PREFACE

THIS work aims at presenting in a convenient form all the references to the Celts that are to be found scattered through the works of the writers of Greece and Rome. These materials deal with a people whose homes spread over Europe, from the fresh fields of Ireland to the torrid plains of Asia Minor, and from the rich mountains of the Spanish peninsula to the uninviting depths of the Hercynian Forest. The earliest reference to this mighty race is found in the Homeric epic, and the latest reference given in these volumes is taken from a writer of the fifth century A.D. The value of this work then must lie altogether in the arrangement of its materials; for it is evident that what we learn from the Carthaginian explorer, Himilco, about the life of the tribes who worked the mines of Britain when Carthage was mistress of the Mediterranean and Rome did not exist, cannot be held to apply to the Celts of Galatia to whom Paul addressed his exhortations; nor can the social life of the Celts of Britain depicted by Poseidonius help us to form an idea of the conditions under which their Celtic contemporaries lived in the valleys of the Po and of the Danube. To safeguard the student from the egregious errors which disfigure too many of the works of our Celtic scholars, considerable pains have been taken to arrange the materials of these volumes in chronological order. Each statement is, as far as it is possible to do so, traced back to its author. The custom among the classical writers of quoting without acknowledgement from the works of earlier authors has given modern scholars much trouble in identifying the sources of their information, especially when the works from which they quote are no longer extant. The account given by Pausanias (second century A.D.) of the invasion of Greece by the Celts is based on the work of a writer of the third century B.C., and probably of Hieronymus of Cardia. It therefore appears in these volumes under the date of its author, and not under that of the copyist to whom we owe its preservation.

The author wishes to acknowledge his indebtedness to the commentators who have laboured to elucidate these problems, to whose works reference is made as occasion demands. With very few exceptions the works that have come down to us from the writers of Greece and Rome owe their preservation to their literary style: they are chiefly polished compilations based on the commentaries of soldiers who described their fights in prose less stately no doubt than Livy's, but which, had fate preserved them for us, would have been of priceless worth to the historian. The picturesque and the heroic appeared to these compilers most worthy of a place in their productions.

The story of the brave wife of the Celtic leader, Ortiagon, is first told by Polybius; Livy presents the story in his most finished style; Plutarch too cannot resist its charm. The myth of Juno's geese saving the capitol is repeated by a dozen writers. So, too, with the histories of the various campaigns, the later writers merely adopted the account given by their predecessors. When the original account is available it alone is quoted in these volumes.

The notes are as brief as it was possible to make them, and are chiefly concerned with such commentary as seems necessary for the proper understanding of the text. The reader is referred to the index at the end of the third volume, where he will find carefully noted the various passages in which the tribes and customs are mentioned in the excerpta. In the same volume will be found a concise etymological glossary of the Celtic names and terms occurring in the texts. The Tabula Rerum Celticarum may also, it is hoped, prove useful.

In the Rerum gallicarum et francicarum scriptores of D. Bouquet (1738), in the Monumenta Historica Britannica of Petrie and Hardy (1848), and in the Γαλλικῶν συγγραφῆς ἑλληνικαί of M. Edmond Cougny (1878-1892) attempts have been made to provide Celtic scholars with useful treasuries of the origines of Celtic history; but a comparison of the arrangement and the contents of these works with the present volumes will show that the author is under no obligations to these writers, whose works—excellent, no doubt, for their time—are now, owing to the great strides made in classical research and criticism, quite out of date. To A. Holder's scholarly work, Alt-Celtischer Sprachschatz, the author wishes to express his obligations, especially in the preparation of the etymological glossary at the end of Volume III. To this monumental work all interested in Celtic Philology are referred. To the researches of the late Mons. D'Arbois de Jubainville, and to those of MM. Georges Dottin, Ernault, Loth, S. Reinach, Alexandre Bertrand, Karl Müllenhoff, and their fellow workers, the author acknowledges his deep indebtedness. For his sympathetic encouragement and advice the author owes much to the late Mr. Alfred Nutt, whose untimely death deprives Celtic studies of an enthusiastic and generous friend. To his fellow-countryman, Mr. D. B. Hurley, who has read the greater part of the translations and has supplied some, the author is particularly indebted not only for the many corrections he has made, but also for his illuminating criticisms of the arrangement of these materials.

It can hardly be hoped that a work entailing so much reading and research would be free from errors or omissions. If any are detected the author will be much obliged to those who will kindly call his attention to them; and, should a second edition be called for, they and any useful suggestions that may be made will be gladly availed of and duly acknowledged.

HOMER

The Homeric epic (circa B.C. 950–900) contains no direct mention of the Celts, but in the word κασσίτερος (= tin) we have undoubtedly a word of Celtic origin, which appears in the names of many tribes of the Gadhelic branch of the Celtic family: <sup>1</sup> e.g. Cassi-gnato-s, Cassi-mara, Bodio-casses, Vidu-casses, &c. In Strabo and in Diodorus Siculus we find a distinction, founded on a confused idea of the geography of North-west Europe, between κασσιτέριδες (the Tin Isles) and Βρεττανική (Britain), two names used by early Greek writers to designate Britain, from whose mines in Cornwall the peoples of the Mediterranean got their tin. To name a metal after the people in whose territory it was found was not unusual among the Greeks and Romans. Thus copper (κύπρος) came from Cyprus (Κύπρος), the mirrors made of polished bronze at Brundisium are

I. τοῦ δ' ἦτοι δέκα οἴμοι ἔσαν μέλανος κῦάνοιο, δώδεκα δὲ χρυσοῖο καὶ εἴκοσι κασσιτέροιο.
 (Iliad, xi. 24, 25.)

II. . . . ἦν πέρι μὲν κύκλοι δέκα χάλκεοι ἦσαν, ἐν δὲ οἱ ὀμφαλοὶ ἦσαν εἴκοσι κασσιτέροιο
 λευκοί, ἐν δὲ μέσοισιν ἔην μέλανος κῦάνοιο.
 (Iliad, xi. 33–35.)

called in Pliny, specula brundisina; steel is in Greek χάλυψ because it was obtained from the Chalybes (Χάλυβες), a people in the Caucasian district. The word κασσίτερος came to the Greeks through the Phoenicians, who enjoyed a monopoly of the tin trade in the Mediterranean.

The XIth extract seems to be best explained with Merry and Riddell,<sup>2</sup> as a description of an iceberg. The Phoenician sailors who came to the Cassiterides for tin must have seen many icebergs, descriptions of which they would not fail to give to the Greeks who bought their cargoes. The XIIth extract shows a knowledge of the short summer nights of the northern latitudes, and this must have been obtained too from the Phoenicians.<sup>3</sup>

The evidence seems to justify the view that in the ninth century B.C. the Gadhelic branch of the Celtic family was established in the British Isles and engaged in the production of tin.

I. (Describing the shield of Agamemnon.) Now on it were ten courses (or circles) of black cyanus and twelve of gold and twenty of tin.

II. (Describing same.) Around it were ten courses of bronze and thereon set twenty white bosses of tin, and in the midst one of black cyanus.

<sup>1</sup> The lines are undoubtedly spurious, as noted by Aristarchos (quoted in Aristonikes). The shields were probably of hides on metal and not, as the interpolator imagines, all of metal. Vide note in Leaf: Iliad, ad hoc.

III. (Vulcan is forging a shield for Achilles.) Into the fire he threw enduring bronze and tin and precious gold and silver, and next he set a great anvil on an anvil-seat and took in his hand a sturdy hammer and in the other he grasped the tongs.

IV. (Describing the wonderful carving and inlay of same.) Also he set therein a vineyard teeming plenteously with clusters, wrought fair in gold; black were the grapes, but the vines hung throughout on silver poles. And around it he ran a ditch of cyanus and round that a fence of tin, and one straight path led to it whereby the vintagers might go when they should gather the vintage.

V. (Describing same.) Also he wrought therein a herd of kine with straight horns, and the kine were fashioned of gold and tin.

VI. Now when he had wrought the shield great and strong, then wrought he a corslet for him brighter than a flame of fire, and he wrought him too a massive helmet to fit his brows, handsomely graven, and thereon he set a crest of gold, and he wrought him greaves of pliant tin.

VII. (Description of combat between Achilles and Aeneas.) Yet through two folds he drove it, but three remained, for the lame god had welded five, two of bronze and two inside of tin and one of gold; therein was held the ashen spear.<sup>1</sup>

VIII. (Description of Agenor's attack on Achilles.) He said, and hurled his sharp spear with weighty hand and struck him on the leg beneath the knee. He did not miss his mark, and the greave of new-wrought tin rang loud, but the brazen spear bounded back after striking and penetrated not, for the god's gift drove it back.

IX. And sprays of dust ever smote the charioteer, and his chariot overlaid with gold and tin ran behind his fleet-footed steeds, and small trace was there of the wheel-tires behind in the fine dust, as they sped on.

X. I will give him the breastplate that I took from Asteropaios, of bronze, whereon a casting of bright tin was overlaid, and it will be to him of great worth.

XI. Then we came to the isle, Aeolia, where dwelt Aeolus, son of Hippotas, dear to the immortal gods, in a floating island, and all about it is a wall of bronze unbroken, and the cliff runs up sheer from the sea.

XII. So for the space of six days we sailed night and day continually, and on the seventh we came to the steep stronghold of Lamos, Telepylos of the Laestrygons, where herdsman hails herdsman as he drives in his flock, and his fellow-herdsman who drives forth answers the call. There might a sleepless man have earned a double wage, the one as neat-herd, the other shepherding white flocks: so near are the out-goings of the night and of the day.

HECATAEUS OF MILETUS

In the Iliad<sup>1</sup> we find mention of Miletus, a Greek city situated near the mouth of the river Maeander. Its favourable position enabled it to secure a monopoly of the trade of the Black Sea, while the energy and enterprise of its citizens made it in the sixth century B.C. the most important of the Greek cities. By B.C. 700 it had founded more than sixty cities, chiefly on the Hellespont, including Abydos, Cyzicus, Sinope, Dioscurias, Panticapaeum and Olbia. It entered into commercial relations with the Phoenicians and became distinguished as a seat of literature, history, philosophy, and geographical enterprise. Towards the end of the seventh century B.C. Anaximander of Miletus designed the first map of the world. Hecataeus, born at Miletus, circa B.C. 540, continued the researches of Anaximander and travelled extensively in Egypt, Asia and Europe. He wrote an account of his observations, largely used by Herodotus in his history, and of which 331 fragments have come down to us. It is to these fragments we owe the first mention of the Celts. The fragments are collected in the scholarly work of C. and T. Müller: Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, 5 vols., published by Didot, Paris.

HIMILCO

Himilco, a Carthaginian explorer, made a voyage round the west coast of Europe and explored as far as Britain and Ireland about B.C. 500. An account of his expedition, giving details of the coast and the tribes who dwelt on it, written probably by himself, was known to the ancients, but is now lost. Eratosthenes (circa B.C. 275-195), librarian to Ptolemy III, King of Egypt, translated this account into Greek, but this work too is lost. Rufus Festus Avienus, who was proconsul for Africa A.D. 366, and an elegant writer of Latin, had a copy of the Greek version of Himilco's work, and amused himself by rendering it into Latin verse. Of this Latin translation, written 850 years after the events it narrates, we have a fragment of some 4015 lines. These have been carefully published by Alfred Holder, under the title of Rufi Festi Avieni Carmina.

It should be noted that at the time of Himilco's expedition the Celts had not conquered Spain. Polybius<sup>1</sup> and, following him, Strabo<sup>2</sup> blame Eratosthenes for stating that the Celts held all Spain except Cadiz, which belonged to the Carthaginians, and then omitting the Celts from his list of peoples occupying the west coast of Spain. There is, however, no contradiction here. Eratosthenes, writing circa B.C. 240, correctly states that the Celts held dominion over the greater portion of the Iberian peninsula, but when copying the account of the voyage of Himilco, which relates to B.C. 500, he does not find the Celts among the tribes occupying Iberia. We must conclude they had not yet conquered the peninsula. We know, however, from Herodotus<sup>3</sup> that about fifty years after the expedition of Himilco the Celts had conquered the Iberian peninsula. The conquest therefore took place in the fifth century B.C. We shall see they were subsequently conquered by the Carthaginians.<sup>1</sup>

AESCHYLUS AND HELLANICUS

Aeschylus, the great tragic poet, was born at Eleusis, near Athens, B.C. 525. He wrote his tragedy, Prometheus Unbound, about B.C. 460. Of this we have but a few fragments, one of which is quoted below. He died in B.C. 456. Hellanicus was born

They feared the sea. But in after-days repose and leisure,

—When security had bred courage,—

Induced them from their mountain homes,

Livingstone. In this unexplored country they placed the Rhiplean Mountains <sup>1</sup> in which the Danube takes have earned him the title of 'The Father of History.' He is always careful to discriminate between what he learned from personal observation, oral information, and mere conjecture. He began his history about B.C. 444.

The first extract given below was written at Athens about 444 B.C. In it Herodotus makes the Danube rise near the city Pyrene. This gross error is not repeated in the second extract, which was written some years later at Thurii. Here we are told the Danube rises in the country of the Celts, who after the Cynetes are the last people in Western Europe. The Cynetes dwelt in the extreme south of Portugal,<sup>1</sup> and the Celts consequently in circa B.C. 442 extended over the south of Europe from the Alps to modern Portugal. We have seen <sup>2</sup> that circa B.C. 500 the Celts had not established themselves in the Spanish peninsula, hence we must date the Celtic conquest of the Spanish peninsula between B.C. 500-442.

In the second extract Herodotus rejects the Hyperboreans as mythical. Reasoning similarly we should refuse to believe in the existence of Mount Atlas, for it is named after a mythical person.<sup>3</sup> Here we must dissent from Herodotus.

I. The river Danube has its rise in the country of the Celts and the city Pyrene, and so runs that it divides Europe in the midst. Now the Celts dwell outside the Pillars of Hercules and border upon the Cynetes, who dwell furthest west of all those who have their abode in Europe.

II. From the Agathyrsians the Maris flows and joins the Danube, and from the summits of Haemos (the Balkans) flow three other great rivers towards the north and fall into it, namely, Atlas, Auras, Tibisis. Through Thrace and the Thracian Crobyzians flow the rivers Athrys, Noes, and Artanes, running into the Danube. And from the Paeonians and Mount Rhodope the river Kios runs into it also, cutting through Haemos in the midst. From the Illyrians the river Angros flows northward and, running out into the Triballian plain, into the river

Brongos, and the Brongos flows into the Danube ; thus the Danube receives both these large rivers : and from the region which is above the Ombri, the river Karpis and another river, the Alpis, flow also towards the north and run into it. For the Danube flows in fact through the whole of Europe, beginning with the land of the Celts who, after the Cynetes, dwell furthest west of all the peoples of Europe. Thus flowing through all Europe it falls into the sea by the side of Scythia.

III. [A band of Lydians leave their territories to seek more fertile lands and sail] until after passing by many nations they came at last to the land of the Ombri,<sup>1</sup> and there they founded cities and dwell up to the present time.

IV. Let what has been said of the Hyperboreans suffice : for the tale of Abaris,<sup>2</sup> who is reported to have been a Hyperborean, I do not vouch for : how the arrow carried him while fasting from all food about over all the earth. If, however, there are Hyperboreans, it follows that there are also Hypernotians ; and I laugh when I see that, though many before this have drawn maps of the earth, yet no one has set the matter forth in an intelligent way, seeing that they draw Ocean flowing round the earth, which is circular, exactly as if drawn with compasses ; and they make Asia of equal size with Europe. In a few words I shall declare the size of each division and of what nature it is as regards outline.

The Celtic conquest of the Spanish peninsula in the fifth century B.C. brought the Celts into close contact with the Mediterranean, while their wild march on Rome made their name ring throughout the classical world. Xenophon (B.C. 431–355) tells us that they were engaged by Dionysius of Sicily to assist his Lacedaemonian allies in the Peloponnesian war of 369–368 B.C. Plato (B.C. 428–348), who had spent some years at the court of Dionysius, was struck by their warlike spirit : while their successful march on Rome in 388 B.C. reached the ears of Aristotle (B.C. 384–322), who preserves some of the stories about them current in his day. But the information possessed by the Greeks was meagre and inexact, as the extracts from Ephorus (B.C. 400–330) and Theopompus (B.C. 375–306) prove.

XENOPHON

I. When these things had been accomplished, the reinforcements from Dionysius sailed to the Lacedaemonians, consisting of more than twenty triremes and conveying Celts and Iberians and about fifty horsemen.<sup>1</sup> Celtic mercenaries.
B.C. 369.

II. And the rest fleeing away were slain ; many by the horsemen and many too by the Celts. B.C. 368.

PLATO

I. I am not discussing the practice of drinking or not drinking wine in general, but about downright drunkenness : are we to follow the custom of the Scythians, and Persians, and Carthaginians, and Celts, and Iberians, who are all warlike nations, or to follow your custom, who, as you say, wholly abstain ?

ARISTOTLE

I. ὥστε ἀναγκίον ἐν τῇ τοιαύτῃ πολιτείᾳ τιμᾶσθαι τὸν πλοῦτον, ἄλλως τε κἂν τύχωσι γυναικοκρατούμενοι, καθάπερ τὰ πολλὰ τῶν στρατιωτικῶν καὶ πολεμικῶν γενῶν, ἕξω Κελτῶν ἢ κἂν εἴ τινες ἕτεροι φανερώς τετιμήκασιν τὴν πρὸς τοὺς ἄρρενας συνουσίαν.<sup>1</sup>

(Politica, Bk. ii. 9, § 7.)

II. Ἐπι δ' ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι πᾶσι τοῖς δυναμένοις πλεονεκτεῖν ἢ τοιαύτη τετίμηται δύναμις, οἶον ἐν Σκύθαις καὶ Πέρσαις καὶ Θραξὶ καὶ Κελτοῖς· ἐν ἐνίοις γὰρ καὶ νόμοι τινές εἰσι παροξύνοντες πρὸς τὴν ἀρετὴν ταύτην, καθάπερ ἐν Καρχηδόνι φασὶ τὸν ἐκ τῶν κρῖκων κόσμον λαμβάνειν ὅσας ἂν στρατεύσωνται στρατείας.

(Politica, Bk. iv. 2, § 10.)

III. Συμφέρει δ' εὐθύς καὶ πρὸς τὰ ψύχῃ συνεθίζειν ἐκ μικρῶν παίδων· τοῦτο γὰρ καὶ πρὸς ὑγίειαν καὶ πρὸς πολεμικὰς πράξεις εὐχρηστότατον· διὸ παρὰ πολλοῖς ἐστὶ τῶν Βαρβάρων ἔθος τοῖς μὲν εἰς ποταμὸν ἀποβάπτειν τὰ γιγνόμενα ψυχρόν, τοῖς δὲ σκέπασμα μικρὸν ἀμπύσχειν, οἶον Κελτοῖς.

IV. Ἐκ δὲ τῆς Πυρήνης [τοῦτο δ' ἐστὶν ὄρος πρὸς δυσμὴν ἰσημερινῆν ἐν τῇ Κελτικῇ] ῥέουσιν ὃ δ' Ἴστρος δι' ὅλης τῆς Εὐρώπης εἰς τὸν Ἐυξείνου πόντον τῶν δ' ἄλλων ποταμῶν οἱ πλείστοι πρὸς ἄρκτον ἐκ τῶν ὀρῶν τῶν Ἀρκυνίων· ταῦτα δὲ

<sup>1</sup> Aristotle, who had only scanty information on the Celts and that only second-hand, is the first writer to make this charge against the Celts. He is followed by other Greek writers (v. Index sub Paiderastia), but the Romans, who had more direct knowledge of the Celts, are silent on the point.

ARISTOTLE

I. The consequence is that in such a state wealth is too highly esteemed, especially if the citizens are under the thumb of their wives, after the manner of most warlike and military nations, except the Celts and a few others who openly approve of connexion with the male.<sup>1</sup>

II. And in all nations which are able to gratify their military ambitions, e.g. the Scythians, Persians, Thracians, Celts, it is military power which is held in esteem. Thus in some countries there are actually special laws to encourage the pursuit of this virtue, as at Carthage, where it is said that men are allowed to wear by way of ornament as many rings as the number of campaigns in which they have served.

III. To inure children to the cold from their earliest years is also an excellent practice which greatly conduces to health and is most effective for hardening them for military service. Hence it is customary among many non-Greek peoples to plunge their newborn children into a cold stream, or, as the Celts do, to clothe them in a light wrapper only.

IV. In the Pyrenees—a mountain situated in the Celtic country, towards the equinoctial sunset (i.e. W. of Greece)—the Danube takes its rise and flows through the whole of Europe into the Euxine. Of the other rivers the majority flow northward from the Hercynian Forest, which, both in height and extent, is the greatest mountain in these regions.

Immediately under the Bear (i.e. due north) beyond the extreme limit of Scythia are the Rhiplean mountains, about the size of which the bulk of the stories told are mythical.

V. In the Ligurian territory a river not less than the Rhone sinks under the surface, and rises again in another place. But the river Rhone is navigable.

VI. In Illyria and Thrace and Epirus the asses are small, while in Scythia and in the Celtic countries they are not found at all, for these lands are extremely cold.<sup>1</sup>

VII. Moreover the ass is a frigid animal, and owing to its natural susceptibility to cold, will not exist in cold countries, such as Scythia and the country bordering on it : nor indeed is he found in the Celtic lands beyond Iberia, because of the cold climate of those parts.

VIII. The brave man endures and performs brave deeds from the motive of honour ; but with regard to excess, the man who is fearless to excess has no special name, — because, as we have said before, many qualities are unnamed,—unless we dub him mad or insensible, if he fears nothing whatever, e.g. if he reckes not earthquakes or waves, as is related of the Celts ; but excess of confidence in face of objects of terror is called temerity.

IX. It is clear that the philosopher Aristotle had heard correctly that Rome was taken by the Celts : but he calls its deliverer Lucius, whereas Camillus was not called Lucius but Marcus.<sup>1</sup>

EPHORUS

I. [From the History of Ephorus.] The Indians inhabit the east and the country towards the rising sun ; while the Ethiopians dwell towards the south ; to the west the land is held by the Celts ; and the north is peopled by the Scythians.<sup>2</sup> These tracts, however, are not of equal extent, for those of the Scythians and Ethiopians are the larger, those of the Indians and Celts the less and almost equal in size. For the Indians are between the summer- and winter-

<sup>2</sup> Strabo is incorrect here. He seems to forget that the Celts conquered the Spanish peninsula between B.C. 500 and B.C. 442, and held most of it up to the Carthaginian conquest, B.C. 237. Vide Introduction to Herodotus, p. 30.

sunrisings, and the Celts hold the country from the summer- to the winter-sunsettings, and this is greater by that difference and mostly opposite to it. The territory inhabited by the Scythians occupies the remaining space of the sun's orbit, and is situated opposite to the Ethiopian folk, and appears to extend from the winter sunrisings as far as the shortest sunsettings.

‘ The Ethiopians, most remote of men, are divided in twain,

In his work on Europe Ephorus relates the old opinion about Ethiopia ; that of the four quarters of the heavens and earth, the Indians occupy towards the east, the Ethiopians towards the south, the Celts towards the west, and the Scythians towards the north : he adds that Ethiopia is larger than Scythia, for it seems, he states, that the Ethiopian nation extends from the winter sunrisings to the settings, and that Scythia is situated opposite to this.

II. Ephorus extends the boundaries of Keltica too far,<sup>2</sup> including within it most of what we now name Iberia, as far as the Gades. He states that the people are great admirers of the Greeks,<sup>3</sup> and relates many particulars concerning them not applicable to their present state. This is one:—That they are very careful to avoid growing fat or big-bellied, and that if any young man exceeds the measure of a certain girdle, he is punished.

III. οὐκ ἐν δ' οὐδ' ὁ φήσας ὄπλα αἴρεσθαι πρὸς τὰς πλημμυρίδας τοὺς Κίμβρους, οὐδ' ὅτι ἀφοβίαν οἱ Κελτοὶ ἀσκοῦντες, κατακλυζέσθαι τὰς οἰκίας ὑπομένουσιν, εἴτ' ἀνοικοδομοῦσι, καὶ ὅτι πλείων αὐτοῖς συμβαίνει φθόρος ἐξ ὕδατος ἢ πολέμου, ὅπερ Ἐφορος φησιν.<sup>1</sup> (Strabo, vii. 2.)

THEOPOMPUS

I. Theopompus, ante quem nemo mentionem habuit, urbem (Romam) dumtaxat a Gallis captam dixit. (Pliny, N. H. iii. 9.)

III. Ἐν δὲ τῇ δευτέρᾳ τῶν Φιλιππικῶν “Ἰλλύριοι, φησὶ, δειπνοῦσι καθήμενοι καὶ πίνουσιν· ἄγουσι δὲ καὶ τὰς γυναῖκας εἰς τὰς συνουσίας, καὶ καλὸν αὐταῖς προπίνειν οἷς ἂν τύχῳσι των παρόντων. Διὸ καὶ Κελτοὶ πολεμοῦντες αὐτοῖς, καὶ εἰδότες αὐτῶν τὴν ακρασίαν, παρήγγειλαν ἅπασιν τοῖς στρατιώταις δείπνον

III. Neither is it true, as has been related, that the Cimbri take arms against the flood-tides, nor that the Celts, as an exercise of their intrepidity, suffer their houses to be washed away by them, and afterwards rebuild them; and that a greater number of them perish by water than by war, as Ephorus relates.<sup>1</sup>

THEOPOMPUS

I. Theopompus, who is the first to mention it, B.C. 388. says merely that the city of Rome was captured by the Gauls.

II. When Dionysius was waging war, envoys came from the Gauls, who some months before had set fire to Rome, with the object of making an alliance and friendly understanding with him.

III. In the second book of his History of Philip he says: 'The Illyrians take their meals and drink sitting down. They also bring their women to their gatherings, and the company gallantly toasts the ladies. These lead the men from the feasts: all are of loose morals. They bind their thighs with wide girdles; when they drink they do so at first in moderation, but when they get warm in their cups they narrow down the girdle. They have three hundred thousand dependants answering to the helot-class. They hold drinking bouts every day and indulge to excess in eating and drinking. Accordingly, when making war on them, the Celts, remembering their intemperate habits, prepared a very part is swamp.

PYTHEAS

About the time of the death of Aristotle (B.C. 322) Pytheas of Marseilles sailed round the coast of Spain, along the western seaboard of France, reached and explored the island of Britain, visited the north of Scotland, sailed along the coasts of the Baltic, conversed with the tribes living there, and crowned his daring voyage by the discovery of Thule. At the time of this venturesome expedition the Carthaginians held the secrets of the tin and amber trades, and zealously practising it for its softening effects.

The northern so-called Pillar is in their territory:
it is very high and reaches out into a

190. promontory towards the billowy sea.

The parts in the neighbourhood of the Pillar are inhabited

by the most remote of the Celts and the Eneti and the furthest off of the Istri, who extend inwards as far as the Adriatic.

Hence it is said

195. the Ister has its rise.

226. Beyond the Pelasgi are found the Umbri . . .

* * *

366. Of the Messapii there live . . . [nonnulla desunt]

are said to lead a luxurious life, their style of living resembling most closely that of the Lydians.

Marseilles determined to explore the sources of the enormous wealth of their trade rivals. The services of Euthymenes and Pytheas, two distinguished men of science, were enlisted. Euthymenes was directed to explore the west coast of Africa, while Pytheas was entrusted with the expedition destined to discover to the Greeks the north-west of Europe. On his return from this expedition, Pytheas wrote a detailed account of his voyage, which is known to us only in the quotations of later writers. The date of its publication may be fixed approximately from the fact that, while unknown to Aristotle, it is quoted by his pupil Dicaearchus and seems to have been used by the writer of the Eudemic Ethics. For centuries it remained, with the works of Poseidonius, the chief source of information possessed by the Greeks on the north-west of Europe. The following arrangement of the quotations from Pytheas found in the classic writers gives the probable route of his famous voyage. It is not clear at what point he set out for Thule, nor does it much matter for our present purpose. His voyage to Britain can be reconstructed with tolerable accuracy, but it is difficult to distinguish his account of the island and its inhabitants from that of Poseidonius, which will be found below, and both descriptions should be compared. The visit of Pytheas to the Cimbri is of interest as affording some grounds for believing that the Cimbri spoke a Celtic tongue. The extracts concerning Thule fully establish the accuracy of the account given by Pytheas of his voyage.

The reputation of Pytheas at first stood high; but the Greek romancers seized upon the countries he explored and made them the scenes of absurd wonder-tales. It subsequently became hard to keep the genuine work of Pytheas free from the unfavourable impressions produced by these stories on serious minds ; and when we remember the crude results of the calculations of distances—due to the imperfect methods in vogue at the time of Pytheas—we are prepared for the unfavourable criticisms of Strabo, Polybius, and other writers. In an appendix to this section we indicate where the best known of these romances may be read, but they are of no historical value. those who were tracking him a similar disaster. He himself got away on some timber from the ship, and was indemnified by the state for the cargo he had lost.

II. Eratosthenes writes also that the neighbourhood of the rock of Gibraltar was known as Tartessis, and also Erythia, which may be translated as the Fortunate Island. Artemidorus denies this and writes it down as false, like his other statements; such as, that Cape St. Vincent is five <sup>1</sup> days' sail from Cadiz, when as a matter of fact they are only about one hundred and seventy miles apart: likewise that the current ceases at Cape St. Vincent, whereas it flows round the whole habitable earth:<sup>2</sup> and, too, that it is easier to pass from the northern parts of Iberia into Keltica, than to proceed by sea; and many other things which he asserts on the authority of that charlatan, Pytheas.

Pytheas takes five days to sail from Cadiz to Cape St. Vincent.

III. The Osismii are the people whom Pytheas calls Ostimii;<sup>3</sup> they dwell on a promontory which projects into the ocean to a considerable distance, but not as far as Pytheas and those who follow him assert.

IV. To these must be added the curvature of Europe beyond the Pillars of Hercules (Gibraltar), fronting the Iberians, and running west, not less than three hundred nautical miles, and the headlands, including that of the Ostimii, named Cabaion. We should add also the neighbouring island, the furthest of which is known as Uxisama, and (according to Pytheas) distant three days' sail.

He reaches the isle of Ushant.

V. They say that there is in the ocean, not far from the coast, a small island opposite the mouth of the Loire, which is inhabited by Samnite women. These practise Bacchic rites, and court the favour of the gods by ritual sacrifices. On that island no man must venture; and when the women desire their intercourse, they cross the sea, and, after obtaining it, return again. It is their custom completely to unroof their temple every year, and to re-roof it the same day before sunset. Each woman brings some of the materials, and if any one lets fall her load, she is rent asunder by the others, and her limbs carried round the temple with wild shouts, which are kept up till their fury exhausts itself. It is said that on every occasion some one drops her burden, and is thus sacrificed.

VI. What Artemidorus states concerning the crows is not easily believed. He narrates that on the ocean there is a harbour named the Port of Two Crows, where two white-winged crows may be seen. Disputants resort thither, and each party places a plank covered with crumbs on a lofty eminence. The birds fly to these

<sup>2</sup> This, and the other stories about the rites practised on the isles around Britain, must be rejected as fabulous. Vide Revue Celtique, ix. p. 279, x. p. 352. S. Reinach: Cultes, mythes et religions, t. 1, pp. 195 et seq. It has been generally remarked that Diodorus Siculus, Hecataeus (Abderus), and other compilers nearly always make an island the scene of their fables, and this has suggested the influence of some lost Greek romance περὶ νήσων. Here Mela speaks guardedly, traduntur. M. Salomon Reinach suggests the description of the isle of Ea (Odyssey X) as the prototype of Sena. There Circe, with her nymphs, can command the winds, change men to the shape of beasts, and knows the future, exactly as the virgins on Sena. The Greek geographers were anxious to identify the isle of Ea, and Claudian planks, eat up the crumbs of one and scatter those of the other. He whose crumbs are scattered loses his suit. But this story is too evidently a fiction. What he affirms concerning Ceres and Proserpine is more probable. There is an island, he says, near Britain in which sacrifices to these goddesses are performed in the same way as in Samothrace.

VII. There are some islands in the Celtic regions which are known universally by the name Cassiterides on account of their richness in lead. There is in the British sea an island called Sena, opposite to the shores of the Osismii and famed for its oracle of a Gallic god. It is said that the oracle has nine priestesses who are bound by a vow of perpetual chastity : that the Gauls call them Senae,<sup>1</sup> and believe them to be gifted with remarkable intelligence : that they can raise up the waves of the sea and the winds with their songs ; that they can assume the shape of any animal they choose ; that they can cure complaints that to others are incurable ; and that they know and predict the future.<sup>2</sup> writes that the island on which Ulysses met Circe is in the extremity of Armorica.

Est locus, extremum qua Gallia litus
 Oceani perfusus aquis, ubi fertur Ulysses . . .
 (In Ruf. i. 123.)

We find that the virgins of Sena correspond to Circe and her nymphs, and the island of Sena is like Ea (accepting Claudian's geography) off Armorica. Further, it is remarkable that no other text mentions priestesses among the Gauls, while in the descriptions of the Germans (Caesar, Bell. Gall. vi. 21, and i. 50 ; Tacitus, Hist. iv. 61 ; Germania, 8), who are always implicitly, if not explicitly, contrasted with the Gauls, the priestesses are always mentioned.

Nevertheless, as far as astronomy and mathematics are concerned, he seems to have used these sciences very well; holding that people bordering on the Arctic Circle would not enjoy cultivated fruits; that they would enjoy an abundance of domestic animals, but few others; that their food would consist of millet, vegetables, and fruit and the roots of plants; and that of corn and honey they make a drink; that having no bright sun, they thresh their corn, and store it in vast granaries, for, on account of the rain and want of sun, threshing-floors are of little use to them.

XII. The days are longer than in our southern regions; the nights are lightsome, and, in the northern parts of Britain, so very short, that the interval between the last gleam of day and the returning dawn is scarcely perceptible. When no clouds intervene, they assert that the sun is seen all night long, neither setting nor rising, but always passing above the horizon.

Of Northern Britain.

XIII. The last headland is named Orcas, and, according to the historians, juts out into the middle of the sea. The shortest side of the island is parallel to the continent of Europe, and is seven hundred and fifty nautical miles in length: the second side, from the strait to the apex of the triangle, measures fifteen hundred, and the third side two thousand nautical miles. Thus the whole island is four thousand two hundred and fifty nautical miles in circumference.

Pytheas sails north to Dunnet Head.

XIV. [From the meridian of Meroë] to the parallel of Thule, which Pytheas says is six days' sail north from Britain and near the Frozen Sea, is a distance of about three thousand eight hundred nautical miles.

Sails to Thule in six days.

XV. In far distant Thule <sup>1</sup> at the summer solstice when the sun enters the Constellation of Cancer there is no night, and at the winter solstice there is no day. It is now thirty years since this was related to me by some clerics who had lived on that island from the first of February till the first of August. They also manserunt, quod non solum in aestivo solstitio, sed in diebus circa illud, in vespertina hora sol abscondit se quasi trans parvum tumulum, ita ut nihil tenebrarum in minimo spatio ipso fiat. . . . In medio illius minimi temporis medium noctis fit in medio orbis terrae; et idcirco mentientes falluntur qui circum eam concretum fore mare scripserunt, et qui a vernali aequinoctio usque ad autumnale continuum diem sine nocte atque ab autumnali versa vice usque ad vernale aequinoctium assiduam quidem noctem, dum illi navigantes in naturali tempore magni frigoris eam intrabant ac manentes in ipsa dies noctesque semper praeter solstitii tempus alternatim habebant: sed navigatione minus diei ex illa ad Boream congelatum mare invenerunt.

(Dicuil, de Mensura Orbis, c. 29.)

XVI. Dicitur autem nox eis fieri usque ad unam horam apud quos arcticus est aestivus tropicus; sicut juxta Thylen insulam scribunt per diem et noctem solem super terram ferri: eos enim qui dicunt semestrem diem noctemque aequalem, aut etiam quaedam borealium partium nunquam illuminari solaribus radiis, rationibus aliis demittimus.

XVII. Περὶ τὴν Θούλην καλουμένην νῆσον, ἐν ἣ γεγονέναι φασὶ Πυθέαν τὸν Μασσαλιώτην φιλόσοφον, ὄλον τὸν θερινὸν informed me that, not only at the summer solstice, but also during the days before and after that season, the sun at evening hides as it were beyond a small hill, but in such a way that there is no darkness even over the smallest space. In the middle of this short space of time it is midnight at the equator; and consequently these story-tellers are mistaken who have written that round Thule the sea is frozen; and so also are they who write that from the spring equinox to the autumnal there is continuous day, and on the other hand from the autumnal to the spring equinox there is again continuous night. Those who sailed to and stopped at this island in the season of intense cold found alternate day and night during their stay, except at the time of the solstice; but they found the sea frozen at less than one day's sail northwards.

XVI. Those who live on the arctic tropic (= here, arctic circle) have night lasting up to one hour; just as they write that near Thule the sun goes round the earth without setting day or night. As to those who tell us that there is a day lasting six months and a night of the same length, or, that certain northern lands are never illuminated by the rays of the sun, well, we will dismiss these writers for other reasons.

His description of Thule.

XVII. Concerning the island of Thule, which is said to have been visited by Pytheas the philosopher of Marseilles, a story is told to the effect that the summer sun is above the earth the whole day and coincides

XXI. Thule Belgarum litori opposita est, Graiis et nostris celebrata carminibus. In ea, quod ibi sol longe occasurus exsurgit, breves utique noctes sunt : sed per hiemem, sicut aliubi, obscurae ; aestate lucidae, quod per id tempus jam se altius evehens, with the arctic circle.<sup>1</sup> Further, when the sun is in Cancer the day lasts for a month, provided all the portions of Cancer are constantly visible : otherwise only so far as the sun is in the constantly visible parts.

XVIII. [Pytheas] says, in his treatise on the Ocean, that the Barbarians used to point out to him where the sun sleeps.<sup>2</sup> About these regions they observed that the night grew shorter, in some places lasting two hours, in others three hours, so that after sunset the sun rose again immediately.

XIX. This parallel is  $63^{\circ}$  from the line of the equinox and passes through the island Thule, and this is the first point at which a man's shadow falls on all sides of him. There the summer tropic is always visible.

XX. Thus, according to Strabo, Pytheas describes the island of Thule, and says that no land, no sea, no air exist there, but the three combined there are like the marine jelly-fish. Surrounded as it were with a chain of all three, it is in its nature impassable on foot or by means of a boat.

XXI. Thule, renowned among the Greeks and in our own verses, lies opposite the coast of the Belgi. In this isle the risen sun tarries long before it sets, and the nights are accordingly short. As elsewhere, they are dark in winter and bright in summer, for at this season the sun rises higher, and although not actually <sup>2</sup> This must mean that the Barbarians had observed the spot where the sun disappeared behind the horizon during the short summer nights. This would naturally be taken by them, and by Pytheas, to be the resting-place of the moving sun-god.

XXII. Sic fit ut, vario lucis incremento, in Meroë longissimus dies XII horas aequinoctiales et octo partes unius horae colligat: Alexandriae vero XIV horas: in Italia XV: in Britannia XVII. Ubi aestate lucidae noctes, haud dubie repromittunt id quod cogit ratio credi; solstitii diebus accendente Sole propius verticem mundi, angusto lucis ambitu, subjecta terrae continuos dies habere senis mensibus; noctesque e diverso ad brumam remoto. visible, yet its close brilliancy illuminates the nearest parts. At the solstice there are no nights, for at that period the sun not only shines more distinctly, but also displays the greater part of its orb.

XXII. It thus happens that through the varying increase in the duration of the daylight, the longest day at Meroë is comprised of twelve equinoctial hours and eight parts of an hour; at Alexandria there are fourteen hours; in Italy, fifteen; in Britain, seventeen. Where the nights are bright in summer, they no doubt avow that which reason compels us to believe, viz. that as the sun at the solstice ascends nearer to the pole, going round in a small zone of light, the parts of the earth beneath have continuous day for six months; and in winter the night is of the same duration. Pytheas relates that this occurs on the island of Thule, which is six days' sail northward from Britain.

XXIII. The flows of the tides in the Ocean all cover a greater part of the land than do those of the other sea (Mediterranean). Pytheas of Marseilles says that beyond Britain the tides flow in to a distance of eighty cubits.

XXIV. Thule was seen (by Agricola's fleet), which up to this had lain concealed in winter. Here the sea is said to be sluggish and unyielding to the oar, and never stirred by the breezes. Perhaps the cause of this is the rarity in these regions of the heights and mountains which cause the motions in the air, and also the difficulty of disturbing so vast a mass of water. We

XXV. Multae et aliae circum Britanniam insulae e quibus Thyle ultima, in qua aestivo solstitio, sole de Cancris sidere faciente transitum, nox paene nulla: brumali solstitio dies adeo conductus, ut ortus junctus sit occasui. are not concerned here with any inquiry into the Ocean and its tides ; others have employed themselves on this. I shall add just one observation, that nowhere else does the sea enjoy such power, for here it at one moment receives the waters of many rivers, and at the next forces them back again to their sources ; for it is not on the coast only that the action of the tides is perceptible : the sea forces itself into the recesses of the land, forming bays and islands in the heart of the land, and raging supreme 'mid hills and mountains as if they were its natural home.

XXV. Of the many islands round about Britain Thule is the most remote. Here at the summer solstice when the sun is passing out of Cancer there is scarcely any night ; while at the winter solstice the days are so shortened that the rising and the setting of the sun are almost simultaneous. A two days' sail from the Caledonian promontory in the direction of Thule brings you to the five islands of the Hebrides. Their inhabitants are unacquainted with the cultivated fruits of the earth, and live solely on fish and milk. One king holds sway over them all, for they are divided by only a narrow strait. All property being public, the king has nought of his own. In the administration of justice he is bound by strict laws. And lest avarice should turn him aside from truth, he learns justice from poverty, for he has no private property, but is otherwise provided for from the public funds. He has no wife of his own, but whatever woman attracts his fancy becomes for the time his ; thus neither the desire nor the hope of children is allowed to him. The second calling-point from the continent of Britain is the Orkney Islands. These are a sail of seven days and seven nights beyond the Hebrides, and are three in number. They are uninhabited and woodless. They bristle with a rushlike grass where they are not barren sands. Thule lies from them a voyage of five days and nights. Here, however, is an abundant and continuous supply of fruit. The inhabitants in the early part of spring live among the cattle on fodder ; in the later part of the year they live on milk. For the winter season they lay in a store of the fruits of the trees. They have their women in common, and know no established marriage customs. Beyond Thule is a sluggish and frozen sea.

The entire circuit of Britain is four thousand eight hundred and seventy-five miles. This area contains many fine rivers. The presiding divinity is Minerva, in whose temple are perpetual fires that never brighten into sparks : when the fire is growing dull it turns into stony brocks.<sup>1</sup>

XXVI. Accordingly, the Volcae Tectosages seized on the most productive districts of Germania, which are those around the Hercynian forest, and settled there. This forest was known by report to Eratosthenes and to other Greeks under the name Orcynia. The Volcae Tectosages retain their territories to our time. . . . So neither is the man brave who calmly faces objects of terror through ignorance, as when one through madness defies the thunderbolts ; or, knowing the danger, through spirit and stout-heartedness, as the Celts who take up arms to resist the waves of the sea ; and in general we may say that the barbaric bravery consists in stout-heartedness.

XXXII. It is true that Pytheas of Marseilles affirms that the farthest country north of the British island is Thule; for which place he says the summer tropic and the arctic circle are one and the same. But he gives no other particulars, nor does he say whether Thule is an island, or whether it is habitable up to the point where the summer tropic is identical with the arctic circle. For myself, I fancy the northern boundaries of the habitable earth are very much south of this. Recent writers make mention of nothing beyond Ireland, which is just north of Britain, and where the inhabitants lead a miserable and primitive existence on account of the severe cold. In my opinion the limits of the habitable earth should be fixed here. . . . But the truth is that Pytheas, who so frequently misleads his readers, leads them astray here too.<sup>1</sup>

XXXIV. Quod fabulae locum potissimum dedit, ipsa est Thules historia, quam hodie etiam plerique volunt non esse dictam Islandiam, sed insulam quandam ex Orcadibus, adhaerentes Ptolemaeo, qui eam statuit quatuor gradibus citra Circulum Polarem. Sane vero si nihil terrarum sub eo circulo detectum jam foret, posset Pytheas haberi mendax, referens 'se eo pervenisse, ubi aestivus Tropicus gereret vicem Arctici, hoc est maximi circulorum semper apparentium': et quia jam etiam navigando pervenitur in Islandiam, ubi Tropicus pro Arctico est; quidni habeamus Pythae fidem et hanc Thulen esse credamus, quam sic nominatam primus prodidit? Quem ceteri certe supponunt, aut fingunt, situm non habet hujusmodi; et Cleomedes, melius quam Strabo, Thulen reliquit ubi Pytheas collocasse memorabatur.

XXXIII. [Pytheas] describes Thule and its neighbourhood, where, according to his account, there is neither earth, water, nor air, in a separate state, but a kind of mixture of all three, resembling a jelly-fish, in which earth, water, and air and all things are mixed, thus, as it were, uniting them all together. One cannot travel over it, nor sail through it. He affirms he saw this substance with his own eyes, the other details he gives on hearsay.<sup>1</sup>

XXXIV. The history of Thule has been specially productive of fabulous stories. At the present time many maintain that this is not the island known as Iceland, but one of the Orkneys; and in this they follow Ptolemy, who has placed it four degrees on this side of the polar circle. No doubt Pytheas might be considered a liar if no land had been discovered under the circle, for he asserts that 'he reached this land at the season when the summer tropic was identical with the arctic circle, that is, the greatest circle was constantly visible.' But considering that we can now reach Iceland by ship, where the tropic takes the place of the arctic circle, why should we refuse to trust Pytheas, or to believe in the existence of Thule, which he was the first to mention by name? The identification suggested and advanced by others has not this condition, and Cleomedes, more accurately than Strabo, has left it where Pytheas is said to have placed it. To prevent anyone from

Et ne dubitare quis possit de Pythae sagacitate et solertia, quasi loca citeriora habere potuerit pro eo in quo dies maximus XXIV foret horarum, verba sunt illius apud Geminum, ‘Monstrabant nobis barbari ubi Sol cubaret, &c.’ Quae refero, ut innuam quemadmodum Pythaeas eo paulatim pervenerit ubi nulla tandem nox foret in aestivo solstitio, ac simul insinuem, quam grata esse debeat illius memoria qui primus mortalium tam longe processit. At fabulam sapit ‘neque terram ibi porro esse, neque mare, neque aerem, sed quidpiam ex iis concretum, pulmonis marini simile, &c.’ Sed nota potius hominis fidem, siquidem dixit solum Pythaeas ‘se pulmonis formam vidisse, referre autem cetera quasi auditu solo recepta.’ Addit Strabo dixisse ‘solum ibi Tropicum pro Arctico esse,’ quod superest autem non commemorasse, neque an insula sit Thule, neque utrum habitationes eo usque pertingant, et alia similia; quae, si voluisset imponere, haud dubie profecto scripsisset . . . alia quoque sunt quae improbat Strabo, ut ‘abesse Thulen a Britannia sex dierum navigatione’ (quod Plinius quoque ex Pythaea habet), ‘Cantium Britanniae a Celtica aliquot,’ et ‘Sacrum Promontorium a Gadibus quinque’; sed nimirum videtur Pythaeas conscripsisse totius suae navigationis diarium, commemorasseque quantum temporis inter superandum locorum intervalla consumpsisset. . . . Quomodo doubting the soundness and scientific knowledge of Pytheas, by imagining that, for the land* in which the longest day measures twenty-four hours, he had in mind places situated farther south, we quote his words as found in Geminus, 'The Barbarians showed us where the sun was wont to set. . .' I mention this to suggest how Pytheas might step by step have won the point where there was no night at all; and also to suggest how pleasant the recollection must have been to him who was the first human being to penetrate so far. But he knew that it was a fable to say 'that farther on there was no land, nor sea, nor air, but some mixture of all three, like to a jelly-fish, &c.' Still I would have you notice the candour of the man, for it is only 'the jelly-fish' he says 'he saw himself, while he states that the rest is mere hearsay.' Strabo adds that Pytheas states merely that 'there alone the tropic is identical with the arctic circle,' giving no details as to whether Thule is an island, or as to whether human habitation extends as far as there, or any other information of this kind. If he had desired to impose on people, he would not have failed to furnish all this. Strabo objects also to the other statements, such as, 'that Thule is six days' sail from Britain' (quoted also by Pliny from Pytheas), 'that Cantium in Britain is a few days' sail from the Celtic shore,' and 'that Cape St. Vincent is a voyage of five days from Cadiz.' Pytheas, in fact, appears to have kept a complete diary of his voyage, noting down the time taken by him in covering the distances between the various points, so that it is not Pytheas who is at fault in his diary, but Hipparchus, who, while professing to quote Pytheas, draws his own conclusions, and asserts that the longest day in North Britain contains eighteen hours. In the same way Eratosthenes is at fault in enumerating the neighbours of Britain. Moreover, he argues that the statements of Pytheas concerning the Ostidamnii, Calbium, and Uxisama (Ushant), and other places, are fictitious; and, being unable to overcome his dislike to Pytheas on account of Thule, he calls the man an outrageous liar; and all because the men who had seen Ireland did not relate their impressions of an island of that kind, but only of the other and smaller islands around Britain. But how can we excuse Pytheas when he claims 'to have traversed all Europe to the Ocean, and from Cadiz to the Tanais'<sup>1</sup>? Of course, no one would deny that he might have coasted along Spain, Gaul and Germany, and, perhaps passing by Denmark, have penetrated far into the Baltic sea, which was anciently believed to be the Sarmatician and Hyperborean ocean, and thought also to surround the Scandinavian islands, which are now known to be the continents of Norway and Sweden. But as to his believing that he reached 'as far as the Don,' well, considering the ignorance of the time, how just it is to overlook even this!

GREEK ROMANCES ABOUT NORTHERN EUROPE

Apollonius Rodius, born circa B.C. 260; was a pupil of Callimachus; succeeded Eratosthenes, librarian to Ptolemy Epiphanes, in B.C. 196. Wrote an epic in the style of Homer, known as the Argonautica. He has much to say about the island from which the amber came, about the Hyperboreans, and about the mythical river Eridanos. Beyond emphasising the isolation from the classical world of the races who have left behind them the megalithic monuments, the work is of no historical value, and its geographical notions are grotesque. An edition of the Argonautica was published in 1905 by Teubner.

I. Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, relates that in this campaign the Celts who dwelt on the Adriatic came to Alexander for the purpose of making a treaty of goodwill and 'guest-friendship,' and that the king received them in a friendly manner, and asked them while drinking, what might be the chief object of their dread, expecting that they would say that he himself was; but that they replied that it was no man, but they felt some alarm lest the sky might perhaps fall on them, but that they valued above everything the friendship of so great a man as he.

II. Envoys then came to Alexander from all the autonomous tribes bordering on the Danube, and from Syrmos, king of the Triballi: some came also from the Celts dwelling on the Ionian Gulf. These Celts are large of stature and have no small opinion of themselves. One and all declared that they came desiring the friendship of Alexander. Alexander and the Celts thereupon made mutual agreements. He asked them what was it that they stood most in fear of in human affairs, hoping that his own mighty name had reached the Celts and gone even beyond them, and that they would therefore say that they feared him above all else. But the Celts made an unexpected reply, for, settled far away from Alexander in lands difficult of access, and perceiving that Alexander's expedition was destined for other parts, they declared that their only fear was that the sky should fall on them. Having addressed them as friends and made them allies, he dismissed them, and afterwards expressed his opinion that they were braggarts.

III. When Alexander entered Babylon embassies met him from the Libyans, extolling him and crowning him with garlands on account of his success in winning the empire of Asia; and from Italy, the Brettii, the Leucani and the Turreni sent an embassy for a similar purpose. It is also stated that the Carthaginians sent an embassy at the same time, and that envoys came from the Ethiopians, the European Scythians, the Celts, and the Iberians, soliciting his friendship.

HIERONYMUS OF CARDIA

To Hieronymus of Cardia is almost certainly to be attributed the knowledge we possess of the Galatian incursion into Greece (see J. G. Droysen, Geschichte des Hellenismus, ii. 2, p. 342, note 4, and Müller, Fragmenta Historicorum Fragmenta, vol. ii. pp. 450 et seq.). He was born between B.C. 370 and 360, and lived for more than a hundred years. From his work, which is sometimes described as a continuation of the History of Ptolemy Lagus, Diodorus Siculus and Pausanias drew their accounts of the invasion of Delphi by the Gauls, and these writers agree except in minor points. The accounts by Pausanias and Justin are the fullest, and are quoted below, with notes where they differ from the account given by Diodorus. An excellent commentary on Pausanias by Mr. Frazer is published by Macmillan & Co., London. Justin-Trogus may have had Timagenes before him when writing of the Galati, but Timagenes drew from Hieronymus, or from a contemporary of Hieronymus.

I. These Galati inhabit the remotest parts of Europe on the shore of a great sea, which is not navigable in their neighbourhood: it flows and ebbs, and contains beasts quite unlike those in the rest of the sea.<sup>2</sup> Through their territory flows the river Eridanus, on whose banks people fancy that the daughters of the Sun bewail the fate of their brother Phaethon.<sup>3</sup> The name Galati is of late origin, for originally they were called Celts, both by themselves and by all other peoples.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>4</sup> A significant remark. The Celts who dwelt on the Po and Danube, and spread across Western Europe to the tin mines of Cornwall, were far removed in civilisation from the armed bands of Galati who burst from the east of the Rhine into Italy, &c., in the fourth century B.C. Cf. Bertrand et Reinach, Les Celtes dans les Vallées du Pô, &c., pp. 131, 160.

II. An army of them mustered and advanced towards the Ionian Sea: they dispossessed the Illyrian people and even the Macedonians, as well as all the intervening tribes, and overran Thessaly.<sup>1</sup> When they had reached the vicinity of Thermopylae most of the Greeks remained impassive; for they had been badly used previously by Alexander and Philip, and subsequently Antipater and Cessander had all but ruined Greece, so that no one considered it a personal disgrace to refrain from taking part in the national defence. (2) But the Athenians, although of all the Greeks they were the most exhausted by the long Macedonian war and had suffered very heavily in the battles, nevertheless resolved to advance to Thermopylae under the command of the said Callippus, with such of the Greeks as volunteered. Having seized the narrowest part of the pass they essayed to check the Barbarians' entry into Greece. But the Celts hit upon the defile by which Ephialtes the Trachinian formerly guided the Medes; and after overpowering the Phocians who were posted on it, they crossed Mount Etna unobserved by the Greeks. (3) Then it was that the Athenians won the esteem of all Greece, for surrounded on both sides they kept the Barbarians at bay. But their comrades on the ships had the hardest task; for at Thermopylae the Lamian Gulf is a swamp, the cause of which, it seems to me, is the warm water that here flows into the sea. This entailed much labour on them; for when they had taken their fellow-Greeks on board, they were obliged to make headway through the mud in ships laden down with armour and men. Thus they endeavoured to save the Greeks in the way I have described. (4) But the Galati were inside of Pylae; and, not bothering about taking the other towns, they were bent on plundering Delphi and the treasures of the god. The Delphians, and those of the Phocians who inhabit the cities in the neighbourhood of Parnassus, drew up in battle array against the Galati; there also came a force of Aetolians, for in those days the Aetolians were renowned for youthful vigour. But when they joined in battle, thunderbolts and rocks, breaking away from Parnassus, rolled down upon the Galati; and dreadful phantoms of men in arms arose against the Barbarians. They say that two of these ghostly warriors, Hyperochus and Amedocus, came from the Hyperboreans, and that the third was Pyrrhus the son of Achilles.<sup>1</sup> For this assistance the Delphians offer sacrifice to Pyrrhus, though formerly they held his very tomb in dishonour as that of a foe. (5) Most of the Galati crossed to Asia Minor in ships and plundered its sea-coast. Some time afterwards the people of Pergamus,—once named Teuthrania,—cleared the Galati off the sea, and drove them into the country now called Galatia.<sup>2</sup> They captured the Phrygian city Ancyra,—founded, in times gone by, by Midas, son of Gordius,—and took possession of the land beyond the Sangarius. The anchor, found by Midas, still exists there. They say that Midas mixed wine with the water of the fountain

III. Ptolemy would have hastened in pursuit, but was unable owing to the following incident. When making his preparations to resist the attack of Magus, he engaged, among other mercenaries, four thousand Galati; but he discovered that they were plotting to seize Egypt, and conducted them to a barren isle on the river, where they perished by one another's swords and through hunger.

IV. When he (Pyrrhus) had rested his army after their discomfiture in Italy, he declared war against Antigonus, because he had failed to support him in Italy, and for other offences. He routed the forces of Antigonus and his Gallic mercenaries, and drove them into the cities on the sea-coast, while he made himself master of Upper Macedonia and Thessaly.<sup>2</sup> The importance of the battle and the decisive nature of the victory of Pyrrhus are best shown by the Celtic arms dedicated in the temple of Athena of Itonia, between Pherae and Larisa, and bearing the following inscription :

'Pyrrhus the Molossian king dedicated these shields as a gift to Athena of Itonia :

From the intrepid Gauls he won them on the day on which he overthrew the whole

Force of Antigonus. And no wonder, for the Aeacids are warriors now as of old.'

V. Seleucus had with him an army composed of Greeks and Barbarians. When he had advanced to Lysimachia he was assassinated by Ptolemy, brother of Lysandra. This Ptolemy had fled to him from Lysimachus, and from his reckless character was named Thunderbolt. The assassin gave up the treasures to the guards to plunder, and ruled Macedonia until, venturing to give battle to the Galati— B.C. 281. and he was the first king we know of who did so—he perished at the hands of the Barbarians.<sup>1</sup> Antigonus the son of Demetrius then regained the throne.

VII. In my description of the Council Chamber at Athens I gave an account of the invasion of Greece by the Galati; but I thought it best to reserve the more detailed account for my description of Delphi, because this was the scene of the fiercest struggle between the Greeks and the Barbarians. The first expedition of the Celts from their country was under the leadership of Cambaules. On that occasion they penetrated as far as Thrace, but did not venture any further, as they realised that their numbers were too scanty to cope with the Greeks. But when a second expedition was resolved upon—chiefly at the instigation of those who had accompanied Cambaules, and Fuller account of expedition against Delphi.

in whom the gains of that looting had awakened a love of plunder and booty—a large force of infantry and of cavalry assembled. The leaders consequently made three divisions of the army, and each set out for a different country. Cerethrius was to advance against the Thracians and the Triballi; Brennus and Acichorius commanded the army marked out to attack Paeonia; while Bolgius was to march against the Macedonians and Illyrians. The latter fought an engagement with Ptolemy, then king of Macedonia. This was the man who, while a refugee at the court of Seleucus, son of Antiochus, assassinated his protector, and whose violence earned him the nickname of Thunderbolt. Ptolemy and a large number of the Macedonian army fell in this battle; still the Celts did not dare to venture further into Greece, and so the second expedition returned home again.

Hereupon Brennus, at public assemblies and in private interviews with the chief men of the Galati, energetically advocated an expedition against Greece, pointing out her weakness at the time, the wealth of her communities, and the immense treasures in her temples, in the shape of offerings in gold and silver coin. In such manner did he prevail upon the Galati to march once more upon Greece, and among the chieftains he chose to be his colleagues Acichorius was found once more.<sup>1</sup> force of the cavalry, but as each trooper had two servants, who were themselves good horsemen and provided with a horse, the actual cavalry strength was sixty-one thousand two hundred. The cavalry tactics of the Galati are as follows: the servants remain in the rear close at hand; if a trooper had his horse killed, the servant brought him a fresh mount; if the trooper himself was slain, the man mounted his master's horse; and if this man too fell, the third servant in turn took his place in the fight. If the master was wounded, one of the servants conveyed him to the camp, while the other took his place in the ranks. The tactics, it seems to me, were adopted by the Galati from the Persian corps of the Ten Thousand, known as the Immortals, but with this difference: in the Persian corps the reserve fell in after the engagement, while with the Galati the reserve took its place as wanted during the action, and thus kept up the full strength in the battle. This organisation they called in their own tongue trimarcisia<sup>1</sup>; for the Celtic word for a horse is marca. Such was the force and such were the objects with which Brennus invaded Greece.

Their tactics.

Perrot (Revue Celtique, ii. 179) shows that St. Jerome is untrustworthy on points of this kind.

them to defend their country. They perceived that it was not merely their liberty which was now at stake, as at the time of the Persian war, but that security could not be purchased even by submission, for they had before their eyes the fate that had overtaken Macedonia, Thrace, and Paeonia, during the previous inroads of the Galati, and reports were reaching them of the atrocities that even then were being perpetrated on the Thessalians. All now recognised that the alternatives to be faced were death or victory.<sup>1</sup>

(2) Perhaps we may here compare the numbers that met King Xerxes at Thermopylae, and the force that now fought against the Galati. To meet the Medes the following Greek forces assembled: Lacedaemonians under Leonidas, not more than three hundred; Tegeans, five hundred; from Mantinea, the same number; from Orchomenus, in Arcadia, one hundred and twenty; from the other cities in Arcadia, one thousand; from Mycenae, eighty; from Phlius, two hundred; double that number from Corinth; and of the Boeotians there came forward seven hundred from Thespieae, and four hundred from Thebes. One thousand Phocians guarded the path on Mount Oeta: their number should be added to the total of the Greek force. The number of Locrians who dwelt under Mount Cnemis is not stated by Herodotus, though he states that every city contributed; but it is possible to make a close approximation; for the number of Athenians who marched to Marathon, inclusive of slaves and those unfit for service through age, did not exceed nine thousand ; therefore, the fighting force of Locrians at Thermopylae cannot be reckoned at more than six thousand. Thus the whole army may have numbered eleven thousand two hundred. But even that force did not remain in arms the whole time at Thermopylae, for with the exception of the Lacedaemonians themselves, the Thespians, and the Mycenaeans, they did not wait to see the issue of the fight.

To meet the Barbarians who had come from the Ocean the following Greek forces marched to Thermopylae. Ten thousand heavy armed infantry and five hundred horse from Boeotia : the Boeotardis were Cephisodotus, Thearidas, Diogenes and Lysander. From Phocis, five hundred horse and three thousand foot, under the command of Critobulus and Antiochus. The Locrians who dwell opposite the island of Atalanta were led by Midias : they numbered seven hundred, but had no cavalry. From Megara there came four hundred heavy foot : Megareus led their cavalry. The Aetolian force was very numerous, and included horse and foot. The strength of their cavalry is not given. Their light infantry numbered ninety, and their heavy infantry amounted to seven thousand. Polyarchus, Polyphron, and Lacrates were their leaders. The general of the Athenians was Callippus, son of Moerocles, as mentioned previously ; and the Athenians had all their seaworthy galleys, five hundred horse, and one thousand foot. In virtue of their ancient prestige they held the command. The kings of Macedonia and Asia contributed five hundred mercenaries each : the force sent by Antigonus was led by Aristodemus, a Macedonian : the Asiatic contingent from Antiochus was under Telesarchus, a native of the district of Syria on the Orontes.

When the Greeks who were marshalled at Thermopylae learned that the army of the Galati had reached the neighbourhood of Magnesia and Phthiotis, they decided to send a detachment of one thousand picked light-armed foot and a company of horse to the river Spercheus, to dispute the passage of the river. On reaching the river they broke down the bridges and encamped on the bank. But Brennus was no incompetent leader, and, for a Barbarian, by no means a poor strategist. Accordingly, that very night he dispatched a force, not to the places where the old bridges had stood, but lower down the river, so that they might effect a passage unobserved by the Greeks. Here the Spercheus spreads its waters over the plain, forming a marsh and lagoon instead of a narrow rapid stream. Thither, then, Brennus dispatched some ten thousand Galati who could swim and were taller than their fellows ; and of all the races in the world the Celts are by far the tallest. They crossed the river in the night by swimming the lagoon, and using their national shields as a sort of raft. The tallest of them were able to wade across. When the Greeks at the Spercheus heard that a detachment of the enemy had crossed the river, they at once fell back on the main body.

dwelt round the Malian Gulf to throw bridges over the Spercheus. This they lost no time in doing, for they were urged on by a dread of Brennus and a desire to get the Barbarians out of their country, and thus save it from any further ruin. Brennus then led his army across the bridges and marched on Heraclea. The Galati did not reduce this city, but they plundered the district, and slew all the men they caught in the fields. During the previous year the Aetolians had compelled the Heracleans to join their League, and now they protected the town as if it belonged as much to them as to its inhabitants, and saved it. But Brennus cared little about Heraclea : his whole heart was set on dislodging the enemy from the passes, and penetrating south of Thermopylae into the centre of Greece.

(2) He therefore advanced from Heraclea, and, on being informed by deserters of the strength of the Greek contingents at Thermopylae, in utter contempt of the Greek army, he offered battle at sunrise on the following day. He had no Greek seer with him, and he consulted no omens, if indeed the Celts practise any art of divination.<sup>1</sup> The Greeks advanced in silence and in good order. On joining battle the infantry preserved their formation by not charging out of the ranks, while the skirmishers, standing their ground, hurled darts and plied their arrows and slings. The cavalry on both sides was useless ; for not only is the pass narrow, but the ground is smooth owing to its rocky nature, and slippery owing to the many streams that intersect it. The Galati were inferior as regards armour, for their only defensive weapon was their national shield; moreover, they were less experienced in the science of war. They rushed on their enemy with the rage and fury and blind courage of a wild beast. Hacked with swords and axes, and pierced with darts and javelins, their fury only died with life itself. Nay, some even plucked out the weapons that struck them and hurled them back at the Greeks, or used them in hand-to-hand fight. Meanwhile the Athenians, with much difficulty and danger, navigated their fleet over the mud that accumulates in great quantities in that sea, and coming as close up as they could to the rear of the Barbarians, raked their flank with a fire of all kinds of missiles and arrows. The Celts were now exhausted: on the narrow ground they received far heavier losses than they could inflict; and, at last, their leaders gave the signal to retire to the camp. A disorderly and confused retreat ensued, during which many were trampled under foot by their companions, and many were submerged in the mud into which they were pushed, till the losses in the retreat were as heavy as in the heat of the action.

of fighting.

(3) On that day the Athenian troops surpassed in valour all the rest of the Greeks; but the bravest of them was Cydias, a youth who then for the first time took his place in a battle. He was slain by the Galati, and his kinsmen dedicated his shield to Zeus of Freedom with the following inscription:—

Ἡ μάλα δὴ ποθέουσα νέαν ἔτι Κυδιόν ἤβην
 Ἄσπις ἀριζήλου φωτὸς, ἄγαλμα Διῖ, Ἄς διὰ δὴ πρώτας λαιὸν ποτε πῆχυν ἔτεινε,

youth,

This inscription was preserved till the shields in the colonnade of Zeus of Freedom, with other noteworthy things at Athens, were removed by the soldiers of Sulla.

(4) After the battle of Thermopylae the Greeks buried their dead, and stripped the spoils off the Galati. But the Galati not only made no request for permission to bury their dead, but were even quite indifferent as to whether they were buried or devoured by wild beasts and the birds that feed on corpses. Their indifference as to the burial of their dead was due, in my opinion, to two causes : a wish to strike awe into the enemy by such callous conduct, and the fact that they do not customarily mourn their dead. Forty of the Greeks fell in the battle : the exact losses of the Barbarians cannot be ascertained, for a great number of them were lost in the mud.

their dead.

X. (1) On the sixth day after the battle a detachment of Galati attempted to ascend Mount Oeta from Heraclea by a narrow path that leads up the mountain just beyond the ruins of Trachis. In those days, above the territory of Trachis, there was a sanctuary of Athena rich in votive offerings. The Barbarians hoped to ascend Mount Oeta by this path, and to plunder the temple by the way. But the garrison under the command of Telesarchus defeated them; Telesarchus, however, was slain—a Greek patriot if ever there was one.

(2) All the Barbarian leaders, except Brennus, were unmanned by the Greek success, and seeing that their expedition made no progress they were perplexed as to the future. But it occurred to Brennus that if he forced the Aetolians to return home, the operations against the remaining Greeks would be much easier. He detached from his army a force of forty thousand foot and some eight hundred horse, and placed these picked men under the command of Orestorius and Combutis. These troops marched back by the bridges over the Spercheus, and, passing through Thessaly, invaded Aetolia. The sack of Callium by Combutis and Orestorius was the most atrocious and inhuman in history. The whole male population was put to the sword, old men and babes at their mothers' breasts were butchered alike. They even drank the blood, and ate the flesh of the fattest of the babies. All the matrons and marriageable maidens who had a spark of spirit put an end to their lives when the town was captured; those who survived were forcibly subjected to every species of outrage by beings who were absolutely devoid of pity and all human feelings. Some of the women met a voluntary death by rushing on the swords of the Galati, the rest soon perished from want of food and sleep, the ruthless Barbarians outraging them in turn, and glutting their lust on the persons of even the dying and dead.

(3) Informed by messengers of the calamities that had befallen their kin, the Aetolians set out with all speed from Thermopylae and hastened into Aetolia, deeply incensed by the sufferings at the sack of Callium, and still more anxious to save the town that had not yet fallen. From all their houses the young men poured out; the old men too, roused by the emergency, joined with them; nay, the very women, whose fury against the Galati exceeded that of the men, volunteered their services.

(4) Before setting out on their return march the Barbarians pillaged the houses and sanctuaries, and fired the town of Callium. Then they were met by the Patreans, who were the only Achaeans who came to the support of the Aetolians. The Patreans, being excellent as heavy infantry, made a frontal assault on the Galati, but suffered heavily from the numbers and desperate valour of the Barbarians. The Aetolians, on the other hand, both men and women, lined the whole road, and kept up an effective fire of weapons on the Barbarians, who had only their national shields for protection. When the Galati pursued them they easily escaped, and then, when their enemy was returning from their vain pursuit, they renewed the attack with vigour. Hence dreadful as had been the fate of Callium—so dreadful, indeed, that in its light Homer's story of the combat between the Laestrygones and the Cyclops seems hardly exaggerated—it was adequately avenged ; for of the forty thousand eight hundred Barbarians less than half returned alive to the camp at Thermopylae.

(5) Meanwhile the Greeks at Thermopylae fared as follows. There are two paths over Mount Oeta : one, starting above Trachis, is very steep and precipitous ; the other, leading through the territory of the Aenianians, is more suitable for an army. This is the path by which Hydarnes, the Mede, on a former occasion turned the flank of the forces under Leonidas, and it was by this same pass that the Heracleots and Aenianians now proposed to guide Brennus, not indeed out of any want of sympathy with the Greeks, but merely because they desired above all else to rid their district of the presence of the Celts, which threatened their utter ruin. The words of Pindar are indeed true, that every man is affected by his own troubles but is insensible to the woes of others. The promise of the Aenianians and Heracleots encouraged Brennus, who thereupon left Acichorius in command of the army with instructions to attack the Greek force when he himself had got to their rear. Then at the head of forty thousand men he set off up the path. It chanced that on that day a thick mist came over the mountain, darkening the sun, so that the Phocians posted on the pass did not notice the approach of the Barbarians till they were close on them. Attacked by the enemy, the Phocians defended themselves with spirit, but were at last overpowered and driven from the pass. They succeeded, however, in reaching the main force in time to warn them of what was taking place before they were completely surrounded. Thus the Athenian fleet had time to transport the Greek army from Thermopylae; and so the men dispersed to their respective districts.

XII. (1) Brennus, without even waiting for the forces under Acichorius, made straight for Delphi. The terrified inhabitants fled to the oracle, and the god bade them to have no fear, 'for,' he replied, 'I will myself guard my own.'

March direct

(2) The Greeks who rallied to the defence of the god were as follows: The Phocians, who mustered from all their towns; four hundred infantry from Amphissa; and a very meagre company from Aetolia at first, but when they learned of the advance of the Barbarians, they dispatched twelve hundred men under Philomelus. The flower of the Aetolian troops, however, advanced against the army under Acichorius, and without giving battle hung on his rear, capturing his baggage and cutting off the men in charge of it, thus seriously impeding his march. He had, besides, left a force at Heraclea to guard the spoils there.

(3) Meanwhile the Greeks who had mustered at Delphi drew up in order of battle against the army of Brennus. And, lo! in the most unmistakable manner the god by signs and wonders marked his hostility to Brennus. In the first place the ground occupied by the Galatian army trembled violently during most of the day; then thunder rolled and lightning flashed without respite, which stupefied the Celts and prevented them from hearing the words of command; while the lightning not only struck down isolated individuals, but set on fire all about them, men and arms alike. Then there appeared to them phantoms of the heroes<sup>1</sup> Hyperochus, Lao-docus, and Pyrrhus, and some will add a fourth, to wit, Phylacus, a local hero of Delphi. Many of the Phocians fell in the action, and amongst them Alexamachus, who more than any other Greek brought death to the Barbarians that day by his youthful strength and daring courage. The Phocians afterwards had his statue dedicated to Apollo at Delphi. Such was the terror that beset the Barbarians that long day; and during the night their plight was even worse. It was bitterly cold and snowed hard, and great boulders, slipping down from Parnassus, with huge crags breaking off, seemed to make straight for the Barbarians, crushing to death in one onset, not one or two, but thirty or more, as they chanced to be gathered together on watch, or in slumber.

(4) At break of day the Greeks advanced from Delphi. All marched direct upon them except the Phocians, who were familiar with the ground. These descended the steep slopes of Parnassus through the snow, and falling unexpectedly on the rear of the Celts, discharged their darts and arrows on the Barbarians in perfect security. -At first—despite the cross-fire, and the bitter cold, that told on them no less severely than did the arrows of their enemies, especially on the wounded—the Celts fought with conspicuous bravery, notably the guard of Brennus,<sup>1</sup> the finest and bravest men of them all. But when Brennus was wounded and carried fainting off the field, the Barbarians, beset on all sides, sorely against their will beat a retreat, dispatching those of their companions who by reason of their wounds and exhausted condition could not join in the retreat. (5) These fugitives bivouacked on the spot where night overtook them. During the night a new terror seized them: groundless fears they say are inspired by Pan. It was late in the evening when the panic first arose in the army, and at first it was confined to a few who fancied that they detected the trampling of charging horses and the onset of the enemy; but soon the alarm spread through the whole army. They snatched up their weapons and dealt out death to one another. They did not recognise their own language, nor one another's features, nor the shape of their shields; each one in his alarm fancying that his adversary was a Greek, that his armour was Greek, and that his tongue was Greek. Thus the god-inspired panic wrought horrible mutual slaughter in the Celtic force. The Phocians who were left in the fields to guard the cattle were the first to notice and report to the Greeks what had befallen the Barbarians during the night. This nerved the Phocians to press the Celts more vigorously than ever, and to strengthen their guards on the cattle, so that the Celts might not get supplies without a hard struggle. This produced a scarcity of corn and all other necessaries in the Galatian army.

(6) The losses in Phocis amounted to nearly six thousand in battle, over ten thousand in the cruel winter night and its panic, and as many more from famine.

(7) Some Athenians who had gone to Delphi to reconnoitre brought back an account of what had befallen the Barbarians, and of the panic the god had inspired among them. On receipt of this news the Athenians marched through Boeotia, where the Boeotians joined them. Their united forces hung on the march of the Barbarians, lying in ambush for them, and cutting off the stragglers. The fugitives with Brennus had been joined by the army under Acichorius only the night before ; for the advance of the latter had been made tedious by the Aetolians, who hurled freely at them javelins and all kinds of weapons that came to their hands, so that only a small part of them escaped to the camp at Heraclea.

(8) Brennus, they say—although his wounds were not of a fatal character—either through fear of his countrymen, or perhaps rather through wounded pride at being the author of this disastrous campaign in Greece, put an end to his life by drinking neat wine.<sup>1</sup> Eventually the Barbarians, with no little difficulty, made their way to the river Spercheus, hotly pressed by the Aetolians. (9) The expedition of the Celts into Greece and their annihilation took place when Anaxicrates was archon at Athens, in the second year of the hundred and twenty-fifth Olympiad, in which Ladas of Aegium won the footrace. Next year, in the archonship of Democles at Athens, the Celts crossed into Asia. I have faithfully set out the course of events.

XIII. Having imposed their yoke on the Pannonians the Galati engaged in warfare for many years with their neighbours. Encouraged by their good fortune, they betook themselves in hordes, some to Greece and some to Macedonia, laying waste all before them with the sword. Such was the terror of the Gallic name that Kings, even before they were attacked, bought peace with large sums of money.

XIV. Ptolemy, King of Macedonia, was the one man who heard unmoved of the approach of the Gauls. The distracted butcher, thinking war required no more preparation than murders, went out to meet them with a few undisciplined troops. . . . The Gauls, under the command of Belgius, sent ambassadors to Ptolemy to discover the feeling among the Macedonians, and to offer peace if he elected to purchase it; but Ptolemy vaunted to his suite that the Gauls sued for peace from fear of war. Before the ambassadors he was no less boastful, and declared that he would grant peace only on the condition that they gave their chiefs as hostages, and delivered up their arms: for he could put no trust in them until they were disarmed. On the announcement of this answer by the deputies, the Gauls laughed, and remarked that he would soon see whether they had offered peace for his sake or for their own. A few days later the Macedonians were defeated and cut to pieces in a battle. Ptolemy, severely wounded, was captured; his severed head was placed on a lance, and carried round the whole army to strike terror into the enemy. A few of the Macedonians found safety in flight; the rest were captured or slain.<sup>1</sup>

XV. When this news was spread throughout Macedonia, the gates of the cities were shut, and mourning filled all the land. . . . While all were thus in despair, Sosthenes, one of the Macedonian chiefs, thinking that nothing would be effected by prayers, mustered the young men fit to bear arms, repulsed the Gauls in the midst of their exultations on their victory, and saved Macedonia from devastation. For these great services he was chosen before many nobles who aspired to the Macedonian throne, although he was of but humble extraction. He was saluted as King by the army, yet nevertheless he made the soldiers take an oath to him, not as King, but as general.

irruption into Greece, heard of the success of the division which, under Belgius, had defeated the Macedonians; and incensed that so rich a booty, consisting of the spoils of the East, had been carelessly abandoned, assembled an army of 150,000 foot and 15,000 horse, and suddenly invaded Macedonia. As he was laying waste the fields and villages, Sosthenes met him with his army of Macedonians in full array, but their inferior numbers and faint hearts fell an easy prey to the numerous and fearless Gauls. The vanquished Macedonians retired behind their city walls, while the victorious Brennus, meeting with no opposition, ravaged the whole of Macedonia. Then, as though the spoils of mortals were too mean for him, he turned to the temples of the gods with the profane jest: that the gods, being rich, ought to be liberal to men. He suddenly, therefore, marched on Delphi, putting plunder before religion, and risking the wrath of the gods for gold. The gods, he said, stood in no need of riches, for they were accustomed rather to bestow them on mortals.<sup>1</sup>

XVII. After peace was made between the two kings, Antigonus and Antiochus, a new enemy suddenly confronted Antigonus as he was returning to Macedonia. The Gauls, whom Brennus had left behind him to defend their frontiers when he set out for Greece, in order not to appear idle, armed 15,000 foot and 3,000 horse. They routed the forces of the Getae and Triballi, and were making preparations to invade Macedonia when they sent Ad postremum integris et intactis munimentis scrutantes potius quam diripientis castra occupaverunt. Tunc ablatis quae invenerant, ad litus convertuntur. ambassadors to Antigonus to offer him peace if he would pay for it, and at the same time to act as spies in his camp. Antigonus, with kingly generosity, invited them to a sumptuous banquet. . . . The ambassadors on their return set forth with much exaggeration the wealth and unsuspecting nature of the King. . . .

XVIII. This story was sufficient to urge this covetous people to seize the booty. The example of Belgius, too, had its influence with them, who, a little before, had cut to pieces the Macedonian army and their King. With the consent of all they attacked the King's camp at night; but, foreseeing the storm that threatened him, the King had ordered his soldiers to remove all their baggage, and to conceal themselves noiselessly in a neighbouring wood. Finding the camp not only without defenders, but even without sentinels, the Gauls suspected a stratagem rather than a flight, and for some time hesitated to enter the gates. Finally, leaving the defences entire and untouched, they took possession of the camp, more after the fashion of explorers than of plunderers. Then, carrying off what they found there, they proceeded towards the coast. Here, while they plundered the vessels without taking precautions, and when they least feared an attack, they were cut down by the sailors and part of the army that had fled thither with their wives and children. Such was the slaughter among them that the report of this success secured peace for Antigonus, not only from the Gauls, but also from his other fierce neighbours.

Denique neque reges Orientis sine mercenario Gallorum exercitu ulla bella gesserunt; neque pulsi regno ad alios quam ad Gallos confugerunt. Tantus terror Gallici nominis et armorum invicta felicitas erat, ut aliter neque maiestatem suam tutari neque amissam recuperare se posse sine Gallica virtute arbitrarentur. Itaque in auxilium a Bithyniae rege invocati, regnum cum eo, parta victoria, diviserunt; eamque regionem Gallograeciam cognominaverunt.<sup>1</sup>

XIX. The Gallic people were at that time so prolific that they filled Asia as with one swarm. Then, indeed, no Eastern king carried on a war without Gallic mercenaries; nor, if they were driven from their thrones, did they seek any protection but that of the Gauls. Such was the terror of the Gallic name, and such the unbroken success of their arms, that princes believed that without the aid of the Gaul's valour they could neither maintain their power, nor, if lost, recover it. Thus it was that, on being summoned to the aid of the King of Bithynia and having brought him victory, they shared his kingdom with him, and called their part Gallograecia.<sup>1</sup>

TIMAEUS

Timaeus was born in Sicily about B.C. 354. He spent most of his life in Athens, where he died about B.C. 256. He was an industrious writer and composed a history which treated in the first part of Italy and Sicily, and in the second, of Sicily and Greece. It ran into some seventy-six books, of which only fragments remain to us. These are collected in C. and Th. Müller's Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, vol. i. pp. l-liv, 193-233. He seems to have followed Pytheas in his description of Northern Europe.

I. Many historians, both ancient and modern, including Timaeus, maintain that when the Argonauts had won the golden fleece they learnt that Aeetes was blockading the Black Sea, and that this circumstance was the occasion of an unusual and notable action on their part: they penetrated to the sources of the Tanais, and drawing their ship to land, carried it to another river which discharged itself into the Ocean, and thus they regained the sea: with the land on their left, they continued their voyage from the north to the west, and came to the straits of Gibraltar, where they entered the Mediterranean. And to convince one of this, the historians add that the Celts who dwell on the shores of the Ocean pay homage especially to the Dioscuri : <sup>1</sup> for there is a tradition among these peoples that in olden times these gods came to them from the Ocean.

ERATOSTHENES

Eratosthenes was librarian at Alexandria B.C. 247-222. He made a Greek translation of Himilco's work (v. supra, pp. 9-13), and also commented on the works of Pytheas, in whom he had much confidence. His only knowledge of the Celts was derived from these writers and has been already dealt with.

<sup>1</sup> In the Musée Cluny is an altar on which is represented two gods which probably correspond to the Castor and Pollux of Roman mythology. Their Celtic names are respectively Cernunnos and Smertullos: cf. Corpus Inscriptionum Latinorum, xiii. p. 467, No. 3026 c. These gods appear in old Irish literature: vide Whitney Stokes, in Revue Celtique, iii. p. 175. Also see Arbois de Jubainville, Cours de littérature celtique, v. pp. 347-353, and pp. 253-254: cf. Ancient Laws of Ireland, vol. iii. p. 84.

II. According to Timaeus the country is called Galatia after Galatos, the son of the Cyclops and Galatia.

Polybius and Strabo criticise him for not mentioning the Celts in his description of Spain. But he is evidently dealing with the Spain of Himilco of B.C. 500. When describing the Spain of his own time, he says that it was held by the Celts with the exception of Cadiz. For references to Eratosthenes in other writers see Index sub Eratosthenes.

PHYLARCHUS

Phylarchus was born probably at Naucratis in Egypt about B.C. 210. He wrote a history in twenty-eight books dealing with the events between the death

I. Ἐν δὲ τῇ τρίτῃ ὁ αὐτὸς Φύλαρχος Ἀριάμνην φησὶ τὸν Γαλάτην πλουσιώτατον ὄντα ἐπαγγέλλασθαι ἐστιᾶσαι Γαλάτας πάντας ἐνιαυτὸν, καὶ τοῦτο συντελέσαι ποιήσαντα οὕτως· κατὰ τόπους τῆς χώρας τὰς ἐπικαιροτάτας τῶν ὁδῶν διέλαβε σταθμοῖς, ἐπὶ τε τούτοις ἐκ χαράκων καὶ τῶν καλάμων τῶν τε οἰσύνων ἐπεβάλλετο σκηναὺς χωρούσας ἀνὰ τετρακοσίους ἄνδρας, καὶ πλείους ἔτι, καθὼς ἂν ἐκποιῶσιν οἱ τόποι τό τ' ἀπὸ τῶν πόλεων δέξασθαι, καὶ τῶν κωμῶν μέλλον ἐπιρῥεῖν πλῆθος. I. In his third book Phylarchus writes that 'Ariamnes the Galatian, a man of fabulous wealth, publicly proclaimed that he would give a banquet every year to all the Galati, which he did in the following manner. He divided out the country by marking off convenient distances along the roads. At these points he built halls of timber, rushes, and osiers, capable of accommodating four hundred men, or more, according as the district and the towns and villages near it might require. In the hall he placed huge kettles full of every sort of meat. The kettles were made the year before he was to give the feast by artisans sent from other cities. He then provided many oxen, pigs, sheep, and other animals for each day, and also casks of wine, and a large supply of flour. And not only,' he continues, 'did all the Galati who came from the villages and cities enjoy his hospitality, but even the strangers, who chanced to pass by, were not permitted escape, for the servants who stood round pressed them to enter and partake of the good things provided.'

II. Among the Galati, Phylarchus states in his sixth book, it is customary to place on the table a large number of loaves broken carelessly, and meat

FABIUS PICTOR

Q. Fabius Pictor was born B.C. 254. He served in the Gallic war of B.C. 225, and was the first Roman to write a history of his native city. The fragments of this work are collected by H. Peter in his Historicorum Romanorum Reliquiae and also in his Historicorum Romanorum Fragmenta.

I. Oros. iv. 13, 5. L. Aemilio Catulo C. Atilio Regulo consulibus magna formidine consternatus est senatus defectione Cisalpinæ Galliae, cum etiam ex ulteriore Gallia ingens aduentare exercitus nuntiaretur, maxime Gaesatorum, quod nomen non genūis sed mercennariorum Gallorum est. Itaque permoti consules totius Italiae ad praesidium imperii contraxere vires.

just taken out of the kettle. No one touches this without first waiting to see if the king partakes of what is brought to him.

III. Phylarchus, the Athenian (some, indeed, say he is a native of Naucratis), in the work in which he treats of Zelas the king of the Bithynians, who invited to supper all the leaders of the Galati, and then plotted against them but was himself killed also, says, if I recollect his works correctly, 'a certain προπομα B.C. 236. was brought round before supper, as a time-honoured custom prescribed.'

His work was largely used by later historians, especially for the history of the Second Punic War (B.C. 219–202), but as the classical writers did not acknowledge their sources except in a general way, it is not possible to determine their exact obligations to Pictor.

I. In the consulship of L. Aemilius Catulo and C. Atilius Regulus the Senate was greatly perturbed by the revolt of Cisalpine Gaul. The news came that a formidable army consisting chiefly of Gaesati was advancing from Further Gaul. 'Gaesati' is not a national name but a word for Gallic mercenaries.<sup>1</sup> The consuls in alarm called out the whole strength of Italy for the defence of the empire, so that in the

In the consulship of L. Aemilius immense bands of Gauls crossed the Alps, but the whole of Italy united with Rome, and Fabius the historian, who took part in this war, writes that eight hundred thousand men were levied for this campaign, which was conducted so successfully by the consul that forty thousand of the enemy were slain, and a triumph granted to Aemilius.

POLYBIUS

Polybius (born circa 203 B.C., died circa 121 B.C.) is the most important and trustworthy authority we have for the history of the period of which he treats.

For him the object of historical study was the discovery of the truth;<sup>1</sup> thus only could history become a guide to statesmen and people.<sup>2</sup> Rhetoric did not appeal to him, and his literary style shows him to have been a man who wrote 'straight on,' intent only on the matter of his composition. Free from the spell of rhetoric, he was equally free from racial prejudice. A patriotic Greek, he incurred a sentence of seventeen years' exile in Rome (B.C. 166-149). This time was spent in the study of the records preserved in the Roman archives, in acquiring the friendship of the important men of Rome, and in hunting, a pastime of which he was passionately fond. To an outlook free from prejudice, and to a genuine love of truth, he joined a thoroughly modern method of historical research. History above all must explain the existing situation, and this renders an investigation of the past necessary. For this investigation Polybius is not satisfied with the compilations of previous historians, but examines anew the most authentic records available. Thus we find him examining the archives at Rome,<sup>3</sup> at

Rhodes,<sup>1</sup> at Carthage,<sup>2</sup> and at Alexandria.<sup>3</sup> When he reaches the events that took place within the memory of his contemporaries, he seeks out the surviving actors in these events, and to quote his phrase, 'could therefore relate what he had seen or what he had heard from eye-witnesses.'<sup>4</sup> For the later period he was himself 'not only an eye-witness, but in some cases an actor, and in others the chief actor.'<sup>5</sup> Polybius held that to the historian of military affairs a knowledge of military operations was indispensable, and was himself a student of military tactics,<sup>6</sup> and qualified for the position of Hipparch, to which he was elected in B.C. 169.<sup>7</sup> Besides the part he took in the wars of the Archæan League, he accompanied the Roman armies to Spain about B.C. 149–146, or in B.C. 134–133,<sup>8</sup> or perhaps on both occasions. distinguished citizens, had invented and popularised the fictions that make up so much of Livy's account of the Gallic invasion of Italy (vide Livy, vol. ii.). For the correction of these fictions Polybius is very valuable. His account of the Celts is the result of long and careful research. His history of the period from B.C. 250 to B.C. 121 may be considered as of original authority, and deserves the closest study at the hands of students of Celtic History.

I. It was in the nineteenth year after the sea-fight at Aegospotami, and the sixteenth before the battle of Leuctra; the year in which the Lacedæmonians made what is called the peace of Antalcidas with the King of Persia; the year in which the elder Dionysius was besieging Rhegium after beating the Italian Greeks on the river Elleporus; and in which the Gauls took Rome itself by storm and were occupying the whole of it except the Capitol. With these Gauls the Romans made a treaty and settlement which they were content to accept: and having thus become, contrary to all expectation, once more masters of their own country, they made a start in their career of expansion; and in the succeeding period engaged in various wars with their neighbours.

V. Just about the same time [the Carthaginians] found themselves confronted by three enemies at once, their own mercenaries, the Numidians, and such Libyans as joined the former in their revolt. And this war proved to be neither insignificant nor contemptible. It exposed them to frequent and terrible alarms; and, finally, it became a question with them not merely of a loss of territory, but of their own bare existence, and of the safety of the very walls and buildings of their city. . . . The course of events at Carthage subsequent to the peace [with Rome] was as follows: As soon as possible after it was finally ratified Barcas withdrew the troops at Eryx to Lilybaeum, and then immediately laid down his command. Gesco, who was commandant of the town, proceeded to transport the soldiers into Libya. But foreseeing what was likely to happen, he very prudently embarked them in detachments, and did not send them all in one voyage. His object was to gain time for the Carthaginian government; so that one detachment B.C. 241–238.

should come to shore, receive the pay due to them, and depart from Carthage to their own country, before the next detachment was brought across and joined them. In accordance with this scheme Gesco began the transportation of the troops. But the Government—partly because the recent expenses had reduced their finances to a low ebb, partly because they felt certain that, if they collected the whole force and entertained them at Carthage, they would be able to persuade the mercenaries to accept something less than the whole pay due to them—did not dismiss the detachments as they landed, but kept them massed in the city. But when this resulted in the commission of many acts of lawlessness by night and day, they began to feel uneasy at their numbers and their growing licentiousness; and required the officers, until such time as arrangements for discharging their pay should have been made, and the rest of the army should have arrived, to withdraw with all their men to a certain town called Sicca, receiving each a piece of gold for their immediate necessities. . . . And there, for lack of something better to do, some of them began calculating, always to their own advantage, the amount of pay due to them; and thus making out the total to be many times more than was really due, they gave out that this was the amount they ought to demand from the Carthaginians. Moreover, they all began to call to mind the promises made to them by the generals in their harangues, delivered on various occasions of special danger, and to entertain high hopes and great expectations of the amount of compensation which awaited them. The natural result followed. When the whole army was mustered at Sicca, and Hanno now appointed general in Libya, far from fulfilling these hopes and the promises they had received, talked on the contrary of the burden of the taxes and the embarrassment of the public finances; and actually endeavoured to obtain from them an abatement even from the amount of pay acknowledged to be due to them; excited and mutinous feelings at once began to manifest themselves. There were constant conferences hastily got together, sometimes among the separate nationalities, sometimes of the whole army; and there being no unity of race or language among them, the whole camp became a babel of confusion, a scene of murmuring tumult, and a veritable revel of misrule. . . .

There were in the army Iberians and Celts, men from Liguria and the Balearic Islands, and a considerable number of half-bred Greeks, mostly deserters and slaves; while the main body consisted of Libyans. . . . They conceived a violent mistrust of their several commanders; and in a furious outburst of anger against the Carthaginians started towards the city, and pitched their camp about a hundred and twenty stades from Carthage, at the town of Tunes, to the number of over twenty thousand. . . . Their confidence in themselves was profound; and their engagements with the Roman legions in Sicily had convinced them, that not only was it impossible for the Carthaginians to face them in the field, but it would be difficult to find any nation in the world who could. Therefore when the Carthaginians conceded the point about their pay, they made a further claim for the value of the horses they had lost. When this too was conceded, they said they ought to receive the value of the rations of corn due to them from a long time previous, reckoned at the highest price reached during the war. And in short, the ill-disposed and mutinous among them being numerous, they always discovered some fresh demand that made it impossible to come to terms. Upon the Carthaginian government, however, pledging themselves to the full extent of their powers, they eventually agreed to refer the matter to the arbitration of some one of the generals who had been actually engaged in Sicily. . . . But there was a certain Campanian in the army, a runaway Roman slave named Spendius, a man of extraordinary physical strength and reckless courage in the field. Alarmed lest his master should recover possession of him, and he should be put to death with torture, in accordance with the laws of Rome, this man exerted himself to the utmost in word and deed to break off the arrangement with the Carthaginians. . . . This was the origin of the Mercenary, or, as it is also called, the Libyan war. . . . Meanwhile Mathos himself was continuing the siege of Hippo Zarytus, and he now counselled Autaritus, the leader of the Galatae, and Spendius to stick close to the skirts of the enemy, avoiding the plains, because the enemy were strong in cavalry and elephants, but marching parallel with them on the slopes of the mountains, and attacking them whenever they saw them in difficulties. While suggesting these tactics, he at the same time sent messengers to the Numidians and Libyans, entreating them to come to their aid, and not to let slip the opportunity of securing their own freedom. Accordingly, Spendius took with him a force of six thousand men, selected from each of the several nationalities at Tunes, and started, keeping along a line of hills parallel to the Carthaginians. Besides these six thousand men, he had two thousand Galatae under Autaritus, who were all that were left of the original number, the rest having deserted to the Romans during the period of the occupation of Eryx. . . . The war with the Libyans had indeed reduced Carthage to dreadful danger; but its termination enabled her not only to re-establish her authority over Libya, but also to inflict condign punishment upon the authors of the revolt. . . . For three years and four months did the mercenaries maintain a war against the Carthaginians which far surpassed any that I ever heard of for cruelty and inhumanity.

The struggle lasts forty months.

VI. Therefore it is that pity and sympathy and assistance await those whose failure is due to Fortune: reproach and rebuke from all men of sense those who have only their own folly to thank for it.

B.C. 230.

The bad faith of some Gallic mercenaries.

It is the latter that the Epirotes now richly deserved at the hands of the Greeks. For in the first place, who in his senses, knowing the common report as to the character of the Galatae, would not have hesitated to trust to them a city so rich, and offering so many opportunities for treason? And again, who would not have been on his guard against the bad character of this particular body of them? For they had originally been driven from their native country by an outburst of popular indignation at an act of treachery done by them to their own kinsfolk and relations. Then having been received by the Carthaginians, because of the exigencies of the war in which the latter were engaged, and being drafted into Agrigentum to garrison it (being at the time more than 3000 strong), they seized the opportunity of a dispute as to pay, arising between the soldiers and their generals, to plunder the city; and again, being brought by the Carthaginians into Eryx to perform the same duty, they first endeavoured to betray the city and those who were shut up in it with them to the Romans who were besieging it; and when they failed in that treason, they deserted in a body to the enemy: whose trust they also betrayed by plundering the temple of Aphrodite at Eryx.

Thoroughly convinced, therefore, of their abominable character, as soon as they had made peace with Carthage the Romans made it their first business to disarm them, put them on board ship, and forbid them ever to enter any part of Italy. These were the men whom the Epirotes made the protectors of their democracy and the guardians of their laws! To such men as these they entrusted their most wealthy city ! How then can it be denied that they were the cause of their own misfortunes ?

VII. We must now turn to Hasdrubal in Iberia. He had during this period been conducting his command with ability and success, and had not only given in general a great impulse to the Carthaginian interests there, but in particular had greatly strengthened them by the fortification of the town, variously called Carthage, and New Town, the situation of which was exceedingly convenient for operations in Libya as well as in Iberia. I shall take a more suitable opportunity of speaking of the site of this town, and of pointing out the advantages offered by it to both countries : I must at present speak of the impression made by Hasdrubal's policy at Rome. Seeing him strengthening the Carthaginian influence in Spain, and rendering it continually more formidable, the Romans were anxious to interfere in the politics of that country. They discovered, as they thought, that they had allowed their suspicions to be lulled to sleep, and had meanwhile given the Carthaginians the opportunity of consolidating their power. They did not venture, however, at the moment to impose conditions or to make war on them, because they were in almost daily dread of an attack from the Celts. They determined therefore to mollify Hasdrubal by gentle measures, and so to leave themselves free to attack the Celts first and try conclusions with them : for they were convinced that, with such enemies on their flank, they would not only be unable to keep their hold over the rest of Italy, but even to reckon on safety in their own city. Accordingly, while sending envoys to Hasdrubal, and making a treaty with him by which the Carthaginians, without saying anything of the rest of Iberia, engaged not to cross the Iber in arms, they pushed on the war with the Celts in Italy.

Ὅτι δὲ ὧν δοκεῖ μοι χρήσιμον εἶναι κεφαλαιώδη μὲν ποιήσασθαι τὴν ἐξήγησιν, ἵνα τὸ τῆς προκατασκευῆς οἰκείου συσσώσωμεν κατὰ τὴν ἐξ ἀρχῆς πρόθεσιν, ἀναδραμεῖν δὲ τοῖς χρόνοις ἐπὶ τὴν ἀρχὴν, ἐξ ὅτου κατέσχον οἱ προειρημένοι τὴν χώραν· ἡγοῦμαι γὰρ τὴν περὶ αὐτῶν ἱστορίαν οὐ μόνον ἀξίαν εἶναι γνώσεως καὶ μνήμης, ἀλλὰ καὶ τελῶς ἀναγκαίαν χάριν τοῦ μαθεῖν τίσι μετὰ ταῦτα πιστεύσας ἀνδράσι καὶ τόποις Ἀννίβας ἐπεβάλετο καταλύειν τὴν Ῥωμαίων δυναστείαν. πρῶτον δὲ περὶ τῆς χώρας ῥητέον, ποία τίς ἐστὶν καὶ πῶς κείται πρὸς τὴν ἄλλην Ἰταλίαν· οὕτως γὰρ ἔσται καὶ τὰ περὶ τὰς πράξεις διαφέροντα κατανοεῖν βέλτιον, ὑπογραφέντων τῶν περὶ τε τοὺς τόπους καὶ τὴν χώραν ἰδιωμάτων.

VIII. This war itself I shall treat only summarily, to avoid breaking the thread of my history ; but I must go back somewhat in point of time, and refer to the period at which these tribes originally occupied their districts in Italy. For the story I think is worth knowing for its own sake, and must certainly be kept in mind, if we wish to understand on what tribes and districts Hannibal relied to assist him in his bold design of destroying the Roman dominion. I will first describe the country in which they live, its nature, and its relation to the rest of Italy ; for if we clearly understand its peculiarities, geographical and natural, we shall be better able to grasp the salient points in the history of the war.

The Celtic
Italy.

Italy, taken as a whole, is a triangle, of which the eastern side is bound by the Ionian sea and the Adriatic Gulf, its southern and western sides by the Sicilian and Tyrrhenian Seas ; these two sides converge to form the apex of the triangle, which is represented by the southern promontory of Italy called Cocinthus, and which separates the Ionian from the Sicilian sea. The third side, or base of this triangle, is on the north, and is formed by the chain of the Alps stretching right across the country, beginning at Marseilles and the coast of the Sardinian Sea, and with no break in its continuity until within a short distance of the head of the Adriatic. To the south of this range, which I said we must regard as the base of the triangle, are the most northerly plains of Italy, the largest and most fertile of any with which I am acquainted in all Europe. This is the district with which we are at present concerned. Taken as a whole it too forms a triangle, the apex of which is the point where the Apennines and Alps converge, above Marseilles, and not far from the coast of the Sardinian Sea. The northern side of this triangle is formed by the Alps, extending 2200 stades; the southern by the Apennines, extending 3600; and the base is the seaboard of the Adriatic, from the town of Sena to the head of the gulf, a distance of more than 2500 stades. The total length of the three sides will thus be nearly 10,000 stades.

Its wonderful fertility.

IX. The yield of corn in this district is so abundant that wheat is often sold at four obols a Sicilian medimnus, barley at two, and a metretes of wine for an equal measure of barley.<sup>1</sup> The quantity of panic and millet produced is extraordinary; and the amount of acorns grown in the oak forests scattered about the country may be gathered from the fact that, though nowhere are more pigs slaughtered than in Italy, for sacrifices as well as for family use, and for feeding the army, by far the most important supply is from these plains. The cheapness and abundance of all articles of food may also be clearly shown from the fact that travellers in these parts, when stopping at inns, do not bargain for particular articles, but simply ask what the charge is per head for board. And for the most part the innkeepers are content to supply their guests with every necessary at a charge rarely exceeding half an as (that is, the fourth part of an obol)<sup>1</sup> a day each. Of the numbers, stature, and personal beauty of the inhabitants, and still more of their bravery in war, we shall be able to satisfy ourselves from the facts of their history.

X. Such parts of both slopes of the Alps as are not too rocky or too precipitous are inhabited by different tribes : those on the north towards the Rhone by the Galatae, called Transalpine ; those towards the Italian plains by the Taurisci and Agones and a number of other barbarous tribes. The name Transalpine is not tribal, but local, from the Latin preposition trans, 'across.' The summits of the Alps, from their rugged character, and the great depth of perpetual snow, are entirely uninhabited. Both slopes of the Apennines, towards the Tuscan sea and towards the plains, are inhabited by the Ligurians, from above Marseilles and the junction of the Alps to Pisae on the coast, the first city on the west of Etruria and inland to Arretium. Next to them come the Etruscans; and the next on both slopes the Umbrians. The distance between the Apennines and the Adriatic averages about five hundred stades; and when it leaves the northern plains the chain verges to the right, and goes entirely through the middle of the rest of Italy, as far as the Sicilian Sea. The remaining portion of this triangle, namely the plain along the sea coast, extends as far as the town of Sena. The Po, celebrated by the poets under the name of Eridanus, rises in the Alps near the apex of the triangle, and flows down to the plains in a southerly course; and after reaching the plains it turns to the east, and flowing through them discharges itself by two mouths into the Adriatic. The larger part of the plain is thus cut off by it, and lies between this river and the Alps to the head of the Adriatic. In body of water it is second to no river in Italy, because the mountain streams, descending from the Alps and Apennines to the plain, one and all flow into it on both sides; and its stream is at its height and beauty about the time of the rising of the Dog Star (i.e. July 15), because it is then swollen by the melting snows on the mountains. It is navigable for nearly 2000 stades up stream, the ships entering by the mouth called Olana; and though it is a single main channel to begin with, it branches off into two at the place called Trigoboli, of which streams the northern is called the Padoa, the southern the Olana.

<sup>1</sup> The Celts of the first Celtic migration, whom we find in the British Isles at the time of Homer (v. supra, pp. 2, 3), were established in North Italy circa 1000 B.C. They were conquered by the Etruscans circa 700 B.C., who in turn were conquered by the Celts of the second Celtic migration, circa 400 B.C. Vide Bertrand et Reinach, Les Celtes dans les vallées du Po et du Danube.

At the mouth of the latter there is a harbour affording as safe anchorage as any in the Adriatic. The whole river is called by the country folk the Bodencus. As to the other stories current in Greece about this river,—I mean Phaethon and his fall, and the tears of the poplars and the black clothes of the inhabitants along this stream, which they are said to wear on this day as mourning for Phaethon,—all such tragic incidents I pass over for the present, as unsuitable to the nature of the work I have in hand; but I shall return to them at some other more fitting opportunity, particularly because Timaeus has shown a strange ignorance of this district.

XI. To continue my description. These plains were anciently inhabited by Etruscans, at the same period as what are called the Phlegraean plains round Capua and Nola; which latter, however, have enjoyed the highest reputation, because they lay in the way of a great many people and so got known. In speaking then of the history of the Etruscan Empire, we should not refer to the district occupied by them at the present time, but to those northern plains, and to what they accomplished when they inhabited them. Their chief intercourse was with the Celts, because they occupied the adjoining districts; who, envying the beauty of their lands, seized some slight pretext to gather a great host and expel the Etruscans from the valley of the Po, which they at once took possession of themselves. First, the country near the source of the Po was occupied by the Laevi and Lebecii; after them the Insubres settled in the country, the largest tribe of all; and next to them along the bank of the river, the Cenomani. But the district along the shore of the Adriatic was held by another very ancient tribe, called the Venēti, in customs and dress nearly allied to the Celts, but using quite a different language, about whom the tragic poets have written a great many wonderful tales. South of the Po, in the Apennine district, first beginning from the west, the Anares, and next to them the Boii settled. Next them, on the coast of the Adriatic, the Lingones; and south of these, still on the sea-coast, the Senones. These are the most important tribes that took possession of this part of the country. They lived in open villages, without any permanent buildings. As they made their bed of straw or leaves, and fed on meat, and followed no pursuits but those of war and agriculture, they lived simple lives without being acquainted with any science or art whatever. Each man's property, moreover, consisted in cattle and gold; as they were the only things that could be easily carried with them, when they wandered from place to place, and changed their dwellings as fancy directed. They put a high esteem, however, on friendship: for the man who had the largest number of clients or companions in his wanderings was looked upon as the most formidable and powerful member of the tribe.<sup>1</sup> but rendered also many of the neighbouring peoples subject to them, whom they overawed by their audacity. Some time afterwards they conquered the Romans in battle, and pursuing the flying legions, in three days after the battle occupied Rome itself with the exception of the Capitol. But a circumstance intervened which recalled them home, that is to say, an invasion of their territory by the Venēti. Accordingly they made terms with the Romans, handed back the city and returned to their own land, and subsequently were occupied with domestic wars. Some of the tribes, also, who dwelt on the Alps, comparing their own barren districts with the rich land occupied by the others, were continually making raids upon them, and collecting their forces to attack them. This gave the Romans time to recover their strength, and to come to terms with the people of Latium. When, thirty years after the capture of the city, the Celts came again as far as Alba, the Romans were taken by surprise; and having no intelligence of the intended invasion, nor time to collect the forces of the Socii, did not venture to give them battle. But when another invasion in great force took place twelve years later, they did get previous intelligence of it; and having mustered their allies, sallied forth to meet them in great spirit, being eager to engage them and fight a decisive battle. But the Galatae were dismayed at their approach; and, being besides weakened by internal feuds, retreated homewards as soon as night fell, with all the appearance of a regular flight. After this alarm they kept quiet for thirteen years, at the end of which period, seeing that the power of the Romans was growing formidable, they made a peace and definite treaty with them. B.C. 334.

XIII. They abided by this treaty for thirty years : but at that time, alarmed by a threatening movement on the part of the Transalpine tribes, and fearing that a dangerous war was imminent, they diverted the attack of the invading horde from themselves by presents and appeals to their ties of kindred, but incited them to attack the Romans, joining in the expedition themselves. They directed their march through Etruria, and were joined by the Etruscans ; the combined armies, after taking a great quantity of booty, got safely back from the Roman territory. But when they got home, they quarrelled over the division of the spoil, and in the end destroyed most of it, as well as the flower of their own force. This is the way of the Galatae when they have appropriated their neighbours' property ; and it mostly arises from brutal drunkenness and intemperate feeding. In the fourth year after this, the Samnites and Galatae made a league, gave the Romans battle in the neighbourhood of Camertium, and slew a large number. Incensed at this defeat the Romans marched out a few days afterwards, and with two Consular armies engaged the enemy in the territory of Sentinum ; and, having killed a large number of them, forced the survivors Romans to retreat in hot haste each to his own land. Again, after another interval of ten years, the Galatae besieged Arretium with a great army, and the Romans went to the assistance of the town, and were beaten in an engagement under its walls. The praetor Lucius having fallen in this battle, Manius Curius was appointed in his place. The ambassadors, sent by him to treat with the Galatae for the prisoners, were treacherously murdered by them. At this the Romans, in high wrath, sent an expedition against them, which was met by the tribe called the Senones. In a pitched battle the army of the Senones was cut to pieces, and the rest of the tribe expelled from the country, into which the Romans sent the first colony which they ever planted in Gaul—namely, the town of Sena, so called from the tribe of Galatae which formerly inhabited it. This is the town which I named before as lying on the coast at the extremity of the plains of the Po.

XIV. Seeing the expulsion of the Senones, and fearing the same fate for themselves, the Boii made a general levy, summoned the Etruscans to join them, and set out to war. They mustered their forces near the lacus Vadimonis, and there gave the Romans battle, in which the Etruscans indeed suffered a loss of more than half their men, while scarcely any of the Boii escaped. But yet in the very next year the same two nations joined forces once more ; and, arming even those of them who had only just reached manhood, again gave the Romans battle ; and it was not until they had been utterly defeated in this engagement that they humbled themselves so far as to send ambassadors to Rome and make a treaty.

These events took place in the third year before Pyrrhus crossed into Italy, and in the fifth before the destruction of the Galatae at Delphi. For at this period fortune seems to have plagued the Galatae with a kind of epidemic of war. But the Romans gained two most important advantages from these events. First, their constant defeats at the hands of the Galatae had inured them to the worst that could befall them; and so, when they had to fight with Pyrrhus, they came to the contest like trained and experienced gladiators. And in the second place, they had crushed the insolence of the Galatae just in time to allow them to give an undivided attention, first to the war with Pyrrhus for the possession of Italy, and then to the war with Carthage for the supremacy in Sicily.

XV. After these defeats the Galatae maintained an unbroken peace with Rome for forty-five years. But when the generation who had witnessed the actual struggle had passed away, and a younger generation had taken their places, filled with unreflecting hardihood, and ignorant of any suffering or reverse, they began, as was natural, to disturb the settlement; and on the one hand to allow trifling causes to exasperate them against Rome, and on the other to invite the Alpine Galatae to join the fray. At first these intrigues were carried on by their chiefs without the knowledge of their tribesmen; and accordingly, when an armed host of Transalpine Galatae arrived at Ariminum, the Boii were suspicious; and forming a conspiracy against their own leaders, as well as against the new-comers, they put their own two kings Atis and Galatus to death, and cut each other to pieces in a pitched battle. Just then the Romans, alarmed at the threatened invasion, had dispatched an army; but learning that the Galatae had committed this act of self-destruction, it returned home again. In the fifth year after this alarm, in the consulship of Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, the Romans divided among their citizens the territory of Picenum, from which they had ejected the Senones when they conquered them: a democratic measure introduced by Gaius Flaminius, and a policy which we must pronounce to have been the first step in the demoralisation of the people, as well as the cause of the next Gallic war. For many of the Galatae, and especially the Boii whose lands were coterminous with the territory of the Romans, entered upon that war from the conviction that the object of Rome in her wars with them was no longer supremacy and empire over them, but their total expulsion and destruction.

spot ; and, for the future, pointed out to them the greatness of the wealth of Rome, and all the riches of which they would become possessed, if they took it. In these attempts to inflame their cupidity and induce them to join the expedition against Rome they easily succeeded. For they added to the above arguments pledges of their own alliance ; and reminded them of the campaign of their own ancestors in which they had seized Rome itself, and had been masters of all it contained, as well as the city itself, for seven months ; and had at last evacuated it of their own free will, and restored it as an act of free grace, returning unconquered and scatheless with the booty to their own land. These arguments made the leaders so eager for the expedition, that there never came from any other part of Gaul a larger host, or one consisting of more notable warriors. Meanwhile, the Romans, informed of what was coming, partly by report and partly by conjecture, were in such a state of constant alarm and excitement, that they hurriedly enrolled legions, collected supplies, and sent out their forces to the frontier, as though the enemy were already in their territory, before the Galatae had stirred from their own lands.

It was this movement of the Galatae that, more than anything else, helped the Carthaginians to consolidate their power in Iberia. For the Romans, as I have said, looked upon the Celtic question as the more pressing one of the two, as it was so near home ; and in their anxiety to settle it satisfactorily first, were forced to connive at what was going on in Iberia. Having, therefore, put their relations with the Carthaginians on a safe footing by the treaty with Hasdrubal, which I spoke of a short time back, they gave an undivided attention to the Celtic war, convinced that their interests demanded that a decisive battle should be fought with them.

XVII. The Gaesatae, then, having collected their forces, crossed the Alps and descended into the valley of the Po with a formidable army, furnished with a variety of armour, in the eighth year after the distribution of the lands of Picenum. The Insubres and Boii remained loyal to the agreement they had made with them: but the Venēti and Cenomani, being induced by embassies from Rome to take the Roman side, the Celtic kings were obliged to leave a portion of their forces behind, to guard against an invasion of their territory by those tribes. They themselves, with their main army, consisting of one hundred and fifty thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse and chariots, struck camp and started on their march through Etruria in high spirits. As soon as it was known at Rome that the Celts had crossed the Alps, one of the consuls, Lucius Aemilius Papus, was sent with an army to Ariminum to guard against the passage of the enemy, and one of the praetors into Etruria: for the other consul, Gaius Atilius Regulus, happened to be in Sardinia with his legions. There was widespread panic in Rome, for the danger threatening them was believed to be great and formidable. And naturally so: for the old fear of the Galatae had never been eradicated from their minds. No one thought of anything else: they were incessantly occupied in mustering the legions, and enrolling new ones, and in ordering up such of the allies as were ready for service. The proper magistrates were appointed to give in a list of all citizens of military age; that it might at once be known to what the total of available forces amounted. And such store of corn, and darts, and other military equipments were collected as no one could remember on any former occasion. From every side assistance was eagerly rendered; for the inhabitants of Italy, in their terror at the Gallic invasion, no longer regarded the matter as a question of alliance with Rome, or as a war undertaken to support Roman supremacy, but each people looked upon it as a danger menacing themselves, their own city and territory. The response to the Roman appeal therefore was prompt.

XVIII. But that we may know from facts how great the power was which Hannibal subsequently ventured to attack, and what a mighty empire he faced, when he succeeded in inflicting upon the Roman people the most severe disasters, I must now state the strength of the forces they could at that time bring into the field. The two consuls had marched out with four legions, each consisting of five thousand two hundred infantry and three hundred cavalry. Besides this there were with each consul allies to the number of thirty thousand infantry and two thousand cavalry. Of Sabines and Etruscans, too, there had come to Rome, for that special occasion, four thousand horse and more than fifty thousand foot. These were formed into an army and sent in advance into Etruria, under the command of one of the praetors. Moreover, the Umbrians and Sarsinatae, hill tribes of the Apennine district, were collected to the number of twenty thousand; and with them were twenty thousand Venēti and Cenomani. These were stationed on the frontier of the Gallic territory, that they might divert the attention of the invaders, by making an incursion into the lands of the Boii. These were the forces guarding the frontier. In Rome itself, ready as a reserve against the accidents of war, there remained twenty thousand foot and three thousand horse of citizens, and thirty thousand foot and two thousand horse of the allies. Lists of men for service had also been returned: of Latins eighty thousand foot and five thousand horse; of Samnites seventy thousand foot and seven thousand horse; of Iapygians and Messapians together fifty thousand foot and sixteen thousand horse; and of Lucanians thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse; of Marsi, and Marrucini, and Ferentani, and Vestini, twenty thousand foot and four thousand horse. And besides these, there were in reserve in Sicily and Tarentum two legions, each of which consisted of about four thousand two hundred foot, and two hundred horse. Of the Romans and Campanians the total of those put on the roll was two hundred and fifty thousand foot and twenty-three thousand horse ; so that the grand total of the forces actually defending Rome was over 150,000 foot, 6000 cavalry : and of the men able to bear arms, Romans and allies, over 700,000 foot and 70,000 horse ; while Hannibal, when he invaded Italy, had less than 20,000 to put against this immense force.

XIX. There will be another opportunity of treating the subject in greater detail ; for the present I must return to the Celts. Having entered Etruria, they began their march through the country, devastating it as they chose, and without any hindrance ; and finally directed their course against Rome itself. But when they were encamped under the walls of Clusium, which is three days' march from Rome, news was brought them that the Roman forces, which were on duty in Etruria, were following on their rear and were close upon them ; upon which they turned back against them, eager to give them battle. The two armies came in sight of each other about sunset, and encamped for the night a short distance apart. But when night fell, the Celts lit their watch-fires ; and leaving their cavalry on the ground, with instructions that, as soon as daylight made them visible to the enemy, they should follow by the same route, they made a secret retreat along the road to Faesulae, and took up their position there ; that they might be joined by their own cavalry, and might disconcert the attack of the enemy. Accordingly, when at daybreak the Romans saw that the cavalry were alone, they believed that the Celts had fled, and hastened in pursuit of the retreating horse; but when they approached the spot where the enemy were stationed, the Celts suddenly left their position and fell upon them. The struggle was at first maintained with fury on both sides, but the courage and superior numbers of the Celts eventually gave them the victory. No less than six thousand Romans fell; while the rest fled, most of whom made their way to a certain strongly fortified height, and there remained. The first impulse of the Celts was to besiege them, but they were worn out by the previous night's march, and all the suffering and fatigue of the day; leaving therefore a detachment of cavalry to keep guard round the hill, they hastened to procure rest and refreshment, resolving to besiege the fugitives next day unless they voluntarily surrendered.

XX. Κατὰ δὲ τὸν καιρὸν τούτου Λεύκιος Αἰμίλιος ὁ προκαθήμενος ἐπὶ τῶν κατὰ τὸν Ἀδρίαν τόπων, ἀκούσας τοὺς Κελτοὺς διὰ Τυρρηνίας ἐμβεβληκότας συνεγγίζειν τῇ Ῥώμῃ, παρῆν βοηθῶν καὶ κατὰ σπουδὴν εὐτυχῶς εἰς δέοντα καιρὸν. καταστρατοπεδεύσαντος δ' αὐτοῦ σύνεγγυς τῶν πολεμίων, κατιδόντες τὰ πυρὰ καὶ νοήσαντες τὸ γεγονός οἱ συμπεφευγότες ἐπὶ τὸν λόφον, ταχέως ἀναθαρρήσαντες ἐξαπέστειλαν αὐτῶν τινὰς τῆς νυκτὸς ἀνόπλους διὰ τῆς ὕλης ἀναγγελοῦντας τῷ στρατηγῷ τὸ συμβεβηκός. ὁ δὲ διακούσας, καὶ θεωρῶν οὐδὲ διαβούλιον αὐτῷ καταλειπόμενον ὑπὲρ τῶν ἐνεστώτων, τοῖς μὲν χιλιάρχοις ἅμα τῷ φωτὶ παρήγγειλε τοὺς πεζοὺς ἐξάγειν, αὐτὸς δὲ τοὺς ἰππεῖς ἀναλαβὼν καθηγεῖτο

XX. But meanwhile Lucius Aemilius, who had been stationed on the coast of the Adriatic at Ariminum, having been informed that the Celts had entered Etruria and were approaching Rome, set off to the rescue; and after a rapid march appeared on the scene just at the critical moment. He pitched his camp close to the enemy; and the fugitives on the hill seeing his watch-fires, and understanding what had happened, quickly recovered their courage and sent some of their men unarmed to make their way through the forest and tell the consul what had occurred. This news left the consul, as he thought, no alternative but to fight. He therefore ordered the tribunes to lead out the infantry at daybreak, while he, taking command of the cavalry, led the way towards the hill. The Gallic chieftains, too, had seen his watch-fires, and understood that the enemy was come; and at once held a council of war. The advice of King Aneroestes was, 'that seeing the amount of booty they had taken,—an incalculable quantity indeed of captives, cattle, and other spoil,—they had better not run the risk of another engagement, but return home in safety; and having disposed of this booty, and freed themselves from its incumbrance, return, if they thought good, to make another determined attack on Rome.' Having resolved to follow the advice of Aneroestes in the present juncture, the chiefs broke up their night council, and before daybreak struck camp, and marched through Etruria by the road which follows the coast of the Ligurian bay: while Lucius, having taken off the remnant of the army from the hill, and combined it with his own forces, came to the decision that it would not be by any means advantageous to offer the enemy regular battle; but that it was better to dog their footsteps, watching for favourable times and places at which to inflict damage upon them, or wrest some of their booty from their hands.

XXI. Just at that time the consul Gaius Atilius had crossed from Sardinia, and having landed at Pisae was on his way to Rome; and therefore he and the enemy were advancing to meet each other. When the Celts were at Telamon in Etruria, their advanced guard fell in with that of Gaius, and the men being made prisoners informed the consul, in answer to questions, of what had taken place; and told him that both the armies were in the neighbourhood: namely, that of the Celts, and that of Lucius close upon their rear. Though somewhat disturbed at the events which he thus learnt, Gaius regarded the situation as a hopeful one, when he considered that the Celts were on the road between two hostile armies. He therefore ordered the tribunes to marshal the legions and to advance at the ordinary pace, and in line as far as the breadth of the ground permitted; while he himself, having surveyed a piece of rising ground which commanded the road, and under which the Celts must march, took his cavalry with him and hurried on to seize the eminence, and so begin the battle in person; convinced that by those means he would get the principal credit of the action for himself. At first the Celts, not knowing anything about the presence of Gaius Atilius, but supposing from what was taking place that the cavalry of Aemilius had outmarched them in the night, and were seizing the points of vantage in the van of their route, immediately detached some cavalry and light armed troops to dispute the possession of this eminence. But having shortly afterwards learnt the truth about the presence of Gaius from a prisoner who was brought in, they hurriedly got their infantry into position, and drew them up so as to face each way, some, that is, to the front and others to the rear. For they knew that one

army was following on their rear, and they expected from the intelligence that had reached them, and from what they saw actually occurring, that they would have to meet another on their front.

XXII. Aemilius had heard of the landing of the legions at Pisae, but had not expected them to be already so far on their road ; but the struggle for the eminence showed him that the two armies were quite close. He accordingly dispatched his horse at once to support the struggle for the possession of the hill, while he marshalled his foot in their usual order, and advanced to attack the enemy who barred his way. The Celts had stationed the Alpine tribe of the Gaesatae to face their enemies on the rear, and behind them the Insubres ; on their front they had placed the Taurisci, and the Cispadane tribe of the Boii, facing the legions of Gaius. Their wagons and chariots they placed on the extreme of both wings, while the booty they massed upon one of the hills that skirted the road, under the protection of a guard. The army of the Celts was thus double-faced. Their mode of marshalling their forces was effective as well as calculated to inspire terror. The Insubres and Boii were clothed in their breeches and light cloaks ; but the Gaesatae from vanity and bravado threw these garments away, and fell in in front of the army naked, with nothing but their arms ; believing that, as the ground was in parts encumbered with brambles, which might possibly catch in their clothes and impede the use of their weapons, they would be more effective in this state. At first the only actual fighting was that for the possession of the hill ; and the numbers of the cavalry, from all three armies, that had joined in the struggle made it a conspicuous sight for all. In the midst of it the consul Gaius fell, fighting with reckless bravery in the thick of the battle, and his head was brought to the king of the Celts. The Roman cavalry, however, continued the struggle with spirit, and finally won the position and overpowered their opponents. Then the foot also came to close quarters. It was surely a singular and surprising battle to witness, and scarcely less so to hear described.

XXIII. A battle, to begin with, in which three distinct armies were engaged, must have presented a strange and unusual appearance, and must have been fought under strange and unusual conditions. Again, it must have seemed to a spectator open to question whether the position of the Celts was the most dangerous conceivable, from being between two attacking forces ; or the most favourable, as enabling them to meet both armies at once, while their own two divisions afforded each other a mutual support ; and, above all, as putting retreat out of the question, or any hope of safety except in victory. For this is the peculiar advantage of having an army facing in both directions. The Romans, on the other hand, while encouraged by having got their enemy between two of their own armies, were at the same time dismayed by the ornaments and clamour of the Celtic host.

For there were among them such innumerable horns and trumpets, which were being blown at the same time from all parts of their army, and their cries were so loud and piercing, that the noise seemed to come not from human voices and trumpets but from the whole country-side at once. Not less terrifying was the appearance and rapid movement of the naked warriors in the van, which showed men in the prime of their strength and beauty : while all the warriors in the front ranks were richly adorned in gold necklaces and bracelets. These sights certainly dismayed the Romans ; still the hope they gave of a profitable victory redoubled their eagerness for the battle.

XXIV. When the men who were armed with the pilum advanced in front of the legions, in accordance with the regular method of Roman warfare, and hurled their pila in rapid and effective volleys, the inner ranks of the Celts found their jerkins and leather breeches of great service ; but to the naked men in the front ranks this unexpected mode of attack caused great distress and discomfiture. For the Gallic shields not being big enough to cover the man, the larger the naked body the more certainty was there of the pilum hitting. And at last, not being able to retaliate, for the pilum-throwers were out of reach, and their weapons kept pouring in, some of them, in the extremity of their distress and helplessness, threw themselves with desperate courage and reckless violence upon the enemy, and thus met a voluntary death ; while others gave ground step by step towards their own friends, whom they threw into confusion by this manifest acknowledgment of their panic. Thus the courage of the Gaesatae had broken down before the preliminary attack of the pilum. But when the throwers of it had rejoined their ranks, and the whole Roman line charged, the Insubres, Boii, and Taurisci received the attack, and maintained a desperate hand-to-hand fight. Though almost cut to pieces, they held their ground with unabated courage, in spite of the fact that man for man, as well as collectively, they were inferior to the Romans in point of arms. The shields and swords of the latter were proved to be manifestly superior for defence and attack, for the Gallic sword can only deliver a cut, but cannot thrust. And when, besides, the Roman horse charged down from the high ground on their flank, and attacked them vigorously, the infantry of the Celts were cut to pieces on the field, while their horse turned and fled.

XXV. Forty thousand of them were slain, and quite ten thousand taken prisoners, among whom was one of their kings, Concolitanus; (the other king, Aneroestes, fled with a few followers, joined a few of his people in escaping to a place of security, and there put an end to his own life and that of his friends.) Lucius Aemilius, the surviving consul, collected the spoils of the slain and sent them to Rome, and restored the property taken by the Galatae to its owners. Then taking command of the legions, he marched along the frontiers of Liguria, and made a raid upon the territory of the Boii; and having satisfied the desires of the legions with plunder, returned with his forces to Rome in a few days' march. There he adorned the Capitol with the captured standards and necklaces, which are gold chains worn by the Galatae round their necks; but the rest of the spoils, and the captives, he converted to the benefit of his own estate and to the adornment of his triumph.

Thus was the most formidable Celtic invasion repelled, which had been regarded by all Italians, and especially by the Romans, as a danger of the utmost gravity. The victory inspired the Romans with the hope that they might be able to entirely expel the Celts from the valley of the Po: and accordingly the consuls of the next year, Quintus Fulvius Flaccus and Titus Manlius Torquatus, were both sent out with their legions, and military preparations on a large scale, against them. By a rapid attack they terrified the Boii into making submission to Rome; but the campaign had no other practical effect, because, during the rest of it, there was a season of excessive rains, and an outbreak of pestilence in the army.

The consuls for the next year, however, Publius Furius Philus and Caius Flaminius, once more invaded the Celtic lands, marching through the territory of the Anares, who lived not far from Marseilles.<sup>1</sup> Having secured the friendship of this tribe, they crossed into the country of the Insubres, near the confluence of the Adda and Po. annoyance from the enemy, as they were crossing the river, and as they were pitching their camp, and after remaining for a short time, they made terms with the Insubres and left their country. After a circuitous march of several days they crossed the river Chiese, and came into the territory of the Cenomani. As these people were allies of Rome, they reinforced the army with some of their men, which then descended once more from the Alpine regions into the plains belonging to the Insubres, and began laying waste their land and plundering their houses. The Insubrian chiefs, seeing that nothing could change the determination of the Romans to destroy them, determined that they had better try their fortune in a great and decisive battle. They therefore mustered all their forces, took down from the temple of Minerva the golden standards, which are called 'the immovables,' and having made other necessary preparations, in high spirits and in formidable array, encamped to the number of fifty thousand opposite to their enemies. Seeing themselves thus outnumbered, the Romans at first determined to avail themselves of the forces of the allied Celtic tribes; but when they reflected on the fickle character of the Galatae, and that they were about to fight an enemy of the same race as these auxiliary troops, they hesitated to associate such men with themselves, at a crisis of such danger, and in an action of such importance. However, they finally decided on this plan. They themselves stayed on the side of the river

<sup>1</sup> Plutarch, Camillus, 41, copies this, and Polyen, Stratag. viii. 7, copies from Plutarch. It is only in these Greek writers that we read of the bad quality of Celtic swords. Latin writers made no mention of such a striking defect in the arms of their dreaded foes: on the contrary, Pliny quotes from Varro that a Helvetian, named Helicon, resided in Rome teaching the industrial arts of his native land. Archeologists are agreed that the Celtic swords, &c. of La Tene are of excellent iron. So are all those to be seen in our museums. S. Reinach attempted to distort some Celtic swords in the Musée de Saint-Germain, but found that no amount of percussion that a man could apply was sufficient to bend these swords. How, then, was so careful a writer as Polybius misled? We know that the Celts settled in the Cisalpine, circa 1000 B.C. (see supra, p. 178, note 1). In their cemeteries, and in the cemeteries of these Celts all over Europe, we find many examples of bent swords. Polybius visited the Cisalpine after the Roman colonisation consequent on the defeat of the Celts related above. The Romans, after the fashion of colonists, ransacked the graves, &c. of the country. In them they found many bent swords. The graves and swords were attributed to their recently defeated next the enemy : and sending the Celtic contingents to the other side, they pulled up the bridges ; which at once precluded any fear of danger from them, and left themselves no hope of safety except in victory ; the impassable river being thus in their rear. These dispositions made, they were ready to engage.

XXVII. The Romans are thought to have shown uncommon skill in this battle ; the tribunes instructed the troops how they were to conduct themselves both collectively and individually. They had learned from former engagements that Gallic tribes were always most formidable at the first onslaught, before their courage was at all damped by a check ; and that the swords with which they were furnished, as I have mentioned before, could only give one downward cut with any effect, but that after this the edges got so turned, and the blade so bent, that unless they had time to straighten them with their foot against the ground, they could not deliver a second blow. The tribunes therefore gave out the spears of the Triarii, who are the last of the three ranks, to the first ranks, or Hastati ; and ordering the men to use their swords only, after their spears were done with, they charged the Celts full in front. When the Celts had rendered their swords useless by the first blows delivered on the spears, the Romans closed foes of the second Celtic invasion. Polybius, who was shown these swords, also assigned them to the same source ; for all memory of the first Celtic settlers had been lost. Why were these swords bent ? They were intentionally bent in obedience to the same rite that commanded the Greeks to place broken vases beside their dead. Cf. Reinach, L'Anthropologie, 1906, pp. 321-336.

with them, and rendered them quite helpless by preventing them from raising their hands to strike with their swords, which is their characteristic and only stroke, because their blade has no point. The Romans, on the contrary, having excellent points to their swords, used them not only to cut but to thrust ; and by thus repeatedly hitting the breasts and faces of the enemy, they eventually killed the greater number of them. And this was due to the foresight of the tribunes : for the consul Flaminius is thought to have made a strategic mistake in his arrangements for this battle. For by drawing up his men along the very brink of the river, he rendered impossible a manœuvre characteristic of Roman tactics, for he left the lines no room for their plan of retrograde movements ; for if, in the course of the battle, the men had been forced ever so little from their ground, they would have been obliged, through this blunder of their leaders, to throw themselves into the river. However, the valour of the soldiers secured them a brilliant victory, as I have said, and they returned to Rome with abundance of booty of every kind, and of trophies stripped from the enemy.

Insubrians
defeated.

XXVIII. Next year, upon embassies coming from the Celts desiring peace and making unlimited offers of submission, the new consuls, Marcus Claudius Marcellus and Gnaeus Cornelius Scipio Calvus, were urgent that no peace should be granted them. Thus frustrated, they determined to try a last chance, and once more took active measures to hire thirty thousand Gaesatae—the Gallic tribe which lives on the Rhone. Having secured these, they held themselves in readiness, and waited for the attack of their enemies. At the beginning of spring the consuls assumed command of their forces, and marched them into the territory of the Insubres; and there encamped under the walls of the city of Acerrae, which lies between the Po and the Alps, and laid siege to it. The Insubres, being unable to render any assistance, because all the positions of vantage had been seized by the enemy first, and being yet very anxious to raise the siege of Acerrae, detached a portion of their forces to effect a diversion by crossing the Po and laying siege to Clastidium. Intelligence of this movement being brought to the consuls, Marcus Claudius, taking with him his cavalry and some light infantry, made a forced march to relieve the besieged inhabitants. When the Celts heard of his approach they raised the siege; and, marching out to meet him, offered him battle. At first they held their ground against a furious charge of cavalry which the Roman consul launched at them; but when they presently found themselves surrounded by the enemy on their rear and flank, unable to maintain the fight any longer, they fled before the cavalry; and many of them were driven into the river, and were swept away by the stream, though the larger number were cut down by their enemies. Acerrae also, richly stored with corn, fell into the hands of the Romans: the Galatae having evacuated it, and retired to Mediolanum, which is the most commanding position in the territory of the Insubres. Gnaeus followed them closely, and suddenly appeared at Mediolanum. The Galatae at first did not stir ; but upon his starting upon his return march to Acerrae, they sallied forth, and having boldly attacked his rear, killed a good many men, and even drove a part of it into flight ; until Gnaeus recalled some of his vanguard, and urged them to stand and engage the enemy. The Roman soldiers obeyed orders, and offered a vigorous resistance to the attacking party. The Celts, encouraged by their success, held their ground for a certain time with some gallantry, but before long turned and fled to the neighbouring mountains. Gnaeus followed them, wasting the country as he went, and took Mediolanum by assault. After this the chiefs of the Insubres, despairing of safety, made a complete and absolute submission to Rome.

XXIX. Such was the end of the Celtic war, which for the desperate determination and boldness of the enemy, for the obstinacy of the battles fought, and for the number of those who fell and of those who were engaged, is second to none recorded in history, but which, regarded as a specimen of scientific strategy, is utterly contemptible. The Galatae showed no power of planning or carrying out a campaign, and in everything they did were swayed by impulse rather than by sober calculation. As I have seen these tribes, after a short struggle, utterly ejected from the valley of the Po, with the exception of some few localities lying XXXI. As soon as Hannibal had taken over the command, he set out to subdue the tribe of the Olcades; and, having arrived before their most formidable city Althaea, he pitched his camp under its walls; and by a series of energetic and formidable assaults succeeded before long in taking it: by which exploit the rest of the tribe were overawed into submission to Carthage.

XXXII. Next summer he set out on another expedition against the Vaccaei,<sup>1</sup> in which he took Salamanca by assault, but only succeeded in storming Arbucala, owing to the size of the town and the valour of its inhabitants, after a laborious siege. After this he suddenly found himself in a position of great danger on his return march—being set upon by the Carpesii, the strongest tribe in those parts, who were joined also by neighbouring tribes, excited principally by refugees of the Olcades, but roused also to great wrath by those who escaped from Salmantica.

XXXIII. Though Hannibal had taken every precaution for the security of Libya and Iberia, he yet waited for the messengers whom he expected to arrive from the Celts. He had thoroughly acquainted himself with the fertility and populousness of the districts at the foot of the Alps and in the valley of the Po, as well as with the warlike courage of the men; but most important of all, with their hostility towards Rome derived from the previous war, which I have described in my last book, with the express purpose of enabling my readers to follow my narrative.<sup>1</sup> He therefore reckoned very much on the chance of their co-operation; and was careful to send messengers to the chiefs of the Celts, whether dwelling actually on the Alps or on the Italian side of them, with unlimited promises; because he believed he would be able to confine the war against Rome to Italy, if he could make his way through the intervening difficulties to those parts, and avail himself of the active alliance of the Celts. When his messengers returned with the report that the Celts were ready to help him and all eagerness for his approach, and that the passage of the Alps, though laborious and difficult, was not, however, impossible, he collected his forces from their winter quarters at the approach of spring.

XXXIV. From Narbo is the district occupied by the Celts as far as the Pyrenees, stretching continuously from the Mediterranean to the Mare Externum.

XXXV. At this period the Carthaginians were masters of the whole Mediterranean coast of Libya from the Altars of Philaenus, opposite the Great Syrtris, to the Pillars of Hercules, a seaboard of over sixteen thousand stades. They had also crossed the strait of the Pillars of Hercules, and got possession of the whole seaboard of Iberia on the Mediterranean as far as the Pyrenees, which separates the Iberes from the Celts—that is, a distance of about eight thousand stades.

XXXVI. While Hannibal was thus engaged in B.C. 218. effecting a passage over the Pyrenees, where he was greatly alarmed at the extraordinary strength of the positions occupied by the Celts; the Romans, having heard the unfavourable result of their embassy to Carthage, and that Hannibal had crossed the Iber earlier than they expected, at the head of an army, voted to send Publius Cornelius Scipio with his legions into Iberia, and Tiberius Sempronius Longus into Libya. And while the consuls were engaged in hastening on the enrolment of their legions and other military preparations, the people were active in bringing to completion the colonies which they had already voted to send into Gaul. They accordingly caused the fortification of these towns to be pushed on energetically, and ordered the colonists to be in residence within Placentia and thirty days : six thousand having been assigned to each colony. One of these colonies was on the south bank of the Po, and was named Placentia ; the other on the north bank and called Cremona. But no sooner had these colonies been formed, than the Boian Galatae, who had long been lying in wait to throw off the loyalty to Rome, but had up to that time lacked an opportunity, encouraged by the news that reached them of Hannibal's approach, revolted ; thus abandoning the hostages they had given at the end of the war described in my last book. The ill-feeling still remaining towards Rome enabled them to induce the Insubres to join in the revolt, and the united tribes swept over the territory recently allotted by the Romans, and following close on the track of the flying colonists, laid siege to the Roman colony of Mutina, in which the fugitives had taken refuge. Among them were the triumviri or ' three commissioners ' who had been sent out to allot the lands ; of whom one—Gaius Lutatius—was an ex-consul and the other two ex-praetors. These men having demanded a parley with the enemy, the Boii consented ; but treacherously seized them upon their leaving the town, hoping through them to recover their hostages. The praetor Lucius Manlius was on guard in the district with an army ; as soon as he heard what had happened, he advanced with all speed to the relief of Mutina. But the Boii, having received intelligence of his approach, prepared an ambuscade ; and as soon as his army had entered a certain wood, they rushed out upon it from every side and killed a large number of his men. At first the survivors fled with precipitation: but having gained some higher ground, they rallied sufficiently to enable them with much difficulty to effect an honourable retreat. Even so, the Boii followed close upon their heels, and besieged them in a place called the village of Tannes.<sup>1</sup> When the news arrived at Rome, that the fourth legion was surrounded and closely besieged by the Boii, the people with all haste dispatched the legions which had been voted to Consul Publius, to their relief, under the command of a praetor; and ordered the consul to enrol two more legions for himself from the allies.

Such was the position of Celtic affairs from the beginning to the arrival of Hannibal; thus completing the course of events which I have already had occasion to describe.

XXXVII. These arrangements made, he summoned a meeting of his army and introduced Magilus and the other chiefs who had come to him from the valley of the Po, and caused them to announce to the whole army, through an interpreter, the resolutions passed by their tribes. The points which were the strongest encouragement to the army were, first, the actual appearance of envoys inviting them to come, and promising to take part in the war with Rome; secondly, the confidence inspired by their promise to guide them by a route where they would be abundantly supplied with necessaries, and which would lead them with speed and safety into Italy; and,

XXXVIII. The Rhone rises in the north-west of the Adriatic Gulf on the northern slopes of the Alps, and flowing westward,<sup>1</sup> eventually discharges itself into the Sardinian Sea. It flows for the most part through a deep valley, to the north of which lives the Celtic tribe of the Aedui<sup>2</sup>; while its southern side is entirely walled in by the northern slopes of the Alps, the ridges of which, beginning at Marseilles and extending to the head of the Adriatic, separate it from the valley of the Po, of which I have already had occasion to speak at length. It was these mountains that Hannibal now crossed from the Rhone valley into Italy.

XXXIX. Having in ten days' march accomplished a distance of 800 stades along the river bank, Hannibal began the ascent of the Alps, and immediately found himself involved in the most serious dangers. For as long as the Carthaginians were on the plains, the various chiefs of the Allobroges refrained from attacking them for fear of their cavalry, as well as of the Galatae who were escorting them. But when these last departed back again to their own lands, and Hannibal began to enter the mountainous region, the chiefs of the Allobroges mustered large numbers of their tribe and occupied the points of vantage in advance, on the route by which Hannibal's forces were constrained to make their ascent. If they had only kept their design secret, the Carthaginian army would have been entirely destroyed ; as it was, their plans became known, and though they did much damage to Hannibal's army they suffered as much themselves. For when the general learnt that the natives were occupying the points of vantage, he halted and pitched his camp at the foot of the pass, and sent forward some of his Gallic guides to reconnoitre the enemy and discover their plan of operations. The order was obeyed : and he ascertained that it was the enemy's practice to keep under arms and guard these posts carefully during the day, but at night to retire to some town in the neighbourhood. Hannibal accordingly adapted his measures to this strategy of the enemy. He marched forward in broad daylight, and as soon as he came to the mountainous part of the road, pitched his camp only a little way from the enemy. At nightfall he gave orders for the watch-fires to be lit, and leaving the main body of his troops in the camp, and selecting the most suitable of his men, he had them armed lightly, and led them through the narrow parts of the road during the night, and seized on the spots which had been previously occupied by the enemy : they having, according to their regular custom, abandoned them for the nearest town.

XL. When day broke the natives saw what had taken place, and at first desisted from their attempts ; but presently the sight of the immense string of beasts of burden, and of the cavalry, slowly and painfully making the ascent, tempted them to attack the advancing line. Accordingly they fell upon it at many points at once ; and the Carthaginians sustained severe losses, not so much at the hands of the enemy as from the dangerous nature of the ground, which proved especially fatal to the horses and beasts of burden. For as the ascent was not only narrow and rough, but flanked also with precipices, at every movement which tended to throw the line into disorder, large numbers of beasts of burden were hurled down the precipices with their loads on their backs. And what added more than anything else to this sort of confusion were the wounded horses ; for, maddened by their wounds, they either turned round and ran into the advancing beasts of burden, or, rushing furiously forward, dashed aside everything that came in their way on the narrow path, and so threw the whole line into disorder. Hannibal saw what was taking place, and knowing that, even if they escaped this attack, they would never survive the loss of all their baggage, he took with him the men who had seized the strongholds during the night and went to the relief of the advancing line. Having the advantage of charging the enemy from the higher ground he inflicted a severe loss upon them, but suffered also as severe a one in his own army ; for the commotion in the line now grew worse, and in both directions at once—thanks to the shouting and struggling of these combatants : and it was not until he had killed the greater number of the Allobroges, and forced the rest to fly to their own land, that the remainder of the beasts of burden and the horses got slowly, and with difficulty, over the dangerous ground. Hannibal himself rallied as many as he could after the fight, and assaulted the town from which the enemy had sallied ; and finding it almost deserted, because its inhabitants had all been tempted out by the hope of booty, he got possession of it : from which he derived much advantage for the future as well as for the present. The immediate gain consisted of a large number of horses and beasts of burden, and men taken with them ; and for future use he got a supply of corn and cattle sufficient for two or three days : but the most important result of all was the terror inspired in the neighbouring tribes, which prevented anyone of those who lived near the ascent from lightly venturing to meddle with him again.

XLI. Here he pitched a camp and remained a day, and started again. For the next three days he accomplished a certain amount of his journey without accident. But on the fourth he again found himself in serious danger. For the dwellers along his route, having concerted a plan of treachery, met him with branches and garlands, which among nearly all the natives are signs of friendship, as the herald's staff is among the Greeks. Hannibal was cautious about accepting these assurances, and took great pains to discover what their real intention and purpose were. The Celts, however, professed to be fully aware of the capture of the town, and the destruction of those who had attempted to do him wrong; and explained that those events had induced them to come, because they wished neither to inflict nor receive any damage; and finally promised to give him hostages. For a long while Hannibal hesitated and refused to trust their speeches. But at length coming to the conclusion that, if he accepted what was offered, he would perhaps render the men before him less mischievous and implacable—but that, if he rejected them, he must expect undisguised hostility from them—he acceded to their request, and feigned to accept their offer of friendship. The Barbarians handed over the hostages, supplied him liberally with cattle, and in fact put themselves unreservedly into his hands; so that for a time Hannibal's suspicions were allayed, and he employed them as guides for the next difficulty that had to be passed. They guided the army for two days: and then these tribes collected their numbers, and keeping close up with the Carthaginians, attacked them just as they were passing through a certain difficult and precipitous gorge.

XLII. Hannibal's army would now have certainly been utterly destroyed, had it not been for the fact that his fears were still on the alert, and that, having a prescience of what was to come, he had placed his

baggage and cavalry in the van and his hoplites in the rear. These latter covered his line, and were able to stem the attack of the enemy, and accordingly the disaster was less than it would otherwise have been. As it was, however, a large number of beasts of burden and horses perished; for the advantage of the higher ground being with the enemy, the Celts moved along the slopes parallel with the army below, and by rolling down boulders, or throwing stones, reduced the troops to a state of the utmost confusion and danger; so that Hannibal with half his force was obliged to pass the night near a certain white rock, which afforded them protection, separated from his horses and baggage which he was covering; until after a whole night's struggle they slowly and with difficulty emerged from the gorge.

XLIII. Hannibal therefore bent his whole energies to the restoration of the spirits and bodies of his men, and of their horses also. When his army had thus sufficiently recovered (from the effects of the passage over the Alps), finding the Taurini, who lived immediately under the Alps, at war with the Insubres and inclined to be suspicious of the Carthaginians, Hannibal first invited them to terms of friendship and alliance; and, on their refusal, invested their chief city and carried it after a three days' siege. Having put to the sword all who had opposed him, he struck such terror into the minds of the neighbouring tribes that they all gave in their submission out of hand. The other Celts inhabiting these plains were also eager

(iii. 60.)

XLIV. Ἄννιβας μὲν οὖν διὰ τοιοῦδέ τινος ἐνεχείρει τρόπου ποιεῖσθαι τὴν παραίνεσιν. συναγαγὼν γὰρ τὰ πλήθη παρήγαγεν νεανίσκους τῶν αἰχμαλώτων, οὓς εἰλήφει κακοποιούντας τὴν πορείαν ἐν ταῖς περὶ τὰς Ἄλπεις δυσχωρίαῖς. τούτους δὲ κακῶς διετίθετο παρασκευαζόμενος πρὸς τὸ μέλλον· καὶ γὰρ δεσμοὺς εἶχον βαρεῖς καὶ τῷ λιμῷ συνέσχηντο, καὶ ταῖς πληγαῖς αὐτῶν τὰ σώματα διέφθαρτο. καθίσας οὖν τούτους εἰς τὸ μέσον προέθηκε πανοπλίας Γαλατικῆς, οἷαις εἰώθασιν οἱ βασιλεῖς αὐτῶν, ὅταν μονομαχεῖν μέλλωσιν, κατακοσμεῖσθαι· πρὸς δὲ τούτοις ἵππους παρέστησε καὶ σάγους εἰσήνεγκε πολυτελεῖς. κἄπειτα τῶν νεανίσκων ἤρετο τίνες αὐτῶν βούλονται διαγωνίσασθαι πρὸς ἀλλήλους ἐφ' ᾧ τὸν μὲν νικήσαντα τὰ προκείμενα λαμβάνειν ἄθλα, τὸν δ' ἠττηθέντα τῶν παρόντων ἀπηλλάχθαι κακῶν τελευτήσαντα τὸν βίον. πάντων δ' ἀναβοησάντων ἄμα καὶ δηλούντων ὅτι βούλονται μονομαχεῖν, κληρώσασθαι προσέταξε, καὶ δύο τοὺς λαχόντας καθοπλισαμένους ἐκέλευσε μάχεσθαι πρὸς ἀλλήλους. παραυτίκα μὲν οὖν ἀκούσαντες to join the Carthaginians, according to their original purpose ; but the Roman legions had by this time advanced too far, and had intercepted the greater part of them : they were therefore unable to stir, and in some cases were even obliged to serve in the Roman ranks. This determined Hannibal not to delay his advance any longer, but to strike some blow which might encourage those natives who were desirous of sharing his enterprise.

XLIV. The manner in which Hannibal tried to encourage his army was this. He mustered his men and caused some youthful prisoners, whom he had caught when they were attempting to hinder his march on the Alpine passes, to be brought forward. They had been subjected to very great severities with this very object, loaded with heavy chains, half-starved, and their bodies a mass of bruises from scourging. Hannibal caused these men to be placed in the middle of the army, and some suits of Gallic armour, such as are worn by their kings when they fight in single combat, to be exhibited ; in addition to these he placed there some horses, and brought in some valuable military cloaks. He then asked these young prisoners, which of them were willing to do combat on condition of the conqueror taking these prizes, and the vanquished escaping all his present miseries by death. Upon their all answering with a loud shout that they were anxious to engage in these single combats, he bade them draw lots ; and the pair, on whom the first lot fell, to put on the armour and

(iii. 62.)

XLV. Οἱ δὲ συστρατεύομενοι Κελτοὶ τοῖς Ῥωμαίοις θεωροῦντες ἐπικυδεστέρας τὰς τῶν Καρχηδονίων ἐλπίδας, συνταξάμενοι πρὸς ἀλλήλους καιρὸν ἐπετήρουν πρὸς ἐπίθεσιν, μένοντες ἐν ταῖς ἑαυτῶν ἑκαστοὶ σκηναῖς. δειπνοποιησάμενων δὲ καὶ κατακοιμισθέντων τῶν ἐν τῷ χάρακι, παρελθεῖν ἐάσαντες τὸ πλεῖον μέρος τῆς νυκτός, καθωπλισμένοι περὶ τὴν ἑωθινὴν φυλακὴν ἐπιτίθενται τοῖς σύνεγγυς τῶν Ῥωμαίων παραστρατοπεδεύουσι. καὶ πολλοὺς μὲν αὐτῶν ἀπέκτειναν, οὐκ ὀλίγους δὲ κατετραυμάτισαν· τέλος δὲ τὰς κεφαλὰς ἀποτεμόντες τῶν τεθνεῶτων ἀπεχώρουν πρὸς τοὺς Καρχηδονίους, ὄντες πεζοὶ μὲν εἰς δισχιλίους ἵππεῖς δὲ μικρῶ λείποντες διακοσίων. fight. As soon as the young men heard these orders, they lifted up their hands, and each prayed the gods that he might be one of those to draw the lot. And when the lots were drawn, those on whom they fell were overjoyed, and the others in despair. When the fight was finished, too, the surviving captives congratulated the one who had fallen no less than the victor, as having been freed from many terrible sufferings, while they themselves still remained to endure them. And in this sentiment the Carthaginian soldiers were much disposed to join, all pitying the survivors and congratulating the fallen champion.

XLV. But the Celtic contingent of the Roman army, seeing that Hannibal's prospects looked the brighter of the two, concerted their plans for a fixed time, and waited in their several tents for the moment for carrying them out. When the men within the rampart of the camp had taken their supper and were gone to bed, the Celts let more than half the night pass, and just about the time of the morning watch armed themselves and fell upon the Romans who were quartered nearest to them; killed a considerable number, and wounded not a few; and, finally, cutting off the heads of the slain, departed with them to join the Carthaginians, to the number of two thousand infantry and nearly two hundred cavalry. They were received with great satisfaction by Hannibal; who, after addressing them encouragingly, and promising them all suitable rewards, sent them to their several cities, to declare to their compatriots what they had done, and to urge them to make an alliance with him; for he knew that they would now all feel compelled to take part with him, when they learnt the treachery of which their fellow-countrymen had been guilty towards the Romans. Just at the same time the Boii came in, and handed over to him the three Agrarian Commissioners, sent from Rome to divide the lands; whom, as I have already related, they had seized by a sudden act of treachery at the beginning of the war. Hannibal gratefully acknowledged their good intentions, and made a formal alliance with those who came: but he handed them back their prisoners, bidding them to keep them safe, in order to get back their own hostages from Rome, as they intended at first.

XLVI. Publius Scipio regarded this treachery as of most serious importance; and feeling sure that the Celts in the neighbourhood had long been ill-disposed, and would, after this event, all incline to the Carthaginians, he made up his mind that some precaution for the future was necessary. . . . Hannibal pitched his camp about forty stades from him. While the numerous Celts inhabiting the plains (about the Trebia), excited by the good prospects of the Carthaginians, supplied his army with provisions in great abundance, and were eager to take their share with Hannibal in every military operation or battle. . . .

XLVII. But afterwards, finding that certain

Celts who lived in the fork of the Po and Trebia, while pretending to have come to terms with him, were sending messages to the Romans at the same time, believing that thus they would secure themselves from being injured by either side, he sent two thousand infantry with some Celtic and Numidian cavalry with orders to devastate their territory. This order being executed, and a great spoil captured, the Celts appeared at the Roman camp beseeching their aid. Tiberius had all along been looking out for an opportunity of striking a blow; and at once seized on this pretext for sending out a party, consisting of the greater part of his cavalry, and a thousand sharpshooters of his infantry along with them; who having speedily come up with the enemy on the other side of the Trebia, and engaged with them in a sharp struggle for the possession of the booty, forced the Celts and the Numidians to beat a retreat to their own camp.

XLVIII. On his left wing, close to the river, Hannibal stationed the Iberian and Celtic horse opposite the Roman cavalry; and next to them half the Libyan heavy-armed foot; and next to them the Iberian and Celtic foot; next, the other half of the Libyans, and, on the right wing, the Numidian horse. Having now got them all into line he advanced with the central companies of the Iberians and Celts; and so arranged the other companies next these in regular gradations, that the whole line became crescent-shaped, diminishing in depth towards its extremities:

his object being to have his Libyans as a reserve in the battle, and to commence the action with his Iberians and Celts.

The armour of the Libyans was Roman, for Hannibal had armed them with a selection of the spoils taken in previous battles. The shield of the Iberians and Celts was about the same size, but their swords were quite different. For that of the Romans can thrust with as deadly effect as it can cut, while the Gallic sword can only cut, and that requires some room. And the companies coming alternately—the naked Celts, and the Iberians with their short linen tunics bordered with purple stripes—the whole appearance of the line was strange and terrifying. The whole strength of the Carthaginian cavalry was ten thousand, but that of their foot was not more than forty thousand, including the Celts.

XLIX. For, as though Fortune were in league with the disasters that had already befallen them to fill up the measure of their ruin, it happened that only a few days after (their ruin at Cannae), while the city was still in this panic, the praetor who had been sent into Gaul fell unexpectedly into an ambush and perished, and his army was utterly annihilated by the Celts.

the Galatae under Comontorius, they were reduced to a sad state of distress indeed.

The Galatae had left their country with Brennus, and having survived the battle at Delphi and made their way to the Hellespont, instead of crossing to Asia, were captivated by the beauty of the district round Byzantium, and settled there. Then having conquered the Thracians and erected Tyle into a capital, they placed the Byzantines in extreme danger. In their earlier attacks, made under the command of Comontorius, their first king, the Byzantines always bought them off by presents amounting to three, or five, or sometimes even ten thousand gold pieces, on condition of their not devastating their territory: and at last were compelled to agree to pay them a yearly tribute of eighty talents, until the time of Cavarus, in whose reign their kingdom came to an end; and their whole tribe, being now in their turn conquered by the Thracians, were entirely annihilated.

LI. So when the Gallic king, Cavarus, came to Byzantium, and showed himself eager to put an end to the war, and earnestly offered his friendly intervention, both Prusias and the Byzantines consented to his proposals.

LV. While Attalus was here (at the river Megistus, in Mysia) an eclipse of the moon occurred, and the Galatae, who had all along been much discontented at the hardships of the march—which was rendered the more painful for them by the fact of their being accompanied by their wives and children, who followed the host in wagons—now regarded the eclipse as an evil augury and refused to go on. But King Attalus, who got no effective service from them, and saw that they straggled during the march and encamped by themselves, and wholly declined to obey orders and despised all authority, was in great doubt as to what to do. He was anxious lest they should desert to Achaeus, and join in the attack on himself, and was uneasy at the same time about the scandal to which he would give rise if he caused his soldiers to surround and kill all these men, who were believed to have crossed into Asia in reliance on his honour. He therefore seized the occasion of their refusal to proceed, to promise them that he would see that they were taken back to the place where they had crossed into Asia; would assign them suitable lands for a settlement, and would afterwards do them any service they asked for, if it was within his power and consistent with justice. Accordingly Attalus led the Aegosagae back to the Hellespont.

LVI. During this period Prusias did a thing that deserves to be recorded. The Galatae, whom King Attalus had brought over from Europe to assist him against Achaeus on account of their reputation for courage, had separated from that monarch on account of the jealous suspicions of which I have before spoken, and were plundering the cities on the Hellespont with gross licentiousness and violence, and finally went so far as actually to besiege Ilium. In these circumstances the inhabitants of Alexandria in the Troad acted with commendable spirit. They sent Themistes with four thousand men and forced the Galatae to raise the siege of Ilium, and drove them entirely out of the Troad, by cutting off their supplies and frustrating all their designs. Thereupon the Galatae seized Arisba, in the territory of Abydos, and thenceforth devoted themselves to forming designs and committing acts of hostility against the cities built in that district. Against them Prusias led out an army; and in a pitched battle put the men to the sword on the field, and slew nearly all their women and children in the camp, leaving the baggage to be plundered by the soldiers. This achievement of Prusias delivered the cities on the Hellespont from great fear and danger, LXI. For owing to the populousness and wealth of the country, the droves of swine in Italy are exceedingly large, especially along the sea-coast of the Tuscans and Galatae.

LXII. The approaches of these Celtiberes did a great deal also to encourage the hopes of the Carthaginians ; for, instead of four thousand, it was reported at Carthage that they were ten thousand, and that their bravery and the excellency of their arms made them irresistible in the field. . . . When the news of these proceedings reached the Roman camp Scipio immediately determined to attack. . . . At the very first charge the Numidians reeled before the Italian cavalry, and the Carthaginians wavered before the horse commanded by Massanissa ; for their many previous defeats had completely demoralised them. But the Celtiberes fought gallantly, for they had no hope of saving themselves by flight, being entirely unacquainted with the country ; nor any expectation of being spared if they were taken prisoners on account of their perfidy to Scipio : for they were regarded as having acted in defiance of justice and of their treaty in coming to aid the Carthaginians against the Romans, though they had never suffered any act of hostility at Scipio's hands during the campaigns in Iberia. When, however, the two wings gave way these men were surrounded by the principes and triarii, and cut to pieces on the field almost to a man. Thus perished the Celtiberes, who yet did very effective service to the Carthaginians, not only during the whole battle, but during the retreat also; for, if it had not been for the hindrance caused by them, the Romans would have pressed the fugitives closely, and very few of the enemy would have escaped.

LXIII. Now these envoys arrived at Rome before the senate had settled the provinces of the consuls appointed for this year, and whether it would be necessary to send both to Gaul, or one of them against Philip. But the friends of Flaminius having assured themselves that both consuls would remain in Italy owing to a threat of an attack from the Celts, all the ambassadors appeared and bluntly stated their grievances against Philip. . . . The senate, as I have said, assigned Gaul to both the consuls as their province.

LXVI. While the negotiations for peace with Antiochus, and for the settlement of Asia in general were going on at Rome, and the Aetolian war was being fought in Greece, it happened that another war in Asia, that, namely, against the Galatae, was brought to a conclusion, the account of which I am now about to give . . . multa absunt.

LXVII. Cnaeus sent envoys to Eposognatus the Galatian, desiring him to send embassies to the kings of the Galatae. Eposognatus in his turn sent envoys to Cnaeus begging him not to move his quarters or attack the Tolistobogian Galatae; and assuring him that he would send embassies to the kings and propose peace to them, and felt quite certain that he would be able to bring them to a proper view of affairs in all respects . . . multa desunt. . . In the course of his march through the country Cnaeus made a bridge over the river Sangorius, which was extremely deep and difficult to cross. And having encamped on the bank of the river, he was visited by some Galli sent by Attis and Battocus, the priests of the mother of the gods at Pesinus, wearing figures and images on their breasts, and announcing that the goddess promised him victory and power. To these Cnaeus gave a courteous reception. . . . multa desunt.

When Cnaeus was at the small town of Gordieium, ambassadors came from Eposognatus, announcing that he had been round and had talked to the kings of the Galatae, but that they would not consent to make any overtures of friendship whatever; on the LXVIII. It chanced that among the prisoners made when the Romans won the victory at Olympus over the Galatae of Asia, was Chiomara, wife of Ortiago. The centurion who had charge of her availed himself of his chance in soldierly fashion and violated her.

He was a slave indeed both to money and lust: but eventually his love of money got the upper hand; and, on a large sum of gold being agreed to be paid for the woman, he led her off to put her to ransom. There was a river between the two camps, and when the Galatae had crossed it, paid the man the money, and received the woman, she ordered one of them by a nod to strike the Roman as he was in the act of taking a polite and affectionate farewell of her. The man obeyed, and cut off the centurion's head, which she picked up and drove off with, wrapped in the folds of her dress. On reaching her husband she threw the head at his feet; and when he expressed astonishment and said: 'Wife, to keep faith is a good thing,' she replied: 'Yes, but it is a better thing that there should be only one man alive who has lain with me.'<sup>1</sup>

LXIX. After the victory over the Galatae at Olym-pus, when the Romans were encamped at Ancyra, and Cnaeus was on the point of continuing his advance, ambassadors came from the Tectosages asking that Cnaeus would leave his troops in their quarters, and advance himself in the course of the next day into the space between the two camps ; and promising that their kings would come to meet him, and discuss the terms of a peace. But when Cnaeus consented, and duly arrived at the appointed place with five hundred horse, the kings did not appear. After his return to the camp, however, the ambassadors came again, and, offering some excuses for the kings, begged him to come once more, as they would send some of their chief men to discuss the whole question. Cnaeus consented, but, without leaving the camp himself, sent Attalus and some tribunes with three hundred horse. The envoys of the Galatae duly appeared and discussed the business : but finally said it was impossible for them to conclude the matter or ratify anything they agreed upon ; but they engaged that the kings would come next day to agree on the terms and finally settle the treaty, if the consul would also come to them. Attalus promised that Cnaeus would come, and they separated for that day. But the Galatae were deliberately contriving these procrastina-tions, and amusing the Romans, because they wanted to get some part of their families and property beyond the river Halys ; and, first of all, to get the Roman consul into their hands if they could, but if not, at

LXX. Meanwhile in Asia the Roman consul Cnaeus Manlius wintered at Ephesus, in the last year of this Olympiad, and was there visited by embassies from the Greek cities in Asia and many others, bringing complimentary crowns to him for his victories over the Galatae. For the entire inhabitants of Asia on this side of Taurus were not so much rejoiced at the prospect given them by Antiochus's defeat of being relieved from tribute, garrisons, or other royal exactions, as at the removal of all fear of the Barbarians, and at their escape from their insolence and lawlessness. Among the rest Musaeus came from Antiochus, and some envoys from the Galatae, desiring to obtain the terms upon which friendship would be granted them; and also from Ariarathes, the King of Cappadocia. . . . The consul complimented the ambassadors from the cities, and dismissed them after a very favourable reception; but he replied to the Galatae that he would not make a treaty with them until King Eumenes (of Pergamum), whom he expected, had arrived.

LXXIII. (Eumenes) imagined that at last his own kingdom was safe, and that he might look forward to a time of ease, now that Perseus and the whole kingdom of Macedonia were utterly destroyed; yet it was then that he was confronted with the gravest dangers, by the Galatae in Asia seizing the opportunity for an unexpected rising. . . . Desunt cætera. Gauls attack King Eumenes of Pergamum (B.C. 169-168).

LXXIV. Attalus, brother of King Eumenes, came to Rome this year, pretending that, even if the disaster of the Gallic rising had not happened to the kingdom, he should have come to Rome to congratulate the senate, and to receive some mark of its approval for having been actively engaged on their side and having loyally shared in all their dangers: as it happened, he had been forced to come at that time to Rome owing to the danger from the Galatae. . . . Accordingly, when Attalus appeared before the senate, he congratulated it on what had happened; expatiated on the loyalty and zeal shown by himself in the war with Perseus; and urged at some length that the senate should send envoys to restrain the audacity of the Galatae, and compel them to confine themselves once more to their original boundaries. Eumenes has to appeal to Rome for help (B.C. 167).

LXXV. On the ground of a general dislike to the visits of kings [the senate] published a decree that 'no king was to visit Rome.' . . . This is the way in which Eumenes was prevented from coming to Rome. And it was not the only important result of this decree. For the Galatae were at that time threatening the kingdom of Eumenes; and it was soon made apparent that by this repulse the king's allies were all greatly depressed, while the Galatae were doubly encouraged to press on the war. And it was in fact their desire to humiliate him in every possible way that induced the senate to adopt this resolution.

LXXVII. When this same king (Antiochus Epiphanes) heard of the games in Macedonia held by the Roman proconsul Aemilius Paulus, wishing to outdo Paulus by the splendour of his liberality, he sent envoys to the several cities announcing games to be held by him at Daphne; and it became the rage in Greece to attend them. The public ceremonies began with a procession composed as follows: first came some men armed in the Roman fashion, with their coats made of chain armour, five thousand in the prime of life. Next came five thousand Mysians, who were followed by three thousand Cilicians armed like light infantry, and wearing gold crowns. Next to them came three thousand Thracians and five thousand Galatae. . . . The number of images of gods it is impossible to tell completely: for images of every god or demigod or hero accepted by mankind were carried there, some gilded and others adorned with gold-embroidered robes; and the myths, belonging to each, according to accepted tradition, were represented by the most costly symbols.

LXXVIII. The ambassadors from Prusias (to Rome) complained of King Eumenes, alleging that he had taken certain places belonging to their country, and had not in any sense evacuated Galatia, or complied with the decrees of the senate; but had been supporting all who favoured himself, and depressing in every possible way those who wished to shape their policy in accordance with the senate's decrees. . . . The senate listened to the accusers, and neither rejected their accusations nor openly expressed its own opinion; but acted with close reserve, thoroughly distrusting both Eumenes and Antiochus, and meanwhile contented itself by continually supporting Galatia and contriving some fresh security for its freedom. B.C. 164.

LXXIX. On the complaint of the ambassadors of Marseilles as to their injuries sustained at the hands of the Ligurians, the senate at once appointed a commission, consisting of Flaminius, Popilius Laenas, and Lucius Pupius, who sailed with the envoys of Marseilles, and landed in the territory of the Oxybii Roman expedition against the Oxybii and Deciatae, tribes of Transalpine Celts (B.C. 154-153).

at the town of Aegitna. . . . Having collected his army at Placentia, Quintus Opimius marched over the Apennines and arrived in the territory of the Oxybii; and pitching his camp on the river Apro, awaited the enemy, being informed that they were mustering their forces and were eager to give him battle. Meanwhile he advanced to Aegitna, where the ambassadors had been outraged, took the city by assault, and sold the inhabitants as slaves, sending the ringleaders of the outrage in chains to Rome. Having done this, he went to meet the enemy. The Oxybii, convinced that their violence to the ambassadors admitted of no terms being granted them, with all the courage of desperation, and excited to the highest pitch of furious enthusiasm, did not wait to be joined by the Deciatae, but, having collected to the number of four thousand, rushed to the attack of their enemy. Quintus was somewhat dismayed by the boldness of their attack, and at the desperate fury of the Barbarians; but was encouraged by observing that the enemy were advancing in complete disorder, for he was an experienced soldier and a man of great natural sagacity. He therefore drew out his men, and, after a considerable harangue, advanced at a slow pace towards the enemy. His charge was delivered with great vigour: he quickly repulsed the enemy, killed a great many of them, and forced the rest into headlong flight. Meanwhile the Deciatae had mustered their forces, and appeared on the ground intending to fight side by side with the Oxybii; but finding themselves too late for the battle, they received the fugitives in their ranks, and after a short time charged the Romans with great fury and enthusiasm; but being worsted in the engagement, they immediately all surrendered themselves and their city to the discretion of the Romans. Having thus become masters of these tribes, Opimius delivered over their territory on the spot to the people of Marseilles, and for the future forced the Ligurians to give hostages at certain fixed intervals to the Marsilians. LXXX. In treating of the geography of Europe I shall say nothing of the ancient geographers, but shall confine my attention to their modern critics, Dicaearchus, Eratosthenes, who is the most recent writer on geography, and Pytheas, who has misled many readers by professing to have traversed on foot<sup>1</sup> the whole of Britain, the coast line of which island, he says, is more than forty thousand stades. And again by his stories of Thule and the countries in its neighbourhood, 'in which,' he says, 'there is neither unmixed land nor sea nor air, but a kind of compound of all three (like the jelly-fish or Pulmo Marinus), in which earth and sea and everything else are held in suspense, and which forms a kind of connecting link to the whole, through which one can neither walk nor sail.' This substance, which he says is like the Pulmo Marinus, he saw with his own eyes, and the rest he learnt by report: such is Pytheas's story, and he adds that, on his return thence, he traversed the whole of the coast of Europe from Cadiz to the Tanais. But we cannot believe that a private person, who was also a poor man, should have made such immense journeys by land and sea.<sup>1</sup> Even Eratosthenes doubted this part of his story, though he believed what he said about Britain and Cadiz and Iberia. I would much rather believe the Messenian [Euhemerus] than him. The latter is content with saying that he sailed to one country which he calls Panchaia; while the former asserts that he has actually seen the whole northern coast of Europe up to the very verge of the world, which one would hardly believe of Hermes himself if he said it. Eratosthenes calls Euhemerus a Bergaeon,<sup>2</sup> yet believes Pytheas, though Dicaearchus himself did not. . . . Eratosthenes and Dicaearchus give mere popular guesses as to distance.

LXXXI. Eratosthenes is quite ignorant of the geography of Iberia and sometimes makes absolutely contradictory statements about it. He says, for instance, that its western coast as far as Cadiz is inhabited by Galatae, since the whole western side of Europe, as far south as Cadiz, is occupied by that people; and then, quite forgetting he had said this, when taking a survey of the whole of Spain he nowhere mentions the Galatae<sup>3</sup> . . .

LXXXIII. Near Aquileia, Polybius says, in the territory of the Noric Taurisci, in my own time a gold mine was discovered, so easy to work, that by scraping away the surface soil for two feet, gold could be found immediately. The seam of gold was not more than fifteen feet; some of it was found unmixed with alloy in nuggets of the size of a bean or lupine, only an eighth of it disappearing in the furnace; but some of it required more elaborate smelting, but would still pay very well. Accordingly, on the Italians joining the Barbarians in working this mine, in two months the price of gold went down a third throughout Italy, and when the Taurisci discovered that, they expelled their Italian fellow-workers and kept the monopoly themselves.

LXXXIV. The war between the Romans and Celtiberians was called the 'fiery war'; for it was of a peculiarly fierce kind and remarkable for the frequency of its battles. The wars in Greece and Asia were as a rule settled by one battle, or in rare cases by two; and the battles themselves were decided by the result of the first charge and impact of the two armies. But in this war things were quite different. As a rule the battles were stopped only by the fall of night; the men neither lost heart nor would yield to bodily fatigue; but returned again and again with fresh vigour to renew the combat. The whole war, and its series of pitched battles, was at length interrupted for a time by the winter. One therefore could hardly conceive a war more nearly answering our notion of a 'fiery war' than this. . . .

LXXXV. The Celtiberians, after making a truce with the consul M. Claudius Marcellus, had sent ambassadors to Rome who remained there quietly waiting for the answer of the senate. Meanwhile M. Claudius went on an expedition against the Lusitani, took Nercobrica by assault, and then went into winter quarters at Corduba. Of the ambassadors who came to Rome the senate admitted those from the Belli and Titthi,<sup>1</sup> who were favourable to Rome, to enter the city; but ordered those from the Arevacae<sup>2</sup> to lodge on the other side of the Tiber, as being at war with Rome, till such time as the senate should have decided the whole question. When the time for the interview was come, the praetors introduced the envoys from their allies first. Barbarians as they were, they made a set speech, and endeavoured to explain clearly the causes of all the dissension prevailing in their country, pointing out that 'unless those who had broken out into war were reduced to tranquillity and punished as they deserved, the very moment the Roman legions left Iberia they would inflict punishment upon the Belli and Titthi as traitors; and that if they escaped unpunished for their first act of hostility, they would make all the tribes of Iberia ripe for an outbreak from the belief that they were capable of coping with Rome. They begged, therefore, that the legions should remain in Iberia, and that each year a consul<sup>1</sup> should come thither to protect the allies of Rome and punish the depredations of the Arevacae ; or, if they wished to withdraw the legions, they should first take signal vengeance for the outbreak of this tribe, that no one should venture to do the like again.' Such, or to this effect, was the speech of the envoys of the Belli and Titthi who were in alliance with Rome. The envoys of the hostile tribe were then introduced. On coming forward the Arevacae assumed a feigned tone of submission and humility in the language of their answer, without being, as was evident, at all yielding in their hearts or acknowledging themselves beaten. On the contrary, they continually hinted at the uncertainty of fortune ; and speaking of the battles that had taken place as undecided, they conveyed the impression that they had had the best of the contest in them all. The upshot of their speech was this : ' If they must submit to some definite mulct for their error, they were ready to do so : but, when that was completed, they demanded that things should revert to the position fixed by their treaty made with the senate in the time of Tiberius Gracchus.'<sup>2</sup>

LXXXVI. The senators having thus heard both sides called in the legates from Marcellus ; and when they saw that they also were inclined to a pacification, and that Marcellus was more inclined to favour the enemy than the allied tribes, they answered the Arevacae that Marcellus would declare in Iberia to both parties the decision of the senate. However, they were convinced in their own minds that their true interests were such as the envoys of the allied tribes suggested, and that the Arevacae were still inclined to haughty independence, and that their own commander was afraid of them: they therefore gave secret instructions to the envoys of Marcellus to carry on the war with spirit, and as the honour of the country demanded. But when they had thus determined on a continuance of the war, feeling no confidence in Marcellus, they determined first of all to send a commander to relieve him in Iberia, as the new consuls Aulus Postumius and Lucius Licinius Lucullus had just taken up their office. They then entered on their preparations with spirit and vigour, because they believed that the Iberian question would be decided by the result of this campaign: if these enemies were beaten, they assumed that all others would accept the orders of Rome; but that, if the Arevacae proved able to ward off the punishment that threatened them, not only would their spirits be again raised, but those of all the other Iberian tribes besides.

Iberia in the previous year (B.C. 153), and those who had served under him, of the perpetual recurrence of the pitched battles, the number of the fallen, and the valour of the Celtiberians, combined with the notorious fact that Marcellus shrank in terror from the war, caused such a panic in the minds of the new levies as the old men declared had never happened before. To such an extent did the panic go, that sufficient men were not found to come forward for the office of military tribune, and these posts were consequently not entirely filled up; whereas heretofore a larger number than were wanted had been wont to volunteer for the duty: nor would the men nominated by the consuls as legati to accompany the commanders consent to serve; and, worst of all, the young men tried to avoid the levies, and put forward such excuses as were disgraceful for them to allege, and beneath the investigation of the consuls, and yet impossible to refute.

LXXXVIII. The Celtiberians have a peculiar manœuvre in war. When they see their infantry hard pressed, they dismount and leave their horses standing in their places. They have small pegs attached to their leading reins, and having fixed them carefully into the ground, they train their horses to keep their places obediently in line until they come back and pull up the pegs.

APOLLODORUS OF ATHENS

Apollodorus of Athens flourished circa B.C. 140. He was a prolific and authoritative writer on mythology, history, geography, and grammar. Unfortunately most of his works are known to us only through fragments. In B.C. 123, the Romans entered Transalpine Gaul for the definite purpose of acquiring a safe line of communication between Italy and the Spanish Peninsula. At that period the Arverni and the Aedui

POSEIDONIUS OF APAMEA

Poseidonius was born at Apamea in Syria circa 135 B.C. He was the most learned and influential of the later Stoics. Having visited the West of Europe he founded a school at Rhodes where Cicero was his pupil in 78 B.C., and where he was honoured were engaged in a struggle for the supremacy of Gaul. The Arverni had joined the Allobroges in their struggle against the Romans at the outbreak of the war, and this naturally decided the Romans to seek the friendship of the Aedui. This alliance is mentioned in excerpt 1 below, and endured till Gaul was finally conquered by Julius Caesar.

with two visits from Pompey, the first in 67 B.C., the second in 62 B.C.

It is not possible to determine the extent of his travels in Western Europe, but it is certain that he visited and explored the Spanish Peninsula and the country round the Alps. It is also probable that he penetrated to Britain by the trade route along the Rhone, but with the interior of Gaul he seems to have been unacquainted.

He wrote, among several other works, a continuation, extending to fifty-two books, of the Histories of Polybius in which he seems to have dealt chiefly with the events between 145–82 B.C. In this work he recorded his observations in Western Europe, and preserved much information of the highest value to students of Celtic history. Unfortunately his work is known to us only in fragments, found chiefly in Diodorus Siculus and in Strabo. Both these compilers took some liberties with the work of Poseidonius, but the cross references given below will enable the reader to compare the two redactions, which should be further compared with Caesar's account of Gaul in his De Bello Gallico, vi. 13–20, where Poseidonius is freely made use of. ancient writers of not acknowledging the sources of their information, it is sometimes difficult to determine whether a passage should be assigned to Poseidonius or to Pytheas,<sup>1</sup> and the accounts of both these explorers should be compared.

In extract XXVIII. quoted below Poseidonius would make the terms Celt and Hyperborean synonymous, but Hyperborean was more generally given a wider meaning, and used to connote all the peoples of Northern Europe including the Celts.

All that Poseidonius relates of the bards, whom he is the first writer to mention, of the feasting customs, of turning deisiol, of duels, of fighting tactics, of weapons, &c., is to be found in the old Irish saga, the Táin Bó Cúalnge, except the custom of human sacrifices which at the beginning of the Christian era had seemingly ceased to be practised in Ireland.

I. The inhabitants of Britain are said to be autochthonous, and to have preserved their original manners. In war they use chariots, as is related of ancient Greek heroes in the Trojan war. The houses they inhabit are unpretentious in appearance, and for the most part built of reeds and wood.<sup>2</sup> They gather their harvest of corn by cutting off the ears and placing them in underground pits. From these pits they take the grains longest in store, and make of them their daily food. Their manners are simple, and very far removed from the craftiness and corruption

The climate is very cold, the isle being situated under the Bear. A number of kings and chiefs govern the country, and these, as a rule, live in peace with one another.<sup>1</sup>

II. Of the customs and other peculiarities of the country we shall speak when we come to the history of Caesar's expedition to Britain.<sup>2</sup> This is the place to speak of the tin that is mined there. The Britons of the neighbourhood of Cape Belerium are very friendly towards strangers, and, from their contact with them, are somewhat civilised. It is they who prepare the tin, working with skill the mine that yields it. The mine is of a stony nature, and runs in seams into the bosom of the earth, whence the miners extract the tin, and purify it by smelting. They fashion the lumps of metal into the shape of dies, and then convey them to an island off Britain, called Ictis, carrying over the lumps of tin on chariots at low tide when the intervening ground is above water. One remarkable peculiarity of the neighbouring islands between Europe and Britain is that at high tide they are completely surrounded by water, but at low water the sea recedes, and a large part of the land is exposed giving the islands the appearance of peninsulæ.<sup>3</sup> There the merchants purchase the tin

ώνονται, καὶ διακομίζουσιν εἰς τὴν Γαλατίαν· τὸ δὲ τελευταῖον πεζῆ διὰ τῆς Γαλατίας πορευθέντες ἡμέρας ὡς τριάκοντα, κατάγουσιν ἐπὶ τῶν ἵππων τὰ φορτία πρὸς τὴν ἐκβολὴν τοῦ Ῥοδανοῦ ποταμοῦ. Περὶ μὲν οὖν τοῦ κασσιτέρου τοῖς ῥηθείσιν ἀρκεσθησόμεθα.<sup>1</sup> (idem v. 22.)

III. Ἐπεὶ δὲ περὶ τῆς τῶν Γαλατῶν προσηγορίας διήληθομεν,<sup>2</sup> καὶ περὶ τῆς χώρας αὐτῶν δέον ἐστὶν εἰπεῖν. Ἡ τοίνυν Γαλατία κατοικεῖται μὲν ὑπὸ πολλῶν ἔθνων διαφόρων τοῖς μεγέθεσι. Τὰ μέγιστα γὰρ αὐτῶν σχεδὸν εἴκοσι μυριάδας ἀνδρῶν ἔχει, τὰ δ' ἐλάχιστα πέντε μυριάδας· ὧν ἐστὶν ἓν πρὸς Ῥωμαίους ἔχον συγγένειαν παλαιὰν καὶ φιλίαν, τὴν μέχρι τῶν καθ' ἡμᾶς χρόνων διαμένουσαν.<sup>3</sup> Κειμένη δὲ κατὰ τὸ πλείστον ὑπὸ τὰς ἄρκτους, χειμέριός ἐστι καὶ ψυχρὰ διαφερόντως. Κατὰ γὰρ τὴν χειμερινὴν ὥραν ἐν ταῖς συννεφέσις ἡμέραις, ἀντὶ μὲν τῶν ὄμβρων χιόνι πολλῇ νίφεται, κατὰ δὲ τὰς αἰθρίας κρυστάλλῳ καὶ πάγοις ἐξαισίους πληθύνει· δι' ὧν οἱ ποταμοὶ πηγνύμενοι, διὰ τῆς ἰδίας φύσεως γεφυροῦνται. Οὐ μόνον γὰρ οἱ τυχόντες ὀδίται κατ' ὀλίγους κατὰ τοῦ κρυστάλλου πορευόμενοι διαβαίνουσιν, ἀλλὰ καὶ στρατοπέδων μυριάδες μετὰ σκευοφόρων καὶ ἀμαξῶν γεμουσῶν ἀσφαλῶς περαιοῦνται. Πολλῶν δὲ καὶ μεγάλων ποταμῶν ῥεόντων διὰ τῆς Γαλατίας, καὶ τοῖς ρεῖθροις ποικίλως τὴν πεδιάδα [γῆν] τεμνόντων, οἱ μὲν ἐκ λιμνῶν ἀβύσσων ῥέουσιν, οἱ δ' ἐκ τῶν ὄρων ἔχουσι τὰς πηγὰς καὶ τὰς ἐπιρροίας· τὴν δ' ἐκβολὴν οἱ μὲν εἰς τὸν ὠκεανὸν ποιοῦνται, οἱ δ' εἰς τὴν καθ' ἡμᾶς θάλασσαν. Μέγιστος δ' ἐστὶ τῶν εἰς τὸ καθ' ἡμᾶς πέλαγος ῥεόντων ὁ Ῥοδανός, τὰς μὲν γονὰς ἔχων ἐν τοῖς Ἀλπείοις ὄρεσι, πέντε δὲ στόμασιν ἐξερευγόμενος εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν. from the natives, and transport it to Gaul. Finally, loading it on horses, they journey across Gaul on foot in about 30 days to the mouth of the Rhone. Let this satisfy for our account of the tin.<sup>1</sup>

III. Having explained the origin of the name of the Galatae,<sup>2</sup> we must now speak of the country itself. Gaul is now inhabited by several tribes of various populations; the stronger tribes numbering about 200,000 men; the weaker about 50,000. Of these tribes there is one which to our day has remained faithful to an old friendship and affection towards the Romans.<sup>3</sup> As Gaul is to a large extent situated under the Bear, the winter there is long and extremely cold. In the misty days of the winter season snow falls instead of rain; and when the sky is clear it freezes into solid ice, which transforms the frozen rivers into natural bridges. Not only do travellers journeying in small parties cross over the ice in perfect safety, but even armies numbering tens of thousands and laden with carts and baggage. Gaul is intersected by large and numerous rivers winding through its plains: some have their sources in deep lakes, some rush down from the mountains; the former discharging into the ocean, the latter into the Mediterranean. Of the rivers discharging into the Mediterranean the largest is the Rhone. It has its rise in the Alps, and enters the sea by five mouths. Of the rivers flowing into the ocean the Danube<sup>4</sup> and Rhine

IV. Ἴδιον δέ τι καὶ παράδοξον συμβαίνει κατὰ τὴν πλείστην τῆς Γαλατίας, περὶ οὗ παραλιπεῖν οὐκ ἄξιον ἠγοῦμεθα. Ἀπὸ γὰρ θερμῆς δύσεως καὶ ἄρκτου πνεῖν εἰώθασιν ἄνεμοι τηλικαύτην ἔχοντες σφοδρότητα καὶ δύναμιν, ὥστε ἀναρπάζειν ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς λίθους χειροπληθιαίους τοῖς μεγέθεσι, καὶ τῶν ψηφίδων ἀδρομερῆ κονιορτόν· καθόλου δὲ καταγιγίζοντες λάβρως, ἀρπάζουσιν ἀπὸ μὲν τῶν ἀνδρῶν τὰ ὄπλα καὶ τὰς ἐσθῆτας, ἀπὸ δὲ τῶν ἵππων τοὺς ἀναβάτας. Διὰ δὲ τὴν ὑπερβολὴν τοῦ ψύχους διαφθειρομένης τῆς κατὰ τὸν ἀέρα κράσεως, οὔτε οἶνον, οὔτε ἔλαιον φέρει. Διόπερ τῶν Γαλατῶν οἱ τούτων τῶν καρπῶν στερισκόμενοι, πόμα κατασκευάζουσιν ἐκ τῆς κριθῆς τὸ προσαγορευόμενον ζύθος, καὶ τὰ κηρία πλύνοντες, τῷ τούτων ἀποπλύματι χρώνται. Κάτιοι δὲ ὄντες καθ' ὑπερβολὴν, τὸν εἰσαγόμενον ὑπὸ τῶν ἐμπόρων οἶνον ἄκρατον ἐμφοροῦνται, καὶ διὰ τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν λάβρῳ χρώμενοι τῷ ποτῷ, καὶ μεθυσθέντες, εἰς ὕπνον ἢ μανιώδεις διαθέσεις τρέπονται. Διὸ καὶ πολλοὶ τῶν Ἰταλικῶν ἐμπόρων διὰ τὴν συνήθη φιλαργυρίαν ἔρμαιον ἠγοῦνται τὴν τῶν Γαλατῶν φιλοιδίαν. Οὗτοι γὰρ διὰ μὲν τῶν πλωτῶν are reputed to be the largest. [It is over the latter river that the deified Caesar in our times built his wonderful bridge, and, transporting his army over it, conquered the Galatae on the opposite bank.]<sup>1</sup> Several other navigable rivers run through Gaul, but it would take too long to describe them here. Nearly all these rivers become frozen, and form natural bridges. In order to prevent travellers from slipping on it owing to its natural smoothness, and to afford a safer footing, they scatter straw over the ice.<sup>2</sup>

IV. A phenomenon too remarkable to pass over is observed throughout the greater part of Gaul. The north-west winds blow with such rude force that they raise from the earth stones as large as a fist, and a thick grit of gravel. Lastly, violent whirlwinds carry off the men's armour and clothes, and blow the riders from their horses. To such an extent does the excessive cold attenuate the density of the atmosphere that in Gaul the vine and olive do not grow. Being deprived of these fruits the Galatae make from barley a drink which they call zythus. They flavour water with honey and use it as a drink. Merchants bring them undiluted wine of which they are very fond, and which they drink so greedily that they become drunk, and fall into either a deep sleep or a violent outburst. Moreover, many of the Italian merchants, actuated by their usual greed, do not fail to profit by the Gauls' love for wine. For transporting the wine to them,

VI. Οἱ δὲ Γαλάται τοῖς μὲν σώμασίν εἰσιν εὐμήκεις, ταῖς δὲ σαρξὶ κάθυγροι καὶ λευκοί· ταῖς δὲ κόμαις οὐ μόνον ἐκ φύσεως ξανθοί, ἀλλὰ καὶ διὰ τῆς κατασκευῆς ἐπιτηδεύουσιν αὔξειν τὴν φυσικὴν τῆς χροῆς ιδιότητα. they use boats on the navigable rivers and carts across the level country. They receive fancy prices, for in exchange for a cask of wine they get a young slave.

V. Gaul is absolutely without silver mines, but Gold.

has a large quantity of native gold. This the people gather without any toil or trouble. As the waves break obliquely against the steep shores they detach large fragments of rock full of gold ingots. Setting to work the inhabitants diligently collect and grind the boulders, and washing away the earthy deposits smelt the residue in furnaces. Thus they obtain a quantity of gold which is used for ornaments, not only for the women but also for the men, for they make bracelets of it which they wear on their wrists and arms. They also make massive collars and remarkable rings of pure gold and even cuirasses.<sup>1</sup> Ornaments. Respecting temples<sup>2</sup> the people of interior Gaul Temples. furnish a peculiar custom. In the temples and sacred groves of this district are to be found large quantities of gold consecrated to the gods; and, although the Celts are excessively fond of money, yet, through fear of the deities, not one of them dare touch these.

VI. The Galatae are of tall stature; they have soft flesh and white skin. Not only is their hair naturally blonde, but they endeavour to heighten this colour by artificial means. To make the hair lustrous they wash it frequently in a lotion of lime. They twist it up from the brow towards the top of the head, and thence to the nape of the neck, giving themselves the appearance of satyrs and Pans. As a result of this treatment their hair thickens till it resembles exactly the hair of horses. Some shave the beard, while others allow it to grow to a moderate length. The nobles shave the cheeks and allow the moustache to grow till it covers the mouth. Thus it happens that in eating their food clings to the moustache, and in drinking the beverage passes through it as through a filter. During meals they do not sit on benches but squat on the ground on skins of wolves and dogs, and are served by the youngest children of both sexes. At the sides are blazing fires with cauldrons and spits garnished with whole quarters of meat. They honour their heroes by offering them the best pieces of the joint.<sup>1</sup> The poet shows us Ajax honoured in the like manner by his comrades after he had fought and beaten Hector single-handed: 'the King honours Ajax with the whole back of the victim.'<sup>2</sup> They invite strangers also to their banquets. After the feast they enquire what they are and what they need. Frequently during these banquets their words give rise to disputes, and, holding life of small account, they challenge one another to single combat.<sup>3</sup> For among them is current the doctrine of Pythagoras, which teaches that the souls of men are immortal, and, migrating into another body, live on again for a fixed number of years.<sup>4</sup> Hence it is that at the funeral ceremony they throw on the pyre letters

VII. When travelling and in war they use two-horse chariots, which seat a driver and a warrior. When they encounter horsemen in war they hurl the javelin against the foe, and then dismounting engage the enemy with the sword. Some of them so utterly despise death that they expose themselves naked with only a girdle around their bodies.<sup>2</sup> They bring with them freemen retainers picked from the poorer class, and employ them as drivers and bodyguards in the fight. Before engaging in battle they have a custom of going before the lines and challenging the bravest of the enemy to single combat, brandishing their arms meanwhile for the purpose of terrifying the enemy. If anyone accept the challenge, they sing the prowess of their ancestors and vaunt their own feats, while on their enemies they pour abuse, and damp their ardour with their vituperation. They cut off the heads of their fallen foes, and attach them to the necks of their steeds. The spoils stained with blood they hand to their retainers to carry, and chant the hymn of victory. They nail these trophies to the doors of their houses, just as other people do with animals captured in the hunt. As regards the heads of the more famous victims, they embalm them with the oil of the cedar tree, and carefully preserve them in a casket. They show them to strangers with pride, vaunting that their ancestors [and themselves ?] had not acquired them by purchase, even for much money. Some are said to show a savage nature and to boast that they would not sell a head even for its weight in gold.<sup>1</sup> But if, on the one hand, it is not chivalrous to place a money value on the trophies of prowess, it is, on the other, savage to engage in deadly combat with one's own countrymen.

VIII. They wear a singular dress. Their tunics are dyed in many colours, and have variegated flowers wrought on them. Their leg-wear they call 'breeches.' They fasten with brooches at their shoulders their striped cloaks, which are richly ornamented with diamond-shaped floral patterns, and which are heavy for winter wear and lighter for summer. Their defensive armour consists of a shield the height of a man, which each warrior decorates after his own fashion. As these shields serve not only for purposes of defence but also as ornaments, some have them furnished with brazen figures of animals, very artistically worked. Their brazen head-gear is ornamented with large projections which give the wearer the appearance of huge stature. On some of these helmets horns are fixed, on others are embossed figures of birds and quadrupeds. They possess uncouth trumpets of peculiar formation which emit a hoarse and warlike sound to inspire terror. Some of them wear breast-plates knit of iron links; others, satisfied with their natural advantages, fight naked. Instead of the ordinary sword they carry a two-edged one hung with an iron

Their swords are scarcely smaller than the javelins of other people; and their javelins have longer points than their swords. Of these javelins some are straight, while others are twisted spirally their whole length. Thus they not only cut but lacerate the flesh, and on being withdrawn enlarge the wound.<sup>1</sup>

IX. Their appearance is awe-inspiring: their voices are deep and very gruff: in conversation they spare their words, expressing themselves in cryptic sentences, and affecting to leave most of their meaning to be inferred. They express themselves hyperbolically when extolling themselves, or deprecating others. Their speech is threatening, strained, and dramatic. They are nevertheless acute-minded, and not unapt in receiving instruction.<sup>2</sup> They have poets whom they call bards, who sing songs of eulogy and of satire, accompanying themselves on instruments very like the lyre. They also have philosophers and theologians whom they hold in extreme honour, and name Druids. They possess prophets too who are much revered. These prophets predict the future from the flight of birds, and from the inspection of the entrails of victims. All the people obey them. They have a strange and incredible custom, particularly when they consult the sacrifices on some important event: they sacrifice a man by striking him with a knife above the diaphragm. They then predict the future from the fall of the victim, from the convulsions of his limbs, and from the flow of his blood; and from long custom, they have faith in these sacrifices.<sup>1</sup> It is an established custom among them that no one shall sacrifice without the presence of a philosopher, for they pretend that sacrifices pleasing to the gods can be offered only through the medium of these men, who understand the supernatural and are in some way in communion with it, and that it is necessary to ask the gods through these men for the favours one desires. These philosophers have a great influence in times of peace, as well as in times of war. Friend and foe submit to the song of the bard. Often when two armies meet, and swords are drawn, and lances set, the bards throw themselves between the contending parties, and pacify them, as one by magic subdues the wild beast. And thus, even among the most savage non-Greeks, frenzy yields to wisdom, and Mars respects the Muses.<sup>2</sup>

X. It may be well to make clear now a point ignored by many. The people who dwell above Marseilles in the interior district, those near the Alps, and those on this side of the Pyrenees also are called Celts; while those who dwell beyond the Celtic country to the southern points of this region, those who inhabit towards the (Atlantic) Ocean, and those around the Hercynian Forest, and all those beyond as far as Scythia are called Galatae. The tribes dwelling in the north and those neighbouring on Scythia are very savage. It is said that they sometimes eat men, as do also the Britons who inhabit Ireland. These nations, famed for their courage and ferocity, according to some writers ravaged all Asia in days gone by. They were then known under the name of Cimmerians, and afterwards under the corrupted form, Cimbri. From the earliest times they engaged in brigandage and in inroads on the territories of others, holding all other people in contempt. It is they who captured Rome, pillaged the temple at Delphi, rendered a great part of Europe and no small part of Asia tributary to them, and settled down in the lands of the conquered people. They received the name of Gallo-graecians from their intermixing with the Greeks. And finally they overthrew many and powerful Roman armies. In accordance with their wild nature they are strangely sacrilegious in their religious rites. or burn, or get rid of by some other torture, the animals captured in war.<sup>1</sup> Although their women are very beautiful they have very little intercourse with them, but satisfy their inclinations in an unnatural way with males, sleeping on the ground on skins of wild beasts with usually a bedmate wallowing on each side. But strangest of all, regardless of personal decency, they offer their virginity freely to strangers; and, far from holding such intercourse shameful, they regard themselves insulted if the favours they offer are refused.<sup>2</sup>

XI. We have dealt in an adequate manner with the Celts, and shall now go on to the history of the Celtiberians, who are their neighbours. The Iberians and Celts had in bygone times waged a war of long duration for the land; but at length entering into an understanding, they held the country in common, while marriage alliances effected a fusion of the two peoples. It was because of the intermixing that they are said to have received the name of Celtiberians. The fusion of two such warlike peoples, and the fertility of the territory they cultivated, helped greatly to make the Celtiberians famous. They withstood the Romans for a long period, who succeeded in conquering them only after a severe struggle. Not only is it agreed that their cavalry is excellent, but their infantry too distinguished itself by its intrepid bravery.<sup>3</sup>

shields, some a round shield of the ordinary size. They enclose their thighs in hairy greaves, and cover their heads with helmets of bronze, decorated with purple crests. Their swords are two-edged and forged of excellent iron. In close fight they use daggers a span in length. Their method of manufacturing their offensive and defensive weapons is peculiar. They bury the iron blades in the soil, and leave them there until the rust has eaten away the weaker parts of the iron and only the strongest remains. It is from this iron that they manufacture their excellent swords and other weapons of war. So well made are these weapons that they cleave everything they strike : no shield, or helmet, or bone can resist their stroke, so excellent is the iron in them.<sup>1</sup> They can fight on foot or on horse. When the cavalry has broken the enemy's ranks they dismount, and, forming as infantry, perform prodigies of valour. They have one very strange custom : although careful of their person, and clean in their daily habits, they have one revoltingly filthy practice : they all bathe themselves in urine, and even brush their teeth in it, believing this a good means of preserving the health of their bodies.<sup>2</sup>

XII. As to their manners, the Celtiberians are very cruel to malefactors and towards their enemies, but generous and kindly towards their guests. They gladly give shelter to travellers in their country, and vie with one another as to who shall give them hospitality. They praise those who accompany strangers,

XIII. Tin is found in several parts of Iberia, not only on the surface, as some repeatedly assert in their accounts, but also in mines, whence it is worked to be refined like as is done with gold and silver. There are many tin mines above the country of the Lusitani and opposite the islets situated off Iberia in the Ocean, and from this circumstance named the Cassiterides. A large quantity of tin is imported into Gaul from the isle of Britain, which faces Gaul ; the merchants loading it on horses, and transporting it across the interior of the Celtic country to the Marseillians and to the city called Narbon. This last city is a Roman colony, and on account of its position and opulence is the largest market in this country.

their meat in a decent enough fashion, although they take the whole joint in both their hands, and bite off their mouthfuls like the lions do. Should there be any piece which they cannot detach, they cut it off with a small sword which they keep concealed on their person in a sheath. Those living near rivers, or on the Mediterranean, or on the Atlantic, eat fish also, which they roast and flavour with salt and vinegar and cummin seed. This cummin seed they also put into their wine. Oil is too scarce with them to use, and, being unaccustomed to it, they find it disagreeable. When a number of them dine together, like the coryphaeus of the chorus, the most distinguished of them sits in the centre. His superiority may be due either to his soldier prowess, to his lineage, or to his wealth. Next to him sits the host; while the other guests are arranged on each side in regular order of precedence, according to each one's particular standing. Behind them stand their armour-bearers holding their large oblong shields, which are called θυρεοι. Their spear-men sit down opposite in a circle, and feast in the same manner as their masters. Their cup-bearers carry round the wine in jars like ordinary casks in shape, and made of either earthenware or silver, and which they call ἄμβικος. The platters on which the meat is served are made of the same material, but some use ones of brass, others ones of wood, and others ones plaited like baskets. The liquor they drink is the rich wine brought from Italy, and from the district round Marseilles. This

The poorer classes drink a beer brewed from wheat, and softened with honey, and more often still without any honey: they call it korma. They all drink from the same cup, taking only short draughts at a time of not more than a cyathus (about  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a pint), but the draughts are frequent. A boy carries the liquor round, beginning at the right side and working round to the left. This is the customary way of serving them, and in worshipping the gods they invariably turn towards the right hand.<sup>1</sup>

XVII. Continuing, Poseidonius relates the wealth of Lyernius, the father of Bityis, whom the Romans subdued. 'He aimed,' he says, 'at becoming the leader of the populace: he made it a practice to drive over the plains in a chariot, scattering gold and silver among the crowds of Celts who followed after him. He enclosed a space twelve furlongs square, in which he erected wine-presses. These he filled with expensive wines, and with a stock of provisions, of such bounteous quantity, that for very many days anyone who chose was free to enter and enjoy whatever was prepared there, being waited on the while with the utmost attention. On a certain occasion, when he had issued invitations to a banquet, a poet from some barbarian tribe, who had arrived too late for the feast, met him on the way and greeted him with an ode extolling his munificence, and lamenting his own bad luck in coming too late. Lyernius was delighted with the ode, and calling for a purse of gold threw it to the poet, who was running beside his chariot. The poet picked it up, and continuing his song, proclaimed that the very prints of his foot upon the earth brought benefits to mankind.' Such are the accounts of the Celts given by Poseidonius in the three and twentieth book of his Histories.

XVIII. The entire race now known as the Gallic, or Galatic, is warlike, passionate, and ever ready for fighting, but otherwise simple and devoid of malice.<sup>1</sup> If aroused they make a blind onrush in a body, and thus are easily defeated by those who resort to stratagem. They may be aroused at any time, in any place, and over any trifle, and will always be found ready for danger, with nothing to support them beyond their violence and rashness. Yet they are easily induced to devote themselves to useful pursuits, and many accordingly are engaged in science and letters. They are powerful both on account of their fine physique and on account of their great numbers. Their frankness and simplicity induces them to assemble in masses when they are stirred with indignation at anything that seems injustice to a neighbour. At the present time they are at peace under the rule of the Romans who have conquered them, but we (i.e. Strabo) have described their customs as we understand they existed in former times, and as they still exist among the Germans. These two nations, both by nature and in their form of government, are similar and related to one another. Their countries are coterminous, being divided by the Rhine, and are, in general, similar to one another. Germany, however, is more to the north, if we compare the southern and northern parts of the two countries. This is the reason they can so easily change their abode. They march in large numbers in one concentrated force, or rather remove with all their families, whenever they are evicted by some superior people. They were subdued by the Romans more easily than were the Iberians; for the war against the Iberians began first, and ceased last, while in the meantime all the peoples between the Rhine and the Pyrenees were subdued. The latter fought in vast arrays, and were overthrown in great numbers, whereas the Iberians kept themselves in reserve, and turned the war into a series of petty engagements, showing themselves in various parties, now here, now there, like banditti. They are all by nature warriors, but they fight better on horseback than on foot. From them the flower of the Roman cavalry is drawn. The most valiant of them dwell towards the north and next the ocean.

XIX. Of these they say the Belgae are the bravest. They are divided into fifteen nations, and dwell near the ocean between the Rhine and the Loire, and have therefore singlehanded withstood the raids of the Germans, Cimbri, and Teutons. The bravest of the Belgae are the Bellovaci, and after them the Suessiones. The fact that formerly there were said to be three hundred thousand Belgae capable of bearing arms affords a clue to their population. The numbers of the Helvetii, the Arverni and their allies have been mentioned already. All this proves the vast population [of Gaul] and, as remarked before, the fecundity of the women, and the ease with which they rear their children. They wear the sagum, let their hair grow, and have short breeches. Instead of tunics they wear a slashed garment with sleeves coming to a little below the hips. The wool they have is coarse, but long; and from it they weave thick sagas called laines. However, in the northern parts the Romans rear flocks of sheep, which they cover with skins, and which produce very fine wool.

The Celtic dress.

Their arms are in keeping with their fine physique: they wear a long sword hanging from the right side, a long shield and equally large lances, and a madaris which somewhat resembles a javelin. Some of them also use bows and slings. They have also a wooden weapon resembling a pilum which they throw, not from a thong but from the hand, and which carries farther than an arrow, and which is used principally for shooting birds.<sup>1</sup> To the present day most of them lie on the ground, and take their meals seated on straw. They live chiefly on milk and all kinds of flesh, that of the swine, which they eat both fresh and salted, being the most common. Their swine are kept in the fields, and are of remarkable height, strength and swiftness; but to persons unaccustomed to approach them, they are almost as dangerous as wolves.<sup>2</sup> The people dwell in large, cases in particular are referred to them. When there are a large number of these cases they imagine that the harvest will be plentiful. Doctrines of Druids, &c.

XXI. To their simplicity and vehemence they add much folly, arrogance, and love of ornament. Around their necks they wear gold collars, on their arms and wrists they have bracelets, and those of good position among them clothe themselves in dyed garments, worked with gold.<sup>2</sup> Their fickle, impressionable nature makes them intolerable in victory and faint-hearted in defeat. Besides their arrogance they have a brutal and senseless custom—common among many northern nations—of hanging the heads of their enemies from the neck of their horses when returning from battle, and of nailing them as an exhibition before their doors when they arrive home. Poseidonius says that he witnessed this in many different places, and was shocked at first, but in time its frequency made him familiar with it. The heads of illustrious men are embalmed with cedar [oil], and exhibited to strangers; but they would not sell them for their weight in gold.<sup>3</sup> [The Romans however put a stop to these customs, as well as to their manner of offering sacrifices and practising divination, which were quite contrary to our established ritual.<sup>4</sup> They would strike the

They are said to have other manners of sacrificing their human victims ; that they pierce some with arrows, crucify others in their temples,<sup>1</sup> and that they prepare a stack of hay and wood which they set on fire after having placed cattle, all kinds of animals, and men in it.<sup>2</sup>

XXII. He [Poseidonius] states that the wealth found at Toulouse was valued at about fifteen thousand talents ; that part of it was hidden in the chapels,<sup>1</sup> and part of it in the sacred lakes, and that it was not coined (money) but gold and silver bullion . . . that the country abounded in gold, and that the inhabitants, being superstitious and living cheaply, hid their treasures in many different places, the lakes especially affording hiding-places for their gold and silver bullion. On obtaining possession of the country the Romans put up these sacred lakes to public sale, and many of the purchasers found quantities of solid silver in them. In Toulouse there was a sacred temple,<sup>1</sup> greatly revered by inhabitants of the neighbourhood, and consequently richly endowed by the gifts of numerous donors, which none dared to touch.

XXIII. He compares with these the activity and industry of the Turdetani, who customarily cut tortuous and deep tunnels, and drain streams which they frequently encounter by means of Egyptian screws. As for the rest, they are quite different from the Attic miners, whose mining methods, he says, may be very fairly compared to the enigma, 'What I have taken up I have not kept, and what I have got I have thrown away.' On the other hand, the Turdetani make a very good profit, for a fourth part of the ore which they extract from the copper mines is (pure) copper, while from the silver mines one person has taken away as much as a Euboean talent within three days. He says that tin is not found on the surface, as many authors state, but is mined; and that it is found not only among the people dwelling beyond the Lusitani but also in the Cassiterides Islands; and he says further that it is transported from the Britannic Isles to Marseilles. He also records that among the Artabri, who are the furthest off of the Lusitani towards the north and west, the earth is powdered with silver, tin, and pale gold; that is, mixed with silver; that this earth is brought down by the rivers: this the women gather with spades, and wash in sieves, woven after the fashion of baskets. Such is his account of these metals.<sup>1</sup>

XXIV. Μετὰ ταύτην (τὴν τῶν Ἐξιτανῶν πόλιν) Ἄβδηρα, Φοινίκων κτίσμα καὶ αὐτή. Ὑπὲρ δὲ τῶν τόπων ἐν τῇ ὀρεινῇ δείκνυται Ὀδύσσεια καὶ τὸ ἱερὸν τῆς Ἀθηνᾶς ἐν αὐτῇ, ὡς Ποσειδώνιος τε εἶρηκε καὶ Ἀρτεμίδωρος καὶ Ἀσκληπιιάδης ὁ Μυρλεανός, ἀνὴρ ἐν τῇ Τουρδητανίᾳ παιδεύσας τὰ γραμματικὰ καὶ περιήγησίην τινα τῶν ἔθνῶν ἐκδεδωκώς.

XXIV. After this city (of the Exitani) comes Lisbon. Abdera, also a Phoenician foundation. Above these places in the mountains, the city of Ulyseæ (now Lisbon) is shown. This city contains a temple to Minerva, according to the testimony of Poseidonius, Artemidorus, and Asclepiades the Myrlean, a man who taught grammar in Turdetania, and published a description of the natives dwelling there.

XXV. Φησὶ δὲ Ποσειδώνιος Μάρκον Μάρκελλον πράξασθαι φόρον ἐκ τῆς Κελτιβηρίας τάλαντα ἑξακόσια· ἐξ οὗ τεκμαίρεσθαι πάρεστιν ὅτι καὶ πολλοὶ ἦσαν οἱ Κελτίβηρες καὶ χρημάτων εὐποροῦντες, καίπερ οἰκοῦντες χώραν παράλυπον. Πολυβίου δ' εἰπόντος τριακοσίας αὐτῶν καταλύσαι πόλεις Τιβέριον Γράκχον, κομφῶδῶν φησι τοῦτο τῷ Γράκχῳ χαρίσασθαι τὸν ἄνδρα, τοὺς πύργους καλοῦντα πόλεις, ὥσπερ ἐν ταῖς θριαμβικαῖς πόμπαις.

XXVI. Φασὶ δ' ἐν τῇ Πιτάνῃ τὰς πλίνθους ἐπιπολάζειν ἐν τοῖς ὕδασι, καθάπερ καὶ ἐν τῇ Τυρρηνίᾳ γῆ τις [τοῦτο] πέπουθε· κουφοτέρα γὰρ ἢ γῆ τοῦ ἐπίσου ὄγκου ὕδατός ἐστιν, ὥστ' ἐποχεῖσθαι. Ἐν Ἰβηρίᾳ δέ φησιν ἰδεῖν Ποσειδώνιος ἕκ τινος γῆς ἀργιλώδους, ἣ τὰ ἀργυρώματα ἐκμάττεται, πλίνθους πηγνυμένας καὶ ἐπιπλεούσας.

XXVII. Ταῦτά τε δὴ δικαίως ἐπιτιμᾷ τοῖς συγγραφεῦσι Ποσειδώνιος, καὶ οὐ κακῶς εἰκάζει, διότι ληστρικοὶ ὄντες καὶ πλάνητες οἱ Κίμβροι, καὶ μέχρι τῶν περὶ τὴν Μαιῶτιν ποιήσαιντο στρατείαν· ἀπ' ἐκείνων δὲ καὶ ὁ Κιμμέριος κληθεὶς Βόσπορος, οἶον Κιμβρικός, Κιμμερίου τοὺς Κίμβρους ὀνομασάντων τῶν Ἑλλήνων. Φησὶ δὲ καὶ Βοίους τὸν Ἐρκύνιον δρυμὸν οἰκεῖν πρότερον· τοὺς δὲ Κίμβρους ὀρμήσαντας ἐπὶ τὸν τόπον τοῦτον, ἀποκρουσθέντας ὑπὸ τῶν Βοίων ἐπὶ τὸν Ἰστρον, καὶ τοὺς Σκορδίσκους Γαλάτας καταβῆναι· εἴτ' ἐπὶ Ταυρίστας καὶ Ταυρίσκους, καὶ τούτους Γαλάτας· εἴτ' ἐπὶ Ἐλουηττίους, πολυχρύσους μὲν ἄνδρας, XXV. Poseidonius says that Marcus Marcellus exacted a tribute of 600 talents from Celtiberia : this proves the Celtiberians to have been a populous and wealthy people, though inhabiting an unproductive country. Polybius has it that Tiberius Gracchus destroyed 300 Celtiberian cities. Poseidonius laughs at this, and says that to flatter Gracchus, Polybius described as cities towers such as are exhibited in triumphal processions.

Celtiberia rich and populous.

XXVI. The bricks made at Pitane are said to float upon the water, as was the case with certain clay in Tyrrenia, for the clay, being lighter than an equal bulk of water, floats on it. Poseidonius says that he saw in Spain bricks made of an argillaceous earth, with which silver vessels are cleansed, floating upon water.

XXVII. For such fables Poseidonius justly blames these authors, and aptly conjectures that the Cimbri, who led a nomadic and piratical life, might have made an expedition as far as the districts around the sea of Azof, and that the name of the Cimmerian Bosphorus has been derived from them, or to be more correct the Cimbrian Bosphorus, for the Greeks call the Cimbri Cimmerii. He also says that the Boii formerly inhabited the Hercynian Forest, and that the Cimbri were repulsed by them when they made an incursion into these parts, and driven towards the Danube, and the country occupied by the Scordisci, a Galatic tribe ; that thence they were driven to the Tauristae or Taurisci, also a Galatic people ; and then were driven to the Helvetii, who at that time were a rich and peaceful people ; and that perceiving the wealth of these freebooters to surpass their own, the Helvetii, and more especially the Tigureni and Toygeni, associated themselves with their expeditions.

XXVIII. Herodotus denies point blank that there are any Hyperboreans . . . but Poseidonius on the contrary declares that Hyperboreans do exist, and that they dwell in the district round the Italian Alps.<sup>1</sup>

XXIX. And among these (tribes on the Danube) are the Celtic tribes of the Boii, Scordisci, and Taurisci. Some indeed call the Scordisci the Scordistae and give the Taurisci the names of Ligurisci and Tauristae.
