bishop, (100) and immediately set out for Northumberland. The early part of this great prelate's life is involved in obscurity. It cannot be doubted that he was a native of Ireland; (101) but I can find nothing further concerning him (102) until what is related as to the occasion of his being raised to the episcopal rank. On his arrival among the Northumbrians king Oswald gave him, according to his wish, the small island of Lindisfarne, since called Holy island, as a place for his see. Aedan lost no time in commencing his mission, and, as he was not as yet perfect master of the English language, the good king, who understood Irish very well, often served him as interpreter. Soon after numbers of auxiliaries, chiefly monks, came over from Ireland, (103) who preached with great zeal throughout the whole country, while such of them as were priests administered baptism to the new converts. Churches were erected in various places; the people flocked with joy to hear the word of God; lands and properties were granted for establishing monasteries and schools, in which the children of the English were taught by Irish masters and even the higher studies were cultivated. (104)

(96) Compare with Bede, L. 5. c. 15.

(97) The Northumbrian kingdom comprized at this period a much greater tract of country than what is now called Northumberland. A very considerable part of the South of Scotland was included in it. See Usher p. 653. seqq.

(98) Bede, L. 3. c. 3. It has been inquired, who were the Scots, among whom Oswald had been an exile. Some say they were the British Scots, and hence Mr. Lingard states (Anglo-Saxon Church, ch. 1.) that Oswald had concealed himself in the mountains of Scotland. Maihew, quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 45.) maintains (Trophæa, &c. Life of Aidan at 31 Aug.) that Oswald had taken refuge in Ireland, and that it was there he became a Christian. Fleury also observes (Hist. Eccl. L. 38. §. 18.) that by the Scots, among whom Oswald was baptized, are to be understood the Irish. And indeed, as Colgan justly remarks, it does not seem probable, that Oswald or his Northumbrian relatives would have entrusted themselves to the protection of the British Scots, who were by no means friendly to that nation, and who must have felt sore at the signal defeat, which they had received some years before from Oswald's father Aedilfrid. (See Bede L. 1. c. 34.) On the other hand the people of Ireland were on the best terms with the Anglo Saxons; and, as Bede attests more than once, very kind to them. If it be admitted, that Oswald took shelter in Ireland, it follows of course that the elders of the Scots, as Bede calls them, to whom that prince applied, were some of the Irish prelates and superior clergy, not indeed of the South but of the North. This is plainly intimated by Bede, who after telling us, that they sent Aedan, accounts for his following the Irish computation of Easter, by observing, that the northern province of the Scots still adhered to it. By northern province he evidently meant the North of Ireland; for immediately after he opposes to their practice that of the Scots of the Southern parts of Ireland. And hence we have an additional argument, that the Scots, with whom Oswald was concerned, were those of Ireland. Cressy refers (Book xv. chap. 3.) the northern province to the Scots of North Britain, among whom he thought that Oswald spent his exile. But he might have observed that, when Bede speaks of the British Scots, he usually calls them the Scots in Britain or who inhabit Britain (See L. 1. c. 34.) Cressy argues from Bede's stating, (L. 3. c. 1.) that the sons of Aedilfrid, of whom Oswald was one, and many young noblemen, had been in exile among the Scots or Picts. Yet this may be well understood of some of those exiles having taken shelter in Ireland, and others in Pictland. This, however, is a question of little importance, and the reader may chuse for himself between Maihew and Cressy.

(99) Bede (L. 3. c. 5.) details a report (ferunt) concerning there having been a bishop sent to Oswald before the mission of Aedan. He does not mention his name; but Hector Boethius (poor authority) calls him Corman, alluding, I suppose, to a confused account (See AA. SS. p. 335.) of a bishop Corman, Connan or Couran, whom some Scotch writers pretend to have been one of those named in the Roman letter above treated of, as if said letter had been written to persons living in the modern Scotland. The report goes on to state, that this bishop being of rather an austere disposition, was not willingly heard by the people, and, finding that he was doing no good among them, returned to his own country, (not monastery, as Mr. Lingard has, loc. cit.) and announced at a meeting of the elders, that his failure was owing to the untractable, rough, and barbarous disposition of that nation. A consultation was then held to determine on what should be done; for the assembled clergy, while sorry for the ill success of the missionary, wished to contribute to the salvation of the Northumbrians. Aedan, who was present, then addressed the returned bishop in this manner; “ I think, brother, that you have “ been too hard towards your unlearned auditors, and have not “ first offered them the milk of gentler doctrine according to the “ apostolic discipline, until, when nourished with the word of “ God, they might be able to comprehend and observe the more “ sublime precepts.” On hearing these words all eyes were turned on Aedan, and it being unanimously agreed that he was a proper person for that mission, he was consecrated bishop and sent to preach in Northumberland.

(100) Lloyd (Church government, chap. 5.) and others suppose, that Aedan was consecrated in Hy. This is indeed very probable; and we know that a bishop resided in the island, (see Not. 234 to Chap. XII.) by whom he might have been consecrated. To this supposition they add, that the monks of Hy were the persons applied to for a bishop by Oswald, and that it was by them that Aedan was sent. But, although it is certain that the superiors of Hy had a share in this transaction, whereas Aedan could not have been made a bishop without the consent of his abbot, then Segenius, it does not follow that they were the only persons concerned in it. For by those elders of the Scots, among whom Oswald had lived, Bede could not have understood the monks or superiors of Hy alone, unless we should suppose, what cannot be admitted, viz. that he and his followers had spent their exile in that very island. Therefore among said elders there were some prelates and dignified clergymen besides the abbot and heads of that monastery. Bede’s saying (L. 3. c. 5.) that Aedan was sent from Hy and from its monastery; “ Ab hac ergo insula, ab horum collegio monachorum, ad provinciam Anglorum instituendam in Christo missus est Aedan, accepto gradu episcopatus”; proves no more than that he was chosen out of that monastery. Nor does Bede state, that he was appointed by the abbot; but, on the contrary, merely observes that his election and consecration occurred in the time of Segenius's administration. In another place (L. 5. c. 22.) Bede says, that the monks of Hy had sent Aedan to preach to the English; which indeed is true, inasmuch as they had taken a part in that business, and Aedan belonged to their body; but this does not exclude the interference and cooperation of those prelates, &c. to whom he most clearly alludes in L. 3. c. 3. and particularly, c. 5. (See Not. prec.)

(101) This is clear from the Annals of Roscrea, ad A. 650 (651), and the calendars of Cashel, Donegall, and Tamlacht or Tallagh, at 31 August (the day of Aedan's death), in which he is spoken of as an Irishman, and bishop in England. (See AA. SS. p. 47.) It is well known, that the great majority of the monks of Hy in those days were from Ireland, and that the abbots and other superiors of that monastery were, for five or six centuries after the death of Columbkil, constantly chosen from among the Irish; and hence we find the names and deaths of the abbots and other distinguished men of Hy as regularly marked in the Irish annals, &c. as those of the members of any religious establishment existing in Ireland. (See Tr. Th. p. 498. seqq. and AA. SS. p. 48.) Now Aedan was undoubtedly, although not abbot, one of the superiors of Hy, as appears from his having had a place in the council among the elders. (Above, Not. 99.) Camden, accordingly (at Ireland, Gen. Treatise) makes him a native of Ireland; and both he and Usher, Ware, Fleury, and all those, who have studied these subjects impartially, speak of the illustrious missionaries, who preached to the English in the 7th century, under the general denomination of Irish. The British Scots were not at that time sufficiently settled to attend to sacred or other studies, and they received their chief clergymen and teachers either from Hy or from the Columbian monasteries of Ireland. Mr. Lingard would have done well in his short sketch of the proceedings of those missionaries to have explained what he meant by the name of Scottish monks, as he usually calls them, ex. c. ch. 1. and iv. He should have let the reader know, that those Scots or Scottish monks, so often mentioned by Bede, were the Irish Scots; a precaution, which he might have found frequently observed by Fleury, when treating of these parts of Ecclesiastical history.

(102) Maihew, having laid down (Life, &c.) that Aedan was a native of Ireland, thought that he was the Aidan, son of Liber, who was a monk of Hy in Columbkil's time, and is mentioned by Adamnan (L. 3. c. 6.) as a religious man of good disposition. Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 386.) was inclined to be of the same opinion, for which, however, there is no foundation except the mere name Aedan, which was exceedingly common in Ireland. Besides its being hard to believe, that a person, who was a monk and grown up man, perhaps, for aught we know, several years before the death of Columbkil, would have been able in 635 to undertake the arduous mission of Northumberland, we may be sure that, if Aidan son of Liber were the same as the bishop, Adamnan would not have omitted this circumstance.

(103) Bede writes; (L. 3. c. 3.) “Exin coepere plures per dies de Scottorum regione venire Britanniam, atque illis Anglorum provinciis, quibus regnavit rex Osvold, magna devotione verbum fidei praedicare.---Monachi erant maxime qui ad praedicandum venerant.” As these preachers came over from the land of the Scots to Britain, it is plain that they came from Ireland; for the land of the British Scots was itself in Britain; and accordingly Lloyd states (chap. v. §. 5.) that these auxiliaries of Aedan “came out of Ireland.” Thus also Fleury (L. 38. §. 19.) calls them missionaries Irlandois.

(104) Bede, ib.

§. 13. Aedan had need of many co-operators to assist him in his pious labours. His diocese stretched far to the North into Scotland, and comprized that of York, of which St. Paulinus had been archbishop for six years. (105) But after Edwin, king of Northumberland, the protector of Paulinus, had been killed in 633 fighting against the British king Caedvalla and the Mercian king Penda, Paulinus, to avoid the fury of the conquerors, retired to Kent. (106) Thenceforth all was confusion at York and throughout all the Northumbrian kingdom; and religion suffered extremely. Aedan, on coming into that country, found himself charged not only with the new mission among people, to whom the Gospel had not yet been preached, but likewise with the care of the church of York, which he and his successors continued to govern for 30 years, without assuming or applying for any title, except that of simple bishop, although they acted in fact as metropolitans. (107) At Lindisfarne Aedan, following the Irish custom, collected around him a monastery, and united the observance of monastic duties with those annexed to his episcopal character. (108) In fulfilling all his obligations he was indefatigable, and "his instructions were well received by every one, because he did not teach otherwise than as he lived with his companions. He neither sought the things of this world, nor cared for them. Whatever he got from kings or wealthy persons he immediately distributed among the poor, that fell in his way. In his journeys here and there he travelled not on horseback, but on foot, except in some case of great necessity, so that, as he went along, he might address those whom he happened to meet, whether rich or poor, and, if infidels, exhort them to embrace the Christian faith, or, if already believers, confirm them in it, and encourage them by words and deeds to almsgiving and the performance of good works. He made it a rule that all those, who accompanied him, whether of the clerical order or not, should be engaged in reading the Scriptures or getting the Psalms by heart. This was a daily occupation of his and theirs, wheresoever they happened to be. And if, what seldom occurred, he accepted of an invitation to the king's table, he took with him only one or two clergymen, and after a short repast hastened away to read with his companions or to pray. From his example religious persons of both sexes adopted the practice of fasting until None (three in the afternoon) on every Wednesday and Friday in the year except between Easter and Whitsuntide. He never overlooked, either through respect or fear, the transgressions “ of the rich, and severely reprimanded them if “ guilty. He made no presents in money to the “ powerful, although he used to treat them with ec“ clesiastical hospitality, but, on the contrary either “ gave to the poor, as above mentioned, whatever “ money he might get from them, or laid it out on “ the redemption of slaves, several of whom he after“ wards instructed and even raised to the priest“ hood.” (109)

(105) Id. L. 2. c. 14.

(106) Ib. cap. 20.

(107) Simeon of Durham writes; (Epist. ad Hug. de archiepiscopis Ebor, in Twysden's Scriptores x.) “ Recedente Paulino, Eboracensis ecclesia per xxx annos proprium non habuit episco-pum: sed Lindisfarnensis, ecclesiae praesules, Aidanus, Finanus, Colmannus, et Tuda, Nordanhimbrorum provinciae administrarunt pontificatum.” Eddius Stephanus (Life of Wilfrid, cap. 10. in Gale's xv. Scriptores) calls Colman metropolitan bishop of York; and he would have so styled his predecessors, if occasion required.
 See more in Usher, p. 78.

(108) “ Aidan quippe, qui primus ejusdem loci episcopus fuit, monachus erat et monachicam cum suis omnibus vitam semper agere solebat. Unde ab illo omnes loci ipsius antistites usque hodie sic episcopale exercent officium, ut, regente monasterium abbate quem ipsi cum consilio fratrum elegerint, omnes presbytori, diaconi, cantores, lectores, caeterique gradus ecclesiastici monachicam per omnia cum ipso episcopo regulam servent.” Bede, Vit. S. Cudberti, cap. 16.

(109) Bede, Hist. Eccl. L. 3. c. 5.

§. XIV. Such was Aedan, and such was the manner in which the Almighty made use of his ministry to convert the Northumbrians, and to establish Christianity on a firm footing in that extensive country.
 To what a degree of religious perfection king Oswald attained through his instructions and example, it is not my province to relate, (110) or to give an account of the veneration, in which he was held both by him and the pious prince Oswin. (111) The only part of Aedan's conduct, with which any fault could be found, was his adhesion to the Irish Paschal computation; (112) yet he was not disturbed in the observance of it, "because every one knew that, although he could not keep Easter contrary to the practice of those who sent him, he diligently fulfilled every Christian duty like all other saints, and accordingly was justly beloved by all, even by those who differed from him on that point, and was held in veneration not only by the people at large but likewise by the bishops Honorius of Canterbury and Felix of the East Angles." (113) This great saint died on the 31st of August, A. D. 651, in the 17th year of his episcopacy. (114) Some writings have been attributed to him rather, I think, on conjecture than on good authority. (115) Aedan was succeeded in the see of Lindisfarne by Finan, who also had been a monk of Hy, and, being consecrated bishop, was sent from that monastery to fill Aedan's place. (116) Finding Lindisfarne without a church sufficiently respectable for the see, which the exertions of Aedan had raised to such a pitch of eminence, Finian erected a suitable cathedral, not however of stone, but, according to the Irish fashion, of oak, and covered with reeds. Soon after his arrival the Paschal question was again revived, owing to some persons, who had come from Kent or France, and who asserted that the Irish computation differed from that of the universal church. Among these was an ardent abettor of the more general practice, Ronan an Irishman, who had learned the true Paschal method in France or Italy, and who, while he brought over several persons to his system, was not able to convince Finan, but rather by his reproofs rendered him more obstinate. (117) The deacon Jacob, whom Paulinus had left at York, used to observe the Roman Easter together with such persons as he had influence over. Also the queen Eanfled, who had lived in Kent, and who had with her a Kentish priest, named Romanus, followed it, while the king Oswiu celebrated the Irish Easter; and it is said to have sometimes happened that, while the king, bishop, &c. were enjoying the Paschal festivity, the other party were still fasting the Lent. (118)

(110) See Bede, L. 3. c. 6---9. seqq. (111) See ib. cap. 14.

(112) Bede, having related various miracles wrought by Aedan, and described him in the highest terms possible as a model for Christian bishops, and as a man that observed every injunction prescribed in the holy scriptures, says (ib. cap. 17.) that he cannot approve of his conduct as to the Paschal system. Then apologizing for it he observes, among other things, that Aedan in the celebration of his Easter had no other object in view than what the whole church had, viz. the redemption of mankind by the passion, resurrection, &c. of our Saviour, and that he did not, as some falsely imagined, keep that festival on any day of the week along with the Jews, but always on a Sunday in commemoration of the resurrection.

(113) Bede L. 3. c. 25. Ledwich, in his ravings concerning the Culdees, endeavours (Antiq. p. 64.) to represent Aedan as not in communion with the Roman prelates, and throws out a malignant charge against Bede's veracity. What impudence! Ledwich to impute lies to such a man as Bede! ! ! Yet he had read Lloyd, who (Church, &c. ch. v. §. 5.) proves from Bede, and particularly from the circumstance of Aedan's having been held in veneration by Honorius and Felix, that he was in communion with the bishops that came from Rome. Ledwich says that one of Aedan's reasons for choosing Lindisfarne for his see was, that, had he fixed upon York, he would have acquiesced in the decision of the Roman pontiff, contrary to the system of the Irish hierarchy. For Paulinus, who came from Rome, had been bishop of that city, and thus York was a Roman see. Now a writer of common honesty would, if inquiring into the reason of Aedan's not settling himself at York, which had been abandoned by Paulinus, have observed that Aedan perhaps thought it improper to reside there, while Paulinus was still alive; although it may be said, that he need not have had any scruple on that score, as Paulinus was actually bishop of Rochester since about two years before Aedan went to Northumberland. (See Bede, L. 2. c. 20.) Had Paulinus returned to York, we may be sure that Aedan would have willingly given up to him the care of his diocese; but, as he did not, Aedan was under the necessity of taking care of it. Whether he had, or not, any such consideration in view, it is easy to account for his having fixed on Lindisfarne, it being a much more retired place than York, and better suited to a monastic establishment. Ledwich says, that Oswald took no notice of Paulinus, being “no admirer of Roman innovations.” It may be that Oswald was not inclined to invite Paulinus to return to York, whereas he was attached to the family of Edwin, (Bede ib.) during whose whole reign Oswald, and his brothers and friends, were obliged to live in exile. (L. 3. c. 1.) To talk of Roman innovations in this case is ridiculous. If Oswald had been considered as an opponent of the Roman missionaries and practices, how could it have come to pass, that he has been held by Bede, and all the abettors of the Romans, as one of the greatest English saints; that so many miracles have been attributed to his reliques; (L. 3. c. 9. seqq.) and that his festival was, from a very ancient period, kept in England on the 5th of August? (See Bede, L. 4. c. 14. and Smith’s note.)

(114) Bede, L. 3. c. 14. and 17. He says of Aedan; “de seculo ablatu, perpetua laborum suorum a Domino premia recepit.” And in the Life of St. Cudbert (cap. 4.) he tells us that Cudbert, when young, saw Aedan’s soul wafted by Angels to heaven. How will the Doctor reconcile this opinion of the Romanists, as he is pleased to call them, concerning Aedan’s sanctity and eternal happiness with his Culdee vagaries? Does he think they would have placed in heaven a man, who was not in communion with Rome? Aedan’s name is in the Roman martyrology at 31 August.

(115) See Ware and Harris, Writers at Aedan. Bale, quoted by Harris, makes mention of Commentaries on the Scriptures, Homilies, &c. as written by Aedan. If there be no better authority for them than that of such a notorious liar, we may safely conclude that they have not existed. I do not know where Harris found, that Bede mentions some Fragments of conferences by Aedan.

(116) Bede says; (L. 3. c. 17.) “Successit vero ei in episcopatum Finan, et ipse illo ab Hii Scottorum insula ac monasterio destinatus:" and (cap. 25.) " Interea Aidano episcopo de hac vita sublato, Finian pro illo gradum episcopatus, a Scottis ordinatus ac mi sus, acceperat."

(117) Ronan (says Bede, L. 3. c. 25.) " nequaquam Finanum emendare potuit; quin potius, quod esset homo ferocis animi, acerbiorum castigando et apertum veritatis adversarium reddidit." It is not easy to determine, whether by the man of ferocious or rough mind Bede meant Finan or Ronan. The context seems to favour an allusion to the former; but the phrase castigando, used by him to denote Ronan's mode of arguing, a mode very unbecoming towards a bishop, might incline one to think that he alluded to Ronan, who appears to have been a very noisy and sharp (acerimus) disputant. It is hard to believe that the Scoto-Irish prelates and clergy, who had sent Finan, would have fixed upon him were he a man of rough disposition, particularly after having experienced the advantage of choosing a person of a mild character. (See above Not. 99.) Colgan says, (AA. SS. p. 45.) that this Ronan was revered in Brittany. I am afraid that he has confounded him with St. Renan, of whom see Chap. ix. §. 12.

(118) Bede, L. 3. c. 25.

§. xv. Notwithstanding this diversity, which was justly considered, a great inconvenience, there was no breach of communion, nor did Finan disturb those, who preferred the Roman computation. This prelate had the happiness to baptize Peada, prince of the Middle Angles, and son of Penda the pagan king of the Mercians. Peada had come to the court of the Northumbrian king Oswin for the purpose of obtaining in marriage his daughter the princess Alchfleda. But, as his proposal would not be agreed to, unless he and his subjects should become Christians, he listened to the word of God, and was so convinced of the truth, that he declared himself willing to become one, even should the princess be not given to him. Accordingly Peada was, together with all his companions and suite, baptized by Finan in the year 653, and, having got from him four learned and worthy priests for the instruction of his subjects, returned with joy to his own country. Those priests were Cedd, Add, Betti, and Diuma, the three former English, and the last an Irishman. (119) They preached with great success to the Middle-Angles, and the number of converts was so great among that people, that about two years after it was deemed expedient to give them a bishop. Diuma, just mentioned, was chosen for this purpose, and being consecrated by Finan, was placed over not only the province of the Middle-Angles, but likewise the kingdom of Mercia, which had lately fallen under the dominion of Oswin. During the short time that he lived Diuma acquired a great flock for the Lord, and was succeeded by Ceollach or Kel-lach, also a Scot or Irishman, who soon after returned to Hy (120) and had for his successor Trumheri an Englishman, who had been instructed and ordained bishop by the Irish. (121) Finan was also fortunate enough to baptize Sigberet, king of the East Saxons. This nation, having expelled the bishop Mellitus, had returned to idolatry; but their king Sigberet, being a friend of Oswin, and in the habit of visiting him, was induced by this zealous sovereign to embrace the Christian religion; and his example was followed by his friends and attendants, who were with him on one of those visits in Northumberland. They were all baptized by Finan in one of Oswin's residences, the same in which he had baptized Peada. Sigberet, returning to his kingdom, took along with him Cedd above mentioned and another priest, who, perambulating the whole territory of the East Saxons, converted a great number of persons. Some time after Cedd had occasion to return to his own country, and waited upon Finan of Lindisfarne, who, on being informed of the great progress of the Gospel among the East Saxons, appointed him bishop for that nation, and consecrated him with the assistance of two bishops whom he had sent for. (122) Finan is called in the Irish annals and calendars son of Rimed and styled bishop in Saxony (England); and they assign his death to A. D. 659, i. e. 660. (123) According to another account it would seem, that he died in 661 (124) His memory was revered in England on the 17th of February, and in Ireland on the 9th of January, neither of which seems to have been the day of his death. (125) A treatise on the Paschal rite has been attributed to him, but on authority not worthy of credit. (126) Finan was succeeded at Lindisfarne by Colman, of whom and the further state of the Paschal question we shall see lower down.

(119) Ib. cap. 21. Mr. Lingard (Anglo-Saxon, &c. ch. 1.) calls them four Northumbrian priests, although Bede expressly states, that Diuma was not a Northumbrian or Englishman. Nor does he say a word about the part that Finan had in the conversion of Peada, or of his having supplied him with these priests; nor does he even vouchsafe to mention his name. This gentleman studiously avoids mentioning the Irish missionaries, who have been of such service to his country, and slurs over, in a desultory superficial manner, every thing that might indicate the great obligations, that England is under in this respect to Ireland. Diuma was, in all probability, one of those missionaries, who had gone over from Ireland to assist Aedan in his Northumbrian mission.

(120) Bede, ib. His saying that Ceollach returned to Hy shows, that he had come from that monastery. Elsewhere (ib. cap. 24.) he says that Ceollach ad Scottiam rediit, meaning Ireland, of which he considered Hy as an appendage, inasmuch as it was inhabited by Irish monks. It seems, however, that Bede's meaning in this passage was, that Ceollach, although he stopped for a while at Hy, returned to Ireland itself, whence he had originally come. By Scottia he certainly did not allude to the territory of the British Scots, which he never calls by that name, while he uses Scottia, indiscriminately with Hibernia, for Ireland.

See ex. c. L. 2. c. 4. L. 3. c. 25. 26. and L. 4. c. 4-26. Colgan treats of Ceollach, AA. SS. ad 14 Febr.

(121) Bede, L. 3. c. 21. and 24. (122) Ib. cap. 22.

(123) Acts of Finan at 9 Januar. Colgan there refers to the Annals of Clonmacnois, Roscrea, 4 Masters, &c. &c. Nothing further is wanting to show, that Finian was a native of Ireland; for, had he not been so, why should our annalists have troubled themselves about him? It may also be observed that this follows likewise from his having been one of the chief monks of Hy; for we may be sure, that otherwise he would not have been raised to the prelacy and see of Lindisfarne. (Compare with Not. 101.) Add that Finan was from the same country with his successor Colman, who, as will be seen, was undoubtedly an Irishman.

(124) Bede having given us to understand, that Aedan died in 651, says (L. 3. c. 26.) that Finan, his successor, held the see for ten years. This, if strictly understood, would bring us to 661. But, if these years be taken not as complete, and supposing that Finan died in a late part of the year, or that Bede reckoned under Finan's incumbency the whole time that elapsed until his successor Colman got possession of the see, Bede's notation, and the date of the Irish annalists will perhaps be found to be exactly the same.

(125) Colgan at Finan's Acts.

(126) It is that of the impostor Bale, who has been copied by others. Instead of Bale, we find Bede in the English translation of Ware's Writers (at Finan). This is a typographical error, and has been avoided by Harris.

CHAP XVI.

St. Gall erects the abbey of St. Gall in Switzerland—St. Columbanus used to offer the sacrifice of salvation in brazen vessels—Gallus apprized in a vision of the death of St. Columbanus, and celebrates mass in commemoration of him—Gallus recommended to be chosen bishop of Constance, but declines the honour and proposes his disciple John, who is thereupon chosen—Gallus invited to become abbot of Luxeu after the death of Eustatius, but declines the invitation—Death of Gallus or St. Gall—St. Deicolus or Dichuill brother of St. Gall and a disciple of St. Columbanus, erects two oratories at Luthra now Lure—Is visited by king Clotharius II. who bestows him land on which he builds a monastery—After some time retires from the monastery and dies—He is called by the people of that country St. Die, and is held in high estimation—Caidoc and Tricor, two Irish priests distinguished for their sanctity at Ponthieu in Picardy—Tricor changed his name to Adrian—Both became monks in the monastery of Centula, and there died and were buried—Account of Rantic, Quilian or Kilian, Chillen Fiacre and other Irish missionaries, who flourished and became famous in the Continent—Account of St. Fursa or Fursey—His labours in Ireland, England and France, in which latter country he died and was interred—Foillan and Ultan, brothers of Fursey, go to Brabant, together with some other Irishmen, upon the invitation of St. Gertrude abbess of Nivelles—They erect monasteries and die—The Martyr St. Livin a native of Ireland—Left Ireland, and with three companions went into Belgium—His labours in converting the Pagan inhabitants of Flanders and Brabant—Is murdered by a multitude of Pagans—The Holy Virgin Dymrna flies to the Continent from her father, a Pagan, who wishes to marry her—Is murdered by him—St. Fridolin the traveller—Founds several churches and monasteries in the Continent—Several other Irish Saints who illustrated France and Belgium by their piety and zeal—St. Madelgar or Maldegar, surnamed Vincent, an Irishman—St. Florentinus an Irish Priest—Roding an Irishman, vulgarly called Rouin.

SECT. I.

WHILE the Irish missionaries were thus employed in England, other holy men, also natives of Ireland, were instructing and edifying by their example the inhabitants of various parts of the Continent. We have left Gallus at Bregentz in 612, (1) who not liking to remain there, returned, while still sick, to his friend the priest Willimar at Arbona, (2) who provided him with a habitation, and, entrusting him to the care of two of his clerks Magnoald and Theodore, supplied him with every thing necessary, so that in the course of some time he was perfectly restored to his health. (3) Wishing to retire to a solitary place, he applied to Heltibold, a deacon under Willimar, who was well acquainted with every part of that country, and with his assistance fixed upon a spot for that purpose near the little river Steinaha (Stinace) (4) where now stands the town and abbey of St. Gall. The saint consecrated his retreat by a fast of three days, and there led an almost solitary life. Some time after he erected an oratory with some small habitations annexed for twelve monks, whom he instructed with great care. (5) It is related that Gallus expelled an evil spirit from Fridiburga, the daughter of Gunzo duke of that country, who had been betrothed to Sigebert king of Austrasia. It is added that, being after her recovery conducted by her father to Metz, where Sigebert resided, and having related how and by whom she had been cured, the king made a grant to the saint of the place where he lived, and sent him some presents. (6) Meanwhile Fridiburga, grateful to God for her recovery, and having been advised by St. Gallus, secretly took the veil at Metz at the very time that her marriage with Sigebert was expected every moment ; which, so far from being offended at, he highly approved of. (7) Sigebert had sent to Fridiburga, before she set out for Metz, some valuable presents, which her father made over to Gallus. The saint brought them to Arbona, and there began to distribute them among the poor. Among them was an elegant silver cup, which Magnoald above mentioned, and now a disciple of Gallus, wished to reserve for the use of the altar. But Gallus ordered it also to be given away, saying that he remembered the words of St. Peter ; silver and gold I have none ; and that his master Columbanus was wont to offer the sacrifice of salvation in brazen vessels, because our Saviour is said to have been affixed to the cross with nails of brass. (8)

(1) Chap. XIII. §. 12.(2) See Chap. XIII. §. 10.

(3) Walafr. Strab. Vita S. G. L. 1. cap. 8. In a Life of St. Magnoald, alias Magnus, published by Canisius, Antiq. Lect. Tom. 5. al. 1. and by Messingham in his Florilegium, and written by an impostor, (as Mabillon says, Annal. Bened. ad. A. 646.) who assumed the name of Theodore, Willimar's two clerks, Magnoald and Theodore, are represented as having been disciples of St. Columbanus, and left by him at Bregentz to take care of Gallus. But Walafrid positively states, that they belonged to Willimar's church. In that same silly Life Magnoald is said to have been a native of Ireland ; for which there is no more foundation than for Theodore also having been one, as stated in the office of St. Gallus in Burke's Officia propria, &c. They were neither Irishmen nor disciples of St. Columbanus ; but they became disciples of Gallus, particularly Magnoald, who is often mentioned by Walafrid.

(4) Walafr. Strab. L. 1. cap. 10.

(5) Ib. cap. 25. It is said in the Life of Magnoald or Magnus (cap. xi.) that Gallus and Magnus constructed a monastery of wonderful magnitude; and hence, I suppose, has been derived what we find in the Office of Gallus concerning his having presided over 400 monks. The author of that Life confounded the foundation of the saint's small establishment with that of the great monastery erected on the site of it about a hundred years later, viz. in 720, and of which Othmar was the first abbot. (See Fleury, L. 42. §. 54.) That he did so confound them appears from his placing there Othmar together with Gallus and Magnus.

(6) Walafrid gives a long account of this transaction. He calls Sigebert son of Theodoric, and represents the recovery of Fridiburga as having occurred not many days after Gallus had fixed upon his retreat, and before he erected his cell and oratory. But this narrative cannot apply to the Sigebert son of Theodoric, who was only a boy when he succeeded his father in 613, and was very soon after put to death by Clotharius II. Nor can it be referred to Sigebert III. whom his father Dagobert made king of Austrasia in 632, when scarcely two years old. For he was too young to be married during the life time of Gallus. Mabillon observes (Annal. Ben. ad A. 613) that the truth of the whole narrative is deservedly doubted, and that it is rejected as fabulous by Valerius; but adds, that it may perhaps have some reference to Sigebert, king of the East Angles, who had lived for some time in France during the early part of the 7th century. (See Bede, L. 3. c. 18.) This conjecture cannot suit any part of Walafrid's account, and it is plain that he, or whoever he got it from, alluded to Sigebert son of Theodoric. The time referred to is that of his short reign in 613, the very year in which Gallus retired to the spot near the river Strinaha. The mention of a grant of that place to the saint shows that the Sigebert meant was a king of Austrasia. There are other inconsistencies in Walafrid's narrative, which it would not be worth while to enlarge upon; and I cannot but suspect that it is a fabricated story. Yet, as it has been often repeated, I give it as I found it.

(7) Walafr. L. 1. cap. 21.

(8) Ib. cap. 18.

§. II. Gallus was apprized in a vision of the death of St. Columbanus, which was in 615, and immediately celebrated mass in commemoration of him. He then sent Magnoald, by this time a deacon, to Bobbio, to inquire about the circumstances connected with it, and gave him directions to mark the day and the hour, in which Columbanus expired, so that he might be able to verify the truth of his vision. Magnoald, on his arrival there, found that every thing had occurred in the manner revealed to Gallus, and returning brought a letter to him from the brethren of Bobbio and a staff bequeathed to him by Columbanus. (9) The see of Constance happening to be vacant, some prelates and the clergy of the diocese had assembled to elect a bishop. The duke Gunzo invited Gallus to attend the meeting, who accordingly went to Constance, accompanied by the two deacons John and Magnoald. John had studied to great advantage for three years under Gallus. The duke having addressed the bishops and the clergy, and exhorted them to choose a proper pastor according to the canons, all the clergy fixed their eyes on Gallus, and unanimously agreed that, considering his superior knowledge of the holy scriptures, his wisdom, humility, charity towards the poor, and singular sanctity, he was the person fittest to be chosen bishop. The duke then said to Gallus; “Do you hear what they are saying?” He replied; “I wish what they say were true; but they do not know that the canons do not easily (without some very urgent cause) allow strangers to be ordained bishops of districts, which they are not natives of. I have a deacon, named John, a native of this neighbourhood, to whom every thing, that has been stated of me, may be justly applied; and, as I think him elected by the divine judgment, I propose him to you as your bishop.” John was then called, and, being asked would he be able to undergo the burden of the episcopacy, took an opportunity of withdrawing from the assembly, and concealed himself in a church of St. Stephen without the town. Thither he was pursued by the clergy and people, and, as Gallus had vouched for his capability, was brought by force into the presence of the bishops, and being elected by acclamation, was immediately consecrated. He then was asked to celebrate mass, and after the reading of the Gospel Gallus was requested to preach. He did so, and delivered a most excellent discourse, which is still extant. (10) Gallus remained seven days with John directing him in the mode of governing his diocese, and then returned to his cell, not ceasing thenceforth to assist him with his counsels, and receiving from him every mark of attention. (11)

(9) Ib. cap. 25. Walafrid says that the staff was the token the absolution granted by St. Columbanus to Gallus. For, as we have seen, (Not. 52. to Chap. XIII.) he has a story about his having been suspended from officiating at the altar by Columbanus until after his death. But, had he been thus suspended, would he not have waited to celebrate mass in commemoration of Columbanus until after the return of Magnoald from Bobbio and the verification of the vision. The whole business comes to this, that St. Columbanus bequeathed to him, as a mark of affection and brotherhood, that staff, which, says Walafrid, was commonly called Cambota. We find this name often used for a bishop's pastoral staff. The abbatial power was sometimes conferred by means of it. (See Ducange at Cambota.) Perhaps Columbanus meant to communicate to Gallus the right of governing a community.

(10) It was first published by Canisius, Tom. 5. Antiq. Lect. and thence by Messingham. It is an abridged history of religion, very well written and intermixed with moral observations, from the creation down to the preaching of the apostles. It corresponds exactly to the summary given of Gallus' discourse at Constance by Walafrid, L. 1. cap. 24. I am surprized that Ware doubted (Writers at Gallus) of its having been different from a discourse on the form of Church government also by Gallus, which, according to Possevin, is in the library of the monastery of St. Gall. Besides Possevin's stating that they are distinct works, the discourse published by Canisius cannot by any means be considered as a tract on Church government, as its object and tenor are of a very different nature.

(11) Walafrid relates all these proceedings at considerable length. They could not have occurred before 616; for John had been a disciple of Gallus during three years. (See L. 1. cap. 22.) Now he did not become so until some time after Gallus had withdrawn from Arbona to his retreat, (see cap. 14 and 19.) and consequently, at the earliest, until 613. Therefore Walafrid is evidently wrong in placing these transactions before the death of St. Columbanus in 615.

§. III. Eustasius abbot of Luxeu having died in 625, (12) the monks of that monastery determined on electing Gallus as his successor, and sent a deputation of six members of their community, all Irishmen, to request that he would undertake the government of Luxeu. Having read the letter of invitation he said that, having abandoned his relatives and acquaintance, chosen a solitude for his dwelling place, and refused a bishopric, he could not think of being raised to any rank, which might involve him in the cares of this world. He detained them for some days, treating them with great civility, but positively refused to quit his retreat. I find nothing further concerning the transactions of this holy man until a short time before his death, when in compliance with the pressing request of the priest Willimar he went to Arbona and preached there on a day of solemnity. He was soon after taken ill of a fever, under which he laboured fourteen days, and died, at the age of 95 years, on the 16th of October (13) about A. D. 645. (14) He was buried in the place of his retreat, and his memory was revered there in a church, which was constantly attended by some religious persons, who had a priest for their superior, and much frequented by pilgrims and people, who wished to obtain favours from God through the intercession of the saint. This establishment was afterwards changed into a great monastery, of which a holy priest named Othmar was the first abbot. (15) Besides one or two sermons, (16) St. Gallus is said to have left some other tracts. (17) That he was an assiduous preacher of the Gospel is well known; and his exertions both in that line, and in forming disciples capable of instructing the people, were such that he has been called the apostle of the Alemanni or Suevi. (18)

(12) Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 625. Fleury, L. 37. §. 27.

(13) Walafr. L. 1. cap. 28.

(14) This is the year marked in the Office of Gallus. Mabillon makes mention of his death under A. 646, although he was not certain that this was the precise year of it. Were we to believe the author of the Life of Magnoald, Gallus would have died in 625; for he places it in the tenth year after the return of Magnoald from Italy, and therefore about ten years after the death of St. Columbanus in 615. Even Walafrid comes near to the same point, where he states (L. 1. cap. 28.) that the last illness of Gallus seized him not long after the invitation (in 625) to Luxeu. But how, says Mabillon, can this be reconciled with his having lived to the age of 95 years? Is it to be supposed that, were he so old in 625, the monks of Luxeu would have looked to him in that year as their abbot? Omitting other considerations, I shall merely add that, if Gallus died in 625, he would have been 85 years old in 615, and consequently then older than his master Columbanus, who does not appear to have lived beyond the age of about 75. (See Not. 69 to Chap. XIII.) Now it is clear from Walafrid passim (ex. c. cap. 1.) that Gallus was several years younger than Columbanus. Either then Gallus did not live to the age of 95; or, if he did, he must have been alive long after 625. Usher, following the pretended Theodore, author of the Life of Magnoald, (not Gallus, as he says) assigns (Ind. Chron.) the death of Gallus to 625. Ware (Writers at Gallus) adds, that some place it in 635. For this I believe he had no better authority than a typographical error in AA. SS. p. 126, where 635 appears for the death of Gallus instead of 625, which Colgan must have intended to mark, whereas he quotes for it the same Theodore.

(15) Walafr. L. 2. c. 10. (compare with Not. 5.) Mabillon observes, (Annal. Ben. ad A. 646) that even before Othmar's time the church, &c. of St. Gallus was sometimes called monastery.

(16) See Not. 10.

(17) Ware and Harris, Writers at Gallus. It is odd that Dupin makes no mention of this saint's writings. A short letter of one Gallus has been published by Canisius, Antiq. Lect. Tom. 5, or, in Basnage's edition, Tom. 1. p. 650. It is addressed to Desiderius, who was bishop of Cahors between 629 and 650. Usher republished it (Sylog. Ep. Hib. No. 10.) under the name of our Gallus. But Basnage (Not. ib.) justly observes, that it was written by a Gallus bishop of Clermont. The writer speaks of Marseilles, Cahors, and Rutenicum (the district of Rodez), places, which our Gallus had nothing to do with. There can be no doubt of its having been written by the Gallus, who became bishop of Clermont in the year 650 under the name of Gallus the second, and who is marked as the twenty-third bishop of that see. See Sammarthan, Gallia Christiana, Tom. 2. p. 244.

(18) In Notker's Martyrology at 18 October it is said that, passing over the multitude of miracles wrought through him before and after his death, it is sufficient to observe, that Divina pietas beatum Gallum genti Alemanniae apostolum fecit, qui nationem, quam paganismo involutam reperit, fidei veritate imbutam, de tenebris ignorantiae ad solem justitiae, qui Christus est, ipse callis Dei solers viator reduxit, &c."

§. iv. St. Deicolus or Deicola, in Irish Dichuill, of whom some mention has been made already, (19) was maternal brother of St. Gallus, and, like him, a disciple and follower of St. Columbanus, (20) with whom he remained at Luxeu until his final expulsion from that place in the year 610. (21) Having left Luxeu together with his master, he found himself, after having walked two miles, unable to continue the journey, owing to the weakness of his feet, added to his being then far advanced in years. (22)

He therefore supplicated Columbanus for leave to remain behind, which being granted, he did not run the risk of returning to Luxeu, but went through lonesome places, as well as he was able, until he arrived at a spot, called Luthra in the midst of a forest, now Lure, in the district of Besançon. (23) There he stopped, and as he used to resort to a neighbouring church, was soon taken notice of by the people of that district, particularly by a pious lady named Bertildis, the relict of Weifhar, a lord the country. She made him a grant of some ground at Luthra, on which, religious men flocking to him from various quarters, he formed a community of monks, and erected two oratories, one dedicated to St. Peter and the other to St. Paul. Some time after the king Clotharius II. happening to be in those parts on a hunting excursion, and hearing of Deicolus called upon him. On inquiring whence he came, and how he and his brethren were able to subsist, he found that Deicolus had been a disciple of his friend St. Columbanus, and immediately requested of him to remain where he was, assuring him that his monastery should want for nothing necessary. Accordingly he made over some land to the establishment, so as to enable it to become a considerable monastery. (24) Deicolus, having governed Luthra for several years, and wishing to spend his last days in retirement, resigned the administration, and appointing Columbinus, one of his disciples, (25) abbot in his stead, withdrew to a solitary cell where he devoted his time to divine contemplation. He died on the 16th of January, (26) about the year 625. (27) His memory is still held in high estimation by the people of that country, who call him St. Dié; (28) and his name is marked in a considerable number of martyrologies. (29)

(19) Not. 5. to Chap. XIII. A Life of Deicolus has been published by Bollandus at 18 Januar. and again by Colgan, who observes that there were extant four other Lives of this saint, but all less accurate than this one.

(20) The author of Deicolus' Life says (cap. 2.) that St. Columbanus had, besides his namesake Columbanus, (see Not. 5. to Chap. XIII.) as his chief and favourite disciples, "praecipuos et prae caeteris sibi familiares—geminos uterinos fratres Gallum atque Deicolum." In the Necrologium of the monastery of St. Gall at 18 Januar. Deicolus is called brother of St. Gallus. This is remarked by Mabillon, (Annal. Ben. ad A. 625), who adds that this consanguinity is not noticed in the Acts of Deicolus. He must not have seen those published by Bollandus and Colgan.

(21) See Chap. XIII. §. 6.

(22) Life, cap. 3. Hence Colgan concludes that Deicolus was older than Gallus, who was at that time, and for many years after, vigorous and active.

(23) See Fleury, L. 37. §. 27.

(24) Life, cap. 5. The author, who lived at a period much later than the times of Deicolus, and when monasteries were richly endowed, represents the grants made to Luthra by Clotharius as much greater than we may be sure they really were. This monastery became gradually possessed of large estates, but not until long after the death of Deicolus. He then tells us, that the saint went to Rome, and, having made his monastery and lands tributary to the Holy see, obtained for it various privileges and exemptions from the interference of kings, &c. This would have been a very strange return for the kindness of Clotharius. These foolish stories are scarcely worth notice. Such deeds of vassalage, monastic privileges, &c. were not known in the days of Deicolus. The author imagined, that because they existed in the tenth century, in which he appears to have lived, the same practices had prevailed at all times.

(25) It is said in the Life, that Columbinus had been baptized by Deicolus. Colgan uses this as an argument to show, that he was a native of Ireland, in the supposition that he was baptized in his infancy. But might not Columbinus have been a Burgundian converted by Deicolus, who in baptizing him gave him that name, and then took him into his monastery? Bollandus also brings Columbinus from Ireland. Yet the matter is still doubtful.

(26) Life, cap. 6.

(27) Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 625.

(28) Fleury, L. 37. §. 27.

(29) See AA. SS. p. 127. He is particularly praised in Sausai's Gallican martyrology, where we read of him; "In veson-tionensi territorio, Lutra coenobio, depositio S. Deicolae, discipuli S. Columbani, et primi illius monasterii abbatis, viri caelesti speculatione, virtutum multiplici gloria, ac miraculorum insignium splendore praeclari."

§. v. In these times two Irish priests, Caidoc and Fricor, (30) were distinguished for their sanctity in the territory of Ponthieu in Picardy. They are said to have gone to France with St. Columbanus, but this can hardly be reconciled with its being stated that their arrival in Ponthieu was in the reign of king Dagobert, and accordingly not earlier than the year 622. (31) Being badly received and ill treated by the rustics of that country they were on the point of being forced to quit it, when a young nobleman, named Richarius, who lived at Centula, now Centule, in Ponthieu, took them under his protection, and bringing them to his house treated them with great respect and attention. He listened to their instructions, and regretting the follies of his past life made a confession of his sins, and became a real penitent. Henceforth they preached freely, and with great success, throughout various parts of Picardy. Fricor changed his name into Adrian as more pleasing to his auditors. Meanwhile Richarius was improving in sanctity, and at length, following the advice of his holy directors, determined on retiring from the world. Having distributed a great part of his large property among the poor he founded the celebrated monastery of Centula about, it seems, the year 625. (32) He is said to have visited Rome, accompanied by Caidoc. On their return to Centula Caidoc embraced the monastic life in that place, and continuing there until his death was buried within the precincts of the monastery. (33) Fricor also became a monk at Centula and was likewise buried there. (34) At what time either of them died is not known; but it must have been later than the year 630. (35) Two other Irish missionaries of these times Rantic, or Ranric, and Quilian, or Kilian, are said to have been disciples of St. Columbanus, but I believe without sufficient foundation. They assisted St. Vulganius in preaching to the Morini, the inhabitants of the tract, in which Boulogne is situated, (36) and to others in those parts. Vulganius was himself from Ireland, and is said to have first distinguished himself at Canterbury, and even to have been archbishop there. As to this story, which seems to be founded on Canterbury having been mistaken for some place in Ireland, (37) we may pass it by; but it is certain, that Vulganius, who is usually called a bishop, distinguished himself as a zealous missionary during part of the seventh century in Belgic Gaul, where his memory is still highly revered. He was alive after 650. (38) The year of his death is not known; but the day marked for it is the 2d of November. (39) His remains are preserved in the collegiate church of Lens in the diocese of Arras. (40) With regard to Rantic and Quilian I can find nothing further, except that the latter was buried at Montreuil in Picardy, where his relics are held in veneration. (41)

(30) Colgan treats of Caidoc at 24 Jan. and of him and Fricor, alias, Adrian together at 31 Mart.

(31) In the Life of St. Richarius of Centula, written by Alcuin, it is said, that during the reign of Dagobert many holy men appeared, among whom Richarius, and that in said times two holy priests, one of whom was Caidoc, came from Ireland to the territory of Ponthieu. Now the reign of Dagobert, even before he became king of all France, did not begin until 622, (see Abregé, &c. at Clotharius II.) which was about 32 years after the arrival of St. Columbanus in France. Malbrancq (De Morinis, L. 2. c. 55.) brings Caidoc and Fricor to France with St. Columbanus in, he adds, the reign of Sigebert, king of Austrasia, meaning Sigebert the husband of Brunehild. Menard says nearly the same; (Append. ad Martyrol. Benedict.) but we have seen (Not. 9. to Chap. XIII.) that Jonas, whom they followed, was mistaken as to Sigebert. And as to their having accompanied St. Columbanus, if it be true, how is the time to be fixed, at which they stopped in Picardy? Malbrancq seems to say that they settled in that province about the time of St. Columbanus' arrival in France, or, at least, the year 591. This cannot agree with what he tells us himself, that, very soon after their arrival in Picardy, Richarius placed himself under their direction, and that in a short time he became eminent for sanctity. Now it is well known, that Richarius founded the monastery of Centula not very long after he had embraced a penitential life. But this monastery did not exist until about 625. How then can it be supposed, that Richarius was a disciple of Caidoc and Fricor as far back as 591? Perhaps it may be said that they did not go to Picardy until after the dispersion of the monks of Luxeu, and might have stopped there about 611 or 612, when Richarius was a young lad. Mabillon, who thought it probable that they had been disciples of St. Columbanus, as Hariulfas says in his Chronicle of Centula, seems to have had some opinion of this sort. (See Annal. Ben. ad A. 615.) Yet even that period appears too early; and still remains the difficulty founded on their arrival in Picardy being assigned, in the Life of Richarius, to the reign of Dagobert. On the whole it is much more probable, that they were not disciples of Columbanus, and that it was just after their landing in France, as Fleury says, (L. 37. §. 28.) that they fell in with Richarius. We may add that Caidoc and Fricor are spoken of, not as monks but as priests, at the time of their undertaking the direction of Richarius.

(32) Fleury, ib. Mabillon (at A. 627) says that it was founded not long before Dagobert acquired the kingdom of Neustria after the death of his father Clotharius II. in 628. He states, that Richarius founded it originally on account of Caidoc and Fricor, and that being there trained by them in monastic discipline he afterwards governed it as abbot.

(33) AA. SS. p. 162 and 797. Caidoc's tomb was repaired by Angilbert, who was abbot of Centula in the reign of Charlemagne. He wrote and got inscribed on it, in golden letters, the following epitaph :

Mole sub hac tegitur Caidocus jure sacerdos,
 Scotia quem genuit, Gallica terra tegit.
 Hic, Domini Christi gaudens praecepta secutus,
 Contempsit Patrias mente beatus opes.
 Hinc sibi concrevit centeni copia fructus,
 Et meruit aetherei praemia larga soli.
 Hinc Angilbertus, fretus pietate magistri,
 Et tumulo carmen condidit, et tumulum.

(34) Mabillon at A. 627. See also AA. SS. p. 799.

(35) In the Anglican martyrology quoted by Colgan (ib.) it is said that they ended their days about 640.

(36) See Chap. III. §. 8.

(37) Malbrancq (De Morinis L. 2. c. 50.) speaks of Vulganius, as having been instructed by Quirian bishop of Canterbury. Who has ever heard of such a bishop having been there? The name is Irish, being the same as Kieran, as is also Vulg nius, which is but a Latin inflexion of our Bolcan. I suspect that Malbrancq, or rather the author, whom he followed, mistook Canterbury, Cantuaria, for Clonmacnois, which had been founded by Kieran, and that Vulganius was probably a member of that monastery, and thence called a disciple of Kieran, inasmuch as he belonged to his establishment and followed his rules. Malbrancq, being led astray by the name, Cantuaria, thence concluded that Vulganius was an Englishman. And then, strange to tell, he introduces him as preaching at Canterbury before 569, the year, in which he says, (ib. cap. 54) that he went to France; as if there were Englishmen or Angles bishops or priests at Canterbury at that period. Then come some stories of how St. Columbanus, who is confounded with Columbkil, being at Canterbury, made over to Vulganius two of his disciples Rantic and Quilian, and that they together with Vulganius left that city to preach elsewhere.

(38) Mabillon (Annal. &c. at 650) makes mention of him as a Scot (Irishman) who is reported to have resigned the see of Canterbury, and with whom Madelgisil is said to have lived at Monstrelet (a place in Ponthieu) after the death of his master St. Furseý, that is, after the year 650. How then could Vulganius have been a preacher before 569, as Malbrancq has laid down?

(39) AA. SS. p. 377. Colgan observes, that his death is placed by some writers as late as about 704, while others assign it to a much earlier period.

(40) Mabillon, ib. at A. 650. St. Vulganius is reckoned among the Irish spiritual benefactors of Belgium by Vernulaeus, De propagatione fidei Christianae in Belgio per sanctos ex Hibernia viros.

(41) Malbrancq, L. 2. c. 58. AA. SS. p. 633.

§. VI. The Quilian or Kilian, now spoken of, must not be confounded with Chillen, also Kilian, an Irish bishop of those times, who having been, as it is said, at Rome, stopped on his return at Meaux with the bishop St. Faro, by whom he was kindly received into his monastery, and directed to preach the Gospel in Artois some time after the year 628.

(42) He was in all probability the St. Chillen, whose remains are said to be at Albinicum (Aubigni) in the diocese of Arras, (43) where his memory is revered on the 13th of November. (44) The same St. Faro received also with great benignity the celebrated St. Fiacre, and his companions, but at what precise time is not recorded. (45) It must have been, however, after 628. (46) Fiacre was of an illustrious family in Ireland. (47) Wishing to lead a solitary life he withdrew to France with some followers, and applied to St. Faro, who was fond of the Irish, (48) for some lonesome spot, that might serve him as a retreat from the bustle of the world. The good bishop immediately supplied him with one out of his own patrimony at a place called Brogillum (Breuil), and surrounded with forests. Here Fiacre erected a monastery in honour of the Blessed Virgin, where he used to receive strangers and guests, living himself in a cell apart. Like many other Irish saints, he made it a rule not to admit females into his monastery. His reputation became so great, that from all parts infirm persons used to be brought to him, whom he cured by merely laying hands on them. The precise time of this saint's death is not known; but there can be no doubt of his having lived many years after his retiring to the diocese of Meaux. (49) He is said to have died on an 18th of August; (50) but his festival is kept on the 30th of said month. His remains were deposited in the oratory of Brogillum, which place has constantly continued to be resorted to by pilgrims, even since they were removed to the cathedral of Meaux in 1568 for protection against the fury of the Calvinists. Innumerable miracles are said to have been performed there; and a great number of churches and oratories have been erected in commemoration of St. Fiacre in France where his festival is generally observed. Some writings have been attributed to this saint, but on authority not worth attending to. (51)

(42) St. Faro founded his monastery in a suburb of Meaux about 628, before which year he does not appear to have been a bishop. (Mabillon ad an.) He was son to Agneric or Chan-neric, the pious nobleman who had entertained St. Columbanus in that city, (see Chap. XIII. §. 9.) and brother of St. Fara, (ib.) as likewise of Chagnoald a disciple of that saint, (ib. §. 12.) who afterwards became bishop of Laon. (Mabillon, ib. and Fleury, L. 37. §. 15.) As Agneric was of the Burgundian nation, his son Faro is sometimes called Burgundofaro, in the same manner as we find his sister under the name of Burgundofara. Malbrancq says, (L. 2. c. 58.) that Chillen went to preach in Artois about 640. Mabillon, who mentions (at A. 628) the circumstance, does not mark the time of it.

(43) Malbrancq, ib.

(44) AA. SS. p. 331.

(45) Mabillon observes, (Annal. &c. ad A. 628) that the dates of Fiacre's transactions are uncertain.

(46) See Not. 42.

(47) Hector Boethius and some other Scotch writers have pretended, that he was a son of an Eugene king of the British Scots. This assertion is rejected by all the ecclesiastical historians; and in the very accurate Office of St. Fiacre in the Breviary of Meaux we read; "Fiacrius, qui et Fefrus, in Hibernia, quam veteres Scotiam appellabant, nobilibus parentibus ortu, &c." In Capgrave's Life of Fiacre he is introduced saying to Faro; "Most Rev. father, Ireland, the island of the Scots, has given origin to me and my ancestors." A hymn for his Office, as read in some churches of France, begins with these words, "Lucernae novae specula—Illustratur Hibernia;—Coruscat Meldis insula—Tantae lucis praesentia. Illa misit Fiacrium,—Haec missum habet radium;—Habent commune gaudium,—Haec patrem, illa filium."

(48) This is easily accounted for, considering the obligations that St. Faro's relatives were under to St. Columbanus. See Not. 42.

(49) According to Fleury (L. 39. §. 30.) he did not die until towards 670. In the Office drawn up by Burke at 30 August (Officia propr. &c.) his death is assigned to 630. This is contrary to all probability, and there is good reason to think, that he had scarcely arrived in France by that time. In Fiacre's Life by Capgrave a similar mistake occurs, where it states that he flourished about 622. But surely he did not flourish until after he left Ireland, and that was several years later. Usher is in the opposite extreme, saying that Fiacre flourished in France in 670. Ind. Chron.

(50) Life by Capgrave. In Burke's Office the day of his death is said to have been the 30th of August, for no other reason, as far as I know, than that this is the day marked for his festival.

(51) It is that of Dempster. See Ware and Harris, Writers at Fiacre.

§. VII. One of the most distinguished Irish saints, who in these times filled England and France with the fame of their virtues, was St. Furse, (in Irish Fursa) concerning whom a great deal has been written, and indeed so much that it has served rather to darken than illustrate his history. (52) He was of high birth, (53) as his father was Fintan son of Finnloga king, or prince, of South Munster, (54) and his mother Gelges daughter of Aedhfinn (Hugh the white) prince of Hy-Briun in Connaught, at whose court Fintan is said to have married her unknown to her father. (55) It is related that Aedhfinn, on discovering her marriage, was so displeased with her, that she and her husband were obliged to quit his principality, and to take shelter with St. Brendan of Clonfert, who was then in an island called Esbren, (56) and by whom they were received with great kindness, and entertained in the hospice with much care, particularly as St. Brendan was paternal uncle to Fintan. (57) It is added, that Fursey was, very soon after, born in that island, (58) and baptized by St. Brendan. According to this account he must have been born before 577, the year in which St. Brendan died. Then we are told, that he was reared in the island, and when of a proper age, taken into the monastery by St. Brendan, with whom he remained until he established one for himself. (59) This part of the narrative is quite inconsistent with the history of St. Brendan, and is sufficient, independently of other considerations, to show that the whole of it deserves very little credit. (60) This much will be admitted that St. Fursey's parents were the persons above mentioned, and that he might have been born in some part of Connaught, (61) probably in Hy-briun among his mother's relatives. (62) Fintan seems to have returned soon after to Munster, where he took care to have Fursey well educated and instructed by some bishops in religious matters. Having made great progress in piety and learning, he left, when arrived at a certain age, his parents, and for the purpose of acquiring greater perfection repaired to a distant part of Ireland. (63) This was the small island of Inisquin, incorrectly called Esbren, (64) where St. Meldan then governed a monastery, probably the same as that, which had been founded by St. Brendan. (65) Meldan was of the sept of Hua-Cuinn, which possessed the country about Lough Orbsen or Lough Corrib. (66) He was, either as founder, or successor of St. Brendan, abbot of Inisquin about the beginning of the seventh century, and was probably also a bishop. (67)*

(52) Furseŷ's Acts were first written by an anonymous writer, whom Bede refers to and follows, L. 3. c. 19. Surius thought these were the Acts which he has at 16 January, and which have been republished by Bollandus at same day. This edition is more correct than that of Surius. Yet Bollandus, who was of the same opinion with Surius, observes that they seem to be imperfect. He has added to them a second book on the Miracles of St. Furseŷ; but from the style and other circumstances it is evident, that this was written by a different author; and Bede speaks of only one book concerning Furseŷ. Mabillon was therefore right in doubting of its being a part of the original Acts, (Preface to his edition of them in AA. SS. Ben. Tom. 2. p. 299.) but agrees with Surius and Bollandus as to the first book being the very tract referred to by Bede. Other Acts of St. Furseŷ were afterwards compiled; among others those, which have been published by Colgan at 16 Januar. in two books, or rather three, as what Bede has concerning Furseŷ has been added by the author as a third one. These Acts have been also republished by Bollandus; and the author of them was Arnulfus abbot of Lagny, who lived in the eleventh century. (Mabillon, ib.) Then comes a very large Life written by James Desmay, Doctor of Sorbonne and Canon of St. Furseŷ's church of Peronne, in French, and translated into Latin by Eugene O'Gallagher an Irish Franciscan of Louvain. This also, though scarcely worth the trouble, has been published by Colgan at 9 Febr. In referring generally to this saint's Acts, the reader will please to recollect that I regularly mean those placed by Colgan under the 16th January.

(53) Bede says of him; (L. 3. c. 19.) "Erat autem vir ille de nobilissima genere Scotorum."

(54) Acts of St. Furseŷ, L. 1. cap. 1. seqq. In the MS. copy, instead of Fintan and Finnloga, the reading is Philtan and Fundloga; and hence we find the names thus written by several foreign writers. But all the Irish writers, that treat of Fursey, have Fintan and Finnloga, which as, Colgan observes, were very usual names in Ireland, while Philtan and Fundloga were unknown in this country. In some Irish Calendars a St. Fursey of Conall Murthemhne (now county of Louth) is mentioned and called son of Finnloga. This led to a mistake of supposing that he was the great St. Fursey. But Colgan proves from the best authorities, that they were different persons, and joins Keating and the Book of Lecane in deriving our Fursey from the line of Loga Laga, a brother of Alill Olum, a celebrated king of Munster. In the Menologium genealogicum they are expressly distinguished; the Fursey of Louth is mentioned (cap. 25.) as son of Finnloga; the other (cap. 37.) as son of Fintan and grandson of Finnloga. The occurrence of the name, Finnloga, in both genealogies gave rise to the mistake. It ought to have been recollected, that this was a very common name in Ireland, and that in the case of Fursey of Louth the Finnloga spoken of appears as his father, while in the other Finnloga is named as a grandfather. Add that in Fursey's acts, and in the Life by Desmay, Finnloga, the father of Fintan and grandfather of St. Fursey, is distinctly represented as a king in Munster. The Fursey of Louth lived, according to Colgan's calculation, an hundred years, at least, before the great St. Fursey.

(55) Acts, L. 1. c. 4. We have often met with the Hy-briuns of Connaught. The one here meant was Hy-brium Breifne; and Colgan states, that Aedh finn was the ancestor of the O'Rourkes and O'Reillys.

(56) Ib. cap. 7. Desmay (cap. 3.) calls it Elbree, and, among other stuff, makes Brendan bishop of it. Colgan thought that the island Esbren might have been written in a mistake for Ard-brennin, or Ardfert, in Kerry. But he is more correct in supposing that by Esbran was meant Esbren or Orbsen, by which name Lough Corrib near Galway was anciently called. Instead of island Esbren we are to read an island in Esbren (Orbsen) i. e. Lough Corrib. And, in fact, Esbren is called a lake in said Acts, L. 1. cap. 11. There can be no doubt, that the island alluded to is Inisquin in Lough Corrib, where St. Brendan is said, having resigned the administration of Clonfert, to have spent the latter part of his life. (See Chap. x. §. 7.)

(57) So the Acts state, but, I am sure, without foundation. Even Colgan could not believe it. This story was seemingly taken from a confusion as to the name Finnloga; for St. Brendan was son of a man of that name. And as Fintan's father was also called Finnloga, hence the confusion; although Fintan should have been made not nephew but brother to St. Brendan. This, however, would have been too absurd and unchronological. But, without enlarging on this point, it is sufficient to remark with Colgan, that St. Brendan was of the family of Hua Alta, (see Chap. x. §. 7.) which was different from that, whence Fintan derived his origin. Yet, as Brendan was a native of Kerry, there might have been some relationship between them.

(58) Acts, L. 1. cap. 8. Colgan places Furse's birth at Clonfert, although in this very chapter, which he was commenting upon, it is laid down, that he was born in the place where his parents were entertained by St. Brendan. Now in the preceding chapter the context leads us to suppose, that this was the island. It is true, that Clonfert is there mentioned as a place, where Brendan had erected a monastery. But Brendan is not stated to have been there, when visited by Furse's parents. Desmay, who also mentions Clonfert, says however, (cap. 3.) that the island of Elbree, as he calls it, was the place, to which they went for the purpose of taking shelter with Brendan. Colgan himself says, (AA. SS. p. 94) that Furse was educated in the island called Esbren; if so, he was, following the Acts, born there; for they most clearly exhibit the place of his education as the same with that of his birth. Thus then, if what is related of Furse's parents having been under the protection of St. Brendan were true, the honour of his birth should be given not to Clonfert, but to Inisquin. (See Not. 56.)

(59) Acts, L. 1. Cap. 8—11.

(60) St. Brendan did not retire to Inisquin until the latter part of his life, and did not live there long enough to see Fintan grow up to manhood and superior of a monastery. For in that case he should have spent there about, at least, 24 years, a greater number than elapsed even from the foundation of his monastery of Clonfert to his death. (See Not. 110 to Chap. x.) Then, according to this story, we should suppose that Furse was born, at least, 24 years before the death of St. Brendan, that is, about 553. Now he lived until, at least, 650. Yet it is not said that he lived to an extraordinary age. Add, that in this supposition Fursey should have been, at least, 80 years old when he went to England; for, as will be seen, he did not arrive there, at the earliest, until 633. It will not be believed, that a man would, at the age of eighty, have left his own country to instruct foreigners. The fact is, that Fursey was probably not born at the time of Brendan's death. Next come various other inconsistencies. Is it to be supposed, that a man and his wife would have been allowed in those days to reside in the precincts of a monastery as long as Fursey's parents are represented to have remained in the island, rearing Fursey, and, as Desmay says, (cap. 4.) there bringing into the world his brothers Foillan and Ultan? And what shall we say of what we read in the Acts of the various and delicious viands, with which Brendan treated his guests, and of his riches? The compiler of these stories thought that Brendan was like those abbots of their own time, who lived like princes, and wallowed in wealth.

(61) The strongest and, indeed, only proof, that St. Fursey was a native of Connaught, occurs in his Acts, L. 1. c. 21, where Beoan and Meldan, whom he is said to have seen in his vision, are stated to have been of the province, in which he was born. Now Meldan, whose history is sufficiently known, was, as will be soon seen, undoubtedly of the province of Connaught. The passage here referred to is taken, almost verbatim, from the old Acts, published by Surius, &c. Yet, as it appears in his edition, we should read, not that Fursey was born in said province, but that he was known there; for instead of natus fuerat, we find notus fuerat. In Bolland's edition it is indeed natus; but Mabillon has notus. Thus then the question as to the province of his birth is still doubtful; for the stuff about Esbren cannot be alleged in favour of Connaught.

(62) The account of Aedhfinn's wrath against his daughter is evidently of a poetical and theatrical kind. She was to be burned to death, escapes this punishment in a prodigious manner, flies with her husband to St. Brendan, and after some years is taken again into favour by her father. This story was made up to make it appear, that Fursey was baptized, educated, &c. by Brendan, and that, because he studied in Inisquin, he had also been born there.

(63) This is the most correct account, of Fursey's younger days, that I have been able to collect from the old Acts, which make mention, only in general terms, of his parents, &c. Nothing is said of what part of Ireland they lived in; but the manner, in which his leaving them is spoken of, seems to indicate that it was at a considerable distance from the place, which he went to. After telling us, that he had got an excellent education, &c. in the country where his parents lived, they add; "Patriam parentesque relinquens sacrae scripturae studiis aliquot vacabat annis." It is not meant, that he left Ireland; for it is plain from the sequel, that he only removed to another part of it. Now this was Inisquin. If Fursey's parents had continued to reside in Connaught, he would have been still so near them as scarcely to justify the phrase, leaving his country and parents. And it is to be observed that, notwithstanding the supposed accident of his having been born in Connaught, Munster is constantly called his patria or country. (See Acts, L. 1. c. 13-14.) Desmay says, (cap. 4.) that Fintan returned with his family to Munster when Fursey was a boy. He adds, indeed, that he left Fursey behind him in the island with St. Brendan. This is a part of the story confuted above (Not. 60); and we know from the old Acts, that Fursey was a grown up young man when he left his father's house and repaired to Inisquin.

(64) See Not. 56.

(65) See Not. 115 to Chap. x. That this was the monastery, to which Fursey retired, is plain from all that we have seen about his having been in the island Esbren, i. e. Inisquin. Maguire, quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 90.) says that Meldan was the spiritual father of St. Fursey. He is called in Fursey's Acts (L. 2. c. 16.) a colleague of Fursey. The author, wishing to uphold the story of Fursey having been a disciple of St. Brendan, did not like to call Meldan his superior. Yet what he says helps to prove, that, at least, he lived in the same monastery with Meldan.

(66) That country is sometimes called Hih-sen, i. e. Hih-Orbsen, sen. contracted for Orbsen.

(67) In the old Acts of Fursey Meldan is called Praesul; and it is said that his memory was universally respected. See also those in AA. SS. L. 1. c. 21. Colgan, who treats apart of Meldan at 7 Feb. observes, that two Meldans are called bishops by Aengus Kelideus, one of whom seems to have been the Meldan of Inisquin.

§. VIII. Fursey having remained for some years with Meldan erected a monastery for himself at, it is said, a place called Rathmat near Lough Orbsen, (68) which was soon supplied with a considerable number of religious persons. When it was properly established (69) Fursey wished to have some of his relatives instructed there, (70) and accordingly set out for Munster with the intention of inducing them to come to his monastery. (71) When arrived near his paternal residence he was suddenly taken ill, and conveyed to a neighbouring house, (72) where he remained for many hours in such a state as to be supposed at the point of death. During this time he had some extraordinary visions, a detail of which the reader will not expect in this place. (73) Either on this occasion, or not long after, in a subsequent vision, he saw the bishops Beoan and Meldan, whom, on their appearing to him, he thought to be dead. (74) From them Fursey received much instruction, for instance, concerning the dreadful effects of pride and of disobedience to superiors of every description, the duties of ecclesiastics and monks, but particularly as to the nature and heinousness of spiritual and inward sins. They told him, that some glory in what they have received from God, as if they had acquired it by their own labour; others afflict their bodies by abstinence and fasting, and are shocked at the slightest external transgressions, while they think nothing of pride, which drove angels from heaven, nor of avarice through which our first parents lost the bliss of the terrestrial paradise, nor of envy which induced Cain to kill his brother Abel, nor of false testimony, by which our Saviour was condemned; and thus they look upon the sins, that are the most grievous in the sight of God, as the lightest, and vice versa; but those saints added, it is not enough to chastise the body, unless the soul be cured of malice and iniquity; and charity is the root and top of all good works. St. Fursey is said to have had these visions in the year 627, (75) which was probably about two or three years after he had founded the monastery of Rathmat. (76) Henceforth he seems to have resigned the administration of it; for it is said, that he went for a whole year all over Ireland announcing what he had seen and heard in his visions, (77) and that he continued for ten years to preach and exhort the people to repentance. (78) During this interval we find him in Munster; (79) yet it is probable that he preached occasionally in other parts of Ireland.

(68) Acts, L. 1. c. 11. Rathmat is there called an island although stated to be near the lake. The author was fond of converting places into islands. Thus he makes even Clonfert an island. Colgan thinks, and with great probability, that Rathmat was the place now called Kill-fursa near Lough Corrib and in the deanery of Annadown. In the Acts ap. Sur. Fursey's monastery is mentioned, but without any particular name.

(69) Harris (Monast.) is wrong in assigning the foundation of Rathmat to the sixth century. It is clear from the sequel of Fursey's history, that it was not founded until several years after the beginning of the seventh.

(70) In the old Acts after the words quoted above (Not. 63.) we read; "Instructusque monasterium in quodam construxit loco, ubi indique religiosis confluentibus ad eum viris aliquos etiam parentum suorum pia solitudine evocare curavit."

(71) It is thus the matter is stated in the old Acts. In the later ones his brothers Foillan and Ultan are spoken of as already along with him at Rathmat, and the object of Fursey's journey to Munster is represented as that of seeing his other relatives, and of giving them spiritual instruction. But their authority is not of equal weight with that of the old Acts, according to which none of his relatives appear to have been at Rathmat, before he set out for Munster. Their statement seems to have been derived from a mis-interpretation of the text of the old Acts. It is true, however, that Fursey, in going to Munster, intended to promote the spiritual welfare of all his relatives.

(72) Old Acts. In the other Acts (cap. 14.) the illness is said to have fallen upon him just as he was setting out for Munster, and it is added that he was brought back to the monastery. But, as already remarked, the former Acts are far more worthy of credit. Capgrave's Life of St. Fursey agrees with them on this point, and so does Fleury, who says, (L. 38. §. 28.) that the saint was taken ill after he had returned to his own country for the purpose of converting his relatives, that is, of inducing them to lead a penitential life. Bede, indeed, (L. 3. c. 19.) speaks of the illness as having seized him, in the monastery, which does not agree with either account. But, as Bede was hastening to relate the visions, he overlooked the detail relative to Fursey's journey.

(73) These and other visions, which Fursey is said to have had afterwards, are related at great length in his Acts. In some other of his lives they are given in a more or less abridged form. Bede (loc. cit.) has only a small part of them. He tells us that an old monk, who lived in the same monastery with himself, used to assert, that a very veracious and religious man had informed him that he had seen St. Fursey in the province of the East Angles, and that he heard him relating his visions. I suspect that, taking them as they appear in the Acts, (ap Colgan) they have been much amplified.

(74) Acts, L. 1. c. 21. Its being said, that Fursey thought they were dead, seems to indicate, that they were still alive. Bede, however, speaks of them, without giving their names, as being dead at that time, and so they are represented in the lives by Capgrave and Desmay, with whom Colgan agrees. Of Meldan we have seen above. Beoan also is called praesul in the old and new Acts, and in Capgrave, a bishop. He was of some part of Connaught; (see Not. 61) but the particular place is not known. His reputation was equally great with that of Meldan.

(75) Usher, Ind. Chron. from the Annals of Ulster.

(76) Fursey was, as has been seen, anxious to place some of his relatives in the monastery, and for that purpose went to Munster. We may be sure that, to fulfil this intention, he did not wait long after he had fixed his establishment on a firm footing. For this two or three years were fully sufficient; and accordingly, if he had the visions in 627, the foundation of said monastery may be justly assigned to about 624. (Compare with Not. 69 and 71.)

(77) Acts, L. 1. c. 30. This is mentioned also in the Acts ap. Sur.

(78) In the old Acts the number of years is ten. In the other (L. 1. c. 31.) and in Capgrave they are twelve, including it seems, the year, in which the saint travelled throughout Ireland. The matter is of little consequence, except as far as it is connected with the question of the time of his going to England.

(79) This appears from the Lives of St. Barr, c. 24. Molagga, c. 19. and Cronan c. 16. See AA. SS. p. 94.

§. IX. Such were the multitudes of people flocking to the saint, that, being no longer able to bear their importunities, he withdrew to a small island in the ocean, (80) and thence repaired soon after to England, accompanied by some religious men, among whom were two brothers of his, Foillan and Ultan. (81) Arriving in the province of the East Angles he was honourably received by the pious king Sigberet, and employed himself, as usual, in preaching the Gospel. His exertions and example were attended with the conversion of many infidels, and with great benefit to others who were already Christians. (82) His arrival in that country is usually assigned to about 637. (83) While engaged in this manner, he was taken ill and had another vision, in which he was encouraged to persevere in his labours and religious practices. Immediately after his recovery he erected a monastery on a spot granted to him by Sigberet at a place called Cnobheresburg (now Burghcastle in Suffolk) in a woody district and contiguous to the sea; which monastery was afterwards enlarged and endowed by king Anna, and the nobles of that country. (84) Some time after, Fursey wishing to lead a still more retired life gave up the care of the monastery to his brother Foillan and two priests Gobban and Dichull. (85) His other brother Ultan had already withdrawn from the monastery, and was living as a hermit in another part of the province. To him Fursey repaired, and spent a whole year with him practising great austerities and subsisting on the daily labour of his hands. But, as the country was disturbed by the inroads of pagans, and foreseeing that the monasteries were in imminent danger, he went over to France. (86) It is said, that, having landed in that country, he was proceeding with some of his disciples through Ponthieu, when at a place, called Macerias (Mazeroeles), belonging to a duke Haymon, he heard great lamentations, which, on his going to the duke's residence, he found to be on account of the death of his only son; and that, having prayed over the deceased, he brought him again to life. Haymon endeavoured to induce Fursey to remain in that district, but could not prevail on him to stay there. (87) Be this as it may, the saint was well received by Clovis II. king of Neustria and Burgundy, or rather by Erchinoald, who as mayor of the palace ruled under him, Clovis being at that time only ten years old. Erchinoald gave him some land at Latiniacum (Lagny) near the river Marne, six leagues from Paris, on which he erected a monastery in or about the year 644. (88)

(80) Acts, L. 1. c. 32.

(81) The translator of Ware's Writers has very awkwardly (at Fursey) called them friers, not knowing that there were no friars in those days. The fratres in Ware's original means brothers.

(82) Bede, L. 3. c. 19.

(83) Usher, reckoning ten years from the date of the visions, places it (Ind. Chron.) in 637. Colgan says, 637 or 638. Mabillon makes mention of it, (Annal. Ben.) at A. 639, as having occurred before it, but in what year is uncertain. Smith (Notes on Bede) differing from these and other writers, assigns it to 633. His argument is founded on the supposition, that Sigberet was killed in 635, and that his reign had begun in 630. Accordingly he concluded that Furseſy's arrival might be placed in 633 as being about the middle of Sigberet's reign. This reasoning would be unanswerable, were Smith right as to the time of said reign. But the commencement of it is placed by others in 636; and, unless we are to set aside the date 627 assigned for Furseſy's visions (see Not. 75.) or the number of ten years, that elapsed between them and his arrival in England, (Not. 78.), the system of these authors is preferable to that of Smith.

(84) Bede L. 3. c. 19.

(85) Ib. Gibbon and Dichull were undoubtedly, as appears from their names, natives of Ireland. They were most probably among those, who had gone over with Furseſy.

(86) Bede, ib. He says that Furseſy "dimissis ordinate omnibus, navigavit Galliam." It is not easy to understand what he meant by dimissis, &c. The more probable explanation seems to be, that he discharged the monks from the monastery until the times should become more peaceable. The mention of the danger impending over monasteries favours this explanation, as if alluding to some step taken by Furseſy for the protection of his monks; and indeed it is hard to think, that he did not look to their safety.

(87) Acts L. 2. c. 1. The reason here assigned for Furseſy's refusing to stop with Hayman is, that he was then going to Rome; and, in fact, they give us a pompous account of his journey to that city, his arrival there, &c. &c. all which are still more pompously described by Desmay, and briefly in Burke's Office of St. Furseſy. This narrative is intermingled with such inconsistencies and anachronisms, that the mere reading of it is sufficient to make us reject it. For instance, it states, that Furseſy was at Rome in the time of Martin I. who did not become pope until 649, and that it was not until after his return from Rome that he went to Lagny in France. Now it is well known, that he was settled in that place prior to 649. There is nothing of this Roman expedition in Bede, Capgrave, &c. and from what they have it is plain, that Furseſy after his landing in France remained there until his death. What gave rise to the story of Fursej having been at Rome was, I believe, its being said in the old Acts that he went from England to France for the purpose of proceeding to Rome, causa visendi Romam. But they do not state, that he actually went thither; and it is plain from the sequel that, on his arrival in France, he was detained there particularly by Erchinoald, and not a word occurs to show, that he ever after travelled to Rome.

(88) Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 644. Fleury, L. 38. §. 28. Smith Not. to Bede, L. 3. c. 19. Usher was mistaken in assigning (Ind. Chron.) Fursej's arrival in France to A. D. 640. Erchinoald was not as yet mayor of the palace in that year.

§. x. When it became known in Ireland that Fursej was settled at Lagny, Emilian, al. Emmian, who is said to have been instructed by him before he went abroad, left Ireland with some other religious persons to join him at that place; and, when arrived there, they were most kindly welcomed by him and received into the monastery. (89) Having governed for some years this establishment, which his reputation had rendered very numerous, the saint wished to visit his brothers Foillan and Ultan, who were still in England. (90) Entrusting Emilian with the care of it he set out for that purpose, and on his way stopped a while at Macerias with the duke Haymon. Here he fell sick, and, having received the holy viaticum, was removed to a better world about the year 650. (91) The day of his death is variously assigned; but the most probable opinion is that it was the 16th of January. (92) Erchinoald, on hearing of the saint's death, hastened to Macerias and got his body removed to Peronne, where it was laid down in the porch of a church, which Erchinoald had just built there. It remained unburied for several days, (93) until the dedication of the church should take place, which was to be within a month. This ceremony being performed, it was deposited near the altar. Four years after it was removed to a chapel built for this purpose in the same church to the East of the altar, the ceremony of the translation being performed with great solemnity by St. Eligius (Eloi) bishop of Noyan and Autbertus, bishop of Cambrai. (94) The day of this translation was the 9th of February. (95) Some writers hold, that St. Fursey was a bishop; and their opinion is not quite unfounded; but the matter is still uncertain. (96) As to his having been author of certain tracts, (97) there is no sufficient authority for it. Besides Emilian, several other followers or disciples of St. Fursey, who also are said to have been natives of Ireland, are mentioned as having been with him at Lagny, for instance, Eloquius, Mombulus, Adalgisus, Etto, Bertuin, Fredegand, Lactan, Malguil, &c. (98)

(89) Fursey's Acts, L. 1. c. 38. Colgan treats of Emilian at 10 Mart. the day on which his memory was revered at Lagny. He is spoken of by Menard and others as having been a disciple of Fursey, before the latter left Ireland.

(90) Ultan was probably still in his hermitage; whether Foillan was then governing the monastery of Burghcastle, or living in retirement, I cannot discover. Not long after they both went to the continent.

(91) Mabillon assigns St. Fursey's death to 650. Other writers, quoted in AA. SS. p. 97. mark other years; but their dates are not worth attending to. The Annals of Roscrea and of Boyle, referred to (ib.) place it in 652. As to the Annals of Boyle, Ware quotes them (Writers at Fursey) as having not 652 but 653. This date may be reconciled with the other, if we suppose that the Annals of Roscrea anticipated the Christian era by one year, according to what we find in several other Irish annals. Either 652 or 653 may be as probable a date as Mabillon's; and his 650 ought perhaps to be understood about 650.

(92) According to the Acts (L. 2. c. 17.) and Desmay, followed by Colgan, he died on the 9th of February. Others have the 4th of March. But some Irish calendars mentioned in AA. SS. p. 97. and Mabillon (at A. 650) assign his death to the 16th of January. I do not know where Burke found what he has in the Office of St.

Fursej, viz. that he died on the 26th of December. Colgan, who reckons seven different days, on which the saint's memory was revered, as anniversaries of his death, burial, translation of reliques, &c. has it not among them.

(93) Bede says 27. But it is probable, that they were not more than 23, viz. the intervening days between the 16th of January and the 9th of February, on which there is every reason to think that St. Fursey's remains were buried, and which is the day marked for it by Mabillon.

(94) Acts, L. 1. c. 40. seqq. See also Bede, L. 3. c. 19. It is observed that the body, when removed, was quite sound.

(95) Acts, L. 2. c. 17. The author makes said day the anniversary of St. Fursey's death; and hence the opinion of his having died on a 9th of February. But from Bede's statement it appears to have been that of his burial. Thus he must have died several days prior to the 9th of February, and, we may safely admit, on the 16th of January, the day on which his festival has been constantly celebrated.

(96) He is called a bishop in the life of St. Cronan (see AA. SS. p. 96.) and in the Annals of Ulster ap. Usher, Ind Chron. A. 627. Neither Bede nor the Acts give him this title. Desmay indeed does; but his account of Fursey's consecration is so fabulous, that his authority is good for nothing. He says, (cap. 14.) that Fursey and his brother Foillan were both ordained bishops at Rome by Pope Martin I. Now it has been seen, (Not. 87.) that Fursey never was at Rome; and as to Foillan, he did not visit the continent until after Fursey's death. Even Colgan rejects this story, and joins Ferrarius, who says that St. Fursey was a bishop, but consecrated in Ireland. Mabillon observes. (at A. 650) that a writer of his Life, prior to Arnulph, makes him a bishop, and that his figure was represented, more than 500 years before his (Mabillon's) time, in pontifical robes, on the great door of St. Fursey's church at Peronne. Yet at A. 645 he says, that he was not a bishop, although improperly called so, like Richarius of Centula and some others, on account of his having been a great preacher of the Gospel. This was also the opinion of Molanus, who mentions, (at 16 Januar.) that St. Fursey is revered as a bishop in the diocese of Cambray; perhaps he was a chorepiscopus, or one of those bishops without regular sees, of whom there were, in those days, many in Ireland.

(97) See Ware and Harris, Writers.

(98) AA. SS. p. 96. Some Belgian writers say, that Eloquius was the immediate successor of Fursey at Lagny. This does not agree with what I have seen concerning Emilian having been charged with the care of it. According to Desmay (cap 18) the monks, on being informed of St. Fursey's death, elected Eloquius as abbot. If so, Emilian must have resigned the administration. Colgan calls Eloquius the third abbot. The same writers make Mombulus succeed Eloquius, and exhibit Adalgisus and Etto as brothers of the priest Gobban, who had been with St. Fursey in England, and founders of monasteries in Belgium. It is added that Etto was a bishop, and instructed the people of Avernus. (AA. SS. p. 51.) Molanus mentions (Natales sanctorum Belgii at 10 July) Etto being called Hiberniensis episcopus, and speaks of a church under his name at a place called Baym near Arras. Bertuin also is said to have been a bishop and to have established a monastery at Maconia in the new territory of Liege. (See more AA. SS. ib. and p. 96.)

§. XI. Not long after St. Fursey's death his brothers Foillan and Ultan left England and went over to Brabant, having been invited, together with some other learned Irishmen, by St. Gertrude, abbess of Nivelles, (99) for the purpose of instructing her community in sacred psalmody and religious matters. Aided by the munificence of St. Gertrude they erected a monastery for the accommodation of their countrymen at Fossás (Fosse) not far distant from Nivelles. (100) Ultan remained there in care of the establishment, Foillan having returned to Nivelles where he superintended both the spiritual and temporal affairs of the nunnery. Some time after Foillan being on his way to see his brother at Fosse, met in the forest of Sinesia (101) with robbers, by whom he and three of his disciples, who accompanied him, were plundered and killed. (102) This happened in or about the year 655 (103) on the 31st of October. As the bodies had been thrown into a thick part of the forest, they were not discovered until the 78th day following, that is, the 16th of January, on which the Invention of St. Foillan has been commemorated. (104) His remains were buried at Fosse, and he is called a martyr. (105) He is also called a bishop, and it is probable that he really was so; (106) although not consecrated, as some have said, by Pope Martin I. at Rome, where he does not appear to have been at any time. (107) As to Ultan, we find him, some time, probably short, after the death of Foillan, superior of the monastery of Peronne, which, as well as that of Fosse, was considered as an Irish monastery. (108) I do not find the precise time of its foundation; but it must have been after the death of St. Fursey, in honour of whom it was established. (109) It is said that Ultan still continued to superintend, also, the monastery of Fosse, at least for some time, and that he was also the first superior of the monastery of St. Quintin near Peronne. (110) He is said to have lived until about 676; and his memory is revered at Peronne and elsewhere on the second of May. (111)

(99) St. Gertrude was daughter of Pepin of Landen, who had been mayor of the palace under the kings Clotharius II. Dagobert I. and Sigebert III. Nivelles is in Brabant between Mons and Brussels. See Fleury, L. 38. §. 58.

(100) Fosse is near the river Sambre not far to the West of Namur, and in the diocese of Liege. The monastery was called the monastery of the Irish; it has since been changed into a collegiate chapter-house and church. (AA. SS. p. 103.)

(101) Soigne or Soignies in Hainaut. (102) AA. SS. p. 99.

(103) Colgan states from various authors, (ib. p. 300.) that Foillan was not killed before 655. Smith (Not. to Bede L. 3. c. 19.) says about 656. Mabillon (Annal. &c. at 652) treats occasionally of Foillan's death, but does not state the precise time of it. Usher assigns it to A. 654. Ind. Chron. This date seems too early.

(104) Colgan has the Acts of this Invention at 16 January.

(105) See the Acts just mentioned. It was usual in those times to give the title of martyr to holy men unjustly killed, although not on account of the Christian faith. In these Acts the murderers of Foillan are represented merely as robbers, who killed him and his companions for the sake of plunder, seemingly of some property and articles intended for the relief and use of the monastery of Fosse.

(106) In the same Acts he is often styled praesul. Molanus and others give him the title of bishop. See Usher, p. 967.

(107) If Foillan ever was at Rome, it must have been after Fursey's death, as Colgan admits, AA. SS. p. 300. Now from that epoch, and from the time of Foillan's arrival in the continent until his death, we find him constantly employed in Brabant and the neighbouring districts. At what time then could he have gone to Rome? (Compare with Not. 96.) Even Usher was mistaken on this point saying (Ind. Chron. ad. A. 648.) that Foillan had in said year returned from Rome, having been there consecrated by Martin I. and after the death of Fursey. Now Martin I. was not Pope until 649; nor was Fursey dead in 648. Usher was led astray by Sigebert's Chronicle.

(108) Mabillon says (at A. 650) that it was called Scotorum monasterium. Its first abbot was Ultan.

(109) Mabillon does not mark the year of its foundation, but Desmay speaks of it (cap. 17.) as founded before the death of St. Fursey, and at the same time makes Ultan its first abbot. Now there was only a church, and that not yet dedicated, at Peronne when Fursey died. And how could Ultan, who was still in England, have been abbot there before Fursey's death?

(110) Mabillon at A. 650. Desmay, cap. 17. This administration of more monasteries than one was somewhat like the superintendence of an abbot over not only the one in which he resided, but likewise over its cells or dependencies, in which, however, there used to be deputy superiors. As the establishments now mentioned were formed chiefly for the Irish, Ultan was looked upon as, after the death of his brothers, the person fittest to preside over them.

(111) Mabillon at A. 674. speaks of Ultan as still alive in said year, yet as if he died not long after. His name is marked in the Benedictine and other martyrologies at 1. May. But Desmay says that his festival was kept at Peronne on the 2d.; transferred, I suppose, on account of the 1st being a holiday.

§. XII. The martyr St. Livin was contemporary with St. Fursey. That he was a native of Ireland is universally admitted; (112) and, if we are to believe some writers, he was of royal extraction. (113) He was born during the reign of Colman Rimhe, who was king of Ireland in the beginning of the seventh century. (114) There is a story of his having been baptized by Augustin the apostle of England, as if he should have been carried to England for that purpose, or Augustin had come over to Ireland, where he never was. (115) Livin is said to have had for master Benignus a priest, and, after his death, to have retired to a desert with three companions, Foillan, Elias, and Kilian, where, among other occupations, he employed himself in transcribing books. (116) Next we are told that he passed over to Britain, and, placing himself under the direction of Augustin, remained with him five years, at the expiration of which Augustin ordained him priest. Passing by this story, which directly contradicts the above mentioned, (117) we may safely assert that Livin became a bishop, having been consecrated in Ireland; (118) but in what part of it, or where he officiated, is not known. As to the fable of his having been archbishop of Dublin, it is scarcely worth mentioning; (119) for in those times there was neither an archbishop nor bishop of Dublin. Actuated by zeal for the conversion of pagan nations he left Ireland, together with his three above-mentioned companions, and continued his course, (120) until he arrived in Belgium, having entrusted his church in Ireland to the archdeacon Silvanus. (121) He was received with great kindness by Florbert (122) abbot of two monasteries at Ghent, one of which has been called that of St. Bavo, who was buried there (123) Having remained at Ghent for 30 days, on every one of which he celebrated mass at St. Bavo's tomb, (124) he set out on his mission through Flanders and Brabant. He was received with great attention by two pious sisters, Berna and Craphaildis, and restored to Ingelbert, a son of the latter, his sight, which had been lost for 13 years. (125) But from the bulk of the people he met with great opposition, insults, and vexation, of which he complains in his epistle to Florbert, declaring at the same time his fore-knowledge and hope that he was to suffer martyrdom. (126) He then consoles himself with the consideration of the friendship of Florbert, (127) who used to provide for his wants while preaching through the country parts, (128) and hints that, although poor in Belgium, he had been great as to this world in his own country. (129) He mentions this on occasion of Florbert having called him not only pontifex but also dominus, (130) as he wished not to be distinguished by titles. Levin was at this time at Holtam or Holten, (131) now Hauthem or Hauthen in the district of Alost, and on this occasion sent Florbert the epitaph on St. Bavo, which that abbot had requested him to compose, apologizing, however, for its not being as elegant as he would have wished, owing to the agitation of his mind and the constant terror he was kept in. (132) Yet both it and the epistle are very neat compositions, and do great honour to the classical taste of the Irish schools of that period, while barbarism prevailed in the greatest part of Western Europe. It was, in all probability, very soon after his having sent these pieces to Florbet, that Livin was attacked at a village called Escha near Hauthem, by a multitude of pagans, among whom one Walbert was chiefly distinguished. After cruelly beating and torturing him, they cut off his head on the 12th of November, A. D. 656. (133) They murdered also his hostess Craphaildis and a young son of hers, named Brixius, whom the saint had baptized only a few days before. The remains of St. Livin and Brixius were buried in one grave by his disciples at Hauthem, and near them were placed those of Craphaildis. His memory has been, and is still, greatly revered in Belgium.

(112) Molanus, Mabillon, Fleury, &c. all agree in this point. It is needless to refer to particular passages.

(113) It is said that his father was Theagamis or Theagnis, a man of high rank, and his mother Angelmia or Agalmia the daughter of an Irish king. See Harris (Bishops at Dublin) and the office of St. Livinus in Burke's Officia propria, &c. The Office from the Breviary of Tournay, which is read in Ireland, and which is more correct, merely states that he was of a noble family. And that he was of high lineage will be seen lower down.

(114) Mabillon (Annal. &c. ad A. 650.) following a Life of St. Livinus written by one Boniface, says that he was born in Ireland during the reign of king Colomagn, the writer having frenchified our Irish name Colman into Colomagn. This king Colomagn or Colman was evidently Colman Rimhe, who, jointly with Aidus Slani, ascended the Irish throne in 599, and reigned six years. (See Chap. xiv. §. 1.) This period answers for the birth of St. Livin, who, as will be seen, suffered martyrdom in 656. Boniface, author of that Life, has been usually supposed the same as St. Boniface the apostle of Germany, and archbishop of Mentz, who lived in the eighth century. This is a quite unfounded opinion. Mabillon, who has published this Life, (AA. SS. Ben. Tom. 2.) thought, that the author was more ancient than Boniface of Mentz, because he says that he got his materials for it from Foillan, Elias, and Kilian, disciples of Livin. This cannot be true, unless it be supposed, that there are interpolations in this tract; for those disciples could not have told him the stories, which it has about Augustin of Canterbury having baptized, &c. Livin, of which lower down. The fact is that Mabillon was mistaken as to the time, in which said Life was composed; for, as the Benedictine authors of the Histoire Letteraire state, (Tom. vi. p. 644.) it was written in the latter end of the tenth or beginning of the eleventh century.

(115) This fable is mentioned from Boniface by Mabillon, (at A. 650.) but he did not think it worth animadversion.

(116) Life by Bo and Office from the Breviary of Tournay. Of Benignus and the companions of St. Livin I can find no further account. Several persons of the names Foillan and Kilian flourished at that period in Ireland.

(117) Augustin did not arrive in England until 597, and died in 605 (Smith Not. to Bede, L. 2. c. 3.) or, at the latest, in 607. How then, if he had baptized Livin, could he have ordained him priest? Unless it be supposed that Livin was not baptized until he was a grown up man; but for this supposition there is not the least foundation, and it is quite repugnant to what is stated concerning his early education under Benignus, &c. Augustin had no Irish disciples. Had he any, Laurence of Canterbury and his brother missionaries would not have been as unacquainted with the state of the Irish church, as they were until they met with Dagan. (See Chap. xiv. §. 16.) Mabillon rejects all that is said of Augustin with regard to Livin.

(118) Office in the Tournay, &c. That Livin was a bishop we have not only from every writer, who has treated of him, but likewise from himself in his poetical epistle to the abbot Florbert in Usher's Ep. Hib. Syll. No. 8. where he says;

Sufficeret fratrem fratrum dixisse Livinum ; Pontificis nomen pergravat et Domini.

(119) This fable originated in mistakes of some foreign writers. Not content with what was true, viz. that Livin was a bishop, they made him archbishop of Ireland. Thus not only Boniface makes him an archbishop, but Massacus, quoted by Usher, (Ep. Hib. Recens.) says of him that he was archiepiscopus Hiberniae. Then was added by others, in consequence of their being ignorant of Irish history and topography, the stuff of his having been archbishop of Dublin; for they had heard, that Dublin was the metropolis of Ireland. Harris, to pay a compliment to Dublin, has foisted Livin and other pretended bishops, prior to the times of the Danes, into Ware's account of the prelates of Dublin. He says, (p. 303.) that Colgan makes Livin bishop there. Now this is unfair; for Colgan merely refers to Ware (Bishops of Dublin) without adding any assertion of his own. Yet he had no right to make that reference; for Ware, who indeed names Livinus in his treatise De Praesulibus Lagemae, published in 1628, that to which Colgan refers, does not make him bishop of Dublin, but, on the contrary, having observed that some historians had so called Livinus, Wiro, and others, does not follow them, beginning his list of the Dublin prelates with Donat or Donagh in the eleventh century. Ware thought so little of Livin's claim, that in his general treatise on the Irish bishops (A. 1665) he has left him out entirely, while he speaks, as before, of Wiro, Rumolo, &c. On this point Burke went still further in his Office for St. Livinus. He says that Livin was not only bishop of Dublin, but likewise that he succeeded, in this see, his uncle Melanchus. Mabillon (ad A. 650) makes mention, from the Life written by Boniface (who has nothing about Dublin) of an Irish archbishop called Melanchius and paternal uncle of St. Livin, who is said to have succeeded him; but he does not place either of them in Dublin. Neither Colgan, Ware, nor Harris knew any thing about him, and the whole is undoubtedly a fable, which it would be a waste of time seriously to refute. I suspect that the author of it alluded to one of the Dubhtachs, archbishops of Armagh, probably the second, of whom he might have heard something; and that he hellenized Dubhtach into Melanchus, Μελανς χους, blackmound, from the Irish dubh, black, and tuaim, mound. Wishing to raise the character of Livinus, he might have thought it allowable to make him a nephew of this Dubhtach, although it is not easy to believe that he could have been so, as Dubhtach II. died in 548.

(120) Malbrancq says, (De Morin. L. 3. c. 18.) that Livin preached for some time among the Morini in Picardy.

(121) By Silvanus, an universal name in Ireland, was meant, I suppose, one Sillan, or Sillen.

(122) In the Dublin edition of the Tournay Office of St. Livin Florentius appears, through mistake, instead of Florbertus.

(123) These monasteries were founded by St. Amandus, who was, about these times, bishop of Moastricht. St. Bavo, a native of Brabant and disciple of Amandus, died towards 653. See Mabillon, ad A. 650, and Fleury, L. 38. §. 57.

(124) Livin had a great veneration for this saint. He wrote an epitaph for him, which he concludes with praying to him to protect his church at Ghent,

“ Quam tu fundasti, quae te tenet, inclyte Bavo Ecclesiam meritis protege, sancte, tuis.”

(125) Mabillon from Life by Boniface.

(126) “ Hos postquam populos consperi luce serena,
Sol mihi non luxit, nox fuit una mihi.
Impia Barbarico gens exagitata tumultu
Hic Braebanta furit, meque cruenta petit.
Quid tibi peccavi, qui pacis nuntia porto?
Pax est quod porto; cur mihi bella moves?
Sed qua tu spiras feritas sors laeta triumpho,
Atque dabit palmam gloria martyrii.
Cui credam novi, nec spe frustrabor inani:
Qui spondet Deus est; quis dubitare potest?”

(127) “ Attamen est aliquid moestae solatia menti
Quod dat, nec penitus me atra premit dies.
Ganda parat gremium, quo me fovet ubere laeto;
Invitat, mulcet, nutrit, amat, refovet.
Hic est Floribertus, quem virtus flore perornat, &c.”

(128) “ Haec quoque dum scribo, properans agitator aselli
Munere nos solito, pondere lassus, adit.
Ruris delicias affert, cum laete butyrum,
Ovaeque caseoli plena canistra premunt, &c.”

(129) “ Egressus patriam, pompae mortalis honorem
Sprevi, devovi; spes Deus una mihi.”

(130) See above Not. 118.

(131) “ Holtam villa gravis, quae nescis reddere fructum,”
&c.”

(132) “ Et pius ille pater cum donis mollia verba
Mittit, et ad studium sollicitat precibus;
Ac titulo magnum jubet insignire Bavonem,
Atque leves elegos esse decus tumulo.
Nec reputat, fisso cum stridet fistula ligno,
Quod soleat raucum reddere quassa sonum.
Exigui rivi pauper quam vena ministrat,
Lasso vix tenues (tenuem) unda ministrat opem.
Sic ego, qui quondam studio florente videbar
Esse poeta, modo curro pedester equo.

Et qui Castalio dicebar fonte madentem
 Dictaeo versu posse movere lyram,
 Carmina nunc lacero dictant mihi verba Camoenae ;
Mensque dolens, laetis apta nec est modulis.
 Non sum qui fueram festivo carmine laetus :
 Qualiter esse queam, tela cruenta videns, ? &c."

(133) This is the year, at which Mabillon treats of his martyrdom. Fleury (L. 38. §. 57.) says about 656. Massacus and some others have assigned it to 633, and thus led astray several writers, even Usher, who following them, marks (Ep. H. Syll.) said year as the date of the Epistle to Florbert. It is easy to refute this position ; for it is allowed that St. Livin did not arrive at Ghent until after the death of St. Bavo, which occurred about 653 (See above Not. 123.) The same Massacus, who is quoted also by Ware (Writers at Livin) says that he was put to death in the very year of his arrival in that country. But from what is said of his having converted a great number of pagans it would appear, that he must have spent there, at least, somewhat more than a year. On the other hand it is stated, (see Office) that Bavo was dead three years before his arrival in Ghent. Now supposing that Bavo died in the latter end of 652, and admitting that St. Livin was killed in 656, there will remain only about one year for his mission in Flanders and Brabant. It might, however, be argued on some collateral grounds, that St. Bavo's death was not, so long as three years, prior to St. Livin's arrival ; but, in the want of authentic documents, it is better to dismiss the subject.

§. XIII. The holy virgin Dympna is usually supposed to have suffered martyrdom about these times. But, if she was, as constantly said to be, a native of Ireland, it is, consistently with her history, more probable, that she lived at either an earlier or a later period than the seventh century. It is related that she was the daughter of an Irish pagan king, who, having lost his wife, conceived an unnatural affection for her and wished to marry her, on account of her extraordinary beauty and the great likeness she bore to her mother. Dympna was secretly a Christian, and had been baptized and instructed by a worthy priest named Gerebern, by whom her mother also, and others, used to be privately attended. To avoid being forced to submit to her father's horrid proposal, she contrived to make her escape from Ireland, accompanied by Gerebern and some other persons, and safely arrived at Antwerp, whence she went to Gela or Gheel, then a small place, but now a populous town in Brabant. Here she found a church dedicated to St. Martin, not far from which she procured a habitation for herself and her companions, where they led a most religious life, Gerebern celebrating mass for them in the church. The king, on being apprized of her escape, sailed in quest of her, attended by many followers, and having arrived also at Antwerp sent persons here and there through the country to make enquiries about her. Some of them happened to stop for a night at Westerloo, and on the next morning, when paying their host, for the entertainment they had received, in Irish money, were told by him, that he had some pieces very like it, of which he did not know the precise value. On being asked how he had come by them he said, that a young and very beautiful lady, who had come over from Ireland and lived in a retired place not far distant, together with a venerable old priest, used to send some of them to him for such articles as she was in need of. Having got themselves directed to that place, they saw Dymphna at a distance, and, on their recognizing her, immediately returned to Antwerp and informed the king of what had occurred. He went with his attendants to the spot, and having there found her and Gerebern, endeavoured to persuade her to agree to his infamous wish. Gerebern beginning to remonstrate against his conduct was instantly ordered to be put to death; and after this was executed the king used every exertion to bring her over to his purpose.

Dympna was inflexible, and reproaching him with the wickedness of his proceeding declared, that she detested his gods and goddesses, and that nothing should induce her to offend her true lover Jesus Christ. On this the king became outrageous, and gave orders that she should be beheaded. As all his attendants declined to obey this command, he became the executioner himself and murdered his own daughter. Her remains and those of Gerebern were left exposed on the ground, but after some days were deposited in a cavern by some of the neighbouring inhabitants. They were in process of time removed elsewhere, those of Gerebern to a place now called Southbeck in the duchy of Cleves, and Dympna's to Gheel, where they are preserved in a precious urn, and with great care, in a collegiate church called by her name. The day of her martyrdom is said to have been a 30th of May, the 15th of said month, on which her festival is kept, being the anniversary of a translation of her reliques. The year is unknown, and even the century is uncertain, it being scarcely credible that it was the seventh. (134).

(134) In the Acts of St. Dympna ap. Messingham (Florileg.) and the Bollandists at 15 May (written by Peter, a Canon Regular of St. Autbert of Cambrai in the 13th century,) whence I have taken this narrative, and which have been closely followed by Burke (Offic. propr.) it is said that she suffered about A. D. 600. The Bollandists (Comment. pr. ad S. Dympna & S. Gerebern.) speak of their martyrdom as having occurred, scemingly, in the 7th century. Thence they throw out a conjecture, that these saints were perhaps Anglo-Saxons, many of that nation being at that period still pagans; whereas the Irish were then universally Christians, and, they add, had already begun to instruct and enlighten the people of various other countries. They observe that in one passage of Dympna's Acts, where her father is said to have been a king, a MS. of Utrecht has Britannia. But in every other MS. and document relative to her we find Hibernia; and in her

Acts we meet with it not once but several times. They say that Gerebern has rather an Anglo-Saxon than Irish sound; as if the termination ern were unusual in Irish names. Now it is well known, that it was not so; and in our ancient history we meet with Fortchern, Libern, &c. Several Irish names at this very day terminate, at least, as they are pronounced, in the same manner. Their other conjecture is much more plausible; viz. that Dympna was the daughter of a Danish king of some part of Ireland during the time that the Danes and Norwegians, who had established themselves in this country, continued pagans. Those nations had very loose ideas of matrimonial rules and impediments. According to this hypothesis, Dympna's times could not have been earlier than the 9th century. It is certainly preferable to the opinion of her having lived in the seventh, or even in the latter part of the sixth, at which period all the Irish princes appear in our history as Christians; and consequently it cannot be supposed, that any one of them would have proposed such an incestuous marriage. But, besides the whole of the fifth century, we find likewise in the early part of the sixth some pagan kings or chieftains in Ireland, and it appears probable that St. Dympna's martyrdom occurred either before 500, or not long after it. A celebrated holy virgin named Dymna al. Damnad, of the great house of Orgiel, was highly revered in that country (Louth, Monaghan, &c.) and was distinguished by the surname Schene, that is, the fugitive. She is said by our genealogists to have been the daughter, or as Colgan explains it, the paternal grand daughter of Daimhein, or Damen a king of Orgiel, and who was also the grandfather of St. Enda of Arran. Dymna was not, however, sister to St. Enda, as her name does not appear among those of his sisters, who are often mentioned. Following the genealogists, she must have been either a first cousin or aunt of his. In either case, considering the times in which Enda lived, Dymna must have been born prior to 500. (See Chap. VIII. §. 7.) That Damen was a Christian we have no reason to believe; and, at least, one of the princes his sons might have been a pagan. On the whole then Colgan's conjecture (AA. SS. p. 713.) that this Dymna, the fugitive, was the same as St. Dympna the martyr, is not probable; and thus the guilty father was either Damen or a son of his; and her martyrdom ought not to be assigned to a later period than about A. D. 500. It may be thought strange, that even a pagan, any how civilized, could have resolved on marrying his own daughter; but incestuous marriages of this and even of a worse kind were not unusual among some nations, otherwise far removed from the savage state, such as the Persians in the proudest times of their empire. It is certain that the pagan Irish had several customs and practices, both religious and political, similar to those of the Persians and some other Orientals. The mode of contracting marriages is said to have been nearly the same in Ireland as in Persia (See Vallancey, Vindication, &c. p. 351.). In the pagan times of Ireland some instances occur even of that worst of Persian practices, the marriage of a son with his mother. (O'Flaherty, Ogygia, p. 282 and 287.) To the hypothesis of St. Dymphna having suffered about 500 it may be objected that the Andoverpes or people about Antwerp were pagans until the seventh century, (see Fleury, L. 38. §. 29) and many of them still later. But in the saint's Acts they are not represented as Christians in her time, although it is said there was a church at Gheel. Besides our not being bound to believe this part of the narrative, it may be observed, that a church or chapel might have been erected there by some former missionaries, which, however, was neglected by the inhabitants. It may also be said, that in the latter end of said 7th century Antwerp was but a small place, a castrum, as appears from the Life of St. Villebrod. This difficulty is easily removed; whereas in the Acts it is called only a castrum, and there is no allusion to its having been in St. Dymphna's days a place of consequence.

§. XIV. Another Irish saint, well known in the continent, concerning whose times there are various opinions, although his transactions are tolerably well recorded, is St. Fridolin (135) surnamed the traveller. That he was a native of Ireland is now universally admitted; but of what part of it is difficult to decide. (136) His birth was illustrious, and he is usually said to have been the son of a king. (137) Having embraced the ecclesiastical state, he was raised to the priesthood and preached with great zeal for some time in various parts of Ireland. Wishing to visit foreign countries he passed over to France, and after preaching here and there for some time became a member of St. Hilary's monastery at Poitiers, where he remained for a considerable time, and was so much esteemed by the community and the bishop and clergy, that he was elected abbot. He then completed an object, which he had greatly at heart; the rebuilding of St. Hilary's church, in which he was assisted by the king Clovis, and by the bishop and inhabitants, and placed in it the remains of that saint, reserving a part of them for himself. During this time he was visited by two priests relatives of his, who had come from Northumberland to see him. (138) Leaving them at Poitiers, and taking with him the portion he had reserved of the reliques of St. Hilary, Fridolin went to the Eastern parts of France, and stopped near the Moselle, on the bank of which he erected a monastery in honour of the same saint, which has been thence called Helera. (139) Having remained there only as long as was necessary to complete that foundation, he built a church amidst the Vosges likewise in honour of St. Hilary, perhaps that which was named Hilariacum, and in course of time the monastery of St. Nabor. (140) Thence he proceeded to Strasburgh, where also he erected a church under the same denomination. Next we find him at Coire in the Grison country, and here likewise founding a church of St. Hilary. While there, he inquired of the inhabitants if there were any island in the Rhine as yet uninhabited, and was informed there was one, of which, however, they could not give him a precise account. He went in search of it, and at length found the island of Seckingen, a well known place several miles up the Rhine above Basle, and where now is one of the Forest towns. When examining it for the purpose of discovering whether it were fit for the erection of a church, he was ill treated and flogged by the inhabitants of the neighbouring district as if he were a robber. But having soon after got a grant of the island from the king, (141) he founded a church and a religious house for females, towards the endowment of which he got some lands from Urso a nobleman of Glaris in Switzerland. (142) Thenceforth he seems to have spent the remainder of his life in Seckingen together with some disciples of his, of whom he had formed a community, prior, it is said, to his having established the nunnery. (143) He died there on a sixth of March, (144) but in what year is not known. There are great doubts even as to the century, in which he flourished; but, although I have on account of these doubts treated of him in this place, I think the most probable opinion is that, which assigns him to the latter part of the seventh and the early part of the eighth. (145) Some writings have been attributed to this saint, but upon no sufficient authority. (146)

(135) Colgan has at 6 March, various Acts and accounts of St. Fridolin. The most ancient is a Life by Baltherus, who studied in the monastery of St. Gall, and afterwards was a clergyman of Seckingen. He dedicated this tract to a Notker of St. Gall, who, according to Colgan and the Bollandists was the celebrated Notker Balbulus, who died in 912. Hence, it was concluded, that Baltherus wrote said Life some time after the middle of the ninth century. But, as Mabillon observes, (Annal. &c. at A. 590.) it must have been written much later; for Baltherus, both in his preface and at the end of the second book, speaks of an incursion of pagans at Seckingen as having occurred long before, jam olim. This was by the Hungarians in 938. Besides Notker Balbulus there were five other Notkers at St. Gall, two in the tenth century, one in the 11th, another in the 12th, and one still later. The Notker, addressed by Baltherus, must have been one of the last. Yet the lateness of the period, at which he wrote, does not weaken the authority of his work; as he declares, that he took it from what he had read in an old book, which he had met with in France. In Colgan's edition of it many errors occur, which the Bollandists in theirs have endeavoured to correct.

(136) In the Life by Baltherus we read; (L. 1. c. 1.) " Beatus Fridolinus ab extremis partibus inferioris Scotiae oriundus esse non ambigitur, quae videlicet apud ipsos Scótigenas Hibernia nuncupata, &c." Colgan thought that by inferioris or the lower part of Ireland the author meant the North. This does not agree with what Baltherus has (ib. c. 6.) concerning a sort of sea, which separates lower Scotia or Ireland from the upper part. The only great water boundary in Ireland is the Shannon, and accordingly the division alluded to seems to refer not to North and South, but to East and West. The part, pointed at by Baltherus, of that water boundary was where shipping could be taken for a foreign country; and it is stated that Fridolin had a long journey from his own country before he reached it. Considering this data, it may be supposed to have been towards the mouth of the Shannon, and it will appear probable that the country, whence Fridolin went thither, was some inferior and far distant part of Connaught. I say Connaught preferably to an Eastern part of Ireland; for Fridolin's country is said to have been at the extremity of lower Ireland. If by this was meant the East, said extremity would, calculating from where Baltherus lived, probably have been placed by him towards the West, and thus would have touched the Shannon instead of being far distant from it. Yet these are mere conjectures; nor can any certain conclusion be drawn from such loose geographical indications. It may even be suspected, that by lower and upper Scotia Baltherus meant not two divisions of Ireland, but the old Scotia (all Ireland) and the new Scotia, or modern Scotland; and that the sea he mentions was that, which separates the two countries. At the time he lived, which was undoubtedly not before the 11th or 12th century, N. Britain had begun to be known by the name of Scotia. But in this hypothesis how are we to explain what he says of Fridolin having been born in the extremity of lower Scotia, (Ireland) and his proceeding thence by a long journey to that sea for the purpose of sailing for France? Could he have meant by said extremity the Southern part of Ireland as being the most remote from Scotland? Yet in this case, how account for his going to the North to procure a passage for France? The whole matter is so obscure, that I shall say no more about it. Other writers, who treat of Fridolin, such as Gapar, Bruschius, Canisius, Guilliman, &c. quoted in AA. SS. (p. 492) make mention of him in general terms as an Irishman, or as Mabillon calls him, Scotto-Hibernus. The Bollandists reject the pretensions of certain Scotch writers, who claimed him their countryman.

(137) Some writers merely say that he was of royal blood. Bartherus, without touching on royalty, represents him as a person of highly distinguished family.

(138) Life, L. 1. c. 16. It is said that these two priests were nephews of his, and they are spoken of as having remained at Poitiers and died there. (AA. SS. p. 490.) Their having come from Northumberland shows, that they had been missionaries in that country.

(139) Life L. 1. c. 19. and Preface. Several writers make Helera the same as Hilariacum a monastery in Lorraine and diocese of Metz, which, according to Claudius Roberti, (Gallia Christiana, p. 628.) was founded by St. Fridolin, endowed by Sigebold bishop of Metz, and dedicated in the year 714. The Sammarthani have, in their Gallia Christiana, followed Roberti. Colgan, who thought that Fridolin lived in the time of Clovis I. endeavours to evade this date by saying, (AA. SS. p. 480.) that, although said monastery was founded by Fridolin, the endowment and dedication did not take place until 200 years after his death. But who will believe that the monastery or its church remained undedicated during so very long a period? The Bollandists, who were of Colgan's opinion as to Fridolin having been in France under Clovis I. pronounce that the Sammarthani made a mistake of 200 years, or that the dedication, &c. in Sigebold's time must be understood as a new dedication, &c. They add a much more plausible explanation, viz. that Hilariacum was perhaps different from Helera, and quote Meurissius, (on the bishops of Metz) who states, that Hilariacum was founded in honour of St. Paul and endowed, &c. in 734. If founded in honour of St. Paul, it must have been different from Helera. Mabillon, although differing from Colgan and the Bollandists as to the times of Fridolin, asserts, (Annal. Ben. ad. A. 590) that Helera and Hilariacum were different places. Besides observing that the latter was dedicated not to St. Hilary but to St. Paul, he adduces an argument much less easy to answer, which is that Hilariacum was situated not on the Moselle but not far from the Saar, at a considerable distance from the former river. It still existed in his own times, whereas Helera, he says, had been long extinct. As to the argument taken from Hilariacum having been dedicated to St. Paul, this assertion may be safely denied. That monastery was known by the name of St. Hilary before it got that of St. Nabor, in consequence of the body of this saint having been placed there by Chrodegang bishop of Metz about A. D. 763. (See Fleury L. 43. §. 37.) The very name Hilariacum shows, that the patron saint was at first Hilary. But how can we answer the argument of Hilariacum not being on the Moselle? I think it must be allowed that Helera, which was certainly on it, was a different place. Might not, however, Hilariacum also have been one of Fridolin's foundations? In his Life, immediately after the account of his having erected Helera, we read that having left that place, and before his arrival at Strasburgh, he erected a church amidst or near the Vosges (of Lorraine) likewise in honour of St. Hilary. I suspect that this is the church that gave rise to Hilariacum, or, as afterwards called, the monastery of St. Nabor, al. St. Avol. This place is nearer to the Saar than to the Moselle, and being in the Eastern or mountainous part of Lorraine answers to the description of the tract, in which Baltherus says that Fridolin founded a church after he had left the banks of the Moselle. Thus then it remains that Hilariacum, although different from Helera, was a foundation also of Fridolin; and the argument against the statement of Roberti, &c. falls to the ground.

(140) See Not. prec.

(141) This was one of the French kings, to whom that country then belonged. Which of them he was will be inquired into lower down.

(142) Life, L. 2. c. 6. Guilliman, De Rebus Helvetiorum, quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 493.) says that Fridolin had founded a monastery at Glaris.

(143) AA. SS. p. 480.

(144) Life, L. 2. c. 5.

(145) A crowd of writers, quoted by Colgan, (AA. SS. p. 491.) place the arrival of Fridolin in France in the reign of Clovis the first. With them the Bollandists agree, who, however, reject the opinion of those, who pretend that he was in that country as early as the year 495. It is plain that he was not long there, before he entered the monastery of St. Hilary at Poitiers. Now this could not have been prior to 507, the year in which Clovis defeated Alaric king of the Visigoths in the battle of Vouillé and got possession of that city. This circumstance was not attended to by those writers. They looked only to the time, about which Clovis became a Christian. Yet, notwithstanding the agreement of so many authors of more or less repute, the fact is, that the Clovis, during whose reign Fridolin arrived in France, was not Clovis the first. Baltherus, indeed, repeatedly calls the king, with whom Fridolin was contemporary, Clovis, or Clodoveus; but he does not state which Clovis he was. He might have meant Clovis the second, who reigned between 638 and 656, were it not that this Clovis was king of Neustria and Burgundy, whereas Baltherus represents (L. 1. c. 10.) his Clovis as reigning far and wide. There was a third Clovis, who reigned in the latter end of the seventh century, and whose empire was very extensive. It is true that he was one of the kings called faineans, the real power being in the hands of the mayor of the palace Pepin of Heristal. Yet he retained the name of king, and was most probably the Clovis meant by Baltherus. That Fridolin did not arrive in France as early as the times of Clovis I. is evident from various circumstances touched upon by Baltherus, whose authority is the best we have. According to him Christianity appears to have been completely established in Ireland at the time of Fridolin's departure from France; there was a great body of clergy, &c. This representation does not suit the religious state of Ireland at the period, in which Clovis I. reigned. And why should Fridolin in his zeal for propagating the Gospel have left his own country at a time when there was ample scope for his exertions at home? These holy expeditions of our missionaries to the continent had not begun as early as the commencement of the sixth century. Next comes the very remarkable circumstance of the priests, Fridolin's nephews, who had come to him from Northumberland. (Above Not. 138.) There were no Irish priests in Northumberland until the year 635. (See Chap. xv. §. 12.)

Mabillon (Annal. Ben. ad A. 590.) thinking that he had discovered the real period, at which Fridolin flourished, rejects the opinion of its having been during the reign of Clovis I. He rejects also that of Roberti, &c. which brings him down as late as the eighth century, arguing from the circumstance of Hilariacum having been different from Helera. But we have seen (Not. 139.) that this argument is not of such weight as he imagined. He maintains, that the time, at which Fridolin founded Helera, was about 590. His proof is founded on a letter written by one Gogus, who had been a powerful man at the court of Sigebert I. king of Austrasia, to Peter bishop of Metz, in which he salutes an abbot who was wont to visit the thresholds of saints, and had just erected a church on the banks of the Moselle; cujus gressibus indesinenter sanctorum limina visitantur—nunc super Mosellae litoribus praeclsa templi cernitur construxisse jam culmina. The name of this abbot is not mentioned; but from these circumstances Mabillon concludes, that he was undoubtedly Fridolin. This opinion is quite contrary to the statement of Baltherus as to king Clovis; for at the period assigned by Mabillon there was no king of that name, and hence he asserts that Baltherus was wrong in attributing to Clovis (the first, as Mabillon understood him) transactions relative to Fridolin, which occurred under some of his successors. There is, however, another point not adverted to by Mabillon, that of Fridolin's nephews having arrived at Poitiers from Northumberland. In his hypothesis this must have been not later than about 590; now there were no Irish priests in Northumberland at that time, nor for many years after. Mabillon's main argument is that the abbot there spoken of by Gogus built a church on the Moselle. I do not see how this proves, that said abbot was Fridolin. There might have been others, who erected churches on the banks of that river.

Calmet, although he had Mabillon's Annals before his eyes, does not follow his system as to Fridolin. He says, (Hist. de Lorraine, L. VII. §. 18.) that Fridolin arrived in France early in the sixth century. Enough has been said to show, that, unless we are to reject the authority of Baltherus, this cannot be true. Calmet attributes the foundation of Hilariacum to Fridolin, and observes that the monastery of St. Maximin at Treves had been at first called the cell of St. Hilary. He thinks that it got this name from Fridolin; and in this case it may be supposed to have been the Helera of Baltherus, whereas Treves lies on the Moselle, and accordingly not extinct as Mabillon has said. Yet it must seem odd that Baltherus does not mention Treves, when marking the situation of Helera. But even admitting that the St. Hilary's cell at Treves was founded by Fridolin, the question remains at what time it began to be called the monastery of St. Maximin. Calmet refers to a diploma attributed to Dagobert I. and said to have been written in 634, in favour of St. Peter's church at Treves, in which the monastery of St. Maximin is mentioned as having been formerly called the cell of St. Hilary. If this document were genuine, it should be admitted that said cell was very ancient; but, as far as I can judge, it is a spurious composition; and although there was a church of St. Maximin at Treves in the sixth century, there seems not to have been a monastery there of that name until a much later period. Whether or not the St. Hilary's cell of Treves was founded by Fridolin, nothing decisive can be deduced towards fixing the time of its origin from the confused accounts, that are given relatively to the monastery of St. Maximin.

On the whole I do not find any authority or argument sufficient to overthrow the position of Claudius Roberti and the Sammarthani as to the times in which Fridolin flourished. It has been objected, that Hilariacum, of which, according to them, he was the founder, was in reality founded by the bishop Sigebold. Some writers have indeed said so, such as Paulus diaconus, (Gesta episcoporum Metensium, ap. Calmet Append. to Hist. de Lorraine, Tom. 1.); but this can be easily explained, inasmuch as although founded by Fridolin, it was endowed by Sigebold, as Roberti, and the Sammarthani state. In this manner the various authorities are easily reconciled, and the very assertion of Paulus affords a strong criterion for discovering the time of Fridolin. He does not say, that Sigebold repaired said monastery, as the Bollandists thought might have been the case, but that he founded it; and accordingly points out its origin. On the other hand every circumstance tends to show, that the prime mover on this occasion was Fridolin. From all that we have now seen I think it may safely be concluded, that Fridolin arrived in France after the middle of the seventh century; that, having spent many years in the monastery of St. Hilary of Poitiers, he became abbot of it during the reign of Clovis III. by whom he was much patronized; and that after some time, resigning the abbacy, he removed to the eastern parts of France. In what year he founded Helera, we cannot form a conjecture; and even as to Hilariacum, although said to have been dedicated in 714, it cannot be decided whether that was the precise year of its foundation, as it might have taken place a few years sooner. The dates of his subsequent transactions are equally uncertain.

There still remains one point to be inquired into. Baltherus, who mentions Clovis as king when Fridolin was abbot at Poitiers, speaks of the same king as still patronizing him after he had passed over to the banks of the Moselle, and even as far as Seckingen. Now this cannot be easily reconciled with the date 714 marked for the dedication of Hilariacum. Clovis the third was dead since 695. If Hilariacum was founded during his reign, it is hard to think that it would have remained undedicated until 714. And considering the shortness of that king's reign, which lasted only five years, it can scarcely be admitted, that Fridolin's transactions, including his being appointed abbot of Poitiers, down to the foundation of Seckingen, could have been comprized within it. It cannot be said that we should therefore suppose the Clovis of Baltherus to have been Clovis the second, whose reign lasted 18 years; for, omitting other difficulties, this Clovis had no power in Austrasia, the scene of Fridolin's latter proceedings. I think the whole matter may be easily explained by supposing that the real patron of Fridolin, in whatever part of France he happened to be, was Pepin of Heristal, who was mayor of the palace under Clovis III. at the time that Fridolin was at Poitiers, and afterwards under his successors Childebert III. and Dagobert III. Baltherus, having met with the name of Clovis on the occasion of Fridolin being at Poitiers, might have imagined that he was still king when Fridolin was moving along the Moselle and the Rhine. On these occasions he does not mention the name of Clovis; but speaks of the aforsaid king. Now the real king was in those days Pipin, and Baltherus was probably unacquainted with the names of some of the nominal ones. Pepin was a great encourager of missionaries. (See Fleury, L. 40. §. 47.)

I should not have troubled the reader with this long note, were it not for the confusion, in which the history of St. Fridolin has been thrown by various hypotheses as to the times in which he lived, and which might almost excite doubts concerning his existence. Such doubts would, however, be ridiculous ; for, besides the constant tradition of the establishments which he founded or governed, particularly Seckingen, there is scarcely a saint, whose memory has been more celebrated for centuries in Lorraine, Alsace, Germany, and Switzerland. The account given of him by Baltherus bears, generally speaking, great marks of authenticity ; nor would any confusion have arisen, had his Clovis not been mistaken for Clovis the first. Among the very many authors who treat of Fridolin, Canisius and Murer have each written his Life in German.

(146) The chief authority is that of Dempster, who, as Colgan and the Bollandists observe on this occasion, attributes to holy men what they might have done, without caring whether they did it or not. The pretended works of Fridolin are mentioned by Harris, Writers.

§. xv. Several other distinguished persons from Ireland are spoken of as having illustrated France and Belgium by their piety and zeal in the seventh century. A St. Tressan or Tresan is said to have been a companion of Foillan, Ultan, Eloquius, &c.

(147) But other accounts state, that St. Tressan was living in France as early as the beginning of the sixth century. (148) According to his Acts he was an illiterate man, but a very religious good Christian. Wishing to lead the life a pilgrim, he went to France taking along with him six brothers, Gibrian, Helan, German, Veran, Abran, Petran, and three sisters, Fracla, Promptia, and Posemna, all very devout persons. (149) He stopped in the territory of Rheims near the Marne in the time of the bishop St. Remigius, by whom Clovis I. was baptized. After some years, having acquired sufficient learning, he was ordained priest by St. Remigius on the recommendation of Genebaldus bishop of Laon. (150) Tressan spent the remainder of his life in the diocese of Rheims near the Marne, and having distinguished himself by his great piety and some miracles, died on a 7th of February, and was buried at Avenay in Champagne. (151) With this account of the times of St. Tressan agrees that given of those of his brother Gibrian, who is said to have arrived in France in the time of Clovis I. and St. Remigius, (152) and, having led a very holy life in the district of Chalons sur Marne, to have died there, whence his remains were long after, viz. in the latter end of the 9th century, removed to Rheims, (153) where his memory is revered on the 8th of May. A similar agreement occurs likewise in what is said of Helan, who is revered also at Rheims and elsewhere on the 7th of October. (154) As to the other brothers and the sisters, scarcely any thing particular is recorded; but it seems rash to deny, that this whole groupe belonged to the times of St. Remigius. Yet the matter is not quite certain; (155) and accordingly, as I have found some of them mentioned as having flourished in the seventh century, I deferred treating of them until this period.

(147) See above §. 10. 11. Molanus, following a Life of Eloquius, joins with them Tressan and others. (See AA. SS. p. 273.)

(148) According to Sigebert's chronicle Tressan was in France in 509. Colgan and the Bollandists have published at 7 February the Acts of Tressan from a MS. of the monastery of St. Remigius of Rheims. Flodoard, who lived in the tenth century, and who treats of him and his brothers, &c. in his history of Rheims, seems to have read these Acts.

(149) Acts, cap. 1. Elsewhere the names of the sisters are spelt in a different manner. But this is a matter of no consequence. These brothers and sisters are mentioned also by Flodoard.

(150) Genebaldus was appointed to that see about A. D. 500. He was its first bishop. (See Fleury, L. 30. §. 46.)

(151) Colgan was, as the Bollandists justly observe, wrong in saying, that the body of St. Tressan rests at Rheims. The Acts place it at Avenay; and there is no account of its having been removed. An abness of Avenay procured the printing of an Office of this saint at Rheims in the year 1600, which was taken from these Acts, such as I have now given the substance of.

(152) The Bollandists have the Acts of Gibrian at 8 May. The seven brothers and three sisters are mentioned in them as in the Acts of Tressan. A breviary of Rheims, referred to by the Bollandists, assigns Gibrian's arrival in France to the reign of Clovis I.

(153) According to Gibrian's Acts this removal took place when Tulco was archbishop of Rheims, and therefore some time between 882 and 900.

(154) Colgan quotes the following passage from a Life of St. Helan, published at Rheims in 1612. "Clodoveo rege Francorum recenter ad fidem Christianam conversa et baptizato, cum res Ecclesie Gallicanæ imprimis regerentur a S. Remigio archiepiscopo Remensi, ex Hibernia insula, quam Scotorum gens incolebat, in Christiani vigoris dignitate florens, omnibusque vicinis gentibus fide præpollens—peregrinationis ob amorem Christi gratia septem fratres eximia pietatis ac virtutum exemplaria cum tribus sororibus suis divina inspiratione incitati venerunt in Franciam; nimirum Gibrianus, Helanus, Tressanus," &c. as above. (See more AA. SS. p. 274.)

(155) In a Life of Eloquius, Helan, Tressan, German, and Veran, are named as companions of his. If this be true, they must have lived in the seventh century, and so also Gibrian and the other persons of that family. The Bollandists (Comment. pr. ad Vit. S. Tressani) are angry with the author, or perhaps interpolator, of said Life for having made Helan, &c. contemporary with Eloquius, and think it strange that Molanus has followed it. But is it certain that no mistake was committed in drawing up the Acts of Tressan, &c. upon which mainly depends the opinion of these persons having flourished in the times of Clovis I. and St. Remigius? Might not some old document have assigned their times to the reign of a Clovis, without adding who that Clovis was? The period mentioned in the Life of Eloquius corresponds to the reign of Clovis the second. The compilers of the Acts of Tressan, &c. might have mistaken this Clovis for Clovis the first. It is true that the specific mention, in Tressan's Acts, of Remigius, and, what is more remarkable, of Genebaldus, affords a strong argument against this supposition. Yet it may be still suspected, that these compilers, knowing that these bishops lived in the reign of Clovis I. introduced their names without sufficient authority. The Bollandists urge, that in the said Life of Eloquentius is mentioned also a Columbanus as one of his companions. Thinking that the author meant the great St. Columbanus of Luxeu, they hence conclude that the passage relative to these companions is not worthy of credit. They should, however, have reflected, that the Columbanus there mentioned is not marked by any epithet of distinction; and that there might have been a person of that name, which was very common in Ireland, among the companions of Eloquentius, different both as to time and place from the great one. Colgan reckons (AA. SS. p. 96.) Tressan and his three above mentioned brothers among those companions as disciples of St. Fursey, and yet elsewhere, (ib. p. 274) contradicting himself, maintains that they lived in the times of Clovis I.

§. XVI. St. Madelgar, or Maldegar, surnamed Vincent, who certainly lived in the seventh century, is said to have been a native of Ireland. (156) He was a military man, and had so distinguished himself by his exploits in the service of the French kings, that he was raised to the rank of Count. (157) He resided in Hainaut, and married Waldetrudis a relative of the royal family, (158) by whom he had some children, all of whom are said to have become distinguished by their sanctity. (159) Having lived together for some years they separated for the purpose of leading a religious life. Madelgar retired to the monastery of Mons-altus (Hautmont) in Hainaut, of which he was the founder, and there embraced the monastic state according to the rule of St. Benedict. Some time after Waldetrudis founded a nunnery at Castri-locus, which has given rise to the present city of Mons, and there spent the remainder of her days. I find the foundation of Hautmont assigned to about the year 650. (160) It is said that Madelgar was, before he became a monk, sent on some occasion to Ireland, and that on his return to France he brought with him some learned and holy men. (161) This much seems certain, that he protected and patronized the Irish monks and missionaries, who happened to be in Hainaut and the neighbouring districts. Among them is particularly mentioned St. Wasnulf a bishop, who spent the latter years of his life in the monastery of Condatum (Condé), where he was buried and his memory is revered on the 1st of October, as the anniversary of his death, and on the 10th of January as that of a translation of his remains. (162) St. Madelgar it said to have erected another monastery at Soignes. (163) He died on the 14th of July about 677. (164) Some other Irish saints are mentioned as having been in France or Belgium in those times, such as Boetius, Corbican, &c. (165) But so little is known about them, that any inquiry into their history would be useless. Nor shall I trouble the reader with researches into the time, at which lived St. Florentinus an Irish priest of great reputation, whose memory is revered at Amboise in France. Let it suffice to observe, that he seems to have belonged to an earlier period than that we are now treating of, and to have been contemporary with St. German of Paris, who died in 576. (166) Roding, an Irishman and abbot of Bellilocus (Beaulieu) in the forest of Argonne, about seven leagues from Verdun and within three of Sainte Menchould, had gone over to France before the year 642, and spent some time there in the monastery of Tabullium (Tholey) in the Vosges. Afterwards he retired to that forest, and set about erecting a monastery, but was soon expelled together with his disciples, by Austresius a powerful and wealthy proprietor of that district, who did not like to allow foreigners to settle there. Roding then went to Rome, but after some time returned to his favourite spot, and having cured Austresius of a complaint, with which God had punished him, got from him a wood in which he founded the monastery of Bellilocus in or about 642. Numbers of persons chiefly Irish, flocked to place themselves under his care. Having governed this establishment for many years, he appointed, some time before his death, one Stephen abbot of it, and retired with only one companion into a more solitary part of the forest, half a mile distant from the monastery, there preparing himself for eternity. But he used to return to the monastery on every Sunday and great festival to celebrate mass and attend at the offices of the day. He lived until about 680, and died on a 17th of September. His reputation was very great in that country, where he is vulgarly called St. Rouin. In the title of a little tract on his life he is called bishop and abbot; but in the tract itself there is nothing to show that he was a bishop. (167)

(156) Colgan promised (AA. SS. p. 412) to prove this point at his Acts 14 July, but did not live long enough to publish them. Bollandus speaks of him as an Irishman, at the Acts of St. Erard, 8 January. Mabillon treating of him (Acta Bened. Tom. 2. p. 672. seqq.) says it is a mistake to make him an Irishman, and states that he was born at Sterpea (Strepy) in Hainault. But he gives us no proof of this assertion, except that Madelgar possessed great estates in that country. Might he not have acquired estates there without having been a native of it? Fleury, who mentions him, Hist. Eccl. L. 39 §. 30. has nothing as to the land of his birth. Some say that he accompanied St. Fursey from Ireland to England and afterwards to France. This does not agree with his having been a military man and married in France, and must be understood of another St. Madelgar, a member of St. Fursey's monastery of Latiniacum or Lagny, and who, as Mabillon observes, (ib. p. 300.) was known there by the name of St. Mauger. That this Madelgar was an Irishman will not be denied; and he was undoubtedly the one, whom Molanus, Miraeus, and others reckon among the followers and disciples of St. Fursey. (See AA. SS. p. 96.) The name Madelgar or Maldegar seems to indicate, that the surnamed Vincent was a relative of the other; and it may be supposed that, in consequence of said relationship, he went to France to try his fortune in that country. Madelgar, or, probably more correct, Maldegar was a well known name in Ireland. There was a Maldogar bishop of Ferns, who died in 676. (Tr. Th. p. 564.) That Vincent was only his surname is admitted by Mabillon (ib. p. 672.) and Fleury (loc. cit.), and is clear from the Life of St. Gislenuis, in which we read ap. Mabillon (ib. p. 793) “Madelgarius, qui Vincentius post dictus est in palatio supradicti regis (Dagoberti I.)”

(157) Colgan, following several writers, calls him Count of Hannonia (Hainaut); for it is said that he was governor of that province. The Bollandists (Comment. pr. ad Vit. S. Waldetrudis, 9 Apr.) say that he was a Count not of Hainaut but in Hainaut.

(158) She was a daughter of Walbert and Bertilia, and was born during the reign of Dagobert I. and consequently between 622 and 638. (See her Life ap. Bolland. 9 April.) Bollandus observes (at St. Erard 8 January) that intermarriages were frequent in those times between the French and the Irish, and instances the case of Waldetrudis and Madelgar.

(159) They were two sons, Landric and Dentelin, and two daughters, Aldetrudis and Madelberta. (See AA. SS. p. 412.) Mabillon says, (Acta Ben. Tom. 2. p. 673) that Dentelin died when only seven years old.

(160) Mabillon, loc. cit.

(161) Desmay has (Life of St. Fursey, cap. 13.) a ridiculous story of his having been sent as a governor to Ireland by Dagobert I. No part of Ireland was ever subject to the French kings. Others say that he conducted Dagobert the second, who after the death of his father Sigebert II. or III. king of Austrasia in 654 was shaved as a monk and sent to Ireland by Grimoald, who had succeeded his father Pepin of Landen as mayor of the palace. It is hard to think, that Madelgar would have been concerned in this iniquitous transaction; and there is every reason to think, that he had retired from the world before it occurred. Vernulaeus (De propagatione fidei, &c.) touching on this subject says that the more probable opinion is that he was an Irishman, and that it is universally allowed that he brought apostolic men from Ireland.

(162) See AA. SS. at 10 January. Molanus, Ferrarius, and Vernulacus call him a bishop, and from Ireland.

(163) Baldericus, quoted by Mabillon, says in his chronicle, that Madelgar, thinking Hautmont not sufficiently retired, removed to Sonegias (Soignies) a place not far distant, and there erected a monastery. He adds that he was buried there. Other accounts state, that he spent the whole of his monastic life at Hautmont.

(164) Mabillon, Acta, &c. Tom. 2. p. 674.

(165) Colgan, AA. SS. p. 96.

(166) According to Usher (Ind. Chron.) Florentinus was distinguished in 560. Compare with Primordia, p. 760. seqq.

(167) For this saint see Mabillon, Annal. Ben. at A. 642 and 680. and Acta Ben. Appendix to Sec. iv. Part 2. where he has published the Life of St. Roding written by an abbot Richard in the eleventh century. That Life is rather incorrect in one or two points, as, ex. c. when it states that Roding left Ireland at the same time with Columbanus and Gallus. He could not have left it so early.

BW5327 .L28 v.2
An ecclesiastical history of Ireland,

Princeton Theological Seminary-Speer Library

1 1012 00017 8774

BR794.L3 1829 v.3
ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF IRE
ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF IRE

John Givleahy A

AN ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY
OF IRELAND,
FROM THE
FIRST INTRODUCTION OF CHRISTIANITY
AMONG THE IRISH,
TO
THE BEGINNING OF THE THIRTEENTH CENTURY.

COMPILED

FROM THE WORKS OF THE MOST ESTEEMED AUTHORS, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC,
WHO HAVE WRITTEN AND PUBLISHED ON MATTERS CONNECTED WITH

THE IRISH CHURCH;

AND FROM IRISH ANNALS AND OTHER AUTHENTIC DOCUMENTS,

STILL EXISTING IN MANUSCRIPT.

By THE REV. JOHN LANIGAN, D. D.,
FORMERLY PROFESSOR OF HEBREW, THE SACRED SCRIPTURES, AND
ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PAVIA.

IN FOUR VOLUMES.

VOL. III.

SECOND EDITION.

DUBLIN:

PRINTED FOR J. CUMMING, 16, L. ORMOND-QUAY;
SIMPKIN AND MARSHALL, LONDON;
AND FOR R. CADELL AND CO., EDINBURGH.

1829.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY

OF

IRELAND, &c.

CHAPTER XVII.

Death of Colman Stellain—St. Colman Hua Fiachra—The priest Failan or Foilan—Priest Ernan—Cronan of Roscrea—Erection of the monastery of Roscrea—Priest Commian—Camin of Iniskeltra—St. Abban—Supposed to be two Saints of that name, one living in the fifth and the other in the sixth and seventh centuries—Monastery of Ros-mic-treoin founded by St. Abban—St. Gobnata—St. Pulcherius or Mochemoc—founds the monastery of Liathmore—several miracles ascribed to him—Death of St. Pulcherius—St. Mochelloc—St. Manchan of Menodrochit—supposed to be the same as Munchin of Limerick—St. Aidus bishop of Kildare—Dachua or Mochua Luachra—Conang O' Daithil, bishop of Emly—Baithan abbot of Clonmacnois, said to have been a bishop—Segenius abbot of Hy succeeded by Suibhne—Suibhne succeeded by Cumineus Albus or Cummin the White—St. Mura or Murus governed the monastery of Fathen-Mura—Bachull-Mura preserved as a relique—St. Monenna founds the nunnery of Fochard—Brighde—appoints Orbila or Servila abbess at Fochard, and retires to near Slieve Gullin, where she erects a church—said to have gone into North Britain and erected seven Churches there—said to have gone into England where she was known by the name of Movenna or Modwenna—St. Conchessa—St. Athracta—St. Fechin—erects the monastery of Fore in the Co. Westmeath—St. Aileran the Wise—he is sometimes called Helerzn, Aimeran, or Ereran—Ultan abbot of Clonard, and Colman Coss and Cumin, both abbots, of Clonmacnois, carried off by the plague that raged in the year 665—Colman successor of Finan in Lindisfarne—Dispute relative to the observance of Easter renewed—a synod held for the purpose of deciding this controversy—In this synod Colman supports the Irish mode of observing the Easter festival, and Agilbert and Wilfrid the Roman practice—The decision of the synod in favour of the Roman observance—The dispute about the tonsure also decided in the synod in favour of the Roman fashion.

SECT. I.

RETURNING now to Ireland, and endeavouring to follow the order of time as well as I am able, I have first to observe that Colman Stellain, abbot of Tirdaglas, and seemingly the immediate successor of Mocumin, (1) died in 624 or 625. (2) Whether or not he was the Colman mentioned among the priests of the third class of saints, (3) it is impossible to determine, as several other Colmans were distinguished at that period by their sanctity, (4) and particularly St. Colman Hua-Fiachra, a descendant of prince Fiachra the brother of Neill Neigillíach. (5) He was contemporary with St. Maidoc of Ferns, (6) and seems to have been abbot, and perhaps founder, of the monastery of Seanbotha in the territory of Hy-kin-selagh, situated at the foot of the mountain, called in Irish Suighe Lagen, that is, I believe, Mount Leinster at the borders of the now counties of Carlow and Wexford. (7) Of his further transactions or the year of his death we have no account. His memory was revered at Seanbotha on the 27th of October, the anniversary of his death. (8) An uncertainty, similar to that relative to the Colman of the third class, occurs also with regard to the priest Failan or Foilan, who also is reckoned among them. He was neither Foillan the brother of St. Fursey, nor the Foillan, who is said to have accompanied St. Livin to Brabant; whereas none of the Irish saints, who removed to the continent, are named in that catalogue. (9) Besides many other saints of this name, (10) there was Failan or Foilan son of Aidus a Munster prince, (11) perhaps the Aidus, who was a young man in the time of St. Senan, (12) and whose posterity ruled in Iveagh a part of the now county of Cork. (13) If so, this Failan might have belonged to the period of the third class, and have been the Failan, who is called the son of an Irish dynast, and said to have been baptized and educated by St. Coemgen or Kevin. (14) But, in the want of distinctive circumstances, no decisive opinion can be formed. In the same third class we meet with a priest Ernan. I think there can be no doubt, that he was the same as Ernene son of Crescen, who, as Adamnan says, (15) was famous and greatly known throughout all the churches of Ireland. Ernan was a servant boy in the monastery of Clonmacnois, when Columkill visited it about the year 590. He was endeavouring to touch the hem of his cloak, when the saint, perceiving what he was about, took hold of him and placed him before his face. On the bystanders observing that he ought not to take notice of such a troublesome boy, he desired them to have patience, and giving him his blessing said to them; "this boy, whom ye now despise, will henceforth be very agreeable to you, and will improve from day to day in good conduct and virtue ; and will be gifted by God with wisdom, learning, and eloquence." (16) It is a misfortune, that very little is known concerning this eminent man. He was, in all probability, a native of the vicinity of Clonmacnois. It was there he went through his studies and with great proficiency. (17) He is called in some Irish calendars Ernene of Rathnui in Hi-Garchon, (Rathnew in the county of Wicklow) whence it seems that he governed some establishment in that place. His memory was revered there on the 18th of August ; (18) and his death is assigned to the same year as that of Fintan Munnu, viz. A. D. 634 (635). (19)

(1) See Chap. x. §. 13. Not. 239.

(2) The Annals of Innisfallen have A. 624. The 4 Masters A. 625. (ap. AA. SS. p. 247.) Usher says, (p. 968 and Ind. Chron.) A. 634. I suspect that 634 has been substituted by mistake for the 624 of the Innisfallen Annals, which are usually very correct.

(3) See Chap. xiv. §. 8.

(4) Colgan, omitting other Colmans, mentions (AA. SS. p. 247) Colman son of Comgell, who died in 620 ; (but he was probably a bishop, see Not. 22. to Chap. xiv.) Colman Huabardan, abbot of Clonmacnois, died in 623 ; Colman, abbot of Glendaloch, died in 659, &c. There was a Colman Cass, abbot of Clonmacnois, who died in 664 (665). See AA. SS. p. 90. These and other Colmans belonged to the period of the third class. Harris has (Monasteries) a St. Colman, who, he says, founded the monastery of Disert-Mocholmoc in the county of E. Meath, and in the sixth century. Of this Colman I can find no further account. Archdall places it in Westmeath, four miles S. W. of Mullingar, and calls it Dysart. He adds, that a house for Conventual Franciscans was afterwards founded there. Mr. Carlisle (Topographical Dictionary of Ireland, ad loc.) makes Archdall say, that this Franciscan establishment was founded by St. Colman. Archdall was not so ignorant as to commit such an unchronological blunder. Surely Mr. Carlisle ought to know, that there were no Franciscans for hundreds of years after the times, in which Archdall supposed Disert-Mocholmoc to have been founded by Colman.

(5) Colgan, AA. SS. p. 141.

(6) We read in the Life of St. Maidoc; (cap. 58) “Alio die cum S. Moedoc iter ageret, occurrit ei in via S. Colmanus filius Fiacrii” (i. e. de stirpe Fiacrii).

(7) In the same Life it is stated (cap. 26.) that St. Maidoc was on some occasion at the monastery of Seanbotha. It is not said that the abbot was Colman; nor is any abbot's name mentioned. But, as in our Calendars he is constantly called Colman of Seanbotha in Hykinselagh, it may be fairly concluded that he was abbot there; and, on comparing the circumstance here mentioned with the passage just quoted, it is plain that he was there in St. Maidoc's time, and that Seanbotha was not far distant from Ferns. Archdall (ad loc.) says that it is now unknown. This much, however, is, I think, certain that it was near Mount Leinster, and, in all probability, at the county of Wexford side. In the chapter (26) above referred to it is placed “juxta radices montis, qui dicitur Scotice Suighe Lagen, id est Sessio Laginensium.” That this was the mountain now called Mount Leinster, appears not only from its very name, which corresponds to the Irish Suighe Lagen, but likewise from its proximity to Ferns.

(8) AA. SS. p. 141.

(9) Ex. c. not even Columbanus of Luxeu, Fiacre, or Fursej, notwithstanding their great celebrity. Usher says, (p. 967) that he would have supposed Foillan, brother of Fursej, to have been the one of the third order, were he not called a bishop. (See Chap. xvi. §. ii.) But, even were it certain, that he was only a priest, he would not have been named in the catalogue, and for the reason above assigned.

(10) See AA. SS. p. 104.

(11) Colgan (AA. SS. p. 799.) surnames this Aidus, or Hugh, Daman, al. Bennan. He does not represent him as king of all Munster. Keating says, (Book 2. p. 35. ed. A. 1723.) that Aodh or Hugh Bennain, king of Munster, died during the reign of the monarch Suibhne (Sweeny) Meann. If so, he must have died between 615 and 628. (See Chap. xiv. §. 1.) But the king of all Munster, who died between these years, was Fingen, the successor of Aodh Caomh. Fingen died in 619. (Not. 39 to Chap. xiv.) It may be, however, that Aodh Caomh lived until the reign of Suibhne Meann. If Aodh Bennain was king of all Munster he must, as far as I can find, have been the same as Aodh Caomh, a son of whom might without any anachronism be placed among the saints of the third class. Yet the surname Bennain, as also that of Daman, seems to indicate that they were different persons; and Aodh Bennain was probably only a petty king or dynast. Instead of calling him with Keating, or his translator, king of Munster, he ought, perhaps, rather be called a Munster prince.

(12) See Life of St. Senan at 8 March, cap 22.

(13) Iveagh or Ivagh was a part of Carbery. Smith's History of Cork, Vol. 1. p. 31.

(14) See Usher, p. 1068.

(15) Vit. S. C. L. 1. c. 3. al. 2.

(16) Adamnan, ib.

(17) Columbill is introduced, (ib.) as saying of him; "In hac vestra congregatione grandis est futurus profectus."

(18) The Martyrologium Tamlact, has at 18 Aug. "Erneus filius Gresseni de Rath-nui in regione de Hi-Garchon." The Calendar of Cashel at the same day adds, that his festival was kept also at Kill-Droigneach in Idrone. (Tr. Th. p. 373.)

(19) Annals of Roscrea. See Tr. Th. ib. ad AA. SS. p. 8, and compare with Not. 83. to Chap. xv. Usher also has affixed his death to 635. (Ind. Chron. from the Annals of Ulster.) He was mistaken, as already remarked, (Not. 91 to Chap. xv) in confounding him with other Ernans.

§. II. After Ernan is mentioned Cronan, who, I should be greatly inclined to suppose, was Cronan of Roscrea, were there not some reason to think, that the latter was a bishop. (20) Be this as it may, Cronan, called of Roscrea, was a native of Ele (Ely O'Carrol) in Munster. (21) His father was Odran of the sept of said territory, and his mother Coemri of that of Corcobaschin, a district in the West of the now county of Clare. Cronan, when arrived at a proper age for embracing the religious state, taking along with him his maternal cousin Mobai, (22) went to visit some holy men in Connaught, and stopped at a place called Puayd, (23) where he was soon joined by several pious persons, with whom he led a monastic life. After some time he left that place, and went together with Mobai to Clonmacnois, where he did not remain long. Next we find him erecting several religious houses, in one of which at Lusmag (24) he spent a considerable time. Having given up this establishment to some monks, Cronan returned to his own country and erected a cell near the lake or marsh called Cree, which cell was called Sean-ross or Seanruis. (25) He was in this place about the time of the death of St. Molua of Clonfert-molua; for it is related that this saint in his latter days visited Cronan at Seanruis, and demanded of him the sacrifice, or holy Eucharist, which he might take with him. Cronan gave it to him, and Molua recommended his monastery to his protection. (26) The monastery of Roscrea was not as yet established; and accordingly its foundation cannot be assigned to an earlier date than about 606. (27) How long Cronan remained at Sean-ross is not recorded. The cause of his leaving it was this. Some strangers, who had come to pay him a visit, were not able to find it out, and in their wanderings remained a whole night without food or roof to shelter them. This so displeased Cronan, that he determined on quitting that lonesome and too much retired spot, and removed to the high road, where he erected a large monastery, which in course of time gave rise to the town of Roscrea. (28) Here he spent the remainder of his life, employed in good works and most highly esteemed. On one occasion he protected by his prayers the people of Ele against the fury of the Ossorians. On another he appeased Fingen, king of Munster, who was bent on punishing most severely the people of Meath on account of some horses, that had been stolen from him, and had already marched with an army for that purpose from Cashel as far as Ele. (29) This king had a great veneration for the saint, whom we find, when very old and blind, on a visit with him at Cashel. When returning to Roscrea, Cronan was accompanied by the king in person and the chief nobility, &c. of the whole country. Not long after, having blessed his people of Ele, and received the divine sacrifice, he died on a 28th of April (30) in, according to every appearance, some year of the reign of said king Fingen, and consequently not later than A. D. 619, or, at the lowest, 626. (31)

(20) Ware, touching on the Life of Cronan, (Writers L. 1. c. 13. al. 15.) calls him bishop, otherwise abbot of Roscrea. Yet Colgan states, (AA. SS. p. 303.) that we do not read of his having been a bishop. I suspect that Ware's motive for giving him that title was, that Roscrea was formerly an episcopal see, and his thence supposing that it was such as early as Cronan's time. Of this, however, I believe he could not have adduced any proof. The Bollandists, who have published his Life at 28 April, observe that in a MS. Florarium they found him called bishop. They were inclined to think, that he really was one, and that he was the bishop Cronan mentioned by Adamnan. (See Not. 182 to Chap. XI.) I grant them, in opposition to Colgan, that Cronan was old enough to be a bishop before the death of Columbkille. But there are circumstances, to be mentioned lower down, which prove, that, if he ever was a bishop, he was not so until after it. The Bollandists feeling the weakness of that conjecture, lay down as almost certain, that he was the priest Cronan of the third order; and in fact it is difficult to suppose, that so celebrated a saint would have been omitted in that catalogue, as would be the case, unless he was the Cronan reckoned among the priests. In his Life, which is a respectable and very circumstantial document, he is called only abbot, without the least allusion to his ever having exercised episcopal functions. On the whole it appears exceedingly probable, that his being called bishop in after times was a mistake founded, as above observed, with regard to Ware, on the circumstance of Roscrea having become an episcopal see.

(21) That district, or at least a part of it, is, as often observed, now comprized in the King's county.

(22) We read in the Life of Cronan; "Mater S. Cronani, et S. Mobai mater, et mater S. Mochonnae tres germanae sorores fuerunt." Of Mobai little else is known. As to Mochonna, he might have been the abbot of that name, who seems to have governed a monastery somewhere in Leinster and was living in the time of St. Coemgen. (See AA. SS. p. 565.) But, as there were other St. Mochonnas about that period, this point must remain undecided.

(23) Prope gurgitem Puayd. Whether the author meant by gurgitem a pool or a gulf, I cannot determine; nor can I find any place in Connaught called Puayd.

(24) In the barony of Garrycastle, King's county.

(25) "Cellam itaque prope stagnum Cree—aedificavit, quae cella Seanross nominatur." (Life of St. Cronan. See also Usher, p. 969.) I have observed elsewhere, (Not. 73 to Chap. XII.) that th's stagnum, or marsh, Cree was probably what is now called the bog of Monela. Archdall (at Roscree) says that Cronan built that cell in an island of Loughkee. But Loughkee or Loughkay is in the county of Leitrim far from Cronan's country. I suppose that, being puzzled by the name Loughcree, he guessed at that of Loughkee.

(26) In the Life of St. Molua, al. Lugidus or Lugidius, is the following passage; "Venit (Molua) ad S. Cronanum de Ruis-cree, sedentem tunc in cella Senruis, et postulavit ab eo sacrificium, quod secum portaret; et dedit ei Cronanus. Cui Lugidus ait: Tecum relinquo locum meum, ut eum a persecutoribus defendas." In said Life Cronan is called only a priest; and hence it appears that, if Cronan ever became a bishop, it must have been after the death of Molua, and consequently several years after that of Columbkil. Thus we see that he was not the bishop Cronan mentioned by Adamnan. (Compare with Not. 20.) Molua's applying to Cronan for the blessed Eucharist, and taking it with him, was in conformity with the ancient practice of holy persons sending it to each other in token of communion and brotherly love. Thus as far back as the times of St. Irenaeus, and earlier, the Popes used to send it to bishops even of far distant churches.

(See Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. L. 5. c. 24. and Bingham, Origines, &c. Book xv. ch. 4. sect. 8.)

(27) This is the earliest date (see Not. 100 to Chap. XII.) marked for Molua's death, before which, we may be sure, Roscrea was not founded. Therefore Harris was wrong in assigning said foundation to the sixth century.

(28) In his Life it is said, that "magnum monasterium aedificavit; et ibi crevit clara civitas, quae vocatur Ross-cree."

(29) The ancient Meath was contiguous to Ele.

(30) Where did Archdall find, that Cronan died on the 10th of May? The Life has 28 April.

(31) Cronan's death is mentioned just after the account of his return from Cashel. Fingen is said to have died in 519. (See Not. 39 to Chap. XIV.) Yet, on comparing what is there observed concerning the beginning of the reign of his successor Failbhe Fland, it may be conjectured that he did not die until about 626. Colgan says, (AA. SS. p. 303.) that Cronan was alive in 625. The Bollandists go still further, pretending that he might have lived until after 640. For this statement they had no authority whatever, except a very unfounded conjecture of their own, that, in case of his having been a bishop, he might have been the bishop Cronan mentioned with Thomian and others in the letter of the Roman clergy written in 640. We have already seen (Not. 91 to Chap. XV.) who this Cronan was; nor could Cronan of Roscrea, even if then alive, and whether bishop or priest, have been among those to whom said letter was directed; whereas they were all northerns, and he a southern. Had the Bollandists known the time of Fingen's reign, they would not have imagined that Cronan could be alive in 640. Archdall had no right to refer to Usher as if assigning Cronan's death to the beginning of the seventh century. All that Usher says is, that he survived Lugidus al. Molua.

§. III. The priest Cronan of the third class, if different from the saint now treated of, might have been Cronan of Maghbile, or the Cronan son of Silni, of whom as much as is known has been already touched upon. (32) That Commian, another priest of said class, was the learned Cummian author of the Paschal epistle (33) is exceedingly probable, and, I should think, certain, were there not reason to believe, that this Cumnian was the same as Cumin Fada, who is said by some to have become a bishop, although on very doubtful authority. (34) But there were, in those times, other distinguished persons of that name, one or other of whom might have been meant by the author of that catalogue. (35) Who Coman was, whose name appears just before that of Commian, I cannot well discover. He could not have been the Coman of Ferns, who lived until 678, but was perhaps the Comman called by Adamnan a respectable priest. (36) I am greatly inclined to think that, notwithstanding an apparent difference in the names, Coman of the third class was the celebrated Camin of Iniskeltra or Iniskeltair. (37) Nothing can agree better than the times; for Camin flourished in the first half of the seventh century. He was of the princely house of Hy-kinselagh by his father Dima, and half brother of Guair king of Connaught by his mother Cumania. Little else is recorded of him, (38) until he retired to the island of Iniskeltair in Loughderg, a lake formed by the Shannon. Here he led a solitary and very austere life, but after some time was obliged to erect a monastery, on account of the numbers of persons, that resorted to him for instruction. Although of a very sickly constitution he seems to have closely applied to ecclesiastical studies and wrote a commentary on the Psalms collated with the Hebrew text. (39) This saint died in 653, (40) on the 25th, or, as some say, the 24th of March. His memory was so much respected, that the monastery of Iniskeltair became very celebrated, and was considered as one of the principal asylums in Ireland. His immediate successor, as abbot, was, I believe, Stellan. (41) Of the priests of the third class there now remain only two to be treated of, Fechin and Airendanus; but chronological order requires our deferring their history for a while.

(32) Not. 91 to Chap. xv.

(33) See Chap. xv. §. 7-8.

(34) See ib. Not. 54.

(35) Ib. Not. 53.

(36) Usher searching for Coman of the third class says, (p. 968) that Coman of Ferns was perhaps the Comman called by Adamnan (L. 3. c. 19.) honorabilis presbyter, whom Usher seems to have supposed the same as Coman of the class. But, as Coman of Ferns did not die until 678, how could he have belonged to said class, which lasted until only 665? (See Chap. xiv. §. 8.) Supposing the Comman of Adamnan to have been different from Coman of Ferns, which is very probable, he might have been the priest Coman of the list. It is true that Adamnan speaks of him as having conversed with him. This conversation might have occurred, when Adamnan was young and some years before 665. Adamnan was born about the year 625, and must have been younger than Comman, who, as he tells us, was maternal nephew of Virgnous, who, after governing Hy for 25 years, died in 623. Colgan treats (at 18 Mart.) of a Comman, who is called bishop in Irish calendars without any mention of his see, and strives to show that he was the same as the priest ap. Adamnan. If so, he must have become a bishop after Adamnan had written his work, and lived until after the death of Columbkil. Colgan has nothing but vague conjectures on this point, and mixed with such inconsistencies, that it is not worth while to make any further remark on what he says, except that this bishop Comman, whose see he was not able to discover, is said to have died in 676 (677). Usher, although he had spoken of Coman of Ferns as a priest, and having always remained so, as appears from his having thought he might have been the Comman of Adamnan, yet in his Ind. Chron. (A. 678) calls him the bishop of Ferns. Ware also reckons him among the bishops of Ferns, but places his death in 675, merely, I believe, on conjecture, and because he knew that in the year 678 the see of Ferns was occupied by Dirath, who succeeded Maldogar in 677. It is more than probable that they were mistaken in making him a bishop, owing to their having met with a bishop of that name (the one of Colgan) and thence confounding him with Coman of Ferns. In a list of the bishops of that see in the 7th century (ap. Tr. Th. p. 564.) no Coman appears, nor according to the succession there marked would there have been room for him.

(37) An interchange of vowels frequently occurs in the spelling of Irish names. Thus we find Commian for Cummian, Cummin or Cumin for the same, Aedh for Aodh, &c. A is often used for O, and vice versa. Fraech, for Froech, Faïllan for Foïllan, &c. Thus Camin might have been written for Comin, or Cumin. It is probable that this diversity of spelling arose from a provincial variety of pronunciation, and was adhered to in writing for the purpose of distinguishing persons, whose names were the same, particularly if such names were very common. Yet I acknowledge that there is a difficulty with regard to applying these observations to the particular case of Camin of Iniskeltra; for the Calendar of Cashel states, that he was otherwise called Canin, a name truly different from Coman. Yet as his original name seems to have been Camin, and Canin only a surname, this objection is not sufficient to overthrow the proposed conjecture. In a copy of the Annals of Innisfallen in the library of the Dublin Society his name is written Cumine.

(38) Colgan has endeavoured (at 25 Mart.) to give some account of Camin. He observes that there are some Irish poems in praise of him, but so intermixed with fables, that he could not make any use of them towards clearing up his history.

(39) Usher says (p. 972) that he saw a part of this work, which was very carefully distinguished by various marks. At the top of each page was the collation with the Hebrew text, and at the outward margin were added short scholia or notes. It was, according to general tradition, in Camin's own handwriting. Colgan also saw a part of it, the same, I suppose, as that mentioned by Ware, Writers at Camin.

(40) Annals of Innisfallen as referred to by Usher, Ware, and Colgan. In the copy above mentioned (Not. 37) the year marked is 651.

(41) Colgan observes, (AA. SS. p. 17.) that Stellan, abbot of Iniskeltra, flourished about 650. Archdall (at Iniskeltair) by changing flourished into died, makes Stellan die three years before St. Camin. This is not the only occasion, in which he has substituted dying for flourishing.

§. iv. One of the most famous Irish saints is Abban; but scarcely any thing can be more confused or unchronological than the accounts, that are given of him. Were we to believe what we read in his so called Life, (42) it should be admitted that he was born in the fifth century and lived until about the middle of the seventh. It might be suspected, that there were two St. Abbans, one who lived in the fifth and sixth centuries, and another belonging to the sixth and seventh; and that their transactions have been confounded together. But on considering the circumstances related concerning him in the Irish calendars and other documents, and comparing them with said Life, it is evident that our old writers knew only of one saint Abban (43) although the compiler or compilers of his Acts did not scruple to make him much more ancient than he really was. Passing by what is said of his relationship to St. Ibar, and some other similar stories, this much is clear that Abban was born some time in the sixth century. His father was Lagnen of the house of Hua Cormac or Dal Cormac in Leinster, derived from Cucorb, (44) who had been king of that province. His mother's name was Mella, who is said to have been a sister of St. Coemgen. (45) The earliest account I meet with of Abban's transactions, that appears tolerably authentic, is his having founded the monastery of Ros-mic-treoin, or Old Ross, some time in the sixth century. (46) A heap of other monasteries is attributed to him, particularly in the now counties of Wexford and Cork. (47) The greatest part of them is unknown, and I have not the least doubt, that several of them were not founded by him. (48) Two nunneries have been also ascribed to him, Kill-aibhe in East Meath, where he is said to have placed as abbess St. Segnic or Sincha (49); and Borneach, now Ballyvourney, six miles W. of Macroomp (co. Cork). This nunnery belonged to St. Gobnata, whose memory is to this day greatly venerated in that country. (50) But Abban's chief establishment was at Magharnoidhe, somewhere, it seems, in the now county of Wexford; (51) and in this place he spent the latter years of his life. He is said to have been, when a young man, in Great Britain. (52) This is, I dare say, as ill founded as the story of his having been three times at Rome, and, on the third, ordained priest there by Gregory the great. (53) Abban is said to have preached in Ely O'Carrol, and to have there obtained a grant of some land, which he retained for religious purposes. (54) Many other circumstances are related concerning him; but they are so intermixed with fables, that it would be a useless task to endeavour to unravel them. He died at Magharnoidhe on, as some say, a 16th of March, or, according to others, a 27th of October. (55) As to the year of his death, it is impossible to discover it; nor can even the period of it be precisely ascertained, although it is probable that it was the early part of the seventh century. (56)

(42) Colgan has published this farrago at 16 Mart. It is very long. The apparent author of it speaks (cap. 24.) of himself as being the grandson of a man, whom St. Abban had baptized. Hence Colgan concludes, that the author lived in the latter end of the seventh century, or beginning of the eighth. But, unless we must suppose that he told a falshood, (for no author of that early period could have put together such a mass of inconsistencies) that passage belonged to some ancient Life of Abban, whence it was copied by the compiler of the one now extant, which appears to be a sort of patchwork collected from various sources. Part of it, at least the two first chapters, seems to have been composed somewhere out of Ireland. The Bollandists have omitted the Life of Abban at 16 March, promising to give at 27 October a dissertation, in which they would inquire, whether there was only one St. Abban or two, viz. a priest Abban and an abbot Abban who lived at different periods. (See Tom. 2. for March, p. 418.) Their reason for putting off that dissertation to the 27th of October was that, while some Calendars mark the festival of St. Abban at 16 March, others assign it to 27 October; and in fact this is the day, on which it is said in his Life that he died.

(43) The Bollandists imagined that there might have been two Abbans, and thus, I suppose, (for I do not know whether their promised dissertation has been published) thought they might explain what is said of St. Finnian of Clonard having been baptized by Abban, that is, a priest Abban, (see Chap. ix. §. 8. and Not. 120.) who might have been different from the abbot Abban of later times. But from the manner, in which this pretended baptism is mentioned in the Life of Abban (cap. 29.) and its being added that, many years after, Abban visited Finnian when the latter was an abbot; together with the title of venerable given to Abban in the part of Finnian's Acts where said baptism is mentioned; it is plain that the Abban meant in that account was no other than the famous abbot Abban. They might also have thought, that said priest Abban was really nephew to St. Ibar, the disciple of St. Patrick, by his sister Mella, as stated in the Life. But the fact is, that said Mella, as we have it on better authority, was sister to St. Coemgen, who flourished in the sixth century. But how could they have reconciled what is said of Abban having been son of Cormac, king of Leinster, (Life, cap. 3.) with his having baptized Finnian? For this Cormac died in 535 (536). Now, if Abban baptized Finnian, he must have been born, at the latest, in 450, as he is said to have been a priest at the time, and Finnian is represented as having been baptized very soon after his birth, which, at the most moderate computation, cannot be placed later than 480. Abban, being then a priest, must have been at least 30 years old. Are we to believe, that Cormac, who reigned only 9 years, had Abban born to him 85 or rather 86 years before his death? I do not make these remarks as if I believed that even the real Abban was son of that king Cormac, but to show what contradictions are contained in said Life, and that they cannot be explained by the supposition of two Abbans. I am surprized that Usher, who met with these contradictory statements, could have swallowed the stories about Abban having been nephew to Ibar, &c. particularly considering his hypothesis as to Finnian having been born about 460. (See Not. 124 to Chap. ix.) For in this hypothesis Abban should have been born not later than 430. Usher knew only of one Abban, and exerted his ingenuity to reconcile those stories with some sort of chronological truth. For this purpose he assigned (Ind. Chron.) to A. 490 what is said of Abban having been sent, when twelve years old, to the school of his uncle Ibar. But he overlooked the circumstance of Finnian's baptism by Abban, and indeed so much so that he affixed to the same year 490 Finnian's departure for G. Britain. Accordingly he must have considered what is said of that baptism as a fable; and he had an equal right to reject other parts of that spurious history. The fact is that in putting it together the author or authors wished to make it appear, that Abban was connected with many of the most eminent persons of the Irish church; and and thus they brought him in contact with Ibar and even with St. Patrick, with Finnian, Columbkil, and so on until they make him associate with St. Molingus, who lived in the 7th century and died in 697. Then, to account for these transactions of his, we are told that he lived more than 300 years!!! In short that Life is a shameful composition, similar to the sort of Life drawn up for Kieran of Saigir. There is not a word about Abban in any document worthy of credit relative to the times of St. Patrick, Ibar, or St. Brigid.

(44) AA. SS. p. 625, seqq. See also O'Flaherty, (Ogyg. p. 293) who makes Cormac son of Cucorb. According to a genealogy ap. Colgan (ib.) he was his grandson. Cucorb lived in the second century. In Abban's Life it is said that he was son of Cormac king of Leinster, that is, the Cormac who was king in the sixth century. (See Not. prec.) But Colgan shows that this is a mistatement. Abban was not the son of either a king or a Cormac. He was of the race of Hua Cormac, that is, a descendant of the above mention Cormac. The compiler of the Life changed Hua-Cormac into king Cormac.

(45) Maguir ap. AA. SS. p. 626. Colgan, who would fain keep up the fable of Abban having been nephew to St. Ibar, strives to show that Maguir was mistaken. But still he was not able to prove, that Mella was sister to Ibar, as said in the Life. In other documents Abban's mother is called Cooinech Abbadh. What was her name is of very little consequence; and it is sufficient to know, that there is no authority worth attending to for the story of her having been a sister of Ibar.

(46) We read in the Life of St. Molua of Clonfert-molua, " S. Molua visitavit S. Evinum abbatem in regione Kinnselach non longe a flumine Berbha in monasterio. Rosmactreoin, quod sanc-tissimus senex Abbanus fundavit, habitantem." (See also Abban's Life, cap. 26.) As St. Evin died about 600, (See Chap. xiv. §. 3.) that monastery must have been established prior to said year. In this passage Abban is called an old man, and might have been really so at the time of the foundation of that monastery, if it took place not long before 600. But it is probable, that senex was merely an epithet, by which he used to be distinguished, as he seems to have lived to a great age, and that it is not there used as indicating that he was actually old, when he founded said monastery. I do not find it mentioned by Archdall, although he has so many others, that never existed; nor do I think it certain, that Abban was the founder of it. (See Not. 46. to Chap. xiv.)

(47) Besides Rosmactreoin, are mentioned Druim-chain-cel-iaigh, Camross, Maghar-Noidhe, Fion-magh, and Disert-Cheanan in Hy-Kinselagh, that is, in or near the county of Wexford; Kill-Abban in E. Meath; another Kill-Abban in Hua Muiredhuig, al. Hua Midhe in a northern part of Leinster, I suppose the present county of Louth, in which was a district called Hy-Meith; (see Harris, Antiq. ch. 7.) Kill-achaid-conchinn in Corcaiduibhne in the West of Munster; (probably in Kerry rather than in the county of Cork, where it is placed by Harris, Monast.) Kill-cruimthir in Hy Liathain; (now comprizing the barony of Barrymore, Cork, and some other tracts.) Kill-na-marbhan near the town called Briggobhain, now Brigoon within a mile of Mitchelstown; (see Smith's Cork, Vol. 1. p. 353.) (Cluain-ard-Mobecoc and Cluain-Findglas in Muskerry, county of Cork; Cluain-conbruin in the plain of Femin between Cashel and Clonmel; and three more in one plain in Connaught called Magh-ce, or Trindi, al. Magh-elle, which Colgan (AA. SS. p. 622.) places in the county of Galway.

(48) Except some of the monasteries said to have been founded by St. Abban in Hy-kinselagh, (his own country) and the two Kill-abbans, I do not find sufficient authority for attributing to him any one of the others above mentioned. Kill-achaid-conchinn, is said in Abban's Life, (cap. 20.) to have been after its foundation denominated from an abbot Finan. Perhaps it was called Killfinan. There is a place in Kerry called Killfin. As that monastery was very probably in Kerry, it might have been in this place. Who the Finan here mentioned was, we are not informed. Colgan conjectures that he was St. Finan called of Kinnitch. (Kinnitty in the King's county) where he was abbot about the latter end of the sixth century, but not in the year 557, as Archdall states. This conjecture is not improbable, whereas this Finan was a native of Corcaduibhne, (Ware, Writers L. 1. c. 13. al. 15.) the territory, in which the monastery of Kill-achaid-conchinn was situated. Might the barony of Corkaguinny in Kerry be the same as the ancient Corcaduibhne, or, at least, a part of it? (Beauford was greatly mistaken (Anc. Topogr. of Ireland) in making Corcaduibhne the same as Hy-Liathain, which was in the East.) Finian had been a disciple of St. Brendan of Clonfert, (Tr. Th. p. 380) and, it seems, of St. Senan of Inniscatthy, to whom he is said to have been related. (AA. SS. p. 529.) In fact a Finan is particularly mentioned among the disciples of Senan. (ib. p. 525.) I suspect that he, not Abban, was the founder of Kill-achaid-conchinn. Why should it have, as stated in Abban's Life, borne the name of Finan, not of Abban, had it been founded by the latter? Finan was a native of the country, in which it was situated, a country, which I doubt whether Abban ever visited. As to the name Kill-achaid-conchinn, that is, the cell of the field Conchinn, it was relative to the spot on which the monastery stood; but how this spot came to be called Conchinn, would scarcely be worth inquiring into, did not Colgan say (AA. SS. p. 622) that it got this name from a holy virgin Conchenna, whose memory was revered there on the 28th April. But it was, at least, originally, a monastery for men; and I suspect that Colgan had no other authority for his statement than his having found a St. Conchenna marked in the Calendars at said day, different from two other Conchennas, one of whom was called the daughter of Kellaigh. I suppose that the having met with the name Kellaigh was Archdall's motive for changing Kill-achad-conchinn into Killeigh, and hence placing this establishment not far from Youghall in East Munster, instead of the West, where it really was. Then he adds, what is not to be found either in Abban's Life or any where else, that Abban placed Conchenna there as abbess.

Next comes Kill-cruimthir, which seems not to have been merely a cell or church belonging to a priest, the name signifying Priest's cell or church. Colgan's opinion was (AA. SS. p. 622) that it got its name from a priest Fraech, whose memory was revered in that neighbourhood, particularly at Kill-chile, (Kilcully, I suppose, in the North Liberty of Cork) near which Kill-cruimthir was situated. Why then attribute it to Abban? or why make him the founder of Kill-na-marbhan, the cell or church of the dead, near Brigoon? The tradition of that district is that the church of Brigoon was erected by a saint Finachan, (Smith's Cork, vol. 1. p. 354) whose staff, as supposed to be, was kept there. This seems to indicate that this saint was a bishop, and Smith says that, according to Colgan, Brigoon was once an episcopal see. I cannot discover where Colgan has said so. He makes mention (AA. SS. p. 584.) of a St. Finnichan or Finchan, who was in the sixth century bishop at a place called Druimenaich, but does not tell us where it was. Perhaps it was in the now county of Cork, where we find several places with names almost exactly the same, ex. c. Dromanagh or Drumanagh in the barony of Duhallow. Archdall (at Brigowne) makes Abban the founder even of Brigoon itself. But Brigoon was neither a church nor a monastery. It was a town at the time that Abban is supposed to have erected Kill-na-marbhan. He misunderstood the following words in Abban's Life (cap. 20.) "Juxta civitatem Briggobhainn cellam, quae dicitur scotice Ceall-na-marbhan, id est, Cella mortuorum, aedificavit."

In the case of Cluain-aird-Mobecoc, or, as Archdall calls it, Kilbeacan, we find a palpable fraud. The very name Mobecoc, that is, my dear Becoc or Becan, (like Moedoc, my Edoc or Edan) shows that its founder was the celebrated St. Becan of the royal blood of Munster, of the Eugenic line, and brother to St. Corbmac, (see Not. 111 to Chap. XII.) St. Evin of Old Ross, and other holy men. We read in the Life of Corbmac; (at 26 Mart. cap. 2) Sanctus Becanus, in Munonia remanens, monasterium de Killbecain, alias Cluain-aird-Mobecoc erexit, et sanctissime rexit." The compilers of Abban's Life seem to have been well aware of what is asserted in this passage; for, to patch up the matter, they allow (cap. 20.) that St. Becan resided there until his death, and pay him the highest encomiums for the extraordinary austerity of his life, and the miracles, which he wrought. They tell us that he used to sing the whole Psalter every day, whether dry or wet, warm or cold, by the side of a stone cross in the open air outside the monastery. St. Becan lived in the sixth century, as appears from his having been a brother of St. Evin. Keating (B. 2. p. 22.) makes him contemporary with Columbkil and the king Diarmid son of Cervail. His memory was revered on the 26th of May. (AA. SS. p. 755.) As to Cluain-Findglas, Cluain-Conbruin, and the three monasteries in Magh-Cé or Magh-elle, concerning which nothing is known, it would be a waste of time to make any inquiry about them.

(49) See Not. 94 to Chap. xiv. If this nunnery was founded by Abban, why call it Kill-Ailbhe? The very name shows, that not he but one Ailbhe was the founder of it.

(50) Smith, Hist. of Cork, Vol. 1. p. 193. Colgan treats of St. Gobnata at 11 February, the day on which her name appears in the Calendars, although Smith says that her patron day is the 14th of said month. She is said to have been a descendant of Conar the great, a famous king of Ireland, some of whose posterity lived in Muskerry, (Cork) where St. Gobnata was born. What Smith has about her having been said to be a daughter of O'Connor Sligo is contrary to every statement I have met with; for she was certainly a native of the South. At what time she lived I do not find; nor can its being said that she got Borneach from St. Abban afford any help towards discovering it. What right had Abban to a place in Muskerry, the residence, and, at least in great part, the property of Gobnata's own family? In the various calendars, in which she is mentioned, and very circumstantially, there is not a word about Abban, and the story of his having founded Borneach is on a par with others already animadverted on.

(51) Magharnoidhe, as it is called in Abban's Life (cap. 32.) is otherwise named Maghirnenina (ib. cap. 26.) Archdall says (ad loc.) I know not on what authority, that it was near the river Barrow, and probably in the parish of Whitechurch. Elsewhere (Addenda, p. 820) he makes it the same as Maudlinton near Wexford. It is odd that a place, which is said to have been once a considerable town, should be so little known at present.

(52) There is a story in the Life (cap. 12. seqq.) about Abban having gone to the South of Britain with St. Ibar and others, and of their having stopped for some time at a city called Abbain-dun, or Dun-Abbain, meaning, it seems, Abingdon. Then we are told, that they there converted the king, queen, and all the inhabitants, who until then had been pagans. This is too silly a fable to merit a serious refutation. For, supposing for a while that Abban lived in Ibar's, time, this conversion should have taken place before the year 500, in which Ibar died. The kings of that period in South Britain were Anglo-Saxons. Now who has ever heard that any Anglo-Saxon king became a Christian before 500, or for very many years after? This intention of the author of this fable seems to have been to insinuate, that Abingdon got its name from St. Abban; and Colgan strives to show, that such was really the case. Camden mentions (Vol. 1. Col. 160.) a tradition, accordingly to which Abingdon was denominated from an Irish hermit, named Abben, that lived there. Usher quotes (p. 1007.) from Simon's history of the abbots of Abingdon (published in the Monasticon Anglicanum, Tom. 1.) an account of the origin of its name, in which it is attributed to an Aben, of a consular family, who, having escaped from the fury of Hengist, led there the life of a hermit, and afterwards retired to Ireland, where he died. (See also Ind. Chron. ad A. 461.)

(53) The first of these pretended expeditions to Rome was in company with St. Ibar, and therefore prior to A. D. 500. As the third was in St. Gregory's time, ergo about 600. This is chronology with a vengeance! And Abban was ordained by Gregory at a time when, following these notable stories, he should have been, at least, 120 years old. And then he returned to Ireland, and set about founding monasteries. Usher, having swallowed these fables, endeavoured to give them some air of probability by affixing (Ind. Chron.) Abban's death to 599 during the pontificate of Gregory. But this will not do; for according to the Life, Abban must have lived for many years after Gregory's death.

(54) The place said to have been granted to Abban is called Rath-Becain. (Life, cap. 21.) I cannot find it under this name. Colgan thrusts in a monastery there, although not mentioned in the Life. This pretended monastery is, I suppose, that which is placed under the name of Kill-Abbain, by Harris in the King's county, of which Ely O'Carrol now forms a part. He seems to have thought that Hua Muiredhuig, in which was a Kill-Abban, might have been in that country; but as being in North Leinster, it must be placed more to the North, perhaps in the now county of Louth. (See above Not. 47.) Harris's Kill-Abban of the King's county is called by Archdall Kilbian. That the Kill-Abban of Hua-Muiredhuig was really founded by St. Abban appears not only from its name, but likewise from its being expressly mentioned in the Calendars, (AA. SS. p. 624.) together with Magharnoidhe, as a monastery, in which his memery was particularly revered.

(55) The latter date is that given in his Life and in some Calendars. It seems to be founded on better authority than the other, which was probably the anniversary of some translation of his reliques.

(56) Allowing that Abban lived to a great age, (see Not. 46) not the monstrous one mentioned in his Life, this period answers for what is said of his having been nephew to St. Coemgen, acquainted with Columbkil, Brendan of Clonfert, and other saints of the sixth century, as also with Fintan Munnu, who lived in 635. As to his connections with St. Moling of Ferns, who died in 697, I believe they are as fabulous a posteriori, as those with St. Ibar are a priori.

§. v. St. Pulcherius or Mochoemoc flourished in the sixth and seventh centuries. (57) He was nephew to St. Ita by his mother Nessa of the Nandesi sept, and son of Beoan a native of Connaicne in Connaught, (58) who having left his own country was settled in Hy-Conall-Gaura, (in the West of the county of Limerick (59) where Pulcherius was born. What was the year of his birth is not known; but it could not have been later than 550; for it is related that he remained for 20 years under the care of St. Ita, who died in 570. Being well prepared for the ecclesiastical and monastic state he went, with her consent and approbation, (60) to place himself under the direction of St. Comgall at Bangor. Here he distinguished himself so much, that Comgall, considering him fully qualified to preside over others, advised him to form a religious establishment for himself, wherever the Lord might direct him. Pulcherius then returned to Munster, and, being introduced to the chieftain of Ele, (Ely O'Carrol) was offered by him his own residence for the purpose of changing it into a monastery. This offer was declined by the saint; but he accepted the grant of a lonesome spot in a thick forest, to which he gave the name of Liathmore, (61) The time of this foundation is not mentioned; but it was probably about or not long after the year 580. (62) Some time after, that chieftain having died, Ronan his successor intended to expel Pulcherius from his territory, and went with a party of soldiers for that purpose towards the monastery at a time that the saint was offering the holy sacrifice; but, when arrived there or near it, he was struck by the hand of God so that he was unable to stir from the spot where he was. He then became sorry for his intention, and sent word to Pulcherius, requesting that he would come and relieve him from his situation. This message was not delivered to Pulcherius until he had finished not only Mass but likewise Tierce. He said that he would not go out of the monastery until after the celebration of None. When this was over, he visited Ronan, and giving him his blessing freed him from the awkward state he was in. Thenceforth a great friendship existed between them, and, after Ronan's death, the saint was very fervent in his prayers for the repose of his soul. (63) At a later period Failbhe Fland, king of all Munster, being displeased with Pulcherius for not allowing some horses of his to graze in the field belonging to the monastery, ordered the chieftain of Ele to drive him out of that country. Pulcherius went to Cashel to expostulate with him on this subject. The king received him in a very insulting manner, and was instantly seized with violent pains in one of his eyes and deprived of the use of it. The courtiers having supplicated Pulcherius to procure him some relief, he blessed some water, on which being applied to the eye the pains ceased while the blindness still continued. On the following night the king had a vision during his sleep, in which he thought he saw from his castle on the Rock of Cashel the plains both to the North and South of the city covered with all the saints of Ireland, and was told by a venerable looking old person that they had assembled in defence of Pulcherius, and that he and his posterity would be destroyed in case of his not complying with the saint's request. Accordingly the king on the next day sent for him and granted him what he demanded. (64) Pulcherius was henceforth held by him in great veneration; and we have seen (65) how he induced him to submit in the case of St. Colman of Doiremore. Several miracles are attributed to Pulcherius, among others his having cured of blindness a holy virgin named Cainer. (66) The celebrated Dagan was in his younger days a disciple of Pulcherius; (67) as was also one Cuanchean, whose history is very little known. (68) Besides St. Caineach and St. Colman of Doiremore, Pulcherius was intimate with St. Molua of Clonfert-molua, St. Lachtean of Achad-ur, a St. Finnbar, and St. Luchern, who had been his fellow students at Bangor, (69) as likewise with St. Mofecta, al. Fechean (70) and the holy bishop Fursaeus. (71) St. Pulcherius must have lived to a very great age, if it be true that he did not die until 656. (72) This much is certain that his death occurred on a 13th of March. (73)

(57) Colgan and, after him, the Bollandists have published the Life of St. Pulcherius at 13 Mart. It is acknowledged to be very ancient by the Bollandists, who thought it might have been written by one of his disciples. The original name of this saint was Coemh-ghin, that is, handsome born; but St. Ita changed it into Mochoemoc, my Choem or Coemh, which has been latinized into Pulcherius.

(58) Conmaicne was the name of various districts in Connaught, chiefly in the county of Galway.

(59) See Not. 6. to Chap. xi.

(60) Life of Pulcherius, cap. 9. It is probable that St. Ita did not long survive the departure of Pulcherius. She is not mentioned in the sequel as alive.

(61) It was, as we read in the Life, (cap. 16.) exactly four miles distant from bishop Colman's monastery of Doiremore. (See Not. 41 to Chap. xiv.) These places are now in the King's county.

(62) That it was founded in the sixth century is evident from its having existed in the time of St. Cainech of Aghaboe, who visited Pulcherius when settled there. Cainech died in 599. It existed also in the time of St. Fachnan, as appears from the Life of Pulcherius, cap. 30. Passing over other arguments, such as its having been founded about the same time with Clonfert-Molua, (ib. cap. 11.) we find Pulcherius governing it as abbot 14 years before the death of Colman, son of Feraidhe, prince of Ossory. (ib. cap. 30.) Now this Colman died in 602. (See Not. 49 to Chap. xii.) Therefore Harris was wrong in assigning its foundation to the seventh century.

(63) Life, capp. 17-18. (64) Ib. capp. 20-21.

(65) Chap. xiv. §. 3.

(66) Life, cap. 36. Colgan thought she might have been the St. Cannera, daughter of Fintan, who is mentioned in the Life of St. Molua of Clonfert-molua as a relative of his. She must not be confounded with the St. Cannera of St. Senan's time. (See Not. 19 to Chap. x.)

(67) See Chap. xiv. §. 16.

(68) See Not. 215 to Chap. xiv.

(69) Life, cap. 11. St. Lachtan, al. Lacten or Lactan, is treated of by Colgan at 19 Mart. He was of the illustrious house of Corpre Musc, of Muskerry, Cork, one of the sons of Conar the second formerly king of Ireland. He is called by some the son of Torben, and, by others, of Corpre the son of Nuachar. He founded a great monastery at Achad-ur, i. e. Green field (not Green-ford, as Archdall says) near or at the place where Treshford now stands in the county of Kilkenny. It is related in the Life of St. Carthag of Lismore, that, while this saint was still at Rathen, Lactean moved by pity for the distressed state of his community, brought him a present of thirty cows, one bull, two herdsmen, and some utensils. He is called in various martyrologies a bishop, but, says Colgan, whether at Achad-ur or elsewhere is not sufficiently clear. If he was a bishop, I believe Achad-ur was his see, as I find him constantly called Lactan of Achad-ur. He died on the 19th of March, A. D. 622 (623.) Harris places the monastery of Achad-ur in the Queen's county; but Archdall, who has it in Kilkenny at Freshford, is more correct, as appears from the name Aghour, by which a prebend in that place is still called. Colgan has confounded this saint with the abbot Lactean, who was a contemporary and neighbour of St. Senan of Iniscatthy. (See AA. SS. p. 525.) But this Lactean cannot be supposed to have lived down to 623. He was a different person, and was, I am sure, the Lactean or Lachtin, from whom the church of Lis-lachtin in Kerry, not far from Iniscatthy, got its name. Colgan has also confounded him with Lacten, who succeeded St. Molua at Clonfert-molua. For this he had no authority, except the mere similarity of name. There were Lactens or Lactans enough to succeed Molua without removing the one of Achad-ur to Clonfert-molua, of which no mention occurs in the calendars, where treating of him. St. Finn bar, another fellow-student of Pulcherius, was not, as Colgan justly remarks, the Finnbar of Cork, who, as is evident from his Life, was never a disciple of Comgall. It is probable that he was the Finnbar, who governed a monastery in Inisdamhle an island in the Suir, (Little island, I suppose, not far below Waterford) between, as Colgan says, (AA. SS. p. 630.) the country of the Desii and Hy-kinselagh. Of this Finnbar I can find nothing further except that his memory was revered on the 4th of July; (ib. p. 597.) whence it is plain that he was different from St. Finnbar of Cork, whose festival was kept on the 25th of September. I do not find this monastery of Inisdamhle in Harris, nor even in Archdall. Might Inisdamhle have been the same as Inis-leamhnacta, where there was a monastery, in which Pulcherius spent some time, as we read in his Life, (cap. 34.)? The situation favours this conjecture; for Inis-leamhnacta is described (ib.) as in the southern part of Ossory not far from the arm of the sea, into which the Suir empties itself. Colgan has confounded this place with Inislannacht, where a celebrated Cistercian abbey was founded some centuries after the death of Pulcherius. (See Ware, Ant. ca. 26 at Tipperary.) Inislannacht lies far from Ossory and still farther from the sea, being some miles to the West of Clonmel. It is now called Inislounagh or Inislough. Harris and Archdall have not only followed this mistake of Colgan, but add, what he has not, that Pulcherius founded a monastery at Inislannacht or Inislounagh. For this there is no authority whatsoever, except its being related that he passed some time at Inis-leamhnacta. But might he not have been there on a visit? This is all that the text authorizes us to admit. I am greatly inclined to think, that he had gone to that place for the purpose of seeing his friend Finnbar, and that Inisleamhnacta was no other than Inisdamlle. If different places, they were, at least, not far asunder. As to Luchern, Colgan (ib.) makes him the same as Luctigern abbot of Inistymon. But Luctigern was a disciple not of Comgall but of Ruadan of Lothra. (See Not. 21 to Chap. xi.)

(70) Life, cap. 31. Colgan thought that Fechean was the famous St. Fechin of Fore, of whom hereafter. But the times do not answer. Fechean is stated to have been in company with Pulcherius, Cannech, and Molua of Clonfert-molua at one and the same time. This must have been prior to the close of the sixth century, as appears particularly from Cannech having been one of the party. Now Fechin of Fore was too young at that period to rank with those venerable abbots. He lived until 665, and died not of old age but of a plague. It is highly probable, that Fechean was the abbot Fechean, who is spoken of as having lived for some time with St. Senan of Inniscatthy; (AA. SS. p. 525.) but of whom I cannot discover any precise account.

(71) Life cap. 33. It can scarcely be doubted, that by this bishop Fursaesus was meant the great St. Fursey of Peronne. He flourished in Ireland in the early part of the seventh century at the same time with Pulcherius, and both of them lived in Munster. This is an additional argument in proof of St. Fursey having been a bishop. (Compare with Not. 96 to Chap. xv.)

(72) The 4 Masters assign his death to 655 (656). Following this date he must have been, at least, 106 years old at the time of his death. He did not go to Bangor, at the latest, until 570; for St. Ita was still alive when he set out for it. As he was then 20 years of age, we cannot place his birth later than 550. Colgan remarks on a silly Irish verse, in which he is said to have lived 14 years above 400, that it ought to be read 14 above 100; and thus the whole age of Pulcherius would have been 114 years. The Bollandists (Comment. pr. at Pulcherius 13 Mart.) approved of this conjecture, but afterwards in a note to the Life of St. Cronan of Roscrea (at 28 April) retracted this approval, giving us a conjecture of their own, viz. that in said verse is to be read 14 past 40; and hence they concluded that he lived only about 55 years, and in their supposition that he was born in 550, died about 605. Their argument in favour of these fine positions is, that, as they say, they found no transaction of his life later than the sixth century. But did they not find that Failbhe Fland was king of Munster during the life time of Pulcherius? Now this prince did not reign until, at the earliest, A. D. 619. (See Not. 39 to Chap. xiv.) Were it not for the assertion of the 4 Masters I should place the death of Pulcherius either in the time of that reign, which ended in 634, or soon after it; whereas in his Life I meet with nothing, that belongs to a later period.

(73) On this point the Calendars, Annals, &c. agree with the Life.

§. vi. St. Mochelloc, of whom I had occasion to make mention elsewhere, (74) belonged to these times, having died very old in some year between 639 and 656. He is usually called Mochelloc of Cathuir-mac-Conchaidh, once a town in the now county of Waterford. (75) It is said that he was a relative of St. Finan of Kinnity. (76) I find him honoured with the title of bishop, but, I suspect, on weak authority. (77) Besides some establishment at Cathuir-mac-Conchaidh, the foundation of the church of Kilmallock is usually attributed to him, and the name Kilmallock is supposed to be a contraction of Kill-mochelloc. (78)

St. Manchan abbot of Meno-drochit (79) died in

652. (80) He was surnamed the Wise, and enjoyed a great reputation. (81) Some writers make him the same as Manchan abbot of Mohill in the now county of Leitrim; (82) but there is reason to think, that they were different persons. (83) Manchan the wise was, I believe the same as the Manchan, or, as vulgarly called, Munchin, who is supposed to have been the first bishop of Limerick. For this supposition there is no sufficient authority; (84) and, as far as I can discover, it rests on no other foundation than that Manchan the wise founded, perhaps, a monastery where Limerick now stands, or that the first church in that place was dedicated in his name. Of the identity of Munchin of Limerick with Manchan the wise a stronger proof need not be required than that his festival is kept on the 2d of January, the day assigned to the memory of Manchan the wise in all the Irish calendars. (85) There is not the least hint, in any old document relative to our Church history, of this Manchan having been raised to the episcopal rank; but the veneration in which he was held at Limerick, and the circumstance of its oldest church bearing his name, gave rise at a late period to the opinion of his having been a bishop. Mistakes of this kind have occurred not only in Ireland but likewise in other countries.

(74) Chap. 1. §. 12.

(75) §. See ib.

(76) Acts of Mochelloc at 26 March. Of this St. Finan see above Not. 48.

(77) Mochelloc is not called bishop in any of the Irish calendars quoted by Colgan.

(78) Keating says that Mochelloc erected the church of Killmochelloc. Colgan calls this place a town, meaning, it seems, Kilmallock. Hence Harris and Archdall ascribe a monastery at Kilmallock to St. Mochelloc.

(79) It is now called Mundrehid and is in the barony of Upper Ossory, Queen's county. The tract, in which it lies, was formerly called Disert-chuillin. There was an abbot Lasren in this place, who died A. D. 600. (Tr. Th. p. 376.)

(80) Annals of Ulster, and Usher, p. 970. and Ind Chron.

(81) The author of the work De Mirabilibus S. Scripturae, of which hereafter, takes particular notice (L. 2. c. 4.) of the death of Manchan, or, as the present text has, Manichaeus, as one of the wise men of Ireland. He places it in the last year of the eleventh (reckoning from the beginning of the world) cycle of 532 years, which, according to his chronological principles, was the same as A. D. 652. (See Usher, p. 970.) From the name Manichaeus Usher (ib.) seems to have concluded, that Manchan's real name was the Hebrew Menaham, which has been changed into Manichaeus. But Colgan maintains (AA. SS. p. 332.) that Manchan is a diminutive of the Irish Manach, a monk, and means a little monk. He observes, that there were many persons in Ireland called Manchan, Manchen, or Manchin, and, all names of the same import. Manichaeus is, as he justly remarks, probably a corruption of Manchanus; and it will be seen, that other Irish names have been corrupted in the text of that work. St. Manchan was, in all probability, the same as the holy and wise man named Manchen, who is mentioned in the Life of St. Mulua of Clonfert-molua as a survivor of his. (See Usher, p. 969.)

(82) Usher seems to have been of this opinion. He had (see p. 969.) a Life of St. Manchan of Mohill, said to have been written by Richard Fitz-Ralph, archbishop of Armagh, in which Manchan was called a Canon regular of St. Augustin and stated to have flourished in the year 608. But there were no such Canons regular in those times. He is there called also patron of seven churches. It is said that ever since said year glebes, lands, fiefs, tythes, &c. were granted to the establishment of Mohill. This account smells of a period much later than 608; for neither fiefs nor tythes were then known in Ireland. Ware (Antiq. cap. 26, at Leitrim) makes him the same as Manchan of Mene-drochit, and so does Archdall, (at Mohill) as appears from his assigning his death to 652.

(83) In the Irish Calendars quoted by Colgan at 14 Febr. where he treats of Manchan of Mohill, they are spoken of as distinct persons. Manchan the wise is mentioned at 2 January, while the one of Mohill appears at 14 February. This is a strong proof that they were different, although, I will allow, the only one; for very little is known concerning these Manchans, notwithstanding the great esteem, in which the one, surnamed Wise was held. Colgan says that, in want of authentic documents to prove the contrary, he must consider them as different persons.

(84) Ware (Bishops at Limerick) says, that St. Munchin, son of Sedna, was the first bishop of that city. He does not refer to any authority, nor had he any except a passage of a genealogical hagiology, (ap. AA. SS. p. 332.) in which among five Manchans is reckoned Manchinus Lumnichensis filius Sednae. But this Manchin or Manchan is not called a bishop, although a Manchan mentioned just before him is marked by that title. I do not find either in the Irish calendars or annals any Manchan bishop of Limerick, nor even one called of Limerick. It is very probable that Manchan the wise was son of Sedna, who is said to have been a descendant of Cormac Cas king of Munster, and the founder of the Dalcassian line of princes. As Thomond, in which was comprized the country about Limerick, was the patrimony of this race, it is natural to suppose that Munchin son of Sedna was greatly revered in that territory, of which he was probably a native. And thus it can be easily accounted for, why there was a church in Limerick called by his name, without recurring to the unauthorized hypothesis of his having been bishop there. Ware acknowledges, that he was not able to find any account of Munchin's successors at Limerick until about the beginning of the twelfth century, and elsewhere (Antiquities, cap. 29 at Limerick) says, that it is a very difficult point to ascertain who Munchin of Limerick was. He mentions the opinion of those, who make him the same as the Mancenus, who, according to Jocelin, was left in Tirawley by St. Patrick. We have already seen, (Chap. v. §. 12. and ib. Not. 118.) that this pretended Mancenus of St. Patrick's times was no other than Manchan of Meno-drochit. But even if he were different, and if there was a Manchan in Tyrawley at that early period, how has it come to pass, that neither in Joceline nor in the Tripartite is a word to be found about said Manchan having become bishop of Limerick, although the latter work is particularly minute as to St. Patrick's proceedings in the now county of Limerick? The fact is, that in St. Patrick's days there was neither a town, nor, I dare say, a village, nor monastery in the place where Limerick is situated. Ware touches also on the opinion, that Munchin was the same as Munchan of Mene-drochit, which, strange to think, he supposed to be less probable than the other. But he assigns no reason for his having thought so. O'Halloran pretends (History, &c. B. VIII. ch. 7.) not only that Manchan was bishop of Limerick soon after the arrival of St. Patrick in Ireland, and that he had been employed in Connaught, but likewise that, before he became bishop, he was abbot, and the first, of Muingharid (Mungret) near Limerick. O'Halloran confounded Mungret with Mene-drochit, notwithstanding their being most clearly distinguished by Colgan, Harris, &c. &c. The first abbot of Mungret, at least on record, was Nesson, who died in 552. (See Chap. XI. §. 6.)

(85) See AA. SS. p. 333. In Ware's Antiquities (cap. 29.) the first of January is mentioned, by mistake, for the festival of St. Munchin, instead of the second. This mistake has not been corrected by Harris.

§. VII. As to the real bishops of these times, besides those of the third class of saints, and Carthagh of Lismore, Dagan, Colman of Doiremore, Colman or Columban of Clonard, Diman of Connor, &c. &c. already treated of, some others are mentioned, the accounts of whom are, in general, very imperfect. St. Aidus or Hugh, surnamed Dubh, bishop of Kildare, died in 638. (86) He is said to have been king of Leinster, and, on resigning his kingdom, to have become a monk, and afterwards bishop. Yet it seems more probable, that he was merely of the blood royal of that province. (87) The day of his death is uncertain. Dachua, or rather Mochua Luachra, a native of Munster, who is called by some only abbot of Ferns, and died on the 22d of June A. D. 652 (653) (88) was likewise a bishop, (89) and the immediate successor of St. Maidoc. (90) Tuenoc also, who succeeded Dachua, and died in 662 (663) was not only abbot but bishop of Ferns. (91) A St.

Aidan, who is said to have been maternal brother to Aidus, son of Anmiraeus, the king of Ireland, who was killed in 599, (92) is spoken of as bishop of Glendaloch. (93) If so, he may be supposed to have succeeded St. Molibba (94) some time in the first half of the seventh century. St. Thomian, archbishop of Armagh, died, as already seen, (95) in 661, and was succeeded by Segen, who held the see for 27 years (96) In the same year died Conang O'Daithil, bishop of Emly. (97) One or other of three bishops of Clogher mentioned by Colgan might have been there in these times; but which of them cannot be determined. (98) Bithan, who succeeded Aidhlog-Mac-Caimin, (99) as abbot of Clonmacnois, is said to have been also a bishop. (100) He was of a family called Hua Cormaic, and native of Conmaicne-mara, in Connaught. (101) Baithan died in 663; (102) and his memory was revered on the first of March, apparently the anniversary of his death. Some other bishops and holy men are mentioned as belonging to this period; but scarcely any thing is known concerning them except the years of their death, (103) further inquiries would be useless.

(86) Colgan has endeavoured to give some account of this bishop at 4 January; but it is very unsatisfactory.

(87) There was not in the early part of the seventh century an Aidus king of Leinster. The king Aidus who died in 591, according to the 4 Masters, could not have been the bishop, whose death they assign to 638. And yet they tell us, that the bishop had been king of Leinster. Colgan strove to explain this contradiction, but, as Harris observes, (Bishops at Kildare) with little success. It is therefore probable, that some mistake has occurred with regard to the title given to Aidus, and that, although of the royal family of Leinster, he had not been a king. Colgan conjectures that he was the bishop Aidus son of Moelodran, a member of that house.

(88) 4 Masters and Colgan, AA. SS. p. 223.

(89) Colgan speaks of him (Tr. Th. p. 564.) as bishop of Ferns. A regular see had been established there; and St. Maidoc, although raised to it, still continued to govern the monastery. The same system was, in all probability, followed by his successors.

(90) Usher and Ware, as will be seen hereafter, were mistaken in making St. Moling the second bishop of Ferns. Of Mochuan Luachra more will be seen, when treating of St. Moling.

(91) See Tr. Th. p. 564. and Harris (Bishop at Ferns).

(92) See Chap. xiv. §. 1. (93) AA. SS. p. 306.

(94) See Chap. xiv. §. 16. Were we to believe some genealogists, who make Aidan a brother of Etchen the ordainer of Columbkil, we should rather suppose him a predecessor of Molibba. From such loose materials nothing authentic can be deduced.

(95) Chap. xiv. §. 12.

(96) Tr. Th. p. 292-294. and Ware at Armagh. It is probable, that this prelate was the Segen, who was a priest in the year 640. (See Not. 91 to Chap. xv.)

(97) AA. SS. p. 150. The Annals referred to by Colgan have A. 660, that is, 661. Yet Ware (at Emly) has retained A. 660, although he might as well have retained it for Thomian of Armagh, whose death is marked also at 660 in the Irish annals. Harris was right in adding "or 661." Conang O'Daithil is mentioned as comorban (successor of St. Ailbe in the Life of St. Molagga, cap. 19. Whether he was the person, who is called in the Life of St. Pulcherius (cap. 35.) archbishop of Emly, I am not able to decide. Probably he was, if it be true that Pulcherius lived until 655. This title of archbishop of Emly is very remarkable, as appearing in a tract so ancient, and shows that the bishops of Emly enjoyed a sort of pre-eminence over the other bishops of, at least, Munster. (Compare with Not. 67 to Chap. vi.) Colgan says (AA. SS. p. 598.) that some of our calendarists place the Natalis of Conang O'Daithil at the 23d of September.

(98) See Not. 5 to Chap. xii.

(99) Aidhlog Mac-Camain died in 652. Usher, Ind. Chron.

(100) Colgan in his short account of Baithian (at 1 Mart.) refers to only the Martyrologium Tamlaclense for his having been a bishop, observing that in other calendars he is called merely abbot. This, however, does not prevent his having been raised to the episcopacy.

(101) Conmaicne-mara means the Conmaicne near the sea. Harris says, (Bishops, at Baitan, Clonmacnois) that it was the same as the barony of Ballynahinch in the county of Galway. Thus he supposed it to have been confined to the tract now called Connamara; but the ancient Conmaicne-mara seems to have extended to the North of the barony of Ballynahinch; for, as Colgan observes, (AA. SS. p. 437.) the island of Inisbofinde (Ennisbofin) is represented as lying off its coast.

(102) This is the date assigned by the 4 Masters. It has been retained by Ware and Harris, although, I dare say, it ought to be understood ās 664.

(103) Colgan has (Ind. Chron. ad AA. SS.) from the 4 Masters; A. 658 died St. Comin bishop of Antrim, and on the 17th of May in said year, St. Sillan bishop of Devenish. A. 659. St. Daniel, bishop of Kinngaradh, 18 January. Instead of Kinngaradh we ought, I believe, to read Killgaradh, now Oran in the county of Roscommon, where St. Patrick is said to have founded a church. (See Chap. v. §. 10.) St. Laidgen, a monk of Clonfert-molua, who had been educated there by the abbot St. Lactan, was a man of extraordinary sanctity, and his memory has been most highly respected. He died in 660 (661) AA. SS. p. 57. Archdall was wrong in making him abbot of that house. He was only a monk.

§. VIII. Segenius abbot of Hy, who died in 652, (104) was succeeded by Suibne (Sweeny) son of Curthri, of whom I find nothing recorded except that, having governed for more than four years, he died in 657 (105) The successor of Suibne was Cumineus Albus or Cunan the white, who has been often mentioned already, and who, as we have seen, (106) must not be confounded with Cummian the author of the Paschal epistle. Let it suffice to add in this place, that he was son of Ernan a brother of the above mentioned abbot Segenius, and accordingly a descendant of Fergus the grandfather of Columbkill. (107) Cumineus died after an administration of twelve years, on the 24th of February, A. D. 669 (108)

To the Columbian order is said to have belonged St. Mura, whose name has been latinized into Murus and Muranus. He governed the monastery of Fathen-Mura, now Fahan in Inishowen, of which he was most probably the founder. (109) Mura was a descendant of Neill Neigilliach by his son Eugene, and great grandson of another Eugene who died in 565. His father's name was Feradach, and his mother's Derinilla. (110) He flourished in the first half of the seventh century, and seems to have died some time before 658. (111) His memory, which is revered on the 12th of March, has been held in great veneration, particularly by the O'Neill family, who considered him as their patron saint. His staff, called Bachull Mura, was and is, perhaps, still preserved as a relique. St. Mura wrote a metrical Life, in Irish, of Columbkil. (112) His monastery flourished for many centuries, but is at present only a parish church in the diocese of Derry.

(104) See Chap. xiv. §. 12. The 12th of August was marked for his commemoration. (Tr. Th. p. 498.)

(105) Usher, p. 702. He has five years for Suibne's administration. This must be understood as reckoning in round numbers. For Suibne died on the 11th of January, and accordingly, counting from the 12th of August 652 (the day marked for Segenius) was abbot only four years and nearly five months. Colgan treats of Suibne at 11 January, but except the little now stated, gives us nothing particular concerning his history.

(106) Not. 70 to Chap. xi.

(107) Acts of Cumineus at 24 Febr. The far greatest part of what follows in these Acts, which were patched up by Colgan, belongs not to Cumineus Albus but to Cummian the writer of the Epistle, Colgan having confounded them together.

(108) All the Irish calendars, quoted by Colgan, agree in marking the 24th February as the day of his death. The Ulster Annals and the 4 Masters assign it to A. 668, i. e. 669. See also Usher, p. 702.

(109) See Not. 116. to Chap. xi.

(110) Mura's Acts at 12 Mart.

(111) The 4 Masters and Colgan Tr. Th. (p. 510. and AA. SS. p. 334.) assign the death of St. Kellach abbot of Fathen-Mura to A. D. 657 (658). Instead of 657 Archdall has (at Fahan) by mistake, 637. Kellach must have been a successor of Mura, and consequently, unless we are to suppose that Mura resigned the government of the monastery, a survivor of his.

(112) See Acts, and Harris, Writers.

§. ix. St. Monenna is reported to have founded a nunnery at Fochard Brighde, the birth place of St. Brigid, (Faugher in the county of Louth) about, as some say, the year 630. (113) But her history is so confused that it is impossible to ascertain the precise time of this foundation. It is plain that Monenna has been confounded with another person of the same or a somewhat similar name. (114) The account given of her, in a work called her Life, is that she was of the great sept of the Conalls of Conail Murthemhni (the country about Dundalk) and Clan Conall in the now county of Down. Her father was Maughteus, prince of that sept and ruler of an extensive territory stretching from Iveagh to the neighbourhood of Armagh. (115) Having governed for some time 150 virgins at Fochard she appointed Orbila, al. Servila, abbess of that establishment, and retired to near Sliev-Cuilin or Sliev-Gullen in the county of Armagh, where she erected a church, which has been called Kill-sleve-Cuilin, that is, the cell of Mount-Cuilin. (116) Next we are told, that she went to North Britain, and erected seven churches in various parts of that country, one of which was at a place called Lanfordin, where she died during the life time of Columbkil. (117) This does not agree with the hypothesis of her having founded the nunnery of Fochard about 630, as Columbkil was dead long before that time. But other accounts bring her to England, where she was known by the name of Movenna or Modwenna, and greatly distinguished in the seventh, or, as some writers maintain, in the ninth century. Amidst these jarring statements I am not able to form any decisive conclusion. (118) St. Conchenna, who was either abbess or, at least, a member of the nunnery of Kill-sleve, died in 655, and her memory was revered on the 13th of March. (119)

There is good reason to think, that the celebrated St. Athracta or Attracta (120) lived about these times, or somewhat earlier. The statements relative to her are indeed so contradictory, that the period, in which she flourished, cannot be precisely ascertained. According to some accounts she was contemporary with St. Patrick. (121) But we find her spoken of as living in the times of St. Corbmac, brother of St. Eviu, (122) and consequently in the sixth century. (123) St. Nathy, that is, according to every appearance, Nathy of Achonry, who lived in the same century and probably during some part of the seventh, is also mentioned as a contemporary of hers. (124) On these grounds it may be fairly concluded, that St. Athracta belonged to the same period. She is said to have been the daughter of Talan of a princely family of Dalaradia in Ulster, (125) and brother of St. Coeman of Aird-ne-Coemhain, a consanguinity which it would be difficult to reconcile with her having been a native of Ulster. (126) Whatever were her family connexions, St. Athracta presided over a nunnery called Kill-athracta (Killaraght) near the lake Techet, now Lough Gara in the county of Sligo. (127) Her memory was revered there on the 11th of August, the day marked for her festival in the Irish calendars; but in some foreign martyrologies her name appears at the 9th of February. (128)

(113) Usher says (Ind. Chron.) that the virgin Monenna flourished in 630. Hence Harris deduced that she founded the nunnery of Fochard in that year. Archdall has 638, an erratum, I suppose, for 630. Harris calls her Monenna, al. Darerca. This is a mistake. It was Darerca, who is said to have lived in St. Patrick's times, that was surnamed Moninne or Monenna. (See Not. 181. to Chap. III.) Usher observes, (Pr. p. 824.) that Conchubran, the writer of Monenna's Life, perhaps confounded her with Darerca, owing to the latter's surname Moninne. This is indeed very probable; for Conchubran (see ib. p. 705.) makes her contemporary with St. Patrick, and afterwards speaks of her as having been in Scotland during the times of Columbkil. Usher thinks that, instead of Columbkil, it would have been more correct to have said, Columba bishop of Dunkeld in Scotland, who lived several years later.

(114) The Monenna of Conchubran is called by others Modvenna, a native of Ireland, who was, in the seventh century, famous in England. She is said to have been the instructress of St. Ositha an English virgin and saint. From Usher's own observations (p. 707) concerning the times of St. Ositha it would appear that Monenna or Modvenna did not, as he calculates, flourish as early as 630. On the other hand some of the transactions of Darerca, surnamed Monenna, who died in 518, have been attributed to the one simply called Monenna. To add to this perplexity, several writers maintain, that St. Modvenna lived not in the seventh but in the ninth century. Of this more lower down.

(115) See Usher, p. 705 and 1036.

(116) It has been seen, (Chap. VIII. §. 9.) that the church and nunnery of Kill-sleve-Cuilin is usually attributed to Darerca, surnamed Moninne, who died in 518. This was also Colgan's opinion, while, although placing this Darerca at that early period, he held that she was different from the one supposed to have been sister to St. Patrick. (See Not. 181 to Chap. III.) Usher was inclined to think, (Ind. Chron. ad. A. 630.) that the foundress of said establishment was the Monenna of the seventh century. But the common opinion appears better supported. Besides the 4 Masters, who call Darerca, that died in 518, abbess of that place, (see AA. SS. p. 190.) there is a passage in the Life of St. Endas of Arran (cap. 8.) in which Darerca, al. Moninne is stated to have been in her nunnery of Bell-slebi (Kill-sleve) during the life time of that saint. Now Enda flourished in the beginning of the sixth century, and, at most, did not outlive the middle of it. On the whole it seems certain that the nunnery of Kill-sleve existed long before that of Fochard.

(117) Thus far Conchubran ap. Usher, p. 706, who gives the names of those seven churches, and observes that Lanfortin was near Dundee. Conchubran having erroneously called Columbkil an archbishop, Usher remarks that Columba the first bishop of Dunkeld was probably the person, in whose time Moninna died. Thus her death might have been as late as about 640.

(118) Conchubran, as far as I can discover, (for I know nothing of his work except from Usher's extracts) makes no mention of St. Monenna having been in England; nor does it appear that he thought her the same as St. Modwenna. Usher and several English writers make no distinction between them, and apply to Modwenna what Conchubran has concerning Monenna. That there was a celebrated Irish virgin Modwenna in England cannot be called in question. Camden says, (col. 613, Gibson's ed.) that "Modwenna an Irish virgin, famed for her wonderful piety, built a nunnery near Pollesworth" in Warwickshire. And (col. 641) he speaks of her as having been near Burton on Trent, Staffordshire. I do not find him stating the period, at which she was in these places. Usher thought it was in the seventh century, because Modwenna is said to have instructed St. Ositha, whom he assigned to said century, as have also Baronius and others. He acknowledges that Ositha flourished in the latter part of it; and hence, as observed above (Not. 114) it may be collected, that Modwenna was not distinguished as early as 630. But other writers assert, that Modwenna lived in the 9th century, and even in the second half of it. Their system is exhibited and followed by Cressy, (Church History, &c. B. 28. ch. 2.), who tells us 1. that Modwenna was the daughter of Nangtheus of Tirconnel. He mistook the name Maughteus of Conchubran for Nangtheus. Another mistake is that of Tirconnel instead of the Conalls' country in Louth and Down. Camden has fallen into it, but was corrected by Usher (p. 1036). 2. Cressy has the nunnery of Fochart, &c. and then says, that Modwenna erected another at Celliscline, so called from the multitude of cells. This is a droll blunder; Celliscline &c. instead of Kill-sleve-Cuillin, the cell of Mount-Cuillin. As to the origin of this nunnery, it is well known, that whoever was the Monenna by whom founded, (see Not. 116) it existed long before the ninth century. 3. Modwenna, on the invitation of Ethelwolf, king of the West Saxons, went to England, taking with her Achea her disciple and relative—is entrusted with the care of Editha the king's sister, and founds the nunnery of Pollesworth. 4. Leaving the direction of Pollesworth to Achea and Editha she went to the small island of Andresey, (Andrew's island) where she erected a church in honour of St. Andrew, and near which was afterwards founded the Benedictine monastery of Burton. 5. Modwinna had also a disciple named Ositha, concerning whose times Cressy here changes a former opinion of his. For he had, (B. 17. ch. 15.) with Baronius, placed her in the 7th century, but now removes her to the ninth. 6. Modwenna returned to Celliscline in Ireland, and died there after having requested that her body should be interred in Andressey. This request was complied with through the care of the great Alfred; but the body was in a following age removed to the monastery of Burton. From this narrative, compared with Conchubran's account, the reader will be able to understand the epitaph on St. Modwenna's tomb at Burton, as in Camden (col. 641.) and Usher, p. 1036.

Ortum Modwennae dat Hibernia, Scotia finem,
 Anglia dat tumulum, dat Deus alta poli.
 Prima dedit vitam, sed mortem terra secunda,
 Et terram terrae tertia terra dedit.
 Aufert Lanfortin, quam Terra Conallea profert; Felix Burtonium Virginis ossa tenet.

St. Modwinna's death is here placed at Lanfortin, where Conchubran says that Monenna died, in opposition to the statement given by Cressy.

(119) This is all that I can find worthy of consideration as to St. Conchenna in what Colgan has about her at 13 Mart. The 4 Masters have for her death A. 654, which, I suppose, ought to be understood 655. They call her St. Conchenna of Killleve, without adding the title of abbess. As Killleve was the same as Kill-sleve-Cuillin, of which in the preceding notes, we have here a proof that this nunnery existed long before the ninth century.

(120) Colgan has endeavoured to compile the Acts of this saint at 9 February. They consist chiefly of fragments of a bombastic Life, written, as he thought, by a Cisterian monk of the abbey of Boyle, and consequently not before the latter end of the twelfth century. He justly observes, that it was not commendable either for style or close attention to truth.

(121) See Chap. v. §. 10.

(122) Life of St. Corbmac, cap. 17. at 26 March.

(123) See Not. 111. to Chap. XII.

(124) Acts of St. Athracta, cap. 13. In the same chapter Keannfaelaid is said to have been king of Connaught during her time. Colgan, not finding any king there of this name before about 670, thought that, instead of a king of all Connaught ought to be understood a dynast of some part of it. But in said Acts Keannfaelaid is expressly stated to have ruled the whole province, "tenens totum eius (Connaciae) principatum universalliter." The author certainly meant the well-known king of all Connaught. Yet we are not bound to believe, that Athracta lived as late as his reign. That author cared so little about anachronisms, that he places her also in the times of St. Patrick. Concerning Nathy of Achronry see Chap. XII. §. 3. That he he was the Nathy alluded to in Athracta's Acts is sufficiently clear from his having lived in the district, in which her nunnery was situated, viz. Lugné or Lugnia, of which the barony of Leney in the county of Sligo forms a part. Nathy of Achonry, which is in said barony, is the only saint of that name, that flourished in Lugne.

(125) AA. SS. p. 281.

(126) See Not. 141 to Chap. XII. If Athracta was, whether sister or not, contemporary with Coeman, we have an additional argument in favour of her having lived in the sixth century; for Coeman is said to have been brother to St. Coemhgen of Glendaloch.

(127) See Chap. v. §. 10 and ib. Not. 95.

(128) In the foreign calendars her name is spelt Tarachta or Tarahata. No St. Tarachta is mentioned in any Irish document; and hence Colgan justly inferred, that she was no other than St. Athracta. The Bollandists (at 9 Febr.) do not controvert his opinion. They have scarcely any thing about St. Athracta except what they took from him, and follow him even to her having flourished in the 5th century, to which period they assign also Coeman of Airdne-Coemhain. It appears that they did not examine the history of either of these saints with much attention.

§. x. St. Fechin, (129) who is the first named among the priests of the third class of Irish saints, was a native of the territory, in which St. Athracta had her nunnery, that is, of Lugne. (130) Bile, or, as afterwards called, Bile Fechin, in the barony of Leney, is stated to have been the place of his birth. His father was Coelcharna a descendant of Eochad Fionn brother to the famous king Con of the hundred battles, and his mother Lassair of the royal blood of Munster. (131) When fit to be sent to school, Fechin was placed under St. Nathy or Nathi of Achonry, in whose monastery he remained until he made a considerable progress in learning and piety. How long he continued there we are not correctly informed. According to one account he staid with Nathi, until he was ordained priest; (132) but according to another, which appears more consistent, he left that school several years before he was ordained and went to that of some other holy man. (133) Having finished his studies, and being raised to the priesthood, he left his own country for the purpose of leading a retired life, and arriving at Fobhar, now Fore in the county of Westmeath, stopped there, being very kindly received by the proprietors of that place. Here he erected a monastery, to which such numbers of persons were attracted by his reputation, that after some time his community consisted of about three hundred monks, (134) who, as well as their holy abbot, subsisted on their own labour, (135) and were sometimes reduced to great penury. (136) Some other monasteries or churches are attributed to St. Fechin; but, with the exception of one or two of them, I greatly doubt whether they were of his foundation. (137) That he established a religious house in the island of Immagh near the coast of Galway (138) cannot be questioned. The inhabitants were still Pagans when Fechin, taking with him some of his monks of Fore, undertook their conversion. At first he met with great opposition, and the people were so obstinate that they refused to supply him and his companions with even the necessities of life, so that two of them died of want of food, whom, however, the Almighty was pleased, through the saint's intercession, to bring again to life. But Guaire, king of Connaught, being apprized of their distress, sent them abundance of provisions. (139) When setting about the construction of a monastery, the islanders threw their implements and utensils into the sea, which, it is said, were driven back on land. At length Fechin succeeded in bringing all of them over to the Christian faith, and baptized them. Their zeal became so fervent, that they consigned themselves and their island to him as their master and superior. (140)

(129) Colgan has published (at 20 January) two Lives of St. Fechin. The author of the first was Augustin Magraidin, who died in 1405. The second, which is more copious and circumstantial was compiled by Colgan and his assistants from three different Lives of Fechin written in Irish.

(130) See Not. 124.

(131) AA. SS. p. 143.

(132) Second Life, cap. 8. In this Life Nathi is represented as living for some time, apparently not inconsiderable, after Fechin, already a priest, had founded some monasteries. If so, Nathi must have lived to a great age; for he was a grown up man before the death of Finnian of Clonard, (see Chap. xii. §. 3.) that is, before 552. Now it can scarcely be admitted that Fechin, who died of a plague in 665, was born earlier than between 580 and 590, or that he could have been a priest prior to between 610 and 620. Supposing then Nathi to have been alive after Fechin had established monasteries, he would have lived until, at least, 620; whence it would follow that he was very old when he died.

(133) In the first Life we read (cap. 6.) that Fechin was still a boy, “bonae indolis puer,” when he removed to another school. His going to this school was very probably owing to Nathi’s death, which may be conjectured to have occurred about the beginning of the seventh century. What school it was, or who was that other holy man, is not mentioned in the Life. He was most probably Fintan Moeldubh. (See Not. 174. to Chap. xii.) Colgan has a fable concerning Fechin having been a disciple of Kieran of Clonmacnois, as if a man, who lived until 665 could have been the scholar of one that died in 549. Yet this story is perhaps founded on truth misunderstood. Fechin might have been at the great school of Clonmacnois, which used to be called Kieran’s school or college. From its having been said that he studied there it might have been imagined that Kieran himself was his master. Whether the times answered or not was a point not inquired into.

(134) First Life, cap. 10. Second, cap. 9. In a hymn for the Office of St. Fechin we read ;

Dehinc fuit monachorum
Dux et pater trecentorum
Quos instruxit lege morum
Murus contra vitia. Amen.

Archdall (at Fore) has swelled the number to three thousand, and refers to Usher, who in the very passage referred to (p. 1195. or, as in the London ed. 500.) reckons only three hundred, quoting the lines now given from the hymn.

(135) First Life, cap. 10. and 14.

(136) Ib. cap. 11. and Second Life, cap. 36.

(137) It is said in the second Life, (cap. 8.) that Fechin prior to his going to Fore erected a noble church as Eas-dara (Ballysadare, co. Sligo ;) another at Bile, where he was born, together with a monastery called Kill-na-manach, i. e. cell of the monks ; and three churches, viz. of Druimratha, Killgarvan, and Edarguidhe, al. Ecclas-roog. In the first place I have to observe, that not one of these foundations is mentioned in the first Life, and that it gives us plainly to understand that the monastery of Fore, in which he presided over 300 monks, was Fechin's first establishment. As to Eas-dara, the most we are bound to admit is, "that he built a church there. It is true that the monastery of that place possessed some land called Tearmann Fechin, i. e. the sacred ground of Fechin; but it does not follow that he founded the monastery, or that it was he that obtained the grants, by which it was enriched. Fechin's system, as appears from his conduct at Fore, was one of poverty and different from that of procuring estates for his establishments. If the monastery of Ballysadare had been founded by him, this would have been stated in the second Life as well as the erection of the church, in the same manner as the monastery at Bile is expressly mentioned besides the church. To account for the name Tearmann Fechin, it is sufficient that the church of Ballysadare, to which a monastery was afterwards annexed, had been denominated from St. Fechin as its founder; or that, what is at least equally probable, that both the church and monastery, by whomsoever founded, were dedicated to him.

That the church of Bile and the monastery of Killnamanach were not founded by Fechin seems almost certain, not only from their not being spoken of in the first Life, but from its being expressly stated that, as soon as he was ordained priest, he withdrew from his own country. Had he formed these establishments, among his relatives, would they not have been hinted at, and some reason assigned for his leaving them? It is no argument to say, that Bile was called Bile-Fechin; for the circumstance of his having been born there sufficiently explains the reason of that surname. In the passage of the second Life relative to these places the monastery of Killnamanach, as far as I understand it, is represented as at Bile. Colgan, however, seems (1A. SS. p. 143.) to distinguish them as differently situated. Perhaps this was the case; for we find a Kilnamanagh not far indeed from Bile but yet in a place distinct from it. Harris and Archdall make them different places; but they had no right whatsoever to assign a monastery to Bile, in the supposition of Killnamanach having been situated elsewhere. In this case there remains for Bile merely a church, according to the second Life, which is the only authority that can be produced for these pretended foundations of Fechin.

These writers have changed also DruiMratha into a monastery, although in said Life it is called only a church, nor does Colgar speak of it otherwise. It was the same as Drumratt in the barony, not, as Archdall says, of Lency, and near Ballysadare, but of Corran in the same county of Sligo. Archdall mentions St. Enan as having been at Drumrath; but this saint, who was earlier by many years than Feclin, belonged to Drumrath in Westmeath. (See Not. 27 to Chap. XII.)

In like manner Harris has without any authority placed an abbey at Kilgarvan, which he supposed to be in the county of Sligo. Archdall who with Colgan calls it Kilnagarvan, is more correct. He speaks of it as only a church, and so it is called in the second Life, as likewise by Colgan, (AA. SS. p. 143.) who says, that it is a parish church in the district of Coistealbach. Archdall is right in placing it in Mayo and in the barony of Gallen. At present it goes by the name of Kilgarvy. It is situated very near the barony of Lency in Sligo. Its old name Kill-na-garvan indicates, that its founder was not Fechin but one Garvan.

Edarguidhe is omitted by Harris and Archdall. All that Colgan says of it is, that it was an oratory, somewhere, I suppose, in Lugne.

In the second Life (cap. 19.) Fechin is spoken of as being in his monastery of Cong (in suo monasterio de Cunga) in the now county of Mayo, barony of Kilmaine. I suspect that suo has been inserted without sufficient authority. In the first Life there is not a word about Cong, an omission very strange indeed, if that celebrated monastery had been founded by Feclin. Among the many abbots of Cong I do not find one called his comorban or successor. Ware says, (Antiq. cap. 26. at Mayo) that the monastery of Cong was founded by Donald son of Aed, or Aidus, and grandson (not nephew, as in the English translation) of Anmirech, that is, Domnald II. king of Ireland, who died in 642. (See Chap. XIV. §. 1.) He assigns this foundation to A. D. 624; Harris adds, or 635. Whence Ware derived this information I cannot discover. He observes that it is said, that Fechin was some time abbot there. For this, it is said, there is no other foundation than the suo of the second Life. Colgan has (AA. SS. p. 151.) a St. Molocus of Cong, whose name is in the calendars at 17 April. It is very probable that, although this monastery might have been erected at the expense of king Domnald, Molocus was its first abbot. He was the saint, whose name used to be joined to that of Cong, as we see in Colgan's Topographical Index (ib.) at Cunga. Such junction of names is generally indicative of the saints, who were either the founders, or the first distinguished in the monasteries or churches, to which their names are annexed.

In the same Life (cap. 22.) a monastery in Ard-oilen, one of the Arran isles off the coast of Galway, is attributed to Fechin. This is evidently a mistake; for besides its not being mentioned in the first Life, it is well known that the patron saint of Ard-oilen was a St. Coemhain, insomuch so that from his name it was formerly called Ara-Coemhain, and its monastery and principal church were called Kill-Coemhain. (See Colgan, AA. SS. p. 715. and above Not. 141. to Chap. XII.) In what Colgan has (ib.) concerning Ard-oilen, although he treats of it very minutely, the name of Fechin is not even hinted at. Harris, however, follows the story of the second Life; and Archdall, to compromise the matter, says that Kill-Coemhain was founded by Fechin. Why rob St. Coemhain of this foundation? Archdall goes farther than the Life, which does not ascribe Kill-Coemhain to Fechin, but exhibits him as erecting a nameless monastery in Ard-oilen, as if there might have been two in that island. But the fact is, that there was only one, the founder of which was Coemhain. Another mistake (perhaps of the press) in his account of Ard-oilen is the confounding of Coemhain with Columb.

Another pretended foundation by Fechin, is that of Tulach-Fobhuir, supposed to be near Naas. This place is mentioned in the second Life, (cap. 32. seqq.) but it is not stated that a monastery was erected there. Colgan, when reckoning these establishments of Fechin, assigns neither a monastery nor a church to Tulach-Fobhuir. All that is said of it is, that a king of Leinster made a grant of it, together with its inhabitants, mill, and the adjoining district, to St. Fechin. Would Fechin and his monks of Fore have been poor and distressed, were they possessed of that fine estate? Tulach-Fobhuir means a landed property belonging to Fore, which this monastery acquired in its days of splendour, but certainly not in Fechin's time. Notwithstanding no mention being made of a monastery, Harris has placed one there, and has been followed by Archdall, who was not able to give any account of it.

(138) Colgan says that, instead of the distinguished monastery of Immagh, in his time, there was only a parish church there, of which St. Fechin was the patron, as also of the island. It was in the diocese of Tuam. I do not find the name, Immagh, used at present. This island is, I suppose, that now called Inismain in the bay of Galway, and a rectory in said diocese.

(139) Usher fell into a huge mistake, (p. 1195. or, as in London ed. 500) with regard to Guaire or, as called in Fechin's Lives, Guari. He thought that he was king only of the island of Immogh, and thence placed him among the persons converted to christianity by Fechin. Usher had read in the first Life, (cap. 12) "Cumque rex terrae, Guari nomine, quod factum fuit audisset, victum copiosum cum suo calice viro Dei et suis transmisit." He supposed that by rex terrae was meant the king of the island; a mighty king indeed! But that phrase is relative to the province of Connaught, in which Immagh was comprized. Had he seen the second Life, in which the same circumstance is related, (cap. 22.) and where king Guari is called son of Colman, Usher would have been more correct. Even the context, as in the first Life, might have taught him that Guari was somewhat more than king of Immagh. But, not being well versed in the provincial history of Ireland, he seems to have known little or nothing about this celebrated and pious king of Connaught, whom we have often met with already, ex. c. Chap. xiv. §. 11.

(140) Second Life, cap. 22. According to the first (cap. 12.) it would seem that the grant of the island was made by king Guaire. Be this as it may, said grant must be understood not as if Fechin became proprietor of the whole island, but that he was considered as the chief director, and, we may say, magistrate of the inhabitants. It is on this occasion that in the second Life Fechin is introduced as erecting another monastery in Ard-oilen. (See Not. 137.) But in the first, although the transactions in Immagh are equally detailed, there is nothing about his passing over to Ard-oilen; and he appears as if having returned from Immagh directly to Fore.

§. xi. Among the many transactions, in which

Fechin is said to have been engaged, it is related that, on occasion of Domnald II. king of all Ireland having marched with a great army into the country of the Southern or Meath Nialls for the purpose of fixing the boundaries of their principality, they applied for protection to the saint, who happened to be then at a place called Tibrada, where, perhaps, he had some small establishment. (141) Fechin complied with their request, and acted so powerfully on the king's mind as to induce him to desist from any further proceeding against the Southern Nialls, between whom and the king he procured a perfect reconciliation. His influence was very great with the kings and princes of his time. An instance of it is given in the case of a young man named Erlomhan, whom Moenach, king of Munster, immediately discharged from prison on perceiving that Fechin wished for this act of grace. (142) Erlomhan afterwards embraced the monastic state under Fechin. In like manner he obtained from the joint kings of Ireland Diermit II. and Blaithmaic (143) the liberation of one Aedus or Aedan, a brave military man, who, on being dismissed from prison and given up to Fechin, went with him to Fore, where he became a monk. Several holy men are mentioned as united in friendship with Fechin, for instance Coeman or Co-main Breac, abbot of Roseach in Meath, (144) Ultan of Ardbraccan, Fintan Munnu, Ronan son of Berach, (145) and particularly Mochua abbot of Ardsleine. (146) Fechin's life was one continued course of austerity, and he was so fond of solitude that he often used to retire from his monastery either of Fore or of Immagh to lonesome situations, passing his time in prayer, fasting, and other mortifications, and taking no food except now and then a little bread and water. Many miracles have been attributed to him; but the accounts of them are, in general, so intermixed with fables, that I shall not attempt to elucidate them. (147) This great saint died on the 20th of January A. D. 665, of the dreadful pestilence that raged all over Ireland. His memory has been most highly respected, and the monastery of Fore, which continued down to the time of the general suppression, was greatly celebrated, (148) and in the course of ages became very splendid and wealthy. (149)

(141) This place is mentioned in the second Life, cap. 34. Harris (at Westmeath) assigns a monastery there to Fechin, and so does Archdall, who calls it Tippert, in, he says, the half barony of Fore. Thus it would be not far distant from the monastery of that name. Colgan also places (AA. SS. p. 143.) a monastery at Tibrada in Westmeath, but, not being able to give any account of it, conjectures (ib. p. 242.) that it might be Tibrad Ultain in that country where a church existed in his times. This is, I suppose, the Tippert of Archdall, who says that it is now a chapel. But even admitting that it was formerly a monastery, why attribute it to Fechin, rather than to Ultan, whose name it bore? There is nothing in the Life to show that he had a monastery at Tibrada, except the mention made of a person there, who had the care of the provisions. It may be, however, that there was a cell in that place dependent on the great monastery of Fore.

(142) Erlomhan's mother had applied to Fechin to assist her in procuring his liberation. He gave her a gold torques, which he had received as a present from Moenach, for the purpose of purchasing from him her son's release. On recognizing it, and as coming from Fechin, Moenach returned it to her, and at the same time discharged Erlomhan. (Second Life, cap. 37.) Fechin had spent some time at Cashel (ib. cap. 14.) probably with this king, who was son to Fingen, and died, as Colgan observes, in 660.

(143) See Chap. xiv. §. 1.

(144) AA. SS. p. 140. He died on the 14th of September, A. D. 614, i. e. 615, as Usher states (Index Chron.) Archdall calls Roseach Rosse, and places it at about a mile South-east of Tara.

(145) Ronan was abbot of Drumshallon in the county of Louth, and died of the great pestilence on the 18th of November in 665. (AA. SS. p. 141.)

(146) Second Life, cap. 44 and 49. Colgan was not able to give any account of this St. Mochua or of Ardslaine ; nor has Harris or Archdall a monastery in that place. I believe it was at or near Slane in Meath, Ardslaine meaning the height of Slane, and am greatly inclined to think, that Mochua was the same as Cronan son of Silni. (See Not. 91 to Chap. xv.) It is well known, and remarked by Colgan, (AA. SS. p. 304.) that Cronan was the same as Mochua. This alone is not a proof of identity ; but as Cronan son of Silni is reckoned among the illustrious men, who died in 665 ; (ib. p. 150. and Usher, Ind. Chron.) and as, according to said Life, the person, called Mochua of Ardslaine died about the very same time with Fechin in that year ; and as the name, Mochua, does not appear in the list, given in the Irish annals, of the distinguished victims of the pestilence, it seems to me highly probable that Mochua of Ardslaine was no other than Cronan, the son of Silni. He must not be confounded with Mochua or Cronan, abbot of Balla in the county of Mayo, who had been a disciple of Comgall of Bangor, and died in 637. (See Colgan AA. SS. at 30 Mart.)

(147) One of these strange accounts is relative to a Tirechan, who had gone to Rome, and whose mother applied to Fechin, who was then at Cashel, to procure his returning to her. It is said that, through the saint's command, Tirechan instantly appeared before him in that city. (Second Life, cap. 14.) This is a perverted statement of a probably real fact, viz. that Fechin sent an order to him to come back to his mother, which Tirechan immediately complied with. Colgan thought that this was the celebrated Tirechan, who became a disciple of Ultan of Ardraccan, afterwards a bishop, and, as some say, Ultan's successor in that see ; and who wrote the Memoirs of St. Patrick so often quoted by Usher. The times agree very well ; for Ultan, who died in 657, was contemporary with Fechin. If Colgan's opinion be correct it may be justly supposed that Tirechan, the writer, was a native of Cashel or of its vicinity. The name of St. Tirechan is marked at the 3d of July.

(148) Usher observes (p. 966.) that Fore was called Baile-Leabhair or the town of books, whence it appears that learning was much cultivated there. Some of its abbots were bishops ; but Harris had no right to suppose, that it was at any time a regular episcopal see.

(149) See Archdall at Fore.

§. XII. In the latter end, viz. on the 29th of December, of said year, died of the same pestilence St. Aileran surnamed the Wise. (150) His name is sometimes written Heleran, Aireran, or Ereran. He was very probably the priest Airendanus of the third class of saints, (151) and who alone, of those mentioned in it, now remains to be sought for. Very little is known relative to the history of Aileran, except as far as concerns his writings. This much is certain, that he presided over the great school of Clonard, (152) not as abbot or bishop, but as principal professor. A tract written by him is still extant, in which the mystical meaning of the names of our Saviour's progenitors, as in the Gospel of St. Matthew, is treated of. (153) Although small, it exhibits, besides a great share of ingenuity, very considerable biblical and theological learning. Aileran wrote also a Life of St. Patrick, or at least, some Memoirs concerning him. (154) This work is lost, (155) as likewise some treatise of his on St. Brigid. (156) He is referred to (157) as having given an account of the proceedings of St. Fechin in the island of Immagh; but it cannot be hence concluded that he drew up, as some have thought (158) an entire Life of that saint.

It might be conjectured that Aileran was the author of the three books De Mirabilibus Sacrae Scripturae. (159) The times agree very well; for, by whomsoever written, he was employed on their composition in the year 655. (160) The learning displayed in this work is such as to render it worthy of being attributed to Aileran. But it seems more probable that the author was a monk either of Clonmacnois or of Cork. (161)

Among the many persons carried off in said year, by the pestilence are reckoned also Ultan, abbot of

Clonard, and two abbots of Clonmacnois, Colman Cass and Cumin. (162)

(150) AA. SS. p. 140. and Usher, Ind. Chron.

(151) Usher having (p. 967) proposed a conjecture whether Airendanus was the same person as Aileran, adds, "or was he rather Aired," who is mentioned by Capgrave as contemporary with St. Maidoc of Ferns, Usher says that Aired lived in a place called Airdsinnaidh. In the Life of Maidoc published by Colgan, which, however, has no mention of Aired, it is called (cap. 8) Ardrinnygh, and spoken of as near Mount Beatha, or Slieve-Beagh in the part of M^onaghan adjoining Fermanagh. Colgan observes (AA. SS. p. 216.) that St. Aired's name is in some calendars at 26 August.

(152) AA. SS. p. 140.

(153) It has been published by Sirin among the Collectaneu Sacra of Fleming, and republished in the Bibliotheca patrum, Tom. 12. Lyons, A. 1677. Its title is, Interpretatio mystica progenitorum Christi, and it consists of two parts, in the former of which the signification of the names is inquired into and shown to contain prophetic allusions to Christ; for instance "Abraham, pater excelsus." The author then applies the meaning to our Saviour by referring to the prophecies concerning him, such as that of Isaias; Vocabitur nomen ejus admirabilis, &c. Thus at Isaac he writes; "In Isaac gaudium, dicente Angelo ad pastores, ecce annuntio vobis gaudium magnum, &c. The second part, which consists of moral explanations deduced from said significations, is imperfect as it ends with Eliacim and two or three words about Azor. Usher (p. 966.) makes mention, from Sedulius the younger's Collectaneum on Matthew, of this tract under a very apposite title; Typicus ac tropologicus genealogiae Christi intellectus, quem sanctus Aileranus Scottorum sapientissimus exposuit."

(154) See Chap. III. §. 5.

(155) We have seen, (ib. §. 4.) that Colgan was mistaken in attributing to Aileran or Eleran what he calls the Fourth Life of St. Patrick.

(156) In the prologue to the sixth or metrical Life of St. Brigid (See Not. 18 to Chap. VIII) we read;

“ Scripserunt multi virtutes virginis almae
 Ultanus doctor, atque Eleranus ovans, &c.”

(157) First Life of Fechin, cap. 12.

(158) Colgan AA. SS. p. 140. Ware and Harris, (Writers at Aileran.)

(159) This very learned work, which had been erroneously attributed to St. Augustin and printed among his works in the early editions of them, may be seen in the Appendix to the third volume of that of the Benedictines. It is an abridgment of the history of the Bible, intermixed with a multitude of theological and philosophical disquisitions, tending to elucidate it, and clear away the difficulties that occur. In the first book the sacred history is treated of as far as it is given in the Pentateuch; in the second down to the end of the Old Testament; and in the third that of the New. The style is good and clear; and the author was well acquainted with general history and the ancient philosophy.

(160) The author having observed (L. 2. c. 4.) that Manchan the Wise, or, as his name appears in the printed text Manichaeus, died in the last year of the eleventh cycle of 532 years, that is A. D. 652. (see above Not. 81.) adds that the third year of the twelfth cycle was that, in which he was writing. It was therefore 665. Hence it is clear, that Manchan the Wise of Menodrochit was not, as some writers have imagined, the author of the work De Mirabilibus, &c. for nothing is more certain than that he died in 652. (above §. 6.) and Ware was right (at Manchinan) in rejecting this opinion.

(161) Prefixed to the work is a dedication beginning with these words; “ Venerandissimis urbium et monasteriorum episcopis et presbyteris, maxime Carthaginensium Augustinus per omnia subjectus optabilem in Christo salutem.” The author then adds, that he had been ordered by his superior Eusebius, who died in the interim, to undertake this work; and towards the end of said dedication makes mention of Bathan as one of these, apparently the Carthaginensium, whom he is addressing, and a master of his. He mentions also another of his masters Manchinanus al. Manchianus “ Ab uno enim vestrum, id est, Bathano, post patrem Manchinanum si quid intelligentiae addidi,” &c. That Car- thaginensium is an erratum is sufficiently plain, unless we should suppose that it refers to Lismore that is, to the institution of St. Carthagh. But other circumstances do not agree with this conjecture. It is probably a mistake either for Chuanensium or for, what comes nearer to it, Corcagiensium. In the former supposition we have Clonmacnois, of which the abbot Aidhlog or Aedhlog died in 652 (above Not. 99), a time well corresponding with that of the injunction to write laid upon the author. If the name Aedhlogus was in his text, a continental transcriber might have softened it into Eusebius. As to Bathan, there is no difficulty; for the superior of Clonmacnois at the time of the author's writing was a Bathan or Baithan. (See § 7.) Yet there are strong reasons for supposing that this author belonged rather to Cork. Among the learned men of St. Finnbar's school I find Eulangius or Eulogius, and Baithan. (AA. SS. p. 630 and 750) Eulogius might have been easily changed into Eusebius. The times correspond; for these persons flourished in the first half of the seventh century. It may be some corroboration of this conjecture that the author seems to have lived not far from the sea. He often speaks of the various sorts of tides, calling the greater ones, or the spring tide, Malina, and the lesser ones Ledo. His mentioning Manchinanus affords us no assistance in this inquiry; as there is no hint that he belonged to the community of which the author was a member. This Manchinanus was most probably Manchan the Wise, whose name appears elsewhere in the work, corruptly written Manichaenus. From the manner, in which our author speaks of Manchinanus, it seems that he had been a pupil of his before he went to study under Bathan, or that Manchinanus had written something on the Scriptures, by which he was assisted in his researches. There was in those times another Manchanus or Manchinanus (for they are the same name) who was surnamed Leth; but nothing is said of his learning, and all that I find concerning him, is, that he died of the pestilence in 665 (AA. SS. p. 332.) and that he seems to have been abbot of Laithmore. (See the Litany of Aengus, ib. p. 539.) The chief difficulty in this question arises from the name Augustinus, under which the author appears in the printed text. No person of that name, a very rare one of old in Ireland, is spoken of in our history as living in the times that the work was written. It is, in all probability, a corruption of some Irish name latinized, perhaps Aengussius or Eugenius. Did other circumstances agree, I should suspect that it was written by mistake for Aileranus. That the author was an Irishman and composed his work in Ireland is self evident. Besides his having been connected with Bathan and Manchinanus, who were certainly Irishmen, his noticing in a particular manner (L. 2. c. 4.) the death of the wise Manichaeus or Manchan, is a proof of it. Treating (L. 1. c. 7.) of how certain animals could have made their way into islands, he asks; "Who, for instance, would have imported into Ireland wolves, stags, wild boars, foxes," &c.? Why mention Ireland preferably to any other island, unless he was living and writing there? The Benedictine editors say, that he was either an Englishman or an Irishman. For his having been an Englishman they could not alledge a single argument; nor does he ever speak of England. Had they known that Bathan and Manchinan were downright Irish names, they would not have thrown out this conjecture; nor, had they been better acquainted with Irish history and topography, would they have said that, instead of Carthaginensium, the original word was perhaps Cantuarensium, or Cambremsium, or Kilkeniensium. There was no monastery at Kilkenny in the author's times; and as to the name it is much more unlike Carthaginensium than Corcagiensium, and even more than indicating other names Irish monasteries, ex c. Clonardenisum, Clonmacnoisensium, &c. The conjecture as to Cantuariensium and Cambremsium is set aside by the fact, that the author was addressing Irish monasteries. In a notice to the reader premised to an edition of this work (ap. Opp. S. August. Tom. 3. Basil. A. 1569) it is ignorantly observed, as if to show that the author was neither English nor Irish, that there are no wolves, wild bears or foxes in either England or Ireland. But we had, in his days, plenty of wolves and wild boars in Ireland, and we still have foxes.

(162) AA. SS. p. 150. This pestilence is called by Irish writers Buidhe Chonnuill, i. e. the yellow jaundice, and appeared in Ireland on the first of August, A. D. 664. It seems to have begun earlier in England, where, as Bede relates (L. 3. c. 27.) having depopulated the southern parts it penetrated into the Northumbrian province and swept away a vast number of people. He adds that it raged also in Ireland; and it is said that only a third part of the inhabitants survived it. A very extraordinary eclipse of the sun had occurred in that year, not on the third, as Bede says, but on the first of May, as marked in the Annals of Ulster, which add, that during the summer the sky seemed to be on fire. (See Usher, p. 948. seqq. and Ind. Chron. at A. 664, and also Colgan's Ind. Chron. to AA. 55).

§. XIII. In the preceding year, that is 664, was held the celebrated conference at Whitby concerning the Paschal question and some other points of ecclesiastical discipline. Colman had succeeded, in 661, (163) Finan in the see of Lindisfarne, having been sent from Ireland for that purpose. (164) He was very probably a native of Connaught, and apparently of the now county of Mayo. (165) He was a monk of the Columbian order, and had, we may suppose, spent some time at Hy. (166) But at the period of his appointment to Lindisfarne he seems to have been living in Ireland. (167) Not long after Colman's arrival in Northumberland the controversies relative to Easter time and to some other ecclesiastical matters, were again revived and carried on with greater warmth than they had been even during the incumbency of Finan. (168) This was owing chiefly to the exertions of Wilfrid, who, after having spent part of his early years among the Irish at Lindisfarne, had gone to Rome, where he became perfectly acquainted with the Roman computation and other practices, and afterwards received the tonsure at Lyons according to the mode followed at Rome. (169) On his return to England Wilfrid had an opportunity of displaying his zeal for the Roman observances, having acquired the friendship of Alchfrid, son of king Oswin, and who, jointly with his father, ruled the Northumbrian kingdom. Alchfrid was instructed by him in ecclesiastical learning, and became so much attached to him that he made over to him the monastery of Rippon, (Inhrypam) having turned out the monks, to whom he had already granted it, because they refused to change the Irish practices for the Roman. (170) Meantime Agilbert, bishop of the West Saxons, (171) accompanied by a priest Agathon, came to Northumberland, and, at the request of Alchfrid, ordained Wilfrid priest in his newly acquired monastery. A discussion having occurred there concerning the Paschal computation, the tonsure, &c. it was agreed upon that a synod or conference should be held, for the purpose of terminating these disputes, in the monastery or nunnery of Strenaeshaleh, (Whitby) which was then governed by the abbess Hild. It was attended by the two kings, Oswin and Alchfrid; by Colman with his Irish clergy; and by Agilbert with the priests Agathon and Wilfrid. This party was supported by Jacob and Romanus, (172) while Hild and her community, together with the venerable bishop Cedd, (173) were on the side of Colman.

(163) Usher, Ind. Chron.

(164) Bede writes; (L. 3. c. 25.) “ Defuncto autem Finano, cum Colmanus in episcopatum succederet, et ipse missus a Scottia”, &c. That by Scottia he meant Ireland, as he always does, is too clear to require further demonstration, and will be seen from the sequel. His saying that Colman was sent from Ireland ought perhaps to be understood not as if he went straight from Ireland to Lindisfarne; for Bede elsewhere seems to state, that he proceeded thither from Hy. On occasion of mentioning his coming to that island after he left England, he writes, (L. 4. c. 4.) “ Venit ad insulam Hii, unde erat ad prædicandum verbum Anglorum genti destinatus.” But as Hy was considered as an Irish island and inhabited by Irish monks, Bede might in a general way have said, that Colman was sent from Ireland. Speaking of Finan’s mission, he has; (L. 3. c. 17.) “ ab Hii Scottorum insula ac monasterio destinatus.” Yet his words unde, &c. may be well explained as relative merely to the order for his undertaking the care of Lindisfarne having emanated from the monastery of Hy, whose abbot was the general superior of the whole Columbian order, of which Colman was a member. This, I think, is the true meaning of Bede, and it appears to be confirmed by his saying not that Colman returned to Hy, but that he came to it. On the other hand, when mentioning his going to Ireland, Bede uses the word, returned; “in Scottiam regressus est—Reverso patriam Colmano;” and expresses his departure from England by the phrase going home, abiens autem domum. (See L. 3. c. 26.) Hence it is fair to conclude, that Colman’s home, before he was sent to Lindisfarne, was not in Hy but in Ireland.

(165) The only proof, but it is a strong one, of this position or conjecture is, that Colman, on his return to Ireland, went straight to Connaught, and formed a monastery in the island of Innisboffin off the coast of Mayo, and afterwards another at Mayo. Why prefer this part of Ireland to any other, unless he had lived there before he went to England? Bede, who mentions these establishments, and who tells us that Colman went home, seems to point out that country as his home. Colgan strives (Tr. Th. p. 382.) to make it appear probable that Colman was the same as Columban of the Briun family, who is spoken of by Adamnan (Vit. S. C. L. 2. c. 16.) as having been at Hy in the time of St. Columba, and then a young man. His mighty argument runs thus; Colman was a Connaught man; atqui the Briun or Hy-briuin race were of Connaught; ergo, &c. On this wretched mode of arguing he builds his hypothesis, which elsewhere (ib. p. 488.) he delivers as certain. How could he have imagined that Colman of Lindisfarne was an immediate disciple of St. Columba? Had he been so, and the same as said Columban, he could not, in the most favourable supposition, have been less than 20 years of age at the time of St. Columba’s death in 597. Thus he should have been 84 years old, when he was appointed to the arduous duty of governing the great diocese of Lindisfarne, comprizing an entire kingdom. If that Columban of the Briuns had been raised to this see, would Adamnan have neglected to record his promotion? Much more might be observed on this strange hypothesis, were it worthy of further animadversions.

(166) Of this point I do not find any positive proof. Yet it is very probable; whereas it is natural to think, that the abbot and other superiors of Hy would not have appointed him to Lindisfarne, had they not been personally acquainted with him. In the fabulous Life of St. Gerald of Mayo it is said, that Colman became abbot of Hy. Colgan endeavours (Tr. Th. p. 382 and 488.) to support this absurdity, which, however, he acknowledges elsewhere (AA. SS. p. 602.) to be very very doubtful. What time could be found for Colman's abbacy? The succession and times of the abbots of Hy are perfectly well known. Cumineus Albus was abbot when Colman was sent to England, and since the year 657. (Above §. 8.) And what makes the matter worse, in said Life Colman is made the immediate successor of St. Columba, although it is very probable that he was not born at the time of this saint's death.

(167) See Not. 164.

(168) See Chap. xv. §. 14.

(169) Fleury L. 39. § 35.

(170) Ib. and Bede L. 3. c. 25.

(171) Agilbert was a native of France, but for the sake of studying the Scriptures had spent a considerable time in Ireland. Bede mentioning (L. 3. c. 7.) his arrival in Wessex says; " Venit in provinciam de Hibernia pontifex quidam, nomine Agilberctus, natione quidem Gallus, sed hunc legendarum gratia Scripturarum in Hibernia non parvo tempore demoratus." Agilbert became afterwards bishop of Paris.

(172) See Chap. xv. §. 14.

(173) See ib. §. 15.

§. XIV. The debate was opened by the king Oswin, who entertained no partiality on the subjects to be treated of, and had been rather favourable to the system of the Irish, by whom he had been instructed and baptized. He observed that, as they all equally served God, and expected the same kingdom of heaven, it was right that they should, in like manner follow the same observances, and that it was fit to institute an inquiry which was the true tradition, and that this should be adhered to by them all. He then directed his bishop Colman to speak first, who said; " The Easter, which I observe, I have received from " my elders, who have sent me hither as bishop; and " all our fathers, men beloved by God, are known to " have celebrated it in the same manner. It is that,
 " which, as we read, was celebrated by the blessed " Evangelist John and all the churches, over which “ he presided.” On this latter point Colman was mistaken, as has been already remarked. (174) After some other observations by Colman the king called upon Agilbert to state his practice, and on what authority it rested. He requested that Wilfrid, who was of the same opinion with himself, might be allowed to speak in his stead, as he could not express his sentiments as clearly by means of an interpreter as Wilfrid could in his native tongue. For this debate was carried on in Irish and Anglo-Saxon, Cedd serving as interpreter between both parties. Then Wilfrid, by order of the king, thus addressed the assembly. “ The Easter, which we hold, we have “ seen celebrated by every one at Rome, where the “ blessed apostles Peter and Paul lived, taught, suf- “ fered, and were buried. We have seen it also in “ every part of Italy and France, that we have tra- “ versed. It is observed, and at one and the same “ time, in Africa, Asia, Egypt, and Greece, and, in “ short, by the whole Christian world, except by our “ adversaries and their accomplices, the Picts and “ Britons.” On Colman’s appealing again to the authority of St. John, Wilfrid answered by allowing, that St. John retained, indeed, the Jewish Pasch, whereas in the commencement of the church it was thought expedient not to immediately reject all the practices of the Mosaic law. On the contrary, St. Peter, looking to our Saviour’s resurrection on the day next after the Sabbath, followed a rule different from that of St. John. “ But after all,” added Wilfrid, “ what has your system to do with St. John’s? “ He celebrated the Pasch on the 14th day of the “ first month without caring on what day of the “ week it fell ; while you never celebrate your Easter “ except on a Sunday, so that you do not agree “ either with John or Peter, nor with the Law or “ the Gospel.” Wilfrid was very correct in these remarks on Colman’s erroneous position as to the practice of St. John, but far from being so in what he has at some length concerning the Paschal regulations established by St. Peter. He supposed that the Paschal system at Rome in his time was the same as that, which had always prevailed there from the commencement of its church. This was a great mistake, as has been shown elsewhere ; (175) and it is unnecessary to trouble the reader with this part of Wilfrid's discourse.

(174) Not. 24 to Chap. xv.

(175) Chap. xv. passim.

§. xv. Colman then alleged the authority of Anatolius as having laid down, that the Paschal days were from the 14th inclusive, to the 20th of the first moon. To this Wilfrid replied that the day, called by Anatolius the 14th, was in reality the same as that, which the Egyptians reckoned as the 15th. But he would not have been able to prove this assertion. (176) Colman had asked, whether it could be supposed that their most revered father Columba and his holy successors, who followed the Irish system, entertained bad sentiments or acted contrary to the Scriptures ; men, whose sanctity was proved by miracles, and whose example and rules he endeavoured to adhere to in every respect. Wilfrid acknowledged that they were holy men, and that, as they were not acquainted with the true paschal system, their not observing it was of little detriment to them. " And," he added, " I believe that, had they been " rightly informed on the subject, (177) they would " have submitted to the rules proposed to them, in " the same manner as they are known to have ob- " served the commandments of God, which they had " learned. But you and your associates certainly " commit sin, if after having heard the decrees of " the Apostolic see, nay of the universal church, and " these confirmed by the holy Scriptures, (178) you " disdain to follow them. For, although your fa- " thers were saints, is their small number from a cor“ner of an island in the extremity of the world (179)

 “to be preferred to the whole church? And, how“ever holy and great performer of miracles your “Columba was, could he be preferred to the most “blessed prince of the Apostles, to whom the Lord “has said: Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I “will build my church, and the gates of hell shall “not prevail against it; and I will give unto thee
 “the keys of the kingdom of heaven?” The king then said: “Is it true, Colman, that the Lord has thus spoken to Peter?” He answered that it was.
 The king added: “Can you show that so great a power was granted to your Columba?” No, replied Colman. The king continued: “Do you agree on “both sides, that this has been said principally to “Peter, and that the Lord has given to him the keys “of the kingdom of heaven?” “Undoubtedly” was the general answer. The king then concluded:
 “Now I tell you, that this is the gate-keeper, whom “I will not contradict, and whose decrees I wish to “obey as far as I know and am able; lest on my “arrival at the gate of the kingdom of heaven
 “there should be no one to open it for me, as he,
 “who holds the keys, would be against me.” Thus the question was decided, and the assembly at large declared in favour of Wilfrid. (180)

(176) See Not. 1. to Chap. xv. Smith observes, (Appendix to Bede, No. ix. p. 703.) that Colman was perfectly right in what he stated concerning the rule of Anatolius, and that Wilfrid’s answer was unfounded and good for nothing.

(177) Fleury remarks (L. 39. §. 36.) that Wilfrid seems not to have known, that St. Columbanus understood the subject very well. He thought that the Columba, whose example was alleged by Colman, was Columbanus of Luxeu, who was certainly fully instructed on the state of the question. (See Chap. XIII. §. 4.) But the Columba meant by Colman, as also by Wilfrid, was Columbkil of Hy.
 This is a mistake very easily fallen into on reading Bede’s narrative, unless particular care be taken to recollect, that Colman had been a monk of Columbkil's institution. As Columba and Columbanus were the same name, (see Not. I. to Chap. XIII.) and as the latter observed the Irish method equally with the former, I am not surprized that Fleury made this mistake. I fell into it myself, in the hurry of writing some years ago; (Introduction, by Irenaeus, to the Protestant Apology for the Roman Catholic Church, p. cxliv. Dublin, 1809.) but at that time I had no idea of undertaking this work, or of being obliged to dip deep into the ecclesiastical history of Ireland.

(178) Wilfrid here assumes grounds, which he had no claim to. Where did he find it ordered in the Scriptures to prefer the Alexandrian cycle of 19 years, then followed by the Romans, to that of 84 years used by the Irish, and for a long time by the Romans themselves, or to that of 532 years, which also had prevailed at Rome? Or where have the Scriptures determined on what day of the first moon Easter should be celebrated, or even that it should be celebrated at any time? But, it may be said, Wilfrid's meaning was, that the Alexandrian, or new Roman, rules were more conformable to the account given of the time of our Saviour's resurrection inasmuch as it took place after the 14th day. If the paschal day were to be determined by what we read in the Gospel, it would follow that Easter could never be celebrated earlier than on the 16th day, as had been the practice at Rome; (see Chap. xv.) whereas, the Friday of the passion having been the 14th, the Sunday of the resurrection was the 16th. Now Wilfrid maintains that the 15th was the first regular day for the solemnity of Easter, (see Bede L. 3. c. 25.) and insists upon it as if it were a rule of faith; and another great stickler for the Alexandrian method, Ceolfrid (or rather Bede, who seems to have been the chief author of Ceolfrid's letter) inveighs against those, who waited for the 16th (See Not. 27. to Chap. xv.) Yet the fact is, that, were Easter day to be fixed according to the Gospel history, the 16th should have been waited for; and thus Wilfrid and his adherents, instead of following the Scriptures as they supposed, were acting against them as much as the Irish, who thought that Easter might be celebrated on the 14th. But it was never made a general rule of the Church to make Easter day correspond exactly with all the circumstances of the time of the Resurrection; and accordingly it was not thought necessary to attend to the whole interval, that elapsed between it and the Passion.

Wilfrid speaks also of decrees of the universal church in favour of his system. Where did he find them? There were such decrees against the Quartadecimans, and ordering that Easter should be always celebrated on a Sunday. The Irish observed these decrees, and were far from being Quartadecimans. But there was no decree enjoining the whole church to adopt the Alexandrian cycle and rules. Those of the general councils of Nice and the first of Constantinople contained no such order; and, if they had, the Roman church itself would have been long guilty of disobedience, whereas it opposed said cycle until about the middle of the sixth century. When the clergy of Rome in their letter to Thomian, &c. (see Chap. xv. §. 11.) speaks of a heresy concerning the Pasch as reviving in Ireland, it is plain that they misunderstood the question, imagining that some of the Irish followed the condemned system of the Quartadecimans. The practice indeed was, in Wilfrid's time, very general against Colman's party, which had been already diminished by the secession of the Southern half of Ireland. But practices, however extensive, are not alone sufficient for constituting an article of faith. (See Veron, Regula fidei Catholicae, §. 4. No. 4.) Even at that time the whole of the Alexandrian method was not adhered to in some parts of the continent, (See Not. 27. to Chap. xv.) Colman and his associates were certainly very blameable for persisting in a practice so contrary to that of the far greatest part of Christendom, and, in itself, of so indifferent a nature. Their only apology is the extreme veneration entertained by them for the memory of Columbkil. On the other hand it is surprising, that such men as Wilfrid and Bede could have considered this question as one of doctrine, of faith, of vital importance. It was a dispute of mere astronomical calculation, similar to that between the abettors of the Gregorian or new style and those of the old one. Neither faith nor morals were in any wise connected with it. As long as the old style continued to be followed in these kingdoms, our Catholics used, with the Pope's consent and permission, to celebrate Easter and the other festivals of the year at times different from those, in which they were observed at Rome and elsewhere. Would this have been allowed, were the fixing of of Easter time, &c. considered as appertaining to faith? So far from an adhesion to the Irish cycle and rules having been supposed at Rome to be indicative of heresy or schism, some of its greatest supporters, after the disputes concerning it had begun, ex. c. Columban of Luxeu, and, even after admonitions from Rome had been received against it, ex. c. Aidan of Lindisfarne, are held there as saints; and the two great men now mentioned are particularly named in the Roman martyrology.

(179) The island meant by Wilfrid seems to be Hy, as that in which Columba and his successors, the fathers referred to by Colman, had lived.

(180) Bede, L. 3. c. 25.

§. XVI. It had been intended to treat in this conference concerning also the mighty question relative to the clerical and monastic tonsure; but the king's declaration, which implied that he would follow the Roman practices in all points, prevented the necessity of discussing it. Yet there existed great disputes about it; (181) and Wilfrid's party looked upon it as a matter of primary importance. The Romans themselves thought little about it; and I do not find that in any of the admonitions from Rome, or of the complaints of the missionaries, the tonsure is at all mentioned. But their ultra-orthodox English converts made vast noise about it, thinking that nothing was good or could be tolerated except what was practised at Rome. This is not the place to enter largely into the origin and varieties of the ecclesiastical tonsure. (182) The difference between the Roman one, as used since the times of Gregory the great, and that of the Irish, consisted in this, that the Romans shaved or clipped very close the crown of the head, leaving a circle of hair all around, (183) while the Irish shaved or clipped only the fore part of the head as far as both ears, allowing the hair to grow at the back between them. The English advocates for the Roman tonsure maintained, that it was practised by St. Peter, and gravely asserted that the Irish one was that of Simon magus. Where they met with this notable discovery, I am not able to tell; yet this was the terrible ground, upon which it was reprobated; (184) for as to various modes of the tonsure, they were allowed to be, in general, harmless things. (185) But the fact is, that neither St. Peter nor Simon magus had any tonsure either circular or semicircular; and the Irish and the Roman ones were equally innocent and blameless. The English disputants constantly supposed, that every ecclesiastical practice observed at Rome in their times, had been established by St. Peter. How or at what particular time the Roman tonsure originated, no account remains; but the Irish seem to have received theirs from St. Patrick (186) who had seen it observed by some monks of the continent. (187) And hence it is easy to understand, why they were so strongly attached to it. Yet it yielded at last, although not as early as the period we are now treating of, to the Roman fashion; and its dissolution proceeded, hand in hand, together with that of the Irish paschal system. For, as soon as any party of the Irish or their adherents adopted the Roman cycle and rules, they received at the same time the Roman tonsure, as had been done by the Southern Irish since about the year 633.

(181) Bede says; (ib. c. 26.) “Nam et de hoc (the tonsure) quaestio non minima erat.”

(182) Smith, on occasion of treating of the tonsural dispute (Append. to Bede, No. 9.) has an excellent dissertation on the tonsure in general. The reader may consult also Fleruy, Institut. au Droit Eccles. Part. 1. ch. 5. and Bingham, Origines, &c. B. VII. ch. 3. sect. 6. It is now universally admitted, that until some time in the fifth century there was no tonsure peculiar to the clergy, and that it meant nothing more than the clipping of the hair so as to wear it short, a practice followed by all Christians both lay and clerical. As the term corona was, after the introduction of the tonsure now understood, applied to it on account of its round form, some writers, for instance Bellarmine (Tom. 2. L. 2. De Monachis, cap. 40.) have argued, that it was meant by the corona sacerdotalis, which is often mentioned by the ancients. St. Jerome writing to St. Augustin says; “Fratres tuos dominum meum Alypium, et dominum meum Evodium, ut meo nomine salutes, precor coronam tuam.” But this corona was usually relative only to bishops, and it became a technical phrase to address them by coronam tuam, or vestram, as we would say, your honour. (See Bingham, B. 2. ch. 9. sect. 4.) Of the numberless passages, in which it occurs, there is not one that indicates an allusion to the tonsure. This phrase is constantly used as meaning dignity or honour, and seems to have been introduced to mark the power of bishops, in the same manner as the royal crown does that of kings. Thus Alypius in a letter to Paulinus: “Ad venerandum socium coronae tuae patrem nostrum Aurelium ita scripsimus.” Paulinus and Aurelius were both bishops; and what can socium coronae tuae signify except a partnership in episcopal authority? Its being used in Holy writ as expressive of glory, or of whatever causes respectability, authorized the application of it to bishops. We read in Proverbs, xvii. 6. Corona senum filii filiorum; and St. Paul writing to the Philippians calls them (iv. 1.) his crown, inasmuch as their good conduct added dignity to his character. That St. Jerome did not mean by corona the ecclesiastical tonsure is evident from the well known passage of his Commentary on Ezechiel xliv. 20. where he says, that “we ought neither to have our heads shaved as is done by the priests and worshippers of Isis and Serapis, nor on the other hand to wear our hair long, a fashion peculiar to luxurious persons, barbarians, and soldiers; but the priest’s face should indicate a decent demeanour, without making the head bald with a razor or clipping the hair so close as to make it appear as if shaven, allowing our hair to grow so as to cover the skin.” This mode, recommended by St. Jerome, was indeed a sort of tonsure; but it was not peculiar to the clergy. That, which afterwards became a distinctive mark of the clerical order, originated, in all appearance, with some monks, chiefly of the East, who, in sign of repentance and affliction, had their heads shaved, either entirely or in part. The Greek monks used to shave the whole head, or, at least, to clip all the hair quite close to the skin. Julian the apostate, when pretending in the reign of Constantius to be a real monk, had his hair clipped in this manner. Others had their heads only half shaved or shorn, that is, from the forehead to the back of the head. St. Paulinus of Nola says (Ep. 7.) of the monks of his time, that they were “casta informitate capillum ad cutem caesi, et inaequaliter semitonsi, et destituta fronte praerasi.” Hence it appears that, at least in the Western church, there was no determined or prescribed form of the monastic tonsure, then the only one, about the beginning of the fifth century. From the monks the tonsure, whether of one sort or another, gradually passed to the secular clergy, partly through the circumstance of monks having been raised to high stations in the church, yet still retaining their practices, some of which were imitated by their subordinate clergy; and partly owing to the monasteries having become seminaries for the education of persons intended for holy orders, and who, while residing in them, used to observe their regulations.

(183) This tonsure is still practised by some religious orders, and is much larger than that usually observed by the secular clergy in Catholic countries. The surrounding circle of hair is that, which was, strictly speaking, called the corona, and was, when mystical interpretations were introduced, supposed by some to represent the crown of thorns placed on the sacred head of our Saviour. Others have exhibited it as an emblem of the royalty of the Christian priesthood.

(184) In Ceolfrid’s letter we read; “Tonsuram eam, quam Magum ferunt habuisse Simonem, quis, rogo, fidelium non statim cum ipsa magia primo detestetur et merito exsufflet?” Aldhelm and others allege the same tremendous charge. (See Usher, p. 924.) Ceolfrid adds another lamentation on the Irish tonsure not exhibiting a perfect corona, being defective at the back of the head. An unknown wiseacre advanced, that the author of the Irish tonsure was a swine herd of king Leogaire, pretending that St. Patrick had said so. (Usher, ib.) Bravo!

(185) In the same letter it is said, that “tonsurae discrimen non noceat quibus pura in Deum fides et charitas in proximum sincera est; maxime cum nunquam Patribus catholicis, sicut de Paschae vel fidei diversitate conflictus, ita etiam de tonsurae differentia legatur aliqua fuisse controversia.” Ceolfrid and his assistant Bede knew that the Greek tonsure differed from the Roman, as exemplified in the case of Theodore, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, by Bede himself (L. 4. c. 1) ; for Theodore, while a monk, had his whole head shaved and wanted the corona. Bede says that this was the tonsure of St. Paul. I wish he had told us whence he derived this piece of information.

(186) In the catalogue of Irish saints (ap. Usher, p. 913.) it is said that the first class, which began with St. Patrick, had one only tonsure, from ear to ear, ab aure usque ad aurem, viz. which went over the fore part of the head. The second class also observed it and no other ; but the members of the third class had not a uniform practice, some of them having the corona, (as the Romans had) and others the caesaries, that is, their hair growing at the back of the head over the neck. We find in the sixth canon of the synod called, of St. Patrick, Auxilius, and Iserminus, (see Chap. VII. §. 3.) a clause ordering that all clergymen should be tonsured in the Roman manner. Admitting that the remainder of said canon was drawn up in that synod, this part of it is evidently an interpolation thrust in by some stickler for the Roman tonsure. It is easy to see, that there was a contest about the form of the tonsure at the time it was written. Now in St. Patrick's days no such contest existed in any part of the world ; and it is more than probable, that during the pontificate of Celestin I. when our Apostle was at Rome, the tonsure, called the Roman, was not used there. (See Fleury, Instit. au Droit, &c. Part 1. ch. 5.) It is strange that Usher allowed himself to be led astray by that spurious clause so as to lay down, (p. 924.) that the tonsure first introduced by St. Patrick was really the one known by the name Roman. Had it been prescribed by him, the Irish would not have dared to substitute another in place of it.

(187) It is a mistake to suppose, that the semicircular tonsure was peculiar to the Irish and Britons. St. Paulinus, who was a native of Gaul and died in 431, the year next before St. Patrick's arrival in Ireland, speaking of some monks whom he knew, describes their tonsure just as we might that of the Irish. He says that they were half tonsured, and the fore parts of their heads shaved ; semitonsi et destituta fronte praerasi. (See above Not. 182.)

CHAPTER XVIII.

Colman not agreeing with the decision of the Synod respecting Easter, resigned the See of Lindisfarne—is succeeded by Tuda—Eata appointed bishop of Lindisfarne—Colman took with him to Ireland some of the bones of St. Aedan, and left the rest at Lindisfarne—Venerable Bede's testimony in favour of Colman and his predecessors at Lindisfarne—Several of the nobles and others of the English at this time resorted to Ireland for education—Colman, on leaving Lindisfarne, took with him all the Irish, and about 30 of the English monks of that establishment—goes to the island of Inisbofinde, now Innisboffin—erects a monastery there—founds a Monastery at Maigh-eo or Mayo for the English monks, and leaves the Irish in the island—resides in Inisbofinde himself until his death in the year 676—Diermit and Blathmac, joint monarchs of Ireland, die of the pestilence in 665, and are succeeded by Seachnasach, who being killed in 671 is succeeded by Kennfoelius—Kennfoelius killed by his successor Finnacta, who after a reign of 20 years, was killed at the battle of Grelachdolla in 695—St. Molagga founds a monastery and school at Tulachmin—dies there—St. Finan the Leper—governs a monastery at Swords—is the reputed founder of those of Inisfallen and Ard-Finan—St. Cudberet or Cuthbert, said to be an Irishman—Egfrid, king of Northumberland, sends an expedition into Ireland—they land on the East coast between Dublin and Drogheda—destroy churches and monasteries, and carry away many captives—this injustice done by Egfrid, in revenge for the shelter given to his brother Alfrid by the Irish—Alfrid succeeds Egfrid in the kingdom of Northumberland, and is called on by Adamnan abbot of Hy to restore the captives and property carried off from Ireland by Egfrid's pirates—Failbe, abbot of Hy—Adamnan again visits Alfrid—Another Adamnan, a priest—Mailduff or Mailduf, an Irishman, an eminent teacher at Malmesbury, the first name of which was Ingeborn—A monastery founded here by Mailduf, from which the place was called Maildufsburg, since changed into Malmesbury—Dagobert, son of Sigebert king of Austrasia, educated in Ireland—after his return to Austrasia patronizes several Irishmen, amongst which were SS. Arbogast and Florentius—Theodatus or Deodatus—Hildulph or Hidulf—Eberhard or Erard—and Albert—all natives of Ireland, accompanied Florentius to the Continent, and became famous there—St. Wiros of Ruremond an Irishman—St. Dysibod accompanied by several persons leave Ireland, and go into Germany—Sidonius (Sedna) an Irishman went to Rome with St. Audeon or Owen, archbishop of Rouen—St. Kilian Apostle of Franconia—assisted in his labours by Coloman and Totnan who accompanied him from Ireland—St. Cataldus or Cathaldus, a native of Ireland—Donatus, a brother of St. Cataldus, reckoned among the bishops of Lupiae or Aletium, now Lecce—Maldogar bishop of Ferns dies, and is succeeded by Dirath—St. Coman and other Irish saints—St. Cera or Chier and five other virgins apply to St. Fintan Munnu for a situation to establish a nunnery—Tech-telle—Killchore or Kilcrea a few miles from Cork—St. Ossan—revered at Rath-ossain, near the West gate of Trim—St. Becan of Clonard—Segen archbishop of Armagh dies, and is succeeded by Flan Febhlor—St. Moling, otherwise called Dayrchell, bishop of Ferns succeeded by the bishop and abbot Killen—St. Egbert and several ecclesiastics who had been educated in Ireland, undertook missions to the Continent—Willibrord, or Vilbrord, and Suidbert with several others sent from Ireland to preach the Gospel in Friesland—Adamnan, abbot of Hy—Synod of Flan Febhlan and Adamnan—Canons of Adamnan—St. Aidus or Aedh bishop of Sletty—Colga abbot of Lusk—St. Killen abbot of Saigir—St. Mosacra, founder and abbot of Tegh-sacra, since called Tassagard, and now Saggard—and St. Machonna, all attended the synod of Flan Febhla.

SECT. I.

COLMAN, although silenced by the king's logic and its approval by the assembly, did not renounce his Irish practices, but resigned the see of Lindisfarne, alias York, in the same year 664, which was the thirtieth from the commencement of the episcopacy of the Irish in the Northumbrian kingdom, Aedan having governed that see for seventeen years, Finian ten, and Colman three. (1) He was succeeded by Tuda, who had studied in the southern half of Ireland, and had been ordained bishop there. In consequence of his having lived in that part of Ireland, Tuda observed the Roman practices as to the tonsure (2) and the Paschal computation. He had come from Ireland during the administration of Colman, whom he assisted in his pious labours. After his appointment he lived but a very short time, having been carried off by the great pestilence; and after his death the see was re-established at York. (3) Yet Lindisfarne was not quite abandoned; for, although none of the Irish monks chose to remain there, some of the English ones did, over whom was placed an abbot Eata, a disciple of Aedan, who, it is said, had been recommended for that purpose by Colman to the king Oswin, who was very fond of Colman. Eata was, some years after, appointed bishop of Lindisfarne, which thenceforth continued to be an episcopal see in itself. Colman on leaving that place, and setting out for his home in Ireland, (4) took with him a part of the bones of St. Aedan, and left the remainder in the church of Lindisfarne. "How disinterested," continues Bede, "and strict in their conduct he and his predecessors were, the very place, which they governed, testified. On his departure very few buildings were found there except the church, and not more than were absolutely necessary for civilized life. They had no money, possessing only some cattle. (5) If they received any money from the rich, they immediately gave it to the poor. For there was no necessity of collecting money, or of providing habitations, for the reception of the great of this world, who never came to their church, except for the purpose of prayer and hearing the word of God. The king himself used, when occasion required, to come with only five or six attendants, and to depart as soon as he had finished his prayers in the church. And if it should happen that they took some refreshment, it was merely that of the simple and daily fare of the brethren, with which they were content, requiring nothing more. For the entire solicitude of those teachers was to serve God, not the world; to cultivate the heart, not the belly. Consequently the religious habit was at that time in great veneration, so that, to whatsoever place a clergyman or monk might come, he was joyfully received by all as a servant of God; and should he be observed travelling on a journey, the people used to run up to him and bending their necks received his blessing with gladness, and diligently listened to his exhortations. On Sundays they flocked with eagerness to the church, or the monasteries, for the sake, not of refreshing their bodies, but of hearing the word of God; and if any of the priests should arrive in a village, the inhabitants immediately assembling, took care to ask “ them for the word of life. For the priests them“ selves, and the clergy in general, had no other “ view in going to the villages than to preach, bap“ tize, visit the sick, and, in short, the care of souls.

 “ And so little were they infected with the plague
 “ of avarice, that they would not, unless compelled
 “ by powerful personages, accept of lands or pos“ sessions for constructing monasteries. This sys“ tem was in all its parts observed for some time
 “ after in the churches of the Northumbrians.” (6)

During the time that Finian and Colman presided over this vast Northumbrian diocese, many nobles and others of the English nation were living in Ireland, whither they had repaired either to cultivate the sacred studies, or to lead a life of greater strictness. Some of them soon became monks; others were better pleased to apply to reading and study, going about from school to school through the cells of the masters; and all of them were most cheerfully received by the Irish, who supplied them gratis with good books, and instruction. (7)

(1) Bede, L. 3. c. 26. It is remarked by Simeon of Durham that the pontificate of the Northumbrian province, comprizing York, was held for 30 years by the bishop of Lindisfarne. Besides Aedan, &c. he mentions Tuda. See Not. 107 to Chap.
xv.)

(2) Bede (ib.) writes of Tuda; “Habens juxta morem pro- vinciæ illius coronam tonsuræ ecclesiasticæ, et Catholicam temporis paschalis regulam observans.” Fleury, having misunderstood this passage, exhibits (L. 39. §. 37.) Tuda as tonsured like the Irish, but yet observing the Roman rules for Easter. This was not the meaning of Bede, whose words, juxta morem provinciæ illius, are relative not only to the tonsure but likewise to the paschâl computation. By the custom of that province he alluded to the difference, that existed between the practices of the Southern Irish, whom he calls Scottos Austrinos, and those of the Northern, who still adhered to the old Irish modes, which the former had many years before renounced. And what renders his meaning quite clear is his saying, that Tuda had the corona, coronam tonsuræ ecclesiasticæ. For corona was the exclusive name of the Roman tonsure, whereas in the semicircular form, such as practised by the northern Irish, there was no corona. (Compare with Notes 183-184 to Chap. xvii.) Wharton adds (Anglia Sacra Tom. 1, p. 693) to Bede's Scottos Austrinos the words, seu pictos. This is a very unlearned addition. Bede never confounded the Picts with the Scots, Besides, does not Bede expressly state, that Tuda had come from Ireland? The Scots, among whom he had studied, followed the Roman practices; but all the British Scots of those times adhered to the Irish ones.

(3) The king Oswin placed on the see of York, in preference to Wilfrid, Ceadda, a brother of bishop Cedd, and a disciple of Aedan of Lindisfarne as likewise an imitator of his virtues and pastoral zeal. Oswin still retained a great partiality for the Irish and their disciples. (See Bede, L. 3. c. 28. Eddis' Life of Wilfrid, and Fleury, L. 39. §. 37.)

(4) See Not. 164. to Chap. xvii.

(5) Bede's words are; "Nil pecuniarum absque pecoribus habebant." They are translated by Fleury (ib.) as if those holy men had neither money nor cattle. But the particle absque conveys, I think, the meaning, which I have given. It is difficult to suppose, that they had not, at least, some cows and sheep, were it merely for being supplied with milk, which was much used by the Irish monks, and wool, of which they made their garments.

(6) Bede, L. 3. c. 26. This interesting account may be considered as descriptive of the practices and rules of the Irish monks and clergy in general, and hence we may judge what little credit is due to the stories of some hagiologists, who talk of great estates granted to our monasteries and churches in those and even earlier times.

(7) Bede having observed that the great pestilence raged also through Ireland, Hiberniam quoque insulam, adds; (L. 3. c. 27.) "Erant ibidem eo tempore multi nobilium simul et mediocrium de gente Anglorum, qui tempore Finani et Colmani episcoporum, relicta insula patria, vel divinæ lectionis, vel continentioris vitæ gratia illo secesserant. Et quidam quidem mox se monasticæ conversationi fideliter manciperunt, alii magis, circumeundo per cellas magistrorum, lectioni operam dare gaudebant; quos omnes Scotti libentissime suscipientes victum eis quotidianum sine pretio, libros quoque ad legendum, et magisterium gratuitum præbere curabant."

§. II. Colman departing from Lindisfarne took along with him all the Irish and about thirty of the English monks belonging to that establishment. On his way towards Ireland he went first to Hy, where he seems to have remained but for a short time. Thence he proceeded to the small island called Inisbofinde, (8) now Innisboffin, in the ocean, off the barony of Morisk and county of Mayo. Here Colman erected a monastery, (9) in which he placed the monks, both Irish and English, who had followed him from Lindisfarne. Some time after, a disagreement having occurred between the parties, (10) Colman thought it adviseable to separate the members of the respective nations, and, having found a spot fit for the establishment of a monastery at Magh-eo, now Mayo, purchased it from a nobleman its owner, with a condition annexed that the monks to be placed there should pray for him. The monastery being, with the assistance of said nobleman and the neighbouring inhabitants, soon completed, Colman removed the English monks to it, (11) leaving the Irish in the island. "This monastery," adds Bede, "is still possessed by English residents. For it is that, which having become a large one is usually called Muigh-eo (12) and, better regulations having been received there, contains a distinguished congregation of monks, who, being collected from England, live by their own labour in great strictness and purity under a canonical rule and abbot." (13) Of Colman's further proceedings I find no account except that he seems to have resided chiefly in Inisbofinde (14) until his death, which occurred on the 8th of August (15) in the year 676. (16)

(8) Inisbofinde means, as Bede has rightly observed, (L. 4. c.

4) the island of the white cow. This Inisbofinde must not be confounded with an island of the same name in Lough-ree (that of St. Rioch,) as has been done by Smith, (Not. ad loc.) who followed one passage of Usher, without taking notice of another, in which he corrected himself. (See Not. 176 to Chap. VIII.)

(9) According to Usher (Ind. Chron.) this monastery would have been founded 664. Yet the Annals of Ulster, quoted by himself (p. 964.) assign the sailing of Colman to Inisbofinde, and his founding a church there, to 667, and are followed by Colgan, (AA SS. p. 423.) If this date be true, we must suppose, that Colman remained much longer at Hy, than Bede seems to indicate, or than Usher supposed. For, according to Bede, (L. 3. c. 27.) the year 664 was that, in which Colman left Lindisfarne, and it cannot be believed, that he was mistaken on this point. Either then the Ulster annals are wrong, or it must be allowed that Colman and his companions tarried about three years in Hy, waiting perhaps until the great pestilence should totally subside. Archdall, following Colgan, places the foundation of Inisbofinde, or, as he calls it, Bophin island, in 667.

(10) Bede states that the Irish, whom, as usual, he calls Scotti, went in summer and harvest time from the monastery to various places, which they were acquainted with, per nota sibi loca, and that on returning in winter they wished to partake in common of the articles which the English had prepared during their absence. This was thought unfair and gave rise to the disagreement. It is plain that the places visited by the Irish monks were in Ireland, and, we may suppose, chiefly their native ones as being well known to them. It may also be justly conjectured, that they were principally in Connaught, the province nearest to Inisbofinde. Will it be now pretended, that the Scotti of Lindisfarne were British or Albanian Scots?

(11) Usher, adhering to his supposition, which is indeed very probable, of Colman having returned to Ireland soon after his departure from Lindisfarne, assigns (Ind. Chron.) the foundation of the monastery of Mayo to A. 665, and is followed by Ware (Antiq. cap. 26. at Mayo.) Yet it might have been at least a year later; for it took place after the winter, in which the dissension occurred, and after the monks had spent at least one summer in Inisbofinde. It is hard to think that they could have been well settled there in that of 664, and it seems more probable that the winter next prior to the establishment at Mayo was that of 665, coming 666. Archdall also has (at Mayo) followed Usher as to A. 665, a very awkward computation on his part, whereas he places the foundation of Inisbofinde in 667. (See Not. 9.) Did he not know, that this establishment was prior to that of Mayo?

(12) In the old editions of Bede we find, instead of Muigh-eo, Invigeo which Usher has, p. 964. But he observes, (Ind. Chron. A. 665) that the true reading is Muigeo; and so it appears in Smith's edition. It is evident, that Invigeo was an erratum of a transcriber, who mistook M for In; and Archdall had no right to say, that Mayo was sometimes called Invigeo.

(13) Bede L. 4. c. 4. By saying, that the English monks of Mayo had adopted better regulations than they had at first; conversis jamdudum ad meliora instituta omnibus; he alluded to their having received the Roman cycle, &c. which, as will appear from what will be seen hereafter, they did as early, at least, as the year 716. Colgan pretends, (AA. SS. p. 605.) that this monastery was of the Benedictine order, and asserts, I am forced to say, most ignorantly, that even Colman belonged to this order, and that the monks of Hy had already received its rule from ages. He confounds subsequent ages, in which Hy adopted Benedictine regulations, with much older ones. How he could have imagined that Colman was a Benedictine may appear unaccountable; but he found that Trithemius, Yepes, and some other Benedictine writers had said so, and had made all the Columbians Benedictines. This was enough for honest Colgan, who believed almost every thing that he met with in books, without caring whether what he found in one were, or not, in opposition to what he read in others. The fact is that, wherever the Irish system, maintained by Colman, prevailed, there were no Benedictines; and Wilfrid was, as he boasted of it, the first that introduced the Benedictine rule into the Northumbrian kingdom after the departure of the Irish (See Not. 237 to Chap. XII.) If Colman had been a Benedictine, would he have opposed the Roman practices as to Easter, &c. which were strictly adhered to by that order not only in Italy, where it originated, but in England and every where else? Or would the English monks, who followed him to Ireland, have done so, had they been Benedictines? Poor Archdall, in obedience to Colgan, has (at Mayo) followed these strange mistakes.

Usher observes, (p. 964.) from the book of Ballymote, that in Adamnan's time, about the latter end of the seventh century, there were 100 Saxon (English) saints at Mayo. From the English establishment in that place it has been called Maigh-eo na Sasson, i. e. Mayo of the English. It became in course of time a very respectable town and the see of a bishop, but is now reduced to a petty village, situated a few miles to the S. E. of Castlebar, in the county to which it gives its name.

(14) In the Ulster annals (ap. Usher, p. 964) he is called bishop of the Island of the White cow, that is, Inisbofinde, where also the 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 383.) place him as bishop.

(15) 4 Masters, ib.

(16) Usher, Ind. Chron. from the Ulster annals, which have 675 (676). The 4 Masters (ib.) assign it to 674 (675). Archdall in his blundering account of the monastery of Mayo speaks of Colman, as if he lived until 697. He confounded the year of Colman's death with that, in which Usher, and after him Colgan, supposed, erroneously indeed as will be seen hereafter, that St. Gerald of Mayo died.

§. III. Among the distinguished persons, that died of the great pestilence in 665, were the joint kings of all Ireland, Diermit II. and Blathmac. (17) They were succeeded by a son of the latter, Seachnasach who, having reigned six years, was killed in 671. After him his brother Kennfoelius or Kennfoelaid was raised to the throne, which he held only four years, having fallen in battle, A. D. 675, fighting against Finnaeta his paternal first cousin, and son of Donchad. Finnaeta succeeded him, and reigned 20 years until he was killed in the battle of Greallachdolla in 695. (18)

One of the Irish saints, who survived that mortality, was St. Molaga. (19) He was born in the territory of Feramugia, a part of the now county of

Cork, (20) of poor but pious parents, and is said to have been baptized, when an infant, by St. Cummin Fada. (21) Molaga received his education in his own country and, having distinguished himself by his piety and learning, established a monastery and school at a place there called Tulach min. (22) He is said to have afterwards visited other parts of Ireland, particularly Connor in Ulster, and even to have passed over to North Britain, and thence proceeded to Wales, where he spent some time with St. David. But this visit to St. David is quite inconsistent with the rest of his history, and with the respective times, in which they lived. (23) Molaga seems to have had some establishment in the district near Dublin, now called Fingall. (24) At length he returned to Tulach-min, where he died on a 20th of January in some year subsequent to the time of the great pestilence and consequently later than 665. His festival used to be celebrated on the anniversary of that day at Tulach-min, and at a place called Lann-beachaire in Fingall. (25) He must not be confounded with other saints of the name of Molaga or Molocus. Whether he was the Molagga, from whom Timoleague (Teach-molaga) in co. Cork got its name I cannot determine, as I do not find that he ever lived in that place. St. Finan, surnamed Lobhar, or the Leper, from his having been afflicted for thirty years of his life with some cutaneous distemper, flourished in these times. (26) He was a native of Heli, (Ely O'Carrol) then a part of Munster, and of an illustrious family. It has been strangely said that he was a disciple of Columbkil, and placed by him over the monastery of Swords. (27) But Finan was not, in all probability, born until after Columbkil's death, and his having been mistaken for a disciple of this saint was caused perhaps by his having been, as may be conjectured, a monk of the Columbian order. He certainly governed a monastery at Swords, which he was, most probably, the founder of. (28) Two other monasteries are constantly attributed to him, viz. the celebrated one of Inisfaithlen or Innisfallen (29) in the lake of Killarney, and that of Ardfinan, the high place of Finan, in the county of Tipperary. (30) Finan spent some part of his life, apparently as abbot, in the monastery of Clonmore, which had been founded by St. Maidoc of Ferns. (31) But the house of Swords was that, in which he seems to have chiefly resided, (32) and where it is probable that he died. (33) Yet, if it be true that he was buried at Clonmore, as one account states, (34) it must be allowed that this was the place of his death. Be this as it may, St. Finan died during the reign of Finnacta, monarch of Ireland, and accordingly some time between 675 and 695. (35) The day of his death was very probably a first or second of February, (36) although in every martyrology, both Irish and foreign, in which he is mentioned, his name is affixed to the 16th of March. (37)

(17) See Chap. xiv. §. 1.

(18) Ware, Antiq. cap. 4. and O'Flaherty, Ogyg. Part 3. cap. 93. The English translator of Ware has made Finnacta a nephew of Aidus or Hugh Slani. But he was his grandson; for his father Donchad was brother to Diermit II. and Blathmac, and consequently son to Aidus Slani. The translator, instead of rendering the nepos of Ware's original by grandson, mistook it for nephew.

(19) Life of St. Molaga, cap. 22. Colgan translated this Life from Irish into Latin, and published it at 20 January. He laments that in several parts it is imperfect.

(20) Feramugia is called at present Roche's and Condon's country. The name is still retained in that of the town of Fermoy.

(21) Life, cap. 7. Concerning Cummin Fada see Chap. xv. §. 8.

(22) I cannot find in the country about Fermoy any place now called by this name. In Molaga's Life some other places, which

I cannot discover, are mentioned as having been in those parts, ex. c. Liathmuine, which is represented as a famous town.

(23) St. David did not live later than A. D. 593. (See Chap. ix. §. 9.) How then could Molaga, who was alive after 665, have been the abbot of a monastery before David's death? And, what comes still nearer to the point, we are told that Molaga was baptized by Cummin Fada, who was not born until 592. (Chap. xv. §. 8.) How can this agree with Molaga's being acquainted with St. David?

(24) It is said in the Life, (cap. 17.) that Molaga placed a swarm of bees at a town in Fingall, and that said town was thence called Lann-beachaire. Lann or Llan means in Welsh what Kill does in Irish: and beach is the Irish name for a bee; so that Lann-beachaire is the same as Bees-church or Bees-cell. It is added that these bees were derived from those, which St. Modomnoc had brought from Wales to Ireland. (See Chap. xiv. §. 5.) Whatever we may think of this story, the memory of St. Molagga was certainly revered at Lann-beachaire in Fingall, as appears not only from his Life, but likewise from the Calendar of Cashel at 20 January. How that place is now called I cannot discover.

(25) Life, cap. 22. (Compare with Not. prec.)

(26) Colgan has endeavoured to put together the Acts of St. Finan at 16 March. They are very scanty and uncircumstantial. The Bollandists at said day have published a short tract, called a Life of Finan, which they got from Fitzsimon. It was written by some Englishman after the settlement of the English in Ireland, and is, though praised by the Bollandists, a wretched little compilation crammed with fables. It has the story about Finan having been placed at Swords by Columbkil.

(27) See Not. 109. to Chap. xi.

(28) See ib. for Archdall's bungled account of this monastery. Ware makes no mention of it; but Harris has followed the unproved opinion of its having been founded by Columbkil.

(29) Ware, having been led astray by the story of Finan's discipleship under Columbkil, assigns the foundation of Innisfallen to the sixth century, as does also Harris. Archdall, treating of this monastery, has some blunders as usual. He makes Finan a son of Alild king of Munster, and disciple of St. Brendan, for which he refers to Colgan. Now Colgan, following several old writers, constantly calls Finan the son of Conall, who was a descendant of the famous Alild Olum, a king that lived some hundreds of years before Finan was born. As to his having been a disciple of Brendan, Colgan has not a word about it. It is mentioned also in the meagre account of Finan in Butler's Lives of Saints, following the Bollandist Life, in which one Brendan is said to have taught Finan. Archdall adds, that Dichull, son of Nesson, was abbot of Innisfallen in 640. On this point he is not quite so much to blame, except that he had not even Colgan's authority for marking any precise year. Colgan happenig (AA. SS. p. 92.) to touch upon Dichull, one of the sons of Nesson, confounded the Inisfaithlen, now Ireland's eye, (see Not. 61. to Chap. xi.) with the Inisfaithlen or Innisfallen of Kerry. But at 15 March, where he treats expressly of the sons of Nesson, he has guarded against this mistake.

(30) Harris and Archdall, following the mistake of Finan having been a disciple of Columbkil, assign this foundation to the sixth century.

(31) See Chap. xiv. §. 10. In the sketch of Finan's Life, ap. Butler, it is strangely stated, that he built the monastery of Clonmore.

(32) The Irish calendarists in enumerating the monasteries belonging to Finan always mention Swords first; thus in the Calendar of Cashel at 16 March we read; "S. Finanus Lobhra filius Conalli—de Surdo, et de Cluainmor Maidoci in Lagenia, et de Inis-faithlin in lacu Lenensi, de Ard-finain." In the account ap. Butler Swords is omitted!

(33) It is related in the Life of St. Maidoc, (cap. 62.) that there was a man, named Finan, who had lived 30 years in the northern part of Leinster, and that on the day of his festival (31 January) this saint, accompanied by St. Brigid, appeared to Finan in a vision and announced to him that he was to be called out of this world within a day or two. Colgan observes, that in an Irish Life of Maidoc this Finan is called Finan Lobhar, and it seems very probable that he really was the St. Finan we are treating of. But Clonmore was not, as Colgan states, the place where the vision is said to have occurred, as it was situated not in the northern but in the southern part of Leinster. If Finan the leper was the person meant in this narrative, as appears almost certain, the scene of the vision was undoubtedly Swords, a town in North Leinster; and consequently, according to this account, it was there that St. Finan, died, and on the 1st or 2d of February. Following the same supposition, viz. that Finan the leper was the person here alluded to, we have an additional argument to show, that he lived at a later period than that assigned by Ware and others; for he is represented as alive after the death of Maidoc, i. e. after the year 632. (See Chap. xiv. §. 10.)

(34) Colgan quotes from a little Irish poem on the church of Clonmore a passage, in which it is said that the body of St. Finan the leper was resting in that place. He attributes said poem to St. Moling of Ferns. If composed by this saint, there can be no question about the place of Finian's burial, and consequently death; I say, consequently death, because, had he died elsewhere, ex. c. at Swords, or, as some have said, at Ardfinan, it is not to be supposed that the monks of these establishments would have given up his entire remains to that of Clonmore. But what authority have we for believing that St. Moling was the author of that poem? It was, I dare say, the composition of a monk of Clonmore, perhaps at a late period, who, in honour of his monastery, wished to make it appear, that among the innumerable reliques preserved there (see AA. SS. p. 277.) was the whole body of St. Finan. It is probable that a part of his remains was to be found in that collection, which might have been the case, although, as seems most probable, he died and was buried at Swords. That St. Moling was not the author of the poem, is sufficiently plain from the allusions in it to certain disputes concerning the place where the reliques collected by a St. Onchuo were deposited. At what period this St. Onchuo lived, cannot be discovered, at least from the vague and confused account of him patched up by Colgan at 8 February. If he was contemporary with Finan the leper, as Colgan says, it would have been easy to know in St. Moling's time (the 7th century) where he had left his collection of reliques, and the disputes on this point could not have then existed; or if, as appears much more probable, he lived at a later period than either Finan or Moling, he could not have been mentioned in a poem written by the latter.

(35) Colgan says (Finian's Acts) between 674 and 693, following the 4 Masters, who mark these years for the reign of Finnacta.

But their date 674 is the same as the 675 of Ware and others; and their 693 is the same as 694, a date differing only by one year from that of other writers. Archdall boldly lays down, (at Clone-more) that Finian died in 680. Where he found this date, he does not inform us. Yet (at Swords) he makes him die before 563, or, at least, before the close of the sixth century. Bravo! (See more Not. 109 to Chap. XI.)

(36) See Not. 33.

(37) Colgan justly remarks, that this can be easily accounted for in consequence of the 1st of February being St. Brigid's day, and the 2d that of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin. We may therefore suppose that, to avoid a collision, the festival of St. Finian was transferred to 16 March.

§. iv. The great St. Cudberet, or Cuthbert, bishop of Lindisfarne, was, according to several distinguished writers, born in Ireland; (38) but it is very probable, that he was rather a native of the Northumbrian kingdom, and of that part of it which is now comprized in Scotland. The name Cudberet, if however it was his original one, indicates a Northumbrian, not an Irish origin. It is certain that, when a very young man, he lived in a district to the North of the Tweed at no great distance from the river. (39) While charged with the care of a flock of sheep and watching in prayer, Cuthbert had a vision on the night of the death of St. Aedan of Lindisfarne, in which he saw the soul of this saint wafted by Angels to heaven. (40) He immediately determined on retiring into a monastery, and chose for said purpose that of Mailros, situated on the bank of the Tweed, the prior of which was then Boisil, a very holy man, and the abbot Eata, (41) a disciple of St. Aedan. Cuthbert was one of the monks, whom Eata took along with him to the new monastery of Inhrypum or Rippon, which he erected on ground granted to him by the prince Alchfrid, and from which they were expelled some time after by the same prince, because

They refused to abandon the Irish practices as to Easter and the tonsure. (42) Having returned to Mailross, Cuthbert was, in consequence of the death of Boisil, which occurred about 661 (43) appointed prior of that monastery in his stead, and held that office until 664 or 665, (44) when he was removed to Lindisfarne by his abbot Eata, who was then abbot of this place also. (45) Here Cuthbert was employed likewise as prior, and continued as such for several years, until, wishing for a solitary life he withdrew, in 676, to the small island of Farne out in the sea some miles distant from Lindisfarne. But I shall not encroach further on the ecclesiastical history of England, to which that of this great saint principally belongs, (46) than to observe that he was, as it were, dragged out of that island in 684 by king Egfrid in person, bishop Frumwine, and many others, for the purpose of being raised to the episcopacy; consecrated at York in 685 and placed over the see of Lindisfarne; and that he died on the 20th of March A. D. 687 in the island of Farne, to which he had again retired a short time before his death. (47)

In the same year that Egfrid king of Northumberland (48) prevailed on Cuthbert to quit the island of Farne he sent, yet some time earlier in the year, an expedition under a commander of the name of Beret against some parts of the Eastern coast of Ireland, particularly that of Bregia, or the country extending from Dublin towards Drogheda. These marauders spared neither churches nor monasteries, and carried away many captives besides a considerable deal of plunder. It is difficult to account for this wanton attack upon an unoffending people, an attack replete with ingratitude, as the Irish had been exceedingly friendly to the English and used to treat them with the utmost kindness and hospitality. (49) A modern writer, who stops at nothing that may suit his purpose, says that Egfrid was urged to this act by the clergy, whom he is pleased to call Romish, that is, the clergy who had adopted the Roman practices as to Easter, &c. (50) For this atrocious charge there is not the least foundation, and it is in direct opposition to the circumstances of the times; and to the conduct and feelings of the then advocates of said practices. (51) The only reason, that can be guessed at, which Egfrid might have had for being displeas'd with the Irish nation, was the shelter granted in Ireland to his brother Alfrid, who having gone thither after the death of king Oswin, applied himself to the ecclesiastical and other studies, and became very learned in every respect. He remained among the Irish during the whole reign of Egfrid, after whose death he was recalled to Northumberland, raised to the throne, and governed his kingdom, for many years with consummate wisdom and ability. (52)

(38) Usher, Ware, Colgan, Harris, &c. held this opinion. Bede, beside what he has about him in his Ecclesiastical history (L. 4.) has left us two Lives, one in verse, the other in prose, of St. Cuthbert, or as he calls him Cudberet, without mentioning the place of his birth. In Capgrave's collection, alias that of John of Tinmouth, there is a Life of this saint, in which he is expressly stated to have been an illegitimate son of an Irish king, who, having murdered another king, called Muriardach, ravished his daughter. Colgan in a note to this Life (AA. SS. ad 20 Mart.) says, that this Muriardach was Murchertach Mac-Erca, who is known to have suffered a cruel death; but is puzzled to account for his being the grandfather of Cuthbert, who was not born until about a hundred years later. For Murchertach Mac-Erca was killed, at the latest, in 533 or 534. (See Chap. ix. §. 13.) Hence Colgan conjectures, that Cuthbert's mother was not daughter, but either grand-daughter or great grand-daughter of said Murchertach. Then we are told, that the infant, the fruit of that violation, was baptized by the Irish name, Nulluhoc, that is, moaning; because, as Colgan explains it, his mother moaned and wept for the injury she had received. It is added, that some time after she passed over to North Britain, taking with her the boy, whom thenceforth we find called Cuthbert, without being informed how he happened to get this name.

Ware (Writers at Cuthbert) has a different statement, according to which Cuthbert was born at Kells in Meath, or, as some have said, at Kill-mochudrick (Killmacudd), four miles distant from Dublin, and was the son of an Irish petty king. It is then said that Sabina, the mother of Cuthbert, going to Rome on a pilgrimage, left him in the monastery of Mailros, &c. thus accounting for his arrival in Britain. This story of Sabina, &c. is in direct opposition to Bede, who represents Cuthbert as a lad tending sheep on the mountains, probably of Berwickshire, when, in consequence of a vision, he determined on repairing to that monastery. In the Life ap. Capgrave, Sabina is said to have been the wife of king Muriardach, and accordingly would have been, following that narrative, the grandmother, not the mother, of Cuthbert. But neither Ware's nor Capgrave's account rests upon any sufficient authority, and it is easy to perceive that they were stories made up for the purpose of bestowing on the saint a royal descent, while it is clear from Bede that he was not entitled to it.

In another work (Antiq. cap. 29. at Kenlis or Kells) Ware says, that the great ornament of Kells was Cuthbert, who was born there, as a writer of his Life states out of Irish authorities. (See also Harris, Bishops, p. 138.) He adds that this tract was in the Cottonian library under Vitellius, D. xiv. 8. We find it in Mr. Planta's catalogue under Titus, A. II. 134. entitled, "De ortu et vita B. patris Cuthberti libellus de Scoticis, i. e. Hibernicis auctoribus collectus." It is the same as that, which Usher call (p. 945) the Acts of our Cuthbert extracted from Irish histories, observing that it appeared about the year 1160. I dare say that those extracts agree in substance with the accounts above given from the Life ap. Capgrave and from Ware. But their being found in that Cottonian tract does not add much to their authority. Ware (ib.) repeats, that some maintain, that Cuthbert was born at Kill-mochudrick. This is asserted in the Annals of St. Mary's-abbey of Dublin, in which (at A. 684.) the most Rev. father Cuthbert of Lindisfarne, is mentioned with this addition; "de Hibernia nato in oppido Kilmacrohuick." There was a church in that place de-dedicated to his memory, and whence was derived the name Kill-mocudrick, that is, the church of my (mo) Cudrick, or Cudberet. This circumstance was, I suspect, the only foundation of the opinion that he was born there.

It is, however, remarkable that many old English and Irish writers, treating of Cuthbert, makes him a native of Ireland and that his name appears in the Irish calendars, as if he had been really so, although, as there marked, he lived in Saxonia (England) (See AA. SS. p. 695. seqq.) The Bollandists, while at St. Cuthbert (20 March) they leave this question undecided, yet at St. Wiro (8 May) seem to acknowledge, that Cuthbert was born in Ireland.

(39) According to Bede (Life, &c. cap. 4.) Cuthbert was, before he entered any monastery, employed in tending sheep on certain mountains, which, as appears from the sequel were in the country, in which Mailros was situated. Simeon of Durham adds (D. of Dunelmensi Ecclesia, cap. 3.) that Cuthbert was then near the Leder, now Lauder, a river in Berwickshire, that flows into the Tweed. Hence Mabillon (Acta Ben. Tom. 2. p. 882.) and others deduce, that Cuthbert was a native of that neighbourhood. This conclusion may appear not absolutely justified by the premises; for from Cuthbert's living, even when a boy, in that country, it does not necessarily follow that he was born there. But until some stronger arguments than those we have seen be produced to show, that he was in his boyhood removed thither from Ireland, the balance of probability remains in favour of Mabillon's opinion. That Cuthbert was a native of Britain seems to be confirmed by a passage of Bede's Preface to the metrical Life, where, having mentioned several great saints, by whom other countries had been enlightened, coming to Cuthbert the light of Britain, he uses the word, genuit:

————— hujusque Britannia consors
 Temporibus genuit fulgur venerabile nostris,
 Aurea qua Cudberetus agens per sydera vitam
 Scandere celsa suis docuit jam passibus Anglos.

(40) Bede's Life of Cuthbert, cap. 4. St. Aedan died on the 31st of August A. D. 651. (See Chap. xv. §. 14.)

(41) Bede, ib. cap. 6. and Eccl. Hist. L. 4. c. 27. Concerning Eata see above §. 1. It is strange that Fleury (L. 40. §. 43) places Mailros in the country of the Mercians, notwithstanding Bede's positive assertion that it was on the bank of the Tweed, and its being a well known place in Scotland near the town of Melross about 10 miles West of Kelso, and consequently very far distant from Mercia, which comprized the central parts of England.

(42) Bede's Life of Cuthbert, cap. 7. 8. (Compare with Chap. xvii. §. 13.) From this narrative it is evident, that the monks of Mailros were of Irish institution and followed the Irish system. Therefore Mabillon was mistaken (Acta Ben. Tom. 2. p. 878) in asserting that Cuthbert had received not the Irish but the Roman tonsure. This had been said before in an anonymous Life of Cuthbert; but the Bollandists justly suspect, that the passage relative to it is an interpolation.

(43) Smith (in a note to Cuthbert's Life, cap. 8.) shows, that Mabillon and the Bollandists were wrong in assigning the death of Boisil to 664.

(44) Smith (Note to Life, &c. cap. 16.) follows Simeon of Durham, who says that Cuthbert was removed to Lindisfarne in 664. This was the year, in which Eata became abbot of Lindisfarne. In the Life ap. Capgrave (cap. 24.) it is said that this removal occurred 14 years after Cuthbert had put on the monastic habit in 651. Thus it should be assigned to 665.

(45) See above §. 1.

(46) Were it certain that St. Cuthbert was a native of Ireland, I should think myself authorized to enter more fully, than I have done, into his history. But it appears to me more probable that he was not. If he was an Irishman, why did he not follow Colman on his return to Ireland, as all the Irish of Lindisfarne did? To this, however, it may be replied, 1. that Cuthbert was then not at Lindisfarne but at Mailros; and 2. that those, who make him a native of Ireland, represent him as so very young, when carried over to Britain, that he could scarcely have retained a recollection of it. Why, it may be asked, was the memory of Cuthbert so much celebrated in Ireland, were it not the land of his birth? I answer that this was owing to his connexions with the Irish of Northumberland, his being a member of their establishments, his having observed their practices, &c. In like manner Gildas and St. David of Wales were greatly revered in Ireland on account of their intercourse with the Irish.

(47) See Bede, Eccl. Hist. L. 4. c. 28. 29.

(48) Egfrid succeeded his father Oswin in 670. Bede, ib. cap. 5.

(49) Bede writes; (ib. cap. 26.) “Anno Dominicae incarnationis 684 Egfrid rex Nordamhymbrorum, misso Hiberniam cum exercitu duce Bereto, vastavit misere gentem innoxiam et nationi Anglorum semper amicissimam; ita ut ne ecclesiis quidem aut monasteriis manus parceret hostilis.” We have seen above (§. 1.) with what extraordinary kindness the English, who went to Ireland for their education or other purposes, used to be received there. Bede’s words with regard to the devastation of Ireland are not to be understood as if he meant all Ireland; nor would the short time, during which it lasted, have been sufficient for a general overrunning of the whole kingdom. The expedition was merely piratical, and was confined chiefly, if not solely, to the territory of Bregia. The people were taken unawares, but fought, as Bede (ib.) observes, as well as they could. This act of piracy is mentioned in the Irish annals, at the very year marked by Bede, and as having occurred on the coast and plains of Bregia. The 4 Masters have; “In the year of Christ 683 (684) and 10th of king Finnacta, the territory of Magh-breagh (plains of Bregia) was laid waste, in the month of June, by the Saxons, (English) who spared neither the people nor the clergy, and carried off to their ships many captives and much booty.” (See Tr. Th. p. 385.) Hence it is clear that this devastation was a partial one, and of short duration, having taken place only in June. Hence also we find, that it was prior to Cuthbert’s leaving the island of Farne, which, as is known from Bede, (ib. cap. 28.) occurred just before the winter of 684.

(50) The reader will easily perceive, that this writer is Dr. Ledwich. These are his words: (Antiq. &c. p. 66.) “Not content with this triumph (the result of the conference of Whitby) the Romish clergy urged Egfrid, king of Northumberland, to wreak their vengeance, a few years after, on the dissident Irish, an harmless and innocent people,” &c. Whether the Doctor was the inventor of this story or not, I am not able to decide; but this much I can state, that it is a shameful falsehood. He talks of a few years between the conference at Whitby, and the expedition against the Irish coast. But the reader will please to recollect, that the conference was held in 664, whence there elapsed full twenty years until said expedition took place.

(51) The paschal and tonsural disputes had subsided in Northumberland long before 684, in consequence of the departure of Colman and his Irish companions. The principal ecclesiastics of that time in said country had studied chiefly under Irish teachers, for instance Eata, who was bishop of Lindisfarne in that very year. Such men could not have entertained any hostility to the Irish nation; nor were they over-zealous against Colman's party, having belonged to it themselves in their younger days. Wilfrid, the great advocate of the Roman practices, was then in disgrace, and having been, some years before, driven from his see and imprisoned by Egfrid, was obliged to live out of the Northumbrian kingdom, to which he did not return until after this king's death. Bede, so far from hinting that any clergyman excited Egfrid to this proceeding, highly condemns his conduct, and informs us that the very reverend father Egbert, an English holy priest, who, although living in Ireland, observed the Roman Easter, &c. had advised him to the contrary. Egfrid's defeat and death in the following year, when fighting against the Picts, was considered as a judgment of God against him for his unjust aggression on Ireland. (See Bede L. 4. c. 26.) Egbert now mentioned, and whom we shall meet with hereafter, had been in Ireland since before the breaking out of the great pestilence in 664, during which he resided in a monastery, called in Irish, Rathmelsigi. (Bede, L. 3. c. 27.) Smith in a note to Bede (ib.) makes Rathmelsigi the same as Mellifont in the county of Louth, for no other reason, it appears, than that the syllable Mel is found in both names. But there is no account of any monastery at Mellifont until the 12th century. Colgan makes mention (AA. SS. p. 793.) of a monastery Rathmilsidhe, where had been a St. Colman, different however from Colman of Lindisfarne, and in his Ind. Topogr. (calling it Rathmilsige) places it in Connaught without telling us in what part of said province. Mr. Lingard speaks (Angl. S. Church. ch. XIII.) of Egbert as living near the eastern coast of Ireland. His reason for so doing was, I suppose, that he relied on Smith's authority as to Rathmelsigi.

(52) This Alfrid, or as Bede sometimes calls him, Aldfrid, was an illegitimate son of Oswin, and older than Egfrid, who however, on account of his legitimate birth, was preferred to him as fit for the throne. We must not, as some writers have done, confound him with Alchfrid, the friend of Wilfrid, who ruled, as king, a part of Northumberland in the lifetime of his father Oswin. (See Chap. xvii. §. 13.) The names are different; and Alchfrid, besides having been a legitimate son, died before his father. (Note of Smith to Bede, L. 5. c. 19) On the accession of Egfrid, Alfrid, either through compulsion or indignation, went over to Ireland, and being out of the reach of his brother, and enjoying abundance of leisure, gave himself up to useful studies, in which he became a great proficient. William of Malmsbury writes; (De Gestis Regum, L. 1. c. 3.) “Is (Alfridus), quia nothus, ut dixi, erat factione optimatum, quamvis senior, regno indignus aestimatus, in Hiberniam, seu vi seu indignatione, secesserat. Ibi, et ab odio germani tutus, et magno otio literis imbutus, omni philosophia animum composuerat.” Bede says of him, (Life of Cuthbert, cap. 24) that he had studied a long time among the Scots (Irish) in their islands, alluding, it seems, not only to Ireland but to various small islands, either in the ocean or in lakes, in which they had monasteries and schools, and that he was very learned in the Scriptures, vir in Scripturis doctissimus, (Eccl. Hist. L. 4. c. 26.) adding, that, when placed on the throne, he nobly re-established, at least in great part, the Northumbrian kingdom, which had been much weakened in consequence of the defeat of Egfrid by the Picts. Harpsfeld, treating of his return to Northumberland, describes him (Hist. Eccl. Angl. Sec. vii. cap. 27.) as having improved himself so much by his studies, particularly sacred, in Ireland, that he became highly qualified for being placed at the head of a state. (See also Gratianus Lucius (Lynch) Cambrensis eversus, p. 128.

§. 5. Alfrid was king of Northumberland, when in the year 685, or 686, Adamnan, then abbot of Hy, was sent to that country for the purpose of recovering the captives and property, which had been carried off by Egfrid's pirates. His application was successful, as might be expected, considering that Alfrid could not but be attached to the Irish, and was, besides, the personal friend of Adamnan. (53) This great man was abbot of Hy since the year 679. His predecessor Failbe had succeeded Cumineus Albus, who died in 669. (54) Concerning Failbe I find nothing particular related, except that he was a native of Tirconnel (Donegal) and son of Pipan, a descendant, in the male line, of Conall Gulbanus the ancestor of Columbkil; that, after his promotion to the administration of Hy, he visited Ireland once or twice; and that he died in 679, on the 22d of March, the day marked for his festival in the Irish calendars. (55) Adamnan, who succeeded him in said year, (56) was likewise a descendant, in the same line, of Conall Gulbanus, and son of Ronan. (57) From his consequently having been of the race of the Northern Nialls it may be fairly concluded, that he was a native of Tirconnel, or of some district not far from it. The time of his birth is doubtful; but it was not later than the year 628. (58) Of his younger days I cannot find any distinct account; but there can be no doubt of his having received his monastic education either in Hy, or in some other monastery of the Columbian institution. He was abbot of that of Raphoe, founded perhaps by himself (59) before he was raised to the government of the whole Columbian order. We find Adamnan again on another visit, two years later, that is, about 687 to the same king Alfrid. (60) He visited him also several years afterwards, as will be seen lower down. There was another Adamnan in these times, who, although perhaps of Irish origin, lived constantly in Britain, and was distinguished for the sanctity and austerity of his life. He was a priest and monk of the monastery of Coludi, now Coldingham in Scotland. (61)

Some time before the period we are now treating of Maildulf, or rather Mailduf, (62) an Irishman, became eminent as a teacher in the place now called Malmsbury. Its former name was Ingebbone or Ingeborn. Mailduf, pleased with the situation, lived at the foot of the hill as a hermit, but afterwards, to supply his wants, set up a school, which was not long after changed into a small monastery. At what precise time he formed this establishment, I do not find recorded; but it must have been several years prior to 675, in which the celebrated Aldhelm, the most distinguished of his scholars, became abbot there. The monastery being greatly enlarged by Aldhelm, who had received the tonsure and habit from Mailduf, gave occasion to the name of the place being soon changed into Maildufsburg, (63) whence has proceeded the modern name Malmsbury. Some writings have been attributed to Mailduf, whether justly or not, I shall not undertake to decide. He died either in 675, or some short time previous to it. (64)

(53) Adamnan, making mention (Vit. S. Col. L. 2. c. 46.) of his visits to Alfrid, calls him his friend, and speaks of this visit as his first one after Egfrid's war. O'Flaherty (MS. note to Adamnan, ib.) referring to Tigernach's annals assigns this visit to A. D. 686. The 4 Masters have 684, that is, 685, and mark it as the eleventh year of the reign of Finnacta. It was that, in which the dreadful plague, mentioned by them at said year, broke out, the commencement of which is affixed by Florence of Worcester to 685. (See Tr. Th. p. 385.) Adamnan having observed, (loc. cit.) that this plague raged when he was on that visit, and that the continent of Europe and the islands Scotia et Britannia (Ireland and Britain) were laid waste by it, except the parts of North Britain inhabited by the British Scots and the Picts, who, he thought, were preserved from it by the intercession of St. Columba. He visited Alfrid more than once on some subsequent occasions; but this, his first embassy, was either in the latter end of 685 or in the beginning of 686.

(54) See Chap. xvii. §. 8.

(55) At this day Colgan has given us as much as he was able to collect concerning Failbe. He rejects various lies of Dempster relative to him, among others that of his having written certain tracts attributed to him by that impostor. Harris might have saved himself the trouble of drawing up an article for Failbe as an Irish writer.

(56) Usher, p. 702. and Ind. Chron. at 679.

(57) Tr. Th. p. 480. It is remarkable that, for more than two centuries from the foundation of Hy, almost all its abbots were descended from Conall Gulbanus, thus connected, more or less, by relationship with Columb-kill, and belonging to the line of the northern Nialls. See Colgan AA. SS. p. 408-450-719.

(58) Colgan says (Tr. Th. p. 385.) that, according to the Roscrea and some other Annals, Adamnan was born in 624. This, as will be seen, does not agree with what is said of his age at the time of his death.

(59) See Not. 112. to Chap. xi. As Adamnan was particularly revered at Raphoe, as the patron saint of its monastery and church, it is certain that he had been closely connected with that place, and that, if not absolutely the founder, he was, at least, abbot there. Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 506.) expressly calls him abbot of Raphoe, before he was promoted to Hy. Adamnan was the person, by whose name the succession at Raphoe used to be distinguished. Thus Malbridid, who died archbishop of Armagh in 926, is called a comorban (successor) not only of St. Patrick, but likewise of Adamnan, inasmuch as he had been abbot (not bishop, as Harris states, (Bishops, p. 270.) of Raphoe, before he was raised to the see of Armagh. (See Colgan, AA. SS. p. 386.) I strongly suspect that St. Eunan, who is usually called the first bishop of Raphoe, was no other than Adamnan; not that Adamnan was ever a bishop; for, were he so, he could not have become abbot of Hy; but that he was the ancient patron saint of that place before it became an episcopal see. Colgan never mentions this St. Eunan, nor could Ware discover any account of him. The first bishop of Raphoe, that we meet with, was Malduin Mac Kinfalaid, who died about 930. (Tr. Th. p. 509.) These observations are not indeed sufficient to show, that Adamnan has been changed into St. Eunan; but it is a very remarkable circumstance that the festival of the saint, called Eunan, is kept on the 23d of September. Now this was the very day, on which Adamnan died, and on which his memory was revered not only at Raphoe, but in many other churches. The name, Eunan, is, I allow, not favourable to the conjecture of his identity with Adamnan; but there might have been some reason for this variation of names, and a person better versed in the Irish language than I am might perhaps find some analogy between them.

(60) Adamn. Vit. S. Col. L. 2. c. 46.

(61) Bede treats of this Adamnan of Coludi, (Hist. Eccl. L. 4. c. 25.) and after him Colgan (AA. SS. 31 January) who acknowledges, that he was not able to decide whether he was an Irish or British Scot. In fact, there is nothing to make it appear, that he was rather the one than the other. All that Bede says in regard to his country is, that he was de genere Scottorum. Coludi, where he lived about A. D. 679. belonged at that time to the Northumbrian kingdom.

(62) The name is spelled Mailduf by Bede (L. 5. c. 18.) and by Leland, Collect. III. 158. (See Smith, Not. to Bede ib.) It was, I believe, originally Moeldubh, a name not uncommon among the ancient Irish. Its being written Mailduf was owing, I dare say, to William of Malmesbury, who in the Life of Aldhelm (ap. Wharton, Anglia Sac. Vol. 2.) treating of Mailduf, writes; "Id (the monastery of Malmesbury) quidam, qui alio nomine vocatur Meildulf, natione Scotus, eruditusque philosophus, professione monachus fecerat." Hence Camden has called him Mailduf, giving it a termination rather Saxon than Irish.

(63) The town of Mailduf. It was known by this name as early as the times of Bede, who calls it (L. 5. c. 18.) Maildufi urbem.

(64) It was soon after the death of Mailduf that Leutherius bishop of Winchester gave in 675 the site of Malmesbury to Aldhelm. (See Monastic. Angl. Tom. 1. p. 50. and Smith, Not. to Bede, L. 5. c. 18.) Concerning Mailduf see more in Camden, (col. 103. Gibson's ed.) Usher (Ep. Hib. Syll. ad Ep. 12.) Ware and Harris (Writers at Maildulph).

§. VI. Alfrid was not the only foreign prince, who in those times was sheltered in Ireland. Dagobert, son of Sigebert II. or III. king of Austrasia, had been sent, when a child, to a monastery in Ireland after his father's death about the year 655 by Grimoald mayor of the palace. (65) The monastery, in which he was placed, is said to have been that of Slane. (66) Wheresoever it was, Dagobert remained in Ireland until about 670, when he was recalled to his own country, and received a part of Austrasia from Childeric the second. (67) On the death of Childeric he became in 674 sovereign of all Austrasia by the name of Dagobert the second, and ruled that country until he was assassinated in 679. (68) After his return to Austrasia we find some distinguished Irishmen in that country, particularly St. Arbogast and St. Florentius; and it would seem as if they had either accompanied him from Ireland or went to Alsace about the same time that he was recalled. (69) Be this as it may, Arbogast, who is usually called a Scot or Irishman, (70) was living retired at Suraburg, where a monastery was afterwards erected in honour of him, (71) when he was raised by this king Dagobert to the see of Strasburgh about 674. (72) Besides being a very holy man he is said to have possessed a considerable share of learning, and to have written some ecclesiastical tracts. (73) He died on the 21st of July in 679, and was succeeded in the same year by his friend and former companion Florentius. (74) That Florentius was a Scot, or Irishman, is universally allowed. (75) He had come from Ireland together with Arbogast, (76) and took up his abode in the forest of Hasle in Alsace near where the river Bruscha flows from the Vosges. (77) Here was founded a monastery either by him, or for him by Dagobert, (78) by whom he was greatly esteemed. It is said that he restored her sight and speech to a daughter of that king. While bishop of Strasburgh, he founded, according to some accounts, the monastery of St. Thomas in that city for the Scots or Irish. (79) Having governed the see of Strasburgh for eight years, St. Florentius departed this life on the 7th of November, A. D. 687. (80)

Among the persons, who accompanied St. Florentius from Ireland, is mentioned a Theodatus, or Deodatus, (81) of whom I cannot discover any authentic account. The celebrated St. Deodatus bishop of Nevers, who lived in those times, and, having resigned his see, retired to Alsace to lead there a monastic life, (82) was indeed a particular friend of St. Arbogast; (83) but there is no reason to think, that he was a native of Ireland. It may be conjectured, that the Deodatus, bishop of Toul, who by the direction of Dagobert II. accompanied St. Wilfrid of York to Rome in the summer or autumn of 679, (84) was perhaps the one, who had come from Ireland. We find a bishop Deodatus, whose memory was revered in the monastery of Latiniacum or Lagny, and who, as that was an Irish establishment, (85) may be supposed to have been an Irishman. (86)

(65) According to Mabillon (Annal. Ben.) Sigibert died in 655; others say, somewhat earlier. It was very soon after his death that Grimoald got Dagobert, then very young, shorn by Didon bishop of Poitiers, and sent him to Ireland, spreading a report of his death.

(66) Archdall at Slane. I do not find this mention of Slane any where else. Archdall seems to refer to Mezeray, Histoire, &c. who, as far as I could discover, merely says that Dagobert was placed in some very retired monastery, without naming any one in particular.

(67) See Abregé Chron. at Dagobert II. Mabillon observes, Annal. &c. ad A. 672) that Dagobert had returned to France before the death of Grimoald, i. e. before 671 or 672.

(68) According to L'Art de verifier les dates (Tom. 1. p. 547.) Dagobert II. became king of all Austrasia in 674, and was killed in 679. Mabillon also has (ib. at A. 680. p. 52.) for his death 679, and marks the 23d of December as the day of it. He adds that Dagobert was revered as a martyr at Stenay, the capital of the dutchy of Bar. Although Mabillon in the course of his work calls this prince Dagobert the second, yet in the General index to Tom. 1. he appears partly as the second, and partly as the third. This mistake of the framer of said index is apt to confuse a person searching in it for the transactions of this Dagobert. The king or half-king called Dagobert the third, belonged to the 8th century. (See L'Art, &c. Tom. 1. p. 548. and Abregé, &c. at Dagobert III.)

(69) In the Acts of St. Florentius (ap. Surius 7 November) we read; “Cum Dagobertus rex ad regni Francorum gubernacula sederet, sanctus Florentius, cum beato Arbogasto, Theodato, et Hildulpho, e Scotia venit in Alsatiam.” The Dagobert here mentioned was the second, not Dagobert the first his grandfather, with whom he has been often confounded; whence, as Mabillon remarks, several religious establishments, founded during the reign of the second Dagobert, have been assigned to that of the first.

(70) Gaspar Bruschius (De German. Episcopat. Epitome, p. 55.) makes Arbogast a native either of Aquitain, or of Ireland, “etsi sint qui ex Hibernia ortum affirmant.” But Mabillon (Annal, &c. at 667) speaks of him positively as an Irishman, “Arbogastus origine Scottus.”

(71) Mabillon (ib. at A. 676. p. 533.) says that this monastery was erected, ob meritum S. Arbogasti, during the reign of Dagobert II. Suraburg was in the diocese of Strasburgh, and near the Sura, or Saur, a river that flows into the Moselle not far from Treves.

(72) See Gallia Christiana, Tom. v. col. 182, where it is stated that Arbogast flourished about 673, and was appointed bishop of Strasburgh by Dagobert II. Hence, and from what Mabillon has, it is plain that Bruschius, who is followed by Ware and Harris, (Writers at Arbogast) was wrong in assigning Arbogast's promotion to 646. Bruschius, in whose time the history of Dagobert II. was scarcely known, supposed that the Dagobert, friend of Arbogast, was the first king of the name. But even in this hypothesis he fell into another mistake; for Dagobert I. was dead before 646, and accordingly could not have been the king by whom Arbogast was appointed.

(73) See Ware and Harris, loc. cit.

(74) Gallia Christiana, Tom. v. col. 781. 782. Bruschius was mistaken in assigning the commencement of Florentius' incumbency at Strasburgh to the year 663. That it was in 679, is clear from its being known that Florentius, having held that see for eight years, died in 687.

(75) Bruschius, Mabillon, and the Gallia Christiana agree on this point.

(76) See Not. 69.

(77) Acts of St. Florentius. Hasle is now called Haselae, and lies at two leagues distance from Molsheim in Basse Alsace.

(78) See Mabillon, Annal. &c. at A. 676. p. 533.

(79) Mabillon, ib.

(80) Gallia Christiana, Tom. v. col. 783.

(81) See Not. 69. (82) See Fleury, L. 39. §. 45.

(83) Mabillon, Annal. at A. 667.

(84) See Acta Bened. Sec. 3. p. 186. and Fleury, L. 40. §. 4.

(85) See Chap. xvi. §. 9-10.

(86) The Bollandists observe, (at 3 February) that they have found in old copies of Usnard's Martyrology this Deodatus thus mentioned; "Latiniaco Natalis S. Deodati episcopi," and quote Molanus, who says that the reliques of Deodatus, Maldegarius, and others were removed to that place. They did not know who this Deodatus was, but thought, and I believe justly, that he was different from St. Deodatus of Nevers. Whether he was the same as Deodatus of Toul, I will not pretend to decide; but it is very probable, that he was a native of Ireland.

§. VII. As to Hildulph, or Hidulf, who also is said to have gone with Florentius from Ireland to Alsace, (87) it is exceedingly difficult to form any decided opinion concerning him. We have no account of any distinguished person of this name at that period except Hildulph bishop of Treves, who, quitting his see, is stated to have retired about 676 to the Vosges and there founded a monastery. (88) He was apparently the Hildulph supposed to have accompanied Florentius; and it can scarcely be doubted that they were contemporaries. (89) But it is very uncertain whether Hildulph of Treves was a native of Ireland ; for, according to some accounts, he was a Belgian, and, according to others, a Bavarian. (90) If it be true that he was a brother of St. Erard of Ratisbon, as has been very generally said, (91) it will follow that he was an Irishman. Hildulph had, perhaps, a brother named Eberhard or Erhard ; but it may be doubted whether he was the same as Erard of Ratisbon. (92)

Be this as it may, St. Erard, although younger than Hildulph, was living in his times ; and accordingly I may be allowed to give some account of him in this place, (93) notwithstanding the contest that has been carried on as to the century, in which he flourished. Some old writers assign his times to the seventh and the beginning of the eighth, while others represent him as flourishing during the reign of Pepin father of Charlemagne, consequently in the second half of the eighth century. Although I dare not pretend to decide on a question, which very eminent men have left undetermined, (94) the former opinion appears to me more probable and better supported by such circumstances of the times as seem sufficiently authentic. And I cannot but think that the confusion, which has taken place on this point as well as on that relative to St. Hildulph of Treves, has proceeded chiefly from Pepin Hiristall, mayor of the palace, and his son Charles Martel, having been mistaken for king Pepin, grandson of the former Pepin, and his son Charlemagne. That St. Erard was a native of Ireland can scarcely be called in question, unless we are to reject the authority of almost all the writers, who have treated of him. (95) It is stated on respectable authority, that he was bishop of Ardagh before he left Ireland. (96) Having resigned his see he went to the continent, and joined himself to St. Hildulph or Hidulf, who was then living retired in the Vosges, (97) and with whom he is said to have remained for a considerable time. From that country he went to Bavaria to preach the Gospel, without attaching himself to any see as bishop. (98) Happening to be on some occasion near the Rhine, Erard baptized Odilia the infant daughter of the duke Etico or Atticus, who, having been born blind, became gifted with sight, through the prayers of Erard, in the very act of her baptism. (99) After this he returned to Bavaria, and stopped at Ratisbon, where, after having led a most holy life and wrought many miracles, he terminated his earthly career on an 8th of January. (100) This saint was canonized by Pope Leo IX. in 1052.

(87) See above, Not. 69.

(88) Fleury, L. 39. §. 45.

(89) Several writers assert, that Hildulph of Treves flourished in the seventh century, and died very old in 707. Yet Baronius and others, who are followed by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 36. seqq.) place him about the middle of the eighth. Mabillon maintains, (Annal. &c. at A. 667.) that he was before the times of Charles Martel, that is, before 714.

(90) In some Lives of St. Hildulph he is said to have been a Nervian, Nerviorum claro ortus genere. (See Bollandus at St. Erard, 8 January, and Colgan AA. SS. p. 37.) The Nervii were a people of Belgium, inhabiting the country about Tournay, or, as some think, Haynault. In one of those Lives Bollandus found Nierniorum, instead of Nerviorum, and thought it might have been a mistake for Hiverniorum, i. e. Hibernorum. But according to a Life published in the Acta Ben. Sec. 3. Part. 2. Hildulph, or, as there called, Hidulf, was a native of Bavaria, and born at Ratisbon. This is, I am sure, a mistake founded on the false supposition that St. Erard, who in said Life is represented as a brother of his, was a native of that city. For his Irish origin we have, besides the Life of St. Florentius, the author of which in all probability alluded to the Hildulph of Treves, two Lives of St. Erard, an Office of this saint from the Breviary of Ratisbon, and some German historians quoted by Colgan, AA. SS. p. 38. If he was a native of Ireland, his original name was, I dare say, Hilduf or Hiduf.

(91) That Hildulph of Treves and Erard were brothers is positively stated in the Lives of Erard, Office, &c. mentioned in the preceding note.

(92) Mabillon observes, (Annal. ad. A. 671.) that an Eberhard or Erhard was said to have been brother to Hildulph, and elsewhere (ib. ad. A. 667.) that he was perhaps the same as Erard bishop of Ratisbon. Everhard, the supposed brother of Hildulph, was the first abbot of Ebersheim near Schelestad in Alsace, a monastery founded by Duke Etico or Atticus, father of St. Odilia, some time it seems in the second half of the seventh century. Ebersheim is supposed to have got its name from this Erhard or Eberhard, as if it meant the mansion of Eberhard. (Mabillon, ib.) Another account states, that Ebersheim signifies the boar's habitation, as being the place where, as we are told, a wild boar killed a son of Dagobert II. who was brought to life again by St. Arbogast. That Erard of Ratisbon lived for some time with Hildulph, when retired in the Vosges, is stated in two breviaries of Augsburg, and in one of Wurtzburgh; (AA. SS. p. 32.) but nothing is said of their having been brothers. Nor is there any thing in them or in his Lives about his having been abbot of Ebersheim. It is also to be observed, that Erard of Ratisbon is never called Eberhard, as appears from the etymologies of his name given in the documents, in which he is expressly treated of. From what has been now said, it may be conjectured, that, if Hildulph had a brother named Eberhard, he was different from Erard of Ratisbon.

(93) Bollandus had published three Lives of St. Erard at 8 January, two of which have been republished by Colgan at said day, besides extracts relative to him from breviaries. He had three other Lives, short ones, which he thought unnecessary to publish. Harris has (Bishops at Ardagh) a good summary of Erard's Acts; but he ought not to have called Conrad a Montepuellarum, (a place in Germany) one of Erard's biographers, Conrad of Montpellier.

(94) Bollandus (Comm. pr. ad Vit. S. Erardi, 8 Jan.) has not undertaken to fix the times of this saint. Mabillon complains (Acta Ben. Sec. 3. part 2. p. 470.) that the history of Erard, his times, &c. is equally confused and intricate as that of St. Hildulph. Yet, although he did not take the trouble of inquiring into it, he must have been inclined to think, that Erard belonged to the seventh century; whereas he was of opinion that Hildulph, in whose times Erard is generally allowed to have lived, did not survive the early part of the eighth. (See Not. 89.) Colgan maintains, (Appendix at St. Erard 8 Jan.) that Erard flourished in the reign of Pepin or of Charlemagne, and strives to answer the arguments to the contrary. But it would be easy to show, that, whatever may be thought of his proofs, his replies are very unsatisfactory.

(95) In the first Life of Erard, written by one Paulus or Paululus in the eleventh century, we read (L. 1. c. 1.); “Erhardus qui gloria fortis interpretari potest, Narbonensis gentilitate, Nervius civilitate, genere Scoticus fuit.” Instead of Narbonensis gentilitate, alluding to his having been of a family settled at a place called Narbon, some other Lives or legends, not published by Colgan, have, “Narbonae in Scotia natus.” Colgan conjectures that this place was the same as Ardboe or Arboe in the county of Tyrone, formerly a town of some note. I suspect that Narbon is a corruption of Nardach, that is, of Ardach or Ardagh, where Erard is said to have been bishop. The N prefixed is a contraction of na, of; so that Narbonensis signifies of Arbon, and Nardachensis, if it was the original reading, would mean of Ardagh, in the same manner as Nendrumensis means of Antrim. (See Not. 187 to Chap. VIII.) As to Nervius civilitate, perhaps the author intended to say, that Erard had spent some time in the territory of the Nervii, (see above Not. 90.) in which there were some Irish establishments. In the Life written by Conrad nothing more is stated than that his country was Scotia, that is as Conrad explains himself (cap. 2.) Ireland, or Scotia major. In some German calendars, and in two breviaries of Augsburg together with one of Wurtzburgh, he is called natione Scotus. According to the breviary of Ratisbon he was born in the ancient Scotia or the island of Ireland; Erhardus in veteri Scotia seu Hibernia insula oceani natus. Raderus (Bavaria Sancta, Tom. 1.), Brunerus (Rerum Boicarum L. 5), and other German writers, quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 38. seqq.) agree on this point that Erard was not only a Scot but a Scot of Ireland. In opposition to all these testimonies there is no authority worth mentioning except that of St. Hidulf’s Life published in the Acta Bened. (see Not. 90.) in which Erard is said to have been born at Ratisbon. For this statement there is no foundation whatsoever, unless it should be argued, that, because Erard spent the last years of himself and died in that city, it was therefore the place of his birth. What could have induced so many German writers of Erard's Lives, compilers of breviaries, historians, &c. to deprive their country of the honour of having produced a saint so highly revered there as Erard was, unless they had incontrovertible proofs of his having been born elsewhere? Hence it is plain, that the author of that Life of Hidulf was as wrong in making Erard a native of Ratisbon as he was in assigning to it the birth of even Hidulf himself. Bollandus, having deeply studied this subject, states, as the most probable opinion, that Erard was an Irishman.

In several of the documents now mentioned Erard's name is spelled Erhard, following the genius of the German language; and hence the author of the first Life etymologizes it into gloria fortis; for Er, in German, signifies honour, and hard, or hart, is strong, hard. Passing by this and some other etymologies of Erhard, the real name of the saint seems to have been Erard, a name, as Colgan observes, not uncommon in Ireland.

(96) Besides the authority of the breviary of Ratisbon, Raderus, and Brunerus, we have for this statement that also of Hundius, Catalog. Episc. Ratisbon. (See Colgan, AA. SS. p. 35. and 39-40.)

(97) First Life of Erard, L. 1. cap. 2. second Life, cap. 2. Breviaries, &c. From the circumstance of Erard having been with Hidulf in the Vosges it seems almost certain, that he flourished in the seventh century; for this was, in all probability, the period, during which Hidulf retired to that country, as appears from its being stated on very good authority that he arrived there before the death of St. Deodatus of Nevers, who, as has been seen, had also retired to Alsace, and whose death is universally allowed to have occurred about 679. (See Colgan AA. SS. p. 36. Fleury, L. 39. §. 45. and compare with Not. 89.) It is said in the Breviary of Ratisbon, that Erard went to Rome straight from Ireland; but this cannot be reconciled with the series of his transactions, as related in the other documents. The journey to Rome must have been after his arrival in Germany.

(98) Several writers have called Erard bishop of Ratisbon. This is denied by Hundius, Raderus, and others, although they allow that he spent a good part of his time in that city and died there. Mabillon observes, (Acta Ben. Sec. 3. part 2. p. 470.) that Erard's name does not appear in the catalogues of the bishops of Ratisbon, and that it is a mistake to make him bishop of that see. As to a story of his having been bishop of Frisingen or of Treves, it is not worth attending to.

(99) According to some accounts Hidulf was joined with Erard in baptizing Odilia, or, as better known, St. Odilia. Be this as it may, we have here another very strong argument to show, that Erard lived before the times of king Pepin. Bollandus states (Comment. &c. at St. Erard) that Etico was the son of Leudesius and grandson of Erchinoald, (the mayor of the palace and friend of St. Fursej) who died about 660. Etico married Bersroinda during the reign of Childeric, that is, Childeric the second, king of Austrasia and afterwards of all France, who was killed in 673. (See Abregé, &c. at Childeric II.) This king had made Etico duke of Germany, who accordingly resided at Ehenheim and Hohemburg. St. Odilia his daughter was the person baptized by St. Erard and St. Hidulf. From these circumstances Bollandus justly concludes, that this baptism, &c. were prior to the times of king Pepin and Charlemagne.

(100) AA. SS. p. 35. The Breviary of Ratisbon and Hundi- us state, that he died during the reign of Pepin father of Charle- magne; but this cannot agree with other circumstances, particu- larly the baptism of Odilia, not long after which his death occurred. Pepin's reign did not begin until 751, while, on the other hand, the birth of Odilia was not later than about 700. Therefore in- stead of king Pepin, I think we should say, Pepin mayor of the palace, Pepin Heristall, who had held that office from about 688 until 714, and was the father of another Charles, i. e. Charles Martel. It is right to observe, that this Pepin had governed Aus- trasia with almost sovereign authority since about 680. (See Abregé, &c. at Thierry III.)

§. VIII. Whatever difference of opinions there may be in regard to Hildulph or Hidulf having been a brother of Erard, there is scarcely any as to his having had a brother called by foreign writers Albert. The names of the two brothers St. Erard and St. Albert (101) go hand in hand together, and the latter is not less constantly stated to have been a native of Ireland. His real name was probably Ailbe, (102) and he is generally said to have been, prior to quitting his country, archbishop of Cashel, which must be understood as to his having been bishop of Emly. (103) It is stated, that he left Ireland, together with Erard and others, and that he accompanied him to Germany, whence they are said to have gone to Rome. (104) Having remained there some time, Albert, on Erard's returning to Germany, continuing his pilgrimage proceeded to Jerusalem, where Gillapattrick, one of his companions, died. How long he stayed there we are not informed. Returning to Germany he lost John, another of his followers, at Saltzburg, and on arriving at Ratisbon found that Erard had, some short time before, departed this life. Not wishing to survive him he prayed to God to take him out of this world; and his petition was listened to soon after. Albert's remains were deposited at Ratisbon in a tomb, only seven feet distant from that of his brother Erard.

To the times of Pepin Heristall, during whose mayoralty the saints now treated of seem to have flourished, belonged to St. Wiros, of whose having been a native of Ireland I find no reason to doubt. (105) Even the Irish family, of which he was a member, is mentioned; for he is stated to have been the son of Cuan, son of Lugid, &c. of an ancient family settled in Corcobaschin, (in the now county of Clare) and that, from which was sprung St. Senan of Inniscatthy. (106) Wiros is said to have travelled to Rome and to have been there consecrated bishop. It is added, that on his return to Ireland he governed for a time some see (107) which he afterwards resigned for the purpose of leading a more retired life. He went to France, where he was most graciously received by Pepin Heristall, (108) who held him in great veneration and used to confess to him barefoot. Pepin assigned to him a habitation at Mons Petri, now Odilie-berg in the diocese of Liege. This was the place where St. Wiros died on an 8th of May; (109) but in consequence of its collegiate church having been transferred to Ruremond, the saint's remains were removed hither in part, and hence he is often called St. Wiros of Ruremond, while another part of them was preserved at Utrecht. (110)

(101) Colgan treats of St. Albert also at 8 January, not because he knew what was the day of his death, or even what day his memory was revered, but on account of its being assigned for St. Erard, with whom the German writers usually associate St. Albert, joining them together in their inquiries into the history of these two holy brothers. Of those writers Conrad is the only one, who making mention (Life of St. Erard, cap. 2.) of Albert, whom he calls Adalbert, seems to speak of him as not having been a brother of Erard. Colgan had no Life of this saint, but has endeavoured to make up his Acts as well as he could.

(102) This conjecture of Colgan is indeed not improbable. Albert was a name well known in Germany, and the transition to it from Ailbe, a name to which the Germans were not accustomed, was easy and natural. We find similar inflections in the names of several Irish saints and teachers, who in old times resorted to the Continent.

(103) The passages of various authors, who agree in calling Albert archbishop, or, at least, bishop of Cashel, may be seen in Colgan at Albert. But, as he remarks, there was neither an archbishop nor bishop of Cashel in Albert's times, supposing him to have flourished even as late as the eighth century. He therefore conjectures, that Albert or Ailbe might have been originally called archbishop of Munster, and, if so, that his see was Emly, the prelates of which were sometimes called archbishops. (See Not. 97. to Chap. xvii.) In this hypothesis Albert or Ailbe would have been Ailbe the second of that see. He might have been there between Conang O'Daithil, who died in 661, (see ib.) and Conamail M'Carthy, who died in 707. But as Cashel became in later times the metropolitanical see of Munster, the writers referred to supposed that Albert had been archbishop there.

(104) Conrad says (Life of Erard, cap. 2.) that Albert went with Erard from the Vosges to Bavaria, and Roderus states that Albert did not go to Rome until after he had spent some time in Germany. (Compare with Not. 97.)

(105) The Bollandists have St. Wiro at 8 May. Bollandus, who wrote the prefixed commentary was inclined to think that he might have been a native of North Britain rather than of Ireland. But in the Life, published by his continuators, the island Scotia, that is Ireland, is expressly called Wiro's country; "Scotia uber sanctorum patrum insula;" and we find it again called an island, ex. c. in the words, "apud incolas ejusdem insulac." It is there said that he imitated Patrick, Cuthbert, and Columba, the pillars of his country. And what still more proves this point, we find a bishop Wiro in various old Irish documents and calendars, who was in all appearance the same as the St. Wiro known in the continent. (See AA. SS. p. 542) Mr. Lingard says, (Angl. S. Church, ch. 13. Not. 12.) that Alcuin in the poem, De Pont. Ebor. v. 1045. calls Wiro an Anglo-Saxon. Now in said poem, which, by the bye, was not written by Alcuin (see Not. 12 to Chap. III.) there is not a word about Wiro at that verse, nor, as far as I can find, in any other part of it.

(106) AA. SS. ib.

(107) It has been supposed by some persons unacquainted with the state of Ireland in Wiro's times, that he was bishop of Dublin. Suffice it to say, that Dublin had no bishops in those days. Foreigners were very apt, since Dublin became the capital of Ireland, to assign to it some of our bishops that had removed to the Continent, of whose real sees they had no account.

(108) See Bollandus at St. Wiro. As Pepin was not invested with great power until about 680, (see Not. 100) Wiro's arrival in France must have been later than this year.

(109) The year of his death is not known. Harris says (Bishops of Dublin, at St. Wiro) that he died in 650. He took this date from a marginal note in Surius; but it is certainly a much too early one, as appears from the preceding note. Many of the dates marked in Surius's edition of the Lives of Saints are merely conjectural.

(110) Bollandus, loc. cit.

§. IX. We read in the chronicle of Marianus Scotus, at the years 674, and 675, that Ireland was then full of holy men, and that St. Dysibod, having given up his episcopal functions, went, accompanied by several persons, from Ireland to Germany. (111) He is said to have been of a noble family, and gifted with great genius. Having been raised to the episcopacy, and officiated as bishop for some years, he left his own country, Ireland, and after ten years peregrination and preaching, stopped in the diocese of Mentz. There, together with three companions, he erected a habitation and an oratory on the side of a mountain. Several persons flocking to him, particularly Benedictine monks, a monastery was established there, (112) in which the rule of St. Benedict was observed. Dysibod did not embrace it himself, as he led a stricter life than it required. Yet the monks refused to submit to any other person but him as their abbot. He is said to have died in the 81st year of his age, on an 8th of July. (113)

About the same time that St. Dysibod went to Germany there was living in the territory of Rouen an Irish monk, named Sidonias (Sedna), who formed a monastery on some ground granted to him by Theodoric, or Thierry III. king of Burgundy and Neustria. He went afterwards to Rome with St. Audeon or Ouen, archbishop of Rouen, in the year 677. Sidonius died on a 14th of September, at which day his name is marked in the calendars. His monastery became, in course of time, a cell belonging to the house of Fontanelles, and the adjoining village of St. Saens has been called from his name. (114)

(111) “Hibernia insula sanctis viris plena habetur; de qua beatus pater noster Dysibodius, episcopatu abdicato, cum plerisque sociis egressus hunc locum inhabitavit, et divinis laudibus hic se a fidelibus venerari apud Deum promeruit.” Mabillon observes (Annal. Ben. ad. 674.) that what is here said of Dysibod was perhaps inserted by Dodechin the continuator of Marianus’ chronicle. This seems very probable; for Dodechin was abbot of the monastery of St. Dysibod, and could have used the phrases, our blessed father, this place, and here, with greater propriety than Marianus, who did not belong to that establishment, although he spent his last years not far from it, as it was in the diocese of Mentz. The Life of St. Dysibod, which Surius has at 8 July, was written by the abbess St. Hildegardis, and as if by revelation, in the year 1170. Much of it is mere common place narrative.

(112) Mabillon states (Annal. Ben. ad A. 674) that this monastery was in the diocese of Mentz, and county of Spanheim, one mile distant from the monastery of Spanheim, and two from that of Creutznac.

(113) Mabillon observes, (ib.) that, according to the martyrology of Rabanus, the Natalis of St. Dysibod was celebrated in the neighbourhood of Mentz on the 6th of September. Rabanus, he adds, calls him simply a confessor, without adding the title of bishop. But his being represented as such in the chronicle of Marianus is a good reason for believing that he really was so. As to the story of his having been bishop of Dublin, it appears no where except in Wilson's Anglican martyrology. What has been remarked concerning St. Wiro (Not. 107) is applicable to this case. We may also pass by Dysibod's having been author of a tract attributed to him by Dempster. (See Ware and Harris, Writers at Disibod.)

(114) See Mabillon (ib.) and compare with Fleury, L. 39. §. 54.

§. x. The celebrated bishop and martyr St Kilian the apostle of Franconia, flourished in these times. (115) That he was a native of Ireland is universally admitted; (116) but we have no account of the part of it, to which he belonged. He was of an illustrious family, and, having embraced the monastic life, (117) is said to have governed some monastery, of which, however, I do not find any particular mention. Having distinguished himself by his sanctity and great ecclesiastical learning, he was raised to the priesthood, and afterwards to the episcopacy. (118) Notwithstanding his being very much beloved by his clergy and people, a wish for attaining a greater degree of perfection induced him to visit foreign parts, and accordingly taking with him some companions, among whom are named Coloman (119) a priest and Totnan a deacon, he went over to the continent and proceeded on his journey until he arrived at Wurtzburg in Franconia. Liking the situation, he determined on fixing his abode there ; but, being anxious to preach the Gospel to the people of that country, who were still pagans, he thought it necessary to apply to the Holy see for permission to do so, hoping that the then Pope, John V. would not refuse it to him. (120) On his arrival at Rome he found that John was dead, but was very kindly received by his successor Conon. This occurred either late in the year 686, or early in 687. (121) Conon finding him well qualified for the mission both by the purity of his faith and his learning, gave him every requisite faculty for that purpose. (122) Kilian then returned to Wurtzburg, accompanied by Coloman and Totnan, who assisted him in his apostolical exertions. He was fortunate enough to convert and baptize Gozbert, duke of that country, whose conversion was followed by that of a great number of his subjects. Geilana, to whom Gozbert was married, had been the wife of his brother. Although Kilian disapproved of his keeping her as his wife, he thought it advisable to be silent on this point, until Gozbert should be well confirmed in the Christian faith. The time being come when Kilian found the duke fit for receiving further instruction, he told him that one thing was still requisite for his being quite acceptable in the sight of God, viz. that he should part with Geilana, whereas their marriage was unlawful. Gozbert answered, that this was the most difficult point as yet proposed to him by Kilian ; but that, as he had already renounced many things for the love of God, he would also quit Geilana, although she was very dear to him ; adding however, that, being then hurried to proceed on a military expedition, he should defer until his return the arrangement and execution of his design. After his departure Geilana, who was informed of what had passed between him and Kilian, became determined on revenge, and seizing on a convenient opportunity sent at night one of her men (123) to put him and his companions to death. Kilian, Coloman, and Totnan were singing the praises of the Lord, when the assassin arrived. They made no resistance, Kilian exhorting his brethren to receive the wished for crown of martyrdom, and were immediately beheaded. During the same night their remains were hastily thrown into the ground, together with their clothes and pontifical ornaments, the sacred books, cross, &c. This martyrdom occurred in 689 on the 8th of July, at which day the names of St. Kilian and his companions are marked in the Roman and other martyrologies, and Kilian is particularly revered at Wurtzburg as its patron saint. (124)

When Gozbert returned to Wurtzburg, he inquired for the servants of God. Geilana said that she did not know what was become of them. But the whole matter was soon discovered; for the assassin, running about in all directions, complained that Kilian was burning him with a dreadful fire. Gosbert, calling together his Christian subjects, asked of them how that unhappy man should be treated. A person present at the meeting, who had been suborned by Geilana, proposed that he should be left at liberty, for the purpose of trying whether the God of the Christians would avenge the death of the martyr, which if he do not, we will, said this wiseacre, worship the great Diana as our forefathers have done. This proposal was agreed to; and the assassin, being let loose, got into a phrenzy and tore himself with his teeth until he expired. It is added that Geilana was seized with an evil spirit, which tormented her so much, that she died soon after. The remains of the holy martyrs were found in 752

(125) by St. Burchard, bishop of Wurtzburg, and removed by him to a great church, which he had erected in that city.

(115) Canisius has published (Antiq. lect. Tom. 4. al. Tom. 3. part. 1.) two Lives of St. Kilian; one rather large, the author of which he conjectured to be Egilward a monk of St Burchard's monastery near Wurtzburg, who lived, according to some writers, in the 11th century; the other shorter, but more exact, by an unknown author. The former is also in Surius (at 8 July) and has been republished by Messingham (Florilegium, &c.) and others; the latter was preferred for republication in the Acta Bened. Sec. 2. p. 991 particularly as various interpolations have been foisted into the larger one.

(116) It would be useless to collect the many testimonies, that might be adduced on this point. In the large Life Kilian's country is thus described; "Scotia, quae et Hibernia dicitur, insula est maris oceani. foecunda quidam glebis, sed sanctissimis clarior viris; ex quibus Columbano gaudet Italia, Gallo dicitur Aleman-nia, Kiliano Teutonica nobilitatur Francia." Rabanus and Notker, in their martyrologies, say that he came from Hibernia Scotorum insula; Marianus Scotus has Hibernia insula. These and other passages to the same purpose, such as from Bellarmine, Serarius, &c. may be seen in Messingham, Floril. p. 324. seqq. Among the more modern writers it is sufficient to mention Mabillon and Fleury.

(117) It is said in St. Kilian's Office in the Benedictine breviary, that the monastery in which he professed the monastic rule was that of Hy. Trithemius also calls him a monk of Hy, monachus Huensis in Hibernia; but this appears to be only conjectural. According to the large Life Kilian could not have been a monk of Hy; for it is stated that he became superior of the very monastery, in which he had made his profession. Now it is well known that he was never abbot of Hy. Trithemius' meaning was perhaps, that Kilian belonged to the order of Hy, although living in Ireland. It is odd, that Burke (Office of St. Kilian) makes him a Benedictine, which, omitting other observations, he could not have been, were he of the order of Hy.

(118) According to the short Life Kilian was a bishop before he left Ireland. And in an old chronicle, quoted by the abbot Thadaeus of Ratisbon (see Messingham, Floril. p. 324.) he is spoken of as a bishop, prior to his setting out for the Continent. This statement has been followed by Fleury, L. 40. §. 38. But, as will be seen lower down, other accounts represent him as having been consecrated bishop at Rome.

(119) In some documents, relative to St. Kilian, Coloman is erroneously called Colonat.

(120) At this part of Kilian's transactions the author of the large Life, or rather some interpolater, introduces the fable of Ireland having been under an apostolical censure on account of the Pelagian heresy, and accordingly of the necessity Kilian was under of going to Rome for the purpose of being absolved from it. To what has been already observed on this subject (Not. 95 to Chap. xv.) I shall here add, that there is not the least allusion to such a censure in the other and more correct Life of Kilian; nor among the old authors, ex. c. Rabanus, Notker, Marianus, Scotus, &c. some of whom mention his having got permission to preach from the Holy see, is there a word about this story of Irish Pelagianism. Nothing relative to any general censure or interdict laid upon Ireland appears in Bede, and the only charge brought forward, yet still unaccompanied by ecclesiastical censure, against any considerable portion of the Irish people, was on the ground of their Paschal and tonsural observances. How could the people or clergy of Ireland be supposed to lie under an interdict, while such crowds of Irishmen were, as was well known at Rome, instructing the continental nations; while Furse, Foillan, Livinus, Arbogast, Florentius, Wiro, &c. preached the Gospel to them without any previous absolution from censures? National interdicts, or general censures of the kind alluded to, were scarcely known at that period; nor is there any historian or canonist, who, in his inquiries into the origin of interdicts, has ever alleged this pretended Irish one as a specimen of them. (See Fleury Instit. au Droit, &c. Part 3. chap. 21.) I shall waste no further time on this silly fable, except to observe that the passage, in which it is contained, is to all appearance an interpolation.

(121) The death of John V. and the accession of Conon have been assigned by some writers to 687; but Pagi (Critica, &c. ad

A. 687.) maintains that John died in 686, and was succeeded by Conon in the same year on the 21st of October.

(122) In the large Life it is said that Conon raised Kilian to the prelacy, in praesulatus officium constituit; so that he might exercise functions peculiar to bishops. The author's meaning seems indeed to be, that Kilian was consecrated bishop by Conon, and so it has been understood by several writers. This is very probably a mistake, founded on the circumstance of Kilian having received from the Pope certain extraordinary powers, with which bishops are not usually invested, such as that of erecting episcopal sees, and other privileges requisite in the case of a new mission, such in short as those which Gregory the great had granted to Augustin towards the formation of churches in England. His having obtained such privileges at Rome might have easily led to the supposition, that it was there also that he was consecrated. But we have better authority for believing, that Kilian was a bishop before he left Ireland. (See Not. 118.)

(123) Some accounts state, that Geilana sent two assassins. This is a matter of no consequence. It is somewhat singular, that Rabanus and Notker, in opposition to every other account, attribute the order for murdering Kilian, &c. to Gozbert.

(124) Although St. Kilian is called the patron of Wurtzburg, Mabillon, (at Kilian's Life, Acta Ben. Sec. 2.) Fleury, (L. 40. §. 38) and Basnage (Preface to Kilian's Acts in his edition of Canisius, Tom. 3. Part. 1.) deny that he was bishop of that city, as its see was not established until many years later in the eighth century. Colgan had said (AA. SS. p. 331.) that, although he was bishop of all Franconia, he was not of Wurtzburg. Yet Marianus Scotus (ad. A. 687) expressly calls him bishop of Wurtzburg, and so he is named in the chronicles of Sigebert and Rhegino, and by many other writers, some of whom, ex. c. Notker, add that he was its first bishop. This question is easily settled; for it is not doubted by any one, that Kilian was a bishop, nor that, although he preached and exercised episcopal functions throughout Franconia, his chief residence was at Wurtzburg. He was not indeed immediately succeeded by any bishop there; whereas from the time of his martyrdom about fifty years elapsed until St. Burchard was appointed bishop of that city. But had this interval not taken place, and if there had been a bishop fixed there immediately after the martyrdom, Kilian would have been universally called bishop of Wurtzburg and its first bishop. What is the reason why some old sees are considered as fixed and regular in preference to places, in which bishops have presided? It is no other than that in the former there has been an uninterrupted succession of bishops, which was not the case with regard to the latter. The question therefore is one of mere words, and it is an affectation of canonistical precision to say, that St. Kilian was not bishop of Wurtzburg. He lived there not as a hermit or in a retired manner, as, for instance, St. Erard had at Ratisbon, but as a bishop actively employed in practising episcopal duties; and this was surely enough to authorize the old writers, who treat of him, to give him the title of bishop of Wurtzburg, and first bishop of that see, whereas no bishop had ever resided there before him. Serarius observes, (Notes to St Kilian's Life ap. Messingham, Floril, &c. p. 328.) that the ecclesiastical monuments of Wurtzburg point him out as its bishop, and joins those, who call him its first bishop. St. Kilian is spoken of as also an author, but, I suspect, on weak grounds. (See Ware and Harris, Writers at Kilian.)

(125) See Pagi, Critica, &c. ad A. 689. and Colgan, AA. SS. at 14 February, where he treats of the translation of the remains of St. Kilian and companions.

§. XI. St. Cataldus or Cathaldus, (126) whose history has been already touched upon, (127) flourished, I believe, in these times, that is, in the latter half of the seventh century. It has been strangely supposed that he lived in the second; (128) but from the accounts, however confused and mixed with fables, that are given of his transactions, it is evident, that he must have lived at a much later period. As to his having been a native of Ireland, there can be no question; (129) and Munster is mentioned as the province, to which he belonged. (130) The very town, in which he was born, is spoken of; some say it was Raschau, and others Catandum, (131) both which in our times can scarcely be guessed at, except that they were, particularly the latter, supposed to have been not far distant from Lismore.

It is said that his father was named Euchus (Echu), and his mother Achlenna, or Athena. He studied at Lismore, where after some time he became a professor. (132) His lectures are stated to have been attended by a great number of students from various countries. (133) The times, in which Cataldus was thus employed, cannot be precisely ascertained; but they were undoubtedly later by several years than 633, about which time the Lismore establishment was founded by St. Carthag. (134) Cataldus, besides instructing others, edified them by his extraordinary piety. He is said to have erected a church at Lismore in honour of the Blessed Virgin mother of God. (135) It is added, that some how or other he incurred the displeasure of a king, (136) who ordered him to be thrown into a dungeon. The king soon repented of this violent measure, and, to make some amends for the injury Cataldus had sustained, is stated to have made him a grant of a district, which had belonged to a duke or chieftain recently dead, whose name was Meltridis. (137) This must be understood with such limitations as the discipline of those times, particularly in the Irish church, required, and can mean no more than that the king assigned to him some land for endowing a church at Rachau, of which place Cataldus was immediately appointed bishop. (138) This was probably about the year 670. (139) Having governed that see for some time he is said to have gone on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and, on his preparing to return thence to Ireland, to have been admonished in a vision to proceed to Tarentum. According to certain strange stories he found, on his arrival in that city, almost all the inhabitants immersed in paganism; (140) but this monstrous assumption is quite irreconcilable with the times of St. Cataldus. It is, however, very probable that vices, although not amounting to idolatry, prevailed there at that period, in consequence of the revolutions and vicissitudes of that country. (141) The saint, having landed at some distance from the city, cured on his way to it a woman, who had been deaf and dumb, and on entering the city relieved a man from blindness. He was immediately taken notice of, and preaching to the inhabitants was listened to with great attention. Not long after he was unanimously appointed to the see of Tarentum, which he governed for many years with great wisdom and zeal. The year of his death is not known; but it appears that the day was an 8th of March. (142) It would be unnecessary to enlarge on the extraordinary veneration, in which this saint is held at Tarentum and elsewhere, and on the great number of miracles, which are said to have been wrought at his tomb. (143) A curious prophecy relative to the state of the kingdom of Naples about the latter end of the 15th century, and the times of Ferdinand of Arragon, the French invasion, &c. has been attributed to St. Cataldus; but it is evidently a forgery made up on the occasion of those troubles, and has nothing to do with the real history of the saint. (144)

St. Donatus, a brother of Cataldus, is reckoned among the bishops of Lupiae, or Aletium, now Lecce, (145) a noble city of the kingdom of Naples. It is said, that these holy brothers lived together as hermits for some time near a small town, now called San Cataldo. (146) Concerning St. Donatus I can find nothing further, unless we should admit the fiction of Dempster that he was author of one or two books. (147)

(126) The name is spelled in both these ways. The original name of this saint was, as Colgan observes, Cathal, or Cathald, an appellation very common in Ireland, now softened into Cahal or Cahill. According to our pronunciation of the letter t, the old Irish would not have written Catald.

(127) Chap. i. §. 3. Colgan, omitting the Cataldias or poetical Life of St. Catalaus by Bonaventure Moroni, has published (at 8 March) the prose Life in two books by his brother Bartholomew, besides a short account of him from Petrus de Natalibus, and an office of St. Cataldus from the breviary of Tarentum or Taranto. Usher treats largely of this saint, Prim. p. 751. seqq. The account given of him by the Bollandists is at the 10th of May, the festival of his Invention and Translation.

(128) John Juvenis says, in the preface to his History of Tarentum, that Cataldus was at Tarentum in the year 160, but elsewhere he places his arrival there in 166. According to the Life by Barth. Maroni his entry into Tarentum was about 170. Other writers assign his times to about 500. (See Usher, p. 759, and Colgan, AA. SS. p. 560.) Ughelli, in his account of St. Cataldus, (Italia Sacra, ad Tarentini Archiep.) merely relates the stories of Juvenis and Petr. de Natalibus. They are not worth the trouble of refutation.

(129) Dempster, with his usual effrontery, pretended that Cataldus was born in Scotland. His lies and contradictions on this subject have been well exposed by Usher (p. 753.) and Colgan (AA. SS. p. 561.) The Bollandists, while they admit that every circumstance tends to show, that Cataldus was a native of Ireland, yet, as if to display their ingenuity, throw out a conjecture that he might have been from Ragusa. And why? Because it had been said that the name of the place, in which he was born, was Rachau, and that he was sometimes called Cataldus Rachau. Then they ask; might not Rachau have been the same as Rausium or Ragusium? But those, who thought that Rachau was the birth-place of Cataldus, say that it was situated in Munster in Ireland; and as to Ragusa, the Bollandists themselves observe, that Ragusa did not exist until it was formed out of the ruins of Epidaurus, which had been destroyed in the 7th century. Not only the Maroni in their Lives of Cataldus, but Juvenis, Petrus a Natalibus, Philip Ferrarius, and many other writers, besides various martyrologies, and Offices of St. Cataldus, all agree in making him a native of Ireland. (See Usher and Colgan, loc. cit.) And it is to be observed, that in every passage relative to this point his country is called Hibernia, or the island Hibernia, the equivocal name of Scotia not being even once used.

(130) Barth. Maroni (Life, &c. L. 1. c. 1.) calls it Mononia, for which Colgan has justly substituted Momonnia. In some old

Offices of St. Cataldus it is written Numenia, which has been corrected in a Roman edition into Mononia. (See Usher, p. 754.)

(131) According to the Office ap. Colgan, and others referred to by Usher, (ib.) with which Juvenis agrees, the saint's native town was Catandum. Maroni says, (loc. cit.) that by some he was made a native of Rachau, but observes that the former is the more probable opinion, and that the latter was seemingly founded only on the saint's being surnamed Rachau, which, he adds, ought to be understood not as if Cataldus had been born there, but as relative to his having been bishop of Rachau. Colgan has some conjectures as to the situation of these places; but they are far from satisfactory. With regard to Catandum, his supposing (AA. SS. p. 544.) that it might have been a Baile-Cathal, or Cathel's-town, in the county of Tipperary might be admitted, were it called, as indeed it is by P. de Natalibus, Cataldus, so as that it had the same name as the saint. There is a place called Ballycahill in said county at the borders of the baronies of Kilnemauna and Kinelogurty. But, besides its being far distant from Lismore, the name of the saint's native spot is usually written Catandum. As to Rachau, which, Morani says, was formerly a city of some note in Munster, Colgan thought the real name was Rathan, observing that there were three places so called in the Nandesi country, in which Lismore is situated, and that one of them is now called Sen-Rathan, or Old Rathan. This must, I am sure, be the same as Shanraghan in the barony of Iffa, county of Tipperary. According to the Irish sound of th, Rathan is the same as Raghan or Rahan. It is really probable that Shanraghan or Old Rathan is the place meant by Rachau, particularly as it is within a short distance of Lismore, not far from which Rachau is represented to have been situated. If, instead of Rachau, we should read Rachan, (u and n being often interchanged in MSS.) the probability would be still greater. Although Colgan's conjecture as to Rathan for Rachau is worthy of attention, yet Burke, when republishing (Officia propria, &c.) the Office of St. Cataldus from the AA. SS. ought not to have thrust into the text Rathan, instead of Rachau, which Colgan has preserved. This is not the only alteration he has made in said Office motu proprio, and without any sufficient authority.

(132) Life by Barth. Moroni, L. I. c. 4. and Office.

(133) In the Office we read; “Adolescens (Cataldus) liberalibus disciplinis eruditus ad eam brevi doctrinae excellentiam pervenit, ut ad ipsum audiendum Galli, Angli, Scoti, Theutones, aliique finitimarum aliarum regionum quamplurimi Lesmoriam convenirent.” Bonaventure Moroni has described this conflux in the following verses;

“Undique conveniunt proceres, quos dulce trahebat
Discendi studium, maior num cognita virtus,
An laudata foret. Celeres vastissima Rheni
Jam vada Teutonici, jam deseruere Sicambri:
Mittit ab extremo gelidos Aquilone Boemos
Albis, et Arverni coeunt, Batavique frequentes,
Et quicumque colunt alta sub rupe Gebennas.
Non omnes prospectat Arar Rhodanique fluenta
Helvetios; multos desiderat ultima Thule.
Certatim hi properant diverso tramite ad urbem
Lesmoriam, juvenis primos ubi transigit annos.”

(See Usher, p. 755.)

(134) See Chap. xiv. §. 14. Not few years must have elapsed from the foundation of Lismore until Cataldus began to teach there. He had studied himself in that school and spent some years at it, before he became qualified to be a professor. In his time Lismore was well known in foreign countries, which its reputation could not have reached all of a sudden.

(135) Life, cap. 4. Office, &c. Colgan observes, (AA. SS. p. 555.) that among eight churches, that were in Lismore in his time, there was one under said title.

(136) P. de Natalibus makes him king of all Ireland. But, if there be any truth in the matter, he must have been rather a king of Munster. The same author as well as Moroni and others assign a very silly cause, not worth mentioning, for the king's displeasure.

(137) It can scarcely be doubted that Meltridis, as he is called by the Italian writers, was the same person as Moelochtride, a chieftain of Nandesi, who had granted to St. Carthagh the ground for his monastery of Lismore. (See Chap. xiv. §. 14.) There is every reason to think, that Moelochtride survived St. Carthagh, who died in 637, and, it is highly probable, even his own so Bran-finn, who was killed in 666. (See Colgan, AA. SS. p. 561.) Now supposing that he lived until about 670, we have the period, at which Cataldus was raised to the episcopacy. The name Mel-tridis has been mistaken by some writers as that of the Duke's territory. There was no principality so called in Ireland.

(138) In the saint's Life, &c. it is ridiculously stated that, having obtained this wonderful grant of a whole principality, he divided it into twelve bishoprics, and raised Rachau to the rank of an archiepiscopal see. Burke, perceiving the absurdity of this fable, has, in his edition of the Office, changed the bishoprics into parishes and the archiepiscopate into a simple bishopric.

(139) See Not. 137.

(140) This story might agree well enough with the supposition of Moroni and others, that St. Cataldus arrived at Tarentum about the year 170. But as the hypothesis is false, so are its concomitant parts. It is odd, that Burke has retained this tale, whereas he lays down, erroneously indeed, that the saint died about 492. How could he have imagined, that Tarentum, or any other city of southern Italy, was at that period almost devoid of Christians?

(141) The Goths had been driven out of Tarentum in the sixth century by the Greeks, who in their turn were expelled by the Lombards under Romoald, duke of Beneventum. (See Paulus diaconus, De Gestis Langobard. L. 6. c. 1.) According to Bollandus and Muratori, (Rer. Ital. Scriptor. Tom. 1. p. 490.) Romoald ruled the dutchy of Beneventum from 671 to 687. It was, I think, during this interval that St. Cataldus arrived at Tarentum.

(142) Some writers say it was on 8th of May; but the archives of the church of Tarentum and other authorities have the 8th of March. (See AA. SS. p. 559.)

(143) The second book, which is rather large, of Barth. Moroni's work is full of accounts of these miracles.

(144) Whoever wishes to know more about this pretended prophecy may consult the Life by Barth. Moroni, L. 1. and Ware and Harris, Writers at Cataldus. Dempster, in his usual way, took it into his head to ascribe to him also a Book of Homilies.

(145) See Ughelli, (Italia Sac. ad Aletini sive Lupienses Episcopi) who quotes J. Ant. Ferrara and Jul. Caes. Infantinus for Donatus having been bishop of that city. Following the fable of Cataldus having been at Tarentum in the second century, he accordingly assigns his brother Donatus to the same period. He speaks of Lupiae and Aletium as one and the same place; but Baudrand (Lexic. Geogr. at Lupiae) states that the ancient Lupiae was a maritime town some miles distant from Aletium, or Lecce, and that is now called La Rocca, although, as he observes, others think that it was the same as San Cataldo, likewise at some miles distant from Lecce. Be this as it may, the see, named Lupiensis, is now at Lecce. Barth. Moroni (Life of St. Cataldus, L. 1. c. 11.) makes mention of Donatus as being said to have been the first bishop of Lupiae and a brother of St. Cataldus. Juvenis also relates the same tradition; (see Usher, p. 760.) and we find it likewise in Philip Ferrarius (Catalog. &c. at 22 October). As to the name, Donatus, no object can be derived from it; for the Irish used to latinize Donagh into Donatus.

(146) Moroni, ib. Juvenis has swelled the time of this eremitical life up to 14 years, observing that San Cataldo lies within ten miles of Otranto. (Usher, ib.)

(147) See Usher, ib.

§. XII. While this swarm of holy and learned men were teaching and edifying foreign nations, some persons, distinguished for sanctity or ecclesiastical rank, died in Ireland. Maldozar, bishop of Ferns, the immediate successor of Tuenoc, (148) departed this life in 677, and was succeeded by Dirath, who held that see until 691. (149) In the same year died a St. Coman or Comman, whose memory was revered on the 18th of March, and who is called a bishop in various Irish calendars, but of what see is not mentioned. (150) Another Coman, surnamed of Ferns, and erroneously supposed by some to have been bishop there, (151) died in the following year 678. (152) To this year is assigned the death of Colman abbot of Clonmacnois, (153) as also that of Kennfael, abbot of Bangor, whose memory was revered on the 8th of said month. (154)

The holy virgin St. Cera, alias Chier, died in 680. (155) She is said to have been the daughter of one Duibhre, and of an illustrious family of Muskerry in the now county of Cork. It is supposed that she was the St. Chier, who, together with five other virgins, applied to St. Fintan Munnu, when residing in Heli (Ely O'Carrol) for a situation to establish a nunnery, and to whom he is said to have assigned the place, where he had lived himself, afterwards called Tech-telle. (156) That St. Cera spent some time in this place I do not find any sufficient reason for denying; (157) but it is very doubtful whether she got it from Fintan Munnu, or whether he had ever resided there. (158) How long she remained in Heli we are not informed. Returning thence to her own country she founded a nunnery, called, from her name, Killchree, now Kilcrea, (159) a few miles S. W. from the city of Cork, which she governed until her death. The reputation of this saint was very great, and her festival was kept at Kilcrea not only on the 5th of January, the anniversary of her decease, but likewise on the 16th of October, as a day of commemoration. Russin, son of Lappain, a comorban, or successor of St. Barr of Cork, and who was in all probability a bishop, departed this life in 685. (686) (160)

St. Ossan, whose name is in the Irish calendars at 17 February, in some of which he is called a bishop, died in 686 (687). He is said to have been a descendant of king Leogaire; and his memory was revered at Rath-ossain, a place named from him near the west gate of Trim. (161) The death of St. Becan of Clonard is assigned to the 16th of April, A. D. 687 (688). (162) I do not find him stiled bishop or abbot ; but he was probably either one or the other.

(148) See Chap. xvii. §. 7.

(149) Four Masters and Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 564. According to their practice of anticipating the Christian era, they assign the demise of Maldogar to 676, and that of Dirath to 690.

(150) See Not. 36. to Chap. xvii. (151) See ib.

(152) Usher, p. 968, and Ind. Chron.

(153) Archdall at Clonmacnois. (154) Idem at Bangor.

(155) Colgan, treating of this saint at 5 January, has, from the Irish annals, A. 679. i. e. 680 for her death.

(156) Archdall places Tech-Telle or Teaghtelle in the county of Westmeath, because Colgan says that, from having been in Heli, it afterwards was comprized in the western Meath. But by western Meath Colgan, and the older writers whom he quotes, understood not only the present Westmeath, but likewise the King's county, in which Tech-Telle ought to be placed, whereas no part of Heli ever extended as far as what is now called Westmeath. Tech-Telle, or the house of Telle, got its name from St. Telle, son of Segen, who was contemporary with Fintan Munnu, and accordingly lived in the early part of the seventh century ; and whose memory was revered on the 25th of June. (See AA. SS. p. 15. and 713.) Archdall has for this saint another Teach-Telle at Teltown in the county of East Meath. And why? Because Colgan, speaking of him (at p. 713 ib.) places Teach-Telle in Midia, or Meath in general. But he had elsewhere (p. 15.) observed, that the part of Midia, in which Teach-Telle lay, was the western ; and we have just seen that it was in the tract now called the King's county. It is plain, on comparing the passages of Colgan, that he knew of only one Teach-Telle. As to Teltown, a place not far from Kells to the East, there is no reason to think that it owes its name to any saint, and it is more than probable that it is the same, at least in part, as the ancient Tailten, celebrated for the sports held there in former times. (See Not. 6. to Chap. v.)

(157) She is stated to have been in that place before it was occupied by St. Telle. The only difficulty is that Telle flourished before the death, in 635, of Fintan Munnu. But St. Cera seems to have been young at the time she is said to have been there.

Supposing that this was about 625, her having lived until 680 contains nothing contradictory or unchronological.

(158) See Not. 78. to Chap. xv.

(159) Colgan, in the Acts of this saint, which he has endeavoured to patch up, pretends that she had founded the nunnery of Kilcrea, before she went to Heli. The only reason, that appears for this position, is that he thought, and indeed very strangely, that she was the St. Ciara who is mentioned, in the Life of St. Brendan of Clonfert, as a holy virgin, contemporary with him, and living in Muscrighe Thire. He confounded Muscrighe Thire with the Muskerry of Cork, not recollecting, as he often does elsewhere, that the former was the tract now called Lower Ormond in Tipperary, whereas the latter was known by the name of Muscrighe Mitine. This is not the worst part of his hypothesis; for he knew that St. Brendan was dead since 577. And yet he would fain make us believe that a person, who lived until 680, was a distinguished saint in his days. To enable us to swallow this anachronism, he says she might have reached the age of 130. Harris was so led astray by this stuff, that he assigned the foundation of Kilcrea to the sixth century. Archdall says nothing (at Kilcrea) about the time of this foundation; but (at Teachtelle) he introduces St. Cera building an abbey, as he calls it at Teachtelle, before the year 576. Passing by these absurdities, I shall only add that, if there was a St. Ciara or Cera in Brendan's time, she was different from the one of Kilcrea, and that she belonged to Lower Ormond. Colgan observes that, besides the St. Cera of Kilcrea, three other holy virgins of the same name are mentioned in the Irish calendars.

(160) 4 Masters, and Colgan, AA. SS. p. 150. Ware has not Russin among the bishops of Cork, but Harris has.

(161) See Colgan, AA. SS. p. 366.

(162) Ib. p. 406. As the date 687 is taken from the 4 Masters, it may be concluded that it was the same as 688. Yet Ware and Harris (at Bishops of Meath) have retained 687.

§. XIII. Segen, archbishop of Armagh, having held that see for 27 years, (163) died on the 24th May, A. 688. (164) and was succeeded by Flan Febhla, son of Scanlan, whose incumbency lasted for the same number years. Dirath, bishop of Ferns, whose death is assigned to 691, had for successor St. Moling, (165) who is said to have been otherwise called Dayrchell. (166) He was a native of Hykinselagh, in Leinster, (167) and his genealogy has been traced to the royal house of that province. (168) According to some accounts he was a disciple of St. Maidoc of Ferns. If so, he must have been very young at that time, as St. Maidoc died, at the latest, in 632. Having embraced the monastic life, he founded a monastery at Aghacainid, or, as called from his name, Tegh-Moling, now St. Mullen's, near the Barrow in the county of Carlow. The precise time of this foundation is not known, but it was probably about the middle of the seventh century. (169) He governed this establishment for many years, part of which he is stated to have spent at Glendaloch, until he was raised to the see of Ferns in 691. (170) We find him under the title of archbishop of Ferns, inasmuch as the sort of precedency, which king Bran-dubh had procured for that see, still continued annexed to it. (171) In the year 693 he induced Finnacta, the monarch of Ireland, to exempt the province of Leinster from the tribute of oxen, with which it had been burdened from a very long period of time. (172) Some prophecies, relative to the kings and affairs of Ireland, have been attributed to St. Moling. (173). He died on the 17th of June, 697, (174) and has been considered as one of the principal saints of Leinster. (175) His successor at Ferns was, it appears, the bishop and abbot Killen, who lived until 714. (176)

(163) See Chap. xvii. §. 7.

(164) Ware and Harris (Bishops at Armagh). Colgan has from the martyrology of Donegall, A. 687, i. e. 688. Harris has strangely misrepresented his words (Tr. Th. p. 294) on this point, stating that he places Segen's death in 686, in consequence of his having followed a faulty copy of the Psalter of Cashel.

Now the fact is quite the reverse. Colgan found the date 686 (687) in the 4 Masters, but preferred that of 687 (688); and the reason he assigns for this preference is, that in the catalogue of the archbishops of Armagh, taken from the Psalter of Cashel, 27 years are allowed for the incumbency of Segen. Thence he concludes that, as Segen became archbishop in 660 (661), his death ought to be placed in 687 (688). So far then from complaining of a faulty copy Harris ought to have told his readers, that one of the chief authorities for the date 688 assigned by Ware, and, before him, in substance by Colgan, is that very Cashel catalogue, which may be seen, ib. p. 292.

(165) Usher (Ind. Chron. ad A. 670.) calls St. Moling second bishop or archbishop of Ferns. This is a mistake, which he would have avoided, had he not published his primordia before Colgan's works appeared, in which the true succession of the prelates of that see is to be found (See AA. SS. p. 223. and Tr. Th. p. 564.) It is strange that Ware, notwithstanding his having these works before his eyes, followed Usher's mistake. He seems to have misunderstood a passage of St. Moling's Life, in which we read that, being conducted to Ferns, he was appointed archbishop of the see of St. Maidoc. It adds, that it had been determined by Bran-dubh, king of Leinster, that the archiepiscopacy of that province should be annexed to Ferns (See Usher, p. 864.) Ware perhaps imagined, that Bran-dubh was still alive, when Moling was raised to the see, and might have been thus induced to place him there next after Maidoc, who died in 632. But Bran-dubh was dead since 602. (See Chap. xiv. §. 10.) But, as I have not the Life of St. Moling, which Ware had, I will not deny that there may be something else in it, upon which he founded his opinion. Yet I find that Colgan, who also had a copy of it, reckons several bishops of Ferns between him and Maidoc, without even hinting that in said Life he is any wise spoken of as Maidoc's next successor. According to Colgan, Maidoc was succeeded immediately by Mochua Luachra. (See Chap. xvii. §. 7.) Yet he observes (AA. SS. p. 219.) that in an Irish Life of St. Maidoc this Mochua has been confounded with St. Moling. Colgan proves that this is a palpable error. In the first place they were from different parts of Ireland. Moling was a native of Leinster, and Mochua of Munster. 2. Mochua died in 652

(653), and Moling in 697. Next we find their names marked at different days in the calendars; that of Moling being at 17 June, whereas Mochua's is at the 22d of said month. That Mochua was the immediate successor of St. Maidoc is evident from what is related in this saint's Life, cap. 37. It is there stated, that St. Maidoc, being about to cross a certain ford, said to his charioteer that the person, who would open for them the entrance to it, would sit in his see after himself. A number of students, among whom was Mochu, as he was afterwards called, were at that time amusing themselves near the ford, when on the saint's coming up Mochua ran and opened the passage to it. He then with great humility said to St. Maidoc; "O holy man of God, I wish to go along with you and to live under your discipline." The saint asking him whence he was, and what was his name, he answered; "I am from Munster, and of the people who inhabit Luachra, and my name is Cronan. The saint then said; "Henceforth you shall be called Mochua Luachra, (my Chua or Cronan, the names being the same) come then and follow me." Accordingly Mochua went off with St. Maidoc, and remained with him as long as the saint lived. His progress in piety and learning was so great, that St. Maidoc appointed him as his successor to the see of Ferns. We have already seen, (Not. 84. to Chap. vi. and Not. 6. to Chap. xi.) that Luachra was a territory comprized in the now county of Limerick, and probably stretching into Kerry. Mochua is sometimes called Dachua; but as Colgan observes, there is no difference between these names.

(166) Ware, Bishops at Ferns, and Writers, L. 1. c. 13. at 15.

(167) Ware, ib.

(168) See AA. SS. p. 219. Colgan observes that the mother of St. Moling was from Luachra; and this he assigns as the reason for his being sometimes named Moling Luachra.

(169) Harris was grossly mistaken (Monasteries) in assigning this foundation to the sixth century. How could he have imagined that St. Moling, whom he admits to have lived until 697, had been an abbot before 600!

(170) In consequence of following the erroneous hypothesis of St. Moling having been the second bishop of Ferns, Ware assigns his accession to A. D. 632. If this were true, his incumbency would have been an extraordinary long one, whereas, according to Ware himself, he did not die until 697. But how account for that see having been held in the interval by Mochua Luachra, Tuenoc, &c.? To shove off this difficulty, Ware tells us that St. Moling had resigned the see long before his death. Where he found this information I cannot discover, nor could he, I believe, have adduced any good authority for it. He thought, however, that such must have been the case, as otherwise it would be impossible to reconcile the accession of St. Moling in 632 and his death in 697 with the fact of there having been four other bishops of Ferns in the mean time.

(171) See Not 135. to Chap. xiv.

(172) See O'Flaherty, Ogygia, Part 3. cap. 56.

(173) Ware and Harris, Writers.

(174) The 4 Masters (ap. Colgan, AA. SS. p. 223) have A. 696. i. e. 697.

(175) Ib. p. 610.

(176) See ib. p. 223.

§. xiv. In these times several zealous and learned English ecclesiastics, who had studied in Ireland and there practised the monastic life, undertook missions to the continent, which were set on foot chiefly by St. Ecgberet, or Egbert. (177) This holy man intended to reach Friesland, by sailing round Great Britain, for the purpose of preaching the Gospel in that country; but, in consequence of a violent storm, which, before he embarked, drove the ship on shore, and conceiving that he was ordered by the Almighty to proceed to the monasteries of Columbkil's institution, he desisted from his enterprize, and remained in Ireland. In his stead Vickberet, who was to be a companion of his, and who also had spent many years in Ireland, undertook it in 690, and preached for two years in Friesland, but with so little advantage that he returned to his retreat in Ireland. (178) St. Egbert, still not despairing of success, appointed to that mission Willibrord or Vilbrord, a very holy priest, who was then in Ireland, where he had been for twelve years, (179) and gave him eleven companions, (180) the most celebrated of whom was Suidberet. Having sailed from Ireland in the year 692, (181) they preached with great success in Friesland, being protected by Pepin Heristall, who had conquered part of that country from its duke Rathbod. (182) About the same time, two English priests, both of whom happened to be called Herwald, and who had lived many years in Ireland, went thence on a mission to the country of the old Saxons in the North of Germany; but, soon after their arrival there, they were put to death. (183)

Adamnan, abbot of Hy, who had come to Ireland in 692 (184) on a visitation of the monasteries subject to his jurisdiction, returned to it in 697. (185) It must have been on this occasion that the synod, called that of Flan Febhla, archbishop of Armagh, and Adamnan, was held. (186) There are extant certain decrees, usually termed the Canons of Adamnan, and which are chiefly relative to some meats improper for food, together with a prohibition of eating such of them as contain blood. It is said that they were passed in this synod; (187) but it can scarcely be supposed, that its labours were confined to matters of such little consequence as these Canons are relative to.

(177) See above Not. 51.

(178) Bede, L. 5. c. 9. and Fleury, L. 40. §. 47.

(179) See Alcuin's Life of St. Willibrord, and Colgan, AA. SS. p. 433.

(180) Bede, L. 5. c. 10. This number of twelve missionaries was fixed upon in imitation of several Irish saints, who, when proceeding on missions, took along with them twelve assistants, following the example of our Saviour, who appointed twelve apostles. Thus Columbkil was accompanied to Hy by twelve persons, and Columbanus took with him the same number to France. Several other instances of this practice are mentioned by Colgan. AA. SS. p. 436. In like manner Egbert, the framer and director of the Frisian mission, sent his twelve co-operators to that country.

(181) See Smith's Notes to Bede, L. 5. c. 9-10. Usher assigns (Ind. Chron.) this expedition to 693, and Fleury (L. 40. §. 47.) to 690; but Smith's dates are more correct.

(182) Bede, L. 5. c. 10. It does not belong to me to inquire into the situation or present denominations of the country called by Bede Fresia, as these points do not form any part of Irish history. On them the curious reader may consult Smith, Notes, ib. For the same reason I shall not enter on the further proceedings of St. Willibrord and his companions.

(183) Bede, ib. Mr. Lingard says, (Angl. Sax. Church, ch. 13.) that the two Hewalds were brothers. Had they been so, Bede would not have omitted to mark it. Nor had Mr. Lingard a right to make them disciples of Egbert. We read indeed in Bede's martyrology, (at 3 October) that they came with St. Willibrord to Germany. But this cannot mean, that they belonged to the party of the eleven assistants given to him by Egbert; for Bede (Histor. &c. ib.) expressly distinguishes them from that party. And Mr. Lingard himself represents them as distinct from it, and as not having left Ireland until after it had arrived in Friesland. Its being stated in the martyrology, that they came to Germany with Willibrord, if however there be not some mistake in the text, must be understood as to their having come about, or soon after, the time of his arrival there. That they were not disciples of Egbert, is evident from the manner in which Bede speaks of them in his history, ib. Having made mention of Egbert but a few lines before, and relatéd how he sent Willibrord and his companions to Friesland, he then states that certain two priests, duo quidam presbyteri, named Hewald, following their example, &c. Would he have written in this manner, had they been disciples of Egbert? On the contrary, he speaks of them as persons apparently unknown to him. Mr. Lingard, not content with this unfounded supposition, tells us that they set out on their mission with the permission and benediction of their teacher (Egbert.) Now of this permission, &c. Bede has not a word, as he certainly would have had, were the matter true. This gentleman would fain make his readers believe, that all the English clergymen, monks, and students, then in Ireland, were under the care of Egbert and instructed by him. If such were the case, he should indeed have had a monstrous great establishment. But the fact is, that there is no reason to suppose, that Egbert governed any monastery or religious house in Ireland. Bede, who is the best authority on this subject, as having been his contemporary, (for he survived him only about six years) although he makes mention of him very often, never calls him an abbot or head of an institution. He represents him as a holy priest zealous in teaching and giving good advice, (see L. 3. c. 27. and L. 5. c. 22.) but does not say a word about his having been a superior of any establishment. He calls Vickberet a companion of his, (L. 5. c. 9.) that is, not a constant one, whereas Vickberet led the life of a hermit, (see ib.) but as one of those, whom he had induced to join him in his intended mission to Friesland. Alcuin says, (Life of St. Willibrord) that not only Vickberet but likewise Egbert spent his time in solitude, attending to contemplation and the service of God; “dulcissimos supernae contemplationis fructus seculo nudus, Deo plenus, solitaria quiete hauriebat conversatione.” He adds, that Willibrord, who went to Ireland in the 20th year of his age, because he heard that scholastic erudition flourished there, “quia in Hibernia scholasticam eruditionem viguisse audivit, attached himself to Egbert and Vickberet, by whose conversation he was greatly improved in piety and virtue. But as to the learning, which he acquired during twelve years study, Alcuin attributes it to the instruction not of these his two friends, as Cressy states (Church hist. &c. B. 20. ch. 6.) mistranslating his words, but of others, whom he calls excellent masters both of holy religion and sacred reading, and that these were Irish teachers he expressly states in the second book of said Life, ex. c. just after the beginning;

“*Quem tibi jam genuit foecunda Britannia mater
Doctaque nutritiv studiis sed Hibernia sacris, Nomine Willbrordus.*”

And again in ch. 33.

“Ut dudum cecini, foecunda Britannia mater, Patria Scottorum clara magistra fuit.”

Egbert's sending Willibrord and others on the Friesland mission proves nothing more than that his influence was great, particularly over his countrymen; and as to Willibrord he had an especial claim on him, as he was one of his chief directors in the practice of piety. Bede says, (L. 3. c. 27.) that Egbert was very serviceable both to the English and Irish, &c. among whom he lived, (for he never returned to Britain) by the example of his life, his assiduity in giving instruction (instantia docendi), his freedom in reproving, and his charity in giving alms out of what he used to receive from the rich. The instantia docendi is relative merely to his zeal in preaching, catechizing, &c. and cannot be understood of his having been abbot or superior of any particular establishment; for Bede represents him as then mixing with the various nations, among whom he reckons even the Picts, not those of Britain, but such of them as Egbert met with elsewhere, for instance in the Western Isles, in which he spent a great part of his later days. For it is to be observed that, after he gave up his intention of proceeding to the continent, he withdrew from his retreat, and moved from place to place, instructing the people and visiting chiefly the Columbian monasteries. (See Bede, L. 5. c. 9.) On the whole there is not the least foundation for supposing, that Egbert governed a great school resorted to by English students. The monks, students, &c. from England were, exclusively of the establishment formed for them at Mayo, (above §. 2.) dispersed throughout various monasteries and schools in different parts of Ireland. (See §. 1.) Their numbers were so great, that they excited the jealousy of Aldhelm, and induced him to write his angry, macaronic and ridiculous letter (No. 13. in Ep. Hib. Syll.) to Eahfrid, or Eadfrid, who had been one of them, and who afterwards became bishop of Lindisfarne. Among other complaints he says, that whole fleet-loads of English students used to sail to Ireland. "Hibernia, quo catervatim isthinc lactores classibus advecti confluent."

(184) Usher, Ind. Chron. (185) Usher, ib.

(186) Colgan says (AA. SS. p. 473) that he had the Acts of this synod, and that it was attended by forty antistites, that is, bishops or abbots, as he explains himself in Tr. Th. p. 218. In the former place he assigns it to A. D. 695 (696); but in the latter he states that it was held about said year. I wish he had published these Acts.

(187) Colgan (AA. SS. p. 382.) mentions the Canons of Adamnan as part of the Acts of said synod. They are eight in number, and may be seen in Martene's Theasaur. Nov. Anecd. (Tom. 4. col. 18). They are of very trifling import, except inasmuch as they show, that the practice of abstaining from blood, according to the Apostolic precept, (Acts xv. 29.) continued to be observed in Ireland as late as the times of Adannan. The second canon runs thus; Pecora de rupe cadentia, si sanguis eorum effusus sit, recipienda. Sin vero, sed fracta sunt ossa eorum, et sanguis foras non fluxit, refutanda sunt. Others of them contain rules with regard to using or not using the flesh of animals, that had eaten morticinum, i. e. the carrion of animals that died of themselves. In the eighth the owner of a horse or beast grazing in land annexed to a town, which may have wounded or hurt a person belonging to said town, is ordered to pay a fine to the injured person.

§. xv. Among the fathers, who composed said synod, I find the name of St. Aidus or Aedh, bishop of Sletty, who died in 699, (188) and whose name is in the Irish calendars at the 7th of February. (189) This was the Aidus, to whom a writer, called Mac-cuthenus, addressed his Life of St. Patrick, of which only some fragments remain. (190) Colga, abbot of Lusk was also one of them. (191) Concerning him nothing further is recorded, except that he was the son of one Moenach. (192) Another of the members of that synod was St. Killen abbot of Saigir, who is called son of Lubne, and whose memory was revered on the 12th of April. (193) It was attended also by St. Mosacra, the founder and abbot of the monastery of Tegh-Sacra, (the house of Sacra, this being his original name) which is stated to have been not far distant from Tallagh or Tallaght in the county of Dublin. It was afterwards called Tassagard, now contracted into Saggard. St. Sacra or Mo-sacra is said to have been of an illustrious family, and the son of one Senan. He governed for some time also the monastery of Finn-magh in Fotharta, apparently somewhere near Wexford. (194) It is said, that he had been likewise abbot of Clonenagh; (195) but I suspect, that he has been confounded with another person of the same name. (196) The year of his death is not known; but he must have lived until after the holding of the synod in 679. The day marked for it is the third of March. A Mochonna, who subscribed the acts of said synod under the title of Antistes Dorensis, is supposed to have been abbot of Derry. (197) He must not be confounded with St. Mochonna, called of Dore-Bruchaise, who died in 688 (689). Mochonna of Derry was a very holy man, and lived until 704 (705). His name is marked in the calendars at 8 March as the anniversary of his death. (198)

(188) Tr. Th. p. 218. The 4 Masters have A. 698, i. e. 699.

(189) AA. SS. p. 221.

(190) Usher, p. 818. Concerning this Maccuthenus Colgan has (Tr. Th. p. 218.) three conjectures. 1. That he might have been the same as Mocomthemne, one of the twelve persons who accompanied Columbkil to Hy in the year 563. But this cannot, as he acknowledges, be reconciled with the circumstance of Maccuthenus having been contemporary with Aidus of Sletty. 2. That he was Cucumneus, surnamed the Wise, who, according to the Annals of Ulster, died in 746, or, as the 4 Masters state, in 724; and who wrote a hymn in honour of the blessed Virgin. By prefixing the particle Mo to his name he would have been called Mocucumneus. Although this name is very unlike Maccuthenus, and there is some difficulty as to the times, yet Colgan prefers this conjecture to the others, and it is the only one of them, that Harris relates (Writers at Maccuthenus.) Now the third conjecture is far better than it, and I think, the true one. It is, that Maccuthenus is only another name for Adamnan, who, it is well known, wrote a Life of St. Patrick. (See Chap. III. §. 5) He was the grandson of one Tenne and accordingly was sometimes called Hua-Tenne or Mac-ua-Tenne, a descendant of Tenne. In the passages of the Tripartite history of St. Patrick, where the older writers of the saint's Acts are mentioned, he is surnamed Hua-Tenne. The name Maccuthenus is plainly Mac-ua-Tenne latinized. As there is no account or tradition in Irish history of any Maccuthen, biographer of St. Patrick, different from Adamnan, it appears to me quite clear that the only difference on this point consists in the surname having been sometimes used instead of the proper name, as was frequently the case among the ancient Irish. I need not remind the reader, that Adamnan and Aidus were contemporaries and acquainted with each other.

(191) Colgan, Ind. Chron. A. 695. ad AA. SS.

(192) See AA. SS. p. 382. (193) Ib. p. 473.

(194) Concerning Fotharta see Not. 138 to Chap. 1.

(195) Archdall (at Clonenagh) quotes Colgan as if assigning the death of the abbot Mosacra of that place to A. 650. Colgan says no such thing, nor indeed could he, as he knew that Mosacra was present at the grand synod more than 40 years after that date.

(196) Among the documents referred to by Colgan (AA. SS. at 3 Mart. p. 454.) where he treats of St. Mosacra, are the Calendar of Cashel and the Martyrology of Donegal, in both of which he is called abbot of Clonenagh, and is stated to have lived in the time of Neill Glandubh king of Ireland. Now this king did not begin to reign until the 10th century. It is therefore probable, that the Mosacra of Clonenagh was different from the one of Tegh-sacra.

(197) Colgan, having observed (AA. SS. p. 566.) that there were many places in Ireland, whose names began with Dore or Doire, from the oak forests in which they were situated, thinks that Doire, where this Mochonna was abbot, was Derry, inasmuch as it was the most celebrated of them all, and accordingly it was not necessary to join to the signature Dorensis its additional name Chalguigh. Had Mochonna belonged to any other Doire, its distinguishing name would have been added. Accordingly he reckons him (Tr. Th. p. 503.) among the abbots of Derry.

(198) AA. SS. p. 566. Yet Colgan elsewhere (Tr. Th. p. 503. and 506.) says that his memory was revered on the 3d of May.

CHAPTER XIX.

Longsech—Congall Kennmagar—Fergal, son of Malduin—Fogartach Hua Cernach—Kineth and Flahertach successively monarchs of Ireland—SS. Herlog or Hierologus, and Colman bishops of Lismore—Theodoric or Turlough king of Thomond, retires from the world and receives the monastic habit from St. Colman—Foundation of the see of Killaloe—St. Flannan its first bishop—Monastery of Killaloe founded by St. Molua Løbhar—St. Aidan brother of St. Flannan—Adamnan, abbot of Hy, again sent on an embassy to Alfrid king of Northumberland—adopts the Roman mode of observing the Paschal festival—persuades several of the Northern Irish to do so—Death of Adamnan—succeeded as abbot of Hy by Conan Mac Failbhe—St. Maoldobhorchon bishop of Kildare—Lochan Meann, surnamed the wise—Great conflagration at Kildare—Conamail Mac Cartiaig bishop of Emly dies, and is succeeded by Cellach—Death of St. Caide or Caidin bishop at Hy—Succession of several abbots of Hy—The priest Egbert sent from Ireland to Hy, prevailed on the monks of that establishment to receive the Roman Paschal Cycle—Death of Dunchad abbot of Hy—Folchua mac Dorbene abbot of Hy—People of Hy expelled by Nectan or Naitan king of the Picts—St. Cale-Christus—St. Cronan bishop of Lismore—Colman ó Liathan—St. Adamnan bishop of Rathmuighe—Monastery of Mayo possessed by the English—St. Segrelia Virgin—St. Samthanna and other holy virgins—Death of Suibhne archbishop of Armagh—St. Foeldooar bishop of Clogher—Reign of Aodh Ollain and other Irish monarchs—Deaths of SS. Manchin of Tuaim-greine, Cormac bishop of Trim, &c.—Feargal or Virgilius bishop of Salzburg—St. Alto a companion of Virgilius—Deaths of Moelimarchan and other holy bishops and abbots, from A. D. 747 to A. 787.—St. Hemelin, St. Mono, St. Rumold and other Irish Saints who flourished in the Continent—Deaths of Ferfugill bishop of Clondalkin and others.

SECT. I.

FINNACTA, monarch of Ireland, who fell in battle A. D. 695, (1) was succeeded by Longsech, a grandson of Domnald the second (2) by his son Aengus. Having reigned nine years (3) he was killed, together with three sons of his, fighting against Kellach, son of Ragall, king of Connaught. Congall Kennmagar, who was also a grandson of Domnald II. by his son Fergus, and consequently a first cousin of Longsech, was then raised to the throne in 704, and held it for seven years, when he died suddenly in 711. (4) Congall's successor was Fergal, son of Malduin, and great grandson of Aidus Huaridni or Huanriodnach. (5) He reigned eleven years, and was killed at the battle of Cath-Almain by Murchad, son of Bran, king of Leinster, on the 11th of December, A. D. 722. (6) Next after Fergal was Fogartach Hua-Cernach, son of Niell, and great grandson of Diérmít II. (7) Fogartach reigned only one year and some months, having lost his life in 724, fighting against Kineth, who succeeded him as monarch of Ireland. Kineth was a son of Irgalach, and grandson of Conang, a nephew of Diérmít II. After a reign of three years he was killed in the battle of Drum-chorcain, A. 727, (8) by Flahertach, son of king Longsech, who, having ruled retired seven years, (9) for in 734 to a monastery in Armagh.

St. Hierlog, whose name has been hellenized into Hierologus, was bishop and abbot of Lismore in the latter end of the seventh century. I find nothing further concerning him, except that he died on the 16th of January in 699. (10) He was succeeded, both as abbot and bishop, by St. Colman, a native of Ibh-Liathain, (11) and son of Finbar who belonged to the illustrious house of Hua Beogna, dynasts of that country. Colman has been called also Mocholmoc, that is, my Colman. (12) He had embraced the monastic life at Lismore, where he distinguished himself by his piety and learning. His incumbency lasted only about four years, as he departed this life on the 22d of January, A. D. 703. (13) St. Colman is said to have been already bishop of Lismore, when he was visited by the Dalcassian prince Theodoric, or Turlough, king of Thomond. He was the son of Cathal, and grandson of Aodh or Aidus Coemh, (14) who had been king of all Munster and brother to St. Molua-lobhar. (15) Theodoric had ruled his kingdom for some time, and was the father of several children, among whom was St. Flannan of Killaloe, when he determined on retiring into a monastery. Accordingly he repaired secretly to Lismore, and received the monastic habit from St. Colman. As this saint was then a bishop, (16) Theodoric must have been far advanced in years as that time; for his father Cathal is said to have died in 625. (17) Notwithstanding his age, which, according to this date could not be less than 75 years, it is related, that he employed himself at Lismore in breaking rocks and making a convenient road up to the monastery. It is added, that, with the permission of Colman, he afterwards returned to his kingdom for the purpose of repairing the ravages it had undergone. (18) It is probable, that this pious prince died not long after his return to Thomond, and he is said to have been buried in the church of Killaloe. (19)

(1) See Chap. xviii. §. 3.(2) See Chap. xiv. §. 1.

(3) O'Flaherty, Ogyg. Part. 3. c. 93. Ware, (Antiquities cap. 4.) says, 8 years.

(4) This is the year marked by O'Flaherty, ib. Ware has A. 710. But they agree as to the seven years of Congall's reign, Ware having placed its commencement in 703.

(5) See Chap. xiv. §. 1.

(6) Ware, ib. This date comes to the same point with the computation of O'Flaherty, who allows eleven years from the reign of Congall, reckoning from 711, while, according to that of Ware, it lasted twelve.

(7) See Chap. xiv. §. 1.

(8) O'Flaherty, ib. Ware has, in 728, thus allowing four years for the reign of Kineth.

(9) Ware says, six years. His computation and O'Flaherty's agree as to the termination of Flahertach's reign in 734, whereas he assigns the beginning of it to 728, which O'Flaherty places in 727.

(10) 4 Masters, and Colgan, AA. SS. p. 155. Their date 698, i. e. 699.

(11) Ibh-Liathain, or the territory of the O'Lehans was, as already observed more than once, in the now county of Cork. Colgan, treating of this St. Colman at 22 January, marks its situation in a very clear manner by stating, that it lay between Cork and Youghall.

(12) Colgan remarks that Colman and Colmoc are the same name, being both diminutives of Colum (or Colm) contracted for Columba. In like manner another St. Colman, who was contemporary with the one of Lismore, and whom Colgan calls Colman of Lann, got also the name of Mocholmoc. As the history of Colman of Lann is exceedingly obscure, I shall avail myself of this opportunity merely to mention what Colgan has endeavoured to pick up concerning him at 30 March. 1. He was a native of a part of Ulster, called Hi-Guala or Gaill-fine, perhaps the Galen hills in the county of Tyrone. 2. He governed three monasteries or churches, viz. Cambos, now Camus, a monastery in the diocese of Derry, which had been founded by St. Comgall of Bangor (see Not. 201. to Chap. x.); a church, either in the diocese of Down or in that of Dromore, at a place called Lann-Mocholmoc; and another, apparently in the diocese of Dromore, at a place called Linn-Huachaille. 3. He died on the 30th of March, A. D. 699, i. e., 700. Colgan adds, that he was maternal brother of another St. Colman, son of Luachain, and known by the name of Colman of Lann-mac-Luachain in Meath, whose name is in the calendars at 17 June.

(13) The 4 Masters and Colgan have A. 702, the same as our 703.

(14) Ogygia, Part. 3. c. 83. p. 389.

(15) See Not. 98. to Chap XII.

(16) It is expressly stated in the Life of St. Flannan, quoted by Colgan, (AA. SS. p. 154.) that Colman was bishop of Lismore when called upon by Theodoric.

(17) The 4 Masters, referred to by Colgan (ib. p. 149) assign the death of king Cathal to A. 624 (625.)

(18) See Colgan (ib. p. 154.) from the Life of St. Flannan.

(19) Ware, Antiq. cap. 29 at Killaloe; and Harris, Bishops, at said place.

§. II. To these times, that is, to the latter part of the seventh, or the beginning of the eighth century, ought, I think, to be assigned the foundation of the see of Killaloe. Its first bishop was St. Flannan, who, according to every account, was a son of the above mentioned king Theodoric. (20) He could not have been a disciple of St. Molua, (21) who was undoubtedly dead before Flannan was born. But it is very probable that he studied in the monastery of Killaloe, which seems to have been founded by the St. Molua surnamed Lobhar, or the leper, who was his great grand uncle. Hence he might have been called a scholar of St. Molua, in consequence of having been a student of the house, which was known by the name of that saint. At what precise time he became bishop of Killaloe is not known; but it must have been many years later than the period which some writers have assigned for it. (22) It is said that Theodoric, the father of St. Flannan, endowed this see with ample revenues;

(23) but whether it was founded before that prince retired to Lismore, or after his return to his kingdom, I am not able to determine. Nor can I find how long it was held by St. Flannan, nor in what year this saint died. (24) His festival is kept on the 18th of December. A St. Aidan, whose history is still less known, is said to have been a brother of his.

(20) Colgan had a Life of St. Flannan, which he intended to publish at 18 December, as had also Ware, who quotes the beginning of it in his first book of Writers, cap. 13. al. 15. They were different works, as appears from the disagreement between the words adduced by Ware and those, with which the Life extant at Louvain in Harris's time began, and which was undoubtedly the one referred to by Colgan. These words are; "Flannus itaque ejusdem Theodorici regis filius." (See Harris's addition to Ware, loc. cit) They are quite different from those given by Ware. Yet he calls Flannan son of king Theodoric, following, we may be sure, the authority of the Life, which he had.

(21) Ware says (Antiq. cap. 29. and Bishops at Killaloe) that Flannan was a disciple of the abbot St. Molua, who lived about the end of the sixth century, for some time at Killaloe, which from him got its name. He speaks of St. Molua in general, so that a person may think that he meant the celebrated Molua of Clonfert-molua. But as far as I am able to judge, the Molua of Killaloe was, although contemporary with him, a different person, and the same as Molua Lobhar. (See Chap. XII. §. 7.) Flannan could not have been a disciple of either of them; not of Molua Lobhar, who, as above seen, was a grand uncle of his father Theodoric and, in all probability, did not survive the sixth century; nor of the other Molua, who died soon after the commencement of the seventh. (See ib.) Nor was he born before this century was pretty far advanced; for, as his father was, when at Lismore, during the episcopacy of St. Colman, and consequently about A. D. 700, still able to work at making roads, &c. he cannot be supposed to have been at that time more than eighty years of age. Accordingly Flannan's birth must, at the earliest, be assigned to between 640 and 650.

(22) According to Ware (Bishops at Killaloe) Flannan was consecrated at Rome by Pope John IV. in 639. Harris and others have followed him without any examination. Whether Flannan was ever at Rome I shall not stop to inquire, although I must observe, that Colgan in a long list (AA. SS. p. 900.) of Irish saints, who travelled to Rome, has not Flannan among them, as he certainly would, had he found such a circumstance related in the Life, which he had in his hands. Ware must have taken it from the other Life; (see Not. 20.) but it is to be recollected, that some of our hagiologists have sent to Rome several Irish saints, who never were in that city. As to John IV. and A. 639, I cannot but suspect, that in Ware's document no particular year was mentioned, and that the Pope was named John in general without the addition of any number. Ware might have thought that he was the fourth of that name, in consequence of his supposition that St. Flannan was a disciple of St. Molua, and consequently flourished in the early part of the seventh century. As John the fourth was the earliest Pope John of said century, he was the fittest for Ware to fix upon. He then laid down the year 639, thinking that John was then Pope. In this, by the bye, he was mistaken; whereas John was not consecrated until very late in 640. (See Not. 88. to Chap. xv.) Had Ware not been wrong as to the period in which Flannan flourished, he would have looked to Pope John V. in 686. or to John VI. in 701. Whether Flannan was consecrated, or not, by a Pope called John, it is certain that he could not have been a bishop either in or about 639, a time, at which it is more than probable he was not as yet in the world. (See Not. prec.)

(23) Ware, Antiq. cap. 29 and Harris, Bishops at Killaloe.

(24) On these points Ware and Harris are silent. Colgan has scarcely a word about St. Flannan, except at AA. SS. p. 154. where he calls him bishop of Killaloe.

§. III. Adamnan, having returned to Hy after the synod held in 697, was again sent by his Irish countrymen as legate or ambassador to his old friend Alfrid, king of Northumberland, some time, it seems, in the year 701, or 702. (25) On this occasion he was urged by some persons to receive the Roman Paschal computation, &c. (26) Examining the subjects in question, and observing the Roman practices, he became persuaded that the Roman cycle was preferable to the old Irish one, and had no objection to whatever other observances were followed in England. (27) While on this embassy, Adamnan presented to Alfrid his work on the places of the Holy land, &c. (28) On his return to Hy he endeavoured to introduce there, and in other places subject to its jurisdiction, the Roman computation, but was not able to bring the monks over to it. He sailed to Ireland apparently in the latter part of 703, and exerted himself to induce the Northern Irish to adopt that computation, and was so far successful as to persuade almost all of them to do so, with the exception of those, who were immediately under the controul of the monastery of Hy. (29) Adamnan remained in Ireland until after the Easter of 704, which he celebrated at the time prescribed by the Roman cycle. Then returning to Hy he lived only for a short time after, as he died on the 23d of September in the course of said year, (30) and in the 77th of his age. (31) Adamnan has been justly considered as one of the fathers of the Irish church, (32) and his memory was held in great veneration, particularly at Raphoe. (33) Besides the Life of St. Columba, the Treatise on the Holy land, and the Life of St. Patrick under the name of Maccuthenus, this great and good man is said to have drawn up a Monastic rule. (34) Some other tracts have been attributed to him, concerning which I am not able to form any opinion. (35) Adamnan was succeeded, as abbot of Hy, by Conain Mac-Failbe, who governed the order for six years. (36)

(25) Bede, who mentions this embassy, (L. 5. c. 15.) does not mark the year; but Smith, following Matthew of Westminster, assigns it to 701. Perhaps it was rather in 702, about two years before Adamnan's death.

(26) The abbot Ceolfrid in his letter to the Pictish king Naiton (ap. Bede L. 5. c. 21.) relates a conversation, which he had at that time with Adamnan concerning the tonsure, and praises him as a man of admirable prudence, humilty, and religion.

(27) Bede, (L. 5. c. 15.) who observes, that Adamnan was a good and wise man, and most deeply versed in biblical knowledge, scientia Scripturarum nobilissime instructus.

(28) Bede (ib.) calls it De Locis sanctis, and (cap. 16-17.) has some extracts from it. Besides an old edition of this tract, (see Ware and Harris, Writers at Adamnan) there is a later one in Act. Benedict. (Sec. 3. Part. 2.) Adamnan composed it on information, which he received from Arculf a French bishop, who had been in Palestine and other parts of the East; and who, returning by sea, was driven by a storm to the western coast of Britain. Having visited Adamnan he was very kindly received by him, and on relating his adventures and every thing remarkable, that he had observed in those countries, was listened to with great pleasure by Adamnan, who put to paper in a regular form the substance of his narrative.

(29) Bede, ib. Dr. Ledwich is very angry with Adamnan for having recommended the adoption of the Roman cycle. At p. 66, amidst a heap of falshoods, he says that Adamnan apostatized, and (at p. 412.) blames him for having brought over most of the Southern monks to Rome, whom he represents as ignorant and bigotted. What mountains does this pseudo-antiquary raise out of trifles! Am I to tire the reader with over and over reminding him, that there was no question of religion properly understood, that is, of faith or morals, between the Anglo-Romans and the Irish, and that, notwithstanding their not celebrating Easter at the same time, or using the same tonsure, they maintained ecclesiastical communion together? Adamnan was as much in communion with Ceolfrid and the other advocates of the Roman practices before he received their Paschal cycle as he was after he agreed to it. Why then talk of apostatizing or changing religion, as this ignorant Doctor is constantly plaguing us with? Adamnan's adopting the Roman cycle, which our Doctor must allow to be far more correct than the Irish one, no more implied a change of religion than the conduct of the church of England in having, after too long a delay, received the Gregorian style. Will the Doctor say, that the English Protestant church by so doing went over to Rome? If in proceedings of this sort there be any going over, according to his phraseology, from one religion to another, this church was guilty of a much greater apostacy than Adamnan had been. For it went over to Rome not only as to the festival of Easter, but likewise with regard to those of the whole year round, Christmas day and its concomitant festivals, Lady days, the feasts of Apostles, Martyrs, &c. I am really weary of this nonsense, which Usher, Prideaux, Smith, and others, who have written on the Paschal question, would have been ashamed to mention as indicative of a difference of religion, while on the contrary they show that the Irish cycle had been derived from Rome, (see Chap. xv) and which no learned Protestant of this day would disgrace himself by laying any stress on. The Doctor, while enforcing these fooleries, was not content with bungling in theology; but he must bungle also in history. He says that the monks, brought over by Adamnan, were those of the South of Ireland. Now he ought to have known, that not only the monks but all the clergy and people of the South had received the Roman computation of Easter full seventy years before Adamnan prevailed on the greatest part of the Northerners to agree with them. (See Chap. xv. §. 6.)

(30) The Annals of Ulster, Innisfallen, and of the 4 Masters agree in assigning the death of Adamnan to A. D. 703, that is, 704. Smith was therefore wrong (at Bede, L. v. c. 15.) in marking it at 702. He reckoned only one year from that in which he supposed that he was on his last embassy to Alfrid; (see above Not. 25) but it is plain from Bede's account of his subsequent proceedings, that a longer time must have elapsed between said embassy and Adamnan's death. Instead of the month of September, which the 4 Masters and Colgan have, (Tr. Th. p. 499.) Usher at A. 704. (Ind. Chron.) has October. This is probably a typographical mistake; for not only in the Irish calendars, but likewise in the Benedictine, the festival of St. Adamnan is marked at the 23d of September.

(31) 4 Masters and Colgan loc. cit. Keating says (History, &c. B. 2. p. 45. ed A. 1723.) that Adamnan died aged 77 years. It is very probable, that this is a mis-translation instead of 77th year. According to these statements, Adamnan' must have been born not in 624, (see Not. 58. to Chap. xviii.) but in 627 or 628.

(32) See Alcuin's lines, Not. 56. to Chap. ii.

(33) See Not. 59. to Chap. xviii. (34) Tr. Th. p. 471.

(35) See Ware and Harris, Writers at Adamnan, and O'Flaherty, Ogygia Vindicated, ch. 10.

(36) Usher, p. 702. and Ind. Chron. ad A. 704. Colgan, (Tr. Th. p. 499.) calls Conain Conamal, and tells us, that his memory was revered on the 11th of September.

§. iv. St Maoldobhorchon, bishop of Kildare, died in 705, on the 19th of February. (37) Nothing further is known, as far as I can discover, concerning this prelate, nor of his predecessors since the time of Aedh Dubh or black, about A. D. 638, unless it may be supposed that some persons, who are called only abbots of Kildare, were also bishops, such as Lochen Meann, surnamed the Wise, who died in 695, and Forannan, whose death is assigned to 698. (38) The clergy of Kildare is said, but on doubtful authority, to have been violently persecuted by the king Congall Kennmagar, for what cause I do not find mentioned. (39) This is most probably a misstatement founded on the circumstance of a great conflagration, that laid waste Kildare in 709 during that king's reign, and in which we may suppose that many clergymen lost their lives. (40)

In these times Conamail Mac-Cartaig (M'Carthy) was bishop of Emly. He died in 707 and was succeeded by Cellach (Kelly), who held that see until 718. (41) St Caide or Caidin, who was bishop at Hy, died in 711; and his name is in the calendars at 24 October. (42) To the preceding year, 710, is assigned the death of Conain Mac-Failbe the abbot, (43) who was succeeded by Dorben, surnamed the long, a descendant of Conall Gulbanus. (14) Dorben governed Hy until 713 in which year he died on the 28th of October. (45) His immediate successor was, I believe, Dunchad, (46) son of Kenfoelaid, and grandson of the monarch Malcovus or Moelcova, consequently of the favourite line of Conall Gulbanus. (47) Dunchad was superior of a Columbian monastery at Kill-lochuir, a maritime town in the S. E. part of Ulster, (48) before he was raised to the government of the whole order. He was still abbot of Hy, when in the year 716 the holy priest Egbert (49) went thither from Ireland, and at length induced the monks of that establishment to receive the Roman paschal cycle and tonsure. (50) Thenceforth Egbert continued to reside for about 13 years in Hy until 729, when he died at a very advanced age on Easter Sunday, the 24th of April, after he had celebrated the festival in the morning together with the brethren. (51)

From the year 716 we find nothing further with regard to those controversies, as far as the Irish were concerned, either at home or abroad.

(37) Tr. Th. p. 629. from the 4 Masters, whose date is 704, i. e. 705. Ware observes (Bishops at Kildare) that others place his death in 708.

(38) Tr. Th. ib. I have added, as usual, a year to the dates. See also Harris (Bishops at Kildare) and Archdall at said place. Lochen's festival was kept on the 12th of January or 12th of June, and that of Forannan on the 15th of January,

(39) Keating has this story (for it probably deserves no better name) in his second book, p. 46. It cannot agree with what is recorded by old writers as to the prosperous and peaceable reign of Congall. O'Flaherty quotes (Ogyg. Part 3. cap. 93.) an old Irish distich, translated by him into Latin, in which his government over Inisfail (Ireland) is represented as a happy one of seven years; "Cuius Inisfaliae septennis fausta potestas." And O'Halloran (History, &c. Book ix. ch. 5) observes, that Congall K. is called by Giolla Moduda, a writer who died about 1148, a beneficent prince, during whose time there was neither battle nor contest, adding that he died in peace after a reign of seven years. Keating's story was picked up by that superficial writer Campbell

(Strictures on the History of Ireland, sect. 6. p. 98) who, not satisfied with repeating what Keating has, viz. that Congall persecuted the church and burned the secular and regular clergy at Kildare, adds that he was a pagan. And why? Because, as he says, “ a deed so atrocious could scarce have been perpetrated by Christian men.” Did, not to go beyond Irish history, Campbell never hear of an Earl of Kildare, who, about the year, 1495, set fire to the cathedral of Cashel for the purpose of burning the archbishop Creagh, whom he supposed to be within it? Nor of an Earl of Inchiquin, who at a later period, after storming said cathedral, put to the sword, amidst heaps of other persons whom he found there, many clergymen dragged from even under the altar? Indeed it is but too well known, that men called Christians, have not scrupled to burn and destroy the clergy. Campbell wished to show that not only Congall but likewise the bulk of the people, at least in Kildare, were then pagans. Now supposing that Congall was guilty of that atrocity, why charge the inhabitants of Kildare as his accomplices? If he ever perpetrated it, he was supported not by them but by an army brought from elsewhere. To imagine that Congall was a pagan is a most ridiculous conceit. We have seen that his ancestors were, for several generations, Christians, and some of them very pious ones. He was a grandson of king Domnald II. (above §. 1.) the prosperous prince who had been blessed by Columbkil. (See Not. 206. to Chap. xii. and Not. 7. to Chap. xiv.) Congall was undoubtedly educated in the Christian religion, and to suppose that he apostatized to paganism is a gross absurdity, as if the people of Ireland, and its numerous clergy and monks would have raised a pagan to the throne, or quietly submitted to an avowed infidel at a time when the whole nation was Christian. Had any of our kings of that period been guilty of such apostacy, the Irish annals and histories would teem with accounts of it. They do not contain a word of the kind; and the last insance of paganism, which I find recorded in them, is that of the islanders of Immagh, who were converted by St. Fechin. (See Chap. xvii. §. 10.)

(40) This conflagration is assigned by the 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 629.) to A. 708. i. e. 709. merely in these words “ Kildare devastated by fire.” As it happened during the reign of Con-gall, some wiseacre might have thought that he was the incendiary.

(41) Ware, Bishops at Emly.

(42) Tr. Th. p. 499. from the 4 Masters, who have A. 710, the same as 711. Concerning the bishops, that resided in Hy, see Notes 234 and 235. to Chap. xi.

(43) Usher, p. 702. The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. ib.) have 708 (709).

(44) The 4 Masters, and Colgan, Tr. Th. Instead of Dorben, Usher, (p. 702. and Ind. Chron. ad A. 710.) places, next after Conain Mc. Failbhe, Dunchad, with whom he terminates his list of the abbots of Hy. Colgan follows the 4 Masters, and observes (AA. SS. p. 745.) that it is a mistake to make Dunchad the immediate successor of Conain. It seems that Usher did not meet with Dorben's name in the Annals of Ulster, by which he was guided; and consequently he might not have known that he was abbot of Hy. The omission of his name in said Annals can be easily accounted for, as nothing remarkable occurred during his administration. This Dorben was, in all probability, the Dorbeneus, who wrote a copy of Adamnan's Life of St. Columba, and added at the end (see Colgan's edition) a request, in which he conjures those, who may wish to transcribe it, diligently to collate their manuscript with that which they took it from, and begs the reader's prayers for himself.

(45) 4 Masters and Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 499. Their date is 713, which must not be changed into 714. For, as O'Flaherty remarks, (MS. note, ib.) Dorben's death was according to Tigernach's Annals, on a Saturday, on which day the 28th of October fell in 713. In his Ogygia vindicated O'Flaherty says, (chap. 10.) that Dorben died in 713. He adds that he ruled Hy only five months. This is in direct opposition to the 4 Masters, and to every other authority I have met with.

(46) The account (ib.) of the succession to Hy after Dorben is rather confused. The 4 Masters throw in Foelchus between him and Dunchad. But, as Colgan observes, some of their dates, relative to the accession of Foelchus, are evidently wrong. Besides they have this same Foelchus again as abbot of Hy after Dunchad, who died in 717, and assign his death to 720 (721.) Hence it appears, that their interposing him between Dorben and Dunchad is founded on some mistake. In a MS. note (ib.) probably written by Conry, Dunchad is placed immediately after Dorben's death in 713.

(47) See Tr. Th. p. 480. and AA. SS. at 24 Mart. p. 744, where Colgan has made up some Acts of Dunchad.

(48) AA. SS. ib. From the description, which Colgan gives of Kill-lochuir as a place frequented by mariners, who considered Dunchad as their patron saint, its lying on the eastern coast, &c. I think it must be the same as Killough in the county of Down.

(49) See Chap. xviii. §. 13.

(50) Bede L. 5. c. 22. al. 23. To what he has concerning this agreement having taken place in 716 under the abbot Dunchad Usher adds (p. 702. and Ind. Chron. ad A. 716.) from the Annals of Ulster, that it was entered into on a Saturday the 29th of August. Prideaux (Connection, &c. Part 2. B. 4.) sums up the matter in these words; " In the year 716 Ecgbert, a pious and learned
" presbyter of the English nation, after having spent many years
" in his studies in Ireland, which was in that age the prime seat of " learning in all Christendom, coming from thence to the monas" tery of Hy proposed to them anew the Roman way, and having " better success herein than Adamnan—brought them all over
" to it."

(51) Bede, ib. Having stated that Easter fell in that year on the 24th of April, he observes that it was never before celebrated at Hy on the corresponding day of any year. In this he was right; for, according to the old Irish cycle, it could not have been put off as late as the 24th of April. (See Smith's Dissertation. &c. No. 9, App. to Bede.)

§. v. Dunchad died in 717 on the 25th of May, (52) the day on which his festival was usually kept, although it seems that his memory was revered in some places on the 24th of March. The immediate successor of Dunchad at Hy was, as well as I can find, Foelchuo Mac-Dorbene, who lived until 721. (53) To the year 717 is also assigned a curious circumstance, which has not as yet been sufficiently explained. It is the expulsion of the family of Ia beyond the Dorsum Britanniae (Drum-albin) by the king Nectan. (54) Ia is generally supposed to mean the island of Hy; and king Nectan was certainly the same as Naiton the Pictish king, who had received the Roman cycle, &c. since 710, and to whom the abbot Ceolfrid had written his learned epistle. (55) For the reign of Naiton, al. Naitan, or Nectan, began in 710 and continued until 725. (56) But by the family of Ia we cannot understand the monks residing in Hy, (57) whereas Nectan had no jurisdiction over that island, as it belonged not to his but to the Scottish kingdom in Britain. (58) Or if by some chance, which by the bye cannot even be guessed at, he had got possession of Hy, how could it be said that he expelled its monks beyond Drum-albin? In this case he would, instead of expelling them, have brought them over to his own kingdom, which lay to the N. and N. E. of those mountains, and was separated by them from the Scottish, to which Hy was adjacent, lying to the South and South-West. (59) There is not a word in any old document, either Irish or British, of any expulsion, dispersion, or persecution of the resident monks of Hy in those times; and that they remained undisturbed in 717, and until after the reign of Nectan, is evident from the circumstance of Egbert having lived quietly among them from 716 to 729. Therefore the expulsion of the family of Ia means nothing more than that Nectan sent out of his kingdom some Columbian monks, that is, of the family or order of Hy, and made them cross Drum-albin on their way to the Scottish territories. What was his reason for this proceeding it is difficult to conjecture. It has been supposed that some Columbians, stationed in Pictland, refused to submit to the general orders he had issued for the adoption of the Roman cycle, &c. and that in consequence he expelled them from his kingdom. (60) But why wait until 717 to thus rigorously enforce said orders, which had been published in 710, or, at the latest, early in 711? If the cause of the expulsion of those monks in 717 was their opposition to the Roman practices, it will follow that they disobeyed not only the king, but likewise their superiors of Hy, who had received them in the preceding year. That such was the case it is difficult to believe; (61) and some other reason must be looked for, why Nectan was displeased with those monks. The probability is that they arraigned his conduct on some matters of a different nature, and that he was dissatisfied with their freedom of remonstrance. (62) Nectan does not appear to have had any dispute with the abbot or monastery, whereas during his reign and after it the abbot continued to exercise his usual ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the countries inhabited by his subjects the Northern Picts. (63) From what has been hitherto stated it is clear, that it is a most absurd mistake to suppose, that the monks expelled by Nectan were those, who inhabited the island of Hy. (64)

(52) 4 Masters and Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 499 and AA. SS. p. 745. The year marked by the 4 Masters is 716, which was also that of the Ulster Annals justly changed by Usher (Ind. Chron.) into 717. Besides such change being authorized by the usual chronological system followed in both these Annals, there is a particular reason for it in this case; whereas it is known from Bede, &c. that the year, in which the monks of Hy, then governed by Dunchad, received the Roman cycle, &c. was 716, and on the 29th of August. Now, as Dunchad died on a 25th of May, instead of A. 716, we must read A. 717.

(53) See 4 Masters and Tr. Th. ib. and compare with Not. 46. The Annals of Ulster (in Johnston's Extracts after Antiq. Celto Norm.) after mentioning the change of Easter at A. 715 (716) place at said time the accession to Hy of Faolan M'Dorbene (or Foelchus) Thus it would seem, that Dunchad resigned the administration some months before his death, as I find stated in a MS. note to Tr. Th. p. 499.

(54) Usher p. 702. and Ind. Chron. at A. 717, from the Annals of Ulster.

(55) See Bede, L. 5. 21. al. 22.

(56) Chalmers, Caledonia, vol. 1. p. 206.

(57) Usher seems to have been of that opinion; but he had not sufficiently inquired into the subject.

(58) See Not. 146 to Chap. xi.

(59) See Not. 151. to Chap. xi.

(60) Of this opinion is Mr. Chalmers, who says, (Caledon. Vol. 1. p. 397.) that Nectan expelled many of the Columbians, who officiated among the Northern Picts, and adhered to their ancient practices. Bede observes, (L. 5. c. 21. al. 22.) that Nectan, or Naiton, promulgated his command for the observance of the Roman computation of Easter, immediately after he had agreed to it himself, and accordingly in the year 710, or very soon after it. (See Smith's notes, ib.)

(61) Bede, who was living in these very times, and is very minute in every thing relative to the reception of the Roman cycle, &c. speaks (ib.) in glowing terms of the unanimity, with which it and the Roman tonsure were submitted to by all the clergy and monks throughout the Pictish provinces, without as much as hinting at any opposition.

(62) Keating states (B. 2. p. 46.) that "Nectan expelled from his dominions a convent of monks, who presumed to reprehend his conduct, and by that means excited discontent among his subjects." That he meant the same expulsion as that of the Annals of Ulster is clear from his placing it in the year, in which was fought the battle of Cloch-Mionuire between the Britons and Dalriadans (of Britain), which is assigned in said Annals to A. D. 716. i. e. 717. (See Johnston's Extracts, &c.)

(63) Bede, who brought down his Ecclesiastical history to A. 731, that is, six years after the death of Nectan, makes mention of this jurisdiction as existing at the time he was writing it. (See ib. L. 3. c. 4. and compare with Not. 234 to Chap. xii.)

(64) Dr. Ledwich says, (Antiq. &c. p. 66.) "by the instigations of Ceolfrid, abbot of Girwy, Naitan, king of the Picts, expelled the Culdees from Hy. This happened A. D. 717." As to his pretended Culdees, by whom he meant the monks of Hy, we shall see elsewhere. Had he merely stated that Naitan expelled the monks from Hy, we might consider his assertion as the mistake of one, who had not studied the subject. But his adding that this was done by the instigations of Ceolfrid shows a peculiar malignity and indifference about truth. Upon what authority could he found this charge? The only account we have of any correspondence between Nectan and Ceolfrid is that of the letter written by the latter, which still exists at full length, and which does not contain a syllable of instigation against the monks of Hy or any other Columbians. Is it because Ceolfrid, in said letter, instructed Nectan as to the Roman cycle, &c. and thereby contributed to his adoption of them? Was this an instigation or instigations to persecution? If Ceolfrid excited the king to punish the monks of Hy, why was his vengeance delayed from 710, in which the letter was received, until 717? Or will the Dr. pretend that it was in the very year 717 that Ceolfrid instigated him? He may, to be sure, invent what stories he thinks fit for his purposes; but he ought, at least, to make them appear not quite improbable. So then in 717, the year marked by the Dr. himself, Ceolfrid prevailed upon Nectan to expell the monks from Hy. Pray, for what? It could not be for the reason meant by our antiquary, viz. their adhesion to the old Irish practices; for, as Ceolfrid well knew, they had exchanged them in 716 for his favourite Roman ones. What then was their crime? Surely the Dr. cannot be so stupid as to think that Ceolfrid and Nectan fell foul of them, because they had come over to their own party. His moans on the downfall of the seminary of Hy, which, he says, expired on this occasion, are absolutely nonsensical. That seminary neither expired at that time, for it flourished for centuries after, nor did it change its tenets, unless the time of celebrating Easter and the form of the tonsure are to be considered as dogmas of religion.

I cannot but here animadvert, although it does not appertain to Irish history, on a similar false assertion of the Doctor, (ib.) viz. that Aldhelm, who flourished in the latter part of the seventh century and died early in the eighth, "excited Ina, the West Saxon king, against Gerontius prince of Cornwall, because he and his subjects preserved the faith at first taught them." Upon what foundation he could build this falshood it is difficult to conceive, unless he alluded to the epistle written by Aldhelm to Gerontius, in which he endeavoured to prove that the Britons were wrong in adhering to their Paschal cycle, &c. But what has this to do with the wars between Gerontius and the West Saxons under their king

Ina? Or where can it be found, that Aldhelm excited Ina to carry them on? The Doctor, with unblushing audacity refers to Cressy, who has quite the reverse of his assertion. For Cressy, after giving a translation of Aldhelm's epistle (B. xix. ch. 17.) observes, that the Saxons did not use any violence against the Britons; and, speaking (B. xxi. ch. 10. the very part of his work pointed out by Ledwich) of the war between Ina and Gerontius, has not a word about Ina's having been urged on by Aldhelm, while, on the contrary, he states that it is not easy to know the cause of the quarrel, and that Gerontius was the aggressor, who, he adds, perhaps thought he might take Ina unawares as being then employed in acts of piety. Of all writers in the world the Dr. should not on this occasion have directed us to Cressy.

§. VI. This would be the place to treat of St. Rudbert or Rupert, bishop of Worms and afterwards of Saltzbourg, who died in 718, were there any reason to believe that he was a native of Ireland. But, as it is certain that he was not, and very probable that he had no Irish connexions, (65) I shall leave an account of him to the ecclesiastical historians of France and Germany.

St. Cele Christus, or Christicola died in 722. (66) He was a native of Ulster, and is said to have belonged to a branch of the Nialls. Having left his own province, he went to a western part of Leinster, called Hidonchadha, where he erected an oratory, which from his name has been called Kill-cele-chriost. It is said that he travelled with some other persons to Rome. In several Irish calendars his name is marked at the 3d of March with the title of bishop of Kill-cele-chriost. He had a brother named Comgall, who was abbot of Both-chonais in Inishowen, and whose memory was revered there on the 4th of September (67)

In these times the archbishop of Armagh was Suibhne or Sweeny, the successor of Flan Febhla, (68) who died in 715 on the 24th of April. (69) Suibhne was son of one Cronnmail, and held the see for 15 years, as he lived until 730. During his incumbency some distinguished men departed this life at Armagh; in 721 Colman surnamed Huamachensis, who wrote some Acts of St. Patrick; (70) in 726 Eochod Mac-Colgan, an anchorite of that city; in 727 Ferdornach, a scribe or writer; and in 728 Dochuma, surnamed Bolgan, an anchorite. (71)

St. Cronan, bishop of Lismore, who was probably the immediate successor of St. Colman, (72) died in 718, and his memory was revered on the first of June. (73) Next after him we find in that see Colman O'Liathain, a celebrated doctor, who died in 726, (74) and, I dare say, on a 25th of July. (75) To the same year 726 is assigned the death of St. Adamnan, bishop of Rathmuighe in Dalriada, (76) a part of the now county of Antrim, and also that of Dachonna, bishop of Connor. (77) In said year died St. Manchen of Leighlin, who was, in all probability, at least abbot there; a St. Colman of Telach-uallen, perhaps Tullihallen, a place in the county of Louth; and a St. Bree, surnamed the Wise. (78)

(65) Colgan has (at 27 Mart.) from among other Lives of St. Rupert, published by Canisius, a very fabulous one, in which this saint is said to have been baptized in Ireland by St. Patrick, to have gone to the continent with St. Erentrudis, and one Trudbert, whom it calls sister and brother of his, and to have died in 623. It would be very strange that a person, baptized by our Apostle, could have lived until this year; and Colgan's substituting in this case a Patrick junior for the great one, is a pitiful evasion not worth attending to. And who will believe that Rudbert, &c. were the names of persons born in Ireland? The Bollandists not only rejected this Life, but observe (at said day) that they would not even mention it, had it not led astray Colgan and Le Cointe in his Annal. Eccl. Fr. They have given us two other Lives of St. Rupert, which appear tolerably correct, and in which there is not a word about Ireland, nor of what is said in the faulty one (followed on this point by several writers) concerning this saint having been of the royal blood of Ireland as well as of France, to which latter hereally belonged. In the Acta Bened. (Sec. 3. Part. 1.) there is a short but very ancient and correct Life, in which neither Ireland, nor its blood royal is even hinted at. Yet I will not deny that St. Rupert might by his maternal line have been connected with some Irish princes; but it will not hence follow that he should be reckoned among the Irish saints. Mabillon (ib. Elog. Histor.) shows that he died in 718. The Office of St. Rupert, patched up by Burke, (Offic. propr. at 27 March) but which is not used in Ireland, is taken from the fabulous Life and from Colgan's conjectures. It is odd, that among the authorities mentioned at the head of this Office we find the name of Bollandus, i. e. the Bollandists, notwithstanding the scornful manner in which they speak of that Life. As to St. Erentrudis, who was a niece, not sister, of St. Rupert, and to Trudbert, whoever he was, I need not tell the reader, that their history has nothing to do with Ireland.

(66) 4 Masters and Colgan (AA. SS. at 3 Mart.) where he treats of this saint. Their date is 721, i. e. 722.

(67) See Colgan, Acts of Cele-Christus, ib. p. 454.

(68) See Chap. xviii. §. 13.

(69) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Armagh.

(70) Tr. Th. p. 172 and 294. See also Chap. III. §. 5.

(71) Ib. p. 294. Colgan prefixes saint to all their names. I have added a year to each of his dates.

(72) See above §. 1.

(73) AA. SS. p. 303. Colgan has from the 4 Masters A. 717 (718). Ware and Harris (Bishops at Lismore) have confounded Cronan of Lismore with Cronan, son of Nethsemon, of whom Colgan treats at 9 February, (p. 302. seqq.) and who, he thought, was the bishop Cronan that paid a visit to Columbkil in Hy. (See Not. 182 to Chap. xi.) He expressly distinguishes him from Cronan of Lismore and for a very just reason, viz. that their times were far different. It is therefore strange that Ware, who had the AA. SS. loc. cit. before his eyes, and where he found mention made of the son of Nethsemon, could have fallen into such a mistake, which cannot be accounted for except by his having read too cursorily what Colgan has about these Cronans. Archdall

(at Lismore) has only a part of Ware's mistake ; for he does not call Cronan of Lismore son of Nethsemon, but he says that he died on the 9th of February. Now this day is assigned in the calendars not to his death but to that of the son of Nethsemon.

(74) AA. SS. p. 149. and Ind. Chron. ib. ad A. 725. i. e. 726.

(75) Colgan, when mentioning the death of Colman O'Liathain, does not give us the day of it, or of his commemoration. Yet he might have easily found either one or the other in the Calendar of Cashel, which he quotes ib. p. 155. This calendar has at 22 January Colman Hua Beogna of Lismore, that is, the older Colman, of whom above §. 1. Then at 25 July it has Mocholmoc or Colman O'Liathain a comorban or successor of St. Mochudda (Carthag) of Lismore. Colgan very oddly imagined that these two Colmans were but one person, viz. the Colman of 22 Jan. and that the 25th of July was a second festival, perhaps of translation, &c. in honour of him. I do not know what reason he could have had for thinking so, except that the Colman at 25 July was called Mocholmoc, which name was often given to the older Colman. But surely every St. Colman might have been called Mocholmoc. (See Not. 12.) That in said calendar two distinct Colmans were meant is evident not only from the difference of the days marked, but still more from the former being surnamed Hua-Beogna, and the latter O'Liathain, the very Colman that died in 726. Whether the 25th of July was his Natalis, i. e. the anniversary of his death, or a day of commemoration, I cannot decide ; but, considering the usual practice in the calendars, it is more probable that it was the Natalis.

(76) AA. SS. p. 377. and Ind. Chron. ib. ad A. 725 (726). Concerning the see of Rathmuighe, which was very ancient, see Chap. vii. §. 6. Not. 58. and Not. 256. to Chap. x.

(77) AA. SS. Ind. Chron. ad A. 725. Ware and Harris (Bishops at Connor) have retained this date, but might have safely changed it into 726.

(78) 4 Masters and Colgan, ib.

§. VII. Foelchuo or Faolan Mac-Dorbene, abbot of Hy, who, according to one account, died in 721, (79) and, according to another, in 724, was succeeded by Killen or Killin, surnamed fada or long. (80) Concerning this Killen I can find nothing particular, except that he is said to have died in 726. (81) The next abbot, whom we meet with after him, was another Killen, surnamed Droichtheach, who lived until about 750.

To the year 727 is affixed the death of Aelchu, abbot of Clonard. (82) It is not improbable that he was also bishop of that place. At least his predecessor Dubdan O'Foclan was, being expressly styled bishop and abbot of Clonard, and who died in 717. (83) In the same year 727 died St. Muredach, bishop of Mayo, and son of Indrect, who is supposed to have been one of the Indrects kings of Connaught in those times. (84)

According to some writers St. Muredach survived St. Gerald called of Mayo; but it is more than probable that he died before him. The history of St. Gerald is extremely confused, and interspersed with monstrous fables. (85) This much is certain that he was an Englishman, and superior of the establishment, which Colman, after his return from Lindisfarne, formed at Mayo for the English, who had followed him to Ireland. (86) If Gerald was one of those, who left Lindisfarne together with Colman, (87) he must have been very young at that time; for Colman's departure from that place was in 664, and Gerald lived until 732. Supposing him to have been in 664 only about sixteen years old, it may be admitted that he belonged to that party; but as the persons who accompanied Colman are spoken of as men and actual monks, (88) it is much more probable that Gerald came over to Ireland on some later occasion; whereas the monastery of Mayo continued to be resorted to by English and students for a long time after Colman's death. (89) Gerald is said to have, on his arrival in Ireland, and before he was placed at Mayo, presided over some monks at Eliteria,

(90) which, if this be true, was probably a cell belonging to the house of Mayo. According to this statement, he could not have been one of Colman's first English followers, who, as is well known, were all fixed by him in said house. At what time he became superior at Mayo is not known; and it probably was not prior to the seventh century. (91) His death is assigned on the best authority to A. D. 732, (92) and, according to several concurrent accounts, to the 13th of March. (93) In some Irish documents St. Gerald is called bishop; but it is very doubtful whether he was entitled to this appellation. (94)

(79) 4 Masters, as above Not. 53.

(80) It is stated in the Annals of Ulster (Johnston's Extracts.) that Killin-fada succeeded Faolan Mac Derbene in 723 i. e. 724.

(81) The 4 Masters and Colgan Tr. Th. p. 499. Their date 725 may, as usual, be supposed the same at 726.

(82) AA. SS. p. 407.

(83) Ib. I have added a year to the dates thus given.

(84) AA. SS. p. 605. The 4 Masters assign Muredach's death to 726, i. e. 727. Archdall (at Mayo) without any authority, instead of Bishop, calls him abbot.

(85) Colgan has published (at 13 Mart.) a Life of St. Gerald from a MS. of the monastery of the Island of all saints in Lough-ree, the author of which he thought was perhaps Augustin Magraidin. But it is clear from some genuine tracts written by Magraidin, he could not be the author of this barbarous stuff. The Bollandists, in their observations (at said day) on St. Gerald, justly declare it to be full of nonsense and intolerable. Besides many fooleries it abounds in anachronisms.

(86) See Chap. XVIII. §. 2.

(87) That he was one of them is stated in the so called Life of St. Gerald, and hence Ware (Antiq. cap. 26.) places him among them. But he omits the ridiculous fable of Gerald having been abbot of Winchester, as if there were Columbians in that city, and of his having brought along with him, in Colman's suite, three brothers of his, and three thousand other worthy Englishmen.

The latter part of this nonsense has been copied by Archdall (at Mayo.) Now we know from Bede (see Chap. xviii. §. 2.) that Colman was followed by only about thirty Englishmen to Ireland.

(88) See Bede, L. 4. c. 4.

(89) See Bede, ib. and above Chap. xviii. §. 2 Not. 13.

(90) Life, cap. 7. Colgan observes (AA. SS. p. 603.) that there was in the diocese of Tuam, to which that of Mayo has been annexed, a chapel called Kill-an-elitheir, that is the cell of the pilgrim or foreigner, and that this might have been what in the Life is called Eliteria. It was perhaps a cell depending on Mayo, as was probably also a church in same diocese called Tech-Sasson, the house of Saxons or Englishmen.

(91) If we could place any confidence in the Life, Gerald would have been abbot of Mayo before the death of Adamnan; for it states (cap. 15.) that he was, when presiding there, visited by him. But, even admitting that such a visit took place, it will not follow that he was abbot before the 7th century; for Adamnan was in Ireland as late as the year 703 (see above §. 3.) during which he might have called upon Gerald. Colgan remarks (AA. SS. p. 604.) that Gerald's name does not appear among those of the persons, who attended the synod of 697, (see Chap. xviii. §. 14.) although that of Egbert, likewise an Englishman, does. His object was to show, that Gerald was then dead; but, as he was undoubtedly alive at that time and for many years after, Colgan ought to have concluded that Gerald was not as yet an abbot or much distinguished in the year 697.

(92) The Annals of Ulster, in which he is called Geralt pontifex Saxonum Campi Heo (Magh-Heo), place his death in 731, i. e. 732, to which year it is affixed also by Tigernach in these words; "Pontifex Muighe-heo Saxonum Garailt obiit." It is singular that Usher, having quoted these authorities, (Ind. Chron. ad A. 697.) has preferred to them that of the lying Life of Gerald, in which we are told that after his death Adamnan of Hy governed the church of Mayo constantly and indefatigably for seven years, until returning to Hy he died there himself. Hence Usher argued that, as Adamnan died in 704, Gerald's death ought to be assigned to 697. But how could he have believed, that Adamnan totally neglected the government of Hy and of the whole Columbian order for seven years, and confine himself to the monastery of Mayo? Or did he not recollect that Adamnan spent a considerable part of that period in Northumberland, and afterwards in Hy striving to bring over his monks to the Roman cycle, &c. (above §. 3.) and accordingly could not have been indefatigably employed at Mayo? Colgan, who scrupled to doubt of what the Life states, followed Usher, adding an argument, which proves nothing more than that Gerald was not abbot of Mayo in 697. (See Not. prec.) As to Archdall's bungling (at Mayo) concerning Gerald having not died, but succeeded Colman in 697 (See Not. 16 to Chap. xviii.) and then placing Adamnan after him, is too slovenly to be honoured with animadversion. The 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 604.) have Gerald's death at A. 726 (727); but their authority is not equal to that of Tigernach or of the Ulster annals. The Bollandists, perceiving that it was ridiculous to make Adamnan of Hy successor of Gerald, suspect that he might have been confounded with another Adamnan. But, as the monastery of Mayo was in those times purely English, it is not easy to believe that any of its abbots was then an Irishman, as an Adamnan would have been. And it is useless to endeavour to prop up any part of that absurd fable.

(93) 4 Masters, Calendars, &c. (ap. AA. SS. p. 604.)

(94) Some calendars, quoted by Colgan (ib.) give him the title of bishop; and we have just seen (Not. 92.) that he has been called pontifex. Yet in the Life, notwithstanding the great things said of him, he is styled merely abbot. The 4 Masters say no more of him than St. Gerald of Mayo. According to their statements he could scarcely have been a bishop; for they place his death in 727, the very year to which they assign that of St. Muredach, whom they expressly call bishop of Mayo. Surely there were not two bishops there at the same time. Bede, speaking of the monastery of Mayo, as it was circumstanced when he was writing his history, and accordingly down to 731, says (L. 4. c. 4.) that the English monks lived there under a canonical or regular abbot. He has nothing about their having among them a bishop, although, in all probability, Gerald was their abbot at the time of his making this observation. I am inclined to think, that his having been called pontifex, pontiff of the English, gave rise to the supposition of his having been a bishop. But why did not Tigernach or the compilers of the Ulster annals plainly call him episcopus? The title, pontifex, has been often used in an equivocal manner, and sometimes in the same sense as president (See Spelman, Gloss. and Ducange, at Pontifex and Pontificium.) It may be, that, as the English were strangers in Ireland, the abbot of Mayo enjoyed some particular privileges as protector of his countrymen.

§. VIII. A holy virgin, named Segretia, is mentioned as having been sister of St. Gerald, and hence some modern writers have concluded that she presided over a nunnery at Mayo. But we have not sufficient authority for either of these statements. (95) That there was a St. Segretia or rather Segnetia in those times, somewhere in Ireland, I do not mean to deny; and we find some other holy women, who were distinguished in the early part of the eighth century, such as St. Samthanna abbess of Clonebrone (96) in the now county of Longford; St. Sebdanna abbess of Kildare, who died in 727, and the next abbess after her St. Affrica, who lived until 739, (97) to which year is assigned also the death of a St. Conchenna daughter of one Kellaigh Chuallan. (98) As scarcely any thing further is, as far as I can discover, known concerning them, an attempt at unravelling their history would be useless.

Suibhne, archbishop of Armagh, having died on the 21st of June in 730 (99) was succeeded by Congus, who held the see for 20 years. He was a native of a place or district called Kinell-Anmire, (100) probably somewhere in Ulster. Congus was a man of learning, (101) and, when archbishop, wrote a poem, in which he exhorted Aedh or Aidus Ollan, king of Ireland, whose confessor he was, to punish Aedh Rony, king of Ulster, for having sacrilegiously attacked and pillaged some churches of the diocese of Armagh. (102)

St. Foeldovar, bishop of Clogher, died in 732 on the 29th of June. (103) He is the first prelate of that ancient see whose times are well known next after St. Tigernach. (104) St. Tola, bishop of Clonard, died in 734 on the 30th of March, the day on which his anniversary was commemorated. (105) This saint was of the illustrious family of the Galengi, (106) and son of one Dunchad. He led for many years the life of a hermit at a place called from him Disert-Tola, and situated either in the southern part of the ancient Meath, or northern part of ancient Munster, and consequently in the now King's county. (107) Afterwards he was raised to the see of Clonard, but in what year is not recorded. It has been said that he was bishop also of Kildare. That this is a mistake may be safely concluded from as much as is known of his transactions. (108) In these times we find a bishop in the small island of Rechrán (Rachlinor Raghlin) off the coast of Antrim, Flann son of Kellach. He died in 735, and his memory was revered on the 17th of July. (109) During this period an Irish bishop, named Cumian, who at a very advanced stage of life had retired from Ireland to Bobbio, where he spent his last 17 years in the monastic state, and in a most exemplary manner died there on a 19th of August, aged 95 years and 4 months. He was buried at Bobbio during the reign of the Lombard king Luitprand, which lasted somewhat more than 31 years until 744. This king had such a veneration for Cumian, that he got his tomb adorned with precious stones. It is not known to what part of Ireland he belonged. (110)

(95) It is said in the Life of St. Gerald (cap. 15.) that Segretia his sister died, together with one hundred of her nuns, of the great pestilence, viz. that of 664; but it is not stated in what place, and her death is mentioned as having occurred while he was at Eliteria, and before he went to Mayo. How could a sister of Gerald have been an abbess before A. 664, or is it to be believed that he was superior of any establishment in Ireland at a time prior to his having set a foot in this country? Colgan observes (Not. ad loc. p. 603.) that he could discover nothing relative to this Segretia, unless she was the same as St. Segnetia of a place called Domnach-Keine, whose Natalis was marked in some calendars at 18 December. Yet afterwards (p. 605.) partly in complaisance to Gerald's Life, and partly through conjecture, he makes mention of St. Segretia or Segnetia, with her 100 virgins, as having died at Mayo on an 18th December. He forgot that a little before he had told us that St. Segnetia belonged to Domnach-Keine. On those notable grounds Harris has made up a nunnery founded at Mayo in the seventh century by St. Segretia, and has been followed by Archdall.

(96) See AA. SS. p. 347.

(97) Tr. Th. p. 629. I have added a year to its dates. In the Ulster annals the death of St. Affrica or Afreca of Kildare is assigned to to A. 744 (745.)

(98) AA. SS. p. 607.

(99) Tr. Th. p. 294. and Ware, Bishops at Armagh.

(100) Ware (ib.) has understood the Kinell-Anmire of Tr. Th. as the name of a man, from whom Congus was descended, or as Harris has it, leaving out Kinell, from whose stock he was sprung. But the words, "De Kinell Anmire oriundus fuit," seem to point rather to a district than to a man; and there were several tracts in Ireland, whose names began with Kinell. It is true that its original meaning was progeny or clan; but it came to be used for the territories, in which such clans lived ex. c. Kinell-Conail, Kinell Enda, &c. in like manner as the Irish word Clann (children, family, &c.) whence Claneboys, Clanrickard, &c. Kinell-Anmire may certainly be explained by Clan of Anmire, and I will not object to the supposition that Congus was a member of that clan. But who said Anmire was I cannot tell, unless perhaps was meant Anmiraus formerly monarch of Ireland.

(101) Congus is called (Tr. Th. ib.) a scribe, a title given in Ireland, as Colgan observes (ib. and p. 631.) to men of letters, professors, and particularly to authors. See also Ware, Antiq. cap. 17.

(102) Tr. Th. p. 294. Ware and Harris, Bishops at Armagh and Writers.

(103) 4 Masters and AA. SS. p. 742. Their date is 731, i. e. 732.

(104) We have seen (Not. 5. to Chap. XII.) that with regard to old times, no attention is due to the reigistry of Clogher, which has been followed by Ware.

(105) Colgan treating of St. Tola (at 30 March p. 793.) quotes the 4 Masters, who assign his death to 733 (734). As to the day of it, which was omitted by them, he does not (ib.) expressly mark it, only observing, that his memory was revered on the 30th of March; but elsewhere (AA. SS. p. 407.) we read, according to his printed text, that Tola died on the 3d of March. This must be a typographical error for 30; whereas Colgan states that he has taken from the calendars of all the obitual days, the Natalis of the several saints, whom he names in this part of the AA. Now all the calendars, referred to by him at p. 793, have Tola's name only at the 30th of March, and it is plain that Colgan considered it as his Natalis. This mistake of the printer (one of the thousands, which have greatly injured Colgan's works,) led astray Ware, (Bishops at Meath) who accordingly assigned Tola's death to the 3d of March. Besides this mistake Ware fell into another, for which Colgan is not to blame, although he professed to follow him; for, instead of 733, which Colgan has every where for the death of Tola, he, or his printer, has given us 732.

(106) The family of the Galengi inhabited, I suppose, some of the districts called Galenga or Gallen. There was a Gallen or Galian, which comprized a very great part of the Queen's county and of the counties of Carlow and Kildare. Considering the situation of the place, in which, as will be just seen, St. Tola commenced his career, it is not improbable that he was a native of that territory.

(107) Colgan observes, that the Calendar of Cashel places Disert-Tola in Meath, while, according to every other authority, it was in upper Dalcassia, that is, the northern part of Munster. He justly remarks that it lay perhaps at the boundary of both provinces. In former times Meath and Munster met each other in what is now called the King's county, which has been made up of districts that belonged to these provinces. That Disert-Tola was in the now barony of Garrycastle in said county may, I think, be deduced from the circumstance, related by the 4 Masters at A. D. 1034, of Carten lord of Dealbhna having been killed by some of his subjects when entering the church of Disert-Tola. This Dealbhna was, in all probability, the one sur-named Eathra, the M'Coghlan's country, or barony of Garrycastle. (See Harris, Antiq. ch. 7. and Seward at Dealbhna.)

(108) In St. Tola's Acts at 30 March, in which Colgan collected every thing that he could find concerning him, Kildare is not even mentioned. In the passage of the 4 Masters relative to him, there quoted at full length, he is called bishop only of Clonard. The calendar of Cashel has "St. Tola of Disert-Tola;" the martyrology of Donegall, "St Tola bishop and anchoret, of Disert-Tola." But in no calendar whatsoever is he said to have belonged to Kildare. Yet at p. 407. we find and of Kildare, et de Kill-dara, added to the words, bishop of Clonard. It is plain that Kill-dara has slipped in, instead of Disert-Tola. Hence proceeded the mistake of Ware and Harris, who (Bishops at Meath and Kildare) make him bishop not only of Clonard, but likewise of Kildare. To show still further that they were mistaken, I may add that in the very minute catalogue, which Colgan has, (Tr. Th. p. 629.) of the bishops, abbots, &c. of Kildare, from the beginning down to the 13th century, no St. Tola is reckoned among them.

(109) Tr. Th. p. 509. The year there marked from the 4 Masters is 734. i. e. 735.

(110) Colgan has this bishop Cumian at 12 January. His reason for treating of him at said day was his having conjectured that he might have been Cumian of Antrim, whose name is in the Irish calendars at said day, and whose death is assigned to A. 658. For this conjecture he has not even the appearance of an argument, nor is it consistent with Cumian's having died at Bobbio on a 19th of August, and during the reign of Luitprand, which did not begin until many years after 658. He observes that among all the St. Cumians, bishops or otherwise, not one of them appears in the Irish calendars at 19 August. This is not to be wondered at, whereas the Cumian of Bobbio died far away from Ireland, and all that is known of him is contained in the following epitaph, which our old hagiologists probably never heard of. and of which I have given the substance.

Hic sacra beati membra Cumiani solvuntur,
 Cujus caelum penetrans anima cum Angelis gaudet.
 Iste fuit magnus dignitate, genere, forma.
 Hunc mittit Scotia fines ad Italicos senem ;
 Locatur et Bobio, Domini constrictus amore,
 Ubi venerandi dogma Columbani servando
 Vigilans, ieiunans, indefessus sedule orans,
 Olympiades quatuor, uniusque circulo anni,
 Sic vixit feliciter, ut felix modo credatur.
 Mitis, prudens, pius patribus pacificus cunctis.
 Huic aetatis anni fuerunt novies deni,
 Lustrum quoque unum, mensesque quatuor simul.
 Ac pater egregiè potens intercessor existe
 Pro gloriosissimo Luitprando rege, qui tuum
 Pretioso lapide tumbam decoravit devotus.
 Sic ut manifestum alium ubi tegitur corpus — est hic dominus Cumianus episcopus
 Quartodecimo Calend. Septemb. fecit Joannes Magister.

Colgan would fain refer the words, Quartodecimo Calend. Septemb. not to the death of Cumian, but to the day on which John Magister worked at the epitaph. This would be a strange mode of explaining the days marked on such monuments, nor would it have occurred to Colgan, did he not think it odd that Cumian's name is not in the Irish calendars at 19 August. Mabillon, touching incidentally on Cumian, (Annal. &c. at A. 722.) understood the 14 Calend. Sept. as relative to his death, observing at the same time that in the calendar of Bobbio his festival was assigned not to that day i. e. 19 August, but to the 9th of June. His adding that Cumian spent more than 20 years in that monastery is, I think, a mistake founded on his having reckoned the four Olympiads as each consisting of five years, a mode of computing, which he had erroneously followed in making up the age of St. Columbanus. (See Not. 69 to Chap. XIII.)

§. ix. Flahertach, monarch of Ireland, who, as we have seen, (111) retired in 734 to a monastery in Armagh, was succeeded by Aedh or Hugh IV. sur-named Ollain, son of the king Fergall. He reigned

for nine years until he was killed in the battle of Kells A. D. 743, fighting against Domnald, who was then raised to the throne. This Domnald, the third monarch of his name, was son of Murdach a great grandson of Colman prince of Meath, who was a son of the monarch Diermit I. Having reigned 20 years, Domnald went on a pilgrimage to Hy, where he died late in 763. His successor was Niell Fras-sach, or the cloudy, a brother of Aedh Ollain, who after a reign of seven years retired to Hy, became a monk there, and lived until 778. The next monarch was Donnchad, or Donagh, a son (born in 733) of Domnald III. He ascended the throne in 770, and held it for 27 years. His reign is remarkable for its having been that, during which the Danes began to infest the coasts of Scotland and Ireland. (112)

The Church history of Ireland during these reigns presents us with a much smaller number of persons distinguished by sanctity or learning, and of interesting facts, than we have met with in former periods. Yet notwithstanding the scanty accounts, that remain of those times, owing either to a neglect in recording transactions or to the destruction and loss of documents, it is certain that ecclesiastical discipline and learning of every sort, such as was cultivated in the eighth century, continued to flourish in this country. Detailed accounts of many holy and learned men of this period cannot be given; but there is no doubt of such, and far from few, persons having adorned it.

A St. Manchin, abbot of Tuaim-gréne (Tomgrany in the county of Clare) died in 735 (736). (113) Aractac, who, although called only abbot of Ferns, was perhaps bishop there, died in 738. (114) To A. D. 742 is assigned the death of St. Cormac bishop of Trim. (115) He is said to have been of the royal house of the Nialls; and his name appears in various calendars at the 17th of February as the anniversary of his death. (116) Three brothers of his are spoken of; Rumond, a very wise man and deeply skilled in history and antiquities, who died in 743; Baitellach, abbot of Trim, whose death is marked at A. D. 752; and Ossan a priest, the year of whose death is not known. St. Coman, or Comman, author of a Monastic rule, which was extensively followed in Connaught, died in 743, or according to another account in 746. (117) I find him called bishop of Roscommon, (118) where an episcopal see existed during the middle ages; and, as that place, in all appearance, got its name from this St. Coman (119) it is highly probable that he was its first bishop. (120) His memory was revered on the 26th of December. (121) In these times there was a bishop, and apparently the first, at Fore, St. Suarle or Suarlech, who, having succeeded the abbot Dubdaboren in 736, was afterwards raised to the episcopal rank and lived until the 27th of March, A. D. 746. (122)

(111) Above §. 1.

(112) O'Flaherty, Ogyg. Part. III. cap. 93. See also Ware, Antiq. cap. 4. Their accounts as to those kings agree in substance, except that Ware reckons the reign of Donnchad from the year 778, in which Niell Frassach died in Hy, while O'Flaherty makes it begin in 770, the year of said king's withdrawing to that island. And hence instead of 27 years, which O'Flaherty has for his reign, Ware counts only 19. I must here caution the reader against a typographical error in the margin (ib.) of the English translation of Ware, in which, instead of 797, the year of Donnchad's death, we find 787. The dates of the 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 448.) relative to all those kings are different from O'Flaherty's; but we may be certain that his are the most correct.

(113) AA. SS. p. 332.

(114) Ib. p. 223. I have changed the date 737 of the 4 Masters into 738. In the 3d Index, ib. Arectach is called bishop of Ferns. This may have been merely a mistake of the compiler.

(115) Colgan at 17 February, (p. 361.) where he treats of this saint, calls him Cormac junior, as if there had been an older Cormac bishop of Trim in the fifth century. That this is a mistake has been shown already (Chap. VIII. §. 12.) The 4 Masters, quoted by Colgan place Cormac's death in 741 (742).

(116) Although in said calendars Cormac, bishop of Trim, is expressly mentioned at 17 February, Colgan, in consequence of his supposing that there was an older Cormac also bishop there, has some doubts as to which of them this date belonged. But, as he was mistaken on that point, these doubts are unfounded. At said day the calendars have indeed another Cormac, who was not bishop of Trim, but archbishop of Armagh. (See Chap. VIII. §. 12.)

(117) The 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 791.) have A. 742 (743). Ware (Writers at Coman) quotes the Annals of Boyle for A. 746.

(118) AA. SS. p. 405.

(119) We have seen (Not. 146 to Chap. XII.) that there is no sufficient reason to admit, that there was a St. Coman at Roscommon in the sixth century, as some writers have supposed.

(120) Colgan (AA. SS. p. 405.) calls Coman not only bishop, but likewise founder of the church of Roscommon.

(121) Ib. and p. 791.

(122) AA. SS. p. 772 at 27 Mart. The date from the 4 Masters is 745, i. e. 746.

§. x. Albuin, alias Witta or Wittan, one of the fellow labourers of St. Boniface in Germany, and who in 741 was appointed by him bishop of Bura-burg near Fritzlar in Hesse, (123) is said to have been a native of Ireland. (124) The only objection I find to this position is, that, if his original name was Witta, he would seem to have been rather an Englishman. But it may be conjectured, that his real name was Albuin, which, to please the German ears, was changed into the corresponding Saxon Witta, white. (125) Be this as it may, scarcely any thing else is known concerning him, except that he died on a 26th of October, and has been called the apostle of Thuringia. (126) It is certain that there were at that period Irish missionaries preaching the Gospel in Germany together with St. Boniface. One of them was the celebrated Virgilius, who afterwards became bishop of Saltzburg, and whose real name was most probably Feargil, or perhaps Feargal. (127) To what part of Ireland he belonged, or of what family he was, I cannot find any account, except its being said that he was of noble extraction. (128) Having greatly distinguished himself by his piety and learning, (129) he was raised to the priesthood, and, apparently soon after, set out for the continent as a missionary. He had arrived in France before the year 746, (130) where he was most graciously received by Pepin, son of Charles Martel, and as yet only mayor of the palace. (131) He is said to have remained with Pepin, who was greatly attached to him, for two years, at Carisiacum, a princely residence near Compeigne, on the Oise, and thence to have proceeded to Bavaria then governed by the duke Otilo or Odilo, to whom he was strongly recommended by Pepin. This was probably about the year 745. Virgilius was in Bavaria when his disputes began with St. Boniface, whose jurisdiction then extended over that country, as well as over many other parts of Germany. The first instance of them occurs in 746, occasioned by a theological question, to which the ignorance of a priest gave rise. This priest, not understanding Latin, used in administering baptism to say these words; “Baptizo te in nomine Patria, et Filia, et Spiritua Sancta” instead of Patris, Filii, et Spiritus Sancti. Boniface, being informed of it, ordered Virgilius and Sidonius, a companion of his and probably also an Irishman, (132) to rebaptize such persons as that priest had undertaken to baptize. They refused to obey, justly maintaining that the baptisms performed by him were valid, and, to protect themselves against any exercise of Boni-face's power, gave a full account of the whole matter in a letter which they wrote to Pope Zachary.

(123) See Epistol. Bonifac. No. 131, 132, and Fleury, Hist. Eccl. L. 42. §. 22.

(124) Trithemius (De viris illustribus Ord. Ben. &c.) states, that he had been a monk in Ireland, and that thence, leaving his sweet native country, he passed over to Germany, where he converted numbers of pagans, and became bishop, &c. Arnold Wion (Lign. Vits.) calls Albuin an Irishman, and as Trithemius also says in one place, a monk of Hy, who went to Germany, &c. Hence several other authors, among whom Serarius (Ber. Mogunt. L. 3.) Usher (Preface to Ep. Hib. Syll.) Colgan (AA. SS. p. 610.) Ware and Harris (Writers at Albuin) have considered him as undoubtedly a native of Ireland.

(125) Even admitting that the original name was Vitta, Witt or Wittan, it might have been an Irish name, although not meaning white in the Irish language. His English companions, finding that in their tongue it was like white, might have latinized it into Albinus.

(126) See AA. SS. p. 610.

(127) The Irish Fear, sometimes contracted into Fer, has in latinizing of names been not seldom changed into Vir. For Fear in Irish signifies man, as Vir does in Latin. Thus an abbot of Hy, whose name is constantly written in Irish Fergna, is called by Adamnan Virgnous through, as Colgan observes (AA. SS. p. 451.) a Latin inflexion. In like manner Virgilius, which I find (ib. p. 800) given also to an abbot of Aghaboe in the 8th century, and (ib. p. 107) to one of Tirdaglas in the 10th, was no other than Feargil, or probably Feargal, Fergal, now Ferral. That the Virgilius, who was in Germany during the time of St. Boniface, was the same as the one, who was afterwards raised to the see of Saltzburg cannot, with any sufficient degree of probability, be called in question. His having disagreed with him on some points, in which by the bye Virgilius was right, and his being denounced by him to Pope Zachary, is no proof that he was not the holy and learned Virgilius, who, after that Pope's death, was considered worthy of being promoted to the episcopal order. Fleury, however, treats of them as two distinct Virgils; but Mabillon (at the Life of St.

Virgil, AA. Ben. Sec. 3. part 2. and Annal. Ben. at A. 747 and 756.) makes them the same person, and so does Basnage in his edition of Canisius, (Ant. Lect. Tom. 3. part 2. p. 273.) I scarcely need add, that Baronius, Usher, Ware, and a crowd of other writers were of the same opinion. Yet Pagi (Critica &c. ad A. D. 746.) has endeavoured to show, that the Virgil, with whom Boniface had some disputes, was different from the great bishop of Saltzburg. But, as will be soon seen, his arguments are far from conclusive.

(128) A Life of St. Virgilius has been published by Canisius (Tom. 3. part 2. Basnage's ed) and afterwards by Messingham (Florileg, &c.) and Mabillon (Act. Ben. Sec. 3. part 2. It was written in the 12th century, and consists of two parts; the first biographical, but short, meagre, and inaccurate; the second on miracles wrought at his tomb in various times. This Life begins with these words: Beatissimus igitur Virgilius in Hibernia insula de nobili ortus prosapia," &c. The account given in it of his transactions prior to his being placed on the see of Saltzburg is very imperfect, and that part of his history must be collected from other documents.

(129) All accounts agree, that besides being very religious he was exceedingly learned. In the Life it is said that he might have been considered the most learned among the learned men of his time and climate, meaning, I suppose, the western world. By Bruschius he is styled vir pietate et doctrina clarus. He is spoken of in like manner by Hundius and other German writers.

(130) Pagi, Critica, &c. ad A. 746.

(131) Some writers have said that Virgilius, on his arrival in France, was received by King Pepin. But this must be understood in a loose sense, inasmuch as Pepin, from being mayor of the palace, was afterwards raised to the throne in 752. Pagi (loc. cit.) and Mabillon (Annal. Ben. ad A. 756.) took care to style Pepin only mayor of the palace at the time of Virgilius' reception at his court. According to the unchronological manner, in which his arrival in France and his subsequent proceedings until he was consecrated bishop of Saltzburg are related in the Life, it would seem as if he had not been in that country until after 760. Not only Ware and Harris, (Writers at Virgil) but likewise Fleury, (L. 44. §. 3.) in consequence of following said Life, fell into a great mistake on this point. Besides calling Pepin king at the time of his first receiving Virgilius, they supposed that the saint was not in the continent more than about four years prior to 766, or 767, to each of which years his consecration at Saltzburg has been most erroneously assigned. It will be seen lower down, that he was a bishop many years earlier. But from what is said in the Life, and which they copied from it, concerning Virgilius having gone from Pepin's court to Saltzburg in the time of Otilo, duke of Bavaria, these writers ought to have guarded against that mistake; for, as Pagi (ib.) observes, Otilo died in 748.

(132) Mabillon says, (Annals, &c. at A. 747) that Sidonius had perhaps come from Ireland with Virgilius. This is a very probable conjecture; for Sidonius, latinized from Sedna, frequently occurs as the name of distinguished Irishmen in those ages. Where did Harris find, (Writers at Virgil) that this Sidonius, the fellow labourer of Virgilius, was archbishop of Bavaria? It is plain that he was only a priest, and so he is titled in a letter of Pope Zachary, written in 748.

§. XI. The Pope was astonished at the proceeding of Boniface, and immediately wrote to him, expressing the pain he felt at his having issued an order for the rebaptizing of those persons. He cautions him never to act in that manner again, whereas, although the priest's Latin was bad, the baptisms performed by him were valid, and unattended with any circumstances that could authorize the rebaptization of those, whom he had baptized. (133) It seems that Boniface was hurt at Virgilius' having written to the Pope, and consequently treated him with harshness. It has been said, but I suspect without foundation, that Virgilius went on this occasion to Rome. (134) It is certain that he was in Bavaria in 747 and the following year. For in one or other of these years, I believe the former, Boniface denounced him to the Pope, alleging various charges, some of which cannot be easily guessed at. (135) The first was that he used to speak ill of Boniface, because, said Boniface, I have shown that he erred on Catholic doctrine. But on what point or points Virgilius erred, we are not informed. Another charge was that, conversing with the duke Otilo, he used to sow seeds of hatred between him and Boniface. To these vague accusations he adds, what he must have picked up from false report, that Virgilius said that he was authorized (136) by the Pope to obtain the diocese of a deceased bishop, one of the four whom Boniface had ordained in that country. But these are trifles, compared with the horrible crime, of which Virgilius was guilty, by maintaining that there was another world and other men under the earth, that is, under the part of the earth trodden by Boniface. Zachary in his answer, written in 748, passing over the two first charges, denies that he had empowered Virgilius to obtain a diocese, and says that, in case it be proved that he held the doctrine of there being another world and other men under the earth, (137) a synod should be convened, and Virgilius expelled from the church. He adds, that he was then about sending a letter to the duke (Otilo) concerning Virgilius, for the purpose of citing him to appear before himself, and, if convicted of error, of condemning him according to the canons. Then he tells Boniface, that he did not forget what he had written to him (on some other occasion) concerning Sidonius and the aforesaid Virgilius. (138) What complaint Boniface had made against them is not stated. Perhaps it was that they were not as obedient to him as he would have wished. Zachary says that he had written a threatening letter to them; and subjoins that Boniface will be believed preferably to them, and that, as he observed above (with regard to Virgilius), he will summon them to appear before the Apostolic see. Whether either Virgilius or Sidonius were actually summoned to attend at Rome, or went thither, or which of the parties was believed in preference to the other, we are not informed; but matters must have been compromised, and a reconciliation have taken place, whereas henceforth nothing whatsoever can be discovered relative to those disputes. (139) Virgilius was abbot of St. Peter's monastery at Saltzburgh before the death of Duke Otilo, (140) which occurred in 748, and seems to have continued in that situation, until he was appointed bishop of said city by Pope Stephen the second and the king Pepin in 756. (141)

(133) This letter of Pope Zachary is at No. 134. of the Epist. Bonifac. and may be seen in the Bibl. Patr. of Lyons, Tom. 13. Usher has it in Ep. Hib. Syll. No. 16 It begins thus; "Virgilius et Sidonius, religiosi viri, apud Baioariorum provinciam degentes, suis nos litteris visitarunt."

(134) Pagi holds (at A. 746) that Virgilius, i. e. the one, whom he distinguishes from the bishop of Saltzburg, went to Rome in said year. His only argument is that in a letter, of which more will be seen directly, of Zachary to Boniface, written in 748, a charge against Virgilius is mentioned, viz. that he said "quod a nobis esset absolutus—diocesim obtinere. Pagi explains absolutus as signifying dismissed; whence he concluded that Virgilius had been at Rome. I think it more probable that absolutus must in that passage be understood as meaning empowered or authorized, according to an acceptation introduced in the middle ages. Thus we find absolutio used for power, liberty, licence; and absolutionem facere for granting power or faculties. It was with reference to this occupation, that Zachary made use of the phrase absolutus; for it seems clear from what we read in the same letter a few lines higher up, that he had not as yet seen Virgilius. Alluding to charges brought against him by Boniface, he says that he does not know whether said Virgilius was called a priest, nescimus si dicatur presbyter. How could this be, had Zachary been acquainted with Virgilius at Rome? In a former letter (see Not. prec.) he called him a religiosus vir, that is, a man charged with religious functions, such as he might have been without being a priest, for instance, were he only a deacon. At the time, at least, when Zachary wrote the latter, Virgilius was abbot of the monastery of St. Peter at Saltzburg; but Boniface had not informed the Pope of his rank or situation. I must not dissemble that also Mabillon thought (Annal. Ben. ad. A. 747.) that Virgilius i. e. he who afterwards became bishop, went to Rome and returned thence to Bavaria in said year 747. He likewise must have been led astray by the word, absolutus.

(135) These charges are known only from Zachary's answer to Boniface No. 140. ap. Epist. Bonifac. and 17. in Usher's Sylloge. Mabillon supposed (Annal. &c. ad A. 756.) that Boniface was displeased with Virgilius, because he had come to Bavaria with recommendations from Pepin, and not by order of Boniface himself, and that he was taken great notice of by the duke Otilo, to which he adds that perhaps Virgilius was not very submissive to him. All this may be true, and joined with the opposition of Virgilius on the baptismal question is fully sufficient to explain why Boniface became so angry with him.

(136) See Not. 134.

(137) It is universally admitted that the opinion maintained by Virgilius was no other than that relative to the Antipodes, an opinion founded on the sphericity of the earth, and which in our days even school-boys are acquainted with. It was new to Boniface; for in those times geographical and philosophical learning was not as much cultivated in other parts of the West as in Ireland. His mode of stating that opinion might have misled a Pope even more learned than Zachary, and induced him to think, that Virgilius held that there was a second species of men inhabiting another world distinct from the earth. That Virgilius entertained no such extravagant notion is clear from there not having been any further proceedings on this subject; a circumstance which cannot be accounted for except on this principle, that Virgilius communicated a correct statement of his opinion to Zachary, who accordingly found it to be harmless.

(138) "Pro Sidonio autem et Virgilio supradicto presbyteris, quod scripsit sanctitas tua, agnovimus." It is odd that here he calls not only Sidonius but likewise Virgil a priest, although some lines before he had said, that he did not know whether that same Virgilius was called one. (See Not. 134.) Unless there be some error in the text, the reason of this discrepancy must be that in a letter of Boniface concerning Sidonius and Virgilius jointly, and which was different from that in which he brought the above mentioned charge against Virgilius in particular, he gave them the title of priests, which he omitted in the other, when complaining of Virgilius alone. By Virgilius Zachary meant throughout the whole letter one and the same person, as is evident from the word supradicto.

(139) One of Pagi's arguments to show that the Virgilius, who was accused by Boniface, was different from St. Virgilius of Saltzburg, is, that, in the saint's Life no mention is made of these disputes. But surely he must have known that in works of that kind, particularly such as were made up in the dark ages, silence was usually observed with regard to quarrels between holy men. In fact, the so called Lives of saints, written in those times, are in general panegyric discourses rather than biographical tracts, and every thing is omitted that might throw the least reflection on the conduct of the saint at any time of his life. And as to that of St. Virgilius, Pagi was well aware that it is very imperfect. Among many other circumstances, it has nothing about Virgilius having been abbot at Saltzburg for many years before he was made bishop. It is odd that Pagi, who allows that both his Virgils were in Bavaria in 746, and thenceforth during the disputes with Boniface, did not consider that the Virgilius engaged in them, was, as appears from Zachary's letter of 748, the confidential friend of duke Otilo. Now Pagi himself states that Virgilius, who became bishop of Salzburg, was the one who had been recommended to him by Pepin, and who was afterwards a great favourite. According to his hypothesis we should admit that both the Virgils were greatly esteemed by the duke and quite intimate with him. What necessity is there for such suppositions, unsupported by any thing we find in Pope Zachary's letters, or by the authority of any old document? Pagi seemed to think, that the Virgilius, who was accused by Boniface, was an obscure person of little note; but if he had well examined the letter of 748, he would have found that he was considered at Otilo's court as a man of high consequence.

(140) Mabillon, Annal. B. ad A. 756.

(141) Mabillon (ib.) shows that this is the true date of Virgilius' appointment to that see, and observes that he was the immediate successor of John, who died in said year 756. Pagi contends (at A. 746) that he was bishop of Saltzburg as early as about this year, and it is on this supposition that he chiefly, and indeed solely, (for his other arguments are good for nothing) grounds his assertion that the bishop was different from the Virgilius, who had disputes with St. Boniface. This should certainly be allowed, were it true that his episcopacy began about 746, whereas it is self-evident that the person accused by Boniface, and suspected of error by Zachary in 748, was not a bishop. Pagi's only argument for making Virgilius a bishop so early is founded on a very ancient epitaph on him, which he met with in Mabillon's Analecta, Tom. 4. In it we read, among other lines ;

“ Quique regebat ovans praesentis culmina sedis
Ferre quater-denos caris cum fratribus annos.”

Pagi understands the almost forty, quater-denos, years here mentioned, as all relative to the episcopal incumbency of Virgilius at Saltzburg. Now, as he died 785, Pagi places the commencement of it in about 746. But Mabillon, who has published said epitaph not only in the Analecta, but likewise in the Annal. B. (at A. 785) has drawn no such conclusion from it ; for, as above observed, he assigns that commencement to A. 756. And did Pagi imagine, that the old breviaries, ex. c. that of Passau, and various writers, where stating that Virgilius was appointed bishop by Stephen the second, and on the postulation of Pepin, when king of the whole French monarchy, were all wrong ? Stephen's pontificate did not begin until 752, the very year in which Pepin was crowned king. To return to the epitaph, the fact is that Pagi was mistaken in his interpretation of it ; for the quoted lines can very well, and, unless equally good documents are to be all rejected, must be explained as relative not only to the years, during which Virgilius was bishop of Saltzburg, but likewise to the previous ones while he governed St. Peter's monastery. Thus it is true, that he was invested with ecclesiastical authority in that city during near forty years, there being every reason to think that he was abbot of St. Peter's as early as 746. As to the opposite extreme of those, who have put off the episcopacy of Virgilius until 766 or 767, it is scarcely worth mentioning ; and let it suffice to observe that Pope Stephen II. by whom he had been instituted, was dead since 757. Harris (Writers at Virgilius) fell into a monstrous blunder as to the dates of some of his transactions. Not content with following Ware's mistake in assigning his consecration as bishop of Saltzburg to 767, he adds, among other inaccuracies, that it was during his episcopacy that he had his controversies with Boniface. Poor Harris did not know, that Boniface suffered martyrdom in 755, and accordingly was dead before even the real date (756) of the episcopacy of Virgilius. Ware himself, although not chargeable with this huge mistake, was very inconsistent in, on one side, supposing that Virgilius had not left Ireland until about 763, (see Not. 131) and, on the other, in saying that he and Sidonius wrote a letter to Pope Zachary against Boniface. It is true, as we have seen, that they wrote to Zachary; but this very circumstance ought to have taught Ware, that Virgilius was in the Continent long before 763, whereas Zachary died in 752. There is a ridiculous story, mentioned by Usher, (Ep. Hib. Syll. Not. ad No. 16) of Virgilius having been a bishop before he left Ireland, and of his having gone over to Germany at the same time with St. Kilian of Wurtzburg. It is too absurd to merit refutation; and it is well known that St. Kilian was dead since 689. (See Chap. XVIII. §. 10.)

§. XII. It is said that Virgilius, although named to that see, and exercising episcopal jurisdiction, deferred his consecration for almost two years, until at length, urged by the other bishops of the province and the clergy and people of his diocese, he submitted to it; and that in the mean time Dobda, or Dobdagreus, a bishop who had accompanied him from Ireland, exercised the necessary episcopal functions in his stead. (142) Some writers have supposed that Dobda was a Greek; but this is, I believe, a mistake originating in the name Dobda-greus having been changed by a copyist into Dobda Grecus or Graecus. (143) According to some accounts, Dobda was placed as bishop at Chiem (Chiempsee in upper Bavaria) by the duke Otilo, and established there a school, which was frequented by a great number of students. (144) Of the further proceedings of St. Virgilius we shall see more hereafter; but chronological order does not allow a continuation of his history in this place. About the same time that he arrived in Bavaria we find another distinguished Irishman in that country, St. Alto, who has been called a companion of his. (145) He is stated to have been of a very illustrious family, and to have arrived in Bavaria about 743. (146) There he lived for some years as a hermit in a forest about midway between Augsburg and Munich. The fame of his sanctity reached the ears of Pepin, to whom that country was subject, and induced him to make him a grant of a part of the forest, about the year 750, for the purpose of erecting a church and monastery. This grant was very probably made through the interference of St. Virgilius, for whom Pepin, both when mayor of the palace and when king, entertained the highest regard. Alto immediately set about clearing the ground, and, assisted by the people of the neighbourhood, succeeded in completing a monastery and church, which was dedicated by St. Boniface. This monastery was, from Alto's name, called Alto-munster, afterwards corrupted into Alt-munster. The memory of this holy man was revered on the 9th of February, the anniversary of his death, the year of which is not known. Some tracts have been attributed to him, but on authority not worth attending to. (147) Among other Irish missionaries of this period in Bavaria is reckoned Declan, who is said to have died at Frisingen on, it seems, a first of December. (148)

(142) These particulars are related in the Life of St. Virgilius, and in one of St. Rupert. In the former the bishop, that officiated instead of Virgilius, is called Dobda; in the latter, Dobdagreus. He is represented as having come from Ireland together with Virgilius; and, if it be true that he got a bishopric from the duke Otilo, this may be admitted, whereas Otilo died in 748.

(143) Hundius in his Catalogue of the bishops of Saltzburg, has Dobda, or as he calls him, Dobdan, a Greek. From him Usher took what he has on this point, (Ep. Hib. Syll. Not. ad No. 16.) and from Usher others have picked it up. Dobda would have been a very odd name for a native of Greece, but it was common in Ireland, being the same as Dubda, of which many instances occur in old times particularly as a part of compound appellations. We have already met with Dubda-borend abbot of Fore, and Dubdan O'Foelain bishop of Clonard. There was a Dubda-lethe archbishop of Armagh in the latter end of the eighth century, a Dubda-lethe, abbot of Killskire, &c. A person, not accustomed to Irish names, might have easily changed Dobda-greus into Dobda-graecus; and hence most probably was derived the notion of that bishop having been a Greek. That there were formerly some Greek ecclesiastics in Ireland is clear from there having been, as Usher (ib.) observes, a Greek church at Trim, and which was so called as late as his times; but there is not sufficient proof to show that Dobda was one of them. Dr. Ledwich, having made mention (Antiq. p. 172.) of Dobda or Dobdan as a Greek, adds to what Usher touched upon; and as if to outstrip him in learning! that Virgilius had learned the doctrine of the Antipodes, &c. from Dobdan and other lettered Greeks and Orientals. Then he says that Virgilius must have read Plutarch, Diogenes Laertius, Proclus, and Stobacus. Yet many a one has held the doctrine, as he terms it, of Antipodes without having read Plutarch, &c. Next he observes that this “demonstrates the attachment of the Irish to the Greek school and fathers above the Roman.” Pray, were Plutarch, Diogenes Laertius, &c. fathers of the Church? Or had the question concerning the Antipodes any thing to do with theology? But the Doctor, when he gets upon his hobby horse of Greeks and Orientals, knows nobounds. He was not aware that Pope Zachary, who was so much attached to Boniface, whom the Dr. would call a Romanist, and who said he would believe him preferably to Virgilius, was himself a Greek. How could it happen that he had not some partiality for an Irishman, for a member of that nation, which preferred the Greek schools to the Roman? To be serious, there was no difference in those days between said schools either theological or philosophical, except that the Greeks were, in general, more skilled in the philosophy of the times. The Irish collected information from whatever quarter it could be found in; they studied the works of both Greeks and Latins in every department of knowledge; and it is certain that they were at that period very well versed in Greek learning, and undoubtedly much more so than any other people of Western Europe.

(144) Hundius, loc. cit. If Dobda was named to that see by Otilo, he must have been there as early as 748. But Hundius' chronology is perhaps as incorrect on this point as on that relative to Virgilius, whom also he makes bishop of Saltzburg in Otilo's time, adding that he was consecrated in 767, to which year he assigns likewise the opening of Dobda's school and apparently his appointment to Chiem.

(145) In the Acts of St. Alto, which Colgan has endeavoured to make up at 9 February, Brunner is quoted as stating (Annal. Boior.) that Alto had accompanied Virgilius, "ex eiusdem comitatu." This was perhaps founded merely on the circumstance of Alto's having been in Bavaria at least as early as Virgilius.

(146) Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 743. Colgan observes (AA. SS. p. 302.) that Alto was rather a usual name in Ireland, as appears from old genealogies. St. Brendan of Clonfert was grandson of one Alto, and accordingly was surnamed by Adamnan Mocu-Alti.

(147) Dempster, besides striving to make Alto a Scotchman, because he is said to have been born in Scotia, as if the Scotia of those times were not Ireland, has forged the names of certain books as written by him, which, observes Colgan, nobody else has a word about.

(148) See AA. SS. p. 302. and Usher, Ep. Hib. Syll. Not. ad No. 16.

§. XIII. To the year 747 (149) are assigned the deaths of the following distinguished and pious ecclesiastics; Moelimarchan, bishop of Ectrum; (150) Nuad or Nuadat, abbot of Clones; Cuangus, surnamed Mac-dall, a man of eminent sanctity and learning, and abbot of Liethmore, where his festival was celebrated, together with that of the founder St. Pulcherius, on the 13th of March; (151) Colman surnamed Britannicus, apparently from his having spent some time in Britain or having been a British Scot, son of one Foilan, and abbot of Slane; Fursey or Fursa, abbot of Lecan, now Leckin in Westmeath; Losclag, surnamed Wise; Eochod of Killtoma, somewhere in said district; (152) Keledulass of Devenish ; and Macoge of Lismore, who was perhaps bishop of that see.

In the following year 748, and on the third of July, is said to have died Killen Droichtheach, abbot of Hy. (153) He was succeeded by Failbe, the second abbot of that name, concerning whom I find nothing particular, except that his death is assigned to the 10th of March A. D. 755 ; that he was then in the 87th year of his age ; and that he was succeeded by Sleben, son of Congal, of the race of Conall Gulbanus. (154)

Congus, archbishop of Armagh, having governed the see for 20 years, (155) was on his death in 750 succeeded by Kele-Petrus, a native of Hi-Bressail, now Clanbrassil in the county of Armagh, whose incumbency lasted until 758, when he died and had for successor Ferdachrich son of one Suibne. (156) Flahertach, who had been king of Ireland, and became a monk at Armagh, died there in 761. (157) In the same year died Tola, abbot, and perhaps bishop, of Ardraccan ; as also Folachtach, abbot of Birr ; Loarn, abbot of Clonard ; Kellbil, abbot of Cluain-bronich ; (158) and Alild, abbot of Mungret ; concerning all of whom nothing further is known.

In these times flourished St. Melle or Mella, the mother of two holy men, Cannech, a priest, and Tigernach, an abbot. (159) Having lost her husband, she determined on leading a religious and retired life. Tigernach had just erected a monastery, close to the lake Melge (Lough-Melve in the county of Leitrim), which he made over to her, proceeding himself to another place. Melle here collected a number of pious females, whom she governed as abbess for many years. There is no account of the precise time of her death ; but it appears to have been prior, by some years, to 787. She is mentioned twice in the Calendars, viz. at the 9th and 31st of March, under the name of St. Melle of Doire-Melle, that is, the oak grove of Melle, by which appellation that nunnery has been distinguished.

(149) 4 Masters, and Colgan Ind. Chron. ad AA. SS. Their date is 746, i. e. 747.

(150) Colgan's text has Episcopus Ectrumensis. I cannot find a place called Ectrum. It is very probable that Ectrumensis is an erratum for Endrumensis or Aendrumensis, and that Antrim was the see of this bishop.

(151) Colgan gives a short account of St. Congus at 13 March, p. 607.

(152) See Archdall at Kiltoma.

(153) The 4 Masters, and Tr. Th. (p. 500) have 747 (748). Smith (Append. to Life of St. Columba) refers to the Annals of Ulster as placing this Killen's death in 751. In Johnston's Extracts from said annals I do not find even his name mentioned.

(154) 4 Masters and Tr. Th. ib. Their date 754 (755) for Failbe's death does not agree with the Annals of Ulster, which, as they appear in Johnston, make mention of Suibhne as abbot in 753 (754). It is also to be observed, that according to his reading there would be no room for the abbot Sleben, whom the 4 Masters and Colgan make the immediate successor of Failbe and next before Suibhne. I suspect that Johnston mistook the text of said Annals, and that he confounded Sleben with his successor Suibhne. Thus, instead of Suibhne, as abbot in 754, we ought to read Sleben.

(155) See above, §. 8.

(156) 4 Masters, and Tr. Th. p. 294. I have added, as also Ware has done, a year to their dates.

(157) Ib. The year there marked is 760, i. e. 761.

(158) In the Topographical Index to AA. SS. Cluain-bronach is marked as the same place with Clonbrone in the county of Longford. But Cluain-bronach must have been different from it, whereas at Clonbrone there was only a nunnery. Cluain-bronach was probably the same as Cluainbraoin near the town of Louth, where the memory of a St. Dichuli was held in veneration. (See Tr. Th. p. 115.) Archdall would have done better, had he assigned Kellbil to this place rather than to Clonbrone, where he has him in a list of abbesses. It may perhaps be said, that Colgan does not expressly call him an abbot ; but, as he uses the word, abbot, just before, when naming Loarn, it is difficult to suppose that this title was not meant as applicable also to Kellbil. In like manner we find in the passage, where those persons are mentioned together (Ind. Chron. ad AA. SS.) as having died in 760 (761), that Tola is not called either abbot or bishop ; yet elsewhere (ib. p. 793.) Colgan gives him the title of antistes of Ardbraccan.

(159) Colgan has a short and imperfect account of St. Mella at 31 March. He thinks that St. Cannech, her son, was the same as the Cannech, whose name is in the Calendars at said day.

§. XIV. Ferdachrich, who, as we have seen, became archbishop of Armagh in 758, held that see for about ten years, and dying in 768, seemingly in the month of May, (160) was succeeded by Foendelach, or Foennelach, (161) the son of one Moenach. Sleben, abbot of Hy, died in 763 ; and his memory was revered on the 2d of March. His successor was Suibhne the second, who governed the Columbian order until 768, or, according to some, 772, the year of his death. This Suibhne's name is in the calendars at 22 June. (162) He had been in Ireland on, as may be supposed, a visitation of the Columbian monasteries in 767. (163) St. Aedgen, bishop of Fore, died in 767 (164) after which I do not find any bishop named from that place until about 100 years later. St. Himelin, a native of Ireland, who is said to have been a near relative of St. Rumold of Mechlin, is supposed to have died during this period and the reign of Pepin, which ended in 768. (165) Himelin was returning from Rome, when being much fatigued and very thirsty he stopped to rest a while at Vissenack, a village near Thenac (Tillemont) in Brabant. It is related that having met a servant maid of the curate of that place, who was bringing water from a neighbouring fountain, he asked her for a drink of it, which she refused to give him, because her master had enjoined her not to let any one put his lips to the vessel on account of a pestilence then raging in that vicinage. At length, however, being earnestly requested by Himelin, who assured her that her master would not be displeased, she allowed him to take a drink. On her returning home and placing the vessel before the curate, he found that, instead of water, it contained wine. Astonished at this prodigy, and being informed by the servant maid of the person she had met with, he immediately ran in search of Himelin, who was continuing his journey. Having overtaken him, and knowing him to be a saint, he induced him after much solicitation to stop at his house and take some refreshment. When it was time to retire to sleep, Himelin refused to lie on a comfortable bed prepared for him, and stretched himself on some bare straw in a barn, where being oppressed by illness he remained for two days, and, having received the rites of the Church from his host, expired on the third. He was buried at Vissenack, where his remains were, and probably are to this day, held in great veneration. The anniversary of his death is marked in various calendars at 10 March, and without any ecclesiastical title annexed to his name, (166) whence it would seem that he was only a layman. Yet in one account of this saint I find him called a priest. (167) St. Mono, who is styled the martyr of Nassonia might be supposed to have been killed during the reign of Pepin. He went from Ireland (the then Scotia) to Arduenna, the forest of the Ardennes, but at what precise time I do not find recorded. He lived there alone for a long time; yet it is said that he was a disciple of Saints Remacle and John Agnus, bishops of Maestricht, the former of whom spent the last years of his life in the monastery of Stevelo in the Ardennes. He erected a church at Nassonia (as it is called in Latin) a place two miles distant from the monastery of St. Hubert, in the diocese of Liege. He was killed by robbers on an 18th of October, and buried in his own church, to which after his death king Pepin assigned tithes. John Agnus placed there a community of clergymen, who were afterwards called canons. (168) But, if it be true that St. Mono was a disciple of St. Remacle, perhaps at Stavelo, he must have been killed before the reign of Pepin, which began in 752. For St. Remacle died several years before the end of the seventh century; and it is difficult to think, that a disciple of his could have reached the times of king Pepin. Perhaps Pepin the king has been confounded with his grandfather Pepin de Herstal mayor of the palace, who died in 714.

(160) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Armagh. Their saying that Ferdachrich died in May is, I believe, founded only on Colgan's stating, (Tr. Th. p. 294.) that more would be seen concerning him at 18 and 31 May. This is a matter of little consequence, and it is more important to observe that Colgan, following the 4 Masters, assigns his death to A. D. 771 (772). Ware took his calculation from the catalogue of the Psalter of Cashel, (ib. p. 292.) which allows only ten years for the incumbency of Ferdachrich, the counting of which from 758 brings us to 768. Its authority is certainly the more respectable of the two; and from it also we know that Ferdachrich was really archbishop of Armagh, although the Ulster annals and the 4 Masters call him merely abbot.

(161) Ware and Harris from the catalogue of the Psalter of Cashel. In that of the 4 Masters and Colgan, instead of Foendelach, the next marked after Ferdachrich is Cudisniscus, whom the Psalter places third in succession after Foendelach. Of the confusion, that occurs as to the succession at Armagh for several years henceforth, we shall see hereafter.

(162) 4 Masters and Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 500. I have added, as usual, a year to their date 762 for Sleben and 767 for Suibhne. The Annals of Ulster in Johnston's Extracts assign the death of Suibhne to 771 (772).

(163) Ulster Annals ap. Johnston.

(164) Ind. Chron. ad AA. SS. It has 766, i. e. 767.

(165) In one of the short accounts of St. Himelin, published by Colgan at 10 March, it is said that he flourished in the times of Pepin, when king of France. As the death of Himelin followed very soon after he was supposed to flourish, that is, after he was known in Brabant, it may be fairly concluded that it occurred during the reign of Pepin. Molanus, however, states that he lived until that of Charlemagne.

(166) In said calendars he is called simply Confessor, for instance in the Martyrol. Anglic. which at 10 Mart. has; “Depositio S. Himelini Confessoris, qui in Hibernia natus,” &c. Ferrarius merely says; Erat autem natione Hibernus, S. Rumoldo episcopo Propinquus; without any allusion to his having been in holy orders.

(167) One of the little tracts, called by Colgan Lives of St. Himelin, begins with these words; “Beatus Himelinus confessor et sacerdos Deo dignus, &c.” It may be seen also in the Bollandists at 10 March.

(168) Molanus, Natales sanctorum Belgii at 18 October. It is very strange that in Ware’s Annals (at the reign of king John, ch. 4.) Mono is spoken of, as if he flourished in the 13th century. Surely the king Pepin lived some centuries before that time. As Ware refers to Molanus, it is impossible that he could have affixed his account of St. Mono to that period; but it seems that those, who collected his posthumous papers, having found it among them, and not knowing where to place it, assigned it at random to the reign of king John. There is extant an old Life of St. Mono; but I have not been able to meet with it. In Butler’s Lives of saints (at 18 October) St. Mono is said to have lived in the 7th century, and to have been a Scotchman. The former position is, I believe, right; but the latter must be qualified according to the acceptation of the name Scotus, which in those times generally signified Irishman. As to there having been a St. Mono’s church in Scotland, this is of no consequence; for in that country there were churches also of Columba, St. Kieran, &c. who were not Scotchmen, as now understood.

§. xv. St. Rumold, commonly called of Mechlin, was distinguished in these times. That he was born in Ireland is usually admitted, and there seems to be no doubt that he was a bishop before he left his country. (169) It is a mistake to say, that he was bishop of Dublin; for that city had not as yet bishops in those days; but, as has been already more than once observed, some foreigners, not acquainted with Irish history, were wont in latter times to give to some of our bishops, whose sees were not known, the title of bishop or archbishop of Dublin, for instance, in the cases of St. Livinus, St. Disibod, &c. (170) According to certain vague accounts Rumold was the son of an Irish prince or king, and heir to his father's principality. (171) Be this as it may, he embraced the ecclesiastical state, and after some time was raised to the episcopal rank. Being struck with a wish to visit the tombs of Apostles and Martyrs he set out for Rome, and travelling through England and France preached on various occasions during the course of his journey. At Rome he spent the greatest part of his time in holy places amidst the remains of saints, and became inflamed with an ardent thirst for martyrdom. Having been, as is said, admonished in a vision to return to the West, he left Rome with the Pope's benediction, and arriving at Mechlin was most kindly received by Count Ado. This Count, who was married to a lady named Eliza and had as yet no children, requested the prayers of St. Rumold that God might please to grant him one. The Countess was in due time delivered of a son, who was baptized under the name of Libertus, and afterwards became distinguished for sanctity. In gratitude for this favour Ado granted to Rumold, for the erection of a monastery, a place called Ulmus, from the number of elms growing there. The saint, being now settled in that country, was indefatigable in preaching the Gospel, not only at Mechlin but likewise throughout the neighbouring districts, and with such great success that he has been justly styled the Apostle of the Mechlinians. While sedulously engaged in this good work, two assassins, one of whom he had reprov'd as guilty of adultery, conspired against him, (172) and put him to death on the 24th of June, A. D. 775. (173) To conceal their crime, they threw his body into a river; but it was soon discovered and honourably interred by Count Ado in a church or chapel, named from St. Stephen, which Rumold had erected at Ulmus. In process of time it was removed to a church in Mechlin, dedicated to his memory, long since and still the cathedral and metropolitan church of that city, where it is preserved in a splendid shrine. Although St. Rumold was killed on the 24th of June, yet, on account of that being St. John the Baptist's day, his festival has been affixed to the first of July. Many miracles are said to have been wrought at his tomb; and it is unnecessary to enlarge on the great veneration in which his memory has been held.

(169) I have not been able to meet with the Acts of St. Rumold written by Hugh Ward, a learned Irish Franciscan of Louvain, and published after his death by his confrere Sirin in 1662. Could I have the perusal of them, I should hope to find something, that would help to clear away the rubbish, that appears in some accounts of this saint. The lessons of his Office at the first of July, compiled by Burke (Offic. Propr. &c.) consist in great part of silly fables, picked up here and there, some of which may be seen in Harris' account of St. Rumold at Bishops of Dublin. These lessons are much less correct than those of the Office, taken from the breviary of St. John Lateran, which is read in Ireland. The tract, called the Life of St. Rumold, and published in the enlarged edition of Surius (Cologne, A. 1618) at 1 July, is, as far as it goes, apparently rather exact. I say, as far as it goes, because it is a mere panegyrical discourse, which had been pronounced on the festival of the saint by an abbot Theodoric of the monastery of St. Trudo or St. Tron, who was living in the year 1100. It omits many circumstances relative to the history of St. Rumold, such as, for instance, his having been a bishop, although it is universally allowed that he was one. As to his having been a native of Ireland, Theodoric is very explicit ; for, although he calls the saint's country Scotia, he tells us that it was the island Scotia, separated by the sea from Britain, the island in which there are no serpents ; and, to make the matter still plainer, he adds the well known words of Solinus descriptive of Ireland. The Martyrology of Mechlin brings St. Rumold from that part of Scotia, which is now called Ireland, subjoining that he had been archbishop of Dublin ; and hence as well as from other documents Molanus justly argued against some persons, who taking advantage of the name Scotia strove to make him a native of the now Scotland, that he was an Irishman and a Scot of the original Scotia. The words of said martyrology have been copied into the Office of the Lateran breviary, with this only difference that, instead of archbishop, it has bishop. But we shall soon see, that Rumold was neither one nor the other of Dublin. The opinion of his having been a native of Ireland was so universally admitted, that the learned Pope, Benedict xiv. in a letter written to the Catholic bishops of Ireland, (August 15, 1741) reckons him among the great Irish saints, such as Columbanus, Kilian, Virgilius, &c. who either propagated the Catholic faith in foreign countries, or illustrated it by their blood. (See Burke's Hib. Dom. p. 21.) It is worth observing, that this letter was written many years after the Bollandist Sollerius (at St Rumold's Acts) threw out some conjectures to show, as that Pope was certainly aware of, that St. Rumold was an Anglo-saxon who had embraced the monastic state at Mayo, and that having heard of the progress of St. Willibrord, &c. in Belgium, he went to that country, and thence, to be qualified for the mission, to Rome, where he was consecrated bishop ; that he then returned to Belgium, &c. This hypothesis may appear rather ingenious ; but how is it to be reconciled with the constant tradition of the church of Mechlin and the testimony of every older writer that has treated of this saint ? It is mentioned, but not adopted, in the Gallia Christiana, Tom. 5. ad Ecclesia Mechliniensis.

(170) Ware has judiciously omitted those pretended bishops of Dublin, prior to the eleventh century ; but Harris has foisted them into his additions. I must here observe that some modern writers are not sufficiently cautious in distinguishing Ware's original work from Harris' interpolations. Thus I find in a note at St. Rumold in Butler's Lives of Saints (1 July) Ware's Bishops referred to for an account of this saint. Now Ware has not given any account whatsoever of him; and, instead of Ware's name, that of Harris should have appeared in said note. We have just seen, that the martyrology of Mechlin places St. Rumold at Dublin. To this first mistake has been added another, viz. that he succeeded there one Gualafer, (meaning perhaps Gallagher) by whom he is said to have been baptized. Molanus has this story, and from him Burke (Office, &c.) and Harris (Bishops at Dublin) have borrowed it. In the Lateran Office there is no mention of this bishop Gualafer, &c. Nor is there any thing in this Office of what Burke has concerning St. Rumold having been consecrated in the cathedral of Dublin by Cuthbert archbishop of Canterbury! What cathedral could there have been at that period in Dublin? or who has ever heard of an archbishop of Canterbury coming over to consecrate bishops in Ireland?

(171) Molanus says that old documents of the church of Mechlin make him son of a king David, meaning, I suppose, Dathy, an Irish name, which by persons writing in Latin has been sometimes changed into David. Burke (ib.) tells us, that this David was king of Dublin, and that his queen was Cecilia, a daughter of a king of Cashel. This is all very fine; but Theodoric and the Lateran breviary, omitting the names of St. Rumold's parents, merely state that he was of the royal house of Ireland and by right of succession heir to a throne.

(172) Theodoric states, that their motive was to get the money, which they thought the saint possessed of, and adds that they had been attendants of his. Probably they supposed that he must have had some money about him towards forwarding the object of his missions.

(173) This is the year assigned for the martyrdom of St. Rumold by Molanus, Usher, Pagi, &c.

§. XVI. During this period we meet with a bishop at Mayo, St. Aidan, who died in 769, (174) and after whom we do not find another there for some centuries. Whether a Ronan, called of Lismore, who is said to have died in 763, was bishop or not, there does not appear any sufficient authority for determining. (175) If he was bishop of Lismore, he is the last who appears there, as such, for more than 200 years, although it cannot be doubted that a regular succession was kept up in that distinguished see. To A. D. 775 is assigned the death of Fulcharta or Fulartach, bishop of Clonard, (176) who in some Irish calendars is stated to have been the same as St. Fulartach, son of Brec of an illustrious family of Ulster, and who had lived as a hermit at a place, called from him Disert-Fulartach, in Hifalgia, now Ophaly in the county of Kildare. This is indeed very probable, although some have made a distinction between them, allowing, however, that both of them belonged to the eighth century. (177) According to said calendars the memory of St. Fulartach, one and the same, was revered on the 29th of March. Senchai, bishop of Emly, died in 778; (178) and in the following year St. Algnied, bishop of Ardbraccan, whose name is marked in some calendars at 8 March. (179) Ferdornach, whom I find reckoned among the bishops of Tuam, is said to have died in 781. (180) To 783 is affixed the death of two bishops of Kildare, one after another, Lomtul and Snedbran. (181) In these times there was a bishop at Cluain-dolcain (Clondalkin) near Dublin, St. Fergusill, concerning whom nothing further is known except that he died in 785, and that his festival was kept on the 10th of March. (182) To the same year is assigned the death of three eminent abbots, Murgal of Clonmacnois, Virgilius of Aghabo, and Fethach of Louth, Slane, and Duleek. (183)

(174) AA. SS. p. 606. The date of the 4 Masters is 768 (769).

(175) Ware and Harris have Ronan, (Bishops at Lismore) but without letting us know where they found him, or giving us any proof of his having been a bishop.

(176) Ware (Bishops of Clonard at Meath) has omitted this Fulartach of the eighth century; but the 4 Masters and Colgan, (AA. SS. p. 787.) who are followed by Harris, make express mention of him, placing his death in 774 (775). He was, I believe, led astray by the list of Finnian's successors at Clonard, given in AA. SS. p. 406. where the bishop Fulartach is placed next after Senach, who died in 588, and omitted where he ought to be, viz. at A. 775. This is plainly one of the innumerable mistakes that appear in Colgan's printed text. Ware, being not aware of it, has Fulartach immediately after Senach, leaving him out elsewhere. Harris took care to avoid this mistake, and, instead of mentioning Fulartach next after Senach, brought him down to his real times, viz. the eighth century.

(177) The 4 Masters, ap. AA. SS. at 29 March, p. 787, where a short account is given of Fulartach son of Brec, assign his death (for their words cannot be referred to any thing else) to A. 755 (756) while they place that of the bishop of Clonard in 775. I am inclined to think, that on this point their authority is inferior to that of the old calendars.

(178) Ware, Bishops at Emly.

(179) AA. SS. p. 568. The 4 Masters have his death at 778, i. e. 779.

(180) Ware in his general treatise on the bishops of Ireland has Ferdornach at Tuam, but not so in his older tract on the archbishops of Cashel and Tuam. Where he met with him I cannot tell. Colgan seems to have known nothing about him, as appears from Tr. Th. p. 308. where, endeavouring to make out as many ancient bishops of Tuam as he could, he makes no mention of Ferdornach.

(181) 4 Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 629. I have changed their date 782 into 783. At the same year they have the death of Murdach abbot of Kildare, whence we see that there were abbots at Kildare different from its bishops.

(182) AA. SS. p. 577. The date of the 4 Masters is 784 (785). Before this saint's time there was a monastery at Clondalkin.

(183) Ib. p. 800. and Ind. Chron.

CHAPTER XX.

History of St. Fergal, or Virgilius, resumed and finished—Clemens and Albinus, Irishmen, arrive in France—Albinus sent as Ambassador from the Emperor Charlemagne to the Pope, a different person from Alcuin—Monastery of Verden established in Saxony for the Scots or Irish—Patto, an Irishman, second bishop of Verden—Irish extend their missions to Iceland—St. Sedulius said to be bishop of Dublin, and to have died in A. D. 786—Colga, Coelchu or Colcu, the wise, presides over the school of Cluain-mac-Nois—corresponds with Alcuin—St. Moelruan bishop of Tallagh—Succession of Archbishops of Armagh, and of other Irish bishops—First invasion of Ireland by the Danes—St. Findan—visits France, Italy and Switzerland—his great sanctity—is adopted as their patron by the monks of Rhignau—Succession of Donnchad and other Irish monarchs—Irish Clergy obtain exemption from attending the kings on military expeditions—Fothad lecturer of Armagh—Aengus the Hagiologist—his Festilogium—he is called Ceile-De—Became abbot of Clonenagh—and was raised to the episcopal rank—Various works of his—Succession of archbishops in Armagh—and abbots in Hy—Death of St. Blathmaic, martyred in Hy by the Danes—Deaths of various holy and distinguished persons in Ireland—Dungal, an Irishman—his two Epistles to Charlemagne—writes against Claudius, a Spaniard, bishop of Turin, who had removed the images and crosses from all the churches in his Diocese—Claudius bishop of Turin supposed by some learned men to be an Irishman—Gildas—Deaths of bishops of various sees in Ireland—Metropolitan rights of the see of Armagh extended all over Ireland—Deaths of several learned and holy men.

SECT. I.

ST. Virgilius, bishop of Saltzburg, (1) soon after his being in possession of the see, consecrated a basilic in that city in honour of St. Stephen, in which he placed an abbot and monks taken from the monastery and church of St. Peter, which was still considered as the cathedral. (2) Some time after he repaired this monastery, of which he had been abbot, and enlarged the cell of St. Maximilian, which had been built by St. Rupert the first bishop of Saltzburg. He established another cell at Ottinga, which was endowed by Count Gunther, at whose expense it had been erected. But his chief work in this respect was a great basilic, which he got constructed and dedicated in the name of St. Rupert, which, having removed that saint's remains to it, he constituted the cathedral. This holy bishop did not confine himself to accommodating his flock with places of worship, but likewise, as became a true pastor, was assiduous in preaching, instructing, and propagating the Gospel. Karastus, a son of Boruth, the Sclavonian duke of Carinthia, and Chetimar a nephew of Boruth were in those times detained as hostages in Bavaria, where, at his request, they were baptized and educated as Christians. On the death of Boruth, Karastus became duke of that country, and, having died in the third year of his rule, was succeeded by Chetimar, who was very religious and had with him as instructor Majoranus a priest, who had been ordained by St. Virgilius. Chetimar had a great respect for the monastery (St. Peter's) of Saltzburg, owing, in all appearance, to his having studied there in his earlier days, under the direction of its learned and holy abbot, and used to make some presents to it every year as tokens of a sort of homage. Some time after he was raised to the dukedom of Carinthia he requested Virgilius, then bishop, to visit his territories and confirm his subjects in the faith. It being then out of his power to comply with the duke's wish, he sent to that country Modestus, a bishop, together with some priests, a deacon, and other inferior clerks, authorizing him to consecrate churches, perform ordinations, &c. Modestus spent the remainder of his life in Carinthia, and after his death St. Virgilius was again requested by Chetimar to proceed thither. But in consequence of intestine troubles, by which the dutchy was agitated, he was prevented from visiting it, and sent, in his stead, Latinus a priest, who was soon after, owing to civil broils, obliged to leave it. The saint, however, kept a fixed eye on Carinthia, and during the administration both of Chetimar and of his successor Watune supplied it with priests and other clergymen. Thus the Carinthian church was established, and St. Virgilius has been justly called the Apostle of that province.

Towards the end of his life the good bishop undertook a general visitation of his vast diocese, for the purpose of eradicating whatever remnants there might be of idolatry, and of strengthening his flock in the belief and observance of the Christian religion. He was every where welcomed and received with the greatest attention by crowds of all descriptions, and during his progress consecrated churches, ordained clergymen, &c. In this visitation was comprized Carinthia, through which he proceeded as far as the frontiers of the Huns, where the Drave joins the Danube. Perceiving that his dissolution was near at hand, St. Virgilius returned to Saltzburg, where, having celebrated the sacred mysteries, and being seized with a gentle illness, he breathed his last on the 27th of November, A. D. 785. (3) Some tracts have been attributed to him; (4) but whether he was an author or not, he has been most highly celebrated for learning. Nor was he less esteemed for his piety and fulfilment of his pastoral duties; (5) and it is stated that many miracles have taken place at his tomb in Saltzburg. (6)

(1) See Chap. XIX. §. 11.

(2) Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 756. He says that Virgilius consecrated the basilic of St. Stephen in the first year of his ordination. This would have occurred after the 15th of June, the day of his ordination or consecration, in 756, or, if it be true that he deferred his consecration for some time, (see Chap. XIX. §. 12.) in a later year.

(3) Mabillon, (ib. ad A. 785.) and Pagi (Critica, &c. ad A. 785.) have proved from certain Annals of Ratisbon and other documents, that this was the real year of the saint's death. Therefore Fleury was mistaken (Hist. Eccl. L. 44. §. 3.) in assigning it to 780, which date he took from the Life of St. Virgil, according to one edition; for another has A. 784. But both these dates are wrong.

(4) Ware (Writers at Virgilius) makes mention of a Discourse on the Antipodes, but does not tell us where it exists. He adds that Virgilius is the reputed author of a Glossary quoted by Melchior Goldast.

(5) Alcuin, in his encomium on St. Virgilius (Poem. No. 231.) has among other lines;

“ Egregius praesul meritis et moribus almus,
 Protulit in lucem quem mater Hibernia primum,
 Instituit, docuit, nutritiv—————
 Sed Peregrina petens —————
 Vir pius et prudens, nulli pietate secundus.”

(6) The second part of his Life contains an account of a great number of these miracles.

§. II. About the year 772, as far as I am able to judge, two very celebrated Irishmen, Clemens and Albinus, as he is usually called, arrived in France. For it appears from good authority, that they were in that country not only prior to the arrival of Alcuin, but likewise a short time after

Charles, known by the name of Charlemagne, became sole sovereign of the whole French monarchy, as he did in the latter end of 771 by the death of his brother Carloman. The whole matter is stated in a very clear manner by a writer of the ninth century, who relating the transactions of Charlemagne (7) has the following narrative at the very beginning of his work. “When the illustrious Charles “began to reign alone in the western parts of the “world, and literature was every where almost forgotten, it happened that two Scots of Ireland came “over with some British merchants to the shores “of France, men incomparably skilled in human “learning and in the holy scriptures. As they produced no merchandise for sale, they used to cry “out to the crowds flocking to purchase; If any “one is desirous of wisdom, let him come to us and “receive it; for we have it to sell. Their reason “for saying that they had it for sale was that, perceiving the people inclined to deal in saleable articles and not to take any thing gratuitously, they “might rouse them to the acquisition of wisdom, as “well as of objects for which they should give value; “or, as the sequel showed, that by speaking in that “manner they might excite their wonder and astonishment. They repeated this declaration so often that an account of them was conveyed either “by their admirers, or by those who thought them “insane, to the king Charles, who, being a lover “and very desirous of wisdom, had them conducted “with all expedition before him, and asked them if “they truly possessed wisdom, as had been reported “to him. They answered, that they did, and were “ready in the name of the Lord to communicate it “to such as would seek for it worthily. On his inquiring of them what compensation they would “expect for it, they replied that they required nothing more than convenient situations, ingenious “minds, and, as being in a foreign country, to be “supplied with food and raiment. Charles, having “heard their proposals, and replete with joy, kept “them both with himself for a short time. After “some interval, when obliged to proceed on a mili“tary expedition, (8) he ordered one of them whose “name was Clemens, to remain in France, entrust-“ing to his care a great number of boys not only of “the highest noblesse, but likewise of the middling

 “and low ranks of society, all of whom were, by “his orders, provided with victuals and suitable ha“bitations. The other, by name Albinus, (9) he “directed to Italy, and assigned to him the monas“tery of St. Augustin near Pavia, that such per“sons, as chose to do so, might there resort to him
 “for instruction. On hearing how graciously the “most religious king Charles used to treat wise men, “Albinus (10) an Englishman took shipping and “went over to him,” &c. (11)

(7) This writer was a monk of St. Gall in Switzerland, and hence he is commonly called Monachus Sangallensis. His two books, De gestis Caroli M. are in Canisius' Antiq. Lect. Tom. 2. Part 3. Basnage's ed. They were addressed to Charles the fat, and consequently written between 884 and 888. Melchior Goldastus, Usher, and many others, have supposed that he was the celebrated Notker Balbulus. This, however, is not quite certain. Mabillon, a great judge in matters of this kind, calls him (ex. c. Annal. B. Tom. 2. p. 67.) the anonymous monk of St. Gall, and Muratori (Annali di Italia) designates him merely by the title of Monaco di S. Gallo, the monk of St. Gall, for instance at A. 781. But this question does not affect the antiquity or authority of this work.

(8) From what will be seen lower down it appears most probable that this was one of his expeditions against the Saxons, either that of 775, or the one of 776.

(9) The words, nomine Albinus, (by name Albinus) are in the printed text of the monk of St. Gall, as edited by Canisius, but are omitted in Duchesne's edition among the Rerum Francicarum Scriptores. Colgan in his long dissertation on Clemens (at 20 March) which comprizes also an account of his companion, says that they are wanting in various MSS. He contends that the real name of said companion was not Albinus but John; and so he is called by Vincentius Bellovacensis and some others, whose authority is not worth attending to, as appears from their joining with Clemens also Alcuin and even Rabanus Maurus. And there is good reason to think, that they mistook John Scotus Erigena, who lived many years later, for the companion of Clemens, whom they accordingly called John. Or might it be that the companion of Clemens had both names? Buchanan (Rer. Scot. L. 5. Rex 65.) calls him Johannes Albinus, and would fain make him a Scotchman on account of the surname Albinus. He might as well have pronounced Alcuin a Scotchman, as he also assumed the name Albinus. If, as indeed I think highly probable, Clemens's companion was called Albinus, this might have been either his original name, or, if a surname, given to him on account of his fair hair or complexion. Perhaps his Irish name was Finnbarr, Finan, or Finian, which, by retaining its signification, was latinized into Albinus. As to the name John, prefixed by Buchanan to Albinus, I suspect that he took it from Hector Boethius, or some one of those writers, who followed Vincentius Bellovacensis. Not content with representing Albinus as a British Scot, he thrusts in also Clemens as such, notwithstanding the positive assertion of the monk of St. Gall, the oldest and best authority, that he and his companion were Scots of Ireland. On these and other pretensions in favour of the British Scots J. P. Murray has justly remarked, (De Britannia atque Hibernia sec. a vi. ad x. litterarum domicilio, in N. Commentar. Soc. R. Gotting. Tom. 2.) that Buchanan went quite too far; "Sed nimia Scotiae suae aperte tribuit eximius vates, cum istam litterarum elegantiam, cumque Albinum illi tribuerit."

To return to the words, nomine Albinus, it is very probable that they were not in the original text of the monk; for several writers, when copying his narrative, have them not, while they closely follow the remainder of his text. (See their passages ap. Colgan on Clemens, &c.) Muratori observes, (Annali, &c. at A. 781. and Antiq. Ital. medii aevi, Tom. III. Dissert. 43.) that the name of Clemens's companion is not precisely known, whence it is clear that he did not consider said words as written by the monk.

But, allowing them to be an interpolation, it does not follow that they are wrong; for the person, who inserted them, might have known from other sources that Albinus was the name of the companion of Clemens. He did not confound him with Alcuin, who also was named Albinus, and who appears immediately after in the text as clearly distinct from the other Albinus.

(10) He was the celebrated Alcuin, who took the more classical appellation of Flaccus Albinus, not, as some have called him, Albinus Flaccus. (See Mabillon, Annal. &c. Tom. 2. p. 186.) In what the author adds about the manner of Alcuin's having become acquainted with the king Charles, and his having been a disciple of Bede, there are some mistakes, which it is not my business to correct.

(11) Brucker (Hist. Phil. Tom. 3. p. 586.) took it into his head to reject as fabulous a great part of this narrative. There are certainly some fables in the additions made to it by Vincentius Bellocensis, Hector Boethius, Arnold Wion, &c. and by those who talk of the University of Paris as founded by Clemens. But taking it as given by the monk of St. Gall, I can perceive nothing fabulous or inconsistent, nor does Brucker give us any proof of his assertion. Perhaps he thought there was something ridiculous in the cry of those two learned men that they had wisdom to sell, as if the stiff and guarded style of our days, were observed at all times and by all nations. They alluded to the traffick that was going on between the merchants and the assembled people, and, not having any usual article of commerce, announced that what they had to dispose of was wisdom. We find very many expressions of a similar kind in the Scriptures, particularly in Proverbs, which exhibit wisdom as the most valuable of commodities, and in which people are invited to partake of it. Clemens and his companion were well acquainted with such phrases, and seem to have had an eye to them in their manner of addressing the crowd. Yet Brucker does not deny that these persons came to France, and states (ib. p. 629.) that Clemens was of great help to Alcuin, and that he was diligent and skilful in establishing the schools of France and Italy. Tiraboschi goes much farther than Brucker; for he endeavours to prove, (Storia della Letteratura Italiana, Tom. 3. L. 3. cap. 1.) that the whole business is a fable, and that there were no such persons in existence. He had laid down a position that no teachers were sent by Charles to instruct the Italians, who, he says, were not then in need of foreigners for that purpose. But, whether they were or not, might not the king have given literary situations to foreigners in Lombardy as well as in France, where nobody denies that he did? Many a foreigner have I known teaching in Italy at a period of its enjoying high literary splendour; and I myself have had the honour of holding a Professor's chair in that very city of Pavia, where Tiraboschi would not allow that a Scotchman, as he calls him, (for he seems not to have known that the Irish were called Scots) taught in the eighth century. He opposes Gatti, who in his history of the University of Pavia adhered to the monk's narrative, abuses Denina for having said that Charles placed two Irishmen over schools in Italy and France, and expresses his surprize that this was admitted by Muratori. But, if such a man as Muratori allowed it, Tiraboschi, who was vastly his inferior on points connected with the history of the middle ages, need not have been ashamed to acknowledge it; and it is but too true that literature was in a very low state at that period in Italy, and for a hundred years prior to it, as is avowed and lamented in the letters of Pope Agatho and the synod of Rome written in 680 to the emperor Constantine. (See Fleury, Hist. Eccl. L. 40. §. 7.) The literary glory of Italy, both ancient and modern, is founded on so solid a basis, that a native of that beautiful country and land of genius may, without any disparagement to it, confess that it has had, like many other parts of the world, its days of darkness, owing to the irruptions of barbarians, by whom both they and Italy have been desolated. And it is a childish vanity to strive to uphold a nation's character of any sort at the expense of historical truth. Muratori was not guilty of it; for he allows and proves, (Antiq. Ital. &c. Tom. III. Dissert. 43.) that in Italy learning had greatly declined in the time we are now treating of. It might be expected, that Tiraboschi would have adduced some proof of his assertion; but he gives us none except his saying that it would have been a strange thing to offer to sell learning to persons who came to buy merchandize. This I have already explained. He adds, that the whole matter depends on the authority of the monk, to whom, however he gratuitously pays the compliment of not having invented it. Who then was the inventor? Tiraboschi ought to have perceived, that this supposition strikes against himself; for in this case the history of the two Irishmen must have been spoken of before it was related by the monk. Is it to be imagined, that he would have announced, within about 70 years after the death of Charlemagne, as facts, circumstances, which there were persons still alive to show the falshood of, if not true? Or, that he would have related them, if doubtful, to a sovereign the great grandson of Charlemagne? Or that he would have ventured to be so particular as to state that the teacher sent to Pavia got the grant of the monastery of St. Augustin? He must have known, that every monk of that celebrated establishment, which has existed for ages, could have contradicted him unless the matter were universally acknowledged. Tiraboschi objects, that the monk of St. Gall is the only writer of those times, who has left an account of those proceedings. Be it so; but did he suppose that writers were as numerous in that period, or as minute in recording facts, as they are at present? Many facts are received as historical upon authority much less contemporary and explicit than that of the monk of St. Gall. Besides, as will be seen, he is not the only writer of those days, who has furnished us with some account, at least, of Clemens. Some other desultory doubts will be considered lower down.

§. 3. From this account it is plain that these two Irishmen were in France before Alcuin (the English Albinus) waited on King Charles in that country, and consequently prior to 781. (12) But as their arrival is stated to have occurred when Charles began to reign alone, we may justly conclude that it was earlier by eight or nine years. An Albinus, a favourite of Charles, is mentioned as one of the ambassadors, whom he sent to Pope Adrian in 773, and who was undoubtedly different from Alcuin, with whom Charles was not yet acquainted. (13) It is probable that he was the Irish Albinus, who as well as Clemens appear, from the manner in which the king treated them, to have become great favourites of his. And following this supposition, it may also be conjectured, that he continued as an inmate in the palace until he was sent on that embassy. (14)

But, whether the companion of Clemens was the ambassador or not, he could not have been placed at Pavia until either the latter end of 774, or after said year, it being that in which Charles got possession of that city. (15) Concerning his subsequent transactions nothing further, that can be depended upon, is known, except that he taught at Pavia, (16) but how long we have no account of. It has been said, that he died there; and some writings have been attributed to him, which, however, cannot at present be distinctly pointed out. (17)

It is stated that, when Charles returned from his expeditions, he ordered the boys, whom he had left under the care of Clemens, to appear before him, and had them examined in their classical studies. Finding that those of the inferior orders had made wonderful progress, while the nobles had made none at all, he solemnly declared that he would have no consideration for the difference of ranks, and that nobility alone should not be a road to preferment, whereas he was determined to grant favours and places solely according to learning and merit without distinction of persons. (18) Where Clemens kept his school, is not ascertained, although some writers have said that it was at Paris, and others would fain make us believe that he was the founder or first teacher of its university (19) The history of Clemens has been greatly confused by the name of Claudius being prefixed by certain late authors (20) to his real name, and by his having been strangely confounded with Clemens, a bishop of Auxerre, who was dead many years before he arrived in France. (21) He was alive and still teaching in the year 802, (22) and perhaps survived Charlemagne, as indeed must have been the case, if, as appears very probable, he was the Clemens who drew up a Life of that sovereign. (23) There are extant under his name some grammatical collections, but whether they have been printed or not I am not able to tell.

(24) Several other tracts have been attributed to him, but most, if not all, of them, without foundation. (25)

(12) This was, as Mabillon shows, (Annal. &c. ad A. 781.) the year, in which Alcuin first stopped in France. Charles had met him in Italy, and took such a liking for him, that he induced him to promise that he would call upon him on his return from that country. Alcuin did so, and soon after his arrival in France got from the king a grant of two abbies. Some years later he proceeded to England, where he remained until 792, or the beginning of 793, when he returned to France and there spent the remainder of his life. It is therefore a mistake to suppose, as several writers have done, that Alcuin was not settled in France before 792. It was, I believe, in consequence of this mistake that Usher (Ind. Chron.) assigned the arrival there of Clemens and Albinus to A. D. 791, thinking that it was not long prior to that of Alcuin.

(13) See Mabillon, (Annal. &c. ad. 773. Anastasius Bibliothecarius, from whom we have an account of this embassy, says of Albinus that he was deliciosus ipsius regis, that is, a favourite and one whom the king was very fond of.

(14) The monk of St. Gall says, as we have seen, that Charles kept the two learned Irishmen with himself for a short time. Supposing that their arrival in France was in 772, and perhaps late in that year, they were probably living with him until some time in 773.

(15) Muratori, making mention (Annali, &c. at A. 781) of the arrival of Clemen's companion at Pavia, does not mark the year of it, merely observing that it was after 744. It was very probably almost immediately after said year, as Charles in his zeal for promoting literature may be supposed to have lost no time in supplying his new subjects of Lombardy with a good school. Add that Albinus is stated to have been sent to Pavia just at the time that Charles was setting out on a military expedition. Now among his various expeditions we find one in 775, and another in 776, both against the Saxons. It may be objected to what I have said concerning Clemens and Albinus having arrived in France as early as about 772, that their arrival must have been later, whereas the monk of St. Gall seems to place Albinus' departure for Pavia just after the short time that he and Clemens had spent with the king in his residence, and accordingly, as Albinus did not go to Pavia until about 775, ought to be assigned to about 774. But we are not bound to understand the monk's words, as if he meant to say that they remained in the palace until the very time that Albinus was ordered to proceed to Pavia. He states indeed that it was subsequent to that of their living with the king, but does not tell us that it was immediately so; and there is nothing to prevent our supposing, that they had left the palace, and were teaching somewhere in France, two or three years prior to the departure of Albinus for Pavia.

(16) Muratori (ib.) merely says, that under this able master learning began to revive at Pavia. The story of his having been the founder of the celebrated university of that city is not worth the trouble of inquiring into. Muratori was wrong in making him and Clemens Benedictine monks. They certainly were not so before they arrived in France, for there were no Benedictines then in Ireland; nor does it appear, that they were monks at all. Albinus might have become a Benedictine after he got the grant of the monastery of St. Augustin, so called, instead of its former title, St Peter, from its containing the remains of the great bishop of Hippo. But whether he did or not we are not able to ascertain.

(17) Ware (Writers at Albinus) ascribes to him some epistles as extant. I wish he had told us where they are to be found. He was also inclined to make him the author of certain Rhetorical precepts, which Buchanan says he saw under the name of his John Albinus. (See Not. 9.) If Buchanan and Ware meant the treatise or dialogue on Rhetoric published among the works of Alcuin, it is clear that they were mistaken; for said treatise was undoubtedly written by the English Albinus, that is, Alcuin himself. As to an Epistle said by Hoveden (Annal. ad A. 792) and other English authors to have been written by an Albinus against the second Council of Nice concerning image worship, the Irish Albinus had nothing to do with it; and it is plain that Hoveden, &c. meant Alcuin; for they state that it was written in England, and that Albinus, its author, brought it thence to the king Charles. By the bye I may remark, that no such epistle was written by Alcuin; (see Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 792.) but it is probable, that Hoveden, &c. mistook the Caroline books on the question of images, in the composition of which Alcuin was perhaps concerned, (Mabillon, ib. ad A. 794.) for an Epistle, which they supposed to have been drawn up by him in England.

(18) See in the monk's De Gestis, &c. just after the above narrative.

(19) Colgan has (at 20 March) collected on these points a heap of rubbish, which is now exploded by every man of learning. The monk of St. Gall has nothing about the place, in which Clemens taught. But Vincentius Bellovacensis and others have added that it was Paris, as if that city had been the usual residence of the king Charles, whereas it is well known that it was not. And as to the foundation of the university, it is laughable to observe, with what ardour it has been disputed whether the so called founder were Clemens or Alcuin. That the latter was not is a clear case; for it has been proved not only by Du Chesne, the editor of his works, but likewise by Mabillon, (ad A. 802) that he never taught at Paris. Whether Clemens had a school there or not, is of little consequence; but this much is well known, that there was no such thing as a university there in those times, nor even the embryo of one until about the end of the eleventh century. (See the Encyclopédie at Université.)

(20) Ware observes, (Writers at Clemens) that, as well as he could discover, Bale (not Bede according to a shameful error in the English translation, which Harris has avoided) was the first who prefixed Claudius to the name of Clemens. A Claudius, of whom we shall see elsewhere, flourished during the reign of Lewis le Debonnaire, and has been reckoned by Vincentius Bellovacensis and some followers of his as one of four pretended founders of the university of Paris. These writers have not Clemens among said founders, although some of them on other occasions say that he taught at Paris. Other authors of this notable stamp, looking for those founders, mention Clemens without naming Claudius. To patch up the business, it occurred to somebody, that Clemens and Claudius might be considered as one and the same person; and thus, sometime in the 16th century, the learned Irishman appeared under the double name of Claudius Clemens. Upon these blunders Tiraboschi built up an argument, which he thought of great weight. He urges that certain writers call the Irish teacher Claudius Clemens; now, as he shows, Claudius was a different person; ergo there was no such man as Clemens. This is really bad logic; as if the mistakes and confused conjectures of such late authors could overturn the assertions of one of the ninth century. If the monk of St. Gall had prefixed the name Claudius to Clemens, such a mode of reasoning would be allowable; but whereas he has not done so, why fling out against his authority the nonsense of persons that lived hundreds of years later? Then, adds Tiraboschi, these writers, when treating of Clemens, contradict each other. Well, and where is the harm of it? Surely there can be nothing more illogical than to conclude from the contradictions of modern writers, that persons, whom they treat of inaccurately, never existed. Were such a critical rule admitted, what history would be safe, even that of the distinguished men of Greece and Rome? Had Tiraboschi been able to prove, which indeed he has not attempted, that the monk contradicted himself or any other writer of his times, there would be a fair field for disputation; or if those, who maintain that Clemens and his companion were Irishmen and taught in France and Italy, founded their positions merely on such late and confused authority as that of Vincentius Bellocensis, &c. his objections would be worth listening to. But as this is not the main authority resorted to on the question, such exceptions are quite nugatory and out of place; nor will any sort of quibbling avail against the monk's narrative until, what can never be done, it shall be proved that he was not author of it. Yet we may observe that it would be very extraordinary, that, besides Vincentius, a multitude of writers, among whom Wyon, Gaguin, Claude Roberti, should have said so much about Clemens and his comrade, if they had not been in France during the reign of Charlemagne.

(21) Colgan (at 20 March) has endeavoured to support the fable of our Clemens having become bishop of Auxerre; but Ware and Harris, (loc. cit.) have cautioned the reader against it, and indeed justly; for, not to quote other authors, Mabillon (Annal. &c. Tom. 2. p. 63.) makes it clear, that Clemens of Auxerre died about 738.

(22) In an ancient catalogue of the abbots of Fulda, quoted by Brower (Notes to the poems of Rabanus) we read that Ratgar, who was one of them, on the occasion of sending Rabanus and Hatto to Tours there to study under Alcuin, directed others, among whom Modestus and Candidus, to Clemens the Scot for the purpose of being instructed in Grammar, that is, in classic branches of learning then comprized under that name. Ratgar became abbot of Fulda in 802, and just after his accession sent those students to France. (See Mabillon, Annal. &c. ad A. 802.) To a loose question of Tiraboschi, Who was Clemens? we may now answer, that, although we do not know who were his father and mother, he was the learned Irish Scot mentioned by the monk of St. Gall, and whose reputation was so great that young men were sent from Germany to his school.

(23) Wolfgang Lazius in his Commentaries on the Roman commonwealth quotes this Life by Clemens. See Usher, Preface to Ep. Hib. Syll. and Ware at Clemens.

(24) Usher (ib.) observes, that they are quoted by Melchior Goldast.

(25) Possevin and others, who are followed by Colgan, have, in consequence of confounding Clemens with Claudius, made him the author of various works, which have been usually ascribed to the latter. It is odd that Colgan refers even to Ware for several of them as if written by Clemens, although Ware had distinguished him from Claudius. It may be, however, that, owing to said confusion, Claudius has been supposed the author of some tracts, written perhaps by Clemens.

§. iv. After the same king Charles had founded the new bishoprics of Minden and Verden in the old Saxony, A. D. 786, as is usually supposed, (26) a monastery was established for the Scots, that is, at least chiefly, the Irish, at a place near Verden, called Amarbaric, over whom was placed Patto a countryman of theirs. (27) Patto is stated to have become bishop of Verden after the death of its first bishop St. Suibert, and was succeeded at Amarbaric by Tanco, also a Scot and, in all probability, an Irish one, who likewise was raised to that see as its third bishop. (28) After him are mentioned Cortilla or Nortyla, and three others as abbots of Amarbaric, under the last of whom, Harruch of the same nation, that monastery is said to have been destroyed. (29)

Prior to these times, and most probably much earlier, the Irish had extended their missions even to Iceland, which they called Thule, or Tyle, and which, it seems, they had a knowledge of as far back as the fifth century. (30) Whether it was inhabited at that early period it is difficult to determine; (31) but it is certain, that it contained inhabitants long before the time assigned by some writers for its first population. (32) At whatsoever time Irish missionaries first visited that island, there can be no doubt of some of them having been there in the eighth century, (33) and it may be justly laid down, that this mission was kept up until the arrival of the Norwegians, who by expelling the Irish clergy put a stop to it. (34) If religious men from Ireland had got in those days as far as Iceland, we are not to wonder at finding others of them settled in the Orkneys and the Shetland isles. (35) I cannot discover any particular account of such of them as were the chiefs of these northern missions, or who might have been distinguished for peculiar sanctity or learning; but nothing can more strongly prove the zeal of the Irish clergy of those times, for the conversion of infidels, than their proceeding so far northward for the purpose of disseminating the saving truths of the Gospel.

(26) Fleury, L. 44. §. 20. The Bollandists (at St. Patto 30 Mart.) quote a chronicle of Verden, which assigns the foundation of that see to 786. Its first bishop was Suibert or Suitbert, who is said to have been an Englishman, and must not be confounded with St. Willebrord's companion the bishop Suitbert, who died in 713.

(27) Colgan, treating of Patto (at 30 March) maintains that he was an Irish Scot. This is very probable, although in the accounts given of him, chiefly by Albert Crantz, (Hist. Eccl. Saxoniae) he is called simply Scotus natione. But as the Irish were more generally known in those times by the name Scoti than their colonists of Britain, the probability is in favour of Colgan's opinion. N. Britain was not then, nor for a very long time later, called Scotia; and accordingly, when we find a Scot or Scots spoken of by old writers, it is to be presumed that they meant natives of Ireland, unless something be added to indicate that such persons were British Scots. Bede was very particular in this respect; for wherever he touches upon the affairs of these Scots, he designates them as the Scots, who inhabit Britain. (See ex. c. Hist. &c. L. 1. c. 34 and L. 5. c. 23.) The English families settled in Ireland from the reign of Henry II. were during many generations called English; but who, on finding a person of that period called an Englishman, would not conceive that he was a native of England, unless it were added that he was an Englishman of Ireland. Colgan adduces an argument, which, if uncontradicted, would leave no doubt as to Patto having been an Irishman. Having found that he was said to have been abbot of Amarbaric in his own country before he went to Germany, he observes that there was no such place either in Ireland or Scotland, and that, instead of Amarbaric, we ought to read Armagh. On this the Bollandists (at St. Suibert, 30 April) remark, that Amarbaric seems to have been rather near Verden, and that a monastery was founded there for the Scots, of which Patto was abbot, before he succeeded, as is said, Suibert in the see of Verden. According to this supposition it is a mistake to place Amarbaric in the country, whence Patto came. Mabillon is still more explicit on this point. He says, (Annal &c. at A. 796) that the monastery of Amarbaric, not far from Verden, was founded by Suibert, who placed Patto over it, and that, after a succession of five or six abbots, it ceased to exist. Mabillon gives to the monks of that establishment the general name of Scots, by which the Irish were then universally understood. But this does not prevent our supposing, that some British Scots might have belonged to it, as well as to the many other monasteries founded in those times throughout Germany by or for the Scoto-Irish, who considered the British Scots as their kinsmen, and were well disposed to receive them into their institutions. Whoever is tolerably acquainted with the state of the British Scots of that period, the narrow limits within which they were confined, their wars against the Picts, - the want of religious establishments on a large scale, must immediately perceive, that those swarms of learned and pious men, called Scots, who flockēd to the Continent in those times and during a long subsequent period, could not, generally speaking, have come from the small part of N. Britain then possessēd by the Irish colonists, and that, at least, the great majority of them were the old Scots or Irish. When Walafrid Strabo, who lived early in the ninth century, observes, (Vit. S. Galli L. 2. c. 46.) that the custom of visiting foreign countries was become a sort of second nature to the Scots, he plainly means the natives of Ireland; for he introduces one of them, who had been left sick in St. Gall's monastery, and who was still alive in his time, as imploring the saint, who appeared to him in a dream, to relieve him as being a countryman of his. And, wherever else in said work Walafrid makes mention of Scots, he alludes to no others than the Irish, as, for instance, L. 1. c. 20. where St. Gallus, whom he every where represents as a native of Ireland, is spoken of as de gente Scotorum. (See also his Preface.) At the period we are now treating of, the Northumbrian kingdom comprized a very great part, and the best, of modern Scotland; and accordingly, as the inhabitants were not then Scots, it cannot be pretended that many of the eminent men, called Scots, who resorted to the Continent, might have been supplied from that country after having been educated in the schools of Mailros, &c. in said kingdom. The Picts were still distinct from the Scots; and, besides their having had no learned men among them, except foreigners, chiefly Irish, (see Pinkerton, Pref. to Vit. Antiq. SS. &c.) no one will imagine, that their country might have furnished some of those numberless persons, whose fame, under the name of Scots, resounded all over Western Europe. Will it be said that the Scots of Argyle and some neighbouring districts were alone numerous and enlightened enough to send out such crowds of learned and holy men? But what schools had they? Except Hy, which, as often observed, was an Irish school, they had none, I mean a respectable one; nor is there a trace of any such school in the territory of the British Scots until much later times. There were indeed some small monasteries or cells; but no mention occurs of any learned establishment. (See Chalmers, Caledonia, Vol. 1. chap. on the Introduction of Christianity.) Those Scots were welcome to the school of Hy, which, we may be sure, was frequented by several of them; but is it to be supposed, that all the so called Scots, who visited England, France, Germany, &c. had been educated at Hy, or that the Irish Scots, belonging to that house, and who, by the bye, were the far greater number, all staid at home, while none but the British ones went to foreign parts? If Hy were the only establishment, whence the travelling Scots of either nation derived their learning, it should have been ten times as large as it was, considering the multitudes of them that emigrated. The truth, however, is that a very considerable portion of these missionaries, &c. had studied in Ireland, which abounded in great schools, such as Armagh, Bangor, which sent out Columbanus, Gallus, and their companions; Lismore, whence St. Cataldus; Clonard, Clonmacnois, Ross, (co. Cork,) Emly, Kildare, Clonenagh, &c. &c. Neither St. Fursey and his companions, nor St. Livinus and others, whom it would be tedious to enumerate, had been members of the monastery of Hy. Next it is to be recollected that the great missionaries, who had really belonged to it, were Irishmen, such as Aidan, Finan, and Colman of Lindisfarne. In those times the British Scots were too much engaged in striving to extend their frontiers, and too poor to apply much to learning; and it was not until after they got possession of the Pictish kingdom in 843, that they set about establishing religious houses and schools on a somewhat extended scale. The Scottish establishment at Dunkeld was not begun until 849; that of Brechin was very late in the 10th century; and the schools of Dumblane and Abernethy, although perhaps earlier, were not formed until a late part of the period comprized between 843 and 1097. (See Chalmers, ib. chap. on the Ecclesiastical history of said period.)

I have been induced to enlarge on this subject, in consequence of having observed, that several continental writers, some of whom were otherwise very learned men, seem to have supposed, that such Scots as distinguished themselves in foreign countries during the seventh, and down to the eleventh or twelfth century, were generally from North Britain, unless some circumstance or indication may happen to occur, which points out Ireland as the land of their birth. Such distinguishing marks do indeed constantly occur; and hence we find that other writers frequently remind the reader, that such and such Scots were from the old Scotia, that is, Irish Scots. Molanus, Philip Ferrarius, Sirmond, Fleury, and many more, particularly German authors, were very careful on this point, while the writers, above alluded to, leave the name Scot, or Scots, as they found it in old documents, without cautioning the reader that the persons so denominated were really Irish. And hence it has come to pass that some late authors of a minor class, writing in the modern languages of Europe, and copying from the Latin works of said writers, are wont to translate Scoti, not adverting to its old signification, Scotchmen, Ecossois, Scozzesi, &c. so as convey to the uninformed an idea that they were uniformly natives of N. Britain. But had the true state of the British Scots in the seventh, eighth, and thence to, at least, the eleventh century, been generally known, the name Scoti, applied to persons during that long period, would be presumed to mean Irishmen, in case there do not appear some special reasons, founded on the context, &c. to show that they were British Scots. If the Bollandists had been well acquainted with the history of these Scots, they need not have been as scrupulous, as we sometimes find them, in their doubts of whether this or that Scot of, ex. c., the eighth century, were from Ireland or the modern Scotland. What I have hitherto stated on these points will help to elucidate the history of several eminent Irishmen, whom we shall meet with in our progress.

(28) The Bollandists (at St. Suibert, 30 April) suspect that Patto was not bishop of Verden, and that the immediate successor of Suibert was Tanco.

(29) See Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 796.) There is no distinct account of the precise times of those abbots or of such of them as became bishops of Verden. What Colgan has about them at St. Patto (30 Mart.) is, as to the chronological part, very incorrect; and it will be sufficient to observe, that all of them flourished after A. D. 786.

(30) See Chap. VIII. §. 8. Not. 91. This is not the place to enter into the celebrated question concerning the Thule so often mentioned by Grecian and Roman writers; but it is certain that Iceland was the island which the Irish called Thyle or Inis Thyle, i. e. the island of Thyle. Not only our old historians are unanimous on this point, (see Colgan AA. SS. p. 242.) but the geographer Dicuill is particularly explicit with regard to it, as, for instance, in what he says concerning the length of the summer days in Thyle, his denying that it was surrounded with ice, and his observing that the frozen sea was one day's sail more to the North.

(31) Playfair (Geography, Vol. III. p. 144) says, that Iceland was inhabited as early as the 5th century; but from what is stated (see above Chap. VIII. ib.) of St. Ailbe's intention to proceed thither for the purpose of leading a life unknown to the world, it may perhaps be conjectured that it was then destitute of inhabitants. This, however, is at most conjectural; for St. Ailbe might, notwithstanding its containing some inhabitants, have found places enough in the island, where he could have remained quite sequestered from them.

(32) The Icelandic historian, Arngrim Jonas, pretends that it was not inhabited until A. D. 874, when it was occupied by the Norwegians. Independently of historical documents, which prove the contrary, it is difficult to suppose that, while so many small islands of the Northern ocean were peopled long before that time, Iceland should have remained uninhabited, particularly as its climate was formerly much more temperate than it has become in the course of ages, and its soil was then much better and more fruitful than at present, besides the advantage of a passage to it not being impeded by ice. It was the Thule of the Romans, as there is good reason to believe, and was certainly inhabited at a far earlier period. But, setting aside this controversy, Arngrim himself supplies us with a proof, that it was peopled prior to the arrival of the Norwegians; for he acknowledges the well known fact, that the Norwegians found there sacred utensils, which had been left by Irish Christians, whom, he says, the ancient Icelanders called Papa or Papas. Pray, who were those old Icelanders, that were able to give some account of the Irish Papas? He must have meant the Norwegian settlers of 874. But, if they were the first inhabitants of the island, what could they have known of said Papas? Had he told us that they discovered the name Papa or Papas, by means of some inscriptions found there, or had he made mention of the Irish books left by the Papas in Iceland, he would have been more consistent with himself. His saying that they were probably fishermen is a poor evasion; for, if so, why should they have left those sacred utensils in an uninhabited country? Unless he supposed that said Papas perished there; but then he tells us that the Norwegians found no traces of any habitation whatsoever. How could this have been, if the Papas had, on landing there, remained for some time in the island, as they surely must have intended to do? Otherwise why bring on shore articles necessary for the celebration of divine service? Passing by these inconsistencies of Arngrim, another Icelandic writer, Ara Multiseius has (Sched. de Islandia, cap. 2.) a clear account of the whole matter. Having observed that, when Ingolfr, the Norwegian, arrived in Iceland, it was in great part covered with forests, he adds, "that there were then Christians " there, whom the Norwegians call Papas, and that they afterwards quitted the country, because they did not like to live with " heathens, and left behind them Irish books, bells, and staves. " Thence it was easy to perceive that they were Irishmen." On this statement we may observe, that the Irish, who were settled there at the time of the Norwegians taking possession of the island, did not, in all probability, leave it voluntarily, but were expelled by those same pagan Norwegians; for otherwise they would have taken along with them their books, &c. Nearly in the same manner are these circumstances stated in the book, called Land-nama-boc (ap. Johnston, Ant. Celto-Scand. p. 14.) in which we read; "Before Iceland was inhabited by the Norwegians, " there were men there whom the Norwegians call Papas, " and who professed the Christian religion, and are thought to " have come by sea from the West; for there were left by them " Irish books, bells and crooked staves, and several other things " were found which seemed to indicate that they were West-men. " These articles were found in Papeya towards the East and in " Papyli." See also Von Troil, (On Iceland, Letter IV.) As to the crooked staves, they were of that kind, which the ancient Irish had a particular veneration for, viz. those, which had belonged to holy bishops, abbots, &c. and which used to be adorned with gold, precious stones, &c. Such was the famous staff of St. Patrick, that of St. Mura, and many others, which were considered as most valuable relics, so that it was usual, even until a late period, to swear by them.

According to the above accounts, those Irishmen, who had lived in Iceland, were called Papa or Papas, by the Norwegians. This might seem to have been a name invented by the old Norwegians for them, because they were in communion with the Pope. But it is more probable, that it was that, which was used by themselves, signifying clergymen. Instances occur in our history of not only bishops but abbots being called Papa. (See Not. 214. to Chap. x.) In a note to Ara (p. 13.) those Papas are stated to have been ecclesiastics. The districts or places in Iceland, bearing the names Papeya and Papyli, afford a strong proof of this supposition; for it is sufficiently clear, that they were so called from having been inhabited by the Irish Papas before the arrival of the Norwegians. It is thus that, as Barry, (History of the Orkneys, p. 115.) following Pinkerton, thinks with great appearance of truth, the persons called Papae, whom the Scandinavians found in the Orkney Islands on their arrival in the ninth century, were the Irish clergymen settled there, who, as they spoke a different language, and were of an appearance and manners different from those of the other inhabitants of said islands, might have been considered by the Scandinavians as a distinct nation. Besides other indications, he observes that many places in these islands were called Papay or Paplay, which, considering their retired and pleasant situation, and the venerable ruins which some of them contain, seem to have been residences of clergymen. There are two whole islands known by that name, Papay Stronsay and Papay Westray, which are remarkable for ruins, and bear strong marks of having been clerical or monastic property.

(33) Dicuill, who has been mentioned already, says in his book, (De mensura provinciarum orbis terrae) that thirty years, prior to the time of writing it, he had got an account of Thyle (Iceland) from some clergymen, who had returned from it after having spent there from the first of February to the first of August. (See Usher, p. 868.) Dicuill flourished in the late part of the eighth and beginning of the ninth century. (Ware, Writers, at Dicuill.) Usher places him (p. 729.) among the writers of the seventh; but as he was living at the time of the Northmannic, or as they are commonly called, Danish piracies, on account of which, he says, (see Ware, Antiq. cap. 24.) several small islands about our island of Ireland have not at present as much as an anchoret in them, he must be assigned to the period, after which said piracies began off the Irish coasts, and which was somewhat later than 790. The date of Dicuill's work is now well known; for Mr. Walckenaer has published it together with Récherches Géographiques et Phisiques on it, Paris, 1814. According to his copy, Dicuill dates his work in 825. Accordingly the thirtieth previous year, in which he had conversed with the clergymen returned from Iceland, will bring us back to about 795. Nor is there any the least hint or any other reason to make us think, that they were the first missionaries, who had gone from Ireland to that country. It seems that the clergymen, who used to be sent on that mission, were occasionally relieved by others from Ireland after a certain period of service.

(34) See Not. 32.

(35) As to the Orkneys see ib. We have observed already, (Chap. xi. §. 14.) that Irish missionaries are said to have been in those islands as early as the times of Columbkil. Dicuill states, that in the Hethlandic, that is, the Shetland isles, there were living Irish hermits since about 100 years prior to the time of his writing. (See Usher, p. 729.)

§. v. St. Sedulius, abbot, and, according to some, bishop at Ath-eliath, now called Dublin, is said to have died in 786. (36) If he was really a bishop, he is the only one that Dublin can lay claim to before the eleventh century; (37) and it is clear, that it was not a regular episcopal see until said century. This, however, does not prevent our admitting, that Sedulius was raised to the episcopal rank, in the same manner as many abbots, distinguished for their merit, used to be in Ireland without attaching permanent sees to their places of residence, and as his neighbour and contemporary, Ferguill, was at Clondalkin. (38) Nothing further is known concerning this St. Sedulius, than that he was the son of one Luat, and departed this life on the 12th of February. A very learned and holy man, Colga, alias Coelchu, Colcu, (in Latin Colcus) surnamed the Wise, presided in these times over the great school of Clonmacnois.

(39) He was of the family of the Hua-Dunechda, and had, it seems, studied at that school. Through his great application, particularly to the Epistles of St. Paul, whom he venerated as his patron, he acquired such a degree of ecclesiastical knowledge that he was looked upon as the most learned man in Ireland, and was styled the Scribe or doctor of all the Scots. His piety was equally great, and accordingly he was raised to the priesthood. At what time he began to teach at Clonmacnois, we are not informed; but he remained there until his death in 792, on, it seems, the 20th February, the day at which his name is marked in the calendars. He left some tracts, one of which, of a devotional kind, has been preserved.

(40) This distinguished man was undoubtedly the lecturer and blessed master Colcu, with whom Alcuin carried on a correspondence, and who had an extraordinary respect for him, as appears from one of his letters to Colcu, which is still extant. (41)

After giving him some news relating to the state of the continent, he styles him most holy father, and calls himself his son. (42) He then mentions one Joseph as an humble servant of Colcu, who, as well as all his other friends then living in France, was serving God in a state of prosperity.

(43) Next he tells him that an unfortunate quarrel had broke out between king Charles and the Mercian king Offa, and that it was said that he himself was to be sent to England for the purpose of negociating a peace between them, as in fact he was in 790, not long after his writing this letter. (44) He requests Colcu's prayers, that God may protect him, whether he should go or not, and laments that he had not received any letter from him for a considerable time.

Alcuin adds an account of some presents, which he had forwarded to him, such as oil, then a scarce article, to be distributed among the bishops; a certain sum of money, partly from the king Charles, and partly from himself, for the brethren (of Clonmacnois); another sum, not so large, from them also, and from another person, for the Southern brethren of Baldhunninega; (45) and some small sums for certain anchorets; requesting that all those persons may pray for himself and for king Charles.

(36) The date of the 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 315.) is 785, i. e. 786.

(37) The 4 Masters call Sedulius only abbot; but the Martyr. Tamloct. and Marian Gorman give him the title of bishop. Ware (Bishops of Dublin) omits him, whereas, according to the old documents of that church, Donat, who lived in the 11th century, was its first bishop. Yet Harris has admitted him, as well as others for whom there is much less foundation. Burke (Office of St. Rumoldus) goes still further, telling us, what it would be hard to guess where he found, that Pope Stephen III. on St. Rumoldus' resigning into his hands the see of Dublin, made it over to Sedulius. This is a patched up story, not worth refutation; for how can it be proved, that St. Rumold ever held said see? (See Chap. XIX. §. 15.)

(38) See ib. §. 16. It is not improbable, that Sedulius' promotion was in consequence of the death of Férugill in 785, as it was requisite that there should be a bishop somewhere in that neighbourhood to exercise the necessary episcopal functions. Perhaps both of them were only chorepiscopi.

(39) Colgan has the Acts of St. Colga at 20 Feb. p. 378. seqq.

(40) Colgan had a copy of it under the title of Scuap chrabhaigh, Scopa devotionis, or Sweeping brush of devotion. He represents it as a collection of most fervent prayers, breathing extraordinary piety. Ware (Writers) has overlooked Colga, but Harris has not.

(41) This letter was published by Usher from two very ancient MSS. of the Cottonian library, in the Ep. Hib. Syll. No. 18., and thence republished by Colgan among the Acts of St. Colga or Colcu. It is headed, "Albini magistri ad Colcum lectorem in Scotia"; then comes the address, "Benedicto Magistro et pio patri Colcu, Alcuine humilis Levita salutem." Harris (Writers, p. 51.) fell into a monstrous mistake in attributing this letter to the Irishman, called Albin, the companion of Clemens, of whom we have treated above. He might have learned not only from the address of it, but likewise from Usher and Colgan, to whom he strangely refers the reader, that it was written by Alcuin.

(42) It is not to be concluded from these and other similar expressions in the letter, that Alcuin had studied under Colcu. For it does not appear, that he had ever been in Ireland. But, as the reputation of both of them was very great, they had heard of each other, and entered into a correspondence. A person might call another Master, or Doctor, and himself his son, without having been under his direction. Mabillon concludes (Annal. Ben. ad A. 790) from the highly respectful manner, in which Colcu is addressed and spoken of by Alcuin, that he must have been a very distinguished man. He then conjectures, that he was perhaps a teacher in Hy. Had he looked into Colgan's AA. SS. a work, which he seems to have been little acquainted with, he would have easily found, that Colcu belonged to Clonmacnois. On this point Mabillon imitated some older Benedictine writers, who, when at a loss with regard to the places, whence some celebrated Irishmen had come, usually recur to Hy, as if that were the greatest of all the Irish schools. Now, from at least the times of Adamnan, it was far from being so, and, although it did not cease to flourish, seems to have been much inferior to some in Ireland, particularly those of Armagh, Clonmacnois, Lismore, Bangor, and Clonard.

(43) This Joseph, who is mentioned in Alcuin's works, (see Letter 67.) had been a scholar of Colcu, as appears from a letter written to him by Alcuin, which Usher found in the MSS. whence he took that to Colcu. (See Ep. Hib. Recens ad. No. 18.) In it Alcuin says to him; “ Your master Colcu is well.” Alcuin had got this information from Ireland, and most probably through a letter from Colcu himself. His adding your to the word master, plainly shows that he meant more than giving the title of master, in general, to Colcu, and that Joseph had studied under him. Hence it may be justly inferred, that Joseph was an Irishman. Colgan enumerates (AA. SS. p. 381.) several persons of said name distinguished at that period in Ireland. It was probably through that Joseph, or some of the other friends of Colcu spoken of by Alcuin, who also appear to have been personally acquainted with him, and consequently are to be presumed natives of Ireland, that an epistolary intercourse took place between those two great men.

(44) See Mabillon, Annal. &c. ad. A. 790. Accordingly the letter was written about two years prior to the death of Colcu which occurred in 792. For the date, 791, marked by Colgan from the 4 Masters, must, following the usual rule, be considered the same as 792.

(45) In Colgan's edition, among other errata, this name is spelled Balthuminega, and, in a note, Baldhunnega, both which have been copied by Harris (Writers, p. 51.). Colgan conjectured that it ought to read Bailechuinnig, so as to mean a town or place of St. Cannech, perhaps Kilkenny or Aghaboe. But, besides the great difference between Baldhuinega and Bailechuinnig, or rather Bailecannich, as Colgan in framing this new name should have spelled it, Alcuin's calling the brethren of that place southern ought naturally to be understood as referring to a part of Ireland more to the south of Clonmacnois than is either Aghaboe or Kilkenny. I can scarcely doubt that Baldhuninega, the town or place Dhuninega, was the same as Lismore, the old Irish name of which was Dunsginne, (see Not. 195. to Chap. xiv.) or Dunsginna. A copyist, unacquainted with the Irish language, might have easily made a mistake in writing this name. Lismore was greatly resorted to by English students; (see Chap. xiv. §. 14. Not. 197.) and it is probable, that Alcuin's reason for sending money to that establishment was to show his gratitude for the attention, with which his countrymen were treated there.

§. VI. St. Moelruan, abbot and bishop at Tallaght, or Tallagh, about five miles from Dublin, who died on the 7th of July A. D. 788, (46) is also to be reckoned among the learned men of those times, and was one, and probably the first, of the authors of the celebrated martyrology called Tamlactense, or of 'Tallaght.' (47) Concerning his transactions I can find nothing further except that he governed his monastery according to the primitive rules of monastic discipline, and had for several years among his monks the great hagiologist Aengus.

Suibhne the second, abbot of Hy, who died either in 768 or 772, (48) was succeeded by Bressal, son of one Segen, whose administration lasted until 797, the year of his death. (49) During it died at Hy, in 787, Artgal, son of Cathald, who had been king of Connaught. Resigning his crown in 779 he became a monk, and in the following year retired to Hy, where he piously spent the remainder of his life. (50)

In these times there seem to have been various contests for the see of Armagh. Foendelach, who is said to have become archbishop in 768, (51) is stated to have held it only three years, although we are told that he lived until 795. (52) Next after him is mentioned Dubdalethe, whose incumbency lasted fifteen years, (53) and accordingly, reckoning from 771, the year of his accession, ended in 786. Next after him are mentioned Arectac, who ruled only one year, (54) and Cudiniscus who held the see four years and consequently until 791. (55) He was succeeded by Conmach, to whom are assigned fourteen years. (56) As to the succession in other Irish sees there is a deplorable vacuum in the history of this period, with scarcely any exception, saving that of Emly. Cuan, who was bishop there, and in all probability the immediate successor of Senchai, died in 784 or 786; (57) and next after him we find in that see Sectabrat, who lived until 819. (58) Instead of a succession of bishops in some of our distinguished sees we are furnished with that of abbots in said places, for instance at Ferns and Kildare, (59) although it is difficult to think that the line of bishops was interrupted. (60)

(46) 4 Masters, ap. AA. SS. p. 583. I have added a year to their date 587. They call him bishop, as does also Colgan, (ib. p. 741.) although elsewhere he gives him only the title of abbot.

(47) The title of this work, which Colgan represents as excellent, and the most copious he ever met with of that kind written in any country, is Martyrologium Aengusii filii Hua-obhlenii et Moelruani. Aengus, of whom hereafter, lived for some years in the monastery of Tallaght under Moelruan. As they both belonged to that place, Colgan has, with good reason, called it Tamlactense. (See AA. SS. p. 5. and 581.) It might have been composed jointly by both of them, or what seems more probable, had been first undertaken by Moelruan, and continued by Aengus, who, from his name being placed first, seems to have written the greater part of it. He adds that a Martyrologium Tam-lactense is mentioned by an old Scholiast on the Festilogium of Marian Gorman, and that there is every appearance of its having been the same as that entitled, Aengus, &c. Concerning it more will be seen lower down.

(48) See Chap. xix. §. 14. Not. 162.

(49) See Tr. Th. p. 500. Smith in his catalogue of the abbots of Hy (Append. to Life of St. Col.) inserts, between Suibhne and Bressal, a St. Muredach as abbot, because he found him called by the 4 Masters prior of Hy. He ought to have known that the priors of Hy were different from the abbots. The office of prior, which is kept up to this very day in large monasteries, is inferior to that of abbot. It is like that of a vice-president. Muredach died in 778.

(50) 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. ib. I have added a year to their dates.

(51) See Chap. xix. §. 14. and ib. Not. 160. 161.

(52) The Psalter of Cashel (ap. Tr. Th. p. 292.) allows three years for the incumbency of Foendelach. But the 4 Masters (ib. p. 294.) who, instead of him, make Cudiniscus the immediate successor of Ferdachrich, assign his death to A. 794 (795) after observing that he had a contest concerning the see, first with Dubdalethe and afterwards with Gormgal.

(53) Ware (Bishops at Armagh) from the catalogue of the Psalter of Cashel.

(54) See said catalogue ap. Tr. Th. p. 292. Ware has Affiat or Arectac. But in the now mentioned catalogue there is no Affiat. The Ulster annals and the 4 Masters call him bishop of Armagh, and state that he died on the same night with Arectac Hua-Foelain abbot of Armagh, in 793 (794.) According to this account, Arectac was not bishop, unless we should suppose that, having held the see for some time, he was pushed out by Affiat, and reduced to the situation of abbot. As to his dying in 794, it does not agree with the Psalter, which allows him only one year's incumbency, and consequently terminating in 787, except we are to admit a similar supposition, viz. that he was deprived of the see some years before his death. It is, however, useless to endeavour to reconcile these jarring accounts, and I shall leave the whole matter as it is given in said Psalter.

(55) It is remarkable that, notwithstanding the disagreement with regard to the order of succession, the Ulster annals and the 4 Masters assign the death of Cudiniscus to A. D. 790, i. e. 791, the very year to which the above catalogue leads us for the close of his incumbency. Harris in his additions to Ware (at Cudiniscus) has a strange jumble of dates. Although he says with Ware, that the Annals of Ulster place his death in 791, he assigns his accession to 794, and his demise to 798. Where he found these dates, nobody, I believe, would be able to tell.

(56) Catalogue from the Psalter of Cashel.

(57) Ware, Bishops at Emly. For Senchai see Chap. xix. §. 16.

(58) Ware, ib.

(59) For the series of abbots there and elsewhere see Archdall. It will not be expected that I should transcribe them. It sometimes happens, as often remarked, that the same persons are sometimes called abbots and sometimes bishops; but it is not to be thence presumed that every one, who is called abbot, ex. c. of Ferns, were also bishops there. We have seen (Not. 180 to Chap. xix.) an abbot of Kildare clearly distinguished from two bishops of said place, who died in the same year with him. Our annalists were usually attentive to give the title bishop to such abbots, as were really both abbots and bishops.

(60) I suspect, however, that such an interruption might have occurred in less distinguished sees or places, owing to the singular practice in Ireland of raising persons to the episcopacy here and there without confining such promotions to old established sees, or places where there had been bishops in former days. The appointment of a bishop in a new spot might have prevented the regular continuation of others in a contiguous place, which had bishops before. For instance, there were some bishops at Cork in the seventh and eighth centuries. Yet after Selbac, who died in 773, we do not meet with another there until about the middle of the tenth. The succession might have been interrupted in consequence of the episcopal dignity being conferred on some abbots in the neighbourhood.

§ VII. The year 795 is stated by some writers to have been that, in which the Scandinavian freebooters, vulgarly called Danes, first infested the coasts of Ireland, and particularly the small island of Rechrann or Raghlin, which they laid waste. (61) To that year I first assigned the death of an abbot of Rechrann, St. Feradach, son of Segen, (62) which might have been occasioned by the proceedings of those marauders. Inis-patrick, now Holmpatrick, was plundered and devastated by them in 798. (63) In one of those early piratical expeditions, and probably the first of them, a sister of St. Findan was carried off by a party of those Northmen, who had landed somewhere on the coast of Leinster. For Findan was a native of that province, (64) and it was there that his father, who was a military man in the service of a Leinster prince, resided. (65) On being sent by his father to the Danes for the purpose of redeeming his sister, he was near being detained as a prisoner; but, as some of the party remonstrated on the unfairness of thus treating a person who had come on such an errand, he was allowed to return home. Some time after, through the treachery of certain enemies of his, he was inveigled to go on an excursion near the sea, whence, it appears, his habitation was not far distant, and there fell into the hands of some of those Norman pirates, and, after various vicissitudes, was taken to the Orkneys. Having stopped near one of its uninhabited islands, several of the pirates landed there and allowed Findan to accompany them. Here he seized an opportunity of slipping away from his Norman companions, and concealed himself under a rock, until the vessel sailed from that place. Thinking that there was an inhabited country not far distant, and having examined every outlet for three days, living on herbs and water, he determined on entrusting himself to Providence, and promised that, if God should preserve him, he would renounce all worldly pursuits, and spend the remainder of his life in holy pilgrimage. He then committed himself to the waves, and swam until he reached land, on reconnoitring which he saw houses and fires at no great distance from the shore. This country was probably some part of Caithness in North Britain. (66) After two days he met some persons, who conducted him to the bishop of a neighbouring town, by whom he was very kindly received. This bishop had [studied in Ireland, understood the Irish language, and kept Findan with him for two years. Findan, however, wishing to proceed on his intended pilgrimage, left that place with the bishop's permission, and taking with him some companions passed over to France, visited St. Martin's of Tours, and, travelling on foot, at length arrived at Rome. Having remained there for some time, he went to Switzerland, and stopping there spent four years in a clerical state with a nobleman, (67) on the expiration of which his superior in the monastery of Rhinaugia or Rhingaw, (68) got him made a monk in the 51st year of his age. The time assigned for Findan's monastic profession is A. D. 800, a date, which does not agree with that marked by some authors for the first Danish attacks on the coasts of Ireland, but which, however, we have not sufficient authority to set aside. (69) After five years of monastic observance in the community, he became a recluse in a cell adjoining the church and monastery, where he remained for 22 years, practising the most extraordinary austerities, particularly as to fasting. These were, in all probability, the last years of his life, and accordingly his death ought to be assigned to A. D. 827 (70) Some remarkable circumstances are related as having occurred to this saint on the festivals of St. Patrick, (71) St. Brigid, St. Columba (Columbkil), and St. Aidan (of Lindisfarne); and certain Irish sentences, which he heard in visions on these occasions, are repeated in his Life. The sanctity of Findan was reputed to be so very great, that the monks of Rhingaw, although the monastery was not founded by him, adopted him as their patron (72) ; and his memory is revered there on the 15th of November. (73)

(61) Ware, (Antiq. cap. 24.) referring to the Annals of Ulster. Usher has (Ind. Chron.) these Danish depredations at A. 795, but does say that they were the first. The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 510.) assign a devastation of Rechrann to A. 790 (791.) This date would, in the supposition that the Danes attacked other parts of the Irish coasts in the same year, agree with the history of St. Findan, of which a little lower down, better than that of the Ulster annals. O'Flaherty follows Ware, (see Ogygia, Part 3. cap. 93. at king Donnchad.) Usher was mistaken in adding to the devastation of Rechrann in 795 that of the greatest part of Ireland; a statement, which he took from a vague passage of Carodoc of Lancarvan. (See Pr. p. 958.) It is clear from what Ware has collected on this part of our history, that the Danes did not penetrate into the interior of Ireland until several years later.

(62) Four Masters and Tr. Th. p. 510.

(63) The Ulster annals (ap. Johnston, App. &c.) have; A. 797 (798) Inis-patrick wasted by the Gáls.

(64) In his Life he is called a Scot, and a citizen of the province of Leinster, "Findan genere Scottus, civis provinciae Lagenensis." This Life may be seen in Melchior Goldast's Rerum Alemannicarum Scriptores, Tom. 1. p. 318. seqq. or, according to another edition, Tom. 1. p. 203. seqq. Although imperfect, it contains a very good account of this saint's transactions, and is written in a clear, sensible, and rational manner. The author lived not long after Findan, for he mentions a person still alive in the monastery of Fore (in Fovariensi monasteris), to whom the saint had related a vision that he had. (See cap. 8.) This person must have seen Findan in Switzerland, but afterwards returned to Ireland. And it appears that the author was also an Irishman, although, at the time of his writing, a monk in Switzerland. Besides his seeming to hint, that he had been in the monastery of Fore, he quotes several Irish passages. But I find no reason for making him, as Ware does, (Writers at 9th century) a companion of Findan.

(65) Colgan, who was much inclined to make our saints sons of kings, calls (AA. SS. p. 355.) Findan, or as he spells the name, Fintan, an Irish prince. Ware (ib.) says that he was the son of a Leinster prince. This is a strange assertion for an author, who refers the reader to the Life published by Goldast. In it we find quite the reverse; for not only is Findan called a citizen of Leinster, but his father is represented as a military man, miles, under a prince of that province, who was at variance with another Leinster prince. Which of them was his master, or whether he belonged to North or South Leinster, we are not informed.

(66) There are some small islands in the southern Orkneys, or in the frith of Pentland, which may also be comprized under the general name of Orcades (Orkneys), from one of which a good swimmer might make his way to the mainland of Scotland. Or the land, which Findan arrived at, might have been one of the larger islands. Yet from other circumstances it seems more probable, that the tract alluded to was in Caithness.

(67) In the Life it is said, that he remained four years with a nobleman in clericatu. Does this mean that Findan acted as chaplain to a nobleman? If so, he was already a priest. But I think that the passage ought to be understood of his leading a clerical life, preparatory to holy orders, or to the monastic profession, while residing with that nobleman.

(68) Rhingaw, alias Rheinau, is an abbey near the town of said name in the district of Thorgaw in Switzerland. Ware (Writers, at 9th century) was wrong in making Findan the founder of it. He was only one of its first monks. The founder was, according to Goldast, the Count Wolfchard of Kyburg, who was, in all appearance, that nobleman, under whom Findan spent four years, and, perhaps, the same as the person called its senior or superior. Mabillon, (Annal. &c. ad A. 800.) admitting that Wolfchard was the founder, states that its first abbots were Wichramn, Wolvin, and Antwart, under one or other of whom, he says, was placed Findan.

(69) This difficulty has been noticed by J. P. Murray, De Britan. atque Hibern. &c. Nov. Comm. R. S. Goetting. Tom. 2. and De Coloniis Scandicis, ib. Tom. 3. The number of years, that intervened between Findan's being carried off by the Danes and his becoming a monk in 800, leads us to an earlier date than 795. Not to reckon the time that passed from his seizure to his escape from the Orkneys, he spent two years with the good bishop before he set out for France. For his journey through that country and Italy to Rome, his delay in said city, and his journey thence to Switzerland, another year, at the least, must be allowed. Add the four years, which he passed with the worthy nobleman previous to his monastic profession, and it will be found, that, supposing the date 800 to be correct, Findan was captured before 795, and that the Danes began to infest the Irish coasts earlier than is stated in the annals of Ulster. Now there are very good reasons for believing, that said date is correct. The writer of the Life was almost contemporary with Findan; (see Not. 64.) he lived in the monastery of Rhingaw, and had access to its documents, among which there was undoubtedly a precise account of the holy man's transactions, time of profession, &c. and accordingly ought to be considered as a very credible witness on these points. The only evasion, that may be guessed at against the truth of the date 800, is, that a transcriber might have mistaken it for some other. But of this some proof should be adduced; and I do not find that any one has undertaken to do so. Said date is followed by Mabillon (Annal. ad 800.); and it is somewhat odd that Ware, who had Fintan's Life before his eyes, did not hesitate to lay down the year 795 as that of the commencement of the Danish aggressions on our coasts; and that Usher, who also had said Life, has affixed (Ind. Chron.) Findan's captivity to that year. I am strongly of opinion that Ireland was annoyed by the Scandinavians some years earlier, although the annals of Innisfallen assign their first appearance on our coasts to said year 795; and we have seen (Not. 61.) that the 4 Masters bring them to Rechrann in 791. If that, or even 792 was the year in which Findan was taken, no difficulty will remain as to what we read of his further proceedings, and his having become a monk as early as A. D. 800.

(70) See Mabillon, Annal. at A. 827.

(71) What will Dr. Ledwich say, on hearing that the festival of St. Patrick was kept at Rhingaw in the beginning of the ninth century. Will he still maintain, that he had not been heard of until the middle of it?

(72) The author of the Life calls him our patron.

(73) AA. SS. p. 355.

§. VIII. Donnchad, king of all Ireland, having reigned 27 years, (74) and left an example of great piety and repentance, (75) died in 797, (76) and was succeeded by Aidus, alias Aedan, alias Hugh, surnamed Ordnidhe, a son of the king Niell Frassach. This Aidus was the fifth monarch of that name. (77) During his reign, which lasted 22 years, the ravages by the Scandinavians became more frequent and dreadful. In 798 they attacked the coasts of Ulster, (78) and in 802 set fire to the monastery of Hy, (79) on which occasion many of the monks were consumed in the flames. They again entered Hy in 806; and such was the extent of their fury that the number of its members was reduced to 64. (80) In 807 they effected a landing in Ireland, and penetrating as far as Roscommon destroyed it, and laid waste the surrounding country. (81) But in 812 they were defeated with great slaughter by the Irish, and forced to fly and return to their own country. (82) About 815, or, as some say, 818, the famous Norwegian Turgesius, of whom more will be seen hereafter, made his first invasion of Ireland. (83) The king Aidus Ordnidhe, having become a great penitent, (84) lived until 819, (85) and had for successor Conquovar, a son of king Donnchad, who is said to have reigned fourteen years. (86) The next king was Niell Calne, son of Aidus Ordnidhe, who after a reign of thirteen years was drowned in the river Calluin, (87) when 55 years of age, in 846. (88) He was succeeded by Mel-seachlain, whose name has been latinized into Malachias, a nephew of king Conquovar by his brother Malronius. His reign lasted sixteen years and some months; and his death is assigned to A. D. 863.

(89) After him reigned Aidus, or Aedan, VI. surnamed Finnliath, and son of king Niell Calne. He held the throne for sixteen years, until his death in the monastery of Druin-iniscluinn (Drumshallon) A. 879. (90) His successor was Flan Sinna, son of the king Melseachlain, who reigned for about 37 years, and accordingly until 916. (91)

(74) See Chap. xix. §. 9.

(75) Four Masters, and Tr. Th. p. 448.

(76) Ware (Antiq. cap. 4.) and O'Flaherty (Ogygia, Part III. cap. 93.) Ware says that, according to some accounts, he was killed in battle fighting against Aidus or Aedan, his successor, a circumstance not mentioned either by the 4 Masters or O'Flaherty. Ware adds as certain, that two sons of Donnchad were afterwards killed contending for the monarchy against the said Aidus.

(77) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 448.) calls him Aidus the sixth, in consequence of his having added a unit to the number of every king of that name, beginning with Aidus, son of Anmireus, in the sixth century, whom he calls Aidus the second, while by others he is called the first.

(78) Ware, Antiq. cap. 24. He says that in 798 they infested Ulster; but this must be understood as relative to the coast, and to partial landings; for from what follows it appears, that there was no general landing, and that they did not advance far into Ireland until 807.

(79) Annals of Ulster, ap. Johnston at A. 801 (802), and 4 Masters (in Tr. Th. p. 500.) who mention an earlier conflagration of Hy in 797 (798).

(80) Annals of Ulster, ib. ad A. 805 (806). Smith (App. to Life of St. C.) says, that in this havock 68 monks were killed by those foreigners (Gâls).

(81) Ware Antiq. cap. 24. and Annals of Ulster, ib.

(82) Eginhard, who is quoted by Usher (p. 731.), has at A. 812; "Classis Nordmannorum Hiberniam Scotorum insulam aggressa, commissoque cum Scotis praelio, parte non modica Nordmannorum interfecta, turpiter fugiendo domum reversa est." The same date and account are given by the chroniclers Rhegino and Hermannus Contractus. See Ware, ib. who adds, that, according to the Irish histories, the Danes were about these times defeated in two engagements. One of them was, in all appearance, fought in 811, at which the Ulster Annals, calling it 810, mark, a slaughter of the Gâls in Ulster.

(83) Ware ib. O'Flaherty (Ogygia, Part. III. cap. 93.) says, that Turgesius arrived in 815, and that thenceforth the so called Danes began to be settled in Ireland. Usher (Ind. Chron.) assigns his arrival to 818; for thus his words must be understood, whereas elsewhere (p. 860) reckoning the 30 years of the tyranny of Turgesius he makes A. 848 the last of them. But the date 815, or about it, suppose the beginning of 816, is probably more correct; and Usher seems to have had no other reason for marking 818, than his having read in Giraldus Cambrensis that Turgesius devastated Ireland for about 30 years, which Usher explained as exactly 30 years. Then finding that, in all probability, the last year of that persecution was 848, he reckoned back merely to 818. Yet the about 30 years of Giraldus may be well supposed to have been really 32 or 33; and Ware and O'Flaherty had, we may be sure, some good reasons for the date 815. For, although Ware mentions 818 as given, by some (meaning, I think, Usher), yet he first lays down 815, or about it.

(84) See Tr. Th. p. 448.

(85) Ware Antiq. cap. 4. and O'Flaherty, loc. cit. Ware adds, that, according to some, he lived until 820.

(86) O'Flaherty, ib. Ware allows him only 12 years, and places his death in 832, while O'Flaherty assigns it to 833.

(87) This river, which flows near Armagh, is now called Callen, The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 448.) say that, from having been drowned in it Niell was surnamed Calne.

(88) O'Flaherty, ib. Ware agrees with him as to this king's death in 846.

(89) Ware (Ant. cap. 4.) has A. 862. He observes, that Mel-seachlain was buried at Clonmacnois.

(90) Ware, having placed the accession of Aidus VI. in 862, says that he reigned almost 17 years, and thus comes to the same point with O'Flaherty in assigning his death to A. 879. He was mistaken as to the situation of Druim-iniscluinn, where the 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 448.) tell us that this king died. It was not in Tirconnel, as he says, but in Conall-murtheimhne, and in the now county of Louth, about three miles from Drogheda. (See Tr. Th. p. 174. and Archdall at Drumshallon.) Owing to the name Conall appearing in the denomination of those two territories, they have sometimes been confounded together.

(91) O'Flaherty (ib.) gives this king 37 years; Ware (Ant. cap. 4.) has 36 years, six months, and five days, adding that he died at Talten (famous for its sports) aged 68. Yet he affixes his death, as well as O'Flaherty, to A. D. 916.

§. ix. During the reign of Aidus Ordnidhe, and in the year 800, the Irish clergy obtained a privilege of the greatest importance. The practice, so fatal to ecclesiastical discipline, of compelling bishops and abbots to attend kings in their military expeditions had crept into Ireland. Aidus having, on occasion of a quarrel with the people of Leinster, laid waste that province, was determined to proceed still further against them, and for that purpose raised in that year a great army from all the other parts of Ireland, and of all descriptions, not excepting even the clergy. Among others he was accompanied by Conmach, archbishop of Armagh, and Fothadius a most learned and holy lecturer and writer of said city, celebrated for his knowledge of the Canons, on which account he was called Fothadius de Canonibus. The army being arrived at the frontiers of Leinster and Meath, the clergy began to complain of their being forced to perform military duty, and applied to the king for an exemption from it. He answered, that he would agree to whatever should be decided on this point by Fothadius, who accordingly drew up a statement, in which he maintained that the clergy ought not to be charged with a service so unbecoming their profession, and which produced the wished for effect. (92)

Fothadius is said to have presented a copy of this tract to the hagiologist Aengus, from whom he had received on this occasion a copy of one of his works, viz. the Festilogium, which he had just completed. This celebrated man, who, as we have seen, had spent some years with St. Moelruan of Tallaght, (93) was of an illustrious family descended from the ancient princes of Dalaradia in Ulster. His father was Aengavan, the son of Hoblen; and accordingly Aengus has been usually distinguished from others of that name by the addition of the surname son of Hua-Hoblen. He embraced the monastic state in the monastery of Clonenagh (Queen's county) under the holy abbot Moelatgen, (94) and made great progress in piety and learning. He was wont to spend a great part of his time in a lonesome spot not far distant from Clonenagh, and which from him has been called Disert Aengus, where he occupied himself in reading the psalms and in constant prayer. His reputation for sanctity becoming very great, he wished to withdraw from the scene of it and to hide himself in some place, where he was not known. Having heard of the strict and exemplary manner, in which St. Moelruan governed his monastery, he determined on placing himself under his direction, and set out for Tallaght.

(92) See the 4 Masters, at A. 799 (800) ap. AA. SS. p. 583, and Harris, Writers at Fothadius.

(93) Above §. 6. Colgan has the Acts of St. Aengus at xi. March.

(94) According to the 4 Masters, (ap. AA. SS. p. 582.) Moelatgen died in 767 (768) and his memory was revered on the 21st of October.

§. x. When arrived there he concealed his name and whatever clerical rank he had been raised to, and requested to be received as a novice. (95) It is said that he was employed for seven years in the most laborious avocations, such as reaping, threshing, &c. His humility and the austerity of his life were so remarkable, that he was called Cele-De or Ceilc-De, that is, a servant or companion of God. (96) At length his rank and acquirements were discovered by Moelruan in consequence of his having assisted one of the school boys of the monastery in preparing his task, at which he had been either dull or negligent, and who was afraid of being punished by Moelruan. The boy hid himself in the barn, where Aengus was working, who, taking compassion on him, helped him so well that he was enabled to go through his task to the great satisfaction of his master, (97) who, surprized at this change, pressed the boy to tell him how it had come to pass, and, although Aengus had cautioned him to be silent, compelled him to relate the whole circumstance. Moelruan, who had hitherto considered Aengus as an illiterate rustic, flew to the barn and embracing him complained of his having so long concealed his character, and expressed his deep regret for the humble and abject manner, in which he had been hitherto treated. Aengus, throwing himself at his feet, begged pardon for what he had done. Henceforth he was held by him in the greatest consideration; and it is probable that he remained at Tallaght until Moelruan's death in 788. He became afterwards abbot, apparently, of Clonenagh or of Disert-Aengus, or probably of both places, (98) after he had returned thither from Tallaght. Aengus was raised also to the episcopal rank, without leaving the monastery or monasteries, which he governed. (99) He died on a Friday, the eleventh of March, but in what year is not recorded, (100) and was buried at Clonenagh.

Several works are attributed to this saint. He is named as one of the authors of the very copious Martyrology of Tallaght, (101) which, it seems, he began to labour at jointly with St. Moelruan after he was recognized by him. Whether he finished his part of it during Moelruan's life time it is difficult to ascertain; but the present text of this martyrology shows, that it has been augmented by some later writer or writers. Besides its containing the festivals of Aengus himself and of Moelruan, it has those of other holy persons down to the close of the ninth century. (102) From that large work, as far as it went in his time, Aengus is stated to have extracted his Festilogium, a small calendar written in Irish verse, in which he mentions at each day only some principal saints, and which he used for his private devotion with regard to them. (103) He composed another work on the saints of Ireland, divided into five small books; 1. containing the names of 345 bishops, 299 priests and abbots, and 78 deacons; 2. entitled of Homonymous saints, or saints of the same names, by some of which, ex. c. Colman, an extraordinary number was called; (104) 3. the Book of sons and daughters, giving an account of holy persons born of the same parents, &c. 4; the maternal genealogy of about 210 Irish saints; 5. a collection of litanies, in which are invoked groups of saints, among whom are included several foreigners that died in Ireland. (105) This work is sometimes called Saltuir-na-rann, that is the Metrical or Multipartite Psalter. (106) There is another Saltuir-na-rann, a poetical work, written also by Aengus, comprizing the history of the Old Testament, which he put into the form of prayers and praises to God. (107)

(95) Harris (Writers at Aengus) says that he was received as a lay brother. Colgan indeed, from whom he took his account of Aengus, seems to have thought so; for he represents him as a conversus, the term by which a lay brother is usually distinguished from a clerical one. But, if this was Colgan's meaning, he was certainly mistaken; for the distinction between clerical and lay monks or brethren, as it is now understood, was not known in Ireland at that period, nor, it seems, any where until the eleventh century. (See Fleury, Discours septieme sur l'Hist. Eccl. and Instit. au Droit Eccl. Part. 1. ch. 25.) In older times some monks, it is true, were raised more or less to the clerical rank, and the number of such promotions appears to have increased with the course of ages ; but there was not as yet any radical distinction of classes in the religious institutions, so as that one of them was perpetually debarred from any ecclesiastical promotion, and destined to toil in the fields and elsewhere as subordinate to the other, and, in fact, as servants of the clerical or higher class.

(96) Toland pretends, (Nazarenus, Letter II. sect. 3.) that the surname Ceile-De given to Aengus indicated an office or particular sort of profession, and that he was one of that sort of clergymen, who have been afterwards called Culdees. But Aengus was a monk, whereas the Culdees, as will be seen elsewhere, were the secular canons of cathedrals or collegiate churches, such as we call prebendaries. It is a palpable mistake to suppose, that they were a monastic order. The title Ceile-De, as applied to Aengus, had nothing to do with them, and it is more than probable, that in his time there was not as yet any such institution as that of those so much talked of Culdees. Aengus's surname was peculiar to himself, unless it should be supposed that all, that is said of his having been a monk, &c. is false. Many Irish names began with Ceile, Cele, or, with the corresponding word Gilla, followed by that of our Saviour or some saint. Thus we find Cele-Christ, Cele-Peter, Gilla-Patrick, &c. i. e. servant of Christ, &c.

(97) It is thus, I think, that the anecdote related in Aengus' Acts ought to be understood. The boy's improvement is indeed stated as miraculous. and as a supernatural consequence of his having slept for a while on the bosom of Aengus. But it can be well accounted for without recurring to a miracle.

(98) Another Aengus, who was almost contemporary with this saint, and who has left an elegant poem in praise of him, from which Colgan derived a great part of his Acts, hints that he was abbot at Clonenagh, and also at Disert-Aengus. Colgan observes, that his hints are stronger as to the latter place. But the matter can be easily settled. As they were near each other, both lying in the barony of Maryborough, Aengus might have been abbot of the two establishments ; and that of Disert-Aengus, which commenced with himself, may be considered as a cell to the old and great monastery of Clonenagh. Archdall (at Clonenagh and Disert- enos, Disert-Aengus) has inverted the order of the transactions of Aengus. After making him found an abbey at Disert-Aengus he sends him to Tallaght, where, he says, he died. Now it is clear from his Acts, that he was no more than a simple monk, when he removed to Tallaght; and as to the place of his death, it was not Tallaght; for, as we find in said Acts, he was buried at Cloneagh. The Aengus, panegyrist of the saint, seems to have been, as Colgan justly conjectures, the abbot Aengus, surnamed the Wise, of Clonfert-molua, who died in 858 (859). (See AA. SS. p. 582.)

(99) In various Irish calendars he is expressly styled bishop. Considering the Irish practice of promoting eminent abbots to the episcopacy, we need not look for any other see for him than one of the above mentioned monasteries.

(100) There being good reason to think that Aengus survived the year 806, Colgan conjectures that the year of his death was either 819, 824, or 830; whereas in each of them the 11th of March fell on a Friday.

(101) See above Not. 47.

(102) Dr. Ledwich (Antiq. &c. p. 365) strives to show, that this martyrology was first written in the 9th century, because it has the names of Moelruan, Aengus and other later saints. It is true that, considered in its present state, it was not completed until even the end of that century; but does it follow that Aengus and Moelruan had no share in drawing it up? He adds, that in its second preface it cites the martyrology of St. Jerome. Here the Doctor is wrong; for this martyrology is quoted not in any preface to the martyrology of Tallaght, alias that of Aengus and Moelruan, but in the second preface to the Festilogium of Aengus. (See AA. SS. p. 581.) He then tells us that the martyrology called of St. Jerome was not known until about the ninth century; but might not about the ninth century be implied to take in part of the eighth, prior to Aengus having been engaged in any of these works? The Doctor says that Launoy has proved, that this martyrology was fabricated about the ninth century. Now in the passage, which he refers to, Launoy has not even attempted to prove it; and all that he says, is that the martyrology called of St. Jerome cannot be proved to have been written by that saint on any authority prior to the reign of Charlemagne. But the Doctor cares nothing about inaccuracies or misquotations, provided he could make the reader believe, that martyrologies are not to be depended upon. Yet Launoy was, in the little he has said, mistaken; for the martyrology ascribed to St. Jerome, or rather to Eusebius and St. Jerome, as quoted by Aengus, is mentioned more than once by Bede, who lived many years before Charlemagne. Thus he cites (L. 2. in Marcum, cap. 26.) Martyrologium Eusebii et Hieronymi vocabulis insignitum; and (Retract. in Act. Ap. cap. 1.) states, that Eusebius is said to have been the author, and Jerome the translator. (See more in Bollandus' General Preface, cap. 4. §. 4. at 1 January). That Eusebius compiled a sort of martyrology is certain; (ib. cap. 1. §. 3.) and the learned Bollandists Henschenius and Papebrochius (Prolog. ad Martyrol. Bed. at March. Tom. 2.) were inclined to think, that it was not only translated, but likewise augmented by St. Jerome. Be this as it may, it is well known that what is now called the Martyrology of St. Jerome was not written by him; but it is supposed to have been originally compiled not long after his time, and is considered by many very learned men to be the oldest extant. D'Achery has published it, (Spicileg. Tom. 4.) and in his Monitum states from Henry Valois, that it was used by Gregory the great, and existed many years earlier. Since those times some names have been added to it, such as that of Gregory himself, which D'Achery has marked in Italics. Among them is that of St. Patrick, and perhaps the Doctor had heard so, on which account he wished to decry its antiquity. Much more might be said on this subject, were this the place for doing so. Meanwhile the reader may consult also Tillemont. Hist. Eccl. Tom. XII. at St. Jerome, art. 144.

(103) Besides the constant tradition of this tract having been written by Aengus, and his having presented a copy of it to Fothadius in 800, as asserted by the Scholiast on it (AA. SS. p. 581.) it is to be observed, that in the first preface king Dunnchad is spoken of as not long dead at the time the author was writing or had finished it. Dunnchad died in 797.

(104) AA. SS. ib. and Preface.

(105) Colgan (ib. p. 539) gives a specimen of these litanies, in which Aengus invokes Roman, Italian, Gallic, British, English, and even Egyptian saints, whose remains he represented as in Ireland, specifying the very places.

(106) Under this title Colgan says (ib. p. 582.) that it appears in some old Irish MSS. and that he got a part of it with the inscription, from Saltuir-na-rann composed by Aengus Cele-De. He observes that the latest saint mentioned in it is St. Tigernach, son of St. Mella, and founder of Doire-melle, (see Chap. xix. §. 13.) who died abbot of Kill-achad, in the now county of Cavan, on the 4th of November, A. D. 805 (806). (See AA. SS. p. 796. and Archdall at Killachad.) This is a strong proof of the assertion that Aengus was the author of this work.

(107) Colgan, AA. SS. p. 582. Harris (Writers at Aengus) says that some ascribe to Aengus a Psalter-na-rann, a miscellany on Irish affairs. Aengus wrote no such work, and his only Psalter, or Saltuir-na-rann were those above mentioned. Harris got his information either from Toland, or from some one who took it from him. In his Nazarenus (Letter II. sect. 3.) Toland says that Aengus wrote a chronicle, entitled Psalter-na-rann. This is a lie invented by that impious writer, who did not wish to let it be known, that Aengus was chiefly employed in treating of saints, and that he used to invoke them. And (ib. Chap. II. §. 8.) he tells a still more monstrous lie, viz. that the Irish used not to pray to saints. Now there is nothing more clear in our ecclesiastical history than that the ancient Irish were in the habit of invoking them. Dungal, a most learned Irishman of these times, defends this practice against Claudius, as will be seen lower down. Brogan, who in the seventh century wrote a life of St. Brigid in Irish verse, (see Not. 18. to Chap. VIII.) often invokes her in the course of it, concluding with these words; “There are two holy virgins in heaven, who may undertake my protection, Mary and St. Brigid, on whose patronage let each of us depend.” See also, to omit many other proofs, Adamnan, Vit. S. Col. L. 2. c. 45. The practice was so general in Ireland, and so well known to learned men, who have dipped into our history, that Usher in his Discourse on the Religion of the ancient Irish, found it expedient not to touch on the invocation of saints.

(108) Ware, Bishops at Armagh. He took this date from the 4 Masters, (ap. Tr. Th. p. 294.) who have A. 806, i. e. 807. making no mention of the fourteen years, during which Conmach held the see according to the catalogue of the Psalter of Cashel. (Above §. 6.) Ware’s reason for omitting these years must have been his inability to reconcile the date 807 for his death with that of 791 for the death of Cudiniscus, whereas between them there were sixteen years. And indeed I do not know how they can be reconciled.

§. XI. Conmach, archbishop of Armagh, died suddenly in, it is said, the year 807, (108) and was succeeded by Forbach, son of one Gorman, and a scribe and lecturer of Armagh. He was a native of Kinel-Torbach, or Hua-Kellach in the territory of the Bregenses, an eastern part of Meath, and held the see only one year. (109) His successor was Nuad, (110) called of Loch-uama, (a lake in some part of Breffny) either from his having been born near it, or from his having led the life of an anchoret in its neighbourhood. (111) He afterwards presided over a monastery until he was raised in 808 to the see of Armagh, which he governed for somewhat more than three years, until his death on the 19th of February, A. D. 812. (112) Not long before, viz. in 811, he made a visitation of some part of Connaught, and on that occasion relieved some churches there from an annual offering, which used to be made to that of Armagh. (113) Next after him we find Flangus, son of Longsech, to whom thirteen years are assigned, and who died in 826. (114) Bressal abbot of Hy, who died in 797, (115) was succeeded by Conmach, a man of great learning, whose death is assigned to the following year (116) The next abbot was Kellach, son of Congal, who lived until 811. (117) He was, in all probability, the founder of the church and monastery of Kells in the year 807, (118) after the dreadful havock caused in Hy by the Danes in 806. (119) His successor Diermit carried off the shrine and remains of St. Columba to the mainland of North Britain in 817, lest it should fall into the hands of those pirates. (120) The time of Diermit's death is not recorded; but he was still abbot of Hy, when St. Blaithmaic was killed there by the Danes in the year 824. This saint was a native of Ireland and heir to a principality; (121) but in opposition to his father and others, among whom are mentioned a bishop and some abbots, he withdrew from the world, and became a monk and afterwards an abbot. Blaithmaic had an ardent desire to visit some foreign parts; but was prevented by his friends and companions from leaving Ireland. At length he passed over to Hy, where he was not long when a party of Danes approached the island. As he was anxious to receive the crown of martyrdom, he determined to remain there, whatever might come to pass, and by his example induced some others to stay along with him, advising those, who did not wish to encounter the impending danger, to make their escape. While celebrating mass, attended by his intrepid companions, the Danes rushed into the church, and, having slaughtered the bystanders, came up to him and asked for the precious metals, within which were contained the holy remains of St. Columba. These, having been brought back from North Britain, had been concealed under ground; but Blaithmaic did not know in what particular spot. Accordingly he answered, that he did not know where they were, adding that, if he did, he would not point them out to the Danes. They then put him to death on the 19th of January, A. D. 824. (122)

(109) On this point the 4 Masters agree with the Cashel catalogue. Colgan says, (Tr. Th. p. 294) that his memory was revered on the 16th of July, that is, the anniversary of his death. (See AA. SS. p. 373.)

(110) Ware and Harris (Bishops at Armagh) call Nuad son of Segen. This is a mistake founded on a cursory reading of the Acts of Nuad of Armagh ap. AA. SS. 19 Febr. Colgan happens to mention among other Nuads, one who was son of Segen, and who was killed by the Danes in 844, and observes, what Ware has strangely overlooked, that he must not be confounded with the archbishop, who died many years earlier.

(111) Nuad's Acts, cap. 2. Colgan observes that the lough or lake Uama, i. e. the lake of the cave, is in Western Breffny or O'Rourke's country, the now county of Leitrim, and that it sometimes flows back into the cave, whence it issues.

(112) Acts, cap. 5. The catalogue from the Psalter of Cashel allows three years for the incumbency of Nuad; but these must be understood with the addition of some months, reckoning from, as Colgan (ib.) observes, the death of Torbach on the 16th of July, A. 807 (808) to 19 February A. 811 (812).

(113) The date given by the 4 Masters for Nuad's journey to Connaught is 810, that is, 811. Yet Ware and Harris have, without any motive, retained 810. The English translator of Ware has spoiled his text by misplacing the date, 810, and making him appear as stating that Nuad's incumbency began in said year.

(114) The 13 years for Flangus, alias Mac-Longsech, are marked in the Cashel catalogue, (Tr. Th. p. 292) and the 4 Masters (ib. p. 294) place his death in 825 (826), which agrees well enough with the catalogue, if we suppose that some delay occurred between the death of Nuad and the accession of Flangus. But they speak (ib.) of Artrigius, as bishop of Armagh in 822 (823). This has puzzled Ware and Harris; for how could Flangus have governed for 13 years, if Artrigius was the bishop in 823? And from the manner in which these prelates are placed by the 4 Masters, it would seem as if, according to them, Artrigius were bishop before Flangus, although they assign his death to 833. O'Flaherty (MS. not. ad Tr. Th. p. 294.) says that Artrigius was perhaps coadjutor bishop in 823 to Flangus, who, he maintains, lived until 826.

(115) Above §. 6. Colgan says (Tr. Th. p. 500.) that he was commemorated either on 18 May or 30 September.

(116) Tr. Th. ib. It has A. 797, i. e. 798. Conmach's name is in the Martyrol. Tam lact. at 10 May.

(117) Ib. Its date is 810 (811). Kellach's memory was revered on the 1st of April.

(118) See Not. 107. to Chap. xi. (119) Above, §. 8.

(120) Tr. Th. p. 500. The 4 Masters' date is 816 (817.)

(121) The Acts of St. Blaithe, written in verse by his contemporary Walafrid Strabo, may be seen in Colgan's AA. SS. at 19 January. Walafrid says, "Strabus ego, misit quem terra Alemannica natu—Scribere disposui de vita et fine beati—Blaithmaic, genuit quem dives Hibernia mundo," &c. And alluding to his birth, he writes; "Regali de stirpe satus, summumque decorem—Nobilitatis habens, florebat regius heres—Iste Dei sanctus, vitam ducendo pudicam." In the Irish annals and calendars his father is called Flann; but it is not stated what principality he had. Colgan conjectures that he was one of the Southern Niells, princes of Meath, because the names Flann and Blaithmaic were rather common in that family. Walafrid gives the epithet rich to Ireland, and so it must have been at that time, as appears from the various attacks made upon it by the Scandinavians. This has been noticed by Simon, Essay on Irish coins, p. 2. where he observes that money was the object sought for by the Ostmen and Nordmen, and that they used to enter into piratical partnerships for the purpose of acquiring it.

(122) The Irish annals agree in assigning his martyrdom to 823 (824). Colgan observes that his name is marked in some Irish calendars at 24 July, probably as the day of a translation of his remains. Mabillon was mistaken (Annal. &c. at A. 793) in affixing his death to about said year, and in calling him abbot of Hy. He did not consult Colgan's AA. SS.

§. XII. To these times are assigned the deaths of some holy and distinguished persons in Ireland, ex. c. St. Finnia, abbess of Kildare in 801; St. Blatmac Hua Muirgeavair, abbot of Durrough, in 808; Tuathal, a scribe or lecturer of Clonmacnois, in 811; Joseph, a scribe of Roscommon, 808; St. Arbertac, abbot of Kildare in 817; and Muredoc, likewise abbot there, in 821. (123) Muredoc was succeeded by Sedulius, who was, in all probability, the author of the Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul, which are universally allowed to have been written by an Irishman of that name. (124) Some other works, under the name of Sedulius, were probably written also by him. (125) He is called the son of Feradach, and must not be confounded with Sedulius, abbot and bishop of Roscommon, who died in 814, (126) whereas the son of Feradach, abbot of Kildare, lived until 829. (127)

Contemporary with this Sedulius was Dungal, one of the most learned men of his times, an excellent theologian, poet, and scholar. That he was a Scot, is now admitted by all critics, and that he was an Irish one will appear from what follows. (128) We find him in France A. D. 811, in which year he wrote his Epistle to Charlemagne on the two solar eclipses of 810. He seems to have been then living in the monastery of St. Denis, as a recluse. (129) But he did not long remain a recluse; for he is represented as an eminent teacher, instructing persons of different ages and capacities. (130) There is a very neat poem in praise of Charlemagne, while still alive, the author of which calls himself an Irish exile, and is supposed to have been Dungal. (131) Afterwards he went to Italy, where he was appointed teacher at Pavia of students from Milan, Brescia, Lodi, Bergamo, Novara, Vercelli, Tortona, Acqui, Genoa, Asti, and Como by Lotharius the first, in, it seems, 823, the year in which this prince, having been already associated in the government of the empire with his father Lewis, was in Italy enacting laws, and crowned emperor at Rome. (132)

(123) Ind. Chron. ad. Tr. Th. I have added a year to each of Colgan's dates.

(124) Of these Commentaries, which are in the Bibliotheca Patrum, (Lyons, A. 1677. Tom. 6.) I have had occasion to treat already, Chap. 1. §. 8. That the author was the Sedulius of Kildare seems unquestionable, particularly as he was living in 818, at which year, as marked by Hepidanus the monk of St. Gall, a Sedulius Scottus (or Irishman) was greatly distinguished. (See ib Not. 68.)

(125) One of these works is the Collectaneum Sedulii in Mathaeum ex diversis Patribus excerptum; two Grammatical books, attributed to Sedulius by Trithemius, one in majus volumen Prisciani, and another in secundam editionem Donati; besides a tract entitled Sedulii Commentariolus in artem Eutychii. (See Usher, p. 780.) Ware (Writers at Sedulius the younger) attributes these tracts rather to Sedulius, who was a bishop in Britain of Scottish descent (de genere Scottorum) and attended at a synod of Rome in the year 721. For this supposition he had no authority whatsoever, except such as that of the liars Bale and Dempster; and nothing further is known of that bishop, than what I have now mentioned. He might as well have ascribed them to any one of six or seven other Seduliuses, who lived in Ireland in the eighth and ninth centuries. (See AA. SS. p. 315.) But as we find a Sedulius, whose reputation for learning was great in 818, why not suppose that he was the author of them rather than one, of whose learning we have no account.

(126) See AA. SS. ib. The 4 Masters' date is 813. (814).

(127) Ib. and Tr. Th. p. 629. I have changed the date 828 into 829.

(128) Mabillon (Annal. Ben. ad A. 827.) says that Dungal was perhaps a Scottus, that is, an Irishman, as his meaning is explained by the Benedictine authors of the Histoire Litteraire, (Tom. 4. at Dungal) who observes that in those times Ireland sent many great men to France. The very name Dungal, which was very common in Ireland, would alone be sufficient to show, that he was a native of it.

(129) Muratori thought, (Antiq. Ital. Tom. III. Diss. 43.) that Dungal was in Italy when he wrote it. He founds his argument on Dungal's words "in ista terra, in qua nunc, Deo donante, Franci dominantur," as if they were applicable to Lombardy, which then belonged to Charlemagne. But they answer equally well for France, and from other circumstances, such as Charlemagne having applied to the abbot of St. Denis to get Dungal to write that tract, it is sufficiently clear that he was still in France. It has been published by D'Achory, Spicileg. Tom. 10.

(130) Martene has published (Collect. Ampliss. &c.) Tom. vi. col. 811. seqq.) various poems written at that period, among which is one in praise of Dungal, vulgarly called his Epitaph, although written while he was alive and vigorous. In it we read; "Scripturas promit casto de pectore sacras—Edocet infirmos et validos pariter—Lacte rigans pueros, et dat capientibus escam—

Hinc lac ut capiant, inde cibum pariter, &c. Then comes a prayer for Dungal's long life and eternal happiness.

(131) The author says; "Hos Carolo regi versus Hibernicus exsul," &c. This poem is the first in the collection just mentioned, and is attributed to Dungal by the authors of the Histoire Litteraire, who praise it as one of the best of those times, and think that he composed also some of the smaller pieces in that collection.

(132) Muratori has published (Rev. Ital. Script. Tom. I. Part. 2. p. 152.) a Capitular of Lotharius, entitled, de Doctrina, part of which is as follows; "Primum in Papia convenient ad Dungalum de Mediolano de Brixia, de Laude, de Bergamo, de Novaria, de Vercellis, de Derthona, de Aquis, de Genua, de Haste, de Cuma. Muratori (ib. and Antiq. Ital. Tom. III. Dissert. 43.) assigns this capitular to A. D. 823, in which year it is known that Lotharius issued some edicts at Cortelona, a place about ten miles from Pavia. Yet elsewhere (Annali d'Italia at A. 829.) he seems to doubt whether that was the precise year of said capitular. But I find no sufficient reason for calling in question his former opinion; and from the time, in which Dungal wrote against Claudius, it may be fairly concluded that Dungal was at Pavia in 823. He then observes, that Dungal, who was settled at Pavia, was in all appearance the same as the writer Dungal, who is mentioned by Bellarmine, Dupin, Cave, and others, and who had been in the monastery of St. Denis. Yet he doubts of his having been the Dungal, whom Mabillon suspected to be a recluse, and thinks there might have been two Dungal's, one a recluse, and the other a teacher and writer. This difficulty is easily settled; for, although Dungal might have been a recluse when he wrote on the eclipses, it does not follow that he continued as such during the remainder of his life; nor is there any necessity whatsoever for the hypothesis of the two Dungal's. If Mabillon had known that Dungal removed to Italy, he would have been more exact in his account of him; but this was first announced to the literary world by Muratori.

§. XIII. Dungal was for some years in Italy when he set about writing his work against Claudius, a Spaniard and disciple of Felix of Urgel, and whom

Lewis the pious had made bishop of Turin. Claudius, who had enjoyed a great reputation, destroyed or removed, soon after his accession to that see all the images and crosses, which he found in the churches of his diocese. Being blamed by his friend the abbot Theodimir for this precipitate proceeding, he wrote a treatise under the title of Apology against Theodimir, in which he inveighed against any veneration whatsoever of images or the cross, and against the invocation of saints and the celebration of their festivals. (133) Dungal had for a considerable time often complained of the proceedings and principles of Claudius; but finding the people of the country where he then lived, that is the North of Italy, divided, some for, some against Claudius, he thought it adviseable to publish a work in refutation of his doctrines, which he entitled Responsa contra perversas Claudii Turo-nensis episcopi sententias. (134) It is usually supposed that he wrote it in 827, a date which I do not find any sufficient reason for controverting. (135) In it he states that it had been agreed upon in a conference held in the imperial palace, that nobody should be such a fool as to pay divine honour to angels, saints, or their images; but that, however, images should not be broken, defaced, or destroyed; and that the rules laid down by Gregory the great in his letter to Serenus should be observed. He then shows from many ancient authorities, particularly the poems of St. Paulinus of Nola, that images were always used in the Church. He maintains that Claudius, by denying that saints ought to be honoured, has renewed the errors of Eunomius and Vigilantius. Then coming to the veneration of the cross, he says that Christians, imitating the Apostle, place their glory in it; that our Saviour did not intend that his passion should be concealed from the faithful as ignominious, but that the remembrance of it should be constantly cherished; and proves, from many authorities, that at all times of the Church the cross has been honoured. As to the invocation of saints, on which he observes that, “if the Apostles and Martyrs, while in this world, could pray for others, how much more so can they do it after their crowns, victories, and triumphs” ? he opposes to Claudius several passages of the fathers according to his usual method, which is, instead of much reasoning, to allege the tradition and constant practice of the Church. He concludes with saying that holy pictures, the cross, and the reliques of saints, ought to be revered with the honour suitable to them, without sacrificing to them or offering them the worship, which is due to God alone ; and asserts that Claudius, by rejecting the cross, declares himself an enemy of the passion and the incarnation. Accordingly, he adds, the Jews praise him and call him the wisest of the Christians, and he passes great encomiums on them as also on the Saracens. How, says Dungal, can a bishop, who abhors the cross of Jesus Christ, perform the ecclesiastical functions, baptize, bless the holy chrism, impose hands, give certain benedictions, or celebrate mass ? For, as St. Augustin observes, none of these functions can be duly exercised without making the sign of the cross. He then makes some remarks on Claudius not allowing the commemoration of saints in the litanies and other offices of the Church, nor the celebration of their festivals ; his prohibiting the lighting of tapers by day in the churches, and the turning of one’s eyes towards the ground in prayer ; his being guilty of several other impieties, which he would shudder to mention, although he was informed of them by persons worthy of credit ; (136) and his refusing to attend at a council of bishops.

(133) See Fleury, Hist. Eccl. L. 47. §. 20.

(134) This work is in the Biblioth. Patr. of Lyons, A. 1677.

Tom. xiv. That it was written in Italy is evident from the Preface ex. c. his saying that from the very time he had come to the country, in which he was writing, he had opposed Claudius; “Jamdudum ex quo in hanc terram advenerim, occasio mihi copiosa hac de re reclamandi occurrit.” That country could not be France, where Dungal had been several years before Claudius attacked the images, &c. Then his observing that the people of the country (regio) in which he was, were divided on those points, shows that he was then living not far from Turin, and assuredly not at Paris, or in its neighbourhood, where the people at large did not trouble themselves about Claudius’ opinions. Mabillon not being acquainted with Dungal’s removal to Italy, was therefore mistaken in supposing that he composed this work in Paris; and Muratori was right (loc. citt.) in stating it as his opinion, that it was written in Italy, and apparently at Pavia. It is added that Tiraboschi (Storia Letteraria, &c. Tom. III. L. 3. cap. 1.) conjectured, that Dungal wrote it before he went to Italy. One would imagine that he wished to appear as understanding these subjects better than Muratori!

(135) See Mabillon, Annal. &c. ad A. 827. and Fleury, Hist. &c. L. 47. §. 21. It was certainly written, prior to 830; for Dungal, speaking in round numbers, mentions the year 820 as already elapsed.

(136) It is probable that Dungal alluded to the Arian doctrines, which, as was afterwards discovered, were held by Claudius. See Fleury, L. 48. §. 7.

§. xiv. This treatise is very well written, and shows that Dungal was deeply versed in theological studies and in polite literature, including a great knowledge of the Christian poets. (137) He had a valuable and large collection of books, as appears from the catalogue of those, which he bequeathed to the monastery of Bobio. (138) It is probable that he spent the last part of his life in that monastery; (139) but at what time he died I cannot discover. (140) Dungal is usually called a deacon, although he does not assume that title in any of his works. As to the part of Ireland, of which he was a native, no account remains; but it is somewhat probable that he belonged to the community of Bangor, and that he left Ireland in consequence of that place being terribly infested by the Danes. (141)

Claudius, the bishop of Turin, against whom Dungal wrote, is supposed by several very learned men to have been the same as the author of some commentaries on various parts of the holy Scriptures, whom others represent as an Irishman and quite distinct from the bishop, who was a Spaniard. (142) As the former opinion seems to me far better founded than the latter, which, I believe, originated chiefly in a Claudius having been confounded with the Irishman Clemens; (143) and as Claudius of Turin had applied particularly to the study and explanation of the Scriptures, (144) I cannot but conclude that there was at that time only one learned Claudius in France, and that he was the author of those commentaries, and the person who was afterwards raised to the see of Turin. (145)

In those times there lived in Ireland a learned man, named Gildas, who is said to have been born in Wales, and the son of an Irish Scot. It is added that he studied in Ireland, (146) and some writers state that he was a monk of Bangor in Down. (147) He has left a work entitled De Computo, which he addressed to the celebrated Raban of Fulda, before he became abbot of this monastery, and consequently prior to A. D. 822. (148) Other tracts have been attributed to him, but some of them certainly, and all of them probably, without foundation. (149)

(137) Muratori in his note on Dungal, (Rer. Ital. &c.) above referred to, says; "Caeterum liber ille Dungalii hominem eruditum sacrisque etiam litteris ornatum prodit, at simul in grammaticali foro ac Prisciani deliciis enutritum, ut legenti constabit."

(138) This catalogue has been published by Muratori, (Antiq. Ital. Tom. III. Dissert. 43.) and to it is prefixed a note stating that they are the books, quos Dungalus praecipuus Scottorum obtulit beatissimo Columbano. They are now, at least, in great part, in the Ambrosian library of Milan, whither they were removed by Cardinal Frederic Borromeo. Among them were three Antiphonaries, one of which was perhaps the Antiphonarium Benchorense, or of Bangor in Ireland, concerning which see Chap. II. §. 8. and also Dungal's work against Claudius.

(139) Muratori (ib.) mentions a MS. of the Ambrosian library, in which are these lines ;

“ Sancta Columba tibi Scotto tuus incola Dungal
 Traditit hunc librum, quo fratrum corda beentur :
 Qui legis ergo, Deus pretium sit muneris, ora.”

Dungal here calls Columbanus Columba, which was in fact his real name, (See Not. 1. to Chap. XIII.) and a Scot, that is an Irishman ; for every one knows that St. Columbanus of Bobio was a native of Ireland. From his styling himself an incola of this saint, Muratori thought that he had lived for some time in his monastery, which, according to a usual manner of speaking, he designated by the name of the founder. It is indeed very probable, that Dungal retired to it in the latter part of his life, and ended his days there, which seems to be confirmed by his having left so many books to it. Yet incola may be understood of his having been only an occasional resident. Could it mean countryman or compatriot ? His adding Scotto to the saint's name seems to point out something of that kind.

(140) I find his death marked at A. 834 in Herault's Abregé Chronol. at the reign of Lewis the pious. This means, at most, that he was still alive in that year, and rests on no foundation except a conjecture of Mabillon, that the recluse, to whom Ebbo, archbishop of Rheims repaired on the restoration of Lewis in said year, was perhaps Dungal. But Dungal had left France many years, prior to that date,

(141) If it could be proved, that the Antiphonarium Benchorense was, as Muratori supposed, (See Not. 31 to Chap. II.) presented to the monastery of Bobio by Dungal, it might be inferred that he had been a member of the house of Bangor, which, together with its neighbourhood, was at the time of his leaving Ireland greatly infested by the Danes. Dungal appears to have been an involuntary absentee from his country ; for he calls himself an Irish exile. To conclude our account of him, I shall add a few words concerning some mistakes of Tiraboschi (loc. cit. Not. 134). He strives to distinguish two Dungal, one who remained in France and who wrote on the eclipse, and was author of the poems (see Not. 130); the other, who was stationed at Pavia, wrote against Claudius, and left books to Bobio. The former, he says, was an Irishman, the Hibernicus exsul; the other a Scotchman, because Dungal, that gave the books, is called a Scottus. Then Tiraboschi alleges this learned argument, viz. that the same man could not be called a Hibernian exile and Scot, “because Ireland and Scotland could not be called one kingdom, and because Great Britain was then divided into many small kingdoms, and accordingly the inhabitants of Ireland and Scotland could not be called promiscuously Irish and Scotch.” The ignorance of the history of our islands displayed in this passage is astonishing. What had the division of Great Britain into many small kingdoms to do with Ireland, which never did or could form a part of it? And Tiraboschi, a man who lived in our own days, did not know, what he might have met with in hundreds of writers, that Ireland was known by two names, Hibernia and Scotia, just as France was by Gallia and Francia, and that the modern Scotland did not get the name of Scotia until a period long subsequent to the times of Dungal. The natives of Ireland were constantly called Scotti, and scarcely ever Hiberni, at least in the times we are now treating of. We find, however, an Irish Scot, now and then named with the addition of de Hibernia or Hibernicus, as ex. c. Dungal himself. From the very lines Tiraboschi read in Muratori (see Not. 139) he might have discovered that Irishmen were called Scotti; for St. Columbanus appears there as a Scottus.

(142) Usher has published (Ep. Hib. Syll. Num. 19 and 20) two fragments from Claudius’ preface, written about A. D. 815, to his commentary on St. Matthew, and addressed to the abbot Justus; and from his preface to his commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians in the form of a letter to the abbot Drueterann. There is nothing in either of them to show that this Claudius was an Irishman, except a head prefixed to the former in these words; “Claudii Scoti presbyteri ad Justum abbatem.” But Scoti was in all probability added by some one, who thought, as some old writers did, that this Claudius was an Irishman; and such was particularly the opinion of those, who confounded him with Clemens. (See above Not. 20.) Mabillon, quoting (Annal. Ben. ad A. 815) part of said preface or letter to Justus, has not Scoti, but Claudius peccator. Ware and Harris (Writers at Claudius or Claude) followed Usher as to this Claudius having been a native of Ireland; and Colgan (AA. SS. p. 703.) maintains the same opinion. If he was, he cannot be confounded with Claudius of Turin, who, as appears from the work of Jonas, bishop of Orleans, written against him, and as is universally acknowledged, was undoubtedly a Spaniard. Labbe undertook (Dissert. in Bellarmin. &c. De Scriptor. &c. Tom. 1.) to show that the author of the commentaries and prefaces was much more probably Claudius of Turin than an Irishman, and has been followed by the editors of the Biblioth. Patrum, (Tom. xiv. A. 1677.) in a note prefixed to their publication of the Commentary to the Epistle to the Galatians. Mabillon (ib.) lays it down as certain, and, besides many others, so does Fleury, Hist. Eccl. L. 48. §. 7.

(143) To what has been said already (Not. 20.) concerning this confusion I shall only add, that the Spaniard Claudius, who afterwards became bishop of Turin, had taught in the same place with Clemens. His department was to explain the Scriptures, while Clemens lectured on the Belles Lettres. (See Fleury, Hist. &c. L. 45. §. 18.) As their names were accordingly often associated, it is no wonder that some one mistook them as one and the same person.

(144) Besides what has been now observed of Claudius' biblical pursuits, we have also the authority of Jonas of Orleans, who says that he was endowed with some scriptural knowledge, "in explanandis Sacrorum Evangeliorum lectionibus quantulacumque notitia."

(145) Colgan (AA. SS. p. 703.) adduces a very unchronological argument to show that Claudius of Turin was different from the commentator. He says that he lived after the reign of Lewis the pious, during which the commentator flourished. Now the fact is that he died before that sovereign. (Fleury, L. 48. §. 7.) It is true that Jonas of Orleans did not publish his work against him until some short time after the death of Lewis, and a still longer one after that of Claudius. Jonas himself died in 843.

(146) See Usher, Ep. Hib. Syll. Not. ad Ep. 21. Ware and Harris, Writers, Book II. ch. 1.

(147) See Colgan, AA. SS. p. 201.

(148) Usher (ib. num. 21.) has published from the MS. in the Cottonian library, consisting of 99 chapters, the preface to it, which has been republished by Colgan, (ib. p. 202.) Its address is, “Dilecto fratri Rabano monacho Gildas peccator in Christo salutem.”

(149) See Colgan, Ware, and Harris, loc. cit.

§ xv. Indrect, bishop of Kilmacduach, died in 815. (150) He must not be confounded with St. Indrect, who is said to have been the son of an Irish king, and to have been killed about a hundred years prior to these times, together with his sister Dominica and some Irish companions, not far from Glastonbury by some West-Saxons robbers. (151) Eocha, son of Tuathal, anchorit, bishop, and abbot of Louth, died in 821, and in 824 Cuana, surnamed the wise, who was also bishop there. (152) To 825 is assigned the death of Rutmel, who is called prince and bishop of Clonfert, as likewise of Flan Mac-Famehellaic bishop of Emly. (153) Cormac, son of Suibhne, abbot of Clonard and a writer and bishop, died in 829, (154) as did Tuadear, bishop of Kildare, in 833. (155)

Flangus Mac-Lonsech, archbishop of Armagh, lived, as we have seen, until 826. It is probable that he was assisted during part of his administration by Artrigius as his coadjutor bishop. (156) For we find this Artrigius acting as bishop for that see in the year 823, in which, as related in the Irish Annals, “the law of St. Patrick was propagated throughout Munster by Feidhlim, son of Crimthan, king of Munster, and Artrigius, bishop of Armagh.” (157) This was an archiepiscopal visitation of that province, in which the metropolitanical rights of the see of Armagh, which at that time were extended all over Ireland, were enforced, after having been probably disregarded for some time, owing perhaps to the contentions which had prevailed concerning the right to the possessions of said see. (158) The law of St. Patrick comprized also certain dues, that used to be paid to the church of Armagh as the chair of our Apostle, and which had been established in earlier times; (159) and hence we understand why it was necessary for the king F'eidhlim to interfere on this occasion. Two years later, in 825, Artrigius went to Connaught, and enforced the said law throughout its three parts or territories. (160) He is placed as successor to Flangus for two years, after which Eugene, surnamed Monaster, (perhaps from having been abbot of the monastery of Armagh) is stated to have held the see of Armagh for eight years. (161) But it appears very probable, that the incumbencies of Artrigius and Eugene, united together, lasted only eight years, during two of which Artrigius seized upon the see, after which he was put out to make way for the legitimate bishop Eugene. (162) Artrigius, having lost the see, lived until 833; and Eugene died in 834; (163) in which year Farannan became archbishop, and governed Armagh for fourteen years, without being disturbed by a competitor, until he was expelled in 848 by Turgesius. (164) During these times some other distinguished ecclesiastics died in Ireland, among whom, as scarcely any thing is known concerning them except their names, I need mention only two, Aidan Hua Condumha, a scribe or learned man of Durrough (King's county) in 828; and Kathernac, a scribe, priest, and wise man of Armagh in 830. (165)

(150) AA. SS. p. 254, and Ware, Bishops at Kilmacduach. Their date is 814, i. e. 815.

(151) Colgan (ib.) treats of these saints after Capgrave and others. Their history is rather involved and beset with chronological difficulties.

(152) 4 Masters ap. AA. SS. p. 736. I have added a year to their dates.

(153) Ware, Bishops at Clonfert and Emly.

(154) 4 Masters, ap. AA. SS. p. 360. They have A. 828 (829.)

(155) Ware, Bishops at Kildare.

(156) See above Not. 114.

(157) 4 Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 294. Their date is 822 (823).

(158) It is odd, that Usher has been represented by some writers, among others Colgan (ib.) and Harris, (Bishops at Artrigius) as understanding the law of St. Patrick as a Monastic rule. Usher says no such thing. He mentions (p. 919) a rule not a law of St. Patrick, and then happens to speak of other rules (Monastic) such as that of St. Brendan, concerning which he says elsewhere, (p. 1050.) that it was the rule called the Law of Ciaran and Brendan. But he does not treat of the law of St. Patrick. If Colgan had read Usher's words with more attention, he would not have fallen into that mistake nor led others into it.

(159) Keating relates (Book 2. p. 47.) that an interview had been held at Tirdaglas in Ormond between Hugh Ollain, king of all Ireland, and Cathal Mac-Fingin, king of Munster, in which methods were concerted for advancing the annual revenue of St. Patrick throughout Ireland, and that they established a particular law for that purpose. Hugh Ollain died in 743. (See Chap. XIX. §. 9.) He makes mention (ib. p. 52.) also of a similar tax levied on Munster by the king Feidhlim son of Crimthan and Artrigius of Armagh, viz. the persons above spoken of.

(160) 4 Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 294. at A. 824 (825.)

(161) Catalogue from the Psalter of Cashel.

(162) O'Flaherty (MS. Not. ad Tr. Th. p. 294.) states that the real successor of Flangus, who died in 826, was Eugene; but that he was in 827 pushed out of the see by Artrigius, who kept it for some time.

(163) 4 Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 295.

(164) See Usher, p. 860, and Ind. Chron. ad A. 834 and 848. The 4 Masters at A. 834 (835) and some following years, (ap. Tr. Th. p. 295) who have been followed by Ware, (Bishops at Farannan) say that there were great disputes from the beginning concerning the possession of the see between Farannan and Diermit Hua Tigernaich, and that one held it for a while, and the other for another. O'Flaherty (MS. notes, ib.) rejects the whole of these statements, and maintains that Farannan held the see without competition until 848. In fact, the Cashel catalogue, the best authority on the subject, allows 14 years for Farannan, and places after him (that is, not after his death) Diermit for four years.

(165) See Ind. Chron. to Tr. Th. I have added a year to the dates.

CHAP. XXI.

Horrid depredations of the Scandinavian pirates in Ireland—Several monasteries plundered and numbers of monks and others of the clergy murdered—Diermid abbot of Hy brings the reliques of Columba to Ireland—is succeeded by Indrecht—Joseph of Rosmor, a bishop and excellent writer—Death of Orthanac, bishop of Kildare—Several Irish bishops and priests took shelter in foreign countries during the troubles caused by the Danish invasion—A synod held in England interdicting the Scottish priests from administering the sacraments—Death of St. Ferdornach—and of Feidhlim son of Crimthann king of Munster—Emly laid waste—Olchobhair bishop of Emly raised to the throne of Munster—Turgesius expels the primate Farannan and all the religious and students from Armagh—Turgesius killed, and the Danes defeated and expelled by the Irish—Maol-seachlin sends ambassadors to the French King, Charles the bald, to form an alliance with him—Return of the Danes—Fin-galls and Dubh-galls.—St. Donatus bishop Fiesole—Brigid, a holy virgin, sister of St. Donatus, settles in Italy—Mark an Irish bishop, Moengal and others, settle at St. Gall in Switzerland—Several other learned Irishmen settle in the Continent.—John Scotus Erigena—writes on predestination—his work condemned by the third Council of Valence—account of different tracts written by him—John bishop of Mecklenburgh an Irishman—John of Malmesbury—Macarius an Irish philosopher in France—The abbot Patrick of Glastonbury—The learned priest Probus—Deaths of various bishops and abbots in Ireland, and in Hy—Ireland harassed by the Danes and intestine feuds—Irish schools and religious houses not so much disturbed as in the time of Turgesius—Deaths of many scribes and learned men—Deaths of Irish Saints in the ninth century.

SECT. I.

MEANWHILE the Scandinavian pirates, having landed in various parts of Ireland, were committing horrid depredations. In 821 they plundered and laid waste Cork, Lismore, and the monastery of Inisdamle, (1) and in 823 treated in like manner that of Bangor, (2) which, it seems, they had already plundered some years earlier. (3) The devastation of 823 was probably that, in which it is related that the abbot and a great number of the monks were killed, and the rich shrine of St. Comgall broke open. (4) Whether it was the same as the one, on occasion of which those pirates are said to have murdered nine hundred monks of Bangor in one day, (5) I am not able to ascertain. In 824 they pillaged again the monastery of Inisdamle, burned that of Maghbile, and in 826 ravaged and destroyed that of Lusk. (6) In 831 they entered Armagh, and plundered it three times in the course of one month. This was the first time that Armagh was occupied by foreigners. (7) In the same year they despoiled the church of Duleek, the monastery of Monaghan, and the towns, &c. of Connor (8) and Louth. (9) In 834 Glendaloch and Slane were plundered in like manner; (10) and in the following year they ransacked and burned Ferns, the monastery of Clonmore (in the county of Wexford), and several churches in Munster. (11) In this year, viz. 835, a great host of them, commanded by Turgesius, destroyed almost all Connaught, together with some parts of Leinster and Meath, and within the three following years subdued a great part of Ulster, demolishing churches and persecuting the faithful. (12) In 836 a party of the Danes marched from Inverdega, or Inverdee, now called Wicklow, (13) to Kildare, which they ravaged, and set fire to the church, one half of which was consumed. (14) This happened after Feidhlim Mac Crimthann, king of Munster, had in the same year taken forcible possession of Kildare and carried off the clergy at the time that Farannan, archbishop of Armagh, was there with some of his ecclesiastics. (15) In 837 two large fleets of the Northmen arrived in the Boyne and Liffey, who spreading themselves over the plains, through which these rivers flow, plundered in all directions churches, monasteries, and the habitations of all sorts of people, carrying off flocks, herds, &c. (16) In 839 they burned Cork, Ferns, and Clonfert, killing the religious, and destroyed the church of Slane; (17) and in 840 a party of them, coming from the neighbourhood of Lough Neagh, plundered Louth, and carried off many bishops, wise, learned, and distinguished men, some of whom they put to death. (18) In the same year they set fire to Armagh, and burned its cathedral and other sacred edifices. (19) In 842 they plundered the monasteries of Clonmacnois, Birr, Saigir, and the church of Ferns; (20) and in 844 burned Clonmacnois and Lothra (Lorragh), besides ravaging the monastery of Tirdaglas. (21) One of the churches, which Turgesius destroyed and burned, when in Connaught, probably in the expedition of 835, was that belonging to the English at Mayo. (22) Many other churches and monasteries, such as Taghmon, Timolin, &c. are mentioned as having been pillaged or ruined during this period by those merciless invaders; and let it suffice to say, that almost every part of Ireland suffered more or less from their fury. (23) Every where they carried away sacred utensils, destroyed libraries, persecuted holy and learned men, many of whom they killed. Among these are particularly mentioned Aidus, abbot of Tirdaglas, whom they put to death in 844; and Kethernac prior of Kildare, whom with many others they slaughtered in said year at Dunamase. (24) To this year is assigned also the martyrdom of Nuad, son of Segen, during the pillaging of the church of Killachad (in the county of Cavan) by a band of Northmen, who had proceeded from Dublin. (25)

(1) Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. ad. A. 820 (821). For Inisdamle see Not. 69 to Chap. x. As it was an island in the Suir, it was very convenient for an attack by the Danes, as were also Cork and Lismore by their situation near the Lee and Blackwater.

(2) Ib. p. 633. The date marked is 822 (823); yet in the Ind. Chron. it is 821, owing, I suppose to a typographical error.

(3) I find mention made of a devastation of Bangor by the Danes in 812. See Archdall at Bangor.

(4) Keating (History, &c. Book 2. p. 50.) mentions these circumstances at about this period. The year in which they occurred seems to have been 823, to which also the annals of Ulster affix a plundering of Bangor, and the scattering of the reliques of St. Congall.

(5) See St. Bernard's Life of St. Malachy, cap. 5.

(6) Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. ad. A. 823 (824) and 825 (826).

(7) 4 Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 295. at A. D. 830 (831). The Ulster Annals have A. 831. What will Dr. Ledwich say to this? He wished to persuade us, that St. Patrick had been brought to Armagh by the Danes; (see Chap. II. §. 16.) now it is clear from what has been said of the law of St. Patrick as having existed before they ever reached that city, that he was known there long prior to their depredations. And he calls himself an Irish antiquary!!!

(8) Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. ad. A. 830 (831) That there was an old monastery at Monaghan is well known; and Colgan mentions (AA. SS. p. 713) as abböt of it (perhaps founder) St. Moeldod, a member of the great house of the dynasts of Orgiel, but does not mark at what time he lived. The Annals of Ulster have a prior spoliation of Duleek by the Danes at A. 824.

(9) 4 Masters, and Archdall at Louth.

(10) Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. ad. A. 833 (834).

(11) Ib. and Annals of Ulster at A. 834 (835). Clonmore is said to have been pillaged two or three times before. (See Archdall at Clonmore.)

(12) Ware, Antiq. cap. 24. (13) See Chap. v. §. 1.

(14) Annals of Ulster, and 4 Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 629. ad A. 835 (836).

(15) 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 295, and 629. ad A. 835 (836). Archdall (at Armagh) in his careless manner says, that it was Forannan and his clergy, who were carried off. Keating relates that Feidhlim being provoked by certain proceedings of some of the more northern people of Ireland, laid waste the country extending from Birr to Tarah. Thus, while the common enemy was in their country, the unhappy Irish were destroying each other. Keating is wrong in stating that Feidhlim became archbishop of Leath Mougha, or the Southern half of Ireland. He never was a bishop, but in the latter part of his life gave himself up to piety, and lived as an anchorite. He reigned 27 years, (see Keating B. II. p. 54.) the first of which was, according to the Annals of Innisfallen (Harris' copy) A. D. 819, but (according to Mr. O'Reilly's) 820.

(16) Tr. Th. p. 629 ad. A. 836 (837) In this place he speaks of these fleets as consisting of thirty ships each, and yet, (ib. p. 111.) referring to the same authority, (the 4 Masters) he tells us that each of them was of sixty. Then in the Ind. Chr. instead of A. D. 836, he has 838. In both these positions he has been followed by Ware (Antiq. cap. 24.) But O'Flaherty (MS. not. Tr. Th. at p. 111) observes, that the true date is 836 (837). That of 838 is mentioned by Giraldus Cambrensis. The Annals of Innisfallen have 836, and state that each of those Northern fleets consisted of sixty ships.

(17) Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. ad 838 (839) and Annals of Innisfallen at A. 839.

(18) AA. SS. p. 736. from the 4 Masters at A. 839 (840) This devastation, &c. is mentioned also in the Ulster annals at said year. In Johnston's Extracts Lough-neagh is, instead of Loch-echa, called Loch-da-caoch.

(19) Tr. Th. p. 295. and Ind. Chron. ad 839 (840).

(20) Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. ad A. 841 (842) and p. 634.

(21) Ib. Ind. Chron. ad A. 843 (844).

(22) See Usher Ind. Chron. at A. 818.

(23) Keating, Book II. p. 50.

(24) See AA. SS. p. 370. and Tr. Th. p. 629. The date marked is 843 (844) Aidus is called the son of Dubh-da-chrioch, and is said to have been abbot also of Clonenagh. He was taken at Dunamase and led away by the Danes to Munster, where they put him to death on the 8th of July. (AA. SS. p. 356.)

(25) AA. SS. p. 373.

§ 11. Diermit, abbot of Hy, came to Ireland in 831, bringing with him the reliques of St. Columba. (26) How long after he continued to govern the Columbian order I do not find recorded; but it appears that he was succeeded by Indrecht or Indrechtaiigh, who in 849 brought to Ireland some sanctified things of St. Patrick. (27) Joseph of Rosmor, a bishop, an excellent writer, and abbot of Clones and other monasteries, died in the year 840, (28) to which is assigned also the death of Orthanoc bishop of Kildare. (29) During the troubles caused by the Danes several Irish bishops and priests took shelter in foreign countries. In a council held at Chalons sur Saone in 813 a decree was passed stating, that there are in some parts of France Scots (Irish), who call themselves bishops, and ordain priests and deacons without the permission of their seigneurs, or of the superiors of said persons; and declaring such ordinations null as being irregular and mostly simoniacal. (30) It seems that some of those emigrant bishops made use of their spiritual power as a means of livelihood. The practice of raising persons to the episcopacy without being attached to fixed sees had been carried so far in Ireland, that it is not to be wondered at that some of them might have made a trade of their rank. A sweeping canon was passed by an English synod held in 816 under Walfred, archbishop of Canterbury, at Ce-licyth, interdicting the Scottish priests in general from administering the sacraments, because it was not known where or by whom they were ordained. (31) It is probable that some Scoto-Irish priests had, in their flight from Ireland, neglected to bring testimonials of their ordination, and thus contributed to afford an occasion for that canon.

St. Ferdornach, a wise and learned scribe or doctor of the church of Armagh, died in 845, and his memory was revered on the 10th of June. (32) In the following year died on the 8th of August the celebrated king of Munster Feidhlim, son of Crimthann, after having in the latter part of his life atoned for his violent and cruel proceedings by a very strict course of penance and great austerities. (33) In the same year Emly was laid waste by the Northmen. (34) Its abbot and bishop Olchobair Mac-Kinede, the immediate successor, in all appearance, of Flaň Mac-Famchellaic, contrived on the death of Feidhlim son of Crimthann, to get himself raised to the throne of Cashel or Munster. (35) He is the first of our princes, at least of great rank, in whom I find the mitre and scepter united. This royal bishop was of a warlike turn, and, being assisted by Lorcan, king of Leinster, defeated the Danes in a great battle fought in 848 at Sua-naght, in which they lost 1200 men, and also in two others, same year, in which about 1700 more of them were slain. (36) Olchobair lived until 850. (37)

(26) Annals of Ulster in Johnstone's Extracts at A. 830 (831).

(27) Id. at A. 848 (849). Johnstone calls them "St. Patrick's oaths or sanctified things." I suppose he mistook a word, meaning vows for oaths. They were probably offerings, that had been made by persons resorting to Hy in honour of St. Patrick. Smith (App. to Life of St. Columba, p. 166.) calls them Columkille's sacred things. Instead of Indrecht he has Jurastach; but the abbot's real name was Indrecht. See AA. SS. p. 254.

(28) AA. SS. p. 308. Ware, led astray by the blundering compiler of the third index to this work, has placed Joseph of Rosmor at Clonmacnois, and has been followed by Harris. Archdall has him at Clones, and so far he was right, but he ought not to have placed him likewise at Clonmacnois. The 4 Masters' date for his death is 839 (840).

(29) Tr. Th. p. 629.

(30) See Fleury, Hist. Eccl. L. 46. §. 5.

(31) It is added that clergymen are not allowed by the canons to officiate without the permission of the ordinary, and that this rule should be particularly enforced against foreigners, with whom there was no metropolitan jurisdiction; alluding, it seems, to the Irish system, according to which there was no regular metropolitanical see except the primatial one of Armagh. Celicyth or Calcuth was somewhere in the kingdom of Mercia and in a central part of England.

(32) Tr. Th. p. 295 at 844 (845).

(33) Ib. p. 186 and Ind. Chron. ad A. 845 (846) from the 4 Masters. The Annals of Innisfallen (Mr. O'Reilly's copy) assign his death to 847. Ware reckons this Feidlim or Feidleimid among the Irish writers, observing that his works are lost. The Ulster annals call him the best of the Scots, a scribe and anchorite. Compare with Not. 15.

(34) Tr. Th. Ind. Chron.

(35) Annals of Innisfallen, and Keating B. II. p. 54.

(36) Ware, Antiq. cap. 24. In the Annals of Innisfallen, at A. 848. Scia-nacht is called Scieth-Niachtain in the Decies, i. e. either in the county of Waterford or southern part of Tipperary. (Harris's copy) and Ware Bishops at Emly.

(37) Annals of Innisfallen.

§. III. Turgesius entered Armagh in 848, and expelled the primate Forannan together with all the religious and students. (38) Taking with him his attendants and the church reliques he was sent to the Danish ships at Limerick. (39) But this year was fatal to Turgesius; for in it he lost his life, having been defeated and made prisoner by Melseachlain, king of Ireland, who drowned him in Loch-vair. (40) The Irish then attacked the Northmen in all directions, and drove great numbers of them out of their country, so that the nation recovered its liberty, after a devastation of about thirty years, and Melseachlain sent ambassadors with presents to the French king, Charles the bald, for the purpose of forming a bond of peace and friendship, and requesting permission to pass through France on his way to Rome. (41) Forannan's place at Armagh was now occupied by Diermit Hua-Tigernach, who is said to have gone to Connaught for the object of enforcing the law of St. Patrick. (42) The Northmen, although broken and defeated, returned again in 849 with a powerful fleet, and renewed the war. (43) As if to help them, the Irish began to fight among themselves, and their king Melseachlain not only made peace with them in 850, but was assisted by them in gaining a great victory over some enemies of his. (44) Dublin, which was already in possession of a description of Northmen, called Fin-gals, or white-foreigners, was attacked in 851 by another, called Dubh-gals, or black-foreigners, who made great havoc of the Fin-gals and plundered the city. (45) In 852 a party of these pagan Northmen entered Armagh, and laid it waste on Easter Sunday, which was probably the cause of the death of the primate Diermit, who died in the same year, as did also Forannan, who had held the see before him. (46) Diermit, whose incumbency lasted four years, was succeeded by Fethgna, who governed the see for 22 years. (47) Olchobair, who died in 850, was succeeded at Emly by Maine son of Huargusa. (48)

(38) Usher, p. 860. and Ind. Chron. at A. 848. The 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 295, assign this expulsion to A. 843 (844); but Usher's date is approved of by O'Flaherty, (MS. Not. ad Tr. Th. ib.) and agrees with the catalogue from the Psalter of Cashel. See Not. 164 to Chap. xx.) Yet in Johnstone's Extracts from the Annals of Ulster it is assigned to A. 844 (845). But Usher's copy of them was probably more correct.

(39) Tr. Th. loc. cit. D. O'Connor, the wretched translator of Keating, has quite misrepresented (B. II. p. 6.) his text as to Forannan. He makes him say, that Forannan, who was then primate of Armagh, retired from Cashel with his clergy to Emly, and that in this solitude, protected by bogs and woods, did this primate, together with them, take up his residence during the tyranny of the Danes. Now Keating says no such thing, nor indeed could he; for besides Forannan's having been sent to Limerick, he was not archbishop or bishop of Cashel. The substance of Keating's original statement is as follows. Having, in opposition to the concurrent testimonies of our ancient writers, taken into his head, that the see of Emly was not marked by any peculiar distinction, and that Cashel was an archiepiscopal see in those times, he then strives to show how it came to pass that Emly was mistaken for an archbishopric by saying that the archbishop of Cashel retired thither with his clergy during the Danish persecution. This is indeed a mere supposition, for there was at that time no archbishop, nor, I believe, even a bishop of Cashel. Nor do I mean to state that Emly was, properly speaking, an archiepiscopal see, although it enjoyed a certain degree of honour and preeminence. (See Not. 67 to Chap. vi.) Besides, there is no foundation for Keating's hypothesis that the clergy of Cashel retired to Emly. They were more safe in the city than there, and we have seen that Emly was ransacked by the Danes in 846. Keating, to prop up his story of the Cashel clergy having been driven thence by the Danes, and fled to Emly, represents it as credible, because Forannan and his clergy had been expelled from Armagh. This is truly a queer sort of argument; as if from the case of Forannan having been certainly driven from his see it were to follow, that other bishops, &c. were also expelled. Enough as to Keating himself; but how strangely have his words been mistranslated so as to bring Forannan, &c. to Cashel and Emly?

(40) Usher (p. 860. and Ind. Chron.) assigns the downfall and death of Turgesius to 848. But the Annals of Innisfallen mark them at 845, before Melseachlain was king of Ireland: Also Ware (Antiq. cap. 24.) seems to place them in 845, while Melseachlain was king only of Meath, and before he was raised to the throne of all Ireland in 846. (See Chap. xx. §. 8.) He mentions the drowning of Turgesius in Lochvair, and afterwards states, that a battle was fought in 848 between Melseachlain, when king of Ireland, and the Danes (without naming Turgesius) at Fore, in which they were defeated and lost 700 men. The 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 509.) assign the drowning of Turgesius in that lough to 843 (844) while Melseachlain was still no more than king of Meath. Neither they nor the Annals of Ulster or of Innisfallen have any thing about the 15 beardless young men, who, according to Giraldus Cambrensis, killed Turgesius. If it be true that Melseachlain was king only of Meath at the time of his putting Turgesius to death, the statement of the 4 Masters, or that of the Innisfallen annals, must be more correct than that of Usher; whereas it is universally allowed, that Melseachlain became king of all Ireland in 846; and it will follow that the expulsion of Forannan from Armagh by Turgesius was prior not only to 848, but likewise to 846. (See above Not. 38.) Yet if we consider, that Usher's date (848) for this expulsion rests on strong grounds, we must suppose that Turgesius was still alive in said year, and that Melseachlain was king of all Ireland, when he got him into his hands. Giraldus Cambrensis, speaking of the downfall of Turgesius by means of Melseachlain, calls the latter king of Meath; and hence perhaps was derived the opinion, that he was not as yet sovereign of all Ireland. Be this as it may, Usher shows (p. 860) from Norwegian chronicles that 848 was the year in which those invaders were greatly humbled in Ireland and their power reduced. Now it is natural to suppose, that the death of Turgesius was immediately followed by the destruction and dispersion of his followers, and consequently it appears most probable that it did not occur until said year 848. Lochvair, in which Turgesius was drowned, is placed by Seward (at Loch-uair) near Mullingar.

(41) Usher p. 860, and Ind. Chron. ad A. 848.

(42) The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 295) assign Diermit's tour to Connaught to A. 835 (836) at a time when, according to them, he was contending against Forannan for the see of Armagh. (See Not. 164. to Chap. xx.) But, as there was most probably no such contention between them, Diermit's going to Connaught was after 848; or, if it was in 836, he went thither not as archbishop but as deputed by Forannan.

(43) Ware, Antiq. cap. 24. The Annals of Ulster in Johnstone's Extracts state at A. 848 (849) that they came in 140 ships, as do also those of Innisfallen at A. 849.

(44) Ware, ib.

(45) Annals of Ulster at A. 850 (851), and Ware, ib. Also Innisfallen Annals at A. 851.

(46) Usher, p. 860 and Ind. Chron. at A. 852. from the Annals of Ulster. In said annals these two prelates are named heirs (comorbans) of St. Patrick, and Diermit is called the wisest of all the doctors of Europe, while to Forannan are given the titles of scribe, bishop, and anchoret.

(47) Catalogue from the Psalter of Cashel in Tr. Th. p. 292.

(48) Ware, Bishops at Emly.

§ IV. St Donatus, bishop of Fiesole in Tuscany, flourished in those times. (49) He was a native of Ireland, and, it seems, a bishop before he undertook a pilgrimage to Rome. (50) A disciple of his named Andrew, of a very illustrious family, (51) whom he had instructed in Ireland, accompanied him in this peregrination. They arrived at Rome during the reign of Lewis the pious, but in what year is uncertain. (52) Having remained there for some time, and obtained the Pope's blessing, they removed to Tuscany, where they visited some churches. On arriving at Fiesole Donatus was received by the clergy and people of that then very respectable city with great honour; and, as the see happened to be vacant, was requested to undertake the government of it. At length he complied with their wish, and acted, for a long time, the part of a good pastor, until God was pleased to call him out of this world on a 22d of October, some years after A. D. 861. (53) Some tracts were written by St.

Donatus, but none of them, as far as I know, are now extant, (54) except his own epitaph, and a pretty little poem, which is prefixed as a prologue to a poetical life of St. Brigid. (55) Andrew became a deacon of Fiesole, and remained there for several years, until by order of Donatus he re-established the church of St. Martin near the river Mensola, which washes the feet of the Fiesole hills, where he formed a monastery, in which he piously spent the remainder of his days until having survived St. Donatus, he died on, it seems, a 22d of August, but in what year I do not find recorded. (56) Dempster, with his usual effrontery, has forged the names of certain tracts as if written by this saint. (57) A sister of his, named Brigid, a very holy virgin, whom he was very anxious to see before his death, left Ireland to pay him a visit, and arrived in time to find him still alive, although very near his end. On his death she determined to remain in Italy, and retired to a forest above Fiesole at the foot of the mountains, where, practising great austerities, she led a solitary life and lived to a great age, most highly esteemed by the people of the neighbourhood. The year of her death is not known; the day is said to have been a first of February, the anniversary of her great namesake St. Brigid of Kildare. After her death a church was erected and dedicated under her name on the spot, where she died, called Opacus, which was, and perhaps is still greatly resorted to on that day, in commemoration of her, by the inhabitants of the adjoining districts. (58)

(49) In Burke's Officia propria, &c. there is at 22 October an Office of St. Donatus, taken chiefly from that read at Fiesole. Colgan had a very ancient Life of this saint, taken from a collection of chronicles of that church. Ughelli treats of him (Italia Sacra, Tom. 3. col. 213.) and calls him nobilis Scottus.

(50) That Donatus was an Irishman is clear not only from the Office, in which he is stated to have been of a noble and orthodox family in the Old Scotia (Ireland), but likewise from his Life, as quoted by Colgan, (AA. SS. p. 238.) where we read, that Ireland, the island of the Scots, sent him to Fiesole; “Iste, fratres mei, iste beatus ille et vere praedicandus Christi sacerdos. B. Donatus, quem nobis Hibernia Scotorum insula transmisit.” Colgan calls him (ib. p. 236) a bishop, while still in Ireland.

(51) A Life of this Andrew has been written by Philip Villani, who makes him a native of Ireland; “Fuit homo Dei Andreas oriundus ex insula Hibernia, quae alio magis vulgari nomine Scotia appellatur, &c. (See AA. SS. p. 236.) Colgan (ib. p. 237) mentions also an anonymous Life of Andrew, or St. Andrew, upon which some notes were written by Constantine Cajetano.

(52) In the anonymous Life of St. Andrew it is said, that Donatus and Andrew came to Italy in the time of Lewis the pious, and Cajetano marks the year as 816. (AA. SS. p. 237) But it was probably some years later. At any rate the Office of Donatus is wrong in stating that they were at Rome in 802.

(53) Cajetano says, that he became bishop of Fiesole in the very year of his arrival in Italy, viz. as he thought, A. D. 816. (See AA. SS. p. 239.) Ughelli also marks that as the year of his promotion; but Coleti in a note observes, that it must have been later than 826; for Grusolphus was bishop of Fiesole in that year and attended at a synod then held at Rome. Donatus was certainly bishop there before 844, in which year he was present at the coronation of Lewis, the son of Lotharius, as king of Italy. He was still its bishop in 861, whereas he was present at a Lateran council that sat in this year under Pope Nicholas I. against John, archbishop of Ravenna. (See Coletis’ addition to Ughelli, ib. Tom. 2. col. 350.) The precise year of his death is not known. He was buried in the cathedral, and on his monument were engraved the following verses, which had been composed by himself;

Hic ego Donatus Scotorum sanguine cretus
 Solus in hoc tumultu pulvere, verme, voror.
 Regibus Italicis servivi pluribus annis,
 Lothario magno, Ludovicoque bono,
 Octenis lustris, septenis insuper annis
 Post Fesulana Praesul in urbe fui.

Gratuita discipulis dictabam scripta libellis
 Schemata metrorum, dicta beata senum.
 Parce viator adis, quisquis pro munera Christi
 Te modo non pigeat cernere busta mea,
 Atque precare Deum, residet qui culmina caeli,
 Ut mihi concedat regna beata sua.

If the Octenis &c. is to be understood of the duration of his incumbency, as Ughelli understood it, he was bishop of Fiesole for 47 years. But he was dead before 877, in which year, as Coleti remarks, Zenobius was its bishop. The Bollandists also (Comment. præv. at the Acts of St. Brigid of Fiesole, 1 Febr.) understood the Octenis &c. as Ughelli did. They conjectured, that Donatus did not become bishop of Fiesole until 841 or 842, and then, assigning to him 47 years of episcopacy, concluded that he lived until near 890. But this cannot agree with what Coleti says concerning Zenobius. It is very probable that he was made bishop of Fiesole soon after 826, perhaps in 827, whence reckoning 47 years, his death may be affixed to about 873. The Bollandists observe, that Donatus obtained from the above mentioned Lewis, with whom he was very intimate, some favours and privileges at Capua, and that the year, in which he obtained them, was apparently 866. Lewis was at this time, and for several years before it, emperor, and is called Lewis the second. He was the Lewis, who is distinguished in the epitaph by the epithet good, and died in 875, in which year he was succeeded, as emperor, by his uncle Charles the bald. In all probability he survived St. Donatus; for otherwise would not the name of Charles, to whom the empire and the kingdom of Italy devolved, have been mentioned in the epitaph? In Burke's Office of St. Donatus, by a strange anachronism, he is said to have died in 840.

From the epitaph it appears, that Donatus had been employed in teaching gratuitously, and that he composed some tracts, Gratuita discipulis dictabam scripta libellis, partly of a poetical kind, Schemata metrorum, and partly theological, dicta beata senum.

(54) Dempster has made up some tracts for him, which are mentioned by Ware (Writers at Donat) merely on his authority, yet it is certain, that he composed some works. (See Not. præc.)

(55) The ancient author of the Life of St. Donatus, quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 238. and Tr. Th. p. 255.) ascribes to him this prologue, which Colgan has prefixed to the Life of St. Brigid, said to have been written by Chilien of Iniskeltra. (See Not. 18 to Chap. VIII.) Usher has given a part of it, Prim. p. 1060, but with two or three variations. It begins thus.

Finibus occiduis describitur optima tellus
 Nomine et antiquis Scotia dicta libris.
 Insula dives opum, gemmarum, vestis, et auri;
 Commoda corporibus, aere, sole, solo.
 Melle fluit pulchris et lacteis Scotia campis
 Vestibus atque armis, frugibus, arte, viris.
 Ursorum rabies nulla est ibi; saeva leonum
 Semina nec unquam Scotica terra tulit.
 Nulla venena nocent, nec serpens serpit in herba
 Nec conquesta canit garrula rana lacu.
 In qua Scotorum gentes habitare merentur,
 Inclyta gens hominum milite, pace, fide.
 De qua nata fuit quondam sanctissima virgo
 Brigida, Scotorum gloria, nomen, honor, &c.

After this description of Ireland it goes on as if prefatory to a Life of St. Brigid; and it really seems, that the author of it wrote such a work. But it is not to be concluded, that the Life attributed to Chilien was written rather by Donatus; for, as Colgan observes, there are in some MSS. other prologues prefixed to said Life; yet if, as I see no reason to doubt, Donatus was the author of the above one, it may, I think, be concluded that he drew up a Life, probably not extant, of St. Brigid. Concerning the epitaph see Not. 53.

(56) See AA. SS. p. 236, and 238.

(57) See Ware and Harris, Writers at Andrew.

(58) I have here given the substance of the Acts of this St. Brigid, as made up from Ferrarius and others by Colgan, AA. SS. at 1. February. The Bollandists have at said day, extracted a short Life of her from Villanis' Life of St. Andrew. In consequence of their having brought down the death of St. Donatus to near 890 (see Not. 53) and her having survived both him and Andrew, they supposed she lived until about 900. This is, I believe, too late; probably she died about 880.

§. v. In 841 Mark, an Irish bishop, together with Moengal, alias Marcellus, his sister's son, returning from Rome stopped at the monastery of St. Gall, where the Irish were always well received as being countrymen of that saint. And in fact it is stated that it was as such that Mark visited that monastery. They were requested to remain there for some time, and at length agreed to do so. Mark then dismissed his other companions and attendants, to whom, being much displeased at his staying there, he gave his horses and mules, some money &c. reserving his books and some other articles for the use of the monastery. Moengal was exceedingly learned in sacred and human literature, and after some time was placed over the interior schools of the cloister. (59) It is probable that they both spent the remainder of their lives at St. Gall's; (60) and it is said that Moengal died in that monastery on a 30th of September, but in what year is not mentioned. (61) Among the persons instructed at St. Gall by Moengal are reckoned Notker Balbulus, Ratpert, and Tutilo; (62) and to him is attributed a certain tract on the lessons of the Gospel. (63)

In the same year 841 another countryman of St. Gall, and consequently an Irish Scot, named Eusebius, arrived at the same monastery and there became a monk. (64) Having remained for some years in the monastery, he retired in 854 or 855 to Mount St. Victor, where there was a church dedicated to the martyr of that name, in the part of the now Grison country called Rhaetia Curiensis. There he became a recluse and lived for 30 years in a most pious, contemplative, and austere manner, until his death on the 30th of January, A. D. 884. (65) He is said have been endowed with the gift of prophecy, and used to be consulted as such by the people of that country. The king Charles (66) had so great an esteem for him, that, on his request, he made a grant of Mount St. Victor to the monastery of St. Gall.

(59) Ekkehard (De casibus monasterii S. Galli ap. Melch. Goldast. R. Al. Scriptor. Tom. 1. p. 36.) writes; "Grimaldi (abbot of St. Gall) temporibus Marcus quidam Scottigena episcopus Gallum tamquam compatriotam suum Roma rediens visitat. Comitatur eum sororis filius Moengal, postea a nostris Marcellus diminutive a Marco avunculo suo sic nominatus. Hic erat in divinis et humanis rebus eruditissimus. Rogatur episcopus loco nostro aliquamdiu stare," &c. See also Mabillon (Annal. Ben. ad A. 841). Harris (Writers at Moengal) makes them visit the abbot Grimoald as their countryman, having misunderstood Ekkehard's words, who calls not him but St. Gallus their compatriot.

(60) Mabillon (ib.) says, that Mark went, after having been for some time at St. Gall's, to France on the invitation of Charles the bald, and that he retired to the monastery of St. Medard at Soissons. He adds that perhaps Moengal also removed to France. But the bishop Mark of St. Medard must have been different from the one of St. Gall, if we are to believe Eric of Auxerre, who tells us (De mirac. S. Germani, L. 1. c. 55.) that he was a Briton, although educated in Ireland; while Ekkehard positively states, that the Mark of St. Gall was an Irishman. And Mabillon himself (ib. and Acta Bened. Sec. iv. Part. 2. p. 461.) represents Mark and Moengal as countrymen of St. Gall and Irishmen.

(61) See Harris, Writers at Moengal.

(62) Mabillon, Acta Ben. ib. p. 46?

(63) See Harris at Moengal.

(64) Colgan has the Acts of St. Eusebius at 30 January. He thinks that his real name was Euchedius, but gives no reason, except that this was an usual name in Ireland, whereas Eusebius was not so. Be this as it may, he represents him as not arriving at St. Gall until A. D. 854, in consequence of his having supposed that Eusebius became a recluse very soon after he reached that place. For in that year or the following he withdrew from the monastery and shut himself up. But Mabillon (Annal. Ben.) assigns his arrival at St. Gall to 841. Eusebius is called by Ratpert of St. Gall (De origine et casibus S. Galli) Scotigena, and by Ekkehard, also of St. Gall (De casibus, &c.) sancti Galli compatrianus, that is an Irishman.

(65) Ratpert (ib.) has these dates for his death, but does not mention his having died a martyr, as noted in the Necrologium of St. Gall, which states, as quoted by Colgan and Bollandus, that Eusebius was killed by one of the inhabitants, when remonstrating with some of them on their bad conduct. Mabillon (Annal. &c. at A. 841.) expresses strong doubts as to this martyrdom and says; "Sublestae fidei videntur, quae de ejus martyris referuntur apud Bollandum." Had it taken place, would it not have been mentioned by Ratpert? The same Necrologium seems to make Eusebius a recluse for near fifty years; but, according to Ratpert, he was such only for thirty. Colgan strives to explain the words of the Necrologium as if relative to the whole life, and indicating that he died in the 50th year of his age. This cannot agree with his having arrived at St. Gall in 841, at which time he would have been, in this hypothesis, no more than about seven years old. A foolish story related in the Necrologium as to Eusebius after his death shows, that its authority is not worth attending to in what it has concerning him.

(66) This Charles was, says Mabillon, (ib.) the son and successor of king Lewis. He must have meant Lewis the Germanic. Consequently Charles was the one, that became emperor, and who is called Charles the fat.

§ VI. Helias, likewise an Irishman, was bishop of Angouleme during the reign of Charles the bald. He had gone to France in the early part of the ninth century; for he was a disciple of Theodulf bishop of Orleans, (67) who died in 821. He became a very learned man and was an admirable teacher. (68) One of his scholars was the celebrated Heric or Eric of Auxerre. (69) Helias succeeded bishop Lanus in the see of Angouleme, but in what year I do not find stated. (70) In 862 he assisted at the synod of Pistes, (71) which had been summoned by Charles the bald, and in 866 at that of Soissons. (72) His death is assigned to A. D. 875 or 876. (73)

Among the crowd of learned Irishmen, who went over to France in those times, the most celebrated was John Scotus Erigena. (74) He was of very small size, but gifted with extraordinary genius. His studies were chiefly classical and philosophical, in which he excelled, considering the times he lived in; but he was greatly deficient in theological learning, which he seems to have scarcely applied to in his younger days, as he was not intended for the church; nor was he ever in holy orders, nor even a monk. He was a very good man, and irreproachable in his conduct. His birth must be assigned to the early part of the ninth century; for he was a grown up and highly learned man when he removed to France, which was before 847, as appears from his having been connected there with Prudentius before he became bishop of Troies. By his learning, eloquence, and wit he became a singular favourite with the king Charles the bald, who was so pleased with him, that he kept him constantly with himself, and did him the honour of having him as a guest at his table. Their conversation was sometimes of a jocose kind; and although John was not always sufficiently cautious not to give offence in his jokes, yet the king used to put up with whatever he said. As he was well skilled in Greek, Charles commissioned him to translate into Latin the works attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite, (75) and accordingly he translated the four books De caelesti Hierarchia, de ecclesiastica Hierarchia, de Divinis nominibus, and de mystica theologia, which he dedicated to the king. (76) This translation was greatly admired for its accuracy, but being too literal was considered obscure. (77) It was published between 858 and 867; for it is mentioned in a letter of Pope Nicholas I. to Charles the bald. (78)

(67) In the chronicle of Ademar (ap. Labbe Nova Bibliotheca, &c. Tom. 2. p. 159.) there is at A. 819. a series of teachers succeeding each other, among whom is Theodulf as having taught Heliam Scotigenam Engolismensem episcopum, and then Helias as the master of Heiric or Heric (of Auxerre) See also Sammarthan. Gallia Christiana ad Eccl. Engolism. Tom. 2. col. 984.

(68) In the Historia pontificum &c. Engolimensium (ap. Labbe, ib. p. 251.) we read; “Defuncto Launo suscepit Helias Scotigena cathedralem Engolismensem, qui in Gallia mirifice scholas rexit. It has afterwards the series of teachers as in the chronicle of Ademar. In the Gallia Christiana (loc. cit.) Helias is styled vir doctissimus.

(69) The Heiric, as called in the chronicle of Ademar, or Henric, as in the Histor. Pontif. Engolism. was Heric of Auxerre, as appears from its being added that Heiric taught Remigius, &c. His having studied for some time under Helias helped to make him well acquainted with learned Irishmen then in France, and with that flock of philosophers, which, as he says in his preface to the Acts of St. Germanus, addressed to Charles the bald, had passed over from Ireland to France; “Quid Hiberniam memorem, contempto pelagi discrimine, pene totam, cum grege philosophorum, ad littora nostra migrantem? Quorum quisquis peritior est ultro sibi indicit exilium, ut Salomoni sapientissimo famuletur ad votum.” Helias, his master, was certainly one of those persons, whom Heric had in view; and hence it is plain that by Scotigena, as Helias is called, is to be understood a native of Ireland, not of N. Britain; for, had he been a British Scot, Heric would not have mentioned Ireland alone.

(70) Claudius Roberti in his Gallia Christiana (at Episc. Engolism.) says, that he was bishop of Angouleme during 40 years. If so, he should have been raised to the see in 835 or 836. But he could not have been bishop there before 853, in which year Launus was alive. (Sammarthan ib. col. 983)

(71) Sammarthan. ib. col. 984. Pistes was a place near the Seine, where it is joined by the Andelle. (See Fleury, Hist. Eccl. L. 50. §. 20.)

(72) Cl. Roberti, loc. cit. and Sammarthan. ib.

(73) The Sammarthani, (ib.) referring to the chronicle of Ademar, place his death in 875. But in that chronicle, according to Labbe's edition, the year marked for it is 876. In the Historia Pontif. &c. Engolism. it is said that Helias brought to Angouleme the remains of the martyr St. Benignus at the time that Charles the bald ascended the imperial throne. If this notation be correct, the death of Elias cannot be placed before 876. For Charles was not emperor until the latter end of 875. Yet the passage may perhaps be explained as meaning about the time that Charles was crowned emperor. It adds that Helias died during his reign. As to the day of his death, a chronicle of Angouleme marks the 22d of September. But as it is wrong with regard to the year of it, it may be wrong also as to the day.

(74) It is surprizing that even at this day some writers pretend that Erigena was a native of Scotland, for instance Chalmers, in his Biographical Dictionary, and Rees' Encyclopedia, at Erigena, notwithstanding the general consent of so many men of real learning, who have had occasion to treat of him, that he was an Irishman. Among the French, Dupin, Fleury, the authors of the Histoire Litteraire, and a crowd of others; Mosheim, J. P. Murray, with other learned Germans, all agree on this point. The surname, Erigena, is alone sufficient to prove it, as it means a native of Eri or Erin, that is, Ireland. Instead of Erigena, we sometimes find him called Eringena, ex. c. in an old MS. written about 900 years ago containing his translation of the works attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite. (See a Dissertation concerning him by Father Paris of St. Genevieve in the Appendix to Perpetuité de la foi, Tom. 3. p. 20. In this dissertation he is positively stated to have been an Irishman. It is to be observed, that this surname was given to him by others; by some, as by Sigebert, he was called Erigena, and by some Eringena. Certain Scotch authors, according to their usual mode of robbing Ireland of many of its distinguished men, would fain make us believe that Erigena means a native of Air in the South-west of Scotland. But, if he was from that place, would the name not have been Airgena or Arigena? Or how could he have been called Eringena; for surely it will not be said that Air was the same as Erin. Besides, what could Sigebert or other continental scholars of those days know about Air in North Britain, a place which perhaps did not then exist? These Scotch gentlemen seem to be unacquainted with the history of their own country. They ought to know, that Air, Airshire, &c. did not, in the times of John Scotus Erigena, belong to the Scots. They were part of the Strathcluyd or Cumbrian kingdom of the Britons, and did not get into the possession of the Scots until the year 946. (See Usher, Pr. p. 664 and Ind. Chron. ad A. 946. also Chalmers, Caledonia, Vol. I. p. 353, seqq.) The country of the British Scots lay in Erigena's days, as well as from their first arrival in Britain to the North of the frith of Clyde; (see Usher, p. 611, 612, and Lloyd on Church government, ch. 1. §. 9. seqq.) and although in 843 by conquering the Picts they extended their kingdom to the northward, they did not enlarge it to the south of the frith until above 100 years later. It is true that the Irish Scots are said to have seized upon, about the beginning of the 9th century, the southern point of Scotland called Galloway from Gael, Irish. (Usher, p. 667 and Ind. Chron. ad A. 800.) But this acquisition did not by any means extend as far as Air. If Erigena was born at Air, he was a Briton; but, should the ancient Britons claim him as their countryman, or should any part of England, for this also has been attempted, do the same, the national epithet, Scotus, is sufficient to decide the question. The best account I have met with of this extraordinary man, particularly of his works, is that given by the Benedictine authors of the Histoire Litteraire, Tom. v. p. 416, seqq.

(75) These works were at that time considered in France as of great importance, owing to the then prevalent opinion that Dionysius the Areopagite was the same as St. Denis the first bishop of Paris.

(76) Usher has published (Ep. Hib. Syll. Nos. 22, 23.) two of these dedications, one in verse, the other in prose. The former begins thus;

“ Hanc libam, sacro Graecorum nectare fartam, Advena Johannes spondo meo Carolo.
 Maxime Francigenum, cui regia stemmata fulgent, Munera votiferi sint tibi grata tui.”

In the latter John gives an account of Dionysius and of the four books, concluding with some verses;

“ Lumine sidereo Dionysius auxit Athenas, Areopagites, magnificusque sophos.
 Primo commotus Phaebum subeunte Selena,
 Tempore quo stauros fixus erat Dominus,” &c.

Here, according to his usual practice in his poems, he intermixed some Greek words.

(77) Anastasius Bibliothecarius, in a letter written to Charles the bald, and published by Usher (No. 24. Ep. Hib. Syll.) says : “ It is wonderful how that barbarous man,” (for every one not a Greek or Roman was called barbarous) “ who placed at the “ extremity of the world might, in proportion as he was remote “ from the rest of mankind, be supposed to be unacquainted with “ other languages, was able to comprehend such deep things and “ to render them in another tongue. I mean John the Scotigena, “ whom I have heard spoken of as a holy man in every respect. “ But he has greatly diminished the advantage, that might be de- “ rived from such an undertaking, having been over-cautious in “ giving word for word—which I think he had no other reason “ for than that, as he was an humble man, he did not presume “ to deviate from the precise meaning of the words, lest he might “ in any wise injure the truth of the text. But the consequence “ has been, that he has involved an author, sufficiently difficult “ in himself, in labyrinths, and has left him, whom he proposed “ to explain, so as still to require explanation.”

(78) The pontificate of Nicholas I. began in 858, and ended in 867.

§. VII. Meanwhile John was engaged in teaching philosophy, and, it seems, at least for some time, at Paris. That which he explained to his disciples, was of a mixed, and in great part, a very bad sort.

(79) Before the above mentioned translation appeared, he published a treatise on divine predestination in 19 chapters. At this period there were great disputes in France concerning the mysteries of predestination and grace, to which the opinions and writings of the monk Gothescala had given rise. This is not the place to give an account of that celebrated controversy; and it will be sufficient to observe that, while Gothescala was defended by Prudentius, bishop of Troies, Florus a deacon of Lyons, Lupus of Ferrieres, Ratraimn of Corbie, and

Remigius, archbishop of Lyons, he was opposed by Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, Rabanus, archbishop of Mentz, and some others. A party of his opponents were not content with having got him condemned by one or two synods, but, with the overbearing Hincmar at their head, procured to have him cruelly flogged and thrown into prison in the year 849. Gothescala was in this prison, when Hincmar and Pardulus, bishop of Laon, finding his doctrine abetted in tracts written by Prudentius, Lupus, and Ratramn, applied to John to draw up a treatise on predestination. He complied with their request, and dedicated the work to them, some short time before 852. In it he relied too much on logical subtleties, and fell into various errors. Among other strange opinions, which he is charged with having held, striving to maintain that there is only one predestination, viz. that of the elect, he advanced that, sin and punishment being mere privations, God cannot foresee them, nor, in consequence, predestine to punishment; that the pains of the damned are only their sins, or the tormenting recollection of them; that the damned will at length enjoy all natural advantages; that the irregular movements of the will can be punished, but that our nature itself is not capable of punishment; and that human nature is not subject to sin, alluding to original sin. As soon as this treatise was published, Venilo, archbishop of Sens, sent extracts from it to Prudentius, requesting him to refute the errors it contained. Prudentius was shocked at finding in them, as he thought, the bad principles of Pelagius and Origen. Having procured the whole work, he judged that it was of a downright Pelagian kind, and in 852 set about refuting it, chapter by chapter, and position by position. The same extracts being sent also to Lyons, the deacon Florus was engaged by the ecclesiastical authority of that city to draw up an answer to them, which he did much in the same manner as Prudentius had. (80) The 19 chapters of John were condemned by the third council of Valence, held in 855, which represents them as conclusions of impertinent syllogisms containing inventions of the devil rather than any proposition of faith. (81) This condemnation was confirmed in 859 by a council of Langres, and in the same year, it is said, by Pope Nicholas I. (82) Besides the errors of which he was guilty in this tract, John has been charged with often contradicting himself, and now starting an assertion and now unsaying it. (83)

(79) Mosheim says (Eccl. History at 9th century, Part 2. ch. 1.) that John taught the philosophy of Aristotle; but as Brucker shows, and will be seen lower down, it was rather of the new Platonists of the Alexandrian school.

(80) See Fleury, L. 48. §. 58. These works of Prudentius and Florus, as also that of John, to which they replied, may be seen in the interesting collection (published by G. Mauguin) Veterum auctorum; qui nono seculo de predestinatione et gratia scripserunt. Usher has published in his History of the Gothescaleian controversy (p. 115. seqq.) an old synopsis of John's chapters.

(81) In quibus commentum diaboli potius quam argumentum aliquod fidei deprehenditur. See Fleury, L. 49. §. 23.

(82) Annal. Bertiniani, and Fleury, ib. §. 48.

(83) Prudentius states (cap. 19.) that John pronounces eternal misery to the damned, to whom he had a little higher up promised joy, &c. at a certain period; "Ecce consuetissima tibi contrarietate miseriam aeternam indicis, quibus Paulo ante gaudium, pulchritudinem, gloriam, fulgoremque contuleras." Florus brings the same charge against him; "Mirandum est nimis, quomodo dicat omnium impiorum et Angelorum et hominum corpora aeterni ignis supplicium perpessura, quod superius tam aperte et tam multipliciter negavit; quod utique in hoc loco aut fecte et dolose confessus est; et abominabilis est Deo, qui de fide ejus in corde tenet mendacium, et in ore vult quasi proferre veritatem; aut si vere ipsa rei veritate, et timore offensionis Ecclesiae superatus ne omnino infidelis judicaretur, hoc confessus est, vacua est omnino et cassa talis confessio, quam superius tanta et tam multiplex praecessit negatio." He says also that, after his having laid down that prescience and predestination were the same, he afterwards confessed that they were different; "Qui hactenus praescientiam et praedestinationem unum adstruxeras, nunc differre, quamvis subdole, confiteris." In fact, John's work is written in such a manner, and in such a constant run of syllogistical acuteness, that it is often difficult to catch at the real meaning of his context. Besides, he uses some words in a sense peculiar to himself, particularly the term nature. He lays down that human nature cannot be corrupted by sin, and accordingly cannot be punished; but that it is the will that is capable of sinning, and consequently of punishment. Thus, treating of original sin, he says (cap. 17. §. 3.) that in the first man the generality of nature did not sin, but the individual will of every one, (for he states that this individual will of every one was contained in that of Adam) and that it would be unjust to punish any one for the sin of another; "Non itaque in eo (primo homine) peccavit naturae generalitas, sed unicujusque individua voluntas—in illo (primo homine) per se ipsum singulus quisque potuit proprium committere delictum; in nullo quippe vindicatur juste alterius peccatum." It appears almost certain, that he did not acknowledge any corruption or enfeeblement not only of human nature, but even of the will as caused by the sin of Adam; but, for fear of being considered as a professed Pelagian, and a denier of original sin, he recurred to the extravagant hypothesis, that every one, that is, every descendant of Adam, committed the same actual sin, and at the same time, that Adam did. Thus the sin of Adam, as committed by him alone, did not affect his posterity; for, as he says, it would be unjust to punish any one for another person's sin; but every one committed an actual sin on that occasion. Now this hypothesis, if admitted, might stand without the necessity of admitting what the Church has always considered as original sin, or of supposing that either human nature or any of its faculties has been impaired by it. Then he adds that nature is not at all punished, because it is from God, and does not sin; but that a voluntary movement making a libidinous use of the good of nature is justly punished; "Proinde in nullo natura punitur, quia ex Deo est et non peccat; motus autem voluntarius libidinose utens naturae dono merito punitur." The constant perfection of nature is one of his great principles, and another is, that no nature can be punished by another. Thence he concludes, that God has not made any punishment, and that the punishment of sinners are nothing else than the sins themselves. Accordingly he heads the 16th chapter with these words; "De eo quod nulla naturam punit, et nihil aliud esse poenas peccatorum nisi peccata eorum."—Then, going on with his dialectics, he says; "Proculdubio igitur tenendum nullam naturam ab alia natura puniri, ac per hoc nullam poenam a Deo esse factam;" whence he deduces that no punishment has been foreknown or predestined by God; "subindeque nec ab eo (poenam) praescitam nec praedestinatum." It is a general axiom of his that God cannot foresee any thing, of which he is not the author, and therefore he maintains that he does not foresee sin or evil. Thus, besides many other passages to this purport, he says (cap. 10.) "Sicut Deus mali auctor non est, ita nec praescius mali nec praedestinans est." This is strange doctrine indeed, as if God could not foresee negations or aberrations from his laws. From these principles he comes to the main point, which he was endeavouring to prove, viz. that there is no predestination of the damned, i. e. that the Almighty has not, in consequence of his foreknowledge of sins, predetermined and prepared punishments for the perpetrators of them; for, if he does not foresee sins, nor make punishments, how can there be a predestination of this sort. He concludes the work with, in a very audacious and consequential manner, anathematizing all those, who hold more than one predestination, that of the blessed; for, he says, there is only one, viz. as to things that exist, but not as to those that do not. Connected with this theory is his maxim, that predestination is nothing else than foreseeing; thus we read (cap. 18.); "Non aliud igitur praedestinare quam praevidere." Here and there we meet with some very singular notions; for instance, speaking (cap. 17.) of the fire of the future state, he says, that it is not a punishment, and that in it will dwell the happy as well as the miserable, "non minus habitabunt beati quam miseri;" but that, as light is pleasing to some eyes, and to others hurtful and pernicious, as food is agreeable to some and to others destructive, &c. in like manner said fire will be cheering to the blessed and doleful to the damned. In the 19th chapter he tells us, that the bodies of the saints will be changed into an aethereal quality, as likewise those of the damned who will enjoy all the goods of nature except beatitude, which, he adds, is from grace. Here he seems to state, that there will be no difference between the blessed and the unblessed, except that the former will enjoy heavenly beatitude, while the latter will be left in a sort of tranquil state of nature. It does not appear to me, that John was so liable to contradict himself as Prudentius and Florus imagined; but I allow, that the art, with which he manages his terms and reasonings, is apt to make one think, that he sometimes falls into contradictions. On the whole, his book is full of bad and dangerous opinions, and is much more philosophical than truly theological. And how could it be otherwise? He commenced it by announcing, that every question is solved by the four rules of philosophy; “Quadrivio regularum totius philosophiae quatuor omnem quaestionem solvi.” But theology is founded on revelation, and is not to be mangled by the Quadrivium. He sometimes quotes the Fathers, particularly St. Augustin, but in the quibbling and clipping mode of captious polemical disputants. John was certainly not a learned divine, as Mosheim calls him, (at 9th cent^y. Part 2. ch. 2.) although it must be allowed that, as Mosheim adds, he was of uncommon sagacity and genius; and I agree with this author (ib. ch. 1.) that he was the first, who joined scholastic with mystic theology. For, the scholastic theology, which the world could have done very well without, had been practised in Ireland some time before John flourished, as Mosheim observes, (at 8th cent^y. Part. 2. ch. 3.) where he says that the Irish, who were distinguished beyond all other European nations for knowledge, were the first teachers of scholastic theology. Whether what he adds concerning their spurning at authority in theological matters at that period be true or not, I shall not stop to inquire. I may, however, remark, whatever may be thought of John, that Dungal, who was not long prior to him, and who was a real theologian, had a great respect for authority relatively to theological questions, as we have seen (Chap. xx. §. 13.) from his treatise against Claudius of Turin.

§. VIII. Many of the erroneous opinions, into which his sort of philosophy led him, are to be found in his work On Natures, περὶ φύσεων, written in form of a dialogue, and divided into five books. (84) It begins with a division of natures into four sorts; 1. That, which creates and is not created; 2. That, which creates and is created; 3. That, which does not create and is created; 4. That, which neither creates nor is created. In the three first books John treats of the three first sorts, and in the two following he explains the return of the created natures into the increated one. He says, that God has created from all eternity in his Son the primordial causes of all things, goodness by itself, essence by itself, life by itself, greatness by itself, peace by itself, and so on as to the other Platonic ideas. He teaches, that the humanity of our Lord has been entirely changed into his divinity after his resurrection; that the wickedness and punishments of devils, and of all the damned in general, will end at some time; that at the general resurrection all sensible and corporeal things will pass into the human nature; that the body of man will be transformed into his soul; that the soul will pass into the primordial causes, and these into God, so that, as before the existence of the world there was nothing but God and the causes of all things in God, there will be after its end nothing else than God and the causes of all things in God. To this he applies a passage of Solomon, All that was, that which will be, as if, he adds, “Solomon plainly said, that God alone and the causes of all things in him was before the world; and that afterwards he, and the causes of all things in him, will be alone.” (85) On various occasions John speaks like a downright Pantheist, and a member of the school of Pseudo-Dionysius and the new Platonists. He states that, when it is said that God makes all things, this means that he is in all things, i. e. that the essence of all things subsists—that in God there is no accident, and that therefore it was not an accident in God to create the universe, and consequently that he was not subsisting before he did create it. (86) He says, that all things are God, and God all things—that God is the maker of all things and made in all. (87) Then we find him advancing some strange positions of another kind, ex. c. that the division of human nature into sexes was a consequence of sin, as foreseen by God, that the souls of beasts cannot perish, &c. (88)

(84) This work has been called by some περὶ φύσεων μερισμῶν, or of the division of Natures. F. Paris (see above Not. 74.) suspects, that μερισμῶν was added by some one that wished to skreen the character of John, as if, in case he should be charged with the heresies, in which the περὶ φύσεων abounds, it might be answered that this was not his work, but the one with the addition μερισμῶν. This is a far fetched conjecture, and, I believe, quite unfounded; for that addition might have been made to the title on account of the division of natures being treated of in the work, and some old writers make mention of it sometimes with and sometimes without that addition. F. Paris had closely examined it, and has given a summary of its doctrines in the first article of his dissertation. I shall follow his account of them, together with that given by Brucker in his history of philosophy, as I have not at hand the edition published by Thomas Gale at Oxford in 1681.

(85) See the dissertation by F. Paris.

(86) In Deo non est accidens; itaque non est Deo accidens universitatem condere. Non erga Deum erat subsistens antequam universitatem crearet.

(87) “Omnia esse Deum, et Deum esse omnia—Deum esse omnium factorem, et in omnibus factum.”

(88) Compare with Brucker Histor. Philosoph. Tom. III. p. 621, seqq. where more may be seen concerning his extravagant and indeed antichristian doctrines. Brucker does not hesitate to call him a Pantheist.

§. IX. John also wrote a metaphysical tract On the vision of God; but what doctrine he laid down in it

I am not able to tell. His book on the Eucharist appeared before 861 or 862. (89) It is not extant, the copies of it having disappeared since it was condemned by the council of Vercelli in 1050. (90) Hence it is impossible to discover his precise system on that mystery; some thinking that he admitted the real presence, denying transubstantiation; and others, that he denied both. (91) That this tract contained, or was at that time supposed to contain, some errors, appears from an answer by Adrevald, a monk of Fleury, who in his treatise, Contra ineptias, Johannis Scoti, brought forward passages from the Fathers in opposition to it. (92) Yet it seems that it was not easy to ascertain in what particular doctrine John meant to insinuate, or whether he really denied the real presence, although Ascelin, who lived in the eleventh century, and who had read his treatise, thought that his real object was to do so. (93) If he did, which by the bye we are not bound to believe, he certainly deviated from the doctrine held in Ireland concerning the holy Eucharist, which was evidently that of the real presence. (94) Nor is there any sufficient reason to think, that it was on account of this tract that Pope Nicholas I. in his letter to Charles the bald concerning John's translation of Dionysius Areopagites, which, he says, ought to have been sent to the Holy see for its approbation, observes that John had been reported by many to have formerly held some bad doctrines. It can scarcely be doubted, that the errors alluded to by the Pope were those contained in the book on predestination, and which the said Pope is said to have condemned in 859. (95) The story of John's having left France in consequence of being accused of heresy, and of his taking shelter with Alfred the great English king, is as unfounded as any thing can be. (96) John was probably never in England, except that perhaps he passed through it on his way to France. During the pontificate of John VIII. which did not begin until the latter end of 872, he was still in France, as appears from some Greek and Latin verses addressed by him to the king Charles, after which he has others, in which that Pope is praised. (97) It is more than probable, as will be soon seen, that he was dead before he could have been received by Alfred. If there was any time, at which John would have gone to England in consequence of wishing to shun persecution in the continent, it should have been during the pontificate of Nicholas I. after his propositions had been condemned by the councils of Valence and Langres, and after Nicholas had written concerning him to Charles the bald. Now Alfred, with whom, according to the story, he took refuge, was not king until after the death of Pope Nicholas; and, after he became king, he was too much engaged in his Danish wars to set about promoting learning and encouraging learned men, which in fact he did not apply to until about 883. Some English writers, aware of this difficulty, have deferred John's reception by Alfred until said year 883; (98) but this is a ridiculous supposition, for which there is not the least authority in the genuine and coeval accounts that remain of Alfred's proceedings. Asserius, his friend and biographer, makes no mention of John, notwithstanding the particular care he took in describing the literary men, whom Alfred encouraged and had at his court. He speaks indeed of a John, who, invited by Alfred, went over to him from France in 884. This John was quite different from John Scotus; for, as Asserius informs us, he was an Eald-Saxon, that is, apparently a continental Saxon, a priest and monk, and became abbot of Aetheling or Athelingey. (99) The other John was an Irishman, nor was he ever either a priest or monk. Yet, strange to say, to prop up the fable of John Scotus having been with Alfred, he has been confounded with John of Aetheling. It would be a waste of words to enlarge on this subject, and I shall only add that this John lived in his monastery until 895, about which year he was killed by two hired assassins. (100)

(89) Histoire Litteraire, Tom. 5. at Erigena. Mabillon thought that it was written before 859, the year in which Hincmar addressed his second treatise on predestination to Charles the bald. (See Acta Ben. Sec. 4. Part. 2. pref. §. 8.)

(90) Some learned men, and particularly F. Paris (Dissertation, &c.) have endeavoured to prove, that the famous tract De corpore et sanguine Domini, published under the name of Bertram, is the identical work of John. It is strange, that they could have thought so; for there is a marked difference between the style of this treatise and that of John's real writings. His style is strong, nervous, and of a close, bold, authoritative kind. That of De corpore, &c. is rather diffuse, and withal often involved and obscure, besides not being quite as correct as John's. But it is now universally admitted, that said tract was written by Ratramn the celebrated monk of Corbie, who was contemporary with John. This has been proved from writers who lived above 800 years ago, by Mabillon (Annal. Ben. ad A. 858. and Pref. ad Acta Ben. Sec. 4. Par. 2. §. 6. seqq.) and after him by others. (See Hist. Letter. ib. at Ratramne.) If it had been written by John, he could not be accused of having denied the real presence in the Eucharist or even transubstantiation. For, besides James Boileau Doctor of Sorbonne, Mabillon, and the authors of Hist. Letter. have clearly shown, that it does not contain any such denial; and, notwithstanding all the noise raised by the Calvinists who supposed that it favoured their system, the very Centuriators of Magdeburg state, that it contained the seeds of transubstantiation.

(91) See Hist. Letter. ib. at Erigena.

(92) Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 858. It is a small tract, consisting of a tissue of passages from Saints Jerome, Augustin and Gregory, explanatory of the true doctrine of the Eucharist. The author does not quote any of John's words, nor does he enter into reasonings. It has been published by D'Achery, Spicileg. Tom. 12. al. 1. and said to have been written about 870.

(93) Ascelin says that a person could not at first perceive what was John's meaning as to the mystery of the Eucharist, because, like a poisoner, he presented some things apparently sweet, but which would produce death; and that, although he alleged passages of the Fathers, he spoiled them by his glosses. Thus having quoted from the Missal of St. Gregory the following prayer, "Perficiant in nobis tua, Domine, sacramenta quod continent, ut, quae nunc specie gerimus, rerum veritate capiamus." On this John added; "Specie geruntur non veritate." Ascelin, Epist. ad Berengar. in notis ad Vit. Lanfr. Hence he deduced that John intended to show, that what is consecrated on the altar is not truly the body or blood of Christ. But with Ascelin's leave, John might have written these few words without meaning to deny the real presence. His object might have been to state, that although the holy Eucharist appears under the form of bread and wine, yet it is not really bread and wine, but only apparently so. Ratramn quotes the same prayer, and makes the same observation on it as that of John; yet it is certain, that in doing so did not mean to impugn the real presence. Some other proofs should be adduced to show clearly that John really denied that doctrine, and I greatly doubt whether they can be found. Hincmar in his second treatise on predestination, addressed to Charles the bald in 859, says, that some persons in his time held various errors, among which he mentions that of the sacrament of the altar not being the true body and the true blood of the Lord, but only the memory of them; "quod sacramenta altaris non verum corpus et verus sanguis sit Domini; sed tantum memoria veri corporis et sanguinis." It is usually supposed that he alluded to John, because some of the other errors, which he marks, are found in John's treatise on predestination or in the work on Natures. This, however, is not certain; and, even admitting it was the case, Hincmar might have misunderstood his meaning in the same manner as a great number of persons have misunderstood that of Ratramn. John might have said in a very orthodox sense, that the sacrament of the altar is a memory or commemoration of the true body and blood of Christ, supposing at the same time that they were really present, although not in the same form or manner as they were during our Saviour's mission on earth, when he was visible, and appeared in human shape, with distinct limbs, &c. If it be true, that John stated that the sacrament of the altar is not the true body and the true blood of the Lord, he might have understood the word true relatively to the system of Pascasius Radbertus, who held that the body of Christ in the Eucharist, although invisible to us, is in the same form as it proceeded from his blessed Mother, as it suffered on the cross, and as it rose from the dead. According to him, the phrase true body, meant a palpable body, such as our Saviour had during his mission on earth, and such as he has in heaven. Now other learned men, and very good Catholics, maintained that the body and blood of Christ, although really and substantially present in the sacrament of the altar, are not there under the form of a true body and blood, as meant by Pascasius, but in a spiritual, and not in a corporeal or carnal manner. Veron says, (Regula fidei Cathol. cap. 2. §. 11.) “ that the body of Christ under the symbols not only can be called spiritual and Christ himself Spirit, but likewise be said to be under the symbols in a spiritual manner or spiritually, and not in an animal or corporeal manner or corporeally or carnally.” He then gives his proofs; “ Probatur, quia est ibi ad modum spiritus multipliciter, scilicet sicut angelus est hic vel ibi invisibilis, impatibilis; et totus in toto, et totus in qualibet parte; est enim indivisibilis, et non frangibilis: ita Corpus Christi, seu Christus, est sub symbolis invisibilis, impatibilis, et totus in toto, et totus sub qualibet parte, quia ibi est indivisibilis et non frangibilis. Modus vero existendi corporalis, seu corporaliter et carnaliter existere, est existere visibiliter, patibiliter secundum extensionem ad totum, seu totum in toto, et partem in parte, et frangibiliter; ergo corpus Christi, seu Christus, est in symbolis spirituali modo seu spiritualiter, et non corporali seu carnali, nec corporaliter seu carnaliter in dicto sensu, &c. Veron proves, that this doctrine is perfectly consonant with that of the council of Trent, sess. 13. If John, speaking of the commemoration of the true body and true blood of the Lord, had said that the body and blood were not present in any manner, he could be justly charged with having denied the real presence. But Hincmar does not say that he did; and perhaps Hincmar was a follower of Paschasius, and consequently supposed that those, who opposed him as to the mode of Christ’s presence in the Eucharist (for as to the substance and reality of the presence there was no question) were in error. Nor is there any sufficient authority for making John say, that in the eucharistical commemoration the body and blood of Christ are absent. This has been asserted by Mosheim, who writes (ad Sec. ix. Part. 2. cap. 3. §. 20.) that John taught “ panem et vinum absentis corporis et sanguinis Christi esse signa et imagines." Mosheim gives us no voucher for this position, nor, I believe, could he. Any declaration of this kind made by John would have roused the whole world against him; for, as Mosheim himself, when entering on the history of the Pascasian controversy, observes, it had been hitherto the unanimous opinion of the Church that the body and blood of Christ were administered to those, who received the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and that they were really present in that holy institution; but as to the mode of this presence there were various opinions, and there was not as yet any decision of the Church on this subject. Now the question excited by the work of Pascasius was relative merely to the mode or form, in which the body and blood of Christ are present in the sacrament of the altar, and not to the presence itself. It was said work that gave occasion to John to draw up his treatise; and I have not as yet met with any decisive proof that he went farther in it than merely to impugn the system of Pascasius relative to the mode of Christ's presence. Yet, as the question was of a very nice and intricate nature, he probably used certain expressions, which some persons might have considered as heterodox.

(94) The very phrases used by the old Irish writers, when speaking of the celebration of Mass, are alone sufficient to show, what was the general belief on this point. They call it the sacrifice, the sacrifice of salvation, the mysteries of the sacrifice, the sacrificial mystery, the sacred mysteries of the Eucharist, the mysteries of the sacred Eucharist; sacrificium salutis, sacrificii mysteria, sacrificate mysterium, sacra Eucharistiae, mysteria, sacrae Eucharistiae mysteria. (See St. Gallus ap. Wal. Strab. V. S. G. L. 1. c. 18. Cumineus, Life of St. Columba, cap. 4. and Adamnan, L. 1. c. 40. L. 2. c. 1. L. 3. c. 12. and 17. &c.) Strong, however, as these expressions are, which could not be used were the body and blood of Christ supposed not to be really present, we find still stronger ones. Thus, the celebration of Mass is expressed by the making of the body of Christ. Adamnan relates, (L. 1. c. 44.) that on a Sunday St. Columba ordered Cronan, whom, although a bishop, he thought to be only a priest, Christi corpus ex more conficere. (See above Not. 182. to Chap. XI.) The consecration of the Eucharist is called by those writers, immolation of the euti host or of the sacred Lord's sacrifice; and the sacramental communion is expressed by the phrase, receiving the body and blood of Christ or of the Lord. In the ancient Life of St. Ita we read (cap. 17.) that on a solemn day, wishing to receive from the hand of a worthy priest the body and blood of Christ, she went to Clonmacnois and there received in a secret manner the body and blood of the Lord. It is added that the clergy, not knowing what was become of the body and blood of the Lord, were greatly alarmed and fasted together with the people until it was discovered, that Ita had received it. Then the priest, who had immolated the host, (immolavit hostiam) which St. Ita received, went to see her, &c. (See above Chap. xi. §. 3.) Cogitosus, describing (Vit. S. Brigidæ, cap. 35.) the church of Kildare, says that by one door the bishop entered with his clergy to immolate the sacred Lord's sacrifice, sacra et Dominica immolare sacrificia; and that by another the abbess and her nuns entered, that they might enjoy the banquet of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, ut convivio corporis et sanguinis fruantur Jesu Christi. Another phrase for the celebration of Mass was, with the old Irish, the offering of Christ's body. In the first Life of St. Kieran of Saigir (cap. 25.) it is said, that on every Christmas night, after his community had received the sacrifice from his hand, he used to go to the nunnery of St. Cocchea there to offer the body of Christ, ut corpus Christi offerret. Whenever the viaticum received before death is mentioned in the lives of our saints, it is usually called the sacred body and blood of the Lord; thus we read of St. Fursey (Life, L. 1. c. 39.) that he died post sacri corporis et sanguinis sumptam vivificationem; and of St. Fechin (Life, cap. 48.) that, sacrosancti corporis et sanguinis Domini sacramentis munitus, he gave up his spirit to his Creator.

Besides the use of these phrases, we find some of our ancient writers positively asserting that the body and blood of Christ are in the Eucharist. St. Columbanus of Bobbio, in his tract De poenitentiarum mensura taxanda, (ap. Bibl. Patr. Tom. 12.) lays down No. 42. that confession be required deligently before Mass, lest a person should receive unworthily; for, he says, the altar is the tribunal of Christ, and his body, which is there with his blood, marks out those who approach in an unworthy state; tribunal enim Christi altare, et corpus suum inibi cum sanguine indicat indignos accedentes. Sedulius, the commentator of St. Paul, in a note after the word, Take and eat; this is my body; (1 Cor. xi. 24.) says; "As if Paul said, Beware not to eat that body unworthily, whereas it is the body of Christ; Quasi Paulus, Cavete ne illud corpus indigne comedatis, dum corpus Christi est." Usher, endeavouring (Discourse on the religion of the ancient Irish) to squeeze something against the real presence out of this Sedulius, has very unbecomingly omitted the now quoted passage, but gives us another, that comes just after it, in which Sedulius remarks on the words, in remembrance of me, (ib.) that Christ "left a memory of himself unto us, just as if one, that was going on a distant journey, should leave some token with him whom he loved; that as often as he beheld it he might call to his remembrance his benefits and friendship." How this passage militates against the doctrine of the real presence I cannot discover, especially after Sedulius having said what we have seen about the body of Christ. Any Catholic might speak in that manner, if treating of the institution of the holy sacrament, which is certainly commemorative of Christ's passion and the benefits received through it. It is accordingly a token of Christ's love for us; but this does not exclude his being really present in it, although in a manner different from that, in which he appeared on the cross. At this very day the Catholics use expressions similar to that of Sedulius. In a lesson, written by St. Thomas of Aquino, of the office for Corpus Christi day it is stated, that in the sacrament "is kept up the memory of that "most excellent charity, which Christ showed in his passion— "and that in the last supper, when, having celebrated the Pasch "with his disciples, he was about to pass from this world to his "Father, he instituted this sacrament as a perpetual memorial of "his passion, a fulfilment of the ancient figures, the greatest of "the miracles wrought by him, and thus left a singular comfort "to the persons grieved for his absence." Would any one quote this passage in opposition to the doctrine of the real presence, on account of said doctrine not being expressly mentioned in it? But, it may be said, that doctrine is laid down in a former lesson taken from the said tract of St. Thomas. To this I reply, that Sedulius had in like manner expressed that doctrine immediately before the words quoted by Usher, who, had he wished to act fairly, should have produced both passages. He alleges also what Sedulius has concerning "our offering daily (in the Mass) for the commemoration of the Lord's passion, once performed, and our own salvation." What has this to do with the question? Whatever some divines may have speculated about the nature of the sacrifice of the Mass, it is certainly commemorative of the Lord's passion, and derives all its virtue from the one passion on the cross; and it is far from being an article of Catholic belief, that in the celebration of Mass there is any such thing as a new passion of Christ. "What is," says Bossuet, (Hist. des Variations, L. vi. §. 37.) "the sacrifice (of the Mass) except Jesus Christ present in the sacrament of the Eucharist, and representing himself to his Father as the victim, by which he has been appeased?" (See also ib. §. 23.) For, to be a truly commemorative sacrifice, it is necessary that Christ be really present; otherwise how could the Mass, or the essential part of it, have been called the sacrifice of the Lord, as it has constantly been? (See Veron, Regul. fidei, &c. cap. 2. §. 14.) Usher was equally wrong in appealing to the poet Sedulius. He quotes a passage, in which the poet, alluding to the offering of Melchisedec, mentions corn and wine, segetis fructus et gaudia vitis. But said passage is relative not to the Lord's supper, but to the one leper, who, out of ten, returned to thank Christ. Luke xvii. 15. Sedulius is very clear on the real presence, where he alludes to the Eucharist. Of these passages, which have been very uncandidly omitted by Usher, although he had read them, one is in the Carmen Paschale, Lib. 4. as follows;

" Nec Dominum latuere doli, scelerisque futuri Prodidit auctorem, panem cui tradidit ipse,
 Qui panis tradendus erat; nam corporis atque
 Sanguinis ille sui postquam duo munera sanxit,
 Atque cibum potumque dedit, quo perpete nunquam
 Esuriant sitiantque animae sine labe fideles."

And ib. another lower down;

" Corpus, sanguis, aqua, tria vitae munera nostrae:
 Fonte renascentes, membris et sanguine Christi
 Vescimur, atque ideo templum Deitatis habemur;
 Quod servare Deus nos annuat immaculatum,
 Et faciat tennes tanto mansore capaces."

In the corresponding part of his prose work (L. 5. c. 18.) on the same subject he says ; “ Omnes enim, qui Christo duce in aquarum fonte renacimur, ejus corpus et sanguinem sumentes edimus et potamus, ut Sancti Spiritus templum esse mereamur, &c. All we, who under our chief Christ are born again in the fountain of water, taking do eat and drink his body and blood, that we may deserve to be the temple of the Holy Ghost.” Sedulius alluded to the practice of the ancient Church, according to which the Eucharist was given to persons just after their baptism. This was observed even with regard to infants, and continued down to as late as the 9th century. Alcuin says ; “ After an infant is baptized, let him be clothed. If the bishop be present, he is to be immediately confirmed with chrism, and then receive the communion ; but, if the bishop be absent, let him receive the communion from a priest.” Jesse, bishop of Amiens, in a letter de ordine baptismi writes ; “ After the three immersions let the bishop confirm the child with chrism in the forehead ; and lastly let him be confirmed or communicated with the body and blood of Christ that he may become a member of Christ.” (See Bingham, Origines, &c. B. xii. ch. 1. sect. 2.) Usher recurs also to the commentator Claudius, whom he supposed to be an Irishman. But, as he was not, (see Chap. xx. §. 14.) we might overlook what Usher strove to extort from him. The fact is, that the passage, which he quotes from Claudius, is quite opposite to his theory, notwithstanding the quibbles he uses to make him appear favourable to it. If ever there was an author, who clearly announced the doctrine of the real presence and the sacrifice of the Mass, Claudius was one, and that in a passage quoted by Usher himself (Ep. Hib. Syll. Not. ad No. 20.) from his commentary on Leviticus. These are his words ; “ Christus in cruce carnem suam fecit nobis esibilem. Nisi enim fuisset crucifixus, sacrificium corporis ejus minime comederetur. Comeditur autem nunc in memoria Dominicae passionis. Crucem tamen praeveniens in Coena Apostolorum seipsum immolavit, qui post resurrectionem in caeli tabernaculum suum sanguinem introduxit, portans cicatrices passionum. Christ on the cross made his flesh eatable for us. For, unless he had been crucified, the sacrifice of his body would not be eaten. But it is eaten at present in memory of the Lord's passion. Yet anticipating the cross, he in the “supper of the Apostles immolated himself, he who after his resurrection introduced his blood into the tabernacle of heaven, bearing with him the scars of his sufferings.”

In the passages, which Usher collected on this subject, and in those whence he undertook to prove that the Irish practised communion under both kinds, he found the Eucharist often called the body and blood of Christ. To evade the strength and plain meaning of these expressions he recurs to dialectical and Calvinistical quibbles for the purpose of showing, that it would be absurd to suppose, that the body and blood are really and truly contained under the appearance of bread and wine. Here he deviated entirely from the purpose of his discourse; whereas the question which he affected to discuss was merely historical, viz. what did the ancient Irish actually believe as to the nature of the Eucharist, and not whether what they believed was absurd and antiphilosophical or not. But pressed by plain words and facts he took shelter under scholastic wrangling, in which he was well versed, although far from being so in real and staunch theology, great as he undoubtedly was in history, chronology, and antiquities. With considerable art he takes hold of the school opinions of some divines, such as the Rhemish ones, and then argues as if they were those of the whole Catholic church; but after all he does not clearly explain his own doctrine, which, there is every reason to think, was rather Calvinistical than conformable to that of the Church of England. As to the communion under both kinds, he might have saved himself the trouble of collecting passages concerning it; for it is not denied that in old times it was practised in Ireland as well as every where else. Yet there were cases, in which that of the cup was withheld; and we meet with a very remarkable one in the Poenitentiale of St. Columbanus, which is annexed to his monastic rule. He prescribes, that novices do not approach the cup; novitii, quia indocti et inexperti, ad calicem non accedant. (See Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 590.)

Long as this note already is, I cannot but make a few observations on certain notes which Toland adduces (Nazarenus, Letter 2. sect. 1.) as annexed to a MS. copy of the four Gospels written at Armagh. The writer or transcriber was one Maolbrighde, and it is now in the Harleian library. Toland says that Simon, although on other points quite mistaken as to this MS. was pretty right in his Bi- bibliothèque Critique at guessing it to be 800 years old, which would bring its age at present to more than 900. But as Toland was versed both in the Irish language and in the history of Ireland, he must have known that it is much more modern, as appears from various facts, dates, and names of princes, clergymen, &c. mentioned in it, and from which Dr. O'Connor, (Prolegom. Part. 2. p. CLXI. seqq. ad Rerum Hibern. Scriptores) very learnedly proves, that it was written in the year 1138. Now who is there so ignorant as not to admit, that the doctrine of the real presence against which Toland urges these notes, was universally held in the Western Church, Ireland included, at that period? Lest, however, it may be said that the notes quoted by Toland, were copied from a text of older times, I shall lay them before the reader. I must indeed take his word for the genuineness of them, as I have not access to said MS. He has left out some parts of them, which might help to elucidate the author's meaning; but, even as he has given them, they prove nothing against the belief in the real presence. The first is, that "the reason for blessing the Lord's supper, was, that it might mystically be made his body;" after which occur these words; "This bread is spiritually the Church, which is the body of Christ; ut mystice corpus ejus fieret—spiritualiter panis hic Ecclesiae est, quae Corpus Christi." Now the former words, instead of meaning what Toland wished to insinuate prove the reverse. The phrase, to be made his body, conveys the idea of the real presence. Its being said that this is done mystically is just as if we should say that it is done in a mysterious manner, and surely this is held and spoken of by every Catholic. Instead of mystically, it is usual at present, in expressing the effect of the consecration of the elements, to say sacramentally. Thus the council of Trent, (Sess. 13. cap. 1.) after having laid down "that Christ is truly, really and substantially present in the sacrament of the Eucharist under the appearance of bread and wine," adds, "that there is nothing repugnant in believing that our Saviour himself is always seated in heaven at the right hand of the Father according to the natural mode of existing, and that nevertheless he is in many other places sacramentally present to us with his substance." As to the latter words, This bread is spiritually, &c. they do not affect the question concerning the real presence, and merely express a very usual metaphorical allusion to the Church. Were they to be understood strictly, it would follow that Christ had no real human body. The second note is apparently more difficult, but probably would not be so, had Toland given us the whole of it. In this note the Eucharist is called "the mystery and figure of the body of Christ—the first figure of the New Testament—this figure is daily reiterated, is received in faith, &c." Mysterium et figura Corporis Christi—prima Novi Testamenti figura—Haec vero figura quotidie iteratur, accipitur in fide, &c. These words would not indicate the least doubt as to Christ being really and substantially present in the Eucharist, were it not for the quibbling use which the Calvinists made of the term figure. Many of the most firm abettors of the real presence have not scrupled to speak in a similar manner. Bellarmine, who often has such phrases, gives us a summary of them in his General Index, where he says; "Eucharistia est "signum, symbolum, repraesentatio, ac typus mortis Christi, seu "carnis et sanguinis, ut visibiliter in cruce illa suffixa, ille effusus "est. The Eucharist is a sign, symbol, representation, and type "of the death of Christ, or of the flesh and blood according as "the one was affixed to the cross and the other shed." This manner of speaking does not by any means exclude the actual presence of Christ's flesh and blood in the Eucharist. St. John Chrysostom says, (Hom. 17 in Ep. ad Hebr.) that the Eucharist is a type or figure of the sacrifice of the cross, and yet in the same place asserts, that the same Christ, who was then offered, is now offered. And surely the whole action, by which the sacrament of the altar is consecrated, is a representation of the death of Christ on the cross. The distinction of the elements of bread and wine, and the repeating of the mysterious words separately over them represent his passion and death, in which the blood flowed out of his body; not that Christ dies again in the sacrament, but that he places himself in it as the victim who has died, and consequently as the sacrifice of redemption and salvation. It is therefore a very silly and indeed unlearned practice to argue from such phrases as above against the doctrine of the real presence. In the great work, Perpetuité de la Foy, by Arnauld and Nicole, it is observed (Tom. 1. Liv. x. ch. 4.) that such terms as figure, type, &c. have been, even since the time of the Berengarian controversy, applied to the Eucharist by writers, who are universally allowed to have been strenuous supporters of that doctrine. No objection will, I suppose, be raised from the words of the note, received in faith; for it is certainly a mystery, which requires faith both for believing in it and for receiving it worthily. Bellarmine says in the above quoted Index; “Hoc mysterium (Eucharistia) sola fide comprehenditur, this mystery is comprehended by faith alone.” The third note, so far from favouring the system of Toland, is in direct opposition to it. Remarking on the words of our Saviour, This is my body, it has; “Et hoc dixit, ne nostra dubitaret fides de sacrificio quotidiano in Ecclesia, quasi corpus Christi esset, quoniam Christus in dextra Dei sedet.” Toland has translated the passage in such a manner as to make it appear contrary to the belief of the real presence. He renders it thus; “This he said, lest our faith should stagger about the daily sacrifice in the Church, as if it were the body of Christ, since Christ sits on the right hand of God.” Now to express the author’s meaning in English, instead of were the body, the translation should be were not the body, or the whole should be given as follows; “And Christ said these words, this is my body, lest our faith might doubt of the daily sacrifice in the Church being the body of Christ in consequence of Christ’s sitting at the right hand of God.” Surely no man of common sense would or could state, that Christ said the words, this is my body, for the purpose of cautioning us not to believe that it is in the daily sacrifice. Are not, on the contrary, these the words, which have induced all antiquity to believe that it really is in said sacrifice? The words, which forced Luther, eager as he was to vex the Catholics, to continue in that belief, and to defend it? Those, which all the impugners of the real presence have never been able to get over, or to explain in any rational manner different from that of said doctrine? The author’s meaning is perfectly clear. His object was to show, that, whereas Christ sits at the right hand of the Father, doubts might arise concerning his body being in the daily sacrifice; but that, to expel such doubts, Christ announced those plain and peremptory words, This is my body.

I shall not enlarge further on these points, as my purpose is not controversy, but merely to prove that the ancient Irish did actually and unequivocally hold the doctrine of the real presence, of the sacrifice of the Mass, &c. just as they are held at this day by the Catholics. And indeed it would be very strange if they did not, for otherwise how could they have been in communion with the English Christians, whose greatest man Bede never accused them of any error as to the Eucharist, with the Romans, Italians, French, &c. all of whom undoubtedly professed those doctrines?

(95) See above §. 7. In the Pope's letter, which, according to Mauguin, was written about 865, we read; "Relatum est
 "Apostolatu nostro, quod opus B. Dionysii Arcopagitae, quod de
 "Divinis nominibus, vel caelestibus ordinibus Graeco descripsit
 "eloquio, quidam vir Johannes, genere Scotus, super in Latinum
 "transtulerit, quod juxta morem nobis mitti et nostro debuit
 "judicio approbari, praesertim cum idem Joannes, licet multae
 "scientiae esse praedicetur, olim non sane sapere in quibusdam fre-
 "quenti rumore diceretur. Itaque quod hactenus omissum est vestra
 "industria suppleat, et nobis praefatum opus sine ulla cuncta-
 "tione mittat, quatenus, dum a nostri Apostolatus judicio fuerit
 "approbatum, ab omnibus incunctaneter nostra auctoritate accep-
 "tius habeatur." Some writers have said that the Pope had required that John should be sent to Rome, or banished from Paris, of whose school he was the capital. This is founded on an alteration made in the Pope's letter after diceretur, or, as in said corrupted letter, dicatur. Balæus (Hist. Univers. Paris. Tom. 1. p. 184.) has published this letter in its altered form from certain Collectanea of Naudacus. But the phrase Capital (head) of the school of Paris was not used until, at least, 300 years after the death of Pope Nicholas. Would Anastasius have, a few years after said letter was written, spoken in the gentle manner he did concerning John (see Not. 77.) had the Pope been so displeased with him as that story insinuates. Besides, the Pope himself does not positively charge John with maintaining errors, merely saying that it was reported that he formerly had.

(96) This fable has been propagated chiefly by William of Malmesbury, from whom others have copied it, which is indeed surprizing, to this very day. We meet with it, among several gross mistakes concerning John's transactions, in Rees' Cyclopaedia. William has it De gestis regum Anglorum, L. 2. c. 4. and De pontificibus, L. 5. From him it was taken with other stories by Simeon of Durham, Hoveden, &c. He was so ill informed of John's proceedings, that he makes Florus write against his work On natures. Now we have seen that it was the treatise on predestination, which was answered by Florus.

(97) See Hist. Letter. Tom. 5. at Erigena. These verses have been published by Du Canga.

(98) Ex. c. Hoveden, Annal. ad. A. 883. Matthew of Westminster, &c. Thus Turner says, (History of the Anglosaxons, B. 12. ch. 4.) that John went to England after the death of king Charles.

(99) Asserius says, that Alfred diversi generis monachos in eodem monasterio congregare studuit: primitus Joannem presbyterum et monachum, scilicet Ealdsaxonum genere, abbatem constituit."

(100) See Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 895. Strange that Turner (ib.) strives to support the paradox of John Scotus having been the same as John of Aetheling.

§. x. Our John has been confounded also with another person of that name, who was in the twelfth century considered as a martyr at Malmesbury, and who is said to have been killed there by his school-boys with their writing styles. That such a circumstance occurred at Malmesbury is very doubtful; but whether true or false, it is an idle conjecture to suppose, that this John called martyr was the same as John Scotus. (101) The fact is, that John Scotus remained in France and died there previous, in all probability, to the death of his protector Charles the bald, (102) which occurred in 877. And it appears certain, that his death was prior to 875, the year in which Anastasius wrote to Charles concerning the translation of Dionysius Areopagites. (103) For Anastasius speaks of John in such a manner as if he were already dead. (104)

Besides the works already mentioned, John drew up a translation of, at least in part, the Greek scholia of St. Maximus on difficult passages of St. Gregory Nazianzen. (105) He is usually supposed to have been the John, who compiled the Excerpta concerning the differences and agreements of the Greek and Latin verbs, which are found among the writings of Macrobius. (106) Seven Latin poems of his, mixed with Greek lines, but different from the Greek and Latin verses above mentioned, are still extant; (107) but whether they have been published as yet I am not able to tell. Some other works have been attributed to him without sufficient proof or authority, except a homily on the beginning of the Gospel of St. John. (108)

(101) This story comes also from William of Malmesbury (ib.) who, after telling us that John Scotus was induced by the munificence of Alfred to go to England, and that he taught at Malmesbury, makes him be killed there by boys. He gives the epitaph, which was to be seen in that place;

*Clauditur hoc tumulo sanctus sophista Joannes,
Qui ditatus erat jam vivens dogmate miro.
Martyrio tandem Christi conscendere regnum,
Quo, meruit, sancti regnant per secula cuncti.*

What has this to do with John Scotus? Would Asserius have been ignorant of John Scotus' martyrdom at Malmesbury, he who mentions so particularly the murder of John of Aetheling? None of the many old writers, prior to William, who speak so often of John Scotus, ever call him a martyr, not even the Berengarius his great admirer and defender. The fable of John Scotus having been the same as John of Malmesbury is still kept up by some superficial writers; but, like certain other stuff of theirs relative to him, it is not worth further consideration.

(102) See Mabillon, Annal. Ben. Tom. 3. p. 242. and Hist. Letter. at Erigena.

(103) This letter (see above Not. 77.) is stated in a MS. copy of it, which was in the Jesuits' library at Bourges, to have been written on the 23d of March, 8th Indiction, that is A. D. 875, six years after the eighth General council, which is mentioned in the latter part of it. (See Dissert. on John Scotus by F. Paris. Art. 6.)

(104) Anastasius remarking on John's method of translation says, that he was an humble man. Were John then alive, he would have said is, not was. He observes that John would not have received the gift of tongues had he not been burning with the fire of charity, and uses some other verbs in past tenses strongly indicating that John had ere that time left this world. Some writers have said, that he returned to Ireland in his latter days and died there. This is a mere conjecture without any foundation. Had he died in Ireland, there would be some mention of him in the Irish annals.

(105) Hist. Letter. ib. It has been published by Gale at the end of the work On Natures.

(106) See ib. and Usher, Ep. Hib. Syll. Not. to No. 23.

(107) Hist. Letter. Avertissement to Tom. 5. p. xix.

(108) Ib. at Erigena. The fabulous Bale says that John translated Aristotelis Moralia de secretis secretorum, seu recto regimine principum into Chaldaic, Arabic, and Latin. He founded this nonsense on a story patched up by some old Scotch writers, and still retained by some new ones, viz. that John, when very young, travelled to Athens and there studied the Greek, Chaldaic, and Arabic languages. What a shame to advance such fooleries!

§. XI. Much has been said about John's name having been in the Roman martyrology at 10 November. It would be very strange if it had been placed in it by the authority of any Pope, considering that his book on the Eucharist had been condemned by the council of Versalli, and that his doctrines on predestination had been also condemned long before; to which may be added that there has been a great and rather general prejudice against his character with regard to orthodoxy. To clear up this matter, it is to be observed that the name of the John, who is said to have been killed at Malmesbury, was in some Anglican calendars at 10 November and got into the edition of the Roman Martyrology published by order of Pope Gregory XIII.

at Antwerp in 1586. (109) This was owing to the said John having been confounded with John bishop of Mecklenburgh, who was a real martyr, and who suffered on the 10th of November, A. D. 1065. This John was a Scotus, or Irishman, and, having been appointed bishop of Mecklenburgh, was sent to preach in Slavonia, that is, the old Slavonia lying between the Elbe and the Vistula, which was inhabited by the Vandals, Vinuli, &c. He was most cruelly treated in that country, and barbarously put to death in their chief town Rethre at the time now mentioned. (110) Considering all these circumstances, it may be fairly concluded that the matter stood as follows. There was buried at Malmesbury a John, surnamed the Wise, but not called martyr by older writers. (111) This surname gave rise to a notion that he was the same as the renowned John Scotus; and thus it became necessary to suppose that John Scotus was at Malmesbury. Then, to account for his having been there, was made up the story of his going over to Alfred, &c. Meanwhile the cruel death of John of Aetheling, caused by repeated wounds inflicted at the instigation of some of his monks, was much spoken of in England. Some of the good people of Malmesbury took it into their heads, that this murdered John was no other than their John the Wise; but, as it would have been awkward to make him appear as killed by, or through the means of monks, the blame of his death was thrown upon the poor schoolboys. (112) One circumstance was still wanting, viz. the day of the martyrdom, whereas William of Malmesbury and his followers had not marked it. Luckily some one found the martyrdom of John Scotus assigned to the 10th of November, and without troubling himself about Mecklenburgh, of which he had been bishop, or Slavonia, where he was killed, identified him with John of Malmesbury; and hence for this John the 10th of November was marked in some English calendars, &c. Thus by putting various Johns in requisition the history of John Scotus Erigena has been egregiously mangled and distorted. (113)

(109) In that martyrology are these words; “Eodem die (10th November) S. Joannis Scoti, qui graphiis puerorum confossus martyrii coronam adeptus est.” Dupin states (at 9th century Vol. 2. p. 87. English ed.) that they are not in any other edition of the Roman martyrology; and Mabillon makes mention of only the Antwerp edition of 1586 as containing the name of John Scotus. (See Acta Ben. Sec. 4. Par. 2. p. 513.) Yet Fitzsimon says (Catalog. praecip. sanctorum Hiberniae, Liege A. 1619.) that it was in an edition of 1583, and declares that it was Baronius, who expunged it from the Martyrology. “I know,” he adds, “that there was ready an apology for John Scotus approved of by the suffrages of great Popes, Cardinals, &c.” Such an apology has not yet seen the light nor probably ever will. As to the year 1583, mentioned by Fitzsimon, either it is a mistake for 1586, or he confounded the Roman Martyrology with an edition of that of Usuard published at Antwerp in 1583, in the appendix to which Molanus, led astray by Hector Boethius, inserted the name of John Scotus. Arnold Wion also fell into this mistake. (See F. Paris, Dissertation, &c. Art. 7.) By the bye, F. Paris was wrong in denying, that the name of John Scotus was in any Roman Martyrology published at Antwerp in 1586, and maintaining that there was no such edition. But there certainly was, and printed by Chr. Plantinus. There is a copy of it in the library of Trinity College Dublin, with John’s name as above, which got into it from the appendix to that of Usuard by Molanus. Although that Antwerp edition was printed by order of Gregory XIII. it does not follow that he approved of it or of the insertion of John’s name; nor indeed could he, whereas he was dead since the 10th April of the preceding year 1585.

(110) See Fleury L. 61. §. 17. John of Mecklenburgh is praised more than once by Adam of Bremen. See also Colgan, AA. SS. p. 407. and below Chap. xxv. §. 3.

(111) Gotzelin, who wrote some time before William of Malmesbury published his De gestis, &c. makes mention (Catalogue of saints buried in England) of John the Wise, whose remains, as well as those of Aldhelm, were in the church of Malmesbury. (See the Dissertation by F. Paris, art. 6.)

(112) In the epitaph (above Not. 101.) which was written before the times of William of Malmesbury, but after John the Wise had been confounded with John of Aetheling, there is no mention of those schoolboys. Were the martyrdom caused by them, would not some notice have been taken of such a circumstance as greatly heightening the account of the martyr's sufferings? It is also worth observation, that in said epitaph John is not called Scotus; whence we may infer, that the opinion of his having been the same as John Scotus was not prevalent at the time it was written; otherwise, there would assuredly be something in it to indicate, that he was the far famed John Scotus.

(113) See Mabillon and Dupin, loc. cit. ad Not. 9. and Harris, (Writers at Erigena.)

§. XII. At the same time with John, or perhaps somewhat earlier, there was another Irish philosopher in France, named Macarius, originally, I suppose Mecher or Meagher, who disseminated an error, afterwards maintained by Averroes, viz. that all men had but one soul. From him it was taken by a monk of Corbie, against whom Ratramn wrote a treatise on that subject. (114) A monk, Columbanus, who from his name may be fairly supposed to have been an Irishman, flourished also in France in these times. By order of Charles the bald he put in verse an old genealogy of emperors, kings, and French lords, which had been drawn up by that sovereign. (115) Among the Capitulars of this Charles there is one, taken from the Acts of the council of Meaux held in 845, relative to the hospitals founded by pious Irishmen in France, for persons belonging to their nation. In it the king is informed that they were usurped by strangers, and reduced to a state of desolation, so that not only persons applying for admission were not received, but likewise those, who had from their infancy served God in them, were driven out and forced to beg from door to door.

(116) Whether the king took care to have a stop put to this abuse, we are not informed. To this period belonged the abbot Patrick, who is said to have flourished in 850, and to have left Ireland about that time, retiring to Glastonbury, where he died on a 24th of August. His history has been greatly obscured by his having been confounded by some Glastonian scribblers with our great apostle. (117) It does not appear that he became abbot of Glastonbury; but he had been an abbot in Ireland, and perhaps a bishop. He was apparently one of those, who fled from the fury of the Northmen; and it may be plausibly conjectured, that he was the same as Moel-Patrick, son of Fianchon, a bishop, anchorite, and abbot elect of Armagh, who died in 862, (118) There is no foundation for the opinion of some writers, that the abbot Patrick was the institutor of Patrick's Purgatory in Lough Derg; (119) and as to some writings attributed to him, the authority, on which they are, is such as to render them not worth inquiring into. (120)

Among the Irish emigrants of these times I find a pious and learned priest, named Probus, who must not be confounded with Probus the biographer of St. Patrick (121) He retired to the monastery of St. Alban of Mentz, where he died on the 26th of May, A. D. 859. He was very fond of classical studies, insomuch so that his friend Lupus of Ferrieres thought that he applied to them more than became an ecclesiastic, and composed many tracts, several of which seem to have been poetical. None of his works appear to be now extant. He is praised in the Annals of Fulda as a man of pure doctrine and holy life, who was an honour to the church of Mentz. (122)

(114) Mabillon says (Annal. Ben. ad. A. 867.) that Macarius, whose error was that there is but one soul in all men, was, perhaps, the Macarius to whom Rabanus dedicated his book De Computo.

Ratramn gave him the nickname Baccharius. Ratramn's tract against his disciple of Corbie was in an old MS. of the monastery of St. Eligius of Noyon. Harris in his incorrect account of Macarius (Writers) has changed it into a tract written by Macarius himself. But no account remains of any writings of Macarius, although he was a teacher.

(115) Hist. Letter. Tom. v. p. 513.

(116) This Capitular may be seen in Sirmond's collection under the head of 6th Capitular. It is also in Baluze's Capitulari, Tom. 2. col. 34. The hospitals are called Hospitalia Scottorum, that is, says Sirmond, Hibernorum, as he proves in his note, which has been copied by Baluze, ib. col. 731. See also Fleury, Hist. Eccl. Liv. 48. §. 30.

(117) See Chap. vii. and ib. Not. 20.

(118) 4 Masters ap. AA. SS. p. 366. Their date is 861. yet, as Patrick of Glastonbury is said to have belonged to Rosdela, (see Not. 18 and 20 to Chap. vii.) it seems more probable, that he was different from Moel Patrick.

(119) See Chap. vii. §. 14.

(120) See Ware and Harris, Writers at Patrick abbot.

(121) We have already seen, (Chap. iii. §. 3.) that the author of the Life of St. Patrick, whose original name was Coeneachair, lived in the tenth century. Probably that was also the Irish name of the Probus we are now treating of.

(122) See Histoire Letter. Tom. v. p. 209. seqq. at Probus, and Mabillon, Annal. &c. at A. 836.

§. XIII. Of the ecclesiastical affairs of Ireland for many years after about 852 very imperfect accounts remain. Mane, son of Huargusa, who became bishop of Emly in 850, (123) died in 857, and was succeeded by Coenfeolad who was also king of Cashel and lived until 872. (124) Aedgen surnamed Brito, apparently a Briton, scribe, anchoret, and bishop of Kildare, died in the 116th year of his age on the 18th of December, 863. (125) He was succeeded by Moengal, who lived until 870, and after whom was Robartach Mac-Naserda, who died in 874, and whose memory was revered on the 15th of January. (126) Another bishop of Kildare, Lasran Mac-Mochtighern, is said to have died in the same year. Cathald Mac-Corbmac, bishop of Clonfert, a distinguished and eminent man died in 862. (127) A namesake of his was in these times bishop and abbot of Clondalkin, whose death is assigned to 876 (877). (128) Manchen, bishop of Leighlin, died in 864. (129) To the year 866 are affixed the deaths of St. Conall son of Fiachna prince of East Meath, and of the royal blood of Ireland, and bishop at Killskire five miles from Kells in Meath and the only bishop we meet with in that place; of St. Cormac Hua Liathain, an anchoret, abbot, and bishop, whose see I cannot discover; of Aidhechar a bishop and chronographer and abbot of Connor and Lannela; and of Robertach likewise a chronographer and bishop of Finglas. (130) Cormac Mac-Eladac, a scribe, abbot, and bishop of Saigir, died in 868, and in 872 Coenchamrac, bishop and abbot of Louth. (131) Fachtna, or rather Fethgna, who had succeeded Diermit at Armagh in 852, died on the 12th of February or 6th of October, 874. (132) In some of our annals he is styled "Comorban (heir) of St. Patrick and head of the religion (primate) of all Ireland," whence it may be concluded that, whatever opposition there was to the exercise of the rights of Armagh during the contests for the possession of that see, they were universally acknowledged in his time. He was succeeded by Annire, who held the see only nine months, and died in 874 or 875. (133) After him was Cathasach Mac-Robertach, whom we find called prince of Armagh. His incumbency lasted four years, and he died some time in 879, before the end of which year Moelcoba Mac-Crunnvail was archbishop of Armagh. For he is styled by that title, when in said year he was, together with Mochta or Mocteus, a lecturer of Armagh, made prisoner by the Northmen. (134) He is stated to have held the see for five years, which agrees with his death being assigned to 885, or 886. (135)

(123) Above §. 3. (124) Ware, Bishops at Emly.

(125) Idem at Kildare from the 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 629. Their date is 862 (863).

(126) See Ware ib. and 4 Masters, ib. who add that Robartach had been also a scribe, or doctor, and abbot of Achonry. They observe that Inis-Robartach, or the island of Robartach, got its name from him. Harris says, in his addition to Ware, that he did not know the situation of it. Perhaps it was the tract now called the island of Allen and surrounded by the bog of said name in the county of Kildare. There is a place in it called Robertstown 21 miles from Dublin.

(127) 4 Masters ap. AA. p. 544 at A. 861 (862)

(128) ib.

(129) ib. p. 332. ad A. 863 (864). Ware (at Leighlin) has A. 865.

(130) 4 Masters ap. AA. SS. p. 784. Besides Cormac Hua Liathain they have (ib. p. 360.) two other bishops Cormac prior to him, one a scribe and bishop at Kill-Fobric (barony of Ibrickan, county of Clare,) who died in 837 (838); and another a writer and bishop at Laithrigh-briuin in the country of the O'Foelans (see ib. p. 541.) and now county of Waterford, whose death they assign to 854 (855). Colgan (Ind. Chron. ib.) calls Aidhecar abbot of Kill-elensis; but this means the same as Lann-ela, whereas the Welsh word Lan or Llan, which was much used by the ancient Irish, corresponds to our Kill or Kille. Of these bishops Conal is the only one particularly treated of by Colgan, viz. at 28 March, the anniversary of his death.

(131) 4 Masters ib. p. 360 and 473 ad A. 867 (868), and p. 736 ad A. 871 (872). There were some other minor bishops in these times; but the names of almost all of them are unknown.

(132) See Ware at Armagh and Tr. Th. p. 295 ad A. 873 (874). Colgan says that his memory was revered on the 12th of February. O'Flaherty (MS. not. ib.) remarks that he should have said 6th of October. But even supposing that Fethgna died on that day, his commemoration might have been on the day marked by Colgan. Yet Colgan adds, that Fethgna died on the 12th of February.

(133) Ware and Tr. Th. locc. citt. The Cashel catalogue allows him one year, as it avoids fractional parts of the years.

(134) Usher, Ind. Chron. ad. A. 879 from the Annals of Ulster.

(135) 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 296 at A. 885 (886) I have here followed the series of the catalogue from the Psalter of Cashel, which is preferred by Ware and Colgan. Harris has added certain dates for Cathasach and Moelcoba, which make Ware's statement appear very confused. The Annals of Ulster differ from the Cashel catalogue as to the succession of Anmire, &c. For they place Anmire after Moelcoba. Then in the 4 Masters we find dates disagreeing with those of other accounts, and which Colgan considers as wrong. Not being able to reconcile these jarring statements, I shall merely lay before the reader a system drawn up by O'Flaherty, which I find in a MS. note to Tr. Th. p. 292. It is this: Fethgna, who died in 874, was succeeded by Moelcoba, who having held the see until 879 was taken by the Northmen. In consequence of his captivity, Anmire was placed on the chair of Armagh, and after nine months possession died in said year 879, in which he was succeeded by Cathasach, who ruled for four years and died in 883. In another MS. note (ib. p. 319.) he says that Moelcoba lived after his captivity until 888.

§. xiv. Indrect, who was abbot of Hy in 849 (136) and a very wise man, suffered martyrdom through some Anglo-Saxons on the 12th of March, A. D. 853.

(137) What was the cause, or on what occasion, or where he was killed I cannot discover; but it could hardly have been on account of his faith, as the Anglo-Saxons were then Christians. Perhaps he was murdered by robbers; and it is known that in those times holy and distinguished men, so put to death, used to be called martyrs. His next successor at Hy was, in all appearance, Kellach, son of Alild, who was also abbot of Kildare, and who died in the country of the Picts in 865. (138) After him the abbot of Hy was Feradach, son of Cormac, who lived until 880. (139) During his administration, and in the year 878, the shrine and relics of St. Columba were brought to Ireland, lest these might fall into the hands of the Danes. (140) It can scarcely be doubted that it was on this occasion that the remains of St. Columba were deposited at Down, where those of St. Patrick had been from the beginning, and whither those of St. Bridget had been removed some not long time before. (141)

During this period Ireland herself had been greatly harassed by the Northmen. In 853 Amlave, alias Auliffe or Olave, a Norwegian prince, accompanied by two brothers of his, Sitric and Ivar, alias Iobhar, came to Ireland, and all the Northmen submitted to him, and he exacted contributions from the Irish. (142) Amlave took possession of Dublin, and Ivar of Limerick, which he built or rather enlarged; (143) and Sitric is said to have built Waterford. (144) In 856 a sharp war was carried on between them and Maelseachlin, king of Ireland, in which great numbers were slain on both sides; and in 857 there was fighting in Munster, during which Carthan Fionn with the Irish and Danes of his party were defeated by Ivar and Amlave, who afterwards in 859 ravaged Meath. (145) In 860 Maelseachlin defeated the Danes of Dublin, and in the same year a party of Danes assisted Aidus or Aedan Finnliath, son of the former king Niall Calne, in another devastation of Meath. It was through the assistance of Amlave and his followers that this Aidus was raised to the throne of Ireland in 863. (146) Yet he afterwards quarrelled with the Northmen, and joined Kieran son of Ronan and the Kinel-Eogain (the people of Tyrone) in a battle against them in 866, near Lough Foyle, in which they came off triumphant with the heads of 240 of the Northmen chiefs. (147) In 869 Amlave plundered Armagh, burned the town and all its sacred edifices, &c. and killed or made prisoners about 1000 persons. (148) While in the year 870 he and Ivar were absent in North Britain, where they destroyed Alcluith or Dunbarton, the Irish king Aidus Finnliath laid waste Leinster from Dublin to Gowran, and soon after their return to Ireland in 871, with 200 ships, Amlave died. (149) Ivar then became king of all the Northmen in Ireland, but died in 873, in which year, while Donogh, son of Dubhdavoirean king of Cashel, and Carrol prince of Ossory, were devastating Connaught, the Danes of Dublin plundered Munster. (150) Then we find the Northmen fighting among themselves, as likewise the Irish, for instance, the Momonians against the people of Meath in 880.

(136) See above §. 2.

(137) AA. SS. p. 254. from the 4 Masters at A. 852 (853.)

(138) Annals of Ulster at A. 864 (865). The 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 500. and 629. have A. 863 (864).

(139) Annals of Ulster at A. 879 (880). According to the 4 Masters, (Tr. Th. p. 500.) Feradach died in 877 (878).

(140) Ib. at A. 877 (878). The 4 Masters, (loc cit.) assign this removal to 875 (876). What I call reliques, Johnstone, (Extracts, &c.) calls oaths. See O'Reilly's Irish Dictionary. Compare with Not. 27. above.

(141) As to the time of the removal of St. Brigid's remains to Down, see Not. 18. to Chap. VIII. Colgan conjectures (Tr. Th. p. 566.) that the person, who removed them, was Keallach abbot of Kildare and Hy, who, as we have just seen, died in 865. With regard to those of St. Columba, O'Donnel relates (Life of St. Col. B. 3. ch. 78.) that they were brought to Down in the time of Mander the son of a Danish king, who was laying waste the northern parts of Britain and the island of Hy. He has a story, which we may pass by, about how the Danes threw the sarcophagus containing them into the sea, and how it floated to Down, where it was opened by the abbot of that place, &c. O'Flaherty. (MS. Not. ad loc. Tr. Th. p. 446.) marks A. 875 as the year of this removal to Down, meaning the 875 (876) of the 4 Masters, for the transferring of the shrine, &c. to Ireland, which, however, the Annals of Ulster assign to 878.

(142) Annals of Ulster at 852 (853). They call Amlave king of the Lochlanach. In the annals of Innisfallen we read, according to Mr. O'Reilly's translation; "A. 853. Auliffe the king of Norway's son came this year into Ireland, accompanied in that expedition by his two brothers Sitric and Iobhar. The Danes and Norwegians submitted to him, and he was also paid tribute by the Irish."

(143) Were we to believe Giraldus Cambrensis, Sitric was the founder of Limerick. But we have seen (above §. 3.) that it was already a town, or, at least, a village, where Danish ships were stationed in the time of Turgesius. And hence also it appears, that the Northmen were in possession of it before 855, the year marked by Ferrar, History of Limerick, p. 5. He refers to Ware, who says nothing about the year 855. Ware indeed (Antiq. cap. 24. at A. 853.) quotes a passage from Giraldus, in which that author states, that Amlave built Dublin, Ivar, Limerick, &c. As to this building of Dublin, Giraldus was quite wrong; for from what has been seen (above §. 1. and 3.) it is plain that it was inhabited by the Northmen several years previous to the arrival of Amlave; and the Annals of Innisfallen affix their first taking possession of it to A. D. 837. It is, however, true that both Dublin and Limerick, which were inconsiderable places, before they were first occupied by the Northmen, were probably much enlarged by Amlave and Ivar.

(144) That Sitric was the founder of Waterford, as Giraldus says, seems to be universally allowed. Smith (History of Waterford, ch. 4.) assigns the foundation of it to A. 853. But it was probably somewhat later.

(145) Annals of Innisfallen, and Ware, Antiq. cap. 24.

(146) Annals of Innisfallen. Compare with Chap. xx. §. 8.

(147) Ib. at A. 866.

(148) Ib. at A. 869. and Ware Antiq. cap. 24. The Annals of Ulster (Johnstone's Extracts) and the 4 Masters, (ap. Tr. Th. p. 295.) assign this destruction of Armagh to A. 867 (868).

(149) See Annals of Innisfallen at 870, (871) and compare with Ware ib.

(150) Ib. at A. 873. Ware assigns the death of Ivar to 872.

§. xv. While this miserable state of affairs continued it might seem that studies of every sort were neglected in Ireland. But it does not appear that, with the exception of Armagh and Hy, the religious establishments and schools were much disturbed or nearly as much harassed as they had been in the times of Turgesius. And in fact, besides some learned men already mentioned, we find several others, who were distinguished in this period as scribes or doctors and writers. Luacharen a scribe of Clonmacnois died in 864; Martin of the same place and another Martin, scribe of Devenish, in 868; (151) Cobhtach Mac-Muredach, abbot of Kildare, and famous for his wisdom, in 869; (152) Dubthach scribe of Kill-achaid (county of Cavan) in 870; Robartach, a monk and scribe of Durrow (King's county) and a very exact chronographer in 871; Aidus scribe of Roscommon, and Torpadius of Tallaght in 873; Robartach O'Kearta scribe of Kill-achaid in 874; Domnald scribe of Cork in 875; Moelpatrick scribe of Trevet (Meath) in 885; Suibhne a celebrated doctor of Clonmacnois in 890, to whom we may add Soerbrethach of Cork, who died in 892. (153) Concerning these persons I do not find any thing particular related, and I have made mention of them merely to show that, notwithstanding the misfortunes of that period, schools were still kept up, and that Ireland could then boast not only of the learned men, who removed to foreign countries, but likewise of many others that remained at home.

Among the distinguished persons of the latter part of the ninth century, marked as saints in the Irish calendars, we meet with Suibhne O'Fionnachta, bishop of Kildare, who died in 879; Scannal, likewise bishop of Kildare, who died in 882; (154) Muredach son of Bran, a king of Leinster, and abbot of Kildare, whose death is assigned to 883, (155) as is also that of Tulelatia, abbess of its nunnery; and Moeldar, bishop of Clonmacnois, who died in 887.

(156) But the most celebrated saint of this period was Corbre, or Corpheus, surnamed Crom, that is crooked or bent, who succeeded Moeldar in the see of Clonmacnois. His reputation was so great, that he was called the head of the religious of almost all the Irish of his time. As no Acts of his are extant, I can only add, that he died in 900 on the 6th of March, the anniversary of which was celebrated as a festival at Clonmacnois.

(157)

(151) Tr. Th. p. 632. and Ind. Chron.

(152) Ib. p. 629.

(153) See ib. p. 632. and Ind. Chron. I have added a year to each of its dates. Suibne of Clonmacnois is spoken of under the name of Swifne, by some English annalists at A. 891, as the most skilful doctor of the Scoti or Irish, and the Annals of Ulster, marking his death, call him an anchoret and an excellent scribe. (See Usher, p. 732.) He was in all appearance the person; whom Caradoc of Lancarvan, quoted by Usher (ib.) calls Subman Cubin, and who, he says, being the greatest of the doctors of Scotia (Ireland) died in 889. Caradoc took this date from some Irish document, and it is the very one given for Suibhe's death by the 4 Masters, which, according to the usual method, I have changed into 890. It differs only by one year from that of those English annals. Florence of Worcester has a date different from both, viz. A. 892.

(154) 4 Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 629 at A. 878 (879) and 881 (882). Ware, (Bishops at Kildare) assigns the death of Suibhne O'Fionnachta to 880, and that of Scannal to 884.

(155) Tr. Th. ib. A. 882 (883). Archdall (Monast. at Kildare) has Muredach at A. 882; but he had him before at A. 870, where he calls him Moreigh Mc. Broyn, without any authority, although he strangely refers to Tr. Th. p. 629, where no such person is mentioned at that year. He says that Moreigh, i. e. Muredach, had been king of Leinster; but this is a mistake founded upon a typographical error in Tr. Th. ib. where rex appears instead of regis. And it is clear from the catalogue of the kings of Leinster, (ib. p. 598.) that there was no Muredach, or Moreigh, son of Bran, or Broyn, among them.

(156) Four Masters ap. AA. SS. p. 509. ad 886 (887.)

(157) See AA. SS. ad 6 Mart. where Colgan treats of St. Corpreus. I have added a year to his date from the 4 Masters. He relates a curious anecdote, which indeed we are not bound to believe, of Maelsechlain, who had been king of Ireland, appearing to the saint, and telling him that he was in purgatory together with the priest, who had been his confessor during his lifetime. It is added, that Corpreus prayed for the deliverance of the king, while his priests prayed for that of the quondam confessor, and that they were both freed from purgatory in the course of a year. Whatever may be thought of this narrative, it shows the practice of the times as to praying for the dead, which was observed in Ireland at much earlier periods. It is very odd, that Usher undertook (Discourse of the Religion, &c. ch. 3.) the hopeless task of endeavouring to prove that the ancient Irish did not pray for the dead; for, historically speaking, whether they were right or wrong, there is nothing more certain or more easily demonstrated than that they did. As to what he has about Patrick's Purgatory in Lough Derg not being as ancient as some had imagined, I agree with him; but, although he does not clearly explain himself, he must have known that said Purgatory was not considered as a habitation or receptacle of departed souls, but as a place where living persons might be purged from their sins. (See Not. 154 to Chap. VII.) Accordingly it has nothing to do with the question relative to any future state of mankind or to prayers for the dead. The passage quoted by Usher from the book De tribus habitaculis, ascribed to St. Patrick, proves nothing on either side of this question. It states that there are three regular habitations established by God, viz. heaven, earth, and hell; that the just are placed in heaven, the wicked in hell, and that on the earth there is a mixture of good and bad persons, and that out of it the two other places are supplied. What has this to do with what the Catholics call Purgatory, which not to enter into school questions as to locality, &c was never supposed to be a regular or permanent habitation or state, but a passage, through which some souls should pass before their entering the kingdom of heaven, and which neither was nor is visited by the far greatest part of mankind. The author says, that the just are raised to heaven, but does not state that they are so immediately on their exit from this life. Now this is the great point at issue, viz. whether all the just, that is, all those who die in the state of grace, without considering their greater or lesser degrees of perfection, proceed indiscriminately to heaven as soon as they leave this world. Concerning this point there is nothing in that passage; and accordingly, as I said, it affords no argument on either side. This observation equally applies to some short passages quoted by Usher from other writers, which are quite irrelevant to the question concerning prayers for the dead, and which I shall not trouble the reader with examining. It was very unfair for Usher to refer to the Greeks against Purgatory; for he well knew that, although they do not admit purgatorial fire, which, however, did not prevent their union with the Latins at the council of Florence, they have always prayed and do still pray for the dead. As to what he has against Bellarmine concerning an argument in favour of Purgatory from the visions of St. Fursey I shall not dwell on it, merely observing that he himself gives a passage from them, which certainly seems to confirm that doctrine. To get rid of said passage he tells us, that God's justice was sufficiently satisfied by the sufferings of Christ, and that man need not give further satisfaction thereunto by penal works or sufferings either here, or in the other world. This is a glorious doctrine for sinners, as if, because Christ suffered for them, they should not make any atonement for their transgressions. It is true, that every exertion of man to satisfy the divine justice would be useless, had not Christ by his sufferings appeased his heavenly father, and thus enabled man to appear before the throne of mercy in the confident hope that, through the merits of Christ, his works and penitential feelings and sufferings may procure for him forgiveness from his Creator. But in Usher's system the sinner may sit down quiet and easy, and do no more than merely cease to sin, saying to himself; Christ has suffered for me; I am not bound to give myself the trouble of any atonement or penitential task; I need not pray, fast, &c. Why then has the Christian church from its very commencement constantly held that, notwithstanding all that our Saviour has done for us, sinners should make some atonement for their transgressions, which might serve as a laborious cleansing of their souls, a proof of their conversion, and an antidote against relapse? Why has there been established during the whole course of the Church such a multitude of penitential regulations to be observed by repentant sinners? Usher was well acquainted with them, but must have looked up to them as useless, nay unjust. For, in fact, his principle was the monstrous tenet of imputed righteousness, that bane of true Christianity and morality, a doctrine which excludes the necessity of any penitential sufferings or mortification on the part of man, as it does also the existence of a state of purgation after death. For, to quote a passage from a tract, which I wrote some years ago, (Introduction, by Irenaeus, to the Protestant Apology for the Roman Catholic Church) “ if a person be reputed just “ only by outward imputation, there can be no gradation of sanc“ tity; whatever may be the habits of different persons, their “ justification must be the same, because no sentiments or deeds

“ of their own are at all looked to or required in the work of “ righteousness, as being not inherent in their souls, but simply “ an external remission of sin. Thus Christians of every sort are “ placed on one level, and they are either absolutely and uncon“ ditionally pardoned, or not pardoned at all. Accordingly after “ death they must proceed straight forward either to heaven or “ hell. If no process for cleansing the soul, by penitential suffer“ ings and actions indicating real repentance, be requisite upon “ earth, it is not to be supposed that it will take place in the “ other world.” Usher well understood the tendency of this doctrine towards the denial of any purgation of souls after death; for he says that it is upon the opposite doctrine, viz. that which requires penal works or sufferings from man, notwithstanding the sufferings of Christ, that the Romanists, as he calls them, do lay the frame of their purgatory.

He was obliged to acknowledge that the ancient Irish used to offer the sacrifice, i. e. celebrate Mass for departed souls; but he pretends that this was done only for such souls as were supposed to be in a state of bliss, and that it was a sacrifice of thanksgiving for their salvation rather than of propitiation for their sins. If such was the only object the Irish had in view, when offering the sacrifice for the dead, or commemorating them in their prayers, they differed from all other Christians in the world. For, as even Bingham (Origines, &c. B. xv. ch. 3.) admits, notwithstanding his evasions, even the souls of persons called sinners, that is, not great sinner but imperfect Christians, were prayed for both in public and private. Thus St. John Chrysostom, (Hom. 41. in I. Cor.) who is quoted by Bingham, speaking against immoderate sorrow for the death of sinners says; “ they are not so much to be lamented, as succoured with prayers, supplications, alms, and oblations. For these things were not designed in vain, neither is it without reason that we make mention of the deceased in the holy mysteries, interceding for them to the Lamb that is slain to take away the sins of the world; but that some consolation may hence arise to them. Neither is it in vain that he, who stands at the altar when the tremendous mysteries are celebrated, cries; We offer unto thee for all those that are asleep in Christ, and all that make commemorations for them. For if there were no commemorations made for them, these things would not be said.—Let us not therefore grow weary in giving them our assistance, and offering prayers for them. For the common propitiation of the whole world is now before us. Therefore we now pray for the whole world and name them with martyrs, with confessors, with priests; for we are all one body, though one member be more excellent than another, and we may obtain a general pardon for them by our prayers, by our alms, by the help of those that are named together with them.” Who, but a fool, could imagine that Chrysostom did not mean a sacrifice and prayers of propitiation? Or what is to be thought of the following plain words of St. Augustin (Enchirid. cap. 110)? “ When the sacrifices of the altar or alms are offered for all the deceased, who had been baptized, they are for the very good thanksgivings, and for those, who were not very bad, they are propitiations.” St. Cyprian distinguishes oblations and sacrifices of thanksgivings, as, ex. c. for the martyrs, from those of supplications and prayers for the less perfect departed souls. When Tertullian says (De Monogamia, cap. 10.) that “ every woman prays for the soul of her deceased husband, and meanwhile requests relief for him and a share in the first resurrection, and makes offerings for him on the anniversaries of his death,” who is the polemic bigoted or silly enough to tell us, that her prayers and offerings were of thanksgiving, not of propitiation? Were I arguing controversially, I could say a great deal more on these subjects; but I have stated this much merely to show, how Usher has misrepresented the practice and doctrine of the ancient Irish church.

The truth is that the Irish had, like all other Christians, sacrifices and prayers, both of thanksgiving and of propitiation. Some of the cases referred to by Usher were relative to thanksgiving, although not all of them, particularly that of Magnus, concerning whom he quotes these words addressed by him a little before his death to Tozzo bishop of Augsburg: "Do not weep, reverend prelate, because thou beholdest me labouring in so many storms of worldly troubles; because I believe in the mercy of God, that my soul shall rejoice in the freedom of immortality. Yet I beseech thee, that thou wilt not cease to help me a sinner and my soul with thy holy prayers." So far from this passage favouring Usher's thanksgiving system, it is evidently against it; for it is plain that Magnus alluded to prayers to be said for him after his death. Now the prayers, which he requested, were, as is clear from the import of the words, those of propitiation; and indeed it would be very odd were they not; for who would presume to call for a thanksgiving to be made for him after his death, as if he were absolutely certain of enjoying eternal happiness? As to what occurred after the death of Magnus, and the nature of the salutary sacrifices offered for him, it is not necessary to inquire; for, if Usher had produced fifty cases of sacrifices and prayers of thanksgiving, they would not exclude those also of propitiation. He allows, that prayers for the dead, and masses for the repose of departed souls, or, as he calls them, Requiem masses, used to be observed in those times; and yet he states in a confidential tone, that they had no necessary relation to the belief of Purgatory. How he quibbles, in his usual way on the name Purgatory? Had he said, that they had no relation to the school questions concerning where or how Purgatory is or is not constituted, the nature of its punishments, its duration, &c. or to the question between the Greeks and Latins as to purgatorial fire, nobody would quarrel with him; but his real intention was not merely to reject that name, but likewise what it was framed to signify, viz. a state, in which some souls are detained before they are allowed to enter the kingdom of heaven. How then could he have reconciled his admitting the practice of Requiem masses, that is, Masses, in which, as is clear from the prayers contained in them, the relief of the deceased was actually prayed for, with his opinion that no such relief was wanted? The Irish had such Masses from a very ancient period, and we find them spoken of in the Penitential of Cumean, (Cap. 14.) which was written most probably in the seventh century. (See to Not. 55 Chap. xv.) In it various days are marked for those Masses according as the deceased were monks or lay persons. They are also in a very ancient Missal, which Mabillon found at Bobio, and which he published in the first volume of his Musaeum Italicum. He calls it Sacramentarium Gallicanum, although he acknowledges that it differs in some respects from the old Gallican Missal as it does in many, from the Roman, Ambrosian, &c. He thought that it was used in the province, of which Besançon was the capital, and in which was situated St. Columbanus' monastery of Luxeu. There can scarcely be a doubt of its having been written by an Irishman, as Dr. O'Connor shows (Ep. Nuncupator, &c. ad Rer. Hibern. Scriptor. p. cxxx. seqq.) from the orthography and the form of the letters being exactly the same as what we find in old MSS. which are well known to be Irish. He thinks it was a portable Missal for the Irish of Luxeu and Bobbio. Be this as it may, we may be sure from its having been copied by an Irishman, that it was used by Irish priests. Mabillon pronounced it to be a thousand years old before his time; and it appears very probable that it was written before the death of St. Columbanus, whose name does not occur in it, as in all appearance it would had he been then dead. We find in it various prayers containing supplications to God for the pardon of the deceased, for the remission of their sins and debts, indulgence towards them, &c. Thus in a Mass for the dead, entitled "Pro defunctis," these words occur in the prayer, called Contestatio; "Tribuos ei (famulo tuo defuncto) Domine delictorum suorum veniam in illo secreto receptacolo, ubi jam non est locus poenitentiae---Tu autem Christe recipe animam famoli tui il. quam dedisti, et demitte ejus debita magis quam ille demisit debitoribus suis." And in a Mass for both the living and dead, Pro vivis et defunctis, we read in the first prayer; "Concede propitius, ut haec sacra oblatio mortuis prosit ad veniam, et vivis proficiat ad salutem. And in the Contestatio the priest asks, both for the dead and living, "remissionem peccatorum, indulgentiam quam semper optaverunt," &c. But of this Missal see more below.

Chap. xxxii. §. 10. Among the canons of the Synod, called of St. Patrick, the 12th (see Ware's Opusc. S. P. p. 34.) is entitled Of the oblation for the dead, and is thus expressed: "Hear the Apostle saying, there is a sin unto death, I do not say that for it any one do pray. And the Lord; Do not give the holy to dogs. For he, who will not deserve to receive the sacrifice during his life, how can it help him after his death?" This canon most clearly shows, that the sacrifice used to be offered as propitiatory towards the relief of the deceased, and of all such as were supposed, while alive, to be worthy of being admitted to the holy communion. It was celebrated for the purpose of helping them; but, according to the universal practice of the Church, it was not offered for those, whom it could not help, that is, impenitent sinners, who were unworthy of receiving it during their lifetime. Usher, well knowing that this canon was directly contrary to his system of the sacrifice not being offered for the dead, except by way of thanksgiving, took care not to quote it. He understood these matters better than poor Harris, who (Bishops, p. 26.) thought that it furnished an additional proof to those of Usher against prayers for the dead. It certainly furnishes a proof against praying for the damned, while at the same time it supplies us with an incontrovertible one to show, that the Irish used to offer the sacrifice and pray for such deceased persons as were not supposed to be in hell. We read in the very ancient Life of St. Ita, who lived in the sixth century, that she prayed during a considerable time for the soul of her uncle, who was suffering in the lower regions, while his sons were giving alms towards the same object. (See Chap. xi. §. 2.) Would Usher say, that these prayers and alms were by way of thanksgiving? When St. Pulcherius, as is stated in his also ancient Life, and who died in the seventh century, used to pray for the repose of the soul of Ronan chieftain of Ele, and recommend it to the prayers of the people, although, by the bye, he was not distinguished as a holy man, (see Chap. xvii. §. 5. and the Life of Pulcherius, cap. 18.) will it be said that these were prayers of thanksgiving? I might appeal also to a Life of St. Brendan, in which, as Usher himself quotes, alluding to the relief of deceased persons from torments, it is stated that the prayer of the living doth profit much the dead. As to said Life containing some fables, that is not the question; and the only inquiry should be, what was, whether amidst fabulous narratives or not, the belief and practice of the ancient Irish with regard to offering the sacrifice and praying for deceased persons. Now, what entirely overturns Usher's quibbles with regard to reducing all such prayers to thanksgivings, we have a canon of an Irish synod prior to the eighth century, in which the oblations for departed souls are expressly distinguished, according to the circumstances of the souls, into those of thanksgiving and into others for obtaining full remission for them, or for lightening their sufferings. This canon may be seen at full below Chap. xxxii. §. 12. and ib. Not. 103. Not wishing to enlarge more on this subject, I shall now leave the reader to judge for himself.

CHAP. XXII.

Succession of kings of Cashel—Deaths of bishops of different sees in Ireland—and of abbots of Hy—Ernulph and Buo, Irishmen, distinguish themselves by their zeal for religion in Iceland—Several religious houses devastated and plundered by the Danes—Cormac Mac Cuilinan king and bishop of Cashel—Cashel not an episcopal see before the time of this prelate—Flahertach abbot of Iniscathy—Cormac's chapel at Cashel—Succession of the bishops of Emly still kept up after Cashel had become a bishop's see—Several illustrious Irishmen in the Continent—Sealbhach secretary to Cormac Mac Cuilionan—Succession of Irish monarchs—Deaths of several bishops, abbots, and learned men in the 10th century—Devastations and plunders by the Danes in Ireland in that century—Conversion of the Danes of Dublin to Christianity—Foundation of the Abbey of St. Mary's, Dublin—Danes defeated in several engagements by the Irish—Deaths of more bishops, abbots, and learned men—Brian Boroimhe king of Munster—seizes on Mac-Giolla-Patrick—defeats the Danes in several battles—Hy plundered, and fifteen of the elders put to death by the Danes.

SECT. I.

COENFOELAD, bishop of Emly, and king of Cashel, who died in 872, (1) was succeeded by Rudgal Mac-Fingail, (2) whose death is assigned to 882, and next after whom was Concenmathair, who died in 887, and had for successor Eugene Mac-Cenfoelad, who is called prince of Emly and was killed in 889. (3) After him we must place Maelbrigid, the son of one Prolech, a holy man, to whom some have given the title of archbishop of Munster. His death is marked at A. D. 896. (4) He was succeeded by Miscel, who died in 898. (5) Cormac, bishop of Duleek, and abbot of Clonard, died in 883. (6) Largis, bishop of Kildare, was killed by the Danes in 886. (7) This was most probably the last year of Moelcoba Mac-Crunnvail, archbishop of Armagh, (8) whose immediate successor was, according to some of our annalists, Mocta; but there is much better reason to believe, that his next successor was Maelbrigid. (9) This prelate, who is reckoned among the Irish saints, was son of Tornan or Dornan of the royal house of Niall, and a descendant of Conal Gulbanus. He had been abbot, apparently of Derry, and abbot also of Raphoe, before he was raised to the see of Armagh. (10) A great riot and fight having occurred on Whitsunday in the year 890 (11) between the Kinel-Eogains, or Tyronians, and the Ulidians, or East Ulster men, in the cathedral of Armagh, Maelbrigid had influence enough to put a stop to it, and to induce both parties to make due compensation for the crime of having profaned the church. It is related of him, that on a certain occasion he went as far as Munster for the purpose of procuring the deliverance of a British stranger from prison. His reputation for piety was so great, that he was called the head of religion, that is, the most religious person, not only of all Ireland, but of the greater part of Europe. He held the see until his death, which occurred on the 22d of February in, according to one account, 926, and, according to another 927. (12) Thus his incumbency must have lasted about 40 years. (13) Alild, a scribe, abbot, and bishop of Clogher, died in 898, (14) as did in the very last year of the century Dungal Mac-Baithen, abbot and bishop of Glendaloch. (15)

(1) See Chap. xxi. §. 13.

(2) I strongly suspect that Rudgal Mac-Fingail was either a converted Northman or the son of one. Fingail, or White foreigners was the well known appellative of a certain description of them, and is still retained in a tract of country possessed by them near Dublin. And the name Rudgal is much more Northmannic than it is Irish. Although the bulk of the Northmen settled in Ireland were still pagans, yet we may rationally suppose, that some of them became Christians, were they no others than the sons of such as had been taken in battle, many of whom were most probably about Emly and Cashel after the victories of Olchobar. Rudgal is the first person bearing a Northmannic name, whom I have met with as a Christian in our history.

(3) Ware, Bishops at Emly.

(4) 4 Masters ap. AA. SS. p. 387, at A. 895 (896). Ware has not Maelbrigid among the bishops of Emly, but Harris has added him to his list. The 4 Masters do not place him at Emly, but by styling him archbishop of Munster they must have meant that see, as in those times no other Munster prelates were, even by courtesy, ever honoured with that title except those of Emly.

(5) Ware at Emly.

(6) 4 Masters ap. AA. SS. p. 360 at A. 882 (883.) Harris has this bishop at Meath, p. 139.

(7) Tr. Th. p. 629. at A. 885 (886.) The Annals of Innisfallen assign his death to A. 888.

(8) See Chap. xxi. §. 13.

(9) Ware observes, (Bishops at Armagh) that some Irish analysts have the following succession after Moelcoba; 1. Mocta, who died in 889; 2. Moelathgen, who died in 890; 3. Kellach Mac-Saorgus, who died in 898, or, as others say, in 903; 4. Moel-Kiaran Mac-Eogain, who died in 914 or 915. He adds, that these are not reckoned by others among the archbishops of Armagh, and that they were considered only as suffragans of Maelbrigid. The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 296.) have Mocta, whom they call bishop, anchorit, and scribe of Armagh. Colgan leaves the matter undecided; but O'Flaherty in a MS. note (ib.) asserts, that Mocta was not a bishop. This Mocta was, in all appearance, the person who was taken by the Danes together with Moelcoba Mac-Crumvail. (See Chap. xx1. §. 13. They have also Moelathgen as bishop of Armagh, and assign his death to 890 (891). Yet they had just before spoken of Maelbrigid as bishop and comorban of St. Patrick in 889 (890) and hence Colgan concludes that Moelathgen was only a suffragan or coadjutor of his. O'Flaherty (MS. note) holds that Moelathgen was a real bishop of Armagh, and that he was the immediate predecessor of Maelbrigid, placing his death in 891. The 4 Masters next have Kellach Mac-Saorgus, but not Moel-Kiaran, and afterwards treat of Maelbrigid. Amidst this confusion the best rule to follow is the catalogue from the Psalter of Cashel, which places Maelbrigid immediately after Maelcoba. Colgan himself prefers its authority to that of the annalists, particularly where he treats of Maelbrigid or St. Maelbrigid, AA. SS. ad 22 Februar.

(10) The 4 Masters call Maelbrigid comorban, (i. e. successor) of saints Patrick, Columba, and Adamnan. As to his being a successor of Columba, Colgan, at his Acts, refers it to Derry, and, I think, with good reason. For it cannot be supposed that he was at any time abbot of Hy. We have seen (Chap. xx1. §. 14.) that the successor of Kellach at Hy was Feradach, who lived until 880, after whom the Annals of Ulster, which are very particular as to the succession at Hy, make mention of Flan Mac-Maoledrin, who was abbot there until 891. Now in this year Maelbrigid was already archbishop of Armagh, and being in that rank could not be invested with the government of Hy, which was always reserved to a priest. Nor do the said annals exhibit Maelbrigid as having been there, notwithstanding their also making him a comorban of Columba. It may be said that Maelbrigid, although he had not been abbot of Hy, was a successor of Columba, not at Derry but at Durrow, (King's county) the other chief monastery of that saint in Ireland. Yet considering that Maelbridgid was also at Raphoe, it is much more probable, considering its being not far from Derry, that this was the place, of which he had been abbot. It is odd that Colgan, in his account of the abbots and other distinguished persons of Hy, reckons (Tr. Th. p. 509.) Maelbridgid among them, notwithstanding what he says of him in his Acts. He does not indeed call him abbot of Hy; but he should not have placed him there at all. Yet he has been followed by Smith, Append. to Life of St. C. p. 167. Maelbridgid's being called successor also of Adamnan is relative to his having been abbot of Raphoe, of whose monastery Adamnan had been the founder and was the patron saint. Harris had no right to make him bishop of Raphoe (Bishops at Armagh, p. 46. and at Raphoe p. 270) on the supposition that its monastery had been already raised to an episcopal see by St. Eunan. For this he had no authority whatsoever; nor does any one know at what time St. Eunan lived. (Compare with Not. 59. to Chap. xviii.)

(11) Four Master ap. Tr. Th. p. 290. at A. 889 (890). O'Flaherty (MS. note ib.) assigns it to 892. I suspect that his only reason for this date was, that the placing of the riot in 890 would not agree with his hypothesis of making Moelathgen archbishop of Armagh predecessor of Maelbridgid. (See Not. 9.)

(12) The 4 Masters (ib.) have 925 (926); and the Ulster Annals (ap. Ware at Armagh) 926 (927).

(13) Colgan, (Acts 22 Febr.) gives him exactly 40 years, which he reckoned from 885 (886) to 925 (926). But in the Cashel catalogue for his administration we find marked only 29 years. Harris (Bishops at Maelbridgid) conjectures, that there is an erratum in the xxix of said catalogue, and that, instead of 1, we should read x, thus making the whole xxx. This is certainly a probable correction.

(14) Ware (at Clogher) from the annals of Ulster. Yet Colgan AA. SS. p. 742.) places, as if from the 4 Masters, Alild's death at 867 (868). There seems to be some mistake in his printed text; for after Alild we find the death of one Moran, abbot of Clogher, affixed to A. 841 (842).

(15) Four Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 257.) at A. 899 (900); and Harris (Bishops at Glendaloch).

§. II. The abbot of Hy Feradach, son of Cormac, who, as we have seen, (16) died in 880, was succeeded by Flan Mac-Maol-edrin, who died in 891. (17) He was a descendant of Conal Gulbanus, the ancestor of St. Columba; and his memory was revered on the 24th of April. (18) After Flan I find mentioned not as abbot, but as coadjutor of the abbot of Hy, Aengus, son of Murchertach, who is styled a choice anchorite, and who died in 936; after whom occurs in the list Caincomrach, who is expressly called abbot of Hy, and whose death is assigned to 946. (19)

In, as it is said, the latter end of the ninth century, that is, after 874, when the Norwegians were in possession of Iceland, (20) two Irishmen, Ernulph and Buo, distinguished themselves in that island by their zeal for religion. (21) It is not known whether they were clergymen or not, and it is probable that they had been taken to Iceland as captives by some Norwegian pirates. All that I find stated concerning them is as follows: " Helgo, surnamed " Biola, a descendant of Norwegian barons, who " dwelt in the province of Kialarn, was not favour- " able to the pagan religion; for he received into " his neighbourhood an Irish christian an exile, " named Ernulph, together with his families, and " not only received him but allowed him to erect a " church under the name of St. Columbus (Colum- " ba) in the village of Esiuberg. Buo, a young man " also of the same province, burned a famous fane " of human victims and all its gods." (22)

Three Irishmen, or Scots of Ireland, are particularly noticed by various English annalists as having set out from Ireland in 891 or 892 in a leathern boat without a sail or any equipment, taking with them a week's provision, and as providentially arriving, after seven days, in Cornwall, whence they proceeded to pay a visit to king Alfred, by whom they were most graciously received. Their names were Dufflan, Macheathath and Magilmunen, who is represented as a man of extraordinary merit, and a celebrated master of the Scots or Irish. (23) Afterwards they went to Rome, intending to proceed thence to Jerusalem. One of them died during their excursions, and some miracles are mentioned as having been wrought in consequence of his death. (24)

(16) Chap. xxi. §. 14.

(17) Annals of Ulster in Johnstone's Extracts. The 4 Masters, who call him son of Malduin, assign (ap. Tr. Th. p. 500) his death to A. 887 (888).

(18) Tr. Th. p. 481.

(19) Ib. p. 500. I have added a year to the dates. Could Caincomrach have been the immediate successor of Flan? If so, he must have governed Hy for 55 years from 891 to 946. Or was there between them an abbot, whose name has not reached us, and for whom Aengus acted as coadjutor? Smith (App. to Life of St. C. p. 167.) makes mention of Dubhard, comorban of Columbkil and Adamnan, who died in 937. But his being called comorban of Columbkil, does not prove, that he was abbot of Hy, no more than it does that of Maolbrigid, archbishop of Armagh, had been such; and we meet with, at a later period, a Muredach, likewise called comorban of Columbkil, and Adamnan, who was certainly not abbot of Hy. By that title was meant, I believe, one who was abbot both of Derry and Raphoe. In the Annals of Ulster the real abbots of Hy are always named as such. The 4 Masters have not Dubhard among them.

(20) See Not. 32 to Chap. xx.

(21) Colgan treats of Ernulph at the 2d, and of Buo at the 5th of February. His reason for treating of the former at the 2d was not, that he knew on what day he died, or whether his name was in any calendar or not, but because a St. Erlulph, martyr, bishop of Verdun, whom he thought a native of Ireland, is marked in a German calendar at that day. Accordingly, on account of the similarity of the name, he has Ernulph, as well as Erlulph at 2d Febr. As to Erlulph having been an Irishman, there is no sufficient proof, although Crantz says that he was either a Scot or an Englishman. He was killed by the Northmen at Ebbeckstorp, not far from Hamburgh, in, it is said, the year 856. The accounts given of him are rather obscure, and unsupported by ancient documents. (See the Bollandists at 2 February.) With regard to Ernulph, were we to judge from the name, it might seem that he was not an Irishman; but he is expressly so called, and probably his real name was Ernuf or Ernubh, which, conformably to a Northern termination, was changed into Ernulph in the same manner as Mailduf, or Maildubh, was changed into Maildulph. (See Not. 62 to Chap. xviii.) Why Buo should be marked at 5 February or styled a saint, Colgan gives us no other authority than that of Camerarius on a Scotch martyrology and of Dempster.

(22) Acts of Ernulph and Buo from Arngrim Jonas. Although Colgan, with others makes Buo an Irishman, yet Arngrim's words, also of the same province, may be conjectured to refer not to Ireland but to the Icelandic province of Kialarn. But the stress intimated by also, quoque, leads us to think, that the author's meaning was to point out Buo as a countryman of Ernulph. It is going rather too far to call Ernulph and Buo the Apostles of Iceland. The little that is known of them does not authorize us to give them that title, which was bestowed on them by the above-mentioned Scotch writers, who, in spite of Arngrim, pretended that they were Scotchmen. We have seen (Chap. xx. §. 4.) that there were Christians and Irish missionaries in Iceland a long time before either of them was born. And as to the re-establishment of Christianity in Iceland after its occupation by the Norwegians, Ara states, (Schedae, &c. ch. 7.) that it was introduced during the reign of Olaus Tryggvon, king of Norway, a great grandson of Harold Harfagre, by persons, among whom he makes no mention either of Ernulph or of Buo. Olaus was killed in battle A. D. 1000. Whether Colgan and those whom he followed were right in making the times of Ernulph, Buo, and Helgo Biola as early as about 890 it is not worth while to inquire. The Bollandists (at 2 Febr.) omit Ernulph, and observe (ib. p. 267.) that some more certain information, relative to him, was requisite than that supplied by Dempster and Colgan. And (at 5 Febr. p. 593.) speaking of Buo, whom also they omit, they say that there is as little clear or authentic known concerning him as there is about Ernulph. Dempster, with his usual imposture, makes Buo author of Homiliae ad Islandos. (See Harris. Writers at Buo.)

(23) It is thus they are mentioned by Fabius Ethelwerd, (Chron. ad A. 891, or 892) who says of Magilmunen that he was "artibus frondens, littera doctus, magister insignis Scottorum." Florence of Worcester (at A. 892.) calls them Dusblan, Mahbeth, and Mulmulin. He says that they left Ireland for the purpose of leading a life of pilgrimage. Perhaps they were obliged to fly by the Northmen; and hence we may account for their going in a sorry boat without proper equipment. Matthew of Westminster assigns their departure to A. 891. Ethelwerd speaking, in his bad Latin, of their visit to Alfred, says; "Aelfredum adeunt regem, in quorum advectionum cum rege pariter sinelitus ovat." Ledwich, whose hatred of the old Irish has made him advance so much nonsense, pretends (Antiq. p. 180.) that the names of these three Irishmen intimate a Danish or Norwegian extraction. Now, if there ever were true Irish names, surely theirs were such. Can any name be more Irish than Dufflan, Black Flan? Or does the Mac of the other names, or heathath, &c. indicate a Danish origin? Did the Doctor ever look into a Danish dictionary?

(24) I have endeavoured to pick out what is said of this death from the barbarous style of Ethelward; but I am not sure of having hit upon his real meaning.

§. III. The troubles caused by the Northmen still continued. In 884 they plundered Kildare, and carried off to their ships the prior Suibhne, son of Duibhdabhaireann, besides 280 other persons. (25) In 887 they laid waste and pillaged Ardraccan in Meath; (26) and in the following year, as some say, or, as others, in 886 a great battle was fought between Flan, king of Ireland, and the Danes of Dublin, who, it is said, gained a bloody victory, while there fell on the part of the Irish, Aedh, son of Conor, king of Connaught, Largis, or Leargus, bishop of Kildare, and Donogh son of Maolduin, prince of Kill-Dealga. (27) Kildare was again devastated by the Danes in 888; and in the following year Clonard. (28) According to one account, the Danes of Dublin, proceeded in 891 to Armagh, and, having plundered the city and destroyed various sacred buildings, took with them 710 captives ; but another account assigns this transaction to A. D. 895. (29) It is added that it was pillaged again in 894 by Northmen, who came from Lough-foyle ; yet it is more probable, that this happened in 898. (30) In the year 896 the Northmen of Tirconnel suffered a dreadful defeat, in which two of their chiefs, Auliffe son of Ivar, and Gluntradna son of Gluniaran, besides 800 of their followers, were killed by the Irish commanded by Aiteid son of Laghan. (31) The power of these marauders was gradually diminishing, and would have declined still faster, were not the Irish quarreling among themselves. In 902 they were slaughtered by the people of Leinster, and the whole of them were driven out of Ireland. (32) Those of Dublin were expelled by the men of Bregh, headed by Maol-Finia (or Finnian) son of Flanagan, who had been killed in 896, (33) and by the inhabitants of Leinster commanded by Carrol. (34) It was, in all probability, after this exploit that Maol-Finnian became a monk and abbot of Inis-Patrick (Holmpatrick), where he died in great reputation of sanctity, A. D. 903, (35) on the 6th of February, at which day his name occurs in various calendars both Irish and foreign. (36)

(25) Four Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 629. at 883 (884).

(26) Ib. p. 663 and Ind. Chron. at A. 886 (887).

(27) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 888. They are followed by Ware, (Antiq. cap 24). The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 629) assign this battle to 885 (886). Largis has been mentioned above §. 1.

(28) Four Masters (ib.) A. 887 (888). and in AA. SS. p. 407. at A. 888 (889).

(29) The 4 Masters (ib. p. 296.) have A. 890 (891) while the Annals of Ulster have A. 894 (895), and are followed by Ware, (loc. cit.) who, however, tells us elsewhere (Bishops of Armagh at Maelbrigid) that Armagh was plundered by the Danes in 890. But he took this from what he found in Colgan from the 4 Masters, to whose date I should prefer those of the Ulster Annals. As to the 710 captives, who, according to the 4 Masters, were taken at Armagh, the Annals of Ulster do not mention this circumstance, but state that in the year 895 (896) Gluniarn, a Northman chief, gained a victory, but where we are not told, in which he made 710 prisoners.

(30) The 4 Masters, ib. have A. 893 (894). Neither in the Annals of Ulster, nor in Ware, (Antiq.) is this devastation mentioned, although (at Bishops loc. cit.) following Colgan as before, he says that the Danes plundered Armagh also in 893. That some Northmen, who came from Lough-foyle, sacked Armagh cannot be denied; but, considering that this occurred after the plundering by the Dublin Danes, which, in all probability, was in 895, it must be placed later than marked by the 4 Masters; and, in fact, the Annals of Innisfallen assign it to A. 898.

(31) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 896. This victory is mentioned also in the Ulster Annals, which have at 895 (896); "The Gàls defeated by the men of Tirconnel under Mac-Laigur (for son of Laghan), who killed Auliffe son of Ivar." At said year these annals state, that Flanagan, king of Bregh (the country stretching from Dublin to Drogheda) was killed by the Northmen.

(32) Annals of Innisfallen A. 902, and of Ulster at A. 901 (902.)

(33) See Not. 31.

(34) Annals of Ulster, ib.

(35) Ib. at A. 902 (903).

(36) Colgan touching on him (AA. SS. at 6 Febr. p. 268.) calls him St. Finnian or Moelfinnian, who, from prince of Bregh became a monk, &c. The 4 Masters, whom he quotes, assign his death to 898 (899); but this cannot agree with his having fought against the Danes in 902. It is odd that the dates of the 4 Masters are usually earlier by some years than those of the annals both of Ulster and Innisfallen. To the many instances we have met with I may here add that for the death of Bressal, a lecturer of Armagh, which (ap. Tr. Th. p. 296.) they assign to A. 894 (895); whereas, according to the Ulster Annals (ap. Usher, Pr. p. 861.) he died in 898 (899).

§. iv. By far the most celebrated man of these times in Ireland was Cormac Mac-Culinan, who was not only bishop of Cashel, but likewise king there, that is, of all Munster, of which that city was the capital. He was not the first who united the scepter of that province with the episcopacy; for, as we have seen, Olchobar and Coenfoelad, bishops of Emly, had been also kings of Cashel or of Munster. Little is known concerning the earlier part of Cormac's life. I find that he was born in 837; (37) and it is allowed on all hands, that he was of the Eugenic branch of the royal house of Munster. That he was educated for the ecclesiastical state is evident from his having been possessed of great learning, for the acquisition of which he must have spent a great part of his time amidst the tranquillity of college or religious establishments. It is said that he had been instructed by Snegdus a learned and pious abbot of Castledermot; (38) and it is certain that he was a bishop before he became a king. But how or where he was raised to the mitre it is not easy to understand. Before his time Cashel was not an episcopal see, having been, notwithstanding some idle conjectures to the contrary, still comprized in the diocese of Emly. How then did Cormac become bishop of Cashel? The see of Emly continued to exist, as usual, and had its bishops, distinct from those of Cashel, in his time and for centuries later. There was no quarrel or schism between Emly and Cashel, and Cormac, while bishop and king, was on the best terms with the bishop of Emly. I think it probable, that he was bishop of Lismore before he removed to Cashel. For a Cormac, son of Culinan, is stated to have been bishop there in those times; and I do not find any sufficient reason for supposing, that we are to admit two bishops Cormac, both sons of Culinans, and contemporaries, one at Cashel and the other at Lismore. (39) It may be, however, that he was originally made bishop at Cashel on account of his extraordinary merit, according to the Irish system of raising distinguished persons to the episcopal rank in places, where previously there had been no bishops. Then, in consequence of the great respect in which his memory was held, Cashel probably became a permanent and regular see; and there is good reason to think that, as the capital of Munster, its following bishops gradually acquired, even before it became a really metropolitanical see, the ascendancy which had been formerly enjoyed by the church of Emly.

(37) Annals of Innisfallen, at A. 837.

(38) See O'Connor's Dissertations, sect. 17. and the 4 Masters at A. 885, and below Not. 56.

(39) Colgan (AA. SS. p. 360.) has, from the 4 Masters, as different persons Cormac Mac-Culinan king and bishop of Cashel, whose death they assign to 903 (904), and Cormac Mac-Culinan, bishop of Lismore, whom they call prince of the Desies, and who, they say, died in 918 (919) If these dates were correct, it would follow that there were two distinct Cormacs Mac-Culinan. But, at least, the former one is not; for the Cormac of Cashel died in 908; and as to 918 for the one of Lismore it is perhaps a mistake for 908. The 4 Masters, when searching in old annals and documents, might have found Cormac Mc. Culinan called in some bishop of Lismore, and in others of Cashel, and thence supposed that they were different. Their calling Cormac of Lismore prince of the Desies does not furnish an argument against his having been the same as Cormac of Cashel; whereas, in consequence of being bishop of that great see, situated in the Desies country, he might while there have got that title, in the same manner as some bishops of Emly, ex. c. Eugene Mac-Cenfoelad, (see above §. 1.) were styled princes of Emly. I suspect that the epithet Theasalescop, which has been applied to Cormac (Not. prec.) before he became king of Cashel, alludes to a see more southerly than Cashel, such as Lismore is. Perhaps it was usual to distinguish Lismore by calling it the southern place or establishment much in the same way as Alcuin spoke of it in his letter to Colcu. (See Not. 45. to Chap. xx.)

§. v. The greatest part of what is known concerning the transactions of Cormac is relative more to the civil than to the ecclesiastical history of Ireland. The occasion of his being raised to the throne was, that Kinngegan, who had got possession of it in 895 (40) was dethroned in 901, and Cormac was called to it by his opponents. (41) Yet some time elapsed before he was peaceably seated on it; and it is stated, that Fionngaine, who is called son of Gorman king of Cashel, was killed in 902 during the contest by his own people. (42) It was in 903 that Cormac became king without opposition. (43) While he was governing his kingdom in peace, Flann, surnamed Sionna, king of all Ireland, and Cearbhal, son of Muregan, king of Leinster, marched with an army towards Munster, and laid waste the whole country between Gowran and Limerick. (44) But in the following year Cormac, accompanied by Flathertach Mac-Ionmunain abbot of Inniscatthy, a man of a very military disposition, set out with the forces of Munster, and, arriving in the plains of Magh-leana in the now King's county, gave battle to Flann and his confederates of Leath-Cuinn (the northern half of Ireland) and defeated them with great loss, particularly of the Nialls, among whom Maolchraobha son of Cathalan king of Kinel-Eogain (Tyrone) was killed. Flann being forced to submit and give hostages to Cormac, the Munster army advanced to Maighe-na-Ceurradh (apparently the Kierrigia of Roscommon) and there compelled the Conacians and some of the Nialls to give hostages, after which they plundered the islands of Lough-ree and a fleet that lay there; and then Leath-cuinn became tributary to an ecclesiastic. (45) Flann and his adherents did not long submit to this degradation, but, together with Cearbhal of Leinster, the princes of Leath-cuinn, Cathal son of Conor king of Connaught, &c. raised a great army, which was met, in 908, at Beallach Mughna (Ballymoon in Idrone, county of Carlow) by Cormac at the head of the forces of Munster and Ossory under their various chiefs and many of their principal nobility. A desperate battle then took place, in which Cormac was killed by one Fiacha, and along with him several other princes and nobles, besides about 6000 of their followers. (46) This battle is said to have been fought on the 16th of August; (47) and some writers place the scene of it at Moy-albe or the White field. This, however, does not imply any difference of situation; for Moy-albe was near Beallach-Mughna, being in the vicinity of Old Leighlin. (48) It has been foolishly said, that Cormac was killed not in this battle but by the Danes, a story quite in opposition to the most respectable authorities and to the then state of Ireland. (49) Others tell us, that his death was occasioned by a fall from his horse during the heat of the battle; and, according to another account, he did not engage in the battle at all, but was praying apart for the success of his army, when a herdsman coming up put him to death (50)

(40) Annals of Innisfallen, as ap. Harris.

(41) Ib. at A. 891 (Mr. O'Reilly's copy).

(42) Ib. ad. A. 902. Colgan says, (Tr. Th. p. 186.) that Fionngaine was son of Kinngeagan; but how will this agree with his being called in the Innisfallen annals son of Gorman? O'Flaherty (MS. not. ib.) asserts that Fionngaine was the same as Kinngeagan. If so, it is odd that in the course of two or three lines the same persons should be called in those annals first Kinngeagan and next Fionngaine. I do not presume to judge on a matter of this kind, which I have touched upon merely to show, that there was a contest for the throne of Cashel after the nomination of Cormac.

(43) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 903. The 4 Masters have earlier dates for these transactions; but their authority is not equal, particularly with regard to the affairs of Munster.

(44) Ib. ad A. 906.

(45) Ib. ad A. 907.

(46) Ib. ad A. 908. I cannot guess what reason Dr. Milner had (Tour in Ireland, Letter 14.) for suspecting, in direct opposition to our Annals, that Cormac lived at a much later period.

(47) Ware, Antiq. cap. 21. and Archbishops of Cashel, at Cormac.

(48) See Not. 36. to Chap. xv.

(49) The fable of Cormac having been killed by the Danes is not to be found in any Irish annals or document that I know of. It is in the chronicle of Caradoc of Lhancarvan, who calls Cormac "Carmot, the son of Cukeman, king and bishop of Ireland." The mighty antiquary Ledwich (Antiq. &c. p. 148.) follows Caradoc; for, in fact, he prefers every authority to that of Irish history, which indeed is not to be wondered at, as he knows so little about it. Speaking of Cormac, he says that "Irish romantic history tells us that he was descended from Olioll Olum king of Munster of the Eugenic race, &c." The reader will please to observe, that he calls the Irish history of even the tenth century romantic. Then to show his learning he says that Olioll Olum was of the Eugenic race. Pray how could that be? For Eugenius, from whom that race was denominated, and from whom the Mac Carthys, &c. descend, was a son of Olioll Olum, who was the ancestor also of the Dalcassian princes, to whom the O'Briens, &c. belonged. If the Doctor had looked only into Keating's pedigrees, he would not have insulted the public with such blunders. Our antiquary adds; "I rely more on the testimony of Caradoc of Lhancarvan for his (Cormac's) existence than the plausible fictions of national writers; and I think what this Welsh chronicler relates of his being slain by the Danes most likely; for at this time they were ravaging every part of the kingdom." The insolence of this ignorant man is really intolerable. To represent what our annalists, historians, and the constant tradition of all Ireland have concerning the existence of Cormac as plausible fictions shows such a perverse carelessness of truth with regard to Irish history, that the proposer of such nonsense is not worth arguing against. What object could our national writers have had in inventing an account of Cormac's existence? But see what this sage critic relies on for it. The testimony of Caradoc! a testimony which would be unintelligible had not Cormac really existed. For who otherwise could discover, who was Carmot son of Cukeman, &c.? As to his following Caradoc on Cormac's having been killed by the Danes, it would have been more to the honour of Ireland and of its clergy had such been the case; nor would our annalists have attributed the death of a king and bishop, so highly esteemed, to his own countrymen, or have so particularly mentioned their names, if they had not been the authors of it. But the fact is, that Cormac could not have been killed at that time by the Danes; for, although neither Caradoc nor his humble follower the Doctor knew it, there were no Danes then in Ireland, against whom Cormac could have fought. For, as we have seen (above §. 3.) they had been driven out in 902, and, although they returned afterwards, yet they did not come back, at least in any considerable force, until some years later than 908, the year in which Cormac was killed.

(50) For these various statements see Keating B. 2. where he treats largely of Cormac, and Ware and Harris, Archbishops of Cashel, at Cormac.

§. VI. Cormac was accompanied in this unfortunate expedition by several ecclesiastics, some of whom actually fought in the battle. Among the slain are reckoned Olioll Mac-Eogan, abbot of Cork, and Colman, abbot of Kinnity. (51) The chief fomenter of it and encourager of Cormac to meet the enemy out of his own country, in opposition to his wish to compromise matters, as he loved peace and is said to have had a foreknowledge of his death in case of an engagement taking place, is stated to have been the furious Flathertach abbot of Inniscathy, who was one of the principal commanders in the battle. (52) This martial spirit, which unluckily insinuated itself among the Irish clergy, and which was so contrary to the feelings and principles of their predecessors, (53) originated in the contests against the pagan Northmen, in which they were much involved, and some of them almost forced to take up arms to defend themselves and their establishments against those barbarous and savage invaders. But, whatever apology may be made for the churchmen who fought against them, or for Cormac who, as a king, was bound to protect his subjects, whosoever the enemies might be, none can be found for such conduct as that of Flathertach, if what is said of him be true. Tiobruide, bishop of Emly, and who is called the religious successor of Ailbe, also accompanied Cormac; (54) but whether he mixed in the battle or not I do not find recorded. Previous to the engagement Cormac made his confession to Comhgall his confessor, and made his will, in which he bequeathed various sacred ornaments and utensils, besides gold and silver, to divers churches and religious places, such as of Cashel, Lismore, Emly, Armagh, Kildare, Glendaloch, &c. (55) It is said that his body was brought to Cashel and interred there; but, according to another account, it has been supposed that he was buried at Castle-dermot. (56) His reputation for piety, wisdom, and learning was so great, that he has been considered as the most eminent man of his times in Ireland. (57) He wrote the celebrated work, entitled, the Psalter of Cashel, (58) in which he treated of the history and antiquities of Ireland. It has been considered as of the highest authority, and was still extant entire in the 17th century, and is probably so somewhere at present, although I know only of some parts of it, which are to be found. (59) To him is usually attributed the Irish glossary or Etymological dictionary, called Sanasan Cormac; (60) and he is said to have written a book on the genealogies of the Irish saints. (61) The beautiful small church, now called Cormac's Chapel, on the rock of Cashel, and perhaps the oldest ecclesiastical building of stone now remaining in Ireland, is universally allowed to have been erected by this king and bishop. (62) This church could not at any time have been the cathedral of Cashel, as some writers have supposed; for it was quite too small for that purpose; and I can scarcely doubt that it was merely a royal church or chapel annexed to the king's palace or castle, which was situated on the summit of the rock. (63)

(51) For Olioll see Annals of Innisfallen at A. 908, and for Colman, Keating. Kinnity is in that part of the King's county, which formerly belonged to Munster.

(52) Keating, ib. (53) See Chap. xx. §. 9.

(54) Keating, ib. (55) Keating, ib.

(56) According to Ware (loc. cit.) he was buried at Cashel; but Keating (ib.) asserts that he ordered to have his remains deposited in Cloyne, where St. Colman son of Lenir had been buried, or if that could not be done, in Disert Dermot (Castledermot), where he had resided for some years in his youth, and received his education, viz. I suppose, under the abbot Snegdus. But I do not find that Keating makes him be actually interred at Castledermot.

(57) In the Annals of Innisfallen (at A. 908.) Cormac is styled the most learned in knowledge and science, and the most holy and pious in his time in Ireland. The 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 366,) call him king, bishop, anchoret a wise man, and writer.

(58) It is usually supposed that this work was called Psalter on account of its having been written in verse, in the same manner as there was the Psalter of Tara, and as to one or two works of Aengus Cele-de was given the name of Psalter-na-rann. (See Chap. xx. §. 10.) But my deceased worthy friend General Valancey informed me that this was a mistake, as the original title of the work was Saltair, which, he said, signifies chronicle; and so he has stated in his Prospectus of a dictionary of the ancient Irish at Taireac. Yet Saltair signifies also Psalter, and the Psalter or Saltair-na-rann was not a chronicle.

(59) Ware makes mention of it (Antiq. cap. 21. and Arch-bishops of Cashel at Cormac) as extant in his time and in great esteem. He says that he had some collections out of it. Keating had a copy of it, which he often quotes, and speaks of it more than once in his Preface as a work to be seen in his days. Colgan also touches on it (AA. SS. p. 5.) as actually existing; and Lhuyd (Archaeologia, catalogue of Irish MSS.) Nicholson (Irish Histor. Library, ch. 2) and Dr. O'Connor (Ep. Nuncup. &c. p. 65.) tells us, that there is a part of it in an old MS. of the Bodleian library at Oxford. Some writers pretend that Cormac was not the author of it, and that it was compiled after his times. In fact, there are some circumstances mentioned as taken from it, which belong to a later period; for instance, the latter part of the catalogues of the archbishops of Armagh (ap. Tr. Th. p. 292.) which comes down to the latter end of the eleventh century. But this proves nothing more than that some additions have been made to the original work of Cormac, as has been the case with regard to numbers of historical works, particularly those written in the middle ages. The mighty Ledwich, not content with denying (Antiq. &c. p. 154.) that Cormac was the author of it, makes some puny efforts to undermine the author's veracity. In his great reading he found, that Stillingfleet (Antiq. of the British churches, ch. 5.) quoted and remarked on some silly old stories related by Peter Walsh (Prospect of Ireland) from the Psalter of Cashel. Walsh had copied them from Keating, to whom he refers; but Stillingfleet either had not Keating's work, or could not understand it, as it was then only in Irish. Is it, however, because such stories were found in the Psalter, to be concluded that the author was neglectful of truth, as the Doctor, distorting Stillingfleet's meaning, insinuates? Who will say that Keating himself was a liar, because he has given many foolish things, which he did not wish the reader to believe, from certain old documents? Or will the Doctor question the veracity of Usher, in whose Primordia we meet with heaps of fables? In like manner why bring such a charge against the author of the Psalter for having copied matters not worthy of belief? Surely no historian was ever judged in this manner, unless he professed to make us consider as true every thing inserted in his work. As for a real want of veracity, the reader will find an instance in the Doctor's said page, where he says that Stillingfleet affirms the Psalter of Cashel to be a collection of poetical fictions, and that it was compiled in the 13th century. Now Stillingfleet has not affirmed nor even hinted at such things, nor has he denied that Cormac was the author of the Psalter.

(60) See Harris, Writers at Cormac Mac Culinan. Dr. Led-wich has (loc. cit.) some grumbling also about this Glossary. He could not deny that such a work exists; for General Vallancey had a copy of it, which he often quotes under the name of Cormac Mac Culinan, and Lhuyd had one, which he copied from an old Irish MS. O'Brien makes mention of it in his Dictionary at Bealtinne, where he calls it simply an old glossary copied by Mr. Lhuyd. I believe there are at present many copies of it to be found. Mr. O'Reilly has one. (See the Prospectus to his Dictionary of the Irish language.) The Doctor says; "Supposing the glossary genuine, would it now, be intelligible?" Strange that a man, who set up as an Irish antiquary, should ask such a question, as if the Irish of the 9th or 10th century could not be understood by our Irish scholars at present. Surely, although the Doctor could not understand it, he must have known that those, who are really versed in the language, find scarcely any difficulty in translating Irish documents still more ancient than the ninth century, as may be seen in Colgan's works, &c. But I am going out of my way, and shall only add, that I wish some genuine Irish scholar and antiquary would give the Doctor a bit of good advice as to his meddling with matters, which he knows nothing about.

‡ (61) Colgan, AA. SS. p. 5. Nicholson fell into a great mistake (Ir. Hist. Libr. Append. No. 1.) in ascribing to Cormac Mac Culinan a political tract, which is said to have been composed by Cormac Ulfada a king of Ireland in the third century. He strangely confounded this king, who lived in pagan times, with the bishop and king of Cashel. This mistake, which has been remarked upon by Harris, (Writers, ch. 1.) shows, that Nicholson was very poorly acquainted with Irish history.

(62) Here again we meet with Ledwich. He allows that this church or chapel is a very curious fabric, but strives to make us believe, that it was built after Cormac's times. This he was not able to prove from the style of its architecture, which, he says, (p. 152) was prior to the introduction of the Norman or Gothic styles. He has some bungling about a Saxon style, and tells us that Cormac's chapel bears a great "resemblance to the church of St. Peter at Oxford, which is supposed to be the oldest stone church in England, and said to be built by Grymbald about the end of the 9th century." As I have often seen this chapel, I may add that the Doctor is right as to its style being antecedent to that vulgarly called Gothic, and that it is similar to the low Roman or Italian style, which appears in some churches in Italy, particularly at Pavia, that were erected in the 7th, 8th, or 9th century. But, waving architecture, let us see how he endeavours to show that it was built after Cormac's times. He lays down, (p. 150.) merely from his own head, that it was erected for the purpose of receiving Cormac's remains. Then he says that, if it was built by Cormac himself, he must have foreknown that he was to be canonized and dubbed the patron saint of Cashel. This is truly ridiculous nonsense. In the first place, even supposing that Cormac wished to be buried in it, might he not have erected it without presuming to think, that he would become a patron saint? How many hundreds of powerful persons have erected churches or chapels, in which their remains should be deposited, who, however, never imagined that they should be canonized? Did Fitz-Adelm de Burgo, when founding the religious house of Athassel near Cashel, in which he was afterwards buried, expect to be called saint? Next we have seen, that doubts have been entertained concerning the place of Cormac's interment, which could not have existed, had the chapel been built for the purpose mentioned by the Doctor. But who told him, that Cormac has been dubbed the patron of Cashel? I have some right to know more about that city than he can, and I am able to tell him that its inhabitants, so far from considering him as their patron, do not give him even the title of saint, always speaking of him by the simple name of Cormac Mac Culinan; nor do they ever invoke him, or celebrate his memory in any manner whatsoever as usual with regard to persons reputed saints.

I have said that Cormac's chapel is perhaps the oldest ecclesiastical stone building in Ireland. Yet I will not contend that some of the ruins of those of Glendaloch and the small church of St. Doulach in the barony of Coolock in the district of Fingal, county of Dublin, or at least a part of it, may not be of equal antiquity. By the bye, the Doctor had no right to rob the Irish nation of St. Doulach, and to give him to the Danes, as he does p. 147, where he says that Doulach is a corruption of St. Olave, and thence concludes, that St. Doulach's church could not have been built before the 11th century. But St. Doulach, or rather Dulech, was an Irishman, son of Amalgad the son of Sinell, &c. and his memory was revered on the 17th of November in the very spot, anciently called Clochar, on which the church is situated. (See AA. SS. p. 598.) The Doctor might have learned this much even from Archdall (at St. Doulough) without introducing his favourite Danes, and on inquiry he could have found, that St. Doulach must have lived a very long time before St. Olave was born. He refers to Harris, (History of Dublin, p. 86) who says that there was a St. Olave's church, at the end of Fishamble-street, vulgarly called St. Tullock's, or he adds, St. Doolach's. But Harris makes no mention of St. Doulach's in Fingal, with which place the vulgarly named St. Tullock's had nothing to do.

(63) Ware speaks of it (Antiq. cap. 29.) in such a manner as to seem to state, that it was at some time the cathedral of Cashel, and the same is hinted by Harris (at Archbishops of Cashel). But who can imagine that a chapel, the nave of which is only 30 feet in length and 18 in breadth, could have been a cathedral, particularly of a city which was the capital of Munster? Cashel was certainly as populous in Cormac's time as it was about 260 years after his death, when a new cathedral was erected on its rock adjoining Cormac's chapel, and which it was found necessary to make, at least, ten times larger than the chapel. The old cathedral must have been somewhere in the city at the foot of the rock, on which was the king's palace or castle during the period that kings resided at Cashel. It was there that Failbhe Fland had his habitation and court. (See the Life of St. Pulcherius, cap. 21. and above Chap. xvii. §. 5.) The rock was not originally applied to a religious Christian purpose, however it might have been anciently to a Pagan one, although Dr. Ledwich makes us laugh with telling us, (Ant. p. 150.) that Cashel (meaning the rock) was an ancient Mandra, that is, as he should have explained to his readers, inhabited by monks. Hear how he proves it; "There is a wall surrounding the summit of the rock; therefore monks dwelt there." He might as well maintain, that every old garden with a wall around it was a Mandra. The wall surrounding the summit of that rock is far from being ancient, and, supposing it to be ever so old, is it anywise strange, that a spot, on which was the king's castle, should be environed by a wall? It is, however, true that there was, as expressly mentioned, a wall around it in ancient times, whereas the royal residence was also a fortress. (See Life of St. Pulcherius, loc. cit.) Another argument is, that the rock is elevated, and that the monastic spirit prevailed in Ireland; therefore the rock of Cashel was a Mandra. What prodigious antiquarian penetration! To follow up his theory, he ought to have added, that every high place, every mountain and hill, in Ireland was a Mandra. As he has made use of that Greek word, whence has come the title of Archimandrite, which we find given to some superiors of monks, he ought to have previously understood its ecclesiastical meaning. For it was not on account of surrounding walls, or inclosures of ground, as he supposed, that certain communities of monks got the name of Mandra. There were no such walls in the deserts of Egypt, and yet they contained Mandras and Archimandrites. But this is not the place to enter into these disquisitions.

§. VII. It is usually supposed that henceforth Cashel became a regular episcopal see; but the names of his successors are not known until about 180 years after the death of Cormac. The succession at Emly was still kept up, and Miscel, who died in 898, (64) was succeeded by Flan Mac-Conail, whose death is assigned to 903, after whom was Tiobruide, or Tibraid Mac-Moelfin, who had accompanied Cormac in his last expedition, and whom we find called prince of Emly. He died in 912, and next after him is mentioned Edchada Mac-Scanlain, who lived until 941. (65) Cormac, bishop of Saigir, died in 908. (66) In the same year a sacrilegious transaction occurred at Armagh. One Kernachan, son of Dulgen, dragged a captive out of the cathedral, where he had taken refuge, and drowned him in Lough Kirr near the city to the West. But he was soon punished by Niell Glundubh, then king of Ulster, and afterwards of all Ireland, who seized upon Kernachan and drowned him in the same lough (67)

About these times the body of St. Maimbodus, who is called martyr, because he was killed by robbers, was removed by order of Berengarius bishop of Besançon, to Monbelliard. (68) He was a native of Ireland, (69) of a distinguished and wealthy family, and belonged to the clerical order. Having left his country for the sake of pilgrimage, he visited holy places, and led a very austere life. Arriving in Burgundy, he was entertained for some time by a nobleman, who conceiving a great esteem for him, on account of his sanctity, pressed him to accept of some presents. But Maimbodus refused to take any thing, except a pair of gloves in memory of him, and blessing him and his family took his leave. He stopped to pray in a church called St. Peter's, in the village of Domnipetra, eight miles distant from Besançon, where some robbers, observing that he wore gloves, thought that he had money about him, and waylaid him outside the village. They attacked him, and striving to extort money, which in fact he had not, beat and wounded him in such a manner that he died on the spot. His body being found by some faithful was buried in the above mentioned church, whence after some time it was removed to Monbelliard, and the bishop Berengarius decreed that the memory of St. Maimbodus should be celebrated in the diocese of Besançon on the 23d of January, the anniversary of his death, as it has been since that time. Several miracles are said to have been wrought at the tomb of this saint. (70) Another Irish saint, still more revered in that diocese, but whose times are more uncertain, was Anatolius (71) That he was a Scot is constantly asserted by the many writers, who have touched upon his history; and that he was an Irish one appears from his being described as a countryman of St. Columbanus of Luxeu, St. Deicolus, &c. (72) He was a bishop before he left Ireland. (73) Of his transactions, until a short time before his death, I find nothing more recorded than that returning from Rome he stopped at a mountain or rock over the valley and city of Salinae (Salins), in the diocese of Besançon, on which he prayed, in an oratory called from St.

Symphorian, martyr of Autun; that he liked the place, determined on remaining there, and died a few days after. (74) As to the time of his death I find nothing, that can enable us even to guess at it, except that his natalis, or the anniversary of it, was kept on the third of February. (75) Although St. Anatolius was a bishop, he was not attached to any see in France, nor does he appear to have even exercised episcopal functions in that country. (76) His memory is very famous for miracles said to have been wrought at his tomb, and has been greatly celebrated in the diocese of Besançon, particularly at Salins. (77) Besides his festival on the third of February, another is kept on the first of September, in commemoration of a translation of his remains. (78)

(64) Above, §. 1. (65) Ware, Bishops at Emly.

(66) AA. SS. p. 473 ad A. 907 (908). Owing to an erratum, we there find 997 instead of 907, by which Ware was led astray so as to place (Bishops of Ossory) Cormac's death in 997; but this mistake has been corrected by Harris.

(67) Tr. Th. p. 296. at A. 907 (908), and Harris, Archbishops of Armagh at Maelbrigid.

(68) Bollandus has published (at 23 January) the Acts of St. Mainbodus from Chifflet and a MS. of the church of Besançon. They have been republished by Colgan at said day. The time in which the saint lived is not mentioned, and can only be guessed at by its seeming, that it was not long before his remains were removed by order of Berengarius, who, as Bollandus and others state, lived about A. D. 900.

(69) This is clear from the Scotia, whence the Acts bring him, being represented as that, which was the country of St. Columbanus, St. Deicolus, and St. Columbinus, who had distinguished themselves in Burgundy. Colgan remarks that, instead of Mainbodus, some have called him Maingolus, and that Maingol was a common name among the ancient Irish.

(70) See the Acts and the notes to them.

(71) Colgan treats of St. Anatolius at 3d February, as do the Bollandists much more diffusely. They have, besides their own observations, a short old Life by an anonymous author, and a sketch of one drawn up by Father Chifflet.

(72) In the Acts of St. Maimbodus after St. Columbanus and other saints from Scotia (Ireland), who had illustrated Burgundy, is mentioned Anatolius from the Scotia. "Post hos verò celeberrimum confessorem prædicamus Anatolium ex Scotia videm genitum, lumen tibi a Domino destinatum."

(73) In the anonymous Life (ap. Bolland.) we read of him; "Fuit igitur vir iste Scoticae regionis oriundus, pontificali officio, ut fert priorum assertio, præditus."

(74) Ib.

(75) According to an opinion of Chifflet in his little sketch of the Life of Anatolius, he should have lived early in the 5th century; but in that case he would have been a Greek or a Cilician. There was an Anatolius bishop of Adana in Cilicia, who took part with St. John Chrysostom against Theophilus of Alexandria, and of whom Palladius (Dialog. de Vit. S. Chrys.) says, that it was reported he had withdrawn to Gaul. Chifflet took it into his head, that he was the Anatolius so famous at Salins. And then to account for his having been universally called a Scotus, he says that he might be so denominated in the same manner as all foreigners were in old times vulgarly called Scoti in France. This is a truly pitiful evasion; for, in the first place Chifflet could not have proved this position; whereas, although there were in the middle ages very many Irish there, yet we know from the French writers of those times that all foreigners were not indiscriminately called Scoti. Were Alcuin, Theodulf, Claudius, Prudentius, &c. reckoned among the Scoti by the French? But, whatever vulgar mode of speaking as to foreigners might have prevailed after the sixth century, when the Irish began to be so generally known in France, surely it cannot be supposed that an oriental bishop, who lived before St. Patrick preached in Ireland, would have been called a Scotus by the inhabitants of Gaul. The Bollandists, wishing to pay a compliment to Chifflet, state that his opinion is probable; yet they lay down that the other of Anatolius having been a Scotus, ought not to be rashly disturbed after a possession of a long line of centuries. Camerarius (Menol. Scot.) and Dempster (Hist. Eccl.) have some fooleries concerning Anatolius of Salins.

in which he is confounded with Anatolius bishop of Laodicea, who lived in the third century and wrote on the Paschal cycle, or with Anatolius a patriarch of Constantinople in the fifth. It may be said, that Anatolius is not an Irish name. But might not this saint, being in the continent, have assumed it, as of more easy pronounciation, instead of his original one, which perhaps had the same meaning? Or, it might have been inflected by the foreigners, among whom he lived, from his real name beginning perhaps with Ana, but which they could not well pronounce. We have already seen, that many Irishmen were known in the continent by names, which they did not bear in Ireland.

(76) Molanus and Ferrarius thought that Anatolius was bishop of Besançon. Colgan and the Bollandists have shown that this is a mistake; and it is clear from the anonymous Life, that he had no see in France.

(77) The chief collegiate church of Salins, of which he is the patron saint, is called by his name, as is also one of the four parish churches of that city, on the mountain at the South side of which is the hermitage of St. Anatolius.

(78) In the 11th century the body of St. Anatolius was removed from the original tomb and placed in the principal church of Salins. About 200 years later, Nicholas, who was bishop of Besançon from A. 1229 to 1235, got it moved on a 1st of September into an elegant shrine in the same church.

§ VIII. In the early part of the tenth century is said to have flourished Sealbach, who is called secretary to Cormac Mac-Culinan. He is represented as a man of great piety and learning, and is said to have written a genealogical tract on the saints of Ireland. (79) Sealbach must have survived Cormac, if it be true that he wrote an account of his death and virtues, and even for many years after, if he was the author of that tract, or if it has not been continued by others. Although the Northmen, or, at least, the greatest part of them, had been driven out of Ireland in 902, (80) yet we meet with them again after some years. In 914 a party of them landed at Waterford, but were slaughtered by a prince or chieftain who is called of Idrona. (81) In 915 they plundered Cork, Lismore, and Aghaboe. (82)

Flann Sinna, king of all Ireland, having died in 916, (83) was succeeded by Niell Glundubh (black-kneed) son of Aidus, or Edan Finnliath. Having reigned scarcely three years, Niell was killed in a great battle near Dublin by the Danes commanded by Ivar and Sitric. In this battle fell also Conor O'Maselseachlin, king of Meath, Aodh, Aidus, or Hugh, son of Eochagan king of Ulster, and many other princes and nobles. (84) Previous to this battle the Danes had sorely afflicted in 916 the people of Leinster, and among many others killed Angarv, son of Olioll king of that province. (85) But in the same year great slaughter was made of them in Munster; (86) and in the following year (917) they were defeated at Emly. (87) The battle, in which Niell Glundubh lost his life, was fought in 919; (88) and he was immediately succeeded by Dunchad or Donogh, son of Flann Sinna, who in the next year routed the Danes in so complete a manner that a greater number of them were slain than had been of the Irish in the former battle near Dublin. (89) Donogh was the second monarch of his name, and reigned 25 years until he died suddenly in 944. Next after him was Congelac or Congal II. son of Melmith a descendant of Congal, who was uncle to the king Cined or Kineth, that reigned in 724. Congal II. was killed, fighting against the Danes of Dublin, in 956, after a reign of 12 years. His successor was Domnald O'Niell, son of Murchertach and grandson of Niell Glundubh. He reigned 24 years, died at Armagh in 980, and was succeeded by Maelseachlin or Malachy II. a grandson of Dunchad or Donogh II. by his father Domnald. (90) This king, having reigned more than 20 years, surrendered the kingdom to Brian Boromhe, as will be seen hereafter.

(79) See Colgan, AA. SS. p. 5. and Harris, Writers at Selbach. Colgan says, that this work is supposed to be the excellent old metrical Menelogium Genealogicum consisting of 22 chapters, which he often quotes.

(80) Above, §. 3.

(81) Annals of Innisfallen (Mr. O'Reilly's copy) at A. 914. This Idrona could scarcely have been the Idrona of the county of Carlow. There was a district not far from Waterford, called Idrona or Drona.

(82) Ib. These plunderings are assigned to A. 913 (914) in the Chronological index to Tr. Th.

(83) See Chap. xx. §. 8.

(84) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 916. See also Ware, Antiq. cap. 4. and O'Flaherty, Ogyg. Part III. cap. 93.

(85) Annals of Innisfallen ib. and Ware Antiq. cap. 24. Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 598) calls this prince Augurius.

(86) Ib.

" (87) Annals of Ulster, ap. Johnstone, at A. 916 (917).

(88) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 919. Ware says, (Antiq. cap. 24) that this battle occurred in 918 on the 15th of September. Yet elsewhere (ib. cap. 4.) he assigns the death of Niell Glundubh to 919, as does also O'Flaherty, loc. cit.

(89) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 920.

(90) The Annals of Innisfallen (at A. 930) and Ware (Antiq. cap. 4.) confound this Domnald with Domnald O'Niell, the king who preceded Maelsechlin. But the 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 448) and O'Flaherty (loc. cit.) distinguish them.

§ IX. During the above mentioned devastation of Leinster in 916, and for some time after, Leighlin was plundered in 917. (91) Kells in Meath was ravaged in 919, in which year died Scanlan, a scribe or learned man of Roscrea. (92) In 921 Godfrid, king of the Danes of Dublin, marched into Ulster, and plundered Armagh in the month of November. (93) He is said, however, to have spared the Churches, the Colidei (the officiating clergy of the cathedral) and the sick. (94) To the year 920 is assigned the death of a celebrated abbot of Derry and Drumcliff, Kinaed or Kineth, who was considered as the great supporter of religion in Tirconnel; (95) and to 921 that of Paulinus or Mal-Paulinus, who is styled a bishop, anchoret, chief scribe of Leth-cuinn (the northern half of Ireland) and abbot of Indenen, (96) and who was, in all probability, the Paulinus to whom Probus addressed his Life of St. Patrick. (97) In the same year 921 died Cormac Aedan or Mac-Aedan, bishop of Clonfert. (98) Dublinterius of Kill-slepte, or Killevey, a priest of Armagh, was killed in 922 by the Northmen, and in the same year died Maeltul, a scholastic or teacher of Clonmacnois. (99) To 925 is assigned the death, on the 7th of February, of Colman Mac-Alild, a very wise doctor, who, besides being abbot of Clonard and Clonmacnois, was also a bishop. He erected a great church in the latter place, and is said to have been of a family of the Conals Murthemhne in the now county of Louth. (100) Next prior to him I find mentioned a bishop of Clonard, Rumond or Rumold son of Cathasach, who also is praised for his wisdom or learning, and is said to have died in 920. (101) Among the distinguished men of this period are likewise reckoned Mainach Mac-Siedul, abbot of Bangor, who is styled a most skilful writer, and Carpre Mac-Feredach abbot of Disert Dermot (Castledermot) to whom is given the title of anchoret and chief of religion in Leinster. The same year 920 is marked for the death of both these abbots. Another abbot of Bangor, Kelius Dabali, who is called bishop, writer, preacher, and celebrated doctor, is said to have died at Rome in 926 or 927. (102)

(91) Ind. Chron. to Tr. Th. at A. 916 (917).

(92) Ib. ad A. 918 (919)

(93) Annals of Ulster at A. 920 (921), of Innisfallen at 921, and Ware, Ant. cap. 24. The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 296.)

assign this devastation to A. 919 (920); but the other now quoted annals form better authority. Yet Ware, in contradiction to himself, following the 4 Masters and Colgan, (Bishops, Armagh, Maelbrigid) places a plundering of Armagh in 919, meaning the one by Godfrid; and Archdall (at Armagh) likewise following them, marked it at the same year. A devastation of Clonenagh is affixed by the 4 Masters (ib. p. 633.) to said year 919 (920).

(94) 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 296.

(95) Ib. p. 503 ad A. 919 (920).

(96) Ib. p. 64 ad A. 920 (921.) (97) See Chap. III. §. 3.

(98) Annals of Innisfallen (Harris's copy), and Ware, Bishops at Clonfert, (99) Four Masters, (ap. Tr. Th. p. 296. and 632.) at A. 921 (922).

(100) AA. SS. p. 407. at A. 924 (925) and Ware, Bishops at Meath and Clonmacnois.

(101) Four Masters ap. AA. SS. p. 107. at 919 (920). It is odd, that Colgan has not this bishop at p. 407. where he expressly gives a list of the prelates and other distinguished ecclesiastics of Clonard. Ware, not finding him in said list, has omitted him (at Meath); but Harris has added him to it.

(102) Ib. p. 107. at A. 919 (920). and for Keliuss, ib. Not. 18.

§. x. St. Maelbrigid of Armagh, who died in 926, or more probably in 927, (103) was succeeded by Joseph, styled prince of Armagh, a man of great learning, who having held the see for nine years, died in 936. (104) In the Irish annals he is represented as a scribe, anchoret, and very wise man. His successor Patrick, or Moelpatrick, a son of Maoltule, and who also is called prince of Armagh and a wise man, died in the same year after an incumbency of only five months (105) Next after Patrick was Cathasach the second, son of one Dulgan of Drumtorraig, who governed the see for 20 years and died in 957. (106) In these times I find three bishops of Derry, notwithstanding its being usually supposed that there was no regular and permanent see in that city until some time in the 12th century. This, however, does not prevent there having been some bishops there occasionally, as was the case in many places, which never became regular sees. Those three were, 1. Cainchomrac Mac Maeluidhir, bishop and abbot, who died in 928 ; 2. Finnachta Mac-Kellach, bishop and abbot, a man deeply skilled in Irish antiquities, whose death is assigned to 938 ; and 3. Moelfinnian, who is simply called bishop and died in 949. (107) Kenfail, son of Lorcan, who died in 930, is called comorban of Clones and Clogher, and hence ought to be reckoned among the bishops of those places. (108) In the same year 930 died Crummnoel, bishop of Kildare, whose memory was revered on the 11th of December. (109) Laidgnen, who is called comorban of Ferns and Tallaght, was, I dare say, a bishop, and, at least, of Ferns. He died in 938, (110) and is the only person on record, who may with some degree of certainty be considered as bishop of Ferns between Killen, who died in 714, and Diermit Hua-Rodachan, who lived in the eleventh century. Yet it can scarcely be supposed, that the episcopal succession was not kept up in that see, notwithstanding all that it suffered from the Northmannic devastations. Ferns was not in those times the chief see, that is, in an honorary degree, of Leinster, whereas that rank had been transferred to Kildare, as early, at least, as the beginning of the ninth century, and the time in which Cogitosus lived ; (111) nor does it seem to have ever been restored to Ferns. (112) About these times died Malduin Mac-Kinnfalaid, bishop of Raphoe, and the first of whom I find any clear mention made as really bishop of that see ; and after him I meet with another there, Aengus Hua Lapain, whose death is assigned to 957 (958). (113) Condla Mac-Dunecan, who is called bishop and prince of Leighlin, died in 943, as did in 955 Maelbrigid a comorban of St. Macnesse, that is bishop of Connor. (114) Besides some scribes, or men of letters, already mentioned, several others are named as belonging to this period, ex. c. Moelmoedoc of Gleannussen (King's county), who died in 916; Joseph of Armagh, in 937; Moelmochta of Clonard, in 941; Dubtach of said place, in 943, as also Angal in 952; Cathasach of Armagh, in 946; Dungal of Clonmacnois in 949; Moelpatrick Mac-Coscan of Armagh, in 952; and Moelnach, likewise of Armagh, in 955. (115) To these we may add Coenachair, or Probus, the author of the Life of St. Patrick, who had been chief master of the school of Slane, and was burned to death by the Danes in 949 or perhaps 950. (116) A holy abbess of Kildare, Muiriunn, or Murrena died in 917 on the 26th of May, or, according to another account, of April. (117)

(103) Above §. 1.

(104) The catalogue from the Psalter of Cashel allows 9 years for Joseph, and not only the 4 Masters but likewise the Annals of Uister place his death in 935 (936). Hence it appears that his accession to the see was in 927.

(105) Tr. Th. p. 296. and Ware, Bishops at Armagh.

(106) Ware, ib. Colgan fell (Tr. Th. p. 297.) into a great mistake concerning this Cathasach. Having found a Cathasach, bishop of Kinel-eogan (Tyrone), whose death is marked at 946, he confounded him with Cathasach of Armagh, and then strove to explain why he was called bishop of Kinel-eogan. Next he strangely tells us, that the 20 years, allowed by the Cashel catalogue for Cathasach of Armagh elapsed exactly between 936, in which Patrick died, and 946; as if a child did not know that this was an interval of only ten years. But, as O'Flaherty remarks (MS. Not. ib.) Colgan overlooked the real Cathasach of Armagh, who died, according to the 4 Masters, in 957, and accordingly committed not only this blunder, but likewise others with regard to the following succession and dates. Ware was so judicious as to pass by what Colgan has about Cathasach of Kinel-eogan; but Harris picked it up, and although he places, with Ware, the death of Cathasach of Armagh in 957, yet he confounds him with the one of Kinel-eogan, and then follows Colgan in the silly reason to show how he could be called bishop of that district. Yet Harris had no right to introduce the 4 Masters as making the two Cathasachs one and the same person (a mistake to be left at Colgan's door), and stating that he, that is, the one of Kinel-eogain died in 956, whereas their date for his death is 946.

(107) 4 Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 503. I have added a year to their dates. See also Ware, Bishops at Derry.

(108) He is mentioned by the 4 Masters, (ap. AA. SS. p. 742) at A. 929 (930). Ware has him among the bishops of Clogher. Clones, of which also he was bishop, had sometimes prelates of its own, and was at other times united with Clogher. We have seen (Chap. ix. §. 2.) that as far back as the early part of the sixth century St. Tigernach was bishop of both these sees; and thus Kenfail was his comorban or successor.

(109) Tr. Th. p. 630. at A. 929 (930).

(110) AA. SS. p. 223 ad A. 937 (938) and Harris, Bishops at Ferns. Ware has omitted Laidgнен, because he did not find him expressly styled bishop; but I think that the title comorban is alone sufficient to show that he was, and that it was used to indicate that he was in every respect a successor of St. Moedoc. Had he been only abbot of Ferns, why not designate him as such in the same manner as many others before and after him are in Colgan's list (ib.) from the 4 Masters? Whether Laidgнен were bishop also of Tallaght is not equally probable, because it was not a regular see, and he might have been merely abbot of its monastery.

(111) See Not. 18. to Chap. viii.

(112) The sort of ecclesiastical primacy observed in Leinster was first attached to the see of Sletty, whence it was removed to Ferns upon the ordination of St. Moedoc about the latter end of the sixth century. Next, but at what precise time cannot be ascertained, it was granted to Kildare. Colgan thought (Tr. Th. p. 308. and AA. SS. p. 218.) that it had been at Kildare earlier than at Ferns; but his only reason for this opinion was his erroneous supposition that Cogitosus, in whose time it was certainly at Kildare, flourished before A. D. 590. According to his system it would have been moved from Sletty to Kildare, then to Ferns, and afterwards back again to Kildare. But, as Cogitosus lived a long time after St. Moedoc, Colgan's hypothesis falls to the ground.

That said primacy returned at any time from Kildare to Ferns there is no authority whatever to prove. It was still at Kildare in the latter end of the eleventh century. But of this more elsewhere.

(113) Tr. Th. p. 509. Ware and Harris, Bishops at Raphoe.

(114) Ware, ib. at Leighlin for Conala; and for Maolbrigid see AA. SS. p. 387 at A. 954 (955) and Harris, Bishops at Connor.

(115) Tr. Th. p. 632. I have added a year to each date.

(116) See Chap. III. §. 3. and compare with below Not. 140.

(117) Colgan's text (ib. p. 630.) has Murena's death at 919, as if from the 4 Masters. But this must be an erratum; for O'Flaherty (MS. not. ib.) says, that they assign it to 916 (917). The day marked by them is May 26; but he observes, that the book of Clonmacnois has the 26th of April. According to Keating, she was abbes of Kildare at the time of Cornac Mac-Culinan's death in 908. If so, there is a mistake, (ib. p. 629.) where Colgan places before her the abbes Cobflatia as dying in 914 (915).

§. XI. The Northmen still continue to plunder and destroy various religious establishments. In 926 Kildare was despoiled first by those of Waterford, and afterwards by those of Dublin. (118) This town was a great object of their cupidity; for it was plundered again in 927 by the Danes of Waterford commanded by a son of Godfred, and afterwards in 928 on St. Brigid's day by Godfred himself. (119) Leinster was not as well defended as some other parts of Ireland. Auliffe, a son of Godfred, I suppose the same as the one just mentioned, was defeated in 926 by Murtogh Mac-Neill (a son of the king Neill Glundubh) and his Ulster men, who killed 800 Northmen, among whom were three of their chiefs Abdean, Aufer, and Harold. (120) Yet they afterwards penetrated into that province, and the same Auliffe, assisted by the Northmen of Lochcuain (Strangford-lough) plundered Armagh about St. Martin's festival 932. (121) A party of them pillaged Clonmacnois in 935; and in the same year they burned the monastery of Mungret. In 937 they plundered the church of Kilcullen, and in the following year burned the monastery of Killachad and ravaged Clonenagh. (122) In 940 they pillaged the church of Inis-mochta, (123) and in 941 laid waste Ardraccon, at which year is marked also a plundering of Down and a conflagration of Clonmacnois. (124) In the same year the celebrated prince Ceallachan or Callaghan Cashel, at the head of the forces of Munster, defeated the Northmen in two battles, one in the Desies country and the other in Ossory, in which 2000 of their troops were killed. (125) In 942 Down, Clonard, Kildare, and the adjacent districts, were overrun by several of their armies; (126) and in 943 those of Limerick laid waste a part of Ossory. (127) In the same year the gallant Murtogh or Murchertach, son of Niall Glunndubh, and prince of Aileach, was killed on the 26th of March fighting at Athfera against the Northman king Blacar, a son of Godfred and brother of Auliffe, and consequently on the following day the Northmen plundered Armagh. (128) In 944 Congall II. king of all Ireland, at the head of the people of Bregh (now Fingal, &c.), and assisted by Bran Mac-Maolmordha and his Lagenians, took Dublin, plundered and exterminated the Danish inhabitants, and burning the town carried off much booty and treasure. (129) In the following year Ceallachan Cashel presented to the see and monastery of Clonfert plunder, which he had taken from the Northmen, and Blacar, having got some reinforcements, recovered Dublin, which he repaired. (130) In 946 Jomhar or Ivar, a Northman chieftain, arrived at Limerick, and, proceeding on the Shannon with his followers, set fire to the establishments of Muicinis, Iniskeltra in Lough-derg, Clonmacnois, and those of the islands of Lough-ree, &c. and thence marching into Meath devastated a great tract of country. (131) In 947 some Northmen, probably those of Dublin, plundered the church of Slane; (132) and it was perhaps on this occasion that they were in said year attacked and routed by Congall II. (133) This king defeated them in another battle, the following year 948, in which their king Blacar and 1000 of his men lost their lives. (134)

(118) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 926. The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 630.) assign this devastation to 924 (925).

(119) 4 Masters, ib. at 926 (927) and 927 (928).

(120) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 926. and Ware, Antiq. cap. 24.

(121) Four Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 296, at A. 931 (932).

(122) Ind. Chron. to Tr. Th. I have added a year to the dates. The Annals of Innisfallen assign this devastation of Killachad and Clonenagh, together with that of Meath in general from its southern parts to as far as Clonard, to the year 639. They charge with it not only the Northmen, but likewise the famous Ceallachan or Callaghan Cashel, who, they state, was assisted by the Danes. The Killachad here mentioned could not have been that of the now county of Cavan, as laid down by Archdall (at Killachad), because this Killachad lay far to the North of Clonard. It was the Killachad-dromfoda, now Killeigh in the King's county, which had been founded by St. Sinell or Senchell. (See Chap. ix. §. 3.)

(123) Tr. Th. ib. at 939 (940). Archdall places Inis-mochta in the county of Louth for no other reason, I suppose, than that St. Mochteus or Mcchta lived in that country. But it is more probable, that it was the place now called Inismouthy, a vicarage in the barony of Slane, co. Meath. (See Seward ad loc.)

(124) Tr. Th. ib. at 940 (941).

(125) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 941.

(126) Ware, Antiq. cap. 24.

(127) Annals of Innifallen at A. 943.

(128) ib. at A. 943. and 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 296.) who assign this battle to 941 (942). Ware says, (Ant. cap. 24. at A. 943.) that Murtoch was killed on the 26th of February. His English translator has rendered his words in such a manner as to make him seem to say, that Murtoth was killed not by the Danes but by the people of Ulster. Aileach, whence that brave prince had his title, was a castle of the Nialls three miles N. of Derry. As to Ath-ferd, it must have been not far from Armagh, which was entered by the Northmen on the day after the battle.

(129) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 944.

(130) Ib. at A. 945. and Ware, Ant. cap. 24.

(131) Ib. at A. 946. Colgan has (Tr. Th. p.: 633.) from the 4 Master at A. 944 (945) a devastation of Clonmacnois, which, we may be sure, was the same as that now mentioned, although they place it a year earlier. At the same date they have a plundering, by Northmen, of the church of Kilcullen.

(132) Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. ad A. 946 (947).

(133) See Ware, Antiq. cap. 24. at A. 947.

(134) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 948.

§. XII. These disasters of the Danes of Dublin probably contributed in some degree to their conversion to the Christian religion, which, it is said, occurred in the same year 948. (135) They were the first of their nation in Ireland, who, at least in any large body, received the divine doctrines of the Gospel, which, however, did not prevent them from afterwards practising ravages in the same manner as their predecessors had done. It has been conjectured, that Godfrid, who after the death of Blacar became head or king of the Irish Northmen, (136) was himself a Christian. He was the son of Sitric, who, according to this conjecture, was the Sitric king of Northumberland, to whom Athelstan king of England, gave his sister Editha in marriage on condition of his embracing the Christian faith. This Sitric had three sons, Reginald, Anlaf, or Auliffe, and Godfrid, the two latter of whom are allowed to have been born of a former marriage. Yet it has been thought probable, that Godfrid, in imitation of his father, also became a Christian. (137) Be this as it may, I find no reason to doubt that the Danish inhabitants of Dublin received christianity at this time, but, generally speaking, not earlier; (138) yet it is not to be supposed, that the abbey of St. Mary, which is said to have been originally of the Benedictine order, was founded as early as the very first year of their conversion. (139) These new converts did not imbibe the meekness prescribed by the Gospel; for in 950 the Danes of Dublin plundered and burned Slane, so that many persons assembled in its belfrey, perished in the flames. (140) In the same year Godfrid was defeated at a place, called Muine-Breacain, by Ruraidhe or Roderic O'Cannanain, prince of Lethcuinn (the northern half of Ireland) and, having lost 1000 men, was forced to fly; but Roderick was killed in this battle. (141) To said year is assigned a devastation of Clonfert by the Northmen; (142) and also an expedition of Godfrid in the southern parts of Munster as far as Ross, in which he was assisted by a considerable fleet. (143) In 951 Godfrid took Dublin, ravaged Kells and Domnach-Patrick about four miles distant from it, Ardraccan, Tullen, Killskire, and some other religious places in Meath; but on his return he and his army were surprized by the Irish, routed, and obliged to leave their plunder behind. This was the last year of Godfrid's depredations; for, having proceeded to the Desies, he was killed, together with 500 of his followers (chiefly, I suppose, the Danes of Waterford,) by the united Munstermen, both Eugenians and Dalcassians. (144) Other Northmen still continued to plunder religious establishments. They pillaged Clonmacnois in 952, at which year is marked also a devastation of Inisdamle. (145)

(135) Ib. where they have; "This year the Danes of Dublin received the Christian religion and were baptized." Instead of Dublin, Ware (loc. cit. at A. 948.) has Ireland. But this is a mistake; and it is clear, from the subsequent history of Ireland, that the conversion of the Danes was far from being general until a later period; nor would the annalist have confined the conversion in 948 to those of Dublin, had the Danes in other parts of Ireland become Christians at the same time.

(136) Ware (ib.) speaks of Godfrid as king of the Danes of Dublin; but I think he ought rather to be called king of those of all Ireland. For we shall see him fighting in Ulster and in Munster, in which province he was killed. Such circumstances do not agree with his having been king only of Dublin.

(137) See J. P. Murray, De coloniis Scandicis in insulis Britannicis, et maxime in Hibernia, §. 14. 15. in Nov. Comment. Soc. R. Goetting. Vol. 3.

(138) Keder (Num. in Hibernia-cursorum Indagatio, p. 7.) and Murray (loc. cit.) were wrong in making Ware attribute a coin of a christian king Anlaf to Anlaf king of Dublin, who died in 941. Ware merely calls it (Antiq. cap. 25.) "the silver coin of Aulaf or Anlaf king of Dublin," without stating which of the Anlafs he meant. For there were other Anlafs, at a later time, kings of Dublin; nor could Ware have alluded to the Anlaf, who died in 941, whereas he does not mention any conversion of the Danes previous to 948. The figure of the cross in two or three parts of it shows, that it was struck by order of an Anlaf a Christian. There was an Anlaf, king of Dublin, who retired to Hy in the year 980, and died there. He was the father of Sitric, king of Dublin, whose son Anlaf became king there in 1029. To either of these Anlafs that coin may be referred, without recurring, as some have done, to an Anlaf of Northumberland. For it is sufficiently clear, that it was struck in Dublin, as the name of the monetarius or mint-man marked on it is Farman or Faereman, which we find also on a coin (with the cross) of Sitric with the addition Dyflin. This Sitric was undoubtedly the one, who became king of Dublin in 989, and who was the son of one Anlaf, and father of another. It is remarkable that there is also a coin of Ethelred, king of England, with the same addition and the name of the said monetarius, having on one side Aedelred Rex Anglo, and, on the reverse, Foereman Mo Dyfli. Had Ethelred no mint of his own, and accordingly was obliged to get money coined in Dublin? (See Simon on Irish coins, p. 6, 7. and 9.) There is a coin, likewise with a cross, which Simon (ib. p. 6.) supposes to be of a king Ivar, and whom he makes the same as Ivar, who died in 872. This is a downright mistake; for this Ivar, who had come from Norway in 853 with his brothers Anlaf or Amlaf and Sitric, was not a Christian. The coin is so worn, that it is almost impossible to explain it. Simon thought that it has the letters R. Yflii, which he interprets Rex Dyflin. I cannot perceive them in this order. In what he calls Yflii I see no L, but something like I three times; and, instead of F the letter is G. (Compare with Coin 7. Tab. 4. in Camden's Britan. col. cxcv. Gibson's ed.) The whole word might have been Largy, the old name of Waterford. Even the name Ivar is not sufficiently plain, excepting the two first letters IF. There was an Ivar king of Waterford, who died in 1000. (Ware, ib. cap. 24.) Should it be insisted that this coin belonged to Dublin, we find an Ivar governor or viceroy of the Danes of Dublin in 1038, (Annals of Innisfallen) to whom it may be fairly referred. Ware does not mention this Ivar; but who will be seen elsewhere. (Below Not. 130 to Chap. xxiii.) Ledwich (Antiq. &c. p. 126.) makes mention of this coin from Simon, and with strange confidence speaks of it, as if the words, Ifarus re Dyflin, were plainly discernible on it. Now even his own figure of it proves, that this is not the case. He follows Simon in attributing it to the Ivar, who came to Ireland in 853, and thence concludes that, as the cross appears on it, the Danes were then Christians, and that Ware was wrong in dating their conversion a hundred years later. But did he know that Ware was not the author of that date, which he took from the Annals of Innisfallen? (See above Not. 135.) Perhaps he did not; for Ware, according to a practice, in which he indulged too much, did not refer to his authority; and on the other hand the mighty antiquary did not trouble himself about Irish annals. He considered this as a most important discovery, and founded on it a heap of rubbish, which he has often here and there about St. Patrick having been brought to Armagh by the Danes or Ostmen in the 9th century, their introducing reliques in the 9th century, erecting stone chapels in the 9th century, and so on. Now, independently of the positive testimony of the quoted annals, we find the Ostmen of Ireland still called gentiles or pagans after the death of Ledwich's pretended Christian king Ivar. Thus the Ulster annals have; "Anno 878 (879) Maicobus filius Crumvaili antiestes Armachanus, et Moc- theus lector, capti sunt a Gentilibus. (Usher, Pr. p. 860. and Ind. Chron. ad A. 879.)

(139) Ware treats of this abbey, Antiq. cap. 24. at A. 948, and cap. 26. but in a rather unsatisfactory manner. He has a story about its having been founded by king Maelseachlin I. who died in 862. But the Irish of those days had no Benedictines. Nor was it founded as early as 948; for, as Ware states, its fourth abbot did not die until April, A. D. 1131; and it cannot be supposed that four abbots could have filled up the long interval between this year and 948. In 1139 the monks of this house adopted the reform of the Cistercian institution.

(140) Ware, ib. cap. 24. This was undoubtedly the conflagration marked by Colgan from the 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 219. and Ind. Chron.) at A. 948 (949), in which he says, that Coenachair, or Probus, above mentioned (see Chap. 111. §. 2.) and many others were burned to death in a tower. Ware mentions that they were burned in the church; but he should have said in the belfrey. Coenachair is called by him Cinaus, and represented as a learned man and chief lecturer of Slane, by which title the 4 Masters designate Coenachair. Ware's date for this conflagration is more correct than Colgan's; whereas the Annals of Ulster, quoted by Dr. O'Connor (Rer. Hib. Scriptores, 1 Proleg. p. 32.) assign it to A. 949 i. e. 950. He observes also, that the 4 Masters mark it at the same year, so that there is a mistake in Colgan's reference to them. Instead of tower he ought to have said belfrey, for the word used by the 4 Masters and in the Ulster annals is Cloiteach, which literally means bell-house. Colgan's tower might lead one to believe, that it was an edifice of stone, which it could not have been; for it was burned itself, and accordingly was of wood. According to both Annals it was in said Cloiteach that Coenachair and his companions were burned to death.

(141) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 950. The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 449.) assign this battle to 948 (949). They swell the number of the Northmen, that fell, to 6000, too great a multitude, I think, for the battles of those times. Where Muine Breccaine was situated I wish that either they or Colgan had informed us.

(142) Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. ad A. 949 (950).

(143) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 950.

(144) Ib. at A. 951.

(145) See Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. ad 951 (952). For Inisdamle see Not. 1. to Chap. XXI.

§. 13. Edchada Mac-Scanlain, bishop of Emly, who died in 941, (146) was succeeded by Huarach, who held the see until 953, and after him we find Mael-Kellach, who lived until 957. (147) Mael-finan, bishop of Kildare, died in 949 or 950. (148) A succession of bishops was still kept up at Louth, as appears from there being assigned to A.D. 949 the death of Finnacta Mac-Ectigern, who is styled bishop, scribe, and abbot of Louth, and the chief procurator of the church of Armagh in the southern parts; and before him is mentioned another bishop there, Moelpatric Mac-Bran, who died in 937. (149) One Cathmogan is named as bishop of Cork in these times, and he is said to have died in 961. (150) A Cormac, bishop of Tallaght, died in 963; but a more celebrated prelate of this period was Cormac Hua Killene, bishop and abbot of Clonmacnois, abbot also of Tomgrany (in Clare) and of Roscommon, who erected a church and steeple at Tomgrany, and, having lived to a very great age, died in 965. (151) St. Adhland, abbot of Derry, is greatly praised for his charity and liberality to the poor. He was a descendant of Conall Gulbanus and died in 951. (152) As abbot of Derry, he has been called a comorban of Columb-kille, and hence it has been erroneously supposed that he was abbot of Hy. (153) After Caincomrach, who died in 946, (154) the next, whom I find strictly called abbot of Hy, is Fiachra Hua-Hartaguin, who lived until 977. (155) A bishop of Hy, who must not be confounded with the abbot, named Fingin, and from his sanctity styled anchoret, died in 965, and his memory was revered on the 5th of March. (156) Kelius, an anchoret of Armagh, died in 951, to which year is assigned also the death of a celebrated Irish chronographer Flann

Hua Becain, archdeacon of Drumcliffe; and in 952 Colga likewise an anchorite of Armagh. (157) I shall close this series of distinguished ecclesiastics with the holy Alild Mac-Moenach bishop of Swords and Lusk, who died in 966, and Muredach O'Connor, bishop and abbot of Clonenagh, who died in 971, prior to whom I find two other bishops there, Tiprad and Kellach, whose deaths fell within said century in 910 and 941. (158) Henceforth and down to the beginning of the twelfth century the accounts of the succession to the see of Armagh are greatly confused and very obscure. It had already got into the possession of one powerful family, the members of which held it for about 200 years, reckoning from the death of St. Maelbrigid, who died in 926, or 927, until the accession of the great St. Malachy. (159) This family was most probably that of the dynasts of the district of Armagh, whose ancestor Daire had granted to St. Patrick the ground, on which the church and other religious buildings, &c. of that city had been erected. (160) And it is remarkable, that the two first bishops of this long succession, viz. Joseph and Moelpatrick are styled princes of Armagh; (161) a title, which strongly indicates, that they were really chieftains as well as bishops of that city. (162) After them care was taken that the see should not be conferred except on members of that ruling family. This pernicious system gradually produced horrid abuses, insomuch so, that during this usurpation eight married men, who, although not illiterate, were not in holy orders, assumed the title, rank, and prerogatives of the archbishop of Armagh; and thus, although there were at times no clergymen belonging to that family, yet it gave to the see persons called bishops. (163) It seems, however, that these lay usurpers retained regular bishops to act for them as suffragans, while they enjoyed the church livings; and hence we find in the subsequent period several persons called by some writers bishops of Armagh and omitted by others; whereby it becomes very difficult and, I may say, impossible to arrange the succession in a correct manner; to which must be added the diversity of dates, that occur in our old writers as to the duration of the incumbencies of said bishops, whether real ones or not. (164)

(146) Above §. 7. (147) Ware Bishops at Emly.

(148) Idem at Kildare.

(149) 4 Masters ap. AA. SS. p. 736. I have added a year to their dates.

(150) Ware, Bishops at Cork.

(151) 4 Masters ap. AA. SS. p. 360, at A. 962 (963), and A. 964 (965). Ware and Harris have Cormac Hua Killeme at Bishops at Clonmacnois. He is called comorban of Kieran and Coman, alluding to Clonmacnois and Roscommon, and also of Cronan, whence Harris deduced that he seems to have been abbot likewise of Roscrea. But I believe that he was so styled relatively to Tomgrany, of which he is expressly called abbot, without any mention of Roscrea. And hence we may infer, that Tomgrany, the origin of which has been hitherto obscure, was founded by St. Cronan. For we know, (see Chap. xvii. §. 2.) that this saint had been on the West side of the Shannon, and had formed some religious establishments, before he had settled at Roscrea. Harris was wrong in saying, that Cormac was the founder of the Church of Tomgrany. There was a church there very long before his time, and all he did was to build a new one.

(152) Tr. Th. p. 480 and 503. AA. SS. p. 107. at A. 950 (951).

(153) Colgan speaks of him (Tr. Th. p. 480.) as abbot of Hy, but elsewhere calls him abbot only of Derry.

(154) Above, §. 2.

(155) 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 500.) at A. 976 (977). The Annals of Ulster have at 958 (959) Dubhduin a comorban of Columbkil; but from this title it does not follow, that he was abbot of Hy. He was probably abbot of Derry and the immediate successor of St. Adhland.

(156) Tr. Th. ib. at A. 964 (965).

(157) Ib. Ind. Chron. adding a year to the dates.

(158) For Alild see ib. and p. 509. at A. 965 (966). According to some accounts we should admit six bishops of Lusk, in the 9th and 10th centuries, prior to Alild. Archdall has their names at Lusk. I find nothing about them in Colgan's works. For the bishops at Clonenagh see AA. SS. p. 356.

(159) See above §. 10. St. Bernard says in the Life of St. Malachy (cap. 7. al. 10.) that said family retained the see for about 200 years, after having observed that there were about 15 generations of them. If this is to be understood, as seems most probable, of natural generations, each of them must be computed as consisting of only 14 years. Some have supposed his meaning to be, that there were 15 successive bishops, or persons calling themselves bishops, of that family. Colgan has endeavoured (Tr. Th. p. 302.) to make out a catalogue of 15 bishops; but his list does not exactly agree with the catalogue from the Psalter of Cashel, as one of those, whom he mentions, is omitted in it.

(160) I agree with Colgan, (ib. p. 303.) that this is the most probable opinion, and that the chieftains of that tract seem to have claimed a right to the see as if an advowson of their family. He observes that said family of usurpers could not have been that of the Neills, or Mac Mahons, or Maguires, or O'Hanlons, as some had conjectured, whereas St. Bernard, who severely inveighs against it, states (Vit. S. Mal. cap. 8.) that it was extinct at the time he was writing.

(161) Above § 10.

(162) A predecessor of Joseph, Cathasach Mac-Robartach is also called Prince of Armagh. (See Chap. XXI. §. 13.) Ware thought, that this title was given to him merely as bishop. But if that were the reason of it, why was it not given likewise to every other bishop of that see? Or if it was given to indicate, as Mac Mahon states, (Jus Prim. Armac. §. 336.) the primatial prerogative, why has it been confined to no more than three prelates of Armagh? I think it much more probable, that it meant, according to its obvious signification, a person invested with civil authority, and that Cathasach, &c. were really chieftains of Armagh. Peter Talbot of Dublin, against whom Mac Mahon was arguing, says that the title of prince was given to those bishops in consequence of the usurpation of 15 generations, as St. Bernard calls it. But this is a mistake ; for Cathasach, who was not a usurper, and between whom and Joseph there were, at least, two bishops of Armagh, is marked by the same title. Nor can Joseph, the first bishop of that uninterrupted line and the successor of St. Maelbrigid, who was of a quite different family, (above §. 1.) be called a usurper, if we consider how highly he is praised in the Irish annals. Perhaps Maelpatrick deserves that appellation. I may here observe, that two bishops of Emly, Eugene Mac-Cenfeolad and Tiobruide, who are styled princes of Emly, (above §. 1 and 7.) were probably so called for a similar reason, i. e. as they might have been temporal lords of that district.

(163) St. Bernard writes; (ib. cap. 7. al. 10.) “ Et eo usque firmaverat sibi jus pravum, imo omni morte puniendam injuriam, generatio mala et adultera, ut, etsi interdum defecissent clerici de sanguine, illo, sed episcopi nunquam. Denique jam octo extiterant ante Celsum viri uxorati et absque ordinibus, literati tamen.” The archliar Toland, having quoted this passage (Nazarenus, Letter 2. §. 12.) adds, that the Irish clergy derived ordination from those lay, so called, archbishops. This he knew to be false. And as they had no orders themselves, how could they have conferred them on others.

(164) With regard to the points now alluded to the 4 Masters often differ from the catalogue of the Psalter of Cashel, and Colgan himself is very obscure, Tr. Th. p. 297. seqq. Nor do the Ulster annals sufficiently agree with that catalogue, which is nearly followed by Ware, yet with some variations. O’Flaherty in a long MS note (opposite to p. 319. Tr. Th.) has a catalogue of the bishops of Armagh taken from his unpublished and, I am afraid, lost work Ogygia Christiana. As to the series of the usurping bishops it is almost the same as that of Ware. According as we proceed, I shall touch upon some of these differences, without entering deeply into them, partly because they are scarcely worth the trouble of doing so, and partly because, as far as I can judge, not one of said catalogues is on the whole correct.

§. XIV. The great abuse of mere laymen calling themselves archbishops of Armagh did not begin in the early part of the usurpation, nor is there any appearance of it until the commencement of the eleventh century. Cathasach the second, who died in 957, (165) was a real bishop, and so was his successor Muredach Mac-Fergus, who is said to have held the see for nine years; after which he was deposed in 966. (166) After him was Dubdalethe the second, who died on the 2d of June, A. D. 998. in the 83d year of his age, and thirty-third of his consecration. (167) It is very remarkable, that Dubdalethe was elected in 989, by the Columbians both of Ireland and North Britain supreme ruler of all their monasteries; and hence he has been called comorban not only of St. Patrick but likewise of St. Columba. (168) Hence it appears, that the Columbians must have by this time departed from, or at least dispensed with, their primitive and long observed system of not allowing any one, except a priest, to be abbot of Hy or chief superior of the order. And in fact I find mentioned after Fiachra Hua Hartagain, who died in 977, a doctor and bishop Mugron, who, unless there be some mistake in the matter, is called abbot of Hy, and whose death is assigned to A. D. 979. (169) But neither among the former abbots, nor among those who lived after Dubdalethe, is there one to be found, who as long as he remained abbot was also a bishop.

St. Moelfinnian Mac Huactain was bishop of Kells in the latter half of this century. He is called also comorban of St. Ultan and of St. Carnech; and his death is assigned to 968. (170) Tuathal, bishop and abbot of Clonmacnois, died in 969. (171) as did also Daniel, bishop of Leighlin, and Eugene Mac-Cleirig, who is called bishop of Connaught, and hence supposed to have been of Tuam. (172) Becan Mac Lachtan, who died in 972, is styled comorban of St. Finnian of Clonard; but whether he was such as bishop or only as abbot, I shall not pretend to decide. (173) Mael-Kellach, bishop of Emly, having died in 957, was succeeded by Foelan, son of Cellaid, who lived until 981; and after him we find Cenfada, who died in 990. (174) The blessed Annchad, bishop of Kildare, died at an advanced age in 981, and his successor Muredach Mac-Flann in 986. (175) Columba Mac-Ciaracain, bishop of Cork, and perhaps the immediate successor of Cathmogán, who died in 961, lived until 990. (176) Prior to these prelates, I find at length, a bishop of Dromore, Maolbrigid Mac-Cathasagh, who died in 973. (177) Among the many ecclesiastics, who were killed in the course of this century by the Northmen, are mentioned, besides some already spoken of, the names of Bran Mac-Colman, abbot of Roscrea in 930; Ardmed, abbot of Coleraine, in 931; Suibhne Mac-Conbrettan, abbot of Slane, in 939; Tanud Mac-Uder, abbot of Bangor, in 957; Mured Mac-Foilán of the royal house of Leinster, and abbot of Kildare, in 966; Ferdalac, abbot of the island of Raghlin, in 974; and Maelkieran O'Maigne, abbot of Derry, who was cruelly put to death in 986 by the garrison consisting of Danes from Dublin. (178)

(165) Above, §. 10.

(166) The Cashel catalogue, which is followed by Ware, allows 9 years for Muredach, and thus his incumbency would have lasted until 966. But O'Flaherty says in the quoted MS. catalogue, that he resigned the see after seven years, and accordingly in 964, adding that he died in the 9th year of his consecration.

(167) Ware at Dubdalethe II. Here again O'Flaherty, in consequence of what he has about Muredach, differs from Ware, and assigns (ib.) the accession of Dubdalethe to 964, yet placing his death in 998 by allowing him 33 complete years of incumbency. The Cashel catalogue marks for him the number xxxiii; but its numbers are not always complete. The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 297.) have in these times two Dubdalethes, one, who is named at A. 988 (989), and appears as succeeded by two bishops, after whom comes also a Dubdalethe, whose death is assigned to 998. But from a circumstance which they mention of both Dubdalethes being called comorbans of Columbkil it is clear, that they were not different persons. O'Flaherty has made some MS. notes on these confused statements; but it is not worth while to trouble the reader with any thing further about them.

(168) See Tr. Th. ib. and p. 503. at A. 988 (989),

(169) Ib. p. 500 ad A. 978 (979). I strongly suspect, that there is a mistake in calling Mugron abbot of Hy. The title given to him in Smith's catalogue (Append. to Life of St. Col.) is Coarb (comorban) of Columbkil in Ireland and Scotland. He might have been abbot of Derry, and thus like some others, styled comorban of Columbkil; besides which place he might have governed a Columbian house in the mainland of Scotland. The title Comorban of St. Columba has been more than once misunderstood as meaning abbot of Hy, when in fact it applied merely to abbots of Derry, as, for instance, in the cases of St. Maelbrigid and St. Adhland. (See above Notes 10 and 153.) If Mugron was abbot of Derry, we shall have, as he was likewise a bishop, one more to add to the three bishops, whom we have met with there in the century we are now treating of. (See above §. 10.)

(170) Ib. p. 508 ad A. 967 (968). As to his being comorban of St. Ultan, this must refer to his having presided also over Ardbraccan either as bishop or abbot; and his being called comorban of St. Carnach shows, that he was abbot of Tulen, where a St. Carnech founded a monastery in the 5th or 6th century. (AA. SS. p. 783.) Harris has not this monastery; but it certainly existed and to a late period. Archdall, calling it Tuileim, (where he found this name I cannot tell) places it in the King's county. But it is clear from the Annals of Innisfallen, that it was somewhere not far distant from Kells. At A. 951. they reckon among other religious places, which Godfrid, son of Sitric, plundered, besides Kells, &c. Tullen as in that range of country; (see above §. 12.) and at A. 1170 they make mention of it as plundered and burned, together with Kells, Slane, &c. by Mac-Murrough and Strongbow. If I am not mistaken, it was the place now called Duleene or Dulane in the barony of Kells, and lying not far from the town of Kells on one side, nor from Killskyre on the other.

(171) Colgan, AA. SS. p. 106. from the Annals of Clonmacnois, and Ware, Bishops at Clonmacnois.

(172) Ware at Leighlin and Tuam.

(173) See the 4 Masters ap. AA. SS. p. 407. ad A. 971 (972). Ware (at Meath) reckons Becan among the bishops of Clonard in consequence of his being called comorban of Finnian. This deduction should be admitted, were it certain, as Ware supposed, that Finnian had been a bishop. But we have seen, (Chap. x. §. 5.) that this is rather a doubtful matter.

(174) Ware at Emly.

(175) Tr. Th. p. 630. at A. 980 (981) and 985 (986). Ware (at Kildare) has changed the date 980 into 981, but for what reason I know not, retained 985.

(176) Ware at Cork.

(177) AA. SS. p. 387. at A. 972 (973.) Ware (at Dromore) has not this bishop; but Harris makes mention of him.

(178) AA. SS. p. 107. I have added a year to each date.

§. xv. To the said century belonged a very distinguished saint, Dunchad O'Braoin. (179) He was of an illustrious family of the Nials, and born in the district called Breghmuine (now barony of Brawny) in Westmeath. He embraced the monastic state at Clonmacnois, where he made wonderful progress in piety and learning. Being very fond of retirement, and wishing to shun the applauses of men, he secreted himself as much as he could, leading the life of an anchorite. But on the death, in 969, of Tuathal, who had been both abbot and bishop of Clonmacnois, Dunchad was fixed upon as his successor to the abbacy, and being dragged from his retreat, was forced to accept of it. He was not, however, raised to the episcopacy, (180) but governed the monastery for some time merely as abbot, until, longing for a more retired state, he withdrew from the management of it, and, to be out of the way of the persons, by whom he was much admired in that part of Ireland, repaired to Armagh in the year 974 there to remain sequestered and unnoticed. But his reputation was soon spread throughout that city, and so much respect was paid to him that he determined on leaving it. His intention being discovered, the principal inhabitants deputed some venerable persons to request of him that he would stay with them for one year longer. He complied with their wish; but when at the end of the year he was bent on departing, a similar request was made, and so on annually, until at length he died there on the 16th of January, A. D. 987. It is said that through his prayers the Almighty restored to life an infant son of a woman, who, having left the dead child at the entrance of the saint's cell, retired apart so as not to be seen, hoping that he would pray for the infant's resuscitation, as in fact it is stated that he did. (181)

Several lecturers of various schools are named in the Irish annals as having died in the second half of this century, for instance, Colman of Kildare in 963; Cronmail of Tallaght in 965; Conchobar of Kildare in 966; Flann of Clonmacnois in 978; (182) Muredach Hua Flannagain of Armagh in 984; (183) Fogartach of Devenish in 985; Longsech of Clonmacnois in 989; Diermit of Kildare in 992; Dunchad O'Huactain of Kells in 993; and Odran of Clonmacnois in 995. (184) Hence, and from what we have seen heretofore, it is clear that learning continued to be cultivated during this whole period, notwithstanding its having been dreadfully troubled by almost constant wars between the Irish and the Danes, or between the Irish themselves. Amidst this havoc divers religious establishments were plundered by the Danes, and some even by the Irish while devastating the places where they were situated. The monastery of Devenish was pillaged by the Northmen or Danes in 962; (185) and either in the following year or in 964 those of Dublin ravaged Kildare unmercifully, making a great number of ecclesiastics and others captives, of whom very many were ransomed by Neill Oherluibh (186) In 968 and again in 969 Kells was plundered by the Leinster men and Danes united. (187) In 979 the people of Ossory burned Lismore, and plundered Cloyne and Leighlin. (188) They were punished not long after for these proceedings. Brian Bo-roimhe, then king of Munster, entered Ossory in 980, seized upon the prince Mac-giolla-Patrick (Fitzpatrick), and compelled all the chieftains of that country to give him hostages. (189) Brian had succeeded in 976 his gallant brother Mahon, who after having, together with Brian, defeated the Danes of Limerick, Cork, and Waterford on many occasions, particularly in the great battle of Sulchoid not far from Limerick A. D. 968, was murdered in said year 976 by some dynasts of the now county of Cork, although he was under the protection of Columba Mac-Ciaracain, bishop of Cork, who accordingly issued a malediction against all those, that were concerned in bringing about the king's death. (190) Another instance of the devastation of religious places was that of Hy by Northmen on Christmas eve in 986, on which occasion the abbot, whose name is not recorded, and fifteen of the elders were put to death. But in the following year those Northmen paid dearly for their atrocities, as 360 of them were killed, by whom, however, we are not particularly informed. (191) In 990 some Northmen plundered Derry, and again in 997, in which year the Danes of Dublin pillaged Kells, and in 999 also Kildare. (192) Other instances of similar depredations might be adduced; but these are sufficient to show, with what calamities Ireland was afflicted.

(179) Colgan has the Acts of this saint at 16 January from a short Life in the possession of Mac-Carthy Riabhach and from a still shorter one in the chronicle of Clonmacnois.

(180) Harris (Bishops at Clonmacnois) thought that Dunchad was also bishop there. For this opinion there is no foundation whatsoever, and some words, which he quotes from Colgan, prove nothing more than that Dunchad was placed over the monastery as abbot. Throughout his Acts, or wherever else he is spoken of, Dunchad is never called bishop, but merely abbot and anchoret. At Clonmacnois, as well as in some other great monastic institutions, the abbots were not always bishops, nor vice versa were the bishops regularly abbots. Thus Moeldar and his successor St. Corpreus, bishop of Clonmacnois, (see Chap. xxi. §. 15.) do not appear to have been abbots there; and Archdall, misquoting Colgan, was wrong in giving them that title, while he omitted their real ones.

(181) This miracle is alluded to by Tigernach, author of the Annals of Clonmacnois, who lived in the eleventh century. He says, that Dunchad was until his time the last of the Irish saints, through whose intercession God restored a dead person to life. (See Dunchad's Acts.)

(182) Tr. Th. p. 632. adding a year to the dates.

(183) Ib. p. 297. at A. 983. (984).

(184) Ib. p. 632. and Ind. Chron. adding a year, as usual.

(185) Ib. Ind. Chron. ad A. 961 (962).

(186) Ib. p. 630. ad A. 962 (963) The Annals of Innisfallen assign this devastation to A. 964.

(187) Ib. p. 508. at A. 967 (968) and 968 (969).

(188) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 978.

(189) Ib. at A. 980.

(190) Ib. at A. 976. For the battle of Sulchoid see ib. at A. 968, where it is stated, that three thousand of the Danes were killed, and Limerick afterwards burned and pillaged.

(191) See the 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 501) at A. 985 (986) and 986 (987).

(192) Ib. p. 503, 508, and 630. adding a year to the dates.

CHAP. XXIII.

Irish support their character for piety and learning, notwithstanding the troubles occasioned by the Danes—at the same time a priest could not be found in England capable of writing or translating a Latin letter—For the restoration of learning in England some erudite Irishmen formed a community at Glastonbury—St. Dunstan educated by them—St. Maccallin, an Irishman, in France—St. Cadroe, a British Scot, in France—Columbanus, an Irish abbot, dies in the monastery of Ghent—Duncan, an Irish bishop, distinguished in France—St. Maccallin founder of the monastery of Walciadorus—St. Forum, who had been archbishop of Armagh, became fourth abbot of Walciadorus and continued so till his death on 30th April, A.D. 982.—Several illustrious Irishmen who flourished on the Continent at that period—St. Fingen abbot of St. Felix at Metz—died in the year 1004—succeeded by his disciple Richard, dean of the diocese of Rheims—St. Gerard, an Irishman, bishop of Toul, gave in 985 a retreat in his diocese to some Greeks, who, mixed with Irishmen, performed the Church service in their own language—Succession of bishops in Ireland, particularly those of Armagh, Emly, and Cork—Deaths of several remarkable persons in Ireland—the Danes defeated in several battles by Brian Boroimhe—Brian compels the Lagenians to give him hostages—Maelseaghlain plunders the Dalcassians—Brian marches against him, and forces him to acknowledge his sovereignty over Leath Mhogha—After several battles with various success Maelseaghlain is dethroned and Brian becomes monarch of Ireland in the year 1001—Several acts of Brian—Total overthrow of the Danes, and death of Brian at the battle of Clontarf in 1014—Interment of Brian in Armagh—dispute between the Eugenian and Dalcassian tribes—Maelseachlain restored to the Monarchy—Interregnum under the government of Cuan O' Leochan the poet, and Corcran a clergyman—Christian religion gradually spread over the remaining Danes of Ireland—Maelmuire Machi Eochad, archbishop of Armagh, succeeded by Amalgaid, who was said to be a layman—Amalgaid's visitation of Munster—Dubdalethe III. succeeds Amalgaid—Deaths of several bishops—Several learned men who flourished in Ireland during this period—Deaths of several illustrious persons who had been distinguished for their learning, piety, &c.—Some Danes still continue to commit depredations on religious establishments in Ireland—Donatus first bishop of Dublin—Church of the Holy Trinity, Dublin, built—and endowed by Sitric, Danish king of Dublin—No proof that Donatus was consecrated by Lanfranc archbishop of Canterbury, as sometimes stated—See of Dublin confined to the city until the Synod of Kells under cardinal Papiro—Death of St. Gormgal, abbot of Ard-oilean.

SECT. I.

WHILE the Irish were struggling at home against the impediments, which the misfortunes of the times opposed to the cultivation of piety and learning, and while they upheld their character in these respects even during that century, which is usually called obscure, and indeed justly so, if we look to the corruption of morals and ecclesiastical discipline, and the shameful ignorance by which said century has been rendered infamous in some other parts of Europe, many of them highly distinguished themselves in foreign countries by their sanctity, Christian zeal, and knowledge, both sacred and literary. In that age we find numbers of them teaching in England, where after the death of Alfred down to the times of St. Dunstan, learning had so declined, owing, it seems, to the troubles caused by the Danes, that at length a priest could not be found capable of either writing or translating a Latin letter.

(1) The monastic institutions, which Alfred had endeavoured partly to restore, having ceased to exist, there were no public schools established in their stead, and hence it is not to be wondered at that ignorance became so universal. Some time before 940 it happened providentially for the restoration of learning, and consequently of religious improvement, that several Irishmen, remarkably skilled in every department of science and erudition sacred and profane, retired to Glastonbury, and there formed a community. For the purpose of contributing towards their support they received young noblemen under their care, whom they instructed in the liberal studies, and among others Dunstan the most celebrated of their pupils. With the help of these masters he acquired a great degree not only of classical and philosophical knowledge, but likewise of ecclesiastical learning, and remained with them until being well accomplished even in the fine arts, such as music, painting, &c. he was introduced by his uncle Athelm, archbishop of Canterbury, to the king Ethelstan. (3) The exertions of this great and holy man were afterwards of most essential service to religion and learning in England.

(1) Mabillon, Annal. Bened. at A. 940. from Spelman.

(2) Osbern, Life of St. Dunstan, ap. Wharton, Anglia Sacra, Vol. II. p. 91. Having observed that at said period the monastic observances were scarcely heard of in England, Osbern adds that, if any one wished to lead a life of mortification, he used to go to some foreign country. He then takes occasion to state that it had been and was in his time quite usual and, as it were, natural for the Irish to go on pilgrimages in foreign parts, and then treats of those who were settled at Glastonbury, &c. As the passage is curious, I shall here quote as much of it as is connected with the present subject; "Hicque mos cum plerosque tum vehementer adhuc manet Hibernos; quia, quod aliis bona voluntas in consuetudinem, hoc illis consuetudo vertit in naturam. Quorum multi atque illustres viri, divinis ac secularibus literis nobiliter eruditi, dum relicta Hibernia in terra Anglorum peregrinaturi venissent, locum habitationis suae Glestoniam delegerunt, propterea quod esset a civili multitudine sequestratus, et humanis usibus accommodus, et (quod maxime affectabant peregrini) Patricii religiosa veneratione gloriosus.—Cum ergo hi tales viri talibus de causis Glestoniam venissent, nec tamen quicquid sibi necessarium erat sufficientissime in loco reperissent, suscipiunt filios nobilium liberalibus studiis imbuendos; ut, quod minus ad usum loci ubertas exhiberet, eorum quos docebant liberalitate redundaret. Adest ergo nobilissimus in Christo puer Dunstanus, inter alios unus, immo prae aliis solus, ubi paullo diligentius quam imbecilla aetas ferre posset literarum studio intentus," &c. Then he tells us how Dunstan fell sick, &c. This, by the bye, was not the first time, in which there were distinguished Irishmen at Glastonbury; many of them had been there long before.

(3) See Mr. Lingard's Anglo-Saxon church, ch. 12.

§. II. St. Maccallin, or, as some call him, Maccallan, Malcallin, or Malcallan, an Irishman, was in France, together with St. Cadroc and some others, in, it seems, 945 or 946 (4) His history is much connected with that of St. Cadroe, on which accordingly, although he was not an Irish but a British Scot, I must say a few words. (5) Cadroe was of the royal house of the Scots of North Britain, and was placed at an early age under the direction of a very pious relative, named Bean, who instructed him in religion and watched over his morals. When grown up, it was thought adviseable to give him what would be now called a university education; and, as there were then no schools in Scotland, in which it could be acquired, Bean sent him to Armagh. (6)

There he applied himself to the classical and philosophical studies, including natural history, astronomy, &c. and, as he was gifted with a fine genius, became a great proficient in them. Having finished his literary and scientific course he recrossed the sea, (7) and returned to his cousin Bean. Being full of zeal for the instruction of his countrymen, he set about teaching them so as to form school-masters for every part of Scotland, all of whom were indebted to him for their knowledge. (8) While Cadroe was thus employed in teaching what are called the liberal arts, without thinking of retiring from the world, it is said that both he and Bean had visions, in which it was announced that he should quit his native country, remove to foreign parts, and exercise himself in monastic discipline, as it was the will of God that he should become the spiritual father of others. He determined on obeying the summons, and was preparing to set out, when the people of every condition, and even the king Constantine (9) requested him not to leave his country, remonstrating with him on the injury which his departure would cause to all Scotland, where he was doing so much good. These expostulations made such an impression on him, that he delayed for some time; but afterwards returning to his former determination he opposed all their exertions to detain him, until at length it was agreed upon to let him go abroad and even to supply him with money, clothes, horses, and every thing necessary for his journey. Having passed the frontiers of the then Scottish kingdom, he entered the British one of Cumbria lying to the south of the Clyde, (10) where he was very kindly received by its king Dovenald, (11) a relation of his, who, having kept him for some time at his court, conducted him to the city of Loida, situated at the boundary of the Cumbrians and Normans, where Cadroe was received by Gunderic, a nobleman, who accompanied him to York and introduced him to the king Eric, whose wife was related to him. (12) Thence he went to London, and proceeded to Winchester, where he was treated with honour by king Edmund, who got him conducted to a harbour called Hymen. After some delay there caused by bad weather, he sent back to Scotland some of his companions, among whom was a nephew of his, and having embarked arrived safely at Boulogne. Thence he went to St. Fursey's monastery of Peronne, where he prayed to God that he would, through the merits of St. Fursey, point out to him a place, where he should stop. On the following night the saint appeared to him in a vision and told him, that he must go to some other spot.

(4) Colgan has made up some Acts for St. Maccalin, or as he names him, Malcallan, at 21 January. The Bollandists treat of him at said day. There is an account of him also in the Acta Bened. Sec. v. p. 548. He is expressly called an Irishman, natione Hibernus in the Appendix to the chronicle of Frodoard at A. 978. and in the Anglican martyrology; and that he was the Bollandists maintain, both at 21 January and 6 March, in their observations on the Life of St. Cadroe, where they state that the Scotch have no argument in favour of making him their countryman. Yet in the Benedictine account, either by Dachory or Mabilion, it is said that he was rather a British than an Irish Scot, notwithstanding the authority of the Appendix to Frodoard there quoted. For this opinion no reason is assigned, nor, I believe, could there, except that Maccallin happened to be in France together with Cadroe, who was certainly a native of N. Britain. But this, as will be soon seen, is far from affording any proof of it. As to the time of Cadroe's arrival in France, it is universally allowed that it was about 945.

(5) There is a rather large Life of St. Cadroe, or Cathroe, as Colgan thought he ought to be called, written by one Reiman or Ousman, seemingly a French or German monk, not very long after the saint's death. It has been published by Colgan at 6 March, at which day it is also in the collection of the Bollandists, who omitted as useless some stuff in the beginning of it relative to certain migrations of the primitive Scots. Thence it was republished in the Acta Bened. Sec. v. Colgan has lost his time in endeavouring to show, that Cadroe was an Irish Scot, whereas it is quite clear that he was a British one; and accordingly he is considered as such by the Bollandists and Mabillon.

(6) It is remarked by Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 944.) that the reason, why Cadroe was sent to Armagh, was that studies were at that time neglected in Scotland. Compare with Not. 27 to Chap. xx.

(7) Aequore remenso. (Life, cap: 12.) Colgan struggles to explain these words as if meaning, that he sailed on a lake or crossed the Shannon on his return to some part of Ireland, in which as Colgan imagined, his relatives lived. But the author of the Life understood Latin sufficiently well not to call a lake or a river aequor.

(8) It is observed in the Life, (ib) by allusion to the words of St. Paul I Cor. iv. 15. that, although Scotland might have thousands of pedagogues yet it had not many fathers, whereas Cadroe was the person, who begat them; in disciplinis enim artium hic illos genuit; and that from the time of his arrival (or return to his country) none of the wise men had crossed the sea but still lived in Ireland. This is marked to prove, that Cadroe was then the only great teacher in Scotland. It is strange, that Colgan could, with such circumstances before his eyes, have persisted in making Cadroe an Irishman, and living and teaching in Ireland; as if there had not been numberless great masters or fathers in Ireland for centuries before Cadroe was born, or as if he could have been called the only father in Ireland, while the very persons or fathers, by whom he himself had been taught, at Armagh, not to mention so many others elsewhere, were still alive.

(9) This was Constantine III. son of Ethus, who, having resigned the throne in 943, became superior of the Culdees of St. Andrews. (Buchanan, Rev. Scot. ad Reg. 75. and Usher, Intd. Chron. ad A. 943.) Colgan strives to get rid of this argument in favour of Cadroe having been a British Scot by introducing a Constantine O'Neill, who was chieftain of Inishowen some time in the tenth century; as if Inishowen could be supposed to be a large kingdom, such as the author of the Life alludes to.

(10) Compare with Not. 74 to Chap. xxi.

(11) This Dovenald was the king, whom old English writers call Dunmail, and whose country the English king Edmund made over to Malcolm I. king of the British Scots in 946, and accordingly after Cadroe had travelled through it. (See Usher, p. 664 and Ind. Chron. at A. 946.) What Colgan has concerning him is so confused, that it is not worth remarking upon.

(12) Life, cap. 17. In this narrative there are some points well worthy the attention of British antiquaries. As it is not my business to enlarge on them, I shall only observe that the people called by the author Normans were the Northumbrians, who were then ruled by Norman or Danish kings, of whom Eric was one.

§. III. Not far distant from Peronne there lived a pious, wealthy, and noble matron, named Hersendis, who was very kind to pilgrims. On hearing that some such persons had arrived in her neighbourhood, she sent to them requesting that they would call to see her. They complied with her wish, and on conversing with her said that all they wanted was a retired place, where living by their labour they might serve God. She then gladly showed them a spot in the forest called Theorascensis near the river Oise in the diocese of Laon and adjoining the frontiers of Hainault, (13) and where there was a church under the name of St. Michael. They liked the place, and Hersendis got the church enlarged and habitations erected for their use. Among these pilgrims, who in all were thirteen, was Maccallin, a man of superior goodness, (14) and whose name now occurs for the first time. Where he met with Cadroe we are not informed, nor whether he had travelled with him all the way from Scotland, although it is not improbable that he had. (15) For there was a great intercourse between the Scots of Ireland and those of N. Britain, so that many of the former were to be found in the latter country, and vice versa. Wheresoever these two worthy men first met, they and their companions being settled at St. Michael's, it was proposed to appoint a superior, and Cadroe was fixed upon for that purpose. But, as he could not be induced to accept of that office, Maccallin was then compelled to submit to it. Having lived for some time in this manner, assisted by the munificence of Hersendis, Maccallin and Cadroe were seized with a desire to become Benedictine monks. For the attainment of this object they were helped by Hersendis, who directed Maccallin to Gorzia, a monastery in the diocese of Metz, recommending him to the abbot Agenald, and Cadroe to the celebrated monastery of Fleury sur Loire, then governed by Erchembald a very religious man. When Maccallin had received the monastic habit, Hersendis sent to Agenald, requesting that he would permit him to proceed to the place, which had been already intended for him. This place was Walciodorus, now Vassor, near the Meuse between Dinant and Givet, where Eilbert, the husband of Hersendis, had erected a monastery about A. 945, and about the same time that Hersendis had formed the establishment of St. Michael's. (16) Maccallin, on his return, was placed as abbot over Walciodorus, still retaining the management of St. Michael's. Having sent for Cadroe, he appointed him prior of the monastery. After some time Maccallin, finding that the direction of two establishments was too much for his strength, begged of Cadroe to become abbot of Walciodorus. With great difficulty Cadroe agreed to this proposal, having been pressed to do so by Otho, king of Germany, who was afterwards emperor. This occurred about 950. (17) Cadroe was afterwards abbot of the monastery of St. Clement, alias St. Felix at Metz, and died A. D. 975 or 976, after the 70th year of his age and 30th of his peregrination or abode in a foreign country. (18) He was buried in the church of his monastery at Metz, and his memory was revered on the 6th of March.

Maccallin, having returned to St. Michael's in the forest Thearascensis, spent the remainder of his life there until his death on the 21st of January in the year 978. He was buried in the church of St. Michael, and his name is mentioned with great praise by old writers and in various martyrologies. (19)

(13) See Bollandus at 21 January, where he treats of St. Maccallin. Colgan was mistaken in assigning that place to the diocese of Verdun.

(14) Life of St. Cadroe, cap. 20.

(15) The author of Cadroe's Life calls (ib.) Maccallin a companion of Cadroe's pilgrimage. This may seem to insinuate, that they had gone together from Scotland. Yet they might have first met in England, or perhaps in France, where many Irishmen were then to be found; and in either hypothesis Maccallin might still be called a companion of Cadroe's pilgrimage (peregrinatio), which, strictly speaking, did not begin until they were settled, as pious foreigners, at St. Michael's. For, as far as I have been able to observe, the acceptance of peregrinatio, which so often occurs in lives of saints of those times, is not so much travelling as living for pious motives in a foreign land. For instance in the passage from Osbern, (above Not. 2.) the words, relicta Hibernia in terra Anglorum prepergrinaturi venissent, plainly mean that the persons there alluded to left Ireland for the purpose of leading a life of peregrination, that is, absence from their own country, in England. Our English word, pilgrimage, does not exactly correspond with the peregrinatio of the writers of the middle ages.

(16) See the Bollandists at St. Cadroe, 6 March.

(17) Ib.

(18) Life of St. Cadroe cap. 25. Compare with Mabillon, Observ. pract. at said Life in Acta Bened. Sec. v.

(19) We read in the Appendix to Frodoard's chronicle; "Anno 978 vir Domini Malcallinus natione Hibernicus in vigilia S. Vincentii Levitae et martyris vitam transitoriam, quam habebat exosam, deseruit, et cum Domino, cui indesinenter, dum adhuc viveret, serviverat, vivere feliciter inchoavit. Qui praefatus abbas in corpore humatus quiescit in ecclesia B. Michaelis archangeli, cujus abbatiam, dum corporaliter in hoc seculo maneret, pio mo-

deramine rexit." The words vir Domini, or as in the MS. vir dni, have been mistaken for Virduni, and hence some have said that Macallin was abbot of St. Michael's at Verdun, and that he died in that town. But there was no such monastery at Verdun. In a history of the foundation of Walciodorus it is mentioned, that he died in 990; but the other is the true date and is followed by the Bollandists and Benedictines.

§. 4. An Irish abbot, named Columbanus, shut himself up and became a recluse on the 2d of February, A.D. 957, in the cemetery of the monastery of Ghent, and remained there until his death on the 15th of February in 959. (20) Whether the monastery, which he had governed, was in Ireland or in the continent, is not sufficiently known; but it is universally allowed that he was an Irishman. (21) His remains are in St. Bavo's church at Ghent, and his memory is famous in Belgium, where his name occurs among those of other saints in a litany of the Belgic churches. Israel, an Irish bishop, but I know not of what diocese, (22) lived in the eastern part of France during the first half of the 10th century. He assisted at a synod held at Verdun in 947, (23) at which was present also the celebrated Bruno, brother of the king, and afterwards emperor Otho. Bruno was then abbot, but a few years later became archbishop of Cologne. One of the masters of this great and learned prelate was Israel, concerning whom I do not find any further account. Duncan, likewise an Irish bishop, was distinguished as a teacher in France some time in the said century. It is not known whether he was consecrated there or in Ireland. He taught in the monastery of St. Remigius at Rheims, (24) and wrote for the use of his students a Commentary on the nine books of Martianus Capella on the liberal arts, in the title of which he is called an Irish bishop. A copy of this work was transcribed by one Gifardus, and was in the library of said monastery, but is now among the royal

MSS. in the British Museum. Duncan wrote also Observations on the first book of Pomponius Mela on the situation of the earth, which likewise are still extant. (25)

St. Forannan, (26) who had been consecrated at Armagh bishop of a place, called Domnach-mor, arrived at Walciodorus 23 years later than St. Maccallin had become its abbot, and accordingly in 970, reckoning from 947 the year, in which, according to every appearance, Maccallin, Cadroe, and some Irish monks began to live there. (27) It is therefore a great mistake to suppose, as some writers have done, that Forannan had been in that place before Maccallin, and that he was the founder of the monastery. (28) From what we have seen above it is evident, that Macallin was the first abbot of Walciodorus, who, on his resignation, was succeeded by Cadroe in about 950. On Cadroe's removing to Metz in 954 or 955 he left an abbot there, whose name is unknown, but who is said to have permitted a relaxation of discipline. After his death Forannan was appointed abbot. (29) Thus Forannan was, in fact, the fourth abbot of Walciodorus, which he governed until his death on the 30th of April in 982, (30) having re-established the vigour of monastic discipline, and left a great reputation for sanctity.

(20) Colgan treats of this St. Columbanus at 2 February, and the Bollandists more probably at 15 of said month.

(21) Dempster, with his usual effrontery, making him a Scotchman and a writer, says that he always lived in Scotland, and refers to Molanus, who has not a word of what that liar pretended to take from him. (See AA. SS. p. 238.) The Belgic writers agree that he was a native of Ireland. By them he is called abbas Hibernicis, without telling us whether in Ireland or elsewhere; but Menard understood that appellation as meaning, that he had been an abbot in Ireland.

(22) Fleury in one place (Hist. Eccl. L. 55. §. 35.) calls him a bishop of Great Britain, and in another (ib. §. 43.) a Scotch bishop, eveque Ecossois. But the Benedictine authors of the Histoire Letteraire, who were better acquainted with the history of those times, expressly state, (Tom. vi. p. 305.) that he was an Irish bishop.

(23) Fleury, ib. §. 35.

(24) Dr. Ledwich very learnedly brings (Ant. &c. p. 165.) the monastery of St. Remigius to Down, and makes Duncan teach there. There was no monastery of St. Remigius in Ireland. But the Doctor, or some one before him, had stumbled on a passage in Usher (Pr. p. 910, or London ed. 472.) where he speaks of this work of Duncan, alias Dunchat, as being in the library of the church of Worcester with the following title; “Commentum Dunchat pontificis Hibernicensis, quod contulit suis discipulis in monasterio S. Remigii douns, super astrologia Martiani Capellae Varronis.” Usher left this title, as he found or thought he found it, imagining, as appears from his making d a capital letter, that douns was a local or proper name. Thence it was deduced, that it meant Down in Ireland. But there can be no doubt, that douns is an erratum for docens, which I should rather ascribe to the copyist of said title than to Usher’s being mistaken in the spelling of the words as he met with it.

(25) See Histoire Letteraire, Tom. vi. p. 549. and Warton’s History of English poetry, Vol. II. p. 75.

(26) The Bollandists have a Life of St. Forannan at 30 April, and from them it has been republished in the Acta Ben. Sec. v. p. 586 seqq.

(27) See the Bollandists, Notes at St. Forannan, ib. p. 819, 820.

(28) Among others Colgan fell into this mistake, and promised to prove at 30 April, that Forannan had preceded Maccallin. (See AA. SS. p. 153 and 238.) How he could have endeavoured to prove it I do not know, as he did not live long enough to publish Forannan’s Life at said day.

(29) See the Bollandists, ib. and p. 808. and at St. Cadroe, 6 Mart. p. 471.

(30) This is the date marked for it by Mabillon, (Annal. Ben. ad A. 982.) and, as it is probably the true one, further inquiries may be omitted.

§ v. About these times there was also an Irish monastery at Cologne. Warinus, archbishop of Cologne, built or repaired a monastery of the Scots (Irish) in an island of the Rhine near the city, over which he placed Mimborin, who is said to have governed it for fifteen years. (31) Marianus Scotus says, that in 975 Erberger, archbishop of Cologne, made over to the Scots, for ever, this monastery called St. Martin's, and that its first abbot was Mimborin, a Scotus, who presided over it for twelve years, reckoning, I suppose, from the date of the perpetual grant made by Erberger. Accordingly Mimborin's death, which occurred on the 18th of July, must be assigned either to 987, or, if the twelve years were not complete, to 986. (32) He was succeeded by Kilian likewise an Irishman, after whom, as it was an Irish establishment, we find it governed by St. Helias, (33) who had belonged to the monastery of Monaghan, and of whom more will be seen elsewhere.

A very celebrated Irish abbot was Fingen, (34) who succeeded St. Cadroc as abbot of St. Felix, alias St. Clement, at Metz, in about the year 976. Besides the government of this monastery he was invested also with that of St. Symphorian, likewise at Metz, in the year 991. This old abbey was rebuilt by Adalbero II. then bishop of Metz, who, having a great esteem for Fingen, placed him over it, and, with the assistance of the empress dowager Adelhaid a protectress of Fingen and the Irish Benedictines, and grandmother of Otho III. as yet only king, obtained from this sovereign a confirmation of the rights and possessions of this establishment on condition, that the Irishman Fingen, its first abbot, and his successors, should not have any other than Irish monks as long as they could be found, but, in case they could not, allowing the admittance of monks of any other nation; and that prayers should be constantly offered there for the king's soul, those of his parents, and of the then bishop and his successors. This deed was signed by the king at Frankfort on the 25th of January, A. D. 992, in the ninth year of his reign. (35) Not long after Fingen was sent to re-establish the monastery of St. Peter and St. Vitonus, now St. Vannes, at Verdun, where he fixed some Irish monks, of whom seven were there under his direction, when the celebrated Richard, dean of the diocese of Rheims, and Frederic, who had been count of Verdun, applied to him in 1001 for permission to become members of this house. (36) As they were persons of high rank in the world, he was at first loth to receive them, being afraid that they would not put up with the poverty and discipline of the monastery. At length, however, he complied with their request, (37) and instructed and trained them so well, that they became, especially Richard, two of the greatest and most useful men of their times. St. Fingen died in the year 1004, and was succeeded by his holy disciple Richard. (38) There is a short letter of his, still extant, in the library of St. Remigius of Rheims, to Fastradis a nun, concerning a monk named Guilier (39)

To this account of Irish ecclesiastics distinguished in foreign countries during the tenth century, I shall add only a curious circumstance related of St. Gerard, bishop of Toul, who in 986 gave a retreat in his diocese to several Greeks, who, mixed with Irishmen, performed the Church service in their own language, and according to the Greek rite. (40) Hence we see, that the Irish still continued to cultivate Greek literature.

(31) Mabillon, ib. ad A. 974.

(32) Florence of Worcester places it in 986.

(33) See Mabillon, loc. cit. and Colgan AA. SS. p. 107.

(34) Colgan treats of St. Fingen at 5 February. His account of him is very imperfect. The Bollandists have omitted him, placing him among the Praetermissi at 5 February, and observing that Colgan had not a sufficient reason for giving him the title of beatus, as he had found him called only virtuosus. But the Fingen, styled virtuosus, was in all probability different from the one we are now treating of; nor did Colgan state that they were the same, although the cause of his placing St Fingen at 5 February was, that the name of a Fingen, the virtuous son of Odran Fedhla, occurs at said day in some Irish calendars. Mabillon did not scruple to consider Fingen as a saint, and often speaks of him as a most religious man, ex. c. Annal. Ben. ad A. 1001. And the authors of the Histoire Letteraire expressly call him St. Fingen an Irishman, &c. (Tom. vi. p. 437.) where they tell us, that there was a large account of him in a Life of Thierrî, bishop of Metz, which unfortunately has been lost.

(35) Colgan, having got a copy of this diploma from the archives of the church of Metz through the kindness of Meuris, bishop of that see, has annexed it to the Acts of Fingen. It begins thus; “ In nomine sanctae et individuae Trinitatis, Otto divina favente clementia rex.” After three or four lines it proceeds; “ Quapropter omnium fidelium nostrorum praesentium scilicet et futurorum noverit industria, quomodo Adalbero Metensis ecclesiae venerabilis episcopus ad nos venit, dicens quod abbatiam quamdam, foras muros Metis civitatis sitam, jam longo tempore destructam, pro Dei amore et sancti Symphoriani martyris noviter coepit reaedificare, humiliter deprecans nostram excellentiam, ut eandem abbatiam cum suis pertinentiis nostrae autoritatis praeceptione confirmemus. Nos vero ob interventum dilectae aviae nostrae, Adalheidis videlicet imperatricis Augustae, piaie petitioni illius benignum assensum praebentes, eidem abbatae S. Symphoriani omnia loca a regibus, vel imperatoribus, vel aliis religiosis personis antea unquam tradita, vel qua iam ipse dilectus Adalbero episcopus illic moderno tempore adauxit et adhuc addere desiderat, aliorumque Dei fidelium bona adiungere studuerit, regia denuo nostra munificentia donamus, atque confirmamus, ea videlicet ratione, ut abbas primus nomine Fingenius Hiberniensis natione, quem ipse praelibatus episcopus nunc temporis ibi constituit, sui que successores Hibernienses monachos, habeant, quamdiu sic esse poterit; et si defuerint ibi monachi de Hibernia, de quibuscumque nationibus semper ibi monachi habeantur; et nostri nominis, animaeque nostrae, parentumque nostrorum, et praesentis episcopi successorumque illius memoria ibi nunquam deficiat." Then after a few words comes the signature, &c. See also Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 991. Fleury could not have seen these Annals at the time he was writing the history of those times; but it is odd, that he seems to have been ignorant of the now quoted diploma, whereas otherwise he would not (Liv. 58. §. 60.) have called Fingen an Ecossois, Scotchman. Mabillon adds, that Otho confirmed also the possessions, &c. of the monastery of St. Felix.

(36) Mabillon ib. and at A. 1001.

(37) An anonymous author of a Life of Richard pretends, that on his and Frederic's first going to Fingen's monastery of St. Vannes they did not find the regular observance, which they expected to see, and that they went to Clugni to consult St. Odilo on what they should do, who, however, advised them to return thither, as they accordingly did. Mabillon (ib. at A. 1001.) rejects this story about the defect of regular observance, and shows that Fingen was a very holy man, who could not be deficient in enforcing regularity. And, in fact, following the story itself, would Odilo have counselled them to place themselves under Fingen, were his discipline not strict? Fleury (loc. cit.) picked up this story among other mistakes concerning Fingen and his Irish monks, whom he calls Ecossois. His saying that Odilon sent Richard and Frederic back to St. Vannes under the persuasion, that they would reform the establishment, is a poor evasion; for how could they expect to do so, while they remained simple monks? The truth is, that Richard's and Frederick's reason for having consulted Odilo was, that on their first going to Verdun they found another monastery there lately founded by bishop Wigfrid, which seemed to them more convenient, although the monastic observance was not as regular as in Fingen's of St. Vannes, which was small and deficient in buildings. On applying to Odilo to learn from him which they should prefer, he gave them the above mentioned advice.

(38) Mabillon, ib. ad A. 1004. Another mistake of Fleury, (loc. cit.) is his stating, that Fingen died about three months after he had received Richard into the monastery. He should have said, about three years; for Richard's reception was in 1001. It is singular, that in the Irish annals the death of a Fingen, called abbot of Roscrea, is marked at A. 1005. (AA. SS. p. 258.) The date comes so near that of the death of St. Fingen, that it might be suspected they were one and the same person. Might it be that Fingen had gone from Roscrea to superintend the establishment of St. Felix at Metz? The day of his death was probably the 8th of October, at which he is praised in the Necrologium of St. Clement of Metz, as abbot, &c. and buried in its church.

(39) Mabillon, ib.

(40) Histoire Letteraire, Tom. vi. p. 638.

§. VI. Cenfada, bishop of Emly, who died in 990, (41) was succeeded by Columba Mac-Lagenan, who held the see until 1003. After him was Serbrethae, who lived until 1027. (42) From these times forward we find what appears to be a regular account of the succession in the see of Cork; and accordingly it is very probable, that Columba Mac-Ciaracain, who died in 990, (43) had as immediate successor Cellaeh Hua-Sealbaugh, a very wise and learned man, who, having lived to a great age, died, it is said, in pilgrimage A. D. 1026. (44) Dubdalethe II. archbishop of Armagh, who died in 998, (45) was succeeded by Muregan, who after three years' incumbency, or rather in the third year, resigned the see in 1001. (46) He had made a visitation of the northern parts of Ireland, and in his stead was placed Maelmury, that is, servant of Mary, the son of Eochad, while, according to another account, the Maelmury, his immediate successor, was the son of Scanlan (47) Be this as it may, Maelmur, the son of Eochad, was certainly archbishop of Armagh, and he is usually said to have held the see for 19 years. (48) His death, which occurred on the 3d of June, A. D. 1020, is supposed to have been caused by grief for the destruction of a great part of the city by fire in said year. (49) This prelate is spoken of in terms of high approbation, being styled the head of the clergy of western Europe, the chief of the holy orders of the West, and a most wise Doctor. (50) Hence it is clear that he was not, as some have imagined, one of those lay usurpers, who arrogated to themselves the title of archbishop of Armagh, but really in holy orders and a real bishop. (50) There is some reason to think, that Amalgaid, who is called his successor, belonged to that class; but of this more hereafter. Maelbrigid, Hua-Rimed, abbot of Hy, died in 1005, and was, it seems, succeeded by Flann-Abhra, who lived until 1025 or 1026. (52)

Some persons, eminent for piety or learning, are marked as having died in the early part of the eleventh century. Aengus abbot of Aghaboe, who had retired to Armagh, died there in 1004. (53) To the same year is assigned the death of Eochad O'Flanagan, the chief and best antiquary of Ireland; (54) but where he lived or died I do not find recorded. Aidus or Aedh, abbot of Trefot (Trevet in Meath not far from Tara) had also retired to Armagh. He is called a scholastic or lecturer, bishop, and wise man. Having led a very holy life he died in 1005, and was buried there with great honour. (55) Muredach Mac-Crichan, a comorban of St. Columba and St. Adamnan, that is, abbot of Derry and Raphoe, died also at Armagh on the 28th of December, A. D. 1011. in the 74th year of his age. He was a bishop, and lecturer of theology at Armagh. Owing to his great reputation, his remains were deposited with great solemnity near the great altar in the cathedral of that city. (56) In the next year a great pestilence broke out at Armagh, which raged from All-saints day until May following, and carried off Kennfaelad of Saball or Saul, a bishop and anchoret, Maelbrigid Mac-an-Gobhann, a lecturer of Armagh, Scholag-Mac-Clerchen, a distinguished priest, and a vast number of elders and students. (57)

(41) See Chap. xxii. §. 14.

(42) Ware, Bishops at Emly. Harris has inserted between Columba and Serbrethae a bishop Cormac Hua-Finn, but without sufficient authority. He is called by the 4 Masters, who mark his death at 1020, (ap. AA. SS. p. 360.) merely the most erudite bishop of the Momonians. It does not hence follow, that he was bishop of Emly, as the words seem to mean nothing more than that he was a very learned man and bishop somewhere in Munster, or that he was the most learned of the Momonians. Ware's catalogue of the prelates of Emly, which is well kept up, must not be departed from on slight grounds.

(43) Chap. xxii. §. 14.

(44) This is the date marked by Ware, Bishops at Cork. In Colgan's text (AA. SS. p. 335.) The date is, as if from the 4 Masters 1036. This is probably a typographical error. At any rate it is wrong; for there were other bishops of Cork between Cellach's death and 1036. The 4 Masters do not mention his dying in pilgrimage, but call him bishop, comorban of St Barr, &c.

(45) Chap. xxii. §. 14.

(46) The catalogue from the Psalter of Cashel allows for Muregan three, seemingly incomplete, years, not four as Harris says in his additions to Ware. Colgan thought (Tr. Th. p. 302.) that Muregan was one of the lay usurpers not really bishops. (See Chap. xxii. §. 13.) But his argument is a very poor one. He met with a Muredach, prior of Armagh, who is called son of Muregan, and who died in 982 or 983. He then supposed that this Muregan was the same as the one styled archbishop. Might not there have been divers Muregans? Or why suppose, that a man, who died in 982, was the son of a person, who was not called archbishop of Armagh until 998, and who, after he had resigned, lived until 1006? Or admitting that the archbishop Muregan was the father of said Muredach, will it follow that he was still a layman in 998? The fact is, that it is impossible to identify all those laymen so called archbishops. I believe that they were chiefly among those, whose names do not occur in the Cashel catalogue, but who are mentioned by the 4 Masters.

(47) The 4 Masters have both these Maelmurs, as bishops of Armagh, placing the son of Scanlan before the other. (See Tr. Th. p. 297, 298.) In the Cashel catalogue only one Maelmur is mentioned without the addition of his father's name. Ware omits the son of Scanlan, as does also O'Flaherty in his MS. catalogue (at Tr. Th. p. 319.) Yet it is highly probable, that he was for some time in possession of the see; and perhaps he was one of the lay usurpers. The dates marked for him and for some others under the title of bishops of Armagh by the 4 Masters, are so confused, that they cannot be reconciled with those of the Cashel catalogue or of Ware, &c. They have also one Hermedac, whom they call bishop and scribe of Armagh, and whom they assign to part of the time, during which, according to others, Maelmur son of Eochad was the actual bishop.

(48) The Cashel catalogue marks 19 years for Maelmur simply so called. The Maelmur meant in it was, in all appearance, the son of Eochad. If there was any other bishop, or person called bishop of Armagh during part of these 19 years, it might have overlooked them.

(49) Ware (at Maelmur) assigns his death to 1021; but it must have been in 1020, whereas it is marked by the 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 298.) at this year, as having fallen on the Friday before Pentecost. Now in the year 1020 Pentecost or Whitsunday, was on the 5th of June. In said year about a month earlier that great fire happened, in which the cathedral and some other churches, besides a great number of houses and much property, were consumed. Yet, according to the 4 Masters, it was not universal as Ware says; for in one of the four quarters of the city the only edifice destroyed was the library.

(50) 4 Masters, ib.

(51) Colgan striving (Tr. Th. p. 302) to find the eight married laymen so called bishops among the persons mentioned in the Cashel catalogue, reckons as one of them, Maelmur, son of Eochad. And why? Because Dubdalethe III. whose accession was in 1049, is called son of one Maelmur. But was the son of Eochad the only Maelmur in Ireland? And, supposing that Dubdalethe III. was the son of a man called bishop, might not his father have been the Maelmur son of Scanlan? (See Not. 47.) It is odd, that Colgan could have supposed that the son of Eochad was not in holy orders, notwithstanding his having been distinguished by the title of chief of the holy orders, &c. Ware did not follow Colgan in his hypothesis concerning this Maelmur and Dubdalethe III.; but Harris has added something relative to it.

(52) Tr. Th. p. 501. at A. 1004 (1005) and 1025 the date of the 4 Masters, not 1015 as appears ib. through an erratum. Smith (App. to Life of St. Columba) has copied this mistake. I am doubtful whether 1025 ought to be changed into 1026; for about these times the 4 Masters begin not to differ as much as usual from the generally received Christian era. Thus we have seen (Not. 49) that their date 1020 for the death of bishop Maelmur is correct; whereas those of a few years earlier are sometimes not so, for instance, that for the battle of Clontarf, which they assign to A. 1013, although it is certain that said battle was fought in 1014.

(53) Ib. p. 297 ad A. 1003 (1004).

(54) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1004.

(55) Tr. Th. p. 297 ad A. 1004 (1005).

(56) Ib. and p. 298 ad A. 1010 (1011).

(57) Ib. ad A. 1011 (1012).

§. VII. Meanwhile a great political change had taken place in Ireland. Hitherto we have seen the monarchy of all Ireland retained in the house of the Nialls of one branch or another down to Mael-seachlin II. whose reign began in 980. (58) Between this sovereign and Brian Boromhe, who became king of Munster in 976, (59) various wars had been carried on, in which Brian was generally victorious. Sometimes, however, they united against the Danes, or against other enemies. Brian was perpetually engaged in humbling his opponents. In 977 he defeated the Danes of Limerick at Inniscathy, plundered all the islands which they possessed in the Shannon, and overthrew with dreadful slaughter in Hy-figente (in the now county of Limerick) Donovan dynast of that territory and his allies the Danes of Munster. In this battle Auliffe, king of those Danes, and Donovan were killed. In 978 the Eugenians, who opposed him as being a Dalcassian, having joined against him under Maolmhuadh together with the Munster Danes, he fought the great battle of Beallach-Leachta, somewhere it seems between Mallow and Macroom, in which the allies were worsted, and besides Maolmhuadh and a great number of the Irish, 1200 Danes lost their lives. Having settled matters with the Eugenians, Brian was attacked in 979 by Donall O'Faolan, prince of the Desies, assisted by the Danes of Waterford. He came up with them at a place called Fanmaccurra, and putting them to flight pursued them into Waterford, where great slaughter was made of the Danes. On this occasion O'Faolan was killed. After this exploit he got hostages from all the princes and chiefs of Munster; and every part of the province submitted to his authority. (60) In 980 he made Mac-Gilla-Patrick prisoner, and compelled all the Ossorian chieftains to deliver up hostages to him. In said year the king Maelseachlin II. defeated at Tara the Danes of Dublin, commanded by the sons of Auliffe or Anlaf their king. In this battle there was a dreadful slaughter of them, and among others were killed Reginald the king's eldest son, and Irlavra the governor of Dublin. This disaster affected Anlaf so much, that he retired to Hy, where he died in the course of this year. (61) In 981 Brian reduced the Lagenians to the necessity of giving him hostages; and the two kings of that province submitted to him. In 982 Maelseachlin plundered Dalgais, the hereditary property of Brian, and cut down the famous tree in the plain of Adair, under which the Dalcassian princes used to be inaugurated; and in the following year he ravaged Leinster then under the protection of Brian. Incensed by these proceedings, Brian marched against Maelseachlin and forced him to agree to a treaty, by which it was stipulated that Brian should be recognized king of Leath-Mogha, or the southern half of Ireland, the other half to be held by Maelseachlin, and that Donald Claon, king of Leinster and the Danes of Dublin should be subject to Brian. (62)

(58) See Chap. xxii. §. 8. (59) Ib. §. 15.

(60) Annals of Innifallen at A. 977-978-979.

(61) Ib. at A. 980. and Ware, Antiq. cap. 24. His English translator has greatly confused his meaning, making him say that the battle of Tara was not fought by Maelseachlin, but by the monarch his predecessor. But the Annals of Innisfallen, which he follows, expressly state, that Maelseachlin was the commander, and when king of Ireland. For Anlaf compare with Not. 138 to Chap. 22.

(62) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 981-982-983.

§. VIII. After various battles and depredations, such as that of Connaught by Maelseachlin in 985; the defeat of the Momonians and Danes of Waterford by the Connacians in 988, in which year Brian plundered Meath and part of Connaught; the defeat of the Danes of Dublin by Maelseachlin in 989; and some other fighting here and there, Maelseachlin ravaged Connaught again in 991, upon which Brian at the head of the Munster and Connaught troops laid waste a great part of Meath. Yet in 994 Maelseachlin gained a victory over Brian, who retaliated on him in the following year by a complete one, in consequence of which peace was concluded between them in 997, and Maelseachlin was again obliged to recognize Brian's title to the sovereignty of Leath-Mogha. These two kings then united, and, having forced the Danes of various parts to give them hostages, marched into Connaught in 998, whence also they took hostages, and then attacked the Danes of Dublin, whom they routed with great slaughter and the loss of their principal chiefs, Artulac son of Sitric, Harold son of Auliffe, &c. &c. (63) Notwithstanding this defeat, the Dublin Danes assisted in 999 Maelmurry, son of Murchard, in compelling Donogh, king of Leinster, to resign his crown to him, and plundered Kildare; upon which Brian marched to Dublin, punished them severely, burned many of their houses, banished their king Sitric, and, having remained there a week, carried off much booty. (64) In the same year Maelseachlin committed depredations in Leinster, and this was probably one of the reasons why Brian determined to wage a serious war against him. Accordingly he raised in 1000 a very considerable army composed of Munstermen, southern Connacians, Ossorians, Lagenians, and Dublin Danes, with whom he marched towards Tara, having sent forward a corps of Danish cavalry, who skirmished with the enemy. On Brian's coming up with his main force, Maelseachlin found it adviseable not to risk a battle, and yielding to Brian's terms promised to give him hostages. It seems that Maelseachlin did not fulfil his engagements; for Brian with the same army marched again in the following year, and arriving at Tara compelled him not only to submit and give hostages, but likewise to resign the throne of Ireland to Brian, and to content himself with his principality of Meath. Thus Brian became king of all Ireland in the year 1001. (65)

(63) Ib. from A. 984. to 998.

(64) Ib. at A. 999. and Ware, Antiq. cap. 24.

(65) Said Annals at A. 1000-1001. The 4 Masters also (ap. Tr. Th. p. 448.) assign Brian's accession to this year. They say that Maelseachlin had reigned 23 years; but it is to be observed that they place the commencement of his reign not in 980 but in 978.

§. ix. In 1002 Brian proceeded to Connaught, where he received hostages, and returning through Meath got some there also from Maelseachlin. He then marched at the head of his numerous forces, to which were now added those of Meath commanded by Maelseachlin, as far as Dundalk, where he was submitted to by all the princes and chieftains of Ulster, who gave him hostages. Afterwards we find him engaged in checking some attempts at revolt or disobedience particularly in the North. On one of these occasions he stopped for a week at Armagh in the year 1004, (66) and left a gold collar, weighing 20 ounces, on the great altar of the cathedral as an offering. Thence he went with his army to Rath-mormuighe, the royal seat of the Dalriedans in the now county of Antrim, whence he brought hostages. But it would be too long, and not within my plan, to follow all the movements of this great king; yet, as a matter belonging to our ecclesiastical history, I must not forget, that being in 1011 with a great army and a number of Irish princes in the now county of Louth, where he again received hostages from the chiefs of Ulster, to which he assigned two kings, he and the assembled princes, &c. granted glebe lands to the churches of Ireland, (67) thus repairing part of the ravages committed by the Northmen. A great storm was now gathering, the cause of which was as follows. Maelmurry Mac-Morogh, or the son of Murchart, who, as we have seen, usurped the crown of Leinster in 999, marched into Meath in 1013 at the head of a powerful army of Lagenians and Danes of Dublin, and ravaged some parts of it. Maelseachlin, in retaliation, set fire to the neighbouring districts of Leinster as far as the hill of Hoath, but being met by Maelmurry and Sitric king of Dublin, was defeated with considerable loss. He then called upon Brian at his residence, and requested assistance from him against the united Lagenians and Danes, who were in the habit of plundering his principality. Accordingly Brian set out with a great army, and, having on his way laid waste Ossory, detached his son Morogh with a large party towards Glendaloch, who plundered the country as he went along and brought many prisoners and much spoil to Brian then encamped at Kilmainham near Dublin, where he remained from the beginning of August until Christmas without being able to bring either the Danes or Lagenians to battle, and consequently returned to Munster. Meanwhile a new fleet of Northmen arrived and burned Cork ; and there was much fighting here and there between those foreigners and the Irish. (68)

(66) Ib. at A. 1004. The same year is marked also by the 4 Masters, and must not be changed into 1005.

(67) Ib. at A. 1011.

(68) Ib. at A. 1013.

§ x. The Danes and Lagenians, availing themselves of Brian's absence, used the utmost exertions to collect troops and auxiliaries from every quarter that they could. A great number of Northmen came to their assistance from Norway and other parts of Scandinavia, from Scotland, the Orkneys, Hebrides, &c. and from the isle of Man, who were joined also by Britons from Cornwall and elsewhere. Brian marched to oppose them, taking with him Maelseachlin, who, however, intended to betray him. For this purpose he sent to Maelmurry, to inform him, that Brian had dispatched his son Donogh, at the head of the Dalcassian troops and of a third part of the Eugenian forces, to ravage Leinster and Hy-Kinselagh, and that he himself with his 1000 Meath-men would desert Brian on the day of battle. Accordingly it was determined to attack Brian before Donogh could come up. He was then encamped on the plain near Dublin with a smaller army than he otherwise should have had. His opponents formed themselves into three divisions ; the first consisting of 1000 Northmen, covered with coats of mail, commanded by two Norwegian princes Charles and Henry, and of Dublin Danes under Dolat and Conmaol. The second division consisted of Lagenians, about 9000 strong, commanded by their king Maelmurry, and under him by some minor princes, such as Mac-Tuathal or Toole of the Liffey territory, the prince of Hy-falgy, &c. together with a large body of Danes. The third division was formed of the Northmen collected from the islands, from Scotland, &c. and of Britons. It was commanded by Lodar, earl of the Orkneys, and Bruadair admiral of the fleet, which had brought the auxiliary Northmen, &c. to Ireland. Brian was not dismayed by this mighty force, and depending on Providence and the bravery of his troops, prepared for battle, dividing his army likewise into three divisions; one to oppose the enemy's first division under his son Morogh, who had along with him his son Turlogh and a select body of the brave Dalgais, besides four other sons of Brian, Teige, Donald, Conor, and Flann, and various chieftains, Donchuan, Lonargan, &c. together with a body of men from Conmacne-Mara, a western part of Connaught. To this division Mael-seachlin was ordered to join his followers. Over the division, which was to fight the second of the enemy, Brian placed Cian and Donald, two princes of the Eugenic line, under whom were the forces of Desmond and other parts of the South of Ireland, including the now county of Kerry, the most of those of Cork and Limerick, and that of Waterford, headed by their respective chiefs. To this division belonged also O'Carrol and his troops of Ely O'Carrol, and it was joined by another O'Carrol prince of Orgiel in Ulster and Maguire prince of Fermanagh. The division opposed to the third of their antagonists consisted chiefly of Conacians, under O'Conor as chief commander, with whom were O'Heyn, O'Kelly, O'Flaherty, O'Cadhla, &c. and their forces, assisted by various bodies of men from divers parts of Tipperary, Limerick, Clare, &c.

commanded by their chieftains, Fogartach, O'Doyle, Mac Donagan, Mac Dermot, &c. (69)

(69) Ib. at A. 1014.

§. XI. I have been more minute, than perhaps my object being ecclesiastical would allow, merely to show that greater unanimity prevailed among the Irish on this occasion than for a long time preceding. In fact it was absolutely necessary for the preservation both of the country and of religion. For the intention of the Northmen, who were still half pagans, was to become masters of all Ireland. (70) Brian and the majority of the Irish princes, who, with a view to the encouragement of foreign trade, had very imprudently permitted parties of them to continue in Dublin, Limerick, Waterford, Cork, &c. instead of driving them entirely out of the country, as they might have done, perceived at last, that nothing less would do than to crush them in such a manner as would prevent their being afterwards able to disturb the tranquillity of Ireland. This they would, in all probability, have been able to accomplish effectually, had not Maelmurry and the people of Leinster entered into an unnatural confederacy with those foreigners. The Northmen from the islands, &c. who had arrived under Bruadair at Dublin on Palm-sunday A. D. 1014, insisted on the battle being fought on Good Friday, which fell on the 23d of April, a day on which, on account of its sanctity, Brian would have wished to avoid fighting. (71) Yet he was determined to defend himself even on that day, and holding the Crucifix in his left hand, and his sword in the right, rode with his son Morogh through the ranks, encouraging his army to put an end forever to the oppressions of those tyrants and usurpers, who had committed so many cruelties and sacrileges in Ireland, so that the day, on which Christ suffered death for our sake, should be the last of their power in this country, and declaring that he was willing to lose his life in so just and honourable a cause. As soon as the engagement began, Maelseachlin with his Meath men withdrew from the scene of action, and remained as a mere looker on. His defection did not disconcert Brian and the other Irish, who fought like heroes from sunrise until the dusk of the evening, and gained a complete victory, which has been and ever will be memorable in Irish history under the name of that of Clontarf. (72) According to one account the Northmen lost between killed and drowned 13000 men, and the Lagenians 3000. (73) The 1000 men that wore coats of mail, are said to have been all cut to pieces, together with their commanders Charles and Henry, besides Dolat and Conmaol. (74) Among the slain were also Bruadair and two of the Danish princes of Dublin, to whom we have to add Maelmurry king of Leinster, the prince of Hy-falgy, &c. (75) But this was a dearly purchased victory; for, besides a great number of the Irish troops, Brian, his son Morogh, and his grandson Turlogh fell on this memorable day, (76) together with many chieftains of Munster and Connaught. Brian was in the 38th year of his age, and Morogh in the 63d. (77) Although almost constantly engaged in military expeditions, Brian was of a very religious disposition, (78) and is praised as having erected or rebuilt churches, ex. c. those of Killaloe and Iniskeltra, religious houses, schools, &c. He indemnified the institutions and families, which had been plundered by the Northmen, with lands of which he dispossessed them, established a system of just administration, put a stop to robberies, fortified the royal residence of Cashel and several other places, and improved the internal communication throughout his kingdom by means of roads, bridges, &c. (79)

(70) In the chronicle of Ademar monk of St. Eparchius of An-gouleme (ap. Labbe, Nova Bibl. MSS. libr. Tom. 2.) there is a curious passage (p. 177.) relative to the views of the Northmen at that time, in which it is stated that they came with an immense fleet, meaning to extinguish the Irish, and to get possession of that most wealthy country, which had twelve cities, great bishoprics, &c. “ His temporibus Normanni supradicti, quod patres eorum nunquam perpetrasse ausi sunt, cum innumera classe Hiberniam insulam, quae Irlanda dicitur, ingressi sunt una cum uxoribus, et liberis, et captivis Christianis, quos fecerant sibi servos, ut, Hirlan-landis extinctis, ipsi pro ipsis inhabitarent opulentissimam terram, quae XII civitates cum amplissimis episcopatibus et unum regem habet, ac propriam linguam, sed Latinas literas; quam S. Patricius Romanus ad fidem convertit,” &c. Ademar, as appears from the sequel, alludes to the preparations for the battle of Clontarf, which it is plain was the one that he meant; for just after his account of it he speaks of Canute the great, and his coming to England, which was about the same time. Labbe thinks, that this chronicle was written before 1031; if so, it is the oldest document I know of, in which the name Irlanda, Ireland, is to be found. Compare with Usher, Pr. p. 734.

(71) The Niala Saga in Johnstone's Ant. Celto-Scand. has (p. 120. seqq.) a curious account of the battle of Clontarf. In it are mentioned the above circumstances, and it is stated, that Bruadair had been informed by a sort of pagan oracle, that, should the battle be fought on Friday, the Northmen would be victorious.

(72) That this was a real and great victory is attested in the Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1014. and in the best Irish documents. Yet Ware (Ant. cap. 24.) has some doubts on this point, as if towards the end of it the Danes became uppermost. Without entering into further particulars, I shall oppose to these doubts the testimony of the Niala Saga, which represents the Northmen as flying in all directions, and large parties of them totally destroyed. And in Ademar's chronicle, after the words quoted (Not. 70.), it is represented as even greater than it really was; for it is said that all the Northmen were killed, and it is added that crowds of their women threw themselves into the sea. Yet it is true, that of some of their divisions not a man was left alive.

Ademar makes the battle last for three days; but this does not agree with other accounts.

(73) Annals of Innisfallen, ib. But those of Ulster, (ap. Johnstone) without mentioning the loss of the Lagenians, state that, besides many chiefs, among whom is reckoned Bruadair, about 6000 of the Danes were killed or drowned.

(74) Annals of Innisfallen, ib. In the Niala Saga a northern prince is introduced asking some time after the battle, what had become of his men. The answer was that they were all killed. This seems to allude to the division in coats of mail.

(75) See ib. The Niala Saga states that not only Broder (Bruadair) but likewise all his pirates (the sea-faring Northmen) were killed.

(76) The person, who killed Brian, was Bruadair, and among the various accounts of how he chanced to get the king into his power, the best is perhaps that of the Niala Saga, according to which Bruadair, who had fled into a wood with a party of his followers, happened to see the king in a retired spot attended by only a few men, and rushed upon him unawares, after which he was soon after killed himself. Morogh was, say the Annals of Innisfallen, treacherously stabbed by the Norwegian Henry, who was lying on the ground and in the act of being relieved by Moragh. This brave prince had just time to make his confession and receive the holy Viaticum.

(77) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1014.

(78) Marianus Scotus, mentioning his death, has these words; "Brianus rex Hiberniae Parasceve Paschae, sexta feria 9 Calendas Maii, manibus et mente ad Deum intentus necatur."

(79) See Keating, Book 2.

§. XII. After the battle was over Teige, son of Brian, withdrew with the remnant of the Irish army to the camp at Kilmainham. On the next day, Holy Saturday, Donogh arrived, bringing with him great booty from various parts of Leinster, and on the same day the inhabitants of Swords came up and took the body of Brian for the purpose of having it interred at Armagh, whither Donogh sent many rich offerings. From Swords it was brought to Duleek, and thence by the people of that place to Louth, whither Maelmur Mac-Eochad, archbishop of Armagh, came with his clergy and many others, bearing reliques, to meet it and convey it to Armagh. (80) Along with it was carried also the body of Morogh, beside the head of Conaing, a nephew of Brian by his brother Dunchuan, and, according to another account, (81) that of Mothla prince of the Desies. The funeral obsequies were celebrated with great pomp, constant watching and the exposure of the reliques of St. Patrick, during twelve days and nights. (82) Brian's remains were deposited in a stone coffin at the North side of the cathedral, those of Morogh, &c. being placed at the South side. (83)

A dispute, of that kind so common between the Eugenic and Dalcassian lines, soon occurred in consequence of Brian's demise. The Eugenic prince Cian claimed a right to the throne of Munster, in virtue of the old compact of alternate succession in those branches of the royal house, alleging also that he was older than either Donogh or Teige. Donogh refused to acknowledge this claim, and, as Cian was not able to enforce it, marched off quietly with his troops for Munster, meeting with no opposition except, when passing through Ossory, a show of opposition on the part of Fitzpatrick. But before the end of the same year he and his brother Teige quarrelled among themselves, and a battle was fought between them and their parties, in which Donogh was defeated. (84) Meanwhile Maelseachlin was again saluted king of all Ireland, a title which, as far as I can judge, was not recognized by the O'Brian's and people of Munster. This prince, notwithstanding his not having fought against the Danes at Clontarf, was still a determined enemy of theirs. In 1015 he attacked the remnant of those of Dublin, and burned almost the whole city; and in 1016, after predatory and incendiary excursions of the said Danes, commanded by their king Sitric, against Kildare, Glendaloch, Clonard, Swords, and Armagh, he defeated them with much loss. (85) The Lagenians soon found, what little dependance could be placed on the friendship of that people; for their king Bran, son of Maelmurry, had his eyes put out in Dublin by Sitric in the year 1018. (86) Roused to a feeling of patriotism, Augurius or Ugair, son of Dunluing, and king of Leinster, overthrew Sitric and his Danes with great slaughter at Delgany in 1021 or 1022. (87) In this year 1022 Maelseachlin died on the 2d of September, in the monastery of the Island of Inisainingin, after having some time before retired from the world to do penance for his sins and make his peace with God. (88) After him there was no king recognized as of all Ireland for many years; but his principality of Meath and, it seems, some adjoining districts fell, after his death, under the administration of Cuan O'Leochain, arch-poet and chief antiquary of Ireland, and of Corcran a clergyman. Their power did not last long, whereas Cuan was killed by the Lagenians in 1024, and Corcran is said to have become an anchorite, and to have died at Lismore in 1040. (89) With regard to the other parts of Ireland let it suffice to mention, that Donogh O'Brian, son of Brian Boromhe, became king of Leth-mogha (the southern half of Ireland) in 1026. (90)

(80) While the Annals of Innisfallen represent the archbishop Maelmur, &c. as having advanced no farther than Louth, the 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 298.) tell us that they proceeded all the way to Swords. The other statement is, I am sure, the true one.

(81) That of the 4 Masters, ib.

(82) Innisfallen and Ulster Annals at A. 1014.

(83) Annals of Innisfallen, ib. (84) Ib.

(85) Ib. at A. 1015. 1016.

(86) Ib. at A. 1018. Ware (Antiq. cap. 24.) has added a year to this date, but, I think, without reason. Instead of the name Bran, which was the real one, and rather usual in the royal house of Leinster, he has Brienus or Brennus, rendered Brien by his translator, thus causing a confusion with the Munster Briens or rather Brians.

(87) 4 Masters ap. AA. SS. p. 313. and Ware loc. cit.

(88) 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 298.) and Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1022, which have Lough-Ainin, that is, I think, Inisaingin, or the Island of All Saints, in Lough-ree. See also O'Flaherty, Ogyg. Part. III. cap. 93. Ware was wrong (Ant. cap. 4.) in adding a year to this date, placing Maelseachlin's death in 1023.

(89) See O'Flaherty, ib. cap. 94. I very much doubt, whether he is right in making this Corcran the same as the anchoret and theologian of Lismore.

(90) Annals of Innisfallen at 1026.

§. XIII. From this detail of political occurrences, which I have been forced to enter into, it appears that a real revolution took place in Ireland at this period. The anciently established system of succession to the throne of the whole kingdom was overturned, and there remained no paramount power authorized to controul the provincial kings or minor chieftains. Amidst those wars one good effect was obtained, viz. the humiliation of the Northmen, who, although numbers of them still remained in various parts of Ireland, were much weakened, and henceforth attempted fewer depredations than in former times. But unluckily the Irish were, during a great part of this century, the eleventh, engaged here and there in wars between themselves, and we find now and then one or other party of them assisted by the Danes, as they are usually called, settled in Dublin or elsewhere. The Christian religion became no longer confined to those of Dublin, by whom it began to be better observed, but gradually spread among the other Danes of Ireland.

Maelmur Mac-Eochad archbishop of Armagh, who died in 1020, (91) was succeeded by Amalgaid, who is stated to have visited Munster in 1021. (92)

He was present in 1022 at the death of king Maelseachlin. (93) It is said that he was one of the laymen who assumed the title of Archbishops of Armagh; whereas among his successors we find Maelisa and Donnald, who are called sons of Amalgadius. (94) Yet the matter is not certain; and if it be true, that Amalgaid administered the sacrament of Extreme Unction to Maelseachlin, he must have been more than a layman. (95) It may also be objected, that his visitation of Munster implied real archiepiscopal power; but it must be observed, that it was probably relative merely to the exaction of certain dues, which used to be paid to the church of Armagh according to the regulation called the Law of St. Patrick. Whether he was a real or nominal archbishop, he held that title 29 years until his death in 1049. (96) During his time Moeltule, who is called bishop of Armagh, died in 1032; but it is probable, that he was merely a suffragan bishop; (97) and hence an additional argument may be deduced to suppose, that Amalgaid was not a real bishop, but that Moeltule officiated in his stead. On the very day of Amalgaid's death Dubdalethe III. son of one Maelmur, (98) and professor of theology at Armagh, was appointed his successor. (99)

(91) Above §. 6.

(92) 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 298. (93) Ib.

(94) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 302.) insists upon this circumstance as a proof that the Amalgaid was an unordained so called archbishop. But supposing that he was the same as the Amalgaid, father of Maelisa and Donnald, might they not have been born before he got that title? Ware has (at Amalgaid) a passage, which seems to favour Colgan's opinion. It is taken from the Annals of the Priory of the island of All Saints at A. 1019, and runs thus; "Amalgaid, comorban of St. Patrick, having spent 29 years in this principality, rested penitentially in Christ." The word, principality, seems to allude to his having been rather a prince than a real bishop. The title comorban of St. Patrick, is not sufficient to show, that Amalgaid was in holy orders, for, as will be seen more fully elsewhere, in the later times of the Irish church, and perhaps from the period we are now treating of, the name comorban was sometimes given to laymen, who kept possession of the church lands belonging to sees and monasteries.

(95) To this Colgan replies, that Maelseachlin was indeed anointed, while in the hands or arms of Amalgaid; but that it is not stated, that the ceremony was performed by him.

(96) This is the date marked not only by the 4 masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 298.) but likewise by the above quoted Annals (Not. 94.) and O'Flaherty in his MS. catalogue; and accordingly, as is marked in said authorities, the incumbency of Amalgaid lasted 29 years. Yet the Cashel catalogue allows for it thirty, which must be understood of his having died in the 30th year; for in said catalogue incomplete years are reckoned as complete.

(97) See Tr. Th. p. 298. and Ware, Bishops at Amalgaid. Moeltule's name is not in the Cashel catalogue.

(98) See above Not. 51. (99) Tr. Th. p. 298.

§. XIV. With regard to the other sees of Ireland, I shall here give the names of such bishops, whose deaths I find marked before about A. D. 1050. Carmacan O'Muilcashel, bishop of Killaloe, the first of that place, whom I meet with after St. Flannan, died in 1019. (100) Neil O'Malduibh, of Cork, the successor of Ceallach Hua-Sealbaugh, (101) died in 1027, and after him Airtri Sairt in 1028, succeeded by Cathal, whose death is assigned to 1034. (102) O'Mail-Sluaig, bishop of Lismore, died in 1025, as did his successor, Moriertach O'Selbach in 1034. (103) Tuathal O'Dunluing, bishop of Clonard, died in 1028 or 1029. (104) The death of Maelmartin, of Kildare, was, according to one account, in 1028, and according to another, in 1030. (105) His successor Maelbrigid lived until 1042. (106) Murchad O'Nioc, bishop of Tuam, died in 1033. (107) Maelfinan of Emly, most probably the immediate successor of Saerbrethach, (108) died in 1040, as did after him O'Flanachuain in 1047, and Clothna Muimnech in 1049.

(109) Flahertach, bishop of Down, died in 1043, and Moelmacte of Louth in 1044. (110) Cleiric O'Muinic, bishop of Leighlin, died in 1048, and to the same year is assigned the death of Ceili, bishop of Ardagh. (111) In the same year some place the death of Diermit O'Rodachan, bishop of Ferns, which others affix to 1050. (112) It can scarcely be doubted that Dunchad O'Kelechuir, who is called comorban of St. Kieran of Saigir, who died in 1048, was bishop of that place. (113) From these instances it may be inferred, that the episcopal succession was kept up, as regularly as the state of the times would allow, in the now mentioned sees, and it is very probable that it was maintained also in other old sees, although the names of their prelates are very seldom to be met with. For example Dungal, a bishop of Ross (in the county of Cork) is marked as the 27th in succession after St. Fachtnan, the founder of that see, (114) who lived in the sixth century. As to bishops appointed occasionally in places, which were not permanent sees, we may be certain that there were, as usual, some of this description in the first half of the century we are now treating of. Thus we find a bishop at Swords Marian O'Crinen, who is called a wise man, and whose death is assigned to 1025. (115)

(100) Ware, Bishops at Killaloe. (101) Above §. 6.

(102) Ware at Cork. (103) Idem at Lismore.

(104) Idem at Meath. See Harris' addition.

(185) Ware (at Kildare) has 1028; the 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 630.) have 1030.

(106) Ib. Ib. (107) Ware at Tuam.

(108) See above §. 6. (109) Ware at Emly.

(110) For Flahertach, see Ware at Down. He was the first bishop of that see whom Ware met with from the times of St. Fergus, who died in the sixth century. (See Chap. XII. §. 1.) But Harris, referring to the 4 Masters, adds that a Fingen, bishop of Down, is mentioned as having died in 962. For Moelmocte see AA. SS. p. 736.

(111) Ware at Leighlin and Ardagh.

(112) Ware at Ferns. The 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 223.) have A. 1050.

(113) See AA. SS. p. 473. Ware has omitted him at Ossory; but he is marked by Harris.

(114) See Harris, Bishops at Ross.

(115) Tr. Th. p. 509.

§. xv. Learning continued to be still cultivated, and many distinguished scholastics or doctors are mentioned as having belonged to this period. Dunchad, scholastic of Clonmacnois died in 1005 and Coenchomrac of Gleannussen in 1015. Flann O'Tegain of Durrow (King's county,) a man, celebrated for his knowledge, died in 1022, as did also Cathasach, a scholastic or teacher at Clonmacnois; and Christian of Devenish in 1025. (116) Eochad Mac-Cethenin, who is called comorban of St. Tigernach, and the wisest doctor in Ireland, died at Armagh in 1030. (117) Moelodar, scholastic of Killachad, died in 1032; and Aengus of Clonmacnois in 1034; and Macnias O'Huactain of Kells in 1035. (118) Flanagan, scholastic of Kildare, Cunden of Connor, and Alill of Durrow, died in 1038. (119) The death of Corcran, an anchorite and a very eminent and pious theologian of Lismore, and of Dunchad O'Hanchanige, a celebrated lecturer of Armagh, is assigned to 1040; and that of Maelpetrus O'Hailechain, likewise a lecturer there and chief director of the students, to 1043. (120) Longsech, scholastic of Clonard, and Eochagan, archdeacon of Slane, lecturer at Swords, and a chronographer, died in 1042. (121) Three scholastics of Kells are mentioned as having died not long after each other; Maelmartin in 1045; Cudul Mac-Gaithen in 1047; and Moelan in 1050. (122) At the year 1046 is marked the death of a very distinguished and holy man Moelpatrick O'Beloige, the chief lecturer and director of the schools of Armagh. (123) O'Ballen, scholastic of Roscrea, and Gilla-molaisse of Louth died in 1047. (124) There were undoubtedly in these times many other lecturers and teachers in the other establishments and schools of Ireland; and to this period are assigned the deaths of two eminent antiquaries. One was Mac-Liag, who is called an Ollamh, that is a Doctor and man of letters, and who wrote some works, among which was a Life of Brian Boroinmhe. He died in 1016. (125) The other was Macbeth, son of Annire, and chief antiquary of Armagh, who died in 1041. (126) A pious prince, Cathald, son of Roderic, and chieftain of West Connaught, who had retired to Armagh in 1037, for the purpose of leading the life of a pilgrim, died there in 1043. (127) The spirit of pilgrimage spread itself among the Danes of Dublin, and Sitric their king set out for Rome with a view to that object, but died on his way in 1029. (128) His son Amlaf, or Auliffe, also king of Dublin, undertook a pilgrimage to Rome in 1035, but was killed in England. (129) He was succeeded by another Sitric, his son, who went beyond sea, probably to Rome, in 1036, and left the government of Dublin in the hands of one Eachmharcach, after whom we find an Ivar governor of Dublin in 1038. (130) Sitric returned to Ireland and died in 1041 or 1042. (131)

(116) Ib. Ind. Chron.

(117) Ib. p. 298. The title comorban of St. Tigernach, is explained by Colgan as meaning abbot of Clones. But, if the St. Tigernach, whose comorban Eochad was, were the one of Clones, I should think that Eochad was rather a bishop; for St. Tigernach had been bishop of Clones as well as of Clogher.

(118) Ib. Ind. Chron. (119) Ib. p. 632.

(120) See AA. SS. p. 206. and Tr. Th. p. 298.

(121) Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. and p. 509.

(122) Ib. p. 508. (123) Ib. p. 298.

(124) Ib. Ind. Chron.

(125) See Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1016. and Harris, Writers at Mac-Liag.

(126) Tr. Th. p. 298. (127) Ib.

(128) Ware, Antiq. cap. 24. Yet the Annals of Innisfallen, after mentioning his departure for Rome in 1028, state that he returned to Ireland, and exhibit him as plundering Ardraccan in 1031.

(129) Ware, ib. The Annals of Innisfallen, instead of 1035, have 1034. I suspect that Ware has added a year to dates at times when he should not have done so.

(130) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1036 and 1038. Ware makes no mention of the absence of Sitric, nor of Eachmharcach or Ivar. This is the Ivar, governor of the Danes of Dublin, to whom I alluded in a part of Not. 138. to Chap. xxii. Ware's silence concerning those persons and circumstances forms no argument against the statement of the Annals.

(131) Ware ib.

§. xvi. Notwithstanding a certain progress made by the Danes in piety and religious practices, yet we find them now and then, even during this period, committing depredations in religious places. Besides some already alluded to, (132) they plundered Kells in 1018, and Duleek in 1023 and again in 1037, (133) besides Ardraccan in 1031, whence they brought much booty and many prisoners. (134) But on the whole it appears, that their manners became gradually much softened, of which we have a very strong proof in the memorable fact of a bishop being for the first time appointed for the Danes of Dublin about the year 1040. This bishop, whose real name seems to have been Dunan, or perhaps Donagh, although it has been latinized into Donatus, (135) was, judging from the name, most probably an Irishman. Sitric, king of Dublin, had already returned from his tour, or perhaps pilgrimage, during which he had probably planned the erection of this new see.

In the Black book of the church of the Holy Trinity, commonly called Christ-church in Dublin, there is a document, which runs thus ; “ Sitricus king of Dublin, son of Ableb (Anlaf) earl of Dublin, gave to the Holy Trinity, and to Donatus first bishop of Dublin, a place, where the arches or vaults were founded, to build the church of the Holy Trinity on, together with the following lands ; viz. Bealdulek, Rechen, Portrahern, with their villains, cattle, and corn. He also contributed gold and silver enough, wherewith to build the church and the whole court thereof.” (136) This must have occurred about 1040 (137) before the death of Sitric, and about the time that Donatus was named to this see. It has been said, that Donatus was consecrated by the archbishop of Canterbury ; but of this I meet with no proof whatsoever, unless it should be considered as such, that some of his successors were consecrated in that city. Now this system, according to which the bishops of Dublin acknowledged themselves subject to the see of Canterbury, did not, as far as I can discover, begin until the time of the archbishop Lanfranc, who came over to England during the reign of William the Conqueror many years after the appointment of Donatus ; and which system was introduced for two reasons ; first, because William and his Normans, being masters of England from the year 1066, were considered by the Irish Danes as their countrymen ; and second, because Lanfranc’s reputation was so great, that, when the Dublin Danes found it necessary that their bishop should be subject to some metropolitan, they made choice of him for that purpose. (138) This new see was confined to the city, and did not extend beyond its walls until later than the synod of Kells under Cardinal Paparo, held in 1152, as will be seen in its proper place. Donatus having built the church, erected also an episcopal palace adjoining it, on the site, where the late Four Courts stood, and a chapel, which was called St. Michael's. He lived until A. D. 1074. (139) I shall conclude this chapter with just mentioning the death of a very holy abbot, who belonged to the period, of which we have been now treating. St. Gormgal, abbot of Ardoilen, one of the Arran islands, who was considered the chief spiritual director of all Ireland, and who died in 1017 on the 5th of August, the anniversary of which was sacred to his memory. (140)

(132) Concerning those of the year 1016 see above §. 12.

(133) Tr. Th. Ind. Chron.

(134) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1031.

(135) Usher quotes (Not. ad Ep. 25. Sylloge, &c.) a passage from the Annals of Dublin, in which he is called Dunan. This is a well known Irish name, and certainly not Danish. It is highly probable, that the Danes had as yet scarcely any clergymen of their nation in Ireland.

(136) See Ware, Bishops at Dublin, and Antiq. cap. 24. and 29. Bealdulek, Rechen, and Portrahern were, I suppose, the places now called Baldoyle, Ratheny, and Portrane, all lying at the North side of Dublin, where the Danes possessed lands.

(137) Ware says, about 1038; but it is probable, that Sitric had not yet returned to Ireland in said year, in which we have seen that Ivar was governor of Dublin. Camden was mistaken (col. 1368) in referring the erection of the church, &c. as related by Ware, to about 1012. There was indeed a Sitric son of Anlaf at that time; but, as Donatus held the see until 1074, is it to be supposed that he was a bishop since 1012? Nor, if that deed be genuine, can it be attributed to a Sitric later than the one, that died in 1041 or 1042; for there was not after him any other Sitric king of Dublin during the life time of Donatus.

(138) Usher and Ware, who are the best authorities on the subject of Donatus, have not a word concerning his having been consecrated by an archbishop of Canterbury; nor indeed could they, as not even an allusion is to be found relative to such a circumstance. And it will be seen lower down, that Patrick, the immediate successor of Donatus, was the first bishop of Dublin, who was consecrated by an archbishop of that see, or who, at least from the time of his appointment, had promised canonical obedience to him. To me it seems more than probable, that Donatus was a bishop, perhaps of some monastery, before he was placed over Dublin. Usher (Discourse on the Religion, &c. ch. 8.) states, that the Ostmen or Danes of Ireland did not begin to have any connexion with Canterbury until after William the conqueror became possessed of England, that is, until after 1066. He is there remarking on a most ignorant assertion of Campion, which, however, has been followed by other English writers, viz. that persons appointed to sees in Ireland used to be directed to the archbishop of Canterbury, to be consecrated by him. On this Usher observes that it is wrongly extended by him to the bishops of all Ireland, whereas it was peculiar “to the Ostmann strangers, that possessed “the three cities of Dublin, Waterford, and Limerick. For these “being a colony of the Norwegians and Livonians, and so country- “men to the Normans, when they had seen England subdued by “the Conqueror, and Normans advanced to the chief arch- “bishopric there, would needs now assume to themselves the name “of Normans also, and cause their bishops to receive their conse- “crution from no other metropolitan but the archbishop of Can- “terbury. And forasmuch as they were confined within the “walls of their own cities, the bishops, which they made, had “no other diocess to exercise their jurisdiction in, but only the “bare circuit of those cities,” &c. And in the same chapter he attributes the forbearance, for some time, of the Irish hierarchy with regard to the bishops of the Danish towns being connected with Canterbury, to the esteem they had for Lanfranc and Anselm, “with whom they themselves were desirous to hold all good correspondence;” yet, he adds, they could not well brook this system, which they considered derogatory to the dignity of their own primate. But of this more elsewhere. Meanwhile it is plain that Usher knew nothing about any dependance of the see of Dublin on Canterbury until the times of Lanfranc, as in reality there was not.

(139) Ware, Bishops of Dublin. See also Harris’s additions. p. 301.

(140) AA. SS. p. 141. and 715.

CHAP. XXIV.

Various distinguished Irishmen still continue to visit foreign countries—Colman and others leave Ireland with intent to visit Jerusalem—taken up as a spy and put to death—honoured as a martyr, and his body deposited with great pomp in the churchyard of Stockereau in Austria—Marianus Scotus, Helias, Annchad and several other learned and pious Irishmen in the Continent—Dubhdaleithe III. archbishop of Armagh, said to have been a layman—was a learned man and wrote annals of Ireland, and an account of the archbishops of Armagh down to his own time—Eight married bishops of Armagh—Succession and deaths of bishops in several sees in Ireland—Ferdornach called bishop of Leinster—Domnald O'Heine bishop of Cashel—Death of Donat bishop of Dublin—Clergy and people of Dublin elect for his successor Patrick, a Priest, and send him to Lanfranc archbishop of Canterbury to be consecrated—Letter of the clergy and people of Dublin to Lanfranc—Patrick professes obedience to Lanfranc, and is consecrated by him—this profession a new practice—Practice of giving the holy Eucharist to infants after baptism—Archbishops of Canterbury never possessed a metropolitan power over the Irish church—Ireland not included in the grant of Legatine jurisdiction granted by the pope to Augustine—Donogh son of Brian Boromhe, king of Leth-Mogha, dethroned by his nephew Torlogh—goes to Rome and there dies a great penitent—Torlogh proclaimed king—extends his kingdom—Pope Gregory VII. writes to Torlogh—Lanfranc's letter to Torlogh—Chorepiscopi consecrated by a single bishop—Baptizing without chrism—Patrick, bishop of Dublin, shipwrecked and drowned—succeeded by Donogh

O'Haingly, who was elected by Torlogh and the people of Dublin, and consecrated by Lanfranc—Death of Torlogh—succeeded by his son Mortogh—Mortogh dethroned, and his brother Dermot placed over Munster in his stead—Mortogh took holy orders, and died in the Monastery of Derry—Distinguished ecclesiastics at the close of the 11th century—Moeliosa O'Broilchain—Tigernach O'Braoin, the annalist—Ireland still famous for learning—English resort to Ireland for education—Several religious establishments plundered and destroyed both by Irish and Danes.

SECT. I.

VARIOUS distinguished Irishmen still continued to visit foreign countries. Colman, or as usually called by continental writers, Coloman, who is styled patron of Austria, (1) left Ireland early in the eleventh century, (2) together with some other persons, for the purpose of a pious visit to Jerusalem. (3) He arrived A.D. 1022. in the eastern part of Norica, now Lower Austria. Its inhabitants were then at variance with the neighbouring nations of Bohemians, Moravians, &c. On Colman's stopping at the small town of Stockerau he was seized as a spy sent by the enemies of Austria, and thrown into prison. On the next day he was strictly examined, but although he told the plain truth, would not be believed. He was then most cruelly tortured, and at length, on his persisting in declaring his innocence, was hung from an old tree together with two robbers. While his body remained suspended from his gibbet, it continued sound and entire; and it is said that his hair and nails continued to grow. The hay or twig rope, by which his head was fastened, and even the old tree, are stated to have bloomed and revived. These extraordinary phenomena excited great attention, which was much enhanced by the circumstance of blood flowing from his body on occasion of a part of his flesh having been cut off for the purpose of being used in effecting a certain cure. It was now concluded, that Colman was a truly holy man, and that he had been unjustly put to death. Accordingly he was honored as a martyr, and his body was taken down and deposited with great pomp in the churchyard of Stockerau. Several miracles are said to have attested his sanctity, and Henry, marquis of Austria, was so moved by them, that he had the body removed to his residence Medicum, alias Medlica, or Mellica, now Melk. (4) On its removal it was found entire, and was placed in St. Peter's church of that town on the 7th of October A. D. 1015, three years after Colmán had been murdered. A Benedictine monastery was soon established there in honour of this saint, which has become very famous and still exists in great splendor. Erchinfrid, who has written the Acts of Colman, (5) was the third abbot of this monastery. He relates, in addition to what has been hitherto stated, several miracles wrought after his death, which it would be too tedious to repeat. He constantly calls him a Scotus, by which appellation, although he does not make mention of Ireland, or name the land of his birth, it may, considering that the Irish were then universally called Scoti, and that they were greatly in the habit of going abroad on pilgrimages, be fairly presumed that Colman was an Irishman. Erchinfrid has nothing about his having been of royal parentage, as some later writers have announced. (6) The name of this saint as a martyr is in the Roman martyrology at 13 October.

(1) Colgan (AA. SS. p. 105.) calls him apostle of Austria; but there is no reason for giving this title; for, besides Austria having been a Christian country before the arrival of Colman, it does not appear that he preached there, or that he had even time to do so. Nor do I find, that Colman was an ecclesiastic. The title given to him by German writers is that of patron of Austria. The most detailed account of him is that by the abbot Erclinfrid, who was contemporary with him, or very nearly so, and which has been published by Lambecius, Commentariorum de Bibliotheca Caesar. Vindobon. Lib. II. cap. 8. Colman is treated of also by Ditmar and other chroniclers, by Baronius, Annal. &c. at A. 1012, and other writers.

(2) According to Erchinfrid's account Colman's departure from his own country must have been only a short time before his death, which occurred in 1012. Colgan says, (ib. p. 107.) that he had left Ireland before the close of the tenth century. I wish he had told us, where this information is to be found.

(3) Baronius was mistaken in saying, that Colman had been often at Jerusalem. But he had not seen the narrative of Erchinfrid.

(4) Mabillon says (Annal. Ben. ad A. 1017.) that Colman's body was buried at Melck, which he calls Mezelikim, by order of the then emperor. This is a mistake, grounded on authority inferior to that of Erchinfrid, who positively states, that Henry, marquis of Austria, was the prince, by whose order that was done. He was also wrong in assigning Colman's death to said year 1017.

(5) See above Not. 1. The miraculous circumstances relative to Colman's remains are attested also by Ditmar, who was bishop of Mersburg and a contemporary of his, as he died in 1019.

(6) Surius has at 13 October an ode written in honour of St. Colman by John Stabius, historiographer of the emperor Maximilian I. It begins thus :

Austriæ sanctus canitur patronus,
Fulgidum sidus radians ab Areto,
Scoticae gentis Colomannus acer
Regia proles.

Ille dum sanctam Solymorum urbem
Transiit, dulcem patriam relinquens,
Regios fastus, trabeam, coronam,
Sceptraque tempisit.

Propter et Christum peregrinus exul
 Factus in terris alienis ultro
 Caelicam pura meditatus aulam
 Mente fideque.

Then comes an account of Colman's transactions much in the manner as related by Erchinfrid; for instance,

Austriæ terras agitabat amens
 Tunc furor : fortes Moravos, Bohemos,
 Pannonos bello simul implicabat
 Inferus hostis,
 Ergo dum sanctum hospitio recepit
 Oppidum nostro Stockheran vocatum
 Patrio ritu, &c.

It was, I dare say, on the authority of this ode that Baronius said that Colman was of a royal family. Dempster, wishing to make Colman, a Scotch prince, fabricated a story of his having been a son of Malcolm I. king of Scotland. To that shameless liar it is sufficient to oppose the silence of Buchanan, who, although he makes mention of more than one son of Malcolm, has nothing about this celebrated St. Colman. Harris, (Writers at Colman of Lindisfarne) remarking on Dempster's assumption, fell, as indeed some others had before him, into a strange mistake, confounding Colman of Austria with the one of Lindisfarne. He did not know that the former was killed in 1012, whereas the latter lived in the seventh century.

§. II. St. Helias, or Elias, an Irishman, who has been mentioned already, (7) was in the year 1022 abbot of St. Martin's of Cologne and also of the monastery of St. Pantaleon in said city. He was the third abbot of the former establishment, and the fifth of the latter. St. Heribert, archbishop of Cologne, who had an extraordinary esteem for Helias, insisted on being attended by him, when on his death bed in 1021, as he accordingly was. Helias had been at Rome, and was the first who brought thence the Roman note or Church music to Cologne. (8) Piligrin, the successor of St. Heribert, was induced to conceive a dislike for Helias and his Irish monks, and accordingly intended to expel them, in the year 1035. His dislike was chiefly occasioned by his supposing, that the discipline maintained by them was too strict. Piligrin was then absent from the city; but, on the Irish being informed of his intention, Helias and his companions said; "If Christ is in us foreigners, may Piligrin not return alive to Cologne." And in fact it turned out so; for Piligrin died soon after. (9) Helias was a rigid observer of monastic discipline, which he carried so far that, a French monk of St. Pantaleon having written, without having asked permission to do so, a neat copy of the Missal for the use of the community, he burned it, lest others should presume to act without previous licence. (10) According to the usage of that period, he is called, as well as Colman, a Scotus, that is, an Irish one, as is clear from his having belonged to the monastery of Monaghan before he went to the continent. He died in great reputation of sanctity on the 12th of April, A. D. 1042, (11) at which day his name is marked in various calendars. His immediate successor was probably Molanus, or Molua, who, according to Florence of Worcester, died in 1061. A monastery was erected for the Irish at Erford in Germany by the bishop Walter de Glysburg in 1036. (12) In these times there were many Irish monks at Fulda, (13) the most celebrated of whom was St. Annichad or rather Annchad. (14) It is probable, that he was of the family of the Siolnannchad and of the district of said name, now called the barony of Longford in the county of Galway, adjoining the Shannon. (15) This district lies not far from the island of Iniskeltra (in Lough Derg) in which Annichad was a monk. The occasion of his leaving Ireland was as follows. Being entrusted with the care of strangers, he happened on a certain occasion to entertain some brethren with the permission of his superior, whose name was Corcran. (16) After they had taken food, and some of them had retired, others, who remained sitting near the fire, asked him to drink something. (17) He refused, alleging that he could not without obtaining leave. At length, being much solicited by them, he consented to do so, but previously sent some of the drink to the superior to be blessed by him. On the next day Corcran inquired of him, why he had sent him that drink, and on Annichad's telling him the whole of what had occurred he immediately, slight as the transgression might appear, ordered him to quit Ireland. Annichad obeyed, and went to Fulda, where, becoming a recluse, he led a very holy life until his death on the 30th of January, A. D. 1043. Marianus Scotus, from whom this narrative is taken, (18) adds that he got the account of it from his own superior Tigernach (19) on occasion of his having committed some small fault. He relates, that lights were seen and psalmody heard over Annichad's tomb in the monastery of Fulda, and that, when a recluse there, he celebrated mass over it every day for ten years. He then states, that a most religious monk, named William, did, in his hearing, pray to Annichad, who was already buried, to bless him, and that the saint did so that same night in a vision, as the monk assured him, while Marianus himself during that night felt a very sweet and delicious scent. The reputation of St. Annichad has been very great, and his name is in divers calendars at 30 January.

(7) Chap. xxiii. § 5.

(8) See Mabillon, Annal. Bened. ad A. 1021–1022.

(9) Marianus Scotus writes at A. 1035; “Propter religionem districtam disciplinamque nimiam, et propter aliquos Scotus quos secum habebat Helias Scotus abbas, qui monasterium S. Pantaleonis et S. Martini in Colonia pariter regebat, Pilgrinus Colonien- sis archiepiscopus invidiosis viris instigatus Heliam abbatem voluit expellere et omnes Scotos monachos, quos secum habebat. Helias Scotus abbas statim, cum de aula regia revertisset, dixit cum cacteris Scotis; Si Christus in nobis peregrinis est, nunquam vivus ad Coloniam veniat Piligrinus. Et ita Deus complevit. See also Mabillon, ib. ad A. 1035.

(10) Florence of Worcester, at A. 1042.

(11) Marianus Scotus has at A. 1042. "Helias Scotus obiit 2. id Aprilis, vir prudens et religiosus." Florence of Worcester, following him as usual, has the same. In various Irish annals, quoted by Colgan, (AA. SS. p. 107.) we read at said year; "Elias or Elill, from the monastery of Monaghan, head of the Irish monks, died at Cologne."

(12) See the Bollandists at Marianus and Murcherat, 9 February, where they have an excellent dissertation concerning the Scot or Irish monasteries founded in Germany in the 11th and 12th centuries. They prove, that all those monasteries were inhabited by Irishmen, with scarcely an exception, although in later times, when the Irish ceased to crowd to foreign countries, they were usurped by the Scotch in consequence of the equivocation of the name Scots. Of this more hereafter.

(13) Marianus Scotus, having mentioned the death of Richard, abbot of Fulda, in 1039, adds, "Hic etiam multos Scotus secum habebat."

(14) Colgan and Bollandus treat of this saint at 30 January.

(15) Colgan observes, that Siolnamchadha signifies the race of Anmchad, a chieftain, from whom that noble family descended. Harris says (Antiq. ch. 7.) that it was called also Silanchia, and that the district was the country of the O'Maddens.

(16) This Corcran wrote a tract concerning the relics and virtues of St. Gormgal, who died in 1017, (see Chap. xxiii. §. 16.) which Colgan, who had a copy of it, calls divine. He thinks that he was the same as the celebrated Corcran, who died at Lismore in 1040. (See ib. §. 15.) But Corcran of Lismore is not called an abbot, nor even a monk. He is indeed styled anchorit; but, considering the manner in which he is spoken of as a distinguished ecclesiastes and chief master, or public professor, he was in all probability a secular priest.

(17) Bibere ab eo petierunt. Colgan explains these words as if the strangers had asked him to take part of what they had before them. Yet they might be understood as meaning that, although the meal was over, they applied to him for some drink, a demand which was probably not conformable to the discipline of the house.

(18) At A. 1043. The whole of it is not in any printed copy of Marianus' chronicle, that I have seen; but it is quoted from his text by Florence of Worcester at said year.

(19) Who this Tigernach was will be inquired lower down.

§ III. The same Marianus relates, that there was in these times a very famous man in Ireland, and of an extraordinary way of acting with regard to religion, Alderic, or rather Aidus, surnamed barbosus, or the bearded. (20) He used to tonsure women and little boys like clergymen, and to announce that converted women ought not to wear veils. Of them, and of girls, boys, and laymen he had a great school. On account of these singularities he was obliged to leave Ireland in 1053. (21) Whither he went we are not informed, nor why some have reckoned him among the Irish writers. (22)

At the year 1058 he gives us an account of the extraordinary conduct of Paternus a Scot, that is, most probably an Irish monk and recluse of a monastery of Paderborn. There were two monasteries in that city, one annexed to the cathedral, and the other consisting merely of monks (23) in which was Paternus, who had lived there as a recluse for many years. A fire broke out in Paderborn on the Friday before Palm Sunday, which was in said year the 10th of April. It had been foretold by Paternus, and seems to have continued for some days. By it the whole city and the two monasteries were consumed; but, while it was raging, Paternus could not by any means be induced to quit his cell, and remained there for the purpose of obtaining, as he supposed, the crown of martyrdom. Whether he was right in this notion is a very questionable point; unless it be maintained, that the vow, which he had made of never leaving his cell, may be considered as an apology for his determination to let himself be burned to death, as in fact he was. Be this as it may, some persons looked upon him as a real martyr; and one of them was Marianus himself, who set out from Cologne not many days after, viz. on the Monday after Low Sunday, for Paderborn, and having visited his tomb on account of the good things that were said of it, prayed on the very mat, on which Paternus had been burned. Thence Marianus went to Fulda together with the abbot of that monastery, who, it seems, had visited Paderborn for a similar purpose. (24)

Marianus, now referred to, who is surnamed Scotus, according to the style of the times, was a native of Ireland and born in 1028. (25) He retired from the world in 1052, and became a monk in, as seems very probable, the monastery of Clonard; for he makes mention of one Tigernach as superior of the establishment he belonged to before he left Ireland. Clonard was governed from the year 1055 until 1061 by Tigernach Borchech, the successor of Tuathal O'Fellarmuin. (26) Tigernach was a very holy man, (27) and there is great reason to think, that he was the superior (28) who, as we have seen above, related to Marianus the reason of St. Amnichad's having gone abroad, and which probably induced him also to quit his country, as he did in 1056, in which year he joined on the 1st of August, the Irish monks of St. Martin at Cologne. There he remained until 1058, when he visited Paderborn, and thence went to Fulda. Somewhat early in 1059, he was ordained priest at Wurtzburg, and not long after became a recluse at Fulda, in which state he spent there ten years.

(29) Concerning this great man more will be seen hereafter.

(20) Florence of Worcestester (at A. 1054) calls him Aedd clericus barbosus, or bearded clerk. See also Ware and Harris (Writers at the eleventh century).

(21) At said year Marianus has ; “ Atdericus” (an erratum, it seems, for Aidus) “ barbosus in Hibernia, vir valde famosus et mirae religionis ; ipse enim foeminas et puerulos more clericorum coronando tondebat ; et coronas et non velata capita foeminas conversas debere praedicabat ; earumque scholam et puellarum et puerorum et laicorum multam scholam habebat. Ob id ex Hibernia projectus est.” The words, mirae religionis, are rather equivocal ; for it is difficult to suppose, that Marianus meant to exhibit him as a man of wonderful true religion. Perhaps his meaning was, that said Aidus led a very austere life, or, what seems more probable, that he had some strange superstitious notion relative to the utility of the tonsure. The notorious liar Bale, quoted by Harris adds, what Marianus does not even hint at, that he clothed the females in boys apparel for the purpose of carrying on intrigues with them. By foeminas conversas, converted females, Marianus meant the same class as that which the French call converties, and the Italians convertite, who wear a peculiar sort of dress, and live retired in establishments similar to our asylums. That there were institutions for persons of this sort in Ireland at that period may be collected from this narrative.

(22) See Ware and Harris, ib.

(23) Mabillon (Annal. Ben ad A. 1058.) calls it monasterium Abdinchofense.

(24) See Marianus’ chronicle at A. 1058, and compare with Florence of Worcester at said year, and Mabillon, loc. cit.

(25) He tells us himself at A. 1028, that this was the year of his birth. It would be superfluous to enter into a long argument to prove, that Marianus was an Irishman. This is attested by his follower Florence of Worcester, who has (Chron. ad A. 1028) ; “ Hoc anno natus est Marianus Hibernensis probabilis Scotus ; cuius studio et labore haec chronica praecellens est de diversis libris coadunata.” Florence was partly contemporary with Maria-nus, who died in 1086, whereas Florence did not live beyond 1118. Usher quotes (Pr. p. 735.) from a chronicle of the Cottonian library a passage of the same import; “Anno 1028. Marianus chronographus Hibernensis Scottus natus est, qui Chronicam Chronicorum composuit.” The Scotch themselves formerly allowed, that Marianus was an Irish Scot, as Usher shows (ib.) from the allegation of John de Merton in the year 1301. But in later times some Scotch writers, actuated by a silly national vanity, have pretended that he was a British Scot. And as such he is treated of by Mackenzie, Lives of the Writers of the Scots nation, Vol 1. p. 99, seqq. in a rhapsody not worth animadverting upon. What are we to think of an author, who makes even Rabanus Maurus a Scotchman? Labbe, De Scriptor. Eccles. Dupin, and the editors of Moreri, not to mention others, hold that Marianus was a native of Ireland.

(26) See Harris (Bishops of Meath, p. 140.) and Archdall at Clonard.

(27) In the Annals of Clonmacnois, followed by the 4 Masters, on occasion of mentioning the death of Tigernach Borchech in 1061 it is stated, that he was a great spiritual director, an anchoret, and comorban of St. Finnian. (See AA. SS. p. 206.) Colgan adds, that his name is in some Irish calendars at 13 March. His being called comorban of St. Finnian might lead one to think, that he was bishop of Clonard; but, as I have observed elsewhere, it is doubtful whether Finnian was a bishop; and it is remarkable, that in the list of the superiors of Clonard (ib. p. 407.) some are called bishops and others only comorbans. If those comorbans had been all bishops, why were they not styled so?

(28) It might be suspected, that Tigernach the superior of Marianus was the celebrated abbot and chronographer of Clonmacnois. But, besides his having outlived Marianus, it is to be observed that he was not abbot before Marianus left Ireland.

(29) For these respective dates, &c. see his chronicle and that of Florence of Worcester.

§. iv. Dubdalethe III., who was appointed archbishop of Armagh in 1049, (30) was succeeded in his professor's chair by Aidus or Hugh O'Fairreth. It is said, that Dubdalethe was only a nominal archbishop and one of the eight laymen, mentioned by St. Bernard, who enjoyed the emoluments of the see, although not in holy orders. (31) This supposition seems to be confirmed by the circumstance of Aidus O'Foirreth having been made bishop and called bishop of Armagh until his death on the 18th of June, A. D. 1056. (32) To reconcile this with Dubdalethe's being then in possession of the see, it must be supposed that Aidus was only a suffragan, and acting as such, probably, in consequence of Dubdalethe's not being authorized to exercise spiritual functions. Add, that Dubdalethe is stated to have died a great penitent, as if he had been guilty of some serious fault, perhaps the usurpation of the archiepiscopal title and rights. And it appears certain, that he resigned, at least in part, the see three years before his death, which occurred on the 1st of September in 1064. (33) For, although some Irish annals bring down his incumbency to the now mentioned date, thus allowing for it 15 years, another account gives him but twelve, and places next after him Cumascach as archbishop of Armagh, to whom it assigns three years. (34) Dubdalethe was a man of learning, and wrote certain annals of the affairs of Ireland, besides an account of the archbishops of Armagh down to his own times. (35) On his death in 1064, and apparently on Cumascach's withdrawing himself from the government of the diocese, Moeliosa (servant of Jesus) son of Amalgaid, that is, as usually supposed, the archbishop of that name, (36) took possession of the See according to the expression of the Annals of Ulster. (37) whereby an allusion seems to be made to his having been a merely nominal archbishop. And it can scarcely be doubted, that he was one of the eight married laymen above spoken of. (38) Yet in 1068 he visited Munster and made a circuit through it, the object of which must have been to exact the dues formerly established conformably to the so called Law of St. Patrick. He is, however, expressly reckoned among the archbishops of Armagh, and held that title for 27 years. (39)

(30) Chap. xxiii. §. 13.

(31) Colgan was of this opinion; but the only argument, which he adduces (Tr. Th. p. 302.) is, that Dubdalethe was, as he supposed, the father of one Aidus, archdeacon of Armagh, who died in 1108, and who is called son of Dubdalethe. This Aidus was, had he lived longer, expected to be raised to the see. These are, however, not better than conjectural proofs.

(32) Tr. Th. p. 298. Aidus O'Foirreth is not in the catalogue from the Psalter of Cashel. He died in the 75th year of his age, and was buried at Armagh. In his epitaph, written in Irish, he is styled an excellent elder and a modest bishop.

(33) Ware was mistaken (Bishops at Dubdalethe III.) in changing 1064 into 1065. O'Flaherty (MS. catalogue) has retained the 1064 of the Ulster annals; for the rule of adding a year to their dates does not generally apply to this period. Add, that the Annals of Innisfallen assign Dubdalethe's death to A. 1064.

(34) The Cashel catalogue ap. Tr. Th. p. 292. Cumascach is not mentioned in the annals either of Ulster or of the 4 Masters as archbishop of Armagh; but in the latter I find Cumascach O'Heradhain, who is called abbot of Armagh, and died in 1075. (See ib. p. 298.) O'Flaherty also has left Cumascach out of his catalogue. Yet it is difficult to believe, that his name would appear in the Cashel catalogue without any foundation; and the Annals of Innisfallen state, that Cumascach O'Heradhain was in 1060 substituted in place of Dubdalethe. The probability is that, although Dubdalethe might have been honoured with the title until his death, Cumascach, acting as his suffragan, exercised such extensive powers during the last three or four years of his incumbency, that he might have been considered as the real archbishop. Harris strove (Additions to Ware) to reconcile the Cashel catalogue, as to the 12 years for Dubdalethe, with the Annals, which allow him fifteen, by introducing one Gilla-Patrick Mac-Domnald, who died in 1052, and by making him archbishop before Dubdalethe. But this is contrary to every other account; nor do the 4 Masters, as Harris asserts, or Colgan, when expressly treating of Armagh, call Gilla-Patrick archbishop of Armagh; they give him only the title of Prior of Armagh. (See Tr. Th. p. 289. and Ind. Chron.) It is true, that in AA. SS. p. 200 said Gilla-Patrick is named as archbishop. This must be a mistake; for, had he been such, this title would appear somewhere in Tr. Th. ex. c. p. 302.

(35) See Ware (Bishops and Writers at Dubdalethe III.) and Colgan, loc. cit.

(36) See Chap. xxiii. §. 13.

(37) See Ware, Bishops at Dubdalethe III.

(38) See Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 302. St. Celsus, who became archbishop of Armagh early in the 12th century, was a grandson of Moeliosa, and a Flanagan, son of Moeliosa, is marked as having died in 1113, after, as was supposed, he was to be appointed abbot of Armagh.

(39) Catalogue from the Psalter of Cashel, and Ware, Bishops at Moeliosa.

§. v. As to the other old and regular sees, the accounts of the succession of their prelates during the second half of this century are in general far from being perfect. One O'Gernidider, bishop of Killaloe, died in 1053; Mugron O'Mutan of Cork was murdered, it seems, by robbers in 1057. Mac-Airthir, bishop of Lismore, died in 1064, and Celecair of Clonmacnois in 1067. (40) Maelmorda, bishop of Emly and successor of Clothna Muimnech, (41) died in 1075 and was succeeded by Maeliosa O'Haractain, who lived until 1093. (42) At length we meet with bishops of Ardferit. The bishop Dermot, son of Maol-Brenan, died in 1075, and his successor Mac-Craith O'Heardain in 1099. (43) Kellach Ramhar, or the fat, bishop of Saigir and abbot of Birr, died in 1079. (44) Another bishop of Killaloe, Thady O'Thady, died in 1083. (45) The death of Aidus or Hugh O'Hoisin, bishop of Tuam, is marked at 1085, and at 1086 that of his successor Erchad O'Maelomair, who was succeeded by Cormac O'Cairill, who died in 1091. (46) The episcopal succession seems to have been regularly kept up at Glendaloch. A very distinguished bishop of this see was Gilda-na-Naomh, (the servant of the saints) or Nehemias. He was a native of Leinster, and after some time, resigning his see, became abbot of the monks (Irish) of Wurtzburg, where he died on the 7th of April A. D. 1085. (47) To the same year is assigned the death of a bishop of Cork, Clerech O'Selbaic, (48) and that of Fin Mac-Gussan, bishop of Kildare. (49) Fin must have been succeeded by Ferdornach, who was certainly bishop of Kildare in 1096, (50) and seems to have resigned the see in said year. For, the death of Moelbrigid O'Brolcan, who is called bishop of Kildare and Leinster, and a celebrated man, is marked at 1097, although it is known that Ferdornach lived until 1101. The title of bishop of Leinster had been assumed also by Ferdornach in consequence of Kildare having been then considered the most respectable see in that province. After Moelbrigid O'Brolcan the next bishop was Aidus O'Heremoin, who died in 1100, and then is mentioned at 1101 the death of Ferdornach. (51) Another bishop of Lismore, Maelduin O'Rebecain, died in 1091, and O'Malvain of Cloyne in 1095, in which year died also Carbre O'Kethernuigh (Kearney) bishop of Ferns. (52) One O'Burgus, who died in 1081, is called comorban of Inniscatthy; (53) but I cannot decide whether he were bishop of that place, as I think I could, were he styled comorban of St. Senan its first bishop. Idunan, who together with some others signed, in 1096, a letter, of which lower down, to St. Anselm archbishop of Canterbury, styling himself bishop of Meath, (54) was in all probability bishop of Clonard, and, it seems, the first of that see who assumed the title of Meath, which after some time became the usual one of his successors. (55) Concerning Idunan I cannot find any thing further, nor even the year of his death. In the same manner as he called himself bishop of Meath, so I meet with a bishop under the title of Leinster in general, Kelius son of Donagan, who is represented as a distinguished elder among those of Ireland, and died in the reputation of sanctity at Glendaloch in 1076. (56) It might seem, that he was bishop of Kildare, as Ferdonnach was who gave himself said title; but it is to be observed, that his name does not occur in the catalogues expressly drawn up of the prelates of Kildare, (57) and it is probable that the title, bishop of Leinster, means no more than that he was a Leinster bishop, and that he was so called in consequence of there not remaining any record of the particular see or place, which he governed.

(40) Ware, Bishops at the respective sees. Harris has added two bishops of Clonmacnois in these times, viz Ectigern O'Ergain, who died in 1052, and Alild O'Harretaigh, who died in 1070. He found them in AA. SS. p. 407, under the title of comorbans of St. Kieran of Clonmacnois, and as having both died in pilgrimage at Clonard. But he had no right to make them bishops; for, comorban of St Kieran, &c. means only abbot of Clonmacnois, whereas that St. Kieran had not been a bishop.

(41) See Chap. xxiv. §. 14. (42) Ware at Emly.

(43) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1075 and 1099; and Ware at Ardfert. In said Annals I find under A. 1010 these words; "The primate of Ireland in Aghadoe died." Have they a reference to some Kerry bishop of that period? I am equally at a loss to understand another passage at said year; "Marcan son of Kennedy, supreme head of the clergy of Munster, died." I find no Marcan at Emly during that period, and I am much inclined to think, that Marcan was bishop of Cashel, which see had, partly as the civil metropolis of Munster, and partly in memory of Cormac Mac Culinan, probably acquired an ecclesiastical ascendancy. Marcan's being called son of Kennedy in the very part of those annals, where Brian (Boroimhe) is so often named as son of Kennedy, seems to indicate, that he was a brother of his. (See Chap. xxii. §. 4.) For Marcan see more below, Not. 120.

(44) He is called comorban of Kieran of Saigir, and hence may be supposed to have been a bishop. See AA. SS. p. 473. and Harris, Bishops, at Ossory.

(45) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Killaloe.

(46) Ib. at Tuam, and Tr. Th. p. 308.

(47) AA. SS. p. 200. where Colgan calls him Nehemias, and Harris, Bishops at Glendaloch, Harris next before him makes mention of Cormac, son of Fithbran, not Fitzbran as he has, who died in 925. He doubts whether he were bishop of Glendaloch; and indeed justly; for, as far as I know, all that is said of him is what the 4 Masters have (ap. AA. SS. p. 386); Cormac of Glendaloch, son of Fithbran, died in 925. Of the Irish monastery of Wurtzburg more will be seen hereafter.

(48) Ware and Harris at Cork. Ware has added, but I believe without sufficient reason, a year to the date 1085 of the Annals of Loughkee.

(49) Colgan says, (Tr. Th. p. 630.) that this bishop died in the church of Killachad. Ware (Bishops at Kildare) has Achonry. I think that he should have rather said Killeigh (in the King's county), where there was, as we have often seen, a very ancient and famous monastery, and where Ware himself tells us that a bishop of Kildare died in 1160.

(50) Usher, Ind. Chron. ad A. 1096.

(51) Tr. Th. p. 630. Ware (Bishops at Kildare) says, I know not on what authority, that Ferdornach returned again to the see, meaning after the death of Aidus O'Heremoin. Is it because, where his death is marked at 1101, he is called bishop of Kildare? But he might have been called so without having resumed the office, remaining, as we would say, an ex-bishop. I suspect, that Ware was mistaken in changing the date 1101 into 1102.

(52) Ware, Bishops at said sees, and AA. SS. p. 223.

(53) AA. SS. p. 542. and Harris, Bishops p. 502.

(54) See Ep. 34. in Usher's Ep. Hib. Syll.

(55) See Ware, Bishops at Meath. Were we to allow that, persons, called comorbans of Finian of Clonard, were bishops, we should add for that see in those times Tuathal O'Follanmuin, who died in 1055, and one or two more, whose names are mentioned by Colgan, AA. SS. p. 407. and Ware and Harris, Bishops ib. But they were probably only abbots. (See above Not. 27.)

(56) 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 308.)

(57) Kelius is not mentioned in Colgan's minute list of the prelates, &c. of Kildare, (Tr. Th. p. 229. seqq.) and consequently is omitted by Ware and Harris.

§. VI. A very illustrious prelate of this period was Domnald O'Heine (58) bishop, or, as some have called him, archbishop of Cashel. He was of the royal house of the Dalcassians, and is most highly praised in our annals as an excellent bishop, exceedingly learned, pious, and charitable. He died on the 1st of December, A. D. 1098, in the 70th year of his age. (59) He was succeeded by Moelmurry O'Dunain, who is also called archbishop. But of this title more elsewhere. Domnald was undoubtedly the Irish bishop Domnald, to whom there is extant a letter or answer of Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, written in 1081. (60) And hence it appears that those were highly mistaken, who thought, that this Domnald was archbishop of Armagh, as likewise others, who confounded him with Donatus bishop of Dublin. (61) Domnald had, together with some other persons, written a letter to Lanfranc, in which, as appears from the answer, he expressed a wish to know, whether it were true that in England and some other countries an opinion was held, that infants, although baptized, could not be saved without actually receiving eucharistical communion. It seems, that, as the practice of giving the holy Eucharist to infants after baptism continued for many centuries, as was certainly the case in some parts of France down to perhaps the tenth, there was a question in the Irish schools concerning the necessity of that practice; and accordingly Lanfranc was applied to as a theologian highly capable both of deciding upon it and of declaring the doctrine held in other countries on this point. His answer, though short, is excellent; and he shows, that Eucharistical communion is not in all cases whatsoever necessary for eternal salvation. With regard to some literary topics, which Domnald had proposed to him, Lanfranc observes that he had given up studies of this nature since he became charged with pastoral duties. Domnald was also, as will be seen, one of the persons, who signed the letter to St. Anselm in 1096.

(58) Ware (at Archbishops of Cashel) says, that he was called O'Hene or Buahein. This Buahein is a droll mistake for Hua-Hein, or O'Hein, which was Domnald's real surname, or, as in the Annals of Innisfallen, O'Heine.

(59) The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 308.) have; "A. 1098. " Domnald Hua-Henne, of the Dalcassian family, a chief director of consciences and a noble bishop, second to no Irishman " in wisdom or piety, source of religion to Western Europe, the " most able doctor of the Irish in the Roman or Canon law, " ended this life on the 1st of December in the 70th year of his " age." And at the same year we read in the annals of Innisfallen; " Donald O'Heine, archbishop of Cashel, and the most " celebrated for piety, wisdom, and charity throughout the whole " kingdom, died." It is odd, that Ware assigns his death to 1090 or 1097. I wish he had not neglected, as he too often does, to give us his authority for either of these dates.

(60) This letter was published by Usher in the Ep. Hib. Syll. (No. 28.) and afterwards by Dachery among the works of St. Lanfranc, where it is marked Ep. 33. Usher observes from the Annals of Canterbury, in which the name Domnald is expressly mentioned, that it was written in the eleventh year of Lanfranc's episcopacy, which was A. D. 1081.

(61) Usher himself in his note on said letter fell into the error of supposing, that Domnald, to whom it was addressed, was archbishop of Armagh. He seems not to have known, or to have forgot, that Domnald of Armagh was not archbishop there until 1091. Even Ware (at Domnald or Donald of Armagh) has committed the same mistake, notwithstanding his having marked the year of Domnald's accession; but he seems to have overlooked the date of the letter. Harris (ib.) has copied this mistake. Dachery says, that Domnald was either of Armagh or of Dublin, as a metropolitan of Ireland; but Lanfranc does not give him any such title; nor was the bishop of Dublin at that time a metropolitan. This, together with some other points touched upon by Dacherly in his note, shows that he was very little acquainted with the ecclesiastical state of Ireland in old times. Some English writers make Domnald the same as Donatus bishop of Dublin, in consequence, it seems, of the name Domnald not being, in some MSS., written full at the head of the letter, but, instead of it, only the capital D. Had they reflected on what Usher quoted from the Annals of Canterbury, they would have found, that D. stood for Domnald, a very different name from that of Donatus, which was originally Dunan or perhaps Donagh. (See Chap. xxiii. §. 16.) Next it is evident that, as it was written in 1081, it could not have been directed to Donatus of Dublin, who died in 1074. Wilkins, who published it, (Concil. M. Br. &c. Vol. 1. p. 361.) as if addressed to Donatus, has given it, seemingly to ward off this difficulty, a wrong date, viz. A. 1073. Harris, although he had followed Ware in confounding Domnald with the one of Armagh, yet elsewhere (Bishops of Dublin at Donat) joins Wilkins in making him the same as Donatus. All this bungling would have been avoided, had due attention been paid to what the Irish annals state concerning Domnald of Cashel. He was the only bishop, at least of any note, in Ireland, of that name, in the year 1081.

§. vii. Donatus, or rather Dunan, (62) bishop of Dublin, died on the 6th of May, A. D. 1074, and was buried in his cathedral of the Holy Trinity near the great altar at the right side of it. (63) The clergy and people of Dublin then elected as his successor a priest, named Patrick, who, in all probability, was not, as is usually said, a Dane but an Irishman. (64) He had been recommended to them by Gothric, then king of Dublin, (65) who is supposed to have been the same as Godred, surnamed Crouan, king of the Isle of Mann, who, sometime before, had conquered Dublin and part of Leinster. (66) Patrick was sent by Gothric to Lanfranc, to be consecrated by him, bearing a letter from the clergy and people of Dublin in these terms; (67) “To the “ venerable metropolitan of the holy church of “ Canterbury Lanfranc the clergy and people of “ the church of Dublin offer due obedience. It is “ known to your paternity, that the church of “ Dublin, which is the metropolis of the island of “ Ireland, (68) is bereft of its pastor and destitute

 “ of a ruler. We have therefore chosen a priest, “ named Patrick, very well known to us, of noble “ birth and conduct, versed in apostolical and ec“ clesiastical discipline, in faith a Catholic, cautious
 “ as to the meaning of the Scriptures, and well “ trained in ecclesiastical dogmas ; who, we request,
 “ may be ordained bishop for us as soon as possible,
 “ that under the authority of God he may be able “ to preside over us regularly and be useful to us,
 “ and that under his government we may be able to “ combat with advantage. For the integrity of “ superiors constitutes the safety of the subjects,
 “ and, where there is the healthfulness of obedience,
 “ there the form of instruction is salutary.” On his arrival Patrick was examined, as usual, by Lanfranc, and, being found well qualified for the episcopal office, was consecrated by him in St. Paul’s church, London, (69) after having previously made the following profession of obedience. (70) “ Whoever “ presides over others ought not to scorn to be “ subject to others, but rather make it his study to “ humbly render, in God’s name, to his superiors
 “ the obedience, which he expects from those, who “ are placed under him. On this account I Patrick, “ elected prelate to govern Dublin the metropolis of “ Ireland do, reverend father Lanfranc, primate of “ the Britains, (71) and archbishop of the holy “ church of Canterbury, offer to thee this charter of “ my profession ; and I promise to obey thee and “ thy successors in all things appertaining to the “ Christian religion.” The preamble to this profession sufficiently indicates, that it was a new practice, and that Patrick was the first bishop of Dublin, who, at least previous to his consecration, declared his obedience to the archbishop of Canterbury. What necessity would there have been for such parade about not scorning to be subject to others, and talking of offering a charter of profession, if such a circumstance had occurred before? For, if it had, Patrick would have been obliged, whether he would or not, to declare his obedience in the simple and positive form used by such of his predecessors as remained subject to Canterbury. (72)

(62) See Chap. xxiii. §. 16.

(63) Annals of Dublin, ap. Usher (Syll. Not. ad Ep. 25.) and Ware Bishops of Dublin at Donatus.

(64) Ware represents him (ib. at Patrick) as an Ostman or Dane in like manner as he had Donatus, of whom we have seen already. For this he had, as far as I can discover, no authority except the mere supposition, that the bishop of a Danish city must have been himself a Dane. But this would prove too much; for the two O'Hanlys, who succeeded Patrick in the see of Dublin, are acknowledged to have been Irishmen, as their name sufficiently proves, that is, of old Irish, not Danish families. And it is in this sense that I say, that both Donatus and Patrick were probably Irish; for according to another acceptation the Danes themselves of these times, settled in Ireland, might be called Irish, as having been born in this country. It is also to be observed, that Dublin was not quite so much a Danish city but that there were families of the old Irish stock living in it. And it appears to me highly probable, that its clergy were at this period chiefly, if not universally, Irish. The Danes were too much occupied in commerce, piracy, and wars to spare persons for the ecclesiastical state; and I believe, that in the same manner as in Gaul, Italy and Spain, after they were conquered by the barbarians of the North, and after these barbarians became Christians and Catholics, the clergy consisted for a considerable time of members of the old families of said countries; the clergy also of Ireland that lived among the converted Danes, were usually chosen in the early times of their conversion, from the families strictly called Irish. We shall see an instance of this practice in the case of Malchus, the first bishop of Waterford. To return to Patrick, his name is certainly Irish, not Scandinavian; and to make it appear more strongly so, he is called Gilla or Gilla-Patrick in the annals of the 4 Masters at A. 1084 ap AA. SS. p. 200.

(65) Annals of Dublin ap Usher, loc. cit.

(66) In the Chronicon Manniae ap. Johnstone (App. to Antiq. Celto-Scand. &c.) Godred Crouan is said to have been son of Harald the black of Iceland. He subdued Mann, and afterwards attacked Dublin, which he got possession of together with, according to said chronicle, a great part of Leinster. His words are; "Godredus subjugavit sibi Dubliniam et magnam partem de Laynestir—Regnavit autem sexdecim annos, et mortuus est in insula, quae vocatur Yle." Usher, who quotes this passage (Syll. &c. Not. ad Ep. 26.) places this conquest of Dublin in 1066, as does also Ware (Antiq. cap. 24.) who however (Bishops of Dublin at Patrick) assigns it to 1070. There is some reason to think that Gothric, who was king of Dublin in 1074, was different from Godred Crouan, although Usher and Ware thought otherwise. For in the first place he is called son not of Harald but of Regnal, as the Ulster annals have, or of Ranold, as he is called in those of Innisfallen. In the latter annals we read, that in the year 1073 Godfrey (Gothric) son of Ranold, and king of the Danes of Dublin, attended at the residence of Turlogh O'Brian, king of Ireland, and submitted to him as his paramount sovereign, acknowledging himself as a vassal prince. Then they state, that in 1075 he was banished beyond sea by Turlogh, and that returning soon after to Ireland with a great fleet he died. This does not agree with what the Chronicle of Mann has concerning the death of Godred Crouan, which it places in Yle, that is, Ilay, an island of the Hebrides. The statement of this chronicle as to Godred Crouan having reigned 16 years, cannot be understood of his having reigned so long over Dublin; for he did not conquer Dublin until 1066, whereas the Danish king of said city, whether the same as Godred Crouan or not, died in 1075, as is marked also in the Annals of Ulster, which, as above observed, call him son of Regnal, alias Ranold or Reginald. By the bye, Ware had no right to change the date 1075 into 1076; for it is that also of the Annals of Innisfallen.

The 16 years of Godred Crouan's reign must therefore be understood of a reign over Mann and some of the Hebrides. And one might be induced to suspect, that his conquest of Dublin and of a great part of Leinster, as the Chronicle of Mann mentions, was merely temporary, and that the permanent king of Dublin, who was there in 1074 and died in 1075, was a different person. A further inquiry into this matter may be worth the attention of some of our antiquaries.

(67) This letter is the 25th in Usher's Sylloge, and the 36th among Lanfranc's letters in Dachery's edition of his works.

(68) It must be considered a great stretch of presumption in the Danes of those times to call Dublin the metropolis of Ireland. The most they could have said of it was, that it was the chief city of the Danes in this country. It might seem that these words are an interpolation of some late transcriber of the letter, introduced at a time when Dublin was really the metropolis, and for the purpose of directing the reader not to confound Dublinensis with some other name, ex. c. Dunelmensis, as has happened on a certain occasion, of which elsewhere. But we find a similar expression in Patrick's profession of obedience. Yet it is to be remarked, that it does not occur in those of his successors, in which is merely said of Dublin, that it is situated in Ireland.

(69) See Usher's note on said letter, Sylloge, &c.

(70) The original of this profession may be seen ib. towards the end, together with other professions of some bishops of Dublin, Waterford, and Limerick, collected by Usher. It is also in Ware's Bishops of Dublin at Patrick, and in Wharton's Anglia Sacra, Vol. 1. p. 80.

(71) The English translator of Ware (ib.) had no right to render Britanniarum by the British isles. Harris has mistranslated it in a similar manner. That name means nothing more than Great Britain, as is clear from the other professions ap. Usher, in which the archbishop of Canterbury pro tempore is addressed as totius Britanniae primas, primate of all Britain. Now Ireland was never considered as a part of Britain, although it has been sometimes comprized under the general denomination of the British islands; nor did the primacy of Canterbury ever extend to any portion of Ireland, except the three Danish towns above mentioned. It was very usual with old writers to call G. Britain Bri- tanniae, without the least allusion to Ireland, in the same manner as Gaul was called Galliae. Thus Catullus has said; Hunc Galliae timent, timent Britanniae. Dr. Milner, who would fain make the world believe, that the whole Irish church was in former times subject to the see of Canterbury, says, (Inquiry, &c. or Tour in Ireland, p. 164.) that Polybius and Ptolemy understand by Britanniae both G. Britain and Ireland. He copied this from Cressy, B. XIII. ch. 14. But both of them should have said, that they called them the British islands, (see Polybus, Hist. L. 3. p. 209 Cuaub. and Ptolemy, Geogr. L. 2. and 8. (a name not to be confounded with Britanniae, which, together with many other writers, Bede applies to G. Britain alone, ex. c. L. v. cap. 24. where he has Britannias twice, as when he says, that the emperor Claudius “Britannias adiens plurimam insulae partem in deditionem recepit;” and he has (ib.) also Britanniarum in the same limited acceptation, alluding to his having, more or less, given an account of the ecclesiastical history and state of every part of G. Britain as well Northern as Southern. I need scarcely tell the reader, that the division of Britain, when under the Romans, into provinces, such as Britannia prima, Britannia secunda, &c. gave rise to the plural name Britanniae. It is true that Ptolemy in one place calls Ireland Little Britain, and that Apuleius, translating from a Greek passage, in which the two British islands are mentioned, has Britanniae duae. (See Usher, p. 723, 724.) But an odd instance of this sort is not sufficient to overturn the fact, that in Bede’s time, and both long before it and ever since, Ireland was not comprized under the name Britanniae. Accordingly Lanfranc’s being styled primate of the Britains signifies merely, that he was primate of all G. Britain, a title which had been opposed by Thomas, archbishop of York, and which was introduced into Patrick’s profession probably for no other reason than to attest the superiority of Canterbury over York. It would be ridiculous to suppose, that Lanfranc was considered as primate also of Ireland, which had then, and for ages before, a primate of her own; nor does there appear in any of his transactions even a hint at his claiming such a prerogative. Dr. Ledwich (Antiq. &c. p. 428) has swallowed the mistranslation of Britanniarum in the English text of Ware.

(72) In the other professions of obedience to the archbishop of Canterbury, collected by Usher in the Sylloge, we find merely an absolute promise of submission, without any reason being assigned for it. We have seen already, (Not. 138 to Chap. xxiii.) that the ecclesiastical connexion between the Danes of Ireland and Canterbury did not begin until after the Norman conquest in 1066. And in fact how could it have begun sooner? Is it to be supposed, that they would have placed themselves under the prelates of that see, while the Anglo-Saxons, a nation with whom they were as much at variance as with the Irish, ruled England? Perhaps it may be said, that they united themselves with Canterbury, prior to the reign of Edward the Confessor in 1042, while England was subject to the Danish kings for somewhat more than 20 years. But of this there does not exist any proof whatsoever, and it would be idle to speculate on a circumstance, which is not mentioned in any document. The most that may be conjectured is, that, after the conquest in 1066, perhaps Donatus entered into some engagement with the see of Canterbury, and that it was arranged before his death, that his successor should be consecrated by its archbishop. But even for this no voucher is to be found. There are two or three words in Lanfranc's letter to Gothric, king of Dublin, which may seem to insinuate, that Patrick was not the first bishop of Dublin consecrated at Canterbury. Having said that he had consecrated Patrick, he adds; "we have sent him back to his see with letters of attestation according to the practice of our predecessors, more antecessorum nostrorum. One might imagine, that Lanfranc alluded to similar letters having been given to other bishops of Dublin by former archbishops of Canterbury; and, in fact, said words are placed in the Annals of Dublin (ap. Usher, Not. ad Ep. 25. Syll.) so as apparently to convey this meaning. But this could not have been the intention of Lanfranc; for, where can any account of such letters be met with? And then who were those predecessors, who could have given them? At most there should have been only one predecessor, whereas there was only one bishop of Dublin before Patrick. Lanfranc's words must therefore be understood as signifying that, inasmuch as it was the practice of the archbishops of Canterbury to furnish such bishops, whoever they were, as they had consecrated, with testimonial letters, he followed that practice with regard to Patrick. It was requisite to inform the Danes of this custom, as they were hitherto unacquainted with the forms observed by metropolitans in such cases.

§. VIII. But this is a question of little importance compared with the extravagant position laid down by some writers, chiefly English, that the archbishops of Canterbury possessed a metropolitan, or, at least, a legatine jurisdiction over the Irish church at large, ever since the days of the monk Augustin down to these times and even later. It is strange, how such a notion could have been entertained, whereas in the whole range of our ecclesiastical history there is not a single instance of the exercise of such power on the part of Canterbury, nor even of a pretension to such a claim with regard to any part of Ireland, except Dublin, Waterford, and Limerick, when after the Norman conquest of England the Danes of these cities subjected their bishops to that see. It was after that great event, that, as far as I can discover, the idea of Canterbury having at any time enjoyed a metropolitan or primatial jurisdiction over Ireland was first started in England. This was in a council held at Winchester A. D. 1072, in the presence of William the conqueror, for the purpose of deciding on the question of the primacy between Canterbury and York. In it Bede's authority was alleged to make it appear, that until his times Canterbury was possessed of a primatial authority not only over Great Britain but likewise over Ireland. (73) This ridiculous assumption, for which, speaking of primatial or metropolitan power, there is not a single argument or even hint in Bede's works, has been picked up by certain authors, who brought down that pretended jurisdiction over Ireland to a later period, and have imposed on some otherwise learned writers. (74) As this nonsense was found to be untenable, an attempt has been made to uphold some sort of predominance of the see of Canterbury over the whole

Irish church, and hence has arisen the fable that the archbishops of that see had constantly claimed, from the times of Augustin, a legatine power over Ireland. (75) The chief foundation, on which it is built, is the supposition that Pope Gregory the great had included Ireland among the countries, over which he conferred a legatine jurisdiction to the missionary Augustin. (76) Now, admitting for a while that he had done so, what has this to do with the rights of Augustine's successors at Canterbury? Surely the legatine power does not of itself descend to the successors of such bishops as may have been invested with it. Every one any way acquainted with the Canon law knows, that it is usually a temporary and not permanent sort of power attached to any see. Gregory did not declare, that it was his intention that the successors of Augustin should be invested with said power, nor in the words, by which he granted it to him, has he even alluded to them. Accordingly, whatsoever were the places or countries comprized in the Pope's grant to Augustin, the legatine jurisdiction was peculiar to Augustin himself; nor could his successors claim it as a right inseparable from the archbishopric of Canterbury. Hence it follows that, supposing even that Ireland was included within the sphere of Augustin's jurisdiction as legate, his successors were not invested with any power relative to it. (77)

(73) See Fleury, Hist. Eccl. L. 61 §. 51. The assertion made in that council was false even as to a considerable part of Great Britain. For the jurisdiction of Canterbury did not in former times extend to such parts of North Britain as had not belonged to the Anglo-Saxons. It was not recognized by the British Scots or by the Northern Picts, whose primate was for centuries no other than the abbot of Hy. But I am not writing the Church history of Scotland.

(74) Among the abettors of that foolish position were Campion and Hamner, the former of whom was well chastised by Usher (see Not. 138. to Chap. xxiii.) and the latter excited the indignation of honest Keating (History, &c. B. 2. p. 100. Dublin ed.). For an answer to similar petty writers I refer the reader to Harris, Bishops, p. 312 and 526. Cressy has the same stuff (Church history, &c. B. xiii. ch. 14.) founding it on Lanfranc's letter above mentioned to Gothric, and on the letter, relative to the see of Waterford, written to Anselm in 1096; as if all Ireland consisted only of Dublin and Waterford. But I was greatly surprized to find so learned a man as Dachery abetting this absurdity. In a note to Lanfranc's Ep. 3. he says, that the Irish bishops were subject to the see of Canterbury, and as a proof of it refers to the professions of obedience collected by Usher in the Sylloge, not knowing that Usher had shown elsewhere, that such professions were confined to Dublin, Waterford, and Limerick. And in a note to Ep. 33. he states, that the metropolitan of Ireland was subject to that of Canterbury. How ignorant Dachery was of our ecclesiastical system appears from his applying (ib.) to Ireland what Bede has (Hist. &c. L. c. 4.) concerning the bishops of North Pictland being subject to the abbot of Hy.

(75) Who was the inventor of this story I do not know; but Dr. Milner has retailed it to us in the place quoted above (Not. 71.) thus modifying the system of his favourite Cressy. But some of his arguments, being similar to those of Cressy, would, if good for any thing, prove that said supposed jurisdiction was not merely legatine, but likewise metropolitan.

(76) Dr. Milner says, that the archbishops of Canterbury claimed this jurisdiction "ever since the time of St. Augustine, by virtue of the authority over all the Britains, conferred by St. Gregory upon this our apostle." Instead of over all the Britains, he should have written, over all the bishops of the Britains; for Gregory's words, as in Bede, (L. 1. c. 27.) and which are quoted by Dr. Milner himself, are; "Britanniarum vero omnes episcopos tuae fraternitati committimus." For the word Britanniarum see above Not. 71.

(77) It is extraordinary, that Dr. Milner could have argued from the legatine power having been conferred upon Augustin, that it was derived to all his successors. He cannot be ignorant of the nature of that sort of power; and as to the fact of its being exercised or claimed by all the archbishops of Canterbury, it would be a hopeless task to attempt to prove it. We have had legates apostolic in Ireland, the first of whom was Gillebert bishop of Limerick. Have the subsequent bishops of Limerick therefore pretended, that they also were invested with the legatine jurisdiction? Or have the successors of St. Malachy of Armagh, or of St. Lawrence of Dublin, both legates apostolic, claimed that dignity? It is true, that with regard to England, whenever a Pope thought fit to appoint a legate for that country, a traditional rule was observed that the archbishop of Canterbury should be the person; and hence it was that Guy, archbishop of Vienne, who in the year 1100 came to England as legate apostolic, would not be received as such. But this was a system very different from that, which would make every archbishop of Canterbury an apostolic legate. If such were the case, a new act of the Pope would not have been necessary for granting the legatine power to an archbishop of that see. Now it is certain that it was; and we find, that even Lanfranc did not enjoy it until about a year after he was actually archbishop of Canterbury, when he received it, and relatively to England alone, from Pope Alexander III. (See Fleury, L. 61. §. 36.)

§. IX. The truth, however, is, that Ireland was not included in the grant of the legatine jurisdiction made by Pope Gregory to Augustine. The first legate ever placed over this country was Gillebert, bishop of Limerick, who flourished in the close of the eleventh and the early part of the twelfth century. (78) No argument whatsoever occurs to show, that Augustin received such authority with regard to Ireland, except the misinterpretation of one word, Britanniarum, which, instead of being understood, as it ought, of Great Britain alone, has been made to comprehend likewise Ireland. (79) Augustin's legatine power was confined to G. Britain, over all whose bishops the Pope gave him an authoritative right of inspection and superintendence, and that for a very good reason, viz. that, in consequence of the Saxon invasion and devastations, religion, ecclesiastical discipline, and morality had greatly declined among the Britons. (80) On the contrary the Irish church was at that period in a most flourishing state, abounding in saints and learned men, as we have seen in the history of the sixth and seventh centuries, and as must have been well known by Augustin, who was then so near us, and by Pope Gregory himself, had he even no further proof of it than the extraordinary sanctity and reputation of St. Columbanus and his companions, who were already in the continent. The Irish bishops and clergy of those days were so attentive to their duties, that there was no necessity for placing a superintendent over them. So far from Augustin having meddled with the ecclesiastical affairs of Ireland, it is clear that he did not enter into any communications or correspondence with the Irish prelates or abbots, &c. (81) Had he thought himself invested with any jurisdiction over the bishops of Ireland, he certainly would, at least, have apprized them of his possessing it. Nor, although some of our old writers have mentioned certain persons as having been at early times apostolical legates for Ireland, such as David, an archbishop of Armagh, and St. Laserian of Leighlin, (82) yet not a word is to be found in any Irish document of Augustin having ever exercised or thought of exercising such jurisdiction, or of his having been so styled, with regard to Ireland.

(78) See St. Bernard, Vita S. Malachiae, cap. 7.

(79) Among other questions Augustin had asked of the Pope how he should act with regard to the bishops of the Gauls and of the Britains; "Qualiter debemus cum Galliarum Britanniarumque episcopis agere?" The Pope answers, that he gives him no authority whatsoever over the bishops of the Gauls, but tells him that, if he should happen to go to the Gauls, and that he find any bishops guilty of misconduct, he may admonish and advise them to reform themselves, without, however, assuming any sort of jurisdiction over them. For, he says, if the exercise of authority be necessary to recal such bishops to their duty, you must treat with the bishop of Arles as the person invested with power over the Gauls, and excite him to act with vigour. “ But we entrust all the bishops of the Britains (Britanniarum vero omnes episcopos) to your fraternity, that the unlearned may be instructed, the weak strengthened by persuasion, and the perverse corrected by authority. (See Interrog. vii. ap. Bede, L. 1. c. 27.) Here there is not a word relative to Ireland, and it is a pitiful quibble to lay any stress upon Augustin’s and consequently Gregory’s having called Great Britain by the plural name Britanniarum in the same manner as they gave to Gaul that of Galliarum. Of what consequence is it, that one or two writers, touching on the topography of these islands, may have in a loose manner called them Britanniae? The question is what did Augustin, and accordingly Gregory, mean in using that name on an occasion, in which particular precision was requisite. If they had Ireland at all in view, surely they would, according to the general phraseology of the times, have added Scotia, or mentioned the bishops of the Scots who inhabit Ireland, as Bede does, (L. 2. c. 4.) where he speaks of the letter of Laurentius, &c. to the bishops of Scotia or Ireland. And if there was any idea of Ireland being included under the Britanniarum of Augustin and Gregory, Bede would certainly have made some observation on it; but such a notion never struck him, and he himself used that word as also Britannias for Great Britain alone. (See above Not. 71.)

(80) Fleury, who had no idea of Dr. Milner’s interpretation of Britanniarum, having stated, (L. 36. §. 38.) that the Pope granted a jurisdiction to Augustin over the bishops of Britain, adds; “ C’etoit les évêques des Bretons, anciens habitans de l’île, chrétiens depuis long-temps, mais tombés dans l’ignorance et la corruption des mœurs.”

(81) This is sufficiently clear from the letter of Laurence, &c. to the Irish bishops and abbots ap. Bede L. 2. c. 4. (see Not. 233 to Chap. xiv.); for in it they say, that they did not know that the Irish followed ecclesiastical practices not different from those of the Britons, until they learned it through the bishop Dagan after his arrival in Britain. If Augustin, who was dead at this time, had had any correspondence with the Irish prelates, this want of information could not have continued until the interview took place between Laurence &c. and Dagan.

(82) For David see Chap. x. §. 13. As for Laserian having been styled legatus apostolicus, it meant originally nothing more than that he had been deputed to Rome as a messenger or agent relatively to the Paschal question. (See Chap. xv. §. 9.)

§. x. Another argument in favour of the pretended power of the archbishops of Canterbury has been squeezed from the circumstance of Laurence, the successor of Augustine, having written, together with Mellitus and Justus, to the bishops and abbots of Ireland concerning certain Irish practices, which they thought wrong, and from an observation of Bede that Laurence, by so doing, extended his pastoral solicitude to the people of Ireland. (83) But neither in said letter nor in Bede's remark is there any thing to make it appear, that Laurence acted in the capacity of an apostolic legate, or that he pretended to any jurisdiction over the Irish church. From the little of it that remains it is evident, that it was a letter merely of exhortation and advice, such as every bishop or number of bishops might write to other bishops without claiming any authority over them. Innumerable letters of this kind are to be met with in ecclesiastical history, and many of them written even to Popes. Laurence assumes no title indicating a special power with regard to the Irish clergy, and calls himself, Mellitus, and Justus, simply bishops. Were it to follow from the writing of the letter that Laurence was invested with jurisdiction over the bishops of Ireland, it should be allowed that so were also Mellitus and Justus. And as to Bede's expression of extending pastoral solicitude, it would be ridiculous to deduce from it, that he alluded to the exercise or to an act of legatine power; for, were such words to be understood in this manner, some thousands of bishops, who have interfered in a similar way with those of other provinces, should be styled legates apostolic. If Bede meant to exhibit Laurence as acting in a legatine capacity, he would not have failed to tell us, that he was invested with a particular jurisdiction of that sort. (84)

To prop up this tottering system an argument of a strange kind has been patched up, founded on a hypothesis, for which there is not the least foundation. It is, that the reason, for which Pope Eugenius III. sent four palls to Ireland by Cardinal Paparo in the year 1152, was to protect the Irish church against the claims of the archbishops of Canterbury, and that thereby it should be recognized as independent of any foreign jurisdiction except that of the see of Rome. This must be the invention of some modern stickler for English ecclesiastical predominance over Ireland; for there is not even a hint at such a motive for palls having been sent to Ireland in any genuine account of those times relative to said transaction; nor are any pretensions of Canterbury at all spoken of as having had any thing to do with the granting of said palls. (85) But of them, and how and why they were granted, more in the proper place.

(83) Bede L. 2. c. 4. where the reader will find the beginning of said letter, which has been mentioned above, Not. 79 and 81.

(84) It must have been on a misinterpretation of these words of Bede that the pretended claim of the see of Canterbury to primatial jurisdiction over Ireland, alleged in the council of 1072 at Winchester, (see above §. 8.) was chiefly founded. Dr. Milner confines the meaning of them to the legatine power over Ireland. But I think I have sufficiently shown, that they do not mean either the one or the other. The fact is, that Laurence &c. in writing to the Irish prelates conducted themselves in a manner quite similar to that, in which Gregory the great told Augustin that he might act with regard to the bishops of the Gauls, viz. by way of admonition and advice, without, however, pretending to any authority over them; (See Not. 79.) and indeed every bishop may do the same. Dr. Milner then brings forward, from Cressy, Lanfranc's jurisdiction over Patrick, bishop of Dublin, and the letter to Anselm. (See Not. 74.) But of these arguments enough has been said already; and I shall only add that, if they could prove any thing with regard to a jurisdiction over all Ireland, it would be that Lanfranc and Anselm were really our primates as well as of England.

(85) Dr Milner has (loc. cit.) this paradoxical statement, which I confess I never heard of before. He must have taken it from some English writer; but who he was we are not informed. Dr. Milner was answering some ridiculous and false positions of Ledwich with regard to Paparo having come to Ireland, brought palls, &c. for the purpose of extinguishing our ancient doctrines and discipline. (See his Antiq. &c. p. 444.) It would have been easy to refute and expose Ledwich's nonsense; but Dr. Milner contents himself with saying, that "the bestowing of palls—was not in fact, nor was it considered any subjection of the Church of Ireland to that of Rome. On the contrary, it was a dignity and an immunity from foreign jurisdiction conferred upon it; in as much as the archbishop of Canterbury for the time being had claimed a legatine jurisdiction over Ireland ever since the time of St. Augustine," &c. Then he adds; "Accordingly the Irish prelates, and St. Malachy in particular, had earnestly solicited the court of Rome to send certain palls to the Church of Ireland as the proof of her immediate dependance on the see apostolic." This is surely a strange sort of refutation, to which poor Ledwich might have made a puzzling reply, if he were acquainted with the subject. Where, in the name of wonder, did Dr. Milner find, that St. Malachy's reason for applying for the pall was to get rid of the claims of Canterbury? In the whole of his Life by St. Bernard there is not a word about Canterbury or its archbishops, not even where an account is given (cap. xi.) of St. Malachy's conversation with Pope Innocent II. concerning the palls, which he requested to get for Armagh and Cashel. There is a good deal said by Keating (B. 2.) and by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 654 and 775, seqq.) with quotations from old Annals, about the palls brought by Paparo; but not even an allusion is made to their having been sent as marks of protection against Canterbury or any other see in the world. Dr. Milner tells us that Hoveden complains at A. 1151, that the granting of the four palls to the Irish metropolitans was contrary to the ancient custom and the dignity of the church of Canterbury, and quotes, as from him, these words; “Hoc factum est contra antiquam consuetudinem et dignitatem Cantuarensis ecclesiae.” Now Hoveden has not made any such complaint, nor has he said words at A. 1151. All that he says in substance at said year is, that four palls were sent to Ireland, to which palls had never been brought before. But he makes no observation on that occurrence. Somebody, no matter who, may have said what Dr. Milner ascribes to Hoveden; yet his meaning might have been relative merely to the church of Dublin, which, in consequence of its being distinguished by the pall, became exempt from the jurisdiction of Canterbury.

§. XI. Not to enlarge further on this subject, the fact is that the power exercised by Lanfranc, in consecrating Patrick and receiving his profession of canonical obedience, was not of the legatine but of the metropolitan kind according to the then general practice of the church, which Patrick, having become a suffragan of the see of Canterbury, submitted to. On his returning to Ireland, Lanfranc gave him testimonial letters, as usual, attesting his consecration, (86) together with two private letters, one for Gothric, king of Dublin, and the other for Terdelvac, who is styled the magnificent king of Ireland. (87) Gothric, although called king, was at this time a vassal of Terdelvac, or, as he is usually named, Turlogh, having submitted to him as his liege sovereign in 1073. (88) Turlogh was son of Teige, or Thaddaeus, a son of Brian Boromhe, who was killed in 1023 at the instigation of his own brother Donogh. (89) We have seen that Donogh became king of Leth-Mogha in 1026. (90) Among many other wars, in which he was engaged during his reign, he had often to contend against his nephew Turlogh, who was a very valiant prince. His kingdom was gradually reduced to Munster, which also he lost in 1064, having been dethroned; upon which he went to Rome, where he died, seemingly not long after, a great penitent in the monastery of St. Stephen. (91) Turlogh was immediately proclaimed king of Munster, and after some short time entered into a league with the celebrated king of Leinster Dermod Mac-Maol-na-mbo, thus confirming their mutual power until 1072, in which year Dermod was killed in the battle of Odhba in Meath, fighting against Connor O'Maolseachlin king of Meath, Mac-Gilla-Patrick, O'Ferral, &c. (92) After this event Turlogh marched into Ossory, Hy-Kinselagh, and other parts of Leinster, and, having received hostages from all parts of that province, became master also of Dublin, (93) whose king or prince Godfrey, or Gothric did, as above mentioned, in the following year acknowledge himself his vassal. Turlogh continued gradually to add to his preponderance over the remaining parts of Ireland. In 1073 and 1074 he brought Meath under his vassalage, in 1075 and 1076 Connaught and Breffny, and in 1079 and 1082 finally Ulster, (94) so that by this time he might be justly styled king of all Ireland, as indeed he has been. And as such he was known in the continent, as appears from a letter written to him by Pope Gregory VII. Lanfranc in his letter to him praises him most highly, and congratulates the people of Ireland on their being blessed by God with so good a king. "Our brother "and fellow bishop Patrick" he adds, "has related "so many and such great good things concerning "the pious humility of your grandeur towards the "good, strict severity against the bad, and your "most discreet equity with regard to every de- "scription of persons, that, although we have "never seen You, yet we love You as if we had, "and wish to consult your interest and to render

“ You our most sincere service, as if we had seen
 “ You and intimately known You.”

(86) See above Not. 72.

(87) Usher seems (Discourse of the Religion, &c. ch. 8.) to confound these two letters with the testimonial letters mentioned by Lanfranc in the one to Gothric. But from the text of this letter it is plain, that they were different. He calls them commendatory letters. That to Gothric is such; but the other to Turlogh contains no direct recommendation of Patrick. They are in the Sylloge at Nos. 26 and 27. and in Lanfranc's Works under Ep. 37 and 38. Harris has given them in English at Patrick, Bishops of Dublin. But he followed Baronius' edition of them, which is not as correct as Usher's.

(88) See Not. 66.

(89) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1023.

(90) See Chap. xxiii. §. 12.

(91) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1064. I do not understand, why Dr. O'Connor (Columbanus' 2d Letter, p. 80.) places Donogh's dethronement and flight to Rome in 1047, whereas the Annals now quoted, which are allowed to be the best authority for the affairs of Munster, positively assign it to 1064, at which year they mark also the accession of his successor Turlogh. Besides, they frequently make mention of him as being in Ireland several years later than 1047, and exhibit him as fighting even in 1063 against Turlogh. The Dr. says, (ib. p. 81. and 85) that Donogh died in 1064. Perhaps he did; but that was certainly likewise the year of his departure for Rome. Keating says, (B. 2. a little after the beginning) that about 77 years before the English invasion Donogh went to Rome with a commission from the principal nobility and gentry to offer themselves as subjects to that see. His chronology is not worth attending to; for, at the time he mentions, Donogh should have been about 100 years of age. But, passing by other absurdities, Donogh had no such offer to make, as if a man, so much disliked as he was in Ireland, and who was expelled from his provincial kingdom, would have been invested with a commission of that kind. And as to his offering all Ireland to Rome, it is too ridiculous a story to be at all listened to.

(92) Said Annals at A. 1072. Ware (Antiq. cap. 4.) has 1073 according to his mode of adding without necessity a year to dates. He represents Dermot as king of all Ireland; but the quoted annals do not, calling him king of Leinster; nor does O'Flaherty, who makes mention of him in the Ogygia (Part. III. cap. 94.) as a prince sometimes called, by a sort of courtesy, king of Ireland. Besides being king of Leinster, Dermot was, according to these annals (ib.) sovereign of Dublin and of the Danish isles, which must, I suppose, be understood of his having possessed a supreme power over the Danish kings or princes as his vassals and dependents.

(93) Said Annals, ib.

(94) See said Annals at the respective dates.

§. XII. Lanfranc then says, that among many things, which pleased him, he was informed of some that did not, viz. 1. that in Terdelvac's kingdom men quit their lawful wives without any canonical cause, and take to themselves others, although near to them or to the deserted wives in consanguinity, and even women who had been in like manner abandoned by their husbands. He makes the same complaint in his letter to Gothric as to his kingdom, that is, Dublin; and it is the only one he particularizes in it, where he further observes that some men used to exchange wives. There is every reason to think, that these abuses were confined chiefly to the Danes, whose Scandinavian ancestors and brethren, even of these times, were known to be very loose in this respect; and, although Lanfranc speaks of Terdelvac's kingdom, yet we may fairly suppose that, as to these abominations, he alluded to that part of it, which was held by Gothric under him. (95) For it can hardly be imagined, that the kings or clergy of Ireland at large would have tolerated practices so contrary to the canons of their church, which canons, being considered as enacted by St. Patrick, were held in the greatest respect. (96) Yet with regard to one point touched upon by Lanfranc, viz. marrying within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity and affinity, some of the Irish clergy seem not to have extended said degrees as far as the Canon law then generally followed required, but to have been content with those laid down in the 18th chapter of Leviticus. (97) The other practices, which displeased Lanfranc, were, 2. That bishops were consecrated by one bishop. 3. That infants were baptized without consecrated chrism. 4. That holy orders were given by bishops for money. He represents these, together with the abominations under No. 1, as abuses contrary to Evangelical and Apostolical authority, to the injunctions of the sacred canons, and to the institutions of all the orthodox Fathers. The fourth is certainly repugnant to every authority, divine and human, and was a disgrace to the Irish church as well as to many other churches of those times; but not so the second and third, which, had Lanfranc known the reason of them, would have appeared to him perfectly harmless. There is nothing contrary to Evangelical and Apostolical authority in a bishop's being consecrated by one only bishop, a circumstance which has often occurred, and which must have frequently taken place in the times of the Apostles, and in the commencement of missions, when there happened to be one bishop alone employed in founding new churches. But Lanfranc was not aware, that the Irish still retained the order of Chorepiscopi, a description of ecclesiastics, which was kept up longer in Ireland than in any other part of Christendom, although this fact was unknown to many eminent church historians and canonists. Now the persons, called bishops by Lanfranc, who used to be consecrated by only one bishop, were in reality chorepiscopi, whom the Irish were wont to style bishops in the same manner as they called the ordinaries of regular sees. As long as that order existed, it was lawful, in virtue of a standing canon of the Church, for a single bishop to consecrate the members of it. (98) With regard to baptizing without chrism, Lanfranc was greatly mistaken in supposing, that either the Apostles or Evangelists, or all the Fathers and canons had prescribed the use of chrism in baptism. In itself it is not a rite at all essential to the validity of this sacrament. Nor was it in early times practised in baptism, but immediately after it as belonging to Confirmation, which, as long as baptism continued to be performed by bishops, or if a bishop were present, used to be administered by them to the persons just baptized. (99) But after the duty of baptizing devolved chiefly, and almost universally on priests, a custom was gradually introduced into the Western church of using chrism among the ceremonies of baptism itself, as an imitation of its use by the bishop when confirming the baptised; but with this difference, that the priest applies the chrism to the top of the head, whereas the bishop used to apply it to the forehead of the baptized as a very material rite of the sacrament of Confirmation. (100) It seems, however, to have not been practised in Ireland at any time prior to those we are now treating of; whereas it was not considered as necessary, no more than some other ceremonies, which in some churches were added in the administration of baptism, but which have since fallen into disuse. (101)

(95) Usher observes (Note on the letter to Terdelvac) that the practice of dismissing wives prevailed also among the Anglo-saxons and in Scotland. The abominable custom of selling wives still kept up in England is a remnant of it.

(96) The most that any Irish canon allowed was the dismissal of a wife on account of adultery, and the injured husband's taking another. In the 26th of what is called the Synod of St. Patrick this is permitted; "Audi Dominum dicentem—non licet viro dimittere uxorem nisi ob causam fornicationis; ac si dicat, ob hanc causam. Unde, si ducat alteram velut post mortem prioris, non vetant." Yet in another, which is the 5th of those attributed to St. Patrick alone, a man is prohibited from taking another wife as long as the guilty one is living. It is added that, if she repent, he shall receive her, and she shall serve him as a handmaid, and do penance for a whole year in bread and water, and that by measure; but that they are not to remain in one bed; " Si alicujus uxor fornicata fuerit cum alio viro, non adducet aliam uxorem quamdiu viva fuerit uxor prima. Si forte conversa fuerit et agat poenitentiam, suscipiet eam, et serviet ei in vicem ancillae, et annum integrum in pane et aqua per mensuram poeniteat, nec in uno lecto permaneant." As to women, who quitting their husbands join themselves to other men, they were excommunicated, according to the 19th canon of the Synod of Patrick, Auxilius, and Isserninus; " Mulier Christiana, quae acceperit virum honestis nuptiis, et postmodum discesserit a primo, et junxerit se adulterio, quae haec fecit excommunicationis sit."

(97) The 29th canon of the so called Synod of St. Patrick is entitled Of consanguinity in marriage, and runs thus; " Understand what the Law speaks, not less nor more. But what is observed among us, that four kinds be divided, they say they have neither seen nor read. Intelligite quid lex loquitur, non minus nec plus. Quod autem observatur apud nos, ut quatuor genera dividantur, nec vidisse dicunt nec legisse." By those who say they have not seen, &c. are apparently meant the persons who composed that synod. What they call four kinds is the same as the four degrees of the canonists; (although, by the bye, they were more than four in Lanfranc's time) and hence it appears, that the theory of them was known in Ireland, and it looks as if they were attended to in practice by some persons. This shows, that St. Patrick had nothing to do with said canon; for in his time the prohibited degrees did not extend so far. Whoever were the authors of it, they seem to have drawn it up for the purpose of restraining the prohibited degrees within the bounds of Leviticus.

(98) See Not. 104. to Chap. xi.

(99) Of this practice we have seen a remarkable instance in what St. Patrick has in his epistle against Coroticus. (See Chap. vi. §. 10. and ib. Not. 102.)

(100) Bellarmine, speaking of the ceremonies that follow baptism, (De Sacramento baptisime, cap. 27.) explains this matter very well in a few words: “ Secunda est, unctio chrismatis in vertice; quae quidem introducta videtur, quia non semper adest episcopus, qui possit continuo dare post baptismum sacramentum confirmationis. Ideo enim interim ungitur baptizatus, non quidem in fronte, sed in vertice, chrismate ab episcopo consecrato.”

(101) It is laughable, although likewise vexatious, to hear certain polemical pigmies of our days deducing a diversity of religious tenets from a difference of practices in matters not at all essential. Ledwich, who is constantly teasing the reader with nonsense of this sort, alleges, (p. 429.) as a proof of difference of tenets, that the Romanists, as he calls them, used chrism, exorcism, and other ceremonies in baptism, which the Irish and Britons did not. In the first place it is false, that the Irish and Britons did not use exorcism. And where did he find, that the Britons omitted chrism? Perhaps they did; but he had no right to assert it. In said page he has some horrid theological bungling in certain remarks he makes on Lanfranc's letter to Donnald bishop of Cashel, (of which above §. 6.) not Donat of Dublin, as he says. Having observed that Lanfranc allows laical baptism in the article of death, (he should have said danger of death) Ledwich pronounces, that the Greek church and the Irish never admitted it. As to the Irish church, nothing can be more false, as appears from that very letter, in which Lanfranc argues from the practice of lay-baptism in cases of necessity, as a matter well known and admitted by Donnald, that baptism was considered sufficient for the salvation of infants without the eucharistical communion. That the Greek church did not admit it is equally false, and it does admit it at present, although the Greeks are rather over-scrupulous in not easily permitting baptism to be administered by a lay person. (See Renaudot in La Perpetuité de la Foy, Tôm. v. L. 2. ch. 1, 2, 3.) It was in urgent cases universally allowed in every part of the Christian church, as Bingham states, (Origines, &c. B. II. ch. 20. sect. 9. and B. XI. ch. 4. sect. 1.) although he mentions two or three exceptions. Even Calvin, notwithstanding his not thinking it necessary, according to his new ideas of the nature of baptism, acknowledges that from the very commencement of the Church it was usual for lay persons to baptize, when there was danger of death, in case a clergyman was not at hand; “ Quod autem multis abhinc seculis, adeoque ab ipso fere Ecclesiae exordio usu recep-

tum fuit, ut in periculo mortis laici baptizarent, si minister in tempore non adesset," &c. (Instit. L. 4. cap. 15. §. 20.) So much for Dr. Ledwich's theological erudition as to lay baptism. Another false assertion (ib.) is, that from said letter "it is evident, that the Irish believed the reception of the Eucharist immediately after baptism indispensably necessary to salvation." Is it possible that a man can be so barefaced as to advance such a position? Domnald had merely inquired of Lanfranc, whether a similar opinion, alluding to infants, was held any where in England or in the continent. Surely it does not thence follow, that it was held by the Irish church. Lanfranc's answer is very mild and polite, without the least insinuation that Domnald or the Irish church erred on that point. Ledwich adds, that said opinion was that "of the primitive church, though not of the Roman in Lanfranc's age." The Doctor, who knows as little of theology as a Samoeide, stops at nothing, provided he can abuse the Roman church. He refers the reader to Bingham, B. XII. ch. 1. Now Bingham was too learned to say any such thing. What he states, and indeed truly, is (ib. sect. 3.) that the well known practice of giving the Eucharist to infants after baptism was continued in the Church for several ages. But he has not even a hint indicating, that this practice was followed, because the church "believed it indispensably necessary to salvation." It is thus that, as I can assure whoever will have the patience to read Ledwich's book, he is constantly imposing on the public, whensoever the Roman church falls in his way.

§. XIII. For the purpose of putting a stop to these abuses (102) or what he thought were such, Lanfranc advises Terdelvac to summon an assembly of bishops and religious men, at which he and his nobles would attend, that they might cooperate in exterminating said bad practices and all others, that might be in opposition to the sacred laws of the Church. Here we may observe that Lanfranc does not speak in a tone of authority, nor did he issue any orders to the Irish bishops or clergy to assemble or to act on this occasion, as he certainly would have done had he conceived himself invested with any jurisdiction over them. In his letter to Gothric he exhorts him to exert himself in procuring the correction of the filthy practices relative to the dismissal and changing of wives ; and, after praising Patrick, advises Gothric to listen to him with attention and to obey his instructions. Patrick held the see of Dublin for about ten years until, having been sent on some business by Turlogh or Terdalvac, then sole master of Dublin, to Lanfranc, he was, on his way over, shipwrecked and drowned on the 10th of October, A. D. 1084. (103) In the following year he was succeeded by Donat or Donogh O'Haingly, who, having made his studies in his own country, had gone over to England and became a monk in Lanfranc's monastery at Canterbury. He must have returned to Ireland before his promotion, as appears from his having been elected by Turlogh and the clergy and people of Dublin, with the approbation of some Irish bishops, to whom accordingly he must have been well known. This is still more clear from the letter written on this occasion by Turlogh and the clergy of Dublin to Lanfranc, in which, among other things, Turlogh states that, whereas Patrick did not arrive to give him an account of how he had followed Lanfranc's fatherly instructions (with regard to remedying the abuses,) Donat will be able to give him the necessary information. (104) He was consecrated in the cathedral of Canterbury by Lanfranc, (105) to whom he made his profession of obedience in the following terms ; " I Donatus, prelate of the church of Dublin, which is situated in Ireland, promise canonical obedience to thee, O Lanfranc archbishop of the holy church of Canterbury, and to thy successors." (106) Lanfranc was much attached to this prelate, and gave him, on his returning to Dublin, some books and church ornaments as presents for the church of the Holy Trinity. Donat lived until 1095, in which he died of the great plague of that year on the 23d of November, with the reputation of a good and learned bishop. (107)

(102) Harris in his translation of the letter to Terdelvac (see above Not. 87) has added another complaint of Lanfranc, viz. that in several cities and towns there was more than one bishop ordained. He took this from Baronius's edition, in which are these words; Quod in villis vel civitatibus plures ordinantur; whence also they have been taken by Dachery in his edition of said letter.

(103) Ware and Harris, Bishops of Dublin, at Patrick. The 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 200.) have; "A. 1084. Gilda or Gilla-Patrick, bishop of Dublin, was drowned."

(104) Harris has this letter (Bishops at Donat O'Haingley) taken, he says, from the Annals of Ulster.

(105) Usher (Discorse, &c. Chap. VIII.) quotes the following passage from the Annals of Dublin: "Anno Dom. 1085. Lanfrancus archiepiscopus Cantuar. ad regimen Dublinensis ecclesiae sacravit Donatum monasterii sui monachum in sede metropoli Cantuar. petentibus atque eligentibus eum Terdelvaco Hiberniae rege, et episcopis Hiberniae regionis, atque clero et populo prae-fatae civitatis."

(106) The original words are; "Ego Donatus, Dublinensis ecclesiae antistes, quae in Hibernia sita est, canonicam obedientiam tibi pronitto et successoribus tuis, o Lanfrance, sanctae Dorobernensis ecclesiae archiepiscopo." In this profession there is nothing about Dublin being styled the metropolis of Ireland. It is probable, that Turlogh put a stop to the assumption of that title. Nor does it occur in any of the subsequent professions. (Compare with Not. 68.) We may also observe, how much more simple this profession is than that of Patrick. (See above §. 7.)

(107) See Ware and Harris at Donat O'Haingly. That terrible plague is mentioned in the Annals of Innisfallen, A. 1095.

§. XIV. There is extant a letter of Pope Gregory

VII. to the king Terdelvac, and to the archbishops, bishops, abbots, nobles, and to all Christians inhabiting Ireland. It is dated from Sutri on the 24th of February, without any year being marked. (108) This letter is much in the style of several others, which he wrote to various kings, princes, &c. for the purpose of claiming not only a spiritual but likewise a temporal and political superiority over all the kingdoms and principalities of Europe. (109) Having insinuated his claim over Ireland, he concludes with giving directions to Terdelvac, &c. to refer to him whatever affairs, the settling of which may require his assistance. (110) How Terdelvac, or Turlogh, and the people of Ireland acted in consequence of this letter we are not informed; but this much is certain, that Turlogh remained the independent king of Ireland until 1086, when he died in a truly Christian-like manner at Ceanchora, one of his chief residences, near Killaloe, in the 77th year of his age, and 22d of his reign reckoning from 1064, in which he became king of Munster. (111) He was buried at Killaloe, and succeeded by his son Muriardach, alias Murchardach, or Murtoogh, not as king of all Ireland but as king of Munster, (112) his hereditary province. Yet Murtoogh, after much fighting against various enemies, and, among others, against his own brother, Dermod O'Brian, enlarged his territories, so that I find him called king also of Connaught in 1092; (113) and in 1094 he became master of Dublin and banished the Danish king Godfrey, who died in the following year. (114) He then assumed the title of king of Ireland, as did at the same time also Donnald Mac-Loghlin, an O'Neill, the powerful sovereign of the northern half, while Murtoogh was considered as the sovereign of the southern. (115) There were, however, some alterations as to the extent of territories, according as either of these princes had the upper hand, or as some other princes endeavoured to maintain their independence. At length Murtogh was dethroned in 1116, and his brother Dermot placed over Munster in his stead. He then took holy orders, and died at Lisimore a great penitent on the festival of St. Pulcherius, 13th March, A. D. 1119; being survived by Domnald Mac-Lochlin, who died in the monastery of Derry in 1121. (116) Murtogh was buried, according to his wish, in the church of Killoaloe, to which he had been a benefactor. (117) This summary of the history of these princes, which is here given by anticipation, will enable us better to understand certain transactions, particularly of Murtogh, connected with ecclesiastical affairs, of which hereafter.

(108) Usher, who published this letter in the Sylloge, (No. 29.) having found it annexed to the Collection of Isidorus Mercator, affixed it by conjecture to A. D. 1085, the last year of Gregory's life. But it must have been written before that year, in which Gregory was at Salerno, at least on the 24th of February. Accordingly, being dated at Sutri, it was written prior to 1085.

(109) A summary of these letters and pretensions may be seen in Fleury (Hist. &c. L. 63. §. 11.) who seems to have been unacquainted with that to Terdelvac or Turlogh, as otherwise he would surely have made mention of it.

(110) " Si qua vero negotia penes vos emeruerint, quae nostro digna videantur auxilio, incunctanter ad nos dirigere studete; et quod juste postulaveritis, Deo auxiliante impetrabitis." He had said before; " Hujus (Domini Jesu) auctoritas sanctam Ecclesiam in solida petra fundavit, et beato Petro, a petra venerabile nomen habenti, ejus jura commisit, quam etiam super omnia mundi regna constituit; cui principatus, et potestates, et quicquid in seculo sublime videtur esse, subjecit, illo Isaiae completo oraculo; Venient, inquit, ad te qui detrahebant tibi, et adorabunt vestigia pedum tuorum. Beato igitur Petro ejusque vicariis, inter quos dispensatio divina nostram quoque sortem annumerari disposuit, Orbis universus obedientem similiter et reverentiam debet, quam mente devota sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae exhibere reminiscimi," &c.

(111) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1086. O'Flaherty, Ogyg. Part III. cap. 94. Ware, Antiq. cap. 4. He was mistaken in placing Ceanchora in the now King's county. It was in the now county of Clare, and contained a palace of the ancient princes of Thomond, of whose line was Turlogh, and is now called Cancora. (See Seward at Cancora.)

(112) Said Annals, ib.

(113) Ib. ad A. 1092.

(114) Ib. ad A. 1094 and 1095. This Godfrey was the one, whom Ware (Antiq. cap. 24. ad A. 1095.) calls Godfrid Meranagh.

(115) O'Flaherty, Part III. cap. 94. For Domnald's having been an O'Neill see Tr. Th. p. 448.

(116) Said Annals at 1116, 1119, and 1121, compared with O'Flaherty, loc. cit.

(117) Ware, Antiq. cap. 29. and Harris, Bishops of Killaloe. The Annals of Innisfallen also have Murtogh's interment in that town. Harris is wrong in assigning the death of Murtagh to the 8th of March; for the festival of St. Pulcherius marked by O'Flaherty, was not the 8th but the 13th; and both he and Ware were mistaken in changing the year 1119, assigned for it, into 1120.

§. xv. I have endeavoured to trace a succession of Irish bishops down to about the close of the eleventh century. (118) It is now requisite to give some account of other distinguished ecclesiastics of that period, although little more is known concerning the greatest part of them than their names. Yet even this much will show, that our religious and learned establishments were still kept up; which is indeed the chief object I had and have in view in entering into such details. The first person, whom I find expressly called abbot of Hy after Flann-Abhra who died in 1025, (119) is Mac-Baithen, who was killed in 1070. (120) Next after him we meet with Dunchad, son of Moenach, who died in 1099. (121) As to learned clergymen and teachers of this century, besides those who flourished in the first half of it, (122) several others are mentioned, such as Flann Mainistreach, that is, of the monastery, who died in 1056, and is represented as the most celebrated writer among the Irish of his time, both as an antiquary and poet. (123) Of Aidus O'Foirreth, who died in the same year, we have seen already. (124) Mugron, bishop of Cork, who was murdered in 1057, had been also a scholastic or professor. (125) Kieran, lecturer of Kells, a man famous for learning and wisdom, died in 1061; (126) and in 1063 Mac-Donngal scholastic of Kildare, and Eochad of Connor. (127) Colman O'Criochain, professor of theology at Armagh, died in 1065; and in 1071 Christian O'Clothocain likewise professor there, and styled the chief doctor of Ireland. (128) Conchobran, scholastic of Gleannussen died in 1082; (129) and to the year 1085 is assigned the death of Gormgal Laigcach, a very learned and pious doctor, who was comorban or rector of St. Brigid's church at Armagh. (130) In 1086 died on the 16th of January the very holy and learned Moeliosa (servant of Jesus) O'Brolchan. (131) He was a native of Inishowen, and of a distinguished family, a branch of the Nialls. He was educated in the monastery of Bothconuis in that territory, and became a great proficient in piety and in every sort of learning. (132) Owing to the loss of documents, his transactions during life are involved in obscurity; but it is stated, that he composed several works, many fragments of which are still extant, and that he transcribed many others. (133) In 1088 died the celebrated annalist Tigernach O'Braoin, a native of the territory of the Siol-Muireadaigh, (134) or Murrays. He was abbot of Clonmacnois and also of Killeoman, or probably rather Roscommon, (135) and is most highly and deservedly praised as a man of very extensive knowledge and an excellent teacher. He brought down the annals of Ireland to the very year of his death, and having died at Clonmacnois was buried there with great solemnity. (136) Among other scholastics or lecturers of these times let it suffice to add Ingnadan of Clonard, who died in 1090, O'Kennedy of Durrow (King's county), who died in 1095, and Aidan of Roscommon, whose death is marked at 1097. (137)

(118) Above §. 5. seqq. (119) See Chap. xxiii. §. 6.

(120) Tr. Th. p. 501. and Annals of Ulster ap. Johnstone ad A. 1070. Smith (Append. to Life of St. Col.) places at 1057 the death of one Robhertach Mac-Donnell, whom he calls Coarb (comorban) of Columbkil. Whoever he was, it does not follow from his being so styled, that he was abbot of Hy. In like manner Smith has at 1009 another coarb of Columkill, Martan Mac-Cineadh, between Maelbrigid Hua-Rimed and Flann-Abhra. I find this Martan also in Johnstone's Extracts from the Ulster Annals (at A. 1009) or, as he calls him, Marcan Mac-Cinach converb of Iona. If said passage be correct, it would appear, that he had been abbot of Hy. But Colgan has him not in his list of those abbots from the 4 Masters, and, as I have observed elsewhere, it seems we ought not to admit as abbots of Hy' any others than those who are expressly called such. I am convinced, that this Marcan Mac Cineadh, i. e. son of Kennedy, was no other than the Marcan, whom the Annals of Innisfallen mention as supreme head of the clergy of Munster, and whose death they assign to A. 1010, (see above Not. 43.) the same year as the 1009 of the Annals of Ulster, in which the death of Marcan was marked without, in all probability, any mention of the place, to which he belonged. To supply this deficiency, some amanuensis or semicritic added at his name comorban of Iona or of Columbkil, because the successors of that saint either at Iona or elsewhere are usually taken notice of in said annals. Thus Marcan son of Kennedy, and apparently a brother of Brian Boromhe, was removed from Munster to Iona or Hy; and both Johnstone and Smith have been led astray. In a similar manner from the additions of scholiasts, &c. hundreds of errors have crept into our ecclesiastical history.

(121) Tr. Th. ib. (122) See Chap. xxiii. §. 15.

(123) Innals of Innisfallen at A. 1056. Some of his works are yet extant; see Harris (Writers at Mainestrec) and Dr. O'Connor. (Rer. Hib. Scriptor. Ep. Hanc. p. 13.)

(124) Above, §. 4.

(125) See Tr. Th. p. 632. and above §. 5.

(126) Ib. p. 508. (127) Ib. p. 630 and 632.

(128) Ib. p. 298. (129) Ib. p. 632.

(130) Ib. p. 299.

(131) He is reckoned among the Saints in some Irish calendars, and accordingly Colgan treats of him at 16 January.

(132) He is greatly praised in the Irish annals, among others in those of Innisfallen, which have at A. 1086; "Maoliosa O'Brollochain, the most venerable old man in all Ireland, and the most learned in his time in wisdom and science, died in the grace of God."

(133) Colgan says, that he had some fragments of Moeliosa's works, and that he knew where several others were in Ireland. He adds that several books in his hand writing, which had belonged to the monastery of Bothconuis, were still in that neighbourhood. (See also Harris, Writers at Brolcan.)

(134) The 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 206.) call him O'Braoin, and hence Colgan (ib. p. 108.) makes him of the same family with St. Dunchad O'Braoin, of whom we have treated Chap. xxii. §. 15. In the Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1088, in which I find him called O'Brain, he is said to have been of the Siol-Muireadhaigh, i. e. of the sept so called, whose territory was an eastern part of Connaught, chiefly, it seems in, the now county of Roscommon, as appears from said Annals at A. 1095. (See also Seward at Siol-Muiridh.) This country was near that, in which St. Dunchad had been born.

(135) Both the Annals just quoted make Tigernach comorban or successor of St. Kieran and St. Coman. As successor of Coman, Colgan (AA. SS. p. 206.) calls him abbot of Killcoman, meaning, perhaps, Kilcomin in the King's county, (of which see Nct. 41. to Chap. xv.) or Killcoeman in the plain of Gesille (now barony of Geashill in said county) which is said (ib. p. 312.) to have been founded by a St. Coeman in the sixth century. Harris, (Writers at Tigernac) instead of Killcoman, has Roscommon; which seems more correct, as it does not appear that the establishments of Killcomin and Killcoeman continued to a late period.

(136) Annals of Innisfallen, ib.

(137) AA. SS. p. 409. and Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. Ware has among the Irish writers Moeliosa O'Sair, a Munster man, who, he says, wrote some philosophical treatises, and died, according to the Ulster annals, in 1098. Whether he were an ecclesiastic or not I cannot discover.

§. XVI. In fact, Ireland still retained its reputation for learning and good schools, so that it was, as well as in former times, resorted to by foreign students. Of this we have a remarkable instance in the case of Sulgenus, who was bishop of St. David's about the year 1070. In his youth, excited by a love of study, he set out, in imitation of his ancestors and countrymen, for Ireland, which was celebrated to a wonderful degree for learning. But, while wishing to see that nation so famous on account of its writings and masters, he was driven back by a storm to his country, where he remained for five years. Still determined on proceeding to Ireland, he went thither and spent there ten or thirteen years in the study of the holy Scriptures, in which he became a great proficient, and thereby was afterwards of great service to his countrymen. (138) That English students continued to repair to Armagh may be collected from the account given of a great conflagration of that city in 1092, in which it is stated that a part of the Trien-Saxon, or the division inhabited by the Saxons (English) was destroyed. (139) This was an accidental fire, such as Irish history gives us many instances of in those times, both of towns and religious houses, owing to the materials, mostly of wood, chiefly used in building, as still practised in some parts of Europe. Losses of this kind were easily repaired, and were of no material injury to studious pursuits, which I observe, lest a person, looking over the lists of conflagrations in those days, might imagine that they were destructive of religious establishments, or generally designed for that object. (140) Yet we meet with burnings and devastations of ecclesiastical places designedly undertaken, partly by the Danes, and partly by Irish princes or chieftains. Thus, when a Sitric of Dublin was, as we have seen, ravaging Ardraccan in 1031, an O'Ruaire plundered Ardfert, but was dreadfully chastized for this sacrilege by Donogh O'Brian then king of Leth-mogha. (141) Another O'Ruaire and an O'Kelly, both Connaught chieftains, plundered Clonmacnois and Clonfert in 1065, but, being met on the following day by Hugh O'Conor, were defeated by him. (142) Clonmacnois was particularly marked out as an object of pillage for divers parties in those times, (143) whence we may infer, that it was then rich. Gleannussen was laid waste in 1041, Clonard in 1046, and Inisclothra (in Loughree) in 1050. (144) These devastations were committed chiefly by the Irish themselves; but in the year 1081 the Danes or Northmen alone, apparently those of Limerick or of some western part of Ireland, plundered the island of Arranna-Naomh, or Arran of the saints, where was the ancient and celebrated establishment of St. Enda. In 1089 a party of Danes totally destroyed the monastery of Inisbofinde in Loughree. (145) These were probably part of the army, with which the king Murtogh O'Brian attacked and plundered in said year various islands of Loughree, such as, besides Inisbofinde, Inisclothra and Inisaingen, (or the island of All-saints) in which were religious houses, together with Cluainemhain, where there was at least a church. (146) Soon after Murtogh and the people of North Munster paid very dearly for these depredations. (147) In the same year Dermot O'Brian, brother of Murtogh, sailing along the coast landed near Cloyne, which he plundered, and carried off some reliques of St. Barr from a church called Kill-na-gCleiriogh. (148) In the preceding year 1088 he had joined Domnald Mac-Lochlin and Roderic O'Conor, king of Connaught, in their dreadful expedition throughout a great part of Munster, in which they destroyed Limerick, and attacked Mungret, Emly, &c. (149) Yet, notwithstanding such and some other similar devastations, the ecclesiastical and literary institutions continued, with very few exceptions, to exist; and we find the habitual zeal for acquiring knowledge still prevalent in Ireland.

(138) An account of Sulgenus was drawn up in verse by his son John. Among some lines, quoted by Usher, (Praef. ad Ep. Hib. Syll.) the following are quite apposite to our present subject;

“ Exemplo patrum, commotus amore legendi,
 Ivit ad Hibernos sophia mirabile claros.
 Sed cum iam cimba voluisset adire revector
 Famosam gentem scripturis atque magistris,
 Appulit ad patriam, ventorum flatibus actus,
 Nomine quam noto perhibent Albania longe.
 Ac remoratus ibi certe tum quinque per annos
 Indefessus agit votum, &c.
 His ita digressis Scotorum visitat arva,
 Ac mox scripturas multo meditamine sacras
 Legis divinae scrutatur saepe retractans.
 Ait ibi per denos tricens jam placidus annos
 Congregat immensam pretioso pondere massam,
 Protinus arguta thesaurum mente recondens.
 Post haec ad patriam remeans jam dogmate clarus
 Venit, et inventum multis jam dividit aurum,” &c.

We may here remark, that the Irish were still called Scoti, as they were in the continent.

(139) Tr. Th. p. 299. Colgan observes, (ib. p. 300.) that Ar-magh was divided into four parts. The first was Rath-Artamacha, or the fort, castle, &c. The three others were Trian-mor, or the great third part; Trian-Massan, or the third part called Massan; and Trian-Saxon, the third part for the Saxons, by whom, in all probability, were meant the English students.

(140) The reader will find a long catalogue of such conflagrations in Tr. Th. p. 633. seqq.

(141) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1031.

(142) Ib. at A. 1065.

(143) Colgan states (Tr. Th. p. 633.) from the 4 Masters, that Clonmacnois was plundered in 1044 twice, in 1050 three times, in 1060, 1065, 1080, 1081, 1092, 1095, 1098. He does not tell us by whom. From the Annals of Innisfallen I find that the pillage of 1092 was by a Munster fleet; and it is said that the one of 1095 or 1094 was by the people of Brawney, the O'Ruaires, and the Mac-Coghlan. (See Archdall at Clonmacnois.)

(144) Tr. Th. ib.

(145) AA. SS. p. 423.

(146) See the annals of Innisfallen at A. 1089. Colgan says, AA. SS. p. 339.) that Cluainemhain was in the county of Roscommon, and that it had a church, when it was laid waste in 1089. Yet there had been a monastery there. (Archdall at Cluainemuin.)

(147) Said Annals, ib.

(148) Ib. (149) Said Annals at A. 1088.

BW5327 .L28 v.3
An ecclesiastical history of Ireland,

Princeton Theological Seminary-Speer Library

1 1012 00017 8782

BR794.L3 1829 v.4
ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF IRE
ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF IRE

John Mulcahy CC
AN

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY

OF

IRELAND,

FROM THE

FIRST INTRODUCTION OF CHRISTIANITY

AMONG THE IRISH,

TO

THE BEGINNING OF THE THIRTEENTH CENTURY.

COMPILED

FROM THE WORKS OF THE MOST ESTEEMED AUTHORS, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC,
WHO HAVE WRITTEN AND PUBLISHED ON MATTERS CONNECTED WITH

THE IRISH CHURCH;

AND FROM IRISH ANNALS AND OTHER AUTHENTIC DOCUMENTS,

STILL EXISTING IN MANUSCRIPT.

By THE REV. JOHN LANIGAN, D. D.,

FORMERLY PROFESSOR OF HEBREW, THE SACRED SCRIPTURES, AND ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PAVIA.

IN FOUR VOLUMES.

VOL. IV.

SECOND EDITION.

DUBLIN :

PRINTED FOR J. CUMMING, 16, L. ORMOND-QUAY ;

SIMPKIN AND MARSHALL, LONDON ;

AND FOR R. CADELL AND CO., EDINBURGH.

1829.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

PHILOSOPHY DEPARTMENT

MEMORANDUM FOR THE DEPARTMENT

RE: [Illegible]

DATE: [Illegible]

BY: [Illegible]

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY

OF

IRELAND, &c.

CHAPTER XXV.

*Several Irish monasteries founded in Germany—Monastery of St. Peter at Ratisbon founded by Marianus an Irishman—Domnus, an Irishman, first abbot of the monastery of St. James at Ra-tisbon—John, an Irishman, bishop of Mecklen-burgh, martyred by the apostate Sclavonians—
Death of Marianus Scotus the chronographer—
Death of Moel-Iosa archbishop of Armagh—Domnald bishop of Armagh makes a visitation of Munster and other parts of Ireland—Battle of Magh-choba—Death of Domnald—Samuel bishop of Dublin elected by Mortogh O'Brien and the clergy and people of Dublin, and consecrated by Anselm archbishop of Canterbury—Waterford erected into a Bishoprick—Malchus, its first bishop, consecrated by Anselm—Assembly of the clergy and people of Ireland at Cashel, in which king Mortogh made over that seat of the Munster kings to God and the church—Donald, nephew of Mortogh, made king of Mann and the Hebrides—Gillibert bishop of Limerick endeavours to reduce the various liturgies in Ireland to one uniform system—Celsus, or Ceallach, archbishop of Ar-* magh, endeavours to stop the hereditary succession by which that See had been injured—Synod of Fiodh-mac-Aengusa—Synod of Rath-Breasail for regulating the dioceses in Ireland—Gregory first archbishop of Dublin.

SECT. I.

IN this century, and somewhat later, several Irish monasteries were founded in Germany. Of that of Erford we have seen already. (1) The next was that of St. Peter's in a suburb of Ratisbon, the occasion of which was as follows. Marianus, (2) who must not be confounded with the chronographer Marianus Scotus, a very handsome man, learned in divine and human knowledge, and eloquent, was a native of the North of Ireland, and went to Germany in 1067 or 1068 accompanied by some persons, among whom are particularly mentioned John and Candidus. It is said that they were first received by Otto, bishop of Ratisbon, (3) with whom they remained for one year in the clerical habit. Afterwards they became Benedictine monks in the monastery of St. Michael near Bamberg. Wishing to go to Rome they stopped on their way at Ratisbon, where was at that time, and for many years before, an Irish recluse named Muricherdac, or Murcherat, who lived in a cell without being a member of any monastery. (4) They were received by the abbess Hemma, whose nunnery was, it seems, near Muricherdac's cell. Marianus communicated his intention of visiting Rome to that holy man, who advised him to pray to God to direct him, whether it would be better to do so or to remain at Ratisbon. On the following night, as is said, Marianus being asleep thought he was desired to stop and spend the remainder of his life in the place, where the rising sun would first shine upon him. The next morning he set out with his companions for the purpose of going to Rome, but, when outside of the city, stopped for a while in St. Peter's church, and prayed there for a prosperous journey. Having finished his prayer, and just as he was coming out of the church, the rays of the rising sun struck his eyes, upon which, recollecting his dream, he determined on not proceeding further, and, together with his companions, throwing himself on his knees thanked God for having pointed out to him the place, where he should live and die. When this circumstance was made known to the abbess Hemma, she made over to Marianus and his brethren the church of St. Peter, and got her grant confirmed by Henry IV. then king of Germany. Several pious and liberal citizens, among whom one Bezelin distinguished himself, contributed towards building for them a monastery. (5)

(1) Chap. xxiv. §. 2.

(2) The Bollandists have at 9 February a Life of Marianus from a copy taken by Father Gamansius a Jesuit from a MS. of a Carthusian monastery. The author was an Irish monk of Ratisbon, and lived in the 12th century. He says, that he knew Isaac one of Marianus' monks, who lived to the age of 120 years, and speaks of various Irishmen of said century, and of Irish monasteries founded after the death of Marianus. In fact his work is rather a history of several Irish monasteries established in Germany, commencing with that of St. Peter's of Ratisbon, than a Life of Marianus. Having observed that the Irish were accustomed to visit foreign countries, and touched upon Mansuetus, St. Patrick, Columbkil, Fursey, Columbanus, Gallus, &c. he enters upon his subject, which is all through relative to the affairs of Irish monks exclusively. In the account of Marianus and his companions, and of other Irishmen either his contemporaries, or later than him, who in those times became distinguished in Germany, I shall chiefly follow this tract together with the learned commentary prefixed to it by the Bollandists.

(3) This Otto is in the Life of Marianus called, by mistake, bishop of Bamberg. He had been indeed a canon of Bamberg; but he was bishop of Ratisbon from 1060 to 1089. The Otto, bishop of Bamberg, was not so until 1102 several years after the death of Marianus. The Bollandists think, that Marianus and his companions went in the first place to Bamberg. Usher was greatly mistaken in placing (Ind. Chron.) the arrival of Marianus and his companions at Ratisbon as late as A. 1090.

(4) Colgan treats (at 17 January) of Muricherdac chiefly from Raderus, Bavaria sancta. The Bollandists observe, that he had no authority for placing him at that day.

(5) See Raderus op. Colgan, ib.

§. II. The companions of Marianus, whom I find mentioned on this occasion, were John, Candidus, and Clemens. (6) Muricherdac did not join himself to them, but continued in his cell until his death, which is conjectured to have occurred about A. D. 1080. Yet he may be considered as the father of this monastery; for it was owing to the great veneration in which he was held, that his countrymen Marianus, &c. were encouraged and enabled to establish it. As soon as it was known in Ireland that this monastery was formed, several persons from the North, whence Marianus himself was, went over to Ratisbon and were received by him, - so that the community gradually became numerous. Some time after its being well established, Clemens went to Jerusalem, where he died; and John withdrew to Austria, where he became a recluse on Mount Kottwich. One of Marianus' chief occupations, and probably of his monks, according to the old practice of those of Ireland, was the transcribing of books, of which he left a great number in his handwriting. He drew up some commentaries on the Psalms, which, as he tells us in the preface, he collected from various Fathers of the Church, and put into one book, in honour of our Saviour, the Blessed Virgin, and St. Erard, in the year 1074, the seventh of his peregrination. (7) It is said, that Marianus died in 1088; but on what day is not known. (8) After him there were six abbots of St. Peter's monastery, all from the North of Ireland, until Domnus, who was from the South, became the first abbot of the new monastery of St. James, which the Irish monks erected in the city of Ratisbon, after the beginning of the 12th century, and to which that of St. Peter's became subordinate, and from which several others were derived, as will be seen in the account of that period. Yet I may be allowed to observe in this place, that, although the Irish monastery of Wurtzburg is usually reckoned among those founded after St. James' of Ratisbon, there is reason to think that it existed, perhaps on a smaller scale, several years prior to that of St. James itself. (9)

(6) Raderus omits Clemens, who is named in the Life published by the Bollandists. Some others are spoken of; but it is more probable, that they were not with Marianus from the beginning. The Bollandists observe, that Donatus, who is reckoned among them by Aventinus, is not mentioned by any other author. Aventinus supposed, that Marianus of Ratisbon was the same as Marianus Scotus, and had led astray Usher, (see Pr. p. 736.) who afterwards corrected himself (ib. p. 1060).

(7) Aventinus quotes said preface from a MS. of a monastery of Ratisbon. Part of it is as follows; "Anno Dominicæ Incarnationis 1074—Marianus Scotus septimo peregrinationis suæ anno collegit modicas istas undas de profundo sanctorum, Patrum pelago, scilicet Hieronymi, Augustini, Cassiodori, Arnobii, et de opusculis S. Gregorii; et pro suæ animæ salute in honorem Salvatoris," &c. These must be the Commentaries on the Psalms, which some writers have attributed to Marianus the chronographer; but they could not have been written by him; for the year 1074 was much later than the seventh of his peregrination or absence from Ireland. It is true that the author of them also calls himself Scotus; but all the Irish of that period were so denominated in the continent. Ware has not this Marianus among the Irish writers; but Harris, who lived later and had better opportunities for knowing something about him, ought not to have omitted him.

(8) Raderus assigned his death to said year, which the Bollandists consider as probable. As to the day, they could not determine any thing, although Gamansius found the date V. idus Febr. (9th of February) added in the MS. whence he copied the so called Life of Marianus.

(9) We have seen, (Chap. xxiv. §. 5.) that Gilda-na naomh, bishop of Glendaloch, became abbot of the monks of Wurtzburg, and died there in 1085. If there be not some mistake in this date, it must be allowed that there was an Irish establishment in that city before the foundation of St. James's of Ratisbon, which is rendered probable also by the circumstance of its apostle St. Kilian having been an Irishman.

§. III. Among several martyrs, who were put to death by the apostate inhabitants of the old Sclavonia, we find a venerable Irishman, John bishop of Mecklenburgh. To what has been said of him elsewhere (10) we have to add, that he had arrived in the north of Germany in the year 1057, where he was well received by Adalbert, archbishop of Bremen, who appointed him, seemingly about 1062, bishop of Mecklenburgh, and directed him to Gothescalc, prince of those Sclavonians, who was exceedingly zealous for the propagation of the faith among his subjects. John converted and baptized many thousands of them. But the pagan and apostate part of that ferocious nation, having killed Gothescalc and several priests, monks, and lay Christians in 1065, seized upon John, and after cruelly beating him with sticks carried him about as a show through all their towns. Stopping at Rethre, their capital, and finding him still inflexible in confessing Jesus Christ, they cut off his feet and hands, and at length his head, on the 10th of November in said year. Having thrown the body into the street, they placed the head on a pike, which they carried about as a mark of triumph, and then immolated to their god Redigast. (11)

The chronographer Marianus Scotus, whom we left at Fulda, where he spent ten years, (12) was removed thence, by order of the bishop of Mentz and of the abbot of Fulda, in the year 1069, on the Friday before Palm Sunday, third of April, and went to Mentz, where he was again shut up on the 10th of July. (13) He remained there as a recluse until 1086, in which year he died and was buried at St. Martin's of Mentz without the city. (14) His reputation for piety was very great; and as to learning he has been ever since considered as one of the first men of his times. The chronicle, which he continued down to A. D. 1083, exceeds any thing of the kind, which the middle ages have produced, and would appear still more respectable, were it published entire. He has left also Notes on all the Epistles of St. Paul annexed to a copy of them transcribed by himself in the year 1079, which is extant in the Imperial library of Vienna. Said notes, although well worthy of the light, have not, as far as I know, been as yet published. (15) It may be conjectured, that he was author also of some excellent anonymous Notes on the Gospel of St. Mark, which are to be found in said library. (16) As to the commentaries on the Psalms, which have been ascribed to him, they were in all probability no other than those, that were written by his namesake of Ratisbon. (17)

(10) Chap. xxi. §. 11.

(11) See Fleury, Hist. Eccl. L. 61. §. 17. and L. 60. §. 58. Although John is called by Fleury Ecossois in consequence of his having been named by some writers a Scotus, according to the usual denomination of the Irish of those times in the continent, yet there can be no doubt but that he was a native of Ireland. Trithemius says in the Chronicon Hirsaugiense at A. 1064, that in these times came John a monk from Ireland, that he preached with great zeal in the territory of Mecklenburgh, and was placed by the Pope as bishop over the people of that country, where he received the crown of martyrdom. Trithemius' words are quoted and followed by Menard in the Benedictine martyrology. (See Colgan, AA. SS. p. 407.) Adam of Bremen makes mention of John more than once, and relates his martyrdom, Histor. Eccles. L. 4. c. 12. See also Mabillon, Annal. Bened. ad A. 1065.

(12) See Chap. xxiv. §. 3.

(13) Marianus has at A. 1069; "Ego miser Marianus, jussu episcopi Moguntiensis et abbatis Fuldensis, feria 6 ante Palmas, 3 nonis Aprilis, post annos decem meae inclusionis solutus, de clusa in Fulda ad Moguntiam veni et in festivitate Septem fratrum secundo includor."

(14) Dodechin, the continuator of Marianus' chronicle, writes at A. 1086; "Marianus Scotus et inclusus obiit, et apud sanctum Martinum sepelitur." See also Mabillon, Annal. Ben. ad A. 1083.

(15) We owe the knowledge of this valuable MS. to Lambecius, who informs us, (Comment de Biblioth. Caes. Vindobon L. 2. cap. 8. p. 749.) that it is the 49th among the Latin theological MSS. "quo (he says) continentur omnes Epistolae S. Pauli "apostoli celeberrimi chronographi Mariani Scoti, monachi Fuldensis, propria manu anno Christi 1079 exaratae, et ab eodem "annotationibus marginalibus et interlinearibus, hactenus quidem "nondum editis, editu tamen dignissimis, illustratae; in quarum "fine haec ipsius legitur subscriptio: Explicit Epistola ad Hebraeos, habens versus DCCC. In honore Individuae Trinitatis Marianus Scottus scripsit hunc librum suis fratribus peregrinis. Anima ejus requiescat in pace, propter Deum devote dicite, Amen. xvi. Kal. Junii, hodie feria vi. anno Domini MLXXVIII." At fol. 10 of said MS. are these words in his handwriting; "x Kal. April. anno Domini MLXXVIII Mariani miseri Domine miserere." It might be suspected that this Marianus was the one of Ratisbon, of whom above; but his styling himself miseri is sufficient to show, that he was the chronographer, who was in the habit of calling himself miser Marianus, as may be seen in his chronicle at A. 1028 and 1069.

(16) Lambecius just before his account of the MS. of St. Paul's Epistles, &c. makes mention of a copy of the Gospel of St. Mark illustrated with very good marginal and interlinear annotations. It appeared to him as written about 600 years before his time; and he adds that the handwriting is very like that of the MS. now spoken of. This, however, is not a sufficient proof for attributing it to Marianus.

(17) See above Not. 7. Concerning some other works attributed to him, but without sufficient authority, the reader may consult Harris, Writers at Marianus.

§. IV. Moeliosa, archbishop of Armagh, having held the see for 27 years, (18) died after a long course of penance on the 20th of December, A. D. 1091; (19) and his place was immediately occupied by Domnald, son of Amalgaid, and in all appearance a brother of Moeliosa. (20) Nothing is said of his election; and it is sufficiently clear, that he usurped that situation in virtue of the pretended abominable right of hereditary succession. He was one of those lay pseudo-archbishops, who were a disgrace to Armagh and to the whole Irish church. Yet in 1092 he made a visitation of Kinel-Eoguin or the O'Neill's country of Tyrone, and in 1094 of Munster and other parts of Ireland; (21) a visitation, which could not be of a spiritual nature, but merely for the purpose of exacting dues according to what was called the Law of St. Patrick. During his incumbency great abuses prevailed in various parts of Ireland, and to add to the evils caused by bad men, a dreadful plague raged in 1095, which swept away a vast number of people. To guard against further misfortunes, which the whole nation was apprehensive of, and which some persons had pretended to foretel, it was resolved by Domnald and the clergy of all Ireland, that during every month of the year 1096 a fast should be observed from Wednesday until the following Sunday, and that only one meal should be allowed on every day of the whole year, excepting Sundays and the great festivals. The people willingly submitted to this regulation, became fervent in their prayers, and made many pious offerings, while the kings, princes, and nobles endowed churches, heretofore distressed, with lands and immunities. (22) In 1099 Coencomrach O'Boigill, or Boil, was consecrated on Whit-sunday suffragan or acting bishop for the see of Armagh. (23) Who was his immediate predecessor in that capacity, I do not find recorded. Domnald greatly exerted himself towards putting a stop to the wars, that raged in Ireland between the northern and southern princes, whom he induced in said year 1099 to abstain from an intended great battle and to conclude a truce for one year. (24) In 1101 he prevailed on Domnald Mac Lochlin to discharge out of prison Donat O'Heochadha, prince of Ulidia, an eastern territory of Ulster, and in 1102 procured a truce for one year between that powerful king and Murtoogh O'Brian. (25) But they quarrelled again in 1103, and Murtoogh marched into Ulster with a great army, consisting of the forces of Leth-mogha, and, having besieged Armagh for some time, and committed various depredations, at length fought the famous battle of Magh-Choba in Tyrone, in which he was defeated with great loss by Domnald Mac-Lochlin and the northerns. (26) The archbishop, as he was called, still endeavoured to prevent a renewal of such dreadful occurrences, and accordingly went to Dublin in 1105 (27) for the purpose of establishing a durable peace between those two kings. He was there taken grievously ill, and was conveyed, on his way to Armagh, to the church of Domnach-airthir-emhua, where he received Extreme unction, and thence to Armagh, where he died on the 12th of August in said year and was honourably buried (28) Domnald was succeeded by Celsus on the 23d of September following.

(18) Chap. xxiv. §. 4.

(19) Tr. Th. p. 299. Ware (Bishops at Maclisa) has 24

December, A. 1092. Whether the day was 20 or 24, is of little consequence; but he had no right to change the year 1091 into 1092. O'Flaherty in his MS. catalogue has retained 1091.

(20) Tr. Th. ib.

(21) Ib. According to the Annals of Innifallen at A. 1094 he made a tour of all Ireland.

(22) See Tr. Th. ib. and Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1095-1096. In the Tr. Th. it is said, that a bad omen, connected with a sort of prophecy, was taken from the circumstance of the feast of St. John the Baptist (not that of his nativity, but that of his decollation, 29 August) being to fall in 1096 on a Friday. Concerning this silly cause of alarm the Annals now referred to have nothing; nor could it have had any weight except with fools. There were motives enough for dreading the divine vengeance and for repenting, without recurring to such an idle speculation.

(23) Tr. Th. ib. and Ware, Armagh at Donald.

(24) Tr. Th. ib. and Annals of Innisfallen at 1099.

(25) Tr. Th. ib. Murtagh had in the preceding year ravaged the territories of Domnald, and destroyed his palaces of Oighleach, or Aileach, and of Coleraine.

(26) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1103, Magh-Choba, or the plain of Choba, was in Tyrone (see Colgan's Topographical index to Tr. Th.) and was probably where the village now called Coagh is situated. Harris is quite wrong in stating, (Archbishops of Armagh at Donald) that the truce, which said Donald had brought about in 1102, was kept on foot by him until 1106.

(27) Ware, still persisting in his system of adding a year to the dates, has changed 1105 into 1106; but O'Flaherty (MS. catalogue) has retained it.

(28) Tr. Th. p. 299. Colgan says, (ib. p. 272.) that there was a church called Domnach-airthir in the diocese of Armagh; but he does not tell us in what part of it. Ware gives a different account of Domnald's death, according to which he fell sick on his return to Armagh and died at Duleek, whence his remains were carried to Armagh. He adds that Domnald was 68 years of age.

§. v. Donatus or Donogh O'Haingly, bishop of Dublin, who died of the plague in 1095, (29) had for successor his nephew Samuel O'Haingly, who had been a Benedictine monk of St. Alban's in England, and of whom an old writer gives us the following circumstantial account. "In the year 1095 there came to Anselm a certain monk of the monastery of St. Alban's, an Irishman, named Samuel. Upon the death of Donatus, of happy memory, bishop of the city of Dublin, he was elected by Murierdach (Murtoogh O'Brian) and the clergy and people to the bishopric of that city, and by a general decree directed, according to old custom, to Anselm, to be consecrated by him. Anselm assenting to their election and petition, having kept this man with himself for some time in an honorable manner, and diligently instructed him how he should conduct himself in the house of God, received from him his profession of canonical obedience according to old custom, and promoted him to the episcopal office at Winchester on the octave of the following Easter, being assisted by four of his suffragan bishops. This new prelate, strengthened by the benediction of so great a father, and by his letters to the aforesaid king and to the clergy and people of Ireland, written as testimonials of his consecration, returned to his country with joy, and was received in his see with honour according to the usage of that land" (30) Samuel's profession was in these terms; "I Samuel, chosen for the government of the church of Dublin, which is situated in Ireland, and to be consecrated bishop by thee, Reverend father Anselm, archbishop of the holy church of Canterbury, and primate of all Britain, do promise, that I will observe canonical obedience in all things to thee and all thy successors." (31) Of Samuel's proceedings I find very little recorded except some circumstances mentioned in a letter written to him by Anselm, (32) in which he complains, 1. that Samuel freely disposed of and gave to strangers the books, garments, and other church ornaments, which the archbishop Lanfranc had made a present of through his uncle Donatus for the use of his church. (33) Anselm says that, if this be true, he wonders at his doing so, whereas those articles were not given to Donatus but to the church, as the brethren of Canterbury could prove; and accordingly he admonishes and desires him to get speedily restored any such part of them as might have been alienated from the church. 2. He adds; "I have heard, that " you expel and disperse the monks, who were col" lected in said church for its service, and that you

" refuse to receive those who are willing to return.
" If it be so, this does not become you; for it is your " duty rather to assemble the scattered than to scatter
" the assembled. Therefore I order you that, if any " of them have been cast out, and wish to return
" and keep themselves in the service of God under " obedience, you do receive them, and with paternal " affection carefully look to their welfare; unless,
" what God forbid, there may be some cause in their " conduct, which would not allow this to be done."
3. Anselm then tells him; "I have also heard, that " you make the Cross be carried before you on the " way; which if it be true, I command you not to " do so again; for this privilege does not belong
" except to an archbishop, who has been confirmed
" with the pall by the Roman pontiff; nor is it fit,
" that by any presumption relative to an unusual " thing you should appear remarkable and repre" hensible to men." At what time this letter was written, I am not able to ascertain; but it must have been after Malchus was seated in the new see of Waterford, whereas it was directed to him with instructions to be delivered in person to Samuel. (34) This bishop's incumbency was rather a long one, as he lived until the 4th of July, A. D. 1121. (35)

(29) Chap. xxiv. §. 13.

(30) Eadmer, Historia Novourm, L. 2. See also Ware, Bishops at Samuel O'Haingly.

(31) Ap. Usher, Sylloge towards the end.

(32) This letter is the 39th in the Sylloge, and the 72d of the third book in Gerberon's edition of St. Anselm's works.

(33) See Chap. xxiv. §. 13.

(34) The letter of Anselm to Malchus, accompanying that to Samuel, is the 38th in the Sylloge. In it is a summary of Anselm's complaints, who adds, that he orders the people of Dublin to prevent the letting out of the articles belonging to the church, and desires him to expostulate, viva voce, with Samuel, and advise him to obey his admonition. At this letter to Malchus Usher marked about A. 1110, which, were it correct, would be also the date of the one to Samuel. Ware and Harris (Bishops of Waterford at Malchus) have followed Usher. But it could not have been so late, whereas Anselm died on the 21st of April, A. D. 1109. It is probable, that it was written in a rather early part of Samuel's incumbency. The mighty antiquary Ledwich says, (p. 439) that Samuel ejected the monks in 1110, i. e. a year after Anselm's death.

(35) Ware at Samuel O'Haingly. Harris observes, that the Annals of Mary's Abbey assign his death to 1122. But, besides the Book of obits of Christ-church, the continuator of Florence of Worcester, a contemporary writer, points out A. 1121, whereas at this year he has the election and consecration of Gregory the successor of Samuel. I do not understand, why Usher, who in his Note on the letter of the people, &c. of Dublin, when sending Gregory over to England, quotes the words of said continuator, yet at said letter (the 40th in the Sylloge) marks in the margin A. 1122. And in his Discourse, &c. (chap. 8.) he says that Gregory was sent in 1122 to be consecrated. It would seem then that he assigned Samuel's death to said year; but it will be seen that he was mistaken as to the time of Gregory's consecration.

§. VI. Meanwhile Waterford became an episcopal see, and Malchus, now mentioned, was appointed its first bishop, having been elected by the clergy and people of that city and by the king Murtoth O'Brian, Domnald bishop of Cashel, and the prince Dermot brother to the king, which election was approved of by various bishops. Waterford, although a Danish city, was subject to Murtoth; but the inhabitants, in imitation of their brethren of Dublin, wished to be connected in spirituals with the Normans of England and with the see of Canterbury. Murtoth complied with their wish, and joined them in a letter to Anselm, (36) in which they say, that they had been for a long time blind to their spiritual welfare, but that they have at length seen the necessity of being subject to a bishop. "Therefore we (the clergy and people of the town of Waterford) and our king Murchertac (Murtoth) and the bishop Domnald, and Dermeth (Dermot) our duke, (37) brother of the king, have chosen this priest Malchus, a monk of the bishop Wachelin of Winchester, (38) very well known to us, of noble birth and morals, versed in apostolical and ecclesiastical discipline, in faith a Catholic, prudent," &c. &c. according to the qualifications required by St. Paul. They request that Anselm may ordain him bishop for them; and to show with what unanimity the election was carried, are subjoined the signatures of Murtoth king, Dermot duke, Domnald bishop, Idunan bishop of Meath, Samuel bishop of Dublin, Ferdornach bishop of the Lagenians, &c. (39)

Malchus went with this letter to England in the year 1096, (40) and was kindly received by Anselm, who having found him worthy of the episcopacy, and received his profession of obedience, consecrated him bishop at Canterbury on the 28th of December in said year, being assisted by Ralph, bishop of Chichester, and Gundulph of Rochester. (41) Malchus' profession was in these words; "I Malchus, elected for the church of Waterford, and to be consecrated bishop by thee, Reverend father Anselm, archbishop of the holy church of Canterbury, and primate of all Britain, do promise that I will observe canonical obedience in all things to thee and to all thy successors." (42) When returned to Waterford, Malchus and his Danish flock erected the cathedral dedicated to the Holy Trinity. (43) Concerning him I find nothing further related, unless he was the same as the holy Malchus, who became bishop of Lismore, and who is so much praised by St. Bernard. But of this lower down.

(36) This letter is in Eadmer's Histor. Nov. L. 2. and in Usher's Sylloge, No. 34. It is thus headed; "Anselmo, Dei gratia Anglorum archiepiscopo, et omnibus dioecesis suae episcopis, Clerus et populus oppidi Watafordiae, cum rege Murchertacho et episcopo Domnaldo, salutem in Domino."

(37) Hence it appears, that Dermod was then governor of Waterford. He had submitted to his brother Murtoth in 1093, and they pledged themselves in a most solemn manner, and by the most sacred oaths, to remain henceforth in peace with each other. (Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1093.)

(38) Although Malchus had been a Benedictine monk at Winchester, he was a native of Ireland, as his contemporary Eadmer informs us, (loc. cit.) when speaking of his Irish electors he says, that they chose a man of their own nation named Malchus.

(39) In the Latin original the signatures are as follows. "Ego Murchertacus rex Hibernia subscripsi. Ego Dermeth dux frater regis subscripsi. Ego Domnaldus episcopus subscripsi. Ego Idunan episcopus Midiae subscripsi. Ego Samuel Dublinensis subscripsi. Ego Ferdornachus Lageniensium episcopus subscripsi. &c. There were several other signatures, which are not come down to us. Of Idunan and Ferdornach we have seen already (Chap. xxiv. §. 5.); and that Domnald, alias Dofnald, was not, as Usher thought, (Not. to Ep. 28. Sylloge) Domnald of Armagh, but Domnald of Cashel (see Chap. xxiv. §. 6.) is evident from the circumstance that the bishops, who signed that letter, were subjects of Murtoth, as king of the southern half of Ireland.

Now Domnald of Armagh belonged to the northern half, which was then ruled by Domnald Mac-Lochlin. Harris was therefore right (Bishops of Waterford at Malchus) in stating, that Domnald, who subscribed the letter, was the one of Cashel. But he was egregiously mistaken (ib. and Bishops of Down, p. 195.) in making Samuel bishop of Down, instead of Dublin. The observation now made with regard to Domnald of Armagh would alone be sufficient to prove, that no bishop of Down was connected with the transactions of king Murtoth or of the southern. Harris was led astray by Spelman and Wilkins, (Councils, &c.) who at the signatures to the Waterford letter have Samuel Dunensis, instead of Dublinensis. They in their turn were deceived by a corrupt reading in the text of Eadmer, and which is still retained in the Benedictine edition, (L. 2. p. 44.) where Samuel is called Dunnelmensis, i. e. of Durham. Knowing that it would be ridiculous to introduce a bishop of Durham signing a letter from Waterford, they changed Dunnelmensis into Dunensis; and hence Harris has honoured Down with a bishop, which it never had. It is strange, that Wilkins did not look into Usher's Sylloge, where he would have found the genuine reading Dublinensis.

(40) This is the year marked by Ware, (at Malchus) and before him by Usher as the date of the letter. Spelman (Councils, Tom. 2. p. 20.) assigns it to 1097. But the other date is more correct. For Eadmer states, that it was received some, seemingly short, time after William Rufus had passed over to Normandy to take possession of that dutchy, which was mortgaged to him by his brother Robert. Now it is known, that William went to Normandy in 1096; and on the other hand the arrival of Malchus at Canterbury was very late in the year. Besides, Anselm was not in England in 1097 at the time of the year, in which Malchus went thither. (See Fleury, L. 64. §. 49.) Wilkins is exceedingly wrong (Concil, &c. Vol. 1. p. 375.) in affixing this letter to A. 1100. Surely he might have known from Eadmer, that it was received while William was absent from England, and consequently a considerable time before the year 1100. (See Rapin, History &c. at William Rufus.)

(41) Eadmer, loc. cit. and Ware at Malchus.

(42) Sylloge towards the end.

(43) Ware, Antiq. cap. 29. and Harris, Bishops at Malchus.

§ VII. There is extant a letter written by Anselm in 1095 to the bishops Domnald, who is called senior, Donat, and all the other bishops in Ireland. (44) It is plain, that Donat was Donat O'Haingly of Dublin; but it may be doubted whether Domnald was the one of Armagh or the other of Cashel. Its being a general letter to all the Irish prelates, and his calling Domnald senior, as if invested with a superior jurisdiction, might seem to indicate that he was the archbishop of Armagh. Yet the title senior may have been given by him merely with relation to the age of Domnald, that is, the one of Cashel, whom he knew to be far advanced in life, as he had corresponded with Anselm's predecessor Lanfranc since, at least, the year 1081. (45) And even did he allude to dignity, Domnald of Cashel might have been styled senior; for, besides his having been called archbishop, it is clear that the bishops of Cashel were at this time distinguished by, at least, an honorary precedency over the others of the southern half of Ireland, which constituted the kingdom of Murtoogh O'Brien; and hence Donald's name occurs first among the signatures of the bishops to the Waterford letter above spoken of. Add, that he was undoubtedly better known to Anselm than Domnald of Armagh; and Anselm seems to have been very little acquainted with either the ecclesiastical or civil state of Ireland, except as far as regarded Murtoogh's kingdom. In this letter he tells them, how he had been forced to accept of the archbishopric of Canterbury, but that, while endeavouring to perform his duty and correct abuses, he made himself several enemies, and was then suffering great tribulations, and that persons, who had submitted to his jurisdiction, now refuse to obey him. (46) He therefore requests the prayers of his fellow bishops of Ireland that God may re-establish harmony, bring over his enemies, and make them all live conformably with his holy will. Next, he exhorts them, notwithstanding their living and thinking properly, to be watchful in maintaining the Church doctrine and discipline, and advises them that, if certain difficult cases relative to religious matters should occur, which could not be canonically determined among themselves, they may, according to a duty of charity, inform him of them, as it is better that they should receive counsel and comfort from him than run the risk of violating any of the commandments of God. Among the ecclesiastical cases, on which they might consult him, he specifies the consecrations of bishops, but makes no complaint relative to that or any other subject of Irish practice.

(44) This letter is the 33d in the Sylloge, and in Gerberon's edition of St. Anselm's works is the 8th in the Supplement to the books of epistles.

(45) Chap. xxiv. §. 6.

(46) Anselm alludes to the violent proceedings of the king William Rufus, against him in 1095, and the conduct of the English bishops, who in the assembly of Rockingham promised the king that they would not obey him any longer. (See Fleury, L. 64. §. 25.)

§. VIII. Yet, although Anselm spoke only in general terms without mentioning any particular abuse, or insinuating that the Irish bishops were guilty of any negligence, it is probable that he had an eye to certain irregularities, which, he says in two letters of his to the king Murtoth, (47) were reported to be prevalent in Ireland. After some compliments and praises of the king for his excellent administration of his kingdom, he requests of him to consider whether there be any practices followed in Ireland, which require correction, and, if there be, to exert himself to get them reformed. For, he says, it is rumoured here (in England) that marriages are dissolved in your kingdom without any reason, and that men exchange wives just as others would horses or whatsoever sort of commodity. It is added, that persons near akin cohabit, under the name of wedlock or otherwise, in opposition to the canonical rules. (48) He then directs him, in case he be not acquainted with the passages of the Holy scriptures, which condemn these antichristian customs, to order his bishops and clergy to announce them to him, that he may be enabled to know how to put a stop to such abuses. Then he tells him that it is reported, that in Ireland bishops are appointed without fixed sees, and consecrated by one bishop alone. These practices are, he observes, contrary to the canons, as in fact they were, with regard to bishops strictly so called. (49) He justly states, that no one ought to be made a bishop, unless there be a district and people assigned for him, which he is to govern; and that it is a wise rule, that he should be consecrated by, at least, three bishops. In what year these letters were written, I am not able to determine; but it is probable, that it was not long after Anselm had consecrated Samuel O'Haingly, through whom he had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with Murtogh's high rank, power, and character. (50) There is a short letter from Murtogh to Anselm, written after the year 1100 during the reign of Henry I. of England, in which he thanks him for his goodness in continuing to pray for him, and for his kindness in having on some occasion succoured his son in law Ernulph. (51)

In the year 1101 Murtogh convened a great assembly of the clergy and people of Ireland at Cashel, in which he made over that hitherto royal seat of the kings of Munster, and dedicated it to God and St. Patrick. (52) In 1102 he concluded a peace for twelve months with Magnus the powerful king of Norway, and of the Hebrides and Mann, who in the following year, while preparing an expedition for the subjugation of all Ireland, was, when exploring the country, killed, together with almost all his followers, by the Irish in Ulster, and buried near St. Patrick's church in Down. (53) Murtoĝh was so much respected by the Northmen of Mann and the Hebrides, that upon the death of Lagmann their king, who had been a son of Godred Crouan, (54) their nobles petitioned him to send them a person of royal blood, who should govern them as king until Olave, another son of Godred, would be of age. Murtoĝh sent them his nephew Donald son of his brother Teige or Thady, (55) who, during his administration, neglecting the directions of his master and uncle, who had commanded him to rule that kingdom with mildness and moderation, acted in a quite opposite manner, and behaved so tyrannically, that after three years all the chiefs of the islands united against him, and made him fly to Ireland, whence he returned no more among them. (56)

(47) These two letters are the 35th and the 36th in the Sylloge, and in Anselm's works, L. 3. Ep. 142—147. They are both directed to Muriardach (Murtoĝh) the glorious king of Ireland, and are so like each other that the latter seems to be only an improved copy of the former, or vice versa. In either of them there is no reference to the other, nor any thing to show, that Anselm wrote twice to Murtoĝh concerning the points treated of in them. I therefore suspect, that they are only various copies of one and the same letter, which having been found among Anselm's papers, were published by Picard as distinct letters, and from him by Usher, who thought that the one which he calls Ep. 35. was written not to Muriardach O'Brian but to Murchertagh or Muroĝh, prince of Leinster, and father of the famous Dermod Mac-Muroĝh. But how can this be reconciled with Anselm's calling the Muriardach or Murchertach, whom he addresses, king of Ireland? It is true, that there was in Anselm's time a Murchertach, prince or king of Leinster, who was killed in the battle of Maigh-choba, fighting under Murtoĝh O'Brien then chief sovereign of Leth-mogha, in the year 1103. (Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1103.) He was not, however, the father of Dermot Mac-Murrough, who was son of another Leinster prince, likewise called Murchertach. Usher fell into a very great mistake (ib.) in making any Murchertach of Leinster the same as the king Murchertach, Muriardach, or Murtoagh, who took part in the election of Malchus bishop of Waterford. Surely Waterford was not subject to any Leinster prince; and nothing can be more clear than that, as we have seen, the king, who interfered in that election, together with his brother Dermot, &c. was no other than Murtoagh O'Brian, who was then king of Waterford as well as of all the South of Ireland. And it is plain from the whole tenour of the letters, that the king Muriardach or Murchertach, with whom Anselm corresponded, was not a subordinate provincial king, such as those of Leinster were at that time, but a king distinguished and known by the title of king of Ireland, as Murtoagh O'Brian certainly was in the days of St. Anselm.

(48) See what has been observed (Chap. xxiv. §. 12. and Notes ib.) concerning similar complaints made by Lanfranc.

(49) See what has been said (ib.) of the Irish system of Chor-episcopi.

(50) Usher marks A. 1100 as the date of the letter, which he reckons No. 35, without assigning any reason for it. Anselm had returned to England in the latter part of that year; but it seems much more probable that said letters or letter were written before he left England in 1097.

(51) This letter is the 37th in the Sylloge, and the 85th of L. iv. in Gerberon's edition of St. Anselm's works. In it Murtoagh calls himself Murchardachus rex Hiberniae. The Ernulph, whom he mentions, was Ernulph or Arnulph de Montgomery, lord of Pembroke and West Wales, who, having together with his brother Robert, earl of Shrewsbury, revolted against Henry I. passed over to Ireland, where he married a daughter of king Murtoagh. See more ap. Usher, Not. to Ep. 37.

(52) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1101.

(53) Ib. ad A. 1102, and 1103. Ware, Ant. cap. 24. and the Chronicle of Mann, in which the death of Magnus is wrongly marked at A. 1098. Ware has added, without reason, a year to the dates of these transactions, thus placing the death of Magnus in 1104 in opposition both to the annals now quoted and to those of Ulster, which have A. 1103.

(54) See Not. 66. to Chap. xxiv.

(55) In the Chronicle of Mann he is called Dopnald' son of Tade, and Murtoth's name is written Murecard O'Brien, king of Ireland. In the Annals of Innisfallen, (at A. 1105.) Donald is called son of Teige son of Turlogh O'Brian; and it is added, that he became king also of the Danes of Dublin, which at most must mean, that he was appointed governor of Dublin.

(56) Chronicle of Mann. According to one date of said chronicle Donald went to govern the Danes of the islands in the year 1075. This is evidently wrong; for in that year Murtoth was not a king, even of Munster. (See Chap. xxiv. §. 14.) Another date is 1089, as quoted by Usher (Not. to Ep, 36. Sylloge); but to this there is a strong objection, inasmuch as Murtoth appears not to have been styled king of Ireland until about 1094. (See said Chap. ib.) The Annals of Innisfallen have a quite different date, viz. A. 1105; but there is no mention in them of the death of Lagmann or the minority of Olave having been the occasion of Donald's appointment to the sovereignty of the islands. According to the Chronicle of Mann Lagmann reigned only seven years. If this be true, it would seem that his death must have been prior by several years to 1105. There is, however, so much confusion and uncertainty of dates in that chronicle, that one does not know how to arrange many of the occurrences related in it. Yet this does not affect the truth of Donald having been for some time king of the isles possessed by the Northmen.

§. ix. In the beginning of the twelfth century we find at length a bishop of Limerick, Gille, whose name has been changed into Gillebert, and who seems to have been abbot of Bangor. (57) There is no reason to suppose, as some have suspected, that he was a Dane; for, although Limerick was a Danish city, it might have had an Irish bishop in the same manner as Dublin and Waterford had. And it is well worth observing, that Gillebert, as I shall call him, was consecrated in Ireland, as evidently appears from a letter written to him by Anselm.

Hence it seems very probable, that he was not elected to the see of Limerick by the clergy and people of that city, as in that case he would apparently have been consecrated in England, but that, being already a bishop, he was invited by them to act as their pastor, or perhaps placed over them by Murtogh O'Brian. Gillebert had travelled before he became a bishop; for he had been acquainted and intimate with Anselm at Rouen several years before his promotion. Sometime after being placed over Limerick he wrote a letter to Anselm, (58) in which he congratulates him on his having at last induced the untameable minds of the Normans to submit to the regular decrees of the holy fathers, with regard to the election and consecration of abbots and bishops, and thanks God for his having enabled Anselm to gain this victory. Hence it may be safely inferred, that this letter was written not long after Henry I. of England had in 1106 settled his disputes with Anselm, and agreed to his terms concerning the investitures, &c. ; (59) and we may also conclude, that Gillebert was bishop of Limerick in said year 1106, and perhaps a year or two earlier. Gillebert adds, that he sends him as a token of his attachment, a little present of twenty-five small pearls (of the sort, I suppose, found in Ireland) and requests that he will not be unmindful of him in his prayers. Anselm replied by the above mentioned letter, (60) thanking him for his congratulation and present, and reminding him of their mutual affection since they had known each other at Rouen. He says that, as he now knows of Gillebert's having been raised to the episcopal dignity in Ireland, (61) he makes bold to request of him, and even, as it appeared necessary, to advise him to exert himself with earnestness towards correcting and extirpating, as far as he is able, whatever may be wrong in that country, and to induce, as well as he can, his king, the other bishops, and whomsoever he may persuade to cooperate with him in that work, and in planting and promoting good practices and morals. Anselm seems here to allude to some reformation of certain Irish ecclesiastical practices, and to the introduction of those then followed at Rome.

(57) In the prologue De usu ecclesiasticae (No. 30 in the Sylloge) he calls himself Gille. Keating (Book 2.) and Colgan (A.A. SS. p. 563.) speaks of him by the name of Gilla-Espuic. Yet he sometimes assumed the name Gillebertus, latinized from Gillebert, which he probably received from the Danes, among whom he lived. That Gille had been abbot of Bangor may be deduced from his being called successor of Congell by Keating, as quoted by Gratianus Lucius, i. e. Lynch, (Cambr. Evers. p. 83.) who thought, and indeed justly, that this must have been the same as abbot of Bangor. Peter Walsh (Prospect, &c. p. 246) and Archdall (at Bangor) speak of him in like manner. I do not find in the corrupt English translation of Keating the title of successor of Congell given to Gille; but the author of it has omitted or altered many parts of the work.

(58) This letter is the 31st in the Sylloge, and the 86th of L. 4. Ep. in Gerberon's edition of St. Anselm's works. It is headed, Gillebertus by the mercy of God bishop of Limerick, Lunicensis episcopus, &c. Usher observes, that in various MSS. Gillebert is called Lunicensis, Lunnicensis, or Lumnicensis from Lumneach the Irish name of Limerick.

(59) See Fleury, L. 65. §. 46. Usher marks in the margin at this letter about A. 1094; but Anselm's disputes with the English kings had scarcely begun in 1094, nor did he obtain any victory until several years later. Usher was quite mistaken as to the times of Gillebert. Thus at the Prologue, (No. 30) which he drew up when bishop of Limerick, Usher marks A. 1090, although in all probability Gillebert was not bishop there for 14 or 15 years after that time. Ware was cautious in this respect; for, without assigning the time of Gillebert's accession, he merely says that he flourished in 1110.

(60) Anselm's letter is at No. 32 in the Sylloge, and in his works, Ep. L. 3. No. 143, addressed to Gillebert Lunicensi episcopo.

(61) As this letter was written after Anselm had settled his disputes with Henry I. and returned to England late in 1106, it follows that he had not heard of Gillebert's promotion until about that time. Hence it is clear, that it did not take place until after Anselm's second departure from England in 1103; for, if it had, Anselm would certainly have been apprized of it before his return. It is probable that Gillebert became bishop of Limerick about 1105. Here I may observe, that some fabulous or shallow writers have confounded him with a Gillebart or Gislebert, surnamed Crispinus, who had been a monk with Anselm in the monastery of Bee in Normandy. But, as Usher observes (Not. ad No. 31.) that Gislebert never became a bishop, having died abbot of Westminster, where he was buried. Ledwich, although he had Usher's Sylloge before his eyes, and followed his mistakes as to Gillebert's letter to Anselm having been written in 1094, and his tract on the Church in 1090, yet (Antiq. &c. p. 433) abandons him, and makes Gillebert the same as Gislebert, merely for the purpose of insinuating that he was an Ostman, as he pretends. Such is the Doctor's consistency! He even quotes Ware to show, that Gillebert was an Ostman, while Ware says nothing more than that he did not know whether he were an Irishman or an Ostman.

§. x. In fact Gillebert, subsequently to his having received this letter, signalized his zeal by endeavouring to bring all the practices, liturgical, and connected with the Church service, of which there was a great variety in Ireland, to one uniform system conformable to that of the particular church of Rome. Comprising these matters under the general name of ecclesiastical order, he wrote a tract entitled De usu ecclesiastico, but at what time I am not able to ascertain, except that there can be no doubt of his having composed it after the exhortation he got from Anselm, who, had it been written sooner, would have alluded to it in his letter, instead of encouraging him as one who had not yet acted vigourously, to set about doing something. (62) It was written before Gillebert became apostolical legate, as it contains not the least hint relative to any such dignity, and in the prologue, addressed to the bishops and priests of all Ireland, he assumes no other title than that of the lowest of prelates Gille of Limerick. (63) He tells them, that at the request and by the command of many of them he has endeavoured to write out the canonical custom in saying the Hours, and in performing the offices of the whole ecclesiastical order, for the purpose of procuring that the various and schismatical orders, with which almost all Ireland is bewildered, may yield to the one Catholic and Roman office. For what, he says, can be more unbecoming or schismatical than that a very learned person of one order should be like an idiot or a layman in a church, where a different one is followed? Therefore whoever professes himself a member of the Catholic church, in the same manner as he is joined in the body by one faith, hope, and charity, so is he commanded to praise God with his mouth and in the (same) order with the other members of the Church. To this he applies with great learning the words of St. Paul, (Rom. xv. 6.) That with one accord and one mouth you may glorify God. As then, he continues, the division of languages caused by pride was brought to unity in the humility of the Apostles, so the confusion of orders, that has arisen from negligence and presumption, is through your exertions and humility to make way for the consecrated rule of the Roman church. Thus he goes on arguing, as if the unity of faith required also a uniformity of ritual practices.

(62) It is strange that Usher, although otherwise wrong in his dates, could have made the writing of this tract prior to that of the letter to Anselm and of Anselm's answer.

(63) Episcopis et presbyteris totius Hiberniae infimus praesul- lum Gille Lunicensis in Christo salutem. Pitts, in his Writers of England, attributes this tract to a Gilla bishop of Lincoln, a man, who, as Usher remarks, (Not. to No. 30.) never existed.

§. XI. Gillebert, although he knew something of these exterior matters, was a very shallow theologian. Gregory the great was of a quite different way of thinking on these subjects, as we see from his instructions to the monk Augustin; and it is universally allowed not only in theory, but by the actual and still subsisting variety of liturgies and offices in the Catholic church, that the great maxim of ecclesiastical unity is not at all affected by such variety. (64) At a very ancient and one of the best periods of the Irish church a diversity of liturgies and rules was added to those introduced by St. Patrick; (65) but it was not supposed, that they implied any the least innovation in religion or essential discipline. In the course of time this diversity was carried to a much greater extent; which was undoubtedly an inconvenience, particularly in such a small country as Ireland. It seems to have been augmented in proportion to the introduction of new monastic rules, of which, notwithstanding their being all founded on one original plan, there was a considerable number. (66) Such a multiplicity of different offices required some limitation; but Gillebert was highly mistaken in calling them schismatical, (67) and equally so in the wretched arguments adduced by him. In his zeal for uniformity he fixed upon the peculiar order and office, which is strictly called Roman, and of which he seems to speak as if it were the only Catholic one, not knowing that there were many others full as catholic then and since in existence and actually followed. (68) This he strove to get substituted for the divers orders and offices used in Ireland, in imitation of similar attempts made about those times in other countries. (69) It is probable, that Gillebert was encouraged in his proceedings by Anselm, although it can scarcely be supposed, that Anselm supplied him with his bad arguments. What is become of his book or treatise De usu ecclesiastico, which seems to have been little else than a copy of the Roman liturgy and office, I am not able to tell; for it must not be confounded with the tract, which he wrote under the title of De statu Ecclesiae, and which, it seems, he prefixed to it. (70) Gillebert did not succeed, as will be seen lower down, at least to any considerable degree, in setting aside the Irish Offices.

(64) See, among other parts of this history where I had occasion to touch on this point, Chap. i. §. 5.

(65) See Chap. x. §. 4. (66) See Not. 58 to Chap. x.

(67) Alemand (Introd. à l'Hist. Monast. d'Irlande, p. 14.) justly censures Gillebert for his unfounded and ignorant manner of speaking of the Irish offices, and observes that a similar variety still prevails, particularly among the religious orders, such as the Carthusians, Benedictines, Dominicans, and Carmelites, whose masses and offices differ from each other and from those of the secular clergy.

(68) Were Gillebert now alive and to go to Rome, he would find in that very city a great number of clergymen observing liturgies and offices different, and some of them very much so, from the Roman.

(69) Pope Gregory VII. was very anxious to introduce the Roman office into the Western churches. On this point he was successful in some parts of Spain. (See Fleury, L. 63. §. 6.)

(70) Towards the end of the prologue De usu, &c. Gillebert makes mention of a painted image of the Church, which he had made. The tract entitled De statu Ecclesiae, which Usher has placed after the prologue, begins with a description of this image, and then proceeds to an account of the various classes of the members of the Church, both lay and ecclesiastical. It has the gradations of bishops, archbishops, primates, and popes, who are placed over all the others. Then we find the orders of ostiarii, lectors, exorcists, acolythes, subdeacons, deacons, and priests, and their various powers and duties. In short it is a summary of the general Canon law of those times, mixed with some observations on ecclesiastical dresses and church utensils and ornaments. Speaking of the priest's duty to pray, Gillebert says that it is chiefly fulfilled in celebrating the Hours and Mass, of which however, he adds, as it cannot be done briefly, we shall treat in the sequel. Here he alludes to the treatise, De usu ecclesiastico, which was to contain the series of the whole divine office, &c. a series not to be found in the tract De statu Ecclesiae. Hence Harris was wrong (Writers at Gille) in confounding them into one treatise, and still more wrong (Bishops of Limerick) in saying, that "it contains the different forms of liturgies, and the various ways of celebrating divine service in the church of Ireland;" for the tract, De statu Ecclesiae, which he thought the same as the other, contains no such things, nor any liturgy whatsoever. And as to what was contained in the book De usu ecclesiastico, we may be sure, that they were not Irish liturgies, but what Gillebert styles the canonical custom.

§ XII. Donnald Mac-Amalgaid was, as already stated (71) succeeded in the see of Armagh by Celsus in the year 1105. Celsus, whose real name was Ceallach or Kellach, was a grandson of the archbishop Moeliosa, Donnald's predecessor, by his son Aedh or Aidus, and accordingly was a member of that family, which had for so great a lapse of time usurped the possession of that great see. (72) But, although of that family, he was a real bishop, having been actually consecrated on the 23d of September in said year, (73) and before he had reached the canonical age, being then only about 26 years old. (74) He is said to have been very learned, and it is certain that he was gifted with a truly ecclesiastical spirit, and was a most zealous, laborious, and holy prelate. He was not married, as some persons have foolishly thrown out; whereas, on the contrary, he exerted himself most strenuously to put an effectual stop to the hereditary succession, by which the see of Armagh had been go grievously injured, and, among many other regulations, re-established by his example and proceedings the canonical system of celibacy, which had been broken through by eight of his predecessors, who, although laymen, got themselves called archbishops.

(75) St. Bernard tells us, that the unhappy state, to which the church of Armagh had been reduced by such enormous abuses, affected, more or less, every other part of Ireland, and a great dissolution of ecclesiastical discipline, together with a neglect of religion, overspread the land. Barbarism, he adds, amounting to a sort of paganism, had been introduced instead of Christian practices; and bishops were changed and multiplied without order or regularity according to the mere pleasure of the Armagh metropolitan, so that almost every church had a bishop of its own. (76) Whatsoever or how far extended were those abuses, Celsus endeavoured to correct them as far as he was able, and by his exemplary conduct, charity, preaching, erecting of churches, lying down rules of discipline and morality for the clergy and people, and other pastoral exertions, greatly contributed to bring about a better order of things. (77) The first act of his, which I find specially recorded, was a visitation of Ulster in 1106, which seems to have been as much of a temporal as of a spiritual nature, that is, for the purpose of receiving the dues, that used to be paid to the see of Armagh. In said year he made a similar visitation throughout Munster, where he appears to have been well received, as, besides the usual contributions according to the so called Law of St. Patrick, many presents were made to him. (78) In the same year died Coencomrach O'Boigill, who had been suffragan bishop to Donald. (79)

(71) §. 4.

(72) I cannot here pass by a most glaring instance of Ledwich's ignorance, not to call it worse, of Irish history. At p. 435 of his rhapsody, while blundering about Domnald of Armagh, he says that the see was then held by the Ostmen. Lest the reader may doubt of his having uttered such a monstrous assertion, I shall give his words; "The Ostmen, who now possessed the see, either had embraced the tenets of the Irish, or were married, or held it by hereditary right." Thus then the family, which usurped and occupied that see for about 200 years, (see Chap. xxii. §. 13.) was not Irish but Ostmannic or Danish, and accordingly the Muredachs, Dubdalethes, Maelmurrys, Amalguids, Moeliosas, Domnalds, Cellachs, &c. were Ostmen, Northmen, or Danes. Would not St. Bernard, who inveighs so much against that family, have told us so, were it true? Would not our annalists and historians, were it merely for the honour of Armagh and of the Irish nation, have stated that those usurpers were foreigners? Would the Irish sovereigns of that period Brian Boromhe, Mael-seachlin, Turlogh, Murtoth, Mac-Lochlin, &c. have allowed Ostmen or Danes to rule the primatial see of Ireland, and at a time when the power of said Ostmen was crushed and they were subject to Irish kings and governors? Why did not the Danes of Dublin and Waterford direct their bishops elect to Armagh instead of to Canterbury, if that see was then held by the Ostmen? Ledwich himself tells us soon after, that the Armachians were very angry with the Danes of Dublin for applying on such occasions to the archbishops of Canterbury. This shameful fabrication is on a par with his fable, which he often repeats, of Christian Ostmen having been in possession of Armagh in the ninth century, and of their having introduced St. Patrick into Ireland. (See Chap. ii. §. 16.) It is wonderful, that a man so profoundly ignorant of the history of this country has dared to write a book styled its Antiquities. It is in fact a romance crammed with misrepresentations, and circumstances that never occurred. There is no part of Europe except Ireland, where a person would have the effrontery to publish such a work; but Ledwich relied on the credulity of the bulk of his Irish readers, who know something of every ancient history, excepting that of their own country.

(73) Tr. Th. p. 299. Ware Bishops at Celsus.

(74) Celsus was in the 50th year of his age, when he died on the 1st of April A. D. 1129. Hence it follows, that, when consecrated, he was, at most, only 26 years old. Harris (Bishops at Celsus) gives him near 27 years; but, following Ware, he erroneously supposed that his consecration took place in 1106. His being consecrated so young was owing to the influence of his family, which had marked him out as successor to Donnald.

(75) St. Bernard, who says of Celsus (Vit. S. Malach. cap. 7.) that he was vir bonus et timoratus, relates, as we have seen (Chap. xxii. §. 13.), that eight lay married men, not in holy orders, had preceded him in the possession of the see, and then states how much grieved Celsus was at the abuses, that followed from that dreadful system, and how he laboured to prevent the recurrence of it. Hence it is as clear as day light, that Celsus was not married; and hence also it is plain, that the Irish bishops were not allowed to have wives. For, if they were, why did not those eight so called archbishops take holy orders? The fable of Celsus having been married originated with Hanmer, who (Chronicle, &c. p. 203. new ed.) says, that "he was a married man, and died of great age, and lyeth buried with his wife and children in the said church," viz. of Armagh. In these few words there are three lies! Celsus did not die of great age; for he was not fifty years old when he died. 2. He was not, as will be seen, buried at Armagh but at Lismore. 3. He had neither a wife nor children. Why did not Hanmer give us the names of some of those children? Harris observes, (Bishops at Celsus) that he does not know on what authority Hanmer has made Celsus a married man. The fact is, that he had no authority whatsoever, except perhaps his having misrepresented some words of St. Bernard, who (ib.) makes mention of a vision, in which, when Celsus was sick, there appeared to St. Malachy a tall reverend looking woman, who was called Celsus's wife, and who presented Malachy with a pastoral staff exactly like that, which belonged to Celsus. It is evident, that this female figure was an emblem of the church of Armagh, the spiritual spouse of Celsus, according to a very usual ecclesiastical phrase, and as a few lines higher up St. Bernard introduces St. Malachy giving the name of spouse to his church of Connor. Hanmer might have met with this passage, and in his stupidity transformed the see of Armagh into a real woman. But where did he find the children! Usher in his juvenile tract on Corbes, &c. published in the Collectan. de rebus Hib. vol. 1. must have taken from Hanmer what he has about Celsus having been married; but he was afterwards better informed, and accordingly in his Discourse on the religion, &c. (chap. 5.), where he is inquiring whether the clergy were in ancient times allowed to marry, has not a word about Celsus. But the doughty Dr. Ledwich still keeps up this fable, and has even added to the lies of Hanmer. He tells us, (p. 438) that Celsus “though well affected to Rome, could not be prevailed on to separate during his life from his wife and children.” Good God! what patience is requisite to read such balderdash! Where did the Dr. find, that any one ever asked Celsus to quit his wife and children? Or how could he have been solicited to separate from persons, that were not in existence?

(76) St. Bernard, ib. He had got his information chiefly from Ireland, as appears from his preface; but his Irish correspondents seem to have given too high a colouring to the abuses that prevailed, and to have made them more diffused throughout Ireland than they really were. That there was a great relaxation of discipline and decay of religion in some parts of Ulster is but too clear from the description, which he gives of the state of the diocese of Connor, before St. Malachy undertook the care of it; but from St. Bernard’s own statement it is evident, as will be seen elsewhere, that other parts of Ireland were not by any means so much infected with that gangrene. The Irish bishops, of whom St. Anselm had some knowledge, viz. those of the Southern half or Murtoogh O’Brian’s kingdom (for those of the North and the state of that portion seem to have been almost unknown to him) are praised by him as religious, good, and wise men in his letter to Domnald, &c. (See above §. 7.) The beginning of the letter shows in what esteem he held them; “Odorem religionis vestrae plurimis indicibus agnoscens, calamitates quas patior decrevi potissimum vobis aperire; ut, quanto vicinius assistitis creatori, tanto familiarius angustias meas in conspectu ejus valeatis indicare, et indicantes compassionis gemitibus ipsius misericordiam mihi impetrare.” And towards the end of it he says; “Practerea, quamquam recte viventem recteque sapientem, pastorali sollicitudine fraternitatem vestram,” &c. And lower down; “Iterum, charissimi, rogamus vos; orate pro nobis, erigite nos de tribulationibus nostris manu vestrae orationis, piis fletibus pulsantes aures clementiae

Dei." Where such bishops presided, it was impossible that barbarism, amounting to a sort of paganism, could prevail. This letter was written in 1095 during the very height of the power of the pseudo-archbishops of Armagh, and only ten years before the accession of the good bishop Celsus. And about eleven or twelve years later writing to Gillebert of Limerick (above §. 9.) he makes no complaint as to any great abuses in Ireland, and speaks of Gillebert's fellow bishops as persons, whom he should apply to for forwarding his views. Gillebert himself in his prologue De usu ecclesiastico addresses those fellow bishops in a style of the greatest respect as pious and worthy persons. It is therefore certain, that St. Bernard's general complaint or invective was not applicable to all Ireland nor even to one half of it, although it was true as to the diocese of Connor and, I dare say, to some adjoining parts. He refers to what he had written before concerning that diocese, as explanatory of the view he gives of all Ireland; but it did not follow that, because matters were bad enough in Connor, they were so every where else. He states as an instance of what he calls paganism the multiplication of bishops, as a thing unheard of since the very beginning of christianity. St. Bernard was not aware, that this was owing to the Irish system of chorepiscopi. Yet I allow, that it was carried too far. At any rate it was not paganism, and he was mistaken in supposing that the multiplying of bishops was a circumstance unheard of. For it is well known, that in the earlier times of the church a bishop was placed in every town, where there was a considerable number of faithful, (see Fleury, Instit. au Dr. Eccl. Part 1. ch. 3.) so that what St. Bernard says of Ireland, viz. that almost every church had a bishop of its own, was actually followed; whereas there was usually in those times only one church in each town. Nor was there any law against fixing bishops in small cities or towns, prior to one of the Council of Sardica, which, by the bye, was not generally observed; for long after it we find bishops in numbers of small places in the Eastern countries, Africa, &c. and we meet with divisions of bishoprics into smaller ones. (See Bingham, Book II. chap. 12.) On the whole, notwithstanding the great corruption of discipline, &c. in some parts of Ireland, the greatest portion of the Irish church was, even before the times of Celsus and St. Malachy, as pure as, I believe, any other national church of that period; which, if necessary, might be shown from St. Bernard's own works, and even from his above mentioned preface.

As St. Bernard had confined his severe remarks on the ecclesiastical state of Ireland to those times, it was not fair in Dr. Milner to apply them in a pcevish note of his against the Irish nation (Inquiry, alias Tour in Ireland, Additional Notes, p. 50.) to a later period, viz. that just prior to the settlement of the English in Ireland, which was later by above 60 years than the accssion of Celsus, and by near 50 than when St. Malachy had set about reforming the diocese of Connor. Had the Doctor been more cool on this subject, he could have learned from St. Bernard, that a great change was brought about by those two holy prelates; and, had he thought it worth his while to look into our ecclesiastical history, he would have found that, through not only their exertions, but likewise of others, who came after them, such as Gelasius of Armagh, &c. &c. the Irish church was, on the arrival of the English, in a very different state from what St. Bernard represents it to have been in about the beginning of the 12th century. Dr. Milner ought to have distinguished the times so as not to make a reader think, that St. Bernard was describing the Irish church as it stood when the English came over; for surely he cannot but know, that the saint was dead many years prior to that event. But he throws different periods into one; and after pronouncing that the Irish were then a motley group of Irish, Scots, and Ostmen or Scandinavians (pray what were then the English? Saxons, Danes, Normans, French, &c.) he goes so far as to say, that in spite even of St. Malachy and Cardinal Paparo, the state of religion and morality was amongst them in the most frightful disorder. The sequel of this work will show, that this is an unfounded assertion; and Dr. Milner would do well not to meddle again with Irish history, until he shall have learned something more about it. It will not do to tell us, as he does in said note, that "most of the writers, who enlighten Ireland at the present day in religious as well as in profane literature, are Englishmen." Be it so and let Dr. Milner be one of them; but certainly he has not enlightened us as to this part of either our civil or ecclesiastical history.

(77) See Tr. Th. p. 300.

(78) Ib. p. 299.

(79) Ib. See above §. 4.

§. XIII. In the year 1111 Celsus attended at the great synod, or rather national convention, of Fiadh-mac-Aengussa, together with Moelmurry O'Dunain, archbishop of Cashel, fifty other bishops, three hundred priests, and three thousand persons of the clerical order; besides Murtoogh O'Brian, king of Lethmogha and the nobles of his kingdom; and in which many regulations were made for the conduct of the clergy and people. (80) This synod is called by some writers that of Usneach, which if it be correct, Fiadh-mac-Aengussa was situated near the famous hill of Usney in the now county of Westmeath. (81) Yet I find them distinguished as two distinct synods, and that of Usneach represented as held for the purpose of dividing the parishes of Meath between the sees of Clonmacnois and Clonard. It is, however, stated to have been held in the same year; but neither Murtoogh O'Brian, nor Celsus, nor Moelmurry, are mentioned as having been present at it. (82) From Moelmurry O'Dunain being called archbishop in the accounts of the synod of Fiadh-mac-Aengussa it appears, that the see of Cashel was by this time generally recognized as metropolitan. Moelmurry's predecessor Donnald O'Heine had been honoured with that title, and enjoyed a certain precedency over the other bishops of the southern half of Ireland. (83) This prerogative was ratified and enlarged by Celsus either in that synod or prior to it, so that Cashel became in reality a truly archiepiscopal and metropolitan see, yet with this condition that it was to be subordinate to the primatial one of Armagh. (84) This act of Celsus was afterwards confirmed by Pope Innocent II. and thus there were in Ireland two archbishops invested with full canonical jurisdiction, viz. the primate, who reserved to himself the Northern half and the primatial rights over all Ireland; and the archbishop of Cashel, who was charged with the care of the Southern half.

After the synod of Fiadh-mac-Aengussa another was held at Rath-Breasail, over which presided Gille or Gillebert, bishop of Limerick and then apostolical legate in Ireland. (85) The precise year of this synod I cannot ascertain; but it must have been later than is commonly supposed, and, on comparing various circumstances, it appears to me that it was about A. D. 1118. (86) As Gillebert was at this time apostolical legate, he must have received his appointment from Pope Pascal II. as appears most probable, or perhaps from Gelasius II. (87) Our writers do not tell us where Rath-Breasail was situated; but, if we are to judge from the name, I should think it was in the district anciently called Hy-Bressail, now Clanbrassil in the county of Armagh, or in the other Hy-Bressail, that formed part of Hy-falgia (the ancient Offaly) in Leinster. (88)

(80) Ib. from the 4 Masters. The true date of this synod was not, as Ware (Bishops at Celsus) in his usual mode of adding a year insinuates, 1112, but 1111, as have also the Annals of Innisfallen, which give the following account of it. “A. 1111. “A general convention of the noblemen of Ireland, both clergy and “laity, was held by Murtoth O’Brian, monarch of Ireland, at “Fiadh-Aengussa, wherein were assembled the nobility of Mun- “ster, and Maolmuire O’Dunain archbishop of Ireland, and Ceal- “lach (Celsus) Mac-Aodha successor of St. Patrick—the num- “ber of men in holy orders, who were at that convention, 58 “bishops, 317 priests, 160 deacons, and a vast number of “clergy of inferior degree; and in that synod many regulations “were made.” Keating (Book 2. p. 100. Dublin ed.) also attributes the summoning of this synod to Murtoth O’Brian, and calls Maolmuire O’Dunain archbishop, but differs from the annals as to the number of clergymen present. Their calling Maolmuire archbishop of Ireland must be understood relatively to that part of it, which formed Murtoth’s kingdom, viz. Leth-mogha. The Annals of Connaught, quoted by Ware, (ib.) give him the title of archbishop of Cashel; and the 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 308.) style him archbishop of Munster. Henry of Marleburgh, whose Annals, or rather part of them, are at the end of Hammer's chronicle, places at said year a great council of bishops, &c. convened, he says, by Maurice Mac-Lochlin king of Ireland. He confounded this Maurice, i. e. Murchertach, or Murtoogh who did not become king of Ireland until many years later, with Murtoogh O'Brian. In like manner they have been confounded by the Bollandists, who (at Celsus 6th April) misunderstanding Colgan make Murtoogh O'Brian, king of the South, a nephew of Domnald Mac-Lochlin the king of the North.

(81) Colgan says (Tr. Th. p. 299.) that in the margin of the 4 Masters the synod of Fiadh-mac-Aengussa is called that of Usneach. Harris has in a note (Bishops at Celsus); "Fiadh-mac-Aengussa, as much as to say, the land or the wood of the son of Aengus, was in very ancient times called Coendruim, and afterwards Usneach. It is now called the hill of Usney, and stands in the barony of Rathconrath, and county of Westmeath, about six miles S. W. of Mullingar."

(82) Immediately after the account of the synod of Fiadh-mac-Aengussa the Annals of Innisfallen add; "In the same year the great synod of Usneach was also held; wherein the parishes of Meath were equally divided between the bishops of Clonmacnois and Clonard.—There attended at these regulations in that synod Morogh O'Maolseachlain, Eocha O'Kelly, and the clergy of the religious house of St. Kieran (Clonmacnois), together with Giolla-Criost O'Maoillean abbot of Clonmacnois."

(83) See Chap. xxiv. §. 6. and above §. 7. Keating says, (B. 2. p. 6.) that the archbishop of Cashel used to be called archbishop of Lethe-mogha, the southern half. But, as far as I can judge, no bishop of that see was thus distinguished until the reign of Murtoogh O'Brian, or, at the earliest, of his father Turlogh.

(84) St. Bernard, having observed (Vit. S. Mal. cap. 7.) that, owing to the reverence and honour, in which the memory of St. Patrick as apostle of Ireland was held, all the bishops, priests, and the whole body of the Irish clergy, &c. acknowledged the metropolitan of Armagh as their chief superior, says (cap. 10.) that "there was another metropolical see, which Celsus had newly appointed, yet subject to the first see, and to its archbishop as primate." The phrase appointed is not in opposition to what has been said of the bishops of Cashel having been styled archbishops, before Celsus not only confirmed that title, but invested them with more than honorary jurisdiction, and thus appointed Cashel a truly archiepiscopal see. That Cashel was the see alluded to by St. Bernard, it would be silly to call in question. Its bishop is the only one, who, besides the primate, is called archbishop in the account of the synod of Fiadh-mac-Aengussa and in other documents of those times. Harris need not have been so cautious as he was, (Bishops at St. Malachy) where he says that the new metropolis spoken of by St. Bernard is supposed to be Cashel. He refers to Mac-Mahon's Jus Primat. Ar-mach. Now Mac-Mahon not only supposes it, but asserts it as an undoubted fact. Thus at No. 7 he writes; “novam metropolim —patet fuisse Casseliensem ex vita S. Christiani Lismorensis et ex numerosa synodo (Fiadh-mac-Aengussa) &c. (See also ib. Nos. 62, and 201.) He seems to say, that Celsus transferred the metropolitical power from Emly to Cashel; but whatever prerogative Emly had enjoyed, and which, as I have already observed more than once, was never truly metropolitical, it had lost it before Celsus' time, as is clear from what we have seen concerning Domnald O'Heine.

(85) Keating, History, &c. B. 2. p. 100. Gratianus Lucius (Lynch) thought, (Cambr. Evers. p. 37.) that this synod was the same as that of Fiadh-mac-Aengussa, and strives to prove it from the Annals of Innisfallen, which, as far as I can discover, make no mention of Rathbreasail, or, as he calls it, Muighbrassel. He may perhaps have found in some copy of said annals a marginal note indicating that the synod was called by both names; but Keating, who treats of both those synods, (ib.) expressly distinguishes them; and from his account of that of Rathbreasail, which he took from the Book of Clonenagh, it is evident that they were different assemblies. Besides, were they one and the same, would he have omitted in his account of that of Fiadh-mac-Aengussa the name of Gille, who undoubtedly presided over the synod of Rathbreasail?

(86) Ware (Bishops at Gille) says, that it was held in 1110. In this case it should have been prior to that of Fiadh-mac-Aengussa, which sat in 1111. But this cannot accord with what will be soon seen concerning the number of Irish bishops having been reduced by a decree of the synod of Rathbreasail much below that of fifty or more, who attended at Fiadh-mac-Aengussa. Lynch says, (loc. cit.) that Keating assigns it to 1110; and I believe that it was from him that Ware took this date. But in the English translation of Keating's history the year marked for it is 1115. Whichsoever of these dates were the original one of Keating, whose notation of years is frequently wrong, we need not inquire; for neither of them is correct. In fact, the synod of Rathbreasail could not have been held before 1118, whereas it was attended by Moeliosa, archbishop of Cashel, the successor of Moelmurry O'Dunain, who died in the latter end of 1117. On the other hand it could not have been later than the early part of 1119, if it be true, as Keating says, that it was summoned in the reign of Murtoth O'Brian, who died on the 13th of March in said year. (See Chap. xxiv. §. 14.) What Keating calls the reign of Murtoth must be understood of his life; for Murtoth had been dispossessed of the throne in 1116, (ib.) and accordingly before the meeting of that assembly.

(87) Neither St. Bernard who makes mention (Vit. S. Mal. cap. 7 and 11.) of Gillebert as apostolical legate, nor Keating, who gives him that title, when treating of the synod of Rathbreasail, nor any of our historians, as far as I can discover, has marked the time of his being raised to that office. It could not have been before the pontificate of Pascal II. which began in 1099, whereas Gillebert was not a bishop at that time. (Above §. 9.) Pascal lived until January in 1118, and might have been acquainted with Gillebert, who had travelled in his younger days, or perhaps was informed of his character by St. Anselm. It is much more probable that Gillebert was appointed legate by him than by his successor Gelasius II. whose troublesome pontificate did not last quite a year.

(88) See for the Hy-Bressail in Co. Armagh AA. SS. p. 62. and Tr. Th. p. 293; and for the other Harris Antiq. ch. 7 at Hy-falgia. According to Lynch's system Rathbreasail would have been in Westmeath; but, as it is unfounded, (above Not. 85.) so is also this consequence.

§. XIV. This synod was attended, like that of Fiadh-mac-Aengussa, not only by bishops and clergymen of various ranks, but likewise by distinguished laymen from, it seems, all parts of Ireland. The only names, which I find recorded, of its members are those of Celsus of Armagh and Moeliosa (servant of Jesus) Mac-Ainmhire, alias O'Foghlada, archbishop of Cashel, and successor of Moelmurry O'Dunain, who died at Clonard in the 77th year of his age, on the 24th of December A. D. 1117, having left a great reputation for wisdom, virtue, and liberality to the poor. (89) The synod was occupied chiefly in forming a regular division of dioceses throughout Ireland, and in fixing their boundaries. It was decreed that, exclusive of Dublin, which was left subject to Canterbury, there should be 24 dioceses, 12 in Leth-cuin subject to the archbishop of Armagh, and 12 others in Leth-mogha subject to the archbishop of Cashel. Of the former, five were in Ulster, viz. Clogher, Ardsrath, Derry, Connor, Down; five in Connaught, viz. Tuam, Clonfert, Cong, Killala, Ard-carn; and two in Meath, which by order of this synod were to be considered as the only fixed sees for that territory, Duleek and Clonard, (90) Of the twelve sees of Leth-mogha besides Cashel, were in Munster, viz. Lismore, or Waterford, Cork, Rathmaighe Deisgirt, Limerick, Killaloe, Emly; (91) and five in Leinster, viz. Kilkenny, (92) Leighlin, Kildare, Glendaloch, and Ferns. On looking over the boundaries marked for those dioceses, a very great part of which can scarcely be pointed out at present on account of the changes of names, it is clear that the synod intended, besides reducing the number of sees, to render all the dioceses of Ireland nearly of equal extent; but it did not succeed, at least to any considerable degree in reducing the number; whereas we find at the time of the council of Kells in 1152 many more sees than those here laid down, and, on the other hand, some of said 24 sees not even spoken of, as if, notwithstanding the decree of Rathbreasail, they had either not been established or had in a very short time ceased to exist. (93) Another important regulation was, that by an act of “this convention the revenues of the clergy and the Church lands were confirmed to the several bishops of Ireland for their maintenance and support of the episcopal character; which lands were to be exempted from tribute and chief rents and other public contributions, and so remain in that state of freedom and independency for ever.” (94) It is probable that some other decrees were enacted by this assembly; but, as far as I know, there remains no account of them. Its proceedings concluded with the following declaration: “The blessing of God Almighty, and of St. Peter and St. Paul, and of the representer of St. Peter’s successor, the legate Giolla-Aspuic bishop of Limerick, and of Ceallach St. Patrick’s successor, primate of Ireland, and of Maoil-Iosa mac-Ainmhire archbishop of Cashel, and of all the bishops, gentry, and clergy in this holy synod of Rathbreasail light and remain upon every one, that shall approve, ratify, and observe these ordinances: and, on the other side, their curses on the infringers of them.” (95)

(89) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1117 and 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 308. Ware (Archbishops of Cashel) has in his usual manner, and without necessity, changed 1117 into 1118. I am surprised at his saying, (ib.) that Moeliosa O’Foghlada is not called archbishop; whereas not only the 4 Masters (ib.) expressly style him archbishop of Cashel, but likewise Keating gives him the same title, and the Annals of Innisfallen (at A. 1131) call him archbishop of Munster. He was the son of one Ainmhire of a family surnamed O’Foghlada.

(90) Keating ib. Lynch in his endeavours to show, that the synod of Rathbreasil was the same as that of Fiadh-mac-Aengussa or Usneach, refers to this regulation, by which two sees were fixed for Meath, setting aside some others, which it had before. But he did not consider, that there was a material difference between what passed at Usneach, and the decree of Rathbreasil. The two sees mentioned in the proceedings of Usneach were, as we have just seen, (§. 13.) Clonmacnois and Clonard, whereas those named and established by the regulation of Rathbreasil were Duleek and Clonard.

(91) In Keating's enumeration of the sees of Leth-mogha, the names of which he gives twice, there is a contradiction, owing to his wretched translator. At first this bungler reckons seven of them in Munster, besides Cashel, making Rathmaighe and Deisgirt two distinct ones. Afterwards, when marking the boundaries of the dioceses, he joins Rathmaighe and Deisgirt into one name and as if of one place; and so the matter stands in Keating's original in both passages; thus the number of the Munster dioceses, besides Cashel, was six. The diocese of Rathmaighe Deisgirt was undoubtedly the same as that of Ardferd, as appears from Cean-Meara (Kenmare), Feil (the river Feal), and Doirbre (the same as the now barony of Iveragh) being reckoned among its boundaries. Rathmaighe was surnamed Deisgert (Southern) to distinguish it from Rathmuighe in the North of Ireland. It is worth observing that, according to this decree, Waterford was united to Lismore, a union which was afterwards broken.

(92) In another part of this enumeration instead of Kilkenny we find Kilcullen; but Keating's original has not Kilcullen but Kilkenny alone. And, what makes it still more clear, a place called Mileadhach near the river Barrow is laid down as an eastern boundary of the diocese in question, being marked at the same time as a western one of the diocese of Ferns, and also as a boundary of that of Waterford or Lismore. This could not answer for a diocese of Kilcullen, and accordingly the true reading is Kilkenny. Whether the synod used this name, or Keating adopted it inasmuch as Kilkenny had become before his time the residence of the bishops of Ossory, I am not able to tell; but the name Kilkenny has never adhered to the see, nor was it until many years after the synod of Rathbreasil that its bishops began to reside in that city.

(93) At the time of the council of Kells there were, as will be seen, besides the archiepiscopal sees, 34 bishoprics. That council was attended by some bishops of old sees omitted by the synod of Rathbreasil, such as those of Clonmacnois, Achonry, Ardagh, &c. On the other hand in the account of the council of Kells are not mentioned the sees of Cong and Ardarn.

(94) Keating, ib.

(95) I have taken these words from Peter Walsh's Prospect of the state of Ireland (p. 248.), who professes to have copied them from Keating, whose translator has omitted them, merely stating, that the synod left the blessing of God and its own upon those, who should support and vindicate the regulations made with regard to the bishoprics and their limits, &c.

§. xv. Before the synod of Rathbreasil was held Celsus had made two visitations of Connaught, the second of which was in 1116. (96) The first might have been in 1106, the year, in which he made his circuit of Ulster and Munster, and perhaps, in making his way from the former to the latter province, took his route through Connaught. It is related, that in 1121 Celsus was appointed bishop also of Dublin with the common consent of the Irish and Northmen or Danes. (97) This must have been after the 4th of July of said year, on which the bishop Samuel O'Haingly died. (98) It is not easy to understand, what is meant by the appointment of Celsus to the see of Dublin; for surely it cannot be supposed, that he intended to become a pluralist. The probability is, that on the death of Samuel he wished to bring that see under his jurisdiction, and that his views were favoured by a part of the clergy and people, who applied to him to take upon himself the administration of the diocese until matters could be properly arranged. Anselm of Canterbury, for whom the Irish prelates entertained great respect, was dead since the year 1109; and it was now thought full time to put an end to the jurisdiction of Canterbury over any part of Ireland. Waterford and Limerick had been already, by the decree of Rathbreasil, placed under the archbishop of Cashel (99) and the Irish bishops, particularly Celsus, considered it very unbecoming, that the church of Dublin should remain separated from the body of the Irish hierarchy. Whether Celsus actually governed the see of Dublin for some time, in consequence of said appointment, however it may be understood, I am not able to ascertain; but the fact is, that a majority of the burgesses and clergy of the city opposed his plan, and elected Gregory, (100) who was as yet not a deacon, for their bishop. They sent him to England with a letter directed to Ralph, archbishop of Canterbury, (101) from which it appears, that there had been a contest relative to the dependence of Dublin on that see. This is clear from the very terms of the head or address, in which the electors, not content with calling themselves the burgesses and clergy of Dublin, represent themselves as all the burgesses and all the clergy. (102) Then they tell him, that they think it fit to send to him Gregory their elect; for, they add, “we were always willingly “ subject to the direction of your predecessors, from “ whom we remember that our people received the “ ecclesiastical dignity. Know then, that the bishops

 “ of Ireland entertain a very great jealousy against “ us, and most of all the one who resides at Armagh, “ because we are unwilling to submit to their ordi“ nation, but wish to be always under your dominion.
 “ Therefore we supplicantly request, that you will “ promote Gregory to the holy order of episcopacy, “ if you wish to retain any longer this diocese, which “ we have preserved for you during a considerable “ time.”

(96) Tr. Th. p. 300.

(97) Ib. from the 4 Masters, and Harris, (Bishops at Celsus) who refers also to the Annals of Multifernan, which have at A. 1121, Celestinus (Celsus) Primas archiepiscopatum Dublin accepit. They are wrong in calling the see of Dublin archiepiscopatum.

(98) Above §. 5.

(99) Yet the Danes of Limerick succeeded, after Gillebert's death, in opposition to that decree, in getting their bishop consecrated at Canterbury.

(100) Colgan, quoting the 4 Masters (Tr. Th. p. 309.) calls him Grenius, an Irish name with a Latin termination.

(101) This letter is at No. 40 in Usher's Sylloge.

(102) Domino reverentissimo ac religiosissimo, Radulpho archiepiscopo Cantuariae, omnes burgenses Dublinae civitatis, cunctusque clericorum conventus, &c.

§. XVI. These Danish electors were assisted by an Irish sovereign, who must have been no other than the one to whom Dublin was then subject. This sovereign was Tirdelvac or Turlogh O'Conor, who, from having been originally king only of Connaught, extended in course of time his dominion over other parts of Ireland, and became master of Dublin in the year 1118. (103) He wrote a letter to Henry I. king of England for the purpose of recommending a request of the burgesses of Dublin relative to this matter, in consequence of which Henry, calling him king of Ireland, directed this note to the archbishop Ralph: "The king of Ireland has announced to me by a brief of his, and the burgesses of Dublin, that they have chosen this Gregory to be their bishop, and that they send him to you to be consecrated. Accordingly I give you this notice, that, complying with their petition, you may perform his consecration without delay." (104) Gregory was, by order of Ralph, ordained deacon and priest by Roger, bishop of Salisbury, at a place called Divisio, on a Saturday the 24th of September, A. D. 1121, and was consecrated bishop by Ralph at Lambeth on Sunday the 2d of October. Ralph was attended by Richard bishop of London, Roger of Salisbury, Robert of Lincoln, Everard of Norwich, and David of Bangor. On the 24th of said month Gregory assisted at the consecration of the church of Tewksbury. (105) His profession of obedience was in these terms; "I Gregory, elected to the government of the church of Dublin, which is situated in Ireland, and to be consecrated by thee, “ Reverend father Ralph, archbishop of the holy “ church of Canterbury, and primate of all Britain,

 “ do promise that I will observe in every respect
 “ canonical obedience to thee and all thy successors.”

(106) And in fact it appears, that he did so until the holding of the council of Kells in 1152, when Dublin was raised to the rank of a metropolitical see, of which Gregory became the first archbishop. After his return to Ireland I meet with no further attempt to bring Dublin under Irish ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and Celsus being a man of peaceable disposition, seems to have acquiesced in the result of Gregory's appointment. In the year 1122 Celsus lost his suffragan or assistant bishop for the see of Armagh, Mael-Colm (servant of Columba) O'Brolchan, who died in reputation of sanctity after having spent some time in pilgrimage at or near Derry. (107) It is probable, that he was the immediate successor, in that capacity, of Coencomrach O'Boigill, who died in 1106. (108)

(103) The Annals of Innisfallen have at A. 1118. “ Turlogh O'Conor became king of the Danes of Dublin, having banished thence Donall Gearr-lamhach (short-handed) O'Brian, son of Murtoigh the son of Turlogh O'Brian.”

(104) The original of this message is at No. 41 in the Sylloge.

(105) Continuator of Florence of Worcester at A. 1121. and Harris, Bishops of Dublin at Gregory. According to Usher (see above Not. 35.) Gregory's consecration should be assigned to A. 1122. This is contrary not only to the positive statement of the Continuator, who has it at A. 1121, but, what is of more weight, likewise to his marking, that the 24th of September fell on a Saturday and the 2d of October on a Sunday. Now these coincidences do not answer for 1122, but they do for 1121, the Dominical letter of which was B. Add that Ralph of Canterbury died on the 19th of October in 1122. Supposing him to have been sick for some time before his death, it is hard to think that he was able to consecrate a bishop in that same month.

(106) Usher's Sylloge towards the end.

(107) 4 Masters ap Tr. Th. p. 300. They say, that he obtained the palm of martyrdom, but do not tell us how, or on what occasion. Their calling him bishop of Armagh must be understood, as with regard to some others to whom they give that title, relatively to his having assisted as suffragan in the government of the see.

(108) Above §. 12. Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 300.) would wish to explain O'Brolchan's having been suffragan to Celsus by observing, that Celsus then, i. e. in 1122, held two sees, Armagh and Dublin. But we may be sure, that he did not hold Dublin in that year; for Gregory was in quiet possession of it. The suffraganship of Armagh was a circumstance of long standing, and Celsus thought it adviseable to continue it, were it merely that the diocese should not be neglected during the periods of his absence.

CHAP. XXVI.

Great contentions among the Irish princes—Deaths of several Irish Bishops in the early part of the 12th century.—Learned men that flourished in Ireland in the same period—Gormfhlaith Abbess of Kildare—Several churches plundered and devastated.—Pious men and ecclesiastics still continue to pass from Ireland into the continent—Monastery of St. James at Ratisbon erected by Irish Monks by the aid of Conor O'Brian, king of Munster—St. Malachy, or Maolmaadhog O'Morgair, his birth, education, &c.—Two churches erected at Lismore and one at Cashel by Cormac Mac-Carthy, king of Desmond—Church of St. Peter and Paul at Armagh consecrated by Celsus—Monastery of Bangor re-established by St. Malachy—St. Malachy consecrated bishop of Connor—Death of Celsus Archbishop of Armagh—succeeded by Murchertach or Maurice, who holds the see for five years—On the death of Murchertach Nigellus attempts to take possession of the see of Armagh, but is prevented, and St. Malachy is declared Primate—Death of Imar O'Haedhagan, who had been St. Malachy's preceptor—Synod of Cashel under Donnald O'Conaing and the bishops of Munster—Several churches pillaged and destroyed—Deaths of several bishops.

SECTION I.

MURTOGH O'Brian was, as we have seen, (1) dethroned in 1116, and died in 1119. The substitution, in his stead, of his brother Dermod gave rise to great wars and desolation throughout all Leth-mogha. Turlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught, availing himself of this opportunity, laid waste Thomond in 1116, and obtained very considerable booty, which he afterwards presented to God and St. Flannan, that is, to the church of Killaloe. Dermod advanced in said year with an army into Connaught, but after great slaughter and loss of military stores, &c. was forced to retreat. (2) These contests continued with various success, chiefly in favour of Turlogh, who in 1118 destroyed the royal palace of the O'Brians at Ceanchorra near Killaloe, until the death of Dermod, which occurred in 1120, when he was succeeded by his eldest son Conor O'Brian as king of Munster, the principality of Thomond, which Conor had held hitherto, being given to his brother Turlogh O'Brian (2) In the following year died Donnald Mac-Lochlin sovereign of the Northern parts, who had been styled king of Ireland. (4) Turlogh O'Conor was now become the most powerful prince in Ireland, and having burned Cashel and Lismore in 1121, (5) continued for several years to ravage and harrass Munster, Leinster, and Meath, until, having humbled also the princes of Ulster, he obtained hostages from them, as he had already from those of other parts, and rose to such pre-eminence that he has been called king of Ireland. (6) Yet we find, that during part of his reign Conor O'Brian possessed great power, and that, besides being sovereign of Leth-mogha, he claimed hostages and obedience from all the other princes of Ireland. (7) Conor lived until 1142, as did Turlogh O'Conor until 1156. (8)

(1) Chap. xxiv. §. 14.

(2) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1116.

(3) Ib. from A. 1116 to 1120. (4) See Chap. xxiv. §. 14.

(5) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1121.

(6) Colgan observes, (Tr. Th. p. 449.) that Turlogh, or, as in his affected nomenclature he calls him, Theodoric O'Conor was one of those Irish kings, who, like Domnald Mac-Lochlin and others, were styled refragable, inasmuch as their title and claims to the sovereignty of all Ireland were disputed and opposed by other kings and princes. See also O'Flaherty, Ogyg. Part III. cap. 94.

(7) See Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1138 and 1142.

(8) Said Annals at those years. Ware assigns (Antiq. cap. 4.) Turlogh's death to 1157 by adding a year without necessity Colgan, following the 4 Masters (Tr. Th. p. 449.) has it at 1156.

§. II. Of Irish bishops, who died in the early part of this the 12th century, I find besides some already mentioned, the names of the following. Rigan, of Dromore, and Cormac O'Mail of Glendaloch died in 1101, (9) Christian O'Hectigern of Clonmacnois in 1103; Maclothod O'Hailgenan of Cork in 1107, and his successor Patrick O'Senbac in 1111; Mac-Dongail of Kildare in 1108; Condla O'Flain of Leighlin and Mac-mic-Aeduan of Lismore in 1113; Catasach O'Conail or O'Conuil of Tuam, and Kellach O'Colman of Ferns in 1117. (10) In the same year died Anmchad O'Hannmchadha, bishop of Clonfert, who was celebrated for his piety and learning. (11) O'Ligbai of Emly died in 1122, and was succeeded by Maelmorda Mac-Inclodnai, during whose incumbency the see was plundered in 1123, and the mitre of St. Ailbe, which had been preserved there for many ages, was burned by the robbers. (12) Murges O'Nioc, bishop of Tuam, died in 1128. (13) To these times must be assigned Eugene bishop of Ardmore, and author of a Life of St. Cuthbert, if it be true that he wrote it about A. D. 1100; but no account remains of the time of his death. (14)

Among the distinguished ecclesiastics and learned men of those days we meet with Gilla-na-Naomh O'Dunabhradh, who is called chief professor of Ireland, and died in 1101. (15) Mugron O'Morgair, chief scholastic or principal professor of Armagh, died in the monastery of Mungret (county of Limerick) on the 5th of October in 1102. (16) I find nothing to prove, that he was an ecclesiastic; (17) and he is stated to have been the father of the great St. Malachy, and of Christian, who became bishop of Clogher. (18) In 1103 Murchad O'Flaitheain, archdeacon of Ardboe and renowned for his wisdom and erudition, died at Armagh. (19) Cosgrach O'Cruadin died in 1104; Ferdornach Dall (blind) in 1110; and Conor O'Cleri in 1112; they were, all three, scholastics of Kildare. (20) Gilla-Patrick O'Dubratha, scholastic of Killaloe, who is called the wisest of the Momonians, died in 1110. (21) Moelsuthun, scholastic of Tallagh died in 1125, (22) and in 1127 Gilla-criost O'Maoillean (Malone) abbot of Clonmacnois, a man greatly distinguished for his wisdom, charity, and sanctity. (23) He had assisted at the synod of Usneach held in 1111. (24) Moelpatrick O'Drughan was appointed professor at Armagh in 1107, (25) and became very eminent, as will be seen hereafter. This list will, omitting other learned men of these times, be sufficient to show, that learning was still cultivated as usual.

(9) Ware, Bishops at Dromore, and Harris at Glendaloch.

10) See Ware (Latin text) and Harris at the respective sees. They have (at Meath) among the bishops of Clonard the death also of Concovar, in 1117, who is called comorban of Finnian; but that title is not sufficient to show, that he was a bishop.

(11) Colgan, AA. SS. p. 206. Neither Ware nor Harris makes mention of this prelate.

(12) Ware and Harris at Emly.

(13) Tr. Th. p. 308. Ware has not this bishop, but Harris has, at Tuam.

(14) That Eugene was bishop of Ardmore is clear from a MS. collection on the Acts of St. Cuthbert in the Cottonian library taken out of Irish histories Ware (Writers, 12th century) states, that the author calls Eugene bishop of Hardimore, but that, as he added that it was the see of St. Declan, it is plain that he meant Ardmore. Ware says, that Eugene lived in 1174. If he meant to insinuate that Eugene wrote about this year, it cannot be reconciled with what Usher says, (Pr. p. 945.) viz. that said collection appeared about 1160. Colgan supposed, (AA. SS. p. 674.) that the author was Laurence of Durham, who died in said year 1160. Eugene must have written his work before this time, and Colgan (ib.) assigns the composition of it to about 1100. It might have been some years later; but it was, in all appearance, prior to the council of Kells in 1152, after which there is no mention of the see of Ardmore in the lists of the Irish bishoprics.

(15) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1101.

(16) Ib. at A. 1102, Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 299) from the 4 Masters, and Usher (p. 861) from the Annals of Ulster, which have at A. 1102; Mugronus O'Mungair, Armachiae et totius Occidentalis Europae lector primarius, multis testibus praesentibus, III nonas Octobris vitam feliciter finivit. Instead of O'Morgair, as in the 4 Masters, they have O'Mungair, which I find also in the Annals of Innisfallen. His being styled chief lecturer both of Armagh and of all Western Europe occurs likewise in the 4 Masters, a denomination, which is often found in the Irish annals, and under which not only Ireland was comprized but likewise, at least some times, the whole of the British islands and perhaps some parts of the Continent. It does not mean in this case, that Mugron gave lectures throughout what was called Western Europe, but that he was the most distinguished of its lecturers.

(17) Colgan makes him a professor of theology, as if there were no other professors than theological ones; but the Annals of Innisfallen call him professor of literature, while those of Ulster do not mark over what department he presided.

(18) In the Annals of Innisfallen (ib.) we read that Mugron was the father of Maelmaodhog and of Giolla-Criost. The former name, which signifies servant of Maodog (St. Moedoc of Ferns) was the real one of St. Malachy, but was latinized, like some other Irish names beginning with Maol into Malachias. Giolla or Giolla-Criost (servant of Christ) has been frequently changed into Christianus, as has happened with regard to St. Malachy's brother, the bishop of Clogher, who is usually called Christian O'Morgair. O'Flaherty in a MS. note to Tr. Th. p. 299. refers to Tigernach and the Chronicon Scotorum (ad A. 1102.) as stating, that Mugron was the father of St. Malachy. Colgan observes (Tr. Th. ib.) that Mugron was a relative of St. Malachy, who is usually said to have been of the very ancient noble family of the O'Morgairs, now called O'Dogherty. But from what we have seen it will follow, that Mugron was more than a mere relative of his.

(19) Tr. Th. ib. Ardboe is in the county of Tyrone, barony of Dungannon. A monastery was founded there by a St. Colman, but at what period I cannot tell. It was burned in 1166. See AA. SS. p. 28 and 222.

(20) Tr. Th. p. 630.

(21) AA. SS. p. 200.

(22) Tr. Th. p. 632.

(23) AA. SS. p. 200.

(24) See Not. 82. to Chap. xxv.

(25) Usher, p. 861. and Tr. Th. p. 299.

§. III. Among the holy females of these times the most celebrated seems to have been Gormlat or Gormfhlaith, daughter of Morogh Mac-Maol-nambo a Leinster prince, and abbess of Kildare, celebrated for her austerities, who died in 1112. (26) Two pious princes died during this period; Roderic (Rughraidhe) O'Conor in 1118, at Clonmacnois, where, from having been king of Connaught, he entered into holy orders; and Teige Mac-Carthy, king of Desmond, at Cashel in 1124 after an exemplary course of penitential conduct. (27) Some other princes also exhibited great proofs of religious feelings and repentance, especially Murtoth O'Brian; (28) but we find terrible oppressions and cruelties perpetrated in said times by Irish kings or dynasts, who did not scruple to plunder, devastate, and burn churches and religious places. For instance, the church of Ardbraccan was, together with a number of people therein, burned and pillaged in 1109 by the Hy-Briuns, who destroyed also the adjacent village. (29) The Dalcassians of Thomond plundered and laid waste the monastery of Clonmacnois in 1111, at, it is said, the instigation of Murtoth O'Brian; and they, or some other party of Momomians, pillaged it again in 1115. (30) Aedh O'Rourke and the Hy-Briuns killed Maelbrigid, abbot of Kells, and many others on the last Sunday of summer in 1117. (31) We have seen above that Turloagh O'Conor burned Cashel and Lismore in 1121, and that Emly was plundered in 1123. Conor O'Lochlin, an Ulster prince, having marched with a great army into Meath, amidst other depredations burned in 1127 the steeple of the church of Trim, in which a very considerable number of people was shut up at the time. (32) Thus it appears, that several of the Irish princes and chieftains had imbibed the spirit of the Danes, sparing neither churches, nor monasteries, nor ecclesiastics, according as suited their views; a system, which was held in abhorrence by their ancestors, and which often excited them to unite in defence of their altars against the Scandinavian robbers. This was one of the sad effects of the contests between various powerful families aspiring to the sovereignty of all Ireland, and again between divers members of said families quarrelling among themselves for precedency. In these contests the respective parties and their adherents stopped at nothing, while endeavouring to establish their claims, and harassed and persecuted without distinction all those, whom they looked upon as their opponents.

(26) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1112. and Tr. Th. p. 630. Morogh, her father was son of Dermod Mac-Maol-na-mbo, the powerful king of Leinster, who was killed in the battle of Odhba, A. D. 1072. Morogh died, according to the Annals of Innisfallen, in Dublin in the year 1070.

(27) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1118 and 1124.

(28) See Chap. xxiv. §. 14.

(29) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1109. These Hy-Briuns were probably those of Leitrim or of Roscommon.

(30) Ib. at A. 1111. and 1115.

(31) Tr. Th. p. 508. Colgan, in translating the text of the 4 Masters, fell into a ludicrous error by making that day the festival of St. Cromdubh. But there was no such saint. Cromdubh was, in all appearance, the same idol as Cromcruach, of which we have seen, (Not. 45 to Chap. v.) and which was destroyed by St. Patrick (§. 8. ib.) O'Flaherty observes (MS. note at Tr. Th. ib.) that the words used by the 4 Masters, among which is Cromdubh, mean the last Sunday of summer, which was sacred to St. Patrick as an anniversary commemorating the destruction of the idol.

(32) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1127.

§. iv. Pious men and ecclesiastics still continued to repair from Ireland to the continent. There is extant a discourse, entitled Itineraria or Exhortatoria, by one Dermat, or, I dare say, rather Dermot or Dermot, who calls himself an Irishman. (33) Whether he were a clergyman or not, he does not inform us. He composed it probably somewhere in Germany; for he says that in the year of his delivering it, viz. A. D. 1117, he had been at Liege. He addresses his auditors as foreigners to him, and tells them that, although an Irishman, and a Scot, he was of the same religion with themselves and a co-partner in the sacraments of their church and in their faith. Dermot was then on his way to Jerusalem, and from this circumstance took an opportunity of exhorting all those, who looked to the salvation of their souls, to quit the mystical Babylon and proceed towards the mystical Jerusalem. He observes, that in said year there appeared strong signs of the divine wrath, dreadful rains, thunder storms, and earthquakes; and that he himself had seen some persons killed by lightning even in churches at Liege. He requests the prayers of the people for himself and Raimbald, an abbot of Liege, who had treated him kindly and provided him with a letter of recommendation. This discourse is written in rather good Latin, and shows that Dermot had studied the Scriptures, and that, among the Fathers, he had read, at least, some of St. Augustin's works.

The Irish monks of Ratisbon, after having occupied for many years the monastery of St. Peter, (34) erected a new one within the city, which was called that of St. James. This was during the pontificate of Calixtus II. (35) and accordingly some time between the early part of 1119 and the late one of 1124. Yet it must have been after 1120, whereas the person, who enabled them to build the monastery of St. James, was Conor O'Brian, king of Munster, who was exceedingly kind to Isaac, (who had been under Marianus the founder of St. Peter's) Gervase, and other monks, whom the abbot Dionysius sent over to Ireland for the purpose of collecting means towards the forming and establishing of the new monastery. Conor O'Brian gave them plenty of money, which, on their return, was laid out in erecting the noble monastery of St. James. (36) Yet the house of St. Peter's still continued to exist, but dependent on the abbot of St. James, who elected its prior. Dionysius (Donogh) was undoubtedly the same as Domnus, who is mentioned as the first abbot of St. James', and as a native of the South of Ireland. How long he governed that establishment, or at what time he died, I do not find recorded. His immediate successor was Christianus, (Gilla-criost) likewise an Irishman from the South, and of the illustrious house of Mac-Carthy. (37) Christianus placed Macarius over a monastery founded, or perhaps only enlarged and endowed, at Wurtzburg on a site granted by the bishop Henry, for Irish monks, as a branch of the house of Ratisbon, and to which the bishop annexed lands, all under the name of God and St. Kilian. (38)

(33) It has been published by Martene and Durand, Thesaur, Nov. Anecd. Tom. 1. col. 340. seqq. and begins with these words, Dermatius natione Hyberniensis. In the body of it he says; "Etsi sum Hyberniensis, etsi sum Scoticus," &c.

(34) See Chap. xxv. §. 2.

(35) Life of Marianus, &c. cap. 4. ap. Bolland. 9 Febr.

(36) See Gratianus Lucius (Lynch) Camb. Evers. cap. 21. where he quotes from Extracts made by Stephen White from a chronicle of the Irish monks of Ratisbon. The abbot Dionysius is called Domnus in the Life of Marianus, both names latinized from Donogh. Conor O'Brian is there stated to have sent Counts of great nobility and power, cruce signatos i. e. going on the crusade to Palestine, with large presents to Lotharius, that is, Lotharius II. king of Germany and afterwards emperor. It is probable, that his object in doing so, was to induce Lotharius to be friendly to his Irish countrymen then in Ratisbon. This correspondence with Lotharius must have been after the erection of the monastery of St. James, whereas Lotharius did not become king of Germany until 1125, and also prior to the latter end of 1137, the time of Lotharius' death.

(37) The Chronicle of the Irish monastery &c. ap. Lynch, ib.

(38) Life of Marianus, cap. 5. The Bollandists observe; that this monastery was established perhaps about 1130, as must have been the case, if Henry was the same as the bishop Hezelin. But, if he was the same as the bishop Embricho, it would have been later; for Embricho held the see of Wurtzburg from 1131 until 1147. I have already observed (Chap. xxv. §. 2.) that there was probably an Irish monastery, at least a small one, before these times at Wurtzburg.

§. v. This was the period, in which that great ornament not only of the Irish but likewise of the whole Catholic church, St. Malachy, began to be distinguished. He was of the ancient and noble family of the O'Morgairs, supposed to be the same as the O'Doghertys, and his original name was Maolmaodhog. (39) It is highly probable, that he was born at Armagh, and particularly so, if it be true, as stated in various Irish annals, that his father was Mugron O'Morgair the celebrated professor of that city. (40) This much is certain, that it was there he was reared from his earliest age. (41) His birth must, in all probability, be assigned to the year 1095. (42) The mother of St. Malachy was a pious and sensible woman, and instilled into his mind from his first years the principles of morality and good conduct. (43) He was of a sedate quiet disposition, and of a very pious turn of mind, fond of prayer and retirement, and exceedingly attentive in learning such rudiments as boys are taught in schools, so as, being endowed with very good abilities, to surpass all his class-fellows. He would have wished to frequent churches, but was prevented partly by his attendance at school, and partly by his not wishing to appear singular while so very young. Yet he used to pray as often as he could. His master was in the habit of taking a walk to a village near Armagh, and was wont to take him as a companion. Malachy used to seize opportunities of remaining for a while a little behind him, and, spreading out his hands towards heaven, throw out some ejaculatory prayers. Having passed the time of boyhood, and being arrived at the age of adolescence, his piety still increasing, he began to consider of a state of life, and how he should serve God and guard against the blandishments of this world, There was a holy man at Armagh, who led a very austere life and was inexorable in chastising his body. His name was Imar, and he lived in a cell near a church, where he continued to serve God day and night in fasting and prayer. To him Malachy repaired and became a disciple of his, (44) sitting with him, listening in silence to his instructions, and exerting himself to imitate his conduct. As soon as it was known that he became a companion of Imar, various remarks were made by the inhabitants of Armagh. Some were sorry, that so delicate a youth, and who was loved by every one, had given himself up to so severe a life. Others said that being so young he would not persevere. Yet he did, and within a few days time was followed by several other persons, who also placed themselves under the direction of Imar. Among them Malachy was pre-eminent by his progress in piety and virtue.

(39) See above Not. 18.

(40) Ib. To this may be objected what St. Bernard says (Vit. S. Malach. cap. 1.) that his parents were great as to family and power, whence it would follow that his father was rather a chieftain than a professor. St. Bernard's words are; "Parentes illi fuere genere et potentia magni juxta nomen magnorum, qui sunt in terra." This can be easily reconciled with the statement of the Irish annalists, if we suppose, as I think we ought to do, that the parentes of St. Bernard does not mean father and mother, but, according to the acceptation quite usual in the middle ages, relatives or kinsfolk, such as parens in French and parenti in Italian. If St. Malachy's father was a chieftain or dynast, how has it come to pass, that he passed his childhood in Armagh under the care of his mother? A chieftain or a chieftain's family would have resided in their district amidst their vassals. Some one may say; Is it to be admitted, that St. Malachy, who belonged to so illustrious a family, could have been son of only a professor, or that professors were to be found among the members of such families? I answer; Why not? Many a professor I have known, that belonged to highly noble families, and some of them even heads of such families. This would indeed have been a very rare case in most parts of Europe during the times we are now treating of, and when kings, princes and nobles could neither read nor write. But the Irish princes and nobles did not sink into this neglect of learning, and some of their most learned men were persons of illustrious birth, such as ex. c. Fedlemidh Mac-Crimthan, king of Munster, in the 9th century, Cormac Mac-Culinan of the same royal blood in the beginning of the 10th, Dubdalethe, of the powerful house, that kept possession of the see of Armagh, in the 11th, and who was professor at Armagh before he was appointed its archbishop under the name of Dubdalethe III. It is therefore not singular, that Mugron O'Morgair, although of high and powerful connections, was a professor. For, as the Irish nobility respected and cultivated literature, more or less, so such of them as were duly qualified were not ashamed to teach it.

(41) St. Bernard, speaking of Armagh, says (ib. cap. 2.); “Ipsa est, in qua alitus est Malachias.” The term, alitus, indicates his having lived there when even a small child.

(42) This is easily deducible from the testimony of St. Bernard, who states that he died in the 54th year of his age, A. D. 1148. Now, as the day of his death was the 2d of November, it follows that, unless we are to suppose that he was born at a time of year later than this, his birth must have occurred in 1095.

(43) St Bernard makes no mention of his father, whence it may be justly inferred that he died when Malachy was very young. This helps to corroborate what we have seen concerning his having been the son of Mugron, whereas Mugron died in 1102, (above, §. 2.) at which time St. Malachy was only about seven years old.

(44) It is strange, that Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 299.) confounds Imar with the master, under whom St. Malachy was placed when a small boy, and marks the beginning of his tuition by Imar at A. 1100. He says that this appears from the Life by St. Bernard. Now it is evident from said Life, that Colgan was highly mistaken. As to St. Malachy's having been under any master in 1100, when he was only about five years old, St. Bernard has not a word; and, instead of assigning to him, while a boy, Imar as master, he expressly tells us, (cap. 1. and 2.) that he did not apply to Imar until he was a grown up lad, and after he had spent his boyhood under his first master. Besides, Imar did not keep a school for teaching boys. Ware (Bishops at St. Malachy) has followed in some measure Colgan's mistake by saying, that the saint was educated first under Imar, and has added another of his own in calling Imar an abbot, instead of which title he should rather have given him that of hermit or recluse. Harris, in his additions to Ware has copied these mistakes, and adds that he spent seven years with Imar. This is an idle and unfounded conjecture. According to it St. Malachy would have left Imar, when he was no more than twelve years old. But the fact is that he had passed that age, before he placed himself under the direction of Imar. Nor is there any account of the number of years, which St. Malachy spent with him. This much is known, that he continued to be, more or less a disciple of his, although it seems not living with him, until he was ordained priest and about 25 years of age. And here comes a monstrous blunder of Harris, who sends him from Imar, that is, when, in his system, only 12 years old, to Lismore; whereas on the contrary, as will be seen, St. Malachy did not go thither nor leave Armagh until after he was a priest. Imar's surname was, according to the 4 Masters, (ap. Tr. Th. p. 300.) O'Hoedhagain.

§. VI. After some time Celsus and Imar considered him worthy of the order of deaconship, and forced him to accept of it. Accordingly, although he had not as yet reached the canonical age of twenty-five years, he was ordained deacon by Celsus, and immediately set about fulfilling the duties of his office. He was particularly assiduous in burying the deceased poor, insomuch that his sister used to reproach him continually, as if he were insane, for applying to what she thought so mean an occupation. He slighted her rebukes, and continued to act as usual. When he was about twenty-five years of age, Celsus, with whom Imar agreed in opinion, thought right to ordain him priest without waiting for the age of thirty usually required by the canons. (45) He then appointed him his vicar, and gave him full powers for the purpose of establishing necessary reforms. St. Malachy exerted himself greatly in this respect, and established the customs of the Roman church in all the churches of the diocese, and particularly the singing of the canonical Hours, according to the general system of the Christian world, being well skilled in Church music, which he had learned in his younger days. This practice of singing the Hours in the churches had not been observed, or rather had ceased to be observed, in the diocese, and even at Armagh. (46) Thus St. Malachy realized, as far as concerned that diocese, the plan of Gillebert of Limerick relative to the substitution of the Roman office for the Irish ones. He abolished superstitious practices, and strove to root out every abuse, that fell in his way. The practice of confession had been much neglected, there not being as yet any general law of the Church prescribing the use of it at certain times. Yet it was observed in Ireland as well as in every Catholic country by persons, who wished to be delivered from their sins, and was much attended to by those, who had addicted themselves to a life of peculiar strictness and sanctity. (47) The more frequent use of it was revived by St. Malachy, who also took care that the sacrament of confirmation should be administered oftener than it used to be. It is not surprising that this sacrament had been neglected in a diocese, which had been governed by laymen calling themselves archbishops, if we consider that real bishops have been found in every part of Europe so slothful and remiss as to omit for many years the administration of it. Next it is stated, that St. Malachy re-established, or rather new-modelled the contract of matrimony. (48) This cannot mean, that lawful marriages were not observed in the diocese of Armagh, whereas it is certain that they were, (49) but is to be understood of some regulations introduced by St. Malachy relative to said contract. (50) It is probable that, while labouring to establish the Roman customs, he endeavoured to introduce certain matrimonial impediments, hitherto not generally observed in Ireland, particularly that, by which, according to the more general rule of those times, marriage was prohibited within the seventh degree of relationship. (51) Or, what is equally probable, and I think more so, St. Malachy undertook to substitute the system of Sponsalia de praesenti, the same as the marriage contract now practised, for the Sponsalia de futuro, which was the more usual mode of contracting marriages in Ireland, and which, accompanied with certain conditions, rendered in those days, marriage as valid and binding as the other form did.

(45) St. Bernard remarks, (cap. 2.) that the circumstance of the canonical rules not being strictly observed in either of St. Malachy's ordinations, whereas he became a deacon before he was 25 and a priest before he was 30 years of age, is to be excused on the plea of the zeal of the ordainer and the worth of the ordained. Concerning the age required for priests and deacons see Not. 74 to Chap. iv. and Not. 87 to Chap. xi.

(46) In Butler's Lives of Saints (at St. Malachy, Nov. 3.) it is said, that the rehearsal of the canonical hours in all the churches of the diocese had been, since the Danish invasions, omitted in the cities. This is a mistake. St. Bernard speaks of only one city. that is, Armagh. Elsewhere indeed he says, that a similar neglect of repeating the ecclesiastical offices in the churches prevailed in the diocese of Connor. But in the far greatest part of Ireland these offices and hours were observed and celebrated, as is evident from Gillebert's treatise, De usu Ecclesiastico, (See Chap. xxv. §. 10.) although they were in general different from the particular ones recited at Rome. How could Gillebert have said, that almost all Ireland was bewildered by the variety of offices, and that a learned man accustomed to one set of offices used to appear like an idiot in a church, where a different one was followed, unless the offices and canonical hours were regularly observed? Nor is it correct to state, that the rehearsal of the offices was omitted since the Danish invasions; for, besides it not having been omitted at all in the greatest part of Ireland, it continued at Armagh for a long period after those invasions had begun. The reading of Psalms and singing of hymns lasted for twelve days and nights over the body of Brian Boromhe, in the cathedral of Armagh, A. D. 1014; (Annals of Innisfallen ad an.) and in 1022 we find Amalgaid, archbishop of Armagh, attending at the obsequies of Maelseachlin, king of Ireland, which were celebrated in the monastery of Inisaingin not only with masses, but likewise with hymns, canticles, and psalmody. (See Tr. Th. p. 298. and compare with Chap. XXIII. §. 12.) It is probable that psalmody was still practised at that time in the churches of Armagh. What put a stop to it must have been the abuses caused by the lay so called archbishops, which went on increasing until the early part of the 12th century. It does not, however, follow that the canonical hours or offices were entirely neglected; for although they were not celebrated solemnly in the churches, they were read in private. All that St. Bernard complains of is, that they were not observed nor sung in the churches; had they been quite omitted, even in private, he would have spoken in a style not of complaint but of invective. And they certainly must have been repeated, nay sung, before St. Malachy undertook to have them celebrated again in the churches; for otherwise, how could he have learned Church music even before he was in holy orders? Surely, to enable him to learn it, there must have been clergymen, who were in the habit of singing their offices at least in private. Beauford in a dissertation inserted by Ledwich says, (Antiq. &c. p. 235.) that the Latin church music was introduced by Malachy; and elsewhere (p. 240. 2d ed.) the Doctor himself, talking of Gregorian and Ambrosian chant, tells us, that ours must have been on a Greek model. That the Church music practised by St. Malachy was the improved Latin one, commonly called Gregorian, is plain from St. Bernard, who makes mention of it as conformable to the Roman custom, and according to the mode then generally followed. But St. Malachy was not the first to introduce it into Ireland, whereas he had learned it himself before he had the power of doing so. It had been long before introduced into France. King Pepin had exerted himself to substitute it for the old Gallican chant, and Pope Stephen II. when on a visit with him in France, gave instructions on it. Charlemagne sent persons to Rome to learn it, and Pope Adrian sent him two Roman singers, and thence it came gradually to be adopted in that country; (see Ducange, Glossar. &c. at Cantus Romanus and Cardinal Bona, De Divinia psalmodia, cap. 17. §. 4.) whence, owing to the great intercourse between France and Ireland, it might have been brought over to us, or perhaps from England, or straight from Rome by some of those many Irishmen, who resorted thither down from the seventh century. Whether it were generally received in Ireland, I am not able to state, although it is probable that it was not, considering how much a very great portion of the Irish clergy was attached to every practice followed by St. Patrick, Columbkil, and the old doctors of their church, who in all probability used the ancient Gallican chant; for, as to the Gregorian one, they could not have adopted it, as it was either not practised in their time, or not known to them. Even in England, notwithstanding its being used by the Roman missionaries, it was confined to a small part of that country until a late part of the seventh century, (see Bede, L. 4. c. 2.) although James the deacon about the middle of said century had taught it at York. (Idem L. 2. c. 20.) Ledwich's saying that the old Irish chant was neither Gregorian nor Ambrosian is correct as to the Gregorian; but how did he know that it was different from the Ambrosian? This chant, which is still kept up, was in use before the times of St. Ambrose, (Bona, ib. cap. 18. §. 10.) and consequently of St. Patrick. It was probably much the same as the Gallican. His adding that ours was on a Greek model may in one sense be admitted as true; and he might have said the same of the Ambrosian and Gallican, the former of which is attributed to an archbishop Mirocletes and the latter may justly be ascribed to the Greek missionaries, Pothinus, &c. who preached in Gaul. But there is no reason to think, that the Irish received their Church music directly from Greeks, conformably to Ledwich's favourite hypothesis of Greek and Asiatic missionaries in Ireland. The style of music, which they followed in singing the Church service, could not have been any other in ancient times than what had been brought to them, apparently from Gaul, by St. Patrick and his followers, who were not Greeks.

(47) Toland, who has been followed by some others more ignorant than himself, had the impudence (Nazarenus, Letter II. Sect. 2. §. 6.) to assert, without alleging a single proof, that the Irish rejected auricular or particular, that is, private confession and sacerdotal absolution. Now he knew that Usher has shown, that “they did (no doubt) both publicly and privately make confession of their faults” and that they submitted to absolution by the bishop or priest in consequence of the power of the keys enjoyed by the sacerdotal order, and which Usher admits it does possess. (Discourse of the Religion, &c. chap. 5.) It is true, that he misrepresents some Catholic tenets relative to absolution, ex. c. his insinuating that, according to the Catholics, the enjoined penances have no “reference to the taking away of the guilt,” and that the bishops and priests attribute to themselves more than a ministerial power in the remission of sins. But this is not the place to discuss such questions, and it is sufficient to observe, that he not only admits, but proves the very reverse of Toland’s lying position. He remarks that, whatever may be said of certain Goths of Languedoc, of whom Alcuin says, or is supposed to have said, that it was reported they used not to confess to the priests, this has nothing to do with the ancient Scottish and Irish, whose practice was quite different. Usher’s reason for touching on this point was that Alcuin’s letter to the Gothish (71st in Duchesne’s edition) was in some MSS. marked as written to the Scottish. The passage runs thus; “Dicitur vero neminem ex laicis suam velle confessionem sacerdotibus dare, quos a Deo Christo cum sanctis Apostolis ligandi solvendique potestatem accepisse credimus.” But, however this is to be understood, (for perhaps it is relative not to sacramental confession but to certain dues called Confessio; (see Ducange at Confessio, No. 4.) it is well known, that said letter was directed not to Irishmen but to Goths. (See Fleury, L. 45. §. 20.) Usher quotes an Irish canon, to which several others might be added if necessary, whence it is evident that confession, penances, and sacerdotal absolution were observed in Ireland. He mentions the practice of St. Cuthbert, and the case of Adamnan of Coldingham, who confessed his sins to an Irish priest, as related by Bede, L. 4. c. 25. Besides what Usher had collected, there are innumerable proofs of the Irish system on these points. Several clergymen are noticed in our annals as distinguished penitentiaries, and who were resorted to from various parts on account of their merit and ability in this particular. Thus St. Gormal, abbot of Ardoilean, is praised on this account; (see Chap. xxiii. §. 16) the blessed Dubtach of Albany, who died in 1064, is styled the chief Confessarius or spiritual director both of Ireland and Albany, (Tr. Th. p. 298.) &c. &c. We find the same practice in much more ancient times, ex. c. in the case of a chieftain Suibhne, who, although truly penitent, was ordered by St. Pulcherius, who lived in the seventh century, to confess his sins. (Life of St. Pulcherius, cap. 19.) Confession to the priest is ordered on certain occasions by St. Columbanus in his Penitential. In that of Cumian the confession of secret sins and even of bad thoughts is much insisted upon. (See Not. 55. to Chap. xv.) It was usual with religious persons to place themselves under the particular direction of some holy man, as, for instance, St. Maidoc of Ferns did under St. Molua of Clonfert-molua, (Chap. xiv. §. 10.) who was called his father confessarius, or father of his confession. (See Life of St. Maidoc, cap. 20 and 54.) It would be superfluous to add more on a subject, which is so clear from the whole of the Irish ecclesiastical history. Toland himself quotes (ib. Sect. 1.) a passage from an Irish writer, in which the practice of confession and absolution is spoken of as quite usual, although the author seems to have had a particular opinion of his own concerning the nature of the absolving power.

(48) St. Bernard's words are; (cap. 2.) "Contractum conjugiorum—Malachias de novo instituit."

(49) Lanfranc, concerning whose letters to king Turlogh and Gothric of Dublin we have seen above, (Chap. xxiv. §. 12.) makes mention, in both of them, of the lawfully wedded wives of the Irish, legitime sibi copulatam uxorem, legitime sibi copulatas. In like manner Anselm in his letters to king Murtoth (see Chap. xxv. §. 8.) speaks of Irish wives and marriages just as he would of those of any other country; and his or Lanfranc's complaint, that some men used to quit their wives and take others, so far from showing that lawful marriages were omitted in any part of Ireland, proves quite the contrary. How could St. Bernard have supposed, that they were unknown at Armagh, while he speaks so highly of St. Malachy's mother? Making mention of the eight laymen, who held the see of Armagh, he says that they were married men, virī uxorati. How could that have been, if marriages were not observed at Armagh?

(50) Fleury (L. 68. §. 58.) has very prettily expressed St. Bernard's meaning by the words, regularity in marriages, la règle dans les mariages.

(51) It has been already remarked, (Chap xxiv. §. 12.) that some of the Irish clergy seem not to have extended the impediments relative to consanguinity or affinity beyond those marked in Leviticus. Gillebert of Limerick, the contemporary of St. Malachy, makes mention of the seventh degree, as that within which marriage was not allowed. In his tract, De Statu Ecclesiae, he writes; “Conjugatorum est nullam usque in sextam vel etiam septimam progeniem sanguine sibi conjunctam, aut illi quam habuerit aut quam habuit sibi proximus, vel commatrem ducere uxorem.” Yet it appears, that, however St. Malachy may have succeeded in the diocese of Armagh, Gillebert's exertions were not sufficient to establish that rule all over Ireland. Indeed it was afterwards found necessary to restrain it, and to limit the prohibition to within the fourth degree of consanguinity as well as of affinity. There was a particular abuse, which some persons in Ireland seem to have favoured, relative to allowing a man to marry the widow of his deceased brother. It is condemned in the 25th canon of the synod, called Synodus S. Patricii, in these words; “Audi decreta synodi super istis. Frater thorum defuncti fratris non ascendat, Domino dicente: Erunt duo in carne una. Ergo uxor fratris soror tua est.” The enacting of this canon indicates, that there was some question on that subject in Ireland; and one Clemens, a Scotus and apparently an Irishman, held that doctrine in Germany about the middle of the 8th century, (see the Letter of St. Boniface of Mentz No. 15 in Usher's Sylloge) and was on that account condemned, as an introducer of Judaism, in a synod of Rome under Pope Zachary. But, prior to that time, this opinion was reprobated by the Irish, and we have seen, (Chap. xviii. §. 10.) that St. Kilian, the apostle of Franconia, considered such a marriage as unlawful, and consequently lost his life. Yet in later times, and even after St. Malachy's death, an abuse of that kind seems to have existed in some parts of Ireland, as will be seen elsewhere.

(52) This is a point, which, as far as I know, has been quite overlooked by such of our writers as have endeavoured to explain the words of St. Bernard, or to answer the calumnies of Giraldus Cambrensis and others, relative to Irish marriages. To understand this subject, it is to be observed that in the old canon law two sorts of Sponsalia, or espousals, are distinguished, viz. one called de futuro, and the other de praesenti. The latter is exactly the same as the matrimonial contract now used, and which renders a marriage valid ipso facto even before its consummation. Accordingly it is otherwise called the contract of matrimony, and used to be celebrated in facie Ecclesiae. The former was also a contract consisting in an agreement, by which the parties solemnly promised and were pledged to join in marriage within a certain limited time. As it did not require immediate cohabitation, it was called Sponsalia de futuro, or what in English is named betrothing. According to the Roman law, it was known under the general name of Sponsalia, and in the Codes there is a Title, De Sponsalibus et donationibus ante Nuptias, distinct from that De Nuptiis, or of marriage strictly so called. This contract of espousal used to be entered into with great solemnity, in presence of witnesses, and accompanied with donations, certain ceremonies, &c. The violation of it was punished with the severest penalties of the state and censures of the church, unless there appeared some just reason for not observing it; as if, ex. c. either of the parties protracted the time of marriage beyond two years. There are several decrees of councils prohibiting persons from breaking in upon this contract, and one even as late as that of Trullo, which declares it downright adultery for a man to marry a woman, that was before betrothed to another, during the life of him who had espoused her. And Pope Siricius, writing to Himerius, says, that it would be a sacrilegious act for a man to take as his wife a girl espoused to another, because it would violate the benediction given by the priest to her who was afterwards to be married. Hence we find that the sacerdotal benediction was used as well in espousals as in strictly called marriages. As long as the Roman laws remained in vigour, the contract of matrimony was usually celebrated some time after that of espousals, and with a solemnity not practised by nations, who had not been ruled by those laws. (On these subjects see Bingham, Origines, &c. Book xxii. ch. 3 and 4.)

But in the middle ages all that apparatus did not appear necessary, at least in some countries. The two contracts were known; but it began to be supposed, that either of them was sufficient in itself, if attended with the requisite circumstances, for the validity of marriage. In the Canon law of the Decretals they are distinguished as two particular contracts, and one of which might be entered into without passing through the other. That, which was strictly understood by the name of contract of matrimony, began, to guard against equivocation and to facilitate the solving of questions, to be called Sponsalia de praesenti, inasmuch as it required no future condition towards rendering the marriage valid, and was expressed in words of the present tense, such as I take you for my wife, &c. In the fourth book of the Decretals, Tit. De Sponsalibus et Matrimoniis, there are many decrees relative to cases, in which there might be a clashing between the two contracts. There is one (cap. 15.) of Alexander III. declaring that Sponsalia de futuro, if followed by consummation, are not dissolved by Sponsalia de praesenti, but that they would if it had not been so followed; provided, however, that the man, who, abandoning his betrothed spouse as yet by him untouched, marries another woman, had not been forced to marry her. I find another (cap. 30.) exactly to the same purpose by Gregory IX. in which he decides, that a man, who has pledged himself (by Sponsalia de futuro) to a woman, and afterwards knows her carnally, is bound to stick to her as his wife, and henceforth is not allowed to marry, in any manner whatsoever, another woman during her life time. Then he adds, (cap. 31.) that, if no carnal knowledge has intervened, the promise ever so solemn (by Sponsalia de futuro) must yield to an actual subsequent marriage, yet so as that the party violating its pledge must undergo penance; while, on the contrary, a marriage strictly so called (by Sponsalia de praesenti) duly entered into, cannot be set aside by any other. Now the whole mystery of Irish marriages is cleared up. They were usually contracted only by sponsalia de futuro, a very old mode much like that of the ancient Jews, whose marriages used to be valid some time.

and often considerable, before the parties went to cohabit together. The Irish were more in the habit of contracting marriage in this way than by that de praesenti; and hence Giraldus Cambrensis has said of them, (Topogr. Hib. Dist. 3. c. 19.) that “nondum matrimonia contrahunt,” that is, as he ought to have explained, that they did not practise the form of Sponsalia de praesenti, or matrimony strictly so called, as usually as the English and some other nations of those times. This is also what it seems more probable St. Bernard alluded to in the phrase contract of marriages (above Not. 48); for he does not upbraid the marriages themselves, but merely remarks the want of the contract peculiarly distinguished by the name conjugium or matrimonium, viz. the Sponsalia de praesenti. That the other form was more generally followed in Ireland, and to a much later period than St. Bernard’s days, is positively stated by Good, an English priest, who writing at Limerick, where he kept a school about A. 1566, says, (ap. Camden at the end of Ireland) that they used to celebrate marriage by Sponsalia de futuro, not de praesenti. The same system continued more or less in some other countries, until it was prohibited by the Council of Trent and the civil laws of Christian states. I may here observe that, although Good, more majorum, speaks badly enough of the Irish, yet he does not give occasion for a monstrous lie advanced by Ledwich, (Ant. &c. p. 431.) and attributed by him to Camden. What Camden has is taken from Good, who says, that the Irish “seldom marry out of their own town.” These plain words have been changed by Ledwich, and as if uttered by Camden, into the following; Beyond the precincts of towns marriage was rarely contracted. Who does not see, that there is a most material difference between these two passages? But any thing for Ledwich, so as that he might abuse the Irish. Good talks about their being prone to incest. Of this charge, which was connected with their not having been very strict with regard to the consanguineal impediments of marriage, an occasion will occur of treating hereafter.

§. VII. St. Malachy, doubting of his being sufficiently acquainted with the discipline of the Church, and wishing to be better informed concerning it, thought it adviseable to place himself for some time under the instruction of the venerable Malchus, bishop of Lismore, who was then held in the highest estimation for his great learning and extraordinary virtue, joined with the gift of miracles, so that he was resorted to by persons not only from all parts of Ireland, but likewise from Scotland. Although an Irishman, he had been a monk of Winchester, whence he was taken to be raised to the see of Lismore. (53) He was probably the immediate successor of Macmic-Aeducan, who died in 1113. (54) St. Malachy, having received the benediction of his master Imar, was directed by his bishop Celsus, to this holy man, who was then far advanced in life, and remained with him some years at Lismore. His arrival there was probably about A. D. 1123. (55) During his stay there he became acquainted with Cormac MacCarthy, the pious king of Desmond, who was in 1127 deprived of his principality by Turlogh O'Connor, king of Connaught, his brother Donogh MacCarthy being set up in his stead. Cormac bore his lot with great fortitude, and throwing himself into the hands of Malchus refused to be treated with distinction, and requested, rather than run the risk of occasioning bloodshed, to be allowed to lead a pious and retired life. Malchus, admiring his resignation and fervour, provided him with a small house, and placed him under the direction of St. Malachy. There he lived on bread and salt and water, leading also in other respects a penitential life. He was delighted with St. Malachy's society, and became exceedingly attached to him. After some time it pleased God to restore Cormac to his kingdom, by means of Conor O'Brian, who, from having been king of Munster, (56) then held the principality of Thomond under a sort of vassalage to Turlogh O'Connor. Determined on shaking it off, he repaired to Lismore, visited Cormac in his poor habitation, and encouraged him to follow him, engaging himself that he would re-instate him. Cormac was unwilling to quit his retirement ; but, as the good of the country required his appearing among his friends, he was ordered by Malchus and advised by St. Malachy to submit, and was soon after re-established in Desmond by Conor O'Brian, assisted by various chieftains, who banished Donogh Mc Carthy to Connaught. (57) On this occasion Cormac erected, or set about erecting, two churches at Lismore, and one at Cashel. (58)

(53) St. Bernard, Vit. S. Mal. cap. 3. Usher thought, (Not. ad Ep. 38. Sylloge) that Malchus of Lismore was the same as Malchus of Waterford, whom we have treated of Chap. xxv. §. 6. Besides the name, the circumstance of his having been a monk of Winchester seems to render this opinion very probable. But St. Bernard says that Malchus was removed from Winchester straight to Lismore, whereas the original see of the Malchus already mentioned was Waterford. There were in those times other persons named Malchus, one of whom is mentioned by St. Bernard himself (ib. cap. 5.) ; and it seems to have been a latinized appellation for one or other of those many Irish names that began with Maol. There might have been two persons, so called, monks at Winchester. If a union really took place between Waterford and Lismore, as Keating (or perhaps his translator) insinuates to have been ordered by the synod of Rathbreasil, (see Chap. xxv §. 14.) it might be supposed that one and the same Malchus was bishop of both sees. But the matter is so obscure, that I cannot pretend to decide upon it. Gratianus Lucius (Lynch) held the same opinion (Cambr. Ev. p. 167) as Usher, but has given us no proof of it.

(54) See above §. 2. Ware and Harris have (at Lismore) a pretended bishop, whom they call Gilla-Mochudu O'Rebacain, and whose death they assign to A. D. 1129. But surely Malchus was bishop there some years before that time, as is clear from S. Malachy's having repaired to him thither about 1123. In consequence of that mistake they were puzzled as to the precise period of Malchus' incumbency, Ware saying that he flourished in 1140, (when he was probably dead) and Harris, that it was in 1134. Indeed Harris has shamefully bungled the whole business, telling us elsewhere, (see above Not. 44.) that St. Malachy went to Lismore when only twelve years old, that is, about A. 1107. He throws in a caveat, that Malchus was not yet a bishop. Had he read or did he understand St. Bernard, who tells us in the clearest terms, that Malchus was a bishop, and a celebrated one, of Lismore before he was waited upon by St. Malachy? The O'Rebacain, whom he and Ware have foisted into the see of Lismore, was undoubtedly no other than an abbot there of that name, who died in 1128 (see Archdall at Lismore) a date, to which Ware, as usual, added a year.

(55) As St. Malachy was ordained priest, when about 25 years of age, and accordingly about A. 1120, and was afterwards employed as Vicar general of the diocese of Armagh for some time, which can scarcely be supposed to have been less than two or three years, it will follow that he did not go to Lismore until about 1123.

(56) See above §. 1.

(57) The substance of these transactions is related by St. Bernard (ib. cap. 3.) without mentioning names or times. Yet he has the name of Cormac, cap. 6. The details are given in the Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1127. According to them Cormac became a pilgrim, and took a crosier (pilgrim's staff) at Lismore. His liberation is related in the following manner: "In the same year Conor O'Brian disavowed the authority of Turlogh O'Conor, and went to Lismore, and gave his hand to Cormac Mac-Carthy, and brought him again into the world, and made him king of Desmond, and dethroned and banished Donogh Mac-Carthy into Connaught; in doing which he was abetted by Turlogh O'Brian (his brother), and by O'Sullivan, O'Donoghue, O'Mahony, O'Keefe, O'Moriarty, and O'Faolain."

(58) Same Annals ib. This church of Cashel either must not be confounded with Cormac's Chapel, (see Chap. xxii. § 6.) or must be considered as not newly built but only repaired. And, in fact, the said Annals state, (at A. 1138.) that Cormac Mac-Carthy had built or repaired the church called Teampoll Chormaic in Cashel. They add, that it was so called from him. But, if they meant what is known by the name of Cormac's Chapel, this cannot be correct, for the architecture of this building indicates a period long prior to the times of Cormac Mac Carthy; and it would have been more proper to say, that two Cormacs had been concerned in it, viz. Mac-Culinan the original founder and Mac-Carthy the repairer. It is very probable, that Cormac's chapel was injured in 1121, when Turlogh O'Conor burned Cashel (above §. 1.) and that this gave occasion to a reparation by Cormac Mac-Carthy. Perhaps what said Annals have about his having built two churches in Lismore ought to be understood in the same manner; for Turlogh had burned also Lismore. Whether M'Carthy erected a new church in Cashel, or only repaired an old one, the work was not completed in 1127, whereas the consecration of it did not, as will be seen, take place until 1134.

§. VIII. While St. Malachy was at Lismore, his sister died. He was so displeased with her on account of her worldly mode of living, that he had determined never to see her again during life. On a certain night he heard in a dream a voice announcing to him, that his sister was standing out in the court-yard and had tasted nothing for thirty days. Awaking he immediately understood what food she wanted, and recollected that for said number of days he had not offered for her the bread of life from heaven. This he took care to repeat; and after some short time she appeared to him in a vision as having reached the door of the church, but so as not to be able to enter it, and clothed in a dark garment. As he continued to offer for her, she appeared to him a second time, in a whitish dress and as within the church, but not allowed to touch the altar. But at length he saw her again, united with the assembly of the white-robed, and wearing a white garment. (59) Meanwhile Celsus and Imar were anxious, that St. Malachy should return to his own country, and accordingly wrote to him to that purpose. Being now well stored with what he had wished to learn, he obeyed their summons. His return was probably in 1127, the year in which he became intimate with Cormac Mac-Carthy at Lismore. (60) During his absence Celsus completed in 1125 the reparation and roofing of the cathedral of Armagh, which had remained partly uncovered since 995, in which year the city had been laid waste by a dreadful conflagration caused by lightning. In 1126 he consecrated the church of St. Peter and Paul, which had been erected, or, as some say, re-erected by Imar O'Haedhagain, the same as Imar the master of St. Malachy. Afterwards he spent thirteen months out of his diocese, going through various parts of Ireland, preaching peace, harmony, and good conduct, and endeavouring to put a stop to the civil war, that raged throughout almost the whole island. He is said to have succeeded in establishing a truce for one year between the Conacian and Momonian princes. (61)

(59) S. Bernard, ib. cap. 4.

(60) Amidst other mistakes Harris says, (Archbishops, &c. at Malachy) that he returned to Ulster in 1120, and was then ordained priest by Celsus. But we have seen, that he was a priest before he went to Lismore, and that he did not go thither until later than 1120. One would imagine, that Harris had not read the Life by St. Bernard, although he refers to it. Besides its being positively stated, that St. Malachy was not only a priest but Vicar general of Armagh before he removed to Lismore, surely Harris ought to have perceived, that, as he celebrated mass at Lismore, he must have been then a priest.

(61) Tr. Th. p. 300. Of the dreadful state, in which the greatest part of Ireland was in those times, the reader will find sufficient proofs in the Annals of Innisfallen, at A. 1125, 1126, 1127.

§. ix. When St. Malachy returned to Ulster, the monastery of Bangor was waste, and seems to have been in that state for a considerable time, not having been re-established after some great devastation, which it had suffered. (62) Yet the lands belonging to it, which were extensive, still continued to be held by persons, who used to be called abbots, and who were even elected to that sinecure situation. (63) They were then in possession of a maternal uncle of St. Malachy, who offered them all up to him, together with Bangor itself, that he might build or rather rebuild a monastery there. But the saint was so much addicted to poverty, that content with merely the site of the monastery he refused to accept of the lands, and allowed them to be transferred to another person, who was chosen, according to custom, for that purpose ; for his uncle resigned them, and placed himself under his direction as a monk. (64) St. Malachy taking with him, by order of Imar, about ten brethren, set about erecting the necessary accommodations at Bangor, on which occasion, as he was cutting wood with an axe, one of them happened to put himself in way of the stroke and received a most violent blow on the back, by which it was apprehended that he was almost killed. But providentially he was scarcely hurt, and his escape was considered miraculous. In a few days they finished a handsome oratory constructed of boards, and, when every thing was ready, St. Malachy, according to the direction of Imar, re-established, as head of the community, the old discipline of Bangor as it had been formerly, with this only difference that the number of monks was smaller. A man named Malchus, who was sick at Bangor, was urged by an evil spirit to be hostile to the saint, who, on being informed of it, recurring to prayer, cured him both of his infirmity and of the temptaton. Malchus, when recovered, was not ungrateful, and embraced the monastic state under him. He was brother to Christian, who afterwards became abbot of Mellifont. A clerk of the name of Michael, whom he cured twice of illness, also joined him, and the reputation and community of St. Malachy went on constantly increasing.

(62) St. Bernard says (ib. cap. 5.) that Bangor had been formerly destroyed by pirates, and that, seemingly as if on that occasion, 900 monks were reported to have been killed by them on one day. This was probably an exaggerated tradition. Of such great slaughter I find no mention in our Irish documents; but we read that Tanudius, abbot of Bangor, was killed by the Danes in 956 (AA SS. p. 107.) It is probable, that on this occasion many of the monks also were put to death; and perhaps we may thence date the devastation spoken of by St. Bernard. To its having been so ancient cannot be opposed the circumstance of one or two abbots of Bangor being mentioned as having lived between that year and St. Malachy's times; for, although monks had ceased to be there, the title of abbot and the emoluments were, as will be just seen, still continued. Harris thought (State of the County of Down, p. 64.) that St. Bernard applied by mistake the slaughter of the British monks of Bancor by the Northumbrian king Aedilfrid (see Not. 12. to Chap. xv.) to the Bangor of Ireland. But Aedilfrid and his army were not pirates, such as St. Bernard mentions; and the number of those British monks killed was much greater than that stated by him. Harris has the infamous lie about Aedilfrid having been instigated by Augustin the monk.

(63) If it be true, that Gillebert had been abbot of Bangor, before he became bishop of Limerick, (see Chap. xxv. §. 9.) he must have been an abbot of this sort, or what the French call an Abbè Commédataire. The abuse of church lands, particularly those belonging to monasteries, being possessed by laymen had long since crept into the church. In England we find it in the eighth century, and at the same period it was usual in France, where the possessors of abbatial lands were called Abbacornites. (See Ducange at Abbacornites, and at In commandum mittere. The earliest instance I meet with of it in Ireland is that of the occupation of the revenues of the see of Armagh by the lay so called archbishops. But about the times we are now treating of it became rather prevalent; and Giraldus Cambrensis informs us, (Itiner. Cambr. L. c. 4.) that there were several lay abbots in Ireland and Wales. The passage is curious and worth transcribing: “Notandum autem, quod haec ecclesia (S. Paterni) sicut et aliae per Hiberniam et Walliam plures, abbatem laicum habet. Usus enim inolevit et prava consuetudo, ut viri, in parochia potentes, “ primo tamquam oeconomi seu potius ecclesiarum patroni et de“ fensores a clero constituti, postea processu temporis aucta “ cupidine totum sibi jus usurparent, et terras omnes cum “ exteriore possessione sibi impudenter appropriarent; solum “ altaria; cum decimis et obventionibus clero relinquentes; et “ haec ipsa filiis suis clericis et cognatis assignantes. Tales “ itaque defensores seu potius ecclesiarum destructores abbates se “ vocari facere, et tam nomen indebitum quam rem quoque sibi “ assignari praesumpserunt.” He says, that those lay abbots, retaining the lands and other properties to themselves, left to the clergy only the altars and the tithes and dues. As to tithes, he alluded to Wales; for they were not paid in Ireland before his time. In the course of ages this system became very general in Ireland, particularly in Ulster; and hence the origin of that singular class of persons called Corbes and Erenachs, concerning whom much has been written but in great part incorrect. Usher has left a dissertation on this subject, (see Collectan. de Reb. Hibern. vol. 1.) which he wrote when young, and in which he pretends, that the Corbes were originally the same as the Chorepiscopi, of which Corbe was a corruption. This was a fundamental mistake, and has been guarded against by Ware, (Antiq. cap. 17.) who justly observes from Colgan, that Corba or Comorba signifies a successor in an ecclesiastical dignity. Usher himself tells us, that “some of the Irish have detorted the name in Latin to Converbius, or Confur-bach in Irish, which importeth as much as conterraneous.” This was no detortion, but founded on the true meaning of the name.

 The original word is Comhorba, (pronounced Covorba) derived from Comh (con in Latin) and forba, i. e. a district, landed estate, or patrimony; and which by a certain usage was applied to the successors of distinguished persons in ecclesiastical situations, as if signifying joint-partners. Colgan writes; (Tr. Th. p. 8.) “Vox “ Hibernica Comhorba, si vocis etymon spectes, idem denotat ac “ compraedianus, sive ejusdem praedii, patrimonii, vel agri pos“ sessor. Derivatur enim a comh, quod idem denotat ac con “ apud Latinos, et forba, i. e. praedium, ager, vel patrimonium.
 “ Usurpatur tamen passim apud priscos nostros scriptore pro suc“ cessore in praelatura vel dignitate ecclesiastica. Unde et hodie “ videmus comhorbanos appellari, licet plerumque sint seculares, “ qui praefecturam tenent agrorum et praediorum, quae olim spec-

“ tabant ad jura divitum abbatiarum ; sive id ortum sit, quod “ majores familiarum, ex quibus illi comorbani assumuntur, se et “ sua praedia protectioni et jurisdictioni istarum abbatiarum sive “ monasteriorum voluntarie consecraverint, ut quidam opinantur ;
 “ sive ex eo quod, rebus ecclesiasticis paulatim labentibus, aliqui “ seculares titulum abbatis vel praelati in talibus monasteriis
 “ primo usurpaverint, et postea ad suos posteros transmiserint.”

(See also ib. p. 293 and 630.) Colgan has these words in a note to a passage, in which the successors of St. Fiech of Sletty are called his comhorbans ; and we have seen over and over the archbishops of Armagh styled comorbans of St. Patrick, the comorbans of Columbkil, of Finnian of Clonard, Barr of Cork, &c. &c. This title is often translated heres, which signifies not only an heir, but an owner or possessor, apparently the primitive meaning of heres, like that of the German word herr. Thus Usher has (Prim. p. 860) from the Annals of Ulster ; “ Duo heredes S. Patricii, nempe Forrannanus—et Dermotius—quieverunt.” The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 295.) call them comorbans of St. Patrick. It is usually joined with the name of the founder of a church ; thus we read of the comorbans of St. Patrick, of Columbkil, of Adamnan not as abbot of Hy but as founder of Raphoe, of St. Iarlath of Tuam, of Comgall, &c. Yet sometimes it occurs united with the name of a church, as the comorban of Inniscatthy, the comorban of the church of St. Brigid of Armagh, a title given (Tr. Th. p. 299.) to Gormgal Laighsech, who died in 1085. And hence we see, that this name was used not only for bishops and abbots, but likewise became gradually extended to persons holding minor ecclesiastical dignities.

In the above quoted passage Colgan observes, that in his time the comorbans were mostly laymen. After the synod of Kells, which defined the episcopal sees, we find but few instances of our bishops being called comorbans ; and this title fell into disuse also as to regular abbots. The laymen, who usurped old ecclesiastical livings, that had belonged to decayed or neglected monasteries and churches, appropriated it to themselves ; and we find in later times a great number of comorbans, or, as corruptly called, Corbas or Corbes of this kind, chiefly in Ulster, as may be seen from the grand Inquisition, held in the year 1609, for the county of Tyrone and the other escheated counties, now in the Rolls Office, Dublin, and abstracts from which are to be found among Harris' MSS. in the library of the Dublin Society. But an inquiry into this subject would lead me beyond the times, which I intend to treat of; and let it suffice to observe, that several of these corbes possessed even lands belonging to episcopal sees, paying, however, certain mensal dues to the bishops, who did not hold the lands in demesne. (See Sir John Davies' Letter to the Earl of Salisbury in Collectan. Vol. 1.) This system had partly begun before the times of St. Malachy.

Yet there were in Colgan's times some comorbas or corbes in holy orders, and they are described by Sir John Davies, (ib.) on the authority of an Irish scholar, as provosts of collegiate churches under the name of plebani, a title corresponding to that of pievano in the North of Italy. The certificate of the Irish scholar, or his description of the corbanatus, which is given by Davies, has been republished by Spelman, (Glossar. ad Corba) who got his information from Usher, and by the Benedictine editors of Ducange, (at Corba) who, by the bye, were mistaken in quoting it as if from Isidorus Moscovius De Majest. Mil. Eccl. This sort of Corbes were probably the heads of churches, which had been formerly small bishoprics, and who, as they could not be called bishops, were distinguished by that name. But there were other corbes not in holy orders and usually married, although Davies seems to say that all the corbes had some order, meaning, I suppose, the tonsure. Colgan, however, positively states, that the greatest part of them were mere laymen. This much is certain, that the corbes or comorbas were not in general, as Usher, Spelman, and others would fain insinuate, the substitutes for chorepiscopi, but persons occupying the church lands, which had formerly belonged to dignitaries of various ranks. Harris, in his usual mode of adding some mistake to Ware's works, says (Antiq. p. 235.) that the Corbes were anciently married men till celibacy was enjoined the clergy. What confusion! We do not find any married corbes or comorbas until very long indeed after the law of celibacy was established; and the married corbes, who appeared in late times, were either not clergymen in any sense of the word, or at most had received only some minor order, ex. c. the tonsure.

; Besides the corbes there was a much more numerous description of persons somewhat like them, but considered as of an inferior rank, viz. the Erenachs. This name originally meant archdeacons, as has been justly remarked by Usher, (on Corbes, &c.) Spelman, (ad Corba) Ware, (Antiq. cap. 17.) &c. In Irish it is written Airchinneach, Airchindeach, or Airchidneach. Colgan's conjecture (Tr. Th. p. 631.) of its being perhaps derived from the Greek ethnarches, as if signifying the head of a people, is quite futile; and he himself was sometimes obliged to translate it archidiaconus. According to the ancient discipline the archdeacons were the managers and economes of the property of the church. By degrees this duty fell into the hands of laymen, who consequently assumed the title of archdeacons. This happened also in France. In the Capitularies it is more than once enjoined, ut archidiaconi non sint laici. In an old document (apud Catellum, L. 5. Rerum Occitan. p. 872.) we read; "Ut tunc temporis erat mos milites tenere archidiaconatus." Ordericus Vitalis (L. 3. p. 496.) says, that about A. D. 1066 Fulcoius son of Ralph de Caldreio gave to monks an archdeaconry, which he held in fief from his predecessors under the archbishop of Rouen. (See more in Ducange at Archidiaconatus.) In the middle ages we find several archdeacons in one and the same diocese, some called majores, others minores. (Gallia Christiana in Episc. Antissiodor. No. 58.) Hincmar of Rheims writes in his letter to the Church of Tournay, quoted by Usher (ib.); "Ut pro constituendis ministerialibus ecclesiasticis praeium non accipiat (episcopus) sed archipresbyteros et archidiaconos eligat, facultatum ecclesiasticarum dispensatores," &c. In course of time the Erenachs became exceedingly numerous in Ireland. They were universally laymen, except that they were tonsured, on which account they were ranked among the Clerici or Clerks. In an inquisition taken for the county of Tyrone in 1608 we read; "In qualibet dictarum baroniarum praeter illas terras, quae antehac possidebantur ac modo possidentur ab hominibus nunc laicis, sunt aliae quaedam terrae, de quibus quidam clerici sive homines literati, qui vocantur Erinaci, ab antiquo seisisi fuerunt." Then it adds, that each of these erenachs used to pay, and was bound to do so, a certain subsidy, reflections, and yearly pension to the archbishop or bishop, in whose diocese the lands held by them were situated, in proportion to the quantity of land and the custom of the country. Usher observes, (ib) that in the dioceses of Derry and Raphoe the bishop got a third part, the other two thirds being reserved for the repairs of churches, hospitality, and Erenach's maintenance. In fact the erenachs were the actual possessors of old church lands, out of which they paid certain contributions either in money or kind towards ecclesiastical purposes. Davies says (ib.); "The church land (in Monaghan) was either monastery land, corbe-land, or erenach's land; for it did not appear unto us, that the bishop had any land in demesne, but certain mensal duties of the corbes and erenachs; neither did we find, that the parsons and vicars had any glebe land at all in this country." "There are," he states, "few parishes of any compass in extent, where there is not an erenach;" which he derives from a right of juspatronatus or advowson. This might have been sometimes the case, but was not generally so. Besides keeping the church in order, exercising hospitality, and giving alms, "he was also to make a weekly commemoration of "the founder in the church; he had always primam tonsuram, "but took no other orders. He had a voice in the Chapter, when "they consulted about their revenues, and paid a certain yearly "rent to the bishop, besides a fine upon the marriage of every "of his daughters, which they call a Loughinipy; he gave a "subsidy to the bishop at his first entrance into his bishopric: "the certainty of all which duties appear in the bishop's register; and these duties grew unto the bishop first, because the "erenach could not be created nor the church dedicated without "the consent of the bishop." Here Davies goes still on the principle that the erenachs held the lands in virtue of a juspatronatus founded on grants made to churches by their ancestors; but the fact is, that those erenachies consisted chiefly in usurpations made by laymen, or merely tonsured clerks, calling themselves archdeacons, who, as well as the so called comorbas or corbes, transmitted the church lands to their posterity, or at least to the sept, to which they belonged, according to the Irish laws of succession and inheritance. On the death of an Erenach, the sept used to elect another from among themselves, and, in case they did not agree, the bishop and clergy were authorized to interfere and chuse one out of said sept; for they could not take the erenachy into their own hands. And if a whole sept became extinct, it was necessary to look out for another, to which it should be transferred, and which would be vested with the right of electing the erenach, under the same conditions and charges, without alteration, as those observed by the former erenachs. Similar regulations existed with regard to the corbes, and much may be seen concerning them and some other collateral points in the Inquisitions in Harris' MSS. above mentioned, in which, by the bye, there are some foolish and groundless speculations relative to the origin of corbeships and erenachies. Harris himself is not sufficiently correct in what he has on these subjects in his additions to Ware (Antiq. p. 233. seqq.); but I shall not enlarge further on them, having said as much as may suffice to illustrate the allusions to them in such part of our ecclesiastical history as I have undertaken to treat of; merely adding, that the corbes differed from the erenaghs in their possessing more extensive lands, and sometimes having erenachs under them, whereas the erenach's power and influence were of an inferior kind. Besides, many corbes held lands, that had belonged to old abbeys, independently, it seems, of the bishops; and such was St. Malachy's uncle, who was in possession of the property of the monastery of Bangor, and who was called comorb (tantamount to abbot) of Bangor. On the contrary, the erenachs were perpetual tenants of the bishops, under whom they held their lands. Add, that some corbes were in holy orders and heads of collegiate churches; whereas the erenachs had no higher order than the tonsure.

The name of Termon lands is often given to some of those, which the corbes and erenachs were possessed of. Concerning this name Usher (on Corbes, &c.) says, that "Tearmuin is used " in the Irish tongue for a sanctuary, (whence Termon-Fechin, a " town belonging unto the archbishop of Armagh, hath its deno- " mination, as it were the sanctuary of Fechin) and may well be " thought to have been borrowed by the Irish, as many other " words are, from the Latin terminus, by reason that such privi- " leged places were commonly designed by special marks and " bounds. Terminus sancti loci habeat signa circa se, says an " ancient synod of Ireland; and the old law of the Bavarians " (Tit. 4. §. 1.) Si quis servum Ecclesiae vel ancillam ad fugi- " endum suaserit, et eos foras terminum duxerit. I conclude, " therefore, that Termons were indeed free land, but free from " all claim of temporal lords, not of the Church, being truly ter- “ritorium ecclesiasticum.” Colgan also, speaking of another Tearman-Fechin in the county of Sligo, explains it (AA. SS. p. 141.) as a sanctuary or refuge. But Terminus in the ecclesiastical style means originally district or territory; the idea of sanctuary was secondary. Gregory of Tours says; (Lib. 1. de Miracul. cap. 59.) “Ecclesia est vici Iciodorensis sub termino Turonicae urbis.” The patrimony of the Roman church is called by Pope John VIII. Terminus sancti Petri ac Pauli. Lotharius the third decreed, A. D. 1132, “Ecclesiam parochialem S. Servatii solam in Trajectensi urbe habere decimas et terminum.” (See more in Ducange, ed. Bened. at Terminus.) Some have thought, that Termon was the same as terra monachorum, or in French Terre-moine, the land of monks; but (as remarked ib. at Termonlandes) this is an idle derivation. Nor is there any necessity for deriving it from terra immunis, free land, although it is true that the church lands were, at least sometimes, exempt from tribute in Ireland, and some of them were considered as sanctuaries.

(64) St. Bernard, ib. cap. 5. Here we have an instance of the election of a cormoba or corbe, undoubtedly by the sept which had got possession of the lands, that formerly belonged to the monastery.

§. x. At this time the adjoining see of Connor being vacant, as it had been for many years, St. Malachy was chosen to fill it, but declined accepting of it, until he was ordered by Imar and his metropolitan Celsus to submit. Accordingly he was consecrated bishop, when about thirty years of age, but not, as is usually said, as early as the year 1124. (65) This diocese had been so much neglected, that every thing was in disorder, and he had never before met with a set of people in so deep a state of corruption. They made no offerings to the churches; did not contract lawful marriages; (66) neglected confession, nor was there any one who asked for penances, or who was to prescribe them. For the ministers of the altar were very few, and, had there been more of them, what could they have done amidst such a people? There was neither preaching nor singing in the churches. St. Malachy finding his utmost exertions necessary, made use of all possible means to reclaim them and to introduce a correct system of discipline. He admonished them publicly and privately, used to stop them in the streets for the purpose of instructing them, and spent whole nights praying for their conversion. Attended by his faithful disciples of Bangor, whom he still continued to govern, he visited in all directions the smaller towns and country parts of his diocese, constantly on foot, and conducting himself as a really apostolical man. He suffered great hardships, met with many repulses, and received injuries. Yet he persevered, and, with God's assistance, succeeded at length in softening that hard-hearted people and bringing them to a sense of their duty. Instead of certain Irish practices of theirs he introduced the Roman ones, got the churches rebuilt, ordained clergymen for them, and took care that the sacraments should be duly administered. Confession is frequented; the people flock to the churches; marriage is celebrated in a solemn manner; and in short every thing was so much changed for the better, that what the Lord had said by the Prophet; Those, who were not my people, are now my people; might be justly applied to that diocese.

(65) St. Bernards' words, (ib. cap. 6.) "Tricesimo ferme aetatis suae anno Malachius consecratus episcopus," have been understood by Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 300.) as referring to A. D. 1124, reckoning from his birth in 1095. He has been followed by Ware and Harris (Bishops at Connor). But this date cannot agree with St. Malachy's having been acquainted, before he returned to Ulster, at Lismore with Cormac Mac-Carthy, and his having been there when Cormac was liberated in 1127, a date which I find no sufficient reason for calling in question. We may suppose, that he was consecrated in that same year; for it is clear that he was but a short time at Bangor when he was appointed bishop; and St. Bernard's round number, tricesimo ferme, must be explained not as meaning exactly or nearly thirtieth, but as we would say, about thirty, although in all likelihood St. Malachy was then thirty two years of age. Ferme is often used for thereabouts, more or less.

(66) The charge here made by St. Bernard is thus expressed; Non legitima inire conjugia. This is relative not to the neglect of marriage, but perhaps to the non-observance of the rule of the canonists, as to the seven degrees, which has been treated of above Not. 51. This rule had not been generally received in Ireland, and indeed it could scarcely be expected that it should, considering the system of clanships, and the Irish practice of marrying chiefly within their septs. It was found so difficult to observe it any where, that it was modified not very long after St. Bernard's death. He does not say, that the people of Connor did not marry; for were this his meaning he would have omitted the word legitima. Or, what is much more probable, St. Bernard alluded to the practice of not celebrating marriage by sponsalia de praesenti, but by those de futuro, a practice, which, however disapproved of by him, rendered marriage valid not only in Ireland but elsewhere. In short, he blamed, as followed in the diocese of Connor, that system, which, he tells us, was reformed by St. Malachy at Armagh, where in all likelihood the new matrimonial regulation consisted merely in substituting the Sponsalia de praesenti for those de futuro, or adding the former to the latter. (See Not. 52.) St. Bernard does not say, what Harris (at Connor) falsely attributes to him, that the people were adulterers; but Harris did not understand the meaning of non legitima inire conjugia.

§. XI. After some time it happened that Connor was destroyed by a king of a northern part of Ireland, and St. Malachy, being obliged to quit that country, went with 120 brethren to Munster, where he was received with a most cordial welcome by his friend Cormac Mac-Carthy, king of Desmond. This must have taken place after the death of Celsus, which in all appearance occurred while St. Malachy was still at Connor. (67) Celsus was very anxious to put a stop to the hereditary succession, which had continued so long in his family, and to be succeeded by Malachy. Accordingly, perceiving his end approaching, he drew up a sort of will, in which he declared his intention that Malachy should be appointed, on his demise, as the person fittest to govern the primatial see of Ireland. This he communicated to persons both present and absent, and particularly to the two kings of Munster, where he then happened to be, whom as well as others he enjoined by the authority of St. Patrick to exert themselves for that purpose. Some short time before his death a woman of tall stature and reverend countenance appeared in a vision to St. Malachy, and on being asked who she was, answered, that she was the wife of Celsus, (that is, the church of Armagh). She then handed him a pastoral staff, which she held in her hand, and disappeared. (68) After a few days Celsus being on his death-bed sent his staff or crosier to Malachy as the person, who was to succeed him; which, when he saw, he perceived that it was exactly like that, which he had seen in the vision. Celsus was then at Ardpatrik in the now county of Limerick, where he died on the 1st of April, A. D. 1129, in the 50th year of his age. His body was removed, according to his will, to Lismore, and honourably interred there, in the burying place of the bishops, on the Thursday following, which in that year was the 4th of April. (69) His name is in the Roman martyrology at the 6th of April. (70) Some writers have made him an author, and speak of him as a very learned man; but I greatly doubt whether much credit be due to their assertions. (71)

(67) It is true that St. Bernard speaks (cap. 6.) of St. Malachy's going to Munster before he treats (cap. 7.) of the last proceedings and death of Celsus. But he must be understood as writing by anticipation, and as continuing his account of the personal transactions of St. Malachy. And in fact he says that, while the saint was reforming the diocese of Connor, &c. Celsus happened to fall sick; and his stating that Connor was not destroyed until some years, annos aliquot, after St. Malachy had undertaken the administration of it, obliges us to suppose, that he did not go with his 120 brethren to Munster before the death of Celsus, which occurred on the 1st of April, A. D. 1129. Now St. Malachy could not have been bishop of Connor prior to 1127, according to what we have seen above Not. 65. We must therefore allow for the some years of St. Bernard some longer time than what had elapsed before April 1129. Perhaps the devastation in which Connor was destroyed, was that of part of Ulster 1130 by Conor, son of Artgoil Mac-Lochlin, at the head of the forces of Tirconnel and Tirone. (See Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1130.)

(68) St. Bernard, ib. cap. 7. Hence in all appearance, as already observed, (Not. 75. to Chap. xxv.) Hanmer took his fable of Celsus having been a married man.

(69) Four Masters and Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 300-301. See also the Annals of Innisfallen and of Mary's Abbey at A. 1129. Baronius was mistaken (Note to the Roman Martyrology at 6 April) in assigning his death to 1128. The Bollandists (at Celsus, said day) strangely observe, that Baronius' reason for the year 1128 was that the Ulster annals used to anticipate the common Christian era by one year. Had this been his reason, he should have marked not 1128, but 1130; for the Irish annals agree in affixing Celsus' death to 1129. Besides, that system of anticipation had ceased before the times we are now treating of.

(70) Its being placed at 6 April is owing to another mistake of Baronius, who was the first to insert it in the Roman Martyrology, which he revised by order of Gregory XIII. It was already in Molanus' Additions to Usuard, published in the year 1568. Not only the 4 Masters, but likewise Marian Gorman, who lived in the same century, has, in his martyrology, the death of Celsus at 1st April. As his interment was marked iv. April, this notation was probably mistaken for vi. April and thus adding a confusion of said day with that of his death, this error seems to have originated.

(71) Ware (Archbishops of Armagh) refers to Brian Twine, who calls Celsus a universal scholar, and affirms from Bale (fine authority!) that he had spent some time at Oxford. And (Writers at Celsus) he says, that he wrote a Theological summary, which he was told had been extant (not published, as the English translator has) at Vienna. Then he speaks of certain letters and constitutions. That Celsus wrote some letters and regulations relative to ecclesiastical matters, and that he drew up a sort of a will, need not be denied; but these are not sufficient for reckoning him among the Irish writers.

§. XII. As soon as it was known at Armagh that Celsus was dead, Murchertach, or (according to his latinized name) Mauritius or Maurice, a son of Domnald the predecessor of Celsus, took possession of the see, which he retained, one way or another, for five years until his death. (72) Thus St. Malachy, who was far from being anxious to be removed to Armagh, was prevented from occupying it, notwithstanding the declaration of Celsus and the wish of the pious persons of those times. It was during Maurice's incumbency or usurpation that he went, as we have seen, to Munster, where, with the assistance of Cormac Mac-Carthy, he constructed a monastery in a place in that prince's kingdom, called Ibrach. (73) There he and the brethren were provided with every thing necessary, and the king often visited them, considering himself as a disciple of St. Malachy. In the attendance to the duties of the house the saint, although the superior and a bishop, performed in his turn every part of them as much at least as any of the brethren, setting them an example of monastic poverty and discipline.

He was probably still there, when Maurice O'Hindrectaigh, who is called comorban of St. Comgall, died at Armagh on the 3d of October, A. D. 1131. (74) Perhaps he was only a person, who had held the lands, which had belonged to the monastery of Bangor, under the title of comorban or corbe. (75) In the same year died Moeliosa O'Foghlada, archbishop of Cashel, (76) and was succeeded by Domnald (not Donagh or Donat) O'Conaing, who held the see until 1137. To the year 1132 is assigned the death of a very eminent priest of Armagh, the blessed Maelbrigid Mac-Dolgen, who departed this life on the 27th of August in the eightieth year of his age, and the 52d of his priesthood. (77)

(72) Tr. Th. p. 301 and 303. St. Bernard ib. cap. 7. Ware and Harris, Bishops of Armagh at Maurice.

(73) Ware, who was greatly in error with regard to Ibrach in his Coenoiba Cisterciencia (at Newry) afterwards thought, (Ant. cap. 26. at Cork) that it was the same as the abbey near Cork called of St. Barr or Finbar. But the account, which he gives of this abbey, shows that he was mistaken. He says, that it was founded for Regular canons of the order of St. Augustin by king Cormac, that is, the Cormac friend of St. Malachy. Now the community, which St. Malachy governed at Ibrach, consisted not of Regular canons, but of monks of the old order of Bangor, or of St. Comgall, as is clear from St. Bernard. Next he says, that it was founded about the year 1134; but in this year St. Malachy was at Armagh, having already returned from Munster. It is therefore clear, that the abbey of St. Barr, otherwise called Gill-abbey, was quite different from the house of Ibrach. Alemand (Hist. Mon. &c. p. 54.) imagined, that Ibrach was the same as Beg-erin near Wexford, as if Ibrach were derived from the name of St. Ibar. This conjecture betrays his ignorance of Irish history. For Ibrach was, as St. Bernard states, in Cormac Mac-Carthy's kingdom, whereas Beg-erin certainly was not. It is strange that Butler (Life of St. Malachy) and some others have referred to this so clearly wrong opinion of Alemand. I have not the least doubt, but that Ibrach or Ibrac, as spelled by St. Bernard, was no other than the district still called Iveragh (b and v commutable in Irish) now a barony in the county of Kerry. The establishment formed there by St. Malachy seems to have ceased soon after his departure from Munster, as it is very probable that the brethren followed him back to Ulster, and we know that the monastery of Bangor, whence they had come, continued to exist after these times.

(74) Tr. Th. p. 303.

(75) See above §. 9. It is hard so think, that he could have been the superior of the monks of Bangor, whereas St. Malachy seems to have retained that office to himself; unless it might be said that he acted as a substitute for the saint, while attending to his diocese of Connor. It may be suspected, that Maurice O'Hindrectaigh was the uncle of St. Malachy, who, as we have seen, had possessed those lands, and who, being too old to follow the saint to Munster, had retired to Armagh. He is spoken of as a holy man; but I do not find him called uncle to St. Malachy.

(76) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1131. 4 Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 308. and Ware, Archbishops of Cashel. Compare with Chap. xxv. §. 14.

(77) Tr. Th. p. 303.

§. XIII. Maurice had held the see of Armagh for three years, and consequently until 1132, when those, who were anxious to put an end to the usurpation, particularly Malchus of Lismore and Gillebert of Limerick, the apostolic legate, having assembled some bishops and chieftains, went in a body to where St. Malachy was, determined to use force if he should resist their plan for placing him on the see. After much expostulation on his part and their threatening him with excommunication, at length he submitted on condition of, in case of the peace of the Church being established and matters properly arranged, being allowed to return to his former spouse (Connor) and to his beloved state of poverty, from which, he said, they were dragging him. It seems, that he was then in his monastery of Ibrach, where he was in the habit of practising his system of poverty, and which, being in Munster, lay convenient for his being called upon by Malchus and Gillebert. His submitting to the demand made of him was chiefly owing to his recollection of the vision, in which the pastoral staff of Celsus appeared as if handed to him, and he was afraid lest his further opposition might involve a resistance to the will of God. Accordingly he went to the diocese of Armagh, of which he undertook the care, as well as of its dependencies, but avoided entering the city, being apprehensive that bloodshed might be the consequence of his doing so. After two years Maurice died on the 17th of September in 1134, (78) having endeavoured, as much as he could, that his successor should be Niell a member of the same usurping family. This Niell, whose name has been latinized into Nigellus, was according to a very probable account, a brother of Celsus; for he is said to have been a son of Aidus and a grandson of a former archbishop Moeliosa. (79) At any rate, he belonged to that race, and their faction were preparing to install him, but were opposed by a king and several bishops and many pious persons, who assembled for the purpose of introducing St. Malachy into Armagh. A hostile party, headed by a very wicked man, placed themselves on a hill adjoining the place of assembly with the intention of rushing down and killing the king and St. Malachy. On his discovering their plan the saint entered a neighbouring church and prayed to God. All of a sudden clouds and darkness with great rain changed the day into night, and a dreadful storm came on accompanied with great thunder and lightning, which killed the leader of that party and some others of them, besides severely injuring others and dispersing the whole gang, while the storm and whirlind left St. Malachy's friends untouched, although not far distant. (80)

(78) Ib. p. 304. from the 4 Masters. This date agrees exactly with St. Bernard's account of Maurice having occupied the see for five years, reckoning from the death of Celsus in 1129.

(79) Colgan says, (ib.) that Niell was son of the Aidus, who died in 1108, and who was a son of Dubdalethe III. Elsewhere, (ib.) owing to an omission of the press, Niell is called son of Dubdalethe. But (ib. p. 305.) Colgan makes him the son of the Aidus son of Moeliosa ; and O'Flaherty maintains (MS. note) that this is the true reading of the 4 Masters. If so, and if they were otherwise right, it will follow, that Niell was a brother of Celsus. (See Chap. xxv. §. 12.) But St. Bernard either did not know this, or did not choose to mention it.

(80) St. Bernard, cap. 7. According to the Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1134 the conspirators were from Tulach-og, now Tullyhog in the barony of Dungannon, county of Tirone, and the transaction is thus stated ; “ The Kineal Eogan (Tironians) of Tulach-Og conspired against Maolmaodhog (Malachy) bishop of Armagh, and twelve of them were struck dead by lightning on the very spot, where they were forming the conspiracy against the holy man.”

§. XIV. St. Malachy was then conducted to Armagh as its bishop and primate of all Ireland, towards the latter end of that same year 1134, (81) being then 38 years old. (82) Niell, finding it necessary to make his escape, took with him two great ornaments of the cathedral, viz. the text of the Gospels, which had belonged to St. Patrick, and the celebrated staff, called the staff of Jesus. (83) Carrying about these objects of the people's highest respect, he was received every where with great attention, and favoured by numbers of persons in preference to St. Malachy. A powerful chieftain of the usurping family, whom the king, St. Malachy's friend, had, before he left Armagh, forced to swear, that he would keep peace with the bishop, and even to give him many hostages to that effect, still harboured evil designs against him, and, on the king's having retired, went to Armagh, where with some relatives and friends he formed a plot for putting the saint to death. They were, however, afraid of the people, and did not dare to attack him in public. But on an evening, when with all the clergy and a multitude of the faithful he was celebrating Vespers in the church, that ill-disposed chieftain sent some persons to request, that he would call upon him for the purpose of their coming to amicable terms. To this the assistants replied, that it was rather his business to wait upon the bishop, and that the church was the fittest place for settling such matters. The messengers answered, that the chieftain was afraid of the crowd, by whom he was hated on account of their attachment to the bishop, and nearly killed a few days before. While they were thus contending, St. Malachy interfered, and said ; “ Brethren, allow me to imitate my master. In vain am I a christian, if I do not follow Christ. Perhaps I shall soften the tyrant by this act of humility ; and, if not, I shall come off victorious by, although the ecclesiastical pastor, paying to a layman an attention, which he owed to me. You will be edified by my example. And what if I should happen to be killed ? I do not refuse to die, so as that you may receive an example of life from me. A bishop, as has been said by the chief of bishops, ought not to domineer over God’s inheritance, but be a model to the flock, and such a one as was exhibited by him, who humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death.” After some other words to this purpose he set out amidst the tears and supplications of all the bystanders, who requested that his wish to die for Christ should not induce him to leave the flock of Christ desolate. He was accompanied by only three of his disciples, who were ready to die along with him. On entering the house he found himself surrounded by armed men, who, on his appearing, seemed stupified, and did not lift a hand against him. The chief of the party, instead of attacking him, rose up to receive him in an honourable manner, and the very persons, who had meditated his death, offered him peace, which was soon concluded on a firm and solid footing, so that his former enemies became attached to him. As to Niell, he was soon after obliged to desist from his pretensions and to give up the reliques or ornaments, which he had carried off. St. Malachy had it now in his power to exercise his ministry with perfect freedom, and was indefatigable in his exertions. Yet he had still some enemies; but his friends took care to guard him both day and night against their snares. A prating fellow, who used to insult the saint and constantly speak ill of him, was punished by his tongue having swelled and rotted, from which he continued to throw out worms for seven days until at length he died. On an occasion of St. Malachy's preaching to the people a woman of the usurping family interrupting him made use of the most opprobrious and blasphemous expressions against him, calling him a hypocrite, an invader of other people's inheritance, &c. He made no answer; but she was struck with madness, and, crying out that she was suffocated by Malachy, expired not long after in a horrid manner.

(81) Annals of Innisfallen, ib. and 4 Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 304.

(82) The anno aetatis suae tricesimo octavo of St. Bernard must be understood of 38 years complete, whereas St. Malachy was born, as we have seen, in 1095 and apparently towards the latter end of the year, so that he was not as yet 39 years old when he entered Armagh after the death of Maurice in September, A. D. 1134.

(83) Concerning this staff, see Chap. iv. §. 12.

§. xv. In the same year, 1134, Imar O'Haedhagain, who had been St. Malachy's master, died at Rome, whither he had gone on a pilgrimage. (84) In said year a synod was held in Cashel by the archbishop, Domnald O'Conaing, and the bishops of Munster, who consecrated the church, which had been built or re-built there by Cormac Mac-Carthy. (85) This church must not be confounded with the great cathedral of Cashel, which, as generally known, was not erected until many years later by Donald O'Brian about the time of the arrival of the English in Ireland. (86) I find it stated, that in the same year the cathedral of Tuam was stormed and forcibly entered by the Dalcassians, and that Derry, the churches of Rath-luirg (Rathlure) Raphoe, and Clonard, part of Cong and Eithne, Roscommon, Rossmor, and several other principal churches were burned and plundered by the Momonians headed by their king Conor O'Brian. These devastations must have been a part of those committed by the great army, composed of Irish and Danes, which he and other princes led in that year against Leth-cuinn or the northern half of Ireland. (87) In the following year Cumea-mor Macconmara (Macnamara) king of Ibh-Caisin, the chief plunderer of the cathedral of Tuam, was killed by the Desmonians under Cormac Mac-Carthy, who ravaged Thomond. (88) Other instances of this disgraceful mode of warfare and want of respect for churches occur in those times. Thus Kildare was plundered by Dermot O'Brian and others in 1136; and in the same year Clonard was pillaged and destroyed by the people of Breffny and Fermanagh. Even Cormac Mac-Carthy is said to have burned a place called Maighe Deiscirt, both houses and churches. (89) After this period I find no further mention of Malchus bishop of Lismore, and, as he was very old when St. Malachy first placed himself under his direction about the year 1123, (90) it may be fairly conjectured that he died not long after St. Malachy got full possession of Armagh. This appears more probable than that he lived until 1150, as some have supposed who made him the same as a bishop of Lismore named Moelmonech O'Lonsech. In 1135 died the blessed Fiachrius a very holy elder of Clonard. (91) Whether the title of elder given to him indicate that he was a bishop, as some have thought, I will not pretend to decide. To the same year is affixed the death of Moeliosa O'Hamire, who appears as the second bishop of Waterford. Domnald O'Dubhai or Dubthaigh, a very wise man, who was bishop of Clonmacnois and of Elphin, called comorban of St. Kieran and archbishop of Connaught, died in 1136 at Clonfert, where he was buried on St. Patrick's day. From his having been honoured with the title of archbishop of Connaught some writers have concluded, that he was also bishop of Tuam. But, had he been such, why not styled comorban of St. Iarlath, as the bishops of Tuam usually were? It is more probable, that said title was given to him merely in an honorary manner, on account of his particular merit and the esteem he was held in (92). Nor was there as yet any Connaught bishop regularly entitled to the name of archbishop.

(84) 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 303. Imar's name is in the Carthusian martyrology at 12 November; but, according to Marian Gorman and the martyrology of Donegal, he died on the 13th of August.

(85) See above §. 7. and Not. 58. The Annals of Innisfallen have at A. 1134; "The church built by Cormac Mac-Carthy in Cashel was consecrated this year by the archbishop and bishops of Munster, at which ceremony the nobility of Ireland, both clergy and laity, were present." Ware (Antiq. cap. 29 at Cashel) states, from the Annals of the Priory of the island of All saints, that after the rebuilding of this church it was solemnly consecrated, and a synod held there in the year 1134. See also Harris, Archbishops of Cashel, p. 464.

(86) Dr. Milner fell (Tour in Ireland, Letter 14.) into a strange mistake on this point. Having made mention of Cormac's chapel, which, he says, was consecrated in the year 900, he adds; "A much more spacious and elegant cathedral was added to this above two centuries later, being consecrated, and a synod held in it, A. D. 1134; at which time the former church began to be used as a chapter-house. Thus he confounded the church, that was consecrated in 1134, with the spacious cathedral, which was not erected until about forty years later. It is very odd that he did, whereas both Ware and Harris expressly and clearly distinguish them, (loc. citt.) representing the church consecrated in 1134, and which they supposed to be the same as Cormac's chapel rebuilt, as quite different from the great cathedral afterwards newly erected by Donald O'Brian.

(87) See the Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1134. Eithne and Rossmor, by which name various places might have been called, were probably in Connaught. There is a river, formerly named Ethne, which runs between the counties of Longford and Westmeath.

(88) Ib. at A. 1135. Ibh-Caisin was in Thomond.

(89) Ib. at A. 1136.

(90) See above §.7. (91) AA. SS. p. 407.

(92) See concerning him ib. p. 217. and Ware and Harris at Clonmacnois, Tuam, and Elphin.

CHAP. XXVII.

St. Malachy makes a visitation of Munster—Pestilence in Ireland—Death of Moeliosa Moelcolumb—St. Malachy retires to the bishopric of Down, and appoints Gelasius his successor in Armagh—Death of Domnald O'Conaing, archbishop of Cashel—and of Giolla Criost bishop of Clogher—Cormac Mc Carthy murdered—Death of Macbrigid O'Brolchan, suffragan bishop of Armagh—St. Malachy goes to Rome to procure the pallium for the sees of Armagh and Cashel—appointed legate by the Pope—Patrick bishop of Limerick consecrated by the bishop of Canterbury—Gelasius archbishop of Armagh, makes a visitation throughout Connaught—Synods held in various places by St. Malachy—Some of the monks of Clarivau sent by St. Bernard to form a monastery in Ireland—Cistercian house of Mellifont founded—Disputes between O'Conor of Connaught and O'Melaghlin of Meath—Great Synod under Muredach O'Dubhthaic bishop of Tuam—Another synod—

Several miracles wrought by St. Malachy—He calls a council at Lismore on account of a man denying the Real Presence in the Holy Eucharist—Different monasteries and oratories erected by St. Malachy—He rebuilds or repairs the church of Down—Synod of Holmpatrick—St Malachy sets out for France to procure the palliums from Pope Eugene III.—Arrives at Clarivau, takes sick and dies there.—Different cistercian abbeys founded in Ireland—Cardinal Paparo arrives in Ireland—Synod of Kells convoked—names of the bishops who attended that synod.—Palliums bestowed on the sees of Armagh, Cashel, Dublin and Tuam—Archbishop of Armagh declared primate—Suffragan sees appointed for the four metropolitans.

SECT. I.

SOME time after St. Malachy was firmly seated on the see of Armagh, he made a visitation of Munster. (1) A pestilence having broken out, the clergy and people of Armagh went in procession, with the usual commemoration and reliques of saints; but on his joining them in prayer it immediately ceased. (2) In 1136 died a distinguished man, Moeliosa Moelcolumb, a very exact calculator of times for the use of the church of Armagh, its librarian, and an eminent antiquary. (3) St. Malachy, having in the course of three years settled ecclesiastical matters in the diocese, restored liberty to its church, reformed abuses, &c. now resolved on resigning the see, according to his previous determination and agreement, and on returning to the scene of his former labours. Yet he did not take to himself the see of Connor, where he had already placed a bishop, but fixed upon Down, which was united to Connor before and when he was bishop there. But, as they had been distinct sees, he now thought it adviseable to separate them again, and leaving that of Connor, strictly so called, to the bishop in possession, undertook himself the care of Down, which was considered inferior to the other. (4) This could not have been earlier than some time in the year 1137, whereas St. Malachy continued to govern Armagh for about three years after his full accession in 1134. Before he retired to Down, he appointed as his successor in Armagh, Gelasius with the consent of the clergy and people. (5) This distinguished prelate was a native of the North of Ireland, and son of Roderic, a man distinguished for his learning, and an excellent poet. His birth is assigned to A. D. 1088, and he is usually called in Irish Gilla Mac-Lieg. (6) In his youth he embraced the monastic state in the abbey of Derry, (7) of which he became abbot, and consequently comorban or successor of Columbkil, in about 1121, which situation he held for sixteen years. (8) I find him called also archdeacon of Derry, (9) whence it seems that Derry was then considered an episcopal see. While he was abbot of this monastery, it was attacked in 1124 by a prince Ardgarr at Ailech near Derry, who, on the towns-people interfering, was killed by one of them. (10) In the same year 1137, in which Gelasius was placed at Armagh, died Domnald O'Conaing, archbishop of Cashel, who is most highly praised for his wisdom, devotion, spirit of prayer, and liberality to the poor and for pious purposes. (11) He was succeeded by Domnald O'Lonargan, who held the see until 1158. (12)

(1) The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 304.) have two visitations of Munster by St. Malachy, one in 1134 (wrongly printed 1124) the very year of his getting full possession, and another in 1136. I strongly suspect, that they were mistaken as to any such visitation in 1134. St. Malachy had enough to do in that year, particularly considering his not being well seated until the late part of it, at Armagh, not to have time to go so soon to Munster, and I am inclined to think, that there was only one visitation, viz. that of 1136.

(2) St. Bernard, cap. 8. (3) Tr. Th. p. 304.

(4) St. Bernard, cap. 9. Ledwich (Antiq. p. 438.) tells a monstrous lie, saying that St. Malachy, after his three years incumbency was driven from Armagh by the old family.

(5) Colgan has (AA. SS. at 27th March) a Life of this eminent prelate, which he collected from various sources. He vainly strives to show by means of some round-about calculations, that Gelasius was raised to the see of Armagh in 1136. It would be a waste of time to inquire into his modes of reckoning, and it is sufficient to observe that, as it is certain that St. Malachy did not get full possession of this see until the latter part of 1134, (see Chap. xxvi. §. 14.) as Colgan himself admits, (Tr. Th. p. 304.) Gelasius could not be a bishop of it before some time in 1137, (the year marked in the Annals of Mary's Abbey) whereas it is likewise certain, that St. Malachy held it for about three years after said part of 1134. What is here observed serves also to set aside a story, which Colgan has (Tr. Th. ib.) and which he repeats in the Life of Gelasius, (cap. 8.) viz. that Niell, or Niggellus, again seized upon the see in 1136, on the occasion of St. Malachy's retiring from it. But St. Malachy was still at Armagh himself in 1136. Nor does St. Bernard, who mentions the appointment of Gelasius, say a word about this second usurpation of Niggellus, but, on the contrary, states (cap. 8.) that, after he was forced to submit to St. Malachy, he was obliged also to remain quiet for the remainder of his life, quiescere de reliquo in omni subjectione. Had he made any second attempt, St. Bernard would not have spared him. Ware and Harris (Bishops at Gelasius) have the same story, having copied it from Colgan.

(6) Mac-Lieg, or, as he spells it, Mac-Leigh, is translated by Harris (ib.) son of the scholar. Others call him Mac-Liagh. Leighin signifies in Irish a scholar, as Liagh does a physician. Colgan observes, (Not. 2. Life of Gelasius) that he has been called, by antonomasia, the son of the poet. Dr. O'Connor quotes (Rer. Hib. Scriptor. 2. Proleg. p. 144.) a passage from Maolbrigte (see Not. 94 to Chap. xxi.) in which he is called Mac Liag mac mic Ruadri, as if grandson of Roderic, and Mac-Liag seems to be explained son of the man of poems.

(7) Ware (ib.) makes him an Augustin Canon, according to his supposition that the abbey of Derry belonged to that order. But that abbey existed for centuries before there were Augustin Canons in the world, and was of the order of Columb kill. He tells us elsewhere, that many of the old Irish monasteries adopted in later times the rule of the Canons of St. Augustin; but he would not have been able to prove, that it was received at Derry in the times of Gelasius. There was indeed a certain affinity between the rule of these new Canons, who did not appear until the eleventh century, and the old general system of the Irish monks, which was bottomed on the monastic regulations introduced by St. Patrick from Tours and Lerins; yet they were not originally the same, and the ancient Irish rules were much stricter than that of the Augustin Canons. Harris (ib.) says; "It is certain the abbey of Derry owed its filiation to the house of St. Peter and St. Paul of Armagh, which past question was of the Augustin congregation." The first part of this assertion is quite unfounded. How could the abbey of Derry, which was founded by Columb-kill in the sixth century, owe its filiation to a house, that did not exist till the twelfth? There is no authentic account of the house or monastery of St. Peter and Paul at Armagh, until its church was erected by Imar O'Haedhagain, and consecrated by Celsus in 1126. (See Chap. xxvi. §. 8.) And Ware (Antiq. cap. 26.) and Harris (Monasteries) were wrong in supposing, that it had been founded by St. Patrick. Archdall has terribly bungled and confused this matter, (at Armagh) placing a long string of abbots, and even archbishops, &c. ever since the days of St. Patrick in the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul, thus confounding it with the ancient religious house, which from the very beginning was annexed to the cathedral. He makes Imar abbot of it in 1100, that is several years before the church was built and consecrated, although it is certain from St. Bernard's account of him, that he was not one at that time. He might have acted as such afterwards, in consequence of having received several disciples besides St. Malachy, and thus have given rise to the community of Augustin Canons, which occupied the house of St. Peter and St. Paul. It has been pretended, that the abbey of Derry was a Benedictine house in the times of Gelasius, and therefore that he belonged to that order. This is a silly pretension of some Benedictine writers, who strove to persuade the world, that many of our old Irish monasteries were of their institution. The attachment of the Columbians, such as the monks of Derry were to Columbkill, was too strong to allow us to suppose, that they would easily have changed their rule for that of the Benedictines.

(8) The 4 Masters (ap. Colgan in his Life cap. 30.) have 16 years for his administration as successor of St. Columba. Hence Colgan concluded, that he was appointed abbot of Derry in 1120, on the supposition that he was removed to Armagh in 1136. But, as he was not removed until 1137, his appointment at Derry was not prior to 1121.

(9) 4 Masters at A. 1137, quoted by Colgan, AA. SS. p. 779.

(10) Life of Gelasius, cap. 5.

(11) 4 Masters, ap. Tr. Th. p. 308.

(12) See Ware and Harris at Archbishops of Cashel. The Annals of Innisfallen (at A. 1158) call him Donall O'Lonargan, and state that he was a Dalcassian.

§. II. St. Malachy, being now bishop of Down, began his new career with uniting some of his disciples into a congregation of Regular Clerks, apparently of the order called Canons Regular of St. Augustin. (13) He now exerted himself with fresh vigour, acting as a zealous bishop, enforcing monastic discipline, making ecclesiastical regulations, &c. Not long after his being stationed at Down he lost his brother Christian (Gilla-Criost) bishop of Clogher, who died in 1138, and was buried in the church of St. Peter and St. Paul at Armagh. His memory was revered on the 12th of June, the anniversary of his death. (14) In fact he was a very holy prelate, who, although not so celebrated as St. Malachy, was perhaps not unequal to him in sanctity of life and zeal for justice. (15) In what year he had been appointed bishop of Clogher I am not able to ascertain. (16) Moelpatrick O'Drughan, who had been chief professor of Armagh since 1107, (17) died in the said year 1138, on the 2d of January, in the island Inis-locha-cre, alias the Island of the living, whither he had gone some time before on a pilgrimage. (18) He is praised as a man highly distinguished for sanctity and great knowledge of the Holy scriptures. (19) In the same year Cormac Mac-Carthy, the friend of St. Malachy, was murdered by his own son in law, Dermod Sugach O'Connor Kerry, at the instigation of Turlogh O'Brian. (20) He was a prince remarkable for his piety and liberality, as indeed appears from various instances already mentioned. (21) That was also the year, in which Gelasius made his first visitation of various parts of Ireland, particularly Munster, where he was received with great honour. (22) Maelbrigid O'Brolchan, a very wise and pious man, suffragan bishop of Armagh, died on the 29th of January, A. D. 1139. (23) He had belonged to the monastery of Derry, and it is probable, that Gelasius invited him thence to assist him in the government of his diocese. To the same year is assigned the death of the unfortunate Niell, or Nigellus, who seems to have been one of the last of the usurping family, which soon became extinct, and who is represented as having died a great penitent. (24)

(13) St. Bernard (cap. 13.) calls the community, formed by St. Malachy, simply conventum regularium clericorum. It is highly probable, that he gave them the rule of the Canons regular of St. Augustin, who by this time were spread far and wide throughout various parts of Europe. But this is the first occasion that I meet with of their being mentioned, or seemingly mentioned, as being in Ireland. Yet there might have been some of them a few years earlier at St. Peter and St. Paul's at Armagh, (compare with Not. 7.) and Ware says, (see Not. 73 to Chap. xxvi.) that the abbey of St. Barr near Cork, founded about 1134, belonged to that order. But I much doubt, whether he found the members of this abbey called Augustin canons in any old document of those times. He was too much in the habit of giving the name of Augustin Canons, or Canons regular of St. Augustin, to our ancient monks. Thus he makes even Bangor from its very foundation in the sixth century an abbey of Augustin Canons. Hence it appears, that he was unacquainted with the true history and origin of these Canons, concerning which see Notes 133 and 134 to Chap. iv. I may here observe, by the bye, that Ware is wrong in assigning the original foundation of the monastery of St. Barr to about 1134. For it had existed since the seventh century, and whatever took place with regard to it in the twelfth consisted merely in its having been re-established or re-founded, as Archdall (at Cork) justly states, and perhaps in some alteration of its rules.

(14) See Tr. Th. p. 482. and AA. SS. p. 742. Ware thought, (Bishops of Clogher) that the year 1138, marked for his death, might have been in reality 1139. But at the times we are now treating of there is no necessity for adding a year to those of the Irish annals.

(15) St. Bernard, cap. 10. A great encomium is paid to him also by the 4 Masters, at A. 1138.

(16) Harris (Bishops of Clogher) assigns his promotion to A. 1126. I do not know what reason he had for this date except that in a list of distinguished persons of the church of Clogher (ap. AA. SS. p. 742.) one Muredach O'Cuillen, who was killed in 1126, is placed next before him. But this O'Cuillen is called only archdeacon of Clogher. Ware has (ib.) a Mac-Mael-Josa O'Cullean as bishop of Clogher and the immediate predecessor of Christian, but does not tell us in what year he died.

(17) See Chap. xxvi. §. 2.

(18) Tr. Th. p. 304 and Ind. Chron. The year of his death was the second of the incumbency of Gelasius, which confirms its having been A. D. 1138. Yet Colgan, persisting in his hypothesis of Gelasius having been raised to Armagh in 1136, has changed (Life of Gelasius, cap. 9.) 1138 into 1137, notwithstanding his assigning O'Drugin's death to 1138 in Tr. Th. locc. cit. Inislocha-cre is called also by other names, such as Monaincha, and is an island in the great bog of Monela, county of Tipperary, about three miles from Roscrea, and we shall have occasion to treat of it hereafter.

(19) Tr. Th. and Life of Gelasius, locc. citt.

(20) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1138.

(21) Dr. O'Connor (Rer. Hib. Scriptor. 2 Proleg. p. 141.) calls Cormac M'Carthy not only king but bishop of Munster. He quotes Maelbrigte, (of whom see Not. 94 to Chap. XXI.) who styles him rig escop Muman. But if escop mean bishop, as Dr. O'Connor thinks, it cannot in this passage be taken in a strict literal sense. Escop is not in several Irish dictionaries, ex. c. those of Lhuyd and O'Reilly, who have no other word for bishop than easbog or easbug. O'Brien, however, has, besides easbog, also eascop. Yet, admitting that rig escop signifies king bishop, either Maelbrigte was mistaken, or, what is more probable, he gave Cormac the title of bishop in an honorary manner on account of his piety and attention to ecclesiastical matters, similar to that, in which Constantine the great was styled bishop. Or, perhaps, escop indicates an allusion to his having taken a pilgrim's staff at Lismore. (See Not. 57 to Chap. XXVI.) That Cormac Mac-Carthy was not a real bishop is evident from the Annals of Innisfallen, which often make mention of him, as a king, a warrior, &c. Had he been also a bishop, it is impossible but that we would find him so called somewhere in said annals. Or would not St. Bernard, who speaks so highly of him, have told us that he was not only a king but a bishop? Keating relates (History, &c. B. 2. p. 103. Dublin ed.) his murder; and Lynch (Cambr. evers. cap. 21.) treats of him rather minutely; but neither of them has a word about his having been a bishop.

(22) Life of Gelasius, cap. 10. This is mentioned also in Tr. Th. p. 305. where, through a typographical error, 1139 appears instead of 1138, which, as O'Flaherty observes, (MS. not. ib.) is the year marked by the 4 Masters.

(23) Ib. cap. 11, and Tr. Th. p. 305.

(24) Ib. St. Bernard states, (Vit. S. Mal. cap. 8.) that the whole of that generation was swept away within a short time after their attempts against St. Malachy.

§. III. Crowds of people of various ranks flocked to St. Malachy at Down, and placed themselves under his direction. Having established several ecclesiastical regulations, he thought it not safe to act upon them without the authority of the Apostolic see, and was particularly anxious to procure for the see of Armagh the pallium, with which it had not at any time been as yet honoured. (25) He thought that, as it had become very usual in those times to distinguish metropolitan sees by the use of it, Armagh ought to enjoy the same privilege, as an ancient church, and not inferior in respectability to most of the other metropolitan ones. He wished also to obtain another for the see of Cashel and to get confirmed by the Pope the act of Celsus, who had raised it to the metropolitanical rank. (26) Consequently he determined on going to Rome, but was strenuously opposed by the brethren and the chiefs and people of the country, who could not bear the idea of his absence, particularly as his brother Christian of Clogher had died a short time before; and they dreaded some great desolation, if after having lost one pillar of the Church the country should be deprived of the assistance of the other. At length, however, he succeeded in their letting him depart; but, before he set out, he provided for the see of Clogher by appointing to it and consecrating Edan or Aedan, one of his disciples, whom he considered the fittest person for that situation. Edan is surnamed O'Kelly or O'Killedy, and held that see for many years. (27) St. Malachy took his route by the way of England, after having landed in Scotland. When arrived at York, he was recognized by a holy priest, named Sycar, who had never seen him before, but to whom it had been revealed that he was to pass that way. Wallely, or Wallen, a nobleman, and then prior of a community of Regular brethren, waited upon St. Malachy at York, and observing that he had a large suite, among whom were five priests, and only three horses, offered him the one he rode himself, which the saint accepted of. Continuing his journey, and travelling through France, he stopped for a while at Clairvaux, where he became acquainted with St. Bernard, who was most highly delighted by his society. St. Malachy was much pleased with this establishment, and the brethren were greatly edified by his presence and conversation. Taking his leave of St. Bernard and the brethren with the warmest feelings of attachment, he pursued his course towards Italy, and having crossed the Alps wrought a miracle at Ivrea by curing a child of his host, that was at the point of death. (28)

(25) St. Bernard, ib. cap. 10. Joceline among other fables of his concerning St. Patrick pretends, that he received the pallium at Rome. This nonsense has been sufficiently refuted already, Chap. VII. §. 1. and ib. Not. 2. Colgan, however, swallowed it, and has endeavoured in a really unlearned manner to support it, Tr. Th. p. 306. seqq. But I was surprised to find that M^cMahon, who lived in times when the origin and nature of the pallium, as granted to archbishops or bishops, were so universally known, could have undertaken to defend this silly paradox in various parts of his Jus primatiale Armacanum, particularly §. 219. seqq. Surely he ought to have been aware, that in St. Patrick's days the pallium, of which we are now treating, was not used in the Western church even by the Popes themselves; and it is a very lame evasion to say, that, although it ceased to be sent to the archbishops of Armagh during the Danish troubles, yet they had received it in the first times of that church. Now St. Bernard writes; "Metropoliticae sedi deerat adhuc et defuerat ab initio pallii usus." Here M^cMahon comes forward with a wretched quibble, distinguishing ab initio from in initio, as if St. Patrick's times were to be exempted from the general and plain assertion of St. Bernard. By why thus exempt them, whereas the pallium was not introduced into the Western church until many years after St. Patrick's death? But, if M^cMahon argued badly on this point, Peter Talbot of Dublin, against whom he wrote, was no less or rather more to blame for striving in his Primatus Dubliniensis to conclude from the want of the pallium, that therefore Armagh was not the primatial see of Ireland. Did he not know, that various gradations of ecclesiastical authority existed before the pallium was used, and that there have been hundreds of metropolitans, who never wore it? St. Ambrose of Milan, who received no pallium, enjoyed as much jurisdiction as if he had been decorated with twenty of them. Nothing is clearer from the whole tenor of our ecclesiastical history than that the see of Armagh was the only truly metropolitan one until Cashel was added to it, yet as subordinate. (See Chap. xxv. §. 13.) St. Bernard is quite explicit on this subject, where mentioning an injunction of Celsus he says; (Vit. S. Mal. cap. 7.) “Sancti Patricii auctoritate præcepit, cujus reverentia et honore tamquam apostoli illius gentis, qui totam patriam convertisset ad fidem, sedes illa, in qua et vivens præfuit et mortuus requiescit, in tanta ab initio cunctis veneratione habetur, ut non modo episcopi et sacerdotes, et qui de clero sunt, sed etiam regum ac principum universitas subjecta sit metropolitanæ in omni obedientia (ecclesiastica), et unus ipse omnibus præsit.” Poor Ledwich took upon himself to meddle with this question (Antiq. p. 391.) where amidst lies and inconsistencies he quotes against the primacy of Armagh a passage of William Neubrigensis, who says, that “the prime see of Ireland is said to be at Arnagh in honour of St. Patrick, &c. Is not this a proof of its having been so? But, he argues, the words, is said, show that William knew nothing of Armagh but from report. Be it so; for he was an Englishman. Does it follow, that the report was false? What think of a scribbler, who pretends, that St. Patrick was not heard of at Armagh until the 9th century, when introduced by the Danes?

(26) St. Bernard, ib. That the new metropolis alluded to by him was Cashel, has been proved, Not. 84 to Chap. xxv.

(27) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Clogher.

(28) St. Bernard ib.

§. iv. St. Malachy, being arrived in Rome, waited on the then Pope Innocent II. by whom he was most kindly received. The first favour he asked of him was permission to retire to Clairvaux, and to spend there the remainder of his life; but this the Pope refused to agree to. During the time of his stay at Rome, which was one month, he visited the holy places, frequenting them for the sake of prayer.

Meanwhile the Pope made many enquiries from him and his companions concerning the manners and customs of the Irish, the state of their churches, and how St. Malachy had exerted himself. He then appointed him Legate apostolic for all Ireland; for Gillebert, the former one, had communicated to the Pope, that on account of his great age and feebleness he was no longer able to attend to the duties of that office. St. Malachy then applied for the confirmation of the new metropolitan see, (Cashel) which the Pope immediately granted; but on his applying also for the palliums, the Pope replied; "This is a matter, which must be transacted with greater solemnity. Do you, summoning the bishops and clergy and the chiefs of your country, celebrate a general council, and, after ye will have all agreed on this point, apply for the pallium by means of respectable persons, and it shall be given to you." (29) Then taking the mitre off his head he placed it on that of St. Malachy, and gave him the stole and maniple, which he used to wear when officiating; and saluting him in the kiss of peace dismissed him with his benediction. Were we to believe the Registry of Clogher, St. Malachy obtained from this Pope, that the fourth part of the ecclesiastical property or dues throughout all Ergall or Oriel should be assigned to the bishops of Clogher, which was situated in that territory. I doubt very much, whether the saint, who, as will be seen, had no fixed income for himself, asked for any such favour. (30) On his return to Ireland he called again at Clairvaux, and regretting that he was not allowed to remain there, left four of his companions in the monastery for the purpose of learning its rules and regulations, and of their being in due time qualified to introduce them into Ireland. He said on this occasion; "They will serve us for seed, and in this seed nations will be blessed, even those nations, which from old times have heard of the name of monk, but have not seen a monk." (31) Proceeding on his journey he arrived safely in Scotland, where he was honourably received by the king, David, and requested by him to cure his son Henry, who was dangerously ill. The saint blessed some water, and sprinkled Henry with it, saying to him; Child, take courage, thou wilt not die this time; and on the next day he recovered his health. Hence both David and Henry became greatly attached to St. Malachy, and continued so as long as he lived. Anxious to arrive soon in Ireland he declined their invitation to remain with them for some days, and on his way to the place of embarkation cured a dumb girl and an insane woman. Being delayed at that place, which was called Lapasperi, for some days, waiting for a passage, he constructed an oratory there, which he surrounded with a trench, and blessed the intermediate space, that it might serve as a cemetery. This spot was afterwards much resorted to, as a place of prayer, and where favours might be obtained from the Almighty. (32)

(29) St. Bernard, cap. 11. The Pope's object was to show, that the granting of palliums should be considered as a great favour, and that the obtaining of them required more than the request of any individual bishop. The rule, requiring that every archbishop should be invested with the pallium, was not as yet established. In what passed between the Pope and St. Malachy on this occasion there is not the most distant allusion to the strange story of the saint's reason for wishing to get palls for Ireland having been to get rid of the claims of Canterbury. (Compare with Not. 85. to Chap. xxiv.) It is laughable to hear Ledwich (p. 438.) resting the Pope's refusal to grant the pallium on his apprehension that the wearer would be insulted by the Irish clergy. So ignorant was he of the history of the transaction, that (ib.) he represents St. Malachy as archbishop of Armagh, when he applied for the palls, although he had left Armagh two or three years before that time, and was then only bishop of Down.

(30) This statement may be seen in Ware and Harris's (Bishops of Clogher at Christian). If true, it is odd, that St. Bernard has not a word about it, notwithstanding his making mention both of Christian and Edan. I suspect it is on a par with the pretty list of bishops of Clogher, which we find in said Registry. (See Not. 5. to Chap. XII.)

(31) St. Bernard, ib. It is difficult to determine, whether by the nations, who had not seen a monk, St. Malachy meant nations different from the Irish, among whom the order of Clairvaux would be propagated, or alluded to some parts of Ireland, in which there had not been monks before for a long time, but in which communities of that order would be placed. Be this as it may, neither he nor St. Bernard could have meant all Ireland; for they well knew, that there had been and was still abundance of monasteries in Ireland, and St. Bernard himself makes mention of many of them, particularly in older times. Ledwich (p. 439) misquoting St. Bernard's words carps at him as if he alluded to all Ireland, and adds in confirmation the following words from a letter of his, written some time after to St. Malachy (No. 44. in Usher's Sylloge, and 357 in Mabillon's ed. Tom. 1.) "et in terra jam (tam, Mabillon) insueta, immo et inexperta monasticæ religionis." But St. Bernard is not speaking there of all Ireland, but of a particular spot, (Mellifont) where a monastery was formed by Cistercians sent over by him, and where there had not been already any monks; and therefore he says, that great vigilance is requisite there, tanquam in loco novo, et in terra, &c. Ledwich omitted the words, loco novo, lest the reader might understand in what sense St. Bernard used terra, by which he meant not Ireland at large but some particular district.

(32) St. Bernard, ib.

§. v. At length after a prosperous passage he arrived at his monastery of Bangor. With what joy he was welcomed there and by the people, who flocked from various parts to see him, it would be superfluous to relate. This was in the year 1140.

(33) By this time Gillebert of Limerick either was dead, or had resigned his see; for we find in that year a new bishop of Limerick, Patrick, who, owing to the influence of the Danes, was consecrated by

Theobald archbishop of Canterbury, to whom he made the following profession ; “ I Patrick, chosen “ to the government of the church of Limerick,
“ and to be consecrated bishop, through the grace
“ of God, by thee, Reverend father Theobald, “ archbishop of the holy church of Canterbury, and “ primate of all Britain, do promise, that I will pay “ due subjection and canonical obedience in every “ respect to thee and to all thy successors, who shall “ succeed thee canonically.” Concerning him I find nothing further, except that he is said to have held the see for only a short time, and to have been succeeded by one Harold a Dane. (34) In the same year 1140 Gelasius of Armagh made a visitation throughout Connaught, and was treated with great respect by the king, Turlogh O’Conor, and the nobles of the country, who allowed him full liberty to arrange and regulate ecclesiastical matters as he thought proper. (35) St. Malachy now set about performing the duties of his legateship ; held, or procured to be held, synods in various places ; re-established good old practices, and introduced new ones ; while every one submitted to his regulations as if they were dictated by heaven. He went all over Ireland, travelling on foot with his companions, and exercising his ministry, preaching &c. Whenever it was necessary to rest, he used to stop in monasteries, adapting himself to their practices and observances, and content with the usual fare of the respective communities. He had no house of his own, no servants, no fixed mensal income. (36) Some time after his return to Ireland he sent some persons to Clairvaux, besides the four whom he had left there, that they also might be instructed in the system of that establishment. (37) On this occasion he wrote to St. Bernard, requesting that he would allow two of those four brethren to return to Ireland, that they might provide a place for a monastery ; but St. Bernard answered, that he thought it adviseable not to separate them so soon, and to allow them time to be better prepared ; and that in the mean while St. Malachy himself might look out for and prepare a proper place for that purpose. When, he adds, they shall be duly qualified, they shall return to their father and sing the canticles of the Lord in their own country. (38)

(33) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1140.

(34) See Ware and Harris, Bishops of Limerick. The original of Patrick's profession is in Usher's Sylloge, and is the only one of any bishop of that sec. It is also the last of the professions of any Irish bishops made to archbishops of Canterbury.

(35) Life of Gelassius, cap. 12.

(36) St. Bernard, Vit. S. Mal. cap. 12. following the order of Messingham's edition. What is here said of St. Malachy not having had any fixed mensal income, or, as St. Bernard expresses it, that nothing was assigned for the episcopal mensa, on which the bishop might live, cannot mean, that there was no property really belonging to the see of Down, but that St. Malachy, who delighted in poverty, did not choose to exact the mensal portion from the erenachs or corbes, who had got the church lands into their possession and management. (See Not. 63. to Chap. xxvi.) In like manner he refused (ib. §. 9.) to accept of the lands, that had belonged to the monastery of Bangor, and allowed them to be enjoyed by a corbe. Even while archbishop of Armagh he possessed no property peculiar to himself; for St. Bernard states, (ib.) that from the first day of his conversion until his death he lived without any thing of his own, sine proprio vixit. Now it is certain, that there was property, and that considerable, annexed to the see of Armagh; otherwise how could the usurping family have been so eager to keep hold of it, or why should Maurice, and then Niell or Nigellus, have seized upon it after the death of Celsus? But whatever share was due to the bishop personally, St. Malachy gave it up; yet it cannot be supposed, that the rents or dues necessary for the expenses of the cathedral, the support of the officiating clergy, the repairs of churches, &c. were not exacted. All that St. Malachy could or would do was to resign his own peculiar portion, which he probably ordered to be assigned to the stock intended for the poor.

(37) St. Bernard, ib. Cap. 11.

(38) St. Bernard's letter in reply to St. Malachy is No. 42. in Usher's Sylloge, and 341. in Mabillon's edition of St. Bernard's works, Vol. 1. Usher assigns it to A. D. 1140; but I think it must have been somewhat later; for it can hardly be allowed, that St. Malachy, who did not return to Ireland until that year, after having but lately left the four brethren at Clairvaux, could have so soon wished for the return of two of them. But Usher supposed that St. Malachy had been at Clairvaux in 1137, a date in which it is evident that he was mistaken. Very probably it was written in 1141.

§. VI. Some other letters passed between these holy men on this subject, and St. Bernard, anxious to gratify his friend's wish, as soon as convenient, sent over the Irish brethren under Christian one of themselves as their superior, who was brother to Malchus a former disciple of St. Malachy at Bangor.

(39) He sent along with them also some of the monks of Clairvaux, so as to make up a sufficient number of members for constituting a monastery.

(40) It was then that the Cistercian house of Mellifont in the now county of Louth, the first of that order in Ireland, was founded in 1142, and endowed by Donogh or Donatus O'Carrol, king of Ergall or Oriel.

(41) Some of the French brethren returned soon after to Clairvaux, although St. Bernard would have been better pleased if they had remained. He mentions with much satisfaction one of them, named Robert, who staid at Mellifont.

(42) In the same year 1142 died a worthy and very learned priest, Cathasach O'Kirchaorach, who had been professor of theology at Armagh.

(43) In said year Conor O'Brian, who had been very powerful during part of his reign, died at Killaloe, whither he had retired to spend his last days in pilgrimage, and was succeeded, as king of Munster, by his brother Turlogh. (44) A great quarrel existed in these times between Turlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught, and Murrogh O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, to put an end to which Gelasius of Armagh and some other prelates were fixed upon as arbitrators. They succeeded in concluding a treaty, in the year 1143, between those princes before the altar of St. Kieran (at Clonmacnois) and many reliques of saints. But some time after, notwithstanding this agreement, O'Conor made an irruption into Meath, and took O'Melaghlin, as if he were guilty of a violation of the treaty, whom he placed as a prisoner in the castle of Dunmore. On this news Gelasius hastened to Connaught, and uniting with Muredach O'Dubhthaich, the worthy bishop of Tuam, the abbot of Fore, and several other distinguished persons, both ecclesiastics and laymen, induced O'Conor to allow the matter to be inquired into, as it was not right that O'Melaghlin should be punished in that manner, unless he were really guilty. Nothing was proved against him; but still O'Conor refused to enlarge him, except on condition of his giving up his principality of Meath for a while to Conor O'Conor a son of Turlogh. This condition, however disagreeable to the prelates, was accepted by O'Melaghlin; but Conor did not long enjoy his usurped power; for within little more than half a year he was killed by O'Dubhlach, chieftain of Fera-Tulach (now the barony of Fertullagh in Westmeath), who could not bear to be subjected to any prince different from his lawful one. (45) A great synod, consisting chiefly of the clergy of Connaught, is stated to have been held in 1143, over which Muredach O'Dubhthaich of Tuam presided. It is said that twelve bishops and five hundred priests were present at it, and that its principal object was to procure the liberation of Roderic O'Conor, son of Turlogh, who happened to be then a captive. (46) Another synod is mentioned as having sat in 1144, in which were present the archbishop of Armagh (Geladius), O'Lonergan (either the archbishop of Cashel or the bishop of Killaloe), the bishop of Roscommon, the king Turlogh O'Conor, &c. and in consequence of which Roderic O'Conor and others recovered their their liberty. (47) This was in all probability no other than the assembly, in which, as we have just seen, Geladius and others stipulated for the enlargement of O'Melaghlin. At this year 1144, I find marked the death of a bishop of Leighlin, Shuagad O'Catan, (48) and that of Gilla-Patrick Mac-Comgall, a very learned priest, scholastic of Clonard. (49)

(39) See Chap. xxvi. §. 9.

(40) St. Bernard, Vit. S. Mal. cap. 11. See also his letters to St. Malachy, No. 43, 44, in the Sylloge, and 356, 357 in Maillon's ed.

(41) Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at County Louth. The Annals (the same as those of Mary's Abbey) quoted by Usher (Not. to Ep. 43. Sylloge) have the same date and circumstances. Hence it appears, that those were mistaken, who calculated, that Mellifont was founded in 1141, for instance Fleury, Hist. L. 68. §. 59. This mistake proceeded from another, viz. that St. Malachy had returned to Ireland in 1139. But they were not mistaken in stating, (see Fleury's Index) that the abbey of Mellifont was the first Cistercian one in Ireland, as is quite clear from St. Malachy's speaking of the brethren, whom he left at Clairvaux, as the persons who would introduce that order into Ireland, and from St. Bernard's representing (Vit. S. Mal. cap. 11.) the community under Christian, that is, the abbey of Mellifont, as the parent of the other Cistercian houses in this country. Therefore what Ware has, (ib. at Dublin) and which he took from the Annals of Mary's Abbey, viz. that this abbey adopted the Cistercian rule in 1139, in imitation of the abbot of Savonac or Savigni in France, cannot be true; whereas there were no Cistercians in Ireland until three years after that date. Besides, the abbey of Savigni was not Cistercian itself until 1148. (Fleury, ib. L. 69. §. 35.) Ledwich, who knew not how to be correct, says, (Antiq. p. 438.) that St. Malachy introduced the Cistercian order into this kingdom in 1140, and settled it at Mellifont, Newry, Bective, Boyle, Balinglas, Nenagh, and Cashel. Now this order was not at Mellifont until 1142, which he might have known from Usher, Ware, Harris, Archdall, &c. There was no Cistercian abbey at or near Cashel until about A. D. 1270, above 120 years after St. Malachy's death. Nenagh, the well known town in the county of Tipperary, never had a Cisterian establishment; but Ledwich con-founded it with Nenay, a place in the county of Limerick, where there was one, the time of whose foundation some place after the death of the saint, which, as will be seen was founded that of Newry, notwithstanding Usher's having thought (Not. to Ep. 43.) that it was established about 1144, which he took from a mistake of Ware in his Coenob. Cisterciensia. When St. Bernard was writing the Life of St. Malachy, there were only five Cistercian houses in Ireland besides Mellifont; (see ib. cap. 11.) yet Ledwich reckons up six before St. Malachy's death. What an antiquary!

(42) See Ep. 44. al. 357. (43) Tr. Th. p. 305.

(44) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1142.

(45) Life of Gelasius, cap. 13. and Tr. Th. p. 305. In the former place Colgan marks these transactions at A. 1143, and in the latter at 1144. This can be easily reconciled by supposing, that the assembly, in which the treaty was entered into by Tur-lough O'Connor and O'Melaghlin was held in 1143, and the other, in consequence of which O'Melaghlin recovered his liberty, in 1144.

(46) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1143. This synod must have been different from the assembly, in which Gelasius of Armagh appeared in 1143 as one of the arbitrators between Turlogh O'Connor and O'Melaghlin; for the Annals make no mention of Gelasius, and represent it as presided by O'Dubhthaich, which could hardly have been the case, were Gelasius present. I do not well understand what said Annals have about Roderic O'Connor's captivity; but Harris (Bishops at Tuam, Muredach O'Dubhai) says, from certain anonymous Annals, that he had been taken prisoner by Tiernan O'Roirk.

(47) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1144.

(48) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Leighlin. Harris has (at Meath) one Eochad O'Kelly, who, according to certain anonymous annals, is called archbishop of the men of Meath, and died in 1140. And (at Kildare) he introduces Cormac O'Cathsuig, who is styled bishop of Leinster, and whose death is assigned to 1146. From the title, bishop of Leinster, it does not follow, that he was bishop of Kildare; for it may mean merely that he was a Leinster bishop, that is, a bishop somewhere in that province. In fact, Colgan makes no mention of him in his catalogue of bishops, &c. of Kildare, Tr. Th. p. 630. Of these two bishops I can find nothing further than what Harris says of them.

(49) AA. SS. p. 407.

§. VII. Gelasius, having laboured for the restoration of peace and tranquillity, now set about repairing the cathedral of Armagh and the adjoining sacred edifices. (50) Meanwhile St. Malachy was busily employed in various parts of Ireland, exercising the functions of his legatine authority; and it is related, that during his excursions he wrought several miracles. At Coleraine, Lismore, and other places, he delivered persons possessed with evil spirits; he cured paralytics, one instance of which occurred at Cashel, and relieved many persons afflicted with divers infirmities. At Cloyne being requested by a nobleman, whose lady was pregnant and having passed the usual time of labour, was supposed to be in danger of her life, and by the bishop Nehemias (O'Moriertach) to do something for her, he blessed a drink, which he ordered to be given to her, and in consequence of which she was soon after safely delivered. Happening to be in an island somewhere off the the Irish coast, near which the sea, from having once abounded in fish, was then very deficient in that respect, St. Malachy was supplicated by the inhabitants to obtain from the Almighty a larger supply. Having told them that he came among them to catch not fish but men, he, however, moved by their faith, prayed to God in favour of them, who was pleased to restore to that part of the sea an abundance of fish, greater perhaps than what it formerly had. On a certain occasion St. Malachy, with three other bishops, came to Fochart, the place where St. Brigid was born. (51) The priest, in whose house they stopped, said to him; "what shall I do, for I have no fish?" The saint desired him to apply to the fishermen, to which he answered, that for two years back the river had been destitute of fish. Yet, replied St. Malachy, let them cast their nets in the name of the Lord. They did so, and at the first throw took twelve salmons, and at the second as many more. A very remarkable case is narrated in nearly the following words. The wife of a nobleman, who lived near the monastery of Bangor, being sick past hopes of recovery, St. Malachy was asked to administer to her the sacrament of Extreme unction. He went to the house; but, as he was preparing to anoint her, his assistants thought that, as it was then evening, it would be better to wait until the next morning. (52) He followed their advice, and giving her his blessing retired. But scarcely had he left the house, (53) when he heard shouts and cries announcing, that she was dead. He immediately ran back, followed by his companions, and, when at the bed-side he ascertained that she had expired, became sorely troubled in mind, imputing to himself that she had not received the grace of the sacrament. Lifting his hands towards heaven he said; "O Lord, I have acted foolishly, I have sinned, who deferred administering, not she, who wished for it." He then declared, that he could not enjoy any comfort or peace of mind, unless that grace might be granted to her. Ordering his companions to watch and pray, as they did singing psalms, &c. he remained the whole night near the bed, praying and pouring out floods of tears. When morning came, she opened her eyes, as if awaking out of a heavy sleep, and raising herself on the bed saluted St. Malachy. Great was the joy and admiration on this occurrence; and the saint returned thanks to God. He then anointed her, and she recovered so as to live for some time after, and to prepare herself for a happy death by a good confession and by the performance of the penance, which he enjoined on her. (54)

(50) Life of Gelasius, cap. 14. and Tr. Th. p. 305.

(51) See Chap. VIII. §. 2.

(52) Probably the reason of this opinion was, that it was thought more becoming that the sacraments should not, except in cases of urgent necessity, be administered by the clergy unless fasting. In Butler's Life of St. Malachy, the cause assigned for waiting until morning is, that she might then be better disposed for the sacrament. But St. Bernard, who is the only authority on this subject, assigns no other motive than that it was evening, erat enim vespera.

(53) In Butler's Life St. Malachy is represented as having retired to a chamber in the nobleman's house. If so, his companions also must have had chambers allotted for them in said house. Now it would not have been consistent with the rules of monastic discipline for monks to stay out of their monastery at night without necessity; and in this case there was no particular necessity for doing so, as the monastery was so near the house that, if called for, they could be there in a very short time. St. Bernard's words plainly indicate, that St. Malachy and his companions had left the house; "exiit cum his, qui secum erant."

(54) St. Bernard, Vit. S. Mal. cap. 13. Messingham's ed. 24. Mabillon's. The other miraculous facts which I have touched upon, and several others, are related by him in said cap. 13. (Messingham) although by oversight or through a typographical error marked 8. In a part of said chapter, or cap. 21. (Mabillon) Cloyne is erroneously called Duenvania or Duevania, instead of Chuenvania.

§. VIII. St. Malachy happened to be somewhere near Cork at a time that the see of that city was vacant. On the election of a bishop, a great contest arose, which when he heard of he repaired to Cork. Summoning the clergy and people, he strove to unite the discordant parties, and induced them to leave the matter to himself as being invested with the legatine power. He immediately named not any one of the nobles of that country, but a poor man, a native of a different part of Ireland, whom he knew to be holy and learned. This man is looked for, and the account given of him was, that he was lying in bed so weak, that he could not stir out except carried by others. The saint said; "Let him rise in the name of the Lord; I command him; obedience will cure him." What could the man do? He was unwilling to obey, and, even were he strong, was afraid to be made a bishop. Yet not knowing how to resist St. Malachy's order, and wishing for his health, he exerted himself to get up, and gradually felt himself becoming stronger and soon able to walk with ease. When he appeared before the assembly, he was placed on the episcopal chair with the acclamations of the clergy and people. (55) The name of this worthy bishop is not mentioned; but I think there can be no doubt, that he was the same as the celebrated Gilla Aeda O'Mugin, who was a truly good and learned man, and who afterwards assisted at the council of Kells in 1152. He was a stranger in Cork, being a native of Connaught, and belonged to the monastery, called of St. Finbar's cave, near that city, and which, according to some writers, was at that time possessed by Canons regular of St. Augustin. (56) St. Malachy being at Lismore met with a clerk there, a man it is said of good conduct, who denied the real presence in the sacrament of the Eucharist. He often expostulated with him in private, but could not induce him to retract his error. This clerk was at length brought, but not in a public manner, by some laymen to a meeting of clerical persons in the presence of St. Malachy, and allowed to defend himself. Notwithstanding his being fully refuted by St. Malachy, and the unanimous opinion of the meeting against him, he still remained obstinate, pretending that he was worsted not by argument but by the bishop's (St. Malachy's) authority. The saint much grieved for his obduracy, and dreading some injury to the Catholic faith, found it necessary to summon a general assembly of the church, before which this man was made to appear. Although publicly admonished by St. Malachy, and earnestly requested by the other bishops, who attended, and all the clergy, to recant his error, he still persisted in it, so that they were obliged to anathematize him and declare him a heretic. Still determined not to submit he said, that they were all favouring the man, not the truth. Well then, replied St. Malachy, may the Lord make thee confess the truth, even through necessity; to which he answered Amen, or be it so. Thus the assembly broke up, after which he resolves on quitting Lismore, where he knew he would be looked upon as infamous. But he had not gone far, when he was seized with a sudden illness and forced to throw himself on the ground. A wandering idiot, who was passing that way, asked him what was the matter with him. He said that he was so ill, that he was not able to go forward or to return. The idiot then helped him back to his habitation, and the man's sentiments were so changed, that the bishop is sent for, to whom he acknowledges that he had been in error, which he retracts, and confesses the truth. He is then reconciled to the Church, makes his confession and is absolved, asks for the holy viaticum, which he receives, and very soon after departs this life. (57)

(55) St. Bernard, ib. cap. 13. or 23. Mabillon.

(56) This monastery has been mentioned above Not. 13, and also Not. 73, to Chap. xxvi. It is to be observed, that it was founded, or rather re-founded, for strangers from Connaught as the countrymen of St. Finbarr. (See Archdall at Cork.) Gilla Aeda O'Mugin is reckoned among its abbots, and from him it has been called Gill-abbey; but it is probable, that he did not assume the government of it until after he was bishop; and thus we may answer the only objection, that can be brought against his having been the same as the poor man spoken of by St. Bernard; for, it may be said, had he been an abbot before he became bishop of Cork, would St. Bernard have called him merely a poor man, while contrasting him with the nobles of the country? Ware distinguishes (Bishops of Cork) Gilla Aeda O'Mugin from the person mentioned by St. Bernard, probably on account of his thinking that this person was appointed bishop by St. Malachy about 1140, and his supposing that this might be too early a date for Gilla Aeda, who held the see until 1172. But St. Bernard says nothing about the time of that appointment, and it might have been six or seven years later than what Ware imagined. Perhaps he was moved also by St. Bernard's calling that man an alienigena, as if he meant to say a foreigner, as in fact Harris (ib.) has falsely translated it. But it is plain from the context, that St. Bernard styled him alienigena for no other reason than that he was not a native of the diocese of Cork; and this answers quite well for Gilla Aeda O'Mugin, who was from Connaught.

(57) St. Bernard, ib. cap. 13, Messingham; 26. Mabil'on.

§. ix. The man, whom St. Malachy had allowed to possess the lands belonging to the monastery of Bangor, (58) was constantly hostile to him and his disciples, and used to find fault with all his proceedings. He had an only son, who imitated him, particularly on one occasion. St. Malachy having undertaken to construct at Bangor a stone oratory, like those which he had seen in other countries, and begun to lay the foundation of it, some of the inhabitants wondered at it, because stone buildings were unusual in that part of Ireland. (59) That young man not only wondered, but became enraged, and by means of whisperings and detractions induced several persons to join him in preventing the execution of the work. On their going to the spot, he addressed St. Malachy with much insolence, saying; "Good man, why have you taken it into your head to introduce this novelty into our country? We are Scots, not Frenchmen. What folly! What necessity is there for this superfluous and superb edifice? Where will you get money towards the completion of it? Who will see it finished? Stop then, desist from this madness; otherwise we will put a stop to it." Little did he know how unable he was to effectuate his threat, in which he was left alone; for the others, who went with him, had, on seeing St. Malachy, changed their minds. The saint replied; "Wretched man, the work, which you now see begun, will certainly be completed, and many will see it so; but you shall not, and beware lest you die in your sin." In fact he died in the course of that year before the oratory was finished. Meanwhile his father, being informed of what St. Malachy had foretold concerning him, said; "He has killed my son;" and denounced him to the duke and chief men of Ulidia, in which territory Bangor was situated, as a liar, &c. and abused him with the nickname of ape. St. Malachy did not answer a word; but on the same day the unfortunate man, having returned home, lost his reason and fell into the fire, out of which he was dragged not without the burning of a part of his body. St. Malachy called to see him, and found him in a dreadful ungovernable state; but on his praying for him the man opened his eyes, and recovered the use of his reason; but it seems that he was afterwards subject to certain intervals of insanity. Having become unfit to manage the lands, with which he had been entrusted, they reverted to the monastery. (60) St. Malachy really had nothing to enable him to erect the oratory, but he confided in Providence and fortunately discovered a sum of money, which had been hid in the very spot, where the building was undertaken ; and he gave orders, that it should be all expended on the work. It is stated, that he saw in a vision a model of an oratory, and that he followed it in the construction of this edifice. It is added, that he had a similar vision with regard to not only the oratory but likewise the entire monastery of Saul. (61)

(58) See Chap. xxvi. §. 9.

(59) We have seen already, that long before this period there were buildings of stone in other parts of Ireland. An instance of them is Cormac's Chapel at Cashel, and a much older one was the ancient church of Duleek, which got its name, Dam-liag, from its house or church of stone. Harris had no right to say (Bishops p. 56.) that the stone oratory of Bangor is said to have been the first of that sort in Ireland.

(60) St. Bernard, ib. cap. 14, Messingham ; 28, Mabillon.

(61) Ib.

§. x. This monastery of Saul in the county of Down might seem one of those five Cistercian establishments, which St. Bernard says had been derived from Mellifont. (62) But it is not reckoned among the Cistercian monasteries, and seems to have belonged to the Canons Regular of St. Augustin after it had been erected, or rather, as usually said, repaired by St. Malachy. (63) The monastery, which he calls Suriense, or Suriam, was undoubtedly one of them, and, in all probability, the oldest next after Mellifont. I think it cannot be doubted, that it was somewhere near the river Suir. (64) As St. Malachy was passing through a town not far from it, where he was surrounded by a great crowd of people, he descried among them a young man, who had got upon a stone to see him, and was eying him with great attention. The saint immediately perceived that he was of a good disposition, and on the following night told the brethren what he foresaw concerning him. After two or three days a nobleman, the master of that young man, brought him to St. Malachy and requested that he would, according to his wish, admit him among his followers. St. Malachy received him with pleasure, and entrusted him to the abbot Congan, who recommended him to the brethren of Surium, in which, in all appearance, Congan was the abbot. (65) The said young man was the first conversus, or lay-brother of that monastery, and led a holy life according to the Cistercian institution. (66) St. Malachy rebuilt or repaired his cathedral of Down, but in what year I do not find mentioned. (67) In 1148 he consecrated the church, under the names of St. Peter and Paul, of the monastery or Knock-na-Sengan, since called Knock abbey, near Louth, which was founded and endowed for Augustin Canons by Donogh O'Carrol, prince of Oriel, and Edan O'Kelly or O'Killedy, bishop of Clogher. (68) St. Malachy was uneasy about the palliums, and was sorry that they had not been applied for during the life-time of Innocent II. who had promised to give them. Innocent died in 1143; his successor Celestine II. held the pontificate for less than six months; and after him Lucius II. for little more than eleven months, on whose death in February, 1145, Eugene III. was placed on the Holy see. This Pope had been a monk of Clairvaux and a disciple of St. Bernard. St. Malachy had therefore a good right to suppose, that he would be favourable to his wish for obtaining the palliums, and thought it adviseable, that the opportunity of a journey of the Pope to France should be seized upon. Accordingly a synod is convoked by St. Malachy and Gelasius of Armagh to be held in the year 1148 in the church of Inis-Patrick, (Holmpatrick) which was attended by 15 bishops, 200 priests, and many of the inferior clergy. (69) Having sat for three days, and made many useful regulations, the business relative to the palliums was treated of on the fourth. It was agreed to, but a wish was expressed that St. Malachy should not be the messenger. Yet, as he was inclined to go, and it being supposed that, having to proceed no farther than France, he would not be long absent, no one presumed to oppose his determination.

(62) See above Not. 41.

(63) Ware, who was very particular in investigating the history of the Cistercian houses in Ireland, has (Antiq. cap. 26.) the abbey of Saul, which, he says, was repaired by St. Malachy, among those of the Canons Regular of St. Augustin; but he was wrong in supposing, that it had belonged to them since the days of St. Patrick; for, as we have often seen, there were no such Canons in the world until many centuries after St. Patrick's death.

(64) Ware (ib. at Tipperary) makes mention of the Cistercian abbey of Inislaunaght, or De Surio, a place near the Suir 3½ miles West of Clonmel. He says, that it was founded in 1159, while others make it later. If so, it was different from the one mentioned by St. Bernard. But perhaps it was only re-founded or newly endowed after St. Bernard's death; or, as Ware observes, the monks of the former De Surio, or Surium, might have removed to Inislaunaght. I have remarked elsewhere (Not. 69. to Chap. xvii.) on the mistakes of Colgan, Harris, and Archdall relative to this place. Lynch was inclined to think, (Camb. evers. p. 169), that Surium was the same as Shrowl in the county of Longford; but, as he objects to himself, the monastery of Shrowl is said to have been founded in 1150 or 1152, and consequently after the death of St. Malachy. Besides, the name is much different from Surium.

(65) This is sufficiently clear from the context of St. Bernard, and his speaking of that young man as a member of the monastery of Surium. Congan was the person, at whose request St. Bernard wrote the Life of St. Malachy, and who helped him with materials for composing it. (See Preface to it.) Some say, that he wrote one himself. It has been also said, that he wrote Acts of St. Bernard. See Ware and Harris, Writers at Congan.

(66) St. Bernard, ib. cap. 14, Messingham; 29, Mabillon.

(67) See Ware, Antiq. cap. 29. at Down.

(68) Tr. Th. p. 305. Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Louth, and

Bishops of Clogher at Edan. Knock-na-Sengan signifies the hill of ants. Colgan places it in the town of Louth, and Ware near it; it might have been formerly in the town. Colgan elsewhere (AA. SS. p. 737) speaks of the church consecrated by St. Malachy as merely the church of Louth, and seems to distinguish it from that of Knock-na-sengan. Ware (loc. citt.) and after him Harris (Monast.) and Archdall (at Louth) have another monastery of Augustin Canons in Louth itself, which, they say, was founded by the same prince Donogh and bishop Edan. It was probably no other than the ancient abbey of Louth restored and renewed, as may be conjectured from its church being called, as the old one had been, by the name of St. Mary. For Edan O'Kelly see above §. 3, (69) Life of Gelasius, cap. 15. and Tr. Th. p. 305. See also the Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1148. In these documents mention is made of the enacting of good rules by the synod.

§. XI. St. Malachy immediately set out, and was accompanied as far as the sea shore by some brethren, but not many, as he ordered them not to follow him. One of them, named Catholicus, who was subject to epileptic fits, lamented with tears his being abandoned by the saint without his doing any thing for him, while he suffered so severely, and was constantly troublesome to the other brethren. St. Malachy, having compassion on him, embraced him, and making the sign of the cross on his breast said; "Be assured, that you will not suffer any thing of the kind until I return." In fact, Catholicus was freed from those fits without being afterwards attacked by them. Just as St. Malachy was entering the ship, two other brethren represented to him, that they wished for a favour. On his asking them what it was, they answered that they would not tell, unless he promised to do it. He promised that he would; and then they said; "your Reverence will please to give us your word, that you will return safe to Ireland," and in this they were joined by the rest of them. At first he was sorry for the promise he had made, but wishing not to make them uneasy he agreed, as well as he could, to their request. When the ship was half way over, a contrary wind arose and drove it back to the Irish coast. St. Malachy landed on a part of it, where there was one of his own churches, in which he spent the night, and thanking Providence considered this circumstance as a fulfilment of his pledge to the brethren. Returning to sea he arrived after a quick passage in Scotland, and on the third day came to a place called Green-Pool, (70) where he had got a monastery prepared, in which he now placed a Cistercian abbot and monks, whom he brought with him from Ireland for that purpose. Taking leave of them and travelling along, he was met by the king David, who detained him for some days. On the saint's entering England, he stopped for a while at Gisbury, where some holy men following a canonical rule lived, with whom he had been long acquainted. While there, a woman afflicted with a dreadful cancer was brought to him, whom he cured by sprinkling water, which he blessed, on the ulcers. When arrived at a sea-port, he was denied a passage to the continent; for the king (Stephen), who had some dispute with the Pope, would not allow any bishop to pass over. (71)

(70) Viride stagnum. Some have confounded this place with Viride lignum, Green wood. But Viride lignum was the Cistercian monastery of Newry, which was founded some years after St. Malachy's death.

(71) St. Bernard, ib. cap. 16, Messingham; 30, Mabillon.

§. XII. Owing to this delay St. Malachy lost the opportunity of seeing the Pope Eugene III. in France, and particularly at Clairvaux, where he spent some time; (72) for he had returned to Italy, before St. Malachy, having got permission to sail from England, could overtake him in France. The saint continuing his course reached Clairvaux in October, 1148, and was received with the utmost joy by St. Bernard and his holy monks. Having spent with them four or five of the happiest days possible on both sides, he was seized, after having celebrated mass, on the festival of St. Luke with a fever, and obliged to take to his bed. At first it was thought to be of little consequence; but every attention, that could be used, was paid to him. He told those good men, that it was all in vain; and when his Irish brethren, who had come along with him, encouraged him not to give himself up, he said to them; "Malachy must die this year; behold, the day is approaching, which, as you well know, I always wished should be my last." Having called for Extreme unction, he would not allow the clergymen to go up stairs to where he lay, but came down to them. Being anointed, he received the holy viaticum, and recommending himself to the prayers of the brethren, and the brethren to God, returned to bed. On finding the last night of his life coming on, he spoke with the greatest spiritual hilarity, and said to those about him; "Take care of me; I shall not forget you, if it will be allowed; but it will be allowed. I have believed in God, and do believe that all things are possible. I have loved God; I have loved you; and charity never faileth." Then looking towards heaven he says; "O God, preserve them in thy name, and not only them, but likewise all those, who through my words and ministry have bound themselves to thy service." Then placing his hands on the heads of each of them, and blessing them all, he desired them to go to rest, whereas his hour was not yet come. About midnight the whole community assembled, and several abbots were in attendance with St. Bernard and the brethren to watch his exit. Not long after he expired in the 54th year of his age, on the 2d of November, A. D.

1148, in the place and time (All Souls day), which he had wished for and foretold. His death was like a sleep; so placid and chearful was his countenance, as if he were alive. His body was carried on the shoulders of abbots to the oratory, where the holy sacrifice was offered for him, the funeral service performed; and every thing conducted with the greatest devotion. St. Bernard, having observed a boy in the oratory, one of whose arms was dead, pointed to him to come forward. The boy did so, and applied the dead arm to the hand of St. Malachy, upon which he recovered the use of it. The remains of the saint were deposited on the same day in the oratory of the Blessed Virgin Mary. (73) St. Bernard preached a funeral oration in honour of him on said day, and another sermon of a similar purport, apparently on an anniversary of his death. (73*) St. Malachy was canonized, many years after his death, by Pope Clement, probably the third, rather than the fourth, as some seem to have thought. (74) He was undoubtedly the greatest, the holiest, and the most disinterested of the bishops of his times. St. Bernard, a truly competent judge, could scarcely find words sufficient to express his admiration of him. It may seem odd, that St. Malachy has been called head of the religion not only of Ireland but likewise of Scotland; (75) but this may be understood relatively to the great esteem, in which he was held by the princes and people of that country, and to his having formed there some religious establishments; or perhaps to the traditionary account of a dependance of the Scottish churches of N. Britain on Armagh. (76) As to his being reckoned among the Irish writers, I cannot find any sufficient reason for it, except his having written some letters, not extant, to St. Bernard, and probably to some others. (77) He was succeeded in the see, of Down, by Moeliosa Mac-In-clericuir, a learned man who has been called Malachy II. (78)

(72) See Fleury, Hist Eccl. L. 69. §. 38.

(73) St. Bernard, ib. cap. xvi. xvii. seqq. Messingham; 31, Mabillon. The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 305.) agree with St. Bernard as to the year and day of St. Malachy's death, observing, as does also Baronius, that his festival was transferred to the following day to avoid the concurrence with that of All Souls. The Annals of Innisfallen also place his death in 1148. Harris (Archbishops of Armagh at St. Malachy) mentions some idle opinions concerning the year of his death or the day of his festival, which are not worth examination.

(73*) These sermons may be seen in the first volume of Mabillon's edition of St. Bernard's works, col. 1047, seqq. He also announced St. Malachy's death to the religious brethren of Ireland, and particularly to the congregations which he had founded, in a most affectionate consolatory letter, No. 45, in Usher's Sylloge, and 37 $\frac{1}{2}$ in Mabillon's ed.

(74) The bull of canonization has been published by Mabillon, ib. immediately after the Life of St. Malachy. It is addressed to the general chapter of the Cistercians, and dated the third year of Pope Clement's pontificate. Mabillon says, Chronologia Bernardina, col. x. towards the end of the 1st Vol. of St. Bernard's works, that the canonization of St. Malachy is marked at A. 1192 in the chronicle of Clairvaux ap. Fr. Chifflet. It will be objected, that this cannot agree with its having been in the third year of Clement III. who died in 1191, and whose third year was 1190. But, although the bull may be fairly supposed to have been issued in 1190, it might not have been acted upon by the Cistercian order until 1192, after due notice had been given of it and matters arranged for the solemnization of St. Malachy's festival.

(75) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1148.

(76) See above §. 4. and 11. Also Not. 35 to Chap. xv.

(77) Concerning the tracts attributed to St. Malachy see Ware and Harris Writers at Malachy. In our days nobody will think of making him the author of the famous forged prophecy concerning the Popes.

(78) Ware, Bishops at Down. Some French writers, ex. c. Menard (Observat. ad Martyrol. Bened. 18 Mart.) and Fleury Hist. Eccl. L. 69. §. 41.) have said, that Christian, abbot of Mellifont, was bishop of Down after St. Malachy, which they deduced from its having been stated, that St. Malachy was succeeded by Christian. But this should have been understood not relatively to the see of Down, but as to his having been the next Apostolic legate after St. Malachy; not that he was appointed to that office immediately after St. Malachy's death, nor probably until at least two years later. Christian was never bishop of Down, but became bishop of Lismore, the only see that he held at any time. The French ecclesiastical historians and antiquaries, not excepting even such men as D'Achery and Mabillon, have, when treating or touching on matters of Irish church history, fallen into many mistakes, owing to their not having thought it worth their while to consult the documents, by which they might have been best guided, such as Colgan's collections; and some of them seem to have been unacquainted even with the works of Ware.

§. XIII. In the said year 1148 after the departure of St. Malachy, Gelasius, archbishop of Armagh, brought about in an assembly held at Armagh a reconciliation between Murchertach or Maurice O'Lochlin, the prince of Tyrone, and the chieftains and nobles of Orgiel and Ulidia, who recognized the supreme power of O'Lochlin and gave him hostages. (79) To this year is assigned the foundation of a monastery of Augustin Canons in Louth by Donogh O'Carrol, prince of Orgiel, and Edan, bishop of Clogher, (80) and the death of O'Dubhin, bishop of Kildare. (81) In 1149 died Nehemias O'Morier-tach bishop of Cloyne, who is highly praised by Irish writers. (82) A very respectable prelate, Muredach O'Dubhthaich, or O'Dubhai, bishop of Tuam, greatly esteemed for his wisdom and liberality, died in the 75th year of his age on the festival of St. Brendan (16th of May) A. D. 1150, and was buried in the monastery of Cong. (83) During his incumbency Turlogh O'Conor erected the priory of St. John Baptist at Tuam. (84) In the same year 1150 a great part of Armagh was destroyed by fire, after which Gelasius made a visitation of his diocese, partly for the purpose of procuring contributions towards re-building and repairing what been burned, in which he was successful. (85) According to some accounts four Cistercian abbeys were founded in 1151, viz. those of Bective in the county of Meath, Boyle in the county of Roscommon, Magio, alias Nenay, in the county of Limerick, and Baltinglass in the county of Wicklow. (86) But it is much more probable, that at least some of them were founded earlier. (87) If, as can scarcely be doubted, these were among the five monasteries derived from Mellifont, which existed at the time St. Bernard was writing the Life of St. Malachy, they must have been established prior to 1151. They are, next to Mellifont, the oldest that appear in the catalogue of the Irish Cistercian houses. (88) Now St. Bernard wrote that work before 1151, as is plain from his speaking of Christian merely as abbot of Mellifont at that time. But it cannot be doubted, that Christian was bishop of Lismore, and even Apostolic legate in said year. He succeeded Moelmonech O'Lonsec, who died in 1150. (89) Christian (Gilla-Criost) was of a family named O'Conairche; and, as he was brother to the monk Malchus, (90) it must be supposed, that he was a native of the country about Bangor.

(79) Life of Gelasius, cap. 15. and Tr. Th. p. 306.

(80) See above Not. 67.

(81) Tr. Th. p. 630. and Ware, Bishops at Kildare.

(82) The 4 Masters, (ap. Tr. Th. p. 308.) who have his death at A. 1149, call him a bishop of the South of Ireland, and represent him as very wise, devout and chaste. He is praised also in the Vision of Tundal or Tungal. (See Ware, Bishops at Cloyne.) St. Bernard makes mention of him, as we have seen above, §. 7.

(83) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Tuam.

(84) Ware, ib. and Antiq. cap. 26. at Galway, where he says, that he does not find of what order said priory was. Harris (ib.) makes it of that of Augustin Canons; yet at Monasteries he states that the order is uncertain.

(85) Life of Gelasius, cap. 16. and Tr. Th. p. 306.

(86) Annals of Mary's Abbey at A. 1151.

(87) Ware states (Antiq. cap. 26. at Limerick) that the house of Magio, or Nenay, was founded in 1148 by, it is thought, O'Brian, I suppose Turlogh O'Brian king of Munster. Of Bective or the monastery De Beatitudine, he says, (ib. at Meath) that it was founded by Murchard O'Melaghlin, prince of Meath, but that the Cistercian Chronologists differ as to the time, some having A. 1146, others 1148, and others again 1151. Treating of Baltinglass, or De Vale salutis, (ib. at Wicklow) founded by Dermot Mac Morrogh, king of Leinster, he mentions that some assign it to 1118, others to 1151; and with regard to Boyle he relates (ib. at Roscommon) that, before the Cistercians removed to it, they were first settled in 1148, under an abbot Peter O'Morda, at a place called Grellechdine, whence they went to Dromconaid with their second abbot Egan O'Maccain, thence with his successor Maurice O'Dubhai to Buinfinny, and finally to Boyle in 1161, or, as others say, 1151. I pass by what he has about these monasteries in the Coenob. Cisterc. For he afterwards changed several of the positions stated in that tract.

(88) Harris has (Monaster.) a Cistercian abbey at Athlone, under the name of St. Peter and St. Benedict, which he assigns to A. 1150. He took this date from Ware's Coenob. Cisterc.; but Ware himself who makes mention of this abbey again (Antiq. cap. 26. at Roscommon) and says, that it was called De Innocentia, marks no date for it, nor does Archdall at Athlone, Roscommon. It may be said, that Shrowl or Shrule, alias De Benedictione Dei, might have been one of the five alluded to by St. Bernard, if it be true that it was founded in 1150. Yet Ware observes, (ib. at Longford) that some assign it to 1152. Probably Mary's Abbey of Dublin was become Cistercian at the time of St. Bernard's writing; but it was not derived from Mellifont. (Compare with Not. 41.)

(89) See Chap. xxvi. §. 15. Ware was right (Bishops at Lismore) in assigning Christian's accession to about 1150; I think it was in that very year. I have remarked above (Not. 78.) on the mistake of those, who have made him bishop of Down. Another still grosser mistake is that of some writers quoted and refuted by Colgan, (AA. SS. at 18 Mart. where he treats of Christian) who have said that he was archbishop of Armagh, as if he could be so while Gelasius held that see. This, like the other mistake, was derived from his having been the next Apostolic legate after St. Malachy, whence it was inferred that he succeeded the saint also as bishop, or even archbishop.

(90) See Chap. xxvi. §. 9.

§. xiv. According to some accounts it would seem, that Christian, soon after he became bishop of Lismore, went to Rome. For it has been said, that he came to Ireland in company with Cardinal Paparo. (91) Yet it is odd that, had he gone to Rome, something more would not have been mentioned about it. (92) Perhaps he went to Scotland there to meet the Cardinal and conduct him to Ireland. For Paparo being sent with the palliums by Pope Eugene III. first came to England, but was refused a passport for the continuance of his journey by king Stephen, unless he would take his oath, that he would not in his progress do any thing prejudicial to the interests of the English kingdom. The Cardinal, feeling indignant at this proposal returned to Rome, where Stephen's conduct on this occasion excited much displeasure. Afterwards he set out again taking the route of Scotland, and was honourably received by the king David about Michaelmas. (93) Thence he went to Ireland, where he arrived in the latter part of the year 1151. (94) He remained seven days with Gelasius at Armagh, who, soon after it seems, went to Connaught, apparently for the purpose of consulting with the king Turlogh O'Connor, and forwarding the business of the approaching synod, (95) which, being convoked, met at Kells (96) on the 9th of March, A. D. 1152. (97) It was presided by Cardinal Paparo, as the Pope's legate, to whom some add as also presiding, Christian, who was likewise Apostolic legate. (98) Several bishops did not attend at this synod; and one of the reasons of their absence seems to have been, that many of the Irish were displeas'd at palliums being intended for the sees of Dublin and Tuam, whereas they thought that none should be granted except to Armagh and Cashel, which was already an archbishopric. And it is observ'd, that the clergy of Armagh and Down particularly insisted on this point. (99) The names of the prelates, who, besides Paparo who was only a Cardinal priest of the title of St. Laurence in Damaso, were actually present, are thus given: "Christian O'Conairche, bishop of Lismore and the Pope's legate in Ireland; Gelasius comorban (successor) of St. Patrick, and primate of Ireland; Domnald O'Lonargain, archbishop of Munster (Cashel); Grenius, or Gregory (alias Greri) bishop of Dublin; Gilla nanoemh, or Nehemias Laigneach, bishop of Glendaloch; Dungal O'Coellaidhe, bishop of Leighlin; Fostius, bishop of Portlargo, or Waterford; Domnald O'Fogarty, Vicar general of the bishop of Ossory; Finn Mac-Kienan, bishop of Kildare; Gilda-An choim'dhe O'Hardmaoil, vicar of the bishop of Emly; Gilla-Aidus O'Maighin, bishop of Cork; Mac-ronan, comorban of St. Brendan, that is, bishop of Clonfert; Brendan, bishop of Kerry; Torgest, bishop of Limerick; Murchertac O'Moeluidhir, bishop of Clonmacnois; Moeliosa O'Connachtain, bishop of East Connaught (Roscommon); Huaruadhanic, or O'Ruadan, bishop of Lugnia (Achonry); Mac-crath O'Morain, bishop of Conmacne of Hi-Briun; Muredach O'Cohtaich, bishop of Kinel Eogain; Moelpatrick O'Banain, bishop of the Dalaradians (Connor); and Moeliosa Mac-Clerich-corr, bishop of the Ulidians (Down)." (100) There were present also many abbots and priors, besides a multitude of inferior clergy. (101)

(91) Ware in his treatise on the Archbishops of Cashel, published in 1626, many years before his general work on the Bishops of Ireland, quotes (at Donatus O'Lonargan) an anonymous writer of those times, who says at A. 1152, that Cardinal John Paparo came to Ireland together with Christian, bishop of Lismore, and legate of all Ireland. But he has omitted this quotation in the general work, probably thinking that it was not well founded. Fleury, however, refers to it, (Hist. Eccl. L. 69. §. 62.), and makes Paparo and Christian come together to Ireland.

(92) In the Annals of Mary's abbey it is said, that Paparo came to Ireland with Christian, but, unless the copy, which I have seen among Harris' MSS., be incorrect, under a palpably wrong date, viz. A. 1148. Colgan, although he quotes (Life of Gelasius, cap. 17.) from Ware the passage of the anonymous writer, yet in the very same chapter says, that there is no account of any one after St. Malachy having gone from Ireland to Rome for the purpose of procuring the palliums; whence we may conclude, that he knew nothing about a journey of Christian to Rome; for, if he did, he would naturally have mentioned it as connected with the affair of the palliums. And in the Acts of Christian at 18 March he has not a word about his having travelled to Rome.

(93) See Fleury, loc. cit. and Pagi (Critica, &c. at A. 1151) from John of Hagustald's Continuation of the History of Simon of Durham.

(94) 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 306. It is unnecessary to quote other authorities to prove, that this was the year of Cardinal Paparo's arrival in Ireland. For nothing is more certain, as will be soon seen, than that the synod of Kells was held in March, 1152. Now, as he did not reach Ireland until a late period of the year, his arrival must consequently be assigned to 1151, probably in October, between which and the following March there was not more than sufficient time for summoning the bishops to the council, their travelling to attend at it, and other necessary preparations. The anonymous writer quoted by Ware (see Not. 91.) places Paparo's arrival in 1152, and led him astray not only at Donatus O'Lonargan, but likewise in his general work on Bishops at Gelasius of Armagh. Fleury also (loc. cit.) fell into the same mistake. That writer confounded the year of the synod with that of Paparo's arrival, as if the synod could have assembled as soon as the early part of March, 1152, if he did not reach Ireland until said year.

(95) Colgan (Life of Gelasius, cap. 18.) refers to the Irish annals, meaning those of the 4 Masters, for Gelasius having gone to Connaught in 1152; but Dr. O'Connor, who has before him the very original copy of said annals, says, (Rer. Hib. &c. 2 Proleg. p. 156.) that it was in 1151. Besides, Colgan contradicts himself; for he states, that in the same year the pious queen Dervorgalla, wife of Turlogh O'Connor, died at Armagh. Now elsewhere (Tr. Th. p. 306.) he assigns, from the 4 Masters, her death to A. 1151.

(96) The anonymous writer, quoted by Ware, has Mell, instead of Kell or Kells. Perhaps this is owing to a mistake of a transcriber; but hence seems to have proceeded the opinion of those, who thought that Mellifont, which they supposed the same as Mell, was the place where the council was held. Ware speaks doubtfully of this matter; yet he says, (Archbishops of Armagh at Gelasius) that it is more generally agreed that Kells is the place. Fleury, (loc. cit.) and Pagi (Critica ad A. 1152) following that anonymous authority, have Mellifont. But it is clear from authentic Irish documents, such as the Annals of Cluain-eidhneach, (Clonenagh) written about the same time, that the council sat at Kells, alias Kennanus, in the now county of Meath. Those annals are quoted by Keating (Book 2. p. 104. Dublin ed.) and from him by Colgan. (Tr. Th. p. 306. and AA. SS. p. 654 and 775.) Yet it may be, that after Cardinal Paparo's departure, some of the bishops assembled again at Mellifont under the presidency of Christian, who was then Apostolic legate. And thus perhaps we may account for the singular statement of the Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1152, that the synod was held at Drogheda, or, as some have said, ad monasterium Pontanense, inasmuch as Mellifont, being not far from Drogheda, might have been called its monastery.

(97) This is the year marked for the celebration of the council of Kells not only in the Annals of Innisfallen, but likewise in those of Mary's Abbey, Multifernan and others. (See Harris, Archbishops of Armagh at Gelasius.) It is the date also of the 4 Masters; and accordingly Colgan was wrong (A. SS. p. 779.) in saying, that they assign it to 1151. For, as observed by Dr. O'Connor, (loc.

et. in Not. 95. above) they have 1152. The same year is expressly marked in the Annals of Cluain-eidhneach; and, to confirm it still more, they add that it was a bissextile, or leap year, such as 1152 was. Usher seems to have thought, (Ind. Chron. ad Pr.) that the synod, although he does not mention it, was held in 1151; but, if he did, he confounded the date of it with that of Paparo's arrival in Ireland. The wretched translator of Keating, Dermot O'Connor, makes him say, that the synod assembled in 1157, and has greatly puzzled poor Harris, who set about proving (ib.) that Keating was mistaken. But Keating was not to blame; for in his genuine text, as quoted three times by Colgan, he has not 1157, but 1152; and Harris himself remarks, that in a MS. English translation of Keating's history in Marsh's library the year marked is 1152. That the first day of sitting was the 9th of March is clear from its being stated in the Annals of Cluain-eidhneach, that it was the Dominica Laetare, or the fourth Sunday in Lent, which in that year fell on the 9th not on the 8th, as Colgan says, of March, whereas Easter Sunday was the 30th. Dr. O'Connor quotes (2 Prol. p. 159.) from the old book of Flannan Mac Eogan a passage, in which it is said, that the synod began pridie Non. Martii, that is, on the sixth of March. But how can this agree with the assertion of its having begun on the Dominica Laetare? Of this more lower down.

(98) In the Annals of Cluain-eidhneach the Cardinal alone is spoken of as president of the council, and Christian is mentioned merely as having attended at it. But Keating himself says, that Christian also presided, and so does Colgan, AA. SS. p. 654. The anonymous writer, quoted by Ware, leaves out Paparo as president, and states that it was Christian, who held the council of Mell, as he calls it. (See above Not. 96.) And yet he supposes that Paparo was present. The Annals of Mary's abbey in like manner make Christian alone president of the council. I suspect, that this statement originated with the Cistercians, to whose order Christian had belonged. But the Annals of Cluain-eidhneach are more deserving of attention.

(99) Keating, as quoted by Colgan, (AA. SS. p. 654 and 776.) refers to the Annals of Cluain-eidhneach for this account; but his miserable translator has perverted his text by making him say, that it was not to the palliums for Dublin and Tuam, but to that for Cashel, that the clergy of Armagh and Down objected. Keating's statement is confirmed by the old book of Flannan Mac-Eogan ap. Dr. O'Conor, loc. cit.

(100) This list is quoted three times by Colgan from Keating's original, as taken from the Annals of Cluain-eidhneach; but Keating's bungling translator has given us a different one, which is no other than that published by Ware (Ant. cap. 16.) from an old MS. except that he has spoiled some names mentioned by Ware. In Ware's list Eda, or Aidan O'Hossin (not O'Heyn, as that translator has) appears between O'Lonargain of Munster or Cashel, and Gregory of Dublin, and is called archbishop of Connaught, i. e. Tuam. But he is not in Keating's text, as Colgan expressly remarks. Perhaps he was sick at the time; for it cannot be supposed, that he had any ecclesiastical objection to the synod, as there was a pallium intended for him. The same pseudo-translator adds Greine to the name of Tuam, not knowing that Tuamgreine, now Tomgrany in the county of Clare, was quite different from the archiepiscopal town of Tuam in the county of Galway. He found Greine, or Greri, mentioned by Ware next after the word Tuam; but Ware's meaning is, that Greine or Greri was the same person as Gregory of Dublin. Among other alterations of Ware's words he has changed the name of O'Maigin, bishop of Cork, into O'Heyn: and hence Harris (at Bishops of Cork) says, that O'Maigin is called O'Heyn by Keating. He should have said, by his translator; for in Keating's original the name is O'Maighin or Maigin, as Harris might have easily found in the various quotations from it by Colgan. Ware calls Donnald O'Fogarty bishop of Ossory, and, in like manner Gilda-An-choimde bishop of Emly. To the bishop of Kildare he gives the surname not of Mac-Kienan but Mac-Tiarcaín. He makes Mac-ronan bishop of Kerry or Ardfert, instead of Clonfert, and then leaves out Brendan, who was the real bishop of Kerry. This was owing to his having found the name of Brendan occurring twice in this order; "Mac-ronan, comorban of St. Brendan; Brendan, bishop of Kerry. Now by the former Brendan was meant the great St. Brendan, founder of the monastery of Clonfert, and by the latter Brendan the then actual bishop of Kerry or Ardfert. Ware con-founded them into one Brendan, and thus made Mac-ronan bishop of Kerry; a mistake, which he has also (Bishops at Ardfert), and in which he has been followed by Harris. He adds two bishops not mentioned by Keating or Colgan, viz. Ethru O'Miadachain, bishop of Clonard, and Tuathal O'Connachtaigh, bishop of Hua-mbriuin, which he explains by Enagh-dune, now Annadown. The Conmacne, of which Mac-crath O'Morain was bishop, he explains by Ardagh; for, one of the districts, called by that name, was in the now county of Longford. But he is not right in making Muredach O'Cobtaich bishop of Derry at the time of the council of Kells; for, in the first place Kinel-Eogain, of which he is called bishop, was the territory now called Tyrone, which did not comprize the district about Derry; and we find among the signatures to the foundation charter of the Cistercian abbey of Newry his name under the title of bishop of Tir-eoghain. Secondly, Ware himself (Bishops at Derry) does not make him bishop of Derry until after Flathbert O'Brolcan, who became bishop of that see in 1158, and lived for some years after. As to the particular name of Muredach's see in Tyrone, it was not Clogher, whose bishop was then Edan O'Killedy, and who, by the bye, did not attend at the synod. Besides, the bishops of Clogher used to be styled bishops of Ergall or Oriel. I have no doubt, that it was the ancient see of Ardsrath or Ardstraw in Tyrone, otherwise called Rathlure. (See Chap. XII. §. 3 and ib. Not. 35.) Keating makes mention of it, under the name of Ardsrath, as existing at the time of the synod of Rathbreasil; (Chap. xxv. §. 13.) but, when treating of the council of Kells, he calls it Rathlure.

In the old book of Flannan Mac-Eogan there is another list of the prelates assembled at Kells, which has been published by Dr. O'Connor, 2 Prol. p. 159. In it we find Aed O'Ossin of Tuam. The bishop of Kildare is called Mac-Tiarcaín. Gilla Aeda O'Maigin of Cork is omitted. Donnald O'Fogarty is called bishop of Ossory. Torgesius of Limerick is omitted; but in his stead Gilla An-chomdhe O'Hardmaoil appears as bishop of that see. This is evidently a mistake; for he belonged to Emly, either as bishop or vicar. Likewise Mac-Ronan of Clonfert is omitted. In this list are the bishops of Clonard and Hua-mbriuin, as mentioned by Ware.

(101) The abbots and priors are mentioned by Keating from the Annals of Cluain-eidneach; and the 4 Masters, according to Dr. O'Connor, (2 Prol. p. 156.) say, that 3000 clergymen were present at the synod. The anonymous writer ap. Ware adds kings, dukes, and other distinguished laymen.

§. xv. The council being assembled, Cardinal Paparo distributed the four palliums for Armagh, Cashel, Dublin, and Tuam. (102) He then declared, as it was right to do, the archbishop of Armagh primate over the others. (103) A decree was issued against simony, a crime which was in those times but too prevalent throughout the Christian world. (104) Usury also was condemned; and the Cardinal ordered, in virtue of apostolical authority, that tithes should be paid. (105) On this point he was very badly obeyed; for it is certain, that tithes were, if at all, very little exacted in Ireland until after the establishment of the English power. Suffragan sees were fixed for the four metropolitans, and are thus reckoned; 1. Under Armagh were placed Connor, Down, Louth or Clogher, Clonard, Kells, Ardagh, Raphoe, Rathlure or Ardstraw, Duleek, Derry. 2. Under Cashel are named Killaloe, Limerick, Iniscathy, Kilfenora, Emly, Roscrea, Waterford, Lismore, Cloyn, Cork, Ross, Ardfert. 3. Under Dublin only five sees, Glendaloch, Ferns, Ossory, Leighlin, Kildare. 4. Under Tuam are mentioned Mayo, Killalla, Roscommon, Clonfert, Achonry, Clonmacnois, Kilmacduagh. (106) These were the only regulations, of which I find any authentic account, (107) enacted in this synod, the whole being relative to discipline and morality. No decrees were issued as to points of faith or doctrine; for there was no question concerning such subjects. (108) The synod being terminated, Cardinal Paparo immediately set out on his return to Rome, and crossed the sea on the 24th of March. (109) Hence we find that the synod did not sit for many days, as it had commenced on the 9th of said month. (110)

In the course of the same year 1152 one of the bishops, who had assisted at the synod, Dungal

O'Coellaidhe, or O'Cellaie, of Leighlin, died ; (111) as did also Fergal O'Ferehubuis, a professor of theology at Armagh. (112) To the preceding year is assigned the death of a bishop of Killala, Maelfogamair, probably the only one of that see, whose name occurs after that of the founder St. Muredach. (113)

(102) Such is the order, in which the four sees are mentioned by Hoveden at A. 1151, who calls them Armarc, Cassel, Dive-line, Connath. In the Annals of Cluain-eidneach in Keating's original text they are placed thus ; Dublin, Cashel, Tuam, and Armagh. The author did not attend to the rank of precedency. From his having accidentally mentioned Dublin first some persons derived a foolish argument as if to show, that its see was made the primatial one of Ireland. That author could not have thought so ; for he tells us immediately after, that the archbishop of Armagh was declared the primate. In all the lists of the prelates, who attended at the synod, Gregory of Dublin is named after not only Gelasius of Armagh, but likewise Donnald of Cashel. (See more in Jus. Prim. Armac. §. 17. scqq.) Hoveden, giving an account of the Irish sees, as they existed at the time of the arrival of Henry II. and reckoning them according to the order of rank, has first Armagh, subjoining its suffragan sees ; then Cashel with its suffragans ; next Dublin, &c. ; and this was undoubtedly the order of dignity and precedency of our archbishops until Dublin became the civil metropolis of Ireland.

(103) The words of the Annals of Cluain-eidneach are, as follows ; “ Insuper Ardmachanum archiepiscopum in primatem super alios, ut decuit, ordinavit.” The ut decuit refers to the ancient right of primacy annexed to Armagh since the time of St. Patrick.

(104) It is laughable to hear the mighty Ledwich saying, (Antiq. p. 445.) that the simoniacal traffic was more advantageously carried on Ireland by those lords, who had embraced the Romish, as he calls them, tenets and party, because they found more purchasers than in their own sept. Where did the great antiquary find this piece of intelligence ? The simony condemned by the council of Kells was not, at least in general, such as that understood by Ledwich, viz. the selling of bishoprics and abbeys by great Lords, of which scarcely an instance can be found in our history, but the bad practice complained of by Lanfranc of Canterbury, who, to use the Doctor's phraseology, was of the Romish party, and followed by some bishops in taking money for conferring holy orders. See Chap. xxiv. §. 12.

(105) Annals of Cluain-eidneach ap. Keating. Ledwich does not grumble at Paparo's proposing the payment of tithes, and talks of the divine right of them, &c. They were dear to his heart: Cicero pro domo sua.

(106) It is thus the sees are reckoned by Keating (Book 2. p. 104.) with whom Ware agrees (Antiq. cap. 16.) as to the names, although differently spelled, which he took from the Census Camerales of Cencius styled Camerarius, who was afterwards Pope Honorius III. It is odd, that Derry is named among the sees, that existed at the time of the council of Kells; for we read in the Life of Gelasius, that it was not a regular see until the year 1158, as Ware himself has at Bishops of Derry. And, what is equally strange, Keating reckons it among the bishoprics fixed by the synod of Rathbreasil. But I greatly doubt, whether the suffragan sees enumerated by Cencius, were exactly the same as those fixed by the synod of Kells; for Cencius wrote many years after the synod. On the other hand Keating's list was, I believe, taken from that of Cencius, and thence the name of Derry might have crept into his account of the synod of Rathbreasil. The sees of Clogher and Louth were united, and probably for many years prior to the synod, the last bishop of Louth alone, whom we meet with, having been Moenach O'Ciordubhain, who died in 1045. (AA. SS. p. 736.) In later times the town of Louth and other parts of that ancient diocese were annexed to Armagh, as Ware observes loc. cit. Elphin is not named in these lists, which Ware wondered at (Bishops at Elphin) and therefore thought it highly probable, that it was already united with the see of Roscommon. This is certainly very probable, and I should think it certain, did not Ware himself supply us (ib.) with a difficulty founded on his mentioning a bishop of Elphin, Flanachan O'Dubhai, who, he says, died in 1168; and after whom he places in that see Moeliosa O'Connachtain, who assisted at the council of Kells under the title of bishop of East Connaught. By this title I do not know what bishop could be meant except one of either Roscommon or Elplin, or of both together. If Moeliosa was then bishop of Roscommon, while the see of Elphin existed separately, as would appear from its having been governed by Flanachan as late as the year 1168, it will follow that the sees were not as yet united at the time of the synod of Kells. But, if Elphin was still not united with Roscommon, how can we account for its not being mentioned in the aforesaid lists? In this supposition it may be conjectured, that Ware was mistaken as to Flanachan O'Dubhai, whose name I do not meet with elsewhere; but, admitting that the sees were then united, it may be said, that Moeliosa was only a coadjutor bishop to him, while holding the united dioceses, which might justly go under the name of East Connaught. Thus, allowing that there was such a bishop as Flanachan, and that he lived until 1168, we can easily understand, how after his death Moeliosa became full bishop of Elphin, that is, of Elphin and Roscommon together, and why the name of Elphin does not appear in the lists, being comprized under that of Roscommon. Ware was, I believe right (Antiq. cap. 16. and Bishops at Clonmacnois) in giving the name of Clonmacnois to the see called Cinani by Cencius Camerarius. In after times it was wrested from the jurisdiction of Tuam, and placed under that of Armagh. Dromore is not mentioned in the list; perhaps it was then comprized under the diocese of Armagh, or rather Down. (Not. 13. to Chap. xxxii.)

(107) John of Hagulstad, quoted by Pagi, (Critica &c. ad A. 1151.) alludes to something done by Paparo in the synod with regard to the matrimonial contract, and is followed by Fleury, Hist. Eccl. L. 69. §. 62. Concerning this point I do not find a word in our Irish documents. If any thing took place relatively to it, it was undoubtedly no other than an endeavour to establish the Sponsalia de praesenti instead of those de futuro, of which enough has been said already. (See Chap. xxvi. §. 6. and ib. Not. 52 and 66.)

(108) In spite of the clear account, that remains of the proceeding of the council of Kells, and the total silence of old writers concerning doctrinal matters being discussed in it, Ledwich had the effrontery to say, (Antiq. &c. 444.) that "the great objects of Paparo's legation were to extinguish our ancient doctrines and discipline," &c. Was the condemnation of simony and usury an extinction of Irish doctrines? What had the proposal of tithes to do with doctrines; or would Ledwich have wished, that the discipline, according to which they were not paid, had been upheld? The giving of palliums is not a point of faith or doctrine. Then he tells us, that one of the objects was to new-model our hierarchy, and above all, lay the foundation of a revenue, for which purpose, he says, the number of Irish sees was reduced. But, if it was intended to raise a revenue for Rome, as he meant, surely the number ought rather to have been augmented. How was the revenue to be raised by our sees? Ledwich supposed by the annates paid on the granting of bulls, and says, that the four palls bestowed on the metropolitans together with the bulls for the other bishops brought a large sum into the Cardinal's coffers. This is not only a barefaced falsehood, but a proof of this malignant scribbler's profound ignorance, whereas in those times annates were not paid to Rome for bulls on the collation of bishoprics; nor did they even begin to be paid any where for, at least, 150 years later. And, even did that practice exist in Paparo's days, what bulls had he to give to bishops? There were no new bishops appointed at the council of Kells, and every one knows, that bulls are issued only for newly appointed ones, and that annates or First fruits are charged merely on new incumbents.

(109) The Annals of Cluain-eidneach ap. Keating have; "Qui etiam Cardinalis protinus post peractum concilium iter arripuit, et nono calendas Aprilis transfretavit." Ware in his tract, Archiepiscopi Cassiliensis, had thought, that the year of Paparo's departure was 1153. In that supposition the synod should have been held in said year, which was not the case, as has been proved above, Not. 97. He was deceived by a passage of John of Hagulstad, but afterwards changed his opinion. That writer, treating of Paparo's arrival in Ireland, &c. gives the whole of the proceedings under A. 1152; but Pagi remarks, (Critica, &c. ad A. 1151) that the A. 1152 marked by him for Paparo's arrival was in reality 1151. Now, as Paparo did not reach Ireland until a late time of the year, and as John of Hagulstad speaks of Paparo's travelling, on his return, through Scotland after Easter, Ware had been led to think, that he did not leave Ireland until 1153. It is thus also that Fleury was led astray, who says, (L. 69. §. 62.) that Paparo left Ireland in 1153, adding that he did so after Easter. Here again he is mistaken; for, as Paparo sailed from Ireland on the 24th of March, he consequently left it before Easter, which in 1152 fell on the 30th of that month. What John of Hagulstad says is to be understood of Paparo's travelling through Scotland after Easter on his way to Rome, although he was before it out of Ireland.

(110) In the Annals of Cluain-eidneach ap. Keating, as quoted by Colgan, (AA. SS. p. 776. and elsewhere) we read; "Pridie nonas Martii haec synodus absoluta fuit." Thus the synod would have ended on the sixth of March. There must be a mistake in this reading; for, as it began on the 9th, (see Not. 97) how could it have terminate on the 6th? Accordingly Colgan conjectured, (ib.) that, instead of pridie nonas, we ought to read pridie idus, which would bring its termination to the 14th, thus allowing six days for its sitting, a time fully sufficient for its proceedings. Dr. O'Connor introduces a different correction, and maintains that, while pridie nonas should be retained, coepta ought to be read instead of absoluta, and quotes, as we have seen (Not. 97.) a passage to this purpose from Flannan Mac-Eogan. But in this hypothesis the synod would have begun on the sixth of March, three days prior to that marked in the above-mentioned Annals; and it cannot be supposed, that these Annals would have assigned two different days for its commencement. The passage in question is at the end of the account of what took place in the council, and is naturally relative rather to the ending than to the beginning of it, the date for which is given at the head of said account. Add, that, in Dr. O'Connor's supposition, the Annals would make no mention of the day, on which the synod was concluded, which, considering the precision with which they treat of it, would be very odd and can scarcely be admitted. It might seem from Paparo's not having crossed the sea until the 24th of March, that the synod sat even later than the 14th, the day supposed by Colgan, whereas it is stated that he set out immediately after it was over. But it will be allowed, that he did not leave Kells until the following day, that is, the 15th in Colgan's system; and while proceeding for a port whence to sail for Scotland, he might have travelled slowly, and, when arrived there, might have been detained waiting for a passage.

(111) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Leighlin.

(112) Tr. Th. p. 308.

(113) See Ware and Harris, Bishops at Killalla. Maelfogamair was called bishop of Tir-amalgaid (Tirawly) and Hua-Fiachra (Tireragh). It was very usual in these times to denominate our bishops from the districts comprized in their dioceses. Harris places one Keliach as bishop of Killala between St. Muredach and Maelfogamair, who, he says, was bishop there in the reign of Tuathal, who was king of Ireland from A. 534 to 544. This cannot be right; for St. Muredach himself was not bishop of Killala until after that time. (See Chap. XII. §. 1.) Harris refers to Colgan's AA. SS. p. 248. But Colgan, although he calls Kellach a bishop, does not tell us when or where he was such.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Macarius superior of the Irish monastery at Wurtzburg—Church of Egidius at Nuremberg given for the use of the Irish—Pope Adrian IV. a scholar of Marianus, a monk of the Irish house at Ratisbon—An Establishment formed for the Irish at Vienna—The Irish houses of Wurtzburg, Nuremberg, Vienna, Ratisbon, &c. in course of time usurped by the Scotch—King Henry II. of England applies to the Pope for permission to take possession of Ireland—The Pope draws up a Bull making over to Henry the entire possession of that island—Synod at Mellifont and consecration of the church there—Great offerings made to God and the monks of Mellifont by several Irish princes, and by the wife of Tiernan O' Ruaire—Synod of Brigh-mac-Thaidhg—Derry raised to the rank of a regular episcopal see—Deaths of several bishops—St. Laurence, or rather Lorcan, O' Toole, consecrated archbishop of Dublin—Synod of Clane—Decree that no one should be a professor of theology in any church in Ireland who had not previously studied for some time at Armagh—The canons of Christ-church from being secular canons become canons regular of the congregation of Aroasia—A cathedral erected at Derry—War between Murtoogh Mac-Loughlin king of Ireland, and Eochad king of Ulidia—Battle of Litterluin and death of Murtoogh—Burning of Armagh, and of several churches—Roderic king of Connaght, aided by several other Irish princes, depose Dermod Mac Murchard king of Leinster, who had seduced Dervorgal, the wife of Tiernan O'Ruairc—Religious houses founded by Dermod—Roderic O'Conor acknowledged king of all Ireland—Convention at Athlone—Dermod Mac-Morogh applies to Henry II. king of England for assistance to recover his kingdom—Enters into negotiations with Strongbow and others—Landing of the first of the Anglo-Saxons in Ireland, who are immediately joined by Dermod—Roderic O'Conor raises a great army to oppose them—War between Donald O'Brien king of Limerick and O'Conor—Donald assisted by the English—Landing of a fresh body of English—Landing of Strongbow—Waterford taken—Eva, daughter of Dermod, married to Strongbow—Dublin taken by Dermod and Strongbow—They march into Meath and Breffny—Synod of the Irish clergy at Armagh, who unanimously declare that the misfortunes now fallen on the Irish people was a judgment from God, for their purchasing from the English some of their children as slaves—Liberation of all the English slaves throughout Ireland—English who had gone into Ireland ordered to return by Henry II.—But afterwards permitted to remain—Death of Dermod Mac-Morogh—Dublin besieged by Roderic king of Ireland—The siege raised and the Irish army dispersed.

SECT. I.

MACARIUS, superior of the Irish monastery of Wurtzburgh, (1) died on a 19th of December some year before 1152. (2) He is said to have written an elegant work on the praise of martyrs. (3) Macarius was succeeded by Gregory, and he by Carus, who became chaplain to king Conrad (the third) and queen Gertrude, who gave him the church of St. Egidius at Nuremberg for the use of the Irish. After Carus, Declan, abbot of St. Egidius of Nuremberg, was appointed chaplain to the said king and queen, and after the death of Conrad, (which occurred early in 1152) was continued as such to his successor Frederic Barbarossa. Declan erected a noble church at Nuremberg, and formed a monastery there for his Irish countrymen. (4) If we are to follow certain accounts, (5) it was about the year 1152, or somewhat later, that Gilla Criost, or Christian Mac-Carthy, the second abbot of St. James' of Ratisbon, went over to Ireland to collect money for the support of the monastery. Their great benefactor Conor O'Brian was then dead, having departed this life, as we have seen, (6) in the year 1142. The funds, with which he had supplied them, being exhausted, Christian found it necessary to apply for relief to his Irish friends. He was very well received and generously treated by a Munster king or prince, and by several chieftains, so that he acquired a great deal of money. When preparing to return to Germany, he was taken ill and died in Ireland, and was honourably buried before the altar of St. Patrick in the metropolitan church of Cashel. (7) Christian had received into his community, which is said to have been then of the Benedictine order, an Irishman of great merit, named Gregory, who had been a Canon Regular of St. Augustin. This Gregory, who seems to have been different from the one that succeeded Macarius at Wurtzburg, was appointed successor to Christian, and was the third abbot of St. James' of Ratisbon. It is related, that he went to Rome to be consecrated, that is, to be invested with the abbacy, by Pope Adrian IV. (8) His journey to Rome could not have taken place before 1155, whereas Adrian's pontificate began on the 3d of December, 1154. Among other subjects of conversation the Pope inquired of him concerning Marianus, who was then a monk of the Irish house of Ratisbon, and who had taught the liberal arts at Paris, where he had among his scholars Nicholas Breस्पere, afterwards Adrian IV. The Pope was very glad to hear that his old master was well, and spoke of him in the highest terms of commendation (9)

(1) See Chap. xxvi. §. 4.

(2) Bollandists at Life of Marianus of Ratisbon, 9th Feb.

(3) Ib. They quote Eysengrein, who states, that Macarius wrote De laude martyrum elegans volumen.

(4) Life of Marianus, cap. 5.

(5) I allude to the Extracts from a chronicle of the Irish monks of Ratisbon, of which above Not. 36. to Chap. xxvi. Lynch (loc. cit. ib.) justly complains, that said chronicle is full of anachronisms.

(6) Chap. xxvii. §. 6.

(7) In the said chronicle we read; "Christianus, abbas monasterii Scotorum S. Jacobi Ratisbonae, vir nobilis ex stirpe primariae familiae Mac-Carthy in Hibernia, jam exhaustis thesauris olim Ratisbonae submissis a rege Hiberniae, videns suos inopia laborare humani subsidii, rogatu fratrum suorum, ut novum repeteret levamen egestatis, concessit in patriam suam Hiberniam, ut a rege ejusdem christianissimo ac devoto Donato O'Brian (jam enim vita functus erat fundator Consecrati Petri et monasterii S. Jacobi Scotorum rex Conchor O'Brian) et ab aliis Hiberniae magnatibus impetraret eleemosynas. Quem rex Donatus, cum regina uxore, et principibus Hiberniae, feliciter expeditis suis negotiis, reditum in Germaniam parantem oneravit ingentibus thesauris. Sed Christianus in Hibernia spiritum Deo reddidit, et honorifice sepultus est ante altare S. Patricii Ecclesiae metropolitanae Casselensis." There is a mistake in the name Donatus O'Brian; for at the time that Christian came to Ireland there was no king of that name in this country. Lynch thought (loc. cit.) that, instead of Donatus O'Brian, the prince alluded to was either Donat Mac-Carthy of Desmond, or Turlogh O'Brian king of North Munster, who reigned from 1142 to 1164 or 1167. To me it seems more probable, that the prince meant was this Turlogh, whereas Cashel, where Christian was buried, and where it may be supposed that he died, belonged to Turlogh's kingdom. Turlogh was succeeded by Domnald or Donald O'Brian, who was a very pious prince and celebrated for his foundations of churches and religious houses. Owing to his great reputation as a benefactor to monasteries, it may be fairly conjectured, that the unchronological compiler of that chronicle confounded him with Turlogh O'Brian, latinizing at the same time his name Domnald into Donatus. From the Life of Marianus (cap. 4.) it would seem as if Christian, having collected the money, returned to Ratisbon and laid it out in purchasing lands for the monastery. Yet it states, (cap. 6.) that he died in Ireland.

(8) After the passage just quoted the said chronicle continues; "Vir magnae virutis genere Hibernus, nomine Gregorius ex ordine Regularium canonicorum S. Augustini, impetravit a Christiano admitti in ordinem St. Benedicti, qui Christiano extincto, apud Jacobi Ratisbonae in abbatis munere suffectus Romam ab Adriano Papa consecrandus petiit." That this Gregory was not the same as the one, who had governed the Irish monastery of Wurtzburg, seems clear from its being stated, that Gregory of Wurtzburg was succeeded by Carus. Therefore, if he died, as may reasonably be supposed, before Carus got that appointment, he must have been different from the Gregory, who succeeded Christian at Ratisbon, and who went to Rome in Pope Adrian's time. For Carus himself was dead some years before the pontificate of Adrian, as appears from his successor Declan having been chaplain to king Conrad, who died in 1152.

(9) Ib. This Marianus must not be confounded with the Marianus one of the founders of the original Irish monastery of Ratisbon. See Chap. xxv. §. 2.

§. II. When Gregory returned to Ratisbon, he was urged by his monks to go to Ireland for the purpose of receiving the money, which had been collected by Christian, and which was deposited with the archbishop of Cashel. He went thither and, besides the deposit, got still more money from divers noblemen, all which he brought to Ratisbon, and expended on the purchase of lands, &c. and on erecting a new magnificent monastery of hewn stone, having thrown down the old one that was in a ruinous state. (10) Under Gregory's government a new establishment was formed for the Irish at Vienna, Henry, duke of Austria, having given to him a monastery there, called of St. Mary and St. George, over which Gregory placed Sanctinus together with 24 brethren. This was after the 15th year reckoned from the time, in which Macarius was appointed superior of the house of Wurtzburg. (11) Meanwhile Walbrun, provost of the church of Eichstad, made over to Gregory a church called the Lord's sepulchre, which he had built in the suburbs of Ratisbon, together with lands, for the use of the Irish monks. (12) From what has been said of these establishments it is evident, that those of Wurtzburg, Nuremberg, Vienna, and others, including the old one of St. Peter's near Ratisbon, were all subordinate to that of St. James, and that they were, without exception, purely Irish, (13) except that, it seems, Scotchmen were occasionally admitted into them, whose countrymen afterwards in course of time, when the Irish gave up the name of Scots, obtained, under the usual trick of applying to themselves what belonged to the ancient and original Scots, exclusive possession of them, and went so far as to prevent Irishmen even from being received into them.

(10) Ib. In this narrative the aforesaid chronicle intermixes some of its anachronisms, such as making Gregory bring letters to a king Murcertach O'Brian from the German king Conrad. But there was no king Murcertach or Murtoogh O'Brian in Gregory's time; and Conrad was dead before Gregory, who had already visited Adrian IV. could have set out for Ireland.

(11) See the Life of Marianus, (cap. 6.) and the observations of the Bollandists at 9 February. The precise year of Macarius' appointment to Wurtzburg is not known; (see Not. 38. to Chap. xxvi.) but it could not have been prior to about 1140, whereas Gregory, during whose incumbency the monastery of Vienna was founded, did not become abbot of that of Ratisbon until about 15 years after that date.

(12) Ib.

(13) See Not. 12. to Chap. xxiv. The Bollandists (loc. cit. ib.) observe that none but Scots, that is, principally Irish, were received into the monasteries, called Monasteria Scotorum, in Germany; "In his porro coenobiis solummodo Scoti inhabitabant et nulli alii, uti vel sancit vel testatur Fredericus II. imperator in diplomate an. D. 1212."

§. III. Although Adrian IV. had such a regard for his old master Marianus, he was then concerned in hatching a plot against that good man's country, and in laying the foundation of the destruction of the independence of Ireland. Henry II., who became king of England about the same time that Adrian was placed on the chair of St. Peter, on being informed of his promotion wrote to him a complimentary letter of congratulation, and having thus opened the way for obtaining favours, applied to him in the year 1115 (14) by means of John of Salisbury then chaplain to Theobald archbishop of Canterbury, for a really important one. John, addressing the Pope in the king's name, asked him for permission for his master to take possession of Ireland for the purpose of extending the boundaries of the Church, of announcing to unlearned and rude people the truth of the Christian faith, and extirpating the weeds of vices from the field of the Lord. (15) What an apostolical and exemplary sovereign was

Henry Plantagenet! It is strange, that the Pope could have listened to such stuff, while he knew, that palliums had been sent, only three or four years before that time, to Ireland by his patron and benefactor, the good Pope Eugenius III. and must have been informed by Cardinal Paparo, who was, as St. Bernard states, a very worthy man, that many good regulations had been made; that there were excellent bishops in this country, such as Gelasius of Armagh and Christian of Lismore; and that the Irish church was not then in so degenerate a state as to require the intervention or the pious exertions of such a king as Henry. But the love of his country (England), (16) his wish to gratify Henry, and some other not very becoming reasons prevailed over every other consideration, and the condescending Pope with great cheerfulness and alacrity took upon himself to make over to Henry all Ireland, and got a letter or Bull drawn up to that effect, and directed to him, in which, among other queer things, he wishes him success in his undertaking, and expresses a hope, that it will conduce not only to his glory in this world but likewise to his eternal happiness in the next. He founds his right for making this grant on the notable principle, that Ireland and all the islands, which have received the Christian faith, undoubtedly belong to St. Peter and the holy Roman church. (17) Adrian requires of Henry to preserve the rights of the churches inviolate, and that, as he had promised to do, he would take care that a denarius should be annually paid from every house to St. Peter. (18) He sent to him, by John of Salisbury, a gold ring, adorned with a valuable emerald, as a token of investiture of his right to govern Ireland; which ring, it was ordered, should be kept in the public archives. (19)

(14) Matthew Paris and others, who are followed by Usher, (Sylloge at Adrian's Bull, No. 46.) assign this transaction to A.

1155; and Pagi (Critica, &c. ad A. 1159) observes, that the date, marked by Matthew Paris, is the true one. Fleury (L. 70. §. 16.) has it under 1156.

(15) These hypocritical reasons are given in the very beginning of the hopeful Bull of Adrian IV. “Laudabiliter et satis fructuose de glorioso nomine propagando in terris, et aeternae felicitatis praemio cumulando in caelis, tua magnificentia cogitat; dum ad dilatandos Ecclesiae terminos ad declarandam indoctis et rudibus populis Christianae fidei veritatem, et vitiorum plantaria de agro Dominico extirpanda, sicut Catholicus princeps, intendis; et ad id convenientius exequendum consilium Apostolicae sedis exigis ad favorem.” The entire Bull may be seen in the Appendix.

(16) This reason was assigned by Cardinal Pole in a speech, which he delivered in 1554, and in which, as quoted by Usher, (Sylloge, Not. to Adrian’s Bull) he said “Pope Adrian IV. by nation an Englishman, induced by the love of his country, granted the dominion of Ireland to Henry II. king of England. This had been observed long before by Donald O’Neill and the Irish chieftains in their letter to Pope John XXII. in which they state, that Adrian had been blinded by his affection for England, Anglicana affectione.”

(17) “Sane Hiberniam et omnes insulas, quibus sol justitiae Christus illuxit, et quae documenta fidei Christianae ceperunt, ad jus beati Petri et sacro-sanctae Romanæ ecclesiae (quod tua etiam nobilitas recognoscit) non est dubium pertinere.” By the words in the parenthesis the Pope probably meant to hint to Henry, that also his kingdom of England, as being in an island, belonged to the Holy see; and we find, that in the year 1173 Henry declared himself a vassal of Pope Alexander III. This nonsense of the Pope’s being the head owner of all Christian islands had been partially announced to the world in a bull of Urban II. dated A. 1091, in which, on disposing of the island of Corsica, he said that the emperor Constantine had given the islands to St. Peter and his vicars. (See Fleury, L. 64. §. 8.) But Constantine could nor give what did not belong to him, and accordingly, as Keating argues (Book 2. p. 3.) could not have transferred the sovereignty of Ireland to any Pope. Adrian IV. without mentioning Constantine, laid down a much larger plea, comprizing all islands, whether they had formed parts of the Roman empire or not. From his not appealing to any other right of his over Ireland we see, how unfounded is the story which some writers have, of the Irish nobility having conferred the sovereignty of all their country on Urban II. in the year 1092. Keating has this fable (ib. p. 113.) and places the transaction in the time of Donogh O'Brian king of Munster, attributing it to their hatred of Donogh. Yet elsewhere (ib. p. 3.) he says, that the offer of surrendering Ireland to the Pope was made by Donogh himself. I have already observed, (Not. 91. to Chap. xxiv.) that Donogh could not have been empowered to make such an offer, and that he must have been dead long before the time, to which Keating assigned it. Then how absurd is it to introduce, as stated in the other story, the Irish nobility making over the whole island to Urban II. in 1092, because they hated Donogh and refused to pay him obedience? For Donogh had fled from Ireland to Rome in 1064, whence he never returned; and in 1092 the king not only of Munster but of other parts of Ireland, and who has been called king of Ireland, was Murtoth O'Brian. And supposing even that Donogh was then living in Ireland, why should the Irish nobility at large have made either then or at any time such an offer to Rome? For Donogh was never king of all Ireland, and in the end was king only of Munster; and consequently the nobility of the greatest part of Ireland had nothing to do with paying or refusing obedience to him. Or will it be supposed, that during the vigorous reign of the powerful king Murtoth the nobility of Ireland would have dared to transfer his kingdom to the Pope? Neither in any of the Irish annals nor in the ecclesiastical documents of those times, whether Roman or Irish, is there a trace to be found of a transfer of Ireland to Urban II. or to any Pope of that or a preceding period by either Irish kings or Irish nobility, although the sly Italian Polydore Virgil, who has been followed by two Englishmen, Campion and Sanders, and also by some Irish writers, has told some big lies on this subject. In the letters of Lanfranc and Anselm, both Apostolic legates, to the kings Turloth and Murtoth O'Brian, there is not the least allusion to any temporal power claimed or at all exercised by the Pope in Ireland; while, on the contrary, these kings are addressed by them in the most respectful manner indicating, that they considered them in the light of sovereigns as independent as any in the universe. Nor is there a vestige of that pretended right in the accounts, that we have of the proceedings of Cardinal Paparo. But what sets the matter quite at rest is, that, if the Popes enjoyed the paramount dominion of Ireland, Adrian IV. would undoubtedly have alleged it as the foundation of his title to the granting of Ireland to Henry II. an argument, which, if it could be adduced, would have been infinitely preferable to that of the ownership of islands in general. I am therefore astonished, that Dr. O'Connor could have undertaken (Columbanus' Second Letter) the defence of the absurd story related by Keating, and headed his §. XII. with declaring it not fabulous. He admits, that Keating's chronology is wrong; but yet he does not prove a single part of the narrative, except what did not require to be proved, viz. that Donogh O'Brian fled to Rome, for which he refers to Tigernach and the Annals of Innisfallen, Ulster, and the 4 Masters. By the bye I think he was mistaken in assigning Donogh's flight to A. D. 1047. (See Not. 91. to Chap. xxiv.) But would it follow from Donogh's going to Rome, that the Irish nobility made over Ireland to the Pope, which is the main point of Keating's fable, that wanted defence? Would it not rather seem, that, having got rid of Donogh, such of the Irish nobility as did not like to obey him, viz. that of Munster alone, had no occasion whatsoever to apply to Rome? And that they did not is as clear as daylight from the fact, that after his flight Turlogh O'Brian, his nephew, was immediately, and without waiting for news from Rome, proclaimed king of Munster. (See Chap. xxii. §. 11.) Of what use was it for Dr. O'Connor to refer to Gregory the Seventh's letter to the same Turlogh, when king of Ireland, and to that Pope's insinuating a claim upon his kingdom? For surely Turlogh was not such a fool as to give it up to him. (See ib. §. 14.) Dr. O'Connor seems to reduce the substance of his whole argumentation to these words at p. 73. "What I state is, that Keating gives the tradition and the opinion of the great mass of the common Irish of his time." Be it so; but something more than the opinion of the common Irish of Keating's time would be requisite to prove, that either the Irish nobility or any Irish king had transferred the chief sovereignty of Ireland to Urban II. or to any other Pope of those days. What Keating adds about this pretended authority having been exercised in Ireland from the year 1092 down to the time of Adrian IV. is so contrary to the Irish history of that period, that it is not worth the honour of refutation. Who were the Roman viceroys or governors acting for the Popes? Is it because Cardinal Paparo brought palliums in 1151, and that he presided over a synod in 1152? What had such things to do with a temporal dominion over Ireland? As well might it be said, that the Popes were at that time sovereigns of every part of the Christian world, to which they used to send legates.

How then did these fables originate? They were not even thought of until a considerable time after the Anglo-Norman settlers and undertakers had spread themselves throughout Ireland. The Irish knew nothing about them as late as the year 1316, in which Donald O'Neill, prince of Ulster, and several chieftains, &c. wrote their letter of complaint and remonstrance to Pope John XXII. against the tyranny and cruelties of the English. This letter may be seen in M^rGeoghegan's Histoire d'Irlande, Tom. 2. p. 106. sqq. It is strange, that he makes this letter be written during the reign of Edward III. of England; for it is certain, that it was in the reign of Edward II. as is clear from its having been written, while Edward Bruce and the Scots were in Ireland, and from the circumstance that the letter or brief addressed, in consequence of it, by that Pope to the king of England, was written in 1319, and therefore to Edward II. some years before the accession of Edward III. On the other hand it could not have been directed to said pope prior to 1316, that being the first year of his pontificate. To return to our subject, the Irish state in their letter, that from the conversion of the nation by St. Patrick, and their coming under the spiritual obedience of the Roman church, until the year 1170 they had sixty-one kings, who acknowledged no superior in temporals, nullum in temporalibus recognoscentes superiorem. They say, that Adrian acted unjustly without any respect for law or justice, indebite, ordine juris omisso omnino. Hence it is plain, that they had no idea whatsoever of any former grant made of Ireland to Urban II. or to any Pope. In later times it probably occurred to some of the Irish that, whereas their enemies used to allege, in favour of their system of plunder and extermination, the grant made by Adrian IV. and confirmed by Alexander III., it would not be a bad plan to admit, that said

Popes had some sort of right to have acted as they did; for in that supposition, if two Popes had made over Ireland to the English, other Popes would be equally authorized to turn them out again; and it gradually began to be believed, that the Popes enjoyed a paramount jurisdiction over the country. But then a question arose, how the Popes had acquired it. Some observed that, as Donogh O'Brian had gone to Rome, the transfer of dominion might have been made by him or by the nobility hostile to him. Next it was found, that Urban II. had asserted about 1092 a claim to dominion over islands, and this was considered a very convenient date for the grant of the sovereignty of Ireland to the Holy see. Thus those stories were patched up in spite of chronology or of any authority whatsoever; and Keating swallowed them as he did many others.

(18) "Jure nimirum ecclesiarum illibato et integro permanente, et salva beato Petro et sacrosanctae Romanae ecclesiae de singulis domibus annua unius denarii pensione." I need not tell the reader, that this charge of a denarius, vulgarly called a penny, was in imitation of the Peterpence, which used for centuries to be paid by England. As to its origin there and to the then value of the denarius it is not my business to inquire. Let it suffice to say, that it was worth a good deal more than our present penny.

(19) John writes (Metalog. L. 4. cap. ult.); "Annulum quoque per me transmisit (Adrianus) aureum, smaragdo optimo decoratum, quo fieret investitura juris in gerenda Hibernia; idemque adhuc annulus in curiali archivo publico custodiri jussus est."

§. iv. Adrian's bull is of so unwarrantable and unjustifiable a nature, that some writers could not bring themselves to believe that he issued it, and have endeavoured to prove it a forgery; but their efforts were of no avail, and never did there exist a more real or authentic document. (20) It was, however, kept secret until a convenient time should occur for taking advantage of it. (21) Had any knowledge of it transpired in Ireland, it would undoubtedly have been mentioned in the synods, that were held not long after it was issued, and particularly in the great one at Mellifont of the year 1157. This synod was convoked for the purpose of consecrating the church of Mellifont, (22) and was attended by the primate Gelasius, Christian bishop of Lismore and Apostolic legate, 17 other bishops, and innumerable clergymen of inferior ranks. There were present also Murchertach or Murtoth O'Loghlin, king of Ireland, O'Eochadha, prince of Ulidia, Tiernan O'Ruaire, prince of Breffny, and O'Kerbhaill or Carrol, prince of Ergall or Oriel. After the consecration of the church Donogh O'Melaghlin, prince of Meath, was excommunicated by the clergy, and deprived of his principality by the king and the other princes, his brother Dermot being substituted in his stead. (23) On this occasion the king gave as an offering for his soul to God and the monks of Mellifont 140 oxen or cows, 60 ounces of gold, and a town-land, called Finnavair-na-ningen, near Drogheda. O'Kerbhaill gave also 60 ounces of gold, and as many more were presented by the wife of Tiernan O'Ruaire, who was a daughter of the prince of Meath, that is, a former prince Murchad. She likewise gave a golden chalice for the high altar, and sacred vestments, &c. for each of the nine others, that were in the church. This was the second year of Murtoth O'Loghlin being considered as king of Ireland, whereas he succeeded Turloth O'Conor, who died in 1156, (24) and was buried in the church of Clonmacnois near the altar of St. Kieran, after having distinguished himself by pious donations. Murtoth's reign continued until 1166. (25)

(20) Gratianus Lucius (Lynch) greatly exerted himself (Camb. Evers. cap. 22.) in striving to show, that the Bull is spurious, and Mac-Geoghegan would fain make us believe the same thing. It has not indeed been published in the Bullarium Romanum, the editors of which were ashamed of it. But there was a copy of it in the Vatican library, as is clear from its being referred to by Pope John XXII. in his Brief to Edward II. of England, written in 1319, which Brief is in the Bullarium, and may be seen in Wilkins'

Councils, Vol. 2. p. 491. in Brodin's Descriptio regni Hiberniae printed at Rome in 1721, and in Mac-Geoghegan's Histoire, &c. Tom. 2. p. 116. In said Brief the Pope not only refers to Adrian's Bull or letter by name, but says that he joins to the Brief a copy of it for the use of the king. And Baronius, who has published the Bull in his Annales, &c. at A. 1159, (not because he thought it was issued in that year) tells us, that he took his copy of it from a codex Vaticanus. Then we have the testimony of the very intriguer employed in procuring this Bull, John of Salisbury, who just before the words quoted (Not prec.) has; "Ad preces meas illustri regi Anglorum Henrico II. concessit (Adrianus) et dedi-Hiberniam jure haereditario possidendam, sicut literae ipsius testantur in hodiernum diem. Nam omnes insulae de jure antiquo, ex donatione Constantini quæ eam fundavit et dotavit, dicuntur ad Romanam ecclesiam pertinere. Annulum quoque," &c. Lynch, having seen this passage, thought that it was supposed to be taken from the Polycraticus of John of Salisbury, and then argues, that it is not in the genuine Polycraticus. But he ought to have known, that it was quoted not from the Polycraticus, but from another of John's works entitled Metalogicus. Adrian's grant of Ireland to Henry is expressly mentioned and confirmed by Pope Alexander III. in his letter to him of the year 1172. Giraldus Cambrensis, (De rebus a segestis, Part 2. cap. 11. and Hiberni expugn. L. 2. c. 6.) Matthew Paris (Historia major, &c. ad A. 1155.) and others give not only an account of said Bull, but the Bull itself; and Usher states, (Sylloge, not. on No. 46.) that he saw copies of it in the registers of the dioceses of Dublin and Lismore. What has been now said is surely more than enough to set aside the doubts of Lynch or of any other writer.

(21) Keating has (Book 2. p. 113.) an unfounded story about Henry II. having, on receiving the Bull, sent John of Salisbury with it to Ireland, and his having read it before the bishops and principal clergy assembled at Waterford. I am sure that he took this fable from Stanihurst's third book De rebus Hibernicis, where it is to be found in consequence of his having followed a corrupt copy of the Hibernia expugnata of Giraldus Cambrensis. Stanihurst has been corrected by his own nephew Usher, (Sylloge, Not. on No. 47.) from whose quotation of Giraldus' genuine text it appears, that Adrian's Bull was not read at Waterford until after

Henry had received also the confirmatory letter or brief of Alexander III. and had returned from Ireland. The reason, for which Henry deferred his expedition to Ireland is stated by Nicholas Trivet (at A. 1155.) to have been that, when Henry discussed with his nobles at Winchester the project of conquering Ireland, his mother opposed it. (See Usher, ib. Not. at No. 46.)

(22) There is an account of it from the 4 Masters (at A. 1157.) in Tr. Th. p. 309. and AA. SS. p. 655 and 776. It is mentioned at the same year in the Annals of Mary's abbey. The 4 Masters say, that it was held in the monastery of Drogheda, meaning, as Colgan observes, Mellifont, which is near that town. I do not find this synod marked in the Annals of Innisfallen, and I suspect that it has been confounded with that of Kells. Hence, perhaps, we may discover, why these Annals have placed the synod of Kells at Drogheda. (Compare with Not. 96. to Chap. xxvii.) Harris has (Archbishops of Armagh at Gelasius) a droll thought, as if the synod of Mellifont might have been a continuation by adjournment of the one of Kells, in the same manner as the council of Trent was adjourned different times. Pray, what was the multiplicity of business proposed at the synod of Kells, that could require adjournments? We have seen, that the few days, during which it sat, were fully sufficient for transacting all that it had to do, which was not a two hundredth part of the matters discussed in the council of Trent. Besides, it is positively stated, that this synod or assembly was held for the mere object of consecrating a church; and in fact very little more seems to have been done by it.

(23) Harris quotes (ib.) from certain anonymous annals, as the cause of the sentence passed against Donogh, "that the cursed atheist was excommunicated from the Church for dishonouring the Comorb (i. e. the primate), the staff of Jesus, and all the clergy."

(24) See Chap. xxvi. §. 1.

(25) Ware, Antiq. cap. 4. Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 449. &c. &c.

§. v. Another synod was held in 1158 at a place in Meath called Brigh-Thaig or Brigh-mac-Thaidhg, at which Gelasius and Christian were present, besides several other bishops, consisting in all of 25 or 26 prelates. (26) Many useful decrees, relative to ecclesiastical discipline and morals, were enacted by it; and, after the ordinary business was over, it resolved, that Derry should be raised to the rank of a regular episcopal see, and Flathbert O'Brolchan, abbot of its monastery, was appointed its bishop. (27) He was constituted also superintendent over all the abbeys of Ireland, which must be understood of those only of the Columbian order. (28) There were no Connaught bishops in this synod; for such of them as had set out with the intention of assisting at it were, after having passed Clonmacnois, met and plundered by some satellites of Dermod O'Melaghlin, prince of Meath; and, two men of their suite being killed, the bishops returned home. It seems, that they then held a synod of their own in Roscommon, in which some good regulations were made. (29) In the same year died a very respectable prelate, Donall or Donald O'Lonargan, archbishop of Cashel. (30) He had assisted at the council of Kells, and was succeeded by Donald O'Hullucan, who held the see until 1182. (31) The great church of Aghadoe in the now county of Kerry, was finished in said year, 1158, by Auliffe-mor, of the territory called Na-Cuimsionach, and son of Aongus O'Donoghue. (32) The history of the see of Aghadoe is exceedingly obscure; and I am not able to determine, whether it existed or not at this time. It is probable, that it rose from the monastery of Innisfallen, but when I cannot tell. (33) The Cistercian monastery of Newry was apparently founded about this time and richly endowed by Murtogh O'Loghlin or O'Laughlin, alias Mac-Laughlin, who in his charter or deed in favour of it calls himself king of all Ireland, a title which he could not have well assumed until the year 1156. (34) Another Cistercian house, called of Kyrie Eleison, had been established in 1154 at Odorney in the now county of Kerry, and supplied with monks from Magio or Nenay in the county of Limerick. (35) Two an-chorets of Armagh, Abel and Gilla-Muredach are said to have died in 1159. (36) To this year is assigned the death of O'Dubery, bishop of Cloyne. (37) Finn Mac-Kienan, bishop of Kildare, who had assisted at the council of Kells, died in 1160 at Killeigh in the now King's county, and was buried there. (38) At this year I find the death of Gilla-na-Naomh O'Duinn, chief professor of the monastery of Inisclothrann in Lough-ree, a celebrated historian, poet and orator. (39)

(26) See for this synod Tr. Th. p. 309. and AA. SS. p. 655 and 777.

(27) Compare with Not. 106. to Chap. xxvii.

(28) Surely it cannot be supposed, that Flathbert was placed over, for instance, the Cistercian abbeys. If we are to believe Keating, (Book 2. p. 103) Christian, bishop of Lismore, was then superior of all the monks of Ireland; but Colgan observes, (AA. SS. p. 654.) that this must be applied merely to the Cistercians, to whose order Christian had belonged. It must also be remarked, that Flathbert's jurisdiction could not have been intended as subversive of the rights of the abbot of Hy over the Irish Columbians.

(29) See Harris (Bishops, p. 59 and 467.) from the Annals of the Priory of All-saints at A. 1158.

(30) The Annals now mentioned, and those of Innisfallen at A. 1158. The former Annals, as quoted by Ware and Harris, (Bishops at his name) call him Chief elder of Munster, a learned and liberal man, especially to the poor.

(31) Ware and Harris, at Archbishops of Cashel.

(32) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1158.

(33) I do not find any mention of Aghadoe in Ware or Colgan. Harris speaks of it (Bishops at Ardfert) for the first time at A. 1588, as if united with Ardfert. It does not occur, as far as I can discover, in any old catalogue of the Irish sees. There was an old abbey at Aghadoe, in which Aodh O'Donoghue, a grandson of Auliffe-mor above mentioned, was buried in 1231. (Archdall at Aghadoe.) Smith says, (History of Kerry, p. 147.) that its cathedral was dedicated to St. Finnian. This was the St. Finnian, surnamed the leper, who founded the monastery of Innisfallen. According to Smith (ib. p. 67.) the diocese of Aghadoe comprized the southern part of Kerry, while the northern part belonged to that of Ardfert. He adds, that in the Register's books there is no distinction between the parishes belonging to the respective sees.

(34) This deed is referred to by Ware, (Antiq. cap. 26. at County of Down, Newry,) and called a charter of foundation. It is entitled Charta abbatiæ de Newry, and may be seen in the Monast. Anal. vol. 2. p. 1031.) and in Dr. O'Coner's 2. Proleg. to Rer. Hib. Script. p. 158. In it the king says, that he has granted and confirmed to the monks serving God in Nyvorcintracta (Newry) the town-land O'Cormaic, where was founded the monastery Atherathin, and also those of Enaratha, Crumglean, Caselanagan, Lissinelle, Croa-Druimfornacta, &c. &c. together with their waters, woods, mills, &c. He then speaks of the abbey, as if he were the original founder of it, and states that he has taken the monks under his protection; "Et quia ipsum monasterium Ybarcintracta (another name for Newry) mera mea voluntate collocavi, ipsos monachos, tamquam filios et domesticos fidei, sub protectione mea suscepi." Among the witnesses, whose names are signed to this charter, were Gilla-Mac-Liag (Gelasius) archbishop of Armagh; Aed O'Killedy, bishop of Ergall (Clogher); Muriach O'Coffay (Muredach O'Cobthaich), bishop of Tireheogain (Ardstraw, see Not. 100. to Chap. xxvii.); Melissa Mac In clerig-cuir, bishop of Ultonia (Ulidia or Down); and Gillacomida O'Caran, bishop of Tirconail (Raphoe). Then come the names of divers princes and nobles. If the monastery of Newry was founded at the same time that these grants were made, its foundation could not have been prior to 1156, unless it might be said, which it would be hard to suppose, that Mur-togh or Maurice O'Laughlin assumed the title of king of all Ireland before the death of Turlogh O'Conor. In the hypothesis of these endowments, and the foundation having taken place about one and the same time, we cannot admit the statement of the Annals of Mary's abbey, which assign the foundation to A. 1153. Ware had in his Coenobia Cisterciensia, published in 1626, affixed it to 1144; but afterwards, when treating of it in his Antiquities, (loc. cit.) he marks no date for it, and says, that it was founded by Maurice Mac-Loghlin, king of Ireland; and at Bishops of Raphoe (Gilbert O'Caran) he assigns Maurice's charter to about 1160. A strong difficulty, however, occurs from its being said, that Finn Mac-Kienan, alias Mac-Tiarcaín, bishop of Kildare, who had assisted at the council of Kells in 1152, (see Chap. xxvii. §. 14. and ib. Not.) had been abbot of the house of Newry Tr. Th. p. 630. where he is called son of Gorman, and Ware Bishops of Kildare, who makes him abbot of Viride lignum, that is, Newry. Now if Finn had been abbot there before he became a bishop, the abbey must have been founded before 1152, which would make it earlier than even the Annals of Mary's abbey have it. It is difficult to reconcile these statements. Might Finn, although bishop of Kildare, have been appointed to the government of the abbey of Newry after its foundation by Murtogh Mac Loghlin? It was not unusual for bishops to superintend monasteries. For instance St. Malachy, while bishop of Connor, was also abbot of Bangor. Or may we suppose, that Finn some time before his death resigned his see and withdrew to Newry? In either of these suppositions the monastery must have existed before 1160, that being the year, in which Finn died. Or, admitting that he was an abbot before he was raised to the episcopacy, might it be that he governed the monastery called Atherathin, which seems to have been prior to that of Newry, and of which the latter was perhaps a continuation. In this case it may be conjectured, that Finn was called abbot of Newry, inasmuch as the monks of Atherathin might have been removed to it. Be it as it may, and supposing that Finn had been an abbot some time or other, the foundation of the abbey of Newry cannot, I think, be placed earlier than about 1157.

(35) The date marked for Kyrie eleison in the Annals of Mary's abbey is A. 1154, and is followed by Ware (Antiq. cap. 26.), Harris, &c. Odorney is near the river Brick in the barony of Clanmaurice. I suppose it was on this account that Alemand attributed the foundation of this monastery to the Fitzmaurice family. Was he so ignorant as not to know, that there were no Fitzmaurices in Ireland in the year 1154?

(36) Tr. Th. p. 309.

(37) Ware, Bishops at Cloyne. Harris adds, that in the Annals of Innisfallen he is called Dubrein, abbot of Cluainvana.

(38) Ware, ib. at Kildare. See more above Not. 34. The Annals of Innisfallen have his death also at A. 1160.

(39) Said Annals ib. and also (A.A. SS. p. 52 and 200.) He died on the 17th of December.

§. VI. The death of several Irish prelates are marked at A. 1161. Among them was Gregory, the first archbishop of Dublin, who departed this life on the 8th of October, after a long incumbency of forty years. (40) He is represented as having been a prudent and learned man. Likewise the first archbishop of Tuam, Aedan O'Hoisin, who is much praised for his piety, learning, and liberality, died in this year, and was buried in his own cathedral under a monument inscribed with an Irish epitaph. He was immediately succeeded by Catholicus or Cadla O'Dubhai. (41) Next comes Teige or Thady O'Lonargan, bishop of Killaloe, a learned and charitable man. (42) Brendan the bishop of Kerry or Ardfert, who had attended at the council of Kells, died also in the same year on the 22d of September, and was buried at Ardfert. (43)

The see of Dublin being now vacant, several competitors started for it; but the electors fixed their eyes upon the holy abbot of Glendaloch, Laurence O'Toole, who for a long time resisted their proposal and wishes, but at length was forced to submit, and was consecrated archbishop in the cathedral of Dublin by Gelasius the primate, accompanied by many bishops. (44) This was in the year 1162. (45) The original name of this great and good man was Lorcan, (46) and he was of the illustrious house of the O'Tuathals, being the youngest son of Muriartach O'Tuathal, prince of Imaly, or Imaile, in the now county of Wicklow. (47) His mother was of the equally great family of the Hy-Brins, now usually called Byrne. (48) Lorcan or Laurence remained with his parents until he was about ten years old, when he was given as a hostage by his father to the king Diermit. (49) This wicked king bore a great hatred to Muriartach, and sent the boy to a barren district, where he was treated with great cruelty. His father, on being apprized of it, seized upon twelve of Diermit's soldiers, and threatened to put them to death, unless his son was restored to him. Diermit alarmed at this menace, and knowing that Muriartach's territory was impregnable and could defy all his power, thought it adviseable to dismiss Laurence, and sent him not to his father, but to the bishop of Glendaloch under the condition of getting back his twelve soldiers. The good bishop kept Laurence with himself for 12 days, placing him under the care of his chaplain, who treated him very kindly, and instructed him in the principles of the Christian doctrine. Laurence, who was at that time 12 years old, then returned to his father's residence. (50)

(40) Ware, ib. at Dublin. In divers Irish Annals Gregory's death is placed in 1162. But this is a mistake, owing to their having confounded the year of it with that of the accession of his successor, St. Laurence O'Toole, which was in 1162.

(41) Ware, ib. at Tuam.

(42) Ware (ib. at Killaloe) assigns his death to 1161; but the Annals of Innisfallen mark it at A. 1160.

(43) Ware (ib. at Ardfert) calls him Mel-Brendan O'Ronan, and strives to confound him with Mac-Ronan, bishop of Clonfert. But we have seen, (Not. 100 to Chap. xxvii.) that he was mistaken on this point. Harris adds, that Keating called him Maol Breanuin O'Ruanain. His wretched translator has indeed these names, which he took from Ware with some alteration; but Keating himself has not, who gave no other name to that bishop of Kerry than Brendan, as appears from the quotations of his original text by Colgan.

(44) Vita S. Laurentii, cap. 10. This Life was written by a Canon Regular of Eu, in the diocese of Rouen, on the frontiers of Normandy, not many years after the saint had died in the monastery of that place. It has been published by Surius, and republished by Messingham in his Florilegium.

(45) Four Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 309. Ware, Archbishops of Dublin at Laurence O'Toole.

(46) Four Masters, ib. Lorcan was latinized into Laurentius. In the quoted Life (cap. 2.) there is a ridiculous story about his having been called Laurentius from laurus, laurel.

(47) In said Life (cap. 1.) his father is called Muriartach O'Toheil, and is made king of Leinster. This is a mistake; for the O'Tuathal country was far from comprizing all that province. In Butler's Life of St. Laurence, at 14 November, the principality of Muriertach or Maurice is said to have been in the vicinity of Dublin. But Imaile, or, as usually called, the Glen of Imaile, is several miles from Dublin, lying to the S. W. of Glendaloch, and stretching to near the town of Donard.

(48) The author of the Vit. S. L. says (cap. 1.) that the saint's mother was called Inian Ivrien, that is, as he adds, daughter of a prince. But this is not the meaning of the words, which ought to be translated daughter of Hy-Brin or O'Brin, from the Irish Ingean, pronounced like Inian, a daughter, and Ivrien, that is, Hy-Brin. It is strange, that Harris did not see into this, when quoting (Archbishops of Dublin at Laurence, &c.) the passage of that author. In a note to the Life in Butler I find, instead of Hy-Brin or O'Brin, alias Byrne, the name written O'Brian. This is wrong; for the O'Brians were a quite distinct family, being of the Dalcassian princes of Munster, whereas the O'Brins were originally a Leinster house, supposed to be descended from the celebrated king Brandubh, who was killed about the year 602.

(49) This Diermit is usually, and I think justly, supposed to have been the famous Dermot Mac-Morough, king of Leinster, although Usher (Sylog. Not. ad No. 48.) makes him a different person. But I believe he was mistaken. Mac Morough was king of Leinster at the time that St. Laurence was ten years old.

(50) Vit. S. L. cap. 3. The then bishop of Glendaloch was apparently the immediate predecessor of Gilla-na-Naomh Laig-nech, who assisted at the council of Kells; but his name is not known.

§. VII. After some days his father, taking Laurence with him, paid a visit to the bishop of Glendaloch, and proposed to him to inquire, by casting lots, which of his sons he should dedicate to the ecclesiastical state. Laurence, on hearing this, is reported to have laughed, and said; "Father, there is no necessity for casting lots; if you allow me, I will embrace it with pleasure." The father smiled, and the bishop and others present were rejoiced to find, that a boy of such high lineage should offer himself for the service of the Church. His father then, consenting with joy, and taking him by the right hand, offered him to God and St. Coemhgen the patron of Glendaloch, recommending him to the care of the bishop for his instruction in learning and piety. Under his tuition and protection Laurence made great progress in the religious duties and acquirements necessary for a clergyman; but after some years he lost this worthy friend and master, who was carried off by death. (51) Yet he still persevered in his pious pursuits, and continued to improve in virtue, so that after some time he was, when 25 years of age, elected abbot of the monastery of Glendaloch, which was distinct from the bishopric. (52) This abbey was very rich, and it had been the custom to choose for its abbots men of the highest families, who might be able to protect the adjacent country. Laurence made the best possible use of the wealth of the monastery, distributing it among crowds of distressed and poor persons, who were afflicted by a dreadful famine, that raged throughout all that district for four years. (53) He used to provide them, by means of his monks, with corn and other necessaries, and his liberality was so extensive, that at length, the riches of the abbey not being sufficient for the wants of the poor, he distributed among them a treasure, which his father had left with him in deposit. He was, however, as great and holy men usually are, reviled by certain false and envious brethren, but who with all their malignity could not find any thing in his conduct deserving of reproach. By dint of prayers he cleared the country from some powerful robbers, who were overtaken by the divine vengeance. Towards the end of the first four years of his administration tranquillity was restored, and a very abundant harvest ensued; yet Laurence still continued his largesses to the poor, and set about building churches. About this time the then bishop of Glendaloch died, and every one called out for Laurence as his successor. But he refused to accept of the appointment, excusing himself on his not having as yet reached the age required for a bishop. (54) Some years after these occurrences Gregory, archbishop of Dublin, died, and Laurence was, as we have seen, appointed his successor. (55)

(51) Ib. capp. 4. 5.

(52) In Butler's Life this matter is not stated correctly. In it we read; " Upon the death of the bishop of Glendaloch, who was at the same time abbot of the monastery, Laurence, though but 25 years old, was chosen abbot, and only shunned the episcopal dignity by alleging, that the canons require in a bishop thirty years of age." Now in the first place there is no authority for saying that the bishop was also abbot of the monastery. What the Latin Life has is merely, that there were in the church of Glendaloch both an episcopal see and an abbey; but it does not state, that any bishop possessed them both together. On the contrary it constantly represents them as quite distinct, and informs us, (cap. 6.) that the abbey was far more wealthy than the see. Nor had Butler any reason for supposing, that it was upon the death of the bishop that Laurence was chosen abbot; and probably a considerable time elapsed between said death, and Laurence's promotion to the abbacy. Next comes a great mistake in Butler's imagining, that the bishop, after whose death Laurence shunned the episcopal dignity, was the same as the one, by whom he had been instructed, and after whose death he became abbot; as if the appointment to the abbacy and the offer of the bishopric had taken place at the same time. Laurence was, as will be soon seen, abbot for four years before he refused to accept of the see, that became vacant at the end of them by the death of the bishop, who consequently was not the one, who had been his master, but his successor.

(53) I do not know why Butler has four months instead of four years; for in Messingham's edition of the Latin Life four years are mentioned in cap. 6. and cap. 9.

(54) Vit. S. L. cap. 10. Laurence was then only 29 years old, having been appointed abbot at the age of 25. That foul-mouthed liar Ledwich gives, (Antiq. &c. p. 48.) as the reason of Laurence not having accepted of the see of Glendaloch, that "his ambition aspired to an higher dignity—the pall and the see of Dublin, and he soon attained them." But he did not soon attain them; for some years intervened before he became archbishop of Dublin. What idea could he have had at that time of his ever being chosen to govern the Danish city of Dublin, he a Tuathal, an O'Toole? It is as clear as day light that, instead of having an eye to that situation, he was forced to submit to it, the proposal relative to it having come, without his knowledge, from the electors of Dublin. The fact is, that Laurence did not wish to be a bishop at all. Many a conscientious man may agree to being made abbot; but holy men do not aspire to bishoprics. Harris was much more honest, who says, (Archbishops of Dublin at Laurence) that "he could not have the opportunities of exerting his strong disposition to charity, when bishop of Glendaloch, as he had when abbot; because the revenues of the bishopric were infinitely inferior to those of the abbacy." The bishop, in whose stead it was proposed to appoint Laurence, was, I am sure, Gilla-na-Naomh, mentioned above Not. 50. In what year he died I do not find; but it must have been between 1152 and 1161. the year of the death of Gregory of Dublin.

(55) Butler is wrong in stating that St. Laurence was only thirty years of age about the time of Gregory's death. This cannot agree with the Latin life, which states (cap. 10.) that a no short time, non breve tempus, elapsed between the time of Laurence's refusing the see of Glendaloch and that of the death of Gregory. Now Laurence was 29 years old when he made that refusal, and in Butler's hypothesis only one year would have passed between it and said death. But surely so short a space would not have been called a non breve tempus; or how could the author of said Life have said (cap. 33.) that he died full of days, plenus dierum, if he was only about thirty when he became archbishop of Dublin? For in this case he would not have outlived the age of fifty, whereas his incumbency began in 1162, and he died in 1180. Accordingly Harris was right (ib.) in reckoning some years between his refusal of the see of Glendaloch and the death of Gregory.

§. VIII. In the same year 1162 Gelasius of Armagh held a synod at Clane in the now county of Kildare, which was attended by 26 bishops, many abbots, and other clergymen. After enacting several decrees relative to Church discipline and morals, it was ordered, with the unanimous consent of the synod, that for the future no one should be admitted a Fer-leghinn, that is, a professor or teacher of theology, in any church in Ireland, unless he had previously studied for some time at Armagh. (56) When returned to his diocese Gelasius did not remain idle, but immediately made a visitation of it, exerting himself most strenuously to correct whatever abuses fell in his way. (57) To said year 1162 is assigned the death of Cathasac a scholastic of Derry. (58) As soon as St. Laurence was placed on the see of Dublin, Dermot Mac-Murrough, king of Leinster, forced upon the monks of Glendaloch a certain person as their abbot, in opposition to the reclamations and ancient privilege of the clergy and people, who used to elect the abbot of that monastery. But he was afterwards put out, and in his stead was appointed Thomas, a nephew of the saint, and an excellent and learned young man. (59) Meanwhile St. Laurence was busily employed in attending to the government of his diocese, being particularly anxious for the regular and constant celebration of the Church offices. Not long after his accession he induced the Canons of Christ-church, who were until then Secular canons, to become Canons Regular of the congregation of Aroasia. (60) He himself took the habit of the order, which he used to wear under his pontifical dress over a hair shirt, and observed its rules as much as he could, observing silence at the stated hours, and almost always attending along with them at the midnight offices, after which he often remained alone in the church, praying and singing psalms until day light, when he used to take a round in the church-yard or cemetery, chaunting the prayers for the faithful departed. Whenever it was in his power, he ate with the Canons in the refectory, practising, however, austerities, which their rule did not require; for he always abstained from flesh-meat, and on Fridays either took nothing at all, or, at most, some bread and water. Yet occasionally he entertained rich and respectable persons, treating them sumptuously, while he contrived to touch the poorest sort of food, and, instead of wine, to drink wine and water, so much diluted that it had merely the colour of wine. And as to the poor there were no bounds to his charity. Among his other acts of beneficence he took care to see fed in his presence a certain number of them every day, sometimes sixty or forty, and never fewer than thirty. He delighted in retiring now and then to Glendaloch, and used to spend some time, even to the number of forty days, in an adjoining cave, famous for the memory of St. Coemhgen or Kevin, in fasting, praying and contemplation. (61)

(56) Thus the Life of Gelasius, cap. 23. and the 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 309. But, according to certain anonymous annals, quoted by Harris, (Bishops at Gelasius) the decree was, as he explains it, that they should have been fostered, or else adopted by Armagh. As fostered it means that they must have studied at Armagh, conformably to the phrase alumnus, which is used for a student in a university or college; thus ex. c. alumnus universitatis Parisiensis signifies a student of the university of Paris. But the words, adopted by Armagh, indicate a class of persons, who had not actually studied there, but who should be approved of by, to use a modern technical term, the faculty of Armagh, and authorized by it to teach theology publicly, in the same manner as in our times degrees and diplomas are taken out at universities, and in many of them are granted, after previous examination, to persons, who had studied elsewhere. It is very probable, that the decree of Clane did not require, that all those, who might afterwards be appointed public professors of theology, should have actually studied at Armagh, and that it was sufficient that, on their capability being ascertained, they had been approved of by the president and doctors of that distinguished school. It is difficult to think, that, while there were several other great schools in Ireland, ex. c. Lismore, Clonmacnois, Clonard, &c. persons of aspiring genius, bent on improving themselves in theology, would have been forced to repair from all parts of the island to Armagh to prosecute their studies there. It was a sufficiently high compliment to its school or university to grant it the exclusive privilege of approving of and authorizing persons to become public teachers. The decree, understood in this manner, was a very wise one, inasmuch as it served to uphold uniformity of doctrine.

(57) Life, &c. cap. 25. (58) Tr. Th. p. 632.

(59) Vita S. S. cap. 16. The time, at which Thomas became abbot of Glendaloch, is not marked; but, Archdall (at Glendaloch) assigns it to A. D. 1162. This is a mistake, as appears not only from the Life now referred to, but likewise from the circumstance, that in or about 1166 the abbot of Glendaloch was Benignus, whose name is signed to the foundation charter granted at that time to the priory of All Saints near Dublin. (See Harris, Bishops, p. 375.) Benignus was undoubtedly the abbot forced upon the monks by king Dermot. It cannot be supposed that Thomas was abbot prior to Benignus; for it is plain from said Life, that Thomas held the abbacy for several years; and consequently he must be placed after Benignus. Archdall (ib.) has a strange statement, relative to that abbey, expressed in these words; “A. 1173. Earl Richard, king Edward’s lieutenant in Ireland, granted to Thomas, his clerk, the abbey and parsonage of Glendaloch, and the lands,” &c. In the first place there was no king Edward at that time. By Earl Richard, Archdall must have meant Strongbow; but how will this agree with his telling us immediately after, that the English adventurers plundered Glendaloch in 1176? Which shows, that it did not belong to any Englishman at that period. Dr Ledwich, quoting the Black book of Dublin, gives (Antiq. &c p. 48.) a more minute account of this pretended transaction. He says, that “ in 1173 Richard Strongbow—granted to Thomas, nephew of Laurence O’Toole, the abbey and parsonage of Glendaloch,” and that the charter was signed by Eva, wife of Strongbow, and other witnesses. If the Black book contains what he states, it contains a forgery. Thomas, the nephew, &c. did not get that abbey from Strongbow, but, as expressly mentioned in the above quoted Life (loc. cit.) from the clergy and people of Glendaloch. The Dr. himself tells us, that one of the witnesses to that deed marked Luke, archbishop of Dublin, whose incumbency began in 1228. He would fain change Luke into Laurence, that is, St. Laurence O’Toole. But the truth is, that this was a grant not of Richard Strongbow, but of Richard de Burgo, who was chief governor of Ireland in 1227 and 1228. (See in Ware’s and Harris’s Antiq. the Table of the Chief Governors, &c. of Ireland.) The fact is thus related by Archdall (ib.); “ A. 1228. Earl Richard, “ king Henry III.’s Lieutenant in Ireland, granted to Thomas, “ his clerk, the abbey and parsonage of Glendaloch, together with “ all its appurtenances, lands, and dignities, situate within and “ without the city in pure and perpetual alms.” The deed is in Harris’s MS. Collectanea at A. D. 1228, copied from the Black book of Dublin, Lib. nig. Archiep. Dublin. fol. 92, the very leaf, to which Ledwich refers. It mentions the numerous lands, &c. &c. and privileges belonging to the abbey, according as king Dermot had testified, “ sicut in verbo veritatis Diarmicius rex testatus est.” Richard is called simply Count without any addition indicating, that he was the same as Strongbow. Thomas is called his beloved and spiritual clerk, without the least hint, that he was the nephew of Laurence O’Toole. The names of the witnesses are Luke, archbishop of Dublin, the countess Eva, Walter de Riddell, Meiler son of Henry, and Nicholas a clerk. The Dr. makes Eva the same as the wife of Strongbow; but there was another Eva, her grand-daughter, and daughter of William Marshal earl of Pembroke. I do not find in Harris any grant made in 1173 by Strongbow, relative to Glendaloch. It is plain, notwithstanding Archdall's mistake, to which Ledwich added circumstances of his own, that the grant to the clerk Thomas was by Richard de Burgo in 1228. In Strongbow's days the English were not in possession of Glendaloch.

(60) Ib. cap. 11. The abbey of Aroasia in the diocese of Arras had been founded eighty years prior to these times. (Fleury, L. 63. §. 25.)

(61) Ib. cap. 12. down to 17.

§. ix. A cathedral was erected at Derry in the year 1164 by the new bishop of that see, Flathbert O'Brolchan, (62) with the assistance of Maurice or Murtoogh Mac-Laughlin, king of Ireland. (63) Between this king and Eochad king of Ulidia, son of Dunslevi, a great contention had broke out, and Eochad in revenge for some injuries, which he alleged to have received from Murtoogh, plundered and laid waste Dalrieda, and some other tracts subject to the immediate jurisdiction of Murtoogh, who incensed by these proceedings marched with a great army into Ulidia, destroyed with fire and sword every thing, except the churches, declared Eochad despoiled of his kingdom, and carrying off the nobles of Ulidia returned to Armagh. While he was there, Donagh O'Kervail, prince of Ergall, and Eochad himself, waited upon him, and together with Gelasius the primate and the clergy of Ulster supplicated for the pardon of Eochad. At length it was obtained in 1165, Eochad was restored to his kingdom, and the Ulidian nobles, on giving up their children as hostages to Mac-Laughlin, were allowed to return home. But this agreement did not last long; for in the next year, owing to some false reports, as if Eochad had violated the treaty, Mac-Laughlin, in a fit of anger, got his eyes put out. Gelasius was sorely afflicted at this outrage, and several princes were highly incensed, particularly Donogh O'Kervail of Ergall, who raising an army, and being joined by the forces of Hy-Briun and Conmacne, attacked with superior numbers Mac-Laughlin at Letter-luin, who, after having lost many of his nobles, fell himself in the field, A. D. 1166. (64) In the same year Gelasius met with another cause of grief, the dreadful conflagration of Armagh, which consumed the far greatest part of the city, and almost all the churches except that of St. Peter and St. Paul. (65) It is very singular, that a number of towns and places, distinguished in our ecclesiastical history, were destroyed by fire about these times. Thus Emly was burnt in 1162; Glendaloch in 1163; Clonfert, Clonmacnois, Louth, Tuam, and Tomgrany in 1164; Ferns in 1165, and again in 1166, by order of the king Dermot Mac-Morogh, lest it should fall into the hands of the Connacians. In said year also Louth was burnt again. (66) And yet I do not find any of these conflagrations attributed to the violence of contending parties, or to malicious or voluntary motives, except the second one of Ferns. The death of Moeliosa O'Lagenan, bishop of Emly, is marked at A. 1163; Donogh O'Brian, bishop of Killaloe, at A. 1165; (67) and that of Gilla Mac-Aiblen, bishop of Clonfert, at 1166. (68)

(62) See above §. 5.

(63) Ware, Bishops of Derry, and Harris, (ib. at Flathbert O'Brolcan) who mentions, that in the anonymous annals the king is called on this occasion Murtoth O'Neil. But, as he justly observes, this king was also an O'Neil, although he has been often called O'Laughlin or Mac-Laughlin from his grandfather Domnald Mac-Laughlin, who was likewise an O'Neill. (See Chap. xxiv. §. 14.)

(64) Life of Gelasius, capp. 25-26. Lettir-luin is there said to be in a wild tract or forest called Fiodh-Hua-nechach in Ulster, that is, as well as I can judge, somewhere near Lough-Neagh. Hy-briuin was probably that of Breifne (now Cavan and Leitrim) and Conmacne the adjoining one of Leitrim. (See Harris, Antiq.

ch. 7.) They belonged to O'Ruarc, who was hostile to the king Murtogh Mac-Laughlin.

(65) Life, &c. cap. 26. It is odd, that Colgan in Tr. Th. p. 309. assigns this great fire to A. 1167, although he quotes said Life, which has it at 1166.

(66) See Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. For the second burning of Ferns see AA. SS. p. 223.

(67) Ware, Bishops at Emly and Killaloe. Harris adds, that the Annals of Innisfallen place Maeliosa's death in 1164, and that other Irish annals assign to the same year that also of Donogh O'Brian.

(68) Ware, ib. at Clonfert. He has this bishop erroneously also at Ardfert, and, I believe, for no other reason except that he found him called comorban of Brendan. For, as Harris observes, (addition ib.) he is thus mentioned in the Annals of Innisfallen; Gilla-nem-Aiblen O'Hannicada, comorban of Brendan. But, although the church of Ardfert was dedicated to St. Brendan, who was a Kerry man, yet the title comorban of Brendan, constantly means the bishop of Clonfert.

§. x. On the death of Murtogh Mac-Laughlin the influence of the house of O'Conor, revived, and Roderic, the son of Turlogh, and king of Connaught, marched to Dublin, where he engaged the inhabitants in his cause, and, accompanied by a party of them, proceeded to Ulster and was there submitted to by the chieftains of the province. Returning thence, and having among his auxiliaries Tiernan O'Ruarc, prince of Breffny, he overran Leinster, was recognized as their chief superior by the lords and nobles, and deposed the profligate and tyrannical king of Leinster, Dermot Mac-Murchard or Mac-Morogh, another of his family being substituted in his place. The immediate cause of his dethronement was not, as vulgarly supposed, his having seduced and taken away Dearbhfhorguill or Dervorgal, daughter of Murchad or Murtogh O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, and wife of Tiernan O'Ruarc. This crime had been committed several years before, and as far back as A. 1153, (69) at a time when O'Ruarc had been dispossessed of his territories by Connaught and Leinster princes. As to the circumstances connected with this vile business, or how far the lady was culpable, this is not the place to inquire; and I will only observe, that the wicked Dermod availed himself of the opportunity of O'Ruarc's distressed situation for gaining his infamous end. O'Ruarc on being informed of it was greatly provoked, and, having contrived to get into favour with Turlogh O'Connor, then king of Ireland, applied to him for redress, who marching with an army into Leinster, rescued Dervorgal from Dermod's filthy embraces in the year 1154, and gave her up to her relatives in Meath. Thenceforth, in atonement for her follies, she distinguished herself by pious donations, and we have seen her making some considerable ones in 1157 to the church of Mellifont. (70) On the death of Turlogh O'Connor in 1156, and the accession of Murtoigh Mac-Laughlin to the throne of Ireland, Dermod attached himself to the new king, and was in the habit of harassing O'Ruarc. But the death of Mac-Laughlin in 1166 was fatal to him, and the day of retribution came at length for this bad man, when O'Ruarc, supported by Roderic O'Connor, had it in his power to wreak his vengeance on him in 1167, the year in which he was deposed. As he was hated almost by every one both in Leinster and elsewhere, (71) he became for some time an outcast and a vagabond. (72) Yet Dermod had founded religious houses. The oldest of them, that I meet with, was the nunnery of St. Mary de Hogges (73) near Dublin, as the city then stood, and near where the present church of St. Andrew is situated. He founded it about 1146 for nuns following the rule of St. Augustin according to the order of Aroasia. Gregory, archbishop of Dublin, and St. Malachy of Armagh, are said to have directed the building, and to have been benefactors to this nunnery. In 1151 Dermot subjected to it, as cells, two other nunneries, apparently of his own foundation, Kilclehin or Kilcleheen alias De Bello portu, in the now county of Kilkenny, near the Suir opposite to the city of Waterford, and Athaddy somewhere in the now county of Carlow. (74) In the same year 1151 he erected and endowed the abbey De Valle salutis, that is, of Baltinglas, for Cistercian monks. (75) Next, he founded and richly endowed a monastery for Augustin Canons at Ferns, his usual residence, in probably either 1160 or 1161. (76) Dermot's last foundation was the priory of All Saints on Hoggin-green, now called College-green, then outside Dublin, and on that part of it where Trinity college stands. He established it either a short time before or in the early part of 1166 for Arosian Canons, and made over to Edan O'Killedy, bishop of Louth or Clogher, for its use the lands of Ballidubgail, (Balldoyle) &c. (77)

(69) Gerald Barry, usually called Giraldus Cambrensis, attributes (Hibernia expugnata, L. 1. cap. 1.) the punishment inflicted by Roderic O'Conor, &c. on Dermot to his having taken away O'Ruarc's wife, as if only a very short time had intervened between these transactions. Keating has the same mistake, (Book 2. p. 105. Dublin ed. A. 1723) which he seems to have copied from Giraldus, and introduces O'Ruarc applying to Roderic, when king of Ireland, for redress for the injury done him. But O'Ruarc's wife had been taken out of Dermot's hands several years before Roderic became king of Ireland, and about two years before he was even king of Connaught. Leland, who treats this matter with great perspicuity, (History of Ireland, Book 1. ch. 1.) has ably refuted the position of Giraldus.

(70) Above §. 4.

(71) Giraldus, although partial to the consequences occasioned by Dermot's proceedings, yet gives him the following character (Hib. exp. L. 1. cap. 6.); "Nobilium oppressor, humilium erector, infestus suis, exosus alienis. Manus omnium contra ipsum, et ipse contrarius omni."

(72) See more on these subjects in Leland, Book 1. ch. 1.

(73) It has been observed, I think justly, as very probable, that Hoggis was not originally the name of the spot, but that it signified virgins, through an English corruption of the Irish word Ogh a virgin, so that St. Mary de Hoggis was the same as St. Mary of the virgins.

(74) See Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Dublin and counties of Kilkenny and Carlow; also Archdall at Dublin (St. Mary de Hoggis), Kilcleheen, and Athaddy. I do not find in what part of the county of Carlow Athaddy was situated.

(75) Some have assigned this abbey to 1148, as Ware states (ib. at County of Wicklow); but the Annals of Mary's abbey, itself a Cistercian house, place its foundation in 1151. Said annals are not apt to be wrong in making the Cistercian establishments later than they really were.

(76) Ware (ib. at County of Wexford) and Harris (Monast.) say, that this monastery was founded about 1158. On the other hand Archdall, (at Ferns) assign it to after 1166. Both these calculations are wrong; the former, because we find among the witnesses to Dermod's deed of foundation Malachy, bishop of Kildare. Now this Malachy, who is surnamed O'Brin or O'Birn, was not bishop there in 1158; for he succeeded Finn Mac-Kienan, who died in 1160. (Above §. 5.) Perhaps it may be said, that Finn had resigned his see some time before his death. (Compare with Not. 34.) Should this be admitted, I meet with nothing to set aside Ware's date. At any rate the foundation could not have been later than 1161, whereas another of the witnesses was St. Laurence O'Toole, while still abbot of Glendaloch, consequently before 1162. And this alone is sufficient to show the error of Archdall's calculation. Or who will imagine, that Dermod was engaged after 1166 in founding monasteries? Besides it is well known, that for some time after his dethronement in 1167 he was concealed in that same house of Augustin canons, in which he was received as having been the founder of it. (See Ware's Annals of Ireland at A. D. 1167) The foundation charter of this monastery may be seen in the Monasticon Angl. Vol. 2. p. 1040.

(77) The charter for the foundation of this priory is in Harris MS. Collectanea in the library of the Dublin Society. It is signed, among others, by Laurence, archbishop of Dublin. Ware (Antiq. cap. 26. at Dublin) and Harris (Monast.) mark this house at 1166; but, if this date be correct, I think it must have been in the early part of said year, and before, in consequence of the death of the king Murtoigh Mac-Loughlin, Dermod become exposed to the attacks of Roderic O'Conor and O'Ruarc. Edan, bishop of Clogher, is in that deed called Dermod's confessor. This was, I believe, owing to Dermod having, in his visits to Mac-Laughlin, occasionally met with Edan and confessed to him; but it is more than probable, that this intercourse ceased with Mac-Laughlin's death.

§. xi. Roderic O'Conor, having arranged matters in Leinster, went to Munster, where he made some regulations, being by this time recognized as king of all Ireland. He then returned to Meath, and held in the same year 1167 a great convention at Athboy, which was attended by the primate Gelasius, St. Laurence O'Toole, Cadla O'Dubhthaigh, archbishop of Tuam, and many others of the principal clergy; as also by Eochad O'Dunslevi, king of Ulidia, Dermod O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, Tiernan O'Ruairc, prince of Breffney, Donogh O'Kervail, prince of Ergall, Reginald, prince or chief of Dublin, Donogh O'Foelain, prince of the Desii, together with many noblemen and 13,000 horsemen. In this convention several decrees were made or renewed relative to the political state of the country and to ecclesiastical discipline. (78) Afterwards the king Roderic compelled the people of Hy-falgia (the ancient Offaly in Leinster) to restore the cattle and other property, which they had taken from the tenantry of Gelasius. (79) At the same year is marked the death of a very distinguished holy priest of Armagh, Moel-Michael O'Dothecain (80) and likewise that of O'Flanagan, bishop of Cloyne. (81) Flanachan O'Dubhai, bishop of Elphin, died in 1168, and was succeeded by Moeliosa O'Connachtain, who had assisted at the council of Kells, under the title of bishop of East Connaught. (82)

Dermod Mac-Morogh, bent on recovering his kingdom, and not caring by what means, set out for England with 60 followers in 1168, and arrived at Bristol. Being there informed, that Henry II. was in Aquitaine, he sailed for that country, and when introduced to him, offered himself as his vassal and placed his kingdom, in case he should be reinstated in it, under his supreme dominion. Henry promised to assist him, but not being then able to succour him with any considerable force gave him a letter patent directed to all his subjects, English, Normans, Welsh, Scots, &c. encouraging and inviting them to help him towards the attainment of his object. (83) Thence Dermot returned to Bristol and negotiated with Richard, surnamed Strongbow, Earl of Chepstow or Strigul, who promised, on certain conditions, to send him assistance in the course of the following spring. He then went to Wales, and there engaged in his cause, on pledging himself to reward them amply, Robert Fitz-Stephens and Maurice Fitz-Gerald, both Normans and maternal brothers. Having made these arrangements, he returned to Ireland and remained during the whole winter concealed at Ferns. (84) While waiting for his Norman auxiliaries, he was near being totally ruined, and would have been so, had his Irish opponents used greater circumspection. (85)

(78) Life of Gelasius, cap. 27. and Tr. Th. p. 310. This assembly is called a convention of the clergy and princes of Lethcuin, or the northern half of Ireland, and it was principally so. For the only person from the South, who is mentioned as present at it, was Donogh O'Foelain.

(79) Ib. Hence it appears, that the see of Armagh possessed lands in Leinster.

(80) Tr. Th. p. 309.

(81) Ware, Bishops at Cloyne.

(82) Ware, ib. at Elphin. To what I have said elsewhere (Not. 106. to Chap. xxvii.) concerning Flanachan and Moeliosa, their sees, and the hypothesis of Moeliosa having been only a coadjutor to him until his death, I may here add that it is probable, that Moeliosa had been bishop of Roscommon, while Flanachan was bishop of Elphin, and that the union between the two sees did not take place until, after Flanachan's death, Moeliosa became bishop also of Elphin, after which the united sees went under one name either of Elphin or Roscommon. Should it be objected, that they must have been united before the council of Kells, because Roscommon, with the omission of Elphin, is reckoned among the suffragan sees supposed to have been constituted by that council, I answer, that we are not bound to believe, that the list of Cencius Camerarius (of which ib.) was exactly the same as that drawn up by the council. Yet I do not pretend to decide upon this matter; whereas in either one or the other supposition it can be easily cleared up.

(83) Giraldus Cambr. Hib. expugn. L. 1. cap. 1. Henry's letter is as follows; "Henricus, rex Angliae, dux, &c. Universis fidelibus suis Anglis, Normannis, Gualensibus, et Scotis, cunctisque nationibus suae ditioni subditis, salutem—Cum praesentes ad vos literae pervenerint, noveritis nos Dermitium Lageniensium principem in gratiae nostrae et benevolentiae sinum suscepisse. Unde et quisquis ei de amplitudinis nostrae finibus, tamquam homini et fidei nostro, restitutionis auxilium impendere voluerit, se nostram ad hoc tam gratiam noverit quam licentiam obtinere."

(84) Ware, Annals of Ireland, Introduction. According to him Dermot returned to Ireland in 1168; but Leland (History, &c. ch. 1.) says in 1169.

(85) See Leland, ib.

§. XII. In 1169 Roderic O'Conor added to the salary of the chief professor of Armagh an annual donation of ten oxen, and by a deed, which he published, bound his successors to continue the same, on condition that the general school should be kept up both for students from all parts of Ireland and for those from Scotland. (86) It was in this year, according to several authors, and in the month of May, that Fitz-Stephen, accompanied by Miler Fitz-Henry, Milo-Fitz-David, Hervey de Monte Marisco (Mount-Morris) and several other horsemen or knights, together with 360 soldiers of different descriptions, landed near Bannow, in the now county of Wexford, being the first of the Anglo-Normans that made an attempt upon any part of Ireland. (87) On the next day Maurice de Prendergast arrived with an additional number of troops, and the whole army was soon after joined by Dermod himself at the head of five hundred of his best Leinster soldiers. The united body then marched to Wexford, where they met with a very sharp resistance from the Danish inhabitants; but not long after the town was surrendered to Dermod, who, according to promise, made it over, together with two adjoining cantreds, to Fitz-Stephen and Fitz-Gerald. He gave also some lands to Hervey de Monte Marisco. After this, being joined by many Irish and by the Wexford Danes, they advanced into Ossory, whose prince was then Donald Mac-Gilla-Patric (Fitzpatrick) a man very obnoxious to Dermod. They were repulsed several times by the Ossorians, who would in the end have beaten them off, had they not imprudently pursued them into a plain, where they were overpowered by the cavalry. Two hundred heads of the Ossorians were laid at Dermod's feet, who repeatedly leaped with savage joy, and actually bit off the nose and lips of one of them, which had belonged to a man, whom he particularly hated. Yet this beastly prince was at length obliged to make peace with Donald and the Ossorians. (88) Meanwhile Roderic O'Conor, being joined by several Irish princes, raised a great army and marched into Leinster, but finding Dermod's party, which many of the Irish had already forsaken, and his foreign auxiliaries encamped in an almost impregnable position not far from Ferns, did not think it prudent to attack them, and endeavoured to negociate with Fitz-Stephen and with Dermod himself for the departure of the strangers. Dermod seemed willing to agree to Roderic's proposals on condition of being reinstated in the kingdom of Leinster, and even delivered up an illegitimate son of his as a hostage to remain with Roderic. But on the arrival of Maurice Fitz-Gerald at Wexford, with an additional body of auxiliaries, he broke his word, and repaired with his united army to join him in that town. It was then determined to march upon Dublin, the environs of which they cruelly ravaged. Dermod was soon after under the necessity of accommodating matters with the citizens of Dublin, and agreed with them to leave the government of the city to Hasculph, their Danish prince, under fealty to himself. For at this time Roderic O'Connor was making war on Donald O'Brian, usually called king of Limerick, but in reality king of North Munster, who was married to a daughter of Dermod, and had entered into a league with him, to prevent the consequences of which he was attacked by Roderic. Dermod then sent Fitz-Stephen with an army to the assistance of O'Brian, which, united with his forces, forced Roderic to return to Connaught. (89) Thus, while the infatuated Irish were fighting among themselves, the common enemy was making his way towards undermining them all.

(86) Life of Gelasius, cap. 23. and Tr. Th. p. 310. Whether this mode of contributing to the emoluments of the head professor was owing to a scarcity of money, or to the consideration that payments in kind are less variable in value than those in specie, I am not able to tell.

(87) Ware, Annals &c. at Henry II. ch. 1. He assigns their arrival to A. 1169, as does also O'Flaherty, Ogygia. Part. III. cap. 94. and MS. note to Tr. Th. p. 310. Colgan (ib.) seems to place it in A. 1170, although in the dedication of the work he quotes the Irish annals, which mark the arrival of a fleet from England in Ireland at 1169. Leland, having placed Dermod's return to Ireland in 1169, (see Not. 84) affixes (loc. cit.) the landing of Fitz Stephen to the following year, i. e. 1170. As I am not writing the civil history of Ireland, I shall not enter into a controversy on this subject; but I think Ware's and O'Flaherty's dates more correct, and will follow them. I must, however, add, that also Lord Lyttleton (History of king Henry, II. Book 4.) assigns the arrival of Fitz-Stephens to A. 1169. I pass by Keating, or his wretched translator, who (Book 2. p. 107) marks it at 1175. This is a strange blunder; for afterwards mention is made of 1171 and 1172, as years before which the English had come to Ireland. Perhaps it is a typographical error.

(88) See Giraldus, Hib. exp. Lyttleton, and Leland, loc. citt.

(89) Ware, Annals at A. 1169, Lyttleton, loc. cit. &c. &c.

§. XIII. Dermot, elated by his success, took it into his head to become king of all Ireland, but was advised to wait for the reinforcements, which Strongbow had promised to send him, to whom he accordingly wrote a very pressing letter, urging him to fulfil his promise. After some time Strongbow dispatched in the beginning of May, A. D. 1170, Raymond le Grose with some knights and archers, who landed on the Wexford coast not far from Waterford under a rock then called Dundolf, (90) where they fortified themselves, expecting the arrival of Strongbow. They were soon after joined by Hervey de Monte Marisco and a few other knights. The citizens of Waterford thought it adviseable to attack them before their numbers should be increased, and being joined by O'Faolain of the Desies, and O'Ryan of Idrone, (91) crossed the Suir, and invested their fort, which they entered, on which occasion some desperate fighting ensued, and after great loss in slain, seventy of the citizens were made prisoners. These were, on the advice and instigation of Hervey, and in opposition to the opinion of the valiant Raymond, most cruelly put to death by first breaking their limbs, and then throwing them headlong into the sea. (92) In the course of the same year 1170, Strongbow landed near Waterford on the 23d of August, with about 1200 men, 200 of whom were knights. (93) Without waiting for a junction with Dermot's forces, or even with those of Raymond, which were still in the fort, he attacked Waterford, and, though twice repulsed, took it by storm on the 25th. The inhabitants were dreadfully slaughtered, and on his taking also a tower, in which, among others, were Reginald prince of the Waterford Danes, and O'Faolain, they were condemned to death, but saved through the intercession of Dermod, who came up with Fitz-Stephen and others just after the victory. Not many hours afterwards Eva, (94) a daughter of Dermod, was, according to a former stipulation, married to Strongbow, and they were publicly declared heirs to king Dermod. But on intelligence being received that Dublin and its governor Hasculph had shaken off all obedience to Dermod, he and Strongbow hastened to march to that city, leaving a garrison at Waterford. Proceeding by mountainous and bye ways they arrived under the walls of Dublin, and at length, owing to the bravery of Milo de Cogan and Raymond, got possession of it; Hasculph and many others having escaped to ships lying in the harbour, and sailed to the Northward. Before the taking of the city St. Laurence O'Toole had been negotiating with the besiegers for good terms for his flock, and after their entrance exerted himself as far as he could for their protection. Amidst the dreadful massacre and plundering of the city he exposed himself in all directions, dragged the palpitating bodies of the slain from the hands of the enemies, and got them buried. Such persons as survived he relieved in every possible manner. At great risk he obtained that the clergy might remain in their situations, and recovered from the pillagers the books and ornaments, which had belonged to the churches. (95)

(90) Smith (History of Waterford, p. 99.) calls this place Dundrone. I do not find a place of this name. Perhaps it was the now Duncannon fort. At any rate it was on the co. Wexford side of the Suir.

(91) This Idrone must not be confounded with the Idrone of the now county of Carlow. Smith (ib.) says, that it was a part of Ossory, i. e. a part near the Suir.

(92) Lord Lyttleton bitterly exclaims against this barbarous act of iniquity.

(93) The date of this arrival marked by Ware, O'Flaherty, and Lyttleton is A. 1170. Leland has 1171; but I think he was mistaken.

(94) Keating (Book 2. p. 110.) calls her Aoife.

(95) Vita S Laurentii, cap. 18.

§. XIV. At this time Roderic O'Connor was in Connaught, whither he had been obliged to repair for the purpose of defending his hereditary territories against the aggressions and devastations of Donald O'Brian. After the fall of Dublin Dermod and Strongbow, leaving the government of the city to Milo de Cogan, marched into Meath, then under the administration of O'Ruarc, and into Breffny, O'Ruarc's own principality, which countries they ravaged, committing incredible barbarities on the inhabitants. Roderic was so incensed at these proceedings, that he sent messengers to Dermod with a letter, in which upbraiding him with his perfidy and perjury in having violated the agreement entered into between them, he required of him to desist from his measures and send back the foreigners, and, in case of his refusal, threatened to send him the head of his son, whom he held as a hostage. To this Dermod replied, that he would neither dismiss the foreigners, nor cease in his pursuits until he should become monarch of all Ireland. Some say, that Roderic, on receiving this insolent answer, actually executed his threat; but this is denied by others. (96) About this time a general synod of the Irish clergy was held at Armagh, in which, after much deliberation concerning the arrival of the foreigners in Ireland, it was unanimously declared, that this misfortune was a judgment of God on account of the sins of the people, and particularly because they used to buy English persons from merchants, robbers, and pirates, and reduce them to slavery, and that it would appear, that they in their turn were to be enslaved by that nation. For the English people, while their kingdom was still firm, were, through a common vice of the nation, accustomed to expose their children for sale, and, even before they were in any want or distress, to sell their own sons and relatives to the Irish. It might therefore be probably supposed, that for this enormous crime the purchasers deserved the yoke of slavery, in the same manner as the sellers had been treated already (in consequence of the Norman conquest of England). It was therefore decreed, and unanimously ordered by the synod, that all the English throughout Ireland, who might happen to be in a state of slavery, should be restored to their original liberty. (97) Dermod and Strongbow, after their expedition in Meath and Breffny proceeded to Leinster, and expelled from their territories O'Connor of Ophaly and Fitzpatrick of Ossory. Then, as winter was coming on, Dermod returned to Ferns, and Strongbow to Waterford. Meanwhile the king, Henry II. became jealous of the progress of Strongbow, and, among other measures taken to put a stop to it, issued an order, that all his subjects, who had gone to Ireland, should return before the following Easter. But Strongbow found means to appease him, and was allowed to remain with his troops in Ireland.

(96) Keating (ib. p. 111.) states, that Roderic, although highly provoked at Dermod's insolence, yet on mature reflection abstained from putting the hostage to death.

(97) I have taken this remarkable narrative from Giraldus, (Hib. exp. L. 1. cap. 18.) adding only the few words within the parenthesis, which I think necessary for understanding his meaning. His text is, as follows: "His itaque completis, convocato apud Ardmachiam totius Hiberniae clero ; et super advenarum in insulam adventu tractato diutius et deliberato ; tandem communis omnium in hoc sententia resedit, propter peccata scilicet populi sui, eoque praecipue quod Anglos olim tam a mercatoribus, quam a praedonibus atque pyratis, emere passim et in servitutem redigere consueverant, divinae censura vindictae hoc eis incommodum accidisse, ut et ipsi quoque ab eadem gente in servitutem vice reciproca jam redigantur. Anglorum namque populus, adhuc integro eorum regno, communi gentis vitio, liberos suos venales exponere, et, priusquam inopiam ullam aut inedia sustinerent, filios proprios et cognatos in Hiberniam vendere consueverant. Unde et probabiliter credi potest, sicut venditores olim, ita et emptores tam enormi delicto juga servitutis jam meruisse. Decretum est itaque praedicto Concilio, et cum universitatis consensu publice statutum, ut Angli ubique per insulam servitutis vinculo mancipati in pristinam revocentur libertatem." The editors of Ware's Annals in English make him say, (at A. 1170) that it was concluded by the clergy, that "God had afflicted the Irish, particularly for their selling the English taken by pirates, or otherwise." This is a shameful, and, I am sure, a wilful perversion of Ware's original. What Ware actually wrote I cannot tell, whereas the part of his Annals, prior to the reign of Henry VII., was not published until many years after his death ; but this much is certain, that he never wrote what those editors have here attributed to him ; for he understood Latin very well, and was too honest to corrupt his authorities. Could he have said, that the Irish used to sell the English, in direct opposition to Giraldus, whom he had before his eyes, and who positively states that they were Englishmen, who used to sell them, and mentions as the only fault of the Irish, that they were wont to buy them? Those editors wished to throw the whole blame upon the Irish, and to screen the English from the direct charge brought against that nation ; and this was also their reason for omitting what Giraldus has about Englishmen selling their children and relatives. He is not the only authority for this nefarious practice ; for it is mentioned and prohibited in the 28th canon of the council of London held under Anselm, A. D. 1102 (ap. Wilkins Concil. §c. V. 1. p. 383) ; "Ne quis illud nefarium negotium, quo hactenus homines in Anglia solebant velut bruta animalia venditari, deinceps ullatenus facere praesumat."

§. xv. Dermot died at Ferns on the 4th of May in the following year 1171. (98) It is said, that his disease was of a horrid and unknown kind, and that he died in a state of impenitence, as an object of divine wrath for his many crimes during a long reign, and for the mischiefs and bloodshed caused by his tyranny and ambition. Hasculph, the late governor of Dublin, having during his absence procured from the Orkneys and other Islands an army of Norwegians, commanded by John, surnamed the Furious, entered in this year the Liffey with sixty ships, and landing the men, attacked the eastern gate of the city; but after much hard fighting, in which many were slain on both sides, was repulsed by Milo de Cogan, owing chiefly to an unexpected attack on the assailants made by his brother Richard with a body of cavalry. In this conflict John was killed, and Hasculph taken prisoner, whom, on account of a bold declaration of his publicly announced, Milo ordered to be beheaded, while the survivors returned to their ships. After this affair Strongbow, together with Fitzgerald, Raymond, &c. repaired to Dublin, and was soon after reduced to a very perilous state. For St. Laurence, who was a great lover of his country, and had been an eyewitness of the atrocities committed by the foreigners on their becoming masters of the city, encouraged by means of messengers, the king Roderic and other Irish princes to unite for the total expulsion of these marauders, and joined them in applying for assistance to Godred, the king of Mann, and of other islands. A short time elapsed before Roderic invested Dublin with a great army, and thirty ships, sent by Godred, blockaded the harbour. Roderic's plan was to compel Strongbow and his forces by means of famine to capitulate and quit Ireland; and, as the siege and blockade continued nearly two months, they were brought to great distress. St. Laurence was on this occasion employed in arranging terms, and in the name of the Irish assembly announced to Strongbow and his people, that it was required, that they should give up all the places that they occupied, and leave Ireland on a certain fixed day. (99) But the Irish, notwithstanding their high demands, carried on the siege in a very slovenly manner; and the besieged, unwilling to submit to their proposals, availed themselves of their negligence to make a sudden and vigorous sally with a chosen and numerous body of knights, esquires, and infantry, in which they succeeded even beyond their expectation, the Irish being taken quite unawares, and through want of foresight of such a desperate attempt, in a state of disorder and confusion. Roderic, against whose quarters the chief attack was made, was then bathing, and had a very narrow escape. The whole Irish army suffering great loss, was dispersed, and the victors returned to Dublin, bringing with them great spoil of baggage, and particularly of provisions.

(98) Ware, Annals at A. 1170. Others assign his death to the close of A. 1170. Keating (Book 2. p. 112.) has it in May, but erroneously, I think, of the year 1172. He himself discovers his error by telling us, that Dermod died in the May next after the murder of Thomas Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, which he supposed to have occurred in 1171. Now it is well known, that said murder was committed on the 29th of December, A. D. 1170.

(99) Leland, History, &c. B. 1. ch. 2. See also for St. Laurence's proceedings. Giraldus, Hib. exp. cap. 22. Ware, Annals at A. 1171. Lyttleton, &c. &c.

CHAP. XXIX.

Arrival of Henry II. in Ireland—several of the Irish princes submit to him—Synod of Cashel, not attended by the northern bishops—Decrees said to have passed there—The payment of Peter-pence never enforced in Ireland—Fabulous story of the Irish baptizing their children with milk—Decrees of the Synod of Cashel not observed by the people of Ireland—Departure of Henry from Ireland—Provincial Synod of Tuam—Deaths and succession of several bishops—The Bull of Adrian IV. and confirmatory Brief of Alexander III. sent into Ireland by Henry II.—Conference between O'Ruarc and Hugh de Lacy—Murder and barbarous treatment of the body of O'Ruarc by the English—Atrocities committed by the English in various parts of Ireland—The English defeated by Donald O'Brien—Roderic O'Conor ravages Meath—Fortifications of Trim and Duleek demolished by Hugh Tirrel—Reymond le Grose and Donald prince of Ossory besiege Limerick—Treaty of Windsor between Henry II. and Roderic O'Conor—St. Laurence O'Toole a subscribing witness to this treaty—Augustin, an Irishman, appointed bishop of Waterford by Henry—St. Laurence O'Toole wounded by a madman, whilst approaching the Altar to celebrate Mass in the Church of Canterbury—Death and succession of other bishops—Priory of St. John of Jerusalem at Kilmainham founded—Death of Strongbow—Castle of Slane attacked and demolished by Mac Loughlin—War between De Courcy and Mac Dunlevy—Synod of Dublin—Foundation of the abbey of St. Thomas at Dublin—Disensions between Roderic O'Conor and his son—Connaught invaded by the English—they are compelled by hunger to retreat, and are attacked and defeated by the Conacians—John declared king of Ireland by his father Henry II.—Several districts in Ireland granted by Henry to his followers—John De Courcy defeated in Ulster—Foundation of the Abbey of Rosglas or Monastereven—Irish bishops who attended the 3d General Council of Lateran—St. Laurence O'Toole recives a Bull from the Pope confirming the jurisdiction of the see of Dublin over those of Glendalough, Kildare, Ferns, and Ossory—Foundation of the Abbey of Ashroe, or Easrue Several churches burned—Hugh de Lacy appointed Lord Deputy—St. Laurence O'Toole exerts himself in reforming the manners of all ranks of people—goes to England for the purpose of settling a dispute between Henry II. and Roderic O'Conor—Henry refuses him permission to return to Ireland—He passes into France, takes sick, and dies in the monastery of Augum, now Eu, at the entrance of Normandy—Canonized by Pope Honorius III.

SECT. I.

PASSING over some minor transactions, the detail of which would be too tedious, and not within my plan, I now proceed to the arrival of Henry II., who landed at Waterford on St. Luke's day, the 18th of October, A. D. 1171, (1) with an army consisting of 500 knights (2) and about 4000 men at arms. He remained there for some days, and appeared rather as a protector than an enemy of the Irish people. During his stay in that city he was waited upon by Dermod Mac-Carthy, who has been called by some writers king of Cork, but who should rather have been styled king of Desmond. Dermod submitted to him, swore fealty, and giving him hostages promised to pay an annual tribute. It has been falsely and foolishly said, that all the archbi-shops, bishops, and abbots of Ireland attended Henry at Waterford, and tendered him their obedience. (3) The only bishop whom, in all probability, the king saw there was that of Waterford, whoever he was. Thence he marched with his army to Lismore, and afterwards to Cashel, where, or near which city, he was met by Donald O'Brian, king of Thomond, who submitted to him, and acknowledged himself his vassal. About the same time O'Faolain of the Desies, and Donald Mac-Gilla-Patric of Ossory acted in the same manner. These princes were well received and honourably treated by Henry, who soon after proceeded to Dublin. Here he was waited upon by Murchard O'Carrol prince of Ergal, Tiernan O'Ruarc of Breffny, and some other princes, who also submitted themselves to his supreme authority. Those of the northern parts of Ulster did not attend, and Roderic O'Conor delayed to imitate the example of the minor potentates. At length, however, he agreed to meet, on the borders of his Connaught kingdom near the Shannon, Hugh de Lacy and William Fitz-Aldelm, who were empowered by Henry to receive his act of homage, and to treat of the tribute, which he would have to pay. The matter was thus settled, and peace was declared between the two kings. (4) Henry spent the Christmas festival of 1171 in Dublin, and splendidly entertained such of the Irish princes and nobles as were in that city.

(1) This is the year marked by Ware, O'Flaherty, Lyttelton, Fleury (Hist. Eccl. L. 72. §. 37.) &c. &c. Keating (Book 2. p. 112) has A. 1172, and so has Leland, B. 1. ch. 3. But they were mistaken; and it is clear even from Hoveden, who seems to favour their opinion, that Henry's arrival was in 1171; for he tells us, that the Christmas day, which Henry spent in Dublin, fell on a Saturday. Now that was the Christmas day of 1171, not of 1172, in which that festival fell on Monday.

(2) Maurice Regan, as Ware observes, mentions only 400. Giraldus and Keating have 500.

(3) Hoveden, whether the author of it or not, has this lie, and so has Brompton, the lying abbot of Iorval, of whom more hereafter; but Giraldus has it not. It is not only a lie, but a foolish one. For how could all the archbishops, bishops, &c. have come to Waterford time enough to pay their obeisance to Henry? Or would Roderic O'Connor, or O'Ruarc have allowed the bishops of their states to wait upon him? Next it is certain, that neither the primate Gelasius nor any bishop of the Ulster province called upon Henry, at least until he was arrived in Dublin. Ware says nothing about this fable, nor does Keating; and it is rejected by Lyttelton (Book 4.) and Leland, B. 1. ch. 3. Hoveden then, gives a list (nearly followed by Brompton) of the archiepiscopal and episcopal sees, which, he says, existed at that time in Ireland, reckoning them according to the order and dignity of the archiepiscopates, 1. Armagh. 2. Cashel. 3. Dublin. 4. Tuam. His account of the suffragan sees, which, according to him, were only 28, is quite incorrect; for there were at that period not fewer than 34 such sees. (See Chap. XXVII. §. 15.) And his names for several of those, which he has, are so strange and unlike the Irish ones, that it can hardly be guessed what places he meant. Who could understand what were such sees as Thuensis, Ceneversis, Lucapniarensis, Erupolensis, Kinfernensis, Kinlathensis, &c.? Yet the soi-disant antiquary Ledwich (Ant. p. 440. seqq.) would fain prefer this wretched catalogue to any other of our sees at that time. Any thing was good enough for him, except Irish documents. I suppose, that the sees mentioned by Hoveden, or Brompton, are those, which Dr. Milner alludes to, when he confidently tells us, (Additional note to his Letters on Ireland, p. 50.) "that it was not till the English invasion that the Irish prelates found themselves enabled to establish regular and canonical limits to their dioceses and succession among themselves." I wish he had told us, where he picked up this piece of information. Not to speak of the synod of Rathbreasil, did he not know, that matters of this kind had been treated of and settled by the council of Kells?

(4) Giraldus pretends, (Hib. exp. L. 1. cap. 32.) that this act of Roderic virtually subjected all Ireland and its inferior kings and princes to the power of Henry, inasmuch as he had been the head of them. This is a false conclusion; for Roderic was only an elective and little more than nominal king of Ireland, and the only consequence of his submission was at most, that his hereditary kingdom of Connaught became feudatory to Henry. No act of his could be binding on the other kings and princes, no more than, according to the late Germanic constitution, all Germany, including the Prussian states, &c. &c. could have been made over by an Emperor to a foreign power.

§. II. Early in the following year 1172 a synod was held at Cashel, (5) which met by order of Henry for the purpose of regulating some matters of ecclesiastical discipline. It has been said, that all the archbishops and bishops of Ireland, besides abbots, &c. attended. (6) This is not true; for in the first place the primate Gelasius did not appear there, not because his great age or infirmities prevented him, but because he did not choose to assist at said synod. (7) And we know that in the same year Gelasius was able to make a general visitation of the whole province of Connaught, which he continued through Ulster, until he returned to Armagh, where he spent the remainder of his life. (8) Next it is certain, that no suffragan bishop of Ulster was present at the council of Cashel, (9) except it may be supposed, that the bishop of Ergall or Clogher might have attended in compliment to his master O'Carrol. Donald O'Hullucan of Cashel, St. Laurence of Dublin, and Catholicus, or Cadla, of Tuam are stated to have assisted at it, together with their suffragan bishops, besides abbots, archdeacons, &c. On the part of Henry, and sent by him, there were Ralph, archdeacon of Landaff, Nicholas his chaplain, and some other ecclesiastics. The president was Christian, bishop of Lismore and apostolic legate. Were we to believe certain authors, a list was drawn up of what they were pleased to call enormities and dirty practices of the Irish, and sealed by Christian. This is a silly tale of a lying faction; (10) for, whatever real abuses in matters of church discipline might have existed in Ireland, they had been already corrected in various synods, at several of which Christian had been present. We may judge of those pretended enormities from the tenour of the wonderful regulations proposed to the synod by Henry's messengers for the reformation of the Irish church, and afterwards agreed to. According to one account it was decreed, 1. That children should be brought to the church and baptized there in clean water, with the triple immersion, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and that this should be done by the priests, except in case of imminent danger of death, in which they may be baptized any where, and by any person whatsoever without distinction of sex or order. 2. It was ordered, that tithes should be paid to the churches out of every sort of property; and 3. That all laymen, who wish to take wives, should take them according to the Canon law. (11)

(5) Giraldus places this synod after Henry had received various Irish princes at Dublin and passed Christmas there. Consequently he assigns it to A. 1172. But the summons for its assembling had been issued earlier. Hoveden, amidst other bungling, tells us, that it was held while Henry was still at Waterford, before he went to Dublin. (See Rerum Anglican. Scriptores, p. 528. Frankfort, A. 1601.) This is truly ridiculous; as if prelates from various parts of Ireland could have assembled at Cashel during the short time that Henry was at Waterford, or as if they would have obeyed his summons before their sovereigns had recognized his authority.

(6) This is insinuated by Hoveden, (ib.) after having previously given the notable list of Irish sees, of which above Not. 3.

(7) Giraldus pretends, (Hib. exp. L. 1. cap. 34.) that the absence of Gelasius was owing to his age and infirmities, but adds that he afterwards waited on Henry at Dublin. This is, I am sure, a fabrication of Giraldus' own; for, had Gelasius done so, it cannot be doubted that so memorable a visit would have been recorded in his Life, which is very particular as to his transactions, or in some of the Irish annals. Now neither the one nor the other have a word about it. The fact is, that Gelasius was not afraid of Henry's displeasure; for none of the Ulster princes, except O'Ker-vaill or Carrol of Ergal, who was not Gelasius's sovereign, had submitted to Henry. Lyttleton conjectures, (Book 4.) that Gelasius absented himself on account of his unwillingness to yield the precedence in the synod to Christian of Lismore the Pope's legate. This is a pitiful conjecture; but Lyttleton did not know, that Gelasius had yielded that precedence in the synod of Kells of 1152, and in that of Mellifont in 1157.

(8) Life of Gelasius, cap. 29. and Tr. Th. p. 310.

(9) Giraldus (loc. cit.) mentions only the suffragans of the archbishops of Cashel, Dublin, and Tuam. See also Leland, B. 1. ch. 3. and Lynch, Camb. evers. p. 189.

(10) Giraldus has this story, (ib. cap. 33.) but Hoveden has it not.

(11) Such is the summary of the decrees as given by Hoveden (loc. cit.) whose words are; " In concilio illo statutum est, ut pueri deferrentur ad ecclesiam, et ibi baptizentur in aqua munda, sub tria mersione, in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti; et hoc a sacerdotibus fiat, nisi metu mortis impediante ab alio et alias oportuerit fieri, et tunc a quolibet fiat sine exceptione sexus et ordinis. Et ut decimae dentur ecclesiis de omnibus, quae possidentur. Et ut omnes laici, qui uxores habere velint, eas secundum jus ecclesiasticum habeant."

§. III. There is another account of the decrees of this synod, which is fuller and more correct, and which is stated to contain the very words, in which they were drawn up. It runs thus: " 1. That the faithful throughout Ireland do contract and observe lawful marriages, rejecting those with their relations either by consanguinity or affinity. 2. That infants be catechized before the door of the church, and baptized in the holy font in the baptismal churches. 3. That all the faithful do pay the tithe of animals, corn, and other produce to the church, of which they are parishioners. 4. That

“ all ecclesiastical lands and property connected “ with them be quite exempt from the exactions
“ of all laymen. And especially, that neither the “ petty kings, nor counts, nor any powerful men
“ in Ireland, nor their sons with their families do “ exact, as was usual, victuals and hospitality or “ entertainments in the ecclesiastical districts, or “ presume to extort them by force; and that the “ detestable food or contributions, which used to “ be required four times in the year from the farms “ belonging to churches by the neighbouring counts, “ shall not be claimed any more. 5. That, in case “ of a murder committed by laymen, and of their “ compounding for it with their enemies, clergy“ men their relatives are not to pay part of the “ fine (or Erick), but that, as they were not con“ cerned in the perpetration of the murder, so “ they are to be exempted from the payment of “ money. 6. That all the faithful, lying in sick“ ness, do, in the presence of their confessor and “ neighbours, make their will with due solemnity, “ dividing, in case they have wives and children, “ (excepting their debts and servants wages) their “ moveable goods into three parts, and bequeathing
“ one for the children, and another for the lawful “ wife, and the third for the funeral obsequies.”
(Then come regulations relative to the disposal of the property in case the man had no legitimate issue, or that his wife was already dead.) “7.
“ That due respect be paid to those, who die after
“ a good confession, by means of masses, vigils,
“ and decent burial.—Likewise that all divine mat“ ters be henceforth conducted agreeably to the “ practices of the holy Church, according as ob“ served by the Anglican church.” (12) These decrees, being subscribed by the members of the synod, were afterwards confirmed by the king.
They are the only ones that emanated from the synod; and some writers have been greatly mistaken in supposing, that some words, in which Giraldus Cambrensis praises Henry to the skies, and attributes to him a mighty reformation of the Irish church, contain a declaration, with which the synod complimented him. (13)

(12) These are the decrees detailed by Giraldus, (Hib. exp. c. 34.) and in all appearance, faithfully and correctly. The short account, which I have just copied from Hoveden, is not in the words of the synod, but is partly abridged and partly paraphrastic. For the clearer understanding of the proceedings of the synod, I here lay before the reader the whole account of it as drawn up by Giraldus, ib. capp. 33, and 34. After having mentioned Henry's spending the Christmas holidays in Dublin, he writes: "Silente igitur insula in conspectu regis, tranquilla pace gaudente, Ecclesiae Dei decus Christique cultum in partibus illis magnificandi ampliori desiderio rex accensus totius cleri Hiberniae concilium apud Cassiliam convocavit. Ubi requisitis et auditis publice terrae illius et gentis tam enormitatibus quam spurcitiis, et in scriptum, et sub sigillo legati Lismorensis, qui caeteris ibidem dignitate tunc praeerat, ex industria redactis, constitutiones sacras, quae adhuc extant, de matrimoniis contrahendis, et decimis dandis, et ecclesiis debita devotione venerandis et frequentandis, quamplures emisit, ecclesiae illius statum ad Anglicanae ecclesiae formam redigere modis omnibus elaborando. Quas constitutiones sub eisdem verbis, quibus et promulgatae sunt, hic intersere non superfluum reputavi."

"Anno igitur Dominicae Incarnationis 1172, primo autem anno, quo illustrissimus Anglorum rex et Hiberniae triumphator ipsam insulam acquisivit, Christianus, Lismoriensis episcopus, et apostolicae sedis legatus, Donatus Cassiliensis, Laurentius Dubliniensis, et Catholicus Tuomenensis, archiepiscopi cum suffraganeis suis et coepiscopis, abbatibus quoque, archidiaconis, prioribus, et decanis, et multis aliis Hiberniensis ecclesiae praelatis, ex ipsius triumphatoris mandato, in civitate Cassiliensi convenerunt, et de utilitate ecclesiae, et statu ejus in meliorem formam producendo, ibidem concilium celebrarunt. Huic concilio interfuerunt isti a rege missi; venerabilis vir Radulphus, archidiaconus de Landaff. Nicolaus capellanus, et alii clerici, et nuncii domini regis.

Concillii autem statuta subscripta sunt, et regiae sublimitatis aucto-rite firmata. Primo statutum est, quod universi fideles per Hiberniam constituti, repudiato cognatorum et affinium contubernio, legitima contrahant matrimonia et observent. 2. Secundo, quod infantes ante fores ecclesiae catechizentur, et in sacro fonte in ipsis baptismalibus ecclesiis baptizentur. 3. Tertio, quod universi fideles Christi decimas animalium, frugum, caeterarumque proven- tionum ecclesiae, cujus fuerint parochiani, persolvant. 4. In quarto, quod omnes terrae ecclesiasticae et earum possessiones ab omnium secularium hominum exactione penitus sint immunes. Et specialiter, quod nec reguli, nec comites, nec aliqui potentes viri Hiberniae, nec eorum filii cum familiis suis cibaria et hospitalitates in territoriis ecclesiasticis, secundum consuetudinem, exigant, nec amodo violenter extorquere praesumant; et quod de villis ecclesi- arum cibus ille detestabilis, qui quater in anno a vicinis comitibus exigitur, de caetero nullatenus exigatur. 5. In quinto, quod pro homicidio a laicis perpetrato, quoties inde cum suis inimicis com- ponunt, clerici videlicet eorum cognati nihil inde persolvant, sed, sicut in homicidii perpetrato, sic in pecuniae solutione sint im- munes. 6. Sexto, quod universi fideles in infirmitate positi, con- fessore suo et vicinis astantibus, cum debita solennitate testamen- tum condant, bona sua mobilia, dummodo uxores et liberos ha- beant (aere alieno et servientum mercede exceptis) in tres partes dividant, unam liberis, alteram uxori legitimae, tertiam propriis exequis relinquentes. Et si forte prolem legitimam non habuerint, bona ipsa inter ipsum et uxorem in duo media dividantur. Et si legitima uxor decesserit, inter ipsum et liberos bipartiri debent. 7. Septimo, ut cum bona confessione decedentibus et missarum et vigiliarum exhibitione et more sepeliendi obsequium debitum persolvatur. Item, quod omnia divina ad instar sacrosanctae Ec- clesiae, juxta quod Anglicana observat ecclesia, in omnibus par- tibus ecclesiae (Hiberniae) amodo tractentur." Wilkins has the whole of this Concilia M. B. &c. Vol. 1. p. 472. seqq.

(13) To his report of the decrees Giraldus added, (ib. cap. 34.) that it was worthy and most just, that Ireland should receive a better form of living from England; whereas to its magnanimous king she entirely owed whatever advantages she enjoyed both as to church and state; and that the manifold abuses, which had pre- vailed in Ireland, had since his coming gone into disuse. !!!

It is surprizing, that both Lyttelton and Leland have attributed this trash to the synod itself, notwithstanding its being self-evident from Giraldus' text, that it was not announced by the synod. Surely the synod could not, while sitting for the purpose of commencing the work of that mighty reform, have said, that the manifold abuses had gone into disuse, in desuetudinem abiere. Giraldus might have spoken so, as he did not write his tract until many years after the synod was held. Lyttleton and Leland, or whosoever they took their idea from, were aware of this difficulty, and accordingly translated the words, in desuetudinem abiere by are now abolished; meaning to insuate, that this was then done through the proceedings of the synod. But surely a schoolboy, who had not yet passed his Cordery, would not translate those three Latin words in that manner. Wilkins saw, that the passage in question was not a part of the acts of the synod, from which he consequently separated it; nor is it united with them by other authors, who have given a list of the synod's decrees, ex. c. Fleury, L. 72. §. 36.

§. iv. Here then we have the sum total of that great reform, which the Irish church stood in need of, and for attaining which the English pope Adrian made a grant of Ireland to Henry II. (14) There is nothing relative to religious dogmas, to matters of faith, or to points of essential discipline; and some of those decrees refer to matters rather of a political than of an ecclesiastical nature. Great attention was paid to the immunities and comforts of the clergy, Henry's policy leading him to favour as much as possible that body in Ireland, that he might draw them over to his party; although he had but a short time before been doing his utmost to curtail the privileges of their brethren in England. While he was so kind to the Irish clergy, he seemed to forget his stipulation concerning what Adrian had so much at heart, the payment of the denarius or Peter-pence out of every house in Ireland. There is not yet a word about it in the transactions of the synod; nor did Henry, as far as I can find, ever set about enforcing the payment of it. The reasons for enacting the two first decrees have been most falsely and basely misrepresented by some English writers. They tell us, that the one relative to marriages was made in consequence of the Irish having been in the habit of marrying as many wives as they pleased. For this foul charge there is not the least foundation in any part of our church history; (15) and from the very words of the decree it is as clear as day-light, that the only object of it was to establish in Ireland the system of the seven prohibited degrees, as then followed by the greatest part of the Western church, but which it was not very long after found necessary to modify; (16) and the only abuse alluded to in the decree, consisted in the intermarriages between near relations. (17) As to the second decree, the intention and meaning of which are as plain as possible, viz. that children should henceforth be baptized not in private houses or even oratories, nor in chapels of ease, as seems to have been not unusual in Ireland, nor, in short, any where except in the parochial churches, or in such as were reputed baptismal churches, from their being furnished with baptismal fonts. (18) A most infamous fable has been fabricated, as if to explain the cause of said decree. It states, that before the holding of this synod it was customary in divers parts of Ireland, that, as soon as a child would come into the world, his father or any other person used to dip him three times in water, or if his father were rich, three times in milk; and that afterwards they used to throw that water or milk into the sewers or other unclean places. Were this stated as a custom, which had nothing to do with Christian baptism, and which was followed immediately on the birth of a child, there would, whether true or not, be no harm in it, but represented, as it has been, as the cause of the second Cashel decree, and consequently as the sort of baptism used in various parts of Ireland, the account given of it is one of the most atrocious lies ever invented. (19) In the whole course of my inquiries I have not met with any the smallest allusion to errors or mistakes, even of the slightest kind, relative to the matter, as the theologians call it, of the sacrament of baptism; while, on the contrary, I have uniformly found water mentioned as the only liquid, in which it could be administered. (20) Perhaps the notion of baptizing in milk was taken from the Irish having probably retained the ancient practice of giving milk to the newly baptized, (21) which, as those ignorant calumniators did not understand the meaning of, they changed into actual baptism in milk. In that fable there is another vile insinuation, as if the Irish were careless about getting their children baptized by clergymen; whereas there never was a nation more observant and cautious than they were in this respect. (22)

(14) Leland remarks (B. 1. ch. 3.); “Such was the plan of reformation, which required the interposition of the Pope, which obliged him to transfer the sovereignty of Ireland to a foreign prince, and demanded the presence of the English monarch and a royal army to enforce! As if the same futile ordinances had not been repeatedly enacted in every synod held almost annually by the Irish clergy from that of Paparo to this of king Henry.”

(15) Neither Lanfranc nor Anselm of Canterbury, who in their letters to Irish kings complain of the practice of the Irish marrying within the degrees prohibited by the then Canon law, and of that of exchanging wives; nor St. Bernard, even when (Vit. S. Mal. cap. 6.) railing against the abuses of the diocese of Connor, and where he touches on those relative to the matrimonial contract; nor Giraldus Cambrensis, although (Topogr. Hib. Dist. 3. c. 19.) he charges the Irish with not observing the more usual matrimonial contract, that is, the one called de praesenti, and with their not attending to the far extended prohibited degrees, as marked by the canonists of those days, ever accuse the Irish of the crime of polygamy, nor do they even hint at it. The first English writer, who, as far as I can discover, advanced this vile falshood, is John Brompton, abbot of Iornal, or rather Iorval, a Cistercian monastery in the diocese formerly of York and afterwards of Chester. He wrote his chronicle, which may be seen among Twysden's x Scriptores, in the 14th century, during the reign of Edward III. In giving an account (ib. col. 1071) of the synod of Cashel, he does not follow the order of the decree nor the words, as detailed by Giraldus, but partly follows Hoveden. At the decree on marriage he introduces the calumny we are now treating of, and of which Hoveden makes no mention. His words are; "plerique enim illorum (Hibernorum) quot uxores volebant tot habebant, et etiam cognatas suas et germanas habere solebant uxores." Here he seems to go so far as to say, that the Irish used to marry even their sisters. Yet perhaps the blockhead meant in his bad Latin by germanas not sisters, but cousin germans.

(16) See Chap. xxiv. §. 12. and xxvi. §. 6. and ib. Not. 51.

(17) It was found difficult to put a stop to such intermarriages in Ireland on account of the system of clanships, and of the Irish laws relative to the right, by which landed property was held, and to the rules of succession thereto. On this subject see Ware, Antiq. cap. 8. and Harris, ib. ch. 11.

(18) Without recurring to the Apostolical age, it is well known that for, at least, the three or four first centuries of the Christian church baptism used to be performed in any place, where water was to be found, whether in the sea, or in a lake, pond, river, fountain, &c. Tertullian has made this observation, (De Bapt. cap. 4.) and we find it also in other writers of about his times. Afterwards baptisteries were erected near the churches, and it became a rule in the Roman empire that baptism should be ordinarily not administered except in them. Yet in St. Jerom's time priests and deacons did not scruple to confer baptism in villages, castles, or other places remote from the bishop's or principal church. (See Dial. cum Lucifer. cap. 4.) St. Patrick used to baptize his Irish converts in rivers, lakes, or fountains; and it is said in the Life of St. Finian of Clonard, (cap. 2.) that he was baptized in the water of two united rivers. Other instances might be adduced, if necessary. But the laws of the Roman empire did not extend to Ireland. The emperor Justinian enforced the rule relative to baptisteries, and some Greek councils, although not early ones, exerted themselves to prevent the administration of baptism elsewhere, except in cases of necessity or by a special licence of the bishop. (See Bingham, Origines, &c. B. xi. ch. 6. sect. 12. seqq.) Baptisteries were built also in the western parts of Europe, and are kept up to this day in many great cities of the continent. But the more general practice became, after the old discipline of baptizing only on certain solemn days of the year had ceased, that of placing baptismal fonts in all parochial and in some other churches, in which alone children should be ordinarily baptized. Even in Ireland the usual rule was, after Christianity became well established, that baptism should be performed in the churches. Thus in the case of St. Finian above mentioned, it is related, (ib.) that after his birth some women were carrying him to the church of Roscur to be there baptized by the bishop Forchern, when they were met by a St. Abban, who stopped them and baptized him, as already stated. And in the metrical Life of St. Senan of Inniscathy we read, (cap. 3.) that his parents took him to the church to be baptized: “Parentes autem pueri,—ditati prole nobili,—ut religiosi admodum,—exortum recens parvulum—tulerunt ad ecclesiam,—ut per divinam gratiam—baptismi tinctus flumine,” &c. Lynch observes (Cambr. evers. p. 202.) from the Life of St. Grillan, or Grellan, the patron of the O’Kellies, that the seniors of that family used to be baptized in a church called from this saint, who, by the bye, flourished at a place called Cradibh in Connaught, in the latter part of the 6th century, and had been a disciple of Finian of Clonard. (AA. SS. p. 337, 339, 396.) The very decree of the synod of Cashel indicates, that there were churches in Ireland supplied with baptismal fonts; but it seems that some negligence, how much diffused I cannot tell, prevailed with regard to bringing children thither for baptism, and that some parents used to get the ceremony performed in country chapels, or private oratories, or perhaps in their own houses, as is usual with us at this day. From the words of the decree it evidently appears, that this was the only defect or abuse to which the synod intended to apply a remedy. But Hoveden, to show his learning, made up a decree on baptism (see above §. 2. and Not. 11.) quite different from the genuine one, in which he introduces clean water, triple immersion, the name of the Father, &c. priests, &c. points, upon which there was no question whatsoever proposed to or treated of by the synod, whereas there was not the least discrepancy of opinion or practice concerning them. The worthy Brompton in a sort of abridgment of Hoveden's farrago makes the synod resolve, "pueros in ecclesia baptizari in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, et hoc a sacerdotibus fieri." This is far from being the real decree. As to catechizing the infants before the door of the church, this alludes to the practice, ordered in the Ritual, of proposing, previous to the baptism, certain questions at the church-door, which are answered, not indeed by the infant, but by the godfather.

(19) Brompton, besides some other English writers not worth naming, has given us, as the reason of the decree, that base stuff. He writes (loc. cit.); "Mos enim erat prius per diversa loca Hiberniae quod, statim cum puer nasceretur, pater ipsius vel quilibet alius eum mergeret ter in aqua. Et si divitis filius esset, ter in lacte mergeretur. Postea vero aquam illam vel lac in cloacis suis vel aliis locis immundis projicere solebant." Had such a practice existed in Ireland, would it, not to appeal to all our Irish writers and documents, or to St. Bernard, or to Lanfranc and Anselm, have been unheard of by Hoveden and Giraldus, neither of whom makes the least allusion to it? I was greatly surprised to find Fleury (L. 72. §. 38.) repeating this nonsense. But he copied his account of the synod of Cashel from Brompton, and consequently has given us also his lie concerning the charge of polygamy. Fleury did not, in all appearance, see Giraldus' account of the synod, and was very little acquainted with the ecclesiastical history of Ireland. But I was still more surprized to observe, that Dr. Milner, who lives much nearer to us, and who ought to know more of our ecclesiastical history than Fleury, has, not very long ago, brought forward the same falshoods of Brompton against the Irish nation, when he states, (Additional note to p. 50 of his Letters on Ireland) that it was not until the English invasion that the Irish prelates were enabled to abrogate the prevailing polygamy, incestuous marriages, the practice of baptizing the children of the rich with milk, &c. Strange that he could imagine, that polygamy ever prevailed among the Irish Christians, or that their children were baptized in milk! As to their incestuous marriages, they were not such, except inasmuch as the system of the prohibited degrees, made up by the canonists, had not been generally received in Ireland. I think Dr. Milner would do well to retract some way or other these unfounded assertions.

(20) Baptism is spoken of several times in the Irish canons; but in none of them is it ordered, that it should be performed in water alone, whereas there was no idea of any other liquid being sufficient for it. Adamnan relates, (Vit. S. Col. L. 2. c. 10.) that, when Columbkil was journeying through the country of the Picts, an infant was brought to him by its parents to be baptized, and that, as there was no water in the neighbourhood, the saint prayed for a while upon a rock and blessed a part of it, whence water immediately flowed out in abundance, with which he baptized the infant. So absolutely necessary was water considered for the administration of this sacrament.

(21) St. Jerom observes, (in Esai. 55. 1.) that milk and wine used to be given in the western churches to persons newly baptized; “Lac significat innocentiam parvulorum. Qui mos a typus in Occidentis ecclesiis hodie usque servatur, ut renatis in Christo vinum lacque tribuatut.” In some churches milk and honey used to be given to them. (See Conc. Carth. 3. can. 24.) It is not improbable, that like some other old practices, one or other of these ceremonies was kept up in Ireland.

(22) We have already seen (Not. 18.) the instances of St. Finian and St. Senan being sent to the church for baptism. St. Fursey was three days after his birth baptized by St. Brendan of Clonfert (Vit. S. Furs. L. 1. c. 8.): St. Fintan of Cluain-edneach on the eighth day by a holy man, and undoubtedly a clergyman, who lived in a place called Cluain-mhic-treoin (Vit. S. Fint. c. 1.): St. Laurence O'Toole by the bishop of Kildare (Vit. S. L. c. 2.) &c. &c. In the 24th and 27th of the canons, called of the synod of St. Patrick, Auxilius, and Isserninus, it is ordered, that no strange or newly introduced clergyman do baptize, or offer, i. e. to celebrate the holy mysteries, without the permission of the bishop. Hence it is clear, that the right of baptizing was supposed ordinarily to belong to the clergy.

§. v. It has been said that, after the synod was concluded, the king Henry sent to the Pope certain letters of all the archbishops and bishops of Ireland recognizing Henry's power over Ireland. (23) This much may be admitted, that some time later (24) he sent to Rome a copy of those wonderful decrees, and very probably, as may be concluded from the brief of Alexander III., (of which hereafter) a certain account of Irish practices, such as might induce the Pope to favour his views. After all, said decrees produced no effect in Ireland, and were disregarded by the Irish clergy and people, who looked only to their own ecclesiastical rules, as if the synod of Cashel had never been held. (25) Henry left Dublin early in February of the same year 1172, and went to Wexford. Being there he received, about the middle of Lent, some very pressing news from Normandy, relative to the affair of Thomas Becket, which required his departure for that country as soon as conveniently possible. Accordingly he sailed from Wexford on the following Easter Monday, (26) which fell on the 17th of April, and arrived on the same day at Port-Finnan in South Wales. In this year a provincial synod was held at Tuam by the archbishop Cadla O'Dubhai; but nothing is recorded of its proceedings, except that on this occasion three churches were consecrated. (27) It must have been after the synod of Cashel, and probably was assembled at the time of the primate Gelasius' visitation of Connaught. (28) In said year died the holy bishop of Cork, Gilla Aeda O'Mugin, (29) who had assisted at the council of Kells. He was succeeded by one Gregory. To the same year are assigned the deaths of O'Meicstia or O'Meicselbe, bishop of Emly; (30) Brigdin O'Cathlan, bishop of Ferns, who is named after some other bishops of that see, whose precise times are not known, and who appears to have resigned several years before his death; (31) and Tigernach O'Maeleoin of Clonmacnois, (32) who was rather an abbot than a bishop. Melruan O'Ruadan, bishop of Achonry, one of the prelates of the synod of Kells, had died in 1170; and another equally eminent prelate, Peter O'Mordai, bishop of Clonfert, who had been the first abbot of Boyle, was drowned in the Shannon on the 27th of December, A. 1171. Peter O'Mordai was succeeded by Moeliosa Mac-Award, who held the see only a short time, as he died in 1173. (33) About these times, and apparently before the arrival of Henry II. in Ireland, Donald O'Brian, king of North Munster, erected the great cathedral of Cashel adjoining Cormac's Chapel, which thenceforth was used as a vestry or chapter-house. He endowed this church, and granted lands to the see. (34) To the year 1173 is assigned the death of Kinad O'Ronan, bishop of Glendaloch, who had been one of the witnesses to the foundation charter of the priory of All Saints in Dublin. (35) Muredach O'Cohtaich, who had been bishop of Kinel-eogain, or Ardsrath, at the time of the council of Kells, (36) and afterwards bishop of Derry, is said to have died in the same year, or in the following, on the 10th of February. He became bishop of this see through the resignation, some years earlier, of Flathbert O'Brolcan the first ordinary bishop of Derry. (37) Muredach had been an Augustin Canon, and was highly esteemed for his learning, humility, and charity to the poor. He has been called bishop also of Raphoe; but this is a mistake, whereas the then bishop of Raphoe was Gilbert O'Caran. (38)

(23) Hoveden has this story (loc. cit.); but Giraldus says nothing about such letters, or their having been sent to Rome. Hoveden absurdly supposed, that these letters were written at Waterford. See above Not. 3.

(24) Owing to the tempestuous weather that prevailed during the winter of 1171 coming 1172, and part of the following spring, Henry could have no communication with Rome, nor had he any for some months even with England or his other dominions.

(25) This is plain from Giraldus, who speaking (Topogr. Hib. Dist. 3. c. 19.) of the Irish practices followed in his days, several years after the synod of Cashel, says, that tithes were not paid, and that marriages were not contracted, that is, according to the usage of England, &c. It is true, that elsewhere he mentions a great alteration for the better, owing to the measures of Henry. (See above Not. 13.) But this must be taken either as a flourish in favour of Henry, or may be understood of the state and system of the diocese of Dublin as it was under John Comin, an Englishman, during whose incumbency Giraldus was in Ireland.

(26) Giraldus says, (Hib. exp. L. 1. c. 37.) Paschali luce secunda, that is, of the year 1172. Leland, who erroneously places (B. 1. c. 3.) Henry's departure in 1173, had no right to refer in the margin to Giraldus, who does not there mention A. 1173; while, on the contrary, it is evident from his whole context, that the Easter Monday was in 1172, the year marked also by Hoveden, and several old writers, as also by Ware (Annals) Lyttleton, &c. &c. The fact is, that Henry must have left Ireland in 1172, whereas nothing can be more certain than that he arrived in Normandy in May of that year; that it was in said year that he was absolved there by the Pope's legates from the censures incurred in consequence of the murder of Thomas Becket; and that he was present at the synod of Avranches, which met in that year on the 27th of September. (See Fleury, L. 72. §. 39. seqq.)

(27) Ware, Annals at A. 1172, and Harris, Archbishops of Tuam at Catholicus O'Dubhai.

(28) See above §. 2.

(29) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Cork. For this worthy prelate see Chap. xxvii. §. 8.

(30) Ib. at Emly.

(31) Harris, ib. at Ferns.

(32) Ware and Harris, ib. at Clonmacnois. I find no proof of his having been a bishop, except his being called comorban of St. Kieran. But he might have been only an abbot; for St. Kieran had not been a bishop. And it is much more probable, that this was the case, because Moriertach O'Moeluidhir, the bishop of Clonmacnois, who assisted at the synod of Kells, lived until 1188; and there is no necessity for supposing with Ware, that he resigned his see long before his death.

(33) Ware and Harris, ib. at Achonry and Clonfert.

(34) Ware, Antiq. cap. 29. at Cashel, and Harris, Archbishops of Cashel.

(35) See Harris, Bishops at Glendaloch. Compare with Chap. xxviii. §. 10.

(36) Not. 100. to Chap. xxvii.

(37) For Flathbert see Chap. xxviii. §. 5.

(38) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Derry. Hoveden calls Muredach Mauritius Charensis epis. instead of Darensis.

§. vi. The great and truly excellent and holy primate Gelasius, having returned to Armagh from his last visitations in Connaught and Ulster, remained there preparing for eternity, until God was pleased to call him to himself on the 27th of March A. D. 1174, in the 87th year of his age after an active and exemplary incumbency of 28 years. (39) He was succeeded by Conchovar or Conor, alias Cornelius, Mac-Conchailleadh, abbot of the Augustin Canons monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul of Armagh, who went to Rome on some ecclesiastical business, and died there in 1175. (40) Patrick O'Bainan, who had been bishop of Connor, and one of the prelates of the council of Kells, a man highly praised for his sanctity, died in 1174 in the island of Hy, whither he had retired apparently some years before his death; for one Nehemias is mentioned as the actual bishop of Conor at the time of king Henry's arrival in Ireland, that is, in the latter part of 1171. (41) To the same year 1174 some assign the death of Ethru O'Miadachain, bishop of Clonard, which others place in 1173. (42) In some lists of the members of the council of Kells this prelate is reckoned among them. (43) In said year 1174 died also Moeliosa O'Connachtain, bishop of East Connaught, that is, I believe, of the united dioceses of Elphin and Roscommon, who had assisted at the now mentioned council. (44) This was also the year of the death of a very holy man, St. Gilda-Machaibeo or Mochaibeo, whose name has been latinized into Machabeus. (45) He was born in 1102, and became in all appearance a disciple of the blessed Imar, the master and director of

St. Malachy. It is certain that, after having been for some time a Canon Regular of St. Augustin in the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul of Armagh, he was appointed abbot of it, probably soon after the death of Imar, which occurred at Rome in 1134. (46) There is reason to think, that he did not hold that situation until his death. (47) He died on the 31st of March, and the Irish hagiologists represent him as a man of superior piety, learning, and wisdom. (48) An illustrious professor of the school of Armagh, and its chief director, Florence Gorman, who had studied for twenty-one years in France and England, and afterwards taught in his own country for twenty years longer, died about the same time in the same year. (49)

(39) AA. SS. Vit. S. Gel. cap. 30. and Tr. Th. p. 310. Giraldus says, (Hib. exp. L. 1. c. 34.) that Gelasius lived entirely on the milk of a cow, which used to be driven before him wherever he went. For entirely read chiefly.

(40) Tr. Th. p. ib. Ware says, (Archbishops of Armagh) that he died in 1175 or 1176. I suppose he had no reason for adding or 1176, except his thinking, that the old mode of anticipating the Christian era, followed in some Irish annals, was still continued. But it had ceased to prevail long before these times.

(41) See Tr. Th. p. 501. and Ware and Harris, Bishops at Connor.

(42) Ware compared with Harris, ib. at Meath.

(43) See Not. 100. to Chap. xxvii.

(44) Ware and Harris, ib. at Elphin. Compare with Not. 106. to Chap. xxvii.

(45) His name is in the Irish calendars, and Colgan treats of him at 31 March.

(46) See Chap. xxvi. §. 15.

(47) We have just seen, that Ware calls Conchovar, who succeeded Gelasius in the see of Armagh A. D. 1174, abbot of St. Peter and St. Paul at the time of his being appointed to it. How then could Machabeus, who survived Gelasius by four days, have been then abbot, if Conchovar was the real one? The matter may be easily settled by supposing, that, if Ware be right, Machabeus had some time previous resigned the abbacy.

(48) Marian Gorman, his contemporary, styles him, as quoted by Colgan, a tower of piety and meekness, an ark of wisdom and science, &c. Others speak of him in a similar manner.

(49) Tr. Th. p. 310.

§. VII. In 1175 Henry II. sent Nicholas, prior of Wallingford, afterwards abbot of Malmesbury, and William Fitz-Adelm to Ireland with the bull of Adrian IV. and the confirmatory brief, which Alexander III. had sent some time before to Henry. (50) On their arrival a meeting of bishops was held at Waterford, in which those precious documents were publicly read. (51) This was the first time that they were so in Ireland; and, although Henry undoubtedly had Adrian's bull in his hands, when he was in Ireland, he thought it unadvisable to announce it publicly. He knew, that not only the whole drift of it, but likewise certain unfounded aspersions contained in it would have caused great irritation among both the clergy and laity. But now, owing to the precarious state of his power in Ireland, he found himself obliged to recur to the Papal authority, thinking that he might by this means secure the obedience of the clergy, whom he imagined he had already brought over in great part to his side by some of the decrees of his synod of Cashel, and through whom he expected to counteract the opposition of the Irish princes and people to his authority. After his departure there was much fighting in Ireland between the natives and the foreigners. A grant, which he had made of Meath to Hugh de Lacy, (52) being contrary to the interests of Tiernan O'Ruarc, under whose government a considerable part of that great territory had been placed, gave rise to a dispute, which was near terminating in open hostilities. To prevent this mischief some friends of both parties brought about a conference between O'Ruarc and Lacy. They met some time in 1172, on a hill not far from Dublin, each accompanied by a small and equal number of their adherents. But before the conference was concluded O'Ruarc was killed by Griffin, a nephew of Maurice Fitzgerald, who was present and who excited him to this act. The apology set up by writers of their faction for this dreadful deed is, that O'Ruarc had previously aimed a blow against Lacy. Whether this be true or not, this is not the place to inquire. The head of O'Ruarc was then cut off, and placed over a gate in Dublin, and his body hung, with the feet upwards, on a gallows. In this year Lacy ravaged Annaly, and killed Donald O'Ferral its king or chieftain. Early in the following year Strongbow invaded Ophaly, whose chieftain was O'Dempsey, and burned and plundered some towns; but on this occasion he lost his son-in-law Robert de Quincey, constable of Leinster, who was attacked in a defile by O'Dempsey, and slain with many of his knights and the loss of the banner of Leinster. (53)

(50) This brief may be seen in Usher's Sylloge, No. 47, taken from the genuine and correct text of Giraldus (Hib. exp. L. 2. c. 6.) Lynch (Cambr. evers. p. 197.) argues from its not being in the Roman Bullarium, that it is a forgery; but this and some other exceptions of his are of as little avail as his arguments against the authenticity of Adrian's bull. It confirms the grant made by Adrian under the former condition of the payment of the Peterpence; and Alexander wishes, that, on eradicating the dirty practices of Ireland, the nation may through Henry's exertions become polished, and its church be brought to a better form. He seems to have known nothing of the state of the Irish church, except what he heard from the lying accounts of the enemies of Ireland; and as to ecclesiastical or other dirt I believe he might in those times have found enough of it, and I fear more, nearer home, without looking for it in this country. I dare say he would have been hard set to meet with, in any equal portion of the Church of that period, so many excellent bishops as Gelasius, Laurence O'Toole, Christian of Lismore, Catholicus of Tuam, &c. There is nothing in the brief concerning any letters or other papers sent by Irish archbishops and bishops to the Pope; (see above §. 5.) and the only authority alleged for Henry's right to Ireland is the Bull of Adrian.

(51) Giraldus (loc. cit.) Ware, Annals at A. 1175. Lyttelton, &c. &c. I do not understand, why Leland (B. 1. ch. 4.) places this meeting of the clergy at Waterford, the arrival of Nicholas of Wallingford, whom he calls simply Wallingford, and the reading of Adrian's bull, &c. so late as A. 1177. I am sure he is wrong; but I shall not tire the reader with a disputation on this subject.

(52) The charter of this grant is in Ware's Antiquities, cap. 27.

(53) Ware, Annals at A. 1172. Lyttelton, B. 4, &c.

§. VIII. In 1173 confederacies were formed in Ireland for the purpose of driving out the Anglo-Normans, who dissatisfied with Hervey de Monte Marisco, whom Strongbow had placed over the army, after the death of De Quincey, called out for Reymond le Grose as their commander. Strongbow having complied with their wish, Reymond set about plundering the Desies, took Lismore which he pillaged, and sent a great part of his united spoil by water towards Waterford. The vessels, in which it was contained, were met at the mouth of the river Blackwater by a Danish fleet from Cork, and a combat ensued, in which the Danes were worsted. Meanwhile Reymond defeated a body of the Irish, who had been sent to Lismore by Dermod Mac-Carthy, king of Desmond, and then marched to Waterford, driving along a great number of cattle. Not long after in a fit of disgust he returned to Wales. (54) The command of the army now devolved on Hervey de Monte Marisco, who in the following year, 1174, wishing to signalize himself, obtained permission from Strongbow to invade the territories of Donald O'Brian, king of North Munster. This was granted to him, and Strongbow himself went to Cashel, where he expected reinforcements from Dublin. The corps under Hervey was attacked all of a sudden, early on a morning, near Thurles (55) by Donald O'Brian, and 400 of them, or, according to another account, (56) 700, together with four of their chief leaders, were put to the sword, while the remainder fled to Waterford, whither Strongbow also hastened his return, and shut himself up in the city as if it were besieged. For the whole country was, on the news of O'Brian's success, filled with Irish armies, which withdrew their allegiance from Henry. Roderic O'Conor soon after entered Meath with a great force, and ravaged the whole country, which Hugh de Lacy had parcelled out among his friends and soldiers. Hugh Tirrel, who acted for Lacy, then in England, finding that he would not be able to defend the castle of Trim, demolished the fortifications, burned it, as he did also that of Duleek, and escaped with his soldiers to Dublin. While the affairs of the foreigners were in this perilous state, Reymond was persuaded to return to Ireland, and arrived with his cousin german Milo, or Meyler, and 30 other knights, all of his own kindred, besides 100 cavalry and 300 infantry, in the harbour of Waterford at a very critical moment. At that time a general insurrection of the Danes of Waterford was breaking out; but Reymond was able to rescue Strongbow from their fury, and conducted him to Wexford. Afterwards they put to death all the Anglo-Normans they met with in the streets or elsewhere, until at length terms were agreed upon between them and the garrison. Reymond then marched towards Meath against Roderic O'Conor, who hearing of his approach returned to Connaught. (57) In the succeeding year 1175 Reymond, assisted by Donald prince of Ossory, undertook the siege of Limerick, in order to enrich his army with the plunder of that city, and probably in revenge for the victory gained by Donald O'Brian near Thurles.

But it would lead me too far to enter into a detail of this siege and its consequences.

(54) Ware, ib. at A. 1173. Lyttelton, ib. &c. &c.

(55) Lyttelton was wrong in placing this battle in Ossory.

(56) Annals of Innisfallen.

(57) Ware, ib. at A. 1174. Lyttelton, &c. &c.

§. IX. While matters were going in this manner, Henry perceived that it was not an easy task to subdue the Irish nation, and, considering the delicate state of his affairs both in Great Britain and France, first strove to render their clergy subservient to him by means of the Papal decrees, which he got read at Waterford, as we have seen above. He knew, however, that something more was wanting to bring over the laity, and accordingly was anxious to compromise his disputes with the Irish princes, particularly Roderic O'Conor. Things were managed in such a manner, that Roderic sent over, to negotiate in his name with Henry, three ambassadors, Catholicus archbishop of Tuam, Concors abbot of St. Brendan's of Clonfert, and Laurence his chancellor. They waited on the king at Windsor about Michaelmas of this year 1175, and within the octave of that festival a great council was held there, (58) in which the following articles were agreed upon. Roderic was to be still a king, but as holding under Henry, and was to retain his hereditary territories as firmly and peaceably as he had possessed them before Henry's arrival in Ireland. He was likewise to have under his superintendence and jurisdiction the other kings, princes, &c. of the rest of Ireland, with the exception of some parts, and was bound to make them pay, through his hands, their tribute to the king of England. These kings &c. were not to be disturbed as to the possession of their principalities, as long as they remained faithful to Henry and obedient to Roderic. But in case they failed in either point, or refused to pay the tribute, Roderic was authorized to judge of their proceedings, and, if requisite, to deprive them of their power and possessions; and, should his own power not be sufficient for that purpose, he was to be assisted by the English king's constable and his other servants and soldiers. The tribute to be paid by Roderic and the Irish at large was very trifling, consisting only of a hide for every tenth head of cattle killed in Ireland. This agreement and the extent of Roderic's power were not, however, to comprehend all Ireland; for the king reserved to himself or to his barons Dublin and its appurtenances, all Meath and Leinster, besides Waterford and the country thence to Dungarvan included. There were some minor articles, which, as I am not writing a civil history of Ireland, it would be out of my line to give a detail of. (59) One of the witnesses to this treaty was St. Laurence O'Toole, who had come over to England concerning certain affairs of his church, some time before the arrival of Roderic's ambassadors. In the same council or assembly Henry exercised the first act of his authority as to the appointment of Irish bishops by naming to the see of Waterford, which happened to be then vacant, (probably by the death of Tostius, who had assisted at the synod of Kells) one Augustin an Irishman, who is styled master, and whom, as St. Laurence was about returning to Ireland, he sent in his company to be consecrated by Donald, archbishop of Cashel. (60) On this occasion the king acted very judiciously; 1. by not placing a foreigner over the church of Waterford; and 2. by not getting Augustin consecrated in England, but directing him, as the canons required, to the metropolitan, whose suffragan he was to become.

(58) Hoveden says (at A. 1175.) that the agreement between the kings Henry and Roderic was made in octavis S. Michaelis, which may be understood of the Octave of Michaelmas, that is, the 6th of October, or of some day within the Octave. The blundering translator of Ware's Annals at said year has englighted Hoveden's words by 8th of October, probably not understanding the meaning of the word Octave, and for Catholicus, &c. he has the Catholic bishop of Tuam. Harris (at Archbishops of Tuam, Catholicus) instead of Concors writes Canthred.

(59) The whole treaty is in Hoveden's Annals at A. 1175. See also Lyttelton, B. 4.

(60) Hoveden writes; (ib.) "In eodem vero concilio dedit rex Angliæ magistro Augustino Hybernensi episcopatum Waterfordiæ, qui tunc vacabat in Hybernia. Et misit eum in Hyberniam cum Laurentio Diviliniæ archiepiscopo, ad consecrandum a Donato Cassiliensi archiepiscopo."

§. x. It was in the same year 1175, and some time before the now mentioned assembly was held, that St. Laurence was near being killed at Canterbury. Having gone thither to wait upon the king, who was there at that time, he was received with great respect by the monks, and after a night spent in imploring the suffrages of the martyr St. Thomas Becket, prepared at their request to celebrate mass on the following morning. As he was proceeding to the altar, dressed in his pontificals, a certain madman, who had heard that he was a holy man, took it into his head that it would be a good act to give him the crown of martyrdom and make him another St. Thomas. Accordingly he seized upon a large club, and rushing through the crowd, struck him with all his might a violent blow on the head, which made him fall near the altar. The monks and the people much aggrieved thought, that he was mortally wounded. But after a little time lifting up his head, the saint called for some water, over which he said the Lord's prayer, and having blessed it with the sign of the Cross, desired the wound to be washed with it. This done, the flowing of the blood ceased, the wound was healed, and he celebrated mass. On the king's ordering that the madman should be hanged, St. Laurence interceded for him, and with difficulty obtained his pardon. (61)

In this year died at a very advanced age Moeliosa (whom some call Malachy) Mac-Inclericuir, the immediate successor of the great St. Malachy in the see of Down, and who was one of the prelates of the council of Kells. He was succeeded by Gilladomnai (called Gelasius) Mac-Cormac, who died in the course of said year, and after whom was appointed another Malachy. (62) In the same, or in the following year Gillacomida (called also Gilbert) O'Caran was removed from the see of Raphoe to that of Armagh, in the room of Conchovar Mac-Conchailleadh, who died at Rome. (63) He was bishop of Raphoe at the time of the foundation of the Cistercian monastery of Newry, to the charter of which he was one of the witnesses, under the title of bishop of Tir-conail, in which territory Raphoe is situated. He was bishop there also when Henry II. arrived in Ireland. (64) Flathbert O'Brolcan, who some years before had resigned the see of Derry, (65) and afterwards retained only the government of the monastery of Derry, having refused that of Hy, died in said year 1175, and was buried in that monastery, leaving a great reputation for wisdom and liberality. He was succeeded in the monastery by Gelasius O'Branain. (66)

(61) Vit. S. Laurent. cap. 19. The author states, that this transaction was attested by a person, who was present.

(62) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Down.

(63) Above §. 6.

(64) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Armagh and Raphoe. Gilbert of Raphoe is mentioned in Hoveden's list of Irish sees. For his signature to the charter of Newry see Not. 34. to Chap. xxviii.

(65) Above §. 5.

(66) Tr. Th. p. 505. and Ware, Annals at A. 1175, and Bishops at Derry.

§. XI. About these times Strongbow founded a priory for knights of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, called at a much later period Knights of Malta, at Kilmainham near Dublin, which foundation was confirmed by Henry II. (67) That place had been anciently called Kill-magnend from St. Magnend, who was abbot there in the early part of the seventh century, and who is said to have been a son of Aidus, prince of Orgiell, who died in 606 (607). St. Magnend's name is in the Irish calendars at 18 December. (68) Strongbow died about the beginning of June A. D. 1176, and his body was kept unburied until Reymond, whom his wife Basilea, sister of Strongbow, had sent for in all haste, arrived in Dublin. It was then, under the direction of St. Laurence O'Toole, solemnly interred in the cathedral church of the Holy Trinity, alias Christ-church. Strongbow left, by his wife Eva, daughter of Dermod Mac-Murrough, a daughter, named Isabel, who was afterwards married to William Mareschal, earl of Pembroke. (69) The king, on hearing of Strongbow's death, sent over to Ireland, as his deputy or lieutenant, William Fitz-Adelm, and together with him John de Courcey, Robert Fitz-Stephen, and Milo de Cogan, who were to act under him. In the beginning of September of the same year Maurice Fitzgerald died at Wexford leaving three sons, William, Gerald, and Alexander. From Maurice are descended all the noble and illustrious families of the Fitzgeralds in Ireland. Soon after the death of Strongbow, and before the arrival of Fitz-Adelm, Melaghlin Mac-Loghlin, an Ulster prince, attacked and demolished the castle of Slane, on which occasion Richard Fleming, the owner or governor of it, was, together with many others, put to the sword, none of the princes of Ulster at this time recognizing the sovereignty of the king of England. (70)

To this year 1176, and to the first of January, some accounts assign the death of Malachy O'Brin, or O'Byrne, bishop of Kildare. (71) It is related, that St. Laurence once ordered him to undertake the cure of a lady, who was mad and possessed with an evil spirit, but that he declined the task, saying that he was not of sufficient merit to be able to expel devils. (72) He was succeeded by Nehemias, who held the see for about 18 years. (73) In 1177 Charles O'Buacalla, abbot of Mellifont, became bishop of Emly, and died in less than a month after. (74) Who was his immediate predecessor is not known; for he could not have been O'Meiestia, who died in 1172. (75) Imar O'Ruadan, bishop of Killybegs, or of Hua-Fiachra, died also in 1177. (76)

(67) Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Dublin.

(68) AA. SS. p. 584 and 713. Archdall says, (at Kilmainham) that Magnend was abbot of Kill-magnend in 606; but Colgan merely states, that this was the year of his father's death.

(69) Ware, Annals at A. 1176.

(70) See Ware, ib. and Lyttleton, B. 5.

(71) See Ware and Harris, Bishops at Kildare. Colgan, (Tr. Th. p. 630.) erroneously calling him O'Brian, places his death in 1175, and so do, as Harris observes, the Annals of Leinster.

(72) Vita S. Laur. cap. 28. Harris pretends, (loc. cit.) that O'Brin was right in making this excuse, if what historians, as he pompously calls them, say of him be true. But these historians of Harris are only Giraldu, (Hib. exp. L. 1. cap. 25.) who is well known to have told or repeated a great number of falsehoods. The story is, that, when Fitz-Stephen was in the year 1171 besieged in Carig near Wexford by Donald, an illegitimate son of Dermod Mac-Morrogh, and the Danes of Wexford, O'Brin, and O'Hethe, bishop of Ferns, perjured themselves to make Fitz-Stephen believe, that Dublin was taken by the Irish, and all the foreigners destroyed, in consequence of which Fitz-Stephen and his party surrendered. This is evidently a fable patched up to apologize for Fitz-Stephen's having given up himself and his garrison, together with the fortress. Ware, treating of this affair, (Annal. at A. 1171) shews, that he did not believe Giraldus, whose tract he had before his eyes; for he merely states, without mentioning any bishop, that the besiegers had spread a report, that Dublin was taken, and Strongbow and his army there cut to pieces. In fact, there were very strong grounds for such a report; whereas, had Roderic O'Conor and the Irish acted with more caution and ability, the foreigners then in Dublin might have been all exterminated. (See Chap. xxviii. §. 15.) Add, that Ware, giving an account (Bishops) of those two prelates, has not a word of that story; and it was reserved for Harris to foist the slanderous tale into that honest writer's works.

(73) Ware, Bishops at Kildare. (74) Ib. at Emly.

(75) Above, §. 5. (76) Ware, Bishops at Killala.

§. XII. In the same year 1177 Malachy, the new bishop of Down, was taken prisoner by John de Courcey, but at the request of Vivian, Cardinal Priest of the title of St. Stephen in Monte Coelio, was soon after restored to his liberty and see. De Courcey, wishing to give some employment to the Anglo-Norman troops, and to provide for their wants, had, in spite of the deputy Fitz-Adelm's orders, set out early in this year (77) from Dublin with a select body of them, joined by some Irish, and by a quick march of three or four days arrived unexpectedly at Downpatrick, the capital of Ulidia, or Ullagh, and at that time an open unfortified place. Mac-Dunlevy, its king, being unprepared for this attack, withdrew from the town. Cardinal Vivian, the Pope's legate for Scotland and the neighbouring islands, and also for Ireland, happened to be then at Downpatrick, having arrived there a short time before from the Isle of Mann, and where he was treated with great respect. He endeavoured to mediate a peace between Mac-Dunlevy and De Courcey, and proposed that the latter with his troops should quit the country on condition of the former paying tribute to king Henry. De Courcey being quite averse to this agreement, the Cardinal, vexed at his unjust conduct, went to Mac-Dunlevy and exhorted him to take arms in defence of his territories. This prince soon collected an army, it is said, of 10,000 men, and marched to attack the invaders. De Courcey and his men went out to meet them, and after a hard fought battle gained a victory. The Cardinal took refuge in a Church, but was protected by De Courcey, who also granted him the freedom of the bishop Malachy, who in the pursuit of the Ulidians had fallen into the enemy's hands. After this Vivian went to Dublin, and held there a synod of bishops and abbots, in which setting forth Henry's right to the sovereignty of Ireland in virtue of the Pope's authority, he inculcated the necessity of obedience to him under pain of excommunication. He allowed the foreigners liberty to take whatever victuals they might want, in their expeditions, out of the churches, into which, as sanctuaries, the Irish used to remove them; merely ordering, that a reasonable price should be paid for them to the rectors of such churches. (78) Thus he atoned for his former attention to Mac-Dunlevy. While Vivian was in Dublin, William Fitz-Adelm founded, by order of Henry II. the celebrated abbey of St. Thomas the martyr (Becket) for Canons Regular of the order of St. Victor, near Dublin, on the site now called Thomas-court, for the good of the souls of Geoffrey, count of Anjou father of the king, of the empress his mother, and his ancestors, of the king himself and of his sons. Fitz-Adelm made over to it, on the king's part, in the presence of the Cardinal and of St. Laurence O'Toole, a piece of land called Donower or Donore. This abbey became in course of time most splendidly endowed. (79) The synod being ended, Vivian passed over to Chester, and soon after returned to Scotland. (80)

(77) Colgan was hugely mistaken (Tr. Th. p. 108.) in assigning John de Courcy's first arrival in Ireland to A. D. 1185. He misunderstood a passage of Usher, who says, (Pr. p. 889.) that Count John came to Ireland in that year. But Usher meant not John de Courcy, but John, earl of Morton, and son of Henry II. who was afterwards king John, as appears also from his Ind. Chron. ad A. 1185.

(78) See Giraldus, Hib. exp. L. 2. c. 17. Ware, Annals at A. 1177. Lyttleton, B. 5.

(79) See Ware, ib. and Antiq. cap. 26. at Dublin. The charter for this foundation may be seen, from an inspeximus, in the Monast. Angl. Vol. 2. p. 1039. It is also in Leland's History, B. 1. ch. 5. Archdall (at Dublin, Abbey of St. Thomas) has egregiously bungled this business. According to him the abbey had been founded by Fitz-Adelm as early as A. 1172, and he tells us, that somebody was prior there between 1172 and 1175; and why? Because that somebody was a witness to a charter granted by John de Courcy to the priory of St. Patrick in Down. The poor man seems not to have known, that Fitz-Adelm was not Henry's deputy in Ireland, and consequently could not have founded the Abbey of St. Thomas before 1176. And as to what he says about St. Patrick's of Down, it was not until 1177 that De Courcy had any thing to do with Down, nor until 1183 that he gave the name of St. Patrick to a church in that town. Then he assigns the grant of Donore to 1178, as if said grant were not at the time of the foundation of the abbey, or as if St. Vivian had not left Ireland in 1177 soon after the conclusion of the synod of Dublin.

(80) Ware, Annals at A. 1177. It is strange, that Usher (Ind. Chron.) assigns to A. 1186 Vivian's synod of Dublin and his return to Scotland, on occasion of which it has been said, that he left Ireland less loaded with Irish gold than he wished. For this was said relatively to his departure in 1177. (See Fleury, L. 72. §. 59.)

§. XIII. At this time a great dissension prevailed between Roderic O'Connor and his eldest son Murtach or Morrogh, who fled to Dublin and excited Fitz-Adelm to make war on his father, offering to conduct into the heart of Connaught the army to be employed on this occasion. Although it does not appear, that Roderic had in any wise violated the treaty solemnly entered into with king Henry, or had given any provocation to the English government, Fitz-Adelm basely availed himself of that unnatural son's treason, hoping to add Connaught to Henry's possessions in Ireland. Accordingly he dispatched in said year 1177 Milo de Cogan, with a considerable army of knights, cavalry, and archers, who crossed the Shannon, and advanced without meeting any opposition, as far as Tuam, which, it seems, they set fire to. (81) Throughout the whole country they found no provisions, as they were either concealed in places where they could not be discovered, or had been carried away or destroyed, the inhabitants having retired with their families and cattle to inaccessible woods or to the mountains. Cogan and his army were thus reduced almost to starvation, and forced to set out again for Dublin, without having gained any advantage; but on their return, and after eight days marching in Connaught, they were attacked in a wood near the Shannon by Roderic and the Connacians, and suffered considerable loss. (82) Murtach was taken in the action, and the Connacians, not one of whom had joined him on his entrance into their country, sentenced him, with the consent of his father, to have his eyes put out, which was accordingly done. (83) Some time in May of this year Henry held a parliament at Oxford, in which he declared his son John king of Ireland, having obtained permission to do so from Pope Alexander III. This is not the place to inquire into the extent of power or territories in Ireland, which Henry meant to confer upon John; but this much I may remark, that John was not styled king of Ireland, his title being lord of Ireland and earl of Morton. (84) Afterwards, and in the same year, he made a grant to Robert Fitz-Stephen and Milo de Cogan of the kingdom of Cork, that is, of Desmond, to hold under himself and his son John, and their heirs, except the city of Cork and the adjoining cantred, which Henry retained in his own hands, but of which Fitz-Stephen and Cogan were to have the custody for him. (85) This grant was of no great service to them; for in spite of it they got possession of only a small part of that kingdom, and two years afterwards were glad to put up with, between them both, seven cantreds near the city, while 24 cantreds remained out of their and Henry's power. (86) A similar sort of grant, rather nominal than real, was some time after made of the kingdom of North-Munster by Henry to Philip de Breuse, who, notwithstanding the king's writ, and the assistance of Fitz-Stephen and Cogan, never acquired an inch of it, and got so frightened that he and his Welchmen thought it their best plan to return home. (87) And it will be seen, that the brave Donald O'Brian, who lived for several years after these times, retained his kingdom until the day of his death.

(81) A conflagration of Tuam in 1177 is mentioned in the Irish annals. (See Tr. Th. p. 634.)

(82) Giraldus pretends, that of Cogan's party only three men were killed; but, as Ware observes, the Irish annals give a different account of the matter.

(83) Ware, Annals at A. 1177. Lyttleton B. 5. Leland, B. 1. ch. 4.

(84) See Ware, ib. and Antiq. cap. 27. Hoveden and Brompton have the name king; but this was not John's real title.

(85) Henry's charter for this grant is in Ware's Antiquities, cap. 27. See also the Annals at A. 1177.

(86) See Giraldus, (Hib. exp. L. 2. c. 18.) and from him Ware, (loc. cit.) who is copied by Smith, History of Cork, B. 1. ch. 1.

Lyttleton was quite wrong (B. 5.) in supposing that Fitz-Stephen and Cogan divided between them the whole kingdom of Desmond, with merely the exceptions mentioned in Henry's charter.

(87) Ware, Antiq. cap. 27. and Annals at A. 1179. Lyttleton, loc. cit. and Ferrar, History of Limerick, part 2. ch. 2.

§. xiv. In the following year, 1178 John de Courcey met with a great check. He had been plundering the now county of Louth, and was driving thence a vast number of cattle, when he was met in the country of Ergall or Oriel by Murtach O'Kervail or Carrol, prince of that country, and Mac-Dunlevy of Ullagh, who attacked him with such success, that, having lost many of his soldiers, he was obliged to fly, attended by only eleven men, for two days and two nights without food or rest, until he reached his castle near Downpatrick. He was also unfortunate in an incursion, which he made into Dalaradia. (88) To this year is assigned the foundation of the Cistercian monastery of Rosalas or Monaster-evan, called of St. Mary, alias De Rosea valle, by Dermot O'Dempsey, prince of Ophaly, who richly endowed it. (89) In this year died on the 8th of May Donald O'Fogarty, bishop of Ossory, who had assisted at the council of Kells, not as bishop but as vicar general of that diocese. (90) It is supposed that in his time the see of Ossory was at Aghaboe, the famous monastery of St. Cannich or Kenny. (91) Yet this is doubtful; but it is certain, that it was there in the time of his immediate successor Felix O'Dullany, who held that see from 1178 to 1202; nor was it, as far as I can judge, until after O'Dullany's death that it was removed from Aghaboe to Kilkenny. (92) - In the same year 1178 died Rugnad O'Ruadan, bishop of Kilmacduach; (93) and the abbey and town of Ardfinnan were plundered and burned by some English adventurers. (94) About this time, or before it, Christian, bishop of Lismore, must have resigned his see; for we find, that in the year 1179 it was held by one Felix. Christian retired to the Cistercian monastery of Kyrie eleison at Odorney in the county of Kerry, where he spent the remainder of his days. (95) On his resigning the bishopric it may be naturally supposed, that he gave up also the apostolic legateship. Felix was one of the Irish prelates, who assisted in 1179 at the third general council of Lateran, for the meeting of which summonses had been issued by Alexander III. in the preceding year. They are said to have been six in all; viz. St. Laurence of Dublin, Catholicus of Tuam, Constantine O'Brian of Killaloe, Felix of Lismore, Augustin of Waterford, and Briccius of Limerick. On their way through England to Rome they were obliged to take an oath, that they would not act in any manner prejudicial to the king or his kingdom. (96) The Pope treated St. Laurence with much kindness, and gave him a bull, in which, taking under his protection the church of Dublin, he confirmed its rights, its jurisdiction over the suffragan sees of Glendaloch, Kildare, Ferns, Leighlin, and Ossory, which he also took under the protection of St. Peter and the Roman church, and its extensive possessions in churches, villages, lands, &c. (97) In this council, or soon after it, and when he was near returning from Rome, the Pope appointed him legate throughout all Ireland. (98) To this year, 1179 some accounts assign the foundation of the Cistercian abbey of Ashro, or Easrua, alias De Samario, near Ballyshannon, by Roderic O'Cananan, prince of Tir-connel. (99) Great conflagrations of Armagh, Cashel, Clonfert, Lothra or Lorrh in the county of Tipperary, and Tuam, are mentioned as having occurred in said year; (100) but whether owing to accident or design, I am not able to tell.

(88) Ware, Annals at A. 1178. See also Lyttleton, B. 5.

(89) Ware, ib. and Antiq. cap. 26. at Kildare. He says, that others place this foundation in 1189. But it could not have been so late, whereas one of the witnesses to the deed for it was Donat, bishop of Leighlin, who died in 1185. This deed is in the Monast. Anglic. Vol. 2. p. 1031. Monasterevan is supposed to have derived its name from a monastery, that had been there under the name of St. Evin. Ware seems to confound it with St. Evin's monastery of Ross-mac-treoin. But Ros-mac-treoin was the place now called Old Ross in the county of Wexford, and in the southern part of Leinster, which could not be said of Monasterevan. (See Chap. xiv. §. 3. and ib. Not. 46.) It may be justly suspected, that the name Monasterevan meant merely the monastery near the river (abhan in Irish), as it was contiguous to the Barrow. For I do not find, that there was any monastery under the name of St. Evin in that part of Leinster, nor that St. Abban, from whom it has been conjectured that Monasterevan got its name, erected one there.

(90) Ware (Bishops at Ossory) thought, that he sat above 20 years. Harris foists in upwards of 26 years, on the supposition of his having been bishop of Ossory at the time of the council. But the most correct account makes him at that time only vicar general. (See Not. 100. to Chap. xxvii.)

(91) Ware (ib.) speaks of the see of Saigir as having been removed to Aghaboe perhaps in 1052, because a church was built there in that year. This, however is a poor argument, and the matter is still uncertain.

(92) Ware says, (ib.) that the removal to Kilkenny was made by O'Dullany; and in the Census Camerales of Cencius, which was written before O'Dullany's death, the see is called Cainic. But from a passage quoted by Usher from a catalogue of the bishops of Ossory (Pr. p. 957.) it appears, that the see was still at Aghaboe, when O'Dullany died. The words are; "A. D. MCCII. obiit Reverendus pater Felix O'Dulane episcopus Ossoriensis, cujus ecclesia cathedralis tunc erat apud Aghboo in superiori Ossoria." Through an error of the press, or probably an oversight of Usher, MCCII. appears there, and also in the Ind. Chron. instead of MCCII. The name of Cainic (Kilkenny) might have been introduced into the text of Cencius at a later period. Ledwich has (Ant. &c. p. 510. 2d. ed.) some bungling about two dioceses of Aghaboe and Kilkenny from a Provinciale, which, he says, was compiled after 1102, because O'Dullany died in that year, for which, he quotes Usher. Now he might have easily perceived, that 1102 is a palpable mistake, and that Usher had observed, (ib.) that the Provinciale, no matter when compiled, was wrong, and that the sees of Aghaboe and Kilkenny ought not to be distinguished. Ledwich complains, that Aghaboe was sunk in Kilkenny through the encroachment of Papal power in 1152, that is, by Cardinal Paparo. But surely the see was not at Kilkenny until long after 1152, nor at the earliest, even according to Ware, until after 1178. What an antiquary of Ireland and of Aghaboe!

(93) Ware, Bishops at Kilmacduach.

(94) Archdall at Ardfinnan.

(95) Ware, Bishops at Lismore, and Antiq. cap. 26 at Kerry. He makes mention of a bishop, named O'Cerbail, (Carrol) who died at Lismore in 1167; but he could not have been bishop of that see, whereas Christian was still its bishop at the time of the synod of Cashel in 1172. (See above §. 2.)

(96) Ware, Annals at A. 1179. It has been said, (Fleury, L. 73. §. 24.) that an Irish bishop, who attended at the council, had no other income than the milk of three cows. If this be true, he must not have been one of those now mentioned; for it cannot be supposed, that any of their sees was reduced to such poverty. In fact Hoveden makes mention (at A. 1179) of five or six Irish bishops, who, besides St. Laurence and Catholicus, went to the council, although other accounts reckon in the whole only the six above named.

(97) This bull is dated the 20th of April A. D. 1179, and may be seen in Usher's Sylloge, No. 48. It is surprising to observe, how richly endowed the see of Dublin was at that time, Lusk, Swords, Finglas, Clondalkin, Tallaght, and many other places are mentioned as belonging to it, and also the parish churches of St. Thomas, St. Nicholas, St. Warburg, St. Patrick in the island, supposed to be the old church of St. Patrick in the south suburbs of Dublin (see Mr. Mason's History of the Cathedral of St. Patrick, p. 2.) the island of the sons of Nessan, that is, Ireland's Eye, (see Not. 61 to Chap. xi.) &c. &c.

(98) Vita S. Laurent. cap. 23.

(99) Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Donegall. He observes, that others place this foundation in 1184. Roderic O'Canavan lived until 1188, as stated by Ware (ib.) and Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 449.) Yet in the Ind. Chron. to this work, owing to one of those errata so common in Colgan's printed text, his death is marked at A. 1178. The English translator of Ware's Annals has (at A. 1179) changed his name into Roderic O'Cavanah.

(100) Tr. Th. Ind. Chron. Colgan (ib. and p. 310.) assigns that of Armagh to A. 1178; but O'Flaherty (MS. note at p. 310.) marks A. 1179.

§. xv. Meanwhile Fitz-Adelm had been recalled from Ireland in 1178, and Hugh de Lacy appointed deputy, to whom Robert De la Poer was joined in the commission. It seems, that he was soon after entrusted with the custody of Wexford. Of him it has been said, that he did nothing memorable or great during his government of Ireland, except his having removed the celebrated staff of Jesus from Armagh to Dublin. (101) But this mighty achievement ought not, I think, to be attributed to Fitz-Adelm, or to the time of his administration, during which neither he nor any of his countrymen had got possession of Armagh; nor was it probably until 1184, when Philip de Worcester entered Armagh with a great army, and extorted there much money and other things from the clergy. (102) There is a bull of Alexander III. dated the 13th of May, A. D. 1179, by which he "confirms the city of Glendaloch, in which the cathedral is, with the churches and other the possessions and appurtenances of it to Malchus, bishop of Glendaloch, and to his successors, saving the rights of the abbot of Glendaloch. (103) St. Laurence O'Toole, being returned to Ireland, (104) applied himself with fervour not only to the care of his own diocese and province, but likewise to the duties of his apostolic legation. He exerted himself to eradicate whatever abuses had crept in, owing to the perturbed state of the country, particularly with regard to the conduct of the clergy. He was very strict against such of them as were guilty of incontinence; and it is said that he sent 140 of them, who were convicted of that crime, to Rome to look for absolution there, although he did not want power to absolve them himself. (105) This was a scandal of a new kind in Ireland, and was chiefly caused by the bad conduct and example of the adventuring and fighting sort of clergymen, that had for some years back flocked over to this country from England and Wales. (106) The holy prelate still continued his unbounded charities, and during a famine, which lasted for three years, gave daily alms to 500 poor persons, besides supplying about 300 more throughout his diocese with clothes, provisions, and other necessaries. During these hard times about 200 children were left at the door of his residence, all of whom he got care taken of and well provided for. (107) Several miracles are attributed to him during that period, one of which was in the case of Gallwed, a priest of St. Martin's church in Dublin, who, having after a heavy fit of sickness lain for three days and nights as if dead, was, on St. Laurence's addressing him and praying over him, roused as it were out of a trance, and rose in good health. (108)

(101) Giraldus, Hib. exp. L. 2. c. 18. and Annals of Mary's Abbey at A. 1178. Concerning this staff see Chap. iv. §. 12.

(102) Ware makes Fitz-Adelm the remover of the staff to Dublin, but does not place this transaction in the time that he was deputy or governor of Ireland; assigning it in his Annals to A. 1180. How could Fitz-Adelm have taken it out of Armagh in that year, whereas neither he nor any of the foreign adventurers entered Armagh at that time, nor for some years later? Ware mentions, (ib. ad A. 1184.) from Giraldus, the conduct of Philip de Worcester; and on this occasion the staff might have been carried away. He adds (at A. 1180) that it was placed in the cathedral of the Blessed Trinity, where it was preserved with great care till the suppression of monasteries. And he tells us (ib. at A. 1538) that it was burned and destroyed in the year 1538.

(103) Harris (Bishops at Glendaloch) from the book, called Crede mihi.

(104) It is strange, that Giraldus (Hib. exp. L. 2. c. 23.) speaks of St. Laurence as if he had never returned to Ireland after the council of Lateran, observing that he was suspected by the king Henry on account of some privileges, contrary to the royal dignity, which he had obtained in that council. It is equally strange, that Leland (B. 1. ch. 5.) follows Giraldus, and adds, that after the council Henry forbade him to return to Ireland. But this prohibition is placed by the author of his Life after his return from Rome to Ireland, and after his having gone on a subsequent occasion to England. What were the privileges derogatory to the king's dignity, obtained by St. Laurence, I cannot discover, unless Giraldus meant the bull, of which above, granted to him by Alexander III. Perhaps Henry, who was not ashamed to apply for bulls, when his interests required them, and was glad to get them, did not wish, that bulls should be issued in favour of others. That St. Laurence did actually return after the council to Ireland is, besides being positively stated in his Life, evident, as will be soon seen, from Hoveden and other old writers.

(105) Vit. S. Laurent. cap. 23.

(106) That this was the true cause of the scandal will be seen lower down, from what passed in the synod of Dublin held a few years later under archbishop Cumin. We have a sample of the hopeful kind of ecclesiastics, who came over to Ireland with Strongbow and others, in one Nicholas a monk, who fought in their armies, and who, when Strongbow and his party on their way in 1171 to relieve Fitz-Stephen, whom they thought still besieged in Carig, were on the point of being totally defeated by O'Ryan, prince of Idrone, killed O'Ryan with an arrow, and thus changed the fate of the day. (Leland, B. 1. ch. 2 and Lyttelton, B. 4.) Such were the missionaries, who, according to the wish of Adrian IV., were to establish pure religion and sound ecclesiastical discipline in Ireland.

(107) Vit. S. Laurent. cap. 24. The author was mistaken in placing those three years of famine during the time of the saint's legateship. They must have begun before it; for he did not live three years after he was appointed legate.

(108) Ib. cap. 30.

§. xvi. Some time in the year 1180 St. Laurence went to England for the purpose of settling a certain dispute between Roderic O'Connor and Henry II. (109) He took with him a son of Roderic, who was to be left hostage with Henry. (110) But Henry, acting in a tyrannical manner, would not listen to him, and, having given orders that he should not be allowed to return to Ireland, passed over to Normandy. The saint retired to the monastery of Abingdon, where he remained three weeks. But hoping to induce Henry to accommodate matters he set out for France, and having landed at Wishant was proceeding towards Normandy, when he was seized with a fever. Being arrived near the frontiers of that province he descried the monastery of Augum, now Eu, belonging to Canons Regular of St. Victor, and situated at the very entrance of Normandy. Thither he went, and having prayed in the church was received in the hospice. Foreseeing that his end was near at hand, he made his confession to the abbot Osbert and received from him the holy Viaticum. While he was confined to bed David, a respectable clergyman and tutor of the young prince, intended as a hostage, called upon Henry, and at length prevailed upon him to agree to some terms. On his return to Augum on the fourth day, the saint expressed his joy at the issue of the business. On the third day following he requested of the abbot and brethren to be received into their body and fraternity, which was granted to him with great pleasure. He then asked for and received the sacrament of Extreme unction. Being admonished to make a will, he answered; "God knows, that I have not at present as much as one penny under the sun." A little before his death he lamented the sad state of his country, saying in the Irish language; "Ah! foolish and senseless people, what are you now to do? Who will cure your misfortunes? Who will heal you?" Soon after he was called to a better world at the very end of Friday, the 14th November, A. D. 1180, and after the funeral obsequies were terminated was honourably interred in the middle of the church of Augum in the presence of many persons, among others Cardinal Alexius the Pope's legate for Scotland, who happened to arrive then at Augum. (111) The saint's body remained there for about four years and a half, until, on occasion of rebuilding the church, it was taken up and placed in a shrine before the altar of the martyr Leodegarius. (112) He was canonized by Honorius III. in the year 1226. (113) After the canonization his reliques were with great solemnity placed over the high altar, and preserved in a silver shrine. Some of them were sent to Christ-church, Dublin, and some to various places in France. (114) Immediately on being informed of St. Laurence's death, Henry II. dispatched Jeffery De la Hay, his chaplain, and a certain clerk of the legate Alexius, to Dublin for the purpose of seizing on the revenues of the see and collecting them into the Exchequer. (115)

(109) In the saint's Life (cap. 31.) the Irish king, in whose behalf he went to England, is called Deronogus. This must be a mistake, as appears from the Life itself, in which that king is called the most powerful king of Ireland. Now there was no such powerful sovereign, named Deronogus, at that time in this country. Hoveden and the abbot Benedict call the Irish king Roderic.

(110) So Hoveden, Benedict, and others. But in the Life (ib.) the young man, intended as a hostage, is represented as a nephew of St. Laurence.

(111) Vit. S. Laurent. capp. 31-32. seqq. Hoveden is far from being correct, when treating of St. Laurence's arrival in Normandy and the time of his death. He says, (at A. 1181) that he came to that country after the feast of the purification of said year, that is, early in February of 1181. He speaks of him as if he had seen the king Henry there, and so does Butler in St. Laurence's Life at 14 November. But the fact is, that the saint died before he could see him in Normandy. I suppose Hoveden was unwilling to acknowledge with what harshness his master treated so holy and respected a prelate. Henry was certainly not fond of him, as he knew how much St. Laurence was attached to the independence of Ireland. Then Hoveden tells us, that the saint died not long after, that is, as his text insinuates, in rather an early part of 1181. This is palpably wrong; for nothing is more certain than that his death occurred on a 14th of November. It is extraordinary, that Harris (Bishops at St. Laurence O'Toole) alleges Hoveden as a voucher for the saint's death in 1180, whereas he expressly places it in 1181. It is, however, true, that 1180 was the real year of it, as Usher has very well proved, (Sylloge, Not. ad No. 48.) who, besides referring to Irish Annals, observes, that this is confirmed by the circumstance of the 14th of November having fallen in that year on a Friday. And Hoveden himself supplies us with an unanswerable proof by stating, that John Cumin was elected archbishop of Dublin on the 6th of September. A. 1181. Now, as St. Laurence died on a 14th of November, this day, having been prior to Cumin's election, must have been in 1180. Ware was therefore right (Annals at A. 1180, and Archbishops of Dublin) in marking the saint's death at this year. Hoveden's mistake in assigning it to 1181 has been followed by several writers, among others Baronius, Fleury, &c. Fleury, to guard against the argument taken from its having occurred on a Friday, affixes it to a Saturday. (See Hist. Eccl. L. 73. §. 25.) But the plain meaning of the author of the Life is, that the saint's death fell within the Friday. He says (cap. 33); "Itaque cum sextae feriae terminus advenisset, in confinio Sabbati subsequentis spiritum sancti viri requies aeterna suscepit."

(112) See said Life, (cap. 35.) and Harris (Archbishops, &c. at St. Laurence) from the office of the feast of the saint's translation celebrated at Augum, or Eu, on the 10th of May.

(113) The bull of canonization is in the Bullarium Romanum, and has been republished by Messingham (App. ad. Vit. S. Laurent.) and Wilkins (Conc. &c. Tom. 1. p. 619.). It is dated 3 idus (the 11th) Decembris, 10th year of the pontificate of Honorius III.

(114) See Harris, ib.

(115) Ware, Annals at A. 1180, and Harris, loc. cit.

CHAP. XXX.

Death of Gilbert O'Caran archbishop of Armagh—Some churches and abbeys plundered, and several others founded—Insurrection of the people of Munster against the English—Dispute between Roderic O'Conor and his son—Arrival of John Cumin, first English archbishop of Dublin—Bull of Pope Lucius III. which in some measure exempts the See of Dublin from the jurisdiction of Armagh—Philip of Worcester succeeds Hugh de Lacy in the government of Ireland, and extorts much money and other valuables from the clergy at Armagh—Arrival of John Earl of Morton and Lord of Ireland—waited on by some Irish Lords, who are insulted by him—they resent his treatment, and in several conflicts almost the entire army of John is destroyed—Deaths and successions of several bishops and abbots—Provincial Synod of Dublin under archbishop Cumin, at which Albin O'Mulloy preached against the incontinency and vicious habits of the English clergy who had come into Ireland—The delinquents are, in consequence, suspended from their functions by the archbishop—Gerald Barry preaches on the next day against the Irish clergy, but is forced to acknowledge their virtues—Canons agreed to at this Synod—Translation of the remains of St. Patrick, St. Columb and St. Brigid—Hugh de Lacy killed—Fables of Giraldus Cambrensis refuted—Payment of tithes introduced into Ireland—Further account and refutation of the fables of Gerald Barry.

SECT. 1.

IN the same year 1180 died also Gilbert O'Caran, archbishop of Armagh, who is said to have made, some time before his death, a grant of the town of Ballybaghal, in the now county of Dublin, to the Cisterian monastery of St. Mary, Dublin. (1) He was succeeded by Tomultach, alias Thomas, O'Conor, who having held the see for some time resigned, as will be seen lower down, but afterwards resumed it. In this year the abbey of Innisfallen, where the gold and silver and the richest articles of that whole country were deposited as in an inviolable sanctuary, was villanously plundered by Maolduin, son of Daniel O'Donoghoe, as likewise the church of Ardferf, and many persons were killed, even in the cemetery, by the Clancarties; but several of the perpetrators of these crimes were soon after punished by an untimely end. (2) The foundation of some religious houses is assigned to this year, such as that of Jeripont, or Jerpoint, in the now county of Kilkenny, for Cisterian monks by Donald, prince of Ossory. (3) It is said, that there was an older monastery of that order at Killenny, somewhere in that country, founded by Dermod O'Ryan, and called De Valle Dei, but which was afterwards united to Douske, now Graige-ne-managh. (4) The Cisterian abbey of Chore, or de choro S. Benedicti, in the place now called Middleton (county of Cork) is also marked at A. 1180, and is stated to have been supplied from Nenay or Magio in the county of Limerick. (5) Prior to this year there was another Cisterian house, called De castro Dei, at Fermoy, which is stated to have been founded in 1170, and to have been originally supplied from the monastery of Surium. (6) The monastery of Maur, or De fonte vivo, also belonging to that order, and in the same now county of Cork, is said to have founded by Dermod Mac-Cormac-Mac-Carthy, king of Desmond, and son of Cormac, the friend of St. Malachy, in 1172, and to have received its first members from the abbey of Baltinglas. (7) According to some accounts the monastery, likewise Cistercian, of Inis or Iniscourcey, a peninsula adjoining the lough of Strangford, and opposite to Downpatrick, was founded in 1180 by John de Courcey, and supplied with monks from Furness in Lancashire. (8) He erected this monastery in atonement for his having destroyed the Benedictine house of Erynagh, called also Carrig, from the rock on which it stood, in the now barony of Lecale, which had been founded in 1127 by an Ulster prince, named Magnell Mackenleff, and whose first abbot was a St. Evodius. With the lands, that belonged to this monastery, De Courcey endowed the new one of Inis. (9) To about the same year 1180 I find affixed another foundation by the same De Courcey, viz. that of the Black priory of St. Andrew de Stokes, a Benedictine establishment in the Ardes, likewise in the now county of Down. (10)

(1) Ware, Archbishops of Armagh. Whether or not that grant was made by Gilbert is not worth inquiring into. Ware says, that Ballybaghal got its name abaculo S. Patricii, meaning, I suppose, the staff usually called of Jesus. But what had that staff, which is said to have been placed in Trinity Church Dublin, to do with a country place in the district of that city? Besides, said staff was not in Dublin during the times of Gilbert. (See Not. 102. to Chap. xxix.)

(2) Annals of Innisfallen, and Ware, Annals at A. 1180.

(3) Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Kilkenny. It seems that, according to some accounts, the monks of this establishment had been removed from some other place in Ossory. Archdall (at Ierpont) calls the founder Donogh O'Donoghoe. Where he found him so called he does not tell us; but surely the princes of Ossory were not O'Donoghoes but Mac-Gilla-Patricks.

(4) See Ware, ib. and Harris, Monasteries.

(5) Ware, ib. at Cork. He does not say, by whom it was founded; but Archdall (at Middleton) shamefully quotes him, as if he had said, that the Fitzgeralds were the founders. He has no such thing, nor could he; for he was too well versed in Irish history not to know, that the Fitzgeralds were not at that time so settled in that country as to set about founding monasteries. The flimsy Alemand ascribes it to the Barries, and, strange to remark, has been followed by Harris, (Monast.) as if Harris could not have easily found, that there were no Barries established at that time in the South of Ireland. The first of that name, who was possessed of lands there granted to him by his uncle Robert Fitz-Stephen, was Philip Barry, who, as far as I can discover, did not come to Ireland, or at least reside in this country, until 1183. (See Ware, Annals at A. 1183, and Antiq. cap. 27.)

(6) Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Cork. The same shallow Alemand ascribes this foundation to the Roches, not knowing that the Roches were not settled in the now county of Cork until many years after 1170. But he had heard, that they became lords of Fermoy, and accordingly, without distinguishing the times, gave them the honour of this foundation. He was very little acquainted with Irish history, particularly the ancient part of it. For instance, in the Introduction to his work (p. 19.) he confounds St. Moctheus of Louth with St. Moedoc of Ferns.

(7) Ware, ib. Archdall thought it probable, that the monastery of Maur was at a place called Carigiliky in the West Carbery.

(8) Ware, ib. at Down, and Archdall at Iniscourcey. Ware observes, that others place this foundation in 1188. Archdall says that one E. of this monastery, that is, the abbot, was a witness to De Courcey's grant made to the church of St. Patrick in Down, meaning the grant of 1183. Were this true, Inis must have been founded some years before 1188. But that E. was witness not to the original grant of 1183, but to a later one in favour of said church. (See Mon. Angl. v. 2. p. 1021.)

(9) See Harris, History of the county of Down, ch. 3. p. 24. and Archdall at Erynagh and Iniscourcey.

(10) Ware treating (ib.) of this priory does not mark the year of its original foundation by De Courcey; but Harris (Monast.) assigns it to about A. 1180. Archdall (at Black abbey) is wrong in saying, that De Courcey made this house a cell to the abbey of Lonley in Normandy; for, as Ware states, (loc. cit.) this was done by De Lacy about the year 1218. De Courcey's charter for said priory is in the Monast. Angl. V. 2. p. 1019; but there is not a word in it about the abbey of Lonley. There is, however, in the same page another charter or deed, by which the abbot and monks of Lonley make over to Richard, archbishop of Armagh, and to his successors, the said priory of St. Andrew in the Ardes, and all their possessions in Ulster. This must have taken place long after the times we are now treating of; for there was no archbishop of Armagh named Richard, until Richard Fitz-Ralph, who lived in the 14th century. Ware (loc. cit.) makes mention of this annexation at rather a late period to the see of Armagh.

§. II. Thomas O'Connor, archbishop of Armagh, made in 1181 a visitation throughout Tyrone, with which he was well satisfied. (11) In this year died Marian O'Dunain, abbot of the Augustin Canons monastery of Cnoc na Sengan in or near Louth. He was most probably the same as the celebrated hagiologist Marian Gorman, who was certainly abbot at Louth in the year 1172, and who has left a much esteemed martyrology, written in Irish verse, comprizing not only Irish saints, but likewise those of other countries. (12) On the 6th of September of this year John Cumin, an Englishman, and a learned and eloquent person, was elected at Evesham in Worcestershire, on the recommendation of Henry II. whom he had served in a clerical capacity, archbishop of Dublin, by some of the clergy of that city assembled there for that purpose. He was not then a priest, but in the following year was ordained one at Velletri and afterwards there consecrated archbishop by Pope Lucius III. (13) He did not come to Ireland until 1184. Edan O'Killedy, who had been placed on the see of Clogher by the great St. Malachy, died after a very long incumbency in 1182, and was succeeded by Moeliosa O'Carrol, who afterwards became archbishop of Armagh. (14) In the same year died also Donald O'Hullucan, archbishop of Cashel, who was succeeded by Maurice, (15) whose real name was undoubtedly Murchertach. It was during his incumbency, but in the early part of it, that the celebrated and beautiful Cistercian abbey of Holy Cross in the county of Tipperary was erected and endowed by Donald O'Brian, king of North Munster, whereas Maurice, while archbishop of Cashel, was one of the witnesses to its foundation charter. (16) In the year 1182 the abbey of Dunbrody, county of Wexford, likewise of the Cistercian order, was founded and endowed with lands and property granted by Hervey de Monte Morisco. (17) About the same year Hugh de Lacy, now lord of Meath, erected two monasteries in that territory for Augustin Canons, one at Duleek, which he made a cell to the priory of Lhanthony near Gloucester, and the other at Colp, anciently Invercolpa, near the mouth of the Boyne, which he made a cell to Lhanthony in Monmouthshire. (18) Thus these adventurers and plunderers endeavoured to atone for their robberies in Ireland, committed not only on the laity but likewise on the native clergy of the country.

(11) Tr. Th. p. 310.

(12) Colgan, AA. SS. p. 5. and 737. He extracted a great part of this work from the martyrology of Tallagh, usually called that of Aengus; but it is not, as Ware says, (Writers at Murry or Marian) a supplement to that martyrology. (See Harris, Addition ib.) Colgan thought, that it was composed about 1167, and Ware states, that it was published in 1171. But it must have been published later, whereas we find in it the name of St. Gilda-Machaibeo, who died in 1174. (See Chap. xxix. §. 6. and ib. Not. 48.)

(13) Ware and Harris, Archbishops of Dublin. Dempster pretends, that he was a Scotchman. The name Cumin is certainly rather Scotch or Irish than English. Hoveden (at A. 1181) calls him simply a clerk of Henry's. But Giraldus (Hib. exp. L. 2. c. 23.) expressly calls him an Englishman.

(14) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Clogher. Some have said, that Edan died in 1180.

(15) The same, ib. at Cashel. Giraldus, whom they quote, calls him a learned and wise man.

(16) This charter is in the Monast. Angl. Vol. 2. p. 1035. It was granted in the present of Gregory, abbot of Holy Cross. Christian bishop of Lismore and Legate Apostolic, (i. e. who had been such) M. archbishop of Cashel, and B. (Briectius) bishop of Limerick, are named as witnesses to it. By M. must be understood Maurice; for there was not during the reign of Donald O'Brian, nor for many years before, any archbishop of Cashel, whose name began with that letter. Nor can it be referred to his successor Matthew, who was not archbishop until 1192, and accordingly could not sign along with Christian, who died in 1186. Therefore Ware was wrong (Antiq. cap. 26. at Tipperary) in assigning this foundation to about 1169 or 1181. Harris (Monast.) marks it at 1182: but it was probably somewhat later, yet prior to the death of Christian.

(17) Ware, loc. cit. at Wexford. He says, that Hervey in about the year 1175 gave various lands to God, and St. Mary, St. Benedict, and the monks of Bildewas in Shropshire various lands for the purpose of establishing a Cistercian abbey, but that the one of Dunbrody was not founded before 1182, upon which the abbot and monks of Bildewas granted to St. Mary's abbey of Dublin whatever right and claim they had to the new establishment of Dunbrody. (See also Archdall at Dunbrody.) Hervey's deed is in the Monast. Angl. Vol. 2. p. 1027; but Dunbrody, although mentioned in it is not marked as the place, where the abbey ought to be erected. One of the witnesses to it was Felix, bishop of Ossory, that is, O'Dullany. Therefore it was later than Ware says; for Felix was not bishop of Ossory until 1178.

(18) Ware, ib. at Meath, where he makes the cell of Duleek the same as the ancient monastery of St. Kienan; but in Annals (at A. 1182) he speaks of it as a new foundation. In the English translation there is an erratum 1120 instead of 1182.

§. 3. In this then fashionable mode of purchasing off sins and obtaining forgiveness from heaven John de Courcey distinguished himself beyond many others. We have met above with some instances of monkish soldierly piety in this respect, and now we find some more of them in the year 1183. He turned the secular canons out of the cathedral of Down, and in their stead introduced Benedictine monks from St. Werburgh's in Chester. At the same time he got the dedication title of the church changed from that of the Holy Trinity into that of St. Patrick. Afterwards he made at different times various grants to this establishment; and Malachy, bishop of Down, also endowed it with lands in a very ample manner, reserving to himself the title of guardian and abbot, as, he says, "is the practice in the church of Winchester or Coventry, and also reserving for the honour of his see, and to its use, the moiety of the oblations on the five following festivals; Christmas day, the Purification of the Blessed Virgin, St. Patrick's day, Easter, and Whitsuntide."

(19) To the same year 1183 is assigned the foundation, by De Courcey, of the Benedictine priory of the island of Neddrum, somewhere, it seems, off the coast of the county of Down, which he made a cell to the abbey of St. Bega of Coupland in Cumberland. (20) The foundation of the priory of St. John the Baptist, alias the English priory, in Down, by De Courcey for the Cruciferi, a branch of Augustin Canons, is also marked at said year. (21) According to some accounts one Reginald, who was a witness to one of De Courcey's charters in favour of St. Patrick's of Down, would have been bishop of Connor at this time, in which case it may be inferred that Nehemias, who was bishop there at the time of king Henry's arrival in Ireland, was already dead. (22) In the course of this year there was a great insurrection in Munster, and almost all its kings and princes revolted against Henry II. On this occasion Philip Barry went over to Ireland with a numerous body of troops, both to assist his uncle Fitz-Stephen and to secure to himself some lands, which Fitz-Stephen had granted to him in Olethan, the tract lying between Cork and Youghal. He was accompanied by his brother Gerald, so well known by the name of Giraldus Cambrensis, who now for the first time arrived in the country, which he afterwards so basely abused. (23) About this time a dispute and civil war having broken out between Roderic O'Connor and his eldest son Conor, surnamed Maenmoigi, Roderic agreed to put an end to the quarrel by giving up the kingdom to Conor, and retiring to a monastery; but in two years after he resumed the sovereignty and administration of it.

(19) The various charters of grants relative to the Benedictine house of Down are in the Monast. Angl. Vol. 2. p. 1020, seqq. See also Ware, (Annals at A. 1183, Antiq. cap. 26. at Down, and Bishops at Down, Malachy III.) Harris, (Additions ib.) and Archdall (at Downpatrick). Harris refutes the flimsy Alemand, who says that the house of Down was to depend on the abbey of St. Werburg in Chester, whereas the very contrary is marked and stipulated in one of De Courcey's charters. And can it be supposed, that the Benedictines of Down, who had become in fact the chapter of the cathedral, in the same manner as monks were anciently throughout almost all the cathedrals not only of Ireland but likewise of England, where this practice was longer kept up, could or would be subjected to any other house of their order? In the deed of the bishop Malachy for this establishment there is a signature as of a witness, L. archbishop of Dublin. L. must be a mistake; for St. Laurence O'Toole was dead before this deed was made, and after him there was no archbishop of Dublin during Malachy's time nor long after, whose name began with L. I am sure the original letter was I. meaning John Cumin.

(20) So Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Down, and Annals at A. 1183. But in a little preface to De Courcey's grant of Neddrum (Monast. Ang. Vol. 2. p. 1023.) it is said, that he made it over in 1179 to the monastery of St. Bega, &c. This, however does not appear in the text of the grant, and may be a mistake. Archdall at (Neddrum) conjectures, that it was the largest of the Copland islands, that is, the one called the Big isle off the Ardes. This conjecture seems very probable; whereas there is good reason to think, that the name Copland was given to those islands in consequence of there being in one of them an establishment belonging to St. Bega of Coupland. In the head to the above mentioned deed, Coupland is said to be in Yorkshire, in Com. Eborac.

(21) Ware in the Antiq. cap. 26 at Down does not mention the year of this foundation, but in the Annals he has it at A. 1183. Harris and Archdall merely say, that it was in the 12th century. This priory was called the English one, because there was another house of Canons Regular of St. Augustin in Down since the time of St. Malachy, and which was distinguished by the name of the Irish priory.

Notwithstanding these monastic foundations, Giraldus Cambrensis represents many of those leaders as plunderers of Church property. After mentioning, (Prooemium to the second edition of Hibernia expugnata) that Robert Fitz-Stephen, Hervey De Monte Marisco, Raymond, John de Courcey, and Meyler, had not merited to obtain legitimate offspring, he adds; " This is not to be " wondered at. For the miserable clergy is reduced to beggary " in the island. The cathedral churches mourn, having been " robbed by the aforesaid persons, and others along with them, " or who came over after them, of their lands and ample estates; " which had been formerly granted to them faithfully and devoutly. " And thus the exalting of the Church has been changed into the " despoiling or plundering of the Church." And, accounting for some losses sustained by the English, he says, (Hib. exp. L. 2. cap 35.) that " the greatest disadvantage of all was, that, while we " conferred nothing new on the Church of Christ in our new prin- " cipality, we not only did not think it worthy of any important " bounty or of due honour, but even, having immediately taken " away its lands and possessions, have exerted ourselves either to " mutilate or abrogate its former dignities and ancient privileges." Thus it was, that the English adventurers fulfilled the expectations of the Popes Adrian IV. and Alexander III.

(22) Ware (Bishops at Conor) thought, that the charter signed by R. or Reginald, bishop of Connor, was drawn up about A. 1183; but this is not certain. I must here point out a mistranslation of Ware's text, ib. He calls John de Courcey conqueror of Ulidia or Ullah, which comprized at most the now county of Down and some parts of Antrim. The translator has rendered it Ulster. But De Courcey never possessed more than a comparatively small proportion of the province now called Ulster. Harris has guarded against the blunder of that translator.

(23) See Ware, Annals at A. 1183.

§. iv. Henry II. intending to transfer the dominion of Ireland to his son John, sent over to Ireland in 1184, to prepare the way for his reception, John Cumin or Comin the new archbishop of Dublin. He had been, as stated above, consecrated archbishop by Pope Lucius III. at Velletri in the year 1182, and on Palm-Sunday the 21st of March. (24) His arrival in Dublin was in the month of September, and he brought with him a bull granted to him by that Pope on the 13th of April A. D. 1182, by which the Pope, "following the authority of the sacred canons, decrees, that no archbishop or bishop do presume to hold meetings in the diocese of Dublin, or to treat of the ecclesiastical causes and affairs of said diocese, without the consent of the archbishop of Dublin, if he (the archbishop of Dublin,) be actually in his bishopric or see, unless such other prelate be enjoined to do so by the Roman Pontiff or his legate." (25) This bull was undoubtedly intended as a protection to the see of Dublin against the exercise of certain powers on the part of the archbishops of Armagh, or perhaps against the antiquated claims of Canterbury. But it does not, as some abettors of the independence of Dublin have imagined, set aside the primatial rights of Armagh, as laid down and arranged by the council of Kells and according to the Canon law of those times. For, although, while the archbishop of Armagh was not only the primate but likewise the only archbishop of Ireland, he exercised powers much greater than were afterwards allowed to primates, visited all the dioceses of Ireland whenever he thought fit, and interfered in their internal concerns, yet by the Canon law of the times we are now treating of, such ample jurisdiction was not allowed to primates any where. The bull of Lucius III., while it exempts the diocese of Dublin from the extensive jurisdiction formerly enjoyed by the see of Armagh, does not, however, render it absolutely independent of that see, as far as its rights were recognized by the general Canon law of that period, particularly the privilege of receiving appeals from the other archdioceses of Ireland and the power of deciding on them in the spiritual court of Armagh, but not elsewhere. There is not a word in the bull to invalidate such primatial rights as these; and it is even supposed, that, except in the cases especially mentioned in the bull, every thing else was to remain as usual. Those therefore, who contend for the total independence of Dublin on Armagh, must recur to other documents different from this bull and later than it, of which they may find several on both sides of the question issued in after-times, of which I do not mean to treat. (26)

(24) Hoveden at A. 1182. This alone is sufficient, if any thing else were wanting, to prove that the year of St. Laurence O'Toole's death was 1180. For he died on a 14th of November; Cumin was elected his successor on the 6th of September following, but was not ordained priest until the 13th, nor consecrated bishop until the 21st March of the next succeeding year. That this was 1182, as Hoveden marks it, is evident from the circumstance of Palm-Sunday falling on the 21st of March, whereas, according to the chronological tables, Easter Sunday fell in 1182 on the 28th of March. (Compare with Not. 111. to Chap. xxix.) Giraldus, speaking (Hib. exp. L. 2. c. 23.) of Cumin's ordination to the priesthood says, that he was ordained presbyter cardinalis by Lucius III. Should this be understood as if he were made a cardinal priest of the particular church of Rome, it is false; for, as Ware has shown, (Archbishops of Dublin at John Cumin) he never was a cardinal in that sense. Perhaps Giraldus' reason for giving that title to Cumin was, that he was probably ordained priest on the title of some parochial church in Dublin; and it is well known, that in former times several priests not only of Rome but likewise of other cities, such as Paris, Ravenna, &c. used to be styled cardinals.

(25) See Ware, (Archbishops, &c. at John Cumin, and Annals at A. 1181.) Harris, (Archbishops ib. and at Armagh, Walter de Jorse) and the Jus Primat. Armac. §. 63. seqq. The original words are as follow; “ Sacrorum quoque canonum auctoritatem sequentes statuimus, ut nullus archiepiscopus vel episcopus absque assensu Dubliniensis archiepiscopi, si in episcopatu fuerit, in dioecesi Dubliniensi conventus celebrare, causas et ecclesiastica negotia ejusdem dioecesis, nisi per Romanum Pontificem vel legatum ejus fuerit eidem injunctum, tractare praesumat.” It was a shame for Peter Talbot, the R. C. archbishop of Dublin, to quote this passage in a mutilated form, as may be seen in Jus, &c. ib. The translator of Ware and Harris have spoiled the whole meaning of it. They make the Pope say, “ that no archbishop or bishop shall without the assent of the archbishop of Dublin presume to hold any convention, &c. if it be in a bishoprick within the diocese of Dublin, or, as Harris has altered it, a bishoprick within his province. Certainly a bishopric within the diocese of Dublin is a ridiculous expression, and shows what a bungler that translator was; but Harris’ amendment is equally bad; for who would translate dioecesi by the word province? They united, without inserting a comma, the words, si in episcopatu fuerit, with in dioecesi Dubliniensi, and, instead of he, wrote it, and thus fell into their blundering translations. From their nonsense it would follow, that a suffragan bishop of the province of Dublin could not hold a meeting of his clergy, ex. c. a diocesan synod or even a conference, without the consent of the archbishop of Dublin, nor without it manage the common affairs of his own see. Now the object of the bull was not to degrade the suffragan bishops below their level, but to protect the see of Dublin against higher claims; and the true meaning of it is, that, while there is a person in the bishopric, that is, an actually existing archbishop of of Dublin in the diocese, no other prelate do venture to hold meetings, or to treat of its affairs, in the diocese of Dullin, except in case the Pope or his legate should give an order to that effect. It may seem, that the second part of the prohibition, viz. that relative to not treating of the affairs of the diocese of Dublin, might be understood of their not being treated of not only in said diocese but likewise no where else. But the context indicates, that the only place meant, within which such affairs should not be treated of by prelates different from the archbishop of Dublin, is the diocese of Dublin itself.

(26) Harris gives (Archbishops of Armagh, at Walter de Jorse) a good summary of this tedious controversy, which he took in great part from Mac-Mahon's Jus Primat. Armac. a learned and respectable work. He deduces the origin of it from the bull of Lucius III.; but I think he was mistaken, as he certainly was with regard to the meaning of said bull. Nor do I find, that any archbishop of Armagh, contemporary with John Cumin, complained of this bull, although Peter Talbot, who is refuted by Harris, (ib. at Moeliosa O'Carrol) pretended that this Moeliosa had a contest with him on this subject. And in fact I do not perceive in this bull any thing derogatory to the real primacy of Armagh. I should rather derive the commencement of this dispute from some later bull, such as one of Honorius III. granted to Henry de Loundres, archbishop of Dublin, and "prohibiting any archbishop or other prelate of Ireland (except the suffragans of Dublin and the Pope's legate) from having the cross carried before them, holding assemblies, (except those of the religious orders) or treating of ecclesiastical causes (unless they be delegated by the Holy see) in the province of Dublin without the consent of the archbishop of Dublin." This bull goes much farther than that of Lucius III.; for in the first place the exemption is not confined to the diocese of Dublin, but extends to the whole province; and secondly, which is very material, the right of having the cross carried before him, which used to be exercised by the primate in every part of Ireland, is prohibited as to the province of Dublin. This was a real infringement of a privilege of the see of Armagh; yet there is nothing said in opposition to its right of receiving appeals from the province of Dublin, although not to be tried in said province without the consent of the archbishop of Dublin. There was, however, enough in this bull to cause dissatisfaction at Armagh. What is said in it concerning the not allowing any prelate of another province to treat of ecclesiastical causes in that of Dublin, while it does not prevent the treating of at Armagh causes belonging to the province of Dublin, confirms what I have observed in the preceding note as to the place, in which, according to Lucius' bull, no prelate, different from the archbishop of Dublin, is permitted to treat of the ecclesiastical affairs of the diocese of Dublin. Were the words of that bull to be understood otherwise than as I have explained them, they would imply a privilege vastly greater than that granted by the bull of Honorius. Now it is evident, that Honorius intended to confer greater exemptions than Lucius had, and yet he goes no farther than to prevent any prelate of a different province (alluding to the archbishop of Armagh) from juridically treating of ecclesiastical causes in the province of Dublin. Hence it is clear, that the intention of Lucius was, that no prelate, different from the archbishop of Dublin, should treat of the affairs of the diocese of Dublin in the diocese of Dublin, without his meaning that said prelate might not treat of them elsewhere. Mac-Mahon is rather unfortunate (Jus, &c. §. 75.) in his comments on the bull of Honorius, which he strives to make appear as spurious. He sneers at its being allowed to the suffragan bishops of the province of Dublin to have the cross carried before them without the consent of the archbishop. But the bull does not permit them to do so in the diocese of Dublin, but only in the province, that is, in their own dioceses and no where else. As the bull refers to the whole province, it was necessary to insert that clause, whereas otherwise a Leinster suffragan bishop, ex. c. a bishop of Kildare, would be prohibited from having the cross carried before him in his own diocese without the consent of the archbishop of Dublin.

§. 5. In this year 1184 Thomas O'Connor resigned the see of Armagh, and in his place was appointed Moeliosa O'Carrol, bishop of Clogher, who was succeeded there by Christian or Gilla-Criost O'Macturan, abbot of Clones. Moeliosa after his election set out for Rome, but died on his way thither. Amlave O'Murid was then chosen archbishop of Armagh, and died not long after in 1185. (27) Upon his death Thomas O'Connor resumed the see, which he held for 16 years after. (28) In said year 1184 Hugh de Lacy was recalled from the government of Ireland, and Philip of Worcester was sent over in his stead, who signalized his administration by an unjust and wicked attack on Armagh, where he extorted much money and other valuables from the clergy. (29) He and some of his followers were soon after punished for this iniquitous proceeding. (30) It was probably in atonement for this crime that Philip founded the Benedictine priory of Sts. Philip, James, and Cumin, at Kilcumin in the now barony of Kilnelongurty, county of Tipperary, which he supplied with monks from Glastonbury, to which he made it a cell, and one of whom, named James, he placed over it. (31) To about the same year I find assigned the establishment of the Cistercian house of Inislaunaght near the Suir in said county, which seems to have consisted merely in a removal from the monastery of Surium to that place, (32) and in a new endowment by Donald O'Brian, king of North Munster. Another Cistercian monastery was founded in 1183 by Cuoghor O'More in Leix in the now Queen's county. (33) In the year 1185 John, earl of Morton, and lord of Ireland, arrived with a large fleet and a very considerable army at Waterford on the first of April. He was accompanied by the famous Gerald Barry as his tutor and secretary. (34) On his landing he was received by the archbishop of Dublin and other English lords, who swore fealty to him. Several Irish chieftains of the neighbouring parts waited on him at Waterford, congratulated him on his happy arrival, and acknowledged him as their lord. But John and his young nobles received them with derision, and some of these impudent foreigners pulled them by their beards, which, contrary to the Norman and English fashion of those days, they wore long and thick. The Irish lords were highly enraged at this treatment, and, determined on revenge, retired together with their clans to the territories of Donald O'Brian, to whom as likewise to Dermod Mac-Carthy, king of Desmond, and to Roderic O'Conor they poured forth their complaints, and represented to them what they might have to expect themselves, if they suffered these insolent invaders to get possession of the country. These princes felt the importance and urgency of the business, and uniting together attacked the new-comers with such vigour, that in the course of a few months John lost in several conflicts almost his whole army, and after having erected two or three castles in Munster, was obliged to return to England in December of said year. On this occasion John de Courcey was appointed Justiciary of Ireland, who by his consummate ability, and with the help of the veteran soldiers, saved the English interest from imminent destruction. (35)

(27) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Armagh and Clogher. Harris adds, that Amlave O'Murid died at Duncruthen (see Not. 18. to Chap. vi.) in the now county of Londonderry, and that his remains were thence conveyed to Derry, and buried there, &c. This is, I am sure, a mistake, which Harris fell into by applying to Amlave O'Murid what Ware and himself have (at Derry) in the very same words concerning Amlave O' Coffy, a bishop of Derry, who also died in 1185. Ware says, that he found nothing more recorded of Amlave O'Murid than the year of his death. What would have brought him to die at Duncruthen; or, if he did die there, would not his remains have been conveyed to Armagh?

(28) The same ib. at Armagh.

(29) Ware, Annals at A. 1184. Compare with Chap. xxix. §. 15. and ib. Not. 102.

(30) Giraldus (Topogr. Hib. Dist. 2. c. 50.) condemns their conduct as sacrilegious, and states that Philip of Worcester, when carrying away the spoil, was struck with a sudden fit, subita passione, from which he hardly escaped. He adds, that two horses of Hugh Tyrrel, who was one of that plundering party, were burnt in Down, which so frightened him, that he sent back his share of the booty, and that the greatest part of that town was destroyed by fire.

(31) Ware, Annals at A. 1184, and Antiq. cap. 26. at Tipperary. There is a short account of this priory in the Monast. Angl. Vol. 2, p. 1023.

(32) See Not. 64. to Chap. xxvii.

(33) Ware (Antiq. loc. cit.) adds to Donald O'Brian, as a benefactor to Inislaunaght, Malachy O'Foelain prince of the Desies. He does not mention the year, in which they endowed or refounded it; and yet Archdall (at Inislounagh) refers to him, as if he said in 1187. Harris (Monaster. Cistercian abbies) assigns this endowment to about A. 1184. For the monastery of Leix see Ware (ib. at Queen's county) and Archdall at Abbey-Leix, the name by which it has been known.

(34) Ware (Annals at 1185) calls Gerald tutor to prince John, and at Writers (Lib. 1. cap. 2.) following Giraldus himself (De rebus a se gestis, Part. 2. c. 10.) says, that Henry II. sent him over to Ireland with John as his secretary. Hence it follows, that Gerald, who had been in Ireland in 1183, (above §. 3.) had in the mean while returned to Wales.

(35) Ware, Annals at A. 1185 and Lyttelton, B. 5. See also Giraldus, Hib. exp. L. 2. c. 35.

§. 6. In said year, 1185, some Irish bishops died, among whom, besides Amlave O'Murid of Armagh, already mentioned, we find Amlave O'Cobthaigh, or O'Coffy, bishop of Derry, who died at Duncruthen in that diocese. His remains were thence conveyed to Derry, and buried there in the abbey of St. Columba near those of Muredach O'Cobthaigh, his immediate predecessor. (36) He was succeeded by Fogartach O'Cherballen or O'Carallan. Joseph O'Hethe, bishop of Ferns, or, as some have called him, of Wexford, died in the same year after having held the see about thirty years. (37) The prince John, who was then in Ireland, offered this see to Gerald Barry, and proposed to get united to it in his favour the bishopric of Leighlin, which was then vacant by the death of its bishop Donagh or Donat, who died in that year. Gerald declined the offer; and after some time Albin O'Mulloy, abbot of the Cistercian house of Baltinglass, was raised to the see of Ferns. (38) About the middle of Lent of the following year, that is, 1186, Archbishop Cumin held a provincial synod in Dublin in the church of the Holy Trinity, alias Christ-church, which began to sit on the Sunday Laetare Jerusalem, or the fourth Sunday of Lent. (39) On the first day the archbishop preached himself on the Sacraments. On the second Albin O'Mulloy, who was still only abbot of Baltinglass, made a long discourse on the subject of the continency of clergymen, in which he inveighed severely against the English and Welsh clergy, that had come over to Ireland, as the authors of whatever abuses then existed in this respect, and who by their vicious example had corrupted the purity and correctness of the Irish ecclesiastics, who were singularly observant of chastity before the contagion was spread among them by those strangers. Upon which several foreign clergymen, settled in the county of Wexford, and who were present at the synod, began to accuse each other, before the whole assembly, of their having concubines and wives, appealing on the spot to witnesses for their assertions and mutual recriminations; upon which they became a laughing-stock and objects of insult to the Irish clergy then present. The archbishop, who had encouraged the delinquents to disclose and prove each others faults, immediately passed sentence on those, who were convicted of being guilty, and suspended them from their ecclesiastical functions and the enjoyment of their benefices. (40) On the third day Gerald Barry, who attended at the synod, was ordered by the archbishop to speak, and pronounced a long farrago of a sermon, in which he entered into a variety of subjects relative to the conduct at large of the Irish clergy, particularly the bishops, mixed with much abuse of the whole nation. (41) Of several of his charges, which are partly founded on his ignorance of ecclesiastical antiquities and partly distorted by malignity, an occasion will soon occur of treating; but I may here observe, that in his general account of the Irish clergy he speaks very favourably of them. "The clergy," he says, “ of this country are very commendable “ for religion, and among the divers virtues, which “ distinguish them, excel and are preeminent in the “ prerogative of chastity. Likewise they attend vi“ gilantly to their Psalms and hours, to reading and “ prayer; and remaining within the precincts of “ the churches do not absent themselves from the “ divine offices, to the celebration of which they “ have been appointed. They also pay great atten“ tion to abstinence and sparingness of food, so that

 “ the greatest part of them fast almost every day un“ til dusk and until they have completed all the ca“ nonical offices of the day.” (42) But, as a set off against this statement, forced from him by the truth, he adds, that in general they take at night more wine or other sorts of drink than is becoming. Yet he does not accuse them of drinking to inebriation.
 (43) The most they could be charged with was, that according to the Irish custom they might have sat together drinking something after dinner, while some other nations, who indulge much more in eating and in quantity and variety of meats than the Irish generally do, drink at the same time that they are eating. (44) He confesses, however, that some of them are exceedingly good men and without blemish.
 (45) What he stated concerning the clergy’s drinking gave great offence; and Felix, bishop of Ossory, who supped on the evening of that day with the archbishop, being asked by him, what he thought of Giraldus’ discourse, answered; “ He said bad things, and I was very near flying in his face, or, at least, making him a harsh reply; for he called us topers.” (46)

(36) Ware, Bishops at Derry. (Compare with Not. 27.) He says, that in the Annals of Connaught Amlave is called bishop of Kinel-Eogain. Hence it seems, that the see of Ardsrath alias Rathlure, or at least part of it, was at this time united with that of Derry.

(37) Ware ib. at Ferns, and Harris ib. Joseph O'Hethe must have been placed on the see of Ferns during the life-time of his predecessor Brigdin O'Cathlan, who lived until 1172 (see Chap. xxix. §. 5.) and who, it appears, resigned about A. 1155. Concerning a calumnious story, in which Joseph was included, see Not. 72. to Chap. xxix.

(38) Ware and Harris, ib. and at Leighlin. See also Giraldus, De rebus a se gestis, Part. 2. cap. 13.

(39) Giraldus, ib. I am much surprized to find, that Ware has assigned this synod to the year 1185 not only in his Annals, but likewise at Bishops (Ferns, Albin O'Mulloy). For it is evident from Giraldus, that it must have been held in 1186. He places it after the return of prince John to England, which was, as we have seen, in December, A. 1185 Ware himself in the Annals follows the order of Giraldus, mentioning John's departure from Ireland before the synod was assembled. Giraldus was present at this synod; but how could this have been, if it were held in 1185? He tells us himself that he came to Ireland with John, (above Not. 34.) and in Easter time; and Ware accordingly says, (Annals at A. 1185) that John landed at Waterford on the 5th day of Easter said year. Therefore Giraldus could not have attended a synod held in Dublin during the Lent of 1185. Harris, although (at Albin O'Mulloy) he has with Ware A. 1185, yet (at Archbishops of Dublin, John Cumin) speaks of the synod as held about 1186. He should have said in 1186, as is clear from Giraldus, and as it is marked by Fleury, L. 74. §. 8.

(40) Giraldus, ib. See also Fleury, loc. cit. Giraldus calls the guilty clergymen Clerici nostrates. They were a sample of the missionaries, who, as Adrian IV. and Alexander III. had flattered themselves, were under the auspices of Henry II. to instruct and reform the people of Ireland!

(41) He has given the substance of his discourse, ib. cap. 14. It is nearly the same, word for word, with what he has in Topogr. Hib. Dist. 3. capp. 27, 28, 29, 30.

(42) His words are (as loc. cit.); Est autem terrae istius Clerus satis religione commendabilis; et inter varias, quibus pollet, virtutes castitatis praerogativa praeeminet et praececellit. Item Psalmis et horis, lectioni et orationi vigilanter inserviunt, et intra ecclesiae septa se continentes a divinis, quibus deputati sunt, officiis non re- cedunt. Abstinētię quoque et parsimonię ciborum non mediocriter indulgent, ita ut pars maxima cotidie fere, donec cuncta diei compleverint horarum officia, usque ad crepusculum jejurent."

(43) Fleury (L. 74. §. 8.) quoting from Giraldus (De rebus, &c. Part. 2. c. 14.) gives an incorrect statement of what he said. He makes him speak of the drunkenness of the Irish clergy, although Giraldus went no farther than to charge them with drinking more than was proper, quam deceret. And then he omitted Giraldus' preceding encomium on them, touching on it merely in general terms. I may also remark, that he had no right to say, that Giraldus proved by unanswerable arguments the negligence of the Irish prelates. Those arguments were not, as will be seen, unanswerable, although Giraldus boasts that they were. Fleury copied Giraldus' boast, but so as that a reader would think, that the words are from Fleury himself. This historian was but too apt to copy without discrimination from prejudiced or ill-informed writers passages relative to matters of Irish ecclesiastical history, with which indeed he was poorly acquainted. Harris also (Bishops of Ferns, at Albin O'Mulloy) speaks of drunkenness; but Giraldus has not that word.

(44) What has been now observed shows the malignity of Giraldus in distorting a custom innocent in itself into a vice. Not being able to show, that the clergy drank to excess, he strove to misrepresent the practice of the country, as if it were more unbecoming to drink something after dinner than to drink as much as people do in some other countries during their long dinners. He acknowledges, however, that whatever the Irish clergy did drink did not lead to any breach of chastity, and says; "Hoc pro miraculo duci potest, quod ubi vina dominantur, Venus non regnat." Surely this is a sufficient proof, that they were moderate with regard to drinking.

(45) "Sunt tamen nonnulli inter hos optimi et sine fermento sincerissimi."

(46) Giraldus De rebus, &c. Part. 2. c. 15. Potores was the word used by Felix, which Harris (loc. cit.) has inaccurately translated drunkards. The conceited and boasting Giraldus speaks with delight of his discourse, and of his having raised the spirits of his countrymen, who had been attacked by Albin O'Mulloy. In his wish for revenge he misrepresented matters as much as he could.

§. VII. The canons agreed to in this synod are still extant, and are as follow. (47) The 1st prohibits priests from celebrating mass on a wooden table (or altar,) according to the usage of Ireland, and enjoins, that in all monasteries and baptismal churches altars should be made of stone; and, if a stone of sufficient size to cover the whole surface of the altar cannot be had, that in such case a square entire and polished stone be fixed in the middle of the altar, where Christ's body is consecrated, of a compass broad enough to contain five crosses and also to bear the foot of the largest chalice. But in chapels, chauntries, or oratories, if they are necessarily obliged to use wooden altars, let the mass be celebrated upon plates of stone of the before-mentioned size firmly fixed in the wood. (48)

The 2d provides, that the coverings of the holy mysteries may spread over the whole upper part of the altar, and that a cloth may cover the front of the same and reach to the ground (or floor). These coverings to be always whole and clean.

3d. That in monasteries and rich churches chalices be provided of gold and silver; but in poorer churches, where such cannot be afforded, that then pewter chalices may serve the purpose, which must be always kept whole and clean. (49)

4th. That the Host, which represents the Lamb without spot, the Alpha and Omega, be made so white and pure, that the partakers thereof may thereby understand the purifying and feeding of their souls rather than their bodies. (50)

5th. That the wine in the Sacrament be so tempered with water, that it be not deprived either of the natural taste or colour. (51)

6th. That all vestments and coverings belonging to the church be clean, fine, and white. (52)

7th. That a lavatory of stone or wood be set up, and so contrived with a hollow, that whatever is poured into it may pass through and lodge in the earth; through which also the last washings of the priest's hands after the holy communion may pass.

8th. Provides, that an immoveable font be fixed in the middle of every baptismal church, or in such other part of it as the paschal procession may conveniently pass round. That it be made of stone, or of wood lined with lead for cleanness, wide and large above, bored through to the bottom, and so contrived that, after the ceremony of baptism be ended, a secret pipe be so contrived therein as to convey the holy water down to mother earth. (53)

9th. That the coverings of the altar, and other vestments dedicated to God, when injured by age, be burnt within the inclosure of the church, and the ashes of them transmitted through the aforesaid pipe of the font, to be buried in the bowels of the earth.

10th. Prohibits any vessel used in baptism to be applied ever after to any of the common uses of men. (54)

11th. Prohibits under the pain of an anathema any person to bury in a church yard, unless he can show by an authentic writing, or undeniable evidence, that it was consecrated by a bishop, not only as a sanctuary or place of refuge, but also for a place of sepulture; (55) and that no laymen shall presume to bury their dead in such a consecrated place without the presence of a priest.

12th. Prohibits the celebration of divine service in chapels built by laymen to the detriment of the mother churches. (56)

13th. Since the clergy of Ireland, among other virtues, have been always remarkably eminent for their chastity, and that it would be ignominious if they should be corrupted, through his (the archbishop's) negligence, by the foul contagion of strangers, and the example of a few incontinent men; he therefore forbids, under the penalty of losing both office and benefice, that no priest, deacon, or sub-deacon should keep any woman in their houses, either under the pretence of necessary service, or any other colour whatsoever, unless a mother, own sister, or such a person whose age should remove all suspicion of any unlawful commerce. (57)

14th. Contains an interdict against simony under the before-mentioned penalty of losing both office and benefice.

15th. Appoints that, if any clerk should receive an ecclesiastical benefice from a lay hand, unless after a third monition he renounce that possession which he obtained by intrusion, he should be anathematized and for ever deprived of the said benefice.

16th. Prohibits a bishop from ordaining the inhabitant of another diocese without the commendatory letters of his proper bishop, or of the archdeacon. (58) Nor that any one be promoted to holy orders without a certain title of a benefice assigned to him. (59)

17th. Prohibits the conferring on one person two holy orders in one day.

18th. Provides, that all fornicators shall be compelled to celebrate a lawful marriage, and also that no person born in fornication should be promoted to holy orders, nor should be esteemed heir either to father or mother, unless they be afterwards joined in lawful matrimony. (60)

19th. Provides, that tythes be paid to the mother churches (61) out of provisions, hay, the young of animals, flax, wool, gardens, orchards, and out of all things, that grow and renew yearly, under pain of an anathema after the third monition; and that those, who continue obstinate in refusing to pay, shall be obliged to pay the more punctually for the future. (62)

20th. Provides, that all archers, and all others, who carry arms not for the defence of the people, but for plunder and sordid lucre, shall on every Lord's day be excommunicated by bell, book, and candle, and at last be refused Christian burial.

These canons were not long after confirmed by Pope Urban III. (63)

(47) Harris says, (Archbishops of Dublin, John Cumin or Comyn) that they are among the archives preserved in Christchurch, Dublin, yet so miserably defaced by time, that many words of them are not now legible, but that the substance of them may be collected. As I have not been able to see the original, I lay before the reader his abstract of them, adding however some observations.

(48) This last mode is the one followed at this day in the Catholic chapels of Ireland. It is allowed, that before the times of Constantine the great the Christian altars or holy tables were generally made of wood; and it is clear from St. Augustin, (Ep. 50. ad Bonifac.) Optatus, (Lib. 6. p. 94.) and St. Athanasius, (Ep. ad solitar. vitam. agentes) that this practice continued later in Africa and Egypt. It has been said, that Pope Sylvester I. ordered, that altars should henceforth be only of stone; but of this there is no sufficient proof; or, if he issued any such order, it was not generally obeyed. The very altar of St. John Lateran's was in his time of wood. The first decree relative to this point seems to be that of the council of Epone in France held A. D. 517, which in its 26th canon declared; "Altaria, nisi lapidea, chrismatis unctione non sacrentur." (See more in Bingham's Origines B. VIII. ch. 6. sect. 15.) It is therefore not to be wondered at, that the Irish made their altars of wood from the beginning, and that they continued to do so in consequence of their steady attachment to the practices received from St. Patrick.

(49) We have seen, (Chap. xvi. §. 1.) that the great St. Columbanus made use of chalices of brass. Chalices of glass were used in various countries, and I have mentioned (Not. 47. to Chap. 1.) a remarkable instance of them at a very early period in Ireland.

(50) Regulations similar to this were observed in other churches. In the monastery of Clugni, as related by Ulric on its practices,

(see Fleury, L. 63. §. 60.) the most strict attention was paid to the pureness and whiteness of the bread for the use of the altar, and the preparing of it was considered as a religious ceremony, in which priests, deacons, and novices were engaged amidst the singing of psalms.

(51) This rule was directed against a custom, which some priests had adopted, particularly in Spain, of putting more water into the chalice than was proper.

(52) What is here said of whiteness cannot be understood of all the vestments and coverings, some of which were not white, but merely of such of them as according to general usage ought to be white.

(53) This canon was made in conformity with the second of the synod of Cashel. (See Chap. xxix. §. 3.

(54) This regulation does not imply, that said vessel should be destroyed, but simply that thenceforth it should be used only for sacred purposes.

(55) The reasons, or at least one of them, for passing this decree was probably to check the impertinence, for I cannot call it by a better name, of certain monks, who pretended, that extraordinary and indeed monstrous privileges were attached to burials in their cemeteries, or within their precincts, and that persons there interred received wonderful advantage from that circumstance. Instances of such pretended and absurd prerogatives may be seen in the Life of St. Moedoc of Ferns (cap. 36.), and in the first one of St. Kieran of Saigir (cap. 38.) on which Colgan has a long and injudicious note, in which he strives to explain these vile fables. On the whole this canon was levelled against such persons, whether monks or others, who endeavoured to draw funerals to their premises, by making them prove, that such places had been duly consecrated as burying grounds.

(56) What Harris calls mother-churches must be in the original Ecclesiae matrices, by which were understood, at that time, not only cathedrals, but likewise parish or baptismal churches.

(57) This canon was ordered in consequence of what appeared on the charges brought by Albin O'Mulloy against the foreign clergy.

(58) This general rule of the Church was observed in Ireland from very ancient times, according to the 30th canon of the synod of Patrick, Auxilius, and Isserninus; “ Episcopus quislibet, qui de sua in alteram progreditur parochiam (dioecesim) nec ordinare praesumat, nisi permissionem acceperit ab eo, qui in suo principatu est.”

(59) It was very proper in these times to enforce this regulation; for, as Fleury observes, (Instit. au Droit Eccles. Part 1. ch. 7.) the abuse of conferring orders absolutely, that is, without a fixed title, became very general in the 12th century. This abuse had been guarded against in the above-mentioned Irish synod, the third canon of which is, “ Clericus vagus non sit in plebe.”

(60) The latter part of this canon is more of a civil than an ecclesiastical nature, and was, I suppose, authorized by the king or his ministers in Ireland. In the old Irish synods I have not met with any assumption of power by the clergy with regard to political or civil matters; or if in some of their assemblies such matters were decided on, the reason was that Irish kings or princes were present at them. A remarkable instance of the respective exercise of authority on the part of Church and State occurred in the council of Mellifont. Donogh O'Melaghlin, prince of Meath, was condemned in it; but the clergy went no farther than to excommunicate him, whereas the decree, by which he was deprived of his principality, emanated from Murrough O'Loghlin, king of Ireland, and the other princes there present. (See Chap. xxviii. §. 4.)

(61) See above Not. 56.

(62) This canon was certainly a plentiful sweeping commentary, in favour of the clergy, on the third of the synod of Cashel, Chap. xxix. §. 3.

(63) Harris. Archbishops of Dublin at John Comyn.

§. VIII. This year, 1186, is remarkable in Irish history for the translation of the remains of saints Patrick, Columba, and Brigid. They had, it is said, been discovered in Down in the preceding year. (64) That St. Patrick had been buried at Down seems to be the most probable opinion, although some of his reliques were certainly preserved at Armagh. (65) St. Columba's body was originally in Hy; (66) but the shrine containing it was brought to Ireland in 878, or, as others say, 876, and, according to every probability, deposited in Down. (67) Not very long before this time the remains of St. Brigid, which had been from the beginning at Kildare, were removed also to Down. (68) The following account is given of this discovery and translation. (69) It being generally believed that the bodies of the three saints were in Down, Malachy its bishop used to pray frequently to God, that he would vouchsafe to point out to him the particular place or places, in which they were concealed. While on a certain night fervently praying to this effect in the church (cathedral) of Down, he saw a light, like a sun-beam, traversing the church, which stopped at the spot, where the bodies were. Immediately procuring the necessary implements he dug in that spot and found the bones of the three bodies, which he then put into distinct boxes or coffins and placed again underground. Having communicated what had occurred to John de Courcey, then lord of Down, they determined on sending messengers to Pope Urban III. for the purpose of procuring the removal or translation of these reliques to a more respectable part of the church. The pope agreeing with their request sent as his legate on this occasion Vivian, Cardinal priest of St Stephen in monte Caelio, who had been at Down nine years before, and who was well acquainted with John de Courcey and the bishop Malachy. (70) On his arrival the reliques were removed with the usual solemnities to a more distinguished part of the church on the 9th of June, the festival of St. Columba. They were deposited in one moment, according to the well known distich ;

*Nunc tres in Duno tumulto tumulantur in uno,
Brigida, Patricius, atque Columba pius.* (71)

Besides the Cardinal there were present at this translation fifteen bishops, together with abbots, provosts, deans, archdeacons, priors, &c. It was resolved, that the anniversary of it should be celebrated in Ireland as a festival, and that the feast of St. Columba should be transferred to the day after the Octave of said festival, that is, to the 17th of June. (72)

(64) Giraldus says, (Topogr. Hib. Dist. 3. cap. 18.) that they were found in the year, in which earl John, that is, prince John earl of Morton, first came to Ireland, which was, as we have seen, A. 1185. To show his learning, he states that the three saints were contemporary, although it is certain, that St. Patrick was dead many years before the birth of Columba.

(65) See Chap. VII. §. 13. and ib. Not. 147, 148.

(66) Chap. XII. §. 15. and ib. Not. 232.

(67) See Chap. XXI. §. 14. and ib. Not. 140, 141.

(68) See Chap. IX. §. 6.—Not. 18. to Chap. VIII. and Not. 141. to Chap. XXI.

(69) It is contained in the Office of the Translation of saints Patrick, Columba, and Brigid, printed in Paris A. 1620, which has been republished by Colgan at the beginning of the Tr. Th. Part of it may be seen in Messingham's Florilegium, p. 208, seqq. and in Usher's Prim. p. 889. seqq.

(70) See Chap. XXIX. §. 12. In the above-mentioned Office this Cardinal is called John instead of Vivian; but, as Usher has well observed, this is a mistake; for there was at that time no John of the title of St. Stephen, &c., whereas from the lists of Cardinals, it is known, that Vivian was the then Cardinal of said title.

(71) It is thus that this distich appears in the response to the 8th lesson of the before-mentioned Office. In the usual editions of Giraldus (Topogr. Hib. Dist. 3. c. 18.) it begins with, In burgo Duno. Other readings have, Hi tres in Duno, &c.

(72) In the Office there is a mistake, undoubtedly of a copyist, in assigning 4 Idus Junii, i. e. the 10th of June, instead of 5 Idus, for the feast of the Translation. The Office itself states, that the Translation took place on the 5 Idus Junii, or the 9th of June. It is therefore clear, that this was the day, on which the Translation was to be annually commemorated. Besides, why transfer the festival of St. Columba from its usual day, the 9th of June, if this were not the day, to which that of the Translation was affixed? yet this regulation has not been observed; for St. Columba's festival is still kept on the 9th of June.

§. ix. In the same year, 1186, Hugh de Lacy, who had made himself lord of Meath, was killed on the 25th of July by a labouring man, whom some call O'Meey, who happened to be alone with him while he was inspecting some works of his new castle of Darmagh or Durrough (in the now King's county), and who, while De Lacy was in a stooping posture, with one stroke of an axe severed his head from his body. (73) His death freed the king, Henry II., from the uneasiness occasioned to him by the ambitious views of De Lacy, who seemed to aspire to the sovereignty of all Ireland. Sometime in this year, but after the synod of Dublin, Albin O'Mulloy, abbot of Baltinglas, who had distinguished himself in that synod, was raised to the see of Ferns, which he held for a great number of years. (74) It is probable, that his promotion to it was owing to his zeal against the incontinent clergy, and to his being considered, particularly by archbishop Cumin, as a proper person to be placed over a diocese, in which the foreign clergymen abounded. To this year is assigned the death of three Irish prelates, the most celebrated of whom was Christian O'Conarchy, who had been bishop of Lismore and apostolic legate, and who had retired some years before to the Cistercian monastery of Kyrie eleison. (75) His name is marked in various calendars at the 18th of March, (76) whence it may be inferred, that this was the day of his death. Another was Gregory, bishop of Cork, of whom it is related, that he granted to the abbey of Thomas-court near Dublin, the church of St. Nessan in Cork. His immediate successor seems to have been one Reginald. The third was Malcallan, bishop of Clonfert. (77) In the same year Conor Maenmoigi rose up anew against his father, Roderic O'Conor, and drove him out of Connaught.

In Ulster also the infatuated Irish princes were quarrelling among themselves, and Donald son of Hugh O'Loughlin, king or prince of Tyrone, was compelled to resign his principality, and in his place was substituted Roderic O'Laherty. But, on his being killed in the following year, while ravaging Tirconnel, Donald resumed the sovereignty of Tyrone. (78)

(73) Ware, Annals at A. 1186. Lyttleton B. 5. &c. Leland observes (History, &c. B. 1. ch. 5.) from some Irish annals, that the fort or castle, which De Lacy was erecting at Durrough, was on the site of the ancient and highly respected monastery, which Columb-kill had founded in that place. He adds, that the irritation felt by the Irishman at this profanation of that venerable spot, was the cause, that excited him to commit that act.

(74) Ware, Bishops at Ferns. (75) See Chap. xxix. §. 14.

(76) Colgan, AA. SS. at Acts of St. Christian, 18 Mart.

(77) See Ware and Harris, Bishops at Lismore, Cork, and Clonfert.

(78) Ware, Annals at A. 1186.

§. x. Gerald Barry left Ireland and returned to Wales between Easter and Whitsuntide of said year 1186. (79) He took with him the materials, which he had collected for the tracts, that he intended to write concerning Ireland. (80) His opportunities for giving a faithful account of the country, were he even willing to do so, were not sufficient for such a task. It is clear, that he mixed very little with the native Irish, and that he had seen but a small part of Ireland. The time of his abode here was short; for, independently of what little time he might have spent in this country after his first arrival in 1183, (81) he was only about one year in it, reckoning from his second appearance among us on the 1st of April, 1185. (82) But what his lack of knowledge was not equal to, his malignity, vanity, and conceitedness supplied. He picked up every idle story, that he met with among the foreign adventurers, basely distorted the nature and circumstances of customs innocent in themselves, and has related heaps of fables, many of which he was forced to acknowledge that he did not believe himself. (83) It is not my business to examine the many false charges which he has against the Irish nation in general. This has been done by others, (84) and, confining myself within the limits of ecclesiastical subjects, I shall touch only on such assertions of his as are relative thereto, or closely connected with them. In the first place I may mention his monstrous falshood concerning there being some parts of Ireland, in which many persons were not as yet baptiz'd, and which the Christian religion had never reach'd. (85) He does not venture to point out any one of those places, but gives us a ridiculous fable, which he says he got from some sailors, of how, when tossed by storms amidst the ocean to the North or N. W. of Connaught, they fell in with an island, and a sort of savages in a boat, whom they discovered to be from some part of Connaught, and who not only knew nothing about Christ, but were ignorant even of the division of years, months, and weeks, and had never before seen a large ship. It would be a waste of time to undertake a serious refutation of this nonsense; and it is clear that, if any sailors related it to Giraldus, they did so merely to amuse themselves at his expense, on finding that he was apt to swallow all sorts of stories and lies. The latest account we have of any persons not Christians being in or near Connaught is that of the islanders of Immagh, who were converted by St. Fechin in the seventh century. (86) And who will imagine that, while so many Irish missionaries were for ages preaching the Gospel in foreign countries, even as far off as Iceland, they would have left behind them any of their own countrymen still in ignorance of the Christian religion? Or that St. Malachy, Gelasius of Armagh, and the apostolic legates, who made so many visitations throughout Ireland, would have overlooked such ignorance, did it exist in any part of the country? In fact, there is not a single hint relative to it in any Irish document whatsoever.

(79) Giraldus, De rebus a se gestis, L. 2. cap. 16. Ware, who was mistaken as to the year of the synod of Dublin, (see above Not. 39.) fell into a similar mistake in placing (Annals) Giraldus' return to Wales in 1185. It was, as Giraldus himself informs us, during the Paschal time next after the holding of the synod, that he left Ireland.

(80) These tracts or works are two. The first is entitled Topographia Hiberniæ sive De Mirabilibus Hiberniæ, and is divided into three books, which he called Distinctions. The second work bears the title of Expugnatio Hiberniæ, or Hibernia expugnata, and also of Historia Vaticinalis. Wharton observes, (Preface to the second part or volume of his Anglia Sacra, p. 20. seqq.) that Giraldus published two editions of this work, the first dedicated to prince Richard, afterwards king of England, and the second dedicated to king John. The former is still in manuscript in the library of Lambeth, and is divided into three books, the third of which is entitled De Vaticiniis, beginning with these words; "Quoniam in prioribus libris Merlini vaticinia tam Caledonii (Caledonii) quam Ambrosii locis competentibus, &c." A subsequent part of this book, and which is in the form of a preface, may be seen in Usher's Ep. Hib. Sylloge, No. 50. Usher thought, (Not. ib.) that Giraldus had not finished said third book; but he had not seen the MS. of Lambeth. It is on account of the prophecies of Merlin, &c. contained in that book, that the whole work was called Historia Vaticinalis. The second edition is divided into two books, and is that, which was published, together with the Topographia, &c. in the Anglica, Hibernica, &c. at Frankfort, A. D. 1602. It is in some parts more enlarged than the first, and in others curtailed. In it the passages from Merlin's prophecies are all omitted, except one. Leland remarks, (B. 1. ch. 5) that Giraldus had no right to entitle this work Expugnatio Hiberniæ, whereas Ireland was far from being subdued in his time. Indeed this is acknowledged by Giraldus himself in the second book, cap.

33. where he says, that the Irish became by dint of practical warfare better able to resist the invaders. He adds; “Igitur in bellici certaminis exercitio (divina forte vindicta) populo diutius utroque statuto, adeo neuter ex toto, vel meruisse gratiam, vel demeruisse videtur, ut nec ille ad plenum victor in Palladis hactenus arcem victoriosus ascenderit, nec iste victus omnino plenae servitutis Jugo colla submiserit.”

(81) See above §. 3. and Not. 34.

(82) See §. 5.

(83) The work, in which his calumnies and lies against the people of Ireland chiefly abound, is the Topographia Hiberniae. This was found fault with by persons of his time for the many ridiculous fables it contains. Giraldus strove in what is called the first preface to Hib. exp. to answer the objections brought forward against it, and after calling it a noble work, opus non ignobile, and hypocritically referring to the Holy Scriptures, Fathers, &c. he says, that “he does not mean that all the things, which he has laid down, should be rashly believed, because he does not believe them himself so as to have no doubt about them.” Then he adds “that he neither affirms nor denies such things.” But why did he assert what he knew could not be proved? In like manner this malicious boaster speaks in a little tract called his Retractations (Anglia sacra Vol. 2. p. 455.); “Imprimis igitur de Topographia Hibernica, labore sc. nostro primaevo fere nec ignobili, ubi multa nova aliisque regionibus prorsus incognita ideoque magis admiranda scribuntur, hoc pro certo sciendum, quorundam quinimo et quamplurimum per diligentem et certam indagacionem a magnis terrae illius et authenticis viris notitiam elicuimus. De caeteris autem publicam potius terrae famam secuti fuimus. De quibus cum Augustino sentimus, qui in libro de Civitate Dei de talibus, quae solum fama celebrat nec certaveritate fulciuntur loquens, nec ea affirmanda plurimum nec prorsus abneganda decrevit.” Who were those great and authentic men of Ireland, from whom he says he derived a great part of his information? We may be sure, that very few of them were Irishmen; and then he tells us, that as to other things, which by the bye form the greatest part of the work, he followed common report; fine authority for the description of a country! Giraldus often prides himself on the Topographia. Thus (De rebus, &c. L. 2. c. 16.) talking of his having read it publicly for three days at Oxford he says, that he did so wishing not to leave the light under the bushel, but to raise it upon the candlestick; lucernam accensam non sub modio ponere sed super candelabrum ut luceret erigere cupiens; and there this swaggerer tells us how he entertained on the first day all the poor of that city. In his work, De jure et statu Menevensis Ecclesiae he boasts (Distinct. 7.) how the Topographia was admired by Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, Robert de Bellofago, canon of Salisbury, and master Walter Mapes, archdeacon of Oxford, and how highly they spoke of Giraldus, as if there were scarcely any other such man in the world. But, he adds, how much more worthy of praise are the works, which he has published and is publishing in his maturer years, some of which have been held in great estimation by the Pope!!! Hence the reader may judge what a vain-glorious animal Giraldus was; and such beings are usually saucy, malignant, and liars.

(84) I scarcely need mention, that the chief writer, who has refuted Giraldus with regard to his account of Ireland, was John Lynch, under the name of Gratianus Lucius, in his learned work entitled Cambrensis eversus. Keating in the preface to his History of Ireland has proved the falshood of many of Giraldus' assertions. See also Mac-Geoghegan, Pref. a l'Hist. de l'Irlande.

(85) Topogr. Hib. Dist. 3. cap. 26.

(86) See Chap. xvii. §. 10.

§. XI. On some other points Giraldus is not so atrociously malignant; but he betrays his profound ignorance of the history of ecclesiastical discipline. On an occasion of abusing the whole nation, and representing them as uninformed in the very rudiments of faith, he gives as one of his arguments, "that they do not as yet pay tithes or first offerings." (87) This was, according to him and the clergy of his country and times, a violation of an article of faith! I allow, that the ancient Irish did not pay those dues, nor were they in general paid in Ireland during his time, except where the English influence predominated, notwithstanding the decrees of the councils of Kells and Cashel. (88)

Giraldus did not know, that such dues were not paid in the best times of the Church, and that it was not until very long after the days of St. Patrick that they were introduced, and indeed first of all into France, where they are now extinct. In Italy they are scarcely known; and yet the Italians cannot be said to be uninformed in the very rudiments of faith. Another argument, which he subjoins, is, “that they do not as yet contract marriages.” (89) He was unacquainted with the difference between the marriage, called Sponsalia de praesenti, and that styled Sponsalia de futuro. The Irish were, in general, strongly attached to the latter form, which in reality constituted, when united with certain conditions, as valid a marriage as the former. Giraldus, not understanding the nature of it, and finding that the Irish did not marry according to the mode practised in England and Wales, concluded that they did not contract matrimony. Having already treated largely of this subject, (90) I need not add more at present. He adds, “that they do not shun incest.” (91) For this charge or argument he had no foundation, except that the Irish had not universally received the system of the seven degrees of consanguinity or affinity, within which the canonists of those times prohibited marriage. (92) As some of them did not scruple to marry within said degrees, hence Giraldus accused them of committing incest. Another fault, which he finds, and, I allow, with better reason, is, that in some parts of Ireland men married the widows of their deceased brothers. (93) This abuse seems to have existed in Ireland; but, even according to Giraldus’ own words, it was far from being general; and it was contrary to the canons and ancient discipline of the Irish church. (94)

(87) Topogr. &c Dist. 3. c. 19.

(88) See Chap. xxvii. §. 15. and Chap. xxix. §. 3. The Irish, however, knew, that tithes were paid in other countries, and some of their clergy seem to have wished, that they were established in Ireland. In the collection of ancient Irish canons published by Martene (Thesaur. Nov. Anecd. Tom. 4.) I find (col. 12.) some passages or rules relative to the tithe of animals and of the products of the earth, taken from a synod called Sapientia. But from the manner, in which they are drawn up, it appears that they contain rather a sort of canonical disquisition concerning tithes in general than regulations ordering the payment of them in Ireland. Keating says (Preface) that they were paid in this country before the arrival of Cardinal Paparo. But this practice was not general, nor, I believe, followed until a short time before that arrival. Yet I do not deny, that they might have been paid in some places through the exertions of Gillebert of Limerick, who mentions them in his tract De statu Ecclesiae, and of St. Malachy.

(89) Topogr. ib.

(90) Not. 52. and 66. to Chap. xxvi. (91) Topogr. ib.

(92) See Chap. xxiv. §. 12. xxvi. §. 6. and ib. Not. 51. xxix. §. 4. and ib. Not. 17.

(93) Topogr. ib.

(94) See Not. 51. to Chap. xxvi.

§. XII. As a proof of the Irish being rude in the principles of faith he states, that they do not frequent the church of God with due reverence. (95) But he does not tell us, in what manner they were deficient as to this point. They entertained, I believe, as much respect for churches as any of their neighbours, and he himself gives us a proof of it in relating a custom followed by them in forming confederacies and pledging each other to maintain mutual friendship. They meet, he says, (96) in some holy place and go round the church three times; after which entering the church they present themselves before the altar, on which the reliques of saints are placed, and, while mass is celebrated and holy priests praying on the occasion, become indissolubly united. This practice shows, that they had a great veneration for churches, as they made use of them and of the church service for sanctioning their solemn obligations. To this narrative, however, he adds a most infamous lie concerning the parties drinking of each others' blood, and its often happening that, owing to a malicious trick, one or other of them loses all his blood and becomes lifeless. In the whole of our Irish history and in the accounts given by our old antiquaries, there is not the least allusion to such a horrid practice; (97) and can any one believe, that the shedding of blood would have been allowed in a church, contrary to the rule of the whole Christian world, or that the clergy and people present would have suffered any one to draw his own blood until he should lose his life? (98) Another proof of the respect paid by the Irish to churches is, that they used to consider them as sanctuaries and inviolable places. (99) One of Giraldus' general charges against the whole nation is, that they do not attend the bodies of the dead to ecclesiastical burial with the due obsequies. (100). How they were wrong in this respect (although their funerals were not exactly similar to those of England and Wales) I do not understand, unless he alluded to their not having been always very precise in having the funeral attended by a priest. That it should be so was ordered by the synod of Dublin, (101) whence there is some reason to think, that this becoming practice was sometimes neglected. It often happens in every country, especially in places where clergymen are scarce, that it is impossible to observe it at every funeral. But that funeral obsequies were regularly celebrated in Ireland, and that the bodies were, according to general rule, interred in the presence of clergymen, we have frequently seen, and might, if necessary, be proved from numberless passages of the Lives of our saints. (102) Giraldus adds, that in Ireland children are not catechized before the doors of the churches. (103) He alludes to the baptismal ceremony, concerning which the synod of Cashel had passed a decree, (104) which seems to have been little attended to. Having already enlarged on this subject, (105) I need not add more about it in this place.

(95) Topogr. ib.

(96) Ib. Dist. 3. c. 22.

(97) See Keating, Preface, and Lynch, Cambr. evers. cap. 29. p. 286, seqq.

(98) This lie of Giraldus is on a par with an abominable one, which he has (ib. cap. 25.) about the mode of inaugurating the kings of Kenél-Cunil, that is, Tirconnel, and which, from the express testimony of the Irish antiquaries, who have described the inauguration of the kings of that country, has been proved to be diabolically false by Keating (ib.), Lynch, (ib. cap. 30. p. 316.) and Harris, Antiquities, ch. 10. The great St. Columba, who was of the royal house of Tirconnel, may be naturally supposed, when inaugurating Aidan king of the British Scots, to have followed, at least in some measure, the mode practised in his own country. Now we have seen, (Chap. xi. §. 15.) that, in performing that ceremony by order of the Almighty, he used a mode quite different from the beastly one, which the vile lying Giraldus strove to impose on the world.

(99) See Chap. xxix. §. 12.

(100) This charge is in his second book (De rebus a se gestis, L. 2. cap. 14.), where he has again some of those already discussed.

(101) 11th. canon, above §. 7.

(102) Ex. c. the Lives of saints Patrick, Columba, Ita, Senan, &c. &c.

(103) De rebus, &c. L. 2. c. 14.

(104) See Chap. xxix. §. 3. (105) Ib. §. 4. and Not. 18.

§. XIII. Giraldus exerted all his malignant cunning to decry the Irish bishops, being apparently jealous of the reputation of the great and holy prelates, who had in those times illustrated the Irish church. Besides his endeavours to detract from the good character, which he was forced to give of the clergy at large. (106) he accuses the bishops of negligence and sloth in not correcting the vices of the people, and not content with alluding to those of his own time, he charges with this fault all the Irish prelates since the days of St. Patrick. (107) The impertinence of this scribbler is really intolerable. Did he not know, that in the very century, in which he wrote, some of the most active and zealous bishops of the whole Christian Church were to be found in Ireland, such as Celsus of Armagh, Gillebert of Limerick, Malchus of Lismore, St. Malachy, Muredach O'Dubthaig of Tuam, Gelasius of Armagh, Christian of Lismore, St. Laurence O'Toole, &c. who not only preached and instructed the people, but likewise held several synods, which were constantly well attended, and made many useful regulations relative to ecclesiastical discipline and Christian morality? As a proof of his base charge, he alleges that none of them had fought for religion and the Church so as to suffer martyrdom. It is true, that we do not find mentioned any of our bishops, who were put to death by Irishmen; but this merely proves what is very honourable to the national character, and shows that, notwithstanding whatever opposition the early preachers of the Gospel met with in Ireland, their adversaries were not of a sanguinary disposition, and entertained a great degree of respect for the Christian clergy. And it is remarkable that, although christianity was not propagated in Ireland by the blood of martyrs, there is no instance of any other nation, that universally received it in as short a space of time as the Irish did. Yet we had plenty of martyrs in Ireland, and some of them bishops, during the fury of the Danes; (108) and as to Irish prelates, who were crowned with martyrdom in foreign countries, I need only refer the reader to what we have seen concerning St. Livinus in Brabant, St. Kilian of Wurtzburg, St. Rumold of Mechlin, and St. John of Mecklenburgh. Geraldus relates, that in a conversation with Maurice, archbishop of Cashel, whom he calls a learned and discreet man, in the presence of another Giraldus, a clerk of the Roman church, who had come to Ireland with some message, (109) he pressed him with this argument against the Irish bishops, to which Maurice replied; “ It is true that, although our nation may seem barbarous, uncultivated, and rude, yet they were always wont to pay great honour and reverence to ecclesiastical men, and not to stretch their hands on any occasion against the saints of God. But now a nation is come into this kingdom, which knows how and is accustomed to make martyrs. Henceforth Ireland shall, like other countries, have martyrs.” (110)

(106) See above §. 6.

(107) Topogr. Hib. Dist. 3. cap. 28. and De rebus, &c. L. 2. c. 14.

(108) See Lynch, Camb. evers. cap. 31.

(109) Ware, or his translator, was mistaken (Annals, at 1185) in calling this Giraldus a legat from the Pope. He was merely a messenger on some particular business.

(110) Topographia, &c. Dist. 3. c. 32.

§. XIV. Much of this pretended indolence of the Irish bishops is attributed by Giraldus to their being usually chosen out of monasteries; and he says that, while they strictly fulfil their monastic duties, they neglect their pastoral obligations. (111) Passing by a sort of affected jingling rhetoric, with which he enlarges on this subject, I shall, although I do not pretend that monks are the fittest persons to be appointed bishops, merely observe, that some of our greatest bishops of those days had belonged to that class. Malchus of Lismore, Gelasius of Armagh, St. Laurence O’Toole, Christian of Lismore, had been monks, and St. Malacy, although originally not one, yet practised the monastic life. It seems that Giraldus had a secret object in view, viz. to prevent monks from being raised to bishoprics. (112) He mentions, but without any reprehension, the great veneration, in which were held the portable bells, and the staffs of saints, curved at the top, and covered with gold, silver, or brass, observing that a similar veneration was paid to them in Scotland and Wales. (113) These staffs were originally, as we have often seen, the crosiers of holy bishops or abbots. Among other singular and strange things he relates several standing miracles of Irish saints, the accounts of which he picked up from the stories of vulgar and ignorant people. (114) He mentions one with extraordinary admiration, the book containing a concordance of the four Gospels, according to the correction of St. Jerome, which was preserved at Kildare, and states that it was made up miraculously through the intervention of an angel and the prayers of St. Brigid. The almost innumerable figures and miniatures, he says, with which it is all through ornamented, are so exquisitely beautiful and elegant, and the colours so fresh, that it is easy to perceive, that it was the work rather of an angel than of a man. (115) But we need not look for a miracle to account for the composition of that beautiful book; and it merely proves, that the arts of calligraphy and miniature had been carried to great perfection in Ireland. (116)

(111) Ib. cap. 29, 30. and De rebus, &c. L. 2. c. 14.

(112) It appears, that Giraldus had an aversion to monks. One of his tracts was entitled De Cisterciensium nequitiiis. We find him afterwards contending against a monk, the prior of Lhanthony, for the see of St. David's, in which contest he was foiled. (See Harris, Writers at Gerald Barry.)

(113) Topogr. Dist. 3. c. 33.

(114) Ib. Dist. 2. capp. 28-29. seqq. Ledwich, to show his learning, has brought forward (Antiq. &c. p. 37.) some of these stories relative to St. Kevin, and talks of the impious and foolish tales of ignorant and superstitious ecclesiastics. Who told him, that all these tales were invented by ecclesiastics? And what a mighty theologian and lover of truth is this so-called antiquary!

(115) Giraldus, ib. capp. 38, 39.

(116) That painting was anciently cultivated in Ireland is clear from Cogitosus, who (Vita S. Brig. cap. 35.) speaks of the pictures, with which St. Brigid's great church at Kildare was decorated. Several persons are marked in our history as elegant transcribers and ornamenters of books, ex. c. St. Dagaëus, of whom above (Chap. x. §. 14.), and the monk Ultan, who was famous in this respect. (See Dr. O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Ser. Ep. Nunc. p. 179.)

§. xv. Giraldus talks about some wonderful islands in Ireland, and mentions strange things, not worth inquiring into, concerning what is vulgarly called Patrick's Purgatory. (117) He tells us, that in North Munster there is a lake, containing two islands, one larger and the other smaller. The larger one, he says, has a church of ancient veneration; the lesser a chapel, which is devoutly served by a few unmarried men, who are called Colidei, which in his manner, he wisely explains by coelicolae, or worshippers of heaven. He then goes on with some nonsensical stories, as how no female of any species could ever enter the larger island without dying immediately, and how in the smaller one nobody ever dies, ever did die, or could die, for which reason it is called the island of the living. But its residents are subject to grievous diseases, and, when tormented with them to such a degree that all hopes of being freed from them are gone, they get themselves removed in a boat to the larger island, which as soon as they touch they immediately give up the ghost. (118) This wonderful island is no other than that called by some Inchinemeo, or rather Inish-na-mbeo corresponding to Island of the living, by others Inis-locha-cre (119) (the island of the lake or bog about three miles from Roscrea) and since known by the name of Monaincha. According to Giraldus the Colidei, who lived there, were not, properly speaking, monks; for he merely calls them coelibes or unmarried men. (120) In his time the island was a place of pilgrimage; but afterwards the residents removed to Corbally, a place not far from it without the lake, where they became Canons Regular of St. Augustin, and had a priory under the name of St. Hilary or St. Mary. (121) As to the name, Island of the living, it meant nothing more than that it was a place where men might live in the service of God, in the same manner as monasteries were called De Valle salutis; De Beatitudine, &c.; and the fable of no one dying there was unheard of by our old historians and annalists. We have an instance of how people could and did die there in the case of a very respectable man, Moelpatrick O'Druggan, who died in that island A. D. 1138. (122) How Giraldus picked up that stuff is of no consequence; he was probably imposed upon by some droll fellow, who explained the name in a new way peculiar to himself. The other story concerning females not daring to enter the larger island was in all appearance founded on there having been there of old some religious community, which made it a rule, not uncommon in some parts of Ireland, not to admit women within their precincts.

(117) Topogr. &c. Dist. 2. c. 5. Although it was not very long since this purgatory came into vogue, (see Chap. VII. §. 14.) yet Giraldus found it out. But, as Lynch has shown, (Cambr. evers. p. 10.) his account of it does not agree with that of Henry of Salterey, of whom see Not. 150. to Chap. VII.

(118) Giraldus, ib. cap. 4. What I have translated, The larger one has a church of ancient veneration, is in the original, "Major ecclesiam habet antiquae religionis." Here we meet with an egregious sample of Ledwich's profound ignorance even of Latin. He translates (p. 69.) the words now quoted; "In the greater is a church of the ancient religion," meaning to insinuate, that there had been before Giraldus' times another and a different Christian religion in Ireland, viz. that of his dear Culdees, concerning whom he has a heap of intolerable trash, of which more by and by. Who, that knew any thing of Latin, could, except this blockhead, have rendered those words in that manner? Surely, when the word, religio, is used in speaking of places, it means veneration, respect, sacred feeling. Thus Ovid has (x Metam. 693) Religione sacer prisca (recessus); and Virgil (VIII. Aen. 344.) Jam tum religio pavidos terrebat agrestes—Sacra loci. Giraldus was fond of using this phrase, when describing places of ancient religious celebrity. Ex. c. he says (ib. cap. 30.); "In australi Momonia, circa partes Corcagiae, est insula quaedam, ecclesiam continens sancti Michaelis antiquae nimis et authenticae religionis, that is greatly and justly respected from very old times. If Giraldus meant, as Ledwich would interpret it, by religionis faith or Christian doctrine, how would not this passage disconcert our antiquary, whereas Giraldus calls it authentic, which he certainly would not have done, had it been different from the faith and christianity, which he professed himself? Elsewhere (as ib. cap. 5.) he has probatae religionis ecclesiam, which Ledwich (p. 70.) translates a church of the orthodox faith, wishing to show, that it belonged to what he calls the ancient religion and to Culdees, although Giraldus does not (ib.) make the least allusion to such persons. He is there speaking of Lough Derg, and its island in which is Patrick's purgatory, one part of which, he says, is very pleasant and attended by angels, while the other is full of devils. Here Ledwich complains, that Giraldus breathes a vindictive spirit against the ancient religion. It is difficult to convey to the reader the meaning of the muddy effusions of this stupid Doctor; but he seems to charge Giraldus with transforming the poor Culdees into the devils of Lough Derg. Now Giraldus was at that time no more thinking of Culdees or of old religion than he was of Ledwich himself. Instead of the word coelibes, which Giraldus has speaking of the Colidei of the smaller island, Ledwich inserted (p. 69.) monks; for he did not like that the Culdees, whom he represents as married men, should be expressly said not to have been married.

(119) This is the name given to it by Colgan. Tr. Th. p. 281. and 304.

(120) I do not understand, why Archdall (at Monaincha) says, that the Culdees of this place, whom he inaccurately calls monks, had an abbey under the invocation of St. Columba. For this he gives us no authority, and I strongly suspect that he had none, except the preconceived unfounded supposition, that the persons, called Culdees, were Columbian monks.

(121) Ware, Antiq. cap. 26 at Tipperary. Here again we meet with the mighty Ledwich, who (p. 74) talking about Augustinians (he did not understand the difference between them and the Canons Regular) and the removal to Corbally, conjectures that the present abbey of Monaincha, i. e. what remains of it, was erected about the beginning of the 13th century. Be it so; but it is amusing to observe, how he proves his thesis. “The Augustinians (he should have said, Augustin Canons) did not appear in this kingdom until 1193; for at that time earl Strongbow brought four from Bodmyn, in Cornwall, to his abbey of Kells in the county of Kilkeny.” This is antiquarian lore with a vengeance. In the first place there were Augustin Canons, alias Canons Regular of St. Augustin, long before 1193; for, as has been seen, we had some of them since the times of St. Malachy and the holy Imar of Armagh; O’Carrol, prince of Ergall, and Edan O’Killedy, bishop of Clogher, founded an abbey for them at Louth in 1148; Hugh de Lacy formed establishments for them in Meath about 1182; John de Courcey erected a priory for them at Down in 1183; and, not to tire the reader with repetitions, the very abbey of St. Thomas near Dublin, which was founded in 1177, belonged to them, that is, to the particular branch called the Congregation of St. Victor. Next, the Doctor tells us, that Strongbow brought four members of this order from Cornwall to Ireland in said year 1193. How could that be, whereas Strongbow was dead since 1176. He refers to Archdall, who (at Kells) mentioning the foundation of that priory by Geoffry Fitz-Robert in 1193, says something in a confused manner about Strongbow. But he does not state, that it was Strongbow that brought over those four persons. Supposing, however, that he had, was it not our great antiquary’s duty to correct him? The poor man was not able; what an antiquary! Or what must be thought of a man, who had the assurance to patch up and publish a big book on the Antiquities of Ireland, while he was so little acquainted with the history of the country as not to know even the year of Strongbow's death; and what of the asinine readers, who have praised that farrago of ignorance and petulance! ! !

(122) Vit. S. Gelasii, cap. 9. Tr. Th. p. 281 and. 304. and above Chap. XXVII. §. 2.

CHAP. XXXI.

The Colidei or Culdees, inquiry concerning them—Deaths of several bishops, priors, professors, &c.—Priory of St. John Baptist, Dublin, founded—John De Courcey defeated by the Irish—Donald O'Loghlin killed in battle—Death of Henry II.—Irish Bishops who attended his funeral—Cathedral of St. Patrick, Dublin, erected on the site of an old parochial church—Foundation of different abbeys—Deaths of more bishops—Synod at Dublin under Matthew O'Heney, the Pope's legate—Glendalough united to Dublin—Several religious houses founded—The See of Meath removed from Clonard to Newtown near Trim—Religious houses founded by Donald O'Brien—Death of Donald—Cruelties practised on his family by the English—Contest for the See of Ross—Hamo de Valois, Justiciary of Ireland, invades ecclesiastical property—Seizes on several lands belonging to the See of Dublin, and on the temporalities of Leighlin, &c.—Death of King Roderic—Contention of the Connaught princes for the kingdom—Foundation of several religious houses.

SECT. I.

THE mention made by Giraldus of the Colidei affords us an opportunity of examining, what was the description of persons understood by that name. If ever subjects plain and easy in themselves have been distorted, misrepresented, and corrupted through ignorance and religious prejudice, this question merits a distinguished place among them. The obscurity, in which it has been involved, is owing to some Scotch writers, who took it into their heads to announce, that before the coming of Palladius the Scots were taught and governed by priests and monks alone without bishops. (1) By Scots they meant the inhabitants of North Britain, as if the real Scots were settled there at that time, or as if there were then a Scottish kingdom in that country, a silly supposition, which we have over and over seen to be false. (2) Had those writers merely said, that in Ireland, the then only country of the Scots, there were some priests without any bishop until Palladius was sent to them, their assertion would imply nothing wrong or fabulous. (3) Other later Scotch authors have added, that those priests or monks were called Culdei, and that they were in Scotland as far back as the reigns of the emperors Decius, Aurelian, and Diocletian, that is, in the third century. (4) Several antiepiscopal writers, particularly Scotch, seized upon this fable, endeavouring to prove from it, that the primitive government of the Christian church was presbyterian; for, say they, those Culdei used to elect their superiors or superintendents, either under the title of bishop or not, without requiring a consecration by any bishop strictly so called. (5) But, it having been proved that there was not any church governed in this manner at that early period in Scotland, nor any such persons there in those times as Culdei or Culdees, (6) a new system was formed, according to which the Culdees were the disciples and followers of Columbkil, and who preserved for centuries the purer doctrines and discipline of Christianity, presbyterianism, &c. until at length they were put down by the church of Rome. (7) One of the chief grounds alleged for this hypothesis consists in a false preconception, that Columbkil did not consider bishops necessary for ordaining priests, (8) and thence it was concluded that the monks of Hy, and accordingly the Culdees, held the same opinion. This stuff was founded on the singular circumstance of Columbkil and his successors at Hy having, although merely priests, exercised a sort of jurisdiction over the bishops of the Northern Picts, and perhaps of the British Scots. (9) But it has been proved over and over, that the exercise of this privilege did not imply any such idea as that of the equality of bishops and priests, and that Columbkil and his followers strictly maintained the superiority, by divine right, of the former over the latter. (10) Now it happens unluckily for this fanciful theory of the Culdees being derived from Columbkil, that in none of the Lives of that saint, nor in Bede, who very often treats of the Columbian order and monks, nor in the whole history of the monastery of Hy and of its dependencies, the name of Culdees or any name tantamount to it, ever once occurs. (11) This would have been impossible, had the Culdees been Columbians and members of the order or congregation of Hy.

(1) John of Fordon, who lived in the 14th century, laid down this position, adding that such was the rule of the primitive church. See more about him Not. 130. to Chap. 1.

(2) Ex. c. See Not. 29. to Chap. 1. and Chap. ix. §. 1.

(3) See Chap. 1. §. 15. and ib. Not. 132.

(4) Hect. Boethius, Scot. Hist. L. 6. Buchanan, Rer. Scot. rxc. 35. &c.

(5) This fictitious system has been supported by Blondel (see Not. 130 to Chap. 1.) and Selden, (Preface to Twysden's x Scriptorum) who, on occasion of a passage relative to the Keledei (whom he calls Culdei) in an account given of Turgot of Durham, when made bishop of St. Andrews, and which will be seen lower down, heaps together in his usual overwhelming and obscure manner a multitude of quotations, which, for the far greatest part, are quite irrelevant to the question, and all of which prove nothing at all as to the special fact or rights of the Culdei, unless we are to receive as good authorities such writers as Hector Boethius. It was a shame for Selden to stoop to some silly conjectures in treating those points; for instance, after striving to insinuate that Adamnan of Hy and Adamnan of Coludi (see Chap. XVIII. §. 5.) were one and the same person, he relates as probable, that Coludi was so called from its being frequented by Culdei.

(6) Lloyd (On Church government, chap. 7.) has treated this subject with great clearness and strength of argument, and has demonstrated the falsehood and absurdity of the whole of that wretched story. Toland (Nazarenus, Letter 2. sect. 3.) carps at Lloyd, but without being able to overturn the main points laid down by him. He attacks Lloyd for having called that Culdee system a monkish dream; for, as he argues, there were persons in Scotland called Culdees, or rather Keldees. But this, so far from being denied by Lloyd, is admitted by him; and he even quotes passages, whence it appears that there were such persons there since about the ninth century. What Lloyd styled a monkish dream is the fable of there having been from very old times in Scotland a presbyterian church governed by the so-called Culdees. Now Toland, although in his cavilling way he quotes Fordon, &c. does not attempt to prove, that there was such a church; for he had learning enough to know, that so senseless a paradox could not be maintained.

(7) A number of Scotch writers have laid down as a truism, that the Culdees were originally Columbian monks, Smith supposes it as a fact, (Life of St. Columba, p. 118.) where he has some raving about "a large body of pastors and people in the isles and mountains of Scotland, who, like the Waldenses of the Alps, maintained the worship of God in its simplicity, and the Gospel in its purity for many generations, when it was greatly corrupted in other places." He says, however, that this is a fact not generally known. And indeed how could it, or how did he know it himself? What a shame to make such assertions without any authority whatsoever of the many documents, relative to the ecclesiastical state of these countries, that were drawn up during those generations, and in not one of which is there the least allusion to those holy Waldenses of Scotland, unless the true worship of God and purity of the Gospel be supposed to consist in celebrating Easter at a particular time, and using a peculiar sort of tonsure! But on these points, the mighty arguments of the discoverers of the Scotch Waldenses, I have said more than enough in their own place. The system of the Culdees being derived from Columbkil is followed also by Jamieson in his Historical Account of the Ancient Culdees, a big book replete with errors of various sorts. This writer has picked up a good deal from Ledwich, whom he now and then honours with referring to; whereas our antiquary also makes Columbkil the founder of the Culdees, but with this difference that, instead of allowing that they were presbyterians, he maintains, (Antiq. p. 60) that they were episcopalians.

(8) Jamieson strives (Historical, &c. p. 48. seqq.) to prove this notoriously false assumption, and (p. 36. seqq.) would fain make us believe, that the monks of Hy were presbyterians. Speaking of Colman of Lindisfarne or York, who called himself a bishop (ap. Beda, Eccl. Hist. L. 3. c. 25.) Jamieson pretends, that he received not only his appointment but even his episcopal power from the College of elders. This writer seems not to understand the very terms of Church discipline and Canon law.

(9) See Chap. XII. § 15. and ib. Not. 234. Jamieson here and there has the old mistake of the North of Ireland being also subject to Hy.

(10) See ib. and Not. 235.

(11) In the five Lives of St. Columba, published by Colgan (Tr. Th.), there is no mention whatsoever of Culdees, not even in that by O'Donnel, who raked together every thing that he could collect relative to the saint's proceedings, and who wrote at a time when there were Culdees, as they are vulgarly called, in Ireland. Bede, notwithstanding all that he has about Columba and his disciples, and concerning the Irish missions in the North of England and elsewhere, the leaders of which were Columbians, as likewise about the practices of the Scots both of Ireland and Britain, and of the Northern Picts, is quite silent as to any persons called Culdees or by any similar name; and it must appear evident to an attentive dispassionate reader of Bede's works, that there was not such an order of men existing in his times. Colgan has employed 23 large folio pages (from 487 to 510) of his Tr. Th. in giving from writers of various ages, an account of St. Columba's disciples, and of the Columbian monasteries, churches, and their superiors, the chronicles of Hy and its abbots, distinguished men, &c. down to the 13th century, and similar ones of the Columbian houses of Derry, Durrough, Kells, Raphoe, Swords, Raghlin island, Fathan, and Drumclieff. Yet in this minute account, including so many centuries, and in which hundreds of names are mentioned, there is not a word about Culdees, nor is any one among those hundreds of persons designated by any name or title like it. Hence it is as clear as day light, that they did not by any means belong to the Columbian institution; and accordingly, besides many others, Nicholson was mistaken (Pref. to Irish Histor. Library p. 30. Octav. ed. 13. fol. ed.) in saying, that the Culdees were of the Irish rule carried into Scotland by St. Columb. It is probable, that they were in Ireland earlier than in Scotland, to which country, however, they were not carried by St. Columb. But what are we to think of Ledwich, who, having pretended to draw up (Antiq. Essay 3. 1st. ed.) a history of the Irish Culdees, not content with following this opinion, has the audacity frequently to refer to Bede as expressly speaking of Culdees? Thus he says, (p. 62.) that "Bede, though closely attached to the See of Rome, yet with candour and truth confesses the merits of the Culdees"; refers (p. 64. seqq.) to Bede for Aidan and his Irish missionaries in Northumberland, as likewise for his successors Finan and Colman, besides others, having been Culdees; tells us, that Bede's third book is chiefly in praise of the Culdees; speaks, as if from Bede, of Adamnan of Hy having been a Culdee, adding that he apostatized, and then groans over the downfall of the illustrious seminaries of the Culdees of Hy and Lindisfarne. Is it possible to bear with such a train of imposture? Bede never mentions Culdees, nor did he know of any such persons in the world. As to Ledwich's balderdash about the apostacy of Adamnan and the downfall of Hy, &c. we have seen elsewhere. The paschal and tonsural disputes were always running in this stupid man's head, and they formed the bulk of his theological erudition. But neither did Adamnan apostatize, nor did the school of Hy or even of Lindisfarne cease to flourish. To his nonsense about the pretended Culdees of Hy he joins (p. 67.) that the Culdees were married, for which he refers to Toland. But Toland was speaking of certain Scotch Culdees, who, he says, were commonly laymen, whereas Ledwich wished to insinuate, that the monks of Hy were married. Another of his attempts to impose on the public is his adducing (p. 55.) the authority of Lloyd and Usher as if they had written highly in favour of the Culdees. Now Lloyd, who has much about them, says not a word in praise of them, observing that he could find no mention of Culdees or Kildees until about A. D. 900. He laughs at the Scotch stories concerning them, and expressly distinguishes them from the Columbian and other old Irish monks, of whom indeed he speaks rather favourably. Usher mentions Culdees or Colidei several times, but neither praises nor dispraises them; and it never entered into his head to confound them with the Columbians. But in spite of these writers and of Bede, &c. Ledwich transfers to his fictitious Culdees whatever they had said in praise of Columbkil and his monks. He then has recourse to Sir Robert Sibbald and Sir James Dalrymple, and so well he might; for, as Chalmers observes (Caledonia, Vol. 1. p. 439.), "system has concurred with ignorance in supposing, that the Culdees actually possessed rights and exercised powers, which were inconsistent with the established laws of the universal church in that age;" and, as he adds, "Sir James Dalrymple's collections are filled with the prejudices of his age and country." Ledwich complains that Mosheim and others have not recorded the merits of the Culdees as champions of Evangelical truth; but what were the merits of the real Culdees? Was it that in late times some of the Scotch ones were married, one of Ledwich's great proofs and tokens of sanctity? After all, even with regard to those, whom he falsely calls Culdees, Ledwich could not with all his lies and quibbles discover any particular system of doctrine held by them, different from that of the whole

Church of those times ; and all his bustle and smoke terminate in the mighty points of the Paschal computation and the tonsure.

§. II. The real name of the members of the community or communities, of which we are now treating, was not Culdees, Culdei, nor Colidei, but, as far as I can discover, Ceile-De, or probably rather Ceile-Dae. (12) But then a question occurs concerning the primitive meaning of this compound title. Several writers think, that it signifies servants of God ; (13) and in fact the terms agree very well with this explanation, and we find that some holy men, who however did not belong to this community, were, on account of their sanctity, called Ceile or Kele-De (servant of God), such as, for instance, the celebrated Aengus Keledeus. (14) Yet, although individuals might very properly have been styled servants of God, or Ceile-De in that acceptance, it is difficult to think, that an entire order of men, consisting of various communities, could have assumed such a proud denomination, or have been greeted with it. Accordingly it appears to me, that the original name was Ceile-Dae, that is, a man living in community ; for Ceile in Irish signifies together, and Dae a man. (15) As the persons belonging to this order were not, strictly speaking, monks, (16) nor at the same time members of the parochial clergy, this new appellation was made out for the purpose of distinguishing them, even by an Irish or Gaelic name, from other ecclesiastical bodies. Looking to the origin of this institution, they were in reality no others than the description of clergymen called Secular Canons who were originally attached to the cathedrals of dioceses. Although bound by rules peculiar to themselves, they belonged to the secular clergy, and partly on this account, and partly to distinguish them from the Canons Regular who sprang up at a much later period, they have been and are still designated by the title of Secular

Canons. A great body of rules was drawn up for these Canons by the council of Aix-la-Chapelle in the year 816, not very long after their institution began to be introduced into various churches. Thenceforth they formed the Chapters of dioceses, and gradually obtained many privileges and exemptions. They lived together in cloisters or chapter-houses, and had dormitories, refectories, &c. in the same manner as the monastic institutions. I need not give an account of their particular superiors and officers, as their whole system is so generally known, and still exists in the greatest part of Christendom, except that in very many places they have ceased to live in communities; and I shall only add that, besides the Cathedral Chapters, there has been formed a great number of collegiate ones consisting of Canons attached to the service of minor churches, and which are kept up to this very day. (17)

(12) The name Colidei is used by Giraldus Cambrensis, as latinized from the Irish, whereas he thought that their original appellation signified worshippers of God. I find it used also by Colgan, Usher, and others. Culdei is evidently a corruption of Colidei, which had Nicholson adverted to, he would not given us (Pref. to Ir. Histor. Libr. loc. cit.) an awkward derivation of Culdee as if it signified a black hood or coul, or a black monk. For neither the real so called Culdees, nor the Columbians, whom Nicholson confounded with them, were black monks. Prior to the times of Giraldus the name was written in Latin Keledei.

(13) Among others O'Brien, Irish Dictionary at Ceile-De. Toland interprets it separated or espoused to God. O'Brien's explanation is more natural.

(14) See Not. 96. to Chap. xx. Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 478.) mentions also a St. Comgan, whose memory was revered on the 2d. of August, and who was surnamed Kele-De, that is, says Colgan, Deicola, by which he explains (AA. SS. p. 580.) likewise the surname Kele-De given to Aengus. But he did not consider either of these saints as a member of the community usually called Culdees, to whom in the very little he says of them he gives the name of Colidei.

(15) See Lhuyd's Irish-English Dictionary at Ceile and Dae. It agrees with the Conventuales ap. Ducange. A new etymology was attempted by Lloyd, (On Church government, ch. 7.) who thought, that the name ought to be written Kyldee, and then concludes, that it means a house of cells, in the same manner as in Welsh mynachdee is a monastery. But could he have found, that in the Irish language Dee is used for a house? Besides, the name originally began with Ceile, a name quite different from cill or cille a cell. Next, the whole name was applied not to houses but to men, whereas Ceile-De or Ceile-Dae is constantly understood of the persons called in Latin Keledei and corruptly Colidei or Culdei.

(16) It is true, that Giraldus, speaking (Itiner. Cambriae, L. 2. c. 6.) of those of the Island of Berdesey off the Welsh coast, calls them monachi religiosissimi; but he says this in a loose manner, and afterwards explains himself by observing, that they were called Caelibes or Colidei. This particular community of them appears to have consisted not only of clergymen but likewise of pious unmarried laymen, as also probably that of the Island of the living near Roscrea. (See Chap. xxx. §§. 15.)

(17) I should not have given this little sketch of the particular system of the Secular Canons, were it not for the purpose of enabling the reader to compare it with that of the so called Culdees. He will find much more on the subject in every even elementary treatise of Canon law, ex. c. Fleury's Institution, &c. part 1. ch. 17.

§. III. The first mention I have met with in Irish history of the particular institution or body of ecclesiastics, called Culdees, (which name, as being now generally adopted, I shall use) is in the account of a pillaging of Armagh in the year 921 by Godfrid, king of the Danes of Dublin, who is said to have spared the churches and the Colidei. (18) The Secular Canons had been generally established since the ninth century; and that the Culdees of Armagh were a branch of their institution is sufficiently clear from the description given of the Culdees, who were still there until the 17th century. They officiated as secular clergymen in the cathedral, sang in the choir, lived in community, had a superior called prior of the Culdees, who acted as praecentor, or chief chanter, and who was elected by themselves, but confirmed by the Archbishop. (19) Surely this was in substance the exact system of the Secular Canons, except that our Culdees seem not to have acquired as many privileges or as much power as the Canons of the continent gradually did. There was a prior and college, or collegiate house, of Culdees also at Clones. (20) We find likewise in the island of Devenish (county of Fermanagh) a house of the same institution, which seems to have been founded in 1130, and was considered a community of secular priests. (21) There is a sentence of John Mey, archbishop of Armagh, passed in 1445, declaring that the office of a Culdee, Prior or not, should be looked upon as not implying care of souls, and that accordingly it does not prevent his holding along with it a benefice, to which such care is annexed, provided he continue to reside in the church of Armagh; and there is a brief of Pope Nicholas V. A. D. 1447, much to the same purpose in favour of the Prior of the college of secular priests called Colidei or Culdees of Armagh. (22) Yet, although the Irish Culdees were generally considered as clergymen, yet the name seems to have been sometimes given to communities comprizing also some pious unmarried laymen, inasmuch as they lived together; and such appear to have been those mentioned by Giraldus Cambrensis. (23) For as to married Culdees there is not the least vestige of any such ever having been in Ireland.

(18) See Chap. xxii. §. 9. I wish Colgan had given us the Irish word, which he latinized by Colidei.

(19) Usher, Prim. p. 637. where he observes, that there were Colidei or Culdees in the principal churches of Ulster, and that they continued at Armagh and elsewhere until within his own memory. Ware, Antiq. cap. 17. and Harris, (Antiq. cap. 35.) who remarks, that those of Armagh were a corporate body and possessed of a considerable landed property.

(20) Ib. Ib. Ib.

(21) Ware, who mentions (ib.) the Culdees of Devenish, speaks of them also cap. 26 at Fermanagh, and calls them secular priests. I have already observed, that collegiate houses of Secular canons were annexed to minor churches, and, I may here add, often in small towns or places, as may be seen particularly in Italy.

(22) See Usher, loc. cit. In the decree of John Mey it is ordered, that the Prior of the Culdees is to have the precedency at table, i. e. in the refectory, and in executing and regulating the divine offices, as being praecentor, and that due reverence be paid to him by the other Culdees.

(23) See above Not. 16.

§. iv. There were Culdees also at York, who in the account given of their hospital of St. Leonard of that city (24) are called Colidei and clergymen of St. Peter's the cathedral. Whether that name was derived to them from Ireland or Scotland I am not able to tell, and it is immaterial to inquire. We find them there in the reign of Athelstan, king of England, who made them some grants in 936; and they continued at York for a long time after down to, at least, the times of Pope Adrian IV., who confirmed their possessions. But it is in the history of Scotland that the name Culdees most frequently occurs; for they had more establishments in that country than in Ireland, whereas the Irish, for the greatest part, adhered to their old system of having their cathedrals served by communities of monks in preference to the new ones of Secular Canons or Culdees. It is not my business to enter into a detailed account of the Culdees of Scotland ; yet I may be allowed to touch on some points relative to them, merely to show how much their whole history has been misunderstood. And first this much is certain, that there is no mention of them in true Scottish history until after the year 800, (25) nor, I believe, for many years later, and that the name Culdees or Keledei first appeared at St. Andrews. (26) It is said, that Constantine the third, king of Scotland, who died in 943, spent the last five years of his life among the Culdees of that city. (27) Such Scotch Culdees, as were seated in episcopal sees, acquired the privilege of electing the bishop out of their own body, and seem to have held it for a considerable time. (28) This was precisely conformable to what the Secular Canons gradually attained in other countries, but which I do not find that the Irish Culdees ever enjoyed. It seems, that the see and Culdees of St. Andrews claimed, about the beginning of the 12th century, a preeminence over those of all Scotland ; for it is recorded, that while Turgot, who had been prior of Durham, was bishop of St. Andrews, the whole right of the Culdees throughout the entire kingdom of Scotland passed to the bishoprick of St. Andrews. (29) The obvious meaning of these words is, that, as the see of St. Andrews was then considered as the metropolitical one of Scotland, its bishop and chapter, or Culdees, insisted upon a precedence over those of all the kingdom, and that no bishop should be installed in that country without their consent. In an old document, written by a Culdee of St. Andrews, we read, that in said city, where is the apostolic see (of St. Andrew), the archbishop of all Scotland ought to be ; and that without the counsel of the elders of that place no bishop ought to be ordained in Scotland. (30)

(24) Ap. Dugdale. Monast. Angl. Vol. 2. p. 367. The hospital had been first called that of St. Peter; and the Colidei placed one of their own body over it.

(25) See Chalmers, Caledonia, Vol. 1. p. 434. This writer, who has treated of the Culdees much more fairly and rationally than many others, yet speaks of them as if they had been a sort of monks, who performed the functions of secular priests, and elsewhere represents them as derived from the old Irish monks, who formed the Cathedral chapters. It would have been more correct to say, that they were secular clergymen, who in some places were substituted to the monks. There is a story in a MS. account of the bishops of Dunkeld by Alexander Myln, and quoted by Sir James Dalrymple, Toland, and Jamieson (Historical, &c. p. 136.) of Culdees having been placed in Dunkeld about A. D. 729 by a king of the Picts at the instance of St. Adamnan. How could this have been, whereas Adamnan died in 704? Add, that Chalmers, who has deeply examined every document relative to the Scotch Culdees, maintains that they were not heard of until after 800. Others say, that there were no Culdees at Dunkeld until 815. (Jamieson, ib.) All mere guess-work.

(26) Chalmers, ib. This brings us down to, at least, the middle of the ninth century, whereas there were no Culdees at St. Andrews until it became an episcopal see, and it is acknowledged that it did not become such until after Kenneth, king of the British Scots, conquered the Picts in 843, and added their country to his kingdom. Chalmers says, (ib. p. 429.) that there is reason to believe, that the see of St. Andrew was founded during the rule of Grig, who ceased to reign in 893.

(27) Buchanan, rex 76. See also Usher, Pr. p. 659.

(28) Jamieson, quotes (p. 100, 101.) a passage from Martine, Reliquiae, in which we read; "Culdei episcopum e suo corpore eligendi potestatem in Scotia semper habebant, donec translatum fuit ab iis jus illud ad clerum, quod primum in electione Sancti Andreani episcopi Willielmi Wisharti abrogatum fuit anno 1271, aut eo circa." And Chalmers observes, (Caledonia, Vol. 1. p. 436.) that before the introduction of the Canons Regular at St. Andrews in 1140 the Culdees alone acted as Dean and Chapter in the election of the bishops, and that thenceforth both parties were joined in that right until 1272, when it was usurped by the Canons Regular. He says also, that the culdees of Brechin continued for many ages to act as the Dean and Chapter of that diocese.

(29) The passage, as quoted by Usher (p. 1032.) from a chronicle of Durham, is as follows: "Anno ab Incornatione Domini MCVIII. tempore regis Malcolmi et sanctae Margaretae electus fuit Turgotus prior Dunelmensis in episcopum Sancti Andree, consecratusque est Eboraci 3 Kalend. Augusti, et stetit (sedit) per annos septem. In diebus illis totum jus Keledeorum per totum regnum Scotiae transiit in episcopatum Sancti Andree." The latter part of this passage is quoted also by Selden. (See above Not. 5.)

(30) This document, otherwise fabulous enough, has been published by Usher, (p. 648. seqq.) and in it we find (p. 651.) the following passage: Ex hac itaque civitate archiepiscopatus esse debet totius Scotiae, ubi apostolica sedes est; nec absque consilio seniorum istius loci ullus episcopus in Scotia debet ordinari."

§. v. There were several Culdee houses in Scotland besides those annexed to episcopal sees. (31) The Culdees, whatsoever place they belonged to, are in Scotch charters and documents often called Canons; (32) are spoken of as acting in that capacity; had priors; were required to live in community, and to observe canonical discipline according to the institution of their rule. (33) In fact, those of Scotland were to all intents and purposes Secular Canons, and continued to enjoy the privileges annexed to that description of clergymen, until they began to be disturbed in the early part of the 12th century by the Canons Regular of St. Augustin, in the same manner as the Secular Canons were at that period, and prior to it, in other countries, where they were ousted out of many cathedrals, &c. and Canons Regular substituted in their stead. Indeed a great part of them, both in Scotland and elsewhere, deserved to be set aside; for they violated some of the chief rules of their institution by ceasing to live in community, and taking to themselves wives or concubines. (34) For these reasons many of the Scotch Culdees laid themselves open to proceedings against them during the reign of Alexander I., who brought Canons Regular from England and established them in several places in lieu of the Culdees. Thus he dismissed in the year 1115 the Culdees of Scone, and entrusted the church of that place to Canons Regular. (35) David I. his successor, although favourable to Canons Regular, yet treated the Culdees with mildness, and did not eject them, wherever they submitted to the reformation, which he introduced. (36) When he procured the establishment of a regular episcopal see at Dunkeld, he allowed the Culdees to continue to act as Dean and Chapter. (37) Several Culdee houses, in which the primitive rules were observed, remained in Scotland until much later times. Of their system I find a remarkable instance in the case of the Culdees of Monymusk, who had been placed under the bishop of St. Andrews by the same king David I. Disputes having arisen in course of time between them and the bishop, the matter was referred to Pope Innocent III., whose referees decided in the year 1212, that “the number of the Culdees of Monymusk should be fixed at twelve with a prior. They were to have one refectory, one dormitory, with a cemetery in the church of Monymusk. Their elections were to be made by choosing three of their own number, out of whom the bishop was to elect a superior. The Culdees were not to become Canons Regular without the consent of the bishop. They were restricted as to the holding or acquiring of lands. And the bishop promised for himself, and for his successors, that the Culdees should in future enjoy the privileges, which had been thus settled by the Pope’s referees.” (38)

(31) Chalmers mentions several of them ib. p. 438.

(32) Thus in a charter (ap. Jamieson, App. No. 12.) Canonici, qui Keledei dicuntur. Elsewhere we find Keledei, qui se canonicos gerunt. In a deed (ib. No. 11.) Keledeis sive Canonicis (of Monymusk). Frequently called Canonici without the addition of Keledei. (See ib. Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17.)

(33) Amidst all Jamieson's shufflings these points are quite clear from what he has himself p. 270. seqq. He throws out (p. 272.) some doubts about the propriety of calling secular clergy Canons, and refers to Ducange as if he made mention only of Canons Regular. But Ducange treats of both the Secular and Regular Canons; nor is there any one at all versed in ecclesiastical history or Canon law, that has not read and heard of Secular Canons, who were and are so called on account of their being secular clergymen subject to particular rules. But objections have been made also to the propriety of the title Canons Regular, Canonici Regulares, because it implies a tautology, as if we should say Regular Regulars.

(34) See Fleury, Instit. au Droit, &c. part 1. ch. 22.

(35) Chalmers, Caledonia, Vol. 1. p. 438, 439.

(36) See ib. p. 437, 438, for the Culdees of St. Servan, Portmoak, and Dunfermlin.

(37) Ib. p. 435. It is false, says Chalmers, that David expelled the Culdees from Dunkeld. This had been said by Alexander Myln, (of whom above Not. 25.) who talks of married Culdees of Dunkeld, and then tells us how David turned them out, and changed their monastery into a cathedral church, in which he placed a Bishop and Canons forming a secular college. Toland seized upon this, as if it proved that the Culdees were not Canons. But the fact is, that those very Canons, placed in the Cathedral, were Culdees; and, if any of them had wives before, they ceased to have them after the regulation made by David. The fictitious Culdees of old times were running in Myln's head; and his statement proves the very reverse of Toland's conclusion, whereas the Chapter of Dunkeld continued to consist of Culdees.

(38) Ib. p. 438. Yet, says Chalmers, did the bishop of St. Andrews, in opposition to a solemn promise, suppress those Culdees, and place Canons regular in their room. The original of this decision may be seen in Jamieson's Appendix No. 19. On the substance of the whole transaction he has in the body of the work some quibbling unworthy of a man of learning and candour. Thus he says (p. 260.) that a complaint was made against the Culdees of Monymusk for their acting as Canons. This was not the case; for the complaint was, that said Culdees, who acted as Canons, and some others of the diocese of Aberdeen were endeavouring to establish at Monymusk, which belonged to the see of St Andrew, a house of Canons Regular, in opposition to the bishop, and to the prejudice of his church; “Kildei quidam, qui se “ canonicos gerunt, et quidam alii Aberdonensis diocesis, infra “ villam de Monismuske pertinentem ad ipsum (episcopum), “ quamdam Canoniam Regularem eodem renitente contra justi- “ tiam construere non formidant in Ecclesiae suae prejudicium et “ gravamen.” Jamieson shamefully confines the charge of erecting the Regular canonry to the persons of the diocese of Aberdeen. Fie! Why overlook qui in the text, qui se canonicos gerunt! Then he has (p. 261) some stuff about the ideas of the Culdees not conforming to the Papal ideas of a Canonry; and he tells us, (p. 262) that they were “non descripts, because not allowed to be called either monks or canons.” This is really intolerable. There was no prohibition against their being called Canons, that is, Secular Canons; and in fact they were frequently called so, as in a deed of Duncan, earl of Mar (App. No. 11.), “Keledeis sive Canonicis ibidem (Monymusk) servientibus;” in the confirmation of the same by John, bishop of Aberdeen, (ib. No. 12.) “Canonicis, qui Keledei dicuntur;” and in that by the king Alexander (ib. No. 13.) simply “Canonicis de Monimusc.” Many more instances might be added from that Appendix, if necessary. But the bishop of St. Andrews did not, for some reasons of his own, like that those Culdees or Canons of Monymusk should become Canons Regular. Did Mr. Jamieson not understand the terms of the documents, which he has published? Or is he so ignorant as not to know, that besides the Canons Regular there were long before them, and are still, people called Secular Canons? His shufflings and tervigersations are all directed to keep up the fable of the anti-Romanism of the Culdees, on which point he has deeply imbibed the spirit of Ledwich.

§. 6. This sentence was on the whole very favourable to the Culdees, and it proves, that neither Innocent III. nor his referees considered them as persons in a state of hostility or opposition to Rome. And in fact, whatever some ignorant and violent bigots may have thrown out, they were never in the times of their existence, whether in Scotland or elsewhere, supposed to be in such state. We have seen, that David I. a king much attached to Rome, was kind to them; and Edelred, a brother of his, abbot of Dunkeld and earl of Fife, made a grant of Ardmore to God and St. Servan and to the Culdees of Lochleven. (39) Prior to the reign of David, king Malcolm and his queen St. Margaret, who were not anti-Romanists, granted to the same Culdees a place called Ballecristin; and more than one bishop of St. Andrews, earlier than Turgot, made over to them churches, &c. as being holy men, and for obtaining the suffrages of their prayers (40) Accordingly they were neither anti-episcopalians, nor in opposition to Rome. A Culdee was made bishop of St. Andrews in 1272; for they continued there until that time and later, notwithstanding the efforts of the Canons Regular to turn them out and get exclusive possession of their places, in which they did not fully succeed until 1297. (41) In progress of time, as had happened in many other countries, the partiality for the system of the Canons Regular prevailed to such a degree, that the Culdees or Secular Canons lost many of their establishments in Scotland, which were granted to these new comers. The Religio, or religious order, was considered preferable to the Culdee institution, and from the first introduction of Canons Regular Alexander I. made grants to the church of St. Andrew for the purpose of establishing there some of them for the service of God. (42) I shall conclude this account of the Culdees with one or two observations on the unfounded assertion of some writers, that it was a general rule with them to denominate all their churches from the Holy Trinity. (43) In the first place this is not true. The principal Culdee house of Scotland was that of St. Andrew's, and the Culdees had a church there called of St. Mary. (44) The church of these of Monymusk was also the name of St. Mary. (45) The Culdees of Lochleven had their church under that of St. Servan. (46) The Culdees of York belonged, as we have seen, to the church of St. Peter, and their hospital got the name of St. Leonard. (47) It is laughable to reflect, how the allegers of the anti-Romanism of the Culdees, in making that assertion as a proof of it, turn out to be disappointed, and how their argument operates against themselves. For the fact is, that the persons, with whom the system attributed to the Culdees prevailed, were downright Romanists. They were the Trinitarians, a branch of Canons Regular of St. Augustin, in whose Rule, approved of by Pope Innocent III., it is enjoined, that "all the churches of said Order should be entitled in the name of the Holy Trinity." (48) As early as the 13th century, not long after the founding of this order, many Trinitarian houses were established in Scotland, and in some places these Canons Regular were substituted to the Culdees. (49) Hence it came to pass, that there were in that country so many churches called of the Holy Trinity. There might have been some there, as was the case in all Christian countries, bearing that title and even belonging to Culdees, before the introduction of the Trinitarians; but the truth is, that the system of giving exclusively that denomination to churches was observed by this Order alone.

(39) Jamieson's Appendix, No. 5.

(40) Ib. In the grant of the church of Sconyn by Tuadal, one of those bishops, the Culdees of Lochleven are mentioned as viri religiosi, to whom it was made pro suffragiis orationum. In that of the bishop Modach to God and St. Servan and said Culdees, they are marked as "in scola virtutum ibidem degentibus."

Jamieson has some silly exceptions scarcely worth noticing, for instance, that little regard was paid to saints in Scotland till the beginning of the 12th century. How then account for the legend (ap. Usher, Pr. p. 648, seqq.) concerning the reliques, veneration &c. of St. Andrew, whence the city of St. Andrews got its name long before that century?

(41) There was a decree as far back as the pontificate of Adrian IV. by which this Pope ordered that, according as the Culdees of St. Andrews died, Canons Regular should be placed in their situations. (Jamieson. p. 281.) These Canons having usurped the privilege of electing the bishop, the Culdees at length appealed in 1297 to Pope Boniface VIII. in support of their former rights, but lost their plea non utendo jure suo, because they had suffered two former elections to proceed without their interference. (Ib. p. 289.) This appeal shows, that the Culdees were not anti-Romanists. They used to be attacked and abused by the Canons Regular, as may be seen in No. 7. of Jamieson's Appendix, where after an account of the reliques of St Andrew, &c. it is said, that after the death of the holy men, who had brought said reliques, and of their disciples, religious worship was lost, the nation being barbarous and uncultivated. Yet, it adds, there were in St. Andrew's church, such as it then was, thirteen persons per successionem carnalem, who were called Kelledei, that is, not thirteen married successions of Culdees, as Toland explains these words, but thirteen Culdees who got their places by inheritance from their relatives. Whether the author meant inheritance from their fathers or from uncles, cousins, &c. cannot be determined. Then he states, that they lived more according to the traditions of men than the rules of the holy fathers, and that they still lived so. He says, that they used to celebrate their offices, and that, after they became Culdees, they were not allowed to have their wives in their houses, nor even any other women. This sort of an account of the old Culdees of St. Andrews was evidently drawn up by some English Canon Regular of that city, who strove to misrepresent them as far as he could. That the Culdees celebrated Mass and the Church offices like all other Secular Canons is beyond question; and in the catalogue of their library of Lochleven (Ib. No. 6.) we find the Pastorale, Missale, Graduale, and Lectionarium.

(42) “ Ecclesiam B. Andreae apostoli possessionibus et reditibus ampliavit—eo nimirum obtentu et conditione ut in ipsa ecclesia constitureretur Religio ad Deo deservendum.” (Ap. Jamieson, p. 215.) These grants were not made to the Culdees in particular, as he seems to suppose, but to the church in general, that it might be enabled to support the Religio or religious community of Canons Regular. For this is the true meaning, although not understood by Jamieson, of Religio in that passage. His translation of the words marked in Italics is very strange; “that in the church itself a proper form of divine service should be constituted or set up.” What necessity would there have been for augmenting the revenues of the church if there were question only of introducing a proper form of divine service? For there were clergymen there already, viz. the Culdees; and if their form was incorrect, it might have been altered without any expense; or who, that understands Latin, could translate these words in the manner that he has done? But he seems to have wished to insinuate, that the Culdees had some form of worship peculiar to themselves, and which the king meant to set aside. For I cannot believe, that he was unacquainted with the sense, in which Religio so often occurs in his documents, that is, as meaning a religious order. And I find that referring (p. 216.) to Wyntown’s Cronykil, who, he says, speaks as if there had been no religion at St. Andrew’s before Alexander’s time, he confesses, that Wyntown seems to understand by Relygyowne a religious order. And so he certainly did. This acceptance of Religio for religious order, monastic life or institution, was quite common in the middle ages, and there is an instance of it even in Salvian, who lived in the 5th century. The abbot Suger says “(Ep. 163); Haec duo potissimum amplexatus sum, videlicet de statuenda Religione in B. Genovefae Parisiensis et nobili Compendiensi ecclesia.” This is exactly like the in ipsa ecclesia constitureretur Religio quoted by Jamieson. It occurs in this sense in the legends of founders of religious orders, as, ex. c. Bruno Carthusianae Religionis institutor; and Jamieson knew that there is a work of Augustinus Ticinensis referred to by Usher, (Pr. p. 659.) entitled Christi- anarum religionum (sive, adds Usher, ordinum religiosorum) Elucidarium. Hence in Italian a religious order is usually called Religione; thus they say, la Religione Domenicana, &c. and Religion, has the same meaning in French, as in the phrase habit de Religion, from the Latin habitus Religionis, the religious habit or dress. Now it is a shame for Jamieson to have endeavoured to twist the word Religio from this acceptation in passages, where it could have no other. This he has done not only at p. 215, but likewise p. 251, 374, &c. And for what? To make his readers believe, that the Culdees professed a particular sort of religion, or summary of doctrine, different from a new one, which was introduced instead of it. This is a base trick unbecoming a writer of any sort of history. There was no question of religion, understood in a doctrinal sense, between the Culdees and others; whereas the whole business came merely to this point, that the Religio or religious order of the Canons Regular was established in various parts of Scotland, and that, being much favoured, they exerted themselves to obtain the situations and advantages, which had belonged to the Culdees or Secular Canons. In a similar strain Jamieson was not ashamed to copy (p. 358.) Ledwich's ridiculous and ignorant explanation of the "antiquae religionis" of Giraldus Cambrensis. (See Not. 118. to Chap. xxx.)

(43) Ledwich (Agtiq. &c. p. 414.) says, from Dalrymple, with triumph; "The Culdees never placed their churches under the invocation of the Virgin Mary, or any saint, but of the Holy Trinity." Jamieson has the same thing (Historical, &c. p. 207); and I am surprized that even Chalmers fell into this mistake, Caledonia, Vol. 1. p. 438.

(44) Jamieson, p. 282, seqq.

(45) Idem, Appendix, No. 11.

(46) Chalmers, Caledonia, Vol. 1. p. 436.

(47) See above §. 4. and Not. 24.

(48) The Trinitarian Rule may be seen in the Monast. Angl. Vol. 2. p. 380. seqq. One of its regulations is that now mentioned: "Omnes ecclesiae istius Ordinis intitulentur nomine sanctae Trinitatis."

(49) Chalmers enumerates (Caledonia, Vol. 1.) several establishments of the Trinitarians, whom he calls Red Friars, that is, Friars of the Redemption of captives. He mentions (ib. p. 691) such Trinitarian foundations at Failefurd, Peebles, and Dornoch; (p. 686.) those of Dunbar, Houston, and Scotland-well; and (p. 683) one in Aberdeen.

§ VII. To the year 1187 is assigned the death of a bishop of Ardagh, named O'Tirlenan, and successor of Christian O'Heotai, who died in 1179. (50) In these times, the bishop of Emly was Isaac O'Hamery, the successor of Charles O'Buacalla, and the bishop of Ross was one Benedict; (51) but the precise times of their deaths are not known. In 1188 died a bishop of Inniscathy, Aidus O'Beachain (52) In or about this year Alured le Palmer, a Dane, founded an hospital near Dublin to the west, where Thomas-street is now situated, and was himself the first prior of it. It was called the priory of St. John Baptist, and fell under the direction of the Cruciferi, a branch of the Canons Regular of St. Augustin. (53) At said year is mentioned a Cistercian establishment of Feal or Ne-feal on the borders of Limerick and Kerry, as a cell to the monastery of Nenay. (54) Martin O'Brolaigh, a professor of Armagh, who is called the most learned of the Irish, died in this year, (55) as did also a holy man, named Amlave O'Doigre, in the island of Hy, whither he had gone on a pilgrimage. (56) In said year John de Courcey, returning from an expedition in Connaught, was met by Conor Maenmoigi, the eldest son of Roderic O'Conor, and Donald O'Brian, king of North Munster, who attacked and defeated him with considerable loss; and the worthy Donald O'Loughlin, king of Tirone, was killed, fighting in battle at a place called Cavanne-cran, although he had gained a victory. He was honourably buried at Armagh. (57) The following year, 1189, is memorable for the death, on the 6th of July, of Henry II. who was succeeded by his son Richard I. surnamed Coeur de lion. He was crowned in the church of Westminster on the 3d of September following, and, besides several other bishops, the coronation was attended by John Cumin, archbishop of Dublin, Albin O'Mulloy, bishop of Ferns, and Concors, bishop of Enaghdone. (58) Richard having not long after gone to the Holy Land, such parts of Ireland, as were possessed by the English, remained under the dominion of his brother John, who was styled Lord of Ireland. In this year Conor Maenmoigi was killed by his own people, in consequence of which Roderic O'Conor again took possession of his kingdom. John de Courcey during an expedition of his through some parts of Ulster plundered Armagh; and in said year Murchard O'Carrol, king of Ergal, died in the abbey of Mellifont, where he was buried near the founder, Donogh O'Carrol; (59) and O'Hislenan, bishop of Ardagh, was killed, but by whom I do not find mentioned. (60)

(50) Ware, Bishops at Ardagh.

(51) See ib. at Emly and Ross.

(52) AA. SS. p. 542. and Harris, Bishop at Limerick.

(53) Ware, Antiq. cap. 26 at Dublin, and Annals at A. 1188.

(54) Harris, Monast. at Cistercians. See also Ware, Antiq. ib. at Limerick.

(55) Tr. Th. p. 310. and Ware, Annals, loc. cit.

(56) Tr. Th. p. 501: (57) Ware, Annals at A. 1188.

(58) Ware, ib. at 1189. In all probability this Concors was the same as the Concors who was abbot of St. Brendan's of Clonfert in the year 1175, and who was one of the Ambassadors of Roderic O'Connor to Henry II. (See Chap. xxix. §. 9.)

(59) Ware, ib. (60) See Ware, Bishops at Ardagh.

§. VIII. In or about 1190 John Cumin, archbishop of Dublin, having demolished an old parochial church in the South suburbs of the city, erected in its stead the church of St. Patrick, which he raised to the rank of a collegiate church, endowing it and placing therein thirteen Canons or Prebendaries. (61) It was not until after his death that it became a cathedral, during the incumbency of his successor, Henry de Loundres. About the same time, as is said, he built and endowed the nunnery of Grace-Dieu, three miles north of Swords in the county of Dublin, for Regular canonesses of the order of St. Augustin, having removed thither the old nunnery of Lusk. (62) In the same year 1190, or, as some say, the preceding one, Cathal O'Conor, surnamed Crobhdearg, founded the Cistercian abbey of Knockmoy in the now county of Galway, six miles south-east of Tuam, in memory of a victory, which he had obtained there, and hence it was called De colle victoriae. (63) Gilla-Criost, or Christian, O'Macturan, bishop of Clogher, died in 1191, and was succeeded by Maeliosa, the son of Mac-Mael-Ciaran, and abbot of Mellifont. (64) In the same year died Murchertach or Maurice, archbishop of Cashel. (65) His successor was Matthew O'Heney, or O'Enny, a Cistercian monk, and a very wise and holy man. About this time, and most probably in 1192, died a bishop of Cloyne, named Matthew, who governed that see as far back as the year 1171, when Henry II. arrived in Ireland. (66) He was succeeded by Laurence O'Sullivan, who held the see until 1204 or 1205. Matthew O'Heney was appointed apostolic legate in 1192, and in said year convened a great synod in Dublin, which was well attended. (67) It is said, that in this synod he confirmed to John Cumin, archbishop of Dublin, and his successors, all the donations, which John, Lord of Ireland, had made to his church, and the annexation of the see of Glendaloch. For it is stated, that John had in the year 1185 granted to John Cumin such annexation, when that see should become vacant. (68) Be this as it may, the union of Glendaloch with Dublin did not take place in 1192, nor, at the earliest, until about 1214 after the death of William Piro, or Peryn, bishop of Glendaloch. (69) And even from that period until 1497 it was little more than nominal; for the Irish septa of that territory would not submit to the see of Dublin; and we find a continuation of bishops of Glendaloch, some of whom were appointed by Popes.

(61) Ware, Annals at A. 1190. and Bishops at John Cumin. See also Harris, Bishops, p. 302.

(62) Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Dublin; Harris, Monast. at Canonesses of the order of St. Augustin; and Archdall at Grace Dieu.

(63) Ware, ib. at Galway, and Annals at A. 1190; Harris, ib. at Cistercians, and Archdall at Abbey Knockmoy.

(64) Ware and Harris Bishops at Clogher. They call Mac-Mael-Ciaran a bishop. If there be not some mistake, it must be supposed, that he embraced the ecclesiastical state after the death of his wife. They have not told us where he was bishop.

(65) Harris, at Archbishops of Cashel. There can be no doubt, but that, as Harris observes, Maurice was the same as the bishop Murchertach, whose death is marked at A. 1191. in the Annals of Innisfallen; and accordingly Ware was mistaken in confounding him with his successor Matthew O'Heney.

(66) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Cloyne. Harris remarks, that the Annals of Innisfallen assign the death of a bishop O'Mongagh to A. 1192. He thinks, and I believe with good reason, that O'Mongagh was the same as Matthew of Cloyne. If so, he must have been the Pope's legate in Ireland, and perhaps the immediate successor, as such, of St. Laurence O'Toole. For the said Annals state, that on his death the legatine authority was entrusted to O'Enny, that is, Matthew O'Heney, archbishop of Cashel.

(67) Annals of Innisfallen at A. 1192. and Harris, Archbishops of Cashel at Matthew O'Heney. See also Ware, Annals at A. 1192.

(68) Harris, ib. and at Dublin, John Cumin, from the Black book of Dublin. I much doubt the truth of these statements relative to the annexation of the see of Glendaloch. Ware, although he makes mention (Annals at A. 1192.) of the synod held in Dublin by Matthew O'Heney, yet has nothing about that annexation. He quotes indeed (Bishops at Henry de Londres) the attestation in favour of the claim of the Archbishops of Dublin to the see of Glendaloch attributed, whether truly or not I shall not inquire, to Felix O'Ruadan, an archbishop of Tuam in the 13th century, in which it is said, that not only John but likewise his father Henry II. annexed Glendaloch to Dublin. Harris has (p. 377.) from the Crede mihi a passage of a grant ascribed to John, and dated A. 1192, by which the archbishop of Dublin should take possession of the bishopric of Glendaloch in case of its becoming vacant, and the bishop of Glendaloch for the future should be chaplain and vicar to the archbishop of Dublin. According to this strange sort of a deed there was to be still a bishop of Glendaloch, while the revenues of the see were to belong to the archbishops of Dublin. There is something very suspicious in these Dublin documents; but as a discussion concerning them would be relative to times, of which I do not mean to treat, I shall leave them as they are.

(69) Harris, Bishops at Glendaloch, William Piro. See also Ware at Henry de Londres.

(70) Ware, Annals at A. 1497, and Harris, loc. cit.

§. IX. A bishop of Ardfert, named Donald O'Conarchy, who was called bishop of Iar-Muan, or West Munster, died in 1193. (71) He was succeeded by David O'Duibditrib, who lived until 1207. In said year 1193 Africa, daughter of Godred, king Mann, and wife of John de Coursey, founded the Cistercian abbey of Our Lady of Leigh, or De jugo Dei, vulgarly called Gray Abbey, in the now county of Down and barony of Ardes, in which she was afterwards buried; (72) and Geoffry Fitz-Robert, senechal of Leinster, founded at Kells, in the now county of Kilkenny, the priory of the Blessed Virgin Mary for Canons Regular of St. Augustin, four of whom he procured from the priory of Bodmin in Cornwall. This establishment was confirmed by Felix O'Dullany, bishop of Ossory. To this priory that of Tullales or Tullelash, in the county of Cork, and barony of Duhallow, founded by Matthew, son of Griffin, was afterwards annexed, (73) To this year some assign the death in, that is near, the abbey of Mellifont, of Dervorgill, the wife of Tiernan O'Ruarc, who had been long before carried away by Dermod Mac Murrough; and about the same time Gilbert de Nangle, an English or Norman adventurer, plundered the island of Inis-clothran in Lough-ree, where there was an ancient and celebrated monastery. (74) In or about 1194 died Eugene, bishop of Clonard, who a little before his death assumed the title of bishop of Meath, which his successors have since used. (75) Yet we have seen that a bishop Idunan called himself by that title as far back as the year 1096. (76) In the confirmation of two donations made to the monastery of St. Thomas near Dublin by Hugh de Lacy in 1183, Eugene styles himself bishop of Clonard. (77) Hence, and from the circumstance of Ethru O'Miadachain having been called bishop of Clonard, (78) it appears that the title, bishop of Meath, was not assumed after Idunan's time, until it was adopted by Eugene. This bishop is said to have appropriated the church of Skrine in Meath to the Cistercian abbey of St. Mary near Dublin. (79) He was succeeded by Simon Rochfort, an Englishman, and the first of his nation who presided over that see, and who deserved to govern it, as he was an excellent and attentive prelate. (80) He removed the see from Clonard to Newtown near Trim, where he founded in 1206 a convent of Augustin Canons, and raised its church to the rank of a cathedral under the title of St. Peter and St. Paul. (81) During his incumbency five of the old episcopal churches of the principality of Meath, viz. Trim, Kells, Slane, Skrine, and Dunshaughlin, were only heads of rural deaneries, governed by archpriests, in the diocese of Meath. (82) The sees of Duleek, Ardraccan, and

Fore, were also swallowed up in this diocese, but at what precise times I am not able to tell. Thus the diocese of Meath contains a greater number of ancient sees than any other in Ireland, and, since that of Clonmacnois was united to it in later times, has swelled to an extraordinary extent. To the same year 1194 is assigned the foundation, by an O'Dogherty, of a Cistercian house at Hilfothuir, in the now county of Donegal, which was afterwards united to that of Arrhoe, or De Samario. (83)

(71) Ware, Bishops at Ardfert.

(72) Ware, Annals at A. 1193. and Antiq. cap. 26. at Down; and Archdall at Gray Abbey.

(73) Ware, Antiq. ib. at Kilkenny, and Archdall at Kells and Tullelash. Harris has (Monast.) the foundation of the priory of Kells in about 1183. This is a mistake; for, as Ware states, it occurred in the reign of Richard I. which began in 1190. (Compare with Not 121. to Chap. xxx.)

(74) Ware, Annals at A. 1193.

(75) Ware, Bishops at Meath.

(76) See Chap. xxiv. §. 5. and xxv. §. 6.

(77) Harris, Bishops of Meath at Eugene.

(78) See Chap. xxix. §. 6. (79) Harris, ib.

(80) Ware, Bishops at Meath. He says, that Simon Rochfort was consecrated about 1194; but Harris states in his additions, that it will appear from his Antiquities probable, that he was advanced to that see a considerable time before said year. If so, Eugene must have died much sooner than is supposed. I do not find in Harris' Antiquities, viz. those which he alludes to, any thing relative to these points.

(81) Ware and Harris, ib.

(82) This appears from Simon Rochfort's constitutions passed at Newtown in 1216 (ap. Wilkins, Concilia, &c. Vol. 1. p. 547.) in which, after a preamble stating, that it had been decreed in the council of Kells that, according as the Chorepiscopi and bishops of smaller sees should die, archpriests were to be placed in their stead to be appointed by the diocesans, and as presiding over rural deaneries, we read, that the churches of Trim, &c. which had been bishops' sees, were then merely heads of such deaneries. Ledwich (Antiq. &c. p. 394. seqq.) calls Trim Athunry, because forsooth the original has Athrumia from the Irish Ath-Truim, the ford of Truim or Trim. This sapient Doctor has made a pretty hodge podge of the ancient sees of Meath. He found in Harris' Bishops (p. 138.) that there are twelve rural deaneries in the present diocese of Meath, and thence concluded, that they had all been sees of at least chorepiscopi. Some of them indeed had been so, and even of regular bishops; but where did he find a bishop or chorepiscopus of Ratoath, Mullingar, Ardnurchor, or Ballyloughort, places now reckoned among these deaneries? Is it because some old sees had been reduced to rural deaneries, that therefore every present deanery must have been a bishop's see? Now, on the contrary, some places, that were really sees, are not counted among these deaneries, such as, ex. c. Dunshaughlin and Ardbraccan. With equal good logic he has made out twelve or thirteen old sees for the diocese of Dublin (he should have added Glendaloch) as if every one of its now deaneries had been formerly honoured with a bishop or a chorepiscopus. Now among the places, which he reckons, there are but four of five at most, in which we find any sort of an episcopal see at any time, such as Lusk, Clondalkin, Tallaght, Swords, and Finglas. But who has ever heard of a bishop of Bray, Wicklow, Arklow, &c. &c.? Besides, Ledwich might have learned from Harris, (ib. p. 299.) whom he had before his eyes, that the number of deaneries has been changed in the dioceses of Dublin and Glendaloch. And, if he understood these subjects, or attended to correct reasoning, he would have seen, that the number and state of our ancient sees are not to be judged of from the present division of deaneries. Such an idea never occurred to Harris; but the Doctor did not care what he thrust into his farrago, whether right or wrong, provided he could swell the book. Amidst a heap of stuff it is droll to hear him preferring himself (p. 402.) to Ware, Harris, and Usher, who, he says, had not even a tolerable idea of our original episcopacy!

(83) Harris, Monastic. and Archdall at Hilfothuir. Ware has not this monastery.

§. x. In this year Donald O'Brian, king of North

Munster, granted to Briccius, bishop of Limerick, and his successors, and to the clergy of St. Mary's of Limerick, in free and perpetual alms, the lands of Mungram, or Mungret, and those of Ivamnach. (84) This was the last year of that good and brave prince, and he was succeeded by his son Donough Carbrach O'Brian. (85) Besides other monastic foundations, of which we have seen already, Donald established a house of Canons Regular at Clare, alias called Kilmony, under the little of St. Peter and St. Paul, in the now county of Clare; (86) and another, styled a priory, for said order, in Inis-negananagh (the island of Canons) in the Shannon, and comprized in the same county, besides a nunnery, under the name of St John the Baptist, for Augustin canonesses at Kil-Oen likewise in said county, and in the barony of Islands. (87) He is also said to have founded in 1194 the Cistercian abbey of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Corcumroe, or De petra fertili, in that county, and barony of Burren, which, however, some attribute to his son Donough and mark at A. 1200. (88) In the city of Limerick he had formed, about the time of the arrival of the English, an establishment, under the name of St. Peter, for Black nuns of the order of St. Augustin. (89) About the same time he had erected a cathedral in Limerick, which was dedicated under the title of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and which he afterwards richly endowed, although there was one there before, called St. Munchin's. (90) Thus Donald added to his many foundations the erection of two cathedrals, viz. this one of Limerick, and that of Cashel. (91) He was also a great benefactor to the see of Killaloe, (92) where it is said that he was buried. His loss was severely felt by his subjects; for soon after his death the English got possession of Limerick and other parts of N. Munster, where they committed great cruelties, particularly on the family of Donald, one of whose sons Mur-togh, they deprived of his sight by putting out his eyes, and another they massacred after having dragged him out of a sanctuary. But, while thus wreaking their vengeance against the memory of Donald, they were checked and forced to fly by Cathal Crobhdearg O'Conor, prince of Connaught; and Donald Mac-Carthy of Desmond drove them out of Limerick. (93)

(84) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Matthew O'Henev, Cashel, and at Briccius, Limerick. The deed was witnessed by Matthew O'Henev, archbishop, &c. and Ruadri O'Gradei. (See Ware, Antiq. cap. 29. at Limerick.)

(85) Ware, Annals at A. 1194.

(86) Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Clare. It is odd, that Donald's charter for this foundation is dated A. 1195, (see Archdall at Clare) although it is agreed, that he died in 1194. This must have happened in consequence of the witnesses not having assembled to sign it until 1195.

(87) Ware, ib. and Archdall at Inis-negananagh and Kil-Oen.

(88) Ware, ib. Harris, Monast. and Archdall at Corcumroe.

(89) Ware, ib. at Limerick.

(90) See Ware, Antiq. cap. 29. at Limerick, and Harris, Bishops, p. 501.

(91) See Chap. xxix. §. 5.

(92) Ware, Antiq. cap. 29. at Killaloe, and Bishops of Killaloe at Constantine O'Brian.

(93) See Ware, Annals, at A. 1194, and 1195. Leland, Hist. of Ireland, Book 1. ch. 5. and Ferrar, History of Limerick part 1. ch. 2.

§. XI. Maeliosa, who had been raised to the see of Clogher in 1191, held it for only about four years; for he died in 1195. He gave up to John Cumin, archbishop of Dublin, and his successors, his claim to the church of All Saints near Dublin, reserving it, however, to himself during his life, to be held of the said archbishop and of the church of the Holy Trinity, or Christ-church. (94) He was succeeded by Tigernach Mac-Gilla-Rowan, an Augustin Canon. In the same year died Florentine, bishop of Elphin, who was son of one Riagan of the family of Malruanaidh, which was descended from kings of Connaught. (95) He had been a Cistercian monk, and for some time abbot of Boyle. (96) His next successor seems to have been Ardgall O'Conor of the royal house of that name. The death of Nehemias, bishop of Kildare, may be assigned to this year; whereas he was promoted to that see in 1177, and is said to have governed it about eighteen years. (97) Who was his immediate successor I am not able to discover. Constantine O'Brian, bishop of Killaloe, who had assisted at the third council of Lateran, must have died before 1195, for in said year we find Dermod O'Coning bishop there, who was deprived of the see and driven out of it by Matthew O'Heney, archbishop of Cashel, the Pope's legate, for what reason is not recorded. Dermod died of grief in the same year, and was succeeded by Charles O'Heney, (probably the same as Cornelius or Conor O'Heney) in or about whose time the see of Roscrea was united to that of Killaloe, and the see of Iniscathy to that of Limerick, while its possessions were divided between the Sees of Limerick, Killaloe, and Ardfert. (98) The nunnery of Augustin canonesses of St. Brigid's of Odra or Odder in the now county of Meath, and barony of Skrine, had its possessions confirmed in this year by Pope Celestin III. (99) At the same time he confirmed also those of the nunnery of the same order of St. Mary's of Clonard, which had been endowed long before, probably by the O'Melaghlin's; (100) and likewise those of St. Mary's nunnery of the same order at Termon-Fechin in the now county of Louth. (101) To said year is assigned the death of one Donald O'Find, who is called comorbu of Clonsfert-Brenain or Brendan; but it is uncertain, whether he was bishop or only abbot of Clonfert. (102)

(94) Ware, Bishops at Clogher. It appears, that said church and the priory annexed to it had been placed under the superintendence of one of Maeliosa's predecessors, Edan O'Killedy. (See Chap. xxviii. §. 10)

(95) AA. SS. p. 158.

(96) Ware, Bishops of Elphin at Florence O'Mulrony.

(97) See Ware and Harris, Bishops at Kildare.

(98) The same, ib. at Killaloe. Ware says, that Iniscathy was united, as well as Roscrea, to Killaloe; but Harris has corrected his text in the manner stated above.

(99) Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Meath, and Archdall at Odder. Alemand and after him Archdall say, that this nunnery was founded by the Barnwall family. I am sure that Alemand had no authority for this assertion; for it is certain, that the Barnwalls were not settled in Meath until a very long time after that period. He was fond of complimenting distinguished Irish families with the honour of making them founders of religious houses merely on conjecture.

(100) Ware, ib. and Archdall at Clonard. See Celestin's Bull, dated 26 February, A. 1195, in Monast. Angl. Vol. 2. p. 1043.

(101) Ware, ib. at Louth, and Archdall at Terfeckan. If we are to believe Alemand, this nunnery had been founded by a M'Mahon. Ware does not say so, although Archdall in his careless manner refers to him for it.

(102) Ware, Bishops at Clonfert. The title comorba means, as I have often remarked, successor. But it is more probable, that St. Brendan was not a bishop, (see Chap. x. §. 7.) and accordingly, unless some particular reasons appear to the contrary, the denomination, Comorba of Brendan, indicates rather an abbot than a bishop.

§. XII. In 1196 died Maurice (Murchertach), bishop of Ross. He had succeeded Benedict, who was bishop there in 1172, and who seems to have died about 1190. (103) Maurice's immediate successor was Daniel, a secular priest, who was consecrated at Rome about the year 1197 by the bishop of Albano, in virtue of an order of Celestin III, whom he had imposed upon by means of forged letters in the name of several Irish bishops, as if they attested his having been duly elected. In opposition to this fraud Florence a monk, and another monk, whose name is marked only by the initial letter E, went to Rome, where each of them alleged, that himself, not Daniel, was the person elected to the see of Ross, and Florence exposed the tricks and knavery of Daniel. On being thus informed, the Pope commissioned Matthew O'Heney of Cashel, his legate, and Charles O'Heney of Killaloe, to inquire into the pretensions of the various candidates, and directed them, in case of their finding Daniel canonically elected, to establish him in the possession of the see; but, if otherwise, then to examine the question between Florence and E. whichever of whom could prove the truth of his claim should be consecrated by the archbishop of Cashel. Those prelates, having received this commission, cited Daniel three times to appear before them; but he declined to do so, and accordingly was pronounced contumacious. They next inquired into the claims of Florence and E; upon which it appeared from the concurrent testimonies of the clergy and people of Ross, of the king of Cork (Desmond), and of the bishops of the province, that Florence had been canonically elected, and E not as much as put in election; and consequently they confirmed Florence in virtue of the apostolic authority. Meanwhile Celestine III. died, and was succeeded by Innocent III. (104) Daniel, availing himself of this circumstance, went again to Rome, and by means of certain false and roundabout statements, in which he implicated the king and bishop of Cork, and likewise Florence, deceived the new Pope as he had the former, insomuch that Innocent sent peremptory orders, that Daniel should be put in possession of the see, and that the king of Cork should be admonished not to oppose him. Florence now found it necessary to repair to Rome, and laid before the Pope a true account of the proceedings of the prelates of Cashel and Killaloe on the commission before mentioned. The Pope, apprehensive of being circumvented by forged letters, as his predecessor had been, remanded Florence to the said prelates with a mandate to cite Daniel, if in Ireland, and to proceed canonically in the cause. But if he were not in Ireland that they should, allowing him a year, reckoned from the time of his departure for Rome, commit in the mean time the administration of the see of Ross to Florence, who, on Daniel's not returning, should be consecrated at the end of said year; and in case Daniel were in Ireland, and should refuse to appear on a citation within three months, that Florence should be consecrated without delay. The Pope set aside all power of appeal in this cause, lest the church of Ross, which had been vacant near three years, should continue longer without a pastor. (105) Florence, on his return to Ireland, was consecrated bishop of that see by the archbishop of Cashel, and thus the matter ended. (106)

(103) Ware, ib. at Ross. He says, that Benedict held the see for about 18 years after 1172.

(104) Celestin died on the 8th of January A. 1198, and on the same day Innocent was elected Pope.

(105) There is a full account of the whole transaction in a letter of Innocent III. to the archbishops of Armagh and Cashel and the bishop of Killaloe, (ep. 364. in Baluze's edition of his Epistles, Lib. 1.) dated at Perugia the 17th of September, probably of the year 1198, reckoning the almost three years, mentioned by him, from the death of Maurice in 1196. I have abridged this account; but whoever wishes to see more of it may consult Harris, Bishops of Ross at Daniel.

(106) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Ross.

§. XIII. Reginald O'Flanua, bishop of Emly, died in 1197. He is supposed to have been in that see at the time of its cathedral being destroyed by fire, that is, as is said, in the year 1192. (107) I find no account of who was his immediate successor. In this year John Cumin, archbishop of Dublin, was much harrassed by Hamo de Valoniis, alias de Valois, who being appointed Justiciary or deputy under John, earl of Morton, and finding the English government much distressed in Ireland, commenced his career with the invasion of ecclesiastical property. He seized on several lands belonging to the see of Dublin, notwithstanding the opposition of the archbishop, who, as all his efforts to resist oppression were fruitless, removed from the cathedral the books, chalices, images, &c. and got the crucifixes crowned with thorns and stretched prostrate on the ground. He excommunicated those, who had injured him and his church, laid an interdict on the diocese, and leaving Ireland repaired to king Richard and to the prince John, from neither of whom did he meet with any redress. (108) About the same time the see of Leighlin being vacant, John a Cistercian monk, and abbot of the monastery De Rosea valle, alias Monasterevan, was elected by the Chapter and confirmed by Matthew O'Heney, archbishop of Cashel, as apostolic legate, the archbishop of Dublin being then either in England or Normandy. But Hamo de Valoniis opposed the consecration of John, and took possession of the temporalities of the church of Leighlin and of the property of the Canons. In consequence of these violent proceedings Matthew O'Heney was loth to consecrate John, who accordingly went to Rome and was well received by Innocent III., who consecrated him himself, and gave him a letter directed to the Chapter, clergy, and people of the town and diocese of Leighlin, in which, after mentioning his having received letters from them, and from the archbishops of Armagh and Cashel, and the bishops of Ossory and Kildare, and touching upon other circumstances connected with the election, &c. he tells them, that he has consecrated John, and that he now sends him back to his church, ordering them to obey him. (109) At the same time he wrote a very sharp letter to John, earl of Morton, in which he complains of the unjust and outrageous conduct of his deputy Hamo, and of John himself having detained the archbishop of Dublin in Normandy, and admonishes him not to prevent the bishop John, whom he himself had consecrated, from administering the see of Leighlin, and to take care that he be not molested by any other person. He desires him to make Hamo refund to the church and Canons of Leighlin what he had taken from them, and threatens him, in case of non-compliance, with disappointing him as to certain hopes of his, perhaps those, which John entertained of being declared king of Ireland. (110) These letters must have been written in 1198, the first year of Innocent's pontificate, being dated in September, (111) while John was only earl of Morton, and consequently prior to his having been crowned king of England on the 26th of May A. D. 1199. Meanwhile Hamo, having plundered not only the church, but likewise the laity, whereby he became very rich, was recalled in 1198, and Meiler Fitzhenry substituted in his place. (112) Some time after, in compensation for the injuries he had done to the see of Dublin, he made a grant of 20 plough-lands to the archbishop, John Cumin, and to his successors. (113)

(107) The same, ib. at Emly. Ware does not mark this fire at A. 1192, but Harris does.

(108) Hoveden at A. 1197, p. 773. Ber. Angl. Scriptores, Frankfort A. 1601. Ware, Annals at A. 1197, and Leland, Hist. &c. B. 1. ch. 5.

(109) This letter is No. 366 in Lib. 1. of the Epistola e, ed. by Baluze. It is dated from Perugia 21st September.

(110) This letter is No. 367, ib. dated 18th September.

(111) This is the month of the date also of the letter concerning the affair of Ross, and they are likewise addressed from Perugia, whereby is confirmed what I have observed (above Not. 105) as to that letter having been written in 1198.

(112) See Ware, Annals at A: 1198, and Leland, B. 1. ch. 6.

(113) Ware and Harris, Bishops at John Cumin.

§. XIV. Cornelius Mac-dermot, king or prince of Moylurg, who had taken the Cistercian habit in the abbey of Boyle, died there in 1197; and to the same year is assigned the death of Flahertach O'Maldory, prince of Tirconnel. (114) The following year is remarkable for the death of the last king of all Ireland, Roderic O'Conor, who departed this life in the monatory of Cong, where he had spent several of his last years. (115) After his death terrible dissensions and wars occurred between Cathal Crobhdearg O'Conor and Cathal Carrach O'Conor, each assuming the title of king of Connaught; but it is not my province to enter into a history of these bloody and unhappy contests. In said year 1198 a bishop of Raphoe, whose name is not known, resigned his see, and another was chosen in his stead; but this resignation was disapproved of by Innocent III. who in a letter to the archbishop of Armagh, dated from Rome May 18, says that as said resignation was irregular, he had already directed him to compel the bishop to resume his pastoral functions, in which case should he voluntarily resign the see into the hands of the archbishop, then the clergy of that church should bring the new bishop to election according to the canons, and the archbishop might confirm and consecrate him. (116) At this time Donogh O'Beoda was bishop of Killa-lala, at whose request the same Pope, by a decree of the 30th of March, same year, confirmed the ancicient possessions of his see. (117) In 1199 died Richard I. king of England, and was succeeded by his brother John, earl of Morton, styled Lord of Ireland. The Cistercian abbey of St. Mary of Comerer, alias Comber or Cumber, in the now county of Down, and barony of Castlereagh, was founded in this year by Brian Catha Dun, ancestor of the O'Neils of Clandeboys, who supplied it with monks from Alba Landa in Carmarthenshire. (118) At said year is marked the death of a holy man, Maurice O'Baodain, in the island of Hy, (119) of whose monastery he was apparently a member. Augustin, the bishop of Waterford, who had been nominated by Henry II. and had assisted at the Lateran council in 1179, must have died about these times; for we find that see in the possession of one Robert in the year 1200. (120)

(114) Ware, Annals at A. 1197. (115) Ware, ib. at A. 1198.

(116) This letter is No. 177, Lib. 1. of the above mentioned collection. Ware supposes, (Bishops at Raphoe) that it was written in 1198.

(117) Ware and Harris, ib. at Killala.

(118) Ware, Annals at A. 1199. and Antiq. cap. 26 at Down. Also Archdall at Cumber, who most strangely places Cumber three miles S. W. of Strangford, while on the contrary it lies many miles to the north of that town. Alemand in his conjectural and impertinent manner attributes the foundation of this abbey to the family of the Whites.

(119) Tr. Th. p. 501.

(120) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Waterford.

§. xv. To said year 1200 is assigned the foundation of two Cistercian monasteries by Donogh Carbrach O'Brian, the successor of Donald king of North Munster. One was that of Kilcoul or Kilcooley in the now county of Tipperary, and barony of Stewarda and Compsy. It was otherwise called the abbey of the Blessed Virgin Mary De arvi campo, and was a daughter of the monastery of Ieripont or Ierpoint, that is, it received its first monks from that establishment. (121) The other was the abbey of Corcumroe, if, however, it had not been already founded by his father Donald. (122) The Cistercian abbey of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Tintern, or De voto, in the now county of Wexford, and barony of Shelburne, was founded in this year by William Mareschal the elder, earl of Pembroke, in consequence of a vow, which, when in great danger at sea, he had made of erecting a monastery in the place, where he might first arrive in safety. This happened to be near Bannow bay, where Tintern is situated. He endowed it, and supplied it with monks from Tintern in Monmouthshire, over whom John Torrel was placed as first abbot. (123) Another Cistercian monastery, likewise of the Blessed Virgin, was established in said year at Kilbeggan in Westmeath, and supplied with monks from Mellifont. It was called De flumine Dei by allusion, I suppose, to the river Brosna, near which that town is situated. (124) About the same time the magnificent monastery of Athassel, near the Suir, three miles from Cashel, was founded in honour of St. Edmund, king and martyr, by William Fitz-Adelm de Burgo, for Canons Regular of St. Augustin. The founder was buried there in 1204, as were in later times some of his posterity. (125) In or about the same year 1200 Theobald Walter, Butler of Ireland, founded and endowed a priory at Nenagh, likewise for Canons Regular, with an hospital annexed, where they were to attend the sick, that served God there. As it was dedicated in the name of St. John, it was commonly called Teach-eon or the house of John. (126) The priory of St. Mary of Tristernagh in Westmeath, barony of Moygoish, was established and endowed for persons of the same order about this time by Geoffry de Constantine. (127) To these times we might, according to one account, assign the foundation of the priory of Aroasian Canons at Rathkeale in the now county of Limerick, under the invocation of the Blessed Virgin Mary; but it appears more probable, that it did not exist until after the year 1200, (128) In like manner the Cistercian abbey of Woney or Wetheny, alias Abington, in said county, which some have affixed to the latter end of the 12th century, was in all appearance not founded until 1205, the year prior to the death of its founder Theobald Fitz-Walter, Butler of Ireland, who was interred there in 1206. (129) Thus the house of Gilbertin Canons at Balimore, near Lough Seudy in Westmeath, has been assigned to the 12th century, although it was not founded until the year 1218. (130). The monastery of Kilkenny West, in the same county, for Cruciferi, likewise a branch of the Canons Regular of St. Augustin, which could not have been founded until some time in the 13th century, has been marked as belonging to the 12th (131).

(121) Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Tipperary. Harris, Monast. at Cistercians. Archdall at Kilcooly. In the Monast. Angl. (Vol. 2. p. 1029.) there is a deed of king Henry III. confirming the grant made to this abbey, there called Kylleconil, by Donald O'Brian. Instead of Donald must be read Donogh; for, as Ware observes, according to the book of the statutes of the Irish Cistercians it was founded in 1200, six years after Donald's death. He mentions the Register of Richmond, which brings it down to 1209. This would not prevent its having been founded by Donogh; but in all probability the true date is 1200.

(122) See above §. 10.

(123) Ware, ib. at Wexford, and Annals at A. 1200. See also Archdall at Tintern, and Monast. Angl. Vol. 2. p. 1032.

(124) Ware, ib. at Westmeath. Harris, Monast. at Cistercians, and Archdall at Kilbeggan. Alemand in his conjectural way attributes this foundation to the Daltons; but Ware, infinitely better authority, says nothing of the founder.

(125) See Ware, ib. at Tipperary, and Archdall at Athassel.

(126) Ware, ib.

(127) Ware, ib. at Westmeath, and Archdall at Tristernagh. The deed for this foundation, witnessed by Simon (Rochfort) bishop of Meath, may be seen in Monastic. Angl. Vol. 2. p. 1046.

(128) Harris (Monast.) marks it at about 1200; but neither Ware nor Archdall mentions the time of its foundation. It existed, however, in the latter part of the 13th century. Were we to believe Alemand, its founder was one Harvey.

(129) See Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Limerick, and Archdall at Abington. The charter of foundation and endowment is in Monastic. Angl. Vol. 2. p. 1034, marked about A. 1205.

(130) Ware (ib. at Westmeath) has this monastery, but does not mention the time of its foundation. Harris, who is often very loose in his dates, places it (Monast. at Praemonstre Canons) in the 12th century. Now, as Archdall observes (at Ballimore), it was not founded until 1218.

(131) Harris, Monast. at Cruciferi. Ware (loc. cit.) touches on this monastery without telling us when founded, or who was the founder. But Archdall (at Kilkenny West) shows, that it was founded by Thomas Dillon, a priest, and grandson of Sir Thomas Dillon. As Sir Thomas did not come to Ireland until 1185, and was then very young, it follows, that his grandson was not a priest, nor a founder of a religious house until many years after 1200. (See Lodge's Peerage at Visct. Dillon.) Alemand attributes this foundation to the Tyrrel family, and why? Because there were Tyrels in that country.

§. xvi. There were several other religious establishments formed about the end of the 12th century; but I do not find the precise years of their foundations. The priory of St. John Baptist near Kells, for the same order of Cruciferi, was founded by Walter de Lacy. (132) This order had a priory, called of St. Leonard, with an hospital annexed to it, near Dundalk, which had been founded towards the close of the reign of Henry II. by Bertram de Verdon, lord of that place. (133) Two Benedictine priorities, one near Cork, and the other near Waterford, both under the name of St. John the Evangelist, were founded by prince John, while only earl of Morton, consequently in the 12th century, and made cells to the abbey of St. Peter and St. Paul in Bath. (134). The Benedictine nunnery of Kilcreunata, alias, of the Castle wood, in the now county of Galway, was founded by Cathal Crobhdearg O'Connor about 1200. Afterwards were annexed to it the cells of Inchmean in Mayo and Ardarn in Roscommon. (135) St. Mary's nunnery of Grany, in the now county of Kildare, for Augustin canons was founded about the same time by Walter de Riddlesford; (136) and nearly at the same time Robert son of Richard, lord of Norragh, founded that of St. Mary of Timolin in said county (barony of Narragh and Rheban) for Augustin nuns, following the Arosian rule, in which he placed a daughter of his. (137) Another nunnery of Augustin canons is mentioned as having existed at this period in Killeigh, a once celebrated place in the now King's county (barony of Geashill). (138) The house of Canons Regular of Kilrush in the county of Kildare, three miles and a half west of old Kilcullen, a cell to the priory of Carthmel in Lancashire, was founded by William Mareschal earl of Pembroke, but whether in the late part of the 12th, or the early one of the 13th century, I am not able to determine. (139) A priory of the same order is said to have been founded near Naas by a baron of Naas in the 12th century. (140) Whether the similar priory of Selsker, called of Sts. Peter and Paul, near Wexford, of which the Roches were at least, patrons, existed in these times is uncertain. But if it be true, as some say, that it was founded by the Danes, it must have been long prior to the end of said century. (141) The military religious orders, which had no establishments in Ireland until the arrival of the English, obtained many afterwards. We have already seen of that of Kilmainham by Strongbow. (142) At Clontarf there was a commandery, called of St. Comgall, for Knights Templars, since the reign of Henry II. (143) One for Knights Hospitalers was founded at Wexford under the names of St. John and St. Bridged by William Mareschal, earl of Pembroke; but whether before or after the commencement of the 13th century I cannot clearly discover. (144) Another for the same order was founded by Walter de Lacy during the reign of Richard I., consequently in the 12th century, at Kilmainham-beg near Nobber in the now county of Meath. (145) The one for the same order at the place now called Castle-buy in the Ardes, county of Down, could not have been founded until the 13th century; for its founder was Hugh de Lacy, earl of Ulster, who was not until then distinguished by that title. (146) A commandery for Knights Templars was established by Matilda de Lacy at Kilsaran in the now county of Louth, barony of Ardee, and, although I think it could not have been so early, is said to have been founded in the 12th century. (147) There were three similar commanderies in the county of Waterford, Kilbarry within the Liberties of the city of Waterford, Killure two miles east of said city, and Crook in the barony of Gualtiere; the two former are assigned to the 12th century, and the last to the 13th. (148)

(132) Ware (ib. at Meath) does not mark the time. Harris (loc. cit.) has Cent. 12. Archdall (at Kells) following Alemand, poor authority, says that it was in the reign of Richard I. If this be true, it was founded in the 12th century.

(133) Ware, ib. at Louth, and Archdall at Dundalk.

(134) Ware, ib. at Cork and Waterford. Archdall (at Waterford) pretends, that John founded the priory there in 1185, because that was the year of his arrival in that city. This is an ill-founded conclusion.

(135) Ware, ib. at Galway, and Archdall at Kilcreunata. I do not find mentioned in what part of the county of Galway this place was situated; but it appears, that it was not far distant from the county of Roscommon.

(136) Ware, ib. at Kildare. Harris was mistaken (Monast.) in placing this nunnery in the county of Carlow, whereas Grany lies in the barony of Kilkea and Moon (co. Kildare) not far from Castle-Dermot. (See Archdall at Grany.)

(137) Ware, ib. Archdall (at Timolin) says, his grand-daughter Lecelina.

(138) Ware (ib. at King's County) does not state by whom this nunnery was founded, nor at what time whether before or after the arrival of the English. The conjectural Alemand tells us, that it was founded by the Warren family, and hence Harris assigned it to the 12th century. Archdall also (at Killeigh) follows Alemand, and in his careless manner refers to Ware, as if he had attributed its foundation to the Warrens. I suspect, that it existed long before the English settled in Ireland; for Killeigh was distinguished of old as a religious place.

(139) Ware (ib. at Kildare) does not mark the time of this foundation. Harris (Monast.) assigns it to the 12th century, and Archdall (at Kilrushe) to the beginning of the 13th.

(140) Harris, ib. and Archdall at Naas. Ware (loc. cit.) says nothing of the time.

(141) Neither Ware (ib. at Wexford) nor Archdall (at Wexford) marks the time of its foundation. Harris (loc. cit.) assigns it to the 12th century. This priory existed in 1240. See Ware (Bishops of Ferns at Johannes de S. Johanne) and Archdall ib.

(142) Chap. xxix. §. II. (143) Ware ib. at Dublin.

(144) Ware (ib. at Wexford) does not mention any particular time; nor does Archdall at Wexford. Harris (loc. cit.) in his general way has Cent. 12.

(145) Ware, ib. at Meath.

(146) Ware (ib. at Down) does not mark the time of this foundation, but attributes it to Hugh de Lacy, earl of Ulster. Yet Harris (loc. cit.) and Archdall (at Castle-buy) place it in the 12th century.

(147) Although Ware (ib. at Louth) makes no mention of the time, yet Harris (loc. cit.) and Archdall (at Kilsaran) have Cent. 12. But the Matilda de Lacy meant by Ware was in all appearance the daughter of Walter de Lacy, lord of Meath, and could not have flourished until the 13th century. Her father died in 1234.

(148) Ware (ib. at Waterford) is silent as to the times and founders of these establishments. But Harris (loc. cit.) and Archdall (at said places) mark the centuries as above; and Archdall adds from Alemand, fine authority, that the one of Crook was founded by a baron of Curraghmore.

CHAP. XXXII.

Death of Thomas O'Conor archbishop of Armagh, and of several other bishops—Inquiry concerning the ancient sees of Ireland—and of ancient monasteries—The great monastery of Hy still kept up, and considered as an Irish establishment—Amalgad O'Fergal elected abbot of Hy by the clergy of the North of Ireland—Account of the early Monkish Orders in Ireland—Ancient Irish liturgies—The Cursus Scotorum—Ancient Irish Canons—Ecclesiastical architecture of the ancient Irish—Description of the ancient church of Kildare—Inquiry on the origin and uses of the ancient round towers.

SECT. I.

I DO not find the death of any Irish prelate marked at the year 1200; but several of them died not long after. Thomas O'Conor, archbishop of Armagh who has left a high reputation for piety and learning, departed this life in 1201, and was buried in the abbey of Mellifont. After his death a great contest took place with regard to the choice of his successor, the electors being divided in their votes relative to the candidates, among whom were Ralph le Petit, archdeacon of Meath, and Humphrey de Tickhull. The king John espoused the party of Tickhull; but the Pope Innocent III. confirmed the appointment of Eugene Mac-Gillivider, which the king refused to agree to, insomuch that on Tickhull's death in 1203 he took part with Ralph le Petit. But his opposition was ineffectual; for the Pope's authority prevailed, and the king became reconciled to Eugene, who thenceforth governed the see peaceably until his death at Rome in 1216. (1) Catholicus or Cadla O'Dubhai, archbishop of Tuam, a highly respected prelate, after having held that see forty years, died at a very advanced age in the same year, 1201, in the monastery of Augustin Canons at Cong, and was succeeded by Felix O'Ruadan, a Cistercian monk. (2) In or about said year died Malachy, usually called the third, bishop of Down, whose successor was one Ralph, apparently a Scotchman; as did also John, bishop of Leighlin, who was succeeded by Herlewin, a Cistercian, as John himself had been. (3) Felix O'Dullany, bishop of Ossory, died in 1202, and was buried in the Cistercian church of Ieripont or Ierpoint, to which he had been a benefactor. It is said, that many miracles have been wrought at his tomb, which was at the north side of the high altar. (4) According to some writers it was he that removed the see of Ossory from Aghaboe to Kilkenny; but this is rather doubtful. (5) He was succeeded by Hugh Rufus, an Englishman, and Canon Regular of St. Augustin, who was prior of the house of Kells in the now county of Kilkenny. (6) Briccius, bishop of Limerick, was most probably dead in these times; for we find, that his successor Donogh or Donat O'Brian of the princely house of that name, a learned, liberal, and zealous prelate, died in 1207. (7) As from what is related of him it appears, that he held the see of Limerick for some years, we may fairly conclude, that Briccius, who was living in 1194, (8) died about the end of the 12th century. Not to encroach further on the history of times, of which I do not mean to treat, I shall conclude this necrology with the death of the illustrious Matthew O'Heney, of which we read: "A. D. 1206. Mat" thew, archbishop of Cashel, legate of all Ireland,

 " the wisest and most religious man of the natives
 " of that country, having founded many churches,
 " and triumphed over the old enemy of mankind
 " by working many miracles, voluntarily abandon" ing all worldly pomp, happily went to rest in
 " the abbey of Holy Cross" (in the county of Tipperary). (9) He had written some tracts, among which was a Life of St. Cuthbert bishop of Lindisfarne, and was succeeded by Donogh or Donatus O'Lonargan, likewise a Cistercian monk. (10)

(1) Ware and Harris at Archbishops of Armagh. Harris seems to say, that Eugene was appointed by Papal provision, independently of any election. But it is evident, even from his own account of the matter, that there had been an election; and all that the Pope did was to confirm the choice made of Eugene as the most regular and best supported. Innocent III. was a strenuous abettor of canonical elections. John preferred the others, being Englishmen or Normans, to Eugene, who was an Irishman.

(2) Ware, Archbishops of Tuam. Harris adds, that Felix O'Ruadan was uncle to Roderic O'Conor, king of Connaught. I suspect, that this is a mistake; for he lived until 1238, and is not spoken of as having reached an extraordinary age, as must have been the case were he an uncle of Roderic.

(3) Ware, Bishops at Down and Leighlin. John was the bishop, of whom we have seen above, Chap. xxxi. §. 13.

(4) Ware and Harris, Bishops at Ossory.

(5) See Chap. xxix. §. 14. and ib. Not. 92.

(6) Ware and Harris, ib. (7) Ib. at Limerick.

(8) See Chap. xxxi. §. 10.

(9) Annals of Mary's abbey, and Ware and Harris, Archbishops of Cashel.

(10) Ware and Harris, ib. and at Writers. Harris calls Donat O'Lonargan the second by allusion to the O'Lonargan, archbishop of Cashel, who assisted at the council at Kells, and who died in 1158. But that O'Lonargan's christian name was not Donogh or Donat. It was Domnald, alias Donald or Donall. (See Chap. xxvii. §. 14. and xxviii. §. 5.)

§. II. The number of distinct episcopal sees was at the close of the 12th century nearly the same as that, which is stated to have been established by the council at Kells, and of which I have already given a list. (11) But about that time, or the early part of the 13th century, three of the sees mentioned in it, viz. Kells, Roscrea, and Iniscatthy, were merged in or united to others. (12) On the other hand the see of Enaghdune (Annadown in the county of Galway), although not in that list, continued to exist, and did so more or less until after many contentions with the archbishops of Tuam it was at length, after a long lapse of time, united to that see. (13) In like manner the see of Dromore, which also is omitted in said list, either still existed, or was revived in an early part of the 13th century. (14) Whether the see of Kilmore, of which likewise there is no mention in that list, was established or not before the 13th century, I am not able to determine. The earliest bishop of that see, or, as its bishops were first called, of Triburna, their original residence, or Breffny, of whose existence there is no doubt, died as late as A. D. 1231. (15) Some of our ancient sees, which still were kept up in the early part of the 12th century, seem to have entirely disappeared before the end of it. Thus those of Cong and Ardarn, which existed at the time of the synod of Rath-Breasail in or about 1118, (16) ceased, probably prior to the holding of the council of Kells, the former being united to Tuam and the latter to Elphin. (17) In the proceedings of said council there is no mention made of them. As to several other old sees or places, in which there had been occasionally bishops in old times, such as Trim, Drumclieff, Lusk, &c. &c. I do not meet with a succession of bishops in them during any part of the 12th century. Many of our ancient monasteries had by these times ceased to exist. Several of them had been destroyed by the Danes; others, which were plundered and burned, as we have seen many instances of, during the wars between the Irish themselves, or those between them and the Anglo-Normans, not being rebuilt dropped off. (18) But to such persons, as wished to embrace the religious or monastic state, sufficient opportunities were afforded by the many establishments for Canons Regular of St. Augustin, and the Cistercian monasteries, adding some Benedictine ones, that were formed during the 12th century, and of which I have made mention in their proper and respective places.

(11) See Chap. xxvii. §. 15.

(12) See Chap. xxxi. §. 9 and 11. These sees are reckoned as existing by Cencius in his Census Camerales. But it is to be observed, that Cencius completed that book in the year 1192, (Fleury, Hist. Eccl. L. 78. §. 1.) at which time those junctions had not taken place.

(13) See Ware and Harris at Archbishops of Tuam. We have met above (Chap. xxxi. §. 7.) with a bishop of Enaghdone named Concors. Enaghdone is in a list of Irish sees, which Camden has (col. 1329. Gibson's ed.) from a Roman Provinciale, and which Bingham (Origines, &c. B. ix. ch. 6. sect. 19.) has copied from him. This list differs also in some other respects from that, which I have already given (Chap. xxvii. §. 15.) It omits Kells, and has a see under the archbishop of Tuam, called De Cellaiaro, which I know not what to make of, unless it was the same as Kill-air in the now county of Westmeath, where St. Aidus, son of Brec, had been bishop in the sixth century. (See Chap. xii. §. 2.) Kill-air, although not in the present province of Connaught, might have been subject to Tuam, in the same manner as Clonmacnois was for some time. In the said list both Roscommon and Elphin are distinctly mentioned, while in the other we find Roscommon alone. Bingham has (ib.) another list, published by Carolus a S. Paulo, likewise from a Roman Provinciale, and which makes the suffragan sees of Ireland amount to fifty-three. But it is a hodgepodge half unintelligible, and scarcely worth consideration. It has, however, one point, which ought not to be passed over, viz. its calling the see of Down alias that of Dromore. Hence it is more probable, that Dromore, during the time of its not existing separately, was included rather in the diocese of Down, as I have conjectured elsewhere, (Not. 106. to Chap. xxvii.) than in that of Armagh, as some thought, ap. Ware (Bishops at Dromore).

(14) The same, Bishops at Dromore. (Compare with Not. prec.)

(15) Ib. at Kilmore. It has been seen, (Chap. x. §. 3) that that there is no proof of St. Fedlimid, the patron saint of Kilmore, having been a bishop, or, at least, of that see.

(16) See Chap. xxv. §. 13. 14.

(17) Harris (Bishops at Elphin) calls one Denis O'Mulkyran bishop of Ardarn, who, he says, died in 1224. If he be right, the name of the see of Ardarn would have been retained at that time, although, as he observes, it was then united with Elphin. But said Denis was not a bishop, being only archdeacon or erenach of Ardarn. (Archdall at Ardarna.) Such archdeacons used to be found in places, which had been once episcopal sees.

(18) It would be an endless and almost fruitless task to inquire into the particular times, at which so many of those old monasteries disappeared. The reader, on looking over Archdall's Monasticon, and noting the periods, at which the succession of their abbots ceased, will perceive that a great number of them had fallen off, some sooner, some later, before the beginning of the 13th century.

§ III. Yet a considerable number of the old monasteries, particularly the larger ones, still continued to exist, such as those of Armagh, Derry, Bangor, Maghbile or Merville in the county of Down, Devenish, Clogher, Clones, Louth, Clonfert, Inchmacnerin, the isles of Arran, Cong, Mayo, Clonard, Kells, Lusk, Kildare, Trim, Clonmacnois, Killeigh, Glendaloch, Saigir, the island of All saints in Lough-ree, Roscommon, Ballysadare, Drumclieff, Aghaboe, Lothra or Lorra, Lismore, Molana, Cork, Iniscatthy, Innisfallen, (19) and several others. The great monastery of Hy was still kept up, and considered as an Irish establishment, of which we have a clear proof in a transaction that occurred in the year 1203. One Kellach erected a monastery in Hy in opposition to the elders of the place, upon which the clergy of the North of Ireland held a meeting, which was attended by Florence O'Kervallen, bishop of Tirone (Derry), Moeliosa O'Dorigh, bishop of Tirconnel (Raphoe) and abbot of the monastery of Saints Peter and Paul at Armagh, Amalgad O'Fergal, abbot of Derry, Anmir O'Cobhtaich, and many others. Afterwards they all went to Hy, demolished the monastery, which had been built by Kellach, and placed over the abbey the above mentioned Amalgad, who was unanimously elected abbot. (20) This election of Amalgad seems to show, that Kellach was abbot of Hy, and that he was deposed on this occasion. What was his object in erecting a new monastery I cannot ascertain. Perhaps his intention was to introduce a new order into the island, perhaps of Cistercians or Augustin Canons, for both of which there was a great predilection in Ireland; or it may be supposed, that his only view was to construct a new edifice for the Columbian monks more aplendid and commodious than the old monastery, and on a different site, which the monks objected to on account of their attachment to every thing connected with the memory of St. Columba. These monks, as well as the whole of the Columbian order, still adhered, as far as I can discover, to their old rule and system; but several other Irish monasteries seem to have adopted before or about these times the rule of the Canons Regular of St. Augustin. (21)

The transition was not difficult; for the old Irish rules did not, in substance, differ much from that of said Canons, inasmuch as they were not as strictly monastical as those of the Egyptian, Basilian, or Benedictine monks, and allowed, without particular dispensation, the union of the active service of the Church, such as practised by the secular clergy, with the observance of monastic regulations, which, although varying more or less, were, as I have often remarked, founded on the system, which St. Patrick had seen followed in Lerins and at Tours, and which he introduced into Ireland. (22) Now the characteristic feature of the Canons Regular, which distinguishes them from monks emphatically so called, is, that, although they make vows and are bound to observe certain laws similar to those of the monks, they are capable of practising the functions, which usually belong to the secular clergy.

(19) See Archdall at these places.

(20) Tr. Th. p. 501. Florence O'Kervallan, or O'Cherballen, is called by Ware bishop of Derry. His being here styled bishop of Tirone is owing to a considerable part of that territory having been in these times comprized in the diocese of Derry. This was not the case until after Muredach O'Cobhtaich became bishop of Derry in the place of Flathbert O'Brolcan. For before that time the title of bishop of Tirone, or Kinel-Eogain, used to be given to the bishop of Ardstraw. (See Chap. xxix. §. 5. and Not. 100. to Chap xxvii.) Anmir O'Cobhtaich, who attended the meeting, was a Columbian monk; for he was afterwards abbot of Derry. (Tr. Th. p. 505.)

(21) See Ware, Opuscula S. Patr. &c. p. 117.

(22) See Chap. iv. §. 9. 12. and vii. §. 15.

§. iv. Yet the system of the ancient Irish communities was much more severe than that of the Canons Regular, as is clear from the Rule of St. Columbanus, which was taken from those of the monasteries in Ireland, particularly that of Bangor, of which that great saint had been a member. After the great law of loving God and our neighbour, the first thing required of a monk was implicit obedience to the orders of his superior without complaining or murmuring. Silence was strictly enjoined, except on necessary and useful occasions. Their fare was of a very simple kind, consisting of herbs, pulse, farinaceous substances mixed with water, and a small allowance of biscuit. Their meal was late in the day; but, although scanty, and such as to render every day a sort of a fast-day, it was sufficient for the necessities of nature without injuring the health or impairing the strength of the body, or preventing the monks from fulfilling their duties of praying, working, and reading. (23) They were not allowed to eat any thing before None (three o'clock in the afternoon) on Wednesdays and Fridays throughout the year, a regulation which was observed, and, according to some accounts, still oftener in all the Irish monasteries. (24) Independently of the great fast of Lent, which did not begin, at least as late as the tenth century, in Ireland until the Saturday previous to the first Sunday of that holy season, (25) the regular weekly fast-days, observed by the whole Irish church, were Wednesdays and Fridays, nor was the fast, or, as now practised, the abstinence on Saturday, which has been substituted for that of Wednesday, received in Ireland until a very long time after it had been established in other parts of the Western church. (26) The ancient Irish monks generally abstained, as far I can discover, at all times from flesh meat, but they were allowed to eat fish, (27) and even in Lent the use of eggs was not prohibited. (28) Yet some monasteries possessed sheep and cows, (29) the former chiefly for the sake of the wool, of which the monks made their garments, and the latter on account of the milk, which was much used by them, and allowed even on the days of the strictest fast. (30) They used, however, to treat guests and strangers with flesh meat. (31) Their usual drink was milk or water; yet they occasionally drank beer and even wine. (32) The Irish monks were at the same time instructed, that the external observance of fasts and abstinence does not in itself constitute sanctity, and that it is not enough to chastise the body, unless the soul be cured of malice and iniquity. (33). In fact, the greatest part of the Rule of St. Columbanus is relative to the necessity of suppressing cupidity and even a wish for superfluities, and of a total contempt of the things of this world; (34) the strict obligation of shunning vanity and pride, of observing chastity not only externally but inwardly in the mind, and of adhering to the straight rule of all the Christian virtues, but with discretion and prudence; the constant spirit of mortification, humility, patience, and abandonment of self will.

(23) St. Columbanus has in his Rule (cap. 3. De cibo et potu): “Cibus sit vilis et vespertinus monachorum, satietatem fugiens et potus ebrietatem, ut et sustineat et non noceat. Olera, legumina, farinae aquis mixtae cum parvo paximatio, ne venter oneretur et mens suffocetur; et enim utilitati et usui tantum consulendum est aeterna desiderantibus praemia; ideo temperandus est ita usus sicut temperandus est labor; quia haec est vera discretio, ut possibilitas spiritualis profectus cum abstinentia carnem macerante retentetur. Si enim modum abstinentia excesserit, vitium non virtus erit; virtus enim multa sustinet bona et continet. Ergo quotidie jejunandum est, sicut quotidie reficiendum est; et dum quotidie edendum est, vilius et parcius corpori indulgendum est, quia ideo quotidie edendum est, quia quotidie proficiendum est, quotidie orandum est, quotidie laborandum, quotidieque est legendum.” The word, paximatum, has been explained by some as meaning bread baked under embers, but is more usually understood of biscuit, and often occurs in old documents. One of them weighed six ounces, and Cassian says, (Collat. 19. cap. 4.) that two of them used to be given to each monk every day. (See Duncange at paximatum.)

(24) In the Poenitentialis or second part of the Rule of St. Columbanus (see Not. 15 to Chap. XIII.) it is ordered that, if any monk eats before None on those days, unless he be sick or infirm, he must fast for two days on bread and water. “Si quis ante horam nonam quarta sextaque feria manducat, nisi infirmus; duos dies in pane et aqua.” St. Aidan brought this practice from Ireland to Northumberland, where, according to his example, it was followed, except in the Paschal time between Easter Sunday and Whitsuntide, by the religious men and women, as Bede thus informs us (Eccl. Hist. L. 3. c. 5.): “Cujus (Aidani) exemplis informati, tempore illo, religiosi quique viri ac foeminae consuetudinem fecerunt per totum annum, excepta remissione quinquagesimae paschalis, quarta et sexta sabbati jejunium ad nonam usque horam protelare.” Whether St. Columbanus excepted the paschal time I do not find mentioned; but it is probable that he did. Ratramn of Corbie, who lived in the 9th century, goes still further, and says in his fourth book against the Greeks, that all the monks and persons belonging to religious communities throughout Ireland used to fast every day, except Sundays and holidays, until None or even later. There he writes, as quoted by Usher (Pr. p. 731); “Scotorum natio Hiberniam insulam inhabitans consuetudinem habet per monasteria monachorum seu canonicorum, vel quorumcunque religiosorum, omni tempore praeter Dominicam festosque dies jejunare, nec nisi vel ad nonam vel ad vesperam corpori cibum indulgere.” We have seen (Chap. xxx. §. 6.) that even in the latter part of the 12th century the Irish clergy in general, a great part of whom were monks, observed the practice of fasting almost every day until late in the evening. Many pious persons, hermits, &c. used to live merely on water herbs, cresses, and water, which they took at the close of the day. In the sixth or metrical Life of St. Brigid we read, that she and her virgins were wont for some time to go in search of such fare;

“*Vespere flumineas quaerebant fontibus herbas,
Antiqui soliti queis vitam ducere sancti
Frigida cum crispis sumebant pocula et herbis.*”

Tr. Th. p. 593.

We meet with in some Lives of Irish saints accounts of extraordinary fasting from any food for some days; but this excess was not authorized by the monastic rules, which required that, as the monks had daily duties to perform, they should eat every day.

(25) See Not. 105. to Chap. v.

(26) It has been said, that in this point the Irish followed the practice of the Greek church, whose weekly fast days are Wednesdays and Fridays, rather than that of the Roman. But the fact is, that the ancient Roman church had the same practice; and it does not appear, that the fast of Saturday was observed at Rome until some time, and apparently a late one, in the 4th century. It might seem that it was first introduced there by Pope Innocent I., (see the 6th lesson of the Roman Breviary at 28 July, and Platina at Innocent I.) whose pontificate began in 402 and ended in 417; but some writers undersand his approbation of it as confirming a practice already observed and not establishing a new one. (See Sandini, Vitae Pontif. Roman. at Innocent I.) St. Augustin, who was contemporary with that Pope, remarks, (Ep. 86. ad Casulanum) that in his time it was observed at Rome and in some Western churches, but that in others it was not. The first certain account we find of it is in the 26th canon of the council of Eliberis in Spain, held in the year 305. (See Bingham, Origines &c. B. xx. ch. 3. sect. 6.) I think he is mistaken in saying, that it was practised a little earlier at Rome. It was not received at Milan in the times of St. Ambrose, nor, I believe, for a considerable time after in the Gallican church, the discipline of which was brought to Ireland by St. Patrick. Wherever it was kept, this fast did not at first set aside that of Wednesday; but its observers had, instead of two, three fast days in the week. (Bingham, ib. B. xxi. ch. 3. sect. 6.) Wednesday was universally kept as a fast day in Ireland down to the times of Colgan. (See Not. 182. to Chap. xi.) From the long permanence of this fast, or at least abstinence, it has come to pass, that to this day there are numbers of persons in this country, who scrupulously abstain from flesh meat on every Wednesday in the year, Ware mentions, (Opusc. S. Patr. p. 99.) that some explain Dia Cedain, the Irish name for Wednesday, as signifying the first fasting day of the week. But O'Brien (Irish Diction. at Dia) gives a quite different etymology.

(27) The monks of Hy had a sort of sea-water pond, in which were kept sea-calves or seals for the use of the monastery (see Not. 183 to Chap. xi); for that kind of fish used to be eaten in those times. Their taking of other sorts of fish is mentioned by Adamnan (vit. S. Col. L. 2. cap. 19). St. Gallus was employed at Bregentz in fishing for the use of the brethren and of others. (Chap. XIII. §. II.)

(28) The holy bishop Cedd, who had been educated at Lindisfarne by Aidan and Finan, while strictly observing a Lent fast, used every day, except on Sundays, to take in the evening only a little bread, one egg, and a small quantity of milk mixed with water. (Bede, Eccl. Hist. L. 3. cap. 23.)

(29) St. Columba had sheep in Hy. (See Not. 183. to Chap. xi.) He had also cows, (Adamnan Vit. S. Col. L. 2. cap. 16.) whereas milk was much used by his monks. The Irish Columbian monks of Northumberland possessed some cattle. (See Chap. xviii. §. 1. and ib. Not. 5.) St. Bridgid had sheep, cows, and even swine. (Cogitosus, Vit. S. Brig. capp. 8, 16, and 20.)

(30) See above Not. 28.

(31) We read in the Life of St. Molua, (concerning whom see Chap. xii. §. 7.) that, on his being visited by St. Moedoc, bishop of Ferns, he ordered a calf to be killed to serve as part of an entertainment for him. But he afterwards discovered, that St. Meodoc did not eat flesh meat. (AA. SS. p. 221.) It is related (ib. p. 421.) that, on the holy bishop Aedus, son of Brec, arriving at the monastery of Inis-Bofinde in Lough-ree, the abbot St. Rioch, not knowing that the bishop abstained from such meat, prepared a great supper of it for him. St. Brigid used to treat guests and strangers with bacon and other sorts of meat. (Cogitosus, cap. 4 and 15.)

(32) The great St. Finnian of Clonard did not scruple to take a cup of beer on festival days. (See Chap. x. §. 5.) It is said in the first Life of St. Kieran of Saigir, (cap. 33.) that at a dinner, with which he entertained Kieran of Clonmacnois and the two Brendans, the Lord provided them with a sufficiency of wine.

(33) See Chap. xvi. §. 8.

(34) In the 17th chapter of the synod called of St. Patrick, after its being stated, that monks are persons who live solitary, without earthly property, under the authority of a bishop or abbot, we find the following words; "Non sunt autem monachi, sed Vactroperiti, hoc est, contemptores solliciti ad vitam perfectam in aetate perfecta." The meaning of this passage seems to be, that monks ought to be like the Vactroperiti, who despised all worldly things. Ware confesses (Opusc. S. Patr. p. 117.) that he did not know, to what language Vactro belongs. Dr. Ledwich (p. 423.) very wisely pronounces, that it is latinized from the Irish Vaigneas, solitude. But, as Ducange observes, Vactroperiti is the same as Bactroperatae, a name given to certain philosophers from their carrying bactron, a staff, and pera, a sack or bag. St. Jerome says of them, (ad. cap. 19 Matth.) "quod contemptores seculi, et omnia pro nihilo ducentes, cellarium suum vehebant." In the same chapter of the synod is added, "quia in frigore et nuditate, in fame et siti, in vigiliis et jejuniis vocati sunt."

§. v. The Irish monks used to live by their own labour, (35) and accordingly certain times of the day were assigned for their respective manual occupations, except on Sundays and festivals, which were spent in celebrating the divine offices. (36) The intervals between those times of the day were occupied in reciting psalms, anthems, and prayers, or the canonical hours, according to the office prescribed for each day. Having read these parts of the office together, every one was bound to pray privately in his own cell. They assembled again in the beginning of the night and read the first Nocturn, consisting of a certain number of Psalms. The second Nocturn, which contained an equal number, was read at midnight; but about twice that number was read early in the morning. A much greater number was read on Saturday night, coming Sunday, than on any other. St. Columbanus established a distinction between the long and the short nights of the year, as he thought it too severe to make the monks recite as many Psalms in the short ones as in the long ones; and accordingly he directed that, when the nights began to grow long, the number of Psalms should be augmented, and so proportionally until they reached their greatest length, and vice versa diminished according as the nights became shorter and shorter. (37) On the whole it appears, that our ancient monks used to read a much greater number of Psalms than is usually enjoined by the present discipline of the Catholic church; yet the canonical hours of the day, Prime, Tierce, Sexte, and None, were much the same as at present; for, independently of the annexed versicles and prayers, each of them consisted of only three Psalms. (38) Thus the monks were not overloaded with those long offices observed in some continental monasteries, and which scarcely allowed time for other occupations. (39) Consequently, although they were also bound to work more or less every day, except Sundays and holidays, they had leisure enough for study and for attending the instructions of the professors or lecturers, who, as we have seen innumerable instances of, were to be found in every Irish monastery. Time was allowed likewise for that most useful and laudable employment, which they were among the first to introduce into monasteries, viz. that of transcribing books, which was in itself a labour equivalent to any other, and in which many of them used to be engaged. (40)

(35) In the Life of St. Brendan of Clonfert it is laid down as a rule, that a monk ought to be fed and clothed by the labour of his own hands; “Monachum oportet labore manuum suarum vesci et vestiri;” and it is stated, that it was thus his 3000 monks maintained themselves. (See Chap. x. §. 7.) A similar rule is found in one of the visions of St. Fursey (See Vit. S. Furs. L. 1. cap. 26); “Qui vero in monasteriis degunt, cum silentio operantes suum panem manducant.” St. Moedoc, bishop of Ferns, used to join his monks in their agricultural labours. (See Chap. xiv. §. 10.) The monks, placed by St. Colman at Mayo, earned their bread with their own hands. (Chap. xviii. §. 2.) In a matter so clear I need not quote further instances.

(36) Columbkil, on occasion of the death of a Leinster bishop, named Columbanus, gave orders, that the monks, who were preparing on a working day to set about their daily labours, should rest on that day, saying, that he intended to celebrate the sacred mysteries of the Eucharist. (See Not. 182 to Chap. XI.)

(37) Rule of St. Columbanus, ch. 7. He observes, that it was the practice of some to read the same number of psalms every night, whether long or short, and that between night and morning or matines they used to meet in choir four times; 1. at the beginning of night, 2. at midnight, 3. at the crowing of the cocks, 4. in the morning.

(38) See ib.

(39) See, for instance, what Fleury has (Hist. Eccl. L. 63. §. 60.) concerning the practices of Clugni.

(40) Columbkil set a glorious example for his followers with regard to this occupation. We find him a short time before his death copying part of the Psalter. (See Chap. XII. §. 14.) Adamnan makes mention (L. 2. cap. 9.) of a book of hymns and other books transcribed by him. If we are to believe O'Donnel, (L. 3. cap. 42.) he left 300 manuscripts of sacred books in his own handwriting. Baithen, one of his chief disciples and his immediate successor in Hy, having written a copy of the Psalter, brought it to the saint, telling him, that it was necessary to get it revised by one of the brethren. Columbkil answered; "Why do you give us this trouble? for there is no mistake in the whole of it, except that one vowel, I, is wanting." This shows, how careful they were in rendering their transcripts correct. There is a proof of the attention paid to correctness also in the request made by Dorbeneus relatively to the transcribing of Adamnan's Life of Columbkil. (See Not. 44. to Chap. XIX.) In a Life of St. David of Wales, published by Colgan, (at 1 March) and written, I believe, in Ireland, as in great part it is taken up with accounts of Irish friends or disciples of that saint, the practice of writing in the monastery is mentioned (cap. 12.) as a usual occupation, after the monks had returned from their rural labours, just as was that of reading or praying. How ungrateful are some modern petty foggers in literature to those good and indefatigable monks, who have preserved for us so many monuments of ancient learning, history, poetry, &c.!

§. VI. The discipline observed by our monks was exceedingly strict. Penances were enjoined for the slightest transgressions and omissions relative to morality, observance of the Rule, and decent behaviour. Those penances consisted in the infliction of blows or stripes, fasting on one biscuit and water for two or more days, and in reading an additional number of Psalms. (41) The monks were bound to remain in the community, to which they had been first attached; but the abbot could permit or command them to go elsewhere, if he thought it would tend to their greater proficiency, or to the good of religion. (42) I find in one of the Irish canons the age for making the monastic vow marked at 20 years; (43) but whether that age was generally considered as sufficient, or whether it was required in all our old monasteries, I am not able to determine. The Irish monks, as well as the clergy at large, were distinguished from the laity by the tonsure, of which enough has been said already; (44) but they had no particular habit or form of dress, except such as became grave, sedate, and humble persons. They wore a long tunic made of wool, over which they sometimes threw the cuculla or mantle of the same material. Notwithstanding the variety of monastic rules, that existed in Ireland, there was no difference as to the colour of their garments; for they left the wool in the natural colour which it had received from the sheep. (45) Accordingly some of them were clad in white, some in black; for, besides white sheep, there were also black ones in Ireland; (45*) but there was no obligation as to using any particular colour.

(41) See the Poenitentialis or Supplementary Rule of St. Columbanus passim. The practice of inflicting stripes prevailed also in some monasteries of the Continent, ex. c. at Clugni. (Fleury. L. 63. §. 60.)

(42) This is the plain meaning of the 21st chapter or canon of the synod, called of St. Patrick, although the text is somewhat corrupt. Dr. Ledwich says, (Antiquities, &c. p. 406.) that in this canon are noticed the Sarabaites, a sort of independent monks, who lived as they pleased, two or three or a few more together, chiefly in cities and frequented places, under no Rule and without any superior, and whom St. Jerome represents as pests of the Church. (See Bingham, Origines, &c. B. vii. ch. 2. sect. 4.) But in the quoted canon there is not a word about them. Did the Doctor mean to state, that there were Sarabaites in Ireland? He refers also to the third canon of the synod of St. Patrick, Auxilius, and Isserninus. Now in this canon monks are not mentioned at all, the words of it being, "Clericus vagus non sit in plebe," the intention of which was, that every clerk should be attached to a church. Among the Irish monks there were none such as the Sarabaites; and we have seen, (above Not. 34.) that they are, without exception, defined persons living solitary &c. under the authority of a bishop or abbot. And by the 34th canon of said synod any monk rambling about without permission of his abbot is ordered to be punished; "Monachus inconsulto abbate vagulus debet vindicari."

(43) A viginti annis debet unusquisque constringi non adtestando sed voto perficiendo, ut est illud, Unusquisque sicut proposuit corde suo faciat, et ut vota mea reddam in conspectu Domini, quia, &c. (Synod of St. Patrick, cap. 17.) This does not mean, that persons under 20 years of age could not be received in the monasteries, and it was quite usual to instruct boys in them; but according to this regulation, although a young man might have an intention, and even declare it, to become a monk, he was not to be solemnly bound to the monastic state, until he had reached the age of twenty. And to this, it seems, is relative the distinction implied in the words adtestando and perficiendo. That was supposed to be a perfect age, i. e. an age, in which a person was able to judge, whether he could fulfil the duties of that state during the remainder of his life. Just before the words quoted above we read, "in aetate perfecta, hoc est, a viginti annis," &c.

(44) See Chup. xvii. §. 16.

(45) Jocelin writes (Vit. St. Patr. cap. 185.): "Super caetera indumenta (S. Patricius) cuculla candida amiciebatur, ut ipse habitus forma et colore monachus sui speciem, et candidatum hu- militatis et innocentiae repraesentare videretur. Unde et monachi in Hibernia S. Patricii sequendo vestigia per multa temporum volumina habitu simplici contenti erant, quem ovium ministrabat lana, qualibet extrinseca tinctura remota." The wool, which he alluded to, was usually white. Thus Adamnan makes mention (Vit. S. Col. L. 2. c. 44.) of the white tunic, candida tunica, of St. Columba; and in the 2d Life of this saint we read (cap. 6) that he instructed in Hy candidos monachorum greges. St. Cuthbert of Lindisfarne, who, whether an Irishman or not, followed the Irish practices, used the common sort of dress, but so as that his was not remarkable either for nicety or dirt. And hence it became a rule of his monastery, that no one should wear clothes of a variegated or precious colour, and that the monks should be content chiefly with such as the natural wool of the sheep did furnish. (Bede, Vit. S. Cuthb. cap. 16.) Of the cuculla of St. Columba we have seen elsewhere (Not. 175 to Chap. xi). Some cucullas were long, some short. That which Jocelin says was worn by St. Patrick, appears to have been long, as covering his other garments; and, as the Irish monks followed his example, we may suppose that theirs were long also.

(45*) Giraldus Cambrensis says, (Topogr. Hib. Dist. 3. cap. 10.) that the Irish wore thin woollens, (laneis enim tenuiter utuntur) by which, as appears from what follows, he must have meant woollen mantles, and that these were generally black, because the sheep were black in Ireland. Dr. Ledwich, in a chapter on the Ancient Irish dress, full of mistakes and mis-statements, tells us, (Antiq. p. 339.) that their reason for using black clothing was, that such was the colour of their bogs, their constant retreats. Now this great antiquary had just before quoted the passage of Giraldus, to which I have referred; but he could not resist his passion for casting some slur on the Irish nation. Giraldus assigns as the cause of that part of their clothing being black, that their sheep were black; but the Doctor brings in the bogs. He might as well have said, that dark colours were preferred at Rome, "Roma magis fuscis vestitur, Gallia rufis," (Martial, Epig. 129. L. 14.) because the Romans used to hide themselves in bogs. Where did he find, that they were the constant retreats of the Irish in ancient times? Was it in Borlase's account of the Irish rebellion, to which he refers, an author treating of the civil wars of Ireland in the 17th century? What an antiquary! Black sheep could not have been as general in Ireland in Giraldus' time as he seems to say, whereas Jocelin, his contemporary, in mentioning the white wool of St. Patrick's cuculla, and his example being followed by the Irish monks in not dyeing the wool for their garments, (see Not. prec.) plainly alludes to white wool. Giraldus spoke of only such parts of Ireland as he was better acquainted with.

§. VII. As I have happened to touch upon the mode of dress, I must be here allowed to make a few remarks on the beastly assertion of Ledwich, (46) that not only the Irish laity but even their ecclesiastics of old times were in the habit of not wearing any other dress than a short sort of mantle, that covered the shoulders and reached only to the elbows, leaving the rest of the body absolutely naked. (47) This he founds on a vile mis-interpretation of a canon of the Irish church, by which it was ordered that, if any clerk from the ostiarius (or door-keeper) up to the priest be seen without a tunic, or do not cover the turpitude and nakedness of his belly, he be despised by the laity and separated from the Church. (48) But the object of the canon was, the clergy should not appear dressed in a fashion, which was very general with young and military men, particularly of the lower orders, who below their upper dress, reaching to the elbows or waist, wore a sort of pantaloons covering in one piece the thighs, legs, and feet, but so tight and fitted so close to the limbs as to discover every muscle and motion of the parts, which it covered. (49) Pantaloons of this kind were justly considered as an indecent article of dress, and particularly unbecoming ecclesiastics, on which account the impropriety of it was marked in the strong terms, which occur in the canon, representing it as tantamount to real nakedness. Accordingly it was enacted under the penalty of excommunication, that no clergyman should appear, or be seen by others, except habited, at least, in a tunica femoralis, that is, a coat closed behind and before, which should reach, at least, to the knees, (50) This then is the sum total of what Ledwich has so shamefully misrepresented. (51) I may here observe, that in the canon there is no mention of bishops; for they always appeared in their full dress. The use of those pantaloons even by the laity was disapproved of; but, in spite of the exertions of the clergy and of others, it was retained by the lower orders until a late period. (52)

(46) Antiq. &c. p. 332.

(47) He charges the Anglo-Saxons with following the same practice, even down as late as the 12th century; and why? Because William of Malmesbury says, that the English wore clothes, which reached to the middle of the knees, and that their skins were punctured with ornamental figures. The latter part of this passage has nothing to do with the question; but surely, if their clothes reached to their knees, their dress was very different from that, which he attributes to them. Here he introduces one of his favourite nonsensical positions, viz. that the Irish were descended from the same stock with the Anglo-Saxons, than which nothing can be more false, unless our antiquary meant to go back as far as the times of Noah. The Irish were derived from a southern source, the Anglo-Saxons from a northern; their languages were essentially different, and so was their mythology; not to mention several other particularities, which it is not my province to inquire into.

(48) This canon is No. 6. of the synod, called of Patrick, Auxilius, and Isserninus, ap. Ware, Opusc. S. Patr. p. 42.) and is thus in the original; "Quicumque clericus, ab ostiario usque ad sacerdotem, sine tunica visus fuerit, aut turpitudinem ventris et nuditatem non tegat—pariter a laicis contemnentur, et ab Ecclesia separantur." In Martene's edition of this canon (Nov. Thes. Anecd. Tom. 4. col. 5.) the words, Patricius ait, are prefixed to it, and instead of simply tunica, we find tunica femorali, as also, instead of aut, it has quae; and after pariter it has condemnantur, et ab Ecclesia separabuntur. But St. Patrick could not have been the author of this canon, whereas it contains likewise an order for observing the Roman tonsure, an order, which could not have been made until, at the earliest, after the Southern Irish had received the Roman paschal computation and, what usually accompanied it, the Roman tonsure, which they did not prior to about A. D. 633. (See Chap. xv. §. 6.) Ware was mistaken in assigning this canon, whatever may be thought of the other canons of that synod, to St. Patrick and his companions; and hence he supposed, (ib. p. 124.) that the ancient author of the old catalogue of the three classes of Irish saints, (ap. Usher, Pr. p. 913, seqq.) of which I have elsewhere treated at large, was wrong in stating, that the two first classes used the old Irish tonsure. Now the fact is, that said author was right; and if St. Patrick had commanded the use of the Roman tonsure, the Irish clergy would never have adopted any other. Accordingly it follows, that the canon in question was passed some time in the 7th or 8th century. I say the 8th, because the MSS. whence D'Achery and Martene published their collections of Irish canons, were as old as that period.

(49) This sort of dress is described by Giraldus, who (Topogr. Hib. Dist. 3. cap. 10.) writes; “Caputiis namque modicis assueti sunt et arctis, trans humeros deorsum, cubito tenus protensis, variisque colorum generibus panniculorumque plerumque consutis; sub quibus phalingis laneis quoque palliorum vice utuntur, seu braccis caligatis, seu caligis braccatis, et his plerumque colore fucatis.” It is not my business to enter into a minute explanation of this passage, which is not as clear as Dr. Ledwich (Antiq. p. 339.) imagined. It would indeed be clear enough, were we to understand it as he does. For he introduces, besides the capuche, a jacket as placed between it and the braccae or pantalons. But Giraldus makes no mention of a jacket, unless it be supposed, that he comprized it under the name of capuche. And it is probable, that he did; whereas he places immediately beneath it either the phalingae or the braccae. But the Doctor, who understands by phalingae or fallin a jacket, makes him say, that the braccae were worn below the fallin. Now Giraldus has no such thing; and his plain meaning, as appears from the particle seu, is that below what he calls the capuche some wore the fallin, and others the braccae. The fallin was certainly not a jacket. According to O'Brien's and Shaw's dictionaries (at Fallain) it was the Irish cloak or mantle, and this corresponds with Giraldus' observing, that they were used palliorum vice. Yet I allow, that the poorer Irish wore a jacket; (see Walker's Histor. Essay on Irish dress, pl. 1. fig. 2.) and it seems that the fallin, which some of them wore, was only a sort of a petticoat. (See ib. pl. 1. fig. 6.) Yet Walker is sometimes incorrect on these points; for instance, he translates (p. 28.) Giraldus' words, phalingis laneis &c. as if he had said, that the Irish, or some of them, wore the fallin, besides large loose breeches or trowsers. Instead of besides he should have written or; nor had he any right to bring in the words large loose, particularly as he himself had (p. 3.) spoken of the straight bracca, that was fitted exceedingly close to the limbs. Trowsers, or trowses as in Ware's Antiquities (ch. 11.) and in Harris's additions (ch. 23.) is a mis-translation of the braccis caligatis of Giraldus, whereas he meant the tight sort of covering used by many of the Irish, and not the wide one called trowsers or trowses. Lynch (Cambr. Evers. p. 122.) gives a very accurate description of it in these words; "Apud Hibernos bracca indumentum est continuum, non intercisum, succos, tibialia, et foeminalia complectens quo uno ductu quis pedibus, suris, et foemoribus induat. Nec enim fluitans erat (ut ait Tacitus) sed strictum, et singulos artus exprimens—Inguinem tegunt quidem braccae, ita tamen ut plane nudare videantur, nisi longiora tunicarum peniculamenta eidem obtenderentur." His using nudare comes to the same point as the turpitudinem ventris et nuditatem of the canon. By longiora tunicarum peniculamenta he means the fringes of the short tunic or jacket, that hang down from it over the bracca. The reader will form a clear idea of both the jacket and bracca, or pantaloons, by looking over the figures of O'More's (of Leix) soldiers in two drawings ap. Ledwich, ib. at p. 354.

(50) The tunica foemoralis must, as the very name shows, be carefully distinguished from the short tunic or jacket. Figures of persons wearing it may be seen passim in Walker's Histor. &c. ex. c. pl. 1. fig. 1. III. fig. 1. 2. 3. &c. Ledwich has, (pl. 20 at p. 282.) after Walker, from paintings in the abbey of Knockmoy, similar figures, in some of which it comes down to the knees, or even lower, and in others not quite so far.

(51) The practice of the Protestant bishops, who, when appearing in public in the short dress used in our times, wear a kind of apron, might have taught him to explain the words of the canon in a manner quite different from what he has done.

(52) Lynch says, (loc cit.) that the higher orders had ceased before his times to wear them, but that the plebeians could not be persuaded to drop the use of them, until at length some time before the war, that began in 1641, they, partly of their own accord, and partly through the exhortations of the priests, exchanged them for breeches. He thinks, that the reason, for which they had been so much attached to the use of those pantaloons, was, that no sort of covering was so convenient for their running with that innate swiftness of foot, for which they were so remarkable.

§. VIII. In the canon now treated of there is a clause, relative to the wives of clerks, from which it has been inferred, that even our priests were married, at least, at the time when said canon was made. After the order for not being seen without the long tunic, and that for using the Roman tonsure, (53) it is enjoined, that the clerk's wife shall not walk out without having her head veiled. (54) Now, as in the text of the canon the name clerk comprizes the various orders from the lowest, the ostiarius, up to the priests, it may be supposed, that by a clerk's wife may be understood one also of a priest. Yet this is not certain; for the name priest might have been inserted not inclusively, but exclusively, as if it were said, that all the members of the clerical orders lower than that of the priest should wear the tunic reaching, at least, to the knees. For it may be conjectured, that the priests were not chargeable with following the lay fashion above described, and that only some of the younger clerks, including even deacons, had adopted it. As a priest could not have been in those times under thirty years of age, and as a peculiar appearance of gravity was required from him, it is hard to think, that he would have appeared in such a dress. According to this supposition, the regulation relative to the wives of clerks did not extend to priests. I have not met with a single instance of a married priest in Ireland until the arrival of the Anglo-Normans and Welsh, among whom such priests were to be found. (55) Yet I allow that the words of the canon seem to favour the marriage of the Irish clergy, at least of the orders inferior to the priesthood, although they do not agree with other documents. The abbot Commian, who was an Irishman, and in all probability lived in the seventh century, has in his penitential (56) a canon condemning the marriage not only of a monk, but likewise of a clerk, after he had devoted himself to God, and sentencing the delinquent to a penance of ten years, three of which on bread and water, besides abstaining from the use of matrimony. (57) There may have been a variety of practices in Ireland relative to this matter, but some other arguments, besides the quoted passage of the sixth Irish canon, would be necessary to prove, that our priests were allowed to have wives. Perhaps it will be said that, although a priest was not permitted to marry after his ordination, he might have been allowed to retain a wife, whom he had before it, as now practised in the Greek church, and that thus this canon may be reconciled with that of Cumian, who mentions after he had devoted himself to God. But I find no reasons for admitting, that this practice was ever received in Ireland; where, on the contrary, it seems to have been condemned. (58) This much is certain, that not only in the times of Giraldus Cambrensis, but likewise as far back as those of Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, there were no Irish married priests; for, if there were, he would undoubtedly have taken notice of a practice so contrary to the then general discipline of the Western church, as he did of other Irish customs, some of which were of much less importance.

(53) See above Not. 48.

(54) “Et uxor ejus si non velato capite ambulaverit, pariter” &c. Usher (Discourse of the Religion, &c. ch. 5.) take notice of these words, as indicating, that the Irish clergy were not prohibited from marrying. But he gives no other proof, except its being related, that St. Patrick was son of a deacon and grandson of a priest. This, however, does not prove, that the law of ecclesiastical celibacy did not exist in Ireland. He speaks of the clergy in general, but without the least allusion to bishops, as they are not mentioned in the canon. And, as already observed (Not. 75 to Chap. xxv.) he had changed his opinion with regard to them. As to what he says about the British clergy, it has nothing to do with the discipline of the Irish church. Toland (Nazarenus, Letter 2. Sect. 2. §. 12.) has followed Usher, adding what St. Bernard has about the eight so called archbishops of Armagh, who were married. But, as we have seen, those eight were merely nominal archbishops, as Toland well knew, who accordingly calls them absolute laymen. He talks also of the Culdees being married; but he tells us, (ib. sect. 3.) that said Culdees were commonly laymen. Whether they were or not, the Irish Colidei or Culdees were out of the question; and Toland observes, (ib.) that he confines his discourse to the Scotch Culdees alone, omitting those of Ireland. Yet Dr. Ledwich refers to Toland, as if he had said that the Irish Culdees were married; (see Not. II to Chap. xxxI.) and elsewhere he gives us with exaggeration the fable of the marriage of Celsus, archbishop of Armagh. (See Not. 75 to Chap. xxv.)

(55) See Chap. xxx. §. 6.

(56) Concerning this Penitential, or De poenitentiarum mensura, see Chap. xv. §. 8. and ib. Not. 55.

(57) This canon is in cap. 3. and in these words; “Si clericus aut monachus, postquam se De voverit, ad secularem habitum iterum reversus fuerit, aut uxorem duxerit, decem annis poeniteat, tribus ex his in pane et aqua, et nunquam postea in conjugio copuletur. Quod si noluerit, sancta synodus vel sedes apostolica separavit eos a communione et convocationibus Catholicorum.” (Compare with Not. 72. below.) By clericus Cummian must have understood only the clerks of the higher or holy orders, whereas those of the four minor ones, as they are now reckoned, were not prohibited from returning to the world and taking wives, unless we are to suppose, that his rules and those of the Irish church were more severe than those of others. And in fact the words, postquam Deo voverit, seem to indicate, that he alluded only to the higher orders.

(58) If we are to judge of the discipline of the Irish church from the treatise of St. Columbanus entitled Liber de poenitentiarum mensura taxanda, (ap. Bibl. Patr. Tom. 12. p. 21. seqq. A. 1677.) which is different from the penitential for monks annexed to his Rule, (see above Not. 24 and 41.) clergymen, whose wives, which they had before their ordination, were still living, were bound to abstain from them after they had taken orders. His 20th canon is as follows; “Si quis autem clericus, aut diaconus, vel alicujus gradus, qui laicus fuit in seculo cum filiis et filiabus, post conversionem suam iterum suam cognoverit clientelam, et filium iterum de ea genuerit, sciat se adulterium perpetrasse et non minus peccasse quam si ab fuventute sua clericus fuisset, et cum puella aliena peccasset, quia post votum suum peccavit, postquam se Domino consecravit, et votum suum irritum fecit; idcirco similiter septem annis in pane et aqua poeniteat.” That by clientelam he meant a wife is evident from the whole context, and is confirmed by a parallel canon of the penitential annexed to a Missal found at Bobbio (of which hereafter) and much the same as the Liber de poenitentiarum mensura, &c. The 12th canon of this penitential has; “Si quis clericus vel superior gradus, qui uxorem habuit, et post honorem iterum eam cognoverit, sciat se adulterium commisisse. Clericus quatuor, diaconus sex, sacerdos septem, episcopus duodecim, singuli in pane et aqua juxta ordinem suum.” Mabillon observes (Not. on this canon) that by clericus perhaps is meant a subdeacon. The rules of this penitential were in all probability founded on the practices of the Irish church.

§. ix. It is very probable, that the Roman liturgy and offices were universally received in Ireland about the end of the 12th century, and there can be no doubt that they were observed in those parts, where the English power prevailed. Giraldus Cambrensis, amidst all his grumbling, does not charge the Irish with differing in this respect from the English or Romans. The exertions of Gillibert, bishop of Limerick, had paved the way for setting aside the old various Irish liturgies, &c.; (59) but St. Malachy's authority and influence contributed much more to the establishment of the Roman practices. (60) Add the seventh canon of the synod of Cashel, held in 1172, in which is an injunction to the same effect. (61) Although this synod was not attended by the prelates of Ulster, yet we may safely infer from their adherence to the principles of St. Malachy, that they approved of that injunction. The apostolic legates, of whom there was a constant succession in Ireland during that century, undoubtedly took care to introduce and enforce the practices of the Roman system. Of the old Irish liturgies and offices no copy is, as far as I know, to be found, except perhaps of the one, and that the most remarkable, which was called Cursus Scotorum, or the liturgy &c. of the old Scots or Irish; which was brought to Ireland by St. Patrick, and was the only one observed during the times of the first class of Irish saints, and consequently for above 100 years. (62) I have had occasion to allude to it more than once, and to remark, that after the introduction of new liturgies or masses it was still followed by St. Comgall in Ireland, and by St. Columbanus, in the continent. (63) It has been said, that it was originally the liturgy of St. Mark the Evangelist; that it was used by St. Gregory Nazianzen and other Greeks, afterwards received by Cassian, Honoratus first abbot of Lerins, St. Caesarius, bishop of Arles, and the abbot Porcarius, also by St. Lupus of Troies and St. German of Auxerre, the friends of St. Patrick, who received it from them; and that it was retained by St. Comgall, &c. (64) This cursus continued in force, at least with the followers of St. Columbanus, for many years after that saint's death in 615. (65) How long it might have been kept up in Ireland by the monks of St. Comgall's institution, I am not able to discover. It must not be confounded with the liturgy usually called Gallicana. (66)

(59) See Chap. xxv. §. 10.

(60) See Chap. xxvi. §. 6 and 10, and xxvii. §. 5.

(61) See Chap. xxix. §. 3.

(62) See Chap. x. §. 4. It is called in the Catalogue of saints (ap. Usher, Pr. p. 913.) una missa, una celebratio.

(63) See Chap. 1. §. 5. x. §. 12. xiii. §. 14.

(64) Such is the account given in the tract on the Origin of Ecclesiastical offices, quoted by Usher, (Pr. p. 343, 840, and 917.) and published in Spelman's Councils, &c. (Vol. 1. p. 176, seqq.) and in Wilkins' (Vol. 4. p. 741, seqq.). Although written in a course style, and sometimes incorrect, owing perhaps to an unlearned transcriber, and containing various mistakes, some of which have been noticed by Usher, it is, however, worth copying. After giving an account of the cursus called the Gallican one, the origin of which he ascribes to St. John the Evangelist, and which, he says, was followed by St. Polycarp, and in the Gauls by St. Irenaeus, &c. the author continues; "Sed beatus Marcus evangelista, sicut refert Josephus et Eusebius in quarto libro, per totam Ægyptum vel Italiam taliter praedicaverunt, sicut unam ecclesiam, ut Omnis sanctus, vel Gloria in excelsis, vel oratione Dominica, et Amen universi tam viri quam foeminae decantarent. Tanta fuit sua praedicatio unita, et postea Evangelium ex ore Petri apostoli edidit. Beatus Hieronymus adfirmat ipsum cursum, qui dicitur praesente tempore Scotorum, beatus Marcus decantavit, et post ipsum Gregorius Nanzenenus, quem Hieronymus suum magistrum esse adfirmat. Et beatus Basilius, frater ipsius S. Gregorii, Antonius Paulus, Macarius, vel Joannes et Malchus secundum ordinem patrum decantaverunt. Inde postea beatissimus Cassianus, qui Livoronsi (Linerensi, or Lirinensi, Usher) monasterio beatum Honorium habuit comparem. Et post ipsum beatus Honoratus primus abbas, et S. Caesarius episcopus, qui fuit in Arelata, et beatus Porcarius abbas, qui in ipso monasterio fuit, ipsum cursum decantaverunt; qui beatum Lupum et beatum Germanum monachos in eorum monasterio habuerunt; et ipsi sub norman regulae ipsum cursum ibidem decantaverunt. Et postea in episcopatus cathedra (episcopatu cathedram) summi honoris, pro reverentia sanctitatis eorum, sunt adepti; et postea in Britannii vel Scottiis praedicaverunt, quae Vita beati Germani episcopi Antioderensis et Vita beati Lupi adfirmat. Qui beatum Patricium spiritaliter litteras sacras docuerunt, atque enutrierunt, et ipsum episcopum pro eorum praedicatione (per eorum praedicationem, Usher) archiepiscopum in Scottiis ac Britannii posuerunt, qui vixit annos centum quinquaginta tres, et ipsum cursum ibidem decantavit. Et post ipsum beatus Wandilochus senex et beatus Gomogillus (Comgallus), qui habuerunt in eorum monasterio monachos circiter tria millia. Inde beatus Wandilochus in praedicationis ministerium abbato (a beato, Usher) Gomogillo missus est, et beatus Columbanus partibus Galliarum destinati sunt Luxogilum (Luxeu) monasterium; et ibidem ipsum cursum decantaverunt. Et inde postea percrebuit formam (forma or fima) sanctitatis eorum per universum orbem terrum; et multa coenobia, ex eorum doctrina, tam virorum quam puellarum sunt congregata. Et postea inde sumpsit exordium sub beato Columbano, quod ante beatus Marcus evangelista decantavit. Et si nos non creditis, inquire in Vita beati Columbani et beati Eustasi (Eustasii) abbatis, plenius, invenietis, et dicta beati Athletii (Atthlati Usher) abbatis Ebovensis (Attala, abbot of Bobbio).’

From this author’s being so particular in tracing the history of the Cursus Scotorum, i. e. of the Irish, while he treats very slightly of four other courses or liturgies mentioned by him, it appears very probable, that he was an Irishman, and perhaps one of those, that lived in the continent. But, it may be said, if he were, would he have told us, that St. Patrick lived 153 years? This I suspect to be an erratum of a copyist; and it is plain that in his text, as it now exists, there are several errata. I cannot find, who was the blessed Wandilochus mentioned by him, except that he appears to have been one of the first companions of St. Columbanus, who set out with him from Ireland. They were twelve in all; but their names are not regularly recorded. (See Not. 5. to Chap. XIII.) What said author has about that cursus having been originally that of St. Mark, or as Mabillon explains it, (Disquisitio de Cursu Gallicano, § 1 in his work De Liturgia Gallicana) an Alexandrian liturgy, is curious, although I would not pretend to say, that it is certain. There is a liturgy, called of St. Mark, which had been found in Calabria by Sirlet, and was afterwards printed in Paris. But it is more than doubtful, whether St. Mark had any thing to do with it. (See Bona, Rer. Liturgic. L. 1. cap. 8.)

(65) It is plain, that it was used in the life-time of the author of the now quoted tract. Now he lived after the death of Eustasius and Attala, the former of whom succeeded St. Columbanus at Luxeu, and the latter at Bobbio.

(66) We have seen, (Not. 64.) that said author makes a distinction between them. We have another proof from its having been remarked, in opposition to St. Columbanus and his Rule, that the Mass, which he celebrated, differed in some points from that, which was usually observed in France in his times, that is, from the old Gallican liturgy, which was not set aside until long after in the reign of Charlemagne. Jonas relates (Vit. S. Eustasii, cap. 5.) that Agrestinus, an enemy of Columbanus' Rule, said, "Columbanum etiam a caeterorum ecclesiasticorum more desciscere, et sacra Missarum solemniam multiplicatione orationum vel collectarum celebrare." It is indeed probable, that the Gallican liturgy, strictly so called, (of which see Mabillon De Liturgia Gallicana) was introduced into Ireland during the period of the second class of Irish saints. In a Mass celebrated by Columbkil the name of St. Martin was mentioned among the commemorations. (See Not. 182. to Chap. xi.) Now as Mabillon observes, (ib. L. 1. cap. 5.) his name was commemorated in the Gallican liturgy. Columbkil might have received his Mass from the Britons David, Gildas, and Docus; (see Chap. x. §. 4.) and it is said, that the Britons followed the Gallican liturgy. Yet St. Martin's name might have been also in the Mass, which St. German and Lupus delivered to St. Patrick, that is in the Cursus Scotorum. Usher (Pr. p. 343.) and after him Stillingfleet (Antiquities of the British churches, ch. 4.) were much mistaken in the confounding those two liturgies together; for the one, which was delivered by Cassian, German, Lupus &c. was not, as they say, the Cursus Gallorum, which was supposed to have been derived from St. John, but the Cursus Scotorum attributed to St. Mark.

§. x. There are good reasons for thinking, that the Cursus Scotorum is still extant, and that it is the same as the ancient Missal, which Mabillon found in the monastery of Bobbio, and which, he says, was written about 1000 years before his time. (67) From its antiquity it is clear, that it must have been brought to Bobbio by St. Columbanus or some of his disciples; and hence arises a strong presumption, that it was the liturgy used by him. (68) The part of the Mass, called the Canon, is taken from that of the Roman liturgy, and agrees nearly with it as it is read at present; yet it has in the article, Communicantes after Cosmae et Damiani, the names of some other saints, among whom is St. Martin. (69) In this Missal there are few masses for saints. It has those for St. Stephen, the apostles James and John, the Cathedra S. Petri, the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, the Invention of the Holy Cross, the nativity of St. John the Baptist and his passion, Saints Peter and Paul, the king Sigismund, (70) St. Martin of Tours, and Michael the archangel. It has three Rogations before the Ascension, and two Masses for the dead, one in general, and another Missa sacerdotis defuncti. In it I find no Mass for any Irish saint, nor even mention of any one of them. This is the chief point, which may excite a doubt of its being the same as the Cursus Scotorum. Yet this difficulty can be easily removed by observing, that the respect paid by the Irish clergy to St. Patrick prevented them from adding any Mass to those contained in the Missal brought by him, and that they were loth to introduce their own saints into it. On the other hand this Missal is accompanied with a Penitential, (71) and what is exceedingly remarkable, one that agrees in very great part with that of St. Columbanus, called Liber de poenitentiarum mensura taxanda, (72) and in some points with the Penitential of Cumman. Accordingly the Penitential joined to the Missal may be supposed to have been intended for the use of the Irish church, and hence it becomes highly probable, that said Missal was also used by it. The antiquity of this Missal appears from the wording of the Creed, which we find in it ; for, although it is the same in substance as the Roman Creed, commonly called the Apostles' creed, yet several words are different. (73) To show, that the copy found at Bobbio was written in Ireland or, at least, by an Irishman, it is asserted, that the characters or letters are exactly of the same kind as those of ancient MSS. recognized to have been written by Irishmen. (74) Add, that, as is usual in such old MSS., certain vowels and consonants are frequently interchanged for each other according to a mode peculiar to the Irish ; (75) and that some eminent diplomatists think it probable, that St. Columbanus brought that Missal from his own country. (76) On the whole, although I do not pretend to decide on the matter, I cannot but think that said Missal was the one used by that saint himself, and that the only difference between it and the ancient Cursus Scotorum consists in his having added to it the Mass of St. Sigismund in compliance with the custom of the province of Besançon.

(67) He has published it in his Museum Italicum, Vol. 1. and, finding it different in various respects from the Liturgia Gallicana, and not well knowing what title to give it, has called it Sacramentarium Gallicanum. In a margin of the MS. is the name of Bertulfus, who in all appearance was the abbot of Bobbio of that name in the seventh century. He thought, that it was a particular Missal for the province of Becançon, in which was Luxeu, particularly as it contains a Mass for St. Sigismund, King of Burgundy. I have had already (Not 157 to Chap. XXI.) occasion to give a short account of this Missal ; but it is well worth some further observations.

(68) That it was is strenuously maintained by Doctor O'Connor (Res. Hibern. Scriptor. Ep. Nuncup. p. 130. seqq.). This did not occur to Mabillon, or at least he does not mention it. He says, that it was not for the use of Bobbio, as there is nothing in it about St. Columbanus or his disciples, or about monastic affairs. But surely it might have been a general Missal for the clergy both secular and regular ; and in such case there was no necessity for specifying monastic matters, or introducing into it the name of St. Columbanus, &c. Besides, that copy was probably written before the death of St. Columbanus.

(69) In that Missal the Canon appears in only what is called the Missa cottidiana (quotidiana) Romensis, and hence it appears, that, it was the only one used throughout the year. After Cosmae et Damiani, the last names in the Roman article Communicantes, come Hilarii, Martini, Ambrosii, Augustini, Gregorii, Hieronymi, Benedicti. We have seen, (Not. 66.) that St. Martin's name was in the Mass celebrated by Columbkil; and hence why may we not be allowed to conjecture, that his Mass was the same as that of the Missal of Bobbio? But, it will be said, the name of St. Gregory (i. e. in all appearance, of Pope Gregory) could not have been in a Mass celebrated by Columbkil, who died before him. Yet this and other names might have been added after Columbkil's death; and in fact such additions were far from being uncommon in ancient Missals. (See Bona, Rev. Lit. L. 2. cap. 12.) I am sure that the last name in that Mass of Columkil was Martini; for it was upon its being mentioned that he stopped the choir. (Nct. 182 to Chap. xi.) On the whole it is improbable, that Columbkil's Missal was not different from that of Bobbio, without our supposing that he followed (as hinted in Not. 66.) the liturgy strictly called the Gallican. Were this as certain as it is probable, it would follow of course, that the Missal of Bobbio contains the Cursus Scotorum.

(70) If it was the Cursus Scotorum, this Mass might have been added to it by St. Columbanus when at Luxeu.

(71) Mabillon (Pref. to the Missal of Bobbio) remarks, that this is a very singular circumstance, and almost the only instance to be met with.

(72) This must not, as I have already observed, (above Not. 58.) be confounded with the Penitential annexed to the Rule of St. Columbanus. We have seen (ib.) an instance of two parallel canons of said Penitentials, differing merely as to the number of years marked for penance. Several more such canons will be found on comparing them, and drawn up nearly in the same words, but sometimes not agreeing with regard to the length of the penitential times. Mabillon was not aware of this concordance; for he had not collated those penitentials. Ho found a trifling agreement of Canon 47 of that of the Missal with one of the other Penitential of Columbanus, that is, the one joined to the Rule, and two or three rather material parallelisms between it and the Penitential of Cummian, particularly that of Canon 28 of the Missal with one of cap. 3. of Cummian, which I have quoted above (Not. 57.), and between which and said Canon 28 the only difference is, that in the latter, instead of Si clericus aut monachus, we read simply Si quis clericus; and instead of decem and tribus we find duodecim and sex, whence it appears that the regulation by this canon was not severer than that of Cummian. But, if Mabillon had compared the Penitential, annexed to the Missal with St. Columbanus' tract De poenitentiarum mensura &c., he would probably have been led at least to suspect, that said Missal was the one used by the saint himself, and consequently contained the Cursus Scotorum.

(73) It runs thus; "Credo in Deum patrem omnipotentem, creatorem caeli et terrae. Credo in Jesum Christum filium ejus unigenitum, sempiternum, conceptum de Spiritu S. natum ex Maria V. Passum sub Pontio Pilato. Crucifixum, mortuum, et sepultum. Descendit ad inferna. Tertia die resurrexit a mortuis. Ascendit ad caelos. Sedit (sedet) ad dexteram Dei Patris omnipotentis. Inde venturus judicare," &c. The remainder exactly as in the Roman creed. I need scarcely tell the reader, that this Creed appears in said Missal at the Traditio Symboli, which used to take place on Palm Sunday, for the Competentes, but not as forming a part of the Mass; whereas the practice of repeating any Creed in the Mass was not observed in those times in any part of the Western church, except in Spain, where the reading of the Nicene Creed, or rather that of Constantinople, during divine service was introduced in the year 589; and which was imitated by the churches of France and Germany in the time of Charlemagne, but not received at Rome until A. D. 1014. (See Bona, Rer. Liturg. L. 2. cap. 8. and Bingham, Origines &c. B. x. ch. 4. sect. 17.)

(74) Dr. O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Scriptor. Ep. Nuncup. p. 135 and 142.

(75) Dr. O'Conor observes (ib. p. 136.) that the vowels e and i, o and u, as likewise the consonants b, p, and v, are constantly interchanged. He had remarked, (p. 134.) that stillae and stilla, appear in the Missal for stellae and stella, Josep for Joseph, osanna for hosanna, exorcidio for exorcizo. We have seen above Not. 73 sedit for sedet.

(76) Dr. O'Connor quotes from the great Benedictine work (Nouveau Traité de Diplom. Paris, 1757) the following passage concerning this Missal: " Elle tient peutetre de l'écriture Romaine, usitée dans les Isles Britanniques avant la conversion des Anglois. Dans cette écriture du VI on VII siècle l'e prend la place de l'oe et de l'i, et l'u celle de l'o. — Le savant Benedictin conjecture, que ce Sacramentaire (from Mabillon's Sacramentarium, &c.) y fut apporté de Luxeuil par St. Columban. On peut, avec autant de fondement, supposer, que ce Saint l'aura apporté de la Grande Bretagne en Franche Comté." Instead of Grande Bretagne they should have written l'Irlande; for surely they knew, that St. Columbanus was an Irishman, and went straight from Ireland to France.

§. 11. The Irish church had a very great number of canons peculiar to itself. Of those, which are said to have been enacted by St. Patrick, or by him and his fellow bishops, and many of which were undoubtedly of their formation, I have said something already. (77) They have been published from Spelman and elsewhere, and illustrated with learned notes by Sir James Ware. (78) After St. Patrick's times a multitude of canons was drawn up by various Irish synods, a vast number of which down to the eighth century is still extant; and out of large collections of them the learned Benedictine D'Achery has published very many of them, and others have been added by his confreres Martene and Durand. (79) I have often had occasion to refer to several of those canons; but it will not be amiss to give a general view of some of the more remarkable ones, following, as nearly as I can, the order, in which I find them as published by Ware, D'Achery, &c. In the synod, called of St. Patrick, there is a canon concerning excommunication, in which the excommunicated person is ordered to be rejected from communion and from table, mass and peace. (80) This canon is illustrated by another of an Irish synod, which distinguished six modes of excommunication, some greater, some lesser. (81) There is a canon prohibiting the rebaptization of persons already baptized, no matter by whom. This was plainly intended against the abettors of Donatist principles; for it assigns as a reason, that the seed is not infected by the iniquity of the sower. (82) It is somewhat singular, that one of the solemn times, besides Easter and Pentecost, for celebrating baptism was in the Irish church the festival of the Epiphany. (83) There is a canon concerning the propriety of taking out the holy sacrifice on Easter night. It states, that it may be taken to the faithful, which, strictly speaking, is not a taking out, because they believe in and receive Christ under the one roof of faith. (84) There is a prohibition against a man marrying the widow of his brother, (85) to which was added another condemning not only a man, who should act in that manner, but likewise a woman, that married the brother of her deceased husband, and sentencing the parties to rejection from communion until death. (86) With regard to other matrimonial regulations, I need not repeat here some Irish canons already quoted. (87) It is remarkable, that the system of the jubilee, as established in the Old Testament, was observed to a certain degree in Ireland; but with what modifications it is difficult to determine, although there are various canons relative to it. (88) Some canons enjoin on the clergy not to bring any suits before infidel judges. (89) These must be very ancient, as are also some others, in which infidels are mentioned, such as that which prohibits alms offered by Gentiles to be received into the church. (90) Several canons are relative to the duties of princes, the respect and obedience due to them, and to not speaking ill of good ones. (91) With regard to sending out of Ireland for decisions on difficult ecclesiastical matters, there is a canon ordering such questions to be referred to the Apostolic see. (92)

(77) Chap. VIII. §. 3.

(78) He has them among the Opuscula S. Patricio adscripta, and in the following order; 1. Synodus S. Patricii consisting of 31 capitula or canons. 2. Nine other canons attributed to St. Patrick. 3. Synodus episcoporum, id est, Patricii, Auxilii, Isser-nini, containing 34 canons. 4. Three canons ascribed to St. Patrick, besides two others not said to have been drawn up by him, one of which is expressly stated to have been made by an Irish synod. 5. Certain rules, called Proverbs of St. Patrick, chiefly for the direction of ecclesiastical judges. See also the concilia M. B. &c. of Spelman, Vol. 1. and of Wilkins, Vol. 1.

(79) The collection by D'Achery is in his Spicilegium, Tom. 9. p. 1. seqq. and in De la Barre's edition of it Tom. 1. p. 492. seqq. He says in the Monitum, that the Irish canons, that follow, were drawn up before the eighth century, and selected by him from a great and ancient MS. collection of canons, consisting of 65 books divided into several capitula or articles. Having observed that this collection is valuable, utpote continuata serie locis S. Scripturae, conciliorum, et SS. Patrum scite admodum ac prudenter insertis alternata, he apologizes for having omitted a considerable number of said canons; 1. because many similar canons may be found elsewhere; and 2. because he shunned the labour of correcting the manifold mistakes and solecisms, with which the MS. abounded, having been copied by an ignorant person unacquainted with Latin. Accordingly he picked out only the most remarkable canons, particularly such as were decreed in Irish synods. For it is to be recollected, that in said great collection there are several canons copied from those of foreign councils, besides some sentences or passages from Gildas and others. D'Achery followed two MSS. one of the monastery of Corbie, the other of that of St. Germain. He says, that the collection was made about the eighth century (in the margin Anno circ. 790) and quotes a passage from Abedoc, the original writer of it, who has in the end; "Abedoc clericus ipse has collectiones conscripsi iacinosae conscriptionis, Haellucar abbate dispensante, quae de sanctis Scripturis, vel divinis fontibus hic in hoc codice glomeratae sunt; sive etiam decreta, quae sancti Patres et synodi in diversis gentibus vel linguis construxerunt. Afterwards Martene found a more correct copy of it in the Bigot Library at Rouen, which had belonged to the monastery of Tiscam, and thence inserted in the Thesaurus novus Anecdotorum (Tom 4. p. 1. seqq.) a large number of canons, which D'Achery had omitted. He mentions also the names of various synods, by which said canons had been made, such as Synodus Fervensis, Consulensis, Valensis, Laudatae, Erenensis, Hibernensis, Ancoritana, Luci Victoriae, Sapientia, &c. Some of these names do not indicate places; and such of them as do I confess I am not able to explain, excepting the synodus Hibernensis, which occurs several times likewise in D'Achery's collection, and which must mean not a single Irish synod, but divers ones called in general Hibernensis. Martene mentions also a synod of N. Britain, and gives Excerpta de libris Romanorum et Francorum, the Canones Adomnani (of which see Chap. XVIII. §. 14.) a Libellus de Remediis peccatorum chiefly from Theodore of Canterbury, besides canons from the book of David (of Wales) and some articles from Gildas. In both D'Achery's and Martene's collections there are some canons the same as in Ware's, although now and then with a slight variation of words. In the collection of canons, &c. called Excerptiones or Excerpta from the Jus Sacerdotale of Ecgbert, archbishop of York, who lived in the eighth century, by Hucarius Levita, that is, a deacon, there are also some Irish canons, and a Synodus Hibernensis is now and then quoted. This collection is in Wilkin's Councils &c. Vol. 1. p. 101. seqq. Hucarius was perhaps the same as Haellucar above mentioned, who was fond of collecting canons, and might have, when only a deacon, drawn up those Excerptiones, before he directed, when abbot, Abedoc in compiling the great collection in 65 books. It is not to be wondered at, that the Irish church had a great number of canons; for one of her ancient decrees lays down, that councils be held twice in the year; "Sancta synodus bis in anno decrevit habere concilia." (Ap. Usher, Discourse on the Religion, &c. ch. 6.) Perhaps by Sancta synodus was meant the council of Nice, which, as well as other councils, had established that rule as to provincial synods; but from its being repeated in our canons we may suppose, that it was observed in Ireland.

(80) It is at cap. 4. in these words; Audi Dominum dicentem : Si tibi non audierit, sit tibi velut gentilis et publicanus. Non maledices, sed repelles excommunicatum a communione et mensa, et missa, et pace. Et si haereticus est, post unam correptionem de-vita.

(81) D'Achery has from L. 39. cap. 1. "Synodus Hibernensis sex modos dicit, a celebratione, a communicatione Missae, a cohabitatione, a benedictione, a colloquio pacifico, a commeatu." (Compare with Not. 32. to Chap. XIII.)

(82) This canon is in cap. 7. of the synod of St. Patrick; "Statuunt ne rebaptizati (sint) qui Symboli traditione (traditionem) a quocunque acceperunt, quia non inficit semen seminantis iniquitas." It mentions the delivery of the Creed as the usual preliminary to baptism. It is by no means relative to the question of the validity of baptism administered by lay persons, as Ledwich supposes, Antiqu. &c. p. 423. But enough has been said already (Not. 101. to Chap. XXIV.) concerning his unlearned effusions on this point.

(83) In cap. 19. of said synod we read; "Octavo die Catechumeni sunt; postea solemnitatibus Domini baptizantur, id est, Pascha, Pentecoste, et Epiphania." Without entering into the Practice of some Eastern churches, and that, although disapproved of, followed in Spain and Sicily, it is known that Epiphany was a solemn time of baptism down to a rather late period in the African churches, as appears from Victor Uticensis referred to by Bingham; (Origines, &c. B. XI. ch. 6. sect. 7.) to whom I may add, that, as Tillemont relates, (Mémoires, &c. Tom. XVI. p. 556.) it was on the night of Epiphany A. D. 484. that St. Eugenius, bishop of Carthage, cured one Felix of blindness at the time of blessing the baptismal font for those that were to be baptized. It is not improbable, that the Irish founded their practice on some African canons.

(84) It is in cap. 13. of the said synod, and entitled De Sacrificio; "In nocte Paschae si fas est ferre foras. Non foras fertur, sed fidelibus deferatur. Quid aliud significat quod in una domo sumitur agnus, quam sub uno fidei culmine creditur et communicatur Christus ?"

(85) It is in cap. 25. of the same synod, and has been quoted above Not. 51. to Chap. xxvi.

(86) This canon is among what are called Judicia Compendia ap. Martene (loc. cit. col. 19.) and is thus expressed; “Vir si nupserit duabus sororibus, vel mulier duobus fratribus, abjiciantur a communione usque ad mortem; verum tamen in exitu vitæ propter misericordiam, si in columes permiserint hujus conjunctionis vincula dissolvere, poenitentiam sequantur. Quod si defecerint, in talibus nuptiis difficilis est poenitentia permanentibus.”

(87) See, for instance, Notes 96 and 97. to Chap. xxiv.

(88) One of them is in cap. 30. of the Synod of St. Patrick in these words; “Nunquam vetitus (vetitum) licet, verum observandæ sunt leges Jubilæi, hoc est, quinquaginta anni, ut non adfirmantur incerta veterato temporis.” Ware has another (Opuse. S. Patr. p. 118.) from an Irish synod, entitled De his quæ non eludit Jubilæus, which enters into distinctions concerning the sorts of property comprized or not under the law of the Jubilee. D’Achery has from Lib. 35. some canons relative to it, one of which (cap. 8.) is thus headed; “De eo quod observandæ sunt leges Jubilæi etiam in novo” (Testamento). This system must have been introduced and kept up with the concurrence and approbation of the civil power, as indeed is plain from the very terms of some of those canons. It seems to have originated in the mode of tenure, by which the Irish tribes and septs held their lands.

(89) The first of the nine canons attributed to St. Patrick (see above Not. 78.) is entitled “De judicio clericorum, ut non sit apud iniquos, aut apud infideles;” then it has, “Omnis mundialis sapiens, si (etsi) sapiens sit, non judicet judicia Ecclesiæ.” Ware (loc. cit. p. 119.) quotes another to the same purpose; “Clericus, qui causam suam, sive justam sive injustam, ad judicium alterius fidei judicis provocat, excommunicetur.”

(90) Can. 13. of the synod of Patrick, Auxilius, and Isserinus.

(91) See the 2d and 3d of the nine canons above mentioned, and the rules about princes ap. D’Achery from Lib. 24. (in which passages are quoted, in the name of St. Patrick as the author, from De abusioibus seculi) and from Lib. 36, some of which, however, relate to ecclesiastical chiefs.

(92) It is the 6th of the nine canons ap. Ware, and in L. 20. cap. 5. ap. Dachery, premised by the words, Patricius ait. Having quoted it and made some remarks on it already, (Not. 35. to Chap. xv.) I need not repeat it here.

§. 12. The marriage of a nun was considered as adultery, and punished by excommunication. But, should she repent, and quit that state, she was to do penance, and not to live near the man, whom she had married. (93) There is a caution given not to break ecclesiastical unity, which is recommended by the example of the first believers. (94) Next after this is a canon declaring the punishment of a person, who had robbed a church, which must have been enacted in one of those mixed assemblies so common in Ireland, in which princes and chieftains used to sit jointly with the clergy. It orders, that his hand or foot be cut off; or that he be thrown into prison, or exiled and make double restitution, and swear not to return until he has fulfilled his penance. (95) I find a canon, purely ecclesiastical, whereby three years penance is imposed for such a theft, and in case of a murder in a holy place seven years, both penances to be performed in a state of pilgrimage. (96) Penances were also enjoined, but not so severe, for every common theft; (97) and there was a general order to drive thieves, robbers, and plunderers out of the Church. (98) The age for a priest is fixed at his thirtieth year, and for a bishop at the thirtieth, fortieth, or fiftieth. But if a man had been married until he was thirty years old, and wished to become a clergyman, he was bound to remain a subdeacon for five years, and a deacon for five years more, after which he might be ordained a priest in his fortieth year. (99) A bishop was to be consecrated with the consent of the clergy, laity (of the diocese), and of the bishops of the whole province, chiefly the metropolitan. (100) No bishop was allowed to appoint his successor; but the appointment was to take place after his death. Yet he might, with the consent of a synod and the approbation of the people of the district, ordain, towards the end of his life, a bishop to succeed him. (101) With regard to the Divine service, a canon states, that the Church offers to God, 1. for itself; 2. for the commemoration of Jesus Christ; and 3. for the departed souls. (102) This last oblation is explained in another, according to which the Church offers for the souls of the deceased in four ways; for the very good the oblations are mere thanksgivings; for the very bad they are consolations of the living; for those not very good they are made for the obtaining of full remission; and for such as were not very bad, that their punishment may be rendered more tolerable. (103) By punishment, or, as the original has, damnatio, we must understand not eternal punishment or damnation, but the purgatorial sufferings; whereas, besides the universal rule of not offering for souls, of whose being in hell no doubt was entertained, there is an Irish canon directing, that the holy sacrifice be not offered for such deceased persons as were guilty of the sin unto death, that is, as most probably meant by it, final impenitence. (104) There is a very severe canon against persons, who falsely accuse others, depriving them of communion until the end of their lives. (105)

(93) The 17th canon of the synod of Patrick, Auxilius, &c. is as follows; Virgo, quae voverit Deo, permanet casta, et postea nupserit carnalem sponsum, excommunicationis sit donec convertatur. Si conversa fuerit, et dimiserit adulterium, poenitentiam agat, et postea non in una domo nec in una villa habitent."

(94) The first of the three particular canons ascribed to St. Patrick (see above Not. 78) is entitled De unitate subditorum, after which we read; "Quis ergo audet scindere unitatem, quam nemo hominum solvere vel reprehendere potest? Then comes a quotation from Acts iv. 32. seqq. Instead of Quis ergo that sentence begins ap. Martene (from L. 21. cap. 10.) with Synodus di- cit; Si quis autem, &c. and ends with anathema sit, thus forming a canon.

(95) “ Qui furatus fuerit pecuniam ab ecclesia sancta, ubi martyres et corpora sanctorum dormiunt, illius manus vel pes circumcidatur, aut in carcerem mittatur, aut in peregrinationem ejiciatur et restituat duplum; et jurabit quod non revertetur donec impleverit poenitentiam.” This canon, although attributed to St. Patrick, could not have been made in his time, as the Irish Christian princes were not as yet powerful enough to establish such a law. There is a similar canon, and called an Irish one, in No. 74 of the Excerptiones from the Jus Sacerdotale of Ecgbert, and another in D’Achery’s collection from L. 28. cap. 6.

(96) It is in D’Achery from L. 42. cap. 15. “ Quicumque reliquias episcoporum vel martyrum (alluding to holy places) homicidio violaverit, septem annis peregrinus poeniteat; si vero furto, tribus annis.” After this, rules are laid down for cleansing the pollutions of such places.

(97) See canon 15. of the synod of Patrick, Auxilius, &c.

(98) “ Synodus; Fures, et latrones, et raptores de Ecclesia ejiciendi sunt;” ap. D’Achery from L. 41. cap. 3.

(99) L. 1. cap. 9. ap. D’Achery.

(100) The canon on this point (ap. D’Achery ib. cap. 5.) was originally of a council of Carthage, as observed by D’Achery. Considered relatively to Ireland, it must be understood of the bishops of regular sees; for, as has been often observed already (ex. c. Chap. xxiv. §. 12. and Not. 104. to Chap. xi.) the Irish church had Chorepiscopi, whose appointment and consecration did not require all that apparatus. We have also seen, that those Chorepiscopi used to be consecrated by one bishop; but such was not the case with regard to the bishops of established sees, whereas for their consecration three bishops, at least, were required in Ireland as well as elsewhere. Thus we read in the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, (L. 2 c. 43.) that, when consecrating Carellus for the church of Tammacha in Hua-nonella (Tirellil, Sligo), he was assisted by the bishops Bron and Bitaeus juxta Ecclesiae consuetudinem. Whether such consecration took place or not, is of little consequence; but the pointing to the custom of the Church adds to the proofs of the rule of consecration by no fewer than three bishops having been observed by the Irish church.

(101) D'Achery has (ib. cap. 17.); "Synodus ait; Nullus episcopus successorem in vita sua faciat, sed post obitum ejus boni bonum eligant. Item, Synodus definivit episcopum ordinare successorem in exitu vitæ consensu synodi et regionis ipsius sententia, ne irritum fiat."

(102) This canon is from L. 2. cap. 9. ap. D'Achery; "Synodus; Nunc Ecclesia multis modis offert Deo; primo pro seipsa; secundo pro commemoratione Jesu Christi, qui dixit, Hoc facite in meam commemorationem; tertio pro animabus defunctis."

(103) It is in cap. 20. ib. thus expressed; "Synodus ait; Quatuor modis offert Ecclesia pro animabus defunctorum. Pro valde bonis gratiarum actiones sunt, in quibus nihil oblatio habet quod debeat; pro valde malis consolationes vivorum; pro non valde bonis, ut plena remissio fiat; pro non valde malis, ut tolerabilior fiat damnatio ista." Nothing can be more contrary than this canon to Usher's system relative to the practice and doctrine of the Irish church in praying for the dead. (See Not. 157. to Chap. XXI.)

(104) Cap. 12. among the thirty-one of the synod of St. Patrick (see above Not. 78.). I have elsewhere (Not. 157. to Chap. XXI.) referred to this canon, the original of which is headed, De oblatione pro defunctis; then follows; "Audi Apostolum dicentem; Est autem peccatum ad mortem, non pro illo dico ut roget quis. Et Dominus, Nolite donare sanctum canibus. Qui enim in vita sua sacrificium non merebitur accipere, quomodo post mortem illi poterit adjuvare." The unfortunate persons here alluded to were such as led notoriously bad lives, and could not be brought to show even symptoms of repentance. They were different from those, called very bad in the canon, (Not. prec.) who might have been so without publicly appearing as hardened obstinate sinners.

(105) "Synodus; Qui falso accusant fratres, usque ad exitum vitæ non communicent. (Ap. D'Achery from L. 16. cap. 13.) From the word, fratres, it might seem, that this canon was relative to the brethren in monasteries; but it may be well understood of persons in general bearing false witness against their neighbours.

§. XIII. I find a singular canon declaring that an oath of a son or daughter, unknown to the father, one of a monk without the knowledge of his abbot, and that of a boy, are void. (106) Among many regulations relative to Church property there is, alluding to pious donations, particularly, it seems, made by will, one, in which it is ordered, that sons, or brothers, or relatives be not defrauded of their due, and that the church do receive only a certain portion, called the portion of God, leaving to the rightful heirs what they are justly entitled to. (107) A spirit of disinterestedness was required from the clergy; and accordingly there was a canon enjoining, that the superfluous of a priest, or whatever he possessed beyond his wants, should be given to the church. (108) This was intended partly for the use of the church itself, such as for repairs, necessary expenses, &c. and partly for the poor, in the same manner as the usual offerings of the faithful, concerning which there are two canons; one empowering the bishop to divide them between the church and the poor, and another condemning a clergyman, who should seize upon said offerings, to be removed from the church. (109) We find some canons relative to the ecclesiastical lands or tracts, called Terminus, and their boundaries or marks. "Let the Terminus of a holy place have marks about it—Wherever you find the sign of the Cross of Christ, do not do any injury.—Three persons consecrate a Terminus of a holy place, a king, a bishop, and the people." (110) There are several canons respecting succession to property, wills, debts, pledges, bargains, &c. which were evidently drawn up in those mixed assemblies, above mentioned, of clergymen and laymen. (111) Among the Irish canons there are two taken from the council of Gangra in Paphlagonia, which was held against the heretic Eustathius and his followers, who, besides other errors, condemned matrimony, and taught that married persons could not be saved. By these canons persons, observing virginity to please the Lord, are ordered under pain of anathema not to insult married persons, nor to express an abhorrence of marriage or of persons engaged in it. (112) They are by no means relative to the question of marriage of the clergy, as a certain author, who was always raving about matrimony, strives to insinuate. (113) But there is a canon, whereby clerks are prohibited to frequent women, not their relations, and are ordered to live with no other females than their mother, or aunt, or sister, or niece, so as to guard against even the suspicion of scandal. (114) In other respects the clergy were bound to observe a very grave and strict line of conduct. For instance, they were not allowed to be spectators of games or sports under pain of degradation; (115) nor, under the same penalty, to walk about in fairs or markets, unless they wanted to buy something. (116) And a clergyman, singing at a banquet, and not edifying religion, was liable to an excommunication; as was also a swearing clergyman. (117) There are some very remarkable canons relative to matrimonial continence, prescribing abstinence from the exercise of conjugal rights at certain stated times, among which are mentioned the three lents or chief fasting seasons of the year. (118) I shall quote only one canon more, which is that against leaders of barbarians, that is of invaders, plunderers, and destroyers. Such leaders are condemned to penance of fourteen years. (119)

(106) D'Achery has it from L. 34. cap. 5. "Synodus Hibernensis; Juramentum filii aut filiae nesciente patre, juramentum monachi nesciente abbate, juramentum pueri, irrita sunt."

(107) This canon is from L. 41. cap. 6. in these words; "Synodus; Nullum oportet fraudare filios, aut fratres, aut propinquos. Item, Ecclesia non nisi partem Dei accipiat: cum enim heres mundi venerit, retrahet ea quae mundi sunt." According to a fixed rule (L. 2. c. 14.) a certain part of the property of a deceased person was reserved for the priests, that is, for the use of the church, including their maintainance, and for his funeral obsequies, beyond which, in virtue of this canon, the church was not allowed to exact or receive any more. According to the sixth decree of the council of Cashel it was the third part of a man's moveable goods. (See Chap. xxix. §. 3.)

(108) Ap. D'Achery, L. 2. cap. 20. "Synodus decrevit, ut sacerdos omne, quod superfluum habet, det in Ecclesia, et ut quantum Ecclesiae dimiserit tantum Ecclesia demat de superfluis ejus."

(109) The 25th canon of the synod of Patrick, Auxilius. &c. is as follows; "Si quae a religiosis hominibus donata fuerint diebus illis, quibus pontifex in singulis habitaverit ecclesiis, pontificalia dona, sicut mos antiquus, ordinare, ad episcopum pertinebunt, sive ad usum necessarium, sive egentibus distribuendum, prout ipse episcopus moderabit." Then comes canon 26. ib. "Si quis vero clericus contraverit, et dona invadere fuerit deprehensus, ut turpis lucri cupidus ab Ecclesia sequestretur."

(110) D'Achery has from L. 42. cap. 11. "Synodus Hibernensis; Terminus sancti loci habeat signa circa se---Synodus dicit; Ubi-cumque inveneritis signum Crucis Christi, ne laeseritis—Tres personae consecrant terminum loci sancti; rex, episcopus, populus." Of what was meant by Terminus in the ecclesiastical sense I have treated already (Not. 63 to Chap. xxvi.). It appears, that crosses used to be erected in such holy places, and that this might have been done by either a king, a bishop, or by the people. For it is more probable, that this is the meaning of the canon, than that all the three parties were to concur in rendering a place a Terminus.

(111) See ap. D'Achery from Libb. 31, 32, 33.

(112) D'Achery has these canons from L. 43. cap. 2. "Synodus; Si quis ex his, qui virginitatem propter Dominum servant, extollitur adversus conjugatos, anathema sit.—Item, Unusquisque, qui virginitatem custodit, propter Dominum faciat, non propter execrationem conjugii; qui enim virum fidelem et religiosam foeminam detestatur, aut culpabiles aestimat, anathema sit." These canons were copied from the ninth and tenth of the council of Gangra, and also from the first.

(113) The reader will easily perceive, that I allude to Dr. Ledwich, who touching (Antiq. &c. p. 325.) on the former of these canons introduces the Trullan canons, &c. concerning the marriage of the clergy. Now neither in that canon, nor in the one annexed to it, is there a word relative to the clergy; but this antiquary, with his usual blundering logic, infers that, because the Irish church, following the council of Gangra, condemned the Eustathian impiety, it therefore authorized the marriage of clergymen! He boasts (ib. p. 422.) of having perused with care all our printed canons, and explained many of them; but from the specimen, which he has given us, (ib. seqq.) a reader will be able to judge of his vaunted explanations.

(114) Martene has this canon from Lib. 9. “ Clerici frequentandi extraneas mulieres non habeant potestatem, sed cum matre, vel thia filia, sorore, nepte, tantum vivant, de quibus omnibus nefas est aliquid quam natura constituit suspicari.” The words, thia filia, if, as it seems, they are to go together, must mean an unmarried aunt; for thia signifies an aunt. (See Ducange at Thia.) But, if they be understood of two distinct persons, and that filia mean daughter, a case is supposed of a clerk having been married before he became an ecclesiastic, and of his having a daughter, that survived her mother. Be this as it may, the canon is plainly contrary to the opinion, that the Irish clergy were, at least in general, allowed in ancient times to have wives. (Compare with §. 8. above.)

(115) “ Omnis clericus, qui ludum spectare desiderat, degradetur.” Ap. D’Achery, from L. 39. cap. 14.

(116) Martene has from Lib. 9. “ Clericus, qui non procmendo aliquid in nudinis vel in foro deambulatur, ab officio suo degradetur.” I suspect, that by degradetur is to be understood in these two canons not total degradation from the clerical order, but merely a temporary suspension.

(117) We read ap. Martene ib. “ Clericus inter epulas cantans, fidem non aedificans, sed auribus tantum pruriens, excommunicatus sit—Clericus jurans excommunicandus est.” The punishment in the former case probably refers to one of those minor sorts of excommunication mentioned above §. 11. and Not. 81.

(118) D’Achery has the following regulations from L. 44. cap. 11. “ Synodus Hibernensis; In tribus quadragesimis anni, et in Dominica die, et in feriis quartis et in sextis feriis, conjuges continere se debent.—Item, in omnibus solemnitatibus, et in illis diebus, quibus uxor praegnans, hoc est, a die quo filius in utero ejus motum fecerit, usque ad partus sui diem ---Item, a partu per 36 dies si masculus, si vero filia 46 dies.---Item, habitantibus illis in habitu religioso copulari non permittitur." Some have supposed, that this canon or canons, down to the last Item, belonged to the council of Eliberis or Elvira in Spain, because it appeared in some collections as from Concilium Helibernense. But Baluze in his Notes to Regino observes, (Not. at No. 328. Lib. 1. p. 571.) that in two very old MSS. the synod, in which said rules were established, is called Ebernensia. He refers also to D'Achery's Synodus Hibernensis, and concludes that it is a mistake to attribute them to the council of Eliberis. He remarks also, that some other canons, attributed to that council by Burchard and Ivo, are in the Irish collection of Corbie. As to the three lents, D'Achery thought, that, besides the great lent before Easter, the other two were the one after Pentecost and that prior to Christmas, such as are mentioned in a Capitulary of Charlemagne. But, as there were different usages with regard to fasting seasons in various churches, it is not easy to determine, which, independently of the great lent, were the two other ones of the Irish. Some churches had four lents, one for each of the four seasons of the year; others likewise had four, but not corresponding with the different seasons. Some had stated fasts for almost every month in the year, distinct from the usual weekly fasts. (See more in Bingham's Origines, &c. B. XXI. ch. 2.) Yet I believe, that one of our Irish lents was that kept before Christmas, which, according to the first council of Macon, held in 581, began after St. Martin's day, and continued until Christmas day, but so as that fasting was required only on three days in each week, Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, to be observed according to the rules of the real or great lent. This was in fact a mere addition of Monday to the usual fasts of the week. Other councils shortened still more this sort of lent by reducing it to the last week before Christmas. (See Bingham, ib. sect. 4.) It is likewise to be recollected, that the word quadragesimis in the above Irish canon is not to be understood of periods of precisely 40 days, but as indicating certain fixed times for fasting, whether of greater or lesser duration, according to an acceptation quite usual in consequence of the Christian fasts having been established in imitation of the 40 days fast of our Saviour.

Even the great lent before Easter, did not in those days consist, at least in Ireland, (see above §. 4.) of that number of days. The last of those regulations seems to suppose, that the man and wife had, although living together, devoted themselves to the observance of some monastic rules, in which case they were to conduct themselves as if they lived separately in monasteries. Usher refers (Discourse, &c. ch. 6.) to the first part of said canon, and might have learned from it, with what attention the Irish church looked to the purity of the nuptial bed, without quibbling, as he does elsewhere, concerning its not having considered marriage a sacrament. The mighty argument, which he adduces (ib. ch. 5.) for his position, is a scrap from Sedulius the commentator, which he does not give entire. Sedulius makes the following observation on some words of St. Paul, Romans i. 11. 12; “Quod autem dicit, ut aliquod tradam vobis donum spirituale, videtur indicare, esse aliquid, quod donum quidem sit, non tamen spirituale, ut nuptiae, divitiae, fortitudo corporis, &c.” Hence Usher concluded, that Sedulius did not look upon marriage as a sacrament. Now it is quite plain, that in this passage marriage is alluded to incidentally, and merely in a temporal or worldly sense. But why did not Usher, who had read all Sedulius’s commentaries, quote some part of them, in which marriage is expressly treated of? He took care to conceal from the reader the following words on what St. Paul says of marriage, Ephes. v, 32. according to the Latin text, Sacramentum hoc magnum est, on which Sedulius has this observation; “Sunt enim alia minora sacramenta.” Hence it is clear, that, as he explained great sacrament by stating, that there are lesser sacraments, Sedulius reckoned marriage among the sacraments.

(119) Ap. D’Achery from L. 57. cap. 2. “Synodus Hibernensis ait; Qui praebet ducatum barbaris, 14 annis poeniteat. Barbarus, id est, alienus. Quis est alienus, nisi qui more crudeli et inmani cunctos prosternit?” This canon may be understood of princes or chieftains, who without provocation attacked, robbed, and murdered their neighbours; or persons that served as guides to marauding parties of strangers.

§. XIV. Prior to those of the twelfth century we find very few monuments of ecclesiastical architecture in Ireland. This is not to be wondered at, because the general fashion of the country was to erect their buildings of wood, a fashion, which in great part continues to this day in several parts of Europe. As consequently their churches also were usually built of wood, it cannot be expected that there should be any remains of such churches at present. Several of them, although constructed of such slight materials, might have been elegant and splendid, and in a good stile of architecture. The description of the church of Kildare, which seems to have been entirely of wood, by Cogitosus, who lived at the latest in the early part of the ninth century, (120) shows, that it was an ample and neat structure. He says, that it was large and very lofty, and adorned with paintings. It contained three large oratories, divided from each other by wooden partitions, (121) all under one roof. One of these partitions was ornamented, painted with images, and covered with linen cloths, and being in the eastern part of the church reached across from one of its outside walls to the other. By this partition he meant the inclosure of the sanctuary, at each extremity of which he tells us that there was a door. By the one at the right the bishop, with his chapter, and the persons appointed to assist at the holy administration, used to enter the sanctuary and proceed to the altar, to immolate the holy sacrifice of the Lord; and that at the left was only for the abess and her nuns to come in, that they might enjoy the banquet of the body and blood of Jesus Christ. (122) The remainder or great body of the church was divided into two equal parts by a partition running from the sanctuary down to the front wall. The right one was for the male part of the congregation, including also priests (such, it seems, as were not actually officiating); and the left one for the females. Each division had a large door, not in the front wall of the church, but in the right and left sides. Thus there were three oratories, as above mentioned, viz. these two parts besides the sanctuary. In this church were many windows; but its chief ornament consisted of the shrines of St. Brigid and St. Conlaeth, containing their bodies at each side of the altar, and adorned with wrought gold and silver, likewise with gems and precious stones, and with gold and silver crowns hanging over them. It is exceedingly probable, that the custom of drawing partitions in the churches, between the places assigned for the respective sexes, was nearly general in Ireland, conformably to the almost universal practice in ancient times of marking distinct and separate places for them. (122*)

(120) See Not. 18 to Chap. VIII. This description is in Vit. S. Brigid. cap. 35.

(121) Divisa parietibus tabulatis.

(122) Hence it appears, that the nunnery adjoined the church on the left, while the habitation of the bishop and his clergy was close to it on the right. (Compare with Not. 141. to Chap. VIII.)

(122*) See Bingham, Origines, &c. B. VIII. ch. 5. sect. 6.

§. xv. In building their churches of wood the Irish had no peculiar motive imaginable, except that they were very little in the habit of erecting any sort of edifices of stone or other materials. Accordingly nothing can be more ludicrous than the assertion of a silly presuming author, that “the doctrine and discipline of the Irish church were averse from stone fabricks.” (123) Even before the twelfth century some stone churches had been erected in Ireland, although it was not until that period that this fashion was introduced into some of the northern parts. (124) It has been said, that the round towers, which are almost peculiar to Ireland, were intended as steeples or belfries to churches. (125) It may be, and indeed seems certain, that some of them have been, although very unfit for the purpose, applied to that use, after their original destination had been forgotten. But it is self evident, that they were not erected with that intention. Their construction was not adapted to it; (126) and, as far as can be discovered, the buildings intended for belfries in Ireland were square. Of this kind is that annexed to Cormac's Chapel on the Rock of Cashel; and it is remarkable, that not far from it there is a Round tower, which, we may be sure, existed at the time when that Chapel was built, and which must not have been considered as a belfrey, whereas in such case there would have been no necessity for erecting the square one near the Chapel. Yet, as I have said above, bells seem to have been placed in some of them, which accordingly got the name of Clotheach, that is the house of the bell. (127) But, although originally not belfries, they were, at least in the times of Giraldus Cambrensis, looked upon as ecclesiastical edifices, that is, as applied to some religious purpose. (128) An ingenious conjecture on this subject is, that they were built for and inhabited by anchorets of the description of those, who were called Inclusi, and who used to shut themselves up all alone in certain places. (29) But, although some anchorets might have availed themselves of them as habitations, for which they were fit enough, yet it is hard to believe, that such lofty buildings, as many of them are, were originally intended for that purpose and for the use of single persons. Where was the necessity of the various stages or floors, into which they were divided, if they were to be inhabited by only one man? Or why should they be all furnished with four windows at the top, opposite to one another, and facing the four quarters of the heavens? Of what use could these be to an anchoret? (130) I find another account of the use, to which they were applied, and which seems as probable as that now spoken of. It is, that they served as prisons for penitents, who used to be placed first on the uppermost floor, and after spending there a certain space of time in proportion to their crimes, were allowed to descend to the next floor, and so on gradually, until they came down to the door and received absolution. (131) In this supposition the various stories or floors would have answered very well for accomodating the divers ranks of penitents with habitations.

(123) Ledwich, Antiq. &c. p. 141. The arguments, which he adduces to uphold this trash, are as nonsensical as his position. "Celsus," he says, "objects to the first believers, that they had no dedications or consecrations of altars, statues, or churches. Four centuries had almost elapsed before the usage here noticed began." Here in the first place he bungles every thing. Neither Celsus nor any other pagan had charged the Christians with not having churches, but with not having temples. Did not this wretched reasoner know, how learned men, and among others Bingham (loc. cit. ch. 6. sect. 13.) have explained in what sense Origen and other apologists acknowledged that they had no altars, while in another they held that they had, and even used the name altar? As to the usage he speaks of, viz. of dedications or consecrations, surely many churches were dedicated, and with great solemnity, during the reign of Constantine the great, long before the close of the fourth century. But what have these things to do with the reason why churches were built of wood rather than of stone? Might not wooden churches have been dedicated as well as stone ones? Ledwich meant to insinuate, that churches used not to be dedicated in Ireland. Now there are innumerable instances to the contrary, and we have already met with many of them. The 23d canon of the synod of St. Patrick, Auxilius and Isserninus requires, that divine service be not performed in a church, built even by a priest, until after it has been consecrated by a bishop; "Si quis presbyterorum ecclesiam aedificaverit, non offerat antequam adducat suum Pontificem, ut eam consecret, quia sic decet." Amidst some other stuff he says, that reliques were placed in churches in 787. He refers to the 7th canon of the second council of Nice. But by this canon no new practice was introduced. The object of it was, as appears from the very words of it, and as has been observed by Balsamon and others, to re-establish the ancient one of not consecrating churches without reliques of martyrs, which had been infringed by the Iconoclasts. The canon runs thus; " In such churches as have been consecrated without holy reliques of martyrs, we order reliques to be placed, accompanied with the usual prayers; and whoever consecrates a church without holy reliques is to be deposed as a transgressor of ecclesiastical traditions." Even Bingham is forced to acknowledge, (B. VIII. ch. 1. sect. 8.) that as early as the times of Constantine the great, churches used to be erected over the graves or reliques of martyrs. Ledwich then comes forward with this triumphant conclusion; " While corruptions were creeping into religion on the continent, ours was pure and primitive. Retentive of the faith delivered to us, and precluded from access to Rome by the convulsions of the empire, we were strangers to the innovations of foreign churches; when time discovered them to us, we beheld them with horror and detestation." Horror and detestation at what? Was it at the respect paid to reliques? I wish he had told us who were the persons, that expressed such feelings. The Irish, instead of abhorring reliques, took great care of them. We have often seen how carefully they preserved those of St. Patrick at Armagh, the shrine of Columbkil in Hy and elsewhere; and the attention and honour paid to those of St. Brigid, &c. have just been mentioned. The church of Armagh was furnished from very old times with a considerable number of reliques of various saints (Vit. Tripart. S. Patr. L. 3. c. 82.); the delegates, who went to Rome about the year 630, brought thence reliques of martyrs on their return to Ireland; (see Chup. xv. §. 6.) and it was usual to expose or carry in procession reliques on solemn occasions. (See ex. c. Chap. xxiii. §. 12.) Usher was so well aware of the respect, which the Irish had for them, that he passes them by in his Discourse, &c. But the Doctor must have alluded not to reliques, but to our having retained the custom of building churches of wood, and thus preserving our religion pure by detesting the innovation of stone churches. For wood and stone are the burden of his talk. How any one could find this great virtue in wood, and connect it so closely with the doctrine and discipline of the Irish church, it is hard to conceive. Such notions suit only wooden-headed disputants.

Next he passes to chrism, wishing to make us believe that, because the Irish did not use it in baptism, (a matter already explained Chap. xxiv. §. 12.) it was not applied in the consecration of churches or altars. He might as well have said, that it was not used at all, not even in Confirmation. Now his introducing chrism brings us again to wood, for, as he argues, the Irish had altars of wood, (see Chap. xxx. §. 7.) which were therefore incapable of chrismation. And why? Because, he says, “the councils of Agde in 506, and of Epone in 517, forbid the holy oil to be applied but to structures of stone.” He had no right to appeal to the council of Agde; for it does not mention either stone or wood, but merely directs in its 14th canon, that altars should be consecrated not only with the unction of chrism, but likewise with the sacerdotal benediction; “Altaria placuit non solum unctione chrismatis, sed etiam sacerdotali benedictione sacrari.” It is true, that the council of Epone requires that no altars be consecrated except of stone, (see Not. 48. to Chap. xxx.) but it does not use the word structures, which Ledwich, who never scrupled to corrupt texts, or to quote falsely, introduced for the purpose of including also churches under that decree. And upon this vile trick he finds another position of his, viz. that churches were not “anointed with chrism” until the 6th century; while at the same time in neither of the councils, to which he refers, are churches at all mentioned. Now as to the canon of Epone relative to stone altars, what had it to do with the Irish church? That was far from being a general council; and, whatever weight its decrees might have had in France, they were not binding in Ireland.

Still he goes on with wood, and tells us that “the Britons, who symbolized with the Irish in religious tenets, had only wattled and wooden churches.—On the contrary the Anglo-Saxon church, founded by an eleve of Rome, early adopted the masses, stations, litanies, singing, reliques, pilgrimages, and other superstitious practices, flowing in a full tide from that imperial city, and with these that mode of building peculiarly suited to them. Hence the Anglo-Saxon fabrics had under them crypts for reliques, &c.” Is it possible to listen with patience to such a medley of stupidity and ignorance! As if masses, stations, &c. might not have been celebrated and held, or psalms sung, or reliques preserved, in wooden churches as well as in stone ones. According to Ledwich the characteristic mark of what he calls a pure Church is, that its buildings be of wood. Why then has he not exerted himself to get St. Paul's and the many other stone churches of these countries demolished, and wooden ones substituted in their stead? I am really ashamed to appear as if arguing against these absurdities. So little idea had the Irish, or their disciples, of wood being the only fit material for ecclesiastical buildings, that St. Cuthbert, who was either an Irishman, or, at least, brought up and trained in the Irish schools of Northumberland, erected in the island of Farne a chapel of large rough stones and turf. (Bede, Vit. S. Cuthberti cap. 17.) Ledwich himself, who calls Cuthbert an Irishman, makes mention of it (p. 138). On the other hand the Roman missionaries attached no consequence to building churches of stone. One of the first of them, Paulinus archbishop of York, is stated to have got renewed the old church of Glastonbury, by making its walls of wood, which were sheeted outside with lead. (See Usher, Prim. p. 114.) The Anglo-Saxons continued to use the wooden church, which Finan had built at Lindisfarne; and many years after his death Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, did not scruple to dedicate it under the name of St. Peter the apostle. Stone was not introduced into it; but for its preservation Eadbert, bishop (the seventh) of Lindisfarne, roofed it and sheeted the walls with lead. (Bede, Eccl. Hist. L. 3. cap. 25.) So much for our antiquary's reveries as to wood marking the pure Irish church, and stone the corrupt Anglo-Saxon one. He has some similar balderdash concerning the Ostmen erecting stone-roofed chapels for reliques, one of which he places at Glendaloch, as if those Ostmen of old could have had easy access to a district so emphatically Irish, and so strong. Why did he not add, that Cormac's stone-roofed chapel at Cashel was also built by Ostmen? When treating of the antiquities of Glendaloch, he pours out more nonsense concerning a connexion between reliques and stone buildings, together with some malignant jargon (p. 43.) concerning the adoration of reliques, instead of saying, that respect was paid to them. And here he pretends, that the practice of depositing reliques in churches was first introduced into Ireland by the Ostmen in the 9th century, notwithstanding that, as we have seen (Chap. XXII. §. 12.) those Ostmen were still pagans until about the middle of the tenth. Were they Ostmen, that brought reliques from Rome about, as remarked above, the year 630?

Among his fanciful explanations of some ruins of Glendaloch

I cannot but touch upon one of them, although unconnected with the points now treated of. Having found three figures on a loose stone, of which he has given an engraving, he describes them thus (p. 39); "The one in the middle is a bishop or priest sitting in a chair and holding a penitential in his hand. On the right a pilgrim leans on his staff; and on the left a young man holds a purse of money to commute it for penance." For this explanation he adduces no proof whatsoever. There is nothing to show that what the young man or rather boy, holds in his hand is a purse. It is rather a bell, with which he seems to summon the people to hear a sermon or discourse by the person in the middle, who appears not in a chair but raised on a pulpit, and holding a book. And even if it were a purse, who told Ledwich, that it contained commutation money? Might it not have been an offering to the church? And where did he find, that the book was a penitential? There is no kneeling, nor imposition of hands, nor any thing indicating a penitential transaction. But his perverse conjectures served him as a vehicle to enlarge on an abuse, which had nothing to do with the antiquities of Glendaloch, and which, as appears from a quotation of his own, was condemned by the Church.

(124) See Chap. xxvii §. 9. and ib. Not. 59.

(125) This was the opinion of the learned Molyneux (Boate's and Molyneux's Nat. Hist. of Ireland, p. 211) and has been followed by Ledwich, Antiq. &c. art. on the Round Towers, p. 285. seqq.

(126) Smith, speaking of the round tower of Ardmore, (History of Waterford, p. 48.) says that it has, no doubt, been used for a belfry or steeple; but he does not state, as Ledwich quoting him (p. 295) pretends, that such was the general use of all the round towers. Upon this quotation Dr. Milner remarks (Letter 14. Inquiry or Tour in Ireland); "Dr. Ledwich tells us, from "Mr. (Dr.) Smith, that the round tower at Ardmore has been, "at some period, used to hang a bell in, as appears by 'three "pieces of oak still remaining near the top of it" and by 'two "channels, which are cut in the sill of the door, where the rope "went out, the ringer standing below the door on the outside.' "But if these pieces of oak were coeval with the tower, it is un- "accountable that they should have remained entire, while the “ beams in every other tower have mouldered away. Again, “ what reason can Dr. Ledwich assign, why there are not holes “ in the sills of every other tower? In a word, the ancient archi- “ tects were too wise to place the bell under cover and the ringer “ in the open air.’ In fact, the tower of Ardmore is covered with a stone roof ending in a point, (see a drawing of it in Vallancey’s Collectanea, Vol. 6. part. 1.) as are many other of our round towers to this day, and as they all undoubtedly were in the beginning. Dr. Milner’s general observation (ib.) on this point is very just. He says, “ that none of these towers is large enough for a “ single bell of a moderate size to swing round in it; that from the “ whole of their form and dimensions, and from the smallness of “ the apertures in them, they are rather culcated to stifle than “ to transmit to a distance any sound, that is made in them; “ lastly that, though possibly a small bell may have been accident- “ ally put up in one or two of them at some late period, yet we “ constantly find other belfries or contrivances for hanging bells “ in the churches adjoining to them.” Molyneux was aware of the difficulty, which the smallness of the dimensions opposed to their having been belfries, and, to ward it off, argued that they were ancient, because, he says, “ large bells are an invention of later times, and were not used in the earlier ages of the Church.” This is a pitiful evasion, especially coming from him, as he thought, of which by and by, that the round towers were built by the Danes, and consequently long after the early ages of the Church. To his argument Harris answers, (Antiq. of Ireland ch. 17.) that large bells were used in England as far back as the sixth century; and in fact, wherever belfries were erected designedly, a larger space was left for the swinging of the bell, and more opening allowed for the conveyance of sound, than we find in these towers. The very remarkable circumstance of the entrance or door into the towers being usually from 8 or 10 to 16 feet, or more, above the ground, without steps or any other means of getting in, unless with the help of a ladder, is, I think, a sure indication that they were not originally designed for belfries. What architect would have constructed a belfry, which the bell-ringer could not enter except by a ladder?

(127) Lynch, touching on the Round Towers, (Cambr. Evers p. 133.) says, that they were erected not for belfries but for watch-towers, but that afterwards bells were placed in them; “Non ut pro campanili sed pro speculo haberentur, unde prospectus ad longinqua late protenderetur. Postea tamen usus invaluit ut, campanis in earum culmine appensis, campanilium vices gererent—Vel nominis enim etymon illas indicat illi usui accomodatas fuisse; Clocteach enim perinde est ac domus campanæ, voce cloc campanam et teach domum significante.” Ledwich refers (p. 285.) to this passage, but, in his usual mode of misquoting, omits what Lynch has about said towers not having been originally intended for belfries. He then quotes a passage from Peter Walsh, which is taken nearly word for word from Lynch, except that what Lynch mentions as a report is called by him certain. I cannot subscribe to what Lynch seems to assert, viz. that all the Round towers we are treating of were called clocteach, after some time; although an odd one of them might have been so called, from the circumstance of a bell being placed in it at a late period. But this was not the real name for a tower strictly understood. Towers are often mentioned in ancient Irish MSS. by the names Tuir, Tura, Turreadh; (see Dr. O’Conor, Rer. Hib. Script. Ind. ad. proleg. p. 207.) but Clocteach is the precise name for a belfrey, as translated by O’Brien, of whatsoever form or materials. As long as churches were built in Ireland of wood, it may be justly supposed that so were also the belfries; and we have seen, (Not. 140. to Chap. xxii.) that there was a wooden belfrey at Slane, which was burned by the Danes. Lynch’s idea that the Round towers were originally watch-towers, which he connects with his false supposition of their having been built by the Danes, (of which lower down) cannot be admitted no more than that of others, who imagined that they were erected to serve as beacons. Neither of these hypotheses can stand, as Harris and Dr. Milner have proved (loc. cit.) by very good reasons, such as their often being found in low and hollow situations, two of them being in some places near each other, &c. &c.

(128) Giraldus (Topogr. Hib. Dist. 2. cap. 9.) calls them, “Turres ecclesiasticas, quae more patriae arctae sunt et altae, necnon et rotundae.” He does not specify what ecclesiastical use they were applied to; but we may fairly conclude, that they were not then used as belfries; for if they were, he would in all probability have mentioned it. He must have considered some of them as very ancient ; whereas he says, that the fishermen of Lough-Neagh used to see and show such towers in the bosom of that lake, which was said to have been formed by a sudden inundation at a very ancient period. He alluded to the tradition of Lough-Neagh, having burst out in the reign of Lugaid Riabhderg, who became king of Ireland in the year 65 of the Christian era. (See Harris' County of Down, ch. 1.)

(129) This opinion seems to have been proposed first by a Dean Richardson of Belturbet, from whom it was taken by Harris, who has endeavoured (Antiq. ch. 17.) to make it appear probable. It has been adopted also by Dr. Milner, (Letter 14. quoted above) who maintains, that these towers were well adapted for habitations of the Inclusi. In the Acts of St. Dunchad O'Braois. (of whom see Chap. xxii. §. 15.) the place, in which he led the life of an anchoret, is called a prison of narrow inclosure, in arcti inclusorii ergastulo clausus ; but it is not mentioned whether it was a tower or not. Harris imagined, that all the Irish anchorets lived in the round towers. For this he had no foundation whatsoever. Many of them lived in huts or caves in unfrequented places. We have met with several of them at Armagh ; but their habitations are constantly called cells not towers.

(130) I do not find, that those, who think that the Round towers were built for anchorets, have given us any explanation of the use of the four windows. Dr Milner assigns one or two reasons for the division into floors or stories ; and I know that they were requisite for enabling a person to ascend to the top by means of ladders ; but I confess that I cannot see the necessity for making so many stories, or, what comes to the same point, for raising the towers so high, if they were originally intended merely for anchorets. He does not say what Harris strives to maintain, viz. that they were divided into stories or lofts in imitation of the pillars of the Eastern Stylites, such as St. Symeon, St. Daniel. &c. ; for, let Harris say what he will, the only means of ascent to the tops of those pillars was from without, there being none inside.

(131) This is the account given by Smith (History of the county, &c. of Cork, Vol. 2. p. 408.) from, he says, some Irish MSS. If we could rely on this reference, it should be admitted, that the Round towers were applied to that purpose. As an additional proof, he states, that the Irish name for a penance is turris the Latin name for a tower. I doubt much, whether it had that acceptation in Irish; at least I cannot find it in any Irish dictionary. Ledwich (Antiq. &c. p. 298) charges Smith with inconsistency, as if he had said elsewhere, that those towers were belfries. Now the fact is, that Smith merely said, that the one of Ardmore had been used as a belfrey; but he did not assert, that such was the general use of all of them. (See above Not. 126.) I wish Smith had given us the title of the MS. or MSS. to which he referred.

§. XVI. Yet after all, notwithstanding it cannot be denied that they were applied in Christian times to some ecclesiastical or religious purposes, some as belfries, others perhaps as retreats for anchorets, others as habitations for penitents, or, as may also be conjectured, of some persons connected with the service of neighbouring churches, the question still remains, whence the singular style of architecture, in which they universally appear, was derived to Ireland. There are no towers of a similar construction to be found in any part of continental Europe. To suppose, as some have thought, that they were erected by the Danes or Ostmen, is evidently a great mistake; for, were they of Danish architecture, how could it have happened, that neither in the Scandinavian countries whence those people came, nor in England, where they ruled more or less for a great number of years, nor in Normandy or other parts of Europe, which they occupied, is there a vestige of such buildings or any tradition concerning them to be met with? (132) Round towers or the remains of them are found in every part of Ireland, and very many of them in places, which were never possessed by the Danes. (133) On the contrary, there neither were nor are any of them in some of the chief seats of the Danes, such as, Waterford and Wexford. The peculiarity of these towers consists not in their being merely round; for round buildings were common enough, and the pillars, not towers, of the Eastern Stylites are said to have been round; but where do we find in other countries towers of a conical form, having the entrance into them many feet above the ground, with at the top four windows facing the four cardinal points, roofed &c. ? Now it is exceedingly remarkable, that towers of an exactly similar construction exist at this day in Hindostan. Lord Valentia saw two of them near Bhaugulpore, of which he has given a drawing. The door or entrance into them is, as appears from the drawing, about twelve feet above the ground; there are four windows at the top, just as in the Irish towers, and they are covered with a small roundish roof. Of them he writes thus; “ I was “ much pleased with the sight of two very singular “ round towers about a mile N. W. of the town.

 “ They much resemble those buildings in Ireland, “ which have hitherto puzzled the antiquaries of the “ sister kingdoms, excepting that they are more or“ namented. It is singular, that there is no tra“ dition concerning them, nor are they held in any “ respect by the Hindoos of this country. The “ Rajah of Jyenagur considers them as holy, and “ has erected a small building to shelter the great “ number of his subjects, who annually come to “ worship here. I have given an engraving of them,
 “ as I think them curious.” (134) These towers were undoubtedly erected by a people, who professed a religion different from that of the majority of the modern Hindoos.

(132) Lynch is, as far as I can discover, the first author, who has mentioned the Danes as the builders of the Round towers, and this he gives as only a hearsay. He writes; (Cambr. Evers. p. 133.) “ Exiguas tamen illas orbiculares arctasque turres Dani, Hiberniam Giraldo authore anno Dom. 838 primum ingressi, primi crexisse dicuntur, non ut” &c. as above Not. 127. Peter Walsh copied Lynch, changing his dicuntur into most certain. This idea was taken up by Molyneux, who has nothing but loose unhistorical conjectures on the subject, one of which is quite wrong. He says ; “ Had the old native Irish been the authors of this kind of architecture, they surely would have raised such towers as these in several parts of Scotland also, where they have been planted and settled many ages past ; but there we hear of none of them.” Now the fact is, that there are two of them in Scotland, one at Abernethy, and the other at Brechin, as Ledwich himself mentions, (p. 294.) who has given a drawing of the latter together with that of the church and the adjoining square belfrey. From this belfrey annexed to the church of Brechin it is clear, that the Round tower at the other side was not one. Ledwich has shamefully imposed on his readers by representing (p. 288. seqq.) Giraldus Cambrensis as having asserted, that the Round towers were built by the Danes. Now Giraldus says no such thing, nor in the little that he has said relatively to their mode of construction, which is all comprised in the few words quoted above, (Not. 128.) does he make any mention of Danes or Ostmen. On the contrary he plainly hints, that the architecture of them was purely Irish, more patriae. Besides, from his having looked upon at least some of them as very ancient, (see ib.) it is evident, that he could not have imagined, that they were erected by the Danes, whereas he supposed that they existed in Ireland before the arrival of that nation. Ledwich squeezed his misrepresentation of Giraldus out of another of Lynch’s meaning in the above quoted words. Lynch says, that the Round towers are reported to have been first erected by the Danes, whose first arrival in Ireland was, according to Giraldus, in the year 838. The sense of this plain passage is twisted by Ledwich, as if Lynch had stated that Giraldus said, that the Danes not only first came to Ireland in 838, but that they were likewise the first builders of the Round towers. Lynch could not have even thought of attributing such an assertion to Giraldus, whereas his object was to refute the supposition of Giraldus, that there were such towers in Ireland at times much earlier than those of the Danes. Lynch was arguing against what Giraldus has about Round towers being seen in Lough Neagh, (see ib.) and strove to refute him by showing, that there were not any such towers in Ireland at the very ancient period alluded to by Giraldus, whereas, he says, they are reported to owe their origin to the Danes, who, according to Giraldus himself, did not come to Ireland until A. D. 838.

(By the bye Giraldus was wrong in his date; for, as has been seen elsewhere, there were Danes in Ireland several years earlier.) The reader will now be able to form an opinion of Ledwich's logic and critical rules, and to judge of his fidelity in referring to authorities. I must here touch upon a pitiful argument adduced by Molyneux in confirmation of his hypothesis. He supposed, that Cloghachd, a word formed from Clocteach, and signifying Belfrey, was the original name for a Round tower. In this he was mistaken; and even according to Lynch, whom he seems to have followed, that could not have been the original name; for Lynch says, (see Not. 127) that they were not erected for the purpose of being used as belfries. Molyneux then tells us, that Cloghachd was taken from a foreign tongue, and derived from Clugga a German-Saxon word, that signifies a bell; and that therefore said towers were built by foreigners, that is, by the Ostmen. Now he was quite wrong as to this derivation; whereas Cloghachd was formed from the Irish Cloc or Clog the very ancient name for a bell, and which was used by the Irish long before the German-Saxons had churches or bells. We find it latinized into Clocca, and it was used by Columbkil, and generally by the ancient Irish writers, as signifying a bell (See Not. 186. to Chap. XI. and Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 374.) So that, instead of giving Saxon etymology to Cloghachd, the Saxon Clugga was most probably derived from the Cloc or Clog of the Irish teachers of the Saxons.

(133) Ledwich seems to have been aware of this difficulty; for he says (p. 289.) that the Irish imitated the Ostmen in the construction of these towers. To make us believe, that the Irish imitated their bitterest enemies, would require more than his bare word.

(134) Lord Valentia's Voyages and Travels, Vol. 1. p. 85.

§. XVII. The great similarity of these towers in the interior of Hindostan to our Irish Round towers has convinced me, that, as my worthy and learned friend General Vallancey had long endeavoured to establish in various tracts of his, (135) that this mode of architecture was introduced into Ireland in the times of paganism by a people, who came to this country from some far distant part of the East. The patterns, from which the construction of our towers was imitated, were most probably the fire-temples of the Persians and others, who followed the Magian religion as reformed by Zerdusht, or, as he is usually called, Zoroastres. (136) Those temples were usually round, and some of them were raised to a great height. (137) That fire was in pagan times an object of worship, or, at least, great veneration in Ireland, and particularly the sun, which was considered the greatest of all fires, is an indubitable fact. (138) Now the lower part of an Irish Round tower might have answered very well for a temple, that is, a place in which was an altar, on which the sacred fire was preserved, while the middle floors could have served as habitations for the persons employed in watching it. (139) The highest part of the tower was an observatory intended for celestial observations, as, I think, evidently appears from the four windows being placed directly opposite to the four cardinal points. The veneration, in which the pagan Irish held the heavenly bodies and, above all, the sun, must have led them to apply to astronomical pursuits, which were requisite also for determining the length of their years, the solstitial and equinoctial times, and the precise periods of their annual festivals. (140) I find it stated, that the doors of most of these towers face the West. (141) If this be correct, it will add an argument to show, that they contained fire-temples; for the Magians always advanced from the West side to worship the fire. (142) According to this hypothesis the Round towers existed in Ireland before churches were built. I see no reason to deny, that they did; and the particular style of their construction shows, that they are very ancient. (143) But then, it is said, how does it happen, that they are usually found near old churches? In the first place this is not universally true. (144) Secondly it is to be observed, that these towers used to be built in towns or villages of some note, such, in fact, as required churches in Christian times. Thus, wherever there was a Round tower, a church was afterwards erected; but not vice versa, whereas there were thousands of churches in Ireland without any such towers in the vicinity of them. (145) Thirdly, there was a prudential motive for the teachers of Christian faith to build churches near the sites of the Round towers, that they might thereby attract their new converts to worship the true God in the very places, where they had been in the practice of worshipping the sun and fire. (146) It may be, that some of these towers were built after the establishment of christianity in Ireland for penitential purposes, as already alluded to, although I have some doubts about it; (147) but I think it can scarcely be doubted, that the original models, according to which they were constructed, belong to the times of paganism, and that the singular style of architecture, which we observe in them, was brought from the East, between which and this country it is certain that there was an intercourse at a very ancient period of time.

(135) I need refer only to his Second Essay on the Round Towers of Ireland in the Collectanea De Reb. Hib. Vol. 6. part 1.

(136) This is not the place to enter into the question of the times of Zoroastres, or as some would have it, of divers Zoroastres. But the one, who is called the reformer of the Magian religion, lived, as far as I am able to judge, during the reign of Darius Hystaspides, king of Persia. Ledwich amidst his low and scurrilous observations (p. 298.) on Vallancey's system, strives to show by referring to Hyde (Relig. Vet. Pers.) that the Persians had no temples. He did not know how to distinguish the times. Let us hear Prideaux, who also referring to Hyde writes (Connection, &c. Part 1. ch. 4.); "Another reformation, which he (Zoroastres) made in the Magian religion, was, that he caused fire-temples to be built wherever he came. For whereas hitherto they had erected their altars, on which their sacred fire was kept, on the tops of hills, and high places in the open air, and there per“ formed all the offices of their religious worship, where often by “ rain, tempests and storms, the sacred fire was extinguished, and

“ the holy offices of their religion interrupted and disturbed, for “ the preventing of this he directed, that, wherever any of those “ altars were erected, temples should be built over them, that so
“ the sacred fires might be the better preserved, and the public “ offices of their religion the better performed before them. For “ all the parts of their public worship were performed before these “ public sacred fires, as all their private devotions were before pri“ vate fires in their own houses; not that they worshipped the fire,
“ (for this they always disowned) but God in the fire.” D’Herbelot makes mention of these fire-temples or Pyrcia (Biblioth.
Orient. at Aluand and Parsi); nor is there any one acquainted with Oriental learning, who denies, that they existed. But what did Ledwich care about learned men.

(137) Hanway says, (Travels, Part 2. ch. 43. p. 292.) that there are at Sari in the province of Mazanderan four temples of the Gebres or worshippers of fire, who formerly inhabited that country.
“ It seemed inconsistent” he adds, “ that the Persians suffered “ these temples to remain unmolested after the abolition of a re“ ligion, which they now esteem grossly idolatrous; but they are “ made of the most durable materials. These edifices are rotund,
“ and above 30 feet diameter, raised in height to a point near 120 “ feet.” It were to be wished, that he had been more particular in his description of them, and that he had said something about the entrance, and about the windows, &c. The elevation of these towers supplies an answer to Dr. Milner’s observation (Letter 14.) on Vallancey’s hypothesis of the Irish Round towers having been Pyratheia or fire temples. He says, that for that purpose “ there was no occasion of carrying them up to so great a height;” but we have now seen, that the temples of Sari are also very high. Maurice states in his Indian Antiquities, quoted by Vallancey, that those fire temples were always round. This much is certain, that such was the shape of a great number of them.

(138) See Chap. v. §. 5. and ib. Not. 43. There seem to have been in Ireland, as there were in Persia two sects of fireworshippers, one, that lighted their fires in the open air and performed their religious ceremonies on hills and high places, (Compare with Not. 45. ib.) and the other, who having received the reformation of Zoroastres kept the sacred fire in temples.

(139) Prideaux, having spoken (loc cit.) of the sort of hierarchy of the followers of Zoroastres, viz. the inferior clergy, as he calls them, the superintendants, and the Archimagus or High priest, says, that they had three sorts of temples. He then proceeds in these words; "The lowest sort were the parochial churches or oratories, which were served by the inferior clergy—And the duties, which they there performed, were to read the daily offices out of their liturgy, and at stated and solemn times to read some part of their sacred writings to the people. In these churches there were no fire-altars; but the sacred fire, before which they here worshipped, was maintained only in a lamp. Next above these were their fire-temples, in which fire was continually kept burning on a sacred altar. And these were—the churches or temples, where the superintendant resided. In every one of these were also several of the inferior clergy entertained, who—performed all the divine offices under the superintendant, and also took care of the sacred fire, which they constantly watched day and night by four and four in their turns, that it might be always kept burning, and never go out. Thirdly, the highest church above all was the fire-temple, where the Archimagus resided," &c. From this statement it appears, that the people at large had access only to what Prideaux calls the lowest sort of churches, and that they were not admitted into the fire-temples strictly understood. The same system is still kept up by the Parsees; for as Anquetil du Perron relates, (Zend. Avesta, Tom. 2. p. 569.) the part or chamber of a modern Parsee temple, called Atesch-gah (place of fire), is not accessible to any persons except the Mobeds and Herbeds, i. e. their sorts of clergymen, except on some particular occasions, as in case of such clergymen not being present, when a privileged Parsee, who has passed through certain purifications, is allowed to enter it for doing something requisite, keeping at the same time his mouth covered with the penom or covering of doubled linen. Hence we may understand, how, notwithstanding the small dimensions of our Round towers, a part of them might have served for a fire-temple, which was entered only by the ministers of religion; and why the entrance into them was placed several feet above the ground, as it was intended merely for the use of a peculiar and comparatively small class of persons. As the people at large were not admitted into them, they felt no inconvenience from the height of the doors; and the reason for placing them so high was probably to guard against any pollution of the sacred fire, or of the place where it was kept, which might happen, either from the breath of people standing near the tower, or from other causes, if the door were near the ground. For such scrupulous attention was observed on this point, that, as Prideux states, (ib.) “the priests themselves never approached this fire but with a cloth (the penom) over their mouths, that they might not breath thereon; and this they did, not only when they tended the fire to lay more wood thereon, or do any other service about it, but also when they approached it to read the daily offices of their liturgy before it.” He says likewise, that the priests “fed it only with wood stripped of its bark, and of that sort which they thought most clean, and they never did blow it either with bellows, or with their breath, for fear of polluting it; and to do this either of those ways, or to cast any unclean thing into it, was no less than death by the law of the land, as long as those of that sect reigned in it.”

Dr. Milner, objecting (Letter cit.) to the hypothesis of the Irish Round towers having been fire-temples, says, that “they ought rather to have been left open at the top, like our great furnaces, than closed up as they are found to be.” He supposed that the fires contained in them were great blazing masses like bonfires. This is a mistake, whereas those of the fire-temples were small, gentle, and placed on altars. To leave said temples open at the top would have been in direct opposition to the object of Zoroastres, who introduced the fashion of temples for the very purpose of protecting the holy fire against rain, storms, &c. (See above Not. 136.) And at this day the Ateschgah of the Parsees is a covered room, as Anquetil informs us, (loc. cit. p. 571.) who also remarks, (p. 569.) that means are contrived for carrying off the smoke. And such might have also been easily contrived in the Round towers with the help of the loop-holes, which we find in them, or of the door; which I mention to guard against an objection that might be made of how those covered temples were kept free from smoke.

(140) See Dr. O’Conor, Rer. Hib. Scr. 1. Proleg. p. 32, and Index to Proleg. p. 206. In the former place he quotes passages from Tigernach, and from the Annals of Ulster and of the 4 Masters at A. 995, in which among other buildings destroyed by lightning at Armagh are mentioned Fiadh-Nemeadh. i. e. celestial testimonies or indications. They are distinguished from the Cloicteacha, or belfries, and might have been, as he conjectures, Round towers used for astronomical purposes. It is well known, that the astronomical studies were cultivated in Ireland, and we have met with several Irishmen, who were well versed in them, such as Cumian, author of the Paschal epistle, St. Virgilius, Dungal, &c.

(141) Smith, Hist. of Cork, Vol. 2. p. 408.

(142) Prideaux says (loc. cit.) that, “ when they came before these fires to worship, they always approached them on the west side, that having their faces towards them, and also towards the rising sun at the same time, they might direct their worship towards both.”

(143) Dr. Milner, an excellent judge in these matters, touching (Letter cit.) on the period, in which they were generally erected, writes; “ It appears to me, that this must be very remote, from the circular arches over the doors of many of them, which proves them to be anterior to the introduction of the pointed arch,” &c. He also remarks, that in the times of Giraldus Cambrensis, as I have already mentioned, they were considered as of great antiquity. The materials, of which they are built, being usually of the best kind, ex. c. those of the tower at Cashel. which are much better than those of the adjoining and much more modern cathedral, the excellence and neatness of the workmanship, circumstances noticed by Dr. Milner, the thickness of the walls, generally about three feet, and their conical form, are more than sufficient to account for their durability and for their having been so little injured by time, although some of them may have been erected two thousand years ago.

(144) I mean, if understood of being very near the churches. Those of Kildare and Drumiskin (co. Louth) stand 90 feet, and that of Downpatrick 48 from the respective churches. (Ledwich. Antiq. p. 304.)

(145) See Ledwich's list of Round towers, ib. p. 300. seqq. It is not, however complete. Mr. Dutton (Statistical Survey of the county of Clare, ch. v. sect. 23.) makes mention of some in that county, which are omitted in said list.

(146) I cannot better illustrate this point than by referring to the conduct of Gregory the great in his directions to the missionary Augustin, communicated in a letter to the abbot Mellitus, (ap. Bed. Eccl. Hist. L. 1. cap. 30.) not to destroy the temples of the Anglo-Saxons, but, having overturned the idols, to purify these temples and apply them to the worship of the true God, placing altars, &c. in them, that so the people might be induced, by the circumstance of their having been accustomed to resort to those places, to continue to do so for the purpose of acquiring the knowledge of the true God, and adoring him. His words are; “Dicite ei (Augustino) quid diu mecum de causa Anglorum cogitans tractavi, videlicet quod fana idolorum destrui in eadem gente minime debeant; sed ipsa quae in eis sunt idola destruantur, aqua benedicta fiat, in eisdem fanis aspergatur, altaria construantur, reliquiae componantur. Quia, si fana eadem bene constructa sunt, necesse est ut a cultu daemonum in obsequi a veri Dei debeant commutari, ut, dum gens ipsa eadem fana sua non videt destrui, de corde errorem deponat, et Deum verum cognoscens ac adorans ad loca, quae consuevit, familiarius concurrat.” A similar principle seems to have actuated the preachers of christianity in Ireland; but, as the Round towers could not, on account of their narrow dimensions, be changed into churches, they thought it adviseable to erect churches near them.

(147) Smith, who speaks of their having been used as prisons for penitents, (above §. 15. and Not. 131.) says, (ib. p. 409.) that the tower of Kineth in W. Carbery (county of Cork) was built about the year 1015, for which he refers to an old MS. containing some annals of Munster. But, even supposing the accuracy of his assertion, I may observe, that he represents this tower as differing from all the others he had heard of. The first story is a regular hexagon, each side being 10 feet 4 inches, so that the whole circumference is 62 feet. This is much greater than the usual circumference of the real Round towers, in which no angles appear. Accordingly, although built somewhat in imitation of them, being from the first story upwards quite round, it does not precisely belong to that class of buildings. He does not tell us, whether the entrance into it be several feet above the ground, or whether it has at the top the four windows facing the cardinal points; two remarkable peculiarities of the Round towers strictly so called. If it be true that it was erected as late as Smith states, it might have been intended for a receptacle for penitents. The strongest argument I meet with for the building of any Round tower, according to the ancient fashion in Christian times, is furnished by that of Brechin in Scotland, which has over one of the two arches on its western front a figure of our Saviour on the Cross, and between both arches two small statues of the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. John. (See Ledwich, p. 294 and 297, and his drawing of that tower, and Gough's Observations on the Round tower of Brechin, (Archaeologia, Vol. 2.) which, together with the drawing, have been followed by Ledwich.) If these figures were placed there at the time of its erection, it is evident that it must be assigned to a Christian period. But might not they have been added long after the original building of the tower, and after it was applied to some Christian purpose?

THE END.

INDEX.

Year	Jan	Feb	Mar	Apr	May	June	July	Aug	Sept	Oct	Nov	Dec	Total
1857
1858
1859
1860
1861
1862
1863
1864
1865
1866
1867
1868
1869
1870
1871
1872
1873
1874
1875
1876
1877
1878
1879
1880
1881
1882
1883
1884
1885
1886
1887
1888
1889
1890
1891
1892
1893
1894
1895
1896
1897
1898
1899
1900

20571

INDEX.

☞ The numeral letters denote the volume, and the Arabic figures the page.

ABBAIN-DUN, iii. 22.

Abban, St. his birth, iii. 14. Two of that name, 15, 16. His death, 15.

Abbey-leix, foundation of, iv. 262, 264.

Abingdon, its name from St. Abban, iii. 22.

Abington. See Woney.

Abstinence of the ancient Irish, iv. 349, 350, 353.

Achadh-abhla, i. 465, anciently called Cro-sailech, 468.

Achad-cinn or Achad-cill, i. 267. Abbey of ii. 103.

Achad-Dagan, ii. 366.

Achadh-farcha, i. 420.

Achadh-Finglaiss, monastery of, ii. 228.

Achadh-fobhair, i. 245.

Achadh-Gabhran, ii. 318.

Achadh-na-cill, i. 267.

Achadh-more, i. 248.

Achad-ur, foundation of, iii. 26.

Achonry, St. Nathan of, i. 345.

Adalgis, disciple of St. Fursey, ii. 462, 464.

Adamnan, abbot of Hy, the time in which he flourished, i. 60.

His life of Columb-kill, ib. Makes mention of St. Patrick, 61.

When born, iii. 12. Sent to Alfred, king of Northumberland, for the purpose of recovering captives and property carried off from Ireland by Egfrid's pirates, 96. Abbot of Raphoe, 97.

Again visits king Alfred, ibid. A priest and monk of the monastery of Coludi, now Coldingham in Scotland, ib. Again sent ambassador to king Alfred, 149. Receives the Roman Paschal computation, 150. His death, ibid.

Adamnan, bishop of Rathmuighe, death of, iii. 163.

Ad Fontanus, monastery of, ii. 267.

Adhland, St. abbot of Derry, iii. 381.

- Ado and Dado, two sons of Autharius, blessed by Columbanus, ii. 285.
- Adrian IV. Pope, grants a bull to Henry II to take possession of Ireland, iv. 159 to 165. Bull sent into Ireland by Henry, 222, 223.
- Aedh, Aodh, or Hugh, a common name with the Irish, ii. 333.
- Aedan, St. or Maidoc, bishop of Ferns, his family, &c. ii. 333, 335.
- Aedan, a military man, becomes a monk at Fore, iii. 51.
- Aedan, apostle of Northumberland, ii. 416. Gets a grant of Lindisfarn, 417. His diocese, &c. 421. His death, 424.
- Aedus or Hugh, a bishop, death of, i. 419.
- Aedus or Hugh, monarch of Ireland, ii. 13. Killed, 198.
- Aedgen, St. bishop of Fore, death of, iii. 194.
- Aedgen Brito, bishop of Kildare, death of, iii. 322.
- Aelchu, abbot of Clonard, death of, iii. 166.
- Aemonia, monastery of, ii. 166.
- Aengus, ceile De. See Aengus the Hagiologist.
- Aengus, coadjutor abbot of Hy, iii. 343.
- Aengus Hua Lapain, iii. 370.
- Aengus, son of Natfraoich, king of Cashel, i. 280, 282, 394, 400. ii. 98.
- Aengus Macnisse, bishop of Connor, i. 422, 435.
- Aengus, son of Olild, i. 263.
- Aengus, the Hagiologist, iii. 232, 233, 245, 249.
- Aethena, mother of St. Columb-kill, ii. 106, 112.
- Africa, St. abbess of Kildare, iii. 170, 172.
- Africa, wife of John De Courcey, iv. 321.
- Aghabo, monastery of, ii. 201. Plundered by the Danes, iii. 366. See of Ossory there, iv. 237, 239.
- Aghacainid, monastery of, iii. 132, 134.
- Aghadoe, the great church of, iv. 168. See of, 169.
- Aghagower, i. 245, 248.
- Aghamore, i. 248.
- Agilbert, bishop of the West Saxons, iii. 60, 62.
- Aidan St. or Maidoc, bishop of Ferns, i. 470. See Aedan.
- Aidan Hua Fiachrach, St. ii. 104.
- Aidan king of the British Scots, ii. 173, 178. Inquiry concerning his claim to Dalreida, 237.
- Aidan, disciple of St. Carthagh, ii. 359, 364.
- Aidan, bishop of Glendaloch, iii. 34.
- Aidan, brother to St. Flannan, bishop of Killaloe, iii. 148.
- Aidan, bishop of Mayo, iii. 201.
- Aidan, Hua Condumha, iii. 267.
- Aidhichan, bishop and abbot of Conor, iii. 323, 324.
- Aidus, St. abbot and bishop of Kildare, i. 214, 219. iii. 33.
- Aidus, abbot of Tirdaglass, iii. 273, 274.
- Aidus, brother of St. Foila, ii. 328.
- Aidus, bishop of Sletty, iii. 140.

- Aidus Finnliath, monarch of Ireland, iii. 242, 326, 327.
 Aidus, father of Cathald king of Munster, ii. 5.
 Aidus, king of Connaught, ii. 145, 198, 199.
 Aidus O'Fairreth, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 448.
 Aidus Oirdnidhe, iii. 241, 244.
 Aidus son of Ainmirech, monarch of Ireland, ii. 122. 237. iii. 301.
 Aidus, son of Brec, ii. 10, 187, 188.
 Aidus, son of Degil, i. 456.
 Aidus, scribe of Roscommon, iii. 329.
 Aidus, 'surnamed Slani, monarch of Ireland, ii. 301.
 Aidus, surnamed Uairiodhnach, monarch of Ireland, ii. 301.
 Ailbe, a priest, different from Ailbe of Emly, i. 15, 240, 243.
 Ailbe of Emly, St. i. 22, 23, 283, 287, 317, 396, 461. ii. 104.
 Ailbe of Senchua, i. 462.
 Ailech, monastery of, ii. 29.
 Ailech, the residence of the chief of Inish Owen, i. 262, 263.
 Ailil, archbishop of Armagh, i. 440, 461, 462, 495.
 Ailill of Maghbile, i. 410.
 Aingin, or Angina, monastery of, ii. 52, 57.
 Ainmirech or Ainmireus, monarch of Ireland, i. 470. ii. 13.
 Airendan, St. ii. 331.
 Airendanus, a priest, iii. 11.
 Airdne-Coemhan, abbey of, ii. 221.
 Alban, St. i. 464, 466.
 Albanus, a name of the elder Gildas, i. 476.
 Albert, St. brother to St. Erard, i. 111, 113.
 Albinus, called Alcuin, iii. 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 213.
 Albuin, or Witta, bishop of Buraburg, iii. 178, 180.
 Alchfrid, prince, iii. 59.
 Alcluid, i. 477.
 Alcluith, or Dunbarton, iii. 327.
 Alcuin, iii. 207 & seqq. 230.
 Alderic, or Aidus Barbarus, iii. 445.
 Alectum, Maclovius, bishop of, ii. 33.
 Alexander III. Pope, his brief conferring the bull of Adrian, iv. 222, 223.
 Alfred, educated in Ireland, i. 90, 96.
 Algnied, bishop of Ardraccan, iii. 202.
 Alild or Alill Molt, monarch of Ireland, i. 392.
 Alild and Illand princes of Leinster, i. 394.
 Alild, abbot of Mungret, iii. 192.
 Alild, abbot of Clogher, iii. 340.
 Alitherus, abbot of Clonmacnois, ii. 124, 241.
 All Saints, priory of, iv. 186, 187.
 Alphabet, the Roman, i. 220.
 Altars in churches, iv. 269, 272, 395, 397.
 Alto, St. iii. 189.
 Al to-Munster, monastery of, iii. 189.

- Altraighe Cliach, district of, ii. 94.
 Amalgaid, abp. of Armagh, iii. 427.
 Amandus of Bourdeaux, i. 199.
 Amarbaric, monastery of, iii. 219, 220, 221.
 Amlaff, king of Dublin, iii. 432.
 Amlave plunders Armagh, iii. 326. Death of, 327. See Auliff.
 Amnichad, St. iii. 443.
 Anagrates, fort of, ii. 267, 268.
 Anat-caltrain, i. 208.
 Anatolius, first inventor of the Paschal computation, ii. 375.
 Anatolius, an Irishman, iii. 362, 364.
 Anatrim, monastery of ii. 222.
 Anchorets called Inclusi, iv. 394, 402.
 Andrew de Stokes, priory of St. iv. 249.
 Andrew, disciple of St. Donatus, iii. 280, 281.
 Angarbh, son of Olill king of Leinster, iii. 366.
 Anglesey, battle of, i. 477,
Anmchara, meaning of, ii. 56.
 Anmire, abp. of Armagh, iii. 322, 325.
 Anmireus, monarch of Ireland, ii. 198.
 Anselm, abp. of Canterbury, iv. 13, 14, 18, 21, 22.
 Antrim, i. 346, 348, 403, 422.
 Antiphonarium Benchorensis, i. 59, 60.
 Antipodes, doctrine of, taught by Fergal, iii. 190.
 Aodh Bennain king of Munster, iii. 5.
 Aodh Caomh, king of Cashel, ii. 213.
 Aonach-Tailten, i. 210.
 Ara-chliach, i. 287.
 Arbertac, St. iii. 255.
 Arbogast, St. iii. 101, 102.
 Aractac, abbot of Ferns, iii. 176, 177.
Ara-na-naomh, see Arn-Island.
 Archdall (author of the Monasticon Hibernicum), blunders of noticed, i. 69, 246, 247, 255, 258, 264, 267, 270, 276, 278, 296, 304, 311, 345, 348, 404, 412, 415, 463. ii. 5, 12, 24, 27, 36, 39, 55, 59, 64, 73, 100, 105, 119, 123, 134, 137, 143, 189, 195, 211, 214, 224, 225, 231, 232, 309, 321, 325, 328, 356, 361, 362, 363, 398, 406. iii. 9, 10, 13, 19, 20, 27, 28, 36, 46, 48, 49, 81, 82, 85, 86, 88, 102, 130, 230. iv. 130, 131, 180, 234, 249, 250, 293, 327, 334.
 Archers, &c. excommunicated, iv. 271.
 Architecture, ecclesiastical, iv. 391. Pagan, 406.
 Archpriests, iv. 222, 223
 Ardbraccan, ii. 346, iii. 374, 433. iv. 55, 322, 346, 377.
 Ardcarne, i. 462, 463, iv. 344, 346.
 Ardferit, i. 420, 421. ii. 31, 354.
 Ardfinan, monastery of, iii. 84.
 Ardgoal or Adrogoal, i. 148.
 Ardlathrann church, ii. 339.
 Ardmacha, see Armagh.

- Ardmore, i. 461.
 Ard-oilean, monastery of, iii. 49.
 Ardpatrick, i. 308.
 Ardsaillech, i. 312.
 Ardstrath or Ardstraw, ii. 190.
 Arecluta, or Alcluid, i. 477.
 Arectac, Abp. of Armagh, iii. 233, 234.
 Argurius, king of Leinster, iii. 426.
 Aridius, bishop, ii. 271, 272.
 Aristobulus, i. 2.
 Armagh, sundry things relating to, i. 74, 275, 308, 312, 315, 402, 403, 450. iii. 266, 270, 271, 277, 326, 346, 347, 361, 367, 382, 385, 424, 490. iv. 31, 34, 77, 91, 94, 101, 110, 136, 182, 190, 195, 238, 256, 259, 260, 261, 303, 315, 342, 343.
 Armoric Britain, i. 92.
 Arn island, monastery of, ii. 51, 396.
 Aroasian canons, iv. 336.
 Arran, i. 404.
 Artchain, monastery of, ii. 162.
 Artgal, son of Cathald king of Conaught, iii. 232.
 Arthur, king of Britain, i. 477, 482, 483.
 Artrigius, coadjutor bishop of Armagh, iii. 257, 266, 267.
 Asacus, a bishop. See Asicus, i. 340.
 Ashroe, or Easrue, abbey of formed, iv. 238.
 Asicus a bishop, i. 242, 261, 340, 403, 418.
 Assanus, St. i. 418.
 Assembly at Cashel, iv. 20.
 Astronomical studies cultivated by the Irish, iv. 412.
 Athaddy, abbey of, iv. 186.
 Athassel, monastery of, iv. 335, 336.
 Athboy, great convention at, iv. 188.
 Ath-cliath, now Dublin, blessed by St. Patrick, i. 275.
 Ath-Truim, now Trim. See Trim.
 Athracta, St. i. 245, 247, iii. 39, 43.
 Attala, successor of Columbanus, ii. 295.
 Attracta, i. 245, 247, 429. iii. 39, 43.
 Augulus, St. bishop and martyr, i. 6.
 Augurius St. a bishop, i. 6.
 Augusta, London not the only city so called, i. 8.
 Augustin, St. his legatine powers confined to Britain, iii. 467, 468.
 Augustinian canons, iv. 104, 105, 106, 136, 293, 313, 322, 347.
 Auliff or Amlave or Olave, a Norwegian prince, iii. 326.
 Auliff, son of Godfrid, iii. 373.
 Auliff, king of the Danes, iii. 415.
 Autharius entertains Columbanus, ii. 284.
 Auxilius, St. i. 195, 259, 261, 333.
 Axilius, St. i. 195.

B.

- Bachull Mura, or staff of St. Mura, iii. 37.
 Badoney, church of, i. 264.
 Badonicus, the younger Gildas so called, i. 476.
Baile-chuinnig. See Baldhuninega.
 Bais-leac-mor, or Baslick, St. Sacellus, bishop of, i. 244.
 Baitan, bishop of Clonmacnois, ii. 60, 413.
 Baitan, founder of the monastery of Sath-reginden, ii. 133.
 Baitellach, abbot of Trim, death of, iii. 177.
 Baithan, bishop of Teigh-baithin, ii, 413.
 Baithen, set over one of the monasteries at Ethica, ii. 162.
 Baithen, abbot of Hy, ii. 250. His death 259.
 Baithen, son of Alla, ii. 413.
Baldhuninega or Baldhunnega, money sent for the brethren of, iii. 230, 232.
 Baldoyle, lands of, made over to the priory of All Saints, iv. 186.
 Ballidughgail. See Baldoyle.
 Ballimore Lough Seudy, the house of Gilbertin canons of, iv. 336, 337.
 Ballybaghal, town of, granted to the abbey of St. Mary's, Dublin, iv. 248.
 Ballymoon. See Beallach Mughna.
 Baltinglass, abbey of, iv. 186.
 Banchor or Bangor near Chester, i. 437.
 Banchor, Benchor, or Bangor near Carrickfergus, monastery of, founded by St. Comgall, ii. 62. Plundered and monks killed by the Danes, iii. 270, 272. Waste, iv. 77. Re-established, 78, 79. A stone oratory erected there, iv. 126.
 Bangor. See Banchor.
 Bantry, called Bentraighe, i. 148.
 Baptism, conferred with chrism, iii. 480, seq. Decrees respecting it, iv. 205, 206, 211, 213, 216. Eucharistical, 455. Solemn times for celebrating, 377.
 Baptismal churches, fonts to be immoveably fixed in, iv. 270, 273.
 Barr, St. or St. Finnarr, bishop of Cork, ii. 313, 315, 316.
 Barrindeus, St. ii. 219, 221.
 Barrinthus St. a disciple of St. Brendan, ii. 35, 219, 221.
 Baslick, See Bais-leac-mor.
 Bath, battle of, i. 476, 479.
 Bavo, St. Livin abbot of the monastery of St. 467, 471.
 Bealduleek, supposed to be Baldoyle, iii. 434, 435.
 Beallach Maghna, battle of, iii. 351.
 Bealtinne, a name given to the first of May, i. 226.
 Beauford, error of, noticed, iv. 65.
 Bec, St. surnamed Mac De. Death of, ii. 103.
 Becan, St. of Clonard, iii. 20. His death, 129.
 Becan, several of that name, ii. 396.

- Becatus, St. i. 3, 4, 265.
- Bede, testimony of, concerning Lindisfarne, iii. 76.
- Beer, used by the ancient Irish monks, iv. 353.
- Bees, said to be first brought to Ireland by St. Domnoch, ii. 319, 320.
- Beg-erin, now called Beg-ery, i. 29. School of, 402.
- Beith-luis-nion*, the name of an old Irish alphabet, i. 220.
- Bel, the sun so called, i. 229.
- Belfries, iv. 394, 399, 400, 406.
- Bell, a small one sent to St. Brigid, i. 450.
- Bellilochus, abbey of, ii. 491.
- Benaventa in Britain, i. 491.
- Benchor. See Banchor.
- Benedict, succeeds St. Enda at Arran, ii. 69.
- Benedictine monks introduced into the cathedral of Down, iv. 253.
- Benedictine priories near Cork and Waterford, iv. 337, 339.
- Benefices, ecclesiastical, not to be received from lay persons, iv. 271.
- Benignus, St. disciple of St. Patrick, i. 221, 257, 323, 374, 402. His death, 375. ii. 42.
- Bentraighe*, See Bantry.
- Beoadh, bishop of Ardarn, death of, i. 462, 464.
- Beoan, father of St. Kiernan of Clonmacnois, ii. 50.
- Beoan, a bishop, instructs St. Fursey, ii. 455, 457.
- Berach, St. Abbot of Cluain-Cairpthe, ii. 323, 324, 325.
- Berchan, see Byrchinus.
- Berrindeus. See Saints, Irish, 2d class, ii. 13.
- Bertuin, disciple of St. Fursey, ii. 462, 464.
- Betan and Eochad succeed Domnald and Fergus kings of Ireland, ii. 198, 199.
- Bile, birth place of St. Fechin, iii. 46, 47. Church of erected by him, ib.
- Bile-tortan, near Ardbraccan, i. 271.
- Birr, monastery of founded, ii. 39. Plundered by the Danes, iii. 271.
- Birgitta, St. of Sweden, i. 214.
- Bishops and other eminent men, deaths of several, iii. 381, 386, 428, 451, 452, 487, 488, iv. 51, 98, 99, 341, 342.
- several killed by the Danes, iii. 387.
- Irish decried by Giraldus Cambrensis, iv. 286, 288.
- lay, possessing the see of Armagh, iv. 31, 33.
- multiplication of, iv. 35.
- regulations respecting them, iv. 382.
- subordinate to abbots, ii. 253. seq.
- Bithan, abbot of Clonmacnois, iii. 34.
- Bitheus, a bishop, buried at Rath-cungu, i. 341.
- Blacar, a Northman king, recovers Dublin from the Irish, iii. 374, Killed, 375.

- Black Abbey. See St. Andrew de Stokes.
- Blaithmaic, St. goes over to Hy, and is killed by the Danes, iii. 253, 255.
- Blathmac Hua Muirgeavair, St. abbot of Durrough, iii. 255.
- Blathmac son of Aidus Slaine, expels St. Carthagh from Raithen, ii. 352.
- Blessed Virgin Mary de arvi campo, abbey of the. See Kilcoul.
- Bobbio, monastery of, ii. 146, 294, 295.
- Boetan II. monarch of Ireland, ii. 198, 199.
- Boetius, St. bishop of Monaster, i. 461, 463.
- Bogs, the retreats of the Irish, iv. 359.
- Boisil, prior of Mailros, death of, iii. 89.
- Bolcan. See Olcanus.
- Bonaven, Bonaun and Bononia, i. 93.
- Bonavem Taberniæ, i. 93, 103.
- Boniface, St. bishop of Saltzburgh, iii. 178. Disputes between him and Virgilius, 182. Accuses Virgilius to the Pope, ib.
- Borchan, see Berchinus
- Borneach, nunnery of, iii. 14.
- Boulogne, diocese of, governed by St. Patrick, i. 96.
- Boyle, Peter O'Mordha, first abbot of, iv. 218.
- Bracan, father of Canoc, i. 424.
- Braccae, a kind of garment, iv. 362.
- Brandubh, bishop of Hy-kinsellagh, ii. 228.
- Brandubh, king of Leinster, defeats Aidus son of Ainmirech, ii. 198. Grants land to St. Maidoc to erect a monastery, 337. Convoles a synod, 338.
- Brecan, brother of St. Cairnech, i. 494.
- Breçpere, Nicholas, afterwards Pope Adrian the fourth, iv. 155.
- Bree, St. surnamed the wise, death of, iii. 163.
- Breffny, bishop of, iv. 344.
- Bregh (Meath) iii. 307.
- Bregenses, the country of, i. 212.
- Brendan, St. abbot of Inisquin, i. 450, 452.
- Brendan, St. of Clonfert, i. 450. ii. 22, 28, 29, 30, 92.
- Brendan, some of his sisters receive the veil from St. Senan, ii. 3.
- Brendan, St. of Birr, ii. 38. Death of, 39.
- Brendans, i. 32, 288, 292.
- Brendans, two of that name. See saints, Irish, 2d class, ii. 13.
- Bressel, abbot of Hy, iii. 232, 252.
- Breuil, monastery of, ii. 446.
- Brevy, synod of, i. 470.
- Brian Boroimhe, several particulars relating to him, iii. 391, 414, 415, 416, 417, 422, 424.
- Brian Catha Dun, ancestor of the O'Neills of Clandeboys, iv. 334.
- Breccius or Briction, bishop of Tours, i. 413.
- Brideus, king of the North Picts, ii. 63.
- Briga, mother of St. Comgall, ii. 61.

- Briga, sister to Brendan, ii. 30.
 Brigh-Thaig, or Brigh-mac Thaidhg, synod of, iv. 167.
 Brigid, sister to Andrew deacon of Fiesole, iii. 281, 284.
 Brigid, St. several particulars relating to her, i. 68, 335, 377, 385, 386, 389, 390, 402, 403, 406, 407, 450, 451, 455, 457, 458, 461. iv. 274.
 Brigid, St. nunnery of, at Kildare, i. 405.
 Britain, on the Continent, i. 113.
 British Islands. Ireland reckoned one of them, i. 2.
 Britons of Albion, colonists from the Britannia of the Continent, i. 106, origin of, 110.
 Brogan, St. of Rostuirc, author of a Life of St. Brigid, i. 379.
 Bron or Bronus, bishop of Cassel Irra, i. 242, 244, 340, 410, 435.
 Brude, king of the North Picts, ii. 154.
 Brugacius, a bishop, ii. 77, 79.
 Brunechild, queen, persecutes St. Columbanus, ii. 275.
Buidhe Chonuill, many great saints die of the, in A. D. 464, iii. 55, 58.
 Bull of Pope Adrian IV. sent into Ireland, iv. 222.
 Buo, an Irishman, distinguished in Iceland, iii. 343, 344.
 Burials, to be in consecrated ground, iv. 270, 273.
 Byrchin. See Irish saints 2d Class.
 Byrchinus, called Berchan, and Borchan, supposed to be the same as St. Mobhy Clairineach ii. 223, 226.

C.

- Cadoc, St. of Lancarvan, called also Cadocus or Docus, a nephew of St. Canoc of Gallen, i. 426, 469, 478, 489, 490, 491.
 Cadroc, St. a British Scot, educated in Armagh, iii. 396, 397, 398, 401.
 Caide, St. bishop of Hy, iii. 153.
 Caidoc, St. an Irish priest distinguished for piety in Picardy, ii. 442, 443.
 Cailan or Coelan, St. abbot of Antrim, i. 422, 423. No sufficient proofs to show that he was bishop of Down, ii. 183.
 Cainchomrac Mac Maeluidhir, bishop and abbot of Derry, iii. 370.
 Caincomrach, abbot of Hy, death of, iii. 370.
 Cainech or Canice, or Kenny, St. of Aghabo, ii. 13, 177, 188, 200. iii. 25, Cairlan, St. archbishop of Armagh, ii. 183, 303.
 Cairngrainey, or heap of the sun, county Antrim, Druidic remains there, i. 229.
 Caisseal-irra, or West Cashel, i. 242, 257.
 Callaghan Cashel, defeats the Northmen, iii. 374.
 Calrigia, inhabitants of, oppose St. Patrick, i. 256.
 Cambos or Camus, monastery of, subordinate to Bangor or Benchor, ii. 67. Governed by St. Colman, iii. 146.

- Caimin, St. erected a monastery at Iniskeltra, ii. 74. Death of, iii. 11.
- Campbell, author of Strictures on Ecclesiastical History of Ireland, errors of, i. 56. iii. 155.
- Campus Girgin*, in Irish Magh Girgin, the district now called Mearns in Scotland, i. 39, 44.
- Can or Coun, father of Gildas, said to be king of Arecluta, or Alcluide, i. 477.
- Canice, St. a pupil of St. Cadoc, i. 490.
- Cannera, St. a nun, buried in St. Senan's Island of Iniscatthy, ii. 6.
- Canoc or Mochonoc, founder of the monastery of Gallen, i. 424.
- Canons of the synod of Dublin, iv. 269. Various Irish, 376 to 391.
- Canons of St. Victor, iv. 293.
- Canons, or Canons Regular of St. John Lateran, i. 187.
- Canons Regular of St. Augustine, not known until the eleventh century, i. 187. Established at Scone and other places instead of the Culdees, iv. 309, 312. Established in Dublin, 317.
- Canons Secular. See Secular Canons.
- Canterbury, archbishop of, erroneously said to have jurisdiction over the bishops of Ireland, iii. 464.
- Captives, brought into Ireland from Gaul and Britain, i. 14.
- Carantock or Carnech, a British saint, not to be confounded with St. Carnech of Ireland, i. 495.
- Carantocus, abbot of Salix supplies Columbanus and his companions with provisions, ii. 266.
- Carbre or Carpre, a holy bishop, i. 25.
- Carbre Riada obtains the territory called after him Dal Rieda, ii. 242.
- Carbria or Carbria Midensis, a territory at the boundary of Meath, ii. 100.
- Carbria Hua Keairda*, ii. 100.
- Carecha, St. a holy virgin, sister of St. Enda, i. 399. ii. 234, 235.
- Carlisle, an error of, noted, iii. 4.
- Carnech, St. abbot and bishop of a church near Loughfoyle, i. 494, 495.
- Carpre Mac Feredach, abbot of Disart Dermod, iii. 368.
- Carpreus of Kill-chairpre, i. 425.
- Carragh, barony of, a district in county Mayo, anciently called Cera, i. 243.
- Carrig-Howel in the Isle of Anglesey. Hoel killed there by king Arthur, i. 482.
- Carthacus, St. one of St. Patrick's disciples, i. 338.
- Carthagh, St. the elder, grandson of Aengus king of Cashel, ii. 98, 99. Ordains St. Carthagh of Lismore, 351.
- Carthagh, St. of Lismore, ii. 20, 351, 352.

- Carthan, a chieftain near Loughneagh, opposes St. Patrick and compels him to quit his territory, i. 266. But his brother, also called Carthan, became a convert, ib.
- Carthan, St. or St. Maccarthen, appointed bishop of Clogher. i. 308.
- Carthan, son of Blod, a Munster prince said to be baptized by St. Patrick, i. 268.
- Carthan Fionn, king of Munster, defeated by the Danes, iii. 326.
- Carthar, surnamed Coche, father of St. Lugeus or Molua, ii. 205.
- Cashel, made over to God and St. Patrick by Murtoch O'Brien, king of Munster, iv. 20. Generally recognized as a metropolitan see, 37, 40. The town burnt, 50. A church erected there by Cormac Mc-Carthy, 74, 75. Consecrated, 97, 99. Raised to the rank of a metropolitan see, 112. The great cathedral of erected, 218. The town burnt, 238.
- Cashel, Calender of, i. 67.
- Cashel, synod of, i. 284, 286. iv. 204. Decrees passed there, 206 to 209. These decrees disregarded, 217.
- Cassidan, or Cassideus, the abbot, a native of Kierruighe Chuirke, i. 447.
- Cassidanus, St. Senan goes to the monastery of, ii. 90.
- Castle-buy, the commandery of, iv. 339, 340.
- Castle-Dermot said to be the burial place of Cormac Mc-Culinan, iii. 355, 356.
- Cathald, abbot and bishop of Clondalkin, death of, iii. 323.
- Cathald, Mac Corbmac, bishop of Clonfert, death of, iii. 323.
- Cathaldus or Cataldus, St. bishop of Tarentum, i. 5. iii. 121, 124.
- Cathasach Mac Robertach, archbishop of Armagh, called prince of Armagh, iii. 323, 325.
- Cathasach, II. archbishop of Armagh, succeeds Maol-Patrick, iii. 369, 371.
- Cathmal, alias Cadoc, a holy man, i. 464.
- Cathub, St. abbot of Achadcinn, i. 267. Death of, ii. 103.
- Cathuir-mac-Conchaidh, monastery of, iii. 27.
- Caylan or Cailan, St. abbot of Antrim, SS. Finnian and Colman, disciples of, i. 431, 432.
- Cayman, St. of Dair-inis, i. 27, 464, 465, 466.
- Ceadda, placed over the see of York by Oswin,^r iii. 78.
- Ceallachan Cashel, presents to the monastery of Clonfert plunder taken from the Danes, iii. 374.
- Ceancroith* of Jocelin, the same as Cean-groith, i. 229.
- Cean-groith*, or head of the sun, what, i. 229.
- Ceannchora, the palace of, destroyed, iv. 50.
- Cearbhal, king of Leinster, assists Flann Sionna monarch of Ireland against Cormac Mc-Culinan, iii. 351.
- Cedd, converts the middle Angles, ii. 428, is appointed bishop of the East Saxons by Finan of Lindisfarne, ib.
- Ceile De*, a surname of Aengus the Hagiologist, iii. 245, 248. Signification of the words, iv. 301.

- Cele-Christus, St. erects a monastery at Hidonchadha, iii. 162.
- Celemaria, a holy virgin, i. 266.
- Celestine, Pope, death of, i. 207.
- Celestius, an Irishman, a disciple of Pelagius, i. 16.
- Celibacy of Ecclesiastics, iv. 366.
- Ce-licyth, synod of, iii. 275, 276.
- Cellach, or Kelly, successor of Conomail Mac Cartiaig, bishop of Emly, iii. 153.
- Cellach Hua Sealbaigh, successor of Columba-mac-Ciaracain, bishop of Cork, iii. 410, 412.
- Cellaiaro, de.* See of, iv. 345.
- Cell-fine*, church of, erected by St. Patrick, i. 38, 41.
- Celsus, St. succeeds Domnald as archbishop of Armagh, iv. 10, 30; endeavours to correct abuses, 31; makes a visitation of Ulster, Munster, Connaught, &c. 31, 32, 45; appointed also bishop of Dublin, 45; character of, by St. Bernard, 33; story of his wife, ib. desires that St. Malachy may succeed him, 89; grandson of Moeliosa, iii. 451.
- Celts, the country of, i. 117.
- Ceman, St. ii. 13.
- Cemanus, probably the same as Coemans, ii. 222, 226.
- Canfado, bishop of Emly, iii. 387, 410.
- Cennanus, or Kennanus, supposed to be the same as St. Kienan of Duleek, i. 341.
- Centula, monastery of, erected by Richarius, ii. 442.
- Ceollach, a Scot, bishop of the middle Angles, ii. 428.
- Conderbhe, an idol of king Leogaire, i. 229.
- Ceolfred abbot of Girevy, iii. 160.
- Cera*, the ancient name of the district now called the barony of Carragh, i. 245.
- Cera, St. or Chier, Virgin, death of, iii. 129, 131.
- Cerbanus, bishop of Fearta-Cerbain, near Tarah, i. 419.
- Cetamaria, a holy Virgin, i. 266.
- Cethecus, disciple of St. Patrick, i. 244, 245, 258, 385, 419.
- Cethenus, a disciple of St. Patrick, i. 246.
- Cethuberius, the first Irish virgin that took the veil, i. 269.
- Chalices, four of glass, mentioned by Jocelin, and in the tripartite life of St. Patrick, i. 15. By a decree of the synod of Dublin in 1186, it was ordained, that chalices should be made of gold, silver or pewter, iv. 269. St. Columbanus used chalices made of brass. Glass chalices used in various countries, 272.
- Chalons sur Soane, decree of the synod of, against Irish bishops, iii. 274.
- Channeric, a nobleman of Meaux, welcomes St. Columbanus, ii. 284. He receives the saints, blessing. ib.
- Chapters, the three, ii. 290.
- Charlemagne, sovereign of France, grants the monastery of St. Augustin, near Pavia, to Albinus, an Irishman, iii. 209.
- Childeric, son of Meroveus king of the Franks at the time of Gildass tour, i. 485.

- Children, English, sold by their parents as slaves to the Irish, iv. 196—Catechized before the door of churches, 285.
- Chillen, an Irish bishop, received into St. Faro's monastery at Meaux, ii. 446.
- Chore, foundation of the abbey of, iv. 248.
- Chorepiscopi, styled bishops, great numbers in Ireland, ii. 318. The order of, general in Ireland, ii. 128. Long kept up there, iii. 477. The system of, iv. 35. Error of Usher respecting them, iv. 80. Decree of the council of Kells respecting them, 323, 324.
- Chrism used in baptism, iii. 478. iv. 397, and in the consecration of churches and altars, iv. 397.
- Christ-church, Dublin, foundation of, iii. 434. Secular canons of, made canons regular, iv. 173.
- Christianity, when introduced into Ireland, i. 1. Spread among the Danes, iii. 427. Received in Ireland without martyrs, iv. 287.
- Christians, some in Ireland before the 3d century, i. 15.
- Christian congregations in Ireland before the mission of Palladius, i. 9.
- Church of the Irish, had canons peculiar to herself, iv. 376. Of the British Scots no considerable one before the mission of Palladius, i. 35.
- Churches, erected by Palladius in Ireland, i. 38. Considered sanctuaries, iv. 285. Built of wood, and also of stone, 392, 393, 397. Dedications and consecrations of, 395. Canon respecting them, 396. Anointed with Chrism, 397. Built near round towers, 408.
- Church lands exempted from tribute, &c. and their revenues confirmed to the bishops, iv. 42.
- Cian, the Eugenian prince, claims the throne of Munster, iii. 425.
- Cieran, or Kieran, of the 2d class of Irish Saints, ii. 13.
- Cinna daughter of Eochodius, becomes a nun, i. 266.
- Cinne or Cinnia, a holy Saint, i. 127.
- Cinnum, St. or Cinne-noem, the meaning of the name of, i. 127.
- Cistercian first established in Ireland, iv. 117, 120.
- Cistercian abbeys of Mellifont, Bective, Boyle, Magio or Nenay, and Baltinglass, foundations of the, iv. 117, 119, 137, 138.
- Clain-bile, Cluain-bile, or Cluain-foda in Meath, the residence of St. Etchen, ii. 125, 126.
- Clairvaux in France, the monastery of St. Bernard. St. Malachy asks permission from the pope to spend the remainder of his days there, iv. 111. Leaves four of his monks there to learn the Cistercian rules, 112, 117, dies there, 133.
- Clanbrassil, the birth place of Ailill or Ailild, archbishop of Armagh, i. 440.
- Clandeboy, North and South, where situate, i. 218.

- Clane in Kildare, called Cluain-damh, i. 441. Synod of, iv. 175.
- Claudius, bishop of Turin, destroys all the images and crosses in his diocese, iii. 259, 262. Is written against by Dungall, an Irishman, ib. Confounded with Clemens, an Irishman, ib.
- Clemens an Irishman, with his companion Albinus arrives in France, ii. 207. Many boys committed to his care by Charlemagne, 209, 210. Said to be the founder of the university of Paris, 214. Confounded with Claudius, an Irishman. 217.
- Clemens, the companion of Marianus, dies in Jerusalem, iv. 4.
- Clergy of Ireland assembled to celebrate the funeral obsequies of St. Patrick, i. 364. Complain to Aidus V. of being compelled to go on military expeditions, iii. 244. Are exempted from such service, ib. Incontinency of, mentioned, iv. 242, 243. Their custom of drinking after dinner, 266, 268. Their virtues and chastity, 266, 267. Incorrectness of Fleury respecting them, 268. Canon respecting them, 270. The marriage of, 389. Not to be spectators of games or sports, nor to sing at banquets, 387, 389.
- Clergy, English and Welch, their incontinence reprov'd, iv. 265.
- Clerks, wives of, iv. 364, 366, 367. Marriage of, condemned, 365. Prohibited from visiting women not their relations, 386, 389.
- Cliach, plain of, county Limerick, i. 390.
- Clotheagh*, meaning of, iv. 394, 406.
- Cloghachd*, its derivation, iv. 406.
- Clogher, called Cluaineois, Clunes, or Clones, the see of St. Mac-carthen, i. 434, 436.
- Clonard, commencement of the school of, i. 464, 469. St. Finnian's removal to, 465. Abbot and bishop of, ii. 21, 23. Devastated by the Danes, iii. 346. One of the established sees of Meath, iv. 42. Eugene, bishop of, assumed the title of bishop of Meath, 322, 323. The see of removed to Newtown near Trim, 322. The nunnery of confirmed in its possessions by the Pope, 327.
- Clondalkin, iii. 202, 203. Property of the see of Dublin, iv. 240.
- Clonenagh, St. Comgall enters into the monastery of, under St. Fintan, ii. 62, 64. Ravaged, iii. 374, 375.
- Clonfert-Brendan, monastery of, founded by St. Brendan, its first abbot, ii. 30. Meaning of the name, 35. Moena its first bishop, 36. Burned by the Danes, iii. 271, iv. 182.
- Clonfert-Molua, monastery of founded, ii. 206, 211. Devastated by the Northmen, iii. 377.
- Clonleigh or Cluain-laodh, monastery of, i. 495.
- Clonmacnois, granted to St. Kieran, i. 56. Monastery founded, ii. 52. Visited by St. Columb-kill, 243. Plundered and burned by the Danes, iii. 271, 374, 376. Pillaged, 377. Several times plundered, 491, 493. Pillaged, iv. 55. Burned, 182.
- Clonmore, monastery of, established by St. Maidoc, ii. 337. St.

- Finnian said to have been abbot there, iii. 84. Burned by the Danes, 271. Pillaged, 273.
- Clontarf, battle of, iii. 419, 423. Commandery of, iv. 339.
- Cloyne, St. Colman of, ii. 217. Plundered by the Danes, iii. 391.
- Clotharius, son of Chilperic, receives St. Columbanus kindly, ii. 283. Becomes king of the whole French monarchy, 294. Sends Eustatius in search of Columbanus, ib.
- Cluain-airdne, church of, i. 248.
- Cluain-ard-Mobecoc, monastery of, supposed to be founded by St. Becan, iii. 20.
- Cluain-bile or Cluainfoda, ii. 125, 126.
- Cluain-braoin, abbey of, i. 350.
- Cluain-bronach, nunnery of, i. 405. Kelbil, abbot of, iii. 192. marked as Clonbrone, 193.
- Cluain-borean*, Carecha, called the Virgin of, ii. 235.
- Cluain-cairpthe, establishment of, founded by St. Berach, ii. 324.
- Cluain-claidhech, monastery of, erected by St. Maidoc, ii. 339.
- Cluain-Credhail, nunnery of, ii. 33. St. Ita fixes her residence there, 83.
- Cluain-Dachran, establishment of, ii. 357, 361.
- Cluain-Damh. See Clane.
- Cluain-dolcain. See Clondalkin.
- Cluain-duach, monastery of, founded by St. Coemgen, ii. 44.
- Cluain-ednach and Cluainenagh. See Clonenagh.
- Cluain-foda. See Clainbile.
- Cluain-fois, monastery of, founded by St. Iarlath, ii. 41.
- Cluain-in-fide, a cell of St. Brigid, i. 449.
- Cluain-laodh, now Clonleigh, i. 495.
- Cluain-mac-nois. See Clon-macnois.
- Cluain-maithchin in Leix, ii. 303.
- Cluain-mhic-trein, St. Fintan of Clonenagh baptized there, ii. 227.
- Cluain-uamhach, now Cloyne, ii. 217.
- Cluayn-duach, said to be the same as Glendalough, ii. 48.
- Cnobhersberg, monastery of, erected by St. Fursey, ii. 458.
- Cnodain, near Easruaidh, monastery of, ii. 222.
- Cobhtach Mac Muridach, abbot of Kildare, death of, iii. 329.
- Cocchea, St. first abbess of Ross Benchair, i. 405.
- Coelan St. of Iniskeltra, supposed to be the same as Chilien who lived in the 8th century, i. 381.
- Coelan St. the same as St. Cailan, abbot of Antrim, and afterwards bishop of Down, i. 422.
- Coelchu, see Colga the wise.
- Coelicolae*, the Colidei, so called by Giraldus, iv. 290.
- Coeman, several saints of that name, i. 269, ii. 222.
- Coeman, brother of St. Athracta, i. 245, ii. 223.
- Coeman, St. of the 2d class of Irish saints, ii. 13.
- Coeman, St. brother to St. Coemhgen or Kevin, said to have been abbot of Airdne-Coemhan, ii. 221, 223.

- Coeman, St. disciple of St. Columba of Tirdeglass, abbot of Anachtrim, ii. 71, 74, 222, 224, 225.
- Coeman, St. or Comman of Roscommon, ii. 225.
- Coeman Breac, St. abbot of Roseach in Meath, iii. 51, 52.
- Coemban, St. abbot of Enachtrim, ii. 74.
- Coemella, mother of St. Coemgen, ii. 43.
- Coemgall or Coemgell. See Comgall.
- Coemgella, mother of St. Senan, i. 445.
- Coemgen or Coemhgen, or Kevin, St. of the 2d class of Irish Saints, ii. 13. His parentage, 43; baptized by St. Cronan, ib. and at 46, founds his establishment at Glendaloch, 44; death of, ib.
- Coemhan, St. See Coeman, St.
- Coemlog, father of St. Kevin, ii. 43.
- Coenchomrac, bishop and abbot of Louth, death of, iii. 323.
- Coenfeolad, king of Cashel, succeeds Maine, bishop of Emly, iii. 322.
- Cogitosus, his account of St. Brigid, i. 68. A monk of Kildare, exalts the dignity of that see, 407.
- Coins, Danish, iii. 359.
- Colbdi, or Colp, harbour of, i. 220.
- Colga, alias Coelchu the wise, president of the school of Clonmacnois, iii. 228.
- Colga, abbot of Lusk, present at the synod of Flan Febhla, iii. 140.
- Colga. See Colgeus:
- Colgeus or Colga, placed over the church of Kilcolgan, ii. 328.
- Colgeus or Colgu, a disciple of St. Columbkil, ii. 328.
- Colgeus, brother of St. Faila, ii. 328.
- Colgu. See Colgeus.
- Colidei, spared by Godfrid, king of the Danes of Dublin, in his attack upon Armagh, iii. 367. Disquisition regarding them, iv. 290, to 303.
- Colla-Huais, king of Ireland, ii. 2.
- Collatus, priest of Drumrelgeach in Meath, i. 87.
- Colle victoria*, abbey De, founded, iv. 319.
- Colman, a bishop, foretels the future greatness of St. Declan, i. 25.
- Colman, St. a disciple of St. Patrick, dies of thirst, i. 319.
- Colman, St. bishop of Dromore, a pupil of Coelan or Caylan, 424, 431, 432. Studies the scriptures under Ailbe of Emly, ib. Erects a monastery on the bank of the river Locha, ib.
- Colman of the 2d class of Irish Saints, ii. 13—Of the 3d class of Irish Saints, 331.
- Colman, surnamed Mutine, son of Lenine, resorts to St. Iarlath's school at Cluainfois, ii. 41, 42, 213.
- Colman, son of Comgellan, decides against the claim of Aidus king of Scotland to Dalriada, ii. 238.
- Colman, St. called Columban, son of Beognai, and called Colman-

- elo, churches and monasteries erected by him, ii. 304, 307, 308.
- Colman of Kilmacduach, a bishop of the 3d class of Irish saints, ii. 341. Founds Kill-mac-duach, 342. Death of, ib. and 344.
- Colman, son of Dairene, or Daire, of Doire-mor, ii. 310, 343. iii. 25.
- Colman, St. of Lindisfarne, different from Colman of Kilmacduach, ii. 343. Succeeds St. Finan at Lindisfarne, 429. Defends the Irish mode of calculating the Paschal festival, iii. 59, 60. Resigns the See of Lindisfarne, 75. Brings away all the Irish monks from Lindisfarne, 79. Goes to Hy; erects the monastery of Inisbofinda, and that of May-eo; death of, ib.
- Colman-Mac-Feraidh, prince of Ossory, the patron of St. Cai-nech or Kenny, ii. 201.
- Colman, several of that name, iii. 4.
- Colman Hua Fiachra, abbot of the monastery of Seanbotha, iii. 2.
- Colman Stellan, abbot of Tirdeglass, ii. 2.
- Colman of Cloyne, ii. 212, 216.
- Colman, son of Comgell, iii. 4.
- Colman Huabardan, abbot of Clonmacnois, iii. 4.
- Colman, abbot of Glendaloch, iii. 4.
- Colman Cass, abbot of Clonmacnois, iii. 4. Carried off by a pestilence, 55.
- Colman, abbot of Clonmacnois, death of, iii. 128.
- Colman, called Mocholmoc, bishop and abbot of Lismore, iii. 145, 146.
- Colman, surnamed Hua-machensis, death of, iii. 163.
- Colman of Telach-uallen, death of, iii. 163.
- Colman O'Liathan, bishop of Lismore, death of, iii. 163.
- Colman, surnamed Brittanicus, abbot of Slane, death of, iii. 191.
- Colman, abbot of Kinnity, slain at the battle of Beallach Mughna, iii. 354.
- Colman Mac Alild, abbot and bishop of Clonard and Clonmacnois, death of, iii. 368.
- Colman, patron of Austria leaves Ireland, iii. 431. Arrives in Austria, is seized on, tortured and hanged, ib. Interred in the church yard of Stockereau, honored as a Martyr, and his body, being found entire, placed in St. Peter's church at Medlica or Melek, 439.
- Colmanel of Muckmore, confounded with Colman of Dromore, i. 431.
- Coludi, now Coldingham in Scotland, iii. 97.
- Columb, a holy priest placed by St. Patrick over the district of Imchclair, i. 266, 269.
- Columb, St. of Tirdaglass, attends St. Finnian of Clonard in his last illness, ii. 22; founds the monastery of Tirdaglass, 71, 74; death of, ib.

Columba, St. or St. Columb-kill, his life written by Adamnan, i. 61 ; his sanctity foretold by St. Patrick, 262 ; his grandfather a Christian, 394. Of the 2d class of Irish Saints, ii. 13 ; founds the monastery of Kilmore-deathruib, 12, 133. Commencement of his history, 106 ; his parentage, ib. his first name, ib. Sent to the school of St. Finnian of Maghbile. 117, attends the lecture of St. Finnian of Clonard, ib.—founds the monasteries of Doire-Calgaich, now Derry, and Dair-magh, now Durogh, 118. Ordained priest by St. Etchen instead of bishop, through mistake, 126 ; founds the monastery of Kennanus, now Kells, in Meath, ib. Several monasteries and churches said to be erected by him, 132, 133. Swords not erected by him, ib. Monastery of Eac-mac-neirc, said to be erected by him, 133. By his prayers Diernit king of Ireland is defeated at the battle of Culdremni, 145. Not the cause of that battle as has been asserted, 149. Pays a visit to St. Finnian of Maghbile and St. Brendan of Birr, ib. The island of I-Columb-kill or Hy, granted to him by Conall, king of the Albanian Scots, 154. Erects his monastery and church there, ib. Undertakes the conversion of the northern Picts, ib. His mission confirmed by miracles, 155. His exertions attended with success, 161. Penetrates as far as the Orkney islands, ib. Finds a monastery in the island of Hinba or Hymba, and is there visited by Saints Comgall, Cainnech, Brendan of Clonfert, and Cormac Hua Leathain, 162. Visits Sky, and is said to have made some establishments there, ib. Excommunicates some members of the royal family who had plundered some of his convents, 163. Attempted to be murdered, ib. Superintends the ecclesiastical affairs of the British Scots, 172. Visits St. Kentigern, ib. Inaugurates Aidan king of the British Scots, 173. His history continued, 236. Goes to the assembly of Drumceat, ib. Is treated with respect by Aidus the king of Ireland, 237. Prevents the suppression of the order of poets, ib. Declines deciding on the dispute between Aidan and Aidus about the territory of Dalriada, 238. Endeavours ineffectually to procure the liberation of Scanlan prince of Ossory, but gives him his blessing, ib. Visits the monastery of Derry, and some others of his own foundation ; and also Clonmacnois, 243. Has an interview with St. Comgall of Bangor, 244. Goes to Coleraine, ib. Again at Hy, ib. Particulars of his last days, and of his death, ib. and 245. His shrine and reliques removed to the main land of N. Britain, to preserve them from the Danes, iii. 252. Brought into Ireland for the same purpose, 274, 326, 327. His body originally buried in Down, iv. 274. See Columbkil.

Columba, son of Crimthan, buried at Tirdaglass.

Columba of Iniskeltra, death of, ii. 73.

Columban Hua Telduibh, bishop of Clonard, ii. 412.

Columbanus, founder of the monastery of Bobbio, a monk of

- Bangor, i. 60. Educated at Bangor, ii. 63. A disciple of St. Comgall, and founder of the monasteries of Luxeuil and Bobbio, 146. Commencement of his history, 261. His education under Senile and St. Comgall at Bangor, ib. Goes to Britain and Gall, 262. His companions on that journey, 263, 264. His arrival in France, 265. Preaches the word of God there, 266. Erects the monastery of Luxovium, now Luxeu, or corruptly Luxeuil, 267; and also that of Fontaines, ib. His rule, 268, iv. 348, 350, 351, 357, 359, 367, 371. Miracles, 269. Observes and defends the Irish system of computing Easter time, 270. Persecuted by Queen Brunehild, 275. Banished from his monastery by order of Theodoric, 278. Foretels the elevation of Clotharius to the throne, 279. Arrives at Orleans, 280. Visits the tomb of St. Martin at Tours, and foretels the destruction of Theodoric and his family, 282. Arrives at Nantes, ib. Leaves Nantes, and proceeds to the kingdom of Clotharius, 283. Proceeds to Mentz, 285. To Arbona, ib. Preaches to the Suevi, converts and baptizes many of them, 286. Destroys three pagan images at Bregentz, converts their temple into a church, and erects a monastery there, 287. Sets out for Italy, and arrives at Milan, 289. Confutes the Arians, ib. Writes to Pope Boniface IV. relative to the question of the three Chapters, 290. Founds the monastery of Bobbio, 294. His death, and miracles performed at his tomb, 295. Used the Cursus Scotorum, iv. 368.
- Columbanus, a Leinster bishop, visits St. Ita, ii. 84.
- Columbanus, son of Echad, founder of the monastery of Snamlaithir, ii. 133.
- Columbanus, son of Beognai, visits St. Columbkil, ii. 177.
- Columbanus, surnamed Mocu-Loigre, ii. 177, 309.
- Columbanus of the district of Laighis, directed to St. Fintan by St. Columbkil, ii. 229.
- Columbanus, a monk, companion of St. Columbanus of Bobbio, ii. 264.
- Columbanus, an Irish monk in France, contemporary with Charles the Bald, iii. 320.
- Columbanus, an Irish abbot, retires to the monastery of Ghent, where he dies, iii. 403, 404.
- Columbean order of monks, iv. 297, 298, 299, 300, 347, 348.
- Columbinus, a disciple of St. Deicolus, appointed abbot of Leuthra, ii. 440.
- Columcille.* See St. Columba and St. Columbkil.
- Colum-crag, a friend of St. Fintan, ii. 407.
- Columbkil, St. birth of, four years prior to that of St. Brigid, i. 455. Dispute between him and St. Finnian of Maghfile about a copy of the Scriptures, ii. 27. Not born until the year 519, 64. Known by the name of St. Columba, 69. Proposes to the king Aidus and the nobles at an assembly, to give some land to

- St. Colman to build a monastery, ii. 304. His prophecy concerning St. Fintan Munnu, 405. Rules of his order, iv. 104. Spent part of his leisure time in transcribing books, iv. 356. His Mass, 369, 371.
- Columellus*. See Colman, son of Beognai or Colmanelo.
- Colman, St. accompanies St. Kilian to France, and is there martyred, iii. 116.
- Colp, harbour of, i. 220. Monastery of Augustinian Canons of, erected, iv. 252.
- Coman or Comman, a bishop, iii. 128.
- Coman, surnamed of Ferns, iii. 11, 12, 128.
- Coman, a priest of the 3d class of Irish saints, ii. 331.
- Comber. See Comerer.
- Comerer, alias Comber or Cumber, abbot of founded, iv. 344.
- Comgall, St. of Bangor, when born, i. 432. Mass of, ii. 20. His family, 61. Goes to Clonenagh, ib. Ordained priest, 62. Returns to his own country and founds the monastery of Bangor, ib. Followed the liturgy introduced by St. Patrick, 63. Goes to Britain, ib. Returns to Ireland and dies, ib. Master of Lugeus, 205. A disciple of St. Fintan of Clonenagh, 227, 230. Used the Cursus Scotorum, iv. 368.
- Comgall, abbot of Bothchonais brother of St. Cele-Christus, iii. 162.
- Comgall II. monarch of Ireland, defeats the Danes, iii. 375.
- Comgan, St. succeeds St. Diermit in Glean-ussin, ii. 76, 78. Sends for St. Ita, 88.
- Comhorba. See Comorba.
- Comin, bishop of Antrim, death of, iii. 36.
- Comman, St. death of, iii. 177, 178.
- Commian, a priest of the 3d class of Irish saints, ii. 331.
- Commian or Cummian, St. his rule, iv. 365, 366.
- Commian, abbot of Clonmacnois, ii. 400.
- Comorba, Comorban, or Corbe, meaning of the name and office explained, ii. 37. iv. 30, seq.
- Cona, brother of Sacellus, i. 245. Supposed to be the same as Mochonna, 248.
- Conain Mac Failbe, made abbot of Hy, iii. 150, his death, 153.
- Conaing, or Conang O'Daithil, comorba of Ailbe of Emly, ii. 400. Death of, iii. 34.
- Conal, St. from whom the church of Kilconnel or Kill-chonail takes its name, i. 429.
- Conal, surnamed Culbannus, and Conal Crimthannus, son of Neill Neigiellach, ii. 111, 112.
- Conall, a brother of the monarch Leogair, blessed by St. Patrick, i. 262.
- Conall, grandfather of St. Columba, a Christian, i. 394.
- Conall, king of the Albanian Scots, grants the Island of Hy to St. Columba, ii. 154, 154.
- Conall, bishop of Coleraine, entertains St. Columb-kille, ii. 244, 246.

- Conall, king of Ireland, killed by Diermit, son of Aidh-slaine, ii. 302.
- Conall, St. bishop of Killskire, death of, iii. 323.
- Conall Cearnach, said to have been present at the death of our Saviour, i. 3.
- Conan, a priest, supposed by Colgan to be the same as Canoc or Mochonoc, i. 426.
- Conan, one of the 2d class of Irish saints, ii. 13.
- Conan or Conanus, surnamed Conan Dil, or Conna Dil, abbot of a monastery at Cnodan, near Easruaidh, ii. 222, 226.
- Conaught devastated by Donogh, son of Dubhdavoirean, king of Cashel, and Carrol prince of Ossory, iii. 327. Visitation of, by Gelasius archbishop of Armagh, iv. 115. Invaded by Fitz-Adelm, 235.
- Concenmathair, bishop of Emly, death of, iii. 339.
- Conchea, or Cocchea, first abbess of Ross-Benchuir, i. 405.
- Conchenna, St. abbess of Killslieve, death of, iii. 39, 42.
- Conchenna, St. daughter of Kellaigh Chualan, iii. 170.
- Conches, Conchessa, or Conques, mother of St. Patrick, i. 123.
- Concordance of the 4 Gospels, a beautiful one preserved at Kildare, iv. 289.
- Condla Mac Dunican, bishop and prince of Leighlin, iii. 370.
- Confederacies, how formed in Ireland, iv. 284, 285.
- Confession, auricular, frequent use of it recommended by St. Malachy, iv. 63, 67. The neglect of it censured, 86.
- Conflagrations, several by the Irish and Danes, iii. 491.
- Cong, abbots of the monastery of, iii. 48. The see of, iv. 344.
- Congall, monarch of Ireland, a Christian, i. 56.
- Congall, II. monarch of Ireland succeeds Dunchad II. on the throne, iii. 366. Takes Dublin, plunders and burns the town, and exterminates the Danish inhabitants, 374. Killed fighting against the Danes, 366.
- Congall, Kennmagar, monarch of Ireland, succeeds Longsech on the throne, iii. 144. Said to have persecuted the clergy of Kildare, 153, 155.
- Congall or Coemgall, abbot of Both-chonais in Inishowen, i. 345.
- Congbail, St. Fiachra, abbot of, ii. 63, 69.
- Congellus or Coemgall, disciple of St. Kienan of Duleek, i. 345.
- Congus, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 170. Death of, 192.
- Conindrus and Romulus, bishops of the Isle of Man, i. 303, 305.
- Coning, monastery of, under St. Ultan, i. 461, 463.
- Conjugal rights, exercise of, iv. 387.
- Conlaeth or Conlaith or Conlean, first bishop of Kildare, i. 409. Death of, 450.
- Conmach succeeds Cudiniscus as archbishop of Armagh, iii. 233. Forced by Aidus V. to accompany him on an expedition against the people of Leinster, 244. His death, 252.
- Conmach, abbot of Hy, death of, iii. 252.

- Conmacne, several districts of that name in Ireland, ii. 41.
- Connor, Aengus Macnise, first bishop of, i. 403. Town of, pillaged by the Scandinavians, iii. 271. St. Malachy chosen to fill the vacant see of, iv. 86. The Roman practices introduced into, 87. The church of, destroyed, 88.
- Conomail Mac Cartiaig (Mac Carthy) bishop of Emly, death of, ii. 158.
- Conquovar, monarch of Ireland, iii. 241. Death of, ib.
- Constantine, king of the Britons, i. 486.
- Constantine, king of Cornwall, said to be founder of a monastery at Govan, near the Clyde, ii. 165.
- Contests for the throne of Munster, iii. 351, 352.
- Corbanus, supposed to be the same as Cerbanus of Feart-Cerbain, i. 421.
- Corballis, the Colidei of Monanincha, removed to, iv. 291.
- Corbes. See Comorba.
- Corbre, or Corpheus, surnamed Crom, bishop of Clonmacnois, death of, iii. 330, 331.
- Corcaria Caoin, St. what time she lived, ii. 327, 330.
- Corco-baskind, birth place of St. Senan, i. 445.
- Corcomroe or Corcumroe, St. Senan forced to join in the plunder of the territory of, i. 445. Foundation of the abbey of the Blessed Virgin Mary of, iv. 325, 335.
- Corcothemne, district of, some thousands of persons baptized there by St. Patrick, i. 252.
- Cork, burned by the Northmen, iii. 276. Plundered by the Danes, 366. Burned, 419.
- Cork, the kingdom of granted by Henry II. to Robert Fitz-Stephen and Milo de Cogan, iv. 226.
- Cormac, St. succeeds St. Iarlath as archbishop of Armagh, i. 359, 415. Distinguished from other Cormacs by the addition Ernaidhe, 416. Distinguished from Cormac, bishop of Trim, ib. His death, ib. Succeeded by Dubtach, 422.
- Cormac, son of Enda, entrusted to the care of St. Patrick, i. 415. Lived in the territory of Usneadh or Usny, 416.
- Cormac, bishop of Trim, i. 416. Died on the same day as Cormac of Armagh, and was buried in Trim, ib. iii. 176, 178.
- Cormac, of the 2d class of Irish Saints, ii. 13.
- Cormac, king of South Leinster, retires to the monastery of Bangor, ii. 63.
- Cormac Hua-Liathain anchoret, abbot and bishop, supposed to be a disciple of St. Columba, ii. 212. Sails in search of some uninhabited island, ib. Death of, ib. 214, iii. 323.
- Cormac, son of Diarmod king of Hy-Kinselagh, liberated from chains by the intercession and miracles of St. Fintan, ii. 228.
- Cormac, son of Suibhne, abbot of Clonard, and a bishop, death of, iii. 266.
- Cormac Mac Eladac, scribe, abbot, and bishop of Saiger, death of, iii. 323.

- Cormac, bishop of Laithrighbriuin, death of, iii. 324.
 Cormac, a scribe and bishop, at Kill-Fobric, iii. 324.
 Cormac, bishop of Duleek and abbot of Clonard, death of, iii. 339.
 Cormac Mac Culinan, bishop of Cashel and king of Munster, iii. 349. Thought to be bishop of Lismore, ib. 350. Called to the throne of Munster, 351. Defeats Flann Sionna, monarch of Ireland, at the battle of Moylena, ib. Killed, with 6000 of his followers, by Flann and his troops, at the battle of Beallagh Mughna, 352. Erroneously said to be killed by the Danes, 352, 353. His will, in which he bequeaths various sacred utensils, gold, silver, &c. to divers churches, 355. His character, 355, 356.
 Cormac, bishop of Saigir, death of, iii. 361.
 Cormac Aedan, bishop of Clonfert, death of, iii. 368.
 Cormac Hua Killene, bishop and abbot of Clonmacnois, death of, iii. 381, 383.
 Cormac, bishop of Tallaght, death of, iii. 381.
 Cormac's chapel at Cashel, supposed to be erected by Cormac Mac Cullinan, iii. 357, 358. Not built by Cormac Mc. Carthy, iv. 75.
 Coroticus, a British prince, St. Patrick's letter against, i. 293. Lands in Ireland, and carries off many of the people lately converted, 296.
 Corpain, bishop of Iferte, i. 420.
 Corpheus Crom. See Corbre Crom.
 Corpheus, father of St. Finnian of Maghbill, ii. 25.
 Corpheus, St. bishop of Coleraine. ii. 77.
 Cortilla or Nortyla, abbot of Amarbaric, iii. 219.
 Courcey, John de, defeated by the Irish, iv. 317. Plunders Ar-magh, 318.
Cruibhech, a place where St. Patrick was entertained by bishop Trian, i. 302.
 Cremourne in Monaghan, i. 266. Derivation of the name, 270.
 Crimthan, king of Hy Kinsellagh, said to have endowed 70 churches, i. 274.
 Crimthan, the first name of St. Columbkil. ii. 106.
 Crioich-cuollan, a tract of land in Wicklow, i. 210.
 Croagh Patrick. See Cruach-an-aichle.
 Crom, a pagan god of the ancient Irish, i. 229.
 Crom-cruach, an idol, i. 229, iv. 56.
 Crom-dubh, the same as Crom-cruach, iv. 56.
 Cronan, abbot of Bangor, the Antiphonarium Benchoreense, written in the time of, i. 60.
 Cronan, another name of St. Mochua, ii. 357.
 Cronan, St. baptizes St. Coemgen, ii. 43.
 Cronan, abbot of Clonmacnois, ii. 60.
 Cronan, a Munster bishop, visits St. Columbkil, ii. 178.

- Cronan, abbot of Roscrea, goes with St. Mobai to Puayd, in Connaught, iii. 7, 8; to Clonmacnois, 7. Erects several establishments, ib. Stops at Lusmag, ib. Erects the cell of Sean-ross, ib. Erects the monastery of Roscrea, ib. Death of, 8.
- Cronan, abbot of Glassmor, near Swords, iii. 361.
- Cronan, a priest of the 3d class of Irish Saints, ii. 331.
- Cronan, bishop of Antrim, ii. 412.
- Cronan, abbot of Maghbile, ii. 10, 413.
- Cronan, St. bishop of Lismore, death of, iii. 163, 164.
- Crook, erection of the commandery of, iv. 339, 340.
- Cro-sailech, an old name of Achadh-abhla, i. 468.
- Crothnecan, the priest that baptized St. Columbkil, ii. 106.
Called Cruthnecan, son of Ceallachan, 114.
- Croyland, monastery of, Black monks of, ii. 306.
- Cruachan-aichle, a mountain in Connaught, called also Croagh Patrick and Cruach-Phadruic, i. 248. St. Patrick's fast there, 249, 250
- Cruachan-Brigh-eile in Hy-falgia, the church of St. Maccaheus there, i. 335.
- Cruachan-legian, said to be where St. Carnech had his monastery, i. 495.
- Cruach Phadruic.* See Cruachan aichle, i. 249.
- Crunmael, bishop of Kildare, iii. 370.
- Cruithneach, or Crutheni, the Picts so called, i. 216, 218.
- Cuan, bishop of Emly, death of, iii. 233.
- Cuana the wise, bishop of Louth, death of, iii. 266.
- Cuangus, surnamed Macdall, abbot of Leithmore, death of, iii. 191.
- Cuanna, St. governed the church or monastery of Kill-chuana, ii. 357, death of, ib.
- Cuannan, a disciple of St. Columba, ii. 138.
- Cudiniscus, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 233, 234.
- Cuil-dremne, the battle of, ii. 113. Cause of, 145, 147.
- Cuille, St. Brigid, receives the veil from the son of, i. 339.
- Cuill-ectrann*, monastery of, supposed by Archdall to be Kiltragh, i. 268.
- Cuirne, the territory of, i. 420.
- Culdean, abbej at Armagh, i. 74.
- Culdees, the secular canons of cathedrals. iii. 248. Ledwich's and Toland's errors and misrepresentations respecting them, 292, 293, 366. Disquisition on them, 295 to 317.
- Culdei, the Culdees so called, iv. 295, 302.
- Culdremni. See Cuildremne.
- Columbkil. See Columbkil.
- Cumanea, St. daughter of Aidus, king of Leinster, ii. 327.
- Cumber. See Cumerer.
- Cumin, abbot of Clonmacnois, death of, iii. 55.

- Cumin, John, elected archbishop of Dublin, iv. 251. Arrives in Ireland, 257, 258. Holds a synod at Dublin, 264. Canons of this synod, 269 to 272. Builds Patrick's church, Dublin, 318. Oppressed by Hamon de Valoniis, 331. Excommunicates those who had injured him and his church, ib. Gets a grant of 20 plough-lands for him and his successors from Hamon de Valoniis, 332.
- Cumineus Albus. See Cummineus Albus.
- Cummian, several of that name, ii. 400.
- Cummian, St. author of the Epistle to Segienus, abbot of Hy, on the Paschal question, i. 58, 395. Principal promoter of the Roman method of the Paschal computation, ib. A different person from Cumineus Albus, abbot of Hy, 397, death of, 398.
- Cummian, an Irish bishop; death of at Bobbio, iii. 171, 174.
- Cummian. See Commian, iv. 365, 366.
- Cummin Fada, St. supposed to be the same as St. Cummian, author of the Paschal Epistle, ii. 398, 400.
- Cummineus Albus, abbot of Hy, author of a life of St. Columbkil, ii. 107, seq. Different from St. Cummian, 397. Death of, iii. 36.
- Curnan, son of Aidan king of Conaught, flies to St. Columba for protection, ii. 145.
- Cursus*, the Gallican, error of Ledwich respecting it, i. 12. Different from the Cursus Scotorum, iv. 369.
- Cursus Orientalis*, or Eastern Liturgy, i. 12.
- Cursus Scotorum*, the ancient Liturgy brought into Ireland by St. Patrick, iv. 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373.
- Cuthbert, St. said to be an Irishman, iii. 88, 90, seq. Prior of the monastery of Mailross, 89. Removed to Lindisfarne, and retires to the island of Farne, ib. Brought from thence by force, and consecrated bishop of Lindisfarne at York, ib. Death of, ib.

D.

- Daboec, St. brother of St. Canoc, Conoc, or Mochonnoc, said to be a son of Breacan's, i. 425, 427.
- Dado. See Ado.
- Dagaeus, St. death of, ii. 76, 79.
- Dagan, St. of Inverdaoill, said to be nephew of St. Coemgen, ii. 45. Brother of St. Libba or St. Molibba, 364, 367. Said to be a disciple of St. Pulcherius, 365. Death of, ib.
- Dagobert, son of Sigebert king of Austrasia, sent to Ireland, iii. 100, 102. Recalled, and becomes king of Austrasia, 101.
- Daimh-inis, now Devenish in Lough Earn, monastery of, ii. 218.
- Daimh-liag or Duleek, St. Kienan first bishop of, i. 341, 344.
- Dair-magh, (now Durrow), monastery of, ii. 118, 121, 123, 124.

- Dalaradia, or Dalraidia, a district in Ulster, not to be confounded with Dalrieda, i. 216, 217. Many churches founded there by St. Patrick, 265.
- Dallan, St. a bishop, disciple of St. Senan, ii. 90.
- Dalrieda or Dalriada, a district in Ulster, different from Dalaradia, i. 217. Several churches erected here by St. Patrick, 265. From whom called, ii. 238. Dispute concerning it referred to St. Colman, ib. Plundered, iv. 182.
- Damen or Damhene, father of Conal, i. 396.
- Danes (of Ireland), when converted to Christianity, i. 75. Begin to infest the coasts of Scotland and Ireland, iii. 176. First land in Ireland, 236. Much plunder and devastation committed by them in Hy and in Ireland, 241. Defeated by the Irish, ib. They murder St. Blaithmac while celebrating Mass in the church of Hy, 253. They plunder and lay waste Cork, Lismore, and several other religious establishments, 270, 271. They murder Kethernac, prior of Kildare, and many others, at Dunamase, 272. St. Nuad, son of Segnen, martyred by them while plundering the church of Killachad, ib. Defeated at the battle of Suanaght, and in two other battles, 275. Defeated by Maelseaghlán, 326. They join Aidus, or Aedan, Finnliath, and devastate Meath, ib. Those of Dublin plunder Munster, 327. They proceed to Armagh, plunder the city, and carry away 710 captives, 346. Expelled by the men of Breagh, and by the Leinstermen, 397. Slaughter of them in Munster, 366. Defeated at Emly, ib. A strong party of, land at Waterford, and are slaughtered by a chief of Idrone, 365, 367. They plunder Cork, Lismore, and Aghaboe, 366. Those of Dublin become Christians, 376, 377, seq. Defeated at Clontarf, 422. Those of Waterford rise against the English, iv. 225.
- Daniel, bishop of Bangor, a pupil of Iltutus, i. 476.
- Daniel, St. bishop of Killgaradh, death of, iii. 36.
- Danish architecture, iv. 403.
- Dardalucha, abbess of Kildare, i. 9.
- Darerca, St. sister of St. Patrick, i. 125. Her death mentioned by the annalists, 127. Said to be mother of Saints Secundinus and Auxilius, 259. Abbess of Kilsleve-Cuillin, 403, 404. Said to be mother of St. Riogh, 419.
- Darerca, mother of St. Kieran of Clonmacnois, ii. 50.
- Daria, mother of St. Ursula, i. 408.
- Darinis, the monastery of, founded by St. Molanfide, i. 310. St. Finnian pays a visit to St. Caiman there, 465. St. Fachtna or Fachnan, a while abbot there, ii. 194, 195.
- Darmagh. See Dairmagh.
- Dathias, king of Ireland, killed, ii. 11.
- David, Gildas and Cadocus, Britons, i. 469.
- David, son of Guaira Hua Farranais, archbishop of Armagh, death of, ii. 70.
- David, St. archbishop of Menevia in Wales, contemporary with

- St. Declan, i. 27, 464, 469. Various opinions concerning the time of his death, 471, 472, 473, &c. St. Senan, spends some time with, ii. 2. Time of his death, 19. Usher wrong in the time he supposes his death to have happened, ii. 93. Said to have accompanied St. Barr to Rome, 314, 316.
- David, archbishop of Armagh, death of, ii. 70.
- Davoc, St. Island of, in Lough-dearg, i. 368.
- De-castro Dei* Priory founded, iv. 248.
- Declan, St. of Ardmore, educated by St. Dymma, i. 25. Sets out for Rome and meets St. Patrick on his way, 26. Goes to meet St. Patrick at Hynneon in Maghfemyn, 281, 283, 284. His death, 461, 463.
- Declan, St. an Irish missionary in Bavaria, iii. 189.
- De fonte vivo.* See Maur monastery.
- Deicolus or Deicola, maternal brother of St. Gallus, and disciple of St. Columbanus, ii. 439. Forms a community of monks at Luthra, 440. Retires to a lonely cell, ib. Death of, ib.
- De jugo Dei.* See Leigh abbey.
- De Lacy, Hugh, lord of Meath, killed, iv. 277.
- Delbhna Assuill, preaching of St. Patrick to the inhabitants of, i. 238.
- Delgany, county Wicklow, anciently called Dergne, and Delgne, i. 427. St. Mogoroc had a cell at, ii. 49. Danes overthrown there by Augurius king of Leinster, iii. 426.
- Delgne.* See Delgany.
- Dempster, his falsehoods, &c. iii. 124, 137.
- Deodatus, St. an Irishman, iii. 102.
- De Pœnitentiarum mensura*, the tract, written by St. Cummian, ii. 398, 401.
- Deputation of several respectable persons wait on St. Brigid, i. 406.
- Derbilia of Irras, St. the period in which she flourished, ii. 327.
- Dergne.* See Delgany.
- Derkan, a bishopric, governed by St. Olcanus, i. 341. Called Rathmuighe or Airthir-muighe, 344. The school of governed by St. Olcan, 403.
- Derlugdacha, St. succeeds St. Brigid in the nunnery of Kildare, i. 460. Death of, 461.
- Derluss, Ros, or Russ, of the town of, converted by St. Patrick, i. 216.
- Dermod, or Diermit, monarch of Ireland, bestows lands on St. Kieran, i. 56. ii. 52. Lays the first stone of the monastery of Clonmacnois, ib.
- Dermod II. or Diermit, son of Aidus Slani, kills Conall king of Ireland, ii. 302. becomes monarch, ib. Death of, ib. iii. 82.
- Dermod Mac Maol-nambo, king of Leinster, killed in the battle of Odhba. iii. 474, 476.

- Dermod O'Brien succeeds his brother Murtoch on the throne of Munster, iii. 485.
- Dermod Mac Morogh, king of Leinster, not the son of Murchertach, prince of of Leinster, who was killed at the battle of Mage-choba, iv. 22. His cruel treatment of St. Laurence O'Toole, 173, 174. Dethroned, 184. His evil actions, 185. Founder of the nunnery of St. Mary de Hogges, and some other religious houses, ib. His character by Giraldus Cambrensis, 186. Sets out for England, and from thence to France to meet Henry II. 189. Receives promises of assistance from Henry, ib. Negotiates with Strongbow, Fitz-Stephen, Fitz-Gerald, &c. ib. Returns to Ireland, and remains concealed at Ferns, ib. Receives succours from England, and commences hostilities against his countrymen, 190, 192. Dies at Ferns, 198.
- Derry, the monastery of visited by St. Columbkil, ii. 243. Plundered, iii. 391. Abbey of, not of the Order of Augustinian Canons, but of the Order of Columbkil, iv. 102, 104. Raised to the rank of an episcopal see, 168. Cathedral of erected, 182.
- Derver, in County Louth, quere was it Drum-dearbh? i. 423.
- Dervorgal, or Dervorgilla, wife of Tiernan O'Ruarc, Prince of Breffny, her gifts to the monks of Mellifont, iv. 165. Carried off by Dermod Mac Morrogh, 184. Rescued from him, 185, 186. Death of, 322.
- Devenish, St. Naal, abbot of, i. 446. Monastery of, erected by St. Lasrean, who is the same as St. Molaisse, ii. 218. Pillaged, iii. 390.
- Dicho, or Dichu, the first person converted in Ireland, and baptized by St. Patrick, i. 208, 212.
- Dicholla Gairbh, disciple of St. Maidoc of Ferns, ii. 337.
- Dichul, abbot of Louth, a prophecy of St. Patrick concerning him, i. 350.
- Dichull, a priest left by St. Fursey at Cnobbersberg, ii. 459, 460.
- Dichuo, erroneously supposed to be a brother to St. Ailill, i. 440.
- Dieclan or Dieclan, a disciple of St. Patrick, i. 26.
- Diermit, king of Ireland. See Dermod monarch of Ireland.
- Diermit, Mac Cervail, monarch of Ireland, ascends the throne, ii. 21. Killed by Aidus the black. 198.
- Diermit, St. or Dermod, abbot of Inisclothran, his period, parentage, &c. ii. 9.
- Diermit, St. abbot of Gleann-ussen, ii. 76.
- Diermit II. See Dermod II.
- Diermit, abbot of Hy, carries the remains of St. Columba to the mainland of North Britain, lest they should fall into the hands of the Danes, iii. 252. Removes the reliques to Ireland, 274.
- Diermit Hua Tighernach, archbishop of Armagh, goes into

- Conaught to enforce the law of St. Patrick, iii. 277. Death of, 277, 280.
- Diermit Mac Morogh. See Dermot Mac Morogh.
- Dima, bishop of Conor, a disciple of Colmanelo, ii. 412.
- Dioceses of Ireland reduced and bounded, iv. 42.
- Dionysius Exiguus, his rules concerning the Paschal calculation, ii. 377, 378.
- Diradius of Edardruim, brother of Conoc, i. 425.
- Dirath, St. bishop of Ferns, death of, iii. 128, 132.
- Direo-Chuisgnigh, nunnery of, ii. 85.
- Disciples of St. Patrick, list of, i. 337.
- Discipline of the Irish monks, iv. 357.
- Disert Aengus near Clonenagh, so called from its being the retreat of St. Aengus Hua Hoblen, iii. 245.
- Disert-chuimin, now called Kill-commin or Kill-cummin, King's county, ii. 395, 397.
- Disert Nairbre, monastery erected there by St. Maidoc of Ferns, ii. 337.
- Disert-Tola in Meath. St. Tola led the life of a hermit here, iii. 171, 173, 174.
- Diuma, St. chosen bishop of the middle Angles, ii. 428. Consecrated by St. Finan, ib.
- Divine service, a canon relating to the, iv. 383.
- Dobda or Dobdagreus or Dobdan, an Irishman, acts as bishop of Saltzburg, instead of Virgil, iii. 188, 189; said to have been bishop of Chiempsee, iii. 188, 189.
- Dochonna the abbot, said to have been placed over the monastery of Eas-mac-neirc, ii. 133.
- Dochonna, bishop of Connor, iii. 163.
- Dochuma, surnamed Bolgan, an anchorite; death of, iii. 163.
- Docus, supposed to have been Cadoc of Lancarven, ii. 19.
- Doire Calgaich, the ancient name of Derry, or Londonderry, ii. 118. Monastery of, founded by St. Columbkil, ib. 122, 123.
- Doire mac-Aidmecain, the church of, erected by St. Lasra, ii. 77, 80.
- Doire-Melle, nunnery of, governed by St. Melle, iii. 193.
- Doire-mor, monastery of, founded by St. Colman, ii. 310.
- Domangart, St. said to be a brother to St. Domnoch, ii. 319. Not to be confounded with St. Domangart of Slieve Donard, ib.
- Domangart, St. of Slieve Donard; the time he lived uncertain, ii. 319, 320, 321; said to have been the son of Euchodius king of Ulster, 322—brother of St. Mura of Fahen, ib.
- Domangen, a bishop, left by St. Carthagh over the monastery of Inispict, ii. 362.
- Domnach-arda in Wicklow, the church of, erected by St. Palladius, i. 38, 41.
- Domnach-bile, the church of, erected by St. Patrick, i. 262.
- Domnach-brain or Domnach-braoin, the church of, founded by St. Patrick, i. 268.

- Domnach-coinre, the church of, erected by St. Patrick, i. 268.
- Domnach-combair, the church of, erected by St. Patrick, i. 268.
- Domnach-fainre, the church of, erected by St. Patrick, i. 268.
- Domnach-Fiech, monastery of, i. 274, 278.
- Domnach-fothairbe, the church of, erected by St. Patrick, i. 268.
- Domnach Glinne-Tochuir, church of, i. 264.
- Domnach-libeir, church of, founded by St. Patrick, i. 268.
- Domnach-maigen, now Donaghmain in county of Monaghan, i. 266, 270.
- Domnach-moclain, church of, erected by St. Patrick, i. 268.
- Domnach-mor in campo Echnach, now Donaghmore near Navan, i. 239.
- Domnach-mor in the district of Magh-íthe, i. 262.
- Domnach-mor in Tirawley, church of, i. 253.
- Domnach-mor Mag-seola. Felartus of, a disciple of St. Patrick, i. 245, 247.
- Domnach-mor muighe siuil*, said to be the same as Donagh-Patrick near Kells, i. 237.
- Domnach-mor-muighe-tochuir*, church of, founded by St. Patrick, i. 262.
- Domnach-Patrick or Donagh-Patrick, near Kells, church founded, i. 236. Ravaged by Godfrid, iii. 377.
- Domnach riascaigh, church of, founded by St. Patrick, i. 268.
- Domnach-righduin, church of, founded by St. Patrick, i. 268.
- Domnach, Sachnell, now Dunshoghlin, in Meath, i. 271.
- Domnach-sainre, church of, erected by St. Patrick, i. 268.
- Domnach-Sarige, near Duleck, county of Meath, i. 245.
- Domnach-tortain, church of, near Ardraccan, county of Meath, i. 271.
- Domnald and Fergus, monarchs of Ireland, deaths of, ii. 198.
- Domnald, archbishop of Armagh, iv. 9. Makes peace between Domnald Mac Loughlin and Mortogh O'Brien, 10. Death of, ib.
- Domnald, bishop of Cashel, writes to Lanfranc on Eucharistical baptism, iii. 455.
- Domnald II. monarch of Ireland, death of, ii. 302.
- Domnald III. monarch of Ireland, goes on a pilgrimage to Hy, and dies there, iii. 176.
- Domnald Mac Loughlin, king of Ulster, assumes the title of king of Ireland, iii. 484. Dies in the monastery of Derry, 485.
- Domnald O'Heyne, bishop of Cashel, death of, iii. 455, 456.
- Domnald O'Neill, becomes king of Ireland, iii. 366. Death of, ib.
- Donnald, scribe of Cork, death of, iii. 329.
- Domnan or Adomnan, left over the monastery of Aingin by St. Kieran of Clonmacnois, ii. 52.
- Domnoch, St. or Madomnoch, a disciple of St. David, ii. 319. Settles at Tipraid Fachtna in Ossory, ib. First brought bees into Ireland, 319, 320.

- Donaghmain. See Donmachmaigen.
 Donagh-mor. See Domnach-mor in campo Echnach.
 Donagh-Patrick. See Domnach-mor-Mag-Seola, and Domnach Patrick.
 Donald, nephew of Murtoogh O'Brien, invited to become king of Man, iv. 21, 23.
 Donard. See Domnach-arda.
 Donations, a canon respecting, iv. 386, 387.
 Donatus, St. brother to St. Cataldus, said to be bishop of Lupiae, iii. 123, 128.
 Donatus, St. bishop of Fiesole in Tuscany, an Irishman, iii. 280, 281, 282, 283.
 Donatus, bishop of Dublin, consecrated by Lanfranc archbishop of Canterbury, iii. 434.
 Donnchad, monarch of Ireland, death of, iii. 241.
 Donogh, son of Dubhdavoirean king of Cashel, and Carrol prince of Ossory, lay waste Conaught, iii. 327.
 Donogh O'Brien, son of Brian Boroimhe, becomes king of Leathmoghla, iii. 426. Sets out on a pilgrimage to Rome. 474, 475.
 Donogh O'Haingly, bishop of Dublin consecrated at Canterbury, iii. 482. Professes obedience to Lanfranc, 483. Death of, ib.
 Donore, the land of, given to the abbey of St. Thomas, Dublin, iv. 233.
 Dorben, abbot of Hy, death of, iii. 153, 154, 156.
 Doulagh, St. not a corruption of the name of St. Olave, iii. 359.
 Doulagh St. church of, one of the most ancient buildings in Ireland, iii. 359.
 Down, St. Patrick buried there, i. 364. Pillaged, iii. 374. Government of the See of, undertaken by St. Malachy, iv. 101. Cathedral of, repaired by St. Malachy, 129. Attacked by John de Courcey, and its bishop taken prisoner, 232. Benedictine monks introduced into the Cathedral, and the dedication title changed, 253.
 Draoi, Draoith, or Druí, meaning of the words, i. 230.
 Dress of the ancient Irish, iv. 360. Canon relating to, 361.
 Droimfionn, dispute there between St. Finnian and St. Columbkille, ii. 28.
 Dromahaire, Maccarthen baptized there by St. Patrick, i. 256.
 Dromore, Colman bishop of, first master of St. Finnian, i. 431, 434.
Druí, Druidh, see Draoi.
 Druids and Druidism, what, i. 228.
 Drumard, nunnery of, ii. 187.
 Drumcheo, nunnery of, i. 405.
 Drum-cliaibh, monastery of, ii. 132.
Druim-corcorthri, perhaps Drumconrath, a church said to be erected there by St. Patrick, i. 237.
 Drum-cullen, monastery of, founded by Barrindeus, ii. 221.

- Druim-dhearbh, i. 422.
Druim-feartain, church of, ii. 100.
 Druimindech, church of, i. 268.
 Druim-inis-clain, or Druim-inis cluinn. See Drumshallon.
 Druim-leathan, monastery of, ii. 333, 336.
 Druim-leith-glais, the ancient name of Down, ii. 185.
 Druimliag, monastery of, ii. 89.
 Druimlias, monastery of, i. 257. Where situated, 258.
Druimnea, church of, erected by St. Patrick, i. 245, 247.
 Druim-relgeach, Donatus priest of, i. 87.
 Druim-sailec, or Druimsailech, or Airdsailech, ancient names of Armagh, i. 312, 314.
 Druim-tiprad, an ancient name of Clonmacnois, ii. 58.
 Drumceat, assembly at, ii. 237, 239.
 Drumcliffe, i. 257. Carthagh of Lismore goes to the monastery of, iii. 352. Bishops formerly there, iv. 345.
 Drum-dubhain, nunnery of, i. 266, 403.
 Drumrath, monastery of, ii. 189.
 Drumshallon, the church of founded by St. Patrick, i. 238, 444.
 Death of Lugadius abbot of, 441, 444. St. Aidus dies in the monastery of, iii. 242, 243.
 Duach, father of Colman of Kilmacduach, ii. 341.
 Duban, St. of Rinn-dubhain, i. 426.
 Dubdalethe, or Dubhdalethe, I. II. and III. Archbishops of Armagh, iii. 233, 234, 386, 387, 428, 448, 450.
 Dubdan O'Foelan, abbot of Clonard, iii. 166.
 Dubduban, placed over the church of Donagh-mor by St. Patrick, i. 262.
Dubh-gals, attack and plunder Dublin, in the possession of the Fingals, iii. 277.
 Dublin, blessed by St. Patrick, i. 275. Sedulius bishop of, iii. 228, 230. Taken and burned by Congal, king of Ireland, 374. Taken by Godfrid, 377. Celsus, Archbishop of Armagh appointed bishop of, iv. 45. Gregory elected bishop of, 46. The see of raised to metropolitanical rank, and Gregory its first archbishop, 47, 48. Attacked by the Norwegians, 198. Besieged by the Irish, ib. Church of confirmed in its jurisdiction over the sees of Glendaloch, Kildare, Ferns, Leighlin and Ossory, 238. Bull to protect the diocese of, against the exercise of powers of others 256. Synods held in, 233, 234, 264, 269, 319.
 Dublinterius of Kill-slepte killed by the Northmen, iii. 368.
 Dubtach or Dubhtach, the poet, converted by St. Patrick, i. 225. Visited by St. Patrick, 273. Recommends St. Fiech for holy orders, ib. 277.
 Dubtach, succeeds St. Cormac as archbishop of Armagh, i. 422, dies, 435. Succeeded by Ailill or Ailild, 440.
 Dubtach, father of St. Brigid, i. 378.

- Dubtach II. archbishop of Armagh, ii. 2. Death of, 70.
 Dubtach, scribe of Kill-achad, death of, iii. 329.
 Duffan, Mac-heathach and Magilmunan, three distinguished Irishmen, leave Ireland in a leathern boat, and land in Cornwall, iii. 343.
 Duinbolg. See Dunbolg.
 Duleek, a bishop's see under St. Kienan, i. 341, 344. Situated in the district of the Kennacta or Kenaght of Meath, i. 345. One of the oldest sees of Meath, ii. 23. Church of, despoiled by the Scandinavians, iii. 270. Plundered, 433. One of the established sees of Meath, iv. 42. Ancient stone church of, 128. The fortifications of destroyed, 225. Monastery of regular canons of, founded, 252. Church of, only head of a rural deanery, 322.
 Dumha-graidh, Ailbe, a priest ordained there by St. Patrick, i. 240, 243.
 Dun-Abbain, now Abingdon, iii. 22.
 Dunamase, Kethernan, prior of Kildare, and many others, put to death there by the Danes, iii. 272.
 Dunan, or Donatus, appointed first bishop of the Danes of Dublin, iii. 433, 435, 436. Succeeded by Patrick, 457.
 Dunbarton, Dunbartane and Dumbarton, changes of the name Dunbritton, i. 94.
 Dumbleische, Fintan of, ii. 232.
 Dunbolg or Duinbolg, battle of, ii. 198.
 Dunbrody, abbey of founded, iv. 252, 253.
 Duncan, an Irish bishop, lecturer at the monastery of St. Remigius, iii. 403.
 Dunchad, becomes abbot of Hy, iii. 154, 156. Death of, 157.
 Dunchad II. monarch of Ireland, routs the Danes, iii. 366.
 Dunchad O'Braoin, becomes abbot of Clonmacnois, iii. 389, 391. Retires to Armagh, and dies there, 390.
 Dunchad, son of Moenach, abbot of Hy, death of, iii. 486.
Dun-cruthen, supposed to be the same as Dunboe, i. 218, 267. A bishop named Beatus placed there by St. Patrick, 265.
 Dundrum bay, enquiry where situate, i. 214.
 Dungal, an Irish Scot, flourishes in France, iii. 256, 257, 262. Writes his epistle, on the solar eclipses of the year 810, to Charlemagne, 256. Goes to Italy, and is appointed teacher at Pavia, ib. Writes against Claudius bishop of Turin, 258.
 Dungal Mac-Baithen, abbot and bishop of Glendaloch, death of, iii. 340.
 Dunkeld, church of, ii. 165.
 Dunshaughlin, the see of, ii. 23. The episcopal church of, iv. 322.
 Dunstan, St. educated at Glastonbury, iii. 395.
 Durdracht, St. of Antrim, i. 348.
 Durov, monastery of, visited by St. Columb-kill, i. 243.

- Dymna, St. educates St. Declan and several others, i. 25.
 Dympna, St. flies from Ireland, ii. 473. Murdered by her father, 474.
 Dysart, convent of, iii. 4.
 Dysibod, St. goes to Germany, and erects a convent at Mentz, iii. 114. Death of, ib.

E.

- Eas-mac-neirc*, monastery of, ii. 133, 144.
 Easrua. See Ashroe.
 Easter, the, kept by St. Colman, the same as that kept by St. John the Evangelist, i. 12. St. Columb-kill's mode of celebrating, ii, 256. Disputes about the time of celebrating, 270. Inquiries concerning the right method of calculating, 388.
 Eata, St. placed over the monastery of Lindisfarne, iii. 75. appointed bishop of that see, ib.
 Eata, abbot of Mailross, iii. 88.
 Ebersham, monastery of, iii. 107.
 Ecclesiastical schools and seminaries established and governed by Irish prelates, i. 402.
 Ecclesiastical matters, decisions on, referred to the Apostolic See, iv. 377.
 Ecclesiastical and temporal power over Ireland claimed by Pope Gregory the Seventh, iii. 484.
 Ecclesiastics and learned men, several noted, iv. 53.
 Egberet St. or St. Egbert, appoints Vilibrord to the mission of Friesland, iii. 135.
 Ectrum, the see of, iii. 193.
 Edardruim, Diradius of, supposed brother of St. Canoc, i. 425.
 Edchada Mac Scanlan, bishop of Emly, iii. 361.
 Egfrid, king of Northumberland, sends an expedition against part of the Eastern coast of Ireland, iii. 89, 94.
 Egbert, St. See Egberet, St.
 Eleran the wise, author of a life of St. Patrick, i. 84, 86.
 Elias, St. an Irishman, abbot of St. Martin's at Cologne, iii. 461, 444.
 Eliogarty, a district in Munster, i. 24.
 Elphinus, St. said to have been an Irishman, i. 6, 7, 8.
 Eliteria, the cell of, iii. 166, 168.
 Ellenius, disciple of St. Cadoc, succeeds him in the monastery of Lancarvon, i. 490.
 Eloquius, disciple of St. Fursey, ii. 462, 464.
 Elphin, church of, founded, i. 242. The bishopric of St. Asacus, 343. Monastery of, governed by St. Asacus, 403.
 Ely O'Carroll, district of, i. 24. ii. 8.
 Emerias, the two, i. 405.

- Emilian or Emmian, goes from Ireland to join St. Fursey at Lagny, ii. 461. Intrusted with the care of that monastery, ib.
- Eminent men, deaths of several, iii. 329, 367, 368, 370, 371, 411.
- Emly, the city and chair of Ailbe, i. 285. Laid waste by the Northmen, iii. 275. Plundered, iv. 52. Burned, 182. Cathedral of, destroyed by fire, 331.
- Emmian. See Emilian.
- Empthor. See Nemthor.
- Enach-aird, now called Annagh, in the county of Leitrim, ii. 327, 329.
- Enach-duin, nunnery of, ii. 30. Death of St. Brendan there, ib.
- Enach-mic-brioin, monastery of, ii. 187, 188.
- Enagh-dune, or Annadown, the see of, iv. 344, 345.
- Enagh-trim, or Annatrim, abbey of, ii. 74.
- Enan, said to have presided over the church of Druimindeich, i. 268.
- Enda and his son Conall protect St. Patrick, i. 253.
- Enda, father of Cormac, archbishop of Armagh, i. 415. Said to have been brother to king Leogaire, ib.
- Enda, St. St. Endeus, or St. Enna, of Arran, erects the monastery of Arn Island, i. 396. Acts of, 404. A pupil of Mansenus, 438. Receives a visit and benediction from St. Brendan, ii. 35. Receives St. Kieran at his monastery of Arn Island, 51, 57. Death of, 69.
- Endeus, of the 2d class of Irish saints, ii. 13.
- Endeus, St. of Arran. See St. Enda.
- Endeus, not the great St. Enda of Arran, ii. 222.
- English Synod, an interdict against Scottish priests administering the sacrament by an, iii. 275.
- English, the, land in Ireland under Fitz-Stephen, &c. iv. 190. Cruelties of, 193, 194, 195, 326. Their custom of selling their children to the Irish as slaves, 196, 197. Plunderers of churches, 256, 261, 263.
- Enna Kinselagh, king of Leinster, kills Niall Naoigiallach, i. 139.
- Enna, or Endeus, disciple of St. Columbkil, abbot of Imleachfoda, ii. 223.
- Ennach-duin, now called Annadown, ii. 36.
- Eocha, son of Tuathal, anchoret, bishop and abbot of Louth, death of, iii. 266.
- Eochad, son of Dathy, converted by St. Patrick, i. 254.
- Eochad, grandson of Leogaire, i. 452.
- Eochaid, abbot, said to be of Lismore, ii. 356.
- Eochaid, son of Diermit, archbishop of Armagh, death of, ii. 303.
- Eochaid Mac Colgain, death of, iii. 163.

- Eochod of Kiltoma, death of, iii. 191.
- Eogan, or Eogin Mac Laisre, of the 2d class of Irish saints, ii. 13, 205.
- Epistle, concerning the Paschal question written to Rome by Thomian and others, ii. 409. On the solar eclipses of the year 810, by Dungal, iii. 256.
- Erard, St. an Irishman, iii. 105, 107, 108. Goes to the monastery of the Vosges, 105, 109. Goes to Bavaria and baptizes Odilia daughter of Ettico, 106. Dies at Ratisbon, ib. 109.
- Erc, St. disciple of St. Senan, ii. 91, 95. See Ercus.
- Erca, daughter of Loarn, and mother of Murchertach, a christian, i. 434.
- Ercan, or Ergind, father of St. Senan, i. 445.
- Erclac, a disciple of St. Patrick, ii. 326.
- Ercus, St. a friend of St. Brigid, i. 410. Death of, 435.
- Ercus, tutor of St. Brendan, ii. 28.
- Erenachs, their name and office, iv. 80, 81, 83, 84, 85.
- Ergind. See Ercan.
- Eric of Auxerre, disciple of Helias an Irishman, iii. 287.
- Erk, sons of, established a Scottish kingdom in Britain, i. 11.
- Erk, son of Deگو, i. 85.
- Erlomhan, freed from prison at the request of St. Fechin, iii. 51. Embraces the monastic life, ib.
- Ernaidhe*, the district in which Cormac, archbishop of Armagh lived, i. 416.
- Ernan, St. placed over the monastery of Hinba, ii. 162.
- Ernan, a priest of the 3d class of Irish saints, ii. 331.
- Ernan, abbot of Tory Island, ii. 414.
- Ernan, a priest, receives the benediction of St. Columbkille, iii. 3. Called Ernene of Rathnui in Hy-Garchon, 4.
- Ernene of Druim-Tommer, ii. 141.
- Ernene of Rathnui. See Ernan.
- Ernulph, an Irishman, distinguishes himself in Iceland, iii. 343, 344.
- Erynagh, Benedictine house of, destroyed by John de Courcey, iv. 249.
- Esbren, island, of, ii. 449, 450, 451.
- Esserninus. See Iserminus, ii. 195, 205.
- Establishment of the Irish Scots, in North Britain, i. 431.
- Establishment for virgins or widows, several, i. 403.
- Etchen, supposed to be Ethian, i. 429.
- Etchen, St. of Cluain-bile, his parentage, ii. 125. He ordains St. Columbkille priest instead of bishop by mistake, 126, 127.
- Ethian, reprov'd by St. Patrick, i. 429. Supposed to be the same as Etchen.
- Ethica, island of, several monasteries founded there, ii. 162.
- Ethne, mother of St. Maidoc of Ferns, ii. 333.
- Ethnia, St. daughter of Aidus king of Leinster, ii. 327.

- Etto, a disciple of St. Fursey, ii. 462.
 Eubonia. See Evania.
 Eucharistical baptism, Domnald bishop of Cashel writes to Lanfranc on, iii. 455.
 Eufiam, St. son of an Irish king, i. 493.
 Eugene, bishop of Ardstraw, death of, ii. 190.
 Eugene, surnamed Monaster, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 267.
 Death of, ib.
 Eugene Mac Cenfaelad, bishop of Emly, killed, iii. 339.
 Eugenian and Dalcassian lines, dispute between the, iii. 425.
 Eunan, St. supposed to be the same as Adamnan, ii. 99.
 Eusebius, an Irish Scot, a monk of St. Gall, iii. 285, 286. Retires to Mount St. Victor, and there dies. ib.
 Eustatius, abbot of Luxeu, sent in search of Columbanus by Clotharius, ii. 294. Finds him at Bobbio, 295.
 Evania, Eubonia, &c. names of the Isle of Man, i. 305, 307.
 Evin, St. of Ros-mic-treoin, visited by Molua of Clonfert Molua, ii. 311. Death of, ib.
 Excommunication, various modes of, iv. 377.

F.

- Fachnan, St. or Fachtna, St. of Rosscarberry, a bishop, ii. 193.
 His school at Ross, 194. His death, ib. Said to have been a disciple of St. Barr, 317, 318.
 Fachtna, St. See Fachnan.
 Facundus, St. See Fachnan.
 Faila, alias Foila or Foclena, of Kill-Faila, ii. 326.
 Failan, St. or Foilan, St. iii. 3. Several of that name in Ireland, ib.
 Failan, St. of the 3d class of Irish saints, ii. 331.
 Failbe, or Failbhe Fland, king of Cashel, reproved by St. Pulcherius, ii. 310.
 Failbe, abbot of Hy, successor to Cumineus Albus, iii. 97. His death, ib. Succeeded by Adamnan, ib.
 Failbe, abbot of Hy, succeeds Killen Droichtheach, iii. 192. His death, ib. Succeeded by Slcben, ib. 193.
 Failge, intending to kill St. Patrick, in mistake pierces Odran his charioteer with a lance, i. 302.
 Falertus, St. or Fularthus, St. of Domnach-mor in Maghbile, i. 342.
Fallin, meaning of the word, iv. 362.
 Fanchea, St. sister of St. Endu, i. 400. Nunnery of, 404.
 Fannacur, the Danes defeated there, by Brian Boromhe, iii. 415.
 Farannan, archbishop of Armagh, succeeds Eugene in that see, iii. 267. Expelled from Armagh by Turgesius the Dane, i. 74, iii. 267.

- Faro, St. receives several Irish Saints at his monastery at Meaux, ii. 446, 447.
- Fast from Wednesday until Sunday throughout the year, ordered by Domnald, archbishop of Armagh, iv. 9.
- Fasting seasons, iv. 389, 390.
- Fasts of the Irish church, iv. 349, 352.
- Fathen Mura, now Fahan, monastery of, governed by St. Mura, iii. 37, 39.
- Faughan, river of, i. 262.
- Fearcall, district of, ii. 12.
- Feart*, meaning of the word, i. 422.
- Fearta Cearbain, a placee near Tara, i. 419.
- Fechin, St. of Fore, educated by St. Nathy, Nathi or Nathan, i. 345. ii. 190, 192. The rule that no woman should serve in monasteries observed in his establishment, ii. 20. Placed under the care of St. Nathy, iii. 45. Retires to Fore, and erects a monastery there, ib. Converts the people of Immagh, near the coast of Galway, ib. Dies of the pestilence, 52.
- Fechin, a priest of the 3d class of Irish Saints, ii. 331. iii. 11.
- Fedlimid, father of St. Columbkil, ii. 109.
- Fedlimid, St. bishop of Kilmore, ii. 10, 11. Church of, 11, 12.
- Fedlimid, bishop of Clones, ii. 10, 12.
- Fedlimid, bishop of Clogher, ii. 10, 12.
- Feidhlim Mac Crimthan, king of Munster, takes possession of Kildare, and carries off the clergy, iii. 271. Never became archbishop of Leigh-Mogha, as asserted by Keating, 273. Death of, 275. 276.
- Feidlimid. See Fedlimid.
- Feidlimid Fionn, succeeds David as archbishop of Armagh, ii. 70. Death of, 183.
- Felartus, St. of Domnach-mor, i. 245.
- Felim, father of St. Columb-kill, ii. 112, 113.
- Femyn, the plain of, i. 281.
- Ferdachrioch*, meaning of the name, i. 310. Improperly given to St. Maccarthen, ib. Properly belonged to St. Tigernach his successor as bishop of Clogher, ib. 434.
- Ferdachrioch, son of Suibne, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 192. Death of, 194, 196.
- Ferdomnach, bishop of Kildare, assumes the title of bishop of Leinster, iii. 452.
- Ferdomnach, bishop of Tuam, death of, iii. 202, 203.
- Ferdomnach, a scribe, death of, iii. 163.
- Ferdomnach, St. doctor of the church of Armagh, death of, iii. 275.
- Feredach, son of Cormac abbot of Hy, iii. 325.
- Feredach, son of Legen, abbot of Rachrann, death of, iii. 236.
- Ferfugill, bishop of Clondalkin, death of, iii. 202.
- Fergall, monarch of Ireland, killed in battle, iii. 144.
- Fergnaus, or Virgnous, a monk of Clon-finchoil, ii. 140.

- Fergnaus or Fergna, abbot of Hy, death of, ii. 347.
- Fergus, son of Conal, and grandfather of St. Columba, a christian, i. 394.
- Fergus, brother of Loarn, i. 431.
- Fergus, bishop of Down, death of, ii. 183.
- Ferns, establishment of St. Maidoc at, ii. 337. Church of, plundered, iii. 271. Burnt by the Danes, ib. The see of, not the chief see of Leinster, 370, 372. The see of, refused by Giraldus Cambrensis, iv. 264. Albin O'Mulloy, appointed bishop of, 265. The town burnt, 182, 184. Monastery of Augustin canons of, founded, 186, 187.
- Ferta-fir-feic*, now Slane, i. 223.
- Fert.* See Feart.
- Fes, of Temor, or Tarah, i. 371.
- Fethach, abbot of Louth, Slane, and Duleek, death of, iii. 202.
- Fethgna, succeeds Diermit Hua Tigernach, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 277. Death of, 323, 325.
- Fiachna, disciple of St. Carthagh, ii. 359, 364.
- Fiachna Hua Hartaguin, abbot of Hy, iii. 381, 386.
- Fiachra, St. administers the Viaticum to St. Comgall, ii. 446, 448.
- Fiachre, St. erects a monastery at Breuil, ii. 446, 448.
- Fiachrius*, or Hifiachrius, David, archbishop of Armagh, so called, ii. 70.
- Fiadh-mac-Aengussa, synod of, i. 286. iv. 37, 38, 39, 40.
- Fiadh Nemeadh*, meaning of these words, iv. 412.
- Fidhart, church of, founded by St. Patrick, i. 244, 246.
- Fiech, St. bishop of Sletty, lived in the 5th century, i. 57. His hymn on St. Patrick, 81. A disciple of Dubtach the poet, 232. Recommended to St. Patrick by Dubtach, 273. Receives the Tonsure from St. Patrick, 274. Becomes chief bishop of Leinster, and fixes his See at Sletty, ib. and 276, seq. The monastery or school of, 402. Contemporary with Conlaith, bishop of Kildare, 410. Death of, 435. Said to be the author of a hymn on St. Bridget, 454. Of the Sept or tribe of Hy-bairreche, 468.
- Finan, St. surnamed the Leper, said to have been placed over the church of Swords, ii. 133. iii. 83. Death of, 84, 87.
- Finan, St. a monk of Hy, succeeds Aedan at Lindisfarne, ii. 424. Erects a cathedral there of oak, ib. Continues obstinate in the observation of the Paschal calculation, according to the Irish practice, ib. Baptizes Peada, prince of the middle Angles, 427. Baptizes Sigebert, king of the East Saxons, 428. Death of, 429. Succeeded as bishop of Lindisfarne by Colman, ib. Sent to the conference of Whitby, iii. 59.
- Finan, St. of Kinnitch, now Kinnitty, iii. 19, 30.
- Findan, St. carried off along with his sister by the Norman pirates, iii. 236, 238. Escapes from them, 239. Sets out on a pilgrimage, and arrives at Rome, 237, 240. Becomes a monk at the monastery of Rhingaw in Switzerland, ib.

- Findbarr*, an epithet applied to St. Finnian of Clonard, ii. 23.
Findchan, a priest, founds a monastery in Ethica, ii. 162.
Findulgan, saves St. Columb-kill from being stabbed, ii. 171.
Fingalls, who possessed Dublin, slaughtered by the Dubhgalls, and the city taken, iii. 277.
Fingar, St. or St. Guigner, story of him, i. 225. Martyrdom of, 297.
Fingen or Fingin, king of Munster, iii. 5, 7.
Fingen, bishop of Hy, not to be confounded with an abbot Fingen, iii. 381. Death of, ib.
Fingen, an Irishman, abbot of St. Felix at Metz, iii. 406, 408. Repairs the monastery of St. Peter and St. Victorius, 407. Death of, ib.
Finghin, king of Cashel, death of, ii. 311.
Finglas, river of, near Dublin, i. 275. Property of the See of Dublin, iv. 240.
Finloga, father of St. Brendan, ii. 28.
Finlug, a disciple of St. Carthagh, ii. 359.
Finnacta, monarch of Ireland, killed in the battle of Greallachdolla, iii. 82, 144.
Finnachta Mac Kellach, bishop and abbot of Derry, iii. 370.
Finnavair-na-ningen, lands of, granted to the monks of Mellifont, iv. 165.
Finnbarr, St. intimate with St. Pulcherius, iii. 25, 27.
Finnia, St. abbess of Kildare, death of, iii. 255.
Finnian, St. of Clonard, lived in the 6th century, i. 31, 269. Foundation of his school at Clonard, 464. Sent, when a child, to be baptized by Fortkern, ib. Met on the way by St. Abban, and baptized by him, ib. Goes to Killmuine in Britain, receives donations of lands, and erects many churches there, ib. Returns to Ireland with many holy men, 465. Preaches before St. Brigid, ib. Erects many churches, ib. Forms an establishment at Magna, ib. Removes to Clonard, ib. Bishop and abbot of Clonard, ii. 21. His school resorted to by several learned men, ib. Attended in his last hours by St. Columb, 22. Death of, ib.
Finnian, St. of Maghbile or Movill, governs the church of Movill, i. 264. Abbot of Maghbile, 265; flourished in the middle of the 6th century, 424; instructed by a bishop Colman, 431; a pupil of St. Cailan, 432; thought to have been the same as Findbar or Finnio, ii. 23, 24, 25. Placed under the care of Colman of Dromore, 25; not the same as St. Frigidian, ib. Buried at Maghbile, ib. Questions concerning the time of his death, 26.
Finnians, two belonging to the 2d class of Irish Saints in Ireland, ii. 13.
Finnio, St. the same as St. Finnian of Maghbile, ii. 24.
Finnmagh, in Fotharta, monastery of, governed by St. Mosacra, iii. 140.

- Fintan, father of St. Finnian, i. 464.
- Fintan, St. of Clonenagh, receives Comgall at his monastery, ii. 62. Disciple of St. Columba, son of Crimthan, 74. His rule, 204. Founds the monastery of Clonenagh, 227, 231. Death of, 229.
- Fintan, bishop of Clonfert, the same as Fintan Corach, ii. 231. Death of 303.
- Fintan Corach. See Fintan of Clonfert.
- Fintan of Dunbleische, the family of, ii. 232.
- Fintan, son of Crimthan, ii. 231.
- Fintan, son of Finnloga, king of Munster, father of St. Fursey, ii. 449.
- Fintan Maeldubh, appointed successor to St. Fintan of Clonenagh, ii. 229, 231.
- Fintan Munhu, or Munnu, goes to Hy, ii. 233, 405. His family, 404. Death of, 406.
- Finten, son of Aidus, ii. 133, 143.
- Fire, an object of worship with the Pagan Irish, i. 226. iv. 407, 411.
- Fire temples, iv. 407, 409, 410.
- Fire-worshippers in Ireland, iv. 409.
- Firminius, St. first bishop of Amiens, said to have been an Irishman, i. 6.
- Fitz-Adelm, William sent into Ireland as deputy to Henry II. iv. 230. Founds the Abbey of St. Thomas at Dublin, 233. Invades Conaught and is defeated, 235.
- Fizgerald, Maurice death of, iv. 230.
- Flahertach, monarch of Ireland, becomes a monk at Armagh, iii. 144. Succeeded on the throne by Aedh or Hugh the fourth, 175. Death of, 192.
- Flan, bishop of Rechran, iii. 171.
- Flan Febhla, becomes archbishop of Armagh, iii. 131. Holds a synod, 136.
- Flan Mac Conaill, bishop of Emly. Death of, iii. 361.
- Flan Mac Famchellaic, bishop of Emly, death of, iii. 266.
- Flan Mac Maoil-edrin, abbot of Hy, death of, iii. 343, 344.
- Flan O'Conacty, called bishop of Breffney, said to be the bishop of Kilmore, ii. 12.
- Flan Sionna, monarch of Ireland, succeeds Aidus the Sixth, iii. 242, 244. Battle between him and the Danes, 346. Lays waste Munster, 351. Defeated by Cormac Mac Culinan, ib. Raises another army and defeats Cormac in the battle of Bealach Mughna, 252. Succeeded on the throne by Nial Glundubh, 366.
- Flanagan, king of Bregh, killed by the Northmen, iii. 348.
- Flanus, son of Loingsech, becomes archbishop of Armagh, iii. 252, 254. Succeeded by his coadjutor Atrigius, 267.
- Flannan, St. first bishop of Killaloe, iii. 147, 148.

- Flathertach, or Flahertach, abbot of Inniscatthy, a man of a military disposition, accompanies Cormac Mac Cullinan to the battle of Magh Leana, iii. 351. Fomentor of the quarrel between Cormac and Flann Sionna, 354.
- Fleury, incorrectness of, when treating of the Irish clergy, iv. 268.
- Florentius, St. an Irish priest, revered at Amboise in France, ii. 491.
- Florentius, St. an Irishman, supposed to have accompanied Dagobert King of Austrasia on his return from Ireland, iii. 101. Founds a monastery in the forest of Haste in Alsace, ib. Bishop of Strasburg, ib. Founds the monastery of St. Thomas in Strasburg, ib. Death of 102.
- Fochard, the birth place of St. Brigid, i. 378.
- Fochard-Brighde, nunnery of, iii. 38.
- Foclut, the wood of, vision of St. Patrick respecting, i. 160, 161, 253.
- Foelan, Bishop of Emly, succeeded by Mael-Kellach, iii. 386.
- Foelcluo Mac-Derbine, abbot of Hy, iii. 157. Death of 166.
- Foeldovar, bishop of Clogher, death of, ii. 185. iii. 170.
- Foendalach, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 194. Death of, 233, 234.
- Fogartach, Hua Cernech, monarch of Ireland, killed in battle against Kenneth his successor, iii. 144.
- Foilan, St. brother to St. Fursey, accompanies him to England, ii. 458. He and his brother Ultan go to Brabant, 464. Killed, together with three of his disciples, by robbers, ib.
- Foillen, the sleep of, i. 272, 276.
- Folachtach, abbot of Birr, death of, iii. 192.
- Folloman, said to be son of Natfraich, i. 402.
- Fontaine, monastery of, ii. 267.
- Forannan, abbot of Kildare, iii. 153.
- Forannan, archbishop of Armagh, sent to the Danish ships at Limerick by Turgesius, iii. 277, 278. Death of, 277, 280.
- Forannan, St. bishop of Domnach-mor, arrives at Walciodorus, and is made abbot there, iii. 404.
- Forbach, archbishop of Armagh, death of, iii. 252.
- Forchern or Fortchern, St. said to be bishop of Trim, i. 427. Said to have been a disciple of St. Luman, 428. Different from bishop Fortkern, 466.
- Fore, in Meath, St. Suarla first bishop of, iii. 177. See of, iv. 323.
- Forgney, church of, i. 419, 420.
- Fornication, persons born in, canon relating to, iv. 271, 274.
- Fornicators, canon relating to, iv. 271.
- Forrach-mac-namalgaidh*, preaching of St. Patrick at, i. 252.
- Fortkern, a bishop, different from Fortchern of Trim, i. 466.
- Fossas or Fosse, monastery of, ii. 464, 465.
- Fothadius, lecturer of Armagh, forced to accompany Aidus V. on an expedition against the people of Leinster, iii. 244.
- Fotharta, where situated, i. 40.

- Fredegand, disciple of St. Fursey, ii. 462, 464.
 Frigor, an Irish priest distinguished for piety in Picardy, iii. 442, 443. Becomes a monk at Centula, 443.
 Friday, feast of St. John Baptist on, accounted ominous by the Irish, iv. 11.
 Fridolinus, St. called the traveller, i. 428, ii. 477. Goes to France, 478, 482. Elected abbot of St. Hilary's monastery, ib. Erects the monastery of Helera and several other monasteries, ib. and 481. Dies at Seckingen, 479.
 Frigidian or Frigidianus, bishop of Lucca, ii. 25, 27.
 Froech, a priest, ii. 323, 324.
 Fulartach, St. bishop of Clonard, death of, iii. 202, 203.
 Funerals not always attended by a priest, iv. 285.
 Fursa, or Fursey, abbot of Lecan or Leckin, death of, iii. 191.
 Fursaeus or Fursey, St. lands in Britany on his way to Rome, i. 113. Intimate with St. Pulcherius, iii. 25. See St. Fursey.
 Fursey or Fursaeus, St. an Irishman, ii. 448. Retires to Inisquin, 449. Erects a monastery at Rathmat, 455. Goes to England, 458. Erects the monastery of Cnobbersburg, ib. Leaves Cnobbersburg to his brother Foilan and two priests, 459. Repairs to his brother Ultan, ib. Goes to France, ib. Erects the monastery of Lagny, ib. Death of, 462. See Fursaeus.
 Fursey, St. of Conall Murthemne, ii. 451.

G.

- Gabhren, father to Fintan of Clonenagh, ii. 227, 231.
 Gall, St. in Switzerland, monastery of, i. 432, 434, 438.
 Gallen, monastery of, i. 424.
 Gallus, St. or St. Gall, a companion of Columbanus, destroys idols at Bregentz, ii. 287, 291. Returns from Bregentz to Arbona, 432. Erects an oratory for twelve monks, and expels an evil spirit from Fridiburga daughter of Gunzo, duke of that country, ib. Goes to Constance, 435. Sends Magnoald to Bobbio to enquire about the death of Columbanus, ib. Invited by the monks of Luxeu to take the government of their house, which he refuses, 437. Death of, 438.
 Garbhan, a hermit, dissuades St. Coemgen from going on a long journey that he was about to undertake, ii. 44. Called son of Lugadius, 49. A disciple of St. Coemgen, ib.
 Garbhan St. or St. Garvan of Achadh-Garbhan, ii. 136.
 Gartan, the birth place of Columbkil, ii. 106, 136.
 Gaul, the country of the Celts, 117.
 Gaura, St. Patrick ill-treated by the people of, i. 266.
 Gelasius, archbishop of Armagh first called Giolla Mac Lieg, iv. 102, 103. Reconciles O'Lochlin, prince of Tyrone, and the nobles of Ulster and Ulidia, 136. Death of, 220.

- Gelges, daughter of Aedh-finn prince of Hy-Briuin, mother of St. Fursey, ii. 449.
- Genereus, an Anglo Saxon, converted by St. Columbkil, ii. 174.
- Gerald Barry. See Giraldus Cambrensis.
- Gerard, St. of Mayo, iii. 166; an Englishman, 168.
- Gerberin, a priest, murdered along with St. Dympna by her father, ii. 474.
- German St. mission of to Britain, accompanied by St. Patrick to extinguish the Pelagian heresy there, i. 34, 180. Preceptor of St. Patrick, 161. Accompanied by St. Patrick in his return from Britain, 184.
- Germanus, a tutor of St. Columbkil, ii. 117, 120.
- Germany, several monasteries founded there by Irishmen, iv. 2.
- Gibrian, St. brother to St. Tressan, ii. 487, 488. Death of, ib.
- Gilda-na-Naomh, bishop of Glendaloch, resigns his see, and becomes abbot of the monks of Wurtzburg, iii. 452, 454. iv. 6.
- Gildas, two of that name, the elder called Albanus, and younger Badonicus, i. 476.
- Gildas, return of to Britain after having for some time taught at Armagh, i. 435. Said to have sent a bell to St. Brigid, 450. Interview with St. Finnian, 464. Much spoken of in the acts of St. Finnian, 469. Disquisition on Gildas Albanus and Gildas Badonicus, 476, 477. Sent when young to the school of Iltutus, 477. Goes to Ireland and is employed in the school at Armagh, ib. Returns to Britain, ib. Superintends the school of Lincarvan, 478. Death of, ib. and 489. Gildas Albanus and Gildas Badonicus the same, 482. Enquiry concerning the time of his birth, 483. Said to have gone on a tour to Brittany, 485. Called Gilla, ib. in high repute with the 2d class of Irish saints, ii. 19. Visited by St. Bréandán while in Brittany, 34.
- Gildas, a learned man, born in Wales, and son of an Irish Scot, iii. 262. Said to have been a monk of Bangor, ib.
- Gildas de Ruys*, St. monastery of, i. 488.
- Gill Abbey, iv. 126.
- Gille, or Gillebert, bishop of Limerick, apostolic legate for Ireland, ii. 72. The first legate ever placed over Ireland, iii. 467. Account of him, iv. 23 to 35.
- Gille Mac Liag, the first name of Gelasius archbishop of Armagh, iv. 102, 103.
- Giraldus Cambrensis, his lies respecting Ireland, iv. 210, 231, 242, 268, 279, 281, 286, 287. His first arrival in Ireland, 253. Again with prince John, 262. Refuses the see of Ferns, 264. Preaches against the Irish clergy, 265. His testimony in favour of them, 267. Returns to England, 278. His malignity, vanity, and conceitedness, ib. His works, 280.
- Gladusa, mother of St. Cadoc, i. 490.
- Glaismor, monastery of, ii. 358, 360.

- Glas-naidhen, abbey of, ii. 76, 78.
- Glass-Kinnick*, a copy of the four Gospels so called, ii. 201.
- Glastonbury, St. Patrick said to be buried there, i. 324. The church of, called the church of St. Patrick, i. 67, 228. Community formed there by Irishmen, 325.
- Gleann-Dallain, a place in Breffny, or Carbury, ii. 327, 329.
- Gleann-Gairg*, not the same as Lough Dearg, i. 426.
- Gleann-indeachta, the church of, i. 268.
- Gleann-ussen, monastery of, ii. 76, 78.
- Glendalough, founded by St. Coemgen, ii. 44. Plundered by the Scandinavians, iii. 271. St. Laurence O'Toole elected abbot of, iv. 175. Archdall's error respecting its abbacy, 180. Burnt, 182. City of confirmed to Malchus, bishop of that see, by a bull from Pope Alexander the third, 241. The see annexed to Dublin, 319, 321. Ledwich's errors respecting it, 398, 399.
- Glenfinnaght, in the county Antrim, a boundary of Dalrieda, i. 217.
- Gluaire in Dalaradia, church of, i. 268.
- Goban, St. monastery of, at Kinsale, ii. 94.
- Gobban, son of Nescainn, a bishop, placed by St. Carthagh in a monastery at Inispict, ii. 358.
- Gobban, St. receives St. Laserian at Old Leighlin, ii. 402. Gives up his monastery to him, 404.
- Gobban, a priest left by St. Fursey at Cnobbersburg, ii. 459, 460.
- Gobnata, St. abbess of Borneach, iii. 14.
- Godfrey, or Godthric, king of Dublin, acknowledges himself vassal to Turlogh O'Brien, iii. 471. Banished, 484, 486.
- Godfrid Cronan, king of Mann, iii. 457, 460.
- Godfrid, king of the Danes of Dublin, plunders Armagh, iii. 367. Thought to be a Christian, 376. Routed in battle by the Irish, 377. Defeated by Roderic O'Cannanain at Muine-Breacain, ib. Killed in battle by the Munstermen, ib.
- Gormfhlaidh, abbess of Kildare, iv. 54.
- Gormgall, abbot of Ardoilen, iii. 435.
- Gortnaluaclra*, the birth place of Berach, ii. 323.
- Gothred or Godfrey, king of Dublin, banished, iii. 484, 486.
- Govan, monastery of, ii. 165.
- Graige-ne-managh, or Douske, abbey of founded, iv. 248.
- Grallo, Count, founder of the abbey of Landevenec, i. 493.
- Grany, nunnery of St. Mary's of, iv. 338, 340.
- Graphan, son of Nescainn, ii. 358.
- Gray Abbey. See Leigh Abbey.
- Greek and Asiatic teachers, no account of any having ever come to Ireland in the ancient history of the church, i. 12.
- Gregory VII. Pope, writes to Turlogh O'Brien, and claims ecclesiastical and temporal power over Ireland, iii. 484.
- Gregory, superior of the Irish monastery of Wurtzburg, iv. 157.

- Gregory, archbishop of Dublin and several other prelates, deaths of, iv. 172.
- Guaire, king of Conaught, ii. 339. Said to have been visited by St. Maidoc of Ferns, ib. and 341. Grants land to St. Colman to erect a monastery, 342.
- Guasacta, a disciple of St. Patrick, i. 219.
- Guic Sezni in Britany, where St. Sezinus, an Irishman, died, i. 261.
- Guigner, St. or Fignar, said to have been converted by St. Patrick, i. 225.
- Gundlaeus, father of Cadoc, i. 489. Retires from the world, leaving his lands to Cadoc, 490.
- Gunibald, St. an Irishman, said to have suffered martyrdom in Germany, i. 7.
- Gunifort, an Irishman, brother of St. Gunibald, suffered martyrdom in Germany, i. 7, 9, 462.

H.

- Hanmer, falsehoods of respecting Celsus, archbishop of Armagh, iv. 33.
- Harbours of Ireland, better known than those of Britain, i. 14.
- Harris, errors of, i. 200. ii. 315, 413. iii. 28, 40.
- Hautmont, monastery of, founded by St. Madelgar, ii. 490.
- Helen, St. sister of St. Tressan, death of, ii. 488.
- Helias, an Irishman, bishop of Angouleme, iii. 287. Disciple of Theodulf, bishop of Orleans, 289. Death of, ib.
- Helvacus, St. (St. Ailbe) said to have baptized St. David of Wales, i. 469.
- Hemma, the abbess, makes over to Marianus and his brethren the church of St. Peter at Ratisbon, iv. 3.
- Henan, St. of Druimrath, ii. 189.
- Henry II. king of England, applies to Pope Adrian IV. for permission to take possession of Ireland, iv. 158. Arrives in Ireland, 201. Receives the submission of several Irish princes, bishops, and abbots, 202, 203. Returns to England, 217, 219. Sends the Bull of Adrian IV. and the Brief of Alexander III. into Ireland, 222. Declares his son John king of Ireland, 235. Waited on in England by St. Laurence O'Toole, to settle a dispute between him and Roderic O'Conor, 244. Behaves tyrannically, and refuses the saint permission to return to Ireland, ib. Death of, 317.
- Herc, St. or St. Hercus, bishop of Slane, i. 224, 346. See Erc and Ercus.
- Hermedus, bishop of Clogher, i. 87.
- Hermon Mountain, i. 164. Supposed to be the rock called Mount St. Michael, 166.

- Hervey de Monte Morisco takes the command of the English army, invades North Munster, but is defeated at Thurles, iv. 224.
- Heth, region of, a church built there by St. Brendan, ii. 29. A monastery established there by St. Comgall, 63, 68.
- Heul in Cornubia. St. Fingar or Guigner, meets St. Hia, an Irish virgin, there, where they and several others are put to death, i. 297.
- Hia, an Irish virgin, put to death at Heul in Cornubia, i. 297.
- Hierarchy, none existed in Ireland before St. Patrick, i. 33.
- Hierlog, St. bishop and abbot of Lismore, death of, iii. 144.
- Hild, abbess of the nunnery of Strenaeshalch (Whitby) defends the Irish Paschal calculation, iii. 60.
- Hildulf, St. said to have been an Irishman, iii. 104, 106.
- Hilfothuir, abbey of, iv. 323.
- Himelin, St. an Irishman, iii. 194, 197. Dies at Brabant, 195.
- Hinba or Hymba, monastery of, erected by St. Columbkil, ii. 162, 167.
- Hoel, brother of St. Gildas, killed by king Arthur at the battle of Anglesey, i. 477.
- Holmes, islands in the Severn, St. Gildas and Cadoc retire to the, i. 47.
- Holm Patrick, supposed to have been the place where St. Patrick landed after he had been repulsed at Anat-Cailtrain, i. 209, 212. Plundered by the Scandinavians, iii. 231, 238.—See Inis-Patrick.
- Holy Cross, abbey of founded, iv. 252.
- Holy Trinity, Dublin, church of the, built, iii. 434.
- Honoratus, St. monastery of, i. 175, 177.
- Hua-meith-tire*. or Hy-meith-tire, now the barony of Orior, co. Armagh, a church erected in, by St. Patrick, i. 266, 270.
- Hua-Nolella*, St. Patrick preached to the people of, i. 244.
- Huarach, succeeds Edachada Mac Scanlan, bishop of Emly, iii. 381.
- Huarangaradh*, a church erected there by St. Patrick, i. 244.
- Hugh IV. surnamed Ollain, monarch of Ireland, killed in battle by Donald, who succeeded him on the throne, i. 175, 176.
- Hy, or I, the island of, occupied by Druids until driven out by St. Columba, ii. 111. Origin of the name of, 153. Permission given by its proprietor to St. Columba to settle in, 154. The monks of, send Aedan to preach to the people of Northumberland, ii. 419, 420. Monks of, receive the Roman Paschal computation, iii. 154. Burned by the Scandinavians, and again attacked by them, 241, 242. Devastated, 391. A new monastery erected there in opposition to the elders of the place, iv. 347. The new monastery demolished by the clergy of the North of Ireland, and Amalgaid elected abbot, ib.
- Hy-Bairrche* or Hy-barche, a tribe and district of Leinster. St. Fiech of that house a Christian when he met with St. Patrick,

- i. 274. The district visited by St. Finnian, 465. Where situated, 468.
- Hy-Breasail*, the district of, iv. 38, 41.
- Hy-Bruin-chualain*, a territory in the county of Wicklow, i. 427.
- Hy-Bruin-Seola*, district of, i. 247.
- Hy-Conaill*, the chieftain and principal persons of, wait on Saint Ita, ii. 84.
- Hy-Cuanach*, St. Patrick violently opposed in, i. 287.
- Hy-failge*, district of, i. 302.
- Hy-Fiachra*, district of, i. 256.
- Hy-figinte*, district of, ii. 3.
- Hy-Garrchon*, district of, where situated, i. 40, 272.
- Hy-Kinsellagh*, comprized in the now county of Carlow, i. 273, 276.
- Hy-Maine*, district of, i. 244.
- Hy-Malia*, district of, i. 245.
- Hy-meith-tire*. See Hua-meith-tire.
- Hy-tuirtre*, a part of Dalaradia, so called, i. 263.

I.

- Jacob, a deacon, observes the Roman custom of the Paschal computation, ii. 424.
- James, St. announced the Christian Faith in Ireland, i. 2.
- James, St. the Irish monastery of, at Ratisbon, iv. 57.
- Jaova, or Iovin St. Studies, in Britain, under his uncle Paul, a disciple of Iltutus, i. 492. Returns to Ireland, and embraces the ecclesiastical state, ib. Death of, ib.
- Iarlath, St. successor to St. Benignus in the See of Armagh, i. 359, 375, 391, 392. Death of, 359, 415. Succeeded by Cormac. ib.
- Iarlath, St. first bishop of Tuam. St. Brendan said to have studied theology under him, ii. 29. His parentage, 41. Erroneously said to have been a disciple of St. Benignus, ib. Establishes his See at Tuam, ib. His death and place of interment. ib.
- Iar-Muin*, or West Munster, i. 293.
- Ibar, St. of Beg-Erin or Begery, an eminent person in Ireland, i. 22. Opposed to St. Patrick, 283. Admonished by an Angel, enters into an agreement with St. Patrick, 284. Ordered by St. Patrick to offer up prayers for the conversion of Olild, 287. Not a bishop so early as has been imagined, 334. School of in Beg Erin, 402. A friend of St. Brigid's, 410. Reckoned one of St. Patrick's disciples, 422. Death of, ib.
- Ibrach, the monastery of, iv. 91, 92.
- I Columbkille, island of. See Hy, and I.
- Idols, not generally worshipped in Ireland, i. 229.

- Idunan, the first who assumed the title of bishop of Meath, iii. 452.
- Ieripoint or Ierpoint, monastery of, founded, iv. 248.
- Iferte or Hyferte, a district in Kerry, i. 420, 422.
- Ilandus, bishop, monastery of, at Rathlibhthen, ii. 10. Invites Aidus, son of Brec, to his monastery, 187.
- Illand, and Alild, sons of Dunlang, king of Leinster, baptized by St. Patrick at Naas, i. 272, 394.
- Illand, king of Leinster, prediction of St. Brigid to him, i. 407.
- Iltutus, school of, at Laniltult or Lantwill in Glamorganshire, i. 475. Death of, 481.
- Imaile, or Imaly, Glenn of, iv. 172, 174.
- Imchad, grandfather of St. Sinill, i. 441.
- Imchclair, a district near Dungannon; people converted there by St. Patrick, i. 266, 269.
- Imleachluan, church of, i. 268.
- Immagh, monastery of, erected by St. Fechin, iii. 45. People of, converted by him, ib.
- Inauguration of princes, iv. 286.
- Inbher-Boinne*, meaning of, i. 221.
- Inbhernaile, errors of Archdall respecting St. Natalis of, i. 447.
- Inbher Slainge*, meaning of the word, &c. i. 214.
- Incest, the Irish not guilty of, iv. 283.
- Inchinemeo*, or Inish-na-mbeo, meaning of, iv. 290.
- Inchmore in Lough-ree, monastery of, ii. 6.
- Inclusi, a description of anchorets, iv. 394, 402.
- Indrect, bishop of Kilmacduach, death of, iii. 266.
- Indrect or Indrecht, succeeds Diermit as abbot of Hy, iii. 274. Martyred by the Anglo-Saxons, 325.
- Inis-Aingin, given to St. Kieran of Clonmānois, by Dermot, monarch of Ireland, i. 56. The monarch Maolseaghlain dies there, iii. 426, 427.
- Inisbeg, church of, i. 279.
- Inis-bo-finde, monastery of St. Rioch in, i. 419. Meaning of the words, 421. A monastery erected there by Colman, iii. 79.
- Inis-Breagh-muigh, birth place of St. Maidoc of Ferns, ii. 333, 336.
- Iniscaoin-Deghadh, St. Dageus bishop there, ii. 76, 79.
- Iniscaorach, now called Mutton Island. An Oratory constructed there by St. Senan, ii. 3, 6.
- Iniscathaig, Iniscattery or Iniscatthy, monastery of, i. 445. Establishment of St. Senan, in, ii. 3.
- Inisclothran, St. Diermit abbot of, ii. 9. Plundered, iv. 322.
- Iniscourcy, monastery of founded, iv. 248, 250.
- Inisdamle, where situate, iii. 27. Monastery of, plundered by the Scandinavians, iii. 270; and again, ib. Devastated, 377.
- Inisfail, church of, i. 279.
- Inisfallen, abbey of, plundered, iv. 248, 249.
- Inish-na-mbeo, meaning of the name, iv. 290.

- Iniskeltra, monastery of, founded by St. Camin, iii. 11. Set on fire, 374. Re-built by Brian Boroinmhe, 422.
- Inislaunaght, Inislounagh or Inislogh, its scite, iii. 28. Abbey of, iv. 262, 264.
- Inisleamhnacta, conjecture on, iii. 27, 28.
- Inis-locha-cre*, known by the name of Monanincha, iv. 290.
- Inisluaidhe, now Inis-ula, ii. 5.
- Inisluinge, church of, ii. 3, 5.
- Inis-mac-Hua-Cuinn or Inisquin, a monastery established there by St. Brendan, ii. 30.
- Inis-mac-Saint*, abbey of, i. 453.
- Inis-mochta, or Inismouthy, church of pillaged, iii. 374, 375. Conjecture on, ib.
- Inismor, monastery of, founded by St. Brendan, ii. 3.
- Inismore, monastery of, founded by St. Columba, i. 430.
- Inis-muigh-Samh, or Inis-mhigh-Saimh, St. Nennidh abbot and bishop there, i. 451. Monastery of, founded by St. Nennidh, ii. 51, 233.
- Inis-ne-gananagh, priory of Canons regular of, iv. 325, 326.
- Inis-Patrick or Holm Patrick, plundered by the Scandinavians, iii. 236, 238. Synod of, iv. 129.
- Inispict, monastery of erected by Carthagh, ii. 358, 362.
- Inisquin, monastery of, under St. Meldan, ii. 36.
- Inistuaiscart, a church erected there by St. Senan, ii. 3.
- Inistusker, conjecture relating to, ii. 5.
- Inistymon, abbey of, ii. 89.
- Innella, St. or St. Devenella, daughter of Fergus, ii. 327.
- Inniscattly. See Iniscathaig.
- Innisboffin. See Inis-bo-finde.
- Innisfallen, monastery of, attributed to St. Finnian the Leper, iii. 84, 85.
- Inish-Owen*, Owen, the chief of, converted by St. Patrick, i. 262.
- Inreathan, anciently called Derluss, near Downpatrick, i. 216.
- Invasion of Ireland by the English, iv. 190.
- Inver-Colpoe, or Invercolpa, now Colp, near Drogheda, landing of St. Patrick at, i. 221. Monastery of, iv. 252.
- Inverdaoile, St. Dagan of, said to have been a nephew of St. Coemgen, ii. 45. Establishment of, 365, 366.
- Inverdega, now Wicklow, march of the Danes from thence to Kildare, iii. 271.
- Invocation of Saints, the custom of, among the early Irish Christians proved, iii. 251.
- John, abbot of Monastereven, elected bishop of Leighlin, and opposed by Hamon de Valoniis, iv. 331. Consecrated by the Pope, ib. Sent back to his diocese, 332.
- John of Atheling invited from France by Alfred king of England, iii. 301. Killed, 302, 318.
- John Baptist, St. feast of, happening on a Friday accounted ominous, iv. 11.

- John Baptist, St. foundation of the priory of, in Tuam, iv. 136;
 — of Down, iv. 253, 256; — of Dublin, iv. 317; —
 of Kells, iv. 337, 339.
- John, bishop of Mecklenburg, an Irishman, iii. 318. Martyred at Rethre by the Slavonians, iii. 318. iv. 6.
- John and Candidus, companions of Marianus, received by Otto bishop of Ratisbon, and afterwards become Benedictine monks, iv. 2, 4.
- John and Magnould, companions of St. Gallus, attend him to Constance, ii. 435. John elected bishop of Constance, 436.
- John de Courcy invades Ullagh or Ulidia; attacks Down, and makes the bishop prisoner, iv. 232. Defeats the Ulidians, 233.
 Defeated by them, 237.
- John, Earl of Moreton, son of Henry II. declared king of Ireland by his father, iv. 235. Never styled king of Ireland, 236. Arrives in Ireland, and treats the Irish princes with derision, 262.
 His whole army almost destroyed, 263. Offers the see of Ferns to his tutor Gerald Barry, or Giraldus Cambrensis, 264.
 Becomes king of England, 334.
- John Scottus Erigena goes to France, iii. 288. Translates the works of Dionysius the Areopagite, ib. 290. Teaches philosophy in Paris, 292. Writes a treatise on Predestination, 293.
 His 19 chapters condemned at the Council of Valence, 294.
 His work on Natures, 298, 299, 315. His tract on the Vision of God, 299. His book on the Eucharist condemned in the Council of Vercelli, 300. Story of his taking shelter with Alfred king of England unfounded, ib. Confounded with John of Atheling, 301; and with John of Malmesbury, 315, 318.
 Died in France, 315. Drew up a translation of the Greek Scholia of St. Maximus, ib. His history mangled and distorted, 319.
- Iomhar, or Ivar, a Northern Chief, arrives at Limerick, iii. 374.
- Iona. See I and Hy.
- Jonas, a monk of Bobbio, ii. 262.
- Joseph, an Irishman, disciple of Colgan the Wise, iii. 229, 231.
- Joseph, scribe of Roscommon, death of, iii. 255.
- Joseph of Rosmor, bishop and abbot of Clones, death of, iii. 273, 276.
- Joseph, called prince of Armagh, succeeds Maelbrigid as bishop of Armagh, iii. 369.
- Iovin, St. See St. Iaova.
- Ireland, reckoned one of the British Isles by the ancients, i. 2.
 Intercourse of, with Gaul, 14. Harbours of better known to merchants than those of Britain, ib. Not included in the le-gatine jurisdiction given to Augustine, iii. 467. Bad practices there complained of by Lanfranc to Turlogh and Godfrey, 476.
 Grounds of the Pope's title to, examined, iv. 160 to 164.
- Iren*, said to be the same place as Oxford, i. 418.

- Irish bishops and priests, many take shelter in foreign countries during the troubles occasioned by the Danes, &c. iii. 274.
- Irish church, said to have been under the jurisdiction of the bishops of Canterbury, erroneous, iii. 464, 466. Pretended reformation of, by Henry II. iv. 210, 211.
- Irish establishments in North Britain, i. 431.
- Irish Liturgies, various, iv. 368.
- Irish method of observing the Paschal calculations, ii. 378.
- Irish monks, discipline and dress of, iv. 357.
- Irish princes disrespectfully treated by John Earl of Morton, iv. 262.
- Irish saints, several in France, ii. 491.
- Irish Scots calling themselves bishops, decrees passed against them in France, iii. 274.
- Irishmen, called Scots, iii. 221. seqq. Several go over to the Continent, iii. 394. Several retire to Glastonbury, 395.
- Island of the living.* See Inish-na-mbeo.
- Israel, an Irish bishop, assists at the Synod of Verdun, iii. 403.
- Isserninus, Esserninus, or Serenus, a companion of St. Patrick, i. 195. Receives clerical orders on the same day that St. Patrick was consecrated, 205. Arrives in Ireland, 259. Left bishop at Kilcullen by St. Patrick, 261. Assists St. Patrick and Auxilius in drawing up decrees or instructions for the Irish church, 333, 337. Death of, 375.
- Ita, St. advises St. Brendan to go to Britain, ii. 29. Her nunnery at Cluain-credhail, 33. St. Brendan said to have been placed under her care by St. Ercus, ib. Her parentage, 81. Retires to the territory of Hy-Conaill, and fixes her residence at Cluain-credhuil, 83. Foretels the time of her death, 88. Dies, ib. Is taken for the patron saint of Hy-Conaill, ib.
- Jubilee, old system of the, observed in Ireland, iv. 377.
- Justus, St. said to have baptized and educated St. Kieran, of Clonmacnois, ii. 50.
- Ivar or Jobhar and Amlave, two Danish chiefs, ravage Meath, iii. 326. Ivar takes possession of Limerick, 326, 328. Succeeds his brother Amlave as king of all the Northmen of Ireland, 327. Death of 327, 328.
- Ivor, the same as Ibar, supposed to be bishop of Kildare, i. 411, 412.

K.

- Kailli-abaide, monastery of, ii. 133.
- Kathernac, scribe and priest of Armagh, death of, iii. 267.
- Keating, wrong in making Feidlym archbishop of Leagh Mogha, iii. 273. Errors of his translator, iv. 144.
- Keldees.* See Culdees.

- Kele-De* and Keledei. See Culdees.
 Keledulass of Devenish, death of, iii. 192.
 Kele-Petrus, archbishop of Armagh, death of, iii. 192.
 Kelius Dabali, abbot of Bangor, iii. 368.
 Kelius, son of Donagan, assumes the title of bishop of Leinster, iii. 453, 455.
 Kellach, son of Bran, plunders Kildare, i. 380.
 Kellach, son of Comgall, abbot of Hy, said to have founded the church called St. Columba's at Kells, ii. 131; iii. 252.
 Kellach and Conall, monarchs of Ireland, ii. 302.
 Kellach, St. abbot of Fathen-Mura, iii. 38.
 Kellach, son of Ailild, abbot of Kildare, succeeds Indrecht as abbot of Hy, iii. 325. Succeeded by Feredach, ib.
 Kells, or Kennanus, St. Columbkil goes to, ii. 126, 130. Monastery of founded by Kellach, abbot of Hy, iii. 252. Ravaged by the Danes, 367. Ravaged by Godfrid, 377. Plundered 390, 391, 433. Synod of, iv. 139, 141, 142. Many of the bishops who attended there, 140, 144, 145. Priory of the Blessed Virgin of, founded, 321. Episcopal church of, 322. Council of, 323. See of, 344, 345.
 Kenacht, Kenaght, Kennacta or Kennachta, the district of, i. 267, 345. The birth place of St. Kienan or Kenan, 345.
 Kenan, St. or St. Kienan, or Kennanus, bishop of Duleek, i. 341, 342.
 Kenan, a monk of Tours, different from St. Kenan of Duleek, i. 342. Appointed by Iovin to administer the parish of Plow-Kernan, 493.
 Kenfaelaid, monarch of Ireland, killed in battle, iii. 82.
 Kenfail, called Comorban of Clones and Clogher, iii. 370, 372.
 Kennanus. See Kells.
 Kennfell, abbot of Bangor, death of, iii. 129.
 Kennfinnian, father of St. Sinell, i. 441.
 Kennfoelaid, father of St. Ita, ii. 81.
 Kenny, St. goes to Britain, ii. 200. Places himself under the abbot Docus, ib. Leaves St. Finnian's school of Clonard, and preaches in the north of Ireland, 201. Finds the monastery of Aghaboe, ib. Visits St. Columba, ib. Death of ib.
 Kentigern, St. bishop of Glasgow, visited by St. Columbkil, ii. 172.
 Kermand Kelstack, deity of the Northerns, i. 230.
 Kevin, St. See St. Coemgen.
 Kethernac, prior of Kildare, put to death by the Danes, iii. 272.
 Kienan, St. of Duleek, said to have written a life of St. Patrick, i. 67. Time of his being bishop of Duleek, 341. The place of his nativity, and his family, 342. Different from the Kenan a monk of Tours, ib. Death of, 418.
 Kieran of Bellachduin, St. Death of i. 87.
 Kieran of Clonmacnois, St. Time of his death, i. 31. Baptized

- by St. Patrick, 244. Time of his birth, 419. Story of his giving Clonard to St. Finnian, and of his having obtained above 100 monasteries from King Dermot, 468. Studied under St. Finnian at Clonard, 469. Places himself under St. Senan at Inniscatthy, ii. 3. Confounded with St. Kieran of Saigir by Ware, 9. Venerated in the Western Islands of Scotland, ib. His festival kept on 9th of September, ib. Place of his birth and his parentage, 50. Goes to the Isle of Arran, 51, and from thence to Inniscatthy, ib. Removes to the monastery of Inis-Aingin, 52, 71. Leaves Aingin, and founds Clonmacnois, ib. Death of, ib. St. Columba said to have been under him at Clonmacnois, 121.
- Kieran of Saigir, St. said to have been a bishop before the coming of St. Patrick, i. 22. Place of his nativity, 29. Goes to Rome, ib. meets St. Patrick on his return, 30. Submits to St. Patrick, 283. One of St. Finnian's scholars, ii. 7. Erects a monastery at Saigir, ib. Establishes a nunnery for his mother and some pious virgins, ib. Thought to have been first bishop of Ossory, ib. Said to have died in Cornwall, 8. Said to have been succeeded by St. Carthagh, 98, 101.
- Kierragia Airne, a district in Conaght, i. 248.
- Kierragia Airteach, in Conaght, a church erected there by St. Patrick, i. 245, 248.
- Kierragia of Munster, surnamed Luachra, i. 248.
- Kierraghe Chuirke, birth place of St. Cassidan, i. 447.
- Kilaraght. See Kill-Athtracta.
- Kilbarry, commandery of, iv. 339.
- Kibeggan, monastery of, iv. 335, 336.
- Kilcleeheen, abbey of, iv. 186.
- Kilconel, anciently called Kill-chonail, i. 429.
- Kilcoul or Kilcouly, abbey of, founded, iv. 334, 336.
- Kilcree, nunnery of, built by St. Cera, iii. 129.
- Kilcreunata, nunnery of, iv. 338, 340.
- Kilcullen, i. 273, 276. Church of, plundered, iii. 374. The see of, iv. 44.
- Kilcumin, priory of, iv. 262.
- Kildare, plundered by Kellach son of Bran, i. 380. The place where St. Brigid erected her monastery for holy virgins, 388. Foundation of the nunnery, 405. Derivation of the name of, 408. Expenses of the church furnished out of the monastery, 411. St. Brigid dies there, 455. Conflagration of, iii. 153, 155. Ravaged, and the church set on fire by the Danes, 271. Taken possession of by Felim Mac Crimthann, king of Munster, ib. Ravaged by the Northmen, 346. Destroyed by the Danes, 373. Ravaged, 390. Pillaged, 391. A beautiful copy of a concordance of the Gospels kept there, iv. 289. Destruction of the church of, 392.
- Kilfaile, church of, ii. 326.

- Kilfeacle, i. 289.
- Kilfenora, church of, ii. 194, 196.
- Kilforchern, church of, i. 428.
- Kilgaradh or Oran, in Roscommon, said to have been the see of Cethecus, i. 335.
- Kilglais, church of i. 268.
- Kilian, St. apostle of Franconia, iii. 115, 118. Sets out from Ireland to the continent, 116. Goes to Rome to obtain the Pope's permission to preach the Gospel in Franconia, ib. Returns to Franconia and converts Duke Gozbert and many of his subjects, ib. Suffers martyrdom together with Coloman and others, by order of Geilana, wife of Gozbert, 117.
- Kilian or Quilian, an Irishman, said to have been a disciple of St. Columbanus, a missionary on the continent, ii. 443.
- Kilian, an Irishman, successor to Mimborin, abbot of St. Martin's monastery at Cologne, iii. 406.
- Kilitragh, monastery of, i. 268,
- Kilkenny, the name of, never adhered to the see of Ossory until after the synod of Rathbreasail, iv. 44. See of Ossory removed to, 237, 239.
- Kilkenny West, monastery of, iv. 336, 337.
- Killachad, church of, pillaged by the Northmen, iii. 272.
- Killachaid, monastery of, burned, iii. 374, 375.
- Kill-achaid-conchinn, monastery of, iii. 19.
- Killachuidh Drumfada (Killeigh in King's County) i. 448.
- Kill-ailbe, nunnery of, ii. 329. iii. 14.
- Kill-ailbhe, monastery of, iii. 21.
- Kill-air, the see of, iv. 345.
- Killala, church of, i. 253.
- Killaloe, church of, origin of its name, ii. 205, 216. Rebuilt by Brian Boroimhe, iii. 422.
- Killare, St. Aidus fixes his see at, ii. 187.
- Kill-ausaille. See Killossy.
- Kill-Athtracta, nunnery of, i. 245. iii. 39.
- Killbil, abbot of Clonach-bronich, death of, iii. 192.
- Kill-Caireni, the port of, i. 465. Derivation of its name, 467. Where situate, 468.
- Killcarn, in Meath, conjecture as to its name, i. 420.
- Kill-Carthaich*, church of ii. 100.
- Kill-Cele-Christ*, monastery of, built by St. Cele-Christus, iii. 162.
- Kill-chairpre, church of, i. 425, 427.
- Kill-chonail, now Kilconel, i. 429.
- Kill-chuana, monastery or church of, ii. 138, 359, 360.
- Kill-coeman, church of, i. 269.
- Killcoonagh. church of, ii. 359.
- Kill-cruimthir, monastery of, iii. 20.
- Kill-dara. See Kildare.

- Kill-dumha-gloinn, St. Mogenoch, bishop of, ii. 233.
 Killeigh, nunnery of, iv. 338, 340.
 Killen, a bishop, placed over the church of Teagh-talian, i. 266, 270.
 Killen, St. abbot of Saiger, iii. 140.
 Killen, successor of St. Moling, bishop of Ferns, iii. 132.
 Killen Droichtheach, abbot of Hy, iii. 166. Death of, 192.
 Killen-fada, abbot of Hy, death of iii. 166.
 Kill-eochaille, church of, ii. 90, 92.
Kill-fheacla, church of, founded by St. Patrick, i. 287.
 Kill-fintan, called after St. Fintan, ii. 232.
 Kill-fortchern, County Carlow, i. 466.
Killgaradh, church of, erected by St. Patrick, i. 244.
 Killgaura, St. Lonius revered at, i. 412.
 Killiadhain, church of, ii. 7.
 Kill-Liadain of Killiadhain, said to have been founded by St. Kieran of Saiger, i. 405.
 Kill-lochuir, monastery of, iii. 154, 157.
 Kill-mac-nenain, church of, ii. 107, 116.
 Killmacrenan, monastery of, ii. 136.
 Killmallock, monastery of, iii. 29.
 Killmanach Droichid, the same as Kilmanagh, near Kilkenny, i. 446.
 Kill-mor-Deathruib, monastery of, ii. 133.
 Killmuini or Kilmuni, in Britain, i. 464, 467.
 Kill-na-gauran, abbey of, iii. 48.
 Killnamanagh, monastery of, iii. 46.
 Kill-na-marbhan, monastery of, iii. 20.
 Killosnadh, battle of, i. 400.
 Killossey, the See of St. Auxilius, i. 261, 273, 276.
 Kill-ratha, monastery of, i. 288.
Kill-regnaighe, abbey of, ii. 77, 80.
 Killskire, church of, ii. 327. St. Conall, bishop of, iii. 323. Ravaged, iii. 377.
 Kill-sleve-Cuilin, establishment of, i. 403, 404. Nunnery of, iii. 38, 40.
 Kill-teidhill, church of, i. 288.
 Killtulach, cell of, ii. 352.
 Killure, commandery of, iv. 339.
 Kilmacduagh, monastery of, ii. 342.
 Kilmbian, church of, ii. 183.
 Kilmagnend, the old name of Kilmainham, iv. 230.
 Kilmainham, priory of, iv. 230, 339.
 Kilmainham-beg, commandery of, iv. 339.
 Kilmanagh, St. Naal abbot of, i. 444, 446.
 Kilmodan, abbey of, ii. 325, 326.
 Kilmony, house of Canons regular at, iv. 325.

- Kilmore, St. Fedlimid said to be bishop of, ii. 10. Cathedral of, 11. See of, iv. 344.
- Kilmore, or Kilmormoy or Kilmormoyle, monastery of, i. 256.
- Kilmore Deathrib, monastery of, ii. 12, 133. School of, 404.
- Kil-Oen, nunnery of, iv. 325.
- Kilpatrick, Scotland, fable concerning, i. 90, 91.
- Kilrush, monastery of, iv. 338, 340.
- Kilsaran, commandery of, iv. 339, 340.
- Kilsleve-Cuilin. See Killsleve-Cuilin.
- Kinaeth, abbot of Durrow, ii. 202.
- Kinaid, abbot of Derry and Drumcliff, death of, iii. 368.
- Kindred, degrees of, forbidden in marriage, iv. 211, 283.
- Kinel Eogan, fight between the people of, and the Ulidians in the cathedral of Armagh, iii. 339. Bishop of, iv. 348.
- Kinneth, monarch of Ireland, killed, iii. 144.
- Kintyre, St. Kieran said to have preached in, ii. 121.
- Knock Abbey, iv. 219.
- Knockmoy, abbey of, iv. 319, 320.
- Knock-na-seangan, monastery of, iv. 129, 131.
- Kyldee. See Culdee.
- Kyrie Eleison, monastery of established, iv. 168, 171.

L.

- Labrathi*, territory of, i. 390.
- Lachtean, St. of Achad-ur, intimate with St. Pulcherius, iii. 25.
- Lactan, St. or Lactin, St. supposed to be the same as St. Lachtean, i. 27.
- Lactan, chosen to succeed Dagan, bishop of Achad-Dagan, ii. 207.
- Lactan, a disciple of St. Fursey, ii. 462, 464.
- Lagny, monastery of, erected, ii. 459.
- Laidec, father of St. Kenny, ii. 200.
- Laidgen, monk of Clonfert-molua, death of, iii. 36.
- Laidnen, Comorban of Ferns and Tallaght, iii. 370, 372.
- Laisrean, of the 2d class of Irish Saints, ii. 13. Called Molaisse, 218. A disciple of Finnian of Clonard, ib. Erects the monastery of Devenish, ib. Different from Laisrean of Leighlin, 219. Death of, 183, 219. See Lasrean.
- Laistran, abbot of Ard-mac-nasca, ii. 414.
- Lamh-ghlan* and Lamh-iodan, meaning of, i. 454.
- Lanavach, church of, i. 268.
- Lancarvan, monastery of, i. 489.
- Landevenec, abbey of, i. 493.
- Lanfranc, bishop of Canterbury, written to by Domnald bishop of Cashel concerning Eucharistical baptism, iii. 455. Consecrates Patrick bishop of Dublin, 458, 462. Writes to Turlogh

- king of Munster, 473, 474. Complains to him of some bad practices in Ireland, 476.
- Lanforten, nunnery of, iii. 38, 41.
- Lann-beachaire in Fingall, St. Molua revered there, iii. 83, 85.
- Lann-Mocholmoc, monastery of, iii. 146.
- Largis, bishop of Kildare, killed by the Danes, iii. 339, 346.
- Laseran, son of Nescainn, ii. 358.
- Laserian, St. abbot of Old Leighlin, defends the Roman mode of calculating the Paschal time, ii. 389, 402. Opposed in this by St. Fintan Munnu, ib. Said to have been ordained by Pope Gregory at Rome, 402. Returns to Ireland, ib.
- Lasra, St. foundress of the church of Doire-mac-Aidmecain, ii. 77.
- Lasran Mac Mochtighern, bishop of Kildare, death of, iii. 323.
- Lasrean, St. abbot of Drumliag, visits St. Ita, ii. 88.
- Lasrean, St. of Ardmacnasca, inquiry respecting him, ii. 363.
- Lasrean, alias Molassius, abbot of Devenish, said to have ordered St. Columba to quit Ireland, ii. 146. See Laisrean.
- Lasrenus, abbot of Dairmogh, ii. 124.
- Lassara, mother of St. Finnian of Maghbile, ii. 25.
- Lateran, Irish bishops, attending at the third council of, iv. 238.
- Laurence, successor to Augustine, possessed no power over Ireland, iii. 470, 471.
- Law of St. Patrick*, enforced by Artrigius primate of Armagh, i. 252. By Diermit Hua Tigernach, 277, 280. By Moeliosa, iv. 9; and by Celsus, 31.
- Laymen, calling themselves archbishops of Armagh, iii. 385.
- Leac Coithurgi*, or St. Patrick's stone at Cashel, i. 281.
- Leamchuill in Leinster, church of, ii. 303.
- Leath Cuinn, reduced under the power of Cormac Mac Culinan, iii. 351.
- Lecale, anciently called Mag-inis, i. 217, 219, 302.
- Ledwich, doctor, proofs of, and animadversions on, the ignorance, errors, and malevolence of, i. 11, 14, 35, 48, 51, 53, 54, 57, 58, 65, 68, 70, 72, 74, 75, 77, 78, 186, 294, 368, 380, 456, 459. ii. 16, 46, 95, 109, 123, 151, 153, 202, 210, 250, 253, 257, 294, 295, 332, 368, 379, 386, 398, 425. iii. 89, 94, 160, 161, 249, 272, 346, 353, 357, 358, 359, 360, 379, 405, 472, 480, 481, iv. 31, 32, 34, 65, 66, 72, 103, 113, 114, 119, 147, 149, 150, 177, 180, 203, 240, 291, 293, 299, 316, 324, 354, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 366, 388, 395, 398, 401, 405, 408.
- Leigh, abbey of our Lady of, founded, iv. 321.
- Leighlin, synod of, concerning the calculation of Easter time, ii. 389. Plundered, 367, 391. Temporalities of the church of, seized by Hamon de Valoniis, iv. 331.
- Leinster, from Dublin to Gowran, laid waste by Aidus Finnliath, iii. 327.
- Leix, or Abbey Leix, monastery of founded, iv. 262, 264.

- Lenin, father of Colman of Cloyne, ii. 213.
 Lent, the fast of, how observed, i. 251.
 Lents, the three, iv. 387, 389.
 Leogaire, monarch of Ireland, St. Patrick summoned to appear before, i. 224. Time of his reign, 225. Said to have been converted to Christianity, 234. His queen converted. ib.
 Letavia, the same as Letha, i. 100.
 Letha, St. Patrick made prisoner there by pirates, i. 98. The same as Letavia, 100. St. Patrick returns to, 150, 151. Errors respecting its situation, 151, 167.
 Letter-luin, battle of, iv. 182, 183.
 Lettrech Odran, monastery of, ii. 70.
 Liaban, mother of St. Kieran, ii. 7.
 Lia-na-Manach, St. Patrick said to have converted a prince Eochad there, i. 254. Errors of Archdall respecting it, 255.
 Leathmore, monastery of, iii. 24, 29.
 Libba, St. or Molibba, said to have been bishop of Glendalough, ii. 364, 365.
 Libern, or Liberius, St. left by St. Senan at Inis-mor, ii. 3.
 Libhan, or Libana, celebrated in Ulster, ii. 327.
 Limerick, account of Gille, or Gillebert, bishop of, iv. 23 to 30. See of, freed from the jurisdiction of that of Canterbury, 45. Besieged by the English and Ossorians, 225. The cathedral of, erected, 325. The English driven out of, 326.
 Lindisfarne, monastery of, ii. 422. See of, transferred to York, 75. Bede's testimony concerning, iii. 76.
 Lingard, doctor, some errors of, ii. 113. iii. 96.
 Linn, nunnery of, i. 404.
 Linn-Huachail, monastery of governed by St. Colman, iii. 147.
 Lismore, monastery of, ii. 353. Plundered by the Danes, iii. 366. Burned, 391. iv. 50. Two churches erected in, 74. Taken by Raymond le Grose, 224.
 Liturgies, Greek, Syrian, &c. used in Rome, i. 13. Various used in Rome, 29. Several used in Ireland, iv. 28.
 Liturgy, introduced into Ireland by St. Patrick, observed and followed by St. Comgall of Bangor, ii. 63.
 Livin, St. martyr, goes over to Belgium, ii. 467. Received by Floribert abbot of two monasteries at Ghent, ib. Acts of, 468. Murdered by a multitude of pagans near Hanthem, ib.
 Loarn, eldest brother of Fergus, i. 11. Irish colony settled in North Britain by, 431.
 Loarn, a priest, i. 248. Said by Archdall to have been an abbot, ib.
 Loarn, abbot of Clonard, death of iii. 192.
 Locha river, i. 432.
 Loch-awe, monastery of, ii. 172.
Loch-uama, Nuad of, iii. 252, 254.
 Logh-vair, Turgesius drowned in, iii. 277, 279.

- Lochen-Meann, surnamed the wise, abbot of Kildare, iii. 153.
- Loga, or Lugus, father of St. Iarlath of Tuam, ii. 41.
- Loman, or Luman, said to be a nephew of St. Patrick, first bishop of Trim, i. 222, 416. ii. 342, 345.
- Lomtul, bishop of Kildare, death of, iii. 202.
- Lonan entertains St. Patrick, i. 288.
- Longsech, monarch of Ireland, killed in battle, iii. 144.
- Lonius, said to have been bishop of Kildare, i. 411. Revered at Kilgaura, 412.
- Losclag, surnamed wise, death of, iii. 191.
- Lothra, St. Ruadan, abbot of, ii. 9, 233. Burned by the Northmen, iii. 271.
- Lough-Dearg, monastery of, i. 425.
- Lough-circ, monastery of founded by St. Barr, ii. 314.
- Lough-ethach, now called Loughneagh, i. 266.
- Lough-Foile, Northmen defeated near, iii. 326.
- Lough-Gara, St. Patrick said to have built a church near, i. 245.
- Lough-Melge, monastery of, iii. 192.
- Lough-Neagh, formerly called Lough-ethach, i. 266.
- Louth, monastery of, i. 308. Moctheus bishop of, 347, 402. The town of, plundered, iii. 271. Burned, iv. 182.
- Lua, a monk, companion of Columbanus, ii. 280, 281.
- Luacharen, scribe of Clonmacnois, death of, iii. 329.
- Luachra, the limit of St. Patrick's progress in West Munster, i. 288.
- Luaighe, said to be father of St. Brendan of Birr, ii. 38, 39.
- Luchern, St. intimate with St. Pulcherius, iii. 25, 28.
- Luchtigherna, St. abbot of Inistymon, visits St. Ita, ii. 88.
- Ludeus, St. of the 2d class of Irish saints, ii. 13. The name supposed to be the same as Lugdeus or Lugad, 211, 212.
- Lugad, St. of Lismore, in the Hebrides, ii. 212, 213.
- Lugadius, St. abbot of Drumshallon, i. 441.
- Lugadius, bishop of Connor, death of, i. 494. See ii. 48, 65.
- Lugadius, monarch of Ireland, not a Christian, i. 234.
- Lugadius, prince of Iniscarra, opposes St. Senan, ii. 2.
- Lugaid, or Lugdach, monarch of Ireland, succeeds Alild Molt on the throne, i. 418. Killed by thunder, ib. Time of his death, 434.
- Lugaid Laithir, said by Harris to be the founder of the church of Rachlin, or Rechrin, ii. 155, 140.
- Lugeus, St. of the 2d class of Irish saints, ii. 13. Called Molua, 205. A disciple of St. Comgall of Bangor, ib. Finds several monasteries in Hy-Figinte, 206. Erects the monastery of Clonfert Molua, 206, 212. Visits St. Dagan, 207. Death of, ib.
- Lugidus, a bishop, said to have ordained St. Coemgen, a priest, ii. 44. Might have been Lugadius, bishop of Connor, 48, 65. Ordains St. Comgall priest, 62.

- Lugneus Mocumin, a disciple of St. Columba, ii. 162.
 Luman, St. said to have been a bishop in the time of St. Patrick, i. 261. First bishop of Trim, 416.
 Lupita, St. said to have been foundress of Drumcheo, i. 405.
 Lurec, St. mentioned by Colgan, ii. 192.
 Luroch, St. the church of Maghera dedicated to, ii. 191. See of Ardstraw supposed to be called Rathlure after him, 192.
 Lusk, St. Mac-Culindus said to have been bishop of, i. 338. Monastery of ravaged and destroyed by the Scandinavians, iii. 270. Part of the endowments of the see of Dublin, iv. 240. See of, 345.
 Lusmag, establishment of, erected by St. Cronan, iii. 7.
 Luthra, monastery of, ii. 440.
 Luxeu, monastery of, ii. 265, 267, monks of, send a deputation to St. Gallus to request of him to undertake the government of that monastery, 437.
 Luxeuil, monastery of, ii. 146.

M.

- Macarius, the Irish philosopher, iii. 320, 321.
 Macarius, superior of the Irish monastery of Wurtzburg, iv. 154.
 Mac Baithin, abbot of Hy, killed, iii. 486.
 Mac Brady, Andrew, bishop of Triburnia, ii. 11.
 Maccaldus, bishop of Man i. 302, 303, 386.
 Maccallan, St. an Irishman. See Maccallin.
 Macalleus, St. friend of St. Brigid, 410. Death of, 418.
 Maccallin, Maccallan, Malcallan or Malcallin, St. an Irishman in France, iii. 396, 398. A man of superior goodness, 400. Appointed superior of the church of St. Michael, near Peronne, 401. Becomes a monk at Gorzia, ib. Goes to the monastery of Walciodorus and made abbot there, ib.
 Maccarthen, baptized by St. Patrick, i. 256. Different from St. Maccartin or Maccarthen of Clogher, 257.
 Maccarthen or Maccartin St. i. 262, 264. No second Maccarthen a bishop, ib. Fable respecting him, 429. Death of, 434.
 Mac Carthy, Cormac prince of Desmond, iv. 73, 75. Murdered, 106. Not a bishop, 108.
 Mac Carthy, Dermod king of Desmond, defeated by Raymond le Grose, iv. 224.
 Mac Carthy, Donald, king of Desmond, iv. 326.
 Mac Corb, said to have been master to St. Finbar, ii. 314.
 Mac Culindus, St. bishop of Lusk, ii. 338.
 Macdall, abbot of Leath-more, iii. 191.

- Mac Dermot, Cornelius, prince of Moylurg, died in religious orders in the abbey of Boyle, iv. 333.
- Maccleus, the same as Maccaleus, i. 335.
- Mac-Erca, placed over the Church of Kilroe, i. 256, 257.
- Mac-Giolla-Patrick, compelled to give hostages, iii, 391.
- Macha, afterwards Armagh, i. 308.
- Machaire-Connacht, i. 243.
- Mac-hua Daimene, i. 398.
- Mac-Hualaing, St. Rioch so called, ii. 12.
- Mac-Kellach, bishop of Emly, ii. 381.
- Mac-Laisre, archbishop of Armagh, ii. 303. Death of, 347.
- Mac Lochlin, Domnald King of Ulster, iv. 10, 11, 17.
- Mac Loingsy, said by Archdall to have been abbot of Moville, i. 265.
- Maclvius or Macluit, bishop of Alectum, ii. 33. A disciple of St. Brendan, 34.
- Mac Morogh, Dermot king of Leinster, iv. 22. seq. See Dermot Mac Morogh.
- Macnise bishop of Connor, i. 432. ii. 308.
- Mactalius, bishop of Kilcullin, i. 337, 377. Death of, ii. 70, 73.
- Mactalius, dynast of Hy-figinte, ii. 3.
- Madelgar, St. ii. 490, 492. Erects the monastery of Soignes, 491. Death of, ib.
- Maelbrigid, abbot of Derry and Raphoe, iii. 339, 341. Death of, 340.
- Maelbrigid, St. archbishop of Armagh, iii. 341, 369.
- Maelbrigid, bishop of Munster, i. 285.
- Maelbrigid, comorban of St. Macnise, iii. 370.
- Maelbrigid, successor to Eugene bishop of Emly, iii. 339, 340.
- Maelbrigid Hua Rimid, abbot of Hy, iii. 411.
- Maelcoba, archbishop of Armagh, i. 74.
- Maelfinan, bishop of Kildare, iii. 281.
- Maelgwn, or Maglocun, prince of Wales, i. 470,
- Maeliosa, said to have been archbishop of Armagh, iii. 449.
- Maelmur, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 410, 413. Comes to Louth to receive the body of Brian Boromhe, 425.
- Maelmurry, assisted by the Danes compels the king of Leinster to resign his crown, iii. 417. Plunders Kildare, ib. Ravages great part of Meath. 418.
- Maelseachlain. See Melseachlain.
- Maelseaghlainn, king of Meath, story of his appearing to St. Cairpre, iii. 331.
- Maeltul, death of, iii. 368.
- Magurnuidhe, near New Ross, i. 466.
- Magbille. See Maghbile.
- Magh-ai, in Roscommon, i. 429.
- Magharnoidhe, establishment of, iii. 14, 21.
- Maghbile, or Moville, anciently called Domnagh-bile, i. 264. Two places of that name, 265. The churches of both said to - have been founded by St. Finnian, ib. Ailill of, 440. Called Movill, 442. Where situated, ib. St. Finnian buried in, ii. 26. Monastery of burned by the Scandinavians, iii. 270.

- Magh-Breagh, devastated by the Saxons, iii. 94, 348.
- Magh-choba, battle of, iv. 11.
- Maghclair, a tract near Dungannon, i. 269.
- Magh-damhorna in Dalaradia, i. 268.
- Magh-co, monastery of erected by Colman, iii. 79.
- Maghera, the see of Ardstraw transferred to, ii. 190, 191.
- Magh-Femin, visited by St. Erc, bishop of Slane, i. 389.
- Magh-Girgin, a tract in Scotland, i. 44.
- Magh-inish, or Lecale, i. 302.
- Maghithe, district of, i. 262.
- Magh-lacha, residence of Ercan, i. 445.
- Magh-leana*, battle of, iii. 351.
- Maghlene, synod of, ii. 392, 397.
- Maghliffe, in the now county Kildare, i. 273.
- Magh-nai, i. 243.
- Magh-seola, near Elphin, i. 245, 247. Synod of, ib.
- Magh-slecht, in county Leitrim, i. 229, 239.
- Magi, contest between the, and St. Patrick, i. 224, 227. They conspire against St. Patrick, 253. They endeavour to hinder St. Columbkil from preaching, ii. 154.
- Magilmunen, an Irishman, leaves Ireland, iii. 344, 346.
- Magin in Tirawley, i. 255.
- Maginis, or Lecale, i. 217, 219.
- Maginish, i. 216.
- Maglocun, prince of North Wales, i. 470, 473.
- Maguil. See Maccaldus, bishop of Man, i. 386.
- Magna, establishment at, by St. Finnian, i. 465.
- Magnoald, ii. 432, 433, 435.
- Magnus, king of Norway, the Hebrides and Man, iv. 20, 22.
- Mahon, king of Munster, death of, iii. 391.
- Maidoc, St. of Ferns, educated by St. David, i. 470. Visited by St. Senan, ii. 4. Was of a family of Breffny, 220. Said to have accompanied St. Barr to Britain, 314. Given as a hostage to the monarch Anmireus, 333, 336. Goes to the monastery of Menevia, 334. Founds the monastery of Desert Nairbre, ii. 337. Death of, 339.
- Maildulf, or Mailduf, an Irishman, iii. 97, 100. Forms the establishment of Malmesbury, 98.
- Mailros, monastery of, iii. 88, 93.
- Maimbodus, an Irishman, called Martyr, iii. 361. Body removed to Monbelliard, ib. Sets out on a pilgrimage, 362, 363. Arrives in Burgundy, and killed by robbers, ib.
- Maine, son of Hurgusa, bishop and abbot of Emly, iii. 227. Death of, 322.
- Mainech Mac Siedul, abbot of Bangor, iii. 368.

- Mainus, an abbot, said to have lived and died in Brittany, ii. 37.
- Malachy, or Maolmaadhog, St. archbishop of Armagh, several particulars of the life of, iv. 59, to 133. Miracles wrought by touching his body, 135.
- Malcallan, or Malcallin. See Maccallin.
- Malchus, bishop of Lismore, iv. 73, 74, 75, 98.
- Malcovus, monarch of Ireland, killed in battle, ii. 301, 302.
- Maldogar, bishop of Ferns, death of, iii. 128, 130.
- Malduin Mac Kennfalaid, bishop of Raphoe, iii. 370.
- Malguil, disciple of St. Fursey, ii. 462, 464.
- Malsbury, ancient name of, iii. 98. Monastery of, founded by Maildulf, ib.
- Man, Isle of, Conindrus and Romulus bishops of, i. 303. St. Mac-caldus bishop of, 303, 305. St. Patrick, said to be the apostle of, 305. Names of, 305, 307.
- Manchan, St. of Menodrochit, death of, iii. 29, 31.
- Manchan, St. abbot of Mohill, iii. 30, 31.
- Manchan the wise, supposed to be the same as Manchan or Munchin, said to be the first bishop of Limerick, iii. 30, 32.
- Manchen, St. abbot of Tuaim-greine, death of, iii. 176.
- Manchen, bishop of Leighlin, death of, iii. 163, 323.
- Manchen, surnamed the Master, i. 253, 254.
- Maneus, a bishop, baptized by St. Patrick, i. 256.
- Mann, a name of the sun among the Pagan Irish, i. 228.
- Mansuenus, master of Endeus of Arran, i. 438.
- Mansuetus, St. bishop of the Armorican Britons, i. 3, 4.
- Maoin-Colum-kille, ii. 139.
- Maoldubhorchon, bishop of Kildare, iii. 153.
- Maol-Finian, son of Flanagan king of Meath, expels the Danes from Dublin, iii. 347. Becomes a monk and abbot of Inis-Patrick, ib. Dies there, 348.
- Maolmaadhog O'Morgair. See Malachy, St. iv. 59, seq.
- Maolpatrick, abbot of Armagh, iii. 369.
- Marian O'Crinan, bishop of Swords, iii. 430.
- Mark, an Irish bishop, stops at the monastery of St. Gall, iii. 285, 286.
- Marianus, founder of the monastery of St. Peter at Ratisbon, different from Marianus Scotus, iv. 2, 5.
- Marianus Scotus, an Irishman, his account of St. Annichad or Anmchad, iii. 443; and of Aidus barbosus, 445. Retires from the world into the monastery of Clonard, 446. Goes to the monastery of Fulda, ib. Visits the tomb of Paternus, ib. Ordained priest at Wurtzburg, ib. His death, iv. 5, 7, 8.
- Marriage, decrees respecting, iv. 205, 206, 211, 212, 215.
- Marriage, of monks, iv. 365. Of nuns, 382.
- Marriage forbidden between brothers and sisters-in-law, iv. 377.
- Marriage and married people to be respected, iv. 387, 388.
- Marriages of the Irish, iv. 20, 63, 69, 70, 71, 72, 86, 88, 283.

- Marriages within certain degrees of kindred forbidden, iv. 377.
- Married priests, iv. 365.
- Martin, St. of Tours, related to St. Patrick, i. 124. His college or monastery near Tours, 155, 156, 157.
- Martin, St. monastery of at Cologne, made over to the Irish, iii. 406.
- Martin, scribe of Clonmacnois, death of, iii. 329.
- Martin, scribe of Devenish, death of, iii. 329.
- Martyrologium Tam lactense*, iii. 233.
- Martyrs Irish, iv. 287, 288.
- Mary, St. Dublin, abbey of, iii. 377, 380. iv. 138.
- Mary, St. de Hoggis, nunnery of, iv. 185, 187.
- Mass not to be celebrated on wooden tables, iv. 269.
- Mass of St. Columbanus and St. Columbkil, iv. 371, 373, 374.
- Matrimonial continence, iv. 387.
- Matrimonial contract, or marriages new modelled, iv. 63, 64.
- Mauctanes, St. or St. Mochtheus, bishop of Louth, prophecy of, concerning St. Columb, i. 263; ii. 111.
- Maugina, St. Virgin, of Clogher, ii. 175, 234, 236.
- Maur, or De fonte vivo, monastery of founded, ii. 248, 250.
- Mayo, monastery of, founded for the English, iii. 166, 168, 169. Church of burned by Turgesius, 272.
- Meath, ravaged by Ivar and Amlave, iii. 326. Falls into the hands of Cuan O'Lochain and Corcran, 426. Parishes of divided between Clonard and Clonmacnois, iv. 37. Two episcopal sees only established in, 42. Devastated by Roderic O'Connor, 225. The several sees of, 322. United into one diocese; 323. The title of bishop of, assumed by Eugene bishop of Clonard, 322.
- Meetings at Magh-femyn held to regulate the ecclesiastical concerns of the South of Ireland, i. 395.
- Mel, or Melus, St. a Briton, i. 335. Bishop of Ardagh, ib. and 240. Monastery of, 402. Death of, 418.
- Melari*, surnamed Nonnita, mother of St. David, i. 471.
- Melda, mother of St. Kenny, ii. 200.
- Meldan, St. abbot of Inisquin, ii. 450.
- Mella, or Milla, St. mother of Cannech, priest, and Tighernach, abbot, iii. 192, 194.
- Mellain, father of St. Mochua, ii. 357, 360.
- Mellifont, monastery of founded, iv. 117. 119. Consecration of the church of, 165.
- Melseachlain I. monarch of Ireland, succeeds Niall Caille on the throne, iii. 241. Defeats, takes prisoner, and drowns Turgesius the Danish chief, 277. Sends ambassadors to Charles the Bald, king of France, ib. Makes peace with the Northmen, and is assisted by them against his enemies, ib. War between him and the Danes, 326. Defeats the Danes of Dublin, ib. Time of his death, 242.

- Melseachlain, II. succeeds Donald O'Neill as monarch of Ireland, iii. 366. Defeats the Danes at Tarah, 415. Plunders Dalgais, ib. Ravages Leinster, ib. Forced to yield the title of king of Leath Mogha to Brian Boraimhe, ib. Ravages Conaught, 416. Defeats Brian Boraimhe, ib. Compelled to resign the crown of Ireland to Brian, 417. Defeated by Maelmurry assisted by the Danes, 418. Assisted by Morogh son of Brian. and takes many prisoners and much spoil, ib. Betrays Brian, 419, 422. Again saluted as king of Ireland, 425. Attacks the Danes of Dublin, and burns the city, ib. Defeats the Danes, commanded by Sitric, 426. Dies in the monastery of Inis-aingin, ib.
- Melteoc, St. revered at Kinsale, ii. 94.
- Menevia, the See of St. David, i. 470.
- Menoc, brother of St. Libba, ii. 364.
- Mentz, monastery of, iii. 114, 115.
- Mernoc, a disciple of St. Barrinthus, ii. 35.
- Milcho, master of St. Patrick, i. 216.
- Milk, fabulous story of the Irish baptizing their children in, iv. 211.
- Milner, doctor, tour of, in Ireland, animadverted on, iv. 36, 99. His mistakes or errors on Irish historical matters, iii. 466, 469, 472, iv. 36, 99, 203, 215.
- Mimborn, an Irishman, abbot of the monastery of St. Martin at Cologn, iii. 406.
- Miracle, one wrought by St. Patrick, i. 150. By St. Columbkil, ii. 155.
- Miracles, attributed to St. Ita, ii. 84. seq. Performed by St. Columbanus, 269. Wrought by St. Maidoc, 337, 339. By St. Pulcherius, iii. 24.
- Mis, the mountain of, i. 216.
- Miscel, bishop of Emly, iii. 339, 361.
- Miserneus, one of St. Patrick's disciples. i. 337.
- Missal, ancient, found at Bobio, iv. 371, 373, 374, 376.
- Mobai, brother of Libba, ii. 364.
- Mobeoc of Gleann-geirg, i. 426.
- Mobhy, St. surnamed Clairineach, ii, 76. School of, 120. Called also Borchan, 223.
- Mochay, St. of Antrim, school of, i. 403. Death of, 418. See Mochoe.
- Mochelloc, St. of Cathuir-mac-Conchaidh, i. 27. iii. 29.
- Mochoe or Mochay, St. of Antrim, i. 217, 346, 348.
- Mochocmog, bishop, son of Cuaith, a disciple of St. Carthagh, ii. 358.
- Mochoemog, son of Vairt, disciple of St. Carthagh, ii. 358.
- Mochonna, St. of Dore Bruchaise, iii. 141. Abbot of Derry, ib.
- Mochua, abbot of Ard-slaine, iii. 151.
- Mochua, alias Cronan, disciple of Carthagh, ii. 357. Set over Cluain-Dachran, ib.

- Mochua Luachra, abbot and bishop of Ferns, iii. 33.
- Mochuda, alias Carthagh junior, ii. 99, 102. See Carthagh of Lismore.
- Mochuemin, St. brother of St. Coemgen, ii. 45.
- Mochuorog, St. a Briton, administers the blessed Sacrament to St. Coemgen, ii. 44. The same as St. Mogoroc of Delgany. 49.
- Mocta, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 339, 341.
- Mocteus or Mochtheus, St. arrives in Ireland, and establishes a monastery at Louth, i. 308. Became a bishop, 347. Monastery of at Louth, 402. The last of St. Patrick's disciples, 494. Death of, ib. Different from Maidoc of Ferns, 496. Received the holy Viaticum from St. Dageaus, ii. 76.
- Mocumin, disciple of St. Columba, succeeds him at Tirdeglass, ii. 71, 74, 76.
- Modan, abbot of Kilmodan, ii. 325.
- Moditeus, St. of the 2d class of Irish Saints, ii. 13. Conjecture respecting him, 212, 214.
- Modwenna, St. an Irish Virgin in England, iii. 41.
- Moedoc, St. bishop of Ferns, iv. 355. See Maidoc, St.
- Moelatgen, abbot of Clonenagh, iii. 245.
- Moelcoba, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 323, 325, 339.
- Moeldar, bishop of Clonmacnois, death of, iii. 329.
- Moeldod, abbot of Monaghan, iii. 272.
- Moelfinnian, bishop of Derry, iii. 370.
- Moelfinnian, Mac Huactain, bishop of Kells, iii. 386, 388.
- Moelimarchan, bishop of Ectrum, death of, iii. 191.
- Moeliosa, archbishop of Armagh, iv. 9.
- Moeliosa O'Brolchain, death of, iii. 487, 489.
- Moelmor, Tuathal king of Ireland, killed by, ii. 21.
- Moelpatrick, scribe of Trevet, death of, iii. 329.
- Moelruan, abbot and bishop of Tallaght, iii. 232, 233.
- Moeltule, bishop of Armagh, iii. 428.
- Moena, bishop of Clonfert, i. 437, ii. 36.
- Moengall, in his return from Rome stops at the monastery of St. Gall, iii. 285. Said to have died there, ib.
- Moengall, bishop of Kildare, iii. 322.
- Mofecta, or Fechean, St. intimate with St. Pulcherius, iii. 25, 28.
- Mogenoch Kille-comly, disciple of St. Finnian of Clonard, ii. 233.
- Mogeroc, St. of Struthuir, i. 425.
- Mommor, battle of, ii. 159.
- Mola, disciple of St. Senan, ii. 91, 95.
- Molaga, St. iii. 83. Erects the monastery of Tulachmin, 83. Death of, ib.
- Molaisse, St. or Molassius, founder of Devenish, i. 446. Said to have been bishop of Clogher, ii. 183. See Laisrean, St.
- Moling, St. bishop of Ferns, iii. 132, 133. Finds a monastery at Aghacainid. ib.

- Molua. See Lugeus.
- Molua, St. of Clonfert-Molua, visits St. Evin, ii. 311. Confessor to Maidoc of Ferns, 338. Disciple of Carthagh, 358. Requests the blessed Sacrament from Cronan, iii. 7. Intimate with St. Pulcherius, 25.
- Mombulus, disciple of St. Fursej, ii. 462, 464.
- Monaghan, monastery of despoiled by the Scandinavians, iii. 270.
- Monanincha, iv. 291, 293.
- Monaster-evan, Cistercian monastery of, founded, iv. 237, 239.
- Monasteria Scottorum*, the Irish monasteries in the continent so called, iv. 158.
- Monasteries, several mentioned, i. 402. Burned by the Northmen, iii. 271. Several attributed to St. Abban, iii. 18. Several of the ancient destroyed, iv. 345. Modern erected, 346. Many ancient still continued, ib.
- Monastery or school of St. Fiech, i. 402.
- Monenna, St. foundress of the nunnery of Fochard Brighde, iii. 38, 39.
- Monennus, St. abbot of Rosnat in Britain, i. 434.
- Monks, some of the greatest bishops of the order of, iv. 289. Obligations and duties of, 349. Lived by their own labour, 354, 355, 356. Spent some time in transcribing books, ib. Marriage of, condemned, 365.
- Mono, St. goes from Ireland to Ardvenna, iii. 195, 197. Erects the church of Naisonia, ib.
- Monsterboice, St. Boetius, bishop of, i. 461.
- Morini, the territory of, comprized under the name of Armoric Gaul, i. 97. The country of St. Patrick, 120.
- Morogh, son of Brian Boromhe, marches against the Danes, iii. 418. Killed at Clontarf, 422, 424. Buried at Armagh, 425.
- Mosacra, St. founder of Tegh-Sacra, iii. 140. Death of, 141.
- Mount Bladhma, ii. 206.
- Mount Eagle, i. 248.
- Mount Luachra, ii. 206.
- Movill or Maghbile, of Donegal, confounded with that of Down, i. 264. Ailill of, 440. 441.
- Moy, river, i. 256.
- Moy-Slecht, i. 239.
- Moylurg, i. 463.
- Muadhnat, sister of St. Molaisse of Devenish, ii. 327.
- Muckin, St. i. 255.
- Muckamore, monastery of, ii. 304, 307.
- Muckmore, i. 431, 433.
- Mucna, a bishop, i. 253, 255.
- Mugdorna, Mugdorne, or Mogdurna, the territory of, i. 266, 270.
- Mugron, abbot of Hy, iii. 386, 388.
- Muicinis, set on fire, iii. 374.
- Muindecha, mother of Eugene of Ardstrath, ii. 191.

- Muine Brechain*, the Danes defeated at, iii. 377.
- Muiredeach, king of Hy-Kinsellagh, goes to visit St. Finnian, i. 465. Death of, 494.
- Mula or Muli, birth place of Nennidh, i. 451.
- Mullach (in Co. Cavan) i. 453.
- Mulloy, O'. See O'Mulloy.
- Munchin, or Manchan, St. ii. 93.
- Munech and Meachair, converted by St. Patrick, i. 289.
- Munenia, baptized by St. Patrick, i. 182.
- Mungret, Nesson of, a scholar of St. Ailbe, i. 462. Monastery of, very eminent ii. 103. Burnt by the Danes, iii. 374.
- Munis, a Briton, bishop of Forgney in Longford, ii. 419. Supposed to be brother of St. Mel, ib.
- Munster, plundered by the Danes of Dublin, iii. 327. Army of plunder the islands of Lough-ree and reduce Leath-Cuinn, 351. Visitation of, by St. Malachy, iv. 101, 102.
- Mura St. abbot of Fathen-Mura, iii. 37, 322.
- Murchertach Mac Erca, king of Ireland, i. 434. killed, 494.
- Muredach, a bishop, i. 253.
- Muredach, father of Murchertach, king of Ireland, i. 435.
- Muredach, bishop of Killala, ii. 183. Death of, 184.
- Muredach, bishop of Mayo, death of, iii. 166.
- Muredach, abbot of Kildare, death of, iii. 255, 203.
- Muredach, St. prior of Hy, iii. 234.
- Muredach, son of Bran king of Leinster, abbot of Kildare, death of, iii. 329, 330.
- Murena, abbess of Kildare, iii. 371, 373.
- Murgal, of Clonmacnois, death of, iii. 202.
- Murgeis, bishop, ii. 342.
- Murgenius, abbot of Gleannussen, ii. 345.
- Muricherdac, or Murcherat, an Irish recluse near Ratisbon, iv. 2, 4.
- Murin, said to have been master of St. Laserian, ii. 403.
- Murtogh O'Brien, king of Munster, becomes master of Dublin, iii. 484. Assumes the title of king of Ireland, ib. Dethroned 485. Dies, ib.
- Murtogh, son of Niall Glundubh, killed, iii. 374, 375.
- Murgeus, St. of the 3d class of Irish saints, ii. 331.
- Murus, St. abbot, ii. 39.
- Muscrighe Breogain, i. 287.
- Muscrith Thire (Lower Ormond) i. 289.
- Music, used in the Irish church, iv. 65.

N.

- Nad-sluagh, a dynast near Coleraine, ii. 77.
- Naal, Natalis or Naol St. abbot, son of Aengus, king of Cashel,

- i. 282, 401, 444. Supposed the same as Naal of Inver Naal, ib. Revered at Kilmanagh, ib. Thought by Colgan to be the same as St. Naal, abbot of Killnaile in Breffny, 466. Monastery of, ii. 2. Said to be successor to St. Laisrean, 219.
- Naas, visited by St. Patrick, i. 272. Castle of, 276.
- Nanned, seemingly the same as Nonnidh, i. 453.
- Naol St. See Naal, St.
- Natalis. See Naal, St.
- Natfraoich, king of Cashel, i. 280.
- Natfraoich, spiritual companion of St. Brigid, i. 410, 412, 452.
- Natfraoich, father of St. Laisrean, ii. 218.
- Nathan, Nathi, or Nathy, St. of Achonry, i. 345. ii. 190. iii. 39, 43.
- Nathi Hua-Garrchon, opposes St. Patrick, i. 208.
- Nathi, Nathy. See Nathan.
- Necta, mother of St. Ita, ii. 81.
- Nectan, king of the Picts, expels from his kingdom some of the monks of the order of Hy, iii. 158.
- Neddrum, monastery of, i. 423. Priory of, founded, iv. 253, 255.
- Neman, St. abbot of Dairinis, near Wexford, i. 311.
- Neman, St. abbot of Lismore, ii. 356.
- Nemnald, father of Berach, ii. 323.
- Nemthur, or Empthor, fabulous account of, i. 90. The same as Nemhthur, Nevthur, Nepthur and Nephthur, 101.
- Nenagh, priory of, founded, iv. 335.
- Nennidh, St. surnamed Lamhdearg, a disciple of St. Finnian of Clonard, ii. 233.
- Nennidh, St. surnamed, Lamhghlan, i. 450. A student at Kildare, 451. Confounded with St. Nennidh, surnamed Laobh-dearc, ib. Acts of, according to Colgan, 452. Said to be a disciple of St. Patrick, ib. A disciple of St. Fiech, 453. The same as St. Nennidh, Laimh-iodan, 454.
- Nennidh, St. surnamed Laimh-iodan. See St. Nennidh Lamhghlan.
- Nennidh, St. surnamed Laobh-dearc, abbot and bishop of Inismhuigh-Samh, i. 451.
- Nennidius Lamh-glan, St. different from St. Nennidus Laobh-dearc, ii. 55.
- Nennidius Laobh-dearc, St. monastery of, ii. 51.
- Nennio, abbot of the great monastery in Britain, i. 347. St. Finnian of Maghbile at the school of, ii. 25.
- Neptria, or Nepricum, the same as Neustria in Gaul, i. 101.
- Nessan, St. placed by St. Patrick over the monastery of Mungret, i. 288. Instructed by St. Ailbe, 462. Of the second class of Irish saints, ii. 13. Probably founder of Mungret, 103, 104. Held theological conversations with St. Ailbe, ib. Death of, ib.

- Nessan, St. disciple of St. Barr of Cork, ii. 315, 317. The church of, at Cork, iv. 277.
- Neustria, the great province of, in Gaul, i. 101.
- Nevet, in Brittany, St. Ronan retires to the forest of, i. 492.
- Newry, Cistercian monastery of founded, iv. 168, 170.
- Newtown, near Trim, iv. 322.
- Niell or Nigellus, usurper of the see of Armagh, carries off the staff of Jesus, &c. from Armagh, i. 176. Usurps the archbishoprick, iv. 44. Expelled, 95. Death of, 106.
- Niell Cailne, king of Ireland, drowned, iii. 241, 243.
- Niell Frassach, monarch of Ireland, retires to Hy, and becomes a monk, iii. 176.
- Niell Glundubh, king of Ireland, killed, iii. 366.
- Niell Naoigiallach, or Niell of the nine hostages, death of, i. 138, 139.
- Noendrumensis, Caylanus, or Coelanus, abbas*, i. 423.
- Northern Picts, converted by St. Columcille, i. 70.
- Northmen (Danes or Norwegians) arrive in the Boyne and Liffey and plunder the country, iii. 271. Burn Cork, Ferns and Clonfert, and commit other horrible depredations, ib. Set fire to Armagh and burn the cathedral, ib. Plunder several monasteries, ib. Destroy libraries, carry off sacred vessels, and put many learned and holy men to death, 272. Lay waste Emly, 275. Enter and lay waste Armagh, 277. Driven out of the country, ib. Return again with a powerful fleet, ib. and 280. Make peace with Maelseachlain, king of Ireland, and assist him against his enemies, 277. Defeated near Lough Foyle, 326. Submit to Auliffe, prince of the Norwegians, ib. Plunder Kildare, 346. Defeated by the Irish, 347, 348. Defeated by Ceallachan Cashel, 374. Prepare to attack Brian, 419.
- North Munster, the kingdom of granted by Henry II. to Philip de Breuse, iv. 236.
- Northumbrians, converted by Aidan and his auxiliaries, ii. 417.
- Norwegians invade Ireland, iii. 241, 243.
- Notker Balbulus, monk of St. Gall, instructed by Moengall, an Irishman, iii. 285.
- Nuad, abbot of Clones, death of, iii. 191.
- Nuad of Loch-uama, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 252, 253.
- Nuad, son of Segen, martyred by the Danes, iii. 272.
- Nunnery of Armagh, i. 450.
- Nuns, marriage of, iv. 382.

O.

Oaths, certain, void, iv. 386, 387.

- O'Boigill or O'Boil, Coencomhrach, consecrated suffragan or acting bishop for the see of Armagh, iv. 9. Death of, 31.
- O'Brien, Conor, supplies the Irish monks with money to build the monastery of St. James at Ratisbon, iv. 57, 58.
- O'Brien, Cormac, war between him and Turloch O'Conor, king of Conaght, iv. 50.
- O'Brien, Dermot, king of Munster war between him and Turloch O'Conor king of Conaght, iv. 50.
- O'Brien, Donogh Carbrach, king of North Munster, iv. 325.
- O'Brien, Donald, king of North Munster, religious establishments founded by him, iv. 325. Death of, ib.
- O'Brien, Murtoogh, king of Munster, iv. 10, 11. Makes over Cashel to God and St. Patrick, 20. His death and burial, 21.
- O'Brin, or O'Byrne, Malachy, bishop of Kildare, fabulous story of him and others perjuring themselves, iv. 231.
- O'Brolchan, Mael-Colm, suffragan or assistant bishop of Armagh, death of, iv. 48, 49.
- Observatory, the Irish round towers used as such, iv. 407.
- O'Byrnes, family of, iv. 172. See O'Brin.
- Ocha, battle of, i. 438.
- O'Conarchy, Christian, death of, iv. 277.
- O'Conor, Cathal Carrach, iv. 333.
- O'Conor, Cathal Crobhdherg, iv. 319, 326, 333.
- O'Conor, Conor Moenmoige expels his father from Conaght, iv. 277. Killed by his own people, 318.
- O'Conor, Roderic, deposes Dermot Mac Murchard king of Leinster, iv. 184. Acknowledged king of all Ireland, 188. Besieges Dublin, 198. Obligated to raise the siege, 199. Submits to Henry II. 202. Dissensions between him and his son Conor Moenmoige, 235. Gives up his kingdom to Conor, 255. Driven out of Conaght by Conor, 277. Resumes the government of Conaght, 318. The last monarch of Ireland, 333. Death of, ib.
- O'Conor, Turloch, king of Conaght, lays waste Thomond and burns Cashel, iv. 50, 51. Ravages Leinster and Meath, ib. Confines and dethrones Murrogh O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, 118.
- Odder. See Odra.
- Odorney, monastery of, iv. 168.
- Odra, or Odder, nunnery of St. Brigid, the possession of confirmed by the pope, iv. 327.
- Odran, St. the charioteer of St. Patrick, i. 332, 304. Killed by Failge, in mistake for St. Patrick, ib.
- Odran, St. abbot of Lettrach-Odran, death of, ii. 70.
- Odran, successor of St. Senan at Iniscatthy, ii. 91.
- O'Dunn, Giolla-na-Naomh, death of, iv. 169.
- Oedlugh, abbot of Clonmacnois, ii. 59.
- Oena, successor to Kieran of Clonmacnois, ii. 60.

- O'Faolans and O'Ryans massacred in cold blood by the English, iv. 193.
- Offices, old Irish, iv. 368.
- Offices, the Roman substituted for the Irish, iv. 63.
- O'Gorman, Marian, iv. 251, 252.
- O'Haingly, Donat, bishop of Dublin, death of, iv. 12.
- O'Haingly, Samuel, succeeds his uncle Donat as bishop of Dublin, iv. 12, 14.
- O'Heney, Matthew, Apostolic legate, holds a synod at Dublin, iv. 319, 321.
- O'Heyne, Matthew abbot of Cashel, death of, iv. 313.
- Olave. See Auliff.
- Olcan, of Kilmore, or Kilmormoy, i. 256.
- Olcan, bishop of Derkan, different from Olcan of Kilmore, i. 256. Baptized by St. Patrick, 265. School of, at Derkan, 403.
- Olcanus, bishop, goes to Gaul, i. 341. Bishop of Derkan, ib. Called by some Bolcan, ib. See Olcan.
- Olchobair Mac Kinede, abbot and bishop of Emly, iii. 275. Defeats the Danes, ib.
- Olild and his family converted and baptized, i. 287.
- Olioll Mac Eagan, abbot of Cork, slain at the battle of Beallach Mughna, iii. 354, 356.
- O'Loghlin, Muirchertach, prince of Tyrone, iv. 136.
- O'Maley's territory, i. 245.
- O'Meey, Hugh de Lacy killed by, iv. 277.
- O'Melaghlin, Morogh, king of Meath, iv. 118.
- O'Morda, Peter, first abbot of Boyle, drowned, iv. 218.
- O'More, Cnogher, founder of the monastery of Leix, iv. 262.
- O'Mulloy, Albin, abbot of Baltinglass, iv. 264. Preaches against the incontinence of the English and Welsh clergy, 265. Raised to the see of Ferns, 277.
- O'Neills of Clandeboys, the ancestor of, iv. 334.
- Opacus, church of, erected, iii. 281.
- Oran, in Roscommon, i. 244, 335.
- Orbila, alias Servila, appointed abbess of Fochard, by St. Monenna, iii. 38.
- Orders, Holy, on whom and where to be conferred, iv. 271, 274.
- Orgiel, or Oriel, i. 398.
- Orthanoë, bishop of Kildare, death of, iii. 274.
- O'Ruarc, Dearbhforguill, or Dervorgall, wife of Tiernan, carried off by Dermot Mac Murchard, iv. 184.
- O'Ruarc, Tiernan, murdered, iv. 223.
- Ositha, disciple of Modwenna, iii. 40, 41, 43.
- Osnate, St. sister of Molaisse of Devenish, ii. 327.
- Ossan, St. death of, iii. 129.
- Ossan, a priest, iii. 177.
- Ossory, see of, at Aghabo, iv. 237, 239.
- Ostmen get possession of Armagh, i. 74. Not Christians until

- about, A. D. 1000, i. 75. Pagan and Christian, iv. 398. Not the erectors of the round towers, 403.
- Oswa, opens the debate at Whitby, iii. 62. Places Ceadda over the see of York, 78.
- Oswald, king of Northumberland, ii. 416, 417.
- Othmar, first abbot of St. Gall in Switzerland, ii. 434, 438.
- O'Toole, St. Laurence, account of, from, iv. 172 to 181. Attempted to be killed at the altar, 228.
- O'Tooles, the family of, iv. 172.
- Otto, by mistake called bishop of Bamberg, iv. 3.
- Owen, son of Brian, converted by St. Patrick, i. 266.

P.

- Palladius, sent to the Scots believing in Christ, i. 9. First bishop sent from Rome to Ireland, 23, 36, 37. Sets out for Ireland, attended by Sylvester, Lolonius, Augustin, Benedict and others, 38. Brings with him some reliques of Saints Peter and Paul, and other saints, ib. Erected three churches in Ireland, ib. Inquiry concerning him, 40 to 46. Leaves Ireland, and arrives in Britain, where he dies, 39. Death of, 198, 202.
- Pallium, St. Malachy anxious to procure one for Armagh, iv. 109, 110, 112, 113, 129.
- Palliums, four sent to Ireland by Pope Eugene III. iv. 139. Distributed at the synod of Kells, 146. Given to the sees of Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam, 146, 147.
- Palmer, Alured le, founder of the priory of St. John Baptist, Dublin, iv. 317.
- Pantaloons worn by the Irish, iv. 360, 364.
- Paparo, Cardinal, lands in England on his way to Ireland with palliums, and refused a passport by king Stephen, iv. 139. Returns to Rome and sets out again, taking the rout of Scotland, ib. Lands in Ireland, ib.
- Paschal calculation, discussion concerning the, ii. 371. Different modes of observing the, 371, 372. Different rules concerning it, 376. The Roman and Alexandrian disputes about the, ib. British method of observing the, 378. Question concerning the, answered by the Roman prelates, 407. Controversy concerning the, at Leighcuinn, 409. Question concerning the, revived, 424. Conference and debate at Whitby concerning the, iii. 62, seq.
- Paschal epistle, written by Cummian, ii. 395, 399.
- Paschal fire, lit by St. Patrick at Slane, i. 224.
- Paternus, St. son to Petranus, visits Ireland, i. 492.
- Paternus, a Scot, a monk at Paderborn, iii. 445. Burnt to death, ib.
- Patrick, St. his existence demonstrated, i. 47. Comes to Ireland, ib. His existence denied by Ledwich and others 48.

Asserted by Usher, Camden and others, ib. His confession and letter to Coroticus, 51. His canons, 54. Mentioned in litanies for the Anglican church, 59. Hymn in praise of him in the Antiphonarium Benchorensis, ib. Mentioned in an ancient liturgy quoted by Usher, 62; and in Bede's Martyrology, 63; and in that of St. Jerome, 65; several churches dedicated to him, 67. Inquiry into the place of his nativity, 80. His life by Probus, 81. His lives published by Colgan, 84. The original tripartite life of, mostly written in Irish, 87. His life by Jocelin, 88. Born in Armoric Gaul, 89. His parentage, 92, 122. Governed the diocese of Boulogne, 96. Made captive in Armoric Britain, 98. His family of the privileged class of citizens, 122. Forfeited his nobility, 123. His mother and sisters, 125, 127. The year of his birth, 129. The year of his death, 131. Error in Butler's life of him, 148. Said to have been taken captive by Niell Naoigiallach, 137. Purchased by Milcho, and employed in tending sheep, 142. Sails for France, 145. Lands at Treguier in Brittany, 150. By his prayers delivers himself and companions from famine, ib. Made captive again, 155. Enters the monastery of Tours under St. Martin, 155, 157. Studies under St. German, 161. His rod, brought from Armagh to Dublin, 176. Said to have received it from Justus, ib. Accompanies St. German and Lupus of Troyes to Great Britain, 180. Said to have been a canon regular of St. John Lateran, 184, 186. Returns to Auxerre with St. German, 184. Goes to Rome, ib. Receives the Pope's benediction, and is empowered to proceed to Ireland, 191. Appointed assistant to Palladius, 192. Did not set out with Palladius, ib. Reason why he did not go to Ireland with Palladius, ib. Reason why he was not consecrated sooner than he was, 194. Informed of the death of Palladius, 198. Consecrated bishop, ib. Embarks for Ireland, 205. Arrives in Ireland, 207. Supposed to have landed in the county of Wicklow, ib. Repulsed by the natives, and obliged to embark again, ib. Opposed by Nathi Hua Garchon, 208. His first converts, ib. Proceeds to a port in the barony of Lecale, 212. Goes to the house of Milcho, 216. Preaches at Maginish, ib. Gives the Latin alphabet to his converts, 220. Arrives in the harbour of Colp. ib. Arrives at Slane, and celebrates the festival of Easter, 223. Lights the Paschal fire at Slane, 224. Preaches before the king at Tara, ib. Saluted by Herc. ib. Goes to Tailten, 233. His baptizm, ib. and 236. Church of Drumconrath and other churches erected by him in barony of Slane, 237. Sets out for Conaught, 240. Converts two of the daughters of king Leogaire, 241. Baptizes St. Kieran of Clanmacnois, 244. Goes to Magh-Seola, ib. Retires to Cruachan-aichle to spend the time of the Quadragesimal fast, 249. Converts seven princes and 12,000 other persons, 252.

Attempt against his life, 253. Converts Eochad, son of Dathy, 254. His books, ib. Enters Hy-Fiachra, and converts many, 256. Goes to Calrigia, ib. Baptizes Mac-carthen, ib. Ends his mission in Conaught, 257. Arrives in Ulster, ib. Erects the church of Rathcunga, 262. Preaches in Tirconell, blesses Conall, and foretels the sanctity of St. Columb, ib. Finds several churches, ib. Leaves Inishowen, and proceeds to Dun-Cruthin, and places St. Beatus over a church there, 265. Builds churches in that neighbourhood, ib. Proceeds through Dalrieda, and baptizes Olcan, afterwards called bishop of Derkan, ib. Goes into Dalradia, ib. Opposed by Carthen, 266. Goes into the tract called Gaura, and converts several, ib. Passes into Hua-meith-tire, and erects a church at Ter-hallan, ib. Goes to Mugdorn, and converts Victor, ib. Proceeds to Meath, and lays the foundation of the church of Domnach-tortan, 271. Arrives at Ardraccan, ib. Proceeds to Leinster, and baptizes two of the sons of king Dunlang at Naas, 272. Proceeds to Hy-Garchon, and is opposed by Driehir, but is entertained by Killin, ib. Goes to Leix, 273; and to the house of Dubtach the poet in Hy-Kinsellagh, ib. Leaves Auxilius bishop at Killosey, and Iserninus at Kilcullin, 273, 276. Goes into Ossory, 274. Crosses Finglas river, and blesses Dublin, 275. Proceeds to Cashel, 279. Spends seven years in Munster, 280. Converts many persons of rank at Cashel, 281. His stone, ib. Oilild and family converted by his prayers, and those of Saint Ailbe and Ibar, 287. Entertained by Lonan, 288. Blesses the country of Thomond, ib. Foretells the birth of St. Brendan, ib. Directs his course to Desmond, ib. Returns to Leinster, 289. Blesses Munster and the people thereof, ib. Writes to Coroticus, 296. Arrives at Brosna, 302. Goes to Hy-failge, ib. Goes from Louth to Macha, 312. Erects the church of Armagh, ib. Goes to Rome for relics, 319. Said to have received the Pallium from the pope, ib. Entrusts Secundinus with the archbishopric of Armagh during his absence at Rome, 321. Holds a Synod, 331. Makes, with the assistance of Auxilius and Isserninus, regulations for the church government, 333. Writes his confession, 349. Attacked by his last illness, 351. Receives the Viaticum from Tassach, and dies at Saul, 352. Discussion concerning the year of his death, 355. Buried at Down, 364. iv. 274. Part of his relics brought to Armagh, 365.

Patrick of Auvergne, i. 76, 352.

Patrick, an Irish abbot, retires to Glastonbury, iii. 321. Said to be the same as Moel-Patrick, ib.

Patrick, bishop of Dublin, iii. 457, 459. Consecrated by Lanfrance, archbishop of Canterbury, 458, 460. Professes obedience to him, ib. Shipwrecked and drowned, 482, 483.

Patrick of Nola, i. 76.

- Patrick, senior, and junior, i. 324, 325.
 Patrick, of Glastonbury, i. 324.
 Patrick, St. books of, i. 254.
 Patrick, St. canons of, iv. 376 to 391.
 Patrick, St. church of built, iv. 318. Made a cathedral, 319.
 Patrick, St. in the island, the church of, iv. 240.
 Patrick, St. Synod of, iv. 376.
 Patrick's day, St. prayer for, i. 368.
 Patrick's stone, i. 281.
 Patrick's Purgatory, i. 368. iv. 290, 291, 292.
 Patto, an Irishman, placed over the monastery of Amarbaric, iii. 219, 220. Said to have been bishop of Verden. ib.
 Paul, St. said to have preached in Britain, i. 1.
 Paul, a disciple of Illutus, i. 492.
 Paul, bishop of St. Pol de Leon, uncle to Iovin, i. 492.
 Paul, an Irish hermit, death of, i. 493.
 Paulinus, school of, at Withland or Whiteland in Caermarthen, i. 475.
 Paulinus, a disciple of Illutus, i. 476.
 Paulinus, St. archbishop of Northumberland, retires to Kent, ii. 421.
 Paulinus, bishop of Leth-Cuinn, and abbot of Indenen, death of, iii. 368.
 Peada, prince of the middle Angles, converted by Finan, ii. 427. Gets priests to convert his subjects, 428.
 Pelagius, the Heresiarch, i. 16.
 Pelagian Heresy, at what time it began in Ireland, ii. 410.
 Peronne, monastery of, ii. 465, 466.
 Pestilence, carries off many eminent persons at Armagh, iii. 411.
 Peter and Benedict, SS. monastery of at Athlone, iv. 138.
 Peter and Paul, SS. church of, at Armagh, iv. 77, 104. Church of at Newtown Trim, 322.
 Peter's St. Limerick, nunnery of, iv. 325.
 Peter's, St. monastery of at Saltzburg, governed by Virgil, iii. 184, 186.
 Peter's pence, iv. 159, 164, 210.
 Petran, a bishop, of 3d class of Irish Saints, ii. 331.
 Petranus, father of Paternus, retires to Ireland, 492.
 Petranus, bishop of Lusk, ii. 333, 334.
 Petrockstow, now Padstow, in Cornwall, called from Petrocus, i. 492.
 Petrocus, a Briton, comes to Ireland, i. 492, preceptor of St. Kevin, ii. 48.
Phalingae, meaning of, iv. 362.
 Picts, the, converted by St. Ninian, i. 70.
 Picts, Irish, i. 216.

- Picts, Northern, converted by St. Columbkil, ii. 154.
 Piran, St. Kieran, known by that name, ii. 8, 9.
 Plou-Kernin, parish of, i. 493.
 Poets of Ireland, ancient, suppression of, prevented by Columbkil, ii. 237, regulations concerning, ib. distinguished from the Magi, 241.
 Poisonous animals, expulsion of, i. 250, 252.
 Portrahern, supposed to be the same as Portrane, iii. 434, 435.
 Potentinus, companion of Columbanus, ii. 280, 281.
 Praying for the dead, practised by the Irish, iii. 331, seqq.
 Predestination, treatise concerning, iii. 293, 294, seqq.
 Prelates, Irish, who attended the third council of Lateran, iv. 238.
 Presbyterianism not the religion of the early church of Scotland, iv. 295, 297.
 Priests, married, iv. 365, not allowed to marry, ib.
 Probus, an Irishman, author of the life of St. Patrick, i. 82. Not Probus the grammarian, ib.
 Probus, master of the school of Slane, burned by the Danes, iii. 371.
 Probus, priest, an Irishman, retires to the monastery of St. Abban of Mentz, iii. 321. Different from Probus the biographer of St. Patrick, ib.
 Psalter of Cashel, written by Cormac Mac Cullinan, iii. 355, 356.
 Pulcherius, St. accompanies St. Colman to the court of Failbe Fland, king of Cashel, ii. 310. Places himself under Saint Comgall of Bangor, iii. 23, 28. Several miracles wrought by, 25.
 Purgatory, opinions of the Irish on, iii. 331.
 Purgatory, St. Patrick's, i. 368. iv. 290, 291, 292.

Q.

- Quadragesimal fast, i. 249.
 Quartadecimans, ii. 257.
Querulous Epistle, by Gildas, the time when written, i. 486.

R.

- Rachan, See of, iii. 122, 125.
 Rachlin, monastery of, ii. 132, 134. Church of, founded by Seogeneus, 347.
 Raithin, monastery of, erected by St. Carthagh of Lismore, ii. 352, 353.
 Rantic, an Irish missionary, said to have been a disciple of St. Columbanus, ii. 443.
 Raphoe, monastery of, ii. 132, 135.

- Ratgan, abbot of Fulda.
 Rathaoth, now Rahue, monastery of, ii. 189.
 Rathbeg, ii. 198.
 Rath-Breasail, synod of, iv. 37, 40, 43.
 Rath-brighide, i. e. Brigids town, i. 389.
 Rathcolpa, i. 346.
 Rathcunga, church of erected, i. 262. Asacus buried at, 341.
 Ratheaspuic-innic, church of, i. 268.
 Rathena, birth place of St. Iarlath, i. 391.
 Rathkeale, priory of, iv. 336, 337.
 Rathlibhthen, monastery of, ii. 10.
 Rathmaighe Deisgirt, the See of, iv. 44.
 Rathmat, monastery of, erected by St. Fursey, ii. 456.
Rath-Megeaonaich, ii. 79.
 Rathmelsigi, monastery of, iii. 95.
 Rathmoane (Rathmodain), church of, i. 267.
 Rathmuigh. See Derkan, i. 341.
 Rathpert of St. Gall, instructed by Moengal, an Irishman. iii. 285.
 Rathsithe, church of, i. 268.
 Ratisbon, monastery of St. Peter's at, founded by Marianus, an Irishman, iv. 2, 5. Monastery of St. James at, erected by the Irish, 57.
 Raymond le Grose, arrives in Ireland, iv. 193. Plunders the Desies, 224.
 Rechin, supposed to be Raheny, iii. 434, 435.
 Rechrann or Raghlin, island of, infested by the Scandinavians, iii. 236, 238.
 Regnach, St. sister of St. Finnian, ii. 77.
 Regular canons, iv. 348.
 Reliques of Saints preserved and venerated by the Irish, iv. 396. Those of St. Patrick, St. Columba, and St. Brigid, translation of, iv. 274. How discovered, 275. Some of St. Patrick's reserved at Armagh, ib.
 Relves, bishop of Menevia, i. 472.
 Renan, St. an Irishman, retires to Britany, i. 492.
 Reuta, i. 217.
 Rhingau, in Switzerland, St. Findan patron of the monastery of, iii. 238, 239.
 Richard I. king, crowned, iv. 318, death of, 334.
 Richarius, receives Caidoc and Fricor, Irish priests, ii. 442. Retires from the world, and founds the monastery of Centula, ib.
 Rinan, St. an Irish bishop, i. 492.
 Rinn-dubhain-alithir, i. 426.
 Rioch, St. erroneously said to have been nephew of St. Patrick, i. 419. Was bishop as well as abbot, ii. 11. Entertains St. Aidus at Inisbofinde, 187.

- Rippon, monastery of, granted to Wilfrid by Prince Alchfrid, iii. 59.
- Robartach Mac Naserda, succeeds Moengall, bishop of Kildare, iii. 322, 324.
- Robartach, bishop of Finglass, death of, iii. 323.
- Robartach O'Kearta, scribe of Kill-achaid, death of, iii. 329.
- Robartach, monk and scribe of Durrow, death of, iii. 329.
- Robbing of a church, iv. 382.
- Rocking stones, i. 230.
- Roderic O'Conor, king of Ireland, devastates Meath, iv. 225.
Sends ambassadors to Windsor to negotiate with Henry II. 226.
Death of, 55.
- Roding, an Irishman, bishop of Bellilocus, ii. 491. Death of, 492.
- Roman liturgy and office, received in Ireland, iv. 367, 368, 372.
- Romulus, a bishop in the Isle of Man, i. 303, 305.
- Ronan, St. first abbot of Drumshallon, i. 444.
- Ronan, brother of St. Carnech, i. 494.
- Ronan, an Irishman, defends the general mode of observing the Paschal calculation, ii. 424, 427.
- Ronan, son of Berach, intimate with Fechin, iii. 51, 52.
- Ronan of Lisimore, iii. 201.
- Rosalas, Cistercian monastery of, iv. 237, 239.
- Roscarrbery, formerly called Ross-ailithri, i. 317, 318.
- Roscommon, synod of, iv. 168.
- Roscor, church of, i. 464, 466.
- Roseneath, anciently Rosnachoich in Dunbartonshire, i. 438.
- Ros-glas, now Old Ross, i. 466.
- Ros-mic-treoin, now Old Ross, i. 466. Monastery of, ii. 311. iii. 14.
- Rosnat, in Britain, monastery of, i. 434.
- Rosoirthir, in Fermanagh, i. 404.
- Ross, son of Trichem, converted by St. Patrick, i. 216.
- Ross, monastery of, ii. 194. Death of Maurice, bishop of, iv. 328. Disputes about a successor to the See of, 329, 330.
- Ross-ailithri, now Rosscarberry, i. 317, 318.
- Ross-Benchuir, i. 405.
- Rosscrea, monastery of, iii. 7.
- Rosnachoich, now Roseneath, i. 438.
- Round towers, disquisition on the, iv. 393 to 414.
- Routs, the, i. 217.
- Ruadan, St. abbot of Lothra, ii. 9, 233. Death of, ib.
- Rudbert, St. or Rupert, bishop of Worms, iii. 162, 163.
- Rudgall, Mac Fingail, bishop of Emly, iii. 339, 340.
- Rufinus, the Heresiarch, i. 16.
- Rumold, St. of Mechlin, an Irishman, iii. 197, 200. Sets out for Rome, 198. Goes to Mechlin, and erects a monastery there, ib. Murdered by assassins, 199.

- Rumond, a very wise man, death of, iii. 176.
 Rumond, bishop of Clonard, iii. 368.
 Rus, or Ross, son of Trichem, converted by St. Patrick, i. 216.
 Russin of Lappain, Comorban of St. Barr, ii. 317, 400. Death of, iii. 129.
 Rutmel, Prince and bishop of Clonfert, death of, iii. 266.

S.

- Sabhall or Sabhul Padruic, (the ancient name of Saul,) i. 212, 302, 318.
 Sacellus of Bais-leac-mor, a disciple of St. Patrick, i. 244.
 Sacrifices, i. 230.
 Saigir, monastery of, ii. 7.
 Saints in Ireland, 1st class of, ii. 12.—2d class, 13.—3d class, 331.
Saltair-na-rann, a work of Aengus the Hagiologist, iii. 247, 251.
 Samthanna, St. abbess of Clonebrone, iii. 170.
 Sannan, meaning of, i. 330.
 Sarabaites, none amongst the Irish monks, iv. 358.
 Saran of Critain, abbot, ii. 414.
 Sath-reginden, monastery of, ii. 133.
 Saul or Sabhall Padruic, i. 212, monastery of, iv. 128, 130.
 Scandinavians infest the coast of Ireland, iii. 236, 238. Plunder Inispatrik, 236. Attack the coasts of Ulster, 241, 242. Set fire to the monastery of Hy, ib. Attack Hy again, ib. Land in Ireland and destroy Roscommon, ib. Defeated by the Irish, and forced to return to their own country, 242. Land again, and burn many places in Ireland, 270. Plunder and lay waste Cork, Lismore, and the monasteries of Inisdamla and Bangor, ib. Destroy almost all Conaght, 271.
 Scanlan, Prince of Ossory, blessed by St. Columbkil, ii. 238, 243.
 Scanlan, scribe of Roscrea, death of, iii. 367.
 Scannal, bishop of Kildare, death of, iii. 329.
 Scathin, St. or Scutin, disciple of St. David of Wales, ii. 323.
 Schiria, St. abbess of Killskire, ii. 327.
 Scholastics and other learned men, deaths of several, iii. 431, seq.
 School of St. Ailbe, i. 402.
 Scotia, St. Senan goes to the nunnery of, ii. 90.
 Scotia, Ireland known by the name of, i. 235. North Britain so called, iii. 221.
 Scots, believing in Christ, i. 36. Inquiry concerning the, 235, iii. 221. The Irish so called, iv. 5. The name of, 157.

- Scottish colony settled in Britain, i. 11.
- Scottish kingdom, none established in Britain in the 3d century, 10.
- Scottish priests interdicted from administering the sacraments by an English synod, iii. 275.
- Scullan, abbot, ii. 414.
- Seachnasach, monarch of Ireland, killed, iii. 82.
- Sealbach, called secretary to Cormac Mac Culinan, iii. 365.
- Seanbotha, monastery of, iii. 2.
- Seanchas More, or Great Antiquity, attributed to St. Patrick, i. 371.
- Sean-ross, cell of, erected by St. Cronan, iii. 7.
- Sebdanna, St. abbess of Kildare, death of, iii. 170.
- Sectabrat, bishop of Emly, iii. 233.
- Secular canons, attached to the service of Cathedrals, iv. 301, 303, 312, 314. Turned out of the Cathedral of Down, 353.
- Secundinus, arrival of, in Ireland, i. 259. Fixes his residence at Dunshaughlin, 271, 272, 273. Time of the death of, 293. Put in charge of the archbishopric of Armagh, 321.
- Sedna, father of St. Comgall, ii. 61.
- Sedna, St. a disciple of St. Senan, ii. 91, 94.
- Sedulius, an Irishman, a poet and theologian, i. 17, 18. Two of that name, ib.
- Sedulius, abbot of Kildare, iii. 255.
- Sedulius, abbot and bishop of Roscommon, iii. 255.
- Sedulius, St. abbot of Athcliath (Dublin) death of, iii. 228, 230.
- Sees, Irish episcopal, at close of the 12th century, iv. 344.
- Segen, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 34, 35. Death of, 131.
- Segen, abbot of Bangor, ii. 415.
- Segeneus, or Segienus, abbot of Hy, founder of the church of Rechrán, or Rachlin, ii. 135, 347. Displeased with Cummian for defending the Roman method of Paschal computation, 395. Death of, iii. 36.
- Segenus, an abbot, supposed by some writers the same as Segenius of Hy, ii. 414.
- Segetius, a priest, accompanies St. Patrick to Rome, i. 168. And back to Ireland, 170.
- Seinglean, church of, ii. 136.
- Selsker, priory of, iv. 338.
- Senach, or Senachus, of Achadh-fobhuir, a bishop, i. 245. Several of that name, 248.
- Senach or Senachus, successor to St. Finnian at Clonard, ii. 21, 23. Death of, 183.
- Senach, archbishop of Armagh, death of, ii. 303. Said to be the Senach of the 3d class of Irish saints, 334.
- Senach Garbh, successor of Fintan of Clonfert, ii. 303. Death of, ib. A bishop, 334.
- Senach, St. of the 3d class of Irish saints, ii. 331. A bishop, 333, 334.

- Senan, St. of Iniscatthy, pupil of St. Naal, i. 444. Time of his birth, 445. Forced by the dynast of Corcobaskin on an expedition against Corcomroe, ib. Places himself under the abbot Cassidan, 446. Retires to the monastery of St. Natalis, ib. Lived to a later period than the year 544, 475. Account of his acts, ii. 2, et seqq. Prohibited women serving in his monastery, 3, 20. Patron saint of Hy Conaill, 89. Goes to the monastery of Cassidanus, and to the nunnery of St. Scota, 90. Dies at Kill-eochaille, ib. Succeeded at Iniscatthy by Odran, 91.
- Senchai, bishop of Emly, death of, iii. 202.
- Senell, St. bishop of Maghbile, death of, ii. 303.
- Senile, tutor to Columbanus, ii. 260, 262.
- Sen-Patrick, the same as St. Patrick, i. 324.
- Serenus, the same as Isserninus, i. 261. See Isserninus.
- Serinum, isle of, i. 174.
- Serpents, expulsion of, from Ireland, i. 250.
- Servanus, bishop, ii. 167
- Seschnan and his family baptized by St. Patrick, i. 221.
- Setna, bishop of Saigir, ii. 303.
- Setna, father of Maidoc of Ferns, ii. 333.
- Sezinus, or Sezni, St. an Irishman, celebrated in Brittany, i. 261. Said to have died there, 492.
- Sheep, white and black, in Ireland, iv. 357, 359.
- Shrowle, barony of, i. 421.
- Shrowl, or Shrule, monastery of, iv. 130, 138.
- Sidonius, an Irish monk at Rouen, iii. 114. Death of, ib.
- Sidonius, companion of Virgil, in Bavaria, iii. 179, 185.
- Sierkeran, abbey of, ii. 8.
- Sigberet, king of the East Saxons, baptized by St. Finan, ii. 428. Brings with him St. Cedd to convert his subjects, ib. Receives St. Fursey kindly, ii. 458.
- Sigebert, king of Austrasia, ii. 432, 434.
- Sigritia, St. virgin, said to be sister to St. Gerard of Mayo, iii. 170, 171.
- Sincha, St. death of, ii. 32.
- Sincha, St. abbess of Kells, iii. 14.
- Sinell, St. said to be the first convert made by St. Patrick in Ireland, i. 208. Establishes a monastery at Killeig, 441. Called Senior, to distinguish him from Sinell, a priest, ib. Presented with a cell at Cluan-Damh, by St. Aibe. ib. Death of, ii. 70.
- Sinell, St. successor of Tigernach at Clogher, ii. 183.
- Sinell, son of Maynocur, abbot of Cluain-inis, ii. 233. Disciple of St. Finnian of Clonard, ib. Master of St. Fintan Munnu, 404.
- Sillan, St. bishop of Maghbile, death of, ii. 303.
- Sillan, St. bishop of Devenish, death of, iii. 36.
- Simony, condemned by the council of Kells, iv. 147, 149. Interdicted by canon, 271.

- Siollan, error of Archdall respecting him, i. 265.
- Sitric, king of the Danes of Dublin, takes possession of Waterford, iii. 326, 328. Sets out on a pilgrimage to Rome, 432, 433. Returns to Dublin, ib. Grants lands to Donatus, bishop of Dublin, 434.
- Skey, island of, visited by St. Columbkil, ii. 162.
- Skrine, various churches of that name, ii. 132, 136.
- Skrine, in Meath, episcopal church of, iv. 322. Appropriated to the abbey of St. Mary, Dublin, ib.
- Slane, arrival of St. Patrick at, i. 223. Ancient name of, ib. St. Hercus or Ercus, bishop of, 346. Death of Ercus, bishop of, 435. Dagobert, son of Sigebert, king of Austrasia, placed in the monastery of, iii. 101, 102. Church of, destroyed by the Northmen, 271. Plundered by the Scandinavians, 276. Church of plundered, 375. Plundered and burned, 377, 378. The castle of, demolished, iv. 230. Episcopal church of, 322.
- Slaves, English, liberated in Ireland, iv. 196.
- Sleben, abbot of Hy, iii. 192, 193. Death of, 194.
- Sleigh Grian*, County of Kilkenny, ancient inscription there, i. 228.
- Slotty, St. Fiech bishop of, i. 274, 335, 435.
- Sliebhliag or Slieve-league, in Donegal, i. 341.
- Slieve Donard, the highest of the mountains of Mourne, i. 214. Mountains of, ii. 312, 329. Monastery of, 319, 321.
- Slieve-Mis, mountain of, i. 216.
- Sligeach or Sligo, river of, i. 256.
- Snam-lathir, monastery of, ii. 133.
- Snav-daen*, St. Patrick crossed the Shannon at, i. 240.
- Snedbran, bishop of Kildare, death of, iii. 202.
- Sochla, mother of Lugeus, ii. 205.
- Sodelbia, daughter of Aidus, king of Leinster, ii. 327.
- Soerbretach of Cork, death of, iii. 327.
- Soignes, monastery of, ii. 491.
- Sopkias. See Cadoc, i. 491.
- Sorar, brother to Faila, ii. 328.
- Sponsalia de futuro, iv. 283. De praesenti, ib.
- Staff of Jesus delivered to St. Patrick, i. 176. Carried away from Armagh by Niell the usurping bishop, iv. 95. Restored to Armagh, 97. Removed from Armagh to Dublin, 241, 242.
- Stellan, succeeds Camin at Iniskeltra, iii. 11, 13.
- Stephen appointed successor to Roding at Bellilocus, ii. 492.
- Stephen, St. monastery of, at Saltzburg, iii. 205, 207.
- Stone buildings in Ireland, iv. 127.
- Stone churches, iv. 393, 397.
- Strangford, or Strangford Lough, conjecture on, i. 214.
- Strongbow, arrival of, in Ireland, iv. 193. Married to Eva,

- daughter of Dermod Mac Morogh, 194. Takes Dublin, and massacres the inhabitants, 223. Shuts himself up in Waterford, 225. Founds the priory of St. John at Kilmainham, 230. Death of, ib.
- Struthuir, or Struthair, St. Mogoroc of, i. 425, 427.
- Sua-nacht, Danes defeated at, iii. 275, 276.
- Suarle, or Suarlech, bishop of Fore, iii. 177.
- Subhneus Meann, monarch of Ireland, ii. 301. Killed, 302.
- Succat, the first name of St. Patrick, i. 140.
- Suibert, first bishop of Verden, iii. 219, 220.
- Suibhne, son of Curthri, abbot of Hy, iii. 36.
- Suibhne, archbishop of Armagh, iii. 162. Death of, 170.
- Suibhne II. abbot of Hy, iii. 194. Death of, 232.
- Suibhne, doctor of Clonmacnois, death of iii. 329, 330.
- Suibhne O'Finnachta, bishop of Kildare, iii. 329.
- Suibhne, prior of Kildare, carried off by the Northmen, iii. 346.
- Sulchoid, battle of, iii. 391, 392.
- Sulgenius, bishop of St. David's, iii. 490.
- Surium, monastery of, iv. 128.
- Swiftmess of foot of the Irish, iv. 364.
- Swords, monastery of, not built by St. Columbkil, ii. 132. Erected by St. Finnan the leper, 133. Monastery of, governed by St. Finan, iii. 83. Part of the possessions of the see of Dublin, iv. 240.
- Synods, various, i. 284, 286, 331, 470. ii. 338, 389, 392, 397. iii. 140. iv. 37, 38, 42, 97, 118, 129, 164, 167, 168, 178, 195, 204, 217, 222, 233, 264, 267, 319, 376, 378, 380, 381.

T.

- Taberniæ*, Taburnia, where situate, i. 93.
- Tabullium, monastery of in France, ii. 491.
- Tailten*, the sports of, i. 210, 233. St. Patrick goes to, ib.
- Talech, mother of St. Finnan of Clonard, i. 464.
- Tallagh or Tallaght, St. Maolruana bishop of, iii. 232. Part of the possessions of the see of Dublin, iv. 240.
- Talulla, sister of St. Molaisse of Devenish, ii. 327.
- Tamaria, Tamerensis or Temeria, island of, i. 173, 174.
- Tanco, a Scot, successor of Patto at Amarbaric, iii. 219, and afterwards in the Lee Verden, ib.
- Tarar or Temoria, arrival of St. Patrick at, i. 220. Where situate, 221. Fire kindled at the festival of, 224, 278. Fes of, 471. Danes defeated at, iii. 415, 416.
- Tarannanus, St. ii. 137.
- Tassach, bishop of Rathcolptha, i. 346, 419.

- Tathacus, St. an Irishman, i. 489.
 Taughboyne, monastery of, ii. 259.
 Tax, levied on Munster by Feidhlim, son of Crimthann and Artrigius, bishop of Armagh, iii. 268.
 Teach-eon. See Nenagh.
 Teach-Mochoe (now Timahoe) monastery of, i. 349.
 Teach-Munnu, monastery of, ii. 406.
 Teach-na-Roman, i. 38, 41.
 Teagh-baithen, or Teagh baoithin, monastery of, ii. 259, 413.
 Teagh-talain or Teagh-talian, church of, i. 266, 270.
 Tearmann-Fechin, monastery of, iii. 47.
 Tech-Telle, called from St. Telle, iii. 129, 130.
 Techet, lake of, i. 245.
 Tefia, the country about Ardagh, i. 389.
 Tagh-brighide, or Brigid's house in Kenel-fiacha, i. 389.
 Tegh-Sacra, monastery of, iii. 140.
 Tehallan, church of, i. 266, 269.
 Teige O'Brien defeats his brother Donogh, iii. 425.
 Tellan St. i. 270.
 Telle, St. iii. 130.
 Temori. See Terah.
 Temple-na-fearta, i. 314.
 Temple-fartagh, i. 314.
Terminus, iv. 85. Canons relating to the, 386, 388.
 Termon-Fechin, nunnery of St. Mary of, confirmed in its possessions by the Pope, iv. 327.
Termon lands, iv. 85.
 Thaddeus, St. school of, i. 489.
 Theodebert, king of Austrasia, ii. 275, 284, 285. Forced to embrace the clerical order, 289.
 Theodore, entrusted with the care of Gallus, ii. 432, 433.
 Theodoric or Torlough, king of Thomond, retires to the monastery of Lismore, iii. 145. Returns to Thomond, ib.
 Thomas, St. abbey of, at Dublin, iv. 233, 234.
 Thomas, St. monastery of, at Strasburg, iii. 101.
 Thomian, archbishop of Armagh, ii. 347, 409. iii. 34.
 Thorannu, one of the disciples of Columba, ii. 137.
 Thuaim, monastery of, ii. 102, 350.
Thule, or Tyle, island of, i. 401. Missionaries sent there from Ireland, iii. 220.
 Thurles, English defeated there, iv. 225.
 Tibrada, monastery of, iii. 51, 52.
 Tigernach or Tighernach.
 Tigernach, bishop of Clogher, i. 434, 436. ii. 70, 183.
 Tighernach, bishop of Cluaincois, i. 436.
 Tighernach, abbot of Clonmacnois, ii. 58, 59.
 Tighernach, father of Conanus, ii. 222.

- Tighernach, son of St. Melle, erects the monastery of Lough Melge, iii. 192.—Gives it over to his mother St. Melle for a nunnery, ib.
- Tighernach Borchech, abbot of Clonard, iii. 446, 448.
- Tighernach O'Braoin, abbot of Clonmacnois, iii. 487, 489.
- Tighernmas, monarch of Ireland, i. 230.
- Timolin, church of, pillaged by the Danes, iii. 272. Nunnery of St. Mary of, iv. 338.
- Tintern Abbey founded, iv. 235, 236.
- Tiobruide, Tiobruidhe, or Tibraid, bishop of Emly, iii. 354, 361.
- Tir-Amalgaidh, or Tir-Awley, St. Patrick arrives in, i. 252. Princes of the house of, Christians, 394.
- Tir-aodh, now the barony of Tyrhugh, i. 263.
- Tirdaglas or Tirdeglas, monastery of, ii. 71, 74. Ravaged by the Northmen, iii. 271.
- Tir-da-croebh, meaning of the name, ii. 140.
- Tirechan, author of the life of St. Patrick, i. 222.
- Tirellil, i. 244.
- Tireragh barony, i. 256.
- Tir-glais, i. 288.
- Tirone, bishop of, iv. 348
- Tithes, iv. 80, 205, 218, 271, 282, 284.
- Tobur enadharc, i. 252.
- Tola, St. bishop of Clonard, iii. 171, 173, 174.
- Tola, St. abbot of Ardbraccan, death of, iii. 192.
- Tomgrany, church of, iii. 381, 383. Burnt, iv. 182.
- Tonsure, discussion concerning the, iii. 68, 69. seq.—Of the Irish monks, iv. 357. The Roman, 364.
- Torpadius of Tallagh, death of, iii. 329.
- Totnan, a deacon, companion of St. Kilian in his voyage to Franconia, iii. 116. Martyred there by a son of Gulana, wife of Gozbert, 117.
- Toul, Mansuetus first bishop of, an Irishman, i. 3.
- Tours, monastery of, i. 156, 157.
- Treguier, in Britany, landing of St. Patrick at, i. 150.
- Trena, father of Iarlath, i. 392.
- Trenan, one of Columbkil's monks, ii. 175.
- Tressan, St. goes to France with six brothers, ii. 487. Stops at Rheims, ib. Death of, ib.
- Trevet, monastery of, ii. 170.
- Trian, bishop, entertains St. Patrick, i. 302. A Roman or Continental monk, 348.
- Triburna, village of, ii. 11. Bishops of, ib. and iv. 344.
- Tribute of cows, given to the See of Armagh, i. 417.
- Trichem, erroneously said to be the father of Ailill, i. 440.
- Trim, St. Loman or Luman, bishop of, i. 222. The church of, 317. Cormac, bishop of, 416. iii. 176, 177. St. Fortchern, bishop of, 427, 466. St. Luman of, i. 428. Steeple of the - church, of burnt, iv. 55. The fortifications of destroyed, 225.

 Episcopal church of, 322. Error of Ledwich respecting, 324.
 Trinitarians, iv. 313.
 Trisingen, in Germany, i. 462.
 Tristernagh, priory of St. Mary of, founded, iv. 335, 337.
 Trowsers or Trowses, iv. 363.
 Trumberi, bishop of the middle Angles, ii. 428.
 Tuadear, bishop of Kildare, death of, iii. 266.
 Tuam, Iarlath, first bishop of, ii. 41. The cathedral of stormed by the Momonians, iv. 98. Burnt, 182. Synod of, 217.
 Tuathal, lecturer of Clonmacnois, death of, iii. 255.
 Tuathal I. monarch of Ireland, killed, ii. 21.
 Tuathal II. monarch of Ireland, i. 494.
 Tuda, successor of Colman at Lindisfarne, iii. 75, 77.
 Tuenoc, St. abbot and bishop of Ferns, iii. 33.
 Tulach-Dubhglaisse, ii. 114, 136.
 Tulach-min, monastery of, iii. 83.
 Tulelatia, abbess of Kildare, death of, iii. 329.
 Tullen, ravaged, iii. 377.
Tunica fœmoralis, iv. 363.
 Turgesius, the Norwegian, invades Ireland, iii. 241, 243. Enters Armagh, and expels the primate and all the students, 276, 278. Defeated and drowned, 277, 279.
 Turlogh O'Brien proclaimed king of Munster, iii. 474. Becomes master of Dublin and most part of Ireland, ib. Death of, 484.
 Tutilo, of St. Gall's, instructed by Moengall, an Irishman, iii.
 285.
 Tyle, island of, i. 400, 401.
 Tytheable articles, iv. 271.

U.

- Uisneach, Uisniuch, Usneagh, or Usney, in Meath. St. Brigid receives the veil at, i. 339. Synod of, iv. 37, 38, 39.
 Ulidia or Ullagh, St. Finnian revered at, ii. 26. Destroyed iv.
 182.
 Ulmus, monastery of, iii. 198.
 Ulster, disputes between the princes of, iv. 278.
 Ultan, St. writer of the life of St. Columb, i. 87.
 Ultan of Ardraccan, St. i. 454. ii. 342. iii. 51. Death of, ii.
 343, 346.
 Ultan, son of Erc, successor of St. Declan, i. 461.
 Ultan, successor of St. Ailbe, i. 461.
 Ultan Magonighe, i. 463.
 Ultan, bishop of, the 3d class of Irish Saints, ii. 331.
 Ultan, brother of St. Fursey, accompanies his brother to England,
 ii. 458. Retires to the monastery of Cnobhersburg, 459. Goes

- to Brabant with his brother Foilan, 464. They erect a monastery at Fosse, ib.
 Ultan, abbot of Clonard, carried off by the pestilence, iii. 54.
 Umalia, district of, i. 245.
 Usher, some errors of, i. 254, 278, 281, 306, 315, 330, 358, 423, 433, 468, 469, 474, 481, seqq. ii. 33, 66, 104, 157, 293, 321, 336, 345, 438. iii. 16, 41, 331.

V.

- Vactro*, the meaning of the word, iv. 354.
 Valence, synod of, iii. 294.
 Valentia, lord, his account of round towers, iv. 404.
Vallis Rosina, i. 471.
 Valoniis, Hamon de, harasses John archbishop of Dublin, and invades ecclesiastical property, iv. 331. Recalled to England, 332. Grants 20 plough-lands to archbishop Cumin and his successors, ib.
 Vestments, &c. to be burned when worn out, iv. 270.
 Vickberet, St. an Irishman, preached in Friesland, ii. 135. Returns to Ireland, ib.
 Victor, the Angel, i. 145, 146.
 Victor, a bishop, i. 266.
 Victor, Mt. St. granted to the monastery of St. Gall, iii. 286.
 Vienna, a monastery erected at, for the Irish, iv. 157.
 Vilbrord, appointed by St. Egbert to the mission of Friesland, iii. 135.
 Vinnoe, a holy man, contemporary with St. Patrick, i. 269.
 Virgilius, abbot of Aghabo, death of, iii. 202.
 Virgilius, Virgil, or Feargil, bishop of Saltzburg, an Irishman, iii. 179, 180, 186. Received by Pepin, mayor of the palace of France, ib. Goes to Bavaria, ib. Disputes between him and St. Boniface, 182. Consecrates a basilic of St. Stephen in Saltzburg, 205, 207. Goes on the visitation of his diocese, 206. Returns to Saltzburg and dies, ib.
 Viride Lignum, the monastery of, iv. 132.
 Visions of St. Fursey, ii. 455, 458.
 Vivian, cardinal, presides over a synod at Dublin, and allowed to the English liberty to take the provisions out of the Irish churches, iv. 233.
 Vosges, the monastery of, erected by St. Hildulf, iii. 104.
 Vulganius, St. an Irishman, ii. 443, 445.

W.

- Walciodorus, monastery of, iii. 401, 404.

- Waldelan, requests the prayers of St. Columbanus, ii. 270.
- Waldetrudis, wife of St. Madelgar, ii. 490. Erects the nunnery at Castrilocus, ib.
- Ware, errors of, respecting the Augustinian Canons, iv. 104.
Willful perversion of the text of, by his English editor, 197.
- Warrham, i. 261.
- Waterford, made an episcopal see, and Malchus its first bishop, iv. 15. Cathedral of, erected, 16. See of, freed from the jurisdiction of that of Canterbury, 45. Meeting of bishops there, 222. The Danes of, rise against the English, 225.
- Well-worship, i. 226.
- West-Cashel, i. 242.
- Wetheny. See Wony.
- Whitley, conference at, concerning the Paschal question, iii. 59, 60.
- Whitefield, synod of, ii. 392, 397.
- Widows marrying the brothers of their husbands, iv. 283.
- Wilfrid defends the Roman Paschal computation, iii. 50. Obtains a grant of the monastery of Rippon, ib. Ordained priest, 60, 62.
- Windsor, terms of the treaty of, iv. 226.
- Wine, used by the ancient Irish monks, iv. 353.
- Winwaloe, or Winwalloe, first abbot of Landevenec, i. 493.
- Wiro, St. an Irishman, iii. 111, 113. Consecrated bishop at Rome, ib. Returns to Ireland, ib. Goes off to France, ib. Dies at Mons Petri, 113.
- Witta. See Albuin.
- Wives of Clerks, &c. iv. 364, 366, 367.
- Women, not allowed to enter convents of men, ii. 17. Rule that none should serve in monasteries, 20.
- Woney, or Wetheny, alias Abington, abbey of, iv. 336.
- Wooden churches, iv. 392, 393, 397.
- Woollen garments worn by the Irish monks, iv. 357, 359.
- Worship, ancient religious, i. 230.
- Writing, the art of, known and practised in Ireland before the coming of St. Patrick, i. 277.
- Wurtzburg, Irish monastery of, iv. 4, 6. Rebuilt by the aid of money from Ireland, 157.

Y.

- Ybarcintracta, a name of Newry, iv. 7.

Princeton Theological Seminary Libraries

1 1012 01210 6086

