P R E F A C E .

THESE three volumes, comprising the "Life" and "Antiquities," form the first instalment of a revision of Whiston's well-known translation of Josephus, which first saw the light in 1736, and has since that time retained the field, not so much from its intrinsic merit, as from the fact that the magnitude of the work, and the want of a good critical edition of Josephus' Greek Text, has deterred scholars from the Atlantean labour of a new translation.

In my revision there is, indeed, not much of Whiston left, though I have retained him where practicable. In revising him, I have amended his baldness, pruned and curtailed his archaisms, corrected his misspelling of names and mistranslations, and generally speaking been throughout close to the text where he has been turgid and paraphrastic. There are also frequently short omissions in Whiston's translation. These I have restored.

With regard to Whiston's Notes, some I have retained, some curtailed, some erased. Those I have omitted have been omitted on the following grounds. Many of them are puerile, many irrelevant, some based upon a less pure Greek text, some obtruding Whiston's very strange and erratic notions on religion, some absolutely incorrect. I have added a W to all the Notes of Whiston which I have retained. The few critical Notes are my own.

Sir C. W. Wilson, one of the heroes of Khartoum, and well known earlier as one of the pioneers of Palestine Exploration, is responsible for the Geographical and Topographical Notes.

Josephus and his works are so well known, and so deservedly popular, that there is no need here to say anything about him or them. But one word is due as to the text which I have used in this revision. Neither the edition of Niese, nor the first instalment of that of Naber in the Bibliotheca Teubneriana, appeared in time for me to make any use of them. I have translated from the edition of Dindorf, in the Didot collection of editions of Classical works, Paris, 1865.

With these few words I commend my revision of Whiston to the theological and general reader. These three volumes will at no distant date be followed by two more, which will contain "The Jewish War," and "Josephus on the Antiquity of the Jews against Apion."

THE LIFE OF FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS.

§ 1.

MY family is not an ignoble one, but hath descended all along from priests; and as nobility among several people is of a different origin, so, with us, to be of priestly extraction is an indication of the splendour of a family. Now, I am not only sprung from priests, but also from the first of the twenty-four<sup>1</sup> courses; and as among us there is considerable difference here too, I am of the chief family of that first course also; nay, farther, by my mother I am of the royal blood; for the sons of Asamonæus, from whom she descended, were both high priests and kings for a very long time. I will give the pedigree. My great-grandfather was named Simon, with the surname of Psellus: he lived at the same time as that son of Simon the high priest, who, first of all the high priests, was named Hyrcanus. This Simon Psellus had nine sons, one of whom was Matthias, called the son of Ephias; he married the daughter of Jonathan the high priest, the first of the sons of Asamonæus who was high priest, and the brother of Simon the high priest also. This Matthias had a son called Matthias Curtus, born in the first year of the government of Hyrcanus; his son's name was Joseph, born in the ninth year of the reign of Alexandra; his son Matthias was born in the tenth year of the reign of Archelaus; and I was born to the first Matthias in the first year of the reign of Caius Cæsar. I have three sons: Hyrcanus, the eldest, was born in the fourth year of the reign of Vespasian, Justus in the seventh, and Agrippa in the ninth. Thus have I set down our pedigree as I found it entered<sup>1</sup> in the public records, and so farewell to those who try to run me down as of low extraction!

<sup>1</sup> We may hence correct the error of the Latin copy of the second book against Apion, § 7, 8 (for the Greek is there lost), which says there were then only four tribes or courses of the priests, instead of twenty-four. Nor is this testimony to be disregarded, as if Josephus there contradicted what he had affirmed here; because even the account there given better agrees to twenty-four than to four courses, while he says that each of these courses contained above 5,000 men, which, multiplied by only four, will make not more than 20,000 priests; whereas the number 120,000, as multiplied by twenty-four, seems much the most probable, they being about one-tenth of the whole people, even after the captivity. See Ezra ii. 36-39. Neh. vii. 39-42. 1 Esd. v. 24, 25, with Ezra ii. 64. Neh. vii. 66. 1 Esd. v. 41. Nor will this common reading or notion of but four courses of priests, agree with Josephus's own farther assertion elsewhere, Antiq. vii. 14, § 7, that David's partition of the priests into twenty-four courses had continued to that day.—W.

§ 2. Now my father Matthias was not only eminent on account of his noble birth, but was still more esteemed for his uprightness, and was held in the highest reputation in Jerusalem, the greatest city we have. I was brought up with my brother, whose name was Matthias (my own brother by both father and mother); and I made mighty proficiency in learning, and appeared to have both a good memory and good understanding. Even as a boy at about fourteen years of age, I was commended by all for the love I had to learning; on which account the high priests and principal men of the city came frequently to me to know my opinion about the accurate understanding of points of the law. And when I was about sixteen years old, I had a mind to make trial of the several sects that were among us. These sects are three: the first is that of the Pharisees, the second that of the Sadducees, and the third that of the Essenes, as I have frequently said in my other works; for I thought that by this means I might choose the best, if I were once intimately acquainted with them all; so I contented myself with hard fare, and hard labour, and went through them all. Nor did I content myself with these trials only; but when I was informed that one whose name was Bauus, lived in the desert, who used no other clothing than grew upon trees, and had no other food than what grew of its own accord, and bathed himself in cold water frequently, both by night and by day, in order to preserve his chastity,

I became a follower of him. And having continued with him three years,<sup>1</sup> and accomplished my purpose, I returned back to the city, being now nineteen years old, and began to live in strict accordance with the rules of the sect of the Pharisees, which is very similar to what the Greeks call the Stoic school.

§ 3. But when I was twenty-six, it happened that I went up to Rome, on the occasion which I shall now describe. At the time when Felix was procurator of Judæa, there were certain priests of my acquaintance, very excellent persons, whom on a small and trifling charge he had put in irons, and sent to Rome to plead their cause before Cæsar. These I was desirous to procure deliverance for, especially as I was informed that they were not unmindful of piety towards God even under their afflictions, but supported themselves with figs and nuts.<sup>2</sup> And I arrived at Rome, after great peril by sea; for, as our ship went down in the Adriatic sea, we that were in it, being about six hundred in number,<sup>3</sup> swam for our lives all that night; and at daybreak, upon our sighting, by God's providence, <sup>1</sup> When Josephus here says, that from sixteen to nineteen, or for three years, he made trial of the three Jewish sects, the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes, and yet says presently, in all our copies, that he stayed besides with one particular ascetic, called Banus, παρ' αὐτῶν, with him, and that before he was nineteen, there is little room left for his trial of three other sects. I suppose, therefore, that for παρ' αὐτῶν, with him, the old reading might be παρ' αὐτοῖς, with them: which is a very small emendation, and takes away the difficulty before us. Nor is Dr. Hudson's conjecture, hinted at by Mr. Hall in his preface to the doctor's edition of Josephus, at all improbable, that this Banus, by this his description, might well be a follower of John the Baptist, and that from him Josephus might easily imbibe such notions, as afterwards prepared him to have a favourable opinion about Jesus Christ himself, who was attested to by John the Baptist.—W.

<sup>2</sup> We may note here, that religious men among the Jews, or at least those that were priests, were sometimes ascetics also, and, like Daniel and his companions in Babylon, Dan. i. 8-16, ate no flesh, but figs and nuts, &c., only. This was like the ξηροφαγία, or austere diets, of the Christian ascetics in passion-week. Constit. v. 18.—W.

<sup>3</sup> It has been thought the number of St. Paul and his companions on ship board, Acts xxvii. 38, which are 276 in our copies, are too many; whereas we find here that Josephus and his companions, a very few years after the other, were about 600.—W. For several close coincidences between the voyages of Josephus and St. Paul, see Blunt's "Undesigned Coincidences," § 22.

a ship of Cyrene, I and some others, eighty in all, got the start of the rest, and were taken on board. And having thus got safe to Dicæarchia,<sup>1</sup> which the Italians call Puteoli, I became intimate with Aliturus, an actor much beloved by Nero, and a Jew by race, and through his interest became known to Poppæa, Nero's wife, and speedily effected through her influence the liberation of the priests. And having obtained many presents from Poppæa besides this favour, I returned home again.

§ 4. And now I perceived that we were on the eve of revolution, and that many were very elated at the idea of a revolt from the Romans. I therefore endeavoured to put a stop to these tumultuous persons, and to persuade them to change their minds; and laid before their eyes against whom it was that they were going to fight, and that they were inferior to the Romans not only in martial skill, but also in good fortune; and desired them not rashly, and after the most foolish manner, to risk bringing the most terrible woes upon their country, their families, and themselves. And this I said with vehement exhortation, because I foresaw that the end of such a war would be most unfortunate to us. But I could not persuade them, for the madness of desperate men carried the day.

§ 5. I was then afraid that, by inculcating these things so often, I should incur their hatred and suspicion, as if I were of the enemy's party, and should run risk of being seized by them, and slain; since they were already possessed of Antonia,<sup>2</sup> which was the citadel; so I retired into the inner part of the temple. But I stole out of the temple again, after Manahem and the leaders of the band of robbers were put to death, and abode among the high priests and the chief of the Pharisees. But no small fear seized upon us now that we saw the people in arms, for we ourselves knew not what we should do, and were not able to restrain the revolutionary party. However, as the danger was directly upon us, we pretended that we were of the same opinion with them, but only advised them to be quiet for the present, and to let the enemy go away, still hoping that it would not be long ere Gessius came up with a great force, and so put an end to these revolutionary proceedings.

§ 6. But upon his coming up and fighting, he was beaten, and a great many of those that were with him fell. And this reverse of Gessius became the calamity of our whole nation; for those that advocated the war were so elated with this success, that they had hopes of eventually conquering the Romans. There was also another pretext for the war: those that dwelt in the neighbouring cities of Syria<sup>1</sup> seized upon such Jews as dwelt among them, with their wives and children, and slew them, when they had not the least cause of complaint against them: for they had neither thought of revolting from the Romans, nor had they shown the slightest sign of hatred or treacherous design towards the Syrians. But what was done by the inhabitants of Scythopolis<sup>2</sup> was the most impious and highly criminal of all;<sup>3</sup> for, when hostile Jews attacked them from without, they forced the Jews that were among them to bear arms against their own countrymen, which it is unlawful for us to do:<sup>4</sup> and when by their assistance they had joined battle with those that attacked them, and had beaten them, they forgot after the victory the assurances they had given these their fellow-citizens and confederates, and slew them all, being in number many myriads. The like miseries were undergone by those Jews that were inhabitants of

<sup>4</sup> The Jews might collect this unlawfulness of fighting against their brethren from that law of Moses, Lev. xix. 16: "Thou shalt not stand against the blood of thy neighbour;" and that, ver. 17: "Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people; but thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself;" as well as from many other places in the Pentateuch and Prophets. See Antiq. viii. 8, § 3.—W.

Damascus. But I have given a more accurate account of these things in my books on the Jewish war. I only mention them now, because I would demonstrate to my readers, that the war of the Jews with the Romans was not so much choice as necessity.

§ 7. Now when Gessius had been beaten, as I have already said, the principal men of Jerusalem, seeing that the robbers and revolutionary party had arms in great plenty, and fearing that they, being unprovided with arms, would be in subjection to their enemies, as actually came to pass afterwards; and, being informed that all Galilee had not yet revolted from the Romans, but that some part of it was still quiet, they sent me and two others of the priests, who were excellent persons, Joazar and Judas, in order to persuade the ill-advised men there to lay down their arms, and to prove to them, that it were best to keep those arms in reserve for the most courageous men that the nation had, for that it had been resolved, that while they should always keep their arms ready against any emergency, they should yet wait to see what the Romans would do.

§ 8. When I had therefore received these instructions, I went into Galilee, and found the people of Sepphoris<sup>1</sup> in no small anxiety about their town, because the Galilæans had resolved to plunder it, on account of the friendship they had with the Romans, and because they had given their right hand to, and made a league with, Cestius Gallus, the governor of Syria. But I delivered them all out of the fear they were in, and persuaded the multitude to deal kindly with them, and permitted them to send to those that were their own hostages with Gessius in Dora,<sup>2</sup> which is a city of Phœnicia, as often as they pleased. But I found that the inhabitants of Tiberias<sup>3</sup> had already taken up arms, and that on the following account.

§ 9. There were three factions in Tiberias. The first was composed of men of worth and gravity; of these Julius Capellus was the head. Now he, as well as all his companions, Herod the son of Miarus, and Herod the son of Gamalns, and Compsus the son of Compsus (for as to Compsus' brother Crispus, who had once been governor of the city under the great king <sup>1</sup> [Agrippa], he was beyond the Jordan on his own estate); all these persons before named gave their advice, that the city should still continue in its allegiance to the Romans, and to the king. But Pistus, who was guided by his son Justus, did not acquiesce in that resolution, for by nature he had a touch of the mad. The second faction was composed of the most obscure persons, and was determined for war. But as for Justus, the son of Pistus, who was the head of the third faction, although he pretended to be doubtful about going to war, yet was he really desirous of revolution, supposing that he should gain power to himself by the change of affairs. He therefore came into the midst, and endeavoured to inform the multitude, "that Tiberias had ever been a city of Galilee, and that in the days of Herod the tetrarch, who had built it, it had obtained the principal place, and that he had ordered the town of Sepphoris to be subordinate to it, nor had they lost this pre-eminence even under Agrippa the father, but had retained it, until Felix was procurator of Judæa. But now they had been so unfortunate as to be made a present of by Nero to Agrippa junior; and that upon Sepphoris' submission to the Romans, it had become the capital of Galilee, and the royal treasury and the archives were now removed from them." When he had spoken this, and a great deal more against Agrippa, in order to provoke the people to revolt, he added, that "now was the time for them to take up arms, and join with the Galilæans as their confederates (whom they might command, and who would now willingly assist them, out of the hatred they bore to the people of Sepphoris, because they had preserved their fidelity to the Romans), and to gather together a great force in order to punish them." By this speech he swayed the multitude, for his abilities lay in making harangues to the people, and in gaining the victory by his speeches over such as opposed him, though their advice was better, by his juggling and craft. For he was not unskilful in the learning of the Greeks, and in dependence on that he undertook to write a history of these affairs, intending by his narrative to subvert the truth. But as to this man, and his bad character and conduct in life, and how he and his brother were, in a great measure, the authors of our destruction, I shall give the reader an account in the course of my narrative. So when Justus had, by his persuasions, prevailed upon the citizens of Tiberias to take up arms,—nay, had even forced a great many to do so against their will, he went out with all of them, and set the villages of Gadara<sup>1</sup> and Hippos<sup>2</sup> on fire; which villages were situated on the borders of Tiberias, and of the region of Scythopolis.

§ 10. And this was the state Tiberias was now in. But as for Gischala<sup>3</sup> its affairs were thus. When John, the son of Levi, saw some of the citizens much elated at the idea of revolting from the Romans, he tried to restrain them, and entreated them to keep their allegiance to them. But he could not gain his purpose, in spite of all his endeavours, for the neighbouring people of Gadara, Gabara,<sup>4</sup> Sogane,<sup>5</sup> and Tyre,<sup>6</sup> got together a great army, and fell upon Gischala, and took it by storm, and set it on fire; and when they had entirely razed it to the ground they returned home. Upon which John was so enraged, that he armed all his men, and joined battle with the people before mentioned, and rebuilt Gischala stronger than before, and fortified it with walls for its future security.

§ 11. But Gamala<sup>7</sup> adhered to its allegiance to the Romans, for the following reason. Philip the son of Jacimus, who was prefect under king Agrippa, had been unexpectedly preserved when the royal palace at Jerusalem had been besieged ; but as he fled away, had fallen into another danger, and that was of being killed by Manahem and the robbers that were with him ; but certain Babylonians who were of his kindred, and were then in Jerusalem, hindered the robbers from executing their design. So Philip stayed there four days, and fled away on the fifth, having disguised himself with false hair, that he might not be discovered ; and when he was come to one of the villages in his jurisdiction that lay near the citadel of Gamala, he sent to some of his men, and commanded them to come to him. But the deity hindered his intention, and that for his own advantage, for had it not so happened, he had certainly perished. For a fever having seized upon him suddenly, he wrote letters to Agrippa and Berenice, and gave them to one of his freedmen to carry to Varus, who at this time was procurator of the kingdom, which office the king and his sister had entrusted him with, as they had gone to Berytus<sup>1</sup> with the intention of meeting Gessius. When Varus had received these letters of Philip, and had learned that he was preserved, he was very uneasy at it, supposing that he should appear useless to the king and his sister, now Philip was come. He therefore produced the carrier of the letters before the multitude, and accused him of forging them ; and said, that he spoke falsely when he related that Philip was at Jerusalem, fighting with the Jews against the Romans. So he slew him. And when the freedman of Philip did not return again, Philip was doubtful what was the reason, and sent a second messenger with letters, that he might, upon his return, inform him what had befallen the other that had been sent before, and why he tarried so long. Varus accused this messenger also, when he came, of telling a falsehood, and slew him. For he was puffed up by the Syrians that were at Cæsarea,<sup>2</sup> and had great expectations ; for they said that Agrippa would be slain by the Romans for the crimes which the Jews had committed, and that he would himself get the kingdom, being descended from kings. For Varus was, by the confession of all, of royal race, as being a descendant of Sohemus, who had been tetrarch near Mount Libanus; for which reason it was that he was puffed up, and kept the letters to himself. He contrived, also, that the king should not get any letters from Philip, by guarding all the passes, lest anyone should escape, and inform the king what had been done. He moreover slew many of the Jews, in order to gratify the Syrians of Cæsarea. He intended also to join with the Trachonites in Batanæa,<sup>1</sup> and to take up arms and make an assault upon the Babylonian Jews that were at Ecbatana,<sup>2</sup> for that was the name they went by. He therefore called to him twelve of the most influential Jews of Cæsarea, and ordered them to go to Ecbatana, and inform their countrymen who dwelt there, that Varus hath heard, that "you intend to march against the king; but, not believing it, he hath sent us to persuade you to lay down your arms, and this compliance will be a sign that he did well not to credit those who raised the report concerning you." He also enjoined them to send seventy of their principal men to make their defence on the charge brought against them. So when the twelve got to their countrymen at Ecbatana, and found that they had no revolutionary ideas at all, they persuaded them to send the seventy, who not at all suspecting what would happen to them, sent them accordingly. So they went down to Cæsarea with the twelve ambassadors, where Varus met them with the king's forces, and slew them all, ambassadors and all, and made an expedition against the Jews of Ecbatana. But one of the seventy escaped, and stole a march on Varus and informed the Jews of his coming; upon which they took their arms, with their wives and children, and retired to the citadel at Gamala, leaving their own villages full of all sorts of good things, and many myriads of cattle therein. When Philip was informed of this, he also went to the citadel of Gamala;<sup>3</sup>

and when he was come, the multitude cried aloud, and desired him to lead them against Varus and the Syrians of Cæsarea; for it was reported that they had slain the king. But Philip restrained their zeal, and put them in mind of the benefits the king had bestowed upon them; and told them how powerful the Romans were, and said it was not for their advantage to make war with them; and at length he prevailed with them. But when the king got to learn of Varus's design to cut off the Jews of Cæsarea, being many myriads, with their wives and children, and all in one day, he called to him Æquus Modius, and sent him to be Varus's successor, as I have elsewhere related. So Philip kept the citadel of Gamala and the adjacent country in its allegiance to the Romans.

§ 12. Now, as soon as I was come into Galilee, and had learned this state of things from the information of such as told me, I wrote to the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem about it, and asked their direction what I should do. They begged me to stay there with my colleagues if they were willing, and to look after the condition of Galilee. But my colleagues, having got great riches from those tithes which were their dues as priests, determined to return to their own country. Yet when I desired them to stay till we could settle affairs, they complied with me. So I removed with them from the city of Sepphoris,<sup>1</sup> and came to a certain village called Bethmaus,<sup>2</sup> four furlongs distant from Tiberias; and thence I sent messengers to the council of Tiberias, and desired that the principal men of the city would come to me; and when they were come, Justus himself being also with them, I told them, that I was sent to them by the people of Jerusalem as an envoy, together with these other priests, in order to persuade them to demolish that house which Herod the tetrarch had built there, and which had the figures of living creatures in it, although our laws had forbidden us to make any such figures; and I desired, that they would give us leave to do so immediately. But for a good while Capellus and the principal men of the city would not give us leave, but were at length induced to assent to our wishes. But Jesus the son of Sapphias, one of those whom I have already mentioned as the leader of a seditious rising of sailors and poor people, anticipated us, and took with him certain Galilæans, and set the entire palace on fire, and thought he should get a great deal of money thereby, because he saw some of the roofs were gilt. They also plundered a great deal without our approbation; for, after we had conversed with Capellus, and the principal men of the city, we departed from Bethmaus, and went into Upper Galilee. But Jesus and his party slew all the Greeks that were inhabitants of Tiberias, and as many others as were their enemies before the war began.

§ 13. When I heard of this, I was greatly provoked, and went down to Tiberias, and took all the care I could to recover all that could be recovered of the royal furniture from such as had plundered it. It consisted of candlesticks made of Corinthian brass; and of royal tables, and of a great quantity of uncoined silver; and I resolved to preserve whatever came to my hand for the king. So I sent for ten of the principal men of the council, and Capellus the son of Antyllus, and committed the furniture to them, with this charge, that they should part with it to nobody but myself. From thence I and my colleagues went to Gischala<sup>1</sup> to John, being desirous to know his intentions, and I soon saw that he was for revolution, and had a mind to the chief power; for he desired me to give him authority to carry off the corn which belonged to Cæsar, and was stored in the villages of Upper Galilee; and he pretended that he would expend what it came to in building the walls of his own city. But when I perceived what he was aiming at, and what he had in view, I said I would not permit him to do so. For I thought either to keep it for the Romans, or for myself, now I was intrusted with the management of affairs there by the people of Jerusalem. But when he was not able to prevail with me, he betook himself to my colleagues, who had no sagacity in reading the future, and were very ready to take bribes. So he corrupted them with money, to decree that all the corn which was within his province should be delivered to him; and I, who was but one, was outvoted by two, and had to acquiesce. Then did John introduce another cunning contrivance. He said, that those Jews who inhabited Cæsarea Philippi, and were shut up by the order of the king's deputy there, had sent to him to desire him, that, since they had no oil that was pure to use, he would provide a sufficient quantity of such oil for them, lest they should be forced to make use of Greek oil, and thereby transgress their laws. Now this was said by John, not out of regard to religion, but out of the most flagrant desire of gain: for he knew that two pints of oil were sold at Cæsarea for one drachma, but that at Gischala fourscore pints were sold for four drachmæ. So he gave order, that all the oil which was there should be carried away, as if he had my permission for so doing; which yet I did not grant him voluntarily, but only out of fear of the multitude, since, if I had forbidden him, I should have been stoned by them. As I therefore yielded the point, John gained vast sums of money by this knavery.

§ 14. But when I had dismissed my colleagues, and sent them back to Jerusalem, I took care to get arms provided, and the cities fortified. And, when I had sent for the boldest of the robbers, I saw that it was not in my power to take their arms from them; but I persuaded the multitude to allow them pay, and told them it was better for them to give them a little money willingly, rather than to see their goods plundered. And when I had obliged the robbers to take an oath not to come into our country, unless they were invited, or when they had not their pay given them, I dismissed them, and charged them neither to war against the Romans, nor against their neighbours: for my first care was to keep Galilee in peace. And as I wished to have the principal Galilæans, in all seventy, as hostages for their fidelity under the pretext of friendship, I made them my friends and companions as I journeyed, and set them to judge causes: and it was with their approbation that I gave my sentences, while I endeavoured not to deviate from justice through over haste, and to keep my hands clean from all bribes.

§ 15. I was now about the thirtieth year of my age; in which time of life it is a hard thing for anyone to escape the calumnies of envy, although he restrain himself from any unlawful desires, especially where a person is in great authority. Yet did I respect the chastity of every woman, and, as to the presents which were offered me, I despised them, as not standing in need of them. Nor indeed would I take those tithes, which were due to me as a priest, from those that brought them. Yet do I confess, that I took part of the spoils of those Syrians who inhabited the cities that were adjacent to us, when I had conquered them, and that I sent it to my kindred at Jerusalem; although when I twice took Sepphoris<sup>1</sup> by storm, and Tiberias four times, and Gadara<sup>2</sup> once, and when I had got John in my power, who had often laid treacherous snares for me, I did not revenge myself upon either him or any of the people beforenamed, as the course of my narrative will show. And on this account, I suppose, it was that God,<sup>3</sup> who never forgets those that do as they ought to do, delivered me still out of their hands, and afterwards preserved me when I fell into those many dangers which I shall relate hereafter.

§ 16. Now the mass of the Galilæans had that great kindness for me, and fidelity to me, that when their cities were taken by storm, and their wives and children carried into slavery, they did not so deeply lament for their own calamities, as they were anxious for my safety. And when John saw this, he was moved with envy, and wrote to me, desiring that I would give him leave to come down, and make use of the hot baths of Tiberias for the recovery of his health. And I did not forbid him, having no suspicion of any wicked design on his part, and I wrote expressly to those to whom I had committed the administration of the affairs of Tiberias to provide a lodging for John, and for such as should come with him, and to procure him a plentiful supply of whatever he stood in need of. Now at this time my abode was in a village of Galilee, which is called Cana<sup>1</sup>

§ 17. But when John was come to the city of Tiberias, he persuaded its inhabitants to revolt from their fidelity to me, and to attach themselves to him; and many of them gladly received the invitation of his, as ever fond of revolutions, and by nature disposed to changes, and delighting in seditions: but Justus and his father Pistus were chiefly earnest in their revolt from me, and their adherence to John. But I was too quick for them, and anticipated them: for a messenger had come to me from Silas, whom I had made governor of Tiberias, as I have said already, and told me of the purpose of the people of Tiberias, and advised me to make haste thither; for if I made any delay, the city would soon be in the power of others. Upon receipt of this letter of Silas', I took two hundred men along with me, and travelled all night, having sent on a messenger, to let the people of Tiberias know that I was coming. When I came near to the city, which was early in the morning, the multitude came out to meet me, and John with them, who saluted me, but in a very confused manner, as if afraid that my coming was to call him to account for what I was now aware he was doing. So he went in great haste to his lodging. But when I was in the open place of the city, having dismissed the guards I had about me, excepting one, and ten armed men that were with him, I attempted to make a speech to the multitude of the people of Tiberias; and, standing on a high wall, I entreated them not to be so hasty in their revolt; for that such a change in their fidelity would be to their reproach, and they would be justly suspected by those that should be their masters hereafter, as if they were not likely to be faithful to them either.

§ 18. But, before I had spoken all I intended, I heard one of my own followers bidding me come down; for that it was not the time to be anxious about retaining the goodwill of the people of Tiberias, but about my own safety, and how to escape my enemies there; for John had sent the most trusty of those thousand armed men that he had with him, and had given them orders to kill me, having learned that I was alone, except for a few personal followers. So those that were sent came as they were ordered, and would have done their work, had I not leaped down from the wall I stood on, with one of my guards, whose name was James, and been hoisted upon the back of one Herod of Tiberias, and guided by him down to the lake, where I seized a ship, and got into it, and escaped, greatly to the surprise of my enemies, and got to Tarichææ.<sup>1</sup>

§ 19. Now when the inhabitants of that city heard of the perfidiousness of the people of Tiberias, they were greatly provoked. So they snatched up their arms, and desired me to be their leader against them; for they said they would avenge their commander's cause upon them. They also carried the report of what had been done to me to all the Galilæans, and eagerly endeavoured to irritate them against the people of Tiberias, and besought them to muster in large numbers and come to them, that they might act as the general thought fit. Accordingly, the Galilæans came to me in great numbers, from all parts, with their weapons, and besought me to assault Tiberias, to take it by storm, and to lay it even with the ground, and then to make slaves of its inhabitants, with their wives and children. Those of my friends also who had escaped out of Tiberias gave me the same advice. But I did not comply with them, thinking it a terrible thing to begin a civil war, for I thought that this contention ought not to proceed further than words; nay, I told them that it was not for their own advantage to do this, the Romans wishing for nothing better than that we should destroy one another by our mutual factions. And by saying this I put a stop to the anger of the Galilæans.

§ 20. But now John was afraid for himself, since his treachery had proved unsuccessful. So he took the armed men that were with him, and removed from Tiberias to Gischala, and wrote to me to apologize for himself concerning what had been done, as if it had been done without his approbation, and desired me to have no suspicion of him. He also added oaths and certain horrible curses upon himself, and supposed he should be thereby believed in what he wrote to me.

§ 21. But now another large body of the Galilæans mustered from all the district again with their weapons, knowing how wicked and how perjured the man was, and desired me to lead them against him, and promised me that they would utterly destroy both him and Gischala. Hereupon I confessed, that I was obliged to them for their readiness to serve me, and that I would more than requite their good-will to me. However, I entreated them to restrain themselves, and begged of them to give me leave to do what I intended, which was to put an end to these troubles without bloodshed; and when I had prevailed with the multitude of the Galilæans to let me do so, I went to Sepphoris.

§ 22. But the inhabitants of that city, having determined to continue in their allegiance to the Romans, and being afraid of my coming to them, tried to divert me by another transaction, that they might be freed from the terror they were in. Accordingly they sent to Jesus, the captain of those robbers who were on the borders of Ptolemais,<sup>1</sup> and promised to give him a great deal of money, if he would come with those forces he had with him, which were in number eight hundred, and fight with us. Accordingly, he complied with what they desired, upon the promises they had made him, and was desirous to fall upon us when we were unprepared for him, and knew nothing of his coming beforehand. So he sent to me, and desired that I would give him leave to come and salute me. When I had given him that leave, which I did without the least knowledge of his treacherous intentions beforehand, he took with him his band of robbers, and made haste to come to me. Yet did not his knavery succeed well at last; for, as he was already near, one of those with him deserted, and came to me, and told me of his intention. When I was informed of this, I went into the market-place, pretending to know nothing of his treacherous purpose. I took with me many Galilæans that were armed, as also some from Tiberias: and when I had given orders that all the roads should be carefully guarded, I charged the keepers of the gates to give admittance to none but Jesus, when he came with the principal of his men, and to exclude the rest; and in case they tried to force themselves in, to smite them. Accordingly, those that had received orders did as they were bidden, and Jesus came in with a few of his men; and when I had ordered him to throw down his arms immediately, and told him that if he refused to do so he was a dead man, he seeing armed men standing all round about him, was frightened and complied; and as for those of his followers that were excluded, when they heard of his arrest, they fled. I then called Jesus apart, and told him, that "I was not a stranger to his treacherous design against me, nor was I ignorant by whom he had been sent, however, I would forgive what he had done already, if he would repent of it, and be faithful to me hereafter." And upon his promising to do all that I desired, I let him go, and gave him leave to muster his followers together again. But I threatened the inhabitants of Sepphoris, that if they would not leave off their unfair treatment of me, I would punish them.

§ 23. At this time two great men who were under the jurisdiction of king Agrippa, came to me out of the region of Trachonitis,<sup>1</sup> bringing their horses, and carrying with them their arms and money. As the Jews wanted to force them to be circumcised, if they wished to stay among them, I would not permit them to have force put upon them,<sup>2</sup> but said, "Every one ought to worship God according to his principles and not to be constrained by force; and that these men, who had fled to us for protection, ought not to be so treated as to repent of their coming hither." And when I had persuaded the multitude, I provided for the men that were come to us whatever they wanted, according to their usual way of living, in great plenty.

<sup>2</sup> Josephus's opinion is here well worth noting,—that every one is to be permitted to worship God according to his own conscience, and is not to be compelled in matters of religion: as one may here observe on the contrary, that the rest of the Jews were still for obliging all those who married Jews to be circumcised, and become Jews, and were ready to destroy all that would not submit so to do. See § 31, and Luke ix. 54.—W.

§ 24. Meantime king Agrippa sent a force under the command of Æquus Modius to make itself master of the citadel of Gamala,<sup>1</sup> but the force that was sent was not large enough to invest it, but lay before it in the open country, and besieged it. But when Æbutius the decurion, who was intrusted with the charge of the great plain, heard that I was at Simonias,<sup>2</sup> a village lying on the borders of Galilee, and was distant from him sixty furlongs, he took a hundred horse that were with him, and about two hundred foot, by night, and brought the inhabitants of the city of Gaba<sup>3</sup> with him as auxiliaries, and marched by night to the village where I abode. And when I drew up my large force in battle array, Æbutius tried to entice us to the plain, as greatly depending on his horse, but we would not come down; for as I saw at once the advantage that his horse would have if we came down into the plain, as we were all foot, I resolved to join battle with the enemy where I was. Now Æbutius and his men made a stout fight for some time; but when he saw that his horse were useless to him on that ground, he retired to Gaba, without having effected his object, and having lost three of his men in the fight. I followed him closely with two thousand armed men: and when I got to the city Besara,<sup>4</sup> that lay on the borders of Ptolemais, but twenty furlongs from Gaba, where Æbutius was, I placed my armed men outside the village, and gave orders that they should guard the roads with great care, that the enemy should not disturb us until we should have carried off the corn, a great quantity of which lay there, which belonged to Berenice the queen, and had been gathered together out of the neighbouring villages into Besara; so I loaded my camels and asses, a great number of which I had brought along with me, and sent the corn into Galilee. When I had done this, I offered Æbutius battle; but as he would not accept of the offer, for he was terrified at our readiness and courage, I marched against Neopolitanus, because I had heard that the country about Tiberias was being plundered by him. This Neopolitanus was captain of a troop of horse, and had had Scythopolis<sup>1</sup> intrusted to his care by the enemy; and when I had hindered him from ravaging Tiberias any further, I began to see to the affairs of Galilee.

§ 25. But when John, the son of Levi, who, as I said, was at Gischala,<sup>2</sup> heard how all things had succeeded to my mind, and that I was in favour with those who were under me, as also that the enemy were greatly afraid of me, he was not pleased with it, as thinking my prosperity tended to his ruin. So he launched out into bitter envy against me; and hoping, that if he could inflame those that were under me to hate me, he should put an end to my good fortune, he tried to persuade the inhabitants of Tiberias and of Sepphoris (as for those of Gabara<sup>3</sup> he supposed they would be of the same mind with the others,) and these three were the greatest cities of Galilee, to revolt from their subjection to me, and to join his party; and he told them, that he would command them better than I did. As for the people of Sepphoris (who belonged to neither of us, because they had chosen to be in subjection to the Romans) they did not listen to him, and for those of Tiberias, they did not indeed so far comply as to revolt from me, but they agreed to be his friends, while the inhabitants of Gabara went over to John; for Simon, a leading man in the city, and a particular friend and companion of John, persuaded them so to do. It is true, the men of Gabara did not openly own their revolt (because they were in great fear of the Galilæans, having had frequent experience of the goodwill they bore to me) yet did they privately watch for a good opportunity to lay snares for me, and indeed I thereby came into the greatest danger, on the following occasion.

§ 26. There were some bold young men of the village Dabaritta,<sup>4</sup> who observed that the wife of Ptolemy, the king's procurator, was journeying over the great plain with a large retinue, and with some horsemen that followed as a guard, from a country that was subject to the king and queen, into the jurisdiction of the Romans; and fell upon them on the sudden, and obliged the wife of Ptolemy to flee, and plundered all the baggage. They also came to me to Tarichææ,<sup>1</sup> with four mules laden with garments and other articles; and the weight of the silver they brought was not small, and there were five hundred pieces of gold also. Now I had a mind to preserve these spoils for Ptolemy (who was my countryman, and it is prohibited us by our laws even to spoil our enemies), so I told those that brought those spoils, that they ought to be kept to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem by their sale. But the young men took it very ill that they did not receive a part of these spoils for themselves, as they expected to have done; so they went among the villages in the neighbourhood of Tiberias, and told the people, that I was going to betray their country to the Romans, for I used deceitful language to them, when I said what had been thus got by rapine should be kept for rebuilding the walls of the city of Jerusalem, when I intended to restore these spoils again to their owner. And indeed they were not mistaken as to this my intention; for when they had gone away, I sent for two leading men, Dassion, and Jannæus the son of Levi, persons that were among the chief friends of the king, and commanded them to take the articles that had been robbed, and to send them to him; and I threatened that I would have them put to death, by way of punishment, if they communicated my orders to any other person.

§ 27. Now, when all Galilee was filled with the rumour, that their country was about to be betrayed by me to the Romans, and when all men were exasperated against me, and desirous to bring me to punishment, the inhabitants of Tarichææ did also themselves suppose that what the young men said was true, and urged my guards and armed men to leave me when I was asleep, and to go quickly to the hippodrome, in order there to take counsel with all men against me their commander. And, when they had prevailed with them, and they were got together, they found there a great company assembled already, who all joined in one clamour, to bring the man who was so wicked to them as to betray them to punishment. Now Jesus, the son of Sapphias, principally egged them on. He was chief magistrate at this time in Tiberias, and a wicked man, and naturally disposed to make great disturbances; he was indeed a seditious person, and an innovator beyond everybody else. He now took the laws of Moses into his hands, and came into the midst of the people, and said, "O my fellow-citizens! if you cannot hate Josephus on your own account, have regard at any rate to those laws of your country, which your commander-in-chief is going to betray; hate him therefore on both these accounts, and bring the man who has acted with such presumption to his deserved punishment."

§ 28. When he had said this, and the multitude loudly applauded him, he took some armed men, and hasted to the house in which I lodged, as if he would kill me immediately. But I was wholly insensible of all this till the disturbance happened, for I had fallen fast asleep from fatigue. But Simon, who was intrusted with the care of my body, and was the only person that stayed with me, seeing the violent rush the citizens made at me, awoke me, and told me of the danger I was in, and begged me to let him kill me, that I might die bravely, and like a general, before my enemies came in, and forced me [to kill myself], or themselves killed me. Thus did he speak to me, but I committed the care of my life to God, and made haste to go out to the multitude. And I put on a black garment, and hung my sword round my neck, and went by a different way to the hippodrome, so that I thought none of my adversaries would meet me: and I appeared among them on the sudden, and fell down flat on the earth, and bedewed the ground with my tears, and seemed to all persons an object of compassion. And when I perceived the change that was thus wrought in the multitude, I tried to divide their opinions, before the armed men should return from my house: so I granted them that I had been as wicked as they supposed me to have been, but I entreated them to let me first inform them for what use I had kept the money arising from the plunder, and they might then kill me, if they pleased. And, upon the multitude's ordering me to speak, the armed men came in, and when they saw me, they ran up to kill me: but when the multitude bade them stop, they complied, expecting that as soon as I should own to them that I had kept the money for the king, it would be looked on as a confession of treason, and they would then be allowed to kill me.

§ 29. When, therefore, silence was made by the whole multitude, I spoke thus to them: "My countrymen, I refuse not to die, if justice so require. However, I am desirous to tell you the truth before I die; for as I knew that this city of yours was a city given to hospitality, and filled with abundance of men who have left their own countries, and are come hither to be partakers of your fortune whatever it be, I had a mind to build walls about it out of this money, for which you are so angry with me, while yet it was to be expended in building your own walls." Upon my saying this, the people of Tarichææ and the foreigners cried out, that they gave me thanks, and desired me to be of good courage. But the Galilæans and the people of Tiberias continued in their wrath against me, insomuch that there arose a tumult among them, as some threatened to kill me, and some bade me not to regard them. But when I promised that I would build them walls at Tiberias, and at the other cities that wanted them, they gave credit to what I promised, and returned everyone to his own home. So I escaped the forementioned danger beyond all my hopes, and returned to my own house, accompanied by my friends and twenty armed men.

§ 30. But those robbers and other authors of this tumult, who were afraid on their own account that I should punish them for what they had done, took six hundred armed men, and came to the house where I abode, in order to set it on fire. When I was told of their approach, I thought it unseemly to run away, and I resolved to expose myself to danger, and to act with resolution. So I gave orders to shut the doors of the house, and went up into an upper room, and desired that they would send some of their men in to receive the money [from the spoils]; for I told them that then they would have no occasion to be angry with me; and when they had sent in one of the boldest of them all, I had him whipped severely, after having him dragged to the innermost part of the house, and I commanded that one of his hands should be cut off, and hung it about his neck, and thus thrust him out to those that sent him. At which procedure of mine they were greatly affrighted, and in no small consternation, and were afraid that they would themselves be served in like manner, if they stayed there (for they supposed that I had in the house more armed men than they had); so they ran away immediately. Thus I, by the use of this stratagem, escaped their second treacherous design against me.

§ 31. But there were some that still irritated the multitude against me, and said that those royal grandees that came to me ought not to be suffered to live, if they would not change their habits to suit those to whom they fled for safety: they spoke reproachfully of them also, and said, that they were sorcerers, and prevented their getting the better of the Romans. And the multitude was soon deluded by such plausible arguments as were agreeable to their own inclinations, and were persuaded by them. But when I was informed of this, I urged on the multitude again, that those who fled to them for refuge ought not to be persecuted; I also laughed at the absurd allegation of sorcery, and told them that the Romans would not keep so many as ten thousand soldiers, if they could overcome their enemies by sorcery. Upon my saying this, the people assented for a while, but they returned afterwards, being irritated by some bad people against the grandees. Nay, they once made an assault upon the house in which they dwelt at Tarichææ, in order to kill them; and when I was informed of that, I was afraid, if so horrid a crime should take effect, that nobody else would make that city their refuge any more. I therefore went with some others to the house where these grandees lived, and locked their doors, and had a canal cut from their house to the lake, and sent for a ship, and embarked thereon with them, and sailed to the confines of Hippos.<sup>1</sup> I also paid them the value of their horses, for in such a flight I could not have their horses brought to them. I then dismissed them, and begged of them earnestly that they would courageously bear this distress which had befallen them. I was also myself greatly grieved that I was compelled to expose those that had fled to me for shelter to go again into an enemy's country; yet did I think it better that they should perish among the Romans, if it should so happen, than in the country that was under my jurisdiction. However, they escaped at last, for king Agrippa forgave them their offences. And this was the conclusion of what concerned those men.

§ 32. But as for the inhabitants of the city of Tiberias, they wrote to the king, and desired him to send them forces sufficient to guard their country; for they were desirous to come over to him: this was what they wrote to him. But when I came to them, they desired me to construct for them walls, as I had promised them to do; for they had heard that the walls of Tarichææ were already built. I agreed to the proposal accordingly, and when I had made all preparations for the building, I gave orders to the engineers to go to work. But on the third day, when I was gone to Tarichææ, which was thirty furlongs from Tiberias, it so fell out, that some Roman horsemen were sighted on the march not far from the city, which made it supposed that a force was come from the king; upon which they shouted, and lifted up their voices in commendations of the king, and in reproaches against me, and one came running up to me, and told me what their dispositions were, and that they had resolved to revolt from me. Upon hearing this news, I was very much alarmed: for I had already sent away my armed men from Tarichææ to their own homes, because the next day was our sabbath; for I would not have the people of Tarichææ disturbed [on that day] by a multitude of soldiers; and indeed, whenever I sojourned in that city, I never took any particular care for a body-guard, because I had had frequent proofs of the fidelity its inhabitants bore to me; and I had about me no more than seven armed men besides some friends, and so I was doubtful what to do. For I did not think proper to send to recall my own forces, because the day was almost over, and had these forces been with me, I could not take up arms on the next day, because our laws forbade us to do so, even though our necessity should be very great ; and if I should permit the people of Tarichææ, and the strangers with them, to plunder the city, I saw that they would not be sufficient for that purpose, and I perceived that I should be obliged to defer my assistance a great while ; for I thought with myself that the forces that came from the king would get the start of me, and that I should be driven out of the city. I resolved, therefore, to get clear of these forces by a stratagem ; so I immediately placed at the gates of Tarichææ those friends of mine on whom I could best confide, to watch very carefully those who wished to pass out ; I also called to me the heads of families, and bade every one of them to launch a ship, and go on board it, and take a pilot with them, and follow me to the city of Tiberias. I also myself went on board one of those ships, with my friends, and the seven armed men I have already mentioned, and sailed for Tiberias.

§ 33. But now, when the people of Tiberias perceived that there were no forces come from the king, and yet saw the whole lake full of ships, they were in fear for their city, and were greatly terrified, supposing that the ships were full of soldiers ; so they changed their minds, and threw down their weapons, and met me with their wives and children, and made acclamations to me with great commendations ; for they imagined that I did not know their former intentions, and besought me to spare the city. But when I was come near, I gave order to the pilots to cast anchor a good way off the land, that the people of Tiberias might not perceive that the ships had no men on board. And I went near to the people in one of the ships, and rebuked them for their folly, and for being so fickle as, without any just excuse, to revolt from their fidelity to me. However, I assured them, that I would certainly forgive them for the time to come, if they would send ten of the ringleaders of the multitude to me ; and when they complied readily with this proposal, and sent me the men before mentioned, I put them on board a ship, and sent them away to Tarichææ, and ordered them to be kept in prison there.

§ 34. And by this stratagem I gradually got all the senate of Tiberias into my power, and sent them to Tarichææ, with many of the principal men among the populace, and those not fewer in number than the others. But when the multitude saw into what great miseries they had brought themselves, they desired me to punish the author of this sedition. His name was Clitus, and he was a young man bold and rash in his undertakings. Now, since I thought it not agreeable to piety to put one of my own countrymen to death, and yet found it necessary to punish him, I ordered Levi, one of my own body-guards, to go to him, and cut off one of Clitus's hands; but as he that was ordered to do this was afraid to go alone among so great a multitude, I was not willing that the cowardice of the soldier should be made manifest to the people of Tiberias. So I called to Clitus himself, and said to him, "Since thou deservest to lose both thine hands for thy ingratitude to me, be thou thine own executioner, lest, if thou refusest so to be, thou undergo a worse punishment." And, when he earnestly begged of me to spare him one of his hands, it was with difficulty that I granted it. And he, to prevent the loss of both his hands, willingly took his sword, and cut off his left hand; and this put an end to the sedition.

§ 35. Now the men of Tiberias, after I had gone to Tarichææ, discovered the stratagem I had used against them, and admired how I had put an end to their foolish sedition without shedding of blood. And now I sent for some of the people of Tiberias out of prison (among whom were Justus and his father Pistus) and had them to sup with me; and during supper time I told them, that I knew the power of the Romans was superior to all others, but had kept silent about it because of the robbers. So I advised them to do as I did, and to wait for a proper opportunity, and not to be uneasy at my being their commander; for that they could not expect to have another who would act with the moderation that I had done. I also reminded Justus how the Galilæans had cut off his brother's hands, before I came from Jerusalem, upon an accusation laid against him of having forged some letters before the war, as also how the people of Gamala, in a rising against the Babylonians after the departure of Philip, slew Chares (who was a kinsman of Philip), and also how they had wisely punished Jesus, his brother, the husband of Justus's sister. When I had said this to them during supper-time, I in the morning ordered Justus, and all the rest that were in prison, to be discharged.

§ 36. But before this, it happened that Philip, the son of Jacimus, went out of the citadel of Gamala upon the following occasion. When Philip had been informed that Varus had been removed by king Agrippa, and that Modius Æquus, a man that was of old his friend and companion, had come to succeed him, he wrote to him, and related what various fortunes he had had, and desired him to forward the letters he had sent to the king and queen. Now, when Modius had received these letters, he was exceedingly glad, knowing thereby that Philip was safe, and forwarded the letters to the king and queen, who were then at Berytus.<sup>1</sup> But when King Agrippa knew that the rumour about Philip was false, (for it had been given out, that the Jews had begun a war with the Romans, and that this Philip had been their commander) he sent some horsemen to conduct Philip to him; and when he was come, he saluted him in a very friendly way, and showed him to the Roman commanders, and told them that this was the man of whom the report had gone about that he had revolted from the Romans. He also bade him to take some horsemen with him, and go to the citadel of Gamala, and bring out thence all his household, and restore the Babylonians<sup>2</sup> to Batanæa again. He also charged him to take all possible care that none of his subjects should be guilty of any insurrection. And Philip, upon these directions from the king, made haste to do what he commanded him.

§ 37. Now, there was one Joseph, the son of a midwife, who stirred up a great many bold young men to join with him, and rose against the principal persons at Gamala, and urged them to revolt from the king, and take up arms, and gave them hopes that they should through him recover their liberty. And some they forced into the service, and those that would not acquiesce in their views, they slew. They also slew Chares, and with him his kinsman Jesus, and a brother of Justus of Tiberias, as I have already said. They also wrote to me, desiring me to send them an armed force, and workmen to raise up the walls of their city; nor did I refuse either of their requests. The region of Gaulanitis<sup>1</sup> did also revolt from the king, as far as the village of Solyma.<sup>2</sup> I also built walls about Selucia<sup>3</sup> and Sogana,<sup>4</sup> villages naturally of very great strength. Moreover, in like manner, I walled several villages of Upper Galilee, though they were very rocky of themselves. Their names were Jamnia,<sup>5</sup> and Meroth,<sup>6</sup> and Achabare.<sup>7</sup> I also fortified, in Lower Galilee, the cities of Tarichææ, Tiberias, Sepphoris, and the villages of the cave of Arbela,<sup>8</sup> Bersabe,<sup>9</sup> Selamin,<sup>10</sup> Jotapata,<sup>11</sup> Caphareccho,<sup>12</sup> Sigo,<sup>13</sup> Japha,<sup>14</sup> and Mount Tabor.<sup>15</sup> I also laid up a great quantity of corn in these places, and arms also, that might be for their security afterwards.

§ 38. But the hatred that John, the son of Levi, bore to me, grew now more violent, as he could not bear my prosperity with patience. So he proposed to himself, by all means possible, to make away with me, and built the walls of Gischala, which was his native place. He then sent his brother Simon, and Jonathan the son of Sisenna, and about a hundred armed men, to Jerusalem, to Simon the son of Gamaliel,<sup>16</sup> to beg him to induce the commonalty of Jerusalem to take from me the government over the Galilæans, and to give their votes for conferring that authority upon him. This Simon was of the city of Jerusalem, and of a very illustrious family, of the sect of the Pharisees, who are supposed to excel all others in the accurate knowledge of the laws of their country. He was a man of great wisdom and intelligence, and capable of restoring public affairs, when they were in an ill posture, by his sagacity. He was also an old friend and companion of John, but was at that time at variance with me. When therefore he had received this exhortation, he urged the high priests, Ananus, and Jesus the son of Gamala, and some others of the same party, to cut me short, now I was growing so great, and not to overlook my advancing to the height of glory; and he added, that it would be for their advantage if I were deprived of my government in Galilee. He desired Ananus also, and his friends, to make no delay about the matter, lest I should get the knowledge of what was doing too soon, and should come and make an assault upon the city with a great army. This was the counsel of Simon; but Ananus the high priest showed that it was no easy thing to be done, because many of the high priests and of the rulers of the people bore witness that I had acted like an excellent general, and added that it was the work of bad men to accuse one against whom they had nothing to say.

§ 39. When Simon heard Ananus say this, he desired those present to conceal the thing, and not to let it come abroad; for he would take care to have me removed from Galilee very quickly. So he called for John's brother, and charged him to send presents to Ananus and his friends; for he said they might probably by that means persuade them to change their minds. And indeed Simon did thus at last compass what he aimed at; for Ananus, and those with him, being corrupted by bribes, agreed to expel me from Galilee, without any others of the citizens knowing what they were doing. Accordingly, they resolved to send men of distinction, both as to their families and learning. Two of these were of the populace, Jonathan and Ananias, of the sect of the Pharisees, while the third, Jozarus, was of the stock of the priests, and a Pharisee also, and Simon, the last of them, was the youngest of the high priests. They were instructed, when they were come to the multitude of the Galilæans, to ask them, what was the reason of their love to me? And if they answered, that it was because I was born in Jerusalem, then they should reply, that they four were all born at the same place; and if they should say, it was because I was well versed in their law, they should reply, that neither were they unacquainted with the practices of their country; and if they should further say, they loved me because I was a priest, they should reply, that two of them were priests also.

§ 40. Now, when they had given Jonathan and his companions these instructions, they gave them forty thousand pieces of silver out of the public treasury. And when they heard that there was a certain Galilæan that then sojourned at Jerusalem, whose name was Jesus, who had with him a band of six hundred armed men, they sent for him, and gave him three months' pay, and orders to follow Jonathan and his companions, and to be obedient to them. They also gave money to three hundred citizens to maintain them all, and ordered them also to follow the ambassadors. And when they had complied, and got ready for the march, Jonathan and his companions went out with them, taking along with them John's brother and a hundred armed men. The orders given them by those that sent them were, that if I should voluntarily lay down my arms, they should send me alive to the city of Jerusalem, but that, in case I opposed them, they should kill me, and fear nothing; for that it was their command so to do. They also wrote to John to make all things ready for fighting me, and gave orders to the inhabitants of Sephoris, and Gabara, and Tiberias, to send auxiliaries to John.

§ 41. Now, as my father wrote me an account of this, (for Jesus the son of Gamala, who was present at that council, a friend and companion of mine, told him of it), I was very much troubled, discovering thereby, that my fellow-citizens were so ungrateful to me, as out of envy to give orders that I should be slain; my father earnestly pressed me also in his letter to come to him, for he longed to see his son before he died. I informed my friends of these things, and said that in three days I should leave the country, and go home. Upon hearing this, they were all very sorry, and desired me, with tears in their eyes, not to leave them to be destroyed, as they would be, if they were deprived of my command over them. But as I did not grant their request, but provided for my own safety, the Galilæans, dreading that after my departure they would be at the mercy of the robbers, sent messengers over all Galilee to inform them of my resolution to leave them. Whereupon, as soon as they heard of it, they got together in great numbers, from all parts, with their wives and children; and this they did, as it appeared to me, not more out of affection to me than fear on their own account: for, while I stayed with them, they supposed that they should suffer no harm. So they all came into the great plain wherein I lived, the name of which was Asochis.<sup>1</sup>

§ 42. But wonderful was a dream I saw that very night; for when I had betaken myself to my bed, being grieved and disturbed at the news that had been written to me, it seemed to me that a certain person stood by me, and said, "Sir, leave off to afflict thy soul, and put away all fear; for what now grieves thee will render thee very great and in all respects most happy; for thou shalt not only get over these difficulties, but many others, with great success. Be not therefore cast down, but remember that thou art to fight with the Romans." When I had seen this dream, I got up with an intention of going down to the plain. But when the whole multitude of the Galilæans (and among them the women and children) saw me, they threw themselves down upon their faces, and, with tears in their eyes, besought me not to leave them exposed to their enemies, nor to go away, and permit their country to be the sport of their foes. But as they did not persuade me by their entreaties, they tried to force me to take an oath that I would stay with them: they also cast abundant reproaches upon the people of Jerusalem, because they would not let their country enjoy peace.

§ 43. When I heard this, and saw what dejection the people were in, I was moved with compassion, and thought it right to undergo the most manifest hazards for the sake of so great a multitude. So I let them know I would stay with them, and when I had given orders that five thousand of them should come to me armed, and with their own provisions, I sent the rest away to their own homes. And when those five thousand were come, I took them, together with three thousand of the soldiers that were with me before, and eighty horsemen, and marched to the village of Chabolo, which is situated on the confines of Ptolemais. And there I kept my forces together, feigning to get ready to fight with Placidus, who had come with two cohorts of foot, and one troop of horse, having been sent there by Cestius Gallus, to burn those villages of Galilee that were near Ptolemais.<sup>1</sup> And upon his casting up a bank before the city Ptolemais, I also pitched my camp at about the distance of sixty furlongs from Chabolo.<sup>2</sup> And now we frequently brought out our forces as if for battle, but proceeded no further than skirmishes; for, when Placidus saw that I was earnest to come to battle, he was afraid, and declined it. Yet did he not remove from the neighbourhood of Ptolemais.

§ 44. It was about this time that Jonathan and his fellow-envoys came, who were sent, as I have said already, by Simon and Ananus the high priest. And Jonathan laid a plot to catch me by treachery; for he durst not make any attempt upon me openly. So he wrote me the following letter. "Jonathan and those that are with him, who are sent by the people of Jerusalem, send greeting to Josephus. We are sent by the principal men of Jerusalem, who have heard that John of Gischala hath laid many snares for thee, to rebuke him, and to exhort him to be subject to thee for the future. We are also desirous to consult with thee about our common concerns, as to what ought to be done. We therefore desire thee to come to us quickly, and to bring only a few men with thee; for this village will not hold a great number of soldiers." Thus they wrote, expecting one of two things, either that I should go to them without armed men, and then they would have me in their power; or, if I came with a great number, they would judge me to be a public enemy. Now a horseman brought the letter, an impudent man who had served in the army under the king. It was the second hour of the night when he came, and I was feasting with my friends, and the leading Galilæans. This man, upon my servant's telling me that a certain Jewish horseman was come, was called in at my command, but did not so much as salute me at all, but held out the letter, and said, "This letter is sent thee by those that are come from Jerusalem: do thou write an answer to it quickly, for I am in a hurry to return to them." Now my guests wondered at the boldness of the soldier, but I asked him to sit down and sup with us; but as he refused to do so, I held the letter in my hands as I received it, and conversed with my guests about other matters. But not long after I rose, and when I had dismissed the rest to their repose, I bade only four of my intimate friends to stay, and ordered my servant to get some wine. I also opened the letter, without anybody noticing it; and understanding thereby presently the intention of the writers, I sealed it up again, as if I had not read it, but only held it in my hands, and ordered twenty drachmæ to be given the soldier for the expenses of his journey; and when he took the money, and said he was obliged for it, I perceived that he loved money, and that he was to be caught chiefly by that bait, so I said to him, "If thou wilt but drink with us, thou shalt have a drachma for every glass thou drinkest." And he gladly embraced the proposal, and drank a great deal of wine, in order to get the more money, and got so drunk, that he could no longer keep the secrets he was intrusted with, but blabbed out, without my putting questions to him, that a treacherous design was contrived against me, and that I was doomed to death by those that sent him. When I heard this, I wrote back the following answer. "Josephus sendeth greeting to Jonathan and those that are with him. I rejoice to hear that you are come into Galilee in good health, especially as I can now resign the care of public affairs here into your hands, and return into my native country; which is what I have desired to do a long time. And I confess I ought, not only to come to you as far as Xaloth,<sup>1</sup> but further, and that without your commands. But I desire you to excuse me, because I cannot do so now, since I am watching the motions of Placidus, who desires to go up into Galilee, here at Chabolo. Do you, therefore, on the receipt of this letter, come hither to me. Fare you well.”

§ 45. When I had written this, and given the letter to the soldier to carry, I sent along with him thirty of the Galilæans of the best repute, and gave them instructions to salute the envoys, but to say nothing to them. I also attached as many armed men, whom I esteemed most faithful to me, to go along with the others, to watch, lest any conversation might pass between those whom I sent, and those that were with Jonathan. So these men set out. But, as Jonathan and his partners had failed in this their first attempt, they sent me another letter, as follows. “Jonathan and those with him send greeting to Josephus. We require thee to come to us to the village Gabaroth,<sup>1</sup> on the third day, without any armed men, that we may hear what thou hast to lay to the charge of John [of Gischala.”] When they had written this letter, and saluted the Galilæans whom I sent, they went to Japha, which was the largest village of all Galilee, and encompassed with very strong walls, and had a great number of inhabitants in it. There the multitude of men, with their wives and children, met them, and exclaimed loudly against them, and bade them be gone, and not grudge them an excellent commander. With these clamours Jonathan and his partners were greatly provoked, although they durst not show their anger openly; so they deigned to make no answer, but went to other villages. But similar clamours met them from all the people, who said, “Nobody should persuade them to have any other commander than Josephus.” So Jonathan and his partners went away from them without success, and came to Sepphoris, the greatest city of all Galilee. Now the men of that city, who inclined to the Romans in their sentiments, met them indeed, but neither praised nor reproached me: and when they were gone down from Sepphoris to Asochis,<sup>2</sup> the people of that place made a clamour against them, just as those of Japha had done. Whereupon they were able to contain themselves no longer, but ordered the armed men that were with them to beat those that made the clamour with their clubs.

And when they came to Gabara, John met them with three thousand armed men. And as I understood by their letter that they had resolved to fight against me, I departed from Chabolo, with three thousand armed men also, but left in my camp one of my most faithful friends, and went to Jotapata, being desirous to be near them, the distance being no more than forty furlongs. And I wrote thus to them. "If you are very desirous that I should come to you, you know there are two hundred and four cities and villages in Galilee: I will come to any of them which you please, excepting Gabara and Gischala; one of which is John's native city, and the other in confederacy and friendship with him."

§ 46. When Jonathan and his partners had received this letter, they wrote to me no more answers, but called a council of their friends together, and taking John into their consultation, deliberated how they might attack me. John's opinion was, that they should write to all the cities and villages that were in Galilee; for that there must be certainly one or two persons in every one of them that were at variance with me, and that these should be invited to come and oppose me as an enemy. He would also have them send this resolution of theirs to the city of Jerusalem, that its citizens, upon the knowledge of my being adjudged to be an enemy by the Galilæans, might themselves also vote the same. He said also, that when this was done, even those Galilæans who were well affected to me, would desert me out of fear. When John had given them this counsel, what he said was very agreeable to the rest. I was made acquainted with this about the third hour of the night by one Sacchæus, who had belonged to them, but now deserted them and came over to me, and told me what they were about. So I perceived that no time was to be lost, but gave command to James, an armed man of my guard, whom I esteemed faithful to me, to take two hundred armed men, and to guard the passages that led from Gabara to Galilee, and to seize upon all passers by, and send them to me, especially such as were taken with letters about them. I also sent Jeremiah himself, one of my friends, with six hundred armed men, to the borders of Galilee, in order to watch the roads that led from that country to the city of Jerusalem, and gave him charge to arrest such as travelled with letters about them, and to keep the men in bonds upon the spot, but to send me the letters.

§ 47. When I had laid these commands upon those I sent out, I gave the Galilæans orders and bid them to take their arms, and bring three days' provision with them, and be with me the next day at Gabaroth. I also divided the armed men about me into four parts, and set those of them that were most faithful to me to be my body-guard. I also put over them centurions, and commanded them to take care that not a soldier whom they did not know should mix himself among them. Now, about the fifth hour on the day following, when I was at Gabaroth, I found the entire plain that was before the village full of armed men, who according to my orders were come out of Galilee to assist me: a large multitude also from the villages accompanied them. And as soon as I had taken my place, and began to speak to them, they all made acclamation, and called me the benefactor and saviour of their country. And when I had made them my acknowledgments, and thanked them, I also advised them to fight with nobody, and not to spoil the country, but to pitch their tents in the plain, and be content with their provisions; for I told them I had a mind to settle these troubles without shedding any blood. Now it came to pass, on the very same day, that those who were sent by John with letters fell into the hands of the guards whom I appointed to watch the roads, so the men were themselves kept upon the spot, as my orders were, but I got the letters, which were full of reproaches and lies; and I intended to march against those men, without saying a word of my intention to anybody.

§ 48. Now, as soon as Jonathan and his companions heard of my coming, they took all their own friends, and John with them, and retired to the house of Jesus, which indeed was a large tower, and no way unlike a citadel. And they privately secreted a band of armed men there, and shut all the doors but one, which they kept open, and expected that I should come to them off my journey to salute them. And indeed they had given orders to the armed men, that when I came they should let nobody besides me come in, but should exclude all the others; supposing that by this means they should easily get me into their power: but they were deceived in their expectation. For I perceived what snares they had laid for me, and, as soon as I was come off my journey, I took up my lodgings over against them, and pretended to be asleep. Then Jonathan and his party, thinking I was really asleep and at rest, made haste to go down into the plain, to persuade the people that I was a sorry general. But matters proved other than they expected; for upon their appearance there was a cry made by the Galilæans immediately, declaring their good opinion of me as their general; and they made a clamour against Jonathan and his party for coming to them, when they had suffered no harm, to upset their affairs; and advised them to go back again, for they would never be persuaded to have any other to rule over them but myself. When this was reported to me, I did not fear to go down into the midst of them; I went, therefore, myself down at once to hear what Jonathan and his companions said. As soon as I appeared, there was immediately acclamation made to me by the whole multitude, and a cry in my commendation from them, who confessed their thanks were owing to me for my leadership of them.

§ 49. When Jonathan and his companions heard this, they were afraid for their own lives, lest they should be attacked by the Galilæans on my account; so they thought of flight. But as they were not able to get off (for I told them to stay) they looked with concern at my words to them. I ordered, therefore, the multitude to restrain their acclamations, and posted the most faithful of my armed men at the avenues, to be on the guard lest John should unexpectedly fall upon us; and I advised the Galilæans to take their weapons, lest they should be disturbed at their enemies, if any sudden assault should be made upon them. Then, in the first place, I put Jonathan and his party in mind of their letter, how they had written to me, and declared they were sent by the commonalty of the people of Jerusalem, to make up the differences I had with John, and how they had desired me to go to them. And as I spoke thus, I publicly showed the letter they had written, till they could not at all deny what they had done, the letter itself convicting them. I then said, "O Jonathan! and you that are his colleagues, if I were to be judged as to my behaviour, compared with that of John's, and had brought no more than two or three witnesses, good men and true, it is plain you would have been forced, after the examination of their characters, to acquit me of the charges brought against me. That therefore you may know that I have acted well in the affairs of Galilee, I think three witnesses too few to be brought by a man that hath done as he ought to do; so I give you all these for witnesses. Inquire of them how I have lived, and whether I have not behaved myself with all decorum and integrity among them. And I further conjure you, O Galilæans! to hide no part of the truth, but to speak before these men as before judges, if I have in anything acted otherwise than well."

§ 50. While I was thus speaking, the voices of all the people united in calling me their benefactor and saviour. And they attested to my former behaviour, and exhorted me to continue so to act. And they all swore that their wives had been preserved from outrages, and that no one had ever been harmed by me. After this I read to the Galilæans two of the letters which had been sent me by Jonathan and his colleagues, and which those whom I had appointed to guard the roads had taken and sent on to me. They were full of reproaches and lies, as if I had acted more like a tyrant than a general to them, and many other things besides were therein contained, which were no better indeed than impudent falsehoods. I also informed the multitude that I got those letters, because those who carried them delivered them up voluntarily; for I was not willing that my enemies should know anything of the guards I had posted, lest they should be afraid, and leave off writing any more.

§ 51. When the multitude heard these things, they were greatly provoked at Jonathan and his colleagues that were with him, and were going to attack them, and kill them, and would certainly have done so, had I not restrained the anger of the Galilæans, and said, that I forgave Jonathan and his colleagues what was past, if they would repent, and go to their own country, and tell those who sent them the truth as to my conduct. When I had said this, I dismissed them, although I knew they would do nothing of what they promised. But the multitude were very much enraged against them, and entreated me to give them leave to punish them for their insolence; yet did I try all methods to induce them to spare the men; for I knew that every case of sedition was pernicious to the public welfare. But the multitude were too angry with them to be dissuaded, and all of them went immediately to the house in which Jonathan and his colleagues abode. But when I perceived that their rage could not be restrained, I got on horseback, and ordered the multitude to follow me to the village Sogane, which was twenty furlongs from Gabara. By using this stratagem, I so managed as not to appear to begin a civil war amongst them.

§ 52. But when I was come near to Sogane, I caused the multitude to make a halt, and exhorted them not to be so easily provoked to anger, and to the inflicting such punishments as could not be afterwards remedied; I also gave order, that a hundred men, who were already in years, and were principal men among them, should get themselves ready to go to the city of Jerusalem, to make a complaint before the people of such as raised seditions in the country. And I said to them, "in case they be moved with what you say, you shall desire the community to write to me, and to enjoin me to remain in Galilee, and to order Jonathan and his colleagues to depart out of it." When I had suggested this to them, and while they were getting themselves ready as fast as they could, I sent them forth the third day after the assembly; I also sent five hundred armed men with them. I then wrote to my friends in Samaria,<sup>1</sup> to see to their safely passing through that country; for Samaria was already under the Romans, and it was absolutely necessary for those that wanted to go quickly to Jerusalem, to pass through that country; for by that road one may, in three days' time, go from Galilee to Jerusalem. I also myself conducted the envoys as far as the bounds of Galilee, and posted guards on the road, that it might not be easily known by any one that these men were gone. And when I had done this, I went and abode at Japha.

§ 53. Now Jonathan and his colleagues, having failed in accomplishing what they would have done against me, sent John back to Gischala, and went themselves to the city of Tiberias, expecting it would submit to them. Their idea was founded on a letter which Jesus, its then governor, had written them, promising, that if they came, the multitude would receive them, and choose to be under their government. So they went their ways with this expectation. But Silas, who, as I said, had been left by me to look after Tiberias, informed me of this, and desired me to make haste thither. And I complied with his advice quickly, and went there, but found myself in danger of my life, for the following reason. Jonathan and his colleagues had been at Tiberias, and had persuaded a great many who were at variance with me to revolt from me; but when they heard of my coming, they were in fear for themselves, and came to me, and when they had saluted me, they said, that I was a happy man in having behaved myself so well in the government of Galilee; and they congratulated me upon the honours that were paid me; for they said that my glory was a credit to them, since they had been my teachers and fellow-citizens. They added further, that it was but just that they should prefer my friendship to them rather than John's, and that they would have immediately gone home, but that they stayed that they might deliver up John into my power; and when they said this, they swore to it with oaths such as are most tremendous amongst us, and such as I did not think fit to disbelieve. However, they desired me to lodge somewhere else: because the next day was the sabbath, and it was not fit that the city of Tiberias should be disturbed by them on that day.

§ 54. As I suspected nothing, I went away to Tarichææ; yet did I leave some in the city to make inquiry whether anything was said about me. I also posted many persons all along the way that led from Tarichææ to Tiberias, that they might communicate to me by relays whatever they learned from those that were left in the city. Now the next day they all assembled in the place of prayer,<sup>1</sup> a large edifice, and capable of receiving a great number of people; Jonathan went in too, and though he durst not openly speak of revolt, yet did he say that their city stood in need of a better governor than it then had. But Jesus, who was the ruler, made no scruple to speak out, and said openly, "O fellow-citizens! it is better for you to be in subjection to four than to one; and those such as are of high birth, and not without reputation for their wisdom," and pointed to Jonathan and his colleagues. Upon his saying this, Justus came forward, and commended him for what he had said, and induced some of the people to be of his mind also. But the multitude were not pleased with what was said, and would certainly have gone in for a tumult, had not the sixth hour, which was now come, dissolved the assembly, as at that hour our laws require us to go to dinner on Sabbath days. So Jonathan and his party put off their council till the next day, and went off without effecting their ends. When I was informed of these things, I at once determined to go to the city of Tiberias in the morning. Accordingly, on the next day, about the first hour of the day, I went to Tiberias from Tarichææ, and found the multitude ready assembled in the place of prayer; but why they were assembled together those that were present did not know. But, when Jonathan and his colleagues unexpectedly saw me there, they were in great disorder, but they spread a report of their own invention that Roman horsemen were seen at a place called Homonæa,<sup>2</sup> on the borders, thirty furlongs from the city. Upon this report Jonathan and his colleagues advised and exhorted me not to suffer the land to be spoiled by the enemy. And this they said with a design to remove me out of the city, under pretence of the pressing need of assistance, while they might make the city hostile to me.

§ 55. As for myself, although I knew of their design, yet did I comply with what they proposed, lest the people of Tiberias should have occasion to suppose that I was not anxious about their security. I therefore went out, but when I was at the place, I found not the least footstep of an enemy, so I returned as fast as ever I could, and found the whole council and the mass of the people assembled, and Jonathan and his colleagues bringing vehement accusations against me, as one that cared not to ease them of the burdens of war, and as one that lived luxuriously. And as they talked thus, they produced four letters as if written to them from some people that lived on the borders of Galilee, imploring them to come to their assistance (for there was an army of Romans, both horse and foot, who would come and lay waste their country on the third day), and desiring them to make haste, and not to neglect them. When the people of Tiberias heard this, they thought they spoke truth, and raised a clamour against me, and said, I ought not to sit still, but to go away to the assistance of their fellow-countrymen. Hereupon I said (for I understood the meaning of Jonathan and his colleagues) that I was ready to comply with what they proposed, and promised without delay to march to the war, but advised them, at the same time, since those letters declared that the Romans would make their assault in four different places, that they should divide their forces into five bodies, and make Jonathan and his colleagues commanders of each body, for it was fit for brave men not only to give counsel, but to take their place as leaders, and assist their countrymen when necessity pressed upon them; for I said it was not possible for me to lead more than one body. This advice of mine greatly pleased the multitude; so they compelled them to go forth to the war. But their plans were thus put into very much disorder, because they had not effected what they had designed to do, as my stratagem foiled their undertakings.

§ 56. Now there was one of them whose name was Ananias, who was a wicked and very mischievous man. He proposed that a general religious fast should be appointed the next day for all the people, and gave order that they should come at the same hour to the same place without any weapons, to make it manifest before God, that unless they obtained his assistance, they thought every weapon useless. This he said, not out of piety, but to catch me and my friends unarmed. And I was forced to comply, lest I should appear to despise a proposal that tended to piety. As soon, therefore, as we were gone home, Jonathan and his colleagues wrote to John, to come to them in the morning, bidding him to come with as many soldiers as he possibly could, for he would then be able easily to get me into his hands, and to do all that he desired to do. When John received this letter, he resolved to comply with it. As for myself, on the next day, I ordered two of my body-guards whom I esteemed the most courageous and most faithful, to hide daggers under their garments, and to go along with me, that we might defend ourselves, if any attack should be made upon us by our enemies. I also myself took my breastplate, and girt on my sword, so that it might be, as far as was possible, concealed, and went to the place of prayer.

§ 57. Now Jesus, who was the ruler, commanded that they should exclude all that came with me, for he kept the door himself, and suffered me to enter with only my friends. And while we were engaged in the services of the day, and had betaken ourselves to our prayers, Jesus got up, and inquired of me what was become of the vessels that were taken out of the king's palace, when it was burnt down, and of the uncoined silver, and in whose possession they now were? This he said, in order to spin out the time till John should come. I said that Capellus, and the ten principal men of Tiberias, had them all; and I told him, that he might ask them whether I told a lie or not. And when they said they had them, he asked me further, "What is become of those twenty pieces of gold which thou didst receive upon the sale of a certain weight of uncoined money?" I replied, that I had given them to their ambassadors, as journey-money, when they were sent by them to Jerusalem. To this Jonathan and his colleagues said, that I had not done well to pay the ambassadors out of the public money. And when the multitude were very angry at them for this, for they perceived the wickedness of the men, I foresaw that a tumult was going to arise, and being desirous not to provoke the people to greater rage against the men, I said, "Well, if I have not done well in paying our ambassadors out of the public stock, leave off your anger at me, for I will repay the twenty pieces of gold myself."

§ 58. When I had said this, Jonathan and his colleagues held their peace; but the people were still more irritated against them, upon their openly showing their unjust ill-will to me. When Jesus saw this change on the part of the people, he ordered them to depart, but desired the senate to stay, for he said they could not examine things of such a nature in a tumult; and, as the people were crying out that they would not leave me alone with them, there came one and told Jesus and his friend privately, that John and his armed men were at hand. Whereupon Jonathan and his colleagues, being able to contain themselves no longer (and perhaps the providence of God hereby procured my deliverance, for, had it not happened so, I should certainly have been destroyed by John), said, "O you people of Tiberias! leave off this inquiry about the twenty pieces of gold, for Josephus hath not deserved to die for them; but he hath deserved it by his desire of tyrannizing, and by cheating the multitudes of the Galilæans with his speeches, in order to obtain the rule over them." When he had said this, they at once laid hands on me, and endeavoured to kill me: but, as soon as those that were with me saw what they did, they drew their swords, and threatened to smite them, if they offered any violence to me. The people also took up stones, and were about to throw them at Jonathan; thus they snatched me from the violence of my enemies.

§ 59. But when I advanced a little way, I was just upon meeting John, who was marching with his armed men, and being afraid of him I turned aside, and escaped by a narrow passage to the lake, and seized on a ship, and embarked in it, and sailed over to Tarichææ. So I escaped this danger beyond my expectation. Whereupon I at once sent for the chief of the Galilæans, and told them how, against all faith given, I had been very nearly slain by Jonathan and his colleagues, and the people of Tiberias. Upon which the multitude of the Galilæans were very angry, and exhorted me to delay no longer to make war against them, but to permit them to go against John, and utterly to destroy him, as well as Jonathan and his colleagues. However I restrained them, though they were in such a rage, and desired them to stay till we should learn what news those ambassadors, that were sent by them to the city of Jerusalem, would bring back; for I told them it was best for them to act according to their determination. And my words prevailed on them. At this time, also, John, as the snares he had laid did not take effect, returned back to Gischala.

§ 60. Now, in a few days, those ambassadors whom we had sent, came back again, and informed us that the people were greatly provoked at Ananus, and Simon the son of Gamaliel, and their friends, because without any determination of the public they had sent to Galilee, and had tried to get me removed. The ambassadors said further, that the people were ready to burn their houses. They also brought letters, whereby the chief men of Jerusalem, at the earnest petition of the people, confirmed me in the government of Galilee, and enjoined Jonathan and his colleagues to return home quickly. When I had got these letters, I went to the village Arbela,<sup>1</sup> where I got an assembly of the Galilæans to meet, and bade the ambassadors relate to them the anger of the people of Jerusalem at what had been done by Jonathan and his colleagues, and how much they hated their wicked doings, and how they had confirmed me in the government of their country, as also what related to the order they had in writing for Jonathan and his colleagues to return home; to whom I immediately sent the letter, and bade him that carried it to inquire carefully what they intended to do.

§ 61. Now, when they had received that letter, and were thereby greatly disturbed, they sent for John, and for the senators of Tiberias, and for the principal men of Gabara, and proposed to hold a council, and desired them to consider what was to be done by them. The men of Tiberias were greatly disposed to keep the government to themselves, for they said it was not right to desert their city, now it was committed to their trust, especially as I should not delay to fall upon them; for they pretended falsely that I had threatened to do so. Now John was not only of the same opinion, but advised them, that two of them should go to accuse me before the multitude at Jerusalem for not managing the affairs of Galilee well, and he said they would easily persuade the people, because of their dignity, and because every multitude is very fickle. As, therefore, it appeared to them that John had given the wisest advice, they resolved that two of their number, Jonathan and Ananias, should go to the people of Jerusalem, and the other two should be left behind to tarry at Tiberias. They also took along with them a hundred soldiers as their guard.

§ 62. However, the men of Tiberias took care to have their city secured with walls, and commanded the inhabitants to take up arms. They also sent for a great many soldiers from John, who was at Gischala, to assist them against me if there should be necessity. Jonathan, therefore, and those that were with him, when they had departed from Tiberias, as soon as they were come to Dabaritta,<sup>1</sup> a village that lay on the borders of Galilee in the great plain, fell in about midnight with my guards, who not only commanded them to lay down their weapons, but kept them in bonds on the spot, as I had charged them to do. This news was written to me by Levi, who had the command of the guard committed to him by me. I allowed two days to elapse, and, pretending to know nothing about this, I then sent a message to the people of Tiberias, and advised them to lay down their arms, and to dismiss their men, that they might go home. But they, supposing that Jonathan, and those that were with him, were already arrived at Jerusalem, returned reproachful answers to me; yet was I not dismayed thereby, but contrived another stratagem against them, for I did not think it agreeable to piety to kindle the fire of war against the citizens. As I was desirous to draw those men away from Tiberias, I chose out ten thousand of the best of my armed men, and divided them into three bodies, and ordered them to go privately, and lie still in ambush in the villages. I also led a thousand into another village, among the mountains as were the others, but only four furlongs from Tiberias, and gave order, that when they got my signal, they should come down immediately. And I myself went out of the village and encamped with my soldiers in the open. Hereupon the people of Tiberias, at the sight of me, came running out of the city perpetually, and abused me greatly. Nay, their madness was come to that height, that they made a decent bier for me : and, standing round it, they mourned over me in jest and sport, and I could not but be myself in a merry humour at the sight of this madness of theirs.

§ 63. And now being desirous to catch Simon by stratagem, and Joazar with him, I sent a message to them, and asked them to come a little way out of the city, with many of their friends to guard them ; for I said I would come down to them, and make a league with them, and divide the government of Galilee with them. And Simon was deluded on account of his imprudence, and from the hope of gain, and did not delay to come ; but Joazar, suspecting snares were laid for him, stayed behind. So, when Simon was come up, and his friends with him as a guard, I met him, and saluted him with great civility, and confessed that I was obliged to him for his coming up to me. But a little while afterwards I walked along with him, as though I would say something to him by myself ; and, when I had drawn him a good way from his friends, I took him about the middle, and gave him to my friends that were with me, to take into the village ; and, commanding my armed men to come down, I, with them, made an assault upon Tiberias. Now, as the fight grew hot on both sides, and the soldiers belonging to Tiberias were in a fair way to beat me (for my armed men had already fled away), I saw the posture of affairs, and, encouraging those that were with me, I pursued those of Tiberias, even when they were already conquerors, into the city. I also sent another band of soldiers into the city by the lake, and gave them orders to set on fire the first house they could seize upon. When this was done, the people of Tiberias thought that their city was taken by storm, and so threw down their arms in fear, and implored, they and their wives and children, that I would spare their city. So I was moved by their entreaties, and restrained the soldiers from their impetuosity, and myself, upon the coming on of evening, returned back with my soldiers from the siege, and went to refresh myself. I also invited Simon to sup with me, and comforted him about what had happened and promised him that I would send him safe to Jerusalem, and would also give him provisions for his journey thither.

§ 64. But, on the next day, I took ten thousand men with me, and went to Tiberias. I then sent for the principal men of the multitude to the public place, and enjoined them to tell me who were the authors of the revolt; and when they had pointed out who the men were, I sent them bound to the city of Jotapata. But, as to Jonathan and Ananias, I freed them from their bonds, and gave them provisions for their journey, and sent them with Simon and Joazar, and five hundred armed men who should guard them, to Jerusalem. The people of Tiberias also came to me again, and begged that I would forgive them for what they had done, and said they would amend what they had done amiss by their fidelity to me for the time to come; and they besought me to preserve what spoils remained from the plunder of the city for those that had lost them. Accordingly, I enjoined those that had got them, to bring them all before us; and as they did not comply for a great while, and I saw one of the soldiers that were about me with a garment on that was more splendid than ordinary, I asked him where he had got it from, and he replied that he had got it from the plunder of the city; so I had him punished with stripes, and I threatened to inflict a severer punishment upon all the rest unless they produced whatever they had plundered; and as a great many things were brought together, I restored to every one of the people of Tiberias what they recognized as their own.

§ 65. And now I am come to this part of my narrative, I have a mind to say a few things to Justus, who has himself written a history concerning these affairs, as also to all others who profess to write history, but have little regard to truth, and are not afraid, either out of hatred or goodwill to some persons, to relate falsehoods. These men act like those who draw up forged deeds and conveyances; and because they are not brought to the same punishment as them, pay no regard to truth. When, therefore, Justus undertook to write the history of these things and of the Jewish war, that he might appear to be an industrious man, he lied in what he related about me, and did not speak truth even about his own country; whence it is, that being belied by him, I am under a necessity to make my defence, and so I shall say what I have concealed till now. And let no one wonder that I have not told the world these things long ago. For although it be necessary for an historian to write the truth, yet is such a one not bound severely to animadvert on the wickedness of certain men, not out of any favour to them, but from his own moderation. How, then, comes it to pass (that I may address myself to him as if he were here present), O Justus! thou most clever of writers, for so thou boastest of thyself, that I and the Galilæans were the authors of that sedition which thy country engaged in, both against the Romans and against the king? For, before I was ever appointed governor of Galilee by the community of Jerusalem, both thou and all the people of Tiberias had not only taken up arms, but had made war against Decapolis<sup>1</sup> in Syria. At any rate thou hadst burnt their villages, and a domestic servant of thine fell in the battle. Nor is it I only who say this, but it is also written so in the Commentaries of Vespasian the emperor, as also how the inhabitants of Decapolis clamoured against Vespasian at Ptolemais, and demanded that thou who wast the author [of that war,] shouldest be brought to punishment. And thou wouldst certainly have been punished at the command of Vespasian, had not king Agrippa, who had power given him to have thee put to death, changed the punishment, at the earnest entreaty of his sister Berenice, from death to a long imprisonment. Thy administration of affairs afterwards doth also clearly discover, both thy other behaviour, and that thou wast the occasion of thy country's revolt from the

Romans ; plain proofs of which I shall produce presently. I have also a mind to say a few things to the rest of the people of Tiberias on thy account, and to demonstrate to those that light upon this history, that thou barest no goodwill, either to the Romans, or to the king. To be sure, the greatest cities of Galilee, O Justus ! were Sepphoris, and thy own native place Tiberias. But Sepphoris, situated in the very midst of Galilee, and having many villages about it, and able, with ease, to have been troublesome to the Romans, if it had so pleased, did yet resolve to continue faithful to its masters, and excluded me out of the city, and prohibited any of its citizens from joining with the Jews in the war. And that they might be out of danger from me, they by a wile got leave of me to fortify their city with walls ; they also, of their own accord, admitted a garrison of Roman legions, sent them by Cestius Gallus, who was then commander of the Roman legions in Syria, and so held me in contempt, though I was then very powerful, and all were greatly afraid of me ; and at the time that the greatest of our cities, Jerusalem, was besieged, and that temple of ours, which belonged to us all, was in danger of falling into the enemy's hands, they sent no assistance, not wishing to have it thought they would take up arms against the Romans. But as for thy country, O Justus ! situated upon the lake of Gennesareth, and distant from Hippos <sup>1</sup> thirty furlongs, from Gadara <sup>2</sup> sixty, and from Scythopolis, <sup>3</sup> which was under the king's jurisdiction, a hundred and twenty, as there was no Jewish city near, it might easily have preserved its fidelity to the Romans, if it had so pleased ; for the city and its people had plenty of weapons. But I was then, so thou sayest, the author of its revolt. And pray, O Justus ! who was the author afterwards ? For thou knowest that I was in the power of the Romans before Jerusalem was besieged, and that Jotapata was taken by storm, as well as many other fortresses, and that a great many of the Galilæans fell in the war. It was therefore then a proper time, when you were certainly freed from any fear on my account, to throw down your weapons, and to prove to the king and to the Romans, that it was not out of choice, but from necessity, that you rushed into war against them ; but you stayed till Vespasian himself came up to your walls with his whole army, and then you did indeed lay down your weapons out of fear, and your city would certainly have been taken by storm, had not Vespasian complied with the king's supplication for you, and condoned your folly. It was not I, therefore, who was the author of this, but your own inclinations to war. Do not you remember how often I got you in my power, and yet put none of you to death? Nay, you once rose one against another, and slew one hundred and eighty-five of your citizens, not on account of your good-will to the king and to the Romans, but on account of your own wickedness, at the time when I was besieged by the Romans in Jotapata. Nay, indeed, were there not reckoned up two thousand of the people of Tiberias at the siege of Jerusalem, some of whom were slain and the rest taken and carried away captive? But thou wilt pretend that thou didst not engage in the war, since thou didst flee to the king at that time. Yes, indeed, thou didst flee to him ; but I say it was out of fear of me. Thou sayest, indeed, that it is I who am a wicked man. But then, why was it that king Agrippa, who procured thee thy life when thou wast condemned to die by Vespasian, and who bestowed so much riches upon thee, did twice afterwards put thee into bonds, and as often ordered thee to be an exile from thy country, and, when he had once ordered thee to be put to death, granted thee a pardon at the earnest request of his sister Berenice? and when (after so many of thy wicked pranks) he had made thee his secretary, he caught thee manipulating his letters, and drove thee away from his sight. But I shall not inquire accurately into these matters of scandal against thee. Yet cannot I but marvel at thy impudence, in having the assurance to say, that thou hast better related the history of these affairs than have all the others that have written about them, since thou didst not know what was done in Galilee (for thou wast then at Berytus with the king), nor didst thou know how much the Romans suffered at the siege of Jotapata, or what miseries they inflicted upon us ; nor couldst thou learn by inquiry what I did during that siege myself ; for all those that might have afforded thee such information were slain in that conflict. But perhaps thou wilt say, thou hast written of what was done against the people of Jerusalem accurately. But how should that be? for neither wast thou engaged in that war, nor hast thou read the Commentaries of Cæsar; of which we have evident proof, because thou hast contradicted those Commentaries of Cæsar in thy history. And if thou art so confident as to affirm that thou hast written that history better than all the rest, why didst thou not publish thy history while the emperors Vespasian and Titus, the generals in that war, as well as king Agrippa and his family, who were men very well skilled in the learning of the Greeks, were all alive? For thou hadst written it twenty years before, and thou mightest then have had testimony to thy accuracy from people who knew the facts. But now, when these men are no longer with us, and thou thinkest thou canst not be confuted, thou venturdest to publish it. But I was not afraid in like manner of mine own writing, but I offered my books to the emperors themselves when the facts were almost still under men's eyes, for I was conscious to myself that I had stated the facts truly, and as I expected to have their attestation to them, so I was not deceived in such expectation. Moreover, I immediately presented my history to many other persons, some of whom were engaged in the war, as king Agrippa and some of his kindred. The emperor Titus indeed was so desirous that the knowledge of these affairs should be taken from my history alone, that he subscribed his own hand to it, and ordered that it should be published; while king Agrippa wrote me sixty-two letters, and attested to the truth of my narration; two of which letters I have here subjoined, that thou mayest thereby know their contents, if thou wishest. "King Agrippa sendeth greeting to Josephus, his dearest friend. I have read through thy book with very great pleasure, and it appears to me, that thou hast written it much more accurately, and with greater care, than have the other writers on the same subject. Send me the rest of these books. Farewell, my dearest friend."—"King Agrippa sendeth greeting to Josephus, his dearest friend. It seems by what thou hast written, that thou standest in need of no instruction, in order to all our information from the beginning. However, when thou comest to me, I will inform thee of a great many things which thou dost not know." When this history was finished, Agrippa wrote this, neither by way of flattery, which was not in his line, nor by way of irony, as thou wilt say (for he was entirely a stranger to such malignity of mind), but by way of attestation to what was true, as all that read histories may do. And so much shall be said concerning Justus,<sup>1</sup> as I am obliged to add this digression.

§ 66. Now, when I had settled the affairs of Tiberias, and had assembled a council of my friends, I consulted what I should do to John. Whereupon it appeared to be the opinion of all the Gallilæans, that I should arm them all, and march against John, and punish him as the author of all the disorders that had happened. But I was not pleased with their views, as I desired to compose these troubles without bloodshed. So I exhorted them to use the utmost care to learn the names of all that were under John ; which when they had done, and I thereby was apprized who the men were, I published an edict, wherein I offered security and my right hand to such of John's party as had a mind to repent; and I allowed twenty days' time to such as would take this advantageous course for themselves. I also threatened that, unless they threw down their arms, I would burn their houses, and confiscate their goods. When the men heard of this, they were in no small disorder, and deserted John, and four thousand threw down their arms and came to me. So that no others stayed with John but his own citizens, and about fifteen hundred strangers, that came from the metropolis of Tyre; and when John saw that he had been outwitted by my stratagem, he continued afterwards in his own country in great fear.

§ 67. About this time it was that the people of Sepphoris grew bold and took up arms, from the confidence they had in the strength of their walls, and because they saw me engaged in other affairs. So they sent to Cestius Gallus, who was president of Syria, and desired that he would either come quickly to them, and take their city under his protection, or send them a garrison. And Gallus promised them to come, but did not send word when he would come; and, when I had learned so much, I took the soldiers that were with me, and made an assault upon the people of Sepphoris, and took the city by storm. The Galilæans seized this opportunity, as thinking they had now a convenient time for showing their hatred to them, since they bore ill-will to that city, and exerted themselves, as if they would destroy them all utterly, with those that sojourned there also. So they ran upon them, and set their houses on fire, finding them without inhabitants, for the men, out of fear, fled to the citadel. And they plundered everything, and omitted no kind of desolation which they could bring upon their countrymen. When I saw this I was exceedingly troubled at it, and commanded them to leave off, and put them in mind that it was not agreeable to piety to do such things to their countrymen. But as they would neither hearken to what I exhorted, nor to what I commanded them to do (for the hatred they bore to the people there was too much for my exhortations to them), I bode those of my friends, who were most faithful to me, and were about me, to spread the report that the Romans were attacking the other part of the city with a great army; and this I did, that, by such a report being spread abroad, I might restrain the violence of the Galilæans, and preserve the city of Sepphoris. And at length this stratagem succeeded; for, upon hearing this report, they were in fear for themselves, and so they left off plundering, and ran away; and that more especially, because they saw me, their general, doing the same also, for, that I might cause this report to be believed, I pretended to be in fear as well as they. Thus were the inhabitants of Sepphoris unexpectedly preserved by this contrivance of mine.

§ 68. Nay, indeed, Tiberias had like to have been plundered by the Galilæans also, upon the following occasion. The chief men of the senate wrote to the king, and desired that he would come to them, and take possession of their city. The king promised to come, and wrote a letter in answer to theirs, and gave it to one of his bedchamber, whose name was Crispus, who was by birth a Jew, to carry it to Tiberias. When the Galilæans knew that this man carried such a letter, they arrested him, and brought him to me; but as soon as the whole multitude heard of it, they were enraged, and betook themselves to their arms. And a great many of them assembled together from all quarters the next day, and came to the city of Asochis,<sup>1</sup> where I then lodged, and vehemently vociferated, and called the city of Tiberias a traitor to them, and a friend to the king; and desired leave of me to go down, and utterly destroy it; for they bore the same ill-will to the people of Tiberias as they did to those of Sepphoris.

§ 69. When I heard this, I was in doubt how I could deliver Tiberias from the rage of the Galilæans, for I could not deny that the people of Tiberias had written to the king, and invited him to come to them; for his letters to them, in answer thereto, would fully prove the truth of that. So I sat a long while musing with myself, and then said to them, "I know well enough that the people of Tiberias have acted wrongly, nor shall I forbid you to plunder their city. However, such things ought to be done with discretion ; for the men of Tiberias have not been the only traitors to our liberty, but many of the most eminent of the Galilæans. Tarry, therefore, till I shall exactly find out the authors of this treason, and then you shall have them all at once in your power, with all such as you shall yourselves bring in also." Upon my saying this, I pacified the multitude, and they left off their anger and went their way ; and I gave orders that he who brought the king's letters should be put into bonds ; but a few days [afterwards I pretended that I was obliged, by a necessary affair of my own, to go out of the kingdom. I then called Crispus privately, and ordered him to make the soldier that kept him drunk, and to flee to the king. So, when Tiberias was in danger of being destroyed a second time, it escaped the danger by my skilful management, and the care that I had for its preservation.

§ 70. About this time it was that Justus, the son of Pistus, escaped to the king without my knowledge. The occasion of which I will now relate. Upon the beginning of the war between the Jews and the Romans, the people of Tiberias resolved to submit to the king, and not to revolt from the Romans. But Justus tried to persuade them to take up arms, as being himself desirous of innovations, and having hopes of obtaining the government of Galilee, as well as of his own country [Tiberias] also. Yet did he not obtain what he hoped for ; for the Galilæans bore ill-will to those of Tiberias, on account of their anger at the miseries they had suffered from them before the war ; so they would not suffer Justus to be their governor. I myself also, who had been intrusted by the community of Jerusalem with the government of Galilee, did frequently come to that degree of rage at Justus, that I had almost resolved to kill him, being unable to bear his villany. He was therefore much afraid of me, lest at length my rage should come to extremity ; so he sent to the king, supposing that he should dwell better and more safely with him.

§ 71. Now, when the people of Sepphoris had, in so surprising a manner, escaped their first danger, they sent to Cestius Gallus, and asked him to come to them quickly, and take possession of their city, or else to send forces sufficient to repress all their enemies' attacks upon them ; and at last they did prevail with Gallus to send them a considerable army, both of horse and foot, which came in the night-time, and which they admitted into the city. But when the country round about was harrassed by the Roman army, I took those soldiers that were about me, and went to a village called Garis<sup>1</sup> where I cast up a bank, a good way off the city of Sepphoris, as I was at twenty furlongs' distance, and advanced upon it by night, and made an assault upon its walls; and when I had ordered a considerable number of my soldiers to scale them with ladders, I became master of the greatest part of the city. But soon after, our ignorance of the locality forced us to retire, after we had killed twelve of the Roman infantry and two horsemen, and a few of the people of Sepphoris, with the loss of only a single man of our own. And when it afterwards came to a battle in the plain against the horsemen, and we had undergone the dangers of it courageously for a long time, we were beaten; for upon the Romans encompassing me about, my soldiers were afraid, and retreated. There also fell in the battle one of those that had been instructed to guard my body, whose name was Justus, who at this time had the same post with the king. At the same time also there came forces both of horse and foot from the king, and Sylla as their commander, who was the captain of his body-guard: this Sylla pitched his camp at five furlongs' distance from Julias,<sup>2</sup> and set a guard upon the roads that led to Cana<sup>3</sup> and to the fortress of Gamala,<sup>4</sup> that he might hinder the inhabitants of Sepphoris<sup>5</sup> from getting provisions out of Galilee.

§ 72. As soon as I had got intelligence of this, I sent two thousand armed men, and a captain over them, whose name was Jeremiah, who raised a bank a furlong off Julias, near the river Jordan, and did no more than skirmish with the enemy, till I took three thousand soldiers myself, and went to them. But on the next day, when I had laid an ambush in a certain valley, not far from the bank, I challenged those that belonged to the king to battle, and gave orders to my own soldiers to turn their backs, till they should have drawn the enemy on to follow them, which happened accordingly; for Sylla, supposing that our party were really fleeing, made ready to pursue them, when our soldiers that lay in ambush took them in the rear, and threw them all into great disorder. I also immediately wheeled round with my own force, and met those of the king's party, and put them to flight. And I should have performed great things that day, if a certain fate had not been my hindrance; for the horse on which I rode in the battle fell into a quagmire, and threw me on the ground, and I was bruised on my wrist, and carried into a village called Cepharnome.<sup>1</sup> When my soldiers heard of this, they were afraid I had been badly hurt, so they did not go on with the pursuit any further, but returned in very great concern for me. I therefore sent for the doctors, and was under their hands, and continued feverish all that day; and as they directed, was that night removed to Tarichææ.<sup>2</sup>

§ 73. When Sylla and his party were informed of what had happened to me, they took courage again, and understanding that the watch was negligently kept in our camp, they placed, by night, a body of horse in ambush beyond the Jordan, and when it was day they challenged us to fight; and as we did not refuse, but went into the plain, their horsemen appeared out of the ambush in which they had lain, and threw our men into disorder, and made them run away, and slew six of our men. Yet did they not go off with victory at last; for when they heard that some armed men were sailed from Tarichææ to Julias, they were afraid, and retired.

§ 74. It was not long now before Vespasian came to Tyre, and king Agrippa with him; and the Tyrians began to speak reproachfully against the king, and called him an enemy of the Romans. For they said, that Philip, the general of his army, had betrayed the royal palace, and the Roman forces that were in Jerusalem, at his command.

When Vespasian heard this, he rebuked the Tyrians, for abusing a man who was both a king, and a friend of the Romans; but he advised the king to send Philip to Rome, to answer for what he had done before Nero. But, when Philip was sent to Rome, he did not come into the sight of Nero, for he found him in extremities on account of the troubles that then happened and civil war, so he returned to the king. But, when Vespasian was come to Ptolemais, the leading men of Decapolis in Syria made a clamour against Justus of Tiberias, because he had set their villages on fire: so Vespasian delivered him to the king, to be put to death by those under the king's jurisdiction: yet did the king [only] put him into bonds, and concealed what he had done from Vespasian, as I have before related. But the people of Sepphoris met Vespasian, and saluted him, and received his forces and Placidus their commander: and also went up with them, as I also followed them, till Vespasian came into Galilee. As to which coming of his, and how it was ordered, and how he fought his first battle with me near the village of Tarichææ, and how from thence they went to Jotapata, and what I did in the siege of it, and how I was taken alive and bound, and how I was afterwards set free, with all that was done by me in the Jewish war, and during the siege of Jerusalem, I have accurately related all this in the books concerning the Jewish War. However, it will, I think, be fit for me to add now an account of those actions of my life, which I have not related in my history of the Jewish War.

§ 75. For when the siege of Jotapata was over, and I was among the Romans, I was treated very well, chiefly because of the great respect that Vespasian showed me. Moreover, at his command, I married a virgin of the country, who was one of the captives taken at Cæsarea; but she did not live with me long, but left me upon my being freed from my bonds, and going to Alexandria. And I married another wife at Alexandria. I was thence sent with Titus to the siege of Jerusalem, and was frequently in danger of death, as the Jews were very desirous to get me in their power, in order to have me punished, and the Romans also, whenever they were beaten, supposed that it happened through my treachery, and made continual clamours to the commander-in-chief, and desired that he would bring me to punishment as a traitor to them. But Titus Cæsar was well acquainted with the uncertain fortune of war, and returned no answer to the soldiers' vehemence against me. And when the city of Jerusalem was taken by storm, Titus Cæsar urged me frequently to take whatever I would out of the ruins of my country, and said that he gave me leave so to do. But when my country was destroyed, I thought nothing else to be of any value, which I could take and keep as a comfort in my calamities, but personal freedom, so I made request for this to Titus. I had also the holy books by Titus' concession. Nor was it long after that I asked of him the life of my brother and fifty friends, and was not denied. When I also went, by permission of Titus, to the temple, where there were a great multitude of captive women and children shut up, I got all those that I remembered as among my own friends and acquaintances to be set free, being in number about one hundred and ninety, and I released them without their paying any ransom, and restored them to their former fortune. And when I was sent by Titus Cæsar with Cerialius and a thousand horsemen to a certain village called Thecoa,<sup>1</sup> in order to see if it was a place fit for a camp, as I came back, I saw many captives being crucified, and recognised three of them as my former acquaintances. I was very sorry in my mind at this, and went with tears in my eyes to Titus, and told him of them. And he immediately commanded them to be taken down, and to have the greatest care taken of them, in order to their recovery. But two of them died under the surgeon's hands, while the third recovered.

§ 76. But when Titus had composed the troubles in Judæa, conjecturing that the lands which I had near Jerusalem would bring me in no profit, because a garrison of Romans to guard the country was afterwards to pitch there, he gave me another estate in the plain. And, when he was going home to Rome, he made choice of me to sail along with him, and showed me great respect. And, when we were come to Rome, I had great care taken of me by

Vespasian; for he gave me an apartment in the house which he lived in before he came to be emperor. He also honoured me with the privilege of Roman citizenship, and gave me an annual pension; and continued to respect me to the end of his life, without any abatement of his kindness to me; which thing made me envied, and brought me into danger. For a certain Jew, whose name was Jonathan, who had raised a revolt in Cyrene,<sup>1</sup> and had persuaded two thousand men of that country to join with him, was the occasion of their ruin, and when he was bound by the governor of that country, and sent to the emperor, he told him that I had sent him both weapons and money. However, he could not conceal his being a liar from Vespasian, who condemned him to die, according to which sentence he was put to death. And frequently after that, when those who envied my good fortune did frequently bring accusations against me, by God's providence I escaped them all. I also received from Vespasian no small grant of land in Judæa. And about this time I divorced my wife, not being pleased with her behaviour, though she was the mother of three children, two of whom are dead, and one, whom I named Hyrcanus, is still alive. After this I married a wife who lived at Crete, but was a Jewess by birth; she was of noble parents, and such as were the most illustrious in all that country, and her character was beyond that of most other women, as her future life did show. By her I had two sons, the elder named Justus, and the next Simonides, and also Agrippa. These were the circumstances of my domestic affairs. And the kindness of the emperors to me continued the same; for when Vespasian was dead, Titus, who succeeded him in the empire, kept up the same respect for me as I had from his father: and, though I had frequent accusations laid against me, he would not believe them. And Domitian, who succeeded him, even augmented my honours; for he punished those Jews that were my accusers, and gave command that a servant of mine, who was a eunuch, and tutor of my son, should be punished. He also made the land I had in Judæa tax-free, which is a mark of the greatest honour to him who hath it. Domitia also, the wife of Cæsar, continued to do me many kindnesses. And this is the account of the actions of my whole life; and let others judge of my character by them as they please. But to thee, Epaphroditus, most excellent of men, do I dedicate all my work on our Antiquities; and so, for the present, I here conclude this narrative.

§ 1.

THOSE who write histories, do not, I observe, take that trouble for one and the same, but for many and very different reasons. Some apply themselves to this part of learning to parade their skill in composition, and to acquire reputation thereby; others, to gratify those that happen to have been personally concerned in them, have spared no pains, but even gone beyond their own abilities in the undertaking; others again have been compelled by force of circumstances to narrate clearly the affairs in which they themselves had a hand; while many are induced by the importance and utility of the real facts, and by the general ignorance about them, to produce them for the benefit of the public. Now of these several reasons for writing history, the two last were my own also; for since I myself had witnessed the war which we Jews had with the Romans, and knew its particular actions, and conclusion, I felt forced to give the history of it, because of those who perverted the truth in their writings.

§ 2. Now I have undertaken the present work, thinking it will appear to all the Greeks 'worthy of their study; for it will contain all our antiquities, and the constitution of our government, translated from the Hebrew writings. I had intended, when I wrote the history of the Jewish War,<sup>2</sup> to explain who the Jews originally were, what fortunes they had had, and by what legislator they had been instructed in religion, and the exercise of other virtues; what wars they had also fought in remote ages, till they were unwillingly engaged in this last with the Romans. But as this work would have taken up a great compass, I separated it into a work by itself, with a beginning and conclusion of its own, but in process of time, as usually happens to such as undertake great works, I grew weary, and went on slowly, it being a large subject to translate into a foreign and strange language. However, some persons there were who desired to know our history, and so exhorted me to go on with it; and above all the rest, Epaphroditus, a man who is a lover of all kinds of learning, but especially delights in the knowledge of history, and that on account of his having been himself concerned in great affairs and many turns of fortune, and having shown a wonderful vigour of an excellent nature, and an immovable virtuous resolution in them all. I yielded to his persuasions, for he always stimulates such as have abilities for what is useful and noble to a like ardour to his. I was also ashamed myself to permit any laziness of disposition to have greater influence upon me, than the delight of taking pains in such studies as were most noble, so I roused myself to greater exertions. Besides the foregoing motives, I had one which greatly swayed me, namely that our forefathers were willing to communicate such things to others, and that some of the Greeks took considerable pains to know the history of our nation.

<sup>1</sup> That is, all the Gentiles, both Greeks and Romans.—W. So also at the end of this paragraph. At this time all the Roman world spoke Greek, and so Greek had become a general term for all the Roman Empire.

<sup>2</sup> We may note here, that Josephus wrote his seven books of the Jewish War long before he wrote these his Antiquities. Those books of the War were published about A.D. 75, and these Antiquities A.D. 93, about eighteen years later.—W.

§ 3. I found for example that the second of the Ptolemies was a king, who was extraordinarily diligent in what concerned learning, and the collection of books; that he was also very desirous to procure a translation of our law, and of the constitution of our polity according to it, into the Greek tongue. Now Eleazar, not inferior in virtue to any of our high priests, did not grudge the forenamed king the participation of that advantage, which he would certainly have denied him, but that he knew the custom of our nation was to hinder nothing that we esteemed ourselves from being communicated to others. Accordingly, I thought it became me to imitate the generosity of our high priest, and to suppose there might even now be many lovers of learning like the king; for he did not obtain all our records, for those who were sent to Alexandria as interpreters, gave him only the books of the law. But there is a vast number of other matters in our sacred books, which, indeed, contain in them the history of five thousand years; in which time happened many strange accidents, many chances of war, great exploits of commanders, and changes in our constitution. Upon the whole, a man that will peruse this history, may principally learn from it, that all events succeed well even to an incredible degree, and that the reward of felicity is given by God, to those that follow his will, and do not venture to break his excellent laws; and that so far as men depart from the strict observance of them, what was practical before becomes impracticable; and whatever they set about as a good thing ends in irremediable calamity. And so I exhort all those that peruse these books, to apply their minds to God, and to test our legislator, whether he hath not understood his nature in a manner worthy of him, and hath ever ascribed to him such operations as become his power, and hath kept his account pure from the unseemly mythology current with others; although, from the great distance of time when he lived, he might have securely forged any lies; for he lived two thousand years ago: to which distant time the poets themselves have not been so hardy as to refer even the generations of their gods, much less the actions or laws of men. As I proceed, therefore, I shall accurately describe what is contained in our records in the order of time that belongs to them; for I have promised so to do throughout this work, neither adding anything to what is therein contained, nor taking away anything therefrom.

§ 4. Now as almost all our constitution depends on the wisdom of Moses, our legislator, it is necessary for me first to make a few remarks about him, for otherwise those that read my book may wonder how it comes to pass that, while it promises an account of laws and historical facts, it contains so much physiology. The reader is, therefore, to know, that Moses deemed it exceedingly necessary, that he who would conduct his own life well, and give laws to others, should in the first place consider the divine nature; and upon the contemplation of God's operations, should thereby imitate the best of all patterns, as far as possible, and endeavour to follow after it; neither could the legislator himself have a right mind without such a contemplation, nor would anything he should write tend to the promotion of virtue in his readers, unless they were taught first of all, that God is the Father and Lord of all things, and sees all things, and bestows a happy life upon those that follow him; but brings such as do not walk in the paths of virtue into great misery. Now as Moses was desirous to teach this lesson to his countrymen, he did not begin his legislation in the same manner that other legislators did as to contracts and rights between man and man, but by raising their minds upwards to regard God and his creation of the world; and by persuading them, that we men are the most excellent of the works of God upon earth, and when once he had brought them to submit to religion, he easily persuaded them to submit in all other things. But as to all other legislators, they followed fables, and in their legends imputed the most reproachful of human vices to the gods, and so afforded wicked men great pretext for their own crimes; while our legislator, when he had once shown that God was possessed of perfect virtue, thought men also ought to strive after the participation of the same, and on those who did not so think and believe he inflicted the severest punishments. I exhort, therefore, my readers to examine my subject from this point of view; for so it will appear to them, that there is nothing therein disagreeable either to the majesty of God, or to his love to mankind; for all things have here a reference to the nature of the universe; while our legislator teaches some things wisely but enigmatically, and others under a decent allegory, but explains such things as require a direct explanation plainly and distinctly. However, those that have a mind to know the reasons of everything, may find here much philosophical contemplation, which I now indeed shall defer, but if God affords me time, I shall set about writing it after I have finished the present work. I shall now betake myself to the narration of events, after I have first mentioned what Moses says of the creation of the world, which I find described in the sacred books in the following manner.

CHAP. I.

§ 1.

IN the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. But when the earth had not yet come into sight, but was covered with thick darkness, and a wind moved upon its surface, God commanded that there should be light: and when that was made, he considered the whole mass, and separated the light and the darkness; and the name he gave to the one was night, and the other he called day, and he named the beginning of light morning, and the time of rest evening. And this was indeed the first day. But Moses said it was one day; I could tell why now; but because I have promised to give the reasons for all things in a treatise by itself, I shall put off its explanation till then. After this, on the second day, he placed the heaven over the whole world, and separated it from it, and determined it should stand by itself. He also placed a moist and rainy firmament round it, in a manner agreeable to the earth, for affording the advantage of dews. On the third day he caused the dry land to appear, with the sea itself round about it; and on the very same day he made plants and seeds to spring out of the earth. On the fourth day he adorned the heaven with the sun, and moon, and the other stars, and appointed them their motions and courses, that the changes of the seasons might be clearly marked by them. And on the fifth day he produced the living creatures that swim in the sea, and those that fly in the air: and made them fit partners for one another severally both as to society and sexual ends, that their kinds might increase and multiply. On the sixth day he created the four-footed beasts, and made them male and female: on the same day he also formed man. Accordingly Moses says that in just six days the world, and all that is therein, was made, and that the seventh day was a rest, and a release from the labour of such operations, whence it is that we celebrate a rest from our labours on that day, and call it the sabbath: which word denotes rest in the Hebrew tongue.

§ 2. After his account of the creation, Moses begins to talk physiologically, and concerning the formation of man says that God took dust from the ground, and formed man of it, and inserted in him a spirit and a soul. This man was called Adam, which in the Hebrew tongue signifies red, because he was formed of red earth compounded together; for of that kind is virgin and true earth. God also brought the living creatures according to their kinds, both male and female, and showed them to Adam, and he gave them the names by which they are still called. But when he saw that Adam had no female companion, no society (for there was no such created), and that he wondered at the other animals being male and female, he laid him asleep, and took away one of his ribs, and out of it formed woman; and Adam knew when she was brought to him that she was made out of himself. Now woman is called in the Hebrew tongue Issa; but the name of this woman was Eve, which signifies the mother of all living.

§ 3. Moses says further, that God planted a garden eastward, full of all sorts of trees; and that among them was the tree of life, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil: and that when he had brought Adam and his wife into this garden, he commanded them to take care of the plants. Now the garden was watered by one river, which ran round the whole earth, and was divided into four—Phison, Euphrates, Tigris, and Geon.<sup>1</sup> Phison, which denotes a multitude, runs into India, and makes its exit into the sea, and is by the Greeks called Ganges. Euphrates and Tigris flow into the Red Sea. Now Euphrates is also called Phora, which denotes rush, or produce, and Tigris is also called Diglath, which denotes swift with narrowness, and Geon runs through Egypt, and denotes what arises from the east, and is by the Greeks called Nile.

§ 4. Now God commanded Adam and his wife to eat of all the other plants, but to abstain from the tree of knowledge, and foretold them, that if they touched it, it would prove their destruction. But as all living creatures had one language at that time, the serpent who then lived together with Adam and his wife, was envious of their happiness, for he thought they would be happy if they obeyed the commands of God, and that if they disobeyed them, they would fall into calamities. So he persuaded the woman, out of malicious intent, to taste of the tree of knowledge, telling her, that in that tree was the knowledge of good and evil; which knowledge whoso should obtain, would lead a happy life; nay, a life not inferior to that of a god: by which means he overcame the woman, and persuaded her to despise the command of God. Now when she had tasted of the tree, and was pleased with its fruit, she persuaded Adam to eat of it also. Upon this they perceived that they were naked, and being ashamed thus to appear abroad, they tried to find some covering, for the tree sharpened their understanding; and they covered themselves with fig-leaves; and placing these before them out of modesty, they thought they were happier than they were before, as they had discovered what they were in want of. But when God came into the garden, Adam, who used before to come and converse with him, being conscious of his wickedness, kept out of the way. This behaviour surprised God; and he asked what was the reason of it? and why he, that before delighted in his company, did now shun and avoid it? When he made no reply, as conscious to himself that he had transgressed the command of God, God said, "I had intended that you should both lead a happy life, without any care and vexation of soul; and that all things which might contribute to your enjoyment and pleasure should grow up by my providence spontaneously, without your labour and pains; which labour and pains would soon bring on old age, and your life would not be long: but now thou hast mocked at my purpose and disobeyed my commands; for thy silence is not the sign of virtue, but of an evil conscience." Then Adam began to excuse his sin, and to entreat God not to be angry at him, and laid the blame of what was done upon his wife, and said that he was deceived by her, and became an offender; while she again accused the serpent. But God punished Adam for weakly submitting to the counsel of his wife; and said that the ground should not henceforth yield its fruits of its own accord, but that only to their severe labour should it bring forth some of its fruits, and refuse to bring forth others. He also punished Eve by the sharp pains of bringing forth children, because she had persuaded Adam with the same arguments wherewith the serpent had persuaded her, and had so ruined him. He also deprived the serpent of speech, out of indignation at his malignity to Adam, and inserted poison under his tongue to show that he was an enemy to men; and suggested to them, that they should direct their strokes against his head, that being the place wherein lay his mischievous designs towards men, and that it would be easiest to take vengeance on him that way. And depriving him of his feet, he made him trail and crawl on the ground. And, when God had appointed these penalties for them, he removed Adam and Eve from the garden to another place.

CHAP. II.

§ 1.

A DAM and Eve had two sons; the elder of them was named Cain, which being interpreted, signifies possession; the younger was Abel, which signifies sorrow. They had also daughters. Now the two brothers were pleased with different pursuits. Abel, the younger, was a lover of righteousness, and, believing that God was present at all his actions, he paid regard to virtue; and his employment was that of a shepherd. But Cain was not only very wicked in other respects, but was only intent upon gain, and he first devised ploughing the ground. He slew his brother on the following occasion. They had resolved to sacrifice to God, and Cain brought the fruits of his husbandry and of trees, but Abel brought milk and the first-fruits of his flocks: and God was more delighted with the latter sacrifice, when he was honoured with what came naturally of its own accord, than he was with what was the invention of a covetous man, and got by forcing the ground. So Cain was very angry that Abel was preferred by God before him; and he slew his brother, and hid his dead body, thinking to escape discovery. But God, knowing what had been done, came to Cain, and asked him, What was become of his brother? because he had not seen him many days; whereas he had observed them conversing together at other times. But Cain was at a loss, and knew not what answer to give to God. At first he said that he himself knew not what to make either of his brother's disappearance, but getting angry, as God pressed him and closely questioned him, he replied, that he was not his brother's guardian or keeper, nor was he an observer of what he did. Then God convicted Cain of having been the murderer of his brother, and said, "I wonder that thou knowest not what is become of a man whom thou thyself hast destroyed." God, however, did not inflict the punishment

[of death] upon him, on account of his offering sacrifice, and thereby making supplication to him not to be extreme in his wrath to him, but he made him accursed, and threatened to punish his posterity in the seventh generation; he also cast him and his wife out of that land. And as he was afraid, that in wandering about he might fall among wild beasts, and so perish, God bade him not to entertain such a melancholy suspicion, but to go over all the earth, without fear of what mischief he might suffer from wild beasts; and having set a mark upon him, that he might be known, he commanded him to depart.

§ 2. And when Cain had travelled over much ground, he, with his wife, settled in a place called Nod,<sup>1</sup> where he made his abode; and also had his children born there. However, he did not take his punishment as a warning, but only became the wickeder, studying only his own bodily pleasure, though it obliged him to be injurious to his neighbours. He augmented his household substance with much wealth, by rapine and violence; he incited his acquaintance to luxury and robbery, and became their leader in wicked courses. He also introduced a change in that simplicity in which men lived before by the introduction of measures and weights; and whereas they lived innocently and generously while they knew nothing of such arts, he changed the world into cunning craftiness. He first of all set boundaries about land; he built a city, and fortified it with walls, and compelled his family to crowd into it; and called it Enoch, after the name of his eldest son Enoch. Now Jared was the son of Enoch; whose son was Malaleel; whose son was Methuselah; whose son was Lamech; who had seventy-seven children by two wives, Silla and Ada. Of the children by Ada one was Jabel: he erected tents, and loved the life of a shepherd. But Jubal, who was born of the same mother too, was an adept in music, and invented the psaltery and harp. But Tubal, one of Lamech's sons by the other wife, exceeded all men in strength, and was a mighty man of war. He was the first who devised armour for the girding of the body.<sup>2</sup>

Lamech was also the father of a daughter whose name was Naamah; and because he was so skilful in matters of divine revelation, that he knew he himself was to be punished for Cain's murder of his brother, he made that known to his wives. Even while Adam was alive, the posterity of Cain became exceeding wicked, one after another by force of example turning out worse. They were exceedingly addicted to war, and eager for rapine. And, generally speaking, if any of them were slow to murder, yet was he a bold desperado, insulting, greedy and grasping.

§ 3. Now Adam, the first man made out of the earth (for our discourse must now go back to him), after Abel was slain, and Cain fled away on account of his murder, was solicitous for posterity, and had a vehement desire for children, being two hundred and thirty years old; after which he lived seven hundred years more, and then died. He had, indeed, several more children, and among them Seth. As for the rest, it would be tedious to name them; I will, therefore, only endeavour to give an account of the posterity of Seth. This Seth, when he was brought up, and came to those years in which he could discern what was good, practised virtue, and, as he was himself an excellent man, so did he leave children behind him who imitated his virtues. All of them were good, and inhabited the same country without dissensions, and in a happy condition, without any misfortunes falling upon them, till they died. They were also the inventors of the science of astronomy. And, that their inventions might not be lost before they became generally known, upon Adam's prediction that the world would be destroyed at one time by the force of fire, and at another time by the violence and quantity of water, they made two pillars, one of brick, the other of stone, and inscribed their discoveries on them both, that in case the pillar of brick should be destroyed by the flood, the pillar of stone might remain, and teach mankind those discoveries, and also inform them that there was another pillar of brick erected by them. And it remains in the land of Siris to this day.

CHAP. III.

§ 1.

NOW the posterity of Seth continued to esteem God as the Lord of the universe, and to have an entire regard to virtue, for seven generations, but in process of time they changed to worse from the practices of their forefathers, and did neither pay those honours to God which were appointed them, nor had they any concern to do justice towards men; but instead of that zeal they had formerly shown for virtue, they now showed in their actions a double degree of wickedness, whereby they made God their enemy. For many angels of God formed connections with women, and begat sons that were violent, and despisers of all that was good, on account of the confidence they had in their strength; for the tradition is, that their acts resembled the daring of those whom the Greeks call giants. But Noah, being very vexed and displeased at their conduct, tried to induce them to change their dispositions and actions for the better: but seeing that they did not listen to him, but were slaves to their wicked pleasures, he was afraid they would kill him, so he departed out of that land with his wife and sons and sons' wives.

§ 2. Now God loved Noah for his righteousness: and not only condemned those other men for their wickedness, but determined to destroy the whole race of mankind, and to make another race that should be pure from wickedness, and cutting short their lives, and making their years not so many as they formerly lived, but one hundred and twenty only, he turned the dry land into sea. And thus were all these men destroyed. But Noah alone was saved, for God suggested to him the following contrivance and way of escape:—That he should make an ark of four stories, three hundred cubits long, fifty cubits broad, and thirty cubits high. Accordingly, he entered into the ark, he and his wife and his sons, and their wives, and not only put into it other provisions to support their wants there, but also all sorts of living creatures, male and female, for the preservation of their kind, some in pairs, others by sevens. Now the ark was strong, and well-constructed both in its sides and roof, so that it could not be any way inundated, or unequal to the violence of the water. And thus Noah, with his family, was preserved. He was the tenth from Adam, being the son of Lamech, the son of Methuselah, the son of Enoch, the son of Jared, the son of Malaleel, who, with many of his sisters, were the children of Cainan, the son of Enos, the son of Seth, the son of Adam.

§ 3. This calamity happened in the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, called by the Macedonians Dius, but by the Hebrews Marshesvan; for so did they order the year in Egypt. But Moses appointed that Nisan, which is the same with Xanthicus, should be the first month for their festivals, because he brought them out of Egypt in that month: so that month began the year, as to all the solemnities observed in honour of God, although he preserved the original order of the months as to selling and buying, and other ordinary affairs. Now Moses says that this flood began on the twenty-seventh day of the forementioned month; and was two thousand two hundred and fifty-six years<sup>1</sup> from Adam the first man; and the time is written down in our sacred books, those who then lived having noted down, with great accuracy, both the births and deaths of illustrious men.

§ 4. Seth then was born when Adam was in his two hundred and thirtieth year, who lived altogether nine hundred and thirty years. Seth begat Enos in his two hundred and fifth year, and lived nine hundred and twelve years. Enos delivered the government to Cainan his son, whom he had in his hundred and ninetieth year, and lived nine hundred and five years. Cainan lived nine hundred and ten years, and had a son Malaleel, who was born in his hundred and seventieth year. This Malaleel, having lived eight hundred and ninety-five years, died, leaving a son, Jared, whom he begat when he was in his hundred and sixty-fifth year. Jared lived nine hundred and sixty-two years; and his son Enoch succeeded him, who was born when his father was one hundred and sixty-two years old. Enoch, when he had lived three hundred and sixty-five years, departed and went to God; whence it is, that they have not written down his death. Now Methuselah, the son of Enoch, who was born to him when he was one hundred and sixty-five years old, had Lamech for his son, when he was one hundred and eighty-seven years of age; who succeeded him when he had lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years. And Lamech, when he had lived seven hundred and seventy-seven years, left Noah his son to be the head of the family, who was born to Lamech when he was one hundred and eighty-two years old, and lived nine hundred and fifty years. These years, added together, make up the sum before set down.<sup>1</sup> But let no one calculate the deaths of these men (for part of their lives was co-extensive with the lives of their children and grandchildren), but let him regard their births only.

§ 5. When God gave the signal, and it began to rain, the water poured down forty entire days, till it became fifteen cubits higher than the earth, which was the reason why there were no more preserved, since they had no place of refuge. When the rain ceased, the water began to abate after one hundred and fifty days, that is, on the seventeenth day of the seventh month, and then subsided by degrees. Then Noah, observing that the ark rested on the peak of a mountain in Armenia, opened it, and seeing some land about it, he felt easier, and more full of hope. And a few days afterwards, when the water was decreased still more, he sent out a raven, desiring to learn whether any other part of the earth were left dry by the subsidence of the water, and whether he might go out of the ark with safety; but the raven, finding all the land still under water, returned to Noah again. And seven days after he sent out a dove, to know the state of the ground; which came back to him covered with mud, and bringing an olive branch: so Noah learned that the earth was become clear of the flood. And when he had stayed seven more days, he put the living creatures out of the ark; and both he and his family went out of it, and sacrificed to God, and feasted. And the Armenians call this place Landing-place; indeed, as the ark was preserved there, its remains are showed by the inhabitants to this day.

§ 6. Now all the writers of barbarian histories make mention of this flood, and of this ark, and among them Berosus the Chaldæan. For describing the circumstances of the flood, he goes on thus:—"It is said, there is still some part of the vessel in Armenia, near the mountain of the Cordyæans,<sup>1</sup> and that some people carry off pieces of its bitumen, which they use as charms." Hieronymus the Egyptian also, who wrote the Phœnician Antiquities, and Mnaseas, and many more, make mention of the same. Nicolaus of Damascus, in his ninety-sixth book, gives the following account about it:—"There is a great mountain in Armenia, over Milyas, called Baris,<sup>2</sup> upon which, it is reported, that many who fled to it for refuge at the time of the deluge were saved; and that one, who was in an ark, came ashore on the top of it; and that the remains of the timber were a great while preserved: this might be the man about whom Moses the legislator of the Jews wrote."

§ 7. But as for Noah, he was afraid, since God had once destroyed mankind, lest he should drown the earth every year; so he offered burnt-offerings, and besought God that nature might hereafter go on in its former course, and that he would not bring on so great a judgment any more, by which the whole race of living creatures would be in danger of destruction; but that, having now punished the wicked, he would spare those that for their goodness had been left, and judged fit to be delivered from so severe a calamity; for otherwise these last would be more miserable than the first, and would have a worse sentence, if not safe for ever, but reserved for another deluge; for they would be terrified by the remembrance of the first deluge, and would be destroyed by a second. He also entreated God to accept of his sacrifice, and never again so to punish the earth, that men might continue to cultivate it, to build cities, and live happily in them; and that they might not be deprived of any of those good things which they enjoyed before the flood, but might attain to the like length of days and old age as their progenitors.

<sup>1</sup> The Cordyæan Mountains separated Armenia from Assyria, and the name is preserved in Kurds and Kurdistan. Berosus probably alludes to the "Mountain of Nizir," or Rowandiz, on which the ark of the Chaldæan Noah rested.

<sup>2</sup> Josephus identifies the mountain upon which the ark rested with the traditional Mount Ararat. For discussion on the more probable site to the south, see Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible," 'Ararat.' Milyas, or Minyas, the country of the Minni, adjoined Ararat on the south-east. Baris, or Lubar, is said by Epiphanius to have been the boundary between Armenia and the Kurds.

§ 8. When Noah had made these supplications, God, who loved the man for his righteousness, granted all his prayers, and said that it was not he who had brought destruction on a polluted world, but that they had undergone that vengeance on account of their wickedness; nor would he have brought men into the world, if he had intended to destroy them, it being greater wisdom not to have granted them life at all, than, after it was granted, to procure their destruction; but “the outrages,” said he, “they offered to my holiness and virtue, forced me to bring this punishment upon them. But I will cease for the time to come to exact such heavy punishment for wicked actions, and especially on account of thy prayers. But if I shall, at any time, send extraordinary tempests of rain, be not affrighted at the largeness of the showers; for the water shall no more cover the earth. However, I bid you to abstain from shedding the blood of men, and to keep yourselves pure from murder, and to punish those that commit murder, and to make use of all the other living creatures at your pleasure, and as your appetites lead you: for I have made you lords of them all, both of beasts of the earth, and fishes of the sea, and fowls of the air, except their blood, for therein is the life. And I will give you a sign, that I have left off my anger, by my bow” (meaning the rainbow, for they considered it the bow of God). And when God had said and promised this, he went away.

§ 9. Now when Noah had lived three hundred and fifty years after the flood, and happily all that time, he died at the age of nine hundred and fifty years. Now let no one comparing the lives of these ancients with our short lives, think that what we have said of them is false: or make the shortness of our lives now an argument, that neither did they attain to so long a duration of life, for they were beloved of God, and made by God himself; and because their food was then fitter for the prolonging of life, might well live so great a number of years; and besides, God afforded them a longer time of life on account of their virtue, and the good use they made of their time in astronomical and geometrical discoveries, which they could not have made unless they had lived six hundred years; for the great year is completed in that interval. I am borne out in what I have said by all those that have written antiquities, both among the Greeks and Barbarians: for Manetho, who wrote the Egyptian history, and Berosus, who compiled the Chaldæan, and Mochus and Hestius and Hieronymus the Egyptian, who compiled the Phœnician history, agree to what I here say. And Hesiod, Hecatæus, Hellanicus and Acusilaus, and beside them, Ephorus and Nicolaus, relate that the ancients lived a thousand years. But as to these matters, let every one look upon them as they think fit.

CHAP. IV.

§ 1.

NOW the three sons of Noah, Shem, Japheth, and Ham, who were born one hundred years before the deluge, first descended from the mountains into the plains, and fixed their habitation there; and persuaded others, who were greatly afraid of living in the plains on account of the flood, and so were loath to come down from the higher ground, to venture to follow their example, and the plain in which they first dwelt was called Shinar.<sup>1</sup> And although God had commanded them to send out colonies, if they should grow numerous, that they might not quarrel among themselves, but might cultivate a great part of the earth, and enjoy its fruits in abundance, in their ignorance they did not obey God. So they fell into calamities, and were made sensible by experience of their error. And as they flourished with a numerous population, God admonished them again to send out colonies; but they, imagining that the prosperity they enjoyed was not derived from his favour, but supposing that their own strength was the cause of it, did not obey him. Nay, they added to their disobedience to the divine will the suspicion that God urged them to send out colonies, that being dispersed, they might the more easily be oppressed.

§ 2. It was Nimrod who excited them to such an affront and contempt of God. He was the grandson of Ham, the son of Noah, a bold man, and of great strength of hand. He persuaded them not to ascribe it to God that they were happy, but to believe that it was their own excellence that procured them happiness. He also gradually established absolute sway, seeing no other way of turning men from the fear of God, but by bringing them into complete dependence on his power. He also said, "He would be revenged on God, if he should design to drown the world again, for he would build a tower too high for the water to be able to reach; and he would be even with him for destroying his forefathers."

§ 3. Now the multitude were very ready to follow the ideas of Nimrod, esteeming it slavery to submit to God: so they built the tower, neither sparing any pains, nor being in any degree negligent, about the work; and, by reason of the many hands employed in it, it grew very high, sooner than any one could expect; but the thickness of it was so great that its height seemed to those who saw it less than it really was. It was built of burnt brick cemented with bitumen, that it might be waterproof. When God saw that they were so mad, he resolved not to destroy them utterly, since they were not grown wiser by the destruction of those that perished in the flood, but set them at variance by causing them to speak in different languages, so that they could not understand one another. The place where they built the tower is now called Babylon, because of the confusion of that language which they clearly understood before, for the Hebrews call confusion Babel. The Sibyl also makes mention of this tower, and of the confusion of tongues, when she says thus: "When all men were of one language, some of them built a very high tower, as if they would thereby ascend up to heaven, but the gods sent storms of wind, and overthrew the tower, and gave every one his peculiar language; and for this reason the city was called Babylon."<sup>1</sup> And as to the plain of Shinar, in the region of Babylon, Hestius mentions it, when he says thus: "Such of the priests as were saved took the sacred vessels of Zeus Enyalios, and went to Shinar in Babylonia."

CHAP. V.

§ 1.

AFTER this they were dispersed abroad, on account of their different languages, and threw out colonies everywhere; and each colony took possession of that land which they lit upon, and into which God led them, so that the whole continent was filled with them, both the inland and maritime parts. Some also passed over the sea in ships, and settled in the islands, and some of the nations still retain the names which were given them by their first founders, but some have altered them, and some have modified them, that they might be more intelligible to sojourners in them. It was the Greeks that introduced these changes of nomenclature; for growing powerful in after times, they monopolized the glory of antiquity; giving names to the nations that sounded well, and that they themselves understood, and imposing forms of government over them, as if they were descended from themselves.

CHAP. VI.

§ 1.

NOW it was in honour of the grandchildren of Noah, that names were imposed on the nations by those that first occupied any land. Japheth, the son of Noah, had seven sons. They began from the mountains Taurus<sup>1</sup> and Amanus,<sup>2</sup> and proceeded along Asia, as far as the river Tanais,<sup>3</sup> and along Europe as far as Gades,<sup>4</sup> and settling on the lands they lit upon, which none had inhabited before, they called the nations by their own names. For Gomer founded those whom the Greeks now call Galati, but were then called Gomerites. Magog founded those that were named Magogites after him, but who are by the Greeks called Scythians. Now as to Javan and Madai, the sons of Japheth, from Madai came the Madæi, who are called Medes by the Greeks; and from Javan Ionia and all the Greeks come. Thobel founded the Thobeli, who are now called Iberes; and the Mosocheni were founded by Mosoch; they are now called Cappadocians, but a trace of their ancient name still exists, for there is even now among them a city called Mazaca,<sup>5</sup> which shows experts that the entire nation was so called once. And Thiras called those whom he ruled over Thires, but the Greeks changed the name into Thracians. So many were the nations that the sons of Japheth founded. Of the three sons of Gomer, Aschanazus founded the Aschanazi, who are now called by the Greeks Rhegines, and Riphath founded the Riphatheans, now called Paphlagonians, and Thorgames the Thorgameans, whom the Greeks determined to call Phrygians. Of the three sons of Javan also, the son of Japheth Elisás gave name to the Elisæans, who were his subjects, they are now the Æolians; and Tharsus to the Tharsians, for so was Cilicia<sup>1</sup> of old called, the proof of which is that the noblest city which they have, and a metropolis also, is Tarsus,<sup>2</sup> Tau being by change put for Theta. Chethimus occupied the island Chetima, now called Cyprus, and from it all islands, and most maritime parts, are called Chethim by the Hebrews. My proof is that one city in Cyprus has been able to preserve its name, the one called Citium<sup>3</sup> by the Greeks, which has not very much deviated from its old name of Chethim. And so many nations did the sons and grandsons of Japheth occupy. Now when I have first stated what perhaps the Greeks do not know, I will return to what I have omitted. The names are spelled here after the manner of the Greeks, to please my readers; for our own language does not so spell them: but the names in all cases are one and the same: for the name we here spell Noeus, is there Noah, and in every case is the same.

§ 2. The sons of Ham occupied the land from Syria and Ananus, and the mountains of Libanus;<sup>4</sup> seizing upon all that was on its sea-coasts, and as far as the ocean appropriating it as their own. Some indeed of their names are utterly lost, others changed or modified so as to be hardly recognizable, but a few have retained their names intact. For example, of the four sons of Ham, time has not altered the name of Chusus; for the Ethiopians, over whom he reigned, are even at this day, both by themselves, and by all men in Asia, called Chusæans. The memory also of the Mestrai is preserved in their name; for all we who inhabit that country call Egypt Mestre,<sup>5</sup> and the Egyptians Mestracæans. Phutes also was the founder of Libya,<sup>6</sup> and called the inhabitants Phuti after himself. There is also a river in the country of the Mauri, which bears that name; whence most of the Greek historians mention that river, and the adjoining country, by the appellation of Phute. But the name it has now, Libya, has been given it from one of the sons of Mestram, who was called Libys. I shall soon say why it was called Africa also. Canaan, the fourth son of Ham, occupied the country now called Judæa, and called it after his own name Canaan. Now Chusus had six sons, Sabas who founded the Sabæans, Evilas who founded the Evilæans, who are now called Gætuli, Sabathas who founded the Sabatheni, now called by the Greeks Astabari, Sabacathas who founded the Sabacatheni, and Regmus, who founded the Regmæans, who had two sons, one of whom, Judadas, founded the Judadæans, a nation of the western Ethiopians, and left them his name, as the other, Sabas, did to the Sabæans; but Nimrod, the son of Chusus, stayed and was king at Babylon, as I have already stated. Now all the sons of Mestram, being eight in number, occupied the country from Gaza<sup>1</sup> to Egypt, though it retained the name of one of them only, Phylistinus, for the Greeks call his share Palestine. As for the rest, Ludiim, Enemetiim, Labiim (who alone inhabited Libya, and called the country after himself), Nedim, Phethrosim, Chesloim, and Chepthorim, we know nothing of them besides their names; for the Ethiopic war, which I shall describe hereafter, overthrew those cities. The sons of Canaan were Sidon, who built a city of the same name in Phœnicia, still also by the Greeks called Sidon;<sup>2</sup> Amathius, who inhabited Amathe,<sup>3</sup> which is even now called so by its inhabitants, although the Macedonians called it Epiphania, from one of their kings; Aradius, who occupied the island Aradus;<sup>4</sup> Arucæus, who occupied Arce,<sup>5</sup> which is in Libanus. But for the seven others, Chettæus, Jebusæus, Amorrhæus, Gergesæus, Euæus, Asennæus, and Samaræus,<sup>6</sup> we have nothing in the sacred books but their names, for the Hebrews overthrew their cities, their calamities coming upon them for the following reason.

§ 3. After the deluge, when the earth was restored to its former condition, Noah set about its cultivation; and having planted it with vines, when the fruit was ripe he gathered the grapes in their season, and when the wine was ready for use, he offered sacrifice, and feasted, and got drunk, and fell asleep, and lay naked in an indecent manner. When his youngest son saw this, he laughed, and showed his brothers, but they covered their father's nakedness. And when Noah knew of it, he prayed for the prosperity of his other sons, but for Ham, he did not curse him, by reason of his nearness in blood, but cursed his posterity: and as the rest of them escaped that curse, God inflicted it on the children of Canaan. But as to these matters, I shall speak more hereafter.

§ 4. Shem, the third son of Noah, had five sons, who colonized Asia from the Euphrates to the Indian ocean. For Elam left behind him the Elamites, the ancestors of the Persians. Asshur founded the city of Nineveh,<sup>1</sup> and called his subjects Assyrians, who enjoyed great prosperity. Arphaxad called his subjects Arphaxadites, who are now called Chaldæans. Aram was father of the Aramites, whom the Greeks call Syrians, and Lud founded the Ludites, who are now called Lydians. Of the four sons of Aram, Uz founded Trachonitis<sup>2</sup> and Damascus, between Palestine and Cœle-Syria.<sup>3</sup> Ulus founded Armenia, Gatherus the Bactriani, Mesas the Mesanæi, now called Spasini Charax. Salah was the son of Arphaxad; and his son was Heber, after whom they originally called the Jews Hebrews. Heber begat Joctan and Phalek: he was called Phalek, because he was born when the earth was divided, for Phalek in the Hebrew tongue signifies division. Now Joctan, the other son of Heber, had thirteen sons:—Elmodad, Saleph, Azer-moth, Jerah, Adoram, Aizel, Declah, Ebal, Abimael, Sabeus, Ophir, Evilates, and Jobab. They colonized from § 5. I will now treat of the Hebrews. The son of Phalek, whose father was Heber, was Ragau; whose son was Serug, whose son was Nahor, whose son was Terah, the father of Abraham, who was the tenth from Noah, and was born in the two hundred and ninety-second year after the deluge, for Terah begat Abraham in his seventyeth year. Nahor begat Terah, when he was one hundred and twenty years old: Nahor was born to Serug in his hundred and thirty-second year: Ragau had Serug at one hundred and thirty; at the same age also Phalek had Ragau: Heber begat Phalek in his hundred and thirty-fourth year; he himself being begotten by Salah, when he was a hundred and thirty years old, whom Arphaxad begot in the hundred and thirty-fifth year of his age. Arphaxad was the son of Shem, and born twelve years after the deluge. Now Abraham had two brothers, Nahor and Haran; of these, Haran left a son, Lot, and daughters, Sarah and Milchah, and died among the Chaldæans, in a city of the Chaldees, called Ur,<sup>1</sup> and his tomb is shown to this day. Nahor and Abraham married their nieces, Nahor Milchah, and Abraham Sarah. Now Terah hating Chaldæa, on account of his losing Haran there, they all removed to Charran<sup>2</sup> in Mesopotamia, where Terah died, and was buried, when he had lived two hundred and five years, for the life of man was already by degrees diminished, and became shorter, till the birth of Moses; after whom the term of human life was one hundred and twenty years, God determining it to be that length; which was the age that Moses happened to lived to. Now Nahor had eight sons by Milchah:—Uz, Buz, Kemuel, Chesed, Azau, Pheldas, Jadelph, and Bethuel. These were all the legitimate sons of Nahor: for Tebah, Gaham, Tavaus, and Maachah, were born of Reumah, his concubine. But Bethuel, one of Nahor's legitimate sons, had a daughter Rebecca, and a son Laban.

§ 1.

NOW Abraham, having no legitimate son, adopted Lot, his brother Haran's son, and his wife Sarah's brother, and left Chaldæa<sup>1</sup> when he was seventy-five years old, at the command of God removing to Canaan, and there he dwelt himself, and left it to his posterity. He was a person of great sagacity, both for understanding all things, and persuading his hearers, and not mistaken in his inferences. So he began to have higher notions of virtue than others had, and determined to alter and change the opinion all men then had concerning God; for he was the first that ventured to declare that there was but one God, the Creator of the Universe; and that of other things whatever contributed anything to the happiness of men, was only according to his appointment, and not by its own power. This he inferred from the changes on land and sea, as well as those that happen to the sun, and moon, and all the heavenly bodies, for if, he argued, those bodies had power of their own, they would certainly make their motions regular, but since they did not preserve such regularity, they made it plain, that, so far as they co-operated to our advantage, they did it not of their own power, but as subservient to him that commanded them, to whom alone we ought to pay honour and thanksgiving. For which opinions, when the Chaldæans, and other people of Mesopotamia, raised a tumult against him, he thought it best to leave that country; and at the will, and by the assistance of God, he dwelt in the land of Canaan: and when he was settled there, he built an altar, and sacrificed to God.

§ 2. Berosus mentions our father Abraham without naming him, when he says thus:—"In the tenth generation after the flood, there was among the Chaldæans a man, just and great, and skilful in his knowledge of the heavenly bodies." But Hecataeus does more than merely mention him; for he composed, and left behind him, a book concerning him. And Nicolaus of Damascus, in the fourth book of his History, says thus:—"Abraham reigned at Damascus, being a foreigner, who came with an army out of the land above Babylon, called the land of the Chaldæans; but no long time after he departed and moved from that country also, with his people, and went into the land then called Canaan, but now Judæa, he and his numerous posterity, whose history I shall relate in another book. Now the name of Abraham is even still famous in the country of Damascus; and they show a village named after him, The Habitation of Abraham."

CHAP. VIII.

How, when there was a Famine in Canaan, Abraham went thence into Egypt, and after he had continued there some time, returned back again.

§ 1.

SOME time after this, when a famine had seized upon the land of Canaan, and Abraham heard that the Egyptians were in a flourishing condition, he was disposed to go down to them, both to partake of their plenty, and to hear what their priests said concerning the gods; intending either to follow them if they had better notions than he, or to convert them to a better way, if his own notions proved the truest. And as he took Sarah with him, and was afraid of the mad lust of the Egyptians for women, lest the king should kill him on account of his wife's great beauty, he contrived the following device. He pretended to be her brother, and instructed her to say the same, for he said it would be for their benefit. Now, as soon as they came into Egypt, it happened to Abraham as he supposed it would, for his wife's beauty was greatly talked of; for which reason Pharaoh, the king of Egypt, would not be satisfied with what was reported of her, but would needs see her himself, and intended to enjoy her;

but God but a stop to his unjust desires by illness and an insurrection. And when he inquired of the priests, how he might be freed from these calamities, they told him, that they came from the wrath of God, on account of his intention to outrage the stranger's wife. He then, in fear, asked Sarah, Who she was? and who it was that she brought along with her? And when he had found out the truth, he made his excuses to Abraham, for, supposing her to be his sister and not his wife, he had set his affections on her, desiring an affinity with him by marrying her, but not incited by lust to outrage her. He also made him a large present in money, and gave him full liberty to converse with the most learned among the Egyptians: from which converse his virtue and reputation became more conspicuous than before.

§ 2. For whereas the Egyptians were addicted to different customs, and depreciated one another's usages, and were very angry one with another on that account, Abraham conferred with each of them, and examining the reasoning they made use of to maintain their views, he demonstrated that such reasoning was idle, and void of truth. So he was admired by them in those conferences as a very wise man, and able, when he discoursed on any subject, not only to understand it, but to persuade other men also to assent to him. He instructed them in arithmetic, and delivered to them the science of astronomy; for, before Abraham came into Egypt, they were unacquainted with those branches of learning, for they were imported from the Chaldæans into Egypt, and from thence to the Greeks also.

§ 3. As soon as Abraham returned to Canaan, he divided the land between him and Lot, on account of the quarrels of their shepherds concerning the land where they grazed. So he gave Lot his option and choice, and took himself what the other left, which were the skirts of the mountain range, and dwelt in Hebron,<sup>1</sup> a city seven years ancients than Tanis<sup>2</sup> in Egypt. But Lot occupied the land in the plain watered by the Jordan, not far from the city of

§ 1.

AT this time, when the Assyrians had the dominion over Asia, the people of Sodom<sup>1</sup> were in a flourishing condition, both as to riches and the number of their youth. There were five kings that ruled that country, Ballas, Barsas, Senabar, and Sumobor, and the king of Bela;<sup>2</sup> and each king led his own troops; and the Assyrians made war upon them, and divided their army into four parts and beleaguered them, and each part of their army too had its own commander. In the battle that ensued, the Assyrians were conquerors, and imposed a tribute upon the kings of the Sodomites, who submitted to this slavery twelve years, and so long continued to pay their tribute: but in the thirteenth year they rebelled, and then the army of the Assyrians invaded them, under their commanders Amarapsis, Arioch, Chedorlaomer, and Tidal. These kings had laid waste all Syria, and overthrown the offspring of the giants. And when they were come over against Sodom, they pitched their camp in the vale called the Asphalt-pits, for at that time there were pits in that place; but now, upon the destruction of the city of Sodom, that vale became the Lake Asphaltitis,<sup>3</sup> as it is called; however, concerning this lake, I shall say more presently. Now, when the Sodomites joined battle with the Assyrians, the fight was very stoutly contested, and many of them were killed, and the rest carried away captive; and among them Lot, who had come to help the Sodomites.

CHAP. X.

How Abraham fought with the Assyrians, and overcame them, and rescued the Sodomites who were Prisoners, and recovered from the Assyrians the Prey they had taken.

§ 1.

WHEN Abraham heard of their calamity, he was at once afraid for Lot his kinsman, and pitied the Sodomites, his friends and neighbours; and thinking it right to come to their aid, he did not delay, but made a forced march, and the fifth night fell upon the Assyrians near Dan<sup>1</sup> (for that is the name of one of the springs of the Jordan); and before they could arm themselves, he slew some in their beds, before they could suspect any harm; and others who were not yet gone to sleep, but were so drunk they could not fight, ran away. And Abraham pursued after them, till, on the second day, he drove them all into Hobah,<sup>2</sup> in the region of Damascus, showing that victory does not depend on numbers and hands, but that the zeal and mettle of soldiers overcome all odds, seeing that he got the victory over so great an army with no more than three hundred and eighteen of his servants, and three of his friends; whereas all those that had fled returned home ingloriously.

§ 2. So Abraham, when he had rescued the Sodomites, who had been taken captive by the Assyrians, and Lot also, his kinsman, marched home in peace. And the king of Sodom met him at a certain place, which they call The King's Dale, where Melchisedek, king of the city of Salem,<sup>3</sup> received him. His name signifies righteous king; and such he was. without dispute, insomuch that, on that account, he was made priest of God : and Salem they afterwards called Jerusalem. Now this Melchisedek supplied Abraham's army in a hospitable manner, and gave them provisions in abundance ; and as they were feasting, he began to praise him, and to bless God for subduing his enemies under him. And when Abraham gave him the tenth part of the prey, he accepted the gift. But when the king of Sodom desired Abraham to take the remaining nine-tenths of the prey, only asking to have those men restored to him whom Abraham had rescued from the Assyrians, because they belonged to him, Abraham would not have any more of the prey than what his servants had eaten, and a portion for the friends that had shared in the expedition. The first of them was called Eschol, the second Enner, and the third Mambres.

<sup>3</sup> According to Josephus and the Jewish commentators Salem was the same as Jerusalem; the Samaritans identified it with Shunem, now Sôlam, to the north of Jezreel; and Jerome says that, in his day, it was a town of the same name near Seythopolis, Beisân.

§ 3. And God commended his virtue, and said, "Thou shalt not, however, lose the rewards thou hast deserved to receive for thy glorious actions." He answered, "And what advantage will it be to me to have such rewards, when I have none to enjoy them after me?" for he was hitherto childless. And God promised that he should have a son, and that his posterity should be very numerous, insomuch that their number should be like the stars. When he heard that, he offered a sacrifice to God, as he commanded him. The manner of the sacrifice was this : he took an heifer of three years old, and a she-goat of three years old, and a ram in like manner of three years old, and a turtle-dove, and a pigeon : and, as he was enjoined, he divided in the midst the beasts, but not the birds. Then, before he built his altar, as birds of prey hovered upon the carcasses, smelling the blood, a divine voice came to him, telling him that his posterity would have wicked neighbours in Egypt for four hundred years ; during which time they should be afflicted, but afterwards overcome their enemies, conquer the Canaanites in war, and possess their land and cities.

being uneasy at his wife's barrenness, he entreated God to grant him a son; and God exhorted him to be of good cheer, and said that he would add to all the rest of the benefits that he had bestowed upon him, ever since he led him out of Mesopotamia, the gift of children. Accordingly Sarah, at God's command, brought to his bed one of her handmaidens, an Egyptian by race, in order to obtain children by her: and when this handmaid was with child, she ventured to affront Sarah, and play the queen, as if the dominion were to come to a son to be born of her. But when Abraham resigned her into the hand of Sarah to punish her, she contrived to flee away, not being able to bear Sarah's harshness to her: and she entreated God to have compassion on her. And an angel of God met her, as she was going on her way in the wilderness, and bade her return to her master and mistress, for if she would be more discreet she would be happier, for her present trouble only came from her unfeeling arrogance to her mistress. He also told her, that if she disobeyed God, and went on her way, she would perish; but if she returned back, she would become the mother of a son, who should reign over that country. To this she listened, and returned to her master and mistress, and obtained forgiveness. A little while afterwards she bare Ishmael, which may be interpreted heard of God, because God had heard his mother's prayer.

§ 5. The forementioned son was born to Abraham when he was eighty-six years old; but when he was ninety-nine, God appeared to him, and promised him, that he should have a son by Sarah, and commanded that his name should be Isaac; and revealed to him, that from him should spring great nations and kings, and that they should obtain all the land of Canaan by war, from Sidon to Egypt. But he charged him, in order to keep his posterity unmixed with others, that they should be circumcised in the flesh of their foreskin, and that this should be done on the eighth day after they were born. The reason of circumcision I shall explain in another place. And on Abraham also inquiring concerning Ishmael, whether he should live or not, God signified to him, that he should live to be very old, and should be the father of great nations. Abraham, therefore, gave thanks to God for these blessings; and then he, and all his household, and his son Ishmael, were circumcised immediately; the son being that day thirteen years of age, and he ninety-nine.

CHAP. XI.

§ 1.

ABOUT this time, the Sodomites grew proud, on account of their riches and great wealth: they were outrageous to men, and impious to God, insomuch that they no longer remembered his benefits, and hated strangers, and declined all intercourse with them. God was therefore much displeased at them, and determined to punish them for their pride, and to overthrow their city, and lay waste their country, until there should neither plant nor fruit grow in it.

§ 2. When God had thus resolved concerning the Sodomites, Abraham, as he sat by the oak of Mambre<sup>1</sup> at the door of his tent, saw three angels; and thinking them to be strangers, he rose up, and saluted them, and begged them to put up at his abode, and accept of some refreshment. And when they agreed, he ordered cakes of the finest wheaten flour to be made at once, and he slew a calf, and roasted it, and brought it to them, as they sat under the oak. Now they made a show of eating, and also asked him about his wife Sarah, where she was? And when he said, She was within, they said, They should come again hereafter, and find her become a mother. Upon which Sarah laughed, and said, that it was impossible she should bear children, since she was ninety years of age, and her husband was a hundred. Then they concealed themselves no longer, but declared that they were angels of God, and that one of them was sent to inform them about their future son, and two to inform them of the overthrow of the Sodomites.

§ 3. When Abraham heard this, he was grieved for the Sodomites, and rose up, and besought God for them, and entreated that he would not destroy the righteous and good with the wicked. And when God replied, that there was no good man among the Sodomites; for if there were but ten such men among them, he would not punish any of them for their sins, Abraham held his peace. And the angels came to the city of the Sodomites, and Lot entreated them to accept of hospitality with him; for he was very kind to strangers, and had learned to imitate the goodness of Abraham. Now when the Sodomites saw that the young men were of beautiful countenances, and that to an extraordinary degree, and that they took up their abode with Lot, they thought of nothing but how to enjoy their beauty by force and violence; and when Lot exhorted them to bridle their lust, and not to act indecently to the strangers, but to have regard to their lodging in his house; and promised, that if their inclinations could not be governed, he would expose his daughters to their lust instead of the strangers; neither thus were they shamed out of their wicked desires.

§ 4. But God was so much displeased at their audacious wickedness, that he smote the men with blindness, so that they could not find the entrance into the house, and condemned the Sodomites to universal destruction. And Lot, upon God's informing him of the impending destruction of the Sodomites, went away, taking with him his wife and two daughters, who were still virgins; for those that were betrothed<sup>1</sup> to them were above the thoughts of going away, and deemed Lot's warning absurd. God then cast a thunderbolt upon the city, and set it on fire with its inhabitants; and laid waste the country all round with similar burning, as I formerly said, when I wrote the Jewish War.<sup>2</sup> But Lot's wife, continually turning back to view the city as she went from it (being too nicely inquisitive what would become of it), although God had forbidden her to look back, was changed into a pillar of salt: <sup>1</sup> I have seen it, for it remains still. But Lot and his daughters fled to a certain small place on the verge of the fire, and settled in it: it is to this day called Zoar,<sup>2</sup> for that is the word which the Hebrews use for a small thing. There he lived a life of hardship from want of company, and dearth of provisions.

§ 5. And his daughters thinking that all mankind were destroyed, lay with their father, taking care not to be perceived. This they did, that the human race might not utterly fail. And they bore sons: the son of the elder was named Moab, which denotes a son by a father; the younger bore Ammon, which name denotes a son by a kinsman. The former was the founder of the Moabites, who are even still a great nation; the latter was the founder of the Ammonites; both dwell in Cele-Syria.<sup>3</sup> Such then was the departure of Lot from among the Sodomites.

CHAP. XII.

§ 1.

ABRAHAM now removed to Gerar* in Palestine, taking Sarah with him as his sister, using the like dissimulation that he had used before out of fear. For he was afraid of Abimelech, the king of that country, who also himself fell in love with Sarah, and was disposed to seduce her; but was restrained from satisfying his lust by a dangerous illness, which befell him from God. Now when his physicians gave him up, he had a dream warning him not to outrage the stranger's wife; and when he recovered, he told his friends that God had inflicted his illness upon him by way of punishment for his injury to the stranger, and in order to preserve the chastity of his wife, for he did not take her with him as his sister, but as his legitimate wife; and that God had promised to be gracious to him for the time to come, if this person was secure of his wife's chastity. When he had said this, he sent for Abraham at the advice of his friends, and bade him not be concerned any longer about his wife's chastity; for God took care of him, and it was by his providence that he received his wife back intact. And he appealed to God, and to his wife's conscience, that he would have had no inclination for her at all, if he had known she was married, but since, said he, thou leddest her about as thy sister, I was guilty of no crime. He also entreated him to be at peace with him, and to make God propitious to him; and said if he thought fit to continue with him, he should have what he wanted in abundance; but if he preferred to go away, he should have an escort and whatever he came to him for. On his saying this, Abraham told him, that his claim of kindred to his wife was no lie, because she was his brother's daughter; and that he did not think himself safe in his travels without this sort of dissimulation; and that he was not the cause of his illness, but was only solicitous for his own safety: he said also, that he was ready to stay with him. Whereupon Abimelech assigned him land and money, and they covenanted to live together without guile, and took an oath at a certain well called Beersheba,<sup>1</sup> which may be interpreted, The well of the oath: and so it is called by the people of the country unto this day.

<sup>1</sup> This pillar of salt was, we see here, standing in the days of Josephus, and he had seen it. That it was standing then, is also attested to by Clement of Rome, contemporary with Josephus; as also that it was so in the next century, is attested by Irenæus.—W.

§ 2. Not long after Abraham had a son by Sarah, as God had foretold to him, whom he named Isaac, which signifies laughter. And indeed he so called him, because Sarah laughed when God<sup>2</sup> said that she should bear a son, she not expecting such a thing, as being past the age of child-bearing, for she was ninety years old, and Abraham a hundred; so that their son was born to them in the last year of each of those numbers. And they circumcised him upon the eighth day: and since that time the Jews observe the custom of circumcising their sons after so many days. But the Arabians circumcise after the thirteenth year, because Ishmael, the founder of their nation, the son of Abraham by the concubine, was circumcised at that age. And of him I shall now give a full account with great exactness.

<sup>2</sup> It is well worth observation, that Josephus here calls the principal angel, who appeared to Abraham, and foretold the birth of Isaac, directly God; which language of Josephus here, prepares us to believe those other expressions of his, that Jesus was a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, Antiq. xviii. 3, § 3, and of God the Word, in his Homily concerning Hades, may be both genuine.—W.

§ 3. Sarah at first loved Ishmael, the son of her handmaid Hagar, with an affection not inferior to that of her own son, for he was brought up as the future head of the family. But after the birth of Isaac, she was not willing that Ishmael should be brought up with him, as being too old for him, and able to do him a mischief when their father should be dead; she therefore urged Abraham to send him and his mother to some distant country. Now, at first, he did not agree to what Sarah was so zealous for, and thought it the greatest barbarity to send away a young child and a woman without necessaries; but at length he agreed to it, because God was pleased with what Sarah insisted on, so he handed over Ishmael to his mother, as not yet able to go by himself, and commanded her to take a skin of water and a loaf of bread, and so to depart, making necessity her guide. But as soon as her necessary provisions failed, she found herself in an evil case; and when the water was almost spent, she laid the young child, who was ready to expire, under a fir-tree, and went on a little further, that so he might not die in her presence. But an angel of God met her, and pointed out a well hard by, and bade her take care and bring up the child, for she should be very happy in the preservation of Ishmael. She then took courage from what was promised her, and meeting with some shepherds, by their care escaped from her piteous plight.

§ 4. When the lad grew up to man's estate he married an Egyptian wife, of the same nationality as his mother. By her he had twelve sons, Nabaioth, Kedar, Abdeel, Massamas, Idumas, Masmass, Masses, Chodad, Theman, Jetur, Naphesus, Cedmas. They inhabited all the country from the Euphrates to the Red Sea, and called it Nabatene. They have handed down their names to the Arab nation and tribes, both because of their own prowess, and the fame of Abraham.

CHAP. XIII.

§ 1.

NOW his father Abraham greatly loved Isaac, as being his only begotten son, and given to him on the threshold of old age by the gift of God. The child also endeared himself to his parents still more by the exercise of every virtue, adhering to his duty to his parents, and being zealous in the worship of God. Abraham also placed all his happiness in the prospect, that, when he should die, he should leave his son in a secure condition; which accordingly he obtained by the will of God: who, being desirous to make an experiment of Abraham's religious disposition towards himself, appeared to him and enumerated all the blessings he had bestowed on him; how he had made him superior to his enemies; and how his son Isaac, who was the principal part of his present happiness, was derived from him; and asked him to offer up to him this son of his as a sacrifice and victim. He bade him take him to Mount Moriah, and build an altar there, and offer him for a burnt-offering upon it; for that would best manifest his religious disposition towards him if he preferred what was pleasing to God to the preservation of his own son.

§ 2. Now Abraham thought it was not right to disobey God in anything, but to serve him in every circumstance of life, since all living creatures owe their life to his providence and bounty. So concealing this command of God, and his own intention to slay his son, from his wife, as also from every one of his servants, otherwise he might have been hindered from obeying God, he took Isaac and two of his servants, and laded an ass with whatever was necessary for a sacrifice, and started for the mountain. Now the servants went along with him two days; but on the third day, as soon as he descried the mountain, he left them in the plain, and taking his son alone with him, went to the mountain. It was the mountain upon which king David afterwards fixed the site of the temple. Now they had brought with them everything necessary for a sacrifice, excepting the victim. And as Isaac, who was twenty-five years old, was preparing the altar, he asked his father, "What he was about to offer, since there was no victim?" to which he answered, "That God would provide one for them, he being able to make a plentiful provision for men even out of non-existing things,<sup>1</sup> and to deprive others of what they already have, when they put too much trust in them; so, if God pleased to be present and propitious at the sacrifice, he would provide him a victim."

§ 3. As soon as the altar was prepared, and Abraham had laid the wood in order on it, and all things were ready, he said to his son, "My boy, I poured forth to God ten thousand prayers that I might have you for my son: and when you came into the world, I paid the greatest attention to your education, nor did I deem myself happy in anything more than in the prospect of seeing you grow up to man's estate, and leaving you at my death the successor to my dominion; but since it was by God's will that I became your father, and it is now his will that I relinquish you, bear this consecration to God with a noble mind; for I resign you to God, who has thought fit now to claim this honour for himself, on account of the favours he hath conferred on me in being to me a supporter and defender. And as your birth was extraordinary, so your leaving the world will be also, being solemnly offered to God, the father of all, by your own father as a sacrifice. I take it he thinks you worthy to die neither by disease, nor in war, nor by any of those casualties by which death usually comes upon men, but so that he will receive your soul with prayers and sacrifice, and will place you near to himself, and you will there be a succourer and supporter to me in my old age, for which end I chiefly educated you, supplying me with God instead of yourself."

came the son of such a father, and was pleased with his words, and said, "That he was not worthy to be born at all, if he should reject the determination of God and of his father, and should not resign himself up readily to both their wills, since it would have been unjust if he had not obeyed, even if his father alone had so resolved." So he went immediately to the altar to be sacrificed. And the deed would have been done, if God had not stopped it: for he called loudly to Abraham by his name, and forbade him to slay his son; and said that it was not out of a desire for human blood that he had commanded him to slay his son, nor did he wish to act so impiously as to take away the son he had given him, but only to try the temper of his mind, whether he would obey such a command. Since, therefore, he was now satisfied of his zeal and excessive piety, he was delighted in having bestowed such blessings upon him; and that he would not be wanting in all sort of concern about him, and in honouring his race; and that his son should live to a very great age, and should have a happy life, and bequeath large possessions to sons, who should be good and legitimate. He foretold also that his family should become many nations, and be very wealthy, and that the patriarchs of the family should leave behind them an everlasting name; that they should obtain the possession of the land of Canaan by war, and be envied by all men. When God had said this, he produced to them a ram, that they had not noticed before, for the sacrifice. So Abraham and Isaac, being restored to one another beyond their hopes, and having obtained promises of such great blessings, embraced one another, and when they had sacrificed, returned to Sarah, and lived happily together, God affording them his assistance in all things they desired.

NOW Sarah died a little while after, having lived one hundred and twenty-seven years. They buried her in Hebron, the Canaanites publicly allowing them a burying-place, a piece of ground which Abraham bought for four hundred shekels of Ephrou, an inhabitant of Hebron. And both Abraham and his descendants built themselves sepulchres in that place.

§ 1.

ABRAHAM after this married Keturah, by whom he had six sons, industrious and clever: Zambran, and Jazar, and Madan, and Madian, and Josobak, and Suus. Now the sons of Suus were Sabathan and Dadan. The sons of Dadan were Latusim, and Assur, and Luom. The sons of Madian were Ephas, Ophren, Anoch, Ebidas, and Eldas. Now Abraham contrived to settle all these sons and grandsons in colonies; and they took possession of Troglodytis,<sup>1</sup> and the country of Arabia Felix,<sup>2</sup> as far as the Red Sea. It is related of this Ophren, that he made war against Libya and occupied it, and that his grandchildren, who inhabited it, called it from his name Africa. And, indeed, Alexander Polyhistor bears me out in the following passage: "Cleodemus, the prophet, who was also called Malchus, who wrote a History of the Jews, in agreement with the History of Moses their legislator, relates that there were several sons born to Abraham by Keturah : nay, he names three of them, Apher, and Surim, and Japhran. He says that from Surim the land of Assyria<sup>1</sup> got its name, and that from the other two, Apher and Japhran, the town of Aphra and the country of Africa got named ; and that they helped Hercules when he fought against Libya and Antæus ; and that Hercules married Aphra's daughter, and by her had a son Didorus, whose son was Sophon, from whom the barbarous people called Sophacians got their name."

§ 1.

NOW when Abraham, the father of Isaac, had resolved to get Rebekah, the granddaughter of his brother Nahor, for a wife to his son Isaac, who was now about forty years old, he sent the oldest of his servants to betroth her, after he had obliged him to give him the strongest assurances of his fidelity. Which assurances were given in the following manner :—They put each other's hands under each other's thighs ; and then called upon God to witness what should be done. He also sent presents to those that were there, that were valuable because either rarely or never seen in that country. The servant did not get there under a considerable time ; for Mesopotamia<sup>2</sup> is a difficult country to travel in, in winter for the depth of the clay, and in summer for want of water, and also for the bands of robbers there, only to be avoided by travellers by great precaution beforehand. However, the servant got safely to Haran.<sup>3</sup> And when he was in the suburbs, he met several maidens going to the water ; he therefore prayed to God that Rebekah might be one of them whom Abraham had sent him to betroth to his son, in case his will were that this marriage should come about, and that she might be made known to him by this sign, that while others denied him water to drink, she should offer it.

§ 2. With this intention he went to the well, and asked the maidens to give him some water to drink. But while the others refused, saying they wanted to take it home, and not to supply him (for the water was not drawn up without some difficulty), one only of them all rebuked them for their peevish behaviour towards the stranger, and said, "What is there that you will ever communicate to anybody, who will not so much as give the man some water?" She then offered him water in an obliging manner. And now he began to hope that all would go well, but desiring still to know the truth, he commended her for her generosity and good nature, that she did not hesitate to supply water to those that wanted it, though it cost her some pains to draw it; and asked who were her parents, and wished them joy of such a daughter; and "may they marry you," added he, "to their satisfaction, into the family of a good husband, to bear him legitimate children." Nor did she disdain to satisfy his inquiries, but told him about her family. "They," says she, "call me Rebekah, my father was Bethuel, but he is dead, and Laban is my brother, who with my mother takes care of all our family affairs, and is the guardian of my virginity." When the servant heard this, he was very glad at what had happened, and at what was told him, perceiving that God had thus plainly directed his journey; and producing a necklace, and some other ornaments which were becoming for virgins to wear, he gave them to the damsel, by way of acknowledgment, and as a reward for her kindness in giving him water to drink; saying it was but just that she should have them, because she was so much more obliging than any of the rest. He asked also that he might come and lodge with them, since the approach of night allowed him not to proceed further. And producing his precious ornaments for women, he said he could trust them to none more safely, than to such as she had showed herself to be; and that he believed he might guess at the kindness of her brother and mother, from the virtue he found in her, that they would not object to take him in, for he would not be burdensome, but would pay for his lodging, and live at his own expense. To which she replied, that he guessed rightly as to the kindness of her parents ; but chided him for suspecting them of meanness, for he should be at free cost. But she said she would first inform her brother Laban, and, if he gave his consent, she would conduct him in.

§ 3. As soon then as his consent was got, she introduced the stranger ; and as for his camels, the servants of Laban took them and looked after them, and he was himself brought into supper by Laban. And, after supper, he said to him, and to the mother of the damsel, “ Abraham is the son of Terah, and a kinsman of yours, for Nahor, the grandfather of these children, was the brother of Abraham by the same father and mother ; upon which account he hath sent me to you, being desirous to take this damsel for his son to wife. He is his legitimate son, and is brought up as his only heir. He could indeed have had the richest of all the women in that country for him, but he would not have his son marry any of them ; but out of regard to his own relations, he desired to match him here, whose affection and inclination I would not have you despise ; for it was by the good pleasure of God that other things happened in my journey, and that I found your daughter and house. For when I was near to the city I saw several maidens coming to the well, and I prayed that I might meet with this damsel, which came to pass accordingly. Do you therefore ratify that marriage, which has been already sanctioned by divine interposition ; and show the respect you have for Abraham, who hath sent me with so much solicitude, by giving your consent to the marriage of this damsel.” And they understood it to be the will of God, for they greatly approved of the offer, and sent their daughter as was desired. And Isaac married her, the inheritance being now come to him ; for the sons of Abraham by Keturah were gone to their colonies.

§ 1.

A LITTLE while after this Abraham died. He was a man of incomparable virtue, and honoured by God as his piety deserved. He lived one hundred and seventy-five years, and was buried in Hebron, with his wife Sarah, by their sons Isaac and Ishmael.

CHAP. XVIII.

§ 1.

NOW Isaac's wife proved with child, after the death of Abraham, and as she was very big, Isaac was anxious, and inquired of God; who told him that Rebekah should bear twins, and that two nations should take the names of those sons, and that he who seemed the lesser should excel the bigger. Accordingly she, in a little time, as God had foretold, bare twins, the elder of whom from his head to his feet was very hairy, but the younger took hold of his heel as they were in the birth. Now the father loved the elder, who was called Esau, or Seir, a name agreeable to his hairiness, which the Hebrews called Seir; but the younger, Jacob, was best beloved by his mother.

§ 2. And when there was a famine in the land, Isaac resolved to go into Egypt, the land there being good; but he went instead to Gerar, for so God commanded him. Here Abimelech the king received him, because Abraham had formerly been his guest and friend. And at first he treated him very kindly, but he was hindered from continuing in the same disposition to the end by envy; for when he saw that God was with Isaac, and took such great care of him, he drove him out of his kingdom. And he, seeing how envy had changed the temper of Abimelech, retired to a place called The Valley, not far from Gerar :<sup>1</sup> and as he was digging a well, the king's shepherds fell upon him, and began to fight, in order to hinder the work ; and because he did not desire to contend, the shepherds seemed to get the better of him. And he retired still further, and dug another well ; and when certain other shepherds of Abimelech began to offer him violence, he left that also, and still retired ; thus purchasing security to himself by rational prudence. At length accident<sup>2</sup> permitting him to dig a well without disturbance, he named this well Rehoboth,<sup>3</sup> which denotes room ; and of the former wells, one was called Escon, which denotes strife, the other Sitenna, which signifies enmity.

§ 3. And now Isaac's affairs were in a flourishing condition from his great riches. So Abimelech, thinking Isaac throve in opposition to him, while their living together made them suspicious of each other, and Isaac's retiring seemed to show a secret enmity also, was afraid that his former friendship with Isaac would not secure him, if Isaac should endeavour to revenge the injuries he had formerly sustained, so he renewed his friendship with him, and brought with him Phicol, one of his generals. And when he had obtained everything he desired owing to Isaac's good nature, who preferred the earlier friendship Abimelech had showed to himself and his father to his later wrath, he returned home.

§ 4. Now when Esau, the favourite son of Isaac, was forty years old, he married Adah, the daughter of Helon, and Alibamah, the daughter of Esebeon, who were men of great rank among the Canaanites, thereby taking upon himself the sole responsibility for his marriage, without asking the advice of his father ; for had Isaac been consulted, he would not have given him leave to marry thus, for he was not pleased with contracting any affinity with the people of that country ; but not wishing to incur his son's hatred by commanding him to put away those wives, he resolved to be silent.

§ 5. But when he was old, and could not see at all, he called Esau to him, and told him, that besides his blindness, and the disorder of his eyes, his old age hindered him from the worship of God; he bade him therefore to go out a hunting, and when he had caught as much venison as he could, to make him a meal, that after it he might make supplication to God to support and assist him during the whole of his life, saying, that it was uncertain when he should himself die, and that he was desirous, by his prayers for him, to procure beforehand the favour of God for him.

§ 6. Accordingly Esau went out a hunting. But Rebekah, thinking to obtain the favour of God for Jacob, and that against the wish of Isaac, bade him kill some kids of the goats, and prepare a meal of them. So Jacob obeyed his mother, according to all her instructions. Now when the meal was got ready, he took a goat's skin and put it about his arm, that, by reason of its hairiness, he might be believed by his father to be Esau: for they, being twins, and in all things else alike, differed only in this respect. This he did out of fear, lest before his father made his supplications, he should be detected in his guile, and provoke his father to curse him instead of bless him. So he brought in the meal to his father. Isaac, perceiving by the peculiarity of his voice who he was, called his son to him, who gave him his hand, which was covered with a goat's skin. When Isaac felt that, he said, "Thy voice is like the voice of Jacob, yet, because of the thickness of thy hair, thou seemest to be Esau." So, suspecting no deceit, he ate the meal, and betook himself to prayers and intercession with God; and said, "O Lord of all ages, and creator of all substance; for it was thou that didst give to my father great plenty of good things, and hast vouchsafed to bestow on me what I have, and hast promised to my posterity to be their kind supporter, and to bestow on them still greater blessings: do thou therefore confirm these thy promises, and do not overlook me because of my present weak condition, on account of which I the more need thy help. Be gracious to this my son; and preserve him, and keep him from everything that is evil. Give him a happy life, and the possession of as many good things as thy power is able to bestow. Make him terrible to his enemies, and honoured and beloved by his friends.”

§ 7. Thus did Isaac pray to God, thinking his prayers had been made for Esau; and he had but just finished them, when Esau came in from hunting. And when Isaac perceived his mistake, he was silent: but Esau asked that he might obtain the like blessing from his father that his brother had got; but his father refused, because all his prayers had been expended upon Jacob: so Esau bitterly grieved over the mistake. So his father being moved at his weeping, said, that he should excel in hunting, and strength of body, and in arms, and in all his actions, and should obtain glory for ever on those accounts, he and his posterity after him, but still should serve his brother.

§ 8. Now his mother delivered Jacob, when he was afraid that his brother would take vengeance on him because of the mistake about the prayers of Isaac, for she persuaded her husband to take a wife for Jacob of her own kindred out of Mesopotamia, Esau having married already Basemath, the daughter of Ishmael, without his father's consent, for the fact that Isaac did not like the Canaanites, so that he disapproved of Esau's former marriages, made him take Basemath to wife, in order to please him, and also because he was very much in love with her.

CHAP. XIX.

Concerning Jacob's Flight into Mesopotamia, by reason of the fear he was in of his Brother; and how he Married there, and had Twelve Sons, and returned to Canaan.

§ 1.

NOW Jacob was sent by his mother into Mesopotamia to marry her brother Laban's daughter (which marriage was permitted by Isaac, on account of his complaisance to the wishes of his wife), and he journeyed through the land of Canaan; and because he hated the people of that country, he would not lodge with any of them, but took up his lodging in the open air, and laid his head on a heap of stones that he had gathered together. And he saw in his sleep the following vision close to him: he seemed to see a ladder, that reached from earth to heaven, and persons descending down it, that seemed more excellent than human; and at last God himself stood above it, and was plainly visible to him, and, calling him by his name, spoke to him in these words:—

§ 2. “O Jacob, it is not fit for thee, who art the son of a good father, and grandson of one who obtained a great reputation for his eminent virtue, to be dejected at thy present circumstances, but to hope for better times, for thou shalt have great abundance of all good things by my assistance: for I brought Abraham hither out of Mesopotamia, when he was driven away by his kinsmen, and I made thy father a happy man, nor will I bestow less happiness on thyself. Be of good courage, therefore, and under my conduct proceed on thy journey, for the intended marriage shall take place. And thou shalt have noble sons, and their descendants shall be innumerable, and they shall leave what they have to a still more numerous posterity, to whom, and to whose posterity, I give the dominion of all the land, and they shall fill the entire earth and sea that the sun looks on. And do not thou fear any danger, nor be afraid of the many labours thou must undergo, for by my providence I will direct thee what thou art to do in the time present, and still more in the time to come.”

§ 3. Such things did God foretell to Jacob: whereupon he became very joyful at what he had seen and heard, and poured oil on the stones, because on them the prediction of such great benefits was made. He also vowed a vow, that he would offer sacrifice upon them, if he could get his living and returned safe: and if he came again in peace, he would give the tenth of what he had got to God. He also judged the place to be honourable, and gave it the name Bethel,<sup>1</sup> which in Greek signifies House of God.

§ 4. So he proceeded on his journey to Mesopotamia, and at length came to Haran; and meeting with shepherds in the suburbs, and youths and maidens sitting by a certain well, he stayed with them, as if desirous to drink; and beginning a conversation with them, he asked them, whether they knew anyone called Laban, and whether he was still alive? And they all said they knew him, for he was not such a person as to be unknown to any of them; and that his daughter fed her father's flock together with them; and that indeed they wondered that she was not yet come, "for from her," said they, "you may learn more exactly whatever you desire to know about the family." As they were saying this, the damsel came up accompanied by some shepherds. They then showed her Jacob, and told her that he was a stranger who came to enquire about her father. And she, pleased, after the custom of children, with Jacob's coming, asked him who he was? and whence he came to them? and by what necessity he had been moved to come there? She also hoped it might be in their power to supply his wants.

§ 5. But Jacob was quite overcome, not so much by their relationship or the affection which might arise thence, as by his love to the damsel, and his surprise at her beauty, which was so great that few of the women of that age could equal it. He said at last, "There is a relationship between us older than either of our births, if you are the daughter of Laban, for Abraham, as well as Haran and Nahor, was the son of Terah. And Bethuel your grandfather was the son of Nahor. Isaac my father was the son of Abraham and of Sarah, who was the daughter of Haran. But there is a nearer and later pledge of relationship which we bear to one another, for my mother Rebekah was own sister to Laban your father, so we are first cousins. And I am now come to salute you all, and to renew our relationship." And she, remembering she had heard a good deal from her father about Rebekah (as young people are likely to hear family history), and knowing that her parents loved her name, in her filial love wept and embraced Jacob, and after this affectionate greeting told him, that he brought the most desirable and greatest pleasure to her father, and indeed all their family; as for her father, he was always mentioning his mother, and always thinking of her, "this," she added, "will make thee equal in his eyes to any advantage whatever." Then she bade him go at once to her father, and follow her while she conducted him to him; and not to deprive him of such a pleasure by loitering on the way any longer.

§ 6. When she had said this, she brought him to Laban; and, being owned by his uncle, he felt secure himself as being among friends, and brought a great deal of pleasure to them by his unexpected arrival. And not many days afterwards Laban told him, that he could not express in words the joy he had at his coming; but still he enquired of him the reason of his coming, and why he left his aged mother and father, when they wanted all his care and attention; he said also that he would afford him all the assistance he wanted. Then Jacob gave him an account of the whole reason of his journey, and told him, "That Isaac had two sons that were twins, himself and Esau; and that Esau, because he lost his father's prayers, which by his mother's wisdom were offered up for him, sought to kill him, as being deprived of the kingdom which was to be given him by God, and of the blessings for which their father prayed; and that this was the reason of his coming hither, as his mother had commanded him to do; for we are all (says he) brethren one to another, and my mother prefers my marrying into your family rather than into one of the families of Canaan, so I look upon you and God to be my supporters in my new home, and think myself safe in my present circumstances."

§ 7. Then Laban promised to treat him with all kindness, on account of his ancestors, and particularly for the sake of his mother, towards whom, he said, he would show his love, even though she was absent, by taking care of him; for he assured him he would make him overseer over his flocks, and give him authority sufficient for that purpose; and, should he have a mind to return to his parents, he would send him back with presents, and such honour as the nearness of their relationship demanded. This Jacob heard gladly; and said he would willingly undergo any labour to please him while he tarried with him, but asked as his wages the hand of Rachel, who was esteemed by him not only on other accounts, but also because she was the means of his coming to him (for he was forced by love for the damsel to make this proposal). Laban was well pleased with these terms, and consented to give the damsel to him, as not desirous to meet with any better son-in-law; and said he would do this, if he would stay with him some time, for he was not willing to send his daughter to be among the Canaanites, for he repented of having married his sister there. And when Jacob had given his consent to this, it was agreed he should stay seven years; for so many years he had to serve his father-in-law, that, having thus given a specimen of his virtue, it might be better known what sort of a man he was. And Jacob accepting of his terms, when the time had expired, Laban made the wedding-feast; and, when it was night, without Jacob's perceiving it, he put his other daughter into bed to him, who was not only older than Rachel, but of no comely countenance: Jacob lay with her that night, being in drink, and misled by the dark. However, when it was day, he knew what had been done to him; and he reproached Laban for the wrong done to him; who asked pardon for that necessity which forced him to do what he did; for he had not given him Leah out of any ill design, but overcome by a weighty reason;<sup>1</sup> that, notwithstanding this, nothing need hinder him from marrying Rachel; for, when he had served another seven years, he would give him her whom he loved. Jacob submitted to this condition, for his love to the damsel did not permit him to do otherwise; and when another seven years were gone by he had Rachel to wife.

§ 8. Now each of these had handmaids given them by their father. Zilpah was handmaid to Leah, and Bilhah to Rachel; they were by no means slaves,<sup>2</sup> but subject to their mistresses. Now Leah was sorely troubled at her husband's passionate love to her sister, and expected she herself would be better esteemed if she bore him children: so she entreated God perpetually: and, when she had borne a son, and her husband paid a little more attention to her on that account, she named her son Reuben, because God had had mercy upon her, for that is the signification of this name. After some time she bore three more sons: Simeon, which name signifies that God had hearkened to her prayer; Levi, which means confirmer of union; and Judah, which denotes thanksgiving. But Rachel, fearing lest the fruitfulness of her sister should make herself enjoy a lesser share of Jacob's affections, put to bed to him her handmaid Bilhah. By her Jacob had Dan; one may interpret that name in the Greek tongue a divine judgment; and after him Nephthalim, which means unconquerable in stratagem, since Rachel tried to conquer the fruitfulness of her sister by this stratagem. But Leah took the same method, and used a counter-stratagem to that of her sister, for she put to bed to Jacob her own handmaid. So he had by Zilpah a son, whose name was Gad, which may be interpreted fortuitous; and after him Asher, which may be said to signify enviable, because he added glory to Leah. Now Reuben, the eldest son of Leah, brought some apples of the mandrake to his mother. When Rachel saw them, she desired that she would give her them, for she longed to eat them; but when she refused, and bade her be content that she had deprived her of the love of her husband, Rachel, in order to mitigate her sister's anger, said she would yield her husband to her, and he should lie with her that evening. She accepted of the favour, and Jacob slept with Leah to oblige Rachel. She bore then these sons: Issachar, denoting one born by hire; and Zabulon, which signifies a pledge of good will; and a daughter, Dinah. After some time, Rachel had a son, named Joseph, which signified there should be another son added to him.

<sup>2</sup> Here we have the difference between slaves for life, and servants, such as we now hire for a time, agreed upon on both sides, and dismissed again after the time contracted for is over. Accordingly, when the Apostolical Constitution forbids a clergyman to marry perpetual servants, or slaves, b. vi. ch. xvii., it is meant only of the former sort: as we learn elsewhere from the same Constitutions, ch. xlvii. can. lxxxii.

§ 9. Now Jacob fed the flocks of Laban his father-in-law all this time, being twenty years, after which he desired leave of his father-in-law to take his wives and go home; but when his father-in-law would not give him leave, he made up his mind to do it secretly. He made trial, therefore, of the disposition of his wives, as to what they thought of this journey. As they approved of it, Rachel took along with her the images of the gods which they used to worship as their country's gods, and ran away, together with her sister. The children also, both of them, and the handmaids, and the possessions they had, went along with them. Jacob also drove away half the cattle, without letting Laban know. Now the reason why Rachel took the images of the gods, although Jacob had taught her to despise such worship, was, that in case they were pursued, and taken by her father, she might have recourse to these images, in order to obtain his pardon.

§ 10. But Laban hearing on the third day of Jacob's and his daughters' departure, was much troubled, and pursued after them with a band of men; and on the seventh day overtook them, and found them encamped on a certain hill; and then, indeed, he did not meddle with them, for it was eventide; and God appeared to him in a dream, and warned him to treat his son-in-law and his daughters in a peaceable manner; and not to venture upon anything rashly, or in wrath to them, but to make a league with Jacob. And he told him, that if he despised their small number, and attacked them in a hostile manner, he would himself assist them. When Laban had been thus forewarned by God, he invited Jacob the next day to a colloquy, and told him what dream he had had; in dependence whereon Jacob went confidently to him. Then Laban began to accuse him, alleging that he had entertained him when he was poor, and in want of all things, and had given him plenty of all things which he had; "For," said he, "I joined my daughters to thee in marriage, and supposed that in consequence of this your goodwill to us would be greater than before; but you have paid no regard either to your own mother's relationship to me, nor to the affinity between us, nor to the wives whom you married, nor to the children of whom I am the grandfather, but have treated me as an enemy, by driving away my cattle, and by persuading my daughters to run away from their father; and by carrying home with you those sacred family gods, which were worshipped by my forefathers, and have been honoured by myself with the like worship which they paid them. In short, you have done what even enemies would shrink from doing in war, though my kinsman, and my sister's son, and the husband of my daughters, and after being hospitably treated by me, and eating at my table." When Laban had said this, Jacob made his defence: "That he was not the only person in whom God had implanted the love of his native country, for he had made it innate in all men, and therefore it was but reasonable that, after so long a time, he should desire to go back to his. And as for the cattle, of whose driving away you accuse me, if any other person were the arbitrator, you would be found in the wrong; for, instead of the thanks I ought to have had from you, for both keeping your cattle, and increasing them, how is it that you are unjustly angry at me, because I have taken, and have with me, a small portion of them? And, as to your daughters, know that it is not through any evil practices of mine that they accompany me in my return home, but from that just affection which wives naturally have to their husbands. They follow, indeed, not so much me as their own children." And thus much he said to clear himself of having acted unjustly. To which he added a counter-complaint and accusation of Laban, saying, "Though I was your sister's son, and you had given me your daughters in marriage, you have worn me out with harsh commands, and detained me twenty years under them. That, indeed, which was required in order to my marrying your daughters, hard as it was, I own to have been lighter, but your conduct to me after those marriages was worse, and such indeed as an enemy would have avoided." And certainly Laban had used Jacob very ill; for when he saw that God was with him in all that he desired, he promised him, that of the young cattle which should be born, he should have sometimes those of a white colour, and sometimes those of a black, but when those that came to Jacob's share proved numerous, he did not keep his faith with him, but said he would give them to him the next year, for he envied him the multitude of his possessions. He promised him as before, because he thought such an increase was not to be expected; but when it came, he deceived him.

§ 11. But as to the sacred images, he bade him search for them; and, as Laban accepted his offer, Rachel, learning of it, put those images into the camel's saddle on which she rode, and sat upon them, and said that her menses prevented her rising up: so Laban left off searching any further, not supposing that his daughter in such circumstances would approach those images. So he made a covenant with Jacob, that he would not bear him any malice on account of what had happened, and Jacob made the like covenant, and promised to love Laban's daughters. And these covenants they made on a certain mountain, whereon they erected a pillar in the form of an altar: whence that hill is called Gilead;<sup>1</sup> and so they call that land the land of Gilead to this day. Now when they had feasted after their mutual covenant, Laban returned home.

CHAP. XX.

§ 1.

NOW, as Jacob was proceeding on his journey to the land of Canaan, angels appeared to him, and suggested to him good hope of his future condition; and he called that place the Camp of God. And being desirous of knowing what his brother's intentions were to him, he sent on messengers to investigate everything, being afraid on account of their former jealousy. And he charged those that were sent on to say to Esau, that "Jacob had thought it wrong to live with him whilst he was in anger against him, and so had gone out of the country; and that now, thinking the long time of his absence must have reconciled them, was returning home; that he brought with him his wives and his children, with the substance he had got, and delivered himself, with what was most dear to him, into his hands; and should think it his greatest happiness to share with his brother what God had bestowed upon him." And those messengers told Esau this message. Upon which he was very glad, and went to meet his brother with four hundred armed men. And Jacob, when he heard that he was coming to meet him with such a number of armed men, was greatly afraid: however, he relied for deliverance on God; and considered how, in his present circumstances, he might preserve himself and those that were with him, and overcome his enemies, if they attacked him unjustly. He therefore divided his company into two parts: some he sent on before the rest, and the others he ordered to follow close behind, that so, if the first were overpowered, if his brother attacked them, they might have those that followed to make good their retreat. And when he had put his company in this order, he sent some forward to carry presents to his brother. They consisted of beasts of burden, and a quantity of animals of various kinds, such as would be very valuable to those that received them on account of their rarity. Those who were sent on with these went apart at certain intervals, that by following close after one another, they might appear to be more numerous, for he thought that Esau would remit his anger on account of these presents, if he were still angry. Instructions were also given to those that were sent on to speak him fair.

§ 2. When Jacob had made these arrangements all the day, as night came on, he moved on with his company; and, as they crossed over a certain stream called Jabbok,<sup>1</sup> Jacob was left behind; and meeting with an angel, he wrestled with him, the angel beginning the struggle: and he prevailed over the angel, who used a voice and spoke to him in words, exhorting him to be pleased with what had happened to him, and not to suppose that his victory was a small one, but that he had overcome a divine angel, and to consider his victory as a sign of great blessings that should come to him; and that his offspring should never fail, and that no man should be too strong for him. He also bade him call himself Israel, which in the Hebrew tongue signifies one that struggled with an angel. This however he foretold him at the entreaty of Jacob; for, when he perceived him to be the angel of God, he begged he would tell him what should befall him hereafter.

Now Wady Zerka, an eastern affluent of the Jordan.

And when the angel had told him all this, he disappeared; but Jacob was pleased with these things, and called the place Phanuel,<sup>1</sup> which signifies the face of God. Now as he felt pain from his struggling upon his broad sinew, he abstained from eating that sinew himself afterwards, and for his sake it is still not eaten by us.

§ 3. When Jacob heard that his brother was at hand, he ordered his wives to go forward, each by herself, with the handmaids, that they might see at a distance the fight, if Esau were so disposed. He then went up and bowed down to his brother Esau, who had no evil design upon him, but embraced him, and asked him about the company of the children and women; and proposed, when he had learned all he wanted to know about them, to go along with him to their father; but, Jacob pretending that the cattle were weary, Esau returned to Seir,<sup>2</sup> for there was his place of habitation, and he had named the place Rough from his own hairy roughness.

CHAP. XXI.

§ 1.

THEN Jacob came to the place, till this day called Booths [Succoth],<sup>3</sup> from whence he went to Shechem,<sup>4</sup> which is a city of the Canaanites. Now, as the Shechemites were keeping a festival, Dinah, who was the only daughter of Jacob, went into the city to see the finery of the women of that country. But when Shechem, the son of Hamor the king, saw her, he defiled her by violence; and being greatly in love with her, desired of his father that he would procure the damsel to him for wife. And he assented, and went to Jacob, and asked him that his son Shechem might marry Dinah according to law. But Jacob, not knowing how to deny his request owing to his position, and yet not thinking it lawful to marry his daughter to a stranger, entreated him to give him leave to deliberate about what he desired him to do. So the king went away, hoping that Jacob would allow this marriage. And Jacob informed his sons of the defilement of their sister, and of the wish of Hamor; and desired them to advise what to do. Upon this most said nothing, not knowing what advice to give. But Simeon and Levi, the uterine brothers of the damsel, agreed between themselves upon the following action. As it was now the time of a festival, when the Shechemites were engaged in relaxation and feasting, they first fell upon the watch by night when they were asleep, and coming into the city, slew all the males, including the king and his son, but spared the women. And when they had done this without their father's sanction, they brought away their sister.

§ 2. Now while Jacob was dismayed at the daring of this act, and indignant with his sons for it, God stood by him, and bade him be of good courage, and purify his tents, and offer those sacrifices which he had vowed when he set out for Mesopotamia, and saw the vision. As he was, therefore, purifying his company, he lit upon the gods of Laban (for he did not before know they were stolen by Rachel), and he hid them in the earth, under an oak, in Shechem. And departing thence, he offered sacrifice at Bethel,<sup>1</sup> the place where he saw his dream when he first started for Mesopotamia.

§ 3. And going on from thence, when he got near Ephratah,<sup>2</sup> he buried Rachel there, who died in childbed: she was the only one of Jacob's kindred that had not the honour of burial at Hebron. And he mourned for her greatly, and called the son that was born of her Benjamin,<sup>3</sup> because of the sorrow the mother had with him. These are all the children of Jacob, twelve males and one female.

<sup>3</sup> Since Benoni signifies 'the son of my sorrow,' and Benjamin, 'the son of days,' or 'one born in the father's old age,' Gen. xlv. 20, I suspect Josephus' present copies to be here imperfect, and suppose, that in correspondence to other copies, he wrote that Rachel called her son's name Benoni, but his father called him Benjamin, Gen. xxxv. 18.—W.

Of the sons, eight were legitimate, six by Leah, and two by Rachel; and four were by the handmaids, two by each; all whose names I have set down already.

§ 1.

FROM thence Jacob went to Hebron,<sup>1</sup> a city situate among the Canaanites; and there it was that Isaac lived: and they lived together for a little while; but as to Rebekah, Jacob did not find her alive. Isaac also died not long after the arrival of his son, and was buried by his sons near his wife in Hebron, where they had their family burying-place. Now Isaac was a man who was beloved by God, and was very providentially taken care of by God, after the death of Abraham his father; and lived to be exceedingly old: for he died when he had lived virtuously one hundred and eighty-five years.

BOOK II.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS.—FROM THE DEATH OF ISAAC TO THE EXODUS OUT OF EGYPT.

CHAP. I.

§ 1.

AFTER the death of Isaac, his sons divided their habitations respectively. Nor did they retain what they had before ; but Esau departed from the city of Hebron, and left it to his brother, and dwelt in Seir, and ruled over Idumæa. He called the country Edom<sup>1</sup> from his own name of Edom, which he got on the following occasion. One day, returning from the toil of hunting very hungry (it was when he was a boy in age), he found his brother was getting ready for his dinner lentil-pottage, which was of a very red colour ; on which account he the more earnestly longed for it, and desired him to give him some of it to eat ; and he took advantage of his brother's hunger, and forced him to resign up to him for it his birthright, and he, being famished with hunger, resigned it up to him with an oath. So it came about that, on account of the redness of this pottage, he was, in way of jest, called by his contemporaries Edom, for the Hebrews call what is red Edom ; and that was the name he gave the country ; but the Greeks gave it the more euphonious name of Idumæa.

§ 2. Esau became the father of five sons ; of whom Jaus, and Jeglomus, and Coreus, were by one wife, whose name was Olibamah ; and of the others, Eliphaz was born to him by Adah, and Raguel by Basemmath. And these were the sons of Esau. Eliphaz had five legitimate sons, Theman,

Omar, Sophar, Gotham, and Kenez; for Amalek was not legitimate, but by a concubine, whose name was Thamnaa. These dwelt in that part of Idumæa which was called Gobolitis, and that called Amalekitis,<sup>1</sup> from Amalek; for Idumæa was a large country, and so preserved the name of Edom for the whole country, while in its several parts it kept the names of its particular inhabitants.

CHAP. II.

How Joseph, the youngest of Jacob's Sons, was envied by his Brothers, when certain Dreams had foreshown his future Happiness.

§ 1.

IT happened that Jacob came to so great happiness as rarely any person has arrived at. He was richer than the original inhabitants of the country; and was at once envied and admired for the virtues of his sons, for they came short in nothing, but were stout-hearted both in manual labour and enduring of toil, and of good understanding. And God exercised such a providence over him, and took such care of his happiness, as to bring him the greatest blessings, even out of what appeared to be the most sorrowful conditions; and to make him and his sons the cause of our forefathers' departure into Egypt.<sup>2</sup> The occasion was this. When Jacob had his son Joseph born to him by Rachel, his father loved him above the rest of his sons, both because of the beauty of his body and the virtues of his mind, for he excelled the rest in prudence. The affection of his father excited the envy and hatred of his brothers; as did also the dreams which he saw and related to his father and to them, which foretold his future happiness, it being usual with mankind to envy even their nearest relations their prosperity. Now the visions which Joseph saw in his sleep were these.

§ 2. When it was the season of harvest, and Joseph was sent by his father, with his brothers, to gather in the fruits of the earth, he saw a vision in a dream very different to the ordinary dreams that come when we are asleep; which, when he got up, he told his brothers, that they might judge what it meant. He said he saw in a dream the previous night, that his w heatsheaf stood in the place where he had put it, but that their sheaves ran to bow down to it, as slaves bow down to their masters. But as they perceived the dream foretold that he should obtain power and great wealth, and authority over them, they gave no interpretation of it to Joseph, as if it were not understood by them, but they prayed that no part of what they suspected to be its meaning might come to pass, and they bore still greater hatred to him.

§ 3. But God, in opposition to their envy, sent a second vision to Joseph, which was much more wonderful than the former; for it seemed to him that the sun took with him the moon and the rest<sup>1</sup> of the stars, and came down to the earth, and bowed down to him. He told this vision to his father, and suspecting no ill-will on the part of his brothers, desired him, when they were present, to interpret what it signified. Now Jacob was pleased with the dream: for considering the prediction in his mind, and shrewdly and wisely guessing at its meaning, he rejoiced at the great things thereby signified, because it declared the future happiness of his son; and that, by the blessing of God, the time would come when he should be honoured, and thought worthy of obeisance by his parents and brothers, guessing that the moon and sun were like his mother and father; the former, as she that gave increase and nourishment to all things; and the latter, he that gave form and other powers to them; and that the stars were like his brethren, since they were eleven in number, and received their power from the sun and moon.

§ 4. And thus did Jacob make a shrewd judgment of this vision. But these predictions caused very great grief to Joseph's brothers; and they felt to him as if he were some stranger, that was to have those good things which were signified by the dreams, and not as to a brother, with whom it was probable they would go shares, as partners alike in the same parentage and prosperity. So they resolved to kill the lad, and having fully made up their minds, as soon as the harvest was gathered in they went to Shechem, which is a country good for feeding of cattle, and for pasturage; and there they fed their flocks, without acquainting their father with their departure there. So not knowing where his sons were, and receiving no messenger from the flocks that could inform him of the true state of things, he grew melancholy and anxious about them, and sent Joseph to the flocks, to learn all about his brothers, and to bring back word how they did.

CHAP. III.

How Joseph was sold by his Brothers into Egypt, by reason of their Hatred to him; and how he there grew famous and illustrious, and had his Brothers in his Power.

§ 1.

NOW they rejoiced as soon as they saw their brother coming to them, not indeed as at the presence of a near relation, and that sent by their father, but as at the presence of an enemy, and one that by divine providence was delivered into their hands; and they at once resolved to kill him, and not let slip the opportunity that lay before them. But when Reuben, the eldest of them, saw them thus disposed, and all of one mind to execute their purpose, he tried to restrain them, showing them the heinousness and horrid nature of the deed; that it appeared wicked in the sight of God, and impious before men, even to kill one not related to them; but far more flagitious would it appear to slay their own brother,—an outrage to the father, and a bitter sorrow to the mother, to lose their son in such an unnatural way. He entreated them, therefore, to reverence them, and to consider what anguish they would suffer at the death of their favourite and youngest son, and to desist from their cruel intention, and to fear God, who was already both a spectator and witness of the designs they had against their brother, and would love them if they abstained from this act, and yielded to repentance and amendment; but in case they carried it out, there was no vengeance which God would not exact from them for this murder of their brother, since they polluted his providence, which was everywhere present, and did not overlook what was done, either in deserts or in cities; for wherever a man is, there ought he to suppose that God is also. He told them further, that their consciences would be their enemies, if they attempted to carry out so wicked a deed, and that they could never escape conscience, whether it were a good one, or whether it were such a one as they would have within them when once they had killed their brother. He also added to what he had before said, that it was not a right thing to kill a brother, even though he had injured them; that it was well not to bear malice to such near friends, even when they did seem to have given reasonable cause for offence; but they were going to kill Joseph, who had been guilty of nothing that was ill towards them, and whose tender age should rather procure mercy and protection from them. He said also that the motive for killing him made their act much worse, as they determined to take him off out of envy at his future prosperity, an equal share of which they would naturally partake while he enjoyed it, since they were not strangers to him, but the nearest relations; so they might reckon what God bestowed upon Joseph as their own; and that it behoved them to think that the anger of God would, for this cause, be more severe upon them, if they slew him who was judged by God to be worthy of that expected prosperity, and so made it impossible for God to bestow it upon him.

§ 2. Reuben said this and much more, and used entreaties to them, and endeavoured to divert them from the murder of their brother. But when he saw that his discourse had not mollified them at all, but they were urgent to do the deed, he advised them to alleviate their wickedness in the manner of killing Joseph; for, as he had exhorted them first, when they were going to revenge themselves, not to do so, so, since the sentence for killing their brother prevailed, he said, that they would not be so grossly guilty if they would be persuaded to follow his present advice, which would include what they were so eager about, but was not so bad, but in their emergency a lighter crime. He begged them, therefore, not to kill their brother with their own hands, but to cast him into a pit that was hard by, and so let him die; by which they would gain this much, that they would not defile their own hands with blood. To this the young men readily agreed: so Reuben took the lad, and tied him with a cord, and let him down gently into the pit, for it had no water at all in it; and when he had done this, he went to seek for pastures for their flocks.

§ 3. But Judah, another of Jacob's sons, seeing some Arabian merchants, of the posterity of Ishmael, carrying spices and Syrian wares out of the land of Gilead to the Egyptians, urged his brothers, after Reuben was gone, to haul up Joseph out of the pit, and sell him to these Arabians; for if he should die among strangers a great way off, they would be free from the guilt of his blood. This, therefore, was resolved on: so they drew Joseph up out of the pit, and sold him to the merchants for twenty minæ. He was now seventeen years old. But Reuben came in the night-time to the pit, resolved to save Joseph without the knowledge of his brothers; and when upon his calling to him he made no answer, he was afraid that they had killed him after he was gone; and accused his brothers of the murder. But when they told him what they had done, Reuben left off mourning.

§ 4. When Joseph's brothers had acted in this way to him, they considered what they should do to escape the suspicions of their father. Now they had stripped off from Joseph the coat which he had on when he came to them, at the time they let him down into the pit; so they thought it well to tear that coat to pieces, and dip it in goat's blood, and then take and show it to their father, that he might believe he was destroyed by wild beasts. And when they had so done, they went to the old man, who by this time knew that something must have happened to his son, and said that they had not seen Joseph, nor knew what mishap had befallen him, but that they had found his coat bloody, and torn to pieces, so they had a suspicion that he had fallen among wild beasts, and so perished, if that was the coat he had on when he started from home. Now Jacob had before some slight hopes that his son was only made a captive; but now he laid aside that notion, and supposed that his coat was an evident proof that he was dead, for he well remembered that that was the coat he had on when he sent him to his brothers; so he ever after lamented the lad as dead. And as if he had been the father of only one son, without taking any comfort in the rest, he was as much affected with his misfortune as before he conversed with Joseph's brothers, when he conjectured that Joseph was destroyed by wild beasts. He sat down in sackcloth, and in heavy affliction, insomuch that he found no ease when his sons comforted him, neither did he tire of his sorrow through time.

CHAP. IV.

§ 1.

NOW Potiphar, an Egyptian, who was chief cook to king Pharaoh, bought Joseph of the merchants who sold him, and held him in all honour, and taught him the learning that became a free man, and gave him leave to enjoy a better diet than was allotted to slaves. He intrusted also the care of his house to him. So he enjoyed these advantages; yet did not he leave that virtue which he had before upon this change in his condition, but he showed that prudence can control the ills of life, in such as have it in reality, and do not only adopt it in temporary prosperity.

§ 2. For when his master's wife fell violently in love with him, both on account of his beauty, and dexterity in affairs, and supposed, that if she should make it known to him, she could easily persuade him to lie with her, and that he would look upon it as a piece of good fortune that his mistress should solicit him, she regarding his state of slavery, and not his moral character, which continued after his condition was changed, she made known her passion for him, and proposed his lying with her. However, he rejected her overtures, thinking it criminal to yield so far to her as to do what would tend to the affront and injury of him who had bought him, and bestowed so much honour on him. So he besought her to govern her passion, and laid before her the impossibility of her obtaining her desires, which he thought might be conquered, if she had no hope of succeeding: and he said, that as for himself, he would endure anything whatever before he would be persuaded to it; for although it was fit for a slave, as he was, to do nothing contrary to his mistress, disobedience in such a case had much excuse. But this refusal of Joseph's, as she did not expect it, made her still more violent in her love to him; and as she was sorely beset with her passion, she resolved to compass her ends by a second attempt.

§ 3. When, therefore, there was a public festival coming on, which it was the custom for women to attend and join in its festivities, she pretended to her husband that she was not well, seeking for solitude and leisure, that she might solicit Joseph again: which opportunity being obtained, she used more kind words to him than before, and said, that it would have been good for him to have yielded to her first solicitation, and to have given her no repulse, both because of the respect he ought to bear to her who solicited him, and because of the vehemency of her passion, which forced her, though his mistress, to condescend beneath her dignity: but that he might now by more prudent action gain pardon for his former folly; for whether it were, that he expected the repetition of her solicitations, she had now made it, and that with greater earnestness than before, for she had pretended to be ill, and had preferred his company to the festival and its festivities; or whether he opposed her former overtures from distrust, she now gave him sufficient security, by thus continuing her suit, that she meant not to impose upon him: and assured him that, if he complied with her desires, he might expect the enjoyment of the advantages he already had, and, if he hearkened to her, he should have greater advantages still, but that he must look for revenge and hatred from her in case he rejected her suit, and preferred the reputation of chastity to gratifying his mistress. Nor would he gain anything by such procedure, because she would then become his accuser, and would falsely pretend to her husband that he had attempted her chastity; and Potiphar would hearken to her words rather than to his, let his be ever so agreeable to the truth.

§ 4. When the woman had said this, and even with tears in her eyes, neither did pity dissuade Joseph from his chastity, nor did fear compel him to compliance with her; but he opposed her solicitations, and did not yield to her threatenings, being afraid to do a wicked act; and he chose to undergo the worst rather than to enjoy the present by doing what his own conscience knew would justly deserve death. He also reminded her that she was a married woman, and that she ought to cohabit with her husband only; and besought her to let these considerations have more weight with her than the short pleasure of lustful dalliance, which would bring her to repentance afterwards, would end in trouble to her, and yet would not amend what had been done amiss. He also suggested to her the fear of being caught in the act, and that their only gratification would be not being found out while their wickedness was not known, while she might have the enjoyment of her husband without any danger. He told her also, that in going with her husband she might have great boldness from a good conscience, both before God and before men. Nay, that she would act more like his mistress, and make better use of her authority over him, while she continued chaste, than she could after he had outraged her modesty, and that it was much better to depend on one's good life being well known, than on undetected wickedness.

§ 5. By saying this and more to like effect, Joseph tried to restrain the violent passion of the woman, and to bring her lust to reason: but she grew more ungovernable and earnest in the matter, and as she despaired of persuading him, she laid her hands upon him and had a mind to force him. But when Joseph got away from her furious lust, leaving also his garment with her, for he left that to her and leaped out of the chamber, she was greatly afraid lest he should discover her lewdness to her husband, and greatly troubled at the slight he had put on her; so she resolved to be beforehand with him, and to accuse Joseph falsely to Potiphar, and by that means to revenge herself on him for his terrible contempt of her charms; and she thought it a wise thing in itself, and also becoming a woman, thus to anticipate an accusation. So she sat dejected and in confusion, pretending in her anger, that the sorrow, which was really for being disappointed of her lust, was for an attempt upon her chastity; and, when her husband came home, and was troubled at her appearance, and inquired what was the cause of the disorder she was in, she began to accuse Joseph, and said, "O husband, mayest thou not live a day longer, if thou dost not punish the wicked slave who desired to defile thy bed; who neither remembered who he was when he came to our house, so as to behave himself with modesty, nor was he mindful of the favours he had received from thy bounty (and he must be an ungrateful man indeed, unless he in every respect behave well to us), but formed the design to abuse thy wife, and that at the festival time, watching for thy absence. So that it is now clear, that his modesty, as it appeared to be formerly, was only because of the restraint he was in from fear of thee, but that he was not really of a good disposition. This has been occasioned by his being advanced to honour beyond what he deserved, or even hoped for, so that he concluded, that he who was deemed fit to be trusted with thy estate, and the government of thy family, and was preferred above thy eldest servants, had liberty to touch thy wife also." And when she had ended speaking, she showed him his garment, as if he left it there when he attempted to force her. Then Potiphar, not being able to disbelieve what his wife's tears showed, and what his wife said, and the garment which he saw, and placing too much confidence in his wife owing to his love for her, did not set himself about the examination of the truth, but taking it for granted that his wife was a modest woman, and condemning Joseph as a wicked man, he threw him into the malefactors' prison; and had a still higher opinion of his wife, and bore witness to her modesty and chastity.

CHAP. V.

§ 1.

NOW Joseph, committing all his affairs to God, did not betake himself to any defence or account of the real circumstances, but silently underwent the bonds and distress; firmly believing that God, who knew the cause of his affliction, and the truth, would be more powerful than those that put him in bonds; a proof of whose providence he quickly received; for the keeper of the prison, taking notice of his care and fidelity in the affairs he had set him about, and the dignity of his countenance, relaxed his bonds, and made his heavy calamity lighter, and more supportable to him: he also permitted him to enjoy a better diet than the rest of the prisoners. Now his fellow-prisoners, when their hard labour was over, fell to discoursing one among another, as is usual in such as are partners in trouble, and to inquiring one of another, what were the reasons of their being condemned. Among them the king's favourite cupbearer was put in bonds, owing to the king's anger, in the same part of the prison as Joseph, and grew intimate with him, and observing that Joseph had an excellent understanding, he told him of a dream he had, and desired he would interpret its meaning, complaining that, besides the afflictions he underwent from the king, God did also add to him trouble from his dreams.

§ 2. He then said, that in his sleep he saw three clusters of grapes hanging upon three branches of a vine, large already and ripe for gathering, and that he squeezed them into a cup which the king held in his hand; and when he had strained the wine, he gave it to the king to drink, and he received it from him with a pleasant countenance. This, he said, was what he saw; and he desired Joseph, if he had any understanding in such matters, that he would tell him what the vision foretold. And he bade him be of good cheer, and expect to be loosed from his bonds in three days' time, because the king desired his service, and was about to restore him to his office again: for he let him know, that God bestows the fruit of the vine upon men for good; which wine is poured out to him, and is the pledge of fidelity and friendship among men, putting an end to quarrels, and taking away perturbation and grief from the minds of those that use it, and making them cheerful. "Thou sayest that thou didst squeeze this wine from three clusters of grapes with thine hands, and that the king received it; know, therefore, that this vision is for thy good, and foretells a release from thy present distress within the same number of days as the branches had from which thou gatheredst the grapes in thy sleep. However, remember what prosperity I foretold thee when thou hast found it come true, and when thou art in authority, do not overlook me in this prison, wherein thou wilt leave me, when thou art gone to the place I have foretold; for I am not in prison for any crime, but I was condemned for my virtue and chastity to suffer the punishment of malefactors, and because I was unwilling to injure him that has thus treated me for my own pleasure." The cupbearer, therefore, as was natural, rejoiced to hear such an interpretation of his dream, and waited for the completion of what had been thus foreshown him.

§ 3. But there was another servant of the king, who had been chief baker, and was now in prison with the cupbearer; he also was in good hope, upon Joseph's interpretation of the other's vision, for he had seen a dream also; so he asked Joseph to tell him what the visions he had seen the night before meant. They were as follows:—"Methought," says he, "I carried three baskets upon my head, two full of loaves, and the third full of sweetmeats and other eatables, such as are prepared for kings; but some birds came and swooped on them, and eat them all up, and had no regard to my attempt to scare them away." And he expected a similar prediction to that of the cupbearer. But Joseph, considering and reasoning about the dream, said to him that he would willingly be an interpreter of good events to him, and not of such as his dream signified, but he told him that he had only two days in all to live, for that the baskets signified that on the third day he would be crucified, and devoured by birds, when unable to help himself. Now both these dreams had the very end that Joseph foretold they would have to both parties; for on the predicted day, when the king solemnized his birthday, he crucified the chief baker, but set the butler free from his bonds, and restored him to his former office.

§ 4. But God freed Joseph from his confinement, after he had endured his bonds two years, and had received no assistance from the cupbearer, who did not remember his predictions. God contrived the following method of deliverance for him. Pharaoh the king had seen in his sleep the same night two visions, and with them the interpretation of each. He had forgotten the latter, but remembered the dreams themselves. Being therefore troubled at what he had seen, for it seemed to him to be all of a melancholy nature, he called together the next day the wisest men among the Egyptians, desiring to learn from them the interpretation of his dreams. But as they were in doubt about them, the king was so much the more troubled. And now it was that the memory of Joseph, and his skill in the interpretation of dreams, came into the mind of the king's cupbearer, when he saw the confusion that Pharaoh was in: so he came and mentioned Joseph to him, as also the vision he had seen in prison, and how the event proved as he had said, and also how the chief baker was crucified on the very same day, and that this also happened to him according to the interpretation of Joseph: that Joseph himself had been put in prison by Potiphar, who was over the cooks, as a slave; but he said that he was one of the noblest of the stock of the Hebrews, and that his father had great renown. "If, therefore," added he, "you will send for him, and not despise him on the score of his present misfortunes, you will learn what your dreams signify." So the king commanded that they should bring Joseph into his presence, and those who received the command went and fetched him, having attired him suitably according to the command of the king.

§ 5. Then the king took him by the right hand, and said, "O young man, as my servant bears witness that you are at present the best and most skilful person I can consult with, vouchsafe me the same favour which you bestowed on him, and tell me what the visions of my dreams foreshadow. I desire you not to suppress anything out of fear, or to flatter me with lying words to please me, if the truth is of a melancholy nature. Methought, as I walked by the river, I saw seven fat and very large kine going from the river to the marshes; and seven other kine met them out of the marshes, exceeding lean and ill-favoured, which eat up the fat and large kine, and yet were no better than before, being miserably pinched with famine. After I had seen this vision I woke from my sleep troubled, and considering with myself what this apparition meant, I fell asleep again and saw another dream, much more wonderful than the foregoing, which did still more affright and disturb me: I saw seven ears of corn growing on one stalk, having their heads borne down by the weight of the grain, and bending down with its ripeness, and near them I saw seven other ears of corn thin and weak for want of rain, which fell to eating and consuming those that were ripe, and put me into great astonishment."

§ 6. To which Joseph replied, "This dream, O king, although seen under two forms, signifies one and the same condition of future things. For your seeing the kine, animals made for the plough and labour, devoured by the lean kine, and the ears of corn eaten up by smaller ears, both foretell a famine and dearth in Egypt for the same number of years as the years of plenty, so that the plenty of these years will be spent in the same number of years of scarcity, and that scarcity of necessary provisions will be very difficult to relieve; as a sign whereof, the lean kine, when they had devoured the better sort, could not be satisfied. But God predicts what is to come upon men, not to grieve them, but that, when they know it beforehand, they may, by prudence, make the actual experience of what is foretold the more tolerable. If you, therefore, carefully store up the plentiful crops which will come in the former years, you will so contrive that the future dearth will not be felt by the Egyptians."

§ 7. Hereupon the king wondered at the discretion and wisdom of Joseph; and asked him by what means he could so store up the plentiful crops in the fertile years as to make the dearth more tolerable. Joseph then suggested to spare the good crops, and not to permit the Egyptians to use them extravagantly, but to reserve what they would have spent in superfluous luxury against the time of want. He also urged Pharaoh to take the corn of the husbandmen, and to give them only so much as would be sufficient for their food. And Pharaoh, admiring Joseph, not only for his interpretation of the dream, but for the counsel he had given him, intrusted him with the management of everything, with power to do what he thought would be for the benefit of the people of Egypt, and for the benefit of the king, believing that he, who first discovered this method of acting, would prove the best to carry it out. And he, having this power given him by the king, with leave to make use of the king's seal, and to wear purple, drove in his chariot through all the land of Egypt, and took the corn of the husbandmen, allotting as much to everyone as would be sufficient for seed and for food, but without telling anyone the reason why he did so.

CHAP. VI.

How Joseph, when he was become famous in Egypt, had his Brethren in Subjection.

§ 1.

JOSEPH was now full thirty years of age, and enjoyed great honour from the king, who called him Psothom Phanech, out of regard to his prodigious degree of wisdom, for that name denotes 'finder out of secrets.' He also married a wife of very high quality, for he married the daughter of Petephres,<sup>1</sup> one of the priests of Heliopolis;<sup>2</sup> she was a <sup>1</sup> This 'Petephres,' who was now a priest of On, or Heliopolis, is the same name in Josephus, and perhaps in Moses also, with him to whom Joseph was sold. They are also affirmed to be one and the same person in the same testament of Joseph, § 18, for he is there said to have married the daughter of his master and mistress. Nor is this a notion peculiar to that testament; but, as Dr. Bernard confesses, note on Antiq. ii. 4, § 1, common to Josephus, to the Septuagint interpreters, and to other learned Jews of old time.—W.

virgin, and her name was Asenath. By her he had two sons before the scarcity came on, Manasseh, the elder, which signifies 'forgetful,' because his present happiness made him forget his former misfortunes; and Ephraim, the younger, which signifies 'restorer,' because he was restored to the freedom of his forefathers. Now, after Egypt had had seven prosperous years, according to Joseph's interpretation of the dreams, the famine came upon them in the eighth year; and because this misfortune fell upon them unexpectedly, they were all sorely afflicted by it, and came running to the king's gates; and he called upon Joseph, who sold the corn to them, being become confessedly a saviour to the mass of the Egyptians. Nor did he open this market of corn for the people of that country only, but strangers had liberty to buy also, Joseph being willing that all men, who are naturally akin to one another, should have assistance from those that had abundance.

§ 2. So Jacob also, when he understood that foreigners might use that market, sent all his sons into Egypt to buy corn, for the land of Canaan was grievously afflicted with the famine, and indeed it touched the whole continent. He only retained Benjamin, his son by Rachel, and uterine brother of Joseph. These sons of Jacob then came into Egypt, and applied to Joseph, wanting to buy corn; for nothing was done without his approbation; for even the honour that was paid the king himself was only advantageous to the persons that paid it when they took care to honour Joseph also. Now he recognized his brethren, though they had no idea it was him, for he was but a lad when he left them, and was now come to an age so much greater, that the lineaments of his face were changed, so that he was not known to them, and the greatness of his dignity suffered them not so much as to suspect it was he. He therefore determined to make trial of their views on all matters. So he refused to sell them corn, and said they were come as spies of the king's affairs; and that they had come from several countries, and had joined themselves together, and only pretended that they were akin, it not being possible that a private man should breed up so many sons so distinguished looking, such a family not being easily reared by kings themselves. Now he did this in order to discover all about his father, and what had happened to him after his own departure, also wishing to know what was become of Benjamin his brother; for he was afraid that they had plotted against him as they had done against himself, and had got rid of him also.

§ 3. And they were in great alarm and terror, and thought that the greatest danger hung over them; yet did not at all reflect about their brother Joseph, but stood firm under the accusations laid against them, and made their defence by Reuben, the eldest of them, who now became their spokesman. "We came not hither," said he, "with any unjust design, nor to do any harm to the king's country, we only wanted to be preserved alive, supposing your humanity might be a refuge for us from the miseries which our country labours under, we having heard that you have established a market for the sale of corn, not only to your own countrymen, but to strangers also, having determined to afford preservation to all that want it: and that we are brethren, and of the same blood, the peculiar lineaments of our faces, and those not much different from one another, plainly show. Our father is Jacob, a Hebrew, who had twelve of us for his sons by four wives, and, when we were all alive, we were a happy family; but when one of our brothers, whose name was Joseph, died, our affairs changed for the worse, for our father made a long lamentation for him, and we are in affliction, both from the calamity of the death of this brother, and the misery of our aged father. And now we are come to buy corn, having left the care of our father and the management of the house to Benjamin our youngest brother. And you can learn, by sending to our house, whether we are guilty of the least falsehood in what we say."

§ 4. Thus did Reuben endeavour to persuade Joseph to have a better opinion of them. But he, when he had learned from them that Jacob was alive, and that his brother Benjamin had not been destroyed by them, put them for the present in prison, as if intending to examine them more at leisure. But on the third day he brought them out, and said to them, "Since you constantly affirm that you are not come to do any harm to the king's country, and that you are brothers, and the sons of the father whom you named, you will satisfy me of the truth of what you say, if you leave one of your company with me, who shall suffer no injury here; and if, when you have carried corn to your father, you come to me again, and bring your brother, whom you say you left there, along with you, this I shall esteem a proof of the truth of what you have told me." Hereupon they were in greater grief than before; they wept, and kept deploring one among another their treatment of Joseph, and said, "They were fallen into this misery as a punishment inflicted by God for their plots against him." But Reuben severely reproached them for their too late repentance, which could do no good to Joseph; and earnestly exhorted them to bear with patience whatever they suffered, since it was done by God in way of vengeance on his account. Thus they spoke to one another, not imagining that Joseph understood their language. A general dejection also seized on them at Reuben's words, and a repentance for what they had done; and they condemned the wickedness they had perpetrated, for which they judged they were justly punished by God. Now when Joseph saw that they were in this distress, he was so affected at it that he fell into tears, and not being willing that his brothers should observe him, he retired; and after a while, came to them again, and detaining Symeon as a pledge for the brothers' return, he bade the rest take the corn they had bought, and go their way. He also commanded his steward privily to put the money which they had brought with them for the purchase of the corn into their sacks, and to dismiss them therewith; who did as he was commanded.

§ 5. Now when Jacob's sons got back to Canaan, they told their father what had happened to them in Egypt, and that they were supposed to have gone thither as spies upon the king; and how they said they were brothers, and had left their eleventh brother with their father, but were not believed; and how they had left Symeon with the governor, until Benjamin should go and be a proof of the truth of what they had said; and they begged their father to fear nothing, but to send the lad along with them. But Jacob was not pleased with anything his sons had done, and was especially vexed at the detention of Symeon, and thought it a foolish thing to give up Benjamin also. Neither did he yield to Reuben's supplication, though he gave Jacob leave to kill his own sons, in case any harm came to Benjamin in the journey. So they were distressed, and knew not what to do; and there was another circumstance that disturbed them still more,—the money that was found hidden in their sacks of corn. Yet when the corn they had brought failed, and the famine still afflicted them, and necessity almost forced him, Jacob could not<sup>1</sup> make up his mind to send Benjamin with his brethren, although there was no returning into Egypt unless they came with what they had promised. But their distress growing every day worse, and his sons begging it of him, he had no other course to take under the circumstances. And Judah, who was of a bold temper upon other occasions, spoke his mind very freely to him. He said that it did not become him to be afraid on account of Benjamin, nor to suspect the worst, for nothing could happen to him but by the appointment of God, which could also certainly come to pass, though he were at home with him: that he ought not to condemn them to such manifest destruction, nor deprive them of the abundance of food they might have from Pharaoh by his unreasonable fears about Benjamin, but ought also to think about the preservation of Symeon, lest he should perish by Benjamin's journey being put off. He exhorted him also to trust to God for him; and said, he would either bring Benjamin back to him safe, or together with him lose his own life." So Jacob was at last persuaded, and delivered Benjamin to them, with double the price of the corn; he also sent presents to Joseph of the produce of the land of Canaan. balsam, and cinnamon, and turpentine, and honey. Now their father shed many tears at the departure of his sons, as also did they. His concern was, that he might receive them back again safe after their journey; and their concern was, that they might find their father well, and no way afflicted with grief for them. And this lamentation lasted a whole day; and the old man was at last tired out with grief, and stayed behind; and they went on their way to Egypt,

§ 6. As soon as they came into Egypt, they were brought before Joseph, and no small fear disturbed them lest they should be accused about the price of the corn, as if they had cheated Joseph. So they made profuse apology to Joseph's steward, and told him, that when they got home they found the money in their sacks, and that they had now brought it back with them. He said he did not know what they meant. So they were delivered from that fear. And when he had loosed Symeon, and attired him suitably, he permitted him to be with his brothers. And meantime Joseph came from his attendance on the king. So they offered him their presents: and upon his asking them about their father, they answered that they found him well. He also, finding that Benjamin was alive, asked, Whether this was their younger brother? for he had seen him. And when they said he was, he replied, that God ruled over all things. But his affection to him making him shed tears, he retired, not wishing to be observed by his brothers. Then Joseph had them to dinner, and they were set down in the same order as they used to sit at their father's table. And although Joseph treated them all kindly, yet did he send a portion to Benjamin double that of the rest of his guests.

§ 7. Now when after dinner they composed themselves to sleep, Joseph commanded his steward not only to give them their measures of corn, but to hide the money again in their sacks, and also to put into Benjamin's sack the golden cup out of which he himself used to drink. Now this he did in order to make trial of his brothers, whether they would stand by Benjamin, when he should be accused of having stolen the cup, and should appear to be in danger, or whether they would leave him, and, on the score of their own innocency, return to their father without him. When the servant had done as he was bidden, the sons of Jacob, knowing nothing of all this, went their way the next day, and took Symeon along with them, and had a double cause for joy, both because they had received him back again, and because they took back Benjamin to their father as they had promised. But presently a troop of horsemen surrounded them, and brought with them Joseph's servant, who had put the cup into Benjamin's sack. Upon which unexpected approach of the horsemen they were much disturbed, and asked what the reason was that they came thus upon men, who, a little before, had been by their lord thought worthy of honour and hospitality? They replied, by calling them wicked wretches, who had forgotten that very hospitality and kind treatment of Joseph, and had not scrupled to do an injury to him, by carrying off the cup out of which he had, in so friendly a manner, drank to them, and had not regarded their friendship with Joseph, or the danger they would be in if they were detected, in comparison with unjust gain. Hereupon they threatened that they should be punished; for though they had escaped the knowledge of him, who was but a servant, yet had they not escaped the knowledge of God, nor had they got off safe with what they had stolen; and now they had the assurance to ask why they were followed after, as if they knew nothing of the matter: but they should soon know by their punishment. This, and more of the same nature, did the steward say, by way of reproach to them: but they being wholly ignorant of anything that concerned them, mocked at what he said; and wondered at the idle talk of the steward, who made bold to accuse those who did not before so much as retain the price of their corn, which was found in their sacks, but brought it back, though nobody else knew anything about it, so far were they from any idea of wilful fraud. But still, supposing that a search would be a more sure justification of themselves than denial of the fact, they bade them search them, and if any one of them had been guilty of the theft, to punish them all; for being no way conscious to themselves of any crime, they spoke with assurance, and, as they thought, without any danger also. The horsemen also desired search might be made; but they said that punishment should be inflicted only on him who should be found guilty of the theft. So they made the search, and having searched all the rest, they came last of all to Benjamin, knowing his was the sack in which they had hidden the cup, having indeed searched the rest only for a show of completeness; so the rest were out of fear for themselves, and were now only concerned about Benjamin, but were still very confident that he also would be found innocent: and they reproached those that had pursued after them for their hindering them, when they might by now have got a good way on their journey. But as soon as they searched Benjamin's sack, they found the cup at once; and all their tone changed to mourning and lamentation. They rent their garments, and wept for the punishment which their brother would have to undergo for his theft, and for their own breach of promise to their father to bring Benjamin back safe to him. What added to their misery was, that this melancholy accident came at a time when they thought they had got off clear; but they confessed that this misfortune of their brother, as well as the grief their father would feel for him, was owing to themselves, since it was they that forced their father to send him with them, when he was himself averse to it.

§ 8. The horsemen then took Benjamin and brought him back to Joseph, his brethren also following. And he, when he saw him in custody, and them looking like mourners, said, "Whatever, vile wretches, were your ideas of my kindness to you, and of God's providence, for you to act so to your benefactor and host?" Whereupon they offered themselves for punishment to save Benjamin: and again called to mind their former wicked plot against Joseph, whom they pronounced more happy than themselves, if he were dead, in being freed from the miseries of this life, and, if he were alive, that he had obtained God's vengeance upon them. They said further, they were their father's bane, since they should now add to his former affliction for Joseph, this other affliction for Benjamin. Reuben also reproached them at length. But Joseph dismissed them; for he said they had been guilty of no offence, and that he would content himself with the lad's punishment, for he said it was not right either to let him go free, for the sake of those who had not offended, or to punish them together with him who had been guilty of the theft. And when he promised to give them leave to go away in safety, the rest of them were in great consternation, and speechless at the catastrophe. But Judah, who had persuaded their father to send the lad, being otherwise also a very bold and active man, determined to hazard himself for the preservation of his brother. "It is true," said he, "O governor, that we have been very wicked with regard to you, and on that account deserve punishment, even all of us, although the theft was only committed by one of us, and he the youngest also; but yet there remains some hope for us, who otherwise must be under despair on his account, from your goodness, which promises us a deliverance out of our present danger. And now I beg you will not look at us, or at the magnitude of the crime, but at your own nature, and take advice of virtue instead of anger, which those that are otherwise mean employ to add to their strength, and that not only on great, but also on trifling occasions. Be magnanimous, and be not subdued by anger so as to slay those that do not any longer presume upon their own safety, but are desirous to accept of it from you. And this is not the first time that you will bestow it on us, for before when we came to buy corn, you afforded us great plenty of food quickly, and gave us leave to carry so much home to our family, as has preserved them from perishing by famine. Nor is there any difference between not disregarding men that are perishing for want of necessaries, and not punishing those that seem to be offenders, and are envied for that glorious benefaction which they received from you. This will be the same favour, though bestowed after a different maner; for you will preserve this way those whom you did feed the other, and will preserve alive, by your bounty, those souls which you did not suffer to be distressed by famine, it being indeed at once a wonderful and a great thing to sustain our lives by corn, and to bestow on us that pardon, whereby in our present distress we may continue those lives. And I think that God, wishing to afford you this opportunity of showing your virtuous disposition, brought us into this calamity, that it might be evident you could forgive injuries done to yourself; and be kind to others, besides those who, on other accounts, stand in need of your assistance; since it is indeed a right thing to do well to those who are in distress for want of food, but it is a still more glorious thing to save those who deserve to be punished, when it is on account of offences against yourself. For if it be a thing deserving commendation to forgive and overlook such as have been guilty of small offences, to restrain anger as to crimes which are capital to the guilty is to approximate to the nature of God. And truly, as for myself, had it not been that we had a father who showed in his sorrow for Joseph how miserably he is always afflicted at the loss of his sons, I should not have spoken any words to save our own lives, except so far as to praise your character, it being good for it to save alive even those that will have nobody to lament them when they were dead, but we would have yielded ourselves up to suffer whatever you pleased : but now, for we do not plead for mercy for ourselves, though indeed, if we die, it will be while we are young, and before we have had much enjoyment in life, but in regard to our father, and pity for his old age, do we make these supplications to you, and beg for those lives, which this wickedness of ours has rendered liable to punishment. He is not himself wicked, nor did he beget us to be such, for he is a good man, and not worthy to have such trials ; and now we are absent, he is afflicted with anxiety about us, and if he hear of our deaths, and the cause of it, he will die a premature death : and the infamy of our end will hasten his, and will bring him to a miserable death, for he will make haste to get into a state of insensibility, before the sad story of our end come abroad to the world. Consider these things in this manner, although our wickedness does now justly provoke you to anger, and forgive it for our father's sake : and let your pity for him counterbalance our crime. Have regard to the old age of our father, who, if we perish, will be very lonely while he lives, and will soon die himself also. Grant this boon to the name of fathers, for so you will honour both your father and yourself also, who enjoy already that title, which will be preserved intact to you by God the Father of all, whom you will seem to honour as he shares the same name, by taking pity on our father, considering how miserably he will be if he be deprived of his sons. It is in your power, therefore, to bestow on us what God has given us (as it is also to take it away), and so to resemble him entirely in benignity ; for it is good to use that power, which can either give or take away, on the merciful side ; and though it is in your power to destroy, to forget that you ever had that power, and to look on yourself as only allowed power for preservation ; and that the more people anyone extends this power to, the greater reputation does he gain to himself. Now, by forgiving our brother what he has unhappily committed, you will preserve us all ; for we cannot think of living if he be put to death, since we dare not show ourselves alive to our father without our brother, but here we must partake of one and the same end. And so much we beg of you, O governor, that if you condemn our brother to die, you will punish us together with him, as if we were partners of his crime ; for we shall not think it right to kill ourselves for grief at our brother's death, but rather to die as if we were equally guilty with him of this crime. I will only leave with you one consideration, and then will say no more, viz. that our brother committed this fault when he was young, and not yet of ripe wisdom, and that men naturally forgive such. If then you condemn us, any omission of mine may be supposed to have hurt us, and made you take the severer view. But if you set us free, that may be ascribed to your own goodness, of which you are inwardly conscious, and that not by merely preserving us, but by granting us such a favour as will make us appear more righteous than we really are, by your seeing more motives for our deliverance than we can ourselves. If, therefore, you mean to slay him, slay me in his stead, and send him back to his father ; or if you prefer to retain him with you as a slave, I am more serviceable to you in that capacity, and, as you see, am better prepared for either contingency." Then Judah, being very willing to undergo anything whatever for the deliverance of his brother, cast himself down at Joseph's feet, and tried all he could to assuage and pacify his anger. All the brothers also fell down before him weeping, and offered their own lives for that of Benjamin.

§ 9. But Joseph, overcome now with his affections, and no longer able to personate an angry man, commanded all that were present to depart, that he might make himself known to his brothers when they were alone. And when the rest were gone out, he made himself known to his brothers, and said, " I commend you for your virtue and kindness to our brother ; I find you better men than I could have expected from your plot against me. Indeed, I did all this to try your love to your brother; so I believe you were not wicked by nature in what you did in my case, but that all has happened according to God's will, who has hereby procured our enjoyment of what good things we have, and, if he continue propitious to us, will hereafter. Since, therefore, I know that our father is safe and well beyond my expectation, and I see you so well disposed to our brother, I no longer remember the guilt you seem to have had in my case, but will leave off to hate you for that wickedness, and rather return you thanks, that you have co-operated with the will of God to bring things to their present state. I would have you also forget and rather be glad of your old folly, since it is come to such a happy conclusion, than to be uneasy and blush at your offence. Do not, therefore, let your evil intentions when you condemned me, and that bitter remorse which followed, grieve you now, since those intentions were frustrated. Go therefore your way, rejoicing in what has happened by divine providence, and inform your father of it, lest he should be worn out with anxiety for you, and deprive me of the most agreeable part of my felicity, by dying before he comes into my sight, and enjoys the good things that we now have. Bring therefore with you him, and your wives and children, and all your kindred, and remove your habitation hither; for it is not proper that the persons dearest to me should live remote from my prosperity, especially as the famine must endure five more years." When Joseph had said this, he embraced his brethren, who were in tears and sorrow at the remembrance of their conduct to him, but the generous kindness of their brother seemed to leave them no room for fear of punishment. And they then feasted with him. Now the king, as soon as he heard that Joseph's brethren were come to him, was exceeding glad, as if it had been his own good fortune; and gave them wagons full of corn, and gold and silver, to take to their father. And when they had received more from their brother, part to take to their father, and part as gifts for each of themselves, Benjamin having still more than the rest, they departed.

CHAP. VII.

§ 1.

AS soon as Jacob learnt on his sons' return home all about Joseph, that he had not only escaped death, though he had mourned for him so long, but that he lived in splendour and happiness, and ruled over Egypt with the king, and had almost all affairs intrusted to his care, he did not think anything he was told incredible, considering the greatness of the power of God, and his kindness to him, although that kindness had for some time been intermitted; so he immediately set out on his journey to Joseph.

§ 2. When he came to the well of the oath (Beersheba),<sup>1</sup> he offered sacrifice to God, and being afraid that their prosperity in Egypt might tempt his posterity to fall in love with it, and settle in it, and think no more of removing into the land of Canaan, and possessing it, as God had promised them; as also being afraid, if this migration to Egypt were made without the will of God, that his family might be destroyed there; fearing also that he should depart this life before he came to the sight of Joseph, he fell asleep, revolving these doubts in his mind.

§ 3. But God appeared to him, and called to him twice by his name; and when he asked who he was? God said, "It is not right that Jacob should not know that God who has been ever a protector and a helper to his forefathers, and after them to himself. For when your father would have deprived you of the position of head of the family, I gave it you, and by my kindness it was, that when you were sent into Mesopotamia all alone, you obtained good wives, and returned home with many children and much wealth. Your whole family also has been preserved by my providence, and it was I who conducted Joseph your son, whom you gave up for lost, to the enjoyment of great prosperity. I also made him lord of Egypt, with power little inferior to that of the king. And I now come to guide you on this journey, and to foretell to you that you shall die in the arms of Joseph; and I inform you, that your posterity shall be many ages in power and glory, and that I will settle them in the land which I have promised them."

§ 4. Encouraged by this dream, Jacob went on more cheerfully for Egypt, with his sons, and their children. They were in all seventy persons. I once indeed thought it best not to set down their names, especially because of their difficult pronunciation [by the Greeks], but upon the whole, I think it necessary to mention their names, that I may disprove such as believe that we came not originally out of Mesopotamia, but are Egyptians. Now Jacob had twelve sons; of these Joseph had already gone into Egypt. I will therefore set down the names of those that followed him, and their children. Reuben had four sons, Anoch, Phallu, Assaron, Charmi. Symeon had six, Jamuel, Jamin, Jaod, Jachin, Soar, Saul. Levi had three sons, Gersom, Caath, Merari. Judah had three sons, Sala, Phares, Zarah; and by Phares two grandchildren, Esrom and Amur. Issachar had four sons, Thola, Phua, Jasub, Samaron. Zabulon had with him three sons, Sarad, Elon, Jalel. All these are the posterity of Leah, with whom also went her daughter Dinah. These are thirty-three. Rachel had two sons, one of whom, Joseph, had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim. The other, Benjamin, had ten sons, Bolosor, Bacchar, Asabel, Geras, Naaman, Jes, Ros, Momphis, Optais, Arad. These fourteen added to the thirty-three before mentioned amount to forty-seven in number. And this was the legitimate posterity of Jacob. He had besides by Bilhah, the handmaid of Rachel, Dan and Naphtali, which last had four sons, that followed him, Jesel, Guni, Issares, and Sellim. Dan had an only-begotten son, Usi. If these be added to those before mentioned, they complete the number fifty-four. Gad and Aser were the sons of Zilpah, who was the handmaid of Leah. These had with them, Gad seven, Saphoniah, Augis, Sunis, Azabon, Aerin, Eroed, Ariel; Aser had a daughter Sarah, and six sons, whose names were Jomne, Isus, Isui, Baris, Abar, and Melchiel. If we add these, which are sixteen, to the fifty-four, the fore-mentioned number (seventy) is made up, Jacob himself not being included in it.

§ 5. When Joseph heard that his father was coming, for Judah his brother went on before, and informed him of his approach, he went to meet him, and they met together at Heroopolis.<sup>1</sup> And Jacob almost fainted away at this unexpected and great joy; however, Joseph revived him, being yet not himself able to help being affected in the same manner by pleasure, yet was he not wholly overcome by his feelings as his father was. After this, he desired Jacob to travel on slowly; but he himself took five of his brothers with him, and hastened on to the king, to tell him that Jacob and his family were come, which was a joyful hearing to him. He also bade Joseph tell him what sort of life his brothers loved to lead, that he might give them leave to follow the same; and he told him they were good shepherds, and had been used to follow no other employment but this alone. Whereby he provided for them, that they should not be separated, but live in the same place, and take care of their father, as also that they might be acceptable to the Egyptians, by doing nothing that would clash with their pursuits, for the Egyptians were prohibited to feed sheep.

§ 6. When Jacob was come to the king, and saluted him, and wished all prosperity to his kingdom, Pharaoh asked him how old he now was? And when he answered that he was an hundred and thirty years old, he admired Jacob on account of the length of his life. And when he added, that still he had not lived so long as his forefathers, he gave him leave to live with his children in Heliopolis;<sup>2</sup> for there the king's shepherds had their pasturage.

§ 7. However, the famine increased among the Egyptians, and this awful distress grew worse for them, because neither did the river irrigate the land, for it did not rise, nor did God send any rain upon it, nor had the people made the least provision for themselves in their ignorance, but Joseph sold them corn for their money. But when their money failed them, they bought corn with their cattle and slaves, and if any of them had a piece of land, they gave up that to purchase them food. So the king became the owner of all their substance; and they were removed some to one place, and some to another, that so the possession of their land might be secured to the king, excepting the lands of the priests, for they continued in their possession. And indeed the sore famine made their minds, as well as their bodies, slaves; and at last compelled them to procure a sufficiency of food by such dishonourable means. But when the famine ceased, and the river overflowed the land, and it brought forth its fruits plentifully, Joseph went to every city, and gathered the people thereof together, and gave them back entirely the land which, by their own consent, the king might have possessed alone, and alone enjoyed its fruits. He also exhorted them to look on it as their own possession, and to till it diligently, and to pay as tribute to the king the fifth part of the fruits for the land which the king restored to them when it was his own. And they rejoiced upon thus becoming unexpectedly owners of their land, and diligently observed what was enjoined them. And by this means Joseph procured for himself greater esteem among the Egyptians, and greater goodwill to the king from them. And this law that they should pay the fifth part of their fruits as tribute, continued until the later kings.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Death of Jacob and Joseph.

§ 1.

NOW when Jacob had lived seventeen years in Egypt, he fell ill, and died in the presence of his sons; but not till he had offered up prayers for their prosperity, and foretold to them prophetically that the posterity of every one of them should dwell in the land of Canaan, as indeed happened many years afterwards. He also enlarged upon the praises of Joseph, because he had not borne malice to his brothers for their treatment of him, but had been even more kind to them, and bestowed upon them such benefits as are seldom paid back even to benefactors. He then commanded his own sons that they should admit Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, into their number, and divide the land of Canaan in common with them: concerning whom I shall speak hereafter. And he requested that he might be buried at Hebron. So he died, when he had lived full an hundred and forty-seven years, having not been behind any of his ancestors in piety towards God; and having such a recompense for it, as it was fit those so good should have. And Joseph, by the king's permission, carried his father's dead body to Hebron, and there buried it at great expense. Now his brothers were at first unwilling to return back with him, because they were afraid, now their father was dead, that he would take vengeance on them for their plot against him, since he was now gone for whose sake he had been so gracious to them. But he urged them to fear no harm, and to entertain no suspicion of him. So he brought them back with him, and gave them great possessions, and never left off his good-will to them.

§ 2. Joseph also died when he had lived an hundred and ten years: having been admirable for virtue, and conducting all his affairs by the rules of reason; and having exercised his authority with moderation, which was the cause of his so great felicity among the Egyptians, even though he came from another country, and that in such bad circumstances also as I have already described. At last his brothers died also, after they had lived prosperously in Egypt. Now their posterity and sons some time after carried away their bodies, and buried them at Hebron: but, as for the bones of Joseph, they carried them into the land of Canaan afterwards, when the Hebrews went out of Egypt, for so had Joseph made them promise him upon oath. But what became of each of them, and by what struggles they got possession of the land of Canaan, shall be showed hereafter, when I have first explained why they left Egypt.

CHAP. IX.

§ 1.

NOW it happened that the Egyptians, who were luxurious and lazy as concerned labour, and gave themselves up to other pleasures, and in particular to the love of gain, became very ill-affected towards the Hebrews, from envy at their prosperity: for when they saw how the nation of the Israelites flourished, and were become notable for abundant wealth, which they had acquired by their virtue and natural love of labour, they thought their increase was to their own detriment. And having from length of time forgotten the benefits they had received from Joseph, particularly as the crown had now come into another family, they treated the Israelites very badly, and contrived various ways of afflicting them; for they enjoined them to cut a great number of channels for the river, and to build walls for their cities, and banks to restrain the river, and hinder its waters from inundating the country and becoming a stagnant marsh. They set them also to build pyramids, and wore them out, and forced them to learn all sorts of arts, and to accustom themselves to hard labour. And four hundred years did they spend under these afflictions; for they strove one against the other, the Egyptians desiring to destroy the Israelites by these labours, and the Israelites desiring to rise superior to them.

§ 2. While the affairs of the Hebrews were in this condition, the following reason made the Egyptians more solicitous for the extinction of our nation. One of those sacred scribes, who are very sagacious in foretelling future events truly, told the king, that about this time there would be a child born to the Israelites, who, if he were reared, would bring the Egyptian dominion low, and would raise the Israelites, and would excel all men in virtue, and obtain a glory that would be remembered through all ages. Which thing was so feared by the king, that, at this scribe's suggestion, he commanded that they should cast every male child, who was born to the Israelites, into the river, and so destroy it, and that the Egyptian midwives should watch the labours of the Hebrew women, and observe their births (for they were enjoined to do the office of midwives to them, as being unlikely from their nationality to transgress the king's commands). He enjoined also, that if any parents should disobey the royal edict, and venture to keep their male children alive, they and their families should be destroyed. This was a severe affliction indeed to those that suffered it, not only as they were deprived of their sons, and being themselves parents were obliged to help in the destruction of their own children, but the intention being to blot out their race, by the destruction of their children, and their own gradual dissolution, made their calamity very hard and inconsolable to them. And this was the misery they were in. But no one can defeat the purpose of God, though he contrive ten thousand subtle devices for that end; for this child, whom the sacred scribe foretold, was brought up, and concealed from the observers appointed by the king; and the scribe was found a true prophet of what should happen through him. The circumstances were as follows.

§ 3. A man whose name was Amram, one of the nobler of the Hebrews, was afraid for the whole nation, lest it should fail, by the dearth of young men to be brought up hereafter; and was very uneasy at it, his wife being then with child, and knew not what to do. Hereupon he betook himself to prayer to God; and entreated him to have compassion on those who had nowise transgressed the laws of his worship, and to afford them deliverance from the miseries they at that time endured, and to render abortive their enemies' hopes of the destruction of their nation. Accordingly God had mercy on him, and was moved by his supplication. He appeared to him in his sleep, and exhorted him not to despair of future favours. He said further, that he did not forget their piety towards him, and would always reward them for it, as he had formerly granted his favour to their forefathers, and made them increase from a few to so great a multitude. He reminded him that, when Abraham was come alone out of Mesopotamia into Canaan, he had been made happy, not only in other respects, but also because, though his wife was at first barren, she was afterwards by him enabled to conceive seed and bear children; and because he left to Ishmael and to his posterity the country of Arabia, and Troglodytis to his sons by Keturah, and Canaan to Isaac. "And it was by my assistance," said he, "that he did great exploits in war, which [unless you be yourselves impious] you must still remember. As for Jacob, he became well known even to strangers, by the greatness of the prosperity which he enjoyed all his life and left to his sons, who came into Egypt with no more than seventy souls, while you are now become over six hundred thousand. Know, therefore, that I shall provide for you all in common what is for your good, and particularly for your own glory. For the child, in dread of whose birth the Egyptians have doomed the Israelitish children to destruction, shall be thine, and he shall be concealed from those who watch to destroy him: and after being brought up in a surprising way, he shall deliver the Hebrew nation from the distress they are under among the Egyptians. His memory shall be famous while the world lasts, and that not only among the Hebrews, but foreigners also. All this shall be the effect of my favour to you and your posterity. His brother also shall be so eminent, that he and his posterity shall have my priesthood to the end of the world."

§ 4. When the vision had informed him of these things, Amram awoke, and told it to Jochebed, who was his wife. And now their fear increased on account of the prediction in Amram's dream; for they were under concern, not only for the child, but on account of the great happiness that was to come to him also. However, the mother's labour was such as afforded a confirmation of what was foretold by God, for it was not known to those that watched her, from the easiness of her pains, and because the throes of her delivery did not fall upon her with violence. And now they nourished the child at home privately for three months; but after that time, Amram, fearing he should be discovered, and, by falling into the king's displeasure, both he and his child should perish, and so he should make the promise of God of none effect, determined rather to trust the safety and care of the child to God, than to depend on his own concealment of him [which he looked upon as a thing uncertain, and whereby both the child so privately to be nourished, and himself, would be always in imminent danger]; for he believed that God would certainly procure the safety of the child, in order to secure the truth of his own predictions. When they had thus determined, they made an ark of papyrus like a cradle, big enough for an infant to be laid in it without being too confined. They then daubed it over with bitumen (which would naturally keep out the water from coming through the papyrus), and put the infant into it, and setting it afloat upon the river, they left its preservation to God. So the river received the child, and carried him along, and Miriam, the child's sister, passed along upon the bank near him, as her mother had bidden her, to see where the ark would be carried. Then did God demonstrate, that human wisdom was nothing, but that whatever he wished to do would have a prosperous end, and that those who for their own security condemn others to destruction, and take great pains over the matter, fail of their purpose, while others are preserved in a surprising manner, and obtain a prosperous condition almost from the very midst of their calamities, when their dangers arise by the appointment of God. And, indeed, such a providence was exercised in the case of this child, as showed the power of God.

§ 5. Thermuthis was the king's daughter. She happened to be diverting herself by the banks of the river, and seeing the ark borne along by the current, she sent some who could swim, and bade them bring the cradle to her. When those that were sent on this errand came to her with the cradle, and she saw the little child in it, she was greatly in love with him on account of his size and beauty: for God took such great care of Moses, that he caused him to be thought worthy of bringing up, and providing for, by those very persons who had made the most fatal decrees on account of their dread of his birth, for the destruction of the rest of the Hebrew nation. Thermuthis bade them bring a woman that might afford her breast to the child; yet would not the child admit of her breast, but turned away from it, and did so to many other women. Now Miriam was by when this happened, not as if on purpose, but only as a spectator, and she said, "It is in vain for you, Princess, to call women who are no way akin to it to suckle the child; but if you will order one of the Hebrew women to be brought, perhaps it will take to the breast of one of its own nation." And as she seemed to speak well, Thermuthis bade her procure such a one, and bring a Hebrew woman that could give suck. And she, having such authority given her, went and fetched her mother, who was known to nobody there. And now the child gladly took to the breast, and seemed to stick close to it; and so at the princess' desire the nursing of the child was entirely intrusted to Jochebed.

§ 6. Then it was that Thermuthis imposed the name 'Moses' upon him, from what had happened when he was put into the river: for the Egyptians call 'water' by the name of 'Mo,' and such as are 'saved out of it,' by the name of 'Uses;' so by putting these two words together, they gave him his name. And he was by the confession of all, according to God's prediction, as well for his greatness of mind, as for his contempt of difficulties, the best of all the Hebrews. And he was the seventh from Abraham, for he was the son of Amram, the son of Caath, the son of Levi, the son of Jacob, the son of Isaac, the son of Abraham. Now Moses' understanding was above his age, nay, far beyond that standard, and when he was taught he showed greater quickness of apprehension than was usual at his age, and his actions at that time promised greater ones when he should become a man. God did also give him such height, when he was but three years old, as was wonderful. And for his beauty, there was nobody so uncouth, as when he saw Moses, did not greatly marvel at his handsomeness. And it happened to many, that met him as he was carried along the road, that they turned back to see the child, and left their work to gaze idly at him. For the beauty of the child was so remarkable and excessive, that it spellbound spectators to gaze on him.

§ 7. Thermuthis therefore, perceiving him to be so remarkable a child, adopted him for her son, having no child of her own. And on one occasion she took Moses to her father and showed him to him, and said she thought to make him her successor, if it should please God she should have no legitimate child of her own, and said to him, "I have brought up a child who is divine in form and noble in mind; and as I received him from the bounty of the river in a wonderful manner, I thought proper to adopt him for my son, and the heir of your kingdom." And when she had said this, she put the infant into her father's hands: so he took him, and hugged him close to his breast: and, to please his daughter, playfully put his diadem upon his head; but Moses threw it down to the ground, after stripping it off in childish mood, and trod upon it with his feet. And this seemed to portend something evil to the kingdom of Egypt. So when the sacred scribe saw this, who had foretold that his birth would be for the humiliation of the Egyptian kingdom, he ran up to kill him, and, crying out in a frightful manner, he said, "O king! this is the child of whom God foretold, that if we kill him we shall be in no danger. He himself affords an attestation to the prediction, by his insulting your government, and treading upon your diadem. Put him therefore out of the way, and deliver the Egyptians from the fear they are in about him; and deprive the Hebrews of the hope they have of reliance on him." But Thermuthis prevented him, and snatched the child away. And the king was reluctant to slay him, God himself, whose providence protected Moses, inclining the king to spare him. He was therefore educated with great care. And the Hebrews were sanguine that great things would be done by him; but the Egyptians were suspicious of what would follow his education. But as there was no plausible pretext for his being killed, either by the king, to whom he was a relation by adoption, or by anyone else, in whom by a knowledge of the future they might have had more confidence, as likely to be of greater advantage to them, they abstained from killing him.

CHAP. X.

§ 1.

MOSES therefore, being born and brought up in the way described, and coming to maturity, made his virtue manifest to the Egyptians; and showed that he was born for their humiliation and to raise the Israelites on the following occasion. The Ethiopians, who are neighbours of the Egyptians, made an inroad into their country, and plundered and carried off the goods of the Egyptians, who, in their rage, marched against them to revenge the insult, but being overcome in battle, some of them were slain, and the rest ran away in a shameful manner, and got home safe. And the Ethiopians followed after them in hot pursuit, and thinking that it would be soft not to subdue all Egypt, they ravaged the country far and wide, and when they had tasted its sweets never left off the prosecution of the war: and as the nearest parts had not courage enough at their first approach to fight with them, they proceeded as far as Memphis<sup>1</sup> and the sea, not one of the cities being able to hold out against them. The Egyptians in this strait betook themselves to their oracles and prophecies; and when God had counselled them to call in the Hebrew to their aid, the king commanded his daughter to produce Moses, that he might be their general. And when she had made the king swear he would do Moses no harm, she delivered him to the king, supposing his assistance would be of great advantage, and reproaching the priests, who, having before urged the Egyptians to kill him as an enemy, were not ashamed now to own their want of his help.

§ 2. So Moses, at the entreaty of Thermuthis and the king, cheerfully undertook the business: and the sacred scribes of both nations were glad; those of the Egyptians, thinking they should overcome their enemies by his valour, and hoping at the same time to kill Moses treacherously,<sup>1</sup> and those of the Hebrews hoping to escape from the Egyptians, since Moses was to be their general. And he was too quick for the enemy, and before they heard of his approach marched against them with his army, not by the river, but by land, where he gave a wonderful proof of his sagacity. For as the ground was difficult to travel over, because of the multitude of serpents (which it produces in vast numbers, and indeed some that other countries do not breed, and such as are remarkable for strength and malignity and unusual appearance, some of which fly so as to come upon men at unawares off the ground and do them a mischief), Moses invented a wonderful stratagem to preserve the army safe and without hurt on its march, for he made baskets like arks of papyrus, and filled them with ibises,<sup>2</sup> and carried them along with the army. Now the ibis is the greatest enemy to serpents, which fly from them when they come near them, and as they fly they get caught and devoured by them, as if by deer. But the ibes are tame creatures, and only enemies to serpents. About them I shall say no more at present, since the Greeks themselves are not unacquainted with the nature of the bird. As soon, then, as Moses was come to the land which breeds these serpents, he let loose the ibes, and by their means repelled the serpents, and used them to clear the ground for his army. Having therefore thus proceeded on his march, he came upon the Ethiopians before they expected him, and joining battle with them, he beat them, and deprived them of the hopes they had of success against the Egyptians, and attacked and overthrew their cities, and indeed made a great slaughter of the Ethiopians. And when the Egyptian army had once tasted success thanks to Moses, they did not slacken their vigour, so that the Ethiopians were in danger of being reduced to slavery, and utter ruin. And at last they were forced into Saba, the royal city<sup>1</sup> of Ethiopia (which Cambyses afterwards called Meroe, after the name of his own sister), and there were besieged. The place was almost impregnable, as it was completely surrounded by the Nile, and two other rivers, the Astapus and Astaboras,<sup>2</sup> made it very difficult for such as attempted to cross over them; for the interior of the city formed an island, being encompassed with a strong wall, and having the rivers as a first line of defence, and great ramparts between the wall and the rivers, so that when the waters rise with the greatest violence they can never overflow it, and these ramparts make it next to impossible for even such as are got over the rivers to take the city. However, while Moses was uneasy at the army's lying idle (for the enemies durst not offer battle), the following circumstance happened: Tharbis, the daughter of the king of the Ethiopians, happened to see Moses as he led the army near the walls, and fought with great courage; and admiring the ingenuity of his undertakings, and supposing him to be the author of the Egyptian success (when they had before despaired of recovering their liberty), and to be the occasion of the great danger the Ethiopians were in, who had before boasted of their great achievements, she fell deeply in love with him. And as her passion increased, she sent to him the most faithful of her servants to propose marriage. He accepted her offer, on condition she would procure the delivering up of the city; and gave her the assurance of an oath to take her to wife, and that when he had once got possession of the city, he would not break his word. No sooner said than done, and when Moses had destroyed the Ethiopians, he gave thanks to God, and celebrated the marriage, and led the Egyptians back to their own land.

CHAP. XI.

§ 1.

NOW the Egyptians, because they had been preserved by Moses, entertained an hatred to him, and were very eager in plotting against him, suspecting that he would, after his success, stir up a revolution in Egypt, and told the king he ought to be slain. The king also had some intention of the same purpose, from envy of his military exploits, and fear of being brought low by him; and, being urged on by the sacred scribes, he was ready to undertake to kill Moses. But he, having learned beforehand what plots there were against him, went away privately; and because the public roads were watched, he took his flight through the desert, where his enemies could not suspect he would travel; and though he was destitute of food, he went on, and despised that difficulty courageously. And when he came to the city of Midian,<sup>1</sup> that lay near the Red Sea, and got its name from one of Abraham's sons by Keturah, he sat upon a certain well, and rested there after his laborious journey and hardships. It was not far from the city; and the time of the day was noon. And there he had an opportunity offered him by the custom of the country, of doing what exhibited his virtue, and afforded him means of bettering his circumstances.

§ 2. For that country having but little water, the shepherds used to occupy the wells before others came, lest their flocks should want water, by its being exhausted by others before they came. Now there were come to this well seven sisters that were virgins, the daughters of Raguel, a priest, and one of great repute among the people of the country. These virgins, who took care of their father's flocks, which sort of work it was customary among women to do in the country of the Troglodytes, came first of all, and drew water out of the well in sufficient quantity for their flocks, into troughs, which were made for the reception of that water. But when the shepherds came up and tried to drive the maidens away, that they might have the water for themselves, Moses, thinking it monstrous to allow the maidens to be so oppressed, and to suffer the violence of the men to prevail over the right of the maidens, drove away those men who had a mind to more than their share, and afforded the necessary help to the women: who, after having received such a benefit from him, went to their father, and told him how they had been affronted by the shepherds, and assisted by a stranger, and entreated that he would not let this generous action be done in vain, nor go without a reward. Now the father took it well of his daughters that they were so desirous to reward their benefactor, and bade them bring Moses into his presence, that he might be rewarded as he deserved. And when Moses came, he told him the testimony his daughters bore to his assistance, and admiring him for his virtue, he said, that Moses had bestowed his assistance on persons not ungrateful, but both able and willing to return his kindness, and even to exceed the measure of his generosity. So he adopted him as his son, and gave him one of his daughters in marriage; and appointed him to be the superintendent and master over his cattle, for of old all the wealth of barbarians was in cattle.

§ 1.

NOW Moses, having obtained such treatment from Jethro, for that was one of the names of Raguel, stayed there, and fed his flock; but some time afterwards grazing his flocks near the mountain called Sinai,<sup>1</sup> he drove them there. Now Sinai is the highest of all the mountains thereabouts, and the best for pasturage, the herbage there being good; and it had not been before fed upon, because of the opinion men had that God dwelt there, the shepherds not daring to ascend up to it. And here it was that a wonderful prodigy happened to Moses: for a fire seized upon a thorn-bush, yet did its green luxuriance continue intact, nor did the fire consume the bush, though the flame was great and fierce. Moses was frightened at this strange sight, but was still more astonished when the fire uttered a voice, and called to him by name, and spoke to him, and told him how bold he had been in venturing to come to a place where no man had ever come before, because the place was divine; and advised him to remove as far as possible from the flame, and to be contented with what he had seen; and though he was himself a good man, and the offspring of great men, not to pry any further. And he foretold to him, that he should have glory and honour among men, by the blessing of God upon him; and commanded him to return with confidence to Egypt, to be the commander and leader of the nation of the Hebrews, and to deliver his kinsmen from the affliction they suffered there: "For," said he, "they shall inhabit that happy land which your forefather Abraham inhabited, and shall have the enjoyment of all sorts of good things; and you by your intelligence shall be their leader there." But he enjoined him, when he had brought the Hebrews out of the land of Egypt, to come to that place, and to offer sacrifices of thanksgiving there. Such was the divine message delivered out of the fire.

§ 2. But Moses was astonished at what he saw, and much more at what he heard; and he said, "I think it would be madness, O Lord, rather than sense, to distrust your power, which I myself worship, and which I know has been manifested to my forefathers, but still I fail to see how I, who am a private man, and of no abilities, should persuade my own countrymen to leave the country they now inhabit, and to follow me to a land whither I should lead them; or, if they should be persuaded, how I can force Pharaoh to permit them to depart, since the Egyptians augment their own wealth and prosperity by the labour and work they put upon them."

§ 3. But God exhorted him to be confident on all points, and promised to be with him, and to assist him in his words, when he was to persuade men, and in his deeds to supply strength. He bade him also take a sign of the truth of what he said, by throwing his rod upon the ground, which, when he had done, it crept along, and became a serpent, and rolled itself round in coils, and reared its head, as ready to retaliate on such as should assault it, after which it became again a rod as it was before. After this, God bade Moses put his right hand into his bosom: he obeyed, and when he took it out it was white and in colour like chalk, but afterwards it returned to its usual colour again. He also, at God's command, took some of the water that was near him, and poured it upon the ground, and saw the colour was that of blood. And Moses marvelling at these signs, God exhorted him to be of good courage, and to be assured that he would be the greatest support to him; and bade him make use of those signs in order to obtain belief among all men, "that you are sent by me, and do all things according to my commands. And I bid you make no delay but haste to Egypt, and travel night and day, and not waste time, so as to make the bondage and sufferings of the Hebrews to last the longer."

§ 4. Moses having now seen and heard these wonders, that assured him of the truth of these promises of God, could no longer disbelieve them: he entreated God to grant him that power when he should be in Egypt; and besought him to vouchsafe to him the knowledge of his name, that since he had heard and seen him, he would also tell him his name, so that when he offered sacrifice, he might invoke him by it. Whereupon God declared to him his name, which had never been discovered to men before, concerning which it is not lawful for me to speak. And these signs accompanied Moses, not then only, but always when he needed them: of all which signs he put most confidence in the fire in the bush, and believing that God would be a gracious supporter to him, he hoped he should be able to deliver his own nation, and to bring ruin on the Egyptians.

CHAP. XIII.

§ 1.

AND Moses, when he heard that the Pharaoh, in whose reign he had fled away, was dead, asked leave of Raguel to go to Egypt to help his own people: and he took with him Zipporah, the daughter of Raguel, whom he had married, and the sons he had by her, Gershom and Eleazar, and made haste into Egypt. Now the former of these names, Gershom, signifies in the Hebrew tongue, 'I have been a stranger in a strange land;' and Eleazar, that, by the 'assistance of the God of his fathers,' he had escaped from the Egyptians. Now when they were near the borders, Aaron his brother, by the command of God, met him, to whom he declared what had happened to him at the mountain, and the commands that God had given him. And as they went forward, the chief men among the Hebrews, having learned that they were coming, met them: to whom Moses declared the signs he had seen; and, as he was not believed, he made them see them. So they took courage at these surprising and unexpected sights, and had a good hope about everything, believing now that God looked after their preservation.

§ 2. Now when Moses found that the Hebrews would be obedient to whatever he should order, as they promised to be, and that they were in love with liberty, he went to the king, who had indeed but lately received the government, and told him how much he had done to help the Egyptians, when they were despised by the Ethiopians, and their country laid waste by them; and how he had been the commander of their forces, and had laboured for them, as if they had been his own people; and he informed him what danger he had been in during that expedition, without having any proper return made to him, as he had deserved. He also informed him of what had happened to him at Mount Sinai, and what God had said to him; and the signs that were done by God, in order to make him put faith in the commands which he had given him, and he exhorted him not to disbelieve what he told him, nor to oppose the will of God.

§ 3. And when the king jeered, Moses made him actually see the signs that were done at Mount Sinai. But the king was very angry with Moses, and called him a bad man, who had formerly run away from his Egyptian slavery, and now came back with deceitful tricks and wonders and magical arts to frighten him. And when he had said this, he commanded the priests to let him see the same wonderful sights, knowing that the Egyptians were skilful in these kind of arts [and that he was not the only person who knew them, and pretended to be divine; as also he told him, that, when he exhibited such wonderful sights before him, he would only be believed by the unlearned]. And when the priests threw down their rods, they too became serpents. But Moses was not daunted at this, and said, "O king, I do not myself despise the wisdom of the Egyptians, but I say that what I do is as much superior to what these do by magic arts and tricks, as divine power exceeds the power of man: and I will prove that what I do is not done by juggling or untrue deception, but by the providence and power of God." And when he had said this, he cast his rod down upon the ground, and commanded it to turn itself into a serpent. It obeyed him, and went all round, and devoured the rods of the Egyptians, which seemed to be dragons, until it had consumed them all; it then returned to its own form, and Moses took it up.

§ 4. However, the king was no more moved, when this was done, than before, but being very angry, he said, that Moses should gain nothing by his cunning and shrewdness against the Egyptians. And he commanded the chief task-master over the Hebrews to give them no relaxation from their labours, but to compel them to submit to greater oppressions than before. For though he allowed them chaff before for making their bricks, he would allow it them no longer, but he made them work hard at brick-making in the daytime, and they had to gather chaff in the night. Now as their labour was thus doubled, they laid the blame upon Moses, because their work and misery were on his account become more severe. But Moses did not let his courage sink for the king's threatenings, nor did he abate his zeal for all the Hebrews' complaints, but he set his soul resolutely against both, and used his own utmost diligence to procure liberty to his countrymen. So he went to the king, and urged him to let the Hebrews go to Mount Sinai, and sacrifice there to God, for he had ordered them so to do, and not to act counter to the designs of God, but to esteem his favour above all things, and to permit them to depart, lest, before he was aware, by laying an obstruction in the way of the divine commands, he should occasion his own suffering such punishments as it was probable anyone that acted counter to the divine commands would undergo, since afflictions arise from everything to those that provoke the divine wrath against them; for such have neither earth nor air for their friends, not does the fruit of the womb come according to nature, but everything is hostile and adverse to them. He said further, that the Egyptians should know this by bitter experience; and that also the Hebrew people should go out of their country without their consent.

CHAP. XIV.

§ 1.

BUT as the king made light of the words of Moses, and paid no regard to them at all, grievous plagues seized the Egyptians; every one of which I will describe, both because no such plagues ever happened to any other nation as the Egyptians now felt, and because I wish to show that Moses did not speak falsely in any one thing that he foretold them, and because it is for the good of mankind, that they may learn this caution, not to act like the Egyptians and do anything that may displease God, lest he be provoked to wrath, and avenge their iniquities upon them. The Egyptian river ran with blood at the command of God, insomuch that it could not be drunk, and they had no other spring of water, and the water was not only of the colour of blood, but it brought upon those that ventured to drink it pain and bitter torment. Such was the river to the Egyptians: but it was sweet and fit for drinking to the Hebrews, and no way different from its natural condition. As the king therefore knew not what to do in these surprising circumstances, and was in fear for the Egyptians, he gave the Hebrews leave to go away; but when the plague ceased, he changed his mind again, and would not suffer their departure.

§ 2. But when God saw that he was ungrateful, and upon the ceasing of calamity would not grow wiser, he sent another plague upon the Egyptians: an innumerable multitude of frogs devastated their land, the river was also full of them, insomuch, that those who drew water found it spoiled by the blood of these animals, as they died in and were drowned in the water; and the country was full of filthy slime, as they were born and died; they also disturbed all their household arrangements, being found among what they ate, and what they drank, and swarming upon their beds. There was also a strong and unpleasant odour from them as they died in their houses. And as the Egyptians suffered grievously from this plague, the king ordered Moses to take the Hebrews with him, and be gone. Upon which the whole multitude of the frogs vanished away, and both the land and river returned to their usual condition. But as soon as Pharaoh saw the land freed from this plague, he forgot the cause of it and retained the Hebrews; and, as though he had a mind to try the nature of more such judgments, he would not yet suffer Moses and his people to depart, having made his concession rather out of fear than from prudence.

§ 3. Accordingly, God punished his falseness with another additional plague. There broke out in the bodies of the Egyptians an innumerable quantity of lice, by which these miserable wretches miserably perished, being unable to destroy the vermin either with washes or with ointments. At which terrible plague the king of Egypt was troubled, fearing that his people would be destroyed, and considering that the manner of death was also shameful, so that he was forced in part to recover from<sup>1</sup> his folly to a sound mind, for he gave leave for the Hebrews themselves to depart. But when the plague thereupon ceased, he demanded that they should leave their children and wives behind them, as pledges of their return, whereby he provoked God to greater anger, thinking to impose on his providence, and as if it were only Moses, and not God, who punished Egypt for the sake of the Hebrews; for he filled that country full of various kinds of pestilential creatures, such as had never been seen by men before, by whom the men themselves perished, and the land was destitute of husbandmen for its cultivation: and if anything escaped destruction by them, it was killed by a distemper, which the men suffered from also.

§ 4. But when Pharaoh did not even then yield to the will of God, but though he gave leave to the husbands to take their wives with them, insisted that the children should be left behind, God presently resolved to punish his wickedness with various plagues greater than those prevalent before; for their bodies had terrible boils, breaking forth with blains, which consumed their inward parts, and a great many Egyptians perished in this manner. But when the king was not brought to reason by this plague, hail such as the climate of Egypt had never suffered from before, like that which falls in other climates in winter-time, and larger than that which falls in the middle of spring in the northern and north-western regions, came down and destroyed all their crops. After this, a swarm of locusts devoured the seed which was not hurt by the hail, so that to the Egyptians their hopes of crops were entirely lost.

§ 5. The forementioned calamities would have been sufficient for one that was only foolish, without wickedness, to make him wise and sensible of what was for his advantage. But Pharaoh, not so much in folly as in wickedness, even though he knew the cause of his troubles, still contested with God, and wilfully deserted the better course. So he bade Moses take the Hebrews away with their wives and children, but leave their cattle behind, since the Egyptian cattle were destroyed. But when Moses said, that what he desired was unjust, since they were obliged to offer sacrifices to God of those cattle; and as time was wasted over this argument, a thick darkness, without the least light, spread itself over the Egyptians, whereby their sight being obstructed, and their breathing hindered by the thickness of the air, they died miserably, and in terror lest they should be swallowed up by the dark cloud. After that, when the darkness, after three days and as many nights, was dissipated, and yet Pharaoh did not repent and let the Hebrews go, Moses came to him, and said: "How long will you be disobedient to the command of God? for he enjoins you to let the Hebrews go; nor is there any other way of your all being freed from these plagues unless you do so." But the king was angry at what he said, and threatened to cut off his head, if he came any more to trouble him about these matters. Thereupon Moses said, he would not speak to him any more about them, but that the king himself, together with the principal Egyptians, would beseech the Hebrews to go away. So when Moses had said this, he went his way.

§ 6. But God, signifying that with one more plague he would compel the Egyptians to let the Hebrews go, commanded Moses to tell the people to make ready a sacrifice, and to prepare themselves on the tenth day of the month Xanthicus against the fourteenth (the month is called by the Egyptians Pharmuthi, and by the Hebrews Nisan, but the Macedonians call it Xanthicus), and ordered him to lead away the Hebrews with all they had. Accordingly, having got the Hebrews ready for their departure, and having divided the people into tribes, he kept them together in one place. And when the fourteenth day was come, and all were ready to depart, they offered sacrifice, and purified their houses with the blood, using bunches of hyssop for that purpose; and when they had supped, they burnt the remainder of the flesh, as just ready to depart. Whence it is, that we do still offer this sacrifice in like manner to this day, and call this festival Pascha, which signifies passover, because on that night God passed us over, and sent the plague upon the Egyptians; for the destruction of the first-born came upon the Egyptians that night, so that many of the Egyptians, who lived near the king's palace, came and advised Pharaoh to let the Hebrews go. Accordingly he called for Moses, and bade them be off, supposing, if once the Hebrews were gone out of the country, that Egypt would be freed from its miseries. They also honoured the Hebrews with gifts, some in order to get them to depart quickly, and others on account of their neighbourly friendship to them.

CHAP. XV.

§ 1.

SO the Hebrews went out of Egypt, while the Egyptians wept, and repented that they had treated them so harshly. And they took their journey by Letopolis,<sup>1</sup> a place at that time deserted, but where Babylon<sup>2</sup> was built afterwards, when Cambyses conquered Egypt. And as they journeyed by the shortest route, on the third day they came to a place called Baalzephon<sup>3</sup> near the Red Sea; and as they had no food out of the land, because it was a desert, they ate loaves kneaded with flour, only baked by a gentle heat; and this food they made use of for thirty days; for what they brought out of Egypt would not suffice them any longer time; and that only while they dispensed it to each person, to use so much only as would serve for necessity, but not for satiety. Whence it is, that, in memory of the want we were then in, we keep a feast for eight days, called the feast of unleavened bread. Now the entire multitude of those that went out, including women and children, would not be easy to number, but those that were of an age fit for war were six hundred thousand.

fifteenth day according to the moon, four hundred and thirty years after our forefather Abraham went into Canaan, and two hundred and fifteen years after Jacob removed into Egypt. It was the eightieth year of the age of Moses, and Aaron was three years older. They also carried out the bones of Joseph with them, as he had charged his sons to do.

§ 3. But the Egyptians repented that the Hebrews were gone, and the king also was very enraged, as if it had come about through the jugglery of Moses, so they resolved to go after them. Accordingly they took their weapons and other stores of war, and pursued after them, in order to bring them back, if once they overtook them, because they could now have no pretence to pray to God, since they had already been permitted to go out; and they thought they would easily overcome them, as they had no armour, and would be weary with their journey. So they made haste in their pursuit, and asked of everyone they met which way they were gone; and indeed it was a difficult land to travel over, not only for armies but for single persons. Now Moses had led the Hebrews this way, that in case the Egyptians should repent of letting them go, and be desirous to pursue after them, they might undergo the punishment of their wickedness, and of the breach of those promises they had made to them. Also on account of the inhabitants of Palestine, who had been hostile to them and hated them of old, he contrived that by all means they might not know of their departure, for their country was next that of Egypt; and so it was that Moses led the people not along the road to the land of Palestine, but was desirous that they should go through the desert, that so, after a long journey and many hardships, they might enter into the land of Canaan. Another reason of this was, that God had commanded him to bring the people to Mount Sinai, that there they might offer him sacrifices. Now when the Egyptians had overtaken the Hebrews, they prepared for battle, and by their multitude drove them into a narrow place, for the number that pursued after them was six hundred chariots, with fifty thousand horse, and two hundred thousand foot. They also blocked up the roads by which they imagined the Hebrews might fly, intercepting them between inaccessible precipices and the sea; for a mountain terminated at the sea, which was impassable from its ruggedness, and so barred their flight; so they hemmed in the Hebrews with their army, where the mountain closed with the sea, planting themselves at this opening, that so they might bar their passage into the plain.

§ 4. The Hebrews then, not being able to undergo as it were a siege, because they wanted provisions, and seeing no means of escape, and if they resolved to fight having no weapons, expected complete destruction, unless they surrendered voluntarily to the Egyptians. And they accused Moses, and forgot all the miracles wrought by God for their freedom, and in their unbelief wished to stone the prophet, who encouraged them and promised them deliverance, and resolved to deliver themselves up to the Egyptians. And there was sorrow and lamentation among the women and children, who had nothing but destruction before their eyes, as they were shut in by mountains, the sea, and their enemies, and saw no means of escape.

§ 5. But Moses, though the multitude looked fiercely at him, did not relax his care of them, but trusted in God, who, as he had done for their liberation all other things which he had foretold them, would not now suffer them to be subdued by their enemies, to be either made slaves of, or to be slain by them. And standing in the midst, he said, "It is not just for us to distrust even men, when they have hitherto well managed our affairs, as if they would not be the same men hereafter: but it is no better than madness for you at this time to despair of the providence of God, by whom all those things have been performed which he promised, when you expected no such things, namely, all that I have had a hand in for your deliverance and escape from slavery. Nay, when we are in the utmost distress, as you see we are, we ought the rather to hope that God will succour us, whose work it is that we are now hemmed in in this narrow place, that he may deliver us out of such difficulties as are otherwise insurmountable, and out of which neither you nor your enemies expect you can be delivered, and may at once demonstrate his own power and providence over us. For God does not give his help in small matters to those whom he favours, but in cases where he sees no hope in men of bettering their condition. Depend, therefore, upon such a protector as is able to make small things great, and to evidence the weakness of this mighty force, and be not affrighted at the Egyptian army, and despair not of safety, because the sea before and the mountains behind afford you no opportunity for fleeing, for even these mountains, if God so please, may be made level ground for you, and the sea become dry land."

CHAP. XVI.

How the Sea was divided asunder for the Hebrews, when they were pursued by the Egyptians, and so gave them an opportunity of escaping from them.

§ 1.

WHEN Moses had said this, he led them on towards the sea, while the Egyptians looked on. For they were within sight, but so tired by their toilsome pursuit, that they thought it best to put off fighting till the next day. But when Moses was come to the sea-shore, he took his rod, and made supplication to God, and called upon him to be their helper and aid, and said, "Thou art not ignorant, O Lord, that it is beyond human strength and human contrivance for us to extricate ourselves from our present condition, but it must be thy work altogether to procure deliverance to our host, which left Egypt at thy command. We despair of any other hope or contrivance, and have recourse only to that hope we have in thee: and if there be any method that can promise us escape from the fury of the Egyptians by thy providence, we look to thee for it. And let it come quickly, and manifest thy power to us, and do thou infuse in the people, who are deeply sunk into a disconsolate state of mind, courage and confidence of deliverance. We are in extremities, but still such as thou hast power over; the sea is thine, the mountain that encloses us is thine; so that it will open if thou commandest it, and the sea also, if thou commandest it, will become dry land. Nay, we might escape by a flight

§ 2. When Moses had thus prayed to God, he smote the sea with his rod, which parted asunder at the stroke, and retiring into itself, left dry ground as a road for the flight of the Hebrews. Now, when Moses saw this manifestation of God, and that the sea went out of its own place and left dry land, he stepped first of all into it, and bade the Hebrews follow him along that divine road, rejoicing at the danger their enemies that followed them were in, and giving thanks to God for so surprising a deliverance vouchsafed to them by him.

§ 3. Now as they loitered not, but went on earnestly, relying on God's presence with them, the Egyptians supposed at first that they were mad, and rushing upon certain destruction. But when they saw that they had gone a great way without any harm, and that no obstacle or difficulty presented itself, they made haste to pursue them, hoping that the sea would be calm for them also. They put their cavalry foremost, and stepped down into the sea. Now the Hebrews, while they were putting on their armour and so lost time, were beforehand with them, and got over to the land on the other side without any hurt. So the Egyptians were encouraged the more to pursue them, expecting no harm would come to them either: but they were not aware that they went into a road made for the Hebrews, and not a common road,—a road made for the deliverance of those in danger, but not for those who were intent on using it for the others' destruction. As soon, therefore, as ever the whole Egyptian army was within it, the sea flowed back again, and came down with a rush agitated by storms of wind, and cut off the Egyptians. Showers of rain also came down from heaven, and dreadful thunders and flashes of lightning. Thunderbolts also were darted upon them. Nor was there anything, wont to be sent upon men by God as indications of his wrath, which did not happen at this time, for a dark and dismal night oppressed them. And thus did all these men perish, so that there was not one man left to be a messenger of this calamity to the rest of the Egyptians.

§ 4. But the Hebrews were not able to contain themselves for joy at their wonderful deliverance, and destruction of their enemies, supposing themselves firmly delivered, as those that would have forced them into slavery were destroyed, and as they found they had God so evidently for their protector. And having escaped the danger they were in in this manner, and moreover seeing their enemies punished in such a way as is never recorded of any other men whatever, they spent all the night in singing of hymns and mirth. Moses also composed a song to God, containing his praises, and a thanksgiving for his favour, in hexameter<sup>1</sup> verse.

§ 5. As for myself, I have delivered every part of this account as I found it in the sacred books. And let no one<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> What that hexameter verse, in which Moses' triumphant song is here said to be written, distinctly means, our present ignorance of the old Hebrew metre or measure will not let us determine. Nor does it appear to me certain, that even Josephus himself had a distinct notion of it, though he speaks of several sorts of that metre or measure, both here and elsewhere, Antiq. iv. 8, § 44, and vii. 12, § 3.—W.

<sup>2</sup> Take here the original passages of the four old authors that still remain, as to the transit of Alexander the Great over the Pamphylian Sea; I mean of Callisthenes, Strabo, Arrian, and Appian. As to Callisthenes, who himself accompanied Alexander in this expedition, Eustathius, in his notes upon the third Iliad of Homer (as Dr. Bernard here informs us), says, that "this Callisthenes wrote, how the Pamphylian Sea did not only open a passage for Alexander, but, rising and elevating its waters, did pay him homage as its king."—Strabo's account is this, Greg. xiv. p. 666. "Now about Phaselis is that narrow passage, by the sea side, through which Alexander led his army. There is a mountain called Climax, which adjoins to the sea of Pamphylia, leaving a narrow passage on the shore, which in calm weather is bare, so as to be passable by travellers, but when the sea overflows, it is covered to a great degree by waves. Now then, the ascent by the mountains being round about and steep, in still weather they make use of the road along the coast. But Alexander fell into the winter season, and, committing himself chiefly to fortune, he marched on before the waves retired, and so it happened that they were a whole day in journeying over it, and were under water up to the navel."—Arrian's account is this, i. pp. 72, 73. "When Alexander removed from Phaselis, he sent some part of his army over the mountains to Perga; which road the Thracians showed him. A difficult way it was, but short. However, he himself conducted those that were with him by the sea-shore. This road is impassable at any other time than when the north wind blows; but if the south wind prevail, there is no passing by the shore. Now at this time, after strong south winds, a north wind blew; and that not without the Divine providence (as both he and they that were with him supposed), and afforded him an easy and quick passage." Appian, when wonder at the strangeness of the narration, if a way of safety through the sea were discovered to those men of old time who were free from wickedness, whether by the will of God, or by chance, since for Alexander, king of Macedonia, and his suite, who lived only the other day, the Pamphylian sea<sup>1</sup> retired and afforded them a passage through itself, when they had no other way to go, when it was the will of God to destroy the monarchy of the Persians. And this is recorded as true by all that have written about the exploits of Alexander. But as to these events let every one think as he pleases.

§ 6. On the next day Moses collected the weapons of the Egyptians, which were brought to the camp of the Hebrews by the current of the sea, and the force of the wind acting upon it, and he conjectured that this also happened by divine providence, so that they might not be destitute of weapons. So, when he had ordered the Hebrews to arm themselves with them, he led them to Mount Sinai, in order to offer sacrifice there to God, and to render thank-offerings for the deliverance of the people, as he had been ordered beforehand.

he compares Cæsar and Alexander together (De Bel. Civil. ii. p. 522), says, "That they both depended on their boldness and fortune, as much as on their skill in war. As an instance of which, Alexander journeyed over a country without water in the heat of summer, to the oracle of [Jupiter] Hammon, and quickly passed over the bay of Pamphylia, when, by Divine Providence, the sea was cut off; thus Providence restraining the sea on his account, as it had sent rain when he travelled over the desert.

N.B. Since, in the days of Josephus, as he assures us, all the more numerous original historians of Alexander gave the account he has here set down, as to the providential going back of the waters of the Pamphylian Sea, when he was going with his army to destroy the Persian monarchy, which the fore-named authors now remaining fully confirm, it is without all just foundation that Josephus is here blamed by some late writers for quoting these ancient authors upon the present occasion. Nor can the reflections of Plutarch, or any other author later than Josephus, be in the least here alleged to contradict him. Josephus went by all the evidence he then had, and that evidence of the most authentic sort also. So that, whatever the moderns may think of the thing itself, there is hence not the least colour for finding fault with Josephus; he would rather have been much to blame had he omitted these quotations.—W.

BOOK III.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF TWO YEARS.—FROM THE EXODUS OUT OF EGYPT, TO THE REJECTION OF THAT GENERATION.

CHAP. I.

How Moses, when he had brought the People out of Egypt, led them to Mount Sinai, but not till they had suffered many Hardships on their Journey.

§ 1.

WHEN the Hebrews had obtained such a wonderful deliverance, the country was a great trouble to them on their journey to Sinai, for it was entirely a desert, and without any sustenance for them, and also had exceeding little water, so that it was not only not at all sufficient for the men, but not enough to feed any of the cattle, for it was parched up, and had no moisture that could give growth to any produce. But they were forced to travel over this country such as it was, as they had no other but this to travel in. They did indeed carry water along with them from the land over which they had just travelled, as their leader had bidden them; but when that was spent, they were obliged to draw water out of wells, with difficulty from the hardness of the soil. Moreover, what water they found was bitter, and not fit for drinking, and that in small quantities only. And as they thus travelled, they came late in the evening to a place called Mar,<sup>1</sup> which had its name from the badness of the water, for Mar denotes bitterness. And they were distressed when they got there, both from the tediousness of their journey, and their want of food, which entirely failed them at that time. Now there was a well there, which made them the more to stay in the place, which, although it was not sufficient to satisfy so great an army, did yet afford them some comfort in such a region, for they heard from those who had been sent to explore that there was nothing to be found if they travelled further. Yet was this water bitter, and not fit for men to drink, and intolerable even to the cattle themselves.

§ 2. When Moses saw how much the people were dispirited, and that the matter was incontestable (for they were not a pure army, who could oppose a manly fortitude to the necessity that distressed them, but the multitude of children and of women, being of too weak capacities to be persuaded by reason, blunted the courage of the men), he was in great anxiety, and had everybody's calamity as his own. For all ran to him and begged of him, the women for their infants, and the men for the women, that he would not neglect them, but would procure some means to save them alive. He therefore betook himself to prayer to God, that he would change the water from its present badness, and make it fit for drinking. And when God had granted him that favour, he took the top of a stick that lay down at his feet, and divided it in the middle, and made an incision lengthways. He then let it down into the well, and persuaded the Hebrews that God had hearkened to his prayers, and had promised to render the water such as they desired it to be, in case they would obey him in what he should enjoin them to do, and that not remissly but with alacrity. And when they asked, what they were to do in order to get the water changed for the better? he bade the strongest men among them that stood round to draw up the water, and told them that when the greatest part was drawn up, the remainder would be fit to drink: so they laboured at it till the water was so agitated and purged by frequent strokes as to be fit to drink.

§ 3. And removing from thence they came to Elim,<sup>1</sup> which looked well at a distance, for there was a grove of palm-trees there, but when they came near, it was evidently a bad place, for the palm-trees were no more than seventy; and they were ill-grown and stunted from want of water, for the country about was all parched, and no moisture sufficient to water them gushed out from the fountains, which were in number twelve; they were rather a few moist places than springs that could jet out their water plentifully. And when they dug in the sand they found no water, and if they did get a few drops into their hands, they found it useless on account of its muddy nature. The trees also were too weak to bear fruit, for want of being sufficiently cherished and refreshed by water. So they laid the blame on their leader, and cried out against him; and said, that their miserable state, and this taste of adversity were owing to him. For they had now journeyed thirty days, and had spent all the provisions they had brought with them, and, finding no fresh ones, were in a very desponding condition. And by fixing their attention upon their present evil plight, they were hindered from remembering what favours they had received from God, and from the virtue and wisdom of Moses also; so they were very angry with their leader, and were fain to stone him as the direct occasion of their present miseries.

§ 4. But as for Moses, though the multitude were excited and bitterly set against him, he cheerfully relied upon God, and upon the consciousness of the care he had taken of his fellow-countrymen, and he came into the midst of them, even while they clamoured against him, and had stones in their hands. He was of an agreeable presence, and very able to persuade the people by his speeches, so he began to mitigate their anger, and exhorted them not to be overmindful of their present necessities, lest they should thereby suffer the benefits that had formerly been bestowed on them to slip out of their memories; and he desired them by no means, on account of their present distress, to cast out of their minds those great and wonderful favours and gifts which they had obtained of God, but to expect deliverance out of their present straits also by the solicitude for them of God, who, it was probable, was making a trial of their virtue to see what fortitude they had, and what memory they retained of his former wonderful works in their favour, and whether they would not think of them in the miseries they now felt. He told them, it appeared they were not really good men, either in patience, or in remembering the benefits done to them, since they so despised God and his commands, by which they had left the land of Egypt, and behaved themselves so ill to him who was the servant of God, and that when he had never deceived them, either in what he had said, or ordered them to do by God's command. He also recapitulated all that had passed: how the Egyptians were destroyed when they attempted to detain them by force contrary to the will of God, and how the very same river was to the Egyptians bloody and not fit for drinking, but to them sweet and fit for drinking; and how they went a new road through the sea, which retired a long way from them, by which very thing they were themselves preserved, but saw their enemies destroyed; and how when they were in want of weapons, God gave them plenty of them; and so he recounted all the particular instances, how when they were apparently just going to be destroyed, God had saved them in a surprising manner, and that he had still the same power, so that they ought not even now to despair of his providence, but to continue quiet, and to consider that help would not come too late, though it came not immediately, if it were present with them before they suffered any great misfortune; that they ought to reason thus, that God delayed to assist them, not because he had no regard to them, but because he would first try their fortitude, and the pleasure they took in freedom, that he might learn whether they had souls great enough to bear want of food and scarcity of water on its account, or whether they were content to be slaves, as cattle were slaves to such as owned them and fed them liberally, but only in order to make them more useful in their service. Finally he said that he should not be so much concerned for his own preservation (for if he should die unjustly he should not reckon it any affliction), but that he was concerned for them, lest, by stoning him, they should be thought to despise God.

was their hope of safety) ; and he desired that he would forgive what necessity had forced the people to do, since it was the nature of mankind to be peevish and querulous in adversity. And God promised he would take care of them, and afford them the succour they were desirous of. And when Moses heard this from God, he came down to the multitude. And when they saw him joyful at the promises he had received from God, they changed their dejection to gladness. And he placed himself in the midst of them, and told them he came to bring them from God a deliverance out of their present distress. And soon after came a vast number of quails (this is a bird more plentiful in the Arabian gulf than anywhere else), flying over the sea, and hovering over them, till, wearied with their flight, and also flying more than other birds very near to the earth, they bore down upon the Hebrews, who caught them, and satisfied their hunger with them, and supposed that this was the method whereby God meant to supply them with food. Upon which Moses returned thanks to God for affording them his assistance so quickly, even sooner than he had promised it.

§ 6. But soon after this first supply of food God sent them a second : for as Moses was lifting up his hands in prayer, a dew fell down : and Moses, when he found it stick to his hands, supposing this also was come for food from God to them, tasted it, and was delighted, and as the people knew not what it was and thought it snowed, and that it was what usually fell at that time of the year, he informed them, that this dew did not fall from heaven as they imagined, but was for their preservation and sustenance. So he tasted it, and gave them some of it, that they might be satisfied of what he told them. They also imitated their leader, and were pleased with the food, for it was like honey in sweetness and pleasant taste, and very similar to bdellium one of the sweet spices, and in size equal to coriander seed. And very earnest they were in gathering it, but they were enjoined to gather it equally, the measure of an omer for each day, that this food should not fail them, and the weaker not be able to get their share, by reason of the overgreediness of the strong in gathering it. However, those who from their extra labour gathered more than the measure appointed for them, had no more than others, for they found no more than an omer a piece. And there was no advantage got by leaving any till the next day, as it got bitter and bred worms. So divine and wonderful a food it was! It also supplied the want of other food to those that fed on it. And even now in all that region it comes down in rain, as Moses then obtained it of God for the people's sustenance. Now the Hebrews call this food manna, for the particule 'man' in our language, asks the question, 'What is this?' So the Hebrews continued to be very joyful at this food sent them from heaven. And they used it for forty years, as long in fact as they were in the wilderness.

§ 7. As soon as they removed thence, they came to Rephidim,<sup>1</sup> being distressed to the last degree by thirst, for while on the preceding days they had lit on a few small fountains, they now found the land entirely destitute of water, and were in an evil case, and again turned their anger against Moses. And he, only just escaping the fury of the multitude, betook himself to prayer to God, beseeching him, that as he had given them food when they were in the greatest want of it, so he would give them drink, since the favour of giving them food was of no value to them while they had nothing to drink. And God did not delay to give it them, but promised Moses that he would procure them a fountain and plenty of water from a place they did not expect to get any from. And he commanded him to smite the rock which they saw lying there, with his rod, and out of it to receive plenty of what they wanted, for he would see that drink should come to them without any labour or pains. When Moses had received this command from God, he came to the people who waited for him, and looked upon him, for they saw already that he was coming fast from the eminence. As soon as he was come, he told them that God would deliver them from their present distress, and had granted them an unexpected deliverance, and told them, that a river should run for their sakes out of the rock. But they were dejected at hearing that, supposing it would be necessary to cut the rock in pieces, now they were worn out by their thirst and journey, when Moses only smote the rock with his rod, and out of it gushed out water in great abundance, and very clear. But they were astonished at this wonderful thing, and, as it were, quenched their thirst at the very sight. And the water was pleasant and sweet to those that drank it, and such as was to be expected where God was the donor. They also admired Moses for being so honoured by God, and gratefully offered sacrifice to God for his providence towards them. And a document deposited in the temple informs us that God foretold to Moses that water should in this manner be elicited from the rock.

CHAP. II.

How the Amalekites, and the neighbouring Nations, made War with the Hebrews, and were beaten, and lost a great Part of their Army.

§ 1.

THE name of the Hebrews began already to be everywhere noised abroad, and rumours about them spread which made the inhabitants of those countries to be in no small fear. Accordingly, they sent envoys to one another, and exhorted one another to defend themselves, and to endeavour to destroy these men. Those that urged them especially to this course were the inhabitants of Gobolitis<sup>1</sup> and Petra, who were called Amalekites, and were the most warlike of the nations that lived thereabout; and their kings sent envoys, and exhorted one another, and their neighbours, to war against the Hebrews; telling them that an army of strangers, who had run away from slavery under the Egyptians, lay in wait for them, "which army it is well for us and safest and most prudent not to disregard, but to crush them before they gather strength, and come to prosperity, and perhaps attack us first, presuming upon our inertia, and we ought to avenge ourselves on them for what they have done in the wilderness, but this cannot be so well done when they have once laid their hands on our cities, and our goods. For those who endeavour to crush a hostile power in its first rise, are wiser than those who endeavour to put a stop to its progress when it is become formidable; for these last seem to be angry only at the flourishing of others, but the former do not give any opportunity for their enemies to become troublesome to them." After they had sent such messages to the neighbouring nations, and to one another, they resolved to attack the Hebrews in battle.

§ 2. These proceedings of the people of those countries occasioned perplexity and trouble to Moses, who expected no such hostile move. And when they offered battle, and the multitude of the Hebrews were obliged to try the fortune of war, they were in great dismay, being in want of all necessaries, and yet having to war with men who were thoroughly well prepared. Then Moses began to encourage them, and to exhort them to have a good heart, and rely on God's good pleasure, by which they had been raised to freedom, and to hope for victory over those who were drawn up in battle array to fight with them, in order to deprive them of that blessing. He told them to suppose their own army to be numerous, wanting nothing, neither weapons, nor money, nor provisions, nor such other conveniences as men in possession of fight with confidence, and to judge themselves to have all these advantages in the divine assistance. He told them also to suppose the enemy's army to be small, unarmed, weak, and such as God, who knew their character, could not wish them to be conquered by. And how valuable God's assistance was, they had experienced on many occasions more terrible than war, for that was only against men, but these were against famine and thirst, things indeed that were insuperable, as also against mountains and sea when they had no way of escape, yet all these difficulties had been conquered by God's favour to them. So he exhorted them to be courageous now, and to look upon their entire prosperity as depending on the conquest of their enemies.

§ 3. With such words did Moses encourage the multitude, and then called together the princes of their tribes, and their chief men, both separately and together. The young men he charged to obey their elders, and the elders to hearken to their leader. So the people were cheered in their minds in regard to their danger, and ready to try their fortune in battle, and hoped to be haply delivered out of all their troubles, nay, they desired that Moses would immediately lead them against their enemies without the least delay, as if delay might cool their courage. Then Moses picked out all that were fit for war, and set Joshua, the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, over them, who was of great courage, and patient to undergo labours, of great intelligence and eloquence, and very conspicuous for his worship of God, and indeed imitated Moses in piety towards God, and was much honoured among the Hebrews. He also set a small party of armed men near the water, to take care of the children and women and the entire camp. So that whole night they got ready for the battle, and repaired their weapons if any of them required it, and attended to their commanders, being ready to rush into battle, as soon as Moses should give the word of command. Moses also passed the night in instructing Joshua how to draw his army up in order of battle. And when the day began to dawn, Moses exhorted Joshua again to approve himself in deeds such a one as his reputation warranted people to expect, and to gain glory in the coming fight among his men by his exploits. He also gave a particular exhortation to the principal men of the Hebrews, and encouraged the whole army as it stood armed before him.—And when he had thus animated the army, both by his words and the disposition of the troops, he retired to a mountain, and committed the army to God and to Joshua.

§ 4. So the armies joined battle, and it was a close fight hand to hand, both sides showing great alacrity and encouraging one another. As long as Moses stretched out his hands towards heaven, the Hebrews were too much for the Amalekites: but Moses not being able to keep his hands so stretched out (and as often as he let down his hands, so often were his own people worsted), he bade his brother Aaron, and Hur, his sister Miriam's husband, to stand on each side of him, and to hold up his hands, and not to permit him to cease giving this aid to the battle through weariness. When this was done, the Hebrews conquered the Amalekites by main force, and indeed they would all have perished, if the approach of night had not obliged the Hebrews to desist from killing. So our forefathers obtained a most signal and most seasonable victory; for they not only overcame those that fought against them, but terrified also the neighbouring nations, and got great and splendid advantage, which they obtained by their strenuous efforts in the battle; for when they had taken the enemy's camp, they got great booty both publicly and individually, whereas before they were short of even necessary food. Their victory in this battle was also the occasion of their prosperity, not only for the present but for the future also: for they not only made slaves of the bodies of their enemies, but subdued their spirit also, and after this slaughter of the Amalekites were feared by all that dwelt round about them. Moreover, they acquired a vast quantity of riches: for a great deal of silver and gold was left in the enemy's camp; as also brazen vessels which they made use of in their families; and there was a notable quantity of embroidery and fine work about the armour and apparel and furniture, and much cattle of various kinds, and whatever else is wont to accompany an army on the march. So the Hebrews now prided themselves upon their courage, and claimed great merit for their valour, and perpetually inured themselves to take pains, by which they deemed everything attainable. Such were the consequences of this battle.

§ 5. On the next day Moses stripped the dead bodies of their enemies, and gathered together the armour of those that had fled, and gave rewards to such as had distinguished themselves in the action, and highly commended Joshua, their general, to whose great prowess testimony was borne by all the army. Nor was any one of the Hebrews slain; but the slain of the enemy's army were too many to be counted up. Then Moses offered sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, and built an altar, which he called God the Conqueror. He also foretold that the Amalekites should be utterly destroyed, and that hereafter none of them should remain, because they fought against the Hebrews, and that when they were in the wilderness and in sore distress. Moreover, he refreshed the army with feasting. And thus did they fight this first battle with those that ventured to oppose them, after they were gone out of Egypt. And, when Moses had celebrated this festival of victory, he permitted the Hebrews to rest for a few days after the fight, and then led them on in order of battle. And they had now many soldiers armed. And by easy marches he got to Mount Sinai three months after the departure from Egypt, at which mountain, as I have before related, the vision of the burning bush, and the other wonderful appearances, had happened.

CHAP. III.

How Moses kindly received his Father-in-law, Jethro, when he came to him to Mount Sinai.

§ 1.

NOW when Raguel, Moses' father-in-law, heard of his success, he came to congratulate him, and greet Moses and Zipporah and their children. And Moses was pleased at the arrival of his father-in-law, and when he had offered sacrifice, he made a feast for the multitude near the burning bush which burnt with fire but was not consumed. And the multitude, every one according to their families, partook of the feast, and Aaron and the company and Raguel sung hymns to God, as to him who had been the author and procurer of their deliverance and freedom. They also praised their leader as the person by whose virtue it was that all things had succeeded so well with them. Raguel also in expressing his thanks to Moses passed great encomiums upon the whole multitude, and extolled Moses for the prowess he had exhibited in bringing about the safety of his friends.

CHAP. IV.

How Raguel suggested to Moses to set the People in Order, under Rulers of Thousands, and Rulers of Hundreds, and how Moses complied in all things with his Father-in-law's Advice.

§ 1.

THE next day, Raguel noticed Moses in the midst of a crowd of business (for he determined the differences of those that referred them to him, every one going to him and supposing that they would only obtain justice if he were the arbitrator; and those that lost their causes, thought it no harm, for they thought they lost them justly, and not by partiality). Raguel, however, said nothing at the time, not wishing to stop any who desired to avail themselves of their leader's sagacity. But when the uproar was over he took Moses aside, and when he had him alone, he instructed him in what he ought to do; and advised him to leave the trouble of lesser matters to others, and himself to see only to the greater, and to the people's safety, for others of the Hebrews could be found that were fit to determine causes, but nobody but a Moses could take care of the safety of so many myriads. "Be not, therefore," he continued, "insensible to your own merit, and to what you have done by ministering under God to the people's preservation. Commit, therefore, the management of disputes to others, and reserve yourself for the service of God only, and for finding means of preserving the multitude from their present distress. If you adopt what I suggest as to human affairs, you will take a careful review of the host, and appoint chosen rulers over tens of thousands, and over thousands, and over five hundreds, and again over hundreds, and over fifties, and let these again be sub-divided into thirties and twenties and tens. And let there be one set over each division, to be nominated by the division. And those whom the whole multitude have approved as good and righteous men, shall decide controversies between man and man. But if any great question arise, let them bring the cognizance of it before the rulers of a higher dignity, and if any difficulty arise that is too hard for even their determination, let them remit it to you. By these means two advantages will be gained, the Hebrews will have justice done them, and you will be able to attend constantly on God, and make him more favourable to the host."

§ 2. This was the suggestion of Raguel; and Moses received his advice very kindly, and acted upon it. Nor did he conceal the invention of this plan, or claim it as his own, but informed the multitude who it was that invented it. Nay, he has named Raguel in the books he wrote, as the person who invented this ordering of the people, thinking it right to bear true testimony to worthy persons, although he might have got reputation by ascribing to himself the inventions of other men. Hence we may learn the integrity of Moses; but about this I shall have occasion to speak in other parts of my work.

CHAP. V.

How Moses ascended up to Mount Sinai, and received Laws from God, and delivered them to the Hebrews.

§ 1.

NOW Moses called the multitude together, and told them that he was going from them to Mount Sinai, to converse with God; to receive from him, and to bring back with him, a certain oracle: and he enjoined them to pitch their tents near the mountain, and prefer vicinity to God to other places. When he had said this, he ascended up to Mount Sinai,<sup>1</sup> which is the highest of all the moun-

<sup>1</sup> Since this mountain Sinai is here said to be the highest of all the mountains that are in that region, it must be that now called St. Katherine's, which is one-third higher than that within a mile of it, now called Sinai, as Mons. Thevenot informs us, Travels, i. 23, p. 168. The other name of it, Horeb, is never used by Josephus; and perhaps was its name among the Egyptians only, whence the Israelites were lately come, as Sinai was its name among the Arabians, Canaanites, and other nations. Accordingly, when (1 Kings ix. 8), the scripture says, that Elijah came to Horeb, the mount of God, Josephus justly tains that are in that region, and is not only very difficult of ascent by men on account of its great height, but because of the sharpness of its precipices also; nay, indeed, it cannot be looked at without fatiguing the eyes; and besides this, it was terrible and unfrequented on account of the rumour that was prevalent that God dwelt there. And the Hebrews removed their tents, as Moses had bidden them, and took possession of the lowest parts of the mountain; and were elated in their minds, from the expectation that Moses would return from God with promises of the good things he intended for them; so they feasted, and waited for their leader, and kept themselves pure in other respects, and abstained from their wives for three days, as he had before ordered them to do. And they prayed to God, that he would favourably receive Moses in his converse with him, and bestow some gift upon them by which they might live well. They also adopted a more sumptuous diet; and put on their wives and children more ornamental clothing than they usually wore.

§ 2. So they passed two days in this feasting, and on the third day, before the sun rose, a cloud spread itself over the whole camp of the Hebrews, such as none had ever before seen, and encompassed the place where they had pitched their tents: and while all the rest of the sky was clear, there came strong winds that raised up large showers of rain, which became a mighty tempest. There was also such lightning as was terrible to those that saw it, and thunder-bolts hurled down declared God's gracious presence and favour to Moses. Now as to these circumstances every one of my readers may think as he pleases, but I am obliged to relate this history, as it is described in the sacred books. What they saw and heard frightened the Hebrews terribly, for it was such as they were not accustomed to; and then the rumour that was prevalent, that God frequented that mountain, greatly awed their minds; so they sorrowfully confined themselves within their tents, supposing that Moses was destroyed by the divine wrath, and expecting the same for themselves.

says, Antiq. viii. 13, § 7, that he came to the mountain called Sinai; and Jerome, here cited by Dr. Hudson, says, that he took this mountain to have two names, Sinai and Choreb. See Nom. Heb. p. 427.—W.

§ 3. As they were under these apprehensions, Moses appeared majestic and in great elation. His appearance freed them from their fear, and suggested better hopes of what was to come. The air also became clear and pure from its former storms on the appearance of Moses. Whereupon he called the people together to a solemn assembly to hear what God would say to them, and when they were gathered together, he stood on high ground where all might hear him, and said, "God has received me graciously, O Hebrews, as on former occasions, and has suggested a happy method of living for you, and an order of polity, and is now present in the camp. I therefore charge you for his sake, and the sake of his works, and for what we have done through him, that you do not put a low value on what I am going to say, only looking at me the speaker, and because it is the tongue of a man that delivers the message. For if you have a due regard to the great importance of the things themselves, you will understand the greatness of him whose institutions they are, and who has not disdained to communicate them to me for our common advantage. For it is not Moses, the son of Amram and Jochebed, but he who obliged the Nile to run bloody for your sakes, and tamed the haughtiness of the Egyptians by various plagues, who provided a way through the sea for us, who contrived a method of sending us food from heaven when we were distressed for want of it, who made water to gush out of a rock when we were in need of it; he by whose means Adam partook of the fruits both of land and sea; he by whose means Noah escaped the deluge; he by whose means our forefather Abraham from a wandering pilgrim became possessor of the land of Canaan; he by whose means Isaac was born of parents who were very old; he by whose means Jacob was adorned with twelve virtuous sons; he by whose means Joseph became lord over the Egyptians; he it is who conveys these instructions to you by me as his interpreter. And let them be to you venerable, and more precious than children and wives. For if you will follow them, you will lead a happy life; you will find the land fruitful, the sea calm, and the fruit of the womb will be plenteous, you will also be terrible to your enemies; for I have been admitted into the presence of God, and been made a hearer of his immortal voice; so great is his concern for your nation, and its preservation.”

§ 4. When he had said this, he brought the people forward with their wives and children, that they might hear God himself speaking to them about what they were to do, that the excellency of what should be spoken might not be hurt by its utterance by the tongue of a man, and so be imperfectly delivered to their understanding. And they all heard a voice that came to all of them from above, inasmuch that not one of the words escaped them, which Moses wrote on two tables; which words it is not lawful for me to set down directly, but I will make their import known.

§ 5. The first word<sup>1</sup> teaches us, that there is but one God, and that we ought to worship him only. The second commands us not to make the image of any living creature to worship it. The third, that we must not swear by God in an insignificant matter. The fourth, that we must keep the seventh day, by resting from all work. The fifth, that we must honour our parents. The sixth, that we must abstain from murder. The seventh, that we must not commit adultery. The eighth, that we must not be guilty of theft. The ninth, that we must not bear false witness. The tenth, that we must not covet any thing that is another's.

§ 6. Now when the multitude heard God himself giving those precepts which Moses had spoken of, they rejoiced at what was said; and the assembly broke up; but on the following days the people came to Moses' tent, and desired him to bring them also laws from God. Accordingly, he appointed such laws; and afterwards informed them how to act in all cases: which laws I shall mention at the proper time; but I shall reserve most of those laws for another work,<sup>2</sup> and make there a separate narration of them.

And he made his ascent in their sight. And as he stayed there a long time (for he was absent from them forty days), fear seized upon the Hebrews, lest Moses should have come to any harm; nor was there anything in all the evils they had experienced that so much troubled them, as this idea that Moses had perished. Now there was a contention about the matter, some saying that he had been slain by wild beasts, and those that were of this opinion were chiefly such as were ill-disposed to him; others saying, that he was departed and gone to God; but the wiser sort were led by their reason to embrace neither of these opinions with any satisfaction, thinking that it was a thing that sometimes happens to men to fall among wild beasts, and perish that way, and that it was probable enough that he might have been translated by God on account of his virtue; so they abstained from conjecture; yet were they exceeding sorry at the idea that they were deprived of a governor and a protector, such a one indeed as they could never get his like again: nor would this idea let them entertain any hope about him, so that they could not help feeling trouble and melancholy upon this occasion. But they durst not remove the camp all this while, because Moses had bid them before to stay there.

§ 8: But when forty days and as many nights had elapsed, Moses came down, having tasted no usual food all that time. His appearance filled the host with gladness, and he declared to them what care God had of them, and by what manner of conduct they might live happily, telling them, that during those days of his absence, God had also suggested to him that he would have a tabernacle made for him, into which he would descend when he visited them, and how they should carry it about with them, when they removed elsewhere, and that there would be no longer any occasion for going up to Mount Sinai, but that God would himself come and visit that tabernacle, and be present at their prayers. Moreover the tabernacle was to be of such proportions and construction as God had showed him, and they were to fall to the work, and prosecute it diligently. When he had said this, he showed them the two tables, with the ten words engraven upon them, five upon each table: and the writing was by the hand of God.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning the Tabernacle which Moses built in the Wilderness for the honour of God, which seemed a sort of Temple.

§ 1.

AND they, rejoicing at what they had seen and heard from their leader, were not wanting in diligence according to their ability; for they brought silver, and gold, and brass, and the best sort of wood, and such as would not rot, goat-skins also and sheep-skins, some of them dyed blue, some scarlet, some purple, and some white, and wool dyed with the same various colours before-mentioned; and fine linen, and precious stones, which those that use costly ornaments fasten and set in gold; they brought also a great quantity of incense. Of such materials did Moses construct the tabernacle, which did not at all differ from a moveable and ambulatory temple. Now when these things were brought together with great diligence, for every one was munificent even beyond his means, Moses set architects over the works, by the command of God, and indeed they were the very same as the people themselves would have chosen, had the election been left to them. Now their names are set down in writing in the sacred books, and they were these, Bezaleel, the son of Uri, of the tribe of Judah, and grandson of Miriam, the sister of their leader, and Aholiab, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan. Now the people went on with the undertaking with so much alacrity, that Moses was obliged to restrain them, by making proclamation, that there were enough volunteers for the work, for so the artificers informed him. So they fell to work upon the building of the tabernacle. Moses informed them, according to the direction of God, both what the proportions and size were to be, and how many vessels it was to contain for use in the sacrifices. The women also were ambitious to do their part in making robes for the priests, and other things that were wanted in the work, both for ornament, and for the divine service itself.

§ 2. Now when all things were prepared, the gold, and the silver, and the brass, and what was woven, Moses, having appointed beforehand that there should be a festival, and that sacrifices should be offered according to every one's ability, reared up the tabernacle. And when he had measured the open court, fifty cubits broad and an hundred long, he set up brazen pillars five cubits high, twenty on each of the longer sides, and ten pillars for the broad side behind; every one of the pillars also had a ring. The capitals of the pillars were of silver, but their bases were of gold, and resembled the sharp ends of spears, but were of brass where they were fixed in the ground. Cords were also put through the rings, and were tied at their farther ends to brass nails of a cubit long, which at every pillar were driven into the floor, and would keep the tabernacle from being shaken by violent winds. And a curtain of fine soft linen went round all the pillars, and hung down in a flowing and loose manner from the capitals to the base, and enclosed the whole space between, and seemed not at all unlike a wall about it. And this was the structure of three of the sides of the enclosure. But as for the fourth side, which was fifty cubits in extent, and was the front of the whole, twenty cubits were left for gates, wherein stood two pillars on each side like a vestibule, they were brass faced with silver, except the bases, which were entirely brass. And on each side of the vestibule there stood three pillars, which were firmly fixed in the supports of the gates, and round them was drawn a curtain of fine linen. But the gates themselves, which were twenty cubits in extent, and five in height, had a curtain of purple, and scarlet and blue, and fine linen, and embroidered with many and divers sorts of figures, excepting the figures of animals. Within these gates was the brazen laver for ablutions (with a base of like material), in which the priests might wash their hands, and pour water over their feet. And this was the construction of the enclosure of the open court of the tabernacle.

§ 3. As to the tabernacle itself, Moses placed it in the middle of the open court, facing the east, that when the sun rose it might send its first rays upon it. Its length was thirty cubits, and its breadth ten cubits. One of its walls faced south, and the other north, and behind was the west. It was necessary that its height should be equal to its breadth. There were also pillars made of wood, twenty on each side; they were wrought in quadrangular form, in breadth a cubit and a half, but in thickness four fingers; they had thin plates of gold affixed to them on all sides, within and without; they had each of them two pivots inserted in their bases, and these were of silver, and in each of the bases there was a socket to receive the pivot. And the pillars on the west wall were six. Now all these pivots and sockets exactly fitted into one another, so that the joints were invisible, and there seemed to be one entire and united wall. It was also covered with gold, both within and without. The number of pillars was equal on each side, as there were on each twenty, and every one of them was the third part of a span in thickness: so that thirty cubits were made up by them. And as to the wall behind, where the six pillars made up together only nine cubits, they made two other pillars, and cut them out, of one cubit, which they placed in the corners, and adorned them equally as the larger ones. And every one of the pillars had rings of gold affixed to their fronts outward, as if they had taken root in the pillars, and stood one row over against another round about, through which were inserted bars gilt with gold, each of them five cubits long, and these fastened together the pillars, the head of one bar running into another, as if deftly screwed into one another. And for the wall behind, there was but one row of bars that went through all the pillars, into which row ran the ends of the bars on each side of the longer walls, the male with its female being so fastened in their joints, that they held the whole firmly together. And why all was jointed so fast together, was that the tabernacle might not be shaken, either by wind or by any other thing, but that it might stand secure and immoveable.

§ 4. As for the inside, Moses parted its length into three partitions. At the distance of ten cubits from the innermost part Moses placed four pillars, whose workmanship was similar to that of the rest, and they stood upon similar bases to them, each a little apart. And inside was the 'Most Holy Place;' but the rest of the tabernacle was open to the priests. And these partitions in the tabernacle happened to correspond with the nature of the universe. For the third part within the four pillars, to which the priests were not admitted, was, as it were, heaven, set apart to God: and the space of the twenty cubits was, as it were, sea and land, to which men have access, and so it was open to the priests only. But at the front, where the entrance was, there stood five pillars of gold on bases of brass. And there were hung in the tabernacle veils of fine linen embroidered in purple, and blue, and scarlet colours. The first veil was ten cubits every way, and this they hung over the pillars which parted the temple, and shut off the most holy place, for this veil made it invisible to anyone. Now the whole temple was called 'The Holy Place;' but the part within the four pillars, to which none had access, was called, 'The Holy of Holies.' This veil was very beautiful, and embroidered with all sorts of flowers which the earth produces, and there was worked on it everything that might be an ornament, excepting the forms of animals. Another veil covered the five pillars that were at the entrance, like the former in size and texture and colour, and at the corner of every pillar a ring fastened it back half-way down the pillar, so as to give entrance for the priests who crept under it. Over this there was a veil of linen of the same size, that could be drawn this way or that by cords, and rings, attached both to the veil and to the cords, allowed either of its being spread or drawn back at the corner, that it might be no hindrance to the view, especially on solemn days; but on other days, and especially when the weather was inclined to snow, it was drawn close, and afforded a covering to the veil of divers colours. Hence the custom continued even after the temple had been built, of having a similar linen veil drawn over the entrances. And ten other curtains four cubits in breadth, and twenty-eight in length, had golden clasps to join the one curtain to the other, which was done so exactly that they seemed to be one entire curtain; these were spread over the temple, and covered all the top, and parts of the walls on the sides and behind, one cubit from the ground. There were other curtains of the same breadth as these, but one more in number, and longer, for they were thirty cubits long, and were woven of hair, with as fine workmanship as those of wool were made, and were extended loosely down to the ground, appearing like a gable and porch at the gates, the eleventh curtain being used for this purpose. There were also other curtains made of skins above these, which afforded covering and protection to those that were woven, both in hot weather and when it rained. And great was the surprise of those who viewed these curtains at a distance, for they seemed not at all to differ from the colours of the sky. And those that were made of hair, and of skins, reached down in the same manner as did the veil at the gates, and kept off the heat of the sun, and the violence of rain. After this manner was the tabernacle reared.

§ 5. There was also an ark made to God, of wood that was naturally strong, and would not rot; this was called Eron in our language. Its construction was as follows. Its length was five spans, but its breadth and height were each three spans. It was covered all over with gold both within and without, so that the wood was not seen. It had also a cover fastened to it by golden hinges, in a wonderful manner, for it was every way evenly fitted to it, and had no projections to hinder its exactly fitting. There were also two golden rings attached to each of the long sides of the ark, passing through the entire wood, and through them gilt bars passed along each side, that it might be moved and carried about by them, as occasion should require; for it was not drawn in a cart by beasts of burden, but borne on the shoulders of the priests. And on its cover were two figures, which the Hebrews call Cherubims; they are flying creatures, but their form is not like that of any of the creatures which men have seen, though Moses said he had seen such beings near the throne of God. In this ark he put the two tables whereon the ten commandments were written, five upon each table, and two and a half upon each side of them: and this ark he placed in the Holy of Holies.

§ 6. And in the holy place he placed a table like those at Delphi, its length was two cubits, and its breadth one cubit, and its height three spans. It had feet also, the lower parts of which were complete feet, resembling those which the Dorians put to their bedsteads, but the upper parts near the table were wrought in a square form. The table had a hollow on every side, having a ledge of four fingers' depth, that went round about like a spiral, both on the upper and lower part of the body of the work. Upon every one of the feet there was also inserted a ring, not far from the cover, through which went bars of wood gilt over, that could be taken out upon occasion, there being a cavity where the table was joined to the rings: for they were not entire rings, but before they came quite round they ended in acute points, one of which was inserted into the prominent part of the table, and the other into the foot; and by these it was carried when they journeyed. Upon this table, which was placed on the north side of the temple, not far from the most holy place, were laid twelve unleavened loaves of bread, six upon each heap, one above another: they were made of two tenth deals of the purest flour, which tenth deal [an omer] is a measure of the Hebrews, containing seven Athenian cotylæ; and above those loaves were put two golden vials full of frankincense. Now after seven days other loaves were brought in their stead, on the day which by us is called the Sabbath; for we call the seventh day the Sabbath. The reason of placing loaves here I shall tell in another place.

§ 7. Over against this table, near the south wall, was set a candlestick of cast gold, hollow within, being of the weight of one hundred minæ, which the Hebrews call cinchares; if it be turned into the Greek language, it denotes a talent. It was made with knops, and lilies, and pomegranates, and bowls (these ornaments amounted to seventy in all); from which it rose on high from a single base, and spread itself into as many branches as there are planets, including the sun among them. It terminated in seven heads, all in order corresponding to one another; and on them were seven lamps, one on each, in imitation of the number of the planets; these lamps faced east and south, the candlestick being placed obliquely.

§ 8. Now between this candlestick and the table inside, as I said before, was the altar of incense, made of the same wood of which the foregoing vessels were made, such as was not liable to rot, but covered over with a golden plate. Its breadth on each side was a cubit, but its height double. Upon it was a grate of gold projecting above, with a golden crown at each corner encompassing it round about, whereto were attached rings and bars, by which the priests carried it when they journeyed. Also before the tabernacle there was reared a brazen altar, but underneath of wood, five cubits in length and breadth, but its height was but three, in like manner adorned with brass plates as bright as gold. It had also a brazen hearth like network, for the ground underneath received the fire from the hearth, because it had no base to receive it. And opposite this altar lay the basons, and the vials, and the censers, and the caldrons made of gold; but the other vessels, made for the use of the sacrifices, were all of brass. And such was the construction of the tabernacle; and these were the vessels thereto belonging.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Vestments of the Priest, and of the High Priest; concerning the Priesthood of Aaron, with the Manner of the purifications and Sacrifices; also concerning the Festivals, and how each Day was ordered; with other Laws.

§ 1.

THERE were vestments appointed for the priests, as well for all the rest whom they call Chanææ, as for the high priest, whom they call Anarabeches, which signifies high priest. The following is the dress of the ordinary priests. When the priest approaches the sacrifices, he first purifies himself with the purification which the law prescribes, and then puts on first what is called Mennachase, which means apron. It is a girdle, composed of fine twined linen, and is put about the privy parts, the feet being to be inserted into them, in the nature of breeches; but about half of it is cut off, and it ends at the thighs, and is there tied fast.

§ 2. Over this he wore a linen coat of fine flax doubled: it is called Chethomene, which denotes linen, for we call linen by the name of Chethon. This coat reaches down to the feet, and sits close to the body; and has sleeves that are tied fast to the arms: it is girded to the breast a little above the armpit, by a girdle four fingers broad, but so loosely woven, that you would think it were the skin of a serpent. It is embroidered with flowers of scarlet, and purple, and blue, and fine linen, but the warp is nothing but fine linen. The beginning of its circumvolution is at the breast; and when it has gone twice round, it is tied, and hangs loosely down to the ancles, that is, all the time the priest is not doing anything, for so it appears most handsome to the spectators; but when he is obliged to assist at the sacrifices, and serve at the altar, that he may not be hindered in his operations by its motion, he throws it on the left shoulder, and wears it so. Moses indeed called this belt Abaneth; but we have learned from the Babylonians to call it Emian, for so it is called by them. This coat has no folds anywhere in it, but only a narrow aperture about the neck; and it is tied with certain strings hanging down from the edge over the breast and back, and is fastened above each shoulder: it is called Massabazanes.

§ 3. Upon his head the priest wears a cap, not with a conical top, or encircling the whole head, but still covering more than half of it, which is called Masnaempthes; and its make is such, that it seems to be a crown, being a thick band of woven linen; and it is folded round many times and sewed together. Moreover, a piece of fine linen covers the whole cap from the upper part, and reaches down to the forehead, and hides the seams of the band, which would otherwise appear, and not look well, and sticks close to all the upper part of the head, being so firmly fixed, as not to fall off while the priest is busy with the sacrifices. Thus I have shown the dress of the priests generally.

§ 4. The high priest, indeed, is adorned with the same garments that I have described, without abating one; only over these, he puts on a vestment of a blue colour. This also is long, reaching to the feet; in our language it is called Meeir, and is tied round with a girdle, embroidered with the same colour and flowers as the former, with gold woven on it. And at the bottom of it are sewn fringes, in colour like pomegranates, to which are attached golden bells <sup>1</sup> by a beautiful contrivance; so that between two bells hangs a pomegranate, and between two pomegranates a bell. Now this vestment was not composed of two pieces, nor was it sewed together upon the shoulders and the sides, but it was one long vestment, so woven as to have an aperture for the neck; not an oblique one, but open at the breast and back. A border also was sewed over it, lest the aperture should look too unhandsome. There was also an opening where the hands were to come out.

§ 5. Besides these, the high priest put on a third garment, which was called the Ephod, which resembled the Epomis of the Greeks. Its make was after this manner. It was woven to the depth of a cubit, of all kinds of colours, with gold embroidered on, but it left the middle of the breast uncovered; it had sleeves also; nor did it appear to be very different from a coat. And in the empty place of this garment, there was inserted a piece of the bigness of a span, embroidered with gold, and the same colours as the ephod, and called Essenes,<sup>2</sup> which, in the Greek language, signifies the Oracle. This piece exactly filled up the empty space in the ephod. It is united to it by golden rings at every corner, similar rings being attached to the ephod, and a blue riband was made use of to tie them together by those rings; and that the space between the rings might not appear empty, they contrived to fill it up with stitches of blue. There were also two sardonyxes upon the ephod, one at each shoulder, to fasten it in the nature of clasps, having each end running to the sardonyxes of gold, that they might be fastened by them. On these were engraven the names of the sons of Jacob in our own national letters, and our own tongue, six on each stone, and the elder sons' names were on the right shoulder. There were also twelve stones upon the breastplate, extraordinary for size and beauty, ornaments not to be purchased by men, because of their immense value. These stones also were in three rows, four in a row, and were inserted into the breastplate, and set in gold, and so made that they could not fall out. The first three were a sardonyx, a topaz, and an emerald. The second row contained a carbuncle, a jasper, and a sapphire. The first of the third row was a jacinth, the second an amethyst, and the third an agate, being the ninth of the whole number. The first of the fourth row was a chrysolite, the second an onyx, the third a beryl, which was the last of all. Now the names of all the sons of Jacob, whom we esteem the heads of our tribes, were engraven on these stones, each stone having the honour of a name, in the order according to which they were born. And as the rings were too weak of themselves to bear the weight of the stones, they made two other rings of a larger size, at the edge of that part of the breastplate which reached the neck, and inserted into the very texture of it, to receive chains finely wrought, which connected them with golden bands to the tops of the shoulders, whose extremity turned backwards, and went into the ring, on the prominent back part of the ephod; and this was for the security of the breastplate, that it should not fall out of its place. There was also sewed to the breastplate a girdle of the forementioned colours mixed with gold, which, when it had gone once round, was tied again upon the seam, and hung down. There were also golden loops that admitted the fringes at each extremity of the girdle, and included them entirely.

§ 6. The high priest's cap was like that we described before, being made like that of all the other priests; above which there was another one, embroidered in blue, and over it was a triple golden crown, and on its top a cup of gold, which resembled the herb which we call saccharus, but which those Greeks that are skilful in botany call hyoscyamus.<sup>1</sup>

Now in case anyone that has seen this herb is unacquainted with its nature, or knowing its name recognizes not the herb when he sees it, I shall give a description of it. This herb is often above three spans high, and its root is like that of a turnip (for he that should compare it thereto would not be far out), and its leaves are like the leaves of mint. Out of its branches it sends out a calyx, cleaving to the branch, and a coat encompasses it, which it puts off of itself when it is about to produce its fruit. This calyx is of the size of the joint of the little finger, and in shape is like a cup. This I will further describe for the use of those that are unacquainted with it. It resembles the exact half of a sphere, being round at the bottom, and tapering gradually to the top, and wide at the brim, like a pomegranate cut exactly in two. And it has a cover so round that one might say it was turned on the lathe, and has notches projecting above it, which, as I said, grow like a pomegranate, only that they are sharp, and end in nothing but prickles. Now its fruit is contained in this cover of the calyx, which fruit is like the seed of the herb sideritis: it sends out a flower that may seem to resemble the petal of the poppy. Of this was a crown made, as far as from the back of the head to each of the temples: but this ephielis, for so the calyx may be called, did not cover the forehead, for on that was a golden plate, which had the name of God inscribed upon it in sacred characters. And such were the ornaments of the high priest.

§ 7. Now here one may wonder at the ill-will which men bear to us, and which they profess to feel on account of our despising that Deity which they choose to honour. For if anyone do but consider the fabric of the tabernacle, and the garments of the priest, and the vessels which we make use of in the sacred service, he will find that our legislator was a divine man, and that we are unjustly reproached by others; for if anyone will with judgment and without prejudice look upon these things, he will find they were each designed in imitation and representation of the universe. When Moses divided the tabernacle into three parts, and assigned two of them to the priests, as a place accessible and common, he denoted the land and the sea, these being of general access to all; but he set apart the third division for God, because heaven is inaccessible to men. And when he set twelve loaves on the table, he denoted the year divided into so many months. By branching out the candlestick into seventy parts, he hinted at the seventy divisions of the planets; and as to the seven lamps upon the candlestick, they referred to the course of the planets, of which that is the number. The veils, too, which were woven of four materials, represent the four elements; for the linen seems to signify the earth, because flax grows out of the earth, the purple signifies the sea, because that colour is dyed by the blood of fish, the blue is meant to signify the air, and the scarlet will naturally be an indication of fire. Moreover, the vestment of the high priest being made of linen, signifies the earth; the blue denotes the sky, being like lightning in its pomegranates, and resembling thunder in the noise of the bells. And as for the ephod, it showed that God had made the universe of four elements, and as for the gold interwoven on it, I suppose it related to the splendour by which all things are enlightened. He also appointed the breastplate to be placed in the middle of the ephod to resemble the earth, for that has the very middle place in the world. And the girdle, which encompassed the high priest about, signifies the ocean, for that goes round about everything. And the two sardonyxes that were in clasps on the high priest's shoulders indicate to us the sun and moon. And for the twelve stones, whether we understand by them the months, or the twelve signs of what the Greeks call the zodiac, we shall not be mistaken in their meaning. And for the cap, which was of a blue colour, it seems to me to mean heaven; for otherwise the name of God would not have been inscribed upon it. That it was also adorned with a crown, and that of gold also, is because of the splendour with which God is pleased. Let this explanation suffice at present, since the course of my narration will often, and on many occasions, afford me opportunity of enlarging on the virtue of our legislator.

CHAP. VIII.

§ 1.

WHEN what has been described was brought to a conclusion, the votive offerings not having been yet consecrated, God appeared to Moses, and enjoined him to bestow the priesthood upon Aaron his brother, as upon him that best of them all deserved to obtain that honour, on account of his virtue. And when he had gathered the multitude together, he gave them an account of Aaron's virtue, and of his good-will to them, and of the dangers he had undergone for their sakes. And when they had given testimony to him in all respects, and shown their readiness to receive him, Moses said to them, "Israelites, our work is already brought to a conclusion, in a manner most acceptable to God, and according to our abilities. And now, since we must receive God in this tabernacle, we shall first of all stand in need of one that may officiate for us, and may minister in the sacrifices and prayers that are to be put up for us. And, indeed, had the search for such a person been left to me, I should have thought myself worthy of that honour, both because all men are naturally fond of themselves, and because I am conscious to myself that I have taken a great deal of pains for your deliverance; but as it is God himself has determined that Aaron is worthy of this honour, and has chosen him for his priest, as knowing him to be the most righteous person among you. So he is to put on the vestments consecrated to God; he is to have the care of the altars, and to make provision for the sacrifices; and he it is that will put up prayers for you to God, who will readily hear them, not only because he is himself solicitous for your nation, but also because he will receive them as offered by one that he hath himself chosen to this office." The Hebrews were pleased with what was said, and gave their approbation to him whom God had appointed; for Aaron was of all the most deserving of this honour, on account of his family, and gift of prophecy, and his brother's virtue. He had at that time four sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar.

§ 2. Now Moses commanded them to make use of all the surplus contributions to the structure of the tabernacle, in coverings for the tabernacle itself, the candlestick, the altar of incense, and the other vessels, that they might not be at all injured on the road either by rain or dust. And when he had gathered the multitude together again, he ordered that they should offer half a shekel per head. The shekel is a Hebrew coin equal to four Athenian drachmæ. And they readily obeyed what Moses commanded; and the number of those who contributed this money was six hundred and five thousand five hundred and fifty. This money was contributed by free men above twenty years old, but under fifty; and what was collected was spent in the uses of the tabernacle.

§ 3. Moses next purified the tabernacle and the priests. The purification was performed in the following manner. He commanded them to take five hundred shekels of choice myrrh, an equal quantity of cassia, and half the foregoing weight of cinnamon and calamus (this last is a sort of sweet spice), to pound them, and steep them in an hin of oil of olives (an hin is our own country measure, and contains two Athenian choes), then mix them together, and boil them: and prepare them after the art of the unguent makers, and make them into a very sweet-smelling ointment, and afterwards to take it to anoint and purify the priests themselves, and all the tabernacle, as also the incense, of which there were various kinds used in the tabernacle, and such as were of very great price, and were brought to the golden altar of incense; whose nature I do not now describe, lest it should be troublesome to my readers. But incense was to be offered twice a day, both before sun-rise and at sun-set. They were also to keep oil already purified for the lamps: three of which were to give light all day long upon the sacred candlestick before God, and the rest were to be lit at eventide.

§ 4. And now all was finished, Bezalee and Aholiab appeared to be the most skilful of the artificers; for they produced finer work than what others had done before, and were very clever to pick up notions of what people were formerly ignorant of. Of the two Bezaleel was judged to be the best. Now the whole time they were about this work was seven months: which completed the first year since their departure out of Egypt. And at the beginning of the second year in the month Xanthicus, as the Macedonians call it, but the Hebrews call it Nisan, on the new moon, they consecrated the tabernacle, and all its vessels, which I have already described.

§ 5. Now God showed himself pleased with the work of the Hebrews, and did not permit their labours to be in vain by disdain to make use of what they had made, but he came and sojourned with them, and made his abode in the holy house. And thus did he show his presence. The sky was clear, but there was a mist over the tabernacle only, encompassing it, but not with such a very deep and thick cloud as is seen in the winter, nor yet with so thin a one that men could discern anything through it, but there distilled a sweet dew from it such as showed the presence of God to those that desired and believed it.

§ 6. Now when Moses had bestowed such honourable presents on the workmen, as it was fit they who had wrought so well should receive, he offered sacrifices in the open court of the tabernacle, as God commanded him, a bull, a ram, and a kid of the goats for a sin-offering. Now I shall speak of what we do in our sacred worship in my account of the sacrifices; and shall there specify in what cases the law bids us offer a whole burnt-offering, and what it permits us to partake of as food. And when Moses had sprinkled Aaron's vestments and person, and his sons, with the blood of the beasts that were slain, and had purified them with spring water and ointment, they became God's priests. And in this manner did he consecrate them and their vestments for seven days together. The same he did to the tabernacle, and the vessels thereto belonging, both with oil first incensed as I have said, and with the blood of bulls and of rams slain day by day, one according to its kind. And on the eighth day, he appointed a feast for the people, and commanded them to offer sacrifice according to their ability. And they vied with one another, and were ambitious to exceed one another in the sacrifices which they offered, and in doing what they were told.

And as the victims lay upon the altar, a sudden fire was kindled from among them spontaneously, and appeared to the sight like fire from a flash of lightning, and consumed all that was upon the altar.

§ 7. Hereupon an affliction befell Aaron, considered as a man and a father, but was undergone by him with true fortitude; for he had indeed a firmness of soul in accidents, and he thought this calamity came upon him according to God's will. He had four sons, as I said before, and the two elder of them, Nadab and Abihu, did not bring to the altar such incense as Moses had bade them bring, but such as they used to offer formerly, and were burnt to death by fire which nobody could quench, rushing upon them, and burning their faces and breasts. So they died. And Moses bade their father and brothers take up their bodies and carry them out of the camp, and bury them magnificently. And the multitude lamented them, and were deeply affected at their death, which had so unexpectedly befallen them. But Moses entreated their remaining brothers and father not to grieve for them, but to prefer the honour of God to their mourning for them, for Aaron had already put on his sacred garments.

§ 8. So Moses refused all the honour which he saw the multitude ready to bestow upon him, and attended to nothing else but the service of God. He went no more up to Mount Sinai; but he went into the tabernacle, and brought back answers from God to what he asked. His dress also was that of a private man; and in all other respects he behaved himself like one of the common people, and did not wish to appear different from the multitude, except in his evident care of them. He also set down in writing their polity and laws, by obedience whereto they would lead their lives so as to please God, and not offend one another. And all this was dictated to him by God. I shall now relate that polity and those laws.

§ 9. I shall first, however, relate what I before omitted about the dress of the high priest: for Moses left no opportunity for malpractice on the part of the prophets. For if any of them should attempt to abuse the divine authority, he left it to God to be present at his worship when he pleased, and when he pleased to be absent. And he wished this to be known, not to the Hebrews only, but to those foreigners also who chanced to be present. Now as to those stones which I said before the high priest wore on his shoulders, which were sardonyxes (I think it needless to describe their nature, as they are known to everybody); one of them sparkled when God was present at their worship, namely the one that served as a clasp on the right shoulder, bright rays darting out thence, and being seen even by persons at a very great distance, though this was not before natural to the stone. This has appeared a wonderful thing to such as do not cultivate wisdom in contempt of religion. But I will mention what is still more wonderful than this, for God declared beforehand, by those twelve stones which the high priest bore on his breast, and which were inserted into his breastplate, when they should be victorious in battle; for so great a splendour shone forth from them before the army began to march, that all the people were sensible of God's presence for their assistance. So those Greeks, who had a regard for our customs, as they could not possibly contradict this, called the breastplate the oracle. However, the breastplate and sardonyx left off shining two hundred years before I composed this work, God having been displeas'd at the transgression of his laws. Of all this I shall further discourse on a fitter opportunity; but I will now go on with my proposed narration.

§ 10. The tabernacle being now consecrated, and a regular order being settled for the priests, the multitude judg'd that God now dwelt among them, and betook themselves to sacrifices and praise, as being now deliver'd from all expectation of evil, and entertaining hope of better times to come. They offer'd also gifts to God, some common to the whole nation, and others privately tribe by tribe, for the heads of the tribes combin'd together, two by two, and brought a wagon and a yoke of oxen. These amount'd to six, and carried the tabernacle when they journeyed. Besides this, every head of a tribe brought a bowl, and a charger, and a censer, worth ten darics, full of incense. Now the charger and the bowl were of silver: and they weigh'd together two hundred shekels, but the bowl cost no more than seventy shekels; and they were full of fine flour kneaded with oil, such as they used on the altar for the sacrifices. They brought also a young bullock, and a ram, with a lamb of a year old, for a whole burnt-offering, as also a he-goat for a sin-offering. Every one of the heads of the tribes brought also other sacrifices, called peace-offerings, every day two bulls, and five rams, with lambs of a year old, and kids of the goats. These heads of tribes were twelve days in sacrificing, one sacrificing every day. And Moses went up no longer to Mount Sinai, but went into the tabernacle, and learned of God what they were to do, and what laws should be made; which laws were preferable to what had been devised by human understanding, and were firmly observed for all time to come, as being believed to be the gift of God, so that the Hebrews did not transgress any of those laws, either in times of peace tempted by luxury, or in times of war by necessity. But I say no more here concerning them, because I have resolved to compose another work about our laws.

CHAP. IX.

§ 1.

[ WILL now mention some of our laws which belong to purifications and sacrifices, as I am come to this part of my subject. The sacrifices are of two sorts; of these one is offered for private persons, and the other for the people in general; and they are performed in two different ways. In the one case what is slain is burnt, as a whole burnt-offering, whence that name is given to it; but the other is a thank-offering, and is designed for feasting those that sacrifice. I will speak first of the former. Suppose a private man offer a burnt-offering, he must slay either a bull, a lamb, or a kid of the goats, and the two latter in their first year, though he is permitted to sacrifice bulls of a greater age; but all burnt-offerings are to be males. When they are slain, the priests sprinkle the blood round about the altar; then they clean the bodies, and divide them into parts, and salt them with salt, and lay them upon the altar, when the cleft wood is piled up and the fire burning: they next clean the feet of the victims and their entrails carefully, and add to the other parts to be purified by fire, while the priests receive the hides. This is the way of offering a burnt-offering.

§ 2. But those that offer thank-offerings, sacrifice indeed the same animals, but such as are unblemished, and above a year old; they may however take either males or females. They also in sacrificing them sprinkle the altar with their blood: but they lay upon the altar the kidneys and the caul, and all the fat, and the lobe of the liver, together with the rump of the lamb: then giving the breast and the right shoulder to the priests, the offerers feast upon the remainder of the flesh for two days; and what remains over they burn.

§ 3. The sacrifices for sins are offered in the same manner as is the thank-offering. But those who are unable to provide the proper victims, offer two pigeons or turtle-doves; one of which is a burnt-offering to God, the other they give as food to the priests. But I shall treat more fully of the sacrifice of these birds when I come to sacrifices. But if a person fall into sin by ignorance, he offers an ewe lamb, or female kid of the goats, a year old, and the priest sprinkles the blood over the altar, not as before, but at the corners of it. They also bring the kidneys, and the rest of the fat, together with the lobe of the liver, to the altar, while the priests bear away the hides and the flesh, and feast on the victim in the holy place the same day, for the law does not permit them to leave any of it till the next morning. But if anyone sin, and is conscious of it himself, but hath nobody that can prove it against him, he sacrifices a ram, the law enjoining him so to do; the flesh of which the priests eat also in the holy place on the same day. And if the heads of tribes offer sacrifices for their sins, they bring the same victims that private men do, only they so far differ, that they bring for sacrifice a bull or a kid of the goats, both males.

§ 4. Now the law requires, both in private and public sacrifices, that the finest flour be also brought; for a lamb the measure of one tenth deal, for a ram two, and for a bull three. This they consecrate upon the altar: it is kneaded with oil; for oil is also brought by those that sacrifice, for a bull the half of an hin, and for a ram the third part of the same measure, and one quarter of it for a lamb. This hin is an ancient Hebrew measure, and is equivalent to two Athenian choes. They bring the same quantity of wine as they do of oil, and pour the wine round the altar; but if anyone does not offer a victim in sacrifice, but brings fine flour only for a vow, he throws a handful upon the altar as first-fruits, while the priests take the rest for their food, either boiled (for it is kneaded with oil), or made into bread. But whatever it be that a priest himself offers must of necessity be all burnt. And the law forbids us to sacrifice any animal at the same time and place with its dam; and in other cases, till the eighth day after its birth. Other sacrifices are appointed for escaping diseases, or other occasions, in which cakes are eaten with the flesh of the victims, any part of which it is not lawful to leave till the next day, when the priests have taken their share.

CHAP. X.

Concerning the Festivals; and how each Day of such Festival is to be observed.

§ 1.

THE law requires that a lamb of the first year be killed every day, at the public expense, at the beginning and end of the day; but on the seventh day, which is called the Sabbath, they kill two, and sacrifice them in the same manner. And at the new moon, they not only perform the daily sacrifices, and slay two bulls, with seven lambs of the first year, and a ram, and a kid of the goats also, for the expiation of sins; that is, for sins of ignorance.

§ 2. But in the seventh month, which the Macedonians call Hyperberetæus, they make an addition to those already mentioned, and sacrifice a bull, a ram, and seven lambs, and a kid of the goats for sins.

§ 3. On the tenth day of the same lunar month they fast till the evening; and this day they sacrifice a bull, and two rams, and seven lambs, and a kid of the goats for sins. And besides these, they bring two kids of the goats; one of which is sent alive out of the limits of the camp into the wilderness as the scape-goat, and to be an expiation for the sins of the whole multitude; but the other is brought into a place of great cleanness within the limits of the camp, and is there burnt with its skin, without any sort of cleansing. With this goat is burnt a bull, not brought by the people, but by the high priest at his own cost. And when it is slain, he brings its blood into the holy place, together with the blood of the kid of the goats, and sprinkles the ceiling with his finger seven times, as also the floor, and again as often towards the holy place, and about the golden altar; he also at last brings it into the open court, and sprinkles it about the great altar. Besides this, they set the extremities, and the kidneys, and the fat, with the lobe of the liver, upon the altar. The high priest likewise presents a ram to God at his own cost as a burnt-offering.

§ 4. Upon the fifteenth day of the same month, when the season of the year is changing for winter, the law enjoins to pitch tabernacles in every family, to preserve them from the cold of that time of the year; as also that, when they should arrive at their own country, and come to that city, that they should have for their metropolis because of the temple therein to be built, and keep a festival for eight days, and offer burnt-offerings, and sacrifice thank-offerings to God, they should carry in their hands a branch of myrtle and willow, and a bough of the palm-tree, with the addition of the fruit of the persea. And the burnt-offering on the first of those days was to be a sacrifice of thirteen bulls, and fourteen lambs, and two rams, with the addition of a kid of the goats as a sin-offering; and on the following days the same number of lambs and of rams, with one kid of the goats; but one bull less every day, till they amounted to seven only. On the eighth day all work is laid aside, and then, as I said before, they sacrifice to God a calf a ram and seven lambs, with a kid of the goats for a sin-offering. And this is the ritual of the Hebrews, when they pitch their tabernacles.

§ 5. In the month of Xanthicus, which is by us called Nisan, and is the beginning of our year, on the fourteenth day of the lunar month, when the sun is in Aries (for it was in this month that we were delivered from bondage under the Egyptians), the law ordained, that we should every year slay that sacrifice which I before told you we slew when we came out of Egypt, which was called the Passover. And so we celebrate it in companies, leaving nothing of what we sacrifice till the day following. The feast of Unleavened Bread succeeds that of the Passover, and falls on the fifteenth day of the month, and continues seven days, wherein the people feed on unleavened bread; on every one of which days two bulls are killed, and one ram, and seven lambs. Now these lambs are entirely burnt, besides the kid of the goats which is added to all the rest for sins, for a feast for the priests on every one of those days. But on the second day of Unleavened Bread, which is the sixteenth day of the month, they first partake of the fruits of the harvest, for before that day they do not touch them. And as they suppose it right to honour God first, from whom they obtain this plentiful provision, they offer to him the first-fruits of their barley in the following manner: they take a handful of the ears, and dry them, then winnow and get the barley out of the bran ready for grinding, they then bring one tenth deal to the altar to God; and casting one handful of it upon the fire, they leave the rest for the use of the priests. And after this they may publicly or privately reap their harvest. They also, at this feast of first-fruits of the earth, sacrifice a lamb as a burnt-offering to God.

§ 6. When a week of weeks has elapsed after this sacrifice, that is forty-nine days, on the fiftieth day, which is called by the Hebrews Asartha, which signifies Pentecost, they bring to God a loaf, made of two tenth deals of wheat flour with leaven; and for sacrifices they bring two lambs; and when they have presented them to God, they are made ready for supper for the priests; nor is it permitted to leave anything of them till the following day. They also slay three calves for a burnt-offering, and two rams, and fourteen lambs, with two kids of the goats for a sin-offering. Nor is there any one of their festivals in which they do not offer burnt-offerings; they also allow themselves to rest on every one of them. And the law prescribes in all, what they are to sacrifice, and how they are to rest, and which sacrifices they may feast upon.

§ 7. Baked bread also unleavened was supplied at the common cost (as much as twenty-four tenth deals of flour were used in making this bread): two heaps of these loaves were baked the day before the sabbath, and were brought into the holy place on the morning of the sabbath, and set upon the holy table, six on a heap opposite one another (and a golden cup full of frankincense was set on each heap), and there they remained till the next sabbath, and then other loaves were brought in their stead, and those loaves were given to the priests for their food, and the frankincense was burnt in that sacred fire wherein all the burnt-offerings were burnt, and other frankincense was set upon the loaves instead of what was there before. The priest also, at his own cost, offered twice every day one tenth deal of flour mingled with oil, and gently baked; he brought half of it to the fire in the morning, and half at night. I shall give fuller account of these sacrifices hereafter; but I think I have said sufficient for the present concerning them.

CHAP. XI.

§ 1.

MOSES separated the tribe of Levi from the rest of the people, and set them apart to be a holy tribe; and purified them by water from perennial springs, and with such sacrifices as were usually offered to God on such occasions. He delivered to their charge also the tabernacle, and the sacred vessels, and all things which were made for covering the tabernacle, that they might minister under the priests, who had been already consecrated to God.

§ 2. He also determined concerning animals, which of them might be used for food, and which they were to abstain from, as to which I shall say more when occasion calls, adding the reasons why he allowed some of them to be our food, and enjoined us to abstain from others. But he entirely forbade us the use of blood in food, deeming it to contain the life and spirit. He also forbade us to eat the flesh of an animal that died a natural death, as also the caul and fat of goats, and sheep, and bulls.

§ 3. He also ordered, that those who were afflicted with leprosy, or had a gonorrhœa, should not come into the city;<sup>1</sup> and he set apart women, when they had their courses, till the seventh day; after which he looked on them as pure, and permitted them to come in again. The law permits those also who have laid out a corpse to come in after the same manner, when that number of days is over; but if any continued longer than that number of days in a state of pollution, the law ordered him to offer two lambs as a sacrifice, one of which they were to purify by fire, and as for the other, the priests had it for themselves. In the same manner do those sacrifice who have the gonorrhœa. But he that sheds his seed in his sleep, if he bathes in cold water, has the same privilege as those that have lawfully companied with their wives. As for lepers, he suffered them not to come into the city at all, nor to live with any others, as if they were in effect dead persons; but if any one had by prayer to God obtained his recovery from that distemper, and had gained a healthy colour again, such a one returned thanks to God with various sacrifices, concerning which I shall speak hereafter.

§ 4. So one cannot but smile at those who say, that Moses was himself afflicted with leprosy, when he fled out of Egypt, and that he was the leader of those who, on that account, were banished from that country into the land of Canaan; for had this been true, Moses would not have made these laws to his own dishonour, indeed it was more likely he would have opposed them, if others had endeavoured to introduce them, especially as there are lepers in many nations, who are yet held in honour, and are not only free from reproach and exile, but have been great captains of armies, and been intrusted with high offices in their commonwealths, and had the privilege of entering into holy places and temples. And so nothing hindered, but if either Moses himself, or the multitude that was with him, had had such a misfortune in their colour, he might have legislated for their credit and advantage, and have cast no such slur upon them. Accordingly it is plain that it is out of violent prejudice only that they report these things about us. But Moses was pure from any such complaint, and lived with countrymen who were pure from it also, and only legislated for those who had it, doing this for the honour of God. But as to these matters, let every one consider them as he pleases.

§ 5. As to women, when they had had a child, Moses forbade them to come into the temple, or touch the sacrifices, before forty days had elapsed if it were a boy, but if a girl, not till twice that number of days had elapsed. And after the time appointed they perform their sacrifices, which the priests offer to God.

§ 6. And if anyone suspect that his wife has been guilty of adultery, he brings a tenth deal of barley-flour, they throw one handful to God, and give the rest of it to the priests for food. One of the priests sets the woman at the gates facing the temple, and takes the veil from her head, and writes the name of God on parchment, and orders her to swear that she has not at all wronged her husband; and to pray that if she had violated her marriage vow, her right thigh might be put out of joint, and her belly swell, and that she might die so, but if her husband, by the violence of his love, and consequent jealousy, had been rashly moved to this suspicion, that she might bear a male child in the tenth month. Now when these oaths were over, the priest rubbed the name of God out of the parchment, and pressed it into a vial. He also took some dust out of the temple, if any happened to be there, and put a little of it into the vial, and gave it to her to drink. And the woman, if she were unjustly accused, conceived and in due time had a child, but if she had broken her faith to her husband, and had sworn falsely before God, she died in a shameful manner. her thigh fell off from her, and her belly swelled with a dropsy. And these are the ceremonies about sacrifices, and about the purification thereto belonging, which Moses provided for his countrymen. He also enacted the following laws for them.

CHAP. XII.

§ 1.

AS for adultery, Moses forbade it entirely, esteeming it a happy thing that men should be faithful in wedlock; and that it was profitable both for states and families, that children should be legitimate. The law also forbade a man's lying with his mother, as one of the greatest crimes, and also lying with his father's wife, and with aunts, and sisters, and sons' wives, as all instances of abominable wickedness. He also forbade a man to lie with his wife when she had her courses, or to lie with beasts, or to approve of lying with males, which was to hunt after unlawful pleasure on account of beauty. To those who were guilty of such outrageous lusts he ordained death as the punishment.

§ 2. As for the priests, he prescribed to them a double degree of chastity, for he not only restrained them like others in the matters mentioned above, but also forbade them to marry harlots, or a slave or captive, or such as got their living by keeping taverns or inns; as also a woman parted from her husband on any account whatever. Nay, he did not permit the high priest to marry even the widow of one that was dead, though he allowed that to the priests, but he permitted him only to marry a virgin, and to retain her. So also the high priest is not to come near to one that is dead, although other priests are not prohibited from coming near to their brothers, or parents, or children, when they are dead. Priests were also to be unblemished in all respects. The priest who had any blemish was to have his portion indeed among the priests, but he forbade him to approach the altar, or to enter the temple. He also enjoined them, not only to observe purity in their sacred ministrations, but in their daily life, that it might be unblameable also. And on this account it is, that those who wear the sacerdotal garments are blameless and eminent for their purity and sobriety; nor are they permitted to drink wine so long as they wear those garments.<sup>1</sup> Moreover, they offer victims that are entire and have no defect whatever.

§ 3. And Moses gave them all these precepts which were observed during his own lifetime. But though he lived now in the wilderness, yet did he make provision for their laws when they should have come to the land of Canaan. He gave rest to the land from ploughing and sowing every seventh year, as he had prescribed rest from work every seventh day; and ordered, that what grew then of its own accord out of the earth should belong in common to all that pleased to use it, making no distinction in that respect between their own countrymen and foreigners: and he ordained, that they should do the same after seven times seven years, which are in all fifty years: and that fiftieth year is called by the Hebrews the year of Jubilee, wherein debtors are freed from their debts, and slaves are set at liberty, who became slaves, though they were their own countrymen, by transgressing some of those laws whose punishment was not capital, but punished by slavery. This year also restores the land to its former possessors in the manner following. When the Jubilee is come, which name denotes liberty, he that sold the land, and he that bought it, meet together and make an estimate, on the one hand of the fruits gathered in, and on the other hand of the expenses laid out upon it. If the fruits gathered in come to more than the expenses laid out upon it, he that sold it takes the land again; but if the expenses prove more than the fruits, the present possessor receives of the former owner the difference, and leaves the land to him; and if the fruits received, and the expenses laid out, prove equal to one another, the present possessor relinquishes the land to the former owners. Moses wished the same law to obtain also to those houses which were sold in villages; but he made a different law for such as were sold in a city; for if he that sold it offered the purchaser his money again within a year, the latter was forced to restore it; but if a whole year had elapsed, the purchaser was to enjoy what he had bought. Moses learned this code of laws of God, when the camp lay under Mount Sinai, and delivered it in writing to the Hebrews.

§ 4. Now when this legislation seemed to be well arranged, Moses turned his attention next to reviewing the host with a view to war. So he charged the heads of the tribes, excepting the tribe of Levi, to take an exact account of the number of those that were able to go to war; for as to the Levites they were holy, and free from all burdens. And when the people had been numbered, there were found six hundred thousand that were able to go to war, from twenty to fifty years of age, besides three thousand six hundred and fifty. Instead of Levi, Moses made Manasseh, the son of Joseph, one of the heads of tribes, and Ephraim instead of Joseph. It was indeed a request of Jacob himself to Joseph, that he would give him his sons to be his own by adoption, as I before related.

§ 5. When they set up the tabernacle, they placed it in the middle of their camp, three of the tribes pitching their tents on each side of it, and roads were cut through the midst. There was also a well-appointed market; and everything was there ready for sale in due order; and artificers of all trades had their shops; so the camp resembled nothing so much as a city that sometimes was moveable, and sometimes fixed. The priests were stationed nearest to the tabernacle; then the Levites, who, because their whole multitude was reckoned from thirty days old, were twenty-three thousand eight hundred and eighty males. And during the time that the cloud stood over the tabernacle, they thought proper to stay in the same place, supposing that God's presence was among them; but when that removed, they journeyed on.

§ 6. Moreover, Moses was the inventor of the form of their trumpet, which was made of silver. Its description is this. In length it was little less than a cubit. It was composed of a narrow tube, somewhat thicker than a flute, but with as much breadth as was sufficient for admission of the breath of a man's mouth; it ended in the form of a bell, like common trumpets. It was called in the Hebrew tongue Asosra. Two of these trumpets were made, and one of them was sounded to call the multitude to come together to public assemblies. When one of them sounded, the heads of the tribes were to assemble, and to consult about the affairs properly belonging to them; but when both of them sounded, it was to call the multitude together. Whenever the tabernacle was removed, it was done in the following order: at the first alarm of the trumpet, those whose tents were on the east quarter prepared to remove; when the second signal was given, those that were on the south quarter did the like; in the next place the tabernacle was taken to pieces, and was carried in the midst of six tribes that went before, and six that followed, all the Levites keeping close to the tabernacle; when the third signal was given, those that had their tents towards the west put themselves in motion; and at the fourth signal, those on the north did so likewise. They also made use of these trumpets in their sacred ministrations, when they were bringing the victims to the altar, as well on the sabbaths as on all other days. And now it was that Moses first celebrated the feast called the Passover in the wilderness since the departure from Egypt.

CHAP. XIII.

§ 1.

multitude began again to be mutinous, and to blame Moses for the trials of their wandering life, and because, as he had persuaded them to leave a good land, they had lost that, and instead of the happy state he had promised them, they were still wandering in their present miserable condition, being in want of water, and if the manna should happen to fail, they must then utterly perish. Yet while they generally spoke many and sore things against the man, one of them exhorted them not to be unmindful of Moses, and the great efforts he had made for their common safety, and not to despair of assistance from God. The multitude thereupon became still more unruly, and more mutinous against Moses than before. Thereupon Moses, although he was so disgracefully treated by them, tried to raise them from their despairing condition, and promised that he would procure them a great quantity of flesh meat, and that not for one day only, but for several. This they disbelieved, and when one of them asked, whence he could obtain supply for so many thousands, he replied, "Neither God, nor I, although we are so abused by you, will leave off our care for you, and this shall soon be seen." As soon as he had said this, the whole camp was filled with quails, and they stood round about them, and gathered them in great numbers. However, it was not long before God punished the Hebrews for their insolence and murmuring, for no small number of them died. And the place to this day retains the memory of this destruction, being named Kibroth-hattaavah,<sup>1</sup> which is, the graves of lust.

CHAP. XIV.

How Moses sent some Spies to search out the Land of the Canaanites, and the Largeness of their Cities; and how when those who were sent returned after forty Days, and reported that they should not be a match for them, and extolled the strength of the Canaanites, the multitude were troubled, and fell into despair, and resolved to stone Moses, and to return back again into Egypt, and serve the Egyptians.

§ 1.

WHEN Moses had led the Hebrews from thence to a place called Ravine, which was near the borders of the Canaanites, and a place difficult to stay at, he gathered the multitude together in assembly, and standing in the midst of them, said, "Of the two blessings that God determined to bestow upon us, liberty, and the possession of a fertile country, ye already are partakers of one by the gift of God, and the other you will quickly obtain; for we are now close to the borders of the Canaanites, and nothing can hinder our progress, neither king nor city, nor even all the inhabitants of the country, if they were all gathered together. Let us, therefore, prepare ourselves for the work, for the Canaanites will not resign their land up to us without fighting, but it must be wrested from them by great struggles. Let us then send spies, who may search out the goodness of the land, and what strength it is of. But above all things, let us be of one mind and honour God, who above all is our helper and assister."

§ 2. When Moses had said this, the multitude acquiesced in his proposals, and chose twelve spies of their most eminent men, one out of each tribe, who, passing over all the land of Canaan from the borders of Egypt, went as far as the city Hamath<sup>1</sup> and Mount Lebanon: and having learned the nature of the land and its inhabitants, they came home, having spent forty days in the whole work. They also brought with them of the fruits of the land, and by showing them the excellency of those fruits, and giving an account of the great quantity of the good things the land afforded, they stirred up the multitude to desire war. But then they terrified them again with the great difficulty of the enterprise, for the rivers were so large and deep that they could not be passed over, and the hills were so high, that they could not climb them, and the cities were strong with walls, and solid fortifications round about them. They told them also that they found at Hebron the posterity of the giants. For indeed these spies who had seen the land of Canaan, when they perceived that all their difficulties would be greater there than any they had met with since they came out of Egypt, were dismayed at them themselves, and endeavoured to make the multitude so too.

§ 3. So supposing from what they had heard that it was impossible to get possession of the country, they broke up the assembly, and with their wives and children burst into lamentation, as if God would not assist them in deed, but only promised them fair in word. They also again blamed Moses, and raised a clamour against him and his brother Aaron the high priest. And they passed that night very ill, and in mutinous language against them; and in the morning they ran to the assembly intending to stone Moses and Aaron, and then return to Egypt.

§ 4. But two of the spies, Joshua the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, and Caleb, of the tribe of Judah, being afraid of the consequences, came into the midst of them, and stilled the multitude, and desired them to be of good courage, and neither to condemn God as having held out to them false promises, nor to hearken to those who had dismayed them, by telling them what was not true concerning the Canaanites, but to those that encouraged them to hope for good success and possession of the happiness promised them, for neither the height of mountains, nor the depth of rivers, could hinder men of true courage from attempting them, especially as God espoused their cause and would fight for them. "Let us then go," said they, "against the enemy, without any suspicion of ill success, trusting in God as our champion, and following us who will be your leaders." Thus did these two exhort them, and endeavoured to pacify their rage. Moses and Aaron fell on the ground, and besought God, not for their own safety, but that he would put a stop to the blindness of the people, and would bring their minds to a quiet temper, which were now disordered by the distress of their present position. The cloud also did now appear, and stood over the tabernacle, which declared to them the presence of God.

CHAP. XV.

How Moses was displeas'd at their conduct, and foretold, that God was angry, and that they should continue in the Wilderness for forty Years, and should not, during that time, either return to Egypt, or take possession of Canaan.

§ 1.

MOSES now came boldly up to the multitude, and informed them, that God was moved at their abuse of him, and would inflict punishment upon them, not indeed such as they deserved for their sins, but such as parents inflict on their children in correction: for, he said, that when he had entered the tabernacle, and was bewailing with tears the destruction that was coming upon them, God reminded him what things he had done for them, and what benefits they had received from him, and yet how ungrateful they had been to him; that just now they had been induced by the timidity of the spies, to think that their words were truer than his promise to them; and that therefore, though he would not indeed destroy them all, nor utterly exterminate their nation, which he had honoured more than any other part of mankind, yet he would not permit them to take possession of the land of Canaan, nor enjoy its happiness, but would make them wander in the wilderness, and live without any fixed habitation, and without a city, for forty years, as a punishment for this their transgression: but he promised to give that land to their children, and to make them the possessors of those good things, which, by their unguided passions, they had deprived themselves of.

§ 2. When Moses had discoursed thus to them, according to the direction of God, the multitude grieved and mourned, and entreated Moses to procure their reconciliation to God, and to permit them no longer to wander in the wilderness, but to bestow cities upon them. But he replied, that God would not hear of any such plan, for he was not moved to his determination from any human levity or anger, but had deliberately sentenced them to that punishment. Now we are not to disbelieve that Moses, who was but a single person, pacified so many ten thousands when they were in anger, and converted them to a mildness of temper; for God was with him and helped him in persuading the multitude; and though they had often been disobedient, they were now sensible that such disobedience was disadvantageous to them, and that they thereby fell into calamities.

§ 3. But this man was admirable for his virtue, and powerful in making men credit what he delivered, not only during the time of his natural life, but even still there is no one of the Hebrews who does not act as if Moses were present, and ready to punish him, if he should do anything disorderly; nay, there is no one but is obedient to the laws he ordained, even although they might be able to escape detection. There are also many other indications that his power was more than human. On one occasion there were some who had come from the parts beyond the Euphrates, a journey of four months, through many dangers and at great expense, in honour of our temple: and yet, when they had offered their sacrifices they could not partake of their victims, because Moses had forbidden it in the case of people not accustomed to it, whose ancient rites were different to our own. Some of them did not sacrifice at all, and others left their sacrifices incomplete; nay, many were not able even at all to enter into the temple, but went their way, preferring submission to the laws of Moses to the fulfilling of their own inclinations, even when they had no fear upon them that anybody would convict them, but only out of regard to their own conscience. Thus this legislation, which appeared to come from God, made this man to be esteemed as one above human nature. Nay, further, a little before the beginning of the Jewish War, when Claudius was Emperor of the Romans, and Ismael was our high priest, and when so great a famine was come upon our country,<sup>1</sup> that one tenth deal [of wheat] was sold for four drachmæ; and when no less than seventy cors of flour were brought into the temple at the feast of unleavened bread (these cors are thirty-one Sicilian, but forty-one Athenian, medimni), not one of the priests ventured to eat one crumb of it, even though so great distress was on the land, fearing the law, and that wrath which God ever visits on acts of wickedness, even when secret. So we ought not to wonder at what happened in those days, since even now the writings left by Moses have so great a force, that even those that hate us confess that our polity was founded by God, and that by means of Moses and his virtue; but as to these matters, let every one judge as he thinks fit.

CHAP. I.

*The Fight of the Hebrews with the Canaanites, without the

§ 1.

NOW the life of the Hebrews in the wilderness was so disagreeable and troublesome to them, that it tempted them, although God had forbidden it, to make an attempt upon the Canaanites. For they would not hearken to the words of Moses and be quiet, but supposing they would be able to beat their enemies, even without his approbation, they suspected and accused him of trying to keep them in a distressed condition, that they might always be in need of his assistance. So they were eager to fight with the Canaanites, and said, that God gave them his assistance, not out of regard to Moses, but because he took care of their entire nation, on account of their forefathers, whom he befriended; and also that it was on account of their own virtue that he had formerly procured them their liberty, and would assist them now if they were willing to take pains. They also said, that they were competent of themselves to conquer the Canaanites, even although Moses should wish to alienate God from them, and that it was altogether for their advantage to be their own masters, and not so to rejoice in their deliverance from the outrages they endured under the Egyptians as to suffer the tyranny of Moses over them, and allow themselves to be deluded, and to live according to his will and pleasure, as though God did only foretell what concerns our nation out of kindness to him, as if they were not all the posterity of Abraham, but God made him alone the author of all the knowledge of the future they had, and that they must still learn it from him; that it would be a piece of prudence in them to oppose his arrogant pretences, and to put their trust in God, and to resolve to take possession of the land which he had promised them, and not to give ear to him, who, on this account, under the pretence of divine authority, forbade them so to do. Considering, therefore, the distressed state they were in then, and that in those desert places they might expect things would be still worse with them, they resolved to fight with the Canaanites, making only God their general, and not waiting for any assistance from their legislator.

§ 2. When, therefore, they had come to this resolution, as being best for them, they marched against their enemies; but they were not dismayed either at the attack itself, or at the great multitude that made it, but received them with great courage. Many of the Hebrews were slain, and the remainder of the army, when their line of battle was broken, were pursued and fled in disorder to their camp. This unexpected misfortune made them quite despond, and they expected nothing that was good, inferring that this reverse came from the wrath of God, because they rashly went out to war without his approbation.

§ 3. But when Moses saw how dismayed his countrymen were at this defeat, fearing that the enemies would be elated at their victory, and would attempt to push their advantage still further, he resolved to withdraw the host into the wilderness, to a further distance from the Canaanites; and the multitude giving themselves up again to his authority (for they perceived now that without his foresight their affairs would not be in a good condition), he moved his camp, and went further into the wilderness, intending there to let them rest, and not to permit them to fight the Canaanites before God should appoint a time for so doing.

CHAP. II.

§ 1.

THAT which is usually the case in great armies, and especially after reverses, namely that the discipline is hard to keep up, did now befall the Jews; for they being six hundred thousand, and by reason of their great number not likely to be docile to their officers, even had things gone well, were at this time more than usually angry, both against one another, and against their leader, because of the distress they were in, and the reverse they had had. Such a rebellion broke out among them, as we know not the like either among the Greeks or barbarians, by which they were in danger of being all destroyed, but were saved by Moses, who bore no malice, though he had been almost stoned to death by them. Nor did God neglect to prevent their ruin, but, notwithstanding the shameful way they had treated their legislator, and their disobedience to the commands which he himself had sent them by Moses, he delivered them from those terrible calamities, which, without his providential care, would have come upon them by this rebellion. I shall first relate the cause of this rebellion, and then give an account of it, as also what settlement Moses made after it was over.

§ 2. Corah, one of the chief Hebrews, both from his family and his wealth, a person also that was able to speak well, and could easily sway the people by his speeches, seeing that Moses was held in exceeding great honour, was vexed at it from jealousy (for he was of the same tribe with Moses, and akin to him), and was put out because he thought he better deserved that position [on account of his great riches, and as not inferior to him in birth]. So he raised a clamour against him among the Levites, who were of the same tribe, and especially among his own branch of the family. He said that it was monstrous that they should allow Moses to hunt after and pave the way to glory for himself, and by ill arts to obtain it under the pretence of God's command; seeing that contrary to the laws he had given the priesthood to his brother Aaron, not by the common suffrage of the multitude, but by his own vote, as bestowing dignities in an arbitrary way on whom he pleased. He added that this concealed way of imposing on them was harder to be borne than if it had been done by open force, because he not only took away their power against their will, but even while they were unapprized of his contrivances. For whoever was conscious to himself that he deserved any dignity, aimed to get it by persuasion, and not impudently to seize it; but those that believed it impossible to obtain their honour justly, wishing to appear good, abstained from force, but by cunning tricks and crooked courses got powerful; that it was proper for the multitude to punish such men, even while they thought themselves undetected in their designs, and not to suffer them to gain strength till they had detected them as open enemies. "For what reason," added he, "is Moses able to give why he has bestowed the priesthood on Aaron and his sons? for if God had determined to bestow that honour on one of the tribe of Levi, I am more worthy of it than he is, I myself being equal to Moses by my family, and superior to him both in riches and age. And if God had determined to bestow it on the eldest tribe, that of Reuben would have it most justly, and then Dathan and Abiram and Peleth would have it, for they are the oldest men of that tribe, and powerful on account of their great wealth also."

§ 3. Now Corah in saying this wished to appear to be looking after the public welfare, but was in reality trying to get that dignity transferred by the multitude to himself. Thus did he speak to the men of his own tribe, with malignant design, but plausible words, and as these words gradually spread to more of the people, and as the hearers still added to the calumnies cast upon Aaron, the whole host was full of them. Now of those that conspired with Corah there were two hundred and fifty of the principal men, who were eager to take the priesthood away from Moses' brother, and to bring him into disgrace. And the multitude themselves were in a ferment, and attempted to stouè Moses; and gathered themselves together in the assembly with noise and confusion and disorder. And now they stood before the tabernacle of God, and cried out to remove the tyrant, and to relieve the multitude from their slavery under him, who, under colour of the divine commands, laid violent injunctions upon them; for had it been God who chose one to perform the office of priest, he would have raised a worthy person to that dignity, and would not have given the office to such a one as was inferior to many others, and had he judged it fit to bestow it on Aaron, he would have permitted the choice to the multitude, and not have left it to his own brother.

§ 4. Now, although Moses had long foreseen this jealousy of Corah's, and saw that the people were greatly excited, yet was he not dismayed, but being of good courage, because he had given them right advice about their affairs, and knowing that his brother had got the priesthood at the command of God, and not by his own favour to him, he came to the assembly; and, as for the multitude, he said not a word to them, but spake as loud to Corah as he could; and being very skilful in other respects, and having the natural talent of swaying the multitude, he said, "O Corah, both you and all those with you (pointing to the two hundred and fifty men), seem to be worthy of honour, nor do I seek to deprive any of this whole company of similar honour, though they may not be so rich or so worthy as you are, nor have I taken and given this office to my brother because he excelled in riches, for you exceed us both in the greatness of your wealth, nor indeed because of his family, for God, by giving us the same common ancestor, has made our family one, nor was it out of brotherly affection, which another might yet have thought right. And indeed if I had not bestowed this honour out of regard to God and to his laws, I should not have passed over myself and given it to another, as being nearer akin to myself than to my brother, and having a closer intimacy with myself than I have with him. And surely it would not be wise in me to expose myself to the dangers of acting illegally by bestowing this happy employment on another. But I am above such base practice, nor would God have overlooked being himself thus despised, nor would he have suffered you to be ignorant of what you were to do in order to please him; but he hath himself chosen one to be his priest, and so freed us from that care. Aaron did not owe it to my favour, but to the will of God. He therefore resigns it to the competition of such as please to put in for it, stipulating only that he who has been already preferred, and has already obtained it, may be allowed now also to offer himself for a candidate. He prefers your living without rebellion to this honour, although in truth it was with your approbation that he obtained it; for though God was the donor, yet do we not offend when we think fit to accept of it with your good will. And it would have been an instance of impiety not to have taken that honour when God offered it; nay, it would have been exceedingly unreasonable, when God had thought fit any one should have it for all time to come, and had made it secure and firm to him, to have refused it. However, he himself will judge again whom he will have to offer sacrifices to him, and to have the direction of matters of religion; for it is absurd that Corah, who is ambitious of this honour, should deprive God of the power of giving it to whom he pleases. Put an end, therefore, to your rebellion and disturbance on this account; and to-morrow morning do every one of you that desire the priesthood bring a censor from home, and come hither with incense and fire. And do you, O Corah, leave the judgment to God, and wait to see on which side he will give his vote upon this occasion. and do not make yourself greater than God. Do you also come as a candidate for the office. And I suppose we may also admit Aaron without offence, to offer himself to the vote, since he is of the same family as you. and has done nothing in his priesthood that can be open to censure. Come ye, therefore, together, and offer your incense in public before all the people; and when you offer it, he, whose sacrifice God shall accept, shall be elected high priest, and shall be clear of the present charge brought against Aaron, that he had that favour granted him because he was my brother."

CHAP. III.

How those that stirred up this Rebellion were destroyed by the Will of God: and how Aaron, Moses' Brother, and his Posterity, retained the Priesthood.

§ 1.

WHEN Moses had said this, the multitude left off their turbulent behaviour, and the suspicion they had of Moses, and commended what he had said, for his proposal was good, and seemed so to the people. At that time, therefore, they dissolved the meeting. And on the next day they came to the congregation, in order to be present at the sacrifice, and at the selection that was to be made between the candidates for the priesthood. Now the meeting proved a stormy one, as the multitude were in great suspense in expectation of what would happen, for some of them would have been pleased if Moses had been convicted of wrong-doing, but the wiser sort desired that they might be delivered from the present disorder and disturbance: for they were afraid, that if this rebellion went on, the good order of their body politic would be destroyed. For the mass of the people naturally delighting in clamours against their governors, and changing their opinions after hearing every speaker, disturbed the public tranquillity. And Moses sent messengers to Abiram and Dathan, and ordered them to come to the assembly as had been agreed, and wait for the result of the solemn service. But they answered the messengers, that they would not obey the summons, nay, would not overlook Moses' behaviour, who was growing too great for all the people through intrigue. Now when Moses heard their answer, he desired the heads of the people to follow him, and he went to the company of Dathan, not being afraid at all to go to those insolent people; and they made no opposition, but went along with him. But Dathan and his company, when they understood that Moses and the chiefs of the people were coming to them, came out with their wives and children in front of their tents, and looked to see what Moses would do. They had also their servants about them to defend them, in case Moses should use force.

§ 2. But he came near, and lifted up his hands to heaven, and cried out with a loud voice, in order to be heard by the whole multitude; and said, "O Lord of all that is in heaven, in earth, and sea (for you are the worthiest witness of what I have done, for it has all been done by your command, and you afforded us assistance when we attempted anything, and showed mercy on the Hebrews in all their distresses), come now and hear all that I say, for no action nor thought escapes your knowledge, so that you will not disdain to speak what is true for my vindication, without any regard to the ingratitude of these men. As for what happened before I was born, you know best, not learning it by hearsay, but being an eyewitness of it, and for what has been done of late, which these men, although they know otherwise, unjustly pretend to suspect, be my witness. When I enjoyed a quiet life, I left what by my own diligence and your providence I had got with Raguel my father-in-law, and sacrificed myself for this people, and underwent many miseries on their account. I had great labour at first to obtain liberty for them, and since to provide for their safety, and have always shown alacrity to assist them in every danger. Now, therefore, since I am suspected by those very men, whose preservation is owing to my labours, do you, who showed me that fire at Mount Sinai, and made me hear its voice, and see the several wonders which that place afforded me; you, who commanded me to go to Egypt, and declare your will to this people; you, who disturbed the happiness of the Egyptians, and gave us the opportunity of escaping from our slavery under them, and made the power of Pharaoh inferior to mine; you, who made the sea dry land for us, when we knew not whither to go, and overwhelmed the Egyptians with destruction in those waves which had been driven back for us; you, who bestowed upon us the security of weapons when we were unarmed; you, who made wells that were corrupted to be fit for drinking, and supplied us with water that gushed out of the rocks, when we were in the greatest distress for it; you, who preserved our lives with food from the sea, when the fruits of the ground failed us; you, who sent us such food from heaven as had never been known before; you, who gave us the knowledge of your laws, and appointed our polity; come, I say, Lord of the whole world, as my judge and witness that cannot be bribed, and show that I have never received any gift from any of the Hebrews to pervert justice, and have never condemned a poor man that ought to have been acquitted for one that was rich; and have never used my power to the injury of the community. Yet I am suspected of a thing, the remotest from my practices, of having given the priesthood to Aaron, not at your command, but out of my own favour to him. Prove then now that all things are arranged by your providence, and that nothing happens by chance, but is governed by your will, and so attains its end: as also that you take care of those that have done good to the Hebrews; prove this, I say, by the punishment of Abiram and Dathan, who accuse you of want of perception, as overcome by my contrivance. This you will do by inflicting an open punishment on these men, who so madly fly in the face of your glory, by removing them from the world, not in an ordinary manner, nor by their dying after the manner of other men; let the ground which they tread upon open about them and swallow them up, with their families and goods. This will be a proof of your power to all men, and a lesson of wisdom to those that entertain profane sentiments about you. And

I too shall so be found a faithful carrier-out of your commands. But if the calumnies they have raised against me be true, then preserve these men from every evil, and bring on me all that destruction which I have imprecated upon them. And when you have inflicted punishment on those that have wished to injure this people, bestow upon them concord and peace for the future. Save the multitude that follow your commands, and preserve them free from harm, and let them not partake of the punishment of those that have sinned; for you know yourself it is not just, that for the wickedness of those men, the whole body of the Israelites should suffer punishment."

§ 3. When Moses had said this, with tears in his eyes, the ground began to move all of a sudden, and its motion was like that which the wind produces in the waves of the sea. The people were all dismayed, as the ground that was about their tents sunk down with a great and terrible sound, and swallowed up all that belonged to Dathan and Abiram. And they vanished so quickly that the eye could scarce take it in, for the earth that had opened about them closed again, and became as it was before, insomuch that such who saw it afterwards did not perceive that any such thing had happened to it. Thus did these men perish, and become a proof of the power of God. And truly, anyone would lament them, not only on account of this calamity that befell them, which yet deserves our commiseration, but also because their kindred were pleased with their sufferings; for they forgot the relation they bore to them, and at the sight of this sad accident approved of the judgment given against them; and because they looked upon the company of Dathan that perished as pestilent men, they did not grieve for them.

§ 4. And now Moses called for those who contended about the priesthood, that trial might be made who should be priest, and that he whose sacrifice God accepted should be elected. There attended two hundred and fifty men, who indeed were honoured by the people, not only on account of the virtue of their ancestors, but also on account of their own, in which they excelled them: Aaron also and Corah came forth, and they all offered incense, in the censers which they brought with them, before the tabernacle. Thereupon so great a fire shone out as no one ever saw in any made by the hand of man, nor in those eruptions out of the earth caused by subterraneous burnings, nor in such fires as burst out spontaneously in forests by the violence of winds and by trees rubbing one against another, but this fire was very bright, and had a terrible flame, such as is kindled at the command of God; and by its bursting out on them, all the company, and Corah himself, were destroyed, and that so entirely, that their very bodies left no remains. Aaron alone was preserved, and not at all hurt by the fire, because it was God that sent the fire to burn those only who were to be burned. And Moses, after those men were destroyed, was desirous that the memory of this judgment might be handed down to posterity, and that future ages might be acquainted with it; so he commanded Eleazar, the son of Aaron, to put the censers of Corah and the rest near the brazen altar, that they might be a memorial to posterity of what those men suffered for supposing that the power of God might be eluded. And thus Aaron was now no longer esteemed to have the high priesthood by the favour of Moses, but by the public judgment of God, and he and his children enjoyed the honour securely afterwards.

CHAP. IV.

§ 1.

HOWEVER, the rebellion was so far from ceasing upon this, that it grew much stronger and fiercer. And the occasion of its growing worse was of that nature, as made it likely the calamity would never cease, but last for a long time: for the men believing already that nothing is done without the providence of God, would have it that these things came not thus to pass without God's favour to Moses; they therefore laid the blame upon him that God was so angry, and said that this had happened not so much because of the wickedness of those that were punished, as from the solicitation of Moses; and that those men had been destroyed without any sin of theirs, only because they were zealous about the divine worship; as also that he who had been the cause of this diminution of the people, by destroying so many men, and men most excellent all of them, besides his escaping any punishment himself, had now given the priesthood to his brother so firmly, that nobody could any longer dispute it with him; for no one else, to be sure, would now put in for it, since he must have seen how those that first did so miserably perished. Moreover, the kindred of those that were destroyed made great entreaties to the multitude to abate the arrogance of Moses, because it would be safest for them so to do.

§ 2. Now Moses, having been informed some time that an uproar was brewing, and fearing that they would mutiny a second time, and that some great and sad calamity would be the consequence, called the multitude together, and patiently heard them, making no apology for himself, lest he should embitter the multitude: he only desired the heads of the tribes to bring their rod with the name of their tribe inscribed upon it, and said he should receive the priesthood, on whose rod God should put a sign. This was agreed to. So the rest brought their rods, as did Aaron also, who had written the tribe of Levi on his rod. These rods Moses laid up in the tabernacle of God. On the next day he brought them out, and they were known from one another by those who had brought them, they having distinctly noted them, as had also the multitude. Now as to all the rest, they saw them still in the same form Moses had received them, but they saw buds and branches grown out of Aaron's rod, and ripe fruit; they were almonds, the rod having been made of that tree. The people were so amazed at this strange sight, that though Moses and Aaron were before under some degree of hatred, they now laid that hatred aside, and began to marvel at the judgment of God concerning them; so that henceforth they applauded what God had decreed, and permitted Aaron to enjoy the high priesthood peaceably. And thus God selected him three several times, and he retained that honour without further disturbance. And thus this rebellion of the Hebrews, which had been a serious one, and had lasted a great while, was at last ended.

§ 3. And Moses, who had exempted the tribe of Levi from war and military duties, and set it apart for the divine worship, lest they should want and seek after the necessaries of life, and so neglect the temple, commanded the Hebrews, according to the will of God, that when they should get possession of the land of Canaan, they should assign forty-eight good and fair cities to the Levites, and allow them land in the suburbs, two thousand cubits all round the walls of those cities. And besides this, he appointed that the people should pay tithe of the annual fruits of the earth, both to the Levites and to the priests. And this is what that tribe receives of the multitude. I now think it necessary to set down what is paid by all only to the priests.

§ 4. Moses commanded the Levites to yield up to the priests thirteen of their forty-eight cities, and to set apart for them the tenth part of the tithes which they every year received from the people. Moreover, he decreed that the people were to offer to God the first-fruits of the entire product of the ground, and to offer the first-born of those four-footed beasts that were appointed for sacrifices, if it were a male, to the priests to be slain, that they and their entire families might eat it in the holy city; and that the owners of those first-born beasts not appointed for sacrifice by the laws of our country, should bring a shekel and a half in their stead; and for the first-born of a man, five shekels. They were also to have the first-fruits out of the shearing of sheep, and when any baked bread and made loaves, they were to give some of what they baked to them. Moreover, those that have made a sacred vow, I mean those that are called Nazarites, that suffer their hair to grow long, and use no wine, when they consecrate their hair, and offer it for a sacrifice, they are to allot what is shorn off to the priests. Such also as call themselves Corban to God, which denotes what the Greeks call a gift, when they are desirous of being freed from that ministration, are to lay down money for the priests; thirty shekels if it be a woman, and fifty if it be a man; but if any be too poor to pay the appointed sum, it shall be lawful for the priests to determine on what sum they think fit. And if any slay beasts at home for a private festival and not a religious one, they are obliged to bring the tripe and breast and right shoulder of the sacrifice to the priests. With these Moses contrived that the priests should be plentifully maintained, besides what they had out of those offerings for sins, which the people gave them, as I have set down in the previous book. He also ordered, that out of everything allotted for the priests, their servants, daughters, and wives should partake as well as themselves, except what came to them out of the sacrifices that were offered for sins: for of them none but the males of the families of the priests might eat, and that in the temple on the same day they were offered.

§ 5. When Moses had made these regulations, after the rebellion was over, he removed with the whole host, and came to the borders of Idumæa. He then sent ambassadors to the king of the Idumæans, and asked him to give him a passage through his country, and agreed to give him what guarantees he should desire, that he should be secured from any injury. He asked him also to allow his army liberty to buy provisions; and said, if he insisted upon it, he would pay down a price for the very water they should drink. But the king was not pleased with this embassy from Moses: nor did he allow a passage for the army, but brought his people out armed to meet Moses, and to hinder them, in case they should endeavour to force their passage. And when Moses consulted God, he told him not to begin the war first; and so he withdrew his forces, and travelled round about through the wilderness.

§ 6. Then it was that Miriam, the sister of Moses, came to her end (having completed the fortieth year since she left Egypt) on the first day of the lunar month Xanthicus. They had a public funeral for her at great expense. She was buried upon a certain mountain, which they call Sin;<sup>1</sup> and when they had mourned for her thirty days, Moses purified the people in the following manner. He took a heifer, that had never been used to the plough or to husbandry, without blemish, and entirely red, to a little distance from the camp, to a place perfectly clean. This heifer was slain by the high priest, and her blood sprinkled with his finger seven times before the tabernacle of God; after this the entire heifer was burned as it was, together with its skin and entrails, and they threw cedar wood, and hyssop, and scarlet wool, into the midst of the fire; then a clean man gathered all her ashes together, and laid them in a place perfectly clean. And when any persons were defiled by touching a dead body, they put a little of these ashes into spring water, with hyssop, and dipping part of these ashes in it, they sprinkled them with it, both on the third day, and on the seventh, and after that they were clean. This he also enjoined them to do when the tribes should come into their promised inheritance.

§ 7. Now when this purification, which their leader enjoined after the mourning for his sister, was over, he caused the army to remove, and to march through the wilderness, and through Arabia. And when he came to a place which the Arabians esteem their metropolis, which was formerly called Arce, but has now the name of Petra,<sup>1</sup> which was encompassed by a high mountain, Aaron ascended the mountain in the sight of the whole host, for the place was over against them, Moses having before told him that he was to die there. He put off his pontifical garments, and delivered them to Eleazar his son, to whom the high priesthood belonged, because he was his oldest son, and died while the multitude gazed at him. He died in the same year in which he lost his sister, having lived in all a hundred and twenty three years. He died on the first day of the lunar month called by the Athenians Hecatombæon, by the Macedonians Lous, and by the Hebrews Abba.

CHAP. V.

How Moses conquered Sihon and Og, kings of the Amorites, and destroyed their whole Army, and then divided their Land by lot to two Tribes and a half of the Hebrews.

§ 1.

THE people mourned for Aaron thirty days, and when this mourning was over, Moses removed the host from that place, and came to the river Arnon,<sup>1</sup> which rising in the mountains of Arabia,<sup>2</sup> and running through all the wilderness, falls into the lake Asphaltitis,<sup>3</sup> and forms the boundary between the land of the Moabites and the land of the Amorites. This land is fruitful, and sufficient to maintain a great number of men with the good things it produces. Moses, therefore, sent messengers to Sihon the king of this country, asking that he would grant his army a passage through it on whatever terms he should please to require: he promised that no injury should be done either to the country which Sihon governed, or to its inhabitants; and that he would buy his provisions at such a price as should be to their advantage, even though they should desire to sell them even their water. But Sihon refused his offer, and put his army into battle array, and made every preparation to hinder their crossing the Arnon.

§ 2. When Moses saw that the Amorite king was disposed to enter upon hostilities with them, he thought he ought not to bear that insult, and determining to wean the Hebrews from their inaction and consequent distress, which had been the occasion of their former rebellion (nor indeed were they now thoroughly easy in their minds), he inquired of God whether he would give him leave to fight? which when he had done, and also promised him the victory, he was himself very confident for the fray, and encouraged the soldiers, calling on them now to take pleasure in fighting, since God gave them leave to do so. They then, upon the receipt of this permission, which they so much longed for, put on their whole armour, and set about the work without delay. But the Amorite king was not equally confident now the Hebrews were going to attack him, but both he himself was affrighted at the Hebrews, and his army, which before had showed itself very courageous, was now found to be timorous. So they could not sustain the first onset, nor stand against the Hebrews, but fled away, thinking this would afford them more likelihood of safety than fighting, for they depended upon their cities, which were strong, though they reaped no advantage from them when they were forced to fly to them: for as soon as the Hebrews saw them giving ground, they immediately pursued them close; and when they had broken their ranks, they greatly terrified them, and some of them broke off from the rest, and ran away in the direction of their cities. And the Hebrews pursued them briskly, and obstinately persevered in the efforts they had already made: and being very skilful in slinging, and very dexterous in throwing all kinds of missiles, and also having on nothing but light armour, which made them quick in the pursuit, they overtook their enemies; and for those that were most remote, and could not be overtaken, they reached them by their slings and their bows, so that many were slain; and those that escaped death were sorely wounded. And they were more distressed with thirst, than even with those that fought against them. for it was the summer season, and as most of them hurried down in confusion to the river out of a desire to drink, the Hebrews, as they fled en masse, came round them, and shot at them, so that what with darts, and what with arrows, they slew them all. Silon also their king was slain. And the Hebrews spoiled the dead bodies, and took the prey. The land also which they took was full of abundance of fruits, and the army went all over it without fear, and fed their cattle upon it, and they took the enemies prisoners, who could no way put a stop to their progress, since all their fighting-men had been slain. Such was the destruction which overtook the Amorites, who were neither sagacious in council nor courageous in action. And the Hebrews took possession of their land, which is a country situated between three rivers, and naturally resembling an island, the river Arnon being its southern limit, the river Jabbok<sup>1</sup> bounding its northern side, which, running into the Jordan, loses its own name, and takes the other's, while the Jordan itself runs along by it on the west.

§ 3. When matters were in this state, Og, the king of Gilead<sup>2</sup> and Gaulanitis,<sup>3</sup> fell upon the Israelites. He brought an army with him, and came in haste to the assistance of his friend Sihon. And though he found him already slain, yet did he resolve still to fight the Hebrews, supposing he should be too hard for them, and being desirous to try their valour, but was disappointed in his hope, as he was both himself slain in the battle, and all his army was destroyed. Then Moses passed over the river Jabbok, and overran the kingdom of Og. He overthrew the cities, and slew all their inhabitants, who exceeded in riches all the men in that part of the country, on account of the goodness of the soil, and the quantity of property. Now Og had very few equals either in size of body or handsomeness of appearance. He was also a man of great activity in the use of his hands, so that his actions were not unequal to the size and handsome appearance of his body. And men could easily guess at his strength and size, as they took his bed at Rabbah,<sup>4</sup> the royal city of the Ammonites; its material was iron, its breadth four cubits, and its length nine cubits. However, his fall did not only improve the circumstances of the Hebrews for the present, but by his death he was the occasion of further good success to them; for they took sixty cities strongly fortified that had been subject to him, and all got much spoil both in general and in particular.

CHAP. VI.

§ 1.

NOW Moses, when he had brought his army to Jordan, pitched his camp in the great plain over against Jericho.<sup>1</sup> This city has a very happy situation, and is very fit for producing palm-trees and balsam. And now the Israelites began to be very elated, and very eager for fighting. Moses then, after he had first offered, for a few days, sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, and feasted the people, sent a party of armed men to lay waste the country of the Midianites, and to take their cities by storm. His reason for making war upon them was as follows.

§ 2. When Balak, the king of the Moabites, who inherited from his ancestors a friendship and league with the Midianites, saw how great the Israelites were grown, he was much alarmed on account of his kingdom's danger; for he was not acquainted with the fact, that the Hebrews would not meddle with any other country, but were to be contented with the possession of the land of Canaan, God having forbidden them to go any further. So, with more haste than wisdom, he resolved to make an attempt upon them by words; but he did not judge it prudent to fight against them, after they had had such great successes even against odds, but he thought to hinder them, if he could, from growing greater, and so he resolved to send ambassadors to the Midianites about them. Now these Midianites, knowing there was one Balaam, who lived by the Euphrates, and was the greatest of the prophets of that time, and one that was friendly to them, sent some of their principal men with the ambassadors of Balak, to entreat the prophet to come to them, that he might imprecate curses for the destruction of the Israelites. So Balaam received the ambassadors, and treated them very kindly, and when he had supped, he inquired God's will as to the matter for which the Midianites entreated him to come to them? And when God opposed his going, he came to the ambassadors, and told them that he was himself very willing and desirous to comply with their request, but informed them that God was opposed to his desire, even that God who had raised him to great reputation on account of the truth of his predictions, for that the host whom they entreated him to come to curse was in the favour of God; on which account he advised them to go home again, and not to persist in their enmity against the Israelites: and when he had given them that answer, he dismissed the ambassadors.

§ 3. Then the Midianites, at the earnest request and fervent entreaties of Balak, sent other ambassadors to Balaam, who desiring to gratify the men, inquired again of God; but he was displeased at this [second] trial, and bade him by no means to contradict the ambassadors. Now Balaam did not imagine that God gave this injunction in order to deceive him, so he went along with the ambassadors; and when a divine angel met him in the way, as he was in a narrow passage hedged in with a wall on both sides, the ass on which Balaam rode, perceiving that it was a divine spirit that met him, thrust Balaam against one of the walls, without any regard to the stripes which Balaam, being hurt by the wall, gave her; but when the ass, upon the angel's continuing to press on to her, and upon the stripes which were given her, fell down, she made use by the will of God of a human voice, and complained to Balaam of his acting unjustly to her; for whereas he had had no fault to find with her in her former service to him, he now inflicted stripes upon her, not understanding that she was hindered from serving him on his present errand by the will of God. And when he was disturbed by reason of the ass speaking like a human being, the angel appeared plainly to him, and blamed him for the stripes he had given his ass, and informed him that it was not in fault, but that he had himself come to obstruct his journey, as being contrary to the will of God. Upon which Balaam was afraid, and was ready to return back again, but God urged him to go on his intended way; but added this injunction, that he should utter nothing but what he himself should suggest to his mind.

§ 4. When God had given him this charge, he went on to Balak; and when the king had received him with distinction, he asked to be led up one of the mountains to take a view of the state of the camp of the Hebrews. Balak himself also ascended the mountain with a royal retinue, and took the prophet along with him. This mountain lay over their heads, and was sixty furlongs distant from the camp. Now when Balaam saw the Hebrews, he desired the king to build him seven altars, and to bring him as many bulls and rams; which the king quickly did. He then slew the sacrifices, and offered them as burnt-offerings, that he might observe some sign betokening the rout of the Hebrews. Then said he, "Happy is this people on whom God bestows the possession of innumerable good things, and grants them his own providence to be their help and guide. For there is no nation among mankind that you will not be esteemed superior to in virtue, and in regard to the best rules of life, and such as are pure from wickedness, and you will leave these excellent rules to children better than yourselves, as you are the only people that God regards, who secures your being happier than any other people under the sun. You shall retain that land to which he hath sent you, and it shall ever be under the command of your children; and all the earth, as well as the sea, shall be filled with your glory; and you shall be sufficiently numerous to supply the world in every region of it with inhabitants of your race. O blessed host! marvel that you are become so many from one father; and truly the land of Canaan can now hold you as being yet comparatively few; but know that the whole world is proposed to be your place of habitation for ever. The multitude of your posterity also shall live in the islands as well as on the mainland, and shall be more in number than the stars of heaven. And when you are become so many, God will not leave off his care of you; but will afford you an abundance of all good things in peace, with victory and dominion in war, if the children of your enemies have a desire to fight against you, and are so bold as to come to arms, and assault you in battle, for they will not return with victory, nor so as to give joy to their children and wives. To such a degree of valour will you be raised by the providence of God, who is able to diminish the abundance of some, and to supply the wants of others."

§ 5. Thus did Balaam speak by inspiration, not being master of himself, but moved to say what he did by the divine Spirit. And Balak was displeased, and said he had broken the contract he had made, whereby he and his allies had invited him on the promise of great presents: for whereas he came to curse their enemies, he had sung their praises, and had declared that they were the happiest of men. To which Balaam replied, "O Balak, if you rightly consider the whole matter, can you suppose, that it is in our power either to be silent or to say anything when the Spirit of God seizes upon us? for it puts such words as it pleases into our mouths, and such discourses as we are not ourselves conscious of. I well remember by what entreaties both you and the Midianites so zealously brought me hither, and why I took this journey. It was my prayer that I might satisfy you as to what you desired of me; but God is more powerful than my resolve to serve you, for those that take upon them to foretell the affairs of mankind, as from their own abilities, are entirely powerless, either to forbear to utter what God suggests to them, or to offer violence to his will; for when he possesses us, nothing that we say is our own. I certainly did not intend to praise this host, nor to recount the good things which God intended to do for their race, but he being favourable to them, and anxious to bestow upon them a happy life and eternal glory, suggested the declaration of those things to me. But now, because it is my desire to oblige you and the Midianites, whose request it is not becoming for me to reject, come, let us again rear other altars, and offer the like sacrifices that we did before, that I may see whether I can persuade God to permit me to bind these men with curses." And when Balak had agreed to this, God would not even at the second sacrifice consent to his cursing the Israelites. And Balaam sacrificed yet a third time, having erected other altars, nor could he even then curse the Israelites, but he fell upon his face, and foretold what calamities would befall kings and most eminent cities, some of which were not yet inhabited; which events have come to pass to those persons, in the foregoing ages, and down to my own memory, both by sea and by land. From which accomplishment of all those predictions that he made, one may conjecture that the rest will have their accomplishment in the future.

§ 6. But Balak, being very angry that the Israelites were not cursed, sent away Balaam, not thinking him worthy of any honour. Whereupon, as he was just starting on his journey and was about to cross the Euphrates, he sent for Balak and the princes of the Midianites, and spoke thus to them: "O Balak, and you Midianites that are here present (for I am obliged even against the will of God to gratify you), it is true no entire ruin can come on the nation of the Hebrews, either by war, or by plague, or by scarcity of the fruits of the earth, nor can any other unexpected accident destroy them. For the providence of God is concerned to preserve them from all evil, nor will it permit any such calamity to come upon them whereby they may all perish: but some small misfortunes, and those for a short time, whereby they may appear to be brought low, may still befall them; but after that they will flourish again, to the terror of those that brought hurt to them. But if you desire to gain a victory over them for a short space of time, you will obtain it by following my directions. Select such of your daughters as are most eminent for beauty, and able to take by storm and conquer the modesty of those that behold them by their beauty, and send them, when decked and trimmed to the highest degree possible, to the Israelites' camp; and give them injunctions, when the young men of the Hebrews desire their company, to allow it them; and when they see that they are enamoured of them, let them pretend to go, and if they entreat them to stay, let them not give their consent till they have persuaded them to abandon their own laws, and the worship of that God who gave them, and to worship the gods of the Midianites and the Moabites; for by this means God will be angry with them." And when Balaam had suggested this counsel to them, he went his way.

§ 7. And when the Midianites had sent their daughters, as Balaam had advised, the young men of the Hebrews were captivated by their beauty, and came to discourse with them, and besought them not to grudge them the enjoyment of their beauty, nor to deny them their love. And they received their words gladly, and complied with their wishes, and when they had brought them to be enamoured of them, and their desires-were at their height, they began to talk of departing. Then these men became greatly disconsolate at the idea of their departure, and implored them not to leave them, but begged they would continue there, and become their wives, and they promised them they should be made mistresses of all they had. This they said with oaths, and called on God to witness what they promised, and that with tears in their eyes, and all other marks of concern such as might move their pity. And the women, as soon as they perceived they had made them their slaves, and had caught them with their intimacy, began to speak to them as follows.

§ 8. "Most excellent young men, we have houses of our own and plenty of good things there, together with the natural affection and love of our parents and friends; nor is it out of any want of such things that we come to discourse with you, nor did we submit to your wishes in the idea of prostituting the beauty of our body for gain, but taking you for brave and worthy men, we agreed to your request, treating you with such honours as friendship required. And now, since you say that you have a great affection for us, and are troubled at the idea of our departing, we are not averse to your entreaties; and if we receive such proof of your good-will as we think can alone be considered sufficient, we shall be glad to lead our lives with you as your wives, but we are afraid that you will in time be weary of our company, and will then abuse us, and send us back to our parents in dishonour;" and they begged they would excuse their anxiety about that danger. But the young men professed they would give them any pledge they could desire, and would contradict them in nothing, so great was the passion they had for them. "If then (said they) this be your resolution, since you make use of such customs and modes of life as are entirely different from all other men, insomuch that your food is peculiar to yourselves, and your drink unlike that of others, it will be absolutely necessary, if you would have us for your wives, that you should worship our gods: nor can there be any other proof of the kindness which you say you already have, and promise to have hereafter to us, than your worshipping the same gods that we do. And no one could censure you, now you are come into this country, for worshipping its gods, especially as our gods are common to all men, and yours such as belong to nobody but yourselves." So they said they must either adopt the ways of all other people, or else they must look out for another world, where they could live by themselves according to their own laws.

§ 9. Now the young men were induced by the love they had for these women to think they spoke very well, so they gave themselves up to what they urged, and transgressed their own laws, and believed in many gods, and resolving that they would sacrifice to the gods established by the laws of that country, they were delighted with their strange food, and went on to do everything that the women would have them do, contrary to their own laws; insomuch that lawlessness already spread through the whole host of the young men, and they fell into a rebellion much worse than the former, and ran risk of the entire abolition of their own institutions; for when once the youth had tasted of these strange customs, they went in for them with insatiable inclinations, and even some of the principal men, who were illustrious on account of the virtues of their fathers, were also corrupted with the rest.

§ 10. Even Zimri, the head of the tribe of Simeon, accompanied with Cozbi a Midianitish woman, the daughter of Zur, a prince in that country; and being bidden by the woman to disregard the laws of Moses, and to follow those she was used to, he complied with her, both by sacrificing in a manner different to the national custom, and by taking a strange woman to wife. When things were in this condition, Moses was afraid that matters would grow worse, and called the people to an assembly, and accused nobody by name, being unwilling to drive into despair those who, by remaining unknown, might repent, but he said, that they did not do what was either worthy of themselves or of their fathers, in preferring pleasure to God and to living according to his will: that it was fit they should change such courses, while their affairs were still in a good state ; and think that was true fortitude which offered not violence to their laws, but which resisted their lusts. He also said that it was unreasonable, when they had lived soberly in the wilderness, to act madly now they were in prosperity ; and that they ought not to lose, now they had abundance, what they had gained when they had little. And by saying this he endeavoured to correct the young men, and to bring them to repentance for what they had done.

§ 11. But Zimri arose up after him, and said, “ Do you, Moses, make use of such laws as you are fond of, and have ratified by custom, for, if things had not been thus, you would have been often punished before now, and would have known that the Hebrews are not easily put upon ; but you shall not have me one of your followers in your tyrannical commands, for you do nothing else hitherto, but, under pretext of laws and God, wickedly impose on us slavery and gain dominion for yourself, while you deprive us of the sweetness of life, and of that free will which is the right of freemen, and of those that have no lord over them. Nay, indeed, this fellow is harder upon the Hebrews than were the Egyptians themselves, claiming to punish according to his laws everyone’s acting as is most agreeable to himself ; but you yourself better deserve to suffer punishment, who presume to abolish what everyone acknowledges to be good for him, and aim to make your absurd notions have more force than the opinions of everybody. And I should justly lose my present fortune, if, thinking it right, I should be afraid to admit it. I have married, as you say, a strange woman (for you shall hear what I do from myself as from one that is free, for truly I do not intend to conceal myself). I also own, that I sacrifice to those gods to whom I think fit to sacrifice ; and I think it right to come at truth by inquiring of many people, and not, like one that lives under a tyranny, to suffer the whole hope of my life to depend upon one man ; nor shall anyone have cause to rejoice, who declares himself to have more authority over my actions than myself.”

§ 12. Now when Zimri had spoken thus about what he and some others had wickedly done, the people held their peace, both from fear of what might come upon them, and because they saw that their legislator was not willing to bring Zimri's insolence before the public any more, or openly to contend with him, for he avoided that, lest many should imitate the profligacy of his language, and thereby disturb the multitude: so the assembly was dissolved. However, the mischief would have proceeded further, if Zimri had not first been slain, which came about in the following way. Phinehas, a man in other respects better than the rest of the young men, and also one that surpassed his contemporaries from the dignity of his father (for he was the son of Eleazar the high priest, and the grandson of [Aaron] Moses' brother), was greatly troubled at what had been done by Zimri, and resolved in earnest to inflict punishment on him, before his outrageous behaviour should grow worse from impunity, and to prevent this transgression from proceeding further, which would happen if the ringleaders were not punished. He was morally and physically so brave, that, when he was in any danger he did not leave off till he overcame it, and got an entire victory; so he went into Zimri's tent, and slew him with his javelin, and Cozbi also. Upon which all the young men that had a regard to virtue, and aimed to do noble actions, imitated Phinehas' boldness, and slew those that were accused of the same crime as Zimri. And many of those that had transgressed perished by the noble conduct of those young men: the rest all died of a plague, which God himself inflicted upon them; and all their kindred, who, instead of hindering them from such wicked actions, as they ought to have done, had egged them on, were esteemed by God partners in their wickedness, and died. And there perished of the host no less than twenty-four thousand.

§ 13. This was the cause why Moses was provoked to send an army to destroy the Midianites; concerning which expedition I shall speak presently, when I have first related what I have omitted; for it is but just not to pass over our legislator's due eucorium, on account of his conduct here. For although Balaam, who was sent for by the Midianites to curse the Hebrews, when hindered from doing so by divine Providence, yet suggested that advice to them, by adopting which our enemies well nigh corrupted the whole multitude of the Hebrews with their practices, till some of them were deeply infected with their opinions, yet did Moses do him great honour by setting down his prophecies in writing. And though it was in his power to claim this glory to himself, and make men believe they were his own predictions, there being no one that could be a witness against him, and convict him of so doing, he still gave his attestation to Balaam, and thought him worthy of mention. But let everyone think of this as he pleases.

CHAP. VII.

§ 1.

NOW Moses sent an army against the land of Midian, for the reason I have mentioned, in all twelve thousand men, taking an equal number out of every tribe, and appointed as their commander that Phinehas whom I mentioned a little before as observing the laws of the Hebrews, and inflicting punishment upon Zimri when he had transgressed them. Now the Midianites hearing that the Hebrews were coming, and were all but upon them, assembled their army together, and fortified the entrances into their country, and there awaited their coming. When they were come, and had joined battle with them, an immense number of the Midianites fell, nor could they be numbered they were so many, and among them fell all their kings, five in number, viz. Evi, Zur, Reba, Hur, and Rekem, who gave his name to the chief city of all Arabia, which is still called by the whole Arabian nation Arceme,<sup>1</sup> from the name of the king that built it, but is called by the Greeks Petra. Now when the enemies were routed, the Hebrews spoiled their country, and took much prey, and destroyed the men that were its inhabitants, together with the women; only they spared the virgins, as Moses had commanded Phinehas to do, who indeed came back bringing with him an army that had received no harm, and a great deal of prey: fifty-two thousand oxen, seventy-five thousand six hundred sheep, sixty thousand asses, with an immense quantity of gold and silver furniture, which the Midianites made use of in their houses; for they were so wealthy, that they were very luxurious. There were also led captive about thirty-two thousand virgins. So Moses divided the prey into parts, and gave one fiftieth part to Eleazar and the priests, and another fiftieth part to the Levites, and distributed the rest of the prey among the people. After which they lived happily, having obtained an abundance of good things by their valour, and having no misfortune that hindered their enjoyment of that happiness.

§ 2. But Moses was now grown old, and appointed Joshua for his successor, both to receive directions from God as a prophet, and to be the commander of the army if they should at any time stand in need of one; and it was at the command of God, that the authority was committed to him. Now Joshua had been instructed in all the learning which concerned the laws and God himself, and Moses had been his instructor.

§ 3. It was at this time that the two tribes of Gad and Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh, as they had a multitude of cattle, as well as all other kinds of property, took counsel together and besought Moses to give them, as their peculiar portion, that land of the Amorites which they had captured by the spear, because it was fruitful and good for feeding cattle. But Moses, supposing that they were afraid of fighting with the Canaanites, and invented this provision for their cattle as a handsome excuse for avoiding the war, called them arrant cowards: and said, that they had only contrived a specious excuse for their cowardice, and that they had a mind to live in luxury and ease, while all the rest were labouring with great hardships to obtain the land they were desirous to have, and that they were unwilling to march along, and undergo the remaining hard service, whereby they were, under the divine promise, to pass over Jordan, and overcome those enemies whom God had showed them, and obtain their land.

But they, seeing that Moses was angry with them, and supposing he had a just cause to be displeased at their petition, made a defence for themselves; and said, that it was not on account of their fear of dangers, nor on account of their laziness, that they made this request to him, but that they might leave the prey they had got in convenient places, and so might be more free and ready to undergo difficulties, and to fight battles. They added also, that when they had built cities, wherein they might preserve their children and wives and possessions, if he would allow them, they would go along with the rest of the army. And Moses was pleased with what they said: so he called for Eleazar the high priest, and Joshua, and the chiefs of the tribes, and permitted those tribes to possess the land of the Amorites, upon condition that they should join with their kinsmen in the war until it was finished. Upon which condition they took possession of the country, and built strong cities, and put into them their children and their wives, and whatever else they had that might hinder their prosecution of the war.

§ 4. Moses also now built ten of the forty-eight cities of the Levites; three of which he allotted to those that slew any person involuntarily, and fled to them; and he assigned the same time for their banishment as that of the life of the high priest under whom the flight happened, for after the death of the high priest he permitted the slayer to return home. During the time of his exile the relations of him that was slain might kill the slayer, if they caught him without the bounds of the city of refuge to which he had fled, though this permission was not granted to any other person. Now the cities which were set apart for refuge were these: Bezer<sup>1</sup> on the borders of Arabia, Ramoth<sup>2</sup> in the land of Gilead, and Golan<sup>3</sup> in the land of Bashan. There were to be also, by Moses' command, three other cities allotted for the habitation of these fugitives out of the cities of the Levites, but not till after they should be in possession of the land of Canaan.

§ 5. At this time the chief men of the tribe of Manasseh came to Moses, and informed him that there was an eminent man of their tribe dead, whose name was Zelophead, who had left no male children, but only daughters, and asked him, Whether these daughters might inherit his land or not? He made answer, that if they should marry in their own tribe, they should carry their estate along with them, but if they should dispose of themselves in marriage to men of another tribe, they should leave their inheritance in their father's tribe. And then it was that Moses ordained, that everyone's inheritance should continue in his own tribe.

CHAP. VIII.

The Polity settled by Moses; and how he disappeared from among Mankind.

§ 1.

WHEN forty years all but thirty days were completed, Moses gathered the congregation together near Jordan, where the city Abila<sup>1</sup> now stands, a place full of palm-trees; and all the people being come together, he spoke to them as follows.

§ 2. "Fellow-soldiers, who have been partners with me in long distress, since now the will of God, and the course of old age, as I am a hundred and twenty, requires that I should depart out of this life; and since I am not to help or aid you in what remains to be done beyond the Jordan, being prevented by God, I thought it reasonable not to leave off my endeavours even now for your happiness, but to do my utmost to procure for you the eternal enjoyment of good things, and remembrance for myself when you shall be in the fruition of great plenty and prosperity. Come, therefore, let me suggest to you by what means you may be happy, and may leave an eternal possession of good things to your children after you, and so let me go out of the world. And I deserve to be believed by you, both on account of the great things I have already done for you, and because when souls are about to leave the body they speak with all virtue. O children of Israel, there is but one source of happiness for all mankind, the favour of God, for he alone is able to give good things to those that deserve them, and to deprive those of them that sin against him; and if you live according to his will, and according to what I, who well understand his mind, exhort you to do, you will never cease being esteemed fortunate, and an object of envy by all men; you will then secure the possession of the good things you already have, and will quickly obtain those that at present you are in want of. Only be obedient to those whom God would have you to follow, and prefer no other constitution of government to the laws now given you, neither disregard that mode of divine worship which you now have, nor change it for any other. If you do this, you will be the most valiant of all men in waging wars, and will not be easily conquered by any of your enemies; for when God is present with you to assist you, it is to be expected that you will be able to despise the opposition of all mankind; and great rewards of virtue are in store for you, if you preserve that virtue through your whole lives. Virtue itself is indeed the oldest and first of blessings, and bestows abundance of others afterwards, so that your exercise of virtue towards other men will make your own lives happy, and render you more glorious than other nations, and procure you an undisputed reputation with posterity. These blessings you will be able to obtain, if you hearken to and observe those laws which by divine dictation I have drawn up for you, and withal meditate upon their wisdom. I am going from you myself, rejoicing in the good things you enjoy; and I commend you to the law of self-control, to the order of your polity, and to the virtues of your commanders, who will take care of what is for your advantage. And God, who has been till now your leader, and by whose will I have myself been useful to you, will not put an end now to his providence over you, but as long as you desire to have him your protector, in your practice of virtue, so long will you enjoy his care over you. Your high priest Eleazar, and Joshua, your senate, and the chiefs of your tribes, will suggest to you the best advice, by following which you will continue to be happy; to whom do you hearken without reluctance, being aware that all such as know well how to be governed will also know how to govern, if they come to that authority themselves. And do not suppose liberty to consist in disliking what your leaders call on you to do, as at present indeed you place your liberty in nothing else but abusing your benefactors; which error if you can avoid for the time to come, your affairs will be in a better condition than they have hitherto been. And do not ever indulge in such a degree of passion against them as you have often ventured to show to me; for you know that I have been oftener in danger of death from you than from our enemies. I now put you in mind of this not to reproach you (for I do not desire, now I am going out of the world, to bring this to your remembrance, in order to leave you offended at me, since at the time when I suffered that treatment from you, I was not angry with you), but to make you wiser hereafter, and to teach you that it will be for your security never to treat insolently those that preside over you, even when you are become rich, as you will be to a great degree when you have passed over the Jordan, and are in possession of the land of Canaan. For if you shall once have been induced by your wealth to despise and disregard virtue, you will also forfeit the favour of God; and when you have made him your enemy, you will be beaten in war, and will have the land which you possess taken away again from you by your enemies, and that with very great disgrace. You will be scattered over the whole world, and will, as slaves, fill every sea and land; and when once you have had the experience of what I now say, you will repent, and remember the laws you have broken, when it will be too late. So I would advise you, if you intend to preserve these laws, to leave none of your enemies alive when you have conquered them, but to judge it for your advantage to destroy them all, lest, if you permit them to live, you taste of their manners, and thereby corrupt your own polity. I also further exhort you to overthrow their altars and their groves, and whatever temples they have among them, and to consume all such, their nation, and their very memory, with fire, for by this means alone the safety of

of your own happy constitution can be firmly secured to you. And in order to prevent your nature degenerating from ignorance of virtue into vice, I have also by divine suggestion ordained for you laws, and a form of government, which are so good, that if you regularly observe them, you will be esteemed of all men the most happy."

§ 3. When he had spoken thus, he gave them the laws, and the constitution of their polity written in a book. And they fell into tears, and showed great affection to their leader, remembering what a number of dangers he had passed through for them, and what care he had taken of their preservation. They desponded also about what would come upon them after he was dead, and thought they should never have another head like him ; and feared that God would take less care of them when Moses was gone, who used to intercede for them. They also repented of what they had said to him in the wilderness when they were angry, and were in grief on that account, insomuch, that the whole body of the people burst into tears with such passion, that it was past the power of words to comfort them in their affliction. However, Moses gave them some consolation, and to call them off the thought how worthy he was of their weeping for him, he exhorted them to keep that form of government he had given them : and then the assembly broke up.

§ 4. I shall now first describe our polity, which was agreeable to the merit and virtue of Moses ; and shall thereby inform those that read these Antiquities what our original constitution was, and shall then proceed to narrate other matters. Now our constitution is all still in writing, as Moses left it, and I shall add nothing by way of ornament, nor anything besides what he left us, I shall only so far innovate, as to digest the various laws into a regular system, for they were left by him casually written down, as he had information on each matter from God. I have thought it necessary to premise this beforehand, lest any of my own countrymen should blame me, as having been guilty of a mistake herein. I shall now only discuss the laws that belong to our polity. As for those laws which Moses left concerning our common intercourse one with another, I have reserved that for a work concerning our manners of life and their reasons, which I propose with God's assistance to write after I have finished the present work.

§ 5. When you have possessed yourselves of the land of Canaan, and have leisure to enjoy the good things of it, and when you have afterwards determined to build cities, if you will do what is pleasing to God, you will have a secure state of happiness. Let there be one holy city in the land of Canaan, and that situate on the finest and best spot, and chosen by God himself by prophetic revelation. Let there also be one temple therein, and one altar, reared not of hewn stones, but of such as are gathered together at random: which stones, when they are whited over with plaster, will have a handsome appearance, and look clean. Let the ascent to it be not by steps, but by an acclivity of raised earth. And let there be neither an altar, nor temple, in any other city; for God is but one, and the nation of the Hebrews is but one.

§ 6. He that dares to blaspheme God, let him be stoned, and let him hang upon a tree all day, and then be buried in an ignominious and obscure manner.

§ 7. Let those that live in all parts, however remote, of the land which the Hebrews shall occupy, come to the city where the temple shall be placed three times a year, that they may give thanks to God for his former benefits, and pray for future blessings, and let them maintain a friendly feeling with one another by meeting and feasting together; for it is a good thing for those that are of the same stock, and under the same laws, not to be unacquainted with each other; which acquaintance will be maintained by their thus conversing together, and by seeing and talking with one another, and so renewing their memory of one another: for if they do not thus converse together occasionally, they will appear mere strangers to one another.

§ 8. Let there be taken out of your fruits a second tenth, besides that which I have allotted to the priests and Levites, which may indeed be sold in the country, but the value is to be expended on those feasts and sacrifices that are to be celebrated in the holy city; for it is fit that you should enjoy those fruits of the earth which God gives you to possess to the honour of the giver.

§ 9. You are not to offer sacrifices out of the hire of a woman which is a harlot, for the Deity is not pleased with anything that comes from lust, and none can be worse than the prostitution of the body. In like manner, no one may take the price of the lining of a bitch, either of one used for hunting, or keeping sheep, for sacrifice to God.

§ 10. Let no one blaspheme those gods which other cities esteem, nor steal what belongs to strange temples, nor take away the gift dedicated to any god.

§ 11. Let not any of you wear a garment made of woollen and linen together, for that is allowed to the priests alone.

§ 12. When the multitude have come together to the holy city for sacrificing every seventh year, at the feast of tabernacles, let the high priest stand upon a high desk, whence he may be heard, and let him read the laws to all the people; and let neither woman nor children be hindered from hearing, no, nor slaves either; for it is a good thing that those laws should be engraven in their souls, and preserved in their memories, that so it may not be possible to blot them out, for so they will not be guilty of sin, since they cannot plead ignorance of what the laws have enjoined. The laws also will have a great authority among sinners by foretelling what they will suffer if they break them, and by imprinting in their souls by hearing what they command, that so there may always be within their minds the object of the laws, by neglecting and violating which they cause their own hurt. Let children also learn the laws, as the first thing they are taught, which will be the best thing they can learn, and ensure their happiness.

§ 13. Let every one commemorate before God the benefits which he bestowed upon them by their deliverance out of the land of Egypt twice every day, both when the day begins, and when the hour for sleep comes on, gratitude being in its own nature a just thing, and serving not only as return for past favours, but also calling down future ones. They are also to inscribe the principal blessings they have received from God upon their doors, and show the same on their arms: as also they are to bear inscribed on their head and arm whatever can declare the power of God and his good-will towards them, that God's readiness to bless them may appear everywhere conspicuous about them.

§ 14. Let there be seven men to judge in every city, such as have been foremost in the exercise of virtue and righteousness, and let every judge have two assessors allotted him out of the tribe of Levi. Let those that are chosen to judge in the several cities be had in great honour; and let none be permitted to revile any, when these are present, or to carry themselves in an insolent manner to any, it being natural that reverence towards those in high office among men should procure men's fear and reverence towards God. Let those who judge have power to decide as they think right, unless anyone can show that they have taken bribes to the perversion of justice, or can bring any other charge against them, proving them to have passed an unjust sentence; for it is not right to decide cases wrongly, out of regard to gain or the position of one of the suitors, but to esteem what is right before all things, otherwise God will by that means be despised, and esteemed inferior to those the dread of whose power has occasioned the unjust sentence: for justice is the power of God. He therefore that favours those in high positions, makes them more powerful than God himself. But if these judges are unable to decide on the cases that come before them (as happens not unfrequently in human affairs), let them send the case undetermined to the holy city, and there let the high priest, the prophet, and the senate, determine as shall seem good to them.

§ 15. But let not a single witness be credited, but only three, or two at the least, and those such whose testimony is confirmed by their past lives. But let not the testimony of women be admitted, on account of the levity and boldness of their sex. And let not slaves be admitted to give testimony, on account of the ignobility of their soul; since it is probable that they will not speak truth, either from hope of gain or fear of punishment. But if anyone be believed to have borne false witness, let him, if convicted, suffer the very same punishment which he, against whom he bore witness, would have suffered.

perpetrator of it be not found, and no one is suspected of having hated the man and therefore killed him, let there be a very diligent inquiry made, and rewards offered for his apprehension, but if no information can be procured, let the magistrates and senate of those cities that lie near the place in which the body was found, assemble together, and measure the distance from the place where the dead body lies; then let the magistrates of the nearest city thereto purchase a heifer, and bring it to a ravine and place unfit for ploughing or planting, and let them cut the sinews of the heifer; then the priests and Levites, and senate of that city, shall take water, and shall openly declare over the head of the heifer, that their hands are innocent of this murder, and that they have neither done it themselves, nor been accessories to any that did it. They shall also beseech God to be merciful to them, that no such horrid act may any more be done in that land.

§ 17. Aristocracy, and the way of living under it, is the best constitution, and may you never have an inclination to any other polity, and may you always love that form, having the laws as your masters, and doing all things according to them; for you need no supreme governor but God. But if you should desire a king, let him be one of your own nation, let him be always careful of justice, and other virtues: let him submit to the laws, and esteem God's commands to be his highest wisdom, but let him do nothing without the high priest and the vote of the senators, let him not have a great number of wives, nor seek abundance of riches or horses, whereby he might grow too proud to submit to the laws. And if he affect any such things, let him be restrained, lest he become too powerful for your welfare.

§ 18. Let it not be esteemed lawful to remove boundaries, either our own, or of those with whom we are at peace. Have a care you do not take those land-marks away, which are, as it were, a sure decree of rights made by God himself to last for ever, since the going beyond limits, and taking others' ground, is the occasion of wars and tumults; for those that remove boundaries are not far off from subverting the laws.

§ 19. He that plants a piece of land, whose trees produce fruits before the fourth year, is not to bring thence any first-fruits to God, nor to make use of the fruit himself, for it is not produced in its proper season ; for when nature is forced unseasonably the fruit is not proper for God, nor for the owner's use ; but let him gather all that is grown in the fourth year, for then it is in its proper season. And let him gather it and carry it to the holy city, and spend it, together with the tithe of his other fruits, in feasting with his friends and with orphans and widows. But in the fifth year the fruit is his own, and he may use it as he pleases.

§ 20. You are not to sow a piece of land with seed which is planted with vines, for it is enough that it supply nourishment to that plant, and be not harassed by ploughing also. You are to plough your land with oxen ; and not to put other animals under the same yoke with them ; but to plough with beasts that are of the same kind. Seeds also are to be pure and unmixed, and not to be compounded of two or three sorts, since nature does not rejoice in the union of things that are not in their own nature alike. Nor are you to permit beasts of different kinds to gender together ; for there is reason to fear, that this unnatural abuse may extend from beasts of different kinds to men, taking its first rise in small and trifling matters. Nor is anything to be allowed, by imitation of which any errors may creep into the constitution. Nor do the laws neglect small matters, but provide that even they may be seen to in a blameless manner.

§ 21. Let not those that reap, and gather in the corn that is reaped, gather in the gleanings also, but let them rather leave some handfuls for those that are in want of the necessaries of life, to be a god-send to them for their subsistence. In like manner, when they gather their grapes, let them leave some smaller bunches for the poor, and let them pass over some of the fruit of their olive trees, for those to gather who have none of their own ; for the advantage arising from the complete gathering of all will not be so considerable to the owners as will arise from the gratitude of the poor. And God will make your land more fertile if, in producing its fruits, you do not merely look after your own interest, but have regard to the support of others also. Nor are you to muzzle the mouths of the oxen, when they tread the ears of corn in the threshing floor ; for it is not just to restrain those that have laboured with us, and worked in its production, from the fruit. Nor are you to prohibit those that pass by at the time when your fruits are ripe from touching them, but to give them leave to fill themselves full of what you have, and that whether they be of your own country or strangers, being glad of the opportunity of giving them some part of your fruits when they are ripe, but let them not carry any away. Nor let those that gather the grapes, and carry them to the wine presses, restrain those whom they meet from eating of them ; for it is unjust to grudge those that desire it their partaking of the good things that come into the world according to God's will, and that while the season is at its height, and is hastening away as it pleases God. Nay, if some out of modesty hesitate to touch those fruits, let them be encouraged to take of them, if Israelites, as if they were partners and owners, on account of their kindred, and if they come from other countries, let them hospitably partake of those things which God has given in their proper season. For that is not to be deemed as idly spent, which anyone out of kindness communicates to another, since God bestows plenty of good things on men, not only to reap the advantage for themselves, but also to give to others out of generosity ; wishing by this means to make known to others his peculiar kindness to the people of Israel, and how freely he communicates happiness to them, while they abundantly contribute, out of their great superfluities, to foreigners also. As for him that acts contrary to this law, let him be beaten with forty stripes save one by the public executioner, let him undergo this punishment, which is a most ignominious one for a freeman, because he was such a slave to gain as to lay a blot upon his own merit. For it is proper for you, who have had experience of afflictions in Egypt and in the wilderness, to make provision for those that are in the like circumstances ; and as you have now obtained plenty yourselves, through the mercy and providence of God, to distribute the same plenty out of sympathy to such as stand in need of it.

§ 22. Besides those two tenths, which I have already said you are to pay every year, the one for the Levites, the other for feasting, you are to bring every third year a third tenth to be distributed to those that want, also to women that are widows, and to children that are orphans. But as to the ripe fruits, let them carry that which is ripe first of all to the temple, and when they have blessed God for the land which has produced them, which he has given them for a possession, when they have also offered those sacrifices which the law has commanded them to bring, let them give the first-fruits to the priests. And when any one has done this, and has brought the tithe of all that he hath, together with those first-fruits that were for the Levites, and for feasting, as he is about to go home, let him stand before the temple precincts, and return thanks to God, that he hath delivered them from the injurious treatment they had in Egypt, and hath given them a good land and a large to enjoy the fruits thereof; and when he has publicly declared that he has fully paid the tenths according to the laws of Moses, let him entreat God that he will be ever merciful and gracious to him, and continue so to be to all the Hebrews, both by preserving to them the good things which he has already given them, and by adding further what he could bestow upon them.

§ 23. Let the Hebrews marry, at the age fit for it, virgins that are free and born of good parents. And he that does not marry a virgin, let him not corrupt another man's wife, and marry her, nor grieve her former husband. And let not free men marry slaves, even if strongly impelled by love to do so, for it is decent and for the dignity of persons to govern their affections. Furthermore, no one ought to marry an harlot; whose marriage-sacrifices, owing to the prostitution of her body, God will not receive. For so the dispositions of the children will be liberal and virtuous, if they are not born of base parents, or of the lustful conjunction of such as marry women that are not free. If anyone has been espoused to a woman as to a virgin, and does not afterwards find her to be so, let him bring his action and accuse her, and let him make use of such proofs as he is furnished with, and let the father or brother of the damsel, or the nearest of kin to her after them defend her. If the damsel obtain a sentence in her favour, that she has not been guilty, let her live with her husband that accused her, and let him not have any further power at all to put her away, unless she give him very great grounds for suspicion, and such as can be no way contradicted. But for him that brings an accusation and calumny against his wife in an impudent and rash manner, let him be punished by receiving forty stripes save one, and let him pay fifty shekels to her father. But if he prove the damsel guilty of having been seduced, and she is one of the common people, let her be stoned, because she did not preserve her virginity till she was lawfully married; but if she is the daughter of a priest, let her be burnt alive. If any man has two wives, and if he greatly regards and is kind to one of them, either out of his affection to her, or for her beauty, or for some other reason, while the other is of less esteem with him; and if the son of her that is beloved is younger than one born of the other wife, but endeavours to obtain the right of primogeniture from his father's kindness to his mother, and would thereby obtain a double portion of his father's substance (for that double portion is what I have allotted the eldest in the laws), let not it be permitted: for it is unjust, that he who is the elder by birth should be deprived of what is due to him in the father's disposition of his estate, because his mother was not equally regarded by him. He that hath seduced a damsel espoused to another man, if he had her consent, let both him and her be put to death, for they are both equally guilty, the man because he persuaded the woman willingly to submit to a most impure action, and to prefer it to lawful wedlock; the woman, because she was persuaded to yield herself to be seduced, either for pleasure, or for gain. However, if a man light on a woman when she is alone, and forces her, when nobody was present to come to her assistance, let him only be put to death. Let him that hath seduced a virgin not yet espoused, marry her; but if the father of the damsel be unwilling that she should be his wife, let him pay fifty shekels as the price of his outrage. He that desires to be divorced from his wife for any cause whatever (and many such causes happen among men), let him in writing give assurance that he will never cohabit with her any more, for so she will have liberty to marry another husband, although before this bill of divorce be given she is not to be permitted so to do : but if she be misused by him also, or if, when he is dead, her first husband should wish to marry her again, it shall not be lawful for her to return to him. If a woman's husband die, and leave her without children, let his brother marry her, and let him call the son that is born to him by his brother's name, and educate him as the heir of his inheritance, for this procedure will be for the benefit of the public, because thereby families will not fail, and the estate will continue among the kindred ; and it will solace widows in their affliction to be married to the nearest relations of their former husbands. But if the brother will not marry her, let the woman come before the senate, and testify that the brother will not take her to wife, but will outrage the memory of his deceased brother, though she is willing to continue in the family, and to bear him children : and when the senate have inquired of him, for what reason it is that he is averse to the marriage, whether he gives a good or bad reason, the matter must come to this issue, that the woman shall loose the sandals of the brother, and shall spit in his face, and say that he deserves this treatment from her, as having outraged the memory of the deceased. And then let him go away from the senate, and bear this reproach all his life long, and let her marry whom she pleases of such as seek her in marriage. And if any man take captive either a virgin, or one that has been married, and has a mind to marry her, let him not be allowed to live with her as his wife, before she has shaven her head and put on mourning, and lamented her relations and friends that were slain in the battle, that so, having given vent to her sorrow for them, she may afterwards betake herself to feasting and matrimony. For it is good and right for him that takes a woman in order to have children by her, to be complaisant to her inclinations, and not merely to pursue his own pleasure, and pay no regard to what is agreeable to her. But when thirty days are past, as the time of mourning, for so many days are sufficient to sensible persons for lamenting the dearest friends, then let them proceed to the marriage. But if, when he has satisfied his lust, he be too proud to retain her for his wife, let him not have it in his power to make her a slave, but let her go away where she pleases, and have the privilege of a free woman.

§ 24. As to those young men that despise their parents, and do not pay them honour, but offer them affronts, either because they are ashamed of them or think themselves wiser than they, let their parents first admonish them in words (for they are sufficient judges for their sons), and let them say to them, that they cohabited not for the sake of pleasure, nor for the augmentation of their wealth by joining both their properties together, but that they might have children, to take care of them in their old age, and to supply them with what they then should want. And let them say also, "When you were born we received you with gladness, and gave God the greatest thanks for you, and brought you up with great care, and spared for nothing that appeared useful for your preservation, and instruction in what was most excellent. And now, since it is reasonable to forgive the sins of those that are young, let it suffice you to have given so many indications of your contempt of us, reform and act more wisely for the time to come, considering that God is displeased with those that are insolent towards their parents, because he is himself the father of the whole race of mankind, and seems to bear part of that dishonour which falls upon those that have the same title, when they do not meet with due gratitude from their children. And on such the law inflicts inexorable punishment, which may you never experience!" Now if the insolence of the young men be thus cured, let them escape the disgrace which their former errors deserved, for so the lawgiver will be good, and parents happy, if they never behold either a son or daughter brought to punishment. But if it happen that these words and instructions of theirs to reclaim their son are evidently useless, and the offender makes the laws implacable enemies to him in consequence of the insolence he has repeatedly offered his parents, let him be brought forth by these very parents out of the city, the multitude following, and let him be stoned, and when he has continued there for one whole day, that all the people may see him, let him be buried in the night. And let all whom the laws condemn to die upon any account whatever be buried so.

Let our enemies that fall in battle also be buried, nor let any dead body lie above the ground, and so suffer punishment beyond what justice requires.

§ 25. Let no one lend to any one of the Hebrews upon usury either meat or drink, for it is not just to make gain of the misfortunes of one of your own nation; but if you have assisted his necessities, think it a gain if you obtain their gratitude and the reward which will come to you from God for your humanity.

§ 26. Those who have borrowed either money, or any sort of fruits whether dry or wet, when their affairs shall, by the blessing of God, be in a prosperous condition, shall bring them back, and restore them with pleasure to those who lent them, laying them up, as it were, in their own treasuries, and expecting to have them again if they shall want them. But if they are shameless about restoring what has been borrowed, let not the lender enter the borrower's house, and take a pledge himself, before judgment be given concerning the matter, but let him ask for a pledge outside the house, and let the debtor bring it of himself, without the least opposition to him that comes to him under the protection of the law. And if he that gave the pledge be rich, let the creditor retain it till what he lent be paid him again; but if he be poor, let him that takes it return it before the going down of the sun, especially if the pledge be a garment, that the debtor may have it for a covering in his sleep, God by his nature showing mercy to the poor. It is also unlawful to take a millstone, or any thing thereto belonging, for a pledge, that the debtors may not be deprived of instruments to get their food with, and so be undone by their necessity.

§ 27. Let death be the punishment for stealing a man; but let him that has purloined gold or silver pay double. If anyone kill a man that is stealing something out of his house, let him be esteemed guiltless, even if the man were only breaking through the wall. Let him that hath stolen cattle pay four-fold what was stolen, except in the case of an ox, for which let the thief pay five-fold. Let him that is so poor that he cannot pay the fine laid upon him, be his slave to whom he was adjudged to pay it.

him serve him six years, and in the seventh let him go free : but if he have children by a female slave in his purchaser's house, and if, on account of his good-will and natural affection to his wife and children, he will serve still, let him be set free only at the coming of the year of jubilee (which is the fiftieth year), and let him then take away with him his children and wife, who shall be free also.

§ 29. If anyone find gold or silver in the road, let him inquire after him that lost it, and make proclamation of the place where he found it, and then restore it to him again, not thinking it right to make his own profit by the loss of another. And the same rule is to be observed in the case of cattle found to have wandered away into a lonely place. If the owner be not presently discovered, let him that is the finder keep them, appealing to God that he does not desire to appropriate what belongs to another.

§ 30. It is not lawful to pass by any beast that is in distress, or from a storm fallen down in the mire, but to endeavour to preserve it, having a sympathy with it in its pain.

§ 31. It is also a duty to show the way to those who do not know it, and not to esteem it a matter for sport to hinder another's convenience by setting him in a wrong way.

§ 32. In like manner let no one revile a person blind or dumb.

§ 33. If men strive together, and there be no instrument of iron used, let him that is smitten be avenged, if he die immediately, by inflicting the same punishment on him that smote him : but if, when he is carried home, he lie sick several days, and then die, let him that smote him escape punishment. But if he that is smitten escape death, and yet be at great expense for his recovery, the smiter shall pay for all that has been expended during the time of his illness, and for all that he has paid the doctors. He that kicks a woman with child, so that she miscarries, let him pay a fine in money as the judges shall determine, as having diminished the population by the destruction of what was in her womb : and let money also be given the woman's husband by him. But if she die of the kick, let him also be put to death, the law judging it right that life should go for life.

§ 34. Let no one of the Israelites keep any deadly poison, or any other harmful drug, and if he be caught with such, let him be put to death, suffering the very same mischief that he would have brought upon them for whom the poison was prepared.

§ 35. He that mutilates anyone, let him undergo the like himself, and be deprived of the same member of which he hath deprived the other, unless he that is mutilated will accept of money instead, for the law makes the sufferer the judge of the value of what he has suffered, and permits him to take compensation, unless he wishes to be more severe.

§ 36. Let him that is the owner of an ox, which pusheth with its horns, kill it: but if it gores and kills anyone in the threshing-floor, let it be put to death by stoning, and let it not be thought fit for food; and if its owner be convicted of having known what its nature was, and did not keep it tied up, let him also be put to death, as being the occasion of the ox killing the man. And if the ox have killed a male or female slave, let it be stoned; and let the owner of the ox pay thirty shekels to the master of him that was slain;<sup>1</sup> but if it be an ox that is gored and killed, let both the oxen, that which gored, and that which was killed, be sold, and let the owners of them divide the price between them.

§ 37. Let those that dig a well or pit be careful to lay boarding over it, and so keep it covered up, not to hinder any person from drawing water, but that there may be no danger of anyone falling in. And if anyone's beast fall into such a well or pit not covered up, and perish, let the owner pay its price to the owner of the beast. Let there be a battlement round the tops of your houses instead of a wall, that may prevent any persons from tumbling off and losing their lives.

§ 38. Let him that has received anything in trust for another take care to keep it as a sacred and divine thing, and let no one venture to deprive him that hath intrusted it with him of the same, whether man or woman, even although he or she were to gain an immense sum of gold, and that where they could not be convicted of it by anybody, for it is fit that a man's own conscience, which knows what he has, should in all cases oblige him to do well. Let this conscience be his witness, and make him always act so as to procure him the approval of others, but let him chiefly have regard to God, from whom no wicked man can lie concealed. But if he in whom the trust was reposed, lose what he was intrusted with, without any fraud of his own, let him come before the seven judges, and swear by God, that it has not been lost willingly or with a wicked intention, and that he has not made use of any part thereof, and so let him depart without blame. But if he has made use of the least part of what was committed to him, and it be lost, let him be condemned to repay all that he received. And as in the case of these trusts, if anyone defraud those that undergo bodily labour for him of their wages, let him remember that we ought not to defraud a poor man of his wages, knowing that God has allotted that wages to him instead of land and other possessions; nay, this payment is not at all to be deferred, but to be paid that very day, since God is not willing to deprive the labourer of the immediate fruit of his labour.

§ 39. You are not to punish children for the faults of their parents, but on account of their own virtue rather to pity them, because they were born of wicked parents, than to hate them, because they were born of bad ones. Nor indeed ought we to impute the sin of children to their fathers, as young persons indulge themselves in many practices different from our instruction, from their proud refusal of such instruction.

§ 40. Let those that have made themselves eunuchs be held in detestation, and avoid the company of those who have deprived themselves of their manhood, and of that fruit of generation which God has given to men for the increase of our kind. Let such be driven away, as if they had killed their children, since they have destroyed beforehand what would procure them; for evident it is, that while their soul is become effeminate, they have also transfused that effeminacy to their body. In like manner do you treat all that is of a monstrous nature when it is looked on; nor is it lawful to geld either men or any other animals.

§ 41. Let this be the constitution of your polity in time of peace, and God will be so merciful as to preserve this excellent settlement free from disturbance. And may that time never come which may innovate any of these things, and change them for the contrary! But since it must needs happen that mankind fall into troubles and dangers, either involuntarily or intentionally, come let us give a few precepts concerning them, that so being apprized beforehand what ought to be done, you may have salutary counsels ready when you want them, and may not then be obliged to seek what is to be done, and have to meet emergencies unprepared. May you be a laborious people and exercise your souls in virtuous actions, and so possess the land God has given you without wars, while neither any foreigners make war upon it and afflict you, nor any internal sedition seize upon it, whereby you may do things that are contrary to your fathers, and so lose the customs which they have established. And may you continue in the observation of those laws which God has approved of, and delivered to you. Let all sort of warlike operations, whether now in your own days, or hereafter in the days of your posterity, take place out of your own borders. And when you are about to go to war, send embassages and heralds to those who are your voluntary enemies, for it is a right thing to use words to them before you take up weapons of war, and assure them that, although you have a numerous army, and horses and weapons, and, before all, God propitious and ready to assist you, yet you desire them not to compel you to fight against them, nor to take from them what they have, which would be a gain you do not wish. And if they hearken to you, it will be right for you to keep peace with them; but if they trust in their own strength as superior to yours, and will wrong you, lead your army against them, making God your supreme commander, and appointing as lieutenant under him one that is of the greatest courage among you. For many commanders, besides their being an obstacle to actions that are to be done quickly, are disadvantageous to those that use them. Lead a chosen army, composed of such men as have all strength of body and boldness of soul, and sift out the timid, lest they run away in time of action, and so afford an advantage to your enemies. Do you also give leave to those who have lately built houses, and have not yet lived a year in them, and to those who have planted vineyards, and have not yet been partakers of the fruits, to stay at home, as well as those also who are betrothed or have lately married wives, lest they have such an affection for these things that they be too sparing of their lives, and by reserving themselves for their enjoyments, purposely play the cowards [on account of their wives].

§ 42. When you have pitched your camp, take care that you do nothing that is cruel. And when you are engaged in a siege, and want timber for the making of warlike engines, do not ravage the land by cutting down trees that bear fruit, but spare them, considering that they were planted for the benefit of men, and that, if they could speak, they would have a just plea against you, because, though they are not the cause of the war, they are unjustly treated, and suffer from it, and would, if they were able, remove themselves to another land. When you have beaten your enemies in battle, slay those that have fought against you, but preserve the others alive, that they may pay you tribute, except the nation of the Canaanites, for as to them you must destroy them root and branch.

§ 43. Take care especially in your battles, that no woman use the dress of a man, nor any man the garment of a woman.

§ 44. This was the form of polity left us by Moses, who had already delivered laws in writing forty years before, concerning which I shall speak in another work. And on the following days (for he called them to assembly continually), he delivered blessings on those who should obey the laws, and curses upon those who should not live according to them, but should transgress what was prescribed to them. After this he read them a poetic song composed in hexameter verse, which he wrote down in the holy book. It contained a prediction of what was to come to pass afterwards, and all things have happened agreeably to it all along, and do still happen; he has not at all deviated from the truth. And he delivered these books to the priests as well as the ark, into which they put the ten commandments written on two tables, and the tabernacle also. Moreover, he exhorted the people that, when they had conquered the land, and were settled in it, they should not forget the injury done to them by the Amalekites, but make war against them, and take vengeance on them, for the hurt they did them, when they were in the wilderness. Also, when they had got possession of the land of the Canaanites, and when they had destroyed the whole of its inhabitants, as they were to do, he told them that they were to erect an altar that should face the rising sun, not far from the city of Shechem,<sup>1</sup> between the two mountains of Gerizim on the right, and that called Ebal on the left; and that the host should be so divided, that six tribes should stand upon each of the two mountains, and with them the Levites and the priests. And first those that were upon Mount Gerizim were to pray for the best blessings upon those who were diligent in the worship of God, and the observance of his laws, and who did not reject what Moses told them; while the other tribes gave assent, and when these last put up the like prayers, the former praised them. After this, curses were denounced from Ebal upon those that should transgress these laws, the tribes answering one another alternately, by way of confirmation of what was said. Moses also wrote down those blessings and curses, that they might learn them so thoroughly, that they might never be forgotten by length of time. And when he was about to die, he wrote those blessings and curses on each side of the altar, where he says the people stood and sacrificed and offered burnt-offerings, though after that day they never offered upon it any sacrifice, for it was not lawful to do so. These are the constitutions of Moses, and the Hebrew nation still live according to them.

§ 45. On the next day, Moses called the people together to assembly with the women and children, and the very slaves, that they might engage themselves to the observation of these laws by oath; and that duly considering the meaning of God in them, they might not, either to gratify their kindred, or out of fear of anyone, or indeed for any motive whatever, think anything ought to be preferred to these laws, and so transgress them. That in case anyone of their own blood, or any city, should attempt to confound or dissolve their polity, they should take vengeance upon them both publicly and privately, and when they had overcome them, should root them out from the very foundations, and, if possible, should not leave the least trace of such madness: and, if they were not able to take such vengeance, they should show that what was done was contrary to their will. And the multitude bound themselves by oath so to do.

§ 46. Moses taught them also how their sacrifices would be most acceptable to God, and how they should go forth to war, making use of the stones [in the high priest's breastplate] for their guidance,<sup>1</sup> as I have before signified. Joshua also prophesied while Moses was still present, and recapitulated what Moses had done for the preservation of the people, both in their wars and in peace, and how he had drawn up for them a code of laws, and procured them an excellent polity, and foretold that God had declared to him, "That if they transgressed the worship of God, they would experience the following miseries: their land would be full of arms and enemies, their cities would be overthrown, and their temple would be burnt, and they would be sold for slaves to such men as would have no pity on them in their afflictions: and they would then repent, when that repentance would no way profit them in their sufferings. Yet, said he, that God who founded your nation, will restore your cities and also the temple to your citizens. And you will lose these things not once only, but often."

§ 47. Now when Moses had encouraged Joshua to lead out the army against the Canaanites, by telling him that

God would assist him in all his undertakings, and had blessed the whole multitude, he said, "Since I am going to my forefathers, and God has determined that this should be the day of my departure to them, I return him thanks, while I am still alive and present with you, for that providence he has exercised over you, which has not only delivered us from the miseries we lay under, but has bestowed a state of prosperity upon us; as also because he has assisted me in the pains I took, and in all the solicitude I had to better your condition, and has on all occasions showed himself favourable to us; or rather it was he who first managed our affairs, and brought them to a happy conclusion, by making use of me as a lieutenant under him, and as a helper in those matters wherein he was willing to do your nation good: on which account I think it proper, now I am departing, to praise the divine power which will take care of you for the time to come, and that to repay the debt which I owe him, and to leave behind me a reminder to you of your obligation to worship and honour him, and to keep those laws which are the most excellent gift of all that he has already bestowed on us, or which, if he continue favourable to us, he will bestow upon us hereafter. Certainly a human legislator is a terrible enemy, when his laws are affronted, and made to no purpose. And may you never experience that displeasure of God, which will be the consequence of the neglect of the laws, which he, your Creator, has given you!"

§ 48. When Moses had spoken thus at the end of his life, and had foretold what would happen to every one of the tribes afterwards, with the addition of a blessing to them, the multitude fell to tears, insomuch, that even the women, by beating their breasts, made manifest the deep concern they had because he was about to die. The children also lamented still more, not being able to control their grief, and so showed that even at their age they were sensible of his virtue and mighty deeds: and truly there seemed to be a strife between the young and the old, who should most grieve for him. The old grieved, because they knew what a protector they were losing, and so lamented their future state, but the young grieved not only for that, but also because it so happened that they were to be left by him before they had well tasted of his virtue. Now one may form conjecture of the excess of this sorrow and lamentation of the multitude, from what happened to the legislator himself; for although he was persuaded all his life that he ought not to be cast down at the approach of death, since people die in accordance with the will of God and the law of nature, yet what the people did so overcame him, that he wept himself. Now as he went thence to the place where he was to vanish out of their sight, they all followed after him weeping, but Moses beckoned with his hand to those that were remote from him, and bade them stay behind in quiet, while he exhorted those that followed close to him not to render his departure so lamentable. Whereupon they thought they ought to grant him that favour, and let him depart according as he himself desired; so they restrained themselves, though weeping still among one another. The only persons who accompanied him, were the senate, and Eleazar the high priest, and Joshua the general. And as soon as they were come to the mountain called Abarim<sup>1</sup> (which is a very high mountain situate over-against Jericho, and one that affords to such as are upon it a prospect of the greatest part of the excellent land of Canaan) he dismissed the senate. And as he was embracing Eleazar and Joshua, and was still conversing with them, a cloud stood over him on a sudden, and he disappeared in a certain ravine. He wrote that he died in the holy books, fearing that people would venture to say, that because of his extraordinary virtue he was translated to God.

§ 49. Now Moses lived, in all, one hundred and twenty years; a third part of which time, all but one month, he was the people's leader; and he died in the last month of the year, which is called by the Macedonians Dvstrus, but by us Adar, on the first day of the month. He was one that exceeded all men that ever lived in understanding, and made the best use of what that understanding suggested to him. He had a very graceful way of speaking and addressing the multitude, and, as to his other qualifications, he had such a full command of his passions, as if he hardly had any such in his soul, and only knew them by name, as rather perceiving them in other men than in himself. He was also such a general of an army as is seldom seen, as well as such a prophet as was never known, so that whatever he uttered you would think you heard the voice of God himself. And the people mourned for him thirty days: nor did ever any grief so deeply affect the Hebrews as did this upon the death of Moses: nor were those that had experienced his conduct the only persons that regretted him, but those also that perused his laws had a strong regard for him, and by them inferred his extraordinary merit. And this shall suffice for the account of the manner of the death of Moses.

BOOK V.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF FOUR HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-SIX YEARS.—FROM THE DEATH OF MOSES TO THE DEATH OF ELI.

CHAP. I.

How Joshua, the Commander of the Hebrews, made War with the Canaanites, and overcame them, and destroyed them, and divided their Land by Lot among the Tribes of Israel.

§ 1.

WHEN Moses was taken away from among men in the manner already described, and when all the solemnities belonging to the mourning for him were finished, and the sorrow for him was over, Joshua commanded the multitude to get themselves ready for an expedition. He also sent spies to Jericho,<sup>1</sup> to discover what forces the enemy had and what were their intentions, and he put his camp in order, intending to cross over the Jordan betimes. And calling to him the chiefs of the tribe of Reuben, and the leaders of the tribe of Gad, and [half the tribe of] Manasseh, for half of this tribe had been permitted to have its possession in the country of the Amorites, [which was the seventh part of the land of Canaan], he reminded them what they had promised Moses, and exhorted them, that in gratitude for the care that Moses had taken of them, who had never been weary of taking pains for them, no, not when he was dying, and for the sake of the public welfare, they would prepare themselves readily for what they had promised; so with fifty thousand armed men who followed him he marched sixty furlongs from Abila<sup>1</sup> to the Jordan.

§ 2. Now when he had pitched his camp, the spies returned to him immediately, having got well acquainted with the condition of the Canaanites: for, at first, before they were at all discovered, they took a full view of the city of Jericho in security, and saw which parts of the walls were strong, and which parts were otherwise, and indeed insecure, and which of the gates were so weak that they might afford an entrance to their army. Now those that met them took no notice of their prying, supposing they were only strangers, who are wont to be very curious in observing everything in a city, and did not take them for enemies; and at even they retired to a certain inn that was near the wall, where they went to eat their supper; after which, as they were considering how to get away, information was given to the king as he was at supper, that there were some spies come from the Hebrews' camp to view the city, and that they were in the inn kept by Rahab, and were very solicitous that they might not be discovered. So he sent immediately some officers with orders to arrest them, and bring them to him, that he might put them to the torture and learn what their business was there. As soon as Rahab heard of their coming, she hid the spies under some stalks of flax which were laid to dry on the top of her house, and said to the officers sent by the king, that certain unknown strangers had supped with her a little before sunset, and were gone away, who might easily be pursued and taken if they were any terror to the city, or likely to bring any danger to the king. So they being thus deluded by the woman, and suspecting no trick, went their way without so much as searching the inn, and immediately pursued them along those roads which they supposed them most likely to have taken, and particularly those which led to the river, but could hear no tidings of them, so they left off the pains of any further pursuit. And when the hue and cry was over, Rahab brought the men down, and besought them, as soon as they should have obtained possession of the land of Canaan, when it would be in their power to make her amends for her preservation of them, to remember what danger she had undergone for their sakes (for if she had been caught concealing them, she could not have escaped the vengeance of the king, but she and all her family with her must have perished miserably), and so bade them go home, after swearing to her to preserve her and her family, when they should take the city, and destroy all its inhabitants, as they had decreed to do, for so much she said she knew from those divine miracles of which she had been informed. And they acknowledged that they owed her thanks for what she had done already, and again swore to requite her kindness not only in word but in deed: and gave her this advice, that when she should perceive that the city was about to be taken, she should put her goods and all her family in her inn, and shut them up there, and hang out scarlet threads before her doors, that the commander of the Hebrews might know her house, and take care to do it no harm. "For," said they, "we will inform him of this matter, because of your zeal to preserve us: but if any of your family fall in the battle, do not blame us: and we beseech that God, by whom we have sworn, not to be displeased with us in that case, as though we had broken our oaths." So these men, when they had made this agreement, went away, letting themselves down by a rope from the wall, and escaped, and told their own people their adventures in Jericho. Joshua also told Eleazar, the high priest, and the senate, what the spies had sworn to Rahab, and they ratified what had been sworn.

§ 3. Now when Joshua was in fear about their passing over the Jordan, for the river ran with a strong current, and could not be passed over on bridges, for bridges had never been laid over it hitherto, and they suspected, if they should attempt to make a bridge, that the enemies would not afford them time to complete it, and as for ferry-boats they had none, God promised to make the river fordable by taking away the main part of its waters. So Joshua, after two days, caused the army and the whole host to pass over in the following manner. The priests went first of all bearing the ark, the Levites next, bearing the tabernacle and the vessels which belonged to the sacrifices; after which the entire host followed according to their tribes, putting their children and wives in the middle, being afraid for them lest they should be borne away by the stream. But as soon as the priests had entered the river first, it appeared fordable, the depth of the water being restrained, and the pebbles appearing at the bottom, because the current was neither so strong nor so swift as to carry them away by its force. So they all passed over the river without fear, finding it to be such as God had foretold he would make it, and the priests stood still in the midst of the river till the host had passed over, and got to the shore in safety: and when all were gone over, the priests came out also; and permitted the current to run freely as usual. And the river, as soon as the Hebrews were come out of it, swelled again presently, and resumed its normal condition.

§ 4. Then the Hebrews went on fifty furlongs further, and pitched their camp at the distance of ten furlongs from Jericho; and Joshua built an altar of those stones which all the heads of the tribes, at the command of the prophet, had taken out of the bed of the river, to be afterwards a memorial of the division of the stream of the river, and upon it offered sacrifice to God, and in that place celebrated the Passover, and had great plenty of all things which they wanted hitherto, for they reaped the corn of the Canaanites, which was now ripe, and took other things as prey, for now their former food, which was manna, of which they had eaten forty years, failed them.

§ 5. Now, while the Israelites did this, and the Canaanites did not attack them, but kept quiet within their walls, Joshua resolved to besiege them. So on the first day of the feast the priests carried the ark round about, with some part of the armed men to be a guard to it. These priests went forward, blowing with their seven trumpets; and exhorted the army to be of good courage, and went round about the city, the senate following them; and when the priests had only blown with the trumpets, for they did nothing more at all, they returned to the camp. And when they had done this for six days, Joshua on the seventh day gathered together the armed men and all the people, and told them the good tidings that the city would now be taken, since God would on that day give it them by the falling down of its walls, and that of their own accord and without their labour. However, he charged them to kill everyone they should take, and not to abstain from the slaughter of their enemies either from weariness or pity, and not to fall on the spoil, and so be diverted from pursuing their enemies as they ran away, but to destroy all the animals, and to take nothing for their own private advantage. He commanded them also to bring together all the silver and gold, that it might be set apart as first-fruits unto God for this glorious victory, as being got from the city they first took; and to save only Rahab and her kindred alive, because of the oath which the spies had sworn to her.

§ 6. When he had said this, and had set his army in order, he brought it against the city; so they went round the city again, the ark going before them, and the priests with their trumpets encouraging the people to be zealous in the work; and when they had gone round it seven times, and had stood still a little, the wall fell down, though no engines of war, nor any violence, were applied to it by the Hebrews.

§ 7. So they entered Jericho, and slew all the men that were therein, who were dismayed at the unexpected overthrow of their walls, and their courage became useless for defence. So they were slain and their throats cut, some in the ways, and others caught in their houses; nothing begged them off, but they all perished, even women and children; and the city was filled with dead bodies, and nothing escaped. They also burnt the whole city, and the country round it; only the spies saved alive Rahab and her family, who had fled for refuge to her inn. And when she was brought before him, Joshua owned to her, that they owed her thanks for her preservation of the spies: so he said he would not show himself behind her in his return. So he gave her certain lands immediately, and held her in great esteem ever afterwards.

§ 8. And if any part of the city escaped the fire, he rased it to the ground, and denounced a curse against its inhabitants, if anyone should desire to rebuild it, that, upon his laying the foundation of the walls, he should be deprived of his eldest son, and upon finishing it, he should lose his youngest son. Nor was this curse pronounced in vain, as I shall show hereafter.

§ 9. Now there was an immense quantity of silver and gold and brass also, that was heaped together out of the city when it was taken, no one transgressing the decree, nor purloining for their own advantage, but abstaining from what was devoted to God, for Joshua delivered the spoil to the priests, to be laid up among their treasures. And thus did Jericho perish.

§ 10. But there was one Achar, the son [of Charmi, the son] of Zebedias, of the tribe of Judah, who, finding a royal cloak woven entirely of gold, and a piece of gold that weighed two hundred shekels, and thinking it a very hard case, that what gain he at some hazard had got, he must give away, and offer to God, who stood in no need of it, while he that wanted it must go without it, dug a deep hole in his tent, and buried them there, supposing he should not only be undetected by his fellow-soldiers, but by God also.

§ 11. Now the place where Joshua pitched his camp was called Gilgal,<sup>1</sup> which denotes liberty; for since now they had passed over the Jordan, they looked upon themselves as liberated from the miseries which they had undergone from the Egyptians, and suffered in the wilderness.

§ 12. Now a few days after the calamity that befell Jericho, Joshua sent three thousand armed men to take Ai,<sup>2</sup> a city situate above Jericho: but the people of Ai engaging with them, they were driven back, and lost thirty-six of their men. When this was told the Israelites, it made them very sad and exceedingly dejected, not so much because of the relation the men that were killed bore to them, though those that were killed were all good men and deserved their esteem, as by the despair it occasioned. For whereas they believed that they were already in possession of the land, and would bring their army out of battles without loss, as God had promised them, they now saw unexpectedly their enemies elated with success; so they put sackcloth on their garments, and continued in tears and lamentation all the day, without the least care for food, and laid what had happened greatly to heart.

§ 13. When Joshua saw the army so dejected, and foreboding evil as to their whole expedition, he used freedom with God, and said, "We are not come thus far out of any rashness of our own, as though we thought ourselves able to subdue this land with our own weapons, but at the instigation of Moses your servant, to whom you promised by many signs that you would give us this land for a possession, and that you would make our army always superior in war to our enemies, and accordingly some success has attended upon us agreeably to your promises; but because we have now unexpectedly been foiled, and have lost some of our men, we are grieved at it, fearing what you promised us, and what Moses foretold us, cannot be depended on by us; and our hope about the future troubles us the more, because we have met with such a disaster in this our first attempt. But do you, O Lord (for you are able to find a cure for this), by giving us victory take away the grief we are in at present, and prevent our despair as to the future.

§ 14. Joshua put these intercessions up to God, as he lay prostrate on his face: and God bade him get up, and purify the host from the pollution which had got into it; for things consecrated to him had been impudently stolen, and that was the reason why this defeat had happened to them, but if they would search out and punish the offender, he would take care they should ever have the victory over their enemies. Joshua told the people this, and calling for Eleazar the high priest, and those in authority, he cast lots, tribe by tribe, and when the lot showed that this wicked action was done by one of the tribe of Judah, he again cast lots for the several families of that tribe, when this wicked action was brought home to the family of Achar; and when the inquiry was made man by man, they took Achar, who, upon God's finding him out so wonderfully, could not deny the fact; but confessed the theft, and produced what he had stolen, and was immediately put to death, and was buried in the night in a dishonourable manner, as was suitable for a condemned malefactor.

§ 15. When Joshua had thus purified the host, he led them against Ai, and having by night laid an ambush round about the city, he attacked the enemies as soon as it was day; and as they advanced boldly against the Israelites because of their former victory, he made believe to retreat, and so drew them a great way from the city, they supposing that they were pursuing their enemies, and despising them as though they had already won the battle, when Joshua ordered his forces to turn about, and face their foes; he then made the signals agreed upon to those that lay in ambush, and so made them get up to fight; so they ran suddenly into the city, the inhabitants being upon the walls, and some of them wholly occupied in watching what was going on outside the city. So they took the city, and slew all that they met with, and Joshua pressed hard those that came against him to battle, and discomfited them, and made them flee; and when they were driven towards the city, which they thought was safe, as soon as they saw it was taken and burnt with their wives and children, they wandered about the fields in confusion, and were unable to defend themselves because of their isolation. Now when this calamity fell upon the men of Ai, there were a great number of children and women and servants captured, and an immense quantity of baggage. The Hebrews also took herds of cattle, and a great deal of money, for it was a rich country. And when Joshua came to Gilgal, he divided all this spoil among the soldiers.

§ 16. But when the Gibeonites, who dwelt very near Jerusalem, saw what miseries had happened to the inhabitants of Jericho, and to those of Ai, and suspected that the like sore calamity would come upon themselves, they decided not to ask for mercy of Joshua, for they supposed they should find little mercy from him, who made war that he might entirely destroy every nation of the Canaanites, but they invited the people of Cepherah<sup>1</sup> and Kirjathjearim,<sup>2</sup> who were their neighbours, to join in league with them; and told them, that neither could they themselves avoid danger, if the Israelites should anticipate them, and attack them; so they combined, and resolved to endeavour to escape the forces of the Israelites. So, on agreeing to what they proposed, they sent as ambassadors to Joshua, to make a league of friendship with him, such of the citizens as they judged most capable of doing what was most advantageous to the multitude. Now these ambassadors thought it dangerous to confess themselves to be Canaanites, but thought they might avoid the danger by saying, that they bore no relation to the Canaanites at all, but dwelt at a very great distance from them; and they said further, that they took their journey on account of the reputation he had gained for his virtue; and as a mark of the truth of what they said, they pointed to their dress, for they said their clothes were new when they started, but were worn out by the length of time they had been on their journey, for indeed they took threadbare garments on purpose that they might make him believe them. So they stood in the midst of the people, and said that they were sent by the people of Gibeon,<sup>3</sup> and the adjacent cities, which were very remote from the land where they now were, to make a league of friendship with them, on such conditions as were customary among their fathers; for as they understood, that, by the favour of God and his gift, they were to have possession of the land of Canaan bestowed upon them, they said that they were very glad to hear it, and desired to be admitted into the number of their citizens. Thus did these ambassadors speak, and, showing them the marks of their long journey, entreated the Hebrews to make a league of friendship with them. And Joshua believing what they said, that they were not of the nation of the Canaanites, entered into friendship with them, and Eleazar the high priest, with the senate, swore to them, that they would esteem them their friends and associates, and would do no injury to them, the multitude also assenting to the oaths that were made to them. So these men, having obtained what they desired by guile, went home; but when Joshua led his army to the foot of the mountains, he learned that the Gibeonites dwelt not far from Jerusalem, and that they were of the stock of the Canaanites, so he sent for their chiefs, and reproached them with the cheat they had put upon him; but they alleged on their own behalf, that they had no other way to save themselves but that, and were therefore forced to have recourse to it. So he convened Eleazar the high priest and the senate, who thought right to make the Gibeonites public servants, that they might not break the oath they had made to them, and they ordained them to be so. And this was the method by which these men found safety and security against the ruin that was about to overtake them.

§ 17. But the king of Jerusalem was very indignant that the Gibeonites had gone over to Joshua, so he called upon the kings of the neighbouring nations to join together, and make war against them. Now, when the Gibeonites saw these kings, who were four besides the king of Jerusalem, come up to attack them, and perceived that they had pitched their camp at a certain fountain, not far from their city, and were getting ready to besiege it, they called upon Joshua to assist them; for such was their case, as to expect to be destroyed by these Canaanites, but to suppose they would be saved by those who came for the destruction of the Canaanites, because of the league of friendship ratified between them. And Joshua made haste with his whole army to their relief, and marched day and night, and in the morning fell upon the enemies, who could not bear the brunt of his attack, and routed them, and hotly pursued them down the descent of the hills. The place is called Beth-horon;<sup>1</sup> and there he saw that God assisted him, manifesting his presence by thunder and thunderbolts, as also by the falling of hail larger than usual. Moreover, it happened that the day was lengthened, that the night might not come on too soon, and hinder the vigour of the Hebrews in pursuing their enemies, so that Joshua took the kings, who were hidden in a certain cave at Makkedah,<sup>1</sup> and put them all to death. Now, that the day was lengthened at this time, and was longer than ordinary, is declared in the books laid up in the temple.

§ 18. Those kings who made war upon the Gibeonites being thus overthrown, Joshua returned again to the mountainous part of Canaan; and when he had made a great slaughter of the people there, and taken much prey, he returned to the camp at Gilgal. And now there went a great fame abroad among the neighbouring people of the courage of the Hebrews, and those that heard what a number had been destroyed were in great consternation; so the kings that lived about Mount Libanus, who were Canaanites, and those Canaanites that dwelt in the plains, with auxiliaries of the Philistines, pitched their camp at Beroth,<sup>2</sup> a city in Upper Galilee, not far from Kadesh,<sup>3</sup> which is also a place in Galilee. Now the number of the whole army was three hundred thousand armed foot, and ten thousand horse, and twenty thousand chariots, so that the multitude of the enemies affrighted both Joshua himself and the Israelites: and they, instead of being full of hope of good success, were over cautious from the great terror with which they were stricken. And God upbraided them with the fear they were in, and asked them, Whether they desired a greater help than he could afford them? and promised them, that they should overcome their enemies; and charged them to make their enemies' horses useless, and to burn their chariots. And Joshua became full of courage upon these promises of God, and marched out against the enemies, and came up with them on the fifth day, and joined battle with them, and there was a terrible fight, and such a number were slain as could not be believed by those that heard it. He also pursued them a very great way, and destroyed the entire army of the enemies, few only excepted, and all the kings fell in the battle; insomuch, that when the supply of men to be killed failed, Joshua slew their horses, and burnt their chariots, and passed all over their country without opposition, no one daring to meet him in battle, taking their cities by siege, and killing all that he found.

§ 19. Five years had now elapsed, and there was not one of the Canaanites remaining any longer, except some that had retired to places of great strength. So Joshua removed his camp from Gilgal to the mountainous country, and placed the tabernacle in the city Shiloh,<sup>1</sup> for that seemed a fit place for it, because of the beauty of its situation, until circumstances would permit them to build a temple; and from thence he went to Shechem, together with all the people, and raised an altar where Moses had before directed; and divided the host, placing half of them on Mount Gerizim, and the other half on Mount Ebal, on which mountain the altar was; he also placed there the tribe of Levi, and the priests. And when they had sacrificed and pronounced the [blessings and the] curses, and left them engraven upon the altar, they returned to Shiloh.

§ 20. And now Joshua was old, and saw that the cities of the Canaanites were not easy to take, not only because they were situated in such strong places, but because of the strength of the walls themselves, by which they added to the natural advantages of the ground on which the cities stood, and expected their enemies would despair of taking them by siege, for when the Canaanites had learned that the Israelites came out of Egypt to destroy them, they were busy all that time in making their cities strong. So he gathered the people together in assembly at Shiloh; and when they with great zeal hastened thither, he observed to them, what prosperous success they had already had, and what glorious things had been done, such as were worthy of that God who enabled them to do them, and worthy of the excellence of those laws which they followed. He said also, that thirty-one of those kings that ventured to give them battle were overcome, and that every army, however great it were, that confided in its own power, and fought with them, was utterly destroyed, so that not so much as any of their posterity remained. And as for the cities, since some of them were taken, but the others must be taken in process of time by long sieges, both on account of the strength of their walls, and of the consequent confidence the inhabitants had in them, he thought it reasonable that those tribes that had come along with them from beyond the Jordan, and had partaken of the dangers they had undergone, being their own kindred, should now be dismissed and sent home, with thanks for the aid they had given. He also thought it well to select one man out of every tribe, held in repute for eminent virtue, who should measure the land faithfully, and without any deceit or fraud should inform them of its real size.

§ 21. Now when he had thus spoken, Joshua found that the multitude approved of his proposal. So he sent men to measure the country, and sent with them some geometricians, who could not easily miss the truth, on account of their skill in that art. He also gave them orders to estimate the measure of that part of the land that was most fruitful, and what was not so good; for such is the nature of the land of Canaan, that one may see large plains, and such as are exceeding fit to produce fruit, which, if compared to other parts of the country, might be reckoned exceedingly fruitful, yet if compared with the land about Jericho and Jerusalem, would appear to be of no account at all. And although it so fell out, that there was very little of this sort of land, and that in the main mountainous also, yet did it not come behind other parts, on account of its exceeding fertility and beauty: for which reason Joshua thought the land for the tribes should be divided by its quality rather than its quantity, it often happening that one acre of some land was equivalent to a thousand acres of other. Now the men that were sent, who were in number ten, travelled all about, and made a valuation of the land, and in the seventh month returned to Joshua to the city of Shiloh, where they had set up the tabernacle.

§ 22. Then Joshua, in conjunction with Eleazar, and the senate, and the heads of the tribes, distributed the land to the nine tribes, and to half the tribe of Manasseh, appointing their portion to be according to the size of each tribe. So when he had cast lots, Judah had assigned to him by lot the upper part of Judæa, reaching as far as Jerusalem, and in breadth extending to the lake of Sodom.<sup>1</sup> In the lot of this tribe were the cities of Ascalon<sup>2</sup> and Gaza.<sup>3</sup> The lot of Simeon, which was the second, included that part of Idumæa<sup>4</sup> which bordered upon Egypt and Arabia. As to the Benjamites, their lot fell so, that in length it reached from the river Jordan to the sea, but in breadth it was bounded by Jerusalem and Bethel;<sup>5</sup> and this lot was the narrowest of all, by reason of the goodness of the land, for it included Jericho and the city of Jerusalem. The tribe of Ephraim had by lot the land that extended in length from the river Jordan to Gadara,<sup>6</sup> but in breadth as far as from Bethel till it ended at the great plain. Half the tribe of Manasseh had the land from the Jordan to the city Dora,<sup>7</sup> and in breadth to Bethshan,<sup>8</sup> which is now called Scythopolis. And after these was Issachar, which had as its limits in length Mount Carmel and the river, and its limit in breadth was Mount Tabor. The tribe of Zebulon's lot included the land which lay as far as the lake of Genesareth, contiguous to Carmel and the sea. The tribe of Asher had that part from Mount Carmel which was called The Valley,<sup>9</sup> and such it was, and all that part which lay over against Sidon. The city Arce<sup>10</sup> belonged to its share, which is also called Ecdipus. The tribe of Naphtali received the eastern parts as far as the city of Damascus and Upper Galilee, and Mount Libanus, and the source of the Jordan which rises in that mountain, extending to the northern boundaries of the neighbouring city Arce. The Danites' lot included all that part of the valley<sup>11</sup> which faces the setting sun, and was bounded by Azotus<sup>12</sup> and Dora; they

§ 23. Thus did Joshua divide the six nations that bear the names of the sons of Canaan, and their land, to be possessed by the nine tribes and a half; for Moses had anticipated him by having already distributed the land of the Amorites, which itself was also called from one of the sons of Canaan, to the two tribes and a half, as I have already stated. And the parts about Sidon, as also those that belonged to the Arucæi and the Amathæi, and the Aridei, were not yet regularly disposed of.

§ 24. And now Joshua was hindered by old age from executing what he intended to do (and those that succeeded him in the government took little care of what was for the advantage of the public), but he charged every tribe to leave none of the race of the Canaanites in the land divided to them by lot; as Moses had assured them before, that they might rest fully satisfied about it, that their security, and the observation of their laws, depended wholly upon it. Moreover, he enjoined them to give thirty-eight cities to the Levites, for they had already received ten in the country of the Amorites, and three of these he appointed as cities of refuge, for he was very solicitous that nothing should be neglected which Moses had ordained. These cities were, in the tribe of Judah, Hebron;<sup>4</sup> and in that of Ephraim, Shechem;<sup>5</sup> and in Naphthali, Kadesh.<sup>6</sup> which is a place in Upper Galilee. He also distributed among them the rest of the prey not yet distributed, which was very great, so that they had an abundance of wealth both in general and in particular, and gold and raiment, and other spoil, besides a multitude of cattle, whose number could not be told.

§ 25. After this was over, he gathered the host together in assembly, and spoke as follows to those tribes who had their settlement in the land of the Amorites beyond the Jordan, for fifty thousand of them had gone armed to the war along with them : “ Since God, who is the father and Lord of the Hebrew nation, has now given us this land for a possession, and promised to preserve us in the enjoyment of it as our own for ever ; and since you offered yourselves with alacrity to assist us when we needed your aid on all occasions according to his command, it is but just, now all our difficulties are over, that you should be permitted to enjoy rest, and that we should trespass on your alacrity to help us no longer. that so, if we should again stand in need of it, we may readily have it on any future emergency, and not weary you out so much now as may make you slower in assisting us another time. We therefore return you our thanks for the dangers you have shared with us, and we do so not now only, but we shall be always thus disposed, and be so good as to remember our friends, and to keep in mind what advantages we have had from them, and how you have put off the enjoyment of your own happiness for our sakes, and have laboured with us for what we have now by the favour of God obtained, and resolved not to enjoy your own prosperity till you had afforded us assistance. However, you have, by joining your labour with ours, got great quantity of riches, and will carry home with you much booty and gold and silver, and, what is more than all these, our good-will towards you, and a willingness to repay your kindness to us in whatever case you shall desire it, for you have not omitted anything which Moses before ordered you, nor have you despised him because he was dead and gone from men, so that there is nothing to diminish the gratitude which we owe to you. We therefore dismiss you joyful to your inheritance, and entreat you to think that there is no limit to our kinsmanship, and not to imagine, because this river is interposed between us, that we are a different race from you and not Hebrews, for we are all the posterity of Abraham, both we that dwell here, and you that dwell there, and it is one God that brought our and your forefathers into the world, whose worship and polity, which he ordained by Moses, you are to attend to, and most carefully to observe ; because while you continue in it God will also ever show himself favourable and helpful to you ; but if you imitate other nations, and forsake him, he will reject your nation." When Joshua had spoken thus, and saluted them all, the chiefs one by one, and the whole multitude in common, he himself stayed where he was, but the people escorted those tribes on their way, and that not without tears, and indeed they hardly knew how to part from one another.

§ 26. Now when the tribe of Reuben, and that of Gad, and as many of the Manassites as followed them, were passed over the river, they built an altar on the bank of the Jordan, as a monument to posterity, and a sign of their relationship to those that should dwell on the other side: but when those on the other side heard that those who had been sent home had built an altar, but did not know with what intention they built it, but supposed it to be by way of innovation for the introduction of strange gods, they did not incline to disbelieve it, but thinking the calumny that it was built for divine worship was credible, they took up arms, as though they would avenge themselves on those that built the altar, and were about to pass over the river, and to punish them for their violation of the laws of their country, for they did not think it right to regard their kindred, or the worth of those that had given the offence, so much as the will of God, and the manner wherein he desired to be worshipped. So these men put themselves in array for war: but Joshua, and Eleazar the high priest, and the senate, restrained them; and persuaded them first to test their intention by a colloquy, and if they found that their intention was evil, then only to proceed to make war upon them. Accordingly they sent as envoys to them Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, and ten others held in esteem among the Hebrews, to learn of them what was their meaning in building, upon passing over the river, an altar upon its bank. And as soon as these envoys had passed over, and were come to them, and a meeting was assembled, Phinehas stood up and said, that the offence they had been guilty of was of too heinous a nature to be punished by words alone, or censured in regard to the future; yet they did not look at the heinousness of their transgression so as to have recourse to arms for their immediate punishment, but on account of their kindred, and the probability there was that they might be reclaimed, they took this method of sending envoys to them, "that when we have learned the motive by which you have been induced to build this altar, we may not seem to have been too rash in pursuing you with arms, if it prove that you made the altar for justifiable reasons, but may justly punish you if the accusation prove true. For we can hardly suppose that you who have been acquainted with the will of God, and have been bearers of those laws which he himself hath given us, now you are separated from us and gone to your own inheritance, which you, through the grace of God, and that providence he exercises over you, have obtained by lot, can forget him, and can leave that ark, and that altar, which is peculiar to us, and can introduce strange gods, and imitate the wicked practices of the Canaanites. Now this will appear to have been a small crime, if you repent now, and proceed no further in your madness, but pay a due reverence and regard to the laws of your country; but if you persist in your sins, we will not grudge our pains to preserve our laws, but we will pass over the Jordan and defend them and God also, and will esteem you as men no way differing from the Canaanites, but will destroy you just as we destroyed them. For do not imagine, because you are got over the river, that you are got out of the reach of God's power; you are everywhere in his reach, and it is impossible to escape his power and vengeance. And if you think that your settlement here will be any obstruction to your religious feelings, nothing need hinder us from dividing the land anew, and leaving this land as a sheep-walk; but you will do well to return to your sense of religion, and to leave off these novelties; and we beseech you, by your children and wives, not to force us to punish you. Deliberate therefore in this assembly, as supposing that your own safety, and the safety of those that are dearest to you, is therein concerned, and believe that it is better for you to be conquered by words, than to continue in your purpose, and to experience deeds and war."

§ 27. When Phinehas had discoursed thus, the chief men in the assembly and the whole multitude began to make an apology for themselves as to what they were accused of, and said, "That neither would they depart from the relation they bore to them, nor had they built the altar by way of innovation: but they recognized one and the same God as all the Hebrews, and the brazen altar which was before the tabernacle, on which they would offer their sacrifices. And as to the altar they had raised, on account of which they were thus suspected, it was not built for worship, but that it might be a sign and memorial for ever of our relation to you, and a necessary caution to us to act wisely, and to continue in the laws of our country, but not a handle for transgressing them, as you suspect. And let God be our sufficient witness, that this was the occasion of our building this altar. So we beg you will have a better opinion of us, and do not impute such a thing to us as would render any of the posterity of Abraham well worthy of utter destruction, in case they attempt to bring in new rites, and such as are different from our usual practices."

§ 28. When they had made this answer, and Phinehas had commended them for it, he returned to Joshua, and reported to the people what answer he had received: and Joshua was glad that he was under no necessity of setting them in battle array, or of leading them to shed blood, and make war against men of their own kindred; and he offered sacrifices of thanksgiving to God for the same. And after that Joshua dismissed the people to their own inheritances, while he himself lived in Shechem. And in the twentieth year after this, when he was very old, he sent for those of the greatest position in the several cities, for those in authority, and the senate, and convened as many of the common people as could be present: and when they were come, he reminded them of all the benefits God had bestowed on them, which could not but be a great many, since they were advanced from a low estate to so great a degree of glory and plenty, and exhorted them to regard the will of God, which had been so gracious towards them, for the Deity would continue their friend only if they honoured him and practised piety; and he said that it was proper for him, now he was about to depart out of this life, to leave such advice to them, and he desired they would keep in memory his exhortation to them.

§ 29. So Joshua, when he had thus discoursed to them, died, having lived a hundred and ten years; forty of which he lived with Moses, in order to learn his duties. He was also commander, after his death, for twenty-five years. He was a man that wanted not wisdom nor eloquence to declare his intentions to the people, but was very eminent on both accounts. He was of great courage and magnanimity in action and in dangers; and very sagacious in procuring the peace of the people, and of great merit in emergencies. He was buried in the city of Timnath,<sup>1</sup> belonging to the tribe of Ephraim. About the same time Eleazar the high priest died, leaving the high priesthood to his son Phinehas. His sepulchre and monument are in the city of Gabatha.<sup>2</sup>

CHAP. II.

How, after the Death of Joshua their Commander, the Israelites transgressed the Laws of their Country, and experienced great afflictions; and how, when there was a Sedition, all the tribe of Benjamin was destroyed, except six hundred men.

§ 1.

NOW after the death of Joshua and Eleazar, Phinehas prophesied that it was God's will that they should commit the government to the tribe of Judah, and that this tribe should destroy the race of the Canaanites, for the people were concerned to learn what was the will of God. They also took to their assistance the tribe of Simeon, on condition that when those that had been tributary to the tribe of Judah should be slain, they should do the same for those in the inheritance of Simeon.

§ 2. But the affairs of the Canaanites were at this time in a flourishing condition, and they waited for the Israelites with a great army at the city Bezek,<sup>3</sup> having put the command into the hands of Adonibezek, which name denotes the lord of Bezek, for Adoni in the Hebrew tongue means lord. Now they hoped to have been victorious over the Israelites, because Joshua was dead: but when the Israelites joined battle with them, I mean the two tribes just mentioned, they fought gloriously, and slew above ten thousand of them, and put the rest to flight, and in the pursuit captured Adonibezek, who, when his fingers and toes were cut off by them, said, "I was not then always to escape from God, as I find by what I now endure, for I was not ashamed to do the same to seventy-two kings." And they carried him alive as far as Jerusalem, and when he was dead they buried him in the ground, and went on still taking the Canaanitish cities: and when they had taken most of them, they besieged Jerusalem. And when they had taken the lower city, which was not for a considerable time, they slew all the inhabitants; but the upper city was not to be taken without great difficulty, from the strength of its walls and the nature of the place.

§ 3. So they removed their camp to Hebron, and when they had taken it, they slew all the inhabitants. There were still left some of the race of giants, who had bodies so large, and so entirely different an appearance from other men, that they were surprising to the sight, and terrible to the hearing. The bones of these men are still shown to this very day, unlike any credible relations of other men. Now they gave Hebron to the Levites as an extraordinary reward, with its suburbs of two thousand cubits; but the land belonging thereto they gave as a free gift to Caleb, according to the injunctions of Moses: this Caleb was one of the spies whom Moses sent into the land of Canaan. They also gave land for habitation to the posterity of Jethro the Midianite, who was the father-in-law of Moses, for they had left their own country, and followed them, and accompanied them in the wilderness.

sorely galled those that attacked them; so these tribes having grown very rich by the war, retired to their own cities, and laid down their arms.

§ 5. But the Benjamites, to whom Jerusalem belonged, permitted its inhabitants to pay tribute: so they all left off, the former to kill, and the latter to expose themselves to danger, and had leisure to till the ground; the rest of the tribes imitated the Benjamites, and did the same; and contenting themselves with the tribute that was paid them, permitted the Canaanites to live in peace.

§ 6. But the tribe of Ephraim, when they besieged Bethel,<sup>1</sup> made no adequate progress, considering the time they spent and the pains they took about the siege, yet did they persist in it, still sitting down before the city, though it gave them great trouble. At last they caught one of the citizens that came to bring necessaries: and they promised him that if he would deliver up the city to them, they would preserve him and his kindred; and he swore, upon these terms, that he would put the city into their hands. Accordingly, he that thus betrayed the city was preserved with his family, and the Israelites slew all the inhabitants, and retained the city.

§ 7. After this, the Israelites grew lax about fighting any more against their enemies, and applied themselves to the cultivation of the land, and as it produced them great plenty and riches, they neglected order, and indulged themselves in luxury and pleasure, nor were they any longer careful to hearken to the laws of their polity. So God was provoked to anger, and first reminded them how, contrary to his will, they had spared the Canaanites, and after that told them that these Canaanites, as opportunity occurred, would use them very barbarously. But the Israelites, though they were in heaviness at this admonition from God, were still very unwilling to go to war, since they got large tribute from the Canaanites, and were indisposed for exertion by their luxury. They suffered their aristocracy to be corrupted also, and did not appoint a senate, or any other magistrates such as their laws had formerly required, but were very much given to cultivating their fields, in order to get wealth. And this great security of theirs brought a terrible sedition upon them, and they proceeded so far as to fight against one another for the following reason.

§ 8. There was a Levite of no great extraction, who belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, and dwelt therein; he had married a wife from Bethlehem, a place belonging to the tribe of Judah. Now he was very fond of his wife, and greatly smitten with her beauty; but he was unhappy in this, that he did not meet with the like return of affection from her, for she was averse to him, which the more inflamed his passion for her, so that they quarrelled with one another perpetually; and at last, the woman was so disgusted at these quarrels, that she left her husband, and returned to her parents in the fourth month. The husband, being very uneasy at her departure owing to his fondness for her, went to her parents, and got reconciled to her, and lived there four days, being kindly treated by her parents. On the fifth day he resolved to go home, and started in the evening; for his wife's parents were loath to part with their daughter, and delayed her till the day was gone. Now they had one servant that followed them, and an ass on which the woman rode; and when they were near Jerusalem, having gone already thirty furlongs, the servant advised them to put up somewhere lest some misfortune should befall them if they travelled in the night, especially since they were not far from enemies, night-time often giving reason for suspicion of danger from even friends. But the husband was not pleased with this advice, nor was he willing to lodge among strangers, for the city belonged to the Canaanites, but desired rather to go twenty furlongs further, and so lodge in some Israelitish city. And he got his way, and reached Gibeah,<sup>1</sup> a city belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, when it was just dark; and as no one that lived in the market-place invited him to lodge with him, there came up out of his field an old man who belonged to the tribe of Ephraim but resided in Gibeah, who met him, and asked him who he was? and for what reason he came there so late? and why he was trying to get supper when it was dark? To which he replied that he was a

Levite, and was bringing his wife from her parents, and was going home, and he also told him he dwelt in the tribe of Ephraim. So the old man, because of their kindred, and because they belonged to the same tribe, and also because they had thus accidentally met one another, took him in to lodge with him. Now certain young men of Gibeah, having seen the woman in the market-place, and admired her beauty, when they understood that she lodged with the old man, came to the doors, despising the weakness and fewness of the old man's family. And when the old man desired them to go away, and not to offer any violence or outrage there, they desired him to yield up to them the strange woman, and then he should have no harm done to him; and when the old man answered, that the Levite was of his kindred, and that they would be guilty of dreadful wickedness, if they suffered themselves to be overcome by pleasure, and offended against their laws, they despised his righteous admonition, and laughed him to scorn, and threatened to kill him if he thwarted their desires. Thereupon, being in great distress, and yet not willing to see his guests abused, he produced his own daughter to them; and told them, that it was a smaller breach of the law to satisfy their lust upon her than to abuse his guests; supposing that by this means he would prevent any injury being done to those guests. But as they no way abated of their lust for the strange woman, but insisted absolutely on having her, he entreated them not to perpetrate any such lawless act, but they proceeded to force, and indulging still more the violence of their desires, they took the woman away to their own house, and when they had satisfied their lust upon her the whole night, they let her go about daybreak. So she came to the place where she had been entertained, in great affliction at what had happened, and very sorrowful at what she had suffered, and durst not look her husband in the face for shame, for she concluded that he would never forget what had happened. so she fell down and gave up the ghost; but her husband, supposing that his wife was only fast asleep, and thinking nothing of a more melancholy nature had occurred, endeavoured to raise her up, resolving to console her, since she had not voluntarily submitted to those men's lust, but was forced away to their house; but as soon as he perceived she was dead, he acted as prudently as the greatness of his misfortunes would admit, and laid his dead wife upon the ass, and carried her home; and cutting her limb by limb into twelve parts, he sent one to every tribe, and charged those that carried them to inform the tribes who were the causes of his wife's death, and of their outrageous conduct to her.

§ 9. Upon this, the people were greatly exasperated at what they saw, and at the atrocity of what they heard, as never having experienced such a thing before; so they gathered themselves to Shiloh, in an uncontrollable and righteous rage, and assembled in crowds before the tabernacle, and immediately resolved to take arms, and to treat the inhabitants of Gibeah as enemies. But the senate restrained them from doing so, and persuaded them that they ought not so hastily to make war upon men of the same nation as themselves, before they spoke to them about the accusation laid against them, it being part of their law that they should not bring an army against even foreigners, who appeared to have done them wrong, without sending an embassy first, and trying thereby whether they would repent or not. Accordingly, they exhorted them to do what they ought to do in obedience to their laws, that is, to send to the inhabitants of Gibeah, to see whether they would deliver up the offenders to them, and if they delivered them up, to rest satisfied with the punishment of those offenders; but if they despised the message that was sent them, to retaliate by taking up arms against them. Accordingly, they sent to the inhabitants of Gibeah, and accused the young men of the crime committed in the affair of the Levite's wife, and demanded of them those that had done what was contrary to the law, that they might be punished, having justly deserved to die for what they had done. But the inhabitants of Gibeah would not deliver up the young men, and thought it monstrous from fear of war to submit to other men's demands upon them, vaunting themselves to be no way inferior to any in arms, either in their numbers or in courage. The rest of their tribe were also making great preparations for war, for they were so mad as to resolve to repel force by force.

§ 10. When what the inhabitants of Gibeah had resolved upon was reported to the Israelites, they took oaths that none of them would give his daughter in marriage to a Benjamite, but would make war with greater fury against them than we have heard our forefathers made war against the Canaanites. And forthwith they despatched an army of four hundred thousand against them, while the Benjamites' army was only twenty-five thousand and six hundred ; five hundred of whom were excellent at slinging stones with their left hand, insomuch that when a battle took place at Gibeah, the Benjamites routed the Israelites, and there fell of them twenty-two thousand men ; and probably more would have been killed, had not night come on, and prevented this, and broken off the fight ; so the Benjamites returned to Gibeah with joy, and the Israelites returned to their camp in great dismay at what had happened. On the next day, when they fought again, the Benjamites again beat them, and eighteen thousand of the Israelites were slain ; and they left their camp from fear of being slaughtered. So they went to Bethel, a city that was near their camp, and fasted the next day, and besought God by Phinehas the high priest, that his wrath against them might cease, and that he would be satisfied with these two defeats, and give them the victory and superiority over their enemies. And God promised them so to do by the prophesying of Phinehas.

§ 11. When they had therefore divided the army into two parts, they laid half in ambush near the city of Gibeah by night, while the other half attacked the Benjamites, and retiring as they pressed hard upon them, the Benjamites pursued them, while the Hebrews retired by slow degrees, wishing to draw them entirely from the city, and the others followed them as they retired, till both the old men and young men that were left in the city, as too weak to fight, came running out together with them, wishing to subdue their enemies. However, when they were a great way from the city, the Hebrews ran away no longer, but turned back to fight them, and made the signal they had agreed on to those that lay in ambush, who rose up, and fell upon the enemy with a great shout. Now, as soon as they perceived themselves to be outwitted, they knew not what to do, and being driven into a certain hollow place which was a ravine, they were shot at by those that surrounded them, till they were all killed, except six hundred who formed themselves into a compact body, and cut their way through the midst of their enemies, and fled to the neighbouring mountains, and occupied them, and remained there; but the rest of them, amounting to about twenty-five thousand, were slain. Then did the Israelites burn Gibeah, and slew the women, and the males that were not in their prime, and did the same also to the other cities of the Benjamites. And indeed they were enraged to that degree, that they despatched twelve thousand men from the army, and gave them orders to destroy Jabesh<sup>1</sup> in Gilead, because it had not joined them in fighting against the Benjamites. And those that were sent slew the men of war, with their children and wives, sparing only four hundred virgins. To such a degree did they proceed in their anger, because they had not only the suffering of the Levite's wife to avenge, but also the slaughter of their own soldiers.

§ 12. However, they were afterwards sorry for the calamity they had brought upon the Benjamites, and appointed a fast on that account, although they thought those men had suffered justly for their sin against the laws: so they recalled by envoys those six hundred who had escaped, and taken up their position on a certain rock called Rhoa,<sup>2</sup> which was in the wilderness. And the envoys lamented not only the disaster that had befallen the Benjamites, but themselves also, by this destruction of their kindred, and persuaded them to take it patiently, and to come and unite with them, and not, so far as in them lay, to give their vote for the utter destruction of the tribe of Benjamin; and said to them, "We give you leave to take the whole land of Benjamin to yourselves, and as much prey as you are able to carry away with you." Then they gave way, and confessed that what had been done was according to the decree of God, and had happened in consequence of their own wickedness, and listened to their invitation, and went down to their own tribe. The Israelites also gave them the four hundred virgins of Jabesh in Gilead for wives; but as to the remaining two hundred, they deliberated as to how they might get wives by whom they might have children: and whereas they had, before the war began, taken an oath that no one would give his daughter to wife to a Benjamite, some advised them to have no regard to what they had sworn, because the oath had not been taken advisedly and judiciously, but in a passion, and thought that they would not offend God, if they were able to save a whole tribe which was in danger of perishing, and that perjury was not dreadful and injurious when it was done out of necessity, but only when it was done with a wicked intention. But when the senate cried out at the very name of perjury, a certain person told them, that he could show them a way whereby they might procure the Benjamites wives enough, and yet keep their oath. They asked him what his plan was? "Three times a year," he said, "when we meet in Shiloh at festival time, our wives and daughters accompany us; let the Benjamites then be allowed to steal away and marry such maidens as they can catch, while we neither incite them nor forbid them: and if their parents take it ill, and desire us to inflict punishment upon them, we will tell them, that they were themselves the cause of what had happened, by neglecting to guard their daughters, and that they ought not to be over-angry at the Benjamites, since that anger was permitted to rise too high before." So the Israelites were persuaded to follow his advice, and decreed that the Benjamites should be allowed thus to steal themselves wives. So when the festival came on, these two hundred Benjamites lay in ambush before the city, in groups of two and three, and waited for the coming of the virgins in the vineyards and other places where they could be concealed. And the virgins came along playing, and suspecting nothing of what was going to happen to them, and walked in an unguarded manner, so the men rose up and caught hold of them as they ran away. And so these Benjamites got them wives, and applied themselves to agriculture, and took pains to recover their former prosperity. And thus was the tribe of the Benjamites, after they had been in danger of entirely perishing, saved in the fore-mentioned manner, by the wisdom of the Israelites; and soon flourished again, and increased in population, and came to enjoy all other advantages. And such was the conclusion of this war.

CHAP. III.

How the Israelites after this Misfortune grew wicked, and served the Assyrians, and how God delivered them by Othniel, who ruled over them forty Years.

§ 1.

NOW it happened that the tribe of Dan suffered as much as the tribe of Benjamin; and it came to do so for the following reason. As the Israelites had already left off the practice of war, and were intent upon husbandry, the Canaanites despised them, and brought together an army, not because they expected to suffer any harm from them, but because they hoped to be able to treat the Hebrews ill when they pleased, and dwell for the time to come in their own cities the more securely; they prepared therefore their chariots, and concentrated their infantry, their cities also combined together, and won over to themselves Ascalon and Ekron, which were in the lot of the tribe of Judah, and several cities that lay in the plain. They also forced the Danites to flee into the mountainous country, and left them not the least portion of the plain to set their foot on. As then these Danites were not able to fight them, and had not land enough to sustain them, they sent five of their men into the interior of the country, to look out for a land to which they might remove their habitation: and they went not far from the neighbourhood of Mount Libanus, and the source of the lesser Jordan, to the great plain of Sidon, a day's journey from that city; and when they had taken a view of the land, and found it to be good and exceeding fruitful, they acquainted their tribe with it, whereupon they set out with their army, and built there the city of Dan, which they so called from the son of Jacob, and their own tribe.

§ 2. The Israelites fell into heavier misfortune from their want of energy and neglect of religion. For when they had once fallen off from the order of their polity, they indulged themselves further in living according to their own pleasure, and according to their own will, till they were defiled by the vices that were common among the Canaanites. God was therefore angry with them, and they lost by their luxury that prosperity which they had obtained by innumerable efforts. For when Chusarth, king of the Assyrians, made war against them, they lost many of their soldiers in the battle, and when their cities were besieged, they were taken by storm. Nay there were some which, out of fear, voluntarily submitted to him, and though the tribute laid upon them was more than they could bear, yet did they pay it, and underwent all sort of oppression for eight years; after which time they were freed from their troubles in the following manner.

§ 3. There was a man whose name was Othniel, the son of Kenez, of the tribe of Judah, of great courage and energy. He was warned by God not to neglect the Israelites in such distress as they were now in, but to endeavour boldly to gain them their liberty; so when he had procured some to assist him in his dangerous undertaking (and few they were, who, either out of shame at their present circumstances, or out of a desire of changing them, could be prevailed on to assist him), he first of all destroyed the garrison which Chusarth had set over them, and when it was perceived that he had not failed in his first attempt, more people came to his assistance: and they joined battle with the Assyrians, and drove them entirely before them, and compelled them to cross over the Euphrates. Then Othniel, who had given such proof of his valour, received from the multitude authority to judge the people; and when he had ruled over them forty years, he died.

CHAP. IV.

How our People served the Moabites eighteen Years, and were then delivered from Slavery by one Ehud, who ruled over the People eighty Years.

§ 1.

WHEN Othniel was dead, the affairs of the Israelites fell again into disorder, and as they neither paid to God the honour due to him, nor were obedient to the laws, their afflictions increased, till Eglon, king of the Moabites, did so greatly despise them, on account of the disorders in their body politic, that he made war upon them and overcame them in several battles, and made the most courageous to submit, and entirely subdued their army, and ordered them to pay him tribute. And when he had built him a royal palace at Jericho, he omitted nothing by which he might distress the people, and indeed he reduced them to poverty for eighteen years. But God took pity on the Israelites on account of their afflictions, and was moved to compassion by their supplications, and freed them from the hard usage they had met with under the Moabites. This liberty he procured for them in the following manner.

§ 2. There was a young man of the tribe of Benjamin, whose name was Ehud, the son of Gera, a man of very great courage in bold undertakings, and of a very strong body, fit for hard labour, and best skilled in using his left hand, in which lay his whole strength; and he also dwelt at Jericho. Now this man became familiar with Eglon, and by means of presents obtained his favour, and insinuated himself into his good opinion, and was therefore also acceptable to those who were about the king. Now, on one occasion when he was bringing presents to the king, and had two servants with him, he girt a dagger on his right thigh secretly, and went in to him; it was then summer-time, and the middle of the day, when the guards were not strictly on their watch, both because of the heat, and because they were gone to dinner. So the young man, when he had offered his presents to Eglon, who was then in a small parlour situated so as to avoid the heat, fell into conversation with him, for they were now alone, the king having ordered his servants that attended him to go their way, because he had a mind to talk with Ehud. He was sitting on his throne, and fear seized upon Ehud lest he should miss his stroke and not give him a deadly wound, so he got him to rise by telling him he had a dream to impart to him by the command of God; upon which the king leaped off his throne for joy of the dream. Then Ehud smote him to the heart, and leaving his dagger in his body, he went out and shut the door after him. And the king's servants were very still, supposing that he had gone to sleep.

§ 3. Then Ehud informed the people of Jericho privately of what he had done, and exhorted them to recover their liberty; and they heard him gladly, and took up arms, and sent messengers all over the country, that should sound trumpets of rams' horns, for it was our custom to call the people together by them. And the attendants of Eglon were ignorant of the misfortune which had befallen him for a great while; but towards evening, fearing something had happened, they entered into his parlour, and when they found him dead, they were in a great state, and knew not what to do; and before the guards could be got together, the Israelites were upon them en masse, so that some of them were slain on the spot, and some were put to flight, and ran away towards the country of Moab, in order to save themselves. Their number was above ten thousand. The Israelites seized upon the fords of the Jordan, and pursued them, and slew them, and killed many of them at the fords, nor did one of them escape out of their hands. Thus it was that the Hebrews freed themselves from slavery under the Moabites. And Ehud was for this deed honoured with the rule over all the multitude, and died after he had held it eighty years. He was a man worthy of commendation, even besides this exploit of his. After him Shamgar, the son of Anath, was elected ruler, but died in the first year of his rule.

CHAP. V.

How the Canaanites brought the Israelites into Servitude for Twenty Years ; after which they were delivered by Barak and Deborah, who ruled over them forty Years.

§ 1.

AND now it was that the Israelites, taking no warning by their former misfortunes to amend their ways, and neither worshipping God nor submitting to the laws, were brought into servitude by Jabin, the king of the Canaanites, and that before they had a short breathing-time after the slavery under the Moabites. This Jabin came out of Hazor,<sup>1</sup> a city situate over the lake Semechonitis,<sup>2</sup> and maintained three hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, and kept three thousand chariots. Sisera was the commander of all this force, and was the principal person in the king's favour, and so sorely beat the Israelites when they fought with him, that he ordered them to pay tribute.

§ 2. So they continued to undergo that oppression twenty years, not being good enough of themselves to grow wise by their misfortunes, and God wishing also thereby the more to subdue their impiety and ingratitude towards himself, that they might at length become penitent, and be so wise as to learn that their calamities arose from their contempt of the laws. At last they besought Deborah, a certain prophetess among them (her name in the Hebrew tongue signifies a Bee), to pray to God to take pity on them, and not to allow their being ruined by the Canaanites. And God granted them deliverance, and chose them a general, Barak, of the tribe of Naphthali. Now Barak, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies lightning.

§ 3. And Deborah sent for Barak, and bade him pick out ten thousand young men to go against the enemy, because God had said that that number was sufficient, and had promised them victory. But when Barak said that he would not be general unless she would also go as general with him, she was indignant at what he said, and replied, "You, O Barak, meanly deliver up the authority which God has given you into the hand of a woman, and I do not reject it." So they collected ten thousand men, and pitched their camp at Mount Tabor, where, at the king's command, Sisera met them, and pitched his camp not far from the enemy; whereupon the Israelites and Barak himself were so dismayed at the multitude of the enemies, that they resolved to decamp, but Deborah restrained them, and commanded them to fight the enemy that very day, for they should conquer them, and God would assist them.

§ 4. So the battle began, and when they engaged, there came down from heaven a great storm, with a vast quantity of rain and hail, and the wind blew the rain in the faces of the Canaanites, and so darkened their eyes, that their arrows and slings were of no advantage to them; nor would the coldness of the air permit their soldiers to use their swords, while this storm did not so much incommode the Israelites, because it came on their backs. They also took such courage from the idea that God was assisting them, that they rushed into the midst of their enemies, and slew a great number of them. And some of them fell by the hand of the Israelites, some were trodden to death by their own horses, and not a few were killed by their own chariots. And Sisera, as soon as he saw himself beaten, leapt off his chariot and fled away, and came to a woman whose name was Jael, a Kenite, who received him, when he asked to be concealed; and as he asked for something to drink, she gave him some sour milk, of which he drank a huge draught and fell asleep, and when he was asleep Jael took an iron nail, and drove it through his mouth under the lip with a hammer into the floor: and when Barak came a little afterwards, she showed him Sisera nailed to the ground. And thus was this victory gained by a woman, as Deborah had foretold. Barak also fought with Jabin at Hazor; and when he met with him he slew him: and when the general was fallen, Barak razed the city to the ground, and ruled over the Israelites for forty years.

CHAP. VI.

How the Midianites and other Nations fought against the Israelites, and beat them, and afflicted their Country for seven Years. How they were delivered by Gideon, who ruled over the People.

§ 1.

NOW after Barak and Deborah died about the same time, the Midianites called the Amalekites and Arabians to their assistance, and made war against the Israelites, and defeated those that resisted them, and carried off their fruits and cattle. Now when they had done this for seven years, the multitude of the Israelites retired to the mountains, and forsook the plains. They also made for themselves vaults under ground and caverns, and preserved therein whatever escaped the enemies; for the Midianites made expeditions in harvest-time, but permitted them to till the land in winter, that so when the others had undergone the labour, they might have fruits to carry away. So a famine ensued and scarcity of food, upon which they betook themselves to supplication to God, and besought him to save them.

§ 2. And Gideon, the son of Joash, one of the principal persons of the tribe of Manasseh, brought his sheaves of corn and privately threshed them at the wine-press, for he was too afraid of the enemies to thresh them openly in the threshing-floor. At this time an angel appeared to him in the shape of a young man, and told him, "That he was a happy man and beloved of God." To which he immediately replied, "A mighty indication of God's favour to me, that I am forced to use this wine-press instead of a threshing-floor!" But the angel exhorted him to be of good courage, and to make an attempt for the recovery of the national liberty. He answered, that it was impossible for him to recover it, because the tribe to which he belonged was by no means numerous, and he was but young himself, and too inconsiderable to think of such great actions. But God himself promised to supply what he was defective in, and to give the Israelites victory under his command.

§ 3. When Gideon related this to some of the young men, they believed him, and immediately there was an army of ten thousand men ready for fighting. But God stood by Gideon in his sleep, and told him, that mankind were too fond of themselves, and were hostile to such as excelled in virtue: now, that they might not pass God over, and ascribe the victory to themselves, and might not fancy it obtained by their own power because they were a great army, and able of themselves to fight their enemies, but might confess that it was owing to his assistance, he instructed him to bring his army about noon, when the heat was most scorching, to the river, and to esteem those that bent down on their knees, and so drank, to be men of courage; but for all those that drank hurriedly and noisily, to think they did so from fear of the enemies. And when Gideon had done as God had suggested to him, there were three hundred men found that took water with their hands hurriedly, then God bade him take these men, and attack the enemy. Accordingly, they pitched their camp at the river Jordan, intending the next day to pass over it.

§ 4. But Gideon was in great fear, for God had told him before to set upon his enemies in the night, and God wishing to free him from his fear, bade him take one of his soldiers, and go near the Midianites' tents, for he should in that very place have his courage raised, and grow bolder. So he obeyed, and went and took his servant Phurah with him; and as he came near to one of the tents, he discovered that those that were in it were awake, and that one of them was telling to his fellow-soldier a dream of his own, and that so that Gideon could overhear him. The dream was this: he thought he saw such a barley cake as could hardly be eaten by men, it was so bad, rolling through the camp, and overthrowing the royal tent, and the tents of all the soldiers. And the other soldier explained this dream to mean the destruction of their army, and told him what the reason was which made him so conjecture, viz. that the seed called barley was allowed to be the vilest sort of seed, and that the Israelites were known to be the vilest of all the people of Asia, like the seed of barley; and those that now had courage among the Israelites were Gideon and the army that was with him: "and since you say you saw the cake overturning our tents, I fear that God has granted the victory over us to Gideon."

§ 5. When Gideon had heard this dream, good hope and courage came upon him; and he commanded his soldiers to arm themselves, and told them of this dream of their enemies. They also took courage at what was told them, and were ready to perform what he should enjoin them: so Gideon divided his army into three parts, each part containing a hundred men, and led them out about the fourth watch of the night. They all carried empty pitchers and lighted lamps in them, that their advance might not be discovered by their enemies. Each of them had also a ram's horn in his right hand, which they used instead of a trumpet. Now the enemies' camp took up a large space of ground, for it so happened that they had a great many camels, and they were distributed according to their different nations, so as to form one large circle. Now when the Hebrews, as they were ordered beforehand, upon their approaching their enemies, on a given signal, sounded with their rams' horns, and broke their pitchers, and set upon their enemies with their lamps, and shouted and cried, "Victory to Gideon, by God's assistance," disorder and panic seized the Midianites who were fast asleep; for it was night-time, and God would have it so. And a few of them were slain by their enemies, but most by their allies, on account of the diversity of their language; and when they were once thrown into disorder, they killed all they met, thinking them to be enemies also. Thus there was a great slaughter made. And when the report of Gideon's victory came to the Israelites, they took their weapons and pursued their enemies, and overtook them in a certain valley, surrounded by ravines, where they could not get away, and they cut them off, and slew them all, with two of their kings, Oreb and Zeeb. And the remaining captains led off those soldiers that were left, who were about eighteen thousand, and pitched their camp a great way off the Israelites. However, Gideon did not slack his energy, but pursued them with all his force, and joined battle with them, and cut off the whole enemies' army, and took captive the other leaders, Zebah and Zalmunna. Now there was slain in this battle of the Midianites, and of their auxiliaries the Arabians, about a hundred and twenty thousand; and the Hebrews took much spoil, gold and silver, and rich stuffs, and camels, and asses. And when Gideon was returned to his own country Ophrah,<sup>1</sup> he slew Zebah and Zalmunna.

§ 6. However, the tribe of Ephraim was so displeased at the success of Gideon, that they resolved to make war against him, accusing him because he had not announced to them his intended expedition against their enemies. But Gideon, a man of modesty, and one that excelled in every virtue, pleaded that it was not of his own accord or will that he attacked the enemy without them, but that it was at the command of God, and that the victory belonged to them as well as to those in the army. And by this method of cooling their passions, he brought more advantage to the Hebrews, than by the success he had against their enemies, for he delivered them from civil war, which seemed likely to break out among them; yet did this tribe afterwards suffer punishment for this injurious treatment of Gideon, of which I shall give an account in due time.

§ 7. Then Gideon would have laid down his command, but was obliged to keep it, and for forty years he dispensed justice to them, as the people came to him in their differences, and what he determined was esteemed valid by all. And when he died at an advanced age, he was buried in his own country of Ophrah.

CHAP. VII.

§ 1.

NOW Gideon had seventy sons that were legitimate, for he had many wives, and he had also by his concubine Drumah one that was illegitimate, whose name was Abimelech, who, after his father's death, retired to Shechem, to his mother's relations, for they were of that place; and when he had got money from them, who were remarkable for their irregular lives, he returned with them to his father's house, and slew all his brothers, except Jotham; for he had the good fortune to escape and save his life. And Abimelech changed the government into a tyranny, and made himself an autocrat, to do what he pleased instead of obeying the laws, and acted most severely to those that stood up for justice.

§ 2. Now, on a certain occasion when there was a public festival at Shechem, and all the multitude was gathered together there, Jotham his brother, whose escape I before related, went up to Mount Gerizim, which hangs over the city Shechem, and cried out so as to be heard by the multitude, who listened to him. He desired they would attend to what he was going to say to them: and when silence was made, he said that when the trees could speak, and there was an assembly of them gathered together, they asked the fig-tree to rule over them: and when that tree refused to do so, because it was contented to enjoy the honour which belonged peculiarly to the fruit it bore, and not that which would accrue to it from abroad, the trees did not leave off their intention to have a ruler, so they thought good to make the offer of that honour to the vine; but when the vine was chosen, it made use of the same words as the fig-tree had used before, and excused itself from accepting the sovereignty: and when the olive-tree had done the same, the bramble, whom the trees had asked to take the kingdom (a sort of wood good only for kindling fires), promised to take office, and to be zealous in the exercise of it, but they must sit down under its shadow, and if they should plot against it to destroy it, the principle of fire that was in it would destroy them. He told them, that what he said was not said to excite a laugh, but because, though they had experienced many blessings from Gideon, they allowed Abimelech to lord it over them all, and had joined with him in slaying his brothers, though he would prove no better than a fire himself. And when he had said this, he went away, and lived hid among the mountains for three years from fear of Abimelech.

§ 3. A little while after this festival, the Shechemites, who now repented of having slain the sons of Gideon, expelled Abimelech both from their city and tribe. So he and his party sought how to injure their city. Now at the season of vintage, the people were afraid to go out and gather the grapes, for fear Abimelech should do them some mischief. Now it so happened that there lived among them then a man of authority, one Gaal, who had armed men and some kinsmen with him ; so the Shechemites desired that he would allow them a guard during their vintage. And he complied with their desire, and so the people went out, and Gaal with them at the head of his soldiers, and they gathered their grapes in safety ; and when they were at supper in groups, they even ventured to rail at Abimelech openly, and their leading men laid ambushes in places about the city, and caught many of Abimelech's followers, and put them to death.

§ 4. Now there was one Zebul, a leading man among the Shechemites, and a friend of Abimelech. He sent messengers, and informed him how much Gaal had irritated the people against him, and advised him to lay ambushes before the city, for he would persuade Gaal to go out against him, which would put it in his power to be revenged on him once for all, and when that was once done he would get Abimelech reconciled to the city. So Abimelech laid ambushes, and himself lay with them. And Gaal abode in the suburbs, consulting too little for his safety, and Zebul was with him. Now Gaal saw some armed men coming up, and told Zebul, that some armed men were approaching, but he replied that they were only shadows from the rocks, but when they were come nearer, Gaal perceived the truth, and said, they were not shadows, but men lying in ambush. Then said Zebul, "Did you not accuse Abimelech of cowardice? Why then do you not show how very courageous you are yourself, and go and fight him?" So Gaal in excitement joined battle with Abimelech, and some of his men fell; whereupon he fled into the city, and took the rest of them with him. But Zebul contrived the expulsion of Gaal out of the city, by accusing him of cowardice in the action with the soldiers of Abimelech. And now Abimelech, learning that the Shechemites were again coming out to gather their grapes, placed ambushes before the city, and when they had come out, the third part of his army occupied the gates, to hinder the citizens from entering in again, while the rest pursued those that were dispersed about, and so there was slaughter everywhere; and when he had razed the city to the ground, for it was not able to stand a siege, and had sown its ruins with salt, he pushed on with his army, till all the Shechemites were slain. As for those that were scattered about the country, and so escaped the danger, they gathered themselves together on a certain strong rock, and settled themselves upon it, and intended to build a wall round it; but when Abimelech knew their intention, he anticipated them, and came upon them with his forces, and laid fagots of dry wood round the place, he himself bringing some of them, and ordering his soldiers to do the same. And when the rock was soon surrounded with these fagots, they set them on fire, and threw on whatever was by nature most inflammable; so a mighty fire was kindled, and nobody could fly away from the rock, but every one perished, about fifteen hundred men, and a great number of women and children also. Such was the calamity which befell the Shechemites; and men's grief on their account would have been greater than it was, had they not seemed to be justly punished for their ingratitude to Gideon.

§ 5. Now Abimelech, when he had terrified the Israelites with the miseries he had brought upon the Shechemites, seemed openly to aim at still greater power than he now had, and appeared to set no bounds to his violence, till everybody was killed. Accordingly, he marched to Thebez,<sup>1</sup> and took that city by sudden assault, and as there was a great tower therein, wherunto the whole multitude fled, he made preparations to besiege it. Now, as he was hurrying near the gates, a woman threw a piece of mill-stone upon his head, upon which Abimelech fell, and asked his armour-bearer to kill him, lest his death should be thought to be the work of a woman. And he did what he was told to do. Such was his punishment for his cruelty to his brothers, and his barbarity to the Shechemites. And the calamity that happened to the Shechemites was according to the prediction of Jotham. And the army of Abimelech dispersed upon his fall, and went to their own homes.

§ 6. Now it was that Jair the Gileadite, of the tribe of Manasseh, took the rule. He was a man happy in other respects also, but particularly in his thirty sons, who were good young men, and very skilful in riding, and were intrusted with the government of the cities of Gilead. He ruled twenty-two years, and died an old man, and was buried at Camon,<sup>2</sup> a city of Gilead.

§ 7. And now all the affairs of the Hebrews were in disorder, and tended to the contempt of God and the laws. So the Ammonites and Philistines despised them, and laid waste the country with a great army; and when they had occupied all Peræa,<sup>3</sup> they were so bold as to cross over the Jordan to gain the possession of all the rest. But the Hebrews being now sobered by the calamities they had undergone, betook themselves to supplications to God, and offered sacrifices to him, beseeching him not to be too severe against them, but to be moved by their prayers to leave off his anger against them. So God became more merciful to them, and was ready to assist them.

§ 8. When the Ammonites marched into the land of Gilead, the inhabitants of the country met them at a certain mountain, but wanted a commander. Now there was a certain person whose name was Jephthah, who, both on account of his father's virtue, and on account of an army which he maintained at his own expense, was an influential man. The Israelites therefore sent to him, and entreated him to come to their assistance, and promised him rule over them all his lifetime. But he would not hearken to their entreaty, and accused them of not coming to his assistance when he was unjustly treated, and that openly by his brothers. For they had cast him out, as not having the same mother with the rest, but born of a strange mother, that was introduced into the house by his father's fondness, and they had done this out of contempt at his weakness. So he dwelt in the country of Gilead, and received all that came to him, from all parts, and paid them wages. However, when they pressed him to accept the rule, and swore that they would grant it him for life, he took the command.

§ 9. And when Jephthah took the control of affairs, he soon marched his army to the city of Mizpah,<sup>1</sup> and sent a message to the Ammonite [king], complaining of his unjust occupation of their land. But that king sent a countercharge, and complained of the exodus of the Israelites out of Egypt, and desired them to quit the land of the Amorites, and yield it up to him, as his original paternal inheritance. But Jephthah returned answer that he did not justly complain of the forefathers of the Israelites as to the land of the Amorites, and ought rather to thank them that they left the land of the Ammonites to them, since Moses could have taken it also; and that they would not recede from that land of their own, which God had obtained for them, and they had now had more than three hundred years, but would fight with them for it.

§ 10. And when he had given them this answer, he sent the envoys away. And when he had prayed for victory, and had vowed, if he came home in safety, to offer in sacrifice whatever living creature should first meet him, he joined battle with the enemy, and gained a great victory, and in his pursuit slew the enemies as far as the city of Minnith.<sup>2</sup> He then passed over to the land of the Ammonites, and overthrew many of their cities, and took much spoil, and freed his own people from the slavery which they had undergone for eighteen years. But on his return he fell into a calamity very unlike his previous good fortune. For his daughter came out to meet him, who was also his only child, and a virgin; and Jephthah heavily lamented the greatness of his affliction, and blamed his daughter for being so forward to meet him, for he had vowed to sacrifice her to God. However, what was to befall her was not ungrateful to her, since she would die upon occasion of her father's victory, and the liberty of her fellow-citizens; she only desired her father to give her leave for two months to bewail her youth with her fellow-citizens, and after that he might do with her according to his vow. Accordingly, when that time had elapsed, he sacrificed his daughter as a burnt-offering, an oblation neither conformable to the law, nor acceptable to God, nor did he consider what opinion those that heard of it would have of such a deed.

§ 11. Now the tribe of Ephraim marched against him, because he had not taken them along with him in his expedition against the Ammonites, and because he alone had the spoil, and fame for what had been done. To whom he said, first, that they were not ignorant how their kinsmen were hard pressed, yet though they were invited, they had not come to their assistance, whereas they ought to have come quickly, even without being invited. And in the next place, he said they were going to act unjustly; for while they had not courage enough to fight their enemies, they marched promptly against their own kindred; and he threatened them, that with God's assistance, he would inflict punishment upon them, if they did not grow wiser. But as he could not persuade them, he fought them with a force which he sent for out of Gilead, and made a great slaughter of them; and when they were routed, he pursued them, and having occupied the fords of Jordan by a part of his army which he had sent on before, he slew about forty-two thousand of them.

§ 12. And when Jephthah had ruled six years, he died, and was buried in his own country Sebee,<sup>1</sup> which is in the land of Gilead.

§ 13. Now, when Jephthah was dead, Ibazan succeeded him, being of the tribe of Judah, and of the city of Beth-lehem. He had sixty children, thirty of them sons, and the rest daughters; all of whom he left alive behind him, giving the daughters husbands, and the sons wives. He did nothing in the seven years of his administration that was worth recording. He died an old man, and was buried in his own country.

§ 14. When Ibazan was dead, neither did Elon, who succeeded him, and ruled ten years, do anything remarkable; he was of the tribe of Zebulun.

§ 15. Abdon, the son of Hillel, of the tribe of Ephraim, who was born at the city of Pharathon,<sup>1</sup> was appointed the supreme governor after Elon. He can only be recorded as having been happy in his children; for public affairs were then so peaceable, and in such security, that he performed no glorious action. He had forty sons, and thirty grandsons, and used to ride in state with the seventy, who were all very skilful in riding, and he left them all alive after him. He died an old man; and had a magnificent tomb at Pharathon.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning the Bravery of Samson, and what Mischiefs he brought upon the Philistines.

§ 1.

AFTER Abdon was dead, the Philistines overcame the Israelites, and received tribute of them for forty years. They were delivered from this hardship in the following manner.

§ 2. There was one Manoah of the tribe of Dan, a person of such great virtue, that he had few men his equals, and was without dispute the principal person of his country. He had a wife celebrated for her beauty, and outshining her contemporaries. He had no children, and being uneasy at this want of posterity, he entreated God to give him legitimate offspring, going frequently to the suburbs<sup>1</sup> with his wife. He was fond of his wife to the degree of madness, and so was violently jealous of her. Now, when his wife was once alone, an apparition was seen by her, it was an angel of God, and resembled a beautiful and tall young man, who brought her the good news, that she should have by God's providence a goodly son of great strength, by whom, when he was grown up to man's estate, the Philistines should be afflicted. He told her also not to cut his hair, and that he was to avoid all other kinds of drink (for so had God commanded), and restrict himself to water. And the angel, when he had delivered that message, went his way, his coming having been by the will of God.

§ 3. Now the wife informed her husband when he came home of what the angel had said, and showed so great an admiration of the beauty and tallness of the young man that had appeared to her, that her husband was beside himself with jealousy, and with such suspicions as are excited by that passion: but she was desirous of having her husband's unreasonable distress taken away, so she entreated God to send the angel again, that he might be seen by her husband. So the angel came again by the favour of God, when they were in the suburbs, and appeared to her when she was alone, without her husband. She desired the angel to stay till she could bring her husband, and that request being granted, she went to fetch Manoah. When he saw the angel, he was not yet free from suspicion, and he desired him to inform him of all that he had told his wife; but when the angel said, it was sufficient that she alone knew what he had said, he bade him tell him who he was, that when the child was born they might return him thanks, and give him a present. He replied, that he did not want any present, for he did not bring them the good news of the birth of a son from want of anything. And when Manoah entreated him to stay, and partake of his hospitality, he did not consent. However, he was persuaded, at the earnest request of Manoah, to stay till he brought him one mark of his hospitality, so he slew a kid of the goats, and bade his wife cook it. When all was ready, the angel enjoined him to set the loaves and the flesh without the vessels upon the rock. And, when they had done so, he touched the flesh with the rod which he had in his hand, and a flame broke out and consumed both flesh and loaves. And the angel ascended, openly, in their sight, up to heaven, by means of the smoke, as by a vehicle. Now Manoah was afraid that some danger would come to them from this sight of God, but his wife bade him be of good courage, for God appeared to them for their benefit.

§ 4. And the woman proved with child, and was careful to observe the injunctions given her, and they called the child, when he was born, Samson, which name signifies strong. And the child grew apace, and it appeared evident that he would be a prophet, both from the strictness of his diet, and the letting his hair grow.

§ 5. Now when he went with his parents to Timnath,<sup>1</sup> a city of the Philistines, when there was a great festival, he fell in love with a maid of that country, and begged his parents to procure him the damsel for his wife: but they refused to do so, because she was not of the stock of Israel; yet because this marriage was of God, who intended to convert it to the benefit of the Hebrews, he succeeded in persuading them to procure her espousal to him. And as he was continually coming to her parents, he met a lion, and though he was unarmed he received its attack, and strangled it with his hands, and cast the beast into a woody piece of ground on the inside of the road.

§ 6. And when he was going another time to the damsel, he lit upon a swarm of bees hived in the carcase of that lion, and taking three honeycombs away, he gave them, together with the rest of his presents, to the damsel. Now the people of Timnath, in dread of the young man's strength, gave him during the time of the wedding feast (for he then feasted them all), thirty of the most stout of their youth, under pretext of being his companions, but in reality to be a guard upon him, that he might not attempt to give them any disturbance. And as they were drinking merrily and playing, as was usual at such times, Samson said, "Come, if I propose you a riddle, and you can expound it in seven days' time, I will give every one of you linen shirts and garments as a reward of your wisdom." So they being very ambitious to obtain the reputation of wisdom, together with the gain, desired him to propose his riddle, when he said, "That a great devourer produced sweet food out of itself, though it was itself very disagreeable." And when they were not able in three days' time to find out the meaning of the riddle, they desired the damsel to discover it by means of her husband, and tell it them, and threatened to burn her if she did not do so. And when the damsel entreated Samson to tell it her, he at first refused to do so, but when she pressed him hard and fell into tears, and treated his refusal to tell her as a sign of unkindness to her, he informed her of his killing the lion, and how he found bees in its carcass, and carried away three honeycombs, and brought them to her. Thus he, suspecting no deceit, informed her of everything, and she revealed it to those who desired to know it. So on the seventh day, on which they were to expound the riddle proposed to them, they met together before sunset, and said, "Nothing is more disagreeable than a lion to those that light on it, and nothing is sweeter than honey to those who find it." To which Samson made this rejoinder, "Nothing is more deceitful than a woman, for it was a woman who discovered my interpretation to you." And he gave them the presents he had promised them, making such Ascalonites as he met upon the road his prey, who were themselves Philistines also. But he divorced his wife, and the girl despised his anger, and married his companion, who had made the match between them.

§ 7. At this outrage Samson was so provoked, that he resolved to punish all the Philistines as well as her: accordingly, as it was then summer-time, and the fruits of the land were almost ripe for reaping, he caught three hundred foxes, and joining lighted torches to their tails, sent them into the fields of the Philistines, by which means the crops were destroyed. And when the Philistines knew that this was Samson's doing, and knew also why he did it, they sent their rulers to Timnath, and burnt his wife, and her relations, as the causes of their loss.

§ 8. Now when Samson had slain many of the Philistines in the plain country, he dwelt at Etam,<sup>1</sup> which is a strong rock belonging to the tribe of Judah, for the Philistines at that time made an expedition against that tribe. But the people of Judah said that they did not act justly in inflicting punishment upon them, as they paid their tribute, merely on account of Samson's offences. They answered, that if they would not be blamed, they must deliver up Samson to them. And they, being desirous not to be blamed, came to the rock with three thousand armed men, and complained to Samson of the bold attacks he had made upon the Philistines, who were men able to bring calamity upon the whole nation of the Hebrews, and told him they were come to take him, and to deliver him up to the Philistines, and asked him to bear this willingly. And when he had received assurance from them upon oath, that they would do him no other harm than deliver him into his enemies' hands, he came down from the rock, and put himself into the power of his countrymen, and they bound him with two cords, and led him on, to deliver him to the Philistines; and when they came to a certain place, which is now called Jaw-bone,<sup>2</sup> on account of the great action there performed by Samson, though of old it had no name at all, the Philistines, who had pitched their camp not far off, came to meet him with joy, and shouting, as having done a great thing, and gained what they desired; but Samson broke his bonds asunder, and catching up the jaw-bone of an ass that lay at his feet, fell upon his enemies, and smiting them with this jaw-bone, slew a thousand of them, and put the rest to headlong flight.

§ 9. Upon this Samson was too proud of what he had performed, and said that it had not come to pass by the assistance of God, but that his success was to be ascribed to his own courage, boasting that some of his enemies fell upon his own use of the jaw-bone, and the rest ran away out of dread of him. But when a great thirst came upon him, he considered that human courage is nothing, and bore testimony that all is to be ascribed to God, and besought him that he would not be angry at anything he had said, nor give him up into the hands of his enemies, but afford him help under his affliction, and deliver him from his present distress. Accordingly, God was moved with his entreaties, and raised him up a plentiful fountain of sweet water at a certain rock; whence it was that Samson called the place Jaw-bone,<sup>1</sup> and so it is called to this day.

§ 10. After this fight Samson held the Philistines in contempt, and came to Gaza,<sup>2</sup> and lodged at a certain inn. When the rulers of Gaza were informed of his coming thither, they occupied the gates, and placed men in ambush near them, that he might not escape without being perceived. But Samson, who was acquainted with their contrivances against him, arose about midnight, and dashed against the gates, and carried them away on his shoulders, with their posts and bolts, and the rest of their woodwork, and bore them to the mountain that is over Hebron, and there laid them down.

§ 11. However, he at length transgressed the laws of his country, and altered his own regular way of living, and imitated the strange customs of foreigners, which was the beginning of his miseries; for he fell in love with a woman who was a harlot among the Philistines, whose name was Delilah, and he lived with her. And the rulers of the Philistines came to her, and induced her by promises to get out of Samson what was the cause of his strength, by which he became invincible to his enemies. Accordingly, as they were drinking, and conversing together, she pretended to admire the actions he had done, and tried to get out of him by subtilty how it was he so much excelled others in strength. Samson, in order to delude Delilah, for he had not yet lost his senses, replied, that if he were bound with seven green withs of a vine woven together, he would be weaker than any other man. The woman said no more then, but told this to the rulers of the Philistines, and hid certain soldiers in ambush within the house; and when he was the worse for drink and asleep, she bound him as fast as possible with the withs; and then awoke him and told him some of her people were upon him, but he broke the withs, and endeavoured to defend himself, as though some people really were upon him. And she, in the constant intercourse Samson had with her, pretended that she took it very ill that he had such little confidence in her affection to him, that he would not tell her what she desired, as if she would not conceal what she knew it was for his interest to be concealed. However, he deluded her again, and told her, that if they bound him with seven cords, he should lose his strength. And when, upon doing this, she gained nothing, he told her as the third thing, to weave his hair into a web: but even upon doing this the truth was not discovered. At last Samson, upon Delilah's prayer (for he was doomed to fall into calamity), wishing to please her, said to her, "God cares for me, and I was born providentially, and so I suffer my hair to grow, God having charged me never to cut my hair, for my strength is in the growth and preservation of my hair." When she had learned this, she deprived him of his hair, and delivered him up to his enemies, for he was no longer strong enough to defend himself against their attempts upon him; so they put out his eyes, and bound him, and led him about among them.

<sup>1</sup> This fountain, called Lehi, or Jaw-bone, is still in existence, as travellers assure us, and was known by this very name in the days of Josephus, and has been known by the same name in all the past ages. See Antiq. vii. 12, § 4.—W.

§ 12. But in process of time Samson's hair grew again. And there was a public festival among the Philistines, when the rulers and notables were feasting together (and the banqueting-hall in which they were had its roof supported by two pillars); and they sent for Samson to come to their feast, that they might insult him in their cups. And he, thinking it one of the greatest misfortunes if he should not be able to revenge himself for being thus insulted, persuaded the boy that led him by the hand that he was weary and wanted to rest himself, and begged him to bring him near the pillars, and as soon as he came near them, he rushed violently against them, and overthrew the house, by overturning the pillars, with the three thousand men in it, who were all slain, and Samson with them. Such was the end of this man, when he had ruled over the Israelites twenty years. And, indeed, he deserves to be admired for his courage and strength, and the magnanimity of his death, and because his wrath against his enemies lasted till his death. But as for his being ensnared by a woman, that is to be ascribed to human nature, which is too weak to resist sins, but we ought to bear him witness, that in all other respects he was a man of extraordinary virtue. And his kindred took away his body, and buried it in Sarias,<sup>1</sup> his own country, with the rest of his family.

CHAP. IX.

§ 1.

NOW after the death of Samson, Eli the high priest was governor of the Israelites. In his days, when the country was afflicted with a famine, Elimelech of Bethlehem, a city belonging to the tribe of Judah, being unable to support so sore a distress, took with him Naomi his wife, and his sons by her, Chilion and Mahlon, and removed to the land of Moab, and his affairs prospering there, he took for his sons Moabitish wives, Orpah for Chilion, and Ruth for Mahlon. In the course of ten years, both Elimelech, and a little while after him, the sons, died: and Naomi being very uneasy at these events, and unable to bear her lonesome condition, now those that were dearest to her were dead, on whose account it was that she had gone away from her own country, she returned to it again, for she had been informed it was now in a flourishing condition. However, her daughters-in-law were not able to think of parting with her, and as they had a mind to go out of the country with her, she could not dissuade them from it, though she begged them not; but as they insisted upon it, she wished them a more happy wedlock than they had had with her sons, and that they might have prosperity in other respects also, and seeing her own fortunes were so low, she exhorted them to stay where they were, and not to think of leaving their own country, and sharing with her in the uncertainty under which she must live there. Then Orpah stayed behind, but she took Ruth along with her, who was not to be persuaded to stay behind, but determined to share her fortune, whatever it might prove.

§ 2. When Ruth was come with her mother-in-law to Bethlehem, Boaz, who was near of kin to Elimelech, entertained her: and when Naomi was called by the people by her name, she said, "You might more truly call me Mara." Now Naomi signifies in the Hebrew tongue happiness, and Mara sorrow. It was now time of harvest, and Ruth, by the permission of her mother-in-law, went out to glean, that they might get food. Now it so happened that she went into Boaz's field, and after some time Boaz came there, and when he saw the damsel, he inquired of his servant that was set over the reapers concerning her. He had a little before inquired about all her circumstances, and told them to his master; who kindly greeted her, both on account of her affection to her mother-in-law, and her remembrance of her dead husband, and prayed that she might have prosperity, and bade her not to glean, but to reap what she was able, and gave her leave to carry it home. He also gave it in charge to the servant who was over the reapers, not to hinder her when she took it away, and bade him give her her dinner and drink, when he brought theirs to the reapers. Now Ruth kept for her mother-in-law the barley-meal that she received of him, and returned to her in the evening, and brought her ears of corn with her; and Naomi had kept for her a part of such food as her neighbours had plentifully bestowed upon her. Ruth also told her mother-in-law what Boaz had said to her: and when Naomi had informed her that he was near akin to them, and was so pious a man as perhaps to make some provision for them, she went out again on the following days, to glean with Boaz's maid-servants.

being winnowed, slept in his threshing-floor. When Naomi was informed of this circumstance, she contrived it so that Ruth should lie down by him, for she thought it might be for their advantage that he should discourse with the girl. Accordingly, she sent the damsel to sleep at his feet, who went as she bade her, for she did not think it consistent with her duty to contradict any command of her mother-in-law. And at first she escaped the notice of Boaz, as he was fast asleep, but when he awoke about midnight, and perceived a woman lying by him, he asked her who she was; and when she told him her name, and desired, that he whom she owned for her lord, would excuse her, he said no more then, but in the morning, before the servants began to set about their work, he awoke her, and bade her take as much barley as she was able to carry, and go to her mother-in-law, before anybody should see that she had lain down there by him, because it was but prudent to avoid any reproach that might arise on that account, especially as there had been nothing wrong done. "But as to the main point," he said, "the matter shall rest thus. He that is nearer of kin than I am shall be asked whether he wants to take you to wife, if he says he does, you shall follow him; but if he refuse, I will marry you according to the law."

§ 4. When she had informed her mother-in-law of this, they were very glad, from the hope they had that Boaz would make provision for them. And about noon Boaz went down into the city, and gathered the senate together, and sent for Ruth, and called her kinsman also, and when he was come, he said, "Have not you the inheritance of Elimelech and his sons?" He confessed that he had, as was permitted by the laws, because he was their nearest kinsman. Then said Boaz, "You must not remember the laws by halves, but do everything according to them; for the wife of Mahlon is come hither, whom you must marry according to the laws, if you wish to keep those fields." So the man yielded up both the inheritance and the wife to Boaz, who was himself of kin to those that were dead, on the score that he had a wife and children already. So Boaz called the senate to witness, and bade the woman loose his shoe, and spit in his face, according to the law; and when this was done, Boaz married Ruth, and they had a son a year after. Naomi herself nursed him, and at the advice of the women, called him Obed, as being to be brought up in order to be subservient to her in her old age, for Obed signifies a servant in the Hebrew dialect. The son of Obed was Jesse, the father of David the king, who left the kingdom to his sons for one-and-twenty generations. I was therefore obliged to relate this history of Ruth, because I wished to demonstrate the power of God, who without difficulty can raise those that are of ordinary parentage to dignity and splendour, to which he advanced David, though born of such parents.

CHAP. X.

§ 1.

AND now, as their affairs were in a bad condition, the Hebrews made war again upon the Philistines. The occasion was this: Eli the high priest had two sons, Hophni and Phinehas. These sons of Eli were guilty of insolence towards men and of impiety towards God, and abstained from no sort of wickedness. Some of the gifts they carried off, as belonging to their office, others they took away by violence. They also were guilty of impurity with the women that came to worship God, obliging some to submit to their lust by force, and enticing others by presents, and the whole course of their life was no better than a tyranny. Their father therefore was angry with them for their wickedness, and continually expected that God would inflict punishment upon them for their doings. The multitude were disgusted also. And as soon as God foretold the calamity which would befall Eli's sons, which he did both to Eli himself, and to Samuel the prophet, who was yet but a child, Eli openly grieved for his sons.

on the whole people of the Hebrews. Elkanah, a Levite, one of a middle condition among his fellow-citizens, who dwelt at Ramah,<sup>1</sup> a city belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, married two wives, Hannah and Peninnah. He had children by the latter, but he loved the other best, although she was barren. Now Elkanah came with his wives to the city Shiloh to sacrifice, for there it was that the tabernacle of God was placed, as I have before said. Now when, after he had sacrificed, he distributed at the festival portions of the flesh to his wives and children, and when Hannah saw Peninnah's children sitting round about their mother, she fell into tears, and lamented her barrenness and lonesomeness, and suffering her grief to prevail over her husband's consolation, she went to the tabernacle to beseech God to give her offspring, and to make her a mother, and vowed to consecrate the first son she should bear to the service of God, that his manner of living should not be like that of ordinary men. And as she continued at her prayers a long time, Eli, the high priest, who sat there before the tabernacle, bade her go away, thinking she was intoxicated; but when she said she had drunk water, but was in sorrow for want of children, and was beseeching God for them, he bade her be of good cheer, and told her that God would give her a son.

§ 3. So she returned to her husband full of hope, and eat her food with gladness, and when they had gone back to their own country, she was soon with child, and they had a son born to them, to whom they gave the name of Samuel, as if one were to say asked of God. They therefore went to the tabernacle to offer sacrifice for the birth of the child, and brought their tithes with them; and the woman remembered the vow she had made concerning her son, and delivered him to Eli, dedicating him to God, that he might become a prophet. And his hair was suffered to grow long, and his drink was water. So Samuel dwelt and was brought up in the temple. And Elkanah had other sons by Hannah, and three daughters.

§ 4. Now when Samuel was twelve years old he began to prophesy: and once when he was asleep, God called to him by his name, but he, supposing he had been called by the high priest, came to him, but when Eli said he had not called him, God did so thrice. Eli was then so far illuminated, that he said to him, "Indeed, Samuel, I was silent now as well as before, it is God that calls you. So answer him, and say, here I am." So when Samuel heard God speak again, he begged him to deliver what message he pleased to him, for he would not fail to perform any ministration he might desire of him, to which God replied, "Since you are here, learn what miseries are coming upon the Israelites, too great for words to declare, or faith to believe; for the sons of Eli shall die on one day, and the priesthood shall be transferred into the family of Eleazar, for Eli has loved his sons more than he has loved my worship, and to such a degree as is not for their advantage." This message Eli obliged the prophet by oath to tell him, for he had no wish to afflict him by telling it. And now Eli had a far more sure expectation of the loss of his sons; and the glory of Samuel increased more and more, it being seen that whatever he prophesied came to pass.

CHAP. XI.

§ 1.

ABOUT this time the Philistines made war against the Israelites, and pitched their camp at the city of Aphek.<sup>1</sup> Now when the Israelites had expected them a little while, the very next day they joined battle, and the Philistines were conquerors, and slew above four thousand of the Hebrews, and pursued the rest of the multitude to their camp.

§ 2. And the Hebrews, being afraid of the worst, sent to the senate and to the high priest, and desired that they would bring the ark of God, that by putting themselves in battle array, when it was present with them, they might be too hard for their enemies, not reflecting that he who had condemned them to endure this calamity was greater than the ark, and was the cause of the ark's being honoured. So the ark came, and the sons of the high priest with it, having received a charge from their father, that if they intended to survive the taking of the ark, they should come no more into his presence ; for Phinehas officiated already as high priest, his father having resigned the office to him because of his great age. And the Hebrews were full of courage, supposing that by the coming of the ark they would be too much for their enemies: while the enemies were very dismayed, and were afraid of the ark's coming to the Israelites. However, the upshot did not prove agreeable to the expectations of either side, for when the battle was fought, the victory which the Hebrews expected was gained by the Philistines, and the defeat the Philistines were afraid of happened to the Hebrews, who thereby found that they had put their trust in the ark in vain, for they were at once routed as soon as they came to a close fight with their enemies, and lost about thirty thousand men, among whom were the sons of the high priest, and the ark was carried away by the enemies.

§ 3. When the news of this defeat came to Shiloh, with that of the captivity of the ark (for a certain young man, a Benjamite, who was in the action, came and brought the news), the whole city was full of lamentation. And Eli the high priest, who sat upon a high seat at one of the gates, heard their mournful cries, and supposed that some strange thing had befallen his family, so he sent for the young man, and when he understood what had happened in the battle, he was not so much uneasy as to his sons, or as to what was told him about the army, having known before by divine revelation that these things would happen, and having himself declared them before, for when sad things come unexpectedly they distress men most ; but as soon as he heard that the ark was carried captive by their enemies, he was very much grieved at it, because it fell out quite differently from what he expected, so he rolled off his seat and died, having in all lived ninety-eight years, and held the government forty of them.

§ 4. On the same day his son Phinehas' wife died also, not being able to survive the misfortune of her husband; for they told her of her husband's death as she was in labour, and she bore a seven months' son, who lived, and to whom they gave the name of Ichabod, which name signifies disgrace, because the army received disgrace at that time.

§ 5. Now Eli was the first of the family of Ithamar, the other son of Aaron, that had the high-priesthood, for the house of Eleazar officiated as high priests at first, the high-priesthood regularly descending from father to son, for Eleazar bequeathed it to his son Phinehas, and after him his son Abiezer took the honour, and delivered it to his son, whose name was Bukki, from whom his son Ozi received it; after whom Eli, of whom I have been speaking, had the high-priesthood, and so had his posterity until the time of Solomon's reign, but then the posterity of Eleazar reassumed it.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF THIRTY-TWO YEARS.— FROM THE DEATH OF ELI TO THE DEATH OF SAUL.

CHAP I.

The Destruction that came upon the Philistines, and upon their Land, from the Wrath of God, on account of their having carried the Ark away captive; and how they sent it back to the Hebrews.

§ 1.

WHEN the Philistines had taken the ark of the Hebrews captive, as I said a little before, they carried it to the city of Ashdod,<sup>1</sup> and put it by their own god, who was called Dagon,<sup>2</sup> as one of their spoils; but when they went into his temple, the next morning, to worship their god, they found him paying the same worship to the ark; for he lay on the ground, having fallen down from the base

whereon he stood. So they took him up, and set him on his base again, and were very troubled at what had happened; and as they frequently came to Dagon, and found him still lying on the ground, in a posture of adoration to the ark, they were in very great distress and confusion. At last God sent destruction and disease upon the city and country of Ashdod, for they died of the dysentery, a sore distemper that brought death upon them very suddenly; for before the soul could by an easy death be loosened from the body, they brought up their entrails, which were eaten through, and vomited them up entirely rotted away by the disease. And as to the fruits of their country, a great multitude of mice came up out of the earth, and hurt them, and spared neither plants nor fruits. Now while the people of Ashdod were undergoing these trials, and were not able to bear up under their calamities, they perceived that they suffered thus because of the ark, and that the victory they had got, and their having taken the ark captive, had not happened for their good; they therefore sent to the people of Ascalon, and asked that they would receive the ark among them. This request of the people of Ashdod was not disagreeable to those of Ascalon, so they granted them that favour. But when they had got the ark, they were in the same miserable condition, for the ark carried along with it the plagues that the people of Ashdod had suffered to those who received it from them. Those of Ascalon therefore also sent it away from themselves to others: nor did it remain with those others either, for as they were pursued by the same plagues, they sent it on to the neighbouring cities; so that the ark went round in this manner to five cities of the Philistines, as though it exacted these plagues as a tribute to be paid it for its coming among them.

§ 2. As those that had experienced these miseries were tired out with them, and as those that heard of them learnt thereby not to admit the ark among them, since they paid so dear a tribute and price for it, at last they sought for some contrivance and means to get free from it: so the rulers of the five cities, Gath,<sup>1</sup> Ekron,<sup>2</sup> Ascalon,<sup>3</sup> Gaza, and Ashdod, met together, and considered what was to be done; and at first they thought it best to send the ark back to its own people, in the idea that God had avenged its cause, and that the miseries they had undergone came along with it, and were sent on their cities upon its account, and together with it. Others said they should not do so, nor suffer themselves to be deluded into ascribing the cause of their miseries to it, because it could not have such a power and influence upon them; for had God had such a regard to it, it would not have been delivered into the hands of men: so they exhorted them to be quiet, and to take patiently what had befallen them, and to suppose there was no other cause of it but nature, which at certain periods of time produces such changes in the bodies of men, in the earth, in plants, and in all things that grow out of the earth. But the counsel that prevailed over those already described, was that of certain men, who were believed to have distinguished themselves previously by their understanding and prudence, and who, in the present circumstances, seemed more than all the rest to speak to the point. These men said it was not right either to send the ark away or to detain it, but to dedicate five golden images, one for each city, as a thank-offering to God, on account of his having taken care of their preservation, and having kept them alive when their lives were likely to be taken away by such distempers as they were not able to face. They also advised to make five golden mice, like those that devoured and destroyed their country, and to put them in a box and lay them upon the ark; to make also a new cart for the ark, and to yoke milch kine to it, but to shut up their calves, and keep them from them, lest by following after them they should prove a hindrance to their dams, and that the dams might return the faster out of a desire for their calves; then to drive those milch kine that carried the ark, and leave them at a place where three roads met, and to let the kine go along whichever of those roads they pleased, and in case they took the way to the Hebrews, and went into their country, they should suppose that the ark was the cause of their misfortunes, but if they should turn into another road, they said, "We will pursue after it, and conclude it has no such force in it."

§ 3. So they determined that these men spoke well, and immediately confirmed their opinion by doing accordingly. And when they had done as has been already described, they brought the cart to a place where three roads met, and left it there, and went their way, and the kine took the right road, as if some one had led them, while the rulers of the Philistines followed after them, wishing to know where they would stand still, and to whom they would go. Now there was a certain village belonging to the tribe of Judah, whose name was Bethshemesh,<sup>1</sup> and to that village did the kine go, and though there was an extensive and fertile plain before them to proceed in, they went no further, but stopped the cart there. This was a sight to those of that village, and they were very glad; for it being then summer-time, and all the inhabitants being in the fields gathering in the harvest, they left off the labour of their hands for joy, as soon as they saw the ark, and ran to the cart; and taking the ark off it, and the box that had the images and the mice in it, they set it upon a certain rock which was in the plain; and when they had offered a splendid sacrifice to God, and feasted, they offered up the cart and kine as a burnt-offering: and when the lords of the Philistines saw this, they returned back.

§ 4. And now it was, that the wrath and anger of God overtook them, and struck seventy persons dead in the village of Bethshemesh, who, not being priests, and so not worthy to touch the ark, had approached it. The people of the village wept for these that thus suffered, and made such lamentation as was naturally to be expected on so great a misfortune sent by God, and everyone mourned for his own relation. And since they acknowledged themselves unworthy of the ark's abode with them, they sent to the public authorities of the Israelites, and informed them that the ark was restored by the Philistines; and when they knew this, they brought it away to Kirjathjearim,<sup>2</sup> a city in the neighbourhood of Bethshemesh. In this city lived one Abinadab, a Levite by birth, who was greatly esteemed for his righteous and religious life; so they brought the ark to his house, as to a place fit for God himself to abide in, since therein did abide a righteous man. His sons also took care of the ark, and were the custodians of it for twenty years, for so many years it continued in Kirjathjearim, having been but four months with the Philistines.

CHAP II.

The Expedition of the Philistines against the Hebrews, and the Hebrews' Victory under Samuel the Prophet, who was their General.

§ 1.

NOW, while the city of Kirjathjearim had the ark with them, the whole body of the people betook themselves all that time to offer prayers and sacrifices to God, and manifested much concern and zeal about his worship. So Samuel the prophet, seeing how ready they were to do their duty, thought this a proper time to speak to them, while they were in this good disposition, about the recovery of their liberty, and the blessings that would accompany the same. Accordingly, he used such words to them as he thought were most likely to excite that inclination, and persuade them to attempt it: "O you Israelites," said he, "to whom the Philistines are still grievous enemies, but to whom God begins to be gracious and friendly, it behoves you not only to be desirous of liberty, but to take the proper means to obtain it. Nor are you to be contented with an inclination to get rid of your lords and masters, while you still do what will procure your continuance under them: but be righteous and cast wickedness out of your souls and cure it, and by your worship supplicate the divine majesty with all your hearts, and persevere in the honour you pay to him. For if you act thus you will enjoy prosperity; you will be freed from your slavery, and will get the victory over your enemies; which blessings it is not possible you should attain, either by weapons of war, or by the strength of your bodies, or by the multitude of allies. For God has not promised to grant these blessings by those means, but by your being good and righteous men; and if you will be such, I will be security to you for the performance of God's promises. When Samuel had said this, the multitude applauded him, and were pleased with his exhortation to them, and gave their consent to do what was pleasing to God. So Samuel gathered them together to a certain city called Mizpeh,<sup>1</sup> which signifies in the Hebrew tongue watch-tower, where they drew water, and poured it out to God, and fasted all day, and betook themselves to their prayers.

§ 2. This assembly of theirs did not escape the notice of the Philistines, and when they learned of their gathering together, they fell upon the Hebrews with a great army and mighty force, hoping to assault them when they did not expect it, and were unprepared. This thing affrighted the Hebrews, and put them into disorder and terror; so they came running to Samuel, and said, that their souls were sunk by their fears, and by the former defeat they had received, and that was why they kept quiet, lest they should excite the power of their enemies. "And now that you have brought us hither to offer up our prayers and sacrifices and take oaths, our enemies are making an expedition against us, while we are naked and unarmed; wherefore we have no other hope of deliverance but that by means of you, and by the assistance God shall afford us upon your prayers to him, we shall obtain deliverance from the Philistines." Thereupon Samuel bade them be of good cheer, and promised them that God would assist them; and taking a sucking-lamb, he sacrificed it for the multitude, and besought God to hold his protecting hand over them when they should fight with the Philistines, and not to suffer them to undergo a second misfortune. And God hearkened to his prayers, and accepting the sacrifice with a gracious intention, and as one disposed to assist them, he granted them victory and power over their enemies. Now while the altar had the sacrifice to God upon it, and had not yet consumed it wholly by its sacred fire, the enemy's army marched out of their camp, and drew up in order of battle, in hope that they should be conquerors, since the Jews were intercepted in disadvantageous circumstances,<sup>1</sup> neither having their weapons with them, nor being assembled there in order to fight. But things so fell out, as would hardly have been credited, if they had been foretold by anybody; for in the first place, God disturbed the Philistines with an earthquake, and moved the ground under them to such a degree, that he caused it to tremble and shake, insomuch that by its trembling some were unable to keep their feet, and others were swallowed up in its chasms. Next he caused such a noise of thunder to come among them, and made fiery lightning shine so terribly round about them, as to scorch their faces, and so shook their weapons out of their hands, that he made them flee unarmed. And Samuel, with the multitude, pursued them to a place called Bethcar,<sup>2</sup> and there he set up a stone as a land-mark of their victory and their enemies' flight, and called it the Stone of Power,<sup>3</sup> as a token of the power God had given them against their enemies.

§ 3. The Philistines after this reverse made no more expeditions against the Israelites, but were quiet, from fear and remembrance of what had befallen them; and the courage which the Philistines formerly had against the Hebrews was, after this victory, transferred to the Hebrews. Samuel also made an expedition against the Philistines, and slew many of them, and entirely humbled their pride, and took from them that country, which, when they were formerly conquerors in battle, they had cut off from the Jews, namely, the country that extended from the borders of Gath<sup>4</sup> to the city of Ekron.<sup>5</sup> The rest of the Canaanites were at this time friendly to the Israelites.

<sup>1</sup> This is the first place, so far as I remember, in these Antiquities, where Josephus begins to call his nation 'Jews,' he having hitherto usually, if not constantly, called them either 'Hebrews' or 'Israelites.' The second place soon follows, chap. iii. § 5.—W.

CHAP. III.

How Samuel, when he was so infirm with old Age, that he could not take care of Public Affairs, intrusted them to his Sons; and how, upon the evil Administration of the Government by them, the Multitude were so angry, that they demanded a King to reign over them, although Samuel was much displeas'd thereat.

§ 1.

NOW Samuel the prophet ordered the affairs of the people well, and appointed a city for every district, and commanded them to come to such cities to have their controversies with one another decided in them, he himself visiting all those cities twice a year, and doing justice; and so he kept everything in good order for a long time.

§ 2. After that, being oppressed with old age, and not able to do what he used to do, he committed the government and the care of the multitude to his sons: the elder of whom was called Joel, and the younger Abiah. He also enjoined them to reside and judge the people, the one at the city Bethel,<sup>1</sup> and the other at Beersheba,<sup>2</sup> and divided the people into districts that should be under the jurisdiction of each of them. Now these sons of Samuel give us an evident example and proof that some children are not of the same disposition as their parents, but sometimes, perhaps, good and virtuous, though born of wicked parents, and sometimes showing themselves wicked, though born of good parents. For they, turning aside from their father's good course, and taking a way that was contrary, perverted justice for gifts and filthy lucre, and gave their sentences not according to truth, but according to gain, and gave themselves up to luxury and a costly way of living, so that, as in the first place, they practised what was contrary to the will of God, so did they, in the second place, what was contrary to the will of the prophet their father, who had taken a great deal of care and pains that the multitude should be righteous.

§ 3. But the people, upon these outrages offered to their former polity and government by the prophet's sons, were very vexed at their actions, and came running to the prophet, who then lived at the city Ramah,<sup>1</sup> and informed him of the transgressions of his sons; and as he was himself old already, and too infirm because of age to manage their affairs in the manner he used to do, they begged and entreated him to appoint some person to be king over them, who might rule over the nation, and avenge them on the Philistines, who ought to be punished for their former oppression. These words greatly afflicted Samuel, on account of his innate love of justice, and his hatred to kingly government, for he was very fond of an aristocracy, as making those under its rule of a divine and happy disposition: nor could he think either of eating or sleeping, from his concern and torment of mind at what they had said, but continued awake all the night long, and revolved these things in his mind.

§ 4. As he was thus disposed, God appeared to him, and comforted him, saying, "That he ought not to be uneasy at what the multitude demanded, because it was not Samuel but himself whom they so insolently despised, and would not have to be their only King; that they had been contriving these things from the very day they came out of Egypt; however in no long time they would sorely repent of what they did, which repentance however could not undo what was thus done for futurity; for they would be sufficiently punished for their contemptuous and ungrateful conduct towards me and your prophetic office. So I command you to appoint one I shall name to be their king, when you have first described what mischiefs kingly government will bring upon them, and openly testified to them what a great change of affairs they are in a hurry to bring about."

§ 5. When Samuel had heard this, he called the Jews together early in the morning, and confessed to them that he was to appoint them a king, but he said that he was first to describe to them what would follow, what treatment they would receive from their kings, and with how many evils they would become familiar. "For know," said he, "in the first place, that they will take your sons away from you, and will command some of them to be drivers of their chariots, and some to be their horsemen and body-guards, and others to be runners before them, and captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds; they will also make them their artificers, makers of armour, and of chariots, and of instruments; they will make them their husbandmen also, and tillers of their fields, and diggers of their vineyards; nor will there be anything which they will not have to do at their commands, as if they were slaves bought with money. They will also make your daughters to be perfumers, and cooks, and bakers; and they will be obliged to do all sorts of work, which women slaves in fear of stripes and torments submit to. They will also take away your possessions, and bestow them upon their eunuchs and body-guards, and will give the herds of your cattle to their own servants. And to say briefly all at once, you, and all that is yours, will be servants to your king and his household; and when you suffer this, you will remember what I now say. And when you repent of what you have done, and beseech God to have mercy upon you, and to grant you a quick deliverance from your kings, he will not accept your prayers, but will neglect you, and permit you to suffer the punishment your ill-advisedness has deserved."

§ 6. But the multitude were still so foolish as to be deaf to these predictions of what would befall them; and too discontented to suffer a determination which they had once made to be put out of their minds. For they could not be turned from their purpose, nor did they regard the words of Samuel, but peremptorily insisted on their resolution, and demanded him to appoint them a king immediately, and not to trouble about the future. For they said it was necessary they should have with them one to fight their battles, and to avenge them on their enemies, and it was no way absurd, as their neighbours were under kingly government, that they should have the same polity also. So as Samuel saw that what he had said had not diverted them from their purpose, but that they continued resolute, he said,

“Go you every one home for the present; at the fitting season I will send for you, as soon as I shall have learned from God who it is that he will give you for your king.”

CHAP. IV.

The Appointment of a King over the Israelites, whose name was Saul, at the Command of God.

§ 1.

THERE was a man of the tribe of Benjamin, of good family and of a virtuous disposition, whose name was Kish. He had a son, a young man of comely countenance, and tall of body, but his understanding and his mind were even better than his externals. His name was Saul. Now this Kish had some fine she-asses that had strayed from the pasture where they fed, and he was more delighted with them than with any other cattle he had; so he sent his son with one servant to search for them. And when he had travelled over his own tribe in search of these asses, he went to the other tribes, and when he found them not there either, he determined to go home, lest he should occasion any concern to his father about himself. But when his servant that followed him told him, as they were near the city of Ramah, that there was a true prophet in that city, and advised him to go to him, for they would know from him what had become of the asses, he replied, that if they should go to him, they had nothing to give him as a reward for his prophecy, for their journey-money was spent. The servant answered that he had still the fourth part of a shekel, and he would present him with that, for they did not know in their ignorance that the prophet took no reward. So they went to him, and when they were before the gates, they lit upon some maidens that were going to fetch water, and they asked them which was the prophet's house? They showed them which it was, and bade them make haste to consult him before he sat down to supper, for he had invited many guests to a feast, and his habit was to sit down before his guests. Now Samuel had gathered many together to feast with him because, as he every day prayed to God to tell him beforehand whom he would make king, he had informed him of this man the day before, for he said he would send him a certain young man of the tribe of Benjamin about that hour of the day; and he sat on the top of his house in expectation of the time being come. And when the time was completed, he came down and went to supper, and met with Saul, and God discovered to him that this was the future king. Then Saul went up to Samuel and saluted him, and desired him to inform him which was the prophet's house? for he said he was a stranger, and did not know it. When Samuel told him that he was himself the prophet, and led him into supper, and assured him that the asses were found which he had been sent to seek, and that blessings of all kinds were assured to him, he replied, "Sir, I am too inconsiderable to hope for any such things, and of a tribe too small to have kings made out of it, and of a family humbler than other families; but you tell me this in jest, and make me an object of laughter, when you discourse with me of greater matters than my present need." However, the prophet led him in to the feast, and made him and his servant that followed him sit down above the other guests that were invited, who were seventy in number; and he gave orders to his servants to set the royal portion before Saul. And when the time of going to bed was come, the rest rose up, and went home every one of them, but Saul and his servant stayed with the prophet, and slept at his house.

§ 2. And as soon as it was day, Samuel made Saul get up out of his bed, and conducted him on his way, and when he was out of the city, desired him to cause his servant to go on, but to stay behind himself, for he had something to say to him, when nobody else was present. So Saul sent on the servant that followed him, and the prophet took a vial of oil, and poured it upon the head of the young man, and kissed him, and said, "Be thou a king by the ordination of God against the Philistines, and to avenge the Hebrews on them. Of this thou shalt have a sign, which I would have thee take notice of. As soon as thou art departed hence, thou wilt find three men upon the road, going to worship God at Bethel, the first of whom thou wilt see carrying three loaves of bread, the second carrying a kid of the goats, and the third will follow them, carrying a wine-skin. These three men will salute thee, and speak kindly to thee, and will give thee two of their loaves, which thou shalt accept of. After that thou shalt come to a place called Rachel's Tomb,<sup>1</sup> where thou shalt meet with a man who will tell thee thy asses are found. After this, when thou reachest Gabatha,<sup>2</sup> thou shalt overtake a company of prophets, and shalt be seized with the divine Spirit, and prophesy along with them, till everyone that sees thee shall be astonished, and wonder, and say, 'Whence is it that the son of Kish has arrived at this degree of happiness?' And when these signs have happened to thee, know that God is with thee; and salute thy father, and thy kindred. Thou shalt also come when I send for thee to Gilgal,<sup>3</sup> that we may offer thank-offerings to God for these blessings." When Samuel had said this, and foretold these things, he sent the young man away. And all things happened to Saul according to the prophecy of Samuel.

§ 3. But as soon as Saul came into the house of his kinsman Abner, whom indeed he loved better than any other of his relations, he was asked by him concerning his journey, and what had happened to him therein; and he concealed none of the other things from him, either his going to Samuel the prophet, or how he told him the asses were found; but he said nothing to him about the kingdom, and what belonged thereto, which he thought when heard would procure him envy and unbelief; nor did he think it prudent to tell those things to him, although he appeared very friendly to him, and one whom he loved above the rest of his relations, considering, I suppose, as human nature really is, that no one is a firm friend either among our intimates or kindred, or preserves his kind disposition when God advances men to great prosperity, but all are still ill-natured and envious at their successes.

§ 4. Then Samuel called the people together to the city Mizpeh, and spoke to them in the following words, which he said he was to speak by the command of God. He said that though God had granted them a state of liberty, and brought their enemies into subjection, they had forgotten his benefits, and rejected God for their King, not considering that it would be most for their advantage to be presided over by the best of beings; for God was the best of beings, and they chose to have a man for their king; while kings would use their subjects as beasts, according to their will and caprice and other passions, being wholly carried away by the lust of power, and would not endeavour to preserve the race of mankind as their own workmanship and creation, which God for that very reason would take care of. "But since you have come to a fixed resolution, and this intention to outrage God has quite mastered you, dispose yourselves by your tribes and families and cast lots."

§ 5. When the Hebrews had so done, the lot fell upon the tribe of Benjamin; and when the lot was cast for the families of this tribe, that which was called Matri was taken, and when the lot was cast for the individuals of that family, Saul, the son of Kish, was taken for their king. When the young man knew this, he immediately went away and hid himself, I suppose because he would not have it thought that he willingly took the kingdom. Nay, he showed such a degree of self-control and modesty, that while most people are not able to contain their joy even when they gain small advantages, but are eager to exhibit themselves publicly to all men, he did not only show nothing of that nature, though he was appointed lord of so many and so great tribes, but stole away and concealed himself from the sight of those he was to reign over, and made them seek him, and that with a good deal of trouble. So as the people were in bewilderment and anxious at Saul's disappearance, the prophet besought God to show where the young man was, and to produce him before them. And when he had learned of God the place where Saul was hidden, he sent men to fetch him, and when he was come he set him in the midst of the multitude. Now he was taller than any of them, and in stature looked every inch a king.

§ 6. Then said the prophet, "God gives you this man to be your king: see how he is higher than any of the people, and worthy of the dominion." And as soon as the people had shouted with acclamation, God save the king! the prophet wrote down what would come to pass in a book, and read it in the hearing of the king, and laid up the book in the tabernacle of God, to be a witness to future generations of what he had foretold. And when Samuel had finished this matter, he dismissed the multitude, and returned himself to the city of Ramah, for it was his own country. Saul also went away to Gibeah,<sup>1</sup> where he was born: and many good men accompanied him and paid him the honour due to the king, but there were several bad men, who despised him, and derided the others, and did neither bring him presents, nor in word or deed try to please him.

§ 1.

BUT one month afterwards the war which Saul had with Nahash, the king of the Ammonites, obtained him respect from all the people. This Nahash had done a great deal of mischief to the Jews that lived beyond the Jordan, by an expedition he had made against them with a great and warlike army. He also reduced their cities to slavery, and that not only by subduing them for the present by force and violence, but weakening them by subtilty and cunning, that they might not be able afterwards to get rid of their slavery to him; for he put out the right eyes of those that either surrendered to him upon conditions, or were taken by him in war; and this he did, that as their left eyes would be covered by their shields, they might be wholly useless in war.<sup>1</sup> Now when the king of the Ammonites had served those beyond the Jordan in this manner, he led his army against those that were called Gileadites; and having pitched his camp near the chief city of his enemies, which was Jabesh,<sup>2</sup> he sent ambassadors to them, commanding them either to surrender and have their right eyes plucked out, or to undergo a siege and have their cities overthrown. He gave them their choice, whether they would cut off a small member of their body, or utterly perish. And the Gileadites were so terrified that they had not courage to say anything to either of these proposals, either that they would deliver themselves up, or that they would fight. But they asked Nahash to give them seven days' truce, that they might send envoys to their countrymen and entreat their assistance, and if assistance came to them, they would fight, but if it were impossible to get that from them, they said they would deliver themselves up to suffer whatever he was pleased to inflict upon them.

§ 2. And Nahash, despising the multitude of the Gileadites, and the answer they gave, allowed them a truce, and gave them leave to send to whomever they pleased for assistance. So they immediately sent to all the cities of the Israelites, and informed them what Nahash had threatened to do to them, and of the hopeless condition they were in. And the people fell into tears and grief on hearing what the envoys from Jabesh said, but the terror they were in permitted them to do nothing more. And when the messengers came to the city of king Saul, and revealed the danger in which the inhabitants of Jabesh were, the people were in the same affliction as those in the other cities, for they lamented the calamity of their kindred. And when Saul returned from his farm to the city, he found the citizens weeping, and when, upon inquiry, he learned the cause of their confusion and dejection, he was seized with a divine fury, and sent home the envoys from the inhabitants of Jabesh, and promised to come to their assistance on the third day, and to beat their enemies before sun-rise, that the rising sun might see that they had already conquered, and were freed from their fears. He also bade some of them stay to show him the way to Jabesh.

§ 3. And wishing to excite the people to war against the Ammonites by fear of punishment, and that they might concentrate with greater celerity, he cut the sinews of his yoke of oxen, and threatened to do the same to all such as did not come armed to the Jordan the next day, and follow him and Samuel the prophet wherever they should lead them. So they mustered in fear of the punishment they were threatened with at the appointed time. And the multitude were numbered at the city of Bezek.<sup>1</sup> And he found the number of those that were gathered together, besides those of the tribe of Judah, to be seven hundred thousand, while those of that tribe were seventy thousand. So he crossed over the Jordan, and marched all that night some thirty-seven miles, and got to Jabesh before sun-rise. Then he divided the army into three companies, and fell upon the enemy on every side on the sudden, and when they expected no such thing: and joining battle with them, he slew a great many of the Ammonites, as also their king Nahash. This glorious action was done by Saul, and was related with great commendation of him to all the Hebrews; and he thence gained a wonderful reputation for valour: for although there were some that despised him before, they now changed their minds, and honoured him, and esteemed him as the best of them all. For he did not content himself with having expunged the inhabitants of Jabesh only, but he made an expedition into the country of the Ammonites, and laid it all waste, and took much spoil, and returned to his own country in glory. And the people were greatly pleased at this success of Saul, and rejoiced that they had made such a one their king. They also clamoured against those that had said he would be no good to their affairs, and said, "Where now are these men, let them be brought to punishment," with all the similar things that multitudes usually say, when they are elated with prosperity, against those that lately held cheap the authors of it. But Saul, although he took the good-will and affection of these men very kindly, swore that he would not see any of his countrymen slain that day, for it was monstrous to mix the victory, which God had given them, with the blood and slaughter of those that were of the same race as themselves, and that it was more fitting to be friendly disposed to one another and to feast together.

§ 4. And when Samuel had told them that he ought to confirm the kingdom to Saul by a second inauguration, they all assembled at the city of Gilgal, for thither did he command them to come. Then the prophet anointed Saul again with the holy oil, in the sight of the multitude, and proclaimed him king the second time. And so the polity of the Hebrews was changed into a regal one, for in the days of Moses, and his disciple Joshua, who was their general, they continued an aristocracy, and after the death of Joshua, for eighteen years in all, the multitude had no settled form of government, but were an anarchy; after which they returned to their former polity, permitting themselves to be judged by him who appeared to be the best and most courageous warrior, so they called this period of their government the era of Judges.

§ 5. Then did Samuel the prophet convene an assembly, and said, "I solemnly adjure you by God Almighty, who brought those excellent brothers, I mean Moses and Aaron, into the world, and rescued our fathers from the Egyptians, and from the slavery they endured under them, that you will not yield to modesty, or suppress anything out of fear, or give way to any other passion, but say out what I have ever done that was bad or unjust, for gain or in covetousness, or to gratify others? Bear witness against me, if I have taken an ox or a sheep, or any such thing, though, when they are taken to support men, it is esteemed blameless; or have I taken an ass for mine own use to the grief of anyone? Lay one such crime to my charge, now we are in your king's presence." But they cried out, that nothing of the kind had been done by him, but that he had presided over the nation in a holy and just manner.

§ 6. Thereupon Samuel, as this testimony had been given him by them all, said, "Since you grant that you are not able to lay any ill thing to my charge hitherto, come now, and hearken while I speak with great freedom to you. You have been guilty of great impiety against God in asking you a king. It behoved you to remember that our ancestor Jacob went down into Egypt, because of a famine, with seventy souls only of our family, and that their posterity multiplied there to many myriads, whom the Egyptians brought into slavery and hard oppression, and that God himself, upon the prayers of our fathers, sent Moses and Aaron, who were brothers, and gave them power to deliver the multitude out of their distress, and that without a king, and they brought you into this very land which you now possess. Yet though you enjoyed these advantages from God, you betrayed his worship and religion. Nevertheless, when you were brought under the hands of your enemies, he delivered you, first by rendering you superior to the Assyrians and their forces, and next by making you to overcome the Ammonites, and the Moabites, and last of all, the Philistines. And these things were achieved under the lead of Jephthah and Gideon, and not of a king. What madness therefore possessed you to flee from God, and to desire to be under a king? Yet have I appointed him king whom he chose for you. However, that I may make it plain to you, that God is angry and displeased at your choice of kingly government, I will so contrive that he shall declare this very plainly to you by a miracle, for I will entreat of God that he will now manifest to you, what none of you ever saw here before, a storm in the midst of harvest." Now, as soon as he had said this to the people, God attested the truth of all that the prophet had said by thunder and lightning and the descent of hail, insomuch that they were amazed and terrified, and confessed that they had sinned, and had fallen into this sin through ignorance; and besought the prophet, as one that was a tender and gentle father to them, to render God so merciful as to forgive this sin, which they had added to those other offences whereby they had affronted him, and transgressed against him. So he promised them, that he would beseech God, and urge him to forgive them this sin. However, he advised them to be righteous and good, and ever to remember the miseries that had befallen them on account of their departure from virtue: as also, to remember the signs God had showed them, and the laws that Moses had given them, if they had any desire of being preserved, and made happy with their king. But he said, that if they should grow careless of these things, great judgments would come from God both upon them and their king. And when Samuel had thus prophesied to the Hebrews, he dismissed them to their own homes, having confirmed the kingdom to Saul the second time.

CHAP. VI.

How the Philistines made another Expedition against the Hebrews, and were beaten by them.

§ 1.

NOW Saul chose out of the multitude about three thousand men, and he took two thousand of them for his own body-guards, and dwelt himself in the city of Bethel,<sup>1</sup> but he gave the rest of them to Jonathan his son to be his body-guards, and sent him to Gibeah.<sup>2</sup> And Jonathan took by storm a certain garrison of the Philistines, not far from Gilgal. For the Philistines of Gibeah had beaten the Jews, and taken their weapons away, and had put garrisons into the strongest places in the country, and had forbidden the Jews to carry any instrument of iron, or to make use of iron at all. And on account of this prohibition, if their husbandmen required to sharpen any of their tools, whether it were coulter, or spade, or any instrument of husbandry, they had to come to the Philistines to do it. Now as soon as the Philistines heard of the slaughter of their garrison, they were in a great rage about it, and looking on this contempt as a terrible affront offered them, they marched against the Jews with three hundred thousand foot, and thirty thousand chariots, and six thousand horse, and pitched their camp near the city of Michmash.<sup>1</sup> When Saul, the king of the Hebrews, was informed of this, he went down to the city of Gilgal,<sup>2</sup> and made proclamation over all the country, and called on the people to try to regain their liberty by fighting against the Philistines. And he made light of their forces, and depreciated them as not very considerable, and as not so great but that they might hazard a battle with them. But when the army of Saul observed how numerous the Philistines were, they were in great consternation, and some of them hid themselves in caves and in dens under ground, but the greater part fled into the land beyond the Jordan, which belonged to Gad and Reuben.

§ 2. But Saul sent to the prophet, and summoned him to consult with him about the war and public affairs. And he commanded him to stay there for him, and to prepare sacrifices, for he would come to him after six days, that they might offer sacrifice on the seventh day, and might then join battle with their enemies. So he waited,<sup>3</sup> as the prophet ordered him to do, but he did not entirely obey the command that was given him, for when he saw that the prophet tarried longer than he expected, and that he was being deserted by his soldiers, he took the victims and offered sacrifice. And when he heard that Samuel was come, he went out to meet him. And the prophet said he had not done well in disobeying the injunctions he had sent him, and by not staying till his coming, which, though

<sup>3</sup> Saul seems to have stayed till near the time of the evening sacrifice, on the seventh day, which Samuel the prophet of God had appointed him, but not till the end of that day, as he ought to have done; and Samuel appears, by delaying to come to the full time of the evening sacrifice on that seventh day, to have tried him (who seems to have been already, for some time, declining from his strict and bounden subordination to God and his prophet, to have taken life-guards for himself and his son, which was entirely a new thing in Israel, and savoured of a distrust of God's providence, and to have affected more than he ought that independent authority which the pagan kings took to themselves); Samuel, I say, seems to have here tried Saul, whether he would stay till the priest came, who alone could lawfully offer the sacrifices, or would boldly and profanely usurp the priest's office, which he venturing upon, was justly rejected for his profaneness.—W.

according to the will of God, he had anticipated by offering up those prayers, and those sacrifices, that he should have made for the multitude, thereby performing sacred rites informally and hastily. Thereupon Saul made apology for himself, and said, that he had waited as many days as Samuel had appointed him; that he had been induced to offer sacrifice from the necessity he was in, and because his soldiers were departing from him, from their fear of the enemy's camp at Michmash, the report having spread that they were coming down upon him to Gilgal. To which Samuel replied, "If you had been a righteous man, and not disobeyed me, nor slighted the commands which God suggested to me in the present state of affairs, by acting more hastily than the case required, you would have been permitted to reign a long time, and your posterity after you." Then Samuel, grieved at what had happened, returned home, and Saul went to the city of Gibeah with his son Jonathan, having only six hundred men with him; and most of these had no weapons, because of the scarcity of iron in that country, as well as of those that could make such weapons, for, as I showed a little before, the Philistines had prohibited the manufacturing of weapons. Now the Philistines divided their army into three companies, and took as many roads, and laid waste the country of the Hebrews, while king Saul and his son Jonathan saw what was done, but were not able to defend the land, as no more than six hundred men were with them. And as he and his son, and Abiah the high priest, who was of the posterity of Eli the high priest, were sitting upon a high hill, and seeing the land laid waste, they were mightily disturbed at it. Now Saul's son agreed with his armour-bearer, that they would go privately to the enemy's camp, and stir up a tumult and panic among them. And when the armour-bearer readily promised to follow him wherever he should lead him, though he should die in the attempt, Jonathan made use of the young man's assistance, and descended from the hill, and made his way to the enemy. Now the enemy's camp was upon a precipice, which had three peaks ending in a small but sharp and long extremity, while there was a rock that surrounded them, like bulwarks to prevent the attack of an enemy. It so happened that the camp there was carelessly guarded, because of the security that was felt from the situation of the place, and because it was thought altogether impossible for anyone not only to ascend to the camp in that quarter, but so much as to come near it. As soon, therefore, as they came to the camp, Jonathan encouraged his armour-bearer, and said to him. "Let us attack the enemy, and if, when they see us, they bid us come up to them, let us take that for a signal of victory; but if they say nothing and invite us not, let us return back again." And as they were approaching the enemy's camp, just after break of day, the Philistines saw them, and said one to another, "The Hebrews come out of their dens and caves:" and they said to Jonathan and to his armour-bearer, "Come on, ascend up to us, that we may inflict a just punishment upon you, for your rash attempt." So Saul's son accepted the invitation, as signifying to him victory, and immediately left the place whence they were seen by their enemies, and changed his place, and came to the rock which had none to guard it because of its strength; and there they crept up with great difficulty, but so far overcame the natural difficulty of the ground that they climbed up to the enemy. And they fell upon them as they were asleep, and slew about twenty of them, and thereby filled them with disorder and panic, insomuch that some of them threw away their entire armour and fled, but most of them, not knowing one another because they were of different nations, suspected one another to be enemies (for they did not imagine it was only two Hebrews that had climbed up), and so they fought one against another: and some of them died in battle, and some, as they were fleeing away, were thrown headlong down the rock.

§ 3. And when Saul's watchmen told the king that the camp of the Philistines was in confusion, he inquired whether anybody had gone from the army. And when he heard that his son, and with him his armour-bearer, were absent, he bade the high priest take the garments of his high priesthood, and prophesy to him what success they would have; and he said, that they would get the victory, and prevail over their enemies. So he went out after the Philistines, and fell upon them as they were in disorder and slaying one another. Those who had fled to dens and caves came running to him, on hearing that Saul was gaining a victory. When therefore the number of Hebrews that came to Saul amounted to about ten thousand, he pursued the enemy who were scattered all over the country; but then he did an unfortunate thing, and one liable to be much blamed, whether unwittingly, or from joy at a victory gained so strangely, for it frequently happens that persons so fortunate are not able to act with reason. For wishing to avenge himself, and exact due punishment from the Philistines, he denounced a curse on the Hebrews, that if anyone stopped slaughtering the enemy, and ate anything, and left off the slaughter or pursuit before night came on and obliged them so to do, he should be accursed. Now after Saul had uttered this curse, when they were now in a wood belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, which was thick and full of bees, Saul's son, who did not hear his father utter that curse, nor the approbation the multitude gave to it, broke off a piece of a honeycomb and ate part of it. But meantime he was informed with what a curse his father had forbidden them to taste anything before sunset, so he left off eating, and said that his father had not done well in this prohibition, for had they taken some food, they would have pursued the enemy with greater vigour and alacrity, and both taken and slain many more of them.

§ 4. When therefore they had slain many myriads of the Philistines, they turned to spoiling the camp of the Philistines, but not till late in the evening. They also took a great deal of spoil, and cattle, and killed them, and ate them with their blood. And it was told to the king by the scribes, that the multitude was sinning against God, as they sacrificed, and were eating before the blood was well washed away, and the flesh made clean. Then Saul gave orders that a great stone should be rolled into the midst, and made proclamation that they should kill their sacrifices upon it, and not feed upon the flesh with the blood, for that was not acceptable to God. And when all the people did as the king commanded them, Saul erected an altar there, and offered burnt-offerings upon it to God. This was the first altar that Saul built.

§ 5. And Saul wishing to lead his men to the enemy's camp, in order to plunder it before it was day, and the soldiers not hesitating to follow him, but indeed showing great readiness to do as he commanded them, the king called Ahitub the high priest, and enjoined him to know of God, whether he would grant him permission to go against the enemy's camp, to destroy those that were in it. And when the high priest said, that God did not give any answer, "It is not without some cause," said Saul, "that God refuses to answer what we inquire of him, as only a little while ago he declared to us all that we desired beforehand, and even anticipated us in his answer. Surely there is some sin against him, that is concealed from us, which is the occasion of his silence. Now I swear by him himself, that though he that hath committed this sin should prove to be my own son Jonathan, I will slay him, and so appease the anger of God, just as I would punish a stranger, and one not at all related to me, for the same offence." And as the multitude cried out to him so to do, he forthwith set all the rest on one side, and he and his son stood on the other side, and he sought to discover the offender by lot. And the lot fell upon Jonathan himself. And when he was asked by his father what sin he had been guilty of? and what he was conscious of in the course of his life that might be esteemed guilt or profaneness? his answer was this, "O father, I have done nothing more than that yesterday, without knowing of the curse and oath you had pronounced, when I was in pursuit of the enemy, I tasted a honeycomb." But Saul swore that he would slay him, and prefer keeping his oath before all the ties of birth and of nature. And Jonathan was not dismayed at this threatening of death, but offering himself nobly and magnanimously, said, "Nor do I desire you, father, to spare me: death will be to me very acceptable, since it proceeds from your piety, and after a glorious victory; for it is the greatest consolation to me that I leave the Hebrews victorious over the Philistines." Thereupon all the people were very sorry, and greatly afflicted for Jonathan, and they swore that they would not see Jonathan die, who was the author of their victory. So they snatched him out of the danger he was in from his father's curse, while they also made their prayers to God for the young man, that he would forgive his sin.

§ 6. So Saul, having slain about sixty thousand of the enemy, returned home to his own city, and reigned happily. He also fought against the neighbouring nations, and subdued the Ammonites, and Moabites, and Philistines,<sup>1</sup> and Edomites, and Amalekites, as also the king of Zobah. He had three sons, Jonathan, and Ishui, and Melchishua, and two daughters, Merab and Michal. And Abner, his uncle's son, was captain of his host, the uncle's name was Ner. For Ner and Kish, the father of Saul, were brothers, and the sons of Abiel. Saul had also a great many chariots and horsemen, and against whomever he made war, he returned conqueror, and advanced the affairs of the Hebrews to a great degree of success and prosperity, and made them superior to other nations. And he made such of the young men that were remarkable for tallness and comeliness his body-guards.

CHAP. VII.

§ 1.

NOW Samuel came to Saul, and said to him, that he was sent by God to remind him that God had preferred him above all others and appointed him king, that he ought therefore to be obedient to him, and to submit to his authority, as though he had the dominion over the other tribes, yet God had the dominion over him, and over all things. He then said that God said to him, "Since the Amalekites did the Hebrews a great deal of mischief when they were in the wilderness, when on their coming out of Egypt they were making their way to that country which is now their own, I enjoin you to punish the Amalekites, by making war upon them, and when you have subdued them, you are to leave none of them alive, but to slay every age indiscriminately, beginning with the women and infants, and to exact this as a punishment upon them for the mischief they did to our forefathers. You are to spare nothing, neither asses nor other beasts, nor to reserve any of them for your own advantage and possession, but to devote them all to God, and, in obedience to the commands of Moses, to blot out the name of Amalek<sup>1</sup> entirely.

§ 2. So Saul promised to do what he was commanded; and supposing that his obedience to God would be shown, not only by making war against the Amalekites, but also by the readiness and quickness of his proceedings, he made no delay, but immediately gathered together all his forces; and when he had numbered them in Gilgal,<sup>2</sup> he found them to be about four hundred thousand Israelites, besides the tribe of Judah, which contained by itself thirty thousand. Accordingly, Saul made an irruption into the country of the Amalekites, and set many men in several parties in ambush at the river, that so he might not only injure them by open fighting, but might fall upon them unexpectedly when on the march, and might surround them and kill them. And when he had joined battle with the enemy he beat them, and, pursuing them as they fled, destroyed them all. And when that undertaking had succeeded according as God had foretold, he attacked the cities of the Amalekites, and besieged them, and took them by storm, some by warlike machines, some by mines dug under ground, some by building walls on the outside, some by famine, and some by other methods, and proceeded to slay women and children, and thought he did not therein act either barbarously or inhumanly, first, because they were enemies whom he thus treated, and in the next place, because it was done by the command of God, whom it was dangerous not to obey. He also took Agag, the enemy's king, captive; the beauty and tallness of whose body he admired so much, that he thought him worthy of saving alive, no longer acting according to the will of God, but giving way to private feeling, and gratifying an unseasonable pity, in a case where it was not safe for him to indulge it. For God hated the nation of the Amalekites to such a degree, that he commanded Saul to have no pity even on those infants whom we by nature especially commiserate, howbeit Saul preserved their king, though the instigator of all the miseries of the Hebrews, as if he preferred the fine appearance of the enemy to the memory of what God had sent him about. The multitude also were guilty as well as Saul, for they spared the herds and the flocks, and took them for a prey, when God had commanded they should not spare them. They also carried off with them all their substance and wealth, but if there was anything that was not worthy of their attention, that they destroyed.

<sup>1</sup> The reason of this severity is distinctly given, 1 Sam. xv. 18: "Go, and utterly destroy the sinners, the Amalekites." Nor, indeed, do we ever meet with these Amalekites but as very cruel and bloody people, and particularly seeking to injure and utterly to destroy the nation of Israel, Exod. xvii. 8-16; Numb. xiv. 45; Deut. xxv. 17-19; Judges vi. 3, 6; 1 Sam. xv. 33; Psalm lxxxiii. 7; and above all the most barbarous of all cruelties, that of Haman the Agagite, or one of the posterity of Agag, the old king of the Amalekites, Esther iii. 1-16.—W.

<sup>2</sup> In 1 Sam. xv. 4, the place of assembly is said to have been Telaim; the reading of the Lxx., however, agrees with Josephus.

§ 3. And when Saul had conquered all the Amalekites that reached from Pelusium<sup>1</sup> in Egypt to the Red Sea, he laid waste all the rest of the enemy's country; but for the nation of the Shechemites,<sup>2</sup> he did not touch them, although they dwelt in the very middle of the land of Midian;<sup>3</sup> for, Saul had sent to them before the battle, and charged them to depart thence, lest they should be partakers of the ruin of the Amalekites, for his reason for saving them was that they were of the kindred of Raguel, Moses' father-in-law.

§ 4. Then Saul returned home with joy at his success against the enemies, as though he had not neglected anything which the prophet had enjoined him to do, when he was going to make war with the Amalekites, and as though he had exactly observed all that he ought to have done.

But God was angry that the king of the Amalekites was preserved alive, and that the multitude had seized on the cattle for a prey, because it was done without his permission; for he thought it an intolerable thing, that they should conquer and overcome their enemies by the power which he gave them, and then that he himself should be so grossly despised and disobeyed by them, that a mere man, that was a king, would not bear it. He therefore told Samuel the prophet, that he repented he had made Saul king, as he did nothing that he commanded him, but indulged his own inclinations. When Samuel heard that he was very troubled, and began to beseech God all that night to be reconciled to Saul, and not to be angry with him: but he did not grant that forgiveness to Saul which the prophet asked for, not deeming it fit to grant forgiveness of sins at his entreaties, for they grow by nothing so much as the indulgence of those that are wronged, for while people hunt after the reputation of being gentle and good-natured, before they are aware, they produce the very sins. As soon therefore as God had rejected the intercession of the prophet, and it plainly appeared he would not change his mind, Samuel at break of day came to Saul to Gilgal. When the king saw him, he ran up to him, and embraced him, and said, "I return thanks to God who has given me the victory, and have done everything that he commanded me." To which Samuel replied, "How is it then that I hear the bleating of sheep, and the lowing of cattle in the camp?" Saul made answer that the people had reserved them for sacrifice, but that, as to the nation of the Amalekites, it was entirely destroyed, as he had been ordered, and that no one was left, but that he had saved the king alive alone, and brought him to him, concerning whom he said they would advise together what should be done with him. But the prophet said, "God is not delighted with sacrifices, but with good and righteous men, who are such as follow his will and his laws, and never think that anything is well done by them, but when they do it as God has commanded them: for he looks upon himself as affronted, not when anyone does not sacrifice, but when anybody appears to be disobedient to him. And from those who do not obey him, nor pay him that duty which is the only true and acceptable worship, he will not kindly accept their oblations, be those they offer never so many and fat, and be the presents they make him never so ornamental,—nay, though they be made of gold and silver, he will reject them, and esteem them arguments of wickedness, and not piety. And he is delighted with those that still bear in mind this one thing, and this only, how to do whatever God tells or commands them to do, and to choose rather to die than transgress any of those commands, nor does he require so much as a sacrifice from them. And when such do sacrifice, though it be but a mean oblation, he better accepts of the honour than such oblations as come from the richest men. Know then that you are under the wrath of God, for you have despised and neglected what he commanded you. How do you suppose that he will accept a sacrifice of such things as he has doomed to destruction? unless perchance you imagine that it is all one to offer it in sacrifice to God as to destroy it. Expect therefore that your kingdom will be taken from you, as well as the authority which you so relied on as to neglect the God who bestowed it upon you.” Then did Saul confess that he had acted wrong, and did not deny that he had sinned in transgressing the injunctions of the prophet, but he said, that it was out of dread and fear of the soldiers that he did not prohibit and restrain them when they seized on the prey. “But forgive me,” said he, “and be merciful to me, for I will be cautious how I offend for the time to come.” He also entreated the prophet to go back with him, and offer thank-offerings to God; but Samuel went home, because he saw that God would not be reconciled to him.

§ 5. And now Saul was so desirous to retain Samuel, that he took hold of his cloak, and because Samuel’s eagerness to depart made the tugging violent, the cloak was rent. Upon which the prophet said, that the kingdom should be rent from him in the same manner, and that a good and just man should take it; that God persevered in what he had decreed about him; for to be mutable and changeable in what was determined consorted with human passion only, not with the divine power. Then Saul said that he had done wrong, but that what was done could not be undone, he therefore begged him to honour him so far, that the multitude might see that he would accompany him in worshipping God. So Samuel granted him that favour, and went with him and worshipped God. Agag, also, the king of the Amalekites, was brought to him; and when he asked, how death was bitter, Samuel said: "As thou hast made many of the Hebrew mothers to lament and bewail their children, so shalt thou by thy death cause thy mother to lament thee also." And he gave orders to slay him immediately at Gilgal, and himself returned to the city of Ramah.

CHAP. VIII.

How, upon Saul's Transgressing of the Prophet's Commands, Samuel anointed privately another Person to be King, whose name was David, as God commanded him.

§ 1.

THEN Saul being sensible of the miserable condition he had brought himself into, and that he had made God to be his enemy, went up to his royal palace at Gibeah,<sup>1</sup> which name denotes a hill, and after that day came no more into the presence of the prophet. And as Samuel continued mourning for him, God bade him leave off his concern for him, and take the holy oil, and go to Bethlehem<sup>2</sup> to Jesse, the son of Obed, and anoint the one of his sons he should show him as the future king. But Samuel said, he was afraid lest Saul, when he came to know of it, should kill him, either privately or openly. But upon God's promising him safety in going there, he went to the forementioned city, and when they all saluted him, and asked, "What was the cause of his coming?" he told them, he came to sacrifice to God. When, therefore, he had sacrificed, he called Jesse and his sons to partake of the sacrifice, and when he noticed that his eldest son was tall and handsome, he guessed by his comeliness that he was to be the future king. But he was mistaken in judging of God's purpose, for when he inquired of God whether he should anoint with oil this youth, whom he so admired, and esteemed worthy of the kingdom? God said, "Men do not see as God seeth. You indeed regard only the fine appearance of the youth, and so esteem him worthy of the kingdom, while I propose the kingdom as a reward, not of the beauty of bodies, but of the virtue of souls, and I seek one that is perfectly comely in that respect, one who is adorned with piety, and righteousness, and bravery, and obedience, for in them consists the comeliness of the soul." When God had said this, Samuel bade Jesse show him all his sons. So he made five other of his sons come to him, of whom Eliab was the eldest, Aminadab the second, Shammah the third, Nathanael the fourth, Rael the fifth, and Asam the sixth. And when the prophet saw that these were no way inferior to the eldest in their looks, he inquired of God, which of them it was whom he chose as the king? And when God said it was none of them, he asked Jesse, whether he had any other sons besides these? and when he said he had one more, named David, but that he was a shepherd and took care of the flocks, Samuel bade them call him immediately, for till he was come they could not possibly sit down to the feast. Now as soon as his father had sent for David, and he was come, he appeared to be of a ruddy complexion, of keen sight, and a comely person in other respects also. This is he, said Samuel privately to himself, whom it pleases God to make king.—So he sat down to the feast, and placed the youth next him, and then Jesse and his sons; after which he took oil, in the sight of David, and anointed him, and whispered him in the ear, and acquainted him that God had chosen him to be king: and exhorted him to be righteous, and obedient to his commands, for so his kingdom would continue for a long time, and his house would be of great splendour and celebrated, and he would overthrow the Philistines, and against whatever nation he made war, he would be conqueror, and survive the fight, and while he lived would enjoy a glorious name, and leave such a name to his posterity also.

§ 2. And Samuel, when he had given him these instructions, went away, and the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and removed to David ; who, upon this removal of the Divine Spirit to him, began to prophesy. But as for Saul, some strange disorders and evil spirits came upon him, and brought upon him such suffocations as were ready to choke him, for which the physicians could devise no other remedy but that, if any person could charm those evil spirits away by singing and playing upon the harp, they advised them to inquire for such a one, and to observe when these evil spirits came upon him and disturbed him, and to take care that such a person might stand near him and play on the harp, and recite hymns to him. And Saul did not delay, but commanded them to seek out such a person. And when one of those that were present said that he had seen in the city of Bethlehem a son of Jesse, who was no more yet than a child in age, but comely and beautiful, and in other respects one deserving of regard, who was skilful in playing on the harp, and in singing of hymns, and an excellent soldier in war, he sent to Jesse and ordered him to take David away from the flocks, and send him to him, for he wished to see him, having heard of his comeliness and valour. So Jesse sent his son, and gave him presents to carry to Saul. And when he was come, Saul was pleased with him, and made him his armour-bearer, and held him in very great esteem, for he charmed his passion, and was his only physician against the trouble he had from the evil spirits whenever they came upon him, and that by reciting of hymns and playing upon the harp, and making Saul himself again. So he sent to Jesse the father of the lad, and desired him to permit David to stay with him, for he was delighted with his sight and company, which stay, not to contradict Saul, he granted.

CHAP. IX.

How the Philistines made another Expedition against the Hebrews, in the Reign of Saul, and how they were overcome by David's slaying Goliath in single Combat.

§ 1.

NOW the Philistines gathered themselves together again no very long time after, and having got together a great army, marched against the Israelites: and having occupied a place between Socoh<sup>1</sup> and Azekah,<sup>2</sup> pitched their camp there. Saul also drew out his army to oppose them, and by pitching his own camp on a certain hill, he forced the Philistines to leave their former camp, and to encamp upon another similar hill, over against that on which Saul's army lay, so that a valley, which was between the two hills on which they lay, divided their camps. Now there came down a man from the camp of the Philistines, whose name was Goliath, of the city of Gath,<sup>3</sup> a man of vast bulk, for he was four cubits and a span in height, and had weapons proportioned to the largeness of his body, for he had a breastplate on that weighed five thousand shekels; he had also a helmet and greaves of brass as large as you would naturally suppose might cover the limbs of so vast a body. His spear also was not a light thing to be carried in his right hand, but he carried it lying on his shoulders. His lance also weighed six hundred shekels: and many followed him carrying his armour. So this Goliath stood between the two armies, as they were in battle array, and cried out in a loud voice, and said to Saul and to the Hebrews, "I will free you from fighting and from dangers; for what necessity is there that your army should fall and be afflicted? Give me a man of yours that will fight with me, and he that conquers shall end the war; for that army to which the conqueror belongs shall be lord over the other, and certainly it is much better, and more prudent, to gain what you desire by the hazard of one man than of all." When he had said this, he retired to his own camp; but the next day he came again and used the same words, and did not leave off forty days together challenging the enemy in the same words, till Saul and his army were therewith terrified. And they put themselves in array as if for a fight, but did not come to close quarters.

§ 2. Now at the commencement of this war between the Hebrews and the Philistines, Saul sent David home to his father Jesse, and contented himself with those three sons of his whom he had sent to his assistance to share in the dangers of the war; and at first David returned to feed his sheep and his flocks; but no long time after he went to the camp of the Hebrews, being sent by his father to carry provisions to his brothers, and to know what they were doing. And as Goliath came again and challenged them, and reproached them with having no man of valour among them that durst come down to fight him, David, who was talking with his brethren about the business for which his father had sent him, heard the Philistine reproaching and abusing the army, and was indignant, and said to his brothers that he was ready to fight a single combat with this adversary. Thereupon Eliab, his eldest brother, reprov'd him, and said that he spoke too rashly for one of his age, and ignorantly, and bade him return to his flocks and to his father, And he was abashed at his brother's words and went away, but still told some of the soldiers that he wished to fight with him that challenged them. And when they had informed Saul of the desire of the young man, the king sent for him, and when he asked what he had to say, he replied, "O king, be not cast down or afraid, for I will take down the insolence of this adversary, and will go and fight with him, and subdue him under me, tall and big as he is, till he shall be a laughing-stock, and your army shall get great glory, when he shall be slain by one that is not yet of man's estate, nor fit for fighting, or being intrusted with the marshalling of an army, or ordering of a battle, but one that looks like a lad, and is really no older."

heartedness of David, but had not confidence in his ability by reason of his age; but said he must on that account be too weak to fight with one that was skilful in the art of war. "I undertake this enterprise," said David, "in dependence on God's being with me, for I have had experience already of his assistance; for I once pursued and caught a lion that had attacked my flocks and carried off a lamb, and I snatched the lamb out of the beast's mouth, and when it rushed at me, I took it by the tail, and dashed it against the ground. In the same manner did I avenge myself on a bear also. Let therefore this adversary of ours be esteemed as one of those wild beasts, since he has a long while reproached our army, and blasphemed our God, who will yet reduce him under my own power."

§ 4. Then Saul prayed that the end might be, by God's assistance, as the alacrity and boldness of the lad promised, and said, "Go to the fight." And he put about him his own breast-plate, and girded on him his own sword, and fitted the helmet to his head, and sent him away. But David was burdened with the king's armour, for he had not learned or been used to wear armour, so he said, "Let this armour deck you out, O king, seeing you are able to bear it, but give me leave to fight as your servant, and as I myself desire." Accordingly, he laid down the armour, and taking his staff with him, and putting five stones out of the brook into his shepherd's bag, and having a sling in his right hand, he went towards Goliath. But the enemy, seeing him coming in such a manner, disdained him, and jeered at him for not having such weapons with him as are usual when one man fights against another, but such as are used in driving away and keeping off dogs, and said, "Dost thou take me not for a man, but a dog?" To which he replied, "No, not for a dog, but for a creature worse than a dog." This provoked Goliath to anger, who thereupon cursed him by the name of God, and threatened to give his flesh to the beasts of the earth, and to the fowls of the air, to be torn to pieces by them. To whom David answered, "Thou comest against me with a sword and with a spear, and with a breast-plate, but I, in coming against thee, have God for my armour, who will destroy thee and all thy army by my hands. For I will this day cut off thy head, and cast the rest of thy body to dogs like thee, and all men shall learn that God is the protector of the Hebrews, and that our armour and strength is his care, and that, without God's assistance, all other warlike preparations and power are useless." So the Philistine being retarded by the weight of his armour from advancing to meet David quickly, came on but slowly, despising him and feeling confident that he should slay him, as he was not only unarmed, but a lad also, without any trouble at all.

§ 5. But the youth met his antagonist accompanied by an invisible assistant, who was no other than God himself. And taking one of the stones out of the brook that he had put into his shepherd's bag, and fitting it to his sling, he slung it against the Philistine's forehead, and it penetrated to his brain, insomuch that Goliath was stunned and fell upon his face. Then David ran, and stood over his adversary as he lay down, and cut off his head with his own sword, for he had no sword himself. And upon the fall of Goliath the Philistines were beaten and fled: for when they saw their champion prostrate on the ground, they were afraid of utter ruin, and resolved not to stay any longer, but committed themselves to an ignominious and disorderly flight, and so endeavoured to extricate themselves from the dangers they were in. But Saul and the entire army of the Hebrews raised a shout, and rushed upon them, and slew a great number of them, and pursued the rest to the borders of Gath, and to the gates of Ascalon,<sup>1</sup> and thirty thousand of the Philistines were slain, and twice as many were wounded. And Saul returned from the pursuit to the camp of the Philistines, and broke down and set on fire its works, and David carried the head of Goliath into his own tent, but dedicated his sword to God.

CHAP. X.

Saul envies David for his glorious Success, and takes an Occasion of entrapping him, from the Promise he made him of giving him his Daughter in Marriage, on Condition of his bringing six hundred Heads of the Philistines.

§ 1.

NOW the women stirred up Saul's envy and hatred to David; for they came to meet the victorious army with cymbals, and drums, and every demonstration of joy, and the wives sang, "Saul has slain his thousands of the Philistines," while the virgins replied, "David has slain his ten thousands." Now, when the king heard them singing thus, and noticed that he had himself the smallest share in their praises, and that the greater number, the ten thousands, were ascribed to the young man; and when he considered with himself, that there was nothing more wanting to David after such a mighty acclamation but the kingdom, he began to be afraid and suspicious of him. So he removed him from the station he was in before, for he was his armour-bearer, which out of his fear seemed too near a station to himself, so he made him captain over a thousand, and bestowed on him a post better indeed in itself, but as he thought, more dangerous for him, for he had a mind to send him against the enemy and into battles, hoping he would be slain in such dangerous conflicts.

§ 2. But David had God going along with him wherever he went, and accordingly it was visible that he greatly prospered in his undertakings, insomuch that not only the people, but Saul's daughter, who was still a virgin, fell in love with him on account of his eminent bravery, and her affection so far mastered her that it could not be concealed, and her father became acquainted with it. Now Saul heard of it gladly, intending to make use of it as a snare against David, and hoping that it would prove the cause of destruction and danger to him, so he told those that informed him of his daughter's affection, that he would willingly give David the virgin in marriage, and said, "I pledge myself to give my daughter in marriage to him, if he will bring me six hundred heads of my enemies. For, as so great a prize is offered him, wishing to get great glory by undertaking a thing so dangerous and incredible, he will immediately set about it, and so perish by the hand of the Philistines, and my designs against him will succeed finely, for I shall be rid of him and get him slain, not by myself, but by others." So he gave orders to his servants to try how David relished this proposal of marrying the damsel. Accordingly, they began to tell him, that king Saul loved him, as did all the people, and was desirous of affinity with him by his marrying his daughter. To which he gave this answer, "Seemeth it to you a light thing to be made the king's son-in-law? It does not seem so to me, especially as I am in a lowly condition, and without any glory or honour." Now when Saul was informed by his servants of the answer David had made, he said, "Tell him, that I do not want any money or dowry from him, which would be rather to set my daughter to sale than to give her in marriage, but I desire a son-in-law who has valour and all other kinds of virtue, of which I see David is possessed. And my desire is to receive from him, on account of his marrying my daughter, neither gold nor silver, nor that he should bring such wealth out of his father's house, but only some revenge on the Philistines, and, indeed, six hundred of their heads. For no more desirable or glorious present could be brought me than this, and it is far more desirable than any of the accustomed dowries for my daughter, that she should be married to a man of David's character, who had a reputation for having conquered his enemies."

§ 3. When these words of Saul were repeated to David, he was pleased with them, and supposed that Saul was really desirous of this affinity with him, so that, without waiting to deliberate or cast about in his mind whether what was proposed was possible or difficult, he and his companions immediately set upon the enemy, and went about doing what was proposed as the condition of the marriage. And, as God made all things easy and possible to David, he slew many of the Philistines, and cut off the heads of six hundred of them, and returned to the king, and, showing him these heads, asked the hand of his daughter in marriage. And Saul having no way of getting off his promise, thinking it a base thing either to seem a liar, or to appear to have acted treacherously to David, in putting him upon what was impossible, to try and get him slain, gave him his daughter in marriage. Her name was Michal.

CHAP. XI.

How David, upon Saul's laying Snares for him, escaped the Danger he was in, by the Affection and Care of Jonathan, and the Contrivance of his Wife Michal : and how he went to Samuel the Prophet.

§ 1.

HOWEVER, Saul was not disposed to let things continue long in the state in which they were, for when he saw that David was in great esteem both with God and with the multitude, he was afraid; and being unable to conceal his fear as it was about great things, his kingdom and his life, to be deprived of either of which was a dreadful calamity, he resolved to have David slain, and commanded his son Jonathan, and his most faithful servants, to kill him. But Jonathan wondered at his father's immense change with respect to David, from showing him no small good-will, to want to have him killed, and as he loved the young man and revered him for his virtue, he informed him of the secret orders his father had given, and of his intentions concerning him. And he also advised him to take care and be absent the next day, for he would visit his father; and, if he met with a favourable opportunity, he would discourse with him about David, and learn the cause of his dislike, and show how little ground there was for it, and that he ought not for it to kill a man that had done so much for the people, and had been a benefactor to himself, on which account he ought in reason to obtain pardon, even had he been guilty of the greatest crimes. "I will inform you," he added, "of my father's state of mind." And David complied with such good advice, and kept himself out of the king's sight.

§ 2. The next day Jonathan went to Saul, and finding him cheerful and gay, began to introduce conversation about David. "What crime, father, either small or great, have you found in David, to induce you to order us to slay a man who has been of great use as regards your own preservation, and of still greater as a scourge to the Philistines?—a man who has delivered the people of the Hebrews from reproach and derision, which they underwent for forty days together, as he alone had courage enough to sustain the challenge of the adversary, and after that brought as many heads of our enemies as he was appointed to bring, and had, as a reward for the same, my sister in marriage; so that his death would be very sorrowful to us, not only on account of his virtue, but on account of the nearness of our relation to him, for your daughter is wronged by his death, who will experience widowhood by it before she has enjoyed much advantage from marriage. Consider these things, and change your mind to a more merciful temper, and do no mischief to a man, who, in the first place, has done us the greatest kindness in preserving you, for when an evil spirit and demons had seized upon you, he cast them out, and procured peace to your soul from them; and in the second place, he avenged us of our enemies; and it is a base thing to forget such benefits." Now Saul was talked over by these words, and swore to his son that he would do David no harm, for justice and reason overcame the king's anger and fear. So Jonathan sent for David, and brought him good and reassuring messages from his father. Jonathan also took David to Saul, and he continued with the king as before.

§ 3. About this time the Philistines made a second expedition against the Hebrews, and Saul sent David with an army to fight against them; and joining battle with them, he slew many of them, and after his victory returned to the king. But his reception by Saul was not what he expected after such success, for the king was grieved at his victory, because he thought David would be more dangerous to him after so glorious an exploit, and when the evil spirit came next upon him, and put him into disorder, and disturbed him, he called for David into the chamber wherein he lay, having a spear in his hand, and ordered him to drive the evil spirit away by playing on his harp, and singing hymns, and when David did so at his command, he threw the spear with great force at him, but David was aware of it before it came, and avoided it, and fled to his own house, and abode there all that day.

§ 4. But at night the king sent officers, and commanded that he should be watched till morning, lest he should get quite away, that he might be tried and condemned and put to death. But when Michal, David's wife and the king's daughter, heard what her father designed, she went to her husband, having small hopes of his deliverance, and greatly concerned about her own life also, for she could not bear to live in case she were deprived of him; and she said, "Let not the sun find you here when it rises, for if it does it will be the last time it will see you. Flee away while the night gives you opportunity; and may God lengthen it for your sake! for know that, if my father find you, you are a dead man." And she let him down by a cord from the window, and saved him; and after she had done so, she fitted up a bed for him as if he were sick, and put under the bed-clothes a goat's liver, and when her father, as soon as it was day, sent to seize David, she said to the officers that he had not been well that night, and showed them the bed covered, and made them believe by the leaping of the liver, which caused the bed-clothes to move also, that David lay there and breathed like one that was asthmatic. So when those that were sent told Saul that David had not been well in the night, he ordered him to be brought just as he was, for he intended to kill him. And when they came, and uncovered the bed, and found out the woman's contrivance, they told it to the king; and when her father complained of her, that she had saved his enemy, and had put a trick upon himself, she invented a plausible defence for herself, and said, that David threatened to kill her, and she lent him her assistance to save him out of fear; for which she ought to be forgiven, because it was not of her own free choice, but from necessity. "For" (she added) "I do not suppose that you were as zealous to kill your enemy, as that I should be saved alive." So Saul forgave the damsel, and David, when he had escaped this danger, went to the prophet Samuel to Ramah, and told him what snares the king had laid for him, and how he was very nearly killed by Saul's throwing a spear at him, although he had been no way guilty in his dealings with him, nor had he been cowardly in his battles with his enemies, but had succeeded well in them all by God's assistance: which was indeed the cause of Saul's hatred to David.

§ 5. When the prophet heard of the unjust dealing of the king, he left the city of Ramah,<sup>1</sup> and took David with him, to a certain place called Galbaath,<sup>2</sup> and there he abode with him. But when it was told Saul that David was with the prophet, he sent soldiers to him, and ordered them to arrest David, and bring him to him: but when they came to Samuel, and found there a company of prophets, they became partakers of the divine Spirit, and began to prophesy. And when Saul heard of this, he sent others to David, who prophesying in like manner as did the first, he again sent others, which third company prophesying also, he was at last angry, and went there in great haste himself; and when he was near the place, Samuel, before he saw him, made him prophesy also. And when Saul came to him, he was troubled in mind and agitated, and stripped off his garments, and fell down, and lay on the ground all that day and night, in the presence of Samuel and David.

§ 6. And David went thence to Jonathan, the son of Saul, and complained to him of the snares that were laid for him by his father, and said that though he had been guilty of no evil, and had not offended against him, yet he was very anxious to get him killed. Then Jonathan exhorted him not to give credit to his own suspicions, nor to the calumnies of those that raised those reports, if there were any that did so, but to attend to him and take courage, for his father had no such intention against him, for he would have acquainted him with the matter, and taken his advice, had it been so, as he used to consult with him in all other affairs. But David swore to him that it was so, and asked him rather to believe him, and to provide for his safety, than to disbelieve the actual truth, but he would believe what he said, when he should either see him killed, or hear of his being killed. He said also that the reason why his father did not tell Jonathan of all this was that he knew of the friendship and affection that he had to him.

<sup>2</sup> In 1 Sam. xix. 19, the place is called Naioth in Ramah. It is evident that Naioth, or Galbaath, was not actually in Ramah, though close to it. Naioth, the 'house of instruction,' was probably the 'school of the prophets' in which Samuel taught.

§ 7. Then Jonathan, being sad that this intention of Saul's was so clearly proved, asked him, "What he would have him do for him." To which David replied, "I know that you are willing to gratify me in everything, and to do whatever I desire. Now to-morrow is the new moon, and I am accustomed to sit down then with the king at supper. Now, if it seem good to you, I will go out of the city, and conceal myself privately in the plain; and if Saul inquire why I am absent, tell him that I am gone to my own city Bethlehem, to keep the festival with my own tribe, and add also that you gave me leave to do so. And if he say, as is usually said in the case of absent friends, "He did well to go," then be sure that no latent mischief or enmity is to be feared at his hands; but if he answer otherwise, it will be a sure sign that he has some design against me. So you shall inform me of your father's state of mind, out of pity to my case and friendship for me, of which friendship we have mutually taken and given pledges, though you are master, I servant. But if you find any wickedness in me, anticipate your father by killing me yourself."

§ 8. But Jonathan heard these last words with indignation, and promised to do what David asked of him, and to inform him if his father's answer implied any savage intention or enmity against him. And that he might the more depend upon him, he took him out into the open, into the pure air, and swore that he would neglect nothing that would be for the safety of David, and said, "I appeal to that God, who, as you see, is everywhere, and knows this intention of mine before I put it into words, to witness my covenant with you, that I will not leave off making frequent trials of the purpose of my father, till I learn whether there be any mischief brewing in the secret parts of his soul; and when I have learnt it, I will not conceal it from you, but will discover to you whether he be favourably or evilly disposed to you. For God knows that I pray he may always be with you, for he is with you now, and will not forsake you, and will make you superior to your enemies, whether my father be one of them, or I myself. Do you only remember this, and if I die, preserve my children alive, and requite the kindness you have now received to them." When he had thus sworn he dismissed David, and bade him go to a certain place in the plain where he used to take exercise, for as soon as he knew the mind of his father, he would come there to him with one servant only: and "if (added he) I shoot three darts at the mark, and then bid my servant carry those three darts away, for they are before him, know that there is no mischief to be feared from my father; but if you hear me say the contrary, expect the contrary from the king. Anyhow you shall gain security through me, and shall suffer no harm, but do not forget me in the time of your prosperity, but befriend my children." And David, when he had received these assurances from Jonathan, went his way to the place appointed.

§ 9. On the next day, which was the new moon, the king, when he had purified himself as the custom was, went to supper, and there sat by him his son Jonathan on his right hand, and Abner, the captain of his host, on the other hand, and he saw David's seat was empty, but said nothing, supposing that he had not purified himself since he had companied with his wife, and so was too late. But when he saw that he was not there the second day of the month either, he inquired of his son Jonathan why the son of Jesse had not come to the supper and the feast either the day before or that day. Then Jonathan said, according to the agreement between them, that he was gone to his own city, where his tribe kept a festival, and that by his permission: and that he had also invited him to go to their sacrifice: and Jonathan added, "If you will give me leave, I will go thither, for you know my good-will to him." Then it was that Jonathan perceived his father's hatred to David, and plainly saw his entire disposition to him, for Saul could not restrain his anger, but reproached Jonathan, and called him the son of runagates and an enemy, and said that he was a partner with David and his ally, and that by his behaviour he showed he had no regard to him or his mother, and would not be persuaded of the fact, that while David was alive, the kingdom was not secure to them. Furthermore he bade him send for David, that he might be punished. And when Jonathan said in answer, "What has he done, that you will punish him for?" Saul no longer contented himself with showing his anger in mere words and abuse, but snatched up his spear, and rushed at Jonathan, wishing to kill him. He did not, indeed, do what he intended, because he was hindered by his friends, but it appeared plainly to his soul that he hated David, and greatly desired to despatch him, insomuch that he had almost slain his son with his own hands on his account.

§ 10. Then the king's son rose hastily from supper: and not being able to eat anything for grief, he wept all that night, not only because he himself had been near destruction, but because the death of David was determined on. But as soon as it was day, he went out into the plain that was before the city, as if going to take exercise, but in reality to inform his friend of the disposition his father was in towards him, as he had agreed to do. And when Jonathan had done all that had been agreed, he dismissed his servant that followed him to return to the city, but he himself went into the desert to meet David and commune with him. And he appeared and fell at Jonathan's feet, and bowed down to him, and called him the preserver of his life; but Jonathan lifted him up from the ground, and they mutually embraced one another, and made a long greeting, and that not without tears. They also lamented the loss of their companionship and intimacy which envy would now deprive them of, and that separation which must now be expected, which seemed to them no better than death itself. At last, recovering with difficulty from their lamentation, and exhorting one another to be mindful of the oaths they had sworn to each other, they parted.

CHAP. XII.

How David fled to Ahimelech, and afterwards to the Kings of the Philistines and Moabites, and how Saul slew Ahimelech and his Family.

§ 1.

BUT David fled from the king, and death at his hands, and went to the city of Nob<sup>1</sup> to Ahimelech the priest, who, when he saw him coming alone, and neither friend nor servant with him, wondered at it, and wished to know the reason why there was nobody with him? To which David answered, "That the king had commanded him to do a certain thing that was to be kept secret, for which he had no occasion for anyone to accompany him; however, I have ordered my servants to meet me at this place." And he asked him to let him have something to eat; and in case he supplied him, he would act the part of a friend, and assist him in his projects; and when he had obtained this, he also asked him whether he had any weapons with him, either sword or spear? Now there was at Nob a servant of Saul's, by birth a Syrian, whose name was Doeg, who kept the king's mules. The high priest said that he had no such weapons, but he added that there was the sword of Goliath, which, when David had slain the Philistine, he had himself dedicated to God.

§ 2. And David took that sword, and fled from the country of the Hebrews to Gath which belonged to the Philistines, where Achish reigned. And the king's servants recognized him, and he was made known to the king himself, the servants informing him that he was that David who had killed many ten thousands of the Philistines. So David was afraid lest the king should put him to death, and that he should experience that danger from him for which he had fled from Saul; he therefore pretended to be distracted and mad, so that his spittle ran out of his mouth, and he did other like actions before the king of Gath, which might make him believe that they proceeded from madness. And the king was very angry with his servants for bringing him a madman; and he gave orders that they should immediately turn David out of the city.

§ 3. When David had got safe out of Gath in this manner, he went to the tribe of Judah, and abode in a cave near the city of Adullam.<sup>1</sup> And he sent to his brothers and informed them where he was. And they came to him with all their kindred, and as many others as were either in want, or in fear of king Saul, repaired to him, and told him they were ready to obey his orders. They were in all about four hundred. Whereupon he took courage, now such a force and assistance was come to him, so he removed thence and went to the king of the Moabites, and begged him to entertain his parents in his country, while the issue of his affairs was in such an uncertain condition. The king granted him this favour, and paid great respect to David's parents all the time they were with him.

§ 4. As for himself, upon the prophet's commanding him to leave the desert, and go into the portion of the tribe of Judah and abide there, he complied therewith; and coming to the city of Hareth,<sup>2</sup> which belonged to that tribe, he remained there. Now when Saul heard that David had been seen with a multitude about him, he fell into no small disturbance and trouble, for as he knew that David was a bold and courageous man, he suspected that something extraordinary would soon be done by him, which would make him mourn, and put him into distress; so he called together to him his friends and commanders, and the tribe from which he himself sprung, to the hill where his palace was; and sitting upon a place called Arura,<sup>3</sup> his courtiers and body-guards being with him, he spoke thus to them: "Men of my own tribe, I know that you remember the benefits that I have bestowed upon you, how I have made some of you owners of land, and bestowed posts of honour upon you, and set some of you over the common people, and others over the soldiers. I ask you, therefore, whether you expect greater and more donations from the son of Jesse? For I know that you are all inclined to him, even my son Jonathan himself is of his party, and persuades you to be of the same. For I am not ignorant of the oaths and covenants between him and David, or that Jonathan is a counsellor and an assistant to those that conspire against me; and none of you are concerned about these things, but you keep silence, and wait to see what will be the upshot of these things." When the king had finished his speech, none of the rest of those that were present made any answer, but Doeg the Syrian, who fed the king's mules, said that he saw David when he went to the city of Nob to Ahimelech the high priest, and that he had learned future events by his prophesying, and had received food from him, and the sword of Goliath, and had been conducted by him in safety to those whom he desired to go to.

§ 5. Saul therefore sent for the high priest, and for all his kindred, and said: "What cruelty or ingratitude have you suffered from me, that you received the son of Jesse, and bestowed on him both food and weapons, when he was plotting against my kingdom? And furthermore, why did you deliver oracles to him concerning the future? For you could not be ignorant that he had fled away from me, and that he hated my family." But the high priest did not attempt to deny what he had done, but confessed boldly that he had supplied him with these things, not to gratify David but Saul himself, and said, "I did not know he was your enemy, but a very faithful servant of yours, and captain over a thousand of your soldiers, and, what is more than these, your son-in-law and connexion. Men do not usually confer such favours on their enemies, but on those who are thought to bear the highest good-will and regard to them. Nor is this the first time that I have prophesied for him, but I have done so often, at other times as well as now. And when he told me that he was sent by you in great haste on a private errand, if I had not furnished him with what he asked for, I should have thought that I was rather rejecting your suit than his. Wherefore, do not entertain any ill opinion of me, nor be suspicious of what I then thought an act of humanity, from what is now told you of David's attempt against you, for I regarded him as your friend and son-in-law, and captain of a thousand, and not as your enemy.

§ 6. The high priest's words did not persuade Saul; his fear was so great, that he could not give credit to a true apology. So he commanded his armed men that stood about him to kill Ahimelech and all his kindred; but as they durst not touch the high priest, but were more afraid of disobeying God than the king, he ordered Doeg the Syrian to kill them. And he took to his assistance wicked men like himself, and slew Ahimelech and his family, who were in all three hundred and eighty-five. Saul also sent to Nob,<sup>1</sup> the city of the priests, and slew all that were therein, sparing neither women nor children, nor any age, and burnt it; only one son of Ahimelech escaped, whose name was Abiathar. Now these things came to pass as God had foretold to Eli the high priest, when he said that his posterity should be destroyed on account of the transgressions of his two sons.

<sup>1</sup> This city of Nob was not a city allotted to the priests, nor had the prophets, that we know of, any particular cities allotted to them. It seems the tabernacle was now at Nob, and probably a school of the prophets was here also. It was full two days' journey on foot from Jerusalem, 1 Sam. xxi. 5. The number of priests here slain in Josephus is 385, and but 85 in our Hebrew copies, but they are 305 in the Septuagint: I prefer Josephus's number, the Hebrew having, I suppose, only dropped the hundreds, the other the tens. This city of Nob seems to have been the chief, or perhaps the only seat of the family of Ithamar, which here perished according to God's former terrible threatenings to Eli, 1 Sam. ii. 27-36, iii. 11-18. See 14, § 9, hereafter.—W.

<sup>2</sup> This section contains an admirable reflection of Josephus concerning the general wickedness of men in great authority, and the danger they are in of rejecting that regard to justice and humanity, to divine providence and the fear of God, which they either really had, or pretended to have, while they were in a lower condition. It can never be too often perused by kings and great men, nor by those who expect to obtain such elevated dignities among mankind. See the like reflections of our Josephus, Antiq. vii. 1, § 5, at the end, and viii. 10, § 2, at the beginning. They are to the like purport with one branch of Agur's crime and murdering the whole family of the high priest, and having no pity on infants nor reverence for the aged, and overthrowing the city which God had chosen for the dwelling-place and support of the priests and prophets there, and had allotted as the only city for the rearing of such men, makes everyone understand and see the disposition of men, how while they are private persons and in low condition, because it is not in their power to indulge nature, or to dare to do what they wish, they are equitable and moderate, and follow only what is right, and bend their whole minds and labours to that. They then believe that God is present in all the circumstances of their lives, and that he not only sees the actions that are done, but clearly knows the thoughts also, whence those actions are sure to arise. But when once men are advanced to power and authority, they then put off all such notions, and, as if they were no other than actors upon a theatre, lay aside their former characters and manners, and assume boldness, insolence, and a contempt of both human and divine laws, and that at a time when they especially stand in need of piety and righteousness, because they are then most of all exposed to envy, and all they think and all they say are in the view of all men; then it is that they become as insolent in their actions, as if God saw them no longer, or was afraid of them because of their power. And whatever they are either afraid of from what they have heard, or hate from inclination, or love without reason, these ideas seem to them to be settled, and sure, and true, and pleasing both to men and to God. And as to what will come hereafter, they have not the least regard to it, but they raise those to honour who have been at a great deal of pains for them, and after raising them to honour they envy them; and when they have brought them into high dignity, they not only deprive them of what they had obtained, but also, on that very account, of their lives also, and that on wicked accusations, such as, on account of their extravagance, are incredible. They also punish men for actions that do not deserve punishment, because of prayer, "One thing have I required of thee, deny me not before I die; give me not riches, lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, who is the Lord?" Prov. xxx. 7, 8, 9.—W.

calumnies and accusations not examined into, and not only punish such as deserve to be punished, but as many as they are able to kill. This is made clear to us by the conduct of Saul, the son of Kish (the first king who reigned after our aristocracy and government under judges), in his slaughter of three hundred priests and prophets from suspicion of Ahimelech, and moreover by the overthrow of their city, as if he were anxious in some sort to render the temple destitute both of priests and prophets, by slaying so many of them, and by not suffering the very city belonging to them to remain, that others might succeed them.

§ 8. But Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech, who alone could escape out of the family of priests slain by Saul, fled to David, and informed him of the calamity that had befallen his family, and of the slaughter of his father. And he thereupon said, that he was not ignorant of what would happen to them when he saw Doeg there, for he had a suspicion then that the high priest would be calumniated by him to the king, and he blamed Doeg as the cause of this misfortune. He also desired Abiathar to stay there and abide with him, as in a place where he might be better concealed than anywhere else.

CHAP. XIII.

How David, when he had twice the Opportunity of killing Saul, did not kill him. Also, concerning the Deaths of Samuel and Nabal.

§ 1.

ABOUT this time David heard that the Philistines had made an inroad into the region about Keilah,<sup>1</sup> and laid it waste, and he offered himself to fight against them, if God, when he should be consulted by the prophet, would grant him the victory. And when the prophet said that God gave a signal of victory, he made a sudden onset upon the Philistines with his companions, and made a great slaughter of them, and carried off much spoils, and stayed with the inhabitants of Keilah till they had securely gathered in their corn and their fruits. And it was told king Saul that David was with the men of Keilah; for what he had done and his great success did not confine itself to Keilah, but the fame of it went all abroad, and came to the hearing of everybody, and both the exploit and its hero came to the king's ears. And Saul was glad when he heard that David was in Keilah; and he said, "God has now put him into my hands, since he has obliged him to come into a city that has walls, and gates, and bars." And he commanded all the people to march upon Keilah, and when they had besieged and taken it, to kill David. But when David knew of this, and learned of God, that if he stayed there, the men of Keilah would deliver him up to Saul, he took his four hundred men, and retired from that city into the desert above a place called Engedi.<sup>1</sup> And when the king heard that he was fled away from the men of Keilah, he left off his expedition against him.

§ 2. Then David removed thence, and came to a certain place called the New Place, belonging to Ziph,<sup>2</sup> where Jonathan the son of Saul met him and saluted him, and exhorted him to be of good courage, and to hope well as to his future condition, and not to despond at his present circumstances, for that he should be king, and have all the forces of the Hebrews under him; but that such things usually come with great labour and pains. He also swore that he would continue all his life long in good-will and fidelity to him, and he called God to witness the curses he invoked on himself, if he should violate his covenant, and change to a contrary behaviour. So Jonathan left him there, having made his cares and fears somewhat lighter, and returned home. Now the men of Ziph, to gratify Saul, informed him that David abode with them, and said if he would come to them they would deliver him up, for if the king occupied the narrow passes of Ziph, David could not escape to any other people. So the king commended them, and confessed that he was obliged to them, because they had given him information of his enemy, and he promised them that it should not be long before he would requite their kindness. He also sent men to seek for David, and to search the wilderness, and he said that he himself would follow them. So they were the king's guides to hunt and catch David, being anxious not only to show their good-will to Saul by informing him where his enemy was, but to evidence the same more plainly by delivering him up into his power. But they failed in their unjust and wicked desire, for, while they underwent no danger by not revealing this to Saul, they did yet calumniate and promise to deliver up a man beloved of God, who was unjustly sought for to be put to death, and who might otherwise have lain concealed, and that out of flattery, and desire of gain, and expectations from the king. For when David learnt of the malignant intention of the men of Ziph, and of the approach of Saul, he left the narrow passes in that neighbourhood, and fled to the great rock that was in the wilderness of Maon.<sup>1</sup>

§ 3. And Saul made haste to pursue him thither; for as he was on the march he learnt that David was gone away from the narrow passes of Ziph, and Saul removed to the other side of the rock. But the report that the Philistines had again made an incursion into the country of the Hebrews, called Saul into another direction from the pursuit of David, when he was just about to be caught. For the king returned back to oppose those Philistines, who were naturally their enemies, judging it more necessary to avenge himself on them, than to take a great deal of pains to catch an enemy of his own, and to overlook the ravaging of the land.

§ 4. And so David unexpectedly escaped from the danger he was in, and came to the passes of Engedi. And when Saul had driven the Philistines out of the land, there came some messengers who told him that David was in the neighbourhood of Engedi: so he took three thousand chosen men that were armed, and hasted after him, and when he was not far from the spot, he saw a deep and hollow cave by the way side, which was very spacious both in length and breadth, and there David, with his four hundred men, lay concealed. As therefore Saul had occasion to ease nature, he entered into it by himself alone; and being seen by one of David's companions, who told David that he had now, by God's providence, an opportunity of avenging himself on his adversary, and advised him to cut off his head, and so deliver himself from his tedious wandering condition and its distresses, David rose up, and only cut off the skirt of the garment which Saul had on. But soon he repented of what he had done, and said it was not right to kill him that was his master, and one whom God had thought worthy of the kingdom. "For even if he is wickedly disposed towards me, yet it does not behove me to be so disposed towards him." And when Saul had left the cave, David came near, and cried out aloud, and desired Saul to hear him. Whereupon the king turned round, and David, according to custom, fell down on his face before the king, and bowed down to him, and said, "O king, you ought not to hearken to wicked men, nor to such as forge calumnies, nor to gratify them so far as to believe what they say, nor to entertain suspicions of your best friends, but to judge of the disposition of all men by their actions. For calumny deludes men, but people's actions are a clear demonstration of their good-will. Words indeed, in their own nature, may be either true or false, but men's actions expose their intentions nakedly to our view. By my deeds, therefore, it will be well for you to believe me as to my regard to you and to your house, and not to believe those that accuse me of things that never came into my mind, and are impossible to be done, and to cease pursuing after my life, and having no concern either day or night but how to murder me, which you now unjustly strive after. For how comes it that you have formed this false opinion about me that I desire to kill you? Or how are you not impious to God in wishing to kill, and deeming as your adversary, a man who had it in his power this day to avenge himself and to punish you, but would not do it, nor make use of such an opportunity, though, if it had fallen out to you against me, you would not have let it slip; for when I cut off the skirt of your garment, I could as easily have cut off your head?" Then he showed him the piece of his garment, and thereby proved to him that what he said was true; and he added, "I, indeed, have abstained from taking a just revenge upon you, yet you are not ashamed to prosecute me with unjust hatred. May God judge between us, and test each of our dispositions." But Saul was amazed at his unexpected deliverance, and being greatly affected with the moderation and disposition of the young man, he groaned aloud, and when David had done the same, the king answered that he had the most cause to groan, "for," said he, "you have been the author of good to me, as I have been the author of evil to you. And you have shown this day that you possess the old-fashioned justice of those who ordered people to save their enemies, though they caught them in a desert place. I am now persuaded that God reserves the kingdom for you, and that you will have the dominion over all the Hebrews. Give me then assurances upon oath that you will not root out my family, nor destroy my posterity, in remembrance of the evil I have done you, but save and preserve my house." And David swore as he desired, and sent back Saul to his own kingdom, but he, and those that were with him, went up to the passes of Mastheroth.<sup>1</sup>

§ 5. About this time Samuel the prophet died, a man whom the Hebrews honoured in an extraordinary degree; for the long mourning which the people made for him manifested his virtue and the affection which the people had to him, as also did the solemnity and concern that appeared about his funeral, and the celebration of the customary rites. They buried him in his own city of Ramah; and wept for him a very great number of days, not sorrowing as for the death of a stranger, but as for one who was a relation. He was a righteous man, and good in his nature, and therefore was very dear to God. Now he governed and presided over the people alone twelve years after the death of Eli the high priest, and eighteen years together with Saul the king: and thus we have finished the history of Samuel.

§ 6. There was a man that was a Ziphite, of the city of Maon,<sup>1</sup> who was rich, and had a vast number of cattle; for he fed a flock of three thousand sheep, and a thousand goats. Now David had charged his men to see that these flocks were without hurt or damage, and to do them no mischief, either from covetousness, or because they were in want, or because they were in the wilderness, and so could not easily be caught, but to value wronging nobody above everything, and to look upon the touching of what belonged to another man as a horrible crime, and contrary to the will of God. These were the instructions he gave, thinking that he had a good man to deal with, and one that deserved to have such care taken of him. But this Nabal, for that was his name, was a harsh man and of bad manners, being like a cynic in his behaviour, but had obtained for his wife a good woman, wise and handsome. To this Nabal, then, David sent ten of his men at the time when he sheared his sheep, and by them greeted him, and expressed a wish for his prosperity for many years to come, and asked him to make him a present of what he was able to give him, since he would learn from his shepherds, that he and his men had done them and their flocks no injury, but had been their guardians a long time while they continued in the wilderness; and he should never repent of giving anything to David. When the messengers had carried this message to Nabal, he accosted them in a very uncourteous and rough manner, for he asked them, who David was? and when he heard that he was the son of Jesse, he said, "Nowadays runagates grow insolent and haughty, and leave their masters." When they told David this, he was wroth, and commanded four hundred armed men to follow him, and left two hundred to take care of the stuff (for he had by now six hundred),<sup>2</sup> and went against Nabal; he

<sup>2</sup> The number of men that came first to David, are distinctly in Josephus, and in our common copies, but 400. When he was at Keilah, still but 400, both in Josephus and in the LXX.; but 600 in our Hebrew copies, 1 Sam. xxiii. 13, xxx. 9, 10. Now the 600 there mentioned are here intimated by Josephus to have been so many, only by also swore, that he would that night utterly destroy the house and all the possessions of Nabal. For he was grieved, not only that he had proved ungrateful to him and his men, without making any return for the great kindness they had shown him, but that he had also reproached them, and used bad language to them, though he had received no injury from them.

§ 7. Then one of those that kept the flocks of Nabal told his mistress, Nabal's wife, that when David sent to her husband, he had received no civil answer from him at all, but had been insulted in very reproachful language, though David had taken extraordinary care to keep his flocks from harm, and added that what had passed would prove very pernicious to his master. When the servant had told her this, Abigail, for that was the wife's name, saddled her asses, and loaded them with all sorts of presents, and without telling her husband anything of what she was about (for he was insensible from drunkenness), she went to David, who met her as she was descending a mountain pass, and was coming against Nabal with four hundred men. When the woman saw him, she leaped down from her ass, and fell on her face, and bowed down to the ground, and entreated him not to bear in mind the words of Nabal, since he knew that he resembled his name (for Nabal, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies folly). And she excused herself as not having seen the messengers whom he sent. "Forgive me, therefore (said she), and thank God who has hindered you from shedding human blood; for as long as you keep yourself innocent, he will avenge you on wicked men. As for the miseries that await Nabal, may they fall upon the heads of your enemies! But be gracious to me, and think me so far worthy as to accept these presents from me, and remit out of regard to me the wrath and anger which you have against my husband and his house; for mildness and humanity become you, especially as you are to be our king." And David accepted her presents, and said, "Certainly, lady, it was God's mercy that brought you to me to-day, for else you would not have seen another day, as I swore to destroy Nabal's house this very night, and an augmentation of 200 afterwards, which, I suppose, is the true solution of this seeming disagreement.—W.

to leave alive not one of you, since you belonged to a man so wicked and ungrateful to me and my companions. But as it is you have arrested my intention, and mollified my anger, being yourself under the care of God, and as for Nabal, although for your sake he shall now escape punishment, he will not always avoid justice, for his evil conduct on some other occasion will be his ruin."

§ 8. When David had said this, he dismissed Abigail. And when she returned home and found her husband feasting with a great company, and already stupefied with wine, she said nothing then to him about what had happened, but on the next day, when he was sober, she told him all the particulars, and made his whole body paralysed and like that of a dead man by her words, and by the grief which arose from them. And Nabal survived ten days, and no more, and then died. And when David heard of his death, he said that God had well avenged him on him, for Nabal had died of his own wickedness, and had suffered punishment on his account, though he had kept his own hands clean. At that time David recognized that the wicked are punished by God, who does not overlook any man, but bestows on the good what is good, and inflicts speedy punishment on the wicked. And he sent to Nabal's wife, and invited her to live with him, and to be his wife. And she replied to those that came, that she was not worthy to touch his feet, however, she came with all her handmaids, and became his wife, having received that honour on account of her wise and just character, and partly also on account of her beauty. Now David had taken another wife before, whom he married from the city of Abisar;<sup>1</sup> for as to Michal, the daughter of king Saul, who had been David's wife, her father had given her in marriage to Phalti, the son of Laish, who was of the city of Gallim.<sup>2</sup>

§ 9. After this came certain of the Ziphites, and told Saul that David was come again into their country; and if he would afford them his assistance, they could catch him. And Saul marched against David with three thousand armed men, and pitched his camp, upon the approach of night, at a certain place called Hachilah.<sup>1</sup> And when David heard that Saul was coming against him, he sent spies, and bade them let him know to what part of the country Saul had already come; and when they told him that he was at Hachilah, he secretly passed the night apart from his men, and went to Saul's camp, taking with him Abishai, his sister Zeruah's son, and Ahimelech the Hittite. Now Saul was asleep, and his armed men, with Abner their commander, lay round about him in a circle, and David entered into the king's tent, but did neither himself kill Saul, though he knew where he lay from the spear stuck in the ground at his head, nor did he allow Abishai, who would have killed him, and was earnestly bent upon doing so: for he said it was a horrid crime to kill one that was ordained king by God, even though he was a wicked man, for he who gave him the dominion, would in time inflict punishment upon him. So he restrained his eagerness: but that it might be clear that it was in his power to have killed him though he refrained from it, he took the spear and the cruse of water which were by Saul as he lay asleep, without being perceived by any in the camp, who were all asleep, and went safely away, having performed everything among the king's attendants that the opportunity afforded, and his boldness encouraged him to do. And when he had passed over a brook, and had got up to the top of a hill, from which he might be easily heard, he cried aloud to Saul's soldiers, and to Abner their commander, and awoke them out of their sleep, and shouted both to him and the people. And when the commander heard him, and asked who it was that called him, David replied, "It is I, the son of Jesse, your fugitive. But why ever do you, who are so great a man, and of the first rank in the king's court, take so little care of your master's body? Is sleep of more consequence to you than his preservation, and the due care of him? This negligence of yours deserves death or condign punishment, since none of you perceived when a little while ago some of us entered into your camp, as far as the king himself and all the rest of you. If you look for the king's spear and cruse of water, you will learn how great a misfortune might have come upon you in your very camp without your knowing of it." Now, when Saul recognized David's voice, and learned that, though he had him in his power when he was asleep, and his guards took little care of him, he yet did not kill him, but spared him when he might justly have cut him off, he said that he owed him thanks for his preservation, and exhorted him to be of good courage, and not to be afraid of any harm from him any more, and to return to his own home, for he was now persuaded that he did not love himself so well as he was beloved by him, though he had driven away him that could guard him, and had given many demonstrations of his good-will to him, and had forced him to live so long in a state of banishment, and in great anxiety for his life, being bereft of his friends and kindred. And yet he had saved the king's life several times, and spared it when it was evidently in great danger. Then David bade them send for the spear and cruse of water, and take them back, adding that God would judge them both according to their nature and the actions that flowed from the same. "For he knows that when it was this day in my power to have killed you, I abstained from doing so."

§ 10. Saul, having thus escaped the hands of David twice, went his way to his royal palace and his own city, but David was afraid, that if he stayed there he would be arrested by Saul, so he thought it better to go up into the land of the Philistines and abide there. Accordingly he went with the six hundred men that were with him to Achish, the king of Gath, which was one of the five Philistine cities. Now the king received both him and his men, and gave them a place to dwell in. He had with him also his two wives, Ahinoam and Abigail, and he dwelt in Gath.<sup>1</sup> And when Saul heard this, he took no further care about sending to him or going after him, because he had been twice nearly undone by him, when he was himself endeavouring to catch him. However, David had no mind to continue in the city of Gath, but asked the king, as he had received him with such kindness, that he would grant him another favour, and bestow upon him some place in that country for his habitation, for he was ashamed to be grievous and burdensome to him by living in Gath. So Achish gave him a certain village called Ziklag,<sup>1</sup> which place David and his sons were fond of when he was king, and reckoned as their own. But about that I shall say more elsewhere. Now the time that David dwelt in Ziklag, in the land of the Philistines, was four months and twenty days. And he privately attacked those Geshurites<sup>2</sup> and Amalekites that were neighbours to the Philistines, and laid waste their country, and took much spoil of their beasts and camels, and then returned home; but he abstained from capturing any men, fearing they would discover him to king Achish, but he sent part of the spoil to him as a gift. And when the king inquired whom he had attacked when he brought off the spoil, he said, those Jews that lay to the south, and inhabited the plain. So he got Achish to believe him, who now hoped that David hated his own nation, and that he would now have him for his servant all his life long, and that he would stay in his country.

CHAP. XIV.

How Saul, on God's not answering him concerning the Fight with the Philistines, asked the Witch of Endor to bring up the Soul of Samuel to him; and how Saul died with his Sons on the Overthrow of the Hebrews in Battle.

§ 1.

ABOUT the same time the Philistines resolved to make war against the Israelites, and sent round to all their allies asking them to go along with them to the war to Reggan [near the city of Shunem<sup>3</sup>], where they might concentrate, and rush at the Hebrews. And Achish, the king of Gath, asked David to assist him with his own armed men against the Hebrews. This he readily promised, and said that the time was now come that he might requite him for his kindness and hospitality, and the king promised to make him the captain of his body-guard after the victory, if the battle with the enemy succeeded to their mind, which promise of honour and confidence he made on purpose to increase his zeal for his service.

§ 2. Now Saul, the king of the Hebrews, had banished out of the country all wizards and witches, and all such as practised the like arts, except the prophets. But when he heard that the Philistines were already at hand, and had pitched their camp near the city of Shunem, situate in the plain, he made haste to oppose them with his forces; and when he was come to a certain mountain called Gilboa,<sup>1</sup> he pitched his camp over against the enemy; but when he saw the enemy's army he was greatly troubled, because it appeared to him to be numerous and superior to his own; and he inquired of God by the prophets concerning the battle, that he might know beforehand what would be the event of it. And as God did not answer him, Saul was in still greater dread, and his courage fell, foreboding, as was but likely, that mischief would befall him, now God was not there to assist him. And he bade his servants to inquire out for him some woman that was a witch, and called up the souls of the dead, that so he might know if affairs would succeed to his mind. For this sort of witches, that bring up the souls of the dead, foretell by them future events to those who ask them. And one of his servants having told him, that there was such a woman in the city of Endor,<sup>2</sup> without the knowledge of anybody in the camp, he put off his royal apparel, and took two of his servants with him whom he knew to be most faithful, and went to Endor to the woman, and entreated her to act the part of a wizard, and to bring up to him whatever soul he should name to her. And when the woman objected, and said she could not despise the king, who had banished this sort of wizards, and that he did not do well, as she had done him no harm, to endeavour to lay a snare for her and to discover that she exercised a forbidden art, in order to get her punished, he swore that nobody should know what she did, and he would not tell anyone of her divination, and that she should incur no danger. As soon as he had induced her by this oath to fear no harm, he bade her bring up to him the soul of Samuel. She not knowing who Samuel was, called him up out of Hades. When he appeared, and the woman saw a venerable and god-like man, she was afraid and astonished at the sight, and said, "Art not thou king Saul?" for Samuel informed her who he was. When he owned that to be true, and asked her whence her fear arose? she said, that she saw a certain person come up, who in his appearance was like a god. And when he bade her tell him what he resembled, in what habit he appeared, and of what age he was? she told him, he was an old man, and a glorious person, and had on a sacerdotal mantle. And the king discovered by these signs that he was Samuel, and he fell down upon the ground, and saluted him, and prostrated himself before him. And when the soul of Samuel asked Saul why he had disturbed him, and caused him to be brought up? he lamented the necessity he was in, for he said that his enemies pressed heavily upon him, and that he knew not what to do in his present circumstances, that he was forsaken of God, and could obtain no prediction of what was coming either by prophets or dreams; and that these were the reasons why he had recourse to him, for he would take care of him. But Samuel, seeing that the end of Saul's life was come, said, "It is idle for you to desire to learn of me anything further, as God has forsaken you. However, hear what I say, that David is to be king, and to finish this war with good success, and you are to lose your throne and life, because you did not obey God in the war with the Amalekites, and did not keep his commandments, as I foretold you while I was alive. Know, therefore, that the people shall be made subject to their enemies, and that you and your sons shall fall in the battle to-morrow, and you shall be with me."

§ 3. When Saul heard this, he was speechless for grief, and fell down on the floor, whether from the sorrow that arose upon what Samuel had said, or from his emptiness, for he had taken no food the foregoing day or night. And when he had with difficulty recovered himself, the woman tried to force him to eat, begging it of him as a favour on account of her dangerous exhibition of magic, which was unlawful, because of fear of the king, though she knew not who he was, yet had she undertaken it, and gone through with it. So she entreated him to allow a table and food to be set before him, that he might recover his strength, and get safe to his own camp. And when he resisted her wish, and absolutely refused in his dejection, she urged him, and at last persuaded him to it. Now she had a calf that she was very fond of, and that she took a great deal of care of, and fed herself, for she was a woman that got her living by the labour of her hands, and had no other possession but this one calf; this she killed, and cooked its flesh, and set it before the king and his servants. And Saul returned to the camp while it was yet night.

§ 4. Now it is but right to commend the generosity of this woman, because though the king had forbidden her to use that art by which her circumstances were bettered and improved, and though she had never seen the king before, she still did not remember to his disadvantage that he had condemned her calling, and did not reject him as a stranger, and one that she had no acquaintance with, but had compassion upon him, and comforted him, and exhorted him to do what he was greatly averse to, and offered him the only thing she had, being a poor woman, and that earnestly and with great humanity, though she had no requital made to her for her kindness, nor had in view any future favour from him, for she knew he was to die; whereas people are naturally ambitious to please those that have bestowed some benefit upon them, or are very ready to serve those from whom they may receive some advantage. It is well therefore to imitate the example of this woman, and to do kindnesses to all such as are in need, and to think that nothing is better, or more becoming mankind than this, or will sooner make God favourable, and ready to bestow good things upon us. And so far may suffice to say concerning this woman. But I shall speak now upon another subject, which will afford me an opportunity of discoursing on what is for the advantage of cities, and peoples, and nations, and suited to the taste of good men, and will encourage them all in the prosecution of virtue, and is capable of showing them the method of acquiring glory and everlasting fame, and of inspiring in the kings of nations and rulers of cities great inclination and desire to do well; as also of encouraging them to undergo dangers, and to die for their countries, and of instructing them how to despise all the most terrible things. And I have a good reason for such a discourse in the person of Saul, king of the Hebrews. For, although he knew what was coming upon him, and that he was to die immediately, by the prediction of the prophet, he determined not to flee from death, nor from love of life to betray his own people to the enemy, nor to bring a disgrace on his royal dignity, but exposing himself as well as all his family and children to dangers, he thought it a noble thing to fall together with them, as he was fighting for his subjects, and that it was better that his sons should die thus, showing their courage, than to leave it uncertain what they would be afterwards, for instead of succession and posterity they gained commendation and a lasting name. Such a one alone seems to me to be a just, courageous, and sensible man, and whoever has arrived at this state of mind, or shall hereafter arrive at it, is the man that ought to be honoured by all with a testimony for virtue. For as to those that go out to war with hopes of success, and likely to return home safe, when they have performed some glorious action, I think those do not do well who call these valiant men, as so many historians and other writers who treat of them are wont to do, although I confess they justly deserve some commendation also; but those only may be styled courageous and bold in great undertakings, and despisers of adversity, who imitate Saul. For as for those who do not know what the event of war will be to themselves, though they do not play the coward in it, but deliver themselves up to an uncertain future and its chances, this is not so great a proof of nobility of mind, although they may happen to perform many great exploits; but when men's minds expect no good event, but they know beforehand they must die, and that they must undergo death in battle also, after this neither to be afraid nor dismayed at the terrible fate that is coming, but to go to meet it, when they know it beforehand, this I judge a proof that a man is truly courageous. And this Saul did, and so proved that all men who desire fame after they are dead are so to act to obtain the same, and especially kings, who ought not to think it enough in their high station that they are not wicked in the government of their subjects, but should be more than moderately good to them. I could say more than this about Saul and his courage, the subject affording sufficient matter, but that I may not appear to launch out improperly in his commendation, I return again to my narrative from which I made this digression.

§ 5. Now when the Philistines, as I said before, had pitched their camp, and reviewed their forces according to their nations and kingdoms and provinces, king Achish came last of all with his own army, and after him came David with his six hundred armed men. And when the commanders of the Philistines saw him, they asked the king, whence these Hebrews came, and at whose invitation. He answered, that it was David, who had fled from his master Saul, whom he had entertained when he came to him, and who now therefore wished to make him a requital for his favour, and to avenge himself upon Saul, and so was become their confederate. The commanders complained of his having taken for a confederate one who was an enemy, and advised sending him away, lest he should unawares do his friends a great deal of mischief, for he had an opportunity of being reconciled to his master by doing mischief to their army. They therefore urged Achish, foreboding this, to send him away, with his six hundred armed men, to the place he had given him for his habitation, for he was that David whom the virgins celebrated in their hymns, as having destroyed many ten thousands of the Philistines. When the king of Gath heard this, he thought they spoke well, so he called David, and said to him, "As for myself, I can bear witness that you have shown great zeal and kindness to me, and that was why I took you for my confederate, however, what I have done does not please the commanders. Go therefore within a day's time to the place I have given you, without suspecting any harm, and there guard my country, lest any of our enemies should make a raid upon it, this shall be your portion of assistance." So David went to Ziklag,<sup>1</sup> as the king of Gath bade him: but it so happened, while he was gone to the assistance of the Philistines, that the Amalekites had made a raid, and taken Ziklag by storm and burnt it; and when they had taken a great deal of various spoil from that place, and from the rest of the Philistines' country, they departed.

§ 6. Now when David found that Ziklag was laid waste, and that everything was plundered, and that his two wives, as well as the wives of his companions, with their children, were made captives, he at once rent his clothes, wailing and lamenting with his friends, and indeed he was so cast down with this misfortune, that even tears failed him. He was also in danger of being stoned to death by his companions, who were greatly afflicted at the captivity of their wives and children, for they laid all the blame of what had happened upon him. But when he had recovered from his grief, and raised up his mind to God, he desired the high priest Abiathar to put on his sacerdotal garments, and to inquire of God, and prophesy to him, "Whether God would grant, if he pursued after the Amalekites, that he should overtake them, and rescue the wives and children, and avenge himself on the enemies." And when the high priest bade him pursue after them, he marched apace, with his six hundred men, after the enemy; and when he was come to a certain brook called Besor,<sup>2</sup> and lit upon a man wandering about, an Egyptian by race, who was almost dead with want and famine (for he had continued wandering about in the wilderness without food three days), he first of all gave him both meat and drink and so refreshed him, and then asked him to whom he belonged, and whence he came? Then the man told him he was an Egyptian by race, and had been left behind by his master, because he was so sick and weak that he could not follow him. He also informed him that he was one of those that had burnt and plundered, not only other parts of Judæa, but Ziklag itself also. So David make use of him as a guide to the Amalekites, and when he had come up with them, as they lay scattered about on the ground, some at dinner, some disordered and entirely unnerved with wine, and in the fruition of their spoil and prey, he suddenly fell upon them and made a great slaughter of them, for they were unarmed, and expected no such thing, but had betaken themselves to drinking and feasting, and so they were all easily killed. Some of them were surprised as they reclined at table, and were slain in that posture, and their blood brought up with it their food. Others of them they slew as they were pledging one another in their cups, and some whom their debauch had sent fast to sleep; and as for those who had time to put on all their armour, they slew them with the sword with no less ease than they did those that were unarmed. And David and his men continued the slaughter from the first hour of the day to the evening, so that there were not above four hundred of the Amalekites left, and they only escaped by getting on swift camels. And David recovered not only all the spoil which the enemy had carried away, but his wives also, and the wives of his companions. And when they had returned to the place where they had left the two hundred men who were not able to follow them, but were left to take care of the stuff, the four hundred did not think fit to divide among them any of what they had got, or of the spoil, since they did not accompany them, but were slack in the pursuit of the enemy, and they said they should be content with having got back their wives safe. But David pronounced this view of theirs as wrong and unjust, and said that when God had granted them such a favour, that they had avenged themselves on their enemies, and had recovered all that belonged to them, they should make an equal distribution of what they had got to all who shared in the expedition, because the rest had tarried behind only to guard the stuff; and from that time this law obtained among them, that those who guarded the stuff should receive an equal share with those that fought in a battle. And when David had returned to Ziklag, he sent portions of the spoil to all his acquaint-tances and friends in the tribe of Judah. And thus ended the affair of the plundering of Ziklag in the slaughter of the Amalekites.

§ 7. Now upon the Philistines joining battle with Saul, there followed a sharp engagement, and the Philistines became the conquerors, and slew a great number of their enemies, but Saul the king of Israel, and his sons, fought courageously, and with the utmost zeal, knowing that their entire glory lay in nothing else but dying honourably, and exposing themselves to the utmost danger from the enemy (for they had nothing else to hope for), so they brought upon themselves the whole power of the enemy, till they were surrounded and slain, but not before they had killed many of the Philistines. Now the sons of Saul were Jonathan, and Abinadab, and Melchishua; and when they fell, the rank and file of the Hebrews were put to flight, and all was disorder and confusion and slaughter, as the Philistines pressed hard upon them. And Saul himself fled, accompanied by a strong body of soldiers, but on the Philistines sending after him some javelinmen and bowmen, he lost all this force except a few; as for himself, he fought with great bravery, and when he had received so many wounds, that he was not able to hold out or resist any longer, and was too weak to kill himself, he bade his armour-bearer draw his sword and run him through, before the enemy should take him alive. But as his armour-bearer did not dare to kill his master, he drew his own sword, and placing himself opposite its point, threw himself upon it, and when he could neither run it through him, nor by leaning against it make it pass through him, he turned round, and asked a certain young man that stood by, who he was, and when he heard that he was an Amalekite, he besought him to force the sword through him, because he was not able to do it with his own hands, and so to procure him such a death as he desired. This the young man did accordingly, and stripped off the golden bracelet that was on Saul's arm, and the royal crown that was on his head, and ran away. And when Saul's armour-bearer saw that he was slain, he killed himself; nor did any of the king's body-guards escape, but they all fell upon the mountain called Gilboa.

And when those Hebrews that dwelt in the valley beyond the Jordan, and those that had their cities in the plain, heard that Saul and his sons were fallen, and that their whole army was destroyed, they left their own cities, and fled to such as were best fortified and most secure, and the Philistines, finding those cities deserted, went and dwelt in them.

§ 8. On the next day, when the Philistines came to strip their enemies that were slain, they found the bodies of Saul and of his sons, and stripped them, and cut off their heads, and sent messengers all over the country to acquaint them that their enemies had fallen. And they hung up their armour as a votive offering in the temple of Astarte,<sup>1</sup> but put their bodies on crosses near the walls of the city of Bethshan, which is now called Scythopolis.<sup>2</sup> But when the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead<sup>3</sup> heard that they had dismembered the dead bodies of Saul and of his sons, they deemed it so horrid a thing to suffer them to be without funeral rites, that the most courageous and bold among them (and indeed that city had in it men that were very stout both in mind and body) journeyed all night, and came to Bethshan, and approached the enemy's walls, and taking down the bodies of Saul and of his sons, carried them to Jabesh, the enemy not being able or bold enough to hinder them, because of their great courage. And the people of Jabesh had a public mourning, and buried their bodies in the best place of their country, which was called Arura;<sup>4</sup> and mourned for them seven days with their wives and children, beating their breasts and lamenting the king and his sons, without either tasting meat or drink.

§ 9. To this sad end did Saul come, according to the prophecy of Samuel, because he disobeyed the commands of God about the Amalekites, and because he slew the

BOOK VII.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF FORTY YEARS—FROM THE DEATH OF SAUL TO THE DEATH OF DAVID.

Chap. I. How David reigned over one Tribe at Hebron, while the Son of Saul reigned over the rest, and how in the Civil War which arose Asahel and Abner were slain . . . . .	1
Chap. II. How, upon the Murder of Ishbosheth by the Treachery of his Friends, David received the whole Kingdom	9
Chap. III. How David laid Siege to Jerusalem, and when he had taken the City, cast the Canaanites out of it, and brought in the Jews to inhabit it . . . . .	11
Chap. IV. How, when David had conquered the Philistines, who made War against him at Jerusalem, he removed the Ark to Jerusalem, and had a mind to build a Temple . . . . .	13
Chap. V. How David subdued the Philistines, and the Moabites, and the Kings of Sophene, and of Damascus, and of the Syrians, as also the Idumæans, in War; and how he made a League with the King of Hamath; and was mindful of the Friendship that Jonathan, the Son of Saul, had had to him . . . . .	18
Chap. VI. How War was waged against the Ammonites, and happily concluded . . . . .	22
Chap. VII. How David fell in love with Bathsheba, and slew her husband Uriah, for which he was reproved by Nathan . . . . .	25
Chap. VIII. How Absalom murdered Amnon, who had forced his Sister, and how he was banished, and afterwards recalled by David . . . . .	30
Chap. IX. Concerning the Insurrection of Absalom against David; and concerning Ahitophel and Hushai; and concerning Ziba and Shimei; and how Ahitophel hanged himself . . . . .	36

Chap. X. How Absalom was beaten, and caught in a Tree by his Hair, and slain by Joab . . . . .	43
Chap. XI. How David, when he had recovered his Kingdom, pardoned Shimei and Mephibosheth; and showed great Affection to Barzillai; and how, upon the Rise of a Sedition, he made Amasa Captain of his Host, in order to pursue Sheba; and how Amasa was slain by Joab . . . . .	48
Chap. XII. How the Hebrews were delivered from a Famine, when the Gibeonites had caused punishment to be inflicted for those of them that had been slain: as also what great Actions were performed against the Philistines by David and the Men of Valour with him . . . . .	54
Chap. XIII. How, when David numbered the People, they were punished, and how the Divine Compassion stopped their Punishment . . . . .	58
Chap. XIV. How David made great Preparations for the House of God, and how upon Adonijah's Attempt to gain the Kingdom, he appointed Solomon to reign . . . . .	62
Chap. XV. The Charge David gave his Son Solomon on the Approach of his Death; also David's Death and Character . . . . .	70

BOOK VIII.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-THREE YEARS.—FROM THE DEATH OF DAVID TO THE DEATH OF AHAB.

Chap. I. How Solomon, when he had received the Kingdom, took off his Enemies . . . . .	72
Chap. II. Concerning the Wife of Solomon, and his Wisdom and Riches, and what he obtained of Hiram for the building of the Temple . . . . .	75
Chap. III. Of the Building of the Temple . . . . .	82
Chap. IV. How Solomon removed the Ark to the Temple, and made Supplication to God and offered public Sacrifices to him . . . . .	88
Chap. V. How Solomon built himself a royal Palace, very costly and splendid; and how he solved the Riddles which were sent him by Hiram . . . . .	94
Chap. VI. How Solomon fortified the City of Jerusalem, and built great Cities: and how he brought some of the Canaanites into Subjection, and entertained the Queen of Egypt and Ethiopia . . . . .	98
Chap. VII. How Solomon grew rich, and fell madly in love with Women, and how God, being incensed at it, raised up Hadad and Jeroboam against him. Concerning the Death of Solomon . . . . .	103

Chap. VIII. How, upon the death of Solomon, the People forsook his Son Rehoboam, and elected Jeroboam King over the ten Tribes . . . . .	110
Chap. IX. How Jadon the Prophet was persuaded by a lying Prophet, and returned to Bethel, and was afterwards slain by a Lion. Also what words the wicked Prophet made use of to persuade the King, and thereby alienated his Mind from God . . . . .	114
Chap. X. Of Rehoboam, and how God Punished him for his Impiety, through Shishak, King of Egypt . . . . .	117
Chap. XI. Concerning the Death of a Son of Jeroboam. How Jeroboam was beaten by Abijah, who died a little afterwards and was succeeded in his Kingdom by Asa. Also how, after the Death of Jeroboam, Baasha destroyed his son Nadab, and all the House of Jeroboam . . . . .	121
Chap. XII. How Zarah King of the Ethiopians was beaten by Asa; and how Asa, upon Baasha's making war against him, invited the King of the Damascenes to assist him; and how, on the Destruction of the House of Baasha, Omri got the Kingdom, and his Son Ahab after him . . . . .	126
Chap. XIII. How Ahab, when he had taken Jezebel to Wife, became more wicked than all the Kings that had been before him. Of the Actions of the Prophet Elijah, and what befell Naboth . . . . .	131
Chap. XIV. How Benhadad, King of Damascus and of Syria, made two Expeditions against Ahab, and was beaten . . . . .	139
Chap. XV. Concerning Jehoshaphat, the King of Jerusalem; and how Ahab made an Expedition against the Syrians, and was assisted therein by Jehoshaphat, but was himself overcome in Battle, and perished therein . . . . .	145

BOOK IX.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY YEARS AND SEVEN MONTHS—FROM THE DEATH OF AHAB TO THE CAPTIVITY OF THE TEN TRIBES.

Chap. I. Concerning Jehoshaphat again; how he appointed Judges, and by God's assistance overcame his Enemies . . . . .	150
Chap. II. Of Ahaziah, the King of Israel, and again of the Prophet Elijah . . . . .	153

Chap. III. How Joram and Jehoshaphat made an Expedition against the Moabites: as also concerning the Miracle of Elisha; and the Death of Jehoshaphat	156
Chap. IV. Joram succeeds Jehoshaphat: how Joram, his Namesake, King of Israel, fought with the Syrians; and the Miracles that were done by the Prophet Elisha	159
Chap. V. Of the Wickedness of Joram King of Jerusalem. His Defeat and Death	167
Chap. VI. How Jehu was anointed King of Israel, and slew both Joram and Ahaziah; as also what he did for the Punishment of the Wicked	169
Chap. VII. How Athaliah reigned over Jerusalem for six Years, when Jehoiada the High Priest slew her, and made Joash, the Son of Ahaziah, King	175
Chap. VIII. Hazael makes an Expedition against the People of Israel, and the Inhabitants of Jerusalem. Jehu dies, and Jehoahaz succeeds him. Joash, the King of Jerusalem, is at first careful about the Worship of God, but afterwards becomes impious, and commands Zachariah to be stoned. When Joash King of Judah was dead, Amaziah his son succeeds him in the Kingdom	178

BOOK VII.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF FORTY YEARS—FROM THE DEATH OF SAUL TO THE DEATH OF DAVID.

CHAP. I.

How David reigned over one Tribe at Hebron, while the Son of Saul reigned over the rest, and how in the Civil War which arose Asahel and Abner were slain.

§ 1.

THIS fight happened to be on the same day on which David got back to Ziklag, after his victory over the Amalekites. And when he had been already two days at Ziklag, there came to him the man who slew Saul, on the third day after the fight. He had escaped out of the battle with the Philistines, and had his clothes rent, and ashes upon his head. And when he made his obeisance to David, he inquired of him whence he came. He replied from the battle of the Israelites: and informed him that the end of it was unfortunate, many myriads of the Israelites having been cut off, and Saul and his sons slain. He also said, that he could give him this information, because he was present at the victory gained over the Hebrews, and was with the king when he fled, and admitted that he had himself slain the king, when he was about to be taken by the enemy, as he asked him to do, because, when he fell on his sword, his many wounds had made him so weak that he was not able to kill himself. He also produced, as tokens that the king was slain, the golden bracelets that had been on the king's arms, and the crown which he had taken off Saul's dead body to bring to him. And David being no longer able to doubt the truth of what he said, but seeing most evident tokens that Saul was dead, rent his garments, and continued all that day with his companions weeping and lamenting. This grief was augmented by his regret for Jonathan, the son of Saul, who had been his most faithful friend, and the author of his own safety. He also showed such virtue and kindness for Saul, as not only to take his death to heart, though he had been frequently in danger of losing his life by him, but also to punish him that slew him: for he told him that he was his own accuser, as the very man who had slain the king, and when he learned that he was the son of an Amalekite, he commanded him to be slain. He also committed to writing some lamentations and funeral panegyrics on Saul and Jonathan, which have continued to my own time.

§ 2. Now when David had paid these honours to the king, and left off mourning, he inquired of God by the prophet which of the cities of the tribe of Judah he bestowed upon him to dwell in? And he answered, that he bestowed upon him Hebron.<sup>1</sup> So he left Ziklag, and went to Hebron, and took with him his two wives and his armed men. And all the people of the fore-mentioned tribe came to him, and elected him as their king. And when he heard that the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead had buried Saul and his sons, he sent to them and commended them, and took what they had done kindly, and promised to repay them for their kindness to those that were dead; and at the same time he informed them, that the tribe of Judah had chosen him for their king.

§ 3. But as soon as Abner (the son of Ner), who was general of Saul's army, and a very active man and of good character, knew that the king and Jonathan and his two other sons had fallen, he made haste to the camp, and taking off with him the remaining son of Saul, whose name was

Ishbosheth, took him to the people over the Jordan, and made him the king of the whole nation, excepting the tribe of Judah; and made his royal seat in a place called in our own language Mahanaim,<sup>1</sup> but in the language of the Greeks The Camp; from whence Abner made haste with a picked force to fight with the tribe of Judah, for he was angry that that tribe had set up David for their king. And Joab, (whose father was Suri, and his mother David's sister Zeruah,) the general of David's army, met him according to David's order, having with him his brothers Abishai and Asahel, as also all David's armed men. Now when he met Abner at a certain fountain, in the city of Gibeon,<sup>2</sup> he drew up his men in order of battle. And when Abner said to him that he had a mind to know which of them had the most valiant soldiers, it was agreed between them that twelve soldiers should fight on each side. So those that were chosen out by both the generals for this fight, came between the two armies, and throwing their lances one against the other, drew their swords, and catching one another by the head, they held one another fast, and ran their swords into each other's sides and groins, until they all, as if by mutual agreement, perished together. When these had fallen down dead, the rest of the army engaged, and after a sharp contest Abner's men were beaten; and as they fled, Joab did not leave off pursuing them, but pressed hard upon them, and urged his men to follow them close, and not to grow weary of killing them. His brothers also pursued them with great alacrity, and especially Asahel, the younger, who was the most eminent of them, and very famous for swiftness of foot, for he could not only outrun men, but is reported to have outrun a horse that raced with him. This Asahel ran violently after Abner, and would not turn the least out of his course, either to the one side or to the other. Then Abner turned back, and attempted cunningly to elude his violence. Sometimes he bade him leave off the pursuit, and take the armour of one of his soldiers, and again, when he could not persuade him to do so, he exhorted him to restrain himself, and not to pursue him any longer, lest he should force him to kill him, and then he would not be able to look his brother Joab in the face. But as Asahel would not be persuaded, but still continued to pursue him, Abner turned round as he fled, and stabbed him with his spear, and mortally wounded him, so that he died immediately. And those that had been pursuing Abner with him, when they came to the place where Asahel lay, stood round his dead body, and left off the pursuit of the enemy. However, both Joab himself and his brother Abishai ran past the dead corpse,<sup>1</sup> and making their anger at the death of Asahel an occasion of greater activity against Abner, they went on with incredible haste and alacrity, and pursued Abner to a certain place called Ammah,<sup>2</sup> and it was now about sunset. Then Joab ascended a certain hill, and stood there with the tribe of Benjamin, and took a view of Abner and his men. Then Abner cried aloud, and said, that it was not right that they should irritate men of the same nation to fight so bitterly against one another, and as for Joab's brother Asahel, he was himself in the wrong, as he would not be persuaded not to pursue him any further, which was the occasion of his wound and death. And Joab consented to what he said, and accepted his words as an apology for the killing of Asahel, and called his men back with the sound of the trumpet, as a signal for their retreat, and put a stop to any further pursuit. And Joab encamped there that night, but Abner marched all night, and crossed over the river Jordan, and went to Ishbosheth Saul's son, to Mahanaim. On the next day Joab counted the dead, and had them all buried. Of Abner's soldiers there were slain about three hundred and sixty, but of David's only nineteen, besides Asahel, whose body Joab and Abishai carried to Bethlehem; and when they had buried him in the sepulchre of their fathers, they returned to Hebron to David. From that time there began a civil war, which lasted a long while, in which the followers of David grew stronger and came off best in the dangers they underwent, and the house and subjects of Saul almost every day became weaker.

§ 4. About this time David had six sons, by as many mothers. The eldest was by Abinoam and was called Amnon; the second was Daniel by his wife Abigail; the third was Absalom by Maacah, the daughter of Talmi, king of Gêhur; the fourth, by his wife Haggith, he called Adonijah; the fifth was Shephatiah, by Abital; the sixth, by Eglah, he called Ithream. Now while this civil war went on, and the subjects of the two kings had frequent encounters and fights, Abner, the general of the army of Saul's son, by his ability and great popularity with the people, made them all continue with Ishbosheth, and indeed for a considerable time they continued in fidelity to him. But afterwards, when Abner was blamed and accused of having gone in to Saul's concubine, the daughter of Aiah, whose name was Rizpah, and when he was censured for it by Ishbosheth, he was very vexed and angry because he had not justice done him by Ishbosheth, to whom he had shown the greatest kindness, and he threatened to transfer the kingdom to David, and to show that Ishbosheth did not rule over the people beyond the Jordan by his own strength and wisdom, but by his (Abner's) warlike skill and fidelity. And he sent to Hebron to David, and asked him to give him security upon oath that he would esteem him his companion and his friend, on condition that he should persuade the people to revolt from Saul's son, and choose David king of the whole country. And when David agreed to the terms of Abner, for he was pleased with his message to him, he asked him as the first proof he meant to fulfil the conditions to restore his wife Michal to him, as he had purchased her with great risk with those six hundred heads of the Philistines which he had brought to Saul her father for her hand. So Abner took Michal from Phaltiel, who was now her husband, and sent her to David, Ishbosheth himself offering his assistance, for David had written to him that he ought to have his wife restored to him. Abner also called together the elders of the people, and the commanders of divisions, and captains of thousands, and said to them that he had dissuaded them from their intention when they were inclined to forsake Ishbosheth and to join themselves to David, but now he gave them leave to do so, if they had a mind to it, for they knew that God had by Samuel the prophet appointed David to be king of all the Hebrews, and had foretold that he should punish the Philistines, and overcome them, and bring them under. Now when the elders and commanders heard this, and saw that Abner had come over to that view of public affairs which they had held before, they changed their party and came over to David. And Abner called together the tribe of Benjamin, for all the body-guards of Ishbosheth were of that tribe, and he spoke to them to the same purpose. And when he saw that they did not in the least oppose what he said, but assented to his view, he took about twenty of his friends and went to David, to receive himself security upon oath from him, for we esteem those things more sure which we do ourselves than those which we do by proxy. He also gave him an account of what he had said to the commanders, and to the whole tribe of Benjamin. And when David had received him in a gracious manner, and had treated him with great hospitality for many days, Abner, when he was dismissed, asked for leave to bring the tribes with him, that he might hand over the kingdom to David when he could see and be seen.

§ 5. Directly David had sent Abner away, Joab, the general of his army, came to Hebron, and when he learnt that Abner had been with David, and had parted with him a little before, on conditions and agreements that the kingdom should be handed over to David, he feared lest David should place Abner, who would assist him to gain the kingdom, in the first rank and dignity, especially as Abner was a clever man in other respects in understanding affairs and in taking occasion by the hand, and that he himself should be put lower, and be deprived of the command of the army, so he took a knavish and wicked course. In the first place he endeavoured to calumniate Abner to the king, urging him to be on his guard against him, and not to pay attention to what he had engaged to do for him, because all he did tended to confirm the kingdom to Saul's son: that he came to him deceitfully and with guile, and was gone away in hopes of gaining his purpose by subtilty.

But as he could not persuade David, and saw that he was not at all exasperated, he betook himself to a project bolder than the former. He determined to kill Abner, and sent some messengers after him, and ordered them, when they should overtake him, to recall him in David's name, who had some matters to tell him about his affairs, which he had not remembered to speak of when he was with him. Now when Abner heard what the messengers said (for they overtook him in a certain place called Besira,<sup>1</sup> which was twenty furlongs from Hebron), he suspected nothing of what was going to happen, and returned. And Joab met him in the gate, and received him in the kindest manner, as if he were Abner's greatest well-wisher and friend; for those who undertake vile actions, in order to prevent any suspicion of their intention, frequently pretend to be really good. And he took him aside from his own followers, as if he would speak with him in private, and led him to a solitary part of the gate, having nobody with him but his brother Abishai, and he drew his sword and smote him in the groin. Thus Abner died by Joab's treachery, which was, he said himself, to avenge his brother Asahel, whom Abner smote and slew as he was pursuing after him in the battle of Hebron, but really from fear of losing his command of the army, and his position with the king, and that Abner would obtain the first place in David's court. By this anyone may learn how much and great wickedness men will venture upon for ambition and power, and not to be behind anyone else. For as when they are desirous of power, they acquire it by ten thousand evil practices, so when they are afraid of losing it, they get it secured to them by much worse practices than the former, as if they thought no more terrible calamity could befall them than not to gain exalted authority, or when they have got it, and by long custom found the sweetness of it, to lose it again; and since this last would be the heaviest of all afflictions, they all of them contrive and venture upon the most desperate actions from fear of losing it. But let these few reflections suffice on the subject.

§ 6. When David heard that Abner was slain, it grieved his soul, and he called all men to witness, stretching out his right hand to God, and crying aloud, that he was not partaker of the murder of Abner, and that his death was not procured by his command or wish. He also imprecated the heaviest curses on him that slew him, and on his whole house, and on all accessories in the murder. For he was anxious not to seem to have had any hand in the murder, contrary to the assurances he had given, and the oaths he had taken to Abner. And he commanded all the people to weep and lament for him, and to honour his dead body with the usual solemnities by rending their garments and putting on sackcloth, and so attired to go before the bier, which he followed himself, with the elders and those that were in authority, lamenting Abner, and by his tears demonstrating his good-will to him while he was alive, and his sorrow for him now he was dead, and that he was not murdered with his consent. And he buried him at Hebron in a magnificent manner, and composed funeral elegies for him: and stood next to the tomb weeping, and caused others to do the same. Nay, so deeply did the death of Abner trouble him, that his companions could by no means force him to take any food, for he affirmed with an oath that he would taste nothing till the sun was set. This behaviour gained him the good-will of the people; for such as had an affection for Abner were mightily pleased with the respect he paid him now he was dead, and his observation of the faith he had plighted to him, which was showed in his vouchsafing to him all the usual funeral ceremonies, as if he had been his kinsman and friend, and not suffering him to be insulted by a neglected and dishonourable burial, as if he had been his enemy; and the entire nation rejoiced at the king's gentleness and mildness of disposition, everyone thinking that the king would have paid the same respect to him in the like circumstances as he showed in the burial of Abner. And indeed in this David principally intended to gain a good reputation, and so took care to do what was proper in the case, so none suspected him as the author of Abner's death. He said also to the people, that he was greatly troubled at the death of so good a man, and that the affairs of the Hebrews had suffered great detriment by being deprived of him who was competent to preserve them by his excellent advice, and by the strength of his hands in war. And he added, "God, who observes everything, will not suffer Abner to die unavenged; but know ye, that I am not able to do anything to these sons of Zeruah, Joab and Abishai, who have more power than I have, but God will requite their wickedness on their own heads." Such was the death of Abner.

CHAP. II.

§ 1.

WHEN Ishbosheth, the son of Saul, heard of the death of Abner, he took it greatly to heart to be deprived of a man that was of his kindred, and had indeed given him the kingdom, and he was grievously afflicted, for Abner's death very much troubled him. Nor did he himself survive any long time, but was treacherously slain by the sons of Hieremmon, Banaotha and Thannus, who being Benjamites of the first rank, thought if they should slay Ishbosheth, they would obtain great presents from David, and get some military command, or some other post. So finding him alone asleep at noon in his bed-chamber, when none of his guards were there, and when the woman that kept the door was not awake, but had fallen asleep also, partly on account of the labour she had undergone, partly from the heat, they went into the room in which Saul's son lay asleep, and slew him; they also cut off his head, and travelled all that night, and the next day, supposing themselves flying away from those they had injured, to one that would take their action as a favour, and give them security. So they came to Hebron, and showed David the head of Ishbosheth, and introduced themselves to him as his well-wishers, who had killed his rival for the kingdom. But David did not approve of what they had done, as they had expected, but said to them, "Vilest of wretches, you shall immediately receive the punishment you deserve. Did not you know how I punished him that murdered Saul, and brought me his crown of gold, and that though he slew him as a favour, that he might not be taken alive by his enemies? Or did you imagine that I am altered in my disposition, and not the same man I was, to be pleased with evil-doers, and to be grateful to you for your vile murder of your master, having slain a righteous man upon his bed, who never did evil to anybody, and treated you with great good-will and honour? Wherefore you shall suffer the punishment due on his account, and also that you owe me for supposing that I should take Ishbosheth's death kindly at your hands, for you could not lay a greater blot on my reputation than by such a suspicion." When David had said this, he had them tormented with all sorts of torments, and then put to death; and with all accustomed rites he laid the head of Ishbosheth in the grave of Abner.

§ 2. When these things were brought to this conclusion, all the principal men of the Hebrew people came to David to Hebron, as the captains of thousands and other rulers, and delivered themselves up to him, reminding him of the good-will they had borne him in Saul's lifetime, and the honour they had not ceased to pay him when he was captain of a thousand, as also that he was chosen by God as king through Samuel the prophet, he and his sons after him, and pointing out besides, how God had given him power to save the land of the Hebrews by overcoming the Philistines. And he received graciously their zeal on his behalf, and exhorted them to continue in it, for they should have no reason to repent of being thus disposed to him. So when he had feasted them, and treated them graciously, he sent them home to bring all the people to him; upon which there came to him about six thousand eight hundred armed men of the tribe of Judah, who had shields and spears for their weapons, who had adhered hitherto to Saul's son, when the rest of the tribe of Judah chose David for their king. There came also seven thousand one hundred from the tribe of Simeon. From the tribe of Levi there came four thousand seven hundred, with Jehoiada for their leader. After these came Zadok the high priest, with twenty-two captains of his kindred. Of the tribe of Benjamin came four thousand armed men, for the rest of the tribe held aloof, hoping that some one of the house of Saul would yet be king over them. Of the tribe of Ephraim were twenty thousand eight hundred mighty men of valour eminent for their strength. Of the half tribe of Manasseh came eighteen thousand of the strongest men. Of the tribe of Issachar came two hundred who foreknew what was to come hereafter, and twenty thousand armed men. Of the tribe of Zebulun came fifty thousand chosen warriors. This was the only tribe that came entirely in to David, and all these had the same weapons as the tribe of Gad. Of the tribe of Nephthali the eminent men and rulers were one thousand, whose weapons were shields and spears, and the tribe itself followed after, being innumerable. Of the tribe of Dan there were twenty-seven thousand six hundred chosen men. Of the tribe of Asher were forty thousand. Of the two tribes that were beyond the Jordan, and half the tribe of Manasseh, armed with shields and spears and helmets and swords, were a hundred and twenty thousand. The rest of the tribes also made use of swords. This multitude came together to Hebron to David, with a great quantity of corn and wine and all other sorts of food, and established David in the kingdom with one consent. And when the people had rejoiced and feasted for three days in Hebron, David and all the people removed and came to Jerusalem.

CHAP. III.

How David laid Siege to Jerusalem, and when he had taken the City, cast the Canaanites out of it, and brought in the Jews to inhabit it.

§ 1.

NOW the Jebusites, who inhabited Jerusalem, and were Canaanites by race, shut their gates, and placed the blind and the lame and all their maimed persons upon the walls to mock at the king, and said that even these would hinder his entrance into it. This they did contemptuously relying on the strength of their walls. And David was enraged, and began the siege of Jerusalem, and employed his utmost diligence and energy, intending by the taking of this place to prove his strength, and to awe all others that might exhibit a similar spirit to him, and he took the lower city by storm, but the citadel held out still, so the king, knowing that the offer of honour and rewards would encourage the soldiers to greater energy, promised that he who should first cross the moat beneath the citadel, and should ascend to the citadel itself and take it, should have the command of the entire people conferred upon him. So they were all eager to ascend, and thought no pains too great to get up there, from their desire of the chief command. But Joab, the son of Zeruiah, got up first, and as soon as he had got up to the citadel, cried out to the king, and claimed the chief command.

§ 2. When David had cast the Jebusites out of the citadel, he rebuilt Jerusalem, and called it the City of David,<sup>1</sup> and abode there all the time of his reign. But the time that he reigned over the tribe of Judah only at Hebron was seven years and six months. And after he had chosen Jerusalem to be his royal city, his affairs prospered more and more by the providence of God, who took care that they should improve and wax greater. Hiram also, the king of the Tyrians, sent ambassadors to him, and made a league of mutual friendship and alliance with him. He also sent him presents of cedar-trees, and artificers carpenters and builders, to build him a royal palace at Jerusalem. Now David built round about the lower city, and also joined the citadel to it, and made it one work, and when he had surrounded it with walls, he appointed Joab to take care of them. [It was David therefore who first cast the Jebusites out of Jerusalem, and called it after himself the City of David, for in the days of our forefather Abraham it was called Solyma, and after that time some say that Homer mentions it by the name of Solyma. And he called the temple Solyma,<sup>2</sup> which in the Hebrew language denotes security.] Now the whole time from the warfare under Joshua our general against the Canaanites, and from the war in which he overcame them, and distributed their land among the Hebrews, was five hundred and fifteen years. Nor could the Israelites ever cast the Canaanites out of Jerusalem until David took it by siege.

§ 3. I shall here mention Araunah, who was a wealthy Jebusite, but was not slain by David in the siege of Jerusalem, because of the good-will he bore to the Hebrews, and because of a certain affection and zeal he had to the king himself, which I shall speak of as occasion offers. Now David married other wives over and above those which he had before: he also kept concubines. And he begat eleven sons, whose names were Amnon, Emnos, Eban, Nathan, Solomon, Jebar, Elien, Phalna, Ennaphen, Jenæ, Eliphale, and also a daughter Tamar. Of these sons nine were born of legitimate wives, but the two last-named of concubines, and Tamar had the same mother as Absalom.

CHAP. IV.

How, when David had conquered the Philistines, who made War against him at Jerusalem, he removed the Ark to Jerusalem, and had a mind to build a Temple.

§ 1.

WHEN the Philistines understood that David was made king by the Hebrews, they led an army against him to Jerusalem, and when they had occupied the valley called the valley of the Giants,<sup>1</sup> a place not far from the city, they pitched their camp therein. But the king of the Jews, who never permitted himself to do anything without prophecy,<sup>2</sup> and the command of God, and without relying on him as a security for the time to come, bade the high priest

<sup>2</sup> It deserves here to be remarked, that Saul very rarely, and David very frequently, consulted God by Urim, and that David aimed always to depend, not on his own prudence, or abilities, but on the divine direction, contrary to Saul's practice. And when Michal laughed at David's dancing before the ark, it is probable she did so because her father Saul did not use to pay such a regard to the ark, to the Urim there inquired by, or to God's worship before it, and because she thought it beneath the dignity of a king to be so religious.—W.

foretold to him what was the will of God, and what would be the event of the battle. And when the high priest foretold that he should gain victory and dominion, David led his army out against the Philistines; and when the battle began he suddenly fell upon the enemy's rear, and slew some of them, and put the rest to flight. And let no one suppose that it was a small army of the Philistines that came against the Hebrews, conjecturing so from the suddenness of their defeat, and from their having performed no great action worth recording, or from the slowness of their march and want of courage; but let him know that all Syria and Phœnicia, with many other warlike nations besides, fought with them and had a share in the war. And this was the only reason why, when they had been so often conquered, and had lost so many ten thousands of their men, they still attacked the Hebrews with a greater force. Indeed, when they failed in their purpose in these battles, they came against David with an army three times as numerous as before, and pitched their camp on the same spot of ground as before. The king of Israel therefore inquired of God again concerning the event of the battle, and the high priest prophesied to him that he should keep his army in the groves called the Groves of Weeping,<sup>1</sup> which were not far from the enemy's camp, and that he should not move, nor begin to fight, till the trees of the groves should be in motion without the wind's blowing, and as soon as these trees moved, and the time foretold to him by God was come, he should without delay go out to gain a certain and evident victory. For the columns of the enemy did not wait his attack, but retreated at the first onset, and he closely followed and slew them, and pursued them to the city of Gazar,<sup>2</sup> which is the border of their country, and spoiled their camp, in which he found great riches, and destroyed their gods.

§ 2. When this proved the issue of the battle, David thought good, upon a consultation with the elders and commanders and captains of thousands, to send for those of all his countrymen that were in the flower of their age from the whole land, and also for the priests and the Levites, to go to Kirjathjearim,<sup>1</sup> to bring up the ark of God out of that city and carry it to Jerusalem, and there to keep it, and to offer those sacrifices and other honours with which God was well pleased. For had they done thus in the reign of Saul, they would not have undergone any great misfortunes at all. So when all the people were come together, as they had resolved to do, the king came to the ark, which the priests brought out of the house of Aminadab, and laid it upon a new cart, and permitted their brothers and children to draw it as well as the oxen. Before it went the king and the whole people with him, chanting praises to God, and singing all sorts of national songs, with the varied sound of musical instruments, and with dancing and singing of psalms, as also with the sound of trumpets and of cymbals, and so brought the ark to Jerusalem. But when they reached the threshing-floor of Chidon, a place so called, Uzzah was slain by the anger of God, for as the oxen stumbled, he stretched out his hand, and would needs take hold of the ark to steady it. And as he was not a priest, and yet touched the ark, God struck him dead. And both the king and people were displeased at the death of Uzzah, and the place where he died is still called the Breach of Uzzah<sup>2</sup> to this day. And David was afraid, and imagined that if he received the ark to himself into his own city, he would suffer as Uzzah had suffered, who, upon his mere putting out his hand to the ark, died in the manner already mentioned, so he did not receive it to himself into his own city, but carried it aside to a certain place, belonging to a righteous man, whose name was Obededom, by race a Levite, and deposited the ark with him. And it remained there three entire months, and benefitted the house of Obededom, and conferred many blessings upon it. And when the king heard what had befallen Obededom, and how from a poor man in a low estate he was become exceedingly wealthy, and the object of envy to all those that saw or inquired after his house, he felt confident that he should meet with no misfortune, and transferred the ark to his own city, the priests carrying it, while seven companies of singers marshalled in order by the king went before it, and he himself played on the harp and danced, insomuch, that when his wife Michal, the daughter of Saul our first king, saw him so doing, she jeered at him. And when they had brought in the ark, they placed it in the tabernacle which David had pitched for it, and he offered costly sacrifices and peace-offerings, and feasted the whole people, and dealt out to women and men and infants a loaf of bread and a cake, and another cake baked in a pan, with a portion of the sacrifice. And when he had thus feasted the people, he sent them away, and himself returned to his own house.

§ 3. And when Michal his wife, the daughter of Saul, came and stood by him, she wished him all happiness, and prayed that whatever he should desire might be given him to the utmost by God, and that he would be favourable to him; but she blamed him, that so great a king as he was should dance in an unseemly manner, and in his dancing uncover himself among the slaves and handmaidens. But he replied, that he was not ashamed to do what was acceptable to God, who had preferred him before her father and all others, and that he would frequently play and dance without any regard either to what the handmaidens or she herself thought of it. So this Michal had no children by David, but when she was afterwards married to him to whom Saul her father had given her (for at this time David had taken her away from him and kept her himself), she bore five children. But concerning these matters I shall speak in their place.

§ 4. Now, when the king saw that his affairs grew better almost every day by the will of God, he thought it a sin that, while he himself dwelt in stately houses made of cedar, and beautifully furnished, he should suffer the ark to be laid in a tabernacle, and was desirous to build a temple to God, as Moses had foretold. And when he had discoursed with Nathan the prophet about these things, and been bidden by him to do whatever he had a mind to do, having God with him as his helper in all things, he was the more ready to set about the building. But God appeared to Nathan that very night, and commanded him to tell David that he took his purpose and his desires kindly, since nobody had before taken it into their head to build him a temple, although in spite of his notion he would not permit him to build him a temple, because he had made many wars, and was defiled with the slaughter of his enemies; however, after his death in old age, when he had lived a long life, there should be a temple built by a son of his, who should succeed to the kingdom after him, and should be called Solomon, whom he promised to befriend and take care of, as a father takes care of his son, by preserving the kingdom to his son's posterity, and delivering it to them, but he would punish him, if he sinned, with disease and barrenness of land. When David understood this from the prophet, he was very joyful at this sure knowledge of the continuance of the kingdom to his posterity, and that his house should be splendid and very famous, and he went to the ark and fell down on his face, and began to adore God and return thanks to him for all his benefits, as well for those that he had already bestowed upon him in raising him from a low state and the employment of a shepherd to so great extent of dominion and glory, as for those also which he promised to his posterity, and for the providence by which he had procured the Hebrews the liberty they enjoyed. And when he had said thus, and had sung a hymn of praise to God, he went his way.

CHAP. V.

How David subdued the Philistines, and the Moabites, and the Kings of Sophene, and of Damascus, and of the Syrians, as also the Idumaeans, in War; and how he made a League with the King of Hamath; and was mindful of the Friendship that Jonathan, the Son of Saul, had had to him.

§ 1.

A LITTLE while after this he considered that he ought to make war against the Philistines, and not to allow any idleness or slackness in his rule, that when he had overthrown his enemies, as God had foretold to him, he might leave his posterity to reign in peace afterwards. So he called together his army again, and charged them to be ready and prepared for war, and when he thought that all things in his army were in a good state, he started from Jerusalem, and marched against the Philistines. And when he had overcome them in battle, and had cut off a great part of their country and annexed it to the country of the Hebrews, he transferred the war to the Moabites; and when he had cut to pieces two parts of their army in battle, he took the remaining part captive, and imposed tribute upon them, to be paid annually. He then made war against Adrazar, the son of Araus, king of Sophene,<sup>1</sup> and when he had joined battle with him at the river Euphrates, he cut to pieces twenty thousand of his foot, and about seven thousand of his horse. He also took about a thousand of his chariots, and destroyed most of them, and ordered that only one hundred should be kept.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Comp. Ant. viii. 7, § 6. In 2 Sam. viii. 3, Hadadezer is called 'King of Zobah,' that is of Aram Zobah, which lay eastward of Cœlesyria, and extended north-east to the Euphrates. Sophene was a district of Armenia lying between the Antitaurus and Mount Masius, that is the region round Kharpût.

<sup>2</sup> David's reserving only 100 chariots for himself out of 1,000 he had taken was most probably done in compliance with the law of Moses, which forbade a king of Israel to 'multiply horses to himself,' Deut. xvii. 16, one of the principal uses of horses in Judæa at that time being for drawing their chariots. See Josh. xii. 6, Antiq. v. 1, § 18.—W.

§ 2. Now when Hadad, king of Damascus and Syria, heard that David fought against Adrazar, who was his friend, he came to his assistance with a powerful army, hoping to rescue him, but when he joined battle with David at the river Euphrates, he came off not as well as he expected, for he lost the battle and a great number of his soldiers; for there were twenty thousand slain in the army of Hadad, and all the rest fled. Nicolaus [of Damascus] also makes mention of this king, in the fourth book of his histories, where he speaks as follows: "A great while after these things had happened, there was one of the natives of that country whose name was Hadad, who became very powerful, and reigned over Damascus, and the rest of Syria, excepting Phœnicia. He made war against David, the king of Judæa, and tried his fortune in many battles, and particularly in the last battle at the Euphrates, wherein he was beaten. He seemed to have been the most notable of all their kings for strength and bravery." And besides this he says of his posterity, that after his death they succeeded one another in his kingdom and name, for he thus speaks: "When Hadad was dead, his posterity reigned for ten generations, each of his successors receiving from his father both his dominions and name, as was the case with the Ptolemies in Egypt. But the third was the most powerful of them all, and wished to avenge the defeat his forefather had received, so he made an expedition against the Jews, and laid waste the region which is now called Samaritis." Nor did he err from the truth, for he means that Hadad who made an expedition against Samaria in the reign of Ahab king of Israel; about whom I shall speak in due place hereafter.

§ 3. Now when David had made an expedition against Damascus, and the rest of Syria, and had brought it all into subjection, and had placed garrisons in the country, and ordered that they should pay tribute, he returned home. He also dedicated to God at Jerusalem the golden quivers and the entire armour which the guards of Hadad used to wear, which Shishak the king of Egypt took away afterwards, when he fought with David's grandson Rehoboam, with a great deal of other wealth which he carried out of Jerusalem. However, I shall narrate all this when I come to the proper place. As for the king of the Hebrews, he was assisted by God, who gave him great success in his wars, and made an expedition against the best cities of Adrazar, Betah<sup>1</sup> and Machon,<sup>2</sup> which he took by storm, and plundered. There was found in them a very great quantity of gold and silver, besides that sort of brass which is said to be more valuable than gold, of which brass Solomon made the large vessel which was called the [brazen] sea, and those most beautiful lavers, when he built the temple to God.

§ 4. But when the king of Hamath<sup>3</sup> was informed of the ill success of Adrazar, and had heard of the destruction of his army, he was afraid on his own account, and resolved to make a league of friendship and fidelity with David before he should come against him, so he sent to him his son Adoram, and professed that he owed him thanks for his fighting against Adrazar who was his enemy, and offered him a league of mutual alliance and friendship. He also sent him as presents vessels of ancient workmanship, both in gold and silver and brass. And when David had made this league of mutual alliance with Thaenus (for that was the name of the king of Hamath), and had received the presents he sent him, he dismissed his son with the honour that was due on both sides, and took the presents that were sent by Thænus, as also the rest of the gold and silver which he had taken from the cities he had captured and the nations whom he had conquered, and dedicated them to God. Nor did God give him victory and success only when he went to war in person and led his own army, but he also gave victory over the Idumæans to Abishai, the brother of Joab the commander-in-chief of the army, and by him to David who had sent him with an army into Idumæa, for Abishai cut to pieces eighteen thousand of them in battle. And David placed garrisons through all Idumæa,<sup>4</sup> and received tribute from the country, and from every person in it. He was in his nature just, and dispensed justice with strict regard to truth. He had for the general of his whole army Joab, and he made Jehoshaphat, the son of Ahilud, recorder. He also appointed Zadok, of the family of Phinehas, to be high priest with Abiathar (for he was his friend). He also made Seisan the scribe, and gave the command over his body-guards to Benaiah the son of Jehoiada. His elder sons were near his person and had the care of it also.

§ 5. He also remembered the covenants and oaths he had made with Jonathan the son of Saul, and the friendship and affection Jonathan had for him; for besides all the rest of the excellent qualities with which he was endowed, he was exceedingly mindful of such as had at any time bestowed benefits upon him. He therefore gave order that inquiry should be made, whether any of Jonathan's family were living, to whom he might make due return for the great friendship of Jonathan for him. And when one of Saul's freedmen was brought to him, called Ziba, who was acquainted with those of the family that were still living, he asked him, "Whether he could tell him of any one belonging to Jonathan that was now alive, and able to receive a return of the benefits which he had received from Jonathan?" And he told him that a son of Jonathan was left, whose name was Mephibosheth, who was lame in his feet, for when his nurse heard that the father and grandfather of the child had fallen in battle, she snatched him up and fled away, and dropped him from her shoulders, and his feet were lamed. And when the king learned where and by whom he was brought up, he sent messengers to the city of Lodebar<sup>1</sup> to Machir, at whose house the son of Jonathan was brought up, and sent for him to come to him. And when Mephibosheth came to the king, he fell on his face and prostrated himself before him, but David bade him be of good cheer and expect better times. And he gave him his father's house, and all the substance that his grandfather Saul was in possession of, and bade him come and eat with him at his own table, and never to be absent one day from that table. And when the youth had prostrated himself before him on account of his words and gifts, the king called for Ziba, and told him that he had given the youth his father's house and all Saul's possessions. He also ordered that Ziba should cultivate the land, and look after it, and bring Mephibosheth the profits of all to Jerusalem. And David entertained him at his table every day; and bestowed upon the youth Ziba and his fifteen sons, and his twenty servants. When the king had made these arrangements, Ziba prostrated himself before him, and promised to do all that he had bidden him, and went his way. And this son of Jonathan dwelt at Jerusalem, and fed at the king's table, and had the same care taken of him that a son would get. He had also a son, whom he called Micha.

CHAP. VI.

§ 1.

SUCH were the honours that those who were left of Saul's and Jonathan's family received from David. About this time died Nahash, the king of the Ammonites, who was a friend of David, and when his son succeeded his father in the kingdom, David sent ambassadors to him to comfort him, and exhorted him to take his father's death patiently, and to expect that the same kindness would continue to himself as had been showed to his father. But the princes of the Ammonites took this message in bad part, and not as David intended it, and excited the king to resent it, and said that David had sent men to spy out the country and its strength, under the pretext of kindness. They further advised him to have a care, and not to give heed to David's words, lest he should be deluded by him, and so fall into irreparable disaster. So Nahash's son, the king of the Ammonites, thought these princes spoke what was more probable than the real truth, and abused the ambassadors in a very sharp manner, and shaved off half their beards, and cut off half their garments, and sent his answer not in words but in deeds. When the king of Israel saw this, he was moved with indignation, and it was plain that he would not overlook this injurious and contumelious treatment, but would make war on the Ammonites, and would avenge this shameful treatment of his ambassadors on their king. So that king's intimate friends and commanders, understanding that they had violated their league, and were bound to be punished for the same, made preparations for war; they also sent a thousand talents to the Syrian king of Mesopotamia, and endeavoured to prevail with him to assist them for that money, and to Shobach. Now these kings had twenty thousand foot. They also subsidized the king of the Amalekites, and a fourth king called Ishtob, and these had twelve thousand armed men.

§ 2. But David was under no consternation at this confederacy, nor at the forces of the Ammonites, but putting his trust in God, because he was going to war in a just cause on account of the injurious treatment he had met with, he at once despatched Joab, the captain of his host, against them, and gave him the flower of his army. And he pitched his camp by Rabbah,<sup>1</sup> the metropolis of the Ammonites; whereupon the enemy sallied out, and set themselves in array, not all of them together, but in two bodies; for the auxiliaries were set in array in the plain by themselves, but the army of the Ammonites was at the gates over against the Hebrews. When Joab saw this, he opposed one stratagem against another, and picked out the bravest of his men, and set them in opposition to the king of Syria and the kings that were with him, and handed over the rest of his army to his brother Abishai, and bade him set them in opposition to the Ammonites, and told him, that in case he should see that the Syrians pressed him (Joab) hard, and were too much for him, he should order his troops to turn about and assist him, and promised that he would do the same by him if he saw him hard pressed by the Ammonites. So he sent his brother forward, and encouraged him to do everything courageously and with zeal, which would make them afraid of disgrace and fight manfully, and so dismissed him to fight with the Ammonites, while he himself fell upon the Syrians. And though they stoutly resisted for a while, Joab slew many of them, and compelled the rest to betake themselves to flight; and when the Ammonites saw this, and were also afraid of Abishai and his division, they stayed no longer, but imitated their auxiliaries, and fled to the city. And Joab, when he had thus overcome the enemy, returned in triumph to Jerusalem to the king.

§ 3. Still this defeat did not induce the Ammonites to be quiet, nor did finding the Hebrews the better men make them peaceful, but they sent to Chalaman, the king of the Syrians beyond the Euphrates, and subsidized him as an auxiliary. He had Shobach for the captain of his host, with eighty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. Now when the king of the Hebrews understood that the Ammonites had gathered so great an army together, he determined to make war with them no longer by his generals, so he passed over the river Jordan himself with all his army; and when he met them he joined battle with them, and overcame them, and slew forty thousand of their foot, and seven thousand of their horse. He also mortally wounded Shobach, the general of Chalaman's forces. And the people of Mesopotamia, upon such a conclusion of the battle, delivered themselves up to David, and sent him presents. And he at winter-time returned to Jerusalem, but at the beginning of the spring he sent Joab, the captain of the host, to fight against the Ammonites; and he over-ran all their country, and laid it waste, and shut them up in their metropolis Rabbah, and besieged them therein.

CHAP. VII.

How David fell in love with Bathsheba, and slew her husband Uriah, for which he was reproved by Nathan.

§ 1.

BUT David fell now into a very grievous sin, though he was by nature a righteous and religious man, and one that strictly observed the laws of our fathers. Late one evening taking a view from the roof of his royal palace, on which he used to walk at that hour, he saw a woman taking a cold bath in her own house; she was of extraordinary beauty, and therein surpassed all other women, her name was Bathsheba. He was so overcome by her beauty, that he was not able to restrain his desires, but sent for her, and lay with her. And she conceived, and sent to the king, that he might contrive some way of concealing her sin (for according to the laws of our fathers a woman guilty of adultery ought to be put to death). So the king sent for the woman's husband, whose name was Uriah, and who was Joab's armour-bearer, from the siege; and when he was come, the king inquired of him about the army, and about the siege. And when he had made answer that everything went according to their wishes, the king took some portions of meat from his supper and gave them to him, and bade him go home to his wife, and take his rest with her. But Uriah did not do so, but slept near the king with the rest of the armour-bearers. When the king was informed of this next day, he asked him why he had not gone home to his house and wife after so long an absence? for that was the natural custom of all men, when they came off a journey. He replied that it was not right, while his fellow soldiers and the general of the army slept upon the ground in camp in the enemy's country, that he should go and take his rest and disport himself with his wife. When he had thus replied, the king ordered him to stay there that day too, and he would dismiss him next day to the general. And the king invited Uriah to supper, and in a cunning and dexterous manner plied him with drink at supper, till he was drunk, yet did he nevertheless sleep at the king's doors, without any desire for his wife. Upon this the king was very vexed, and wrote to Joab, and commanded him to punish Uriah, for he told him that he had offended him, and he suggested the manner in which he would have him punished, that it might not be discovered that he was himself the author of his punishment; for he charged him to set him over against that part of the enemy's army where the attack would be most dangerous, and where he might be in the greatest jeopardy by being left, for he bade Joab order Uriah's fellow soldiers to retire from the fight. When he had written this, and sealed the letter with his own seal, he gave it to Uriah to carry to Joab. When Joab had received it, and upon reading it understood the king's purpose, he set Uriah in the place where he knew the enemy would be most troublesome to him, and gave him some of the best soldiers in the army, and said that he would come to his assistance with the whole army, if they could break down some part of the wall and enter the city. And he desired him to be glad of the opportunity of exposing himself to such danger and not to be displeased at it, since he was a valiant soldier, and had a great reputation for his valour both with the king and with his countrymen. And when Uriah undertook the work he was set upon with alacrity, Joab gave private orders to those who were to be his companions, that when they saw the enemy make a sally, they should retire. When, therefore, the Hebrews made an assault upon the city, the Ammonites were afraid that the enemy might be too quick for them, and get into the city at the very place where Uriah was posted, so they put their best soldiers in the front, and opened their gate suddenly, and fell upon the enemy with great vehemence at the double. And when those that were with Uriah saw this they all retreated, as Joab had told them beforehand; but Uriah, being ashamed to run away and leave his post, waited the attack of the enemy, and bore the brunt of their onset, and slew many of them, but being surrounded and intercepted by them he was slain, and a few of his companions were slain with him.

§ 2. When this had happened, Joab sent messengers to the king, and ordered them to tell him that he had done what he could to take the city soon, but that, as they made an assault on the wall, they had been forced to retire with great loss; and he bade them, if they saw the king was angry, to add that Uriah was slain. When the king heard the messengers, he was displeased at their news, and said that they had done wrong to make an assault on the wall, whereas they ought to have endeavoured to take the city by undermining and other stratagems of war, especially as they had the example of Abimelech, the son of Gideon, who would needs attempt to take the tower of Thebez<sup>1</sup> by storm, and was killed by a large stone thrown at him by an old woman, and although he was a man of great prowess, died ignominiously from the dangerous manner of his assault. He said that they should have remembered this, and not gone near the enemy's wall, for the best method of making war with success was to call to mind the incidents of former wars, and what good or bad success had attended them in the like dangers, that so they might imitate the one, and avoid the other. As the king was in this disposition, the messenger told him that Uriah was slain also, whereupon he was pacified, and bade the messenger go back to Joab, and tell him that this misfortune was a common one, and one to be naturally expected in war, in which sometimes one side would have success, sometimes another, and he ordered him to go on still in his care about the siege, that no ill accident might befall him in it again; let them raise bulwarks, and use machines in besieging the city; and when they had captured it, let them overturn its very foundations, and destroy all those that were in it. And the messenger carried the king's message with which he was charged, and hastened back to Joab. And when Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah, was informed of the death of her husband, she mourned for his death many days; and when her mourning was over, and the tears which she shed for Uriah were dried up, the king took her to wife at once, and had a son by her.

phet in his sleep, and complained of the king. Now Nathan was a discreet and prudent man, and considering that kings, when they fall into a passion, are guided more by that passion than by justice, he resolved to conceal the threats that proceeded from God, and made a useful discourse to him in the following manner. He desired that the king would give him his opinion in the following case. "There were (he said) two men in one city, the one rich and the other poor; the rich man had a great many flocks of cattle, sheep, and kine, but the poor man had but one ewe lamb, which he brought up with his children, and let it eat its food with them, and had the same natural affection for it as one might have for a daughter. Now on the coming of a stranger to the rich man, he would not vouchsafe to kill any of his own flocks, and feast his friend thereon, but he sent for the poor man's lamb, and took it away from him, and dressed it for food, and thereon feasted the stranger." This discourse troubled the king exceedingly, and he declared to Nathan that the man was a wicked man who had the heart to do such a thing, and that it was but just that he should restore the lamb fourfold, and be punished with death also. Upon this Nathan immediately said that he was himself the man that ought to suffer that punishment by his own sentence, for it was he who had perpetrated this great and horrid crime. He also revealed to him and laid open before him the anger of God, who had made him king over all the Hebrews, and lord of all those many and great nations round about him; who had formerly delivered him out of the hands of Saul, and had given him wives whom he had justly and legally married; but now God was despised by him, and affronted by his impiety, since he had married and now lived with another man's wife; and, by exposing her husband to the enemy, had really slain him. He added that God would inflict punishment upon him on account of his wickedness, and that his own wives should be forced by one of his own sons; and that he should be plotted against by the same son; and that, although he had perpetrated his wickedness secretly, yet that punishment which he was to undergo should be inflicted publicly upon him. Moreover he told him that the boy born to him by Bathsheba should soon die. When the king was troubled and very confounded at this, and said with tears and sorrow that he had sinned (for he was without doubt a pious man, and guilty of no sin at all in his whole life except in the matter of Uriah), God had compassion on him, and was reconciled to him, and promised that he would preserve to him both his life and his kingdom: for he said he was no longer displeased with him seeing he repented of what he had done. And Nathan, when he had delivered this prophecy to the king, returned home.

§ 4. However, God sent a dangerous sickness on the child that David had by the wife of Uriah; at which the king was troubled, and took no food for seven days, although his servants almost forced him to take it, but clothed himself in a black garment, and lay prostrate upon the ground in sackcloth, entreating God for the recovery of the child, for he passionately loved the child's mother. And when on the seventh day the child died, the king's servants durst not tell him of it, supposing that, when he knew it, he would still less take food or any care of himself, because of his grief at the death of his son, since, when the child was only sick, he so greatly grieved for him. But when the king perceived that his servants were troubled, and seemed to be affected as people very desirous to conceal something, he understood that the child was dead, and when he had called one of the servants to him, and discovered that it was so, he rose up and had a bath, and put on a white garment, and went into the tabernacle of God. He also commanded them to set food before him, and so greatly surprised his kindred and servants, as he did nothing of the kind when the child was sick, but did all these things now he was dead. So having first begged leave to question him, they besought him to tell them the reason of his conduct. And he called them stupid, and explained to them how he hoped for the recovery of the child while it was alive, and accordingly did all that was proper for him to do, thinking by such means to render God propitious to him, but that now the child was dead, there was no longer any occasion for idle grief. When he had said this, they commended the king's wisdom and understanding. He then went in unto Bathsheba his wife, and she conceived and bare a son, who by the command of Nathan the prophet was called Solomou.

§ 5. Meantime Joab sorely distressed the Ammonites in the siege, by cutting off their water, and depriving them of other means of subsistence, till they were in the greatest want of meat and drink; for they depended only on one small well of water, and this they durst not drink too freely, lest it should entirely fail them. So he wrote to the king, and informed him thereof; and urged him to come himself and take the city, that he might have the honour of the victory ascribed to himself. Upon this letter from Joab, the king was pleased with his good-will and fidelity, and took with him his army, and came to the capture of Rabbah, and when he had taken it by storm, he gave it up to his soldiers to sack. And he himself took the king of the Ammonites' crown, whose weight was a talent of gold, and which had in its middle the precious stone called a sardonyx. And this crown David wore on his own head frequently. He also found in the city much splendid and costly spoil. As for the inhabitants, he tortured them to death; and when he had taken the other cities of the Ammonites by storm, he treated them in the same manner.

CHAP. VIII.

§ 1.

WHEN the king returned to Jerusalem, a sad misfortune befell his house, on the following occasion. He had a daughter, who was still a virgin, and very handsome, insomuch that she surpassed all the most beautiful women; her name was Tamar, and she had the same mother as Absalom. Now Amnon, David's eldest son, fell in love with her, and not being able to obtain his desires, on account of her virginity and the care taken of her, got into a bad way, and his grief so consumed his body, that he grew lean, and lost his colour. And one Jonathan, a kinsman and friend of his, discovered what ailed him, for he was an extraordinarily wise man, and of great sagacity. When therefore he saw every morning that Amnon was not in body as he ought to be, he came to him and desired him to tell him what was the cause of it: however he said he guessed it came from the passion of love. And when Amnon confessed his passion, and said that he was in love with a sister of his, who had the same father as himself, Jonathan suggested to him by what method and contrivance he might obtain his desires; for he advised him to pretend sickness, and bade him, when his father should come to see him, to beg of him that his sister might come and minister to him, for if that were done he would be better, and would quickly recover from his illness. So Amnon lay down on his bed, and pretended to be ill, as Jonathan had suggested. When his father came, and inquired how he did, he begged of him to send his sister to him, and David ordered her to be fetched at once. And when she was come Amnon bade her make cakes for him, and fry them in a pan, and do it all with her own hands, because he should fancy them better from her hands. So she kneaded the flour in the sight of her brother, and made him cakes, and cooked them in a pan, and brought them to him. But he would not taste them then, but gave orders to his servants to send all that were there out of his chamber, because he had a mind to repose free from noise and disturbance. As soon as what he had commanded was done, he asked his sister to bring the cakes into the inner chamber, and when the damsel had done so, he took hold of her, and endeavoured to persuade her to lie with him. Whereupon the damsel cried out and said, "Nay, brother, do not force me, nor be so wicked as to transgress the laws, and bring upon yourself dreadful shame. Curb this unrighteous and impure lust, from which our house will get nothing but reproach and ill-fame." She also advised him to speak to their father about it, for he would permit him to marry her. This she said being desirous to avoid her brother's violent passion at that moment. But he would not be persuaded, but being inflamed with love, and carried away by the vehemence of his passion, he forced his sister: but as soon as he had satisfied his lust, he hated her and insulted her, and bade her rise up and be gone. And when she said that this was more injurious treatment than the former, if, now he had forced her, he would not let her stay with him till the evening, but bade her go away in the daytime while it was light, that she might meet with people that would be witnesses of her shame, he commanded his servant to turn her out. And she was sorely grieved at the injury and outrage that had been done to her, and rent her tunic (for the virgins of old time wore such tunics tied at the hands and going down to the ankles, that the petticoats might not be seen), and sprinkled dust on her head, and went through the city, crying out and bewailing the violence that had been done her. And her brother Absalom happened to meet her, and asked her what sad thing had befallen her, that she was in that plight? and when she had told him the injury that had been done her, he comforted her, and desired her to be quiet and to take it patiently, and not to esteem her being outraged by her brother as an injury. So she yielded to his advice, and left off crying out, and discovering her outrage to the multitude, and she continued desolate with her brother Absalom a long time.

§ 2. When David his father knew this, he was grieved at the action of Amnon, but because he had an extraordinary affection for him, for he was his eldest son, he felt compelled not to punish him; but Absalom watched for a fit opportunity of avenging this crime on him, for he thoroughly hated him. Now the second year had elapsed after Amnon's wicked behaviour to his sister, and Absalom was about to shear his sheep at Belsephon,<sup>1</sup> a city in the portion of Ephraim, and asked his father and brothers to come and feast with him. And when David excused himself, as not wishing to be burdensome to him, Absalom begged he would send his brothers, whom he did send accordingly. And Absalom charged his servants, that when they should see Amnon disordered and drowsy with wine, and he should give them a nod, they should fear nobody but kill him.

§ 3. When they had done as they were commanded, the other brothers were alarmed and confounded, and afraid for themselves, so they immediately got on horseback, and rode away to their father; but someone got there first, and told David they were all slain by Absalom; whereupon he was overcome with sorrow at so many of his sons being killed at once, and that by their brother also, for the consideration that it was their brother that appeared to have slain them intensified his sorrow for them. And being completely unnerved by the tragedy, he neither inquired what was the reason for this slaughter, nor stayed to hear anything else, which yet it was but reasonable to have done, when so very great, and by its greatness so incredible, a misfortune was related to him, but he rent his clothes, and threw himself upon the ground and there lay, mourning for all his sons, both those who, as he was informed, were slain, and him who slew them. But Jonathan, the son of his brother Shimeah, entreated him not to indulge his sorrow so far, for as to the rest of his sons, he did not believe they were slain, for he found no ground for such a suspicion; but he said it might deserve inquiry as to Amnon, for it was not unlikely that Absalom might venture to kill him on account of the injury he had done to Tamar. In the mean time, a great galloping of horses, and a noise of people coming, attracted attention. It was the king's sons, who had fled away from the feast. So their father met them as they were in their grief, and he himself grieved with them, for it was more than he expected to see his sons again, as he had a little before heard that they had perished. So there were tears and lamentation on both sides; they lamenting their brother who was dead, and the king lamenting his son who was slaughtered. And Absalom fled to Geshur,<sup>1</sup> to his maternal grandfather who was king of that place, and he remained with him three whole years.

§ 4. Now David wished to send for Absalom, not to return to be punished, but that he might be with him, for his anger was abated by time. And Joab, the captain of his host, stirred him up to this even more; for he suborned a woman that was stricken in age to go to the king in mourning apparel, and she told him that two of her sons in clownish way had some difference, and in the progress of that difference came to an open quarrel, and nobody appearing to part them, one was smitten by the other and was dead, and she begged him to interpose in the case, and to do her the favour to save her son from her kindred, who were very desirous to have him that had slain his brother put to death, that she might not be deprived of the hopes she had of being taken care of in her old age by him, and he could do this for her by preventing the slaughter of her son by those that wished to kill him, and her kindred would not be restrained from their purpose by anything else than fear of him. And when the king had given his consent to what the woman begged of him, she made this reply to him, "I owe you thanks for your kindness to me in pitying my old age and almost entire childlessness, but in order to assure me of your kindness, be first reconciled to your own son, and cease to be angry with him. For how shall I persuade myself that you have really bestowed this favour upon me, while you yourself continue to be angry for a similar offence with your own son? for it is a foolish thing to lose wilfully another son, when the death of one has come about against your wish." And now the king perceived that this pretended story was a subornation of Joab, and of his contrivance, and when, upon inquiry of the old woman, he understood it to be so in fact, he called for Joab, and told him he had obtained what he wanted, and bade him bring Absalom back, for he was not now displeased, but had already ceased to be angry with him. So Joab bowed himself down to the king, and was glad at his words, and went immediately to Geshur, and brought back Absalom with him to Jerusalem.

§ 5. However, the king sent a message to his son beforehand, when he heard he was coming, and commanded him to retire to his own house, for he was not yet disposed to see him at once. Accordingly, upon his father's command, he avoided coming into his presence, and contented himself with the respect paid him by his household. Now his beauty was not impaired either by the grief he had undergone, or by the want of such care as was proper to be taken of a king's son, for he still surpassed and excelled all men in the beauty and tallness of his body, and outshone those that lived most luxuriously, and indeed such was the thickness of the hair of his head, that it was with difficulty that he was polled every eighth day, and his hair weighed two hundred shekels, which are equal to five minæ. And he dwelt in Jerusalem two years, having become the father of three sons and one daughter; the daughter was of very great beauty, and Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, took her to wife afterwards, and had by her a son named Abias. And Absalom sent to Joab, and desired him to pacify his father entirely towards him, and to beseech him to give him leave to come and see him and speak with him. But as Joab neglected to do so, Absalom sent some of his servants, and set fire to Joab's field, which was near him, and when Joab heard of it he went to Absalom, and accused him of what he had done, and asked him the reason why he had done so? To which Absalom replied, "I have found out this stratagem to bring you to me, as you have taken no care to perform the injunctions I laid upon you, which were to reconcile my father to me: and I beg of you now you are here to pacify my father's anger against me, for I esteem my return here more grievous than my banishment, as my father's wrath against me continues." Then Joab was persuaded, and pitied the distress that Absalom was in, and interceded to the king for him. And when he talked with David, he soon brought him to that friendly disposition towards Absalom, that he at once sent for him to come to him; and when he had cast himself down upon the ground, and begged for forgiveness for his offences, the king raised him up, and promised to forget what he had done.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning the Insurrection of Absalom against David ; and concerning Ahitophel and Hushai ; and concerning Ziba and Shimei ; and how Ahitophel hanged himself.

§ 1.

NOW Absalom, after his reconciliation with his father the king, got for himself a great many horses and chariots in a very little time. He had, moreover, fifty armour-bearers about his person, and came early every day to the king's palace, and spoke agreeably to such as came for justice and lost their cases, as if it happened for want of good counsellors about the king, or perhaps because the judges gave unjust sentences. So he gained the good-will of all, and told them, that had he the authority committed to him, he would dispense justice to them in a most equitable manner. When he had made himself in this way popular among the multitude, he thought he had already the good-will of the people secured to him, so when four years had elapsed since his father's reconciliation to him,<sup>1</sup> he went to him, and besought him to give him leave to go to Hebron, and pay a sacrifice to God, which he vowed when he fled from the country. So when David had granted his request, he went there, and great multitudes came flocking together to him, for he had sent to many to do so.

§ 2. Among them came Ahitophel the Gilonite,<sup>2</sup> a counsellor of David, and two hundred men from Jerusalem itself, who knew not his intentions, but were sent for as to a sacrifice. And Absalom was appointed king by all of them through this stratagem. As soon as the news was brought to David, and he was informed of what he did not expect from his son, he was alarmed at this his impious and bold undertaking, and wondered that he was so far from remembering how lately his offence had been forgiven, that he undertook much worse and more wicked enterprises still, first, to deprive him of the kingdom which was given him by God, and secondly, to take away his own father's life. He therefore resolved to flee to the parts beyond the Jordan, and he called his most intimate friends together, and communicated to them all that he heard of his son's desperate conduct. He committed himself to God to judge all his actions, and left the care of his royal palace to his ten concubines, and fled from Jerusalem, being willingly accompanied by the rest of the people, and by those six hundred armed men who had been with him in his first flight in the days of Saul. But he persuaded Abiathar and Zadok, the high priests, who had determined to go away with him, as also all the Levites, to stay with the ark, hoping that God would deliver him without its removal, and he charged them to let him know privately how all things went on : and he took with him Ahimaaz the son of Zadok and Jonathan the son of Abiathar as his faithful ministers in all things. Ittai the Gittite also went out with him, though David would have had him to stay, and on that account he appeared more friendly to him. And as the king was ascending the mount of Olives barefooted, and all his company were in tears, it was told him that Ahitophel was with Absalom and on his side. This news augmented his grief, and he besought God earnestly to alienate the mind of Absalom from Ahitophel, for he was afraid that he would persuade him to follow his pernicious counsel, for he was an able man and very keen in seeing what was advantageous. When David had reached the top of the mount, he looked back at the city, and prayed to God with abundance of tears, as if he had already lost his kingdom : and here it was that a faithful friend of his met him whose name was Hushai. When David saw him with his clothes rent, and dust on his head, and in lamentation for the great change of affairs, he comforted him and exhorted him to leave off grieving, and at last besought him to go back to Absalom, and appear as one of his party, and so fish out the secretest counsels of his mind, and oppose the advice of Ahitophel, for he could not do him as much good by going with him as he might by being with Absalom. So he was prevailed on by David, and left him, and went to Jerusalem, where Absalom himself came also a little while afterwards.

§ 3. When David was gone a little further, Ziba the servant of Mephibosheth (whom he had sent to take care of the possessions which had been given to the son of Jonathan and grandson of Saul), met him with a couple of asses laden with provisions, and desired him to take as much of them as he and his followers stood in need of. And when the king asked him where he had left Mephibosheth? he said he had left him in Jerusalem, expecting to be chosen king in the present confusion, in remembrance of the benefits Saul had conferred upon the nation. At this the king was greatly indignant, and gave to Ziba all that he had formerly bestowed on Mephibosheth; for he decided that it was much more right that he should have them than the other. At this Ziba greatly rejoiced.

§ 4. And when David was at Bahurim,<sup>1</sup> a place so called, there came out a kinsman of Saul's, whose name was Shimei, who threw stones at him, and uttered reproachful words: and as his friends stood about the king and protected him, he persevered still more in his reproaches, and called him a bloody man, and the author of all sorts of evils. He bade him also go out of the land as an impure and accursed wretch, and he thanked God for depriving him of his kingdom, and causing him to be punished by his own son for the injuries he had done his master Saul. Now when they were all provoked to anger against him, and particularly Abishai, who wished to kill Shimei, David restrained his anger, "Let us not," said he, "bring upon ourselves another fresh misfortune to those we have already, for indeed I have not the least regard or concern for this dog that raves at me: I submit myself to God, by whose permission this man treats me in such a savage manner; nor is it any wonder that I am obliged to undergo these abuses from him, since I experience the like from an impious son of my own; but perhaps God will have some compassion upon us, and if it be his will we shall overcome our enemies." So he went on his way without troubling himself about Shimei, who ran along the other side of the mountain, and threw out his abuse plentifully. And when David reached the Jordan, he allowed those that were with him to refresh themselves, for they were weary.

§ 5. But when Absalom and Ahitophel his counsellor were come to Jerusalem with all the people, David's friend Hushai came to them, and prostrated himself before Absalom, and prayed that his kingdom might last for ever and continue for all time. And Absalom said to him, "How comes it that he who was so intimate a friend of my father's, and appeared faithful to him in all things, is not with him now, but hath left him, and is come over to me?" Hushai's answer was very clever and prudent, for he said, "We ought to follow God and all the people. As therefore they, my lord and master, are with you, it is fit that I should follow them, for you have received the kingdom from God. I will therefore, if you believe me to be your friend, show the same fidelity and kindness to you which you know I have showed to your father: nor is there the least reason to be dissatisfied with the present state of affairs, for the kingdom is not transferred to another family, but remains still in the same, by son succeeding father." This speech persuaded Absalom, who before suspected Hushai. And now he called Ahitophel, and consulted with him what he should do; and he advised him to go in unto his father's concubines; for he said that the people would know and believe by this action that his difference with his father was irreconcilable, and would therefore fight with greater zeal against his father, for hitherto they were afraid of taking up open enmity against him, from the expectation that they would be reconciled again. And Absalom was prevailed on by this advice, and commanded his servants to pitch him a tent on the top of the royal palace, in the sight of the multitude; and he went in to it and lay with his father's concubines. Now this came to pass according to the prediction of Nathan, when he prophesied and told David that his son would rise up in rebellion against him.

§ 6. And when Absalom had done what he was advised to do by Ahitophel, he desired his opinion, in the second place, about the war against his father. Now, Ahitophel asked him to let him have ten thousand picked men, and he undertook to slay his father, and bring the soldiers back again in safety, and said that the kingdom would be secure to him only when David was dead. Absalom was pleased with this suggestion, and sent for Hushai, David's friend (for so did he call him), and informing him of the opinion of Ahitophel, he asked further what was his view on the matter? Now Hushai saw that if Ahitophel's counsel was followed, David would be in danger of being taken and slain, so he attempted to introduce a contrary opinion, and said: "You are not unacquainted, O king, with the valour of your father, and of those that are now with him, for he has made many wars, and has always come off with victory over his enemy. It is likely that he now stays in camp, for he is very skilful in stratagems, and in foreseeing the wiliness of his enemies, and will leave his own soldiers in the evening, and will either hide himself in some valley, or will place an ambush at some rock: so that when our army joins battle with him, his soldiers will retire for a little while, but will come upon us again, being encouraged by the king's being near them; and meantime your father will show himself suddenly in the time of the battle, and will infuse courage into his own people when they are in danger, and bring consternation to yours. Consider therefore my advice and reason upon it, and if you acknowledge it to be the best, reject the opinion of Ahitophel. And send round to the entire country of the Hebrews, and bid them come and fight against your father; and do you yourself take over the army, and be your own general in the war, and do not trust its management to another. And expect to conquer him with ease, when you take him in the open with his few followers, having yourself many myriads desirous of showing to you their zeal and energy. And if your father shall shut himself up in some city and stand a siege, we will overthrow that city by machines of war and undermining." When Hushai had said this, he obtained his point against Ahitophel, for his opinion was preferred by Absalom to the other's: but it was God who made the counsel of Hushai appear best to the mind of Absalom.

§ 7. Then Hushai hastened to the high priests Zadok and Abiathar, and told them the counsel of Ahitophel and his own, and that it had been decided to follow his. He therefore bade them send to David and tell him of it, and inform him of what had been resolved upon, and exhort him further to pass quickly over the Jordan, lest his son should change his mind, and make haste to pursue him, and so get the start of him and take him before he could be in safety. Now the high priests had their sons concealed outside the city on purpose, that they might carry news to David of what was going on. So they sent a maid-servant whom they could trust, to carry them the news of Absalom's determination, and ordered them to signify the same to David with all speed. And they lost no time and made no delay, but taking with them their fathers' injunctions, became pious and faithful ministers, and judging quickness and speed the best mark of faithful service, made haste to meet David. But certain horsemen saw them when they were two furlongs from the city, and informed Absalom of them, who immediately sent some men to take them; but when the sons of the high priests perceived this, they left the high road at once, and betook themselves to a certain village not far from Jerusalem called Bahurim; there they desired a certain woman to hide them, and give them security. And she let the young men down by a rope into a well, and laid fleeces of wool over them, and when those that pursued them came to her, and asked her whether she had seen them, she did not deny that she had seen them, for they had stayed with her some time, she said, and then gone away, and she foretold them that if they would follow them directly, they would catch them. But when after a long pursuit they did not catch them, they came back again; and when the woman saw that they had returned, and that there was no longer any fear of the young men being caught by them, she drew them up by the rope, and bade them go on their errand. And they used great diligence in the prosecution of their journey, and got to David, and informed him accurately of all the plans of Absalom. And he commanded those that were with him to pass over the Jordan while it was night, and not to delay at all on that account.

§ 8. But Ahitophel, on rejection of his advice, got upon his ass and rode away to his own city, Gilon;<sup>1</sup> and calling his family together, he told them in detail the advice he had given Absalom, and since he had not been persuaded by it, he said he would certainly perish, and that in no long time, for David would overcome him, and return to his kingdom again. So he said it was better that he should take his own life away with freedom and magnanimity, than expose himself to be punished by David, in opposition to whom he had acted entirely for Absalom. When he had thus discoursed to them, he went into the innermost room of his house, and hanged himself. Such was the death of Ahitophel, who was self-condemned, and when his relations had cut him down from the rope, they took care of his funeral. As for David, he passed over the Jordan, as I have said already, and came to Mahanaim,<sup>2</sup> a very fine and very strong city. And all the chief men of the country received him with great pleasure, both from the shame they had that he should have been forced to flee away [from Jerusalem], and from the respect they bore him when he was in his former prosperity. These were Barzillai the Gileadite, and Siphar the ruler of the Ammanites, and Machir the principal man in Gilead; and they furnished him with plentiful provisions for himself and his followers, insomuch that they wanted neither beds nor blankets, nor loaves of bread, nor wine; they brought them also a great many cattle for slaughter, and offered them whatever they wanted for their refreshment and food when they were weary, in plentiful supply.

CHAP. X.

§ 1.

SUCH was the state of David and his followers. But Absalom mustered together a large army of the Hebrews against his father, and crossed over the river Jordan, and encamped not far from Mahanaim in the region of Gilead. He appointed Amasa to be captain of all his army, instead of Joab his kinsman. The father of Amasa was Ithra, and the mother Abigail: both she and Zeruah, the mother of Joab, were David's sisters. But when David had numbered his followers, and found them to be about four thousand, he resolved not to wait till Absalom attacked him, but set over his men captains of thousands and captains of hundreds, and divided his army into three parts: one part he committed to Joab, the next to Abishai, Joab's brother, and the third to Ittai, David's companion and friend, though he came from the city of Gath.<sup>1</sup> And when he was desirous of fighting himself among them, his friends would not let him, checking him on very wise grounds. "For," (said they,) "if we be conquered when he is with us, we have lost all our good hopes of recovering ourselves; but if we should be beaten in one part of our army, the other parts may retire to him, and may thereby prepare a greater force, while the enemy will naturally suppose that he has another army with him." And David was pleased with this advice, and resolved himself to tarry at Mahanaim. And as he sent his friends and commanders to the battle, he desired them to show all possible zeal and fidelity, and to bear in mind what benefits they had received from him; and he begged of them to spare the young man Absalom, lest he should do himself some mischief if he should be killed. And thus did he send out his army to battle, and prayed for their victory therein.

§ 2. And Joab put his army in battle array over against the enemy in the great plain, which had a wood behind it. Absalom also brought his army into the field to oppose him. On the opening of the battle both sides displayed great valour and boldness; the one side exposing themselves to the greatest hazards, and exhibiting the utmost zeal, that David might recover his kingdom, and the other side being no way deficient either in doing or suffering, that Absalom might not be deprived of the kingdom, and brought to punishment by his father for his impudent attempt against him. Those also that were the most numerous were anxious that they should not be conquered by the few that were with Joab and his under officers, for that would be the greatest disgrace to them, while David's soldiers strove greatly to overcome so many myriads of the enemy. So the battle was stoutly contested, but David's men were the conquerors, being superior in strength and skill in war; so they followed the others as they fled away through coppices and valleys; some they took prisoners, and many they slew, and more in the flight than in the battle, for there fell about twenty thousand that day. And all David's men hotly pursued Absalom, for he was easily known by his beauty and height. He was himself also afraid that his enemies would capture him, so he got upon the royal mule and fled; but as he was borne with rapidity and unsteady motion, being himself light, he entangled his hair in the large boughs of a knotty tree that spread a great way, and there hung in a marvellous manner; and as for the beast, it went on swiftly as if its master had been still upon its back, but he, hanging in the air upon the boughs, was taken by his enemies. And when one of David's soldiers saw him, he informed Joab, and when the general said, that if he had shot at and killed Absalom, he would have given him fifty shekels, he replied, "I would not have killed my master's son if you would have given me a thousand shekels, especially as he begged that the young man might be spared in the hearing of us all." But Joab bade him show him where it was that he saw Absalom hanging, and shot him to the heart and slew him, and Joab's armour-bearers stood round about the tree, and pulled down his dead body, and cast it into a large obscure pit, and threw stones upon him till it was filled up, when it had both the appearance and dimensions of a grave. Then Joab sounded the retreat, and recalled his own soldiers from pursuing the enemy's army, wishing to spare his fellow-countrymen.

§ 3. Now Absalom had erected for himself a marble pillar<sup>1</sup> in the king's dale, two furlongs distant from Jerusalem, which he named Absalom's Hand, saying, if his children were killed, that his name would remain by that pillar. Now he had three sons, and one daughter named Tamar, as I said before, who was married to David's grandson Rehoboam, and bore a son, Abias by name, who succeeded his father in the kingdom: but of these I shall speak in a part of my history which will be more proper. And after the death of Absalom the people returned every one to their own homes.

§ 4. And now Ahimaaz the son of Zadok the high priest went to Joab, and desired he would permit him to go and tell David of this victory, and to bring him the good news that God had afforded him his assistance and care. However, he did not grant his request, but said to him, "Will you, who have always been the messenger of good news, go now and acquaint the king that his son is dead?" So he desired him to stay, and called Cushy, and committed the business to him, that he should tell the king what he had himself seen. But when Ahimaaz again desired him to let him go as a messenger, and assured him that he would only relate what concerned the victory, and would say nothing about the death of Absalom, he gave him leave to go to David. And he took a short cut which nobody knew but himself, and got before Cushy. Now as David was sitting between the gates, and waiting for somebody to come to him from the battle and tell him how it went, one of the watchmen saw Ahimaaz running, and before he could discern who he was, he told David that he saw somebody coming to him, and the king said he was a good messenger. A little while after he informed him that another messenger followed him; whereupon the king said that he also was a good messenger. But when the watchman recognized Ahimaaz, who was now very near, he gave the king notice that it was the son of Zadok the high priest who came running. Then David was very glad, and said he was a messenger of good tidings, and brought him news from the battle such as he would be glad to hear.

§ 5. While the king was saying this, Ahimaaz appeared and prostrated himself before the king, and when the king inquired of him about the battle, he said he brought him good news of victory and dominion. And when he inquired if he had any news about his son, he said that he came away directly the enemy was defeated, and that he heard a great shouting of those that pursued Absalom, but that he could learn no more, because of the haste he made when Joab sent him to inform the king of the victory. But when Cushai was come, and had prostrated himself, and informed the king of the victory, he asked him about his son, and he replied, "May the like misfortune befall your enemies as has befallen Absalom." That word did not permit either David or his soldiers to rejoice for the victory, though it was a very great one; but David went up to the highest part of the city,<sup>1</sup> and called his son by name, and beat his breast, tearing [the hair of] his head, and tormenting himself all manner of ways, and crying out, "O my son! I wish that I had died myself, and ended my days with you!" For David was of a tender natural affection, and had extraordinary love for this son in particular. But when the army and Joab heard that the king mourned so for his son, they were ashamed to enter the city in the guise of conquerors, and all came in dejected and in tears, as if they had been beaten. Now, while the king covered his face, and grievously lamented his son, Joab went in to him, and talked him round, and said, "My lord the king, you are not aware that you do yourself wrong by what you now do : for you seem to hate those that love you, and undergo dangers for you, nay, even yourself and your family, and to love those that are your bitter enemies, and to regret those that are no more, who have been justly slain. For had Absalom got the victory, and firmly settled himself in the kingdom, there would have been no vestige of us left, but all of us, beginning with yourself and your children, would have miserably perished, while our enemies would not have wept over us, but rejoiced over us, and punished those that pitied us in our misfortunes. And you are not ashamed to do this in the case of one that has been your bitter enemy, who, though he was your son, has proved so wicked. Leave off, therefore, your unreasonable grief, and come abroad and show yourself to the soldiers, and return them thanks for the zeal they showed in the fight; for I will myself this day persuade the people to leave you, and to give the kingdom to another, if you continue to act thus; and then I shall make you grieve bitterly and in earnest." Upon Joab's speaking thus to him, he made the king leave off his sorrow, and brought him to the consideration of his affairs. And David changed his behaviour, and showed himself so as to be seen by the multitude, and sat at the gates; whereupon all the people heard of it, and ran together to him, and saluted him. And this was the present state of David's affairs.

<sup>1</sup> Since David was now in Mahanaim, and in the open place of that city gate, which seems still to have been built the highest of any part of the wall, and since our other copies say, he 'went up to the chamber over the gate,' 2 Sam. xviii. 23, I think we ought to correct our present reading in Josephus, and for 'city' should read 'gate,' i. e. instead of the highest part of the 'city,' should say the highest part of the 'gate.' Accordingly, we find David presently in Josephus, as well as in our other copies, 2 Sam. xix. 8, sitting as before in the 'gate' of the city. —W.

CHAP. XI.

How David, when he had recovered his Kingdom, pardoned Shimei and Mephibosheth; and showed great Affection to Barzillai; and how, upon the Rise of a Sedition, he made Amasa Captain of his Host, in order to pursue Sheba; and how Amasa was slain by Joab.

§ 1.

NOW those Hebrews that had belonged to Absalom's party, and had escaped from the battle, when they had all returned home, sent messengers to every city to put them in mind of the benefits which David had bestowed upon them, and of the liberty which he had procured them, by delivering them from many and great wars. But they complained, that whereas they had ejected him out of his kingdom, and offered it to another, and this other whom they had set up was now dead, they did not beseech David to leave off his anger, and to become friends with them, and as before to resume the care of their affairs, and take over the kingdom again. This was often reported to David, notwithstanding he sent to Zadok and Abiathar the high priests, telling them to say to the rulers of the tribe of Judah that it would be a reproach upon them to permit the other tribes to choose David for their king before their tribe, and that as they were akin to him and of the same blood. He commanded them also to say the same to Amasa, the captain of their forces, and to tell him that though he was his sister's son, and yet had not persuaded the multitude to restore the kingdom to David, yet he might expect from him not only reconciliation, for that was already granted but the supreme command of the army also, which Absalom had bestowed upon him. Accordingly, the high priests, when they had discoursed with the rulers of the tribe, and said what the king had ordered them, persuaded Amasa to undertake the care of the king's affairs. And he persuaded his tribe to send immediately messengers to beseech the king to return to his kingdom. The same did all the Israelites, at the persuasion of Amasa.

§ 2. When the messengers went to the king, he returned to Jerusalem, and the tribe of Judah was the first that came to meet the king at the river Jordan. And Shimei, the son of Gera, came with a thousand men of the tribe of Benjamin whom he brought with him, and Ziba the freedman of Saul came with his fifteen sons and twenty servants. All these, with the tribe of Judah, laid a bridge over the river, that the king and those that were with him might cross over with ease. And as soon as he was come to the Jordan, the tribe of Judah saluted him. Shimei also went upon the bridge, and took hold of his feet, and prayed him to forgive his offence against him, and not to be bitter against him, nor to think fit to make him the first example in his new authority, but to consider that he had repented of his failure of duty, and had taken care to come first to him. While he was thus entreating the king, and moving him to compassion, Joab's brother Abishai said, "And shall not this man die for having cursed him whom God appointed to be king?" But David turned to him, and said, "Will ye never leave off, ye sons of Zeruiah? Do not, I pray, raise new troubles and seditions among us, now the former are over; for it is not right for you to be ignorant that I this day begin my reign, and therefore swear to remit all offenders their punishments, and not to proceed against any one that has sinned. Be you therefore, (said he,) Shimei, of good courage, and do not at all fear being put to death." Then Shimei prostrated himself before the king, and went on before him.

§ 3. Saul's grandson Mephibosheth also came to meet David, clothed in a dirty garment, and having his hair long and neglected; for after David fled away, he was in such grief, that he had not polled his head, nor washed his clothes, dooming himself to such neglect on occasion of the change in the king's affairs. Now he had been unjustly calumniated to the king by Ziba his steward. So when he had greeted the king, and prostrated himself before him, the king began to ask him, "Why ever he had not gone out of Jerusalem with him, and accompanied him during his flight?" He replied that it was all Ziba's fault, for when he was ordered to get things ready for his setting out, he paid no attention to him, but regarded him no more than if he had been a slave. "And indeed, had I had my feet sound and strong, I should not have been left behind you, for I could have made use of them in flight. But this is not all the injury that Ziba has done me, as to my duty to you, my lord and master; but he has calumniated me besides, and told lies about me to injure me, but I know your mind will not believe such calumnies, being just and loving the truth, which God also wishes to prevail. For when you were in the greatest danger of suffering at the hand of my grandfather, and when on that account our whole family deserved to perish, you were moderate and merciful, and quite forgot all those injuries, when, if you had remembered them, you had the power of punishing us for them. And you judged me to be your friend, and set me every day at your table, nor did I want anything which one of your own kinsmen held in highest honour could have expected." When he said this, David resolved neither to punish Mephibosheth, nor to condemn Ziba as having belied his master, but said to him, that as he had granted all his estate to Ziba, because he had not come along with him, so he now promised to forgive him, and ordered that half his estate should be restored to him. Whereupon Mephibosheth said, "Nay, let Ziba take all, it is enough for me that you have recovered your kingdom."

§ 4. Then David besought Barzillai the Gileadite, that great and good man, who had made a plentiful provision for the king at Mahanaim, and conducted him as far as the Jordan, to accompany him to Jerusalem, for he promised to treat him in his old age with all manner of honour, to take care of him as if he were his father, and provide for him. But Barzillai was so desirous to live at home that he entreated him to excuse him from attendance on him; and said that his age was too great to enjoy the pleasures [of a court,] for he was fourscore years old, and had therefore to make provision for his death and burial, so he begged him to gratify him in this desire, and dismiss him, for he had no relish of his meat or drink by reason of his age, and his ears were deaf to the sound of pipes, or the melody of other musical instruments, such as those that lived with kings delighted in. As he entreated for this so earnestly, the king said, "I dismiss you then, but you shall leave with me your son Chimham, and upon him will I bestow all sorts of good things." So Barzillai left his son with him, and prostrated himself before the king, and prayed for a prosperous conclusion of all his affairs according to his mind, and returned home. Then David went to Gilgal,<sup>1</sup> having already with him half the people of Israel, and all the tribe of Judah.

§ 5. Now the principal men of Israel came to him to Gilgal with a great multitude, and complained that the tribe of Judah had come to him secretly, whereas they ought all to have met him conjointly and unanimously. But the rulers of the tribe of Judah desired them not to be displeased at their having come first, for, said they, "We are David's kinsmen, and on that account we took more care of him, and loved him, and came first to him, but we did not for our early coming receive any gifts from him, to give them who came last any cause for vexation." When the rulers of the tribe of Judah had said this, the rulers of the other tribes were not content, but said, "O brothers, we cannot but wonder at you calling the king your kinsman alone, for he that has received from God the power over all of us, ought to be esteemed a kinsman of us all: for which reason, the whole people have eleven parts in him, and you but one part, we also are older than you, so you have not done justly in coming to the king in his stealthy and secret manner."

§ 6. While these rulers were disputing thus with one another, a certain wicked man who took pleasure in sedition, whose name was Sheba, the son of Bichri, of the tribe of Benjamin, stood up in the midst of the multitude, and cried aloud, and spoke thus to them: "We have no part in David, nor inheritance in the son of Jesse." And when he had spoken these words, he blew with a trumpet, and declared war against the king, and all Israel left David and followed him; the tribe of Judah alone remained with him, and settled him in his royal palace at Jerusalem. But as for the concubines, with whom Absalom his son had lain, he removed them to another house, and ordered those that had the care of them to supply them with all things necessary, but he came not near them any more. He also appointed Amasa as the captain of his forces, and gave him the post that Joab had before, and bade him muster out of the tribe of Judah as great an army as he could, and come to him within three days, that he might put his entire army into his hands, and send him to fight against the son of Bichri. Now, when Amasa was gone out, and made some delay in gathering the army together, and so had not returned on the third day, the king said to Joab, "It is not fit we should make any delay in this affair of Sheba, lest he get a numerous army about him, and be the occasion of greater mischief, and hurt our affairs more than Absalom did. Do not therefore wait any longer, but take what force you have at hand, and the six hundred, and your brother Abishai, and pursue after the enemy, and make him fight wherever you find him. Make haste to anticipate him, lest he seize upon some fortified cities, and cause us great labour and pains to dislodge him."

§ 7. And Joab resolved to make no more delay, but taking with him his brother and the six hundred, and giving orders that the rest of the army which was at Jerusalem should follow, he marched against Sheba; and when he was come to Gibeon,<sup>1</sup> a village forty furlongs from Jerusalem, Amasa met him with a great army. Now Joab was girded with a sword and had his breastplate on; and when Amasa came near him to salute him, he took particular care that his sword should fall out of the scabbard as if spontaneously. Then he took it up from the ground, and approached Amasa, who was then near him, as though he would kiss him, and took hold of Amasa's beard with his other hand, and stabbed him in the belly when he did not expect it, and slew him. This impious and altogether unholy action Joab did to a good young man, and his kinsman, and one that had done him no injury, merely out of jealousy that he would obtain the chief command of the army, and have equal rank with himself about the king, and it was for the same reason that he had killed Abner. But as to that former wicked action, the death of his brother Asahel, which he seemed to revenge, afforded him a decent pretext, and made that crime a pardonable one; but in this murder of Amasa there was no such excuse. And when Joab had killed his fellow-general, he pursued after Sheba, having left a man with the dead body, who was ordered to proclaim aloud to the army that Amasa was justly slain and deservedly punished, and to say to them, "If you be for the king, follow Joab his general, and Abishai Joab's brother." But as the body lay in the road, and all the multitude came running up to it, and, as is usual with a crowd, gaping and staring a great while at it, he that guarded it removed it thence, and carried it to a place very remote from the road, and there laid it, and covered it with his garment. When this was done, all the people followed Joab. Now as he pursued Sheba through all the country of Israel, a certain person told him that he was in a strong city called Abel-macheah,<sup>1</sup> so Joab went there, and besieged it with his army, and cast up a bank round it, and ordered his soldiers to undermine the walls, and to overthrow them; and since the people in the city would not admit him, he was greatly displeased at them.

§ 8. Now there was a woman in the city both wise and intelligent, who seeing her native place lying at the last extremity, climbed upon the walls, and through the armed men called for Joab; and when he came near, she began to say, "God gave us kings and generals of armies to drive out the enemies of the Hebrews, and to introduce universal peace among us, but you are endeavouring to overthrow and depopulate a metropolis of the Israelites, which has been guilty of no offence." But he replied, "God continue to be merciful unto me: I desire to avoid killing any of the people, much less would I destroy such a city as this: and if they will deliver me up Sheba, the son of Bichri, who has rebelled against the king, I will raise the siege, and withdraw the army." Now as soon as the woman heard what Joab said, she desired him to intermit the siege for a little while, for he should have the head of his enemy thrown out to him at once. So she went down to the citizens, and said to them, "Will you be so wretched as to perish miserably, with your children and wives, for the sake of a vile fellow, and one whom nobody knows anything about? And will you have him for your king instead of David, who has been so great a benefactor to you, and will you oppose one city to such a mighty and strong army?" So she prevailed with them, and they cut off the head of Sheba, and threw it into Joab's army. When this was done, the king's general sounded a retreat, and raised the siege. And when he had returned to Jerusalem, he was again appointed general of all the people. The king also made Benaiah captain of the body-guards and of the six hundred. He also set Adoram over the tribute, and Sabathes and Achilauus over the records, and made Susa the scribe, and appointed Zadok and Abiathar as the high priests.

CHAP. XII.

How the Hebrews were delivered from a Famine, when the Gibeonites had caused punishment to be inflicted for those of them that had been slain: as also what great Actions were performed against the Philistines by David and the Men of Valour with him.

§ 1.

AFTER this, when the country was grievously afflicted with a famine, David besought God to have mercy on the people, and to discover to him what was the cause of it, and how a remedy might be found for it. And the prophets answered, that God would have the Gibeonites avenged, whom king Saul had been so wicked as to betray to slaughter, violating the oath which the general Joshua and the senate had sworn to them. If, therefore, said God, the king would permit such vengeance to be taken for those that were slain, as the Gibeonites should desire, he promised that he would be reconciled to them, and free the people from the famine. As soon therefore as the king learned from the prophets that it was this which God sought, he sent for the Gibeonites, and asked them, What they would have? and when they asked to have seven sons of the race of Saul delivered up to them to be punished, he delivered them up, but spared Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan. And when the Gibeonites had received the men, they punished them as they pleased; upon which God began to send rain at once, and to make the earth again bring forth its fruits as usual, and to free it from the previous drought, so that the country of the Hebrews flourished again. Not long afterwards the king made war against the Philistines, and when he had joined battle with them, and put them to flight, he was left alone as he was in pursuit of them; and when he was quite tired out, he was descried by one of the enemy, whose name was Acmon, the son of Araph; he was one of the sons of the giants. He had a spear, the handle of which weighed three hundred shekels, and a breastplate of chain work, and a sword. He turned and rushed violently to slay David, who was quite tired out, but Abishai, Joab's brother, appeared on the sudden, and protected the king with his shield as he lay down, and slew the enemy. Now the people were very uneasy at this danger and near escape of the king, and the rulers made him swear that he would no more go out with them to battle, lest he should come to some great misfortune by his courage and boldness, and thereby deprive the people of the benefits they now enjoyed through him, and those they might hereafter enjoy by his living a long time with them.

§ 2. When the king heard that the Philistines were gathered together at the city of Gazar,<sup>1</sup> he sent an army against them, when Sobacches the Hittite, one of David's most courageous men, behaved himself so as to deserve great commendation, for he slew many of those who bragged that they were the posterity of the giants, and vaunted themselves highly on their bravery, and so was the occasion of victory to the Hebrews. And after that defeat the Philistines made war again: and when David sent an army against them, Nephan his kinsman won great renown, for he fought in single combat with the stoutest of all the Philistines, and slew him, and put the rest to flight. Many of them also were slain in the flight. And a little while after this the Philistines pitched their camp at the city of Gath,<sup>1</sup> which lay not far off the borders of the country of the Hebrews. They had a man who was six cubits tall, and had on each of his feet and hands one more toe and finger than men naturally have. Now Jonathan, the son of Shimea, out of the army sent against them by David, fought this man in single combat, and slew him; and as he was the person who gave the turn to the battle, he gained the greatest reputation for courage therein. This Philistine also vaunted himself to be of the sons of the giants. But after this fight the Philistines made war no more against the Israelites.

§ 3. And now David being freed from wars and dangers, and enjoying for the rest of his reign profound peace, composed songs and hymns to God in several kinds of metre: some of those which he made were trimeters, and some pentameters. He also made instruments of music, and taught the Levites to sing hymns to God, both on the Sabbath-day, and on the other festivals. Now this was the construction of the instruments: the lyre was an instrument of ten strings played upon with a plectron, the psaltery had twelve musical notes and was played upon by the fingers, the cymbals were broad and large instruments made of brass. And so much shall suffice to say about these instruments, that the reader may not be wholly unacquainted with their nature.

§ 4. Now all the men that were about David were men of courage. Those of them that were most illustrious and famous for their actions were thirty-eight; of five of whom only I will relate the performances, for these will suffice to make manifest the virtues of the others also; for these were powerful enough to subdue countries, and conquer great nations. First then was Jessamus, the son of Achemæus, who frequently rushed upon the ranks of the enemy, and did not leave off fighting till he overthrew nine hundred of them. The second was Eleazar, the son of Dodo, who was with the king at Arasam.<sup>1</sup> This man once, when the Israelites were in consternation at the multitude of the Philistines, and were running away, stood his ground alone, and fell upon the enemy, and slew many of them, till his sword stuck to his hand from the blood he had shed, and till the Israelites, seeing the Philistines routed by him, came down from the mountains and pursued them, and at that time won a surprising and famous victory, for Eleazar slew the men, and the multitude followed and spoiled their dead bodies. The third was Cesabæus, the son of Ilus. Now this man, when, in the wars against the Philistines, they pitched their camp at a place called Lehi,<sup>2</sup> and when the Hebrews were again afraid of the enemy and fled, stood his ground alone as if an army and body of men, and some of them he slew, and others who were not able to abide his strength and force, but fled away, he pursued. These were the works of their hands, and of fighting, which these three performed. And once, when the king was at Jerusalem, and the army of the Philistines came against him to fight him, David went up to the top of the citadel, as I have already said, to inquire of God concerning the battle, while the enemy's camp lay in the valley that extends to the city of Bethlehem,<sup>3</sup> which is twenty furlongs from Jerusalem. Now David said to his companions, "We have excellent water in my own city, especially that which is in the pit near the gate," wondering if anyone would bring him some of it to drink: for he said he would rather have it than a great deal of money. When these three men heard what he said, they ran off immediately, and burst through the midst of the enemy's camp, and went to Bethlehem, and when they had drawn the water, they returned again through the enemy's camp to the king, and the Philistines were so surprised at their boldness and stout-heartedness, that they kept quiet, and did nothing against them, as if they despised their small number. But when the water was brought to the king, he would not drink it, for he said that it was got by the danger and blood of the men, and that it was not right on that account to drink it. So he poured it out to God, and gave him thanks for the safety of the men. The fourth was Abishai, Joab's brother, who in one day slew six hundred of the enemy. The fifth was Benaiah, by lineage a priest; who, being challenged by [two] eminent brothers in the country of Moab, overcame them by his valour. And again, when an Egyptian of vast size challenged him, though he was unarmed, he killed him with his own spear which he threw at him, for he snatched his javelin, and took away his weapons, while he was alive and fighting, and slew him with them. One might also add the following to the forementioned actions of the same man, either as the bravest of them, or equal to the rest. When God sent a snow, a lion slipped and fell into a certain pit, and because the pit's mouth was narrow, it was evident the lion would perish, being enclosed in the snow, so as it saw no way to get out and save itself, it roared. When Benaiah heard the wild beast, for he was passing by at the time, at the roaring it made, he went down to the mouth of the pit, and smote it as it struggled with a club that was in his hand, and immediately slew it. The other thirty-three were like these in valour also.

CHAP. XIII.

How, when David numbered the People, they were punished, and how the Divine Compassion stopped their Punishment.

§ 1.

NOW king David was desirous to know how many myriads of the people there were, but he forgot the commands of Moses, who had said beforehand, that if the multitude were numbered, they were to pay half a shekel to God per head. And the king commanded Joab, the captain of his host, to go and number the whole multitude: but though he said there was no necessity for such a census, the king was not persuaded, but enjoined him to make no delay, but to go about the numbering of the Hebrews at once. Then Joab took with him the heads of the tribes, and the scribes, and went over the country of the Israelites, and took a census of the people, and returned to Jerusalem to the king nine months and twenty days after, and gave in to the king the number of the people, with the exception of the tribe of Benjamin, for he did not number that tribe, or the tribe of Levi, for the king repented of his having sinned against God. Now the number of the rest of the Israelites was nine hundred thousand men able to bear arms and go to war, and the tribe of Judah by itself was four hundred thousand men.

§ 2. Now when the prophets had signified to David that God was angry with him, he began to entreat and beseech him to be merciful to him and forgive him his sin. Then God sent Gad the prophet to him to offer him the choice of three things, that he might select which he liked best: whether he would have famine come upon the country for seven years? or would have a war, and be subdued three months by his enemies? or whether God should send a pestilence and plague upon the Hebrews for three days? But as he was reduced to a fatal choice of great miseries, he was sorely troubled and confounded; and when the prophet said he must make his choice, and ordered him to answer quickly, that he might report his choice to God, the king reasoned with himself, that in case he should ask for famine, he would appear to do it for others, and without risk to himself, since he had a great deal of corn hoarded up, but to the harm of his people, and in case he should choose to be conquered by his enemies for three months, he would appear to have chosen war because he had valiant men about him and strongholds, and so feared nothing therefrom, therefore he chose that affliction which is common to kings and their subjects, and in which the fear was equal to all, and observed that it was much better to fall into the hands of God than into those of the enemy.

§ 3. When the prophet received this answer, he reported it to God; who thereupon sent a pestilence and mortality upon the Hebrews. But they did not die after one and the same manner, nor so that it was easy to know what their malady was, for the miserable disease was one indeed, but it carried them off by ten thousand causes and occasions, which those that were stricken could not understand. For one died after another, and the terrible malady seized them before they were aware, and brought them quickly to their end, some giving up the ghost suddenly with very great and sharp pains, and some being worn away by their sufferings, and having very little left to be buried, being as soon as ever they fell sick entirely macerated; some were choked, and wailed aloud, being also stricken with sudden darkness; and some there were, who fell down dead as they were burying a relation, without finishing the funeral. And there perished by this pestilence, which began in the morning and lasted till the hour of dinner, seventy thousand. And the angel stretched out his hand over Jerusalem, to send this terrible judgment upon it. But David put on sackcloth and lay on the ground, begging and entreating God that the plague might now cease, and that he would be satisfied with those that had already perished. And when the king looked up into the air, and saw the angel borne along thereby towards Jerusalem with his sword drawn, he said to God that he, the shepherd, might justly be punished, but that the sheep ought to be preserved not having sinned at all, and he implored God that he would send his wrath upon him and upon all his family, but spare the people.

§ 4. And God heard his supplication and caused the pestilence to cease, and sent the prophet Gad to him, and commanded him to go up immediately to the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite, and build there an altar to God, and offer sacrifices. When David heard that, he did not disobey, but hastened at once to the place appointed him. Now Araunah was threshing wheat, and when he saw the king and all his servants coming to him, he ran up to him, and prostrated himself before him: he was by race a Jebusite, but a particular friend of David, who for that reason did him no harm when he overthrew the city, as I pointed out a little back. And when Araunah inquired, "Wherefore is my lord come to his servant?" David answered that he came to buy of him his threshing-floor, that he might build thereon an altar to God, and offer a sacrifice. Araunah replied, that he freely gave him both the threshing-floor and ploughs and oxen for a burnt-offering, and he prayed that God would graciously accept his sacrifice. But the king made answer, that he took his generosity and magnanimity kindly, and accepted his goodwill, but he desired him to take the price of them all, for it was not right to offer a sacrifice that cost nothing. And when Araunah said he might do as he pleased, he bought the threshing-floor of him for fifty shekels. And when the king had built an altar, he performed divine service, and offered a burnt-offering and peace-offerings also. With these God was pacified, and became gracious again. Now it happened that Abraham came to offer up his son Isaac for a burnt-offering at this very place,<sup>1</sup> and when the youth was about to have his throat cut, a ram appeared on a sudden standing by the altar, which Abraham sacrificed in the stead of his son, as I have before related. Now when king David saw that God had heard his prayer, and had graciously accepted of his sacrifice, he resolved to call that entire place the altar of all the people, and to build a temple to God there. This word he uttered very appositely to what was to be done afterwards, for God sent the prophet to him, and told him, that the son who was to succeed him in the kingdom should there build him a temple.

<sup>1</sup> What Josephus adds here is very remarkable, that this mount Moriah was not only the very place where Abraham offered up Isaac long ago, but that God had foretold to David by a prophet, that here his son should build him a temple; which is not directly in any of our copies, though very agreeable to what is in them, particularly to 1 Chron. xxi. 26-28, and xxii. 1, to which places I refer the reader.—W.

CHAP. XIV.

How David made great Preparations for the House of God, and how upon Adonijah's Attempt to gain the Kingdom, he appointed Solomon to reign.

§ 1.

AFTER the delivery of this prophecy, the king commanded the strangers to be numbered, and they were found to be one hundred and eighty thousand. He appointed fourscore thousand of these to be hewers of stone, and the rest of the multitude to carry the stones, and of them he set three thousand five hundred over the workmen. He also prepared a great quantity of iron and brass for the works, and many exceeding large cedar trees, the Tyrians and Sidonians sending them to him, for he had asked them for a supply of those trees. And he told his friends that these things were now prepared, that he might leave materials ready for the building of the temple to his son who was to reign after him, and that he might not have to provide them then, as he was very young, and unskilful in such matters because of his youth, but might have them lying by him to complete the work.

§ 2. Then David called his son Solomon, and charged him, when he received the kingdom, to build a temple to God, and said, "I intended to build to God a temple myself, but he prohibited me, because I was polluted with blood and wars, but he foretold that Solomon, my youngest son, who should be called by that name, over whom he has promised to take the care that a father takes over his son, should build him a temple; and that he would make the country of the Hebrews happy in his days, not only in other respects, but by giving it peace and freedom from wars and from internal dissensions, which is the greatest of all blessings. Since, therefore, you were designed king by God himself before you were born, endeavour to make yourself worthy of his providence, as in other respects, so particularly in being religious and righteous and courageous. Keep also his commandments and laws, which he has given us by Moses, and do not permit others to break them. Be zealous also to dedicate to God the temple which he hath chosen to be built in your reign, and be not dismayed at the vastness of the work, nor set about it timorously, for I will make all things ready for you before I die: and take notice, that there are already ten thousand talents of gold, and a hundred thousand talents of silver, collected together. I have also stored up brass and iron without number, and an immense quantity of timber and stones. Moreover, you have many myriads of stone-cutters and carpenters; and if you want anything more, you yourself will add it. And if you carry through this work, you will be acceptable to God, and have him for your patron." David also further exhorted the rulers of the people to assist his son in the building, and to attend to the divine service, when they should be free from all evils, for so they would enjoy instead of them peace and order, blessings with which God rewards such as are religious and righteous. He also gave orders, that when the temple should be built, they should put the ark in it, and the holy vessels; and he told them, that they would have had a temple long ago, if their fathers had not been negligent of God's commands, who had given it in charge, that when they had got the possession of this land, they should build him a temple. Thus did David discourse to the chiefs of the people and to his son.

§ 3. David was now in years, and his body was become by time cold and numb, insomuch that he could get no heat by covering himself with many clothes; and when the physicians consulted together, they recommended that a beautiful virgin, chosen out of the whole country, should sleep by the king's side, and communicate heat to him, and remedy his numbness. Now a woman of superior beauty to all other women was found in the city (her name was Abishag), who, sleeping with the king, only communicated warmth to him, for he was so old that he could not have sexual intercourse with her. But of this virgin I shall speak more presently.

§ 4. Now the fourth son of David was a beautiful and tall young man, born to him by his wife Haggith. He was called Adonijah, and in disposition resembled Absalom, and exalted himself hoping to be king, and told his friends that he ought to succeed David. He also prepared many chariots and horses, and had fifty men as outriders. When his father saw this, he did not reprove him, nor restrain him from his purpose, nor did he go even so far as to ask why he did so. Now Adonijah's partisans were Joab the captain of the army, and Abiathar the high priest; and the only persons that opposed him were Zadok the high priest, and the prophet Nathan, and Benaiah who was captain of the body-guards, and Shimei David's friend, and all the most mighty men. Now Adonijah had prepared a feast outside the city, near the fountain that was in the king's park,<sup>1</sup> and had invited all his brothers except Solomon, and had taken with him Joab the captain of the army, and Abiathar, and the chiefs of the tribe of Judah; but had not invited to this feast either Zadok the high priest, or Nathan the prophet, or Benaiah the captain of the body-guards, or any of the opposite party. The matter was told to Bathsheba, Solomon's mother, by Nathan the prophet, how Adonijah was king and David knew nothing of it; and he advised her to save herself and her son Solomon, and to go alone to David and remind him that he had sworn that Solomon should reign after him, but meantime Adonijah had already usurped the kingdom. He added that he would himself come after her, and when she had told the matter to the king, would confirm what she said. And Bathsheba hearkened to Nathan, and went in to the king, and prostrated herself before him, and when she had desired leave to speak with him, she told him all things as Nathan had suggested to her; and related the feast Adonijah had made, and who were invited by him, as Abiathar the high priest, and Joab the general, and all David's sons, except Solomon and his intimate friends. She also said, that all the people had their eyes upon him, to know whom he would choose for their king. She begged him also to consider how, after his death, Adonijah, if he were king, would slay her, and her son Solomon.

§ 5. Now, as Bathsheba was still speaking, the keepers of the king's chambers told him that Nathan desired to see him. And when the king commanded that he should be admitted, he came in, and asked him, whether he had that day made Adonijah king, and delivered the kingdom to him, for he had made a splendid feast, and invited all the king's sons except Solomon, as also Joab the captain of the host [and Abiathar the high priest], "who are feasting with shouting and merriment, and praying that his kingdom may last for ever; but he has not invited me, nor Zadok the high priest, nor Benaiah the captain of the body-guards; and it is but right that all should know whether this be done with your approbation." When Nathan had said this, the king commanded that they should call Bathsheba to him, for she had gone out of the room when the prophet went in. And when Bathsheba returned, David said, "I swear by Almighty God, that thy son Solomon shall certainly be king, as I formerly swore, and that he shall sit upon my throne, and that this very day." Then Bathsheba prostrated herself before him, and wished him a long life, and the king sent for Zadok the high priest, and for Benaiah the captain of the body-guards; and when they were come, he ordered them to take with them Nathan the prophet, and all the armed men about the palace, and to set his son Solomon upon the king's mule, and to carry him out of the city to the fountain [called Gihon,<sup>1</sup>] and to anoint him there with the holy oil, and to declare him king. This he charged Zadok the high priest and Nathan the prophet to do, and commanded them to follow Solomon through the midst of the city, and to sound the trumpets, and to cry aloud, "May Solomon the king sit upon the royal throne for ever," that so all the people might know that he was declared king by his father. He also gave Solomon a charge concerning the kingdom, to rule the whole nation of the Hebrews and the tribe of Judah religiously and righteously. And when Benaiah had prayed that God would be favourable to Solomon, they set Solomon without delay upon the royal mule, and escorted him out of the city to the fountain, and anointed him with oil, and brought him back to the city again with acclamations and prayers that his kingdom might continue a long time; and when they had brought him into the king's house, they set him upon the throne. Thereupon all the people betook themselves to merriment and feasting, dancing and delighting themselves with musical pipes, till both the earth and air echoed with the numerous instruments of music.

§ 6. Now when Adonijah and his guests heard this noise, they were greatly alarmed, and Joab, the captain of the host, said he was not pleased with that music nor the sound of the trumpets. And when the feast was set before them, nobody tasted of it, but they were all very thoughtful and grave. And Jonathan, the son of Abiathar the high priest, came running to them; and when Adonijah saw the young man gladly, and hailed him as a good messenger, he declared to them the whole matter about Solomon, and the determination of King David; and both Adonijah and all his guests rose hastily from the banquet, and fled everyone to their own homes. Adonijah also, being afraid of the king for what he had done, became a suppliant to God, and took hold of the horns of the altar, which were prominent. It was told Solomon that he had so done, and that he desired to receive assurances from him, that he would not bear malice against him for what he had done, nor inflict a severe punishment. Solomon answered very mildly and prudently, that he forgave him this offence, but said that if he were detected again in any attempt at revolution, he would be the author of his own punishment. So he sent and raised him up from his place of supplication. And when he went to the king, and prostrated himself before him, the king bade him go away to his own house, and have no suspicion of any harm, and desired him to show himself henceforward a good man, as it would be for his advantage.

§ 7. And David, wishing to declare his son king over all the people, called together to Jerusalem their rulers, and the priests and Levites; and having first numbered the Levites, he found them to be thirty-eight thousand from thirty years old to fifty, of whom he appointed twenty-three thousand to take care of the building of the temple, and six thousand to be judges of the people and their scribes, and four thousand as porters of the house of God, and as many as singers, to sing to the instruments which David had provided, as I said before. He divided them also into families, and when he had separated the priests from the tribe, he found of those priests twenty-four families, sixteen of the house of Eleazar, and eight of that of Ithamar; and he ordained that one family should minister to God eight days, from Sabbath to Sabbath. And thus were the families distributed by lot, in the presence of David, and Zadok and Abiathar the high priests, and all the rulers; and the family which came up first was written down first, and that which came up second as second, and so on to the twenty-fourth: and that settlement has remained to this day. He also made twenty-four divisions of the tribe of Levi, and when they cast lots, they came up in the same manner for their courses of eight days. He also honoured the posterity of Moses, and made them the keepers of the treasures of God, and of the offerings of the kings. He also ordained that all the tribe of Levi, as well as the priests, should serve God night and day, as Moses had enjoined them.

§ 8. After this he divided the entire army into twelve parts, each with its leaders and captains of hundreds and commanders. Now every part had twenty-four thousand, who were ordered to wait on Solomon thirty days at a time, from the first day till the last, with the captains of thousands and captains of hundreds. He also set over every part as rulers such as he knew to be good and righteous men. He also set others to take charge of the treasures, and of the villages, and of the fields, and of the cattle, whose names I do not think it necessary to mention.

§ 9. When David had ordered all these offices in the manner just mentioned, he convoked the rulers of the Hebrews, and their heads of tribes, and the officers over the several divisions, and those that were set over every work or property, and standing upon a very high platform, spoke to the multitude as follows. "My brothers and fellow-countrymen, I would have you know that I intended to build a house for God, and got together a large quantity of gold, and a hundred thousand talents of silver, but God forbade me by the prophet Nathan, because of the wars I had had on your account, and because my right hand was polluted with the slaughter of our enemies; but he commanded my son, who was to succeed me in the kingdom, to build him a temple. Now, therefore, since you know that of the twelve sons whom Jacob our forefather had, Judah was appointed to be king, and that I was preferred before my six brothers, and received the kingdom from God, and that none of them were uneasy at it, so do I also desire that my sons be not factious, now Solomon has received the kingdom, but accept him cheerfully for their lord, knowing that God has chosen him. For it is not a grievous thing to obey even a foreigner as a ruler, if it be God's will, but it is matter for rejoicing when a brother has obtained that dignity, since the other brothers partake of it with him. And I pray that the promises of God may be fulfilled, and that this happiness which he has promised to bestow upon king Solomon may spread over all the country, and continue therein for all time to come. And these promises will be sure, my son, and come to a happy end, if you show yourself to be a religious and righteous man, and an observer of the laws of your country; but if not, expect adversity upon disobedience to them."

§ 10. Now when the king had said this he left off, but gave to Solomon in the sight of them all the description and pattern of the building of the temple, of the foundations and of the lower and upper chambers, how many they were to be, and how large in height and in breadth; he also determined the weight of the golden and silver vessels. Moreover, he earnestly urged them with his words to show the utmost zeal in the work; he exhorted the rulers also, and particularly the tribe of Levi, to assist Solomon, both because of his youth, and because God had chosen him to superintend the building of the temple and the government of the kingdom. He also showed that the work would be easy and not very laborious to them, because he had already prepared for it many talents of gold and more of silver, and timber, and a great many carpenters and stone-cutters, and a large quantity of emeralds and all sorts of precious stones; and he said, that he would now give out of his own private income two hundred talents, and three hundred talents besides of pure gold, for the most holy place, and cherubims for the chariot of God, to stand over and cover the ark. And when David had done speaking, there appeared great zeal among the rulers and priests and the tribe of Levi, who now contributed, and made great and splendid promises for a future contribution; for they undertook to bring of gold five thousand talents and ten thousand staters, and of silver ten thousand talents, and many myriad talents of iron. And if any one had a precious stone he brought it, and had it put among the treasures; of which Ialus, one of the posterity of Moses, had the care.

§ 11. Upon this occasion all the people rejoiced, as well as David, who, when he saw the zeal and emulation of the rulers and priests and all the rest, began to bless God with a loud voice, calling him the Father and Parent of the universe, and the Author of human and divine things, with which he had adorned him as the ruler and guardian of the Hebrew nation, and of its happiness, and of the kingdom which he had given him. Besides this, he prayed for happiness for all the people, and for Solomon his son a sound and just mind, strengthened by all sorts of virtue, and then he commanded the people to bless God. Upon which they all fell down upon the ground, and worshipped God, and also gave thanks to David, on account of all the blessings which they had received ever since he had had the kingdom. On the next day he presented as sacrifices to God a thousand calves, and as many rams and lambs, which they offered for burnt offerings. They also offered peace-offerings, slaying many myriad victims. And the king feasted all day with all the people, and they anointed Solomon the second time with the holy oil, and declared him king, and Zadok high priest of the whole people. And when they had brought Solomon to the royal palace, and had set him upon his father's throne, they were obedient to him from that day.

CHAP. XV.

§ 1.

A LITTLE time afterwards David fell ill by reason of old age, and perceiving that he was going to die, he called his son Solomon, and addressed him as follows : “ I am now, my son, going to my grave, and to my fathers, by the common way which all men that now are, or shall be hereafter, must go, from which it is impossible to return, or to know anything that is going on in this world. On which account I exhort you, as I am still alive, though very near to death, in the same manner as I formerly advised you, to be just to your subjects, and religious towards God, who has given you the kingdom, and to observe his commandments and laws, which he sent to us by Moses, and disregard them neither from favour nor flattery nor lust nor any other passion. For if you transgress the laws, you will lose the favour of God, and turn away his good providence from you in all things ; but if you behave as you ought, and as I exhort you, you will preserve the kingdom to our family, and no other house will bear rule over the Hebrews, but we ourselves shall for all ages. But remember the iniquity of Joab, the captain of the host, who slew two generals out of envy, and those righteous and good men, Abner the son of Ner and Amasa the son of Jether, whose death avenge as shall seem good to you, for Joab has been too much for me, and more powerful than myself, and so has escaped punishment hitherto. I commend also to you the sons of Barzillai the Gileadite, whom to gratify me you shall hold in great honour, and take great care of ; for we do not begin the kindness, but only repay the debt which we owe their father, for what he did to me in my flight. As to Shimei the son of Gera, of the tribe of Benjamin, who, after having cast many reproaches upon me in my flight, when I was going to Mahanaim, met me at the Jordan, and received assurances that he should then suffer nothing, seek now for some just occasion to punish him."

§ 2. When David had given these instructions to his son about public affairs, and about his friends, and about those whom he knew to deserve punishment, he died, having lived seventy years, and reigned seven years and six months in Hebron over the tribe of Judah, and thirty-three years in Jerusalem over all the country. He was an excellent man, and endowed with all virtue necessary for a king, who had the safety of so many tribes committed to him. And he was a man of valour in a very extraordinary degree, and rushed foremost of all into dangers on behalf of his subjects, animating his soldiers to action by his own energy in fighting, and not by commanding them in a despotic way. He had also very great ability in understanding and comprehending the present and future. He was prudent and moderate, and kind to such as were in calamities, he was just and humane, which are good qualities peculiarly fit for kings, nor was he guilty of any crime in the exercise of such great authority except in the affair of the wife of Uriah. He also left behind him greater wealth than any other king, either of the Hebrews or of other nations, ever did.

§ 3. He was buried by his son Solomon, in Jerusalem, with great magnificence, and with all the funeral pomp which kings are wont to be buried with: moreover, he had great and immense wealth buried with him; the quantity of which may be easily conjectured by what I shall now record. One thousand three hundred years afterwards Hyrcanus the high priest, when he was besieged by Antiochus, surnamed the Pious, the son of Demetrius, and wished to give him money to get him to raise the siege and draw off his army, having no other means of getting the money, opened a chamber in David's tomb, and took out three thousand talents, and gave part of that sum to Antiochus, and so caused the siege to be raised, as I have stated elsewhere. And many years after him Herod the king opened another chamber, and took away a great deal of money, and yet neither of them came at the coffins of the kings themselves, for their bodies were buried under the earth so artfully, that they did not appear even to those that entered their tomb. But so much shall suffice us to have said concerning these matters.

BOOK VIII.

CHAP. I.

§ 1.

I HAVE already treated in the preceding book of David and his virtue, and of the benefits he conferred upon his countrymen, of his wars also and battles which he managed with success, and then died an old man. And when Solomon his son, who was but a youth in age (whom David had declared while he was alive lord of the people according to God's will), had taken over the kingdom and sat upon the throne, the whole body of the people made joyful acclamations, as is usual at the beginning of a reign; and wished that all his affairs might come to a happy conclusion, and that he might arrive at a great age, with his kingdom in the most prosperous condition possible.

§ 2. Now Adonijah, who had, even while his father was living, attempted to gain possession of the kingdom, went to the king's mother Bathsheba, and saluted her with great civility; and when she asked him, whether he came to her because he desired her assistance in anything, and bade him tell her if that were the case, for she would cheerfully afford it him, he began to say, that she herself knew that the kingdom was rightfully his, both on account of his priority of age and the wish of the multitude, though i had been transferred to Solomon her son according to the will of God. He also said that he was contented to be a servant under him, and acquiesced in the present state of affairs, but he desired her to be a means of obtaining a favour from his brother for him, by persuading him to bestow on him in marriage Abishag, who had indeed slept by his father, but because his father was too old, he had not lain with her, and she was still a virgin. And Bathsheba very readily promised to afford him her assistance to bring this marriage about, both because the king would be willing to gratify him, and because she would press it upon him very earnestly. Accordingly, he went away hopeful of compassing this match, and Solomon's mother went at once to her son, to speak to him about what she had promised Adonijah upon his request to her. And when her son came forward to meet her and embraced her, and led her into the chamber where the royal throne was set, he sat down thereon, and bade them set another throne on the right hand for his mother. And when Bathsheba was sat down, she said, "O my son, grant me one request that I ask of thee, and do not treat me disagreeably or peevishly by a refusal." And when Solomon bade her lay her commands upon him, because it was his duty to grant her everything she should ask, and first complained somewhat that she did not speak with a firm expectation of obtaining what she asked, but seemed to have some fear of a denial, she entreated him to grant that his brother Adonijah might marry Abishag.

§ 3. But the king was greatly offended at this request, and sent away his mother, saying that Adonijah aimed at great things, and that he wondered that she did not ask him to yield up the kingdom to him as his elder brother, since she asked that he might marry Abishag, for he had potent friends in Joab the captain of the host and in Abiathar the priest. So he sent for Benaiah, the captain of the body-guards, and ordered him to slay his brother Adonijah. He also called for Abiathar the priest, and said to him, "I will not put you to death, because of the various hardships you endured with my father, and because of the ark which you removed with him, but I inflict the following punishment upon you, because you were one of Adonijah's followers, and one of his party. Do not continue here, nor come any more into my sight, but go to your own town, and live in your own fields all your life, for you have offended so greatly, that it is not just that you should retain your office any longer." For the fore-mentioned cause therefore the house of Ithamar was deprived of the high priesthood, as God had foretold to Eli the grandfather of Abiathar, and it was transferred to the family of Phinehas, to Zadok. Now those that were of the family of Phinehas, who lived privately during the time that the high priesthood was transferred to the house of Ithamar (of which family Eli was the first that received it), were as follows: Boccias, the son of Joseph the high priest, his son was Joatham, Joatham's son was Meraioth, Meraioth's son was Arophæus, Arophæus' son was Ahitub, and Ahitub's son was Zadok, who was first made high priest in the reign of David.

§ 4. Now when Joab the captain of the host heard of the death of Adonijah, he was greatly afraid, for he was a greater friend to him than to king Solomon; and suspecting, not without reason, that he was in danger on account of his good will to Adonijah, he fled to the altar, supposing that he might so get safety to himself because of the king's piety towards God. But when some told the king what Joab's idea was, he sent Benaiah, and commanded him to remove Joab from the altar, and bring him to the judgment-seat to make his defence. However, Joab said he would not leave the altar, but would die there rather than in another place. And when Benaiah reported his answer to the king, Solomon commanded him to cut off his head there, as he wished, and to inflict that punishment for those two captains of the host whom he had wickedly murdered, and to bury his body, that his sins might never leave his family, but that he himself and his father might be guiltless by Joab's death. And when Benaiah had done what he was commanded to do, he was himself appointed to be captain of the whole army. The king also made Zadok high priest alone in the room of Abiathar, whom he had removed.

§ 5. As to Shimei, Solomon commanded that he should build a house and dwell at Jerusalem, and live near him, and should not have authority to go over the brook Cedron, and if he disobeyed that command, death should be his punishment. And, not content with this threat, he compelled him to take an oath that he would obey. And Shimei said that he had reason to thank Solomon for giving him such an order, and swore that he would do as he bade him, and he left his own city and made his abode in Jerusalem. But three years afterwards, when he heard that two of his servants had run away from him, and were in Gath, he set out to bring them back. And when he returned back with them, the king heard of it, and was much displeased that he had neglected his commands, and what was more, had had no regard to the oaths he had sworn to God; so he called him, and said to him, "Didst thou not swear never to leave me, nor to go out of this city to another? thou shalt not therefore escape punishment for thy perjury; but I will punish thee, thou wicked wretch, both for this crime, and for thy abuse of my father when he was in his flight, that thou mayest know that wicked men gain nothing at last, although they be not punished immediately for their crimes, but that during all the time wherein they think themselves secure, because they have yet suffered nothing, their punishment increases, and is heavier upon them than if they had been punished immediately upon the commission of their crimes." Then Benaiah at the king's command slew Shimei.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the Wife of Solomon, and his Wisdom and Riches, and what he obtained of Hiram for the building of the Temple.

§ 1.

SOLOMON, having already settled himself firmly in his kingdom, and having brought his enemies to punishment, married the daughter of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and made the walls of Jerusalem much larger and stronger than they had been before, and thenceforward managed public affairs very peaceably; nor was his youth any hindrance to justice or the observation of the laws, or the remembrance of the charges his father had given him at his death, but he discharged every duty with great exactness, such as might have been expected from aged men of the greatest prudence. He now resolved to go to Hebron, and sacrifice to God upon the brazen altar that was built by Moses, and he offered there a thousand burnt-offerings, and when he had done this, it seemed he had paid great honour to God, for that very night as he was asleep God appeared to him, and commanded him to ask what gifts he should give him as a reward for his piety. And Solomon asked of God what was most excellent, and of the greatest worth in itself, and what God would bestow with the greatest joy, and what it was most profitable for man to receive; for he did not ask to have bestowed upon him either gold or silver or any other riches, as a man and a youth might naturally have done, for these are the things generally esteemed by most men, as alone of the greatest worth, and as the best gifts of God; but, he said, "Give me, O Lord, a sound mind and good understanding, whereby I may judge the people according to truth and righteousness." With this prayer God was well pleased, and promised to give him all those things besides that he had not mentioned in his choice, riches, glory, and above all victory over his enemies, and understanding and wisdom, such as no other, either king or ordinary person, ever had. He also promised to preserve the kingdom to his posterity for a very long time, if he continued righteous and obedient to him, and imitated his father in those things wherein he was excellent. When Solomon heard this from God, he at once leaped out of his bed, and when he had worshipped him he returned to Jerusalem, and after he had offered great sacrifices before the tabernacle, he feasted all his household.

§ 2. In these days a difficult case came before him, which it was very hard to determine. I think it necessary to state the matter about which the judgment was, that such as light upon my writings may know what a difficult case Solomon had to determine, and those that are concerned in such matters may take this sagacity of the king's for a pattern, that they may the more easily give sentence on such questions. Two women who were professional harlots came to him, of whom she that seemed to have been wronged began to speak first, and said, "O king, I and this other woman dwell together in one room: now it came to pass that we both bore a son at the same hour on the same day, and on the third day this woman overlaid her son and killed it, and then took my son out of my bosom, and removed him to herself, and as I was asleep laid her dead son in my arms. Now when in the morning I was desirous to give the breast to the child, I did not find my own, but saw the woman's dead child lying by me, for I carefully looked at it and found it was so. Then I demanded my son, and as I could not obtain him, I have had recourse, my lord, to your assistance; for as we were alone, and there was nobody there that could convict her, she impudently perseveres in the stout denial of the fact." When she had told her story, the king asked the other woman what she had to say in contradiction to what had been stated. And when she denied that she had done what she was charged with, and said that it was her child that was living, and her antagonist's child that was dead, and when no one could devise what judgment should be given, and the whole court were blind in their understanding, and could not tell how to find out this riddle, the king alone contrived the following way to discover it. He bade them bring in both the dead child and the living child, and sent for one of his bodyguards, and commanded him to draw his sword, and to cut both the children into halves, that each of the women might have half the living and half the dead child. Hereupon all the people privately laughed at the king, as no more than a youth. But mean time she that was the real mother of the living child cried out, and begged that he would not do so, but deliver the living child to the other woman as her own, for she would be satisfied with the life and sight of it, although it should be esteemed the other's child: but the other woman was ready to see the child divided, and was desirous moreover that the first woman should be tormented. When the king understood that both their words proceeded from truth, he adjudged the child to her that cried out to save it, for she was the real mother of it, and he condemned the other as a wicked woman, who had not only killed her own child, but was anxious to see her friend's child destroyed also. Now the multitude looked on this decision as a great sign and proof of the king's sagacity and wisdom, and, after that day, attended to him as to one that had a divine mind.

§ 3. Now the captains of his armies, and officers appointed over the whole country, were as follows. Over the lot of Ephraim<sup>1</sup> was Ures; over the region of Bethlehem was Dioclerus; and Abinadad, who married Solomon's daughter, had the region of Dora<sup>2</sup> and the sea coast under him. The great plain<sup>3</sup> was under Benaiah, the son of Achilus, who also governed all the country as far as the Jordan. Gabares ruled over Gilead<sup>4</sup> and Gaulanitis,<sup>5</sup> as far as Mount Lebanon, and had under him sixty great and fenced cities. Achinadab managed the affairs of all Galilee as far as Sidon, and he also had married a daughter of Solomon, whose name was Basima. Banacates had the sea coast about Arce,<sup>6</sup> and Shaphat had mount Tabor, and Carmel, and Lower Galilee [as far as the river Jordan.] And one man was appointed over them throughout all this country. And Shimei was intrusted with the lot of Benjamin, and Gabares had the country beyond the Jordan. And over these again there was one governor appointed. Now the people of the Hebrews and the tribe of Judah wonderfully increased when they betook themselves to husbandry and the cultivation of the land; for as they enjoyed peace, and were not distracted with wars and troubles, and also enjoyed abundantly the most desirable liberty, they were all busy in augmenting the product of their own lands, and making them worth more than they had formerly been.

§ 4. The king appointed also other rulers, who were over the land of Syria and of the strange nations, which reached from the river Euphrates to Egypt, and they collected his tribute from the nations. Now they contributed to the king's table for his dinner every day thirty cors of fine flour, and sixty of meal, ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and an hundred fat lambs; besides what was taken by hunting, as harts and buffaloes, birds and fishes, which were brought to the king by the foreigners every day. Solomon had also so great a number of chariots, that the stalls of his horses for those chariots were forty thousand. And besides these he had twelve thousand horsemen, half of whom waited upon the king in Jerusalem, and the rest were dispersed about and dwelt in the royal villages: and the same officer who provided for the king's expenses, supplied also the fodder for the horses, and carried it to the place where the king abode.

§ 5. Now the sagacity and wisdom which God had bestowed on Solomon was so great, that he exceeded the ancients and was no way inferior to the Egyptians, who are said to be beyond all men in understanding; nay, indeed, it is evident that their sagacity was very much inferior to that of the king's. He also excelled and distinguished himself in wisdom above those who were most eminent among the Hebrews at that time for ability, whose names I will not omit, as Ethan and Æman and Chalceus and Dardanus, the sons of Emaon. He also composed books of odes and songs, a thousand and five; of parables and similitudes, three thousand; for he spoke a parable upon every sort of tree, from the hyssop to the cedar; and in like manner also about beasts, and all sorts of living creatures, whether upon the earth, or in the seas, or in the air; for he was not unacquainted with any of their natures, nor did he omit inquiries about them, but described them all like a philosopher, and showed his exquisite knowledge of their several properties. God also enabled him to learn the art which expels demons, which is useful and works cures for men. He composed charms also by which diseases are alleviated. And he left behind him forms of exorcisms, by which people drive away demons so that they never return: and this method of cure is of very great value unto this day; for I have seen a certain man of my own country, whose name was Eleazar, curing people possessed by demons in the presence of Vespasian and his sons and captains and the whole of his soldiers. The manner of the cure was as follows: he put a ring that had under its seal one of those sorts of roots mentioned by Solomon to the nostrils of the demoniac, and then drew the demon out through his nostrils as he smelt it: and when the man fell down immediately, he adjured the demon to return into him no more, still making mention of Solomon, and reciting the incantations which he had composed. And Eleazar, wishing to persuade and show to the spectators that he had such a power, used to set a little way off a cup or basin full of water, and commanded the demon, as he went out of the man, to overturn it, and so to let the spectators know that he had left the man. And when this was done, the skill and wisdom of Solomon was showed very manifestly; and that all men may know the vastness of Solomon's abilities, and how he was beloved of God, and that the extraordinary virtues of every kind with which this king was endowed may not be unknown to any people under the sun, I have been induced to speak about these matters.

§ 6. Now when Hiram king of Tyre had heard that Solomon had succeeded to his father's kingdom, he was very glad at it, for he was a friend of David. So he sent ambassadors to him, and saluted him, and congratulated him on the present happy state of his affairs. Upon which Solomon sent him a letter, the contents of which are as follows.

SOLOMON TO KING HIRAM.

“KNOW that my father would have built a temple to God, but was hindered by wars and continual expeditions; for he did not leave off overthrowing his enemies till he made them all subject to tribute. But I give thanks to God for the peace I at present enjoy, and on that account I am at leisure, and design to build a house to God, for God foretold to my father that such a house should be built by me. Wherefore I desire you to send some of your subjects with mine to mount Lebanon to cut down timber, for the Sidonians are more skilful than our people in cutting wood. As for wages to the woodmen, I will pay whatever price you shall fix.”

§ 7. When Hiram had read this letter he was pleased with it: and wrote back the following answer to Solomon.

KING HIRAM TO KING SOLOMON.

“It is right to bless God, that he has committed your father’s government to you, who are a wise man, and endowed with all virtues. As for myself, I rejoice at the condition you are in, and will supply you with all things you write to me about; for when I have had cut down by my subjects many and large cedar and cypress trees, I will send them to the sea, and will order my subjects to make rafts, and to sail with them to whatever place in your country you shall desire, and leave them there, and then your subjects can carry them to Jerusalem. But take care in return for this timber to supply us with corn, which we stand in need of, because we inhabit an island.”

§ 8. The copies of these letters are extant at this day, and are preserved not only in our books, but also among the Tyrians, insomuch that if anyone would know the certainty about them, he may ask the keepers of the public records of Tyre to show him them, and he will find what is there set down to agree with what I have narrated. I have said so much from a desire that my readers may know that I speak nothing but the truth, and do not compose a history out of plausible materials to deceive and please men at the same time; nor do I attempt to avoid examination, or desire men to believe me immediately; nor am I at liberty to depart from speaking truth (which is the proper commendation of an historian), and yet be blameless: but I insist upon no admission of what I say, unless I am able to manifest its truth by demonstration and cogent testimony.

§ 9. Now as soon as this letter was brought him from the king of Tyre, king Solomon commended the readiness and good-will he declared therein, and bartered with him as he asked, and sent him yearly twenty thousand cors of wheat, and as many baths of oil. The bath contains seventy-two sextarii. He also sent him the same measure of wine. And the friendship between Hiram and Solomon increased through this more and more; and they swore to continue it for ever. And the king appointed a tribute to be laid on all the people of thirty thousand labourers ; whose work he rendered easy to them by skilfully dividing it among them ; for he made ten thousand cut timber in mount Lebanon for a month, and then return home and rest for two months, until the time when the remaining twenty thousand had finished their month each ; and so it came to pass that each ten thousand returned to their work every fourth month. And Adoram was over this tribute. There were also of the strangers who were left by David, who were to carry the stones and other materials, seventy thousand ; and of those that cut the stones, eighty thousand. Of these three thousand three hundred were overseers over the rest. He also enjoined them to hew large stones for the foundations of the temple, and to shape and unite them together in the quarry first, and then bring them to the city. This was done not only by the workmen of our own country, but by the artificers whom Hiram sent also.

CHAP. III.

§ 1.

SOLOMON began to build the temple in the fourth year of his reign, in the second month, which the Macedonians call Artemisius, and the Hebrews Jar, five hundred and ninety-two years after the exodus of the Israelites out of Egypt, and one thousand and twenty-two years after Abraham's coming out of Mesopotamia into Canaan, and one thousand four hundred and forty years after the deluge. And from Adam, the first man created, until Solomon built the temple, there had passed in all three thousand one hundred and two years. And the year in which the temple began to be built, was just the eleventh year of the reign of king Hiram ; and from the building of Tyre to the building of the temple, there had passed two hundred and forty years.

§ 2. Now king Solomon laid the foundations of the temple very deep in the ground, and the materials were strong stones, such as would resist the force of time, which were to fit in with the earth, and become a basis and sure foundation for the structure which was to be erected upon it; they were to be so strong in order to sustain with ease that vast pile and precious ornaments, whose own weight was to be not less than the weight of those other high and heavy buildings which the king designed to be very ornamental and magnificent. They erected it of white stone quite up to the roof; its height was sixty cubits, and its length was the same, and its breadth twenty. There was another building erected over it, equal to it in its proportions, so that the entire height of the temple was a hundred and twenty cubits. It faced east. As to the porch, they built it in front of the temple; its length was twenty cubits to match the breadth of the house; and it was ten cubits in breadth, and its height was raised as high as a hundred and twenty cubits. He also built round about the temple thirty small rooms, which might include the whole temple, by their closeness one to another, and by their number and outward position round it. He also made passages through them, that one might pass from one into another. Every one of these rooms was five cubits in breadth, and the same in length, but twenty in height. Above these there were other rooms, and others above them, equal both in their proportions and number; so that they reached a height equal to the lower part of the house; for the upper part had no buildings about it. The roof that was over the house was of cedar; and indeed every one of these rooms had a roof of its own, not connected with the other rooms; but for the other parts there was a covered roof common to them all, and built with very long beams, that passed through the rest, and through the whole building, so that the middle walls being strengthened by the same beams of timber, might be thereby made firmer; and as for that part of the roof that was under the beams, it was made of the same materials, and was all made smooth, and had ornaments proper for roofs, and plates of gold nailed upon them. And he enclosed the walls with boards of cedar, and had them gilt over, so that the whole temple shone, and dazzled the eyes of such as entered by the splendour of the gold that was on every side of them. And the whole structure of the temple was with great skill wrought of polished stones, laid together so very harmoniously and smoothly, that to the spectators there appeared no sign of any hammer or other instrument of architecture, but it seemed as if, without any use of them, the entire materials had naturally united themselves together, that the fitting in of one part with another seemed rather to have been natural than to have arisen from the action of tools. The king also had a fine contrivance for an ascent to the upper room over the temple by a spiral staircase in the thickness of the wall; for it had no large door at the east end as the lower house had, but the entrances were by the sides through very small doors. He also overlaid the temple both within and without with boards of cedar, that were fastened together by thick iron clamps, so as to be of the nature of a support and strength to the building.

§ 3. And when the king had divided the temple into two parts, he made the inner house, which was twenty cubits square, to be the most holy place, but he appointed that of forty cubits to be the sanctuary; and when he had cut a door-place in the wall, he put therein doors of cedar, and overlaid them with a great deal of gold that had various carvings upon it. He also had veils of blue and purple and scarlet, of the brightest and softest linen, with the most curious flowers wrought upon them, to hang before those doors. He also dedicated for the most holy place, whose breadth was twenty cubits and length the same, two cherubims of solid gold; the height of each of them was five cubits: and they had each of them two wings stretched out five cubits; he so set them up not far from each other, that with one wing they might touch the south wall of the most holy place, and with another the north wall; their other wings, which joined each other, were a covering to the ark, which was placed between them; but nobody can tell, or even conjecture, what was the shape of these cherubims. He also laid the floor of the temple with plates of gold, and he added doors to the gate of the temple in proportion to the height of the wall, and in breadth twenty cubits, and to them he attached gold plates. And, to say all in one word, he left no part of the temple, either internal or external, not overlaid with gold. He had also curtains drawn over these doors in like manner as they were drawn over the inner doors of the most holy place. But the door of the porch had nothing of the kind.

§ 4. And Solomon sent for an artificer from Tyre, whose name was Hiram, who was of the tribe of Naphtali on the mother's side (for she was of that tribe), but his father was Uriah, of the stock of the Israelites. This man was skilful in all sorts of work, but his chief skill lay in working in gold and silver and brass, and he did all the curious work about the temple as the king wished. This Hiram also made two pillars of brass, and the thickness of the brass was four fingers, and the height of the pillars was eighteen cubits, and their circumference twelve cubits, and there was cast with each of their chapters lily work, that stood upon the pillars, and was elevated five cubits, round about which there was net-work, interwoven with small palms made of brass, which covered the lily work. To this also were hung two hundred pomegranates in two rows. One of these pillars he set at the entrance of the porch on the right, and called it Jachin, and the other he set at the left, and called it Boaz.

§ 5. He also cast a brazen sea whose figure was that of a hemisphere. This brazen vessel was called a sea from its size, for the laver was ten feet in diameter, and cast of the thickness of a palm: its middle part rested on a short pillar, that had ten spirals round it, and the pillar was one cubit in diameter. There stood round about it twelve oxen facing the four winds of heaven, three towards each wind, having their hinder parts so depressed that the hemispherical vessel might rest upon them, which itself was also depressed round about inwardly. Now this sea was capable of containing three thousand baths.

§ 6. He also made ten brazen quadrangular bases for as many lavers: the length of every one of these bases was five cubits, and the breadth four cubits, and the height six cubits. The work was turned, and contrived as follows: there were four small quadrangular pillars that stood one at each corner, that had the sides of the base fitted to them on each quarter: they were parted into three parts; every interval had a border fitted to support [the laver], upon which was engraven, sometimes a lion, sometimes a bull or an eagle. The small pillars had the same animals engraven that were engraven on the sides. The whole work was elevated upon four wheels, which were also cast, and had naves and felloes, and were a foot and a half in diameter. Anyone who saw the spokes of the wheels, how exactly they were turned, and united to the sides of the bases, and with what harmony they fitted to the felloes, would wonder at them. Their construction was as follows: certain shoulders of hands stretched out held the corners above, upon which rested a short spiral pillar, that lay under the hollow part of the laver, resting upon the fore part of the eagle and the lion, which were so skilfully joined that those who viewed them would think they were of one piece: between these were engraved palm-trees. Such was the construction of the ten bases. He also made ten large round brass lavers, each of which contained forty baths, and its height was four cubits, and its edges were equi-distant from each other. He also placed these lavers upon the ten bases that were called Mechonoth; and he set five of the lavers on the left side of the temple, which was the side towards the north, and as many on the right side towards the south, but facing east: the same way he also set the brazen sea, which he filled with water and assigned for washing the hands and feet of the priests when they entered into the temple, and were to ascend to the altar, and the lavers were to cleanse the entrails and feet of the beasts that were to be burnt-offerings.

§ 7. Hiram also made a brazen altar, whose length was twenty cubits, and its breadth the same, and its height ten, for the burnt-offerings. He also made all its vessels of brass, the pots, and the shovels, and the basons, and besides these, the snuffers and the tongs, and all its other vessels, and of such brass as was in brightness and beauty like gold. The king also dedicated a great number of tables, and one that was large and made of gold, upon which they set the loaves of God: and he made ten thousand more that resembled them, but were made in another manner, upon which lay the vials and the cups; those of gold were twenty thousand, and those of silver were forty thousand. He also made ten thousand candlesticks according to the command of Moses, one of which he dedicated for the temple, that it might burn in the day-time according to the law; and one table with loaves upon it on the north side of the temple over against the candlestick; for this he set on the south side, but the golden altar stood between them. All these vessels were contained in the house which was forty cubits long, before the veil of the most holy place wherein the ark was to be set.

§ 8. The king also had eighty thousand pouring vessels made, and a hundred thousand golden vials, and twice as many silver vials; and of golden dishes, to offer kneaded fine flour at the altar, there were eighty thousand, and twice as many of silver. Of large basons also, wherein they mixed fine flour with oil, there were sixty thousand of gold, and twice as many of silver. Of the measures of Moses called Hin and Assaron, there were twenty thousand of gold, and twice as many of silver. The golden censers, in which they carried the incense into the temple, were twenty thousand: the other censers, in which they carried fire from the great altar to the little altar within the temple, were fifty thousand. The sacerdotal garments which belonged to the high priests, with the long robes, and the oracle, and the precious stones, were a thousand. But the crown upon which Moses wrote the name of God, was only one, and has remained to this very day. He also made ten thousand sacerdotal garments of fine linen, with purple girdles, for every priest, and two hundred thousand trumpets, according to the command of Moses: and two hundred thousand garments of fine linen for the singers that were Levites. And he made forty thousand musical instruments such as were invented for singing hymns, called Nablæ and Cinyræ [psalteries and harps], which were made of a compound of gold and silver.

§ 9. Solomon had all these things made for the honour of God, with great expenditure and magnificence, sparing no cost, but using all possible liberality in adorning the temple; and these things he dedicated to the treasures of God. He also placed round about the temple a partition, which in our tongue we call Gison, but it is called θρυγκός by the Greeks, and he raised it up to the height of three cubits; it was to keep the multitude from coming into the temple, and to signify that it was a place that was open only to the priests. He also built outside this a temple, in figure quadrangular, and erected for it great and broad porticoes entered by very high gates, each of which faced one of the four winds, and was shut by golden doors. Into this temple all the people entered that were distinguished from the rest by being pure and observant of the laws. But he made this outside temple a wonderful one indeed, and such as exceeds all description in words; nay, if I may so say, it is hardly credited when seen; for when he had filled up with earth great valleys (which, on account of their immense depth, could not be looked on, when you bent down to see them, without pain,) and had elevated the ground four hundred cubits, he made it on a level with the top of the mountain on which the temple was built, and by this means the outmost temple, which was exposed to the air, was even with the temple itself. He encompassed it also with a building of a double row of porticoes, which stood on high pillars of native stone, while the roofs were of cedar, and were polished with fret-work; and he made all the doors of this temple of silver.

CHAP. IV.

How Solomon removed the Ark to the Temple, and made Supplication to God and offered public Sacrifices to him.

§ 1.

WHEN king Solomon had finished these works and large and beautiful buildings, and had laid up his donations in the temple, and accomplished all this in seven years, and had given proof of his riches and zeal, insomuch that anyone who saw it would have thought it must have been an immense time ere it could have been finished, and would be surprised that so much could be finished in so short a time, short, I mean, if compared with the greatness of the work, he wrote to the rulers and elders of the Hebrews, and ordered all the people to gather themselves together to Jerusalem, both to see the temple which he had built, and to remove the ark of God to it. And when this invitation to the whole body of the people to come to Jerusalem was carried round to everybody, it was the seventh month before they assembled together, which month is by our countrymen called Thisri, but by the Macedonians Hyperberetæus. The feast of tabernacles happened to fall at the same time, which was celebrated by the Hebrews as a most holy and important feast. So they carried the ark and the tabernacle which Moses had pitched, and all the vessels that were for ministration in the sacrifices to God, and removed them to the temple. The king himself and all the people and the Levites went before, rendering the ground moist with drink-offerings and the blood of a great many victims, and burning an immense quantity of incense; and that till the very air itself everywhere round about was so full of these odours, that it reached in a most agreeable manner persons at a great distance, and was a token of God's presence, and, as men thought, of his habitation in this newly built and consecrated place; and they did not grow weary either of singing hymns or of dancing until they reached the temple. And in this manner did they bring the ark. But when they were to transfer it to the most holy place, the rest of the multitude went away, and only the priests that carried it set it between the two cherubims, which embraced it with their wings, for so were they framed by the artificer, and covered it as under a tent or dome. Now the ark contained nothing else but those two tables of stone that preserved the ten commandments, which God spoke to Moses on Mount Sinai, and which were inscribed upon them; but they set the candlestick and table and the golden altar in the temple before the most holy place, in the very same positions which they occupied till that time in the tabernacle, when<sup>1</sup> they offered the daily sacrifices. And Solomon set the brazen altar before the temple over against the door, that when the door was opened it might be exposed to sight, and the sacred solemnities, and the costliness of the sacrifice, might be thence descried. And they gathered together all the rest of the vessels and put them within the temple.

§ 2. Now, as soon as the priests had put all things in order about the ark and had gone out, there came down suddenly a thick cloud, which stood there, and spread itself in a gentle manner through the temple; it was a cloud diffused and temperate, not a rough one such as we see full of rain in the winter season. This cloud so darkened the place that the priests could not discern one another, but it afforded to the minds of all a visible image and glorious token of God's having descended into this temple, and of his having gladly pitched his tabernacle therein. And those present were intent upon this thought. And king Solomon rose up, (for he was sitting before,) and used such words to God as he thought agreeable to the divine nature to receive and fit for him to give. "Thou hast [he said] an eternal house, O Lord, and such an one as thou hast created for thyself out of thine own works; we know thou pervadest the heaven, and the air, and the earth, and the sea, nor art thou contained within these limits. I have indeed built this temple to thee, and called it by thy name, that from thence, when we sacrifice and perform sacred rites, we may send our prayers up into the air, and may constantly believe that thou art present and not far off. For as thou seeest and hearest all things, when it pleases thee to dwell here, thou dost not fail to be very near to all men, but especially art thou present to those that pray to thee by night or by day." When he had thus solemnly addressed himself to God, he turned his discourse to the multitude, and strongly represented to them the power and providence of God, how he had showed all things that were come to pass to David his father, and most had indeed already come to pass, and the rest would certainly come to pass hereafter; and how he had given him his name, and foretold what he should be called before he was born, and how, when he should be king after his father's death, he should build him a temple. And as they saw this accomplished according to his prediction, he asked them to bless God, and believing in him from what they had seen accomplished, never to despair of anything that he had promised for the future for their happiness, as if it would not come to pass.

§ 3. When the king had thus discoursed to the multitude, he looked again towards the temple, and, lifting up his right hand to the multitude, he said, "It is not indeed possible by what men can do to return thanks to God for his benefits bestowed upon them, for the Deity stands in need of nothing, and is above any such requital; but as we have been made superior, O Lord, to all other living creatures by thee, it is our bounden duty to bless thy majesty, and return thee thanks for what thou hast bestowed upon our house, and on the Hebrew people. For with what other thing can we better appease thee, when thou art angry with us, or more properly preserve thy favour, than with our voice; which, as we have it from the air, so do we know that by that air it ascends upwards. I therefore now return my thanks thereby in the first place for my father, whom thou didst raise from obscurity unto so great glory, and in the next place for myself, since thou hast performed all that thou hast promised me up to this very day. And I beseech thee, for the time to come, to afford us whatever thou, O God, hast power to bestow on such as thou dost esteem, and to augment our house for all time, as thou didst promise David my father, both in his lifetime and at his death, that our kingdom should continue, and that his posterity should inherit it for ten thousand generations. Do not therefore fail to give us these blessings, and to bestow on my offspring that virtue in which thou delightest. And besides all this, I humbly beseech thee, that thou wilt let some portion of thy spirit come down and dwell in this temple, that thou mayest appear to be with us upon earth. As to thyself, the entire heavens and the immensity of the things that are therein are but a small habitation for thee, much more is this poor temple so: but I entreat thee to keep it as thine own house, so that it shall never be sacked by our enemies, and to take care of it as thine own possession. And if ever this people be found to have sinned, and be thereupon afflicted by thee with any plague because of their sin, as with dearth or pestilence, or any other affliction which thou wilt inflict on those that transgress any of thy holy laws, and if they gather themselves together and take refuge all of them in this temple, beseeching thee and begging of thee to deliver them, then do thou, being within this house, hear their prayers, and have mercy upon them, and deliver them from their afflictions. Moreover I implore this help of thee, not for the Hebrews only, when they are in distress, but when any shall come hither even from the ends of the world, and shall return from their sins and implore thy pardon, do thou then pardon them and hear their prayer. For so all shall learn that thou thyself wast pleased with the building of this house for thee, and that we are not ourselves of an unhumane nature, nor hostile to such as are not of our own people, but are willing that thy help should be given to all men in common, and that the enjoyment of thy benefits should be bestowed upon them."

§ 4. When Solomon had said this, and prostrated himself upon the ground, and worshipped a long time, he rose up, and brought sacrifices to the altar. and when he had filled it with unblemished victims, he most clearly discovered that God had with pleasure accepted all his sacrifice. For a fire came running out of the air, and darting with violence upon the altar, in the sight of all, which licked up and consumed all the sacrifice. Now, when this divine appearance was seen, the people supposed it to be a proof that God would abide in the temple, and were pleased with it, and fell down upon the ground and worshipped. And the king began to bless God, and exhorted the multitude to do the same, as now having tokens of God's favourable disposition to them; and to pray that they might always have the like from him, and that he would preserve in them a mind pure from all wickedness, owing to their righteousness and religious worship and keeping the commandments which God had given them by Moses, because so the Hebrew nation would be happy, indeed the most blessed of all mankind. He exhorted them also to remember, that by what means they had attained their present good things, by the same they must preserve them sure to themselves, and make them greater and more than they were at present ; for they ought not to suppose only that they had received them on account of their piety and righteousness, but also that they had no other way of preserving them for the time to come, for it is not so great a thing for men to acquire something that they want, as to keep what they have acquired, and to be guilty of no sin whereby it may be lost.

§ 5. When the king had spoken thus to the multitude, he broke up the assembly, having completed the sacrifices both for himself and for the Hebrews, for he sacrificed twenty-two thousand oxen, and an hundred and twenty thousand sheep. For the temple did then first taste of victims, and all the Hebrews with their wives and children feasted therein ; moreover the king then observed splendidly and magnificently the feast which is called the Feast of Tabernacles before the temple for twice seven days, feasting together with all the people.

§ 6. When all these solemnities were abundantly performed, and nothing omitted that concerned the worship of God, the king dismissed the people, and they went every one to their homes, giving thanks to the king for the care he had taken of them, and the works he had done for them, and praying God to preserve Solomon as their king for a long time. They also took their journey home with rejoicing and merrymaking, and singing hymns to God, so that the pleasure they enjoyed took away the sense of the tediousness of their journey home. For when they had brought the ark into the temple, and had seen its greatness and how fine it was, and had been partakers of the many sacrifices and festivals, they returned every one to their own cities. And a dream appeared to the king in his sleep, and informed him that God had heard his prayers, and that he would not only preserve the temple, but would always abide in it, if his posterity and all the people should be righteous. As for the king himself, if he abode by the advice of his father, he would advance him to an immense degree of happiness, and his posterity of the tribe of Judah should be kings of that country for ever : but if he should be found a betrayer of the ordinances of the law, and forget them and turn away to the worship of strange gods, he would cut him off root and branch, and would neither suffer any remnant of his family to continue, nor would preserve the people of Israel any longer from afflictions, but would utterly destroy them with ten thousand wars and misfortunes; and would cast them out of the land which he had given their fathers, and make them sojourners in strange lands; and deliver that temple, which was now built, to be burnt and spoiled by their enemies, and their city to be utterly overthrown by the hands of their enemies; and would make their miseries deserve to be a proverb, and such as should hardly be credited for their stupendous magnitude, so that their neighbours, when they should hear of them, should wonder at their calamities, and very earnestly inquire why the Hebrews, who had before been advanced by God to such glory and wealth, should be then so hated by him; and the answer that should be made by the remnant of the people should be their confessing their sins and transgression of the laws of their country. We have it transmitted to us in writing, that God did thus speak to Solomon in his sleep.

§ 1.

AFTER the building of the temple, which, as I have before said, was finished in seven years, the king laid the foundation of his palace, which he did not finish under thirteen years. For he was not equally zealous in the building of his palace as he had been about the temple; for as to that, though it was a great work, and required wonderful and surprising application, yet God, for whom it was made, so far co-operated in the work, that it was finished in the forementioned number of years; but the palace, which was a building much inferior in dignity to the temple, not only because its materials had not been got ready so long beforehand, nor so carefully prepared, but because it was only an habitation for kings and not for God, took longer time to finish. However, it was a magnificent edifice, and one that suited the prosperity of the Hebrews and their king; but it is necessary for me to describe the entire structure and arrangement of it, that so those that light upon this book may conjecture and form some idea of its magnitude.

§ 2. The house was a large and handsome building, supported by many pillars, and Solomon built it to contain a great many persons for hearing cases, and taking cognizance of suits, for it was large enough to hold a great many men, who might assemble to hear cases determined. It was an hundred cubits long, and fifty broad, and thirty high, supported by quadrangular pillars which were all of cedar, and its roof was of the Corinthian order, with doors of equal size, and three-grooved panels, so that the building was at once strong and ornamental. There was also another house placed in the middle, it was quadrangular, and its breadth was thirty cubits, and there was a temple opposite to it raised upon massive pillars; in which temple there was a magnificent hall, where the king sat in judgment, to which was joined another house, that was built for the queen. There were other smaller edifices for food and sleep after public affairs were over, and these were all floored with boards of cedar. Some of these Solomon built with stones of ten cubits, and wainscoted the walls with other stone that was sawn and of great value, such as is dug out of the earth to ornament temples, and to add to the show of royal palaces, making the mines whence it is dug famous. Now the curious workmanship of this stone was in three rows, and the fourth row would make one admire its sculptures, wherein were represented trees and all sorts of plants, with the shades that arose from their branches, and leaves that hung down from them. Those trees and plants covered the stone that was beneath them, and their leaves were wrought so wonderfully fine, that you would think they moved. But the other part up to the roof was plastered over, and embroidered with colours and pictures. Solomon built moreover other edifices for pleasure, as also very long porticoes situated in an agreeable part of the palace, and among them a most glorious dining-room for feastings and revellings, full of gold and such other furniture as so fine a room ought to have for the convenience of the guests, and all the vessels were made of gold. Indeed it is hard to reckon up the magnitude and variety of the royal apartments, how many rooms there were of the largest sort, how many of a size inferior to those, how many that were underground and secret, the beauty of those that enjoyed the fresh air, and groves with the most delightful landscapes for avoiding heat and for refreshment of the body. And to say all in brief, Solomon made the whole building entirely of white stone and cedar wood and gold and silver, and adorned the roofs and walls with stones set in gold, and beautified them thereby in the same manner as he had beautified the temple of God with similar stones. He also made himself a throne of prodigious size of ivory, constructed on a dais, with six steps to it; on every one of which stood at each end of the step two lions, two other lions standing above also; and at the seat of the throne, hands came out and received the king; and when he reclined in it, he rested on half a bullock, that looked towards his back, and all was fastened together with gold.

§ 3. When Solomon had completed both temple and palace in twenty years' time, as Hiram king of Tyre had contributed a great deal of gold and more silver to these buildings, as also cedar wood and pine wood, he himself requited Hiram with rich presents; sending him annually corn and wine and oil, which were the principal things that he stood in need of, because he inhabited an island, as I have already said. And besides these, he granted him certain cities of Galilee, twenty in number, that lay not far from Tyre; and when Hiram went to them, and looked at them, and did not like the gift, he sent word to Solomon, that he did not want the cities, and from that time those cities were called the land of Cabul,<sup>1</sup> which name, if it be interpreted according to the language of the Phœnicians, denotes what does not please. Moreover, the king of Tyre sent hard and enigmatical sayings to Solomon, and desired he would solve them, and free them from the ambiguity that was in them. Now so sagacious and intelligent was Solomon, that none of these problems were too hard for him, but he conquered them all by reasoning, and discovered their hidden meaning, and brought it to light. Menander also, who translated the Tyrian archives out of the dialect of the Phœnicians into the Greek language, makes mention of these two kings, where he says thus: "When Abibalus was dead, his son Hiram succeeded him in the kingdom, and lived fifty-three years and reigned thirty-four. He raised a bank in the large place, and dedicated the golden pillar which is in the temple of Zeus. He also went and cut down timber on the mountain called Libanus for the roofs of temples; and when he had pulled down the ancient temples, he built both the temple of Hercules and that of Astarte: and he first set up the temple of Hercules in the month Peritius; he also made an expedition against the Iycaei who did not pay their tribute, and when he had subdued them to himself, he returned. Under this king lived Abdemon's younger son, who always conquered the difficult problems which Solomon, king of Jerusalem, commanded him to explain." Dios also makes mention of him, where he says thus: "When Abibalus was dead, his son Hiram reigned. He raised the eastern parts of the city higher, and made the city itself larger. He also joined the temple of Olympian Zeus, which before stood by itself, to the city, by raising a bank in the middle between them, and he adorned it with donations of gold. Moreover, he went up to mount Libanus, and cut down timber for the building of temples." He says also, that "Solomon, who was then king of Jerusalem, sent riddles to Hiram, and desired to receive the like from him, and he who could not solve them should pay money to him that did, and that Hiram accepted the conditions, and when he was not able to solve the riddles [proposed by Solomon], he paid a great deal of money for his fine: but that afterwards he did solve the proposed riddles by means of Abdemon,<sup>1</sup> a man of Tyre:

<sup>1</sup> Dios and Menander state Hiram's riddle-guesser a little differently. Their accounts will be harmonized if we consider that Abdemon's son had the same name as his father. But the matter is of little moment.

and that Hiram proposed other riddles, which, when Solomon could not solve, he paid back a great deal of money to Hiram." This is the account of Dios.

CHAP. VI.

How Solomon fortified the City of Jerusalem, and built great Cities: and how he brought some of the Canaanites into Subjection, and entertained the Queen of Egypt and Ethiopia.

§ 1.

NOW when the king saw that the walls of Jerusalem stood in need of towers and other defences for their security (for he thought the walls that surrounded Jerusalem ought to correspond to the dignity of the city), he repaired them, and made them higher by great towers. He also built cities which might be counted among the strongest, as Hazor<sup>1</sup> and Megiddo,<sup>2</sup> and the third Gazar,<sup>3</sup> which had indeed belonged to the Philistines, but Pharaoh the king of Egypt had made an expedition against it, and besieged it, and taken it by storm, and when he had slain all its inhabitants, he razed it to the ground, and gave it as a present to his daughter who had married Solomon. So the king rebuilt it, as a city that was naturally strong, and might be useful in wars, or any reverses such as sometimes happen. Moreover, he built two other cities not far from it; Beth-horon<sup>4</sup> was the name of one of them, and Baalath<sup>5</sup> was the name of the other. He also built other cities that lay conveniently for these for enjoyment and pleasure, such as had naturally a good temperature of air, and were agreeable for fruits ripe in their proper seasons, and well watered with springs. Nay, Solomon went as far as the desert above Syria, and possessed himself of it, and built there a very great city, which was distant two days' journey from Upper Syria, and one day's journey from the Euphrates, and six days' journey from the great Babylon. Now, the reason why this city lay so remote from the inhabited parts of Syria was that below there is no water to be had, and that in that place only are there springs and wells of water. When he had therefore built this city, and thrown round it very strong walls, he gave it the name of Tadmor, and that is the name it is still called by to this day among the Syrians, but the Greeks call it Palmyra.

§ 2. So Solomon the king was at this time engaged in building these cities. Now if any people should ask why all the kings of Egypt from Minaeus, who built Memphis, and lived many years earlier than our forefather Abraham, until Solomon, during an interval of more than one thousand three hundred years, were called Pharaohs, and took that title from one Pharaoh who lived after the kings of that interval, I think it necessary to inform them, to cure their ignorance, and to make the reason of that name manifest. Pharaoh, in the Egyptian tongue, signifies a king.<sup>1</sup> I suppose they had other names in their childhood, but that, when they became kings, they changed them into the name which in their own tongue denoted their authority. Thus also the kings of Alexandria, who were called formerly by other names, when they took the kingdom, were called Ptolemies from their first king. The Roman emperors also are from their birth called by other names, but are called Cæsars because their empire and dignity imposes that name upon them, and so they do not continue in the names which their fathers gave them. I suppose also that Herodotus of Halicarnassus,<sup>1</sup> when he said there were three hundred and thirty kings of Egypt after Minaeus, who built Memphis,<sup>2</sup> did not tell us their names, because they were all in common called Pharaoh; for when after their death a queen reigned, he calls her by her name Nicaulis, thereby declaring, that as the male kings had the same name, while a woman could not have the same, he did therefore set down the name which she could not by nature have. As for myself, I have discovered from our own books, that after Pharaoh, the father-in-law of Solomon, no other king of Egypt did any longer use that name, and that it was after that time when the fore-mentioned queen of Egypt and Ethiopia came to Solomon. As to her I shall inform the reader presently; but I have now made mention of these things to prove that our books and those of the Egyptians agree together in many things.

§ 3. King Solomon also subdued the remnant of the Canaanites that had not before submitted, those, I mean, that dwelt in mount Lebanon and as far as the city of Hamath,<sup>3</sup> and ordered them to pay tribute. He also chose out of them every year such as were to serve him in the meanest offices, and to do his domestic work, and till the ground. For none of the Hebrews were slaves, (nor was it reasonable, when God had brought so many nations under their power, that they should depress their own people to such mean offices of life rather than them,) but all went armed to war with chariots and horses rather than lead the life of slaves. He appointed also five hundred and fifty overseers over those Canaanites who were reduced to such domestic slavery, who received the entire care of them from the king, and instructed them in those labours and operations wherein he wanted them.

city of Eloth.<sup>1</sup> This country belonged formerly to the Jews, and became useful for shipping in consequence of the donations of Hiram king of Tyre; for he sent there a sufficient number of pilots and men skilful in navigation, to whom Solomon gave command that they should sail with his stewards to the land that was of old called Ophir, but now the Land of Gold, (which belongs to India,) to fetch him gold. And when they had collected there four hundred talents, they returned to the king again.

§ 5. There lived in those days a woman who was queen of Egypt and Ethiopia,<sup>2</sup> a great student of philosophy, and on other accounts also one to be admired. When this queen heard of the virtue and wisdom of Solomon, she had a great mind to see him, and the reports that went every day abroad induced her to go to him. For being desirous to be satisfied by her own experience, and not by bare hearsay (for reports thus heard are likely enough to be false, as they wholly depend on the credit of the relators), she resolved to visit him, especially in order to test his wisdom by propounding questions of very great difficulty, and entreating that he would solve their hidden meaning. So she came to Jerusalem with great splendour and rich equipage; for she brought with her camels laden with gold and with several sorts of sweet spices and precious stones. Now the king in his kind reception of her showed a great desire to please her, and easily comprehending in his mind the meaning of the curious questions she propounded to him, he resolved them sooner than anybody could have expected. So she was amazed at the wisdom of Solomon, and discovered that it was more excellent upon trial than she had heard by report beforehand; and especially was she surprised at the fineness and largeness of the royal palace, and not less at the good order of the apartments, for she observed that the king had shown great wisdom therein. But she was beyond measure astonished at the house which was called the forest of Lebanon, as also at the magnificence of the king's daily table, and its preparation and serving, and at the apparel of his servants that waited, and their skilful and decorous attendance: nor was she less affected with those daily sacrifices which were offered to God, and the careful diligence which the priests and Levites displayed in connection with them. As she saw all this happening every day, she was in the greatest wonder imaginable, insomuch that she was not able to contain the surprise she was in, but openly confessed how wonderfully she was affected; for she proceeded to discourse with the king, and owned in her speech that she was overcome with wonder at the things I have related, and said; "All things indeed, O king, that come to our knowledge by report, come with uncertainty; but as to those good things that are yours, both what you yourself possess, I mean wisdom and prudence, and what your kingdom gives you, certainly the fame that came to us was no falsity, it was not only a true report, but it described your happiness as much less considerable than I now see it to be before my eyes. For report only attempted to persuade our hearing, but did not so much make known the value of the things themselves as does the sight of them, and the being present among them. I indeed, who did not believe what was reported, because of the multitude and grandeur of the things I heard, do see them to be much more numerous than they were reported to be. Accordingly I deem the Hebrew people, as well as your servants and friends, happy, who enjoy your presence, and hear your wisdom every day continually. One would therefore bless God, who has so loved this country, and those that dwell therein, as to make you king over them."

<sup>2</sup> That this queen of Sheba was a queen of Sabæa in South Arabia, and not of Egypt and Ethiopia, as Josephus here asserts, is, I suppose, now generally agreed. And since Sabæa is well known to be a country near the sea, south of Arabia Felix, which lay south from Judæa also; and since our Saviour calls this queen, 'the queen of the south,' and says, 'she came from the utmost parts of the earth,' Matth. xii. 42; Luke xi. 31, which descriptions agree better to this Arabia than to Egypt and Ethiopia, there is little occasion for doubt in the matter.

§ 6. When the queen had thus shown by her words how deeply the king had affected her, her disposition was also made known by various presents, for she gave him twenty talents of gold, and an immense quantity of spices, and precious stones. They say also that we owe the root of the balsam, which our country still produces, to this lady's gift. Solomon also gave her in return many good things, especially bestowing upon her what she chose of her own inclination, for there was nothing that she asked for which he denied her; and as he was very generous and liberal in his own disposition, so did he show the greatness of his soul by bestowing on her whatever she herself desired of him. And when this queen of Egypt and Ethiopia had obtained what I have already given an account of, and had given as presents to the king what she had brought with her, she returned to her own kingdom.

CHAP. VII.

How Solomon grew rich, and fell madly in love with Women, and how God, being incensed at it, raised up Hadad and Jeroboam against him. Concerning the Death of Solomon.

§ 1.

ABOUT the same time there were brought to the king from the country called the Land of Gold precious stones and pine trees, and these trees be made use of for propping up the temple and the palace, and also as the materials of musical instruments, harps and psalteries, that the Levites might make use of them in their hymns to God. The wood that was brought to him at this time was larger and finer than any that had ever been brought before; but let no one imagine that these pine trees were like those which are now so named, and which get that name from the merchants, who so call them to dazzle purchasers; for those we speak of were to the sight like the wood of the fig-tree, but whiter and more shining. I have said thus much, that nobody may be ignorant of the difference of these sorts of wood, or unacquainted with the nature of the genuine pine-tree, and I thought it both seasonable and kind to mankind, when I mentioned the uses the king made of it, to explain this difference.

§ 2. Now the weight of gold that was brought the king was six hundred and sixty-six talents, not including in that sum what was brought by the merchants, or what the governors and kings of Arabia gave him in presents. He also cast two hundred targets of gold, each of them weighing six hundred shekels. He also made three hundred shields, every one weighing three pounds of gold, and had them taken and put into the house which was called the forest of Lebanon. He also made cups of gold and precious stones for the entertainment of his guests, and had them adorned in the most artificial manner; and he contrived that all his other numerous vessels should be of gold, for there was nothing then sold or bought for silver. For the king had many ships which lay in the sea of Tarsus;<sup>1</sup> these he commanded to carry all sorts of merchandise to the remotest nations, by the sale of which silver and gold was brought to the king, and a great quantity of ivory, and Ethiopians, and apes. The voyage, going and returning, took three years.

§ 3. And there went a great fame all round the neighbouring countries, proclaiming the virtue and wisdom of Solomon, insomuch that all kings everywhere were desirous to see him, not giving credit to what was reported on account of its seeming almost incredible; they also showed the regard they had for him by the presents they made him; for they sent him vessels of gold and silver, and purple garments, and many sorts of spices, and horses and chariots, and as many mules for his carriages as they could find likely to please the king's eyes from their strength and beauty. This addition that he made to the chariots and horses which he had before by those that were sent him, augmented the number of his chariots by above four hundred (for he had a thousand before), and augmented the number of his horses by two thousand (for he had twenty thousand before). These horses also were so trained to make a fine appearance and run swiftly, that no others could upon comparison with them appear either finer or swifter; but they were at once the most beautiful of all, and their swiftness was incomparable. Their riders also were a further ornament to them, being in the first place young men in the most delightful flower of their age, and being also eminent for their stature and far taller than other men. They had also very long heads of hair hanging down, and were clothed in garments of Tyrian purple. They had also dust of gold every day sprinkled on their hair, so that their heads sparkled with the reflection of the gold in the sun. The king himself rode upon a chariot in the midst of these men (who were in armour and fitted with bows) dressed in a white garment, and so used to go out of the city in the morning. There was a certain place about sixty furlongs from Jerusalem called Etham,<sup>1</sup> very pleasant from its fine gardens, and abounding in rivulets of water;<sup>2</sup> there did he use to go out in the morning perched aloft in his chariot.

§ 4. Now Solomon had divine sagacity and zeal in all things, and was very fond of having things done in an elegant manner: so he did not neglect the care of the ways, but he laid a highway of black stone along the road that led to Jerusalem, which was the royal city, both to make the road very easy for travellers, and to manifest the grandeur of his riches and government. He also divided his chariots and disposed them in a regular order, that a certain number of them should be in every city, (still, however, keeping a few about his own person,) and those cities he called the cities of his chariots. And the king made silver as plentiful in Jerusalem as stones in the street; and so multiplied cedar-trees, which did not grow there before, in the plains of Judæa, that they were like sycamore-trees for abundance. He also commissioned the Egyptian merchants that brought him their merchandise to sell him chariots with a pair of horses for six hundred drachmæ of silver each, and he sent them as presents to the kings of Syria, and to those kings that were beyond the Euphrates.

§ 5. But although Solomon was become the most glorious of kings and the best beloved of God, and exceeded in wisdom and riches those that had been rulers of the Hebrews before him, yet he did not persevere in this happy state till he died, but forsook the observation of the law of his fathers, and came to an end no way suitable to my foregoing account of him. For he grew mad in his love of women, and laid no restraint on his sexual appetite, nor was he satisfied with the women of his own country alone, but he married many wives out of foreign nations, as Sidonians, and Tyrians, and Ammonites, and Edomites, and transgressed the laws of Moses, which forbade Jews to marry any but those that were of their own people, and also began to worship their gods, which he did to gratify his wives, and out of affection for them. Our legislator suspected this very thing when he admonished us beforehand that we should not marry women of other countries, lest we should be entangled with foreign customs and apostatize from our own, and should leave off to honour our own God, and should worship their gods. But Solomon was fallen headlong into blind passion, and regarded not these admonitions. For when he had married seven hundred wives,<sup>1</sup> the daughters of princes and eminent persons, besides the king of Egypt's daughter, and had also three hundred concubines, he was soon governed by them till he came to imitate their practices. He was forced to give them this proof of his kindness and affection to them, namely to live according to the laws of their countries. And as he grew in years, and his reason became too weak in process of time to recall to his mind the institutions of his own country, he still more neglected his own God, and continued to regard the gods of his strange wives. Nay, even before this happened, he sinned and fell into error about the observation of the law, when he made the images of brazen oxen that supported the brazen sea,<sup>1</sup> and the images of lions about his own throne, although it was impious so to do; and this he did, notwithstanding that he had in his father a most excellent and domestic pattern of virtue, and knew what a glorious character he had left behind him because of his piety towards God, nor did he imitate him, although God had twice appeared to him in his sleep, and exhorted him to imitate his father, so he died ingloriously. For a prophet came soon to him, who was sent by God, and told him that his wicked actions were not concealed from God, and threatened him that he should not long rejoice in what he had done, that the kingdom indeed should not be taken from him while he was alive, because God had promised his father David that he would make him his successor, but that he would take care that this should befall his son when he was dead; not that he would withdraw all the people from him, but he would give ten tribes to a servant of his, and leave only two tribes to David's grandson, for David's sake, because he loved God, and for the sake of the city Jerusalem, wherein he wished to have a temple.

§ 6. When Solomon heard this he was grieved, and greatly confounded at this change into so bad a state from almost all that happiness which had made him to be admired. Nor did much time elapse after the prophet had foretold what was coming, before God raised up an enemy against him, whose name was Hadad, who had the following reason for his enmity against him. He was a child of the stock of the Edomites, and of the blood royal; and when Joab, the captain of David's host, laid waste the land of Edom for six months, and destroyed all the men that were grown and able to bear arms, this Hadad alone escaped, and went to Pharaoh the king of Egypt, who received him kindly, and gave him a house to dwell in, and land to supply him with food, and when he was grown up, loved him exceedingly, insomuch that he gave him his wife's sister, whose name was Tahpenes, to wife, by whom he had a son who was brought up with the king's children. When Hadad heard in Egypt that both David and Joab were dead, he went to Pharaoh, and begged that he would permit him to return to his own country; upon which the king asked him what it was that he wanted, and what hardships he had met with, that he was so desirous to leave him. And though he was often troublesome to him, and entreated him to let him go, he did not then, but at the time when Solomon's affairs began to grow worse on account of his forementioned transgressions, and God's anger against him for the same, Hadad went to Edom by Pharaoh's permission. And as he was not able to make the people revolt from Solomon, for Edom was kept under by many garrisons, and a rising could not take place with safety, he removed thence and went into Syria; and there he lit upon one Rezon, who had run away from Adrazar, king of Sophene,<sup>1</sup> his master, and was become a robber in that country, and joined friendship with him, as he had already a band of robbers about him. Then he went up the country, and seized upon that part of Syria, and was made king thereof. He also made incursions into the land of Israel, and did it no small mischief, and plundered it, and that in the lifetime of Solomon. And this was the calamity which the Hebrews suffered at the hand of Hadad.

§ 7. One also of Solomon's own nation rose up against him, namely Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who was full of ambition, from a prophecy that had been made to him long before. He was left a child by his father, and brought up by his mother, and when Solomon saw that he was of a noble and bold disposition, he made him the overseer of the walls which he built round about Jerusalem; and he superintended those works so well, that the king approved of his behaviour, and gave him as a reward for the same the military command over the tribe of Joseph. And when about that time Jeroboam was once going out of Jerusalem, a prophet from the city of Shiloh,<sup>1</sup> whose name was Ahijah, met him, and saluted him, and when he had taken him a little aside to a place out of the way, where there was no other person present, he rent the garment he had on into twelve pieces, and bade Jeroboam take ten of them, and prophesied to him, "This is the will of God, he will break up the dominion of Solomon, and give one tribe with that which is next it to his son, because of the promise made to David, and will give ten tribes to you, because Solomon has sinned against him, and given himself up to women and their gods. As, therefore, you know the reason why God has changed his mind and is alienated from Solomon, try to be righteous, and keep the laws, because the greatest of all rewards is proposed to you for your piety and honour to God, namely, to be as greatly exalted as you know David was."

§ 8. So Jeroboam was elated by the words of the prophet, and being a young man of warm temper, and ambitious of greatness, he could not be quiet; and when he had his military command, and called to mind what had been revealed to him by Ahijah, he endeavoured to persuade the people to revolt from Solomon, and to make a disturbance, and transfer the kingdom to himself. But when Solomon understood his intention and treachery, he sought to arrest and kill him; but Jeroboam was informed of this beforehand, and fled to Shishak the king of Egypt, and there abode till the death of Solomon, by which means he gained these two advantages, that he suffered no harm from Solomon, and was preserved for the kingdom. And Solomon died when he was already an old man, having reigned eighty years, and lived ninety-four, and he was buried at Jerusalem, having been superior to all other kings in happiness and riches and wisdom, excepting that, when he was growing into years, he was deluded by women and transgressed the law; concerning which transgressions, and the miseries which befell the Hebrews thereby, I propose fully to enter into on another occasion.

CHAP. VIII.

How, upon the death of Solomon, the People forsook his Son Rehoboam, and elected Jeroboam King over the ten Tribes.

§ 1.

NOW when Solomon was dead, and his son Rehoboam, (who was by an Ammonitish wife, whose name was Naamah,) had succeeded him in the kingdom, the rulers of the multitude sent immediately to Egypt, and recalled Jeroboam; and when he was come to them to the city Shechem,<sup>1</sup> Rehoboam went to it also, for he had resolved to declare himself king to the Israelites, while they were gathered together there. So the rulers of the people and Jeroboam went to him and besought him to relax the servitude imposed on them, and to be milder than his father, for they had borne under his father a heavy yoke, and said they would then be better affected to him, and be well contented to serve him under a milder despotism more out of love than fear. But Rehoboam told them to come to him again in three days' time, when he would give an answer to their request. This delay gave occasion to suspicion at once, since he had not given them a favourable answer immediately, for they thought he should have given them a kind and gentle answer off-hand, especially as he was but young. However, they thought that his deliberation about it, and the fact that he did not give them a denial on the spot, afforded them some good hope of success.

§ 2. Rehoboam now called his father's friends, and considered with them what sort of answer he ought to give to the people; upon which they gave him the advice which became friends, and such as knew the temper of multitudes. They advised him to speak kindly to the people, and more in a popular way than with the grandeur of a king, because he would thereby make them submit to him with good-will, it being most agreeable to subjects that their kings should be affable and put themselves almost upon the level with them. But Rehoboam rejected this so good, and in general so profitable advice, (it was so at least at this time, when he was to be made king,) God himself, I suppose, causing what was most advantageous to be rejected by him. So he called for the young men, who were brought up with him, and told them what advice the elders had given him, and bade them say what they thought he should do. They advised him to give the following answer to the people, (for neither their youth, nor God himself, suffered them to discern what was best,) that his little finger should be thicker than his father's loins; and if they had met with hard usage from his father, they should experience much rougher treatment from him, for if his father had chastised them with whips, they must expect that he would chastise them with scorpions.<sup>1</sup> The king was pleased with this advice, and thought it agreeable to the dignity of his kingdom to give them such an answer. Accordingly, when the people were come together to hear his answer on the third day, all were in great expectation, and very intent to hear what the king would say to them, and supposed they should hear something of a kind nature, but he neglected the advice of his friends, and answered as the young men had counselled him. Now this happened according to the will of God, that what Ahijah had foretold might come to pass.

§ 3. By these words the people were struck as it were by iron, and were as grieved at what was said as if they had already felt the effects of it, and felt great indignation at the king, and all cried out aloud and said that they had no longer any relation to David or his posterity after that day. And they said further that they would leave to Rehoboam only the temple which his father had built, and they threatened to forsake him. Nay they were so bitter and retained their wrath so long, that when he sent Adoram, who was over the tribute, to pacify them and render them milder, and urge them to forgive him if he had said to them anything that was rash or peevish owing to the impetuosity of youth, they would not listen to him, but threw stones at him and killed him. When Rehoboam saw this, he thought himself aimed at by the stones with which they had killed his servant, and feared lest he should actually lose his life too, so he got immediately into his chariot and fled to Jerusalem, where the tribes of Judah and Benjamin elected him king: but the rest of the tribes revolted from the house of David from that day, and appointed Jeroboam to be their ruler. Upon this, Rehoboam, Solomon's son, assembled a great meeting of the two tribes that had submitted to him, and intended to take a hundred and eighty thousand chosen men of his army, to make an expedition against Jeroboam and his people, that he might force them by war to be his servants; but he was forbidden by God through the prophet [Shemaiah] to go to war, for he said that it was not right that fellow-countrymen should fight against one another, and that this revolt of the people was according to the purpose of God. So he did not set out. And now I will relate first the actions of Jeroboam the king of Israel, after which I shall relate the actions of Rehoboam the king of the two tribes; by this means we shall preserve the order of the history throughout.

§ 4. Jeroboam then built him a palace in the city of Shechem, and dwelt there. He also built him another at a city called Penuel.<sup>1</sup> And as the feast of tabernacles was now near at hand, Jeroboam considered that, if he should permit the people to go and worship God at Jerusalem, and celebrate the festival there, they would possibly repent of what they had done, and be enticed by the temple and worship of God there performed, and would leave him and return to their first king; and if so, he would run risk of losing his own life. So he invented the following contrivance. He made two golden calves, and built two little temples for them, one in the city of Bethel,<sup>2</sup> and the other in Dan,<sup>3</sup> which last was at the fountains of the lesser Jordan, and he put the calves into the little temples in the fore-mentioned cities. And when he had called the ten tribes together, over whom he ruled, he made a speech to the people in the following words:—"I suppose, my fellow-countrymen, that you know this, that every place has God in it, nor is there any one definite place in which he is, but he everywhere hears and sees those that worship him; on which account I do not think it right to force you to go so long a journey to Jerusalem, which is an enemy's city, to worship him. It was a man that built the temple: I have also made two golden calves to represent God; one of them I have consecrated in the city of Bethel, and the other in Dan, that those of you that dwell nearest those cities may go to them and worship God there. And I will ordain for you certain priests and Levites from among yourselves, that you may have no need of the tribe of Levi or of the sons of Aaron; and let him that is desirous among you of being a priest, bring to God a calf and a ram, which they say Aaron the first priest did." Jeroboam in saying this deluded the people, and made them revolt from the worship of their forefathers, and transgress their laws. This was the beginning of miseries to the Hebrews, and the cause why they were overcome in war by foreigners and fell into captivity. But I shall relate these things in their proper place.

§ 5. When the feast was just at hand in the seventh month, Jeroboam was desirous to celebrate it himself in Bethel, as the two tribes celebrated it in Jerusalem. Accordingly, he built an altar before the calf, and undertook to be high priest himself. So he went up to the altar, with his own priests about him; but as he was going to offer the sacrifices and the burnt-offerings in the sight of all the people, a prophet sent by God, whose name was Jadon, came to him from Jerusalem, and stood in the midst of the multitude, and in the hearing of the king, and directing his discourse to the altar, spoke as follows: "God foretells that there shall be a certain man of the family of David, Josiah by name, who shall sacrifice upon thee those false priests that shall live at that time, and shall burn upon thee the bones of these deceivers of the people, these impostors and wicked wretches. However, that this people may believe that these things shall be so, I foretell a sign to them that shall soon come to pass. This altar shall be rent in pieces immediately, and all the fat of the victims shall be poured upon the ground." When the prophet had said this, Jeroboam fell into a passion, and stretched out his hand, and bade them arrest Jadon; but the hand which he stretched out was enfeebled, and he was not able to pull it in to him again, for it was become withered, and hung down as if it were a dead hand. The altar also was rent in pieces, and all that was upon it was poured out, as the prophet had foretold should come to pass. Then the king understood that he was a man of truth and had a divine foreknowledge, and entreated him to pray to God that he would restore his right hand. Accordingly the prophet did pray to God to grant him that request. And the king having his hand restored to its natural state, rejoiced at it, and invited the prophet to dine with him; but Jadon said that he dare not come into his house, nor taste of bread or water in that city, for that was a thing God had forbidden him to do, as also to go back by the way which he came, for he said he was to return by another way. And the king wondered at the self-control of the man, but was himself in fear, suspecting a change of his affairs for the worse from what had been predicted to him.

CHAP. IX.

How Jadon the Prophet was persuaded by a lying Prophet, and returned to Bethel, and was afterwards slain by a Lion. Also what words the wicked Prophet made use of to persuade the King, and thereby alienated his Mind from God.

§ 1.

NOW there was a certain wicked old man in that city who was a false prophet, whom Jeroboam held in great esteem, though deceived by him and his flattering words. This man was bed-ridden at this time by reason of the infirmities of old age; however, he was informed by his sons of the prophet that had come from Jerusalem, and of the signs done by him ; and how, when Jeroboam's right hand had been withered, at the prophet's prayer he had it restored again. Whereupon he was afraid that this stranger would be held in better esteem by the king than himself, and obtain greater honour from him, and he gave order to his sons to saddle his ass at once, and to make all ready that he might go out. And as they made haste to do what they were commanded, he got upon the ass, and followed after the prophet, and overtook him as he was resting under a very large oak tree that was thick and shady, and first saluted him, and then blamed him because he had not come to his house and partaken of his hospitality. And when the other said that God had forbidden him to taste food with any one in that city, he replied, "Certainly God did not forbid you to dine at my table, for I am a prophet as you are, and worship God in the same manner as you do, and am now come sent by him to bring you to my house, and make you my guest." And Jadon gave credit to this lying prophet, and returned back with him. But when they were at dinner and merry together, God appeared to Jadon, and said that he should suffer punishment for transgressing his commands, and told him what that punishment should be ; for he said that he should meet with a lion as he was going on his way, by whom he should be torn in pieces, so that he should not be buried in the sepulchres of his fathers. And this came to pass, I suppose, according to the will of God, that so Jeroboam might not give heed to the words of Jadon, as one that had been convicted of lying. And as Jadon was returning to Jerusalem, a lion attacked him, and pulled him off his beast, and slew him, yet did not at all hurt the ass, but sat by him and guarded him, as also the prophet's body. This continued till some travellers that saw it came and told it in the city to the false prophet, who sent his sons, and brought the body back to Bethel, and made a funeral for him at great expense. He also charged his sons to bury himself with him, for he said that all which he had foretold against that city, and the altar, and priests, and false prophets, would prove true: and that, if he were buried with him, he would receive no injurious treatment after his death, as their bones would not then be distinguishable apart. And when he had performed those funeral rites to the prophet, and had given that charge to his sons, as he was a wicked and impious man, he went to Jeroboam, and said to him, "Why ever were you disturbed at the words of that silly fellow?" And when the king had related to him what had happened to the altar and his own hand, and gave Jadon the name of a truly divine man and excellent prophet, he endeavoured by a wicked trick to weaken that opinion of his, and by using plausible words concerning what had happened, to shake their reality. For he attempted to persuade him that his hand was numbed by the labour it had undergone in lifting the sacrifices, and that upon its resting awhile it returned to its usual condition again; and that, as to the altar, it was but new, and had borne a great many heavy sacrifices, and was accordingly rent in pieces, and had fallen down from the weight of what had been laid upon it. He also informed him of the death of him that had foretold those things, and how he was slain by a lion, so that he had not any thing in him of a prophet, nor spoke like one. By speaking thus he persuaded the king, and entirely alienated his mind from God, and from works that were righteous and holy, and encouraged him to go on in his impious practices; and accordingly, he to that degree outraged God, and was so great a transgressor, that he sought for nothing else every day, but how he might be guilty of some new wickedness more detestable than what he had been so insolent as to do before. And so much shall at present suffice to have said concerning Jeroboam.

CHAP. X.

§ 1.

NOW Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, who was, as I said before, king of the two tribes, built the strong and large cities of Bethlehem,<sup>1</sup> and Etam,<sup>2</sup> and Tekoa,<sup>3</sup> and Bethsur,<sup>4</sup> and Socho,<sup>5</sup> and Adullam,<sup>6</sup> and Ipan,<sup>7</sup> and Maresha,<sup>8</sup> and Ziph,<sup>9</sup> and Adoram,<sup>10</sup> and Lachish,<sup>11</sup> and Azekah,<sup>12</sup> and Saraim,<sup>13</sup> and Elom<sup>14</sup> and Hebron.<sup>15</sup> These he built first of all in the tribe of Judah. He also built other large cities in the tribe of Benjamin. And he walled them about, and put garrisons in them all, and captains, and a great deal of corn and wine and oil, and furnished every one of them plentifully with other provisions that were necessary for sustenance; moreover, he put therein shields and spears for many myriads. The priests also and Levites that were in all Israel, and any other of the people that were good and righteous men, gathered themselves together to him, having left their own cities, that they might worship God in Jerusalem: for they were not willing to be forced to worship the calves which Jeroboam had made; and they swelled the population of the kingdom of Rehoboam for three years. And after Rehoboam had married a woman of his own kindred, and had by her three children, he married also another of his own kindred, whose name was Maachah, who was daughter of Absalom by Tamar, and by her he had a son whom he called Abijah. He had also many children by other wives, but he loved Maachah above them all. Now he had eighteen legitimate wives, and thirty concubines: and he had twenty-eight sons, and threescore daughters: but he appointed Abijah, his son by Maachah, to be his successor in the kingdom; and intrusted him with his treasures and strongest cities.

§ 2. Now I think that success in affairs and a change for the better often becomes the cause of mischief and transgression in men. For when Rehoboam saw his kingdom so much increased, he lapsed into unrighteous and irreligious practices, and despised the worship of God, till the people themselves under him imitated his wicked actions. For the manners of subjects get corrupt simultaneously with those of their governors, for they then lay aside their own sober way of living as if it would be a reproof of their governors' intemperate courses, and follow their wickedness as if it were virtue, for it is not possible for men to seem to approve of the actions of their kings, unless they act in the same way. So it happened now to the subjects of Rehoboam, for when he was grown impious and a transgressor himself, they were studious not to offend him by resolving still to be righteous. But God sent Shishak king of Egypt to punish them for their outrages against him, concerning whom Herodotus was mistaken in attributing his actions to Sesostris. This Shishak then in the fifth year of the reign of Rehoboam made an expedition into Judæa with many myriads, for he had one thousand two hundred chariots with him, and sixty thousand horse, and four hundred thousand foot. Of this army he brought with him most were Libyans and Ethiopians. Now, therefore, when he invaded the country of the Hebrews, he took the strongest cities of Rehoboam's kingdom without fighting, and when he had put garrisons in them, he went last of all to Jerusalem.

§ 3. Now when Rehoboam and the people with him were shut up in Jerusalem by the army of Shishak, and when they besought God to give them victory and deliverance, they could not persuade God to be on their side; but Shemaiah the prophet told them, that God threatened to forsake them, as they had forsaken his worship. When they heard this, they were immediately in great consternation of mind, and seeing no way of deliverance, they all earnestly set themselves to confess that God might justly neglect them, since they had been guilty of impiety towards him, and had violated his laws. And when God saw them in that disposition, and that they acknowledged their sins, he told the prophet that he would not destroy them, but that he would, however, put them into the hands of the Egyptians, that they might learn whether they would suffer less by serving men or God. And when Shishak had taken the city without fighting, because Rehoboam was afraid and received him into it, he did not stand to the covenants he had made, but spoiled the temple, and emptied the treasures of God and the king, and carried off innumerable myriads of gold and silver, and left nothing at all behind him. He also took away the golden bucklers and shields, which Solomon the king had made; nay, he did not leave the golden quivers which David had taken from the king of Sophene,<sup>1</sup> and had dedicated to God. And when he had thus done, he returned to his own kingdom. Now Herodotus of Halicarnassus mentions this expedition, having only made mistake in the king's name, and [in saying that] he made war upon several other nations also, and brought Palestinian Syria into subjection, and took the men that were therein prisoners without fighting. Now it is manifest that he intended to declare that our nation was subdued by the king of Egypt; for he says that "he left behind him pillars in the land of those that delivered themselves up to him without fighting, and engraved upon them the secret parts of women." And our king Rehoboam delivered up our city without fighting. Herodotus says also<sup>2</sup> that "the Ethiopians learned circumcision from the

<sup>2</sup> Herodotus, as here quoted by Josephus, and as this passage still stands in his present copies, b. ii. chap. civ. affirms, That "the Phœnicians and Syrians in Palestine [which last are generally supposed to denote the Jews] owned their receiving circumcision from the Egyptians;" whereas, it is abundantly evident, that the Jews received their circumcision from the patriarch Abraham, Gen. xvii. 9-14, John vii. 22, 23, as I conclude the Egyptian priests did also. It is not therefore very un-

Egyptians; for the Phœnicians and Syrians that live in Palestine confess that they learned the practice from the Egyptians." Yet it is evident, that no other of the Syrians that live in Palestine besides us are circumcised. But as to such matters, let everyone say what is agreeable to his own opinion.

§ 4. When Shishak had gone away, Rehoboam the king made bucklers and shields of brass instead of those of gold, and delivered the same number of them to the keepers of the king's palace; and, instead of warlike expeditions, and the glory which results from those actions, he reigned in great quietness, though not without fear, being always an enemy to Jeroboam. And he died when he had lived fifty-seven years, and reigned seventeen. He was in his disposition a proud and foolish man, and lost most of his dominions by not hearkening to his father's friends. He was buried at Jerusalem in the sepulchres of the kings; and his son Abijah succeeded him in the kingdom, in the eighteenth year of Jeroboam's reign over the ten tribes. And this was the conclusion of these affairs. It is now our business to relate the affairs of Jeroboam, and how he ended his life: for he ceased not nor rested from being outrageous to God, but every day raised up altars upon high mountains, and went on making priests of the common people.

likely that Herodotus, because the Jews had lived long in Egypt, and came out of it circumcised, did therefore think they had learned circumcision in Egypt, and had it not before. Manetho, the famous Egyptian chronologer and historian, who knew the history of his own country much better than Herodotus, complains frequently of his mistakes about their affairs, as does Josephus more than once in this chapter; nor indeed does Herodotus seem at all acquainted with the affairs of the Jews; for as he never names them, so little or nothing of what he says about them, their country, or maritime cities, two of which he alone mentions, Cadytns and Jenysus, proves true; nor indeed do there appear to have ever been such cities on their coast.—W.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning the Death of a Son of Jeroboam. How Jeroboam was beaten by Abijah, who died a little afterwards and was succeeded in his Kingdom by Asa. Also how, after the Death of Jeroboam, Baasha destroyed his son Nadab, and all the House of Jeroboam.

§ 1.

HOWEVER, God intended at no late date to recompense Jeroboam's wicked actions, and the punishment they deserved, upon his own head, and upon the head of all his house. As a son of his, who was called Abijah, was ill at that time, he enjoined his wife to lay aside her robes, and to put on the dress of a private person, and to go to Ahijah the prophet, for Jeroboam said he was a wonderful man in foretelling future things, it having been he who told him that he would be king. He also enjoined her, when she got to him, to inquire concerning the lad, whether he should recover, as if she were a stranger. And she did as her husband bade her, and changed her dress, and went to the city of Shiloh, for there did Ahijah live: and as she was going into his house, as his eyes were then dim with age, God appeared to him, and informed him of two things, first that the wife of Jeroboam was come to him, and secondly what answer he should make to her inquiry. Accordingly, as she was entering into the house like a private person and a stranger, he cried out, "Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam! Why concealest thou thyself? Thou art not concealed from God, who hath appeared to me, and informed me that thou wast coming, and hath commanded me what to say to thee." Then he told her to return to her husband, and speak to him as follows from God: "As I made thee a great man when thou wast little, or rather wast nothing, and rent the kingdom from the house of David and gave it to thee, and thou hast been unmindful of these benefits, and hast left off my worship, and hast made thee molten gods and honoured them; I will in like manner cast thee down again, and will destroy all thy house, and make them food for dogs and birds; for a certain king shall be raised up by me over all this people, who shall leave none of the family of Jeroboam remaining. The people also shall themselves partake of the same punishment, and shall be cast out of this good land, and shall be scattered into regions beyond the Euphrates, because they have followed the wicked practices of their king, and have worshipped the gods that he made, and forsaken my sacrifices. And do thou, lady, make haste back to thy husband, and tell him this message; but thou shalt find thy son dead, for as thou enterest the city he shall depart this life: yet shall he be buried with the lamentation of all the people, and honoured with a general mourning, for he is the only good person in Jeroboam's family." When the prophet had foretold these events, Jeroboam's wife went away hastily with a troubled mind, and greatly grieved at the death of the forenamed lad. So she was in lamentation as she went along the road, and mourned for the impending death of her son, and was indeed in a wretched condition at the unavoidable misery of his death, and hastened on in circumstances very unfortunate as to her son, for the greater despatch she made, the sooner would she see her son dead, yet was she forced to make such haste on account of her husband. And when she had returned, she found that her son had given up the ghost, as the prophet had said, and she told everything to the king.

§ 2. However, Jeroboam did not lay any of these things to heart, but he got together a numerous army, and made a warlike expedition against Abijah, the son of Rehoboam, who had succeeded his father as king over the two tribes, for he despised him because of his age. But when he heard of the expedition of Jeroboam, he was not dismayed at it, but proved of a courageous temper of mind, superior both to his youth and the hopes of his enemy; for he chose him an army out of the two tribes, and met Jeroboam at a place called Mount Semaron,<sup>1</sup> and pitched his camp near him, and made all necessary preparations for the fight. His army consisted of four hundred thousand, but the army of Jeroboam was double that. Now, as the armies stood in battle array, ready for action and dangers, and were just going to fight, Abijah stood upon an elevated place, and beckoned with his hand, and desired the people and Jeroboam himself to hear first with silence what he had to say. And when silence was made, he began to speak as follows. "That God gave David and his house the kingdom for all time you yourselves are not ignorant; so I cannot but wonder how you should revolt from my father, and join yourselves to his servant Jeroboam, and come now with him here to fight against those who by God's own will are to reign, and to deprive them of that dominion which still belongs to them; for as to the greater part of it Jeroboam is unjustly in possession of it. However, I do not suppose he will enjoy it much longer, but when he has paid God the penalty for what is past, he will leave off the transgressions he has been guilty of, and the outrages he has offered to him, and which he still continues to offer, and has persuaded you to do the same; yet when you were not any further unjustly treated by my father than that he did not speak to you so as to please you, in compliance with the advice of wicked men, you in anger seemingly forsook him, but in reality you withdrew yourselves from God and his laws. And yet it would have been well for you to have forgiven a man young in age, and not used to court popularity, not only some disagreeable words, but also if his youth and unskilfulness in affairs had led him into some unfortunate action, for the sake of his father Solomon, and the benefits you received from him; for men ought to excuse the sins of the children on account of the good deeds of the parents. But you considered nothing of all this then, neither do you consider it now, as you are come with so great an army against us. And what is it you depend upon for victory? is it upon the golden calves, and the altars that you have on high places, which are proofs of your impiety, and not of religious worship? Or is it the exceeding multitude of your army that makes you so sanguine? But certainly there is no strength at all in an army of many myriads when the war is unjust; for we ought to place our surest hopes of success against our enemies in righteousness alone, and in our piety towards God, which hope we justly have, since we have kept the laws from the beginning, and have worshipped our own God, who was not made by hands out of corruptible matter, nor devised by a wicked king to deceive the multitude, but who is his own work, and the beginning and end of all things. I therefore counsel you even now to repent, and to take better advice, and to leave off the prosecution of the war, and to call to mind the laws of your country, and to reflect what it is that advanced you to so great a position."

§ 3. This is the speech which Abijah made to the people. But while he was still speaking, Jeroboam sent some of his soldiers secretly to cut off Abijah in certain parts of the camp that were not visible; and when he was thus in the reach of the enemy, his army was dismayed and their courage failed them; but Abijah encouraged them, and exhorted them to place their hopes in God, for he could not be cut off by the enemy. So they all at once implored the divine assistance, while the priests sounded with the trumpet, and shouted and fell upon their enemies, and God broke the courage and impaired the strength of their enemies, and made Abijah's army superior to them. And God vouchsafed to grant them a wonderful and very famous victory; and such a slaughter was now made of Jeroboam's army, as is never recorded to have happened in any other war,<sup>1</sup> whether of Greeks or Barbarians, for they slaughtered five hundred thousand of their enemies, and they took their strongest cities by storm, and spoiled them; and they also did the same to Bethel and her towns, and to Jeshanah<sup>2</sup> and her towns. And

<sup>1</sup> By this terrible, and perfectly unparalleled slaughter of 500,000 men of the newly idolatrous and rebellious ten tribes, God's high displeasure and indignation against that idolatry and rebellion fully appeared; the remainder were thereby seriously cautioned not to persist in them, and a kind of balance or equilibrium was made between the ten and two tribes for the time to come; for otherwise the perpetually idolatrous and rebellious ten tribes would naturally have been too powerful for the two tribes; which were pretty frequently free both from such idolatry and rebellion; nor is there any reason to doubt of the truth of the prodigious number slain upon this occasion.—W.

Jeroboam never recovered this defeat during the life of Abijah, who did not long survive, for he reigned but three years, and was buried in Jerusalem in the sepulchres of his forefathers. He left behind him twenty-two sons, and sixteen daughters; and he had all these children by fourteen wives; and Asa his son succeeded him in the kingdom, a young man whose mother was Maachah. During his reign the country of the Israelites enjoyed peace for ten years.

§ 4. So much for Abijah, the son of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, as his history has come down to us. As for Jeroboam, the king of the ten tribes, he died when he had governed them two-and-twenty years; and his son Nadab succeeded him, in the second year of the reign of Asa. And Jeroboam's son reigned two years, and resembled his father in impiety and wickedness. In those two years he made an expedition against Gabatho,<sup>1</sup> a city of the Philistines, and sat down to take it by siege; but he was conspired against while he was there by a friend of his, whose name was Baasha, the son of Machel, and was slain; and Baasha seized the kingdom after his death, and destroyed the whole house of Jeroboam. It also came to pass, according as God had foretold, that some of Jeroboam's kindred that died in the city were torn to pieces and devoured by dogs, and others of them that died in the fields were torn and devoured by birds. So the house of Jeroboam suffered the just punishment of his impiety and wicked actions.

CHAP. XII.

How Zarah King of the Ethiopians was beaten by Asa ; and how Asa, upon Baasha's making war against him, invited the King of the Damascenes to assist him ; and how, on the Destruction of the House of Baasha, Omri got the Kingdom, and his Son Ahab after him.

§ 1.

NOW Asa, the king of Jerusalem, was of an excellent character, and had a regard to God, and neither did nor designed anything but what was pious and had relation to the observation of the laws. He made a reformation of his kingdom, and cut off whatever was wicked therein, and purified it from every impurity. And he had an army of chosen men armed with targets and spears, of the tribe of Judah three hundred thousand, and of the tribe of Benjamin two hundred and fifty thousand that bore shields and drew bows. And when he had just reigned ten years, Zarah king of Ethiopia made an expedition against him, with a great army of nine hundred thousand foot and one hundred thousand horse, and three hundred chariots, and came as far as Mareshah,<sup>1</sup> a city that belonged to the tribe of Judah. Now when Zarah had come so far with his own army Asa met him, and put his army in battle array over against him, in a valley called Saphtha,<sup>2</sup> not far from the city, and when he saw the multitude of the Ethiopians, he cried out, and besought God to give him the victory, and that he might kill many myriads of the enemy. "For," said he, "I depend on nothing else but the assistance which I expect from thee, which is able to make the fewer superior to the more numerous, and the weaker to the stronger, in venturing to meet Zarah and fight him."

§ 2. While Asa was saying this, God signified that he should be victorious, and joining battle cheerfully on account of what God foretold about the issue of it, he slew a great many of the Ethiopians, and when he had put them to flight, he pursued them to the country near Gerar.<sup>1</sup> And when he and his army left off killing their enemies, they betook themselves to spoiling them (for the city Gerar was now taken), and to spoiling their camp, so that they carried off much gold and silver, and a great deal of spoil, and camels and beasts of burden and flocks of sheep. And when Asa and his army had obtained such a victory and such wealth from God, they returned to Jerusalem. Now, as they were near the city, a prophet, whose name was Azariah, met them on the road, and bade them stop their journey a little; and began to tell them that the reason why they had obtained this victory from God was that they had shown themselves righteous and religious men, and had done everything according to the will of God. He said also that, if they persevered therein, God would grant that they should always overcome their enemies and live happily: but that, if they left off his worship, all things should fall out contrary; and a time should come, when no true prophet should be left in the whole nation, nor a priest who should give good advice, but their cities should be overthrown, and their nation scattered over the whole earth, and live the life of strangers and vagabonds. So he advised them, while they had time, to be good, and not to deprive themselves of the favour of God. When the king and the people heard this they rejoiced, and all in common, and every one in particular, took great care to behave themselves righteously. The king also sent some to take care that the people should observe the laws also throughout the country.

§ 3. Such was the behaviour of Asa, king of the two tribes. I now return to Baasha, the king of the people of the Israelites, who slew Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, and seized his kingdom. He dwelt in the city of Tirzah,<sup>2</sup> having made that city his capital, and reigned twenty-four years. He became more wicked and impious than Jeroboam or his son. He ground down the people, and outraged God, who sent the prophet Jehu to him, and told him beforehand, that he would destroy his whole family and bring the same miseries on his house as had brought that of Jeroboam to ruin, because, though he had been made king by him, he had not requited his kindness by governing the people righteously and religiously, (which things in the first place tended to their own happiness, and were in the next place pleasing to God,) but had imitated that very wicked king Jeroboam; and although that man's soul had perished, yet did he express to the life his wickedness; and he said that he should therefore justly experience the like calamity as him, as he had been guilty of the like wickedness. But Baasha, though he heard beforehand what miseries would befall him and his whole family for his audacious behaviour, yet did not leave off his wicked practices for the time to come, nor did he care to appear to be other than worse and worse till he died, nor did he repent of his past actions, nor endeavour to obtain pardon of God for them, but (as those who have rewards proposed to them, when they have once in earnest set about their work, do not leave off their labours), so did Baasha, when the prophet foretold to him what would come to pass, grow worse, as if what were threatened, the ruin of his family and destruction of his house, (which are really among the greatest of evils,) were good things; and, as if he were an athlete for wickedness, he every day took more and more pains about it. And at last he took his army, and assaulted a certain considerable city called Ramah,<sup>1</sup> which was forty furlongs from Jerusalem; and when he had taken it he fortified it, having determined beforehand to leave a garrison in it, and make it a point d'appui from whence they might make raids and do mischief to the kingdom of Asa.

§ 4. And Asa being afraid of this hostile move of the enemy, and reflecting how much mischief this army that was left in Ramah might do to the country over which he reigned, sent ambassadors to the king of the Damascenes with gold and silver, begging for his assistance, and reminding him of their old mutual friendship in the times of their forefathers. And he gladly received that sum of money, and made a league with Asa, and broke off his friendship with Baasha, and sent the commanders of his own forces to the cities that were under Baasha's dominion, and ordered them to do them mischief. So they went and burnt some of them and spoiled others, as Ijon,<sup>1</sup> and Dan,<sup>2</sup> and Abellane,<sup>3</sup> and many others. Now when the king of Israel heard this, he left off building and fortifying Ramah, and returned in haste to assist his own people in their distress. So Asa made use of the materials that Baasha had prepared for building Ramah, for building in the same place two strong cities, one of which was called Geba,<sup>4</sup> and the other Mizpah.<sup>5</sup> And after this Baasha had no leisure to make an expedition against Asa, for he was prevented by death, and was buried in the city of Tirzah, and Elah his son succeeded him, who died when he had reigned two years, being treacherously slain by Zimri the captain of half his army. For as Elah was feasting in the house of his steward Olsa, Zimri persuaded some of the horsemen that were under him to attack him, and so he slew him, when he was without his armed men and his captains, for they were all occupied in the siege of Gabatho, a city of the Philistines.

§ 5. When Zimri, the general of the cavalry, had killed Elah, he seized the kingdom himself, and according to Jehu's prophecy, slew all the house of Baasha; for it came to pass that Baasha's house utterly perished, on account of his impiety, in the same manner as I have already described the destruction of the house of Jeroboam. But the army that was besieging Gabatho, when they heard what had befallen the king, and that Zimri when he had killed him had seized the kingdom, made Omri their general king, who drew off his army from Gabatho, and went to Tirzah<sup>6</sup> where the royal palace was, and assaulted that city and took it by storm. And when Zimri saw that the city had none to defend it, he fled into the inmost part of the palace, and set it on fire, and burnt himself with it, having been king only seven days. Upon which the people of Israel were at once divided, for part of them would have Tibni to be king and part Omri; but when those that were for Omri's ruling had beaten Tibni, Omri reigned over all the people. Now it was in the thirtieth year of the reign of Asa that Omri began to reign, and he reigned for twelve years; six of those years he reigned in the city of Tirzah, and the rest in the city called Semareon,<sup>1</sup> known by the Greeks as Samaria; but Omri called it Semareon from Semar, who sold him the mountain whereon he built it. Now Omri was no way different from those kings that reigned before him, except that he was worse than they; for they all sought how they might turn away the people from God by their daily wicked practices; and so it was that God made them to be slain by one another, and that none of their families remained. Now this Omri died at Samaria, and Ahab his son succeeded him.

§ 6. Now by these events we may learn what regard God pays to the affairs of mankind, and how he loves good men, but hates the wicked and destroys them root and branch; for many of these kings of Israel, they and their families, were miserably destroyed and taken off by one another, in a short time, for their transgressions and wickedness; but Asa, who was king of Jerusalem and of the two tribes, attained, by God's blessing, a long and happy old age, for his piety and righteousness, and died happily, when he had reigned forty-one years: and when he was dead, his son Jehoshaphat succeeded him in the kingdom. He was the son of Asa, by his wife Abidah. And all men allowed that he followed David his forefather both in courage and piety, but I am not obliged now to speak any more of the affairs of this king.

CHAP. XIII.

How Ahab, when he had taken Jezebel to Wife, became more wicked than all the Kings that had been before him. Of the Actions of the Prophet Elijah, and what befell Naboth.

§ 1.

NOW Ahab, the king of Israel, dwelt in Samaria, and reigned for twenty-two years; and made no alteration in his conduct from that of the kings that were his predecessors, except for the worse in such things as were of his own invention, and in his most gross wickedness. He imitated them in their wicked courses, and in their outrageous behaviour towards God, and more especially did he rival the sin of Jeroboam: for he worshipped the calves that he had made, and contrived other absurd objects of worship besides them. He also took to wife the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Tyrians and Sidonians, whose name was Jezebel, from whom he learned to worship her own gods. This woman was active and bold, and fell into so great a degree of wantonness and madness, that she built a temple to the god of the Tyrians, whom they call Belus, and planted a grove of all sorts of trees; she also appointed priests and false prophets to this god. The king himself also had many such about him, and so exceeded in folly and wickedness all his predecessors.

§ 2. And a prophet of the most high God, a native of Thesbon,<sup>1</sup> a town in Gilead, came to Ahab and told him that God foretold he would not send rain nor dew for several years upon the country till he himself should appear again. And when he had confirmed this by an oath, he departed into the southern parts, and made his abode by a torrent, out of which he had water to drink, for as for his food ravens brought it him every day. And when the river was dried up for want of rain, he went to Zarephath,<sup>2</sup> a city not far from Sidon and Tyre (for it lay between them), at the command of God, for God told him that he would find there a woman who was a widow, that would give him sustenance. And when he was not far from that city, he saw a woman that laboured with her own hands gathering sticks; and God informed him, that this was the woman who was to give him sustenance; so he went up and greeted her, and asked her to bring him some water to drink; and as she was going to do so he called her back, and bade her bring him a loaf of bread also. Thereupon she affirmed with an oath that she had at home nothing more than one handful of meal and a little oil, and that she was going to gather some sticks, that she might knead it and make bread for herself and her son; after which she said they must perish, and be consumed by famine, for they had nothing for themselves any longer. Then he said, "Depart with good courage, and hope for better things: and first of all make me a little cake, and bring it to me, for I foretell to you that the vessel of meal and cruse of oil shall not fail, until God send rain." When the prophet had said this, she went home<sup>1</sup> and did as he told her, and had part of the cake for herself, and gave the rest to her son and the prophet, nor did the meal or oil fail until the drought ceased. Now Menander mentions this drought in his account of the acts of Ethbaal king of the Tyrians, where he says as follows: "In his reign there was a want of rain from the month Hyperberetæus till the month Hyperberetæus of the following year. And when he made supplication there came great thunders. This Ethbaal built the city of Botrys<sup>2</sup> in Phœnicia, and the city of Auza<sup>3</sup> in Libya." By these words Menander designed this want of rain that was in the days of Ahab, for it was at that time that Ethbaal also reigned over the Tyrians.

§ 3. Now the woman of whom I said before that she sustained the prophet, when her son fell so ill, that he gave up the ghost and appeared to be dead, came to the prophet weeping and beating her breast with her hands, and sending out such expressions as her grief suggested to her, and complained to him that he had come to her to convict her of her sins, and that was why her son was dead. But he bade her be of good cheer, and deliver her son to him, for he would restore him to her alive. And when she had delivered her son up to him, he carried him into the chamber where he himself lived, and laid him down upon the bed, and cried unto God, and said that God had not done well in rewarding the woman who had entertained him, and sustained him, by taking away her son; and he prayed that he would send again the soul of the child into him, and bring him to life again. And God took pity on the mother, and was willing also to gratify the prophet, that he might not seem to have come to her to do her a mischief, and the child came to life again beyond all expectation. Then the mother returned the prophet thanks, and said she was now clearly satisfied that God was with him.

§ 4. A little while after this Elijah, according to God's will, went to king Ahab, to inform him that rain was coming. Now the famine had seized upon the whole country, and there was a great want of what was necessary for sustenance, insomuch, that it was not only men that were in distress, but the earth itself also did not produce enough for horses and other beasts of what was good for them to feed on, by reason of the drought. So the king called for Obadiah, who was steward over his cattle, and told him that he would have him go to fountains of water and brooks, that if any grass could be found by them, they might mow it down, and reserve it for the beasts. And when he had sent persons all over the land to discover the prophet Elijah, and they could not find him, he bade Obadiah accompany him on the search, and it was resolved they should start and divide the roads between them, and Obadiah should take one road, and the king another. Now it happened, when Queen Jezebel slew the prophets, that this Obadiah had hidden a hundred prophets in underground caves, and had fed them at his own expense with bread and water. And when Obadiah was alone and apart from the king, the prophet Elijah met him; and Obadiah asked him who he was, and when he had learned from him, he prostrated himself before him. Elijah then bade him go to the king, and tell him that he was ready to wait on him, but Obadiah replied, "What evil have I done to thee, that thou sendest me to one who seeketh to kill thee, and hath sought all over the land for thee?" He asked also if he was so ignorant as not to know that the king had left no place untried, unto which he had not sent persons to bring him back, in order, if they could take him, to have him put to death? And he told him he was afraid that God would appear to Elijah again, and he would go away to another place, and that when the king should send him for Elijah, and he should miss of him, and the king not be able to find him anywhere upon earth, he would be put to death. He begged him therefore to think of his safety, reminding him how diligently he had provided for those of his own profession, for he had saved a hundred prophets, when Jezebel slew the rest of them, and had kept them concealed and fed them. But Elijah bade him fear nothing, but go to the king, assuring him upon oath that he would certainly show himself to Ahab that very day.

§ 5. And when Obadiah had informed the king that Elijah was there, Ahab met him, and asked him in anger, if it was he that afflicted the people of the Hebrews, and was the occasion of the drought. But Elijah, without any flattery, said that Ahab himself and his house had brought such sad afflictions upon them, by introducing strange gods into their country and worshipping them, and by leaving their own, who was the only true God, and paying no longer any kind of regard to him. However he bade him now go his way, and gather together to him to Mount Carmel<sup>1</sup> all the people and his own prophets and those of his wife, telling him how many there were of them, as also the prophets of the groves, about four hundred in number. And when all the men whom Ahab sent for hastened to the forenamed mountain, the prophet Elijah stood in the midst of them, and said, "How long will you live thus in uncertainty of mind and opinion?" He also exhorted them, that in case they esteemed their own national God to be the true and only God, they would follow him and his commandments, but in case they esteemed him to be nothing, but thought they ought to worship the strange gods, his counsel was that they should follow them. And when the multitude made no answer to this, Elijah asked, as a trial of the power of the strange gods and of his God, that he, who was his only prophet, while they had four hundred, might take a heifer and offer it as a sacrifice, and lay it on a pile of wood, and not kindle any fire, and they should do the same, and call upon their gods to set the wood on fire, for if that were done they would then learn the true nature of God. This proposal pleased the people, so Elijah bade the prophets choose out a heifer first and sacrifice it, and call on their gods; but when there appeared no effect from the prayer and invocation of the prophets upon their sacrifice, Elijah derided them, and bade them call upon their gods with a loud voice, for they were peradventure on a journey, or asleep; and when these prophets had done so from morning till noon, and cut themselves with swords and lancets,<sup>1</sup> according to the custom of their country, and he was about to offer his sacrifice, he bade the prophets go away, but bade the people draw near and observe what he did, lest he should privately hide fire among the cleft wood. Then, upon the approach of the multitude, he took twelve stones, one for each tribe of the people of the Hebrews, and built an altar with them, and dug a very deep trench round it; and when he had laid the cleft wood upon the altar, and had laid upon them his sacrifice, he ordered them to fill four barrels with the water of the fountain, and to pour it upon the altar, till it ran over it, and till the trench was filled with the water poured into it. When he had done this, he began to pray to God, and to call on him to make manifest his power to a people that had already been in error a long time. And as he was still speaking, fire came on a sudden from heaven in the sight of the multitude, and fell upon the altar, and consumed the sacrifice, till the very water was set on fire, and the place became dry.

§ 6. Now when the Israelites saw this, they fell down upon the ground, and worshipped the one God, and called him the greatest and only true God, while they called the others mere names framed by the vile and foolish opinion of men. And they took their prophets and slew them at the command of Elijah. Elijah also told the king that he might go to dinner without any further anxiety, for in a little time he would see God would send them rain. Ahab accordingly went his way, but Elijah went up to the top of Mount Carmel, and sat down upon the ground, and leaned his head upon his knees, and bade his servant go up to a certain look-out-place, and look towards the sea, and when he should see a cloud rising anywhere to give him notice of it, for till then the sky had been clear. When the servant had gone up, and had said several times that he saw nothing, at the seventh time of his going up, he said that he saw a small black thing in the sky, not larger than a man's foot. When Elijah heard that, he sent to Ahab, and recommended him to get down to the city before the rain came down in torrents. So he went to the city Jezreel,<sup>1</sup> and in a little time the sky was obscured and covered with clouds, and a strong wind came upon the earth, and with it a great deal of rain. And the prophet was seized with a divine enthusiasm, and ran along by the king's chariot to Jezreel, a city belonging to Issachar.

§ 7. When Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, understood what wonders Elijah had wrought, and how he had slain her prophets, she was angry and sent messengers to him, and by them threatened to kill him, as he had destroyed her prophets. At this Elijah was terrified, and fled to the city called Beersheba,<sup>2</sup> which is situated on the extreme borders of the country belonging to the tribe of Judah, towards the land of Edom; and there he left his servant, and went away into the desert. He prayed also that he might die (for he was not better than his fathers, that he should be very desirous to live since they were dead), and he lay down and slept under a certain tree; and when somebody awoke him, he rose up and found food set by him and water. And when he had eaten and recovered his strength by that food, he went to the mountain which is called Sinai, where Moses is said to have received his laws from God; and finding there a certain hollow cave, he entered into it, and continued to make his abode in it. But when a certain voice came to him, whence he knew not, and asked him, "Why he was come thither, and had left the city?" he said that because he had slain the prophets of the foreign gods, and had persuaded the people that he alone whom they had worshipped from the beginning was God, he was sought for by the king's wife to be punished for so doing. And when he had heard another voice, telling him to come out the next day into the open air, and he should then know what he was to do, he came out of the cave the next day, and not only heard an earthquake but saw the bright light of a fire; and after an interval of silence a divine voice exhorted him not to be dismayed by the circumstances he was in, for none of his enemies should have power over him. The voice also commanded him to return home, and to appoint Jehu, the son of Nimshi, to be king over the people, and Hazael of Damascus to be king over the Syrians, and Elisha, of the city Abel,<sup>1</sup> to be prophet in his room; and said also that some of the impious multitude should be slain by Hazael, and others by Jehu. And Elijah, upon hearing this, returned into the land of the Hebrews. And he found Elisha, the son of Shaphat, ploughing, and some other persons with him driving twelve yoke of oxen, and he went to him, and cast his own garment upon him; upon which Elisha began to prophesy at once, and leaving his oxen, he followed Elijah. And when he desired leave to salute his parents, Elijah bade him do so: and when he had taken his leave of them, he followed him, and became the disciple and attendant of Elijah all the days of his life. Such were the affairs in which this prophet was concerned.

§ 8. Now there was one Naboth in the city of Jezreel, who had a field adjoining the king's property: and the king asked him to sell him that field, which lay so near his own land, at whatever price he pleased, that he might join them together, and make one estate of them; and if he would not accept of money for it, he gave him leave to choose any of his other fields instead. But Naboth said he would not do so, but would keep the possession of that land of his own, which he had by inheritance from his father. Upon this the king was grieved, as if he had received an outrage, since he could not get another man's possession, and he would neither take a bath nor any food: and when Jezebel his wife asked him what it was that troubled him? and why he would neither bathe nor eat either dinner or supper? he related to her the perverseness of Naboth, and how, though he had made use of gentle words to him, and such as were beneath the royal authority, he had been affronted in not obtaining what he asked for. But she urged him not to be cast down at this, but to leave off his grief, and return to the usual care of his body, for she would see that Naboth was punished. And she immediately sent a letter to the rulers of the Jezreelites in Ahab's name, and commanded them to fast and call a solemn assembly, and to set Naboth at their head, for he was of an illustrious family, and to have three audacious men ready to bear witness that he had blasphemed God and the king, and then to stone him, and so to dispose of him. Accordingly, when Naboth had been thus convicted, as the queen had enjoined in her letter, of blasphemy against God and Ahab the king, he was stoned to death by the people. And when Jezebel had heard this, she went in to the king, and bade him take possession of Naboth's vineyard at free cost. And Ahab was glad at what had been done, and rose up immediately from the bed whereon he lay, to go and see Naboth's vineyard. But God had great indignation at it, and sent Elijah the prophet to the field of Naboth, to meet Ahab and to ask him why he had slain the true owner of that field unjustly. And when he came to him, and the king had said that he had done with him what he pleased (for he thought it a reproach to be thus caught by him in his sin) Elijah said, that in the very place in which the dead body of Naboth was eaten by dogs, both his own blood and that of his wife should be shed, and that all his family should perish, because he had been so insolently wicked, and had slain a citizen unjustly and contrary to the laws of his country. Then Ahab began to be sorry for the things he had done, and to repent of them, and he put on sackcloth, and went barefoot, and would not touch any food:<sup>1</sup> he also confessed his sins, and endeavoured thus to appease God. So God said to the prophet, that he would put off the punishment of his family during Ahab's lifetime, because he repented of those insolent crimes he had been guilty of, but that he would still fulfil his threatening in the reign of Ahab's son. And this message the prophet delivered to the king.

CHAP. XIV.

How Benhadad, King of Damascus and of Syria, made two Expeditions against Ahab, and was beaten.

§ 1.

WHEN the affairs of Ahab were in this condition, at that very time Benhadad the son of Hadad, who was king of the Syrians and of Damascus, got together an army out of all his country, and procured thirty-two kings beyond the Euphrates as his allies, and made an expedition against Ahab. And because Ahab's army was not equal to that of Benhadad's, he did not draw up his men in battle array to fight him, but having shut up everything in the strongest cities he had in the country, he abode in Samaria himself, for the walls about it were very strong, and it appeared in other respects also not easy to be taken. So the king of Syria took his army with him, and went to Samaria, and placed his army round about the city, and besieged it. He also sent a herald to Ahab, and asked him to receive the ambassadors he would send him, by whom he would let him know his pleasure. And upon the king of Israel's per-

<sup>1</sup> "The Jews weep to this day (says Jerome, here cited by Reland), and roll themselves upon sackcloth, in ashes, barefoot, upon such occasions." To which Spanheim adds, "That after the same manner, Berenice, when her life was in danger, stood at the tribunal of Florus barefoot." Jewish War, ii. 15, § 1. mission for him to send, those ambassadors came, and, by their king's command, said that Ahab's riches, and his children and wives, were Benhadad's, and if he would make an agreement, and give him leave to take as much of them as he pleased, he would withdraw his army and raise the siege. Upon this Ahab bade the ambassadors go back, and tell their king, that both he himself and all that he had were his possessions. And when these ambassadors had told this to Benhadad, he sent to Ahab once more and asked, since he confessed that all he had was his, that he would admit those servants of his whom he should send the next day; and he commanded him to deliver to those whom he should send, whatever, upon their searching his palace and the houses of his friends and kindred, they should find to be excellent, but what did not please them they would leave to him. Ahab was angry at this second message of the king of Syria, and gathered together the multitude in assembly, and told them, that for himself he was ready for their safety and peace to give up his own wives and children to the enemy, and to yield to him all his own possessions, for that was what the Syrian king required at his first embassy. "But now he has demanded to send his servants to search all our houses, and to leave in them nothing that is most excellent, seeking an occasion of fighting, knowing that I would not spare what is mine own for your sakes, but taking a handle from the disagreeable terms he offers you to bring on a war. However, I will do what you shall think good." Then the multitude advised him to hearken to none of Benhadad's proposals, but to despise him, and be in readiness to fight him. Accordingly, when he had given the ambassadors the following answer to take back, that he still continued in the mind to comply with the terms at first asked, for the safety of the citizens, but as for Benhadad's second demands he could not submit to them, he dismissed them.

§ 2. Now when Benhadad heard this, he was indignant, and sent ambassadors to Ahab the third time, and threatened that his army would raise a bank higher than those walls, relying upon whose strength he despised him, and that by each man of his army merely taking a handful of earth, thus making a show of the great number of his army, and endeavouring to frighten him. Ahab answered, that he ought not to vaunt himself when he had only put on his armour, but when he had conquered his enemies in the battle. Then the ambassadors went back, and found Benhadad at supper with his thirty-two kings, and informed him of Ahab's answer; and Benhadad immediately gave orders for proceeding to draw lines round the city, and raise earth-works, and to prosecute the siege in every way. Now while this was being done, Ahab was in great agony, and all his people with him; but he took courage, and was freed from his fears, by a certain prophet coming to him, and saying to him, that God had promised to subdue so many myriads of his enemies under him. And when he inquired by whom the victory was to be obtained, he said, "By the sons of the nobles, but under thy conduct as their leader, by reason of their inexperience." Upon this he called for the sons of the nobles, and found them to amount to two hundred and thirty-two persons, and when he was informed that the king of Syria had betaken himself to feasting and repose, he opened the gates and sent out the nobles' sons. Now when the sentinels had informed Benhadad of this, he sent some to meet them, and commanded them, that if these men were come out for fighting, they should bind them, and bring them to him; and if they came out peaceably, they were to do the same. Now Ahab had another army ready within the walls, and the sons of the nobles fell upon the out-posts, and slew many of them, and pursued the rest of them to the camp; and when the king of Israel saw that they were victorious, he sent out all the rest of his army, which falling suddenly upon the Syrians, beat them, for they did not think they would have come out; on which account it was that they assaulted them when they were naked<sup>1</sup> and drunk, insomuch that they left

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Reland notes here very truly, that the word 'naked,' does not always signify entirely naked, but sometimes without men's usual armour, or without their usual robes or upper garments; as when Virgil bids the husbandman plough naked and sow naked; when Josephus says, Antiq. iv. 3, § 2, that God had given the Jews the security of armour when they were naked; and when he here says, that Ahab fell on the Syrians when they were both naked and drunk; and when, Antiq. xi. 5, § 8, he says that Nehemiah commanded those Jews that all their armour behind them when they fled out of the camp, and the king himself only escaped with difficulty on a swift horse. And Ahab went a great way in pursuit of the Syrians, slaying them. And when he had spoiled their camp, which contained a great many treasures, and also a large quantity of gold and silver, he took Benhadad's chariots and horses, and returned to Samaria. And as the prophet told him that he ought to have his army ready, because the Syrian king would make another expedition against him the next year, Ahab made provision accordingly.

§ 3. Now Benhadad, when he had saved himself and as much of his army as he could out of the battle, consulted with his friends how he might make another expedition against the Israelites. And those friends advised him not to fight with them on the hills, because their God was strong in such places, and so it had come to pass that they had lately been beaten; but they said, that if they joined battle with them in the plain, they would beat them. They also gave him this further advice, to send home those kings whom he had brought as his allies, but to retain their army, and to set satraps over it instead of them, and to raise an army out of their country in place of the former army which perished in battle, as also to get horses and chariots. And he thought their counsel good, and marshalled his host accordingly.

§ 4. At the beginning of spring Benhadad took his army with him, and led it against the Hebrews, and when he was come to a certain city which was called Aphek,<sup>1</sup> he pitched were building the walls of Jerusalem, to take care to have their armour on upon occasion, that the enemy might not fall upon them naked. I may add, that the case seems to be the same in the Scripture, where it says, that Saul lay down naked among the prophets, 1 Sam. xix. 24, when it says, that Isaiah walked naked and barefoot, Isa. xx. 2, 3, and when it says, that Peter, before he girt his fisher's coat to him, was naked, John xxi. 7. What is said of David also gives light to this, who was reproached by Michal for "dancing before the ark, and uncovering himself in the eyes of his handmaids, as one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncovereth himself," 2 Sam. vi. 14-20; yet it is there expressly said, v. 14, that "David was girded with a linen ephod," i. e. he had lain aside his robes of state, and put on the sacerdotal, Levitical, or sacred garments, proper for such a solemnity.—W.

his camp in the great plain.<sup>1</sup> Ahab also went to meet him with his army, and pitched his camp opposite him, although his army was a small one in comparison to that of the enemy. And the prophet came again to him, and told him, that God would give him the victory, to prove that his own power was not only on mountains but on plains also; which, it seems, was contrary to the opinion of the Syrians. Both armies lay quiet in their respective camps seven days, but on the last of those days, as the enemy came out of their camp at daybreak, and put themselves in battle-array, Ahab also led out his own army against them, and when the battle was joined, and obstinately contested on both sides, Ahab put the enemy to flight, and pursued them, and pressed them hard, and kept slaying them. Many indeed were destroyed by their own chariots, and by one another, nor could any but a few of them escape to the city of Aphek. And twenty-seven thousand were killed by the walls falling upon them, and there were slain in the battle a hundred thousand also. But Benhadad, the king of the Syrians, fled away, with some of his most faithful servants, and hid himself in a cave under ground. But when they told him that the kings of Israel were humane and merciful men, and that they might make use of the usual manner of supplication and obtain safety from Ahab, in case he would give them leave to go to him, he gave them leave accordingly. And they went to Ahab, clothed in sack-cloth, with ropes about their heads,<sup>2</sup> (for that was the ancient manner of supplication among the Syrians,) and said that Benhadad begged Ahab would save him, and promised he would ever be a servant to him for that favour. Ahab replied that he was glad that he was alive, and not hurt in the battle, and also promised him the same honour and kindness that a man would exhibit to his brother. So they received assurances upon oath from Ahab, that when Benhadad came to him, he should receive no harm, and then went and fetched him out of the cave wherein he lay hid, and brought him to Ahab who was sitting in his chariot. And

<sup>2</sup> This manner of supplication for men's lives among the Syrians, with ropes or halters about their heads, or necks, is, I suppose, no strange thing in latter ages, even in our country.—W.

Benhadad prostrated himself before him ; and Ahab gave him his hand, and bade him come up to him into the chariot, and kissed him, and bade him be of good cheer, and not to expect that any harm should be done to him. And Benhadad returned him thanks, and declared that he would remember his kindness to him all the days of his life : and promised he would restore those cities of the Israelites which the kings his predecessors had taken from them, and grant Ahab leave to come to Damascus, as his own forefathers had had leave to go to Samaria. So they confirmed their covenant by oaths, and Ahab made Benhadad many presents, and sent him back to his own kingdom. Such was the conclusion of the war that Benhadad made against Ahab and the Israelites.

§ 5. But a certain prophet, whose name was Micaiah,<sup>1</sup> came to one of the Israelites, and bade him smite him on the head, for by so doing he would act according to the will of God ; but as he would not do so, he foretold to him, that since he disobeyed the commands of God, he should meet with a lion and be destroyed by it. When this had befallen the man, the prophet went again to another, and gave him the same injunction, and he smote him, and broke his head, upon which he bound it up, and went to the king, and told him that he had been a soldier of his, and had had the custody of one of the prisoners committed to him by an officer, and that the prisoner having run away, he was in danger of losing his own life at the hands of that officer, who had threatened him, if the prisoner escaped, that he would kill him. And when Ahab had said that he would justly die, he took off the bandage on his head, and was recognized by the king to be Micaiah the prophet, who made use of that artifice as a prelude to his subsequent words. For he said that God would punish Ahab for suffering Benhadad, a blasphemer against him, to escape punishment; and that he would so bring it about, that he should be killed by Benhadad, and his people by Benhadad's army. Upon this Ahab was very angry at the prophet, and commanded that he should be put in prison and there kept; but for himself, he returned to his own house confounded by the words of Micaiah.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning Jehoshaphat, the King of Jerusalem; and how Ahab made an Expedition against the Syrians, and was assisted therein by Jehoshaphat, but was himself overcome in Battle, and perished therein.

§ 1.

SUCH were the circumstances in which Ahab was. I now return to Jehoshaphat, the king of Jerusalem, who augmented his kingdom, and put garrisons in the cities of the country belonging to his subjects, and no less into those cities which had been taken from the tribe of Ephraim by his grandfather Abijah, when Jeroboam reigned over the ten tribes. And he had God's gracious assistance, as he was both righteous and religious, and sought to do every day what would be agreeable and acceptable to God. The kings also that were round about him honoured him with the presents they made him, till the riches he acquired were immensely great, and the glory he gained was of a most exalted nature.

§ 2. Now in the third year of his reign he called together the rulers of the country, and the priests, and commanded them to go round the land, and teach all the people that were under him, city by city, the laws of Moses, and to observe them, and to be diligent in the worship of God. With this the whole people were so pleased, that they were not so eager about or so much in love with anything as the observation of the laws. The neighbouring nations also continued to love Jehoshaphat and to be at peace with him. The Philistines paid him their appointed tribute, and the Arabians supplied him every year with three hundred and sixty lambs, and as many kids of the goats. He also fortified several great and important cities, and prepared also a mighty army of soldiers and weapons against his enemies. Now his army consisted of three hundred thousand armed men of the tribe of Judah, of whom Ednah was the chief; and John was chief of two hundred thousand, and was in command of the tribe of Benjamin, and had two hundred thousand archers under him. There was another chief, whose name was Ochobatus, who had a hundred and eighty thousand armed men under him. This host was ready for the king's service, besides those soldiers whom he had distributed among the best fortified cities.

§ 3. Jehoshaphat married his son Jehoram to the daughter of Ahab, the king of the ten tribes, whose name was Athaliah. And some time after when he went to Samaria, Ahab received him courteously, and entertained the army that accompanied him in a splendid manner with plenty of corn and wine and slain beasts, and begged Jehoshaphat to join him in war against the king of Syria, that he might recover from him the city of Ramoth in Gilead;<sup>1</sup> for though it had belonged to his father, yet had the king of Syria's father taken it away from him. And upon Jehoshaphat's promise to afford him assistance (and indeed his army was not inferior to Ahab's), and sending for his army from Jerusalem to Samaria, the two kings went out of the city, and each of them sat on his own throne, and each gave their orders to their own army. And Jehoshaphat bade them call some of the prophets, if there were any there, and inquire of them concerning this expedition against the king of Syria, whether they would advise to make the expedition at that time. For there was peace and friendship then between Ahab and the king of Syria, which had lasted three years, from the time Ahab had taken him captive till that day.

number about four hundred, and bade them inquire of God whether he would grant him the victory, if he made an expedition against Benhadad, and enable him to overthrow that city,<sup>1</sup> for which he was going to commence war. And these prophets counselled his making this expedition now, and said that he would beat the king of Syria, and would get him as before into his power. But Jehoshaphat, who saw by their words that they were false prophets, asked Ahab, whether there was not some other prophet that belonged to the true God, that they might have sure information concerning the future. Then Ahab said that there was indeed such a one, but that he hated him, as he had prophesied evil to him, and had foretold that he should be overcome and slain by the king of Syria, and that for that cause he had him now in prison, and that his name was Micaiah, the son of Imlah. But upon Jehoshaphat's desire that he might be produced, Ahab sent an eunuch who brought Micaiah to him. Now the eunuch had informed him on the way, that all the other prophets had foretold that the king should gain the victory; but he said that it was not lawful for him to lie against God, but that he must speak whatever God should tell him about the king. When therefore he came before Ahab, and the king adjured him upon oath to speak the truth to him, he said that God had showed to him the Israelites running away, and pursued by the Syrians, and dispersed upon the mountains by them, as flocks of sheep are dispersed when their shepherd is slain. He said further, that God signified to him, that they should return in peace to their own home, and that he only should fall in battle. When Micaiah had thus spoken, Ahab said to Jehoshaphat, "I told you a little while ago the disposition of the man with regard to me, and that he is wont to prophesy evil concerning me." Upon this Micaiah replied, that he ought to hear all, whatever it was, that God foretold, and that they were false prophets that encouraged him to make this war in hope of victory, whereas he must fall in the battle. Thereupon the king was in suspense, but Zedekiah, one of the false prophets, came near, and exhorted him not to hearken to Micaiah, for he did not at all speak the truth. As a proof of this he instanced what Elijah had said, who was better in foreseeing the future than Micaiah.<sup>1</sup> For he had foretold that dogs would lick Ahab's blood in the city of Jezreel, in the field of Naboth, as they had licked the blood of Naboth, who owing to him was there stoned to death by the people. It was plain therefore that this Micaiah was a liar, as he contradicted a greater prophet than himself, and said that Ahab would be slain in three days. He added, "You shall soon know whether he be a true prophet, and has the power of the divine spirit; for I will smite him, and let him then hurt my hand, as Jadon caused the hand of Jeroboam the king to wither when he would have arrested him; for I take it you have certainly heard of that event." So when, upon his smiting Micaiah, no harm happened to Zedekiah, Ahab took courage, and readily led his army against the king of Syria. For I suppose fate was too hard for him, and made him believe that the false prophets spoke truer than the true one, that it might get an opportunity of bringing him to his end. Moreover Zedekiah made horns of iron, and told Ahab that God signified by them that he should overthrow all Syria. But Micaiah replied that Zedekiah, in a few days, should go from one inner chamber to another to hide himself, that he might escape the punishment of his lying. Then did the king give orders that they should take Micaiah away, and give him to Amon the governor of the city to guard, with orders to supply him with nothing but bread and water.

§ 5. Then did Ahab and Jehoshaphat the king of Jerusalem take their forces, and march to the city of Ramoth in Gilead; and when the king of Syria heard of this expedition, he led out his army against them, and pitched his camp not far from Ramoth. Now Ahab and <sup>1</sup> These reasonings of Zedekiah the false prophet, in order to persuade Ahab not to believe Micaiah the true prophet, are plausible, but being omitted in our copies, we cannot now tell whence Josephus got them. That some such plausible objection was now raised against Micaiah is very likely, otherwise Jehoshaphat, who used to disbelieve all such false prophets, could never have been induced to accompany Ahab in these desperate circumstances.—W.

Jehoshaphat had agreed, that Ahab should lay aside his royal robes, and that the king of Jerusalem should put them on, and stand in front of the army, in order by this artifice to prevent what Micaiah had foretold. But Ahab's fate found him out though he was without his robes; for Benhadad the king of Syria had charged his army, by their commanders, to kill nobody else but only the king of Israel. Now when the Syrians, upon their joining battle with the Israelites, saw Jehoshaphat standing in front of the army, they conjectured that he was Ahab, and rushed violently at him, and surrounded him; but when they got near, and discovered that it was not he, they all returned back. And though the fight lasted from daybreak till late in the evening, and the Syrians were conquerors, they killed nobody, as their king had commanded them, seeking to kill Ahab only, but being unable to find him. But a young servant of king Benhadad, whose name was Naaman, drew his bow against the enemy, and wounded the king through his breast-plates in the lungs. Upon this Ahab resolved not to make known to his army what had happened, lest they should run away, but bade the driver of his chariot to turn it back and carry him out of the battle, for he was sorely and even mortally wounded. However, he stayed in his chariot and endured the pain till sunset, and then he fainted away and died.

§ 6. And the Syrian army at nightfall retired to their camp, and when a herald gave notice that Ahab was dead, they returned home. And they took the dead body of Ahab to Samaria and buried it there, and when they had washed his chariot, which was bloody with the dead body of the king, in the fountain of Jezreel,<sup>1</sup> they acknowledged that the prophecy of Elijah was true, for the dogs licked his blood, and harlots continued thenceforwards to wash themselves in that fountain. But still he died at Ramoth, as Micaiah had foretold. Now as what was foretold by the two prophets should happen to Ahab came to pass, we ought thence to have high notions of God and everywhere to honour and worship him, and never to suppose that what is pleasant and agreeable is more worthy of belief than what is true, and to esteem nothing more advantageous than the gift of prophecy and the foreknowledge of future events which is derived from it, since God shows men thereby what they ought to avoid. We may also from what happened to this king guess and infer as to the power of fate, that there is no way of avoiding it, even when we know it beforehand, for it creeps upon human souls, and flatters them with pleasing hopes, till it leads them on to where it will be too hard for them. Thus Ahab appears to have been deceived thereby, so that he disbelieved those that foretold his defeat, and by giving credit to those who foretold what was pleasant to him, was slain. And his son Ahaziah succeeded him.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY YEARS AND SEVEN MONTHS—FROM THE DEATH OF AHAB TO THE CAPTIVITY OF THE TEN TRIBES.

CHAP. I.

Concerning Jehoshaphat again; how he appointed Judges, and by God's assistance overcame his Enemies.

§ 1.

WHEN Jehoshaphat the king returned to Jerusalem, after the assistance he had afforded Ahab, the king of Israel, when he fought with Benhadad king of Syria, the prophet Jehu met him, and found fault with him for assisting Ahab, a man both impious and wicked; and told him that God was displeased with him for so doing, but had delivered him from the enemy, notwithstanding he had sinned, because of his own disposition which was good. Thereupon he betook himself to thanksgivings and sacrifices to God: after which he went all round the country which he ruled, to teach the people thoroughly both the law which God gave them by Moses and the piety due to God. He also appointed judges in every one of the cities of his kingdom, and charged them to have regard to nothing so much in judging the people as to do justice, and not to be moved by bribes, nor by the dignity of men eminent for either their riches or birth, but to dispense justice equally to all, knowing that God is cognizant of every secret action. When he had himself instructed them thus, and gone over every city of the two tribes, he returned to Jerusalem. He there also appointed judges selected from the priests and Levites and principal persons of the community, and admonished them to pass all their sentences with care and justice. And if any of the people of his country had differences of great consequence, they were to send them from the other cities to these judges, who would be obliged to give righteous sentences concerning such cases; and that with the greater care, because it is proper that the sentences given in that city where the temple of God is, and wherein the king dwells, be given with great care, and the utmost justice. And he set over them Amariah the priest and Zabariah, both of the tribe of Judah. Thus the king ordered affairs.

§ 2. About the same time the Moabites and Ammonites made an expedition against Jehoshaphat, and took with them a great body of Arabians, and pitched their camp at Engedi,<sup>1</sup> a city situate near the lake Asphaltitis, three hundred furlongs from Jerusalem. In that place grows the best kind of palm-trees, and the opobalsamum. Now when Jehoshaphat heard that the enemies had crossed over the lake, and had made an irruption already into the country which belonged to his kingdom, he was dismayed, and called the people of Jerusalem to an assembly in the temple, and standing over against the holy place, called upon God to give him power and strength to inflict punishment on those that made this expedition against them (for those who built this temple of God had prayed that he would protect their city, and take vengeance on those that were so bold as to come against it), for they were come to take away that land which God had given them for a possession. When he had prayed thus he wept, and the whole multitude, together with their wives and children, made their supplications also. And a certain prophet, Jehaziel by name, came into the midst of the assembly, and cried out, and told both the multitude and the king that God heard their prayers, and promised to fight against their enemies. He also gave order that the king should draw out his forces next day to meet the enemies, and he would find them between Jerusalem and the ascent of Engedi, at a place called the Eminence,<sup>1</sup> and that he was not to fight against them, but only stand still, and see how God would fight against them. When the prophet had said this, both the king and the multitude fell upon their faces, and gave thanks to God, and worshipped him, and the Levites continued singing hymns to God with their instruments of music.

§ 3. As soon as it was day, and the king was come into that wilderness which is under the city of Tekoa,<sup>2</sup> he told the multitude that they ought to give credit to what the prophet had said, and not to set themselves in array for fighting, but to set the priests with their trumpets, and the Levites with the singers of hymns, to give thanks to God, as having already delivered their country from the enemies. This opinion of the king pleased the people, and they did what he advised them to do. And God caused a terror and panic to arise among the Ammonites, who thought one another to be enemies and slew one another, insomuch that not one man escaped out of so great an army; and when Jehoshaphat looked upon the valley where their enemies had encamped, and saw it full of dead men, he rejoiced at so surprising an event as this assistance of God, for he himself by his own power and without their labour had given them the victory. He also gave his army leave to plunder the enemies' camp, and to spoil their dead bodies; and indeed so they did for three days together, till they were weary, so great was the number of the slain; and on the fourth day all the people gathered together in a certain hollow place or valley, and blessed God for his power and assistance, from which circumstance the place had this name given it, the Valley of blessing.<sup>1</sup>

§ 4. And when the king had brought his army back thence to Jerusalem, he betook himself to festivals and sacrifices for many days. And indeed, after this destruction of their enemies came to the ears of foreign nations, they were all greatly dismayed, supposing that God would openly fight for Judah hereafter. And Jehoshaphat from that time lived in great glory and splendour, on account of his righteousness and piety towards God. He was also friendly with Ahab's son who was king of Israel, and he joined with him in the building of ships that were to sail to Pontus,<sup>2</sup> and the merchant cities of Thrace; but he failed of his gains, for the ships were destroyed by being so big and unwieldy, so he no longer concerned himself about shipping. And this is the history of Jehoshaphat the king of Jerusalem.

CHAP. II.

§ 1.

AND Ahaziah, the son of Ahab, reigned over Israel, and made his abode in Samaria. He was a wicked man, and in all respects like both his parents, and Jeroboam, who first of all transgressed, and began to deceive the people. In the second year of his reign the king of Moab revolted from him, and left off paying the tribute which he before paid to his father Ahab. Now it happened that Ahaziah, as he was coming down from the top of his house, fell down from it, and in his illness sent to Ekron<sup>1</sup> to the goddess Fly, for that was the goddess' name, to inquire about his recovery. But the God of the Hebrews appeared to Elijah the prophet, and commanded him to go and meet the messengers that were sent, and ask them whether the people of Israel had not a God of their own, that the king sent to a foreign god to inquire about his recovery, and to bid them return and tell the king that he would not recover. And when Elijah had done what God commanded him, and the messengers had heard what he said, they returned to the king immediately; and when the king wondered how they could return so soon, and asked them the reason of it, they said, that a certain man met them and forbade them to go any further; "but to return and tell you, at the command of the God of Israel, that your illness will be fatal." And when the king bade them describe the man that said this to them, they replied that he was a hairy man, and was girt about with a girdle of leather. And the king understood by this that the man who was described by the messengers was Elijah; so he sent a captain to him with fifty soldiers, and commanded him to bring Elijah to him; and when the captain that was sent found Elijah sitting upon the top of a hill, he commanded him to come down and to go with him to the king, for so he had enjoined, for if he refused, they would take him by force. Then Elijah said to him, "That you may know whether I be a true prophet, I will pray that fire may fall from heaven, and destroy both the soldiers and yourself." So he prayed, and a whirlwind of fire fell from heaven, and destroyed the captain and those that were with him. And when the king was informed of the destruction of these men, he was very angry, and sent another captain with the same number of armed men as were sent before. And when this captain also threatened the prophet, that unless he came down of his own accord, he would seize him and take him away; upon Elijah's prayer against him, fire from heaven slew this captain and his company just as the other. And when, upon inquiry, the king was informed of what had happened to him, he sent out a third captain. But when this captain, who was a wise man and of a mild disposition, came to the place where Elijah happened to be, he spoke courteously to him, and said that Elijah knew that it was against his own will, and only in submission to the king's command, that he came unto him, as also those that came before had not come willingly, but for the same reason. He therefore begged him to have pity on those armed men that were with him, and to come down and follow him to the king. And Elijah liked his discreet words and courteous behaviour, and came down and followed him. And when he came to the king, he prophesied to him, and told him that God said, "Since thou hast despised me as if I were not God, and so unable to foretell the truth about thy illness, and hast sent to the goddess of Ekron to inquire of her what will be the end of this illness, know that thou shalt die."

<sup>2</sup> What are here Pontus and Thrace, as the places whither Jehoshaphat's fleet sailed, are in our copies Ophir and Tarshish, and the place whence it sailed is in them Eziongeber, which lay on the Red Sea, whence it was impossible for any ships to sail to Pontus or Thrace; so that Josephus's copy differed from our copies, as is farther plain from his own words, which render what we read, that the ships were broken at Eziongeber, 'from their unwieldy greatness.' But so far we may conclude, that Josephus thought one Ophir to be somewhere in the Mediterranean, and not in the South Sea, though perhaps there might be another Ophir in that South Sea also, and that fleets might then sail both from Phœnicia and from the Red Sea, to fetch the gold of Ophir.—W.

§ 2. And the king in a very little time died, as Elijah had foretold; and Joram his brother succeeded him in the kingdom, as he died childless. And this Joram was like his father Ahab in wickedness, and reigned twelve years, indulging himself in all sorts of wickedness and impiety towards God; for, leaving off his worship, he worshipped foreign gods: but in other respects he was an active man. Now it was at this time that Elijah disappeared from among men, and no one knows of his death to this day. And he left behind him a disciple Elisha, as I have formerly declared. However, as to Elijah, and as to Enoch, who was before the deluge, it is written in the sacred books that they disappeared, and nobody knows of their death.

CHAP. III.

How Joram and Jehoshaphat made an Expedition against the Moabites : as also concerning the Miracle of Elisha ; and the Death of Jehoshaphat.

§ 1.

WHEN Joram had succeeded to the kingdom, he determined to make an expedition against the king of Moab, whose name was Misa ; for, as I said before, he had revolted from his brother Ahaziah, though he paid as tribute to their father Ahab two hundred thousand sheep with their fleeces. When therefore he had gathered his own army together, he sent also to Jehoshaphat, and entreated him, since he had been from the beginning a friend to his father, to assist him in the war that he was entering upon against the Moabites, who had revolted from him.. And he not only promised himself to assist him, but said he would also oblige the king of Edom, who was under his authority, to make the same expedition also. When Joram had received these assurances of assistance from Jehoshaphat, he took his army with him and went to Jerusalem, and when he had been sumptuously entertained by the king of Jerusalem, it was resolved upon by them to march against their enemies through the wilderness of Edom, for they would not expect them to take that road. So the three kings set out from Jerusalem, namely, the kings of Judah and Israel and the king of Edom. And when they had taken a circuitous route for seven days, they were in distress from want of water for the cattle and for the army, owing to their guides mistaking the roads, so that they were all in an agony, especially Joram, and cried to God by reason of their sorrow, and [desired to know] what wickedness had been committed by them, that induced him to deliver three kings together without fighting into the hand of the king of Moab. But Jehoshaphat, who was a righteous man, encouraged Joram, and bade him send to the camp to know whether any prophet of God was come along with them, “ that we might by him learn from God what we should do." And when one of the servants of Joram said that he had seen there Elisha, the son of Shaphat, the disciple of Elijah, the three kings went to him, at the entreaty of Jehoshaphat; and when they were come to the prophet's tent, which tent was pitched outside the camp, they asked him, "What would become of the army?" and Joram especially. And when Elisha replied to him, that "he should not trouble him, but go to his father's and mother's prophets, for they were true prophets," he still begged him to prophesy and to save them. But he swore by God, that he would not answer him unless on account of Jehoshaphat, who was an holy and righteous man; and when, at his desire, they brought him a man that could play on the harp, the divine spirit came upon him as the music played, and he commanded them to dig many trenches in the bed of the torrent: for he said, "Though there appear neither cloud nor wind nor storm of rain, ye shall see the river full of water, so that the army and the cattle shall be saved for you by drinking of it. Nor will this be all the favour that you shall receive from God, but you shall also overcome your enemies, and take the best and strongest cities of the Moabites, and shall cut down their fruit-trees, and lay waste their country, and stop up their fountains and rivers."

§ 2. When the prophet had said this, the next day, before sun-rise, the torrent ran strongly; for God had caused it to rain very plentifully at the distance of three days' journey into Edom; so that the army and the cattle found water to drink in abundance. And when the Moabites heard that the three kings were advancing upon them, and making their approach through the wilderness, the king of Moab concentrated his army at once, and commanded them to pitch their camp upon the mountains, that when the enemies should attempt to enter their country, it might not escape their notice. But when at sun-rise they saw that the water in the torrent, for it was not far from the land of Moab, was of the colour of blood, for at such a time the water looks especially red from the shining of the sun upon it, they formed a false notion of the state of their enemies, as if they had slain one another mad for thirst, and the river ran with their blood. So, supposing that this was the case, they asked their king to send them out to spoil their enemies. And they all went in haste, as to an advantage already gained, and came to the enemy's camp, supposing them destroyed. But their hope deceived them, for as their enemies surrounded them, some of them were cut to pieces, and others of them were dispersed and fled to their own country. And when the three kings entered the land of Moab, they overthrew the cities that were in it, and ravaged and spoiled their fields, filling them with stones out of the brooks, and cut down the best of their trees, and stopped up their fountains of water, and overthrew their walls to their foundations. And the king of Moab, being hard pressed by siege, and seeing his city in danger of being taken by storm, made a sally, and went out with seven hundred horsemen to try and break through the enemies' lines in that quarter where he thought the watch was kept most negligently: but when, upon trial, he could not get away, for he happened on a place that was carefully watched, he returned into the city, and did a thing that showed the utmost despair and distress. For he took his eldest son, who was to reign after him, and lifting him up upon the wall, that he might be visible to all the enemies, he offered him as a whole burnt-offering to God. And when the kings saw his action, they commiserated the distress that was the occasion of it, and were so affected by humanity and pity, that they raised the siege, and every one returned to his own country. And Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem, and continued in peace there, but outlived this expedition but a very little time, and then died, having lived in all sixty years, and of them reigned twenty-five. He was buried in a magnificent manner in Jerusalem, for he had imitated the actions of David.

CHAP. IV.

Joram succeeds Jehoshaphat : how Joram, his Namesake, King of Israel, fought with the Syrians ; and the Miracles that were done by the Prophet Elisha.

§ 1.

JEHOSHAPHAT left a good number of children, but he appointed his eldest son Joram to be his successor, who had the same name as his mother's brother, the son of Ahab, who was king of Israel. Now when the king of Israel returned from the land of Moab to Samaria, he had with him Elisha the prophet, whose acts I intend to relate particularly, for they are remarkable and worthy to be recorded, as we have them set down in the sacred books.

§ 2. For they say that the widow of Obadiah,<sup>1</sup> Ahab's steward, came to him ; and said, that he was not ignorant how her husband had saved alive the prophets that were sought to be slain by Jezebel, the wife of Ahab ; for she said that he had hid a hundred of them, and had borrowed money for their maintenance ; and that, after her husband's death, she and her children were carried away to be made slaves by the creditors ; and she begged him to have mercy upon her on account of what her husband had done, and afford her some assistance. And when he asked her what she had in the house, she said, "Nothing but a very small quantity of oil in a cruse." And the prophet bade her go away, and borrow a great many empty vessels of her neighbours, and when she had shut her chamber door, to pour the oil into them all, for God would fill them full. And when the woman had done what she was commanded to do, and bade her children bring every one of the vessels, and all were filled and not one left empty, she came to the prophet, and told him that they were all full: upon which he advised her to go away, and sell the oil, and pay the creditors what was owing to them, and there would be some surplus over from the price of the oil, which she might devote to the maintenance of her children. And thus did Elisha discharge the woman's debts, and free her from the vexation of her creditors.

§ 3. Elisha also sent a hasty message to Joram,<sup>1</sup> and exhorted him to take care of that place, for there were some Syrians lying in ambush there to kill him. So the king did as the prophet exhorted him, and avoided going a hunting. And when Benhadad failed in his scheme, he was wroth with his own servants, as if they had betrayed his ambush to Joram, and sent for them, and said they were the betrayers of his secrets, and threatened that he would put them to death, since his intention, which he had intrusted to none but them, was yet made known to his enemy. And when one of those that were present told him not to be under a false impression, nor suspect that they had discovered to his enemy his sending men to kill him, but to know that it was Elisha the prophet who had discovered all to him, and revealed his plan, he gave order that they should send some to learn in what city Elisha dwelt. And those that were sent brought word that he was in Dothan.<sup>1</sup> So Benhadad sent to that city a great army with horses and chariots to take Elisha. And they encompassed the city round about by night, and watched it, and when the prophet's servant in the morning perceived this, and that his enemies sought to take Elisha, he came running and crying out in an alarmed manner to him, and told him of it. But he encouraged him and bade him not be afraid, and besought God, whose assistance prevented his feeling fear himself, to manifest to his servant his power and presence, as far as was possible, in order to inspire him with hope and courage. And God heard the prayer of the prophet, and made his servant see a multitude of chariots and horses surrounding Elisha, so that he laid aside his fear, and his courage revived at the sight of the army he supposed come to their assistance. After this Elisha entreated God, that he would dim the eyes of their enemies, and cast a mist before them, whereby they might not discern him. When this was done, he went into the midst of his enemies, and asked whom they came to seek? And when they replied "the prophet Elisha," he promised he would deliver him to them, if they would follow him to the city where he happened to be. And these men were so blinded by God in their sight and mind, that they followed Elisha very readily. And when he had brought them to Samaria, he ordered Joram the king to shut the gates, and to place his own army round the Syrians, and prayed to God to clear the eyes of their enemies, and take the mist from before them. Accordingly, when they were freed from the darkness they had been in, they saw themselves in the midst of their enemies, and the Syrians were strangely amazed and alarmed, as was but likely, at an action so divine and surprising; and when king Joram asked the prophet, if he would give him leave to shoot them, Elisha forbade him so to do; for he said, that it was just to kill those that were taken in battle, but that those men had done his country no harm, but, without knowing it, were come there by divine power. And his counsel was to treat them in a hospitable manner at the king's table, and then to send them away without hurting them. And Joram hearkened to the prophet, and when he had feasted the Syrians in a splendid and magnificent manner, he sent them back to Benhadad their king.

§ 4. Now when those men were come back, and had showed Benhadad what had befallen them, he wondered at the strangeness of it, and at the appearance and power of the God of Israel, as also at the prophet with whom God so evidently was ; so he determined to make no more secret attempts upon the king of Israel, out of fear of Elisha, but resolved to make open war against him, supposing he would be more than a match for his enemies owing to his numerous and powerful army. So he made an expedition with a great force against Joram, who, not thinking himself a match for the Syrians, shut himself up in Samaria, relying on the strength of its walls ; but Benhadad supposed he should take the city, if not by his engines of war, yet by reducing the Samaritans by famine and want of necessaries, so he brought up his army and besieged the city. And the supply of necessaries so failed Joram, that from the extremity of want an ass's head was sold in Samaria for fourscore pieces of silver, and the Hebrews bought a pint of dove's dung instead of salt for five pieces of silver. Now Joram was afraid that somebody would betray the city to the enemy because of the famine, and went every day round the walls and the guards, to see whether any such traitor were among them, and by being thus seen, and taking such care, he deprived them of the opportunity of contriving any such thing, and if they had a mind to do it, he, by this means, prevented them. And on a certain woman's crying out, " Have pity on me, my lord," as he thought that she was about to ask for something to eat, he was angry and imprecated God's curse upon her, and said he had neither threshing-floor nor wine-press, whence he might give her any thing at her petition. Upon this she said she did not desire his aid in any such thing, nor wanted to trouble him about food, but desired that he would do her justice on another woman. And when he bade her say on, and let him know what she desired, she said that she had made an agreement with the other woman, who was her neighbour and friend, because the famine and want was intolerable, that they should kill their children (each of them having a son), and live upon them in turn for two days. "And I killed my son the first day, and we both lived upon him yesterday, but she will not do the same thing, but has broken her agreement, and hid her son." This mightily grieved Joram when he heard it, and he rent his garment, and cried out with a loud voice, and was filled with wrath against Elisha the prophet, and eagerly desired to have him slain, because he had not prayed to God to provide them some way and means of escape from the miseries by which they were surrounded, and he sent some one away immediately to cut off his head. And he hurried off to kill the prophet, but Elisha was not unacquainted with the wrath of the king against him; for as he sat in his house by himself, with none but his disciples about him, he told them, that Joram, the son of a murderer, had sent some one to take off his head; "but," continued he, "when he that is commanded to do this comes, take care that you do not let him come in, but shut the door in his face, and hold it fast, for the king himself will shortly follow him, and come to me, having altered his mind." And they did as they were bidden, when he that was sent by the king to kill Elisha came. Now Joram had repented of his wrath against the prophet, and fearing that he who was commanded to kill him would have done it before he came, he made haste to hinder the murder and to save the prophet. But when he got to him, he accused him of not praying to God for their deliverance from the miseries they now lay under, and of not caring about their perishing so sadly under them. Thereupon Elisha promised that the very next day, at the very same hour in which the king came to him, they should have great plenty of food, and that two measures of barley should be sold in the market for a shekel, and a measure of fine flour should be bought for a shekel. This prediction made Joram and those that were present very joyful, for they did not hesitate to believe what the prophet said, on account of the experience they had had of the truth of his former predictions, and the expectation of plenty made the want and distress they were in that day appear a light thing to them. But the captain of the third band, who was a friend of the king, and on whom the king then leaned, said, "You talk of incredible things, O prophet! for as it is impossible for God to rain down torrents of barley or fine flour out of heaven, so it is impossible that what you say should come to pass." To which the prophet made this reply, "You yourself shall see these things come to pass, but shall not partake of any of them."

§ 5. Now what Elisha had thus foretold came to pass in the manner following. There was a law at Samaria, that those that had the leprosy, and whose bodies were not clean from it, should abide without the city. Now there were four men that on this account abode before the gates, and nobody gave them any food because of the extremity of the famine: and as they were prohibited from entering into the city by the law, and considered that even if they were permitted to enter, they should miserably perish by the famine, while if they remained where they were they should suffer in the same manner, they resolved to deliver themselves up to the enemy, for if they spared them they would live, but if they should be killed they would be fortunate in their death. So when they had determined on this resolution, they went by night to the enemies' camp. Now God had begun to frighten and disturb the Syrians, and to bring the noise of chariots and armour to their ears, as though an army were advancing upon them, and had made them suspect that it was coming nearer and nearer to them. In short, they were in such a panic about this army, that they left their tents, and ran together to Benhadad, and said that Joram the king of Israel had hired as allies both the king of Egypt and the king of the islands, and was leading them against them, for they heard the noise of them coming. And Benhadad believed what they said (for there came the same noise to his ears as to theirs), and so they fell into a mighty alarm and panic, and left their horses and beasts and immense riches in their camp, and betook themselves to flight. And those lepers who had departed from Samaria and gone to the camp of the Syrians, of whom I made mention a little before, when they got to the camp, observed nothing but great quietness and silence: accordingly they entered into it, and went hastily into one of the tents, and as they saw nobody there, they ate and drank, and carried away garments and a great quantity of gold out of the camp and hid it, after which they went into another tent, and carried off what was in it, as they did at the former, and this they did several times, without the least interruption from anybody. So they inferred thereby that the enemies were departed; whereupon they reproached themselves for not informing Joram and the citizens of it. So they came to the walls of Samaria, and called aloud to the watchmen, and told them about the enemies, and they told the king's guards, through whom Joram came to know of it; and he sent for his friends, and the captains of his host, and said to them, "I suspect that this departure of the king of Syria is an ambush and piece of treachery, and that he is in despair of ruining you by famine, so, as you imagine the Syrians to have fled away, he tempts you to come out of the city to spoil their camp, that he may then fall upon you on a sudden, and not only kill you, but take the city without fighting. So I exhort you to guard the city carefully, and by no means to go out of it, or proudly to despise your enemies, as though they were really gone away." And a certain person said, that the king did very well and wisely to entertain such a suspicion, but still he advised him to send a couple of horsemen to search all the country as far as the Jordan, and if they were seized by an ambush of the enemy and cut to pieces, they might preserve the army from going out as if they suspected nothing, and suffering the like misfortune: and those horsemen might be added to those that had died by the famine, supposing they were intercepted and slain by the enemy. And the king was pleased with this advice, and sent such as might search out the truth, who journeyed over a road that was without any enemies, and found it full of provisions and of weapons, that they had thrown away and left behind them, in order to be unimpeded and expeditious in their flight. When the king heard this, he sent out the multitude to plunder the camp. And their gains were not things of small value, but they took a great quantity of gold, and a great quantity of silver, and droves of all kinds of cattle. They also got possession of such innumerable quantities of wheat and barley, as they never in the least dreamed of, and were not only freed from their former miseries, but had such plenty, that two measures of barley were bought for a shekel, and a measure of fine flour for a shekel, according to the prophecy of Elisha. Now a measure is equal to a peck and a half.<sup>1</sup> And the captain of the third band was the only man that received no benefit from this plenty; for as he was appointed by the king in charge of the gate to prevent too great a crowd of the multitude endangering one another and perishing by treading on one another in the press, he suffered himself in that very way, and died in that very manner, as Elisha had foretold his death, when he alone of them all disbelieved what the prophet said concerning that plentiful supply of provisions which they should soon have.

§ 6. Now when Benhadad, the king of Syria, had got safe to Damascus, and understood that it was God himself that had cast all his army into this alarm and panic, and that it did not arise from the invasion of enemies, he was mightily dejected at his having God so greatly for his enemy, and fell ill. Now it happened that Elisha the prophet, at that time, had gone out of his own country to Damascus, of which Benhadad was informed: so he sent Hazael, the most faithful of all his servants, to meet him, and to carry him presents, and bade him inquire of him about his illness, and whether he should recover from it. And Hazael went to Elisha with forty camels, that carried the best and most precious things that the country of Damascus afforded, as well as those that the king's palace supplied, and saluted him kindly, and said that he was sent to him by king Benhadad, to bring him presents and to inquire concerning his illness, whether he would recover from it or no. Whereupon the prophet bade him not tell the king the melancholy news, but said he would die. And the king's servant was troubled to hear it, and Elisha wept also, and his tears ran down plentifully as he foresaw what miseries his people would undergo after the death of Benhadad. And when Hazael asked him what was the reason of his distress, he said,

“I weep out of compassion for the multitude of the Israelites, and for the terrible miseries they will suffer by thee. For thou wilt slay the strongest of them, and burn their strongest cities, and destroy their children, and dash them against the stones, and wilt rip up their women with child.” And when Hazael said, “How shall I have power enough to do such things?” the prophet replied, that God had informed him that he should be king of Syria. And when Hazael returned to Benhadad, he told him good news concerning his illness, but the next day he spread a wet cloth in the nature of a net over him, and so strangled him, and took his dominion. He was an active man, and had to an eminent degree the good-will of the Syrians, and of the people of Damascus, by whom both Benhadad himself, and Hazael who ruled after him, are honoured to this day as gods by reason of their benefactions, and their building of temples, by which they adorned the city of the Damascenes. They also every day have a procession in honour of these kings, and pride themselves on their antiquity, not knowing that these kings are much later than they imagine, and not yet eleven hundred years old. And when Joram, the king of Israel, heard that Benhadad was dead, he breathed again from the terror and dread he had been in on his account, and was very glad to live in peace.

CHAP. V.

§ 1.

NOW Joram the king of Jerusalem, who, as I before said, had the same name as the king of Israel, as soon as he had received the kingdom, betook himself to the slaughter of his brothers and the chief of his father's friends, and so made a beginning and demonstration of his wickedness; nor was he at all better than those kings of Israel who first transgressed the national laws of the Hebrews, and God's worship. And Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, whom he had married, taught him to be a bad man in other respects, and also to worship foreign gods. Now God would not quite root out this family, because of the promise he had made to David. However, Joram did not leave off the introduction of innovations every day, to the propagation of impiety and the ruin of the national customs. And as the Edomites had about that time revolted from him, and slain their former king, who had been loyal to his father, and had set up one of their own choosing, Joram fell upon the land of Edom by night with the horsemen and chariots that were about him, and destroyed those Edomites that lay near to his own kingdom, but did not proceed further. However, this expedition did him no service, for they all revolted from him, as also those that dwelt in the country of Libnah.<sup>1</sup> He was indeed so mad, as to compel the people to go up to the high places of the mountains and worship strange gods.

§ 2. As he was acting thus, and had entirely cast his own country's laws out of his mind, there was brought him a letter from Elijah the prophet,<sup>2</sup> which declared that God would execute great judgments upon him, because he had not imitated his fathers, but had followed the wicked courses of the kings of Israel, and had compelled the tribe of Judah and the citizens of Jerusalem to leave the holy worship of their national God and to worship idols, as Ahab had compelled the Israelites to do, and because he had slain his brothers, and the men that were good and righteous. And the prophet predicted in this letter what punishment he should undergo for these crimes,—namely, the destruction of his people and the slaughter of the king's own wives and children, and that he should himself die of a disease in his bowels after long torments, his bowels falling out by the excessive inward rottenness of the parts ; inso-much that though he should see his own misery, he should not be able at all to help himself, but should die in that manner. This was what Elijah predicted in that letter.

<sup>2</sup> This letter, in some copies of Josephus, is said to come to Joram from Elijah, with this addition, "for he was yet upon earth," which could not be true of Elijah, who, as all agree, was gone from the earth about four years before, and could only be true of Elisha: nor, perhaps, is there any more mystery here, than that the name of Elijah has very anciently crept into the text instead of Elisha, by the copiers, there being nothing in any copy of that letter peculiar to Elijah.—W.

§ 3. Not long after this an army of those Arabians that lived very near Ethiopia, and of the Philistines, fell upon the kingdom of Joram, and spoiled the country and the king's house, and moreover slew his sons and his wives : one only of his sons was left him, who escaped the enemy ; his name was Ahaziah. After this calamity he himself fell ill of the disease which was foretold by the prophet, and was ill a great while (for God inflicted upon him this punishment in his belly in his wrath against him), and he died miserably, and saw his own bowels fall out. The people also treated his dead body with contempt, I suppose because they thought that such death came upon him by the wrath of God, and that therefore he was not worthy to partake of such a funeral as became kings. Accordingly they neither buried him in the sepulchres of his fathers, nor vouchsafed him any honours, but buried him like a private man. And he had lived forty years, and reigned eight ; and the people of Jerusalem delivered the kingdom to his son Ahaziah.

CHAP. VI.

How Jehu was anointed King of Israel, and slew both Joram and Ahaziah ; as also what he did for the Punishment of the Wicked.

§ 1.

NOW Joram the king of Israel after the death of Ben-hadad hoped that he might take Ramoth, a city of Gilead, from the Syrians. Accordingly he made an expedition against it with a great army, but as he was besieging it, an arrow was shot at him by one of the Syrians, but the wound was not mortal, so he returned to have it healed in Jezreel, but left his whole army in Ramoth, and Jehu the son of Nimshi as its general, for he had already taken the city by storm, and he proposed, after he was healed, to make war on the Syrians again. But Elisha the prophet sent one of his disciples to Ramoth, and gave him the holy oil to anoint Jehu with, and he was to tell him that God had chosen him to be king. He also sent him to say other things to him, and bade him take his journey as if he fled, that when he came away he might escape the knowledge of all men. So when he was come to the city, he found Jehu sitting in the midst of the captains of the army, as Elisha had foretold to him. So he went up to him, and said that he desired to speak with him about certain matters; and when he rose up and followed him into an inner chamber, the young man took the oil and poured it on his head, and said, that God elected him to be king, to destroy the house of Ahab, and to revenge the blood of the prophets that were unjustly slain by Jezebel, that so their house might utterly perish, as those of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and of Baasha, had perished for their wickedness, and that no seed might remain of Ahab's family. And when he had said this, he went away hastily out of the chamber, and endeavoured not to be seen by any of the army.

§ 2. Then Jehu came out, and went back to the place where he had before been sitting with the captains. And when they asked him, and desired him to tell them, why it was that this young man came to him, and also added that he was mad, he replied, "You guess right, for the words he spoke were the words of a madman." And as they were very eager about the matter, and desired he would tell them, he answered, that God had said, he had chosen him to be king over the people. When he had said this, every one of them put off his garment and strewed it under him, and blew with trumpets, and proclaimed that Jehu was king. And when he had got his army together, he proposed to set out immediately against Joram for the city of Jezreel, where, as I said before, he was getting healed of the wound which he had received in the siege of Ramoth. It happened also that Ahaziah, king of Jerusalem, had now come to visit Joram (for he was his sister's son, as I have said already), to see how he did after his wound on account of their kindred. Now as Jehu was desirous to fall upon Joram and those who were with him unexpectedly, he desired that none of the soldiers should escape and tell Joram what had happened, for to prevent this would be an evident proof of their kindness to him, and would show that their real inclinations were to make him king.

§ 3. And they were pleased with what he proposed, and guarded the roads, lest anybody should privately report Jehu's intentions to those that were at Jezreel. And Jehu took with him some chosen horsemen, and sat upon his chariot, and started for Jezreel. And when he was come near, the watchman, whom Joram had put there to spy out such as were coming to the city, saw Jehu advancing, and told Joram that he saw a troop of horsemen advancing. Upon this Joram immediately gave orders, that one of his horsemen should be sent out to meet them, and to know who it was that was coming. So when the horseman came up to Jehu, he asked him in what condition the army was; for he said the king wanted to know; but Jehu bade him not to meddle at all with such matters, but to follow him. When the watchman saw this, he told Joram that the horseman had joined the company, and was coming along with them. And when the king had sent a second messenger, Jehu commanded him to do as the former had done. And when the watchman told this also to Joram, at last he mounted his chariot himself, together with Ahaziah, the king of Jerusalem, who, as I said before, was there to see how Joram did, after he had been wounded, being his relation. So he went out to meet Jehu, who marched slowly,<sup>1</sup> and in good order; and when Joram met him in the field of Naboth, he asked him if all things were well in the camp? But Jehu reproached him bitterly, and ventured to call his mother a witch and harlot. Upon this the king, fearing his intention, and suspecting he meant no good, turned his chariot about as soon as he could and fled, and said to Ahaziah, "We are fought against by deceit and treachery." But Jehu drew his bow, and smote him, the arrow going through his heart; so Joram fell down immediately on his knee, and gave up the ghost. Jehu also gave orders to Bidkar, the captain of the third division of his army, to cast the dead body of Joram into the field of Naboth, reminding him of the prophecy which Elijah prophesied to Ahab his father after he had slain Naboth, that both he and his family should perish in that place, for as they sat behind Ahab's chariot they heard the prophet say so, and now it was come to pass according to his prophecy. Now when Joram had fallen, Ahaziah was afraid for his own life, and turned his chariot into another road, supposing he should not be noticed by Jehu; but he followed after him, and overtook him at a certain acclivity, and drew his bow and wounded him. And he left his chariot, and got upon his horse, and fled from Jehu to Megiddo,<sup>1</sup> and though his wound was attended to, in a little time he died there of it, and was carried to Jerusalem, and buried there, after he had reigned one year, and had proved a wicked man and worse than his father.

§ 4. Now when Jehu was come to Jezreel, Jezebel adorned herself and stood upon the tower, and said, "he was a fine servant that killed his master." And when he looked up to her, he asked who she was, and commanded her to come down to him. At last he ordered the eunuchs to throw her down from the tower, and being thrown down, she besprinkled the wall with her blood, and was trodden upon by the horses, and so died. When this was done, Jehu went to the palace with his friends, and refreshed himself after his journey both with other things and a meal. He also bade his servants take up Jezebel and bury her, because of the nobility of her race, for she was descended from kings; but those that were bidden to bury her found nothing remaining but the extremities of her body, for all the rest was eaten by dogs. When Jehu heard this, he marvelled at the prophecy of Elijah, for he foretold that she should perish in this manner at Jezreel.

§ 5. Now Ahab had seventy sons who were being brought up in Samaria. So Jehu sent two letters, one to those who were bringing up the young princes, the other to the rulers of Samaria, and wrote in them that they should set up the most valiant of Ahab's sons for king, for they had abundance of chariots and horses and armour, and a great army and fenced cities, and by so doing they might avenge the murder of Ahab. This he wrote to test the intentions of the people of Samaria. Now when the rulers and those that were bringing up the young princes read the letters, they were afraid, and considering that they were not at all able to oppose Jehu, who had already subdued two very great kings, they returned him answer that they owned him for their lord, and would do whatever he bade them. So he wrote back to them bidding them obey him and cut off the heads of Ahab's sons, and send them to him. Accordingly, the rulers sent for those that were bringing up the sons of Ahab, and commanded them to slay them, and cut off their heads and send them to Jehu. So they did what they were commanded, omitting nothing at all, and put the heads in wicker baskets, and sent them to Jezreel. And when Jehu, as he was at supper with his friends, was informed that the heads of Ahab's sons were brought, he ordered them to make two heaps of them, one on each side of the gates, and in the morning he went out to take a view of them, and when he saw them, he began to say to the people that were present, that he conspired himself against his master and slew him, but he had not slain all these; and he desired them to take notice that all things had come to pass to Ahab's family according to God's prophecy, and that his house had perished as Elijah had foretold. And when he had further destroyed all the kindred of Ahab that were found in Jezreel, he went to Samaria; and as he was upon the road, he met the relations of Ahaziah, king of Jerusalem, and asked them, whither they were going? And when they replied, that they came to salute Joram, and their own king Ahaziah (for they knew not that he had slain them both), Jehu gave orders that they should take them and kill them, being in number forty-two persons.

§ 6. After these there met him a good and righteous man, whose name was Jonadab, who had been his friend of old. He saluted Jehu, and began to commend him, because he had done everything according to the will of God, in extirpating the house of Ahab. And Jehu desired him to come up into his chariot, and to make his entry with him into Samaria, and told him that he would show him that he would not spare one wicked man, but would punish the false prophets and false priests, and those that deceived the multitude, and persuaded them to leave the worship of God Almighty, and to worship foreign gods; for it was a most excellent and most pleasing sight to a good and righteous man to see the wicked punished. And Jonadab was persuaded by these arguments, and got up into Jehu's chariot, and went with him to Samaria. And Jehu sought out all Ahab's kindred and slew them. And being desirous that none of the false prophets nor the priests of Ahab's gods should escape punishment, he took them all deceitfully by the following wile. He gathered all the people together, and said that he would worship twice as many gods as Ahab worshipped, and desired that their priests and prophets and servants might be present, for he would offer costly and great sacrifices to Ahab's gods, and if any of his priests were wanting, they should be punished with death. Now Ahab's god was called Baal. And when he had appointed a day on which he would offer the sacrifices, he sent messengers throughout all the country of the Israelites to bring the priests of Baal to him. Then Jehu commanded to give all the priests vestments; and when they had received them, he went into the temple of Baal with his friend Jonadab, and gave orders to make search, whether there was any foreigner or stranger among them, for he would have no stranger mix in their sacred rites. And when they said that there was no stranger there, and were beginning their sacrifices, he placed without fourscore of his soldiers whom he knew to be most faithful to him, and bade them slay the false prophets, and vindicate now the laws of their country, which had been a long time neglected. He also threatened, that if any one of them escaped, their own lives should go for them. So they slew them all with the sword, and burnt the temple of Baal, and so purged Samaria of foreign customs. Now this Baal was the god of the Tyrians; and Ahab, in order to gratify his father-in-law

Ethbaal, who was the king of Tyre and Sidon, had built a temple for him in Samaria, and appointed him prophets, and worshipped him with all sorts of worship. Howbeit, when this god was demolished, Jehu permitted the Israelites to worship the golden calves. But because he had done thus to Baal, and taken care to punish the wicked, God foretold by his prophet that his sons should reign over Israel for four generations. Such is the history of Jehu.

CHAP. VII.

How Athaliah reigned over Jerusalem for six Years, when Jehoiada the High Priest slew her, and made Joash, the Son of Ahaziah, King.

§ 1.

NOW when Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, heard of the death of her brother Joram, and of her son Ahaziah, and of all the royal family, she was anxious that none of the house of David should be left alive, but that the whole family should be exterminated, that no king might arise out of it afterwards. And she thought she had actually extirminated them all, but one of Ahaziah's sons was preserved, who escaped death in the following manner. Ahaziah had a sister by the same father, whose name was Jehosheba, and she was married to the high priest Jehoiada. She went into the king's palace, and found Joash, for that was the little boy's name, who was not above a year old, among those that were slain, but concealed with his nurse, and she took him with her into a secret bedchamber, and shut him up there, and she and her husband Jehoiada brought him up privately in the temple six years, during which time Athaliah reigned over Jerusalem and the two tribes.

§ 2. Now in the seventh year Jehoiada communicated the matter to some five of the captains of hundreds, and persuaded them to join him in his attempt against Athaliah, and in procuring the kingdom for Joash. He also exacted such oaths from them as are proper to secure conspirators from the fear of discovery; and he was then of good hope, that they should depose Athaliah. And those men whom Jehoiada the priest had taken to be his confederates, went over all the country, and gathered together the priests and Levites and heads of the tribes, and came and brought them to Jerusalem to the high priest. And he demanded the security of an oath of them, to keep private whatever he should reveal to them, which required both their silence and assistance. And when they had taken the oath, and had thereby made it safe for him to speak, he produced the boy that he had brought up of the family of David, and said to them, "This is your king, of that house which you know God foretold should reign over you for all time to come. I recommend that three divisions of you guard him in the temple, and that a fourth keep watch at all the gates of the temple, and that a fifth keep guard at the gate which opens and leads to the king's palace, and let the rest of the multitude be unarmed in the temple, and let no armed person go into the temple, but the priest only." He also gave them this order besides, that a part of the priests and the Levites should be about the person of the king himself, and guard him with their swords drawn, and kill that man immediately, whoever he was, that should be so bold as to enter armed into the temple; and bade them be afraid of nobody, but persevere in guarding the king. And these men obeyed what the high priest advised them to, and showed the reality of their resolution by their actions. Jehoiada also opened the armoury which David had made in the temple, and distributed to the captains of hundreds, as also to the priests and Levites, all the spears and quivers and whatever other weapons it contained, and set them armed in a circle round about the temple, so as to touch one another, by that means excluding those from entering that ought not to enter. Then they brought the boy into the midst, and put on him the royal crown, and Jehoiada anointed him with the holy oil, and proclaimed him king. And the multitude rejoiced, and applauded, and cried out, "God save the king!"

§ 3. When Athaliah unexpectedly heard the tumult and acclamations, she was greatly disturbed in her mind, and came quickly out of the royal palace with her army; and when she was come to the temple, the priests received her, but as for those that stood round about the temple, as they had been ordered by the high priest to do, they hindered the armed men that followed her from going in. And when Athaliah saw the boy standing on a platform with the royal crown on his head, she rent her clothes, and vehemently cried out, and commanded [her guards] to kill him that had laid snares for her, and endeavoured to deprive her of the kingdom. But Jehoiada called for the captains of hundreds, and commanded them to take Athaliah to the valley of Cedron, and slay her there, for he would not have the temple defiled with the punishment of this abandoned woman; and he gave orders, if any one came near to help her, that he should be slain also. So those that had the charge of her slaughter, took hold of her, and led her to the gate of the king's mules, and slew her there.

§ 4. Now as soon as Athaliah was cunningly despatched in this manner, Jehoiada called together the people and the armed men into the temple, and made them take an oath that they would be loyal to the king, and take care of his safety and the safety of his realm. After that he obliged the king to give security on oath that he would worship God, and not transgress the laws of Moses. They then ran to the temple of Baal, which Athaliah and her husband Joram had built, to the dishonour of the God of their fathers, and to the honour of Ahab, and demolished it, and slew Mattan the priest of Baal. And Jehoiada intrusted the care and custody of the temple to the priests and Levites, according to the appointment of king David, and enjoined them to bring their regular burnt-offerings twice a day, and to offer incense according to the law. He also appointed some of the Levites and porters to be a guard to the temple, that no one that was defiled might enter in.

§ 5. And when Jehoiada had set these things severally in order, he, with the captains of hundreds and the rulers and all the people, brought Joash out of the temple into the king's palace, and when he had set him upon the king's throne, the people shouted for joy, and betook themselves to feasting, and kept a festival for many days; for the city was quiet upon the death of Athaliah. Now Joash was seven years old when he took the kingdom: his mother's name was Zibiah, of the city of Beersheba.<sup>1</sup> And all the time that Jehoiada lived Joash was very careful that the laws should be kept, and zealous in the worship of God. And when he was of age, he married two wives who were found for him by the high priest, by whom he had both sons and daughters. And thus much shall suffice to have related concerning king Joash, how he escaped the treachery of Athaliah, and took over the kingdom.

CHAP. VIII.

Hazael makes an Expedition against the People of Israel, and the Inhabitants of Jerusalem. Jehu dies, and Jehoahaz succeeds him. Joash, the King of Jerusalem, is at first careful about the Worship of God, but afterwards becomes impious, and commands Zachariah to be stoned. When Joash King of Judah was dead, Amaziah his son succeeds him in the Kingdom.

§ 1.

NOW Hazael, king of Syria, fought against the Israelites and their king Jehu, and ravaged the eastern parts of the country beyond Jordan which belonged to the Reubenites and Gadites and half the tribe of Manasseh, as also Gilead and Bashan, burning and spoiling, and offering violence to all that he laid his hands on; and this without hindrance from Jehu, who made no haste to defend the country when it was in this distress: nay, he was become a contemner of religion, and a despiser of holiness and of the laws; and died when he had reigned over the Israelites twenty-seven years. He was buried in Samaria: and left his son Jehoahaz as his successor in the kingdom.

§ 2. Now Joash, king of Jerusalem, had a desire to repair the temple of God; so he called Jehoiada, and bade him send the Levites and priests through all the country to ask half a shekel of silver of every person towards the restoration and repairing of the temple, which was brought to decay by Joram, and Athaliah, and her sons. But the high priest did not do this, concluding that no one would willingly pay that money, but in the twenty-third year of Joash's reign, when the king sent for him and the Levites, and complained that they had not obeyed what he had enjoined them, and commanded them for the future to see to the restoration of the temple, he used the following stratagem for collecting the money, with which the multitude was pleased. He made a wooden chest, and closed it up fast on all sides, but opened one hole in it; he then put it in the temple beside the altar, and desired every one to cast into it what he pleased through the hole for the restoration of the temple. This contrivance was acceptable to the people, and they vied with one another in bringing in large quantities of silver and gold; and when the scribe and the priest that were over the treasuries had emptied the chest, and counted the money in the king's presence, they then set it in its former place, and this they did every day. But when the multitude appeared to have cast in as much money as was wanted, the high priest Jehoiada and king Joash sent to hire masons and carpenters, and to buy large pieces of timber of the finest sort, and when they had repaired the temple, they made use of the remaining gold and silver, which was not a little, for bowls and basons and cups and other vessels, and continued every day to make the altar fat with costly sacrifices. And these things met with suitable attention as long as Jehoiada lived.

§ 3. But as soon as he was dead (which was when he had lived a hundred and thirty years, having been a righteous and in every respect a good man, and he was buried in the king's sepulchre at Jerusalem, because he had recovered the kingdom to the family of David) king Joash gave up his care about God. The leading men of the people were also corrupt together with him, and offended against their duty, and against what was considered to be most for their good. And God was displeased at this change in the king and the rest of the people, and sent prophets to testify to them how bad their actions were, and to stop them from their wickedness.

But they had got such a strong affection and so violent an inclination to it, that neither could the example of those that had before them offered affronts to the laws and had been so severely punished they and their entire families, nor could the fear of what the prophets now foretold bring them to repentance, and turn them back from their course of transgression. But the king even commanded that Zachariah, the son of the high priest Jehoiada, should be stoned to death in the temple, and forgot the kindnesses he had received from his father; for when God appointed Zachariah to prophesy, he stood in the midst of the multitude, and gave this counsel to them and to the king, that they should act righteously, and foretold to them that, if they would not hearken to his admonitions, they should suffer a heavy punishment. And Zachariah when dying appealed to God to witness and avenge what he suffered for the good counsel he had given them, and how he perished in a most severe and violent manner for the good deeds his father had done to Joash.

§ 4. However, it was not long before the king suffered punishment for his lawlessness. For when Hazael, king of Syria, invaded his country, and had overthrown Gath and spoiled it, he made an expedition against Jerusalem. Upon this Joash was afraid, and emptied all the treasures of God, and of the kings before him, and took down the gifts that had been dedicated in the temple, and sent them to the king of Syria, and procured so much by them, that he was not besieged, nor utterly undone, for Hazael was induced by the greatness of the sum of money not to bring his army against Jerusalem. But Joash fell into a severe illness, and was attacked by the friends of Zachariah the son of Jehoiada, in order to revenge his death. They conspired against the king, and slew him. He was indeed buried in Jerusalem, but not in the royal sepulchres of his forefathers, because of his impiety. He lived forty-seven years, and Amaziah his son succeeded him in the kingdom.

§ 5. In the one-and-twentieth year of the reign of Joash, Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu, became king of the Israelites at Samaria, and reigned seventeen years. He did not imitate his father, but was guilty of as wicked practices as those who first held God in contempt: but the king of Syria brought him low, and by an expedition against him did so reduce his forces, that there remained no more of his great army than ten thousand foot and fifty horse. He also took away from him his great and many cities, and destroyed his army. Now the king of Israel suffered these things according to the prophecy of Elisha, when he foretold that Hazael should kill his master, and reign over the Syrians and Damascenes. But when Jehoahaz was in such extreme miseries, he had recourse to prayer and supplication to God, and besought him to deliver him out of the hands of Hazael, and not allow him to be reduced by him. And God accepted his repentance as virtue, being desirous rather to admonish the powerful, and not to determine that they should be utterly destroyed, and granted him deliverance from war and dangers. So the country having obtained peace, returned again to its former condition, and flourished as before.

§ 6. Now after the death of Jehoahaz, his son Joash took the kingdom, in the thirty-seventh year of king Joash of the tribe of Judah. This Joash then took the kingdom of Israel in Samaria, and had the same name as the king of Jerusalem, and retained the kingdom sixteen years. He was a good man, and in his disposition not at all like his father. Now at this time the king of Israel came to visit Elisha the prophet, who was already very old, and was now fallen into an illness, and when Joash found him very near death, he began to weep in his sight and lament, and call him his father and protector, because it was by his means that he never made use of his weapons against his enemies, but overcame his adversaries by his prophecies without fighting; but now he was departing this life, and leaving him to the Syrians, that were already armed, and to other enemies of his; and he added that it was not safe for him to live any longer, but that it would be well for him to hasten to his end, and depart out of this life with him. As the king was bemoaning this state of affairs, Elisha comforted him, and bade the king bend a bow that was brought him: and when the king had fitted the bow for shooting, Elisha took hold of his hands and bade him shoot. And when he had shot three arrows, and then left off, Elisha said, "If thou hadst shot more arrows, thou wouldst have cut the kingdom of Syria up by the roots, but since thou hast been satisfied with shooting three times only, thou shalt fight and beat the Syrians no more than three times, that thou mayest recover that country which they cut off from thy kingdom in the reign of thy father." And when the king heard that he departed, and a little while after the prophet died. He was a man celebrated for righteousness, and in eminent favour with God. He also performed wonderful and surprising works by prophecy, and such as were gloriously preserved in memory among the Hebrews. He had a magnificent funeral, such a one indeed as it was fit a person so beloved of God should have. Now it happened at that time that certain robbers cast a man whom they had slain into Elisha's grave, and upon his dead body coming close to Elisha's body, he came to life again. Thus much have I enlarged on Elisha the prophet, both as to what he foretold while he was alive, and how he had a divine power after his death also.

§ 7. Now upon the death of Hazael, the king of Syria, the kingdom came to Adad his son, with whom Joash king of Israel made war, and beat him in three battles, and took from him all that country, and all those cities and villages, which his father Hazael had taken from the kingdom of Israel. Now this came to pass according to the prophecy of Elisha. And when Joash happened to die, he was buried in Samaria, and the kingdom came to his son Jeroboam.

CHAP. IX.

How Amaziah made an Expedition against the Edomites and Amalekites, and conquered them ; but when he afterwards made War against Joash, he was beaten, and not long after was slain, and Uzziah succeeded him in the Kingdom.

§ 1.

NOW in the second year of the reign of Joash over Israel, Amaziah became king over the tribe of Judah at Jerusalem. His mother's name was Jehoadan, and she was born at Jerusalem. He was exceedingly careful in doing what was right, and that though he was very young. And when he came to the management of affairs and into the kingdom, he resolved that he ought first of all to avenge his father Joash, and to punish those friends of his that had laid violent hands upon him ; so he seized upon them all, and put them to death, yet did he execute no severity upon their children, but acted therein according to the law of Moses, who did not think it just to punish children for the sins of their fathers. After this he chose him an army out of the tribe of Judah and Benjamin, of such as were in the flower of their age, and about twenty years old : and when he had collected together about three hundred thousand of them, he set captains of hundreds over them. He also sent to the king of Israel, and hired a hundred thousand of his soldiers for a hundred talents of silver. For he had resolved to make an expedition against the nations of the Amalekites, and Edomites, and Gebalites : but as he was preparing for his expedition, and ready to start, a prophet counselled him to dismiss the army of the Israelites, because they were impious men, and because God foretold that he should be beaten, if he made use of them as allies, but that he should overcome his enemies, though he fought with but a few soldiers, if God pleased. And when the king was discontented at his having already paid the hire of the Israelites, the prophet exhorted him to do what God would have him, because he should thereby obtain much wealth from God.

So he dismissed them, and said that he still freely gave them their pay, and went with his own army alone, and made war with the nations before mentioned. And when he had beaten them in battle he slew ten thousand of them, and took as many prisoners alive, whom he brought to the great rock which is in Arabia,<sup>1</sup> and threw them down headlong. He also brought away a great deal of spoil and vast riches from all those nations. But while Amaziah was engaged in this expedition, those Israelites whom he had hired and then dismissed were very vexed at it, and taking their dismissal for an affront (supposing it could not have been done to them but out of contempt), they fell upon his kingdom, and proceeded to plunder the country as far as Bethhoron,<sup>2</sup> and took much cattle, and slew three thousand men.

§ 2. Now, upon the victory which Amaziah had got, and his great success, he was puffed up, and began to neglect God, who had given him the victory, and proceeded to worship the gods he had brought out of the country of the Amalekites. So a prophet came to him and said, that he wondered how he could esteem these to be gods, who had been of no advantage to their own people who paid them honours, nor had delivered them from his hands, but had overlooked the destruction of many of them, and had suffered themselves to be carried away captive, for they had been carried to Jerusalem, in the same manner as any one might have taken some of the enemy alive and led them there. This reproof provoked the king to anger, and he commanded the prophet to hold his peace, and threatened to punish him if he meddled with his conduct. So he replied that he would indeed hold his peace, but also foretold that God would not overlook his innovations. But Amaziah was not able to contain himself in the prosperity which God had given him, but outraged God notwithstanding, and was so elated that he wrote to Joash, the king of Israel, and commanded that he and all his people should be obedient to him, as they had formerly been obedient to his progenitors, David and Solomon ; and he let him know, that if would not be so wise as to do what he commanded him, he must fight for his throne. To this message Joash wrote back the following answer. " King Joash to king Amaziah. There was a vastly tall cypress tree in Mount Lebanon, as also a thistle : the thistle sent to the cypress tree to ask the cypress tree's daughter in marriage for the thistle's son ; but as the thistle was making this request, there came a wild beast, and trode down the thistle. May this be a lesson to thee not to be so ambitious, and to have a care, lest upon thy good success in the fight against the Amalekites, thou growest so proud as to bring reverses upon thyself and upon thy kingdom."

§ 3. When Amaziah had read this letter, he was still more eager for war, I suppose by the incitement of God, that he might be punished for his offences against him. But as soon as he led out his army against Joash, and they were going to join battle, there came such a sudden fear and panic upon the army of Amaziah, as God, when he is displeased, sends upon men, which discomfited them even before they came to a close fight. Now it happened, as they were dispersed by the terror that was upon them, that Amaziah was left alone, and was taken prisoner by the enemy ; and Joash threatened to kill him, unless he would persuade the people of Jerusalem to open their gates to him, and receive him and his army into the city. And Amaziah from necessity and fear for his life got the enemy received into the city. And Joash overthrew about four hundred cubits' length of wall, and drove his chariot through the breach into Jerusalem, and led Amaziah captive with him. Thus he became master of Jerusalem, and took away the treasures of God, and carried off all the gold and silver that was in the king's palace, and then freed the king from captivity, and returned to Samaria. Now these things happened to the people of Jerusalem in the fourteenth year of the reign of Amaziah, who after this was conspired against by his friends, and fled to the city of Lachish,<sup>1</sup> and was there slain by the conspirators, who sent men there to kill him.

And they took up his dead body, and carried it to Jerusalem, and made a royal funeral for him. This was the end of the life of Amaziah because of his innovations in religion and contempt of God, when he had lived fifty-four years, and had reigned twenty-nine. He was succeeded by his son, whose name was Uzziah.

CHAP. X.

Concerning Jeroboam King of Israel, and Jonah the Prophet: and how, after the Death of Jeroboam, his son Zachariah had the Kingdom. How Uzziah, King of Jerusalem, subdued the Nations that were round about him; and what befell him when he attempted to offer Incense to God.

§ 1.

IN the fifteenth year of the reign of Amaziah, Jeroboam the son of Joash reigned over Israel in Samaria forty years. This king was guilty of contumely against God, and became very wicked, worshipping idols and undertaking many things that were strange and foreign. He was therefore the cause of ten thousand misfortunes to the people of Israel. Now one Jonah, a prophet, foretold to him, that he should make war with the Syrians, and conquer their army, and enlarge the bounds of his kingdom on the north as far as the city of Hamath,<sup>1</sup> and on the south as far as the lake Asphaltitis, for these were originally the boundaries of Canaan, as Joshua the general had fixed. So Jeroboam made an expedition against the Syrians, and overran all their country, as Jonah had foretold.

§ 2. Now I cannot but think it necessary, as I have promised to give an accurate account of our affairs, to narrate the history of this prophet, as I have found it written down in the Hebrew books. Jonah had been commanded by God to go to the kingdom of Ninus, and when he was there, to publish in the city of Nineveh,<sup>2</sup> how it should lose its dominion. But out of fear he went not, nay, he ran away from God to the city of Joppa,<sup>1</sup> and, finding a ship there, went on board and sailed to Tarsus<sup>2</sup> in Cilicia. And upon the rise of a most terrible storm, which was so great that the ship was in danger of sinking, the mariners and the pilot and the master himself made prayers and vows of thank-offerings in case they escaped the sea: but Jonah lay still and covered up without imitating any thing that the others did. Then as the waves grew greater, and the sea became more violent by the winds, they suspected, as is usual in such cases, that some one of the persons that sailed with them was the cause of the storm, and agreed to discover by lot which of them it was; and when they had cast lots, the lot fell upon the prophet. So they asked him, whence he came, and what was his errand? He replied, that he was a Hebrew by nation, and a prophet of Almighty God; and he recommended them to cast him into the sea, if they would escape the danger they were in, for he was the cause of their storm. Now at first they durst not do so, esteeming it a wicked thing to expose a man who was a stranger, and who had committed his life to them, to such manifest destruction; but at last, as their distress overbore them, and the ship was just going to sink, and as they were incited to do so by the prophet himself and by fear for their own safety, they cast him into the sea; upon which the storm ceased. It also related that Jonah was swallowed by a whale, and that when he had been in its belly three days and as many nights, he was vomited out on the coast of the Euxine Sea, and that alive and without any hurt upon his body. And there, on his prayer to God, he obtained pardon for his sins, and went to the city of Nineveh, where he stood in the hearing of all, and proclaimed that in a very little time they should lose the dominion of Asia. And when he had announced this, he returned. I have given the account about him, as I found it written.

§ 3. When Jeroboam the king had passed his life in great happiness, and had ruled forty years, he died, and was buried in Samaria, and his son Zachariah succeeded him in the kingdom. Similarly Uzziah, the son of Amaziah, began to reign over the two tribes in Jerusalem, in the fourteenth year of the reign of Jeroboam. His mother Achiala was a citizen of Jerusalem. He was by nature a good man, and righteous and magnanimous, and energetic in looking after the affairs of his kingdom. He made an expedition also against the Philistines, and overcame them in battle, and took by storm their cities of Gath<sup>1</sup> and Jamnia,<sup>2</sup> and razed their walls to the ground. After this expedition, he attacked the Arabs that were on the confines of Egypt. He also built a city upon the Red Sea,<sup>3</sup> and put a garrison in it. After this he overthrew the Ammonites, and ordered them to pay tribute. He also subdued all the country as far as the confines of Egypt, and then began to take care of Jerusalem itself for the rest of his life. For he rebuilt and repaired all those parts of the walls which had either fallen down from time or the carelessness of the kings his predecessors, as well as all that had been thrown down by the king of Israel, when he took his father Amaziah prisoner, and entered with him into the city. Moreover, he built a great many towers a hundred and fifty cubits high, and built walled towns in desert places and put garrisons into them, and dug many aqueducts. He had also many beasts for labour, and an immense number of cattle, for his country was good for pasture. He was also fond of husbandry, and took great care to cultivate the ground, and planted it with all sorts of plants, and sowed it with all sorts of seeds. He had also about him an army composed of three hundred and seventy thousand chosen men, who were governed by two thousand general officers and captains of thousands, who were men of valour and unconquerable strength. He also divided his whole army into divisions, and armed them, giving every one a sword, and brazen bucklers and breast-plates, and bows and slings. And besides these, he made for them many engines of war for besieging of cities, such as engines for throwing stones and darts, and grappling-irons, and other instruments of that sort.

§ 4. While Uzziah was making these arrangements and preparations he was corrupted in his mind by pride, and became puffed up on account of his perishable abundance, and despised that power which is of eternal duration (which consisted in piety towards God and the observation of his laws), so he fell by reason of the good success of his affairs, and was carried headlong into those sins of his father, which the splendour of the prosperity he enjoyed, and the glorious actions he had done, led him into, as he was not able to moderate himself in them. So upon a high day, when a general festival was to be celebrated, he put on the priestly garment, and went into the temple to offer incense to God upon the golden altar, which he was prohibited to do by Azariah the high priest, who had eighty priests with him, and who told him that it was not lawful for him to offer sacrifice, for none but the posterity of Aaron were permitted to do so. And when they cried out that he must go out of the temple and not sin against God, he was wroth at them, and threatened to kill them, unless they would hold their peace. In the mean time, a great earthquake shook the ground,<sup>1</sup> and a rent was made in the temple, and the bright rays of the sun shone through it, and fell upon the king's face, insomuch that leprosy seized him immediately, and before the city, at a place called Eroge,<sup>2</sup> half a mountain broke off on the west, and rolled itself four furlongs, and stopped at the east mountain, till the roads and king's park were obstructed. Now, as soon as the priests saw that the king's face was infected with leprosy, they told him of his calamity, and commanded him to go out of the city as an unclean person. And he was so confounded with shame at this terrible disease, that he lost all his confidence, and did as he was commanded, and underwent this miserable and terrible punishment for an intention beyond what it befitted a man to have, and for the impiety against God which was implied therein. So he dwelt out of the city for some time and lived a private life, and his son Jotham took over the government; after which he died with grief and dejection at what had happened to him, when he had lived sixty-eight years, and of them reigned fifty-two; and he was buried by himself in his own gardens.

CHAP. XI.

How Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, and Pekah reigned over the Israelites; and how Pul and Tiglath-Pileser made an Expedition against the Israelites. How Jotham, the Son of Uzziah, reigned over the Tribe of Judah: and what Nahum prophesied against the Assyrians.

§ 1.

NOW when Zachariah, the son of Jeroboam, had reigned six months over Israel, he was slain by the treachery of a certain friend of his, whose name was Shallum, the son of Jabesh, who usurped the kingdom after him, but kept it no longer than thirty days; for Menahem, the general of the army, who was at that time in the city of Tirzah,<sup>1</sup> and heard of what had befallen Zachariah, marched with all his army to Samaria, and joined battle with Shallum, and slew him, and made himself king, and went thence, and came to the city of Tiphseh.<sup>2</sup> But the citizens that were in it shut their gates, and barred them against the king, and would not admit him; and in order to be avenged on them, he ravaged the country round about, and took the city by storm after a siege; and being very much displeased at what the inhabitants of Tiphseh had done, he slew them all, and spared not so much as the infants, exhibiting the utmost cruelty and barbarity; for he used such severity to his own countrymen, as would not be pardonable with regard to strangers who had been conquered by him. And this Menahem continued to reign with cruelty and barbarity for ten years: but when Pul, king of Assyria, made an expedition against him, he did not engage in battle with the Assyrians, but persuaded Pul to accept of a thousand talents of silver and to go away, and so put an end to the war. This sum the multitude collected for Menahem, by exacting fifty drachmæ per head. After this he died, and was buried in Samaria, and left his son Pekahiah his successor in the kingdom, who followed the barbarity of his father, and ruled two years only, after which he was slain with his friends at a feast, by the treachery of one Pekah, the son of Remaliah, and captain over a thousand, who had conspired against him. And this Pekah was king twenty years, and proved a wicked man and a transgressor. And when the king of Assyria, whose name was Tiglath-Pileser, made an expedition against the Israelites, and overran all the land of Gilead, and the region beyond the Jordan, and the adjoining country which is called Galilee, and Kadesh<sup>1</sup> and Hazor,<sup>2</sup> he made the inhabitants prisoners, and transplanted them to his own kingdom. And so much shall suffice to have related here concerning the king of Assyria.

§ 2. Now Jotham, the son of Uzziah, reigned over the tribe of Judah in Jerusalem, his mother, whose name was Jerusha, being a citizen thereof. This king was not defective in any virtue, but was religious towards God, and righteous towards men. He was also careful of the condition of the city (for whatever parts wanted to be repaired or adorned, he magnificently repaired and adorned them). He also repaired the porticoes in the temple, and set up the walls that were fallen down, and built very great towers, and such as were almost impregnable; and if any thing else in his kingdom had been neglected, he took great care of it. He also made an expedition against the Ammonites, and overcame them in battle, and ordered them to pay as tribute a hundred talents, and ten thousand cors of wheat, and as many of barley, every year. And he so augmented his kingdom, that his enemies could not despise it, and his own people lived happily.

§ 3. Now there was at this time a prophet whose name was Nahum, who spoke as follows concerning the overthrow of the Assyrians and Nineveh. "Nineveh shall be a pool of water in motion; <sup>1</sup> so troubled and tossed shall all her people be, and go away by flight, while they say one to another, stand, remain still, seize their gold and silver; for there shall be no one to wish them well, for they will rather save their lives than their money: for a terrible contention shall possess them one with another, and lamentation, and trembling of limbs, and their countenances shall be perfectly black with fear. And where shall be the den of the lions, and the mother of the young lions? God says to thee, Nineveh, that he will deface thee, and lions shall no longer go out from thee to rule the world." And indeed this prophet prophesied many other things besides these concerning Nineveh, which I do not think necessary to repeat, and I omit them that I may not appear troublesome to my readers. And all these predicted things happened to Nineveh a hundred and fifteen years afterwards. This much may suffice to have spoken of these matters.

<sup>1</sup> This passage is taken out of the prophet Nahum, chap. ii. 8-13, and is the principal, or rather the only one that is given us almost verbatim, but a little abridged, in all Josephus's known writings: by which quotation, we learn what he himself always asserts, viz. that he made use of the Hebrew original [and not of the Greek version]; as also we learn, that his Hebrew copy considerably differed from ours.—W.

CHAP. XII.

How, upon the Death of Jotham, Ahaz reigned in his stead ; against whom Rezin, King of Syria, and Pekah, King of Israel, made War : and how Tiglath-Pileser, King of Assyria, came to the Assistance of Ahaz, and laid Syria waste, and removing the Damascenes into Media, placed other Nations in Damascus.

§ 1.

NOW Jotham died when he had lived forty-one years, and of them reigned sixteen, and was buried in the sepulchres of the kings ; and the kingdom came to his son Ahaz, who turned out most impious towards God, and a transgressor of the laws of his country. He imitated the kings of Israel, and reared altars in Jerusalem, and offered sacrifices upon them to idols, to whom also he offered his own son as a burnt-offering, according to the practices of the Canaanites, and did other similar actions. Now as he was going on in this mad course, Rezin, the king of Syria and Damascus, and Pekah the king of Israel, who were now friendly to one another, made war against him ; and when they had driven him into Jerusalem, they besieged that city a long while, making but small progress on account of the strength of its walls. And when the king of Syria had taken the city of Elath<sup>1</sup> near the Red Sea, and had slain its inhabitants, he peopled it with Syrians. And when he had slain the Jews in the garrisons and in the neighbourhood, and had carried off much spoil, he returned with his army back to Damascus. Now when the king of Jerusalem knew that the Syrians were returned home, supposing himself a match for the king of Israel, he drew out his army against him, and joined battle with him, and was beaten ; and this happened because God was angry with him on account of his many and great enormities. Accordingly one hundred and twenty thousand of his men were slain that day by the Israelites, whose general

Zacharis slew Amaziah, king Ahaz's son, in the battle, as well as the governor of the kingdom, whose name was Azricam. He also took prisoner Elkanah, the general of the tribe of Judah. They also carried away captive the women and children of the tribe of Benjamin; and when they had got a great deal of spoil, they returned to Samaria.

§ 2. Now there was one Obed, who was a prophet at that time in Samaria, who met the army before the city walls, and with a loud voice told them that they had not got the victory by their own strength, but because of the anger that God had against king Ahaz. And he complained, that they were not satisfied with the good success they had had against Ahaz, but had had the heart to make captives of their kinsmen the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. He also counselled them to let them go home without suffering any harm, for if they did not obey God, they should be punished. And the people of Israel came together to their assembly and considered of these matters, when a man whose name was Barachiah, who was one of great reputation in the state, stood up, and three others with him, and said they would not suffer the citizens to bring those prisoners into the city, lest they should all be destroyed by God; they had sins enough of their own that they had committed against God, as the prophets assured them, they ought not therefore to introduce the practice of new crimes. When the soldiers heard that, they permitted them to do what they thought expedient. So the forenamed men took the captives and let them go, and took care of them, and gave them necessaries for their journey, and sent them back to their own country, without doing them any harm. Moreover those four went along with them, and conducted them as far as Jericho, which is not far from Jerusalem, and returned to Samaria.

§ 3. Now king Ahaz, after having been so thoroughly beaten by the Israelites, sent to Tiglath-Pileser, king of the Assyrians, and sued for assistance from him in the war against the Israelites and Syrians and Damascenes, with a promise to send him much money; he also sent him handsome presents. And he, upon the reception of those ambassadors, came to assist Ahaz, and made war upon the Syrians, and laid their country waste, and took Damascus by storm, and slew Rezin its king, and transplanted the people of Damascus into upper Media, and brought a colony of Assyrians, and planted them in Damascus. He also afflicted the land of Israel, and took many captives out of it. While he was dealing thus with the Syrians, king Ahaz took all the gold and silver that was in the king's treasures, and what was in the temple of God, and what precious gifts were there, and carried them off with him to Damascus, and gave them to the king of Assyria according to his agreement. And he confessed that he owed him thanks for all he had done for him, and returned to Jerusalem. Now Ahaz was so sottish, and thoughtless of what was for his own good, that he would not leave off worshipping the Syrian gods when he was beaten by the Syrians, but went on worshipping them, as though they would procure him victory : and when he was beaten again, he began to honour the gods of the Assyrians ; and he seemed more desirous to honour any gods than his own national and true God, whose anger was the cause of his defeat. Nay, he proceeded to such a degree of despite and contempt of God, that he shut up the temple entirely, and forbade the offering of the appointed sacrifices, and took away the gifts that had been given to it. And when he had offered these indignities to God, he died, having lived thirty-six years, and of them reigned sixteen ; and he left his son Hezekiah as his successor.

CHAP. XIII.

How Pekah died by the Treachery of Hoshea, who was a little after subdued by Shalmaneser ; and how Hezekiah reigned instead of Ahaz ; and what Actions of Piety and Righteousness he did.

§ 1.

ABOUT the same time, Pekah, the king of Israel, died by the treachery of a friend of his, whose name was Hoshea, who retained the kingdom nine years, but was a wicked man, and a despiser of the divine worship. And Shalmaneser, the king of Assyria, made an expedition against him, and overcame him (which was probably because he had not God favourable or friendly to him), and brought him to submission, and ordered him to pay a fixed tribute. Now in the fourth year of the reign of Hoshea, Hezekiah, the son of Ahaz, began to reign in Jerusalem; and his mother's name was Abijah, she was a citizen of Jerusalem. His nature was good, and righteous, and religious; for when he came to the kingdom, he thought that nothing was more important, or more necessary, or more advantageous to himself and his subjects, than to worship God. Accordingly, he called the people together, and the priests and the Levites, and made a speech to them, and said, "You are not ignorant that, owing to the sins of my father, who neglected the sacred service of God, you have experienced many and great miseries, as you were corrupted in your mind by him, and were induced to worship those whom he approved of as gods. I exhort you, therefore, who have learned by sad experience how awful a thing impiety is, to put it immediately out of your memory, and to purify yourselves from your former pollutions, and to open the temple to these priests and Levites who are here convened, and to cleanse it with the accustomed sacrifices, and to restore all to the ancient honour which our fathers paid to it. For so we shall render God favourable, and he will remit his anger."

§ 2. When the king had said this, the priests opened the temple; and when they had set in order the vessels of God, and cast out what was impure, they laid the accustomed sacrifices upon the altar. The king also sent throughout his territories, and called the people to Jerusalem to celebrate the feast of Unleavened Bread, for it had been intermitted a long time, on account of the wickedness of the forementioned kings. He also sent to the Israelites, and exhorted them to leave off their present way of living, and return to their ancient practices, and to worship God, for he gave them leave to come to Jerusalem, and to celebrate all in one body the feast of Unleavened Bread; and he said this was by way of invitation only, and to be done not out of obedience to him but of their own free will, and for their own advantage, because it would make them happy. But the Israelites, upon the coming of his envoys, and upon their laying before them the message of their king, were so far from complying therewith, that they laughed the envoys to scorn, and mocked them as fools: they also affronted the prophets who gave them the same exhortations, and foretold what they would suffer if they did not return to the worship of God, insomuch that at length they arrested them, and slew them. Nor did this degree of transgressing suffice them, but they acted more wickedly still than has been described. Nor did they leave off before God brought them under their enemies as a punishment for their impiety; but of that more hereafter. However, there were many of the tribe of Manasseh, and of Zebulon, and of Issachar, who were obedient to what the prophets exhorted them to do, and returned to piety. And all these flocked to Jerusalem to Hezekiah, that they might worship God.

§ 3. When they were come, king Hezekiah went up into the temple with the rulers and all the people, and offered for himself seven bulls and as many rams, and seven lambs and as many kids of the goats. The king also himself and the rulers laid their hands on the heads of the victims, and left it to the priests to complete the sacrifices. So they both sacrificed and offered the burnt-offerings, while the Levites stood round about with their musical instruments, and sang hymns to God, and played on their harps, as they were instructed by David to do, while the rest of the priests returned the music with their trumpets. And when this was done, the king and the multitude threw themselves down upon their faces and worshipped God. The king also sacrificed seventy bulls, one hundred rams, and two hundred lambs, and granted the multitude to feast upon six hundred oxen, and three thousand other cattle. And the priests performed all things according to the law. And the king was so pleased therewith, that he feasted with the people, and returned thanks to God. And as the feast of Unleavened Bread was now at hand, when they had offered the sacrifice which is called the Passover, they after that offered the other sacrifices for seven days. When the king had bestowed on the multitude, besides what they sacrificed themselves, two thousand bulls, and seven thousand other cattle, the same thing was done by the rulers:

for they gave them a thousand bulls, and a thousand and forty other cattle. Nor had this festival been so well observed since the days of king Solomon, as it was now first observed with great splendour and magnificence. And when the festival was ended, they went out into the country, and purified it, and cleansed the city of all the pollution of the idols. The king also ordered that the daily sacrifices should be offered at his own expense according to the law; and appointed that the tithes and first-fruits should be given by the multitude to the priests and Levites, that they might constantly attend upon divine service, and never be taken off from the worship of God. Accordingly, the multitude contributed all sorts of fruits to the priests and Levites. The king also made garners and storehouses for these fruits, and distributed them to every one of the priests and Levites, and to their children and wives. And thus did they return to their ancient religion. Now, when the king had settled these matters in the manner already described, he made war upon the Philistines, and beat them, and possessed himself of all the enemies' cities from Gaza<sup>1</sup> to Gath. But the king of Assyria sent to him, and threatened to overthrow all his dominions, unless he would pay him the tribute which his father paid formerly; but king Hezekiah was not concerned at his threatenings, but depended on his piety towards God, and upon Isaiah the prophet, from whom he got accurate knowledge of all future events. And thus much shall suffice for the present concerning king Hezekiah.

CHAP. XIV.

How Shalmaneser took Samaria by Force, and how he transplanted the Ten Tribes into Media, and brought the Nation of the Cuthæans into their Country in their Room.

§ 1.

WHEN Shalmaneser, the king of Assyria, had it told him, that Hoshea the king of Israel had sent privately to So the king of Egypt, desiring his assistance against him, he was very angry, and made an expedition against Samaria, in the seventh year of the reign of Hoshea. But as he was not admitted by the king, he besieged Samaria three years, and took it by storm in the ninth year of the reign of Hoshea, and in the seventh year of Hezekiah, king of Jerusalem, and quite destroyed the kingdom of Israel, and transplanted all the people into Media and Persia, among whom he took king Hoshea alive. And when he had removed these people out of their land, he transplanted other nations from a place called Cuthah<sup>1</sup> (there is a river of that name in Persia) into Samaria and the country of the Israelites. So the ten tribes of the Israelites were removed from Judæa, nine hundred and forty-seven years after their forefathers came out of the land of Egypt and possessed themselves of this country, and eight hundred years after Joshua was their leader; and two hundred and forty years seven months seven days after they had, as I have already described, revolted from Rehoboam, the grandson of David, and given the kingdom to Jeroboam. And such an end came upon the Israelites because they transgressed the laws, and would not hearken to the prophets, who foretold that this calamity would come upon them, if they would not leave off their evil doings. What originated their misfortunes was their rebellion against Rehoboam, the grandson of David, when they set up Jeroboam his servant to be their king, who, by sinning against God, and bringing them to imitate his bad example, made God to be their enemy, while Jeroboam underwent that punishment which he justly deserved.

§ 2. And now the king of Assyria invaded all Syria and Phœnicia in a hostile manner. The name of this king is also set down in the archives of Tyre, for he made an expedition against Tyre in the reign of Elulæus; as Menander testifies, who, when he wrote his Annals, and translated the archives of Tyre into the Greek language, gave the following account: "One, whose name was Elulæus, also called Pyas, reigned thirty-six years: this king, upon the revolt of the Cittæans, sailed and reduced them to submission again. Against these did the king of Assyria send an army, and in a hostile manner overran all Phœnicia, but soon made peace with them all, and returned back; but Sidon and Ace<sup>1</sup> and old Tyre<sup>2</sup> revolted from the Tyrians, and many other cities also, which delivered themselves up to the king of Assyria. But as the Tyrians would not submit to him, the king of Assyria returned, and attacked them again, and the Phœnicians furnished him with three-score ships and eight hundred men to row them; and when the Tyrians sailed against them in twelve ships, and dispersed the enemies' ships, and took five hundred men prisoners, the reputation of all the citizens of Tyre was thereby increased. But the king of Assyria returned, and placed guards at their river and aqueducts to hinder the Tyrians from drawing water. This continued for five years, and still the Tyrians held out, and drank of the water they got from wells which they dug." This is what is written in the Tyrian archives concerning Shalmaneser the king of Assyria.

§ 3. But now the Cuthæans who removed into Samaria (for that is the name they have been called by to this day, because they were brought out of the country called Cuthah, which is a country of Persia, where there is a river of the same name), each of them, according to their nations, which were five, introduced their own gods into Samaria; and by worshipping them after their national rites they provoked Almighty God to be angry and displeased at them, for a plague seized them, by which they were destroyed; and as they found no cure for their miseries, they learned by an oracle that they must worship Almighty God to get deliverance. So they sent messengers to the king of Assyria, and desired him to send them some of those priests of the Israelites whom he had taken captive. And when he sent them, and the people were taught by them the laws and the right worship of God, they worshipped him zealously, and the plague immediately ceased. Indeed they continue to make use of the very same rites to this day, and are called in the Hebrew tongue Cuthæans, but in the Greek tongue Samaritans. And as to their relationship with the Jews these people chop and change according to circumstances. When they see the Jews in prosperity, they pretend that they are allied to them, and call them kinsmen, as though they were derived from Joseph and so had an original affinity with them: but when they see them in reverses, they say they are no way related to them, and that the Jews have no right to expect any kindness or marks of kindred from them, for they then declare that they are resident aliens. But of them I shall have a more seasonable opportunity to speak hereafter.

BOOK X.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-TWO YEARS AND A HALF.—FROM THE CAPTIVITY OF THE TEN TRIBES TO THE FIRST YEAR OF THE REIGN OF CYRUS.

CHAP. I.

How Sennacherib made an Expedition against Hezekiah; what Threatenings Rabshakeh made to Hezekiah when Sennacherib was gone against the Egyptians; how Isaiah the Prophet encouraged Hezekiah; how Sennacherib, having failed of Success in Egypt, returned thence to Jerusalem; and how, upon his finding his Army destroyed, he returned home; and what befell him shortly afterwards.

§ 1.

IT was now the fourteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah, king of the two tribes, when the king of Assyria, whose name was Sennacherib, made an expedition against him with a great army, and took all the cities of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin by storm. And when he was about to bring his army against Jerusalem, Hezekiah sent ambassadors to him beforehand, and promised to submit, and to pay what tribute he should fix. And Sennacherib, when he heard the offers the ambassadors made, resolved not to proceed in the war, but to accept the proposals that were made to him; and if he should receive three hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold, he promised that he would depart in a friendly manner; and he pledged himself upon oath to the ambassadors that he would then do the king no harm, but go away as he came. And Hezekiah believed him, and emptied his treasures, and sent the money, supposing he should be freed from his enemy, and from any further anxiety about his kingdom. And the Assyrian king took the money, but paid no regard to what he had promised; for while he himself went to war against the Egyptians and Ethiopians, he left his general Rabshakeh, and two other commanders, with great forces, to destroy Jerusalem. The names of the two other commanders were Tartan and Rabsaris.

§ 2. Now as soon as they were come before the walls, they pitched their camp, and sent messengers to Hezekiah, and desired that they might speak with him. But he did not himself come out to them owing to fear, but he sent three of his most intimate friends, Eliakim who was administrator of the kingdom, and Shebna, and Joah the recorder; who came out of the city and met the commanders of the Assyrian army. And when Rabshakeh saw them, he bade them go and tell Hezekiah that "Sennacherib the great king<sup>1</sup> desires to know of him, on whom it is that he relies and depends in revolting from his lord, and being unwilling to hear him, or admit his army into the city? Is it on account of the Egyptians, in the hope that Sennacherib's army will be beaten by them? Let him know, if this is what he expects, that he is a foolish man, and like one who leans on a broken reed, who will not only fall down, but will have his hand pierced and hurt by it. He ought also to know that Sennacherib makes this expedition against him by the will of God, who has granted this favour to him, that he shall overthrow the kingdom of Israel, and that in the same manner he shall destroy those that are Hezekiah's subjects also." When Rabshakeh had made this speech in the Hebrew tongue, for he was skilful in that language, Eliakim was afraid that the multitude that heard him would be thrown into consternation, so he desired him to speak in the Syrian tongue: but the general understanding what he meant, and perceiving the fear he was in, made his answer in a louder and clear voice, and said, "I speak in the Hebrew tongue, that all may hear the king's commands, and consult their own advantage in delivering themselves up to us, for it is plain that both you and your king dissuade the people from submitting by vain hopes, and so induce them to resist. But if you are confident, and think to drive our forces away, I am ready to supply you with two thousand of the horses that are with me for your use, if you can set as many riders on their backs, and then show your strength. But you cannot produce the men you have not got. Why do you therefore delay to deliver up yourselves to a superior force, who can take you without your consent? although it will be safer for you to deliver up yourselves voluntarily, as a forcible surrender by your being beaten is evidently dangerous, and will bring further calamities upon you."

§ 3. When the people and the messengers had heard what the Assyrian commander said, they reported it to Hezekiah, who thereupon put off his royal apparel, and clothed himself with sackcloth, and took the habit of a mourner; and fell upon his face after the manner of his country and besought God, and entreated him to assist him, for he had no other hope of relief. He also sent some of his friends and some of the priests to the prophet Isaiah, and desired that he would pray to God, and offer sacrifices for their common deliverance, and beseech him to have indignation at the hopes of their enemies, and to have mercy upon his own people. And when the prophet had done this, an oracle came from God to him, and encouraged the king and his friends that were about him; and foretold that their enemies should be beaten without fighting, and should go away in an ignominious manner, and not with that insolence which they now showed, for God would take care that they should be destroyed. He also foretold that Sennacherib the king of Assyria would fail in his expedition against Egypt, and when he came home would perish by the sword.

§ 4. About the same time the king of Assyria also wrote a letter to Hezekiah, in which he said he was a foolish man to suppose that he should escape from being his servant, for he had already reduced many and great nations; and he threatened, that when he took him, he would utterly destroy him, unless he now opened his gates, and willingly received his army into Jerusalem. When Hezekiah read this letter, he despised it on account of the trust that he had in God, and he rolled it up and laid it in the temple. And as he again prayed to God for the preservation of the city and all the people, the prophet Isaiah told him that God had heard his prayer, and that he should not be besieged at this time by the king of Assyria, and that for the future he might be secure of not being at all disturbed by him, and that the people might peaceably and without fear go on with their husbandry and other affairs. And a little while after the king of Assyria, having failed in his attempt against the Egyptians, returned home without success for the following reason. He had spent a long time in the siege of Pelusium,<sup>1</sup> and when the banks that he had raised near the walls were of a great height, and he intended to make an immediate assault upon them, he heard that Tirhakah, king of the Ethiopians, was coming up with a great force to aid the Egyptians, and intended to march through the desert, and so fall suddenly upon the Assyrians. And king Sennacherib was disturbed at this news, and, as I said before, left Pelusium, and returned home without success. Now concerning this Sennacherib Herodotus also relates in the second book of his histories, that this king came against the Egyptian king, who was the priest of Hephaestus, and that, as he was besieging Pelusium, he raised the siege for the following reason. The Egyptian priest prayed to God, and God heard his prayer, and sent a judgment upon the Arabian king. But Herodotus was mistaken in this, in calling him king not of the Assyrians, but of the Arabians. For he says that a multitude of mice gnawed to pieces in one night both the bows and the rest of the armour of the Assyrians, and that it was on this account that the king, as he had no bows left, drew off his army from Pelusium. Herodotus gives us this account; and Berosus also, who wrote of the affairs of Chaldæa, mentions this king Sennacherib, and says that he ruled over the Assyrians, and that he made an expedition against all Asia and Egypt, and says thus . . . .<sup>1</sup>

§ 5. Now, when Sennacherib returned from his Egyptian war to Jerusalem, he found his army under Rabshakeh, his general, in danger from a plague, for God had sent a pestilence upon his army; and on the very first night of the siege, a hundred fourscore and five thousand, with their captains and generals, were destroyed. And the king was in great dread and terrible agony at this calamity, and being in great fear for his whole army, he fled with the rest of his forces to his own kingdom, and to his city of Nineveh; and when he had abode there a little while, he was treacherously slain by his elder sons, Adrammelech and Shareser, and was buried in his own temple called Araske.<sup>2</sup> Now these sons of his were driven away by the citizens on account of the murder of their father, and went into Armenia, and Esarhaddon succeeded Sennacherib. And this was the conclusion of this expedition of the Assyrians against the people of Jerusalem.

CHAP. II.

How Hezekiah was sick and likely to die ; and how God bestowed upon him fifteen Years' longer Life, and gave him a sign of it by the Shadow going back ten Degrees.

§ 1.

NOW king Hezekiah, being thus unexpectedly delivered from the dread he was in, offered thank-offerings to God with all the people, because nothing but the divine assistance had destroyed some of their enemies, and made the rest so fearful of undergoing the same fate that they departed from Jerusalem. But though he was very zealous and diligent about the worship of God, he soon afterwards fell into a severe illness, insomuch that the physicians despaired of his life, and feared the worst, as also did his friends. And besides his illness itself, there was a very melancholy circumstance that troubled the king, which was the consideration that he was childless, and was going to die, and leave his house and kingdom without a legitimate successor. And he lamented and was grieved at the thought of this, and entreated of God that he would prolong his life for a little while till he had some children, and not suffer him to depart this life before he became a father. And God had mercy upon him, and hearkened to his supplication, because the trouble he was in at the idea of death was not because he was soon to lose the advantages he enjoyed as king, nor did he on that account pray that he might have a longer life afforded him, but only in order to have sons to succeed him. And God sent Isaiah the prophet, and commanded him to inform Hezekiah, that within three days' time he should recover from his illness, and should survive it fifteen years, and should have children also. Now upon the prophet's saying this, as God had commanded him, Hezekiah could hardly believe it, both on account of his very sore illness, and because of the surprising nature of what was told him, so he desired that Isaiah would give him some sign and omen, that he might believe what he had said, and be sure that he came from God : for things that are beyond expectation, and greater than our hopes, are made credible by such signs. And when Isaiah asked him what sign he desired, he asked that he would make the shadow of the sun, which he had already made go down ten degrees in his house, to return again to the same place, and be as it was before. And when the prophet prayed to God to exhibit this sign to the king, he saw what he desired to see, and was freed from his illness, and went up to the temple, where he worshipped God, and made vows to him.

§ 2. At this time the empire of the Assyrians was overthrown by the Medes, but of this I shall treat elsewhere. But the king of Babylon, whose name was Baladan, sent ambassadors to Hezekiah with presents, and desired he would be his ally and his friend. And he received the ambassadors gladly, and made them a feast, and showed them his treasures, and his armoury, and the other wealth he was possessed of in precious stones and gold, and gave them presents to be carried to Baladan, and sent them back to him. Upon this the prophet Isaiah came to him, and inquired of him, " Whence those ambassadors came ? " To which he replied, that they came from Babylon from the king ; and that he had showed them all he had, that by the sight of his riches and power they might thereby guess at his condition, and be able to inform the king of it. But the prophet rejoined, " Know that, after a little while, these riches of thine shall be carried away to Babylon, and thy posterity shall be made eunuchs there, and lose their manhood, and be slaves of the king of Babylon, for God foretells that such things will come to pass." At these words Hezekiah was troubled, and said that he was unwilling that his nation should fall into such calamities at all, yet as it was not possible to alter what God had determined, he prayed that there might be peace while he lived. Berosus also makes mention of this Baladan king of Babylon. Now as to this prophet [Isaiah], he was by the confession of all a divine and wonderful man in revealing the truth, and confiding in his never having spoken what was false, he wrote down all his prophecies, and left them behind him in books, that their accomplishment might be judged of by posterity from the events. Nor did this prophet alone do so, but the others, who were twelve in number, did the same. And whatever is done among us, whether it be good, or whether it be bad, comes to pass according to their prophecies. But of every one of these I shall speak hereafter.

CHAP. III.

How Manasseh reigned after Hezekiah ; and how, when he was in Captivity, he returned to God, and was restored to his Kingdom, and left it to his Son Amon.

§ 1.

WHEN king Hezekiah had survived the interval of time already mentioned, and had dwelt all that time in peace, he died, having completed fifty-four years of life, and reigned twenty-nine. But when his son Manasseh, whose mother, Hephzibah, was a native of Jerusalem, had taken the kingdom, he departed from the conduct of his father, and fell into a course of life quite contrary thereto, and showed himself most wicked in his manners in all respects, and omitted no sort of impiety, but imitated those transgressions of the Israelites for the commission of which against God they had been destroyed ; for he was so bold as to defile the temple of God and Jerusalem and the whole country. For setting out with a contempt of God, he savagely slew all the righteous men who were among the Hebrews, nor did he spare the prophets, for every day he slew some of them, till Jerusalem flowed with blood. And God was angry at these proceedings, and sent prophets to the king and to the people, by whom he threatened the very same calamities to them, which their brethren the Israelites had suffered from upon the like affronts offered to God. But they would not believe their words, though had they done so they might have reaped the advantage of escaping all those miseries, yet did they learn by the events that what the prophets had told them was true.

§ 2. For as they persevered in the same courses, God raised up war against them from the king of Babylon and Chaldæa, who sent an army into Judæa, and laid waste the country; and got possession of king Manasseh by treachery, and ordered him to be brought to him, and had him in his power to inflict what punishment he pleased upon him. Then it was that Manasseh perceived what a miserable condition he was in, and esteeming himself the cause of all, he besought God to render his enemy humane and merciful to him. And God heard his prayer, and granted him what he prayed for. So Manasseh was released by the king of Babylon, and restored to his kingdom. And when he returned to Jerusalem, he endeavoured, if it were possible, to cast out of his memory his former sins against God, of which he now repented, and to apply himself to a very religious life. He sanctified the temple, and purified the city, and for the remainder of his days was intent on nothing but to return thanks to God for his deliverance, and to preserve his favour all his life long. He also instructed the people to do the same, having experienced what calamity he had very nearly fallen into by the contrary conduct. He also rebuilt the altar, and offered the legal sacrifices, as Moses commanded. And when he had re-established the divine worship as it ought to be, he saw to the security of Jerusalem, and did not only repair the old walls with great diligence, but added another wall to the former. He also built very lofty towers, and the out-works before the city he not only strengthened in other respects, but put into them provisions of all sorts. And, indeed, when he had changed his former courses, he so led his life for the time to come, that from the time he began to show piety towards God, he was deemed a happy man, and a pattern for imitation. And when he had lived sixty-seven years, and reigned fifty-five years, he departed this life, and was buried in his own garden; and the kingdom came to his son Amon, whose mother Meshulemeth was a native of the city of Jotbath.

CHAP. IV.

How Amon reigned instead of Manasseh; and after Amon Josiah; he was both righteous and religious. Also concerning Huldah the Prophetess.

§ 1.

THIS Amon imitated the wicked conduct of his father during his youth, and had a conspiracy made against him by his own servants, and was slain in his own house, when he had lived twenty-four years and reigned two. But the multitude punished those that slew Amon, and buried him with his father, and gave the kingdom to his son Josiah, who was eight years old. His mother was of the city of Boscath,<sup>1</sup> and her name was Jedidah. He was of a most excellent disposition and naturally virtuous, and followed the actions of king David, and made him a pattern and rule in the whole conduct of his life. And when he was twelve years old, he gave proof of his religious and righteous behaviour; for he brought the people to a sober way of living, and exhorted them to leave off the opinion they had of their idols, for they were not gods, and to worship the national God. And by reflecting on the actions of his forefathers, he prudently corrected what they did wrong, like a man of ripe years very competent to understand what ought to be done; and whatever he saw was well and seasonably done, he observed and imitated the same. And thus he acted following the wisdom and sagacity of his own nature, and complying with the advice and instruction of the elders; for it was by following the laws that he succeeded so well in the order of his government, and in piety with regard to the divine worship, for the iniquity of the former kings was seen no more, but quite vanished away. For the king went about the city and the whole country, and cut down the groves which were devoted to strange gods, and overthrew their altars; and if there were any gifts dedicated to them by his forefathers, he treated them contemptuously and plucked them down. And by this means he brought the people back from their opinion about them to the worship of God, and they offered the accustomed sacrifices and burnt-offerings upon his altar. Moreover, he appointed certain judges and overseers, that they might order matters in their jurisdiction, and have regard to justice above all things, and dispense it with the same concern they would have about their own soul. He also sent over all the country, and bade such as pleased bring gold and silver for the repairs of the temple, according to every one's inclination or ability. And when the money was brought in, he made Maaseiah the governor of the city, and Shaphan the scribe, and Joah the recorder, and Eliakim the high priest, curators of the temple and of the contributions thereto. And they made no delay, nor put off the work at all, but prepared architects, and whatever else was wanted for the repairs, and set closely about the work. And so the temple was repaired, and became a public proof of the king's piety.

§ 2. And when Josiah was now in the eighteenth year of his reign, he sent to Eliakim the high priest, and gave orders that out of any surplus money he should cast cups and dishes and vials for ministration in the temple; and also that they should bring all the gold and silver that was among the treasures, and similarly expend it in making cups and such kinds of vessels. And as the high priest Eliakim was bringing out the gold, he lit upon the holy books of Moses that were laid up in the temple, and when he had brought them out, he gave them to Shaphan the scribe, who, when he had read them, went to the king, and informed him that all which he had ordered to be done was finished. He also read over the books to him, and the king, when he heard them read, rent his garment: and called for Eliakim the high priest, and for [Shaphan] the scribe, and for others of his most particular friends, and sent them to Huldah the prophetess, the wife of Shallum, a man held in good repute and of an eminent family, and bade them go to her and ask her to appease God, and endeavour to render him propitious to them, for there was reason to fear that, because of the transgression of the laws of Moses by their forefathers, they should be in peril of going into captivity, and of being cast out of their own country, and of being in want of all things, and so ending their days miserably. When the prophetess heard this from the messengers that were sent to her by the king, she bade them go back to the king, and say that God had already given sentence against them, to ruin the people, and cast them out of their country, and deprive them of all the happiness they now enjoyed; which sentence none could set aside by any prayers, since it was passed on account of their transgressions of the laws, and because of their not having repented in so long a time, though the prophets had exhorted them to amend, and had foretold the punishment that would ensue on their impious practices; which threatening God would certainly execute upon them, that they might be persuaded that he was God, and had not deceived them in any respect as to what he had denounced by his prophets: yet, because Josiah was a righteous man, he would at present delay those calamities, but would after his death send on the multitude the miseries he had determined for them.

§ 3. And these messengers, upon this prophecy of the woman, came and reported it to the king; and he sent round to the people everywhere, and ordered that the priests and the Levites should assemble at Jerusalem; and commanded that those of every age should be present also. And when they were gathered together, he first read to them the holy books; after which he stood upon a platform in the midst of the multitude, and obliged them to make a covenant, with an oath, that they would worship God and keep the laws of Moses. And they gave their assent willingly, and undertook to do what the king urged upon them, and immediately offered sacrifices, and that in an acceptable manner, and besought God to be gracious and merciful to them. He also enjoined the high priest, that if there remained in the temple any vessel that was consecrated to idols or to foreign gods, they should cast it out: and when a great number of such vessels were got together, he burnt them, and scattered their ashes, and slew the priests of the idols, who were not of the family of Aaron.

§ 4. And when he had done thus in Jerusalem, he went into the country, and utterly destroyed the buildings that had been set up therein by king Jeroboam in honour of the strange gods, and he burnt the bones of the false prophets upon the altar which Jeroboam first built. So it came to pass as the prophet Jadon,<sup>1</sup> who came to Jeroboam when he was offering sacrifice, foretold in the hearing of all the people, viz., that a certain man of the house of David, Josiah by name, should do what I have here mentioned. And it happened that those predictions took effect after three hundred and sixty-one years.

§ 5. After these things Josiah went also to all the Israelites who had escaped captivity and slavery under the Assyrians, and persuaded them to desist from their impious practices, and to leave off the honours they paid to strange gods, and to worship rightly their own Almighty God, and adhere to him. He also searched the houses and villages and cities, suspecting that somebody might have some idols in private. Moreover he took away the chariots [of the sun] that were set up in his royal palace, which his predecessors had made, and whatever else there was besides which they worshipped as God. And when he had thus purified all the country, he called the people to Jerusalem, and there celebrated the feast of Unleavened Bread called the Passover. He also gave the people, for the Paschal sacrifices, thirty thousand young kids of the goats and lambs, and three thousand oxen for burnt-offerings. The principal Jews also gave to the priests for the Passover two thousand six hundred lambs; the principal Jews also gave to the Levites five thousand lambs and five hundred oxen. Thus there was great plenty of victims, and they offered the sacrifices according to the laws of Moses, every priest showing the way and ministering to the people. Indeed there had been no other Passover thus celebrated by the Hebrews since the times of Samuel the prophet, and the reason was that all things were performed according to the laws, and according to the national rites. And when Josiah had after this lived in peace, nay, in riches and reputation also among all men, he ended his life in the manner following.

CHAP. V.

How Josiah fought with Necho, King of Egypt, and was wounded, and died soon afterwards; as also, how Necho carried Jehoahaz, who had been made King, into Egypt, and transferred the Kingdom to Jehoiakim: also concerning Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

§ 1.

NOW Necho, king of Egypt, raised an army, and marched to the river Euphrates, in order to fight with the Medes and Babylonians, who had overthrown the empire of the Assyrians, for he had a desire to reign over Asia. Now when he was come to the city of Mendes,<sup>1</sup> which belonged to the kingdom of Judah, Josiah brought an army to hinder him from passing through his country in his expedition against the Medes. And Necho sent a herald to Josiah, and told him that he did not make this expedition against him, but was pushing on to the Euphrates, and bade him not provoke him to fight against him, because he hindered his march to the place where he had resolved to go to. But Josiah did not hearken to this message of Necho, but put himself in a position to hinder Necho from his intended march, fate, I suppose, pushing him on to this conduct, that it might have an opportunity against him. For as he was setting his army in battle-array, and riding about in his chariot from one wing of his army to another, one of the Egyptians shot an arrow at him, and put an end to his eagerness for fighting; for being sorely wounded, he commanded a retreat to be sounded for his army, and returned to Jerusalem, and died of his wound, and was magnificently buried in the sepulchre of his fathers, having lived thirty-nine years, and of them reigned thirty-one. And all the people mourned greatly for him, lamenting and grieving many days: and Jeremiah the prophet composed an elegy in lamentation of him which is still extant. This prophet also foretold the sad calamities that were coming upon the city. He also left behind him in writing a description of that destruction of our nation which has lately happened in our days, and of the taking of Babylon. Nor was he the only prophet who delivered such predictions beforehand to the people, for so did Ezekiel also, who was the first person that left behind him in writing two books about these events. Now these two prophets were priests by birth, and Jeremiah dwelt in Jerusalem from the thirteenth year of the reign of Josiah until the city and temple were utterly destroyed. But I shall relate what befell this prophet in its proper place.

§ 2. Upon the death of Josiah, as I have already said, his son, Jehoahaz by name, succeeded to the kingdom, being about twenty-three years old. He reigned in Jerusalem, and his mother was Hamutal, of the city of Libnah.<sup>1</sup> He was an impious man, and impure in his course of life: and when the king of Egypt returned from the war, he sent for Jehoahaz to come to him to the city called Hamath, which belongs to Syria; and when he was come, he put him in bonds, and delivered the kingdom to a brother of his on the father's side, whose name was Eliakim, and changed his name to Jehoiakim, and laid a tribute upon the land of a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold, and Jehoiakim paid this sum of money by way of tribute: but Necho carried away Jehoahaz into Egypt where he died, having reigned three months and ten days. Now Jehoiakim's mother was called Zabudah, she was a native of the city of Abuma.<sup>2</sup> He was of a wicked and malevolent disposition, neither religious towards God nor kind towards men.

How Nebuchadnezzar, when he had conquered the King of Egypt, made an Expedition against the Jews, and slew Jehoiakim, and made his son Jehoiachin king.

§ 1.

NOW in the fourth year of the reign of Jehoiakim, one whose name was Nebuchadnezzar became ruler over the Babylonians, and at the same time went up with a great army to the city of Carchemish,<sup>1</sup> which was near the Euphrates, intending to fight with Necho king of Egypt, under whom all Syria then was. And when Necho learnt of the intention of the Babylonian, and that this expedition was made against him, he did not make light of the matter, but started with a great band of men for the Euphrates, to defend himself from Nebuchadnezzar; and when they joined battle, he was beaten, and lost many myriads in the battle. Then the king of Babylon passed over the Euphrates, and took all Syria as far as Pelusium except Judæa. And when Nebuchadnezzar had already reigned four years, which was the eighth year of Jehoiakim's rule over the Hebrews, he made an expedition with a mighty force against the Jews, and required tribute of Jehoiakim, and threatened on his refusal to make war upon him. Jehoiakim was alarmed at this threatening, and bought peace with money, and for two years brought the tribute he was ordered to bring.

§ 2. But in the third year, upon hearing that the Egyptians were marching against the Babylonian, he did not pay his tribute, yet was he disappointed of his hope, for the Egyptians durst not fight. And indeed the prophet Jeremiah foretold every day, how vainly they persisted in relying on Egypt, and how the city would be overthrown by the king of Babylon, and how Jehoiakim the king would be subdued by him. But what he thus spoke proved to be of no advantage to them, because there were none that should escape ; for both the multitude and the rulers, when they heard him, paid no attention to what they heard ; but being displeased at what was said, as if the prophet were a prophet of evil against the king, they accused Jeremiah, and bringing him before the court, asked that he should be sentenced and punished. Now all the rest gave their votes for his condemnation, but the elders refused, who prudently sent away the prophet from the court, and urged the rest to do Jeremiah no harm ; for they said that he was not the only person who had foretold what would come to the city, but that Micah had announced the same before him, as well as several others, none of whom suffered anything at the hands of the kings that then reigned, but were honoured as the prophets of God. And they mollified the multitude with these words, and delivered Jeremiah from the punishment decreed against him. Now when this prophet had written all his prophecies, and the people were fasting and assembled at the temple, in the ninth month of the fifth year of Jehoiakim, he read the book he had composed of his predictions of what was to befall the city and temple and people. And when the rulers heard of it, they took the book from him, and bade him and Baruch the scribe go and hide themselves, lest they should be discovered ; but they took the book and gave it to the king, and he gave order, in the presence of his friends, that his scribe should take it and read it. When the king heard what it contained, he was angry and tore it, and cast it into the fire, where it was consumed. He also commanded that they should seek for Jeremiah and Baruch the scribe, and bring them to him, that they might be punished. However they escaped his anger.

§ 3. Not long afterwards the king of Babylon made an expedition against Jehoiakim, who received him into the city from fear of the predictions of Jeremiah, supposing that he should suffer nothing that was terrible, because he neither shut the gates, nor fought against him. Howbeit when Nebuchadnezzar had come into the city, he did not observe the covenants he had made, but he slew such as were in the flower of their age, and such as were of the greatest beauty, together with their king Jehoiakim, whom he commanded to be thrown before the walls without any burial, and made his son Jehoiachin king of the country and city. He also took captive three thousand of the principal persons, and led them away to Babylon: among whom was the prophet Ezekiel, who was then but a boy. And this was the end of king Jehoiakim, when he had lived thirty-six years, and of them reigned eleven: and Jehoiachin succeeded him in the kingdom, whose mother's name was Nehushta, she was a citizen of Jerusalem. He reigned only three months and ten days.

CHAP. VII.

How the King of Babylon repented of making Jehoiachin King, and took him away to Babylon, and transferred the Kingdom to Zedekiah. This King would not believe what was predicted by Jeremiah and Ezekiel, but joined himself to the Egyptians; who, when they came into Judæa, were vanquished by the King of Babylon; as also what befell Jeremiah.

§ 1.

FOR a terror soon seized on the king of Babylon, who had given the kingdom to Jehoiachin, for he was afraid that he would bear him a grudge because of his killing his father, and would therefore make the country revolt from him. So he sent an army, and besieged Jehoiachin in Jerusalem. And he, because he was by nature good and just, did not desire to see the city endangered on his account, but took his mother and kindred and delivered them to the commanders sent by the king of Babylon, and accepted of their oaths, that neither they nor the city should suffer any harm, which agreement they did not observe for a single year. For the king of Babylon did not keep it, but gave orders to his generals to take captive all that were in the city, both the youth and the handicraftsmen, and bring them bound to him (their number was ten thousand eight hundred and thirty-two), as also Jehoiachin and his mother and friends. And when these were brought to him, he kept them in custody, and appointed Zedekiah Jehoiachin's uncle to be king: and made him take an oath, that he would certainly keep the country for him, and make no revolt, nor have any friendship with the Egyptians.

§ 2. Now Zedekiah was twenty-one years old when he took the government, and he had the same mother as his brother Jehoiakim, and he was a despiser of justice and of his duty. Indeed both those of the same age with him and his court were wicked, and the whole multitude did what unjust and insolent things they pleased; so that the prophet Jeremiah came often to him and protested, and bade him leave off all his impieties and transgressions, and see to what was right, and neither give ear to the rulers (among whom were wicked men), nor give credit to the false prophets, who deluded them, as if the king of Babylon would no more make war against Jerusalem, and as if the Egyptians would make war against him and conquer him, since what they said was not true, and the events would not prove such. Now Zedekiah himself, as long as he heard the prophet speak, believed him, and agreed to everything as true, and supposed what he recommended was for his advantage; but afterwards his friends perverted him, and dissuaded him from what the prophet advised, and got him to do what they pleased. Ezekiel also prophesied in Babylon what calamities were coming upon the people, which when he heard, he sent accounts of them to Jerusalem. But Zedekiah did not believe their prophecies for the following reason. It happened that the two prophets agreed with one another in what they said in all other things, as that the city should be taken, and Zedekiah himself should be taken captive, but Ezekiel differed in saying that Zedekiah should not see Babylon, while Jeremiah told him that the king of Babylon should carry him thither in bonds. And because they did not both say the same thing as to this circumstance, he disbelieved what they both appeared to agree in, and condemned them as not speaking truth therein, although all the things foretold him did come to pass according to their prophecies, as I shall show upon a fitter opportunity.

§ 3. Now when Zedekiah had preserved friendship with the Babylonians for eight years, he broke it, and allied himself to the Egyptians, in hope of overcoming the Babylonians by their assistance. When the king of Babylon learnt this, he marched against him, and laid his country waste, and took his fortified towns, and came to the city Jerusalem itself to besiege it. And when the king of Egypt heard what circumstances his ally Zedekiah was in, he took a great army with him, and came into Judæa, intending to raise the siege: upon which the king of Babylon departed from Jerusalem, and met the Egyptians, and joined battle with them and beat them, and put them to flight, and pursued them, and drove them out of all Syria. But as soon as the king of Babylon had departed from Jerusalem, the false prophets deceived Zedekiah, and said that the king of Babylon would not any more make war against him or his people, nor remove them out of their own country into Babylon, but that those now in captivity would return with all those vessels of the temple of which the king of Babylon had spoiled the temple. But Jeremiah came forward, and prophesied what was contrary to those predictions, and what proved to be true. He said they did ill, and deluded the king; for the Egyptians would be of no advantage to them, but the king of Babylon would renew the war against Jerusalem, and besiege it again, and would destroy the people by famine, and carry away those that remained into captivity, and would take away what they had as spoil, and would carry off the riches that were in the temple, and moreover would burn it, and utterly overthrow the city, and they should serve him and his posterity seventy years; but the Persians and Medes should put an end to their servitude, and overthrow the Babylonians, and then they should be let go, and return to their own land, and rebuild the temple, and restore Jerusalem. When Jeremiah said this, most people believed him, but the rulers and those that were wicked despised him, as one out of his mind. Now he had resolved to go to his native place, which was called Anathoth,<sup>1</sup> and was twenty furlongs from Jerusalem, and as he was going, one of the rulers met him, and arrested him, and accused him falsely of going as a deserter to the Babylonians: but

Jeremiah said that he accused him falsely, and added that he was only going to his native place. But the other would not believe him, but arrested him and led him away to the rulers for sentence, at whose hands he endured all sorts of outrage and tortures, and was reserved to be punished; and this was the condition he was in for some time, unjustly suffering what I have already described.

§ 4. Now in the ninth year of the reign of Zedekiah, on the tenth day of the tenth month, the king of Babylon made a second expedition against Jerusalem, and sat down before it eighteen months, and besieged it with the utmost energy. There came upon them also two of the greatest calamities at the same time that Jerusalem was besieged, a famine and pestilence, and made great havoc of them: and though the prophet Jeremiah was in prison, he did not rest, but cried out and preached aloud, and exhorted the multitude to open their gates, and admit the king of Babylon, for if they did so they and their households should be preserved, but if they did not do so they should perish. He also foretold, that if any one stayed in the city, he should certainly die in one of two ways, he should either be consumed by famine, or slain by the enemy's sword, but if he would flee to the enemy, he should escape death. But those rulers who heard did not believe him, even when they were in the midst of their sore calamities, but went to the king in their anger, and informed him of what Jeremiah said, and accused him, and complained of the prophet as a madman, and one that disheartened their minds, and by his prediction of miseries diminished the zeal of the multitude, who were otherwise ready to expose themselves to dangers for king and country, while he in a threatening way warned them to flee to the enemy, and told them that the city would certainly be taken and utterly destroyed.

§ 5. Now the king himself was not at all personally irritated against Jeremiah, such was his gentle and righteous disposition; yet that he might not be engaged in a quarrel with the rulers at such a time, by opposing their wishes, he let them do with the prophet whatever they would: and when the king had granted them that permission, they at once went to the prison and took Jeremiah, and let him down with a cord into a pit full of mire, that he might be suffocated, and so not die at their hands. And he stood up to his neck in the mire, which was all round him, and so continued. But one of the king's servants, who was in esteem with him, an Ethiopian by descent, told the king what a state the prophet was in, and said that his friends and the rulers had done evil in plunging the prophet into the mire, and so contriving against him, that he should suffer a death more bitter than that by his bonds only. When the king heard this, he repented of his having delivered up the prophet to the rulers, and bade the Ethiopian take thirty men of the king's guards, and cords with them, and whatever else he thought necessary for the prophet's preservation, and draw him up immediately. So the Ethiopian took the men he was ordered to take, and drew up the prophet out of the mire, and left him at liberty.

§ 6. And when the king sent for him privately, and inquired what he could say to him from God, and desired him to inform him what might be suitable to his present circumstances, Jeremiah replied that he had somewhat to say, but would not be believed, nor hearkened to if he admonished him, "for," (continued he,) "thy friends have determined to destroy me, as though I had been guilty of some wickedness; and where are now those men who deceived you, and said that the king of Babylon would not come and fight against us any more? But I am afraid now to speak the truth, lest thou shouldst condemn me to die." And when the king had assured him upon oath, that he would neither himself put him to death, nor deliver him up to the rulers, he became bold upon that assurance being given him, and advised him to deliver up the city to the Babylonians. And he added that it was God that prophesied this by him, that he must do so if he would be preserved, and escape out of the danger he was in, and that then neither should the city be razed to the ground, nor should the temple be burned; but if he disobeyed he would be the cause of these miseries coming upon the citizens, and of the calamity that would befall his whole house. When the king heard this, he said that he would willingly do what he advised him to do, and what he declared would be for his advantage, but that he was afraid of those of his own country that had deserted to the Babylonians, lest he should be calumniated by them to the king of Babylon, and be punished. But the prophet encouraged him, and said he had no cause to fear such punishment, for if he would deliver up the city to the Babylonians, he should not experience any misfortune, either himself or his children, or his wives, and the temple should also continue uninjured. And when Jeremiah had said this, the king dismissed him, and charged him to betray to none of the citizens what they had resolved on, nor to tell any of the rulers, if they should have learned that he had been sent for, and should ask what he had said to him; but to pretend to them that he had begged only that he might not be kept in bonds and in prison. And indeed he said so to them; for they came to the prophet, and asked him, what advice it was that he went to give the king as to them? And thus I have finished what concerns this matter.

CHAP. VIII.

How the King of Babylon took Jerusalem and burnt the Temple, and removed Zedekiah and the People of Jerusalem to Babylon. Also a list of the High Priests under the Kings.

§ 1.

NOW the king of Babylon was very intent and earnest upon the siege of Jerusalem, and he erected towers upon great earthworks, and from them repelled those that stood upon the walls; he also threw up a great number of such earthworks round the whole city, whose height was equal to the walls. However, those that were within bore the siege with courage and energy, for they were not disheartened either by the famine or pestilence, but were stout-hearted in the prosecution of the war, although those miseries within harassed them, and did not suffer themselves to be terrified either by the contrivances of the enemy or by their engines of war, but devised engines to oppose all the enemy's ones, till indeed the whole struggle between the Babylonians and the people of Jerusalem seemed to be which had the greater sagacity and skill; the former supposing they would be by their skill in war more than a match for the others for the destruction of the city; the latter placing their hopes of deliverance in nothing else but in persevering in such counter-inventions as might demonstrate the enemy's engines to be useless. And this siege they endured for eighteen months, until they were undone by famine, and by the darts which the enemy threw at them from the towers.

§ 2. Now the city was taken in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, in the ninth day of the fourth month. It was taken by the generals of the king of Babylon, to whom Nebuchadnezzar committed the siege, for he abode himself in the city of Riblah.<sup>1</sup> The names of the generals who took and subdued Jerusalem, if any one desire to know them, were these, Nergal Sharezer, Samgar Nebo, Rabsaris, Sarsechim, and Rabmag. And when the city was taken about midnight, and the enemy's generals had entered into the temple, Zedekiah, learning it, took his wives and children and captains and friends, and with them fled out of the city through the fortified ditch and through the desert. And when certain deserters had informed the Babylonians of this, they made haste at daybreak to pursue after Zedekiah, and overtook him not far from Jericho, and surrounded him. Then those friends and captains of Zedekiah who had fled out of the city with him, when they saw the enemy near, left him and dispersed, some one way some another, for every one resolved to save himself; so the enemy took Zedekiah alive (as he was deserted by all but a few), with his children and his wives, and brought him to the king. When he was come, Nebuchadnezzar began to call him a wicked wretch, and a covenant-breaker, and one that had forgotten his former words, when he promised to keep the country for him. He also reproached him for his ingratitude, seeing that when he had received the kingdom from him, who had taken it from Jehoiachin and given it him, he had made use of his power against him that gave it; "but," he added, "God is great, who hated that conduct of yours, and has brought you under us." And when he had used these words to Zedekiah, he commanded his sons and his friends to be slain, while Zedekiah and the rest of the captives looked on, after which he put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him, and carried him off to Babylon. And so those things happened to him, which Jeremiah and Ezekiel foretold to him, that he should be taken and brought before the king of Babylon, and should speak to him face to face, and should see his eyes with his own eyes. And thus much did Jeremiah prophesy, but he was also made blind, and brought to Babylon, and did not see it, according to the prediction of Ezekiel.

§ 3. I have narrated this, because it is sufficient to show the nature of God to such as are ignorant of it, how it is various and acts in many different ways, and how all events happen in a regular manner in their proper season, and how it foretells what must come to pass. It is also sufficient to show the ignorance and incredulity of men, whereby they are not permitted to foresee the future at all, and are without any guard exposed to calamities, so that it is impossible for them to avoid the experience of them.

§ 4. Thus the kings of David's race ended their lives, being in number twenty-one including the last king, and reigned altogether five hundred and fourteen years six months and ten days; of whom Saul, their first king, retained the kingdom twenty years, though he was not of the same tribe as the rest.

§ 5. And now it was that the king of Babylon sent Nebuzaradan, the general of his army, to Jerusalem, to pillage the temple, and commanded him to burn it and the royal palace, and to lay the city even with the ground, and to transplant the people to Babylon. Accordingly he went to Jerusalem in the eleventh year of king Zedekiah, and pillaged the temple, and carried off the vessels of God both gold and silver, and the large laver which Solomon dedicated, as also the pillars of brass and their chapiters, and the golden tables and candlesticks. And when he had carried these off, he set fire to the temple in the fifth month, on the first day of the month, in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, and in the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar; he also burnt the palace, and razed the city to the ground. Now the temple was burnt four hundred and seventy years, six months, and ten days, after it was built. It was then one thousand and sixty-two years, six months, and ten days, from the departure out of Egypt; and the whole interval from the deluge to the destruction of the temple was one thousand nine hundred and fifty-seven years, six months, and ten days; and from the birth of Adam, till this befell the temple, there were three thousand five hundred and thirteen years, six months, and ten days. Such was the number of years, and the actions that were done during those years I have particularly related. And the general of the Babylonian king razed the city to the ground, and removed all the people, and took captive the high priest Seraiah, and Zephaniah the priest next to him in rank, and the rulers that guarded the temple, who were three in number, and the eunuch who was over the armed men, and seven friends of Zedekiah, and his scribe, and sixty other rulers, all of whom, together with the vessels which he had pillaged, he carried to the king of Babylon to Riblah,<sup>1</sup> a city in Syria. And the king commanded the heads of the high priest and of the rulers to be cut off there; but he himself took Zedekiah and all the captives to Babylon. He also led away bound the high priest Josedek, who was the son of Seraiah the high priest, whom the king of Babylon had slain in Riblah, a city in Syria, as I have just related.

§ 6. And now, since I have enumerated the succession of the kings, and who they were, and how long they reigned, I think it necessary to set down the names of the high priests, and who they were that succeeded one another in the high priesthood under the kings. The first high priest then of the temple which Solomon built, was Zadok; after him his son Achimas received that dignity; after Achimas came Azarias; his son was Joram, and Joram's son was Issus; after him came Axioramus: his son was Phideas, and Phideas' son was Sudeas, and Sudeas' son was Juelus, and Juelus' son was Jotham, and Jotham's son was Urias, and Urias' son was Nerias, and Nerias' son was Odeas, and his son was Sallumus, and Sallumus' son was Elcias, and his son [was Azarias,<sup>1</sup> and his son] was Seraiah, and his son was Josedek, who was carried captive to Babylon. All these received the high priesthood by succession in direct descent.

§ 7. When the king was come to Babylon, he kept Zedekiah in prison until he died, and buried him magnificently, and dedicated the vessels he had pillaged from the temple of Jerusalem to his own gods, and planted the people in the country of Babylon, and freed the high priest from his bonds.

CHAP. IX.

How Nebuzaradan set Gedaliah over the Jews that were left in Judæa, who was shortly afterwards slain by Ishmael: and how Johanan, after Ishmael was driven away, went down into Egypt with the People, whom Nebuchadnezzar, when he made an Expedition against the Egyptians, took captive, and led away to Babylon.

§ 1.

NOW Nebuzaradan, the general of the army, when he had carried the people of the Jews into captivity, left the poor and deserters in the country, and made Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, a person of noble family, their governor. He was of a gentle and righteous disposition, and commanded them to till the ground, and pay a fixed tribute to the king. He also took Jeremiah the prophet out of prison, and urged him to go with him to Babylon, for he had been enjoined by the king to supply him with whatever he wanted: but if he did not like to do so, he desired him to inform him where he resolved to dwell.

<sup>1</sup> I have here inserted in brackets this high priest Azarias, though he is omitted in all Josephus' copies, out of the Jewish chronicle. Sedar Olam, of how little authority soever I generally esteem such late rabbinical historians, because we know from Josephus himself, that the number of the high priests belonging to this interval was eighteen. Antiq. xx. 10, whereas his copies have here but seventeen.—W.

that he might signify the same to the king: but the prophet had no mind to follow him, nor to dwell anywhere else, but was content to live among the ruins of his country and its miserable remains. When the general understood what his purpose was, he enjoined Gedaliah, whom he left behind, to take all possible care of him, and to supply him with whatever he wanted; and when he had given him rich presents, he dismissed him. So Jeremiah dwelt in a city of that country called Mizpah;<sup>1</sup> and begged of Nebuzaradan, that he would set at liberty his disciple Baruch, the son of Neriah, who was of a very eminent family, and exceedingly skilful in the language of his country.

§ 2. When Nebuzaradan had done all this, he set out for Babylon: but as to those that had fled away during the siege of Jerusalem, and had been scattered all over the country, when they heard that the Babylonians were gone away, and had left a remnant in the land about Jerusalem, who were to cultivate it, they flocked together from all parts to Gedaliah at Mizpah. Now the rulers that were over them were Johanan, the son of Kareah, and Jezaniah, and Seraiah, and others besides them. Now there was of the royal family one Ishmael, a wicked man and very crafty, who, during the siege of Jerusalem, fled to Baalim, the king of the Ammonites, and dwelt with him during that time: and Gedaliah persuaded them, now they were there, to stay with him, and to have no fear of the Babylonians, for if they would cultivate the country, they should suffer no harm. This he assured them by oath: and said, that they should have him for their patron, and if any disturbance should arise, they should find him ready to defend them. He also advised them to dwell in any city they each pleased, and to send men with his own servants to rebuild the houses upon their old foundations, and dwell in them, and admonished them beforehand to lay up a stock, while they had time, of corn and wine and oil, that they might have whereon to feed during the winter. When he had spoken thus to them, he dismissed them, that every one might dwell in what place in the country he pleased.

§ 3. Now when it was spread abroad among the nations that bordered on Judæa, that Gedaliah kindly entertained the fugitives that went to him, the only condition being that they should pay tribute to the king of Babylon, they also came readily to Gedaliah, and inhabited the country. And when Johanan and the rulers that were with him observed the state of the country, and the goodness and humanity of Gedaliah, they were exceedingly in love with him, and told him that Baalim, the king of the Ammonites, had sent Ishmael to kill him by treachery and secretly, that he might have the dominion over the Israelites, as he was of the royal family. And they said that he might deliver himself from this treacherous design, if he would give them leave to slay Ishmael, and nobody should know it. For they told him they were afraid that, if he was killed by Ishmael, the entire ruin of the remaining strength of the Israelites would ensue. But he declared that he could not believe what they said, when they told him of such a treacherous design on the part of a man that had been well treated by him; for it was not probable that one who, in such a want of all things, had failed of nothing that was necessary from him, should be found so wicked and ungrateful towards his benefactor (when it would be great wickedness in him not to endeavour earnestly to save him, if he were treacherously assaulted by others) as to seek to kill him with his own hand. However, if he ought to suppose this information true, it was better for himself to be slain by him, than to destroy a man who fled to him for refuge, and intrusted his own safety to him, and committed himself to his disposal.

§ 4. So Johanan and the rulers that were with him, not being able to persuade Gedaliah, went away: but after thirty days had elapsed, Ishmael came again to Gedaliah, to the city of Mizpah, and ten men with him; and when Gedaliah had feasted Ishmael and those that were with him with a splendid table, and had given them presents, he became drunk, as he entertained them; and when Ishmael saw him in that case, and that he was immersed in his cups to the degree of insensibility, and had fallen asleep, he jumped up on a sudden with his ten friends, and slew Gedaliah and those that were reclining with him at the feast. And when he had slain them, he went out by night, and slew all the Jews that were in the city, and those soldiers also who had been left therein by the Babylonians. And the next day fourscore men came out of the country with presents for Gedaliah, none of them knowing what had befallen him; and when Ishmael saw them, he invited them in to Gedaliah, and when they were come in, he shut up the court-yard and slew them, and cast their dead bodies down a certain deep pit, that they might not be seen. But Ishmael spared those of these fourscore men that entreated him not to kill them till they had delivered up to him what they had concealed in the fields, as furniture and raiment and corn. He also took captive the people that were in Mizpah, with their wives and children; among whom were the daughters of king Zedekiah, whom Nebuzaradan, the general of the army of Babylon, had left with Gedaliah. And when he had done all this, he went to the king of the Ammonites.

§ 5. But when Johanan and the rulers with him heard of what had been done at Mizpah by Ishmael, and of the death of Gedaliah, they were indignant at it, and every one of them took his own armed men, and set out to fight against Ishmael, and overtook him at the fountain in Hebron. And when those that were carried away captive by Ishmael saw Johanan and the rulers, they were very glad, and looked upon them as coming to their assistance; so they left him that had carried them away captive, and went over to Johanan. Then Ishmael, with eight men, fled to the king of the Ammonites; but Johanan took those whom he had rescued out of the hands of Ishmael, the eunuchs the women and the children, and went to a certain place called Mandra,<sup>1</sup> and there they abode that day. For they had determined to remove from thence and go into Egypt, fearing that the Babylonians would slay them in case they continued in the country, in their anger at the slaughter of Gedaliah, who had been set over it by them as governor.

son of Kareah, and the rulers that were with him, went to Jeremiah the prophet, and desired that he would pray to God, and, because they were at an utter loss as to what they ought to do, that he would discover it to them, and they swore that they would do whatever Jeremiah should tell them. And when the prophet said he would be their intercessor with God, it came to pass ten days after that God appeared to him, and told him to inform Johanan and the other rulers, and all the people, that he would be with them, and take care of them, and keep them from being hurt by the Babylonians of whom they were afraid, while they continued in that country, but that he would desert them if they went into Egypt, and, in his wrath against them, would inflict the same punishments upon them which they knew their brethren had already suffered. But when the prophet informed Johanan and the people that God had foretold these things, he was not believed when he said that God commanded them to continue in that country, for they imagined he said so to gratify Baruch his own disciple, and belied God, and urged them to stay there that they might be destroyed by the Babylonians. So both the people and Johanan disobeyed the counsel of God, which he gave them by the prophet, and removed into Egypt, and carried Jeremiah and Baruch along with them.

§ 7. And when they were there, God signified to the prophet, that the king of Babylon was about to make an expedition against the Egyptians, and commanded him to foretell to the people that Egypt would be taken, and that the king of Babylon would slay some of them, and would take others captive, and bring them to Babylon. And all this came to pass. For in the fifth year after the destruction of Jerusalem, which was the twenty-third year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, he made an expedition against Cœle-Syria, and when he had possessed himself of it, he made war against the Ammonites and Moabites; and when he had brought all those nations under subjection, he attacked Egypt in order to overthrow it: and he slew the king that then reigned, and set up another; and those Jews that were captive there he led away to Babylon. And such was the end of the nation of the Hebrews, who tradition tells us went twice beyond the Euphrates. For the ten tribes were carried out of Samaria by the Assyrians in the days of king Hoshea; and afterwards those of the two tribes that remained after Jerusalem was taken were carried away by Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon and Chaldæa. Now as to Shalmanezar, when he removed the Israelites out of their country, he placed therein instead the nation of the Cuthæans, who had formerly belonged to the inner parts of Persia and Media, but were now called Samaritans, as they took the name of the country to which they were removed. But the king of Babylon, who brought out the two tribes, placed no other nation in their country, by which means all Judæa and Jerusalem and the temple continued to be deserted for seventy years. And the entire interval of time from the captivity of the Israelites to the carrying away of the two tribes was a hundred and thirty years, six months, and ten days.

§ 1.

NOW Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon took the most noble children of the Jews, and the kinsmen of Zedekiah their king, such as were remarkable for the beauty of their bodies, and the comeliness of their countenances, and delivered them into the hands of tutors for their education, castrating some of them (which course he took also with those of other nations, whom he had taken in the flower of their age), and supplied them their diet from his own table, and had them instructed in the customs of the country, and taught the learning of the Chaldæans; and they had now exercised themselves sufficiently in the wisdom which he had ordered they should apply themselves to. Now among them were four of the family of Zedekiah, of most excellent dispositions, one of whom was called Daniel, another Ananias, another Misael, and the fourth Azarias: but the king of Babylon changed their names, and commanded that they should have other names; Daniel he called Baltasar — Ananias, Shadrach — Misael, Meshach — and Azarias, Abednego. These the king held in esteem and continued to love, because of their very excellent natural dispositions, and because of their application to learning, and the progress they made in wisdom.

§ 2. Now Daniel and his kinsmen had resolved to use a plain diet, and to abstain from those kinds of food which came from the king's table, and entirely to forbear from eating animal food, so he went to Aschanes, the eunuch to whom the care of them was committed, and asked him to take and use what was brought for them from the king, but to give them pulse and dates for their food, and any thing else that he pleased except animal food; for their inclinations were for that sort of diet, and they despised the other. He replied, that he was ready to serve them in what they desired, but he suspected that they would be discovered by the king, from the thinness of their bodies and the alteration of their countenances, for their bodies and colours would be sure to change with their diet, especially as they would be clearly discovered by the finer condition of the other children who fared better, and so they would bring him in danger, and occasion his being punished. However they persuaded Aschanes in spite of his fears to give them the food they desired for ten days by way of trial, and in case the condition of their bodies was not altered, to go on in the same way, as it would be certain then that they would not be hurt thereby, but if he saw them look thin and worse than the rest, to put them to their former diet. Now when it appeared they were so far from becoming worse by the use of their food, that they grew plumper and fuller in body than the rest, insomuch that he thought those who fed on what came from the king's table seemed in poorer condition, while those that were with Daniel looked as if they lived in plenty and all sorts of luxury, Aschanes thenceforward fearlessly took himself what the king sent every day from his dinner according to custom to the lads, but gave them the fore-mentioned diet. And thus they had their souls more pure and so fitter for learning, and their bodies in better tune for hard labour (for they had neither their minds oppressed and heavy with variety of meats, nor were their bodies pampered on the same account); so they readily picked up all the learning of the Hebrews and Chaldæans, especially Daniel, who, being already sufficiently skilled in wisdom, was very apt in the interpretation of dreams; and God manifested himself to him.

§ 3. Now, two years after the destruction of Egypt, king Nebuchadnezzar saw a wonderful dream, the end of which God showed him in his sleep, but when he got up off his bed, he forgot it, so he sent for the Chaldæans and magicians and seers, and told them that he had seen a dream, but informed them that he had forgotten the end of what he had seen, and enjoined them to tell him both what the dream was and what its signification. But they said that this was a thing impossible to be discovered by men, but promised him, if he would relate to them the dream he had seen, that they would tell him its signification. Thereupon he threatened to put them to death, unless they told him his dream; and he commanded to have them all put to death, since they confessed they could not do what they were commanded to do. Now when Daniel heard that the king had commanded that all the wise men should be put to death, and that among them himself and his three kinsmen were in danger, he went to Arioch, who was captain of the king's guards, and desired to know of him the reason why the king had commanded that all the wise men and Chaldæans and magicians should be slain. And when he learned that the king had had a dream, and had forgotten it, and that when they were enjoined to inform the king of it, they had said they could not, and had thereby provoked him to anger; he begged Arioch to go in to the king and ask a respite for the magicians for one night, and to put off their slaughter so long, for he hoped within that time to obtain, by prayer to God, the knowledge of the dream. And Arioch informed the king of what Daniel desired: and the king bade them delay the slaughter of the magicians till he knew the result of Daniel's undertaking. And the young man retired to his own house with his kinsmen, and besought God all that night to save and deliver the magicians and Chaldæans, with whom they were themselves also to perish, from the king's anger, by enabling him to declare the vision, and to make manifest what the king had seen the night before in his sleep, but had forgotten. And God, out of pity to those that were in danger, and in regard to the wisdom of Daniel, made known to him the dream and its interpretation, that so the king might learn from him its signification also. When Daniel had obtained this knowledge from God, he arose very joyful, and told it his brethren, and made them glad and hopeful that now they should preserve their lives, of which they despaired before, and had their minds full of nothing but the thoughts of dying. So after he had with them returned thanks to God who had commiserated their youth, when it was day he went to Arioch, and asked him to bring him to the king, for he wished to tell him the dream which he had seen the night before.

§ 4. When Daniel was come in to the king, he first deprecated the idea that he pretended to be wiser than the other Chaldæans and magicians, as, upon their entire inability to discover his dream, he was undertaking to inform him of it, for it was not by his own skill, or on account of his having better cultivated his understanding than the rest, but he said, "God had pity upon us, as we were in danger of death, and when I prayed for the life of myself and of those of my own nation, he made manifest to me both the dream and the interpretation thereof. And indeed I was not less concerned for thy glory than for the sorrow that we were by thee condemned to die, since thou didst so unjustly command men both good and excellent to be put to death, enjoining them to do what was entirely above the reach of human wisdom, and requiring of them what was the work only of God. Now as thou in thy sleep wast solicitous concerning those that should succeed thee in the government of the whole world, God wished to show thee all those that should reign after thee, and to that end exhibited to thee the following dream. Thou seemedst to see a great image standing before thee, the head of which was of gold, the shoulders and arms of silver, and the belly and thighs of brass, but the legs and feet of iron; after which thou sawest a stone broken off from a mountain, which fell upon the image, and threw it down, and broke it to pieces, and did not permit any part of it to remain whole; but the gold, the silver, the iron, and the brass, became finer than meal, and, upon the blast of a violent wind, was by force carried away and scattered abroad, but the stone did increase to such a degree, that the whole earth beneath it seemed to be filled therewith. This is the dream which thou sawest, and its interpretation is as follows. The head of gold denotes thee and those that have been kings of Babylon before thee; and the two hands and arms signify this, that thy empire shall be destroyed by two kings; but another king that shall come from the west, armed with brass, shall destroy their empire; and another power that shall be like unto iron shall put an end to the power of the former, and shall have dominion over all the earth, on account of the nature of iron, which is stronger than that of gold and silver and brass." Daniel did also declare the meaning of the stone to the king,<sup>1</sup> but I do not think proper to relate that, since I have only undertaken to describe things past or present, not things that are future: yet if anyone be so very desirous of knowing the truth, as not to waive such points of curiosity, and cannot curb his inclination for learning the uncertainties of futurity, let him carefully read the book of Daniel, which he will find among the sacred writings.

§ 5. When Nebuchadnezzar heard this and recognized his dream, he was astonished at the nature of Daniel, and fell upon his face and saluted Daniel in the manner that men worship God, and gave command that he should be sacrificed to as a god. And this was not all, for he also imposed the name of his own god upon him, and made him and his kinsmen rulers of his whole kingdom; which kinsmen of his happened to fall into great danger through the envy and malice of [their enemies ;] for they offended the king for the following reason. The king made an image of gold, whose height was sixty cubits, and its breadth six cubits, and set it up in the great plain of Babylon ; and when he was going to dedicate it, he invited the principal men out of all his dominions, and commanded them in the first place, that when they should hear the sound of the trumpet, they should then fall down and worship the image ; and he threatened that those who did not do so should be cast into a fiery furnace. When therefore all the rest, upon the hearing of the sound of the trumpet, worshipped the image, they say that Daniel's kinsmen did not do this, because they would not transgress the laws of their country. So they were immediately convicted and cast into the fire, but were saved by divine providence, and escaped death in a surprising manner, for the fire did not touch them : and I suppose that it touched them not, as if it reasoned with itself, that they were cast into it without any fault of theirs, and therefore it was too weak to burn the young men when they were in it, God making their bodies proof against the fire, so that it could not consume them. This recommended them to the king as righteous men, and men beloved of God, on which account they continued in all honour with him.

§ 6. A little after this the king saw again in his sleep another vision, that he should fall from his dominion, and feed among the wild beasts, and when he had lived in this manner in the desert for seven years, should recover his dominion again. When he had seen this dream, he called the magicians together again, and inquired of them about it, and desired them to tell him what it signified ; but none of them could find out the meaning of the dream, nor discover it to the king, and Daniel was the only person that explained it, and as he foretold, so it came to pass. For after Nebuchadnezzar had continued in the desert the forementioned time, as no one durst attempt to seize his kingdom during those seven years, he prayed to God that he might recover his kingdom, and did return to it. Let no one blame me for writing down everything of this nature, as I find it in our ancient books ; for I plainly assured those that should think me defective in any point, or complain of anything, and told them in the beginning of this history, that I intended to do no more than translate the Hebrew books into the Greek language, and promised to set them forth, without adding anything of my own, or taking anything away.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning Nebuchadnezzar and his Successors: and how their Empire was destroyed by the Persians; and what befell Daniel in Media, and what Prophecies he delivered there.

§ 1.

NOW when Nebuchadnezzar had reigned forty-three years, he ended his life. He was an active man, and more fortunate than the kings that were before him. Now Berosus makes mention of his actions in the third book of his Chaldaic history, where he says thus: "When his father Nabopalassar heard that the satrap whom he had set over Egypt and the region about Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia, had revolted from him, as he was not himself able any longer to undergo the hardships [of war,] he committed some parts of his army to his son Nebuchadnezzar, who was still but a youth, and sent him against him. And when Nebuchadnezzar had given battle, and fought with the rebel, he beat him, and reduced the country from under his subjection, and made it part of his own kingdom. And it happened about this time that his father Nabopalassar fell ill, and ended his life in the city of Babylon, when he had reigned twenty-one years; and when Nebuchadnezzar heard, as he did in a little time, that his father was dead, he settled the affairs of Egypt and the rest of the country, as also those that concerned the captive Jews and Phœnicians and Syrians and those of the Egyptian nations, and having committed to certain of his friends the conveyance of them to Babylon, together with the bulk of his army and the baggage, he went himself hastily with a very few others over the desert, and reached Babylon. He then took upon him the management of public affairs, and of the kingdom which had been kept for him by one who was the best of the Chaldæans, and became master of the entire dominions of his father, and ordered that, when the captives came, they should be assigned colonies in the most convenient parts of Babylonia: and adorned the temple of Belus, and the rest of the temples, in a magnificent manner at his own expense with the spoils he had taken in war. He also added another city to that which was there of old, and built it so that such as might besiege it hereafter could no more turn the course of the river, and so attack the city itself: he therefore built three walls round the inside of the city, and three others round the outside, and this he did partly with burnt brick and bitumen, partly with brick alone. And after he had worthily fortified the city and adorned its gates gloriously, he built another palace before his father's palace, but close to it; to describe whose vast height and splendour it would perhaps be too much for me to attempt, yet large and lofty as it was, it was completed in fifteen days.<sup>1</sup> He also erected in the palace elevated places for walking in stone, and made them resemble mountains, and built them so that they might be planted with all sorts of trees. He also erected what was called a hanging park, because his wife was desirous to have things like her own country, she having been bred up in the region of Media." Megasthenes also makes mention of these things in the fourth book of his account of India, where he endeavours to show that this king exceeded Hercules in bravery and in the greatness of his actions, for he says he conquered Iberia and most of Libya. Diocles also mentions this king in the second book of his account of Persia, and Philostratus, in his histories of India and of Phœnicia, says that this king besieged Tyre thirteen years, at the same time that Ithobalus reigned at Tyre. These are all the accounts that I have met with concerning this king.

§ 2. Now, after the death of Neubuchadnezzar, his son Evil-Merodach succeeded him in the kingdom, who immediately set Jeconiah at liberty, and esteemed him as one of his most intimate friends: he also gave him many presents, and honoured him above the rest of the kings that were in Babylon; for his father had not kept faith with Jeconiah, when he voluntarily delivered up himself with his wives and children and whole kindred for the sake of his country, that it might not be taken by siege and utterly destroyed, as I have already described. And when Evil-Merodach died after a reign of eighteen years, Niglisar his son succeeded to the throne, and retained it forty years, and then ended his life. And after him the succession to the kingdom came to his son Labosordachus, who continued in it only nine months; and when he died it came to Baltasar,<sup>1</sup> who by the Babylonians was called Naboandelus. Against him did Cyrus, the king of Persia, and Darius, the king of Media, make war; and when he was besieged in Babylon, there happened a wonderful and portentous sight. He was reclining at supper in a large room made for royal entertainments, and he had with him his concubines and friends. And he thought good and commanded that those vessels of God which Nebuchadnezzar had plundered Jerusalem of, and had not made use of, but had put them in his own temple, should be brought. He also was so audacious as to proceed to use them in his cups, drinking out of them and blaspheming against God, when he saw a hand come out of the wall, and write upon the wall certain syllables. Being troubled at this sight he called all the magicians and Chaldæans together, and all sorts of men among the Babylonians able to interpret signs and dreams, to explain the writing to him. But when the magicians said they could not discover nor understand it, the king was in great disorder of mind and great trouble at this surprising thing; so he caused it to be proclaimed throughout all the country, and promised that to him who could explain the writing, and give the signification couched therein, he would give a golden chain for his neck, and allow him to wear a purple garment, as did the kings of Chaldæa, and would bestow on him the third part of his dominions. When this proclamation was made, the magicians ran together more earnestly, and were very ambitious to find out the meaning of the writing, but still doubted about it as much as before. Now when the king's grandmother saw him cast down at this, she began to encourage him, and to say that there was a certain captive who came from Judæa, a Jew by birth, but brought away by Nebuchadnezzar when he destroyed Jerusalem, whose name was Daniel, a wise man, and of great sagacity in finding out what was impossible for others to discover, and what was known to God alone; who brought to light and answered such questions of Nebuchadnezzar, as no one else was able to answer, when they were consulted. She therefore begged that he would send for him, and inquire of him concerning the writing, and so condemn the unskilfulness of those that could not find its meaning, even though what God signified thereby should be of a melancholy nature.

§ 3. When Baltasar heard this, he called for Daniel; and when he had told him what he had heard concerning him and his wisdom, and how a divine spirit was with him, and how he alone was very capable of finding out what others could never understand, he desired him to point out to him what this writing meant: for if he did so, he would give him leave to wear purple, and would put a chain of gold about his neck, and would bestow on him the third part of his dominions, as an honour and reward for his wisdom, that thereby he might become most illustrious to those who saw him, and inquired why he had obtained such honours. But Daniel desired that he would keep his gifts to himself (for what was wise and divine admitted of no gifts, and bestowed its advantages on petitioners freely), but still he explained the writing to him, which denoted that he should soon die, and that because he had not learnt to honour God, and not to attempt things too high for human nature, by the punishment his progenitor had undergone for the outrages he had offered to God; for he had quite forgotten how Nebuchadnezzar was removed to feed among wild beasts for his impieties, and did not recover his former life among men and his kingdom, but upon God's mercy to him, after many supplications and prayers; who did thereupon praise God all the days of his life, as one of almighty power who takes care of mankind. But he had forgotten all this, and had greatly blasphemed against God, and had made use of his vessels with his concubines. And God had seen this, and was angry with him, and declared beforehand by this writing what a sad conclusion of life he should come to. And he explained the writing as follows. "MANE. This, if it be expounded in the Greek language, will signify a Number, because God has numbered so long a time for thy life and kingdom, and there remains but a small time for you. THEKEL. This signifies a Weight, and means that God has weighed the time of thy kingdom in a balance, and finds it going down already. PHARES. This in the Greek tongue denotes a Fragment. God will therefore break thy kingdom into fragments, and divide it among the Medes and Persians."

§ 4. When Daniel had told the king that the writing upon the wall signified this, Baltasar was in great sorrow and affliction, as was to be expected, since the interpretation was so heavy against him. However, he did not refuse what he had promised Daniel, though he was a prophet of evils to him, but bestowed them all upon him, reasoning that the threatened overthrow of his kingdom came from fate and necessity and not from the prophet, and that it was the part of a good and just man to give what he had promised, although the events were of a melancholy nature. Accordingly, the king determined so to do: and no long time after both himself and the city were taken by Cyrus, the king of Persia, who led an army against him: for it was Baltasar under whom Babylon was taken, when he had reigned seventeen years. And this was the end of the posterity of king Nebuchadnezzar, as history informs us. And Darius was sixty-two years old when Babylon was taken by him, and when he with his kinsman Cyrus overthrew the empire of the Babylonians. He was the son of Astyages, and had another name among the Greeks. And he took Daniel the prophet, and carried him with him into Media, and honoured him very greatly, and kept him with him; for he was one of the three satraps whom he set over his three hundred and sixty satrapies, for so many did Darius make.

§ 5. Now Daniel being held in such great honour and wonderful favour with Darius, and being alone intrusted with everything by him, as having somewhat divine in him, was envied by the rest; for those that see others in greater honour than themselves with kings envy them. And when those that were grieved at the great favour Daniel was in with Darius, sought for an occasion to calumniate and accuse him, he afforded them no opportunity at all, for as he was above all temptations of money and despised bribes, and esteemed it a very base thing to take anything by way of reward even when it might be justly given him, he afforded those that envied him not the least handle for accusations. So as they could find nothing that was shameful or reproachful, for which they might calumniate him to the king, and thereby deprive him of the honour he was in with him, they sought for some other method, whereby they might get him out of the way. As therefore they observed that Daniel prayed to God three times a day, they thought they had got a pretext by which they might ruin him. So they went to Darius, and told him, that the satraps and governors had thought proper to allow the multitude a relaxation for thirty days, during which time no one was to offer a petition or prayer either to him or to the gods, and whoever transgressed this decree was to be cast into the den of lions, and there perish.

§ 6. Thereupon the king, not being acquainted with their wicked design, nor suspecting that it was a contrivance of theirs against Daniel, said he was pleased with this decree of theirs, and promised to ratify what they desired; he also published an edict to promulgate to the people the decree which the satraps had made. And all the rest took care not to transgress those injunctions, and rested quiet, but Daniel had no regard to them, but, as he was wont, persistently prayed to God in the sight of them all. Then the satraps, having met with the occasion they so earnestly sought to find against Daniel, went at once to the king, and accused Daniel as the only person that had transgressed the decree, for nobody else dared to pray to the gods. This discovery they made, not because of their piety, but because they had watched him and observed him out of envy; for supposing that Darius, having greater kindness to him than they wished, would be ready to grant him a pardon for this contempt of his injunctions, and envying this very pardon to Daniel, they did not become any milder, but desired he might be cast into the den of lions according to the law. Then Darius, hoping that God would deliver him, and that he would undergo nothing that was terrible from the wild beasts, bade him bear what should happen cheerfully. And when Daniel was cast into the den, he put his seal to the stone that lay upon the mouth of the den instead of a door, and went his way; but he passed all the night without food and without sleep, being in great distress for Daniel. And when it was day, he got up and came to the den, and found the seal unbroken, which he had left the stone sealed with; so he opened the seal, and cried out, and called to Daniel, and asked him, If he were safe? And as soon as he heard the king's voice, and said that he had suffered no harm, the king ordered that he should be drawn up out of the den. Now when his enemies saw that Daniel had suffered nothing that was terrible, they would not own that he was preserved by God and his providence; but they said that the lions had had their fill of food, and so it was, they supposed, that the lions would not touch Daniel, nor come near him ; and this they said to the king. But he, hating them for their wickedness, gave order, that they should throw in a great deal of flesh to the lions ; and when they had filled themselves, he gave further order that Daniel's enemies should be cast into the den, that he might learn whether the lions, now they were full, would touch them or not. And it appeared plain to Darius, after the satraps had been cast to the wild beasts, that it was God who preserved Daniel, for the lions spared none of them, but tore them all to pieces, as if they had been very hungry and wanted food. I suppose, therefore, it was not their hunger, which had been a little before satisfied with abundance of flesh, but the wickedness of these men, that whetted their appetite ; for if it so pleased God, that wickedness might be esteemed even by those irrational creatures a plain ground for their punishment.

§ 7. When therefore those that had plotted against Daniel were themselves destroyed, king Darius sent [letters] over all the country, and praised that God whom Daniel worshipped, and said, that he was the only true God and almighty. He also held Daniel in very great esteem, and made him the first of his friends. Now when Daniel was become so illustrious and famous, because of the opinion men had that he was beloved of God, he built a tower at Ecbatana<sup>1</sup> in Media : it was a most elegant building and wonderfully made, and still remains and is preserved to this day ; and to such as see it, it appears to have been lately built, and to be no older than the very day when anyone looks upon it, it is so fresh, flourishing, and beautiful, and no way grown old in so long time. And yet buildings suffer the same as men do, they grow old as well, and by numbers of years their strength is dissolved, and their beauty withered. Now they bury the kings of Media, Persia, and Parthia, in this tower to this day ; and he who was intrusted with the care of it was a Jewish priest ; which custom is also observed to this day. But it is right to give an account of what this Daniel did, which is most wonderful to hear, for all things went wonderfully well with him, as one of the greatest of the prophets, insomuch, that while he was alive he had the esteem and good opinion both of the kings and of the multitude, and now he is dead, he has a remembrance that will never die. For the several books that he wrote and left behind him are still read by us to this day, and from them we believe that Daniel conversed with God. For he did not only prophesy of future events, as did the other prophets, but he also fixed the time of their accomplishment: and while other prophets used to foretell misfortunes, and so were disagreeable both to the kings and to the multitude, Daniel was to them a prophet of good things, so that by the agreeable nature of his predictions he procured the goodwill of all men, and by the accomplishment of them he procured the belief of their truth, and the opinion of divine power in himself, among the multitude. He also wrote and left behind him what made manifest the accuracy and undeniable veracity of his predictions. For he says that when he was in Susa,<sup>1</sup> the metropolis of Persia, and went out into the plain with his companions, there was on a sudden an earthquake and commotion of the earth, and that he was left alone by himself, his friends fleeing away from him; and that he was disturbed and fell on his face and on his two hands, and that a certain person touched him, and at the same time bade him rise and see what would befall his countrymen after many generations. He also related that when he stood up he was shown a great ram, with many horns growing out of its head, and that the last was higher than the rest; and after this he looked to the west, and saw a he-goat borne through the air from that quarter, which rushed upon the ram with great violence, and smote it twice with its horns, and overthrew it to the ground, and trampled upon it. Afterwards he saw a very great horn growing out of the head of the he-goat, and when it was broken off, four horns grew up that were turned to each of the four winds. And he wrote that out of them arose another lesser horn, which he said waxed great; and God showed to him that it would fight against his nation, and take their city by force, and bring the temple-worship to confusion, and forbid the sacrifices to be offered for one thousand two hundred and ninety-six days. Daniel wrote that he saw these visions in the plain of Susa; and informs us, that God interpreted the appearance of this vision in the following manner. He said that the ram signified the kingdoms of the Medes and Persians, and the horns those kings that were to reign in them; and that the last horn signified the last king, and that he should exceed all the kings in riches and glory; that the goat signified that one should come and reign from the Greeks, who should twice fight with the Persian, and overcome him in battle, and should receive his entire dominion; that by the great horn which sprang out of the forehead of the he-goat was meant the first king; and that the springing up of four horns upon its falling off, and the turning of every one of them to the four quarters of the earth, signified the successors that should arise after the death of the first king, and the partition of the kingdom among them, and that they should be neither his children, nor of his kindred, that should reign over the habitable earth for many years; and that from among them there should arise a certain king that should overcome the Jewish nation and their laws, and should take away their polity, and should spoil the temple, and forbid the sacrifices being offered for three years' time. And so indeed it came to pass, that our nation suffered these things under Antiochus Epiphanes, according to Daniel's vision, and to what he wrote many years before it came to pass. In the same manner Daniel also wrote concerning the Roman government, and that our country should be made desolate by them. All these things did he leave in writing, as God had showed them to him, so that such as read his prophecies, and see how they have been fulfilled, wonder at the honour wherewith God honoured Daniel; and may thence discover how the Epicureans are in error, who cast providence out of human life, and do not believe that God takes care of the affairs of the world, nor that the universe is governed and continued in being by that blessed and immortal nature, but say that the world is carried along of its own accord without a ruler and guardian; for were it destitute of a guide to conduct it, as they imagine, it would be like ships without pilots, which we see submerged by the winds, or like chariots without drivers which are overturned, and would be dashed to pieces by chance motion, and so perish and come to nought. So that, by the fore-mentioned predictions of Daniel, those men seem to me very much to err from the truth, who declare that God exercises no providence over human affairs; for if it were the case that the world went on by chance, we should not see all things come to pass according to his prophecy. Now as to myself, I have described these matters as I have found them and read them; but if any one is inclined to another opinion about them, let him enjoy his different sentiments without any blame from me.

BOOK XI.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY-THREE YEARS AND FIVE MONTHS.—FROM THE FIRST YEAR OF THE REIGN OF CYRUS TO THE DEATH OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

CHAP. I.

How Cyrus, King of the Persians, let the Jews go out of Babylon, and suffered them to return to their own Country, and to build their Temple, for which Work he gave them Money.

§ 1.

IN the first year of the reign of Cyrus, which was the seventieth from the day that our people were removed out of their own land into Babylon, God commiserated the captivity and calamity of those poor people, as he had foretold to them by Jeremiah the prophet, before the destruction of the city; that after they had served Nebuchadnezzar and his posterity, and had undergone that servitude seventy years, he would restore them again to the land of their fathers, and they should build their temple, and enjoy their ancient prosperity. And these things God did afford them. For he stirred up the mind of Cyrus, and made him write throughout all Asia, "Thus saith Cyrus the king. Since God Almighty has appointed me to be king of the habitable earth, I believe that he is the God whom the nation of the Israelites worship. For indeed he foretold my name by the prophets, and that I should build him an house at Jerusalem in the country of Judæa."

§ 2. This was known to Cyrus by his reading the book of his prophecies which Isaiah left behind him two hundred and twenty years before. For that prophet had said, that God had spoken thus to him in a secret vision: "My will is that Cyrus, whom I have appointed to be king over many and great nations, shall send back my people to their own land, and build my temple." This was foretold by Isaiah one hundred and forty years before the temple was demolished. Accordingly, when Cyrus read this, and admired the divine power, an earnest desire and ambition seized upon him to fulfil what was written; so he called the most eminent Jews that were in Babylon, and told them that he gave them leave to go back to their own country, and to rebuild their city Jerusalem and the temple of God, for he would be their friend, and would write to the governors and satraps that were in the neighbourhood of their country of Judæa, to contribute to them gold and silver for the building of the temple, and besides that beasts for their sacrifices.

§ 3. When Cyrus had announced this to the Israelites, the rulers of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, with the Levites and priests, set out for Jerusalem. But many stayed at Babylon, not being willing to leave their possessions. And when they were got to Jerusalem, all the king's friends assisted them, and brought in, for the building of the temple, some gold and some silver, and some a great many cattle and horses. So they performed their vows to God, and offered the sacrifices that had been usual in old times, as though their city had been rebuilt, and the ancient practices relating to their worship had been revived. Cyrus also sent back to them the vessels of God which king Nebuchadnezzar had robbed the temple of, and had carried to Babylon. And he committed them to Mithridates, his treasurer, to take away, with an order to give them to Abassar, that he might keep them till the temple was built, and when it was finished deliver them to the priests and rulers of the multitude, in order to their being restored to the temple. Cyrus also sent a letter to the satraps that were in Syria, the contents whereof are as follows.

“ KING CYRUS TO SISINES AND SARABAZANES,
GREETING.

I have given leave, to as many of the Jews that dwell in my country as please, to return to their own country, and to rebuild their city, and to build the temple of God at Jerusalem, on the same site where it was before. I have also sent my treasurer Mithridates, and Zorobabel, the governor of the Jews, that they may lay the foundations of the temple, and may build it sixty cubits high, and of the same breadth, making three layers<sup>1</sup> of polished stone, and one of the wood of the country; and similarly with the altar whereon they offer sacrifices to God. I wish also the expense of these things to come out of my revenues. I have also sent the vessels which king Nebuchadnezzar robbed the temple of, and have given them to Mithridates the treasurer, and to Zorobabel the governor of the Jews, that they may carry them to Jerusalem, and restore them to the temple of God. Now their number is as follows: fifty ewers of gold, and five hundred of silver; forty drinking cups of gold, and five hundred of silver; fifty basons of gold, and five hundred of silver; thirty vessels of gold for pouring the drink-offerings, and three hundred of silver; thirty vials of gold, and two thousand four hundred of silver; with a thousand other large vessels. I permit them to have the same honour which their forefathers were used to have, for their cattle and wine and oil two hundred and five thousand and five hundred drachmæ, and for wheat flour twenty thousand and five hundred artabæ. And I order that these expenses be furnished out of the tribute from Samaria. The priests shall also offer their sacrifices in Jerusalem according to the laws of Moses, and when they offer them, they shall pray to God for the preservation of the king and his family, that the kingdom of Persia may continue. And my will is, that those who disobey these injunctions, and make them void, shall be hung upon a cross, and their substance brought into the king's treasury." Such was the import of this letter. Now the number of those that returned from captivity to Jerusalem, were forty-two thousand four hundred and sixty-two.

CHAP. II.

How, upon the Death of Cyrus, the Jews were hindered in the building of the Temple by the Cuthæans, and the neighbouring Governors; and how Cambyses entirely forbade the Jews to build the Temple.

§ 1.

WHEN the Jews were laying the foundations of the temple, and were very zealous about building it, the neighbouring nations, especially the Cuthæans, whom Shalmanezer, king of Assyria, had brought out of Persia and Media, and had planted in Samaria, when he carried the people of Israel into captivity, besought the satraps, and those that had the care of such affairs, that they would interrupt the Jews, both in the rebuilding of their city, and in the building of their temple. Now as these men were bribed by them, they sold the Cuthæans authority to make this building a slow and careless work, for Cyrus, who was busy in various wars, knew nothing of all this; and it so happened, that when he led his army against the Massagetæ, he ended his life there.<sup>1</sup> But when Cambyses,

<sup>1</sup> Josephus here follows Herodotus, and those that related how Cyrus made war with the Scythians and Massagetæ, near the Caspian Sea, and perished in it; while Xenophon's account, which appears never to have been seen by Josephus, that Cyrus died in peace, in his own country of Persia, is attested to by the writers of the affairs of Alexander the Great, when they agree that he found Cyrus' sepulchre at Pasargadæ, near Persepolis. This account of Xenophon's is also confirmed by the fact that Cambyses, upon his succession to Cyrus, instead the son of Cyrus, had taken over the kingdom, some of those in Syria, and Phœnicia, and the countries of Ammon and Moab, and in Samaria, wrote a letter to Cambyses, whose contents were as follows. "To our lord Cambyses, we thy servants, Rathymus the historiographer, and Semellius the scribe, and the rest that are thy judges in Syria and Phœnicia, send greeting. It is fit, O king, that thou shouldest know that those Jews who were carried captive to Babylon, are come into our country, and are building that rebellious and wicked city and its market-places, and are setting up walls, and raising up the temple. Know therefore, that when these things are finished, they will not be willing to pay tribute, nor will they submit to thy commands, but will resist kings, and will choose rather to rule over others than to be ruled over themselves. We therefore thought it proper to write to thee, O king, as the works about the temple are going on so fast, and not to overlook this matter, that thou mayest search into the books of thy fathers, for thou wilt find in them that the Jews have been rebels and enemies to kings, as has their city been also, which for that reason had been till now laid waste. We thought proper also to inform thee, because thou mayest otherwise perhaps be ignorant of it, that if this city be once inhabited, and be entirely girt with walls, thy way will be barred to Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia."

§ 2. When Cambyses had read this letter, being naturally wicked, he was irritated at what they told him, and wrote back to them as follows. "Cambyses the king to Rathymus the historiographer, to Belsemus, to Semellius the scribe, and to the rest that are joined with them and dwelling in Samaria and Phœnicia, after this manner. I have read the letter that was sent by you; and I gave order that the books of my forefathers should be searched into, and it was there found that this city has always been of a war to avenge his father's death upon the Scythians and Massagetæ, and to prevent those nations from overrunning his northern provinces, which would have been the natural consequence of his father's ill success and death there, went immediately to an Egyptian war, long ago begun by Cyrus, according to Xenophon, page 644, and conquered that kingdom; nor is there, that I ever heard of, the least mention in the reign of this Cambyses of any war against the Scythians and Massagetæ that he was ever engaged in all his life.—W.

an enemy to kings, and that its inhabitants have raised seditions and wars. We are also aware that their kings have been powerful and tyrannical, and have exacted tribute of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia. Therefore I give order that the Jews shall not be permitted to build this city, lest such mischief as they used to bring upon kings be greatly augmented." When this letter was read, Rathymus, and Semellius the scribe, and their associates, mounted on horseback at once, and made haste to Jerusalem. They also took a great company with them, and prevented the Jews building the city, and the temple. So these works were hindered from going on nine years more, till the second year of the reign of Darius, for Cambyses reigned six years, and in that time overthrew Egypt, and on his return died at Damascus.

CHAP. III.

How, after the Death of Cambyses, and the Slaughter of the Magi, and in the Reign of Darius, Zorobabel was superior to the rest in the Solution of Problems, and thereby obtained this Favour of the King, that the Temple should be Built.

§ 1.

AFTER the slaughter of the Magi, who, upon the death of Cambyses, ruled over the Persians for a year, those who were called the seven houses of the Persians, appointed Darius, the son of Hystaspes, to be their king. Now he, while he was a private man, had made a vow to God, that if he came to be king, he would send back all the vessels of God that were in Babylon to the temple at Jerusalem. Now it so fell out, that about this time Zorobabel, who had been made governor of the Jews that were in captivity, came to Darius from Jerusalem: for there had been an old friendship between him and the king. He was also thought worthy to be with two others guard of the king's body; and obtained that honour which he hoped for.

those that were about him, and those born in his house, and the rulers of the Medes, the satraps of the Persians, the toparchs of India and Ethiopia, and the generals of his hundred and twenty-seven satrapies. And when they had eaten and drunk abundantly, even to satiety, they every one departed to their own houses to go to bed, and Darius the king also went to bed; but after he had rested a little part of the night, he awoke, and not being able to sleep any more, he fell into conversation with his three body-guards, and promised, that to him who, on points that he should inquire about, should make the truest and wisest answer, he would grant, as a reward of his victory, to put on purple, and to drink in cups of gold, and to sleep upon gold, and to have a chariot with bridles of gold, and a tiara of fine linen, and a chain of gold about his neck, and to sit next to himself on account of his wisdom; and he added, "he shall be called my kinsman." Now when he had promised to give them these gifts, he asked the first of them, Whether wine was not the strongest? The second, Whether kings were not such? And the third, Whether women were not such? Or, Whether truth was not the strongest of all? When he had proposed to them these problems, he went to rest; and in the morning he sent for his great men, and satraps, and toparchs of Persia and Media, and sat down in the place where he used to give audience, and bade each of his body-guards declare in the hearing of them all what they thought of the proposed questions.

§ 3. Then the first of them began to speak of the power of wine, setting it forth thus. "When (said he) I think about the strength of wine, I find, Sirs, that it exceeds everything by the following indications. It trips up and deceives the mind of those that drink it, and reduces that of the king to the same state as that of the orphan and one who needs a tutor, and erects that of the slave to the boldness of the freeman, and that of the needy becomes like that of the rich man. For it changes and renews the souls of men when it gets into them, and it quenches the sorrow of those that are in calamities, and makes men forget their debts and think themselves of all men the richest, so that they talk of no small things, but of talents, and such sums of money as become wealthy men only. Nay more, it makes them insensible of their commanders and kings, and takes away the remembrance of their friends and companions. For it arms men even against those that are dearest to them, and makes them appear the greatest strangers to them, and when they are become sober, and have slept off their wine in the night, they arise without knowing anything they have done in their cups. By these facts I infer and find that wine is the strongest and most powerful of all things."

§ 4. As soon as the first had given the fore-mentioned proofs of the strength of wine, he left off, and the next to him began to speak about the strength of a king, and demonstrated that it was the strongest of all, and more powerful than anything else that appears to have any force or wisdom. He began his proof in the following manner. "Men govern all things; they force the earth and sea to become profitable to them in what they desire, and over these men do kings rule and have authority. Now, those men who rule over that animal, which is the strongest and most powerful, must needs deserve to be esteemed insuperable in power and strength. For example, when kings command their subjects to make war and undergo dangers, they are hearkened to, and when they send them against their enemies, their power is so great that they are obeyed, and they command men to level mountains, and to pull down walls and towers. Nay, when they are commanded to be killed and to kill, they submit to it, that they may not appear to transgress the king's commands; and when they have conquered, they bring what they have got in the war to the king. Those also who are not soldiers, but cultivate the ground and plough it, when they have reaped and gathered in their fruits (after they have endured the labour and all the hardship of such works of husbandry) bring tribute to the king. And whatever the king says or commands is done of necessity without any delay. He in the meantime is satiated with all sorts of food and pleasure, and sleeps in quiet, and is guarded by such as watch and are fixed down as it were to the place through fear, for no one ventures to leave him, even when he is asleep, nor does anyone go away and see to his own affairs, but he esteems this one thing the only work of necessity, namely, to guard the king, and accordingly to this he wholly addicts himself. How then can it be otherwise, but that it must appear that the king exceeds all in strength, as so great a multitude obeys his injunctions ?”

§ 5. Now when this man had also held his peace, the third of them, who was Zorobabel, began to instruct them about women and truth, and spoke as follows. “Wine is strong, as is the king also whom all men obey, but women are superior to them in power. For it was a woman that brought the king into the world, and women bear and bring up those that plant vines which produce wine, nor indeed is there anything which we do not receive from women. For they weave garments for us, and our household affairs are by them taken care of and looked after, nor can we live apart from women. And when we have got a great deal of gold and silver, or any other thing that is of great value and deserving regard, and see a beautiful woman, we leave all those things, and with open mouth fix our eyes upon her countenance, and are willing to forsake what we have, that we may enjoy and possess her beauty. We also leave father and mother and the earth that nourished us, and frequently forget our dearest friends, for the sake of women, nay, we venture to lay down our lives for them. But what will chiefly make you see the power of women is the following consideration. Do we not take pains and endure a great deal of trouble both by land and sea, and when we have procured something as the fruit of our labours, do we not bring it to the women as to our mistresses, and bestow it upon them? Nay, I once saw the king, who is lord of so many people, smitten on the face by his concubine Apame, the daughter of Rabezacus Thaumasius, and his diadem taken from him, and put upon her own head, while he bore it patiently: and when she smiled he smiled, and when she was angry he was sad; and according to the change of her passions he fawned upon her, and drew her to reconciliation by the great humiliation of himself to her, if at any time he saw her displeased at him.”

§ 6. And when the satraps and rulers looked at one another, he began to speak about truth, and said: "I have already demonstrated how powerful women are: but both they and the king himself are weaker than truth. For although the earth be large, and the heaven high, and the course of the sun swift, yet all these are moved according to the will of God, who is true and righteous, for which cause we ought to esteem truth to be strongest of all things, and that what is unrighteous to be of no force against it. Moreover all things else that have any strength are mortal and short-lived, but truth is a thing that is immortal and eternal. It affords us indeed not such beauty as will wither away with time, nor such riches as may be taken away by fortune, but righteous rules and laws: It distinguishes them from unrighteousness and puts it to rebuke."

§ 7. And when Zorobabel had left off his discourse about truth, and the multitude had cried out aloud that he had spoken the best, and that it was truth alone that had immutable strength and would never wax old, the king commanded that he should ask for something over and above what he had promised, for he would give it him because of his wisdom and prudence wherein he exceeded the rest; "and thou shalt sit with me," added the king, "and be called my kinsman." When he had said this, Zorobabel put him in mind of the vow he had made, in case he should ever have the kingdom. Now this vow was to rebuild Jerusalem, and to build therein the temple of God, as also to restore the vessels which Nebuchadnezzar had pillaged and carried to Babylon. "And this," said he, "is the request which thou now permittest me to make, because I have been judged to be wise and understanding."

§ 8. And the king was pleased with what he said, and arose and kissed him, and wrote to the toparchs and satraps, and enjoined them to conduct Zorobabel and those that were going with him to build the temple. He also sent letters to the rulers that were in Syria and Phœnicia, to cut down and carry cedar-trees from Lebanon to Jerusalem, and to assist him in building the city. He also wrote to them, that all the captives who should return to Judæa should be free, and he prohibited his deputies and satraps from laying any king's taxes upon the Jews; he also permitted them to have all the land which they could possess themselves of without tribute. He also enjoined the Idumæans and Samaritans, and the inhabitants of Cœle-Syria, to restore the villages which they had taken from the Jews, and besides all this to contribute fifty talents for the building of the temple. He also permitted them to offer their appointed sacrifices, and whatever the high priest and the priests wanted, and the sacred garments wherein they used to worship God, were to be supplied at his own expense, as also the musical instruments which the Levites used in singing hymns to God. Moreover he ordered that portions of land should be given to those that guarded the city and the temple, as also a fixed sum of money every year for their maintenance. Darius also sent back the vessels, and also ordered that all that Cyrus had intended to do before him, relating to the restoration of Jerusalem, should be done.

§ 9. Now when Zorobabel had obtained these grants from the king, he went out of the palace, and, looking up to heaven, he began to return thanks to God for the wisdom he had given him, and the victory he had gained thereby, even in the presence of Darius himself; for, said he, "I should not have been thought worthy of these things, O Lord, unless thou hadst been favourable to me." When therefore he had returned these thanks to God for the present, and had prayed him to show him the like favour for the time to come, he went to Babylon, and brought to his countrymen the good news of the various grants he had procured for them from the king. And they, when they heard of the same, gave thanks also to God for restoring the land of their forefathers to them again. And they betook themselves to drinking and revelling, and for seven days continued feasting and keeping festival for the recovery and restoration of their country. After this they chose themselves rulers out of the tribes of their forefathers, who should go up to Jerusalem with their wives and children and cattle, who travelled to Jerusalem with joy and pleasure under the conduct of those whom Darius sent along with them, making melody with harps and pipes and cymbals. The rest of the Jewish multitude also accompanied them with rejoicing.

§ 10. And thus did these men return, a certain and definite number out of every family. I do not think it proper to recite particularly the names of those families, that I may not take off the mind of my readers from the connexion of the historical facts, and make it hard for them to follow my narrative. But the sum of those that went up of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, above the age of twelve years, was four millions six hundred and twenty-eight thousand;<sup>1</sup> the Levites were seventy-four: the number of the women and children mixed together was forty thousand seven hundred and forty-two. And besides these, there were one hundred and twenty-eight singers of the Levites, and one hundred and ten porters, and three hundred and ninety-two sacred servants. There were also others besides these six hundred and sixty-two, who said they were Israelites, but were not able to show their genealogies. Some also of the priests were expelled from their office, as having married wives whose genealogies they could not produce, nor were they found in the genealogies of the Levites and priests: these were about five hundred and twenty-five. The multitude also of servants that followed those that returned to Jerusalem were seven thousand three hundred and thirty-seven; the singing men and singing women were two hundred and forty-five; the camels were four hundred and thirty-five; the beasts of burden were five thousand five hundred and twenty-five. And the leaders of all this multitude thus numbered were Zorobabel, the son of Salathiel, of the posterity of David and of the tribe of Judah, and Jeshua, the son of Josedek, the high priest. And besides these there were Mordecai and Serebæus, who were distinguished from the multitude, and were rulers, who also contributed a hundred minæ of gold, and five thousand of silver. Thus the priests and the Levites, and a definite part of the entire people of the Jews that were in Babylon, returned and dwelt in Jerusalem, but the rest of the multitude went each to their own parts of the country.

<sup>1</sup> This strange reading in Josephus's copies of 4,000,000 instead of 40,000, is one of the grossest errors that is in them, and ought to be corrected from Ezra, ii. 64, 1 Esd. v. 40, and Neh. vii. 66, who all agree the general sum was but about 42,360. It is also very plain, that Josephus thought, that when Esdras afterwards brought up another company out of Babylon and Persia in the days of Xerxes, they were also, as well as these, out of the two tribes, and out of them only, and were in all no more than 'a seed' and 'a remnant,' while an immense number of the ten tribes never returned, but, as he believed, continued beyond the Euphrates, chap. v. § 2, 3. Of these Jews beyond the Euphrates he speaks frequently elsewhere; though, by the way, he never takes them to be idolaters, but looks on them still as observers of the laws of Moses. The 'certain part' of the people that now came up from Babylon, at the end of this chapter, imply the same smaller number of Jews that now came up, and will no way agree with the 4,000,000.—W.

CHAP. IV.

§ 1.

NOW in the seventh month after they had departed from Babylon, both Jeshua the high priest, and Zorobabel the governor, sent messengers all round, and gathered together those that were in the country to Jerusalem en masse, who came very gladly thither. They then built the altar on the same place on which it had formerly been built, that they might offer the appointed sacrifices upon it to God, according to the laws of Moses. But in doing this they did not please the neighbouring nations, who all of them bore ill-will to them, They also celebrated the feast of Tabernacles at that time, as the legislator had ordained concerning it, and after that they offered sacrifices, and what were called the continual sacrifices, and the oblations proper for the Sabbaths and for all holy festivals. Those also that had made vows performed them, and offered their sacrifices, from the first day of the seventh month. They also began to build the temple, and gave a great deal of money to the masons and carpenters, and what was necessary for the maintenance of the workmen. The Sidonians also were willing and ready to bring cedar-trees from Lebanon, to bind them together and make a raft of them, and to bring them to the port of Joppa, for that was what Cyrus had commanded at first, and what was now done at the command of Darius.

§ 2. In the second year of their return to Jerusalem, as the Jews were there in the second month, the building of the temple went on apace; and when they had laid its foundations on the first day of the second month of that second year, they set as overseers over the work such Levites as were full twenty years old, and Jeshua and his sons and brothers, and Zodmiel the brother of Judas, the son of Aminadab, with his sons. And the temple was finished sooner than anyone would have expected from the great diligence of those that had the care of it. And when the temple was finished, the priests, adorned with their accustomed garments, and with their trumpets, and the Levites and sons of Asaph, stood and sung hymns to God, according as David first of all showed them how to bless God. Now the priests and Levites, and the older men in the families, recollecting how much greater and more sumptuous the old temple had been, and seeing how inferior this now made was, on account of their poverty, to that which had been built of old, considered with themselves how much their happy state was sunk below what it had been of old, as well as their temple. So they were dejected, and not able to contain their grief at it, and proceeded as far as to lament and shed tears. But the people in general were contented with their present condition, and because they were allowed to build them a temple, they desired no more, and neither regarded nor remembered, nor indeed at all tormented themselves with the comparison of that and the former temple, as if this were below their expectations. But the wailing of the old men and of the priests, on account of the deficiency of this temple in their opinion, compared with that which had been demolished, prevailed over the sound of the trumpets and the rejoicing of the people.

§ 3. Now when the Samaritans, who were hostile to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, heard the sound of the trumpets, they ran up and desired to know what was the reason of this noise. And when they perceived that it was the Jews, who had been carried captive to Babylon, and were rebuilding their temple, they went to Zorobabel and Jeshua and the heads of the families, and desired that they would give them leave to build the temple with them, and to be partners with them in building it; for they said, "We worship your God no less than you and pray to him, and are desirous of your religion, ever since Shalmaneser, the king of Assyria, transplanted us from Cuthia and Media to this place." When they said this, Zorobabel and Jeshua the high priest, and the heads of the families of the Israelites, replied to them, that it was impossible for them to permit them to share in the building, as they [only] had been appointed to build that temple, at first by Cyrus and now by Darius, but it was lawful for them to come and worship there if they pleased, and they could allow them nothing in common with them but what was common to all other men, namely, to come to their temple and worship God there.

§ 4. When the Cuthæans heard this, (for the Samaritans have that appellation,) they were indignant at it, and urged the nations of Syria to ask the satraps, as they had formerly done in the days of Cyrus, and again in the days of Cambyses after him, to put a stop to the building of the temple, and to endeavour to delay and hinder the Jews in their zeal about it. Now at this time Sisines the governor of Syria and Phœnicia, and Sarabazanes, with certain others, came up to Jerusalem, and asked the rulers of the Jews, "By whose permission it was that they built the temple so that it was more like a citadel than a temple? and why it was they built porticoes and walls, and those strong ones too, about the city?" To which Zorobabel and the high priest Jeshua replied, that they were the servants of the most high God, and that the former temple was built for him by a king of theirs that enjoyed great prosperity, and exceeded all men in virtue, and that it continued a long time, but that Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Babylonians and Chaldæans, because of their fathers' impiety towards God, took their city by storm and destroyed it, and pillaged and burnt down the temple, and transplanted the people whom he had made captives, and removed them to Babylon: and that Cyrus, who was after him king of Babylonia and Persia, wrote that the temple should be built, and committed the votive offerings and vessels, and whatever Nebuchadnezzar had taken from it, to Zorobabel and Mithridates the treasurer, and gave order to have them carried to Jerusalem, and restored to their own temple when it was built. And he enjoined them to do it speedily, and commanded Abassar to go up to Jerusalem, and to see to the building of the temple; who, upon receiving a letter from Cyrus, came, and immediately laid its foundations: and although it had been in building from that time to this, it had not yet been finished because of the malignity of their enemies. If therefore you have a mind and think proper, write account of this to Darius, that when he has consulted the records of the kings, he may find that we have told you nothing that is false about the matter."

§ 5. When Zorobabel and the high priest had made this answer, Sisines and those that were with him resolved not to hinder the building, until they had informed king Darius of all this, and immediately wrote to him about it. And as the Jews were now terrified and afraid lest the king should change his mind as to the building of Jerusalem and the temple, two prophets at that time among them, Haggai and Zachariah, encouraged them, and bade them be of good cheer and suspect no hindrance from the Persians, for God foretold this to them. So they applied themselves earnestly to the building in reliance on those prophets, and did not intermit one day.

§ 6. Now Darius, when the Samaritans had written to him, and in their letter had accused the Jews of fortifying the city, and building the temple more like a citadel than a temple, and said that their doings were not for the king's advantage, and also showed the letter of Cambyses, wherein he forbade them to build the temple, and when Darius thereby understood that the restoration of Jerusalem was not for his interest, and when he had read the letter that was brought him from Sisines and those that were with him, he gave order that what concerned these matters should be sought for among the royal records. And a book was found at Ecbatana, in the tower that was in Media, wherein was written as follows: "Cyrus the king, in the first year of his reign, commanded that the temple and altar should be built in Jerusalem; its height was to be threescore cubits, and its breadth the same, with three layers of polished stone, and one of wood of their own country: and he ordered that the expenses of it should be paid out of the king's revenue. He also commanded that the vessels which Nebuchadnezzar had pillaged and carried to Babylon, should be restored to the people of Jerusalem, and that the care of these things should belong to Abassar, the governor and president of Syria and Phœnicia, and to his associates, not to meddle in the place, but to permit the servants of God, the Jews and their rulers, to build the temple. He also ordered that they should contribute towards the work, and supply the Jews, out of the tribute of the country where they were governors, for the sacrifices, bulls and rams and lambs and kids of the goats, and fine flour and oil and wine, and all other things that the priests should suggest to them; and that they should pray for the preservation of the king, and of the Persians. As for such as transgressed any of these orders thus sent to them, he commanded that they should be arrested and crucified, and their substance confiscated to the king's use. He also prayed to God that, if any one attempted to hinder the building of the temple, God would strike him dead, and thereby restrain him from his wickedness."

§ 7. When Darius had found this book among the records of Cyrus, he wrote an answer to Sisines and his associates, whose contents were as follows. "King Darius to Sisines the governor, and to Sarabazanes, greeting. Having found a copy of the enclosed letter among the records of Cyrus, I have sent it to you; and I will that all things be done as is therein written. Farewell." So when Sisines, and those that were with him, understood the intention of the king, they resolved to follow his directions entirely for the time to come. So they forwarded the sacred works, and assisted the elders of the Jews and the princes of the Sanhedrim, and the structure of the temple was with great diligence brought to a conclusion, by the prophecies of Haggai and Zachariah according to God's commands, and by the injunctions of the kings Cyrus and Darius. Now the temple was built in seven years, and in the ninth year of the reign of Darius, on the twenty-third day of the twelfth month, which is called by us Adar, but by the Macedonians Dystrus, the priests and Levites and the rest of the Israelites offered sacrifices, (to commemorate the renewal of their former prosperity after their captivity, and because they had now the temple rebuilt,) a hundred bulls, two hundred rams, four hundred lambs, and twelve kids of the goats, according to the number of their tribes, (for so many are the tribes of the Israelites), and this last for the sins of every tribe. The priests also and the Levites set porters at every gate according to the laws of Moses. The Jews also built the cloisters of the inner temple round about the temple itself.

§ 8. And as the feast of Unleavened Bread was at hand, in the first month, which according to the Macedonians is called Xanthicus, but according to us Nisan, all the people flocked in from the villages to the city, and celebrated the festival, having purified themselves, with their wives and children, according to the law of their country; and they offered the sacrifice which was called the Passover on the fourteenth day of the same month, and feasted seven days, and spared for no cost, but offered whole burnt-offerings to God, and performed sacrifices of thanksgiving, because God had restored them to the land of their fathers and to its laws, and had made the mind of the king of Persia favourable to them. And they offered the largest sacrifices on these accounts, and used great magnificence in the worship of God, and dwelt in Jerusalem, and had a form of government that was partly aristocratical, partly oligarchical. For the high priests were at the head of affairs, until the posterity of the Asamonæans set up kingly government: for before the captivity, and the dissolution of their polity, they had first kingly government from Saul and David, for five hundred and thirty-two years, six months, and ten days; and before those kings, such rulers governed as were called Judges and Dictators. Under this form of government they continued for more than five hundred years, after the death of Moses, and of Joshua their leader. And this is the account I had to give of the Jews who had been carried into captivity, but were delivered from it in the times of Cyrus and Darius.

§ 9. But the Samaritans, being enviously and evilly disposed against the Jews, wrought them much mischief, relying on their riches, and pretending that they were akin to the Persians, since from thence they came; and whatever they were enjoined by the king's order to pay the Jews out of the tribute for the sacrifices, they would not pay. They had also the governors favourable to them and assisting them in that purpose; nor did they spare to hurt the Jews, either by themselves or by others, as far as they were able. So the people of Jerusalem determined to send an embassy to king Darius to accuse the Samaritans. The ambassadors were Zorobabel, and four others of the rulers. And as soon as the king heard from the ambassadors the accusations and complaints they brought against the Samaritans, he gave them a letter to carry to the governors and council of Samaria. The contents were as follows. "King Darius to Tanganas and Sambabas, the governors of the Samaritans, also to Sadraces and Bobelo, and the rest of their fellow-servants that are in Samaria. Zorobabel, Ananias, and Mordecai, ambassadors of the Jews, complain of you, that you obstruct them in the building of the temple, and do not supply them with the sums which I commanded you for the offering of the sacrifices. My will therefore is that, upon the reading of this letter, you supply them with whatever they want for their sacrifices, and that out of the royal treasury of the tribute of Samaria, as the priests shall desire, that they may not leave off offering their daily sacrifices, nor praying to God for me and the Persians." Such were the contents of the letter.

CHAP. V.

How Xerxes, the Son of Darius, was well disposed to the Jews: as also concerning Esdras and Nehemiah.

§ 1.

UPON the death of Darius, his son Xerxes succeeded to the kingdom, who, as he inherited his father's kingdom, so did he inherit his piety towards God, and honour of him; for he did all things like his father as to divine worship, and he was exceedingly friendly to the Jews. Now about this time, a son of Jeshua, whose name was Joacim, was the high priest. Also there was now in Babylon a righteous man, and one that enjoyed a great reputation among the multitude, he was the principal priest of the people, and his name was Esdras. He was very skilful in the laws of Moses, and was a favourite with king Xerxes. He determined to go up to Jerusalem, and to take with him some of those Jews that were in Babylon, and he desired that the king would give him a letter to the satraps of Syria, that they might know who he was. Accordingly, the king wrote the following letter to those satraps. "Xerxes, king of kings, to Esdras the priest, and reader of the divine law, greeting. I think it agreeable to that love which I bear to mankind, to permit those of the Jewish nation that are so disposed, as well as those of the priests and Levites that are in our kingdom, to go together to Jerusalem. Accordingly, I have given command for that purpose; and let everyone that has a mind go, (for so it has seemed good to me and to my seven counsellors,) in order to review affairs in Judæa, to see whether they be agreeable to the law of God. Let them also take with them those presents which I and my friends have vowed, as well as all the silver and gold that is found in the country of the Babylonians which was dedicated to God, and let all this be carried to Jerusalem for sacrifices to God. Let it also be lawful for thee and thy brethren to make as many vessels of silver and gold as thou pleasest. Thou shalt also dedicate those holy vessels which have been given thee, and as many more as thou hast a mind to make, and shalt take the expenses out of the king's treasury. I have moreover written to the treasurers of Syria and Phœnicia, to see to the affairs that Esdras the priest, and reader of the laws of God, is sent about. And that God may not be at all angry with me, or with my children, I grant all that is necessary for sacrifices to God according to the law, as far as a hundred cors of wheat. And I enjoin you not to lay any treacherous imposition or tribute upon their priests or Levites, or sacred singers, or porters, or sacred servants, or scribes of the temple. And do thou, O Esdras, appoint judges according to the wisdom given thee by God, and those such as understand the law, that they may judge in all Syria and Phœnicia; and do thou instruct those also who are ignorant of it, that if anyone of thy countrymen transgress the law of God, or that of the king, he may be punished, as not transgressing it out of ignorance, but as one that knows it indeed, but boldly despises and contemns it. And such may be punished by death, or by paying fines. Farewell."

§ 2. When Esdras had received this letter, he was very joyful, and began to worship God, and confessed that he had been the cause of the king's great favour to him, and for that reason he gave all the glory to God. And he read the letter at Babylon to the Jews that were there, but he kept it, and sent a copy of it to all those of his own nation that were in Media. And when these Jews understood the piety the king had towards God, and the kindness he had for Esdras, they were all greatly pleased; and many of them took their effects with them and came to Babylon, yearning to return to Jerusalem. But the entire body of the people of Israel remained in that country. So there are but two tribes in Asia and Europe subject to the Romans, for the ten tribes are beyond the Euphrates even now, and are an immense multitude that cannot be numbered. Now there came a great number of priests, and Levites, and porters, and sacred singers, and sacred servants, to Esdras. So he gathered together those that were in captivity beyond the Euphrates, and stayed there three days, and ordained a fast for them, that they might make prayers to God for their preservation, that they might suffer no misfortune by the way, either from their enemies, or from any other mischance. For Esdras had told the king beforehand that God would preserve them, and so he had not thought fit to request that he would send horsemen to conduct them. And when they had finished their prayers, they removed from the Euphrates on the twelfth day of the first month of the seventh year of the reign of Xerxes, and got to Jerusalem in the fifth month of the same year. And Esdras at once presented the sacred money to the treasurers, who were of the family of the priests, six hundred and fifty talents of silver, vessels of silver one hundred talents, vessels of gold twenty talents, and vessels of brass that was more precious than gold<sup>1</sup> twelve talents by weight; for these presents had been made by the king and his counsellors, and by all the Israelites that stayed at Babylon. And when Esdras had delivered these things to the priests, he gave to God, as the appointed sacrifices of whole burnt-offerings, twelve bulls for the common preservation of the people, ninety rams, and seventy-two lambs, and twelve kids of the goats for the remission of sins. He also delivered the king's letter to the king's officers, and to the governors of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia; and as they were obliged to do what was enjoined by him, they honoured our nation, and assisted them in all their necessities.

§ 3. Now all these things were done under the advice of Esdras, and he succeeded in them, because God esteemed him worthy of success in his plans on account of his goodness and righteousness. And some time afterwards there came some persons to him, who brought an accusation against certain of the multitude and of the priests and Levites, who had transgressed their polity and broken the laws of their country by marrying strange wives, and had brought the family of the priests into confusion. These persons desired him to support the laws, lest God should take up a general anger against them all, and reduce them to a calamitous condition again. Thereupon he immediately rent his garments in his grief, and pulled off the hair of his head and beard, and cast himself upon the ground, because this crime had reached the principal men among the people, and considering that if he should enjoin them to put away their wives, and the children they had by them, he should not be hearkened to, he continued lying upon the ground. However, all the better sort came running to him, and also themselves wept and joined in the grief he was in for what had been done. Then Esdras rose up from the ground, and stretched out his hands towards heaven, and said that he was ashamed to look towards it because of the sins which the people had committed, who had cast out of their memories what their fathers had undergone on account of their wickedness: and he besought God, who had saved a seed and a remnant out of the calamity and captivity they had been in, and had restored them again to Jerusalem and to their own land, and had obliged the kings of Persia to have compassion on them, to forgive them also the sins they had now committed, for, though they deserved death, yet it was agreeable to the mercy of God to remit even to them the punishment due.

§ 4. After Esdras had said this, he left off praying; and when all those that came to him with their wives and children were in lamentation, one whose name was Jechonias, a principal man in Jerusalem, came to him and said that they had sinned in marrying strange wives; and urged him to adjure them all to put away those wives and the children born of them, and that those should be punished who would not obey the law. So Esdras hearkened to this advice, and made the chief men of the priests and Levites and Israelites swear that they would put away those wives and children according to the advice of Jechonias. And when he had received their oaths, he went at once out of the temple into the chamber of Johanan the son of Eliasib, and as he had hitherto tasted nothing at all for grief, he abode there that day. And when proclamation was made, that all those of the captivity should gather themselves together to Jerusalem, and those that did not meet there in two or three days should be banished from the multitude, and their substance appropriated according to the decision of the elders, those that were of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin came together in three days, viz. on the twentieth day of the ninth month, which according to the Hebrews is called Tebeth, and according to the Macedonians Apellæus. Now, as they were sitting in the upper room of the temple, where the elders also were present, who suffered greatly from the cold, Esdras stood up and accused them, and told them that they had sinned in marrying wives that were not of their own nation; and that they would now do a thing both pleasing to God, and advantageous to themselves, if they put those wives away. And they all cried out that they would do so, but that the multitude was great, and that the season of the year was winter, and that this work would require more than one or two days. "Let the rulers, therefore [said they,] and those that have married strange wives, come hither at a fixed time, and let the elders of every place estimate the number of those that have thus married, and be there also." Accordingly, this was resolved on by them, and they began the inquiry for those that had married strange wives on the first day of the tenth month, and continued the inquiry to the first day of the next month, and found a great many of the posterity of Jeshua the high priest, and of the priests and Levites and Israelites, who had a greater regard to the observation of the law than to their natural affection, and immediately put away their wives and the children which were born of them;<sup>1</sup> and in order to appease God they offered sacrifices, and slew rams as oblations to him. But it does not seem to me to be necessary to set down the names of these men. So when Esdras had reformed this sin about the marriages of the fore-mentioned persons, he purified their practice in marriages, so that it continued in that state for the time to come.

§ 5. Now when they kept the feast of Tabernacles in the seventh month, and almost all the people were come together to it, they went up to the open part of the temple, to the gate which faced east, and desired of Esdras that the laws of Moses might be read to them. Accordingly he stood in the midst of the multitude and read them, and did so from morning to noon. Now, by hearing the laws read to them, they were instructed to be righteous men for the present and for the future, and as for their past offences, they were vexed with themselves, and even went so far as to shed tears, considering with themselves, that if they had kept the law, they would have endured none of those miseries which they had experienced. But when Esdras saw them in that disposition, he bade them go home and not weep, for it was a festival, and they ought not to weep thereon, for it was not lawful to do so. He exhorted them rather to proceed immediately to feasting, and to do what was suitable to a feast and agreeable to a day of joy, and to let their repentance and sorrow for their former sins be a security and guard to them against falling any more into the like offences. So upon Esdras's exhortation they began to feast, and when they had so done for eight days in their tabernacles, they departed to their own homes, singing hymns to God, and returning thanks to Esdras for his reformation of the corruptions that had been introduced into their polity. And it came to pass after he had obtained this reputation among the people, that he died an old man, and was buried in a magnificent manner at Jerusalem. About the same time also Joachim the high priest died, and his son Eliasib succeeded him in the high priesthood.

§ 6. Now there was one of the Jews that had been carried into captivity, who was cup-bearer to king Xerxes, whose name was Nehemiah. As he was walking about in the suburbs of Susa, the metropolis of the Persians, he heard some strangers that were entering the city after a long journey, speaking to one another in the Hebrew tongue, so he went to them and asked them whence they came? And when their answer was, that they came from Judæa, he began to inquire of them again in what state the multitude was? and in what condition Jerusalem was? And they replied that they were in a bad state,<sup>1</sup> for their walls were thrown down to the ground, and the neighbouring nations did a great deal of mischief to the Jews, for in the day time they overran the country and pillaged it, and in the night did them mischief, insomuch that not a few were led away captive out of the country and from Jerusalem itself, and the roads were every day found full of dead men. At this Nehemiah shed tears, commiserating the calamities of his countrymen: and looking up to heaven, he said, "How long, O Lord, wilt thou allow our nation to suffer such great miseries, for we are made the prey and spoil of all men." And while he stayed at the gate and lamented thus, one told him that the king was going to sit down to supper; so he made haste, and went at once as he was, without washing himself, to minister to the king in his office of cup-bearer. And as the king was very pleasant after supper, and more cheerful than usual, he cast his eyes on Nehemiah, and seeing him looking sad, he asked him why he was sad? Whereupon he prayed to God to give him favour, and persuasion to his words, and said, "How can I, O king, appear otherwise than sad and in trouble of mind when I hear that the walls of Jerusalem, the city where are the sepulchres of my fathers, are thrown down to the ground, and that its gates are consumed by fire; but do thou grant me the favour to go and build its wall, and to finish the building of the temple." And the king gave him a sign that he freely granted him what he asked, and told him to carry a letter to the satraps, that they might pay him due honour, and afford him whatever assistance he wanted for what he pleased. "Leave off thy sorrow, therefore," added the king, "and be cheerful henceforth in the performance of thy office." Then Nehemiah worshipped God, and gave the king thanks for his promise, and cleared up his sad and cloudy countenance in the pleasure he had at the king's promises. And the king called for him the next day, and gave him a letter to carry to Adæus, the governor of Syria and Phœnicia and Samaria, wherein he gave him injunctions to pay due honour to Nehemiah, and to supply him with what he wanted for the building.

§ 7. Now when he had gone to Babylon, and had taken with him thence many of his countrymen who voluntarily followed him, he arrived at Jerusalem in the twenty-fifth year of the reign of Xerxes: and when he had shown the letters to God,<sup>1</sup> he gave them to Adæus and the other governors. He also called together all the people to Jerusalem, and stood in the midst of the temple, and made the following speech to them. "You know, O Jews, that our forefathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, kept God in mind continually; and for the sake of their righteousness, he has not left off the care of you: indeed he has assisted me in gaining this leave from the king to raise up our wall, and finish what is wanting of the temple. I desire you therefore (who well know the ill-will the neighbouring nations bear to us, who, when once they perceive that we are in earnest about building, will come upon us, and contrive many ways of obstructing our work), in the first place to put your trust in God, as in one who will assist us against their hatred, and next to intermit building neither night nor day, but to use all diligence, and to hasten on the work, now we have this especial opportunity for it." When he had said this, he gave order that the rulers should measure the wall and divide the work of it among the people, according to their villages and cities, and according to every one's ability. And when he had added the promise, that he himself with his servants would assist them in the building, he dissolved the assembly. So the Jews prepared for the work. They have been called Jews from the day that they came up from Babylon, after the tribe of Judah, which came first to those places, and so both they and the country gained that appellation.<sup>2</sup>

§ 8. Now when the Ammonites and Moabites and Samaritans, and all that inhabited Cœle-Syria,<sup>3</sup> heard that the building of the walls went on apace, they took it ill, and proceeded to lay snares for them, and to hinder their intention. They also slew many of the Jews, and sought to destroy Nehemiah himself, by hiring some of the foreigners to kill him. They also put the Jews in fear and alarm, and spread abroad rumours, as if many nations were going to make an expedition against them, by which means they were alarmed, and almost left off the building. But none of these things could deter Nehemiah from being diligent about the work, only he kept a number of men about him as a body-guard, and unweariedly persevered therein, and was insensible of any toil in his desire to perfect the work. And thus did he take care of his own safety attentively and with great forecast, not that he feared death, but because he was persuaded that if he were dead, the walls for his fellow-citizens would never be raised. He also gave orders that the builders should keep their ranks, and have their armour on while they were building. Accordingly, the mason had his sword on, as well as he that brought the materials for building. He also ordered that their shields should lie very near them, and he placed trumpeters at intervals of five hundred feet, and charged them if their enemies appeared, that they should give notice of it to the people, that they might fight in their armour, and that their enemies might not fall upon them when they were unarmed. He also went about the rounds of the city by night, being never discouraged, either about the work itself, or about his own diet and sleep, for he made no use of those things for pleasure, but only out of necessity. And he underwent this toil for two years and four months:<sup>1</sup> for in so long time was the wall built, in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of Xerxes, in the ninth month. And when the walls were finished, Nehemiah and the multitude offered sacrifices to God for the building of them, and continued feasting for eight days. But when the nations which dwelt in Syria heard that the building of the walls was finished, they were indignant at it. Now when Nehemiah saw that the city was thinly peopled, he exhorted the priests and Levites to leave the country and remove to the city and live there, and he built them houses at his own expense, and he commanded those of the people who were employed in cultivating the land to bring the tithes of their fruits to Jerusalem, that the priests and Levites, having perpetually whereon they might live, might not leave the divine worship. And they willingly hearkened to the orders of Nehemiah, so the city of Jerusalem came to be fuller of people than it was before. And when Nehemiah had finely done many other excellent things worthy of commendation, he died at a good old age. He was a man of a good and righteous disposition, and very ambitious to make his own nation happy; and he left the walls of Jerusalem as his eternal monument. They were built in the days of Xerxes.

<sup>1</sup> This showing king Xerxes' letters to God, or laying them open before God in the temple, is very like the laying open the letters of Sennacherib before him also by Hezekiah, 2 Kings xix. 14, Isa. xxxvii. 14, although this last was for a memorial, to put him in mind of the enemies, in order to move the divine compassion, and the present as a token of gratitude for mercies already received, as Havercamp well observes on this place. — W.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning Esther and Mordecai and Haman: and how, in the Reign of Artaxerxes, the whole Nation of the Jews was in Danger of Perishing.

§ 1.

AFTER the death of Xerxes, the kingdom came to his son Cyrus, whom the Greeks called Artaxerxes. When he was ruler over the Persians, the whole nation of the Jews,<sup>1</sup> with their wives and children, was in danger of perishing: the reason of which I shall show in a little time, for it is proper first to give some account of this king, and how he married a Jewish wife of royal stock, who is related to have saved our nation. For when Artaxerxes had taken over the kingdom, and had set governors over the hundred and twenty-seven satrapies from India to Ethiopia, he made in the third year of his reign a costly feast for his friends and the nations of Persia and their governors, such an one as was proper for a king to make when he had a mind to make a public demonstration of his riches, and it lasted a hundred and eighty days; after which he made a feast for other nations, and for their ambassadors at Susa, for seven days. Now this feast was ordered after the manner following; he caused a tent to be pitched, which was supported by pillars of gold and silver, with curtains of linen and purple spread over them, that many ten thousands might recline. The cups with which the waiters ministered were of gold, and adorned with precious stones, for pleasure and for show. He also gave order to the servants that they should not force the guests to drink by bringing them wine continually, as is the practice of the Persians, but permit every one of them to enjoy himself according to his own inclination. He also sent messengers throughout the country, and gave order that the people should have a remission of their labours, and should keep a festival many days, on account of his accession to the kingdom. In like manner did Vashti the queen gather the women together, and make them a feast in the palace. Now the king was desirous to show her to those that feasted with him, as she exceeded all women in beauty, and he sent and commanded her to come to the feast. But she, out of regard to the laws of the Persians, which forbade women to be seen by strangers, would not go to the king;<sup>1</sup> and though he certainly ought to do, and as Dean Prideaux has justly done, we place this history under Artaxerxes Longimanus, as do both the Septuagint and Josephus. The learned Dr. Lee, in his posthumous dissertation on the second book of Esdras, page 25, also says, that "the truth of this history is demonstrated by the feast of Purim, kept up from that time to this very day."—W.

<sup>1</sup> Since some sceptical persons are willing to discard this book of Esther as no true history; and even our learned and judicious Dr. Wall, in his late posthumous critical notes upon all the other Hebrew books of the Old Testament, gives us none upon the Canticles, or upon Esther, and seems thereby to give up this book, as well as he gives up the Canticles, as indefensible: I shall venture to say, that almost all the objections against this book of Esther are gone at once, if, as we

often sent the eunuchs to her, she nevertheless stayed away and refused to come, till the king was so much irritated, that he broke up the entertainment, and rose up and called for those seven Persians who had the interpretation of the laws committed to them, and accused his wife, and said that he had been affronted by her, because though she was frequently summoned by him to his feast, she did not obey him once. He therefore ordered them to inform him what could be done against her by the law. Then one of them, whose name was Muchæus, said that this affront was offered not to him alone, but to all the Persians, who were in danger of leading very unhappy lives with their wives if they were thus despised by them; for none of the wives would have any reverence for their husbands, having such an example of arrogance in the queen towards him who ruled over all. So he exhorted him to punish her severely, as she had been guilty of so great an affront to him, and when he had so done, to publish to the nations what had been decreed about the queen. So the resolution was to put Vashti away, and to give her dignity to another woman.

§ 2. But the king being very fond of her could not well bear a separation, and yet by the law he could not admit of a reconciliation with her, so he was in trouble, as not having it in his power to do what he desired to do. Now when his friends saw him so uneasy, they advised him to put the memory of his wife and his love for her out of his mind, and to send abroad over all the world, and search out for comely virgins, and to take her whom he should like best for a wife, because his passion for his former wife would be quenched by the substitution of

would not submit to such an indignity; and if it were not so gross as that, yet it might, in the king's cups, be done in a way so indecent, as the Persian laws would not then bear, any more than the common laws of modesty. And that the king had some such design, seems not improbable, for otherwise the principal of these royal guests could be no strangers to the queen, nor unapprized of her beauty. However, since Providence was now paving the way for the introduction of a Jewess into the king's affections, to bring about one of the most wonderful deliverances which the Jewish or any nation ever had, we need not be further solicitous about the motives by which the king was induced to divorce Vashti, and marry Esther.—W.

another, and the kindness he had to Vashti would be withdrawn from her, and be placed by degrees on her that was with him. And he was persuaded to follow this advice, and gave orders to certain persons to choose out of the virgins that were in his kingdom those that were esteemed the most comely, and bring them to him. Now when a great number of these virgins were gathered together, there was found a damsel in Babylon, whose parents were both dead, and she was brought up with her uncle Mordecai, for that was his name. He was of the tribe of Benjamin, and was one of the principal persons among the Jews. Now it so happened that this damsel, whose name was Esther, was the most beautiful of all, and the grace of her countenance drew the eyes of spectators principally upon her: so she was committed to one of the eunuchs to take charge of her: and she was provided with sweet odours in great plenty, and with costly ointments, such as these virgins' bodies needed to be perfumed with: for this course was used six months by the virgins, who were in number four hundred. And when the eunuch thought the virgins had been sufficiently prepared in the forementioned time, and were now fit to go to the king's bed, he sent one to be with the king every day. And he, when he had lain with her, sent her back to the eunuch: but when Esther had come to him, he was pleased with her, and fell in love with the damsel, and made her his lawful wife, and kept a wedding feast for her in the twelfth month of the seventh year of his reign, which was called Adar. He also sent couriers, called angari,<sup>1</sup> unto every nation, and gave orders that they should keep a feast for his marriage, while he himself treated the Persians and the Medes, and the principal men of the nations, for a whole month, on account of his marriage. And Esther came to the royal palace, and he set a diadem on her head. Thus was she married, without making known to the king what nation she belonged to. Her uncle also removed from Babylon to Susa, and dwelt there, being every day about the palace, and inquiring how the damsel did, for he loved her as though she had been his own daughter.

§ 4. Some time after this two eunuchs Bagathous and Theodestes plotted against the king, and Barnabazus, the servant of one of them, and by birth a Jew, got acquainted with their conspiracy, and discovered it to the queen's uncle; and Mordecai through Esther made the conspirators known to the king. This troubled the king, but he discovered the truth, and crucified the eunuchs, but gave no reward at the time to Mordecai, who had been the occasion of his preservation. He only bade the scribes set down his name in the records, and bade him stay in the palace, as a very intimate friend of the king.

§ 5. Now there was one Haman, the son of Amedatha, an Amalekite by race, that used to visit the king, and when he did so the foreigners and Persians prostrated themselves before him, as Artaxerxes had commanded that such honour should be paid to him; but Mordecai was so wise, and so observant of his country's laws, that he would not prostrate himself before a man. When Haman observed this, he inquired what his nationality was. And when he heard that he was a Jew, he was indignant, and said within himself, that whereas the Persians, who were free men, prostrated themselves before him, this man, who was no better than a slave, did not choose to do so. And as he desired to punish Mordecai, he thought it too small a thing to request of the king that he alone might be punished, he rather determined to abolish the whole nation, for he was naturally an enemy to the Jews, because the nation of the Amalekites, from which he sprung, had been destroyed by them. Accordingly, he went to the king, and accused them, saying, "There is a certain wicked nation, dispersed over all the world under thy dominion; a nation separate from others, unsociable, having neither the same sort of divine worship that others have, nor using laws like the laws of others: at enmity with thy people and with all men both in their manners and practices. Now, if thou wilt be a benefactor to thy subjects, thou wilt give orders to destroy them utterly, and not leave the least remains of them, nor preserve any of them either for slaves or for captives." And that the king might not be injured by the loss of the tribute which the Jews paid, Haman promised to give him out of his own estate forty thousand talents, whenever he pleased; and he would pay this money very willingly, that the kingdom might be freed from such a pest.

§ 6. When Haman made this petition, the king remitted him the money, and granted him the men, to do what he would with them. Then Haman having gained what he desired, sent out immediately a decree as from the king to all nations, the contents whereof were as follows. "Artaxerxes, the great king, sends this writing to the rulers of the hundred and twenty-seven satrapies from India to Ethiopia. Whereas I have governed many nations, and obtained the dominion of as much of all the world as I desired, and have not been obliged to do any thing insolent or cruel to my subjects by my power, but have shown myself mild and gentle, and seen to their peace and good order, and have been studious that they might enjoy those blessings for all time to come; and whereas I have been kindly informed by Haman, who on account of his prudence and justice is the first in my esteem and in dignity, and only second to myself for his fidelity and constant good-will to me, that there is an ill-natured nation intermixed with all mankind, that is averse to laws and unruly to kings, and of a different conduct of life from others, that hateth monarchy, and is ill-affected to our rule, I give order that these men, of whom Haman my second father hath informed us, be destroyed with their wives and children, and that none of them be spared, and that none put pity to them before obedience to this decree. And I will this to be executed on the fourteenth day of the twelfth month of this present year, that so, when all that have enmity to us are destroyed in one day, we may be allowed to spend our lives in peace hereafter." Now when this decree was carried to the cities and all over the country, all made ready for the entire destruction and massacre of the Jews on the day before mentioned; and they were very zealous about it at Susa in particular. And the king and Haman spent their time in feasting and drinking together, but the city was troubled.

§ 7. Now when Mordecai was informed of what had been done, he rent his clothes and put on sackcloth, and sprinkled ashes upon his head, and went about the city, crying out that a nation that had done no wrong was to be destroyed. And saying thus he went as far as the king's palace, and there he stood, for it was not lawful for him to go into it in that dress. The same thing was done by all the Jews that were in the several cities wherein this decree was published, who lamented and mourned on account of the calamities denounced against them. But when certain persons told the queen that Mordecai stood in the court-yard in mourning, she was troubled at hearing this, and sent out people to change his garments; but as he could not be induced to put off his sackcloth, because the terrible occasion that forced him to put it on was not yet ceased, she called the eunuch Achratheus, who was then present, and sent him to Mordecai, in order to know of him what sad event had befallen him, for which he was in mourning, and would not put off at her desire the dress he had put on. Then did Mordecai inform the eunuch of the reason of his mourning, and of the decree against the Jews which was sent by the king all over the country, and of the promise of money whereby Haman had bought the destruction of their nation. He also gave him a copy of what was proclaimed at Susa to carry to Esther; and he charged her to petition the king about the matter, and for the safety of her nation not to think it a dishonourable thing to put on a humble dress, wherein she might deprecate the ruin of the Jews, who were in great peril; for Haman, whose dignity was only inferior to that of the king, had accused the Jews, and had irritated the king against them. When she was informed of this, she sent to Mordecai again, and told him that she was not summoned by the king, and that whoever went in to him without being summoned was slain, unless the king, if he wished to save any one, held out his golden sceptre to him; for to whomever he did so, although he went in without being summoned, that person was so far from being slain, that he obtained pardon, and was safe. Now when the eunuch carried this message from Esther, Mordecai bade him tell her that she must not look only to her own preservation, but the common preservation of her nation, for if she now neglected this opportunity, there would certainly arise help for it from God some other way, but she and her father's house would be destroyed by those whom she now despised. Then Esther sent the same messenger back to Mordecai and bade him go to Susa, and gather the Jews that were there together to an assembly, and to fast and abstain from all sorts of food on her account, and she with her maidens would do the same; and then she promised that she would go to the king, though it was against the law, and if she must die for it she would go through with it.

§ 8. And Mordecai did as Esther enjoined him, and made the people fast, and together with them besought God not to overlook his nation, particularly at that time, when it was going to be destroyed; but that, as he had often before provided for them, and forgiven them when they had sinned, so he would now deliver them from the destruction which was denounced against them; for although it was not all the nation that had offended, yet must they ingloriously be slain, but he himself was the cause of the wrath of Haman, "because," said he, "I did not prostrate myself before him, nor could I endure to pay that honour to him which I used to pay to thee, O Lord, and it is owing to his anger against me that he has contrived this present mischief against those that have not transgressed thy laws." The multitude offered up the same supplications, and entreated that God would see to their deliverance, and free the Israelites in every land from this calamity which was now coming upon them; for they saw it already before their eyes and expected it. Esther also made supplication to God after the manner of her country, by casting herself down upon the ground, and putting on mourning apparel, and bidding farewell to meat and drink and all pleasures for three days; and she entreated God to have mercy upon her, and to make her words appear persuasive to the king, and to render her countenance more beautiful than it was before, that both by her words and beauty she might succeed in averting the king's anger, in case he were at all irritated against her, and in protecting those of her own country, now they were in the utmost danger of perishing; as also that he would excite a hatred in the king against the enemies of the Jews, and those that had contrived their future destruction, if they were still despised by him.

§ 9. When Esther had used this supplication to God for three days, she put off her mourning and changed her dress, and adorned herself as became a queen, and took two of her handmaids with her, one of whom supported her as she gently leaned upon her, and the other followed her, and held up her large train (which swept along the ground) with the extremities of her fingers: and thus she came to the king, with a blush on her countenance, and a pleasant attractiveness in her behaviour and dignity. Yet did she go in to him with fear. And as soon as she came within sight of him, as he was sitting on his throne in his royal apparel, which was a garment interwoven with gold and precious stones, which made him seem to her more terrible, especially as he looked at her somewhat severely, and with a countenance on fire with anger, immediately her joints failed her from the dread she was in, and she fainted in the arms of her handmaids.<sup>1</sup> But the king changed his mind, by the will of God, I suppose, and was concerned for his wife, lest her fear should bring some very ill thing upon her, and leaped from his throne and took her in his arms, and brought her round, embracing her and speaking kindly to her, and exhorting her to be of good cheer, and not to anticipate anything dreadful for coming to him without being summoned; for that law was made for subjects, so that she, who was a queen as much as he a king, was entirely secure. As he said this, he put the sceptre into her hand, and laid his rod upon her neck, on account of the law, to free her from her fear. And after she had revived at this, she said, "My lord, it is not easy for me to say what suddenly happened, for as soon as I saw thee to be great and comely and terrible, my spirit departed from me, and I had no soul left in me." And as it was with difficulty and in a low voice that she could say so much, the king was in great agony and disorder, and encouraged Esther to be of good cheer, and to look for the best, since he was ready, if occasion should require it, to grant her half his kingdom. Then Esther desired that he and his friend Haman would come to her to a banquet, for she said she had prepared a supper. He consented to it, and when they were there, as they were drinking, he bade Esther let him know what she desired, for she should not be disappointed, though she should desire the half of his kingdom. But she put off the discovery of her petition till the next day, if he would come again, together with Haman, to banquet with her.

§ 10. Now as the king promised to do so, Haman went away very glad, because he alone had the honour of supping with the king at Esther's, and because no one else partook of the same honour with kings but himself; yet when he saw Mordecai in the court-yard, he was very much displeased, for he paid him no manner of respect when he saw him. So he went home and called for his wife Zeresh and his friends, and when they were come, he told them what honour he enjoyed not only from the king, but from the queen also, for he alone had that day supped with her with the king, and was also invited again for the next day; but he said he was not pleased at seeing Mordecai the Jew in the court-yard. Thereupon his wife Zeresh advised him to give orders that a gallows should be made fifty cubits high, and that in the morning he should ask of the king that Mordecai might be hanged thereon. And he commended her advice, and gave orders to his servants to prepare the gallows, and to place it in the court-yard for the punishment of Mordecai. And it was accordingly prepared. But God laughed to scorn the wicked hope of Haman, and as he knew what the event would be, was pleased with what had been done. For that night he took away the king's sleep; and as he was not willing to lose the time of his lying awake, but to spend it in something that might be of advantage to his kingdom, he commanded the scribe to bring him the chronicles of the former kings, and the records of his own actions, and to read them to him. And as he brought them and read them, one was found to have received an estate on account of his bravery on a certain occasion, and his name was set down; another was found to have had a present made him on account of his fidelity: and then the scribe came to Bagathous and Theodestes, the eunuchs that had made a conspiracy against the king, whom Mordecai had informed against. And when the scribe read no more than that, and was going on to another event, the king stopped him, and inquired, whether it was not added that Mordecai had a reward given him? And when he said there was nothing written about it, he bade him leave off, and inquired of those who were told off for that purpose, what hour of the night it was? And when he was informed that it was already day, he gave order that if they found any of his friends already come, and standing before the palace, they should tell him. Now it happened that Haman was found there, for he was come sooner than usual, to petition the king to have Mordecai put to death. So when his servants said that Haman was before the palace, the king bade them call him in; and when he was come in, he said, "Because I know that thou only art my fast friend, I desire thee to give me advice, how I may honour one that I greatly love, in a manner suitable to my magnificence." Now Haman reasoned with himself, that the opinion he should give would be for himself, since it was he alone who was beloved by the king; so he gave that advice which he thought the best. He said, "If thou wouldest truly honour a man whom thou sayest thou dost love, make him ride on horseback, with the same garment on which thou wearest, and with a gold chain about his neck, and let one of thy intimate friends go before him, and proclaim through the whole city, that he whom the king honoureth obtaineth this mark of his honour." This was the advice which Haman gave, supposing that the honour would be his. And the king was pleased with the advice, and said, "Go then, for thou hast the horse, the garment, and the chain, ask for Mordecai the Jew, and give him those things, and go before his horse, and proclaim accordingly; for thou art (he added) my intimate friend, and hast given me good advice; carry out therefore thyself what thou hast advised me to do. This shall be his reward from me for preserving my life." When he heard this order, which was entirely unexpected, he was confounded in his mind, and scarce knew what to do. However he went out and took the horse and purple garment and golden chain for the neck, and finding Mordecai before the palace clothed in sackcloth, he bade him put that dress off, and put the purple garment on: but Mordecai, not knowing the truth, and thinking that it was done in mockery, said, "O thou wretch, thou vilest of all mankind, dost thou laugh so at our calamities?" But when he was satisfied that the king bestowed this honour upon him, for the safety he had procured him, when he had informed against the eunuchs who had conspired against him, he put on the purple garment which the king always wore, and put the chain about his neck, and got on horseback, and went round the city, while Haman went before, and proclaimed, "This shall be the reward which the king will bestow on the man whom he loves and esteems worthy of honour." And when they had gone round the city, Mordecai went in to the king, but Haman went home full of shame, and informed his wife and friends of what had happened with tears. And they said that he would never now be able to be revenged on Mordecai, for God was with him.

§ 11. Now while they were thus talking to one another, Esther's eunuchs came to hasten Haman to supper; and one of the eunuchs, named Sabuchadas, seeing the gallows that was fixed in Haman's house for Mordecai, inquired of one of the servants, why they had prepared it? And when he learned that it was for the queen's uncle, because Haman was about to petition the king that he might be punished, he held his peace for the time. Now when the king was feasting with Haman at the banquet, he desired the queen to tell him what gift she wished to obtain, and assured her that she should have whatever she had a mind to. She then lamented the danger her people were in, and said that she and her nation were given up to be destroyed, and so she spoke about the matter; for she would not have troubled him if he had only given order that they should be sold into bitter servitude, for such an evil would not have been intolerable, but she desired that they might be delivered from this destruction. And when the king inquired of her who was the author of this, she then openly accused Haman, and proved that he had been the wicked instrument of this, and had formed this plot against them. When the king was troubled at this, and bounded away from the banquet into the garden, Haman began to beg and beseech Esther to forgive him his offences, for he perceived that he was in a very bad case. And as he had fallen upon the queen's couch, and was making supplication to her, the king came in, and being still more provoked at that sight, said, "O thou vilest of all mankind, dost thou attempt to force my wife?" And when Haman was dismayed at this, and unable to speak one word more, Sabuchadas the eunuch came in, and accused Haman, and said he found a gallows at his house prepared for Mordecai, for the servant had told him so much upon his inquiry, when he went to summon Haman to supper. He said further, that the gallows was fifty cubits high. When the king heard this, he determined that Haman should be punished in no other manner than that which he had devised against Mordecai; so he gave orders that he should be hung immediately upon that gallows, and so die. And hence I cannot forbear to admire God, and to recognize his wisdom and justice, not only in punishing the wickedness of Haman, but in so disposing it, that he should undergo the very same punishment which he had contrived for another; as also, because he thereby teaches others this lesson, that what mischief anyone prepares against another, he, without knowing it, first contrives against himself.<sup>1</sup>

§ 12. Haman then, having immoderately abused the honour he had from the king, perished in this manner, and the king granted his estate to the queen. He also sent for Mordecai, (for Esther had informed him that she was akin to him,) and gave him the ring which he had before given to Haman. The queen also gave Haman's estate to Mordecai, and prayed the king to deliver the nation of the Jews from the fear of death, and showed him what had been written over all the country by Haman the son of Amadatha: for if her country were destroyed, and her countrymen were to perish, she could not bear to live any longer. And the king promised her, that he would not purposely do anything that should be disagreeable to her, nor go counter to what she desired, but bade her write what she pleased about the Jews in the king's name, and seal it with his seal, and send it all over his kingdom, for those who read letters whose authority was secured by having the king's seal on them would no way oppose what was written therein. So he commanded the king's scribes to be sent for, and to write to the nations on the Jews' behalf, and to his lieutenants and governors, that were over his hundred and twenty-seven satrapies from India to Ethiopia. Now the contents of his letter were as follows. "The great king Artaxerxes sendeth greeting to our rulers,<sup>1</sup> and to those that are our faithful subjects. Many men there are, who, on account of the greatness of the benefits bestowed on them, and because of the honour which they have obtained from the wonderfully kind treatment of those that bestowed it, act not only outrageously to their inferiors, but do not scruple to do evil to those that have been their benefactors, as if they would take away gratitude from men, and from their want of tact turn their abundance and unexpected blessings against the authors of them, and suppose they shall lie concealed from God in that case, and escape the vengeance which comes from him. Some of these men, when they have the management of affairs

committed to them by their friends, and bear private malice of their own against some others, deceive and persuade those that are in power to be angry at such as have done them no harm, by laying false accusations and calumnies, till they are in danger of perishing. Nor is this state of things only to be discovered by ancient examples, or such as we have learned by report only, but by some examples of such impudent attempts under our own eyes, so that it is not fit to attend henceforth to calumnies and accusations, nor to the persuasions of others, but to judge of actions by one's own knowledge, and to punish what justly deserves it, and to grant favours to such as are innocent. Haman, the son of Amadatha, an Amalekite by race and alien from the blood of the Persians, is a good example of what I mean, for though he was hospitably entertained by us, and partook of that kindness which we bear to all men to so great a degree as to be eventually called my father, and to be all along prostrated to, and to have honour paid him by all next to the royal honour due to ourselves, he could not bear his good fortune, nor wisely and soberly turn to good account the magnitude of his prosperity, nay, he even made a conspiracy against my kingdom and life, (though I gave him his authority,) by endeavouring to take off Mordecai, my benefactor and saviour, and by basely and treacherously asking to have Esther, the partner of my life and dominions, brought to destruction; for he wished by this means to deprive me of my faithful friends,<sup>1</sup> and to transfer the kingdom to others. But since I find that these Jews, who were devoted by this cursed fellow to destruction, are not wicked men, but conduct their lives in the best manner, and are men devoted to the worship of that God who has preserved the kingdom to me and my ancestors, I do not only free them from the punishment which the former letter, which was sent by Haman, ordered to be inflicted on them, (to which if you do not attend you will do well,) but I also will that they have all honour paid to them. And I have hanged up the man that contrived such things against them with his family before the gates in Susa, that punishment being sent upon him by God who seeth all things. And I charge you to publicly set up a copy of this letter throughout all my kingdom, that the Jews may be permitted peaceably to use their own laws, and that you assist them, that, at the very season wherein their misery was to begin, they may defend themselves the very same day from unjust violence, namely on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is Adar, for God has made that day a day of salvation to them instead of a day of destruction. And may it be a good day to those that wish us well, and a memorial of the punishment of the conspirators against us! And I will that you take notice, that every city, and every nation, that shall disobey anything that is contained in this letter, shall be destroyed by fire and sword. And let this letter be published throughout all the country that is under our rule, and let all the Jews by all means be ready against the day before-mentioned, that they may avenge themselves upon their enemies."

§ 13. Then the horsemen who carried these instructions went the ways which they were to go with speed. But as for Mordecai, as soon as he had put on the royal garment and the crown of gold, and had put the chain about his neck, he appeared in public, and when the Jews who were at Susa saw him in so great honour with the king, they thought his good fortune was common to themselves also. And joy and the light of salvation came upon the Jews both in the cities and provinces upon the publication of the king's letter, so that many even of other nations circumcised their foreskins for fear of the Jews, that they might procure safety to themselves thereby. For on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which according to the Hebrews is called Adar, but according to the Macedonians Dystrus, those that carried the king's letter gave them notice, that on the very day whereon their danger was to have been, they should destroy their enemies. And now the rulers of the satrapies, and tyrants and kings and scribes, held the Jews in esteem, for the fear they were in of Mordecai forced them to act with discretion. Now when the royal decree had spread over all the country that was subject to the king, it so fell out that the Jews at Susa slew about five hundred of their enemies. And when the king had told Esther the number of those that were slain in that city, but did not know what had been done in the provinces, and asked her whether she would have any thing done further against them, for if so it should be done accordingly: she begged that the Jews might be permitted to treat their remaining enemies in the same manner the next day, as also that they might hang the ten sons of Haman upon the gallows. And the king ordered the Jews to do so, being desirous not to oppose Esther. So they banded themselves together again on the fourteenth day of the month Dystrus, and slew about three hundred of their enemies, but touched nothing of their possessions. Now seventy-five thousand of their enemies were slain by the Jews that were in the provinces and in the other cities, and these were slain on the thirteenth day of the month, and the next day they kept as a festival. Similarly the Jews that were in Susa gathered themselves together, and feasted on the fourteenth and fifteenth days of the same month. Hence even now all the Jews all over the world keep festival these days, and send portions to one another. Mordecai also wrote to those Jews that lived in the kingdom of Artaxerxes to observe these days, and celebrate them as festivals, and hand them down to posterity, that this festival might continue for all time to come, and that it might never be buried in oblivion, for since they were about to be destroyed in those days by Haman, they would do right, as they had escaped the danger in them, and inflicted punishment on their enemies, to observe those days, and give thanks to God on them. For this cause the Jews still keep the forementioned days, and call them days of Phrurim [or Purim]. And Mordecai became a great and illustrious person with the king, and assisted him in the government, and also enjoyed the company of the queen: so that the affairs of the Jews were by their means better than they could ever have hoped for. And this was the state of the Jews during the reign of Artaxerxes.

CHAP. VII.

How John slew his Brother Jesus in the Temple; and how Bagoses offered many Injuries to the Jews; also what Sanballat did.

§ 1.

WHEN Eliashib the high priest was dead, his son Judas succeeded him in the high priesthood: and when he also was dead, his son John took that dignity; on whose account it was that Bagoses, the general of another Artaxerxes's army, polluted the temple, and imposed tribute on the Jews, that out of the public stock, before they offered the daily sacrifices, they should pay for every lamb fifty shekels. The reason of this was as follows. Jesus was the brother of John, and was a friend of Bagoses, who had promised to procure him the high priesthood. Relying on his support, Jesus quarrelled with John in the temple, and so provoked his brother, that in his anger he slew him. Now it was a horrible thing for John, when he was high priest, to perpetrate so great a crime; and so much the more horrible, that there never was so cruel and impious a thing done either by the Greeks or barbarians. However, God did not neglect its punishment, for the people were on that very account enslaved and the temple polluted by the Persians. For when Bagoses, the general of Artaxerxes's army, knew that John, the high priest of the Jews, had slain his own brother Jesus in the temple, he came upon the Jews immediately, and began in anger to say to them, "Have you dared to perpetrate a murder in your temple?" And as he was about to go into the temple, they tried to prevent his doing so; but he said to them, "Am not I purer than he that committed murder in the temple?" And when he had said these words, he went into the temple. Bagoses seized upon this pretext, and punished the Jews seven years for the murder of Jesus.

§ 2. Now when John departed this life, his son Jaddus succeeded him in the high priesthood. He had a brother whose name was Manasseh. Now there was one Sanballat, who was sent into Samaria as satrap by Darius, the last king of Persia. He was a Cuthæan by race, of the same stock as the Samaritans. This man knew that the city of Jerusalem was a famous city, and that their kings had given a great deal of trouble to the Assyrians and to the people of Cœle-Syria, so he willingly gave his daughter, whose name was Nicaso, in marriage to Manasseh, thinking this alliance by marriage would be a pledge and security that the nation of the Jews would continue their good-will to him.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning Sanballat and Manasseh, and the Temple which they built on Mount Gerizim; as also how Alexander made his Entry into the City of Jerusalem, and what Benefits he bestowed on the Jews.

§ 1.

ABOUT this time it was that Philip, king of Macedon, was treacherously assaulted and slain at Aegæ<sup>1</sup> by Pausanias, the son of Cerastes, who was descended from the family of the Orestæ. And his son Alexander succeeded him in the kingdom, and crossed over the Hellespont, and overcame the generals of Darius's army in a battle fought at the Granicus,<sup>2</sup> and marched into Lydia,<sup>3</sup> and subdued Ionia,<sup>4</sup> and overran Caria,<sup>5</sup> and attacked the region of Pamphylia,<sup>6</sup> as has been related elsewhere.

§ 2. Now the elders of Jerusalem, being very indignant that the brother of Jaddus the high priest, as he was married to a foreigner, should be a partner with him in the high priesthood, formed a party against him; for they esteemed his marriage an encouragement to such as should be desirous of transgressing by marrying strange wives, and thought this would be the beginning of intercourse with foreigners, although the offence of some about marriages, and their having married wives that were not of their own country, had been the cause of their former captivity, and of the miseries they then underwent. So they commanded Manasseh to divorce his wife, or not to approach the altar, the high priest himself joining with the people in their indignation against his brother, and excluding him from the altar. Whereupon Manasseh went to his father-in-law Sanballat, and told him, although he loved his daughter Nicaso, yet he was not willing to be deprived of his sacerdotal dignity on her account, for it was the principal dignity in their nation, and always continued in the same family. Then Sanballat promised not only to preserve to him his priesthood, but to procure for him the power and dignity of high priest, and to make him governor of all the places he himself now ruled over, if he would retain his daughter as his wife. He also said further, that he would build a temple like that at Jerusalem upon Mount Gerizim,<sup>1</sup> which is the highest of all the mountains in Samaria, and he promised that he would do this with the approbation of Darius the king. Manasseh was elated by these promises, and stayed with Sanballat, supposing that he should get the high priesthood from Darius, for it happened that Sanballat was already in years. But there was now a great disturbance among the people of Jerusalem, because many of the priests and Levites were entangled in such marriages. For they all revolted to Manasseh, and Sanballat afforded them money, and divided among them land for tillage, and gave them habitations also, in order in every way to gratify his son-in-law.

§ 3. About this time it was that Darius heard that Alexander had passed over the Hellespont, and had beaten his satraps in the battle of the Granicus, and was proceeding further; whereupon he gathered together an army of horse and foot, and determined that he would meet the Macedonians before they should invade and conquer all Asia. So he crossed over the river Euphrates, and marched over Taurus the Cilician mountain,<sup>1</sup> and waited for the enemy at Issus<sup>2</sup> in Cilicia, intending there to give him battle. And Sanballat was glad that Darius was come down, and told Manasseh that he would at once perform his promises to him, directly Darius should come back, after he had beaten his enemies; for not he only, but all those that were in Asia also, were persuaded that the Macedonians would not so much as come to a battle with the Persians, on account of their numerous host. But the event proved other than they expected, for Darius joined battle with the Macedonians, and was beaten, and lost a great part of his army. His mother also, and his wife and children, were taken captive, and he fled into Persia. Then Alexander came into Syria, and took Damascus, and when he had become master of Sidon, he besieged Tyre, and sent a letter to the Jewish high priest, bidding him send him some auxiliaries, and supply his army with provisions; and henceforth to pay to him the tribute he had formerly paid to Darius, and to choose the friendship of the Macedonians, for he should never repent of so doing. But the high priest answered the letter-carriers that he had given his oath to Darius not to bear arms against him, and said he would not break his word while Darius was in the land of the living. Upon hearing this answer Alexander was very angry, and though he determined not to leave Tyre, which was just on the eve of being taken, yet he threatened that, as soon as he had taken it, he would make an expedition against the Jewish high priest, and through him teach all men to whom they must keep their oaths. So he energetically pushed on the siege and took Tyre, and settled its affairs, and marched to the city of Gaza,<sup>3</sup> and besieged both the city and commander of the garrison, whose name was Babemeses.

§ 4. And Sanballat thought he had now got a good opportunity for his plan, so he renounced Darius, and taking with him seven thousand of his subjects, went to Alexander, and finding him beginning the siege of Tyre, told him that he would deliver up to him those places that were in his power, and gladly accept him as his lord instead of king Darius. And when Alexander had received him kindly, Sanballat thereupon took courage and spoke to him about his plans. He told him that he had a son-in-law Manasseh, who was brother to the high priest Jaddus, and that there were many others of his own nation now with him that were desirous to have a temple in the region that was under him; and that it would be for the king's advantage to have the strength of the Jews divided into two, lest, if the nation was of one mind and united, upon any revolutionary attempt it should prove troublesome to him, as it had formerly proved to the kings of Assyria. Thereupon Alexander gave Sanballat leave to do so, and he used the utmost diligence, and built the temple, and made Manasseh the priest, and deemed it a very great honour that his daughter's children should have that dignity. But when the seven months of the siege of Tyre were over, and the two of the siege of Gaza, Sanballat died, and Alexander, when he had taken Gaza, made haste to go up to Jerusalem. And Jaddus the high priest, when he heard that, was in an agony and dread, not knowing how he should meet the Macedonians, since the king was displeased at his previous contumacy. He therefore ordered the people to make supplications, and to join him in offering sacrifice to God, whom he besought to protect and deliver the nation from the perils that were coming upon them. Thereupon God warned him in a dream, as he was asleep after he had offered sacrifice, to take courage, and adorn the city, and open the gates; that the rest were to appear in white garments, but that he and the priests were to meet the king in the garments proper to their order, without dread of any evil consequences, which the providence of God would prevent. Upon this, when he rose from his sleep, he greatly rejoiced; and declared to all the warning he had received from God, and acted entirely according to his dream, and waited for the coming of the king.

§ 5. And when he heard that the king was not far from the city, he went out in procession, with the priests and mass of the citizens. The procession was imposing, and the manner of it different from that of other nations. It reached a place called Sapha,<sup>1</sup> which word, translated into Greek, signifies a prospect, for you have thence a prospect both of Jerusalem and of the temple. Now when the Phœnicians and Chaldæans that followed the king thought they should have liberty to plunder the city, and torture the high priest to death, which the king's displeasure made probable, the very reverse of this happened. For Alexander, when he saw the multitude at a distance in white garments, while the priests stood clothed in their fine linen, and the high priest in purple and gold robes, with his mitre on his head, and the golden plate in it whereon the name of God was engraved, he approached by himself, and adored that Name, and first saluted the high priest. The Jews also with one voice saluted Alexander, and surrounded him, whereupon the kings of Syria and the rest were astonished at what Alexander had done, and supposed him disordered in mind. However, Parmenio alone went up to him, and asked him, "How it came to pass, that when all others adored him, he should adore the high priest of the Jews?" To whom he replied, "I did not adore him, but that God who has honoured him with the high priesthood. For I saw this very person in a dream in these very robes, when I was at Dium<sup>2</sup> in Macedonia, who, when I was considering with myself how I might obtain the dominion of Asia, exhorted me to make no delay, but boldly to cross over, for he would conduct my army, and would give me the dominion over the Persians. And so having seen no other in such robes, and now seeing this person in them, and remembering that vision, and the exhortation which I had in my dream, I believe that I bring this army under the divine conduct, and shall conquer Darius, and destroy the power of the Persians, and that all things will succeed according to what is in my mind." When he had said this to Parmenio, and had given the high priest his right hand, the priests ran along by him, and he entered the city. And when he went up into the temple, he offered sacrifice to God according to the high priest's direction, and handsomely treated both the high priest and the priests. And when the book of Daniel was shown him,<sup>1</sup> wherein Daniel declared that one of the Greeks should destroy the empire of the Persians, he supposed that he was the person meant, and full of joy dismissed the multitude for the present, but the next day called them to him, and bade them ask what favours they pleased of him. Thereupon the high priest begged that they might enjoy the laws of their forefathers, and might pay no tribute every seventh year, and he granted all they desired. And when they entreated him that he would permit the Jews in Babylon and Media to enjoy their own laws also, he willingly promised to do what they asked. And when he said to the people that if any of them would enlist in his army, on condition that they should continue in the laws of their forefathers, and live according to them, he was willing to take them with him, many engaged in his service.

§ 6. When Alexander had thus settled matters at Jerusalem, he led his army to the neighbouring cities. And as all the people to whom he went received him with great kindness, the Samaritans, who had then Shechem<sup>2</sup> for their metropolis (a city situate near Mount Gerizim, and inhabited by apostates of the Jewish nation), seeing that Alexander had so greatly honoured the Jews, determined to profess themselves Jews. For such is the disposition of the Samaritans, as I have already elsewhere stated, that when the Jews are in adversity they deny that they are akin to them, confessing then the truth; but when they perceive that some good fortune has befallen them, they immediately pretend to be related to them, saying that they belong to them, and trace their genealogy from the posterity of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh. Accordingly, they met the king with splendour, and exhibited great zeal for his person, at a little distance from Jerusalem. And when Alexander had commended them, the Shechemites approached him, having with them the troops that Sanballat had offered to send him, and they desired that he would come to their city and do honour to their temple also. And he promised that when he returned he would come to them. And when they petitioned that he would remit their tribute every seventh year, because they did not sow therein, he asked who they were that made such a petition. And when they said that they were Hebrews, but had the name of Sidonians living at Shechem, he asked them again, whether they were Jews; and when they said they were not Jews, "It was to the Jews," said he, "that I granted that privilege; however, when I return, and am more thoroughly informed by you of this matter, I will do what I shall think proper." And in this manner he took leave of the Shechemites: but ordered that the troops of Sanballat should follow him into Egypt, because he designed to give them lands there which he did a little after in the Thebaid,<sup>1</sup> having ordered them to garrison that country.

§ 7. Now when Alexander was dead, his dominions were divided among his successors, but the temple upon Mount Gerizim remained. And if any one were accused by those at Jerusalem of having eaten things common, or of having broken the Sabbath, or of any other offence of the like nature, he fled away to the Shechemites, and said that he was accused unjustly. About this time Jaddus the high priest died, and Onias his son succeeded him in the high priesthood. This was the state of the affairs of the people of Jerusalem at this time.

CHAP. I.

How Ptolemy, the Son of Lagus, took Jerusalem and Judæa by Deceit and Treachery, and carried many of the Jews thence and planted them in Egypt.

§ 1.

NOW, when Alexander, king of Macedon, had put an end to the dominion of the Persians, and had settled affairs in Judæa in the forementioned manner, he ended his life. And as his empire fell to many, Antigonus obtained Asia, Seleucus had Babylon and the other nations in that neighbourhood, Lysimachus got the Hellespont, and Cassander had Macedonia, and Ptolemy the son of Lagus got Egypt. And as these princes ambitiously strove one against another, every one for his own principality, it came to pass that there were continual and long wars, and the cities were sufferers, and lost a great many of their inhabitants in those times of distress, insomuch that all Syria through Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, underwent the reverse of that appellation of Saviour<sup>1</sup> which he then had. He also seized upon Jerusalem through deceit and treachery: for as he entered the city on a sabbath-day, as if he would offer sacrifice, he took the city without any trouble, as the Jews did not oppose him, for they did not suspect him to be their enemy, and they spent that day always in rest and quietness, and when he had made himself master of it, he ruled over it in a cruel manner. And Agatharchides of Cnidos,<sup>2</sup> the historian of the acts of Alexander's successors, reproaches us with superstition, as if we had by it lost our liberty, for his words are as follows. "There is a nation called the nation of the Jews, who inhabit a strong and great city, called Jerusalem, and allowed it to come into the hands of Ptolemy, being unwilling to take up arms, and so submitted to be under a hard master, because of their unseasonable superstition." This is what Agatharchides relates of our nation. But when Ptolemy had taken a great many captives, both from the mountainous parts of Judæa, and from the places about Jerusalem, and Samaria, and Mount Gerizim, he led them all into Egypt, and settled them there. And as he knew that the people of Jerusalem were most faithful in the observance of oaths and covenants, from the answer they made to Alexander when he sent an embassy to them after he had beaten Darius in battle, he distributed many of them into garrisons, and at Alexandria gave them equal privileges as citizens with the Macedonians themselves, and required of them to take oaths that they would keep fidelity to the posterity of him who committed those places to their care. And not a few other Jews went into Egypt of their own accord, attracted by the goodness of the soil and the liberality of Ptolemy. However, there were dissensions between their posterity and the Samaritans, on account of their determination to preserve that conduct of life which was delivered to them by their forefathers, and this was their contention; those of Jerusalem said that their temple was holy, and resolved to send their sacrifices there; but the Samaritans were resolved that they should be sent to Mount Gerizim.

CHAP. II.

How Ptolemy Philadelphus caused the Laws of the Jews to be translated into the Greek Tongue ; and set many Captives free ; and dedicated many Gifts to God.

§ 1.

WHEN Alexander had reigned twelve years, and after him Ptolemy Soter forty years, Ptolemy Philadelphus next had the kingdom of Egypt, and held it forty years save one. He caused the Jewish law to be interpreted, and set free a hundred and twenty thousand natives of Jerusalem who were in slavery in Egypt. The reason was as follows. Demetrius Phalereus, who was librarian to the king, was endeavouring, if it were possible, to collect all the books that were in the world, and to buy up whatever was anywhere valuable or agreeable, for he rivalled the king's inclination (who was very earnestly set upon collecting books). And when Ptolemy once asked him, How many myriads of books he had already collected ? he replied that he had already about two hundred thousand books, but that, in a little time, he should have five hundred thousand. He also said that he had been informed that there were many books of laws among the Jews, worth inquiring after and worthy of the king's library, but which, being written in characters and in a dialect of their own, would cause no small trouble to get translated into the Greek tongue ; for the character in which they were written seemed to be like that which was the proper character of the Syrians, and its sound, when pronounced, was like theirs also, and this sound appeared to be peculiar to them. So he said nothing hindered their getting those books translated also, for as nothing was wanting that was necessary for that purpose, they might have their books also in the library. So the king thought that Demetrius was very zealous to procure him abundance of books, and that he suggested what was exceeding proper, and he wrote to the Jewish high priest that this was to be done.

§ 2. Now there was one Aristæus, who was among the king's most intimate friends, and on account of his moderation very acceptable to him. This Aristæus had resolved frequently before now to petition the king that he would set all the captive Jews in his kingdom free; and he thought this a convenient opportunity for the making that petition. So he talked first with the captains of the king's body-guards, Sosibius of Tarentum<sup>1</sup> and Andreas, and besought them to assist him in what he was going to intercede with the king for. And Aristæus, having received their assent, went to the king, and made the following speech to him: "It is not right, O king, to allow ourselves to be deceived, but to lay the truth open. For since we have determined not only to get the laws of the Jews transcribed, but interpreted also, for thy satisfaction, by what means can we do this, while so many of the Jews are now slaves in thy kingdom? Do then what will be agreeable to thy magnanimity and good nature; free them from the miserable condition they are in, for that God, who supporteth thy kingdom, was the author of their laws, as I have learned by particular inquiry; for both these people, and we also, worship the same God, the framer of all things. We call him, and that truly, by the name of Zeus,<sup>2</sup> because he breathes life into all men. Wherefore do thou restore these men to their country for the honour of God, because they pay peculiarly excellent worship to him. And know this further, that though I be not akin to them by race, nor one of the same country with them, yet do I desire these favours to be done them, since all men are the workmanship of God; and I am sensible that he is well pleased with those that do good. I therefore put up this petition to thee, to do good to them."

§ 3. When Aristæus had said this, the king looked upon him with a cheerful and joyful countenance, and said, "How many ten thousands dost thou suppose there are of such as are to be made free?" To which Andreas, who stood by, replied, and said, "A few more than ten times ten thousand." The king made answer, "And is this a small gift that thou askest, Aristæus?" But Sosibius, and the rest that stood by, said, that he ought to offer such a thank-offering, as was worthy of his greatness of soul, to that God who had given him his kingdom. With this answer he was much pleased, and gave order, that when they paid the soldiers their wages, they should lay down twenty drachmæ for every one of the slaves. And he promised to publish a magnificent decree, about what they requested, which should confirm what Aristæus had proposed, and especially what God willed should be done; whereby he said he would not only set those free who had been led away captive by his father and his army, but those who were in his kingdom before, and those also, if any such there were, who had been brought away since. And when they said that their redemption money would amount to over four hundred talents, he granted it. A copy of this decree I have determined to preserve, that the magnanimity of this king might be made known. Its contents were as follows. "Let all those who were soldiers under our father, and who, when they overran Syria and Phœnicia, and laid waste Judæa, took the Jews captives, and made them slaves, and brought them into our cities and into our country, and then sold them, set them free, as also all those that were in my kingdom before them, and if there be any that have been lately brought thither, let their owners receive twenty drachmæ for every slave; and let the soldiers receive this redemption money with their pay, but the rest out of the king's treasury. For I suppose that they were made captives without our father's consent and against equity, and that their country was harassed by the licence of our soldiers, who, by removing them into Egypt, made a great profit out of them. Out of regard therefore to justice, and out of pity to those that have been oppressed contrary to equity, I enjoin those that have Jews in their service to set them at liberty upon receipt of the before-mentioned sum, and that no one use any deceit about them, but obey what is here commanded. And I will that they give in their names, within three days after the publication of this edict, to such as are appointed to carry it out, and produce the slaves before them also, for I think this will be for the advantage of my affairs. And let every one that will inform against those that do not obey this decree, and I will that their estates be confiscated to the king's treasury." When this decree was read to the king, it at first contained all else that is here inserted, but only omitted those Jews that had been brought into captivity formerly and afterwards, who had not been distinctly mentioned, so that he himself added these clauses out of his humanity and great generosity. He also gave order that the payment, which was to take place all at once, should be divided among the king's ministers and the officers of his treasury. When this was done, what the king had decreed was quickly brought to a conclusion in no more than seven days' time, the number of talents paid for the captives being above four hundred and sixty, and that because their masters required the twenty drachmæ for the children also, the king having in effect commanded that these should be paid for, when he said in his decree that they should receive the fore-mentioned sum for every slave.

§ 4. Now when this had been done in so magnificent a manner according to the king's will, the king ordered Demetrius to give him in writing his sentiments concerning the transcribing of the Jewish books; for nothing is done rashly by these kings, but all things are managed with great circumspection. So I have subjoined a copy of these letters, and set down the number of the vessels sent as gifts [to Jerusalem], and the construction of every one, that the carefulness of the artificer's workmanship, as it appeared to those that saw it, and which workman made every vessel, might be made manifest, and that on account of the excellency of the vessels themselves. Now the copy of the letter runs as follows. "Demetrius to the great king. As thou, O king, gavest me a charge concerning the collection of books that were still wanting to fill thy library, and concerning the care that ought to be taken about such as are imperfect, I have used the utmost diligence about those matters; and I inform thee that we want the books of the Jewish legislation, with some others. For they are written in the Hebrew characters, and being in the language of that nation are to us unintelligible. It has also happened to them, that they have been transcribed more carelessly than they ought to have been, because they have not hitherto had royal care taken about them. Now it is necessary that thou shouldest have accurate copies of them.

And indeed this legislation is full of wisdom and pure as proceeding from God. That is why, as Hecateus of Abdera<sup>1</sup> says, the poets and historians make no mention of it, nor of those men who lead their lives according to it, since it is a holy law, and not to be published by profane mouths. If then it please thee, O king, thou wilt write to the high priest of the Jews, to send six of the elders out of every tribe who are most skilful in the understanding of the laws, that by them we may learn the clear and harmonious sense of these books; and may obtain an accurate interpretation of their contents, and so may have such a collection of them as may be worthy of thy desire."

§ 5. When this letter was sent to the king, he commanded that a letter should be written to Eleazar, the high priest of the Jews, concerning these matters, and that they should inform him at the same time of the release of the Jews that had been in slavery among them. He also sent fifty talents of gold for the making of large basons vials and cups, and an immense quantity of precious stones. He also gave orders to those who had the custody of the chests that contained these stones, to give the artificers leave to choose out what sorts of them they pleased. He also ordered that a hundred talents in money should be sent to the temple for the sacrifices and for other uses. Now I will give a description of these vessels, and the manner of their construction, but not till after I have transcribed a copy of the letter which was written to Eleazar the high priest, who had obtained that dignity on the following account. When Onias the high priest was dead, his son Simon became his successor, who was called the Just, both because of his piety towards God, and his kind disposition to those of his own nation. When he died, and left only an infant son who was called Onias, Simon's brother Eleazar, of whom we are speaking, took the high priesthood; and he it was to whom Ptolemy wrote as follows. "King Ptolemy to Eleazar the high priest greeting. There are many Jews who now dwell in my kingdom, whom the Persians, when they were in power, carried away captive. These were honoured by my father; some of them he placed in the army, and gave them greater pay than usual; to others of them, who went with him into Egypt, he committed his garrisons and the guard of them, that they might be a terror to the Egyptians. And when I had succeeded to the kingdom, I treated all men with humanity, and especially those that are thy fellow-citizens, of whom I have set free above a hundred thousand that were slaves, and paid the price of their redemption to their masters out of my own revenues; and I have admitted those that are of a fit age into the number of my soldiers. And such as are capable of being faithful to me, and fit for my court, I have put in such a post, thinking this to be a very great and acceptable gift which I devote to God for his providence over me. And as I am desirous to do what will be gratifying to them and all the other Jews in the world, I have determined to procure an interpretation of your law, and to have it translated out of Hebrew into Greek, and put in my library. Thou wilt therefore do well to choose out and send to me six men of good character out of every tribe, who are now advanced in age. These by their age will be skilful in the laws, and able to make accurate interpretation of them: and when this shall be finished, I think that I shall have done a glorious work. And I have sent to thee Andreas, the captain of my body-guard, and Aristæus, men whom I hold in very great esteem, to discuss these matters with thee, by whom also I have sent those first-fruits which I have dedicated to the temple, and to the sacrifices, and to other uses, to the value of a hundred talents. And if thou wilt let us know what thou wouldst have further, thou wilt do a thing acceptable to me."

§ 6. When this letter of the king was brought to Eleazar, he wrote an answer to it with all the eagerness possible. "Eleazar the high priest to king Ptolemy greeting. If thou and thy queen Arsinoe, and thy children, be well, it is well with us. When we received thy letter, we greatly rejoiced at thy intentions: and when the multitude were gathered together, we read it to them, and thereby made them sensible of the piety thou hast towards God. We also showed them the twenty vials of gold which thou didst send, and thirty of silver, and the five large basons, and the table for the show-bread ; as also the hundred talents for the sacrifices, and for making whatever shall be needful for the temple. These things Andreas and Aristæus, those most honoured friends of thine, have brought us : and truly they are persons of an excellent character, and of great learning, and worthy of thy virtue. Know, then, that we will gratify thee in this matter for thy advantage, though we do what is unusual, for we ought to make a return for the numerous acts of kindness which thou hast done to our countrymen. We immediately, therefore, offered sacrifices for thee and thy sister,<sup>1</sup> thy children and friends ; and the people offered up prayers that thy affairs might be to thy mind, and that thy kingdom might be preserved in peace, and that the translation of our law might come to the conclusion thou desirest, and be for thy advantage. We have also chosen six elders out of every tribe, whom we have sent, and the law with them. It will be only like thy piety and justice, to return the law when it has been translated, and to send back those to us in safety that bring it. Farewell."

§ 7. This was the reply which the high priest made. But it does not seem to me to be necessary to transcribe the names of the seventy elders who were sent by Eleazar, and carried the law. Their names were set down at the end of the letter. However, I think it not improper to give an account of those very valuable and artistic presents which the king sent to God, that all may see how great a regard the king had for God. For the king allowed vast sums for them, and often visited the workmen, and viewed their works, and suffered no carelessness or negligence to damage their operations. And I will relate how magnificent all were as well as I am able, although perhaps the nature of this history does not require such a description, but I imagine I shall thereby recommend the elegant taste and generosity of this king to those that read this history.

§ 8. And first I will describe what belongs to the table. It was indeed in the king's mind to make this table vastly large in its dimensions ; but he gave orders that they should learn what was the size of the table which was already at Jerusalem, and whether it were possible to make one larger than it. And when he was informed how large that was which was already there, and that nothing hindered but a larger might be made, he said he was willing to have one made that should be five times as large as the present table, but his fear was that it might be useless in their sacred ministrations, if it were too large, for he desired that the gifts he presented them should not only be for show, but should be useful also in their sacred ministrations. Inferring therefore that the former table was made of so moderate a size for use, and not for want of gold, he resolved that he would not exceed the former table in size, but would make it exceed it in the variety and beauty of its materials. And as he was quick in observing the nature of all things, and in having a just notion of what was new and surprising, where there were no delineations, he would invent such as were proper by his own skill, and would show them to the workmen, and command that such should be made, and that those which were delineated should be most accurately copied with a constant regard to their delineation.

§ 9. When therefore the workmen had undertaken to make the table, they fashioned it in length two cubits and a half, in breadth one cubit, and in height one cubit and a half, and the entire structure was of gold. They also made a crown of a handbreadth round it, with wave-work wreathed about it, and with carving which imitated a cord, and was admirably turned on its three parts; for as they were of a triangular figure, every angle had the same outline, so that when you turned them about, there was the very same form without any variation. Now that part of the crown-work that was enclosed under the table was very beautifully carved, but that part which went round on the outside was more elaborately adorned with most beautiful ornaments, because it was exposed to sight and view. And so it was that both those sides which were above the rest were acute, and none of the angles, which I before said there were, appeared less than another, when the table was turned about. Now into the cord-work thus turned precious stones were inserted in rows parallel one to the other, enclosed in golden buttons which had holes in them; but the parts which were on the side of the crown, and were exposed to sight, were adorned with a row of oval figures obliquely placed, of the most excellent sort of precious stones, which imitated rods laid close, and ran round the table. And under these oval figures thus engraven the workmen had put a crown all round, where the nature of all sorts of fruit was represented, insomuch that bunches of grapes hung, and corn and pomegranates were also represented. And when they had made the stones to represent all the kinds of fruit before mentioned, each with its proper colour, they made them fast with gold round the whole table. The like disposition of the oval figures, and of the engraved rods, was made under the crown, that the table might on each side show the same appearance of variety and elegance in its ornaments, so that neither the position of the wave-work nor of the crown might be different, although the table were turned on the other side, but that the appearance of the same artificial contrivances might reach as far as the feet. For they made a plate of gold four fingers broad along the entire breadth of the table, into which they inserted the feet, and then fastened them to the table by buttons and button-holes, at the place where the crown was situate, that so, whatever side the table stood, it might exhibit the very same view of the exquisite workmanship, and of the vast expense bestowed upon it. And upon the table itself they engraved a mæander, inserting very valuable stones in the middle of it, like stars of various colours, as the carbuncle and the emerald, each of which sent out most agreeable rays of light to the spectators, and such stones of other sorts also as were most curious and best esteemed, as being most precious in their kind. Hard by this mæander a texture of network ran round, the middle of which appeared like a rhombus, into which were inserted rock crystal and amber, which by their alternation gave wonderful delight to those that saw them. The chapters of the feet imitated the buddings of lilies, while their leaves were bent under the table, but so that the chives were seen standing upright within them. Their base was made of a carbuncle, it was one palm in depth, and eight fingers in breadth. Now they had engraven upon each of the feet, with a very fine tool and with a great deal of pains, ivy and tendrils of the vine with clusters of grapes, so natural that you would guess they were real tendrils, for they were so very thin, and so stood out at their extremities, that they moved with the wind, and made one believe that they were the product of nature, and not the imitation of art. They also made the entire workmanship of the table appear to be threefold, and the joints of the several parts were so deftly united together as to be invisible, and the places where they were joined could not be distinguished. Now the thickness of the table was not less than half a cubit. So that this gift, by the king's great generosity, by the great value of the materials, and the variety of its exquisite structure, and the artificer's skill in imitating nature with graving-tools, was at length brought to perfection, the king being very desirous that, though in size it was not to be different from that which was already dedicated to God, yet in exquisite workmanship, and novelty of contrivance, and in splendour of construction, it should far exceed it, and be more notable than that was.

§ 10. There were also two bowls of gold, ornamented with scaly-work from its base half way up, with various sorts of stone chased in the coils. Next to which there was upon it a mæander a cubit in height, composed of stones of all sorts of colours. And next to this was rod-work engraven, and next to that was a rhombus in a texture of net-work, extending to the brim of the bowl, while small shields made of stones, beautiful in their kind, and of four fingers' depth, filled up the middle parts. Round the brim of the bowl were wreathed leaves of lilies and convolulus, and tendrils of vines. And this was the construction of the two bowls of gold, each containing two firkins. But those which were of silver were much more bright and splendid than mirrors, and you might see your countenance in them more plainly than in mirrors. The king also had thirty vials made, of which the parts that were of gold, and not filled up with precious stones, were shaded over with leaves of ivy and vines artificially engraven. And these vessels were in an extraordinary manner brought to this perfection, partly by the skill of the workmen who were admirable in such fine work, but much more by the diligence and munificence of the king, who not only supplied the artificers abundantly and with great generosity with whatever they wanted, but also forbade public audiences for the time, and came and stood by the workmen, and saw the whole operation. And this was the reason why the workmen exhibited such diligence, that they had regard to the king, and to his great concern about the vessels, and so kept the more closely to their work.

§ 11. These were the gifts sent by Ptolemy to Jerusalem, and dedicated to God there. And when Eleazar the high priest had devoted them to God, and had paid due respect to those that brought them, and had given them presents to take back to the king, he dismissed them. And when they were come to Alexandria, and Ptolemy heard that they were come, and that the seventy elders were come also, he sent at once for Andreas and Aristæus, his ambassadors, who came to him, and delivered him the letters which they had brought him from the high priest, and made answer to all the questions he put to them by word of mouth. He then desired to see the elders that came from Jerusalem to interpret the laws, and ordered that everybody who came on other errands should be sent away, which was a thing surprising and unusual for him to do, for those that were drawn thither upon such occasions used to come to him on the fifth day, but ambassadors at the month's end. But now he sent those away, and waited for these that were sent by Eleazar. And when the old men came in with the presents which the high priest had given them to bring to the king, and with the parchments upon which they had their laws written in golden letters, he put questions to them concerning those books; and when they had taken off the covers wherein they were wrapped, they showed him the parchments. And the king admired the thinness of those membranes, and the exactness of the junctures which could not be perceived (so exactly were they connected with one another); and this he did for a considerable time. He then said that he returned them thanks for coming to him, and still greater thanks to him that sent them, and, above all, to that God whose laws they happened to be. Then did the elders, and those that were present with them, cry out with one voice, wishing all happiness to the king. Upon which he fell into tears from excess of pleasure, it being natural to men to show the same emotion in great joy that they do in sorrow. And when he had bidden them deliver the books to those that were appointed to receive them, he greeted the men, and said that it was but right to speak first of the errand he had sent for them to execute, and then to address himself to them. He promised, however, that he would celebrate this day on which they came to him as a remarkable and eminent one every year throughout his whole life. For their coming to him, and the victory which he gained over Antigonus<sup>1</sup> by sea, happened to be on the very same day. He also invited them to sup with him, and ordered that they should have excellent lodgings provided for them in the upper part of the city.

§ 12. Now he that was appointed to take care of the reception of strangers, Nicanor by name, called for Dorotheus, whose duty it was to make provision for them, and bade him prepare for everyone of them what should be requisite for their diet. Now things were ordered by the king in the following manner; he took care for those that belonged to every city, that did not use the same way of living, that all things should be prepared for those that visited him according to their custom, that being feasted according to their usual method of living, they might be the better pleased, and might not be offended at anything as strange. And this was now done in the case of these men by Dorotheus, who was put into this office because of his great skill in matters belonging to life. So Nicanor by him made all arrangements for their reception, and appointed them seats to sit on in two places, according as the king had commanded him to do; for he had commanded that half of them should be set beside him, and the other half behind his table, and he took care that no respect should be omitted that could be shown them. And when they were thus set down, he bade Dorotheus to minister to all those that had come to him from Judæa in the manner they were used to. So he declined the services of the sacred heralds, and those that slew the sacrifices, and the rest that used to offer prayers, but called one of those that were come to him, whose name was Eleazar, who was a priest, and desired him to say prayers. So he stood in the midst and prayed that all prosperity might attend the king and his subjects. Upon this acclamation was made by the whole company with joy and great noise; and when that was over, they fell to eating their supper, and to the enjoyment of what was set before them. And after a little interval, when the king thought sufficient time had been given, he began to talk philosophically to them, and he asked every one of them some physical questions and such as might throw light on such inquiries; and when they had explained all that had been asked by the king on every point, he was well pleased with their answers. This took up the twelve days in which they were entertained, and whoever pleases may learn the particular questions in that book of Aristæus', which he wrote on this very occasion.

§ 13. And as not only the king but the philosopher Menedemus also admired them, who said that all things were governed by providence, and that it was probable that thence it was that such force and beauty was discovered in these men's words, they then left off asking any more such questions. And the king said that he had gained very great advantages by their coming, for he had received this profit from them, that he had learned how he ought to rule his subjects. And he ordered that they should have three talents apiece given them, and that they should be conducted to where they were to lodge. And after three days had elapsed, Demetrius took them and went over seven furlongs to an embankment in the sea near an island. And when they had gone over the bridge, he proceeded to the northern parts, and showed them where they should meet, which was in a house that was built near the shore, which was a quiet place, and fit for their considering their work. When he had taken them there, he entreated them, (now they had all things about them which they wanted for the interpretation of their law,) that they would suffer nothing to interrupt them in their work. Accordingly, they made an accurate interpretation with great zeal and great pains, and continued to do this till the ninth hour of the day, when they rested and took care of their body, as food was provided for them in great plenty: Dorotheus also, at the king's command, brought them a great deal of what was provided for the king himself. And in the morning they went to the court, and saluted Ptolemy, and then went back to their former place, where, when they had washed their hands in the sea and bathed, they betook themselves to the interpretation of the laws. Now when the law was transcribed, and the labour of interpretation was over, which came to an end in seventy-two days, Demetrius gathered all the Jews together to the place where the laws were translated, and where the interpreters also were, and read them over. And the multitude approved of those elders that were the interpreters of the law, and also commended Demetrius for his proposal, as the inventor of what was greatly for their happiness, and begged that he would give leave to their rulers also to read the law. Moreover they all, both the priest and the elders, who had been the interpreters, and the principal men of their commonwealth, made it their request, since the interpretation was happily finished, that it might continue in the state it now was, and might not be altered. And when they all commended that idea, they enjoined, if anyone observed either anything superfluous, or anything omitted, that he would review it again, and have it laid before them and corrected; which was a wise action of theirs, that as the thing was judged to have been well done, it might continue for ever.

§ 14. And the king rejoiced, when he saw that his design in this matter was so usefully carried out; and he was especially delighted with hearing the laws read to him, and was astonished at the mind and wisdom of the legislator. And he began to ask Demetrius, "How it came to pass, since this legislation was so wonderful, that no one, either of the poets or of the historians, had made mention of it." Demetrius made answer, that no one had ventured to touch upon the description of those laws, because they were divine and venerable, and because some that had attempted it had been afflicted by God. He also told him, that Theopompus had been desirous of writing something about them, but was disturbed in his mind for more than thirty days, but upon some intermission of his mental malady, he appeased

God [by prayer], suspecting that his madness proceeded from that cause. Nay, indeed, he further saw in a dream, that his mental malady befell him because he indulged too great a curiosity about divine matters, and was desirous of publishing them to profane men; and when he left off the attempt, he recovered his understanding again. Moreover he informed him of Theodectes the tragic poet, of whom it was reported, that when, in a certain play, he was desirous to make mention of things that were contained in the sacred books, he was afflicted with a disease in his eyes; and that, upon his recognizing the cause of his disease, and appeasing God [by prayer], he was freed from it.

§ 15. And when the king had received these books from Demetrius, as I have already said, he venerated them, and gave order that great care should be taken of them, that they might remain uninjured. He also desired that the interpreters would come often to him from Judæa, for it would be profitable, he said, to them both on account of the respect that he would pay them and the presents he would make them: for he said it was now but right to send them away, but if of their own accord they would come to him hereafter, they should obtain all that their wisdom deserved, and his generosity was able to give them. So he sent them away for the time, and gave to every one of them three excellent garments, and two talents of gold, and a cup of the value of one talent, and the couch whereon they had feasted. And these were the things he presented to them. Also he sent by them to Eleazar the high priest ten beds with feet of silver, and the furniture belonging to them and a cup of the value of thirty talents; and besides these ten garments and a purple robe, and a very beautiful crown, and a hundred pieces of the finest woven linen, as also vials and dishes and ewers and two golden bowls to be dedicated to God. He also desired him by letter to give these interpreters leave, if any of them were desirous of visiting him again, because he highly valued the company of men of such learning, and would be very willing to lay out his wealth upon such men. Such was what came to the Jews, to their glory and honour, from Ptolemy Philadelphus.

CHAP. III.

How the Kings of Asia honoured the Nation of the Jews, and made them Citizens of the Cities which they built.

§ 1.

THE Jews also obtained honours from the kings of Asia, when they served with them. For Seleucus Nicator made them citizens of the cities which he built in Asia and in Lower Syria, and in the metropolis itself, Antioch;<sup>1</sup> and gave them privileges equal to those of the Macedonians and Greeks who dwelt there, insomuch that those privileges continue to this very day. A proof of this is that, as the Jews will not use oil prepared by foreigners, they receive a certain sum of money from the superintendents of the gymnasiums as the value of that oil; and when the people of Antioch would have deprived them of that money in the last war, Mucianus, who was then governor of Syria, secured it to them. And after that, when Vespasian and his son Titus were masters of the world, when the people of Alexandria and of Antioch prayed that these privileges of citizenship might be taken away, they did not obtain their request. In this behaviour any one may see the equity and generosity of the Romans, especially of Vespasian and Titus, who although they had had a great deal of trouble in the war against the Jews, and were exasperated against them, because they did not deliver up their arms, but continued the war to the very last, yet did not take away any of their before-mentioned privileges of citizenship, but restrained their anger; and resisted the prayers of the Alexandrians and Antiochians, who were very powerful people, insomuch that they did not yield to them, either out of their favour to them, or out of their hatred to those whom they had subdued in war; nor would they repeal any of the ancient favours granted to the Jews, but said that those who had borne arms and fought against them had paid the penalty, and that it was not just to deprive those that had not offended of the privileges they enjoyed.

§ 2. We also know that Marcus Agrippa was similarly affected to the Jews. For when the Ionians were very angry with them, and besought Agrippa that they only might have those privileges of citizenship which Antiochus,<sup>1</sup> the grandson of Seleucus, (who by the Greeks was called God,) had bestowed on them, and asked if the Jews were to be joint-partakers with them, that they might be obliged to worship the gods they themselves worshipped, when these matters were brought to trial, the Jews prevailed, and obtained leave to use their own customs, Nicolaus of Damascus pleading their cause, for Agrippa declared that it was not lawful for him to make any change. And if any one has a mind to know this matter accurately, let him peruse the hundred and twenty-third and hundred and twenty-fourth books of the history of this Nicolaus. Now, as to this determination of Agrippa, it is not perhaps so much to be admired, for at this time our nation had not made war against the Romans. But one may well be astonished at the magnanimity of Vespasian and Titus, that after such great wars and struggles as they had with us, they should use such moderation. But I will now return to that part of my history whence I made the present digression.

§ 3. It happened in the reign of Antiochus the Great,<sup>2</sup> who ruled over all Asia, that the Jews, as well as the inhabitants of Cœle-Syria, suffered greatly, and their land was sorely harassed: for as he was at war with Ptolemy Philopator, and with his son Ptolemy, who was called Epiphanes, it fell out that these nations were equally sufferers, both when he was beaten and when he was victorious, so that they were very like a ship in a storm, which is tossed by the waves on both sides, for just thus were they in their situation, in the middle between Antiochus's prosperity and reverses. But when Antiochus had beaten Ptolemy he seized upon Judæa: and when Philopator was dead his son sent out a great army under Scopas as general against the inhabitants of Cœle-Syria, who took many of their cities and also our nation, which, when he warred against it, went over to him. But not long afterwards Antiochus overcame Scopas, in a battle fought at the fountains of the Jordan,<sup>1</sup> and destroyed a great part of his army. And afterwards, when Antiochus subdued those cities of Cœle-Syria which Scopas had got into his possession, and Samaria among them, the Jews of their own accord went over to him, and received him into their city [Jerusalem,] and gave plentiful provision to all his army and to his elephants, and readily assisted him when he besieged the garrison that had been left by Scopas in the citadel of Jerusalem. Thereupon Antiochus thought it but just to requite the Jews' diligence and zeal in his service, so he wrote to the generals of his armies, and to his friends, and bore testimony to the good behaviour of the Jews towards him, and informed them what rewards he had resolved to bestow on them for that behaviour. I will soon give the letters which he wrote to his generals concerning them, but will first produce the testimony of Polybius of Megalopolis,<sup>2</sup> who thus speaks in the sixteenth book of his history. "Now Scopas, the general of Ptolemy's army, marched to the upper parts of the country, and in the winter-time overthrew the nation of the Jews." He also says in the same book, "When Scopas was conquered by Antiochus, Antiochus took Batanæa<sup>3</sup> and Samaria<sup>4</sup> and Abila<sup>5</sup> and Gadara,<sup>6</sup> and shortly afterwards, there came to him those Jews that dwelt near the holy place which was called Jerusalem, concerning which, although I have more to say, and particularly concerning the presence of God in that holy place, yet do I put off that history to another time." This is what Polybius relates. But I will return to my narrative, when I have first produced the letters of king Antiochus.

" KING ANTIOCHUS TO PTOLEMY GREETING.

" Since the Jews, on our first entrance into their country, showed their friendship towards us, and when we came to their city [Jerusalem,] received us in a splendid manner, and came to meet us with their senate, and gave abundance of provisions to our soldiers and to the elephants, and joined with us in driving out the garrison of Egyptians that were in the citadel, I have thought fit to reward them, and to repair the condition of their city, which has been greatly injured by the reverses which have befallen its inhabitants, and to bring those that have been dispersed abroad back to it. And, in the first place, I have determined, on account of their piety, to bestow on them, as a contribution to their sacrifices of animals that are fit for sacrifice, and to their wine and oil and frankincense, twenty thousand pieces of silver, and six sacred artabæ of fine flour, and a thousand four hundred and sixty medimni of wheat, and three hundred and seventy-five medimni of salt. And these payments I will have fully paid them, as I have ordered. I will also have the work about the temple finished, and the porticoes, and if there be anything else that wants building. As for the material of wood, let it be brought out of Judæa itself and other countries, and from Libanus, tax free: and the same I will have observed as to those other materials which will be necessary, in order to render the temple more glorious. And let all of that nation live according to the laws of their own country; and let the senate and the priests, and the scribes of the temple, and the sacred singers, be discharged from the poll-tax and crown-tax and other taxes also. And that the city may the sooner be inhabited, I grant a discharge from taxes for three years to its present inhabitants, and to such as shall migrate to it before the month Hyperberetæus. I also discharge them for the future from a third part of their tribute, that the losses they have sustained may be repaired. As to all those that have been carried away from their city, and are become slaves, we grant to them and their children their freedom, and order that their substance be restored to them."

§ 4. These were the contents of his letter. He also published a decree throughout all his kingdom, in honour of the temple, which contained what follows. "It shall be lawful for no foreigner to come within the precincts of the temple, which is forbidden also to the Jews, unless to those who have purified themselves according to their national custom. Nor let any flesh of horses, or of mules, or of wild or tame asses, be brought into the city, or of leopards, foxes, or hares, or in general of any animal which is forbidden to the Jews. Nor let their skins be brought into it, nor let any such animal be bred in the city. Let them only be permitted to use the sacrifices derived from their forefathers, with which they are obliged to appease God. And he that transgresseth any of these orders, let him pay to the priests three thousand drachmæ of silver." Antiochus also bore testimony to our piety and fidelity in a letter of his, written when he was informed of a rebellion in Phrygia and Lydia, when he was in the upper satrapies, wherein he commanded Zeuxis, the general of his forces, and his most intimate friend, to send some of our nation out of Babylon into Phrygia. The letter was as follows.

"KING ANTIOCHUS TO ZEUXIS HIS FATHER GREETING.

"If you are in health it is well, I am also in health. Having been informed that a rebellion has broken out in Lydia and Phrygia, I thought the matter required great care: and upon deliberating with my friends what was to be done, have resolved to remove two thousand families of Jews, with their effects, out of Mesopotamia and Babylon, unto the garrisons and places that lie most convenient. For I am persuaded that they will be well-disposed guardians of my dominions, because of their piety towards God, and because I know that my predecessors have borne witness to them, that they are faithful, and do with alacrity what they are desired to do. I will, therefore, though it be a laborious work, that thou remove these Jews, promising them that they shall be permitted to use their own laws. And when thou shalt have brought them to the places indicated, thou shalt give everyone of them a place for building their houses, and a piece of land to cultivate and to plant their vines on, and thou shalt discharge them from paying taxes of the fruits of the earth for ten years: and let them have a sufficient quantity of wheat for the maintenance of their servants, until they get corn out of the earth: also let a sufficient share be given to such as minister to them in the necessaries of life, that, being treated by us with humanity, they may show themselves the more zealous of our interests. Take care likewise of that nation, as far as thou art able, that they may not be troubled by anyone." Now this testimony which I have produced is sufficient to declare the friendship that Antiochus the Great had to the Jews.

CHAP. IV.

How Antiochus made a league with Ptolemy, and how Onias provoked Ptolemy Evergetes to Anger, and how Joseph brought things all right again, and entered into Friendship with him, also the other things which were done by Joseph and his son Hyrcanus.

§ 1.

AFTER this, Antiochus made a friendship and league with Ptolemy,<sup>1</sup> and gave him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, and yielded up to him Cœle-Syria and Samaria and Judæa and Phœnicia by way of dowry. And upon the division of the taxes between the two kings, all the principal men farmed the taxes of their several countries, and, collecting the sum that was assigned to them, paid the same to the two kings. Now at this time the Samaritans were in a flourishing condition, and much harassed the Jews, ravaging their land, and carrying off slaves. This happened when Onias was high priest, for after Eleazar's death, his uncle Manasseh took the priesthood, and when he too had ended his life, Onias received that dignity. He was the son of Simon, who was called the Just, and Simon was the brother of Eleazar, as I said before. This Onias had a little soul, and was a great lover of money; and for that reason, because he did not pay the tax of twenty talents of silver for the people, which his forefathers paid to these kings out of their own estates, he provoked to anger king Ptolemy Euergetes,<sup>1</sup> who was the father of Philopator.<sup>2</sup> Euergetes sent an ambassador to Jerusalem, and complained that Onias did not pay the taxes, and threatened that if he did not receive them he would parcel out their land, and send soldiers to dwell upon it. When the Jews heard this message of the king, they were confounded: but so avaricious was Onias, that nothing of this put him about.

§ 2. Now there was one Joseph, young indeed in age, but of great reputation among the people of Jerusalem for character, sense, and uprightness. His father's name was Tobias, and his mother was the sister of Onias the high priest. She informed him of the coming of the ambassador, for he was then sojourning at a village called Phicol,<sup>3</sup> his native place. And he went to Jerusalem, and reproved Onias for not seeing to the preservation of his countrymen, but bringing the nation into dangers, by not paying this money, though it was for their benefit that he had received the authority over them, and had been made high priest: but if he was so great a lover of money, as to have the heart to see his country in danger on that account, and the citizens suffering the greatest damage, he advised him to go to the king, and petition him to remit either the whole or a part of the sum demanded. Onias's answer was that he did not care for his authority, and was ready, if it were possible, to lay down his high priesthood, and that he would not go to the king, for he cared nothing at all about the matter. Joseph then asked him, if he would give him leave to go as ambassador on behalf of the nation? He replied that he would. Thereupon Joseph went up into the temple, and called the multitude together to an assembly, and exhorted them not to be disturbed or alarmed because of his uncle Onias's carelessness, but desired them to be at rest, and not to terrify themselves with fear about it; for he promised them that he would be their ambassador to the king, and persuade him that they had done him no wrong. And when the multitude heard this, they returned thanks to Joseph. So he went down from the temple, and treated Ptolemy's ambassador in a hospitable manner, and presented him also with rich gifts, and feasted him magnificently for many days, and then sent him on to the king before him, and told him that he would soon follow him. For he was now still more desirous to go to the king, from the encouragement of the ambassador, who urged him to go to Egypt, and promised him that he would take care that he should obtain everything that he desired of Ptolemy, for he was highly pleased with his liberality and the gravity of his deportment.

§ 3. When Ptolemy's ambassador reached Egypt, he told the king of the thoughtlessness of Onias, and informed him of the good disposition of Joseph, who was coming to him to excuse the multitude, as not having done him any harm, for he was their champion. In short he was so very profuse in his encomiums upon the young man, that he disposed both the king and his wife Cleopatra to have a kindness for him before he arrived. And Joseph sent to his friends at Samaria, and borrowed money of them, and got ready what was necessary for his journey, clothes and cups and beasts of burden, which cost about twenty thousand drachmæ, and set out for Alexandria. Now it so happened that at this time all the principal men and rulers went up from the cities of Syria and Phœnicia to buy the taxes; for every year the king sold them to the well-to-do men in each city. And these men saw Joseph journeying on his way, and jeered at him for his poverty and meanness. But when he got to Alexandria, and heard that king Ptolemy was at Memphis, he went up there to meet him. And as the king was sitting in his chariot with his wife and friend Athenion (who was the very person who had been ambassador at Jerusalem, and been entertained by Joseph,) directly Athenion saw him, he at once made him known to the king, saying this was the person about whom on his return from Jerusalem he had told the king how good and generous a young man he was. So Ptolemy saluted him first, and desired him to come up into his chariot, and as Joseph sat there, began to complain of the behaviour of Onias. To which Joseph answered, "Forgive him on account of his age, for thou canst not certainly be unacquainted with this fact, that old men and infants have their minds exactly alike; but thou shalt have from us, who are young men, everything thou desirest, and shalt have no cause to complain." The king was so delighted with the grace and pleasantry of the young man, that he began already, as though he had had long experience of him, to have still greater affection for him, insomuch that he bade him lodge in his palace, and be a guest at his table every day. And when the king was come to Alexandria, the principal men of Syria saw Joseph sitting with the king, and were much offended at it.

§ 4. Now when the day came, on which the king was to farm the taxes of the cities, and those that were the men of principal dignity in their several countries bid for them, the sum of what was bidden for the taxes of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia and Judæa and Samaria amounted altogether to eight thousand talents. Thereupon Joseph accused the bidders of having agreed together to estimate the value of the taxes at too low a rate, and promised that he would himself give twice as much for them, and for those who did not pay, he would send the king their whole substance, for this privilege was also sold with the taxes. The king was pleased to hear that offer, and because it augmented his revenues, he said he would confirm the sale of the taxes to him. But when he asked him the question, Whether he had any sureties, that would be bound for the payment of the money? he answered very cleverly, "I will give as security persons good and honourable, whom you shall have no reason to distrust." And when he bade him name who they were, he replied, "I give thee no other persons, O king, for my sureties than thyself and thy wife; and you shall be security for both parties." Then Ptolemy laughed at the proposal, and granted him the farming of the taxes without any security. This was a sore grief to those who had come into Egypt from the cities to be thus outbid, and they returned home everyone with shame.

§ 5. And Joseph took with him two thousand foot-soldiers of the king's, for he desired to have some assistance, in order to force such as were refractory in the cities to pay. And borrowing five hundred talents from the king's friends at Alexandria, he started for Syria. And when he got to Ascalon,<sup>1</sup> and demanded the taxes of the people of Ascalon, they refused to pay anything, and insulted him also, upon which he seized about twenty of their principal men, and slew them, and gathered their substance together, which amounted to a thousand talents, and sent it all to the king, and informed him of what he had done. And Ptolemy admired the prudent conduct of the man, and commended him for what he had done, and gave him leave to do as he pleased. When the Syrians heard of this, they were dismayed, and having before them a sad example in the men of Ascalon that were slain, they opened their gates, and willingly admitted Joseph, and paid their taxes. And when the inhabitants of Scythopolis<sup>2</sup> attempted to affront him, and would not pay him the taxes, which they formerly used to pay without any hesitation, he slew also the principal men of that city, and sent their effects to the king. By this means he got much wealth together, and made vast gains of this farming of the taxes, and made use of what he had thus got to support his authority, thinking it prudent to keep what had been the occasion and foundation of his present good fortune. And he privately sent many presents to the king, and to Cleopatra, and to their friends, and to all that were powerful at the court, and thereby purchased their good-will.

§ 6. This good fortune he enjoyed for twenty-two years, and was the father of seven sons by one wife: he had also another son, whose name was Hyrcanus, by his brother Solymius' daughter, whom he married on the following occasion. He once went to Alexandria with his brother, (who took with him a daughter already marriageable, in order to give her in wedlock to some of the Jews of chief dignity there,) and supping with the king, and falling in love with a dancing girl of great beauty that came into the room where they feasted, he told his brother of it, and entreated him, because a Jew is forbidden by their law to lie with a foreign woman, to conceal his offence, and to be kind and subservient to him, and to give him an opportunity of fulfilling his desires. Upon this his brother willingly entertained the proposal of serving him, and disguised his own daughter, and brought her to him by night, and put her into his bed. And he being in drink knew not who she was, and so lay with his brother's daughter, and this he did many times, and loved her exceedingly, and said to his brother, that he loved this dancing girl so well, that he would run the hazard of his life for her, for probably the king would not give him leave to have her. But his brother bade him be in no concern, and told him he might enjoy her whom he loved without any danger, and might have her for his wife, and opened the truth to him, and assured him that he chose rather to have his own daughter abused than see him come to disgrace. Then Joseph commended him for his brotherly love, and married his daughter, and by her had a son, whose name was Hyrcanus, as I said before. And as this his youngest son at thirteen years old showed great natural courage and wisdom, and was greatly envied by his brothers, as being much above them and such a one as they might well envy, Joseph had a mind to know which of his sons had the best natural parts, and so he sent them each to those that had at that time the best reputation for instructing youths, but all the others, by reason of their sloth, and unwillingness to take pains, returned to him foolish and unlearned. After them he sent out Hyrcanus, the youngest, and gave him three hundred yoke of oxen, and bade him go two days' journey in the wilderness, and sow the land there, but kept back privately the leather harness of the oxen. When Hyrcanus came to the place, and found he had no harness, he scorned the idea of the drivers of the oxen, who advised him to send some of them home to his father to bring them harness, for thinking he ought not to lose time waiting for the return of those who might be despatched, he invented a kind of stratagem that showed wisdom greater than his age. For he slew ten yoke of the oxen, and distributed their flesh among the labourers, and cut their hides into several pieces, and made harness, and yoked the oxen with them; by which means he sowed as much land as his father had ordered him to sow, and returned to him. And when he was come back, his father was mightily pleased with his sagacity, and commended the sharpness of his understanding, and his boldness in what he did, and loved him still more, as if he were his only genuine son, and his brothers were much troubled at this.

§ 7. And when one told him that Ptolemy had a son just born, and that all the principal men of Syria, and the other countries subject to him, intended to keep a festival on account of the child's birthday, and had set out with great retinues to Alexandria, he was himself indeed hindered from going by old age, but he tried to see whether any of his sons would go to the king. And when the elder sons excused themselves from going, and said they were not courtiers enough for such company, and advised him to send their brother Hyrcanus, he gladly hearkened to their advice, and called Hyrcanus, and asked him, whether he would go to the king, and if he was willing to do so. And upon his undertaking to go, and saying that he should not want much money for his journey, because he would live moderately, so that ten thousand drachmæ would be sufficient, Joseph was pleased with his son's moderation. A little while after the son advised his father not to send his presents to the king from there, but to give him a letter to his steward at Alexandria, that he might furnish him with money for purchasing what would be most excellent and most precious. So he, thinking that his presents to the king would come to about ten talents, and commending his son as giving him good advice, wrote to Arion his steward, who managed all his money at Alexandria, which money was not less than three thousand talents. For Joseph sent the money he received from Syria to Alexandria, and when the day appointed for the payment of the taxes to the king came, he used to write to Arion to pay them. Now when the son had asked his father for a letter to this steward, and had received it, he set out for Alexandria. And when he was gone, his brothers wrote to all the king's friends to kill him.

§ 8. Now when he was come to Alexandria, he delivered his letter to Arion, who asked him how many talents he would have, (hoping he would ask for no more than ten, or only a little more,) and when he said he wanted a thousand talents, the steward was angry, and rebuked him, as one that intended to live extravagantly, and let him know that his father had got together his wealth by carefulness and by resisting his inclinations, and wished him to imitate the example of his father: he also said that he would give him only ten talents, and that for a present to the king. The lad was irritated at this, and threw Arion into prison. And when Arion's wife had informed Cleopatra of this, and entreated that she would rebuke the lad for what he had done, (for Arion was in great esteem with her,) Cleopatra told the king of it. And Ptolemy sent messengers to Hyrcanus to tell him that the king wondered, when he was sent to him by his father, that he had not yet come into his presence, but had put the steward in prison. He gave order, therefore, that he should come to him, and explain why he had acted so. And they report that the answer he made to the king's messengers was that there was a law of the king's that forbade a child that was born to taste of the sacrifice before he had been to the temple and sacrificed to God. According to which reasoning he had not himself come to him as he was waiting for the presents he was to make to him who had been his father's benefactor: and he had punished the slave for disobeying his commands, for it mattered not whether a master was little or great. "Unless, indeed, we punish such as these, thou mayst thyself also expect to be despised by thy subjects." Upon hearing this answer of his, Ptolemy fell a laughing, and wondered at the great wit of the lad.

§ 9. When Arion learned that this was the king's disposition, and that he himself had no other alternative, he gave the lad a thousand talents, and was let out of prison. And after three days had elapsed, Hyrcanus came and saluted the king and queen. They saw him with pleasure, and feasted him in a friendly manner, out of respect to his father. And he went to the merchants privately, and bought a hundred boys that were well educated and in the flower of their age at a talent a-piece, and also bought a hundred maidens at the same price. And when he was invited to feast with the king among the principal men of the country, he sat down the lowest of them all, because he was little regarded, as still a lad in age, by those who placed every one according to their dignity. Now when all those that sat at meat with him had laid the bones of their portions on a heap before Hyrcanus, (for they had themselves cleared the meat off them,) till the table where he sat was full of bones, Trypho, who was the king's jester, and was appointed to joke and laugh at revels, was now called for by the guests that sat at table. So he stood by the king, and said, "Dost thou see, my lord, the bones that lie by Hyrcanus? By this thou mayst conjecture that his father has made all Syria as bare as he has made these bones." And the king laughing at what Trypho said, and asking Hyrcanus, "How he came to have so many bones before him?" he replied, "No wonder, my lord: for dogs eat the flesh and bones together, as these have done, (looking at the king's guests,) for there is nothing before them; but men eat the flesh, and cast away the bones, as I, who am a man, have now done." Upon this the king admired his answer, which was so wisely made, and bade all the company applaud, as a mark of their approbation of his facetious jest. On the next day Hyrcanus went to every one of the king's friends, and to the men powerful at court, and saluted them, and inquired of their servants, what present their masters would make the king on his son's birthday; and when they said that some would give twelve talents, and that others of greater dignity would give more according to the quantity of their riches, he pretended to every one to be grieved that he was not able to offer so large a present, for he had no more than five talents. And when the servants heard what he said, they told their masters; and they rejoiced at the prospect that Joseph would be lightly esteemed, and would offend the king by the smallness of his present. When the day came, the others, even those that brought the most, offered the king not more than twenty talents, but Hyrcanus gave to every one of the hundred boys and hundred maidens that he had bought a talent a-piece for them to carry, and led the boys up to the king, and the maidens to Cleopatra; everybody, even the king and queen themselves, wondering at the unexpected munificence of the present. He also presented to the friends and courtiers of the king gifts worth a great number of talents, that he might escape the danger he was in from them: for it was to them that Hyrcanus' brothers had written to kill him. Now Ptolemy admired the young man's loftiness of soul, and commanded him to ask what gift he pleased. But he desired nothing else to be done for him by the king than to write to his father and brothers about him. So when the king had paid him very great respect, and had given him very fine gifts, and had written to his father and brothers and all his commanders and officers about him, he sent him away. But when his brothers heard that Hyrcanus had received such favour from the king, and was returning home with great honour, they went out to meet him and kill him, and that with the knowledge of their father; for he was angry at him for the large sums of money that he had bestowed as presents, and so had no concern for his preservation. However, Joseph concealed his anger to his son from fear of the king. And when Hyrcanus' brothers fought with him, he slew many others of those that were with them, as also two of his brothers, but the rest escaped to Jerusalem to their father. And when Hyrcanus came to the city, as nobody would receive him, he was afraid, and retired beyond the river Jordan, and there dwelt and levied tribute on the barbarians.

§ 10. At this time Seleucus, who was called Philopator,<sup>1</sup> the son of Antiochus the Great, reigned over Asia. And [now] Hyrcanus' father Joseph died. He was a good man and high-souled, and brought the Jews out of a state of poverty and meanness to one that was more splendid. He farmed the taxes of Syria and Phœnicia and Samaria twenty-two years. His uncle Onias also died, and left the high priesthood to his son Simon. And when he also died, Onias his son succeeded him in that dignity, to whom Areus, King of the Lacedæmonians, sent an embassy with a letter, a copy whereof here follows.

GREETING.

“We have met with a certain writing, whereby we have discovered that both the Jews and Lacedæmonians are of one stock, and are derived from the kindred of Abraham.<sup>1</sup> It is but just, therefore, that you, who are our brethren, should send to us about any of your concerns as you please. We will also do the same, and esteem your concerns as our own, and will look upon our concerns as yours. Demoteles, who brings you this letter, will bring your answer back to us. This letter is square, and the seal is an eagle, with a dragon in its claws."

§ 11. Such were the contents of the letter which was sent by the king of the Lacedæmonians. Now upon the death of Joseph, the people grew seditious, because of his sons. For whereas the elder ones made war against Hyrcanus, who was the youngest of Joseph's sons, the multitude was divided, but most joined with the elder ones, as did Simon the high priest because of his kinsmanship to them. However, Hyrcanus determined not to return to Jerusalem any more, but stationed himself beyond the Jordan, and was at perpetual war with the Arabians, and slew many of them, and took many of them captive. He also erected a strong castle, and built it entirely of white stone to the very roof, and had animals of a prodigious size carved on it. He also drew round it a great and deep canal of water. He also made caves many furlongs long by hollowing a rock that was opposite, and made large rooms in it, some for feasting, and some for sleeping and living in. He introduced also a quantity of water which ran through it, and was very delightful and ornamental in the court-yard. However, he made the mouths of the caves so narrow, that no more than one person could enter them at once; and that on purpose for his own preservation, lest he should be besieged by his brothers, and run the hazard of being taken by them. Moreover, he built courts of greater size than ordinary, which he adorned with spacious gardens. And when he had brought the place to this state, he called it

<sup>1</sup> Whence it comes that these Lacedæmonians declare themselves here to be akin to the Jews, as derived from the kindred of Abraham. I cannot tell, unless, as Grotius supposes, they were derived from the Dores, that came of the Pelasgi. These are by Herodotus called 'Barbarians,' and perhaps were derived from the Syrians and Arabians, the posterity of Abraham by Keturah. See Antiq. xiv. 10, § 22, and Jewish War, i. 26, § 1, and Grot. on 1 Maccab. xii. 7.—W.

'Tyre.<sup>1</sup> It is between Arabia and Jndæa, beyond the Jordan, and not far from the country of Heshbon.<sup>2</sup> And he ruled over those parts for seven years, even all the time that Seleucus was king of Syria. But when Seleucus was dead, his brother Antiochus, who was called Epiphanes,<sup>3</sup> took the kingdom. Ptolemy, also, the king of Egypt, died, who was also called Epiphanes, and left two sons, both young in age, the elder of whom was called Philometor,<sup>4</sup> and the younger Physcon. As for Hyrcanus, when he saw that Antiochus had a great army, and feared lest he should be taken by him, and punished for what he had done to the Arabians, he ended his life by suicide, and Antiochus seized upon all his substance.

How, upon the Quarrels of the Jews with one another about the High Priesthood, Antiochus made an Expedition against Jerusalem, and took the City and pillaged the Temple, and distressed the Jews. Also how many of the Jews forsook the Laws of their Country; and how the Samaritans followed the Customs of the Greeks, and called their Temple on Mount Gerizim the Temple of Zeus Hellenius.

§ 1.

ABOUT this time, on the death of Onias the high priest, the king gave the high priesthood to Jesus his brother; for the son whom Onias left [or Onias IV.] was yet but an infant. I shall, in its proper place, inform the reader of all the circumstances that befell this child. Now this Jesus, the brother of Onias, was deprived of the high priesthood by the king, who was angry with him, and gave it to his younger brother, whose name also was Onias, for Simon had these three sons, to each of whom the high priesthood came, as I have already informed the reader. This Jesus changed his name to Jason, and Onias was called Menelaus. Now as the former high priest, Jesus, formed a party against Menelaus, who was appointed after him, the multitude were divided between them both. And the sons of Tobias took the side of Menelaus, but most of the people assisted Jason: so that Menelaus and the sons of Tobias got the worst of it, and fled to Antiochus, and informed him that they were desirous to leave the laws of their country, and the Jewish way of living according to them, and to follow the king's laws, and the Greek way of living. So they desired his permission to build for themselves a Gymnasium at Jerusalem.<sup>1</sup> And when he had given them leave, they drew their prepuce forward, that when they were naked they might appear to be Greeks. They also left off all the customs that belonged to their own country, and imitated the practices of other nations.

§ 2. Now Antiochus, as the affairs of his kingdom were in a prosperous condition, resolved to make an expedition against Egypt, both because he had a desire to make himself master of it, and because he despised the sons of Ptolemy, as still weak, and not yet of abilities to manage affairs of such consequence; so he marched with a great force to Pelusium, and circumvented Ptolemy Philometor by treachery, and occupied Egypt. He then went to the parts about Memphis, and when he had taken Memphis, he set out for Alexandria, in hope of taking it by siege, and of subduing Ptolemy who reigned there. But he was driven not only from Alexandria, but out of all Egypt, by the Romans, who charged him to let that country alone, as I have elsewhere stated before. I will now give a particular account of what concerns this king, who took Judæa and the temple; for in my former work I mentioned these things very briefly, and therefore now

§ 3. King Antiochus then, returning out of Egypt for fear of the Romans, made an expedition against the city of Jerusalem, and in the hundred and forty-third year of the kingdom of the Selucidæ,<sup>1</sup> took the city without fighting, those of his own party opening the gates to him. And when he had got possession of Jerusalem he slew many of the opposite party, and when he had carried off a great deal of money, he returned to Antioch.

§ 4. Now it came to pass two years after, in the hundred and forty-fifth year, on the twenty-fifth day of the month, which is by us called Chasleu, and by the Macedonians Apellæus, in the hundred and fifty-third Olympiad, that this king went up to Jerusalem with a large force, and pretending peace, got possession of the city by treachery;<sup>2</sup> at which time he spared not so much as those that admitted him into it, on account of the riches that were in the temple; but owing to his covetousness (for he saw there was in the temple a great deal of gold, and many votive offerings of very great value), in order to plunder its wealth, he ventured to break the league he had made. And he stripped the temple bare, and took away the vessels of God, as the golden candlesticks, and the golden altar of incense, and the table of shew-bread, and the altar of burnt-offering, and did not keep his hands off even the veils which were made of fine linen and scarlet. He also emptied the temple of its secret treasures, and left nothing at all remaining, and so cast the Jews into great lamentation, for he forbade them to offer the daily sacrifices which they used to offer to God according to the law. And when he had pillaged the whole city, he slew some of the inhabitants, and some he carried away captive, together with their wives and children, so that the number of captives amounted to about ten thousand. He also burnt down the finest buildings, and when he had overthrown the city walls, he built a citadel in the lower part of the city,<sup>3</sup> for the place was high, and overlooked the temple, on which account he fortified it with high walls and towers, and put into it a garrison of Macedonians. None the less in that citadel dwelt the impious and wicked part of the [Jewish] multitude, at whose hands the citizens suffered many terrible things. And when the king had built an altar upon God's altar, he slew swine upon it, and so offered a sacrifice neither according to the law, nor the ancient Jewish religious worship. He also compelled them to forsake the worship of their own God, and to adore those whom he esteemed gods, and made them build temples, and raise altars in every city and village, and offer swine upon them every day. He also commanded them not to circumcise their sons, and threatened to punish any that should be found to have transgressed this injunction. He also appointed overseers, who should compel them to do what he commanded. And indeed many Jews complied with the king's commands, some voluntarily, others out of fear of the penalty that was denounced: but the best men, and those that had noble souls, did not regard him, but paid greater respect to the customs of their country than to care about the punishment which he threatened the disobedient with, so they every day died in great miseries and bitter torments. For they were whipped with rods, and their limbs were torn to pieces, and they were fixed to crosses while they were still alive and breathed; they also strangled, as the king had ordered, the women and those of their sons who had been circumcised, hanging their sons about their necks as they were on the crosses. And if there were any sacred book or copy of the law found, it was destroyed, and those with whom they were found miserably perished also.

lowing history, both in the Maccabees and in Josephus, seems to have been a castle built on a hill, lower than mount Zion, though upon its skirts, and higher than mount Moriah, but between them both; which hill the enemies of the Jews now got possession of, and built on it this citadel, and fortified it, till a good while afterwards the Jews regained it, demolished it, and levelled the hill itself with the common ground, that their enemies might no more recover it, and might thence overlook the temple itself, and do them such mischief as they had long undergone from it, Antiq. xiii. 6, § 6.—W.

things, they no longer alleged that they were of their kindred, or that the temple on Mount Gerizim belonged to Almighty God. This was according to their nature, as I have already shown. They now said that they were a colony of Medes and Persians: and indeed they were a colony of theirs. So they sent ambassadors to Antiochus, and a letter, whose contents were as follows. "To king Antiochus Epiphanes, god, a memorial from Sidonians who live at Shechem. Our forefathers, because of certain frequent plagues, and following a certain ancient superstition, made a custom of observing that day which by the Jews is called the Sabbath.<sup>1</sup> And when they had erected a temple without a name on the mountain called Gerizim, they offered upon it the customary sacrifices. Now upon thy just treatment of these wicked Jews, those that carry out thy orders, supposing us to be akin to them and doing as they do, make us liable to the same accusations, although we be originally Sidonians, as is evident from the public records. We therefore beseech thee, our benefactor and saviour, to give order to Apollonius, the governor of this part of the country, and to Nicanor, the manager of thy affairs, not to disturb us, or to lay to our charge what the Jews are accused for, since we are aliens from their nation and customs; and let our temple, which at present has no name at all, be called The Temple of Zeus Hellenius. If this be once done, we shall be no longer disturbed, but shall be more secure in attending to our own occupations and so bring in a greater revenue to thee." When the Samaritans had petitioned for this, the king sent them back the following answer in a letter. "King Antiochus to Nicanor. The Sidonians who live at Shechem have sent me the enclosed memorial. When therefore we were advising with our friends about it, the messengers sent by them represented to us, that they are no way concerned in the charges brought against the Jews, but choose to live after the customs of the Greeks. Accordingly we declare them free from such accusations, and order that, agreeably to their petition, their temple be called The Temple of Zeus Hellenius." He also sent the like letter to Apollonius, the governor of that province, in the forty-sixth year, on the eighteenth day of the month Hecatom-bæon.

CHAP. VI.

How, upon Antiochus prohibiting the Jews to make use of the Laws of their country, Mattathias the Son of Asamonæus alone despised the King, and overcame the Generals of Antiochus' Army; as also concerning the Death of Mattathias, and the Succession of Judas.

§ 1.

NOW at this time there was a man who dwelt at Modiim,<sup>1</sup> whose name was Mattathias, the son of John, the son of Symeon, the son of Asamonæus, a priest of the order of Joarib, and a native of Jerusalem. He had five sons, John who was called Gaddes, and Simon who was called Matthes, and Judas who was called Maccabæus, and Eleazar who was called Auran, and Jonathan who was called Apphus. Now this Mattathias lamented to his sons the sad state of their affairs, as the spoiling of the city, and the plundering of the temple, and the calamities of the people, and he told them, that it was better for them to die for the laws of their country, than to live so ingloriously.

§ 2. Now when those that were appointed by the king were come to the village of Modiim, to compel the Jews to do what was commanded, and enjoin those that were there to offer sacrifice as the king had ordered, they desired that Mattathias, a person of the highest repute among them, both on other accounts and because of his goodly family, would begin the sacrifice, because his fellow citizens would follow his example, and because such behaviour would make him honoured by the king. But Mattathias said he would not do so, and if all other nations obeyed the commands of Antiochus, either out of fear or to please him, neither he nor his sons would leave the religious worship of their country. But when he had ended his speech, one of the Jews came into the midst, and sacrificed as Antiochus had commanded. At this Mattathias had great indignation, and ran upon him with his sons who had swords with them, and slew both the man himself, and Apelles the king's general, who was trying to compel them to sacrifice, and a few of his soldiers. He also overthrew the altar, and cried out, "Whoever is zealous for the laws of his country, and for the worship of God, let him follow me." And when he had said this, he went into the desert with his sons, and left all his property in the village. Many others did the same also, and fled with their children and wives into the desert, and dwelt in caves. Now when the king's generals heard of this, they took all the soldiers they then had in the citadel at Jerusalem, and pursued the Jews into the desert; and when they had overtaken them, they first endeavoured to persuade them to repent, and to choose what was most for their advantage, and not to put them to the necessity of treating them according to martial law. But as they would not listen to their persuasions, but continued to be of a different mind, they attacked them on the Sabbath-day, and burnt them as they were in their caves, without their resisting, or even so much as stopping up the entrances of the caves. And they abstained from defending themselves on that day, because they were not willing to break in upon the honour they owed the Sabbath even in such an evil case, for our law requires us to rest upon that day. There were about a thousand, with their wives and children, who were smothered and died in those caves; but many escaped and joined themselves to Mattathias, and appointed him to be their ruler. And he taught them to fight even on the Sabbath-day, and told them, that unless they would do so, they would become their own enemies, by observing the law so rigorously, for their adversaries would continue to assault them on that day, and if they would not then defend themselves, nothing could prevent their all perishing without fighting. This speech persuaded them. And this rule continues among us to this day, that if there be necessity, we may fight on the Sabbath-days. So Mattathias got a great army about him, and overthrew the altars, and slew all those that broke the law that he could get in his power, for many of them were dispersed among the nations round about for fear of him. He also commanded that those boys who were not yet circumcised should be circumcised now, and he drove out of the country those that were appointed to hinder their circumcision.

§ 3. But when he had ruled one year he fell very ill, and called for his sons, and set them round about him, and said, "O my sons, I am going the way of all flesh, and I commend to you my resolution, and beseech you not to be negligent in keeping it, but to be mindful of the wish of him who begat you and brought you up, to preserve the customs of your country, and to recover your ancient polity, which is in danger of being upset, and not to be seduced by those that betray it, either from their own inclination, or out of necessity, but to be sons worthy of me, and to be above all force and necessity, and so to dispose your souls, as to be ready, if it shall be necessary, to die for your laws, reflecting on this, that if God see that you are so disposed he will not overlook you, but will greatly value your virtue, and will restore to you again what you have lost, and will give you back again that freedom in which you shall live in security, and enjoy your own customs. Your bodies are mortal and subject to fate, but they receive a sort of immortality by the remembrance of the actions they have done. And I would have you so in love with this immortality, that you may pursue after glory, and when you have undertaken the greatest things, may not shrink from losing your lives. I exhort you especially to agree with one another, and in whatever point any one of you exceeds another, to yield to him so far, and so to reap the advantage of every one's own virtues. Esteem then your brother Simon as your father, because he is a man of extraordinary prudence, and be governed by him in the counsels he gives you. Take Maccabæus for the general of your army, because of his courage and strength, for he will avenge your nation and repel your enemies. Conciliate the righteous and religious, and so add to their power."

§ 4. When Mattathias had thus discoursed to his sons, and had prayed to God to be their helper, and to restore to the people their former manner of life, he died soon afterwards and was buried at Modiim,<sup>1</sup> all the people making great lamentation for him. And his son Judas called Maccabæus took upon him the administration of affairs, in the hundred and forty-sixth year: and by the ready assistance of his brothers and others, drove their enemies out of the country, and put those of their own country to death who had transgressed their laws, and purified the land from all pollution.

CHAP. VII.

How Judas overthrew the Forces of Apollonius and Seron, and killed those Generals; and how, when a little while afterwards Lysias and Gorgias were beaten, he went up to Jerusalem and purified the Temple.

§ 1.

WHEN Apollonius, the general of the army of Samaria, heard of this, he took his army, and marched against Judas. And he met him, and joined battle with him, and beat him, and slew many of his men, and among them Apollonius himself the general, whose sword (which he happened to be wearing) he seized upon and kept for himself; but he wounded more than he slew, and took a great deal of spoil from the enemy's camp, and retired. But when Seron, who was general of the army of Cœle-Syria, heard that many had joined themselves to Judas, and that he had with him an army sufficient for fighting and making war, he determined to march against him, thinking it became him to endeavour to punish those that lawlessly transgressed the king's injunctions. So he got together as large an army as he was able, and joined to it the fugitive and wicked Jews, and marched against Judas, and advanced as far as Bethhoron,<sup>2</sup> a village of Judæa, and there pitched his camp. And there Judas met him, and intended to offer battle, and when he saw that his soldiers were loath to fight, because their number was small, and because they wanted food, for they were fasting, he encouraged them by telling them that victory and conquest of enemies was not derived from numbers but from piety towards God ; and that they had the plainest proof of this in their forefathers, who by their righteousness and by exerting themselves on behalf of their laws and children, had frequently conquered many ten thousands, for innocence was a mighty force. By this speech he induced his men to despise the multitude of the enemy, and to fall upon Seron. And upon joining battle with him, he routed the Syrians ; and as their general fell they all ran away with speed, thinking flight their only chance of safety. And he pursued them to the plain, and slew about eight hundred of the enemy, and the rest escaped to the region which lay near to the sea.

§ 2. When king Antiochus heard of these things, he was very angry at what had happened, and got together all his own army, and many mercenaries whom he took with him from the islands, and made preparations to invade Judæa about the beginning of the spring. But when, upon his mustering his soldiers, he perceived that his treasury was deficient, and that there was a want of money, (for all the taxes had not been paid because of the insurrections of the various nations, and he was so munificent and liberal that his own revenues were not sufficient for him,) he resolved first to go into Persia, and collect the taxes of that country. So he left in command one whose name was Lysias, who was in great repute with him, and governor as far as the bounds of Egypt and Lower Asia from the river Euphrates, with part of the forces and elephants, and charged him to educate his son Antiochus with all possible care until he came back, and to conquer Judæa, and enslave its inhabitants, and utterly destroy Jerusalem, and annihilate the whole nation. And when king Antiochus had given these orders to Lysias, he went into Persia, and in the hundred and forty-seventh year crossed over the Euphrates, and went to the upper satrapies.

§ 3. Upon this Lysias chose Ptolemy (the son of Dorymenes) and Nicanor and Gorgias, very influential men among the king's friends, and delivered to them forty thousand foot and seven thousand horse, and sent them against Judæa. And they came as far as the city Emmaus,<sup>1</sup> and pitched their camp in the plain. Auxiliaries also came to them out of Syria and the country round about, as also many of the fugitive Jews. And besides these came some merchants to buy those that should be captured (having fetters with them to bind those that should be made prisoners), with the silver and gold which they were to pay for their price. And when Judas saw their camp, and how numerous the enemies were, he urged his own soldiers to be of good courage, and exhorted them to place their hopes of victory in God, and to make supplication to him clothed in sackcloth according to the custom of their country, and to show their usual habit of supplication in the greatest dangers, and so to prevail with God to grant them the victory over their enemies. And he set them in the ancient order of battle used by their forefathers, under their captains of thousands and commanders of divisions, and dismissed such as were newly married, as well as those that had newly gained possessions, that they might not fight in a cowardly manner, from an inordinate love of life, in order to enjoy those blessings. When he had thus marshalled his soldiers, he encouraged them to fight by the following speech which he made to them. "Comrades, no other time is more necessary than the present for courage and contempt of dangers; for if you now fight manfully you may recover your liberty, which, as it is a thing for itself agreeable to all men, so to us it proves much more desirable, by its affording us the power of worshipping God. Since then you are in such a case at present, that you must either recover that liberty, and so regain a happy and blessed way of living, which is that according to our laws and the customs of our country, or submit to the most ignoble sufferings, nor will any seed of your nation remain if you play the part of cowards in this battle, fight manfully. And reflecting that you must die though you do not fight, and believing that besides such glorious rewards as those of the liberty of your country, your laws, and your religion, you shall obtain everlasting glory, prepare yourselves and resolve to be ready to fight with the enemy as soon as it is day to-morrow morning."

§ 4. This was the speech which Judas made to encourage his army. And when the enemy sent Gorgias, with five thousand foot and one thousand horse to surprise Judas by night, with certain of the fugitive Jews as guides for that purpose, the son of Mattathias heard of it, and resolved to fall upon the enemies in their camp, now their forces were divided. When he had therefore supped in good time, and had left many fires in his camp, he marched all night to the enemy who were at Emmaus. Now as Gorgias found no enemy in their camp, he suspected that they had retreated and hidden themselves among the mountains, and resolved to go and seek wherever they were. But about daybreak Judas appeared to the enemy at Emmaus, with only three thousand men, and those ill-armed by reason of their poverty, and though he saw the enemy very well and skilfully fortified in their camp, he encouraged the Jews, and exhorted them to fight though with ill-armed bodies, for God had sometimes of old given such men strength, and that against such as were more numerous and better armed to boot, in delight at their great courage. Then he commanded the trumpeters to sound for the battle, and by thus falling upon the enemy when they did not expect it, and so alarming and dismaying their minds, he slew many of those that resisted, and went on pursuing the rest as far as Gadara<sup>1</sup> and the plains of Idumæa<sup>2</sup> and Azotus<sup>3</sup> and Jamnia;<sup>4</sup> and of these there fell about three thousand. And Judas exhorted his soldiers not to be too desirous of spoil, for they must still have a contest and battle with Gorgias and the forces that were with him: but when they had once overcome them, then they might securely plunder the camp, because they were the only enemies remaining, and they expected no others. And just as he was saying this to his soldiers, Gorgias' men looked down from a hill at the army which they had left in their camp, and saw that it was routed, and the camp burnt; for the smoke that arose from it showed them what had happened, even though they were a great way off. When therefore those that were with Gorgias understood that things were in this posture, and perceived that those that were with Judas were ready to fight them, they also were panic-struck, and turned to flight; and now Judas having beaten Gorgias' soldiers without fighting, returned and seized on the spoil. He took a great quantity of gold and silver, and purple and blue raiment, and returned home with joy, singing hymns to God for this success; for this victory contributed not a little to the recovery of their liberty.

§ 5. But Lysias was confounded at the defeat of the army which he had sent out, and the next year he got together sixty thousand chosen foot, and five thousand horse, and invaded Judæa, and went up to the hill-country near Bethsura,<sup>1</sup> a village of Judæa, and pitched his camp there. And Judas met him there with ten thousand men, and when he saw the great number of the enemies, he prayed to God that he would assist him, and joined battle with the advanced guard of the enemy, and beat them, and slew about five thousand of them, and so caused panic in the rest of the army. Lysias indeed observing the great spirit of the Jews, and that they were prepared to die rather than lose their liberty, and being afraid of their desperate valour as real strength, took the rest of his army back with him, and returned to Antioch, where he stayed to enlist foreigners in his service, and made preparations to invade Judæa with a greater army.

§ 6. And now that the generals of Antiochus' armies had been beaten so often, Judas assembled the people together, and told them, that after these many victories which God had given them, they ought to go up to Jerusalem, and purify the temple, and offer the customary sacrifices. And as soon as he with the whole multitude had come to Jerusalem, and found the temple deserted, and its gates burnt down, and weeds growing in the temple on account of its desertion, he and those that were with him began to lament, being quite confounded at the sight of the temple. And he picked out some of his soldiers, and gave them order to fight against the guards that occupied the citadel, until he should have purified the temple. And when he had carefully purged it, he brought in new vessels, as the candlestick, the table of show-bread, and the altar of incense, which were made of gold, and hung up veils at the doors, and added doors. He also demolished the altar, and built a new one of stones that he gathered together, not hewn with iron. And on the five-and-twentieth day of the month Chasleu, which the Macedonians call Apellæus, they lighted the lamps that were on the candlestick, and offered incense upon the altar of incense, and laid loaves upon the table of show-bread, and offered burnt-offerings upon the new altar. Now it so fell out, that these things were done on the very day on which their divine worship had ceased, and been changed to a profane and common use, three years before, for the temple that had been made desolate by Antiochus continued so for three years. This desolation happened on the temple in the hundred and forty-fifth year, on the twenty-fifth day of the month Apellæus, and in the hundred and fifty-third Olympiad: and it was dedicated anew on the same day, the twenty-fifth of the month Apellæus, in the hundred and forty-eighth year, and in the hundred and fifty-fourth Olympiad. And this desolation came to pass according to the prophecy of Daniel, which was given four hundred and eight years before; for he declared that the Macedonians would stop the temple worship.

§ 7. Now Judas celebrated the festival of the restoration of the temple sacrifices for eight days, and omitted no sort of pleasure, but feasted the people upon the very rich and splendid sacrifices, and honoured God, and delighted the people by hymns and psalms. Nay, they were so very glad at the revival of their national customs after a long time of intermission, now that they had unexpectedly regained the freedom of their worship, that they made it a law for their posterity, that they should keep a festival for eight days on account of the restoration of their temple worship. And from that time to this we celebrate this festival, and call it "Lights." I suppose the reason was, because this liberty appeared to us beyond our hopes, and hence the name was given to the festival. Judas also rebuilt the walls round about the city, and reared towers of great height against the incursions of enemies, and set guards therein. He also fortified the city of Bethsura, that it might serve as a citadel against any emergency caused by the enemies.

CHAP. VIII.

How Judas subdued the Nations round about; and how Simon beat the People of Tyre and Ptolemais; and how Judas overcame Timotheus, and forced him to flee away, and did many other things, after Joseph and Azarias had been beaten.

§ 1.

WHEN these things had taken place, the nations round about the Jews were very uneasy at the revival of their power and strength, and rose up and destroyed many of them, gaining advantage over them by laying snares for them, and plotting against them. Judas had perpetual wars with these nations, and endeavoured to restrain them from their incursions, and to prevent the mischiefs they did to the Jews. So he fell upon the Idumæans, the posterity of Esau, at Acrabatene,<sup>1</sup> and slew a great many of them, and took their spoil. He also invested and besieged the sons of Baanus, who had laid ambush for the Jews, and burnt their towers, and slew the men that were on them. After this he marched against the Ammonites, who had a great and a numerous army, of which Timotheus was the commander. And when he had subdued them, he seized on their city Jazor,<sup>2</sup> and took their wives and children captives, and burnt the city, and then returned to Judæa. But when the neighbouring nations heard that he had returned, they mustered together in great numbers in the land of Gilead against the Jews that were on their borders. And they fled to the fortress of Dathema,<sup>1</sup> and sent to Judas to inform him that Timotheus was endeavouring to take the place where they had fled. And as their letters were being read, there came other messengers out of Galilee, who informed him that the inhabitants of Ptolemais and Tyre and Sidon, and the strange nations in Galilee, had concentrated their forces.

§ 2. Then Judas, considering what was best to be done with relation to the urgency of both these cases, ordered Simon his brother to take three thousand picked men, and go to the assistance of the Jews in Galilee, while he and another of his brothers, Jonathan, marched into the land of Gilead with eight thousand soldiers. And he left Joseph (the son of Zacharias) and Azarias over the rest of the forces: and charged them to guard Judæa very carefully, and to fight no battles with anyone until his return. Simon accordingly went into Galilee, and fought the enemy, and put them to flight, and pursued them to the gates of Ptolemais, and slew about three thousand of them, and took the spoil of those that were slain, and rescued those Jews who had been taken prisoners, and their baggage, and then returned home.

§ 3. As for Judas Maccabæus and his brother Jonathan, they crossed over the river Jordan, and when they had gone three days' journey further they met the Nabatæans, who came to meet them peaceably, and told them how affairs within the land of Gilead stood, and how many of them were in distress, and driven into the garrisons and cities of Gilead, and exhorted him to make haste to go against the foreigners, and to endeavour to save his own countrymen out of their hands. To this Judas hearkened, and returned into the wilderness, and fell first upon the inhabitants of Bosorra,<sup>2</sup> and took the city, and beat the inhabitants, and slew all the males and all that were able to fight, and burnt the city. Nor did he stop even when night came on, but he pushed on to the garrison where the Jews happened to be invested, and where Timotheus lay round the place with his army, and Judas reached the city in the morning; and when he found that the enemy were just making an assault upon the walls, and that some of them were bringing ladders, by which they might get upon the walls, and others engines to batter them down, he bade the trumpeter sound his trumpet, and encouraged his soldiers cheerfully to undergo dangers for their brethren and kindred; he also divided his army into three, and fell upon the rear of the enemies. And when Timotheus' men perceived that it was Maccabæus that was upon them, of whose courage and success in war they had formerly had sufficient experience, they turned to flight; but Judas followed them close with his army, and slew about eight thousand of them. He then turned aside to a city of the foreigners called Malle, and took it, and slew all the males, and burnt the city itself. He then removed from thence, and overthrew Chasphom,<sup>1</sup> and Bosor,<sup>2</sup> and many other cities in the land of Gilead.

§ 4. And not long after this, Timotheus got together a great army, and took others as auxiliaries, and induced some of the Arabians for pay to join him in his expedition, and went with his army beyond the brook over against the city of Raphon.<sup>3</sup> And he exhorted his soldiers, if it came to a battle with the Jews, to fight courageously, and to prevent their crossing over the brook: for he told them beforehand, "if they come over it, we shall be beaten." And when Judas heard that Timotheus prepared himself to fight, he took all his own army, and marched in haste against the enemy, and when he had crossed over the brook, he fell upon the enemies, and some of them met him, whom he slew, and others of them he so terrified, that he compelled them to throw down their arms and flee; and some of them escaped, others fled to what was called the temple at Carnain,<sup>4</sup> in hopes of preserving themselves; but Judas took the city and slew them, and burnt the temple, and so contrived several ways of destroying the enemies.

§ 5. When he had done this and gathered all the Jews in Gilead together, with their children and wives and the substance that belonged to them, his intention was to bring them back into Judæa. And as soon as he was come to a certain city, whose name was Ephron,<sup>1</sup> that lay upon the road, (and as it was not possible for him to go any other way, so he was not willing to go back again,) he sent to the inhabitants, and desired that they would open their gates, and permit them to go on their way through the city, for they had stopped up the gates with stones, and cut off their passage through it. But as the inhabitants of Ephron would not listen to him, he encouraged those that were with him, and encompassed the city round, and besieged it, and lying round it day and night took the city, and slew every male in it, and burnt it all down, and so obtained a way through it; and the multitude of those that were slain was so great, that they went over their dead bodies. They then crossed over the Jordan, and arrived at the great plain, situate over against which is the city of Bethshan,<sup>2</sup> which is called by the Greeks Scythopolis.<sup>3</sup> And marching on from thence, they came into Judæa, singing psalms and hymns as they went, and indulging such tokens of mirth as are usual in triumphs. They also offered thank-offerings, both for their success, and the preservation of their army, for not one of the Jews was slain in these battles.

§ 6. But as to Joseph (the son of Zacharias) and Azarias, whom Judas left in command of the rest of the forces at the time when Simon was in Galilee fighting against the people of Ptolemais, and Judas himself and his brother Jonathan were in the land of Gilead, they also wished to get the glory of being fine generals, so they took the army that was under their command, and went to Jamnia. There Gorgias, the general at Jamnia,<sup>4</sup> met them, and upon joining battle with him, they lost two thousand of their army, and fled away, and were pursued to the very borders of Judæa. And this reverse befell them from their disobedience to the injunction Judas had given them, not to fight with anyone before his return. For besides the rest of Judas' sagacious counsels, one may well admire this concerning the reverse that befell the forces commanded by Joseph and Azarias, which he understood would happen, if they broke any of the injunctions he had given them. But Judas and his brothers did not leave off fighting with the Idumæans, but pressed them hard on all sides, and took from them the city of Hebron, and demolished all its fortifications, and set all its towers on fire, and ravaged the country of the foreigners, and took the city of Marissa,<sup>1</sup> They went also to Azotus,<sup>2</sup> and captured it, and laid it waste, and took away a great deal of the spoil and prey that were in it, and returned to Judæa.

<sup>3</sup> The reason why Bethshan was called 'Scythopolis,' is well known from Herodotus, Book i. ch. 105, and Syncellus, p. 214, that the Scythians, when they overran Asia, in the days of Josiah, seized on this city, and kept it as long as they continued in Asia, from which time it obtained the name of 'Scythopolis,' or the 'city of the Scythians.'—W.

CHAP. IX.

The Death of Antiochus Epiphanes. How Antiochus Eupator fought against Judas, and besieged him in the Temple, and afterwards made Peace with him and departed. Of Alcimus and Onias.

§ 1.

ABOUT this time king Antiochus, as he was going through his upper provinces, heard that there was a very rich city in Persia, called Elymais,<sup>3</sup> and a very rich temple of Artemis therein, full of all sorts of votive offerings, as also weapons and breastplates, which, he found upon inquiry, had been left there by Alexander, the son of Philip, king of Macedon. And being incited by this news, he set out for Elymais, and assaulted it, and besieged it. But as those that were in it were not terrified at his assault, nor at his siege, but opposed him very courageously, he was baffled in his hope, for they drove him away from the city, and went out and pursued after him, insomuch that he fled away as far as Babylon, and lost many of his army. And when he was grieving for this disappointment, some persons told him of the defeat of his commanders whom he had left behind to fight with the Jews, and what strength the Jews had already got. When the concern about these affairs was added to the former, he was confounded, and from the anxiety he was in fell into an illness which lasted a great while, and his pains increased upon him, so at length he perceived that he should die, and called his friends to him, and told them, that his illness was severe, and confessed also that this calamity was sent upon him for the miseries he had brought upon the Jewish nation, in plundering their temple, and despising their god: and when he had said this, he gave up the ghost. So one may wonder at Polybius of Megalopolis, though otherwise a good man, saying that "Antiochus died because he purposed to plunder the temple of Artemis in Persia," for the purposing to do a thing, and not actually doing it, is not worthy of punishment. But if Polybius could think that Antiochus lost his life on that account, it is much more probable that the king died on account of his sacrilegious plundering of the temple at Jerusalem. But I shall not contend about this matter with those who think that the cause assigned by Polybius of Megalopolis is nearer the truth than that assigned by us.

§ 2. However this may be, Antiochus, before he died, called for Philip, who was one of his companions, and made him the regent of his kingdom, and gave him his diadem and royal robes and ring, and charged him to carry them and deliver them to his son Antiochus, and desired him to take care of his education, and to preserve the kingdom for him. Antiochus died in the hundred and forty and ninth year: and Lysias declared his death to the multitude, and appointed his son Antiochus to be king, (for he had the care of him,) and called him Eupator.<sup>1</sup>

§ 3. At this time the garrison in the citadel at Jerusalem and the Jewish fugitives did a great deal of harm to the Jews: for the soldiers in the garrison used to sally out upon the sudden, and kill such as were going up to the temple to offer their sacrifices, for this citadel commanded the temple. When this had often happened, Judas resolved to destroy that garrison, so he got all the people together, and vigorously besieged those that were in the citadel. This was the hundred and fiftieth year of the dominion of the Seleucidæ. So he made engines of war, and threw up earthworks, and tried hard to take the citadel: but not a few of the fugitives who were in the place went out by night into the country, and got together some other wicked men like themselves, and went to Antiochus the king, and begged of him, that he would not suffer them to continue in the great hardships they underwent from those of their own nation, and that on his father's account, because they had left the religious worship of their fathers, and adopted that which he had commanded them to follow. They said also that there was danger that the citadel, and those appointed to garrison it by the king, would be taken by Judas and those that were with him, unless he sent them succours. When Antiochus, who was but a boy, heard this, he was angry, and sent for his captains and friends, and ordered that they should get an army of mercenaries together, and such men also from his own kingdom as were of an age fit for war. And an army was collected together of about a hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, and thirty-two elephants.

§ 4. So the king took this army, and marched from Antioch with Lysias, who had the command of the whole force, and came to Idumæa, and thence went up to Bethsura,<sup>1</sup> a city that was strong and not to be taken without great difficulty, and sat down before the city, and besieged it. And as the inhabitants of Bethsura<sup>1</sup> courageously opposed him, and sallied out upon him, and burnt his engines of war, a great deal of time was spent in the siege. But when Judas heard of the king's coming, he raised the siege of the citadel, and met the king, and pitched his camp at a certain pass, at a place called Bethzachariah,<sup>2</sup> at the distance of seventy furlongs from the enemy; and the king soon drew his forces away from Bethsura, and brought them to that pass. And as soon as it was day, he put his men in battle array, and made his elephants follow one another through the narrow pass, for they could not go abreast. Now round every elephant there were a thousand foot, and five hundred horse; and the elephants had high towers and archers on their backs. And he made the rest of his army go up the mountains on each side, and put his friends in the van, and ordered the army to shout aloud, and so attacked the enemy. He also exposed to sight their golden and brazen shields, so that a glorious splendour emanated from them; and when the army shouted, the mountains echoed again. When Judas saw this, he was not terrified, but received the enemy with great courage, and slew about six hundred of the front ranks. And when his brother Eleazar, whom they called Auran, saw the tallest of the elephants armed with royal breastplates, supposing that the king was upon it, he attacked it with great bravery. He also slew many of those that were round the elephant, and scattered the rest, and then went under the belly of the elephant, and smote it, and slew it, but the elephant fell upon Eleazar, and by its weight crushed him to death. And thus did Eleazar come to his end, when he had first courageously destroyed many of his enemies.

§ 5. Then Judas, seeing the strength of the enemy, retired to Jerusalem, and prepared to endure a siege. As for Antiochus, he sent part of his army to Bethsura to besiege it, and with the rest of his army marched to Jerusalem. And the inhabitants of Bethsura were terrified at his strength, and seeing that their provisions grew scarce, they delivered themselves up on the security of oaths, that they should suffer no harsh treatment from the king. And when Antiochus had thus taken the city, he did them no other harm than sending them out unarmed. He also placed a garrison of his own in the city. But as for the temple of Jerusalem, he besieged it a long time, for those within bravely defended it, for whatever engines the king set against them, they counter-contrived other engines. But at last their provisions failed them, the fruits of the ground they had laid up were spent, and the land not being tilled that year continued unsown, because it was the seventh year, on which, by our laws, we were obliged to let it lie uncultivated. And so many of the besieged deserted for want of necessaries, that only a few were left in the temple.

§ 6. Such happened to be the circumstances of those who were besieged in the temple. But when Lysias, the general of the army, and Antiochus the king, were informed that Philip was marching upon them from Persia, and was endeavouring to get the management of public affairs to himself, they determined to raise the siege, and march against Philip, yet did they resolve not to let this be known to the soldiers nor to the officers, but the king commanded Lysias to speak openly to the soldiers and the officers, without saying a word about the affair of Philip, and to intimate to them, that the siege would be very long, that the place was very strong, that they were already short of provisions, that many affairs of the kingdom wanted regulation, and that it was much better to make a league with the besieged, and to become friends of the whole nation, by permitting them to observe the laws of their fathers, since they broke out into this war only because they were deprived of them, and to return home. When Lysias had spoken thus to them, both the army and officers were pleased with the resolution.

§ 7. So the king sent to Judas, and to those that were besieged with him, and promised to give them peace, and to permit them to make use of and live according to the laws of their fathers. And they gladly received his proposals, and when they had taken security upon oath for their performance, they evacuated the temple. But when Antiochus went into it, and saw how strong the place was, he broke his oaths, and ordered his army that was there to raze the walls to the ground, and when he had done so he returned to Antioch: he also took with him Onias the high priest, who was also called Menelaus: for Lysias advised the king to slay Menelaus, if he would have the Jews be quiet and cause him no further disturbance, for he had been the origin of all the mischief by persuading his father to compel the Jews to leave the religion of their fathers: so the king sent Menelaus to Bercea,<sup>1</sup> a city in Syria, and there had him put to death, when he had been high priest ten years. He had been a wicked and impious man, and, in order to get the government to himself, had compelled his nation to transgress their laws. After the death of Menelaus, Alcimus, who was also called Jacimus, was made high priest. But when king Antiochus found that Philip had already usurped the government, he made war against him, and beat him, and took him and slew him. Now, as to Onias, the son of the high priest, who, as I before said, was left a child when his father died, when he saw that the king had slain his uncle Menelaus, and given the high priesthood to Alcimus, who was not of the stock of the high priests, being induced by Lysias to transfer that dignity from his family to another house, he fled to Ptolemy king of Egypt; <sup>1</sup> and being held in great esteem by him and his wife Cleopatra, he asked and obtained a place in the district of Heliopolis, <sup>2</sup> wherein he built a temple like that at Jerusalem. But of these things I shall hereafter give an account in a place more proper for it.

How Bacchides, the General of Demetrius' Army, made an Expedition against Judæa, and returned without success; and how Nicanor was sent a little afterwards against Judas, and perished, together with his Army; as also concerning the Death of Alcimus, and the Succession of Judas.

§ 1.

ABOUT the same time, Demetrius, <sup>3</sup> the son of Seleucus, fled away from Rome, and took Tripolis, a city of Syria, and set the diadem on his own head. He also gathered together certain mercenary soldiers, and entered the kingdom, and was joyfully received by all, who delivered themselves up to him. And when they had taken

Antiochus, the king, and Lysias, they brought them to him alive; both of whom were immediately put to death by the command of Demetrius, when Antiochus had reigned two years, as I have already related elsewhere. And now many of the wicked Jewish fugitives came together to him, and with them Alcimus the high priest, who accused the whole nation, and particularly Judas and his brothers, and said, that they had slain all his friends, and that those in the kingdom that were of his party, and waited for his return, were put to death by them; and that these men had ejected them out of their own country, and caused them to be sojourners in a foreign land; and they desired that he would send one of his own friends, and ascertain through him what mischief Judas' party had done.

§ 2. At this Demetrius was very angry, and sent Bacchides, a friend of Antiochus Epiphanes, an able man, and one that had been intrusted with all Mesopotamia, and gave him an army, and committed Alcimus the high priest to his care, and ordered him to slay Judas and those that were with him. So Bacchides set out from Antioch with his army, and when he was come into Judæa, he sent to Judas and his brothers to treat on friendship and peace, for he had a mind to take him by treachery. But Judas did not believe in him, for he saw that he came with an army such as men do not bring when they come to make peace, but only when they come to make war. However, some of the people crediting what Bacchides caused to be proclaimed, and supposing they should undergo no great harm from Alcimus, who was their countryman, went over to them, and when they had received oaths from both of them, that neither they themselves, nor those of the same views, should come to any harm, they trusted themselves with them. But Bacchides troubled not himself about the oaths he had taken, but slew threescore of them, although by not keeping his faith with those that first went over to him he deterred all the rest who intended to go over to him from doing so. And when he was gone out of Jerusalem, and was at the village called Bethzetho,<sup>1</sup> he sent and arrested many of the deserters, and some of the people also, and slew them all, and enjoined all that lived in the country to submit to Alcimus, whom he left there, with some part of the army, that he might be able to keep the country in obedience, and returned to Antioch to king Demetrius.

§ 3. Then Alcimus wishing to have his power more firmly assured, and perceiving, that if he could make the people his friends, he would govern with greater security, ingratiated himself with all by kind words, and carried himself to everybody in an agreeable and pleasant manner, by which means he soon got a great body of men and an army about him, although the greater part of them were wicked and deserters. With these, whom he used as his servants and soldiers, he went all over the country, and slew all that he could find of Judas' party. And when Judas saw that Alcimus was already become great, and had destroyed many of the good and holy men of the nation, he also went all over the country, and destroyed those that were of the other's party. And when Alcimus saw that he was not able to oppose Judas, but was unequal to him in strength, he resolved to apply to king Demetrius for assistance; so he went to Antioch, and exasperated him against Judas, accusing him of having suffered a good deal at his hands, and saying that he would do more mischief unless he were prevented, and brought to punishment, by a powerful force being sent against him.

§ 4. Then Demetrius, being already of opinion that it would be a thing injurious to his own interest to overlook Judas, now he was become so great, sent against him Nicanor, the most affectionate and faithful of all his friends (for it was he who fled away with him from the city of Rome), and also gave him as large a force as he thought sufficient to conquer Judas, and bade him not spare the nation at all. Now when Nicanor was come to Jerusalem, he resolved not to fight Judas immediately, but judged it better to get him into his power by treachery, so he sent him a message of peace, and said there was no necessity for them to fight and hazard themselves, and he would pledge him his oath that he would do him no harm, for he only came with some friends, in order to let him know what king Demetrius' intentions were, and what his views about their nation. When Nicanor delivered this message, Judas and his brothers listened to him, suspecting no deceit, and gave him assurances of friendship, and received Nicanor and his army. But while he was greeting Judas, and they were talking together, he gave a certain signal to his soldiers to seize Judas; but he perceived the treachery, and ran back to his own soldiers and fled away with them. And upon this discovery of his purpose, and the trap laid for Judas, Nicanor determined to make open war upon him, and gathered his army together, and made preparations for fighting him, and on joining battle with him at a certain village called Capharsalama,<sup>1</sup> he beat him, and forced him to flee to the citadel which was in Jerusalem.

§ 5. And when Nicanor came down from the citadel to the temple, some of the priests and elders met him and saluted him; and showed him the sacrifices which they said they were offering to God for the king: upon which he blasphemed, and threatened, unless the people delivered up Judas to him, to pull down the temple on his return. And when he had thus threatened, he departed from Jerusalem, but the priests fell into tears for grief at what he said, and besought God to deliver them from their enemies. Now Nicanor, when he was gone from Jerusalem, and was at a certain village called Bethhoron,<sup>2</sup> pitched his camp there, another army from Syria having joined him: and Judas pitched his camp at Adasa,<sup>3</sup> another village thirty furlongs from Bethhoron, having with him no more than a thousand soldiers. And when he had encouraged them not to be dismayed at the multitude of their enemies, nor to regard how many they were against whom they were going to fight, but to consider who they themselves were, and for what rewards they hazarded themselves, and to attack the enemy courageously, he led them out to fight, and joining battle with Nicanor, overcame the enemy after a severe fight, and slew many of them; and at last Nicanor himself fell fighting gloriously. Upon his fall his army did not stay, but having lost their general turned to flight and threw down their arms; and Judas pursued them, and slew them; and gave notice to the neighbouring villages by the sound of the trumpets that he had conquered the enemy. And when the inhabitants heard the trumpets they put on their armour quickly, and met their enemies as they were running away, and slew them, insomuch that not one of them escaped out of this battle, and there were nine thousand of them. This victory happened to fall on the thirteenth day of that month, which is by the Jews called Adar, and by the Macedonians Dystrus; and the Jews celebrate this victory every year thereon, and esteem the day as a festival. After this the Jewish nation was for a while free from wars, and enjoyed peace, but afterwards it returned to its former state of wars and perils.

§ 6. And now, as the high priest Alcimus meant to pull down the wall of the sanctuary, which had been there of old time and had been built by the holy prophets, he was smitten suddenly by God, and fell down speechless upon the ground, and after undergoing torments for several days, he at length died, when he had been high priest four years. And when he was dead, the people bestowed the high priesthood on Judas, who hearing of the power of the Romans, and that they had conquered in war Galatia and Iberia and Carthage in Libya, and that besides these they had subdued Greece, and the kings Perseus and Philip and Antiochus the Great, resolved to enter into a league of friendship with them. He therefore sent to Rome two of his friends, Eupolemus the son of John, and Jason the son of Eleazar, and by them begged the Romans to assist them and be their friends, and to write to Demetrius not to fight against the Jews. And the senate received the ambassadors that came from Judas to Rome, and discussed with them the errand on which they came, and granted them a league of assistance. They also made a decree concerning it, and sent a copy of it into Judæa. It was also laid up in the Capitol, and engraven on tables of brass. The decree itself was as follows. "The decree of the senate concerning a league of assistance and friendship with the nation of the Jews. It shall not be lawful for any that are subject to the Romans to make war against the nation of the Jews, nor to assist those that do so either with corn or ships or money. And if any people attack the Jews, the Romans shall assist them to the utmost of their power. Again, if any people attack the Romans, the Jews shall assist them. And if the Jews have a mind to add anything to, or withdraw anything from, this league of assistance, it shall be done with the common consent of the people of the Romans. And whatever addition shall thus be made shall be of force." This decree was written by Eupolemus the son of John, and by Jason the son of Eleazar, when Judas was high priest of the nation, and his brother Simon general of the army. And thus came about the first league between the Romans and the Jews.

CHAP. XI.

§ 1.

NOW when Demetrius was informed of the death of Nicanor, and of the destruction of the army that was with him, he sent Bacchides again with an army into Judæa, who set out from Antioch, and came into Judæa, and pitched his camp at Arbela,<sup>1</sup> a city of Galilee, and having besieged and taken those that were in caves there<sup>2</sup> (for many of the people had fled to them), he removed from thence and made all the haste he could to Jerusalem. And when he learned that Judas had pitched his camp at a certain village whose name was Bethzetho,<sup>3</sup> he hurried up against him his army consisting of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse. Now Judas had no more soldiers than one thousand.<sup>4</sup> When these saw the number of Bacchides' men they were afraid, and left their camp, and fled away, all but eight hundred. Now though Judas was deserted by his own soldiers, and the enemy pressed him hard and gave him no time to gather his army together, he was disposed to fight with Bacchides' army, though he had but eight hundred men with him; so he exhorted these men to undergo the danger courageously, and encouraged them to attack the enemy. And when they said they were not able to fight so great an army, and advised that they should retire now and save themselves, and that when he had got all his men together, he should then fall upon the enemy afterwards, his answer was this: "Let not the sun ever see such a thing as that I should show my back to the enemy; and even though this be the time that will bring me to my end, and I must die in this battle, I will rather stand to it courageously, and bear whatever comes, than by now running away bring reproach upon my former exploits, and tarnish their glory." This was the speech he made to those who remained with him, whereby he encouraged them to attack the enemy.

§ 2. Then Bacchides led his army out of their camp, and put them in battle array. He set the horse on both the wings, and posted the light soldiers and archers in front of the whole line, and stationed himself on the right wing. And when he had thus put his army in order of battle, and was going to engage with the enemy, he commanded the trumpeter to give a signal of battle, and the army to make a shout and to fall on the enemy. And when Judas had done the same, he joined battle with them, and both sides fought valiantly, and the battle continued till sunset, when Judas noticed that Bacchides and the strongest part of the army was on the right wing, so he took the most courageous men with him, and ran upon that part of the army, and fell upon those that were there, and broke their ranks, wedging himself into the middle, and forced them to run away, and pursued them as far as a mountain called Aza.<sup>1</sup> But when those on the left wing saw that the right wing was routed, they hemmed Judas in and pursued him, and came behind him, and got him in the middle of their army; so not being able to fly, but surrounded by enemies, he stood still, and he and those that were with him fought desperately, and when he had slain a great many of those that came against him, he was at last wounded and fell, and gave up the ghost, and died in a way worthy of his former famous actions. When Judas had fallen, those that were with him had no one whom they could look to, so when they saw themselves deprived of such a general, they fled. But Simon and Jonathan, Judas' brothers, received his dead body from the enemy under a truce, and carried it to the village of Modiim, where their father had been buried, and there they buried him, and the people lamented for him many days, and performed the usual solemn funeral rites. And this was the end of Judas, a noble man and great warrior, and mindful of the commands of his father Mattathias, who endured all things, both in doing and suffering, for the liberty of his countrymen. And his character being so excellent, he left behind him a glorious reputation and memory by gaining freedom for his nation, and delivering them from slavery under the Macedonians. And when he had retained the high-priesthood three years, he died.

CHAP. I.

§ 1.

HOW the nation of the Jews recovered their freedom when they had been brought into slavery by the Macedonians, and how many and great struggles their general

Judas went through, till he was slain fighting for them, has been related in the previous book; but after he was dead, all the wicked, and those that transgressed the laws of their forefathers, sprung up again in Judæa, and flourished, and distressed them on every side. A famine also assisted their wickedness and afflicted the country, till not a few, by reason of their want of necessaries, and because they were not able to bear up against the miseries that both the famine and their enemies brought upon them, deserted to the Macedonians. And now Bacchides gathered those Jews together who had apostatized from the way of living of their forefathers, and chose to live like other nations, and committed the care of the country to them. And they arrested the friends of Judas, and those of party, and delivered them up to Bacchides, who, when he had first tortured and tormented them at his pleasure, by that means at last killed them. And when this misery of the Jews had become so great, that they had never experienced the like since their return from Babylon, those that remained of the companions of Judas, seeing the nation perishing miserably, went to his brother Jonathan, and begged that he would imitate his brother and the care which he took of his countrymen, for whose general liberty he died, and that he would not let the nation be without a leader, especially in its present ruin. And when Jonathan said that he was ready to die for them, as he was indeed esteemed no way inferior to his brother, he was appointed to be the general of the Jewish army.

§ 2. When Bacchides heard this, and was afraid that Jonathan might be very troublesome to the king and to the Macedonians, as Judas had been before, he sought to slay him by treachery; but this intention of his was not unknown to Jonathan, nor to his brother Simon: and when these two were apprised of it, they took all their companions, and hastily fled into the wilderness which was nearest to the city, and when they were come to a lake called Asphar,<sup>1</sup> they abode there. But when Bacchides heard that they had shifted their quarters, and were in that place, he marched against them with all his forces, and pitching his camp beyond the Jordan, recruited his army. And when Jonathan knew that Bacchides was coming upon him, he sent his brother John, who was also called Gaddis, to the Nabatean Arabs, that he might deposit his baggage with them until the battle with Bacchides should be over, for they were the Jews' friends. But the sons of Amareus laid an ambush for John from the city of Medaba,<sup>1</sup> as he was on his journey to the Nabateans, and seized upon him, and upon those that were with him, and plundered all that they had with them, and slew John and all his companions. However, they were adequately punished for what they now did by John's brothers, as I shall relate presently.

§ 3. Now when Bacchides learnt that Jonathan had pitched his camp among the marshes of the Jordan, he watched for the Sabbath-day, and then attacked him, supposing that he would not fight on that day because of the law. But Jonathan exhorted his companions to fight, and told them that their lives were at stake, since they were hemmed in by the river and by their enemies, and had no way of escape, for their enemies pressed upon them in front, and the river was behind them. And after he had prayed to God to give them the victory, he joined battle with the enemy, of whom he overthrew many; and as he saw Bacchides coming up boldly to him, he stretched out his right hand to smite him, but he foreseeing and avoiding the stroke, Jonathan with his companions leaped into the river and swam across it, and by that means escaped beyond the Jordan, as the enemy did not pursue them over that river: but Bacchides returned at once to the citadel at Jerusalem, having lost about two thousand of his army. He also fortified many of the cities of Judæa, whose walls had been demolished, as Jericho, and Emmaus,<sup>2</sup> and Bethoron,<sup>3</sup> and Bethel,<sup>4</sup> and Timnath,<sup>5</sup> and Pharatho,<sup>6</sup> and Tekoa,<sup>7</sup> and Gazara.<sup>8</sup> And he built towers in every one of those cities, and encompassed them with strong and high walls, and put garrisons into them, that they might issue out of them and do mischief to the Jews. He also fortified the citadel at Jerusalem more than all the rest. Moreover, he took the sons of the principal Jews as hostages, and shut them up in the citadel, and in that manner guarded them.

§ 4. About the same time a person came to Jonathan and his brother Simon, and told them that the sons of Amaræus were celebrating a marriage, and bringing the bride, who was the daughter of one of the illustrious men among the Arabians, from the city of Gabatha,<sup>1</sup> and that the damsel was to be conducted with pomp and splendour. So Jonathan and Simon, thinking that a most favourable opportunity had presented itself for avenging the death of their brother John, and that they had forces sufficient to take satisfaction from them for his death, marched to Medaba, and lay in wait among the mountains for the coming of their enemies. And as soon as they saw them conducting the virgin and her bridegroom, and a great company of friends with them such as was to be expected at a wedding, they sallied out of their ambush and slew them all, and took their ornaments, and all the prey that then followed them, and so returned, after taking this satisfaction for their brother John from the sons of Amaræus, for as well as those sons themselves, their friends and wives and children that followed them perished, being in all about four hundred.

§ 5. Then Simon and Jonathan returned to the marshes of the Jordan, and there abode. And Bacchides, when he had secured all Judæa with his garrisons, returned to the king: and now the affairs of Judæa were quiet for two years. But when the deserters and the wicked saw that Jonathan and those that were with him lived in the country very quietly because of the peace, they sent to king Demetrius, and besought him to send Bacchides to seize upon Jonathan, which they showed could be done without any trouble, for in one night, if they fell upon them before they were aware, they might slay them all.

So the king sent Bacchides, who, when he was come into Judæa, wrote to all his friends, both Jews and allies, to seize upon Jonathan, and bring him to him; but when, upon all their endeavours, they were not able to seize upon Jonathan, for he was aware of the snares laid for him, and on his guard against them, Bacchides was angry at these deserters, as having imposed upon him and the king, and took and slew fifty of their leaders. Whereupon Jonathan, with his brother and those that were with him, retired to Bethalaga,<sup>1</sup> a village that lay in the wilderness, from fear of Bacchides. He also built towers, and encompassed it with walls, so that he should be safely guarded. Upon hearing this Bacchides led out his army, and took his Jewish allies besides, and marched against Jonathan, and made an assault upon his fortifications, and besieged him many days. But Jonathan did not abate his courage at the energy Bacchides displayed in the siege, but courageously opposed him, and leaving his brother Simon in the city to fight with Bacchides, he went privately out himself into the country, and got together a great body of men of his own party, and fell upon Bacchides' camp in the night-time, and destroyed a great many of them. His brother Simon also knew of his falling upon them, because he perceived that the enemies were slain by him, so he too sallied out upon them, and burnt the engines which the Macedonians used in the siege, and made a great slaughter of them. And when Bacchides saw himself intercepted by the enemies, some of them before and some behind him, he fell into dejection and trouble of mind, being confounded at the unexpected ill success of the siege. However, he vented his displeasure at this contretemps upon those deserters who got him sent by the king, as having deluded him; and wished to raise the siege in a dignified manner, if it were possible for him to do so, and then to return home.

§ 6. When Jonathan heard of his intention, he sent ambassadors to him, to propose friendship and mutual alliance, and that they should restore the captives taken on both sides. Bacchides thought this a dignified way of retiring home, and made a league of friendship with Jonathan, and they swore that they would not any more make war against one another. Accordingly they exchanged prisoners, and he returned to Antioch to the king, and after this departure never invaded Judæa again. Then Jonathan, having obtained this quiet state of things, went and lived in the city of Michmash,<sup>1</sup> and there governed the people, and punished the wicked and ungodly, and so purged the nation of them.

CHAP. II.

How Alexander, warring with Demetrius, granted Jonathan many Favours, and appointed him to be High Priest, and persuaded him to assist him, although Demetrius promised him greater Favours on the other side. Concerning the Death of Demetrius.

§ 1.

NOW in the hundred and sixtieth year it so fell out that Alexander,<sup>2</sup> the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, went up into Syria and took Ptolemais,<sup>3</sup> the soldiers within having betrayed it to him, for they were vexed with Demetrius on account of his haughtiness and difficulty of access; for he used to shut himself up in a palace of his that had four towers, which he had built himself not far from Antioch, and would admit nobody. He was also slothful and negligent about public affairs, whereby the hatred of his subjects was the more kindled against him, as I have already related elsewhere. But when Demetrius heard that Alexander was in Ptolemais, he took his whole army and led it against him: he also sent ambassadors to Jonathan, to propose mutual alliance and friendship, for he resolved to be beforehand with Alexander, lest he should treat with Jonathan first, and gain assistance from him: and this he did from the fear he had that Jonathan would remember how ill he Demetrius had formerly treated him, and would join Alexander in the war against him. He therefore gave orders that Jonathan should be allowed to raise an army, and should get armour made, and should receive back those Jewish hostages whom Bacchides had shut up in the citadel at Jerusalem. When this good fortune had befallen Jonathan by the concession of Demetrius, he went to Jerusalem, and read the king's letter in the audience of the people and of those that kept the citadel. When this was read, those wicked men and deserters who were in the citadel were greatly afraid, on the king's permission to Jonathan to raise an army and to receive back the hostages. And he delivered every one of them up to their parents. And thus did Jonathan make his abode at Jerusalem, renewing the city to a better state, and arranging everything as he pleased, and he gave orders that the walls of the city should be built with square stones, that it might be more secure against enemies. And when those that kept the garrisons that were in Judæa saw this, they all left them, and fled to Antioch, except those that were in the city of Bethsura, and those that were in the citadel of Jerusalem, for most of these were of the wicked Jews and deserters, and so did not deliver up their garrisons.

§ 2. When Alexander knew what promises Demetrius had made Jonathan, and also knew his courage and what great things he had done when he fought against the Macedonians, and also what hardships he had undergone at the hands of Demetrius and Bacchides the general of Demetrius's army, he told his friends that he could not at the present conjuncture find any one that could afford him better assistance than Jonathan, who was not only courageous against his enemies, but also had a particular hatred against Demetrius, as having both suffered many injuries from him, and done many injuries to him. If therefore they were of opinion that they should make him their friend against Demetrius, nothing was more for their advantage now than to invite him to assist them. It being therefore determined by him and his friends to send to Jonathan, he wrote to him the following letter. "King Alexander to his brother Jonathan greeting. We have long ago heard of thy courage and thy fidelity, and for that reason have sent to thee, to make with thee a league of friendship and mutual alliance. We therefore appoint thee this day high priest of the Jews, and order that thou art to be called my friend. I have also sent thee, as presents, a purple robe and a golden crown, and beg, now thou art honoured by us, that thou wilt reciprocate our sentiments."

§ 3. When Jonathan had received this letter, he put on the high priest's robe at the time of the feast of Tabernacles,<sup>1</sup> four years after the death of his brother Judas, for since that time no high priest had been made. And he raised a large force, and had a quantity of arms made. This greatly grieved Demetrius when he heard of it, and made him blame himself for his tardiness in not anticipating Alexander in getting the good-will of Jonathan, and giving him opportunity to do so. However, he also himself wrote a letter to Jonathan and to the people, the contents whereof were as follows. "King Demetrius to Jonathan and to the nation of the Jews greeting. Since you have preserved your friendship for us, and though you have been tempted by my enemies, have not joined yourselves to them, I not only commend you for this your fidelity, but also exhort you to continue in the same, for which you shall be repaid, and receive rewards and favours from us. For I will free you from most of the tribute and taxes which you formerly paid to the kings my predecessors and to myself; and I do now set you free from those tributes which you have ever paid; and besides, I forgive you the tax upon salt, and the value of the crowns which you used to offer to me; <sup>2</sup> and instead of the third part of the fruits [of the field,] and half the fruits of the trees, I give up my share of them from this day. And as to the poll-tax, which ought to be paid me for every inhabitant of Judæa, and of the three toparchies that adjoin Judæa, Samaria and Galilee and Peræa, this I concede to you now and for all time to come. I will also that the city of Jerusalem be holy and inviolable, and free from tithe and taxes to its utmost bounds: and I permit your high priest Jonathan to hold the citadel, that he may place as garrison in it such persons as he approves of for fidelity and good-will to himself, that they may keep it for us. I also make free all those Jews who have been made captives and slaves in my kingdom. I also give order that the beasts of the Jews be not pressed for our service. And let their Sabbaths, and all their festivals, and three days before each of them, be free from any public burdens. I likewise set free the Jews that dwell in my kingdom, and order that no injury be done to them. I also give leave to such of them as are willing to enlist in my army, that as many as thirty thousand may do so, which Jewish soldiers, wherever they go, shall have the same pay that my own army has: and some of them I will place in my garrisons, and some as guards about mine own body, and some as rulers over those that are in my court. I give them leave also to use the laws of their forefathers, and to observe them, and I will that they have power over the three toparchies that adjoin Judæa, and it shall be in the power of the high priest to see that not one Jew shall have any other temple for worship but that at Jerusalem. I offer also out of my own revenues yearly, for the expenses of the sacrifices, one hundred and fifty thousand drachmæ, and what money is over I will that it shall be your own. I also remit to you those ten thousand drachmæ which the kings received from the temple, because they belong to the priests that minister in the temple. And whoever shall flee to the temple at Jerusalem, or to its precincts, either owing the king money, or on any other account, let them be set free, and let their property be untouched. I also give you leave to repair and rebuild your temple, and that at my expense. I also allow you to build the walls of your city, and to erect high towers, and let them be erected at my expense. And if there be any fortress that would be convenient to have very strong in the country of the Jews, let it be built at my expense."

<sup>1</sup> Since Jonathan plainly did not put on the pontifical robes till seven or eight years after the death of his brother Judas, or not till the feast of Tabernacles in the 160th year of the Selucidæ, 1 Maccab. x. 21, Petitus's emendation seems here to deserve consideration, who, instead of four years after the death of his brother Judas, would have us read eight years after the death of his brother Judas. This would tolerably well agree with the date of the Maccabees, and with Josephus's own exact chronology at the end of the twentieth book of the Antiquities, which the present text cannot be made to do.—W.

<sup>2</sup> Take Grotius's note here: "The Jews (says he) were wont to present crowns to the kings [of Syria:] afterwards that gold, which was paid instead of those crowns, or which was expended in making them, was called the crown gold and crown tax." On 1 Maccab. x. 29.—W.

§ 4. This was what Demetrius promised, and granted to the Jews, in this letter. But king Alexander raised a great army of mercenary soldiers, and of those that joined him from Syria, and marched against Demetrius. And in the battle that ensued, the left wing of Demetrius put those opposite them to flight, and pursued them a great way, and slew many of them, and spoiled their camp, but the right wing, where Demetrius happened to be, was beaten. And as for all the rest, they ran away, but Demetrius fought courageously, and slew a great many of the enemy, but as he was in pursuit of the rest, his horse carried him into a deep bog, where it was hard to get out, and there it happened, upon his horse's falling down, that he could not escape being killed; for when his enemies saw what had befallen him, they turned back, and surrounded Demetrius, and all threw their darts at him, and he being now on foot, fought bravely, but at length he received so many wounds, that he was not able to resist any longer, but fell. And this is the end that Demetrius<sup>1</sup> came to when he had reigned eleven years, as I have elsewhere related.

*The Friendship between Onias and Ptolemy Philometor ;

§ 1.

NOW the son of Onias the high priest, who had the same name as his father, and who had fled to king Ptolemy,<sup>2</sup> who was called Philometor, lived now at Alexandria, as I have said already; and when he saw that Judæa was ravaged by the Macedonians and their kings, desiring to purchase to himself eternal memory and fame, he resolved to send to king Ptolemy and queen Cleopatra, to ask leave of them that he might build a temple in Egypt like that at Jerusalem, and might ordain Levites and priests out of their own stock. The chief reason why he was desirous to do so was that he relied upon the prophet Isaiah, who lived more than six hundred years before, and foretold that there certainly was to be a temple built to the most high God in Egypt by a man that was a Jew. Onias was incited by this prediction, and wrote the following letter to Ptolemy and Cleopatra. "Having done you many and great services in war by the help of God, and being in Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia, and having gone with the Jews to Leontopolis<sup>1</sup> in the district of Heliopolis, and to other places of your nation, I found that most of your people had temples in an improper manner, and that on that account they bore ill-will to one another, which happened to the Egyptians because of the multitude of their temples, and their different opinions about divine worship. Now I found a very fit place in a stronghold that has its name from rural Bubastis,<sup>2</sup> the place is full of wood of various kinds and sacred animals. I desire, therefore, that you will grant me leave to purge this holy place, which belongs to no special divinity and is fallen down, and to build there a temple to the most high God, after the pattern of that in Jerusalem, and of the same dimensions, for the benefit of yourself and your wife and children, that those Jews who dwell in Egypt may have a place where they may come and meet together in mutual harmony with one another, and assist you in your needs. For the prophet Isaiah foretold that there should be an altar in Egypt to the Lord God. And many other such things did he prophesy relating to the place."

§ 2. This was what Onias wrote to king Ptolemy. Now any one may conjecture his piety, and that of his sister and wife Cleopatra, by the letter which they wrote in answer to it; for they laid the sin and transgression of the law upon the head of Onias. For this was their reply. "King Ptolemy and queen Cleopatra to Onias greeting. We have read thy petition, wherein thou desirest leave to be given thee to purge the temple which is fallen down at Leontopolis in the district of Heliopolis, and which has its name from the rural Bubastis. So we cannot but wonder that it should be pleasing to God to have a temple erected in a place so unclean, and so full of sacred animals. But since thou sayest that Isaiah the prophet foretold this long ago, we give thee leave to do it, if it may be done according to your law, and so that we may not appear to have offended God at all in the matter."

§ 3. So Onias took the place, and built a temple, and an altar to God, like that in Jerusalem, but smaller and poorer. I do not think it needful for me now to describe its dimensions or its vessels, which have been already described in the seventh book of my Jewish War. And Onias found some Jews like himself, and priests and Levites to perform divine service there. But I have said enough about this temple.

§ 4. Now it came to pass that the Jews in Alexandria had a quarrel with the Samaritans, who paid their worship to the temple that was built in the days of Alexander on Mount Gerizim, and disputed about their temples before Ptolemy himself, the Jews saying that according to the laws of Moses the temple was to be built at Jerusalem, and the Samaritans saying that it was to be built on Mount Gerizim. They desired therefore the king to sit with his friends, and hear a debate on these matters, and punish those with death who were beaten in the argument. Now Sabbæus and Theodosius managed the argument for the Samaritans, and Andronicus, the son of Messalamus, for the people of Jerusalem and the Jews. And they swore by God and the king to prove their case according to the law, and they desired of Ptolemy, that he would put to death whoever he should find violated what they had sworn to. And the king took several of his friends into counsel, and sat down to hear what the pleaders said. Now the Jews that were at Alexandria were in great concern for those who were to contend for the temple at Jerusalem; for they took it very ill that any should try to take away the reputation of their temple, which was so ancient and celebrated all over the world. Now as Sabbæus and Theodosius gave leave to Andronicus to speak first, he began to show, from the law and the succession of the high priests, how every one had received that dignity, and ruled over the temple in succession from his father, and how all the kings of Asia had honoured that temple with their votive offerings and the most splendid gifts, while as for that at Gerizim, no one made any account of it, or regarded it, as if it had a being at all. By this speech and similar arguments Andronicus persuaded the king to determine that the temple at Jerusalem was built according to the laws of Moses, and to put Sabbæus and Theodosius to death. And these were the events that befell the Jews at Alexandria in the days of Ptolemy Philometor.

CHAP. IV.

How Alexander greatly honoured Jonathan, and how Demetrius, the Son of Demetrius, overcame Alexander, and became King himself, and made a League of Friendship with Jonathan.

§ 1.

DEMETRIUS having been slain in battle, as I have stated above, Alexander took the kingdom of Syria, and wrote to Ptolemy Philometor asking his daughter in marriage, and said it was but just that he should be joined in affinity to one who had now recovered the throne of his forefathers, and had been promoted to it by God's providence, and had conquered Demetrius, and was on other accounts not unworthy of being connected with him. Ptolemy received this offer of marriage gladly, and wrote him an answer, congratulating him on account of his having recovered the throne of his forefathers, and promising him that he would give him his daughter in marriage, and desiring him to meet him at Ptolemais, as he would bring his daughter there, for he would accompany her so far from Egypt, and would there give her to him in marriage. When Ptolemy had written this, he soon went to Ptolemais, and brought his daughter Cleopatra along with him; and as he found Alexander there before him, as he desired him, he gave him his daughter in marriage, and for her dowry gave as much silver and gold as became such a king to give.

§ 2. When the wedding was over, Alexander wrote to Jonathan the high priest, and desired him to come to Ptolemais. And when he came to the kings, and made them magnificent presents, he was honoured by them both. Alexander also compelled him to put off his own garment, and to put on a purple garment, and made him sit with him on his throne, and commanded his captains to go with him into the middle of the city, and proclaim that it was not permitted to any one to speak against him, or to cause him any trouble. And when the captains had done so, those that were prepared to accuse Jonathan, and who bore him ill-will, when they saw the honour that was done him by proclamation by the king's order, ran away, and were afraid lest some mischief should befall them. Nay, king Alexander was so very kind to Jonathan, that he registered him as the principal of his friends.

§ 3. Now in the hundred and sixty-fifth year Demetrius,<sup>1</sup> the son of Demetrius, came from Crete with a great number of mercenary soldiers, whom Lasthenes the Cretan furnished him with, and sailed to Cilicia. This news threw Alexander into great concern and anxiety, so he hastened immediately from Phœnicia to Antioch, that he might put matters in a safe posture there, before Demetrius should come. He also left Apollonius Daus governor of Cœle-Syria, who coming to Jamnia<sup>2</sup> with a great army, sent to Jonathan the high priest, and told him, that it was not right that he alone should live in security and authority, not being subject to the king, and that this brought him reproach among all men, that he had not yet made himself subject to the king. "Do not thou therefore deceive thyself (he continued), sitting among the mountains, and thinking thyself strong, but if thou hast any reliance on thy strength, come down into the plain, and let our armies be pitted together, and the event of the battle will prove which of us is the best man. Know, however, that the most valiant men of every city are in my army, and these are the very men who have always beaten thy progenitors; but let us have the battle on ground where we may fight with weapons, and not with stones, and where there may be no place where those that are beaten may flee to."

§ 4. Jonathan was irritated at this message, and picking out ten thousand of his soldiers, marched from Jerusalem with his brother Simon, and went to Joppa, and pitched his camp outside the city, because the people of Joppa had shut their gates against him, for they had a garrison in the city put there by Apollonius. But as Jonathan was preparing to besiege them, they were afraid he would take the city by storm, so they opened the gates to him. And Apollonius, when he heard that Joppa was taken by Jonathan, took three thousand horse and eight thousand foot, and went to Azotus,<sup>1</sup> and removing thence made his journey silently and slowly, and going up to Joppa, feigned to retire, and so drew Jonathan into the plain, as he prided himself highly upon his horse, and placed his hopes of victory principally in them. And Jonathan sallied out, and pursued Apollonius to Azotus; and as soon as Apollonius perceived that his enemy was in the plain, he came back and gave him battle. Now Apollonius had laid a thousand horsemen in ambush in a valley, that they might take their enemies in the rear, and though Jonathan perceived this, he was in no consternation, but ordering his army to form a square he charged them to repel the enemy on both sides, and set them so as to face those that attacked them both before and behind. And as the fight lasted till the evening, he gave part of his forces to his brother Simon, and ordered him to attack the enemies' lines, but he himself charged those that were with him to cover themselves with their armour, and so receive the darts of the horsemen. And they did as they were commanded, so that the enemy's horsemen, though they threw their darts till they had no more left, did them no harm, for the darts that were thrown did not enter their bodies, as they lit upon their shields, that were joined and united together, the compactness of which easily resisted the force of the darts, which glanced off without taking effect. But when the enemy grew tired of throwing darts from morning till late at night, Simon perceived their weariness, and fell upon the main body of the enemy, and as his soldiers fought with great vigour, he put them to flight. And when the horse saw that the foot ran away, neither did they stay themselves, but being very weary by the fight lasting till the evening, and their hope from the foot being quite gone, they ran away in great disorder and confusion, till they separated from one another, and were scattered over all the plain. Upon which Jonathan pursued them as far as Azotus, and slew a great many of them, and compelled the rest, who despaired of escaping, to flee to the temple of Dagon, which was at Azotus. But Jonathan took the city at the first onset, and burnt it and the villages round it, nor did he abstain from the temple of Dagon itself, but he burnt it also, and so killed those that had fled to it. Now the entire number of the enemies that fell in the battle, or were burnt to death in the temple, was eight thousand. Now when Jonathan had overcome so great an army, he removed from Azotus, and went to Ascalon,<sup>1</sup> and when he had pitched his camp outside the city, the people of Ascalon came out and met him, bringing him presents, and honouring him; and he gratefully accepted their kindness, and returned thence to Jerusalem with a great deal of spoil which he got when he conquered his enemies. And when Alexander heard that his general Apollonius was beaten, he pretended to be glad of it, because he had fought with his friend and ally Jonathan against his directions. Accordingly, he sent to Jonathan, and bore testimony to his worth, and gave him honorary rewards,<sup>2</sup> as a gold pin, which it is the custom to give the king's kinsmen, and allowed him Ekron<sup>3</sup> and its toparchy as his own inheritance.

§ 5. About this time king Ptolemy, who was called Philometor, came to Syria with a land and sea force to the assistance of Alexander, who was his son-in-law;<sup>1</sup> and all the cities received him in a friendly manner, as Alexander had commanded them to do, and conducted him as far as Azotus, where all made loud complaints about the burning of the temple of Dagon, and accused Jonathan of having destroyed it and the adjacent country with fire, and slain a great number of them. Ptolemy heard these accusations, but said nothing. Jonathan also went to Joppa to meet Ptolemy, and received from him handsome presents, and all marks of honour. And when he had escorted him as far as the river called Eleutherus,<sup>2</sup> he returned again to Jerusalem.

§ 6. But when Ptolemy was at Ptolemais, most unexpectedly he was very near destruction, for he was plotted against by Alexander, through Ammonius who was his friend. And when the plot was detected, Ptolemy wrote to Alexander, and demanded of him that he should bring Ammonius to condign punishment, informing him of the way he had plotted against him, and desiring that he might be accordingly punished. But as Alexander did not comply with his demands, he perceived that it was he himself who had laid the design, and was very angry with him. Alexander had also formerly been on very ill terms with the people of Antioch because of Ammonius, for they had suffered very much at his hands. However Ammonius at length underwent the punishment his insolent crimes had deserved, for he was killed in an opprobrious manner as a woman, having endeavoured to conceal himself in feminine dress, as I have elsewhere related.

§ 7. And now Ptolemy blamed himself for having given his daughter in marriage to Alexander, and for assisting him against Demetrius, so he dissolved his connection with him, and took his daughter away from him, and immediately sent to Demetrius, and offered to make league of mutual alliance and friendship with him, and agreed to give him his daughter in marriage, and to restore him to the throne of his fathers. Demetrius was well pleased with this message, and accepted his alliance, and his daughter's hand in marriage. But Ptolemy had still one more hard task to do, and that was to persuade the people of Antioch to receive Demetrius, because they were hostile to him on account of the injuries his father Demetrius had done them, yet he did bring it about. For as the people of Antioch hated Alexander on Ammonius' account, as I have related already, they were easily prevailed to cast him out of Antioch; and he, being thus expelled out of Antioch, went into Cilicia. Ptolemy then went to Antioch, and was made king by its inhabitants and by the army; so that he was forced to put on two diadems, the one of Asia, the other of Egypt. But being naturally a good and righteous man, and not desirous of what belonged to others, and, besides this being also wise in reading the future, he determined to avoid exciting the envy of the Romans; so he called the people of Antioch together to an assembly, and urged them to receive Demetrius; and assured them, that he would not be mindful of what they had done to his father, in case he should now be obliged by them; and undertook that he would himself be a good preceptor and governor to him; and promised that he would not permit him to attempt any bad actions; and said that for his part he was contented with the kingdom of Egypt. By these words he persuaded the people of Antioch to receive Demetrius.

§ 8. And now Alexander marched from Cilicia into Syria with a numerous and great army, and burnt and ravaged the country belonging to Antioch, whereupon Ptolemy and his son-in-law Demetrius (for he had already given him his daughter in marriage), led their army against him, and beat Alexander, and put him to flight, and he fled to Arabia. Now it happened, in the battle, that Ptolemy's horse was frightened at hearing the cry of an elephant, and threw him, and his enemies seeing this rushed at him, and gave him many wounds upon his head, and brought him into danger of death; for when his bodyguards rescued him, he was so very ill, that for four days he was insensible and speechless. However, Zabel, a prince among the Arabians, cut off Alexander's head, and sent it to Ptolemy, who recovering of his wounds, and becoming sensible on the fifth day, heard at once most agreeable news, and saw a most agreeable sight, namely heard of the death and saw the head of Alexander; yet a little after this joy and satisfaction at the death of Alexander, he also departed this life. Now, Alexander, who was called Balas, reigned over Asia five years, as I have related elsewhere.

§ 9. But when Demetrius, who was also called Nicator,<sup>1</sup> had taken over the kingdom, he was so wicked as to treat Ptolemy's soldiers very hardly, neither remembering the alliance that was between them, nor that he was his son-in-law and kinsman by his marriage with Cleopatra, so the soldiers fled from his wicked treatment to Alexandria, but Demetrius retained the elephants. And Jonathan the high priest levied an army out of all Judæa, and attacked the citadel at Jerusalem, and besieged it; it was held by a garrison of Macedonians, and by some of those impious men who had abandoned the customs of their forefathers. These men at first despised the attempts of Jonathan to take the place, relying on its strength; but some of those wicked men went out by night and came to Demetrius, and informed him that the citadel was being besieged; and he was irritated with what he heard, and took his army, and went from Antioch against Jonathan. And when he was at Ptolemais he wrote to him, and commanded him to come quickly to him there; upon which Jonathan did not intermit the siege of the citadel, but took with him the elders of the people and the priests, and carried with him gold and silver and garments, and a great number of presents, and went to Demetrius, and presented him with them, and so pacified the king's anger. So he was honoured by him, and received from him the confirmation of his high priesthood, as he had got it by the grants of the kings his predecessors. And when the Jewish deserters accused him, Demetrius was so far from giving credit to them, that when Jonathan petitioned him that he would demand no more than three hundred talents for the tribute of all Judæa and the three toparchies of Samaria

<sup>1</sup> This name, 'Demetrius Nicator,' or 'Demetrius the Conqueror,' is so written on his still extant coins, as Hudson and Spanheim inform us; the latter of whom gives us here the entire inscription, 'King Demetrius the God Philadelphus Nicator.'—W.

Peræa and Galilee, he complied with the proposal, and gave him a letter whose contents were as follows. "King Demetrius to Jonathan his brother, and to the nation of the Jews, greeting. We have sent you a copy of the letter which we have written to Lasthenes our kinsman, that you may know its contents. 'King Demetrius to Lasthenes his father greeting. I have determined to return thanks, and to show favour, to the nation of the Jews, who have acted uprightly to us. Accordingly, I remit to them the three prefectures, Apherima,<sup>1</sup> Lydda,<sup>2</sup> and Ramatha,<sup>3</sup> which were added to Judæa out of Samaria, with their appurtenances, as also what the kings my predecessors received from those that offered sacrifices in Jerusalem, and what are due from the fruits of the earth and trees, and what else belongs to us, as the salt pits and crowns that used to be presented to us. Nor shall they be compelled to pay any of these taxes either now or henceforth.' Take care therefore that a copy of this letter be taken, and given to Jonathan, and be set up in some prominent place in the holy temple." Such were the contents of the letter. And now, when Demetrius saw that there was peace everywhere, and that there was no danger nor fear of war, he disbanded his army, and diminished their pay, and was bountiful only to such foreigners as had come with him from Crete and the other islands. However, this procured him ill-will and hatred from the soldiers, on whom he bestowed nothing from this time, whereas the kings before him used to pay them even in time of peace as much as they did in war, that they might have their goodwill, and that they might be very ready to undergo the perils of war, if occasion should require.

CHAP. V.

How Trypho, after he had beaten Demetrius, handed over the kingdom to Antiochus the Son of Alexander, and got Jonathan for his Ally; and concerning the Actions and Embassies of Jonathan.

§ 1.

NOW a certain commander of Alexander's forces, an Apamian by birth, whose name was Diodotus, though he was also called Trypho,<sup>1</sup> took notice of the ill-will the soldiers bore to Demetrius, and went to Malchus the Arabian, who was bringing up Antiochus the son of Alexander, and told him what ill-will the army bore to Demetrius, and persuaded him to hand over to him Antiochus, for he said he would make him king, and restore to him the kingdom of his father. Malchus at first opposed him in this, as he did not trust him, but as Trypho urged him for a long time, he at last persuaded him to comply with his views. Such was the state of affairs with Trypho.

§ 2. Meantime Jonathan the high priest, being desirous to get rid of those that were in the citadel of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish deserters, and wicked men, as well as of those in all the garrisons in the country, sent presents and ambassadors to Demetrius, and entreated him to take away his soldiers from the strongholds of Judæa. Demetrius made answer that after the war, which he was now deeply engaged in, was over, he would not only grant him that, but greater things than that also, and begged him to send him some assistance, and informed him that his army had revolted. So Jonathan picked out three thousand of his soldiers, and sent them to Demetrius.

§ 3. Now the people of Antioch hated Demetrius, both on account of the mischief he had himself done them, and because they were his enemies also on account of his father Demetrius, who had very badly treated them; so they watched for some opportunity which they might lay hold of, to fall upon him. And when they were informed of the assistance that was coming to Demetrius from Jonathan, and considered at the same time that he would raise a numerous army, unless they prevented him, they took up arms, and surrounded his palace as if besieging it, and occupied all the outlets, and sought to subdue their king. And when he saw that the people of Antioch were become his bitter enemies, and were thus in arms, he took the mercenary soldiers whom he had with him, and those Jews who had been sent by Jonathan, and assaulted the Antiochians; but he was overpowered by them and beaten, for they were many myriads. But when the Jews saw that the Antiochians were getting the better of it, they went up to the roof of the palace, and shot at them from thence, and because they were so remote from them by their height, that they suffered nothing on their side, but did great execution on them, fighting from such an elevation, they drove them out of the adjoining houses, and immediately set them on fire. Thereupon the flames spread over the whole city, and burnt it all down, by reason of the closeness of the houses, and because they were mostly built of wood; and the Antiochians, as they were not able to help themselves, or put out the fire, turned to flight. And as the Jews leaped from the top of one house to the top of another, and pursued them after that manner, it happened that the pursuit was very surprising. But when the king saw that the Antiochians were anxious to save their children and wives, and so did not fight any longer, he fell upon them in the narrow streets and fought them, and slew a great number of them, till at last they were forced to throw down their arms, and surrender to Demetrius. And he forgave them their insolent behaviour, and put an end to the rebellion: and when he had given rewards to the Jews out of the rich spoil he had got, and had returned them thanks as the authors of his victory, he sent them back to Jerusalem to Jonathan, testifying to the assistance they had afforded him. But he behaved ill to Jonathan afterwards, and broke the promises he had made, and threatened that he would make war upon him, unless he would pay all the tribute which the Jewish nation had paid the former kings. And he would have done so, if Trypho had not hindered him, and diverted his preparations against Jonathan into concern for his own preservation. For Trypho returned from Arabia to Syria with the lad Antiochus, for he was yet but a youth in age, and put the diadem on his head: and as the whole forces that had deserted from Demetrius, because they could get no pay, came over to him, he made war upon Demetrius, and joining battle with him, overcame him in the fight, and took from him both his elephants and the city of Antioch.

§ 4. Demetrius upon his defeat retired into Cilicia, and the lad Antiochus sent ambassadors and a letter to Jonathan, and made him his friend and ally, and confirmed to him the high priesthood, and yielded up to him the four prefectures which had been added to Judæa. Moreover, he sent him vessels and cups of gold, and a purple robe, and gave him leave to use them. He also presented him with a gold pin, and ordered him to be called one of his principal friends, and made his brother Simon general over his forces from the Ladder of Tyre to Egypt. And Jonathan was so well pleased with these favours of Antiochus, that he sent ambassadors to him and to Trypho, and professed himself his friend and ally, and said he would join him in a war against Demetrius, informing him that Demetrius had made no proper return for the favours he had done him, for though he had received many kindnesses from him when he stood in great need of them, he had for such good turns requited him with injuries.

§ 5. And as Antiochus gave Jonathan leave to enlist a numerous army in Syria and Phœnicia, and to make war against Demetrius' generals, he set out at once to the several cities, which received him splendidly indeed, but put no troops into his hands. And when he was come from thence to Ascalon,<sup>1</sup> the inhabitants of Ascalon came and brought him presents, and entertained him handsomely. He exhorted them, and every one of the cities of Cœle-Syria, to forsake Demetrius, and to join Antiochus, and to assist him in his endeavour to punish Demetrius for the offences he had formerly been guilty of against themselves: and he told them there were many reasons for that step, if they had a mind to take it. And when he had persuaded those cities to promise their assistance to Antiochus, he went to Gaza, in order to induce it also to be friendly to Antiochus. But he found the inhabitants of Gaza much more alienated from him than he expected, for they shut their gates against him, and although they had deserted Demetrius, they resolved not to join themselves to Antiochus. This provoked Jonathan to besiege them, and to ravage their country, for he set a part of his army round Gaza itself, and with the rest he overran their land, and devastated it, and burnt what was in it. When the inhabitants of Gaza saw themselves suffering thus, and that no assistance came to them from Demetrius, and that what distressed them was at hand, but what might aid them was still at a great distance, and it was uncertain whether it would come at all or not, they thought it would be prudent conduct to leave off any longer adherence to Demetrius, and to cultivate friendship with the other; so they sent to Jonathan, and promised to be his friends, and afford him assistance. For such is the temper of men, that before they have had the trial of great afflictions, they do not understand what is for their advantage, but when they find themselves in any evil plight, they then change their minds, and what it had been better for them to have done before they had been at all hurt, they choose to do, but not till after they have suffered such hurt. And Jonathan made a league of friendship with them, and took from them hostages for their performance of it, and sent those hostages to Jerusalem, while he himself went over all the country as far as Damascus.

§ 6. But when he heard that the generals of Demetrius' forces were come with a numerous army to the city of Kadesh,<sup>1</sup> which lies between the land of the Tyrians and Galilee (for they supposed they should so draw him out of Syria to preserve Galilee, for they thought he would not allow war to be made upon the Galilæans, who were his own people), he went to meet them, having left his brother Simon in Judæa, who raised as large an army as he was able out of the country, and then sat down before Bethsura, and besieged it, it being the strongest place in all Judæa; and a garrison of Demetrius' kept it, as I have already related. And as Simon was throwing up earthworks, and bringing his engines of war against Bethsura,<sup>1</sup> and was very energetic in the siege of it, the garrison was afraid lest the place should be taken by Simon by storm, and they put to the sword; so they sent to Simon, and desired the security of his oath, that they should come to no harm from him, and then they would evacuate the place, and go away to Demetrius. Accordingly he gave them his oath, and so got them out of the city, and put therein a garrison of his own.

§ 7. But Jonathan removed out of Galilee from the waters which are called Gennesar,<sup>2</sup> for there he had encamped, and went into the plain that is called Asor,<sup>3</sup> without knowing that the enemy was there. When therefore Demetrius' men knew, a day beforehand, that Jonathan was coming against them, they set men in ambush on the mountain, while they themselves met him with an army in the plain: and when Jonathan saw this army ready to engage him, he also got ready his own soldiers for the battle as well as he was able. But those men that were set to lie in ambush by Demetrius' generals having appeared on the Jews' flank, they were afraid lest they should be taken between two fires and be exterminated, so they all fled headlong, and left Jonathan, except about fifty who stayed with him, and among them Mattathias the son of Absalom, and Judas the son of Chapsæus, who were leaders of the whole army. And they advanced boldly, and like men desperate, against the enemy, and so attacked them that by their courage they daunted them, and by their valour put them to flight. And when those soldiers of Jonathan that had retreated saw the enemy giving way, they rallied after their flight, and pursued them hotly as far as Kadesh, where the camp of the enemy was.

§ 8. Jonathan having thus won a glorious victory, and slain two thousand of the enemy, returned to Jerusalem. And when he saw that all his affairs prospered according to his mind by the providence of God, he sent ambassadors to the Romans, being desirous of renewing the friendship which their nation had had with them formerly. He also enjoined on his ambassadors as they returned to go to the Spartans, and remind them that they were their friends and kindred. So when the ambassadors got to Rome, they went into their senate, and said what they were commanded by Jonathan the high priest to say, how he had sent them to confirm their friendship. The senate then confirmed what had been formerly decreed concerning their friendship with the Jews, and gave them letters to carry to all the kings of Asia and Europe, and to the governors of the cities, that so they might get safe conduct back to their own country. And as they returned, they went to Sparta, and delivered the letter which they had received from Jonathan for them, a copy of which here follows. "Jonathan the high priest of the Jewish nation, and the senate and commonalty of the Jews, to the ephors and senate and people of the Lacedæmonians, who are their brothers, send greeting. If you be well, and both your public and private affairs be agreeable to your minds, it is according to our wishes; and we are well also. When in former times a letter was brought to Onias, who was then our high priest, from Areus, who at that time was your king, by Demoteles, concerning the relationship between us and you, a copy of which is here subjoined, we not only joyfully received the letter, but were also well pleased with Demoteles and Areus, although we did not need such a testimony, because we were well satisfied about it from the sacred writings.<sup>1</sup> Yet

<sup>1</sup> This clause is otherwise rendered in the first book of Maccabees, xii. 9. "For that we have the holy books of scripture in our hands to comfort us." The Hebrew original being lost, we cannot certainly judge which was the truest version, only the coherence favours Josephus. But if this were the Jews' meaning, that they were satisfied out of their Bible that the Jews and Lacedæmonians were akin, that part of their Bible is now lost, for we find no such assertion in our present copies. —W.

we did not think fit first to claim this relationship to you, lest we should seem premature in taking to ourselves the glory which is now given us by you. It is a long time since this our relationship to you was renewed; and when upon holy and festival days we offer sacrifices to God, we pray to him for your safety and victory. As for ourselves, although we have had many wars that have come to us through the covetousness of our neighbours, yet we determined not to be troublesome either to you or to others that were related to us; but since we have now overcome our enemies, and had occasion to send Numenius the son of Antiochus, and Antipater the son of Jason, who are both honourable men belonging to our senate, to the Romans, we gave them a letter to you also, that they might renew our mutual friendship. You will therefore also do well yourselves to write to us, and send us an account of what you stand in need of from us, since we are in all things disposed to act according to your desires." And the Lacedæmonians received the ambassadors kindly, and made a decree for friendship and mutual alliance, and sent it to them.

§ 9. At this time there were three sects among the Jews, who had different opinions concerning human actions; one was called the sect of the Pharisees, another the sect of the Sadducees, and the third the sect of the Essenes. As for the Pharisees,<sup>1</sup> they say that some, but not all, actions are

<sup>1</sup> Those that suppose Josephus to contradict himself in his three accounts of the notions of the Pharisees, this here, and the earlier one in the Jewish War, ii. 8, § 14, and the latter, Antiq. xviii. 1, § 3, as if he sometimes said they introduced an absolute fatality, and denied all freedom of human actions, is almost wholly groundless: he ever, as the very learned Casanbon here truly observes, asserting, that the Pharisees were between the Essenes and Sadducees, and did ascribe all to fate, or divine providence, as much as was consistent with the freedom of human actions. However, their perplexed way of talking about fate or providence, as overruling all things, made it commonly thought they were willing to excuse their sins by ascribing them to fate. Perhaps under the same general name some different opinions in this point might be propagated, as is very common in all parties, especially in points of metaphysical subtlety: however, our Josephus, who in his heart was a great admirer of the piety of the Essenes, was yet in practice a Pharisee, as he himself informs us, Life, § 2. And his account of this doctrine of the Pharisees is certainly agreeable to his own opinion, who fully the work of fate, and some are in our own power, either to do or not to do. And the Essenes affirm that fate governs all things, and that nothing befalls men but what is according to its decree. But the Sadducees take away fate, and say there is no such thing, and that the events of human life are not at its disposal, and suppose that all our actions are in our own power, so that we ourselves are the authors of what is good, and bring our troubles on ourselves by our own folly. But I have given a more exact account of all these opinions in the second book of the Jewish War.

§ 10. Now the generals of Demetrius, wishing to retrieve the defeat they had had, gathered together a greater army than they had had before, and marched against Jonathan. And he, as soon as he was informed of their coming, went quickly to meet them, to the district of Amathis,<sup>1</sup> for he resolved to give them no opportunity of coming into Judæa. So he pitched his camp fifty furlongs from the enemy, and sent out spies to take a view of their camp, and see how it was drawn up. When his spies had given him full information, and had captured some men by night, who told him the enemy intended to attack him, he, being thus apprised beforehand, provided for his security, and placed outposts outside his camp, and kept his men armed all night; and charged them to be of good courage and resolve to fight even in the night-time, if they should be obliged to do so, that their enemies' designs might not be concealed from them. But when Demetrius' generals found out that Jonathan knew what they intended they were puzzled, and alarmed to find that the enemy had discovered their intentions, nor did they expect to overcome them in any other way, now they had failed in the snare they had laid for them; for should they hazard an open battle, they did not think they should be a match for Jonathan's army. So they resolved to flee, and having lit many fires, that when the enemy saw them they might suppose they were there still, they decamped. And when

Jonathan came to their camp in the morning, and found it deserted, and understood they were fled, he pursued them, but could not overtake them, for they had already passed over the river Eleutherus,<sup>1</sup> and were out of danger. And when Jonathan returned from thence, he went into Arabia, and fought against the Nabatæans, and drove off a great deal of their cattle, and took [many] captives, and went to Damascus, and there sold all that he had taken. And about the same time Simon his brother went over all Judæa and Palestine, as far as Ascalon, and fortified the strongholds; and when he had made them very strong, both by works and the garrisons placed in them, he went to Joppa, and when he had taken it, he introduced a strong garrison into it, for he heard that the people of Joppa wished to deliver up the city to Demetrius' generals.

§ 11. When Simon and Jonathan had arranged these matters, they returned to Jerusalem, where Jonathan gathered all the people together, and advised restoring the walls of Jerusalem, and rebuilding the wall round the temple precincts that had been thrown down, and making the adjoining places stronger by very high towers; and besides that building another wall in the midst of the city, to exclude the garrison, which was in the citadel, from the market-place, and so to hinder them from any plentiful supply of provisions; and moreover making the fortresses that were in the country much stronger and more secure than they were before. And when this advice was approved of by the multitude as good, Jonathan himself superintended the building in the city, and despatched Simon to make the fortresses in the country more secure than before. But Demetrius crossed over and went into Mesopotamia, wishing to occupy that country and Babylon, and by becoming master of the upper satrapies to get a point d'appui for recovering his entire kingdom; for the Greeks and Macedonians who dwelt in those parts frequently sent ambassadors to him, and promised, that if he would come to them, they would deliver themselves up to him, and assist him in fighting against Arsaces, the king of the Parthians. Elated by these hopes he marched to them, having resolved that, if he once overthrew the Parthians, and got a sufficient army of his own, he would make war against Trypho, and eject him from Syria. And as the people of that country received him with great enthusiasm, he raised forces, with which he fought against Arsaces, and lost all his army, and was himself taken alive, as I have elsewhere related.

CHAP. VI.

How Jonathan was slain by Treachery; and how thereupon the Jews made Simon their General and High Priest: and what courageous Actions he performed, especially against Trypho.

§ 1.

NOW when Trypho knew what had befallen Demetrius, he was no longer loyal to Antiochus, but devised how he might kill him and take possession of his kingdom: but his fear of Jonathan was an obstacle to this design, for Jonathan was a friend of Antiochus. So he resolved first to get Jonathan out of the way, and then to set about his attempt on Antiochus; and resolving to take him off by deceit and treachery, he went from Antioch to Bethshan, which by the Greeks is called Scythopolis,<sup>1</sup> at which place Jonathan met him with forty thousand picked men, for he suspected he came to fight him. But when Trypho perceived that Jonathan was ready to fight, he attempted to gain him over by presents and by treating him in a friendly manner, and gave order to his captains to obey him, and by these means wished to make him believe in his good-will, and to take away all suspicions out of his mind, that so he might make him careless and heedless, and take him off his guard. He also advised him to dismiss his army, because there was now no occasion for bringing it with him, as there was no war but all was in peace. However, he begged him to retain a few men about him, and go with him to Ptolemais, for he would deliver the city up to him, and would bring all the fortresses that were in the country under his dominion; and he told him that he came there for that very purpose.

§ 2. Now Jonathan did not suspect anything at all of his intentions, but believed that Trypho gave him this advice out of kindness, and in sincerity. Accordingly he dismissed most of his army, and retained no more than three thousand, and left two thousand of these in Galilee, and himself, with one thousand, went with Trypho to Ptolemais: but when the people of Ptolemais<sup>1</sup> shut their gates, as they had been commanded by him to do, Trypho took Jonathan alive, and slew all that were with him. He also sent soldiers against the two thousand that were left in Galilee, in order to kill them also, but they, having heard what had happened to Jonathan, were too quick for them, and before those that were sent by Trypho arrived, they armed themselves, intending to depart from the country. And when those that were sent against them saw that they were ready to fight for their lives, they gave them no trouble, but returned back to Trypho.

§ 3. Now when the people of Jerusalem heard that Jonathan was taken, and that the soldiers who were with him were killed, they deplored his sad fate, and there was earnest inquiry made about him by everybody, and a great and reasonable fear fell upon them, and made them sad, lest, now they were deprived of the courage and forethought of Jonathan, the nations about them should bear them ill-will, and though they were before quiet on account of Jonathan, should now rise up against them, and, by making war against them, should put them into the utmost dangers. And indeed what they suspected really befell them. for when those nations heard of the death of Jonathan, they began to make war against the Jews as now destitute of a leader; and Trypho himself got an army together, and was minded to go up to Judæa, and make war against its inhabitants. But when Simon saw that the people of Jerusalem were terrified at the circumstances they were in, he desired to make a speech to them, and so to render them more resolute in opposing Trypho when he should come against them. So he called the people together into the temple, and there began to encourage them as follows. "My countrymen, you are not ignorant that my father, and myself, and my brothers, have hazarded our lives, and that willingly, for the recovery of your liberty. Since I have therefore such examples before me, and we of our family have determined even to die for our laws and religion, no terror shall be so great as to banish this resolution from our souls, nor to introduce in its place a love of life and contempt for glory. Do you therefore follow me with alacrity wherever I shall lead you, not being destitute of a leader willing to suffer and dare the greatest things for you; for neither am I better than my brothers that I should be sparing of my own life, nor worse than them so as to avoid and refuse what they thought the most honourable of all things, namely, to undergo death for your laws and worship of God. I will therefore give them sufficient proof that I am their very brother; and I am so bold as to expect that I shall avenge their blood upon our enemies, and deliver you all, with your wives and children, from the injuries they intend against you, and with God's assistance preserve your temple from destruction by them, for I see that these nations hold you in contempt, as being without a leader, and so are encouraged to make war against you."

§ 4. By this speech Simon inspired the multitude with courage, and as they had been before dispirited through fear, they were now raised to a good hope of better things, insomuch, that the whole multitude of the people cried out with one voice that Simon should be their leader; and that, instead of his brothers Judas and Jonathan, he should have the government over them: and they promised that they would obey him whatever he should command them. So he got together immediately all his own soldiers that were fit for war, and made haste to rebuild the walls of the city, and to strengthen it by very high and strong towers, and sent a friend of his, one Jonathan, the son of Absalom, to Joppa, and gave him orders to eject its inhabitants, for he was afraid that they would deliver up the city to Trypho; but he himself stayed to look after Jerusalem.

§ 5. Now Trypho removed from Ptolemais with a great army, and came into Judæa, and brought Jonathan with him in bonds. And Simon met him with his army at the city of Addida,<sup>1</sup> which is upon a hill, and beneath it lie the plains of Judæa. And when Trypho knew that Simon had been made their leader by the Jews, he sent to him, and would have imposed upon him by deceit and treachery, and bade him, if he would have his brother Jonathan released, to send a hundred talents of silver, and two of Jonathan's sons as hostages, that when he should be released, he would not make Judæa revolt from the king, for at present he was kept in bonds on account of the money he had borrowed of the king, and still owed. But although Simon was aware of the craft of Trypho, and although he knew that if he gave him the money he should lose it, and that Trypho would not set his brother free, and that he himself would also be delivering up the sons of Jonathan to the enemy, yet because he was afraid that he would be calumniated among the multitude as the cause of his brother's death, if he neither gave the money nor sent Jonathan's sons, he gathered his army together, and told them what offers Trypho had made, and added that the offers were a snare and treacherous, and yet that it was preferable to send the money and Jonathan's sons than to be liable to the imputation of being unwilling to save his brother through not complying with Trypho's offers. Accordingly, Simon sent the sons of Jonathan and the money; but when Trypho had received them he did not keep his promise, nor set Jonathan free, but took his army, and went all about the country, and resolved to go afterwards to Jerusalem by way of Idumæa, and went to Adora<sup>2</sup> a city of Idumæa. And Simon marched out against him with his army, and still kept pitching his own camp over against his.

§ 6. Now when those that were in the citadel sent to Trypho, and besought him to make haste and come to them, and to send them provisions, he got his cavalry ready, as though he would be at Jerusalem that very night. But so great a quantity of snow fell in the night, that it covered the roads, and lay so deep, that there was no getting on, especially for horses. This hindered him from coming to Jerusalem, so Trypho removed from thence, and went into Cœle-Syria, and made a hurried raid into the land of Gilead, and slew Jonathan there, and when he had given order for his burial, returned himself to Antioch. But Simon sent some to the city Basca<sup>1</sup> to bring away his brother's bones, and buried them in their own city Modiim,<sup>2</sup> and all the people made great lamentation over him. Simon also erected a very large monument of white and polished stone to his father and brothers, and raised it a great height, so as to be seen a long way off, and made porticoes about it, and set up pillars which were of one stone apiece, a work wonderful to see. Moreover, he built seven pyramids also to his parents and brothers, one for each of them, which were very wonderful both for size and beauty, and which have been preserved to this day. And we know that it was Simon who exhibited so much zeal about the burial of Jonathan, and the building of these monuments to his relations. Now Jonathan died when he had been high priest four years,<sup>3</sup> and had also been the ruler of his nation. And these were the circumstances of his death.

§ 7. But Simon, who was made high priest by the people, in the very first year of his high priesthood set the nation free from their slavery under the Macedonians, so that they paid tribute to them no longer; which liberty and freedom from tribute they obtained after a hundred and seventy years of the kingdom of the Assyrians,<sup>4</sup> which was

<sup>3</sup> There is some error in the copies here, when no more than four years are ascribed to the high priesthood of Jonathan. We know by Josephus's last Jewish chronology, Antiq. xx. 10, that there was an interval of seven years between the death of Alcimus or Jacimus, the last high priest, and the real high-priesthood of Jonathan, to whom yet those seven years seem here to be ascribed, as a part of them were to Judas before, Antiq. xii. 10, § 6. Now since, besides these seven years' interregnum in the pontificate, we are told, Antiq. xx. 10, that Jonathan's real high priesthood lasted seven years more; these two seven years will make up fourteen years, which I suppose was Josephus's own number in this place, instead of the four in our present copies.—W.

<sup>4</sup> These 170 years of the Assyrians mean no more, as Josephus explains himself here, than from the era of Seleucus, which, as it is known

after Seleucus,<sup>1</sup> who was called Nicator, got the dominion over Syria. Now the affection of the people to Simon was so great, that in their contracts with one another, and in their public records, they wrote, "In the first year of Simon the benefactor and ethnarch of the Jews:" for under him they were very successful, and overcame the enemies that were round about them. For Simon overthrew the cities of Gazara<sup>2</sup> and Joppa and Jamnia,<sup>3</sup> and took the citadel of Jerusalem by siege, and razed it to the ground, that it might not be any more a point d'appui for their enemies, when they occupied it, to do them a mischief, as it had been till then. And when he had done this, he thought it the best way, and for their advantage, to level the very mountain itself upon which the citadel happened to stand, that so the temple might be higher than it. And, indeed, when he had called the multitude to an assembly, he persuaded them to have it demolished, by reminding them what miseries they had suffered by its garrisons and the Jewish deserters, and what miseries they might hereafter suffer in case any foreigner should seize the kingdom, and put a garrison into that citadel. This speech induced the multitude to compliance, because he exhorted them to do nothing but what was for their own good. So they all set to work and levelled the mountain, and spent both day and night in that work without any intermission, and it took them three whole years before it was brought to a level with the rest of the city. After this the temple was the highest of all the buildings, now the citadel and mountain whereon it stood were demolished. And these actions were thus performed under Simon.

to have begun in the 312th year before the Christian era, from its spring in the first book of Maccabees, and from its autumn in the second book of Maccabees, so did it not begin at Babel till the next spring, on the 311th year. And it is truly observed by Dr. Hudson on this place, that the Syrians and Assyrians are sometimes confounded in ancient authors, according to the words of Justin the epitomizer of Trogius Pompeius, who says that "the Assyrians were afterwards called Syrians," i. 11. See Jewish War, v. 9, § 4, where the Philistines themselves, at the very south limit of Syria, in its utmost extent, are called Assyrians by Josephus, as Spanheim observes.—W.

CHAP. VII.

How Simon confederated himself with Antiochus Pius, and made War against Trypho, and a little afterwards against Cendebeæus, the General of Antiochus's Army; as also how Simon was treacherously murdered by his son-in-law Ptolemy.

§ 1.

NOW a little while after Demetrius had been captured, Trypho his governor murdered Antiochus<sup>1</sup> the son of Alexander,<sup>2</sup> who was called 'the god,'<sup>3</sup> when he had reigned four years, though he gave it out that he died under the hands of the surgeons. He then sent his friends and those that were most intimate with him to the soldiers, and promised that he would give them a great deal of money if they would elect him king. He represented to them that Demetrius was made captive by the Parthians, and that Demetrius's brother Antiochus, if he ever came to be king, would do them a great deal of hurt, in revenge for their revolting from his brother. So the soldiers, in expectation of the wealth they should get by bestowing the kingdom on Trypho, made him their ruler. However, when he had gained the management of affairs, Trypho showed his wicked disposition. For while he was a private person he paid court to the multitude, and pretended to great moderation, and so drew them on artfully to whatever he pleased, but when he had once got the kingdom, he laid aside any further dissimulation, and was the true Trypho.<sup>4</sup> And this behaviour made his enemies superior to

<sup>2</sup> How Trypho killed this Antiochus, the epitome of Livy informs us, chap. 55, viz. that he corrupted his physicians or surgeons, who falsely pretending to the people that he was perishing with the stone, as they cut him for it, killed him, which exactly agrees with Josephus.—W.

him, for the soldiers hated him, and revolted from him to Cleopatra the wife of Demetrius, who was then shut up in Seleucia<sup>1</sup> with her children. But as Antiochus<sup>2</sup> (the brother of Demetrius) who was called Soter was wandering about, not being admitted by any of the cities on account of Trypho, Cleopatra sent to him, and invited him to marry her, and to take the kingdom. The reasons why she invited him to do so were these, that her friends persuaded her to it, and that she was afraid for herself, in case some of the people of Seleucia should deliver up the city to Trypho.

§ 2. After Antiochus had come to Seleucia, as his forces increased every day, he marched out to fight Trypho, and having beaten him in battle, drove him out of Upper Syria into Phœnicia, and pursued him there, and besieged him in Dora<sup>3</sup> where he had fled, which was a fortress hard to be taken. He also sent ambassadors to Simon the high priest of the Jews, about a league of friendship and mutual alliance. And he readily accepted his proposal and sent to Antiochus great sums of money and provisions for those that besieged Dora, and supplied them very plentifully, so that for a little while he was looked upon as one of his warmest friends. And Trypho fled from Dora to Apamea,<sup>4</sup> where he was besieged and taken, and put to death, after he had reigned three years.

§ 3. Antiochus, however, because of his covetous and wicked disposition forgot the kind assistance that Simon had afforded him in his necessity, and handed over an army to his friend Cendebæus, and sent him to ravage Judæa, and to seize Simon. When Simon heard of Antiochus' iniquitous conduct, although he was now in years, yet, being exasperated at the unjust treatment he had met with from Antiochus, and with more spirit than his age warranted, he took like a young man the command of his army. He sent out his sons first with the bravest of his soldiers, and himself marched on with his army by another way, and laid many of his men in ambush in the narrow mountain passes, nor did he fail of success in any one of his manœuvres, but was too much for his enemies in every one of them. And he led the rest of his life in peace, and also himself made a league with the Romans.

§ 4. And he ruled over the Jews eight years, and came to his end at a feast through the treachery of his son-in-law Ptolemy, who also arrested his wife and two of his sons, and kept them in bonds, and sent some to kill John the third son, whose name was also Hyrcanus. But the young man perceiving them coming avoided the danger he was in from them, and made haste into the city [Jerusalem], relying on the good-will of the people, because of the benefits they had received from his father, and because of the hatred the mob bore to Ptolemy. And when Ptolemy endeavoured to enter the city by another gate, they drove him away, having already admitted Hyrcanus.

CHAP. VIII.

Hyrcanus receives the High Priesthood, and ejects Ptolemy from the Country. Antiochus makes War against Hyrcanus, and afterwards makes a League with him.

§ 1.

SO Ptolemy retired to one of the fortresses that was above Jericho, called Dagon:<sup>1</sup> but Hyrcanus, having taken the high priesthood that had been his father's before, first propitiated God by sacrifices, and then marched against Ptolemy, and when he attacked the fortress, he was in all other respects too much for Ptolemy, but was overcome by compassion for his mother and brothers. For Ptolemy brought them out on the walls, and ill-treated them in the sight of all, and threatened that he would throw them down headlong, unless Hyrcanus raised the siege. And as he thought that the more he relaxed his energy about taking the place, the more did he show favour to those that were dearest to him by preventing their sufferings, he abated his zeal about it. However, his mother stretched out her hands, and implored him not to grow remiss on her account, but to be enraged so much the more, and to do his utmost to take the place quickly, in order to get his enemy in his power, and revenge himself upon him for what he had done to those that were his dearest ones; for death would be sweet to her, though with torment, if that enemy of theirs were but brought to punishment for his wicked dealings to them. Now, when his mother said this, Hyrcanus resolved to take the fortress, but when he saw her beaten and lacerated, his courage failed him, and he could not but sympathize with his mother's sufferings, and so was overcome. And as the siege was protracted owing to this, the year in which the Jews are wont to rest came on; for the Jews observe this rest every seventh year, as they do every seventh day. And Ptolemy, being for this cause released from the war,<sup>1</sup> slew the brothers and mother of Hyrcanus, and when he had so done, fled to Zeno, who was called Cotyla, the tyrant of the city of Philadelphia.<sup>2</sup>

§ 2. Now Antiochus, being very indignant at the miseries that Simon had brought upon him, invaded Judæa in the fourth year of his reign, and the first year of the rule of Hyrcanus, in the hundred and sixty-second Olympiad.<sup>3</sup> And when he had ravaged the country, he shut Hyrcanus

<sup>1</sup> Hence we learn, that in the days of this excellent high priest, John Hyrcanus, the observation of the Sabbatic year, as Josephus supposed, required a rest from war, as did that of the weekly Sabbath from work: unless in case of necessity, when the Jews were attacked by their enemies, in which case indeed, and in which alone, they then allowed defensive fighting to be lawful even on the Sabbath-day, as we see in several places of Josephus, Antiq. xii. 6, § 2; xiii. 1, § 3; Jewish War, i. 7, § 3. But then it must be noted, that this rest from war no way appears in the first book of Maccabees, chap. xvi., but the direct contrary: though indeed the Jews, in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, did not venture upon fighting on the Sabbath-day, even in the defence of their own lives, till the Maccabees decreed so to do, 1 Macc. ii. 32-41, Antiq. xii. 7, § 2.—W.

<sup>3</sup> Josephus's copies, both Greek and Latin, have here a gross mistake, when they say that this first year of John Hyrcanus, which we have just now seen to have been a Sabbatic year, was in the 162nd Olympiad, whereas it was for certain the second year of the 161st. See the like before, xii. 7, § 6.—W.

up in the city, which he surrounded with seven camps, but accomplished nothing much at first, because of the strength of the walls and the valour of the besieged, and also from want of water, which they were delivered from by a great downfall of rain at the setting of the Pleiades.<sup>1</sup> However, at the north part of the wall, where the ground happened to be level, the king raised a hundred towers, each three stories high, and placed bodies of soldiers upon them, and made attacks every day, and cut a double ditch deep and broad, and so shut the inhabitants in. But the besieged contrived to make frequent sallies out, and if the enemy at any point were not upon their guard, they fell upon them, and did them a great deal of hurt, and if the enemy perceived them, they then easily retired. And as Hyrcanus saw the inconvenience of having so great a number of men in the city, for provisions were sooner consumed by them, and yet, as one may well suppose, great numbers did nothing, he weeded the useless ones and excluded them out of the city, and retained those only who were in the flower of their age and fit for war. However, Antiochus would not let those that were excluded go away, so they wandered about among the walls, and wasted away by famine, and died miserably. But when the feast of Tabernacles was at hand, those that were within commiserated their condition, and received them in again. And when Hyrcanus sent to Antiochus, and desired there might be a truce for seven days because of the festival, he yielded to his piety towards God, and agreed to a truce, and also sent in a magnificent sacrifice, bulls with their horns gilded,<sup>2</sup> and all sorts of sweet spices, and gold and silver cups. And those that were at the gates received the sacrifice from those that brought it, and took it to the temple, Antiochus in the meanwhile feasting his army; which was very different conduct from that of Antiochus Epiphanes, who, when he had taken the city, offered swine upon the altar, and sprinkled the temple with the broth of their flesh, violating the laws of the Jews, and the religion they derived from their forefathers; for which reason our nation made war upon him, and would never be reconciled to him. But all called this Antiochus Pious for the great zeal he showed in religion.

<sup>1</sup> This heliacal setting of the Pleiades, or seven stars, was, in the days of Hyrcanus and Josephus, early in the spring, about February, the time of the latter rain in Judæa; and this, so far as I remember, is the only astronomical character of time, besides one eclipse of the moon in the reign of Herod, that we meet with in all Josephus, the Jews being little accustomed to astronomical observations, any further than for the uses of their calendar, and utterly forbidden those astrological uses which the heathens commonly made of them.—W.

§ 3. And Hyrcanus took this moderation of his kindly, and when he saw how religious he was towards the Deity, he sent an embassage to him, and desired that he would restore their national polity. And Antiochus rejected the counsel of those that would have had him utterly destroy the nation because of their holding aloof from other nations, and did not regard what they said, but being persuaded that all they did was done from piety, he answered the ambassadors, that if the besieged would deliver up their arms, and pay tribute to him for Joppa and the other cities which bordered upon Judæa, and would admit a garrison of his, he would on these terms make war against them no longer. But the Jews, although they were content with the other conditions, would not agree to admit a garrison, because they did not associate with other people; but they were willing, instead of the admission of a garrison, to give him hostages, and five hundred talents of silver, of which they paid down three hundred at once, and sent the hostages, whom king Antiochus accepted, one of whom was Hyrcanus' brother. Hyrcanus also demolished the fortifications that went round the city: and on these conditions Antiochus raised the siege and departed.

§ 4. Now Hyrcanus opened the tomb of David, who excelled all other kings in riches, and took out of it three thousand talents, and relying on this store, was the first of the Jews that kept foreign troops. There was also a league of friendship and mutual alliance made between him and Antiochus, so Hyrcanus admitted him into the city, and furnished him with whatever his army wanted in great plenty and with great generosity, and accompanied him when he made an expedition against the Parthians. Nicolaus of Damascus bears me out as to this, who writes in his history as follows. "When Antiochus had erected a trophy at the river Lycus,<sup>1</sup> upon his conquest of Indates, the general of the Parthians, he stayed there two days, at the request of Hyrcanus the Jew, because of a national festival, whereon the laws of the Jews did not allow them to travel." And truly he did not speak falsely in saying so; for the festival of Pentecost was the next day to the Sabbath; nor is it lawful for us to journey<sup>2</sup> either on the Sabbath-days, or on a festival day. But when Antiochus joined battle with Arsaces the Parthian, he lost a great part of his army, and was himself slain: and his brother Demetrius<sup>3</sup> succeeded him in the kingdom of Syria, Arsaces having freed him from his captivity when Antiochus attacked Parthia, as I have previously related elsewhere.

How, after the Death of Antiochus, Hyrcanus made an Expedition against Syria, and made a League with the Romans. Concerning the Death of King Demetrius and Alexander.

§ 1.

BUT when Hyrcanus heard of the death of Antiochus, he straightway made an expedition against the cities of Syria, thinking, as was indeed the case, to find them destitute of fighting men, and of such as were able to defend them. However, it was not till the sixth month that he took Medaba,<sup>4</sup> and that not without his army suffering great hardships. After this he took Samega,<sup>5</sup> and the places in its neighbourhood, and besides these Shechem<sup>1</sup> and Gerizim, and the nation of the Cuthæans, who dwelt near the temple (like the one at Jerusalem) which Alexander permitted Sanballat the general to build, for the sake of Manasseh, who was son-in-law to Jaddus, the high priest, as I have formerly related, which temple was now laid waste two hundred years after it was built. Hyrcanus took also Adoraj<sup>2</sup> and Marissa,<sup>3</sup> cities of Idumæa, and subdued all the Idumæans, and permitted them to stay in their own country, if they would circumcise their foreskins, and conform to the laws of the Jews. And they were so desirous of living in the country of their forefathers, that they submitted to circumcision and the rest of the Jewish mode of life;<sup>4</sup> since which time they have been accounted no other than Jews.

§ 2. Hyrcanus the high priest was also desirous to renew the friendship they had with the Romans. Accordingly he sent an embassy to them; and when the senate had received his letter, they made friendship with him in the following manner. “Fanius (the son of Marcus) the prætor gathered the senate together on the eighth day before the Ides of February in the Comitia, in the presence of Lucius Manlius, the son of Lucius, of the

<sup>4</sup> This account of the Idumæans submitting to circumcision, and the entire Jewish law, from this time, or from the days of Hyrcanus, is confirmed by their entire history afterwards. See Antiq. xiv. 8, § 1; xv. 7, § 9; Jewish War, ii. 3, § 1; iv. 4, § 5. This, in the opinion of Josephus, made them proselytes of justice, or entire Jews, as here and elsewhere, Antiq. xiv. 8, § 1. However, Antigonus, the enemy of Herod, though Herod was derived from such a proselyte of justice for several generations, will allow him to be no more than a ‘half Jew,’ xiv. 15, § 2. But still take out of Dean Prideaux, at the year 129, the words of Ammonius, a grammarian, which fully confirm this account of the Idumæans in Josephus. “The Jews (says he) are such by nature, and from the beginning, whilst the Idumæans were not Jews from the beginning, but Phœnicians and Syrians; but being afterward subdued by the Jews, and compelled to be circumcised, and to unite into one nation, and be subject to the same laws, they were called Jews.” Dio also says, as the Dean there quotes him, from book xxxvi. p. 37. “That country is called ‘Judæa,’ and the people ‘Jews;’ and this name is given also to as many others as embrace their religion, though of other nations.”—W.

Mentine tribe, and Caius Sempronius, the son of Caius, of the Falernian tribe, to discuss what the ambassadors sent by the people of the Jews, viz. Simon the son of Dositheus, and Apollonius the son of Alexander, and Diodorus the son of Jason, all three good and virtuous men, came to treat about, namely the league of friendship and mutual alliance which existed between them and the Romans, and about other public affairs. For example, they desired that Joppa and its havens, and Gazara<sup>1</sup> and its springs, and the several other cities and places of theirs which Antiochus had taken from them in war contrary to the decree of the senate, might be restored to them, and that it might not be lawful for the king's troops to pass through their country, or the countries of those that were subject to them, and that whatever had been decreed by Antiochus during the war, without the consent of the senate, might be made void, and that the Romans would send ambassadors, who would take care that restitution should be made to them of what Antiochus had taken from them, and that they would make an estimate of the country that had been laid waste in the war, and that they would grant them letters of protection to kings and commonwealths for their security on their return home. It was decreed then as to these points to renew the league of friendship and mutual alliance with these good men, who were sent by a good and friendly people." But as to the letters desired, their answer was that the senate would consult about that matter when their own affairs would give them leave, and that they would endeavour for the time to come that no such injury should be done them; and that the prætor Fanius should give them money out of the public treasury to pay their expenses home. And thus did Fanius dismiss the Jewish ambassadors, and gave them money out of the public treasury, and gave the decree of the senate to those that were to conduct them on their way and to see that they got home safely.

§ 3. And thus stood the affairs of Hyrcanus the high priest. But as for king Demetrius, who wished to make war against Hyrcanus, he had no opportunity or chance for it, as both the Syrians and soldiers hated him, because he was a bad man. And when they had sent ambassadors to Ptolemy<sup>1</sup> who was called Physcon, begging him to send them one of the family of Seleucus to take the kingdom, and he had sent them Alexander<sup>2</sup> (who was also called Zebina) with an army, and there was a battle between them, Demetrius was beaten in the fight, and fled to Cleopatra his wife to Ptolemais, but his wife would not receive him, so he went thence to Tyre, and was there taken, and when he had suffered much at the hands of those that hated him, he was slain by them.<sup>3</sup> And Alexander took over the kingdom, and made a league with Hyrcanus the high priest, but afterwards when he fought with Antiochus the son of Demetrius,<sup>4</sup> who was also called Grypus, he was beaten in the fight and slain.

How, upon the Quarrel between Antiochus Grypus and Antiochus Cyzicenus about the Kingdom, Hyrcanus took Samaria, and utterly demolished it; and how Hyrcanus joined himself to the Sect of the Sadducees, and left that of the Pharisees.

§ 1.

WHEN Antiochus had taken over the kingdom of Syria, he was afraid to lead an army into Judæa, because he heard that his uterine brother, who was also called Antiochus,<sup>5</sup> was raising an army against him from Cyzicus. So he stayed at home, and resolved to prepare himself for the attack he expected from his brother, who was called Cyzicenus, because he had been brought up in Cyzicus.<sup>6</sup> He was the son of Antiochus who was called Soter, who died in Parthia, and was the brother of Demetrius, the father of Antiochus Grypus, for it so happened that Cleopatra had married two brothers, as I have related elsewhere. This Antiochus Cyzicenus went into Syria and continued many years at war with his brother. Now Hircanus lived all this while in peace. For after the death of Antiochus he revolted from the Macedonians, nor did he any longer pay them the least regard either as their subject or their friend, but his affairs were in a very improving and flourishing condition in the times of Alexander Zebina, and especially under the brothers Grypus and Cyzicenus. For the war which they had with one another gave Hircanus the opportunity of enjoying himself in Judæa quietly, insomuch that he amassed an immense quantity of money. However, when Antiochus Cyzicenus ravaged his land, he then openly showed his hand, and when he saw that Antiochus was destitute of Egyptian auxiliaries, and that both he and his brother were worn out by the struggles they had with one another, he despised them both.

§ 2. And he made an expedition against Samaria, which was a very strong city; of whose present name Sebaste,<sup>1</sup> and its rebuilding by Herod, I shall speak at the proper place. And he attacked and besieged it vigorously, for he was greatly displeased with the Samaritans for the injuries they had done to the people of Marissa, who were colonists and allies of the Jews, at the bidding of the kings of Syria. When he had therefore drawn a trench, and built a double wall fourscore furlongs long all round the city, he set his sons Antigonus and Aristobulus over the siege. And they brought the Samaritans to such great distress by famine, that they were forced to eat what is not usually eaten, and to invite Antiochus Cyzicenus to help them, who came readily to their assistance, but was beaten by Aristobulus, and pursued as far as Scythopolis by the two brothers, but got away. And they returned to Samaria, and shut up the Samaritans again within the wall, till they were forced to send for the same Antiochus a second time to help them, who procured about six thousand men from Ptolemy Lathurus, whom he sent without his mother's consent, so that she nearly turned him out of the succession. With these Egyptians Antiochus at first overran and ravaged the country of Hyrcanus like a robber, for he durst not meet him face to face to fight with him, not having an army sufficient for that purpose, but he supposed that by thus ravaging his land he should force Hyrcanus to raise the siege of Samaria. However, as he fell into ambush and lost many of his soldiers, he went away to Tripolis, and committed the carrying on of the war against the Jews to Callimander and Epicrates.

§ 3. As to Callimander, he attacked the enemy too rashly, and was put to flight, and slain immediately; and as to Epicrates, he was such a lover of money, that he openly betrayed Scythopolis and other places near it to the Jews, but was not able to make them raise the siege of Samaria. And when Hyrcanus had taken the city, which was not till after a year's siege, he was not content with that only, but he razed Samaria to the ground, and brought rivulets to it to swamp it, and by digging through it he made a lake of it, and took away all indications that there had ever been a city there at all. Now a very surprising thing is related of this high priest Hyrcanus, how God came to talk with him. For they say that, on the very day on which his sons fought with Antiochus Cyzicenus, he was alone in the temple as high priest burning incense, and heard a voice saying that his sons had just overcome Antiochus. And he openly declared this to all the multitude upon his coming out of the temple, and it proved true. Such was the condition of affairs with Hyrcanus.

§ 4. Now it happened at this time, that not only were those Jews who were at Jerusalem and in Judæa in prosperity, but also those who dwelt at Alexandria and in Egypt and Cyprus. For Cleopatra the queen was at variance with her son Ptolemy who was called Lathurus, and appointed as her generals Chelcias and Ananias, the sons of that Onias who built the temple like that at Jerusalem in the district of Heliopolis, as I have elsewhere related. Cleopatra intrusted her army to these men, and did nothing without their advice, as Strabo of Cappadocia attests in the following words. "Now most, both of those that came to Cyprus with us, and of those that were sent afterwards there by Cleopatra, revolted to Ptolemy immediately; only those Jews that were called Onias' party

§ 5. However, this prosperous state of affairs moved the Jews to envy Hyrcanus, and they that were the worst disposed to him were the Pharisees, who were one of the sects of the Jews, as I have stated already. And so great is their influence over the multitude, that when they say anything against the king, or against the high priest, they are at once believed. Now Hyrcanus was a disciple of theirs, and greatly beloved by them. And once he invited them to a feast, and entertained them very kindly, and when he saw them in a good humour, began to say to them, that they knew he was desirous to be a righteous man, and to do all things whereby he might please God, which was the very profession of the Pharisees. However, he desired, if they observed him offending in any point, and going out of the right way, that they would call him back and correct him. And as they testified to his being entirely virtuous, he was well pleased with their commendation. But one of his guests there, whose name was Eleazar, a man malignant by nature and delighting in faction, said, "Since thou desirest to know the truth, if thou wilt be righteous in earnest, lay down the high priesthood, and content thyself with the civil government of the people." And when he desired to know for what reason he ought to lay down the high priesthood, the other replied, "We have heard from old men, that thy mother was a captive in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes." This story was false, and Hyrcanus was very angry with him, and all the Pharisees were very indignant.

§ 6. Now there was one Jonathan, a very great friend of Hyrcanus, but of the sect of the Sadducees, whose notions are quite contrary to those of the Pharisees. He told Hyrcanus that Eleazar had cast that slur upon him according to the general opinion of all the Pharisees, and that this would be made manifest, if he would but ask them the question, what punishment they thought Eleazar deserved for what he had said. And Hyrcanus having asked the Pharisees what punishment they thought Eleazar deserved (for he would feel sure that the slur was not laid on him with their approbation, if they were for punishing him as his crime deserved), the Pharisees made answer, that Eleazar deserved stripes and bonds, but that it did not seem right to punish his taunt with death. And indeed the Pharisees generally are not apt to be severe in punishments. At this mild sentence Hyrcanus was very angry, and thought that the man had reproached him with their approbation. But it was Jonathan who chiefly exasperated him against them, and influenced him so that he made him join the Sadducees and leave the party of the Pharisees, and abolish the decrees they had imposed on the people, and punish those that observed them. From this source arose that hatred which he and his sons met with from the multitude; but of this I shall speak hereafter. What I would now merely state is this, that the Pharisees have delivered to the people a great many traditional observances handed down from their fathers, which are not written in the laws of Moses, and for that reason it is that the Sadducees reject them, and say that we are to esteem those observances obligatory that are in the written word, but are not to observe what are derived from the tradition of our forefathers. And great disputes and differences have arisen concerning these things among them, as the Sadducees influence none but the rich, and have not the populace on their side, but the Pharisees have the multitude to back them. But as to these two sects and that of the Essenes I have given an accurate account in the second book of the Jewish War.

§ 7. But when Hyrcanus had put an end to this sedition, he afterwards lived happily, and administered the government in the best manner for thirty-one years, and then died, leaving behind him five sons. He was esteemed by God worthy of the three greatest privileges, the government of his nation, the dignity of the high priesthood, and the power of prophecy, for God was with him, and enabled him to know and foretell the future. Thus, as to his two eldest sons, he foretold that they would not long continue in the government of public affairs; and their unhappy fate will be worth description, that people may thence learn how very much they came short of their father's happiness.

CHAP. XI.

How Aristobulus, when he had taken the Government, put a Diadem on his Head, and was most barbarously cruel to his Mother and Brothers; and how, after he had slain Antigonus, he himself died.

§ 1.

NOW when their father Hyrcanus was dead, the eldest son Aristobulus, intending to change the government into a kingdom, for so he resolved to do, was the first after the captivity to put a diadem on his head, four hundred and eighty-one years and three months after the people had been delivered from the Babylonish slavery, and had returned to their own country again. This Aristobulus loved his next brother Antigonus, and treated him as his equal, but the others he held in bonds. He also put his mother into prison, because she disputed the government with him, for Hyrcanus had left her mistress of all, and proceeded to that degree of barbarity, as to starve her in prison. He was also estranged from his brother Antigonus by calumnies, and eventually slew him too, though he seemed to have a great affection for him, and made him partner with him in the kingdom. Those calumnies he did not at first give credit to, partly because he loved him and so did not give heed to what was said against him, and partly because he thought the charges proceeded only from envy. But when Antigonus once returned from an expedition, and the feast of Tabernacles was then at hand, it happened that Aristobulus was fallen sick, and Antigonus went up most splendidly adorned to the temple, with his soldiers about him in their armour, to celebrate the feast, and to put up many prayers for the recovery of his brother, and some wicked persons, who had a great mind to set the brothers at variance, made a handle of the pompous appearance of Antigonus, and of the great actions which he had done, and went to the king, and spitefully exaggerated his pompous show at the feast, and insinuated that all this behaviour was not like that of a private person, but an indication that he aspired to royal authority, and that his coming with a strong body of men must be with an intention to kill him, and that his way of reasoning was, that it was silly in him, when he might reign himself, to look upon it as a great favour that he shared in the honour of his brother.

§ 2. Aristobulus listened unwillingly to these insinuations, but took care not only that his brother should not suspect him, but also that he himself should run no risk of his own safety; so he posted his guards in a certain place that was underground and dark, (he himself then lying ill in the tower which was called Antonia,<sup>1</sup>) and commanded them, in case Antigonus came to him unarmed, not to injure him at all, but if he came armed, to kill him. And he sent to Antigonus, and desired that he would come unarmed; but the queen, and those that joined with her in the plot against Antigonus, persuaded the messenger to tell him the direct contrary, how his brother had heard that he had got a fine suit of armour for war, and desired him to come to him in that armour, that he might see it. And Antigonus, suspecting no treachery, and relying on the good-will of his brother, came to Aristobulus armed, as he was, in his entire armour, in order to show it him. But when he was come to a place which was called Strato's Tower, where the passage happened to be very dark, the guards slew him. Now this death of his proves that nothing is stronger than envy and calumny, and that nothing does more alienate the good-will and natural affections of men than these passions. But here one may take occasion to marvel at one Judas, who was of the sect of the Essenes, and who never missed the truth in his predictions; for when he saw Antigonus passing by the temple, he cried out to his companions and friends, who dwelt with him as his scholars in the art of foretelling things to come, that it was good for him to die now, since he had spoken falsely about Antigonus, who was still alive, for he saw him passing by, although he had foretold that he should die that very day at the place called Strato's Tower, and the place where he had foretold he should be slain was six hundred furlongs off, and most of the day was already past, so that he was in danger of proving a false prophet. As he was saying this in a dejected mood, the news came that Antigonus was slain in a place under ground, which was also itself called Strato's Tower, having the same name as that Cæsarea<sup>1</sup> which lies on the sea. This event greatly disturbed the prophet.

§ 3. But Aristobulus repented immediately of this slaughter of his brother, on which account his disease increased upon him, and he was so disturbed in mind at such blood-guiltiness, that his inward parts consumed away owing to his intolerable pain, and he vomited blood, which one of the servants that attended upon him, when carrying it away, did, by divine providence, as I cannot but think, slip down and shed part of it at the very place where there were spots of Antigonus' blood there slain still remaining. And when there was a cry raised by the spectators, as if the servant had shed the blood in that place on purpose, Aristobulus heard it, and inquired what the matter was? And as they did not answer him, he was the more earnest to know what it was, it being natural to men to suspect that what is concealed in such cases is very bad. So upon his threatening, and forcing them by terrors to speak, they at length told him the truth: whereupon he shed many tears, in the mental agony which arose from his consciousness of what he had done, and gave a deep groan, and said, "I am not, I see, to escape the detection of God for the impious and horrid crimes I have been guilty of, but a quick punishment is coming upon me for shedding the blood of my relations. And now, most shameful body of mine, how long wilt thou retain a soul that ought to die to appease the ghosts of my brother and mother? Why dost thou not give it all up at once? And why do I deliver up my blood drop by drop, to those whom I have so wickedly murdered?" In saying these last words, he died, having reigned a year. He was called a lover of the Greeks,<sup>1</sup> and had conferred many benefits on his own country, having made war against Ituræa, and added a great part of it to Judæa, and compelled the inhabitants, if they would remain in that country, to be circumcised, and to live according to the Jewish laws. He was naturally a man of equity, and of great modesty, as Strabo bears witness on the authority of Timagenes in the following words. "This man was a man of equity, and very serviceable to the Jews, for he added a country to them, and obtained a part of the nation of the Ituræans for them, and bound them to them by the bond of the circumcision of their foreskins."

CHAP. XII.

How Alexander, when he had taken the Government, made an Expedition against Ptolemais, and then raised the Siege out of fear of Ptolemy Lathurus; and how Ptolemy made War against him, because he had sent to Cleopatra to persuade her to make War against him, though he pretended to be in Friendship with him.

§ 1.

WHEN Aristobulus was dead, his wife Salome, who was called by the Greeks Alexandra, let his brothers out of prison (for Aristobulus had kept them there, as I have said already), and made Alexander Janneas king, who was superior in age and in moderation. He happened to be hated by his father as soon as he was born, and was never permitted to come into his father's sight till he died. The reason of which hatred is thus reported. As Hyrcanus loved chiefly his two eldest sons, Antigonus and Aristobulus, he inquired of God, who appeared to him in his sleep, which of his sons should be his successor; and upon God's showing him the countenance of Alexander, he was grieved that he was to be the heir of all his goods, and had him brought up in Galilee.<sup>2</sup> However, God did not deceive Hyrcanus, for after the death of Aristobulus he certainly took over the kingdom, and slew one of his brothers, who aimed at the kingdom, but held the other in honour, who chose to live a private and a quiet life.

§ 2. When he had settled the government in the manner that he judged best, he made an expedition against Ptolemais; and having overcome the enemy in battle, he shut them up in the city, and invested it, and besieged it; for of the maritime cities there remained only Ptolemais and Gaza to be conquered, and Strato's Tower<sup>1</sup> and Dora<sup>2</sup> which were held by the tyrant Zoilus. Now as Antiochus Philometor, and his brother Antiochus who was also called Cyzicenus, were warring against one another, and destroying one another's armies, the people of Ptolemais could get no assistance from them; but when they were hard pressed by this siege, Zoilus, who occupied Strato's Tower and Dora, and maintained a legion of soldiers, and, because of the contest between the kings, aimed at kingly power himself, came and brought some small assistance to the people of Ptolemais. Nor indeed had the kings such a friendship for them, as that they could hope for any aid from them; for both those kings were in the case of wrestlers, who finding themselves deficient in strength, and yet being ashamed to yield, put off the fight by laziness, and by resting as long as they can. The only hope they had remaining was from the kings of Egypt, and from Ptolemy Lathurus who now held Cyprus, and who went to Cyprus when he was driven from the government of Egypt by his mother Cleopatra. So the people of Ptolemais sent to him, and desired him to come as an ally to deliver them, now they were in such danger, out of the hands of Alexander. And as the ambassadors gave him hopes, if he would pass over into Syria, that he would have the people of Gaza on the side of those of Ptolemais, and also said that Zoilus, and also the Sidonians and many others, would assist him, he was sanguine at this, and got his fleet ready as soon as possible.

§ 3. Meantime Demænetus, one that had great powers of persuasion, and a leader of the populace, made the men of Ptolemais change their opinions, and said to them, that it was better, as the future was uncertain, to run all hazard against the Jews, than to accept evident slavery by delivering themselves up to a master, and besides that, to have not only a war at present, but to expect a much greater one from Egypt, for Cleopatra would not permit Ptolemy's raising an army for himself out of the neighbourhood, but would come against them with a great army of her own, for she was labouring to eject her son out of Cyprus even; and while Ptolemy, if he failed in his hopes, could still retire to Cyprus, they would be left in the greatest danger possible. Now Ptolemy, although he heard of the change of mind in the people of Ptolemais, yet went on with his voyage all the same, and put in at a place called Sycaminus,<sup>1</sup> and there set his army on shore. His whole army, horse and foot together, amounted to about thirty thousand, with which he marched near to Ptolemais, and there pitched his camp; but as the people of Ptolemais would neither receive his messengers, nor hear what they had to say, he was very anxious.

§ 4. But when Zoilus and the people of Gaza came to him, and desired his assistance, because their country was laid waste by Alexander and the Jews, Alexander raised the siege for fear of Ptolemy: and when he had drawn off his army into his own country, he played a double game afterwards, privately inviting Cleopatra to march against Ptolemy, but publicly pretending to desire a league of friendship and mutual alliance with him; and he promised to give him four hundred talents of silver, and asked him in return to put out of the way the tyrant Zoilus and give his country to the Jews. Then Ptolemy gladly made such a league of friendship with Alexander, and subdued Zoilus, but when he afterwards heard that Alexander had privately made overtures to his mother Cleopatra, he broke his league of friendship with him, and besieged Ptolemais, because it would not receive him; and leaving his generals, with some part of his forces, to go on with the siege, he set out himself with the rest to subdue Judæa. And when Alexander understood that this was Ptolemy's intention, he also got together about fifty thousand soldiers out of his own country, or, as some writers have said, eighty thousand, and with this army went to meet Ptolemy. But Ptolemy unexpectedly made an assault upon Asochis,<sup>1</sup> a city of Galilee, and took it by storm on the Sabbath-day, and captured about ten thousand people, and took a great deal of spoil.

§ 5. He next tried to take Sepphoris,<sup>2</sup> which was a city not far from that which had just been sacked, but he lost many of his men there, and marched on to fight with Alexander. And he met him near the river Jordan, at a certain place called Asophon,<sup>3</sup> not far from the river Jordan, and pitched his camp near the enemy. He had eight thousand in the van of his army whom he called Hecatontamachi,<sup>4</sup> who had shields of brass. Those in the van of Ptolemy's army also had shields covered with brass: but Ptolemy's soldiers were in other respects inferior to those of Alexander, and therefore were more cautious in running hazard: but Philostephanus the tactician put great courage into them, and ordered them to cross the river which lay between the two camps. Nor did Alexander think fit to hinder their passage over it, for he thought if the enemy had the river on their back, he should the easier take them prisoners, as they could not then flee out of the battle, At first the courage and daring on both sides were alike, and a great slaughter was made by both the armies; but Alexander had the best of it, till Philostephanus divided his troops, and reinforced those that were giving way; and as there was no reserve to help those Jews that gave way, they consequently fled, and those near them did not assist them, but fled with them. But Ptolemy's soldiers acted quite differently, for they followed the Jews, and killed them, and at last those that slew them pursued after them, when they had made them all run away, and slew them till their weapons were blunted, and their hands quite tired with slaughter. And the report was that thirty thousand were slain, but Timagenes says there were fifty thousand slain. As for the rest, part of them were taken captive, and part fled to their own homes.

§ 6. After this victory, Ptolemy scoured all the country round, and when night came on, he took up his quarters in certain villages of Judæa, and as he found them full of women and children, he commanded his soldiers to cut their throats and hack them in pieces, and then to cast them into boiling caldrons, and devour their limbs as sacrifices. This command was given, that such as fled from the battle, and came to them, might suppose their enemies were cannibals, and so might be still more terrified at them upon such a sight. Both Strabo and Nicolaus affirm that they used these people in this manner, as I have already related. Ptolemy also took Ptolemais by storm, as I have shown elsewhere.

CHAP. XIII.

How Alexander, upon the League of Alliance which Cleopatra had agreed with him, made an Expedition against Cœle-Syria, and overthrew the City of Gaza; and how he slew many myriads of Jews that rebelled against him: also concerning Antiochus Grypus, Seleucus, Antiochus Cyzicenus, Antiochus Pius, and others.

§ 1.

WHEN Cleopatra saw that her son was grown great, and laid Judæa waste with security, and had got the city of Gaza under his power, she resolved no longer to overlook what he did, as he was at her gates, and as he was so much stronger now than before, would probably desire to rule over the Egyptians. So she immediately advanced against him with both a naval and land force, and made the Jews Chelcias and Ananias generals of her whole army, and sent the greatest part of her riches, her grandchildren, and her will, to the people of Cos.<sup>1</sup> Cleopatra also ordered her son Alexander to sail with a great fleet to Phœnicia, when that country revolted, and herself went to Ptolemais, and as the people of Ptolemais would not receive her, besieged the city. But Ptolemy went out of Syria, and made haste into Egypt, supposing that he should find it destitute of an army and so soon take it. But he failed in his hope. At this time Chelcias, one of Cleopatra's generals, happened to die in Cœle-Syria, as he was in pursuit of Ptolemy.

§ 2. When Cleopatra heard of her son's attempt, and that his Egyptian expedition did not succeed according to his expectations, she sent part of her army there, and drove him out of that country. And when he had returned from Egypt again, he spent the winter at Gaza. And meantime Cleopatra took the garrison that was in Ptolemais as well as the city by siege, and when Alexander came to her, he gave her presents, and paid her such marks of respect as were but proper, since he had had no other refuge but her in the miseries he endured under Ptolemy. Now some of her friends urged her to seize Alexander, and to overrun and take possession of the country, and not to sit still and see such a multitude of brave Jews subject to one man. But Ananias' counsel was contrary to theirs, for he said she would do an unjust action, if she deprived a man that was her ally of the authority which belonged to him, and that a man who was related to them. "For (said he) I would not have thee ignorant of this, that any injustice thou doest to him, will make all us Jews thy enemies." Cleopatra hearkened to this advice of Ananias, and did no injury to Alexander, but made an alliance with him at Scythopolis, a city of Cœle-Syria.

§ 3. Now when Alexander was delivered from the fear he was in of Ptolemy, he at once made an expedition into Cœle-Syria, and took Gadara,<sup>2</sup> after a siege of ten months. He also took Amathus,<sup>3</sup> a very strong fortress belonging to those who dwelt beyond the Jordan, where Theodorus, the son of Zeno, had his chief treasures, and what he esteemed most precious. This Zeno fell unexpectedly upon the Jews, and slew ten thousand of them, and seized on Alexander's baggage. But this misfortune did not terrify Alexander, but he made a raid on the maritime parts, as Raphia<sup>1</sup> and Anthedon<sup>2</sup> (the name of which last king Herod afterwards changed to Agrippiades), and took even it by storm. And when he saw that Ptolemy had retired from Gaza to Cyprus, and that his mother Cleopatra had returned to Egypt, in his rage because the people of Gaza had invited Ptolemy to assist them, he besieged their city and ravaged their country. But when Apollodotus, the general of the army of Gaza, fell upon the camp of the Jews by night with two thousand mercenaries and ten thousand of his own men,<sup>3</sup> the men of Gaza prevailed while the night lasted, as they made the enemy believe that it was Ptolemy who attacked them: but when day dawned, and that mistake was corrected, and the Jews knew the truth, they rallied and fell upon the men of Gaza, and slew about a thousand of them. But as the men of Gaza stoutly resisted, and would not surrender either for scarcity of provisions or because of the great numbers that were slain (for they would rather suffer any hardship whatever than come into the power of their enemies), Aretas, the king of the Arabians, a very illustrious person, encouraged them by promising that he would come to their assistance. But before he came Apollodotus happened to get slain, for his brother Lysimachus, envying him for the great reputation he had among the citizens, murdered him, and won over the army, and delivered up the city to Alexander. And he, when he entered first, was quiet, but afterwards set his army upon the inhabitants of Gaza, and gave the city up to sack. So some went one way, and some another, and slew the inhabitants of Gaza; but they did not behave cowardly, but opposed those that came to slay them, and slew as many of the Jews. And some of them, when they saw themselves deserted, burnt their own houses, that the enemy might get none of their spoil; nay, some of them with their own hands slew their children and wives, having no other way but this of avoiding slavery for them. But the senators, who were in all five hundred, fled to Apollo's temple (for this attack happened to be made as they were sitting in council,) and Alexander slew them, and when he had utterly overthrown their city, he returned to Jerusalem, having spent a year in the siege.

§ 4. About this very time Antiochus, who was also called Grypus, was treacherously slain by Heracleon, when he had lived forty-five years, and reigned twenty-nine. His son Seleucus<sup>1</sup> succeeded him in the kingdom, and warred with Antiochus, his father's brother, who was also called Cyzicenus, and beat him, and took him prisoner, and slew him. But not long after Antiochus,<sup>2</sup> the son of Cyzicenus, who was called the Pious, came to Aradus,<sup>3</sup> and put the diadem on his own head, and warred against Seleucus, and beat him, and drove him out of all Syria. And he fled to Cilicia, and went to Mopsuestia,<sup>4</sup> and levied money again upon the people of Mopsuestia; but they were indignant and burnt down his palace, and slew him and his friends. But when Antiochus, the son of Cyzicenus, was king of Syria, Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, made war upon him, and was beaten and slain, he and his army. After him his brother Philip<sup>5</sup> put on the diadem, and reigned over some part of Syria; but Ptolemy Lathurus sent for his fourth brother Demetrius, who was called Eucærus, from Cnidus,<sup>6</sup> and made him king at Damascus. Both these brothers did Antiochus vehemently oppose, but soon died; for when he was come as an ally to Laodice, queen of the Gileadites, who was warring against the Parthians, he fell fighting courageously. And his two brothers Demetrius and Philip governed Syria, as has been elsewhere related.

against him, for at a festival which was then being celebrated, as he stood at the altar and was going to sacrifice, the nation rose in insurrection against him and pelted him with citrons [which they then had in their hands,] because the law of the Jews requires at the feast of Tabernacles that every one should have branches of palm-trees and citron-trees, as I have elsewhere related. They also reviled him, as descended from a woman who had been a captive,<sup>1</sup> and so as unworthy of his dignity, and of sacrificing. At this he was in a rage, and slew about six thousand of them. He also constructed a wooden screen round the altar and the temple, as far as the partition within which it was only lawful for the priests to enter, and by this means he debarred the multitude from coming near him. He also kept an army of Pisidian and Cilician mercenaries; but could not so utilize the Syrians, as he was their enemy. He also overcame the Moabites and Gileadites, who were Arabians, and made them pay tribute. Moreover, he demolished Amathus, as Theodorus durst not fight with him.<sup>2</sup> But engaging in battle with Obedas, king of the Arabians, he fell into an ambush in places that were rugged and difficult to travel over, and was thrown down into a deep ravine by a multitude of camels at Gadara a village of Gilead, and barely escaped with his life. From thence he fled to Jerusalem, where because of his ill success the nation attacked him, and he fought against them for six years, and slew no less than fifty thousand of them. And when he begged that they would desist from their ill-will to him, they hated him so much the more on account of what had happened; and when he asked them what he ought to do, they all cried out that he ought to die, and sent to Demetrius Eucærus, and begged him to make an alliance with them.

CHAP. XIV.

How Demetrius Eucærus overcame Alexander, and yet in a little time retired out of the Country for fear of the Jews. As also how Alexander slew many of the Jews, and thereby got rid of his Troubles. Concerning the Death of Demetrius.

§ 1.

SO Demetrius came with an army, which he swelled with those that invited him, and encamped near the city of Shechem;<sup>1</sup> and Alexander, with six thousand two hundred mercenaries, and about twenty thousand Jews who were of his party, marched against Demetrius, who had three thousand horse and forty thousand foot. Now there was much negotiation on both sides, Demetrius trying to make the mercenaries that were with Alexander desert because they were Greeks, and Alexander trying to make the Jews desert that were with Demetrius. However, neither of them could persuade the opposite side to do as they wished, but a battle ensued, in which Demetrius was the conqueror, and all Alexander's mercenaries were killed, when they had given proof of their fidelity and courage. A great number of Demetrius's soldiers were slain also.

§ 2. Now when Alexander fled to the mountains, six thousand of the Jews mustered to him, moved by pity at his reverse. So Demetrius was afraid, and retired out of the country; after which the Jews fought against Alexander, and were beaten, and slain in great numbers in the several battles which they had. And when he had shut up the most powerful of them in the city of Bethome,<sup>2</sup> he besieged them therein; and when he had taken the city, and got the inhabitants into his power, he brought them to Jerusalem, and did one of the most barbarous actions in the world to them: for as he was feasting with his concubines in the sight of all the city, he ordered about eight hundred of them to be crucified, and while they were still living ordered the throats of their children and wives to be cut before their eyes. This was indeed by way of revenge for the injuries they had done him, but this punishment which he exacted was inhuman, though we suppose him to have been ever so much distressed, as it is probable he was, by his wars with them, for he had by their means come to the last degree of hazard both as to his life and kingdom. For they were not satisfied to fight only by themselves against him, but introduced foreigners also for the same purpose; nay, at last they reduced him to that degree of necessity, that he was forced to deliver back to the king of Arabia the land of Moab and Gilead, which he had subdued, and the places that were in them, that they might not join the Jews in the war against him, and they also did ten thousand other things to affront and outrage him. However, this barbarity seems to have been without any necessity, and on account of that extreme savageness he got the name of Thracidas among the Jews.<sup>1</sup> And the soldiers who had fought against him, who were about eight thousand in number, fled by night, and continued in exile all the time that Alexander lived. And he, being now freed from any further disturbance from them, reigned the rest of his time in the utmost tranquillity.

§ 3. Now when Demetrius departed from Judæa, he went to Beroea,<sup>2</sup> and besieged his brother Philip, taking with him ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse. But Strato, the tyrant of Beroea and ally of Philip, called in Zizus the ruler of the Arabian tribes, and Mithridates Sinaces, the ruler of the Parthians. And they coming with a large force, and besieging Demetrius in his intrenched camp, into which they had driven him with their arrows, compelled those that were with him to surrender from want of water. And they took a great deal of spoil out of that country, and captured Demetrius himself, whom they sent to Mithridates, who was then king of Parthia, but as to those of the people of Antioch whom they took captive, they restored them to the people of Antioch without any ransom. Now Mithridates, the king of Parthia, held Demetrius in great honour, till Demetrius ended his life by sickness. And Philip, directly the fight was over, went to Antioch, and made himself master of it, and reigned over Syria.

CHAP. XV.

How Antiochus, who was called Dionysus, and after him Aretas, made Expeditions into Judæa; as also, how Alexander took many Cities, and then returned to Jerusalem, and died after an Illness of Three Years, and what Advice he gave to Alexandra.

§ 1.

AFTER this, Antiochus, who was called Dionysus, and was Philip's brother, aspired to the dominion, and went to Damascus, and got the power into his hands, and there reigned. But as he was making an expedition against the Arabians, his brother Philip heard of it, and went to Damascus, where Milesius, who had been left governor of the citadel, delivered up the city of the Damascenes to him; but as Philip was ungrateful to him, and bestowed upon him nothing of what he hoped for when he received him into the city, but wished to have it believed that it was rather delivered up out of fear of him than owing to the kindness of Milesius, and because he did not reward him as he ought to have done, he was suspected by him, and so lost Damascus again; for when he was going into the Hippodrome, Milesius shut him out of it, and kept Damascus for Antiochus. And he, hearing how Philip's affairs stood, came back from Arabia, and also immediately marched into Judæa, with eight thousand foot, and eight hundred horse. And Alexander, being afraid at his coming, dug a deep trench from Chabarzaba,<sup>1</sup> which is now called Anti-patris,<sup>1</sup> to the sea near Joppa,<sup>2</sup> where alone an army could be brought against him. He also raised a wall one hundred and fifty furlongs in length, and erected on it wooden towers and curtains, and waited for the coming of Antiochus, who burnt all those works, and made his army pass by that way into Arabia. The Arabian king [Aretas] at first retired, but afterwards suddenly appeared with ten thousand cavalry. Antiochus met them and fought desperately, but when he had got the victory in his part of the battle, and was bringing up reinforcements to the part of his army that was hard pressed, he got slain. And when Antiochus had fallen, his army fled to the village of Cana,<sup>3</sup> where most of them perished by famine.

§ 2. After him Aretas reigned over Coele-Syria, being called to the government by those that held Damascus, because of the hatred they bore to Ptolemy the son of Mennæus. He also made thence an expedition into Judæa, and beat Alexander in battle, near a place called Addida,<sup>4</sup> but upon certain conditions agreed on between them retired from Judæa.

§ 3. But Alexander marched again to the city Dium,<sup>5</sup> and took it, and then made an expedition against Essa,<sup>6</sup> where most of Zeno's treasures happened to be, and surrounded the place with three walls, and when he had taken the city by assault, he marched on to Gaulana<sup>7</sup> and Seleucia.<sup>8</sup> And when he had taken those cities, he also took the valley which is called the valley of Antiochus, as also the fortress of Gamala.<sup>9</sup> He also accused Demetrius, who was governor of those places, of many crimes, and turned him out: and after he had spent three years in this war, he returned to his own country, and the Jews joyfully received him because of his good success.

The Jews also possessed others of the principal cities in Syria, which had been destroyed.

§ 5. After this king Alexander, although he fell ill from hard drinking, and was troubled with a quartan ague for three years, yet would not leave off going out with his army, till he was quite worn out with the labours he had undergone, and died on the borders of the Gerasenes,<sup>26</sup> while besieging Ragaba,<sup>27</sup> a fortress beyond the Jordan. But when his queen saw that he was on the point of death, and had no longer any hope of surviving, she came to him weeping and lamenting, and bewailed the desolate condition which herself and her sons would be left in, and said to him, "To whom dost thou thus leave me and my children, who are destitute of all other support, and that though thou knowest how much ill-will thy nation bears thee?" securely for herself and her children : namely, to conceal his death from the soldiers till she should have taken Ragaba, and after that to go in triumph as upon a victory to Jerusalem, and put some authority into the hands of the Pharisees, for they would commend her for the honour she did them, and would reconcile the nation to her ; for they had great authority among the Jews, both to injure such as hated them, and to bring advantages to those who were friendly disposed to them, for they were believed most of all by the multitude when they spoke any severe thing against others, though it was only out of envy. And he said that it was owing to them, whom indeed he had insulted, that he had incurred the displeasure of the nation. “ Do thou therefore,” he added, “ when thou art come to Jerusalem, send for the leading men among them, and show them my dead body, and with great show of sincerity, give them leave to use it as they themselves please, whether they will dishonour my corpse by refusing it burial, as having suffered much at my hands, or whether in their anger they will offer any other outrage to that body. Promise them also that thou wilt do nothing without consulting them in the affairs of the kingdom. If thou dost but say this to them, I shall have the honour of a more glorious funeral from them than I could have had from thee, for when it is in their power to abuse my dead body, they will do it no injury at all, and thou wilt rule in safety.”<sup>1</sup> When he had given his wife this advice he died, after having reigned twenty-seven years, and lived fifty years save one.

<sup>1</sup> It seems, by this dying advice of Alexander to his wife, that he had himself pursued the measures of his father Hircanus, and taken part with the Sadducees, who kept close to the written law, against the Pharisees, who had introduced their own traditions, chap. 7, § 2, and that he now saw a political necessity of submitting to the Pharisees, and their traditions hereafter, if his widow and family were to retain their hold over the Jewish nation.—W.

CHAP. XVI.

How Alexandra, by gaining the good-will of the Pharisees, retained the Kingdom Nine Years, and then, having done many glorious Actions, died.

§ 1.

AND Alexandra, when she had taken the fortress, acted as her husband had suggested to her, and spoke to the Pharisees, and put all things into their hands, both as to the dead body, and as to the affairs of the kingdom, and so pacified their anger against Alexander, and made them her friends and well-wishers. So they went among the multitude, and made speeches to them, extolling the actions of Alexander, and telling them that they had lost a righteous king; and by the commendation they gave him, they induced them to grieve and be in heaviness for him, so that he had a more splendid funeral than had any of the kings before him. Alexander left behind him two sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, but committed the kingdom to Alexandra. Now as to her two sons, Hyrcanus was indeed unfit to manage public affairs, and delighted rather in a quiet life; but the younger, Aristobulus, was active and bold. And Alexandra herself was loved by the multitude, because she seemed displeased at the offences her husband had been guilty of.

§ 2. Now she made Hyrcanus high priest, because he was the elder, but much more because he did not meddle with politics, and she allowed the Pharisees to do everything, and also ordered the multitude to be obedient to them. She also restored those practices which the Pharisees had introduced, according to the traditions of their forefathers, and which her father-in-law Hyrcanus had abrogated. She had indeed the name of queen, but the Pharisees had all the authority; for it was they who restored such as had been banished, and set such as were prisoners at liberty, in a word, they differed in nothing from lords of the realm. However, the queen also looked after the affairs of the kingdom, and got together a great body of mercenary soldiers, and increased her own army to such a degree, that she became terrible to the neighbouring tyrants, and took hostages of them. And the country was entirely at peace, except for the Pharisees; for they disturbed the queen, and urged her to kill those who had persuaded Alexander to slay the eight hundred men; after which they themselves cut the throat of one of them, Diogenes, and after him they did the same to several, one after another, till the leading men of the opposite party came to the palace, and Aristobulus with them (for he seemed to be displeased at what was done, and it appeared clear that, if he had an opportunity, he would not permit his mother to go on so), and reminded the queen what great dangers they had gone through, and what great things they had done, whereby they had demonstrated the firmness of their fidelity to their master, and had in consequence received the greatest marks of favour from him; and they begged of her, that she would not utterly blast their hopes, as it now happened, that after having escaped the hazards that arose from their [open] enemies, they were cut off at home, by their [private] enemies, like brute beasts, without any remedy whatever. They said also, that if their adversaries would be satisfied with those that had been slain already, they would take what had been done patiently, on account of their natural love to their masters, but if they must expect the same for the future also, they implored of her dismissal from her service, for they could not bear to think of attempting any method for their deliverance without her, but would die willingly before the palace, if she would not forgive them. They said also that it would be a great disgrace both for themselves and for the queen, if when they were neglected by her, they should be welcomed by her husband's enemies, for the Arabian Aretas and the other monarchs would give any pay if they could get such men as mercenaries, whose very names, before their voices were heard, would be probably terrible to them. But if they could not obtain this their second request, and she was determined to prefer the Pharisees before them, let her place every one of them in her fortresses; for if some demon had a spite against Alexander's house, they would be willing to live in a lowly station.

§ 3. As these men used much language of this kind, and called upon Alexander's ghost to commiserate those already slain, and those in danger of being so, all the bystanders broke out into tears; especially Aristobulus, who showed what his sentiments were, and used many reproachful expressions to his mother. He said also that they were indeed themselves the authors of their own calamities, seeing they had unreasonably permitted a woman, who was mad with ambition, to reign over them, when there were sons in the flower of their age fitter to rule over the kingdom. Then Alexandra, not knowing how to refuse with any decency, committed all the fortresses to them, except Hyrcania<sup>1</sup> and Alexandrium<sup>2</sup> and Machærus,<sup>3</sup> where her principal treasures were. A little while after she also sent her son Aristobulus with an army to Damascus against Ptolemy, who was called Mennæus, who was a bad neighbour to that city; but he did nothing considerable against him, and returned home.

§ 4. About this time news was brought that Tigranes,<sup>4</sup> the king of Armenia, had made an irruption into Syria with five hundred thousand soldiers,<sup>5</sup> and was coming to attack Judæa. This news, as may well be supposed, terrified the queen and nation. Accordingly, they sent him many and very valuable presents, as also ambassadors, as he was besieging Ptolemais. For queen Selene, who was also called Cleopatra, ruled then over Syria, and had persuaded the inhabitants to exclude Tigranes. So the Jewish ambassadors interceded with him, and entreated that he would decree nothing severe against the queen or nation. He commended them for the court they paid him at so great a distance, and gave them good hopes of his favour. But as soon as Ptolemais was taken, news came to Tigranes that Lucullus, in his pursuit of Mithridates, could not light upon him (for he had fled into Iberia), but was laying waste Armenia, and besieging its cities. Now when Tigranes knew this, he returned home.

<sup>5</sup> The number of 500,000, or even 300,000, as one Greek copy, with the Latin copies, have it, for Tigranes' army, that came out of Armenia into Syria and Judæa, seems much too large. We have already had several such extravagant numbers in Josephus's present copies. I incline to Dr. Hudson's emendation here, which supposes them but 40,000.—W.

§ 5. After this, when the queen was fallen dangerously ill, Aristobulus resolved to attempt to seize the kingdom, so he stole away secretly by night with only one of his servants, and went to the fortresses wherein his father's friends were settled. For as he had been a great while displeased at his mother's conduct, so was he now much more afraid that, upon her death, their whole family would be in the power of the Pharisees, for he saw the inability of his brother the heir apparent. Now no one had any idea of what he was going to do except his wife, whom he left at Jerusalem with their children. He went first of all to Agaba,<sup>1</sup> where was Galæstes, one of the influential men before mentioned, and was received by him. When it was day the queen perceived that Aristobulus had fled; and she did not for some time suppose that his departure had any revolutionary intention; but when messengers came one after another with the news that he had secured the first fortress, the second fortress, and all the fortresses (for as soon as one began, they all submitted to his disposal), then the queen and nation were in the greatest alarm, for they were aware that it would not be long ere Aristobulus would be able to settle himself firmly in the government. What they were principally afraid of was that he would inflict punishment upon them for the mad treatment his house had had from them: so they resolved to take his wife and children into custody, and kept them in the fortress that was over the temple.<sup>2</sup> Now a mighty conflux of people came to Aristobulus from all parts, insomuch that he had a kind of royal retinue about him; for in little more than fifteen days he got twenty-two fortresses, which gave him the opportunity of raising an army from Libanus and Trachonitis and the monarchs. For men are easily led by majorities, and readily submit to them; and besides this they thought that by affording him their assistance when he could not expect it, they as well as he would enjoy the advantages that would come by his being king, because they had been the cause of his gaining the kingdom. Now Hyrcanus and the elders of the Jews went in to the queen, and desired that she would give them her views on the present state of affairs, for Aristobulus was already lord of almost all the kingdom, by possessing so many strongholds, and it was absurd for them to take any counsel by themselves, however ill she were, whilst she was alive, and the danger would be upon them in no long time. And she bade them do what they thought best to be done: for they had many circumstances in their favour still remaining, a nation in good heart, an army, and money in their several treasuries; but she had small concern for public affairs now, as the strength of her body already failed her.

§ 6. Now a little while after she had said this to them, she died, when she had reigned nine years, and had lived in all seventy-three. She was a woman who showed no signs of the weakness of her sex; for she was sagacious to the highest degree in her love of rule, and demonstrated at once by her doings her practical genius, and the little understanding that men show who make frequent mistakes in ruling. For she always preferred the present to the future, and ranked power above all things, and where that was at stake had no regard to what was good or right. However, she brought the affairs of her house to such an unfortunate condition, that she was the cause of its losing, and that at no distant date, that authority which she had obtained by much toil and danger, from a desire of interfering in what did not belong to a woman, and by siding in her opinions with those that bore ill-will to her family, and by leaving the administration destitute of proper support; and indeed her management during her administration, while she was alive, was such as filled the palace after her death with calamities and confusion. However, although this had been her fashion of governing, she preserved the nation in peace. Such was the conclusion of the reign of Alexandra.
