BOOK XIV.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF THIRTY-TWO YEARS.—FROM THE DEATH OF QUEEN ALEXANDRA TO THE DEATH OF ANTIGONUS.

CHAP. I.

The War between Aristobulus and Hyrcanus about the Kingdom ; and how they made an Agreement that Aristobulus should be King, and Hyrcanus live a private Life : as also, how Hyrcanus, a little afterwards, was persuaded by Antipater to flee to Aretas.

§ 1.

I HAVE related the reign of queen Alexandra and her death in the previous book, and will now speak of what followed next, having nothing so much at heart as this, that I may omit no facts, either from ignorance or fault of memory. For I am upon the history and relation of such things as most people are unacquainted with because of their antiquity, and I aim to do it with a proper beauty of style, so far as that is derived from words well arranged, and from such ornaments of speech also as may contribute to the pleasure of my readers, that they may imbibe the knowledge of what I write with satisfaction and pleasure. But the principal end that authors ought to aim at is to speak accurately and truly, for the satisfaction of those that are unacquainted with the transactions, and obliged to believe what writers tell them.

§ 2. Now Hyrcanus began his high priesthood in the third year of the hundred and seventy-seventh Olympiad, when Quintus Hortensius and Quintus Metellus, who was also called Creticus, were consuls at Rome. And Aristobulus directly began to make war against him, and as it came to a battle at Jericho, many of the soldiers of Hyrcanus deserted him, and went over to his brother; upon which Hyrcanus fled into the citadel, where Aristobulus' wife and children had been imprisoned by his mother, as I have said already, and attacked and overcame his adversaries that had fled to the temple precincts. And when he had sent a message to his brother to treat with him, he laid aside his enmity to him on these conditions, that Aristobulus should be king, and that he should live without meddling in public affairs, and quietly enjoy his private fortune. When they had agreed upon these terms in the temple, and had confirmed the agreement with oaths, and the giving one another their right hands, and embracing one another in the sight of the whole multitude, they departed, Aristobulus to the palace, and Hyrcanus, as a private man, to the house of Aristobulus.

§ 3. But there was a certain friend of Hyrcanus, an Idumæan, called Antipater, who was very rich, and by nature an energetic and factious man; he was at enmity with Aristobulus, and had differences with him, from his goodwill to Hyrcanus. Nicolaus of Damascus says indeed that Antipater was of the stock of the leading Jews who returned from Babylon into Judæa; but that assertion of his was made to gratify Herod, who was Antipater's son, and who, by certain revolutions of fortune, came afterwards to be king of the Jews, whose history I shall give in its proper place. Now this Antipater was at first called Antipas, and that was his father's name also, of whom they relate that king Alexander and his wife made him governor of all Idumæa, and that he made a league of friendship with those Arabians and Gazites and Ascalonites that thought as he did, and by many and large presents made them his fast friends. But the younger Antipater was suspicious of the power of Aristobulus, and was afraid that he might do him some mischief because of his hatred to him, so he stirred up the most powerful of the Jews privately against him by detraction, and said that it was wrong to overlook the conduct of Aristobulus, who had got the government unrighteously, and ejected his brother out of it, who was the elder, and ought to retain what belonged to him by primogeniture. And he perpetually made the same speeches to Hyrcanus, and told him, that his own life would be in danger, unless he was on his guard, and got rid of Aristobulus; for he said that the friends of Aristobulus omitted no opportunity of advising him to kill him, as being then, and not before, sure to retain the kingdom. Hyrcanus gave no credit to these words of his, being of a good disposition, and one that did not readily, owing to his mild character, listen to calumny. This temper of his, not disposing him to meddle in public affairs, and want of spirit, made him appear to spectators degenerate and unmanly; while Aristobulus was of a contrary temper, an active man and wide awake.

§ 4. When Antipater saw that Hyrcanus did not attend to what he said, he ceased not day by day to charge feigned crimes upon Aristobulus, and to calumniate him as desirous to kill him, and by being always at him he at last with great difficulty persuaded him to flee to Aretas, the king of Arabia, and promised, that if he would comply with his advice, he would also himself assist him. When Hyrcanus heard this, he said that it was for his advantage to flee to Aretas; for Arabia is a country that borders upon Judæa. However, Hyrcanus sent Antipater first to the king of Arabia, in order to receive assurances from him, that when he should come as a suppliant to him, he would not deliver him up to his enemies. And Antipater, having received such assurances, returned to Hyrcanus to Jerusalem. Not long afterwards he took Hyrcanus, and stole out of the city by night, and travelled fast, and brought him to the city called Petra,<sup>1</sup> where the palace of Aretas was; and as he was a very intimate friend of that king's he urged him to bring back Hyrcanus into Judæa, and continued his suit every day without intermission, and also offered him presents, and at last he prevailed with Aretas. Moreover, Hyrcanus promised him, that when he had been restored, and had recovered his kingdom, he would give back the territory and twelve cities which his father Alexander had

§ 1.

AFTER these promises had been made to Aretas, he marched against Aristobulus with an army of fifty thousand horse and foot, and beat him in battle. And as after that victory many went over to Hyrcanus as deserters, Aristobulus was left alone, and fled to Jerusalem. Upon this the king of Arabia took all his army, and made an assault upon the temple, and besieged Aristobulus therein, the people still supporting Hyrcanus and assisting him in the siege, while none but the priests continued with Aristobulus. So Aretas united the forces of the Arabians and Jews together, and pressed on the siege vigorously. As this happened at the time when the feast of Unleavened Bread, which we call the Passover, was being celebrated, the principal men among the Jews left the country and fled into Egypt. Now there was one whose name was Onias, a righteous man and beloved of God, who, in a certain drought, had prayed to God to put an end to the intense heat, and whose prayer God had heard, and had sent rain. This man had hid himself, because he saw that this civil war would last a long while. However, they brought him to the Jewish camp, and desired, that as by his prayers he had once put an end to the drought, so he would in like manner utter imprecations on Aristobulus and those of his faction. And when, upon his refusing and making excuses, he was still compelled to speak by the multitude, he stood up in the midst of them, and said, "O God, the king of the whole world, since those that stand now with me are thy people, and those that are besieged are also thy priests, I beseech thee, that thou wilt neither hearken to the prayers of those against these, nor bring to effect what these pray against those." And the wicked Jews who stood around him, as soon as he had made this prayer, stoned him to death.

§ 2. But God punished them immediately for this barbarity, and took vengeance on them for the murder of Onias, in the manner following. As the priests and Aristobulus were besieged, it happened that the feast called the Passover was come, at which it is our custom to offer a great number of sacrifices to God; and those that were with Aristobulus wanted victims, and desired that their countrymen without would furnish them with such, and assured them they should have as much money for them as they wished; and when they required them to pay a thousand drachmæ for each head of cattle, Aristobulus and the priests willingly undertook to pay for them accordingly, and those within let down the money over the walls, and gave it to them. But when the others had received it, they did not deliver the victims, but arrived at that height of wickedness as to break the promises they had given, and to be guilty of impiety towards God, by not furnishing those that wanted them with victims. And when the priests found they had been cheated, and that the agreements that had been made were violated, they prayed to God that he would avenge them on their countrymen. Nor did he delay that punishment, but sent a strong and vehement storm of wind, that destroyed the fruits of the whole country, till a modius of wheat was bought for eleven drachmæ.

§ 3. Meantime Pompey sent Scaurus into Syria, as he was himself in Armenia making war against Tigranes: and when Scaurus was come to Damascus, and found that Lollius and Metellus had just taken that city, he pushed on into Judæa. And when he was come there, ambassadors came to him both from Aristobulus and Hyrcanus, for both asked him to assist them. And as both of them promised to give him money, Aristobulus four hundred talents, and Hyrcanus no less, he accepted of Aristobulus' promise, for he was rich and had a great soul, and desired to obtain nothing but what was fair, whereas the other was poor, and mean, and made incredible promises for greater advantages. Nor was it the same thing to take a city by storm, which was exceedingly strong and powerful, as it was to eject out of the country some fugitives, with a quantity of Nabatæans, who were no very warlike people. He therefore made an agreement with Aristobulus for the reasons before mentioned, and took his money, and raised the siege, and ordered Aretas to depart, or else he should be declared an enemy to the Romans. Then Scaurus returned to Damascus again, and Aristobulus with a great army marched against Aretas and Hyrcanus, and fought them at a place called Papyron,<sup>1</sup> and beat them in the battle, and slew about six thousand of the enemy, among whom fell Phallion also, the brother of Antipater.

CHAP. III.

How Aristobulus and Hyrcanus came to Pompey to discuss who ought to have the Kingdom; and how, upon the Flight of Aristobulus to the Fortress of Alexandrium, Pompey led his army against him, and ordered him to deliver up the Fortresses of which he was possessed.

§ 1.

A LITTLE afterwards Pompey came to Damascus, and marched over Cœle-Syria, and there came to him ambassadors from all Syria, and Egypt, and from Judæa also. For Aristobulus sent him a great present, which was a golden vine,<sup>1</sup> and worth five hundred talents. Now Strabo of Cappadocia mentions this present in the following words. "There came also an embassy out of Egypt and a crown of the value of four thousand pieces of gold, and out of Judæa there came another, whether you call it a vine or a garden: they called it TERPOLE (Delight). However, I myself saw that present deposited at Rome in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, with this inscription, 'The gift of Alexander the king of the Jews.' It was valued at five hundred talents, and the report is, that Aristobulus, the ruler of the Jews sent it."

§ 2. A little time afterwards came ambassadors again to him, Antipater on behalf of Hyrcanus, and Nicodemus on behalf of Aristobulus; which last also accused those who had taken bribes, first Gabinius, and then Scaurus, the one having had three hundred talents, and the other four hundred; by which proceeding he made those two his enemies, besides those he had before. And when Pompey had ordered those that had differences with one another to come to him in the beginning of the spring, he took his army out of their winter quarters, and marched into the country near Damascus; and as he went along he demolished the citadel that was at Apamea,<sup>2</sup> that Antiochus Cyzicenus had built, and subdued the country of Ptolemy Mennæus (a wicked man, and not less so than Dionysius of Tripolis, who had been beheaded, who was also his relation by marriage), who however bought off the punishment of his crimes for a thousand talents, with which money Pompey paid the soldiers their wages. He also razed to the ground the fortress of Lysias,<sup>1</sup> of which Silas a Jew was tyrant. And when he had passed by the cities of Heliopolis<sup>2</sup> and Chalcis,<sup>3</sup> and crossed over the mountain which is the boundary of Cœle-Syria, he went from Pella<sup>4</sup> to Damascus; and there he carefully heard the Jews, and their governors Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, who were at variance with one another, as also the nation against them both, for it did not desire to be under kingly government, because the form of government they had received from their forefathers was that of subjection to the priests of that God whom they worshipped, whereas though Hyrcanus and Aristobulus were the posterity of priests, yet did they seek to change the government of their nation to another form, in order to enslave them. As to Hyrcanus, he complained, that although he was the elder brother, he was deprived of the prerogative of his birth by Aristobulus, and that he had but a small part of the country under him, Aristobulus having taken away the rest from him by force. He also stated that the raids which had been made into their neighbours' countries, and the piratical expeditions by sea, were owing to him, and that the nation would not have revolted, had not Aristobulus been a man given to violence and disorder. And there were no fewer than a thousand Jews, of the best reputation, who confirmed this accusation, being suborned by Antipater. But Aristobulus alleged on the other hand that it was Hyrcanus' own nature, which was inactive, and so contemptible, that had caused him to be deprived of the government; and that, as for himself, he was necessitated to take it upon him, for fear it should be transferred to others, and as to his title of king, it was no other than the same title that his father had taken before him. And he called as witnesses of this some persons who were both young and insolent, whose purple garments, fine heads of hair, and other ornaments, made them objectionable, for they appeared not as though they were to plead their cause in a court of justice, but as if they formed part of a triumphal procession.

<sup>1</sup> This 'golden vine,' or 'garden,' seen by Strabo at Rome, has its inscription here as if it were the gift of Alexander, the father of Aristobulus, and not of Aristobulus himself, to whom yet Josephus ascribes it; and in order to prove the truth of that part of his history, introduces this testimony of Strabo; so that the ordinary copies seem to be here either erroneous or defective, and the original reading seems to have been either 'Aristobulus,' instead of 'Alexander,' with one Greek copy, or else 'Aristobulus the son of Alexander,' with the Latin copies, which last seems to me the most probable. For as to Archbishop Usher's conjectures, that Alexander made it, and dedicated it to God in the temple, and that thence Aristobulus took it, and sent it to Pompey, they are both very improbable, and no way agreeable to Josephus, who would hardly have avoided the recording both these uncommon points of history, had he known of them; nor would either the Jewish nation, or even Pompey himself, then have relished such a flagrant instance of sacrilege.—W.

§ 3. When Pompey had heard these two, and had condemned Aristobulus for his violent proceedings, he then spoke civilly to them, and sent them away, and told them that when he came into their country again he would settle all their affairs, after he had first taken a view of the affairs of the Nabatæans. Meantime he ordered them to be quiet, and at the same time paid great attention to Aristobulus, lest he should make the nation revolt, and hinder his return; which Aristobulus did: for without waiting for that further determination which Pompey had promised, he went to the city of Dium,<sup>1</sup> and thence marched into Judæa.

§ 4. Pompey was angry at this behaviour, and taking with him the army which he was leading against the Nabatæans, and the auxiliaries that came from Damascus and the rest of Syria, with the other Roman legions which he had with him, marched against Aristobulus. And as he passed by Pella and Scythopolis,<sup>2</sup> he came to Coreæ,<sup>3</sup> which is the first town in Judæa as one passes through the interior of the country, where he came to a most beautiful fortress (that was built on the top of a mountain), called Alexandrium,<sup>4</sup> to which Aristobulus had fled, and Pompey sent his commands to him, that he should come to him. Accordingly, as many urged him not to make war with the Romans, he came down, and when he had disputed with his brother the right to the government, he went up again to the citadel, as Pompey gave him leave to do. And this he did two or three times, flattering himself with the hopes of having the kingdom granted him, and pretending he would obey Pompey in whatever he commanded, although at the same time he retired to his fortress, that he might not depress himself too low, and that he might be prepared for war, in case Pompey, as he feared, should transfer the government to Hyrcanus. But when Pompey ordered Aristobulus to deliver up the fortresses he held, and to send written orders to their governors in his own handwriting for that purpose, for they had been forbidden to deliver them upon any other conditions, he obeyed indeed, but retired in dudgeon to Jerusalem, and made preparations for war. A little after this certain persons came out of Pontus, and informed Pompey, as he was on the way and leading his army against Aristobulus, that Mithridates was dead, having been slain by his son Pharnaces.

CHAP. IV.

How Pompey, when the Citizens of Jerusalem shut the Gates against him, besieged the City and took it by Storm; also what other things he did in Judæa.

§ 1.

NOW Pompey pitched his camp at Jericho (where the palm-tree grows, and that balsam which is of all ointments the most precious, which upon any incision made in the wood with a sharp stone distills out like juice), and marched next morning to Jerusalem. Thereupon Aristobulus repented, and went to Pompey, and offered him money, and promised to receive him into Jerusalem, and begged that he would leave off the war, and do what he pleased peaceably. Then Pompey, upon his entreaty, forgave him, and sent Gabinius and some soldiers to receive the money and take possession of the city. But none of these promises were performed, but Gabinius returned, not only having been shut out of the city, but also having received none of the money promised, because Aristobulus' soldiers would not permit the agreement to be carried out. At this Pompey was very angry, and put Aristobulus into prison, and went himself to the city, which was strong on every side, excepting the north, which was not well fortified; for there was a broad and deep ditch that ran round the city,<sup>1</sup> and included within it the temple, which was itself surrounded with a very strong stone wall.

§ 2. Now there was variance among the men that were within the city, for they did not agree as to what was to be done in their present circumstances, for some thought it best to deliver up the city to Pompey, but Aristobulus' party exhorted them to shut the gates and fight, because he was kept in prison. And these got the start of the others, and seized upon the temple, and cut off the bridge which reached from it to the city, and prepared themselves to stand a siege; but the others admitted Pompey's army in, and delivered up both the city and the king's palace to him. Then Pompey sent his lieutenant Piso with an army, and placed garrisons both in the city and in the palace to secure them, and fortified the houses that joined the temple, and all those that were outside but in the neighbourhood of it. And first he offered conditions to those within, but as they would not comply with what he invited them to, he fortified all the places thereabout, and Hyrcanus zealously assisted him in everything. And Pompey pitched his camp outside,<sup>1</sup> at the north end of the temple, where it was most open to attack, though even on that side great towers rose up, and a trench had been dug, and a deep ravine begirt it round about, for the parts towards the city were precipitous, and the bridge on which Pompey had entered in was broken down; however, a bank was raised day by day with a great deal of labour, as the Romans cut down the trees all round. And when this bank was sufficiently raised, and the trench filled up with difficulty owing to its immense depth, Pompey had his engines and battering rams brought from Tyre, and placing them on the bank, kept battering the temple with his catapults. Now had it not been our national practice to rest on the seventh days, this bank would never have been completed, owing to the opposition the Jews would have made; for though our law allows us to defend ourselves against those that commence a fight with us and assault us, it does not permit us to meddle with our enemies on the Sabbath-days while they do anything else.<sup>2</sup>

§ 3. Now when the Romans observed this, they threw no missiles at the Jews on those days which we call Sabbaths, nor did they come to a hand to hand fight, but raised up their bank and towers, and brought forward their engines that they might do execution the following day. And one may learn how very great piety we exercise towards God, and how much we observe his laws, from the fact that the priests were not at all hindered from their sacred ministrations by fear during the siege, but did still twice a day, in the morning and at the ninth hour, offer their sacrifices on the altar, nor did they omit those sacrifices if any melancholy accident happened during the assaults. Indeed when the city was taken in the third month, on the day of the fast, in the hundred and seventh-ninth Olympiad, when Caius Antonius and Marcus Tullius Cicero were consuls, and the enemy fell upon them, and cut the throats of those that were in the temple, yet did not those that offered the sacrifices leave them off, nor could they be compelled to run away, either from the fear they were in for their own lives, or from the numbers that had been already slain, thinking it better to suffer whatever came upon them at the very altars, than to omit anything that their laws required of them. And that this is not a mere tale to pass an encomium upon piety that was never displayed, but is the real truth, I appeal to all those that have written of the acts of Pompey, who bear me out, and among them to Strabo and Nicolaus, and also to Titus Livius, the writer of the Roman history.

§ 4. Now when the battering engine was applied, the greatest of the towers was shaken by it and fell down, and opened a breach in the walls, so the enemy poured in apace, and Cornelius Faustus, son of the famous Sulla, with his soldiers, first of all scaled the wall, and after him Furius the centurion, with those that followed him on the other side, while Fabius, who was also a centurion, scaled it in the middle, with a great body of men with him. And now all was full of slaughter, some of the Jews being slain by the Romans, and some by one another; nay, there were some who threw themselves down the precipices, or put fire to their houses and burned them, not being able to Maccabees, was the cause of Jerusalem's being taken by Pompey, by Sosius, and by Titus.—W.

bear their miseries. Of the Jews there fell twelve thousand, but of the Romans very few. Absalom, who was at once both uncle and father-in-law of Aristobulus, was taken captive. And no small outrage was committed in the Holy of Holies, which before had been inaccessible and seen by none; for Pompey went into it, and not a few of those that were with him also, and saw all that it was unlawful for any men to see but the high priests. There were there the golden table, the holy candlestick, and the pouring vessels, and a great quantity of spices; and besides these there were among the treasures two thousand talents of sacred money; but Pompey touched nothing of all this,<sup>1</sup> on account of his regard to religion, but in this point also acted in a manner that was worthy of his virtue. The next day he gave order to those that had the charge of the temple to cleanse it, and to bring what offerings the law required to God; and he restored the high priesthood to Hyrcanus, not only because he had been useful to him in other respects, but also because he had hindered the Jews in the country from giving Aristobulus any assistance in the war. He also cut off the heads of those that had been the authors of the war, and bestowed fitting rewards on Cornelius Faustus and the others that had mounted the walls with such alacrity. And he made Jerusalem tributary to the Romans, and took away those cities of Cœle-Syria which the inhabitants of Judæa had formerly subdued, and put them under the government of the Roman prætor, and contracted the whole nation, which had elevated itself so high, within its own bounds. Moreover, he rebuilt Gadara (which had been razed to the ground a little before), to gratify Demetrius of Gadara,<sup>2</sup> who was his freedman, and restored the rest of the cities, as Hippos,<sup>3</sup> and Scythopolis, and Pella,<sup>4</sup> and Dium,<sup>5</sup> and Samaria,<sup>6</sup> as also Marissa,<sup>7</sup> Azotus,<sup>8</sup> Jamnia,<sup>9</sup> and Arethusa,<sup>10</sup> to their own inhabitants. And these were in the interior of the country, except those that had been razed to the ground. As to the maritime cities, as Gaza and Joppa and Dora<sup>1</sup> and Strato's Tower (which last Herod rebuilt in a glorious manner, and adorned with havens and temples, and changed its name to Cæsarea<sup>2</sup>), Pompey left all of them free, and joined them to the province of Syria.

§ 5. Now the causers of this misery which came upon Jerusalem were Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, by their being at variance with one another; for we lost our liberty, and became subject to the Romans, and were deprived of the territory which we had gained by our arms from the Syrians. Moreover, the Romans exacted of us in a short time more than ten thousand talents. And the royal authority, which was a dignity formerly bestowed on those that were high priests by right of their family, became the property of common men. But of these matters I shall treat in their proper place. And Pompey handed over Cœle-Syria, as far as the river Euphrates and Egypt, to Scaurus, and two Roman legions, and then went away to Cilicia, and pushed on to Rome. He also bound Aristobulus and carried him and his children along with him, for he had two daughters, and as many sons; one of whom, Alexander, ran away, but the younger, Antigonus, was carried to Rome with his sisters.

How Scaurus made Peace with Aretas. And what Gabinus did in Judæa, after he had conquered Alexander, the Son of Aristobulus.

§ 1.

SCAURUS now made an expedition against Petra<sup>3</sup> in Arabia, and ravaged all the places round about it, because of the great difficulty of access to it. And as his army was pinched by famine, Antipater furnished him with corn from Judæa, and with whatever else he wanted, at the command of Hyrcanus. And Antipater, being sent to Aretas as an ambassador by Scaurus, because they were old friends, persuaded Aretas to give Scaurus a sum of money to prevent the ravaging of his country, and undertook to be his surety for three hundred talents. And Scaurus, upon these terms, ceased to make war against him any longer, for he wanted peace as much as Aretas.

§ 2. Some time after this, when Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, overran Judæa, Gabinius came from Rome to Syria, as commander of the Roman forces. He did many other considerable actions, and marched against Alexander, as Hyrcanus was no longer able to hold out against Alexander's power, but was already attempting to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, which Pompey had overthrown, although the Romans who were there restrained him from that. However, Alexander scoured all the country-side, and armed many of the Jews, and quickly got together ten thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse, and fortified Alexandrium<sup>1</sup> (a fortress near Coreæ) and Machærus<sup>2</sup> near the mountains of Arabia. Gabinius therefore advanced against him, having sent on Mark Antony and other commanders. They armed such Romans as followed them, and besides them such Jews as were subject to them, who were led by Pitholaus and Malichus, and they also took with them the friendly contingent of Antipater, and met Alexander; and Gabinius himself followed with the heavy armed troops. Thereupon Alexander retired to near Jerusalem, where they fell upon one another, and a pitched battle ensued, in which the Romans slew about three thousand of their enemies, and took as many alive.

§ 3. Meantime Gabinius went to Alexandrium, and invited those that were in it to cessation of hostilities, and promised that their former offences should be forgiven. But as many of the enemy had pitched their camp before the fortress, the Romans attacked them, and Mark Antony fought bravely, and slew a great number, and seemed to come off with the greatest honour. So Gabinius left part of the army there to reduce the place, and he himself went into the other parts of Judæa, and gave orders to rebuild all the cities that he came to that had been demolished. So Samaria, Azotus, Scythopolis, Anthedon,<sup>1</sup> Raphia,<sup>2</sup> Dora, Marissa, Gaza, and not a few others were rebuilt. And as the men acted according to Gabinius' command, it came to pass at this time that those cities were safely inhabited, which had been desolate for a long time.

§ 4. When Gabinius had done thus throughout the country, he returned to Alexandria, and as he pressed on the siege, Alexander sent an embassy to him, desiring that he would pardon his former offences, and delivering up to him the fortresses Hyrcania and Machærus, and at last Alexandria itself. All these fortresses Gabinius razed to the ground. And when Alexander's mother, who was on the side of the Romans, having her husband and other children at Rome, came to Gabinius, he granted her whatever she asked; and when he had settled matters with her, he restored Hyrcanus to Jerusalem, and committed the care of the temple to him. And when he had appointed five councils, he divided the nation into the same number of parts, and these councils governed the people; the first was at Jerusalem, the second at Gadara, the third at Amathus,<sup>3</sup> the fourth at Jericho, and the fifth at Sepphoris<sup>4</sup> in Galilee. So the Jews were now freed from kingly rule, and were governed by an aristocracy.

NOW Aristobulus escaped from Rome to Judæa, and purposed to rebuild the fortress of Alexandria, which had been recently demolished: so Gabinius sent soldiers against him, and Sisenna and Antony and Ser-vilius as their commanders, to hinder him from making himself master of the country again, and to recapture him. For indeed many of the Jews flocked to Aristobulus, on account of his former glory, as also because they were glad of a revolution. And one Pitholaus, lieutenant-general at Jerusalem, deserted to him with a thousand men, although many of those that joined him were un-armed. And when Aristobulus resolved to go to Machærus, he dismissed these, because they were so badly equipped (for they could not be useful to him in action), but he took with him about eight thousand that were armed, and set out. And as the Romans attacked them furiously, the Jews were beaten in the battle, though they fought valiantly, and were overcome by the enemy, and put to flight. And about five thousand of them were slain, and the rest being dispersed, tried, as well as they were able, to save themselves. However, Aristobulus had with him still above a thousand, and with them he fled to Machærus, and fortified the place, and though he had had ill success, he was still sanguine about his affairs. But when he had held out two days, and received many wounds, he was captured and brought before Gabinius, with his son Antigonus, who had also fled with him from Rome. Such was the fortune of Aristobulus, who was sent back again to Rome, and there retained in bonds, having been both king and high priest for three years and six months, and being indeed a noble person and one of a lofty soul. However, the senate let his children go, upon Gabinius' writing to them that he had promised their mother so much when she delivered up the fortresses to him; and accordingly they then returned to Judæa.

§ 2. Now when Gabinius was making an expedition against the Parthians, and had already crossed over the Euphrates, he changed his mind, and resolved to return into Egypt, in order to restore Ptolemy to his kingdom.<sup>1</sup> But this has been related elsewhere. However, Antipater supplied the army which Gabinius despatched against Archelaus with corn and weapons and money. He also won over those Jews who were beyond Pelusium<sup>1</sup> to be his confederates, who guarded the passes that led into Egypt. But when he came back out of Egypt, he found Syria in disorder sedition and confusion, for Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, having seized on the government a second time by force, made many of the Jews revolt to him, and marched over the country with a great army, and slew all the Romans he could light upon, and proceeded to besiege them at the mountain called Gerizim,<sup>2</sup> where they had retreated.

§ 3. Now when Gabinius found Syria in this condition, he sent on Antipater, who was a sensible man, to those that were rebellious, to try whether he could cure them of their madness, and persuade them to return to a better mind. And when he came to them, he brought many of them to a sound mind, and induced them to do what they ought to do. But he could not restrain Alexander, for he had an army of thirty thousand Jews, and met Gabinius, and joining battle with him, was beaten, and lost ten thousand of his men near mount Tabor.<sup>3</sup>

§ 4. Then Gabinius settled the affairs which belonged to the city of Jerusalem, as was agreeable to Antipater's wishes, and went against the Nabatæans, and overcame them in battle. He also sent away in a friendly manner Mithridates and Orsanès, who were Parthian deserters who had come to him, though the report went abroad that they had run away from him. And when Gabinius had performed great and glorious actions in his management of the war, he returned to Rome, and handed over his province to Crassus. Now Nicolaus of Damascus, and Strabo of Capadocia, both describe the expeditions of Pompey and Gabinius against the Jews, but neither of them say anything new which is not in the other.

How Crassus went into Judæa, and pillaged the Temple; and marched against the Parthians, and perished with his army. Also how Cassius made himself master of Syria, and put a stop to the incursion of the Parthians, and then went into Judæa.

§ 1.

NOW Crassus, as he was going upon his expedition against the Parthians, came into Judæa, and carried off the money that was in the temple, which Pompey had left (which amounted to two thousand talents), and was disposed to spoil it of all the gold belonging to it (which was eight thousand talents). He also took a beam, which was made of solid beaten gold, of the weight of three hundred minæ. Now each mina with us weighs two pounds and a half. It was the priest who was guardian of the sacred treasures, whose name was Eleazar, who gave him this beam, not out of a wicked design, for he was a good and righteous man, but being intrusted with the custody of the veils belonging to the temple, which were of admirable beauty and of very costly workmanship, and hung down from this beam, and seeing that Crassus was bent on getting together money, and being alarmed for the safety of all the ornaments of the temple, he gave him this beam of gold as a ransom for the whole, but not till he had given his oath that he would remove nothing else out of the temple, but be satisfied with this only, which he should give him, for it was worth many ten thousand [shekels]. Now this beam was in a wooden beam that was hollow, which was not known to anybody else, for Eleazar alone knew of it. And Crassus took away this beam, on condition of touching nothing else that belonged to the temple, but afterwards broke his oath, and carried away all the gold that was in the Holy of Holies.

§ 2. Let no one wonder that there was so much wealth in our temple, since all the Jews throughout the world, and those that worshipped God, even in Asia and Europe, sent their contributions to it, and that from very ancient times. Nor is the largeness of these sums I have mentioned without attestation, nor is it due to our vanity, as if we had without ground raised it to so great a height: but there are many witnesses to it, especially Strabo of Cappadocia, who speaks as follows. "Mithridates sent to Cos,<sup>1</sup> and took the money which queen Cleopatra had deposited there, as also eight hundred talents belonging to the Jews." Now, we have no public money but what belongs to God. And it is evident that the Asiatic Jews removed this money to Cos from fear of Mithridates, for it is not probable that those in Judæa, who had a strong city and temple, would send their money to Cos, nor is it likely that the Jews, who were inhabitants of Alexandria, would do so either, since they were in no fear of Mithridates. And the same Strabo himself bears witness in another place, that at the time that Sulla passed over into Greece to fight against Mithridates, he sent Lucullus to put an end to a disturbance that our nation, of whom the world is full, had raised in Cyrene,<sup>2</sup> for he speaks as follows. "There were four classes of men in Cyrene; the first composed of citizens, the second of husbandmen, the third of resident aliens, and the fourth of Jews. Now these Jews are already got into all cities, and it is not easy to find a place in the world that has not received this tribe of men, and is not occupied by it. And it has come to pass that Egypt and Cyrene (as having the same governors), and a great number of other nations, imitate their way of living, and especially cherish many of these Jews, and grow to great prosperity with them, following the Jewish customs. Accordingly, the Jews have places assigned them in Egypt to dwell in, besides what is peculiarly allotted to this nation at Alexandria, which is a large part of that city. There is also an ethnarch allowed them, who governs their nation, and dispenses justice, and sees to their contracts and laws, as if he were the ruler of a free republic. In Egypt indeed this nation is powerful, because the Jews were originally Egyptians, and because the land which they inhabit, since they went thence, is near to Egypt. They also removed into Cyrene, because that land adjoins the government of Egypt, as does Judæa, or

§ 3. Now when Crassus had settled all things as he himself pleased, he marched into Parthia, where both he himself and all his army perished, as has been related elsewhere. But Cassius fled to Syria, and made himself master of it, and stopped the Parthians, who, because of their victory over Crassus, made incursions into Syria. And he went again to Tyre, and into Judæa also. And he attacked Taricheæ,<sup>1</sup> and captured it at once, and took about thirty thousand Jews captives, and slew Pitholaus (who had imitated Aristobulus in his rebellious practices), at the instigation of Antipater, who had great influence with him, and was at that time held in very great repute by the Idumæans also, out of which nation he married a wife, who was the daughter of one of their eminent men from Arabia, and her name was Cypros, and he had by her four sons, Phasaelus, and Herod (who afterwards became a king), and Joseph, and Pheroras, and one daughter called Salome. This Antipater cultivated also friendly relations with other potentates, and especially with the king of Arabia, in whose charge he placed his children, when he fought against Aristobulus. And Cassius removed his camp, and pushed on to the Euphrates, to meet those that were coming to attack him from that quarter, as has been related by others.

§ 4. But some time afterwards Julius Cæsar, when he had become master of Rome, and when Pompey and the senate had fled beyond the Ionian sea, freed Aristobulus from his bonds, and resolved to send him into Syria, and delivered two legions to him, that he might set matters right in that country, being an influential man. But Aristobulus had no enjoyment of what he hoped for from the power that was given him by Cæsar, for those of Pompey's party were too much for him, and carried him off by poison, but those of Cæsar's party buried him. His dead body also lay for a long time embalmed in honey, till Antony afterwards sent it to Judæa, and caused it to be buried in the royal sepulchres. And Scipio, upon Pompey's sending to him to slay Alexander the son of Aristobulus, accused the young man of offences he had been guilty of earlier against the Romans, and cut off his head. And thus did he die at Antioch; but Ptolemy, the son of Mennæus, who was the ruler of Chalcis<sup>1</sup> under Mount Libanus, welcomed his brothers, and sent his son Philippio to Ascalon<sup>2</sup> to Aristobulus' wife, and bade her send back with him her son Antigonus and her daughters, one of whom, whose name was Alexandra, Philippio fell in love with and married. But afterwards his father Ptolemy had him put to death, and married Alexandra, and continued to take care of her brothers.

CHAP. VIII.

How the Jews became Confederate with Cæsar when he fought against Egypt. The glorious Actions of Antipater, and his Friendship with Cæsar. The Honours which the Jews received from the Romans and Athenians.

§ 1.

NOW after Pompey was dead, and after the victory Cæsar gained over him,<sup>3</sup> Antipater, who managed the Jewish affairs by the order of Hyrcanus, became very useful to Cæsar when he made war against Egypt. For when Mithridates of Pergamus<sup>4</sup> was bringing his auxiliary forces, and was not able to continue his march by Pelusium,<sup>5</sup> but was obliged to stay at Ascalon, Antipater went to him with three thousand armed Jews, and also got the principal men of the Arabians to come to his assistance; and it was owing to him that all the Syrians joined him also, being unwilling to appear behindhand in their zeal for Cæsar, viz. Iamblichus the ruler, and Ptolemy his son, who dwelt at Mount Libanus, and almost all the cities. So Mithridates marched out of Syria, and came to Pelusium, and as its inhabitants would not admit him, he besieged the city. And Antipater distinguished himself here, and was the first who pulled down a part of the wall, and so opened a way for the others to enter into the city, and so Pelusium was taken. Now the Egyptian Jews, who dwelt in the district of Onias, tried to prevent Antipater and Mithridates and their soldiers passing over to Cæsar, but Antipater persuaded them to come over to his party, because he was of the same race as them, and especially when he showed them the letters of Hyrcanus the high priest, wherein he exhorted them to cultivate friendship with Cæsar, and to supply his army with presents and all things needful. Accordingly, when they saw that Antipater and the high priest were of the same sentiments, they did as they were desired. And when the Jews in the neighbourhood of Memphis<sup>1</sup> heard that these Jews had come over to Cæsar, they also invited Mithridates to come to them; and he went and incorporated them also into his army.

§ 2. And when Mithridates had gone over the part called Delta,<sup>2</sup> he came to a pitched battle with the enemy, near the place called the Jewish camp.<sup>3</sup> Now Mithridates was on the right wing, and Antipater on the left; and when the fight came on, the wing where Mithridates was gave way, and would have suffered extremely, had not Antipater come running to him with his own soldiers along the bank of the river, as he had already beaten the enemy opposite him; and he delivered Mithridates, and put those Egyptians to flight who had been too much for him. He also took their camp, and continued in the pursuit of them, and called back Mithridates, who had retreated a great way, and had lost eight hundred soldiers, while Antipater had lost only forty. And Mithridates wrote an account of this battle to Cæsar, and declared that Antipater was the author both of the victory and his safety, so that Cæsar commended Antipater then, and made use of him during all the rest of the war in the most hazardous undertakings; indeed he got wounded in some of the engagements.

§ 3. So when Cæsar, after some time, had finished the war, and sailed to Syria, he honoured Antipater greatly, and confirmed Hyrcanus in the high priesthood, and bestowed on Antipater the privilege of citizenship of Rome, and freedom from taxes everywhere. Now it is reported by many, that Hyrcanus joined Antipater in this expedition, and went himself into Egypt. And Strabo of Cappadocia bears me out, when he says as follows on the authority of Asinius. "After Mithridates and Hyrcanus the high priest of the Jews invaded Egypt." Nay, the same Strabo says again, in another place, on the authority of Hypsicrates, that "Mithridates at first set out alone, but Antipater, who had the care of Jewish affairs, was called by him to Ascalon, and mustered three thousand soldiers for him, and stirred up the other rulers, and Hyrcanus the high priest also took part in this expedition." This is what Strabo says.

§ 4. Now Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, came at this time to Cæsar, and lamented his father's fate, and complained that it was owing to his loyalty to him that Aristobulus was taken off by poison, and his brother beheaded by Scipio, and desired that he would take pity on him, as he had been ejected from his dominions. He also accused Hyrcanus and Antipater of governing the nation by violence, and acting lawlessly to him. Antipater was present, and made his defence as to the accusations that were laid against him, and showed that Antigonus and his party were given to innovation, and were rebellious persons. He also reminded Cæsar of the labours he had undergone when he assisted him in his wars, relating what he had witnessed himself. He added, that Aristobulus was justly carried away to Rome, as one who was an enemy to the Romans, and could never be brought to be friendly to them, and that his brother had only his deserts from Scipio, being caught in the act of committing robberies; and that his punishment was not inflicted on him by way of violence or injustice by the perpetrator of it.

§ 5. When Antipater had made this speech, Cæsar appointed Hyrcanus to be high priest, and gave Antipater what position he himself should choose, and left the determination to himself, so he made him procurator of Judæa. He also gave Hyrcanus leave to raise up again the walls of his own city, on his asking that favour of him, for they had been demolished by Pompey. And this grant he sent to the consuls at Rome, to be engraven in the Capitol. The decree of the senate was as follows.<sup>1</sup> “Lucius Valerius (the son of Lucius) the prætor, referred this to the senate, upon the Ides of December, in the Temple of Concord. There were present at the writing of this decree Lucius Coponius (the son of Lucius) of the Colline tribe, and Papirius of the Quirine tribe, concerning the affairs which Alexander the son of Jason, and Numenius the son of Antiochus, and Alexander the son of Dorotheus, ambassadors of the Jews, good men and our allies, proposed, who came to renew that league of goodwill and friendship with the Romans which existed before. They also brought a shield of gold, as a token of the alliance, valued at fifty thousand pieces of gold; and desired that letters might be given them, directed both to free cities and to kings, that their country and their havens might be in security, and that no one among them might receive any injury. It has therefore pleased [the senate] to make a league of friendship and good-will with them, and to bestow on them whatever they asked, and to accept of the shield which was brought by them.” This happened in the ninth year of Hyrcanus the high priest and ethnarch, in the month of Panemus. Hyrcanus also received honours from the people of Athens, as having been useful to them on many occasions, for they wrote and sent him a decree as follows. “Before the president and priest Dionysius, the son of Asclepiades, on the fifth day of the latter part of the month of Panemus, this decree of the Athenians was given to their commanders, when Agathocles was archon, and Eucles (the son of Menander) the Alimusiau was the scribe. In the month of Munychion, on the eleventh day of the Prytany, a council of the presidents was held in the theatre. Dorotheus Erchieus and the fellow presidents with him put it to the vote of the people. Dionysius, the son of Dionysius, said: Since Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, the high priest and ethnarch of the Jews, continues to bear good-will to our people in general, and to every one of our citizens in particular, and treats them with all sorts of kindness; and when any of the Athenians come to him, either as ambassadors, or on any private business, he receives them in an obliging manner, and sees that they are conducted back in safety, of which we have had several previous testimonies, it is now also decreed, on the motion of Theodosius, the son of Theodorus of Sunium,<sup>1</sup> who put the people in mind of the virtue of this man, and that his purpose is to do us all the good that is in his power, to honour this Hyrcanus with a crown of gold, the usual reward according to the law, and to erect his statue in brass in the temple of Demos and of the Graces; and that this present of a crown shall be proclaimed publicly in the theatre at the Dionysia, while the new tragedies are acting, and at the Panathenæan, Eleusinian, and gymnastic contests also; and that the commanders shall take care, while he continues in his friendship, and maintains his good-will to us, to return all possible honour and favour to the man for his affection and generosity; that by this treatment it may appear how our people receive the good, and repay them by suitable return; and that he may be induced to continue in his affection to us, by the honours we have already paid him. Let ambassadors be also chosen out of all the Athenians, who shall carry this decree to him, and desire him to accept of the honours we pay him, and to endeavour always to be doing some good to our city." This much shall suffice as to the honours that were paid to Hyrcanus by the Romans and the people of Athens.

CHAP. IX.

How Antipater committed the care of Galilee to Herod, and that of Jerusalem to Phasaelus; as also, how Herod, because of the Jews' envy of Antipater, was accused before Hyrcanus.

§ 1.

NOW when Cæsar had settled the affairs of Syria, he sailed away; and as soon as he had conducted Cæsar out of Syria, Antipater returned to Judæa, and immediately raised up the walls which had been thrown down by Pompey, and by his coming pacified the tumult which had been all over the country, both by threatening and advising the people to be quiet: for he told them if they would be on Hyrcanus' side, they would live happily, and pass their lives without disturbance in the enjoyment of their own possessions, but if they were influenced by hopes of what might come by revolution, and aimed to get gain thereby, they would find him a despot instead of a mild ruler, and Hyrcanus a tyrant instead of a king, and the Romans and Cæsar their bitter enemies instead of rulers; for they would never bear him to be set aside whom they had appointed to govern. And when Antipater had said this to them, he himself set in order the affairs of the country.

§ 2. And seeing that Hyrcanus was of a slow and sluggish temper, Antipater made Phasaelus, his eldest son, governor of Jerusalem and the places in its vicinity, and committed Galilee to Herod, his next son, who was then quite a young man, for he was but twenty-five years of age. But that youth of his was no impediment to him; but as he was a young man of noble spirit, he soon met with an opportunity of showing his courage. For finding that there was one Ezekias, a captain of a band of robbers, who overran the neighbouring parts of Syria with a great troop of them, he took him, and slew him, as well as a great number of the robbers that were with him. For this action he was greatly beloved by the Syrians, for they were very desirous to have their country freed from this nest of robbers, and he purged it of them: so they sung songs in his commendation in their villages and cities, for his having procured them peace, and the secure enjoyment of their possessions. And on account of this he became known to Sextus Cæsar, who was a relation of the great Cæsar's, and was now procurator of Syria. Now Phasaelus, Herod's brother, was moved with emulation at his actions, and envied the fame he had thereby got, and became ambitious not to be behind him in deserving the same, so he made the inhabitants of Jerusalem bear him the greatest good-will, as he governed the city himself, but did neither manage its affairs improperly, nor abuse his authority therein. This conduct procured to Antipater from the nation such respect as is due to kings, and such honours as he might partake of if he were absolute lord of the country. Yet did not this splendour of his, as frequently happens, diminish in the least in him his kindness and good faith to Hyrcanus.

§ 3. But now the principal men among the Jews, when they saw Antipater and his sons growing so much in the good-will of the nation, and in the revenues which they received from Judæa and from Hyrcanus' own wealth, became ill disposed to him. And indeed Antipater had contracted a friendship with the Roman emperors, and he had prevailed on Hyrcanus to send them money, but took it himself, and appropriated the intended present, and sent it as if it were his own, and not Hyrcanus', gift to them. Hyrcanus heard of this but took no heed to it: nay rather he was very glad of it: but the chief men of the Jews were in fear, because they saw that Herod was a violent and bold man, and very desirous to play the tyrant, so they went to Hyrcanus, and now accused Antipater openly, and said to him, "How long wilt thou be quiet under such actions as are now done? Or dost thou not see that Antipater and his sons have already girded themselves with power? and that it is only the name of a king which is given thee? But do not thou suffer these things to be hidden from thee, nor think to escape danger by being so careless about thyself and the kingdom. For Antipater and his sons are not now stewards of thine affairs: do not deceive thyself with such a notion, they are evidently absolute lords, for Antipater's son Herod has slain Ezekias and those that were with him, and has thereby transgressed our law, which has forbidden to slay any man, even though he were a wicked man, unless he had been first condemned to suffer death by the sanhedrim; <sup>1</sup> yet has he ventured to do this without any authority from thee."

§ 4. Upon Hyrcanus hearing this, he listened to it, and the mothers also of those that had been slain by Herod fanned his indignation; for every day in the temple they continued to beseech the king and the people, that Herod might undergo a trial before the sanhedrim for what he had done. And Hyrcanus was so moved by all this, that he summoned Herod to come to his trial, for what was charged against him. Accordingly he came, but his father advised him not to come like a private man, but with a body-guard for the security of his person; and when he had settled the affairs of Galilee in the best manner he could for his own advantage, to come for his trial, but still with a body of men sufficient for his security on the journey, yet not with so great a force as might look formidable to Hyrcanus, but still such a one as might not expose him naked and unguarded [to his enemies]. However, Sextus Cæsar, governor of Syria, wrote to Hyrcanus, and desired him to discharge Herod from trial, and threatened him also if he did not do so. And this letter of his was the cause of Hyrcanus' delivering Herod from suffering any harm from the sanhedrim, for he loved him as his own son. But when Herod stood before the sanhedrim with his band of men about him, he frightened them all, and none of his former accusers durst after that bring any charge against him, but there was a deep silence, and nobody knew what was to be done. When things were in this posture, one whose name was Sameas, a righteous man and for that reason above all fear, rose up, and said, "O king and members of the sanhedrim, neither have I ever myself known such a case, nor do I suppose that any one of you can name its parallel, that one who is called to take his trial by us ever stood in such a manner before us; but every one, whoever he be, that comes to be tried by this sanhedrim, presents himself in a submissive manner, and like one that is in fear, and endeavours to move us to compassion, with his hair dishevelled, and in a black mourning garment: but this most excellent Herod, who is accused of murder, and called to answer so heavy an accusation, stands here clothed in purple, and with the hair of his head finely trimmed, and with armed men about him, that if we shall condemn him by our law, he may slay us, and by being too strong for justice may himself escape death. Yet I do not blame Herod for this, if he is more concerned for himself than for the laws; but I blame you and the king, who give him license to do so. However, know that God is great, and that this very man, whom you wish to let go for the sake of Hyrcanus, will one day punish both you and the king himself also." Nor was Sameas wrong in any part of this prediction; for when Herod had got the kingdom, he slew Hyrcanus and all the members of this sanhedrim except Sameas, for he honoured him highly on account of his uprightness, and because, when the city was afterwards besieged by Herod and Sosius, he advised the people to admit Herod into it; and told them that for their sins they would not be able to escape him. About all this I shall speak in its proper place.

§ 5. Now when Hyrcanus saw that the members of the sanhedrim were ready to pronounce sentence of death upon Herod, he put off the trial to another day, and sent privately to Herod, and advised him to flee from the city, for by that means he might escape from danger. So he retired to Damascus, as though he fled from the king: and when he had gone to Sextus Cæsar, and had put his own affairs in a sure posture, he resolved, if he were again summoned before the sanhedrim to take his trial, not to obey the summons. Thereupon the members of the sanhedrim felt great indignation, and endeavoured to persuade Hyrcanus that all these things were against him. He was not ignorant that this was the case, but he was so unmanly and foolish, that he was able to do nothing at all. And when Sextus made Herod general of the army of Cœle-Syria, for he sold him that post for money, Hyrcanus was afraid that Herod would make war upon him; nor was the effect of what he feared long in coming upon him, for Herod came with an army to fight against Hyrcanus, being angry at the trial he had been summoned to undergo before the sanhedrim; but his father Antipater, and his brother [Phasaelus], met him, and hindered him from assaulting Jerusalem. They also tried to pacify his vehement temper, and begged him to do no overt action, but only to frighten by threatening, and to proceed no further against one who had given him the dignity he had; they also desired him, if he was vexed that he was summoned and obliged to come to his trial, to remember also how he was dismissed without condemnation, and to be grateful for that, and not to regard only what was disagreeable to him, and so be unthankful for his deliverance. They desired him also to consider, since it is God that turns the scales of war, that there is great uncertainty in the issues of battles, and therefore he ought not to expect the victory, when fighting against his king and comrade, who had bestowed many benefits upon him, and had done nothing severe to him, for his accusation, which was owing to evil counsellors and not to Hyrcanus, had rather the suggestion and semblance of severity, than anything really severe in it. Herod listened to these arguments, and believed that it was sufficient for his future hopes to have made a show of his strength before the nation, and to have done nothing more. Such was the state of affairs in Judæa at this time.

CHAP. X.

The Honours that were paid the Jews; and the Alliances that were made by the Romans, and other Nations, with them.

§ 1.

NOW when Cæsar had returned to Rome, he was on the eve of sailing for Africa to fight against Scipio and Cato, when Hyrcanus sent to him, and besought him to ratify the league of friendship and mutual alliance which was between them. And it seems to me to be necessary here to give an account of all the honours that the Romans and their emperors paid to our nation, and of the alliances they made with it, that all mankind may know what regard the kings of Asia and Europe have had to us, and that they have been abundantly satisfied with our courage and fidelity. Now since many owing to hostility to us do not believe what has been written about us by the Persians and Macedonians, because those writings are not everywhere to be met with, and are not stored up in public places, but are only among ourselves and certain other barbarous nations, while no one can gainsay the decrees of the Romans (for they are laid up in the public places of the cities, and are extant still in the Capitol, and engraven upon pillars of brass; moreover, Julius Cæsar made a pillar of brass for the Jews of Alexandria, and declared publicly that they were citizens of Alexandria), from these evidences I shall prove what I say. I shall also set down the decrees made both by the senate and Julius Cæsar, which relate to Hyrcanus and to our nation.

§ 2. "Caius Julius Cæsar, imperator, pontifex maximus, and dictator the second time, to the magistrates, senate, and people of Sidon, greeting. If you be in health, it is well. I also and the army are well. I have sent you a copy of the decree, registered on the tablet, which concerns Hyrcanus (the son of Alexander) the high priest and ethnarch of the Jews, that it may be laid up among the public records; and I will that it be engraved on a tablet of brass both in Greek and Latin. It is as follows. I Julius Cæsar, imperator the second time, and pontifex maximus, have made this decree with the approbation of the senate. Whereas Hyrcanus (the son of Alexander) the Jew, has demonstrated his fidelity and diligence in our affairs both now and in former times, both in peace and in war, as many of our generals have borne him witness, and came to our assistance in the last Alexandrian war with fifteen hundred soldiers, and when he was sent by me to Mithridates, showed himself superior in valour to all in the army, for these reasons I will that Hyrcanus the son of Alexander, and his children, be ethnarchs of the Jews, and have the high priesthood of the Jews for ever according to the customs of their forefathers, and that he and his sons be our allies, and besides this that every one of them be reckoned among our particular friends. I also ordain that he and his children retain whatever privileges belong by their laws to the office of high priest, or whatever favours have been hitherto conceded to them. And if at any time hereafter there arise any questions about the Jewish customs, I will that he determine the same. And I do not approve of their being obliged to find us winter quarters, or of any money being required of them."

§ 3. "The decrees of Caius Cæsar, consul, containing what has been granted and determined, are as follows. That Hyrcanus and his sons bear rule over the nation of the Jews, and have the profits of the places granted to them, and that Hyrcanus himself, as high priest and ethnarch of the Jews, defend those that are injured. And that ambassadors be sent to Hyrcanus (the son of Alexander) the high priest of the Jews, to discourse with him about a league of friendship and alliance, and that a tablet of brass, containing all this, be openly set up in the Capitol, and at Sidon and Tyre and Ascalon, and in the temples, engraven in Roman and Greek letters: and that this decree be communicated to the quæstors and prætors of the several cities, and to the friends of the Jews: and that the ambassadors have presents made them, and that these decrees be sent everywhere."

§ 4. "Caius Cæsar, imperator, dictator, and consul, has granted, out of regard to the honour and virtue and kindness of the man, and for the advantage of the senate and people of Rome, that Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, both he and his sons, be high priests and priests of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation, by the same right, and according to the same laws, by which their progenitors have held the priesthood."

§ 5. "Caius Cæsar, consul the fifth time, has decreed, that the Jews may keep Jerusalem, and fortify that city; and that Hyrcanus (the son of Alexander), the high priest and ethnarch of the Jews, occupy it as he himself pleases; and that the Jews be allowed to deduct out of their tribute every second year the land is let a cor of the tribute, and that the tribute they pay be not let to farm, and that they pay not always the same tribute."

§ 6. "Caius Cæsar, imperator the second time, has ordained, that all the country of the Jews, except Joppa, pay tribute for the city of Jerusalem every year except the seventh year, which they call the sabbatical year, because therein they neither receive the fruit of their trees, nor do they sow their land; and that they pay as their tribute in Sidon in the second year, the fourth part of what was sown: and besides this, they are to pay the same tithes to Hyrcanus and his sons, as they paid to their forefathers. And no one, either governor, or general, or ambassador, may raise auxiliaries within the bounds of Judæa, nor may soldiers exact money of them for winter quarters, or on any other pretext, but they are to be free from all sorts of injuries: and whatever they shall hereafter have, or get possession of, or buy, they shall retain. It is also our pleasure that the city of Joppa, which the Jews had originally, when they made a league of friendship with the Romans, shall belong to them, as it formerly did; and that Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, and his sons, shall have as tribute for that city from those that occupy the land, for the country and for what they export every year to Sidon, twenty thousand six hundred and seventy-five modii every year, except the seventh year, which they call the sabbatical year, wherein they neither plough nor take the fruit off their trees. It is also the pleasure of the senate, as to the villages which are in the great plain, which Hyrcanus and his forefathers formerly possessed, that Hyrcanus and the Jews have them with the same privileges with which they formerly had them, and that the same original ordinances remain still in force which concern the Jews with regard to their high priests and priests, and that they enjoy the same benefits which they formerly had by the concession of the people and senate. And let them enjoy the like privileges at Lydda. It is the pleasure also of the senate, that Hyrcanus the ethnarch, and the Jews, retain those places, lands, and farm-steads, which belonged to the kings of Syria and Phœnicia, the allies of the Romans, and which they had bestowed on them as their free gift. It is also granted to Hyrchanus, and to his sons, and to the ambassadors sent by them to us, that in the fights between gladiators, and in those with wild beasts, they shall sit among the senators to see those shows, and when they desire an audience, they shall be introduced to the senate by the dictator or master of the horse, and when they have introduced them, answers shall be returned them in ten days at the latest, after the decree of the senate is made."

§ 7. "Caius Cæsar, imperator [dictator] the fourth time, and consul the fifth time, declared to be perpetual dictator, made the following speech concerning the rights and privileges of Hyrchanus (the son of Alexander), the high priest and ethnarch of the Jews. 'Since those imperators<sup>1</sup> who have been in the provinces before me have borne witness to Hyrchanus, the high priest of the Jews, and to the Jews themselves, and that before the senate and people of Rome, when the people and senate returned their thanks to them, it is good that we now also remember the same, and provide that a requital be made to Hyrchanus, to the nation of the Jews, and to the sons of Hyrchanus, by the senate and people of Rome, and that suitably to the good-will they have shown us, and to the benefits they have bestowed upon us.'

§ 8. "Julius Caius, prætor, consul of Rome, to the magistrates, senate, and people of the Parians, greeting. The Jews of Delos,<sup>2</sup> and some other Jews that sojourn there, signified to us, in the presence of your ambassadors, that you forbid them by a decree of yours to follow the customs of their forefathers and their sacred rites. Now it does not please me that such decrees should be made against our friends and allies, whereby they are forbidden to live according to their own customs, or to bring in contributions for common suppers and sacrifices, since they are not forbidden to do so even at Rome itself. For even Caius Cæsar, our imperator and consul, in the decree wherein he forbade other companies to meet in the city, did yet permit the Jews, and them only, both to bring in their contributions, and to make their common suppers. Accordingly, though I forbid other companies, I permit these Jews to gather themselves together, according to the customs and laws of their forefathers, and to continue therein. It will therefore be good for you, if you have made any decree against these our friends and allies, to abrogate the same, because of their virtue and good-will towards us."

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Hudson justly supposes, that the Roman imperators, or generals of armies, both here and § 2, who gave testimony to Hyrchanus' and the Jews faithfulness and good-will to the Romans before the senate and people of Rome, were principally Pompey, Scæurus, and Gabinius; of all whom Josephus has already given us the history, as far as the Jews were concerned with them.—W.

§ 9. Now after Caius Cæsar was slain, when Marcus Antonius and Publius Dolabella were consuls, they assembled the senate, and introduced Hyrcanus' ambassadors into it, and discussed what they desired, and made a league of friendship with them. The senate also decreed to grant them all they desired. I add the decree itself, that those who read the present work may have at hand a proof of the truth of what I say. The decree was as follows.

§ 10. The decree of the senate copied out of the treasury from the public tablets belonging to the quæstors, when Quintus Rutilius and Caius Cornelius were city quæstors, and taken from the second tablet of the first class. "On the third day before the Ides of April, there were present in the temple of Concord, at the writing of this decree, Lucius Calpurnius Piso of the Menenian tribe, Servius Papinius Potitus of the Lemonian tribe, Caius Caninius Rebilus of the Terentine tribe, Publius Tidetius, Lucius Apulinus (the son of Lucius) of the Sergian tribe, Flavius (the son of Lucius) of the Lemonian tribe, Publius Platius (the son of Publius) of the Papirian tribe, Marcus Acilius (the son of Marcus) of the Mecian tribe, Lucius Erucius (the son of Lucius) of the Stellatine tribe, Marcus Quintus Plancillus (the son of Marcus) of the Pollian tribe, and Publius Serius. Publius Dolabella, and Marcus Antonius, the consuls, drew it up. As to those things which, by the decree of the senate, Caius Cæsar had determined about the Jews, and yet had not hitherto had that decree brought into the treasury, it is our will, as it is also the desire of Publius Dolabella and Marcus Antonius, our consuls, to have those decrees put on the public tablets, and brought to the city quæstors, that they may take care to have them put upon the double tablets. This was done in the temple of Concord the fifth day before the Ides of February. Now the ambassadors from Hyrcanus the high priest were these, Lysimachus the son of Pausanias, Alexander the son of Theodorus, Patroclus the son of Chæreas, and Jonathan the son of Onias."

§ 11. Hyrcanus also sent one of these ambassadors to Dolabella, who was then the governor of Asia, beseeching him to dismiss the Jews from military service, and to preserve to them the customs of their forefathers, and to permit them to live according to them. And when Dolabella had received Hyrcanus' letter, he sent without any further deliberation a letter to all in Asia, and to the city of the Ephesians (the metropolis of Asia), about the Jews, a copy of which here follows.

§ 12. "In the Presidency of Artemon, on the first day of the month Lenæon, Dolabella, imperator, to the senate and magistrates and people of the Ephesians sends greeting. Alexander the son of Theodorus, the ambassador of Hyrcanus (the son of Alexander), the high priest and ethnarch of the Jews, has shown to me that his countrymen cannot go into the army, because they are not allowed to bear arms or to travel on the Sabbath-days, nor to procure themselves then those sorts of food which they have been used to eat from the times of their forefathers. I do therefore grant them exemption from going into the army, as the governors before me have done, and permit them to use the customs of their forefathers, in assembling together for sacred and religious purposes, as their law requires, and for collecting oblations necessary for sacrifices: and my will is, that you write this to the several cities under your jurisdiction."

§ 13. Such were the concessions that Dolabella made to our nation when Hyrcanus sent an embassy to him. And Lucius Lentulus, the consul, said: "I have at my tribunal exempted those Jews, who are citizens of Rome, and follow the Jewish religious rites and perform them at Ephesus, from going into the army, on account of their religious scruples, on the twelfth day before the Calends of October, in the consulship of Lucius Lentulus and Caius Marcellus.

There were present Titus Appius Balgus (the son of Titus), lieutenant of the Horatian tribe, Titus Tongius (the son of Titus), of the Crustumine tribe, Quintus Ræsius, the son of Quintus, Titus Pompeius Longinus, the son of Titus, Caius Servilius (the son of Caius), of the Terentine tribe, Bracchus the military tribune, Publius Clusius Gallus (the son of Publius), of the Veturian tribe, and Caius Sentius (the son of Caius), of the Sabatine tribe. Titus Appius Bulbus, the son of Titus, lieutenant and pro-prætor, to the magistrates, senate, and people of the Ephesians, greeting. Lucius Lentulus the consul exempted the Jews that are in Asia from going into the army in consequence of my intercession for them. And when I made the same petition some time afterwards to Phanius the pro-prætor and to Lucius Antonius the pro-quæstor, I obtained that privilege of them also ; and my will is, that you take care that no one give them any trouble."

§ 14. The decree of the Delians. "The answer of the prætors, when Bœotus was archon, on the twentieth day of the month Thargelion. When Marcus Piso the lieutenant lived in our city, who was also appointed head of the recruiting of soldiers, he called us and many others of the citizens, and gave order, if there were here any Jews who were Roman citizens, that no one was to trouble them about going into the army, because Cornelius Lentulus, the consul, freed the Jews from going into the army on account of their religious scruples. You are therefore obliged to submit to the prætor." And the like decree was made by the Sardians also about us.

§ 15. "Caius Phanius, the son of Caius, imperator and consul, to the magistrates of Cos greeting. I would have you know that the ambassadors of the Jews have been with me, and desired they might have those decrees which the senate had made about them ; which decrees are here subjoined. My will is that you take care of and see to these men, according to the senate's decree, that they may be safely conveyed home through your country."

§ 16. The declaration of Lucius Lentulus the consul : "I have dismissed those Jews who are Roman citizens, and who appeared to me to have their religious rites, and to practise them at Ephesus, on account of their religious scruples. This was done the thirteenth day before the Calends of October."

§ 17. "Lucius Antonius, the son of Marcus, pro-quæstor, and pro-prætor, to the magistrates, senate, and people of the Sardiens, greeting. Those Jews that were our citizens came to me, and showed that they had an assembly of their own according to the laws of their forefathers, and that from the beginning, as also a place of their own, wherein they determined their suits and controversies with one another: upon their petition therefore to me, that these might be lawful for them, I gave order for their privileges to be preserved and permitted."

§ 18. The declaration of Marcus Publius, the son of Spurius, and of Marcus the son of Marcus, and of Lucius the son of Publius. "We went to the pro-consul Lentulus, and informed him of what Dositheus, the son of Cleopatrides, of Alexandria desired, that, if he thought good, he would dismiss those Jews who were Roman citizens, and were wont to observe the rites of the Jewish religion, on account of their religious scruples. Accordingly, he did dismiss them, on the thirteenth day before the Calends of October."

§ 19. "In the month Quintilis, when Lucius Lentulus and Caius Marcellus were consuls, there were present Titus Appius Balbus, the son of Titus, lieutenant of the Horatian tribe, Titus Tongius of the Crustumine tribe, Quintus Ræsius the son of Quintus, Titus Pompeius the son of Titus, Cornelius Longinus, Caius Servilius Bracchus (the son of Caius) military tribune, of the Terentine tribe, Publius Clusius Gallus (the son of Publius) of the Veturian tribe, Caius Teutius (the son of Caius) military tribune, of the Æmilian tribe, Sextus Atilius Serranus (the son of Sextus) of the Æsquiline tribe, Caius Pompeius (the son of Caius) of the Sabatine tribe, Titus Appius Menander the son of Titus, Publius Servilius Strabo the son of Publius, Lucius Paccius Capito (the son of Lucius) of the Colline tribe, Aulus Furius Tertius the son of Aulus, and Appius Menas. In the presence of these Lentulus pronounced the following decree: I have before my tribunal dismissed those Jews that are Roman citizens, and are accustomed to observe the sacred rites of the Jews at Ephesus, on account of their religious scruples."

§ 20. "The magistrates of the Laodiceans send greeting to Caius Rabilius (the son of Caius) the consul. Sopater the ambassador of Hyrcanus the high priest, has delivered us a letter from thee, whereby he lets us know that certain persons came from Hyrcanus the high priest of the Jews, and brought a letter written concerning their nation, wherein they desired that the Jews might be allowed to observe their Sabbaths, and other sacred rites, according to the laws of their forefathers, and that no one might lord it over them, because they were our friends and allies, or injure them in our province. Now although the Trallians there present replied that they were not pleased with these decrees, yet didst thou give order that they should be observed, and informedst us that thou wast desired to write this to us about them. We therefore, in obedience to the injunctions we have received from thee, have received the letter which thou sentest us, and have laid it up apart among our public records. As to the other things about which thou didst send to us, we will take care that no complaint be made against us."

§ 21. "Publius Servilius Galba (the son of Publius), proconsul, to the magistrates, senate, and people of the Milesians, sendeth greeting. Prytanis (the son of Hermes) a citizen of yours, came to me when I was at Tralles<sup>1</sup> and held a court there, and informed me that you used the Jews in a way different to our orders, and forbade them to celebrate their Sabbaths, and to perform the sacred rites received from their forefathers, and to manage the fruits of the land according to their ancient custom, and that he himself had promulgated the decree according to the laws. I would therefore have you know, that upon hearing the pleadings on both sides, I gave sentence that the Jews should not be prohibited to use their own customs."

§ 22. The decree of the people of Pergamus.<sup>2</sup> "When Cratippus was Prytanis, on the first day of the month Dæsius, the decree of the prætors was as follows. Since the Romans, following the conduct of their ancestors, undertake dangers for the common safety of all mankind, and are ambitious to settle their allies and friends in happiness and firm peace; and since the nation of the Jews, and their high priest Hyrcanus, sent as ambassadors to them Strato the son of Theodotus, and Apollonius the son of Alexander, and Æneas the son of Antipater, and Aristobulus the son of Amyntas, and Sosipater the son of Philip, all worthy and good men, who gave a particular account of their affairs, the senate thereupon passed a decree as to what they asked of them, that Antiochus the king, the son of Antiochus, should do no injury to the Jews, the allies of the Romans; and that the fortresses and havens and territory, and whatever else he had taken from them, should be restored; and that it should be lawful for them to export their goods out of their own havens: and that no king or people should have leave to export any goods, either from the country of Judæa or from their havens, without paying customs, except Ptolemy the king of Alexandria, because he is our ally and friend; and that according to their desire, the garrison that was in Joppa should be expelled. Now Lucius Pettius, one of our senators, a worthy and good man, gave order that we should take care that these things should be done according to the senate's decree; and that we should take care also that the Jewish ambassadors might return home in safety. And we admitted Theodorus into our senate and assembly, and took the letter from him as well as the decree of the senate; and as he discoursed with great earnestness, and described Hyrcanus' virtue and generosity, and how he was a benefactor to all men in common, and to everybody that came to him in particular, we laid up the letter in our public records, and made a decree ourselves, since we also were allies of the Romans, that we would do everything we could for the Jews according to the senate's decree. Theodorus also, who brought the letter, asked of our prætors, that they would send Hyrcanus a copy of that decree, as also ambassadors to signify to him the affection of our people to him, and to exhort him to preserve and augment his friendship with us, and to be ready to bestow other benefits upon us, as we reasonably expected to receive a fit return, remembering that our ancestors were friendly to the Jews even in the days of Abraham, who was the father of all the Hebrews, as we have found it set down in our public records.”

23. The decree of the Halicarnassians.<sup>1</sup> “Before Memnon the priest, the son of Orestides by descent, but of Euonymus by adoption, on the * * * day of the month Anthes-terion, the decree of the people, upon the motion of Marcus Alexander, was as follows. Since we have ever a great regard to piety towards God and to holiness, following the people of the Romans, who are the benefactors of all men, and what they have written to us about a league of friendship and alliance between the Jews and our city, that their sacred rites and accustomed feasts and assemblies may be observed by them; we have decreed, that as many men and women of the Jews as wish to do so may celebrate their Sabbaths, and perform their holy rites, according to the Jewish laws, and have their places of prayer by the sea-side, according to the customs of their forefathers; and if any one, whether a magistrate or private person, hinders them from so doing, he shall be liable to a fine, to be paid to the city.”

§ 24. The decree of the Sardians.<sup>2</sup> “This decree was made by the senate and people, upon the representation of the prætors. Whereas those Jews, who are our fellow-citizens, and live in our city, have ever had great benefits heaped upon them by the people, and have come now to the senate, and requested of the people that, upon the restitution of their laws and liberty by the senate and people of Rome, they may assemble together according to their ancient customs, and that we will not bring any suit against them about it; and that a place may be given them where they may hold their congregations with their wives and children, and may offer, as their forefathers did, their prayers and sacrifices to God; the senate and people have decreed to permit them to assemble together on the days formerly appointed, and to act according to their own laws; and that such a place be set apart for them by the prætors for a building and habitation, as they shall esteem fit for that purpose. And let those that see to provisions for the city, take care that such sorts of food as they shall esteem fit for their eating, may be introduced into the city."

§ 25. The decree of the Ephesians. "When Menophilus was Prytanis, on the first day of the month Artemisius, this decree was made by the people. Nicanor, the son of Euphemus, pronounced it, upon the motion of the prætors. As the Jews that dwell in this city petitioned Marcus Julius Pompeius (the son of Brutus) the pro-consul, that they might be allowed to observe their Sabbaths, and to act in all things according to the customs of their forefathers, without impediment from anybody, the prætor granted their petition. So it was decreed by the senate and people, as the affair concerned the Romans, that none of them should be hindered from keeping the Sabbath-day, nor be fined for so doing, but that they should be allowed to do all things according to their own laws."

§ 26. Now there are many other such decrees of the senate and imperators of the Romans, made in favour of Hyrcanus and our nation, and decrees for cities, and rescripts of the prætors to such letters as concerned our rights and privileges: and certainly such as are not ill disposed to what I write, may believe that they are all to this purpose, from the specimens which I have inserted. For as I have produced evident marks that may still be seen of the friendship we have had with the Romans, and shown that those marks are engraven upon pillars and tablets of brass in the Capitol, that are still in existence and will be so, I have omitted to set them all down as needless and disagreeable; for I cannot suppose any one so perverse as not to believe that we have had friendship with the Romans, since they have demonstrated the same by such a great number of their decrees relating to us, or to doubt of our fidelity as to the rest of those decrees, since I have shown a sample. I have now sufficiently set forth the friendship and alliance we had in those times with the Romans.

CHAP. XI.

How Murcus succeeded Sextus, when he had been slain by Bassus' treachery; and how, after the death of Cæsar, Cassius came into Syria, and distressed Judæa; as also, how Malichus slew Antipater, and was himself slain by Herod.

§ 1.

NOW it so fell out about this very time that the affairs of Syria were in great disorder on the following account. Cæcilius Bassus, one of Pompey's party, conspired against Sextus Cæsar, and slew him, and then took his army, and got the management of public affairs into his own hand; so that there arose a great war about Apamea,<sup>1</sup> for Cæsar's generals came against him with an army of horse and foot. Antipater also sent succours with his sons to them, calling to mind the kindnesses he had received from Cæsar, and so he thought it but just to require punishment for him, and to take vengeance on the man that had murdered him. And as the war lasted a great time, Murcus came from Rome to take Sextus' command, and Cæsar was slain by Cassius and Brutus and the other conspirators in the senate-house, after he had ruled three years and six months. This is however related elsewhere.

§ 2. As the war that arose upon the death of Cæsar was now begun, and the principal men all went, some one way, some another, to raise armies, Cassius went from Rome into Syria, to take the command of the army at Apamea, and having raised the siege, he won over both Bassus and Murcus to his party. He then visited the various cities, and got together weapons and soldiers, and laid great taxes upon the cities, and especially oppressed Judæa, exacting from it seven hundred talents. But Antipater, when he saw that affairs were in such great confusion and disorder, divided the collection of that sum, and appointed his two sons to gather some of it, and part of it was to be exacted by Malichus, who was ill disposed to him, and part by others. And because Herod did exact what was required of him from Galilee before all others, he was in the greatest favour with Cassius; for he thought it prudent to cultivate a friendship with the Romans, and to gain their good-will at the expense of others; whereas the rulers of the other cities, with all the citizens, were sold for slaves; and Cassius reduced four cities to slavery, the two most important of which were Gophna<sup>1</sup> and Emmaus,<sup>2</sup> and besides them Lydda<sup>3</sup> and Thamna.<sup>4</sup> Nay, Cassius was so very angry at Malichus, that he would have killed him (for he was mad at him), had not Hyrcanus sent him by Antipater a hundred talents of his own, and so pacified his anger against him.

§ 6. But after Cassius had gone from Judæa, Malichus conspired against Antipater, thinking his death would be for the security of Hyrcanus' power; but his design was not unknown to Antipater, who, when he perceived it, retired beyond the Jordan, and got together an army, partly of Arabs, and partly of his own countrymen. However, Malichus, being a crafty fellow, denied that he had laid any snares for him, and made his defence with an oath both to him and his sons, and said, that as Phasaelus had the garrison in Jerusalem, and Herod had the weapons of war in his custody, he could never have thought of any such thing. So Antipater, perceiving the distress that Malichus was in, was reconciled to him, and made an agreement with him when Murcus was prætor of Syria, who perceiving that this Malichus was raising disturbances in Judæa, very nearly had him killed, but at the intercession of Antipater he saved his life.

§ 4. However, Antipater little thought that in Malichus he had saved his own murderer. For when Cassius and Murcus had got together an army, they intrusted the entire care of it to Herod, and made him general of the forces of Coele-Syria, and gave him a fleet of ships, and an army of horse and foot; and promised him, after the war was over, to make him king of Judæa, for war was already begun between them and Antony and the young Cæsar.<sup>5</sup>

And as Malichus was now especially afraid of Antipater, he tried to get him out of the way ; and, by the offer of money, persuaded the butler of Hyrcanus with whom they were about to feast, to kill him by poison. This being done, having armed men with him, he settled the affairs of the city. But when Antipater's sons, Herod and Phasaelus, got to know of this conspiracy against their father, and were indignant at it, Malichus denied all, and professed to have no knowledge of the murder. And thus died Antipater, a man that had distinguished himself for piety and justice and love for his country. And whereas one of his sons, Herod, resolved immediately to revenge his father's death, and marched against Malichus with an army, the elder of his sons, Phasaelus, thought it best rather to get round him by policy, lest they should appear to begin a civil war in the country. So he accepted Malichus' defence, and pretended to believe that he had had no hand in the death of Antipater his father, and erected a fine monument to him. Herod also went to Samaria,<sup>1</sup> and as he found it in great distress, he repaired the city, and composed the differences of its inhabitants.

§ 5. Not long after this, Herod, upon the approach of a festival at Jerusalem, went with his soldiers to that city ; whereupon Malichus was afraid, and urged Hyrcanus not to permit him to enter the city. Hyrcanus listened to him, and alleged, as a pretext for excluding Herod, that a crowd of strangers ought not to be admitted when the multitude were purifying themselves. But Herod paid little regard to the messengers who were sent to him, and entered the city by night, and frightened Malichus, who however remitted nothing of his dissimulation, but wept for Antipater, and bewailed him with a loud voice as a friend of his. And Herod and his friends thought it well not to expose Malichus' hypocrisy, but to receive him kindly also, to prevent his feeling any suspicion.

§ 6. However, Herod sent to Cassius, and informed him of the murder of his father. And he, knowing the character of Malichus, sent him back word to revenge his father's death ; and also sent privately to the commanders of the army at Tyre, ordering them to assist Herod in the execution of his very just design. Now when Cassius had taken Laodicea,<sup>1</sup> and they all went together to him, and carried him garlands and money, Herod expected that Malichus would be punished while he was there; but Malichus was somewhat apprehensive of some such thing when in the neighbourhood of Tyre in Phœnicia, and designed to make some great move, and as his son was then an hostage at Tyre, he went to that city, and resolved to steal him away privately, and to march thence into Judæa; and as Cassius was in haste to march against Antony, he thought to bring the country to revolt, and to procure the government for himself. But Providence opposed his counsels, for Herod being a shrewd man, and perceiving what his intention was, sent thither beforehand a servant, in appearance indeed to get a supper ready, (for he had said before that he would feast them all there,) but in reality to take a message to the commanders of the army, whom he urged to go out against Malichus with their daggers. So they went out, and met the man near the city, upon the sea-shore, and there stabbed him. Thereupon Hyrcanus was so astonished at what had happened, that his speech failed him; and when, after some difficulty, he came to himself, he asked Herod's men what the matter could be, and who it was that had slain Malichus? And when they said that it was done by command of Cassius, he commended the action; for he said Malichus was a very wicked man, and one that conspired against his country. And this was the punishment that was inflicted on Malichus for what he wickedly did to Antipater.

§ 7. But when Cassius had marched out of Syria, disturbances arose in Judæa: for Helix, who was left at Jerusalem with an army, made a sudden attack on Phasaelus, and the people themselves took up arms. And Herod went to Fabius, the prefect of Damascus, and desired to run to his brother's assistance, but was hindered by an illness that seized upon him, till Phasaelus by himself was too hard for Helix, and shut him up in the tower, and then dismissed him on conditions. Phasaelus also complained of Hyrcanus, on the ground that, although he had received a great many benefits from them, he yet acted with his enemies. For Malichus' brother at this time made many places to revolt, and kept garrisons in them, and especially at Masada,<sup>1</sup> the strongest fortress of all. Not long after this Herod recovered from his illness, and came and took from Malichus' brother all the places he had got, and, on certain conditions, let him go.

CHAP. XII.

Herod ejects Antigonus, the Son of Aristobulus, from Judæa, and gains the Friendship of Antony, who was now come into Syria, by sending him much Money; on which Account he would not hear those that would have accused Herod: and what it was that Antony wrote to the Tyrians in behalf of the Jews.

§ 1.

NOW Ptolemy, the son of Mennæus, because he was akin to him, brought back into Judæa Antigonus the son of Aristobulus, who had already raised an army, and had by money made Fabius his friend. Marion also gave him assistance. Marion had been left by Cassius to tyrannize over Tyre, for Cassius having seized on Syria, then kept it under by tyrants. Marion also marched into Galilee, which lay in his neighbourhood, and took three of the fortresses, and put garrisons into them to keep them. But when Herod came against him he took them all from him, but he dismissed the Tyrian garrison in a very civil manner; nay he made presents to some from the good-will he bore to that city. When he had despatched these affairs, and had gone to meet Antigonus, he joined battle with him, and beat him, and drove him out of Judæa, when he was just come into its borders. And when he was come to Jerusalem, Hyrcanus and the people put garlands on his head; for he had already contracted an affinity with the family of Hyrcanus by having espoused a descendant of his, and for that reason Herod took the greater care of him, as he was about to marry the daughter of Alexander (the son of Aristobulus) and grand-daughter of Hyrcanus, by whom he eventually became the father of three sons and two daughters. He had also married before this another wife, of a lower family of his own nation, whose name was Doris, by whom he had his eldest son Antipater.

§ 2. Now Antony and Cæsar<sup>1</sup> had beaten Cassius near Philippi,<sup>2</sup> as others have related; and after that victory, Cæsar<sup>1</sup> went into Italy, and Antony set out for Asia, and, when he arrived at Bithynia,<sup>3</sup> ambassadors met him from all parts. The principal men also of the Jews came there to accuse Phasaelus and Herod, and said that Hyrcanus had indeed the semblance of reigning, but these men had all the power. But Antony paid great respect to Herod, who came to him to make his defence against his accusers, so that his adversaries could not so much as obtain a hearing; which favour Herod obtained of Antony by money. But when Antony was come to Ephesus, Hyrcanus the high priest, and our nation, sent an embassy to him, who carried a crown of gold with them, and begged that he would write to the governors of the provinces, to set those Jews free who had been carried captive by Cassius, though they had not fought against him, and to restore them the country which had been taken from them in the days of Cassius. Antony thought the Jews' requests were just, and wrote immediately to Hyrcanus and to the Jews. He also sent, at the same time, a decree to the Tyrians, the contents of which were as follows.

§ 3. "Marcus Antonius, imperator, to Hyrcanus the high priest and ethnarch of the Jews greeting. If you be in health, it is well; I also am in health and the army. Lysimachus the son of Pausanias, and Josephus the son of Mennæus, and Alexander the son of Theodorus, your ambassadors, met me at Ephesus, and have renewed that embassy which they had formerly been upon at Rome, and have diligently acquitted themselves in the present embas-

sage on behalf of you and your nation, and have fully declared the good-will you have for us. I am therefore satisfied, both by your actions and words, that you are well disposed to us, and I understand that your conduct of life is constant and religious, so I reckon upon you as our own. But since those that were adversaries to you, and to the Roman people, abstained neither from cities nor temples, and did not observe the agreements they had confirmed by oath, it was not only on account of our private contest with them, but also on account of all mankind in common, that we took vengeance on those who have been the authors of great injustice towards men, and of great wickedness towards the gods; for the sake of which we suppose it was that the sun turned away its light,<sup>1</sup> being unwilling to view the horrid crime they were guilty of in the case of Cæsar. We have also overcome their conspiracies, which threatened the gods themselves, which Macedonia received, as it is a climate peculiarly proper for impious and insolent attempts, and we overcame that confused rout of men half mad with spite against us, which they got together at Philippi in Macedonia, when they occupied places fit for their purpose, and, as it were, walled round with mountains to the very sea, and where approach was open only through a single gate. This victory we gained because the gods had condemned those men for their wicked undertakings. Now Brutus, when he had fled to Philippi, was shut up by us, and partook of the same destruction as Cassius; and now that those men have received their punishment, we hope that we may enjoy peace for the time to come, and that Asia may be at rest from war. We, therefore, make that peace which God has given us common to our allies also, so that the body of Asia is now recovered from its disease as it were owing to our victory. I, therefore, bearing you in mind and hoping to aggrandize your nation, shall take care of what may be for your advantage. I have also sent letters to the several cities, that if any persons, whether freemen or bondmen, have been sold under the spear by Caius Cassius, or his subordinate officers, they are to be set free. And I will that you make use of the favours which I and Dolabella have kindly granted you. I also forbid the Tyrians to use any violence to you, and as to those places of the Jews they now possess, I order them to restore them. I have also accepted of the crown which you sent me."

§ 4. " Marcus Antonius, imperator, to the magistrates, senate, and people of Tyre, greeting. The ambassadors of Hyrcanus the high priest and ethnarch [of the Jews] have appeared before me at Ephesus, and have told me that you are in possession of part of their country, which you entered upon during the sway of our adversaries. Since, therefore, we have undertaken a war for obtaining the government, and have taken care to do what was agreeable to piety and justice, and have brought to punishment those that had neither any remembrance of the kindness they had received, nor kept their oaths, I will that you be at peace with those that are our allies, as also that what you have taken by means of our adversaries shall not be reckoned your own, but be returned to those from whom you took them. For none of our rivals took their provinces or their armies by the gift of the senate, but seized them by force, and gratified by violence such as served them in their unjust proceedings. Since, therefore, those men have received the punishment due to them, we desire that our allies may retain whatever they formerly possessed without disturbance, and that you restore all the places which you now have, which belonged to Hyrcanus the ethnarch of the Jews, even though only one day before Caius Cassius began an unjustifiable war against us, and entered our provinces. Neither use any force against the Jews in order to weaken them, that they may not be able to dispose of that which is their own. But if you have any plea to urge in defence against Hyrcanus, it shall be lawful for you to plead your case when we come to the places concerned, for we shall alike preserve the rights, and hear all the causes, of our allies."

§ 5. " Marcus Antonius, imperator, to the magistrates, senate, and people of Tyre, greeting. I have sent you my decree, and I will that you take care that it be engraven on the public tablets, in Roman and Greek letters, and that it stand engraven in the most public place, that it may be read by all. Marcus Antonius, imperator, one of the triumvirs over public affairs, has spoken. Since Caius Cassius, in the revolt he made, pillaged a province which did not belong to him, and was held by garrisons there encamped, and plundered our allies, and warred against the nation of the Jews that was in friendship with the Roman people, and since we have overcome his madness by arms, we now correct by our decrees and judicial determinations what he has laid waste, that all that may be restored to our allies. And as for what has been sold of the Jews, whether bodies or possessions, let them be released, the bodies into that state of freedom they were originally in, and the possessions to their former owners. I also will, that he who shall not comply with this decree of mine, shall be punished for his disobedience; and if such a one be caught, I will take care that the offender shall suffer condign punishment."

§ 6. The same thing did Antony write to the Sidonians, and the Antiochians, and the Aradians.<sup>1</sup> I have produced these decrees at a suitable place, as proofs of the truth of what I said, namely that the Romans had a great concern about our nation.

of the Jews to accuse Herod and his party, and set the men of the greatest eloquence among them to speak. But Messala pleaded against them, on behalf of the young men, and in the presence of Hyrcanus, who was Herod's father-in-law already.<sup>1</sup> When Antony had heard both sides at Daphne,<sup>2</sup> he asked Hyrcanus who governed the nation best? and he replied, Herod and his party. Thereupon Antony, because of the old friendship he had with Herod's father when he was with Gabinius, made both Herod and Phasaelus tetrarchs, and committed the public affairs of the Jews to them, and wrote letters to that purpose. He also put fifteen of their adversaries in bonds, and was going to kill them, but Herod obtained their pardon.

§ 2. Yet did not these men continue quiet when they returned from their embassy, but a thousand of the Jews went to Tyre to meet Antony there, as the report was that he would go there. But Antony was corrupted by the quantity of money which Herod and his brother had given him, and so he gave orders to the governor of the place to punish the Jewish ambassadors who were for making innovations, and to settle the government upon Herod. And Herod went out quickly to them, and Hyrcanus with him (for they stood upon the shore before the city), and charged them to go their ways, because great mischief would befall them if they went on with their pertinacity. But they would not listen, so the Romans ran upon them at once with their daggers, and slew some, and wounded others, and the rest fled away and went home, and remained quiet in great consternation. And when the people made a clamour against Herod, Antony was so provoked at it that he slew those fifteen that had been put in bonds.

§ 3. Now, in the second year, Pacorus, the king of Parthia's son, and Barzapharnes, a satrap of the Parthians, occupied Syria. Ptolemy, the son of Mennæus, was now

<sup>1</sup> We may here take notice, that espousals alone were of old esteemed a sufficient foundation for affinity, Hyrcanus being here called father-in-law to Herod, because his grand-daughter Mariamne was betrothed to him, although the marriage was not completed till four years afterwards. also dead, and Lysanias his son succeeded him, and made a league of friendship with Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, and for that end made use of the satrap Barzapharnes, who had great influence with him. Now Antigonus had promised to give the Parthians a thousand talents and five hundred women, if they would take the government away from Hyrcanus, and bestow it upon him, and also kill Herod. And although he did not give what he promised, yet did the Parthians make an expedition into Judæa on that account, and carried Antigonus with them. Pacorus went along the maritime parts, and the satrap Barzapharnes through the interior of the country. Now the Tyrians excluded Pacorus, but the Sidonians and those of Ptolémaïs<sup>1</sup> received him. However, Pacorus sent a troop of horse into Judæa, to make a reconnoissance of the country, and to assist Antigonus, and sent the king's butler as its commander, who had the same name as himself. And when the Jews that dwelt about Mount Carmel came to Antigonus, and were ready to march with him into Judæa, Antigonus hoped to get some part of the country by their assistance; the place was called Drymi.<sup>2</sup> And when some others came and met them, the men marched on Jerusalem; and when some more were come to them, they got together in great numbers, and marched against the king's palace and besieged it. But as Phasaelus' and Herod's party came to the others' assistance, and a battle took place between them in the market-place, the young men beat their enemies, and pursued them into the temple, and sent some armed men into the adjoining houses to keep them in, who however being destitute of support were burnt, houses and all, by the people who rose up against them. But Herod was revenged on these seditious adversaries of his soon afterwards for this injury they had done him, for he fought with them, and slew a great number of them.

§ 4. But though there were daily skirmishes, the enemy waited for the coming of the people out of the country to Pentecost (a feast of ours so called), and when that day was come, many myriads of the people were gathered together near the temple, some in armour, and some unarmed. Now those that came guarded both the temple and the city, except near the palace, which Herod guarded with a few of his soldiers; and Phasaelus had the charge of the wall, while Herod, with a body of his men, sallied out upon the enemy, who lay in the suburbs, and fought valiantly, and put many myriads to flight, some fleeing into the city, and some into the temple, and some to the outer vallum that was there. Phasaelus also came to his assistance. And Pacorus, the general of the Parthians, at the desire of Antigonus, was admitted into the city, with a few of his horsemen, under pretext indeed of stilling the sedition, but in reality to assist Antigonus in obtaining the government. And when Phasaelus met him, and received him kindly, Pacorus persuaded him to go himself as ambassador to Barzapharnes, which was done treacherously. And Phasaelus, suspecting no harm, complied with his proposal, while Herod did not approve of what was done, because of the perfidiousness of the barbarians, but bade Phasaelus rather to fight against those that were come into the city.

§ 5. So both Hyrcanus and Phasaelus went on the embassy; but Pacorus left with Herod two hundred horse, and ten men who were called Freemen, and conducted the others on their journey. And when they got to Galilee, the governors of the cities there met them in arms. And Barzapharnes received them at first with cheerfulness, and made them presents, though he afterwards conspired against them; and Phasaelus, with his horsemen, were conducted to the seaside. But when they heard that Antigonus had promised to bribe the Parthians by a thousand talents and five hundred women to assist him against them, they soon had a suspicion of the barbarians. Moreover, there was one who informed them that snares were laid for them by night, as a guard secretly surrounded them. And they would then have been seized upon, had not they waited for the seizure of Herod by the Parthians that were at Jerusalem, lest, upon the slaughter of Hyrcanus and Phasaelus, he should have an intimation of it, and so escape out of their hands. And these were the circumstances they were now in, and they saw who they were that guarded them. Some persons indeed advised Phasaelus to ride off immediately, and not to stay any longer; and there was one Ophellius, who, above all the rest, was urgent with him to do so, for he had heard of this treachery from Saramalla, the richest of all the Syrians at that time, who also promised to provide him ships for flight; for the sea was near. But he had no mind to desert Hyrcanus, nor bring his brother into danger; but he went to Bartzapharnes, and told him he did not act justly in plotting thus against them, for if he wanted money, he would give him more than Antigonus; and besides, it was monstrous to slay ambassadors that came to him upon the security of their oaths, and that when they had done no injury. And the barbarian swore to him that there was no truth in any of his suspicions, but that he was troubled with nothing but false fancies, and then went back to Pacorus.

§ 6. But as soon as he was gone away, some of the Parthians came and bound Hyrcanus and Phasaelus, and Phasaelus greatly reproached the Parthians for their perjury. Now the butler who was sent against Herod had been told to get him without the walls of the city and seize upon him. But messengers had been sent by Phasaelus to inform Herod of the perfidiousness of the Parthians: and when Herod knew that the enemy had seized Hyrcanus and Phasaelus, he went to Pacorus, and to the most influential of the Parthians, as the lords of the rest. And they, although they knew the whole matter, dissembled with him in a deceitful way; and said that he ought to go out with them before the walls, and meet those who were bringing him letters, for they had not yet been taken by his adversaries, but were coming to give him an account of the good success Phasaelus had had. But Herod did not credit what they said; for he had heard from others that his brother had been seized. And the daughter of Hyrcanus, whose daughter he had espoused, advised him also [not to credit them,] which made him still more suspicious of the Parthians; for although other people did not give heed to her, he believed her to be a woman of very great wisdom.

§ 7. Now while the Parthians were in consultation what was fit to be done (for they did not think it proper to make an open attempt upon a person of his character), and put off the matter to the next day, Herod was in great anxiety; and rather inclining to believe the reports he heard about his brother and the Parthians, than to give heed to what was said on the other side, he determined that, when evening came on, he would make use of it for his flight, and not make any longer delay, as if danger from the enemy was still uncertain. He therefore set out with the armed men whom he had with him, and set the women upon beasts of burden, as his mother and sister, and her whom he was about to marry [Mariamne], the daughter of Alexander (the son of Aristobulus), and her mother the daughter of Hyrcanus, and his youngest brother, and all their servants, and the rest of the multitude that was with him, and without the enemies' knowledge pursued his way to Idumæa<sup>1</sup>: nor could any enemy of his, who had seen him then in this case, have been so hard-hearted, as not to have commiserated his fortune, as the women dragged along their infant children, and with tears in their eyes, and sad lamentations, left their own country, and their friends in prison, and expected nothing but what was of a melancholy nature.

§ 8. But Herod raised his mind above the miserable state he was in, and was of good courage in the midst of his misfortunes, and, as he passed along, bade every one be of good cheer, and not give way to sorrow, because that would hinder them in their flight, which was now the only hope of safety that they had. So they tried to bear with patience the calamity they were in, as Herod exhorted them to do; but he once almost killed himself, upon the overthrow of a waggon, and the danger his mother was then in of being killed, not only because of his great concern for her, but also because he was afraid lest, by this delay, the enemy should overtake him in the pursuit. But as he was drawing his sword, and going to kill himself with it, those that were present restrained him, and being so many in number were too much for him, and told him that he ought not to desert them, and leave them a prey to their enemies, for that it was not the part of a brave man to free himself from the distresses he was in, and to leave his friends to struggle in the same. So he was compelled to let that horrid attempt alone, partly from shame at what they said to him, and partly from regard to the great number of those that would not permit him to do what he intended. And he revived his mother, and took all the care of her the conjuncture would allow, and proceeded on the way he proposed to go with the utmost haste, and that was to the fortress of Masada.<sup>1</sup> And though he had many skirmishes with such of the Parthians as attacked him and pursued him, he was conqueror in them all.

§ 9. Nor indeed was he free from the Jews during his flight; for by the time he had got sixty furlongs out of the city, and was upon the road, they fell upon him, and fought hand to hand with him, and he also put them to flight and overcame them, not like one that was in distress and in necessity, but like one that was excellently prepared for war, and had what he wanted in great plenty. And in the very place where he overcame the Jews, some time afterwards, when he became king, he built a most fine palace, and a city round it, and called it Herodium.<sup>2</sup> And when he was come to Idumæa, to a place called Thresa,<sup>3</sup> his brother Joseph met him, and he then held a council to take advice about all his affairs, and what was fit to be done under the circumstances, as he had a great multitude that followed him, besides his mercenary soldiers, and the fortress of Masada, where he proposed to flee to, was too small to contain so great a multitude. So he sent away the greater part of his company, who were more than nine thousand, and bade them go some one way and some another, and save themselves in Idumæa, and gave them what would buy them provisions on their journey; but he took with himself those that were the least encumbered, and were most friendly to him, and reached the fortress, and placed there his wives, and his followers (who were eight hundred in number), there being in the place a sufficient quantity of corn and water and other necessaries, and himself set out directly for Petra in Arabia. But when it was day, the Parthians plundered all Jerusalem, and the palace, and abstained from nothing but Hyrcanus' money, which was three hundred talents. A great deal of Herod's money escaped, especially all that he had been so prudent as to send into Idumæa beforehand. However, what was in the city did not suffice the Parthians, but they went out into the country, and plundered it, and razed to the ground the powerful city of Marissa.<sup>1</sup>

§ 10. Thus was Antigonus restored to Judæa by the king of the Parthians, and received Hyrcanus and Phasaelus as prisoners; but he was greatly cast down because the women had escaped, whom he intended to have given the enemy, as he had promised they should have them, with money, for their reward. And being afraid that Hyrcanus, who was guarded by the Parthians, would have the kingdom restored to him by the multitude, he cut off his ears, and so took care that the high priesthood should never come to him any more, because he was thus maimed, and the law required that this dignity should belong to none but such as had all their members entire.<sup>2</sup> But one cannot but admire the fortitude of Phasaelus, who, perceiving that he was to be put to death, did not think death terrible at all; but he thought it a most pitiable and dishonourable thing to die at the hands of the enemy, and therefore, since he had not his hands at liberty, for the bonds he was in prevented him from killing himself with them, he dashed his head against a great stone, and so took away his own life, which he thought to be the best thing he could do in such straits as he was in, and so put it out of the power of the enemy to put him to any death he pleased. It is also reported, that when he had made a great wound in his head, Antigonus sent surgeons as if to heal it, and ordered them to infuse poison into the wound, and so killed him. However, Phasaelus hearing from a certain woman, before he was quite dead, that his brother Herod had escaped the enemy, underwent his death cheerfully, since he now left behind him one who would revenge his death, and was able to inflict punishment on his enemies.

How Herod got away from the King of Arabia, and made haste to go into Egypt, and thence went away in haste also to Rome: and how, by promising a great deal of money to Antony, he was made by the Senate and Augustus King of the Jews.

§ 1.

AS for Herod, the great hardships he underwent did not discourage him, but made him sharp in inventing bold plans. For he went to Malchus, king of Arabia, whom he had formerly been very kind to, in order to receive a return now he was in more than ordinary want of it, and desired he would let him have some money, either by way of loan or as a free gift, as he had received many benefits from him; for not knowing what had happened to his brother, he was in haste to ransom him out of the hands of his enemies, being willing to give three hundred talents as the price of his ransom. He also took with him the son of Phasaelus, who was a child of but seven years of age, in order that he might be a hostage to the Arabs for the repayment of the money; but there came messengers from Malchus to meet him, by whom he was desired to be off, for the Parthians had charged him not to receive Herod. This was only a pretext which he made use of that he might not be obliged to repay him what he owed him: and he was further induced to this by the principal men among the Arabians, that they might cheat him of the sums they had received from Antipater as a trust. He made answer, that he had not intended to be troublesome to them by his coming to them, but that he had desired only to discourse with them about certain affairs that were of the greatest importance to him.

§ 2. He then resolved to go away, and very prudently took the road to Egypt. And that night he lodged in a certain temple, for he had left a great many of his followers there, but on the next day he reached Rhinocurura,<sup>1</sup> and there heard what had befallen his brother. However, Malchus soon repented of what he had done, and came running after Herod, but with no success, for he had got a very great way off, making post haste on the road to Pelusium.<sup>1</sup> And when the ships that lay at anchor there hindered him from sailing to Alexandria, he went to the rulers of the place, by whom, in their reverence and great regard for him, he was conducted to the city, and was detained there by Cleopatra. However she was not able to prevail with him to stay there, because he was making haste to Rome, even though the weather was stormy, and he was informed that affairs in Italy were in great disorder and in a most unsettled condition.

§ 3. So he set sail from thence for Pamphylia,<sup>2</sup> and, falling in with a violent storm, had much ado to escape to Rhodes, with the loss of the ship's burden. And there two of his friends, Sappinas and Ptolemy, met him; and as he found Rhodes had been very much damaged in the war against Cassius, he neglected not to do it a kindness, though he was in necessity himself, but did what he could to restore it to its former state. He also built there a trireme, and set sail thence with his friends for Italy, and arrived at the port of Brundisium;<sup>3</sup> and when he had got from thence to Rome, he first related to Antony what had befallen him in Judæa, and how Phasaelus his brother had been seized by the Parthians, and put to death by them, and how Hyrcanus was detained captive by them, and how they had made Antigonus king, who had promised them no less a sum of money than a thousand talents, and five hundred women (who were to be of the principal families and of the Jewish stock), and how he himself had carried off the women by night, and by undergoing a great many hardships had escaped the hands of his enemies; as also, that his own relations were in danger of being besieged and taken, and that he had sailed through a storm, and despised all these terrible dangers, in order to come as soon as possible to him, who was his hope and only succour at this time.

that had happened in Herod's condition, and reasoning with himself that this was a common case among those that are placed in such great dignities, and that they too are liable to fortune, he was very ready to give him the assistance he desired, partly because he called to mind the friendship he had had with Antipater, partly because Herod offered him money to make him king, as he had formerly done because he was made tetrarch, but chiefly because of his hatred to Antigonus, for he took him to be a seditious person, and an enemy to the Romans. Augustus was also the forwarder to raise Herod's dignity, and to give him his assistance in what he desired, on account of the toils of war which his father had undergone with Antipater in Egypt, and of the hospitable way in which he had treated him, and the kindness he had always showed him, as also to gratify Antony, who was very attached to Herod. So the senate was convened, and Messala and after him Atratinus introduced Herod, and enlarged upon the benefits they had received from his father, and reminded them of the good-will he had himself borne to the Romans. At the same time they accused Antigonus, and declared him an enemy, not only because of his former opposition to them, but because he had now neglected the Romans, and taken the government from the Parthians. Upon this the senate was irritated, and Antony came forward and informed them that it was for their advantage in the Parthian war that Herod should be king. This seemed good to all the senators, and they made a decree to this effect accordingly.

§ 5. And this was the principal proof of Antony's affection for Herod, that he not only procured him a kingdom which he did not expect (for he did not come with an intention to ask the kingdom for himself, for he did not suppose the Romans would grant it him, who generally bestowed it on some of the royal family, but intended to ask it for his wife's brother, who was grandson on the father's side to Aristobulus, and to Hyrcanus on the mother's side), but procured it for him so soon, little as he expected it, that he left Italy in as few days as seven in all. The young man his brother-in-law Herod afterwards took care to have slain, as I shall show in its proper place. And when the senate was dissolved, Antony and

Augustus went out of the senate-house, with Herod between them, and with the consuls and other magistrates before them, in order to offer sacrifices, and to lay up their decrees in the Capitol. Antony also feasted Herod the first day of his reign. And thus did he receive the kingdom, having obtained it in the hundred and eighty-fourth Olympiad, when Caius Domitius Calvinus was consul the second time, and Caius Asinius Pollio [the first time].

§ 6. All this while Antigonus besieged those that were in Masada, who had plenty of all other necessaries, and were only in want of water, so that on that account Joseph, Herod's brother, intended to desert from it with two hundred of his men to the Arabians; for he heard that Malchus repented of the offences he had been guilty of with regard to Herod. But God, by sending rain in the night-time, prevented his going away, for their cisterns were thereby filled, and so he was under no necessity of flight any longer, but they were now of good courage, and the more so, because the sending that plenty of water which they had been in want of, seemed a token of divine providence; so they made a sally, and fought with Antigonus' soldiers, some openly, others from ambush, and slew a great number of them. Meautime Ventidius, the general of the Romans, having been sent to drive the Parthians out of Syria, marched after them into Judæa, ostensibly to succour Joseph, but in reality the whole affair was no more than a stratagem to get money from Antigonus. So he pitched his camp very near Jerusalem, and stripped Antigonus of a great deal of money, and then retired himself with the greater part of his army; but, that his motive might not be found out, he left Silo there with a certain part of his soldiers; and Antigonus also paid court to him, that he might cause him no disturbance, though he still hoped that the Parthians would come again and aid him.

CHAP. XV.

How Herod sailed from Italy to Judæa, and fought against Antigonus; also what other things happened in Judæa about this Time.

§ 1.

BY this time Herod had sailed from Italy to Ptolemais, and had got together no small army both of mercenaries and of his own countrymen, and marched through Galilee against Antigonus. Silo also and Ventidius came and assisted him, being urged by Dellius (who was sent by Antony) to assist in restoring Herod. As for Ventidius, he was employed in settling the disturbances that had been made in the cities because of the Parthians; and as for Silo he was in Judæa, having been bribed by Antigonus. Now as Herod went along, his army increased every day, and all Galilee, with some few exceptions, joined him; but as he was marching to those that were at Masada (for he was obliged to endeavour to save those that were besieged in that fortress because they were his relations) Joppa<sup>1</sup> was a hindrance to him, for it was necessary for him to take that place first, it being a city hostile to him, that no point d'appui might be left in his enemies' hands on his rear, when he should go to Jerusalem. And as Silo made this a pretext for departing and was thereupon pursued by the Jews, Herod fell upon them with a small body of men, and not only put the Jews to flight but saved Silo, when he was very poorly able to defend himself. And when Herod had taken Joppa, he made haste to set free those of his friends that were in Masada.<sup>2</sup> Now some of the people of the country joined him because of the friendship they had had to his father, and some because of his own reputation, and others by way of return for the benefits they had received from both of them, but most came to him in hope of getting something from him, if he were once firmly settled in the kingdom.

§ 2. Herod had now a strong force, and as he marched on, Antigonus laid snares and ambushes in the passes and places most proper for them, but in truth he did thereby little or no damage to his enemy. But Herod recovered his friends out of Masada, and took the fortress of Thresa,<sup>1</sup> and marched on for Jerusalem. The soldiers also that were with Silo accompanied him, as did many of the citizens, being awed at his power. And as soon as he had pitched his camp on the west side of the city, the soldiers that were set to guard that part shot their arrows, and threw their darts at him. And as some sallied out en masse, and fought hand to hand with the front ranks of Herod's army, he gave orders that they should, in the first place, make proclamation near the walls, that he came for the good of the people, and for the preservation of the city, and not to revenge any old grudge on even his most open enemies, but was ready to forget the offences which his greatest adversaries had done him. But Antigonus, by way of reply to what Herod had caused to be proclaimed, said to Silo and the Roman army, "That they would not do justly, if they gave the kingdom to Herod, who was only a private man, and an Idumæan, i.e., only half a Jew, whereas they ought to bestow it on one of the royal family, as their custom was. For if they now bore ill-will to him (Antigonus), and had resolved to deprive him of the kingdom as having received it from the Parthians, yet were there many others of his family who might by their law take it, and those such as had no way offended against the Romans, and as they were priests, it would be an unworthy thing to pass them by." Now, as they said thus one to another, and fell to reproaching one another on both sides, Antigonus permitted his own men to repel the enemy from the walls. And they using their bows, and showing great energy against their enemies, easily drove them away from the towers.

§ 3. And now Silo made it plain that he had taken bribes. For he set many of his soldiers to complain aloud of their want of provisions, and to demand money to buy food, and to insist on being led into places proper for winter quarters, since the places near the city were a desert, because Antigonus' soldiers had looted everything, so he was for removing the army, and endeavoured to march away. But Herod pressed him not to depart, and exhorted Silo's captains and soldiers not to desert him, as Augustus and Antony and the senate had sent him there, for he would provide them plenty of all the things they wanted, and easily procure them a great abundance of what they required. After this entreaty he went immediately into the country, and left not the least pretext to Silo for departure, for he brought an unexpected quantity of provisions, and sent to those friends of his who dwelt near Samaria, to bring down corn, and wine, and oil, and cattle, and all other provisions, to Jericho, that there might be a plentiful supply for the soldiers for the time to come. Antigonus got to know this, and sent at once all over the country such as might hinder, and lie in ambush for, those that went out for provisions. And they obeyed the orders of Antigonus, and got together a great number of armed men in the neighbourhood of Jericho, and sat upon the mountains on the look out for those that brought provisions. However, Herod did not idly look on at their doing this, for he took ten cohorts of soldiers, of whom five were composed of Romans, and five of Jews, and some mercenaries also, and some few horsemen, and marched to Jericho; and he found the city deserted, but five hundred occupied the tops of the hills with their wives and children, and these he took and sent away; but the Romans fell upon the city and plundered it, and found the houses full of all sorts of good things. And the king left a garrison at Jericho, and returned, and sent the Roman army to take their winter quarters in the parts of the country that had come over to him, as Judæa and Galilee and Samaria. And so much did Antigonus gain of Silo for the bribes he gave him, that part of the army should be quartered at Lydda,<sup>1</sup> to please Antony. And the Romans now laid their weapons aside, and lived in plenty.

§ 4. But Herod was not pleased with being inactive, but despatched his brother Joseph against Idumæa with two thousand armed foot, and four hundred horse, while he himself went to Samaria, and left his mother and his other relations there, for they were already gone from Masada, and set out for Galilee, to capture certain places which were held by the garrisons of Antigonus. And he reached Sepphoris<sup>1</sup> in a snow-storm, and as Antigonus' garrisons had withdrawn, he had great plenty of provisions. He also went thence, and resolved to destroy some robbers that dwelt in the caves, and did much mischief in the country, so he sent a troop of horse and three companies of foot against them. They were very near to a village called Arbela;<sup>2</sup> and on the fortieth day he came up himself with his whole army; and as the enemy sallied out boldly against him, the left wing of his army gave way, but he himself, coming up at the nick of time with a compact body of men, put those to flight who were already conquerors, and rallied his men that had fled away. He also pressed hard upon his enemies, and pursued them as far as the river Jordan, though they fled by different roads. And he brought over to him all Galilee, excepting those that dwelt in the caves, and distributed money to every one of his soldiers, giving them a hundred and fifty drachmæ apiece, and much more to their commanders, and sent them into winter quarters. Meantime Silo and the commanders who were in winter quarters came to him, because Antigonus would not give them provisions any longer, for he supplied them for no more than one month. Nay, he had sent to all the country round about, and ordered them to carry off the provisions that were there, and retire to the mountains, that the Romans might have no provisions to live upon, and so might perish by famine. But Herod committed the care of that matter to Pheroras, his youngest brother, and ordered him to rebuild Alexandria<sup>3</sup> also. And he quickly made the soldiers to abound with great plenty of provisions, and rebuilt Alexandria, which had before been desolate.

§ 5. About the same time Antony continued some time at Athens, and Ventidius, who was now in Syria, summoned Silo against the Parthians, and commanded him first to assist Herod to finish the present war, and then to summon their allies to the war they were themselves engaged in. As for Herod, he went in haste against the robbers that were in the caves, and sent Silo away to Ventidius, while he himself marched against them. These caves were in mountains<sup>1</sup> that were exceedingly steep, and in the middle had precipitous entrances, and were surrounded by sharp rocks, and the robbers lay concealed in these caves with all their families about them. But the king caused certain cases to be made bound about with iron chains, and hung down by a mechanical contrivance from the top of the mountain, it not being possible to get up to them by reason of the sharp ascent of the mountain, nor to creep down to them from above. Now these cases were filled with armed men, who had long hooks in their hands, by which they could pull out such as resisted them, and then tumble them down the precipices, and kill them by so doing. But the letting down the cases proved to be a matter of great danger, because of the vast depth they were to be let down; and they had their provisions inside with them. But when the cases were let down, and not one of those in the mouths of the caves durst come near them, but remained quiet from fear, one of the armed men girt on his armour, and with both of his hands took hold of the chain by which the case was let down, and went into the mouth of one of the caves, because he fretted that such delay was made by the robbers not daring to come out. And when he was at any of those mouths, he first killed many of those that were in the mouths with his darts, and afterwards pulled to him those that resisted with his hook, and tumbled them down the precipices, and afterwards went into the cave and killed many more, and then returned to his case again, and lay still there; and terror seized the rest, when they heard the lamentations that were made, and they despaired of escaping. However, when night came on, that put an end to the whole work; and, as the king permitted it, many made overtures and delivered up themselves to him as his subjects. The same method of assault was made use of the next day, when Herod's men went further, and got out in baskets to them, and fought them at their doors, and threw fire in among them, and set their caves on fire, for there was a great deal of wood inside them. Now there was one old man who was shut up in one of these caves with seven children and a wife, and they prayed him to give them leave to go out and yield themselves up to the enemy, but he stood at the cave's mouth, and still slew that son of his who went out, till he had killed them every one, and after that he slew his wife, and cast their dead bodies down the precipices, and himself after them, preferring death to slavery. But before he did this, he greatly reproached Herod with the meanness of his family, although Herod (who saw what he meant to do) stretched out his hand, and offered him all manner of security for his life. In this way all these caves were at length subdued entirely.

§ 6. And when the king had set Ptolemy over these parts of the country as his general, he went to Samaria, with six hundred horse and three thousand foot, intending to fight against Antigonus. But this command of the army did not succeed well with Ptolemy, for those that had been troublesome in Galilee before attacked him and slew him; and when they had done this, they fled to the marshes and to places almost inaccessible, laying waste and plundering all that part of the country. But Herod soon returned, and punished them for what they had done; for some of those rebels he slew, and others of them (who had fled to strongholds) he besieged, and both slew them and demolished their strongholds: and when he had thus put an end to their rebellion, he laid a fine upon the cities of a hundred talents.

§ 7. Meantime as Pacorus had fallen in battle, and the Parthians had been defeated, Ventidius sent Machæras to the assistance of Herod, with two legions and a thousand horsemen, at the instigation of Antony. But Machæras, at the invitation of Antigonus, without the approbation of Herod, being corrupted by money, went away as if to reconnoitre Antigonus' position. But Antigonus, suspecting the intention of his coming, did not admit him into the city, but kept him at a distance by hurling stones at him from slings, and so plainly showed what he himself meant. And when Machæras was sensible that Herod had given him good advice, and that he had made a mistake in not hearkening to it, he retired to the city of Emmaus; <sup>1</sup> and whatever Jews he met on the road, he slew, whether they were enemies or friends, from the rage he was in at the hardships he had undergone. The king was provoked at this conduct of his, and went to Samaria, and resolved to go to Antony about these affairs, and to inform him that he stood in no need of such helpers, who did him more harm than they did his enemies, and that he was able of himself to beat Antigonus. But Machæras followed him, and begged that he would remain, or, if he was resolved to go, that he would join his brother Joseph to them, and let him fight against Antigonus. And he was reconciled to Machæras upon his earnest entreaties; and he left Joseph there with his army, but charged him to run no hazards, and not to quarrel with Machæras.

§ 8. But he himself made haste to Antony (who was then besieging Samosata, <sup>2</sup> a place near the Euphrates), with troops both of horse and foot who went to his aid. And when he reached Antioch, and found there a great number of men got together, that were very desirous to go to Antony, but durst not venture to go from fear, because the barbarians fell upon them on the road, and slew many, he encouraged them, and became their conductor upon the road. Now when they were within two days' march of Samosata, the barbarians laid an ambush there for those who were going to join Antony; and where the woods made the passes narrow to the plains, there they laid not a few of their cavalry, who were to lie still until those who were to pass by had got into a place where cavalry could manœuvre. Now as soon as their first ranks were gone by (for Herod brought up the rear), those that lay in ambush, who were about five hundred, fell upon them on the sudden, and when they had put the foremost of them to flight, the king came up riding hard, with the forces that were with him, and immediately drove back the enemy; by which means he made the minds of his own men courageous, and emboldened them to go on, insomuch that those who ran away before now rallied, and the barbarians were slain on all sides. The king also went on killing them, and recovered all the baggage (among which were a great number of beasts of burden and slaves) and proceeded on his march; and whereas there were a very great number of those in the woods that attacked them, and were near the outlet into the plain, he made a sally upon these also with a strong body of men, and put them to flight, and slew many of them, and thereby rendered the way safe for those that came after; and they called Herod their saviour and protector.

§ 9. And when he was near Samosata, Antony sent out his army in all their pomp to meet him, partly to pay Herod this respect, partly as a reinforcement, for he had heard of the attacks the barbarians had made upon him. He also was very glad to see him, having been made acquainted with the great actions he had performed upon the road, and he entertained him very kindly, and could not but admire his courage. Antony also embraced him as soon as he saw him, and saluted him in a most affectionate manner, and highly honoured him, as having himself lately made him a king. And in a little time Antiochus delivered up the fortress, and so the war was at an end; so Antony handed over the command to Sossius, and gave him orders to assist Herod, and himself went to Egypt. And Sossius sent two legions on to Judæa to the assistance of Herod, and followed himself with the main body of his army.

§ 10. Now Joseph had been already slain in Judæa in the following manner. He forgot the injunctions his brother Herod had given him when he went to Antony; and when he had pitched his camp among the mountains, as Machæras had lent him five regiments, he went hastily with them to Jericho, in order to reap the corn in that district; and as the Roman regiments were but newly raised, and were unskilled in war (for they were in great part collected out of Syria) he was attacked by the enemy, and entangled on difficult ground, and was himself slain fighting bravely, and lost his whole army, for six regiments were cut to pieces. And when Antigonus had got possession of the dead bodies, he cut off Joseph's head, although his brother Pheroras would have redeemed it for fifty talents. After this defeat the Galilæans revolted from their commanders, and drowned those of Herod's party in the lake, and a great part of Judæa became seditious; but Machæras fortified the place Gittha.<sup>1</sup>

§ 11. Meantime messengers came to Herod, and informed him of what had happened, and when he was come to Daphne near Antioch, they told him of the ill fortune that had befallen his brother; which he had indeed expected from certain visions that appeared to him in his dreams, which clearly foreshowed his brother's death. So he hastened his march, and when he came to mount Libanus, he took about eight hundred of the men of that neighbourhood, having already with him also one Roman legion, and went to Ptolemais. He also marched thence by night with his army, and proceeded through Galilee. Here the enemy met him, and fought him, and were beaten, and shut up in the same fortress whence they had sallied out the day before. So he attacked the place in the morning, but by reason of a great storm that then broke out, he was able to do nothing, but drew off his army into the neighbouring villages; but as soon as a second legion that Antony sent him had come, those that were in garrison in the place were afraid, and deserted it in the night-time. Then did the king march hastily to Jericho, intending to avenge himself on the enemy for the slaughter of his brother. And when he had encamped there, he made a feast for the principal people, and after this collation was over, he dismissed his guests, and retired to his own chamber. And here one may see what kindness God had for the king, for the upper part of the house fell down when nobody was in it, and so killed nobody, insomuch that all the people believed that Herod was beloved of God, since he had escaped such a great and surprising danger.

§ 12. But the next day six thousand of the enemy came down from the tops of the mountains to fight, which greatly terrified the Romans; and the soldiers that were in light armour came near, and pelted the king's guards who had come out with him with darts and stones, and one of them hit the king himself on the side with a dart. Antigonus also sent a commander whose name was Pappus, with some forces against Samaria, being desirous to show the enemy how strong he was, and that he had men to spare in his war with them: while he himself sat down to oppose Machæras. But Herod, when he had taken five cities, slew those who were left in them, who were about two thousand, and burnt the cities themselves, and then returned to go against Pappus, who was encamped at a village called Isanas; <sup>1</sup> and there flocked to him many from Jericho and Judæa, near to which places he was, and the enemy fell upon his men, so confident were they, and joined battle with them, but he beat them in the fight, and in order to be revenged on them for the slaughter of his brother, he pursued them hotly, and killed them as they ran away. And as the houses were full of armed men, and many of them fled to the tops of the houses, he got possession of these, and pulled down the roofs of the houses, and saw the rooms below full of soldiers that were caught all together. And they threw stones down upon them as they lay piled one upon another, and so killed them: nor was there a more frightful spectacle in all the war than outside the walls, where an immense number of dead bodies lay heaped upon one another. It was this action which chiefly broke the spirits of the enemy, who looked anxiously to the future. For there appeared a mighty number of people that came from places far distant, that were now about the village, but ran away; and had it not been that the depth of winter prevented them, the king's army would have gone to Jerusalem, being very courageous at this good success, and would have brought the whole war to an end. For Antigonus was already on the qui vive to flee away and leave the city.

§ 13. Then the king gave order that the soldiers should go to supper (for it was late at night) while he himself went into a chamber to have a bath (for he was very weary), and here it was that he was in the greatest danger, which yet by God's providence he escaped. For as he was naked, and had but one servant with him as he was bathing in an inner room, some of the enemy, who were in their armour, and had fled there out of fear, were then in the place; and as he was bathing, the first of them came out with his sword drawn, and went out at the doors, and after him a second and a third, armed in like manner, and were in such consternation that they did no hurt to the king, and thought themselves to have come off very well in suffering no harm themselves, but getting safe out of the house. On the next day Herod cut off the head of Pappus (for he was already slain) and sent it to Pheroras, in revenge for what their brother had suffered at his hands, for he had slain him with his own hand.

§ 14. When the winter was over, Herod removed his army, and came near to Jerusalem, and pitched his camp hard by that city. Now this was the third year since he had been made king at Rome. And as he removed his camp, and came near that part of the wall where it could be most easily assaulted, he pitched his camp before the temple, intending to make his attacks in the same manner as Pompey had done formerly. So he threw up three bulwarks round the place, and erected towers, and employed a great many hands in the work, and cut down the trees that were round about. And when he had appointed proper persons to oversee the works, while the army still lay before the city, he himself went to Samaria to marry Mariamne, the daughter of Alexander (the son of Aristobulus), to whom he was already betrothed, as I have before related.

CHAP. XVI.

How Herod, when he had married Mariamne, took Jerusalem, with the Assistance of Sossius, by Force, and how the Reign of the Asamoneans was put an end to.

§ 1.

AFTER the wedding was over, came Sossius through Phœnicia, having sent on his army before him through the interior of the country. The commander also followed himself with a great number of horse and foot. The king also himself came from Samaria,<sup>1</sup> and brought with him

no small army, besides that which had been there long before, for they were about thirty thousand : and they all mustered together at the walls of Jerusalem, and encamped near the north wall of the city, being now an army of eleven legions of foot, and six thousand horse, besides reinforcements from Syria. The generals were two, Sossius sent by Antony to assist Herod, and Herod on his own account, in order to take the government from Antigonus (who was declared an enemy to Rome) and that he might himself be king according to the decree of the senate.

§ 2. Now the Jews that were enclosed within the walls of the city fought against Herod with great energy and zeal (for the whole nation was gathered together); they also gave out many prophecies about the temple, and foretold many things agreeable to the people, as if God would deliver them out of the dangers they were in ; they had also carried off whatever they could that was outside the city, that they might not leave anything to afford sustenance either to men or beasts, and by private robberies they made the want of necessaries greater. When Herod observed this, he set ambushes in the fittest places against their private robberies, and sent legions of armed men to bring in provisions, and that from remote places, so that in a little time they had great plenty of necessaries. Now the three bulwarks were easily erected, because so many hands were continually at work upon them ; for it was summer time, and there was nothing to hinder their erection, either from the atmosphere or from the workmen : so they brought their engines to bear, and shook the walls of the city, and tried all manner of ways to get in. However, they did not terrify those within, but they also contrived not a few engines to oppose their engines with. They also sallied out, and burnt not only those engines that were not completed, but those that were ; and when they fought hand to hand, their daring was not less bold than that of the Romans, though they were behind them in skill. They also erected new works when the former ones were demolished, and making mines underground, met each other in battle there ; and in reckless daring rather than prudence, they persisted in this war to the very last : and that though a mighty army lay round them, and they were distressed by famine and want of necessaries, for it happened to be a sabbatic year. The first that scaled the walls were twenty picked men, the next were Sossius's centurions, for the first wall was taken in forty days, and the second in fifteen more, when some of the porticoes that were round the temple were burnt, which Herod alleged were burnt by Antigonus, in order to expose him to the hatred of the Jews. And when the outer court of the temple and the lower part of the city were taken, the Jews fled into the inner court of the temple and into the upper part of the city: but fearing that the Romans would hinder them from offering their daily sacrifices to God, they sent an embassy, and begged that they would permit them only to bring in beasts for sacrifices, which Herod granted, hoping they were going to yield; but when he saw that they did nothing of what he expected, but bitterly opposed him, in order to preserve the kingdom to Antigonus, he made an assault on the city, and took it by storm. And at once all parts of it were full of those that were slain by the rage of the Romans at the long duration of the siege, and by the zeal of the Jews that were on Herod's side, who were not willing to leave one of their adversaries alive. So they were murdered continually in the narrow streets and in the houses by crowds, and as they were fleeing to the temple for shelter, and there was no pity taken either of infants or the aged, nor did they spare so much as the weaker sex; nay, although the king sent round, and besought them to spare the people, yet none restrained their hand from slaughter, but, as if they were a company of madmen, they fell upon persons of all ages without distinction. At last Antigonus, without regard to either his past or present circumstances, came down from the citadel, and fell down at the feet of Sossius, who took no pity on him in this change of fortune, but insulted him beyond measure, and called him Antigone [i.e., a woman and not a man]; however, he did not treat him as if he were a woman by letting him go free, but put him into bonds and kept him in close custody.

§ 3. And now Herod, having overcome his enemies, had to check those foreigners who had been his allies, for the crowd of strangers rushed to see the temple and the sacred things in the sanctuary. But the king thinking victory a more severe affliction than defeat, if any of those things which it was not lawful to see should be seen by them, used entreaties and threatenings, and sometimes even force itself, to restrain them. He also stopped the plundering that was going on in the city, and many times asked Sossius, whether the Romans would empty the city both of money and men, and leave him king of a desert? and told him, that he esteemed the dominion over the whole world as by no means an equivalent for such a wholesale murder of his citizens; and when Sossius said, that this plunder was justly permitted the soldiers in return for the siege they had undergone, he replied, that he would give every one a reward out of his own money, and so he redeemed what remained of the city from destruction. And he performed what he promised, for he gave a handsome present to every soldier, and proportionably to their commanders, and a most royal present to Sossius himself, so that all went away with plenty of money.

§ 4. This destruction befell the city of Jerusalem when Marcus Agrippa and Caninus Gallus were consuls at Rome, in the hundred and eighty-fifth Olympiad,<sup>1</sup> in the third month, on the solemn fast day, as if a cycle of calamity had come round since that which befell the Jews under Pompey, for the Jews were taken by Sossius on the same day twenty-seven years after. And when Sossius had dedicated a crown of gold to God, he marched away from Jerusalem, taking Antigonus with him in bonds to Antony. But Herod was afraid that Antigonus would be kept in bonds and carried to Rome by Antony, and might get his cause heard by the senate, and might show, as he was himself of the royal blood, and Herod but a private man, that it belonged to his sons to have the kingdom, on account of their family, if he had himself offended the Romans by what he had done. Herod fearing this, by giving Antony a great deal of money, persuaded him to have Antigonus slain, which being done, he was free from fear. And thus did the reign of the Asamonæans cease, a hundred and twenty-six years after it was first set up. This family was a splendid and an illustrious one, not only on account of the nobility of its stock and the dignity of the high priesthood, but also for the glorious actions its ancestors had performed for our nation. However they lost the kingdom by their dissensions with one another, and it was transferred to Herod the son of Antipater, who was of a common family, and of private extraction, and a subject of the kings. And this is what history tells us of the end of the Asamonæan family.

BOOK XV.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF EIGHTEEN YEARS.—FROM THE DEATH OF ANTIGONUS TO THE FINISHING OF THE TEMPLE BY HEROD.

CHAP. I.

Concerning Pollio and Sameas. Herod slays the principal of Antigonus' Friends, and spoils the City of its Wealth. Antony beheads Antigonus.

§ 1.

HOW Sossius and Herod took Jerusalem by storm, and how they also took Antigonus captive, has been related by me in the previous book. I shall now proceed in the narrative. Since Herod had now the government of all Judæa put into his hands, he promoted such of the private men in the city as had been of his party, but never left off punishing and revenging himself every day on those that had chosen the party of his enemies. But Pollio the Pharisee, and Sameas a disciple of Pollio, were honoured by him above all the rest, because when Jerusalem was besieged, they had advised the citizens to receive Herod, for which advice they were well requited. Now this Sameas, at the time when Herod was once upon his trial of life and death, foretold Hyrcanus and the other judges reproachingly that this Herod, if they suffered him to escape, would afterwards avenge himself on them all. This prediction had its fulfilment in time, when God made good the words Sameas had spoken.

§ 2. At this time Herod, now that he had got Jerusalem in his power, carried off all the royal ornaments, and also spoiled the wealthy men of what they had got, and when he had heaped together by these means a great quantity of silver and gold, he gave it all to Antony and his friends that were about him. He also put to death forty-five of the principal men of Antigonus' party, and set guards at the gates of the city, that nothing might be carried out with their dead bodies. They also searched the dead, and whatever was found on them, either silver or gold or other treasure, was carried to the king. Nor was there any end of the miseries he brought upon them, and this distress was partly occasioned by Herod's own covetousness, who was still in want of more, and partly by the sabbatic year, which was on, which forced the country to lie uncultivated, since we are forbidden to sow the land in that year. Now when Antony had received Antigonus as his captive, he had determined to keep him in bonds till his triumph; but when he heard that the nation was growing rebellious, and that they continued to bear good-will to Antigonus, because of their hatred to Herod, he resolved to behead him at Antioch, for otherwise the Jews could no way be brought to be quiet. And Strabo of Cappadocia<sup>1</sup> bears out what I have said, where he speaks as follows. "Antony ordered Antigonus the Jew to be brought to Antioch, and there beheaded him: and this Antony seems to me to have been the first of the Romans that beheaded a king, supposing he could in no other way bend the minds of the Jews to receive Herod, whom he had made king in his stead; for by no torments could they be forced to call him king, so great a fondness had they for their former king. So he thought that this dishonourable death would diminish the value they had for Antigonus' memory, and at the same time would diminish the hatred they bore to Herod." Thus far Strabo.

CHAP II.

How Hyrcanus was set at liberty by the Parthians, and returned to Herod, and what Alexandra did when she heard that Ananelus was made High Priest.

§ 1.

NOW after Herod got possession of the kingdom, Hyrcanus the high priest (who was then a captive among the Parthians) hearing of it returned to him, being set free from his captivity in the following manner. Barzapharnes and Pacorus, the generals of the Parthians, took Hyrcanus, who was first made high priest and afterwards king, and Herod's brother Phasaelus, captives, and intended to carry them away into Parthia. Phasaelus, indeed, could not bear the reproach of being in bonds, and thinking that death with glory was better than any life whatever, committed suicide, as I have formerly related.

§ 2. But when Hyrcanus was brought into Parthia, the king Phraates treated him in a very kind manner, having already learned of what an illustrious family he was; on which account he set him free from his bonds, and allowed him to dwell at Babylon,<sup>1</sup> where there was a quantity of Jews. These Jews honoured Hyrcanus as their high priest and king, as did all the Jewish nation that dwelt as far as the Euphrates; which was very much to his satisfaction. But when he was informed that Herod had received the kingdom, new hopes came upon him as having been himself from the beginning of a kind disposition towards him, and he expected that Herod would bear in mind the favour he had received from him when he was upon his trial, for when he ran risk of a capital sentence being pronounced against him, he delivered him from that risk and from all punishment. Accordingly, he talked of that matter with the Jews who often came to him from their great affection to him. But they endeavoured to retain him among them, and desired that he would stay with them, reminding him of the services and honours they had done him, and that those honours they paid him were not at all inferior to what they could pay to either their high priests or their kings; and what was a greater motive to determine him, they argued, was this, that he could not have those dignities [in Judæa] because of that mutilation on his body, which had been inflicted on him by Antigonus. They said also that kings did not usually requite men for those kindnesses which they received when they were private persons, the height of their fortune producing usually no small change in them.

§ 3. Now although they suggested these arguments to him for his own advantage, yet did Hyrcanus still desire to depart. Herod also wrote to him, and begged him to ask Phraates and the Jews that were there not to grudge him the royal authority, which he should have jointly with himself, for now was the proper time to make him a return for the favours he had received from him, having been brought up by him, and saved alive by him also, and for Hyrcanus to receive it. As he wrote thus to Hyrcanus, so did he also send his ambassador Saramallas to Phraates with many presents, and begged him in the most obliging way to be no hindrance to his gratitude towards his benefactor. But this zeal of Herod's did not flow from the principle of gratitude, but because he had been made king of Judæa without having any just claim to that position, he was afraid, and that upon reasons good enough, of a change in his condition, and so was anxious to get Hyrcanus into his power, or indeed to put him quite out of the way: which last thing he compassed eventually.

§ 4. However, when Hyrcanus came full of assurance, on the permission of the king of Parthia, and at the expense of the Jews who supplied him with money, Herod received him with all possible respect, and gave him the upper place at public meetings, and set him above all the rest at feasts, and thereby deceived him, calling him father, and endeavouring in all possible ways that he might have no suspicion of any treacherous design against him. He also did other things, in order to secure his power, which occasioned strife in his own family; for being wary how he made any illustrious person the high priest of God, he sent for an obscure priest from Babylon, whose name was Ananelus, and bestowed the high priesthood upon him.

§ 5. Now Alexandra the daughter of Hyrcanus, and wife of Alexander (the son of king Aristobulus), who had children by Alexander, could not from the first bear this outrage. Her son was of the greatest comeliness, and was called Aristobulus; and her daughter, Mariamne, married to Herod, was eminent for her beauty also. Alexandra was much disturbed, and took this indignity offered to her son exceedingly ill, that while he was alive, any foreigner should have the dignity of the high priesthood conferred upon him. So she wrote to Cleopatra (a musician assisting her in taking care to have her letter transmitted) to desire her intercession with Antony, in order to gain the high priesthood for her son.

§ 6. But as Antony was slow in granting this request, his friend Dellius who came into Judæa upon some affairs, when he saw Aristobulus, marvelled at the tallness and handsomeness of the lad, and no less at Mariamne the king's wife, and was open in his commendations of Alexandra, as the mother of most beautiful children. And when she had a conversation with him, he urged her to get pictures drawn of them both, and to send them to Antony, for he said Antony, when he saw them, would deny her nothing that she should ask. And Alexandra was elated with these words of his, and sent their pictures to Antony. Dellius also talked extravagantly, and said, that those children seemed not derived from men, but from some god or other. His design in doing so was to entice Antony into lewd pleasures with them, who was ashamed to send for the damsel, as being the wife of Herod, and avoided it also because of the reproaches he would have from Cleopatra on that account, but he sent in the most decent manner he could for the young man, adding withal, "Unless it would give offence." When this letter was brought to Herod, he did not think it safe for him to send one so handsome as Aristobulus was, in the prime of his life (for he was but sixteen years of age) and of so noble a family, and particularly to Antony, the principal man among the Romans, and one that would abuse him in his amours, being a man that openly indulged himself in pleasure (as his power allowed him) without control. He therefore wrote back to him, that if the lad should only go out of the country, all would be in a state of war and uproar, because the Jews were in hopes of a change in the government, and of having another king over them.

§ 7. When Herod had thus excused himself to Antony, he resolved that he would not leave either the lad or Alexandra entirely without honour, and his wife Mariamne was vehemently at him to restore the high priesthood to her brother, and he judged it was for his advantage so to do, because, if he once had that dignity, he could not go out of the country. So he called all his friends together, and brought many charges against Alexandra, and said that she had privately conspired against his royal authority, and had endeavoured by means of Cleopatra so to bring it about that he might be deprived of the government, and that by Antony's means Aristobulus might have the management of public affairs in his stead, and that this wish of hers was unjust, since she would at the same time deprive her daughter of the dignity she now had, and would bring disturbances upon the kingdom, for which he had taken a great deal of pains, and had got it by undergoing extraordinary dangers. He said also that, though he well remembered her wicked practices, he would not leave off doing what was right himself, but would even now give the youth the high priesthood, and that he had formerly set up Ananelus, only because Aristobulus was then so very young a boy. Now when he had said this, not at random, but (as he meant) most advisedly, in order to deceive the women and those friends whom he had taken into consultation, Alexandra, from the great joy she had at this unexpected promise, and from fear at the suspicions she lay under, fell a-weeping, and made the following apology for herself. She said, that as to the high priesthood, she was very much concerned at the slight put on her son, and so used her utmost endeavours to procure it for him, but that as to the kingdom she had made no attempts, and if it were offered her she would not accept it, for now she had enough honour, and as Herod himself occupied the throne, she had thereby security from his exceptional ability in governing for all her family. She added that she was now overcome by his benefits, and thankfully accepted the honour for her son, and would hereafter be entirely obedient; and she desired him to excuse her, if the nobility of her family and her freespokenness had made her act too precipitately from her indignation. When they had spoken thus to one another, they came to a mutual understanding, and all suspicion, as far as appearances went, vanished away.

CHAP. III.

How Herod, upon his making Aristobulus High Priest, took care that he should be murdered in a little time: and what apology he made to Antony about Aristobulus; as also concerning Joseph and Mariamne.

§ 1.

SO king Herod immediately took the high priesthood away from Ananelus, who, as I said before, was not a native of our country, but was descended from one of those Jews that had been carried captive beyond the Euphrates. For not a few myriads of our people had been carried away captive, and dwelt in Babylonia, whence Ananelus came, who was of the stock of the high priests, and had been of old a particular friend of Herod; who when he was first made king, conferred that dignity upon him, and now took it away from him again, in order to quiet the troubles in his family, though what he did was plainly unlawful. For at no period had any one that had once been in that dignity been deprived of it, till Antiochus Epiphaues first broke the law, and deprived Jesus, and made his brother Onias high priest in his stead. Aristobulus was the second that did so, and took that dignity from his brother Hyrcanus: and Herod was the third, who took that high office away [from Ananelus], and gave it to the lad Aristobulus in his stead.

§ 2. And now Herod seemed to have healed the divisions in his family ; yet was he not without suspicion, as is frequently the case after an apparent reconciliation, for he thought that, as Alexandra had already made attempts tending to innovation, he had reason to fear that she would go on therein, if she found a fit opportunity for so doing. So he ordered her to dwell in the palace, and meddle with no public affairs : her guards also watched her so, that nothing she did in private life every day was concealed. All this put her out of patience, by little and little, and she began to hate Herod. For as she had the pride of a woman to the utmost degree, she had great indignation at this suspicious guard that was about her, being desirous rather to undergo anything that could befall her than to be deprived of her liberty of speech, and, under the specious pomp of a guard of honour, to live in a state of slavery and terror. She therefore sent to Cleopatra, and made a long complaint of the circumstances she was in, and entreated her to do her utmost for her assistance. Cleopatra thereupon advised her to take her son with her, and escape immediately to her into Egypt. This advice pleased her, and she planned the following contrivance for getting away : she got two coffins made, as if they were to carry away two dead bodies, and put herself into one, and her son into the other, and gave orders to such of her servants as knew of her intentions to carry them away in the night-time. Now their road thence lay to the sea-side, and there was a ship ready to carry them into Egypt. Now Æsop, one of her servants, happened to fall in with Sabbion, one of her friends, and spoke of this matter to him, thinking he already knew of it. When Sabbion got to know this, (who had formerly been an enemy of Herod, and been esteemed one of those that had plotted against and given the poison to Antipater,) he expected that this discovery would change Herod's hatred into kindness, so he told the king of this stratagem of Alexandra. And he suffered her to proceed to the execution of her project, and caught her in the very act of flight, but still passed by her offence : for though he had a great mind to do so, he durst not inflict any severe treatment upon her (for he knew that Cleopatra would not bear that he should have her accused, on account of her hatred to him), but made believe that it was rather his generosity of soul, and great moderation, that made him forgive her and her son. However, he fully determined to put the young man out of the way, by one means or other; but he thought he would probably evade notice in doing so, if he did not do it quickly, or immediately after what had just happened.

§ 3. So upon the approach of the feast of Tabernacles (which is a festival very much observed among us) he let those days pass over, and both he and the rest of the people were very merry therein. Nevertheless the envy which at this time arose in him, caused him to make haste to do what he was about, and provoked him to do it. For when the youth Aristobulus, who was now in the seventeenth year of his age, went up to the altar, to offer the sacrifices according to the law, and that in the dress of the high priest, as he performed the sacred offices, he seemed to be exceeding comely, and taller than men of his age usually were, and to exhibit in his countenance a great deal of the high family he was sprung from, and a warm zeal and affection towards him appeared among the people, and the memory of the actions of his grandfather Aristobulus evidently came to their minds. And their affections got so far the mastery of them, that they could not conceal their feelings. They at once rejoiced and grieved, and mingled with good wishes the joyful acclamations which they made to him, till the good-will of the multitude was made too evident, and they proclaimed the happiness they had received from his family more rashly than it was fit under a monarchy to do. In consequence of all this Herod resolved to carry out his intention against the young man. When, therefore, the festival was over, and he was feasting at Jericho with Alexandra, who entertained him there, he was very pleasant with the young man, and drew him into a lonely place, and at the same time played with him in a juvenile and ludicrous manner. Now the temperature of that place was hotter than ordinary; so they soon went out en masse from languor, and as they stood by the fish ponds, of which there were several large ones about the house, they proceeded to cool themselves [by bathing], because it was the noon of a very hot day. At first they were only spectators of Herod's servants and acquaintances as they were swimming, but after a while, the young man, at the suggestion of Herod, went into the water among them, while such of Herod's acquaintances as he had appointed to do so ducked him, as he was swimming, and plunged him under water, as the darkness came on, as if it was in sport only, nor did they desist till he was entirely suffocated. And thus was Aristobulus murdered, having lived no more in all than eighteen years, and had the high priesthood one year only, and Ananelus now got back the high priesthood again.

§ 4. When what had happened was told the women, their joy was soon changed to lamentation at the sight of the dead body that lay before them, and their sorrow was immoderate. The city also on the spreading of this news was in very great grief, every family looking on this calamity as if it belonged not to another, but one of themselves had died. But Alexandra was more deeply affected, upon her knowledge of her son's death. Her sorrow was greater than that of others, by her knowing how the murder was committed, but she was under a necessity of bearing up under it, from the prospect of greater mischief that might otherwise follow. Indeed she often thought of killing herself with her own hands, but still she restrained herself, in hopes she might live long enough to revenge the unjust murder thus ingeniously committed; nay, she further resolved to endeavour to live longer, and to give no occasion to let it be thought she suspected her son was slain on purpose, and supposed that she might thereby be in a position to revenge it at a fit opportunity. Thus did she restrain herself, that she might not be thought to entertain any such suspicion. And Herod plausibly contrived that none abroad should believe that the lad's death was caused by malice prepense, so he not only used the ordinary signs of sorrow, but shed tears also, and exhibited a real confusion of soul: and perhaps his emotions overcame him, when he saw the lad's countenance, so young and so beautiful, although his death was supposed to tend to his own security; so far at least this grief served as to make some apology for him. Moreover he took care that his funeral should be very magnificent, by making great preparation for a sepulchre to lay his body in, and by providing a great quantity of spices, and by burying many ornaments with him, till the very women, who were in such deep sorrow, were astonished at his conduct, and received in this way some consolation.

§ 5. However, no such things could overcome Alexandra's grief, but the remembrance of this tragedy made her sorrow both deep and obstinate. And she wrote an account of Herod's treacherous behaviour to Cleopatra, and how her son was murdered; and Cleopatra, who had even formerly been desirous to give her what satisfaction she could, commiserating Alexandra's misfortunes, made the case her own, and would not let Antony be quiet, but egged him on to punish the lad's murder; for she said it was an unworthy thing that Herod, who had been made king by him of a kingdom that no way belonged to him, should be guilty of such horrid crimes against those that were the kings de jure. Antony was persuaded by these arguments, and when he went to Laodicea, he sent and commanded Herod to come and make his defence as to what he had done to Aristobulus, for he said that such a treacherous design was not well done, if he had any hand in it. Herod was now afraid both of this charge, and of Cleopatra's ill-will to him, which was such, that she was ever endeavouring to make Antony hate him. He, therefore, determined to obey his summons, for he had no possible way to avoid it: and he left his uncle Joseph regent and at the head of public affairs, and gave him a private charge, that if Antony should kill him, he also should kill Mariamne immediately; for he said he had a tender affection for his wife, and was afraid of the injury that would be offered him, if, after his death, she, for her beauty, should be courted by some other man. But his intimation was nothing but this at bottom, that Antony had fallen in love with her because he had formerly casually heard of her beauty. And when Herod had given Joseph this charge, and had, indeed, no sure hopes of escaping with his life, he set out for Antony.

§ 6. Now as Joseph administered the public affairs of the kingdom, and for that reason was very frequently with Mariamne, both because his business required it, and because of the respect he ought to pay to the queen, he frequently fell into discourse about Herod's great love and affection towards her. And when the women, and especially Alexandra, rallied him on his words in feminine manner, Joseph was so over desirous to show the king's state of mind, that he proceeded so far as to mention the charge he had received, and thence drew his proof that Herod was not able to live without her, for if he should come to an ill end, he could not endure a separation from her, even after he was dead. Thus spoke Joseph. But the women, as was natural, did not take this to be a proof of Herod's strong affection for them, but of his savageness, that they could not escape destruction, nor a tyrannical death, even when he was dead himself, so that this communication made them entertain grave suspicion of Herod.

§ 7. Meantime a report went about the city of Jerusalem, set in motion by Herod's enemies, that Antony had tortured Herod and had him put to death. This report, as was natural, agitated those that were in the palace, but chiefly the women. And Alexandra endeavoured to persuade Joseph to go out of the palace, and flee to the ensigns of the Roman legion, which then lay encamped about the city as a guard to the kingdom, under the command of Julius; for so, if any disturbance should happen in the palace, they would be in greater security, having the Romans favourable to them; they hoped also to obtain the highest authority, if Antony did but once see Mariamne, by whose means they might recover the kingdom, and want nothing which it was natural for them to hope for because of their royal extraction.

§ 8. But as they were in the midst of these deliberations, a letter arrived from Herod about all his affairs, and proved contrary to the report, and to what they had anticipated. For when he was come to Antony, he soon recovered his interest with him, through the presents he had brought for him from Jerusalem, and soon induced him, upon conversing with him, to leave off his indignation at him, so that Cleopatra's words had less force than the arguments and presents he brought to regain his friendship. And Antony said that it was not good to require an account of a king as to the management of his kingdom, for at this rate he could be no king at all, but those who had given him that authority ought to permit him to make use of it. He also said the same to Cleopatra, and told her that it would be best for her not to inquire too closely into the acts of princes. Herod wrote home an account of all this, and enlarged upon the other honours which he received from Antony, how he sat by him on the judgment seat, and feasted with him every day, and enjoyed those favours from him, notwithstanding the calumnies of Cleopatra, who having a great desire for his country, and earnestly entreating Antony that the kingdom might be given to her, laboured with the utmost diligence to get him out of the way. He added that he still found Antony just to him, and had no longer any apprehensions of harsh treatment from him; and that he should soon return, with a firmer assurance of his favour to him in his reign and management of public affairs; and that there was no longer any hope for Cleopatra's cupidity, as Antony had given her Cœle-Syria instead of what she desired, by which means he had at once pacified her, and got rid of the entreaties which she made to him for Judæa to be bestowed upon her.

§ 9. When this letter was brought, the women abandoned their project of fleeing to the Romans, when Herod was supposed to be dead, yet was not that purpose of theirs a secret; for when the king had conducted Antony on his way against the Parthians, he returned to Judæa, where both his sister Salome and his mother informed him at once of Alexandra's intentions. Salome also added further the calumny against her own husband Joseph that he had often had criminal connexion with Mariamne. The reason of her saying so was this, that she had for a long time borne her ill-will, for when they had had disputes with one another, Mariamne had with too much pride reproached her and her mother with the meanness of their birth. But Herod, whose affection to Mariamne was always very warm, was at once greatly agitated at this, and could not bear his torments of jealousy, but was restrained from doing any rash thing to her by the love he had for her, yet did his vehement affection and jealousy together make him question Mariamne by herself about this charge in connection with Joseph. And she denied it upon her oath, and said all that an innocent woman could possibly say in her own defence, so that by little and little the king was prevailed upon to drop his suspicion, and left off his anger at her; and being overcome with his passion for his wife, he made an apology to her for having seemed to believe what he had heard about her, and made her many acknowledgments of her modest behaviour, and confessed the great affection and love he had for her, till at last, as is usual with lovers, they both fell into tears, and embraced one another with the most tender affection. But as the king gave more and more assurances of his belief in her fidelity, and endeavoured to draw her to a like confidence in him, Mariamne said, "The command thou gavest, that if any harm came to thee from Antony, I, who had been no occasion of it, should perish with thee, was no sign of thy love to me." When these words had fallen from her, the king was in a violent rage, and at once let her go out of his arms, and cried out, and tore his hair with his hands, and said that now he had a clear proof that Joseph had had criminal connexion with her, for he would never have uttered what he had been privately told, unless there had been great familiarity and mutual understanding between them. And while he was in this passion he had liked to have killed his wife, but being overcome by his love for her, he restrained this impulse, though not without lasting grief and disorder of mind. However, he gave orders to slay Joseph, without permitting him to come into his sight; and as for Alexandra, he had her kept in custody, as the cause of all this mischief.

CHAP. IV.

How Cleopatra, when she had got from Antony some parts of Judæa and Arabia, came into Judæa; and how Herod gave her many Presents, and conducted her on her way back to Egypt.

§ 1.

NOW at this time the affairs of Syria were in confusion owing to Cleopatra's constantly urging Antony to make an attempt upon everybody's dominions. For she kept urging him to take their dominions away from the several princes, and bestow them upon her; and she had a mighty influence upon him, because of his passion for her. She was also by nature very covetous, and stuck at no wickedness. She had already poisoned her brother, because she knew that he would be king, when he was but fifteen years old; and she got her sister Arsinoe to be slain, by means of Antony, when she was a suppliant at Diana's temple at Ephesus. Indeed if there were but any hopes of getting money, she would violate both temples and sepulchres, nor was there any holy place, that was esteemed the most inviolable, from which she would not strip the ornaments it had in it; nor any place so profane, but would suffer the most flagitious treatment possible from her, if it could but contribute somewhat to the covetous humour of this abandoned creature. Yet did not all this suffice so extravagant a woman, who was a slave to her lusts, but she still imagined that she wanted everything she could think of, and did her utmost to gain it; for which reason she was ever egging Antony on to deprive others of their dominions, and give them to her. And as she went over Syria with him, she purposed getting it into her possession; so she slew Lysanias, the son of Ptolemy, accusing him of bringing the Parthians into those parts. She also petitioned Antony to give her Judæa and Arabia, and desired him to take those countries away from their present kings. As for Antony, he was so entirely enthralled by the woman, that one would not think her intimacy with him only could do it, but that he was some way or other bewitched to do whatever she would have him; yet did her injustice when manifest make him so ashamed, that he would not always hearken to her, to do those flagrant enormities she would urge him to. That therefore he might not either totally deny her, or, by doing everything which she enjoined him, appear openly to be an unjust man, he took some parts only of each of those countries away from their rulers, and gave them to her. Thus he gave her the cities that were on this side the river Eleutherus<sup>1</sup> as far as Egypt, except Tyre and

Sidon, which he knew to have been free cities from their ancestors, although she pressed him very often to bestow those on her also.

§ 2. When Cleopatra had obtained thus much, and had accompanied Antony in his expedition to Armenia as far as the Euphrates, she returned back, and came to Apamea<sup>1</sup> and Damascus, and passed on to Judæa, where Herod met her, and hired from her those parts of Arabia that had been given to her, and those revenues that came to her from the region about Jericho. This country bears that balsam, which is the most precious thing that is there, and grows there alone, and also palm-trees, both numerous and excellent. When she was there, she was very often with Herod, and endeavoured to have criminal intercourse with him, nor did she affect secrecy in the indulgence of such sort of pleasures; and perhaps she had some passion for him, or rather (as is more probable) she laid a treacherous snare for him if adulterous intercourse with him resulted; however, upon the whole, she seemed overcome with love for him. Now Herod had a long while borne no good-will to Cleopatra, knowing that she was a woman troublesome to everybody, and at this time he thought her particularly worthy of hatred, if her attempt proceeded from lust; he also thought of preventing her intrigues, if such were her motives, by putting her to death. And he refused to comply with her proposals, and called a council of his friends to consult with them, whether he should not kill her, now he had her in his power? for he would thereby deliver from a multitude of evils all those to whom she was already troublesome, and was expected to be so also for the time to come; and this very thing would be much for the advantage of Antony himself, since she would certainly not be faithful to him, if any conjuncture or necessity should make him stand in need of her fidelity. But when he thought of this, his friends would not hear of it, but told him in the first place that it was not right to attempt so great a thing, and run himself thereby into the plainest danger; and they urged and begged of him to undertake nothing rashly, for

Antony would never stand it, no, not though any one should evidently lay before his eyes that it was for his own advantage; and that the idea of having lost her by this violent and treacherous method, would probably set his affections more in a flame than before. Nor did it appear that Herod could offer any thing of tolerable weight in his defence, this attempt being against a woman of the highest dignity of any of her sex at that time in the world; and as to any advantage to be expected from such an undertaking, if any such could be supposed in this case, it would appear to deserve condemnation on account of the insolence of carrying it out. These considerations made it very plain that in so doing he would find his reign filled with great and lasting mischiefs both to himself and his posterity, whereas it was still in his power to reject the wickedness she wanted to persuade him to, and to come off honourably at the same time. By thus frightening Herod, and representing to him the hazard he would, in all probability, run by this undertaking, they restrained him from it. So he paid court to Cleopatra, and made her presents, and conducted her on her way to Egypt.

§ 3. But Antony subdued Armenia, and sent Artabazes, the son of Tigranes, prisoner to Egypt with his sons and satraps, and made a present of them and of all the royal ornaments which he had taken out of that kingdom to Cleopatra. But Artaxias, the eldest of his sons, who escaped at that time, took the kingdom of Armenia, and was afterwards ejected by Archelaus and Nero Cæsar, when they restored Tigranes, his younger brother, to that kingdom: but this happened some time afterwards.

§ 4. Now as to the tribute which Herod was to pay Cleopatra for the territory which Antony had given her, he acted fairly with her, not deeming it safe for him to give Cleopatra any reason to hate him. As for the king of Arabia, whose tribute Herod also received, for some time indeed he paid him the two hundred talents, but he afterwards became very disaffected to him and slow in his payments, and could hardly be brought to pay some portion of it, and was not willing to pay even that without fraud.

CHAP. V.

How Herod made War with the King of Arabia, and after they had fought many Battles, at length conquered him, and was chosen by the Arabs to be Ruler of their Nation; as also concerning a great Earthquake.

§ 1.

THEREUPON Herod got ready to march against the king of Arabia, because of his ill conduct, and because he would no longer do what was just, but made the Roman war an occasion of delay. For the battle off Actium was now expected, which came off in the hundred and eighty-seventh Olympiad, in which Augustus and Antony were to fight for the sovereignty of the world: and Herod having enjoyed now for a long time a country that was very fruitful, and having got great taxes and resources, enlisted a body of men, and carefully furnished them with all necessaries, as auxiliaries for Antony. But Antony said he had no need of his assistance, but commanded him to punish the king of Arabia (for he had heard both from him and from Cleopatra of his perfidy). And this was what Cleopatra desired, who thought it for her own advantage that these two kings should mutually weaken one another. On this message from Antony, Herod returned back, but kept his army with him, in order to invade Arabia immediately. And when his army of horse and foot was ready, he marched to Diospolis,<sup>1</sup> where the Arabians came to meet him, for they were not unapprized of this war that was coming upon them; and after a well-contested battle had been fought, the Jews had the victory. But afterwards a numerous army of Arabians concentrated at Cana, which is a place in Coele-Syria. Herod was informed of this beforehand, so he marched against them with most of the forces he had; and when he was come near to Cana, he resolved to encamp himself, and began to entrench his camp, that he might take an advantageous season for attacking the enemy; but as he was giving those orders, the multitude of the Jews cried out, that he should make no delay, but lead them at once against the Arabians. They were impetuous for the fray because they believed in their excellent discipline, and especially those who had been in the former battle, and had been conquerors, and had not permitted the enemy so much as to come to close quarters with them. And as they were so tumultuous, and showed such great zeal, the king resolved to avail himself of the readiness the multitude then exhibited; and when he had assured them he would not be behindhand with them in courage, he led them on, and was at their head in his armour, all the men following him in their several ranks. And a panic fell at once upon the Arabians; for when they perceived that the Jews were not to be conquered, and were full of spirit, most of them after a short resistance ran away and avoided fighting, and they would have been cut to pieces, had not Athenion fallen upon the Jews and Herod. He was Cleopatra's general over the soldiers she had in those parts, and was at enmity with Herod, and very wistfully looked on to see what the event of the battle would be: for he had resolved, if the Arabians did anything that was brilliant, to remain still, but if they were beaten, as really happened, to attack the Jews with those forces he had of his own, and with those that had flocked to to him from that region. And he fell upon the Jews unexpectedly, and made a great slaughter of them, when they were fatigued, and thought they had already vanquished the enemy. For as the Jews had spent their courage upon their known enemies, and were about to enjoy themselves in fancied security after the victory, they were easily beaten by these that now attacked them, and received great loss in ground which was stony, and where their horses could not be of service, and where those that attacked them were better acquainted with the ground than themselves. And when the Jews had suffered this reverse, the Arabians plucked up their spirits again and returned back and slew those that were already routed: and indeed all sorts of slaughter were now frequent, and of those that fled only a few got back safe to the camp. And king Herod, as he despaired of the battle, rode off to them to bring them assistance, however he did not come up in time enough to do them any service, though he tried hard to do so, for the Jewish camp was taken, so that the Arabians had unexpectedly a most glorious success, having gained that victory which by themselves they were no way likely to have gained, and having slain a great part of the enemy's army. And thenceforward Herod could only act like a private robber, and make incursions into many parts of Arabia, and distress them by sudden raids, encamping among the mountains, and avoiding by any means coming to a pitched battle, yet greatly harassing the enemy by his assiduity and the pains he took in the matter. He also took great care of his own men, and used all the means he could to correct this reverse.

§ 2. Meantime the sea-fight happened off Actium,<sup>1</sup> between Augustus and Antony, in the seventh year of the reign of Herod;<sup>2</sup> and then it was also that there was an earthquake in Judæa, such as had not happened at any other time, and which brought a great destruction upon the cattle in that country. About thirty thousand men also perished by the fall of houses; but the army, which lodged in the field, received no damage by this sad accident. When the Arabians were informed of this, and when those that hated the Jews took pleasure in exaggerating the facts, they raised their spirits, as if their enemy's country was quite overthrown, and the men were utterly destroyed, and thought there now remained nothing that could oppose them. Accordingly, they seized on the Jewish ambassadors (who came to them after all this had happened to make peace with them) and slew them, and marched with great energy against their army. And the Jews durst not withstand them, and were so cast down by their calamities, that they took no care of their affairs, but gave up themselves to despair, for they had no hope that they should be upon an equality with them again in battle, nor obtain any assistance elsewhere while their affairs at home were in such great distress. When matters were in this condition, the king tried to animate the commanders by his words, and to raise their spirits which were quite sunk. And first he endeavoured to encourage and embolden some of the better sort, and then ventured to make a speech to the multitude, which he had before avoided doing, lest he should find them uneasy thereat, because of their reverses. And he made an hortatory speech to the multitude in the following words.

§ 3. "You are not ignorant, fellow-soldiers, that we have had not long since many reverses that have put a stop to what we are about; and it is probable that even those that are most distinguished above others for their courage can hardly keep up their spirits in such circumstances; but since we cannot avoid fighting, and nothing that has happened is of such a nature but it may by ourselves be restored to a good state by one brave action, I have proposed to myself both to give you some encouragement and at the same time some information, that you may still continue in your fortitude. I will then, in the first place, prove to you that this war is a just one on our side, and a war of necessity owing to the outrages of our adversaries, for if you be once satisfied of this, it will be the greatest cause of zeal in you, after which I shall further prove that the misfortunes we are in are of no great consequence, and that we have the greatest reason to hope for victory. I shall begin with the first, and appeal to yourselves as witnesses of what I say. You are not ignorant certainly of the lawlessness of the Arabians, who are as treacherous to all other men, as barbarians wholly without conception of God are likely to be. They have mostly come into conflict with us from covetousness and envy, and they have attacked us suddenly, when we were in disorder. And what need is there for me to give many proofs of such being their procedure? But when they were in danger of losing their independence, and of being slaves to Cleopatra, who but we freed them from that fear? For it was the friendship I had with Antony, and the kind disposition he was in towards us, that was the reason that even these Arabians were not utterly undone, Antony being unwilling to undertake anything which might be suspected by us. And when he had a mind to bestow some parts of each of our dominions on Cleopatra, I also managed that matter so, that by giving him many presents of my own, I might obtain security for both nations, while I undertook myself to answer for the money, and gave him two hundred talents, and became surety for two hundred more which were imposed upon the land that was subject to this tribute; and this they have defrauded us of. And yet it was not reasonable that Jews should pay tribute to any man living, or allow part of their land to be taxed, but even if it had been, yet ought we not to pay tribute for those Arabians, whom we ourselves preserved; nor is it fit that they, who have professed, and that with great effusion and sense of our kindness, that it is owing to us that they retain their independence, should injure us, and deprive us of what is our due, and that while we are not their enemies but their friends. And whereas observance of covenants takes place even among the bitterest enemies, and among friends is absolutely necessary, it is not observed among these men, who think gain to be the best of all things, let it be by any means whatever, and that injustice is no harm, if they can but get money by it. Is it therefore a question with you, whether the unjust are to be punished or not, when God wills this, and commands us ever to hate injuries and injustice, and that when people are pursuing a not only just but necessary war? For these Arabians have done what both the Greeks and barbarians own to be most lawless, for they have beheaded our ambassadors, though the Greeks declare that such ambassadors are sacred and inviolable, and for ourselves, we have learned from God the most excellent of our doctrines, and the most holy part of our law by angels; for this name brings God to the knowledge of mankind, and is able to reconcile enemies to one another. What wickedness then can be greater than the slaughter of ambassadors, who come to treat about doing what is right? And when such have been their actions, how is it possible they can enjoy a tranquil life, or be successful in war? In my opinion it is impossible. But perhaps some one will say, that what is holy and righteous is indeed on our side, but that the Arabians are more courageous, or more numerous than we are. Now as to this, in the first place, it is not fit for us to say so, for with whom is what is righteous, with them is God himself, and where God is, there are both numbers and courage. And to examine our own circumstances a little, we were conquerors in the first battle, and when we fought again, they were not able to oppose us, but ran away, and could not endure our attack and courage; but when we had conquered them, then came Athenion and made war against us without declaring it. Pray, is this an instance of their manhood, or a second instance of their wickedness and treachery? Why are we, therefore, of less courage, on account of what ought to inspire us with stronger hopes? and why are we terrified at those who, when they fight fairly, are continually beaten, and when they seem to be conquerors, gain the victory unfairly? And if any one should deem them to be men of real courage, will he not be excited by that very consideration to do his utmost against them? for true valour is not shown in fighting against weak persons, but in being able to overcome the strongest. But if the distresses we are ourselves now suffering from, and the miseries that have come from the earthquake dismay any one, let him consider in the first place, that this very thing will deceive the Arabians, who will think that what has befallen us is greater than it really is, and next that it is not right that the same thing that emboldens them should discourage us. For these men, you see, do not derive their courage from any advantage of their own, but from their hope, as to us, that we are quite cast down by our misfortunes; but if we boldly march against them, we shall soon abate their insolent self-conceit, and shall gain this by attacking them, that they will not be so valiant when we come to the battle. For our distresses are not so great, nor is what has happened an indication of the anger of God against us, as some imagine, for such things are accidental, and adversities that come in the usual course of things: and even if it happened by the will of God it is clear that it is now over by his will also, and that he is satisfied with what has already happened, for had he been willing to afflict us still more thereby, he would not have changed his mind so soon. And as for the war we are engaged in, he has himself shown that he is willing it should go on, and that he knows it to be a just war; for while some of the people in the country perished by the earthquake, all you who were in arms suffered nothing, but were all preserved alive: whereby God makes it plain that if you had all been in the army, with your children and wives, you would not have undergone anything that would have much hurt you. Consider these things, and, what is more than all the rest, that you have God at all times for your protector, and go out with a just bravery against these men, who in friendship are false, in their battles perfidious, towards ambassadors impious, and always inferior to you in valour."

§ 4. When the Jews heard this speech, they were much cheered in their minds, and more disposed to fight than before. So Herod, when he had offered the sacrifices appointed by the law, made haste, and took and led his men against the Arabians; and with a view to that, crossed over the Jordan, and pitched his camp near the enemy. He also thought it well to seize upon a certain fortress that lay between the two armies, hoping it would be for his advantage, and would the sooner pull on a battle, and if the battle had to be postponed, he should by it have his camp protected. And as the Arabians had the same intentions upon that place, a contest arose about it: at first they were but skirmishes, after which more soldiers came up, and it proved a sort of fight, and several fell on both sides, till those on the Arabian side were beaten and retreated. This was no small encouragement to the Jews immediately; and when Herod observed that the enemies' army was disposed to anything rather than to come to a general engagement, he ventured boldly to attack their earthworks and demolish them, so to get nearer to their camp, in order to fight them; for when they were forced out of their trenches, they went out in disorder, and had not the least vigour or hope of victory. Yet did they fight hand to hand, because they were more in number than the Jews, and because they were in such a strait that they were obliged to come on boldly: so a terrible battle ensued, wherein not a few fell on each side. However, at last the Arabians were routed and fled; and so great a slaughter was made on their being routed, that they were not only killed by their enemies, but became the authors of their own deaths also, and were trodden down by the multitude, and by the great rush of people in disorder, and fell under the weight of their own armour. So five thousand men lay dead upon the spot, while the rest of the multitude soon ran within their entrenched camp, but had no firm hope of safety, because of their want of necessaries, and especially want of water. The Jews pursued them, but could not get in with them into their entrenched camp, but invested it, and prevented the entrance of any assistance to them, and also their coming out that desired.

§ 5. When the Arabians were in these circumstances, they sent ambassadors to Herod, first to propose terms of accommodation, and afterwards to offer him (so pressing was their thirst) to undergo whatever he pleased, if he would free them from their present distress. But he would hear of no ambassadors, or ransom, or any moderate terms whatever, being very desirous of revenge for their lawless conduct to his nation. So they were necessitated by other things, and particularly by their thirst, to come out, and deliver themselves up to him, to be carried away captives; and in five days four thousand were taken prisoners so, while all the rest resolved to make a sally upon their enemies, and to fight it out with them, choosing rather, if it so must be, to die so, than to perish ingloriously by little and little. When they had taken this resolution, they came out of their trenches, but could no way sustain the fight, being too weak both in mind and body, and having no room to fight gloriously, so they thought it an advantage to be killed, and a misery to survive; accordingly on the first onset there fell about seven thousand of them. After this stroke they lost all the courage they had before, and were amazed at Herod's warlike spirit under his calamities; and thenceforward they yielded, and made him ruler of their nation; whereupon he was greatly elevated at so seasonable a success, and returned home, having won prestige from this valiant exploit.

CHAP. VI.

How Herod slew Hyrcanus, and then hastened away to Augustus, and obtained the Kingdom from him also ; and how, a little time afterwards, he entertained Augustus in a most honourable manner.

§ 1.

HEROD'S other affairs were now very prosperous, and he was not open to attack on any side, yet did there come upon him a danger that might hazard his entire dominions, after Antony had been beaten at the battle off Actium by Augustus. For at that time both Herod's enemies and friends thought his fortunes desperate, for it was not probable that he would remain without punishment, who had shown so much friendship for Antony. So it happened that his friends despaired and had no hopes of his escape, and as for his enemies, they all outwardly appeared to be troubled at his case, but were privately very glad at it, as hoping to obtain a change for the better. As for Herod himself, he saw that there was no one of royal rank left but Hyrcanus, and therefore he thought it would be for his advantage not to suffer him to be an obstacle in his way any longer ; for if he himself survived, and escaped the danger he was in, he thought it the safest way to put it out of the power of a man, who was more worthy of the kingdom than himself, to make any attempt against him at such a juncture of affairs ; and if he himself should be put to death by Augustus, his envy prompted him to slay the only man that would be king after him.

§ 2. While Herod had these things in view, an opportunity was afforded him by Hyrcanus' family. Hyrcanus himself was of so mild a temper, both then and at other times, that he desired not to meddle with public affairs, nor to concern himself with innovations, but left all to fortune, and contented himself with what she afforded him. But Alexandra [his daughter] was a lover of contention, and was exceedingly desirous of change, and urged her father not to bear for ever Herod's injurious treatment of their family, but to anticipate their future hopes, as he safely might; and asked him to write about the matters to Malchus, who was then governor of Arabia, and to ask him to receive them and protect them; for if, after their departure, Herod's affairs proved to be as it would likely they would be because of Augustus' enmity to him, they would then be the only persons that could take over the kingdom, both on account of their royal blood, and the good will of the multitude to them. When she urged this, Hyrcanus rejected her suit, but as she was a very woman, and a contentious woman too, and would not desist either night or day, but would always be speaking to him about it, and about Herod's treacherous designs against them, she at last prevailed on him to intrust Dositheus (one of his friends) with a letter, wherein it was arranged that the Arabian governor should send him some horsemen, who should take and conduct him to the lake Asphaltites,<sup>1</sup> which is three hundred furlongs from the bounds of Jerusalem. And he trusted Dositheus with this letter, because he paid court to him and Alexandra, and had no small reasons to bear ill-will to Herod: for he was a kinsman of Joseph, whom he had slain, and a brother of those that had been formerly slain at Tyre by Antony. However, these motives could not induce Dositheus to serve Hyrcanus faithfully in this affair, for he gave Herod the letter, preferring the hopes he had from the present king to those he might have from him. And he took his kindness in good part, and bade him, besides doing what he had already done, to go on serving him, by folding up the letter and sealing it again, and delivering it to Malchus, and then bringing back his letter in answer to it; for it was very important for him to know Malchus' intentions also. And as Dositheus was very ready to serve him in this point also, the Arabian governor returned back for answer, that he would receive Hyrcanus and all his retinue, and also all the Jews that were of his party: and that he would, moreover, send forces sufficient to secure them on their journey, and that he should be in no want of anything he should desire. Now, as soon as Herod had received this letter, he immediately sent for Hyrcanus, and questioned him about the agreement he had made with Malchus ; and, when he denied it, he showed his letter to the sanhedrim, and had Hyrcanus put to death.

§ 3. We give the reader this account, because it is that contained in the commentaries of king Herod. But other historians do not agree with this, for they think that Herod did not find, but rather made this an opportunity for thus putting Hyrcanus to death, and that by treacherously laying a snare for him. For they thus write ; that Herod and he were once at a supper-party, and that Herod had given no occasion to suspect [that he was displeased with him,] but put this question to Hyrcanus, whether he had received any letters from Malchus? and when he answered, that he had received letters, but only letters of civility, and when he asked further, whether he had not received any present from him? and when he replied, that he had received only four horses to ride on, which Malchus had sent him ; they say that Herod charged this upon him as proof of bribery and treason, and gave order that he should be strangled. And in order to prove that he had been guilty of no offence, when he was thus brought to his end, they recount how mild his temper was, and how even in his youth he had never given any signs of boldness or rashness, and that the case was the same when he came to be king, for even then he committed the management of most public affairs to Antipater ; and that now he was above fourscore years old, and knew that Herod's throne was in a secure state. He had also crossed the Euphrates, and left those who greatly honoured him beyond that river, to be entirely in Herod's power. So it was a most incredible thing that he should enterprise anything by way of innovation, and not at all agreeable to his temper, so they argue that the whole affair was a plot of Herod's contrivance.

§ 4. Thus did Hyrcanus end his life, after having undergone various and manifold turns of fortune in his lifetime. For he was made high priest of the Jewish nation in the beginning of the reign of his mother Alexandra, who held the government nine years ; and when, after his mother's death, he took the kingdom himself, and held it three months, he was ejected from it by his brother Aristobulus. He was afterwards restored by Pompey, and received all sorts of honours from him, which he enjoyed forty years; but when he was again deprived by Antigonus, and mutilated in his body, he was made a captive by the Parthians, and thence returned home again after some time, on account of the hopes that Herod had given him; none of which came to pass according to his expectation, but he still battled with many misfortunes through the whole course of his life; and what was the heaviest calamity of all, as I have related already, he came to a bad end in his old age. He appears to have been a man of a mild and moderate disposition in all things, and to have suffered the administration of affairs to be generally done by others under him. He was averse to business, nor had he shrewdness enough to govern a kingdom: and both Antipater and Herod came to their greatness because of his mildness, and at last he met with such an end from them as was not agreeable either to justice or piety.

§ 5. Now Herod, as soon as he had put Hyrcanus out of the way, made haste to Augustus; and because he could not have any hopes of favour from him, on account of the friendship he had had for Antony, he felt suspicious about Alexandra, lest she should avail herself of this opportunity to bring the multitude to revolt, and introduce rebellion into the affairs of the kingdom; so he committed the care of everything to his brother Pheroras (placing his mother Cypros, and his sister [Salome,] and the whole family, at Masada <sup>1</sup>), and charged him, if he should hear any bad news about him, to seize the government. As to Mariamne his wife (because of the misunderstanding between her and his sister and mother, which made it impossible for them to live together), he placed her at Alexandria <sup>2</sup> with her mother Alexandra, and left his treasurer Joseph, and Sohemus of Ituræa, <sup>3</sup> to take care of that fortress. These two had been very faithful to him from the beginning, and were now left to guard the women under pretext of paying them due respect. They also had it in charge, if they should hear any mischief had befallen Herod, to kill them both, and as far as they were able to preserve the kingdom for his sons, and for his brother Pheroras.

§ 6. When he had given them this charge he set out post haste to Rhodes to meet Augustus, and when he had sailed to that city, he took off his diadem, but remitted nothing else that marked his rank. And when, upon his meeting Augustus, he desired that he would let him speak to him, he therein exhibited much more the nobility of his great soul, for he did not betake himself to supplications, as men usually do upon such occasions, nor did he offer any petition as if he were an offender, but gave an account of what he had done with impunity. He made the following speech to Augustus. He said that he had had the greatest friendship for Antony, and done everything he could that he might be master of the world, that he was not indeed in the army with him, because the Arabians had diverted him, but that he had sent him both money and corn, which was but too little in comparison of what he ought to have done for him. "For," (he added) "if a man owns himself to be another's friend, and knows him to be a benefactor, he ought to hazard everything, to use every faculty of his soul, every member of his body, and all the wealth he has, for him, in which I confess I have been too deficient. However, I am conscious to myself that so far I have done right, in that I did not desert him after his defeat at Actium; nor upon the evident change of his fortunes did I transfer my hopes from him to another, but preserved myself, though not as a valuable fellow-soldier, yet certainly as a faithful counsellor to Antony, when I suggested to him that the only way that he had to save himself, and not to lose all his authority, was to put Cleopatra to death; for when she was once dead, there would have been room for him to retain his authority, and I recommended him rather to bring thee to make a composition with him, than to continue at enmity with thee any longer. None of which advice would he attend to, but preferred his own rash resolution, which has happened unprofitably for him, but profitably for thee. Now therefore, in case thou determinest about me, and my zeal in serving Antony, according to thy anger at him, I cannot deny what I have done, nor will I disown, and that publicly too, that I had a great kindness for him; but if thou wilt put him out of the case, and only examine how I behaved myself to my benefactors in general, and what sort of friend I am, thou wilt find by experience that I shall do and be the same to thyself. For it is but changing the names, and the firmness of friendship that I shall bear to thee will not be disapproved by thee."

§ 7. By this speech, and by his behaviour, which showed Augustus the openness of his mind, he greatly gained upon him, as he was himself of a generous and noble character, insomuch that those very actions, which were the foundation of the accusation against him, won him Augustus' favour. Accordingly, he restored him his diadem again, and exhorted him to show himself as great a friend to him as he had been to Antony, and held him in great esteem. Moreover he added that Quintus Didius had written to him, that Herod had very readily assisted him in the affair of the gladiators. So when he had obtained such a kind reception, and had, beyond all his hopes, got his crown more entirely and firmly settled upon him than ever by Augustus' gift, as well as by the decree of the Romans, which Augustus took care to procure for his greater security, he escorted Augustus on his way to Egypt, and made presents even beyond his means to both him and his friends, and in general behaved himself with great magnanimity. He also begged that Augustus would not put to death one Alexander, who had been a companion of Antony's; but Augustus had sworn to put him to death, and so he could not obtain that petition. And he returned to Judæa again with greater honour and security than ever, and dismayed those that had expected the contrary, acquiring from his very dangers still greater splendour than before owing to the favour of God to him. And he prepared at once for the reception of Augustus, as he was going from Syria to invade Egypt; and when he came, he entertained him at Ptolemais with all royal magnificence. He also bestowed presents on the army, and brought them provisions in abundance. He also proved to be one of Augustus' most cordial friends, and put the army in array, and rode along with Augustus, and had a hundred and fifty chambers, well appointed in all respects in a rich and sumptuous manner, for the better reception of him and his friends. He also provided them with what they would want especially as they passed over the desert, insomuch that they lacked neither wine nor water, which last the soldiers stood in the greatest need of. He also presented Augustus with eight hundred talents, and made all think that he was assisting them in a much greater and more splendid degree than the kingdom he had obtained could afford. Thus he more and more demonstrated to Augustus the firmness of his friendship, and his readiness to assist him; and what was the greatest advantage to him was that his liberality came at a seasonable time also. And when they returned back from Egypt, his assistance was no way inferior to the good offices he had formerly done.

CHAP. VII.

How Herod slew Sohemus, and Mariamne, and afterwards Alexandra, and Costobarus, and his most intimate Friends, and at last the Sons of Babas also.

§ 1.

HOWEVER, when he returned to his kingdom again, he found his house all in disorder, and his wife Mariamne and her mother Alexandra very displeased. For, as they supposed (as was natural enough), that they were not put into that fortress [Alexandrium] for the security of their persons, but as into a garrison for their imprisonment, and that they had no power over anything, either of others or of their own, they were very displeased; and Mariamne supposing that the king's love to her was rather pretended, as advantageous to himself, than real, looked upon it as feigned. She was also grieved that he would not allow her any hopes of surviving him, if he should come to any harm himself, and recollected the commands he had formerly given to Joseph, so that she began to pay court to her keepers, and especially to Sohemus, being well apprized how all was in his power. And at first Sohemus was faithful to Herod, and neglected none of the things he had entrusted to him ; but when the women, by kind words and liberal presents, had gained his affections, he was by degrees overcome, and at last disclosed to them all the king's injunctions, chiefly because he did not expect that Herod would come back with the same authority he had before ; so that he thought he would escape any danger from him, and would not a little gratify the women, who were not likely to lose their present rank, and so would be able to make him abundant recompense, since they would either reign themselves, or be very near to him that did reign. He had a further ground of hope also, in that, though Herod should have all the success he could wish for, and should return again, he could not contradict his wife in what she desired, for he knew that the king's fondness for Mariamne was inexpressible. These were the motives that drew Sohemus to disclose the injunctions that had been given him. And Mariamne was greatly displeased to hear that there was no end of the dangers she was in from Herod, and was very vexed at it, and wished he might obtain no favours [from Augustus,] and esteemed it almost unbearable to live with him any longer. Indeed she afterwards showed this very clearly, not concealing her resentment.

§ 2. And now Herod sailed home, in great joy at the unexpected good success he had had, and went first of all, as was likely, to his wife, and told her the good news before the rest, on account of his fondness for her, and the intimacy there had been between them, and embraced her. But it so happened, as he told her of the good success he had had, that she was so far from rejoicing at it, that she was rather sorry for it ; nor was she able to conceal her resentment, but, thinking of her dignity and the nobility of her birth, on his embracing her she gave a groan, and showed evidently that she rather grieved than rejoiced at his success, and that till Herod was disturbed no longer by suspicion but proof evident of her dislike to him. It made him almost mad to see that this unreasonable hatred of his wife to him was not concealed, and he took it so ill, and was so unable to bear it, on account of the fondness he had for her, that he could not continue long in one mind, but sometimes was angry at her, and sometimes reconciled to her ; and by always changing from one passion to another, he was in great discomfort. And thus was he entangled between hatred and love, and was frequently disposed to inflict punishment on her for her contemptuous behaviour to him ; but being deeply in love with her in his soul, he had not the heart to get rid of her. In short, though he would gladly have had her punished, yet was he afraid lest, ere he were aware, he should, by putting her to death, bring unawares a heavier punishment upon himself.

§ 3. When Herod's sister and mother perceived that he was in this state of mind with regard to Mariamne, they thought they had now got an excellent opportunity to satisfy their hatred against her, so they provoked Herod to wrath by telling him such long stories and calumnies about her, as might at once excite both his hatred and jealousy. Now, though he willingly enough heard their words, yet he had not courage enough to do anything to her, as if he believed them. But still he became more ill-disposed to her, and their evil passions were more and more inflamed on both sides, as she did not hide her dislike to him, and he turned his love for her into wrath against her. But when he was just on the eve of putting matters past all remedy, he heard the news that Antony and Cleopatra were both dead, and that Augustus was victor in the war, and had conquered Egypt, whereupon he made haste to go and meet him, and left the affairs of his family statu quo. However, Mariamne recommended Sohemus to him, as he was setting out on his journey, and confessed that she owed him thanks for the care he had taken of her, and asked of the king a governorship for him, and accordingly that honour was bestowed upon him. Now, when Herod was come into Egypt, he enjoyed great freedom with Augustus, as already a friend of his, and received very great favours from him ; for he made him a present of those four hundred Galatians who had been Cleopatra's body-guards, and restored to him again that territory which had by her been taken away from him. He also added to his kingdom Gadara<sup>1</sup> and Hippos<sup>2</sup> and Samaria<sup>3</sup> ; and besides these, the

§ 4. Upon these new acquisitions, Herod grew more magnificent, and escorted Augustus as far as Antioch; but upon return, in proportion as his prosperity was augmented by the external additions that had been made to his kingdom, so much the greater were the distresses that came upon him in his own family, and chiefly in the affair of his marriage, wherein he formerly appeared to have been most fortunate. For the passion he had for Mariamne was no way inferior to such passions as are famous in history, and that on very good grounds; while as for her, she was in other respects chaste and faithful to him; but she had somewhat of the woman in her, and was haughty by nature, and treated her husband imperiously enough, because she saw he was so fond of her as to be her slave. She did not also consider (as would have been well) that she lived under a monarchy, and was at another's disposal, and so she would behave in a haughty manner to him, while he usually concealed his vexation, and bore her tauntings with moderation and good temper. She would also jeer at his mother and sister openly, and speak ill of them on account of the meanness of their birth, so that there was before this a disagreement and deadly hatred among the women, and it was now come to greater calumnies than formerly. And these suspicions increased, and lasted a whole year after Herod returned from Augustus. And this hatred, which had been kept under somewhat for a great while, burst out all at once upon the following occasion. As the king one day about noon was laid down on his bed to rest, he called for Mariamne out of the great affection he always had for her. She came to him accordingly, but would not lie with him though he was very desirous of her company, but showed her contempt of him; and also twitted him with having caused her father and brother to be slain.<sup>5</sup> And as he took this contemptuous treatment very unkindly, and was inclined to use violence to her, the king's sister Salome, observing that he was more than ordinarily put out, sent to the king his cup-bearer, who had been prepared long beforehand for such a design, and bade him tell the king that Mariamne had asked him to give his assistance in preparing a love potion for him; and if he appeared to be troubled, and asked what that love potion was, he was to tell the king that she had the potion, and that he was asked only to supply it, but in case he did not appear to be much concerned about this potion, he was to let the matter drop, for no harm would come to him. When she had given him these instructions, she then sent him in to say this. So he went in with a plausible and earnest manner, and said that Mariamne had given him presents, and had urged him to give the king a love potion. And when this greatly moved the king, he said, that this love potion was a composition she had given him, whose properties he did not know, which was the reason of his resolving to give him this information, as the safest course he could take, both for himself and for the king. When Herod heard this, being prejudiced against Mariamne before, his indignation grew more violent, and he ordered the eunuch of Mariamne's who was most faithful to her to be brought to torture about this potion, well knowing that it was not possible that anything great or small could be done without him. And when this man was in the utmost agony he could say nothing concerning the matter he was tortured about, but that Mariamne's hatred against Herod was occasioned by something that Sohemus had told her. Now, while he was still saying this, Herod cried out aloud, and said that Sohemus, who had been at all other times most faithful to him and to his throne, would not have disclosed the injunctions he had given him, unless he had been unduly intimate with Mariamne. So he gave orders that Sohemus should be arrested and put to death immediately, but he put his wife on her trial, and got together those who were most faithful to him, and made a formal accusation against her as to this love potion and composition, which had been laid to her charge calumniously. And he was intemperate in his words, and was in too great a passion for judging right about the matter; and so, when the court was at last satisfied that he was so resolved, they passed sentence of death upon her: but when sentence had been passed upon her, it was suggested by himself, and by some others of the court, that she should not be thus hastily put to death, but be imprisoned in one of the fortresses belonging to the kingdom. But Salome and her party laboured hard to have the poor woman put to death, and they prevailed upon the king to do so, urging that the multitude would be riotous if she were suffered to live. And so Mariamne was led out to execution.

Alexander, whom he caused to be slain, (as Josephus himself informs us, chap. 6, § 2,) we must either take Zonara's reading, which is here grandfather rightly, or else we must, as before, chap. 1, § 1, allow a slip of Josephus' pen or memory in the place before us.—W.

§ 5. When Alexandra saw how things went, and that there was small hope that she herself would escape the like treatment from Herod, she changed her behaviour to quite the reverse of her former boldness, and that in a very unseemly manner. For wishing to show how entirely ignorant she was of the crimes laid against Mariamne, she jumped up, and reproached her daughter in the hearing of all the people; and cried out, that she had been peevish and ungrateful to her husband, and that her punishment came justly upon her for such insolent behaviour, for she had not made a proper return to him who had been their common benefactor. And when she had for some time acted in this hypocritical manner, and even gone so far as to tear her hair, this unseemly dissembling, as was to be expected, was greatly condemned by the rest of the spectators, as was manifested still more by the poor woman who was to suffer; for she spoke to her not a single word, nor did she seem disturbed or to regard her unfriendliness, yet did she, in her greatness of soul, discover her concern for her mother's offence, and especially for her exposing herself in a manner so unbecoming. As for herself, she went to her death with unshaken firmness of mind, and without changing colour, and so evidently showed the nobility of her descent to the spectators even in the last moments of her life.

§ 6. And thus died Mariamne, a woman of an excellent character both for chastity and greatness of soul ; but she wanted moderation, and had too much of contentiousness in her nature, but she surpassed all the women of her time more than can be said in the beauty of her body and charm of her society, which was the principal reason why she did not prove so agreeable to the king, nor live so pleasantly with him, as she might otherwise have done ; for as she was most indulgently used by the king, from his fondness to her, and did not expect that he could do any hard thing to her she took too excessive liberty. But what most distressed her was what Herod had done to her relations, and she ventured to speak out of all they had suffered at his hands, and at last greatly provoked both the king's mother and sister (till they became enemies to her), and also the king himself, on whom alone she relied to escape extreme punishment.

§ 7. But when she was once dead, the king's passion for her was kindled more than before, he being such as I have already described. For his love to her was not of a calm nature, nor such as we usually meet with in other husbands, for at its commencement it was enthusiastic, nor was it weakened by long cohabitation and free intercourse. And now his love for Mariamne seemed to seize him in such a peculiar way as looked like divine vengeance upon him for taking away her life, for he would frequently call for her, and frequently lament for her in a most unseemly manner. Moreover, he bethought him of everything he could make use of to divert his mind from thinking of her, and contrived feasts and company for that purpose, but nothing would suffice ; he therefore laid aside the administration of public affairs, and was so overcome by his passion, that he would order his servants to call for Mariamne, as if she were still alive, and could hear. And when he was in this way, there arose a pestilential disease, that carried off many of the people, and his most esteemed friends, and made all men suspect that this was brought on them by the anger of God, for the injustice that had been done to Mariamne. This circumstance affected the king still more, till at length he went into retirement, and, under a pretence of going a hunting, bitterly mourned, and had not borne his grief

there many days before he fell into a most dangerous illness. He had an inflammation upon him, and a pain in the hinder part of his head, joined with madness; and the remedies that were used did him no good at all, but proved contrary to his case, and so at last his life was despaired of. All the physicians also that were about him, partly because the medicines they brought for his recovery could not at all conquer the disease, and partly because his diet could be no other than what his disease inclined him to, desired him to take whatever he had a mind to, and so left the small hopes they had of his recovery to the power of that diet, and left him to fortune. And thus was he ill at Samaria, now called Sebaste.<sup>1</sup>

§ 8. Now Alexandra lived at Jerusalem, and being informed of the condition Herod was in, endeavoured to get possession of the fortified places that were about the city, which were two, the one belonging to the city itself, the other belonging to the temple; for whoever could get them into their hands had the whole nation ever in their power, for without the command of them it was not possible to offer the sacrifices; and to think of leaving off those sacrifices is to all Jews plainly impossible, for they are more ready to lose their lives than to leave off the divine worship which they have been wont to pay to God. So Alexandra told those that had the keeping of those strongholds, that they ought to deliver up the same to her and to Herod's sons, lest, upon his death, any other person should seize upon the government; and if he recovered none could keep them more safely for him than those of his own family. These words were not taken by them at all in good part; and as they had been in former times faithful [to Herod], they resolved to continue so more than ever, not only because they hated Alexandra, but also because they thought it a sort of impiety to despair of Herod's recovery while he was yet alive. For they had been his old friends, and one of them, whose name was Achiabus, was his cousin. They therefore sent messengers to acquaint Herod with Alexandra's design; and he without any delay gave orders to have her put to death. And it was only with difficulty, and after he had endured great pain, that he got rid of this illness. He was still sorely afflicted both in mind and body, so that he was very morose, and readier than ever upon all occasions to inflict punishment upon those that fell under his power. He also slew the most intimate of his friends, as Costobarus, and Lysimachus, and Gadias, who was also called Antipater, as also Dositheus, for the following reason.

§ 9. Costobarus was an Idumæan by birth, and one of principal dignity among them, and his ancestors had been priests to the Koze, whom the Idumæans esteem a god; but after Hyrcanus had made a change in their polity, and made them receive the Jewish customs and law, Herod after he got the kingdom made Costobarus governor of Idumæa and Gaza, and gave him his sister Salome to wife, after putting to death Joseph, who had that government before, as I have related already. When Costobarus had got so highly advanced, it pleased him, being more than he had hoped for, and he was more and more puffed up by his good fortune, and in a little while he exceeded all bounds, and did not think fit to obey what Herod his ruler commanded him, or that the Idumæans should adopt the Jewish customs, or be subject to the Jews. He therefore sent to Cleopatra, and informed her that the Idumæans had been always under her progenitors, and for that reason it was but just that she should ask that country of Antony, and added that he himself was ready to transfer his friendship to her. This he did, not because he was better pleased to be under Cleopatra's government, but because he thought that, upon the diminution of Herod's power, it would not be difficult for him to obtain himself the entire rule over the Idumæans, and somewhat more also; for he raised his hopes still higher, as having no small advantages both from his birth and those riches which he had got by his constant attention to filthy lucre, and it was no small matter that he aimed at. So Cleopatra asked this country of Antony, but did not get it. An account of this was brought to Herod, who was thereupon inclined to kill Costobarus, but upon the entreaties of his sister and mother he let him go, and vouchsafed to pardon him, though he was suspicious of him ever afterwards for this attempt of his.

§ 10. But some time afterwards, when Salome happened to be at variance with Costobarus, she sent him at once a bill of divorce,<sup>1</sup> and dissolved her marriage with him, though this was not according to the Jewish laws. For with us it is lawful for a husband to do so, but a wife, if she departs from her husband, cannot herself marry another, unless her former husband put her away. However, Salome chose to follow not the law of her country, but the law of her own will, and so renounced her wedlock, and told her brother Herod that she left her husband out of good-will to him, because she had found out that Costobarus and Antipater and Lysimachus and Dositheus were raising a rebellion against him: as an evidence whereof she alleged the case of the sons of Babas, who had been preserved alive by him twelve years, as proved to be the case. But when Herod thus unexpectedly heard of this, he was greatly surprised at it, and the more so because the affair appeared incredible to him. For Herod had formerly taken great pains to bring those sons of Babas to punishment, as being enemies to his government, but they were now forgotten by him, on account of the length of time between. Now, the cause of his ill-will and hatred to them was because, when Antigonus was king, Herod with his army besieged the city of Jerusalem, where the distress and miseries that the besieged endured were so harassing, that many invited Herod into the city, and already placed their hopes on him. But the sons of Babas, who occupied a high position and had much influence with the multitude, were faithful to Antigonus, and were always calumniating Herod, and encouraging the people to preserve the kingdom to the royal family who held it by inheritance. Now they acted thus for their own advantage, as they thought; but when the city was taken, and

<sup>1</sup> Here is a plain example of a Jewish lady giving a bill of divorce to her husband, though in the days of Josephus it was not esteemed lawful for a woman so to do. See alike among the Parthians. Antiq. xviii. 9, § 6. However, the Christian law, when it allowed divorce for adultery, Matt. v. 32, allowed the innocent wife to divorce her guilty husband, as well as the innocent husband to divorce his guilty wife, as we learn from the shepherd of Hermas, Mand. iv., and from the second Apology of Justin Martyr, where a persecution was brought upon the Christians upon such a divorce; and I think the Roman laws permitted it at that time, as well as the laws of Christianity.—W.

Herod had become master of the position, and Costobarus was appointed to hinder men from passing out at the gates, and to guard the city, that those citizens that were guilty, and of the party opposite to the king, might not get out of it, Costobarus, knowing that the sons of Babas were held in respect and honour by the whole multitude, and supposing that their preservation might be of great advantage to him in any changes of government afterwards, took them out of the way, and concealed them on his own estate. And when the thing was suspected, he assured Herod upon oath that he really knew nothing of the matter, and so allayed his suspicions. Moreover after that, when the king had publicly proposed a reward for their discovery, and devised all sorts of methods for searching out the matter, he would not confess, but being persuaded that, owing to his having at first denied it, he would not escape unpunished, if the men were found, he was forced to keep them secret, not only from his goodwill to them, but from necessity. But when the king knew the facts of the case from his sister's information, he sent men to the places where he had intimation they were concealed, and ordered both them, and those that were accused as guilty with them, to be slain, so that now there were none at all left of the kindred of Hyrcanus, and the kingdom was entirely in Herod's own power, and there was nobody remaining of such high position as could interfere with what he did against the Jewish laws.

CHAP. VIII.

How ten of the Citizens [of Jerusalem] made a Conspiracy against Herod, because of the foreign Practices he had introduced, which was a Transgression of the Laws of their Country. Concerning the building of Sebaste and Cæsarea, and other Erections of Herod.

§ 1.

THIS was why Herod revolted from the laws of his country, and corrupted our ancient polity, which ought to have been preserved inviolable, by the introduction of foreign practices; by which we became guilty of great wickedness afterwards, as those religious observances which used to lead the multitude to piety were now neglected. For, in the first place, he appointed solemn games to be celebrated every fifth year, in honour of Augustus, and built a theatre at Jerusalem, as also a very great amphitheatre in the plain. Both of them were indeed costly works, but opposite to the Jewish notions; for we have had no such shows handed down to us by tradition as fit to be used or exhibited by us; yet did Herod celebrate these games every five years in the most splendid manner. He also made proclamation to the neighbouring people, and called men together out of all the nation. Wrestlers also, and the rest of those that strove for the prizes in such games, were invited out of all the land, both by the hopes of the rewards there to be bestowed, and by the glory of victory there to be gained. So the principal persons that were most renowned for these sorts of exercises were got together, for there were very great rewards proposed for victory, not only to those who performed gymnastic exercises, but also to those who were professional musicians, and who were called Thymelici; indeed Herod spared no pains to induce all persons, the most famous for such exercises, to come to the contest. He also proposed no small rewards for those who contended for the prizes in chariots drawn by four horses, or by a pair, or with race-horses. He also imitated everything, though ever so costly or magnificent, that was practised by other nations, being ambitious to give public demonstration of his grandeur. Incriptions also of the great actions of Augustus, and trophies of the nations which he had got in his wars, all made of the purest gold and silver, were all round the theatre. Nor was there anything that could conduce to display, whether precious garments or precious stones set in order, which was not also exposed to sight in these games. He also got together a great quantity of wild beasts, and of lions in very great abundance, and of such other beasts as were either of uncommon strength, or of such a sort as were rarely seen. These were trained either to fight one with another, or men who were condemned to death were to fight with them. And truly foreigners were greatly surprised and delighted at the vast expense of the shows, and at the great danger of the spectacles, but to the Jews it was a palpable breaking up of those customs for which they had so great a veneration. It appeared also no better than barefaced impiety to throw men to wild beasts, to afford delight to the spectators, and it appeared no less impiety to change their own laws for such foreign practices. But above all the trophies gave most distaste to the Jews, for as they imagined them to be images inclosed in the armour that hung round about them, they were sorely displeased at them, because it was not the custom of their country to pay honour to such things.

§ 2. Nor was Herod unacquainted with their emotion, and as he thought it unseasonable to use violence, he tried to conciliate and console some of them, and to free them from their religious scruples, but he could not satisfy them, but they cried out with one accord, from their great uneasiness at the offences they thought he had been guilty of, that although they might bear all the rest, yet would they never bear images of men in their city (meaning the trophies), because this was against the laws of their country. Now when Herod saw them so put out, and that they would not easily change their sentiments unless they received satisfaction on this point, he called to him the most eminent men among them, and brought them to the theatre, and showed them the trophies, and asked them what sort of things they took these trophies to be? And when they cried out, that they were the images of men, he ordered that they should be stripped of the ornaments which were about them, and showed them the bare wood; which wood, now without any ornament, became matter of great sport and laughter to them, as indeed they had always before had the ornaments of images in derision.

§ 3. When Herod had thus baffled the multitude, and dissipated the vehemence of passion under which they laboured, most of the people were disposed to change their ideas, and not to be displeased at him any longer; but some of them still continued to be offended with him for his introduction of new customs, and esteemed the violation of the laws of their country as likely to be the origin of very great mischiefs to them, so that they deemed it an instance of piety rather to run any risk than to seem as if they took no notice of Herod's action in changing their polity, and violently introducing such customs as they had never been used to before; for he was indeed to appearance a king, but in reality one that showed himself an enemy to their whole nation. So ten men that were citizens conspired together against him, and swore to one another to undergo any dangers in the attempt, and took daggers with them under their garments [for the purpose of killing Herod]. Now there was a certain blind man among these conspirators, who was moved by indignation in consequence of what he heard had been done; he was not indeed able to afford the rest any assistance in the undertaking, but was ready to undergo any suffering with them, if they should come to any harm, insomuch that he became a very great encouragement to the conspirators.

§ 4. When they had taken their resolution, they went by common consent into the theatre, hoping that Herod himself would not escape them, as they would fall upon him so unexpectedly, and supposing that, if they missed him, they should anyhow kill a great many of those who were about him; and feeling they would be satisfied, even though they should die for it, if they brought home to the king what injuries he had done to the multitude. These conspirators, therefore, being thus prepared beforehand, went about their design with great zeal. But there was one of Herod's spies, who were appointed to fish out and inform him of any conspiracies that were made against him, who found out the whole affair, and told the king of it, as he was about to enter the theatre. And when he reflected on the hatred which he knew most of the people bore him, and on the disturbances that arose upon every occasion, he thought this plot against him not improbable. Accordingly, he retired into his palace, and called those that were accused of this conspiracy before him by their names; and as, by his guards falling upon them, they were caught in the very act, and knew they could not escape, they prepared themselves for their deaths with all the decency they could, and so as not to recede at all from their resolute behaviour. For they showed no shame at their act, nor did they deny it, but when they were seized, they showed their daggers, and professed that their conspiracy was a holy and pious action, that what they intended to do was not for gain, or to indulge their passions, but rather for those common customs of their country, which all Jews were obliged to observe or to die for them. This is what these men boldly said, in their undaunted courage evinced in this conspiracy, as they were led away to execution by the king's guards that surrounded them, and patiently underwent all the torments inflicted on them till they died. Nor was it long before the spy who had informed against them was seized on by some of the people, from the hatred they bore to him, and was not only slain by them, but pulled to pieces limb by limb, and given to the dogs. This action was seen by many of the citizens, but not one of them would discover the doers of it, till upon Herod's making a strict and severe search for them, certain women that were tortured confessed what they had seen done; and the authors of the act were so terribly punished by the king, that their entire families were destroyed for their rash attempt. But the obstinacy of the people, and the undaunted constancy they showed in the defence of their laws, made Herod afraid unless he strengthened himself in a more secure manner. So he resolved to hem in the multitude on all sides, lest faction should end in open rebellion.

§ 5. When therefore he had fortified the city by the palace in which he lived, and the temple by a strong fortress rebuilt by himself, called Antonia,<sup>1</sup> he contrived to make Samaria also a point d'appui for himself against all the people, and called it Sebaste,<sup>2</sup> supposing that it would overawe the country as much as the other. So he fortified the place, which was a day's journey distant from Jerusalem, so as to be useful to him both in keeping the country and city in awe. He also built another fortress for the whole nation, which was of old called Strato's Tower, but was by him called Cæsarea.<sup>3</sup> Moreover, he chose out some picked cavalry to wait upon him in the great plain, and built [for them] a place in Galilee called Gaba,<sup>1</sup> and Esebonitis in Peræa.<sup>2</sup> And these were the places which he particularly built, as he was always inventing something fresh for his own security, and surrounding the whole nation with garrisons, that they might by no means get out of his power, nor fall into tumults, which they did continually upon any small commotion; and that if they did make any commotions he might know of it, as some of his spies would be upon them from the neighbourhood, and would both be able to know what they were attempting, and to prevent it. And when he started fortifying Samaria, he took care to convey there many of those that had assisted him in his wars, and many of the people in that neighbourhood also, whom he made fellow-citizens with the others. This he did partly from an ambitious desire of building a temple, and making the city more eminent than it had been before, but chiefly that it might at once be for his own security, and a monument of his magnificence. He also changed its name, and called it Sebaste. Moreover, he parcelled out the adjacent country, which was excellent in its kind, among the inhabitants of Samaria, that they might be in a prosperous condition on their first coming to inhabit it. He also surrounded the city with a wall of great strength, and availed himself of the steepness of the place to make its fortifications stronger; nor was the compass of the place made now so small as it had been before, but it was such as rendered it not inferior to the most famous cities; for it was twenty furlongs in compass. And within in about the middle of it he built a sacred enclosure, a furlong and a half in circumference, and adorned it with all sorts of decorations, and erected a temple in it, which was most notable both on account of its size and beauty. And as to the several parts of the city, he adorned them with decorations of all sorts also: and seeing what was necessary to provide for his own safety, he made the walls very strong for that purpose, and made it for the most part a citadel; and as to elegance of building, that was looked after also, that he might leave a memorial of the fineness of his taste, and of his beneficence, to future ages.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning the Famine that happened in Judæa and Syria ; and how Herod, after he had married another Wife, rebuilt Cæsarea, and other Greek Cities.

§ 1.

NOW in this very year, which was the thirteenth year of the reign of Herod, very great calamities came upon the country, whether from the anger of God, or whether this evil recurs naturally in certain periods of time. For in the first place there were perpetual droughts, and for that reason the ground was barren, and did not bring forth the same quantity of fruits that it usually produced ; and next to this the change of food which the want of corn occasioned produced diseases in the bodies of men, and a pestilence prevailed, one misery following hard upon the back of another. And the circumstance that they were destitute both of methods of cure and of food, made the pestilence, which began in a violent manner, the more intense, and the death of men in such a manner deprived those that survived of all their courage, because they had no way to provide remedies sufficient to meet the distress they were in. As therefore the fruits of that year were spoiled, and whatever they had laid up beforehand was expended, there was no hope of relief remaining, but the evil, contrary to what they expected, still increased upon them; and not only in that year, when they had nothing for themselves left at the end of it, but the seed they had sown perished also, because of the ground not yielding its fruits in the second year. The distress they were in made them also out of necessity eat many things that were not usually eaten ; nor was the king himself free from this distress any more than other men, as he was deprived of the tribute he used to have from the fruits of the ground, and had already expended what money he had in his liberality to those whose cities he had built. Nor had he any people that were worthy of his assistance, for this miserable state of things had procured him the hatred of his subjects, for it is a constant rule that misfortunes are laid to the account of those that govern.

§ 2. Under these circumstances he considered with himself how to procure some relief; which was a difficult matter, as their neighbours had no food to sell them, as they had suffered as much themselves, and their money also was gone, had it been possible to purchase a little food at a great price. However, he thought it well not to leave off by any means his endeavours to assist his people; so he cut off the rich furniture both of silver and gold that was in his palace, nor did he spare the finest vessels he had, or those that had been made with the most elaborate skill of the artificers, but sent the money to Petronius, who had been made prefect of Egypt by Augustus. And as not a few had already fled to him in their necessities, and as he was a particular friend of Herod, and desirous to have his subjects preserved, Petronius gave them first leave to have corn from Egypt, and assisted them every way both in purchasing and conveying it to Judæa, so that he was the principal, if not the only person, who afforded them help in this matter. And Herod took care the people should know that this help came from himself, and so not only changed the bad opinions of those that formerly hated him, but gave the greatest proof of his good-will to them and care of them. For, in the first place, to those who were able to provide their own food, he distributed their proportion of corn in the exactest manner, while for those many that were not able to provide food for themselves, either because of old age or any other infirmity, he made this provision for them, seeing that the bakers made their bread for them. He also took care that they should not be hurt by the dangers of winter, as they were in great want of clothing also, because of the utter destruction and loss of their flocks, so that they had no wool to make use of, nor anything else to cover themselves with. And when he had procured these things for his own subjects, he also attempted to provide necessaries for the neighbouring cities, and gave seed to the Syrians, which thing turned as much to his own advantage, this charitable assistance being afforded most seasonably to their fruitful soil, so that every one had now a plentiful provision of food. And when the harvest of the land was generally approaching, he sent no less than fifty thousand men, whom he had sustained, into the country; by which means he not only repaired the afflicted condition of his own kingdom with great generosity and diligence, but also very much lightened the afflictions of his neighbours, who were suffering from the same calamities. For there was nobody who had been in want, that was left destitute of a suitable assistance from him: nor were there either any peoples or cities or private persons, who had to make provision for multitudes and so were in want, who had recourse to him, without receiving what they stood in need of, inso-much, that it appeared upon computation, that the number of cors of wheat (now a cor is ten Attic medimni) that was given to foreigners amounted to ten thousand, and the number that was given in his own kingdom was about fourscore thousand. Now it happened that this care of his, and this seasonable benevolence, had such influence on the Jews, and was so cried up among other nations, that it wiped off that old hatred which his violation of some of their customs, during his reign, had procured him among all the nation, and this liberality of assistance in their greatest necessity was reckoned full requital. It also procured him great fame among foreigners, and it seems as if those calamities, that afflicted his kingdom to a degree plainly incredible, came in order to raise his glory, and to be to his great advantage. For the greatness of his liberality in those distresses, which he displayed beyond all expectation, did so change the disposition of the multitude towards him, that they were ready to suppose he had been from the beginning not such a one as they had found him long ago by experience, but such a one as the care he had taken of them in supplying their necessities now showed him to be.

§ 3. About this time it was that he sent five hundred picked men of his body-guards as auxiliaries to Augustus, whom Ælius Gallus conducted to the Red Sea, and who were of great service to him there. And when his affairs were in a good and flourishing condition again, he built himself a palace in the upper part of the city, raising the rooms to a very great height, and adorning them with the most costly furniture of gold and precious stones and decorations, and built apartments so large that they could contain very many men, and had particular names given them according to their size, for one apartment was called Augustus', another Agrippa's. He also fell in love again, and married another wife, not suffering his reason to hinder him from living as he pleased. The occasion of this marriage was as follows. There was one Simon, a native of Jerusalem (the son of one Boethus, an Alexandrian), who was a priest of great note, and had a daughter who was esteemed the most beautiful woman of her time; and as the people of Jerusalem talked much about her, it happened that Herod was much affected first with what was said about her, and afterwards when he saw the damsel he was deeply smitten with her beauty, yet did he entirely reject the thoughts of using his authority to abuse her, believing, as was the truth, that if he did so he would be stigmatized for violence and tyranny, so he thought it best to take the damsel to wife. And as Simon was of a rank too low to be allied to him, but still too considerable to be despised, he followed his inclination in the most prudent manner, by augmenting the dignity of his family, and making it more honourable. So he forthwith deprived Jesus, the son of Phabes, of the high priesthood, and conferred that dignity on Simon, and then married his daughter.

§ 4. When the wedding was over, he built another citadel in the place where he had conquered the Jews when he was driven out of his kingdom, when Antigonus was at the head of affairs. This citadel<sup>1</sup> is about threescore furlongs from Jerusalem. It is a place strong by nature, and fit for such a building. It is a sort of a moderate hill, raised to a greater height by the hand of man, so that its circuit is like the shape of a woman's breast. It has circular towers at intervals, and a steep ascent up to it, composed of two hundred steps of polished stones. Within it are royal and very costly apartments, constructed both for security and beauty. At the bottom of the hill there are habitations of such a structure as are well worth seeing, both on other accounts, and also on account of the water which is brought there from a great way off,<sup>1</sup> and at vast expense, for the place itself is destitute of water. The plain below is full of buildings, and not inferior to any city in size, having the hill above it as a citadel.

§ 5. And now, when all Herod's designs had succeeded according to his hopes, he had not the least suspicion that any troubles would arise in his kingdom, because he kept his people obedient, as well by the fear they stood in of him, for he was implacable in his punishments, as by the provident care he had showed towards them, in the most magnanimous manner, when they were in their distresses. Still he took care to have external security as a fortress against his subjects. For to the cities he was courteous and full of kindness, and cultivated a seasonable good understanding with their governors, and bestowed presents on every one of them, inducing them thereby to be more friendly to him, and using his magnificent disposition, so that his kingdom might be the better secured to him, and all his affairs be every way more and more augmented. But that magnificent temper of his, and the court which he paid towards Augustus and the most powerful men of Rome, obliged him to transgress the customs of his nation, and to set aside many of their laws, both by building cities in an ambitious manner, and erecting temples; not in Judæa indeed (for that would not have been borne, it being forbidden for us to pay any honour to images, or representations of animals, like the Greeks), but he did thus in the country and cities out of our bounds. The apology which he made to the Jews for this was that all was done, not by his own inclination, but by command and order, to please Augustus and the Romans, as though he had not the Jewish customs so much in his eye as he had paying honour to the Romans, while yet he had himself in view entirely all the while, and indeed was very ambitious to leave great monuments of his reign to posterity; whence it was that he was so zealous in building such fine cities, and spent such vast sums of money upon them.

§ 6. Now upon his observing a place near the sea, which was very well adapted for a city, and was before called Strato's Tower, he set about planning a magnificent city there, and erected many edifices with great care all over it of white stone. He also adorned it with most sumptuous palaces, and edifices for containing the people; and what was the greatest and most laborious work of all, he adorned it with a haven sheltered from the waves of the sea, in size not less than the Piræus [at Athens,] and containing inside two stations for ships.<sup>1</sup> It was excellently constructed, which was the more remarkable from its being built in a place that of itself was not suitable for such a noble structure, but had to be brought to perfection by materials fetched from other places at very great expense. The city is situate in Phœnicia, in the passage by sea to Egypt, between Joppa<sup>2</sup> and Dora,<sup>3</sup> which are smaller maritime cities, and not fit for havens, on account of the fierce south winds that beat upon them,—which, rolling the sand that comes from the sea against the shore, do not give good anchorage for ships, but merchants are generally forced to ride at anchor out at sea. This inconvenience Herod endeavoured to rectify, and laid out such a compass towards the land as might be sufficient for a haven, wherein great fleets might lie in safety; and this he effected by putting down huge stones of above fifty feet in length, and not less than eighteen in breadth, and nine in depth, twenty fathoms deep, and as some stones were less, so others were bigger than those dimensions. This mole which he built by the sea-side was too hundred feet long, and half of it was opposed to the force of the waves, so as to keep them off (and so was called break-water), and the other half had upon it a wall, with several towers at intervals, the largest of which was called Drusus, and was a work of very great excellence, and had its name from Drusus, the step-son of Augustus, who died young. There were also a great number of arches, where the mariners dwelt; there was also in front of them a quay which ran round the entire haven, and was a most agreeable walk to such as had a mind for exercise. And the entrance or mouth of the port faced north, which wind brings the clearest sky. And the basis of the whole circuit on the left hand, as you sail into the port, supported a round turret, which was made very strong, in order to resist the greatest waves; while on the right hand stood two huge stones, each of them larger than the turret which was opposite them, which stood upright, and were joined together. And there were edifices all along the circular haven, made of the most polished stone, with a certain elevation in the middle, whereon was erected a temple of Cæsar,<sup>1</sup> visible a great way off to those who were sailing for that haven, which had in it two statues, one of Rome, the other of Cæsar.<sup>1</sup> The city itself was called Cæsarea, and was itself built of fine materials, and handsomely constructed; nay, the very subterranean vaults and cellars had as much care bestowed on them as the buildings above ground. Some of these vaults carried things at regular distances to the haven and to the sea; but one of them ran obliquely, and undergirt all the rest, that both the rain and sewage of the citizens were conveyed away with ease, and the sea itself at full tide entered the city, and washed it all clean. Herod also built therein a theatre of stone; and on the south side of the harbour behind an amphitheatre also, capable of holding a vast number of men, and conveniently situated for a sea view. This city was finished thus in twelve years;<sup>2</sup> during which time the king did not fail both to go on with the work, and to pay the necessary expenses.

How Herod sent his Sons to Rome ; also how he was accused by Zenodorus and the Gadarenes, but was cleared of what they accused him of, and withal gained to himself the Good-will of Augustus. Also concerning the Pharisees, the Essenes, and Manahem.

§ 1.

WHEN Herod was engaged in these matters, and had already built Sebaste [Samaria], he resolved to send his sons Alexander and Aristobulus to Rome, to visit Augustus. And they, when they got there, lodged at the house of Pollio,<sup>1</sup> who was very proud of Herod's friendship ; and they had leave to lodge in Augustus' own palace, for he received these sons of Herod with all kindness, and gave Herod leave to give his kingdom to which of his sons he pleased : and moreover he bestowed on him Trachon,<sup>2</sup> and Batanæa,<sup>3</sup> and Auranitis,<sup>4</sup> which he gave him for the following reason. One Zenodorus had hired the house of Lysanias, and, as he was not satisfied with its revenues, he became a partner with the robbers that infested Trachon, and so got a larger income ; for the inhabitants of that region lived in a mad way, and pillaged the country of the Damascenes, and Zenodorus did not restrain them, but shared himself in the booty. Now, as the neighbouring people were thereby great sufferers, they complained to Varro, who was then president [of Syria], and entreated him to write to Augustus about this wrong-doing of Zenodorus. When these matters were laid before Augustus, he wrote back to Varro to destroy those nests of robbers, and to give the land to Herod, that so by his care the neighbouring countries might be no longer disturbed by these doings of the Trachonites. For it was no easy thing to restrain them, since this habit of robbery had been their usual practice, and they had no other way to get their living, because they had neither any city of their own, nor lands in their possession, but only some dens and caves in the earth, and there they and their cattle lived in common together. However, they had made contrivances to get water, and laid up corn for themselves, and were able to make great resistance, by issuing out on the sudden against any that attacked them. For the entrances of their caves were narrow, so that but one could go in at a time, and the places within were incredibly large and roomy; and the ground over their habitations was not very high, but rather on a plain. And the rocks were altogether hard and difficult of access, unless any one followed the track of another, for these roads are not straight, but have many windings. And when those men were hindered from their wicked preying upon their neighbours, their custom was to prey one upon one another, so that no sort of wrong-doing came amiss to them. But when Herod had received this grant of land from Augustus, and went into this country, he procured skilful guides, and put a stop to their wicked robberies, and gave peace and quietness to the neighbouring people.

§ 2. Thereupon Zenodorus was angry, first because his district was taken away from him, and next even still more because he envied Herod who had got it; so he went up to Rome to accuse him, but returned back again without success. Now Agrippa was [about this time] sent to govern in the name of Augustus the countries beyond the Ionian Sea, and Herod visited him when he was wintering at Mitylene, for he had been his particular friend and companion, and then returned to Judæa again. And some of the Gadarenes went to Agrippa, and accused Herod, but he sent them back bound to the king, without giving them a hearing. And the Arabians, who of old bore ill-will to Herod's sway, were excited, and now attempted to raise a rebellion in his dominions; and, as they thought, for a justifiable reason. For Zenodorus, despairing already of success as to his own affairs, anticipated [his enemies] by selling to those Arabians a part of his district, called Aurantia, for fifty talents; and as this was included in the grant of Augustus, they contested the point with Herod, as being unjustly deprived of what they had bought. Sometimes they did this by making incursions upon him, and sometimes by attempting force against him, and sometimes by going to law with him. Moreover, they persuaded the poorer soldiers to help them, and were hostile to Herod in the constant hope of an insurrection, a thing which those that are in the most miserable circumstances of life most rejoice in. And although Herod had been a long time aware of this, yet did he not act with severity to them, but by reason tried to conciliate them, being unwilling to give any handle for tumults.

§ 3. Now when Herod had already reigned seventeen years, Augustus came into Syria: at which time most of the inhabitants of Gadara<sup>1</sup> clamoured against Herod, as imperious in his orders, and tyrannical. These reproaches they mainly ventured upon by the encouragement and calumny of Zenodorus, who swore that he would never desert them till he had got them severed from Herod's kingdom, and joined to Augustus' jurisdiction. The Gadarenes were induced thereby, and raised no small outcry against Herod, and that the more boldly, because those that had been delivered up by Agrippa to him were not punished by Herod, who let them go, and did them no harm; for indeed he (if anyone) appeared inexorable in punishing crimes in his own family, but very generous in remitting offences that were committed elsewhere. And as they accused Herod of violence and plunder and overthrowing of temples, he stood unconcerned, and was ready to make his defence. However Augustus gave him his right hand, and remitted nothing of his kindness to him, upon this uproar of the multitude; and indeed these things were alleged the first day, but the hearing proceeded no further on the following days. For as the Gadarenes saw the bias of Augustus and of his assessors, and expected, as they had reason to do, that they would be delivered up to the king, some of them, in dread of the torments they might undergo, cut their own throats in the night, and some of them threw themselves down precipices, and others of them cast themselves into the river, and committed suicide; which seemed a sufficient condemnation of the rashness and fault they had been guilty of; and there-upon Augustus without any further delay acquitted Herod of what he was accused of. Another fortunate event also befriended Herod at this time; for Zenodorus' belly burst, and a great quantity of blood issued from him in his illness, and he departed this life at Antioch in Syria. And Augustus bestowed his district, which was no small one, upon Herod; it lay between Trachon and Galilee, and contained Ulatha<sup>1</sup> and Paneas,<sup>2</sup> and the country round about. He also made him one of the procurators of Syria, and commanded that nothing should be done without his approbation; in short, he arrived at that pitch of felicity, that whereas there were but two men that governed the Roman empire, first Augustus, and then Agrippa, who was Augustus' principal favourite, Augustus preferred no one to Herod after Agrippa; and Agrippa made no one his greater friend than Herod except Augustus. And when he had acquired such great influence, he begged of Augustus a tetrarchy<sup>3</sup> for his brother Pheroras, and himself bestowed upon him a revenue of a hundred talents out of his own kingdom, that if he came to any harm himself, his brother might be in safety, and his sons might not have dominion over him. And when he had escorted Augustus to the sea, and had returned home, he built in his honour a most beautiful temple of white stone, in Zenodorus' district, near the place called Panium; <sup>4</sup> where there is a very fine cave in a mountain, under which there is a great cavity in the earth, and the cavern is precipitous, and prodigiously deep, and full of stagnant water;

<sup>3</sup> A tetrarchy properly and originally denoted the fourth part of an entire kingdom or country; and a tetrarch, one that was a ruler of such fourth part; which always implies somewhat less extent of dominion and power than belong to a kingdom and to a king.—W.

over it hangs a vast mountain; and under the cavern arise the springs of the river Jordan. Herod still further adorned this place, which was already a very remarkable one, by the erection of this temple, which he dedicated to Augustus.

§ 4. At this time Herod remitted to his subjects the third part of their taxes, under pretext indeed of relieving them after the dearth they had had; but his main reason was, to recover their good-will, for they were vexed at him because of the innovations he had introduced in their practices, to the dissolution of their religion, and to the disuse of their own customs; and the people everywhere talked against him, like people who were still provoked and put out. Against these discontents he greatly guarded himself, taking away the opportunities the people might have to disturb him, and enjoining them to be always at work; nor did he permit the citizens either to meet together, or to walk or eat together, but watched everything they did. And when any were caught they were severely punished, and there were many who were brought to the citadel Hyrcania,<sup>1</sup> both openly and secretly, and were there put to death; and there were spies set everywhere, both in the city and in the roads, who watched those that met together. Nay, it is reported, that he did not himself neglect this part, but that he would often himself put on the dress of a private man, and mix among the multitude in the night-time, and so find out what opinion they had of his government. And as for those that could no way be induced to acquiesce in his scheme of government, he persecuted them in all manner of ways, while for the rest of the multitude, he required that they should be obliged to take an oath of fidelity to him, and compelled them to swear that they would bear him good-will in his government. And indeed most, either to please him, or out of fear of him, yielded to what he required of them, but such as had more spirit, and were indignant at force, he by one means or other made away with. He endeavoured also to persuade Pollio the Pharisee, and Sameas, and most of their scholars, to take this oath; but they would not submit to do so, nor were they punished with the rest, from the regard he had to Pollio. The Essenes also, as we call a sect of ours, were excused from this necessity. These men live the same kind of life as do those whom the Greeks call Pythagoreans, concerning whom I shall speak more fully elsewhere. However, it is but fit to set down here the reason why Herod held these Essenes in such honour, and thought higher of them than their mortal nature warranted; nor will this account be unsuitable to the nature of this history, as it will show the opinion men had of these Essenes.

§ 5. One of these Essenes, whose name was Manahem, had this testimony, that he not only conducted his life in an excellent manner, but had also the foreknowledge of future events given him by God. This man once saw Herod when he was but a lad, and going to school, and saluted him as king of the Jews; but he thinking that either he did not know him, or that he was in jest, reminded him that he was but a private person; but Manahem quietly smiled and clapped him on the backside with his hand, and said, "However that be, thou wilt be king, and wilt begin thy reign happily, for God finds thee worthy of it. And do thou remember the blows that Manahem has given thee, as a token to thee of the change of thy fortunes. And truly this will be the best determination for thee, that thou love justice and piety towards God, and clemency towards the citizens; yet do I know thy whole conduct, that thou wilt not be such a one. For thou wilt excel all men in good fortune and obtain an everlasting reputation, but wilt forget piety and justice. And these crimes will not be concealed from God, for at the conclusion of thy life thou wilt find that he will be mindful of them, and punish thee for them." Now at the time Herod did not attend at all to what Manahem said, having no hopes of such advancement; but afterwards, when he was so fortunate as to be advanced by degrees to the dignity of king, and was at the height of his power, he sent for Manahem, and asked him, How long he should reign? Manahem did not tell him the full length of his reign, so upon his silence he asked him further, Whether he should reign ten years, or not? when he replied, "Yes, twenty, nay, thirty years," but did not state the precise period of his reign. Herod was satisfied with this answer however, and gave Manahem his hand, and dismissed him, and from that time he continued to honour all the Essenes. I have thought it proper to relate this to my readers, however strange it seems, and to declare what has happened among us, because many of the Essenes have, by their excellent virtue, been honoured [by God] by the knowledge of divine things.

CHAP. XI.

How Herod rebuilt the Temple, and raised it higher, and made it more magnificent than it was before; as also concerning the Tower which he called Antonia.

§ 1.

AND now Herod, in the eighteenth year of his reign, and after the acts already mentioned, undertook a very great work, that is to build at his own expense the temple of God, and to make it larger in compass, and to raise it to a most magnificent height, esteeming it to be the most glorious of all his actions, as it really was, to bring it to perfection, and thinking this would be sufficient for an everlasting memorial of him. But as he knew the multitude were not ready nor willing to assist him in so great a design, he thought to prepare them first by making a speech to them, and then set about the work itself, so he called them together, and spoke to them as follows. "I think I need not speak to you, fellow countrymen, about such other works as I have done since I came to the kingdom, although I may say they have been performed in such a manner as to bring more security to you than glory to myself: for I have neither been negligent in the most difficult times about what tended to ease your necessities, nor have the buildings I have erected been so much to preserve me as yourselves from injuries; and I imagine that, with God's assistance, I have advanced the nation of the Jews to a degree of prosperity which they never had before. And as for the particular edifices belonging to your own country, and your own cities, that we have lately acquired, which we have erected and greatly adorned, and so augmented the dignity of your nation, it seems to me a needless task to enumerate them to you, since you well know them yourselves. But as to the undertaking which I have a mind to set about at present, and which will be a work of the greatest piety and excellence in our power, I will now speak about it to you. Our fathers, indeed, when they returned from Babylon, built this temple to Almighty God, yet does it want sixty cubits in height compared with the first temple which Solomon built. But let no one condemn our fathers for negligence or want of piety herein, for it was not their fault that the temple was no higher; for it was Cyrus and Darius (the son of Hystaspes) who determined the measures for its rebuilding; and because of the subjection of those fathers of ours to them and to their posterity, and after them to the Macedonians, they had not opportunity to follow the archetype of this holy edifice, nor could they raise it to its ancient height. But since I am now, by God's will, your governor, and have had peace a long time, and have gained great riches, and large revenues, and, what is the principal thing of all, am at amity with and favourably regarded by the Romans, who, if I may so say, are the rulers of the whole world, I will do my endeavour to correct that imperfection which has arisen from necessity and the slavery which we were under formerly, and to make a thankful return in the most pious manner to God, for the blessings I have received from him in giving me this kingdom, by rendering his temple as complete as I am able."

§ 2. Such was the speech which Herod made to them, but still it astonished most of the people, being unexpected by them; and because it seemed incredible to hope, it did not encourage them, but put a damper upon them, for they were afraid that he would pull down the whole edifice, and not be able to bring his intentions for rebuilding it to perfection, and this danger appeared to them to be very great, and the vastness of the undertaking to be such as could hardly be accomplished. But while they were in this disposition, the king encouraged them, and told them, he would not pull down their temple till all things were got ready for building it up entirely again. And as he promised them this beforehand, so he did not break his word with them, but got ready a thousand waggons, that were to bring stone for the building,<sup>1</sup> and chose out ten thousand of the most skilful workmen, and bought a thousand sacerdotal garments for as many of the priests, and had some of them taught how to be builders, and others how to be carpenters, and then began to build, but not till everything was well prepared for the work.

§ 3. And Herod took up the old foundations, and laid others, and erected the temple upon them, which was in length a hundred cubits, and in height twenty additional cubits, which [twenty,] upon the sinking of their foundations,<sup>2</sup> fell down; and this part it was that we decreed to raise again in the days of Nero. Now the temple was built of stones that were white and strong, and the length of each was twenty-five cubits, the height eight, and the breadth about twelve.<sup>3</sup> And the whole structure, as was also the structure of the royal portico, was on each side much lower, but the middle was much higher, so that it was visible to those that dwelt in the country for many furlongs, but chiefly to such as lived opposite, or approached

<sup>2</sup> Some of our modern students in architecture have made a strange blunder here, when they imagine that Josephus affirms the entire foundation of the temple, or holy house, sunk down into the rocky mountain on which it stood, no less than twenty cubits; whereas he is clear, that they were the foundations of the additional twenty cubits only above the hundred, (made perhaps weak on purpose, and only for show and grandeur,) that sunk or fell down, as Dr. Hudson rightly understands him; nor is the thing itself possible in the other sense. Agrippa's preparation for building the inner parts of the temple twenty cubits higher, (Jewish War, v. 1, § 5,) must, in all probability, refer to this matter, since Josephus says here, that this which had fallen down was designed to be raised up again under Nero, under whom Agrippa made that preparation. But what Josephus says presently, that Solomon was the first king of the Jews, appears by the parallel place, Antiq. xx. 9, § 7, and other places, to be meant only the first of David's posterity, and the first builder of the temple.—W.

<sup>3</sup> Josephus here gives the size of one or two of the largest stones in the wall, and has rather exaggerated the height of the courses. The stones have weathered a yellowish brown; when fresh from the quarry they must have been of a pearly white colour.

it. The temple had doors also at the entrance, and lintels over them, of the same height as the temple itself. They were adorned with embroidered veils, with flowers of purple, and pillars interwoven; and over these, but under the cornices, was spread out a golden vine, with its clusters hanging down from a great height, the size and fine workmanship of which was a surprising sight to the spectators to see, such vast materials were there, and with such great skill was the workmanship done. He also surrounded the entire temple with very large porticoes, contriving them all in due proportion, and he laid out larger sums of money than had ever been done before, till it seemed that no one else had so greatly adorned the temple as he did. There was a large wall to both the porticoes, which wall was itself the most prodigious work that was ever heard of by man. The hill was a rocky ascent, that sloped gradually towards the east of the city up to its topmost peak. This hill it was which Solomon, who was the first of our kings, surrounded by divine revelation with a wall of excellent workmanship above and round the top of it.<sup>1</sup> He also built a wall below, beginning at the bottom, which was encompassed by a deep valley; and on the south side he laid rocks together, and bound them to one another with lead, and included some of the inner parts, till it proceeded to a great depth, and till both the size of the square edifice, and its altitude, were immense, and till the vastness of the stones in the front were plainly visible on the outside, and the inward parts were fastened together with iron, and preserved the joints immoveable for all time. When this work was joined together to the very top of the hill, he wrought it all into one outward surface, and filled up the hollow places which were about the wall, and made it a level on the external upper surface, and a smooth level also. This hill was walled all round, and in compass four furlongs, each angle containing a furlong in length;<sup>2</sup> but within this wall, and on the very top of all, there ran another wall of stone also, having on the east ridge a double portico of the same length as the wall; in the midst of which was the temple itself. This portico faced the gates of the temple; and it had been adorned by many kings in former times. And round about the entire temple were fixed the spoils taken from barbarous nations; all these were dedicated to the temple by Herod, who added those he had taken from the Arabians.

§ 4. Now in an angle on the north side [of the temple] was built a citadel, well fortified and of extraordinary strength. This citadel was built before Herod by the kings of the Asamonæan race, who were also high priests, and they called it the Tower, and in it were deposited the vestments of the high priest, which the high priest only put on at the time when he was to offer sacrifice.<sup>1</sup> These vestments king Herod kept in that place, and after his death they were in the power of the Romans, until the days of Tiberius Cæsar; in whose reign Vitellius, the governor of Syria, when he visited Jerusalem, and was most magnificently received by the multitude, had a mind to make them some requital for the kindness they had showed him; so, upon their petition to have those holy vestments in their own power, he wrote about them to Tiberius Cæsar, who granted his request; and this power over the sacerdotal vestments continued with the Jews till the death of king Agrippa. And after him Cassius Longinus, who was governor of Syria, and Cuspius Fadus, who was procurator of Judæa, bade the Jews deposit those vestments in the Tower of Antonia, on the plea that the Romans ought to have them in their power, as they had formerly had. However, the Jews sent ambassadors to Claudius Cæsar, to intercede with him as to this matter, on whose coming king Agrippa, junior, being then at Rome, asked for and obtained power over them from the emperor, who ordered Vitellius, who was then commander in Syria, to give it them accordingly. Before that time, they were kept under the seal of the high priest, and of the treasurers of the temple, which treasurers, the day before a festival, went up to the

Roman commander of the fortress, and viewed their own seal, and received the vestments; and again, when the festival was over, brought them back to the same place, and showed the commander of the fortress their seal, which corresponded with his seal, and deposited them there. And that these things were so, the afflictions that happened to us afterwards [about them] are sufficient evidence. As for the tower itself, when Herod the king of the Jews had fortified it more firmly than before, in order to secure and guard the temple, he gave the Tower the name of Antonia, to gratify Antony, who was his friend and a ruler of the Romans.

§ 5. Now in the western part of the enclosure of the temple there were four gates; the first led to the king's palace, and went to a passage over the intermediate valley; two more led to the suburbs of the city; and the last led to the rest of the city, where the road descended down into the valley by a great number of steps, and thence up again to the ascent.<sup>1</sup> For the city lay opposite the temple like a theatre, and was encompassed with a deep valley along the entire south quarter. But the fourth front of the temple, facing south, had indeed itself gates in its midst, and over it the royal portico, which was triple and reached in length from the east valley unto that on the west, for it was impossible it should reach any further: and this portico deserves to be mentioned better than any other under the sun. For as the valley was very deep, and its bottom could not be seen if you looked from above into the depth, the high elevation of the portico stood upon that height, that if any one looked down from the top of the roof to those depths, he would be giddy, while his sight could not reach down to such an abyss. And there were pillars that stood in four rows one over-against the other all along (for the fourth row was interwoven into the wall, which was built of stone), and the thickness of each pillar was such, that three men might with their arms extended span it, and its length was twenty-seven feet, with a double spiral at its base. And the number of all the pillars was a hundred and sixty-two. Their chapters were made with sculptures in the Corinthian style, that caused amazement from the grandeur of the whole. These four rows of pillars included three intervals for walking in the middle of the portico; two of which walks were made parallel to each other, and were contrived in the same manner; the breadth of each of them was thirty feet, the length a furlong,<sup>1</sup> and the height above fifty feet, but the breadth of the middle part of the cloister was one and a half of the other, and the height was double, for it was much higher than those on each side. And the roofs were adorned with deep carving in wood, representing many sorts of figures: the middle was much higher than the rest, and the wall in front was adorned with lintels, resting upon pillars that were interwoven into it, and the front was all of polished stone; insomuch, that its fineness, to such as had not seen it, was incredible, and to such as had seen it, was marvellous. Such was the first enclosure, and in the midst, not far from it, was the second, to be ascended to by a few steps; this was surrounded by a stone wall for a partition, with an inscription forbidding any foreigner to enter under pain of death. Now, this inner enclosure had on its south and north sides three gates, equi-distant from one another; but on the east side, towards the sunrising, there was one large gate, through which such as were pure went in with their wives. But within was a sanctuary not open to the women; and still further within was there a third sanctuary, which it was not lawful for any but the priests to enter. The temple itself was within this, and before it was the altar, upon which we offer our sacrifices and burnt-offerings to God. Into none of these three did king Herod enter, for he was forbidden because he was not a priest. However, he laboured at the porticoes, and the outer enclosures, and these he built in eight years.

§ 6. And the temple itself was built by the priests in a year and six months, upon which all the people were full of joy, and returned thanks in the first place to God for the speed with which it was finished, and in the next place for the zeal the king had shown, feasting and celebrating this rebuilding of the temple. As for the king, he sacrificed three hundred oxen to God, as did the rest, every one according to his ability; the number of which sacrifices is not possible to be set down, for it cannot be that we should truly relate it. For at the same time as this celebration of the work about the temple, fell also the day of the king's inauguration, which he kept of old as a festival, and it now coincided with the other, which coincidence of both made the festival most notable.

§ 7. There was also an underground passage built for the king, which led from Antonia to the inner temple to its eastern gate, above which he also erected for himself a tower, that he might have the opportunity of an underground ascent to the temple, in order to guard against any rebellion which might be made by the people against their kings. It is also reported that, during the time that the temple was building, it did not rain in the daytime, but showers fell in the night, so that the work was not hindered. And this our fathers have handed down to us, nor is it incredible, if any one looks to the other manifestations of God. And thus was performed the work of the rebuilding of the temple.

BOOK XVI.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF TWELVE YEARS.—FROM THE FINISHING OF THE TEMPLE BY HEROD TO THE DEATH OF ALEXANDER AND ARISTOBULUS.

CHAP. I.

A Law of Herod about Housebreakers. Salome and Pheroras calumniate Alexander and Aristobulus upon their Return from Rome, for whom Herod yet provides Wives.

§ 1.

AS king Herod was very zealous in the administration of all his affairs, and desirous to put a stop to particular acts of injustice which were done by criminals in the city and country, he made a law no way like our original laws, which he enacted of himself, to sell housebreakers to be taken out of his kingdom, which punishment was not only grievous to be borne by the offenders, but contained in it an infringement of the customs of our forefathers. For slavery to foreigners and such as did not live after the manner of the Jews, and necessity to do whatever such men should command, was an offence against our religion rather than a punishment to such as were found to have offended, such a punishment being avoided in our original laws. For those laws ordained that the thief should restore fourfold, and if he had not so much, he should be sold indeed, but not to foreigners, nor so as to be in perpetual slavery, for he had to be released after six years. But this law, thus enacted in order to introduce a severe and illegal punishment, seemed to be a piece of arrogance in Herod, as he did not act as a king but as a tyrant, and thus contemptuously, and without any regard to his subjects, ventured to introduce such a punishment. Now this penalty, thus brought into practice, was like Herod's other actions, and became one of the charges brought against him, and caused hatred to himself.

§ 2. Now at this time it was that he sailed to Italy, being very desirous to meet Augustus, and to see his own sons who lived at Rome. And Augustus was not only very obliging to him in other respects, but delivered him his sons again, that he might take them home with him, as they had already completed their education. And as soon as the young men returned from Italy, the people were very desirous to see them, and they became the observed of all observers, being adorned with great blessings of fortune, and having the countenances of persons of royal dignity. So they at once appeared to be the objects of envy to Salome the king's sister, and to those who had done Mariamne to death with their calumnies; for they were suspicious, that when these sons of her's came to the throne, they should be punished for the wickedness they had been guilty of against their mother. So they made this very fear of theirs a motive to raise calumnies against them also; and gave it out that they were not pleased with their father's company, because he had put their mother to death, as if it did not appear agreeable to piety to live with their mother's murderer. Now, by retailing these stories, that were untrue<sup>1</sup> and only built on probabilities, they were able to do them mischief, and to take away that kindness from his sons which Herod had before borne to them. For they did not say these things to him outright, but scattered abroad such words among the multitude generally; from which words, when carried to Herod, hatred was by degrees generated, which natural affection itself, even by length of time, was not able to overcome. Yet did the king at this period prefer the natural affection of a father to all the suspicions and calumnies his sons lay under; and he honoured them as he ought to do, and married them to wives, now they were grown up. To Aristobulus he gave for wife Berenice Salome's daughter, and to Alexander Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus king of Cappadocia.

CHAP. II.

How Herod twice sailed to Agrippa; and how, upon the complaint of the Jews in Ionia against the Greeks, Agrippa confirmed the Laws of the Jews to them.

§ 1.

WHEN Herod had despatched these affairs, on hearing that Marcus Agrippa had sailed again from Italy to Asia, he hastened to him, and besought him to come to his kingdom, and receive that welcome he might justly expect from one that had been his guest and friend. This request he urgently pressed, and Agrippa agreed to it, and came into Judæa. And Herod omitted nothing that might please him, but entertained him in his new-built cities, and showed him the edifices he had built, and provided all sorts of the best and most costly dainties for him and his friends, and showed him Sebaste, and the port that he had built at Cæsarea, and the fortresses which he had erected at great expense, as Alexandrium<sup>1</sup> and Herodium<sup>2</sup> and Hyrcania. He also conducted him to the city of Jerusalem, where all the people met him in their festival garments, and received him with acclamations. Agrippa also offered a hetacomb to God, and feasted the people, without omitting any of the greatest dainties. As for himself he enjoyed himself so much there, that he abode many days with them, and would willingly have stayed longer, but that the season of the year made him haste away; for, as winter was coming on, he thought it not safe to sail later, as he was obliged to return again to Ionia.

§ 2. So Agrippa sailed away, after Herod had bestowed many presents on him, and on the chief persons of his suite. And king Herod, when he had passed the winter in his own dominions, made haste to join him again in the spring, as he knew he meant to go on a campaign to the Bosphorus. So when he had sailed by Rhodes and Cos, he touched at Lesbos,<sup>3</sup> thinking he should find

Agrippa there, but he was delayed there by a north wind, which hindered his ship from entering port. So he continued many days at Chios, and there he kindly treated a great many that came to him, and obliged them by giving them royal gifts; and when he saw that the portico of the city was fallen down (which, as it was overthrown in the Mithridatic war, and was a very large and fine building, was not so easy to rebuild as the rest) he furnished a sum not only large enough for that purpose, but more than sufficient to finish the building, and ordered them not to neglect that portico, but to rebuild it quickly, that so the city might recover its principal ornament. And when the wind ceased, he sailed to Mytilene,<sup>1</sup> and thence to Byzantium;<sup>2</sup> and when he heard that Agrippa had sailed beyond the Cyanean rocks,<sup>3</sup> he made all the haste possible to overtake him, and came up with him at Sinope<sup>4</sup> in Pontus. He was sighted by the fleet most unexpectedly, but appeared to their great joy; and many friendly greetings passed between Agrippa and him, for Agrippa thought he had received the greatest marks of Herod's kindness and affection towards him possible, since he had come so long a voyage, and at a very fit season for his assistance, and had left the administration of his own dominions, and thought it better worth his while to come to him. Accordingly, Herod was all in all to Agrippa in the management of the war, and a great assistant in civil affairs, and in giving advice as to particular matters. He was also a pleasant companion for Agrippa when he relaxed himself, and a partner with him in all things, in difficulties because of his good-will, and in prosperity because of the respect Agrippa had for him. Now as soon as they had finished those affairs in Pontus, for which Agrippa was sent there, they did not think fit to return by sea, but passed through Paphlagonia and Cappadocia, and travelled thence by land over great Phrygia, and came to Ephesus, and then sailed across from Ephesus to Samos. And indeed Herod bestowed a great many benefits on every city that he came to, according as they stood in need of them; for as for those that wanted either money or kind treatment, he was not wanting to them, but supplied the former himself at his own expense; he also became an intercessor with Agrippa for all such as sought after his favour, and he so managed that the petitioners failed in none of their suits to him, Agrippa being himself of a good disposition, and of great generosity, and ready to grant all such requests as might be advantageous to the petitioners, provided they were not to the detriment of others. The inclination of Herod was of very great weight to stimulate Agrippa, who was himself not slow to do good; for he made a reconciliation between him and the people of Ilium,<sup>1</sup> with whom he was angry, and paid the money the people of Chios owed Augustus' agents, and relieved them of their tribute; and helped all others according as their several necessities required.

§ 3. But now when Agrippa and Herod were in Ionia, a great number of Jews, who dwelt in their cities, came to them, and seizing the opportunity and freedom now given them, laid before them the injuries which they suffered, as they were not permitted to use their own laws, but were compelled to prosecute their lawsuits by the ill-usage of the judges upon their holy days, and were deprived of the money they used to send to Jerusalem, and were forced into the army and into other services, and obliged to spend their sacred money, from which burdens they always used to be freed by the Romans, who had still permitted them to live according to their own laws. As they vociferated this, the king desired of Agrippa that he would hear their cause, and assigned Nicolaus, one of his friends, to plead for their privileges. Accordingly, when Agrippa had called the principal of the Romans, and such of the kings and rulers as were there, to be his assessors, Nicolaus stood up, and pleaded for the Jews as follows.

Agrippa, on all who are in distress to have recourse to those that have it in their power to free them from injury, and those that are now your suppliants, approach you with great assurance. For as they have formerly often found you what they wished, they now only entreat that you, who have been the donors, will take care that those favours you have already granted them shall not be taken away from them. We have received these favours from you, who alone have power to grant them, but have them taken from us by such as are no greater than ourselves, and by such as know they are as much subjects as we are. And certainly, if persons have been vouchsafed great favours, it is to their commendation who have obtained them, as having been found deserving of such great favours; and if those favours be but small ones, it is dishonourable for the donors not to confirm them. And as to those that thwart the Jews and use them ill, it is evident that they affront not only the receivers of these favours, as they will not allow those to be worthy men to whom their excellent rulers themselves have borne testimony, but also the donors, as they desire that those favours already granted may be abrogated. Now if any one were to ask them which of the two they would rather part with, their lives, or the customs of their forefathers, as their solemn processions, their sacrifices, and their festivals, which they celebrate in honour of those they suppose to be gods, I know very well that they would choose to suffer anything whatever, rather than to give up any of the customs of their forefathers. For most choose rather to go to war on that account, being very solicitous not to transgress in such matters: and indeed we measure that happiness which all mankind do now enjoy owing to you by this very thing, that we are allowed every one to worship and live as our institutions require. And although they would not like to be thus treated themselves, yet do they endeavour to compel others to comply with them, as if it were not as great an instance of impiety, to profanely dissolve the religious solemnities of others, as to be negligent in the observance of their own duty towards their gods. And now let us consider another case. Is there any people or city, or community of men, to whom your government and the Roman power does not appear to be the greatest blessing? Is there any one that can desire to make void the favours thence proceeding? No one is certainly so mad: for there are no men who have not been partakers of those favours both publicly and privately; and indeed those that take away what you have granted, can have no assurance but that every one of their own grants made them by you may be taken from them also. And yet these grants of yours can never be sufficiently valued; for if people were to compare the old government under kings with the present government, besides the great number of benefits which this government has bestowed on them for their happiness, this is above all the rest, that they appear to be no longer in a state of slavery but of freedom. Now our circumstances, even at the best, are not such as deserve to be envied, for we are indeed in a prosperous state through you, but only in common with all others; and we desire no more than this, to preserve our national religion without any prohibition; which as it appears not in itself a privilege to be grudged us, so is it for the advantage of those that grant it to us; for if the divinity delights in being honoured, he delights also in those that permit him to be honoured. And there are none of our customs which are inhuman, but all are pious and devoted to the preservation of justice; nor do we conceal these precepts of ours, by which we govern our lives, as they are suggesters of piety, and of friendliness to men: and the seventh day we set apart from labour for the learning of our customs and laws,<sup>1</sup> as we think it proper to reflect on them, as well as on any [good] thing else, in order to avoid sin. If any one, therefore, examine our customs, he will find that they are good in themselves, and that they are ancient also, though some think otherwise, so that those who have received them cannot easily be brought to depart from them, from the honour they pay to the length of time they have religiously observed them.

<sup>1</sup> We may here observe the ancient practice of the Jews, of dedicating the Sabbath-day not to idleness, but to the learning their sacred rights and religious customs, and to meditation on the law of Moses. The like to which we meet with elsewhere in Josephus, as Against Apion, i. § 22.—W.

Now our adversaries are for unjustly taking our privileges away, they violently seize upon that money of ours which is offered to God, and called sacred money, and that openly in a sacrilegious manner; and they impose tribute upon us, and bring us before tribunals and make us do other services on holy days, not because the laws require it, or for their own advantage, but because they would put an affront on our religion, which they know as well as we, indulging themselves in an unjust and involuntary hatred. For your government over all your subjects is one, and tends to the establishing of benevolence and abolishing of ill-will among such as are disposed to it. This then is what we implore of thee, most mighty Agrippa, that we may not be ill-treated; that we may not be abused; that we may not be hindered from following our own customs; nor be despoiled of our goods; nor be forced by these men to do what we ourselves do not force them to do: for these privileges of ours are not only according to justice, but have also been granted us by you. And we are able to read to you many decrees of the senate, and the tablets that contain them, which are still extant in the Capitol, concerning these things, which it is evident were granted after you had experience of our fidelity towards you, and which would be valid, even if no such fidelity had previously been shown by us. For you have hitherto preserved what people were in possession of, not to us only but to almost all men, and have added greater advantages than they could have hoped for, and thereby your sway has become a great advantage to them. And if any one were to enumerate the benefits you have conferred on every nation, he would never put an end to his discourse; but that we may prove that we are not unworthy of all those advantages we have obtained, it will be sufficient for us to say nothing of other things, but to speak freely of the king who now governs us, and is one of thy assessors. For indeed, in what instance of good-will, as to your house, has he been deficient? What mark of fidelity to it has he omitted? What token of honour has he not devised? What occasion of assisting you has he not regarded first? What hinders, therefore, but that your kindnesses may be as numerous as his so great benefits to you have been?

It may also perhaps be fit here not to pass over in silence the valour of his father Antipater, who, when Cæsar made an expedition into Egypt, assisted him with two thousand armed men, and proved second to none, either in the battles on land, or in the management of the fleet. And what need to say anything of the great importance those soldiers were at that juncture? or how many and how great presents they were vouchsafed by Cæsar? And truly I ought before now to have mentioned the letters which Cæsar wrote to the senate at that time, and how Antipater had public honours, and the freedom of the city of Rome bestowed upon him. For these are proofs that we have received these favours by our own deserts, and so we petition thee for thy confirmation of them, from whom we should have had reason to hope for them, even though they had not been given us before, looking both to our king's disposition towards you, and your disposition towards him. We have also been informed by those Jews, that were there, with what kindness thou camest into our country, and how thou offeredst perfect sacrifices to God, and honoured him with perfect vows, and how thou gavest the people a feast, and didst accept their own hospitable presents to thee. We ought to esteem all these kind entertainments made both by our nation and city to a man who has management of so much of the public affairs, as indications of that friendship which thou feelest in return to the Jewish nation, and which has been procured them by the family of Herod. So we put thee in mind of these things, in the presence of the king now sitting by thee, and make our request for no more but this, that what you have given us yourselves, you will not see taken away from us by others."

§ 5. When Nicolaus had made this speech, there was no opposition made to it by the Greeks, for this was not an inquiry made as in a court of justice, but a petition to prevent violence being offered to the Jews any longer. Nor did the Greeks deny that they had done so, but their excuse was that as the Jews inhabited their country, they were entirely unjust to them [in not joining in their worship]. But the Jews proved that they were natives, and that, though they worshipped according to their own institutions, they did nothing to harm them. So Agrippa, perceiving that they had been oppressed by violence, made the following answer: that because of Herod's good-will and friendship, he was ready to grant the Jews whatever they should ask him, and that their requests seemed to him in themselves just; and that if they requested anything further, he should not scruple to grant it them, provided it was no way to the detriment of the Roman empire; and that, while their request was no more than this, that the privileges they had already had given them might not be abrogated, he confirmed this to them, that they might continue in the observance of their own customs, without any one offering them injury." And when he had said this, he dissolved the assembly; upon which Herod stood up, and saluted him, and gave him thanks for the kind disposition he showed to them. Agrippa took this in a very obliging manner, and saluted him back, and embraced him, and then left Lesbos.<sup>1</sup> But Herod determined to sail homewards, and when he had taken his leave of Agrippa, he set sail, and landed at Cæsarea<sup>2</sup> in a few days' time, having favourable winds, from whence he went to Jerusalem, and there gathered all the people together to an assembly, not a few being there from the country also. So he came forward, and gave a particular account of all his journey, and of the affairs of all the Jews in Asia, and how owing to him they would live without injurious treatment for the time to come. He also told them of all the good fortune he had met with, and how he had administered the government, and had not neglected anything which was for their advantage; and as he was very joyful, he now remitted to them the fourth part of their taxes for the last year. And they were so pleased with his favour and speech to them, that they went their ways with great gladness, and wished the king all manner of happiness.

CHAP. III.

How great Disturbances arose in Herod's Family because of his preferring Antipater, his eldest Son, to the rest, and how Alexander took that Injury very much to heart.

§ 1.

BUT now the affairs in Herod's family grew to more disorder, and became worse and worse, from the hatred of Salome to the young men [Alexander and Aristobulus], which descended as it were by inheritance [from their mother Mariamne]; and as she had completely succeeded against their mother, so she proceeded to that degree of reckless daring as to endeavour that none of her posterity might be left alive, who might have it in their power to revenge her murder. The young men had also somewhat of a haughty and ill-affected air towards their father, occasioned by the remembrance of what their mother had unjustly suffered, and by their own desire for reigning. The old grudge was again renewed, and they cast reproaches on Salome and Pheroras, who requited the young men with malice and laid treacherous snares for them. As for this hatred, it was equal on both sides, but the manner of showing it was different; for as for the young men they were rash, reproaching and affronting Salome and Pheroras openly, being inexperienced enough to think it most noble to declare their minds in that frank manner; but Salome and Pheroras did not take that method, but made use of calumnies in subtle and spiteful manner, provoking the young men on every occasion, and imagining that their boldness might in time come to offering violence to their father. For inasmuch as they were not ashamed of the pretended crimes of their mother, and thought she suffered unjustly, Salome and Pheroras supposed that their feelings might at length exceed all bounds, and might induce them to think they ought to be avenged on their father, even though they despatched him with their own hands. At last it came to this, that the whole city was full of talk of this kind, and, as is usual in such contests, the inexperience of the young men was pitied, but the contrivance of Salome was too much for them, and the imputations she laid upon them came to be believed owing to their own conduct. For they were so deeply affected at the death of their mother, that while they said both she and themselves were in a miserable case, they vehemently complained of her pitiable end, which indeed was truly such, and said that they were themselves in a pitiable case also, because they were forced to live with those that had been her murderers, and likely to experience the same treatment.

§ 2. These family feuds increased greatly, and the king's absence abroad afforded a fit opportunity for their increase. And as soon as Herod had returned, and had made his speech to the multitude, Pheroras and Salome immediately let fall words as if he were in great danger, and as if the young men openly threatened that they would not spare him any longer, but revenge their mother's death upon him. They also added another circumstance, that their hopes were fixed on Archelaus, the king of Cappadocia, that they should be able through him to go to Augustus and accuse their father. Herod was immediately disturbed at hearing such things, and indeed was the more dismayed because the same things were related to him by some other persons also. This recalled to his mind his former calamity, and he reflected that family troubles had hindered him from enjoying any comfort from those that were dearest to him, and from his wife whom he loved so well; and suspecting that his future troubles would be even heavier and greater than those that were past, he was in great confusion of mind. For divine Providence had indeed conferred upon him a great many outward advantages for his happiness, even beyond his hopes, but the troubles he had at home were such as he had never expected to have met with, and rendered him unfortunate; nay, both good and bad fortune happened to him more than one could have anticipated, and made it a doubtful question, whether, upon the comparison of both, it was desirable to have had so much success in outward things with such great misfortunes at home, or whether it would not have been better to avoid family troubles, though he had never possessed the admired grandeur of a kingdom.

§ 3. As he was thus embarrassed and unhappy, in order to put down these young men, he summoned to his court another of his sons, that was born to him when he was a private individual (whose name was Antipater), but he did not indulge him then as he did afterwards, when he was quite mastered by him, and let him do everything he pleased, but rather in the design of repressing the insolence of the sons of Mariamne, and managing this elevation of his so, that it might be for a warning to them; for their audacity would not (he thought) be so great, if they were once persuaded that the succession to the kingdom did not appertain to them alone, or need of necessity come to them. So he introduced Antipater as their rival, and imagined this a good plan for abating their pride, and that after this was done to the young men, there might be a likelihood of their being of a better disposition. But the event proved other than he expected. For the young men thought he had done them a very great injury, and as Antipater was a shrewd man, when he had once obtained this position, and begun to expect greater things than he had before hoped for, he had but one design, and that was to hurt his brothers, and not to yield them the pre-eminence, but to stick to his father, who was already alienated from them by calumnies, and easy to be worked upon in any way his zeal against them urged him to pursue, that he might be continually more and more severe against them. Accordingly, all the reports that were spread abroad came from him, while he avoided himself the suspicion of those discoveries coming from him, for he mainly used those persons as his creatures who were unsuspected, and such as might be believed to speak truth because of the goodwill they bore to the king. And indeed there were already not a few who paid court to Antipater in hopes of gaining somewhat by him, and these were the men who most of all persuaded Herod, because they appeared to speak thus out of their goodwill to him. And while these accusations from various sources corroborated each other, the young men themselves afforded further occasion for suspicion. For they were observed to shed tears often, on account of the dishonour that was done them, and often had their mother in their mouths, and among their friends openly ventured to reproach their father as not acting justly by them; all which things were with an evil intention kept in memory by Antipater for a fit season, and when they were repeated to Herod with exaggerations, increased very much the family troubles. For as the king was very angry at what was alleged against the sons of Mariamne, and was desirous to humble them, he still increased the honours that he bestowed on Antipater; and was at last so much under his influence that he actually brought his mother to court. He also wrote frequently to Augustus in his favour, and most earnestly recommended him to him. And when Agrippa was returning to Rome, after he had finished his ten years' government in Asia, Herod sailed from Judæa, and when he met with Agrippa, he had none with him but Antipater, whom he delivered to him, that he might take him along with him, together with many presents, that so he might become Augustus' friend; insomuch, that things already looked as if he had all his father's favour, and that the young men were entirely shut out of any hopes of the kingdom.

CHAP. IV.

§ 1.

AND now what happened during Antipater's absence augmented the honour to which he had been promoted, and his apparent eminence above his brothers, for he made a great figure in Rome, because Herod had recommended him by letter to all his friends there. Only he was grieved that he was not at home, and had no opportunities for perpetually calumniating his brothers; and his chief fear was, lest his father should alter his mind, and entertain a more favourable opinion of the sons of Mariamne. And as he had this in his mind, he did not desist from his purpose, but continually sent from Rome any such stories as he hoped might grieve and irritate his father against his brothers, under pretence indeed of a deep concern for his preservation, but in truth, such as his malignity suggested, in order to add to his hope of the succession, which yet was already great in itself; and thus he did till he had excited such a degree of anger and indignation in Herod, that he was already become very ill-disposed towards the young men. But as he shrank from publicly showing his violent disgust with them, that he might not either be too remiss or too rash, and so offend, he thought it best to sail to Rome, and there accuse his sons before Augustus, and not to indulge himself in any such act as might from its enormity be suspected of impiety. And on his going up to Rome, it happened that he hastened to meet Augustus at the city of Aquileia; <sup>1</sup> and when he came to speech with Augustus, he asked for a time for hearing this great cause, wherein he thought himself very miserable, and produced his sons there, and accused them of their desperate conspiracy against him. He said that they were enemies to him, and did their utmost to show their hatred to him their father, and wished to take away his life in the most barbarous manner, and so obtain his kingdom, which he had authority from Cæsar to dispose of, not by necessity but by choice, to him who should show the greatest piety towards him. He said also that his sons were not so desirous of ruling, as they were (upon being disappointed thereof) to expose their own lives, if they might but deprive their father of his life, so wild and polluted had their minds become from their hatred to him. And whereas he had a long time borne this misfortune, he was now compelled (he said) to lay it before Augustus, and to pollute his ears with the hearing of it. And yet what severity had they ever suffered from him? or what hardships had he ever laid upon them to make them complain of him? and how could they think it just, that he should not be lord of that kingdom, which he had gained in a long time and with great danger, and that they should not allow him to keep it, and dispose of it to him who should deserve best? And that, with other advantages, he proposed as a reward for the piety of such a one as would hereafter imitate the care he had taken of it, and such a one would gain so great a requital. But it was an impious thing for them to intrigue for it beforehand, for he who had ever the kingdom in his view, at the same time reckoned on the death of his father, because otherwise he could not come to the throne. As for himself, he had hitherto given them all that he was able, and all that was fit for such as were subject to royal authority, and were the sons of a king, pomp and servants, and delicate fare, and had married them into the most illustrious families, Aristobulus to his sister's daughter, and Alexander to the daughter of king Archelaus. And what was the greatest favour of all, though their crimes were so very bad, and he had authority to punish them, yet had he not made use of it against them, but had brought them before Augustus, their common benefactor, and had not used the severity which he might have done, either as a father who had been impiously treated, or as a king who had been conspired against, but made them stand upon the same level as himself in judgment. Lastly he said that it was necessary that all this should not be passed over without punishment, nor he himself live in the greatest fears; nay, that it was not for their own advantage to see the light of the sun after what they had aimed at, even if they should escape that time, since they had done the vilest things that ever were known among mankind, and would certainly suffer the greatest punishment.

§ 2. These were the accusations which Herod brought with great vehemence against his sons before Augustus. Now the young men wept and were in confusion while he was speaking, and still more at his concluding. As to themselves, they knew in their own consciences that they were innocent, but because they were accused by their father, they knew, as was indeed the case, that it was hard for them to make their apology, since though they were at liberty to speak their minds freely as the occasion required, and might with force and earnestness refute their father's accusation, yet it was not now decent so to do. There was therefore a difficulty how they should be able to speak, and tears and at last deep groans followed, for they were afraid, if they said nothing, that they should seem to be in this difficulty from a consciousness of guilt, nor had they any defence ready because of their youth and the alarm they were in. Nor did Augustus fail to perceive, when he saw the confusion they were in, that their delay to make their defence did not arise from any consciousness of crime, but from their unskilfulness and modesty. They were also commiserated by those who were present, nay they privately moved their father with genuine emotion.

§ 3. So when they saw there was a kind disposition both in him and Augustus, and that every one else present did either shed tears, or at least sympathize with them, the one of them, whose name was Alexander, addressed his father, and attempted to answer his accusations, and said, "O father, the benevolence thou hast shown to us is evident, even in this very judicial procedure, for hadst thou had any bad intentions in regard to us, thou wouldst not have produced us here before the common saviour of all. For it was in thy power, both as a king and as a father, to punish the guilty, but by thus bringing us to Rome, and making Augustus himself a witness to what is done, thou intimatest that thou intendest to save us, for no one that has a design to slay a man will bring him to temples and sanctuaries. But our circumstances are still worse, for we cannot endure to live any longer, if it be believed that we have injured such a father; nay, perhaps, it would be worse for us to live with this suspicion upon us, that we have injured him, than to die innocent. But if our bold defence be received as true, we shall be happy, both in persuading thee, and in escaping the danger we are in, but if this calumny still prevails, it is more than enough for us that we have seen the sun this day, for why should we see it with this suspicion fixed upon us? Now, it is easy to say of young men, that they desire to reign, and to add charges about our unhappy mother, is abundantly sufficient to produce our present misfortune out of the former. But consider well, whether such an accusation does not suit all young men, and may not be said of them all promiscuously? For nothing can hinder him that reigns, if he have children, and their mother be dead, but that he may have a suspicion of all his sons, as intending some treachery against him; but a mere suspicion is not sufficient to prove such impiety. Now let any man say, whether we have actually dared to attempt any such things as would make actions otherwise incredible to appear credible. Can anyone prove the preparation of poison, or a conspiracy of our comrades, or the corruption of servants, or letters written against thee? though indeed there are none of those things but have sometimes been invented by calumny, though they were never done. For a royal family that is at variance with itself is a terrible thing; and the throne, which thou callest a reward of piety, often excites in very wicked men such hopes as make them draw back from no criminality. However no one will actually lay any crime to our charge. And as to calumny, how can he put an end to it, who will not hear what we have to say? Have we talked with too great freedom? not against thee, for that would be wrong, but against those that never conceal anything that is spoken to them. Have either of us lamented our mother? yes, but not because she is dead, but because she was ill spoken of by unworthy persons. Are we desirous of the throne which we know our father is possessed of? For what reason can we be so? if we already have royal honours, as we have, should we not labour in vain? And if we have them not, yet are not we in hope of them? Or supposing that we had killed thee, could we expect to obtain thy kingdom? why, neither the earth would let us tread upon it, nor the sea let us sail upon it, after such an action as that: nay, the religion of all your subjects, and the piety of the whole nation, would have prevented parricides from being at the head of affairs, and from entering into the most holy temple built by thee. And suppose we had made light of other dangers, can any murderer go off unpunished, while Augustus is alive? We are thy sons, and not so impious or thoughtless as that, though perhaps more unfortunate than was well for thee. But if thou neither findest any causes of complaint, nor any treacherous designs, what sufficient evidence hast thou to make such wickedness credible? Our mother is dead indeed, but what befell her would be an instruction to us to caution, and not an incitement to wickedness. We are willing to make a longer apology for ourselves, but actions never done do not admit of argument. Wherefore we make this agreement with thee before Augustus, the lord of all, as mediator now between us: if thou, O father, canst bring thyself by the evidence of truth to have a mind free from suspicion concerning us, let us live, though even then we shall not be happy; for to be accused of great acts of wickedness, though falsely, is a terrible thing; but if thou hast any fear remaining, continue thou in thy pious life, we will see to ourselves,<sup>1</sup> our life is not so desirable to us as for us to wish to have it, if it tend to the harm of our father who gave it us."

§ 4. When Alexander had thus spoken, Augustus, who did not even before believe so grave a charge, was still more moved, and looked intently upon Herod, and perceived he was a little confused; and the persons present were in anxiety about the young men, and the fame that was spread abroad at court made the king hated. For the incredibility of the charge, and the pity felt for the young men, who were in the flower of youth and beauty of body, inspired sympathy, and the more so because Alexander had made his defence with dexterity and prudence. Nay, the young men themselves did not any longer continue in their former guise, bedewed with tears and with eyes cast down to the ground, for now there arose in them a hope of better things, and the king himself appeared not to have had foundation enough to build such an accusation upon, he having no real evidence to convict them, so that some apology seemed required from him. But Augustus, after some delay, said, that although the young men were innocent of that with which they had been charged, yet they had been to blame for not having demeaned themselves towards their father so as to prevent the suspicion which was spread abroad concerning them. He also exhorted Herod to lay aside all such suspicion and to be reconciled to his sons; for it was not just to give any credit to such reports concerning his own children; and this change of mind on both sides might not only heal those breaches that had happened between them, but might even improve their good-will to one another, whereby on both sides, apologizing for the rashness of their suspicions, they might resolve to feel more affection towards each other than they had before. After Augustus had given them this admonition, he beckoned to the young men, and when they were disposed to fall down at their father's feet, he took them up, and embraced them, in tears as they were, and took each of them in turn into his arms, till not one of those that were present, whether freeman or slave, but was deeply affected.

§ 5. Then did they return thanks to Augustus, and went away together, and with them went Antipater, who hypocritically pretended that he rejoiced at this reconciliation. And on the following days Herod made Augustus a present of three hundred talents, as he was then exhibiting shows, and bestowing largesses on the people of Rome; and Augustus made him a present of half the revenue of the copper mines in Cyprus, and committed the care of the other half to him, and honoured him with other gifts and incomes: and as to his kingdom, he left it in his own power to appoint which of his sons he pleased as his successor, or to distribute it in parts to each, that the royal rank might so come to them all. And when Herod was disposed to make such a settlement at once, Augustus said that he would not give him leave to deprive himself, while he was alive, of the power over his kingdom, or over his sons.

§ 6. After this Herod returned to Judæa again. But during his absence from home, the Trachonites, no small part of his dominions, had revolted, but the commanders he left there had vanquished them, and compelled them to submission again. Now, as Herod was sailing with his sons, and put in near Cilicia at Elæusa, which has now had its name changed to Sebaste,<sup>1</sup> he met with Archelaus king of Cappadocia, who received him kindly, and rejoiced that he was reconciled to his sons, and that the accusation against Alexander, who had married his daughter, was at an end. They also made one another such presents as it became kings to make. From thence Herod went to Judæa, and to the temple, where he made a speech to the people, concerning what had been done during his absence from home, telling them about Augustus' kindness to him, and about as many of the particular things he had done, as he thought it for his advantage they should be acquainted with. At last he turned his speech to the admonition of his sons, and exhorted the courtiers and the multitude to concord, and informed them, that his sons were to reign after him, Antipater first, and then Alexander and Aristobulus, the sons of Mariamne; but at present he desired that they should all pay court to himself, and esteem him king and lord of all, since he was not yet effete from old age, but was at that period of life when he was most skilful in governing, and that he was not deficient in other arts that might enable him to govern the kingdom well, and to rule over his children also. He also told the rulers and soldiers, that in case they looked to him alone, they would pass their lives in tranquillity, and would make one another happy. And when he had said this, he dismissed the assembly. His speech was acceptable to most of the audience, but not to some, for the contention among his sons, and the hopes he had given them, occasioned thoughts and desires of innovation among some of them.

CHAP. V.

How Herod celebrated Games, to take place every fifth Year, upon the Building of Cæsarea; and how he built and adorned many other Places in a magnificent manner; and how he did many other Actions gloriously.

§ 1.

ABOUT this time Cæsarea Sebaste, which Herod had built, was finished. The entire building being concluded in the tenth year, the solemnity of it fell in the twenty-eighth year of Herod's reign, and in the hundred and ninety-second Olympiad. There was accordingly a great festival, and most sumptuous preparations were made at once for its dedication. For the king appointed contests in music and athletic exercises, and also got ready a great number of gladiators, and of beasts for like purpose: horse races also, and the most costly of such sports and shows as used to be exhibited at Rome and in other places. He consecrated these contests to Cæsar Augustus, and ordered them to be celebrated every fifth year. He also provided all the apparatus for it at his own expense, to set off his liberality; and Julia, the Emperor's wife, sent a great part of her most costly things privately from Rome, insomuch that he had no want of anything. The sum of them all was estimated at five hundred talents. Now when a great multitude was come to Cæsarea, to see the shows, as well as the ambassadors whom various people sent because of the benefits they had received from Herod, he entertained them all in the public inns, and at public tables, and with perpetual feasts, the festival having in the day-time the attractions of the fights, and in the night-time such merry-making as cost vast sums of money, and publicly demonstrated the greatness of his soul, for in all his undertakings he was ambitious to exhibit what exceeded whatever had been done before. And they say that Augustus himself and Agrippa often said, that the dominions of Herod were too little for the greatness of his soul, for he deserved to have the kingdom of all Syria, and of Egypt also.

§ 2. After this solemnity and these festivals were over, Herod erected another city in the plain which is called Capharsaba, where he chose out a fit place, both for plenty of water and goodness of soil for what was there planted, as a river encompassed the city itself, and a grove of the best trees for size was round about it. This he named Antipatris after his father Antipater.<sup>1</sup> He also built, upon another spot of ground above Jericho, a place of great security, and very pleasant for habitation, and called it Cypros<sup>2</sup> after the name of his mother. He also dedicated the finest monument to his brother Phasaelus, on account of the great natural affection there had been between them, by erecting a tower in the city itself, not smaller than the tower of Pharos,<sup>1</sup> which he called Phasaelus, which was at once a part of the defences of the city and a memorial of him that was deceased, because it bore his name. He also built a city which he called after him in the valley of Jericho, as you go from it northwards, whereby he rendered the neighbouring country more fruitful, by the cultivation which its inhabitants introduced; and this he called Phasaelis.<sup>2</sup>

§ 3. As for his other benefits, it is impossible to reckon up those which he bestowed on cities both in Syria and in Greece, and in all the places he went to in his travels. For he seems to have contributed very liberally to many public burdens and to the building of public works, and furnished the money that was necessary for such works as wanted it upon the failure of their revenues. But the greatest and most illustrious of all his works was the erection of Apollo's temple at Rhodes at his own expense, and his giving the people of Rhodes a great many talents of silver to build a fleet. He also built the greatest part of the public edifices for the inhabitants of Nicopolis<sup>3</sup> near Actium: and for the inhabitants of Antioch, the principal city of Syria, where a broad street cuts through the place lengthways, he built porticoes along it on both sides, and paved the open road with polished stone, which was of very great advantage to the inhabitants. And as to the Olympian games, which were in a very low condition because of want of money, he revived their reputation, and appointed revenues for keeping them up, and made that general festival more stately as to the sacrifices and other displays. And because of this great liberality, he was almost unanimously registered as one of the perpetual judges of those games.

§ 4. Now there are some who stand amazed at the diversity of Herod's nature and purposes. For when we look at his magnificence, and at the benefits which he bestowed on all people, there is no possibility even for those that had the least respect for him to deny, or not to admit, that he had a nature vastly beneficent; but when any one looks upon the punishments he inflicted, and the injuries he did not only to his subjects but to his nearest relations, and takes notice of his severe and unrelenting disposition, he will be forced to allow that he appears brutish, and a stranger to all humanity; whence some people suppose his nature to be various and sometimes self-contradictory. But I am myself of another opinion, and imagine that the cause of both these sort of actions was one and the same. For being an ambitious man, and quite overcome by that passion, he was induced to be magnificent, wherever there appeared any hopes either of future memory or of present reputation; and as his expenses were beyond his means, he was necessitated to be harsh to his subjects. For the persons on whom he expended his money were so many that they made him a very bad procurer of it; and as he was conscious that he was hated by those under him for the injuries he had done them, he thought it no easy thing to amend his offences, for that was inconvenient for his revenue; he therefore strove on the other hand to make their ill-will an opportunity to add to his gains. As to his own people, therefore, if anyone was not very obsequious to him in language, and would not confess himself to be his slave, or seemed to think of any innovation in his realm, he was not able to contain himself, but prosecuted his very kindred and friends, and punished them as if they were his enemies; and he committed such faults from a desire that he might himself alone be honoured. Now for this my assertion about that feeling of his, we have the greatest evidence, by what he did to honour Augustus and Agrippa and his other friends; for those honours he paid to those who were his superiors he desired also to be paid to himself; and what he thought the most excellent present he could make another, he showed an inclination to have also presented to himself. But the Jewish nation is by their law a stranger to all such things, and accustomed to prefer righteousness to glory; for which reason that nation was not agreeable to him, because it was out of their power to flatter the king's ambition with statues or temples, or any other such things. And this seems to me to have been at once the cause of Herod's harsh acts to his own courtiers and counsellors, and of his benefits to foreigners and to those that had no relation to him.

CHAP. VI.

An Embassy of the Jews in Cyrene and Asia to Augustus, concerning the Complaints they had to make against the Greeks; with Copies of the Letters which Augustus and Agrippa wrote to the Cities for them.

§ 1.

NOW the Greek cities ill-treated the Jews in Asia, and also all those of the same nation who lived in Libya<sup>1</sup> near Cyrene, though the former kings had given them equal privileges with the other citizens; but the Greeks oppressed them at this time, and that so far as to take away their sacred money, and to do them mischief on particular occasions. As therefore they were thus evil intreated, and found no end of the barbarous treatment they met with among the Greeks, they sent ambassadors to Augustus about these matters. And he gave them the same privileges as they had before, and sent letters to the same purpose to the governors of the provinces, copies of which I subjoin here, as testimonies of the favourable disposition the Roman emperors formerly had towards us.

§ 2. "Cæsar Augustus, Pontifex Maximus, and tribune of the people, ordains as follows. Since the nation of the Jews has been found friendly to the Roman people, not only at this time, but in time past also, and especially Hyrcanus the high priest, under my father Cæsar the emperor,<sup>2</sup> it has seemed good to me and my council, according to the wish and oath of the people of Rome, that the Jews should have liberty to follow their own customs, according to the law of their forefathers, as they did under Hyrcanus the high priest of Almighty God; and that their sacred money be not touched, but be sent to Jerusalem, and that it be committed to the care of the receivers at Jerusalem; and that they be not obliged to appear in court either on the Sabbath-day, or on the day of preparation before it, after the ninth hour.<sup>1</sup> And if any one be caught stealing their holy books, or their sacred money, whether it be out of the synagogue, or from the men's apartments, he shall be deemed a sacrilegious person, and his goods shall be confiscated to the public treasury of the Romans. And I give order, that the decree which they have given me, on account of the piety which I exercise to all mankind, and out of regard to Caius Marcus Censorinus, and the present edict, be put up in the most eminent place consecrated to me by the community of Asia at Ancyra.<sup>2</sup> And if any one transgress any part of what is above decreed, he shall be severely punished." This was inscribed upon a pillar in the temple of Cæsar Augustus.

§ 3. "Cæsar Augustus sends greeting to Norbanus Flaccus. Let those Jews, however numerous they be, who have been used according to their ancient custom to send their sacred money to Jerusalem, do the same freely." These were the decrees of Cæsar Augustus.

§ 4. Agrippa also himself wrote in the following manner on behalf of the Jews. "Agrippa, to the magistrates, senate, and people of the Ephesians, greeting. I will that the care and custody of the sacred money that is carried to the temple at Jerusalem be left to the Jews of Asia, to do with it according to their ancient custom; and that such as steal that sacred money of the Jews, and flee to a sanctuary, shall be torn from thence and delivered to the Jews, by the same law that sacrilegious persons are torn from thence. I have also written to Silanus the prætor, that no one compel the Jews to appear in court on the Sabbath-day."

§ 5. "Marcus Agrippa, to the magistrates, senate, and people of Cyrene, greeting. The Jews of Cyrene have petitioned me for the performance of what Augustus sent orders about to Flavius, who was then prætor of Libya, and to the other procurators of that province, that the sacred money should be sent to Jerusalem without hindrance, as has been their custom from their forefathers, for they complain that they are harassed by certain informers, and, under pretence of taxes which are not due, are hindered from sending them; which I command to be restored them without any diminution or trouble; and if any of that sacred money in the cities be taken from their proper receivers, I further enjoin, that the same be duly returned to the Jews in that place."

§ 6. "Caius Norbanus Flaccus, proconsul, sends greeting to the magistrates and senate of the Sardians. The Emperor has written to me, and commanded me not to forbid the Jews, however numerous they be, from assembling together according to the custom of their forefathers, or from sending their money to Jerusalem. I have therefore written to you, that you may know that both the Emperor and I would have you act accordingly."

§ 7. Nor did Julius Antonius, the proconsul, write otherwise. "To the magistrates, senate, and people of the Ephesians, greeting. As I was dispensing justice at Ephesus on the Ides of February, the Jews that dwell in Asia pointed out to me, that Cæsar Augustus and Agrippa had permitted them to use their own laws and customs, and to offer those their first fruits, which every one of them freely offers to the Deity on account of piety, and to carry them in a company together to Jerusalem without let or hindrance. They also petitioned me, that I would also confirm what had been granted by Augustus and Agrippa by my own decree. I would therefore have you take notice, according to the will of Augustus and Agrippa, that I permit them to use, and do according to, the customs of their forefathers without let or hindrance."

§ 8. I have felt obliged to set down these decrees, because the history of our acts will go generally among the Greeks, and I have thus shown them that we were formerly held in great esteem, and were not prohibited by those governors we were under from keeping any of the laws of our forefathers; nay, that we were supported by them in following our own religion and worship of God. And I frequently mention these decrees to reconcile other people to us, and to remove any reasons for that hatred which inconsiderate men seem naturally to bear to us. As for our customs, there is no nation which always makes use of the same, and in every city almost we meet with different ones; but justice is most for the advantage of all men equally, both Greeks and barbarians, to which our laws pay the greatest regard, and so render us, if we observe them rightly, benevolent and friendly to all men. On which account we have reason to expect the like return from others, nor ought they to esteem difference of institutions a sufficient cause of alienation, but should look rather to virtue and probity, for this belongs to all men in common, and is sufficient of itself alone for the preservation of human life. I now return to the thread of my history.

CHAP. VII.

§ 1.

AS for Herod, he had spent vast sums on the cities both without and within his own kingdom: and as he soon heard how Hyrcanus, who had been king before him, had opened David's tomb, and taken out of it three thousand talents of silver, and how there was much more left, indeed enough to suffice for all his wants, he had long intended to make an attempt on it, so now he opened the tomb by night, and went into it, and to prevent its being known in the city took only his most faithful friends with him. As for money, he found none, as Hyrcanus had done, but golden ornaments and various treasures laid up there, all of which he took away. However, he had a great desire to make a more diligent search, and to go further in, even as far as the very coffins of David and Solomon. But two of his body-guards were slain, by a flame that burst out upon those that went in, as the report went, so he was terribly frightened, and went out and built a propitiatory memorial in white stone at the mouth of the tomb at great expense, to mark the fright he had been in. Even Nicolaus his historiographer makes mention of this building of Herod, though he does not mention his going down into the tomb, as he knew that action was indecorous. And many other things he treats in the same manner in his history. For he wrote in Herod's lifetime, and during his reign, and so as to please and serve him, touching upon nothing but what tended to his glory, and openly excusing many of his notorious crimes, and very diligently concealing them. And as he was desirous to put a good colour on the murder of Mariamne and her sons, which were barbarous actions on the part of the king, he tells falsehoods about the incontinence of Mariamne, and the treacherous plots of her sons, and thus he proceeded in his whole work, passing excessive encomiums upon the just actions Herod did, and earnestly apologizing for his unjust ones. However, as I said, one might say a great deal by way of excuse for Nicolaus; for he did not so much write a history for others, as what might serve the king himself. As for ourselves, who come of a family nearly allied to the Asamonæan kings, and so have the honour of the priesthood, we think it unbecoming to say anything that is false about them, and accordingly we have described their actions in an honest and upright manner. And although we reverence many of Herod's posterity who still reign, yet do we pay a greater regard to truth than to them, and that though it has sometimes happened that we have incurred their displeasure by so doing.

§ 2. Now Herod's family troubles seemed to be augmented by the attempt he made upon David's tomb, whether divine vengeance increased the calamities he suffered from, in order to render them incurable, or whether fortune made an assault upon him in those cases, wherein the opportuneness of the case made it strongly believed that the calamities came upon him for his impiety. For the quarrels were like a civil war in his palace, and their hatred towards one another was such that each strove to exceed one another in calumnies. And Antipater was always undermining his brothers, and that very cunningly: he got them loaded with accusations, but took upon himself frequently to apologize for them, that this seeming benevolence to them might make him get believed, and forward his attempts against them. By this means he in various ways circumvented his father, who believed that all he did was for his preservation. Herod also recommended Ptolemy, who was the manager of the affairs of his kingdom, to Antipater, and consulted with his mother about important matters also. And indeed these were all in all, and did what they pleased, and made the king angry with any other persons, as they thought would be to their own advantage. So the sons of Mariamne got in a worse and worse condition perpetually, and as they were passed over, and set in a more dishonourable rank, though by birth the most noble, they could not bear the dishonour. As for the women, Alexander's wife Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, was hated by Salome, both because of her love to her own husband, and because of Glaphyra's seeming to behave herself somewhat insolently towards her daughter,<sup>1</sup> who was the wife of Aristobulus, which equality of rank to herself Glaphyra took very impatiently.

§ 3. Now, besides this second strife that had fallen out among them, neither did the king's brother Pheroras keep himself out of trouble, but gave private grounds for suspicion and hatred. For he was overcome by the charms of his wife to such a degree of madness, that he despised the king's daughter, to whom he had been betrothed, and wholly adhered to his wife, who had been but a slave. So Herod was vexed at the dishonour done him, because he had bestowed many favours upon him, and had advanced him to that height of power that he was almost a partner with him in the kingdom, and saw that he did not make him a due return for his favours, and esteemed himself unhappy on that account. So upon Pheroras' refusal, he gave the damsel to Phasaelus's son: but after some time, when he thought the heat of his brother's affection for his wife was abated, he blamed him for his former conduct, and asked him to take his second daughter, whose name was Cypros. Ptolemy also advised him to leave off affronting his brother, and to put away her whom he loved, for it was disgraceful to be so enamoured of a slave, as to deprive himself of the king's good-will to him, and become an occasion of his trouble, and make himself hated by him. Pheroras knew that this advice was for his good, particularly as he had been accused before, and forgiven; so he put the poor woman away, although he had already a son by her, and promised the king that he would take his second daughter, and agreed that the thirtieth day after should be the day of marriage; and swore he would have no further intercourse with her whom he had put away. But when the thirty days were over, he was such a slave to his affections, that he no longer performed anything he had promised, but continued still with his former wife. This plainly grieved Herod and made him angry, so that the king dropped one word or other against Pheroras perpetually; and many made the king's anger an opportunity for calumniating him. Nor had the king any longer a single quiet day or hour, but some fresh quarrel or other arose among his relations and those that were dearest to him. For Salome was of a harsh temper, and ill-natured to Mariamne's sons, nor would she suffer her own daughter, who was the wife of Aristobulus, one of those young men, to live happily with her husband, but persuaded her to tell her if he said anything to her in private; and when any misunderstanding happened, as is common, she raised a great many suspicions out of it; by which means she learned all their concerns, and made the damsel ill-natured to the young man. And in order to gratify her mother, she often said that the young men used to mention Mariamne when they were by themselves, and that they hated their father, and were continually threatening, if they once got the kingdom, that they would make Herod's sons by his other wives village-clerks, for the present education which was given them, and their diligence in learning, fitted them for such an employment; while as for the women, whenever they saw them adorned with their mother's clothes, they threatened, that instead of their present gaudy apparel, they should be clothed in sackcloth, and confined so closely that they should not see the light of the sun. These stories were at once carried by Salome to the king, who was troubled to hear them, and endeavoured to make up matters; but these suspicions afflicted him, and becoming more and more uneasy, he believed everybody against everybody. However, upon his rebuking his sons, and hearing their defence, he was easier for a while, though a little afterwards much worse troubles came upon him.

§ 4. For Pheroras went to Alexander, the husband of Glaphyra, who was the daughter of Archelaus, as I have already stated, and said, that he had heard from Salome, that Herod was enamoured of Glaphyra, and that his passion for her was vehement. When Alexander heard that, he was all on fire from his youth and jealousy, and put the worst interpretation on Herod's attentions to her, which were very frequent, from the suspicions he had on account of what fell from Pheroras. Nor could he conceal his grief at the thing, but went to his father and informed him of what Pheroras had said. Upon this Herod was more put out than ever, and not being able to bear such a false calumny, which tended to his shame, was much disturbed at it: and often did he complain of the wickedness of his relations, and how good he had been to them, and what ill return they had made him. And he sent for Pheroras, and reproached him, and said, "Thou vilest of all men! art thou come to that unmeasurable and extravagant degree of ingratitude, as not only to suppose but to speak such things of me? I now indeed perceive what thy intentions are, it is not thy aim only to reproach me, in using such words to my son, but thereby to tempt him to plot against me, and take me off by poison. For who, if he had not a good genius like my son, would have such a suspicion of his father, and not revenge himself upon him? Dost thou suppose that thou hast only dropped a word for him to think of, and not rather put a sword into his hand to slay his father? And what dost thou mean, when thou really hatest both him and his brother, by pretending kindness to them, only to raise calumnies against me, and by talking of such things as no one but such an impious wretch as thou art could either devise in mind or declare in words. Begone, thou that art such a vile plague to thy benefactor and brother, and may that evil conscience of thine go along with thee ; and may I still overcome my relations by kindness, and be so far from avenging myself on them as they deserve, as to bestow greater benefits upon them than they are worthy of."

§ 5. Thus did the king speak. Whereupon Pheroras, who was caught in the very act of his villainy, said, that Salome had concocted this plot, and that the words came from her. And as soon as she heard that (for she happened to be at hand), she cried out plausibly that no such word ever came out of her mouth, and that they all earnestly endeavoured to make the king hate her, and to get rid of her, because of the good-will she bore to Herod, and because she was always foreseeing the dangers that were coming upon him ; and that at present there were more plots against him than usual ; and as she was the only person who had urged her brother to put away the wife he now had, and to marry the king's daughter, it was no wonder if she was hated by him. As she said this, and often tore her hair, and often beat her breast, her countenance made her denial somewhat plausible, but the malignity of her character argued her dissimulation. But Pheroras was in a fix, and had nothing plausible to offer in his own defence, for he confessed that he had said what was charged against him, but was not believed when he said he had heard it from Salome. So the confusion among them, and their quarrelsome words to one another, increased. At last the king, out of his hatred to his brother and sister, sent them both away ; and when he had commended the moderation of his son in himself telling him of the report, as it was now late he went to rest. After such a contest as this had fallen out among them, Salome's reputation suffered greatly, since she was supposed to have first raised the calumny ; and the king's wives hated her, knowing she was a very ill-natured woman and unreliable, as she would sometimes be a friend, and sometimes an enemy. So they perpetually said one thing or other against her to Herod, and something that now happened made them the bolder in speaking against her.

§ 6. There was one Obodas, king of Arabia, an inactive and slothful man in his nature; and Syllæus managed most of his affairs for him. He was an able man, although but young, and was handsome also. This Syllæus upon some occasion coming to Herod, and supping with him, saw Salome, and set his heart upon her; and understanding that she was a widow he made up to her. Now because Salome was at this time less in favour with her brother, and looked upon Syllæus with some passion, she was very earnest to be married to him; and on the following days, as they went to supper, there appeared many and very great indications of their mutual understanding. Now the women carried this news to the king, and laughed at the unseemliness of it; whereupon Herod inquired further about it of Pheroras, and desired him to observe at supper how they behaved to one another; and he told him that by their nods and looks they were both evidently in love. After this the Arabian being suspected went away, but came again two or three months afterwards, as if on that very design, and spoke to Herod about it, and asked that Salome might be given him to wife; for he said that affinity with him might be not unprofitable to Herod through his connection with Arabia, the government of which country was already in effect in his hands, and would be still more so hereafter. And when Herod discoursed with his sister about it, and asked her, whether she were disposed to the match, she quickly agreed to it. But when Syllæus was asked to conform to the Jewish religion, and then he should marry her (for it was impossible to do so on any other terms), he would not hear of it, but went his way, for he said if he should do so, he would be stoned by the Arabs. Then did Pheroras twit Salome with her lust, as did the women much more, who said that Syllæus had had connection with her. As for the damsel, whom the king had betrothed to his brother Pheroras, who had not taken her, as I have before stated, because he was enamoured of his wife, Salome asked Herod that she might be given to her son by Costobarus, which match Herod had no objection to, but was dissuaded from it by Pheroras, who pleaded that this young man would not be kind to her, because of the murder of his father, and that it was much more just that his son should have her, who was to be his successor in the tetrarchy. So he sued for pardon, and the king's wrath was over. And the damsel, upon this change of her espousals, was disposed of to this young man, the son of Pheroras, the king giving her also as her portion a hundred talents.

CHAP. VIII.

How Herod arrested Alexander, and put him in prison, and how Archelaus, King of Cappadocia, reconciled him to his Father Herod again.

§ 1.

HOWEVER affairs in Herod's family grew no better, but were every day more troublesome. And the following circumstance happened, which arose from no decent occasion, and proceeded so far as to bring great difficulties upon him. There were certain eunuchs whom the king was very fond of on account of their beauty; and the care of bringing him drink was intrusted to one of them, of bringing him his supper to another, and of putting him to bed to the third, who almost managed the principal affairs of the kingdom. Now some one told the king that these eunuchs had been corrupted by Alexander the king's son with great sums of money. And when Herod asked them if Alexander had had criminal dealings with them, they confessed that he had, but said they knew of no further criminality on his part against his father. But when they were tortured, and were in the utmost extremity, for the tormentors to gratify Antipater stretched the rack to the very utmost, they said that Alexander bore great ill-will and innate hatred to his father: and that he had told them, that Herod despaired of living much longer, and that in order to cover his great age, he dyed his hair black, and endeavoured to conceal what would discover how old he was; but if they would join him, when he should attain the kingdom, which, in spite of his father, would come to no one else, they should quickly have the first place in the kingdom under him; and he was now ready to take the kingdom, not only as his birthright, but by the preparations he had made for obtaining it, because a great many of the rulers, and a great many of his friends were zealous partisans of his, ready both to do and to suffer anything.

§ 2. When Herod heard this confession, he was all over anger and fear, some parts of it seeming to him insulting, and some making him suspicious of dangers that awaited him, insomuch that on both accounts he was provoked, and bitterly afraid lest some worse plot should be actually laid against him than he should be able to escape from now. So he did not any longer make any open search, but sent about spies to watch such as he suspected, for he was now overrun with suspicion and hatred against everybody, and indulging his suspicions, in order to his preservation, he continually suspected those that were innocent. Nor did he set any bounds to himself, but supposing that those who were near him had the most power to hurt him, they were his bugbears; and for those that were not used to come to him, it seemed enough generally to name them [to make them suspected], and he thought himself safer when they were at once put to death. At last his courtiers were come to that pass, that being no way secure of escaping themselves, they fell to accusing one another, imagining that he who first accused another was most likely to save himself. Yet, when any had thus overthrown others, they were hated, and they were thought to suffer justly, who unjustly accused others only thereby to anticipate being accused themselves. Nay, at last they avenged their own private enmities by this means, and when they were caught they were punished in the same way, using this opportunity as an instrument and snare against their enemies, yet when they tried it often themselves caught in the same snare which they laid for others. And the king soon repented of what he had done, because he had no clear evidence of the guilt of those whom he had slain; and yet what was still more severe in him, he did not make use of his repentance in order to leave off doing the like again, but in order to inflict the same punishment upon their accusers.

§ 3. And in this troubled state were the affairs of the palace; and Herod had already told many of his friends not to appear before him, nor come into the palace; and the reason of this injunction was that [when they were there] he had less freedom of action, or greater restraint on himself on their account. And at this time it was that he dismissed Andromachus and Gemellus, men who had been very old friends of his, and been very useful to him in the affairs of his kingdom, and been of advantage to his family in their embassages and counsels; and had been tutors to his sons, and had in a manner the first degree of freedom with him. He dismissed Andromachus, because his son Demetrius was intimate with Alexander, and Gemellus, because he knew that he wished Alexander well, which arose from his having been with him in his youth when he was at school, and also with him when he was absent at Rome. These he expelled from his palace, and would have liked to have done worse to them; but that he might not seem to take such liberty against men of so great reputation, he contented himself with depriving them of their rank and power to hinder his wicked proceedings.

§ 4. Now Antipater was the cause of all this, who when he saw the mad and licentious conduct of his father, as he had been a great while one of his counsellors, egged him on, and thought he would gain his own ends more, when everyone that could oppose him was removed out of the way. When therefore Andromachus and his friends were driven away, and had no freedom of access or speech with the king any longer, the king in the first place examined by torture all whom he thought faithful to Alexander, to see whether they knew of any plot against him; but they died under the torture without having anything to say, which made the king more furious, that he could not find out the evil proceedings he suspected. As for Antipater, he was very clever in raising calumny against those that were really innocent, as if their denial was only their constancy and fidelity [to Alexander,] and instigated Herod by the torture of more persons to discover any hidden plots. Now a certain person among the many that were tortured, said that he knew that Alexander had often said (when he was commended as a tall man in his body. and a skilful marksman, and told that in his exercises he exceeded all men), that these qualifications given him by nature, though good in themselves, were not advantageous to him, because his father was grieved at them, and envied him for them; so that when he walked with his father he endeavoured to depress and shorten himself, that he might not appear too tall, and that when he shot at anything as he was hunting, he missed his mark on purpose when his father was by, for he knew how ambitious his father was of being first in such exercises. So when the man was tormented about this saying, and had his body given ease after, he added, that Alexander had his brother Aristobulus as his assistant, and that they resolved to lie in wait for their father, as he was hunting, and kill him: and when they had done so, to flee to Rome, and ask to have the kingdom given to Alexander. There were also letters of the young man found written to his brother, wherein he complained, that his father did not act justly in giving Antipater a country, whose [yearly] revenues amounted to two hundred talents. Upon these confessions Herod at once thought he had something to depend on as to his suspicion about his sons; so he arrested Alexander and put him in prison. Yet did he still continue to be uneasy, and was not quite satisfied of the truth of what he had heard; and when he considered the matter, he found that they had only exhibited juvenile complaints and contentions, and that it was an incredible thing, if his son should slay him, that he should go openly to Rome; so he was desirous to have some surer proof of his son's wickedness, and was very solicitous about it, that he might not appear to have condemned him to be put in prison too rashly. So he tortured the principal of Alexander's friends, and put not a few of them to death, without getting out of them any of the things which he suspected. And as Herod was very busy about this matter, and the palace was full of terror and trouble, one of the young men, when he was in the utmost agony, said that Alexander had sent to his friends at Rome, and asked that he might be quickly invited there by Augustus, and that he could discover a plot against him, for Mithridates, the king of Parthia, was joined in a friendship with his father against the Romans;

he also added that Alexander had a poisonous potion ready prepared at Ascalon.

§ 5. To this Herod gave credit, and enjoyed thereby, in his miserable case, some sort of consolation for his rashness, in flattering himself with finding things in so bad a condition. But as for the poisonous potion, though he was anxious to find it, he could find none. As for Alexander, he was desirous from a contentious spirit to aggravate the great misfortunes he was in, so he denied not the accusation, but punished the rashness of his father with a greater fault of his own; and perhaps he wished to make his father thereby ashamed of his easy belief of such calumnies: he aimed especially, if he could gain belief to his story, to plague him and his whole kingdom. For he wrote four letters, and sent them to Herod to tell him, that he need not torture any more persons, nor search any further, for he had himself plotted against him, and that he had as his partners Pheroras and the most faithful of the king's friends; and that Salome came to him by night, and lay with him against his will; and that all men were come to be of one mind to make away with the king as soon as they could, and so get rid of the continual fear of him they were in. Among others he accused Ptolemy and Sapinius, who were the most faithful friends of the king. And what more can be said, but that those who were before the most intimate friends were become wild beasts to one another, as if a certain madness had fallen upon them, and there was no room for defence or refutation, in order to the discovery of the truth, but all were at random doomed to destruction; so that some lamented those that were in prison, others those that had been put to death, others that they were in the expectation of the same miseries: and dejection and solitude rendered the kingdom quite the reverse of the happy state it formerly enjoyed. Herod's own life also was bitter to him, so greatly alarmed was he; and because he could trust nobody, he was sorely punished by the expectation of further misery, for he often fancied in his imagination, that his son had made an insurrection against him, or even stood by him with a sword in his hand. Thus was his mind night and day intent upon this thing, and he revolved it over and over, just as if he were distracted. Such was the sad condition Herod was now in.

§ 6. But when Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, heard of the state that Herod was in, being in great distress about his daughter, and the young man [her husband,] and sorry for Herod as a man that was his friend, on account of the great trouble he was in, he came [to Jerusalem] on purpose to arrange matters. And when he found Herod in such a state, he thought it wholly unseasonable to reprove him, or to say that he had acted rashly, for he would thereby naturally bring him to dispute the point with him, and make him the more irritated by his having still more to apologize for himself. He went therefore another way to work, in order to improve matters, and appeared angry with the young man, and said, that Herod was so very mild a man, that he had not acted a rash part at all. He also said he would dissolve his daughter's marriage with Alexander, for he could not in justice spare his own daughter, if she were conscious of anything, and did not inform Herod of it. When Archelaus appeared in this mood, far otherwise than Herod expected, and in the main angry on Herod's account, the king abated his harshness, and took occasion, from his appearing to have acted justly hitherto, to come by degrees to put on the affection of a father; and was on both sides to be pitied, for when some persons refuted the calumnies that were laid on the young man, he fell into a passion, but when Archelaus joined in the accusation, he was dissolved into tears and great sorrow; and begged that he would not dissolve his son's marriage, or be so angry at his offences. So when Archelaus had brought him to a more moderate temper, he shifted the charges to his friends, and said, it must be owing to them that so young a man, and one without a touch of malice, was corrupted, and thought there was more reason to suspect the brother than the son. Upon this Herod was very much displeased at Pheroras, who indeed had now no one that could reconcile him and his brother; so when he saw that Archelaus had the greatest influence with Herod, he betook himself to him in the guise of a mourner, and like one that had all the signs upon him of a ruined man. Upon this Archelaus did not neglect the intercession he made to him, but said that he could not change the king's disposition to him immediately, and said that it was best for him to go himself to the king, and confess himself the occasion of all the trouble, and beg the king's pardon, for that would mitigate the king's anger towards him, and he would be present to assist him. When he had persuaded him to this, he gained his point with both of them, and the calumnies raised against the young man were contrary to all expectation wiped off. And Archelaus, as soon as he had made this reconciliation between Pheroras and Herod, went away to Cappadocia, having proved at this critical juncture the most acceptable person to Herod in the world; on which account he gave him the richest presents as tokens of his respect to him, being on all occasions magnificent, and esteemed him as one of his dearest friends. He also made an agreement with him that he would go to Rome, because he had written to Augustus about these affairs, and they went together as far as Antioch. And there Herod made a reconciliation between Archelaus and Titus (the president of Syria), who had been greatly at variance, and then returned to Judæa.

§ 1.

WHEN Herod had been at Rome, and had come back again, a war broke out between him and the Arabians, for the following reason. The Trachonites,<sup>1</sup> after Augustus had taken their country away from Zenodorus, and added it to Herod, were no longer permitted to rob, but were forced to plough the land, and to live quietly, which was a thing they did not like: and though they took pains, the ground did not produce much profit.

However, from the first, the king would not permit them to rob, and so they abstained from that unjust way of living upon their neighbours, which got Herod a great reputation for his pains; but when he sailed to Rome (it was when he went to accuse his son Alexander, and to commit his son Antipater to Augustus' protection), the Trachonites spread a report that he was dead, and revolted from his sway, and betook themselves again to their accustomed way of robbing their neighbours. For the time the king's commanders subdued them during Herod's absence, but about forty of the principal robbers, being terrified by the punishment of those that had been taken, left the country, and retired into Arabia, Syllæus entertaining them now he had missed of marrying Salome, and giving them a place of strength, in which they dwelt. And they overran and pillaged not only Judæa but all Cœle-Syria also, while Syllæus afforded points d'appui and security to these illdoers. But when Herod came back from Rome, he perceived that his dominions had greatly suffered at their hands, and since he could not reach the robbers themselves, because of the security which the protection of the Arabians afforded them, being very angry at the injuries they had done him, he went over all Trachonitis, and slew their relations. Thereupon these robbers were more angry than before, it being a law among them to be avenged on the murderers of their relations by all possible means, so they continued to harry and plunder all Herod's dominions with impunity. Then did Herod speak about these robbers to Saturninus and Volumnius, and demanded that they should be punished; upon which they waxed stronger, and became more numerous, and by their rising threw everything into confusion, laying waste the countries and villages that belonged to Herod's kingdom, and butchering men whom they took prisoners, till these unjust proceedings came to be like a real war, for the robbers were now become about a thousand. At which Herod was sore displeased, and demanded the surrender of the robbers, as well as the money which he had lent Obodas through Syllæus, which was sixty talents, and since the time of payment was now past, he desired to have it paid him. But Syllæus, who had set

Obodas aside, and managed everything himself, denied that the robbers were in Arabia, and put off the payment of the money: about which there was a discussion before Saturninus and Volumnius, who were then the governors of Syria. At last he, on their decision, agreed that within thirty days Herod should be paid his money, and that each of them should deliver up the other's subjects. Now, as to Herod, there was not one of the other's subjects found in his kingdom, either for committing any crime or on any other account, but it was proved that the Arabians had the robbers amongst them.

§ 2. When the day appointed for payment of the money was past, Syllæus, without performing any part of his agreement, set out for Rome. So Herod demanded the payment of the money, and that the robbers that were in Arabia should be delivered up, and, by permission of Saturninus and Volumnius, took the law into his own hands against those that were refractory. He took the army that he had, and led it into Arabia; and in three days' time, by forced marches, he arrived at the garrison wherein the robbers were, and took it by storm, and captured them all, and demolished the place, which was called Raipta,<sup>1</sup> but did no harm to any others. But as the Arabians came to the assistance of the robbers, under Nacebus their captain, a battle ensued, wherein a few of Herod's soldiers, and Nacebus, the captain of the Arabians, and about twenty of his men fell, while the rest betook themselves to flight. So when Herod had punished them, he settled three thousand Idumæans in Trachonitis, and so restrained the robbers that were there. He also sent an account of these things to the captains that were in Phœnice,<sup>2</sup> showing that he had done nothing but what he ought to do, in punishing the refractory Arabians, which, upon exact inquiry, they found to be true.

§ 3. However, messengers hurried away to Syllæus to Rome, and informed him of what had been done, and, as is usual, exaggerated everything. Now Syllæus had already wormed himself into the acquaintance of Augustus, and was then about the palace, and as soon as he heard of these things, he changed his dress to black, and went in, and told Augustus that Arabia was afflicted with war, and that all his kingdom was in great confusion, because of Herod's laying it waste with his army: and added, with tears in his eyes, that two thousand five hundred of the principal men among the Arabians had fallen, and that their captain Nacebus, his familiar friend and kinsman, had been slain; and that the riches that were at Raipta had been carried off; and that Obodas was despised, as his infirm state of body rendered him unfit for war; on which account neither he, nor the Arabian army, were present. When Syllæus had said this, and added invidiously that he would not himself have left the country, unless he had believed that Augustus would have provided that they should all have peace with one another, and that, had he been there, he would have taken care that the war should not have been to Herod's advantage; Augustus was nettled at what was said, and asked only this one question, both of Herod's friends that were there, and of his own friends, who were come from Syria, "Whether Herod had led an army there?" And as they were forced to admit this, Augustus, without staying to hear why and how he did so, grew very angry, and wrote to Herod sharply. The sum of his letter was that, whereas of old he had treated Herod as his friend, he should now treat him as his subject. Syllæus also wrote an account of this to the Arabians. And they were so elated at it, that they neither delivered up the robbers that had fled to them, nor paid the money that was due, and retained those pastures also which they had hired, and kept them without paying their rent, and all this because the king of the Jews was now humiliated because of Augustus' anger with him. The inhabitants of Trachonitis also seized their opportunity, and rose up against the Idumæan garrison, and followed the same way of robbing as the Arabians, who had pillaged their country, and were more active in their unjust proceedings, not only for gain, but for revenge also.

§ 4. Now Herod was forced to bear all this, that confidence of his being quite gone with which Augustus' favour used to inspire him, and his spirit failed him. For Augustus would not so much as receive an embassy from him to make an apology, and when the envoys came a second time, he sent them away without success. So Herod was in dejection and fear, and Syllæus grieved him exceedingly, as he was now trusted by Augustus, and was present at Rome, nay, aspired even higher. For Obodas was dead, and Æneas, whose name was now changed to Aretas,<sup>1</sup> took over the rule over the Arabians. And Syllæus endeavoured by calumnies to get him turned out of his kingdom that he might himself take it: with which design he gave much money to the courtiers, and promised much money to Augustus, who indeed was angry that Aretas had not written to him first before he took the kingdom. But Aretas afterwards himself also sent a letter and presents to Augustus, and a golden crown of the weight of many talents. And his letter accused Syllæus of having been a wicked servant, and of having killed Obodas by poison, and while he was alive, of having governed him as he pleased, and of having also debauched the wives of the Arabians, and of having borrowed money, in order to obtain the kingdom for himself. But Augustus did not listen to these accusations, but sent his ambassadors back, without receiving any of his presents. And meantime affairs in Judæa and Arabia became worse and worse, partly because of the disorder they were in, and partly because, bad as they were, nobody had power to bring them round. For of the two kings, the one was not yet confirmed in his kingdom, and so had not authority sufficient to restrain evildoers; and as for Herod, Augustus was angry with him, for having so soon avenged himself, and so he was compelled to bear all the injuries that were offered him. At last, when he saw no end of the evils which surrounded him, he resolved to send an ambassador to Rome again, to see whether through his friends he could mitigate the wrath of Augustus, and to have an interview with Augustus himself. And the ambassador he sent was Nicolaus of Damascus.

<sup>1</sup> This Aretas was now become so established a name for the kings of Arabia, that when the crown came to this Æneas, he changed his name to Aretas, as Havercamp here justly observes. See Antiq. xiii. 15, § 2.—W.

CHAP. X.

How Eurycles falsely accused Herod's Sons, and how their Father put them in prison, and wrote to Augustus about them. Of Syllæus, and how he was accused by Nicolaus.

§ 1.

THE troubles in Herod's family and about his sons at this time grew much worse; for it now appeared certain, nor was it unforeseen beforehand, that fortune threatened the greatest and most insupportable misfortunes possible to his kingdom. Their progress and increase at this time was due to the following cause. One Eurycles, a Lacedæmonian (a person of note in his own country, but a man of perverse mind, and so cunning in his pleasures and flattery, as to indulge both, and yet seem to indulge neither), visited Herod's court, and made him presents, but so that he received more presents from him. He also seized such opportunities of worming himself into Herod's friendship, that he became one of the most intimate of the king's friends. He lodged in Antipater's house, but he had access to and intimacy with Alexander, for he told him that he was in great favour with Archelaus the king of Cappadocia. He also pretended much respect to Glaphyra, and secretly cultivated a friendship with them all, but always observed what was said and done, that he might with calumnies please them all. In short, he behaved himself so to everybody as to appear to be his particular friend, and he made others believe that his associating with any one was for that person's advantage. So he won over Alexander, who was but young, and persuaded him that he might open his grievances to him with safety, but to nobody else. So he declared his grief to him, and how his father was alienated from him, and related also the affairs of his mother, and how Antiochus had driven him and his brother from their proper honour, and had the power over everything himself. He added that all this was intolerable, as his father had already come to hate them, and would neither admit them to his table, nor to his presence. Such were the complaints, as was but natural, of Alexander, as to the things that troubled him; and Eurycles retailed these words to Antipater: and told him, he did not inform him of them on his own account; but that, being overcome by his kindness, the great importance of the matter obliged him to do so, and he warned him to have a care of Alexander, for what he said was spoken with vehemence, and in the words themselves lay murder. So Antipater, thinking him to be his friend by this advice, gave him great presents upon all occasions, and at last persuaded him to inform Herod of this. So when he related to the king Alexander's displeasure, as discovered by the words he had heard him speak, he was easily believed, and brought the king to that pass, turning him about by his words and irritating him, that he made his hatred implacable: as he showed at that very time, for he immediately gave Eurycles a present of fifty talents. And he, when he had received them, went to Archelaus king of Cappadocia, and commended Alexander to him, and told him that he had been many ways useful to him in making reconciliation between him and his father. So he got money from him also, and went away, before his pernicious practices were found out; and when Eurycles returned to Lacedæmon, he did not leave off mischief making, and at last for his many acts of injustice was banished from his own country.

§ 2. As for Herod, he was not now in the temper he was in formerly towards Alexander and Aristobulus, when he had been content with only hearing calumnies of them when others told him, for he was now come to that pass of hatred as to urge men to speak against them, though they did not do it of themselves. He also observed all that was said, and put questions, and gave ear to everyone that would but speak, if they could but say anything against them, till at length he heard that Euaratus of Cos was a conspirator with Alexander, which news was to Herod the most agreeable and sweetest imaginable.

§ 3. But a still greater misfortune came upon the young men, for new calumnies against them were continually being fabricated, and, so to speak, as if it was everyone's task to lay some grievous thing to their charge, which might appear to be for the king's safety. There were two body-guards of Herod held in honour for their strength and height, Jucundus and Tyrannus, who had been cast off by Herod, who was displeased with them, and now used to ride with Alexander, and for their skill in their exercises were held in honour by him, and had some gold and other gifts bestowed upon them. Now the king having at once suspicion of these men, had them tortured, and they endured the torture courageously for a long time, but at last confessed that Alexander urged them to kill Herod when he was hunting wild beasts; for it could be said he fell from his horse, and was run through with his own spear, for he had once met with such a misfortune formerly. They also showed where there was money hidden in a stable under ground, and convicted the king's chief hunter of having given them the royal hunting spears, and weapons to Alexander's attendants, at Alexander's command.

§ 4. Next to these the commander of the garrison of Alexandria<sup>1</sup> was arrested and tortured; for he was accused of having promised to receive the young men into his fortress, and to supply them with money of the king which was stored up in that fortress. He confessed nothing himself; but his son came forward, and said it was so, and delivered up a letter which, so far as could be guessed, was in Alexander's hand-writing. Its contents were as follows. "When we have finished, by God's help, all that we have proposed to do, we will come to you: but endeavour, as you have promised, to receive us into your fortress." After this writing was produced, Herod had no longer any doubt about the treacherous designs of his sons against him. But Alexander said that Diophantus the scribe had imitated his hand-writing, and that the letter was a forgery of Antipater. For Diophantus appeared to be very clever in such practices, and was afterwards convicted of forging other papers, and therefore put to death.

§ 5. And the king produced before the multitude at Jericho those that had been tortured, in order to have them accuse the young men; and many of the people stoned these accusers to death. But when they were going to kill Alexander and Aristobulus likewise, the king would not permit them to do so, but restrained the multitude by the help of Ptolemy and Pheroras. However, the young men were put under a guard, and kept in custody, and nobody might any longer have access to them: and all that they did or said was observed, and the reproach and fear they were in was little or nothing different from that of condemned criminals. And one of them, Aristobulus, was so deeply affected, that he induced Salome, who was his aunt and mother-in-law, to sympathize with him in his calamities, and to hate him who had been persuaded to let things come to that pass; when he said to her, "Are not you also in danger of destruction, as the report goes that you disclosed beforehand all our affairs to Syllæus, when you were in hopes of being married to him?" But she immediately carried these words to her brother. And he, being no longer able to control his rage, gave command to bind them and keep them apart from one another, to write down the ill things they had done against their father, and send them on to Augustus. And when this was enjoined them, they wrote that they had laid no treacherous design, nor formed any plot against their father, but that they had intended to flee away, and that from the distress they were in, their lives being now suspected and full of anxiety.

§ 6. About this time there came an ambassador out of Cappadocia<sup>1</sup> from Archelaus, one Melas, who was a ruler under him. And Herod wishing to show Archelaus' ill-will to him, sent for Alexander, as he was in his bonds, and asked him again concerning their proposed flight, as to whither and how they had resolved to flee? Alexander replied, "To Archelaus, who had promised to send them thence to Rome, but that they had no wicked nor mischievous designs against their father, and that none of the charges fabricated against them by their adversaries was true; and that they wished Tyrannus and his associates were yet alive that they might have been examined more strictly, but that they had been suddenly slain by means

§ 7. When he had said this, Herod commanded that both Alexander and Melas should be carried to Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, and that she should be asked whether she did not know anything of plots against Herod? Now as soon as they came to her, and she saw Alexander in bonds, she beat her head, and in great consternation gave a deep and moving groan. The young man also fell into tears. This was so miserable a sight to those present, that, for a great while, they were not able to say or do anything; but at last Ptolemy, who had been ordered to bring Alexander, bade him say, if his wife were privy to his actions? He replied, “How is it possible, that she, whom I love better than my own soul, and by whom I have had children, should not know what I do?” Upon which she cried out, that “she knew of no wicked designs of his; but yet, if accusing herself falsely would tend to his preservation, she would confess all.” Then Alexander said, “There is no such wickedness as those (who ought least to do so) suspect, which either I have intended, or you know of, but this only, that we had resolved to retire to Archelaus, and from thence to Rome.” And when she also confessed this, Herod, supposing that Archelaus’ ill-will to him was fully proved, gave a letter to Olympus and Volumnius, and bade them, as they sailed by, to touch at Elæusa<sup>1</sup> in Cilicia, and give it to Archelaus, and when they had expostulated with him for having a hand in his sons’ plot against him, to sail thence to Rome; and if they found Nicolaus had gained any ground, and that Augustus was no longer displeased with Herod, to give him the letters and proofs which he sent ready prepared against the young men. As to Archelaus, he made this defence for himself, that he had promised to receive the young men, because it was both for their own and their father’s advantage to do so, lest he should take some violent step in the anger he was in because of his present suspicions; but that he had not promised to send them to Augustus, nor had he promised anything else to the young men that could show ill-will to him.

§ 8. When Olympus and Volumnius reached Rome, they had a good opportunity of delivering their letters to Augustus, because they found him reconciled to Herod. For Nicolaus' embassy had gone off as follows. As soon as he was come to Rome, and was about the court, he did not first only set about what he was come for, but he thought fit also to accuse Syllæus. Now the Arabians, even before he came to talk with them, openly quarrelled with one another, and some of them left Syllæus' party, and joined themselves to Nicolaus', and informed him of all the wicked things that had been done; and showed him evident proofs of the slaughter of a great number of Obodas' friends by Syllæus, for when they left Syllæus' party, they had carried off with them letters whereby they could convict him. When Nicolaus saw such an opportunity offered him, he made use of it in order to gain his own ends afterwards, being anxious to reconcile Augustus and Herod. For he knew very well that if he should desire to make a defence for Herod's acts, he would not be allowed that liberty; but that, if he desired to accuse Syllæus, an opportunity would present itself of speaking on Herod's behalf. So when the case was ready for hearing, and the day appointed, Nicolaus, in the presence of Aretas' ambassadors, accused Syllæus of various other things, and imputed to him the destruction of his king and of many others of the Arabians, and said he had borrowed money for no good purpose, and proved that he had been guilty of adultery, not only with women in Arabia but in Rome also. And he added, as the heaviest charge, that he had estranged Augustus from Herod, having said nothing true about the actions of Herod. When Nicolaus was come to this point, Augustus stopped him from going on, and desired him only to say as to Herod that he had not led an army into Arabia, nor slain two thousand five hundred men there, nor taken prisoners, nor pillaged the country. To this Nicolaus answered that he could prove conclusively that either none at all or but very few of those imputations of which he had been informed were true, for had they been true, he might justly have been angry at Herod. At this unexpected assertion Augustus was very attentive, and Nicolaus said, that there was a debt due to Herod of five hundred talents, and a bond, wherein it was written, that if the time appointed for payment had elapsed, it should be lawful to make reprisals in any part of the country. As for the expedition into Arabia, he said it was no hostile expedition, but a just demanding back of his own money, and that not immediately, nor so soon as the bond allowed, but that Herod had frequently gone to Saturninus and Volumnius, the governors of Syria; and that at last Syllæus had sworn at Berytus,<sup>1</sup> by the Emperor's fortune, that he would certainly pay the money within thirty days, and deliver up those that had fled from Herod's dominions. "And when Syllæus performed nothing of this, Herod went again before those governors, and upon their permission to make reprisals for the money, he went reluctantly out of his own dominions with a party of soldiers for that purpose. And this is all the war which these men so tragically describe; this was the expedition into Arabia. And how can this be called a war, when thy governors permitted it, and the bond allowed it, and it was not executed till thy name, O Cæsar Augustus, with that of the other gods, had been profaned? And now I must speak in order about the captives. There were robbers that dwelt in Trachonitis;<sup>2</sup> at first their number was no more than forty, but they became more numerous afterwards, and they escaped the punishment Herod would have inflicted on them, by making Arabia their head-quarters. Syllæus received them, and supported them with food to the detriment of all men, and gave them a country to inhabit, and received himself the gains they made by robbery. But he promised on oath that he would deliver up these men on the day that he fixed for payment of his debt; nor can he show that any other persons besides these were at this time taken out of Arabia, and indeed not all these either, but only so many as could not conceal themselves. And thus does the odious calumny of the captives appear to be no better than a fiction and lie, made on purpose to provoke thy indignation. For I say, that when the forces of the Arabians came upon us, and one or two of Herod's party fell, Herod only defended himself, and Nacebus the Arabian general fell, and about twenty-five others in all, and no more; whereas Syllæus, by multiplying every single soldier by a hundred, reckons the slain to have been two thousand five hundred."

§ 9. This speech greatly moved Augustus, and he turned to Syllæus full of rage, and asked him how many Arabians had been slain? And as he hesitated, and said he had been imposed upon, the conditions about the borrowed money were read, and the letters of the governors of Syria, and the complaints of all the cities that had been injured by the robbers. The conclusion of the matter was this, that Syllæus was condemned to die, and that Augustus was reconciled to Herod, and owned his repentance for the severe things he had written to him occasioned by calumny, and told Syllæus that he had induced him by his lying account to be guilty of ingratitude to a man that was his friend. In fine Syllæus was sent away to answer Herod's suit, and to repay the debt that he owed, and after that to be executed. But Augustus was still offended with Aretas, that he had taken upon himself the kingdom, without his consent being first obtained, for he had determined to bestow Arabia upon Herod; but the letters Herod had sent hindered him from doing so now. For Olympus and Volumnius, on finding that Augustus was now become favourable to Herod, thought fit immediately to deliver him the letters they were commanded by Herod to give him concerning his sons and the proofs of their crimes. When Augustus had read them, he thought it would not be proper to add another kingdom to him, now he was old, and on bad terms with his sons, so he admitted Aretas' ambassadors; and after he had just reprov'd his rashness, in not waiting till he received the kingdom from him, he accepted his presents, and confirmed him in his kingdom.

How Herod, by Permission of Augustus, accused his sons before a Council of Judges at Berytus; and what Tero suffered for using too much Liberty of Speech. Concerning also the Execution of the young Men, and their Burial at Alexandria.

AND Augustus being now reconciled to Herod wrote to him that he was grieved for him on account of his sons, and said if they had been guilty of any grave crimes against him, it would behove him to punish them as parricides (and he gave him authority to do so), but if they had only designed to flee away, he would have him give them an admonition, and not proceed to extremities with them. He also advised him to appoint and convene a council at Berytus, where the Romans had a colony, and to include the governors of Syria and Archelaus the king of Cappadocia, and as many more as he thought remarkable for their merit and friendship to him, and determine what should be done by their advice. These were the directions that Augustus gave. And Herod, when the letter was brought to him, was very glad of Augustus' reconciliation to him, and very glad also that he had complete authority given him over his sons. And somehow it happened that whereas before, in his adversity, though he had indeed shown himself severe, he had not been very rash or precipitate in procuring the destruction of his sons, he now, in his prosperity, took advantage of this change for the better, and the freedom he now had, to glut his hatred against them. He therefore sent round and invited whom he thought fit to this council, except Archelaus, for he would not invite him, either out of hatred to him, or because he thought he would be an obstacle to his designs.

§ 2. When the governors of Syria and the others whom he invited from the various cities were come to Berytus, he kept his sons in a certain village belonging to Sidon, called

Platana,<sup>1</sup> but near Berytus, that if they were called he might produce them, for he did not think fit to bring them before the council. And when there were one hundred and fifty persons present, Herod came in by himself alone, and accused his sons, and that in such a way as if it were not a melancholy accusation, and painful necessity in consequence of misfortune, but in such a way as was very indecent for a father to accuse his sons in. For he was very vehement and impassioned when he came to the demonstration of the crime they were accused of, and gave the greatest signs of fury and barbarity: nor would he suffer the council to judge of the weight of the evidence, but played the part of advocate himself in a manner most indecent in a father against his sons, and read what they had written, wherein there was no mention of any plot or contrivance against him, but only a confession that they had meant to flee away, containing also certain reproaches against him because of the ill-will he bore them. And when he came to those reproaches, he bellowed out most of all, and exaggerated what was said, as if they had confessed plotting against him, and swore that he would rather lose his life than hear such words. Lastly he said that he had sufficient authority both by nature and by Augustus' permission [to do what he thought fit.] He also mentioned a law of their country which enjoined that, if parents laid their hands on the head of him that was accused, the bystanders were obliged to cast stones at him, and so to kill him. But though he was ready to do this in his own country and kingdom, yet he said he waited for their determination; though they came not thither so much as judges, to condemn his sons for such manifest designs against him, whereby he had almost perished, but as persons who had an opportunity of joining him in his anger, for it was unworthy in any, even the most remote, to pass over such conspiracy [without punishment.]

§ 3. When the king had said this, and the young men had not been produced to make any defence for themselves, the members of the council perceived there was no chance of mildness and reconciliation, so they confirmed his authority. And Saturninus, a person who had been consul, and one of great influence, first pronounced his sentence, but with great moderation and considering the circumstances. He said, "That he condemned Herod's sons, but did not think they should be put to death. He had sons of his own, and to put one's son to death was a greater misfortune than any that could befall one by them." After him Saturninus' sons (for he had three sons that accompanied him, and were his lieutenants) pronounced the same sentence as their father. Volumnius' sentence, on the contrary, was to inflict death on such as had been so impiously undutiful to their father; and most of the rest said the same, insomuch that the conclusion was that the young men were condemned to die. Immediately afterwards Herod went away from thence, and took his sons to Tyre, where Nicolaus met him, having sailed back from Rome; of whom Herod inquired, after he had related to him what had passed at Berytus, what his friends at Rome thought about his sons. He answered, "What they had resolved to do to thee is impious, and thou oughtest to keep them in prison: and if thou thinkest anything further necessary, thou mayest indeed so punish them, that thou appear not to indulge thy anger more than to govern thyself by judgment; but if thou inclinest to the milder side, thou mayest absolve them, lest perhaps thy misfortunes be rendered incurable; and this is the opinion of most of thy friends at Rome." On this Herod was silent and very thoughtful, and bade Nicolaus sail along with him.

§ 4. On Herod's reaching Cæsarea,<sup>1</sup> everybody there was talking of his sons, and the kingdom was in suspense, and the people in great expectation as to what would become of them. For a terrible fear seized upon all men, lest the old dissensions of the family should come to a sad conclusion, and they were in great anxiety about their sufferings; nor was it without danger to say any hasty thing about the matter, or even to hear another saying it; but men's pity was forced to be shut up in themselves, which made their sorrow silent. But there was an old soldier of Herod's, whose name was Tero (who had a son of the same age as Alexander, and his friend), who was so bold as openly to speak out what others silently thought about the matter, and felt forced to cry out often among the multitude, saying in the most unguarded manner that truth had perished, and that justice was taken away from men, and that lies and malice prevailed, and brought such a mist upon public affairs, that offenders were not able to see the greatest ills that could befall men. And as he was so bold, he seemed to bring himself into danger by speaking so freely; but the reasonableness of what he said moved men to regard him as having behaved with great courage and seasonably. So every one heard what he said with pleasure; and although they provided for their own safety by keeping silent themselves, yet did they approve of the great freedom he took; for the expected tragedy constrained them to speak in behalf of Tero whatever they pleased.

§ 5. This man thrust himself into the king's presence with the greatest freedom, and desired to speak with him by himself alone, which the king permitted him to do, when he spoke as follows. "Since I am not able, O king, to bear the great concern I am in, I have preferred the use of this bold liberty that I now take (which is necessary and advantageous to you) to my own safety. Where is your understanding gone, and left your soul empty? Where is that extraordinary sagacity of yours gone, whereby you performed so many and such glorious actions? Whence comes this absence of friends and relations, though I judge those neither friends nor relations who overlook such horrid wickedness in your once happy kingdom. Do you not perceive what is doing? Will you slay these two young men, your sons by your queen, who are proficients in every virtue, and leave yourself destitute in your old age, and in the power of one son, who has very ill sustained the confidence placed in him, and to relations whose death you have so often resolved on yourself? Will you not take notice that the silence of the multitude at once sees the crime and abhors the case, and that the whole army and its officers have commiseration on the poor unhappy youths, and hatred to those that are the authors of this?" The king heard these words, and for some time with good temper. But what can one say? When Tero plainly touched upon the tragedy and the perfidiousness of Herod's domestics, he was moved at it: but when Tero went on further, and by degrees used an unbounded military freedom of speech, (for he was too boorish to accommodate himself to the occasion,) Herod was greatly vexed, and seeming to be rather reproached by his speech, than to be hearing what was for his advantage, as he learned thereby that the soldiers abhorred what he was about, and the officers were indignant at it, he gave orders that all whom Tero had named, and Tero himself, should be bound and kept in prison.

§ 6. When this was done, one Trypho, who was the king's barber, took the opportunity, and came and told the king, that Tero often urged him, when he shaved the king, to cut his throat with the razor, for so he should be among the chief of Alexander's friends, and receive great rewards from him. When he had said this, the king gave orders that Tero and his son and the barber should be tortured, which was done accordingly. And though Tero bore up himself, his son seeing his father already in a sad case, and without hope of deliverance, and perceiving what would be the consequence of his terrible sufferings, said that if the king would free him and his father from those torments for what he should say, he would tell the truth. And when the king had given his word to do so, he said that there was an agreement made, that Tero should lay violent hands on the king, because it was easy for him to approach him when he was alone; and if, when he had done so, he should suffer death for it, as was not unlikely, it would be an act of generosity done on behalf of Alexander. This was what Tero's son said, and thereby freed his father from the torture, but it is uncertain whether he had been thus forced by the torture to speak what was true, or whether it was a contrivance of his own to procure his own and his father's deliverance from their pain.

§ 7. As for Herod, if he had before any doubt about putting his sons to death, there was now no longer any room left in his soul for it; but as he had rejected whatever might afford him the least suggestion of reasoning better about the matter, so he made haste at once to bring his purpose to a conclusion. He therefore brought three hundred of the officers that were accused, as also Tero and his son, and the barber that accused them, before an assembly, and brought charges against them all; and the multitude stoned them with whatever came to hand, and so killed them. Alexander also and Aristobulus were brought to Sebaste<sup>1</sup> by their father's command, and there strangled; and their dead bodies were carried by night to Alexandrium, where their uncle on the mother's side, and most of their ancestors, had been buried.

§ 8. And now perhaps it may not seem strange to some that such a long-standing hatred should so grow, and proceed so far as to overcome nature: but it may justly deserve consideration, whether it is to be laid to the charge of the young men, that they gave such a handle to their father's anger, and led him to do what he did, and by going on long in the same way made things past remedy, and caused him to use them so unmercifully; or whether it is to be laid to the father's charge, that he was so hard-hearted, and so very greedy in the desire of power and of other kinds of glory, that he would take no one into partnership with him, that so whatever he wished might be law; or indeed, whether Fortune has not greater power than all prudent forecasting, whence we are persuaded that human actions are determined beforehand by her by an inevitable necessity, and we call her Fate, because there is nothing which is not done by her. However, I suppose it will be sufficient to compare this notion with that other, which attributes somewhat to ourselves, and renders men not unaccountable for the perversity of their lives, which notion is no other than the philosophical view of our ancient law. As to the other two causes of this sad event, anybody may partly lay the blame on the young men, who under the influence of youthful vanity, and pride at their royal birth, listened to the calumnies that were raised against their father, while certainly they were not kindly judges of the actions of his life, but ill-natured in suspecting, and intemperate in speaking of them, and so on both accounts easily led away by those who observed them, and informed of them to gain favour. However, their father cannot be thought worthy of excuse as to his impiety to them, seeing that, without any certain evidence of their treacherous designs against him, and without any proofs that they had made preparation for such an attempt, he had the heart to kill his own sons, who were of very comely bodies and the great darlings of all other men, and no way deficient in their pursuits, whether hunting, or warlike exercises, or speaking upon occasional topics. For in all these things they were skilful, and especially Alexander, who was the eldest. And certainly it would have been sufficient, even though Herod had condemned them, to have kept them alive in bonds, or to have let them live at a distance from his dominions in banishment, as he was surrounded by the Roman forces, which were a strong security to him, and would prevent his suffering anything from either a sudden attack or from open force. But for him to kill them so quickly, in order to gratify a passion that mastered him, was a proof of excessive impiety; especially as he was guilty of so great a crime in his old age. Nor will the delay that he made, and the late time in which the crime was done, plead at all for his excuse. For when a man is taken by surprise and moved to commit a wicked action, although it be a grave crime, yet it is a thing that is always happening; but to do it deliberately, and after frequent attempts, and as frequent delays, to undertake and accomplish it at last, was the action of a murderous mind, and one not easily moved from what is evil. Moreover Herod showed this temper in what he did afterwards, when he did not spare those that seemed to be the best beloved of his friends that were left, in regard to whom, though the justice of their punishment caused those that perished to be the less pitied, yet was the barbarity of the man as great, in that he did not abstain from their slaughter either. But of these persons I shall have occasion to speak more hereafter.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF FOURTEEN YEARS.—FROM THE DEATH OF ALEXANDER AND ARISTOBULUS TO THE BANISHMENT OF ARCHELAUS.

CHAP. I.

How Antipater was hated by all the Nation for the Death of his Brothers ; and how, for that Reason, he courted his Friends at Rome, by giving them many Presents ; as he did also to Saturninus, the Governor of Syria, and to others. Also concerning Herod's Wives and Children.

§ 1.

WHEN Antipater had thus got rid of his brothers, and brought his father into the highest degree of impiety, till he was haunted by the Furies for what he had done, his hopes did not succeed to his mind as to his future. For although he was delivered from the fear of his brothers being his rivals as to the government, yet did he find it a very hard thing, and almost impracticable, to come at the kingdom, because the hatred of the nation was become very great against him. And besides this very disagreeable circumstance, the alienation of the soldiers from him grieved him still more, for these kings derived from them all the safety which they had, whenever they found the nation desirous of innovation ; and he had drawn all this danger upon himself by his destruction of his brothers. However, he governed the nation jointly with his father, being indeed no other than a king already ; and he was the more trusted by Herod and got his greater good-will for what it would have been well for him to have been put to death, as he seemed to have informed against his brothers from his concern for the preservation of Herod, and not rather out of his ill-will to them, and still more to his father himself. Such was the accursed state he was in. Now, all Antipater's contrivances tended to pave the way to take off Herod, that he might have nobody to accuse him in the vile practices he was devising, and that Herod might have no refuge, nor any to afford him assistance, if Antipater became his open enemy; inso-much that the very plots he had laid against his brothers were occasioned by the hatred he bore his father. And at this time he was more than ever set upon the carrying out of his attempts against Herod, because, if he were once dead, the kingdom would now be firmly secured to him; but, if Herod were to live any longer, he would himself be in danger upon discovery of the wickedness of which he had been the contriver, and his father would of necessity then become his enemy. And so he became very bountiful to his father's friends, and bestowed great sums on several of them, in order so to take off men's hatred against him. He also sent great presents to his friends especially at Rome, to gain their good-will, and above all to Saturninus, the governor of Syria. He also hoped to gain the favour of Saturninus' brother by the large presents he bestowed on him; and also used the same treatment to [Salome] the king's sister, who had married one of Herod's chief friends. And as he counterfeited friendship to those with whom he conversed, he was very clever in gaining their belief, and very cunning in hiding his hatred against any that he really did hate. But he could not impose upon his aunt, who had understood him a long time, and was a woman not easily to be deluded, as she had already used every possible caution to prevent his malicious designs. And although Antipater's maternal uncle had married her daughter, and that by Antipater's contrivance and management, as she had before been married to Aristobulus, while Salome's other daughter was married to Callias the son of her husband, yet that marriage was no obstacle to her discovering his wicked designs, any more than her former relationship to him could prevent her hatred of him. Now Herod had compelled Salome, when she was in love with Syllæus the Arabian, and had a great fondness for him, to marry Alexas, which match was arranged by Julia, who persuaded Salome not to refuse it, lest there should be open enmity between the brother and sister, as Herod had sworn that he would never be friends with Salome, if she would not accept Alexas for her husband. And she listened to Julia as being the Emperor's wife, and also because she advised her to nothing but what was very much for her advantage. At this time, also, Herod sent back king Archelaus' daughter, who had been Alexander's wife, to her father, returning the portion he had with her out of his own estate, that there might be no dispute between them about it.

§ 2. Now Herod himself brought up his sons' children with very great care; for Alexander had two sons by Glaphyra; and Aristobulus had three sons and two daughters by Berenice, Salome's daughter; and once when his friends were with him, he produced the children before them, and deploring the fortune of his own sons, prayed that no such ill fortune might befall their children, but that they might improve in virtue, and obtain what they justly deserved, and so might make him return for his care of their education. He also promised them in marriage when they should come to the proper age, the elder of Alexander's sons to Pheroras' daughter, and Antipater's daughter to Aristobulus' son. He also allotted one of Aristobulus' daughters to Antipater's son, and Aristobulus' other daughter to Herod, a son of his own by the high priest's daughter; for it is the ancient practice among us to have several wives at the same time. Now, the king made these betrothals for the children out of commiseration of them now they were fatherless, endeavouring to render Antipater kind to them by these intermarriages. But Antipater did not fail to continue in the same temper of mind to his brothers' children as he had been in to his brothers themselves; and his father's affection for them irritated him, as he thought that they would become greater than ever his brothers had been, especially when they came to men's estate, as Archelaus, a king, would support his daughter's sons, and Pheroras, a tetrarch, would have one of the daughters as wife for his son. What provoked him further was that all the multitude commiserated these fatherless children, and so hated him, and he feared that all would come out, since they were no strangers to his malignity to his brothers. He manœuvred, therefore, to upset his father's arrangements, thinking it a terrible thing that they should be so related to him, and be powerful. And Herod yielded to him, and changed his resolution at his entreaty: and the arrangement now was, that Antipater himself should marry Aristobulus' daughter, and Antipater's son Pheroras' daughter. And the betrothals were changed in this manner against the king's real wishes.

§ 3. Now Herod the king had at this time nine wives, one of them Antipater's mother, and another the high priest's daughter, by whom he had a son of his own name. He had also one who was his brother's daughter, and another his sister's daughter, but these two had no children. One of his wives also was of the Samaritan nation, and her sons were Antipas and Archelaus, and her daughter Olympias, who afterwards married Joseph, the king's brother's son; but Archelaus and Antipas were brought up at the house of a certain private man at Rome. Herod also had as wife Cleopatra of Jerusalem, and by her he had Herod and Philip, which last was also brought up at Rome. Pallas also was another of his wives, who bore him a son Phasaelus. And besides these, he had for wives Phaedra and Elpis, by whom he had two daughters, Roxane and Salome. As for his elder daughters by the same mother as Alexander and Aristobolus, and whom Pheroras had refused to marry, he gave the one in marriage to Antipater, the king's sister's son, and the other to Phasaelus, his brother's son. And this was the posterity of Herod.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the Babylonian Jew Zamaris. Also concerning the Plots laid by Antipater against his Father. Also about the Pharisees.

§ 1.

AND now Herod, being desirous of securing himself against the Trachonites, resolved to build a village as large as a city for the Jews between him and them, which might make his own country difficult of access, and which he might make a point d'appui to make sudden sallies upon the enemy from a short distance, and so do them a mischief. So when he heard that there was a man that was a Jew come out of Babylonia with five hundred horsemen (all of whom could shoot their arrows as they rode on horseback) who with a hundred of his relations had crossed over the Euphrates, and now dwelt at Antioch near Daphne in Syria, where Saturninus, who was then governor of Syria, had given them a place to dwell in called Valatha, he sent for this man and his companions, and promised to give him land in the toparchy called Batanæa, which is bounded by Trachonitis, wishing to make his settlement a point d'appui against the enemy. He also promised to let him hold the country free from tribute, and that they should dwell there without paying any such customs as used to be paid, and gave it them tax free.

§ 2. This Babylonian was induced by these offers to settle there, and took possession of the land, and built fortresses in it and a village, which he called Bathyra.<sup>1</sup> And he became a protection to the inhabitants against the Trachonites, and also kept those Jews who came out of Babylon to offer their sacrifices at Jerusalem from being hurt by the Trachonite robbers; so that many came to him from all those parts where the ancient Jewish laws were observed, and the country became full of people because of the universal freedom from taxes. This continued during the life of Herod; but when Philip, who was [tetrarch] after him, took over the government, he made them pay a few taxes, but for a little while only; and although Agrippa the Great, and his son of the same name, harassed them greatly, yet they would not take their liberty away. And though the Romans have now taken the government into their own hands from them, they still give them the privilege of their freedom, and oppress them merely with the imposition of taxes. But I shall treat these matters more fully in the progress of this history.

§ 3. At length Zamaris, the Babylonian, to whom Herod had given that country for a possession, died, having lived virtuously, and left good children behind him, one of whom was Jacimus, who was famous for his valour, and taught the Babylonians under him how to ride their horses, and a troop of them were body-guards to the forementioned kings. And when Jacimus died in old age, he left a son whose name was Philip, one of great strength in his hands, and in other respects also more eminent for his valour than any one; so that there was a firm friendship and lasting good-will between him and king Agrippa; and whatever army the king kept he constantly trained and led wherever they had occasion to march.

§ 4. The affairs of Herod being in the condition I have described, everything depended upon Antipater; and his power was such, that he could do what he pleased, by his father's concession, who believed in his good-will and fidelity to himself, and he ventured to use his powers still further, because his wicked designs were concealed from his father, and he made him believe everything he said. He was also formidable to all, not so much because of the power and authority he had as for his cunning malice; and Pheroras especially paid court to him, and received the like friendship in return. And Antipater had cunningly surrounded him by a company of women, whom he placed about him; for Pheroras was completely under the influence of his wife, and her mother, and her sister; and that notwithstanding the hatred he bore them for the indignities they had offered to his virgin daughters. Yet did he put up with them, and nothing was to be done without the women, who had got round this man, and continued still to assist each other in all things, so that Antipater was entirely under their influence, owing both to himself and his mother, for these four women<sup>1</sup> all said the same thing; and the opinions of Pheroras and Antipater only differed in a few points of no consequence. But the king's sister [Salome] was their antagonist, who for a good while had pried into all their affairs, and knew that this friendship of theirs was made in order to do Herod some harm, and was disposed to inform the king of it. And as they knew that their friendship did not please Herod, they contrived that their meetings should not be discovered, and pretended to hate one another, and abused one another as time and opportunity allowed, and especially when Herod was present, or when any one was there that would tell him ; but their intimacy was greater than ever in secret. This was the course they took ; but they could not conceal from Salome either their contrivance when first they set about this plan, or when they had made some progress in it, but she searched out everything ; and, exaggerating the matter to her brother, disclosed to him their secret meetings and computations, and counsels taken in a clandestine manner, which, if they were not in order to destroy him, might well enough have been open and public. And though to appearance they were at variance, and spoke about one another as if they intended one another a mischief, they agreed well enough together when they were out of the sight of people ; for when they were alone by themselves, they acted in concert, and professed that they would never leave off their friendship, but would fight against those from whom they concealed their designs. And thus did she search out these things, and get a perfect knowledge of them, and then told her brother of them ; who was himself aware of a great deal of what she said, but still durst not act upon it, because of the suspicion he had that much of his sister's tales was calumny. Now there was a certain sect of Jews, who valued themselves highly upon the strict observance of the law of their fathers, and made men believe they were highly favoured by God, and had great influence over women. They were called Pharisees, and ventured even to oppose kings. They were a cunning set, and prompt to open fighting and mischief. And when all the rest of the Jewish people gave assurance by oath of their good-will to the Emperor and to the king's government, these very men would not swear, who were more than six thousand ; and when the king imposed a fine upon them, Pheroras' wife paid the fine for them. And they to requite that kindness of hers (for they were believed to have foreknowledge of things to come by divine inspiration) foretold that God had decreed that Herod's sway should cease, and that his posterity should be deprived of it, and that the kingdom should come to her and Pheroras and their children. These predictions (for they were not concealed from Salome) were told the king ; as also how they had corrupted some persons about the palace itself: and the king slew such of the Pharisees as were chiefly accused, and the eunuch Bagoas, and one Carus the royal catamite, who excelled all his contemporaries in beauty. He slew also those of his own household who had consented to what the Pharisees foretold. As for Bagoas, he had been puffed up by them as though he should be called father and benefactor of him who was by the prediction to be their king: for this king would have all things in his power, and would enable Bagoas to marry and beget children.

CHAP. III.

Of the Enmity between Herod and Pheroras; how Herod sent Antipater to Augustus; and of the Death of Pheroras.

§ 1.

WHEN Herod had punished those Pharisees who had been convicted of these crimes, he gathered together an assembly of his friends, and accused Pheroras' wife; and ascribing the outrages done to the virgins to the audacity of the woman, brought an accusation against her for the dishonour she had brought upon him. He added that she had stirred up strife between him and his brother, and had by her ill temper brought them into a state of war, to the best of her power, both by her words and actions; and that the fines which he had imposed had not been paid, for the offenders had escaped punishment by her means; and that nothing which had of late been done had been done without her. "And so Pheroras will do well, if he will, of his own accord, and at his own initiative, and not at my entreaty, or as following my opinion, put this his wife away, as one that will still be the occasion of strife between us. And now Pheroras, if thou valuest thy relation to me, put this wife of thine away; for so thou wilt continue to be a brother to me, and wilt abide in thy love to me." Then said Pheroras, (although moved by the force of Herod's words,) that he would neither do so unjust a thing as renounce his brotherly relation to him, nor leave off his affection for his wife; that he would rather choose to die than live and be deprived of a wife that was so dear to him. Thereupon Herod put off his anger against Pheroras on these accounts, although he exacted a severe punishment, for he forbade Antipater and his mother to associate with Pheroras, and bade them take care to avoid the assemblies of the women: which they promised to do, but still got together when an opportunity presented itself, and both Pheroras and Antipater had their own merry meetings. The report went also, that Antipater had criminal connection with Pheroras' wife, and that they were brought together by Antipater's mother.

§ 2. But Antipater was now suspicious of his father, and afraid that his hatred to him would increase: so he wrote to his friends at Rome, and bade them signify to Herod, that he was to send Antipater without delay to Augustus. And Herod did this, and sent most handsome presents with Antipater, as also his testament, wherein he appointed Antipater to be his successor: and if Antipater should die first, Herod his son by the high priest's daughter was to succeed. And Syllæus the Arabian went with Antipater to Rome, though he had done nothing of all that Augustus had enjoined, and Antipater accused him of the same crimes as he had been formerly accused of by Nicolaus. Syllæus was also accused by Aretas of having without his consent slain many of the chief Arabians at Petra, and particularly Sohemus, a man that deserved to be honoured by all men, and of having slain Fabatus a slave of Augustus. Syllæus was also accused on the following account. Corinthus was one of Herod's body-guards, and greatly trusted by him. Syllæus had tempted this man by the offer of a great sum of money to kill Herod, and he had promised to do so. When Fabatus learnt of this, for Syllæus himself told him of it, he informed the king of it; and he had Corinthus arrested and put to the torture, and so wormed the whole conspiracy out of him. He also got two other Arabians arrested, trusting to the information of Corinthus; the one the head of a tribe, and the other a friend of Syllæus, who were both put by the king to the torture, and confessed that they had come to encourage Corinthus not to fail in courage, and to assist him with their own hands in the murder, if need should require their assistance. And Saturninus, upon Herod's discovering the whole matter to him, sent them to Rome.

§ 3. Herod also commanded Pheroras, since he was so obstinate in his affection for his wife, to retire to his own tetrarchy; which he did very willingly, and swore many oaths that he would not come back again, till he heard that Herod was dead. Indeed, when Herod was ill, and Pheroras was asked to come to him before he died, that he might entrust him with some injunctions, he had such a regard to his oath, that he would not come to him. But Herod did not imitate Pheroras in his conduct, but changed his purpose [not to see him,] which he before had, and as soon as Pheroras began to be ill, went to him without being sent for. And when he was dead, he took care of his funeral, and had his body brought to Jerusalem and buried there, and appointed a solemn mourning for him. Now this [death of Pheroras] became the beginning of Antipater's misfortunes, although he had already sailed for Rome, God being now about to punish him for the murder of his brothers. I shall narrate this matter very fully, that it may be a warning to mankind, that they take care to conduct their whole lives by the rules of virtue.

CHAP. IV.

Pheroras' Wife is accused by his Freedmen of poisoning him; and how Herod, upon examining the Matter by Torture, found the Poison; but also that it had been prepared for himself by his son Antipater; and how, upon Inquiry by Torture, he discovered the dangerous Designs of Antipater.

§ 1.

AS soon as Pheroras was dead, and his funeral was over, two of Pheroras' freedmen, who were much esteemed by him, went to Herod, and entreated him not to leave the murder of his brother unavenged, but to examine into the cause of his strange and unhappy death. As he was moved by these words, for they seemed to him to be true, they said that Pheroras had supped with his wife the day before he fell ill, and that a certain potion was brought him in a kind of food he was not used to eat, and that when he had eaten it he died of it; that this potion was brought out of Arabia by a woman, nominally as a love potion, (for it was called a philter,) but in reality to kill Pheroras; for the Arabian women were skilful in making such poisons, and the woman to whom they ascribed this, was confessedly a most intimate friend of one of Syllæus' mistresses, and both the mother and sister of Pheroras' wife had been to the places where she lived, and had persuaded her to sell them this potion, and had returned with it the day before Pheroras' last supper. At these words the king was exasperated, and put the women slaves and also some free women to the torture, and as the matter was by no means clear, because none of them would speak out, at last one of them, after suffering extreme agonies, said no more but that she prayed that God would send the like agonies upon Antipater's mother, who had been the cause of these miseries to all of them. This prayer induced Herod to increase the women's tortures, till thereby all was discovered: the merry-makings, the secret meetings, and the disclosing of what he had said to his son alone unto Pheroras' women.<sup>1</sup> (Now what Herod had charged Antipater to conceal, was the gift of a hundred talents to him not to have any dealings with Pheroras.) It also came out what hatred Antipater bore to his father, and how he complained to his mother how very long his father lived, and that he was himself almost an old man, insomuch, that if the kingdom ever came to him, it would not afford him the same pleasure; and that there were a great many of his brothers, or brothers' children, being reared in hopes of the kingdom, as well as himself, all which made his own hopes of it uncertain; and even now, if he should himself not live, Herod had ordered that the kingdom should be conferred, not on his son, but rather on his brother. He had also accused the king of great barbarity, and of the slaughter of his sons, and had said that it was the fear he was in, lest he should do the like to him, that made him contrive his journey to Rome, and made Pheroras contrive to go to his own tetrarchy.

§ 2. All this tallied with what Herod's sister had told him, and tended greatly to corroborate her testimony, and to free her from the suspicion of unfaithfulness to him. And the king having satisfied himself of the spite which Doris, Antipater's mother, as well as Antipater himself, bore to him, took away from her all her fine ornaments, which were worth many talents, and then sent her away, and entered into friendship with Pheroras' women. But he who most of all irritated the king against his son was one Antipater, a Samaritan, the steward of Antipater the king's son, who, when he was tortured, said among other things that Antipater had prepared a deadly potion, and given it to Pheroras, bidding him give it to his father during his own absence, and when he was too remote to have the least suspicion cast upon him as to it: and that Antiphilus, one of Antipater's friends, brought the potion out of Egypt, and that it was sent to Pheroras by Theudion, the brother of the mother of the king's son Antipater, and so came to Pheroras' wife, her husband having given it her to keep. And when the king questioned her about it, she confessed, and as she was running to fetch it, she threw herself down from the house-top, but did not kill herself, because she fell upon her feet. And so, when the king comforted her, and promised her and her domestics pardon, upon condition of their concealing nothing of the truth from him, but threatened her with the utmost tortures if she obstinately determined to conceal anything, she promised and swore that she would speak out and tell how everything was done; and said what most took to be entirely true. "The potion was brought out of Egypt by Antiphilus, and his brother, who is a physician, procured it; and when Theudion brought it us, I kept it upon Pheroras' committing it to me, and it was prepared by Antipater for you. So when Pheroras was fallen ill, and you came to him and took care of him, and when he saw the kindness you had to him, his mind was broken thereby. So he called me to him, and said to me; 'Antipater has deluded me, wife, in this affair of his father and my brother, by persuading me to have a murderous intention to him, and procuring a potion for that purpose. Go therefore and fetch the potion, (since my brother appears to have still the same kind disposition to me as he had formerly, and I do not expect to live long myself), and, that I may not defile my forefathers by the murder of a brother, burn it before my face:’ and I immediately brought it, and did as my husband bade me, and burnt most of the potion, but left a little of it, that if the king, after Pheroras’ death, should treat me ill, I might poison myself, and so get rid of my miseries.” Upon her saying this, she brought out the potion, and the box it was in, before them all. And another brother of Antiphilus, and his mother also, under the agony of pain and torture, confessed the same things, and recognised the box. The high priest’s daughter also, who was the king’s wife, was accused of having been privy to all this, and of having resolved to conceal it; so Herod divorced her, and blotted her son out of his testament, wherein he had been mentioned as one to reign after him; and he took the high priesthood away from his father-in-law, Simon the son of Boethus, and appointed Matthias the son of Theophilus, who was born at Jerusalem, to be high priest in his room.

§ 3. Meantime Bathyllus, Antipater’s freedman, also came from Rome, and upon being tortured, was found to have brought another potion, to give to Antipater’s mother and to Pheroras, that if the former potion did not operate upon the king, this at least might carry him off. There came also letters from Herod’s friends at Rome, by the advice and at the suggestion of Antipater, to accuse Archelaus and Philip, as if they calumniated their father on account of the slaughter of Alexander and Aristobulus, and as if they commiserated their deaths; and as if they concluded, because they were sent for home (for their father had already recalled them), that they themselves were also to be put to death. These letters were concocted for great rewards by Antipater’s friends. And Antipater himself also wrote to his father about Archelaus and Philip, and laid the heaviest things to their charge; yet did he entirely excuse them of any guilt, for he said they were but striplings, and so imputed their words to their youth. He added that he had himself been very busy in the affair relating to Syllæus, and in paying court to great men, and on that account had bought splendid ornaments to present them with, which had cost him two hundred talents. Now, one may wonder how it came about, while so many accusations were laid against Antipater in Judæa for seven months before this, that he was not made acquainted with any of them. The explanation of this is that the roads were carefully guarded, and that men hated Antipater: for there was nobody who would run any hazard himself to procure Antipater's safety.

CHAP. V.

Antipater sails Home from Rome to his Father; and how he was accused by Nicolaus of Damascus, and condemned to die by his Father, and by Quintilius Varus, who was then Governor of Syria; and how he was imprisoned till the Emperor should decide on the Case.

§ 1.

NOW Herod, upon Antipater's writing to him, that having done all that he was to do, and as he was to do it, he would soon return, concealed his anger against him, and wrote back to him, and bade him not delay his journey, lest any harm should befall himself in his absence. At the same time also he made some little complaints about Antipater's mother, but promised that he would drop those complaints on Antipater's return. He also expressed his entire affection for him, fearing lest he should have some suspicion of him, and defer his journey home, and lest, while he lived at Rome, he should plot for the kingdom, and do him some harm. Antipater got this letter in Cilicia, but had received an account of Pheroras' death before at Tarentum,<sup>1</sup> which news affected him deeply, not out of any affection for Pheroras, but because he had died without having murdered Herod, as he had promised to do. And when he was at Celenderis<sup>2</sup> in Cilicia, he began to deliberate whether he should sail home, as he was much put out at the banishment of his mother. Now, some of his friends advised him to tarry a while and wait for further information. But others advised him to sail home without delay, for if he were once arrived there, he would soon put an end to all accusations, and nothing now afforded any weight to his accusers but his absence. He was persuaded by these last and set sail, and landed at the haven called Sebastus,<sup>1</sup> which Herod had built at vast expense, and called Sebastus in honour of Cæsar Augustus.<sup>2</sup> And now Antipater was evidently in a sorry plight, as nobody came to him or saluted him, as they did at his going away, with good wishes or joyful acclamations; nor was there now anything to hinder the people from receiving him, on the contrary, with bitter curses, as they supposed he was come to receive punishment for the murder of his brothers.

§ 2. Now, Quintilius Varus was at this time at Jerusalem, being sent to succeed Saturninus as governor of Syria, and was come as an adviser to Herod, who had asked his advice in the present state of affairs; and as they were sitting together, Antipater came in, without knowing anything of the matter; so he entered the palace clothed in purple. The porters received him indeed in, but excluded his friends. And now he was in great alarm, and clearly perceived the position he was in, for upon going to salute his father he was repulsed by him, and Herod called him a murderer of his brothers, and a plotter of destruction against himself, and told him that Varus should hear everything and be his judge the very next day. So he found that the misfortune he now first heard of was already upon him, the greatness of which dismayed him, and his mother and wife soon had an interview with him (his wife was the daughter of Antigonus, who was king of the Jews before Herod), from whom he learned everything, and prepared for his defence.

§ 3. The following day Varus and the king sat together in judgment, and both their friends were also called in, as also the king's relations, and his sister Salome, and as many as could discover anything, and all those who had been tortured ; and besides these, some slaves of Antipater's mother, who had been arrested a little before Antipater's coming, having on them a letter, the sum of which was that Antipater was not to return home, as all was come to his father's knowledge, and that Augustus was the only refuge he had left to prevent both him and her falling into Herod's hands. Then did Antipater fall down at his father's feet, and besought him not to prejudge his case, but that his father would first hear him, and not decide against him except upon evidence. Then Herod ordered him to be brought into the midst, and then lamented that he had had children, from whom he had suffered such great misfortunes before, and now Antipater plotted against him in his old age. He also touched on the maintenance and education he had given his sons, and what seasonable supplies of wealth he had afforded them as they desired, though none of those favours had hindered them from plotting against him, and from bringing his very life into danger, in order to gain his kingdom in an impious manner, by taking away his life before either the course of nature, or their father's wishes, or justice, required that the kingdom should come to them. As to Antipater, he wondered what hopes could bring him to such a pass as to be bold enough to attempt such things ; for he had by his testament declared him in writing his successor in the kingdom, and while he was alive he was in no respect inferior to him either in his splendid dignity or in power and authority, as he had no less than fifty talents for his yearly income, and had received for his journey to Rome no less than thirty talents. He also accused him as to his brothers, saying if they were guilty he had imitated their example, and if they were innocent, he had brought him groundless accusations against his near relations ; for he had been informed of all those things by him, and by nobody else, and had done what he had done by his advice, and he now absolved them from all that was criminal, as he had become the inheritor of the guilt of their parricide.

§ 4. When Herod had thus spoken, he fell a-weeping, and was not able to say any more ; but at his desire Nicolaus of Damascus, who was the king's friend, and very intimate with him, and well acquainted with all his affairs, proceeded to what remained, and stated all that concerned the proofs and evidences of the facts. Upon which Antipater, in his defence, turned to his father, and enlarged upon the many indications he had given of his good-will to him; and enumerated the honours that had been done himself, which would not have been done, had he not deserved them by his regard to his father; for he had made provision for everything that could be foreseen, as to giving his father the wisest advice; and whenever there was occasion for the labour of his hands, he had not grudged any such pains for him. He added that it was unlikely that he who had delivered his father from so many treacherous contrivances of others against him, should himself plot against him, and so lose all the reputation he had gained for his virtue then by the wickedness which succeeded it, and that though he was already appointed his successor, and had nothing to prevent his enjoying the royal honour with his father at present; nor was it likely that a person who had half the royal authority without any danger, and with a good character, should hunt after the whole with infamy and danger, and that when it was doubtful whether he could obtain it or not, and when he had seen the punishment of his brothers, and was both the informer and accuser against them when otherwise their guilt would not have been discovered; nay, was himself the author of the punishment inflicted upon them, when it appeared evident that they were guilty of a wicked attempt against their father; and even the contentions there were in the king's family, were proofs that he had ever managed affairs in the sincerest affection to his father. And as to what he had done at Rome Augustus was a witness, who was no more to be imposed upon than God himself: of whose opinion his letters sent there were sufficient evidence, and it was not reasonable to prefer the calumnies of such as proposed to raise disturbances to those letters; most of which calumnies had been raised during his absence, which gave opportunity to his enemies to forge them, which they would not have been able to do if he had been at home. Moreover, he descanted on the weakness of evidence obtained by torture, which was commonly false; because the distress men were in under such torture naturally obliged them to say many things in order to please those in power. He also offered himself to the torture * * *.

§ 5. Hereupon there was a change observed in the assembly, as they greatly pitied Antipater, who, by weeping and putting on a countenance suitable to his sad case, moved even his enemies to compassion; and it appeared plainly that Herod himself was affected in his own mind, although he was not willing it should be taken notice of. Then did Nicolaus begin to recapitulate what the king had begun, and that with great bitterness; and summed up all the evidence which arose from the tortures, or from the witnesses. He mainly enlarged upon the king's virtue, which he had exhibited in the maintenance and education of his sons, though he had never gained any advantage thereby, but had still fallen from one misfortune to another. And although he owned that he was not so much surprised at the thoughtless behaviour of Herod's other sons, who were younger, and were besides corrupted by wicked counsellors, who had caused them to wipe out of their minds all the righteous dictates of nature, and that from a desire of coming to the throne sooner than they ought to do; yet he could not but justly stand amazed at the horrible wickedness of Antipater, who, although he had had great benefits bestowed on him by his father, yet was not more tamed in mind than the most envenomed serpents, and even those creatures admitted of some mitigation, and would not bite their benefactors; and Antipater had also not let the misfortunes of his brothers be any hindrance to him, but had gone on to imitate their barbarity none the less. "Yet wast thou (he continued) O Antipater! the informer as to the wicked actions they had dared, and the searcher out of the evidence against them, and the author of the punishment they underwent upon their detection. Nor do we say this as accusing thee for being so zealous in thy anger against them, but we are astounded at thy endeavours to imitate their wicked behaviour; and we discover thereby that thou didst not act thus for the safety of thy father, but for the destruction of thy brothers, that by thy expressed hatred of their impiety thou mightest be believed to be a lover of thy father, and mightest so get power enough to do mischief with the greater impunity; which design thy actions indeed demonstrate. It is true thou tookest thy brothers off, because thou didst convict them of their wicked designs, but thou didst not yield up to justice those who were their fellow-conspirators, and so didst make it evident to all men, that thou madest covenant with them against thy father, as thou chocest to be the accuser of thy brothers, wishing to gain for thyself alone the advantage of laying plots to kill thy father, and so to enjoy double pleasure, which is truly worthy of the evil disposition which thou didst openly show against thy brothers; on which account thou didst rejoice, as having done a most famous exploit, nor was that thought unworthy of thee. But if thy intention was otherwise, then art thou worse than they; for while thou didst contrive to hide thy treachery against thy father, thou didst hate them, not as plotters against thy father, for in that case thou wouldst not thyself have fallen into the like crime, but as successors to his throne, and more worthy of that succession than thyself. Thou wouldst kill thy father after thy brothers, lest thy lies raised against them might be detected; and lest thou shouldst suffer the punishment thou hadst deserved, thou hadst a mind to exact that punishment from thy unhappy father, and didst devise such an uncommon sort of parricide as the world never yet saw. For thou, who art his son, didst not only plot against a father, but against one who loved thee, and had been thy benefactor, and had made thee in reality his partner in the kingdom, and had openly declared thee his successor, so that thou wast not forbidden to taste the sweetness of authority already, and hadst sure hope of what was to come by thy father's determination and the security of a written testament. But certainly thou didst not estimate these things according to thy father's virtue, but according to thy own wicked thoughts, and wert desirous to take away the part of the kingdom that remained from thy too indulgent father, and soughtest to destroy with thy deeds him whom thou in words pretendedst to preserve. Nor wast thou content to be wicked thyself, but thou also filledst thy mother's head with thy devices, and raisedst disturbances among thy brothers, and hadst the boldness to call thy father a wild beast; whilst thou hadst thyself a mind more cruel than any serpent, whence thou sentest out that poison among thy nearest kindred and greatest benefactors, and invitedst them to assist thee and guard thee, and didst hedge thyself in on all sides by the artifices of both men and women against an old man; as though that mind of thine was not sufficient of itself to support so great a hidden hatred as thou didst bear to him. And now thou appearest here, after the tortures of freemen and domestics and men and women on thy account, and after the informations of thy fellow-conspirators, as anxious to contradict the truth, and hast thought on ways not only to take thy father out of the world, but to set aside that law which is written against thee, and the virtue of Varus, and the nature of justice. Nay, so great is that impudence in which thou confidest, that thou desirest to be put to the torture thyself, though thou allegest that the tortures of those already examined thereby have made them tell lies; that those that have saved thy father from thee may not be thought to have spoken the truth, but that thy tortures forsooth may be esteemed the discoverers of truth! Wilt not thou, O Varus! deliver the king from the injuries of his kindred? Wilt not thou destroy this wicked wild beast, who has pretended kindness to his father in order to destroy his brothers, while yet he is himself alone ready to take the kingdom immediately, and appears to be the most deadly enemy to his father of them all? For thou art well aware that parricide is an injury alike to nature and life, and that the intention of parricide is as great a crime as its perpetration: and he who does not punish it does an injury to nature itself."

§ 6. Nicolaus added further what concerned Antipater's mother, as whatever she had prattled with womanish garrulity, and also about the predictions and sacrifices relating to the king; and whatever Antipater had done lasciviously in his cups and amours with Pheroras' women. He touched also upon the result of the examinations by torture, and the testimonies of the witnesses, which were many and of various kinds, some prepared beforehand, and others sudden answers, which confirmed the foregoing evidence. For those men who were acquainted with any of Antipater's practices, but had concealed them out of fear, lest if he got off he would avenge himself on them, when they saw that he was exposed to the accusations of those who had begun to accuse him, and that fortune, which had often supported him before, had now evidently betrayed him into the hands of his enemies, who were insatiable in their hatred to him, now told all they knew of him. And his ruin was now hastened, not so much by the enmity of those who were his accusers, as by the great audacity of his wicked contrivances, and by his ill-will to his father and brothers, as he had filled their house with dissension, and caused them to murder one another; and was neither fair in his hatred, nor kind in his friendship, but only so far as was likely to serve his own turn. Now there were many who had for a long time observed all this, and especially those who were naturally disposed to judge of matters by the rules of virtue, because they were used to decide about facts without passion, but had been restrained from making any open complaints before, who now, upon the leave given them, produced all that they knew before the public. There were also various wicked crimes alleged against him, which could no way be refuted, because the many witnesses did neither speak out of favour to Herod, nor were they obliged to keep back what they had to say from suspicion of any danger they were in, but they spoke what they knew, because they thought such actions very wicked, and that Antipater deserved every punishment, not so much indeed for Herod's safety, as on account of his own wickedness. Many things were also said by a great number of persons who were not called upon to say them, so that Antipater, who used generally to be very clever in his lies and brazen-faced impudence, was not able to say one word to the contrary. When Nicolaus had left off speaking, and had finished producing his evidence, Varus bade Antipater betake himself to his defence, if he had prepared any whereby it might appear that he was not guilty of the crimes he was accused of; for as he was himself desirous, so did he know that his father was in like manner desirous also, to find him entirely innocent. But Antipater fell down on his face, and appealed to God and to all men to testify to his innocency, desiring that God would declare, by some evident signs, that he had not laid any plot against his father. This is the usual method of all men destitute of virtue; when they set about any wicked undertakings, they fall to work according to their own inclinations, as if they believed that God did not interfere in human affairs; but when once they are found out, and are in danger of undergoing the punishment due to their crimes, they endeavour to upset all the evidence against them by appealing to God; which was the very thing which Antipater now did. For whereas he had done everything as if there was no God in the world, now that he was on all sides hemmed in by justice, and was destitute of proofs by which he might rebut the accusations laid against him, he impudently abused the majesty of God, and ascribed it to his power that he had been preserved hitherto, and enumerated before them all the bold acts he had never failed to do for his father's safety.

§ 7. But when Varus, upon frequently asking Antipater what he had to say for himself, found he had nothing to say besides appealing to God, and saw that there would be no end of all this, he bade them bring the potion before the court, that he might see what virtue still remained in it; and when it was brought, and one that was condemned to die had drunk it by Varus' command, he died at once. Then Varus got up, and left the court, and the day following went away to Antioch, where his usual residence was, because that was the royal city of the Syrians. And Herod at once put his son in prison. Now what Varus said to Herod was not known to the generality, nor his last words before he went away: though it was generally supposed that whatever Herod did afterwards to Antipater was done with his approbation. But when Herod had imprisoned his son, he sent letters to Rome to Augustus about him, and messengers also to inform Augustus by word of mouth of Antipater's crimes. Now, at this very time there was intercepted a letter of Antiphilus, written to Antipater from Egypt (where Antiphilus lived), and, when it was broken open by the king, it was found to contain what follows. "I have sent thee Acme's letter, and hazarded my own life; for thou knowest that I am in danger from two families, if I am discovered. I wish thee good success in thy affair." These were the contents of this letter; but the king made inquiry about the other letter also, for it did not appear, and Antiphilus' slave, who brought the letter which was read, denied that he had received any other. But while the king was in doubt about it, one of Herod's friends, seeing a seam upon the inner coat of the slave (for he had two coats on), guessed that the letter might be hidden within the lining, which proved to be the case. So they took out the letter, and its contents were as follows. "Acme to Antipater. I have written to thy father such a letter as thou desiredst me. I have also taken a copy and sent it, as if it came from Salome to my mistress; and when he reads it, I know that Herod will punish Salome, as plotting against him." Now, this pretended letter of Salome's to her mistress was composed by Antipater, in the name of Salome as to its meaning, but in the words of Acme. The letter was as follows. "Acme to king Herod. I have done my endeavour that nothing that is done against thee should be concealed from thee. So upon my finding a letter of Salome written to my mistress against thee, I have written out a copy, and sent it to thee, with risk to myself, but for thy advantage. The reason why she wrote it was because she had a mind to be married to Syllæus. Do thou therefore tear this letter in pieces, that I may not come into danger of my life." Now Acme had written to Antipater himself, to inform him that, in compliance with his command, she had not only herself written to Herod, as if Salome was intensely eager to plot against him, but had also sent a copy of a letter, as coming from Salome to her mistress. This Acme was a Jewess by birth, and a slave to Julia, the Emperor's wife; and she did this out of friendship to Antipater, having been bought by him with a large sum of money, to assist in his evil designs against his father and aunt.

§ 8. Thereupon Herod was so amazed at the prodigious wickedness of Antipater, that he was eager to have him slain immediately, as a turbulent person in the most important concerns, and as one that had laid a plot not only against himself, but against his sister also, and even corrupted the Emperor's household. Salome also incited him to it, beating her breast, and bidding him kill her, if he could produce any credible testimony that she had acted in that manner. Herod also sent for his son, and questioned him, and bade him contradict it if he could, and not suppress anything he had to say from mistrust. But as he did not speak one word, he asked him, since he was every way detected of villany, at least to discover without delay his associates in his wicked designs. And he laid all upon Antiphilus, and discovered nobody else. Thereupon Herod was in such great grief, that he was eager to send his son to Rome to Augustus, there to give an account of these his wicked contrivances. But afterwards he feared lest he might there, by the assistance of his friends, escape the danger he was in; so he kept him in prison as before, and sent more ambassadors and letters [to Rome] to accuse his son, as also an account of the assistance Acme had given him in his wicked designs, with copies of the letters before mentioned.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning the Illness that Herod had, and the Rebellion which the Jews raised in consequence, as also the Punishment of the Rebellious.

§ 1.

NOW Herod's ambassadors made haste to Rome, having been instructed beforehand, what answers they were to make to the questions put to them. They also carried the letters with them. But Herod now fell ill, and made his will, and bequeathed his kingdom to [Antipas], his youngest son; and that out of hatred to Archelaus and Philip owing to the calumnies of Antipater. He also bequeathed a thousand talents to the Emperor, and five hundred to Julia, the Emperor's wife, and to the Emperor's children, and friends, and freedmen. He also distributed his money revenues and lands among his sons and grandsons. He also made Salome his sister very rich, because she had continued faithful to him in all his circumstances, and had never ventured to do him any harm. And as he despaired of recovering, for he was in the seventieth year of his age, he grew very fierce, and indulged the bitterest anger upon all occasions; the reason whereof was that he thought himself despised, and that the nation was pleased with his misfortunes; besides which, he resented a rebellion which some of the people excited against him, the occasion of which was as follows.

§ 2. Judas, the son of Sariphæus, and Matthias, the son of Margalothus, were two of the most eloquent men among the Jews, and the most celebrated interpreters of the Jewish laws, and men well beloved by the people, because of their education of the youth; for all those youths that were studious of virtue frequented their lectures every day. These men, when they heard that the king's illness was incurable, incited the young men to pull down all those works which the king had erected contrary to the law of their fathers, and so obtain the rewards which the law would confer on them for such actions of piety, for it was truly on account of Herod's rashness in making such things as the law had forbidden that his other misfortunes, which were so unusual among mankind, and this illness also, with which he was now afflicted, had come upon him. For Herod had caused some things to be made which were contrary to the law, for which he was accused by Judas and Matthias. For example the king had erected over the great gate of the temple a large golden eagle, of great value, as an offering to the temple. Now, the law forbids those that propose to live according to it to erect images or representations of any living creatures. So these wise men bade [their scholars] pull down the golden eagle; saying that, though they might incur danger, which might bring them to their deaths, the virtue of the action now proposed to them was evidently far more advantageous to them than the pleasure of living, since they would die for the preservation and maintenance of the law of their fathers, and would also acquire everlasting fame and commendation, and would be commended not only by the present generation, but leave an example of life that would never be forgotten to posterity. And as death could not be avoided by living to escape danger, it was well for those who aimed after virtue to accept their fate so as to go out of the world with praise and honour; and it would alleviate death to a great degree, thus to come at it by noble actions which danger brought, and, at the same time, to leave that reputation behind them to their children, and to all their relations, whether men or women, which would be of great advantage to them afterwards.

§ 3. With such words did they incite the young men, and a report having come to them that the king was dead co-operated with the wise men's arguments. So at midday they went and pulled down the eagle and cut it in pieces with axes, while a great many people were in the temple. And now the king's captain, hearing of the affair, and supposing it was more serious than it proved to be, went to the spot with a large force, such as was sufficient to put a stop to the multitude of those who were trying to pull down what was dedicated to God: and he attacked them unexpectedly, as they were upon this bold attempt in foolish presumption rather than cautious prudence (as is usual with the multitude), and while they were in disorder and incautious of what was for their advantage; and he arrested no fewer than forty of the young men, who had the courage to wait his attack when the rest ran away, as also the instigators of this bold attempt, Judas and Matthias, (who thought it an ignominious thing to retire upon his approach,) and led them to the king. And when they were come to the king, and he asked them if they had been so bold as to pull down what he had dedicated to God, "Yes, (said they,) we contrived what was contrived, and we performed what has been performed, and that with such virtue as becomes men; for we have given our assistance to those things which are dedicated to the honour of God, and we have paid heed to the hearing of the law; and it ought not to be wondered at at all, if we esteem those laws which Moses had suggested and taught to him by God, and which he wrote and left behind him, more worthy of observation than thy commands. And we will with pleasure undergo death, or whatever punishment thou mayst inflict upon us, since we are conscious to ourselves that we shall not die for any unrighteous actions, but for our love to religion." And thus they all said, and their courage was equal to their words, as also to the spirit with which they had set about their bold action. And the king ordered them to be bound, and sent them to Jericho, and summoned the principal men of the Jews. And when they were come, he assembled them in the theatre, and as he could not himself stand, he lay upon a couch, and enumerated the many labours that he had long endured on their account, and how he had built the temple at great expense, though the Asamonæans, during the hundred and twenty-five years of their rule, had not been able to perform so great a work for the honour of God; and how he had also adorned it with very valuable votive offerings, so that he hoped he had left himself a memorial and fair fame after his death. He then cried out that these men had not abstained from affronting him even in his life-time, but in the very day-time, and in the sight of the multitude, had outraged him to that degree, as to lay their hands upon what he had dedicated, and by way of abuse to pull it down to the ground. They pretended, indeed, that they had done so to affront him, but if any one considered the matter, he would find that they were really guilty of sacrilege against God.

§ 4. But those present, because of Herod's temper, and for fear he would be so cruel as to inflict punishment on them, said that what was done was done without their approbation, and that it seemed to them that the deed deserved punishment. But Herod dealt more mildly with the others, but he deprived Matthias of the high priesthood, as in part the cause of this action, and made Joazar, who was Matthias' wife's brother, high priest in his stead. Now it happened, during the time of the high priesthood of this Matthias, that another person was made high priest for a single day, which the Jews observed as a fast, for the following reason. This Matthias the high priest, during the night before the day when the fast was to be celebrated, seemed in a dream to have connection with his wife; and because he could not officiate himself on that account, Joseph, the son of Ellemus, his kinsman, performed the sacred duties for him. Herod now deprived this Matthias of the high priesthood, and burnt alive the other Matthias, who had raised this insurrection, with his companions. And that very night there was an eclipse of the moon.<sup>1</sup>

§ 5. And now Herod's disease greatly increased upon him, God inflicting judgment upon him for his sins; for a slow fire consumed him, which did not so much appear to the touch outwardly, as it augmented his pains inwardly; and brought on him a vehement appetite for eating, which he could not but satisfy. His intestines were also ulcerated, and he had especial pain in his colon; an aqueous and transparent humour was also in his feet, and a similar ailment afflicted him in his abdomen. His privy-member also was putrified, and bred worms; and when he sat upright, he had a difficulty of breathing, which was very unpleasant, on account of the foulness of his breath, and his frequent panting; he had also convulsions in all parts of his body, which made him preternaturally strong. It was said by those who practised divination, and were endued with wisdom to foretell such things, that God inflicted this punishment on the king on account of his great impiety. And though his afflictions seemed greater than any one could bear, yet had he some hopes of recovering, and sent for physicians, and did not refuse to follow what they prescribed for his relief, and he crossed the river Jordan, and bathed in the warm baths that were at Callirrhoe,<sup>1</sup> which, besides their other general virtues, were also fit to drink; these waters run into the lake called Asphaltites.<sup>2</sup> And when the physicians thought fit to revive him there, by placing him in a vessel full of oil, it was supposed that he was dying; but upon the lamentable cries of his domestics, he came round, and having no longer the least hopes of recovery, gave orders that every soldier should be paid fifty drachmæ. He also gave a great deal of money to their commanders, and to his friends, and returned to Jericho, where he grew so choleric, that it made him do all things savagely, and though he was near his death, he contrived the following wicked design. Having commanded that all the principal men of the entire

Jewish nation, wherever they lived, should come to him (and a great number came, because the whole nation was called, and all men heard of this decree, and death was the penalty of such as should neglect the letters sent to call them), the king was in a wild rage against them all, as well innocent as guilty, and ordered them to be all shut up in the hippodrome, and sent for his sister Salome, and her husband Alexas, and spoke to them as follows. "I shall die at no distant time, so great are my pains; and death ought to be cheerfully borne, and to be welcomed by all men; but what principally troubles me is this, that I shall die without being lamented, and without such mourning as usually takes place at a king's death." He added that he was not unacquainted with the temper of the Jews, and knew that his death would be a thing very desirable and exceedingly acceptable to them, for even during his lifetime they were ready to revolt from him and despise his measures. He told them it was therefore their duty to resolve to afford him some alleviation of his great sorrow under these circumstances. For if they did not refuse him their consent in what he desired, he would have a great mourning at his funeral, and such as never any king had had before him, for then the whole nation would mourn from their very soul, which otherwise would be done in sport and mockery only. He desired therefore that as soon as they saw he had given up the ghost, they should place soldiers round the hippodrome, who did not know that he was dead, and that they should not announce his death to the multitude till this was done, and that they should give orders to have those that were in the hippodrome shot with these soldiers' darts; and this slaughter of them all would cause him not to fail to rejoice on two accounts, first at their performing what he charged them with his dying breath to do, and secondly at his having the honour of a memorable mourning at his funeral. So he deplored his condition with tears in his eyes, and appealed to them by the kindness due from kindred, and by their faith in God, and conjured them not to debar him of this honourable mourning at his funeral. And they promised him to do what he wished.

§ 6. Now one may easily discover the temper of this man's mind, even if one were satisfied with his former acts, as having been done to his relations from love of life, by these last commands of his which savoured of great inhumanity, since he took care, when he was departing out of this life, that the whole nation should be put into mourning by the loss of their dearest ones, as he gave orders that one out of every family should be slain, although they had done nothing that was unjust, or that was against him, nor were they accused of any other crimes; though it is usual for those who have any regard to virtue to lay aside at the hour of death their hatred even to those whom they justly esteem their enemies.

CHAP. VII.

§ 1.

AS he was giving these instructions to his relations, there came letters from his ambassadors who had been sent to Rome to Augustus, and when they were read, their purport was as follows: that Acme had been put to death by Augustus, in consequence of his indignation at the hand she had had in Antipater's wicked practices; and that, as to Antipater himself, Augustus left it to Herod to act as became a father and king, and either to banish him or take away his life, which he pleased. When Herod heard this, he felt somewhat better from the pleasure he had at the contents of the letters, and was elated at the death of Acme, and at the power that was given him over his son; but as his pains became very great, he was now ready to faint for want of something to eat; so he called for an apple and a knife; for it was his custom even formerly to pare an apple himself, and gradually to cut it and eat it. When he had got the knife, he looked about, and had a mind to stab himself with it; and would have done so, had not his cousin Achiabus prevented him, and held his hand, and cried out loudly. Whereupon a woeful lamentation echoed through the palace, and a great noise was made, as if the king was dead. Upon this Antipater, who verily believed his father was dead, grew bold in his language, hoping to be immediately and entirely released from his bonds, and to take the kingdom into his own hands without any more ado; so he talked with the jailor about letting him go, and promised him great things, both now and hereafter, as if that were the only thing now in question. But the jailor not only refused to do what Antipater would have him, but informed the king of his intentions, and of the many solicitations he had had from him. Thereupon Herod, who had not formerly been overpowered by good-will towards his son, when he heard what the jailor said, cried out, and beat his head, although he was at death's door, and raised himself upon his elbow, and sent for some of his body-guards, and commanded them to kill Antipater without any further delay, and to do it quickly, and to bury him in an ignoble manner at Hyrcania.<sup>1</sup>

§ 1.

AND now Herod changed his testament again upon the alteration of his mind; for he appointed Antipas, to whom he had before left the kingdom, to be tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa,<sup>2</sup> and granted the kingdom to Archelaus. And Gaulonitis, and Trachonitis, and Batanæa,<sup>3</sup> and Panias,<sup>4</sup> he gave to Philip, his son, and own brother to Archelaus.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>5</sup> When it is said that Philip and Archelaus were own brothers, or born of the same father and mother, there must be here some mistake; because they had indeed the same father Herod, but different mothers; the former Cleopatra, and Archelaus, Malthace. They were indeed by the name of a tetrarchy; and bequeathed Jamnia,<sup>1</sup> and Azotus,<sup>2</sup> and Phasaelis,<sup>3</sup> to his sister Salome, as also five hundred thousand [drachmæ] of coined silver. He also made provision for all the rest of his kindred, by giving them suns of money and revenues, and so left them all in a wealthy condition. He bequeathed also to Augustus ten millions of [drachmæ] of coined silver, besides vessels both of gold and silver, and to Julia, Augustus' wife, exceedingly costly garments, and to some others five millions. When he had done these things, he died, the fifth day after he had caused his son Antipater to be slain; having reigned thirty-four years since he had had Antigonus slain, and thirty-seven since he had been declared king by the Romans. He was a man of great cruelty to all men alike, and a slave to his anger, and indifferent to justice, yet was he favoured by fortune as much as any man ever was, for from a private man he became a king, and though he was surrounded by ten thousand dangers, he got clear of them all, and protracted his life to a very old age. But as to the affairs of his family and sons, in which indeed, according to his own opinion, he was also very fortunate, because he was able to conquer his enemies, he was in my opinion very unfortunate.

§ 2. However Salome and Alexas, before the king's death was generally known, dismissed those that were shut up in the hippodrome to their own homes, and told them that the king ordered them to go away to their own lands, and look after their own affairs. They thus conferred on the nation a great benefit. And now the king's death was made public, and Salome and Alexas gathered the soldiers together in the amphitheatre at Jericho; and the first thing they did was to read Herod's letter written to the soldiers, thanking them for their fidelity and good-will to him, and exhorting them to treat his son Archelaus, whom he had appointed as their king, with like fidelity and good-will. After this Ptolemy, who had the king's seal intrusted to him, read the king's testament, which was not to be of force till Augustus had inspected it. And there was accla-

nation made at once to Archelaus as king, and the soldiers came by bands, and their commanders with them, and promised the same good-will to him, and zeal in serving him, as they had exhibited to Herod, and they prayed God to be his helper.

§ 3. After this was over, they prepared for the king's funeral, Archelaus taking care that his father should be buried in a very sumptuous manner. Accordingly, he brought out all his ornaments to add to the pomp of the funeral. The body was carried upon a golden bier, embroidered with very precious stones of great variety, and the bier was covered over with purple, as well as the body itself, which had a diadem upon its head, and above it a crown of gold, and a sceptre in its right hand. Round the bier were Herod's sons and numerous relations; next to these were the soldiers, disposed according to their several countries and names, and placed in the following order: first of all went the body-guards, then the band of Thracians, after them the Germans, and next them the Galatians, every one in their habiliments of war; and behind these marched the whole army in the same manner as they used to go out to war, preceded by their commanders and centurions; and these were followed by five hundred domestics carrying spices. And they went eight furlongs on the road to Herodium;<sup>1</sup> for there by his own command Herod was to be buried. And thus did he end his life.

§ 4. Now Archelaus paid his father so much respect, as to continue his mourning till the seventh day; for so many days are appointed by the custom of our country. And when he had feasted the multitude, and left off his mourning, he went up into the temple; and he had acclamations and praises given him, whichever way he went, every one vying with one another who should appear to use the loudest acclamations. And he ascended a high platform made for him, and took his seat on a throne made of gold, and spoke kindly to the multitude, and declared with what joy he received their acclamations and marks of good-will; and returned them thanks for not remembering to his disadvantage the injuries his father had done them, and promised them he would endeavour not to be slack in rewarding their zeal to him. He said he should abstain at present from the name of king, but he would have the honour of that dignity if the Emperor should confirm the testament his father had made; and that was the reason why, when the army would have put the diadem on his head at Jericho, he would not accept of that honour, which is usually so much desired, because it was not yet evident that he who had the authority of bestowing it would give it him. But if he got the kingdom he would not (he said) come short in the virtue of gratitude for their good-will; for it should be his endeavour, in all things wherein they were concerned, to prove in every respect better than his father. Whereupon the multitude, as is usual with them, supposed that the first days show the intentions of those that enter upon such sovereignty, and the more gently and civilly Archelaus spoke to them, so much the more highly did they commend him, and made application to him to grant what they desired. Some cried out to him to ease them of some of their annual payments, others to release those that had been put into prison by Herod (who were many, and had been there a long time); others asked that he would do away with those heavy taxes which had been laid upon what was publicly sold or bought. And Archelaus contradicted them in nothing, as he was anxious to do all things so as to conciliate the good-will of the multitude, looking upon that good-will as a great step towards the preservation of his power. He then went and offered sacrifice to God, and afterwards betook himself to feasting with his friends.

CHAP. IX.

How the People raised a Rebellion against Archelaus, and how he Sailed to Rome.

§ 1.

MEANTIME some of the Jews assembled together out of desire of innovation, and lamented Matthias, and those that were slain with him by Herod, who had not had at the time any respect paid them by mourning, from the fear men were in of Herod, and had been condemned for pulling down the golden eagle. These people made a great clamour and lamentation, and threw out some reproaches against the king also, as if that was a solace to the deceased. They assembled together, and demanded of Archelaus, that, to avenge them, he would inflict punishment on those who had been honoured by Herod: and first and foremost that he would deprive the high priest whom Herod had made, and would choose one more agreeable to the law, and of greater purity, to officiate as high priest. To this Archelaus assented, although he was mightily offended at their importunity, because he proposed to himself to go to Rome shortly, to see what the Emperor had determined about him. However, he sent his general to use persuasion, and to tell them that the death which was inflicted on their friends was according to the law, and to represent to them that their petitions about these things were highly insulting to him, and that the time was not now fit for such petitions, but rather required their unanimity until he should be established on the throne by the consent of the Emperor, and should have come back to them; for he would then consult with them in common as to what they asked; but they ought at present to be quiet, lest they should seem factious.

§ 2. When the king had suggested this line of argument, and instructed his general what he was to say, he sent him to the people. But they made a clamour, and would not let him speak, and put him in danger of his life, as they also did to all who ventured upon saying openly anything which might bring them to a sober mind, and prevent their going on in their present courses; because they had more desire to have all their way than to yield obedience to their rulers, thinking it monstrous that, while Herod was alive, they should have lost those who were most dear to them, and that now he was dead, they should not get their revenge. So they went on with their designs in a violent manner, and thought all to be lawful and right which tended to please them, being unskilful in foreseeing what danger they ran, and if they had suspicion of any such thing, the present pleasure they took in the idea of the punishment of those they deemed their very great enemies outweighed all such considerations. And although Archelaus sent many to speak to them, they treated them not as messengers sent by him, but as persons who came of their own accord to mitigate their anger, and would not suffer one of them to speak. The rebellion was also set in motion by such as were in a great passion, and it was evident that it would grow, as the people joined the movement in great numbers.

§ 3. Now on the approach of the feast of Unleavened Bread, which the law of their fathers had appointed for the Jews (which feast is called the Passover,<sup>1</sup> and is a memorial of their deliverance out of Egypt, when they offer sacrifices with zeal, and when it is customary to slay more victims than at any other festival, and when an innumerable multitude come out of the country—nay, from beyond its limits also, to worship God), the innovators lamented Judas and Matthias, those teachers of the laws, and kept together in the temple, having plenty of food, because those factious persons were not ashamed to demand it. And as Archelaus was afraid that some terrible thing would happen owing to these men's madness, he sent a regiment of armed men, and with them a captain of a thousand, to suppress the violence of the rebellious, before the whole population should be infected with the like madness; and charged them, if they found any more openly rebellious than others, to bring them before him. But those that were rebellious because of those dead teachers of the law, incited the people by noise and clamour, so they made an assault upon the soldiers, and went up to them, and stoned most of them, but a few ran away wounded, and their captain with them. And when they had thus done, they attended to the sacrifice again. Now Archelaus thought there was no way to keep his throne but by cutting off those of the people who made this attempt upon it; so he sent out his whole army against them, and despatched his cavalry to prevent those that had their tents outside the temple from assisting those that were within the temple, and to kill such as fled from the infantry when they thought themselves out of danger. And the cavalry slew some three thousand men, and the rest betook themselves to the neighbouring mountains. Then did Archelaus order proclamation to be made that all should go to their own homes; so they went away, and left the festival fearing that something worse might follow, although they had been so bold because of their stupidity. Then Archelaus went down to the sea with his mother, and took with him Nicolaus and Ptolemy, and many of his friends, and left his brother Philip governor of all things belonging both to his family and the realm. There also went with him Herod's sister Salome, who took with her her children, and many of her kindred went with her, under pretext of assisting Archelaus in gaining the kingdom, but in reality to oppose him, and chiefly to make loud complaints of what he had done in the temple. But Sabinus, the Emperor's administrator in Syrian affairs, as he was making haste to Judæa to take charge of Herod's money, met with Archelaus at Cæsarea; but Varus came up and restrained him from meddling with it, for he had been sent for there by Archelaus through Ptolemy. And Sabinus, to gratify Varus, did neither seize upon any of the fortresses that were among the Jews, nor seal up the treasures in them, but permitted Archelaus to have them, till the Emperor should declare his will about them, and having promised that, he remained at Cæsarea. But after Archelaus had sailed for Rome, and Varus had removed to Antioch, Sabinus went to Jerusalem, and seized on the king's palace. He also sent for the keepers of the garrisons, and for all those who had had the charge of Herod's affairs, and declared publicly that he should call them to account, and disposed of the fortresses as he pleased. However, those who kept them did not neglect what Archelaus had commanded them, but continued to keep all things in the manner that had been enjoined them; and their pretext was that they kept them all for the Emperor.

§ 4. At the same time, also, did Antipas, another of Herod's sons, sail to Rome, to claim the kingdom, being buoyed up by Salome with promises that he should have it, as<sup>1</sup> being much fitter than Archelaus for that authority; since Herod had, in his former testament, which ought to be esteemed most valid, deemed him the worthiest to be made king. Antipas also took with him his mother, and Ptolemy the brother of Nicolaus, who had been Herod's most honoured friend, and was now zealous for Antipas; but it was Irenæus the orator, who, on account of his reputation for sagacity, was intrusted with the affairs of the kingdom, who most of all encouraged him to think of claiming the kingdom. That was why, when some advised him to yield to Archelaus, as his elder brother, who had been declared king by their father's last will, he would not do so. And when he was come to Rome, all his relations came over to him, not out of good-will to him, but out of hatred to Archelaus, though indeed they were most desirous of gaining their liberty, and of being put under a Roman governor; but if opposition were made to that, they thought Antipas preferable to Archelaus, and so tried to get the kingdom for him. Sabinus also accused Archelaus to the Emperor in a letter.

§ 5. Now, when Archelaus had despatched a letter to the Emperor, wherein he pleaded his right to the kingdom, and his father's testament, and sent Ptolemy with Herod's seal and the accounts of Herod's money, he waited the event. And when the Emperor had read Archelaus' letter, and Varus' and Sabinus' letters, and the accounts of the money, and the statement of the annual revenues of the kingdom, and understood that Antipas had also sent a letter laying claim to the kingdom, he summoned his friends together to give their opinions, and among them Caius, the son of Agrippa and his daughter Julia whom he had adopted, whom he made to sit first of all, and bade such as pleased speak their minds about the affairs now before them. And Salome's son Antipater, a very clever orator, and a very bitter enemy to Archelaus, spoke first, and said that it was jesting of Archelaus to plead now to have the kingdom given him, since he had in reality assumed the authority already, before Augustus had granted it. He also inveighed against his bold action in slaying so many at the

<sup>1</sup> For kai I read ὡς. It is well known how similar the abbreviation of these two words is, and how frequently this mistake is made in MSS.

Jewish festival, for if the men had acted unjustly, it was but fit the punishing of them should have been reserved to those who were out of the country, and had the right to punish them, and not been executed by a man who, if he pretended to be a king, wronged Augustus by ignoring his authority, and if he owned himself a private person, his case was much worse, since he who put in claim to the kingdom, could by no means expect to have that power granted him over the Jews, of which he had already deprived Augustus. He also charged and upbraided him with changing some commanders in the army, and sitting on the royal throne, and deciding lawsuits, just as if he were king, and assenting to the requests of those that publicly petitioned him, and indeed his management of all things, which could in his opinion be no greater if he had been already settled in the kingdom by Augustus. He also ascribed to him the releasing of the prisoners that were in the hippodrome, and many other things, that had either been done by him, or might be believed to have been done, because they were of such a nature as were done by young men, and by such as in desire of ruling grasped at power too soon. He also charged him with neglect in mourning for his father, and with revelling the very night he died; and said that was why the multitude began raising a tumult; and if Archelaus could thus requite his dead father, who had bestowed such benefits upon him, and bequeathed such great things to him, pretending to shed tears for him in the day-time like an actor on the stage, but every night making merry at having got the kingdom, he would show himself the same Archelaus to Augustus, if he granted him the kingdom, as he had been to his father; for he had then danced and sung, as though an enemy of his had fallen, and not as though a man was being carried to his funeral, that was so nearly related to him, and had been so great a benefactor. But he said that the most monstrous thing of all was, that he came now before Augustus to obtain the kingdom by his grant, when he had before acted in all things as he would have acted if the Emperor himself had already fixed him firmly in the kingdom. And what he most exaggerated in his pleading was the slaughter of those in the temple, and the impiety of its being done at festival time, and how they were slain like sacrifices themselves, some of them foreigners, and others of their own country, till the temple was full of dead bodies: and all this was not done by an alien, but by one who laid claim to the lawful title of king, that he might fulfil the wicked tyranny which his nature prompted him to, and which was hated by all men. That was no doubt the reason why his father had never so much as dreamed of making him his successor in the kingdom, when he was of a sound mind, because he knew his character, and in his former and more authentic testament had appointed his enemy Antipas to succeed; for Archelaus was called by his father to the kingdom, when Herod was in an ailing condition both of body and mind, while Antipas was called when Herod was ripest in his judgment, and of such strength of body as made him capable of managing his own affairs. And even if his father had had the like notion of him formerly that he had now showed, yet Archelaus had given a sufficient specimen of what sort of a king he was likely to be, when he deprived Augustus of the power which he justly had of disposing of the kingdom, and had not abstained from making a terrible slaughter of his fellow-citizens in the temple when he was but as yet a private person.

§ 6. When Antipater had said thus much, and had confirmed what he said by producing many witnesses from among his own relations, he ended his speech. Upon which Nicolaus rose up on behalf of Archelaus, and said that what had been done in the temple was rather to be attributed to the behaviour of those who had been killed than to the authority of Archelaus; for those who were the authors of such things, were not only wicked in the injuries they themselves did, but in forcing sober persons to avenge themselves upon them. And it was evident that their hostile action was taken in pretext, indeed, against Archelaus, but in reality against the Emperor himself, for those riotous persons attacked and slew those who were sent by Archelaus, and who came only to put a stop to their doings, having no regard either to God or to the custom of the festival; and yet Antipater was not ashamed to advocate their cause, whether to indulge his enmity against Archelaus, or because of his own hatred of virtue and justice. For those who began such tumults, and attacked people who little expected it, forced men even against their will to betake themselves to arms to punish them. Nicolaus also ascribed all the rest that was done to all those who had acted in counsel with the accusers, for nothing which was here accused of as unjust had been done, but what had been approved of by them; nor were those things bad in themselves, but only so represented to harm Archelaus. So great was these factious persons' desire to do injury to a man that was of their kindred, and their father's benefactor, and one familiarly acquainted with them, who had ever lived in friendship with them. And as to Herod's testament, it was made by the king when he was in a sound mind, and so ought to be more valid than his former testament, for Augustus was left by it the judge and sole disposer of all its contents. And certainly Augustus would not imitate the unjust proceedings of those men, who, during Herod's life, had on all occasions been benefited by his power, and yet now zealously endeavoured to hinder his will, though they had not themselves deserved as well of Herod as Archelaus had. Augustus would not therefore disannul the testament of a man who had put everything at his disposal, and had been his friend and ally, and had committed everything to him in trust. Nor would Augustus' virtuous and upright disposition, which was known and uncontested throughout all the world, imitate the wickedness of these men in condemning a king as having lost his reason, and as a madman, for having bequeathed the succession to a good son, who fled to Augustus' uprightness for refuge. Nor could Herod ever have been mistaken in his judgment about his successor, when he showed so much prudence as to submit all things to the decision of Augustus.

§ 7. When Nicolaus had laid these arguments before Augustus, he ended his speech. And Augustus kindly raised Archelaus up when he threw himself down at his feet, and said that he was most worthy of the kingdom, and showed that he was not disposed to act otherwise than his father's testament directed, which was for the advantage of Archelaus. However, though he gave this encouragement to Archelaus to rely on him and banish all fear, he made no full determination about him. And, when the assembly was broken up, he debated with himself, whether he should confirm the kingdom to Archelaus, or whether he should divide it among all Herod's posterity, as these too stood in need of much assistance.

CHAP. X.

An Insurrection of the Jews against Sabinus; and how Varus brought the Authors of it to Punishment.

§ 1.

BUT before these things could be brought to a settlement, Archelaus' mother, Malthace, fell ill and died, and letters came from Varus, the governor of Syria, informing Augustus of a revolt of the Jews. For, after Archelaus had sailed, the whole nation was in an uproar, and Varus himself, as he was on the spot, brought the authors of the disturbance to punishment; and when he had mostly composed this rising, which was a formidable one, he set out for Antioch, leaving one legion of his army at Jerusalem to keep the Jews quiet, if they made any new rising. But this did not at all avail to put an end to their rebellion; for after Varus was gone away, Sabinus, Augustus' procurator, stayed behind, and greatly harassed the Jews, believing that the forces that were left there would by their numbers be too many for the Jews. For he made use of them, and armed them as his guards, so oppressing and troubling the Jews, that they rebelled; for he used force to seize the citadels, and zealously made violent search for the king's money, on account of his love of gain, and extraordinary covetousness.

§ 2. Now on the approach of Pentecost (which is a festival of ours, so called from the days of our forefathers) a great many myriads of men assembled together not only to keep the festival, but also in consequence of their indignation at the mad insolence of Sabinus. They were chiefly Galilæans and Idumæans, and from Jericho, and those who inhabited the districts on the other side of the river Jordan, who all banded together, and were more zealous than the others to avenge themselves on Sabinus. And they divided themselves into three bands, and encamped in the following places, some of them seized upon the hippodrome, and one of the other two bands encamped on the east quarter from the north part of the temple to the south, while the third band occupied the west part of the city where the king's palace was. Their action tended to besiege entirely the Romans, and to shut them in on all sides. Now Sabinus was afraid of these men's numbers and spirit, for they had little regard to their lives from their desire not to be overcome, and they thought it virtue to conquer their enemies; so he sent immediately a letter to Varus, and, as was usual with him, was very urgent with him, and entreated him to come quickly to his assistance, as the forces he had left were in imminent danger, and would probably, in no long time, be intercepted and cut to pieces. But he himself occupied the highest tower of the fortress Phasaelus (which had been built in honour of Phasaelus,<sup>1</sup> king Herod's brother, and so called when the Parthians had brought him to his death<sup>2</sup>), and thence gave a signal to the Romans to attack the Jews, and although he did not himself venture even to come down to his friends, expected that all the others should expose themselves to death for his greediness. And as the Romans ventured to make a sally, a terrible battle ensued; and though the Romans beat their adversaries, yet were not the Jews cowed in spirit even at the sight of the terrible slaughter that was made of many of them, but they made a circuit, and got upon those porticoes which surrounded the outer court of the temple, where a great fight was still maintained, and they cast stones at the Romans, partly with their hands, and partly from slings, being very expert in that kind of warfare. All the archers also drawn up in battle-array did the Romans a great deal of mischief, because they were on higher ground, and so not easy to get at, for when the Romans tried to shoot their arrows against the Jews upwards, these arrows could not reach them, so that the Jews were too much for their enemies here. And this sort of fight lasted a great while, till at last the Romans, who were greatly enraged at what was done, set fire to the porticoes so stealthily, that those Jews who were upon them did not perceive it. This fire being fed by a great deal of combustible matter,<sup>1</sup> soon caught the roof of the porticoes; and the wood, which was full of pitch and wax, especially as its gold was smeared over with wax, yielded to the flames at once; and those vast works, which were so worthy of esteem, were destroyed utterly, and those that were on the roof unexpectedly perished at the same time; for, as the roof tumbled in, some of these men fell down with it, and others were killed by their enemies who surrounded them. Many also, in despair of saving their lives, and dismayed at the fate that awaited them, either cast themselves into the fire, or threw themselves upon their own swords, and so got out of their misery. And as to those that endeavoured to escape by the same way by which they ascended, they were all killed by the Romans, being unarmed, and their courage failing them; their reckless fury being now unable to serve them, as they were destitute of armour; so that not one of those that ascended to the roof escaped. The Romans also rushed through the fire, where it was practicable, and seized on the treasure where the sacred money was; a great part of which was stolen by the soldiers, but Sabinus got openly four hundred talents.

§ 3. Now the loss of their friends, who fell in this battle, grieved the Jews, as did also the plundering of the money dedicated to God in the temple. So that body of them which was most compact and most warlike surrounded the palace, and threatened to set fire to it, and kill all that were in it, and commanded them to go out quickly, and promised, if they would do so, that they would not hurt them, or Sabinus either. And most of the king's troops deserted to them, while Rufus and Gratus, who had three thousand of the most warlike of Herod's army with them, who were men of bodily activity, went over to the Romans. There was also a troop of horse under the command of Rufus, which itself went over to the Romans also. However, the Jews went on with the siege, and dug mines under the walls, and besought those that had gone over to the other side not to hinder them, now they had such an opportunity for the recovery of their country's ancient liberty. As for Sabinus, he was desirous of going away with his soldiers, but dared not trust himself with the enemy on account of the mischief he had already done them, and this great clemency of theirs (which he suspected) made him reject their offer. He also expected that Varus was coming, and so endured the siege.

§ 4. At this time there were myriads of other troubles in Judæa, many people in many places stirring up war either in hope of gain to themselves, or from enmity to the Jews. And two thousand of Herod's old soldiers, who had been already disbanded, mustered in Judæa itself, and fought against the king's troops, and Achiabus, Herod's cousin, opposed them; but as he was driven out of the plains into the mountainous parts by their military skill, he kept on ground not easy of approach, and saved what he could.

§ 5. There was also one Judas, the son of that Ezekias who had been a robber-chief, a very strong man, who had with great difficulty been taken by Herod. This Judas having got together a multitude of men of profligate character at Sepphoris<sup>1</sup> in Galilee, made an assault upon the palace [there,] and seized upon all the weapons that were stored up in it, and armed with them every one of his men, and made off with all the money that was left there, and became terrible to all men by plundering those that came near him, in consequence of a thirst for power, and an ambitious desire for royal rank, which he hoped to obtain, not as the reward of his virtue, but of his power to do harm.

§ 6. There was also one Simon, who had been a slave of

Herod the king, but was in other respects a comely person, tall and of a robust body, and had had great things committed to his trust. He, being elated at the disorderly state of affairs, was so bold as to put a diadem on his head, and a certain number of the people stood by him, and by their madness he was hailed as king, and he thought himself more worthy of that dignity than any one else, and burnt down the royal palace at Jericho, and plundered what was left in it, and also set fire to many other of the king's houses in various parts of the country, and utterly destroyed them, and permitted those who were associated with him to take what was left in them as spoil. And he would have done greater things, if care had not been taken to repress him quickly; for Gratus, after he had joined himself to the Roman soldiers, took the forces he had with him, and met Simon, and after a great and obstinate fight, most of those that came from Peræa, who were a disorderly body of men, and fought in rather a bold than skilful manner, were cut to pieces, and although Simon tried to save himself by flight through a certain defile, yet Gratus overtook him, and cut off his head. The royal palace at Amatha,<sup>1</sup> near the river Jordan, was also burnt down by a party of men that mustered together, like those belonging to Simon. Thus did a great and wild fury spread itself over the nation, because they had no king of their own to keep the multitude in virtue, and because those foreigners, who came to reduce the rebellious to order, did, on the contrary, set them more in a flame, because of their avarice and outrageous treatment of them.

§ 7. At this time also Athronges, a person eminent neither for the dignity of his progenitors, nor for any great virtue or wealth of his own, as he was only a shepherd, and obscure in all respects, because he was a tall man, and excelled others in the strength of his hands, was so bold as to set up for king, and thought it so sweet a thing to do injuries to others, that although he should be killed, he did not much care if he lost his life in such actions. He had also four brothers, who were tall men themselves, and were believed to be superior to others in the strength of their hands, and he thought that strength of theirs would aid him in retaining his kingdom. Each of them ruled over a band of men of their own; for those who mustered to them were very numerous. They were also every one of them commanders, but when they came to fight, they were subordinate to Athronges, and fought for him, and he put a diadem on his head, and assembled a council to debate about what things were to be done, and all things were done according to his pleasure. And he retained his power a great while, being called king, and having nothing to hinder him from doing what he pleased, and he and his brothers slew a great many both of the Romans and of the king's forces, acting with the like hatred to each of them, to the king's forces because of their outrageous conduct during Herod's reign, and to the Romans because of the injuries they had so lately received from them. But in process of time they grew more cruel to all sorts of men alike, nor could any one escape, for they slew some in the hope of gain, and others from the mere habit of slaying men. They once attacked a company of Romans at Emmaus,<sup>1</sup> who were bringing corn and weapons to the army, and surrounded Areus, the centurion, who commanded the company, and shot down him and forty of the best of his foot-soldiers; and the rest of them were dismayed at their slaughter, and left their dead behind them, but escaped themselves by the aid of Gratus, who came with the king's troops that were with him to their assistance. They continued such guerilla warfare a long while, and much harassed the Romans, but did their own nation also a great deal of injury. But they were afterwards put down, one of them in a fight with Gratus, another with Ptolemy; and Archelaus took the eldest of them prisoner, when the last of them was so dejected at the others' misfortune, and saw so plainly that he had no way now left to save himself, being left alone and worn out with continual labours, and having lost his men, that he also delivered himself up to Archelaus, upon his promise and oath to God [to preserve his life.] But these things happened some time afterwards.

§ 8. And now Judæa was full of bands of robbers, and, as the several companies of the seditious lit upon any one to head them, he was created a king immediately, in order to do mischief to the community. They did some small harm to a few of the Romans, but their murders of their own people lasted the longest.

§ 9. Directly Varus was informed of the state of Judæa by Sabinus' writing to him, he was afraid for the legion he had left; so he took the two other legions (for there were three legions in all in Syria), and four troops of horse, and all the auxiliary forces that either the kings or any of the tetrarchs supplied him with, and made what haste he could to assist those who were then besieged in Judæa. He also gave orders to all who were sent forward to hasten to Ptolemais. The citizens of Berytus<sup>1</sup> also gave him fifteen hundred auxiliaries, as he passed through their city. Aretas also, the king of Arabia Petræa,<sup>2</sup> from his hatred to Herod, and in order to purchase the favour of the Romans, sent no small assistance, besides foot and horse. And when Varus had concentrated all his forces at Ptolemais,<sup>3</sup> he committed part of them to his son, and to a friend of his, and sent them upon an expedition into Galilee, which lies in the neighbourhood of Ptolemais; and they attacked the enemy, and put them to flight, and took Sepphoris, and made its inhabitants slaves, and burnt the city. But Varus himself pushed on to Samaria<sup>4</sup> with the main army: but he did not meddle with the city of that name, because it was not accused of rebellion, but pitched his camp at a certain village that belonged to Ptolemy, called Arus,<sup>5</sup> which the Arabians burnt from their hatred to Herod, and from the enmity they bore to his friends. The Arabians marched thence to another village called Sampho,<sup>5</sup> which they plundered and burnt, although it was a very strong and fortified place; and all along this march nothing escaped them, but all places were full of fire and slaughter. Emmaus was also burnt by Varus' order, after its inhabitants had deserted it, that he might avenge those that had been slain there. From thence Varus marched at once to Jerusalem, and those Jews whose camp lay there, and who were besieging the Roman legion, at first sight of the approach of his army raised the siege and fled. But as to the Jews in Jerusalem, when Varus reproached them bitterly, they cleared themselves of the charges laid against them, and said that the conflux of the people was occasioned by the feast, and that the war was not made with their approbation, but came from the rashness of the strangers, for they were on the side of the Romans, and rather besieged with them, than desirous at all to besiege them. Now Joseph, the cousin of king Herod, had also come before this to meet Varus, as had also Gratus and Rufus (who brought their soldiers with them), and those Romans who had been besieged. But Sabinus did not come into Varus' presence, but stole out of the city privately, and went to the sea-side.

§ 10. Next Varus sent a part of his army all over the country, to seek out the authors of the revolt; and when they were discovered, he punished some of those that were most guilty, and some he dismissed: the number of those that were crucified on this account was two thousand. After this he disbanded his army, which he found not at all useful, for the soldiers behaved themselves very disorderly, and disobeyed Varus' orders and wishes, being intent on the gain which they made by malpractices. As for himself, when he was informed that ten thousand Jews had mustered together, he made haste to crush them; but they did not venture to fight him, but, at the advice of Achiabus, surrendered to Varus. Thereupon he forgave the multitude their crime of revolting, but sent their several commanders to Augustus. The Emperor dismissed many of them, and the only persons whom he punished were those relations of Herod who had joined these men in this war, who, without the least regard to justice, had fought against their own kindred.

CHAP. XI.

An Embassy of the Jews to Augustus, and how he confirmed Herod's Testament.

§ 1.

WHEN Varus had settled these affairs, and left the legion that had been formerly there to garrison Jerusalem, he set out for Antioch. As for Archelaus, he had new sources of trouble come upon him at Rome from the following circumstances. An embassy of the Jews came to Rome (Varus having permitted the nation to send it) to petition for the liberty of living according to their own laws. Now, the number of the ambassadors that were sent by the will of the nation was fifty, who were joined by more than eight thousand Jews who dwelt at Rome. And Augustus assembled his friends, and the chief men among the Romans, in the temple of Apollo, which he had built at great expense, and the ambassadors came there, and the multitude of Jews that lived at Rome with them, as did also Archelaus and his friends. But as for the various kinsmen of the king, they would not join themselves with Archelaus, from their hatred to him; and yet they thought it monstrous to vote with the ambassadors against him, supposing it would be a disgrace to them in Augustus' opinion to think of thus acting in opposition to a man of their own kindred. Philip also had arrived there from Syria, at the instigation of Varus, with the principal intention of assisting his brother (for Varus was his great friend), but still so, if any change should happen in the form of government (for Varus expected the kingdom would be divided, because of the many who desired the liberty of living in accordance with their own laws), that he might not be behind, but might have his share of it.

§ 2. Now upon liberty being given to the Jewish ambassadors to speak, they who hoped by their words to put down kingly government betook themselves to accusing Herod of various lawless acts, and declared that he had been nominally indeed a king, but had usurped that absolute authority which tyrants exercise over their subjects, and had made use of that authority for the destruction of the Jews, and had not abstained from introducing many innovations among them besides, according to his own inclination. And although a great many had perished during his reign by various kinds of deaths, so many indeed as no previous history related, they that had survived were far more miserable than those that had suffered, not only from the anxiety they were in as to his look and disposition, but also from the danger their estates were in. They said Herod had never ceased adding to the beauty of those neighbouring cities that were inhabited by foreigners, but the cities belonging to his own kingdom were ruined and utterly destroyed, and whereas when he took the kingdom, it was in an extraordinarily flourishing condition, he had afflicted the nation with extreme poverty, and when he had slain any of the nobility upon unjust pretences, he had taken away their estates, and when he permitted any of them to live, he had condemned them to the forfeiture of what they possessed. And, besides the annual impositions which he laid upon every one of them, they had had to make liberal presents to him and his domestics and friends, and to such of his slaves as were vouchsafed the favour of being his tax-gatherers, because there was no way of obtaining freedom from unjust violence, without giving either gold or silver for it. They would say nothing of the deflowering of their virgins, or the debauching of their wives, and that carried out in a wanton and inhuman manner, because it was almost equal pleasure to the sufferers to have such things concealed as not to have suffered them. They said Herod had ill treated them worse than a wild beast would have done, if he had had power given him to rule; and although their nation had passed through many vicissitudes and changes, their history gave no account of any calamity it had ever undergone, that could be compared with what Herod had brought upon the nation. And so they had thought they might reasonably and gladly hail Archelaus as king, upon the supposition that whoever should be set over the kingdom would appear more mild to them than Herod had been; and they had joined with him in the mourning for his father, in order to gratify him, and were ready to oblige him in other points also, if they found him mild in his dealings with them. But he seemed to be afraid lest he should not be deemed Herod's own son; and so, without any delay, he immediately let the nation understand his disposition, and that before his position on the throne was secure, since Augustus could either give it him or not, as he pleased. Moreover he had given his subjects a specimen of his future virtue, and of the kind of moderation and good administration with which he would govern them, by his first action in the sight of the citizens and God himself, when he slaughtered three thousand of his own countrymen in the temple. How, then, could they help justly hating him who, besides his other barbarity, had alleged as one of their crimes that they had opposed and thwarted him in the exercise of his authority? They concluded by saying that the main thing they desired was that they might be delivered from kingly and similar governments, and might be added to Syria, and be put under the authority of such chief magistrates as should be sent to them; for it would thereby be made evident, whether they were really rebellious people, and generally fond of innovations, or whether they would live in an orderly manner, if they had mild rulers set over them.

§ 3. Now when the Jews had said this, Nicolaus vindicated the kings from those accusations, and said that as for Herod, since he had never been thus accused during his life, it was not right for those that might during his lifetime have accused him before just judges, and procured his punishment, to bring an accusation against him now that he was dead. He also attributed the actions of Archelaus to the Jews' insolence, who, striving after what was contrary to the laws, and beginning to kill those who would have hindered them from their insolence, now complained of just reprisals. He also accused them of their love of innovation, and of the pleasure they took in sedition, because of their not having learned to submit to justice and the laws, through their desiring to have their way in all things. This was what Nicolaus said.

§ 4. When Augustus had heard these pleadings, he dissolved the assembly, and a few days afterwards appointed

Archelaus not indeed king, but ethnarch of half the country that had been subject to Herod, and promised to give him the royal dignity subsequently, if he deserved it. As for the other half, he divided it into two parts, and gave it to two other of Herod's sons, to Philip and to that Antipas who disputed with Archelaus the whole kingdom. Now Peræa and Galilee paid their tribute, which amounted annually to two hundred talents, to Antipas, while Batanæa and Trachonitis and Auranitis, with a certain portion of what was called the house of Zenodorus, paid the tribute of one hundred talents to Philip. But Idumæa, and Judæa, and Samaria, paid tribute to Archelaus, but had a fourth part of their tribute taken off by order of Augustus, who decreed them that abatement because they had not joined in revolt with the rest of the multitude. There were also other cities which paid tribute to Archelaus, as Strato's tower,<sup>1</sup> and Sebaste,<sup>2</sup> and Joppa, and Jerusalem; for as to Gaza and Gadara<sup>3</sup> and Hippos,<sup>4</sup> they are Greek cities, which Augustus separated from Archelaus' jurisdiction, and added to the province of Syria. And the tribute-money that came to Archelaus every year from his dominions amounted to six hundred talents.

which he reserved for himself ; and they were acceptable to him, not so much for their great value as because they were memorials to him of king Herod.

§ 1.

WHEN these affairs had been thus settled by Augustus, a certain young man, by birth a Jew, but brought up by a Roman freedman in the city of Sidon, palmed himself off as akin to Herod, by the resemblance of countenance, which those who saw him attested him to have to Alexander the son of Herod, whom Herod had had put to death. And this was an incitement to him to endeavour to seize the kingdom. So he took to him as an assistant a man of his own tribe (one who was well acquainted with the affairs of the palace, but in other respects a bad man, and one whose nature made him capable of causing great mischief, and who taught this wicked contrivance to the other), and declared himself to be Alexander the son of Herod, who had been stolen away by one of those that were sent to slay him, who slew two others to deceive the spectators, but saved both him and his brother Aristobulus alive. Thus was this man puffed up, and proceeded to impose on all that saw him, and when he landed at Crete, he made all the Jews that came into his company believe his story. And when he had got much money, which was presented to him there, he crossed over to Melos,<sup>1</sup> where he got much more money than he had before, from the belief the people of Melos had that he was of the royal family, and from their hopes that he would recover his father's kingdom, and reward his benefactors : so he made haste to Rome, and was escorted there by his private friends. He was also so fortunate, upon landing at Dicearchia,<sup>2</sup> as to bring the Jews that were there into the same delusion ; and not only other people, but also all those who had been intimate with Herod, or had good-will to him, joined themselves to him as their king. The reason was that men gladly listened to his tale, which was confirmed by his appearance, which made those who had been intimately acquainted with Alexander believe that he was no other but the very same person, which they also confirmed to others by oath. And so, when the report went about him that he was come to Rome, the whole multitude of the Jews that were there went out to meet him, ascribing it to divine providence that he had so unexpectedly escaped, and being very joyful because of their affection to his mother's family. And wherever he went, he was carried in a litter through the streets, and all the ornaments about him were such as kings wore, and all this was done at the expense of his private friends. The multitude also flocked about him perpetually, and made auspicious acclamations to him, and nothing was omitted which could be thought proper treatment for such as had been so unexpectedly preserved alive.

§ 2. When news of this was told Augustus he did not believe it, because Herod was not so easily to be imposed upon in affairs of great concern to him; yet, having some suspicion it might be so, he sent Celadus, one of his freedmen, who had intimately known the young men, and bade him bring Alexander into his presence. And he brought him, being no better in judging about him than the rest of the multitude. However the young man did not deceive Augustus, for although there was a resemblance between him and Alexander, yet was it not so exact as to impose on such as had good discernment. For this spurious Alexander had his hands rough from the labour he had undergone, and instead of that softness of body which the other had, derived from his delicate and noble bringing up, this man, for the contrary reason, had a hard body. When, therefore, Augustus saw how the master and scholar agreed in this lying story, and in their audacious fiction, he inquired about Aristobulus, and asked what had become of him, who (according to his story) was stolen away also, and why he had not come with him, and endeavoured to recover the rights due to his high birth also? And he said, that he had been left in the island of Cyprus, for fear of the dangers of the sea, that, in case anything should happen to himself, the posterity of Mariamne might not utterly perish, but that Aristobulus might survive, and punish those that had plotted against them. And as he persevered in his affirmations, and the author of the imposture bore him out, Augustus took the young man aside and said to him, "If thou wilt not impose upon me, thou shalt have this for thy reward, that thou shalt escape with thy life; tell me, then, who thou art, and who it was that had boldness enough to contrive such a cheat as this; for this contrivance is too great a piece of villany to have been undertaken by one of thy age." And as he had no other course to take, he told Augustus of the contrivance, and how, and by whom, it was made up. Then Augustus, observing the spurious Alexander to be a strong active man, and fit to work with his hands (for he would not break his promise to him) put him to row in his galleys, but had him executed who had induced him to do what he had done. As for the people of Melos, he thought them sufficiently punished, in having thrown away so much of their money upon this spurious Alexander. Such was the ignominious conclusion of this bold contrivance in regard to this spurious Alexander.

CHAP. XIII.

§ 1.

WHEN Archelaus had taken over his ethnarchy, and returned to Judæa, he accused Joazar, the son of Boethus, of having assisted the rebellious, and took away the high priesthood from him, and put Eleazar his brother into his place. He also magnificently rebuilt the royal palace at Jericho, and diverted half the water with which the village of Neara<sup>1</sup> used to be watered, and drew off that water into the plain, which he had planted with palm-trees. He also built a village which he called Archelais;<sup>1</sup> and he transgressed the law of our fathers<sup>2</sup> by marrying Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, who had been the wife of his brother Alexander, who had three children by her, though it was a thing detestable among the Jews to marry their brothers' wives. But Eleazar did not continue long in the high priesthood; Jesus, the son of Sie, being put in his room while he was still living.

§ 2. Now in the tenth year of Archelaus' rule, the principal men of Judæa and Samaria, not being able to bear his barbarous and tyrannical usage of them, accused him to Augustus, especially as they knew he had broken the commands of the Emperor, namely to behave himself with moderation among them. And Augustus, when he heard this accusation, was very angry, and called for Archelaus' agent, who looked after his affairs at Rome, and whose name was Archelaus also, and thinking it beneath him to write to Archelaus, he bade this agent sail away as soon as possible, and bring him to Rome: and he made haste in his voyage, and when he reached Judæa, found Archelaus feasting with his friends; and he told him what Augustus had sent him for, and hurried him off. And when he reached Rome, Augustus, upon hearing what his accusers had to say, and his reply, banished him, and appointed Vienne,<sup>3</sup> a city of Gaul, to be the place of his habitation, and took his money away from him.

§ 3. Now, before Archelaus had gone up to Rome upon being summoned by Augustus, he related the following dream to his friends, that he saw ten ears of corn full of wheat, perfectly ripe, which ears, as it seemed to him, were devoured by oxen. And when he woke (for the vision appeared to be of great importance to him) he sent for the wise men who understood dreams. And while some were of one opinion, and some of another, (for all their interpretations did not agree,) Simon, a man of the sect of the Essenes, desired leave to speak his mind freely, and said that the vision denoted a change in the affairs of Archelaus, and that not for the better; that oxen, because that animal takes uneasy pains in its labours, denoted afflictions, and indeed denoted further a change of affairs, because the land which was ploughed by oxen could not remain in its former state: and that the ears of corn being ten marked the same number of years, because an ear of corn grows in one year; and that the time of Archelaus' rule was over. Thus did this man expound the dream. Now, on the fifth day after this dream came first to Archelaus, the other Archelaus, that was sent to Judæa by Augustus to recall him, arrived also.

§ 4. Something similar befell Glaphyra his wife, who was the daughter of king Archelaus, and was married, as I said before, while she was a virgin, to Alexander the son of Herod, and brother of Archelaus; but after Alexander was put to death by his father, she married Juba, the king of Libya, and when he was dead, and she living in widowhood in Cappadocia with her father, Archelaus divorced his former wife Mariamne, and married her, so great was his affection for this Glaphyra. And she, during her marriage to him, had the following dream. She thought she saw Alexander standing by her, at which she rejoiced, and embraced him with great affection, but he complained of her, and said, "O Glaphyra! thou provest that saying to be true, which assures us that women are not to be trusted. Didst not thou pledge thy faith to me? and wast not thou married to me when thou wast a virgin? and had we not children? Yet hast thou forgotten the affection I bore to thee, in thy desire for a second husband. Nor wast thou satisfied with that injury thou didst me, but thou hast been so bold as to procure thee a third husband to lie by thee, and in an indecent and impudent manner hast entered into my house, having married Archelaus, thy husband, and my brother. However, I will not forget thy former kind affection for me, but will set thee free from all reproach, and cause thee to be mine again, as thou once wast." When she had related this dream to her female companions, a few days after she departed this life.

§ 5. Now, I do not think these stories unsuitable in my present history, because my narrative is now concerning kings; and besides I thought them fit to be set down, as they confirm the immortality of the soul, and the providence of God over human affairs. But if any one does not believe such relations, let him indeed enjoy his own opinion, but let him not hinder another, that would thereby encourage himself in virtue. However Archelaus' country was added to the province of Syria; and Cyrenius, who had been consul, was sent by Augustus to take a valuation of property in Syria, and to sell the house of Archelaus.

CHAP. I.

How Cyrenius was sent by Augustus to take a Valuation of Syria and Judæa; and how Coponius was sent to be Procurator of Judæa; also of Judas of Galilee, and the Sects that were among the Jews.

§ 1.

NOW Cyrenius, a Roman senator, and one who had gone through other offices, and had passed through all till he became consul, and one who, on other accounts, was of great merit, came at this time into Syria with a few others, being sent by Augustus to be a judge of that nation, and to take a valuation of their substance. Coponius also, a man of the equestrian order, was sent with him, to have the supreme power over the Jews. Cyrenius also came into Judæa, which was now added to the province of Syria, to take a valuation of their substance, and to dispose of Archelaus' money. But the Jews, although at first they took the report of a taxation very ill, yet left off any further opposition to it, at the persuasion of Joazar, who was high priest, and the son of Boethus. For they listened to Joazar's words, and gave an account of their estates without any dispute. But one Judas,<sup>1</sup> a Gaulanite, of a city whose name was Gamala,<sup>2</sup> joining himself to Sadduc a Pharisee, was eager to draw them to a revolt. Both said that this taxation was nothing but a direct introduction of slavery, and exhorted the nation to assert their liberty, as if they could procure them happiness and security for what they possessed, and if they failed in the happiness that would result from this, they would acquire honour and glory for magnanimity. They also said that God would not assist them unless they joined with one another energetically for success, and still further set about great exploits, and did not grow weary in executing the same. And the men heard what they said with pleasure, and so this bold attempt proceeded to a great height. All sorts of misfortunes also sprang from these men, and the nation was infected by them to an incredible degree: one violent war came upon us after another, and we lost our friends who used to alleviate our pains; there were also very great robberies, and murders of our principal men, under pretext indeed of the public welfare, but in reality from the hopes of private gain. Hence arose seditions, and owing to them political murders, which sometimes fell on their own people, (from the madness of these men towards one another, and their desire that none of their rivals should be left.) and sometimes on their enemies; a famine also came upon us, and reduced us to the last degree of despair, as did also the taking and demolishing of cities, nay, faction at last increased so high, that the very temple of God was burnt down by the enemies' fire. So greatly did the alteration and change from the customs of our fathers tend to bring all to destruction who thus banded together, for Judas and Sadduc, who introduced a fourth philosophic sect among us, and had a great many followers therein, filled our state with tumults at the time, and laid the foundations of future miseries by their system of philosophy which we were before unacquainted with, concerning which I shall discourse a little, and that the rather, because the infection which spread thence among our younger men, who were zealous for it, brought our nation to destruction.

<sup>1</sup> Since St. Luke once, Acts v. 37, and Josephus four times, here, § 6, and xx. 5, § 2; Jewish War, ii. 8, § 1, and 17, § 8, calls this Judas, who was the pestilent author of that seditious doctrine and temper which brought the Jewish nation to utter destruction, a Galilæan, but here, § 1, Josephus calls him a Gaulanite, of the city of Gamala, it is a great question where this Judas was born, whether in Galilee on the west side, or in Gaulanitis, on the east side of the river Jordan; while in the place just now cited out of the Antiquities, xx. 5, § 2, he is not only called a Galilæan, but it is added to his story, 'as I have signified in the books that go before these,' as if he had called him a Galilæan in those Antiquities before, as well as in that particular place, as Dean Aldrich observes, Jewish War, ii. 8, § 1. Nor can one well imagine why he should here call him a Gaulanite, when in the 6th sect. following here, as well as twice in Jewish War, he still calls him a Galilæan. As for the city of Gamala, whence this Judas was derived, it determines nothing, since there were two of that name, the one in Gaulanitis, the other in Galilee. See Reland on the city or town of that name.—W.

§ 2. The Jews had had for a great while three sects of philosophy peculiar to themselves, the sect of the Essenes, and the sect of the Sadducees, and the third sort of opinions was that of those called Pharisees. And although I have already spoken of these sects in the second book of the Jewish War, yet will I touch a little upon them also now.

§ 3. As for the Pharisees, they live simply, and despise delicacies, and follow the guidance of reason, as to what it prescribes to them as good, and think they ought earnestly to strive to observe its dictates. They also pay respect to such as are in years; nor are they so bold as to contradict them in anything which they have introduced. And when they say that all things happen by fate, they do not take away from men the freedom of acting as they think fit; since their notion is, that it has pleased God to mix up the decrees of fate and man's will, so that man can act virtuously or viciously. They also believe, that souls have an immortal power in them, and that there will be under the earth rewards or punishments, according as men have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; and the latter souls are to be detained in an everlasting prison, but the former will have power to live again. On account of these doctrines they have very great influence with the people, and whatever they do about divine worship, or prayers, or sacrifices, they perform according to their direction. Such great testimony do the cities bear them on account of their constant practice of virtue, both in the actions of their lives, and in their conversation.

§ 4. But the doctrine of the Sadducees is that souls die with the bodies; nor do they pretend to regard anything but what the law enjoins on them; for they think it virtue to dispute with the teachers of the philosophy which they follow, and their views are received by only a few, but those are of the highest rank. But they are able to do hardly anything so to speak, for when they become magistrates, as they are unwillingly and by force sometimes obliged to do, they addict themselves to the notions of the Pharisees, because the people would not otherwise put up with them.

§ 5. The doctrine of the Essenes is that all things are left in the hand of God. They teach the immortality of souls, and think that the rewards of righteousness are to be earnestly striven for. And when they send what they have dedicated to God to the temple, they do not offer sacrifices, because they have more pure lustrations of their own; on which account they are excluded from the common court of the temple, and offer their sacrifices by themselves. But their course of life is better than that of other men, and they entirely addict themselves to husbandry. It also deserves our admiration, how much they exceed in justice all other men that addict themselves to virtue, to such a degree as has never appeared among any other men, either Greeks or barbarians, and that not for a short time, but it has endured for a long while among them. This is shown by that institution of theirs, which will not suffer anything to hinder them from having all things in common, so that a rich man enjoys no more of his wealth than he who has nothing at all. There are more than four thousand men who live in this way, and they neither marry wives, nor are desirous to keep slaves, thinking that the latter tempts men to be unjust, and that the former gives a handle to domestic quarrels; but as they live by themselves, they minister to one another. They also appoint good priests to receive their revenues, and the fruits of the ground, so as to get their corn and food. They live all alike, and mostly resemble those Dacæ who are called Polistæ.<sup>1</sup>

§ 6. But Judas the Galilæan was the author of the fourth sect of Jewish philosophy. Its pupils agree in all other things with the Pharisaic notions, but they have an inviolable attachment to liberty, and say that God is their only ruler and lord. They also do not mind dying any kinds of death, nor indeed do they heed the tortures of their relations and friends, nor can any such fear make them call any man lord. And since this immovable resolution of theirs is well known to a great many, I shall speak no further about that matter; for I am not afraid that anything I have said of them should be disbelieved, but rather fear that what I have said comes short of the resolution they show when they undergo pain. And it was in Gessius Florus' time, who was our procurator, that the nation began to suffer from this madness, for by the abuse of his authority he made the Jews go wild and revolt from the Romans. And these are the sects of Jewish philosophy.

§ 1.

WHEN Cyrenius had now disposed of Archelaus' money, and when the taxings were come to a conclusion, which were made in the thirty-seventh year after Augustus' victory over Antony off Actium,<sup>2</sup> he deprived Joazar of the high priesthood, which dignity had been conferred on him by the multitude, and appointed Ananus, the son of Seth, to be high priest. Now Herod and Philip had each of them received their own tetrarchy, and settled affairs therein. Herod also fortified Sepphoris,<sup>1</sup> (which is the ornament of all Galilee,) and dedicated it to the emperor. He also built a wall round Betharamptha,<sup>2</sup> which was itself a city also, and called it Julias, from the name of the emperor's wife.<sup>3</sup> Philip also built Paneas,<sup>4</sup> a city at the springs of the Jordan, and called it Cæsarea. He also advanced the village Bethsaida,<sup>5</sup> situate near the lake of Gennesar, to the dignity of a city, both from the number of inhabitants it contained, and its opulence in other respects, and called it by the name of Julias, from the name of the emperor's daughter.<sup>6</sup>

§ 2. As Coponius, who I said was sent out with Cyrenius, was administrating Judæa, the following event happened. When the Jews celebrate the feast of Unleavened Bread, which we call the Passover, it is customary for the priests to open the temple gates just after midnight. When, therefore, these gates were first opened at this Passover, some of the Samaritans who had come privately to Jerusalem threw about dead men's bones in the porticoes; so the Jews afterwards excluded them all from the temple, which they had not used to do at such festivals; and on other accounts also watched the temple more carefully than they had formerly done. Soon after this event Coponius returned to Rome, and Marcus Ambivius came to be his successor in the government; under whom Salome, the sister of king Herod, died, and left to Julia Jannia<sup>7</sup> and all its toparchy, and Phasaelis in the plain, and Archelais,<sup>8</sup> where is a great plantation of palm-trees, whose fruit is most excellent. His successor was Annius Rufus, during whose term of office died Augustus, the second emperor of the Romans, the duration of whose reign was fifty-seven years six months and two days, (of which time Antony ruled with him fourteen years,) and the duration of his life was seventy-seven years; and on his death Tiberius Nero, his wife Julia's son, succeeded. He was now the third emperor, and he sent Valerius Gratus as procurator of Judæa, to succeed Annius Rufus. He deprived Ananus of the high priesthood, and appointed Ishmael, the son of Phabi, to be high priest. He also deprived him in a little time, and appointed Eleazar, the son of Ananus (who had been high priest before) to be high priest; which office, when he had held it for a year, Gratus deprived him of, and gave the high priesthood to Simon, the son of Camithus, and, when he had held that dignity only a year, Joseph, also called Caiaphas, was made his successor. When Gratus had done all these things, he returned to Rome, after he had stayed in Judæa eleven years, and Pontius Pilate came as his successor.

§ 3. And Herod the tetrarch, who was in great favour with Tiberius, built a city of the same name as him, and called it Tiberias.<sup>1</sup> He built it in the best part of Galilee near the lake of Gennesar. There are warm baths at no great distance from it, in a village called Emmaus.<sup>2</sup> Strangers came and inhabited this city, a great number of the inhabitants were Galilæans also; and many were made to go there from the country belonging to Herod, and were by force compelled to be its inhabitants, some of these being persons of condition. Herod also admitted poor people, gathered from all parts, to dwell in it. Nay, some of them were not quite freemen, and these he was a great benefactor to, and made them free in great numbers; but obliged them not to forsake the city, by building them very good houses at his own expense, and by giving them land also; for he knew that to colonize this place was to transgress the ancient Jewish laws, because many sepulchres there had to be taken away to make room for this city of Tiberias, and our laws pronounce that such inhabitants are unclean for seven days.<sup>3</sup>

§ 4. About this time died Phraates, king of the Parthians, by the treachery of Phraataces his son, for the following reason. Though Phraates had legitimate sons of his own, he had an amour with an Italian maid (whose name was Thermusa, who had been formerly sent to him among other presents by Julius Cæsar), and being a great admirer of her beauty, and in process of time having a son by her, whose name was Phraataces, he eventually made her his legitimate wife, and held her in great honour. Now, though she was able to persuade him to do any thing that she said, and strove to procure the throne of Parthia for her son, she saw that her endeavours would not succeed, unless she could contrive to remove Phraates' legitimate sons. So she urged him to send those sons of his as pledges of his fidelity to Rome; and they were sent to Rome accordingly, because it was not easy for him to contradict her commands. Now, as Phraataces was alone brought up to succeed to the throne, he thought it very tiresome and tedious to wait for that throne by his father's donation as his successor; he therefore formed a treacherous design against his father, by his mother's assistance, with whom (so the report went), he had also criminal relations. And he was hated for both these things, as his subjects esteemed this incestuous love of his mother to be as bad as his parricide; and he was expelled out of the country by them, in an insurrection, before he grew too great, and so died. But, as the noblest of the Parthians agreed that it was impossible they could be governed without a king, while it was also their constant practice to choose one of the descendants of Arsaces (nor did their law allow of any others, and they thought the kingdom had been sufficiently injured already by the marriage with an Italian concubine, and by her issue,) they sent ambassadors and invited Orodes [to take the crown;] for though the multitude did not like him, and though he was accused of very great cruelty, and was of an intractable temper, and prone to wrath, yet he was one of the descendants of Arsaces. However, a conspiracy was made against him, and he was slain, as some say, at a festival and at table (for it is the universal custom there to carry swords); but the more general report is that he was slain when he was induced to go a-hunting. They then sent ambassadors to Rome, and asked for one of those that were pledged there to be their king. And Vonones was preferred before the rest, and sent to them, for he seemed capable of such great fortune, which two of the greatest kingdoms under the sun now offered him, his own and a foreign one. However, the barbarians soon changed their minds, being naturally of a fickle disposition, and supposing that he was not worthy to be their king (for they could not think of obeying the commands of one that had been a slave, for so they called those that had been hostages, nor could they bear the ignominy of that name); and this was the more intolerable, because the Parthians were now to have a king set over them, not by right of war, but by insolence in time of peace. So they forthwith invited Artabanus, king of Media, to be their king, who was one of the descendants of Arsaces. Artabanus complied with the offer that was made him, and came to them with an army. And Vonones met him, and at first the multitude of the Parthians stood on his side, and he put his army in battle array, and Artabanus was beaten, and fled to the mountains of Media; but a little while after he gathered a great army together, and fought again with Vonones, and beat him; whereupon Vonones fled away on horseback, with a few of his attendants about him, to Seleucia.<sup>1</sup> And when Artabanus had slain a great number in the rout from the very great dismay the barbarians were in, he betook himself to Ctesiphon<sup>2</sup> with a great number of his people. And so he now reigned over the Parthians. But Vonones fled away to Armenia, and as soon as he got there, he desired to have the government of that country given him, and sent ambassadors to Rome about it. But as Tiberius refused it him, partly because he wanted courage, partly because of the Parthian king's threats (who sent ambassadors to threaten war), and as he had no other way to get the kingdom (for the people of authority among the Armenians near Niphates<sup>3</sup> joined themselves to Artabanus), he delivered himself up to Silanus, the president of Syria, who, out of regard to his education at Rome, kept him in Syria, and Artabanus gave Armenia to Orodes, one of his own sons.

§ 5. At this time died Antiochus, the king of Commagene,<sup>1</sup> whereupon the people disputed with the aristocracy, and both sent ambassadors to Rome, for the men in power were desirous that their form of government might be changed into that of a Roman province; but the people desired to be under kings, as their fathers had been. And the senate made a decree, that Germanicus should be sent out to settle affairs in the East, fortune hereby taking opportunity to deprive him of his life. For when he had gone to the East, and settled all affairs there, he was taken off by poison by Piso, as has been related elsewhere.

CHAP. III.

Insurrection of the Jews against Pontius Pilate. Concerning Christ, and what befell Paulina and the Jews at Rome.

§ 1.

NOW Pilate, the procurator of Judæa, removed the army from Cæsarea, and put it in winter quarters at Jerusalem, in order to abolish the Jewish laws. And he thought of introducing into the city the Emperor's busts, which were upon the standards, whereas our law forbids us the very making of images; on which account former procurators were wont to make their entry into the city with such standards as had not such ornaments. Pilate was the first who brought those images to Jerusalem, and set them up there; which was done without the knowledge of the people, because it was done in the night-time. But as soon as they knew it, they flocked in great numbers to Cæsarea, and besought Pilate many days that he would remove the images. And when he would not grant their request, because it would seem an insult to the Emperor, as they persevered in their request, he ordered his soldiers on the sixth day to take their weapons privately, and himself came and sat upon his judgment-seat, which was so prepared in the open part of the city, that it concealed the army that lay in ambush. And when the Jews petitioned him again, he gave a signal to the soldiers to surround them, and threatened that their punishment should be no less than speedy death, unless they left off disturbing him, and went their ways home. But they threw themselves upon the ground, and bared their necks, and said they would welcome death rather than that the wisdom of their laws should be transgressed. Thereupon Pilate was astonished at their determination to keep their laws inviolable, and instantly commanded the images to be carried back from Jerusalem to Cæsarea.

§ 2. Pilate also introduced water into Jerusalem, paying for the work with the sacred money, and brought the water a distance of two hundred furlongs. However, the Jews were not pleased with what was done about this water; and many myriads of the people assembled together and made a clamour against him, and insisted that he should abandon his intention. Some of them also used reproaches, and abused Pilate, as crowds love to do. So he dressed a great number of his soldiers in the Jewish dress, who carried daggers under their garments, and sent them to a place where they might surround the Jews, and then himself bade the Jews go away. But as they began to abuse him, he gave the soldiers the signal which had been agreed on beforehand, and they laid about them with much greater vigour than Pilate had commanded, and equally punished those that were riotous, and those that were not. But the Jews abated not a whit their obstinacy, and as they were unarmed, and roughly handled by men provided with weapons, a great number of them were slain by this means, and others of them ran away wounded. Thus an end was put to this insurrection.

§ 3. Now about this time lived Jesus, a wise man, if indeed it be lawful to call him a man. For he was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of men who receive the truth with pleasure; and drew over to him many of the Jews, and many of the Gentiles. He was the Christ. And when Pilate, at the information of the leading men among us, had condemned him to the cross, those who had loved him at first did not cease to do so. For he appeared to them alive again the third day, as the divine prophets had foretold this and ten thousand other wonderful things concerning him. And the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day.

§ 4. About the same time, also, another sad calamity troubled the Jews, and certain shameful practices took place in the temple of Isis that was at Rome. I shall first relate the wickedness done in the temple of Isis, and will then give an account of what befell the Jews. There was at Rome a woman whose name was Paulina, who, on account of the rank of her ancestors, and because of the regular conduct of a virtuous life, had a great reputation; she was also very rich, and although she was of a beautiful countenance, and in that flower of her age wherein women are the most gay, she led a life of great modesty. She was married to Saturninus, who well assorted in every way to her from his excellent character. Decius Mundus, a man very high in the equestrian order, fell in love with Paulina, and as she was of too great rank to be caught by presents, and had already rejected them, though they had been sent her in great abundance, he was still more inflamed with love for her, insomuch that he promised to give her two hundred thousand Attic drachmæ for one enjoyment of her. And as not even this would prevail upon her, and he was not able to bear this ill success in his amours, he thought it the best way to starve himself to death, on account of his trouble at Paulina's refusal. And he determined to die in this manner, and went on with his purpose accordingly. Now, Mundus had a freed-woman, who had been made free by his father, whose name was Ide, a woman up to all sorts of mischief. She was very much grieved at the young man's resolution to kill himself (for he did not conceal his intention to destroy himself), and went to him, and encouraged him by her words, and made him hope that he might yet enjoy Paulina. And when he joyfully listened to her entreaty, she said she wanted no more than fifty thousand drachmæ to entrap Paulina. Now when she had encouraged in this way the young man, and got as much money as she asked for, she did not take the same methods as had been taken before, because she perceived that the lady was by no means to be tempted by money; but knowing that she was very much given to the worship of the goddess Isis, she devised the following stratagem. She went to some of Isis' priests, and told them the passion of the young man, and with the strongest promises of concealment urged them by words, but chiefly by the offer of money, twenty-five thousand drachmæ in hand, and as much more when the thing had been done, to use all possible means to seduce the woman. And they were induced to promise to do so by the large sum of gold they were to have. So the oldest of them went immediately to Paulina, and upon his being admitted desired to speak with her by herself. When that was granted him, he told her that he was sent by the god Anubis, who had fallen in love with her, and bade her visit him. And she took the message very kindly, and boasted to her lady friends of this condescension of Anubis, and told her husband, that she had a message sent her, and was to sup and sleep with Anubis. And he agreed to her acceptance of the offer, being fully satisfied of the chastity of his wife. Accordingly, she went to the temple, and after she had supped there, and it was the hour to go to sleep, the priest shut the doors of the temple, when the lights were also put out in the inner sanctuary. Then did Mundus leap out, (for he was hidden there,) and did not fail to enjoy her, and she was at his service all the night long, supposing he was the god; and when he had gone away, which was before the priests who knew not of this stratagem were stirring, Paulina went home early in the morning to her husband, and told him how the god Anubis had appeared to her, and also boasted about the matter to her lady friends. And they partly disbelieved the thing when they reflected on its nature, and partly were amazed at it, but had no pretext for not believing it, when they considered her modesty and merit. But on the third day after what had been done, Mundus met Paulina, and said, "Truly, Paulina, thou hast saved me two hundred thousand drachmæ, which sum thou mightest have given thine own family; yet hast thou not failed to be at my service in what I asked of thee. As for the reproaches thou hast heaped upon Mundus, I care not about names; but I rejoice in the pleasure I reaped by what I did, when I took to myself the name of Anubis." When he had said this, he went his way, but she rent her garments, now first knowing what she had done, and told her husband of this wicked and black contrivance, and prayed him not to neglect to assist her. And he discovered the matter to the emperor; whereupon Tiberius inquired into it thoroughly, examining the priests about it, and ordering them to be crucified, as well as Ide, who was the cause of their ruin, and had contrived the whole matter, which was so injurious to Paulina. He also demolished the temple of Isis, and gave orders that her statue should be thrown into the river Tiber. But he only banished Mundus, and did no more to him, because he supposed that the crime he had committed was done from the violence of his love. These were the circumstances as to the temple of Isis, and the outrage done by her priests. I now return to the relation of what happened about this time to the Jews at Rome, as I said before I should.

§ 5. There was a man who was a Jew, but had been driven away from his own country by an accusation of transgressing the laws, and by the fear he was in of punishment for the same, but he was in all respects a wicked man. He, then living at Rome, professed to instruct men in the wisdom of the laws of Moses, and also got three other men, entirely of the same character as himself, to be his partners. These men persuaded Fulvia, a woman of great rank, who had become a disciple of theirs, and embraced the Jewish religion, to send purple and gold to the temple at Jerusalem, and, when they had got these, they employed them to their own use, and spent the money themselves, which was the very reason why they had first asked it of her. Whereupon Tiberius (who had been informed of the thing by his friend Saturninus, the husband of Fulvia, who desired inquiry might be made about it) ordered all the Jews to be banished from Rome. And the consuls enlisted four thousand of them, and sent them to the island of Sardinia; <sup>1</sup> but punished very many, who were unwilling to become soldiers, because of their respect for the laws of their forefathers. Thus were these Jews banished from Rome owing to the wickedness of four men.

How the Samaritans made a Tumult, and how Pilate slew many of them: also how Pilate was accused, and what was done by Vitellius as regarded the Jews and the Parthians.

§ 1.

BUT the nation of the Samaritans did not escape without tumult. The man who excited them to it was one who thought lying a thing of little consequence, and who contrived everything to please the multitude. So he bade them assemble together upon Mount Gerizim, which is by them looked upon as the most holy of all mountains, and assured them, that when they came there, he would show them the sacred vessels that were buried there, because Moses had them put there. And they went there armed, and thought the statement of the man probable; and as they encamped at a certain village, which was called Tirathana,<sup>1</sup> they got together as many as they could, desiring to go up the mountain en masse. But Pilate prevented them by occupying the ascent with a band of horse and foot, who attacked those who were concentrated in the village; and when it came to an action, they slew some, and put others to flight, and took a great many alive, the leaders of whom, and also the most influential of those that fled away, Pilate ordered to be put to death.

§ 2. But when this tumult was appeased, the Samaritan senate sent an embassy to Vitellius, a man that had been consul, and was now president of Syria, and accused Pilate of the murder of those that had been killed, for they said they had gone to Tirathana not to revolt from the Romans, but to escape the violence of Pilate. And Vitellius sent Marcellus, a friend of his, to see to the affairs of Judæa, and ordered Pilate to go to Rome, to answer the accusations of the Jews before the emperor. And Pilate, who had spent ten years in Judæa, hastened to Rome in obedience to the orders of Vitellius, which he durst not contradict. But before he got to Rome, Tiberius was dead.

§ 3. But Vitellius came into Judæa, and went up to Jerusalem; it was at the time of that festival which is called the Passover. And as he was magnificently received there, Vitellius released the inhabitants of Jerusalem from all the taxes upon the fruits that were bought and sold, and allowed the high priest's vestments, with all their ornaments, to be under the charge of the priests in the temple, as they had been in old times, although at this time they were laid up in the fortress called Antonia,<sup>1</sup> and that for the following reason. One of the high priests called Hyrcanus, the first of many of that name, built a tower near the temple, and when he had so done, he generally dwelt in it, and kept these vestments (which were in his charge) there, because it was lawful for him alone to put them on, and he deposited them there when he went down into the city, and took his ordinary garments; and the same practice was continued by his sons, and by their sons after them. But when Herod came to be king, he rebuilt this tower, which was very conveniently situated, in a magnificent manner; and because he was a friend of Antony, he called it by the name of Antonia. And as he found these vestments lying there, he retained them in the same place, believing that the people would not rise against him because he had them in his custody. The same as Herod did was done by his son Archelaus, who was appointed king after him; after whom the Romans, when they took over the government, took possession of these vestments of the high priest, and had them deposited in a stone chamber, under seal of the priests and keepers of the treasury, the commandant of the fortress lighting a lamp there every day. And seven days before a festival they were delivered to them by the commandant of the fortress, when the high priest having purified them, and used them, laid them up again in the same chamber where they had been laid up before the very day after the feast was over. This was the practice at the three yearly festivals, and on the fast day.<sup>1</sup> But Vitellius put these vestments into our own power, as in the days of our forefathers, and ordered the commandant of the fortress not to trouble himself to inquire where they were laid, or when they were to be used; and this he did as an act of kindness, to oblige the nation to him. He also deprived Joseph, who was also called Caiaphas, of the high priesthood, and appointed Jonathan (the son of Ananus, the former high priest,) to succeed him. After this he returned to Antioch.

§ 4. And Tiberius sent a letter to Vitellius, and commanded him to negotiate a friendship with Artabanus, the king of Parthia; for he was his enemy, and terrified him, as he had seized Armenia, lest he should proceed further, and Tiberius said he should only trust him upon Artabanus giving him hostages, and especially his son. Upon Tiberius' writing thus to Vitellius, by the offer of great presents of money, he persuaded both the king of Iberia,<sup>2</sup> and the king of Albania,<sup>3</sup> to make no delay, but to fight against Artabanus; and although they would not do so themselves, yet they gave the Scythians a passage through their country, and opened the Caspian gates<sup>4</sup> to them, and brought them upon Artabanus. So Armenia was again taken from the Parthians, and the country of Parthia was filled with war, and their leading men were slain, and all things were in disorder among them: the king's son also himself fell in these wars, together with many ten thousands of his army. Vitellius had also sent such great sums of money to the kinsmen and friends of his father Artabanus, that he had almost got him slain by those who had taken the bribes. And when Artabanus perceived that the plot laid against him was not to be avoided, because it was laid by many persons and by the leading men, so that it would certainly take effect, and compared the number of those who were truly faithful to him with those that were already corrupted, and deceitful in the kindness they professed to him, and were likely, if any attempt were made upon him, to go over to his enemies, he made his escape to the upper satrapies. And he afterwards raised a great army out of the Dahæ and Sacæ, and fought with his enemies, and recovered his throne.

§ 5. When Tiberius heard of these things, he desired to have friendship negotiated between himself and Artabanus. And when, upon this invitation, Artabanus received the proposal kindly, he and Vitellius met at the Euphrates, and as a bridge was laid over the river, they each of them, attended by their guards, had an interview with one another in the middle of the bridge. And when they had agreed upon the terms of peace, Herod the tetrarch erected a rich tent in the middle of the passage, and feasted them there. Artabanus also, not long afterwards, sent his son Darius to Tiberius as a hostage, with many presents, among which was a man seven cubits in height, a Jew by race, whose name was Eleazar, and who for his height was called Giant. After this Vitellius went to Antioch, and Artabanus to Babylonia. And Herod, wishing to give Tiberius the first information that they had obtained hostages, sent letter-carriers, and accurately described all the particulars, and left nothing for the consular Vitellius to inform him of. So when Vitellius' letters were sent, and Tiberius let him know that he was acquainted with the affair already, because Herod had given him an account of them before, Vitellius was very much vexed at it; and supposing that he had been thereby more injured than was really the case, he nourished a secret anger for it, till he could be revenged on Herod, which was after Caius had succeeded to the empire.

after he had been tetrarch of Trachonitis, and Gaulanitis, and Batanæa also, thirty-seven years. He had shown himself a person of moderation and quietness in his rule. He always lived in the country which was subject to him, and used to make his progresses with a few chosen friends; his tribunal also, on which he sat in judgment, followed him in his progresses, and when any one met him who wanted his assistance, he made no delay, but had his tribunal set down immediately, wherever he happened to be, and sat down upon it, and heard the case; and ordered the guilty that were convicted to be punished, and absolved those that were accused unjustly. He died at Julias,<sup>1</sup> and when he was carried to the tomb which he had already had erected for himself beforehand, he was buried with great pomp. Tiberius took his dominions, for he left no sons behind him, and added them to the province of Syria, but gave orders that the tribute collected in his tetrarchy should be kept in it.

CHAP. V.

Herod the Tetrarch makes War with Aretas, the King of Arabia, and is beaten by him; also concerning the Death of John the Baptist; and how Vitellius went up to Jerusalem; together with some Account of Agrippa, and of the Posterity of Herod the Great.

§ 1.

ABOUT this time Aretas, the king of Arabia Petraea, and Herod, had a quarrel on the following account. Herod the tetrarch had married the daughter of Aretas, and had lived with her a long time. But on his journey to Rome, he lodged with Herod, who was his brother indeed, but tember, in the fourth year before the Christian era, and Tiberius began, it is well known, August 19, A.D. 14, it is evident that the thirty-seventh year of Philip, reckoned from his father's death, was the twentieth of Tiberius, or near the end of A.D. 33 (the very year of our Saviour's death also), or, however, in the beginning of the next year, A.D. 34. This Philip seems to have been the best of all the posterity of Herod, for his love of peace and love of justice.—W.

not by the same mother; for this Herod<sup>1</sup> was the son of the high priest Simon's daughter. And he fell in love with Herodias, this last Herod's wife, (who was the daughter of Aristobulus their brother, and the sister of Agrippa the Great,) and ventured to talk to her of marriage. And as she agreed to his proposal, it was arranged that she should change her habitation, and come to him as soon as he should return from Rome: it was also stipulated that he should divorce Aretas' daughter. When he had made this agreement, he sailed to Rome; and when he had done there the business he went about, and returned home again, his wife having heard of the agreement he had made with Herodias, and having learned of it before her husband was aware of her knowledge of his whole design, she desired him to send her to Machærus,<sup>2</sup> a fortress on the borders of the dominions of Aretas and Herod, without informing him of any of her intentions. Accordingly Herod sent her there, not thinking his wife had any inkling of his arrangement with Herodias. Now she had sent various things a good while before to Machærus, which was at that time subject to her father, and so all necessary preparations for her journey were made by the general of Aretas' army; and so she soon started and reached Arabia, passed on by one general to another, and soon got to her father, and told him of Herod's intentions. And Aretas made this a casus belli, having previously had some difference with Herod about their frontiers in the district of Gamalitis.<sup>3</sup> So they raised armies on both sides, and prepared for war, and sent their generals to fight instead of themselves; and, when they joined battle, all Herod's army was destroyed by the treason of some fugitives, who, as they were of the tetrarchy of Philip, served under Herod. And Herod wrote about this to Tiberius, who, being very angry at the aggression of Aretas, wrote to Vitellius to make war upon him, and either to take him alive, and bring him to him in bonds, or to kill him, and send him his head. This was the charge that Tiberius gave the president of Syria.

§ 2. Now some of the Jews thought that the destruction of Herod's army came from God, and that very justly, as a punishment for what he did against John, who was called the Baptist. For Herod had had him put to death, though he was a good man, and commanded the Jews to exercise virtue, both as to justice towards one another, and piety towards God, and so to come to baptism; for baptism would be acceptable to God, if they made use of it, not in order to expiate some sins, but for the purification of the body, provided that the soul was thoroughly purified beforehand by righteousness. Now, as many flocked to him, for they were greatly moved by hearing his words, Herod, fearing that the great influence John had over the people might lead to some rebellion, (for the people seemed likely to do any thing he should advise,) thought it far best, by putting him to death, to prevent any mischief he might cause, and not bring himself into difficulties, by sparing a man who might make him repent of his leniency when it should be too late. Accordingly, he was sent a prisoner, in consequence of Herod's suspicious temper, to Machærus, the fortress I before mentioned, and was there put to death. So the Jews had an opinion that the destruction of this army was sent as a punishment upon Herod, and was a mark of God's displeasure at him.

§ 3. Now Vitellius prepared to make war upon Aretas, having with him two legions of armed men: he also took with him all the light-armed troops and cavalry with them, which were drawn from those kingdoms which were under the Romans, and pushed on for Petra,<sup>1</sup> and arrived at Ptolemais. And when he was going to lead his army through Judæa, the principal men met him, and desired that he would not march through their land; for the laws of their country would not permit them to overlook images being brought into it, of which there were a great many on their standards. And he listened to what they said, and changed the resolution which he had before taken in the matter, and ordered the army to march along the great plain, while he himself with Herod the tetrarch and his friends went up to Jerusalem to offer sacrifice to God, as an ancient festival of the Jews was then at hand. And when he arrived there, and was honourably received by the people of the Jews, he stayed there for three days, during which time he deprived Jonathan of the high priesthood, and gave it to his brother Theophilus; but on the fourth day, when letters came to him informing him of the death of Tiberius, he obliged the people to take an oath of fidelity to Caius; he also recalled his army, and made them every one go home to their winter quarters, because, as the empire had devolved upon Caius, he had not the same authority for making this war as he had before. It was also reported, that when Aretas heard of the coming of Vitellius to fight him, he said, upon his consulting the auguries, that it was impossible that this army of Vitellius' should enter Petra; for one of the rulers would die, either he that gave orders for the war, or he that was marching at the other's desire to carry out his will, or else he against whom this army was prepared. And Vitellius retired to Antioch. Now Agrippa, the son of Aristobulus, had gone to Rome a year before the death of Tiberius, in order to treat of some affairs with the emperor, if he might be permitted to do so. I have now a mind to describe at some length Herod and his family, and how it fared with them, partly because it concerns this history to speak of the matter, and partly because Herod's family history is a signal proof that a great number of children is of no advantage, any more than any other strength that mankind set their hearts upon, apart from piety towards God: for it happened, within a hundred years, that the posterity of Herod, who were very numerous, with but few exceptions completely died out.<sup>1</sup> One may well apply this for the instruction of mankind, to learn thence how unhappy they were; it will also be well to relate the history of Agrippa, who, as he was a person most worthy of admiration, so was he from a private man, beyond the expectation of all that knew him, advanced to great power and authority. I have said something of them formerly, but I shall now speak more in detail.

§ 4. Herod the Great had two daughters by Mariamne, the daughter of Hyrcanus; one was Salampsio, who married Phasaelus her cousin, who was himself the son of Herod's brother Phasaelus, her father making the match; the other was Cypros, who herself married her cousin Antipater, the son of Herod's sister Salome. Phasaelus had three sons by Salampsio, Antipater, Herod, and Alexander, and two daughters, Alexandra and Cypros. Agrippa, the son of Aristobulus, married this Cypros, and Timius of Cyprus married Alexandra; he was a man of note, but had by her no children. Agrippa had by Cypros two sons and three daughters; the daughters were called Berenice, Mariamne, and Drusilla; and the names of the sons were Agrippa and Drusus, of whom Drusus died before he came to the years of puberty. And their father, Agrippa, was brought up with his other brothers Herod and Aristobulus, who were also the sons of Aristobulus the son of Herod the Great by Berenice; this Berenice was the daughter of Costobarus and of Herod's sister Salome. Aristobulus left these infants, when he and his brother Alexander were put to death by their father, as I have already related. But when they arrived at years of puberty, this Herod, the brother of Agrippa, married Mariamne, the daughter of Olympias (who was the daughter of Herod the king), and of Joseph (the son of Joseph, who was brother to Herod the king), and had by her a son, Aristobulus. And Aristobulus, the third brother of Agrippa, married Jotape, the daughter of Sampsigeramus, king of Emesa;<sup>1</sup> they had a daughter who was deaf, whose name also was Jotape. These so far are the children of the male line. And Herodias, their sister, was married to Herod [Philip], the son of Herod the Great by Mariamne the daughter of Simeon the high priest, and they had a daughter

Salome; after her birth Herod took upon her to confound the laws of our country, and divorced herself from her husband while he was alive, and married Herod [Antipas], (her husband's brother on the father's side,) who was tetrarch of Galilee. And her daughter Salome married Philip (the son of Herod), tetrarch of Trachonitis. And, as he died childless, Aristobulus (the son of Herod, the brother of Agrippa) married her; they had three sons, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus. This was the posterity of Phasaelus and Salampsio. And the daughter of Antipater by Cypros was Cypros, who married Alexas Helcias, the son of Alexas, and they had a daughter Cypros; but Herod and Alexander, who, as I said, were the brothers of Antipater, died childless. As to Alexander, the son of Herod the king, who was put to death by his father, he had two sons, Alexander and Tigranes, by the daughter of Archelaus the king of Cappadocia; Tigranes, who was king of Armenia, was accused at Rome, and died childless; but Alexander had a son of the same name as his brother Tigranes, who was sent out as king of Armenia by Nero; and he had a son, Alexander, who married Jotape, the daughter of Antiochus, the king of Commagene;<sup>1</sup> Vespasian made him king of an island<sup>2</sup> in Cilicia. But these descendants of Alexander, soon after their birth, deserted the Jewish religion, and went over to that of the Greeks. And the rest of the daughters of Herod the king all died childless. And as the descendants of Herod, whom I have enumerated, were in existence when Agrippa the Great got the kingdom, and I have now given an account of their pedigree, it now remains that I relate the various vicissitudes that befell Agrippa, and how he lived through them, and was advanced to the greatest height of dignity and power.

CHAP. VI.

How Agrippa sailed for Rome to Tiberius; and how, upon his being accused by his own freedman, he was put in prison; and how he was set at liberty by Caius, after Tiberius' death, and was made King of the Tetrarchy of Philip.

§ 1.

A LITTLE before the death of Herod the king, Agrippa living at Rome, and being brought up with and very intimate with Drusus, the emperor Tiberius' son, also contracted a friendship with Antonia (the wife of the elder Drusus), who held his mother Berenice in great esteem, and was very desirous of advancing her son. Now though Agrippa was by nature magnanimous and very generous in respect to giving, he did not manifest this inclination of his mind while his mother was alive, thinking it best to avoid her anger for such extravagance; but when Berenice was dead, and he was his own master, he spent a great deal extravagantly in his daily course of living, and a great deal in the immoderate presents he made, and those chiefly to the emperor's freedmen, hoping for their support, so that in a little time he was reduced to poverty, and could not live at Rome any longer. Tiberius also forbade the friends of his deceased son to come into his sight, because on seeing them he should be put in mind of his son, and his grief would be thereby revived.

§ 2. For these reasons he went away from Rome, and set sail for Judæa, but in evil circumstances, being dejected by the loss of the money which he once had, and because he had not wherewithal to pay his creditors, who were many in number, and gave him no chance of avoiding them; so that he knew not what to do, and in shame at the state of his affairs, retired to a certain tower at Malatha<sup>1</sup> in Idumæa, and had thoughts of killing himself. But his wife Cypros perceived his intention, and tried all sorts of methods to divert him from taking such a course.

So she sent a letter to his sister Herodias, who was now the wife of Herod the tetrarch, and let her know Agrippa's present design, and the necessities that drove him to it, and desired her, as a kinswoman of his, to help him and to engage her husband to do the same, as Herodias could see how she (Cypros) alleviated her husband's troubles all she could, although she had not the means they had. And they sent for him, and allotted him Tiberias for his habitation, and assigned him some money for his maintenance, and made him a magistrate of that city, by way of honouring him. However, Herod did not long continue in the resolution of supporting him, though even that support was not sufficient for him. For as they were once at a feast at Tyre, and in their cups abused one another, Agrippa thought it was not to be borne, that Herod threw in his teeth his poverty, and his owing his necessary food to him. So he went to Flaccus, who had been consul, and a very great friend to him at Rome formerly, and was now president of Syria.

§ 3. And Flaccus received him kindly, and he lived with him. Flaccus had also with him there Aristobulus, who was Agrippa's brother, but was at variance with him; yet did not their enmity to one another hinder the friendship of Flaccus to them both, but they both received equal honour from him. However, Aristobulus did not abate his ill-will to Agrippa, till at length he got him to be on bad terms with Flaccus, bringing on the estrangement as follows. The Damascenes had a difference with the Sidonians about their frontiers, and when Flaccus was about to hear the case pleaded, on hearing that Agrippa had great influence with him, they begged that he would be on their side, and promised him a great deal of money. So he was zealous in assisting the Damascenes as far as he was able; but Aristobulus (who had got intelligence of this promise of money) accused him to Flaccus. And when, upon a thorough examination of the matter, it appeared plainly to be so, Flaccus discontinued his friendship to Agrippa. So he was reduced to the utmost straits, and went to Ptolemais,<sup>1</sup> and because he knew not where else to get a livelihood, he thought of sailing to Italy. But as he was prevented from doing so by want of money, he desired Marsyas, who was his freedman, to find some method of procuring him as much money as he wanted for that purpose, by borrowing it of some person or other. So Marsyas desired Peter, who was the freedman of Agrippa's mother Berenice, but by virtue of her testament belonged to Antonia, to lend Agrippa money upon his own bond and security; but he accused Agrippa of having defrauded him of certain sums of money, and so obliged Marsyas, when he made the bond for 20,000 Attic drachmæ, to accept 2,500 drachmæ less than that sum. This the other allowed because he could not help it. Upon the receipt of this money, Agrippa went to Anthedon,<sup>1</sup> and took shipping, and was going to set sail; but Herennius Capito, who was the procurator of Jamnia,<sup>2</sup> sent a band of soldiers to demand of him 300,000 drachmæ of silver, which were owing by him to the emperor's treasury at Rome, and tried to force him to stay. He pretended at the time that he would do as he was told, but when night came on, he cut cables, and went off, and sailed to Alexandria, where he desired Alexander the Alabarch to lend him 200,000 drachmæ; but he said he would not lend it him, but did not refuse it to Cypros, as he greatly admired her affection to her husband, and all her other virtue; and she undertook to repay it. And Alexander gave them five talents at Alexandria, and promised to pay them the rest of the sum at Dicæarchia,<sup>3</sup> and this he did from the fear he was in that Agrippa would soon spend it. And Cypros, having thus set her husband free to sail on to Italy, returned to Judæa with her children.

§ 4. And when Agrippa reached Puteoli, he wrote a letter to Tiberius Cæsar, who then lived at Caprææ,<sup>4</sup> and told him that he was come so far to wait on him and pay him a visit, and asked that he would give him leave to come over to Caprææ. And Tiberius made no difficulty, but wrote to him in an obliging way in other respects, and also told him he was glad of his safe return, and desired him to come to Caprææ; and when he was come he did not fail to welcome him and treat him as kindly as he had promised him in his letter to do. But the next day came a letter to the emperor from Herennius Capito, informing him, that Agrippa had borrowed 300,000 drachmæ, and not paid it at the time appointed; but, when it was demanded of him, had run away like a fugitive from the places in his jurisdiction, and had put it out of his power to get the money from him. When Tiberius had read this letter he was much vexed at it, and gave orders that Agrippa should be excluded from his presence until he had paid the debt. But he, being no way dismayed at the emperor's anger, entreated Antonia, the mother of Germanicus, and also of Claudius, who was afterwards emperor himself, to lend him those 300,000 drachmæ, that he might not lose Tiberius' friendship. And she, out of regard to the memory of Berenice his mother (for these two women had been very intimate with one another), and out of regard to his having been brought up with Claudius, lent him the money, and, upon the payment of his debt, his friendship with Tiberius continued as before. After this, Tiberius Cæsar recommended to him his grandson,<sup>1</sup> and ordered that he should always accompany him when he went out. But Agrippa, after the kind treatment of Antonia, paid great court to Caius, who was her grandson, and was held in very high honour because of the popularity of his father.<sup>2</sup> Now there was one Thallus, a freedman of Tiberius, a Samaritan by race, of whom Agrippa borrowed a million drachmæ, and so repaid Antonia the debt he owed her, and by spending the overplus in paying his court to Caius, he became a person of great influence with him.

§ 5. Now as the friendship which Agrippa had with Caius rose to a great height, they once had a conversation about Tiberius, as they were in a chariot together, Agrippa praying (for they two sat by themselves) that Tiberius might soon go off the stage, and leave the empire to Caius, who was in every respect more worthy of it. Now Euty-chus, who was Agrippa's freedman, and drove his chariot, heard these words, and at the time said nothing about them: but when Agrippa accused him of stealing some garments of his (which he really did steal) he ran away from him; and when he was captured and brought before Piso, who was governor of the city, and asked why he ran away? he replied, that he had something private to say to Tiberius, that regarded his security and safety: so Piso sent him in bonds to Capreae. [And Tiberius, according to his usual custom, kept him in bonds, being a procrastinator, if ever king or tyrant was so; for he did not receive ambassadors quickly, and no successors were despatched to governors or procurators of provinces that had been formerly sent, unless they were dead. This made him also negligent in hearing prisoners. And when he was once asked by his friends, what was the reason of his delay in such cases? he said, that he delayed to hear ambassadors, lest, upon their quick dismissal, other ambassadors should be appointed, and return to him; and so he should bring trouble upon himself by their receptions and dismissals. He said also that he permitted those governors who had been once sent to their governments to stay there a long time from regard to the subjects that were under them; for all governors were naturally disposed to get as much as they could, and those who were not to remain there, but to stay a short time only, and that in uncertainty when they would be turned out, were all the more tempted to fleece the people. Whereas, if their government was long continued to them, they were at last satiated with their spoil, as having got a great deal, and so became less keen in their pillaging; but if a rapid succession of governors took place, the poor subjects, who were exposed to them as a prey, would not be able to bear the new ones, for they would not have the same time allowed them, as their predecessors had filled themselves in, and so grown indifferent to getting more, because they would be recalled too soon for making a rich harvest otherwise. He gave them an illustration to show his meaning. A great number of flies swarmed about the sore places of a man that had been wounded; upon which one of the bystanders pitied the man's misfortune, and thinking he was not able to drive those flies away himself, was going to drive them away for him. But he prayed him to let them alone, and when the other asked him in rejoinder the reason of such indiscretion in not getting relief from his present misery, he replied, "If thou drivest these flies away, thou wilt hurt me worse. For as these are already full of my blood, they do not crowd about me, nor pain me so much as before, but are somewhat more remiss, while fresh ones that came almost famished, and found me quite tired out already, would be my destruction." Tiberius said this was why he was himself careful not to send new governors perpetually to his subjects (who were already sufficiently harassed by many oppressions), who, like these flies, would further distress them, and, besides their natural desire of gain, would have this additional incitement to it, that they expected to be soon deprived of the pleasure which they derived from it. And, as a further attestation to what I say of the character of Tiberius, I appeal to his practice itself; for, although he was emperor twenty-two years, he sent in all only two procurators to govern the nation of the Jews, namely Gratus, and his successor in the government, Pilate. Nor had he one way of acting with respect to the Jews, and another with respect to the rest of his subjects. He also gave out that he made such delay in hearing prisoners, because immediate death to those that were condemned to die would be an alleviation of their present miseries, whereas those wicked wretches did not deserve any such favour; but their being harassed by the anticipation of calamity would make them undergo greater misery.

§ 6. This was why Eutyclus could not obtain a hearing, but was kept still in bonds. However, some time afterwards, Tiberius went from Capreæ<sup>1</sup> to Tusculanum,<sup>2</sup> which is about a hundred furlongs from Rome, and Agrippa asked Antonia to procure a hearing for Eutyclus, let the matter whereof he accused him prove what it would. Now Antonia was greatly esteemed by Tiberius on all accounts, not only from her connexion with him (for she was his brother Drusus' wife), but also from her eminent chastity; for though she was still a young woman, she continued in her widowhood, and refused all other matches, although Augustus had enjoined her to marry somebody, and all her life long preserved her reputation free from reproach. She had also been privately

the greatest benefactress to Tiberius when there was a very dangerous plot laid against him by Sejanus, a man who had been her husband's friend, and who had the greatest power at that time because he was in command of the army, and when many members of the senate, and many of the freedmen joined with him, and the soldiers were tampered with, and the plot became very formidable, and Sejanus would certainly have gained his point, had not Antonia's boldness been more wisely conducted than Sejanus' villainy. For when she had discovered his designs against Tiberius, she wrote him an exact account of the whole, and gave the letter to Pallas, the most faithful of her slaves, and sent him to Capreæ to Tiberius; and Tiberius, when he heard of it, slew Sejanus and his fellow-conspirators, and though he had held Antonia in great esteem before, now looked upon her with still greater respect, and regarded her as trustworthy in all things. So, when Tiberius was desired by this Antonia to examine Eutyclus, he answered, "If indeed Eutyclus has falsely accused Agrippa in what he has said of him, he has had sufficient punishment by what I have done to him already; but if, upon examination, the accusation appears to be true, let Agrippa have a care, lest, in desire of punishing his freedman, he do not rather bring a punishment upon himself." Now when Antonia told Agrippa of this, he was still much more pressing that the matter might be examined into; so Antonia, upon Agrippa's continually importuning her to beg for this, seized the following opportunity. As Tiberius once reclined in his litter, and was being carried about in it, and Caius, her grandson, and Agrippa walked before him, after dinner, she went close to the litter, and begged Tiberius to call Eutyclus, and have him examined; to which he replied, "O Antonia! the gods are my witnesses, that I am induced to do what I am going to do, not by my own inclination, but because I am forced to it by thy entreaty." When he had said this, he ordered Macro, who had succeeded Sejanus, to bring Eutyclus to him; and he was brought without any delay. Then Tiberius asked him what he had to say against a man who had given him his liberty. Upon which he said, "O my lord! this Caius, and Agrippa with him, were once riding in a chariot, and I sat at their feet, and among other conversation that passed, Agrippa said to Caius, 'O that the day would come, when this old man would die, and appoint thee as master of the world! for Tiberius, his grandson, would be no hindrance to us, if taken off by thee, and the world would be happy, and I should be happy still more.'" Now Tiberius took these to be truly Agrippa's words, and having an old grudge also at Agrippa, because, when he had commanded him to pay court to Tiberius his grandson, and the son of Drusus, Agrippa had neglected him, and disobeyed his commands, and transferred all his homage to Caius, he said to Macro, "Bind this person." But Macro, not distinctly knowing whom it was he bade him bind, and not expecting that he would wish any such thing done to Agrippa, delayed until he should know more distinctly what Tiberius meant. But, when Tiberius had gone round the hippodrome, he found Agrippa standing there, and said "Why, Macro, here is the person I meant to have bound;" and when he still asked, "Which of them?" he said "Agrippa." Then Agrippa betook himself to making supplication for himself, reminding him of his son, with whom he was brought up, and of Tiberius [his grandson] whom he had educated: but all to no purpose, for they took him off bound in his purple robe. It was also very hot weather, and they had had but little wine to their meal, so that he was very thirsty; he was also distressed and vexed at this treatment. Seeing therefore one of Caius' slaves, whose name was Thaumastus, carrying some water in a vessel, he desired that he would let him drink. And as he readily gave him some water to drink, he drank, and said, "Boy! this service of thine to me will be for thy advantage; for, if I once get rid of these my bonds, I will soon procure thee thy freedom from Caius, seeing thou hast not been wanting to minister to me, though I am in bonds, in the same manner as when I was in my former state and dignity." Nor did he deceive him in what he promised him, but requited him for what he had done, for, when Agrippa afterwards came to be king, he took particular care of Thaumastus, and got him his liberty from Caius, and made him manager of his affairs, and when he died, left him to Agrippa his son, and to Berenice his daughter, to minister to them in the same capacity. Thaumastus also grew old in that honourable post, and died in it. But all this happened some time afterwards.

§ 7. Now Agrippa stood in his bonds before the royal palace, with many others who were in bonds also, and leaned against a certain tree in dejection, and as a certain bird sat upon the tree against which Agrippa leaned, (the Romans call this bird bubo,<sup>1</sup>) one of those that were bound, a German by nation, seeing the bird, asked a soldier who that man in purple was. And when he was informed that his name was Agrippa, and that he was by race a Jew, and one of the principal men of that nation, he asked leave of the soldier to whom he was bound,<sup>2</sup> to let him come nearer to him, to speak with him; for he had a mind to inquire of him about some things relating to his country. And when he had obtained leave, he stood near him, and spoke as follows to him by an interpreter. "This sudden change of thy condition, young man! troubles thee, as bringing on thee a manifold and very great adversity; nor wilt thou believe me, when I foretell how thou wilt get rid of this present misery, and how divine Providence will provide for thee. Know therefore (and I appeal to my own country's gods, as well as to the gods of this place, who have awarded these bonds to us,) that all I am going to say about thy concerns, shall neither be said to please thee by its babbling, nor in the endeavour to cheer thee without cause, for such predictions, when they come to fail, make the grief in the end more bitter than if one had never heard them at all. However, though I expose myself to danger by so doing, I think it fit to declare to thee the prediction of the gods. It cannot be that thou shalt continue long in these bonds, but thou wilt soon be delivered from them, and wilt be promoted to the highest dignity and power, and wilt be envied by all who now pity thy fortunes, and wilt be happy in thy death, and wilt leave happiness to thy children. But remember, whenever thou seest this bird again, thou wilt then live but five days longer. This event will be brought to pass by that God who has sent this bird here to be a sign unto thee. I think it wrong to conceal from thee what I foresee concerning thee, that by thy knowing beforehand what happiness is coming upon thee, thou mayest lightly regard thy present misfortunes. But when this happiness shall come to thee, do not forget what misery I am in myself, but endeavour to deliver me." When the German had said this, he made Agrippa laugh at him as much as he afterwards appeared worthy of admiration. But Antonia took Agrippa's misfortune to heart: however, to speak to Tiberius on his behalf, she saw to be a very difficult thing, and indeed quite impracticable; but she got leave of Macro, that the soldiers that guarded him should be of a gentle nature, and that the centurion who was over them, and was bound to him, should be of the same disposition, and that he might bathe every day, and that his freedmen and friends might have access to him, and that other things that tended to ease his body might be allowed him. So his friend Silas had access to him, and two of his freedmen, Marsyas and Stœcheus, brought him such kind of food as he was fond of, and indeed took great care of him; they also brought him garments, under pretence of selling them, and, when night came on, laid them under him, and the soldiers assisted them, as Macro had ordered beforehand. Such was Agrippa's condition for six months, and such was the state of his affairs.

§ 8. As for Tiberius, on his return to Capreæ, he fell ill. At first his illness was but mild, but as it increased upon him, he was anxious about his condition, and bade Euodus, who was the freedman whom he most of all valued, to bring the children to him; for he said he wanted to talk to them before he died. Now he had no longer any sons of his own alive; for Drusus, who was his only son, was dead; but Drusus' son Tiberius was still living, who was also called Gemellus. There was also living Caius, the son of Germanicus, who was the son of his brother [Drusus]. He was now grown up, and had finished his education, and was in esteem and favour with the people because of the excellent character of his father Germanicus, who had attained the highest honour among the multitude by his consistent behaviour, and the easiness and affability of his intercourse with the multitude, for the rank he had did not hinder his treating all persons as if they were his equals. In consequence of this behaviour he was not only greatly esteemed by the people and the senate, but also by every one of the nations that were subject to the Romans; some of whom were captivated, when they met him, with the grace of their reception by him, and others by the report of those who had met him. So upon his death there was a lamentation made by all men, not counterfeit sorrow such as is made in flattery to rulers, but real sorrow, for everybody grieved at his death, as if they had lost one that was near to them. So affable was he to all men, that it turned greatly to the advantage of his son among all; and the soldiers in particular were so devoted to him, that they reckoned it a gain, if need were, to die, if he might but become emperor.

§ 9. Now when Tiberius had given orders to Euodus to bring the children to him the next day in the morning, he prayed to his country's gods to show him a manifest sign which of the two should be his successor, being very desirous to leave it to his son's son, but still intending to depend more upon what God should foreshow concerning them, than upon his own opinion and inclination. So he made this to be the omen, that the empire should belong to him who should come first to him the next day. When he had thus resolved, he sent to his grandson's tutor, and ordered him to bring the child to him early in the morning, supposing that God would not interfere about who should be made emperor. But God thwarted his intention. For as Tiberius was thus contriving matters, directly it was day, he bade Euodus to call in the child which should be ready there first. And he went out, and found Caius before the door, (for Tiberius was not yet come, for his breakfast was late, and Euodus knew nothing of what his lord intended,) so he said to Caius, "Thy father calls thee," and brought him in. As soon as Tiberius saw Caius, he reflected then first on the power of God, and how the power of bestowing the empire on whom he would was entirely taken from him, and so he was not able to make good what he had intended. And he greatly lamented that the power of carrying out his intention was taken from him, and that his grandson Tiberius was not only to lose the Roman empire by his mode of divination, but his own safety also, because his preservation would now depend upon such as would be more powerful than himself, who would think it a thing insufferable that a kinsman should live with them, and so his relationship would not be able to protect him, but he would be feared and hated by him who had the supreme authority, partly on account of his being next to the empire, partly because he would be perpetually plotting, not only to preserve himself, but also to be at the head of affairs. Now Tiberius was very much given to the casting of nativities, and had spent his life more successfully in the science than those whose profession it was. For example, when he once saw Galba coming to him, he said to his most intimate friends, that there came a man that would one day have the rank of Roman emperor. And Tiberius was more addicted to all sorts of divinations than any other of the Roman emperors, because he had found them to reveal the truth about his own affairs. And indeed he was now in great distress at this chance that had befallen him, and was very much grieved about his grandson as if he were already murdered, and vexed with himself that he should have made use of such a method of divination, when it was in his power to have died without grief in ignorance of the future, whereas he must now die tormented by his foreknowledge of the misfortunes of such as were dearest to him. But although he was troubled at this unexpected succession to the empire of those for whom he did not intend it, he spoke as follows to Caius, though unwillingly and against his inclination: "O child! though Tiberius is nearer related to me than thou art, I, by my own determination and the vote of the gods, do give, and put into thy hand, the Roman empire. And I desire thee never to be unmindful when thou comest to it, either of my kindness to thee, in setting thee in so high a dignity, or of thy relationship to Tiberius; and as thou knowest that I am, together with and after the gods, the procurer of such great blessings to thee, so I desire that thou wilt make me a return for my readiness to assist thee, and wilt take care of Tiberius because of his near relationship to thee. Besides which, thou art to know, that, while Tiberius is alive, he will be a bulwark to thee, both as to the empire and as to thy own preservation ; but, if he die, that will be but a prelude to thy own misfortunes ; for to be alone under the weight of such vast affairs is very dangerous ; nor will the gods suffer those actions which are unjustly done, contrary to the law which directs men to act otherwise, to go unpunished." This was the speech which Tiberius made, which did not persuade Caius to act accordingly, although he promised to do so, for when he was settled in the empire, he took off this Tiberius, as was predicted by his grandfather, as he was also himself, no long time afterwards, slain by a conspiracy formed against him.

§ 10. After Tiberius had at this time appointed Caius to be his successor, he lived only a few days, and then died, after he had been emperor twenty-two years, five months, and three days. Now Caius was the fourth emperor. And when the Romans heard that Tiberius was dead, they rejoiced at the good news, but had not courage to believe it, not because they were unwilling it should be true, for they would have given large sums of money that it might prove to be so, but because they were afraid, if they showed their joy prematurely, and the news proved false, they would be accused and ruined. [For this Tiberius had brought a vast load of misery on the patrician families of the Romans, for he was easily inflamed with passion in all cases, and was of such a temper as rendered his anger uncontrollable till he had wreaked it, even though he hated anyone without reason, for he was by nature fierce in all the sentences he gave, and made death the penalty for the slightest offences.] And so, though the Romans heard the rumour about his death gladly, they were restrained from the full enjoyment of that pleasure by the dread of such miseries as they foresaw would follow, if their hopes proved ill grounded. Now as soon as Marsyas, Agrippa's freedman, heard of Tiberius' death, he came running to tell Agrippa the news ; and finding him going out to the bath, he gave him a nod, and said in the Hebrew tongue, "The lion is dead."<sup>1</sup> And he, understanding his meaning, and being delighted at the news, said, "All thanks and happiness attend thee for this news of thine: I only hope that what thou sayest may prove true." Now the centurion, who was set to guard Agrippa, when he saw with what haste Marsyas came, and what joy Agrippa had at what he said, suspected that his words announced something startling, and asked them about the subject of their conversation. They at first turned the subject, but, upon his further pressing, Agrippa, without more ado, told him (for he was already his friend), and he joined with him in the pleasure which this news occasioned, because it would be fortunate to Agrippa, and made him a supper. But, as they were feasting and drinking merrily, there came one who said, that Tiberius was still alive, and would return to the city in a few days. At this news the centurion was exceedingly troubled, because he had done what might cost him his life, in feasting so jovially a prisoner, and that upon the news of the death of the emperor; so he thrust Agrippa from the couch whereon he reclined, and said, "Dost thou think to cheat me by a lie about the emperor without punishment? and shalt not thou pay for this report at the price of thine head?" When he had so said, he ordered Agrippa to be bound again, (for he had loosed him before,) and kept a severer guard over him than formerly. In that evil condition was Agrippa that night; but the next day the rumour increased in the city, and confirmed the news that Tiberius was certainly dead, insomuch that men durst now openly and freely talk about it; nay, some offered sacrifices on that account. Several letters also came from Caius, one of them to the senate, informing them of the death of Tiberius, and of his own succession to the empire, another to Piso, the governor of the city, which announced the same thing. Caius also gave orders that Agrippa should be removed out of the camp, and go to the house where he lived before he was put in prison; so that he was now out of fear as to his own affairs; for, although he was still in custody, yet he had considerable freedom. And as soon as Caius was come to Rome, and had brought Tiberius' body with him, and had made a sumptuous funeral for him, according to the laws of his country, he was much disposed to set Agrippa at liberty that very day, but Antonia hindered him, not out of any ill-will to the prisoner, but from regard to decency in Caius, lest it should make men believe that he heard of the death of Tiberius with pleasure, if he set free so soon one whom Tiberius had put in bonds. However, not many days elapsed before Caius sent for Agrippa to his house, and had him shaved, and made him change his raiment, after which he put a diadem upon his head, and appointed him king of the tetrarchy of Philip. He also gave him the tetrarchy of Lysanias,<sup>1</sup> and changed his iron chain for a golden one of equal weight. He also sent out Marullus to be master of the horse in Judæa.

§ 11. Now, in the second year of the reign of Caius Cæsar, Agrippa asked for leave to sail home, and settle affairs in his kingdom, and promised to return again when he had put everything in order, as it ought to be put. And, upon the emperor's permission, he returned to his own country, and appeared before all men unexpectedly as king, and thereby demonstrated to those that saw him the power of fortune, when they compared his former poverty with his present prosperity. And some called him a happy man, because he had not been foiled of his hopes, others could scarce believe what had happened.

How Herod the Tetrarch was exiled to Lugdunum.

§ 1.

BUT Herodias, Agrippa's sister, who was wife of that Herod who was tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa, was envious of this authority of her brother, particularly as she saw that he had far greater dignity bestowed on him than her husband had, though, when he ran away, he was not able to pay his debts, but now he was come back, he had great position and prosperity. She was therefore grieved, and much displeased at so great a change, and especially when she saw him walking about among the multitude with the usual marks of royal authority, and was not able to conceal how miserable she was from her envy, but she incited her husband, and begged him to sail to Rome, to court honours equal to Agrippa's: for she said life was unbearable for them, if Agrippa (the son of that Aristobulus who was condemned to death by his father), who came to her husband in such extreme poverty, that all the necessaries of life had to be supplied him day by day, and had fled away from his creditors by sea, now returned a king, while he himself, the son of a king, whom his near relationship to royalty called upon to claim the same dignity, sat still, and was contented with a private life. "And if," she continued, "before, Herod, you did not mind being in a lower condition than your father, who begot you, had, yet now at any rate seek after a similar dignity; and do not bear this come down that a man who has paid court to your riches should be in greater honour than yourself, nor suffer his poverty to show itself able to purchase greater things than our abundance; nor esteem it other than a shameful thing to be inferior to one, who, the other day, lived upon your charity. But let us go to Rome, and let us spare no pains or expenditure of silver or gold, since they cannot be kept for any better use than for procuring a kingdom."

§ 2. As for Herod, he opposed her request for a time, from his love of ease, and a suspicion that he would have trouble at Rome, and he tried to instruct her better. But the more she saw him draw back, the more she pressed him to it, and desired him to leave no stone unturned to be king: and at last she left not off till she engaged him, whether he would or not, to be of her sentiments, because he could no otherwise avoid her importunity. So he got all things ready, in as sumptuous a manner as he was able, and spared for nothing, and went up to Rome, and took Herodias with him. And Agrippa, when he heard of their intention and preparations, also made his preparations. And as soon as he heard they had set sail, he sent Fortunatus, one of his freedmen, to Rome, to carry presents to the emperor, and letters against Herod, and to speak to Caius himself, if he should have an opportunity. This man followed Herod so quick, and had so prosperous a voyage, and came so little time after Herod, that while Herod was with Caius, he also arrived, and delivered his letters; for they both sailed to Dicæarchia,<sup>1</sup> and found Caius at Baiæ,<sup>2</sup> which is itself a little town in Campania, about five furlongs from Dicæarchia. There are in that place royal palaces with sumptuous apartments, each emperor still endeavouring to outdo his predecessor's magnificence; the place also has warm baths that spring out of the ground of their own accord, which are of advantage for the recovery of the health of those that make use of them, and also minister to men's luxury. Now Caius simultaneously addressed Herod (it was the first time he had met with him) and looked at the letters which Agrippa had sent him, and which were written in accusation of Herod, wherein he was accused of having been in conspiracy with Sejanus against Tiberius' government, and of being now confederate with Artabanus, the king of Parthia, in opposition to the government of Caius, as a proof of which Agrippa said that Herod had armour sufficient for seventy thousand men ready in his armoury. Caius was moved at this information, and asked Herod, whether what was said about the armour was true. And when he admitted there was such armour there (for he could not deny it, the truth of it being too notorious), Caius took that as a sufficient proof of the accusation that he intended to revolt. So he took away from him his tetrarchy, and gave it by way of addition to Agrippa's kingdom; he also gave Herod's money to Agrippa, and punished Herod by perpetual exile, and appointed Lugdunum,<sup>3</sup> a city of Gaul, to be his place of habitation. But when he was informed that Herodias was Agrippa's sister, he made her a present of the money that was her own, and told her, that it was only her brother who prevented her sharing the calamity of her husband. But she replied, "You, indeed, O emperor! say this in a magnificent manner, and as becomes you, but the love which I have for my husband hinders me from partaking of the favour of your gift; for it is not right that I, who have been a partner in his prosperity, should forsake him in his misfortunes." Thereupon Caius was angry at her pride, and sent her into exile with Herod, and gave her estate to Agrippa. And thus did God punish Herodias for her envy of her brother, and Herod for giving ear to the vain discourses of a woman. Now Caius administered public affairs with great magnanimity during the first and second year of his reign, and behaved himself with such moderation, that he gained the good-will of the Romans themselves, and of his other subjects. But, in process of time, he thought himself because of the vast extent of his dominions as something more than a man, and made himself a god, and took upon himself to act in all things so as to insult the Deity.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning the Embassy of the Jews to Caius, and how Caius sent Petronius into Syria to make War against the Jews, unless they would receive his Statue.

§ 1.

NOW a tumult having arisen at Alexandria between the Jewish inhabitants and the Greeks, three ambassadors were chosen out of each party that were at variance, who came to Caius. Now one of these ambassadors from the people of Alexandria was Apion, who greatly slandered the Jews, and, among other things that he said, charged them with neglecting the honours that belonged to the emperor; for while all who were subject to the Roman empire built altars and temples to Caius, and in all other respects treated him as one of the gods, these Jews alone thought it unseemly to erect statues in honour of him, or to swear by his name. When Apion had said many of these severe things, by which he hoped to exasperate Caius against the Jews, as was likely to be the case, Philo, the principal person of the Jewish embassy, a man eminent on all accounts, and the brother of Alexander the Alabarch,<sup>1</sup> and not unskilled in philosophy, was ready to betake himself to make his defence against those accusations. But Caius prohibited him, and bade him be gone, and was also in such a rage, that it was clear he was about to do them some very great mischief. And Philo having been thus ill treated went out, and said to those Jews who were about him, that they ought to be of good courage, for Caius' words indeed showed anger at them, but in reality he had already set God against him as an enemy.

§ 2. Then Caius, indignant that he should be thus despised by the Jews only, sent Petronius as his lieutenant to Syria, and as successor in the government to Vitellius, and gave him orders to invade Judæa with a large force, and, if they would admit his statue willingly, to erect it in the temple of God, but, if they were obstinate, to conquer them by war, and then to do it. Accordingly, Petronius took over the government of Syria, and made haste to obey Caius' injunctions. He got together as great a number of auxiliaries as he possibly could, and took with him two legions of the Roman army, and went to Ptolemais<sup>2</sup> to winter there, intending to set about the war in the spring. He also wrote word to Caius what he had determined to do, and he commended him for his energy, and ordered him not to be slack in the work, but to make war with them, if they would not obey his commands. Then many ten thousands of the Jews went to Ptolemais to Petronius, to offer their petitions to him, that he would not compel them to transgress and violate the law of their forefathers. "But if (said they) you are absolutely determined to bring this statue and erect it, first kill us, and then do what you have resolved on; for while we are alive, we cannot permit such things to be done as are forbidden us by the authority of our legislator and our forefathers, who have decided that such prohibitions are proofs of virtue." But Petronius was angry with them, and said, <sup>1</sup> This Alexander the Alabarch, or governor of the Jews at Alexandria, and brother of Philo, is supposed by Bishop Pearson to be the same as that Alexander who is mentioned by St. Luke, as of the kindred of the high priests, Acts iv. 6.—W.

“ If I were myself emperor, and meant to follow my own will in acting thus, these words of yours would be properly spoken to me, but now the emperor has sent me, I am under the necessity of carrying out his decrees, because disobedience to them would bring upon me inevitable destruction.” Then the Jews replied, “ Since, therefore, you are so disposed, O Petronius, that you will not disobey Caius’ commands, neither will we transgress the bidding of our law; and as we, relying on God and virtue, and the efforts of our ancestors, have continued hitherto without suffering them to be transgressed, we dare not by any means suffer ourselves to be so timorous as to transgress those laws, which God has ordered for our advantage, from the fear of death. And if we fall into misfortunes, we will bear them in order to preserve our laws, knowing that those who expose themselves to dangers have good hope of escaping them, because God will stand on our side, if, out of regard to him, we undergo afflictions, and sustain the uncertainties of fortune. But, if we should submit to you, we should be greatly reproached for our cowardice, as thereby showing ourselves ready to transgress our law; and we should incur the great anger of God also, who, even in your own judgment, is superior to Caius.”

§ 3. When Petronius saw by their words that their determination was fixed, and that he would not be able without a war to obey Caius in the dedication of his statue, and that there would be a great deal of bloodshed, he took his friends and retinue, and pushed on to Tiberias, wishing to know in what posture the affairs of the Jews were. And many ten thousand of the Jews met Petronius again, when he was come to Tiberias, for they thought they would run a mighty hazard if they should have war with the Romans, but judged that the transgression of the law was of much greater consequence, and made supplication to him, that he would by no means reduce them to such straits, nor defile their city with the erection of Caius’ statue. Then Petronius said to them, “ Will you war then with the emperor, without considering his great preparations for war, and your own weakness?” And they replied, “ We will not by any means war with him, but we will die before we see our laws transgressed.” Then they threw themselves down upon their faces, and stretched out their throats, and said they were ready to be slain. And this they did for forty days together, and in the meantime left off the tilling of their ground, though the season of the year required them to sow it. Thus firm did they continue in their resolution, and proposal to die willingly, rather than to see the erection of Caius' statue.

§ 4. When matters were in this state, Aristobulus, king Agrippa's brother, and Helcias the Great, and the other principal men of that family, and the leading Jews with them, went in unto Petronius, and besought him, since he saw the determination of the multitude, not to drive them to despair, but write to Caius, that the Jews had an insuperable aversion to the reception of his statue, and how they assumed a hostile attitude, and left off the tillage of their ground: and that they were not willing to go to war with him, because they were not able to do it, but were ready to die with pleasure, rather than suffer their laws to be transgressed: and how, if the land continued unsown, robberies would be on the increase, from their inability of paying tribute. They added that perhaps Caius would be thereby moved to pity, and not entertain any savage idea, or think of destroying the nation, but if he continued inflexible in his former opinion to war against them, he might then set about it himself. Thus did Aristobulus, and the rest with him, supplicate Petronius. And Petronius,<sup>1</sup> partly on account of the earnest entreaties of Aristobulus and the rest, and because of the great importance of what they asked, and the skilful way in which they made their supplication; partly because he saw the firmness of the opposition made by the Jews, and thought it monstrous for him so to carry out the madness of Caius, as to slay so many ten thousand men, only because of their religious disposition towards God, and to pass all his life after that in remorse; Petronius, I say, thought it much better to write to Caius, although he knew what intolerable rage he would be in against him for not obeying sooner his commands. But perhaps he thought he might persuade him, or if this mad resolution continued, he might then begin the war against them; nay, even if Caius should turn his anger against him (Petronius), it was good for persons who laid claim to virtue even to die for such vast multitudes of men. So he determined to hearken to the petitioners in this matter.

§ 5. He then called the Jews together to Tiberias (who came many ten thousands in number), and went up to them, and pointed out that the present expedition was not undertaken at his own option, but at the commands of the emperor, whose wrath would immediately and without delay be executed on such as had the temerity to disobey what he had commanded; nor was it fit for him, who had obtained such great honour by his favour, to contradict him in any thing. "Yet," added he, "I do not think it just to have such a regard to my own safety and honour, as to refuse to sacrifice them for your preservation, as you are so many in number, and endeavour to preserve the respect due to your law (which because it has come down to you from your forefathers, you esteem worth fighting for) and to the supreme authority and power of God, whose temple I will not venture to allow to fall into contempt by the imperial authority. I will, therefore, send to Caius, and let him know what your determination is, and will assist your suit as far as I am able, that you may not suffer on account of the virtuous designs you have proposed to yourselves. And may God be your helper (for his authority is beyond all the contrivance and power of men), and may he procure you the preservation of your ancient laws, and not be deprived, by the unreasonable wishes of men, of his accustomed honours! But if Caius be irritated, and turn the violence of his rage upon me, I will rather undergo all the danger and affliction that may come either upon my body or soul, than see so many of you perish, while you are acting in so excellent a manner. Do you, therefore, every one of you, go your ways about your own occupations, and fall to the cultivation of your land. I will myself send to Rome, and will not refuse to serve you in all things, either by myself or by my friends."

§ 6. When Petronius had said this, and had dismissed the assembly of the Jews, he desired those in authority to see to the cultivation of the fields, and to encourage the people to hope for better things. Thus did he soon make the multitude cheerful again. And now did God show his presence to Petronius, and signify to him, that he would afford him his assistance in his whole design; for he had no sooner finished the speech that he made to the Jews, but God sent down at once great showers of rain, contrary to human expectation, for the day was a clear day in the morning, and gave no indication by the appearance of the sky of any rain; nay, the whole year had been subject to a great drought, and made men despair of any rain from above, even if at any time they saw the heavens overcast with clouds; so that when such a great quantity of rain fell then, and that in an unusual manner, and without any expectation of it, the Jews hoped that Petronius would not fail in his supplication for them. And as to Petronius, he was amazed, evidently seeing that God took care of the Jews, and gave very plain signs of his appearance, so that those that were actually much inclined to a contrary opinion were unable to contradict it. This also among other particulars he wrote to Caius, all tending to dissuade him from his purpose, and entreating him by all means not to drive so many ten thousands of these men mad, whom if he should slay (for without war they would by no means suffer the laws of their worship to be set aside,) he would lose the revenue they paid him, and would be publicly cursed by them through all future ages. He added that God, who was their protector, had shown his power most clearly, and that such a power as left no room for doubt about it. Such was the business that Petronius was now engaged in.

§ 7. Now king Agrippa, who at this time chanced to be living at Rome, grew more and more in favour with Caius; and when he had once made him a feast, and was careful to exceed all others, both in the expense of the feast, and in such preparations as might contribute to his pleasure, which were not only far out of the means of all others, but such as Caius himself could never equal, much less exceed (such care did Agrippa take to exceed all men, and particularly to do all he could to please the emperor), Caius admired his generous disposition and magnificence, that he should strive to do every thing to please him even beyond his means, and wished to imitate the generosity which Agrippa exhibited in order to please him. So Caius, when he had drunk wine plentifully, and was merrier than usual, said during the feast, when Agrippa urged him to drink, "I knew before now what great regard you had for me, and what great kindness you showed me, though with risk to yourself from Tiberius, nor have you omitted anything to show your good-will towards me, even beyond your means. So, as it would be a base thing for me to come short of you in affection, I am desirous to make you amends for every thing in which I have been formerly deficient. For all that I have bestowed on you, that may be called my gifts, is but little; every thing therefore that may contribute to your happiness shall be at your service, and that gladly, and as far as my power will reach." And this Caius said to Agrippa, thinking he would ask for some province or the revenues of certain cities. But, although he had made up his mind beforehand what he would ask, yet did he not discover his intentions, but made answer to Caius immediately, that it was not out of any expectation of gain that he formerly paid court to him, contrary to the commands of Tiberius, nor did he now do any thing to please him with an eye to his own advantage, and in order to receive any thing from him: for the gifts he had already bestowed upon him were great, and beyond the hopes of even a grasping man; for, although they might be beneath the emperor's power, they were greater than the expectation and merit of the receiver. [And, as Caius was amazed at Agrippa's virtue, and pressed him still more to make his request for something which he might gratify him with, Agrippa replied, "Since, my lord! you declare, such is your liberality, that I am worthy of your gifts, I will ask nothing that will contribute to my own happiness, for what you have already bestowed on me has made me remarkable for that; but I ask something which may make you glorious for piety, and render the Deity a helper of your designs, and may be an honour to me among those that hear of it, as showing that I never fail to obtain what I ask of you. Now my petition is this, that you will no longer think of the dedication of the statue which you have ordered Petronius to set up in the Jewish temple.”]

§ 8. Thus did Agrippa venture to cast the die upon this occasion, so important was the matter in his opinion, though he knew how dangerous a thing it was so to speak ; for, had not Caius approved of his request, it would have tended to no less than the loss of his life. But Caius, who was mightily taken with Agrippa’s obliging behaviour, and also thought it unseemly to break his word before so many witnesses, as he had with such eagerness forced Agrippa to become a petitioner, and thought it would look as if he soon repented of his offer, and because he greatly admired Agrippa’s virtue, in not desiring him at all to augment his own dominions, either with large revenues, or greater authority, but in thinking of the public tranquillity, of the laws, and of the Deity, granted him what he requested, and wrote as follows to Petronius, commending him for mustering his army, and consulting him about this affair. “ If (he said,) thou hast already erected my statue, let it continue up ; but, if thou hast not yet done so, do not trouble thyself further about it, but dismiss thy army, and go to the business which I sent thee about first, for I have now no occasion for the erection of the statue. I have granted this as a favour to Agrippa, a man whom I honour so very greatly, that I am not able to refuse him what he would have, or what he has desired me to do for him.” Now Caius wrote this to Petronius, before he received his letter, informing him that the Jews were ripe for revolt about the statue, and that they seemed absolutely resolved to threaten war against the Romans. Upon receipt of this letter Caius was much displeased that any attempt should be made against his supreme authority, being as he was a slave to base and vicious actions on all occasions, and paying no regard to what was virtuous and honourable, and if he resolved to show his anger against any one for any reason whatever, suffering not himself to be restrained by any advice, but thinking the indulging his anger a real pleasure. So he wrote as follows to Petronius. “ Seeing thou esteemest the presents made thee by the Jews to be of greater value than my commands, and art grown insolent enough to be subservient to their pleasure, I charge thee to become thy own judge, and to consider what thou art to do, now thou art under my displeasure; for I will make thee an example to the present and to all future ages, that none may dare to contradict the commands of their emperor."

§ 9. This was the letter which Caius wrote to Petronius, but Petronius did not receive it while Caius was alive; the ship which carried it sailing so slow, that other letters came to Petronius before it, by which he learned that Caius was dead. For God would not forget the dangers Petronius had undertaken to gratify the Jews, and to do him honour, but when he had taken Caius off in indignation at his so insolently attempting to claim for himself divine worship, he discharged his debt to Petronius. And Rome and all the empire co-operated with Petronius, especially those of the senators that were of most merit, because Caius had been unmercifully severe to them. For Caius died not long after he had written to Petronius the letter which threatened him with death; but as to the cause of his death, and the nature of the plot against him, I shall relate them in the progress of my narrative. Now the letter which informed Petronius of Caius's death came first, and a little afterwards came that which commanded him to kill himself with his own hands. And Petronius rejoiced at this circumstance of the death of Caius, and at the same time marvelled at the providence of God, who without the least delay, and immediately, gave him a reward for the regard he had had to the temple, and for the assistance he had afforded the Jews. Thus easily and unexpectedly did Petronius escape the danger of death.

CHAP. IX.

What befell the Jews that were in Babylon, because of two Brothers, Asinæus and Anilæus.

§ 1.

A DREADFUL calamity now befell the Jews that were in Mesopotamia, and especially those that dwelt in Babylonia. It was inferior to none, and accompanied by great slaughter of them, and that greater than any recorded before; concerning all which I shall speak explicitly, and set forth the causes of their calamity. There was a city in Babylonia called Naarda,<sup>1</sup> not only a populous one, but one that had a fertile and large territory round it, and, besides its other advantages, was full of men also. It was also not easy to be assaulted by enemies, because the river Euphrates encompassed it all round, and because it had strong walls. There was also the city Nisibis,<sup>2</sup> situate on the same current of the river. So the Jews, depending on the natural strength of these places, deposited in them that half shekel<sup>3</sup> which every one, by the custom of our country, offers to God, as well as they did other things devoted to him, for they made use of these cities as a treasury, whence, at the proper time, they were transmitted to Jerusalem; and many ten thousand men undertook to carry those donations, from fear of the ravages of the Parthians, to whom Babylonia was then subject. Now, there were two brothers, Asinæus, and Anilæus, natives of the city of Naarda, who had lost their father, and their mother put them to learn the art of weaving, it not being esteemed a disgrace among those people for men to spin wool. Now, he that taught them that art, and was set over them, complained that they came too late to their work, and punished them with stripes: and they took this punishment as an outrage, and carried off all the weapons which were kept in that house, which were not a few, and went into a certain place where was a partition of the rivers, a place naturally very fit for the feeding of cattle, and for getting hay to be stored up for the winter. The poorest sort of the young men also resorted to them, whom they armed with the weapons they had got, and became their captains, and nothing hindered them from being their leaders in mischief. And they soon became invincible, and built a citadel, and sent to such as fed cattle, and ordered them to pay so much tribute out of them as might be sufficient for their maintenance, and stated that they would be their friends if they would submit to them, and that they would defend them from all their enemies on every side, but that they would kill all the cattle of those that refused to obey them. So they hearkened to their proposals (for they could do nothing else), and sent them as many sheep as were required of them, so that their forces grew greater, and they became lords over all they pleased, because they made sudden and unexpected raids, so that everybody who had to do with them chose to pay them court, and they became formidable to such as came to assault them, till the report about them came to the ears of the king of Parthia himself.

§ 2. Now when the satrap of Babylonia heard of this, desiring to nip them in the bud, before greater mischief should arise from them, he got together as great an army as he could, both of Parthians and Babylonians, and marched against them, thinking to attack them and destroy them, before any one should carry them the news that he had got an army together. He then encamped in the marshes, and lay still, but on the next day, (which was the Sabbath, which is among the Jews a day of rest from all work,) supposing that the enemy would not dare to fight him thereon, but that he could take and carry them off prisoners without fighting, he advanced stealthily, and thought to take them by surprise. Now Asinæus was sitting with the rest, and their weapons lay beside them, and he said, "Men, I hear a neighing of horses, not of such as are feeding, but such as have riders on their backs, for I also hear the noise of their bridles, and am afraid that some enemies are stealing upon us to surround us. However, let somebody go and reconnoitre, and make a sure report of the present state of things; and may what I have said prove a false alarm!" And when he had said this, some of them went to spy out what was the matter, and soon came back and said to him, "Neither were you mistaken in telling us what our enemies were doing, nor will they permit us to do harm to people any longer. We are caught by their stratagem, like brute beasts, for there is a large body of cavalry marching upon us, while we are destitute of hands to defend ourselves with, because we are restrained from doing so by the prohibition of our law, which obliges us to rest [on this day.]" But Asinæus did not by any means agree with the opinion of his spy as to what was to be done, but thought it more agreeable to the law to pluck up their spirits in this emergency, and break their law by avenging themselves, even if they should die in the action, than by doing nothing to please their enemies by submitting to be slain by them. Accordingly, he took up his weapons, and infused courage in those that were with him to act as bravely as himself. So they engaged with their enemies, and slew a great many of them, (because they despised them, and came as to a certain victory,) and put the rest to flight.

§ 3. Now when the news of this fight came to the king of Parthia, he was surprised at the boldness of these brothers, and was desirous to see them, and speak with them. He therefore sent the most trusty of all his body-guards to say to them, "King Artabanus, although he has been wronged by you, as you have invaded his kingdom, yet has more regard to your courageous behaviour than to the anger he bears to you, and has sent me to offer you his right hand and friendship, and he permits you to come to him safely and without any injury on the road, and he wants you to address yourselves to him as friends, and means no guile or deceit to you. He also promises to make you presents, and so to honour you as by his power to augment your present fame." But Asinæus himself put off his journey there, but sent his brother Anilæus with all such presents as he could procure. So he went, and was admitted to the king's presence; and when Artabanus saw Anilæus coming alone, he inquired why Asinæus had not come with him. And when he learnt that he was afraid, and stayed in the marshes, he took an oath by the gods of his country, that he would do them no harm, if they came to him upon the assurances he gave them, and offered Anilæus his right hand, which is the greatest pledge of security with all those barbarians to those who converse with them; for none of them will deceive you, when once they have given you their right hands, nor will any one doubt of their fidelity, when that is once given, even though they were before suspected of an intention to harm you. When Artabanus had done this, he sent away Anilæus to try to persuade his brother to come to him. Now the king acted in this way, because he wanted by the courage of these Jewish brothers to curb his own satrapies, lest they should violate their friendship with him, for they were ripe for revolt, and disposed to rebel, and he was about to make an expedition against them. He was also afraid that, while he was engaged in a war in order to subdue those satrapies that revolted, the party of Asinæus and the Babylonians would be augmented, and either make war upon him when they should hear of their revolt, or, if they should be disappointed in that, would not fail of doing him very much harm.

§ 4. With these intentions the king sent away Anilæus, and Anilæus prevailed on his brother [to go to the king,] when he had related to him the king's good-will, and the oath that he had taken; accordingly, they made haste to go to Artabanus. And he received them, when they were come, with pleasure, and marvelled at Asinæus' courage in the actions he had done, and that because he was a little man to look at, and at first sight appeared contemptible also to such as met him, so that they might deem him of no value at all, and he said to his friends that, upon both being compared together, Asinæus showed his soul to be superior to his body. And, as they were once drinking together, he showed Asinæus to Abdagases, one of the generals of his army, and told him his name, and described the great courage he had exhibited in war. And when Abdagases desired leave to kill him, and so to inflict punishment on him for the injuries he had done to the Parthian kingdom, the king replied, "I will never give leave to kill a man who has trusted in my good faith, especially after I have sent him the offer of my right hand, and endeavoured to gain his confidence by oaths by the gods. But if you are a good warrior, you stand not in need of my perjury to avenge the outraged Parthian kingdom. Attack this man, when he is gone home, and conquer him by the forces that are under your command, without my privity." And the king sent for Asinæus early in the morning, and said to him, "It is time for you, young man! to return home, and not to provoke the indignation of my generals here any more, lest they attempt to murder you, and that without my approbation. I commit to you the country of Babylonia in trust, that it may, by your care, be preserved free from robbers, and from other mischief. I have kept my faith inviolable to you, and that not in trifling matters, but in such as concerned your safety, and I therefore deserve your kindness in return." When he had said this, and given Asinæus some presents, he sent him away immediately. And he, when he was come home, built fortresses, and made those that were previously built stronger, and became great in a little time, and managed affairs with such courage and success, as no other person, that had had no higher a beginning, ever did before him. Those Parthian governors also, who were sent that way, paid him great respect; for the honour that was paid him by the Babylonians seemed too small, and beneath his deserts, although he was in no small dignity and power there: nay, indeed, all the affairs of Mesopotamia depended on him, and he flourished more and more in this happy condition for fifteen years.

§ 5. But as the two brothers were in so flourishing a condition, the beginning of calamity came upon them for the following reason, after they had deviated from that course of virtue whereby they had gained so great power, and affronted and transgressed the laws of their forefathers, and fallen under the dominion of their lusts and pleasures. A certain Parthian, who came as general of an army into those parts, was accompanied by his wife, who had a great reputation for other accomplishments, and was particularly admired above all other women for her great beauty; and Anilæus, the brother of Asinæus, either heard of her beauty from others, or perhaps saw her himself also, and so at once became her lover and her enemy; partly because he could not hope to enjoy her but by obtaining power over her as his captive, partly because he thought he could not conquer his passion for her. As soon therefore as her husband had been declared an enemy of theirs, and had fallen in a battle forced on him, the widow of the deceased was captured and married to her lover. However, she did not come into their house without causing great misfortune not only to Anilæus himself, but also to Asinæus, for she brought great mischief upon them both from the following cause. When she was led away captive, upon the death of her husband, she concealed the images of those gods which were her and her husband's national gods, for it is the custom in that country for all to keep the idols they worship in their own houses, and to carry them along with them when they go into a foreign land, according to which custom of theirs she carried her idols with her. And at first she performed her worship of them privately, but when she became Anilæus' wife, she worshipped them in her accustomed manner, and with the same ceremonies which she used in her former husband's life. Thereupon their most esteemed friends first blamed him for not acting after the manner of the Hebrews, and for doing what was not agreeable to their laws, in marrying a foreign wife, and one that neglected the observance of their sacrifices and religious ceremonies; and bade him look to it, lest by conceding too much to the pleasures of the body, he might lose his position and the power which, by God's blessing, he had arrived at. But, as they prevailed not with him at all, he slew one of them, who was most highly esteemed, because of the liberty he took with him; and he, as he was dying from regard to the laws, imprecated curses upon his murderer Anilæus, and upon Asinæus also, and prayed that all their companions might come to a like end from their enemies; the two first as the principal actors in this lawlessness, and the rest because they would not assist him when he suffered in defending their laws. Now these latter were sorely grieved, yet did they tolerate these doings, because they remembered that they had arrived at their present happy state by no other means than the bravery of the two brothers. But when they also heard of the worship of those gods whom the Parthians honour, they thought the outrage that Anilæus offered to their laws could be borne no longer; so a great number of them came to Asinæus, and loudly complained of Anilæus, and told him, if he had not previously noticed what was advantageous to them, that now it was high time anyhow to correct what had been done amiss, before the crime that had been committed proved the ruin of himself and all the rest of them. They added that the marriage of this woman took place without their consent, and without regard to their laws; and that the worship which she paid to her gods was an outrage to the God whom they worshipped. Now, Asinæus knew that his brother's offence had been already the cause of great mischiefs, and would continue to be so, but he tolerated it because of the good-will he had to so near a relative, and made allowance for him, considering that his brother was quite overcome by his wicked passion which mastered him. But as more and more came to him every day, and the clamours became greater, he at last spoke to Anilæus about the matter, reproving him for his former actions, and desiring him for the future to leave them off, and send the woman back to her relations. But nothing was gained by these reproofs. And as the woman perceived what a tumult was made among the people on her account, and was afraid for Anilæus, lest he should come to any harm for his love to her, she put poison into Asinæus' food, and so took him off, and was now free from fear, as her lover was now sole judge of what should be done about her.

§ 6. When Anilæus had thus got all the power himself alone, he led out his army against the villages of Mithridates, who was a leading man in Parthia, and had married king Artabanus' daughter, and plundered them. So he got much money, and many slaves, and much cattle, and many other things, which, when gained, make men's condition happy. Now, when Mithridates, who was in that region at the time, heard that his villages were taken, he was very enraged that Anilæus had begun to injure him, and to affront him in his present dignity, though he had not offered any injury to him previously; so he got together the largest body of cavalry he was able, and picked out of that number those who were in their prime, and went to fight Anilæus. And when he was arrived at a certain village of his own, he rested there, intending to fight Anilæus on the day following, because it was the sabbath, the day on which the Jews rest. And when Anilæus was informed of this by a Syrian stranger from another village, who not only gave him an exact account of other circumstances, but told him where Mithridates would feast, he took his supper betimes, and marched by night, intending to fall upon the Parthians while they were ignorant of what he was going to do; and fell upon them about the fourth watch of the night, and slew some of them while they were asleep, and put others to flight, and took Mithridates alive, and set him naked upon an ass, which is esteemed the greatest reproach possible among the Parthians. And when he had brought Mithridates into a wood in such guise,<sup>1</sup> and his friends desired him to kill him, he soon told them his own mind to the contrary; for he said it was not well to kill a man who was one of the principal families among the Parthians, and still more honoured by contracting a royal marriage; that so far as they had hitherto gone was tolerable; for although they had insulted Mithridates, yet if they preserved his life, this benefit would be remembered by him to the advantage of those that had conferred it on him; but if he were once put to death, the king would not rest till he had made a great slaughter of the Jews that dwelt at Babylon, whose safety they ought to regard, both on account of their relationship to them, and because, if any misfortune befell them, they had no other place to retire to, since the king had got the flower of their youth. By this suggestion and speech of his made in council he persuaded them, so Mithridates was let go. But when he returned home, his wife reproached him, that, although he was son-in-law to the king, he neglected to avenge himself on those who had insulted him, and took no heed of it, but was contented to have been made captive by the Jews, and to have escaped them. And she bade him either go back like a man of courage, or else she swore by the gods of their royal family, that she would certainly dissolve her marriage with him. Upon this, partly because he could not endure the annoyance of her daily taunts, partly because he was afraid of her high spirit, lest she should in earnest dissolve her marriage with him, he unwillingly, and against his inclinations, got together again as large an army as he could, and marched along with them, himself now thinking it insufferable that he, a Parthian, should be defeated by a Jew who warred against him.

§ 7. Now as soon as Anilæus heard that Mithridates was marching with a large force against him, he thought it ignoble to remain in the marshes, and not to be first in meeting his enemies, and he hoped to have the same success, and to beat the enemy as he had done before; so he ventured boldly upon the like attempt. Accordingly, he led out his army, and a great many more men joined themselves to his army, to betake themselves to plunder other persons' property, and to terrify the enemy again first by their appearance. But when they had marched ninety furlongs, as their road lay through waterless places, they became very thirsty about the middle of the day, and Mithridates suddenly appeared, and fell upon them, as they were in distress for want of water, on which account, and on account of the time of day, they were not able to bear their weapons. So Anilæus and his men were put to an ignominious rout, as they were faint and yet had to attack men that were fresh and in good plight; so a great slaughter was made, and many ten thousands killed. Now Anilæus and all that remained round him fled as fast as they were able into a wood, and gave Mithridates the pleasure of having gained a great victory over them. And now there flocked unto Anilæus a countless number of bad men, who regarded their own lives very little, if they might but gain some present ease, so that, by their thus coming to him, they compensated for the number of those that had perished in the fight. But they were not equal in quality to those that had fallen, because they had had no practice in war; however, with them Anilæus attacked the villages of the Babylonians, and a mighty destruction of all things there was made by his violence. So the Babylonians, and those that joined in the war, sent to Naarda to the Jews there, and demanded them to deliver up Anilæus. And although they did not obey their demand (for if they had been willing to deliver him up, it was not in their power to do so), yet did they desire to make peace with them. To which the others replied, that they also wanted conditions of peace, and sent envoys with the Babylonians, to treat with Anilæus about peace. But the Babylonians, having made a reconnaissance, and found out where Anilæus and his men were encamped, fell secretly upon them as they were drunk and had fallen asleep, and slew with impunity all of them they fell in with, and killed Anilæus himself also.

§ 8. The Babylonians were now freed from Anilæus' raids (which had been a great hindrance to their carrying out their hatred to the Jews, for they were almost always at variance because of the difference of their laws, and whichever party grew boldest attacked the other first), and so now, upon the slaughter of Anilæus' party, they attacked the Jews. And they, dreading the injuries they received from the Babylonians, and being unable to fight them, and thinking it intolerable to live with them, migrated to Seleucia,<sup>1</sup> the principal city in those parts, which was built by Seleucus Nicator; and was inhabited by many Macedonians, but principally by Greeks, and not a few Syrians also dwelt there. And there did the Jews take refuge, and lived there five years without any misfortunes. But in the sixth year a pestilence came upon those at Babylon, and because of it a stampede took place to Seleucia. And a still heavier calamity came upon them for the reason which I am going to relate.

§ 9. The life of the Greeks and Syrians in Seleucia was mostly quarrelsome, and full of strife, though the Greeks had the best of it. But when the Jews came there and dwelt among them, there arose a sedition, and the Syrians were too much for the Greeks, owing to the assistance of the Jews, who are men that despise dangers, and are very ready to fight upon any occasion. Now, as the Greeks had the worst in this sedition, and saw that they had but one way of recovering their former authority, and that was, if they could prevent the unity of the Jews and Syrians, they each talked with such of the Syrians as were formerly acquainted with them, and offered to be at peace and friendship with them. And they gladly agreed to this, and a conference was held by both parties; and as the principal men of both nations agreed to a reconciliation, it was soon brought about. And when they were so agreed, they both felt that the chief token of such a union would be common hostility to the Jews; so they fell upon them suddenly, and slew about fifty thousand of them. Indeed the Jews were all destroyed, except a few who escaped from the compassion of their friends or neighbours, and migrated to Ctesiphon,<sup>1</sup> a Greek city near Seleucia, where the king winters every year, and where the greatest part of his treasures are deposited. But the Jews had no certain settlement here, those of Seleucia having little concern for the king's honour. For the whole nation of the Jews were afraid both of the Babylonians and Seleucians, because all the Syrians that lived in those places agreed with the Seleucians to war against the Jews: so most of them gathered themselves together, and went to Naarda and Nisibis,<sup>2</sup> and obtained security there from the strength of those cities; and also their inhabitants, who were a great many, were all warlike men. Such was the state of the Jews in Babylonia.

§ 1.

NOW Caius showed his outrageous madness not only to the Jews at Jerusalem, or to those that dwelt in Judæa, but also exhibited it in every land and sea that was subject to the Romans, and filled the empire with ten thousand woes, such as no former history relates. But Rome itself felt the most dire effects of his acts, as he held it in not a whit more honour than all other cities, but savagely oppressed all its citizens, and especially the senate and patricians, and such as were honoured for their illustrious ancestors. He also found out ten thousand devices against those of the equestrian order, as it was called, who were esteemed by the citizens equal in dignity and wealth to the senators, because out of them the senators were themselves chosen; he treated these in an ignominious manner, and degraded them from their position, and they were not only slain, but their wealth plundered, for he slew men generally in order to seize on their riches. He also asserted his own divinity, and insisted on greater honours being paid him by his subjects than are due to mankind, for he frequented the temple of Jupiter which they call the Capitol, which is among the Romans the most honoured of all their temples, and had the audacity to call Jupiter his brother. And other things he did like a madman, as when he laid a bridge from the city of Dicæarchia<sup>1</sup> in Campania to Misenum,<sup>2</sup> another city upon the seaside, a distance of thirty furlongs by sea from one promontory to the other. And this he did because he disliked crossing over in a trireme, and thought also that it became him to make that bridge, since he was lord of the sea, and might demand from it as much as from the land, so he enclosed the whole bay within his bridge, and drove his chariot over it, and thought that, as he was a god, it was fit for him to make such roads as this was. Nor did he abstain from the plunder of any of the Greek temples, but gave orders that all the paintings and sculptures, and the rest of the ornaments of the statues and votive offerings should be brought to him, saying that beautiful things ought to be set nowhere but in the best place, and that was the city of Rome. He also adorned his own house and gardens with what was brought from those temples, as also his houses which he occasionally stayed at when he travelled in Italy; and he did not scruple to command that the statue of Olympian Zeus, the work of Phidias the Athenian, which was honoured by the Greeks, should be transferred to Rome. But he did not compass his end in this, for the architects told Memmius Regulus, who was commanded to remove that statue of Zeus, that it would be broken if it were removed. It is also reported that Memmius, both on that account, and on account of some mighty prodigies such as are of an incredible nature, deferred the removing it, and wrote these circumstances to Caius, as his apology for not having done what his letter required of him; and when he was in consequence in danger of his life, he was saved by Caius dying himself, before he had him put to death.

§ 2. Nay, Caius' madness rose to such a height, that when he had a daughter born, he carried her into the Capitol, and put her upon the knees of the statue, and said that the child was common to him and to Jupiter, and affirmed that she had two fathers, but which of these fathers was the greatest he left undetermined. And yet men put up with such actions! He also gave leave to slaves to accuse their masters of any crimes whatever they pleased; for all such accusations were terrible, because they were in great part made to please him and at his suggestion, inso-much that Pollux, Claudius' slave, had the boldness to lay an accusation against Claudius himself, and Caius was not ashamed to be present, and to hear the trial for his life of his own uncle, in hope of being able to take him off, although the result did not turn out to his mind. But when he had filled the whole world which he governed with false accusations and miseries, and had made slaves in a great measure their masters' masters, many plots were laid against him, for some conspired against his life in rage and to revenge themselves for the miseries they had already undergone from him, and others to take him off before they should fall into such great miseries. And so his death happened very opportunely for the preservation of the laws of all nations, and had a great influence upon the public welfare, and happened most happily for our nation in particular, which would almost have utterly perished if he had not been soon slain. I intend to give a complete account of his murder, especially as it affords great proof of the power of God, and great comfort to those who are in afflictions, and soberness to those who think their happiness will never end, instead of bringing them at last to the most enduring miseries, if they do not conduct their lives by the principles of virtue.)

§ 3. Now there were three conspiracies made to murder Caius, and each of these three was headed by excellent persons. Æmilius Regulus, a native of Corduba<sup>1</sup> in Iberia, got some men together, and was desirous to take Caius off either by them, or by himself. Another conspiracy was laid under the lead of Chærea Cassius, a tribune [of the Prætorian guard]. Minucianus Annius was also one of great consequence among those that were prepared to put an end to Caius' tyranny. Now the reasons of these men's hatred and conspiracy against Caius were as follows. Regulus had indignation and hatred against all injustice (for he was by nature hot-tempered and frank, which made him not conceal his counsels; so he communicated them to many of his friends, and to others who seemed to him men of action); and Minucianus entered into conspiracy, because of the injustice done to Lepidus his particular friend, and one of the best of all the citizens, whom Caius had slain, and also because he was afraid of him himself, as Caius' wrath revelled in the slaughter of all alike: and as for Chærea, he thought it no illiberal deed to kill Caius, being ashamed of Caius constantly twitting him with being effeminate,<sup>1</sup> as also because he was himself in danger every day from his friendship with Caius, and the observance he paid him. These men opened their plot to all who saw the injuries that were done them, and who were desirous that by Caius' death they might escape all this: for perhaps they would succeed, and it would be a happy thing if they should to have so many excellent fellow-conspirators, who earnestly wished to share in their design for the delivery of the city and empire, even at the hazard of their own lives. But Chærea was the most zealous of them all, not only from a desire of getting himself the greatest name, but also because of his access to Caius' presence with less danger, because he was a tribune [of the Prætorian guard], and so could the more easily kill him.

§ 4. Now at this time came on the horse-races, the view of which games is eagerly desired by the people of Rome, for they come with great alacrity into the Circus at such times, and crowd round in great multitudes, and petition their emperors for what they stand in need of; and they usually do not think fit to deny them their requests, but readily and graciously grant them. Accordingly now they most importunately desired that Caius would ease them in their tributes, and abate somewhat of the rigour of the taxes imposed upon them. But he would not listen to their petition, and, as their clamours increased, he sent soldiers, some one way, and some another, and gave orders that they should arrest those that made the clamours, and without any more ado, bring them out, and put them to death. These were Caius' commands, and those who were commanded carried them out, and the number of those slain on this occasion was very great. Now the people saw this, and bore it, and soon left off clamouring, because they saw with their own eyes that this petition to be somewhat relieved of the payment of their taxes brought immediate death upon them. These things made Chærea more resolute to go on with his plot, in order to put an end to this savageness of Caius against men. Frequently he thought to fall upon Caius as he was feasting, but he restrained himself by some considerations, not that he had any doubt about killing him, but because he watched for a proper season, that the attempt might not be in vain, but might be carried out effectually.

§ 5. Chærea had been in the army a long time, but was not pleased with much intercourse with Caius. And when Caius appointed him to exact the tribute and other dues, which, when not paid in due time, were forfeited to the emperor's treasury, he made some delay in exacting them, because those burdens had been doubled, and rather indulged his own mild disposition than carried out Caius' commands, and indeed provoked Caius to anger by his sparing men, and pitying the hard fortunes of those from whom he demanded the taxes, and Caius upbraided him with his sloth and effeminacy in being so long about collecting the money. And indeed he not only affronted him in other respects, but whenever he gave him the word for the day in his turn, he gave him feminine words,<sup>1</sup> and those of a very reproachful nature. And this he did, having been initiated in the secrets of certain mysteries which he had himself invented: for as he sometimes put on women's clothes, and devised false curls, and did a great many other things, in order to get taken for a woman, so he ventured to taunt Chærea with the like womanish behaviour. And whenever Chærea received the word for the day from him, he was indignant at it, but still more whenever he had to pass it on to others, being laughed at by those that received it, insomuch that his fellow-tribunes made him their sport. For they would foretell that he would bring them some of his usual amusing words whenever he was to bring the word for the day from the emperor. For these reasons he took the bold step of joining to him certain associates, having just reasons for his indignation against Caius. Now there was one Pompedius, a senator, who had gone through almost all offices, but was in other respects an Epicurean, and one who for that reason loved to lead an inactive life. Now Timidius, an enemy of his, informed Caius that Pompedius had used unseemly reproaches against him, and called Quintilia as a witness, a woman who was much run after by many that frequented the theatre, and also by Pompedius, because of her great beauty. Now as this woman thought it monstrous to bear witness to a lying accusation that touched the life of her lover, Timidius desired to have her put to the torture. And Caius in his exasperation commanded Chærea without any delay to torture Quintilia, as he used to employ Chærea in such bloody matters, and whenever the rack was required, because he thought he would do it the more severely to avoid the imputation of effeminacy. But Quintilia, when she was brought to the rack, trod upon the foot of one of her associates, and let him know, that he might be of good courage, and not be afraid of any consequences from her tortures; for she would bear them bravely. And Chærea tortured her in a cruel manner, unwillingly indeed, and only because he was compelled to act so for his own safety, and then brought her, without her being the least moved at what she had suffered, into the presence of Caius, and that in such a condition as was sad to behold. And Caius, being somewhat affected by the sight of Quintilia, who had her body miserably racked with pain, acquitted both her and Pompedius of the crime laid to their charge. He also gave her money to make her honourable amends, and comfort her for the injury to her body which she had suffered, and for her glorious patience under such dreadful torments.

§ 6. This matter sorely grieved Chærea, as having been the cause, as far as he could be, of such miseries to human beings as seemed worthy of consolation to Caius himself; and he said to Clemens and to Papinius (of whom Clemens was commander of the Prætorian body-guard, and Papinius tribune,) "Certainly, Clemens, we have no way failed in guarding the emperor; for as to those that have conspired against his government, some have been slain by our forethought and pains, and some have been tortured by us, and that to such a degree, that he has himself pitied them. How great then is our virtue in submitting to lead his armies!" Clemens was silent, but showed the shame he felt in obeying Caius' orders both by his looks and blushing countenance, though he thought it by no means right to accuse the emperor in express words, lest his own safety should be endangered thereby. Upon this Chærea took courage, and spoke to him without fear of danger, and descanted on the sore calamities under which the city and empire then laboured, and said, "We may indeed pretend in words that Caius is the person to whom such miseries ought to be imputed; but in the opinion of such as try to investigate the truth, it is I, O Clemens, and Papinius here, and before us both you yourself, who bring these tortures upon the Romans and upon all mankind, not by our being subservient to the commands of Caius, but by following our own wish, for whereas it is in our power to put an end to the life of this man, who has so terribly outraged the citizens and his subjects, we are his body-guards and executioners rather than soldiers, and are the instruments of his cruelty. We carry weapons not for our liberty, nor for the Roman empire, but only for his preservation, who has enslaved both the bodies and minds of his subjects, and we are every day polluted with the blood that we shed, and the torments we inflict upon them, until somebody shall become Caius' instrument in bringing the like miseries upon ourselves. Nor does he thus employ us out of good-will to us, but rather because he is suspicious of us, as also because when many more have been killed (for Caius will set no bounds to his wrath, since he acts thus not out of regard to justice, but to his own pleasure,) we shall also ourselves be a mark for his cruelty; whereas we ought to be the means of confirming the security and liberty of everybody, and at the same time we ought to resolve to free ourselves from dangers."

§ 7. Then Clemens openly commended Chærea's intention, but bade him be silent, for in case his words should get out among many, and such things should spread abroad as were well to be concealed, the plot would be discovered before it was executed, and they would be brought to punishment: so he recommended that they should leave all to the future and the hope which arose thence that some fortunate event would aid them; as for himself, his age would not permit him to take any active part in the attempt. "Although perhaps," he added, "I could suggest what might be safer than what you, Chærea, have contrived and urged, yet how is it possible for any one to suggest what is more for your reputation?" And Clemens went his way home, reflecting on what he had heard, and what he had himself said. Chærea was also in anxiety, and went quickly to Cornelius Sabinus (who was himself also a tribune, and one whom he also knew to be a worthy man and lover of liberty, and so very much opposed to the present management of public affairs), being desirous to carry out quickly what had been determined, and thinking it well for him to propose it to him, not only being afraid lest Clemens should inform against them, but also looking upon procrastination and delay as next door to abandoning the enterprise.

§ 8. Now all this was agreeable to Sabinus, who had himself the same design as Chærea, but had been silent for want of a person to whom he could safely communicate his views, so now having met with one, who not only promised to conceal what he heard, but who also opened his mind to him, he was much more encouraged, and desired of Chærea that no delay might be made. So they went to Minucianus, who was as virtuous a man, and as zealous to do glorious actions, as themselves, and was suspected by Caius on account of his murder of Lepidus; for Minucianus and Lepidus had been intimate friends, and both in fear of their common dangers. For Caius was terrible to all great men, not ceasing to rage against each of them in particular, and all of them in general; and men were afraid of one another, while yet uneasy at the posture of affairs, and hesitated to let one another see their mind and hatred against Caius, from fear of danger, although they perceived in other ways their mutual hatred of Caius, and so did not cease to feel mutual good-will.

§ 9. When Minucianus and Chærea met together, and saluted one another, as they had been used in former intercourse to give the first place to Minucianus, both on account of his eminent merit (for he was the noblest of all the citizens) and because he was highly commended by all men, especially when he made speeches, Minucianus began first, and asked Chærea, what was the word he had received for that day from Caius. For the insults which were offered Chærea in giving the words for the day were notorious all over the city. And Chærea made no delay to reply to that question, from the joy he had that Minucianus had such confidence in him as to discourse with him. "And do you," said he, "give me Liberty as the word! And I return you my thanks for having so greatly encouraged me to exert myself in an extraordinary manner; nor do I stand in need of many words to embolden me, if you and I are of the same mind, and sharers in the same resolution, even before this conversation. I have indeed but one sword girt on, but it will be enough for us both. Come on, therefore, let us set about the work. Do you go first, if so minded, and bid me follow you, or else I will go first, and you shall assist me, and I will rely on your co-operation. Nor is there a necessity for even one sword to such as have a mind disposed to action, for by the mind the sword is wont to be sharpened. I am zealous about this action, nor am I solicitous as to what I may myself undergo; for I am not at leisure to consider the dangers that may come upon myself, so deeply am I troubled at the slavery of our once free country, and at the abeyance of our excellent laws, and at the destruction which hangs over all men's heads owing to Caius. I hope that I may in your judgment be esteemed worthy of credit in these matters, seeing that we are both of the same opinion, and that there is no difference between us."

§ 10. When Minucianus saw the vehemence with which Chærea delivered himself, he gladly embraced him, and encouraged him in his bold attempt, commending and embracing him, and so let him go with his good wishes and prayers. And some affirm that Minucianus confirmed him in the execution of what had been agreed among them. For, as Chærea entered the senate-house, they say that a voice came from among the multitude to encourage him, which bade him finish what he was about, and take the opportunity that providence afforded : and that Chærea at first suspected that one of the conspirators had turned traitor, and that he was detected, but at last perceived that it was by way of exhortation, whether someone who knew what he was about gave a signal for his encouragement, or whether God himself, who looks upon the actions of men, encouraged him to go on boldly in his design. The plot had now been communicated to a great many, and the conspirators were all armed, some of them being senators, and some of the equestrian order, and all the rest soldiers who were privy to the plot. For there was not one of them who did not reckon it happiness to remove Caius, and so they were all very zealous in the affair, however they might compass it, and resolved not to be behindhand in these virtuous designs, but to be ready with all their alacrity and power, both in words and actions, to slay the tyrant. Another conspirator was Callistus (who was a freedman of Caius), and was the only man who had arrived at a very great degree of power under him, such a power, indeed, as was in a manner equal to the power of the tyrant himself, from the dread that all men had of him, and from the great riches he had acquired ; for he took bribes most freely, and insolently treated everybody, using his power contrary to equity ; he also knew the disposition of Caius to be implacable, and never to be turned from what he had once resolved on ; he had also many other reasons why he thought himself in danger, and not least the vastness of his wealth. So he privately ingratiated himself with Claudius, and transferred his court to him, hoping if, after the removal of Caius, the empire should come to him, his interest in such changes would lay a foundation for his preserving his position under Claudius, as he would have laid in beforehand a stock of gratitude and good-will. He had also the audacity to pretend that he had been ordered to kill Claudius by poison, but had contrived ten thousand ways of delaying to do it. But it seems probable to me that Callistus only pretended this to ingratiate himself with Claudius, for if Caius had resolved in earnest to take off Claudius, he would not have admitted of excuses from Callistus, nor would Callistus have put it off, if he had been enjoined to do such an act because it was desired by Caius, or, if he had disobeyed those injunctions of his master, he would have had immediate punishment: so that Claudius was preserved from the madness of Caius by a certain divine providence, and Callistus pretended to have done him such a kindness as he never had done.

§ 11. However, the execution of Chærea's design was put off from day to day, from the hesitation of many of the conspirators: for as to Chærea himself, he did not willingly make any delay in carrying it out, thinking every time a fit time for it. For frequent opportunities offered themselves, as when Caius went up to the Capitol to sacrifice for his daughter, or when he stood on the roof of his royal palace, and threw pieces of gold and silver among the people, he might be pushed down headlong, because the roof of the palace overlooking the forum was very high; and also when he celebrated the mysteries which he had himself instituted, he might easily be attacked, for he was then no way secluded from the people, but solicitous to do every thing formally and duly, and was free from all suspicion that he would then be attacked by any body. And although the gods should afford Chærea no indication that he would be able to take away Caius' life, yet had he strength sufficient to despatch him even without a sword. So Chærea was angry with his fellow-conspirators, fearing they would suffer opportunities to slip by; and they were sensible that he had just cause to be angry at them, and that his eagerness was for their advantage; however, they desired that he would have a little longer patience, lest, if their attempt failed, they should agitate the city, and when search should be made for the conspirators, should make the courage of those that were to attack Caius ineffectual, as he would then secure himself more carefully than ever against them. They thought therefore that it would be best to set about the work when the shows were exhibited in the palace. These shows were acted in honour of that Cæsar<sup>1</sup> who first changed the commonwealth into a monarchy ; galleries being fixed before the palace, where the Romans that were patricians sat as spectators, with their children and wives, and the emperor himself also ; and the conspirators reckoned, as many ten thousands would be crowded there in a narrow space, that they would have a favourable opportunity to make their attack upon Caius as he came in ; because his body-guards, even if any of them had a mind to do so, would not be able to give him any assistance.

§ 12. Chærea consented to this delay, and it was resolved to do the deed the first day that the shows were exhibited. But fortune, which allowed a further delay, was too much for their preconcerted plan, and, as three days of the regular time usual for these shows were now over, they had much ado to get the business done on the last day. So Chærea called the conspirators together, and spoke to them as follows. “ So much time passed away without effect is a reproach to us, for delaying to go through such a virtuous design as we are engaged in ; but this delay will prove more fatal, if we be discovered and the design be frustrated ; for Caius will then become much more savage. Do we not see how long we deprive all our friends of their liberty, and give Caius leave still to tyrannize over them, whereas we ought to have procured them security for the future, and by laying a foundation for the happiness of others, have gained for ourselves great admiration and honour for all time to come ? ” Now, as the conspirators had nothing particular to say by way of contradiction, and yet did not quite relish what they were doing, but were silent and seemed dazed, he said further, “ O my brave comrades ! why do we delay ? Do not you see that this is the last day of these shows, and that Caius is about to go to sea ? ” (for he had made preparations to sail to Alexandria in order to visit Egypt.) “ Is it then for your honour to let a man go out of your hands who is a reproach to mankind, and to permit him to go about in a magnificent procession of Romans both by land and sea ? Shall we not be justly ashamed of ourselves, if some Egyptian or other, who shall think his injuries insufferable to freemen, shall kill him ? As for myself, I will no longer bear your procrastination, but will expose myself to the dangers of the enterprise this very day, and bear cheerfully whatever shall be the consequences of the attempt, let them be ever so great, for I will not put off the affair any longer. For what can be more miserable to a man of spirit than the thought that, while I am alive, any one else should kill Caius, and deprive me of the honour of so virtuous an action."

§ 13. When Chærea had spoken thus, he zealously set about the work, and inspired courage into the rest to go on with it, and they were all eager to fall to it without further delay. And he was at the palace early in the morning, with his equestrian sword girt on, for it was the custom that the tribunes should ask for the word for the day from the emperor with their swords on, and this was the day on which Chærea's turn was to receive the word. And the multitude had already come to the palace, in great crowds and jostling one another, to get a good place early for seeing the shows; and Caius was delighted with this eagerness of the multitude, so no peculiar seats were appointed for the senators, or for the equestrian order, but all sat promiscuously, men and women together, and free men mixed up with slaves. So a way was made for Caius, and he offered sacrifice to Cæsar Augustus, in whose honour indeed these shows were celebrated. Now it happened, as one of the victims was slain, that the toga of Asprenas, a senator, was sprinkled with blood, which made Caius laugh, and was an evident omen to Asprenas, for he was slain at the same time with Caius. It is also stated that Caius was that day, contrary to his usual nature, so very affable and courteous in his conversation, that every one of those that were present were astonished. After the sacrifice was over, Caius betook himself to see the shows, and sat down for that purpose, and his chief friends sat round him. Now the theatre was constructed as follows, as it was put together every year. It had two doors, one leading to the open air, the other for going in or out of the portico, that those within the theatre might not be thereby disturbed; but out of one gallery there was an inward passage, parted into partitions also, which led into another gallery, to give room to the combatants, and to the musicians, to go out as occasion served. When the multitude had sat down, and Chærea and the other tribunes were not far from Caius (now the right corner of the theatre was allotted to the emperor), one Vatinius, a senator, and commander of the prætorian band, asked of Cluvius, who sat near him, and was of consular dignity, whether he had heard any news or not, but took care that nobody should hear what he said. And when Cluvius replied, that he had heard no news, "Know then," said Vatinius, "that the play of tyrannicide is to be played to-day." And Cluvius said, "Brave comrade! hold thy peace, lest some other of the Achæans hear thy tale."<sup>1</sup> And as there was much fruit scrambled among the spectators, as also a great number of birds of great value to such as got them on account of their rarity, Caius was amused with the fights and scuffles of the spectators for them. Here also I understand<sup>2</sup> there were two omens. For a Mime was introduced, in which a leader of robbers was crucified, and the pantomimic dancer brought in a play called Cinyras, wherein he himself was slain and his daughter Myrrha, and wherein a great deal of sham blood seemed to flow, both round him that was crucified, and also round Cinyras. It is also admitted, that this was the same day whereon Pausanias, a friend of Philip (the son of Amyntas), king of Macedonia, slew him as he was entering the theatre. And now Caius was in doubt whether he would stay to the end of the shows, as it was the last day, or whether he would not go first to bathe and dine, and then return as on previous days, when Minucianus, who sat above Caius, afraid that the opportunity would fail them, got up, because he saw that Chærea had already gone out, and was hastening out to confirm him in his resolution, when Caius took hold of his garment in a free and easy way, and said to him, "My good fellow, where are you going?" Whereupon, out of reverence to the emperor apparently, he sat down again, but his fear prevailed, and in a little time he got up again, and this time Caius did not at all oppose his going out, thinking he went out to do some necessary act of nature. And Asprenas, who was one of the conspirators also, persuaded Caius to go out to bathe and dine, as he had done on previous days, and then to come in again, being desirous that what had been resolved on might be brought to a conclusion immediately.

§ 14. And Chærea and his associates posted themselves as conveniently as they could, but it was not without great effort that they could keep the place which was appointed them. And they were put out by having to wait so long to carry out their purpose, for it was already about the ninth<sup>1</sup> hour of the day, and Chærea, upon Caius' tarrying so long, had a great mind to go in to him and attack him on his seat. He foresaw however that this could not be done without much bloodshed, both of the senators, and of those of the equestrian order that were present; but although he knew this must result, yet had he a great mind to do so, thinking it right to procure security and freedom to all, even at the expense of such as might perish at the same time. And as they were just going back to the entrance to the theatre, the great applause told them that Caius had risen up. Then the conspirators turned and thrust back the crowd, on the pretext that they annoyed Caius, but in reality being desirous to murder him securely through depriving him of any to defend him. Now Claudius, his uncle, and Marcus Vinicius, his sister's husband, as also Valerius Asiaticus, preceded him, and though the conspirators would have liked to thrust them out of the way too, respect to their dignity hindered them from doing so, and Caius came last with Paulus Arruntius. And when Caius got within the palace, he left the direct road, along which his servants stood that were in waiting, and which Claudius and those with him had taken, and turned aside into a private narrow passage, in order to go to the baths, as also to look at some boys that had come from Asia, who had been sent from thence partly to sing hymns in the mysteries which were now being celebrated, partly to dance the Pyrrhic dance at the theatres. And Chærea met him, and asked him for the word; and upon Caius' giving him one of his mocking words, Chærea immediately reproached him, and drew his sword, and gave him a terrible but not

mortal stroke with it. And although some say that it was so contrived on purpose by Chærea, that Caius should not be killed at one blow, but should be punished more severely by a number of wounds, yet this story appears to me incredible, because the fear men are in in such actions does not allow them to use their reason. And if Chærea was of that mind, I esteem him the greatest of all fools, for so indulging his spite against Caius, rather than immediately procuring safety to himself and his fellow-conspirators from the danger they were in; for many things might still happen for Caius' help, if he had not already given up the ghost. For certainly Chærea would not regard so much the punishment of Caius as himself and his friends, when it was in his power after such success to keep silent, and to escape the wrath of Caius' defenders; far less, when it was uncertain whether he had gained the end he aimed at or not, would he in a stupid way have been likely to act as if he had a mind to ruin himself, and lose the opportunity. But every one may conjecture as he pleases about this matter. However, Caius staggered from the pain that the blow gave him (for the sword wounded him between the shoulder and the neck, but was prevented by the collarbone from proceeding any further,) but did not either cry out in his astonishment, or call out for any of his friends; whether he had no confidence in them, or because he was lightheaded, but he groaned from the excessive pain, and moved forward to flee. Then Cornelius Sabinus, who had already made up his mind, received him and thrust him down upon his knee, and many others stood round about him with one consent, and hacked at him with their swords, and encouraged one another to repeat their blows. And all agree that Aquila gave him the finishing stroke, which instantly killed him. But one may justly ascribe this murder to Chærea, for although many had a hand in the act itself, yet was he the first contriver of it, and began long before all the rest to prepare for it, and was the first that spoke boldly of it to the rest; and upon their approving of the project, he got the dispersed conspirators together, and prepared every thing in a clever manner, and by suggesting good advice showed himself far superior to the rest, and conciliated them by clever speeches, insomuch that he compelled even the timid to go on with the enterprise, and when the time came for action, he appeared ready first and gave the first blow, and also brought Caius easily into the power of the rest, and almost killed him himself, insomuch that it is but just to ascribe all that the rest did to the advice and bravery of Chærea, and to the labours of his hands.

§ 15. Thus did Caius come to his end, and lay dead from the many wounds which had been given him. And Chærea and the other conspirators, now Caius was dead, saw that it was impossible for them to save themselves if they should all go the same way. For not only were they unnerved by what they had done (for they had incurred no small danger by killing an emperor who was honoured and loved by the madness of the people, and the soldiers were likely to make a bloody inquiry after his murderers), but the road was narrow where the deed was done, and also crowded with a great number of Caius' attendants, and with such of the soldiers as were the emperor's guard that day. So they went by different ways, and reached the house of Germanicus, the father of Caius whom they had just killed (which house joined on to the palace; for though the palace was one edifice, it had been built in its several parts by previous emperors, and those parts bore the names of those that built them, or the name of him who had begun to build any of them), and so they got away from the attack of the multitude, and were for the present out of danger, as long as what had happened to the emperor was not known. The Germans were the first that perceived that Caius was slain. These Germans were his body-guards, and had their name from the country where they had been enlisted, and composed the Celtic legion. The men of that country are naturally passionate, which is not unfrequently the temper of some other of the barbarous nations also, as they do not much reason about what they do, but are strong in their bodies, and rush upon their enemies at the first onset, and wherever they go perform great exploits. When, therefore, they knew that Caius was slain, they were very sorry for it, because they did not judge public affairs on their merits, but measured them by the advantages they themselves received, (Caius being beloved by them because of the money he gave them, by which he had purchased their good-will,) so they drew their swords, and Sabinus led them on. He was their tribune, not because of the virtue and nobility of his ancestors, for he had only been a gladiator, but he had obtained that position over these men by his strength of body. Now these Germans marched along the houses in quest of Caius' murderers, and cut Asprenas to pieces, because he was the first man they fell in with, whose garment the blood of the sacrifice had stained, as I have stated already, which was ominous that his meeting with the soldiers would not be for his good. The next that met them was Norbanus, who was one of the noblest of the citizens, and could show many generals of armies among his ancestors, but they paid no regard to his rank, but he was of such great strength, that he wrested the sword of the first of those that assaulted him out of his hands, and showed plainly that he would not die without a fight for his life, but he was surrounded at last by a great number of assailants, and died in consequence of the many wounds which he received. The third they met was Anteius, a senator, and a few others were with him. He did not meet these Germans by chance, as the rest did before, but came to show his hatred to Caius, and to feast his eyes with seeing Caius lie dead, and took a pleasure in the sight, because Caius had banished Anteius' father, who was of the same name as himself, and, not being satisfied with that, had despatched soldiers to slay him. So he had come to rejoice at the sight of him, now he was dead; but as the house was now all in confusion, though he tried to hide himself, he could not escape the careful search which the Germans made, for they barbarously slew alike those that were guilty and those that were innocent. And thus were these persons slain.

§ 16. But when the news that Caius was slain reached the theatre, there was both panic and incredulity. For some that heard of his destruction with great pleasure, and were more desirous of its happening than of almost any other satisfaction that could come to them, could not believe it for fear. There were also others who greatly distrusted it, because they were unwilling that any such thing should happen to Caius, nor could they believe it, though ever so true, because they thought no one able to kill Caius. These were the women, and youths, and slaves, and some of the soldiers. These last had taken his pay, and in a manner tyrannized with him, and had ill-treated the best of the citizens, in obedience to his outrageous commands, and to gain honours and advantages to themselves; and the women and youths had been captivated, as crowds are, with shows, and the fightings of gladiators, and distributions of meat, all which things were done nominally to please the multitude, but in reality to glut the savage madness of Caius. The slaves also were loth to believe the news, because they were allowed by Caius to accuse and despise their masters, and they could have recourse to his assistance when they had acted insolently to them; for he was very easy in believing them against their masters, even when they accused them falsely; and, if they would discover what money their masters had, they might soon obtain both liberty and riches as the reward of their accusations, because the eighth part of their masters' substance was assigned to these informers.<sup>1</sup> As to the patricians, although the report appeared credible to some of them, either because they knew of the plot beforehand, or because they wished it might prove true, they concealed not only the joy they felt at the news, but that they had heard any news at all. These last acted so from the fear they had that, if the report proved false, they would be punished for having so soon let men know their minds. And those that knew Caius was dead, because they were privy to the conspiracy, concealed it still more, not knowing one another's minds, and fearing lest they should speak of it to some of those to whom the continuance of tyranny was advantageous, and if Caius should prove after all to be alive, they might be informed against and punished, for another report went about, that although Caius had been wounded indeed, he was not dead, but still alive, and under the surgeon's hands. Nor was any one looked upon by another as one to be trusted, and to whom one might boldly open one's mind; for he was either a friend to Caius, and therefore suspected to favour his tyranny, or he was one that hated him, and therefore might be suspected to deserve the less credit for what he said, because of his ill-will to him. It was also reported by some, (who deprived the patricians of all their hopes, and made them sad indeed), that Caius despised the danger he had been in, and took no care to heal his wounds, but had got away to the forum, bloody as he was, and was making an harangue to the people. And these were the conjectural reports of those that were so unreasonable as to endeavour to raise tumults, which were received different ways according to the opinions of the hearers. However, they did not leave their seats, for fear of being accused if they should go out before the rest; for they would not be judged by the real intention with which they went out, but by the conjectures of the accusers and judges.

§ 17. But when the multitude of Germans surrounded the theatre with their swords drawn, all the spectators looked for nothing but death, and upon every one's coming in a fear seized upon them, as if they would be cut in pieces immediately; and they were in great anxiety, not having courage enough to go out of the theatre, and yet not believing themselves safe from danger if they stayed there. And when the Germans rushed in, the theatre rang again with the cries and entreaties of the spectators to the soldiers, for they pleaded that they were entirely ignorant of every thing that related to an insurrection, and if any insurrection had been raised, they knew nothing of what had happened. They therefore begged that they would spare them, and not punish those that had not the least hand in such bold crimes of other persons, while they neglected to search after those who had really done whatever had been done. Then did they appeal to God, and deplore their infelicity with shedding of tears and beating of their faces, and said every thing that the most imminent danger, and the utmost concern for their lives, could dictate to them. This broke the fury of the soldiers, and made them repent of what they had intended to do to the spectators, for that would have been barbarous, and so it appeared even to these savages, who fixed the heads of those that were slain with Asprenas upon the altar. At this dreadful sight the spectators were sorely afflicted, both from the consideration of the rank of the persons, and commiseration at their sufferings; nay, indeed, they were almost in as great terror at the prospect of the danger they themselves were in, seeing it was still uncertain whether they should to the end escape the like calamity. And thus it came about that such as thoroughly and justly hated Caius, were yet robbed of pleasure at his death, because they were themselves in jeopardy of perishing with him, nor had they as yet any firm assurance of surviving.

§ 18. There was at this time one Euaristus Arruntius, a public crier in the market, and therefore of a powerful voice, who vied in wealth with the richest of the Romans, and was able to do what he pleased in the city both now and afterwards. This man made himself look as mournful as he could, (although he had greater hatred against Caius than any one else, but his fear and astuteness to secure his own safety taught him to conceal his present pleasure) and put on such mourning as he would have done had he lost his dearest friend in the world, and went to the theatre, and announced the death of Caius, and so put an end to the state of ignorance as to what had happened that people were in. Paulus Arruntius also went round, and called out to the Germans, as did the tribunes with him, bidding them put up their swords, and telling them that Caius was dead. And this most certainly saved the lives of those that were assembled together in the theatre, and all the rest who any way met the Germans; for, while they had hopes that Caius had still any breath in him, they abstained from no sort of mischief; and such an abundant kindness had they still for Caius, that they would willingly have prevented the plot against him, and purchased his escape from such an end at the expense of their own lives. But they left off their eagerness to punish his enemies, now they were fully satisfied that Caius was dead, because it was now in vain for them to show their zeal and kindness to him, as he that would reward them had perished. They were also afraid, if they went on doing such injuries, that they would be punished by the senate, if the authority devolved on them, or by the next emperor. And thus at last a stop was put, though not without difficulty, to the rage which possessed the Germans on account of Caius' death.

§ 19. Now Chærea was so much afraid for Minucianus, lest he should fall in with the Germans, now they were in their fury, and be killed by them, that he went and spoke to every one of the soldiers, and prayed them to take care of his preservation, and made himself great inquiry about him, lest he should have been slain. As for Clemens, he let Minucianus go (for he was brought to him) and, with many other of the senators, affirmed the deed was right, and commended the virtue of those that had contrived it, and had had courage enough to execute it; and said that tyrants did indeed please themselves with tyranny and look big for a while, but did not, however, go happily out of the world, because they were hated by the virtuous, and perished miserably like Caius, who had become a conspirator against himself, before those men who attacked him had plotted against him, and by becoming intolerable in his outrages, and by setting aside the wise provision the laws had made, had taught his dearest friends to treat him as an enemy, so that, though in common parlance the conspirators had slain Caius, yet in reality it was by his own act that he now lay dead.

§ 20. Now by this time the people in the theatre had risen from their seats, and those that were within made a very great disturbance, the reason of which was that the spectators were in too great a hurry to get away. There was also one Halcyon, a surgeon, who hurried away, as if to cure those that were wounded, and on that pretext sent those that were with him to fetch what things were necessary for the healing of those wounded persons, but in reality to free them from the imminent danger they were in. Meantime the senate had met, and the people also had assembled in the forum where they held their comitia, and both were employed in searching after the murderers of Caius. The people did this very zealously, but the senate in appearance only; for Valerius Asiaticus, a man of consular authority, went to the people, as they were troubled and very uneasy that they could not yet discover who had murdered the emperor, and when he was earnestly asked by them all, who it was that had done it, he replied, "I wish I had." The consuls also published an edict, wherein they accused Caius, and ordered the people and soldiers to go home, and gave the people hopes of abatement of their grievances, and promised the soldiers if they kept quiet as they used to do, and went not abroad to do mischief, that they would bestow rewards upon them. For there was reason to fear that the city would suffer harm from their wild behaviour, if they should once betake themselves to spoiling the citizens or plundering the temples. And now the whole multitude of the senators were assembled together, and especially those that had conspired to take away the life of Caius, who put on at this time an air of great assurance and great contempt of others, as if the administration of public affairs had already devolved upon them.

CHAP. II.

How the Senators wished to restore the Republic; but the soldiers were for preserving the Monarchy. The Murder of Caius' Wife and Daughter. The character of Caius.

§ 1.

WHEN public affairs were in this condition, Claudius was suddenly hurried away out of his house. For the soldiers held a meeting, and when they had debated about what was to be done, they saw that a democracy was incapable of managing such a vast weight of public affairs, and that if it should be set up it would not be for their advantage; and if one of those already in power should become emperor, it would in all respects be unsatisfactory to them, if they did not assist him in his advancement: it would therefore be well for them, while public affairs were still unsettled, to choose Claudius as emperor, who was uncle to the deceased Caius, and of greater dignity than any of those senators who were assembled together, both on account of the virtue of his ancestors, and the attention he had paid to learning, and who, if once made emperor, would reward them according to their deserts, and bestow largesses upon them. This was their plan, and they executed it immediately. Claudius was therefore seized upon by the soldiers. But Cnæus Sentius Saturninus, although he had heard of the seizing of Claudius, and that he intended to claim the throne, unwillingly indeed in appearance, but in reality with his consent, stood up in the senate, and, without being dismayed, addressed them in a manner suitable to free and noble men, and spoke as follows.

§ 2. "Although it seems incredible, O Romans, because of the great length of time since so unexpected an event has happened, yet are we now in possession of liberty. How long indeed it will last is uncertain, and lies at the disposal of the gods, whose grant it is, yet is it sufficient to make us rejoice, and be happy for the present, although we may soon be deprived of it; for to those that love virtue one hour is sufficient spent in freedom in our country, which is now independent and governed by such laws as it once flourished under. As for myself, I cannot remember our former time of liberty, for I was born after it had passed away, but I am beyond measure filled with joy at the thought of our present freedom, and esteem those happy men that were born and bred up in it, and I think these men worthy of no less honour than the gods themselves, who have, though late, given us a taste of it in this age. May secure enjoyment of it continue to all ages: though this single day may suffice for our youth, as well as for our old men. It will seem an age to our old men, if they die during its happy duration; it will also instruct our younger men what kind of virtue those men had from whom we are sprung. As for ourselves, nothing will be more to our advantage in the present than to live virtuously, for it is virtue alone that can preserve men their liberty. As to our ancient state I have heard from others, but as to our later state, I have personally seen and known what mischiefs tyrannies have brought upon our polity, discouraging all virtue, and depriving persons of magnanimity of their liberty, and teaching flattery and fear, because they leave public affairs to be governed not by the wisdom of the laws, but by the caprice of our rulers. For since Julius Cæsar took it into his head to overthrow our democracy, and, by violating the regular system of our laws, brought disorders into our polity, and got above right and justice, and was a slave to his own inclinations, there is no evil that has not plagued our state, as all those that have succeeded him have vied with one another to overthrow the ancient laws of our country, and to leave it destitute of all citizens of noble principles, because they thought it for their safety to have only vicious men to deal with, and not only to break the spirits of those that were best esteemed for their virtue, but to resolve upon their utter destruction. Of all these tyrants, who have been many in number, and who have laid upon us an insufferable burden during their reigns, this Caius, who has been slain to-day, has brought more terrible calamities upon us than did all the rest, not only by wreaking his ungovernable rage upon his fellow-citizens, but also upon his kindred and friends, inflicting upon all alike still greater miseries by exacting unjust punishments, being equally furious against men and against the gods. For tyrants are not content to gain their pleasure by doing injuries, or by tampering both with men's estates and wives, but they look upon it as entire gain when they can utterly overthrow the entire families of their enemies. So hateful to tyrants is all liberty, nor can even those gain their friendship that patiently endure whatever miseries they bring on them. For as they are conscious of the abundant evils they have brought on several, and how nobly they have borne their hard fortune, they cannot but be sensible what evils they have done them, and so only think they can get security, so suspicious are they, by putting them entirely out of the world. Since, then, we are now got clear of so great a plague, and are only accountable to one another (which form of government affords us the best assurance of present concord and future security from evil designs, and will be most for our own glory in putting the state in good order), you ought every one of you personally to look to the public interests of everybody, nay, even to oppose measures which have been proposed that you dislike, and that without any danger, because there is now no irresponsible despot to do mischief to the state, with absolute power to take off those that freely declare their opinions. Nor has any thing so much contributed to the increase of tyranny of late as sloth and timidity in contradicting the emperor's will; for men had too great love for the sweets of peace, and had learned to live like slaves. And as many of us as either suffered intolerable calamities, or saw the miseries of our neighbours, because we dreaded dying virtuously, had the prospect of death with the utmost infamy. We ought, then, in the first place, to decree the greatest honours we are able to those that have taken off the tyrant, especially to Chærea Cassius. For this one man, with the aid of the gods, has by his counsel and actions been the procurer of our liberty, nor ought we to be ungrateful to him, seeing that he under a tyranny conspired and hazarded his life for our liberty, but we ought to decree him honours, and exhibit this as our first spontaneous act. And certainly it is a very excellent thing, and one well becoming freemen, to requite benefactors, such as this man has been to us all, though unlike Cassius and Brutus who slew Caius Julius [Cæsar]; for they laid the foundations of sedition and civil war in our city, but this man by his tyrannicide has set our city free from all the mischiefs that came therefrom."

§ 3. This was the gist of Sentius' oration, which was received with pleasure by the senators, and by as many of the equestrian order as were present. And now one Trebellius Maximus rose up hastily, and took off Sentius' finger a ring, which had a stone with the image of Caius engraven upon it, and which, in his zeal for speaking, and earnestness in what he was about, he had forgotten (it was supposed) to take off himself. The intaglio was broken immediately. And, as it was now far in the night, Chærea demanded of the consuls the word, and they gave him Liberty. What had happened seemed wonderful to them and almost incredible. For it was a hundred years since the democracy had been set aside, when this giving the word for the day returned to the consuls; for, before the city was governed by tyrants, they were the commanders of the soldiers. And when Chærea had received the word, he passed it on to those soldiers who were on the senate's side, which were four regiments, who esteemed government without emperors to be preferable to tyranny. And these went away with their tribunes. The people also now departed very joyful, full of hope and courage at having recovered their former power, and being no longer under an emperor. And Chærea was everybody with them.

§ 4. And now Chærea was very uneasy that Caius' wife and daughter were still alive, and that all his family had not perished with him, since whoever was left of them would be left for the ruin of the city and the laws. So, being anxious to complete his work, and satisfy his hatred of Caius, he sent Julius Lupus, one of the tribunes, to kill Caius' wife and daughter. They proposed this office to Lupus, as a kinsman of Clemens, that he might be so far a partaker in the tyrannicide, and might get credit for his virtue among the citizens, and might seem to have been one of the original conspirators. But it appeared to some of the conspirators cruel to use such severity to a woman, because Caius, in all that he did, indulged his own ill-nature more than used her advice, and it was owing to him (and not her) that the city was in such a desperate condition of misery, and the flower of the citizens destroyed. But others accused her of giving her consent to these things, nay, they ascribed all that Caius had done to her as the cause of it, and said that she had given a philtre to Caius, which had made him enslaved to her will, and had tied him down to love her, so that she, having made him mad, was herself the author of all the misfortunes that had befallen the Romans and the world that was subject to them. So that at last it was determined that she must die, for those of the contrary opinion could not at all prevail to have her saved, and Lupus was sent accordingly. Nor did he make any delay in executing his errand, but he took the first opportunity to obey those that sent him, being desirous to be no way blamable in what was done for the advantage of the people. So he went to the palace, and found Cæsonia, Caius' wife, lying by her husband's dead body, which also lay on the ground, and was destitute of all such things as the law allows to the dead, and herself besmeared all over with the blood of her husband's wounds, and in the greatest affliction, her daughter lying by her side also: and nothing else was heard from her in these circumstances but blaming Caius for not having attended to what she had so often told him beforehand; which words of hers were taken in two senses even at that time, and are now esteemed equally ambiguous by those that hear them, and are still interpreted according to the different inclinations of people. For some said that the words denoted, that she had advised him to leave off his mad behaviour and cruelty to the citizens, and to govern the public with moderation and virtue, lest he should perish by their using him as he had used them. Others said, as certain words had passed concerning the conspirators, that she desired Caius to make no delay, but immediately to put them all to death, and that whether they were guilty or not, and so he would be out of fear of any danger; and that this was what she now blamed him for, for being too tender in the matter when she had advised him to slay them all. And this was what Cæsonia said, and what the opinions of men were about it. But when she saw Lupus approach, she showed him Caius' dead body, and begged him to come near with lamentation and tears; and when she noticed that Lupus seemed unsettled in his purpose, and approached her as if to do something disagreeable to himself, she was well aware for what purpose he came, and bared her throat very readily, bewailing her case like people who utterly despair of their life, and bidding him not delay to end the tragedy they had resolved upon relating to her. So she boldly received her death at the hand of Lupus, as did her daughter after her. Then Lupus made haste to inform Chærea of what he had done.

§ 5. Such was the end of Caius, after he had reigned four years all but four months. Even before he came to be emperor he was ill-natured, and one that had arrived at the utmost pitch of wickedness; a slave to pleasure, and a lover of calumny; greatly afraid of what was formidable, and of a very murderous disposition, where he durst show it. He enjoyed his power to this only purpose, to injure those that least deserved it with unreasonable arrogance, and he got his wealth by murder and injustice. He laboured to appear above the gods and the laws, but was a slave to the praises of the populace; and whatever the laws determined to be shameful, and censured, that he esteemed more honourable than virtue. He was unmindful of his friends, however intimate, and though they were persons of the highest character; and, if he was once angry at any of them, he would inflict punishment upon them for the most trifling matters, and esteemed every man that endeavoured to lead a virtuous life his enemy. And whatever he commanded, he would admit of no contradiction to his desires, so it was that he committed incest with his own sister,<sup>1</sup> on which account chiefly it was that a bitter hatred first sprang up against him among the citizens, that sort of incest not having been known for a long time, and so it provoked men to distrust and hate him that was guilty of it. As for any great or royal work that he ever did, which might be for the advantage of his contemporaries or posterity, nobody could name any such, except the haven that he made about Rhegium<sup>2</sup> and Sicily, for the ships that brought corn from Egypt; which was indeed indisputably a very great work in itself, and of very great advantage for navigation. Yet this work was not brought to perfection by him, but was left only half finished because of his want of application to it; the reason was that he dissipated his energy on useless matters, and as he spent his money upon pleasures such as tended to no one's benefit but his own, he could not be liberal in things that were undeniably of greater consequence. In other respects he was an excellent orator, and thoroughly acquainted with the Greek tongue, as well as with his own mother-tongue, the Latin. He was also able, off-hand and readily, to give answers to compositions made by others of considerable length. He was also more skilful in persuading others in important cases than any one else in consequence of a natural facility, which had been improved by much exercise and painstaking. For as he was the grandson<sup>3</sup> of the brother of Tiberius, whose successor he was, this was a strong compulsion to his prosecution of learning, because Tiberius was eminent for his success in learning, and Caius aspired after the like glory for eloquence, being induced thereto by the letters of his kinsman and emperor. He was also foremost of the citizens of his own age, but the advantages he received from his learning did not counterbalance the mischief he brought upon himself by his license; so difficult is it for those to get the virtue of self-control who have irresponsible freedom of action. At first he got himself such friends as were in all respects most worthy, and was greatly beloved by them, in consequence of his learning and emulating the glory of the best men; until from his excessive injuries to them, they laid aside the kindness they had for him, and began to hate him, from which hatred came the plot which they raised against him, in which he perished.]

CHAP. III.

How Claudius was seized, and brought out of his House, and taken to the Camp, and how the Senate sent an Embassy to him.

§ 1.

NOW Claudius, as I said before, had taken a different road to Caius, and, as the royal family were greatly put out by the sad murder of the emperor, he was in great anxiety how to save himself, and was found to have hidden himself in a certain narrow passage, though he had no reason for suspicion of danger besides the dignity of his birth. For he lived privately and behaved himself with moderation, and was contented with his present fortune, applying himself to learning, and especially to that of the Greeks, and holding himself entirely aloof from every thing that might bring trouble. But as at this time the multitude were in consternation, and the whole palace was full of the fury of the soldiers, and the emperor's body-guards seemed in the same panic and confusion as private persons, the band called prætorian, which was the purest part of the army, held a consultation as to what was to be done at this juncture. Now all those that were present at this consultation, had little regard to the punishment Caius had suffered, because he justly deserved his fate, but rather considered their own fortunes, how they might take the best care of themselves, especially as the Germans were busy in punishing the murderers of Caius, rather to gratify their own savage temper, than for the good of the public. All these things troubled Claudius, who was afraid for his own safety, especially when he saw the heads of Asprenas and his fellow-conspirators carried about. He stood in a certain place ascended by a few steps, where he had retired in the dark. And when Gratus, who was one of the soldiers that belonged to the palace, saw him, but could not well tell by his countenance who he was, because it was dark, though he could see that it was some one who was hiding, he went nearer to him, and when Claudius desired that he would retire, he discovered who he was, and said to his followers, "This is a Germanicus; <sup>1</sup> come, let us choose him for our emperor." And when Claudius saw that they were preparing to take him away by force, and was afraid they would kill him, as they had killed Caius, he besought them to spare him, reminding them how quietly he had demeaned himself, and that he was unacquainted with all that had been done. Thereupon Gratus smiled upon him, and took him by the right hand, and said, "Leave off these humble thoughts of saving yourself, while you ought to have greater thoughts, even of obtaining the empire, which the gods, in their concern for the world, have committed to your virtue by taking Caius out of the way. Go, therefore, and take the throne of your ancestors." So he lifted him up and carried him, because he was unable to walk, such was his mingled dread and joy at what Gratus said to him.

§ 2. Now there were already gathered round Gratus a great number of the body-guards, and when they saw Claudius carried off, they looked sad, supposing that he was being dragged to execution for the mischief that had been lately done, though he was a man who had never meddled with public affairs all his life long, and had been in great danger during the reign of Caius; and some of them thought it well that the consuls should take cognizance of the matter. And, as more and more of the soldiers got together, the crowd gave way, and Claudius could hardly go forward from weakness of body, and those who carried his litter, when they heard of his being carried off, ran away and saved themselves, despairing of their lord's safety. But when they were come into the large court of the palace (which, as the report goes about it, was the first part inhabited in the city of Rome), and had just got to the public treasury, many more soldiers flocked to him, being glad to see Claudius' face, and thought it exceeding right to make him emperor, on account of their kindness for Germanicus, who was his brother, and had left behind him a great reputation among all that were acquainted with him. They reflected also on the covetousness of the leading men of the senate, and what great errors they had been guilty of formerly, when they were in power. They also considered the difficulty of the situation, as also what danger they would be in, if the government should devolve upon any individual but Claudius, who would take it as their grant and favour, and would be grateful for the benefit they had done him, and make them a sufficient recompense for the same.

§ 3. These were the discourses the soldiers had with one another and by themselves, and they communicated them to all such as came near them. And they, on hearing it, willingly embraced the proposal, and they carried Claudius to the camp, crowding round him as his guard, and bearing him aloft in a litter, that their impatience might not be thwarted. As to the populace and senate they differed in their opinions. The latter were very desirous to recover their former dignity, and anxious to get rid of the slavery that had been imposed on them by the insolence of their tyrants, now that they had an opportunity afforded them; but the people, who were envious of them, and knew that the emperors were able to curb their arrogance, and were a protection to themselves, were very glad that Claudius had been carried off by the army, and thought that if he were made emperor, he would prevent such a civil war as there was in the days of Pompey.

But when the senate knew that Claudius had been taken to the camp by the soldiers, they sent to him those of their body who had the best character for virtue, to recommend him to do nothing to gain power by violence, but to submit to the senate, as he was either already, or would hereafter be, one of their body, which consisted of so many persons, and to submit to the law in all that related to public order, and to remember how greatly previous tyrants had afflicted their state, and what dangers both he and they had run under Caius, for they said he ought not to hate the heavy burden of tyranny, when the injury was done by others, and yet be himself willing to play havock with his country. They added that if he would hearken to them, and show that his determination was to live quietly and virtuously as before, he would have the greatest honours decreed to him that a free people could bestow, and by subjecting himself in part to the law, would obtain this commendation, that he acted like a man of virtue both as a ruler and subject; but if he would act recklessly, and learn no wisdom by Caius' death, they would not permit it. For a great section of the army (they added) sided with them, and they had plenty of weapons, and a great number of slaves to make use of: and hope played a great part in such cases, and fortune and the gods never assisted any but those that exerted themselves with virtue and goodness, who could only be such as fought for the liberty of their country.

§ 4. Such was the speech that the envoys, Veranius and Brochus, who were both tribunes of the people, made to Claudius, and falling down upon their knees, begged of him, that he would not bring the city into wars and misfortunes. But when they saw what a multitude of soldiers surrounded and guarded Claudius, and that the consuls were totally inadequate to cope with them, they added that, if he desired the empire, he should accept it as given by the senate, for he would be happier in it and take it under better auspices, if he did not seize it by violence, but accepted it from the good-will of those who offered it to him.

CHAP. IV.

What King Agrippa did for Claudius, and how Claudius, when he had become Emperor, commanded the Murderers of Caius to be slain.

§ 1.

NOW Claudius, though he was not blind to the presumption of this message from the senate, yet behaved himself for the present with moderation, as they advised. However, he recovered from his fright, being encouraged partly by the boldness of the soldiers, and partly by king Agrippa, who exhorted him not to let such an empire slip out of his hands, when it came thus spontaneously to him. King Agrippa acted also to Caius as became one who had been so much honoured by him; for he embraced Caius' body after he was dead, and laid it upon a bed, and laid it out as well as he could, and went to the body-guards, and told them that Caius was still alive, but bade them fetch surgeons, for he was very ill of his wounds. But when he learned that Claudius had been carried off by the soldiers, he pushed through the crowd to him, and when he found that he was in a condition of terror, and ready to yield to the senate, he encouraged him, and bade him stick to the empire. And when he had said this to Claudius, he returned home, and, upon the senate's sending for him, he anointed his head with ointment, as if he had just come from a festive party, and so went to them, and also asked the senators what Claudius had done. And when they told him the present state of affairs, and further asked his opinion on the whole matter, he at once told them that he was ready to lose his life for the honour of the senate, but desired them to consider what was for their advantage, without any regard to their personal desires. For those who grasped at government, stood in need of weapons, and soldiers to guard them, lest being unprepared they should fall into danger. And when the senate replied, that they could bring weapons and money in abundance, and that as to an army, part of it was already mustered together, and they could raise a larger one by giving the slaves their liberty, Agrippa made the following answer. "O senators! may you be able to do what you desire; but I will without any hesitation tell you my thoughts, because they tend to your preservation. Know, then, that the army which will fight on behalf of Claudius has been long trained in war, while our army will be no better than a mob and rabble, as it is composed of such as have been unexpectedly freed from slavery, and are without discipline; we shall therefore bring up against those who are skilful in war men who know not so much as how to draw their swords. My opinion therefore is, that we should send some persons to Claudius, to urge him to lay down the government, and I am ready to be one of your ambassadors."

§ 2. Upon this speech of Agrippa, the senate complied with him, and he was sent with others, and privately informed Claudius of the alarm of the senate, and advised him to answer them in a somewhat commanding strain, and as one invested with dignity and authority, So Claudius replied that he did not wonder the senate did not wish to have an emperor over them, because they had been harassed by the savageness of those who had formerly been at the head of affairs; but they should enjoy an equitable government and good times under him, for he would only be their ruler in name, but the authority should be common to all. And since he had passed through many and various scenes of life before their eyes, it would be well for them not to distrust him. The ambassadors, upon receiving this answer, were dismissed. And Claudius harangued the army which was gathered together, and made them swear that they would remain faithful to him, and gave the body-guards five thousand drachmæ apiece,<sup>1</sup> and a proportionable quantity to their captains, and promised to give the same to the rest of the armies wherever they were.

§ 3. And now the consuls convoked the senate to the temple of Jupiter Stator, while it was still night. But some of the senators concealed themselves in the city, being uncertain what to do on the hearing of this summons, and some of them retired to their estates in the country, foreseeing the issue of public affairs, and despairing of liberty, supposing it much better for them to be slaves without danger to themselves, and to live a lazy and inactive life, than, by trying to gain the glory of their forefathers, to hazard their own safety. So a hundred and no more met together, and as they were deliberating about the present posture of affairs, a sudden clamour was raised by the soldiers that were on their side, bidding the senate to choose an emperor, and not to ruin the state by setting up a multitude of rulers. Thus they fully declared themselves to be for giving the government not to all, but to one; but they gave the senate leave to look out for a person worthy to be set over them. And now the situation of the senate was much worse than before; because they had not only failed in the recovery of their vaunted liberty, but were afraid of Claudius also. Yet there were some of them that hankered after the chief power, both on account of the dignity of their families, and that accruing to them by their marriages. For Marcus Minucianus was illustrious, both from his own nobility, and from his having married Julia, the sister of Caius, and accordingly was very ready to claim the government, although the consuls discouraged him on one pretext or another. And Minucianus, who was one of Caius' murderers, restrained Valerius Asiaticus from thinking of such things. And indeed there would have been a prodigious slaughter, if those men who desired to be emperors had been permitted to set up themselves in opposition to Claudius. There were also a considerable number of gladiators, and of those soldiers who kept watch by night in the city, and of rowers who flocked to the camp; so that of those who claimed the empire, some gave up their pretensions to spare the city, and others from fear for their own safety.

§ 4. Now at first dawn of day Chærea, and those that were associated with him, went to the senate, and attempted to make speeches to the soldiers. However, the mass of the soldiers, when they saw that they were making signals for silence with their hands, and were going to begin to speak to them, grew tumultuous, and would not let them speak at all, because they all desired to be under the rule of one; and they demanded of the senate an emperor, for they would endure no longer delays. But the senate were in a fix about either their own governing, or how they should be governed, for the soldiers would not allow them to govern, and the murderers of Caius would not permit the soldiers to dictate to them. As affairs were in this posture, Chærea was not able to contain his anger at their demand for an emperor, and promised that he would give them a leader, if any one would bring him the word for the day from Eutyclus. Now this Eutyclus was charioteer of the green faction in the Circus at Rome,<sup>1</sup> and a great friend of Caius, who used to tire out the soldiers with building stables for his horses, and put them to ignominious labours. Chærea reproached them with this, and other similar things, and told them, he would bring them the head of Claudius, for it was monstrous after a madman to have a fool for emperor. But they were not moved with his words, but drew their swords, and took up their standards, and went to Claudius, to join in taking the oath of fidelity to him. So the senate were left without anybody to defend them, and the consuls had no more authority than private persons: and there was great consternation and dejection, men not knowing what would become of them, because Claudius was irritated by them; so they fell to reproaching one another, and repented of what they had done. At this juncture Sabinus, one of Caius' murderers, came forward and threatened to kill himself sooner than consent to make Claudius emperor, and see slavery returning upon them; and also rebuked Chærea for loving life, since he, who was first in his contempt of Caius, could think it good to live, now that (after all they had done) they found it impossible to recover their liberty. But Chærea said he had not changed his mind at all about killing himself, but he would sound the intentions of Claudius first.

§ 5. Such was the posture of affairs in the senate. But in the camp every body was pushing their way from all sides to pay their court to Claudius, and one of the consuls, Quintus Pomponius, was especially reproached by the soldiers for having exhorted the senate to recover their liberty, and they drew their swords, and rushed at him, and would have murdered him, if Claudius had not hindered them. For he snatched the consul out of the danger he was in, and set him by his side; but he did not receive those of the senate who had sided with Quintus in the like honourable manner; for some of them received blows, and were thrust away as they came to salute Claudius, and Aponius went away wounded, and all were in danger. Then king Agrippa went up to Claudius, and desired he would treat the senators more gently; for if any mischief should come to the senate, he would have no others over whom to rule. And Claudius listened to him, and called the senate together to the palace, and was carried there himself in his litter through the city, the soldiers escorting him not without injuring the multitude a good deal. And Chærea and Sabinus, two of Caius' murderers, went about openly, though Pollio, whom Claudius had a little before made captain of his bodyguards, had sent them a letter, forbidding them to appear in public. So Claudius, upon his reaching the palace, got his friends together, and desired their opinion as to Chærea. They said that the deed done seemed a glorious one, but they accused the doer of disloyalty, and thought it just to inflict condign punishment upon him, to discountenance such actions for the time to come. So Chærea was led out to execution, and Lupus and many other Romans with him. And it is reported that Chærea bore his fate nobly, as was evidenced not only by the firmness of his own behaviour under it, but by his reproach to Lupus, who fell into tears; for when Lupus had laid his garment aside and complained of the cold,<sup>1</sup> Chærea said that cold never hurt lupus [i.e. a wolf]. And as a great multitude followed to see the sight, when Chærea came to the place of execution, he asked the soldier who was to be their executioner whether the office was one he was used to, or whether this was the first time of his using his sword in that manner, and bade him fetch the very sword with which he himself had slain Caius. And he was happily killed at one stroke; but Lupus did not meet with such good fortune in going out of the world, as he was timid, and had many blows levelled at his neck, because he did not stretch it out boldly.

§ 6. Now, a few days after this, as the festival called the Parentalia<sup>1</sup> was just at hand, the Roman multitude made their usual offerings to their dead relatives, and put portions into the fire in honour of Chærea, and besought him to be propitious to them, and not angry with them for their ingratitude. Such was the end of Chærea. As for Sabinus, although Claudius not only set him at liberty, but gave him leave to retain his former command in the army, he thought it would be unjust in him to fail in good faith to his fellow-conspirators, so he fell upon his sword and killed himself, driving his sword up to the very hilt in the wound.

CHAP. V.

How Claudius restored to Agrippa his Grandfather's Kingdoms, and augmented his Dominions, and how he published an Edict in behalf of the Jews.

§ 1.

NOW, when Claudius had speedily got rid of all the soldiers whom he suspected, he published an edict, wherein he confirmed to Agrippa the kingdom which Caius had given him, and commended the king highly. He also added to it all the territory over which his grandfather Herod had reigned, that is, Judæa and Samaria: and this he restored to him as due to his family. As for Abila,<sup>2</sup> that had belonged to Lysanias, and all the country near Mount Libanus, he bestowed them upon him, as out of his own territory. He also made a league with Agrippa, confirmed by oaths, in the middle of the forum, in the city of Rome. He also took away from Antiochus the kingdom which he had, but gave him a portion of Cilicia and Com-magene.<sup>1</sup> He also set at liberty Alexander Lysimachus, the Alabarch, who had been his old friend, and steward to his mother Antonia, but had been imprisoned by the anger of Caius. Now Marcus, Alexander's son, had married Berenice, the daughter of Agrippa; and when Marcus died, who had married her when she was a virgin, Agrippa gave her in marriage to his brother Herod, and begged of Claudius the kingdom of Chalcis<sup>2</sup> for him.

§ 2. Now, about this time, there was strife between the Jews and Greeks in the city of Alexandria. For when Caius was dead the nation of the Jews, which had been very much oppressed under his reign, and very badly treated by the people of Alexandria, recovered courage and immediately took up arms. And Claudius sent an order to the governor of Egypt to quiet the tumult. He also sent an edict, at the requests of king Agrippa and king Herod, both to Alexandria and to Syria, whose contents were as follows. "Tiberius Claudius Cæsar, Augustus, Germanicus, Pontifex Maximus, and Tribune of the people, ordains as follows. Since I have long known that the Jews of Alexandria, called Alexandrians, have been joint colonists from the earliest times with the Alexandrians, and have obtained from their kings equal privileges with them, as is evident from the public records that are in their possession, and the edicts, and since, after Alexandria was made part of our empire by Augustus, their rights and privileges have been preserved by those who have at divers times been sent there as governors, and since no disputes were raised about those rights and privileges, when Aquila was governor of Alexandria, and since, when the Jewish ethnarch was dead, Augustus did not prohibit making ethnarchs, wishing that all nations subject to the Romans should continue in the observance of their own customs, and not be forced to transgress their country's religion; and since, in the reign of Caius, the Alexandrians became excited against the Jews that were among them, and Caius, from his great madness and want of understanding, oppressed the nation of the Jews, because they would not transgress their national worship, and call him a god, I decree that the nation of the Jews be not deprived of their rights and privileges on account of the madness of Caius, but that those rights and privileges which they formerly enjoyed, be preserved to them, and that they may continue in their customs. And I charge both parties to take very great care that no trouble arises after the promulgation of this edict."

§ 3. Such were the contents of the edict on behalf of the Jews that was sent to Alexandria. But the edict that was sent to the rest of the world was as follows. "Tiberius Claudius Cæsar, Augustus, Germanicus, Pontifex Maximus, Tribune of the people, chosen Consul the second time, ordains as follows. Upon the petition of king Agrippa and king Herod, who are persons very dear to me, that I would grant the same rights and privileges to be preserved to the Jews throughout all the Roman empire, as I have granted to the Jews of Alexandria, I very willingly comply therewith, not only to gratify my petitioners, but also judging those Jews for whom I have been petitioned worthy of such a favour, on account of their fidelity and friendship to the Romans. I think it also very just that no Greek city should be deprived of such rights and privileges, since they were preserved to them under the great Augustus. It is therefore right to permit the Jews throughout all our empire to keep their ancient customs without let or hindrance. And I do charge them also to use this my kindness to them with moderation, and not to show contempt at the superstitious observances of other nations, but to observe their own laws only. And I will that the rulers of cities and colonies and municipal towns, both within and without Italy, and kings and governors by their ambassadors, post up this decree publicly for full thirty days, in a place<sup>1</sup> where it may plainly be read from the ground."

CHAP. VI.

What was done by Agrippa at Jerusalem, when he had returned to Judæa : and what Petronius wrote in behalf of the Jews to the Inhabitants of Doris.

§ 1.

NOW Claudius Cæsar showed by these decrees, which were sent to Alexandria and to all the world, what opinion he had of the Jews. And he soon sent Agrippa away to administer his kingdom, advanced as he was to more illustrious dignity than before, and sent letters to the governors and procurators of the provinces to treat him with attention. And he returned in haste, as it was likely he would, now he returned in greater prosperity than before. He also went to Jerusalem, and offered thank-offerings, and omitted nothing that the law required. So he ordered that many of the Nazarites should have their heads shorn, and as for the golden chain which had been given him by Caius, of the same weight as the iron chain wherewith his royal hands had been bound, he hung it up within the temple precincts above the treasury, as a memorial of his sad fortune, and a testimony of his change for the better, that it might be a proof how the greatest prosperity may have a fall sometimes, and that God can raise up what is fallen down. For this chain thus dedicated reminded all men, that king Agrippa had once been bound with a chain for a small matter, but had recovered his former rank again, and soon afterwards had got out of his bonds, and was advanced to be a more illustrious king than he was before. Whence men may understand that all that partake of human nature, however great, may fall; and that those that fall may gain their former illustrious rank again.

§ 2. And when Agrippa had discharged all his religious duties to God, he removed Theophilus, the son of Ananus, Hudson here tells us, from the great Selden, that it used to be thus represented at the bottom of their edicts by the initial letters only U. D. P. R. L. P. Unde De Plano Recte Legi Possit. "Where it may plainly be read from the ground."—W.

from the high-priesthood, and bestowed his office on Simon (the son of Boethus) also called Cantheras. This Simon had two brothers, and a sister who married king Herod, as I have related before. Simon, then, had the high-priesthood with his brothers, and with his father, in like manner as the three sons of Simon, the son of Onias, had it formerly under the rule of the Macedonians, as I have related in a former book.

§ 3. When the king had settled the high-priesthood in this manner, he returned the kindness which the inhabitants of Jerusalem had shown him; for he released them from the tax upon every house, thinking it a good thing to requite the affections of those that loved him. He also made Silas, who had shared with him in many of his troubles, the general of his forces. But very soon afterwards the young men of Doris,<sup>1</sup> preferring audacity to piety, and being naturally bold and insolent, carried a statue of the emperor into a synagogue of the Jews, and erected it there. This action of theirs greatly provoked Agrippa; for it plainly tended to the dissolution of the laws of his country. So he went without delay to Publius Petronius, who was then governor of Syria, and accused the people of Doris. Nor did he less resent what was done than did Agrippa; for he judged it a piece of impiety to transgress the laws. So he wrote the following letter to the people of Doris, in angry strain. "Publius Petronius, the lieutenant of Tiberius Claudius Cæsar, Augustus, Germanicus, to the magistrates of Doris, ordains as follows. Since some of you have had the boldness, or madness rather (after the edict of Claudius Cæsar, Augustus, Germanicus, was published, permitting the Jews to observe the laws of their country,) not to obey the same, but have acted in entire opposition thereto, forbidding the Jews to assemble together in the synagogue, and setting up the emperor's statue therein, and thereby have offended not only the Jews, but also the emperor himself, whose statue is more properly placed in his own temple than in a foreign one, and that too in a place of assembling together, seeing that it is but a part of natural justice, that everyone should have power over the places belonging to themselves, according to the decree of the emperor (to say nothing of my own decree, which it would be ridiculous to mention after the emperor's edict, which gives the Jews leave to make use of their own customs, and also orders that they are to enjoy the same rights of citizens as the Greeks themselves); I therefore order Proculus Vitellius, the centurion, to bring those men before me, who, contrary to the emperor's edict, have been so insolent as to do this thing, (at which the men, who appear to be of principal reputation among them, are indignant also themselves, and allege that it was not done with their consent, but by the violence of the multitude,) to give account of what has been done. I also advise the principal magistrates, unless they wish to have this outrage supposed to have been done with their consent, to point out to the centurion the guilty persons, and to take care that no handle be thence taken for raising a sedition or quarrel, which those who encourage such doings seem to me to hunt after; for both I myself, and king Agrippa, whom I hold in the highest honour, are more anxious about nothing than that the nation of the Jews may have no opportunity given them of gathering together and becoming tumultuous under the pretext of defending themselves. And that what the emperor has determined about the whole matter may be more publicly known, I have subjoined the edicts which he has lately caused to be published at Alexandria, and which, although they may be well known to all, Agrippa, for whom I have the highest esteem, read nevertheless at that time before my tribunal, and pleaded that the Jews ought not to be deprived of the benefits which the emperor had granted them. I therefore charge you, that you do not, for the time to come, seek for any occasion of sedition or disturbance, but that everybody be allowed to follow their own religious customs."

§ 4. Thus did Petronius make provision that such lawlessness might be corrected, and that no such thing might be attempted afterwards against the Jews. And now king Agrippa took the high-priesthood away from Simon Cantheras, and was for putting Jonathan, the son of Ananus, back into it again, and owned that he was more worthy of the dignity. But it did not seem to him desirable to resume so great a dignity. So he refused it, and said, "O king! I rejoice in the honour you show me, and take it kindly that you are inclined to give me such a dignity, though God has judged that I am not at all worthy of the high-priesthood. I am satisfied with having once put on the sacred garments; for I put them on then in a more holy manner, than I should now resume them. But if you desire that a person more worthy than myself should have this honour, give me leave to name such a one to you. I have a brother that is pure from all sin against God, and of all offences against yourself; I recommend him to you, as one that is fit for this dignity." And the king was pleased with these words of his, and approved of the advice of Jonathan, and bestowed the high-priesthood upon his brother Matthias. And not long after Marsus succeeded Petronius as governor of Syria.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning Silas, and why King Agrippa was angry with him. How Agrippa began to surround Jerusalem with a wall; and what Benefits he bestowed on the Inhabitants of Berytus.

§ I.

NOW Silas, the general of the king's army, because he had been faithful to him in all his misfortunes, and had never declined sharing with him in any of his dangers, but had often undertaken the most perilous services for him, was full of assurance, and thought he might expect a sort of equality with the king, because of the constant friendship he had shown him. Accordingly he would not sit lower than the king at table, and used similar freedom in all his intercourse with him, and became troublesome to the king, when they were merry together, by extolling himself beyond measure, and by often reminding the king of the misfortunes he had undergone, that he might bring up his own faithfulness to him in those days; and he was continually harping upon this string, what he had gone through for him. The repetition of this so frequently seemed a reproach to the king, insomuch that he took this uncontrolled liberty of speech very ill at his hands. For the bringing up times when men have been under a cloud is by no means agreeable to them; and he is a very silly man, who is perpetually relating to a person the good services he has done him. At last, therefore, Silas so thoroughly provoked the king's indignation, that he acted rather from passion than reason, and not only turned Silas out of his place as general of his army, but sent him in bonds into his own country. But the edge of his anger wore off in time, and made room for more just reasonings as to his judgment about the man, and he considered how many labours he had undergone for his sake. So when Agrippa kept his birthday, and all his subjects partook of the mirth, he sent for Silas straightway to be his guest. But as he was a very frank man, he thought he had now a very just handle given him for his anger, which he could not conceal from those who came to fetch him, but said to them, "What honour is this the king invites me to, which will soon be over? for the king has not let me keep my first rewards for the good-will I bore him, but has plundered and ill-treated me. Does he think that I can leave off that liberty of speech, which, upon the consciousness of my deserts, I shall use more loudly than before, and shall relate how many dreadful things I have delivered him from, how many labours I have undergone for him, whereby I procured for him safety and honour, as a reward for which I have borne the hardship of bonds and a dark prison. I shall never forget these things; nay, perhaps my very soul, when it is departed out of the body, will not forget the glorious actions I did on his account." This was what he vociferated, and ordered the messengers to repeat to the king. So he perceived that Silas was incurable in his folly, and suffered him to continue in prison.

§ 2. As for the walls of Jerusalem, that looked to the new city, he repaired them at the public expense, and made them wider in breadth, and higher in altitude, and would have made them too strong for all human power to demolish, had not Marsus, the governor of Syria, informed Claudius Cæsar by letter of what he was doing. And as Claudius had some suspicion he meant innovation, he ordered Agrippa to leave off the building of those walls at once; and he thought it inexpedient to disobey.

§ 3. Now king Agrippa was by nature very liberal in his gifts, and very ambitious to oblige people with large donations, and to get celebrity by his great expenditure, as he took delight in giving, and rejoiced in living with a good reputation, being very unlike the Herod who reigned before him. For that Herod was ill-natured, and severe in his punishments, and had no mercy on those that he hated, and it is admitted that he was more friendly to the Greeks than to the Jews; for he adorned foreign cities with large grants of money, and baths, and theatres; nay, in some of those places he erected temples, and in others porticoes, but he did not vouchsafe to raise one of the least edifices in any Jewish city, or make them any donation that was worth mentioning. But Agrippa's temper was mild, and he was equally liberal to all men. He was humane to foreigners, and displayed to them his munificence, while to his own countrymen he was equally kind, but more sympathetic. Accordingly, he loved to live continually at Jerusalem, and was strict in the observance of the laws of his country. He therefore kept himself entirely pure, nor did any day pass over his head without its appointed sacrifice.

§ 4. Notwithstanding, a certain man of the Jewish nation at Jerusalem, called Simon, who was thought to be skilled in the knowledge of the law, called the multitude together in assembly, while the king was absent at Cæsarea, and had the insolence to accuse him of not living holily, and said he might justly be excluded from entrance into the temple, since it belonged only to native Jews. And the captain of the city informed Agrippa by letter that Simon had said this to the people. So the king sent for him, and, as he was sitting in the theatre at the time, he bade him sit down by him, and said to him in a low and gentle voice, "What is there done here that is contrary to the law?" But he had nothing to say for himself, and begged for pardon. And the king was more easily reconciled to him than one would have imagined, as he esteemed mildness a better quality in a king than anger, and knew that moderation is more becoming in great men than passion. So he gave Simon a present, and dismissed him.

§ 5. Now, Agrippa was a great builder in many places, but paid peculiar regard to the people of Berytus.<sup>1</sup> For he erected a theatre for them, superior to many both in sumptuousness and elegance, as also an amphitheatre built at great expense, and besides these he built them baths and porticoes, and spared no cost in any of his edifices to render them both handsome and large. He also spent a great deal upon their dedication, and exhibited shows in the theatre, and brought there musicians of all sorts, and such as made delightful music in great variety. He also showed his magnificence in the amphitheatre by a great number of gladiators, and there too he exhibited fighting on a large scale to please the spectators, indeed he sent no fewer than seven hundred men to fight with seven hundred other men, using all the malefactors he had for this purpose, that both they might receive punishment, and that this operation of war might give delight in peace. Thus he destroyed all these criminals at once.

§ 1.

WHEN Agrippa had completed what I have just stated at Berytus, he removed to Tiberias,<sup>2</sup> a city in Galilee. Now he was held in great esteem by other kings. Accordingly, there came to him Antiochus, king of Commagene,<sup>3</sup> and Sampsigeramus, king of Emesa,<sup>4</sup> and Cotys, who was king of Lesser Armenia, and Polemo, who was king of Pontus,<sup>5</sup> as also Herod his brother, who was king of Chalcis.<sup>6</sup> All these he treated with agreeable entertainments and in an obliging manner, and so as to exhibit the greatness of his mind, and to appear worthy of the respect which these kings paid to him, by thus coming to see him. However, while these kings stayed with him, Marsus the governor of Syria came to visit him. And Agrippa, to show the respect that was due to the Romans, went out of the city as far as seven furlongs to meet him. But this proved to be the beginning of a difference between him and Marsus; for Agrippa took with him in his chariot those other kings seated with him. And Marsus was suspicious what the meaning could be of so great a friendship of these kings with one another, and did not think so close an agreement of so many kings for the benefit of the Romans. He therefore sent some of his friends to each of them, and enjoined them to go to their own countries without delay. This was very ill taken by Agrippa, who after that became Marsus' enemy. And he took the high-priesthood away from Matthias, and made Elionæus, the son of Cantheras, high priest in his stead.

§ 2. Now, when Agrippa had reigned three years over all Judæa, he went to the city of Cæsarea,<sup>1</sup> which was formerly called Strato's Tower; and there he exhibited shows in honour of Claudius Cæsar, upon his being informed that this festival was one instituted for his safety. At this festival a great multitude assembled together of the principal persons, and such as were of dignity throughout the province. On the second day of the shows Agrippa put on a garment made wholly of silver, and of a contexture truly wonderful, and came into the theatre at daybreak; at which time the silver of his garment being illumined by the early rays of the sun's beams upon it, glittered in a surprising manner, and was so resplendent as to inspire fear and trembling in those that looked intently upon him. And straightway his flatterers cried out, one from one place, and another from another, (though not really for his good,) that "he was a god;" and they added, "Be thou merciful to us; for although we have hitherto revered thee only as a man, yet do we henceforth own thee as superior to mortal nature." Upon this the king did neither rebuke them, nor reject their impious flattery. But soon afterwards he looked up, and saw an owl sitting on a certain rope over his head, and immediately understood that this bird was the messenger of ill tidings, as it had once been the messenger of good tidings, and felt heart-piercing grief. A severe pain also seized his belly, and began in a most violent manner. He therefore jumped up from his seat and said to his friends, "I whom ye call a god, am now commanded to depart this life; fate thus reproving the lying words you just now said to me; and I, who was by you called immortal, am now hurried off to death. But I am bound to accept my destiny, as it pleases God; for I have lived no paltry life, but in a splendid and happy manner." When he had said this, his pain became intense. So he was carried quickly into the palace, and the rumour went abroad every where, that he would certainly die soon. And the multitude at once sat in sackcloth, with their wives and children, according to the law of their country, and besought God for the king's recovery; and all places were full of mourning and lamentation. Now the king rested in a high chamber, and as he saw them below lying prostrate on the ground, he could not himself forbear weeping. And when he had been quite worn out by the pain in his belly for five days, he departed this life, being in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and in the seventh year of his reign; for he reigned four years under Caius Cæsar; three of them over Philip's tetrarchy only, but in the fourth he had that of Herod added to it; and he reigned also three years under the reign of Claudius Cæsar, during which time he reigned over the forementioned countries, and also had Judæa and Samaria and Cæsarea added to them. The revenues that he received out of them were very great, being no less than twelve millions of drachmæ.<sup>1</sup> However, he borrowed great sums from others; for he was so very liberal that his expenses exceeded his income, and his generosity was boundless.

§ 3. But before the multitude knew of Agrippa's having expired, Herod the king of Chalcis, and Helcias the commander and friend of the king, sent Aristo, one of the king's most faithful servants, and slew Silas (who was their enemy), as if it had been done by the king's own command.

<sup>1</sup> This sum, which is equal to £425,000 sterling, was Agrippa the Great's yearly income, or about three quarters of his grandfather Herod's income; he having abated the tax upon houses at Jerusalem, and not being so tyrannical as Herod had been to the Jews.—W.

CHAP. IX.

What happened after the Death of Agrippa; and how Claudius, on account of the Youth and Unskilfulness of Agrippa Junior, sent Cuspius Fadus to be Governor of Judæa, and of the entire Kingdom of Agrippa.

§ 1.

THUS did king Agrippa depart this life. But he left behind him a son Agrippa, a youth in the seventeenth year of his age, and three daughters; one of whom, Berenice, was married to Herod her father's brother, and was sixteen years old; the other two, Mariamne and Drusilla, were still virgins, Mariamne was ten years old, and Drusilla six. Now these daughters had been betrothed by their father, Mariamne to Julius Archelaus, the son of Chelcias, and Drusilla to Epiphanes, the son of Antiochus the king of Commagene. Now when it was known that Agrippa had departed this life, the inhabitants of Cæsarea and of Sebaste<sup>1</sup> forgot the kindnesses he had bestowed on them, and acted the part of the bitterest enemies. For they cast such reproaches upon the deceased as were not fit to be spoken, and as many of them as were then soldiers (who were a great number), went to his house, and carried off the statues<sup>2</sup> of the king's daughters, and with one accord carried them into the brothels, and, when they had set them on the roofs of those houses, abused them to the utmost of their power, and did such things to them as are too indecent to be related. They also reclined in public places and celebrated general feastings, with garlands on their heads, and anointed themselves, pouring out libations to Charon, and drinking to one another for joy that the king had expired. And they were not only unmindful of Agrippa, who had lavishly extended his liberality to them, but of his grandfather Herod also, who had himself rebuilt their cities, and had raised them havens and temples at vast expense.

§ 2. Now Agrippa, the son of the deceased, was at Rome at this time, being brought up with Claudius Cæsar. And when the emperor heard that Agrippa was dead, and that the inhabitants of Sebaste and Cæsarea had acted so insolently to his memory, he was sorry for the death of Agrippa, and was displeased with the ingratitude of those cities. He was therefore disposed to send Agrippa Junior away at once to succeed his father in the kingdom, and wished to make good his oaths. But those freedmen and friends of his, who had the greatest influence with him, tried to dissuade him from it, and said that it was a dangerous experiment to permit so large a kingdom to come into the hands of so very young a man, and one hardly yet arrived at years of discretion, who would not be able to take sufficient care of its administration, for the weight of a kingdom was heavy enough to a grown man. And the emperor thought what they said reasonable. So he sent out Cuspius Fadus to be governor of Judæa, and of the entire kingdom of Agrippa, and paid that respect to the deceased, not to introduce Marsus, who had been at variance with him, into his kingdom. But he determined before everything to give injunctions to Fadus to chastise the inhabitants of Cæsarea and Sebaste for the insults they had offered to the memory of him that was deceased, and their licentious conduct to his daughters that were still alive; and to remove the body of soldiers that were at Cæsarea and Sebaste, and the five cohorts, to Pontus, that they might do military duty there, and to choose an equal number of soldiers out of the Roman legions that were in Syria, to supply their place. However those that had such orders were not actually removed; for by sending messengers to Claudius, they mollified him, and got leave to stay in Judæa still; and these were the very men that became the source of very great calamities to the Jews in after times, and sowed the seeds of the war which began under Florus. And so, when Vespasian had subdued the country, he removed them out of the province, as I shall relate hereafter.

A Quarrel between the Philadelphians and the Jews ; also concerning the Vestments of the High Priest.

§ 1.

UPON the death of king Agrippa, which I related in the previous book, Claudius Cæsar sent Cassius Longinus as successor to Marsus, out of regard to the memory of king Agrippa, who had often desired of him by letters, while he was alive, that he would not suffer Marsus to be any longer governor of Syria. But Fadus, as soon as he was come into Judæa to administer affairs, found a quarrel going on between the Jews that dwelt in Peræa<sup>1</sup> and the people of Philadelphia,<sup>2</sup> about their borders, at a village called Mia,<sup>3</sup> that was filled with men of war ; for the Jews of Peræa had taken up arms without the consent of their principal men, and had slain many of the Philadelphians. When Fadus was informed of this, it provoked him very much that they had not left the decision of the matter to him, if they thought the Philadelphians had done them any wrong, but had rashly taken up arms against them. So he seized upon three of their principal men, who were also the causes of this strife, and ordered them to be bound, and afterwards had one of them slain, whose name was Annibas, and banished the other two, Amaramus and Eleazar. Tholomæus also, the arch robber, was, in a little time, brought to him bound, and slain, but not till he had done a great deal of mischief to Idumæa and the Arabians. And indeed all Judæa was cleared of robberies from that time by the care and forethought of Fadus. He also at this time sent for the high priests and principal persons in Jerusalem by command of the emperor, and bade them place the long garment, and the sacred vestment, which it was customary for only the high priest to wear, in the fortress of Antonia,<sup>1</sup> that it might be under the power of the Romans, as it had been formerly. Now the Jews durst not contradict what he said, but nevertheless begged Fadus and Longinus (which last had come to Jerusalem with a great army, from fear that the injunctions of Fadus would force the Jews to rebel,) first to give them leave to send ambassadors to the emperor, to petition him that they might have the holy vestments in their own power, and next to wait till they knew what answer Claudius would give to their request. And they replied that they would give them leave to send their ambassadors, provided they would give them their sons as hostages. And when they had agreed to do so and had given them the hostages they desired, the ambassadors were sent accordingly. And when, upon their coming to Rome, Agrippa Junior, the son of the deceased, knew of the reason why they came (for he dwelt with Claudius Cæsar, as I said before,) he besought the emperor to grant the Jews their request about the holy vestment, and to send a message to Fadus accordingly.

§ 2. Thereupon Claudius summoned the ambassadors, and told them he granted their request, and bade them return their thanks to Agrippa for this favour which had been bestowed on them upon his entreaty. And, besides these answers of his, he sent the following letter. "Claudius Cæsar, Germanicus, tribune of the people the fifth time, and consul designate the fourth time, and imperator the tenth time, the father of his country, to the magistrates, senate, and people, and whole nation of the Jews, greeting. Upon the presentation of your ambassadors to me by my friend Agrippa (whom I have brought up, and have now with me, and who is a person of very great piety), who are come to give me thanks for the care I have taken of your nation, and have entreated me in an earnest and solemn manner, that they may have the holy vestment and the crown in their own power, I grant their request, as that excellent person Vitellius, who is very dear to me, did before me. And I have complied with your desire, first in regard to my own piety and because I would have every one worship God according to the laws of their own country; and next because I know I shall hereby gratify king Herod and Aristobulus Junior, whose piety to me and good-will to you I am well acquainted with, and for whom I have the greatest friendship, as I highly esteem them and value them. I have also written about these affairs to Cuspius Fadus my procurator. The carriers of the letter are Cornelius the son of Cero, Trypho the son of Theudio, Dorotheus the son of Nathanael, and John the son of John. Dated the fourth day before the Calends of July, Rufus and Pompeius Silvanus being consuls."

§ 3. Herod also, the brother of the deceased Agrippa, who was at this time possessed of the royal authority over Chalcis, petitioned Claudius Cæsar for authority over the temple, and the sacred money, and the choice of the high priests, and obtained all that he petitioned for; so that after this time that authority continued<sup>1</sup> with all his descendants till the end of the war. Accordingly, Herod removed the high priest called Cantheras, and bestowed that dignity on his successor Joseph, the son of Comei.

CHAP. II.

How Helena, Queen of Adiabene, and her son Izates, embraced the Jewish Religion; and how Helena supplied the Poor with Corn when there was a great Famine at Jerusalem.

§ 1.

ABOUT this time Helena, queen of Adiabene,<sup>2</sup> and her son Izates, changed their course of life, and embraced the Jewish customs, for the following reason. Monobazus,

the king of Adiabene, who had also the name of Bazæus, fell in love with his sister Helena, and took her to be his wife, and got her with child. And as he was in bed with her one night, having laid his hand upon his wife's belly, he fell asleep, and seemed to hear a voice bidding him take his hand off his wife's belly, and not hurt the infant that was therein, which, by God's providence, would be safely born, and have a happy end. This voice troubled him, and he woke immediately, and told the matter to his wife, and when his son was born, he called him Izates. He had also had Monobazus, an elder son, by Helena, and other sons by other wives. But he openly placed all his affections on this his only begotten<sup>1</sup> son Izates, which was the origin of the envy of his brothers, who on this account hated him more and more, and all grieved that their father should prefer Izates to them. Now although their father was well aware of this, yet did he forgive them, as not feeling envy from an evil disposition, but from the desire each of them had to be beloved by their father. However, he sent Izates with many presents to Abennerigus, the king of Charax-Spasini,<sup>2</sup> because of the great dread he was in for him, lest he should come to some misfortune from the hatred of his brothers, and he committed his son's safety to him. And Abennerigus gladly received the young man, and had a great affection for him, and married him to his own daughter, whose name was Symacho: he also bestowed a province upon him, from which he might receive large revenues.

§ 2. But when Monobazus was grown old, and saw that he had but a little time to live, he wished to see his son before he died. So he sent for him, and embraced him in the most affectionate manner, and bestowed on him the region called Carræ;<sup>3</sup> it was a soil that bore amomum in great plenty: there are also in it the remains of the ark, wherein it is related that Noah escaped the deluge, which are still shown to such as desire to see them.<sup>1</sup> And Izates abode in that region until his father's death. And the very day that Monobazus died, queen Helena sent for all the grandees and satraps of the kingdom, and for those in command of the forces; and when they were come, she made the following speech to them. "I believe you are not ignorant that my husband desired Izates to succeed him in the kingdom, and thought him worthy to do so. However, I wait your determination; for happy is he who receives a kingdom not from a single person only, but from the willingness of many." She said this in order to try to discover the sentiments of those whom she had summoned together. Upon the hearing of this, they first of all paid their homage to the queen, as their custom was, and then they said that they confirmed the king's determination, and would submit to it, and rejoiced that Izates' father had preferred him before the rest of his brothers, as it was agreeable to all their wishes. But they said they were desirous first of all to slay his brothers and kinsmen, that so the kingdom might come securely to Izates; for if they were once destroyed, all the fear would be over which might arise from their hatred and envy to him. Helena replied to this, that she returned them her thanks for their good-will to herself and to Izates; but desired that they would defer the execution of this proposed slaughter of Izates' brothers till he should be there himself, and give his approbation to it. But as these men prevailed not with her to slay them, as they had advised, they exhorted her at least to keep them in bonds till Izates should come for their own security; they also counselled her to appoint some one whom she put the greatest trust in, as regent of the kingdom in the mean time. Helena complied with this counsel of theirs, and appointed Monobazus, the eldest son, to be king, and put the diadem upon his head, and gave him his father's signet ring, as also the sword of state which they call Sampsera, and exhorted him to administer the affairs of the kingdom till his brother should come. But Izates returned quickly, on hearing that his father was dead, and succeeded his brother Monobazus, who resigned up the kingdom to him.

§ 3. Now, during the time that Izates abode at Charax-Spasini, a certain Jewish merchant, whose name was Ananias, got among the king's women, and taught them to worship God according to the Jewish religion. Moreover through them he became known to Izates, and persuaded him in like manner to embrace the Jewish religion, and also, at his earnest entreaty, accompanied Izates when he was sent for by his father to Adiabene. It also happened that Helena was instructed similarly by another Jew, and went over also to the Jewish religion. Now when Izates had taken over the kingdom, and had come to Adiabene, and there saw his brothers and other kinsmen in bonds, he was displeased at what had been done; and as he thought it impious either to slay or imprison them, but still thought it hazardous to let them have their liberty at his court, as they would remember the injury that had been done them, he sent some of them with their children as hostages to Rome to Claudius Cæsar, and sent the others to Artabanus, the king of Parthia, on the like pretext.

§ 4. And when he found that his mother was highly pleased with the Jewish customs, he was fain to embrace them entirely; and, as he supposed that he could not be thoroughly a Jew unless he were circumcised, he was ready to undergo that operation. But when his mother heard of his intention, she endeavoured to hinder him from it, and told him that it would bring him into danger; for as he was king, he would get himself into great odium among his subjects, when they should learn that he was so fond of rites to them strange and foreign, and they would never submit to be ruled over by a Jew. She said this to him, and tried every way to dissuade him from his purpose. And when he had repeated what she had said to Ananias, he confirmed what his mother had said, and also threatened to leave the king, unless he complied with him, and actually departed. For he said he was afraid lest, if such an action were once made public to all, he should himself be in danger of punishment, as having been the cause of it, and having been the king's instructor in actions that were ill thought of. He also said that the king might worship God without being circumcised, even though he did resolve to follow the Jewish law entirely, for the worship of God was of more importance than circumcision. He added that God would forgive him, though he did not perform the operation, as it was omitted out of necessity, and from fear of his subjects. And the king for the time listened to these arguments, but afterwards (for he had not quite left off his desire of doing this thing) another Jew that came out of Galilee, whose name was Eleazar, and who was esteemed very skilful in the knowledge of his country's laws, urged him to do it. For as he entered his palace to salute him, and found him reading the law of Moses, he said to him, "You are ignorant, O king, of the immense injury you are doing to the laws, and through them to God himself, for it is necessary not only to read them, but also still more to practise what they enjoin. How long will you continue uncircumcised? But, if you have not yet read the law on the matter, that you may know what great impiety you are guilty of in neglecting it, read it now." When the king heard these words, he delayed the thing no longer, but retired to another room, and sent for a surgeon, and did what he was commanded to do. He then sent for his mother, and Ananias his original instructor in Jewish principles, and informed them that he had done the thing, upon which they were at once seized with astonishment and fear, and that to a great degree, lest the matter should be openly discovered and censured, and the king should hazard the loss of his kingdom, as his subjects might not submit to be governed by a man who was so zealous for a strange religion; and lest they should themselves run some hazard, because they would be supposed the cause of his having so done. But God himself hindered what they feared from happening: for he preserved both Izates himself, and his sons, when they fell into many dangers, and procured their deliverance when it seemed to be impossible, and showed thereby, that the fruit of piety does not perish for those that look to him, and fix their faith upon him only. But I shall relate these events hereafter.

§ 5. Now Helena, the king's mother, when she saw that the affairs of the kingdom were in peace, and that her son was a happy man, and an object of envy to all men, even to foreigners, owing to God's providence over him, desired to go to the city of Jerusalem, to worship at that temple of God which was so very famous among all men, and to offer her thank-offerings there. So she asked her son to give her leave to go there, upon which he gave his very willing consent to what she asked, and made great preparations for her departure, and gave her a great deal of money, and she went down to the city of Jerusalem, her son conducting her a great way on her journey. Now her visit was of very great advantage to the people of Jerusalem, for as a famine oppressed their city at that time, and many people died for want of money to procure necessaries with, queen Helena sent some of her servants to Alexandria with a great quantity of money to buy corn, and others of them to Cyprus to bring a cargo of dried figs. And as soon as they had come back with those provisions very quickly, she distributed food to those that were in want of it, and left an excellent memorial behind her of this beneficence to our whole nation. And when her son Izates was informed of this famine, he sent great sums of money to the principal men in Jerusalem, which being distributed amongst those that were in want relieved many from the griping pangs of hunger. However, what favours this king and queen conferred upon our city of Jerusalem, and what resources came from her to our citizens, shall be further related hereafter.

CHAP. III.

How Artabanus, King of Parthia, afraid of the Plots of his Subjects against him, went to Izates, and was by him reinstated in his Kingdom; as also how Vardanes, his son, denounced War against Izates.

§ 1.

NOW Artabanus, king of the Parthians, on learning that his satraps had formed a plot against him, did not think it safe to remain among them, but resolved to go to Izates, wishing to find some way of preservation through him, and, if possible, to get his return to his own dominions. So he went to Izates, and took a thousand of his kindred and servants with him, and met him upon the road, and he well knew Izates, but Izates did not know him. When Artabanus stood near him, and had first prostrated himself before him, according to the custom of his country, he then said to him, "O, king, do not overlook me thy servant, nor proudly reject the suit I make thee: for as I am reduced to a low estate by reverse of fortune, and from a king am become a private man, I stand in need of thy assistance. Look then at the uncertainty of fortune, and consider the case as one that might be thine, and esteem the care thou shalt take of me to be taken of thyself also; for if I be neglected, and my subjects go unpunished, many subjects will become more insolent towards other kings also." Now Artabanus made this speech with tears in his eyes, and with a dejected countenance. And as soon as Izates heard Artabanus' name, and saw him stand as a suppliant before him, he leapt down from his horse quickly, and said to him, "Take courage, O king, and be not disturbed at thy present calamity, as if it were incalurable; for a change from thy sad condition shall be speedy, for thou shalt find me to be more thy friend and assistant than thou hopest; for I will either reinstate thee in the kingdom of Parthia, or lose my own kingdom."

§ 2. When he had said this, he set Artabanus upon his horse, and himself accompanied him on foot, honouring him as a greater king than himself. But when Artabanus saw this, he was very uneasy at it, and swore by his present fortune and honour that he would dismount, unless Izates would get upon his horse again, and go before him. So he complied with his desire, and leaped upon his horse; and when he had brought him to his royal palace, he showed him every honour when they sat together, and gave him the chief place at festivals, regarding not his present fortune, but his former dignity, and considering also that changes in fortune are common to all men. He also wrote to the Parthians, urging them to receive Artabanus again, and gave them his right hand and faith, that Artabanus would forget what was past and done, and offered himself as mediator between them. Now the Parthians did not themselves refuse to receive him again, but pleaded that it was now out of their power to do so, because they had given the kingdom to another person, who had accepted it, whose name was Cinnamus, and that they were afraid lest a civil war should arise on this account. When Cinnamus heard of their views, he wrote to Artabanus himself, for he had been brought up by him, and was by nature good and gentle, and besought him to put confidence in him, and come and take his own dominions again. Accordingly, Artabanus trusted him, and returned home, and Cinnamus met him, and prostrated himself before him, and saluted him as king, and took the diadem off his own head, and put it on the head of Artabanus.

§ 3. Thus was Artabanus restored to his kingdom again through Izates, after he had previously lost it owing to his grandees. Nor was he unmindful of the benefits Izates had conferred upon him, but rewarded him with the greatest honours among them; for he allowed him to wear his tiara upright,<sup>1</sup> and to sleep upon a golden bed, which are privileges and marks of honour allowed only to the kings of Parthia. He also cut off a large and fruitful country from the king of Armenia, and bestowed it upon him. The name of the country is Nisibis,<sup>2</sup> and the Macedonians had formerly built there the city of Antioch, which they called in Mygdonia. These were the honours that were paid Izates by the king of the Parthians.

§ 4. But no long time after Artabanus died, and left the kingdom to his son Vardanes. Now this Vardanes came to Izates, and urged him to join him with his army, and to assist him in the war he was preparing to make against the Romans, but he could not prevail upon him to do so. For Izates knew so well the strength and good fortune of the Romans, that he thought Vardaues was attempting what was impossible. And having besides sent his sons, five in number, and those but young also, to learn accurately the language and learning of our nation, as he had sent his mother to worship at our temple, as I have related already, he was still more reluctant, and tried to restrain Vardanes, telling him perpetually of the great armies and famous actions of the Romans, and thinking thereby to frighten him, and hinder him from his desire for an expedition against them. But the Parthian king was provoked at this behaviour, and proclaimed war immediately against Izates. Yet did he gain no advantage by this war, because God cut off all his hopes therein; for the Parthians, perceiving Vardanes' intention, and how he had determined to war against the Romans, slew him, and gave his kingdom to his brother Cotardes. He also in no long time perished by a plot made against him, and Vologeses, his brother, succeeded him, who entrusted his kingdoms to two of his brothers by the same father, Media to the elder Pacorus, and Armenia to the younger Tiridates.

CHAP. IV.

How Izates was betrayed by his own Subjects, and fought against by the Arabians; and how, by the Providence of God, he was delivered out of their hands.

§ 1.

NOW when the king's brother, Monobazus, and his other kinsman, saw how Izates, owing to his piety to God and inherent goodness of character, was become greatly esteemed by all men, they also had a desire to leave the religion of their country, and to embrace that of the Jews, and they carried out their intention. But this act of theirs was discovered by Izates' subjects, and the grandees were much displeased at it, but dissembled their anger, only they intended, when they could find a convenient opportunity, to inflict punishment upon them. Accordingly, they wrote to Abias, king of the Arabians, and promised him great sums of money, if he would make an expedition against their king: and further promised him that on the first onset they would desert their king, for they wished to punish him because of the hatred he had to their religion, and they bound themselves by oaths to be faithful to each other, and begged that he would lose no time in the matter. The king of Arabia complied with their request, and brought a great army into the field, and marched against Izates without delay; and at the first onset, and before they came to close fight, all those grandees, as if in a panic, deserted Izates, as they had agreed to do, and turned their backs upon their enemies, and ran away. But Izates was not dismayed at this, but as he saw that the grandees had betrayed him, he also retired to his camp, and made inquiry into the matter; and as soon as he knew who they were that had made this conspiracy with the king of Arabia, he put to death those that were found guilty, and renewed the fight the next day, and slew most of his enemies, and forced all the rest to betake themselves to flight. He also pursued their king, and drove him into a fortress called Arsamus,<sup>1</sup> and, following up the siege vigorously, he took that fortress. And, when he had plundered it of all the spoil that was in it, which was not small, he returned to Adiabene, but he did not take Abias alive; because, as he found himself surrounded on every side, he slew himself, before he could fall into the hands of Izates.

§ 2. But although the grandees of Adiabene had failed in their first attempt, being delivered up by God into their king's hands, yet would they not be quiet even then, but wrote again to Vologeses, who was now king of Parthia, and begged that he would kill Izates, and set over them some other potentate, who should be a Parthian by race; for they said they hated their own king for changing the laws of their forefathers, and being enamoured of foreign customs. When the king of Parthia heard this, he was elated at the idea of war, and as he had no just pretext for it, he sent and demanded back those honours which had been bestowed on Izates by Artabanus, and threatened, on his refusal, to war against him. Upon hearing this, Izates was in no small trouble of mind, thinking it would be a reproach upon him to appear to resign those honours that had been bestowed upon him from fear; but because he knew that the king of Parthia would not be quiet, even if he should receive back those honours, he resolved to commit himself to God, his protector, in the present danger he was in of his life: and as he esteemed God his principal help, he placed his children and wives in a very strong fortress, and stored up his corn in citadels, and set the hay and grass on fire. And when he had thus put things in order as well as he could, he awaited the coming of the enemy. And when the king of Parthia was come with a great army of foot and horse, which he did sooner than was expected, (for he marched in great haste,) and had intrenched himself at the river that separated Adiabene from Media, Izates also pitched his camp not far off, having with him six thousand horse. But a messenger, sent by the king of Parthia, came to Izates, and told him, how great the power of the king of Parthia was, as his dominions extended from the river Euphrates to Bactria,<sup>1</sup> and enumerated the king's subjects. He also threatened him, that he should be punished, as a person ungrateful to his master, and added, that the God whom he worshipped could not deliver him out of the king's hands. When the messenger had delivered this message, Izates replied that he knew the king of Parthia's power was much greater than his own, but he knew also that God was much more powerful than all men. And when he had returned this answer, he betook himself to make supplication to God, and threw himself upon the ground, and defiled his head with ashes, and fasted with his wives and children, and called upon God, and said, "O Lord and Governor, if I have not in vain committed myself to thy goodness, but have justly esteemed thee the only Lord and chief protector and master of all beings, come now to my assistance, and defend me from my enemies, not only on my own account, but on account of their insolent behaviour with regard to thy power, for they have not feared to lift up their proud and arrogant tongue against thee." Thus did he lament with weeping and wailing. And God heard his prayer, for immediately, that very night, Vologeses received letters, the contents of which were that a great band of Dahæ and Sacæ, despising him now he had gone so long a journey from home, had made an expedition, and laid Parthia waste, so he went home again without effecting his purpose. And thus Izates escaped the threatenings of the Parthian by the providence of God.

§ 3. And not long after Izates died, when he had completed fifty-five years of his life, and had ruled his kingdom twenty-four years. He left behind him twenty-four sons and twenty-four daughters. And he gave orders that his brother Monobazus should succeed him as king, thereby requiting him, because, when he was himself absent after his father's death, he had faithfully preserved the kingdom for him. But when his mother Helena heard of her son's death, she was in great heaviness, as was but natural upon the loss of a most dutiful son; yet was it a comfort to her to hear that the succession came to her eldest son. Accordingly, she went to him in haste, and when she had reached Adiabene, she did not long outlive her son Izates, but soon expired, being worn out with old age and grief. And Monobazus sent her bones and those of Izates his brother to Jerusalem, and gave orders that they should be buried in the pyramids which their mother had erected; they were three in number,<sup>1</sup> and three furlongs from the city of Jerusalem. As for the actions of Monobazus the king, which he did during the rest of his life, I shall relate them hereafter.<sup>2</sup>

CHAP. V.

Concerning Theudas, and the Sons of Judas the Galilæan; as also what calamity fell upon the Jews on the Day of the Passover.

§ 1.

NOW when Fadus was administrator of Judæa, a certain impostor, whose name was Theudas,<sup>3</sup> urged a great part of the people to take their effects with them, and follow him to the river Jordan; for he told them he was a prophet, and that he would, by his own command, divide the river, and afford them an easy passage over it: and many were deluded by his words. However, Fadus did not permit them to reap any advantage from their folly, but despatched a troop of horse against them, who, falling upon them unexpectedly, slew many of them, and took many of them alive. They also took Theudas himself alive, and cut off his head, and carried it to Jerusalem. This was what befell the Jews in the time of Cuspius Fadus' administration.

§ 2. Tiberius Alexander came as successor to Fadus; he was the son of Alexander the Alabarch of Alexandria, who was foremost among his contemporaries both for his family and wealth: he was also more eminent for piety than his son Alexander, for he did not continue in the religion of his country. Under these administrators it was that that great famine happened in Judæa, when queen Helena bought corn in Egypt at a great expense, and distributed it to those that were in want, as I have related already. Moreover the sons of that Judas of Galilee were now slain, who caused the people to revolt from the Romans, when Cyrenius came to assess the estates of the Jews, as I have shown in a previous book. The names of these sons were James and Simon, and Alexander commanded them to be crucified. And Herod, king of Chalcis,<sup>1</sup> removed Joseph, the son of Cemedæ, from the high priesthood, and made Ananias, the son of Nebedæus, his successor. And Cumanus came as successor to Tiberius Alexander, and Herod, brother of Agrippa the Great, departed this life in the eighth year of the reign of Claudius Cæsar. He left behind him three sons, Aristobulus, whom he had by his first wife, and Berenicianus and Hyrcanus, who were both by Berenice his brother's daughter. But Claudius Cæsar bestowed his dominions on Agrippa Junior.

§ 3. Now while the Jewish affairs were under the administration of Cumanus, there happened a great tumult at the city of Jerusalem, and many of the Jews perished therein. I shall first explain the reason why it happened. When the feast, which is called the Passover, was at hand,

(at which time our custom is to use unleavened bread), and a great multitude had gathered together from all parts to that feast, Cumanus was afraid lest some disturbance should then be made by them; so he ordered that one regiment of soldiers should take their arms, and stand in the temple porticoes, to suppress any riot which might occur, which was no more than what former governors of Judæa had done at such festivals. But on the fourth day of the feast a certain soldier exposed his person to the multitude, which put those that saw him into a furious rage, and made them cry out, that this shameful action was not done to insult them, but God himself. Nay, some of the bolder ones reproached Cumanus, and pretended that the soldier was set on to act so by him, and when Cumanus heard that, he was not a little provoked at such reproaches, yet did he exhort them to leave off the desire for riot, and not to raise a tumult at the festival. But as he could not induce them to be quiet, for they still went on the more reproaching him, he gave order that the whole army should take their entire armour, and go to Antonia, which was a fortress, (as I have said already), which overlooked the temple; but when the multitude saw the soldiers there, they were frightened at them, and ran away hastily: but as the passages out were narrow, and as they thought their enemies followed them, they crowded together in their flight, and a great number were pressed to death in these narrow passages. So that no fewer than twenty thousand perished in this tumult. Thus, instead of a festival, they had at last mourning, and they all forgot their prayers and sacrifices, and betook themselves to lamentation and weeping; so great an affliction did the obscene conduct of a single soldier bring upon them.<sup>1</sup>

§ 4. Now before this their first mourning was over, another mischief befell them also; for some of those that had raised this riot robbed Stephanus, a slave of Cæsar, as he was journeying along the public road, about a hundred furlongs from the city, and plundered him of all that he had with him. And when Cumanus heard of this, he sent soldiers immediately, and ordered them to plunder the neighbouring villages, and to bring the most eminent persons among them in bonds to him, for he would exact vengeance for this audacious act. Now, as these villages were being ravaged, one of the soldiers seized the laws of Moses that lay in one of the villages, and brought them out before the eyes of all present, and tore them to pieces, and did this with reproachful language and much scurrility. Now when the Jews heard of this, they ran together in great numbers, and went down to Cæsarea, where Cumanus then was, and besought him that he would avenge, not themselves, but God himself, whose laws had been insulted, for they could not bear to live any longer, if the laws of their forefathers must be insulted in this manner. Then Cumanus, fearing that the multitude would go in for another riot, following also the advice of his friends, had the soldier beheaded who had offered this insult to the laws, and so put a stop to the riot which was likely to burst out a second time.

<sup>1</sup> This and many more tumults and seditions, which arose at the Jewish festivals, illustrate the cautious procedure of the Jewish governors, when they said, Matt. xxvi. 5, "Let us not take Jesus on the feast-day, lest there be an uproar among the people;" as Reland well observes on this place. Josephus also takes notice of the same thing, Jewish War, i. 4, § 3.—W.

CHAP. VI.

How a Quarrel happened between the Jews and the Samaritans, and how Claudius put an End to their Differences.

§ 1.

A QUARREL also arose between the Samaritans and the Jews for the following reason. It was the custom of the Galilæans, when they came to the holy city for the festivals, to journey through the country of the Samaritans; <sup>1</sup> and at this time there lay in the road they took a village that was called Ginæa<sup>1</sup> (which was situated on the borders of Samaria and the great plain,) some inhabitants of which fought with the Galilæans, and killed many of them. And when the leading Galilæans heard of what had been done, they went to Cumanus, and desired him to avenge the murder of those that had been killed: but he was bribed with money by the Samaritans to do nothing in the matter. And the Galilæans were much displeased at this, and urged the multitude of the Jews to betake themselves to arms, and to regain their liberty, and said that slavery was in itself a bitter thing, but when it was joined with injuries, it was perfectly intolerable. And when their principal men endeavoured to pacify them, and tried to stop the tumult, and promised to endeavour to persuade Cumanus to avenge those that were killed, they would not hearken to them, but took their weapons, and entreated the assistance of Eleazar, the son of Dinæus (a robber, who had many years made his abode in the mountain), and set on fire and plundered several villages of the Samaritans. When Cumanus heard of this action of theirs, he took the troop of horse at Sebaste,<sup>2</sup> and four regiments of foot, and armed the Samaritans, and marched out against the Jews, and came up with them, and slew a great number of them, but took more alive; whereupon those that were the most eminent persons at Jerusalem in reputation and family, as soon as they saw to what a height of calamity things had come, put on sackcloth, and heaped ashes upon their heads, and in all kind of ways besought and urged the insurgents to consider the utter ruin of their country, the conflagration of their temple, and the slavery of themselves their wives and children, which would be the result of what they were doing, and to alter their minds, and cast away their weapons, and for the future be quiet, and return to their own homes. These arguments prevailed with them. So the people dispersed, and the robbers went away again to their strongholds. And from this time all Judæa was overrun with bands of robbers.

§ 2. But the leading persons of the Samaritans went to Ummidius Quadratus, the governor of Syria, who was at this time at Tyre, and accused the Jews of setting their villages on fire, and plundering them. They also said that they were not so much displeased at what they had themselves suffered, as they were at the contempt thereby shown to the Romans, for if the Jews had received any injury, they ought to have made the Romans the judges of what had been done, and not overrun the country, as if they had not the Romans for their governors. So they now came to him to obtain satisfaction. This was the accusation which the Samaritans brought against the Jews. But the Jews affirmed that the Samaritans were the authors of this tumult and fighting, and before everything maintained that Cumanus had been bribed by their gifts, and so passed over in silence the murder of those that had been slain. When Quadratus heard this, he put off the hearing of the case, and said he would give sentence after he went into Judæa, and got a more exact knowledge of the truth. So they went away without effecting their object: but not long afterwards Quadratus came to Samaria, where, upon hearing the case, he came to the conclusion that the Samaritans were the authors of the disturbance. But, when he was informed that some of the Jews were for revolution, he ordered those whom Cumanus had taken captive to be crucified. From thence he went to a certain village called Lydda,<sup>1</sup> which was as big as a city, and there heard the Samaritans a second time before his tribunal, and there learned from a certain Samaritan, that one of the chief of the Jews, whose name was Dortus, and some other riotous persons with him, four in number, had urged the multitude to revolt from the Romans. And Quadratus ordered them to be put to death, but he sent Ananias the high priest and Ananus the commander in bonds to Rome, to give account for what they had done to Claudius Cæsar. He also ordered the principal persons both of the Samaritans and the Jews, as also Cumanus the governor, and Celer the tribune, to go to Italy to the emperor, to be judged before him as to their differences with one another. He next went to the city of Jerusalem, fearing that the multitude of the Jews would again attempt a riot, but he found the city in a peaceable state, and celebrating one of their usual festivals to God. So he believed that they would not attempt any rioting, and left them celebrating the festival, and returned to Antioch.

§ 3. Now Cumanus, and the principal Samaritans, who were sent to Rome, had a day appointed them by the emperor, on which they were to plead their cause about their differences with one another. But the Emperor's freedmen and friends were very zealous on behalf of Cumanus and the Samaritans, and they would have prevailed over the Jews, had not Agrippa Junior, who was then at Rome, observing that the principal of the Jews were hard set, earnestly entreated Agrippina, the emperor's wife, to urge her husband to hear the case, as was agreeable to his justice, and to condemn those to be punished who were really the authors of the insurrection. And Claudius was moved by this request and heard the case, and when he found that the Samaritans had been the ringleaders in these troubles, he gave orders that those who had come up to him should be slain, and that Cumanus should be banished. He also gave orders that Celer the tribune should be carried back to Jerusalem, and should be drawn through the city in the sight of all the people, and then put to death.

CHAP. VII.

§ 1.

THEN Claudius sent Felix, the brother of Pallas, to administer affairs in Judæa. And when he had already completed the twelfth year of his reign, he bestowed upon Agrippa the tetrarchy of Philip and Batauzæ,<sup>1</sup> and added thereto Trachonitis<sup>2</sup> and Abila,<sup>3</sup> which last had been the tetrarchy of Lysanias, but he took from him Chalcis, when he had reigned over it four years. And when

Agrippa had received these gifts from the Emperor, he gave his sister Drusilla in marriage to Azizus, king of Emesa, upon his consent to be circumcised. For Epiphanes, the son of king Antiochus, refused to marry her, not wishing to come over to the Jewish religion, though he had promised her father formerly he would do so. Agrippa also gave Mariamne in marriage to Archelaus, the son of Helcias, to whom she had formerly been betrothed by her father Agrippa; of which marriage came a daughter, whose name was Berenice.

§ 2. As for the marriage of Drusilla and Azizus, it was no long time afterwards dissolved for the following reason. When Felix was governor of Judæa, he saw this Drusilla, and fell in love with her, for she did indeed excel all other women in beauty, and he sent to her a person whose name was Simon, one of his friends, a Jew, born in Cyprus, who pretended to be a magician, and endeavoured to persuade her to forsake her present husband, and marry Felix, and promised, that if she would not refuse Felix, he would make her a happy woman. Accordingly she acted wickedly, and because she was desirous to avoid her sister Berenice's envy (for she was very ill treated by her on account of her beauty), was prevailed upon to transgress the laws of her forefathers, and to marry Felix. And she had a son by him, whom she called Agrippa. And how that young man and his wife perished at the conflagration of Mount Vesuvius, in the days of Titus Cæsar, shall be related hereafter.<sup>1</sup>

§ 3. As for Berenice, she lived a widow a good while after the death of Herod [king of Chalcis], who was both her husband and uncle, but when the report went that she committed incest with her brother [Agrippa Junior], she urged Polemo, who was king of Cilicia,<sup>2</sup> to be circumcised and to marry her, supposing that by this means she should prove those calumnies to be false; and Polemo listened to her chiefly on account of her riches. But this marriage did not continue long, for Berenice soon left Polemo, owing, as was said, to her licentiousness. And he left simultaneously

both his marriage and the Jewish religion. At the same time Mariamne put away Archelaus, and married Demetrius, the principal man among the Alexandrian Jews, both for his family and wealth; and indeed he was then their Alabarch. And she named the son whom she had by him Agrippinus. But of all these particulars I shall hereafter speak more exactly.<sup>1</sup>

CHAP. VIII.

How, upon the Death of Claudius, Nero succeeded as Emperor, as also what barbarous things he did. Concerning the Robbers, Murderers, and Impostors that arose while Felix and Festus were Governors of Judæa.

§ 1.

NOW Claudius Cæsar died when he had reigned thirteen years, eight months, and twenty days; and a report went about from some that he was poisoned by his wife Agrippina. Her father was Germanicus, the Emperor's brother, and her first husband was Domitius Ænobarbus, one of the most illustrious persons in the city of Rome; after whose death, when she had long continued in widowhood, Claudius married her, and she brought with her a son, Domitius, of the same name as his father. Claudius before this had his wife Messalina slain out of jealousy, by whom he had had a son Britannicus and a daughter Octavia; their eldest sister was Antonia, whom he had by Petina his first wife. And he married Octavia to Nero; for that was the name that Claudius gave Domitius after adopting him as his son.

§ 2. But Agrippina being afraid that, when Britannicus should come to man's estate, he would succeed his father as emperor, and desiring to secure the empire beforehand for her own son Nero, according to report contrived the death of Claudius, and immediately sent Burrus, the general of the army, and the tribunes with him, and such also of the freedmen as had the greatest influence, to take Nero away to the camp, and salute him emperor. And when Nero had thus obtained the empire, he got Britannicus poisoned so that the multitude should not know of it, but publicly put his own mother to death not long afterwards, making her this requital, not only for being her son, but by bringing it about by her intrigues that he obtained the Roman empire. He also slew his wife Octavia and many other illustrious persons, under the pretext that they plotted against him.

§ 3. But I omit any further discourse about these affairs, for many have composed the history of Nero, some of whom have neglected the truth out of favour to him, having received benefits from him, while others, out of hatred to him, and from the great ill-will which they bore him, have so impudently raved against him with their lies, that they justly deserve to be condemned. But I do not wonder at such as have told lies of Nero, since they have not in their writings preserved the truth of history as to facts earlier than his time, even when the persons concerned could have no way incurred their hatred, since those writers lived a long time after them. But as to those that have no regard to truth, they may write as they please; for in that they seem to take delight: but as to ourselves, who have made truth our direct aim, we shall briefly touch upon what only belongs remotely to our undertaking, but shall relate what has happened to us Jews with great fulness, and shall not shrink from giving an accurate account both of the calamities we have suffered, and of the faults we have been guilty of. I will now therefore return to the relation of our affairs.

§ 4. In the first year of the reign of Nero, upon the death of Azizus, king of Emesa, his brother Sohemus succeeded him in the kingdom. And Aristobulus, the son of Herod, king of Chalcis, was entrusted by Nero with the government of Lesser Armenia. The emperor also bestowed on Agrippa a certain part of Galilee, ordering Tiberias<sup>1</sup> and Taricheæ<sup>2</sup> to submit to his jurisdiction. He gave him also Julias,<sup>3</sup> a city in Peræa, and fourteen villages that lay about it.

§ 5. Now the affairs of the Jews grew worse and worse continually. For the country was again full of bands of robbers, and of impostors who deluded the multitude. Yet did Felix capture and put to death many of these impostors every day, as well as the robbers. He also took alive Eleazar, the son of Dinæus, who had got together a company of robbers, and this he did by treachery, for he gave him assurance that he should suffer no harm, and so persuaded him to come to him; but when he came he bound him, and sent him to Rome. Felix was also vexed with the high priest Jonathan, because he frequently gave him admonitions about governing the Jewish affairs better than he did, lest he should himself have complaints made of him by the multitude, since it was he who had asked Claudius to send him as governor of Judæa. So Felix contrived a method whereby he might get rid of him, now he was become so continually troublesome to him; for continual admonition is grievous to those who are disposed to act unjustly. So in consequence of this Felix persuaded one of Jonathan's most trusted friends, a native of Jerusalem, whose name was Doras, to bring the robbers upon Jonathan to kill him; and this he did by promising to give him a great deal of money for so doing. Doras complied with the proposal, and contrived matters so, that the robbers might murder him in the following manner. Certain of those robbers went up to the city, as if they were going to worship God, but with daggers under their garments, and mingling themselves with the multitude slew Jonathan. And as this murder was never punished, the robbers went up with the greatest security to the festivals after this time, and having their weapons concealed in like manner as before, and mingling themselves with the multitude, they slew both their own enemies and those whom other men wanted them to kill for money, not only in other parts of the city, but some even in the temple itself, for they had the boldness to murder men there, without thinking of the impiety of which they were guilty. And this seems to me the reason why God, out of his hatred of these men's wickedness, rejected our city, and no longer judged the temple sufficiently pure for him to dwell therein, but brought the Romans upon us, and threw a fire upon the city to purge it, and brought slavery upon us and our wives and children, being desirous to sober us by our calamities.

§ 6. With such impiety did the actions that were done by the robbers fill the city. And impostors and deceivers urged the multitude to follow them into the wilderness, and pretended that they would exhibit manifest wonders and signs, that should be performed by the providence of God. And many that were persuaded by them suffered the punishment of their folly: for Felix brought them back, and then punished them. There also came out of Egypt about this time to Jerusalem one that said he was a prophet, and advised the multitude of the common people to go along with him to the Mount of Olives, as it was called, which lay opposite the city at five furlongs distance: for he said he wished to show them from thence, how, at his command, the walls of Jerusalem would fall down, through which he promised to procure them an entrance into the city. Now, when Felix was informed of this, he ordered his soldiers to take their weapons, and himself set out from Jerusalem with a great number of horse and foot, and attacked the Egyptian and those that were with him, and slew four hundred of them, and took two hundred alive. But the Egyptian himself escaped out of the fight, and did not appear any more. And again the robbers stirred up the people to make war against the Romans, and said they ought not to obey them at all, and if any persons would not comply with them, they set fire to their villages, and plundered them.

§ 7. And now a great quarrel arose between the Jews and Syrians who inhabited Cæsarea, as to their equal right to the privileges of citizenship. For the Jews claimed the pre-eminence, because Herod their king, the founder of Cæsarea, was by birth a Jew. Now the Syrians did not deny what was stated about Herod, but they said that Cæsarea was formerly called Strato's Tower, and that then there was not one Jewish inhabitant in the city. When the rulers of that district heard of this, they arrested the ringleaders of this dispute on both sides, and tormented them with stripes, and so put a stop to the disturbance for a time. But the Jewish citizens, relying on their wealth, and on that account despising the Syrians, reproached them again, and hoped to provoke them by their reproaches. However, the Syrians, though they were inferior in wealth, valued themselves highly because most that served there as soldiers under the Romans were from Cæsarea<sup>1</sup> or Sebaste,<sup>2</sup> so they also for some time used reproachful language to the Jews, till at last they came to throwing stones at one another, and several were wounded and fell on both sides, though the Jews were the conquerors. But when Felix saw that this quarrel was become a kind of war, he sprung forward and desired the Jews to desist, and when they refused so to do, he armed his soldiers, and sent them out at them, and slew many of them, and took more of them alive, and permitted his soldiers to plunder some of the houses of many of the citizens, which were full of riches. And now the Jews that were more moderate, and of principal dignity among them, were afraid for themselves, and begged of Felix that he would sound a retreat to his soldiers, and spare them for the future, and give them opportunity to repent of what they had done; and Felix was prevailed upon to do so.

§ 8. About this time king Agrippa gave the high priesthood to Ishmael, who was the son of Fabi. And now arose dissension between the high priests and the leading men of the multitude of Jerusalem, each of whom got about them a company of the boldest sort of men, and of those that loved innovation, and became leaders to them, and when they met together, they cast reproachful words and threw stones at one another. And there was nobody to punish them, but these things were done with impunity as in a city without a government. And such shamelessness and boldness seized on the high priests, that they ventured to send their slaves to the threshing floors, to take the tithes that were due to the priests, so that the poorest sort of the priests died for want. To this degree did the violence of faction prevail over all right and justice!

§ 9. Now, when Porcius Festus was sent as successor to Felix by Nero, the principal of the Jewish inhabitants of Cæsarea went up to Rome to accuse Felix; and he would certainly have been brought to punishment for his offences against the Jews, had not Nero yielded to the importunate solicitations of his brother Pallas, who was at that time held in the greatest honour by him. And two of the principal Syrians in Cæsarea bribed Burrus (who was Nero's tutor, and secretary for his Greek letters), by a great sum of money, to disannul the equality of the privileges of citizenship which the Jews enjoyed with the Syrians. And Burrus by his solicitations obtained leave of the emperor that a letter should be written to that purpose. This letter became the occasion of the subsequent miseries that befell our nation; for, when the Jews of Cæsarea were informed of the contents of this letter to the Syrians, they were more disorderly than ever, till they kindled a war.

§ 10. Upon Festus' coming into Judæa, it happened that Judæa was afflicted by the robbers, as all the villages were set on fire, and plundered by them. And now it was that the Sicarii, as they were called (who were robbers) grew numerous. They made use of small swords, very similar in size to the Persian acinaces, but somewhat crooked, and like the Roman sicæ, as they were called, and from these weapons these robbers got their denomination, and with these weapons they slew a great many. For they mingled themselves among the multitude at their festivals, as I said before, when they came up in crowds from all parts to the city to worship God, and easily slew those they had a mind to slay. They also came frequently with their weapons to the villages belonging to their enemies, and plundered them, and set them on fire. And Festus sent forces both of horse and foot, to fall upon those that had been seduced by a certain impostor, who promised them deliverance and freedom from the miseries they suffered from, if they would but follow him as far as the wilderness. And the forces that were sent destroyed both the impostor and his followers.

§ 11. About this time king Agrippa built himself a very large dining-room in the royal palace at Jerusalem, near the portico. This palace had been erected of old by the sons of Asamonæus, and was situated upon an elevation, and afforded a most delightful prospect to those who wished to overlook the city, which prospect was desired by the king, for there he could recline and see what was being done in the temple. Now when the chief men of Jerusalem observed this, they were very much displeas'd; for it was not agreeable to the habits or laws of our country, that what was done in the temple should be overlooked, especially what belonged to the sacrifices. They therefore erected a high wall before the hall in the inner part of the temple towards the west, and this wall, when it was built, did not only intercept the view from the dining-room in the palace, but also the view from the western portico in the outer part of the temple, where the Romans kept guard near the temple at the festivals. At these doings king Agrippa was much displeas'd, and still more Festus the governor, and Festus order'd them to pull the wall down again; but the Jews petitioned him to give them leave to send an embassage about this matter to Nero; for they said they could not endure to live, if any part of the temple were demolish'd; and when Festus had given them leave to do so they sent ten of their principal men to Nero, as also Ishmael the high priest, and Helcias the keeper of the sacred treasure. And when Nero had heard what they had to say, he not only forgave them what they had already done, but also gave them leave to let the wall they had built stand, in order to gratify his wife Poppæa, who was a religious woman, and had request'd these favours of Nero, and who gave orders to the ten ambassadors to go their way home, but retain'd Helcias and Ishmael as hostages with herself. As soon as the king heard this news, he gave the high priesthood to Joseph (who was call'd Cabi), the son of Simon who was formerly high priest.

§ 1.

AND Nero, upon hearing of the death of Festus, sent Albinus into Judæa, as governor. And king Agrippa deprived Joseph of the high priesthood, and bestow'd the succession to that dignity on the son of Ananus, who was also himself called Ananus. They say that this older Ananus was a most fortunate man; for he had five sons, who were all high priests to God, and he had himself enjoyed that dignity a very long time formerly, which had never happened to any other of our high priests. But the younger Ananus, who, as I have said already, succeeded to the high priesthood, was a bold man in his temper, and very audacious, and followed the sect of the Sadducees, who are more severe in punishing offenders than all other Jews, as I have already shown. As therefore Ananus was of such a disposition, he thought he had now a good opportunity [to exercise his authority,] as Festus was now dead, and Albinus was still on the road, so he assembled the sanhedrim of judges, and brought before them the brother of Jesus who was called Christ, whose name was James, and some others, and having accused them as breakers of the law, he delivered them over to be stoned. But those who seemed the most moderate of the citizens, and strict in the observance of the laws, disliked what was done; and secretly sent to king Agrippa, beseeching him to bid Ananus to act so no more, for what he had already done was not done rightly. Nay, some of them also went to meet Albinus, as he was upon his journey from Alexandria, and informed him that it was not lawful for Ananus to assemble a sanhedrim without his consent. And Albinus listened to what they said, and wrote in anger to Ananus, and threatened that he would bring him to punishment for what he had done. And king Agrippa took the high priesthood from him, when he had ruled but three months, and made Jesus the son of Damnæus high priest.

§ 2. Now as soon as Albinus was come to the city of Jerusalem, he used all his endeavours and care that the country might be kept in peace, so he slew many of the Sicarii. As for the high priest Ananias, he increased in credit every day, and obtained the favour and esteem of the citizens in a signal manner. For he was a great maker of money; so he daily courted the friendship of Albinus and the high priest by making them presents. But he had servants who were very wicked, who joined themselves to the boldest sort of the people, and went to the threshing-floors, and took away by violence the tithes that belonged to the priests, and did not refrain from beating such as would not give these tithes to them. And the high priests acted in the same manner as Ananias' servants did, without any one's being able to prevent them. And so [some of the] priests that were wont of old to be supported with those tithes, died for want of food.

§ 3. And the Sicarii again went into the city by night just before the festival, for one was now at hand, and took alive the scribe belonging to Eleazar the governor of the temple (who was the son of Ananus the high priest), and bound him, and carried him away with them. They then sent to Ananias, and said that they would send the scribe to him, if he would persuade Albinus to release ten of their party whom he had captured and put in bonds. So Ananias was forced to beg Albinus to do so, and gained his request. This was the beginning of greater calamities; for the robbers perpetually contrived to take alive some of Ananias' servants, and when they had captured them, they would not let them go except in exchange for some of their own Sicarii. And as they were again become no small number, they grew bold again, and ravaged the whole country.

§ 4. About this time king Agrippa built Cæsarea Philippi<sup>1</sup> larger than it was before, and, in honour of Nero called it Neronias. And when he had built a theatre at Berytus<sup>2</sup> at vast expense, he exhibited shows to the people there every year, and spent therein many ten thousand [drachmæ]; for he gave the people corn and distributed oil among them. And he adorned the entire city with statues of his own donation, and with original images made by ancient hands, nay, he almost transferred there all that was most ornamental in his own kingdom. This made him greatly hated by his subjects, because he took away the things that belonged to them to adorn a foreign city. And now Jesus the son of Gamaliel became the successor of Jesus, the son of Dam-næus, in the high priesthood, which the king had taken from the latter; and so a quarrel arose between the high priests, and they got together bodies of the boldest sort of people, who frequently from reproaches proceeded to throwing stones at each other. But Ananias got the best of it, as by his riches he gained over those that were most ready to receive. Costobarus also and Saulus got together a multitude of wicked wretches, for they were of the royal family, and obtained favour because of their kindred to Agrippa, but they were violent and ready to plunder those who were weaker than themselves. And from that time chiefly it came to pass, that our city greatly suffered, and that all things grew worse and worse among us.

§ 5. Now when Albius heard that Gessius Florus was coming to succeed him, he was desirous to appear to have done something for the people of Jerusalem, so he brought out all those prisoners who seemed to him to be most plainly deserving of death, and ordered them to be put to death accordingly; but as for those who had been put into prison for some trifling matter, he took money of them, and dismissed them. So the prisons were emptied, but the country was filled with robbers.

§ 6. Now as many of the Levites (a tribe of ours) as were singers of hymns urged the king to assemble a sanhedrim, and to give them leave to wear linen garments as well as the priests; for they said it would be a work worthy the times of his government, to date from them the commencement of such a novelty. Nor did they fail to obtain their desire; for the king, with the suffrages of those who came to the sanhedrim, granted the singers of hymns this privilege, that they might lay aside their former garments, and wear such a linen one as they desired; and as part of this tribe ministered in the temple, he also permitted them to learn the hymns as they had besought him. Now all this was contrary to the laws of our country, and whenever they have been transgressed, we have never been able to escape the punishment of such transgressions.

§ 7. And now the temple was quite finished. So, when the people saw that the workmen, who were above eighteen thousand, were unemployed, and as they received no wages were in want, because they had earned their bread by their labours about the temple, and as they were unwilling to keep them out of the treasures deposited there from fear of the Romans, though as they desired to make provision for the workmen, they had a mind to expend those treasures upon them (for if any one of them did but labour for a single hour, he received his pay immediately), they urged the king to rebuild the east portico. This portico was on the outer part of the temple, and lay in a deep valley, and had walls four hundred cubits [in length], built of square and very white stones, the length of each stone being twenty cubits, and the height six cubits. This was the work of king Solomon, who first of all built the entire temple. But king Agrippa (who had the care of the temple committed to him by Claudius Cæsar), considering that it is easy to demolish any building, but hard to build it up again, and that it was particularly so in the case of this portico (for it would require a considerable time and great sums of money), denied the petitioners their request about this matter; but he did not prevent their paving the city with white stone. He also deprived Jesus the son of Gamaliel of the high priesthood, and gave it to Matthias, the son of Theophilus, under whom the war between the Jews and Romans began.

CHAP. X.

§ 1.

I NOW think it necessary and proper for this history to give an account of our high priests; how they began, who had that dignity, and how many of them there were to the end of the war. They say then that Aaron, the brother of Moses, first officiated to God as high priest, and that after his death his sons immediately succeeded him, and that this dignity has been continued down from them to all their posterity. Hence it is a custom of our country, that no one should take the high priesthood of God, but he who is of the blood of Aaron, while every one that is of another stock, though he were a king, can never obtain that high priesthood. Accordingly, the number of all the high priests from Aaron, who was (as I have said) first of them, until Phinees, who was made high priest during the war by the seditious, was eighty-three. Thirteen of these officiated as high priests from the days of Moses in the wilderness, while the tabernacle was standing, until the people came into Judæa, when king Solomon erected the temple to God: for at first they held the high priesthood till the end of their life, though afterwards they had successors even while they were alive. And these thirteen, who were descendants of the two sons of Aaron, received this dignity by succession, one after another. Now their first form of government was an aristocracy, and after that a monarchy, and in the third place the government was regal. Now the number of years during the rule of these thirteen, from the day when our fathers departed out of Egypt, under Moses as their leader, until the building of the temple which king Solomon erected at Jerusalem, was six hundred and twelve. After those thirteen high priests, eighteen took the high priesthood at Jerusalem, one in succession to another, from the days of king Solomon, until Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, made an expedition against Jerusalem and burnt the temple, and removed our nation to Babylon, and took Josedek the high priest captive. The time of these high priests was four hundred and sixty-six years six months and ten days, while the Jews were still under kingly government. But after the period of seventy years' captivity under the Babylonians, Cyrus, king of Persia, sent the Jews from Babylon to their own land again, and gave them leave to rebuild their temple; at which time Jesus, the son of Josedek, took the high priesthood over the captives when they had returned home. Now he and his posterity, who were in all fifteen, lived under a democratical government for four hundred and fourteen years, until king Antiochus Eupator, and then the fore-mentioned Antiochus, and Lysias the general of his army, deprived Onias, who was also called Menelaus, of the high priesthood, and slew him at Bercea,<sup>1</sup> and putting his son out of the succession appointed Jacimus as high priest, who was indeed of the stock of Aaron, but not of the family of Onias. On which account Onias, who was cousin of the Onias that was dead, and had the same name as his father, went into Egypt, and became friendly with Ptolemy Philometor and his wife Cleopatra, and persuaded them to make him high priest of the temple<sup>1</sup> which they had built to God in the district of Heliopolis, in imitation of that at Jerusalem; and as to that temple which was built in Egypt, I have spoken of it frequently. Now, when Jacimus had retained the priesthood three years, he died, and there was no one that succeeded him, but the city continued seven years without a high priest. After that the posterity of the sons of Asamonæus, who had the government of the nation conferred upon them, when they had beaten the Macedonians in war, appointed Jonathan to be their high priest, who ruled over them seven years. And when he had been slain by the treacherous contrivance of Trypho, as I have before related, Simon his brother took the high priesthood; and when he was killed at a feast by the treachery of his son-in-law, his son, whose name was Hyrcanus, succeeded him, after he had held the high priesthood one year longer than his brother. This Hyrcanus enjoyed the dignity thirty years, and died an old man, leaving the succession to Judas, who was also called Aristobulus, whose brother Alexander succeeded him; this Judas died of illness, after he had held the priesthood together with the royal authority (for this Judas was the first that put on his head a diadem, which he wore for one year). And when Alexander had been both king and high priest for twenty-seven years, he departed this life, and permitted his wife Alexandra to appoint the next high priest; so she gave the high priesthood to Hyrcanus, but retained the kingdom herself nine years, and then departed this life. For the same period only did her son Hyrcanus enjoy the high priesthood; for after her death his brother Aristobulus fought against him, and beat him, and deprived him of his high priesthood, and did himself not only reign, but perform the office of high priest to God. But when he had reigned three years and as many months, Pompey came and took the city of Jerusalem by storm, and put him and his children in bonds, and sent them to Rome. He also restored the high priesthood to Hyrcanus, and made him ruler of the nation, but forbade him to wear a diadem. This Hyrcanus ruled, besides his first nine years, twenty-four years more, when Barzapharnes and Pacorus, rulers of the Parthians, crossed over the

Euphrates, and fought with Hyrcanus, and took him alive, and made Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, king; and when he had reigned three years and three months, Sossius and Herod besieged and captured him, and Antony had him brought to Antioch and slain there. And Herod, who was then made king by the Romans, did no longer appoint high priests out of the descendants of Asamonæus, but appointed to that office men of no note, and barely priests, with the single exception of Aristobulus. For he made this Aristobulus high priest, who was the grandson of Hyrcanus who was taken by the Parthians, and married his sister Mariamne, only to win the good-will of the people, because of their remembrance of Hyrcanus. But afterwards, being afraid that all would fall away to Aristobulus, he put him to death, contriving to have him suffocated as he was swimming at Jericho, as I have already related; and after him he never intrusted the high priesthood to the posterity of the sons of Asmonæus. Herod's son Archelaus also acted like his father in the appointment of high priests, as did the Romans also, who took the government over the Jews into their own hands after Archelaus. And the number of the high priests, from the days of Herod until the day when Titus took and burnt the temple and the city, was in all twenty-eight, and the period they were high priests was a hundred and seven years. Some of them took part in affairs in the reigns of Herod and Archelaus his son, but after their death the government became an aristocracy, and the high priests were intrusted with dominion over the nation. Thus much may suffice to say concerning our high priests.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning Gessius Florus the Governor, who forced the Jews to take up arms against the Romans. Conclusion of the Antiquities of the Jews.

§ 1.

NOW Gessius Florus, who was sent as successor to Albinus by Nero, filled Judæa with many miseries. He was a native of Clazomenæ, and brought with him his wife

Cleopatra, (by whose friendship with Nero's wife Poppæa he obtained this government,) who was as wicked as he was. This Florus was so bad and violent in the exercise of his authority, that the Jews cried up Albinus as their benefactor, so excessive were the evils that Florus brought upon them. For Albinus concealed his wickedness, and was careful that it might not be discovered by anybody; but Gessius Florus, as though he had been despatched to Judæa on purpose to display his crimes, ostentatiously showed his lawlessness to our nation, never omitting any rapine or unjust punishment; for he was not to be moved by pity, and was never satisfied with any amount of gain, nor did he pay any more regard to great than to small acquisitions, but went shares even with the robbers. For many pursued that calling without fear, feeling perfect security, because he went shares in their robberies; so that there were no bounds set to the nation's miseries; but the unhappy Jews, being unable to bear the devastations which the robbers made among them, were all forced to leave their own habitations and flee away, as if they could dwell better any where else in the world among foreigners. And why need I say any more, for it was Florus who forced us to take up arms against the Romans, as we thought it better to be destroyed at once than by little and little. For this war began in the second year of the government of Florus, and in the twelfth year of the reign of Nero. And what actions we were forced to do, or what miseries we had to suffer, may be accurately known by such as will peruse those books which I have written about the Jewish war.

§ 2. I shall now, therefore, make an end here of my Antiquities, after which I began to write my account of the war. Now these Antiquities contain what has been delivered down to us from the original creation of man to the twelfth year of the reign of Nero, as to what has befallen us Jews, as well in Egypt as in Syria and in Palestine, and what we have suffered from the Assyrians and Babylonians, and what afflictions the Persians and Macedonians brought upon us, and after them the Romans. And I think I may say that I have composed this history with all accuracy. I have attempted to enumerate the high priests that we have had during the interval of two thousand years. I have also accurately recorded the succession of our kings, and related their actions and polity, as also the power of our monarchs, and all according to what is written in our sacred books; for this is what I promised to do in the beginning of this history. And I make bold to say, now I have completed the work I proposed to myself to do, that no other person, whether Jew or foreigner, had he ever so great an inclination to it, could have given so accurate an account to the Greeks as I have done. For those of my own nation freely acknowledge, that I far exceed them in the learning belonging to Jews; I have also taken a great deal of pains to obtain the learning of the Greeks, and understand the elements of the Greek language, although I have so long accustomed myself to speak our own tongue, that I cannot pronounce Greek with sufficient exactness. For our nation does not encourage those that learn the languages of many nations, and so adorn their discourses with the smoothness of their periods, because they look upon this sort of accomplishment as common not only to all sorts of free men, but to as many servants as please to learn them, and they give those only the testimony of being wise men who are fully acquainted with our laws, and able to interpret the meaning of the holy writings. And so, though there have been many who have done their endeavours with great patience to obtain this learning, there have been hardly as many as two or three that have succeeded therein, and immediately got the fruit of their labours.

§ 3. And now perhaps it will not be invidious or unapt, if I treat briefly of my own family, and of the actions of my own life,<sup>1</sup> while there are still living such as can either prove what I say to be false, or attest that it is true. So I shall here put an end to these Antiquities, which are contained in twenty books and sixty thousand lines. And if God permit me, I shall briefly run over the war again, and what befell us to this very day, which is the thirteenth year of the reign of the Emperor Domitian, and the fifty-sixth year of my own life. I intend also to write four books concerning our Jewish opinions about God and his being and concerning our laws, and why, according to them, some things are permitted us to do, and others are prohibited.

THE JEWISH WAR, OR, THE
HISTORY OF THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM.

PREFACE.

SINCE<sup>1</sup> the war between the Jews and the Romans was the greatest of all those not only in our times, but almost all that were ever heard of, either of those wherein cities have fought against cities or nations against nations, and as some men who were not concerned in the affairs themselves, have collected together vain and contradictory stories from hearsay, and have recorded them in a sophistical manner, while those that were present have given false accounts of things, either in flattery to the Romans or from hatred to the Jews, and as their writings contain sometimes accusations, and sometimes encomium, but no where the accurate truth, I have proposed to myself, for the sake

<sup>1</sup> I have already observed more than once, that this history of the Jewish War was Josephus's first book, and published about A.D. 75, when he was but 38 years of age; and that, when he wrote it, he was not thoroughly acquainted with several circumstances of history from the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, with which it begins, till near his own times, contained in the first and former part of the second book, and so committed many involuntary errors therein. He published his Antiquities eighteen years afterwards, in the 13th year of Domitian, A.D. 93, when he was much more completely acquainted with those ancient times. Accordingly he then reviewed those parts of this work, and gave the public a more faithful, complete, and accurate account of the facts therein related; and honestly corrected the errors he had before run into.—W.

of such as live under the empire of the Romans, to translate those books into the Greek tongue, which I, Josephus, the son of Matthias, by birth a Hebrew, a priest also, and one who at first fought against the Romans myself, and was forced to be present at what was done afterwards, formerly composed in the language of our country, and sent to the Upper Barbarians.<sup>1</sup>

§ 2. Now at the time when this most important event happened, the affairs of the Romans themselves were in a bad situation, for the Jews who were for innovation, who were in a flourishing condition both as regarded strength and riches, rose up in insurrection just when the times were disturbed, insomuch that affairs in the East were then in exceeding confusion, as some hoped for gain, and others were afraid of loss, and the Jews hoped that all of their nation who were beyond the Euphrates would have risen up in insurrection with them. The Gauls also in the neighbourhood of the Romans were in commotion, and the Celts were not quiet, but all was in disorder after the death of Nero. And the opportunity now offered induced many to aim at royal power, and the soldiers were enamoured of change from the hope of gain. I thought it therefore monstrous to see the truth falsified in affairs of such great consequence, and to suffer those Greeks and Romans that took no part in the war to be ignorant of these things, and to read either flatteries or fictions, while the Parthians, and Babylonians, and remotest Arabians, and those of our own nation beyond the Euphrates, and the Adiabeni, knew accurately by my labours why the war begun, and what miseries it brought upon us, and how it ended.

§ 3. And yet these writers have the confidence to call their accounts histories, though they seem to me to fail of their own purpose, in addition to their relating nothing that is sound. For they wish to demonstrate the greatness of the Romans, while they still diminish and lessen the actions of the Jews; but I do not see how they can appear to be great who have only conquered those that were little.

<sup>1</sup> Who those Upper Barbarians, remote from the sea, were, Josephus himself informs us, § 2, viz., the Parthians and Babylonians, and remotest Arabians, besides the Jews beyond the Euphrates, and the Adiabeni, or Assyrians.—W.

Nor are they ashamed to overlook the length of the war, the numbers of the Roman forces who so greatly suffered in it, and the greatness of the commanders, whose many struggles to take Jerusalem will be deemed inglorious, if what they achieved be reckoned but a small matter.

§ 4. However, I have determined not to go to the other extreme, in opposition to those men who extol the Romans, and to raise the actions of my countrymen too high, but I shall relate the actions of both parties with accuracy, only I shall suit my language to my feelings as to the affairs I describe, and shall indulge some lamentations upon the miseries of my country. For that our own factions destroyed it, and that it was the tyrants among the Jews who brought the Roman forces upon us against their will, and occasioned the burning of our holy temple, Titus Cæsar, who destroyed it, is himself a witness, who, during the entire war, pitied the people who were kept under by the factious, and often voluntarily delayed the taking of the city, and protracted the siege, in order to give the authors of the war time for repentance. And if any one blames me for my accusing the tyrants or robbers, or for bewailing the misfortunes of our country, let him indulge my sorrow in this, though it be contrary to the rules of writing history; for our city Jerusalem, which had arrived at a higher degree of felicity than any other city under the Romans, at last fell into the sorest of calamities. At any rate it appears to me that the misfortunes of all men from the beginning of the world, if they be compared to these of the Jews, are not so considerable, and as the authors of them were not foreigners, it makes it impossible for me to contain my lamentations. But if any one be a judge too hard for pity, let him assign the facts to history, and the lamentations to the writer himself only.

§ 5. However, I might justly censure the learned men among the Greeks, who, when such great actions have been done in their own times, which by comparison quite eclipse the old wars, do yet sit as judges of those affairs, and severely criticize the best writers of antiquity, for though they may be superior to the old writers in eloquence, yet are they inferior to them in the execution of what they intend to do : for they write themselves about the Assyrians and Medes, as if the ancient writers had not described their affairs well enough, although they are as far inferior to them in abilities, as they are different in their notions from them. For of old every one was anxious to write what happened in his own time, where their presence at the actions made their narration of value, and where to write lies for those who knew the facts would turn to their disgrace. But to preserve to memory what has been before recorded, and to represent the affairs of one's own time to those that come afterwards, is really worthy of praise and commendation ; and he is not industrious who only alters the arrangement and order of other men's works, but he who relates what is new and composes an entire body of history of his own. And I have been at great expense and have taken very great pains, though I am a foreigner, and dedicate this work, as a memorial of great actions, both to the Greeks and Romans. But for some of our own men, their mouths are wide open, and their tongues loosed, at once for gain and lawsuits, but are quite muzzled up when they are to write history, where they must speak truth and gather facts together with a great deal of pains ; and so they leave the writing such histories to inferior people, and to such as are not acquainted with the actions of princes. But let the real truth of historical facts be preferred by us, since it is neglected among the Greeks.

§ 6. To write the Antiquities of the Jews, as who they were, and how they left the Egyptians, and what region they travelled over, and what countries they occupied afterwards, and how they were removed out of them, I think to be now unseasonable and also superfluous, since many Jews before me have written the history of our ancestors accurately, as some of the Greeks have done also, having translated them into their own tongue, and have not much wandered from the truth. But I shall begin my history where the writers of these affairs and our prophets leave off. Now as to what concerns the war which happened in my own time, I shall narrate all that with much detail, and with all the diligence I am able, but shall briefly run over what preceded mine own age.

§ 7. I shall relate then how Antiochus, who was named

Epiphanes, took Jerusalem by storm, and held it three years and three months, and was then ejected out of the country by the sons of Asamonæus; and next how their posterity quarrelled about the kingdom, and dragged into their affairs the Romans and Pompey; and how Herod, the son of Antipater, put an end to their rule, bringing in Sossius upon them; and also how our people rose in insurrection upon Herod's death, when Augustus was the Roman emperor, and Quintilius Varus was in our country; and how the war broke out in the twelfth year of Nero, as also what happened under Cestius; and what places the Jews assaulted in a hostile manner in the first movements of the war.

§ 8. I shall also relate how they built walls about the neighbouring cities; and how Nero, upon Cestius' defeat, was in fear about the issue of the war, and so made Vespasian general in it, and how this Vespasian, with the elder of his sons,<sup>1</sup> made an expedition into the country of Judæa, and what Roman force he took with him, and how many of his auxiliaries were cut off throughout all Galilee; and how he took some of its cities by storm, and how others surrendered. I shall then describe the good order of the Romans in war, and the discipline of their legions, and the size of both the Galilees, and their nature, and the limits of Judæa, and the peculiarities of the district, and the lakes and fountains that are in it, and what miseries happened to each city as it was taken, and all this I shall describe with accuracy as I saw or suffered. For I shall not conceal any of the calamities I myself endured, since I shall relate them to such as know the facts.

§ 9. After this I shall relate how Nero died, when the fortunes of the Jews were become very bad, and how Vespasian, as he was hastening to Jerusalem, was called off to become emperor, and what omens happened to him in relation to that, and how he reached Rome, and how he was made emperor by the soldiers against his will, and how, upon his return to Egypt, to take the chief command, the Jews became very riotous; as also how the tyrants rose up against them, and their own mutual dissensions.

§ 10. I shall also relate how Titus marched from Egypt

into Judæa the second time ; as also how and where he concentrated his forces, and how many they were, and what state the city was in in respect to faction at his coming ; and what attacks he made, and how many earthworks he threw up : also of the three walls that invested the city, and of their measures ; also of the strength of the city. I shall also relate accurately the structure of the temple and sanctuary, as also the measures of those edifices, and of the altar, and some of their habits at festivals, and their seven purifications, and the sacred ministrations of the priests, as also the vestments of the priests and of the high priest ; and of the nature of the holy place of the temple, without concealing anything, or adding anything to what is generally known.

§ 11. I shall next relate the barbarity of the tyrants towards their fellow-countrymen, as also the clemency of the Romans to foreigners ; and how often Titus, in his desire to preserve the city and the temple, invited the rebels to come to terms of accommodation. I shall also distinguish the sufferings and calamities of the people, and how far they were afflicted by the war, and how far by the faction, and how far by famine, till at last Jerusalem was taken. Nor shall I omit to mention the misfortunes of the deserters, nor the punishments inflicted on the captives : as also how the temple was burnt against the wish of Titus, and how many of the sacred treasures of the temple were rescued out of the fire ; and the destruction of the entire city, and the signs and wonders that preceded it ; and the taking the tyrants captive, and the multitude of those that were made slaves, and their various fortunes. I shall also relate how the Romans followed up the remains of the war, and how they demolished the strongholds, and how Titus went over the whole country and settled affairs ; together with his return to Italy and triumph.

§ 12. I have included all these things in seven books, and have left no occasion for blame or accusation to such as are acquainted with or took part in this war, and I have written it for those who love truth, not for those who read merely for pleasure. And I shall begin my account of these as I stated in my recapitulation.

BOOK I.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SEVEN YEARS, FROM THE TAKING OF JERUSALEM BY ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, TO THE DEATH OF HEROD THE GREAT.

CHAP. I.

How the City of Jerusalem was taken, and the Temple pillaged, by Antiochus Epiphanes. Also concerning the Actions of the Maccabees, Matthias and Judas, and the Death of Judas.

§ 1.

AT the time that Antiochus, who was called Epiphanes, contended with the sixth Ptolemy about his right to all Syria, a great strife fell out among the men of power in Judæa, and they had a struggle for power, as each of those that were in authority could not endure to be subject to his equals. And Onias, one of the high priests, got the best of it, and expelled the sons of Tobias from the city. And they fled to Antiochus, and besought him to make use of them for his guides, and to make an expedition into Judæa. The king complied with them, being disposed thereto beforehand, and set out with a great army, and took Jerusalem by storm, and slew a great multitude of those that favoured Ptolemy, and sent out his soldiers to plunder them without mercy. He also himself spoiled the temple, and put a stop to the constant practice of offering daily sacrifices for three years and six months. But Onias, the high priest, fled to Ptolemy, and received a place from him in the district of Heliopolis,<sup>1</sup> where he built a little city resembling Jerusalem, and a similar temple, concerning which I shall speak more hereafter in its proper place.

§ 2. Now Antiochus was not satisfied either with his unexpected capture of the city, or with its pillage, or with the great slaughter he had made there, but being a slave to his violent passions, and remembering what he had suffered during the siege, he tried to compel the Jews to break the laws of their country, and to keep their infants uncircumcised, and to sacrifice swine's flesh upon the altar; which they all disobeyed, and the most esteemed among them were put to death. Bacchides also, who was sent by Antiochus as commander of the fortresses with these wicked orders, from his own natural barbarity indulged in excessive lawlessness, and tormented the worthiest of the inhabitants, man by man, and threatened the city every day with open destruction; till at length he provoked the poor sufferers by his excessive outrages to avenge themselves.

§ 3. For Matthias, the son of Asamonæus, one of the priests who lived in a village called Modein,<sup>1</sup> armed himself and his family (he had five sons), and slew Bacchides with daggers; and forthwith, from fear of the many garrisons [of the enemy], fled to the mountains, and so many of the people followed him, that he took courage and came down from the mountains, and gave battle to Antiochus' generals, whom he beat and drove out of Judæa. So he became all powerful by his success, and (because he had expelled the foreigners) became the prince of his own people at their own wish, and when he died, left the government to Judas, his eldest son.

§ 4. Now Judas, supposing that Antiochus would not remain quiet, gathered together an army of his own countrymen, and was the first that made a league of friendship with the Romans, and drove Epiphanes out of the country, when he made a second expedition into it, inflicting on him a great defeat. And being warmed by this great success, he made an assault upon the garrison that was in the city, for it had not been cut off hitherto, and ejected it from the upper part of the city, which was called the Citadel, and drove the soldiers into the lower. He then got the temple in his power, and cleansed the whole place, and walled it round about, and made new vessels for sacred ministrations, and brought them into the temple, because the former vessels had been profaned, and built another altar, and began to offer the daily sacrifices. And when the city had already received its sacred constitution again, Antiochus died, and his son Antiochus succeeded him in the kingdom, and in his hatred to the Jews also.

§ 5. So he got together fifty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, and eighty elephants, and marched through Judæa into the mountainous parts. He then took Bethsura,<sup>1</sup> which was a small city, but at a place called Bethzacharias,<sup>2</sup> where there was a narrow pass, Judas met him with his army. However, before the forces joined battle, Judas' brother Eleazar, seeing the very biggest of the elephants adorned with a large tower and trappings of gold, and supposing that Antiochus himself was upon him, ran a great way before his own army, and cutting his way through the press of the enemies got up to the elephant. But he could not reach him who seemed to be the king because of his high position, but he ran his weapon into the belly of the beast, and brought him down upon himself, and was crushed to death, having done no more than attempted great things, and showed that he preferred glory to life. Now he that rode on the elephant was but a private soldier, and even had he proved to be Antiochus, Eleazar would have done nothing more by this bold stroke than show he chose to die, when he had the bare hope of doing a glorious action. Nay, his death proved an omen to his brother how the battle would end. It is true that the Jews contested it bravely for a long time, but the king's forces being superior in numbers, and having fortune on their side, obtained the victory. And when a great many of his men were slain, Judas took the rest with him, and fled to the toparchy of Gophnitis.<sup>3</sup> And Antiochus went to Jerusalem, and stayed there but a few days, for he was in want of provisions, and so went away. He left, indeed, a garrison behind him, such as he thought sufficient, but drew the rest of his army off to winter in Syria.

§ 6. Now, after the king was departed, Judas was not idle; for many of his own nation came to him, and he gathered together those that had escaped out of the battle, and again engaged with Antiochus' generals at a village called Adasa,<sup>1</sup> and having greatly distinguished himself in the battle, and slain a great number of the enemy, he was at last himself slain also. And not many days afterwards his brother John had a plot laid against him by those who were of Antiochus' party, and was slain by them.

CHAP. II.

§ 1.

JONATHAN, who was Judas' brother, succeeded him, and behaved himself with great circumspection in all other respects with relation to his own people, and strengthened his authority by his friendship with the Romans, and also made a league with Antiochus' son.<sup>2</sup> Yet was not all this sufficient for his security. For the tyrant Trypho, who was guardian to Antiochus' son, laid a plot against him, and first endeavoured to take off his friends, and captured Jonathan by stratagem, as he was going with a few persons to Ptolemais<sup>3</sup> to Antiochus, and put him in bonds, and then marched against the Jews; but being repulsed by Simon, who was Jonathan's brother, he was enraged at his defeat, and put Jonathan to death.

§ 2. Now Simon managed public affairs in a courageous manner, and took Gazara<sup>4</sup> and Joppa<sup>5</sup> and Jamnia,<sup>6</sup> which were cities in the neighbourhood, and also conquered the garrison, and demolished the Citadel at Jerusalem. He afterwards helped Antiochus against Trypho, whom he besieged in Dora,<sup>1</sup> before he went on his expedition against the Medes. Yet could not he make the king ashamed of his ambition, though he had assisted him in killing Trypho; for it was not long ere Antiochus sent Cendebæus his general with an army to lay waste Judæa, and to subdue Simon. But though he was now in years, he conducted the war as if he were a young man, and sent his sons with a strong band against Cendebæus, while he took part of the army himself, and attacked him in another quarter. He also laid a great many men in ambush in many places among the mountains, and overcame the enemy in all his attacks upon them. And having been conqueror in so glorious a manner, he was made high priest, and freed the Jews, after a period of a hundred and seventy years, from the dominion of the Macedonians.

§ 3. This Simon had also a plot laid against him, and was slain at a feast by his son-in-law Ptolemy, who put his wife and two sons into prison, and sent some persons to kill the third, John, who was also called Hyrcanus. But as the young man was informed beforehand of their coming, he made haste to get to the city, having very great confidence in the people there, both on account of the memory of the glorious actions of his father, and of their hatred to the lawlessness of Ptolemy. Ptolemy also made an attempt to get into the city by another gate, but was quickly repelled by the people, who had just admitted Hyrcanus; so he retired presently to one of the fortresses beyond Jericho, which was called Dagon.<sup>2</sup> Now, when Hyrcanus had received the high priesthood, which his father had held before, and had offered sacrifice to God, he made great haste to attack Ptolemy, that he might bring aid to his mother and brothers.

§ 4. So he laid siege to the fortress, and was superior to Ptolemy in other respects, but was overcome by his just grief. For as Ptolemy was pressed hard, he brought out Hyrcanus' mother and brothers, and set them upon the wall, and beat them with rods in every body's sight, and threatened, unless Hyrcanus went away immediately, that he would throw them down headlong; at which sight Hyrcanus' commiseration and concern were too much for his anger. But his mother was not dismayed, either at the stripes she received, or at the death with which she was threatened, but stretched out her hands, and begged her son not to be so moved by the injuries she suffered as to spare the wretch, since it was better for her to die at the hands of Ptolemy than to live for ever, provided he could be punished for the injuries he had done to their family. Now whenever John considered the courage of his mother, and heard her entreaty, he was incited to the attack, but whenever he saw her beaten and torn to pieces with stripes, he was unnerved and entirely overcome by grief. And as the siege was protracted in this way, the year of rest came on, for the Jews rest every seventh year, as they do every seventh day. In this year, therefore, Ptolemy was freed from the siege, and slew the brothers of John with their mother, and fled to Zeno, who was surnamed Cotylas, who was the tyrant of Philadelphia.<sup>1</sup>

§ 5. And now Antiochus was so angry at what he had suffered at the hands of Simon, that he made an expedition into Judæa, and sat down before Jerusalem, and besieged Hyrcanus. But he opened the tomb of David, who was the richest of the kings, and took thence more than three thousand talents in money, and bribed Antiochus by three hundred talents to raise the siege. Hyrcanus was the first of the Jews that had money enough, and so begun to maintain mercenary troops.

§ 6. At another time, when Antiochus was gone upon an expedition against the Medes, and so gave him an opportunity of being revenged upon him, Hyrcanus immediately marched upon the cities of Syria, thinking, as proved to be the case, that he would find them empty of fighting men. So he took Medaba,<sup>2</sup> and Samæa,<sup>3</sup> with the towns in their neighbourhood, as also Shechem<sup>4</sup> and Garizin;<sup>5</sup> and besides these [he subdued] the nation of the Chuthæans, who dwelt in the neighbourhood of the temple built in imitation of the temple at Jerusalem. He also took many other cities of Idumæa,<sup>1</sup> and Adoreus<sup>2</sup> and Marissa.<sup>3</sup>

§ 7. He also proceeded as far as Samaria, where is now the city Sebaste, which was built by Herod the king, and invested it on all sides, and set his sons Aristobulus and Antigonus over the siege; who pushed it on so hard, that famine so prevailed within the city, that the inhabitants were forced to eat most strange food. So they invited Antiochus, who was surnamed Aspendius, to come to their assistance, and he willingly complied with their invitation, but was beaten by Aristobulus and Antigonus; and indeed he was pursued by the brothers as far as Scythopolis<sup>4</sup> in his flight from them. And they returned back to Samaria,<sup>5</sup> and closely blockaded its population again, and when they had taken the city, they demolished it, and made slaves of its inhabitants. And as they still had great success in their undertakings, they did not suffer their zeal to cool, but marched with an army as far as Scythopolis, and overran it, and laid waste all the country that lay within Mount Carmel.

§ 8. But now these successes of John and his sons made them envied, and occasioned a sedition among their fellow-countrymen, and many mustered together against them, and would not be at rest till they broke out into open war, when they were beaten. So John lived the rest of his life very happily, and administered the government in an excellent manner for thirty-three entire years, and then died, leaving five sons behind him. He was certainly a very happy man, and had no occasion to complain of fortune in his case. At any rate he alone had three of the most desirable things in the world, the government of his nation, and the high priesthood, and the gift of prophecy. For the Deity conversed with him, so that he was not ignorant of any thing that was to happen afterwards, insomuch that he foresaw and foretold that his two eldest sons would not continue at the head of affairs: and it will be worth while to describe their end, and how far they came short of their father in happiness.

CHAP. III.

How Aristobulus was the first that wore a Diadem on his Head, and after he had put his Mother and Brother Antigonus to death, died himself, when he had reigned no more than a Year.

§ 1.

FOR after the death of their father, Aristobulus, the elder of them, changed the government into a kingdom, and was the first that put a diadem upon his head, four hundred and seventy-one years and three months after our people returned to their own country, after being set free from the Babylonian slavery. Now, of his brothers, he appeared to have most affection for Antigonus, who was next to him, and he treated him as his equal, but as for the rest, he bound them, and put them in prison. He also put his mother in bonds for contesting the government with him, for John had left her at the head of affairs, and proceeded to that degree of barbarity as to cause her to be starved to death in prison.

§ 2. But vengeance came upon him at last in the case of his brother Antigonus, whom he loved and made his partner in the kingdom; for he slew him also owing to the calumnies which wicked men about the court fabricated against him. At first, indeed, Aristobulus would not believe their reports, partly from the affection he had for his brother, and partly because he thought that a great part of these tales sprang only from envy; however, as Antigonus came in a splendid manner from an expedition to the feast, wherein our ancient custom is to make tabernacles for God, it happened during those days that Aristobulus was ill, and at the end of the feast Antigonus went up to the temple with his armed men about him, and dressed in the finest manner possible, to pray to God earnestly on behalf of his brother. Meantime these wicked men came to the king, and told him of the procession of armed men, and of the elation of Antigonus, too great for a private person, and said that he was at hand with a great band of men to kill Aristobulus; for he could not endure the bare enjoyment of royal honour, when it was in his power to have the kingdom himself.

§ 3. Now it was only by degrees and unwillingly that Aristobulus gave credit to these accusations, and he took care not to show his suspicion openly, but to make himself secure against any accidents, so he placed his body-guards in a dark subterranean passage; for he lay ill in a place formerly called Baris, though afterwards its name was changed to Antonia;<sup>1</sup> and he gave orders, that if Antigonus came unarmed, they should let him alone, but if he came in his armour, they should kill him. He also sent some to tell Antigonus beforehand to come unarmed. But in reference to this the queen very cunningly acted in concert with those that plotted against Antigonus, for she urged those that were sent to conceal the king's message, and to tell Antigonus that his brother had heard he had got a very fine suit of armour made in Galilee with fine martial ornaments, and because his present illness hindered him from coming and seeing it, he very much desired to see him now in his armour, "because, (said he,) in a little time you are going away from me."

§ 4. As soon as Antigonus heard this (the good disposition of his brother to him not allowing him to suspect any harm), he came with his armour on to show it to his brother; but as he was going along that dark passage, which was called Strato's Tower, he was slain by the body-guards, and became a clear proof how calumny destroys all good-will and natural affection, and how none of our good feelings are strong enough to resist envy perpetually.

§ 5. But one might marvel at the account of the conduct of Judas upon this occasion. He was of the sect of the Essenes, and had never erred or been deceived in his predictions before. Now as he saw Antigonus passing along by the temple, he cried out to his friends (for not a few attended upon him as his scholars), "Alas! it is good for me to die now, since truth is dead before me, and something that I have foretold has proved false. For Antigonus is here alive, who ought to have died this day; and the place where he was fated to be slain is Strato's Tower, which is six hundred furlongs from this place; and yet four hours of this day are already over, so that the time falsifies the prediction." When the old man had said this, he was dejected in his mind, and so continued. But a little time after news came that Antigonus was slain in a subterranean place, which was itself also called Strato's Tower, as well as Cæsarea on the coast, and it was this ambiguity that troubled the prophet.

§ 6. However, Aristobulus soon repented of the great crime he had been guilty of, and his remorse made his illness grow worse, and his mind being constantly disturbed at the thoughts of the murder he had done, he wasted away, till his bowels being lacerated by the intolerable grief he was in, he threw up a great quantity of blood. And as one of the pages that attended him carried out that blood, by some supernatural providence he slipped and fell down in the very place where Antigonus had been slain, and so he spilt some of the murderer's blood upon the still visible stains of blood of him that had been murdered. Thereupon a lamentable cry arose among the spectators, as if the page had spilt the blood on purpose in that place; and as the king heard that cry, he inquired what was the cause of it? And as nobody ventured to tell him, he pressed them so much the more, desiring to know what was the matter; so at last, when he had threatened them, and forced them to speak out, they told him the truth. Thereupon he burst into tears, and groaned, and said, "So I perceive I am not like to escape the great eye of God, as to the atrocious crimes I have committed, but swift vengeance pursues me for the blood of my kinsman. O most shameful body, how long wilt thou retain a soul that ought to die for a mother and a brother slain? how long shall I myself spend my blood drop by drop? Let them take it all at once; and let their manes be no longer disappointed by my bowels being offered to them piecemeal." As soon as he had said these words he died, having reigned only a year.

CHAP. IV.

What Actions were done by Alexander, who reigned Twenty-seven Years.

§ 1.

AND now the king's widow set free the king's brothers, and made Alexander king, who both from his age and moderation appeared preferable to the rest. And he, when he came to the throne, slew one of his brothers who aimed at the kingdom himself, but held the remaining one left in great esteem, as loving a quiet life, and not meddling in public affairs.

§ 2. Now it happened that there was a battle between him and Ptolemy, who was called Lathurus, who had taken the city of Asochis.<sup>1</sup> He indeed slew many of his enemies, but the victory inclined to Ptolemy. But when this Ptolemy was pursued by his mother Cleopatra, and retired into Egypt, Alexander besieged Gadara,<sup>2</sup> and took it, as also Amathus,<sup>3</sup> which was the strongest of all the fortresses beyond the Jordan, and in it were the most precious of all the possessions of Theodorus the son of Zeno. But Theodorus suddenly attacked him, and took what belonged to himself as well as the king's baggage, and slew about ten thousand of the Jews. However, Alexander recovered this blow, and turned towards the maritime parts, and took Raphia<sup>4</sup> and Gaza,<sup>5</sup> and also Anthedon,<sup>6</sup> which was afterwards called Agrippias by king Herod.

§ 3. But when he had reduced these cities to slavery, the nation of the Jews made an insurrection against him at a festival; for seditions generally break out at those feasts. And it looked as if he would not be able to escape the plot they had laid for him, had not his foreign troops of Pisidians and Cilicians assisted him : for, as to the Syrians, he never admitted them among his mercenary troops, on account of their innate enmity to the Jewish nation. And when he had slain more than six thousand of the rebels, he made an incursion into Arabia, and when he had subdued the Gileadites and Moabites there, he enjoined them to pay him tribute, and returned to Amathus. And, as Theodorus was thunderstruck at his great success, he found the fortress of Amathus undefended, and rased it to the ground.

§ 4. But afterwards, when he fought with Obedas, king of the Arabians, who laid an ambush for him near Gaulane,<sup>1</sup> he lost his entire army, as it was crowded together in a deep valley, and trodden to pieces by the multitude of camels. And, when he had escaped to Jerusalem, he provoked the nation who had long hated him to make an insurrection against him from the greatness of his reverses. However, he was then too strong for them, and in several successive battles slew no less than fifty thousand of the Jews in six years. But he had no reason to rejoice in these victories, since he did but exhaust his own kingdom ; so that at last he left off fighting, and endeavoured to be reconciled to his subjects. But this change and inconsistency in his conduct made them hate him still more. And when he asked them why they so hated him, and what he should do in order to appease them ? they said by dying ; indeed it would be all they could do then to be reconciled to him, who had done such harm to them, even when he was dead. At the same time they invited to their aid Demetrius, who was surnamed Eucærus ; and as he readily complied with their request in hopes of great advantages, and came with his army, the Jews joined these their auxiliaries near Shechem.<sup>2</sup>

§ 5. However, Alexander met both these forces with a thousand horse, and eight thousand foot, who were mercenaries. He had also with him about ten thousand Jews who were faithful to him. But his enemies had three thousand horse, and fourteen thousand foot. Now, before they joined battle, the kings made proclamation, and endeavoured to draw off each other's soldiers, for Demetrius hoped to induce Alexander's mercenaries to leave him, and Alexander hoped to induce the Jews that were with Demetrius to leave him. But since neither the Jews would leave off their rage, nor the Greeks prove unfaithful, they came to an engagement, and to a close fight with their weapons; in which battle Demetrius was the conqueror, although Alexander's mercenaries showed the greatest bravery both of soul and body. But the upshot of the battle proved different from what was expected on both sides; for not only did those that had invited Demetrius not continue with him, though he was conqueror, but six thousand Jews, out of pity at the reverse of Alexander, came over to him when he had fled to the mountains. Demetrius could not bear this turn of affairs, but supposing that Alexander was already a match for him again, and that all the nation would go back to him, went his way home.

§ 6. However, the rest of the Jewish people did not lay aside their animosity to Alexander when Demetrius and his force were gone, but they had a perpetual war with him, until he had slain the greatest part of them, and driven the rest into the city of Bemeselis,<sup>1</sup> and when he had demolished that city, he carried the captives to Jerusalem. And now his rage had grown so excessive, that his savageness proceeded to the degree of impiety; for when he had had eight hundred of those that were taken hung upon crosses in the midst of the city, he had the throats of their wives and children cut before their eyes, and he gazed at all this as he was drinking and reclining with his concubines. Thereupon such dejection seized the people, that eight thousand of his opponents fled away the very next night from all Judæa, whose exile was terminated only by Alexander's death. Thus at last, though not without great difficulty, he procured by such actions quiet for his kingdom, and rested from arms.

§ 7. But Antiochus, who was surnamed Dionysus, became a source of troubles to him again. He was the brother of Demetrius, and the last of the Seleucidæ. Alexander was afraid of him, when he was marching against the Arabians; so he cut a deep trench between Antipatris,<sup>2</sup> which was near the mountains, and the shores of Joppa ; and also erected a high wall before the trench, and built wooden towers, in order to obstruct and render difficult his approach. However, he was not able to exclude Antiochus, for he burnt the towers and filled up the trench, and marched on with his army. And postponing his revenge on Alexander for endeavouring to stop him, he marched at once against the Arabians, whose king retired into such parts of the country as were fittest for engaging the enemy, and then suddenly made his horse wheel round, who were in number ten thousand, and fell upon Antiochus' army while they were in disorder. And a terrible battle ensued, and Antiochus' troops, as long as he was alive, held out, although a mighty slaughter was made of them by the Arabians ; but when he fell, (for he was always in the front, rallying his beaten troops,) they all gave ground, and most of his army were cut to pieces, either in the action or the flight ; and as for the rest, who fled to the village of Cana,<sup>1</sup> it happened that they all perished for want of necessaries, a few only excepted.

§ 8. After this the people of Damascus, in their hatred to Ptolemy, the son of Mennæus, invited in Aretas and made him king of Cœle-Syria.<sup>2</sup> He also made an expedition into Judæa, and beat Alexander in battle, but afterwards retired by mutual agreement. But Alexander, when he had taken Pella,<sup>3</sup> marched to Gerasa,<sup>4</sup> moved by a covetous desire for Theodorus' possessions, and when he had built a triple wall about the garrison, he took the place by force. He also demolished Gaulane<sup>5</sup> and Seleucia,<sup>6</sup> and what was called the Valley of Antiochus ;<sup>7</sup> besides which, he took the strong fortress of Gamala,<sup>8</sup> and stripped Demetrius who was governor of it of what he had, on account of the many crimes laid to his charge, and returned to Judæa, after he had been three whole years on this expedition. now he was kindly received by the nation because of the success he had had, but now he was at rest from war, he fell ill. For he was afflicted with a quartan ague, and thought that he would get rid of his complaint by exercising himself again in martial affairs; but by making such expeditions at unseasonable times, and forcing his body to undergo hardships greater than his strength, he brought himself to his end. He died, therefore, in the midst of his troubles, after he had reigned seven-and-twenty years.

CHAP. V.

§ 1.

NOW Alexander left the kingdom to Alexandra his wife, being sure that the Jews would very readily submit to her, because she had been very averse to such cruelty as he had treated them with, and had opposed his lawless acts, and had so got the good will of the people. Nor was he mistaken as to his hope; for his wife got the throne in consequence of her reputation for piety; for she accurately observed the ancient customs of her country, and cast those men out of the government that offended against their holy laws. And she made Hyrcanus, the elder of her two sons by Alexander, high priest, on account of his age, as also on account of his inactive temper, which indisposed him to disturb the public; but she kept the younger, Aristobulus, as a private person, because of his impetuosity.

§ 2. And now the Pharisees joined themselves to her, to assist her in the government. They are a body of Jews that appear more religious than others, and seem to interpret the laws more accurately. Now Alexandra attached herself to them in an extraordinary degree, being a woman of great piety towards God. And these Pharisees artfully insinuated themselves into her simplicity by little and little, and became themselves the real administrators of public affairs. They banished and recalled from exile, bound and loosed, whom they pleased, and in short had the enjoyment of the royal authority, whilst the expenses and the difficulties of it belonged to Alexandra. She was a sagacious woman in the management of great affairs, and intent always upon getting a large army together, so that she doubled her army, and procured a great body of foreign troops, till her own nation became not only powerful but terrible also to foreign potentates. So she governed other people, and the Pharisees governed her.

§ 3. Accordingly they themselves slew Diogenes, a person of note, who had been a friend of Alexander; having accused him of having advised the king to crucify the eight hundred men.<sup>1</sup> They also urged Alexandra to put to death the rest of those who had irritated Alexander against them. And as she gave way from her religious feelings, they wished to kill whom they pleased, but the most eminent of those that were in danger fled to Aristobulus, who urged his mother to spare the men on account of their position, but to expel them out of the city, unless she took them to be innocent; so they were suffered to go unpunished, and were dispersed all over the country. But when Alexandra sent her army to Damascus, on the pretext that Ptolemy was always oppressing that city, she got possession of it, nor did it make any considerable resistance. She also tried by agreements and presents to get Tigranes, king of Armenia, who lay with his troops before Ptolemais,<sup>2</sup> and besieged Cleopatra, to go away. But Tigranes raised the siege first, because of troubles at home, for Lucullus had invaded Armenia.

§ 4. In the meantime Alexandra fell ill, and Aristobulus, her younger son, took hold of this opportunity with his domestics (of whom he had many, who were all of them his friends on account of his warmth of heart,) and got possession of all the fortresses. He also used the money he found in them to get together a band of mercenary soldiers, and made himself king. At this, upon Hyrcanus' complaint, his mother commiserated his case, and put Aristo-bulus' wife and sons under restraint in Antonia, which was a fortress adjacent to the north slope of the temple. It was, as I have already said, of old called Baris,<sup>1</sup> but afterwards got the name of Antonia, when Antony was in power, just as the other cities, Sebaste<sup>2</sup> and Agrippias,<sup>3</sup> had their names changed from Sebastus and Agrippa. But Alexandra died before she could punish Aristobulus for deposing his brother, after she had reigned nine years.

CHAP. VI.

As Hyrcanus, who was Alexandra's Heir, receded from his Claim of the Crown, Aristobulus is made King, and afterwards the same Hyrcanus, by the agency of Antipater, is brought back by Aretas. At last Pompey is made the Arbitrator of the Dispute between the Brothers.

§ 1.

NOW Hyrcanus was heir to the kingdom, and his mother gave it him before she died, but Aristobulus was superior to him in power and spirit. And a battle having taken place between them for the kingdom near Jericho, most deserted Hyrcanus, and went over to Aristobulus. And Hyrcanus, with those of his party who remained with him, fled to Antonia, and got into his power hostages that might be for his safety (these were Aristobulus' wife and her children); but the brothers came to an agreement, before things came to extremities, that Aristobulus should be king, and Hyrcanus should resign that, but retain all the rest of his dignities, as being the king's brother. Thereupon they were reconciled to each other in the temple, and embraced one another in a very kind manner, as the people stood round; they also changed their houses, for Aristobulus went to the royal palace, and Hyrcanus retired to the house of Aristobulus.

tobulus were afraid at his thus unexpectedly obtaining the kingdom, and especially Antipater, whom Aristobulus hated of old. He was by race an Idumæan, and the principal man of his nation on account of his ancestors and riches and other power. He also urged Hyrcanus to flee to Aretas, the king of Arabia, and so to recover his kingdom, and at the same time he urged Aretas to receive Hyrcanus, and to restore him to his kingdom; he also cast great reproaches upon Aristobulus as to his morals, and gave great commendations to Hyrcanus, and exhorted Aretas to receive him, and told him how becoming a thing it would be for him, who ruled so great a kingdom, to extend his assistance to such as were unjustly treated; and he said Hyrcanus was treated unjustly, by being deprived of the dominions which belonged to him by the priority of his birth. And when he had predisposed them both to do what he would have them, he took Hyrcanus by night, and escaped from the city, and continuing his flight with great swiftness, got safe to the place called Petra,<sup>1</sup> which is the royal seat of the king of Arabia. There he put Hyrcanus into Aretas' hand, and by much conversation with Aretas, and gaining him over with many presents, he prevailed upon him to furnish him with an army that might restore Hyrcanus to his kingdom. This army consisted of fifty thousand foot and horse, against which Aristobulus was not able to make resistance, but was deserted at the first onset, and was forced into Jerusalem: and would also have been taken by force, had not Scaurus, the Roman general, come and seasonably interposed himself, and raised the siege. He was sent into Syria from Armenia by Pompey the Great, who was fighting against Tigranes: and he went to Damascus, which had been lately taken by Metellus and Lollius, and he removed them from there, and on hearing how the affairs of Judæa stood, he hastened there as to a windfall.

§ 3. And directly he entered the country, there came ambassadors from both the brothers, each of them desiring his assistance. But Aristobulus' three hundred talents had more weight with him than justice; for when

Scaurus had received that sum, he sent a herald to Hyrcanus and the Arabians, and threatened them with the resentment of the Romans and Pompey, unless they raised the siege. So Aretas was terrified, and retired from Judæa to Philadelphia,<sup>1</sup> and Scaurus returned to Damascus. But Aristobulus was not satisfied with not being captured, but gathered all his forces together, and pursued his enemies, and fought them at a place called Papyron,<sup>2</sup> and killed more than six thousand of them, and among them Antipater's brother, Phallion.

§ 4. When Hyrcanus and Antipater were thus deprived of the aid of the Arabians, they transferred their hope to their adversaries: and as Pompey had passed through Syria and come to Damascus, they fled to him for assistance; and without gifts they made the same equitable pleas that they had used to Aretas, and besought him to hate the violent behaviour of Aristobulus, and to restore the kingdom to him to whom it justly belonged, both on account of his character and priority in age. However, neither was Aristobulus wanting to himself, relying on the bribes that Scaurus had received, but was also present himself, attired as like a king as he was able. But thinking it beneath him to dance attendance upon Pompey, and not enduring to serve his own ends in a way so much more abject than his rank, he departed from Diospolis.<sup>3</sup>

§ 5. At this Pompey was very indignant, Hyrcanus also and his friends made great supplication to him, so he took not only his Roman forces, but many of his Syrian auxiliaries, and marched against Aristobulus. And when he had passed by Pella and Scythopolis, and was come to Coreæ,<sup>4</sup> where you enter into the country of Judæa, when you go to it through the inland parts, he heard that Aristobulus had fled to Alexandrium,<sup>5</sup> which is a stronghold fortified with the utmost magnificence, and situated upon a high mountain, and he sent to him and commanded him to come down. Now Aristobulus' inclination was to try his fortune in battle, since he was summoned in such an imperious manner, rather than to comply with that summons; but he saw the people were in great fear, and his friends exhorted him to consider how irresistible the power of the Romans was. So he complied with their advice, and came down to Pompey; and when he had made a long defence as to the justice of his taking the kingdom, he returned to the fortress. And when his brother summoned him again, he came down and spoke about the justice of his claim, and then went away without any hindrance from Pompey. So he was between hope and fear, and he came down to importune Pompey to entrust every thing to him, and he went up again to the citadel, not to appear to debase himself too low. When Pompey however commanded him to give up his fortified places, and forced him to write to every one of their commanders to yield them up, for they had had this charge given them to obey no letters but such as were in his own handwriting, he did what he was ordered to do, but was very indignant at what was done, and retired to Jerusalem, and made preparations to fight against Pompey.

§ 6. But Pompey did not give him time to make much preparation, but followed close at his heels, being further obliged to make haste owing to the death of Mithridates, of which he was informed near Jericho, where is the most fruitful country of Judæa, which produces a great number of palm trees, besides the balsam tree, whose trunks they cut with sharp stones, and at the incisions gather the juice which exudes. And Pompey pitched his camp in that place one night, and pushed on the next morning to Jerusalem; but Aristobulus was so dismayed at his approach, that he came and met him as a suppliant, and promised him money, and to put both himself and the city at his disposal, and so mitigated the anger of Pompey. However, he did not perform any of the conditions he had agreed to; for Aristobulus' party would not so much as admit Gabinius, who was sent to receive the promised money, into the city.

CHAP. VII.

How Pompey had the City of Jerusalem delivered up to him, but took the Temple by Storm. How he went into the Holy of Holies ; also his other Exploits in Judæa.

§ 1.

AT this Pompey was very angry, and detained Aristobulus in bonds, and went to the city, and looked about where he might make his attack ; for he saw that the walls were so strong, that it would be hard to attack them, and that the ravine before the walls was terrible, and that the temple, which was within that ravine, was surrounded with a very strong wall, insomuch that if the city were taken, the temple would be a second line of defence for the enemy to retire to.

§ 2. Now as he was a long time deliberating about this matter, a sedition arose among the people within the city, Aristobulus' party demanding to fight and set their king at liberty, while the party of Hyrcanus were for opening the gates to Pompey ; and dread made these last a very numerous party, when they looked upon the good order of the Roman soldiers. So Aristobulus' party lost the day and retired into the temple, and cut off the communication between the temple and the city, by breaking down the bridge that joined them together, and prepared to hold out to the utmost. But as the others received the Romans into the city, and delivered up the palace, Pompey sent Piso, one of the generals under him, into that palace with an army, who distributed a garrison about the city, because he could not persuade any of those that had fled to the temple to come to terms of accommodation ; he then made arrangements all round for attack, having Hyrcanus' party very ready to afford both counsel and assistance.

§ 3. Then Pompey himself filled up the trench that was on the north slope of the temple and the entire ravine also, the army itself bringing up the materials for that purpose. And indeed it was a hard thing to fill up the ravine because of its immense depth, especially as the Jews used all possible means to repel them from above; nor would the Romans have succeeded in their endeavours, had not Pompey utilized the seventh days, on which the Jews abstain from all sorts of work for religious worship, and raised his bank then, but restrained his soldiers from fighting on those days; for the Jews only acted on the defensive on sabbath-days. And as soon as Pompey had filled up the ravine, he erected high towers upon the bank, and brought up those engines which had been fetched from Tyre near to the wall, and tried to batter it down. And the slingers of stones beat off those above them and repulsed them: but the towers on this side of the city made very great resistance, and were extraordinarily big and handsome.

§ 4. Then indeed, as the Romans were very distressed, Pompey could not but marvel not only at the other proofs of the Jews' fortitude, but especially that they did not at all intermit their religious services, even when they were deluged with darts on all sides. For as if the city was in profound peace, the daily sacrifices and purifications, and every part of their religious worship, were still performed to God with the utmost exactness. Nor indeed, when the temple was actually taken, and they were every day slain round the altar, did they leave off their usual worship. For it was in the third month of the siege before the Romans could with great difficulty overthrow one of the towers and get into the temple. Now the first of all that ventured to get over the wall, was Faustus Cornelius, the son of Sulla; and next after him were two centurions, Furius and Fabius; and each of these was followed by his own company of men, who surrounded the Jews on all sides, and slew some of them as they were running for shelter to the temple, and others as they resisted for a while.

§ 5. And now many of the priests, even when they saw their enemies advancing with swords in their hands, calmly went on with divine worship, and were slain as they were offering drink-offerings, and burning incense, preferring their duties to God to their own preservation. Most were slain by their own countrymen of the adverse faction, and an innumerable multitude threw themselves down precipices; nay, there were some who were so distracted at the terrible position they were in, that they set fire to the buildings that were near the wall, and were burnt with them. And twelve thousand of the Jews were slain, while very few of the Romans were dead, but a great many were wounded.

§ 6. But nothing affected the nation so much, in the calamities they were now in, as that their holy place, which had been hitherto seen by none, should be laid open to strangers. Pompey, at any rate, and his suite went into the temple itself, where it was not lawful for any one to enter but the high priest, and saw what was deposited therein, the candlestick and the lamps and the table and the pouring vessels and the censers, all made entirely of gold, also a great quantity of spices heaped together, and two thousand talents of sacred money. Yet did not he touch that money, nor any thing else that was there deposited; but he commanded the priests of the temple, the very next day after he had taken it, to cleanse it, and to perform their accustomed sacrifices. Moreover, he made Hyrcanus high priest, as one having not only in other respects shown great zeal during the siege, but having also been the means of hindering the people in the district from fighting for Aristobulus, which they were very desirous to do. In this way he acted the part of a good general, and reconciled the people to him more by goodwill than fear. Now, among the captives, Aristobulus' father-in-law was taken, who was also his uncle. And Pompey punished those that were the chief authors of the war by beheading, but rewarded Faustus and those that had fought so bravely with him with glorious presents, and laid a tribute upon the country and upon Jerusalem itself.

§ 7. He also took away from the Jews all those cities they had taken in Coele-Syria, and made them subject to him that was at that time appointed to be the Roman general there, and confined Judæa within its proper bounds. He also rebuilt Gadara,<sup>1</sup> (which had been demolished by the Jews,) to gratify one Demetrius, who was from Gadara, and was one of his own freedmen. He also made other cities free from their dominion that lay in the interior of the country, as many as they had not demolished before, as

This family consisted of two daughters and two sons, one of whom, Alexander, escaped on the road, but the younger, Antigonus, was carried to Rome with his sisters.

*Alexander, the Son of Aristobulus, who escaped from Pompey, makes an Expedition against Hyrcanus; but being overcome by Gabinius, he delivers up the Fortresses to him. though even there he was in distress, for his army suffered from famine. In order to supply this want, Hyrcanus afforded him some assistance, and sent him provisions by Antipater, whom Scaurus also sent to Aretas, as one well acquainted with him, to induce him to purchase peace by money. The king of Arabia listened to him, and gave him three hundred talents, upon which Scaurus withdrew his army from Arabia.

§ 2. As for Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, who escaped from Pompey, he got in time a considerable band of men together, and overran Judæa, and was a formidable foe to Hyrcanus, and seemed likely to depose him quickly, and indeed would have come to Jerusalem, and ventured to rebuild the wall that was thrown down by Pompey, had not Gabinius, who was sent into Syria as successor to Scaurus, showed his bravery, as in many other points, so in marching against Alexander. And as he was afraid that Gabinius would attack him, he got together a large army, composed of ten thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, and built walls about strategic positions, as Alexandrium,<sup>1</sup> and Hyrcanium,<sup>2</sup> and Machærus,<sup>3</sup> near the mountains of Arabia.

§ 3. But Gabinius sent before him Mark Antony, and followed himself with his whole army. And the picked men with Antipater, and the other body of Jews, under the command of Malichus and Pitholaus, joined those captains that were with Mark Antony, and met Alexander. And not long after came up Gabinius with the main army. And as Alexander was not able to sustain the charge of the enemies' forces, now they were united, he retreated, but when he got near to Jerusalem, he was forced to fight, and lost six thousand men in the battle, of whom three thousand fell, and three thousand were taken alive, and he fled with the rest to Alexandrium.

§ 4. Now, when Gabinius was come to Alexandrium, as he found many encamped there, by promising them pardon for their former offences, he tried to induce them to come over to him without fight; but as they would hearken to no terms of accommodation, he slew many of them, and shut up the rest in the citadel. In this battle the general Mark Antony greatly distinguished himself, who always showed great courage, but never so much as now. But Gabinius, leaving forces to take the fortress, went away himself, and set in order the cities that had not been ravaged, and rebuilt those that had been destroyed. Accordingly, upon his orders, the following cities were inhabited again, Scythopolis,<sup>1</sup> Samaria,<sup>2</sup> Anthedon,<sup>3</sup> Apollonia,<sup>4</sup> Jamnia,<sup>5</sup> Raphia,<sup>6</sup> Marissa,<sup>7</sup> Adoreus,<sup>8</sup> Gamala,<sup>9</sup> Azotus,<sup>10</sup> and many others, as inhabitants readily flocked into each of them.

§ 5. After Gabinius had seen to these things, he returned to Alexandria, and pressed on the siege so vigorously, that Alexander, as he despaired of ever obtaining the kingdom, sent ambassadors to him, and prayed him to forgive what he had done amiss, and surrendered to him the remaining fortresses, Hyrcanium<sup>11</sup> and Machærus,<sup>12</sup> and put Alexandria<sup>13</sup> into his hands afterwards: all of which Gabinius demolished, at the persuasion of Alexander's mother, that they might not be a point d'appui in a second war. She had now come to mollify Gabinius, in her concern for her husband and other children, who were captives at Rome. After this Gabinius restored Hyrcanus to Jerusalem, and committed the care of the temple to him, but changed the civil polity into an aristocracy. He also divided the whole nation into five centres, assigning one to Jerusalem, another to Gadara,<sup>14</sup> another to Amathus,<sup>15</sup> a fourth to Jericho, and the fifth to Sepphoris,<sup>16</sup> a city of Galilee. And the people were glad to be freed from monarchical government, and were governed for the future by an aristocracy.

§ 6. But not long afterwards Aristobulus was the beginning of new trouble, for he escaped from Rome, and got together again many of the Jews that were desirous of change, who had borne affection to him of old; and when he had first taken Alexandrium,<sup>1</sup> he attempted to rebuild it. But as soon as Gabinius had sent an army against him under Sisenna and Antony and Servilius, when he was aware of it, he retreated to Machærus.<sup>2</sup> And as for the useless multitude he dismissed them, and only marched on with those that were armed, who were about eight thousand, among whom was Pitholaus, who had been lieutenant-general at Jerusalem, and had deserted to Aristobulus with a thousand of his men. And the Romans followed him, and when it came to a battle, Aristobulus' men for a long time fought courageously; but at length they were overcome by the Romans, and five thousand of them were slain, and about two thousand fled to a hill, but the thousand that remained with Aristobulus cut their way through the Roman army, and marched together to Machærus. And when the king had lodged there the first night among its ruins, he was in hopes of raising another army, if the war did but cease a while, so he fortified that stronghold after a sort. But as the Romans attacked him, he resisted beyond his strength for two days, and was then taken and brought in bonds before Gabinius, with Antigonus his son, who had fled with him from Rome, and from Gabinius he was carried to Rome again. And the senate put him in prison, but sent his children back to Judæa, because Gabinius informed them by letters, that he had promised Aristobulus' wife to do so, for her delivering the fortresses up to him.

§ 7. And now, as Gabinius was setting out to war against the Parthians, he was hindered by Ptolemy, whom he brought back to Egypt, returning from the Euphrates, and making use of Hyrcanus and Antipater to provide everything that was necessary for the army. For Antipater furnished him with money, and weapons, and corn, and auxiliaries; he also prevailed upon the Jews that were there, and guarded the passes near Pelusium,<sup>1</sup> to let Gabinius pass by. But now, upon Gabinius' departure, the other part of Syria was in commotion, and Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, induced the Jews to revolt again; and getting together a very large force, set about killing all the Romans that were in the country. Thereupon Gabinius was afraid, (for he was come back already from Egypt, being obliged to come back quickly by these disturbances,) and sent Antipater, and prevailed upon some of the rebels to be quiet. However, thirty thousand still continued with Alexander, and he was himself eager to fight also; accordingly, Gabinius went out to fight, and the Jews met him, and the battle was fought near Mount Tabor, and ten thousand Jews were slain, and the rest of the multitude dispersed in flight. And Gabinius went to Jerusalem, and settled the government as Antipater wished; and from thence he marched, and fought and beat the Nabatæans; as for Mithridates and Orsanès, who had fled out of Parthia, he sent them away privately, but gave it out among the soldiers that they had escaped.

§ 8. In the mean time, Crassus came as successor to Gabinius in Syria. He took away all the rest of the gold belonging to the temple at Jerusalem, in order to furnish himself for his expedition against the Parthians, and also took away the two thousand talents which Pompey had not touched. But when he had crossed over the Euphrates, he perished himself, and his army with him; as to which it is not now the time to speak.

§ 9. But as the Parthians were hastening to pass into Syria after Crassus, Cassius, who had fled into that province, checked them. And when he had taken possession of that province, he made a hasty march into Judæa: and upon his taking Tarichææ,<sup>2</sup> he enslaved thirty thousand Jews. He also put to death Pitholaus (who had supported the rebellious followers of Aristobulus), as Antipater advised him to do. This Antipater had married a wife whose name was Cypros, of an eminent family among the Arabians, and had four sons by her, Phasaëlus, and Herod who was afterwards king, and, besides these, Joseph and Pheroras, and a daughter Salome. Now, as he made himself friends among men of power every where, by the kind offices he did them, and the hospitable way in which he treated them; so did he contract the greatest friendship with the king of Arabia by his marriage; and when he made war against Aristobulus, he sent and intrusted his children to him. And when Cassius had forced Alexander to come to terms and to be quiet, he returned to the Euphrates, in order to prevent the Parthians from crossing over it; concerning which I shall speak elsewhere.

CHAP. IX.

Aristobulus is taken off by Pompey's friends, and his Son Alexander by Scipio. Antipater cultivates a Friendship with Cæsar after Pompey's Death; he also performs great Actions in the War, wherein he assisted Mithridates.

§ 1.

NOW, upon the flight of Pompey and the senate beyond the Ionian Sea, Cæsar got Rome and the Empire under his power, and released Aristobulus from his bonds; and committed two legions to him, and sent him in haste into Syria, hoping that by him he should easily conquer that country, and the parts adjacent to Judæa. But envy prevented Aristobulus' alacrity and the hopes of Cæsar; for he was taken off by poison given him by those of Pompey's party, and for a long while had not so much as burial in his native country; for his dead body lay preserved in honey, until it was sent to the Jews by Antony, to be buried in the royal sepulchres.

§ 2. His son Alexander was also beheaded by Scipio at Antioch, and that at the command of Pompey, upon an accusation being laid against him before his tribunal for the harm he had done to the Romans. But Ptolemy the son of Mennæus, who was then ruler of Chalcis<sup>1</sup> under Mount Libanus,<sup>2</sup> took his brothers, sending his son Philip for them to Ascalon.<sup>1</sup> And he took Antigonus and his sisters away from Aristobulus' wife, and brought them to his father; and falling in love with the younger daughter, he married her, and was afterwards slain by his father on her account; for Ptolemy himself, after he had slain his son, married Alexandra, for that was her name, on account of which marriage he took the greater care of her brother and sister.

§ 3. Now, after Pompey was dead, Antipater changed sides, and paid court to Cæsar. And, since Mithridates of Pergamus<sup>2</sup> was excluded, with the forces he was leading into Egypt, from the passes near Pelusium,<sup>3</sup> and was detained at Ascalon, he persuaded the Arabians, whose guest he was, to assist him, and marched himself at the head of three thousand armed Jews. He also stirred up the men of power in Syria to come to his assistance, as also the inhabitants of Libanus, as Ptolemy and Jamblichus, owing to whom the cities in that district joined readily in the war; so that Mithridates now ventured, in dependence upon the additional strength that he had got through Antipater, to march forward to Pelusium, and when he was refused a passage by it, he besieged that city. And Antipater greatly distinguished himself in the attack, for he broke down that part of the wall which was opposite to him, and was the first to leap into the city, with the men that were with him.

§ 4. Thus was Pelusium taken. But as they were marching on, those Egyptian Jews that inhabited the district called the district of Onias, tried to bar their way. Then did Antipater not only persuade them not to stop them, but even to afford provisions for the army; on which account even the people about Memphis<sup>4</sup> would not fight against them, but of their own accord joined Mithridates. So he went round the Delta, and fought the rest of the Egyptians at a place called the Jews' Camp.<sup>5</sup> And when he was in danger in the battle with all his right wing, Antipater wheeled round and came along the shore of the river to his help, having beaten those that opposed him: as he led the left wing. He then fell upon those that pursued Mithridates, and slew many of them, and pursued the remainder so far that he took their camp, and lost only eighty of his own men, while Mithridates lost during the rout about eight hundred. Being thus himself saved unexpectedly, Mithridates became an unenvious witness to Cæsar of the great actions of Antipater.

§ 5. Thereupon Cæsar encouraged Antipater to undertake other hazardous enterprises for him by praise and hopes: in all which enterprises he readily exposed himself, and became a most courageous warrior; and had many wounds, almost all over his body, as proofs of his valour. And, when Cæsar had settled affairs in Egypt, and had returned to Syria, he gave him the privilege of a Roman citizen, and freedom from taxes, and rendered him an object of admiration by the other honours and marks of friendship he bestowed upon him. It was also on his account that he confirmed Hyrcanus in the high priesthood.

CHAP. X.

Cæsar makes Antipater Governor of Judæa; and Antipater appoints Phasaelus to be Governor of Jerusalem, and Herod Governor of Galilee; who some time after is called to take his trial before Hyrcanus, when he is acquitted. Sextus Cæsar is treacherously killed by Bassus, and is succeeded by Murcus.

§ 1.

ABOUT this time Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, went to Cæsar, and became (wonderfully enough) the cause of Antipater's further advancement. For whereas he ought to have lamented that his father appeared to have been poisoned on account of his differences with Pompey, and to have complained of Scipio's barbarity towards his brother, and not to have mixed any invidious passion when he was suing for mercy, besides these things he came forward and accused Hyrcanus and Antipater of having banished him and his brothers most inequitably out of all their native country, and of having acted in a great many instances petulantly and insultingly to their nation, and said that as to the assistance they had sent Cæsar in Egypt, it was not done out of good-will to him, but from the fear they were in from former differences, and in order to gain pardon for their former friendship to Pompey.

§ 2. Thereupon Antipater stripped off his garment, and showed the number of wounds he had, and said, that as to his good-will to Cæsar, he had no occasion to say a word, because his body cried aloud, though he said nothing himself: but he wondered at Antigonus' boldness, who was himself no other than the son of an enemy to the Romans, and of a fugitive of the Romans, and had inherited from his father a fondness for innovation and rebellion, that he should undertake to accuse other men before the Roman governor, and endeavour to gain some advantage for himself, when he ought to be contented that he was suffered to live; and his present ambition was not so much because he was in want, but because, if he could once obtain what he aimed at, he might stir up faction among the Jews, and use what he had gained from the Romans to their injury.

§ 3. When Cæsar heard this, he declared Hyrcanus to be the most worthy of the high priesthood, and gave leave to Antipater to choose what authority he pleased. But Antipater left the determination of such dignity to him that bestowed the dignity upon him, so he was constituted governor of all Judæa, and obtained leave, moreover, to rebuild those walls in Jerusalem that had been thrown down. And Cæsar ordered these honours to be engraved in the Capitol, that they might stand there as an indication of his own justice and the virtue of Antipater.

§ 4. Now as soon as Antipater had conducted Cæsar out of Syria, he returned to Judæa, and the first thing he did was to rebuild that wall in Jerusalem which Pompey had overthrown, and next he went all over the country and quieted the tumults that were therein, partly threatening and partly advising every one, and telling them that if they would submit to Hyrcanus, they would live happily and quietly, and enjoy what they possessed with universal peace; but if they hearkened to the cold hopes of those who wished to get themselves some gain by innovation, they should then find him to be their despot instead of their protector, and should find Hyrcanus to be a tyrant instead of a king, and the Romans and Cæsar to be their enemies instead of rulers and friends; for they would not suffer him to be removed from the government, whom they had themselves appointed. And at the same time that he said this, he settled the affairs of the country by himself, because he saw that Hyrcanus was inactive, and too remiss for royal power. So he appointed his eldest son, Phasaelus, governor of Jerusalem and of the neighbourhood; he also sent his next son, Herod, who was quite young, with equal authority into Galilee.

§ 5. Now Herod was by nature an active man, and soon found scope for his energy. For as he found that Ezekias, a robber-chief, overran the neighbouring parts of Syria with a great band of men, he took and slew him and many of the robbers, and this exploit was especially gratifying to the Syrians, insomuch that Herod's commendation was sung both in the villages and cities, as having procured their quietness, and preserved to them their possessions. From this circumstance he became acquainted with Sextus Cæsar, a kinsman of the great Cæsar, and administrator of Syria. A just emulation of his brother's glorious actions incited Phasaelus also to imitate him, and by his management of the city he procured the good-will of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and did not abuse his power in any disagreeable manner. So the nation paid Antipater the court due to a king, and the honours that all yielded him were equal to the honours due to a despot; he did not however abate any of the good-will or fidelity which he owed to Hyrcanus.

§ 6. But it is impossible to escape envy in prosperity. For the fame of these young men affected even Hyrcanus himself privately, but what he was principally vexed at was the great success of Herod, and that so many messengers came one after another, and informed him of the great reputation Herod had got in all his undertakings. There were also many people in the palace who inflamed his envy at him, such as were obstructed in their designs by the prudence either of the young men or of Antipater. These men said, that by committing public affairs to the management of Antipater and of his sons, Hyrcanus sat down with nothing but the bare name of king without any power; and they asked him, how long he would act so foolishly as to breed up kings against his own interest? For they did not now conceal their control of affairs, but were plainly lords of the nation, and had set him aside, since Herod slew so many men contrary to the law of the Jews, without Hyrcanus giving him any command to do so, either by word of mouth or by letter. If Herod then was not a king, but a private man still, he ought to come to his trial, and answer for his conduct to him, and also to the laws of the country, which did not permit any one to be put to death without trial.

§ 7. Now Hyrcanus was by degrees inflamed by such speeches, and at last could no longer control his rage, but summoned Herod to take his trial. And he at his father's advice, as soon as affairs would give him leave, went up to [Jerusalem,] when he had first placed garrisons in Galilee. But he went with a strong force of soldiers, not so many indeed that he might appear to wish to overthrow Hyrcanus' government, nor yet so few as to expose himself unarmed to envy. However, Sextus Cæsar was in fear for the young man, lest he should be taken by his enemies, and brought to punishment, so he sent to command Hyrcanus expressly to acquit Herod of the capital charge against him. And Hyrcanus acquitted him accordingly, being otherwise inclined also to do so, because he loved Herod.

§ 8. But Herod, supposing that he had escaped punishment against the wish of the king, retired to Sextus to Damascus, and made every preparation to disobey him, if he should summon him again. Thereupon those that were ill-disposed irritated Hyrcanus, and told him that Herod had gone away in anger, and was preparing to make war upon him; and as the king believed what they said, he knew not what to do, for he saw that his antagonist was stronger than he was himself. And now, since Herod was made general of Cœle-Syria and Samaria by Sextus Cæsar, he was formidable, not only from the good-will which the nation bore him, but from his own power, so that Hyrcanus fell into the utmost terror, and expected he would presently march against him with his army.

§ 9. Nor was he mistaken in his opinion, for Herod got his army together, from anger at Hyrcanus' threatening him with trial, and led it to Jerusalem, to depose him from his kingdom. And this he would soon have done, had not his father and brother come to him and broken the force of his fury, and exhorted him to carry his revenge no further than by threatening and frightening him, and to spare the king, under whom he had been advanced to such a degree of power. They added that he ought not to be so much provoked at his having been tried, as not to be thankful that he was acquitted; nor so to dwell upon what was of a melancholy nature, as to be ungrateful for his safety; and if one ought to reckon that God was the arbitrator of success in war, an unjust cause was of more disadvantage than an army could be of advantage; and that therefore he ought not to be entirely confident of success, when he was going to fight against his king and old companion, who had often been his benefactor, and had never been severe to him, except when he had hearkened to evil counsellors, and so thrown a shadow of injury upon him. And Herod was prevailed upon by these arguments, thinking it was enough for his future hopes to have shown his power to the nation.

§ 10. In the mean time, there was a disturbance and civil war among the Romans in the neighbourhood of Apamea,<sup>1</sup> caused by the treacherous murder of Sextus Cæsar by Cæcilius Bassus from his good-will to Pompey. Bassus also assumed the authority over his soldiers, but the rest of Sextus Cæsar's commanders attacked him with their whole army to punish him for the murder of Sextus Cæsar, and Antipater also sent them assistance by his sons, both on account of the murdered Cæsar and the Cæsar who was still alive, both of whom were his friends. And as this war was protracted, Murcus came from Italy as successor to Sextus Cæsar.

CHAP. XI.

Herod is made Governor of all Syria : Malichus is afraid of him, and takes Antipater off by Poison ; whereupon the Tribunes of the Soldiers are prevailed upon to kill Malichus.

§ 1.

THERE was at this time a great war raised among the Romans because of the sudden and treacherous murder of Julius Cæsar by Cassius and Brutus, after he had been in supreme power three years and seven months. At this murder there was very great commotion, and as the influential persons formed various factions, every one betook himself to that party where he had the greatest hope of advancing himself. And Cassius came into Syria, to take command of the forces that were at Apamea, where he effected a reconciliation between Bassus and Murcus, and the legions that were at variance with Bassus, and raised the siege of Apamea, and took over the command of the army, and went about levying tribute from the cities, and exacting more than they were able to bear.

§ 2. So when Cassius commanded that the Jews should contribute seven hundred talents, Antipater, in dread at his threats, divided the raising of this sum speedily among his sons and some of his friends, and among them he required one Malichus, who was at enmity with him, to do his part also. Thus necessity forced him to do. Now Herod first gratified Cassius by bringing his share out of Galilee, which was a hundred talents, on which account he was in the highest favour with him. And Cassius reproached the rest for being tardy, and was angry at the cities themselves. So he enslaved Gophna<sup>1</sup> and Emmaus,<sup>2</sup> and two other cities of less note, and made as though he would kill Malichus, because he had not made greater haste in exacting his tribute ; but Antipater prevented the ruin of

Malichus, and the ruin of the other cities, and got into Cassius'<sup>1</sup> favour, by bringing in a hundred talents immediately.

§ 3. However, when Cassius was gone, Malichus forgot the kindness that Antipater had done him, and laid plots against him who had frequently saved him, being anxious to get him out of the way, as he was an obstacle to his wicked practices. And Antipater was so much afraid of the power and cunning of the man, that he went beyond the Jordan in order to get an army to guard himself against his treacherous designs. But though Malichus was thus detected, he imposed on Antipater's sons by his impudence, for he thoroughly deluded Phasaelus who was the guardian of Jerusalem, and Herod who was intrusted with the weapons of war, by a great many excuses and oaths, and persuaded them to contrive his reconciliation with their father. Thus was he preserved again by Antipater, who dissuaded Murcus, who was then governor in Syria, from his resolution of killing Malichus for his love of innovation.

§ 4. Now when war broke out between Cassius and Brutus on one side and the younger Cæsar<sup>2</sup> and Antony on the other, Cassius and Murcus got together an army out of Syria; and because Herod seemed to have had a great share in providing necessaries, they made him governor of all Syria, and gave him an army of foot and horse. Cassius also promised, after the war was over, that he would make him king of Judæa. But it so happened to Antipater that the power and hopes of his son caused his destruction. For as Malichus was afraid of these, he corrupted one of the king's cupbearers with money, to give poison to Antipater, who became a sacrifice to Malichus' wickedness, and died at a feast. He was a man in other respects active in the management of affairs, and had recovered and preserved the kingdom for Hyrcanus.

§ 5. However, Malichus, though he was suspected of poisoning Antipater, and though the multitude was angry with him for it, denied it, and tried to make the people believe he was not guilty. He also tried to make himself more powerful by raising soldiers; for he did not suppose that Herod would remain quiet, who indeed marched against him with an army quickly to revenge his father's death. But upon his brother Phasaelus advising him not to punish him in an open manner, lest the multitude should rise in insurrection, he accepted Malichus' apology, and professed that he cleared him of suspicion, and made a splendid funeral for his father.

§ 6. Then Herod went to Samaria,<sup>1</sup> which was in disturbance, and restored the city to order; after which he returned to Jerusalem for the festival, having his armed men with him. Thereupon Hyrcanus, at the instigation of Malichus, who feared his approach, sent and forbade him to introduce foreigners to mix themselves with the people of the country, while they were purifying themselves. But Herod disregarded the pretext and him that gave the command, and entered the city by night. Upon which Malichus came to him again and bewailed the death of Antipater; Herod also feigned to believe him, though he had much ado to restrain his anger, and bitterly complained of the murder of his father in his letters to Cassius, who also on other accounts hated Malichus. So Cassius sent him back word to avenge his father's murder upon him, and privately gave order to the tribunes that were under him, that they should assist Herod in his righteous action.

§ 7. And because, upon the taking of Laodicea<sup>2</sup> by Cassius, men of influence came together from all quarters, bringing presents and crowns, Herod fixed this time for his taking vengeance on Malichus. As Malichus suspected that, and was at Tyre, he resolved to withdraw privately his son who was a hostage among the Tyrians, and himself made preparation to escape into Judæa. But the despair he was in of escaping incited him to think of greater things; for he hoped that he might now stir up the nation to revolt from the Romans, while Cassius was occupied in the war against Antony, and that he might easily depose Hyrcanus, and get the crown for himself.

§ 8. But fate laughed at his hopes. For Herod foresaw his intention, and invited both Hyrcanus and him to supper. And calling to him one of the servants that stood by him, he sent him out, as though it were to get things ready for supper, but in reality to tell the tribunes of the soldiers beforehand to lie in ambush for Malichus. And they, remembering what orders Cassius had given them, went with their swords in their hands to the seashore before the city, where they surrounded Malichus, and killed him with many wounds. And Hyrcanus immediately swooned away, and fell down in his alarm, and it was with difficulty that he recovered, when he asked Herod who it was that had killed Malichus. And when one of the tribunes of the soldiers replied that it was done by the command of Cassius, "Then, (said he) Cassius has saved both me and my country, by cutting off one that was laying plots against them both." Whether Hyrcanus spoke according to his opinion, or whether his fear made him commend the action by saying so, is uncertain. But this was how Herod satisfied his vengeance on Malichus.

CHAP. XII.

Phasaelus is too strong for Felix; Herod also overcomes Antigonus in Battle; and the Jews accuse both Herod and Phasaelus, but Antony acquits them, and makes them Tetrarchs.

§ 1.

WHEN Cassius had departed from Syria, another sedition arose at Jerusalem, Felix having attacked Phasaelus with an army, that he might avenge the death of Malichus upon Herod through his brother. Now Herod happened to be then with Fabius, the governor of Damascus, and though he was anxious to go to his brother's assistance, he was detained by illness. Mean time Phasaelus was by himself too strong for Felix, and reproached Hyrcanus on account of his ingratitude, both for the assistance he had afforded Felix, and for allowing Malichus' brother to seize on the fortresses; for he had seized a great many of them already, and among them the strongest of them all, which was Masada.<sup>1</sup>

§ 2. However, he could not cope with the force of Herod, who, as soon as he was recovered, took all the other fortresses again, and drove him out of Masada as a suppliant. He also drove out of Galilee Marion, the tyrant of the Tyrians, who had already seized on three fortified places; but as to those Tyrians whom he captured he preserved them all alive; nay, to some of them he gave presents, and so sent them away, and thereby procured good-will to himself from the city, and hatred to the tyrant. Marion had indeed obtained his tyrannical power from Cassius, who set tyrants over all Syria; and out of hatred to Herod he assisted Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, and especially on Fabius' account, whom Antigonus had won over by money to aid him in his return. And Ptolemy, the kinsman of Antigonus, supplied everything that he wanted.

§ 3. When Herod had drawn up his army in battle array against these in the passes of Judæa, he conquered them in battle, and routed Antigonus, and returned to Jerusalem, beloved by every body for his glorious success. For even those who did not before favour him, joined themselves to him now, because of his marriage into the family of Hyrcanus. For as he had formerly married a wife out of his own country of no ignoble blood, who was called Doris, by whom he had Antipater; so now he married Mariamne, the daughter of Alexander the son of Aristobulus, and grand-daughter of Hyrcanus, and thus became a connection of the king.

to Antony to Bithynia,<sup>1</sup> the leading men of the Jews came also, and accused Phasaelus and Herod, that they kept the government by force, and that Hyrcanus had no more than the mere name of king. Herod appeared to answer this accusation, and, having made Antony his friend by the large sums of money which he gave him, brought him into such a frame of mind that he would not hear his enemies at all. And so they were dismissed at this time.

§ 5. However, after this there came a hundred of the principal men of the Jews to Daphne<sup>2</sup> near Antioch to Antony, who was already madly in love with Cleopatra; and they put forward those men that were the most influential both from rank and eloquence, and accused the brothers.<sup>3</sup> But Messala opposed them, and defended the brothers, and Hyrcanus stood by them because of his connection by marriage with Herod. When Antony had heard both sides, he asked Hyrcanus which party was the fittest to govern? And as he replied that Herod and his party were the fittest, Antony was glad (for he had been formerly treated in a hospitable and obliging manner by his father Antipater, when he marched into Judæa with Gabinius), so he made the brothers tetrarchs, and committed to them the government of all Judæa.

§ 6. And when the envoys were indignant at this, Antony took fifteen of them and put them into custody, and wished also to kill them, and the rest he drove away with insults. On this occasion a still greater tumult arose at Jerusalem; so they sent again a thousand envoys to Tyre, where Antony was now staying, intending to go to Jerusalem. To these envoys, who raised a clamour, he sent the governor of Tyre, and ordered him to punish all that he could arrest of them, and to confirm in the government those whom he had made tetrarchs.

§ 7. But before this Herod and Hyrcanus had gone to the seashore, and earnestly advised those envoys neither to bring ruin upon themselves, nor war upon their native country, by their rash contentiousness. But as they showed still more discontent Antony sent out some of his armed men, and slew a great many, and wounded more of them; of whom those that were slain were buried by Hyrcanus, and the wounded were put under the care of surgeons by him; yet would not those that had escaped be quiet still, but so disturbed the city, and so provoked Antony, that he slew those whom he had put in bonds also.

CHAP. XIII.

The Parthians bring Antigonus back to Judæa, and cast Hyrcanus and Phasaelus into Prison. The flight of Herod, and the taking of Jerusalem, and what Hyrcanus and Phasaelus suffered.

§ 1.

NOW two years afterwards, when Barzapharnes, the satrap of the Parthians, and Pacorus, the king's son, had seized upon Syria, and when Lysanias had already succeeded to the kingdom upon the death of his father, Ptolemy the son of Mennæus, he urged the satrap by a promise of a thousand talents, and five hundred women, to restore Antigonus to his kingdom, and to depose Hyrcanus. Pacorus was by these offers induced so to do, and marched along the sea coast, and ordered Barzapharnes to invade Judæa in the interior of the country. But of the maritime people the Tyrians would not receive Pacorus, although those of Ptolemais<sup>1</sup> and Sidon<sup>2</sup> received him; so he committed a portion of his horse to a certain royal cupbearer of his own name, and gave him orders to march into Judæa, in order to reconnoiter the enemy, and to help Antigonus if he should want his assistance.

§ 2. Now as these men were ravaging Carmel, many of the Jews mustered to Antigonus, and showed themselves eager for battle. So he sent them on to a place called Drymus,<sup>1</sup> to occupy it; whereupon a battle ensued, and they drove the enemy away, and pursued them, and ran after them as far as Jerusalem; and as their numbers increased, they went as far as the king's palace. But as Hyrcanus and Phasaelus received them with a strong body of men, a battle ensued in the market-place, in which Herod's party beat the enemy, and shut them up in the temple, and set sixty men in the adjoining houses as a guard on them. But the people that were in revolt against the brothers<sup>2</sup> attacked and burnt those men. And Herod, in his rage against the people for killing them, attacked and slew many of them; so as each party sallied out daily in bands to attack one another, there was continual carnage on both sides.

§ 3. Now, when the festival which is called Pentecost was at hand, all the places about the temple, and the whole city, were full of a multitude of people, that had come out of the country, mostly armed. And Phasaelus guarded the walls, and Herod with a few men guarded the royal palace, and made a sally upon his enemies as they were in disorder on the north quarter of the city, and slew a very great number of them, and put them all to flight, and some of them he shut up within the temple, and others within the outer rampart. Meantime Antigonus desired that Pacorus might be admitted to mediate between them; and Phasaelus was prevailed upon to admit the Parthian into the city with five hundred horse, and to treat him in a hospitable manner, for he pretended that he came to quell the tumult, but in reality he came to assist Antigonus. And he laid a plot for Phasaelus, and persuaded him to go as ambassador to Barzapharnes, in order to put an end to the war, although Herod was very earnest with him to the contrary, and advised Phasaelus to kill the plotter, and not to expose himself to the snares he had laid for him, for barbarians were naturally perfidious. But when Pacorus left Jerusalem he took Hyrcanus with him, that he might be the less suspected; he also left some of the horse, called Freemen, with Herod, and conducted Phasaelus with the rest.

§ 4. And when they were come to Galilee, they found that the people of that country had revolted, and were in arms, who came very cunningly to the satrap, and besought him to conceal his treacherous intentions by an obliging behaviour to them. Accordingly, he at first made them presents, and afterwards, as they went away, laid ambushes for them. And when they were come to one of the maritime cities called Ecdippon,<sup>1</sup> they perceived that a plot was laid for them; for they there heard of the promise of a thousand talents, and how Antigonus had devoted to the Parthians most of the five hundred women that were there with them. They also heard that an ambush was always laid for them by the barbarians in the night-time, and that they would have been seized long before this, had not the barbarians waited for the seizure of Herod first at Jerusalem, because if he were once informed of this treachery of theirs, he would be on his guard. Nor was this mere report, but they saw the guards already not far off them.

§ 5. However, Phasaelus could not think of forsaking Hyrcanus and fleeing away, although Ophellius earnestly urged him to do so (for he had learned the whole scheme of the plot from Saramalla, the richest at that time of all the Syrians), but he went up to the satrap, and reproached him to his face for laying this treacherous plot against them, especially as it was done for money; and he promised him, that he would give him more money for their preservation than Antigonus had promised to give for the kingdom. But the Parthian craftily endeavoured to remove all this suspicion by apologies and by oaths, and then withdrew to Pacorus; immediately after which those Parthians who were left seized upon Phasaelus and Hyrcanus, as they had been ordered to do, who could do no more than curse their perfidiousness and perjury.

§ 6. Meantime the cupbearer who had been sent<sup>2</sup> laid a plot how to seize upon Herod, by deluding him, and getting him out of the city, as he was commanded to do. But Herod suspected the barbarians from the beginning, and having now received intelligence that a messenger, who had had fallen into the hands of the enemy, was bringing him letters to inform him of the treachery intended, he would not go out of the city; though this cupbearer said very plausibly that he ought to go out, and meet the messengers that brought the letters, for the enemy had not taken them, and the contents of them were not accounts of any plot but of all that Phasaelus had done. But he had heard from others that his brother was seized, and Mariamne, Herod's daughter, shrewdest of women, came to him, and begged of him that he would not go out, nor trust himself to the barbarians who were now plainly come to make an attempt upon him.

§ 7. Now while Pacorus and his friends were considering how they might bring their plot to bear privately, because it was not possible to circumvent openly a man of so much sense, Herod got the start of them, and went off by night, unknown to his enemies, with the persons that were most nearly related to him. And as soon as the Parthians perceived it, they pursued after them, and Herod ordered his mother and sister and the young woman who was betrothed to him, and her mother and youngest brother, to make the best of their way on, while he himself with his attendants took all the care they could to beat back the barbarians; and when, at every attack, he had slain a great many of them, he got safe to the fortress of Masada.<sup>1</sup>

§ 8. And he found that the Jews pressed more heavily upon him in his flight than the Parthians, harassing him perpetually, and at sixty furlongs from the city bringing on a sort of regular battle which lasted some time. And Herod beat them, and killed a great number of them, and afterwards built a fortress on the spot in memory of his success, and adorned it with a most costly palace, and erected a very strong citadel, and called it from his own name Herodium.<sup>2</sup> Now many fugitives joined themselves to him every day; and at a place called Thresa<sup>3</sup> in Idumæa his brother Joseph met him, and advised him to get rid of most of his followers; for Masada would not contain so great a number, for they were over nine thousand. Herod complied with this advice, and sent away the least useful portion of his force, that they might go into Idumæa,<sup>1</sup> and gave them provisions for their journey; but he got safe to the fortress of Masada with his nearest relations, and retained with him only the strongest of his followers; and he left there eight hundred of his men as a guard for the women, and provisions sufficient to last through a siege, and himself pushed on to Petra in Arabia.

§ 9. As for the Parthians in Jerusalem, they betook themselves to plundering, and rushed into the houses of those that had fled, and into the king's palace, and spared nothing but Hyrcanus' money, which was not more than three hundred talents. What they found of other men's property also was not so much as they hoped for; for Herod, having had a long while suspicion of the perfidiousness of the barbarians, had taken care to have what was most splendid among his treasures conveyed into Idumæa, as all his relations had likewise done. But the Parthians proceeded after their plundering to that degree of outrage, as to fill all the country with implacable war, and to demolish the city of Marissa,<sup>2</sup> and not only to set up Antigonus for king, but to deliver Phasaelus and Hyrcanus bound into his hands to ill-treat. And Antigonus himself actually bit off Hyrcanus' ears with his own teeth, as he fell down upon his knees to him, that so he might never be able, upon any change of affairs, to take the high priesthood again, for high priests had to be entire and without blemish.

§ 10. But the courage of Phasaelus anticipated any action on the part of Antigonus in connection with him, for though he had neither his sword nor the use of his hands, he dashed his head against a stone; and so showed himself to be Herod's own brother, and Hyrcanus a most degenerate relation, and died with great bravery, and made his end agreeable to the actions of his life. There is also another report prevalent, that Phasaelus recovered of the injury done to his head, and that a surgeon, who was sent by Antigonus as if to heal him, filled the wound with poisonous drugs, and so killed him. But whichever of these deaths he came to, the beginning of it was glorious. It is also reported, that before he expired he was informed by a certain poor woman that Herod had escaped, and that he said, "I now die with comfort since I leave behind me one alive that will avenge me on mine enemies."

§ 11. So died Phasaelus. And the Parthians, although they had failed in getting the women, which was what they chiefly desired, yet put the government of Jerusalem into the hands of Antigonus, and took away Hyrcanus in bonds to Parthia.

Herod is rejected in Arabia, and hastes to Rome, where Antony and Augustus unite in making him King of the Jews.

§ 1.

NOW Herod pursued his journey into Arabia with greater speed, as he was anxious to get money of the king, while his brother was yet alive, for he only hoped by money to prevail upon the cupidity of the barbarians to spare Phasaelus. For he reckoned, if the Arabian king was forgetful of his father's friendship with him, and was too covetous to make him a gift, that he could at any rate borrow of him as much as might redeem his brother, and put into his hands, as a pledge, the son of him that was to be redeemed; for he took his brother's son with him, who was seven years old. Now he was ready to give three hundred talents for his brother, and put forward the Tyrians to intercede for him; however, fate was too quick for his zeal, and since Phasaelus was dead, Herod's brotherly love was now in vain. Moreover, he did not find any lasting friendship among the Arabians; for their king, Malichus, sent to him immediately, and commanded him to leave his country, using the name of the Parthians as a pretext, as though they had bidden him expel

Herod out of Arabia, while in reality he had a mind to keep back what he owed to Antipater, and not be obliged to make returns to his sons for the gifts their father had bestowed on him. In this shameless conduct he followed the advice of those who like himself wished to deprive Herod of what Antipater had deposited among them; and these men were the most influential persons at his court.

§ 2. Now when Herod found that the Arabians were his enemies, and that for the very reasons which he hoped would have made them most friendly, he gave their messengers such an answer as his passion suggested, and set out for Egypt. And he lodged the first evening at one of the temples of that country, to take up those whom he had left behind; and the next day word was brought him as he reached Rhinocurura,<sup>1</sup> that his brother was dead; and he indulged his natural grief, and proceeded on his journey, when he laid aside such sorrow. And now, somewhat late, the king of Arabia repented of what he had done, and sent messengers quickly to recall him whom he had treated so contemptuously. But Herod was too quick for them, and had reached Pelusium,<sup>2</sup> where he could not obtain a passage from those that lay at anchor there, so he had an interview with the governors of the place. And they, in respect to the fame and dignity of the man, conducted him to Alexandria. And when he came into the city he was received by Cleopatra with great splendour, for she hoped he would be commander of her forces in the expedition she was now about; but he rejected the queen's solicitations, and being neither afraid of it being midwinter, nor of the disturbances now in Italy, he sailed for Rome.

§ 3. But he was in peril near Pamphylia,<sup>3</sup> and obliged to throw overboard most of the ship's cargo, and with difficulty got safe to Rhodes,<sup>4</sup> a place which had been very much injured in the war with Cassius. He was there received by his friends, Ptolemy and Sappinius, and, although he was then in want of money, he built a very large trireme, wherein he and his friends sailed to Brundisium,<sup>1</sup> and went thence to Rome with all speed, where he first of all went to Antony, on account of the friendship his father had had with him, and laid before him the calamities of himself and his family, and told him how he had left his nearest relations besieged in a fortress, and had sailed to him in winter as a suppliant.

§ 4. And Antony was moved to compassion at the reverse in Herod's affairs, partly from his calling to mind how hospitably he had been treated by Antipater, but more especially on account of Herod's own virtue; so he resolved now to get him, whom he had himself formerly made tetrarch, made king of the Jews. The hatred also that he had for Antigonus was an inducement of no less weight than the great regard he had for Herod; for he looked upon Antigonus as a factious person, and as an enemy of the Romans. As for Augustus, Herod found him even more ready than Antony, remembering the campaigns he had gone through with Antipater his father, and the hospitable treatment he had met with from him, and the entire good-will he had shown him, besides the activity which he saw in Herod himself. So he called the senate together, and Messala, and after him Atratinus, introduced Herod, and gave full account of the good services of his father, and his own good-will to the Romans. At the same time they showed that Antigonus was their enemy, not only because he had soon quarrelled with them, but because he now neglected the Romans, and got his kingdom through the Parthians. These arguments greatly moved the senate, and at this juncture Antony came in and told them that it was for their advantage in the Parthian war that Herod should be king, and they all gave their votes for it. And when the senate broke up, Antony and Augustus went out with Herod between them; and the consuls and the rest of the magistrates went before them to offer sacrifices, and to lay the decree in the Capitol. Antony also feasted Herod on this first day of his reign.

CHAP. XV.

Antigonus besieges those in Masada, whom Herod relieves on his return from Rome, and at once marches to Jerusalem, where he finds Silo corrupted by Bribes.

§ 1.

NOW during this time Antigonus besieged those that were in Masada,<sup>1</sup> who had all other necessaries in sufficient quantity, but were short of water. And so Herod's brother Joseph was disposed to flee to the Arabians with two hundred of his men, because he had heard that Malichus repented of his offences with regard to Herod. And he would have straightway left the fortress, had there not fallen a great deal of rain on that very night when he was going away, so that his reservoirs were full of water, and he was no longer under any necessity of flight; but he and his men made a sally upon Antigonus' troops, and slew a great many of them, some in open battle, and some in ambush. However, they had not always success, for sometimes they were beaten and had to retreat.

§ 2. In the meantime Ventidius, the Roman general, was sent from Syria to restrain the Parthians, and went after them into Judæa, on the pretext indeed of assisting Joseph and his party, but in reality to extort money from Antigonus. So when he had pitched his camp very near Jerusalem, as soon as he had got money enough, he went away with most of his forces; but he left Silo with some of them, lest if he had taken them all away, his extortion would have been too evident. But Antigonus hoped that the Parthians would again come to his assistance, and meantime paid court to Silo, that he might not be baffled in his hopes.

§ 3. Now by this time Herod had sailed back from Italy, and had arrived at Ptolemais,<sup>2</sup> and as soon as he had got together no small army of foreigners and of his own countrymen, he marched through Galilee against Antigonus, and was assisted by Ventidius and Silo, both of whom Dellius, who had been sent by Antony, urged to restore Herod. Now Ventidius was at this time among the cities, composing the disturbances which had been caused by the Parthians, but Silo was in Judæa, corrupted by the money of Antigonus. And Herod himself was not destitute of strength, for the number of his forces increased every day as he went along, and all Galilee with few exceptions joined him. The most necessary enterprise that lay before him was the relief of Masada, and to deliver his relations from the siege they endured. But Joppa<sup>1</sup> stood in his way, for it was necessary to take that city first, which was in the enemies' hands, that when he should go to Jerusalem, no fortress might be left in the enemies' power in his rear. And Silo willingly joined him, having now a pretext for moving his army. And when the Jews pursued him and pressed upon him, Herod sallied out against them with a small body of his men, and soon put them to flight, and saved Silo who had made a very poor defence.

§ 4. Herod next took Joppa, and then made haste to Masada to set free his relations. Now many of the people of the country joined him, some induced by their friendship to his father, some by the reputation he had already gained himself, and some in order to repay the benefits they had received from both his father and him, but most from the hopes they placed in him, as a king firmly established on the throne. So that he soon got together a powerful army. And Antigonus laid ambushes for him as he marched on, placing men in convenient positions, but did little or no harm to his enemies. And Herod easily rescued his relations that were in Masada, and captured the fortress of Resa,<sup>2</sup> and then marched to Jerusalem, where the soldiers that were with Silo joined themselves to him, as did many in the city who stood in awe of his power.

§ 5. Now when he had pitched his camp on the west

slope of the city, the guards that were there shot their arrows, and threw their darts at his men, while others sallied out in companies, and attacked his vanguard. But Herod commanded proclamation to be made at the walls, that he was come for the good of the people and the preservation of the city, without any design to be revenged on his open enemies, but to grant amnesty to them, though they had been most hostile to him. Now the soldiers that were for Antigonus made a contrary clamour, and did neither permit any body to hear Herod's proclamation, nor to change their party; so Antigonus gave order to his forces to repel the enemy from the walls; so they soon put them to flight with their darts from the towers.

§ 6. And now Silo showed he had taken bribes; for he set many of the soldiers to clamour about their want of necessaries, and to ask for their pay to buy themselves food, and to demand that they should be led into convenient places for their winter quarters (for the parts about the city were destitute, as Antigonus' soldiers had stripped them of every thing), and he even shifted his camp, and attempted to get off the siege. But Herod went to the captains that were under Silo, and to the soldiers en masse, and begged of them not to leave him who was sent there by Augustus and Antony and the senate; for he would take care to have their wants supplied that very day. After this entreaty he went at once into the country, and brought them from thence so great an abundance of necessaries, that he cut off all Silo's pretexts. And in order to provide for the following days that they should not want supplies, he ordered the people of Samaria<sup>1</sup> (for that city had joined itself to him) to bring corn, and wine, and oil, and cattle to Jericho.<sup>2</sup> When Antigonus heard of this, he sent some of his party to scour the country, with orders to lie in ambush for and intercept these collectors of corn. This command was obeyed, and a great multitude of armed men gathered together near Jericho, and lay among the mountains, on the look out for those that brought the provisions. But Herod was not idle, but took with him ten cohorts, five of them Roman and five Jewish, with some mercenary troops intermixed among them, and also a few horse, and marched to Jericho. And when he arrived there he found the city deserted, but five hundred men, with their wives and children, occupied the heights; these he took and dismissed. And the Romans fell upon the rest of the city, and plundered it, finding the houses full of all sorts of treasures. And Herod left a garrison at Jericho, and returned, and sent the Roman army to take their winter quarters in Idumæa<sup>1</sup> and Galilee and Samaria, which had come over to him. Antigonus also, to pay court to Antony, bribed Silo to receive part of his army into Lydda.<sup>2</sup>

§ 1.

SO the Romans lived in plenty, and rested from war. However, Herod did not lie idle, but occupied Idumæa with two thousand foot and four hundred horse, sending his brother Joseph there, lest any diversion might be attempted in that quarter by Antigonus. He also removed his mother, and all his relations who had been in Masada,<sup>3</sup> to Samaria,<sup>4</sup> and when he had settled them there securely, he set out to subdue the rest of Galilee, and to expel the garrisons placed there by Antigonus.

§ 2. And when he had reached Sepphoris<sup>5</sup> in a very great snow-storm, he took the city without any difficulty, the guards that should have defended it fleeing away before it was assaulted. And there he gave an opportunity to his followers that had suffered from the wintry weather to refresh themselves, there being in that city a great abundance of supplies; after which he set out against the robbers that were in the caves, who scoured a great part of the country, and did as much mischief to its inhabitants as a war would have done. And he sent on three cohorts of foot and one troop of horse to the village of Arbela,<sup>1</sup> and followed himself forty days afterwards with the rest of his force. But the enemy were not affrighted at his approach, but met him in arms, for their skill was that of warriors, and their boldness was that of robbers. When, therefore, it came to a pitched battle, they routed Herod's left wing with their right; but Herod, wheeling about quickly from his own right wing, came to the assistance of his left wing and rallied it, and also fell upon its pursuers, and checked their impetuosity, till they could not bear the hand to hand attack made on them, but fled themselves.

§ 3. And Herod pursued them to the Jordan, slaying them, and cut to pieces a great part of them, and those that remained dispersed on the other side of the river, and Galilee was freed from the terror it had been in, excepting from those that remained, who lay concealed in the caves, and required some time to capture. So Herod first distributed the fruits of their labours among the soldiers, and gave every one of them a hundred and fifty drachmæ of silver, and a great deal more to their commanders, and sent them into winter quarters. He also bade Pheroras, his youngest brother, to see that they had a plentiful supply of provisions, and to fortify Alexandria.<sup>2</sup> And he saw to both of these injunctions.

§ 4. Meantime Antony abode at Athens, and Ventidius summoned Silo and Herod to the war against the Parthians, but ordered them first to settle affairs in Judæa. And Herod willingly dismissed Silo to go to Ventidius, but he made an expedition himself against the robbers that lay in the caves. Now these caves<sup>3</sup> were in precipitous mountains, and could not be got at from any side, for they had only some very narrow winding pathways by which access lay to them, and the rock that lay on their front had beneath it ravines of a vast depth, and of an almost perpendicular declivity; so that the king was doubtful for a long time what to do, because of the great difficulty of attacking the place. But at last he made use of a most dangerous contrivance, for he let down the boldest of his men in chests, and set them at the mouths of the caves; and they slew the robbers and their families, and when they made resistance threw fire at them. But as Herod was desirous of saving some of them, he invited them by a herald to come and deliver themselves up to to him; but not one of them came willingly to him, and of those that were compelled to come, many preferred death to captivity. At this stage of affairs a certain old man, the father of seven sons, who (as also their mother) desired him to permit them to go out upon the assurance that was offered them, slew them in the following manner: he ordered every one of them to go out, but stood himself at the cave's mouth, and slew each son as he went out. Herod saw this sight from the heights, and his bowels of compassion were moved at it, and he stretched out his right hand to the old man, and besought him to spare his sons. But he did not relent at all at what he said, but even twitted Herod with the lowness of his origin, and slew his wife as well as his sons, and when he had thrown their dead bodies down the precipice, he last of all threw himself down after them.

§ 5. In this way Herod subdued these caves, and the robbers that were in them. He then left as large a part of his army as he thought sufficient to prevent any risings, and made Ptolemy their general, and himself returned to Samaria, and led three thousand foot and six hundred horse against Antigonus. Upon this those that used to raise tumults in Galilee, feeling free to do so upon his departure, fell unexpectedly upon Ptolemy the general, and slew him, and also laid the country waste, and then retired to the marshes and to places not easy of access. But when Herod was informed of this rising, he came to the rescue immediately, and slew a great number of the rebels, and raised the sieges of all the fortresses they had besieged, and also exacted a hundred talents from his enemies as a penalty for their rising.

§ 6. The Parthians being by this time already driven out of the country, and Pacorus slain, Ventidius, by Antony's command, sent a thousand horse and two legions to help Herod against Antigonus. Now Antigonus besought their general Machæras by letters to come to his assistance, and made a great many complaints about Herod's violence, and about the injuries he did to the the kingdom, and promised to give him money. But he complied not with his invitation to betray his trust (for he did not despise him that sent him, especially as Herod gave him more money), but pretended friendship to Antigonus, though he really came as a spy to discover his affairs, in this however not listening to Herod, who tried to dissuade him from so doing. But Antigonus perceived what his intentions were beforehand, and shut him out of the city, and repelled him as an enemy from the walls, till Machæras was ashamed and went to Emmaus<sup>1</sup> to Herod, and, as he was in a rage at his disappointment, slew all the Jews whom he met with, not sparing those that were of Herod's party even, but treating them all as if they were Antigonus' friends.

§ 7. Thereupon Herod was very angry, and was going to fight against Machæras as an enemy; but he restrained his indignation, and marched to Antony to accuse Machæras of ill behaviour. But he, thinking over his offences, followed after the king immediately, and earnestly begged and obtained reconciliation with him. However, Herod did not desist from his resolution of going to Antony; and when he heard that he was besieging Samosata,<sup>2</sup> a strong city near the Euphrates, with a large army, he made the greater haste, seeing that the opportunity was a good one for showing at once his courage, and for greatly obliging Antony. Indeed, when he came, he soon put an end to the siege, and slew a great number of the barbarians, and took from them much booty, so that Antony, who admired his courage formerly, admired it now still more, and heaped many more honours upon him, and gave him more assured hopes that he should gain his kingdom: while king Antiochus was forced to surrender Samosata.

The Death of Joseph, Herod's Brother, which had been signified to Herod in Dreams. How Herod was preserved twice in a wonderful Manner. He cuts off the Head of Pappus, who was the Murderer of his Brother, and sends it to Pheroras. And no long Time after he besieges Jerusalem, and marries Mariamne.

§ 1.

IN the mean time, Herod's affairs in Judæa were in a bad condition. He had left his brother Joseph armed with full powers, but had charged him to make no attempts against Antigonus till his return; for he said Machæras would not be an ally he could depend on, as was plain from his previous behaviour. But as soon as Joseph heard that his brother was at a very great distance, he neglected the orders he had received, and marched towards Jericho with five cohorts, which Machæras had sent him. His intention was to seize the corn, as it was now in the height of summer; but as his enemies attacked him in the mountains, and in difficult places, he was not only killed himself, fighting very bravely in the battle, but the entire Roman force was cut to pieces. For these cohorts were men just enlisted in Syria, and there was no mixture of those soldiers called veterans among them, who might have rallied these raw recruits.

§ 2. This victory was not sufficient for Antigonus, but he proceeded to that degree of rage, as to ill treat the dead body of Joseph; for when he had got possession of the bodies of those that were slain, he cut off his head, although his brother Pheroras would have given fifty talents as a ransom for it. And now the affairs of Galilee were thrown into such disorder after this victory of Antigonus, that those of Antigonus' party took the principal men that were on Herod's side to the lake, and there drowned them. There were also many changes made in Idumæa, where Machæras rebuilt one of the fortresses, which was called Gittha.<sup>1</sup> But Herod had not yet heard of these things. For after the capture of Samosata, Antony himself departed to Egypt, when he had set Sossius over Syria, and given him orders to assist Herod against Antigonus, and Sossius sent two legions before him into Judæa to assist Herod, and himself followed soon after with the rest of his army.

§ 3. Now when Herod was at Daphne<sup>2</sup> near Antioch, he had some dreams which clearly foreboded his brother's death, and as he leaped out of bed in a troubled manner, there came messengers that acquainted him with that calamity. And when he had lamented this misfortune for a while, he put off the main part of his mourning, and hurried on against his enemies. And pushing on by forced marches and reaching Mount Libanus,<sup>3</sup> he got eight hundred men of those that lived near to that mountain to help him, and joined with them one Roman legion. With this force, before it was day, he made an irruption into Galilee, and drove the enemy who met him back to the place which they had left. He also made an energetic attack upon the fortress, but before he could take it, he was forced by a most terrible storm to pitch his camp in the neighbouring villages. But when, after a few days, the second legion that came from Antony joined him, the enemy were frightened at his power, and left their fortress in the night-time.

§ 4. After this he marched through Jericho, making what haste he could to be avenged on his brother's murderers. And there happened to him there a wonderful event, and as he unexpectedly escaped, he had the reputation of being a man very dear to God. For that evening there feasted with him many of the principal men, and after that feast was over, and all the guests were gone, the house fell down immediately. And as he judged this to be a sign both that he should undergo dangers and escape them in the coming war, he set forward in the morning with his army, when about six thousand of his enemies came running down from the mountains, and began to fight with those in his van, but they dared not engage the Romans hand to hand, but threw stones and darts at them from a distance, by which they wounded a considerable number. Even Herod himself as he rode by was wounded in the side by a dart.

§ 5. Now as Antigonus wished to appear to exceed Herod, not only in the courage but also in the number of his men, he sent Pappus, one of his companions, with an army against Samaria. Now it was their fortune to have to contend with Machæras. But Herod overran the enemies' country, and demolished five little cities, and destroyed two thousand men that were in them, and burned their houses, and then returned to his camp; and his headquarters were at the village called Cana.<sup>1</sup>

§ 6. Now a great multitude of Jews flocked to him every day, both from Jericho itself, and from the other parts of the country, some out of hatred to Antigonus, others out of regard to the glorious actions Herod had done, but most induced by an unreasonable desire for change. And he pushed on to attack the enemy, and Pappus and his men were not terrified either at his numbers or zeal, but marched out boldly against him. And when it came to a close fight, the other parts of their army made resistance for a while, but Herod running the utmost hazard from the rage he was in at the murder of his brother, that he might be avenged on those that had been the authors of it, soon beat those men that were opposite to him, and, after he had beaten them, still turned his attention to those that made a stand, and put them all to flight. And a great slaughter was made as they were forced back into the village which they had come out from, as he pressed hard upon the hindermost, and slew immense numbers of them. He also entered the village with the enemy, and every house was full of armed men, and the roofs were crowded with soldiers for their defence. And when he had beaten those that were outside, he pulled the houses to pieces, and dragged out those that were within; and upon many he brought down the roofs, and killed them en masse, while the soldiers received those few that fled from the ruins with their swords in their hands, and so great a multitude of slain lay in heaps, that the conquerors could not pass along the roads. Now the enemy could not bear this blow, so when the multitude of them that had gathered together saw that those in the village were slain, they dispersed and fled. On the strength of this victory Herod would have marched immediately to Jerusalem, had he not been hindered by the severity of the winter. This impediment lay in the way of his complete success, and hindered Antigonus from being conquered, who was already disposed to leave the city.

§ 7. Now in the evening, when Herod had already dismissed his friends to refresh themselves after their fatigue, he had gone himself, while he was still hot from his armour, to bathe like a common soldier, with but one lad that attended him. And before he entered the bath, one of the enemy ran out just opposite to him with a sword in his hand, and then a second, and then a third, and after that several. They were men who had run away from the battle in their armour to the bath, and had lain there for some time in great terror, and hidden, and when they saw the king, they trembled for fear, and ran by him in a fright although he was unarmed, and made for the outlets of the bath. Now there was by chance nobody else at hand to seize these men, and as for Herod, he was contented to have come to no harm himself, so they all got away in safety.

§ 8. But the next day Herod cut off the head of Pappus, who was the general of Antigonus, and had been slain in the battle, and sent it to his brother Pheroras, in vengeance for the murder of their brother, for he was the man that had slain Joseph. And now as the winter was abating, Herod marched to Jerusalem, and brought his army to the walls of it, in the third year after he was made king at Rome, and encamped before the temple, for on that side only was it assailable, and it was there that Pompey had taken the city before. And he divided the work among the army, and cut down trees in the suburbs, and raised three banks, and gave orders to have towers built upon those banks, and left the most energetic of his comrades at the works, but himself went to Samaria, to take to wife

Mariamne the daughter of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, who had been betrothed to him before, as I have already said. And he did this by the by during the siege of the city, for he held his enemy in great contempt already.

§ 9. When he had married Mariamne, he returned to Jerusalem with a larger army; Sossius also joined him with a large army both of horse and foot, which he had sent on before through the interior of the country, while he himself marched through Phœnice. And when the whole army was got together, which were eleven regiments of foot, and six thousand horse, besides the Syrian auxiliaries, who were no small part of the army, they pitched their camp near the north wall; Herod relying upon the decree of the senate, by which he had been declared king, and Sossius relying upon Antony, who sent the army that was under him to Herod's assistance.

How Herod and Sossius took Jerusalem by storm, and what Death Antigonus came to. Also concerning Cleopatra's avaricious Temper.

§ 1.

NOW the multitude of the Jews that were in the city were troubled in various ways. For the weaker people crowded about the temple and gave out, that, as the times were, he was the happiest and most fortunate man who died. But as to the bolder men, they got together in bodies, and fell to robbing others in various manners, and particularly plundered places about the city, and that because there was no food left for either horses or men. But those of the men of war who were best disciplined were appointed to defend the city during the siege, and they kept away from the walls those that raised the banks, and were always inventing some contrivance or other to be a hindrance to the engines of the enemy. But they had not so much success any way over the enemy as in the underground mines.

§ 2. Now, as for the robberies which were committed, the king contrived that ambushes should be laid, by which he checked the robbers' excursions; and as for the want of provisions, he provided that they should be brought from a great distance. He was also too hard for the Jews by the Romans' skill in the art of war; for although the Jews were bold to the utmost degree, yet they durst not fight hand to hand with the Romans, for that was certain death, but through their underground mines they would appear in the midst of them on a sudden, and before they could batter down one part of the wall, they raised another in its stead; in short, they did not show any slackness either of valour or contrivances, being resolved to hold out to the very last. Indeed, though they had so great an army investing them, they bore a siege of five months, till some of Herod's picked men ventured to get upon the wall and enter the city, and Sossius' centurions after them. And first they occupied the neighbourhood of the temple, and upon the pouring in of the army there was immense slaughter every where, because of the rage the Romans were in at the length of the siege, and because the Jewish force with Herod was anxious that none of their adversaries should be left. So they were cut to pieces en masse, as they were crowded together in the narrow streets and in houses, or were fleeing to the temple; nor was any mercy shown either to infants, or to the aged, or to the weakness of women; but although the king sent round and desired them to spare the people, nobody could be persuaded to withhold his right hand from slaughter, but they slew people of all ages like madmen. Then it was that Antigonus, without any regard to his former or present fortune, came down from the citadel, and fell down at Sossius' feet. But he, without pitying him at all upon this change in his fortunes, laughed at him beyond measure, and called him Antigona.<sup>1</sup> Yet did he not let him go free like a woman, but put him into bonds, and kept him in custody.

§ 3. But Herod's concern at present, now he had got his enemies in his power, was to restrain the zeal of his foreign auxiliaries; for these foreigners were very eager to see the temple, and the sacred things in the sanctuary. But the king endeavoured to restrain them, partly by exhortation, partly by threats, partly even by force, thinking victory worse than a defeat, if anything that ought not to be seen were seen by them. He also forbade at the same time spoiling the city, asking Sossius in the most earnest manner, whether the Romans, by emptying the city of money and men, had a mind to leave him king of a desert? and saying that he judged the dominion of the world too small a compensation for the slaughter of so many citizens. And when Sossius said that it was but just to allow the soldiers this plunder, as a reward for what they suffered during the siege, Herod answered, that he would himself give every one of the soldiers a reward out of his own money. So he redeemed the rest of Jerusalem, and performed his promises, making presents in a magnificent manner to each soldier, and proportionably to their commanders, and a most royal bounty to Sossius himself, so that nobody departed short of money. And Sossius dedicated a crown of gold to God, and then went away from Jerusalem, leading Antigonus away in bonds to Antony; and the axe, which his cowardly behaviour well deserved, brought him to his end, though he still had a fond desire of life, and some frigid hopes of it to the very last.

§ 4. And king Herod distinguished between the people in the city, for as for those that were on his side he made them still more his friends by the honours he conferred on them, but those of Antigonus' party he slew, and as his money ran low, he turned all the ornaments he had into money, and sent it to Antony and his followers. But he could not thereby purchase an exemption from all suffering; for Antony was already madly in love with Cleopatra, and entirely a slave to his passion. Now Cleopatra had put to death all her kindred, till no one near her in blood remained alive, and after that she fell to slaying those who were no way related to her; and she calumniated the principal men among the Syrians to Antony, and urged him to have them slain, that so she might easily become mistress of what they had. Moreover she extended her greed to the Jews and Arabians, and intrigued to have Herod and Malichus, the kings of both those nations, taken off.

§ 5. Now Antony complied in part with these injunctions of hers, for though he esteemed it abominable to kill such good and great kings, yet was he alienated from his friendship (which was the next thing) with them. So he took away a great deal of their country, even the palm-trees at Jericho, where the balsam-tree also grows, and gave them her, as also all the cities on this side the river Eleutherus,<sup>1</sup> except Tyre<sup>2</sup> and Sidon.<sup>3</sup> And when she was become mistress of these, and had conducted Antony in his expedition against the Parthians as far as the Euphrates, she went into Judæa by Apamea<sup>4</sup> and Damascus. Then did Herod appease her ill-will to him by large presents, and also hired from her those places that had been torn away from his kingdom at the yearly rent of two hundred talents. He conducted her also as far as Pelusium,<sup>5</sup> and paid her all the court possible. And not long after this Antony came back from Parthia,<sup>6</sup> and led with him Artabazes, Tigranes' son, captive, as a present for Cleopatra; for this Parthian was at once given her, with the money and all the spoil that was taken.

§ 1.

NOW when the war about Actium<sup>7</sup> broke out, Herod had intended to set out to the assistance of Antony, being already freed from his other troubles in Judæa, and having gained Hyrcania,<sup>1</sup> which fortress had been held by Antigonus' sister. However, he was cunningly hindered by Cleopatra from sharing in the dangers of Antony, for since, as I have already remarked, she had plotted against the kings of Judæa and Arabia, she urged Antony to commit the war against the Arabians to Herod, that so, if he won the day, she might become mistress of Arabia, or, if he were worsted, of Judæa, and that she might put down one of those kings by the other.

§ 2. However, this contrivance turned out to the advantage of Herod. For at the very first he plundered the enemy, and got together a large body of horse, and hurled them against the enemy near Diospolis,<sup>2</sup> and conquered the enemy, though they fought stoutly. At this defeat the Arabians were in great excitement, and mustered together at Canatha,<sup>3</sup> a city of Cœle-Syria,<sup>4</sup> in vast multitudes, and waited for the Jews. And when Herod arrived there with his army, he tried to manage the war with particular prudence, and gave orders to fortify the camp. But the multitude did not hearken to him, but were so emboldened by their previous victory, that they attacked the Arabians, and beat them at the first onset, and pursued them. But snares were laid for Herod in the pursuit, for Athenio, who was one of Cleopatra's generals, and always antagonistic to Herod, sent out of Canatha the men of that country against him, and upon their attack the Arabians took courage, and rallied, and joined their forces together on stony and difficult ground, and routed Herod's men, and made a great slaughter of them. And those that escaped out of the battle fled to Ormiza,<sup>5</sup> where the Arabians surrounded their camp, and took it with all the men in it.

§ 3. Not long after this calamity, Herod came to bring succour, but he came too late. Now the cause of this reverse was that the officers would not obey orders; for had not the fight begun so suddenly, Athenio would not have had an opportunity for the snares he laid for Herod. However, Herod was even with the Arabians afterwards, and overran their country, and did them frequently more harm than their single victory could compensate. And as he was avenging himself on his enemies, there fell upon him another providential calamity; for in the seventh year of his reign, when the war about Actium was at its height, in the beginning of spring, there was an earthquake, which destroyed an immense number of cattle, and thirty thousand men; but the army received no harm, because it lay in the open air. In the meantime, the rumour of this earthquake elated the Arabians to greater courage, for report exaggerated it, as is generally the case in gloomy events, as if all Judæa was overthrown. Supposing, therefore, that they should easily make themselves masters of a land that was destitute of inhabitants, they first sacrificed those ambassadors who had come to them from the Jews, and then marched into Judæa immediately. Now the Jewish nation were dismayed at this invasion, and quite dispirited at the greatness of their calamities one after another; but Herod assembled them together, and endeavoured to encourage them to defend themselves by the following speech.

§ 4. "The present dread you are in seems to me to have seized upon you very unreasonably. It is true, you might justly be dismayed at the providential chastisement which has befallen you; but to suffer yourselves to be terrified at the invasion of men is unmanly. As for myself, I am so far from being dismayed at our enemies after the earthquake, that I imagine that God has thereby laid a bait for the Arabians, that we may be avenged on them, for their present invasion proceeds more from our accidental misfortunes, than from their great dependence on their own weapons or fitness for action; but the hope which depends not on men's own power, but on others' ill success, is a very ticklish thing. For there is no certainty among men, either in their bad or good fortunes, but we may see that fortune is changeable, and goes from one side to another. You may indeed learn this from your own case; for though you were victors in the former fight, your enemies overcame you at last; and it will very likely happen now that these who think themselves sure of beating you will themselves be beaten. For when people are very confident, they are not upon their guard, but fear teaches people to act with caution; insomuch that I feel confidence from your very fear. For when you were more bold than you ought to have been against the enemy, and contrary to my wish attacked the enemy, Athenio's treachery had its opportunity; but now your hesitation and seeming dejection of mind is to me a pledge and assurance of victory. And indeed it is proper to be thus cautious beforehand, but when we come to action, we ought to pluck up our spirit, and to make our enemies believe, be they ever so wicked, that neither any human, no, nor any providential misfortune, can ever depress the courage of Jews while they are alive; nor will any of them ever suffer an Arabian, whom he has all but often taken captive, to become lord of his good things. And do not disturb yourselves at the movements of inanimate things, nor imagine that this earthquake is a sign of another calamity; for such conditions of the elements are according to the course of nature, nor do they import any thing further to men than the actual mischief they bring with them. Perhaps there may come some sign a little beforehand in the case of pestilence and famine and earthquakes; but these calamities themselves have their force limited. Indeed what greater mischief can the war do to us, though it should go against us, than the earthquake has done? Nay, there is a very great sign of our enemies' destruction visible, and that not a natural one, nor coming from a strange hand, in that they have barbarously murdered our ambassadors contrary to the usage of all mankind, and have decked them with garlands as sacrifices to God in relation to this war. But they will not escape his great eye, nor his invincible right hand; and we shall soon be revenged on them, if we still retain any of the spirit of our forefathers, and rise up boldly to punish these covenant-breakers. Let every one therefore go forward to fight, not so much for his wife or his children, or for the danger his country is in, but for these ambassadors of ours; for they will conduct this war of ours better than we ourselves who are alive. And if you will hearken to me, I will myself go before you into danger; for you know well enough that your courage is irresistible, unless you hurt yourselves by acting rashly.”<sup>1</sup>

§ 5. When Herod had encouraged his army by this speech, and saw how ready they were, he offered sacrifice to God, and after the sacrifice crossed over the river Jordan with his troops, and pitched his camp near Philadelphia,<sup>2</sup> not far from the enemy, and had a skirmish with them for a fortification that lay between them, as he was desirous to bring on a general engagement quickly; for some of the enemy had been sent forward to seize upon that fortification. But the king sent some troops, who immediately beat them out of the fortification, and occupied the hill, while he himself led out his men every day, and put them in battle array, and challenged the Arabians to fight. But as none of them came out of their camp (for they were in a terrible fright, and their general, Elthemus, was not able to say a word for fear), Herod went up to them, and pulled their intrenched camp to pieces, so that they were compelled to come out and fight, which they did in disorder, and so that their horse and foot were mixed up together. They were indeed superior to the Jews in number, but inferior as to zeal, although they too were very venturesome from their despair of victory.

§ 6. And so, while they resisted, they had not a great number slain; but as soon as they turned their backs, many were trodden to pieces by the Jews, and many by their own men, and so perished. And five thousand fell in the flight, while the rest of the multitude prevented their immediate death, by crowding into their intrenched camp. Herod surrounded and besieged these, and as they were bound to be taken by their enemies with their arms, they had an additional distress, which was thirst from want of water. For the king received their ambassadors in a supercilious way, and though they offered five hundred talents as ransom, he pressed still harder upon them.

<sup>1</sup> This speech of Herod's is set down twice by Josephus, here and Antiq. xv. 5, § 3, to the same purpose, but not in the same words, whence it appears, that the sense was Herod's, but the composition Josephus's.—W.

And as they were parched with thirst, they came out en masse, and voluntarily delivered themselves up to the Jews, till in five days four thousand of them were prisoners; and on the sixth day the multitude that were left were desperate, and came out to fight. And Herod fought with them, and slew again about seven thousand. And he punished Arabia so severely, and so far extinguished the spirits of the men, that he was chosen by the nation for their ruler.

CHAP. XX.

Herod is confirmed in his Kingdom by Augustus, and cultivates a Friendship with the Emperor by magnificent Presents; while Augustus returns his Kindness by bestowing on him that Part of his Kingdom which had been taken away by Cleopatra, with the Addition of Zenodorus' Country also.

§ 1.

AND now Herod was in immediate concern about his whole fortunes on account of his friendship with Antony, who had just been defeated off Actium<sup>1</sup> by Augustus. But he was more afraid than hurt. For Augustus did not think he had quite undone Antony while Herod remained. But the king resolved to face his danger: so he sailed to Rhodes,<sup>2</sup> where Augustus then abode, and came to him without his diadem, and in the dress and guise of a private person, but with the spirit of a king. And he concealed nothing of the truth, but spoke straight out as follows. "O Cæsar, I was made king of the Jews by Antony, and I confess that I have used my royal authority entirely for his advantage; nor will I conceal this further, that you would certainly have found me in arms, had not the Arabians hindered me. However, I sent him as many auxiliaries as I was able, and many ten thousand cors of corn; nor indeed did I desert my benefactor after his reverse at Actium. But I gave him the best advice I was able, when I was no longer able to assist him in the war; for I told him that there was but one way of retrieving his affairs, and that was to kill Cleopatra; and I promised him, that if he put her to death, I would afford him money and walls for his security, and an army and myself to assist him in the war against you. But his passion for Cleopatra stopped his ears, as did God himself also, who has bestowed the victory on you. And I am overcome with Antony, and with the same fortune as his I have laid aside my diadem, and am come hither to you, putting my hopes of safety in your virtue, and I presume you will consider how faithful a friend, and not whose friend, I have been."

§ 2. Augustus replied to him as follows: "Continue in safety, and reign now more firmly than before; for you are worthy to rule over a great many subjects, because of the firmness of your friendship. And do you endeavour to be equally constant in your friendship to me in<sup>1</sup> happier circumstances, for I have the brightest hopes from your lofty spirit. However, Antony did well in listening to Cleopatra rather than to you; for I have gained you by her folly. It also appears that you were my friend before I began to be yours, for Quintus Didius has written to me that you sent him assistance against the gladiators. Now therefore I confirm the kingdom to you by decree: but I shall also endeavour to do you some further kindness hereafter, that you may not miss Antony."

§ 3. When Augustus had spoken thus kindly to Herod, and put the diadem on his head, he proclaimed what he had bestowed on him by a decree, in which he greatly launched out in his commendation. And Herod still further appeased him by the presents he gave him, and begged him to forgive Alexander, one of Antony's friends, who supplicated his favour. But Augustus' anger was too great against Alexander for this, and he complained of the many and very great offences the man whom Herod petitioned for had been guilty of, and so he rejected his request. After this, when Augustus went to Egypt through Syria, Herod received him with royal and rich entertainments; and then first rode side by side with Augustus, when he reviewed his army at Ptolemais,<sup>1</sup> and feasted him with all his friends, and then distributed among the rest of the army what was necessary to feast them also. He also contrived a plentiful provision of water for them, when they were to march as far as Pelusium<sup>2</sup> through a dry country, and did so also on their return thence; nor were there any necessaries wanting to the army. It was therefore the opinion, both of Augustus and his soldiers, that Herod's kingdom was too small for those generous presents he made them; for which reason, when Augustus had returned to Egypt, as Cleopatra and Antony were now dead, he not only bestowed other honours upon him, but also made an addition to his kingdom, by giving him, not only the country which had been taken from him by Cleopatra, but also Gadara<sup>3</sup> and Hippos<sup>4</sup> and Samaria,<sup>5</sup> and in addition to these the maritime cities of Gaza<sup>6</sup> and Anthedon<sup>7</sup> and Joppa<sup>8</sup> and Strato's Tower.<sup>9</sup> He also made him a present of four hundred Galati for his body-guard, as they had been to Cleopatra before. Nor did anything so strongly induce Augustus to make these presents as the generosity of him that received them.

§ 4. Moreover, after the first games at Actium, he added to his kingdom both the region called Trachonitis,<sup>10</sup> and the adjacent Batanæa,<sup>11</sup> and the district of Auranitis,<sup>12</sup> for the following reason. Zenodorus, who had hired the house of Lysanias, had all along sent robbers out of Trachonitis among the Damascenes. And they had recourse to Varro the governor of Syria, and begged of him that he would represent their calamity to Augustus; and when Augustus was acquainted with it, he sent back orders that this nest of robbers should be destroyed. Varro therefore made an expedition against them, and cleared the land of those men, and took it away from Zenodorus, and Augustus afterwards bestowed it on Herod, that it might not again become a point d'appui for those robbers against Damascus. He also made him procurator of all Syria the tenth year afterwards, when he came again into that province, on such a footing that the other procurators could not do anything without his advice. And when Zenodorus was dead, Augustus bestowed on Herod all the land which lay between Trachonitis and Galilee. And what was of still more consequence to Herod, he was beloved by Augustus next after Agrippa, and by Agrippa next after Augustus. So he arrived at a very great degree of felicity, and his spirit was elated to greater ideas, and most of his magnanimity was extended to the promotion of piety.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Temple and Cities that were built by Herod, and erected from the very Foundations; also of the other Edifices that were erected by him; and what magnificence he showed to Foreigners; and how Fortune was in all things favourable to him.

§ 1.

ACCORDINGLY in the fifteenth year of his reign Herod rebuilt the temple, and surrounded with a wall double the land that was before enclosed around it, at vast expense and with insurpassable magnificence. A sign of which you have in the great porticoes erected about the temple, and the citadel on its north side.<sup>1</sup> The porticoes he built from the foundation, but the citadel he repaired at a vast expense, as if it were no less than a royal palace, and called it Antonia<sup>1</sup> in honour of Antony. He also built himself a palace<sup>2</sup> in the upper city, containing two very large and most beautiful apartments, to which the temple itself could not be compared. One he called Cæsareum, and the other Agrippeum, after his friends Cæsar Augustus and Agrippa.

§ 2. But he did not preserve their memory by particular buildings only, and the names given them, but his generosity went as far as entire cities. For when he had built a most beautiful wall twenty furlongs long round a town in the district of Samaria, and had brought six thousand inhabitants into it, and had allotted to them most fruitful land, and in the midst of this city had erected a very large temple to Augustus, and had laid round about it a sacred enclosure of three furlongs and a half, he called the city Sebaste.<sup>3</sup> He also settled the affairs of the city in a most regular manner.

§ 3. And when Augustus had further bestowed upon him another additional country, he built there also a temple of white marble in his honour near the fountains of the Jordan. The place is called Panium.<sup>4</sup> There the top of a mountain rises to an immense height, and at its side beneath a dark cave opens, within which is a horrible precipice that descends abruptly to a vast depth, which contains a mighty quantity of stagnant water, and if any body lets down any thing to find the bottom, no length of cord is sufficient to reach it. Now the fountains of the Jordan rise at the external roots of this cave, and some think, this is the origin of the Jordan. But I shall speak of this matter more accurately hereafter.

§ 4. And the king erected other edifices at Jericho also, between the citadel Cypros<sup>5</sup> and the former palace, which were better and more convenient for dwelling in, and named them after the same friends of his. In short, there was not any place in his kingdom fit for the purpose, that was permitted to be without something for the emperor's honour, and when he had filled his own country with temples to him, he showed him the like marks of honour all over the province, and built in many cities temples in honour of Cæsar Augustus.

§ 5. And when he observed that there was a city by the seaside, that was much decayed, called Strato's Tower,<sup>1</sup> and that the place, from its convenient situation, was capable of great improvements from his liberality, he rebuilt it all with white stone, and adorned it with several most splendid palaces, and in it especially showed his natural munificence. For all the seashore between Dora<sup>2</sup> and Joppa,<sup>3</sup> between which places this city is situated, had no good haven, insomuch that every one that sailed from Phœnice for Egypt had to toss about out at sea because of the south wind that threatened them; for if that wind blows but a little fresh, such vast waves are raised and dash upon the rocks, that upon their ebb the sea is in a great ferment for a long way. But the king by great expense and liberality overcame nature, and built a haven larger than the Piræus,<sup>4</sup> and in its recesses built other deep stations for ships also.

§ 6. Now although the place was very ill adapted for his purpose, yet did he so fully struggle with its difficulty, that the firmness of his work could not easily be conquered by the sea, and the beauty and ornament of the work was such, as if he had not had any difficulty in its construction. For when he had measured out as large a space for the harbour as I have mentioned, he let down stones into twenty fathoms of water, of which most were fifty feet in length, and nine in depth, and ten in breadth, and some larger still. And when that depth was filled up, he enlarged the wall which thus already stood out above the sea to two hundred feet, one hundred of which was built out in order to break the force of the waves, whence it was called Procumia,<sup>5</sup> and the rest of the space was under a stone wall that ran round the harbour. On this wall were very large towers, the principal and most beautiful of which was called Drusium from Drusus, who was step-son of Cæsar Augustus.

§ 7. There were also a great number of crypts, where mariners could put in at ; and all the space before them round about was a terrace and broad walk for those that came on shore. And the entrance was on the north, because the north wind was there the most gentle of all the winds. At the mouth of the haven there were on each side three great Colossuses supported by pillars, of which those on the left hand as one sails in are supported by a solid tower, but those on the right hand are supported by two upright stones joined together, and larger than the tower on the other side of the entrance. And houses, built also themselves of white stone, were close to the haven, and the narrow streets of the city led down to it, which were built at equal distances from one another. And opposite the mouth of the haven, upon an elevation, was a temple of Cæsar Augustus, excellent both for beauty and size ; and in it was a colossal statue of Cæsar Augustus, as big as the Olympian Zeus, from which it was copied, and a statue of Rome, as big as that of Hera at Argos. And he dedicated the city to the province, and the haven to those that sailed there, but the honour of the founding of the city he ascribed to Cæsar Augustus, and called it Cæsarea accordingly.

§ 8. He also built the other edifices, as the amphitheatre, and theatre, and market-place, in a manner worthy of the name of the city. And he appointed games every fifth year, and called them in like manner Cæsar's Games ; and he first offered himself the largest prizes in the hundred and ninety-second Olympiad, in which games not only the victors themselves, but also those that came in second and even third, were partakers of the royal bounty. He also rebuilt Anthedon,<sup>1</sup> a city that lay on the coast, and had been demolished in the wars, and called it Agrippæum ; indeed, he had so very great a kindness for his friend Agrippa, that he had his name engraven upon the gate which he had himself erected in the temple.

§ 9. Herod was also a lover of his father, if any person ever was, for he built as a memorial of his father a city in the finest plain that was in his kingdom, which had rivers and trees in abundance, and called it Antipatris.<sup>1</sup> He also built a wall round a citadel that lay above Jericho, and was very strong and handsome, and dedicated it to his mother, and called it Cypros. Moreover, he dedicated a tower that was at Jerusalem, to his brother Phasaelus,<sup>2</sup> and called it by his name. Its structure, size, and magnificence, I shall describe hereafter. He also built another city in the valley that leads northwards from Jericho, and called it Phasaelis.<sup>3</sup>

§ 10. And as he thus handed down to eternity his family and friends, so did he not neglect a memorial of himself, but built a fortress upon a mountain towards Arabia, and called it after himself Herodium;<sup>4</sup> and he called a hill that was the shape of a woman's breast, and was sixty furlongs from Jerusalem, by the same name, and bestowed much curious art upon it at lavish expense. For he built round towers all about the top of it, and filled the enclosure with the most costly palaces, so that not only the sight of the inner apartments was splendid, but great wealth was expended on the outer walls and cornices and roofs. He also brought a quantity of water from a great distance at vast cost, and raised an ascent to it of two hundred steps of the whitest marble, for the elevation for this reservoir was a fair height and entirely artificial. He also built other palaces at the bottom of the hill, large enough to receive the furniture that was put into them and his friends also; so that from its containing all necessaries the fortress might seem to be a city, but from its area a palace only.

built gymnasiums at Tripolis<sup>1</sup> and Damascus and Ptolemais,<sup>2</sup> and a wall round Byblus,<sup>3</sup> and arcades and porticoes and temples and market-places at Berytus<sup>4</sup> and Tyre,<sup>5</sup> and theatres at Sidon<sup>6</sup> and Damascus. He also built an aqueduct for those Laodiceans<sup>7</sup> who lived by the sea-side; and for those of Ascalon he built baths and costly fountains, as also colonnades that were admirable both for their workmanship and size. Moreover, he dedicated groves and meadows to some people; and not a few cities had lands of his donation, as if they were parts of his own kingdom. He also bestowed annual revenues for ever on the offices of gymnasiarchs, appointing for them, as for the people of Cos,<sup>8</sup> that prizes should never be wanting. He also gave corn to all who wanted it, and frequently<sup>9</sup> conferred upon the people of Rhodes<sup>10</sup> large sums of money for building ships. And when Apollo's temple had been burnt down, he rebuilt it at his own expense, but handsomer than before. Why need I speak of the presents he made to the Lycians<sup>11</sup> and Samians,<sup>12</sup> or of his great liberality through all Ionia,<sup>13</sup> according to everybody's wants? And are not the Athenians, and Lacedæmonians, and Nicopolitans,<sup>14</sup> and Pergamus<sup>15</sup> in Mysia, full of donations that Herod presented them with? And as for the street of Antioch in Syria,<sup>16</sup> did not he pave it with polished marble, though it was twenty furlongs long, and shunned by all men before, because it was full of mud, and did he not adorn it with a portico of the same length to take shelter in from the rain?

§ 12. But perhaps some one may say, these were favours peculiar to particular places, but his donation to the people of Elis<sup>1</sup> was not only common to all Greece, but to all the world, to which the glory of the Olympic games reached. For when he perceived that they were coming to nothing for want of money, and that the only vestige of ancient Greece was disappearing, he not only became a president of the games in that quinquennial celebration, which in his sailing to Rome he happened to be present at, but he settled upon them revenues of money in perpetuity, insomuch that his memory as a president of the games there can never fail. It would be an infinite task if I should detail his remissions of debts or tributes, as he eased the people of Phasaelis<sup>2</sup> and Balanea,<sup>3</sup> and the small cities about Cilicia,<sup>4</sup> of the annual taxes they before paid. However, the greatness of his soul was very much disturbed by the fear that he should excite envy, or seem to hunt after greater things than he ought, in bestowing more liberal gifts upon these cities than their own masters had.

§ 13. Now Herod had a body suited to his soul, and was ever a most excellent hunter, in which sport he generally had great success owing to his skill in riding, for in one day he once killed forty wild beasts. His country breeds boars, and is especially full of stags and wild asses. He was also such a warrior as could not be withstood, and many have marvelled at his skill at the butts, when they saw him a most straight javelin-thrower, and a most unerring archer. And in addition to this excellence of mind and body, fortune was also very favourable to him. For he seldom failed of success in war; and when he failed, he was not himself the cause of such failure, but he was either betrayed by some, or the rashness of his own soldiers procured his defeat.

CHAP. XXII.

The Murder of the High Priests Aristobulus and Hyrcanus, as also of Mariamne the Queen.

§ 1.

HOWEVER, fortune had a Nemesis against Herod for his external success, by raising him up domestic troubles, and he began to be unhappy on account of his wife, of whom he was very fond. For when he became king, he put away her whom he had married when he was a private person, a native of Jerusalem, whose name was Doris, and married Mariamne, the daughter of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus; on whose account disturbances arose in his family, and that very soon, but chiefly after his return from Rome. For first of all, he banished from Jerusalem Antipater the son of Doris, for the sake of his sons by Mariamne, and permitted him to come there at no other times than at the festivals. After this he slew his wife's grandfather, Hyrcanus, when he returned to him from Parthia, on a suspicion of plotting against him. This Hyrcanus had been carried captive by Barzapharnes, when he overran Syria, and those of his own country beyond the Euphrates were desirous he would stay with them, moved by pity. And had he listened to them, when they exhorted him not to go over the river to Herod, he would not have perished. But the marriage of his granddaughter Mariamne ensnared him to his death; for as he relied upon that, and was very fond of his own country, he returned to it. Now Herod's irritation against him was, not that Hyrcanus made any attempt to gain the kingdom, but that the kingdom properly belonged to him.

§ 2. Now of the five children that Herod had by Mariamne, two were daughters, and three were sons. And the youngest of these sons was educated at Rome, and there died; and the two eldest he treated as royal blood because of the exalted rank of their mother, and because he was king when they were born. But what was stronger than all this was the love he bore to Mariamne, which inflamed him every day to a greater degree, so that he felt none of the troubles that arose on account of her he loved. But Mariamne's hatred to him was not inferior to his love for her. She had, indeed, just cause of indignation for what he had done, while her boldness proceeded from his affection for her; so she openly reproached him with what he had done to her grandfather Hyrcanus, and to her brother Aristobulus. For he had not spared this Aristobulus, though he was but a lad, for when he had given him the high priesthood at the age of seventeen, he had him slain immediately after he had conferred that dignity upon him; for when Aristobulus had put on the holy vestments, and had approached the altar at a festival, the assembled multitude wept for joy; whereupon the lad was sent by night to Jericho, and was there dipped by the Galati, at Herod's command, in a swimming-bath till he was drowned.

§ 3. For these reasons Mariamne reproached Herod and his sister and mother with dreadful abuse. And he was dumb on account of his affection for her: but the women were very vexed with her, and raised a calumny against her, that she was false to Herod's bed: which thing they thought most likely to move him to anger. They also contrived many other things to make it appear more credible, and accused her of having sent her picture into Egypt to Antony, and in her extravagant lust of having thus shown herself, though she was absent, to a man that was mad after women, and had it in his power to force her. This charge fell like a thunderbolt upon Herod, and greatly troubled him, especially as his love to her made him jealous, and as he also reflected on the cruelty of Cleopatra, owing to whom Lysanian the king had been taken off, and Malichus the Arabian. For he measured his danger not only by the loss of his wife but also his life.

§ 4. When, therefore, he was about to take a journey abroad, he committed his wife to Joseph, his sister Salome's husband, as to one who would be faithful to him, and bore him good-will on account of their connection by marriage, giving him secret injunctions, if Antony slew him, that he would slay her. But Joseph without any evil intention, and only in order to prove the king's love to his wife, so that he could not bear to think of being separated from her even by death itself, discovered this secret to her. And when Herod was come back, and in the familiar intercourse of marriage confirmed his love to her by many oaths, and assured her that he had never loved any other woman as he had her; "To be sure," said she, "you proved your love to me by the injunctions you gave Joseph, when you commanded him to kill me."

§ 5. When he heard this secret, he was like a distracted man, and said that Joseph would never have disclosed that injunction of his, unless he had seduced her; and his passion made him stark mad, and he leaped off the bed, and ran about the palace in a wild manner. Meantime his sister Salome took advantage of this to blast Mariamne's reputation, and confirm Herod's suspicion about Joseph. And so in his ungovernable jealousy and rage, he commanded both of them to be slain immediately; but as soon as ever his passion was over, he repented of what he had done, and, as soon as his anger was worn off, his love was kindled again. And, indeed, his passionate desire for Mariamne was so ardent, that he could not think she was dead, but in his sorrow talked to her as if she were still alive until taught by time, and grieved, now she was dead, as much as he had loved her while she was living.

CHAP. XXIII.

Calumnies against the Sons of Mariamne. Antipater is preferred before them. They are accused before Augustus, and Herod is reconciled to them.

§ 1.

NOW Mariamne's sons inherited their mother's hate, and when they considered the greatness of Herod's abominable guilt, they were suspicious of their father as of an enemy, even earlier when they were educated at Rome, but still more when they had returned to Judæa. This idea of theirs increased as they grew up to be men. Now when they were come to an age fit for marriage, one of them married the daughter of their aunt Salome, who had been the accuser of their mother, and the other married the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. And now they used boldness in speaking, as well as bore hate in their minds. And those that calumniated them took a handle from their boldness, and some of them told the king now more plainly that there were treacherous designs laid against him by both his sons, and that the one that was son-in-law to Archelaus, relying upon his father-in-law, was making preparations for flight to accuse Herod before Augustus. And when Herod was quite poisoned against them by these calumnies, he recalled Antipater, his son by Doris, from exile, as a bulwark against his other sons, and began in every way to treat him with more distinction than them.

§ 2. But this change in their affairs was intolerable to these sons, for when they saw him advanced that was the son of a private woman, the nobility of their birth made them unable to contain their indignation; but whenever they were vexed, they showed their anger. And as they gave more and more offence every day, Antipater began already to look out for his own interest, being very clever in flattering his father, and in contriving various calumnies against his brothers, telling some stories of them himself, and suborning his friends to spread abroad other stories against them, till he entirely cut his brothers off from all hopes of succeeding to the kingdom. For he was already put publicly in his father's will as his successor: so he was sent with royal ornaments, and other marks of royalty, except the diadem, to Augustus. He was also able in time to introduce his mother again into Mariamne's bed. The two weapons he made use of against his brothers were flattery and calumny, whereby he brought matters privately to such a pass that the king thought of putting his sons to death.

§ 3. So Herod dragged Alexander with him as far as Rome, and charged him with attempting to poison him before Augustus. Alexander could hardly speak for grief, but having a judge that was more skilful than Antipater, and more wise than Herod, he modestly avoided laying any imputations against his father, but very ably cleared himself of the calumnies laid against him; and when he had proved the innocence of his brother, who was in the same danger as himself, he then bewailed the craftiness of Antipater, and the dishonour done to him and his brother. He was enabled also to justify himself, not only by a clear conscience, but also by his eloquence; for he was a very clever speaker. And upon his saying at last, that if their father brought this charge against them, it was in his power to put them to death, he made everybody present weep; and brought Augustus to that pass, as to reject the accusation, and to reconcile Herod to them immediately. And the conditions of reconciliation were these, that they should in all things be obedient to their father, and that he should have power to leave the kingdom to whoever he pleased.

§ 4. After this the king returned from Rome, and seemed to have acquitted his sons of these charges, but still was not without some suspicion of them. For he was accompanied by Antipater, who was the fountain-head of these accusations, but who did not openly show his hatred to them, as he stood in awe of him that had reconciled them. And as Herod sailed by Cilicia he touched at Eleusa,<sup>1</sup> where Archelaus treated them in the most hospitable manner, and gave Herod thanks for the safety of his son-in-law, and was much pleased at the reconciliation; for he had lost no time in writing to his friends at Rome to assist Alexander at his trial. And he conducted Herod as far as Zephyrium,<sup>2</sup> and made him presents to the value of thirty talents.

§ 5. Now when Herod had returned to Jerusalem, he gathered the people together, and presented to them his three sons, and gave an account of the reason of his absence, and thanked God greatly, and Cæsar Augustus also, for settling his house when it was in a state of confusion, and for procuring concord among his sons, which was of greater consequence than the kingdom. "I will render this concord still more firm," he added, "for Augustus has put it into my power to dispose of the kingdom, and to appoint my successor. Accordingly, by way of requital for his kindness, and for mine own advantage, I do declare, that my three sons here shall all be kings, and first I pray for the approbation of God, and next I desire your approval in this matter. The age of one of them, and the nobility of the other two, recommend them for the succession. Nay, indeed, my kingdom is so large, that it is sufficient for even more kings. Now do you uphold those whom Augustus has united, and their father has appointed; and do not pay undue or unequal respect to them, but to every one according to the order of their birth; for he that pays such respect unduly, will not thereby make him that is honoured beyond what his age requires so joyful, as he will make him that is dishonoured sorrowful. As for the kindred and friends that are to associate with them, I will appoint them for each of them, and will so constitute them that they may be securities for their concord: for I am well aware that the malignity of those with whom they associate will produce quarrels and contentions among them; but if those with whom they associate be good, they will preserve their natural affections for one another. But still I desire, that not these only, but all the captains of my army, place for the present their hopes on me alone. For I do not hand over my kingdom to my sons, but give them royal honours only; whereby they will enjoy the sweets of government as rulers, but the burden of administration will rest upon me, even if I do not wish for it. And let every one consider my age, and the conduct of my life, and my piety. For my age is not so great, that men may soon expect the end of my life; nor have I indulged in such a luxurious way of living as cuts men off when they are young; and I have been so religious towards God, that I have reason to hope I may arrive at a very great age. So he that pays court to my sons with a view to deposing me shall be punished by me for such conduct. I am not one who envy my own children or forbid men to pay them respect, but I know that extravagant respect is the way to make them insolent. And if every one that comes near them does but consider this, that if he proves a good man, he shall receive a reward from me, but if he sows discord, his malignity shall get him nothing from him to whom he pays court, I suppose all will study my interests, which are also those of my sons; for it will be for their advantage that I reign, and continue in concord with them. And do you, my good sons, reflect first upon the sacred ties of nature, by which natural affection is preserved even among wild beasts; and next reflect upon the emperor who has made this reconciliation among us; and, in the third place, reflect upon me, who entreat you to do what I have power to command you, and continue as brothers. I give you already royal robes and royal honours; and I pray to God to uphold my decision, if you live in concord with one another." When the king had thus spoken, and lovingly embraced every one of his sons, he dismissed the multitude, some of whom wished that what he had said might take effect, but those who desired change pretended that they had not heard what he said.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Malice of Antipater and Doris. Alexander is very uneasy on Glaphyra's Account. Herod pardons Pheroras and Salome. Herod's Eunuchs are tortured, and Alexander is put in bonds.

§ 1.

BUT the dissension between the brothers still accompanied them when they parted, and the suspicions they had of one another grew worse. For Alexander and Aristobulus were much vexed that the privilege of the first-born was confirmed to Antipater, and Antipater was very angry that his brothers were to succeed him. But he, being very crafty, knew how to hold his tongue, and used a great deal of cunning, and so concealed the hatred he had to them; while they, relying on the nobility of their births, had every thing upon their tongues which was in their minds. Many also exasperated them further, and several [seeming] friends insinuated themselves into intimacy with them to spy out what they did. So every thing that was said by Alexander was at once brought to Antipater, and from

Antipater it was carried to Herod with additions. Nor could the young man say anything in the simplicity of his heart without giving offence, but what he said was still turned to calumny against him, and if he had been at any time a little free in his conversation, the greatest imputations were forged from the smallest occasions. Antipater also was perpetually employing persons to provoke him to speak, that the lies he told about him might seem to have some foundation of truth; and if, among the many stories that were spread abroad, but one could be proved true, that was supposed to imply the rest to be true also. As to Antipater's friends, they were all either naturally close, or had been bribed to be so, so that no secrets got abroad by them; nor would any one be wrong if he called the life of Antipater a mystery of wickedness. For he either corrupted Alexander's suite with money, or got into their favour by flatteries; by which two means he gained all his designs, and induced them to betray their master, and to reveal all that he did or said. Thus did he act his part very cunningly in all points, and wound his way to Herod by his calumnies with the greatest art, assuming the character of a kind brother, but suborning other men to inform of them. And when any thing was reported against Alexander, he would come forward and play his part, and beginning by affecting to disbelieve what was said, would afterwards so contrive matters privately, that the king should be more incensed at him. His main aim was to lay snares, and to make it appear that Alexander was watching his opportunity to kill his father; for nothing afforded so much confirmation to these calumnies as did Antipater's apologies for him.

§ 2. By these methods Herod was exasperated, and, in proportion as his natural affection to the young men every day diminished, so did it increase toward Antipater. The courtiers also inclined to the same conduct, some of their own accord, and others by the king's injunction, as Ptolemy, the king's most honoured friend, as also the king's brothers, and all his family. For Antipater was all in all: and what was most mortifying to Alexander, Antipater's mother was also all in all; and she intrigued against them, and was more harsh than a step-mother, and hated the queen's sons even more than it is usual to hate step-sons. All men therefore already began to pay court to Antipater in hopes of self-interest, and the king's commands alienated every body from Alexander and his brother, as he charged his most intimate friends, that they should not come near them, nor pay any regard to them. Herod was also terrible, not only to those in his kingdom, but also to his friends abroad; for Augustus had given to no other king such a privilege as he had given to him, namely, that he might fetch back any one that fled from him, even from a city that was not in his jurisdiction. Now the young men were ignorant of the calumnies raised against them, so that being off their guard they were the more exposed to them, for their father did not make any public complaints against either of them, though they saw by degrees how things were from his coldness to them, and because he was more and more harsh with them when anything offended him in their conduct. Antipater also made their uncle Pheroras their enemy, and their aunt Salome, as he was always courting her, as if she were his wife, and irritating her against them. Moreover, Alexander's wife, Glaphyra, augmented her hatred against them, by talking of her own noble lineage, and declaring that she was superior to all the women in the kingdom, being descended on her father's side from Temenus, and on her mother's side from Darius, the son of Hystaspes. She also frequently twitted Herod's sister and wives with their low extraction, for every one of his wives had been chosen by him for their beauty, and not for their family. Now those wives of his were not a few, it being of old permitted to the Jews to marry many wives; <sup>1</sup> and Herod delighted in many, all of whom hated Alexander on account of Glaphyra's pride and insults.

abuse. For he perpetually upbraided his wife with her low extraction, and complained that he had married a woman of no rank, while his brother Alexander had married a princess. At this Salome's daughter wept, and told her mother what he said with the addition, that Alexander and Aristobulus threatened the mothers of their other brothers, that when they should come to the crown, they would make them weave with the female slaves, and would make their brothers country scribes, jeering at them for their careful education. At this Salome could not contain her anger, but told all to Herod; nor could her testimony be suspected, as it was against her own son-in-law. There was also another calumny that spread abroad, and inflamed the king's anger. For he heard that these sons of his were perpetually speaking of their mother, and among their lamentations for her did not abstain from cursing him; and that often, when he made presents of any of Mariamne's dresses to his later wives, his sons threatened, that soon, instead of royal garments, they should clothe themselves in haircloth.

§ 4. Now though Herod on these accounts was somewhat afraid of the young men's high spirit, yet did he not despair of bringing them to a better mind; so before he went to Rome, where he was now going by sea, he called them to him, and threatened them a little as a king, but in the main admonished them as a father, and exhorted them to love their brothers, and told them that he would pardon their past offences, if they would be better for the time to come. But they cleared themselves of the charges laid against them, and said they were false, and maintained that their actions were sufficient vindication. They said also that Herod ought to shut his ears against such tales, and not to be too credulous, for people would never be wanting to tell lies against them, so long as any would give ear to them.

§ 5. When they had in this way soon persuaded him, as being their father, they got rid of their fear for the present, but they saw reason for sorrow for the future; for they knew that Salome and their uncle Pheroras were their enemies. And both of these were important and dangerous persons, and especially Pheroras, who was a partuer with Herod in all the kingdom, except that he had no diadem, and had also a hundred talents of his own income, and enjoyed the revenues of all the land beyond the Jordan, which he had received as a gift from his brother, who had also made him a tetrarch (having asked that favour of Augustus), and given him a wife out of the royal family, namely, his own wife's sister, and after her death had solemnly betrothed to him his own eldest daughter, with a dowry of three hundred talents; but Pheroras had refused this royal marriage because of his love for a certain maid-servant. At this Herod was very angry, and gave that daughter in marriage to a brother's son of his, who was afterwards slain by the Parthians, but soon laid aside his anger against Pheroras, and pardoned his infatuation for the maid-servant.

§ 6. Pheroras had indeed been accused long before, while the queen was still alive, of having designed to poison Herod; and there came now so very great a number of informers, that though Herod was exceedingly fond of his brother, he was induced to believe what was said, and to be afraid. And when he had brought many of those that were under suspicion to the torture, he came at last to Pheroras' own friends; none of whom distinctly admitted any plot, but owned that he had made preparations to carry off this maid-servant whom he loved, and run away to the Parthians, and that Costobarus, the husband of Salome, to whom the king had given her in marriage, after her former husband had been put to death for adultery, was cognizant of his intended flight. Nor did Salome escape all calumny herself; for her brother Pheroras accused her of having made an agreement to marry Syllæus (the procurator of Obodas, king of Arabia), who was a very bitter enemy of Herod. But though she was convicted of this, and of all that Pheroras had accused her of, she obtained her pardon. The king also pardoned Pheroras himself the crimes he was accused of.

§ 7. Thus the storm that threatened the whole family shifted to Alexander, and all of it burst upon his head. There were three eunuchs who were in the highest esteem with the king, as was plain by the offices they held about his person; for one of them was appointed his butler, another of them brought in his supper, and the third put him to bed, and lay with him. Now Alexander had induced these eunuchs by large gifts to be his pathics. And when this was told to the king, they were put to the torture, and at once confessed the immoral relations he had had with them. They also disclosed the promises by which they had been induced to behave so, and how they were deluded by Alexander, who had told them that they ought not to fix their hopes upon Herod, a shameless old man who dyed his hair (and perhaps they thought him young on that account), but they ought to pay their court to him, who was sure to be his successor in the kingdom, whether he liked or not, and who in no long time would avenge himself on his enemies, and make his friends happy and blessed, and themselves most so of all. They added that influential men already paid court to Alexander privately, and that the generals of the army and other officers secretly waited upon him.

§ 8. These confessions so terrified Herod, that he durst not immediately make them public, but he privately sent spies abroad by night and day, and made a close inquiry into all that was done and said, and put all who were suspected of treason to death. Thus the palace was full of horrible injustice. For everybody forged calumnies, according as they were in a state of enmity or hatred against others, and many abused the king's thirst for blood against those with whom they had quarrels. And lies were easily believed, and punishments were inflicted sooner than the calumnies were forged: and he who had just been accusing another, was accused himself, and was led away to execution with him whom he had convicted; for the danger the king was in of his life cut inquiries very short. He also proceeded to such a degree of bitterness, that he could not look pleasant even at any of those that were not accused, but was most savage even to his friends. Indeed, he forbade a great many of them to come to court, and spoke harshly to those whom he had not power actually to injure. As for Antipater, he intrigued against Alexander afresh, now he was in misfortune, and got a band of his kinsmen together, and raised all sorts of calumnies against him. And the king was brought to such a degree of terror by these prodigious slanders and inventions, that he fancied he saw Alexander coming to him with a drawn sword in his hand. So he had him arrested immediately and put into prison, and proceeded to examine his friends by torture, most of whom died silently, for they would not say anything against their consciences; but some, being forced to speak falsely by the pain, said that Alexander and his brother Aristobulus had conspired against Herod, and watched for an opportunity to kill him as he was hunting, and then intended to flee to Rome. These accusations, though they were far from plausible, and only made up on the spur of the moment from the great torture they were in, were gladly believed by the king, who thought it some comfort not to appear to have put his son into prison unjustly.

CHAP. XXV.

§ 1.

NOW Alexander, since he saw it was impossible to change his father's mind, resolved to meet his calamities; so he composed four books against his enemies, and confessed to a conspiracy, but declared also that most of them were accomplices with him, and especially Pheroras and Salome; nay, he declared that Salome one night forced him against his will to lie with her. These books were put into Herod's hands, and raised a great clamour against influential persons. And Archelaus hurried to Judæa, being frightened for his son-in-law and daughter; and he came as a very prudent helper to them, and by his astuteness prevented the king's carrying out his threats. For when he was come to him, he cried out at once, "Where in the world is this accursed son-in-law of mine? Where shall I see that parricidal head, which I will tear to pieces with my own hands? I will do the same also to my daughter, who has such a fine husband: for if she has not been a partner in the plot, yet, by being the wife of such a wretch, she is polluted. And I wonder at your patience, after having been thus plotted against, if Alexander is still alive. For I came with what haste I could from Cappadocia, for I expected to find he had paid the penalty long ago ; but I desired to consider with you the case of my daughter, whom I had given to him in marriage, out of regard to you and your rank. But now we must take counsel about them both. And if your paternal affection is so great, that you cannot punish your son, who has plotted against you, let us exchange our right hands, and succeed one to the other in expressing our rage upon this occasion."

§ 2. By this pompous oration Archelaus got Herod to remit his purpose somewhat, though he was very determined. And Herod gave him the books which Alexander had composed to read, and as he perused every chapter, considered it with him. And Archelaus took opportunity from this for his stratagem, and by degrees shifted the blame to the persons whose names were in these books, and especially to Pheroras. And when he saw that the king believed him, he said, " We must consider whether the young man be not himself plotted against by so many wicked wretches, and not you plotted against by the young man. For I cannot see any reason for his falling into so abominable a crime, since he enjoys the advantages of royalty already, and has the hope of being one of your successors, unless indeed some persons urge him to it, who abuse the easiness of youth ; for not only are young men sometimes imposed upon by such persons, but old men also, and sometimes the most illustrious families and whole kingdoms overturned."

§ 3. Herod assented to what he said, and by degrees abated of his anger against Alexander, but was exasperated with Pheroras ; for he was the principal subject of the four books. So Pheroras, perceiving this sudden change on the part of the king, and observing that Archelaus' friendship was now all powerful with Herod, and that he had no honourable method of preserving himself, procured his safety by impudence. So he left Alexander, and had recourse to Archelaus. And Archelaus told him that he did not see how he could get him excused, now he was involved in so many charges, by which it was clearly proved that he had plotted against the king, and had been the cause of that evil plight which the young man was now in, unless he would leave off his cunning, and cease to deny what he was charged with, and confess his guilt, and implore pardon of his brother, who still loved him; and if he would do so, he would afford him all the assistance in his power.

§ 4. With this advice Pheroras complied, and so attiring himself as might most move compassion, he came with a black garment and tears in his eyes, and threw himself down at Herod's feet, as often as he got an opportunity, and begged pardon for what he had done, and confessed himself a guilty wretch, who had done every thing he had been accused of, and lamented the distraction of his mind and madness, which his love to a woman had (he said) brought him to. And when Archelaus had got Pheroras to accuse and bear witness against himself, he then made excuses for him, and mitigated Herod's anger towards him by an illustration from his own family history. For he said that he had suffered much worse treatment from a brother of his own, but preferred the ties of nature to revenge; for in kingdoms, as in overgrown bodies, where some member or other was swollen by the body's weight, it was not proper to cut off such member, but to heal it by a gentle method of cure.

§ 5. Upon Archelaus' saying this, and much more to the same purpose, Herod's displeasure against Pheroras was mollified; but Archelaus persisted in his indignation against Alexander, and said he would have his daughter divorced, and take her away from him, till he induced Herod to plead in turn for the young man, and that Archelaus would let his daughter continue his wife. But Archelaus very plausibly told Herod he might marry her to any one he chose but Alexander, because he (Pheroras) attached the very greatest importance to keeping up the bonds of affinity with Herod. And when Herod rejoined that his son would take it as a great favour of him, if he would not dissolve the marriage, especially as they had had children, and as his wife was so loved by the young man, that while she remained his wife she would be a great safeguard against his offending, whereas, if she should be once torn away from him, she would cause his utter despair (for audacious enterprises were best quieted by being diverted by home affections), Archelaus complied with what Herod desired, but not without apparent reluctance, and was both himself reconciled to the young man, and reconciled his father to him also. However, he said he must, by all means, be sent to Rome to speak with the emperor, because he had already written him a full account of the whole matter.

§ 6. Such was the end of Archelaus' astuteness, by which he delivered his son-in-law from the danger he was in: and after these reconciliations were effected, they spent their time in feasting and mirth. And when Archelaus went away, Herod made him a present of seventy talents, and a golden throne set with precious stones, and some eunuchs, and a concubine who was called Pannychis. He also paid due honour to every one of his friends according to their merit. In like manner did all the king's kindred, at his command, make handsome presents to Archelaus. And he was conducted on his way by Herod and his nobility as far as Antioch.

CHAP. XXVI.

How Eurycles calumniated the Sons of Mariamne; and how the Testimony of Euaratus of Cos on their behalf was ineffectual.

§ 1.

NOW not long afterwards there came into Judæa a man that was much abler than Archelaus in stratagems, who not only upset the reconciliation that had been so ably managed by Archelaus for Alexander, but also proved the cause of Alexander's destruction. He was a Lacedæmonian, whose name was Eurycles, who, attracted by the desire of getting money, came to the kingdom in an evil hour, for Greece could no longer suffice for his luxury. He presented Herod with splendid gifts, as a bait to compass his ends, and soon received them back again multiplied, but he esteemed bare gifts as nothing, unless by his trafficking he imbrued the kingdom in blood. And he got round the king by flattery and by clever talking and by the lying encomiums which he passed upon him. For as he soon saw through Herod's character, he said and did every thing to please him, and so became one of his most intimate friends. And indeed the king and all that were about him had a great regard for this Spartan on account of his country.<sup>1</sup>

§ 2. Now as soon as this fellow perceived the rotten state of the family, and the dissensions of the brothers, and the disposition of the father towards each of them, he chose to reside in the house of Antipater, but pretended friendship for Alexander, and falsely claimed to be an old comrade of Archelaus. So he was quickly admitted into Alexander's intimacy as a tried friend. He also soon recommended himself to his brother Aristobulus. And when he had tested the characters of these several persons, he insinuated himself into their favour by different ways. But he was principally hired by Antipater, and betrayed Alexander, though he played a double game, reproaching Antipater because, when he was the eldest son, he overlooked the intrigues of those who stood in the way of his expectations, and reproaching Alexander because he who was son of a queen, and married to a king's daughter, permitted the son of a private woman to lay claim to the succession, and that when he had the very great support of Archelaus. Nor was his advice thought to be other than faithful by the young man, because of his pretended friendship with Archelaus. And so Alexander, without concealing any thing from him, lamented to him Antipater's behaviour with regard to himself, and said it was no wonder that Herod, after he had killed their mother, should deprive them of her kingdom. At this Eurycles pretended to pity and sympathize with them. He also, by a bait that he laid for him, got Aristobulus to say the same things. Thus did he inveigle both the brothers to make complaints against their father, and then went to Antipater, and carried these secrets to him. He also added a fiction of his own, as if the brothers had laid a plot against him, and were all but ready to come upon him with their drawn swords. For this intelligence he received a great sum of money, and on that account he praised Antipater to his father, and at last undertook to bring about the death of Alexander and Aristobulus, and to accuse them before their father. So he went to Herod, and told him that he would save his life as a requital for the favours he had received from him, and would preserve him from death by way of return for his kind entertainment. For he said a sword had long been whetted against him, and Alexander's right hand had long been stretched out against him; but that he (Eurycles) had thwarted Alexander's eagerness by pretending to co-operate with him in his design. He stated that Alexander said that Herod was not content with reigning himself in a kingdom that belonged to others, and with playing fast and loose with their mother's kingdom, after he had killed her; but besides all this he introduced a spurious successor, and proposed to give the kingdom of their ancestors to that pestilent fellow Antipater. He also stated that Alexander said that he would now appease the departed souls of Hyrcanus and Mariamne, by taking vengeance on Herod; for it was not fit for him to succeed such a father on the throne without bloodshed: and many things happened every day to provoke him to do so, for he could say nothing at all but it afforded a handle for calumny against him. For if any mention were made of nobility of birth even of others, he was insulted unjustly, for his father would say, that nobody of course was of noble birth but Alexander, and that he despised his father on account of his low extraction. If they were at any time hunting, and he said nothing, he gave offence; and if he commended any body, he was called dissembler; and he always found his father harsh, and without natural affection for any but Antipater; on which account, if his plot did not succeed he was very willing to die; but if he killed his father, he had sufficient opportunities for saving himself. In the first place, he had Archelaus his father-in-law, to whom he could easily flee; and in the next place he had the emperor, who was ignorant of Herod's character to that day. For he would not then appear before him with that dread he had before, when his father was there to terrify him, nor would he then produce only personal charges against Herod, but would first openly dwell on the calamities of the nation, and how they were taxed to death, and next in what ways of luxury and wicked practices that wealth was spent which was got by bloodshed, and state what sort of persons they were that got the national riches, and to whom their cities had been entrusted. He would then have inquiry made as to the deaths of his grandfather and mother, and would openly proclaim all the plague-spots of the kingdom; and on these various accounts he would not be deemed a parricide.

§ 3. When Eurycles had made this portentous speech against Alexander, he greatly commended Antipater, as the only son of his that had an affection for his father, and on that account was an impediment to the others' plot against him. Thereupon the king, who had with difficulty kept down his anger at the earlier part of Eurycles' speech, was exasperated to an incurable degree. And Antipater again seized another opportunity to suborn other accusers against his brothers, and to tell him that they had privately tampered with Jucundus and Tyrannus, who had formerly been the king's masters of the horse, but for some offences had been now dismissed from that office. Herod was in a very great rage at this information, and at once ordered those men to be tortured: but they did not confess anything of what the king had been informed. But a certain letter was produced, purporting to be written by Alexander to the governor of one of Herod's castles, begging him to receive him and his brother Aristobulus into the castle when he had killed his father, and to give them weapons and what other assistance he could. Alexander indeed said that this letter was a forgery of Diophantus, the king's secretary, who was a bold man, and clever in imitating any one's handwriting, and after he had counterfeited a great number, he was at last put to death for it. Herod also ordered the governor of the castle to be tortured, but got nothing out of him of what the accusation suggested.

§ 4. However, although Herod found the evidence weak, he gave orders to have his sons kept in custody, for till now they had been at liberty. He also called Eurycles, that pest of his house, and contriver of all these vile accusations, his saviour and benefactor, and gave him a reward of fifty talents. Upon this he prevented any accurate account getting abroad of what he had done, by going immediately into Cappadocia, and there he obtained money also from Archelaus, having the impudence to say that he had reconciled Herod to Alexander. He thence passed into Greece, and used what he had thus wickedly got to the like wicked purposes. So he was twice accused before Cæsar Augustus of having filled Achaia with sedition, and and having plundered its cities, and was sent into banishment. Thus was he punished at last for his wicked conduct to Aristobulus and Alexander.

§ 5. It is right to contrast the conduct of Euaratus of Cos with that of this Spartan. For as he was one of Alexander's most intimate friends, and came to him in his travels at the same time as Eurycles, the king asked him whether those things of which Alexander was accused were true? He assured him upon oath, that he had never heard any such things from the young men; but this testimony availed nothing for the clearing of the poor wretches; for Herod was most ready to hearken only to what was said against them, and every one was most agreeable to him, who would join him in believing their guilt, and in expressing their indignation.

CHAP. XXVII.

Herod, by Augustus' direction, accuses his Sons at Berytus. They are not produced before the Court, but yet are condemned; and in a little time they are sent to Sebaste, and strangled there.

§ 1.

MOREOVER, Salome increased Herod's savageness against his sons; for Aristobulus was desirous to bring her, who was his mother-in-law and aunt, into the same danger as himself; so he sent to her to advise her to see to her safety, and told her, that the king intended to put her to death, on account of the accusation that was laid against her, that formerly, when she was anxious to marry Syllæus the Arabian, she had secretly discovered to the king's secrets to him who was the king's enemy. Now this came as the last storm, and entirely overwhelmed the young men who were in great danger before. For Salome came running to the king, and informed him of the advice that had been given her, whereupon he could restrain himself no longer, but commanded both the young men to be imprisoned, and kept apart from one another. He also sent Volumnius, the general of the army, to Augustus speedily, and also his friend Olympus with him, who carried the informations in writing with them. Now, as soon as they had sailed to Rome, and delivered the king's letters, Augustus was mightily troubled at the case of the young men, but he did not think he ought to take the power from a father over his sons. So he wrote back to him, and gave him full authority, but said he would do well to have a judicial inquiry as to the plot against him, and to take for his assessors his own kindred and the governors of the province; and if his sons were found guilty, to put them to death; but if they appeared to have thought of no more than fleeing from him, to moderate their punishment in that case.

§ 2. With these directions Herod complied, and went to Berytus,<sup>1</sup> where Augustus had ordered, and got the court assembled. The governors of provinces sat first, as Augustus' letter had appointed, and Saturninus and Pedanius and their lieutenants, among whom was Volumnius also, the general of the army, and next to them sat the king's kinsmen and friends, and Salome also and Pheroras, next to whom sat the principal men of all Syria, except king Archelaus; for Herod had a suspicion of him, because he was Alexander's father-in-law. But he did not produce his sons in open court, and this was done very cunningly; for he knew well enough that, had they but appeared only, they would certainly have been pitied; and if they had also been suffered to speak, Alexander would easily have got them acquitted of what they were accused of. But they were in custody at Platane,<sup>1</sup> a village of the Sidonians.

§ 3. Now the king got up, and inveighed against his sons, as if they were present. As for the accusation indeed that they had plotted against him, he urged it but faintly, because he was destitute of proof, but he dwelt before the court on their abuse, and jests, and insults, and ten thousand offences against him, which were harder to bear than death itself. And as nobody contradicted him, he moved them to pity his case, as though he had been condemned himself, now he had gained a bitter victory against his sons. And he asked every one's sentence, and Saturninus first gave his, and said that he condemned the young men, but not to death; for it was not fit for him, who had three sons of his own now present, to give his vote for the death of the sons of another. The two lieutenants also gave the like vote, and some others also followed their example. But Volumnius first voted the more melancholy sentence, and all those that voted after him condemned the young men to death, some out of flattery, and some out of hatred to Herod, but none from indignation against the young men. And now all Syria and Judæa was in great expectation, and waited for the last act of this tragedy; however, nobody supposed that Herod would be so barbarous as to put his sons to death. But he dragged them off to Tyre,<sup>2</sup> and sailed thence to Cæsarea,<sup>3</sup> and deliberated with himself what sort of death the young men should suffer.

§ 4. Now there was a certain old soldier of the king, whose name was Tero, who had a son that was very intimate and friendly with Alexander, and also himself personally loved the young men. This Tero was distracted from excess of indignation, and at first he cried out aloud, as he went about, that justice was trampled under foot, that truth had perished, and nature was confounded, and that life was full of lawlessness, and said everything else that passion could suggest to a man who valued not his own life. And at last he ventured to go to the king, and said, "Truly, I think, you are a most unfortunate man, in hearkening to most wicked wretches against those that ought to be dearest to you, for you have frequently resolved that Pheroras and Salome should be put to death, and yet you believe them against your sons; while they, by cutting off your legitimate successors, leave all wholly to Antipater, choosing such a king as may be thoroughly under their influence. However, consider whether the death of Antipater's brothers will not make him hated by the soldiers. For there is nobody who does not pity the young men, and many of the officers show their indignation at it openly." Upon his saying this, he named those that showed this indignation; and the king ordered those men, and Tero himself, and his son, to be arrested immediately.

§ 5. Upon this a certain barber, whose name was Trypho, leaped up in a kind of madness, and informed of himself, and said to Herod, "This Tero endeavoured to persuade me also to cut your throat with my razor when I shaved you, and promised that Alexander would give me large presents for so doing." When Herod heard this, he examined Tero and his son and the barber by the torture; but as the others denied the accusation, and the barber said nothing further, Herod gave orders that Tero should be racked more severely. Thereupon Tero's son, out of pity to his father, promised to discover the whole to the king, if he would spare his father. And when Herod had agreed to this, he said that his father, at the instigation of Alexander, had intended to kill him. Now some said this was made up, to free his father from his torture, and some said it was true.

§ 6. And now Herod accused the officers and Tero in an assembly of the people, and brought the people together in a body against them; and accordingly they were there put to death as also the barber, being killed by pieces of wood and stones that were thrown at them. Herod also sent his sons to Sebaste,<sup>1</sup> which is not far from Cæsarea, and ordered them to be strangled there. And his orders being executed immediately, he commanded that their dead bodies should be brought to the fortress of Alexandrium,<sup>1</sup> to be buried with Alexander, their maternal grandfather. And this was the end of Alexander and Aristobulus.

CHAP. XXVIII.

How Antipater is hated by all Men; and how Herod wanted to betroth the sons of those that had been slain to his own kindred; but Antipater got him to change these proposed Marriages. Herod's various Wives and Children.

§ 1.

BUT unconquerable hatred rose up against Antipater from the nation, now that he had an indisputable title to the succession, because all knew that he was the person who had contrived all the calumnies against his brothers. Moreover, he began to be in no small fear, as he saw the posterity of those that had been slain growing up. For Alexander had two sons by Glaphyra, Tigranes and Alexander; and Aristobulus had three sons, Herod and Agrippa and Aristobulus, and two daughters, Herodias and Mariamne, by Salome's daughter Berenice. As for Glaphyra, Herod, as soon as he had killed Alexander, sent her back to Cappadocia with her dowry, but married Berenice, Aristobulus' widow, to the brother of Antipater's mother. Antipater had arranged this marriage in order to reconcile Salome to him, who had been at variance with him. He also got into Pheroras' favour, and into the favour of Augustus' friends, by presents and other ways of paying court, and sent no small sums of money to Rome. Saturninus also, and his friends in Syria, were all well replenished with the presents he made them. But the more he gave the more he was hated, as not making these presents out of generosity, but spending his money from fear. Thus the result was that the receivers bore him no more good-will than before, while those to whom he gave nothing were his more bitter enemies. However, he bestowed his money every day more and more profusely, on observing that, contrary to his hopes, the king took care of the orphans, and thus showed his repentance for killing their fathers, by his commiseration of their children.

§ 2. For Herod got together on one occasion his kindred and friends, and set before them these children, and with his eyes full of tears spoke as follows. "It was an unlucky fate that took away from me these children's fathers, and they are recommended to me by the natural pity which their orphan condition inspires. And I will endeavour, though I have been a most unfortunate father, to appear a milder grandfather, and to leave these children after my death such guardians as are dearest to me. I therefore betroth your daughter, Pheroras, to the elder of the sons of Alexander, that you may be a guardian by affinity. I also betroth your son, Antipater, to the daughter of Aristobulus; be therefore a father to that orphan; and my son Herod, whose maternal grandfather was high priest, shall have her sister. And let every one that loves me be of my mind in these arrangements, which none that have an affection for me will break. And I pray God that he will join these children together in marriage to the advantage of my kingdom and posterity, and look down with more gentle eyes upon them than he looked upon their fathers."

§ 3. While he yet spoke these words, he wept, and joined the children's right hands together; after which he embraced every one of them in an affectionate manner, and dismissed the assembly. Upon this Antipater's blood ran cold at once, and everybody noticed that he lamented what was done. For he supposed that the honours conferred on these orphans were derogatory to him even in his father's lifetime, and that he would hereafter run risk of losing the kingdom altogether, if Alexander's sons should have the support of the king Archelaus and the tetrarch Pheroras. He also reflected how he was himself hated by the nation, and how they pitied these orphans, and what great affection the Jews bore those brothers of his when they were alive, and how they cherished their memory now they had perished owing to him. So he resolved by all possible means to get these betrothals dissolved.

§ 4. Now he was afraid of going craftily about this matter with his father, who was difficult to deal with, and was at once moved upon the least suspicion: so he ventured to go to him and beg him straight out not to deprive him of the honour which he had been pleased to bestow upon him, and that he might not have the bare name of king, while the power was with other persons: for he would never be able to hold his own, if Alexander's son was to have Pheroras for his father-in-law in addition to the support of his grandfather Archelaus; and he besought him earnestly, since there were so many of the royal family alive, that he would change those proposed marriages. For the king had nine wives,<sup>1</sup> and children by seven of them; Antipater was himself the son of Doris, and Herod the son of Mariamne, the high priest's daughter; and Antipas and Archelaus were by the Samaritan Malthace, as also a daughter Olympias, whom his brother's Joseph's<sup>2</sup> son had married; by Cleopatra of Jerusalem he had had Herod and Philip, and Phasaelus by Pallas. He had also two daughters, Roxane and Salome, one by Phædra, and the other by Elpis. He had also two wives that had no children, the one his cousin, and the other his niece; and besides these he had two daughters, sisters of Alexander and Aristobulus, by Mariamne. Since, therefore, the royal family was so numerous, Antipater prayed him to change these proposed marriages.

§ 5. When the king perceived the disposition he exhibited to these orphans, he was very angry at it, and a suspicion came into his mind, as to those sons whom he had put to death, whether that too had not been brought about by the calumnies of Antipater. So at the time he made Antipater a long and angry answer, and bade him

<sup>1</sup> Dean Aldrich takes notice here, that these nine wives of Herod were alive at the same time, and that if the celebrated Mariamne, who was now dead, be reckoned, Herod's wives were in all ten. Yet it is remarkable that he had no more than fifteen children by them all.—W.

<sup>2</sup> To prevent confusion, it may not be amiss, with Dean Aldrich, to distinguish between four Josephs in the history of Herod. 1. Joseph, Herod's uncle, and the [second] husband of his sister Salome, slain by Herod, on account of Mariamne. 2. Joseph, Herod's quæstor, or treasurer, slain on the same account. 3. Joseph, Herod's brother, slain in battle against Antigonus. 4. Joseph, Herod's nephew, the husband of Olympias, mentioned in this place.—W.

begone. But he was afterwards prevailed upon by his flatteries, and changed the proposed marriages, betrothing him to Aristobulus' daughter, and his son to Pheroras' daughter.

§ 6. Now one may learn how very much Antipater could do by flattery, from Salome's inability in similar circumstances. For though she was Herod's sister, and had, through Julia, the emperor's wife, earnestly begged to be married to Syllæus the Arabian, Herod swore he would esteem her his bitterest enemy, unless she would give up the project; and also caused her at last against her will to be married to Alexas a friend of his, and had one of her daughters married to Alexas' son, and the other to Antipater's mother's brother. As for the daughters Herod had by Mariamne, one was married to Antipater his sister's son, and the other to his brother's son Phasaelus.

CHAP. XXIX.

Antipater becomes intolerable. He is sent to Rome, and carries Herod's Testament with him. Pheroras leaves his Brother, that he may keep his Wife, and dies in his own Tetrarchy.

§ 1.

NOW when Antipater had cut off the hopes of the orphans, and had contracted affinities for his own advantage, he had confidence in the certainty of his hopes, and as he had now assurance added to his wickedness, he became intolerable. For not being able to avoid the hatred of all people, he sought his security in the terror he inspired in them. Pheroras also assisted him in his designs, looking upon him already as sure to be king. There was also a company of women at the court, who excited new disturbances; for Pheroras' wife, and her mother and sister, and also Antipater's mother, showed great effrontery in the palace. Pheroras' wife even dared to insult the king's two daughters, on which account the king hated her especially; but although these women were hated by him, they domineered over the others. Salome only was antagonistic to their union, and informed the king of their meetings, as not being for the advantage of his affairs. And when those women knew the charges she had made against them, and how much Herod was displeased, they left off their public meetings and friendly entertainments of one another; and, on the contrary, pretended to quarrel with one another, when the king was within hearing. Antipater exhibited similar dissimulation, and openly opposed Pheroras; but still they had private cabals and merry meetings at night, nor did their being under espionage do any thing but increase their mutual agreement. However, Salome knew everything they did, and told it all to Herod.

§ 2. And he was inflamed with anger at them, and especially at Pheroras' wife; for Salome had principally accused her. So he assembled together his friends and kindred, and there accused this woman of many things, and particularly of her insolence to his daughters, and of supplying the Pharisees with money to his detriment, and of making his brother his enemy, by giving him love potions. At last he turned his speech to Pheroras, and told him, that he would give him his choice of these two things, whether he would keep in with his brother, or with his wife. And when Pheroras said that he would die rather than leave his wife, Herod not knowing what to do further in the matter, turned his speech to Antipater, and charged him to have no intercourse either with Pheroras' wife, or with Pheroras himself, or with any one belonging to her. Now, though Antipater did not transgress this injunction publicly, he secretly used to pass the night with them; and because he was afraid that Salome observed what he did, he got leave by means of his Italian friends to go and live at Rome. For when they wrote that it was proper for Antipater to be sent to Augustus after some time, Herod made no delay, but sent him with a splendid retinue, and a great deal of money, and gave him his testament to carry with him, wherein Antipater had the kingdom bequeathed to him, and Herod, the son of Mariamne the high priest's daughter, was named as Antipater's successor.

§ 3. Syllæus also, the Arabian, sailed to Rome, without any regard to Augustus' injunctions, in order to oppose Antipater with all his might, as to that law-suit which he had had with Nicolaus before. This Syllæus had also a great contest with Aretas his own king; for he had slain several of Aretas' friends, and particularly Sohemus, the most influential person in the city of Petra.<sup>1</sup> Moreover, he had tampered with Fabatus, who was Herod's steward, by giving him a great sum of money to assist him against Herod; but as Herod gave him more, he induced Fabatus to leave Syllæus, and by him demanded of Syllæus all that Augustus had required him to pay. But when Syllæus paid nothing of what he was to pay, and also accused Fabatus to Augustus, and said that he was not a steward for Augustus' advantage, but for Herod's, Fabatus was angry with him on that account, but was still held in very great esteem by Herod, and disclosed Syllæus' secrets, and told the king that Syllæus had corrupted by bribes Corinthus, one of his body-guards, so that he must be on his guard against him. And the king listened to him, for this Corinthus was brought up in Herod's kingdom, though he was by birth an Arabian; and the king ordered him to be arrested immediately, and not only him, but two other Arabians, whom he found with him, one of them Syllæus' friend, the other the head of a tribe. And they, being put to the torture, confessed that they had bribed Corinthus by the offer of a large sum of money to kill Herod. And when they had been further examined before Saturninus the administrator of Syria, they were sent to Rome.

§ 4. However, Herod did not leave off importuning Pheroras, but tried to force him to put away his wife; but he could not devise any way by which he could bring the woman herself to punishment, although he had many reasons for hating her, till at last he was so vexed with her, that he exiled both her and his brother out of his kingdom. Pheroras took this injury very patiently, and went away to his own tetrarchy, and swore that there should be but one end put to his exile, namely Herod's death, for he would never return while he was alive. Nor indeed would he return when his brother was sick, although Herod earnestly sent for him to come to him, because he had a mind to leave some injunctions with him before he died; but Herod unexpectedly recovered. And not long afterwards Pheroras himself fell sick, when Herod showed great forgiveness, for he went to him and took kind care of him, but he could not cure his complaint, for Pheroras died a few days afterwards. And although Herod had so great an affection for him to the last day of his life, yet a report spread abroad that he had killed him by poison. However, he took care to have his dead body carried to Jerusalem, and ordered the whole nation to mourn for him, and bestowed a most splendid funeral upon him. Such was the end that one of Alexander's and Aristobulus' murderers came to.

CHAP. XXX.

When Herod made Inquiry about Pheroras' Death, Discovery was made that Antipater had prepared a poisonous Draught for him. Herod casts out of the Palace Doris and her Accomplices, as also Mariamne, whose son Herod blots out of his Testament.

§ 1.

AND now vengeance came round to the real criminal Antipater, beginning from the death of Pheroras. For some of Pheroras' freedmen came with a sad countenance to the king, and told him that his brother had been destroyed by poison, for his wife had brought him something prepared in an unusual manner, and upon his eating it he at once fell ill. They said also that her mother and sister, two days before, had brought a woman out of Arabia that was skilful in mixing drugs, that she might prepare a love potion for Pheroras, and instead of a love potion, she had given him deadly poison at the instigation of Syllæus, who was acquainted with the woman.

§ 2. The king was confounded with many suspicions, and had the maid-servants tortured, and some of the free women also; one of whom cried out in her agony, "May the God that governs earth and heaven punish the author of all these miseries of ours, Antipater's mother!" The king caught at this confession, and proceeded to inquire further into the truth of the matter. And this woman disclosed the friendship of Antipater's mother to Pheroras and his wife,<sup>1</sup> as also their secret meetings, and that Pheroras and Antipater spent the whole night drinking with them when they returned from the king, and would not suffer any body, either man-servant or maid-servant, to be present. It was one of the free women who disclosed all this.

§ 3. Upon this Herod tortured the maid-servants every one separately, who all unanimously agreed in the foregoing disclosures, and that Antipater went to Rome and Pheroras to Peræa by mutual agreement: for they had often said to one another that now Herod had slain Alexander and Aristobulus, he would fall upon them and upon their wives, because, as he had not spared Mariamne and her sons, he would spare nobody; and for this reason it was best to flee as far from the wild beast as they were able. They said also that Antipater often lamented his own case to his mother, and used to say to her, that he was already growing grey, while his father seemed to become younger every day, and perhaps death would overtake him before he should begin to be a real king; and even if Herod ever should die (nobody knew when), his own enjoyment of the succession would certainly be but for a little time; for those Hydra heads, the sons of Alexander and Aristobulus, were growing up. He also said that he was deprived by his father of the hopes of being succeeded by his own sons, for the successor after his death was not to be any one of his own sons, but Herod the son of Mariamne; but in this point Herod plainly doted, to think that his testament would take effect, for he would take care that not one of his posterity should remain. And though Herod was of all fathers the greatest hater of his children, yet did he hate his brother still worse, for a little while back he gave him (Antipater) a hundred talents to have no dealings with Pheroras. And when Pheroras said, "Wherein have we done him any harm?" Antipater replied, "I wish he would deprive us of all we have, and leave us naked if only alive. But it is indeed impossible to escape this wild beast, who is so given to murder, who will not permit us to love any person openly. So we meet together privately, but it will be possible for us to meet openly too, if we have but the courage and the hands of men."

§ 4. These things were said by the women who were tortured, as also that Pheroras intended to flee with them to Peræa. Now Herod gave credit to all they said, on account of the mention of the hundred talents; for he had spoken about them only to Antipater. So he vented his anger first of all against Antipater's mother Doris, and took away from her all the ornaments which he had given her, which had cost a great many talents, and expelled her from the palace a second time. He also took care of Pheroras' women after their torture, being now reconciled to them. But he was in great alarm and excitement upon every suspicion, and had many innocent persons dragged to the torture, from fear that he should pass by one guilty person.

§ 5. And now he betook himself to examining Antipater of Samaria, who was the steward of [his son] Antipater, and upon torturing him, he learned that Antipater had sent for a potion of deadly poison for him from Egypt, by Antiphilus, a companion of his; and that Theudio, the uncle of Antipater, had it from him, and delivered it to Pheroras; for Antipater had charged him to take Herod off while he was at Rome, and so free him from the suspicion of doing it himself. He said also that Pheroras had committed this potion to his wife. Then did the king send for her, and bade her bring him at once what she had received. And she came out of her house as if she would bring it with her, but threw herself down from the top of the house, in order to prevent the king's examining her and putting her to the torture; however, it came to pass, as it seems by the providence of God, who intended to bring Antipater to punishment, that she fell not upon her head, but upon other parts of her body, and so was not killed. And the king, when she was brought to him, revived her, (for she was stupefied by her fall,) and asked her why she had thrown herself down, and gave her his oath, if she would tell the real truth, that he would excuse her from punishment; but if she concealed any thing, he would have her body racked to pieces by torture, and allow no part of it to be buried.

§ 6. Upon this the woman paused a little, and then said, "Why do I spare to speak of these secrets, now Pheroras is dead, only to save Antipater, who has undone us all? Hear then, O king, and be you, and God himself, who cannot be deceived, witnesses to the truth of what I am going to say. When you sat weeping by Pheroras as he was dying, he then called me to him, and said, 'My dear wife, I have been greatly mistaken as to the disposition of my brother towards me, having hated him that is so affectionate to me, and having conspired to kill him who is so troubled for me even before I am dead. As for myself, I receive the recompense of my impiety; but do you bring the poison that was left with us by Antipater for Herod, and destroy it immediately in my sight, that I may not be also liable to the avenger in Hades.' So I brought it as he bade me, and emptied most of it into the fire, but reserved a little of it for my own use against the uncertain future and in dread of you."

§ 7. When she had said this, she brought the box, which had a small quantity of this potion in it. Then the king transferred the torture from her to Antiphilus' mother and brother, who both confessed that Antiphilus had brought the box out of Egypt, and that they had received the potion from a brother of his who was a doctor at Alexandria. Then did the manes of Alexander and Aristobulus haunt all the palace, and became the inquisitors and discoverers of what would not otherwise have been found out, and dragged such as were freest from suspicion to examination. And it was discovered that Mariamne, the high priest's daughter, was privy to the plot, and her brothers, when they were tortured, declared it to be so. Thereupon the king avenged this audacity of the mother upon her son, and blotted Herod, his son by her, out of his testament, who had been before named therein as successor to Antipater.

CHAP. XXXI.

Antipater is convicted through Bathyllus, but returns from Rome without knowing this. Herod brings him to his Trial.

§ 1.

AFTER these Bathyllus came under examination, and proved the concluding link in the evidence of Antipater's designs. For he was his freedman, and came with another deadly potion, the poison of asps, and the juices of other serpents, that, if the first potion did not do its business, Pheroras and his wife might be armed with this also against the king. He brought also as an addition to Antipater's crimes against his father, some letters which he had written against his brothers, Archelaus and Philip, who were the king's sons, and educated at Rome, as yet lads but full of spirit. Antipater was anxious to get rid of these as soon as he could, that they might not stand in the way of his hopes, and to that end he forged letters against them in the name of his friends at Rome. Some of these he corrupted by bribes to write how much they abused their father, and openly bewailed Alexander and Aristobulus, and were uneasy at their own recall, for their father had already sent for them, which was the very thing that chiefly troubled Antipater.

§ 2. Indeed, while Antipater was still in Judæa, and before he went upon his journey to Rome, he gave money to have similar letters against them sent from Rome, and then went to his father, who as yet had no suspicion of him, and apologized for his brothers, and alleged on their behalf that some of the things contained in those letters were false, and others were only the errors of youth. But at the same time that he gave a great deal of his money to such as wrote these letters against his brothers, he tried to hide the proofs of his great expenses on account of these letters, by buying costly garments and variegated coverlets, and silver and gold cups, and several other treasures, that so, among the very great expenses laid out upon such furniture, he might conceal the money he had used in hiring men to write these letters. For he brought in his expenses as amounting to two hundred talents, his main pretext for which was the lawsuit he had had with Syllæus. Now though all his rogueries, even those of a lesser sort, were uncovered by his greater villainy, and all the examinations by torture proclaimed his attempt to murder his father, as the letters did his second attempt to murder brothers, yet none of those that went to Rome informed him of his misfortunes in Judæa, although seven months intervened between his conviction and return, so great was the hatred which all persons bore to him. And perhaps the manes of those brothers of his that had been done to death stopped the mouths of those that intended to have told him. At any rate he wrote from Rome, announcing the news that he would soon return, and that he was dismissed with honour by Augustus.

§ 3. Now the king, being desirous to get this plotter against him into his hands, and being also afraid lest he should some way come to the knowledge of how his affairs stood, and so be upon his guard, dissembled his anger in his letters to him, and in all respects wrote kindly to him, and desired him to make haste, because if he came quickly, he would lay aside the complaints he had against his mother. For Antipater was not ignorant that his mother had been expelled from the palace. He had also before received a letter at Tarentum,<sup>1</sup> which contained an account of the death of Pheroras, and he had made very great lamentations at it, for which some sang his praises considering he really grieved for his uncle; though probably it was confusion at his having thereby failed in his plot, and his tears were more for the loss of him that was to have been subservient therein than for Pheroras personally. Moreover, a sort of fear came upon him as to what he had done, lest the poison should have been discovered. However, when he was in Cilicia,<sup>2</sup> he received the forementioned letter from his father, and made great haste accordingly. But when he had sailed to Celenderis,<sup>3</sup> a suspicion came into his mind as to his mother's misfortunes, as if his soul foreboded some mischief to himself. Those therefore of his friends who were the most prudent advised him not to meet his father till he had learned clearly what were the reasons why his mother had been expelled from the palace, because they were afraid that some addition might have been made to the charges against his mother. But those that were less farsighted, and had more regard to their own desire of seeing their native country than to Antipater's safety, advised him to make haste home, and not by delaying his journey to afford his father grounds for evil suspicion, and give a handle to those that calumniated him; for if any thing had now been set a going against him, it was owing to his absence, for no one durst have broached any charge against him had he been present. They said also that it was absurd to deprive himself of certain advantages for the sake of uncertain suspicions, and not speedily to return to his father, and take the kingdom, which was in a state of oscillation on his account only. Antipater listened to this (for the deity urged him on), so he crossed over the sea, and landed at Sebastus,<sup>1</sup> the haven of Cæsarea.

§ 4. And here he found a perfect and unexpected solitude, for every body avoided him, and nobody durst come near him; for he was hated equally by all men, and now that hatred had liberty to show itself. The dread also that men were in of the king's anger made many men keep aloof from him; for the whole city was filled with rumours about Antipater, and Antipater himself was the only person who was ignorant of the state of his affairs. And as no man was ever sent out more magnificently when he sailed for Rome, so no man was ever received back with greater ignominy. And indeed he began already to suspect his danger at home, but he cunningly concealed his suspicions; and while he was inwardly ready to die for fear, he put on a forced boldness of countenance. Nor could he now flee any longer, nor had he any way of escape from the difficulties which surrounded him, nor indeed had he even on the spot any certain intelligence of the affairs of the royal family, because of the threats of the king against any who revealed to him the true state of affairs. The only ray of hope that comforted him was that perhaps nothing had been discovered, or, if any discovery had been made, that perhaps he would be able to clear himself by impudence and artful tricks, which were the only things he relied upon for his deliverance.

§ 5. With these hopes did he fortify himself, and went to the palace without any friends with him; for these were insulted and shut out at the first gate. Now Varus, the governor of Syria, happened to be in the palace; and Antipater went in to his father, and, putting on a bold face, came near as if to salute him. But Herod stretched out his hands, and turned his head away from him, and cried out, "Even this is the action of a parricide, to be desirous to embrace me, when he is under such heavy accusations! A murrain on thee, vile wretch! do not touch me, till thou hast cleared thyself of the crimes that are charged upon thee. I appoint thee a court where thou art to be judged, and Varus, who is very seasonably here, to be thy judge. Go, and get thy defence ready against tomorrow; for I give thee so much time to prepare suitable excuses for thy knavish tricks." At this reception Antipater was in such consternation that he was able to make no answer, but went away silent. And when his mother and wife came to him, and told him of all the evidence against him, he came to himself again, and considered what defence he should make.

CHAP. XXXII.

Antipater is accused before Varus, and is convicted of plotting against his Father by the strongest Evidence. Herod puts off his Punishment till his own recovery from illness, and, in the mean time, alters his Testament.

§ 1.

ON the following day the king assembled a court of his kinsmen and friends, and called in Antipater's friends also. Now Herod sat beside Varus, and ordered all the witnesses to be brought in; among whom some of the domestic servants of Antipater's mother were brought in also, who had but a little while before been arrested, as they were carrying the following letter from her to her son: "Since all those things have been already discovered by thy father, do not come near him, unless thou canst procure some assistance from Augustus." When these and the other witnesses had been brought in, Antipater came in, and falling on his face before his father's feet, he said, "Father, I beseech you not to condemn me unheard, but let your ears be unbiassed, and attend to my defence; for if you will give me leave, I will prove that I am innocent."

§ 2. Thereupon Herod cried out to him to hold his peace, and spoke as follows to Varus. "I cannot but think that thou, Varus, and every other upright judge, will determine that Antipater is a vile wretch. I am also afraid that thou wilt abhor my ill fortune, and judge me also deserving of every calamity, for begetting such sons. And yet I ought rather to be pitied, who have been so affectionate a father to such wretched sons. For when I had settled the succession to the kingdom on my former sons, even when they were young, and when, besides the charges of their education at Rome, I had made them the friends of the emperor, and objects of envy to other kings, I found them plotting against me, and they were put to death, mainly for the sake of Antipater. For as he was then young, and appointed to be my successor, I took care chiefly to secure him from danger. But this accursed wild beast, when he had been gorged with the patience which I showed him, turned his insolence against me. For I seemed to him to live too long, and he was very uneasy at the old age I had arrived at; nor would he be any longer a king but by parricide. And justly am I served by him for bringing him to court from the country, where he was held in no esteem, and for thrusting out those sons of mine that had a queen for their mother, and for making him a successor to my throne. I confess to thee, O Varus, the great folly I was guilty of. I provoked those sons of mine to act against me, having cut off their just expectations for the sake of Antipater. And indeed what kindness did I do to them, that could equal what I have done to Antipater? to whom I have almost yielded up my royal authority during my lifetime, and whom I have openly named for the successor to my dominions in my testament, and given him a yearly revenue of his own of fifty talents, and supplied him with very large sums of money out of my own revenue; and when he sailed to Rome recently, I gave him three hundred talents, and recommended him, and him alone of all my children, to the emperor, as his father's deliverer. Now what crimes were those other sons of mine guilty of like these of Antipater? or what evidence was there brought against them so strong as there is to prove that this son plotted against me? Yet does this parricide presume to speak for himself, and hopes to hide the truth again by his cunning tricks. Thou, O Varus, must guard thyself against him; for I know the wild beast, and I foresee how plausibly he will talk and counterfeit lamentation. He it was who exhorted me to have a care of Alexander when he was alive, and not to intrust my body to everybody! He it was who came to my very bed, and looked about lest any one should lay snares for me! He it was who took care of my sleep, and secured me from anxiety, who comforted me in the trouble I was in at the death of my sons, and tested the affection of his surviving brothers! He was my protector, and the guardian of my body! And when I call to mind, Varus, his craftiness upon every occasion, and his dissembling, I can hardly believe that I am still alive, and wonder how I have escaped from such a deep plotter. But since some god or other makes my house desolate, and perpetually raises up those that are dearest to me against me, I will with tears lament my hard fate, and privately groan under my lonely condition; but no one who thirsts after my blood shall escape punishment, although the evidence should extend to all my sons."

§ 3. As Herod was saying this, he was interrupted by the distress of mind he was in; so he ordered Nicolaus, one of his friends, to produce the evidence. But meantime Antipater lifted up his head, (for he lay on the ground where he had thrown himself before his father's feet,) and cried out aloud, "Thou, O father, hast made my defence for me; for how can I be a parricide, whom thou thyself confessest to have always had for thy guardian? Thou callest my filial affection prodigious hypocrisy. How then could it be that I, who was so subtle in other matters, should here be so mad as not to understand that it was not easy that he who contrived so horrid a crime should be concealed from men, and impossible that he should be concealed from the judge of heaven, who sees all things, and is present every where? Did I not know what end my brothers came to, on whom God inflicted so great a punishment for their evil designs against thee? And, indeed, what was there that could possibly provoke me against thee? Could the hope of being a king do it? I was a king already. Could I suspect hatred from thee? Was I not beloved by thee? And what other fear of thee could I have? Moreover, by preserving thee safe, I was a terror to others. Did I want money? Who was able to expend so much as myself? Indeed, father, had I been the most abominable of all mankind, and had I had the soul of some savage wild beast, must I not have been overcome by thy benefits, seeing that, as thou thyself sayest, thou broughtest me back from exile, and didst prefer me to so many of thy sons, and madest me a king in thine own lifetime, and by the other vast advantages thou bestowedst on me, madest me an object of envy? O wretched man that I am for my bitter absence, which afforded such a great opportunity for envy, and long interval for such as were plotting against me! But I was absent, father, for thee and on thy affairs, that Syllæus might not treat thee with contempt in thine old age. Rome is a witness to my filial affection, and so is Augustus the ruler of the world, who often called me a lover of my father.<sup>1</sup> Take the letters he has sent thee, father, they are more to be believed than the calumnies raised here; these letters are my only defence, these I use as proofs of the natural affection I have to thee. Remember that it was against my own choice that I sailed [to Rome,] knowing the latent hatred that was in the kingdom against me. It was thou, O father, however unwillingly, who hast been my ruin, by forcing me to allow time for envy to sow calumnies against me. However, I am here, and am ready to hear the evidence there is against me. If I am a parricide, I have travelled over land and sea, without suffering any misfortune on either of them: but this argument is no advantage to me. For it seems, father, that I am already condemned, both before God and before thee; and as I am already condemned, I beg that thou wilt not believe the others that have been tortured, but let fire be brought to torment me; let the racks go through my bowels. Have no regard to any lamentations that this accursed body can make; for if I am a parricide, I ought not to die without torture." Such words did Antipater cry out with lamentation and weeping, and moved Varus and all the rest to pity. Herod was the only person whose rage was too strong to permit him to weep, knowing that the evidence against Antipater was true.

§ 4. And now it was, that at the king's command, Nicolaus, when he had premised a great deal about the craftiness of Antipater, and had so toned down their pity to him, afterwards brought a bitter accusation against him, ascribing all the wickedness that had been in the kingdom to him, especially the murder of his brothers, demonstrating that they had perished because of the calumnies he had raised against them. He also said that he had intrigued against those that were still alive, as if they were aiming at the succession: for how could it be supposed that he who prepared poison for his father, would abstain from his brothers? He then proceeded to bring home to him the attempt to poison Herod, and gave an account in order of the several discoveries that had been made, and was very wroth as to the affair of Pheroras, because Antipater had tried to make him murder his brother, and had corrupted those that were dearest to the king, and had filled the whole palace with guilt. And when he had said many other things and proved them he left off.

§ 5. Then Varus bade Antipater make his defence, but he lay on the ground silent, and said no more but this, "God is my witness that I am entirely innocent." So Varus asked for the potion, and gave it to a condemned malefactor, who was then in prison, to drink. And he having died upon the spot, Varus, after a private conversation with Herod, when he had written an account of this trial to Augustus, went away the day after. And the king put Antipater in bonds, and sent people to inform Augustus of the case.

§ 6. After this it was discovered that Antipater had laid a plot against Salome also; for one of Antiphilus' domestics came, and brought letters from Rome from a maid-servant of Julia, whose name was Acme. By her it was written to the king, that she had found a letter written by Salome among Julia's papers, and had sent it him privately out of good-will to him. This letter of Salome's contained most bitter reproaches against the king, and the greatest accusations against him. Antipater had forged this letter, and had corrupted Acme, and persuaded her to send it to Herod. This was proved by her letter to Antipater, for thus did this woman write to him: "As thou desiredst, I have written a letter to thy father, and have sent that letter, and am persuaded that the king will not spare his sister when he reads it. Thou wilt do well to remember what thou hast promised, when all is accomplished."

§ 7. When this letter was discovered, and the forged letter against Salome, a suspicion came into the king's mind, that perhaps the letters against Alexander had also been forged. He was moreover greatly disturbed and enraged, because he had almost slain his sister owing to Antipater. He did not intend therefore any longer to delay to bring him to punishment for all his crimes; but as he was going to proceed against Antipater, he was restrained by a severe illness. However, he sent an account about Acme, and the conspiracy against Salome, to Augustus; he sent also for his own testament, and altered it, and therein made Antipas king, passing over his eldest sons, Archelaus and Philip, because Antipater had blasted their reputations with him; and he bequeathed to Augustus, besides other presents that he gave him, a thousand talents, and to his wife and children, and friends, and freedmen, about five hundred talents; he also bequeathed to all others a great quantity of land and money, and showed his respect to Salome his sister by giving her most splendid gifts. Such were the changes which he made in his testament.

CHAP. XXXIII.

The Golden Eagle is cut to pieces. Herod's barbarity when on the point of death. He attempts to kill himself. He commands Antipater to be slain. He survives him Five Days, and then dies.

§ 1.

NOW Herod's illness became more and more severe, because various ailments fell upon him in his old age and dejected condition; for he was already almost seventy years of age, and was depressed at the calamities that had happened to him about his children, so that he had no pleasure in life, even when he was in health. The grief also that Antipater was still alive aggravated his disease, and he resolved to have him put to death not now at random, but publicly executed as soon as he himself should be well again.

§ 2. There also now happened to him, among his other troubles, a certain rising of the people. There were two men of learning in the city of Jerusalem, who were thought most skilful in the laws of their country, and were on that account held in very great esteem by all the nation: one was Judas, the son of Sepphoræus, and the other was Matthias the son of Margalus. There was a great course of the young men to these men, as they expounded the laws, and there got together every day a kind of army of such as were growing up to be men. Now when these men were informed that the king was now wasting away with melancholy and disease, they dropped words to their friends that it was now a very proper time to defend the cause of God, and to pull down what had been erected contrary to the laws of their country. For it was unlawful that there should be any such thing in the temple as images, or busts, or the representation of any living thing whatever. Now the king had put a golden eagle over the great gate of the temple, which these learned men exhorted them to cut down, and told them, if any danger should arise, that it was a glorious thing to die for the laws of their country; for immortality of soul and eternal enjoyment of happiness would await those that died so ; while the mean-spirited, and those that were not wise enough to show a right love of their souls, preferred death by disease to death as the result of virtue.

§ 3. At the same time that these men made this speech to their disciples, the rumour spread abroad that the king was dying, which made the young men set about the work with greater boldness. They therefore let themselves down from the top of the temple with thick cords at midday, when a great number of people were in the temple, and cut down the golden eagle with axes. This was announced at once to the king's captain, who came running up with a great body of soldiers, and arrested about forty of the young men, and brought them to the king. And when he asked them first if they had been so bold as to cut down the golden eagle, they confessed that they had done so : and when he asked them next by whose command they had done so, they replied, at the command of the law of their country. And when he asked them further how they could be so jubilant when they were to be put to death, they replied, because they would enjoy greater happiness after they were dead.

§ 4. At this the king was in such a rage that he overcame his disease [for the time,] and went out and spoke to the people, and made a terrible accusation against those men, as being guilty of sacrilege, and as having greater ideas in view under pretext of their law, and he thought they deserved to be punished as impious persons. Thereupon the people were afraid lest a great number should be found guilty, and begged that when he had first punished those that had suggested this work, and then those that were caught at it, he would leave off his anger as to the rest. With this the king complied, though not readily, and ordered those that had let themselves down from the temple with cords, as also the learned men, to be burnt alive, but delivered the rest that had been arrested to the proper officers to put to death.

§ 5. After this the disease seized upon Herod's whole body, and racked all his members with various complications. For there was a great fever upon him, and an intolerable itching over all the surface of his body, and continual pains in his colon, and dropsical swellings in his feet, and an inflammation in his abdomen, and a putrefaction that produced worms in his privy member. He had also a difficulty in breathing, and could not breathe but when he sat upright, and was convulsed in all his members, insomuch that the diviners said these various complications were a punishment upon him for what he had done to the learned men. But he struggled against his numerous complaints, and still had a desire to live and hope of recovery, and thought of several methods of cure. Accordingly, he crossed the Jordan, and used those hot baths at Callirrhoe,<sup>1</sup> which run into the lake Asphaltitis,<sup>2</sup> but are sweet and drinkable. And here the physicians thought proper to bathe his whole body in warm oil, by letting it down into a large vessel full of oil, whereupon his eyes failed him, and he rolled them as if he were dying. And as a cry was then made by his servants, he revived again at their voice, but afterwards despaired of recovery, and gave orders that each soldier should have fifty drachmæ apiece, and that his commanders and friends should have great sums of money given them.

§ 6. He then returned to Jericho,<sup>3</sup> and arrived there very dejected, and almost threatened death itself, for he proceeded to attempt horrid wickedness. For he got together the most illustrious men out of every village in all Judæa into a place called the Hippodrome, and there shut them in. He then called for his sister Salome, and her husband Alexas, and made the following speech to them: "I know well enough that the Jews will make a festival of my death; but I may be mourned for on other accounts, and have a splendid funeral, if you will but carry out my commands. Do you but take care to send soldiers to surround those men that are now in custody, and to slay them immediately upon my death, and then all Judæa and every family in it will weep unwilling tears at my death."

§ 7. These were the commands he gave them, when there came letters from his ambassadors at Rome, wherein information was given that Acme had been put to death at Augustus' command, and that Antipater was condemned to death; however, they wrote also that if Herod had a mind rather to banish him, Augustus permitted him to do so. And Herod for a little while revived, and had a desire to live; but afterwards he was overcome by his pains, and distracted by want of food and by a convulsive cough, and endeavoured to anticipate death; so he took an apple and asked for a knife, for he used to pare his apples before eating them; he then looked round to see that there was nobody to hinder him, and lifted up his right hand as if he would stab himself. But Achiabus, his cousin, ran up to him, and held his hand, and hindered him from doing so. Immediately a very great lamentation was raised in the palace, as if the king had expired; and as soon as ever Antipater heard that, he took courage, and with joy in his looks besought his keepers, for a sum of money, to loose him and let him go. But the principal keeper of the prison did not only prevent that, but ran and told the king what his design was. Thereupon the king cried out louder than his disease would well bear, and immediately sent some of his body-guards and had Antipater slain. He also gave orders to have him buried at Hyrcanium,<sup>1</sup> and altered his testament again, and therein made Archelaus (his eldest son, and the brother of Antipas,) his successor, and made Antipas tetrarch.

§ 8. Herod survived the death of Antipater only five days, having reigned thirty-four years since he had caused Antigonus to be slain, and obtained his kingdom, but it was thirty-seven years since he had been made king by the Romans. As for his fortune, it was prosperous in all other respects, if ever any man's was, seeing that from a private man he obtained a kingdom, and kept it so long, and left it to his own sons; but in his domestic affairs he was a most unfortunate man. Now before the soldiers knew of Herod's death, Salome and her husband came out and set free those that were in bonds, whom the king had commanded to be slain, and said that he had altered his mind, and would have every one of them sent to their own homes. When they were gone, Salome then told the soldiers of the king's death, and assembled them and the rest of the multitude in the amphitheatre in Jericho, where Ptolemy, who was intrusted by the king with his signet-ring, came before them, and passed a eulogy on the late king, and comforted the multitude, and read the letter which had been left for the soldiers, wherein Herod earnestly exhorted them to bear good-will to his successor. And after he had read this letter, he opened and read Herod's testament, by which Philip was to inherit Trachonitis and the neighbouring countries, and Antipas was to be tetrarch, as I said before, and Archelaus was made king. Archelaus was also commanded to carry Herod's ring to Augustus, and the settlements made about the kingdom sealed up, for Augustus was to be lord of all the settlements Herod had made, and was to confirm his testament. As to all other matters, Herod ordered that they were to be as in his former testaments.

§ 9. At once acclamation was made congratulating Archelaus, and the soldiers went round in bands with the multitude, and promised him their good-will, and also prayed God to bless him. After this they betook themselves to the king's funeral; and Archelaus spared no expense, but brought out all the royal ornaments to add to the pomp of the funeral. The bier was of solid gold, set with precious stones, and on it was a purple bed richly embroidered, and upon it lay the corpse covered with a purple pall, and a diadem was put upon the head, and a crown of gold above it, and a sceptre in the right hand. And round the bier were Herod's sons, and a multitude of his kindred; next to whom came his body-guards, and the regiment of Thracians, also the Germans and Galati, all accoutred as if they were marching to war. And the rest of the army went in advance, armed, and following their captains and officers in order; and after them five hundred of Herod's domestics and freedmen followed bearing sweet spices. And the body was carried two hundred furlongs to Herodium,<sup>1</sup> where Herod had given orders to be buried. Such was the end of the life of Herod.

BOOK II.

CONTAINING THE INTERVAL OF SIXTY-NINE YEARS.—FROM THE DEATH OF HEROD TILL VESPASIAN IS SENT BY NERO TO SUBDUE THE JEWS.

CHAP. I.

Archelaus makes a funeral Feast for the People on account of Herod. After this a great Tumult is raised by the Multitude, and Archelaus sends the Soldiers out upon them, who destroy about three Thousand of them.

§ 1.

NOW the necessity which Archelaus was in of journeying to Rome was the occasion of new disturbances. For when he had mourned for his father seven days, and had given a very expensive funeral feast to the multitude, (which custom causes poverty to many of the Jews, because they are forced to feast the multitude, for if any one omits it, he is not esteemed a holy person,) he put on a white garment, and went up to the temple, where the people received him with various acclamations. He also spoke kindly to the multitude from an elevated seat and throne of gold, and returned them thanks for the zeal they had shown at his father's funeral, and the court they had paid to himself, as if he were already sure to be king. However, he told them, he would not at present take upon him either the authority or title of king, until Augustus, who was constituted lord of the whole affair by Herod's testament, confirmed his succession; for when the soldiers would have set the diadem on his head at Jericho, he would not accept of it. He said, however, that he would make abundant return, not only to the soldiers, but also to the people, for their zeal and good-will to him, when those in power should give him a complete title to the kingdom; for it should be his aim to show himself in all points better than his father.

§ 2. Upon this the multitude were pleased, and at once made trial of his intentions by great requests. For some made a clamour that he would ease them in their taxes, others that he would take off the duties upon commodities, and some that he would set free those that were in prison. In all these cases he assented readily, to get the good-will of the multitude; after which he offered sacrifice, and feasted with his friends. Thereupon a great many of those that desired innovation gathered together in crowds towards the evening, and began to mourn on their own account, when the public mourning for the king was over, and lamented those that had been put to death by Herod, because they had cut down the golden eagle that had been over the gate of the temple. Nor was this mourning of a subdued nature, but the lamentations were piercing, the mourning prearranged, and the weeping such as was loudly heard all over the city, as for men who they said had perished for the laws of their country, and for the temple. They also cried out that punishment ought to be inflicted in their behalf upon those that had been honoured by Herod; and that first the man whom Herod had made high priest ought to be deposed, for it was right to choose a person of greater piety and purity for that office.

§ 3. At these clamours Archelaus was provoked, but restrained himself from taking vengeance, because of the urgent necessity of going to Rome, fearing, if he excited the hostility of the people, that he might be detained at home by an émeute. Accordingly, he tried to quiet the innovators by persuasion rather than force, and sent his general privately to them, and exhorted them to be quiet. But the riotous threw stones at him, and drove him away, as he entered the temple, before he could say any thing to them; and those who came to them after him to try and bring them to reason (for many were sent by Archelaus) they answered on all occasions in a passionate manner, and it plainly appeared that they would not be quiet, if their numbers became considerable. And indeed at the feast of Unleavened Bread, which was now at hand (and is by the Jews called the Passover, and is celebrated with a great number of sacrifices), an innumerable number of the people came out of the country to worship: and some of them stood in the temple bewailing the learned men [that had been put to death by Herod,] seeking to fan the sedition. At this Archelaus was afraid, and secretly sent a tribune and cohort of soldiers against them, before the disaffection should spread among the whole multitude, and gave orders that they should constrain by force those that began the tumult to be quiet. At their arrival the whole multitude were irritated, and threw stones at the soldiers and killed most of them, and the tribune fled away wounded, and had much ado to escape. After this they betook themselves to their sacrifices, as if nothing of importance had happened. However, it did not appear to Archelaus that the multitude could now be restrained without bloodshed; so he sent his whole army against them, the foot en masse through the city, and the horse by way of the plain; and they, falling upon them on the sudden, as they were offering their sacrifices, slew about three thousand of them, and dispersed the rest of the multitude upon the adjoining mountains. And Archelaus' heralds followed and commanded every one to retire to their own homes, so they all went off and left the feast.

CHAP. II.

Archelaus goes to Rome with a great Number of his Kindred. He is there accused before Augustus by Antipater; but gets the better of his Accusers, owing to the defence which Nicolaus made for him.

§ 1.

ARCHELAUS went down to the sea-side with his mother and friends Poplas and Ptolemy and Nicolaus, and left Philip behind him, to manage the palace and see to his domestic affairs. Salome also went with him, as did also her sons and the king's brothers and connections by marriage, ostensibly to give him all the assistance they were able to secure his succession, but in reality to accuse him for his breach of the laws in what he had done at the temple.

§ 2. And when they were come to Cæsarea,<sup>1</sup> Sabinus, the governor of Syria, met them, who was going up to Judæa to secure Herod's effects. But Varus, who had arrived there, having been sent for by Archelaus through Ptolemy, restrained him from going any further. At this time indeed, to gratify Varus, Sabinus neither hastened to the citadels, nor did he shut up from Archelaus the treasuries where his father's money was laid up, but promised that he would do nothing till Augustus should have decided about affairs. So he abode at Cæsarea. But as soon as those that could hinder him were gone, when Varus had gone to Antioch,<sup>2</sup> and Archelaus had sailed to Rome, he quickly went up to Jerusalem, and occupied the palace. And when he had sent for the governors of the citadels, and the controllers of the king's household, he tried to sift out the money accounts, and take possession of the citadels. But the governors of those citadels did not neglect the commands laid upon them by Archelaus, and continued to guard them, saying that the guard of them belonged rather to Augustus than to Archelaus.

§ 3. Meantime Antipas also went to Rome to lay claim to the kingdom, and to insist that the former testament, wherein he was named king, was more valid than the latter testament. Salome had also promised to assist him, as had many of his kindred who sailed with Archelaus. He also took with him his mother, and Ptolemy the brother of Nicolaus, who seemed one of great weight, on account of the trust Herod placed in him, he having been one of his most honoured friends. However, Antipas depended chiefly upon Irenæus the orator, owing to his eloquence, upon whose advice he had rejected such as had advised him to yield to Archelaus, because he was his elder brother, and because the second testament gave the kingdom to him.

The favour also of Archelaus' kindred, who hated him, was shifted to Antipas, when they came to Rome. For though every one much preferred living under their own laws under a Roman governor; yet if they should fail in that point, they wished that Antipas might be king.

§ 4. Sabinus also afforded them his assistance for this purpose by the letters he sent, wherein he accused Archelaus to Augustus, and highly commended Antipas. Salome and her party also drew up their charges against Archelaus, and put them into Augustus' hands; and after they had done that, Archelaus wrote down the main points of his claim, and sent in by Ptolemy his father's ring and accounts. And when Augustus had first weighed by himself the claims of both, as also the size of the kingdom, and large amount of the revenues, and also the numerous offspring Herod had left behind him, and had also read the letters he had received from Varus and Sabinus on the matter, he assembled a council of the principal Romans (in which Caius, the son of Agrippa and his own daughter Julia, whom he had adopted as his own son, sat in the first seat), and gave the pleaders leave to speak.

§ 5. Then stood up Salome's son Antipater, (who of all Archelaus' antagonists was the cleverest speaker,) and accused him as follows. He said that Archelaus did in words lay claim to the kingdom, but had in deed long exercised royal authority, and so did but insult Augustus in desiring to be now heard on that account; since he had not waited for his determination about the succession, but suborned certain persons after Herod's death to move for putting the diadem upon his head, and had sat on the throne and acted as a king, and altered the arrangements of the army, and granted to some higher dignities, and had also complied in all things with the people in the requests they had made to him as to their king, and had also set free those that had been put in bonds by his father for most important reasons, and now, after all this, he came to ask of his lord the shadow of that royal authority, whose substance he had already seized for himself, and so made Augustus lord, not of things, but of words. He also reproached him further, that his mourning for his father was only pretended, as he put on a sad countenance in the day-time, but drank to great excess by night, which behaviour, he said, caused the late disturbance among the multitude, for they were indignant thereat. And indeed the purport of his whole discourse was to aggravate Archelaus' crime in slaying such a multitude about the temple, for they came to the feast, but were barbarously slain in the midst of their own sacrifices; and he said there was such a vast number of dead bodies heaped together in the temple, as even a foreign and implacable war could not have heaped together. And he added, that it was the foreknowledge his father Herod had of his barbarity, which made him never give him any hopes of the kingdom, except when his mind was more infirm than his body, and he was not able to reason soundly, and did not remember whom he nominated in his second testament as his successor; and this was done by him at a time when he had no complaints to make of him whom he had nominated before, when he was sound in body, and when his mind was free from all disorder. If, however, any one should suppose Herod's judgment, when he was ill, was superior to his judgment at another time, yet had Archelaus forfeited the kingdom by his behaviour, and by actions contrary to the law, and to the disadvantage of the realm. For what sort of a king would he be, if he obtained the kingdom from Augustus, who had slain so many before he had obtained it?

§ 6. When Antipater had spoken much to this purpose, and had produced a great number of his kindred as witnesses to prove every part of the accusation, he ended his discourse. Then Nicolaus stood up to plead for Archelaus. He argued that the slaughter in the temple could not be avoided; for those that were slain were enemies not only to the kingdom but also to Augustus, who was to determine about him. He also showed that Archelaus' accusers had advised him to perpetrate other things of which he was accused. Moreover he insisted that the latter testament should chiefly be esteemed valid, because Herod had therein appointed Augustus as the person who should confirm the succession. For he who showed such sense as to yield up his own power to the lord of the world, could not be supposed mistaken in his judgment about him that was to be his heir; and he that so well knew whom to choose for arbitrator of the succession, could not be unacquainted with the character of him whom he chose for his successor.

§ 7. When Nicolaus had gone through all he had to say, Archelaus came up gently and fell down at Augustus' knees. Upon which he raised him up in a very kind manner, and declared that he was worthy to succeed his father. However, he made no determination in the case; but when he had dismissed those assessors that had been with him that day, he deliberated by himself as to what he had heard, whether it were fit to appoint any of those named in the various testaments as Herod's successor, or whether Herod's dominions should be parted among all his posterity, for a number of persons seemed to stand in need of support.

CHAP. III.

The Jews fight a great Battle with Sabinus' Soldiers, and a great Destruction is made at Jerusalem.

§ 1.

NOW before Augustus had come to any determination about these affairs, Archelaus' mother Malthace fell sick and died. Letters also were brought out of Syria from Varus about a revolt of the Jews. This was foreseen by Varus, who accordingly, after Archelaus had sailed, went up to Jerusalem to restrain its promoters, since it was manifest that the nation would not be at rest; and he left at Jerusalem one of the three legions which he had brought with him out of Syria, and himself returned to Antioch. But Sabinus went there after he was gone, and gave them a pretext for making innovations; for he compelled the keepers of the citadels to deliver them up to him, and made a strict search for the king's money, for depending not only on the soldiers who were left by Varus, but on the multitude of his own slaves, all of whom he armed, and used as the instruments of his covetousness. Now when that feast, which was observed after seven weeks, was at hand, which the Jews call Pentecost, its name being taken from the number of days after the Passover, the people assembled together, not on account of their accustomed worship, but from their indignation. For an immense multitude came together from Galilee and Idumæa<sup>1</sup> and Jericho,<sup>2</sup> and from Peræa<sup>3</sup> beyond the Jordan. But the people that naturally belonged to Judæa itself exceeded the rest both in numbers and zeal. And they divided themselves into three parts, and pitched their camps in three places, one at the north side of the temple, another at the south side by the Hippodrome,<sup>4</sup> and the third at the palace<sup>5</sup> on the west. And they lay round about the Romans on every side, and besieged them.

§ 2. Now Sabinus was afraid both of their numbers and courage, and sent frequent messengers to Varus, and besought him to come to his succour quickly, for if he delayed, his legion would be cut to pieces; and he himself got up to the highest tower of the fortress, which was called Phasaelus,<sup>6</sup> and was so called after Herod's brother who was killed by the Parthians, and from thence he made signs to the soldiers of the legion to attack the enemy; for his alarm was so great that he durst not go down to his own men. And the soldiers obeyed and rushed forward into the temple, and fought a terrible battle with the Jews; in which, while there were none above them to gall them, they had the best of it from their skill, and the others' want of skill, in war; but when once many of the Jews had got up to the top of the porticoes, and threw their darts downwards upon the heads of the Romans, a great many of them were slain. Nor was it easy to avenge themselves upon those that threw their weapons from above, nor to stand the attack of those who fought them hand to hand.

§ 3. As, therefore, the Romans were sorely galled by both these, they set fire to the porticoes, which were works to be admired both for their size and costliness. Thereupon those that were on them were suddenly wrapped in flames, and many of them perished therein; many of them also were cut to pieces by the enemy, as they leapt upon them; some of them also threw themselves down from the walls behind, and some in the desperate condition they were in anticipated the fire by killing themselves with their own swords. And as many of them as crept down from the walls, and rushed upon the Romans, were easily mastered by them, because of the panic they were in, until at last, some of the Jews being slain, and others dispersed from the terror they were in, the soldiers fell upon the treasure of God which was now deserted, and plundered about four hundred talents, of which Sabinus got all that was not stolen by the soldiers.

§ 4. Now this destruction of their porticoes and men made a much greater number of Jews, and those of the more warlike sort, to oppose the Romans; and they surrounded the palace, and threatened to destroy all that were in it, unless they went away quickly; for they promised that Sabinus should come to no harm, if he would depart with his legion. Most also of the king's party deserted the Romans, and assisted the Jews. However, the most warlike body of them all, who were three thousand men of Sebaste,<sup>1</sup> went over to the Romans. Rufus also, and Gratus, their captains, did the same, (Gratus having the foot of the king's party under him, and Rufus the horse,) each of whom, even without the forces under them, were of great weight, on account of their courage and wisdom, to turn the scales in war. Now the Jews persevered in the siege, and tried to break down the walls of the fortress, and cried out to Sabinus and his party to depart, and not to prove a hindrance to them, now they hoped, after a long time, to recover the autonomy that their forefathers had enjoyed. Sabinus indeed would have been well contented to get out of the danger he was in, but he distrusted the assurances the Jews gave him, and suspected such gentle treatment was but a bait laid as a snare for him; this consideration, together with the hopes he had of succour from Varus, made him bear the siege still longer.

CHAP. IV.

Herod's Veterans mutiny. The Robberies of Judas. Simon and Athrongæus take the name of King upon them.

§ 1.

AT this time there were great disturbances throughout the country in many places, and the opportunity that now offered itself induced many to set up for kings. In Idumæa indeed two thousand of Herod's veterans banded together, and armed themselves, and fought against those of the king's party; against whom the king's cousin Achia-bus fought, making the places that were most strongly fortified the base of his operations, and avoiding battle with the enemy in the plains. In Sepphoris<sup>1</sup> also, a city of Galilee, one Judas (the son of the arch-robber Ezekias, who formerly overran the country, and had been subdued by king Herod) got no small multitude together, and broke into the royal armouries, and armed those about him, and attacked those that desired to get power.

§ 2. In Peræa also Simon, one of the king's slaves, relying upon his handsome appearance and tall stature, put a diadem upon his head, and went about with a band of robbers that he had got together, and burnt down the royal palace that was at Jericho, and many other costly edifices besides, and procured himself spoil very easily by snatching it out of the fire. And he would soon have burnt down every handsome building, if Gratus, the captain of the king's foot, had not taken the Trachonite archers, and the most warlike of Sebaste, and met him in battle, when great numbers of his foot were slain. Gratus also intercepted Simon himself, as he was fleeing along a steep ravine, and gave him an oblique stroke upon his neck, as he fled, and cut his head off. The royal palace also that was near the Jordan at Betharamathus<sup>2</sup> was burnt down by some of the other rebels from Peræa.

§ 3. At this time a certain shepherd called Athrongæus ventured to set himself up for a king. It was his strength of body that suggested to him the hope of such a dignity, as well as his soul which despised death; and, besides these qualifications, he had four brothers who were as brave as himself. He put a troop of armed men under each of his brothers, and made use of them as his generals and satraps to make incursions, while he himself like a king meddled only with the more important affairs. And at this time he put a diadem on his head, and continued afterwards to overrun the country for no little time with his brothers, and became their leader in killing both the Romans and those of the king's party, nor did any Jew escape him, if any gain could accrue to him thereby. He once ventured to surround a whole troop of Romans at Emmaus,<sup>1</sup> who were carrying corn and weapons to their legion. And his men shot their arrows and darts, and slew the centurion Arius and forty of the bravest men, but the rest of them who were in danger of the same fate escaped, as Gratus and the men of Sebaste came up to their assistance. And when these men had thus harassed both their own countrymen and foreigners during the whole war, three of them were after some time subdued, the eldest by Archelaus, the two next by falling into the hands of Gratus and Ptolemy, and the fourth delivered himself up to Archelaus, upon his giving him his right hand for security. However, this end did not befall them till afterwards, and at present they filled all Judæa with a guerilla war.

§ 1.

UPON Varus' reception of the letters that were written by Sabinus and his officers, he could not but be afraid for the whole legion, and resolved to hasten to their relief. So he took with him the other two legions, with the four troops of horse belonging to them, and marched to Ptolemais; <sup>1</sup> having given orders for the auxiliaries that were sent by the kings and governors of cities to meet him there. Moreover, he received from the people of Berytus, <sup>2</sup> as he passed through their city, fifteen hundred armed men. Now as soon as the other body of auxiliaries were come to Ptolemais, as well as Aretas the Arabian, (who, from the hatred he bore Herod, brought a great army of horse and foot,) Varus sent a part of his army at once to Galilee, which was near Ptolemais, with Caius one of his friends as its commander, who put those that met him to flight, and took the city of Sepphoris, <sup>3</sup> and burnt it, and made slaves of its inhabitants. As for Varus himself, he marched to Samaria <sup>4</sup> with his whole army, and did not meddle with that city, because he found that it had made no commotion during these troubles, but pitched his camp near a certain village which was called Arus: <sup>5</sup> which belonged to Ptolemy, and on that account was plundered by the Arabians, who were very angry even with Herod's friends also. He thence marched on to Sampho, <sup>6</sup> another fortified village, which they plundered as they had done the other, and carried off all the money they found that belonged to the public revenues. And all was now full of fire and bloodshed, and nothing could resist the plundering of the Arabians. Emmaus was also burnt, upon the flight of its inhabitants, at the command of Varus, in his rage at the slaughter of Arius and those that were with him.

§ 2. Varus marched on thence to Jerusalem, and as soon as he and his army were but seen by the Jews, he dispersed their force, for they retired and fled up the country. But the citizens received him, and cleared themselves of having had any hand in the revolt, and said, that they had raised no commotion, but had been forced to admit the multitude because of the festival, and had rather been besieged with the Romans, than assisted those that had revolted. There had before this met him Joseph, the cousin of Achelaus, and Gratus and Rufus, who led the men of Sebaste, <sup>7</sup> and the king's army; there also met him those of the Roman legion armed in their accustomed manner. As for Sabinus, he durst not come into Varus' sight, but had gone out of the city before this to the seaside. And Varus sent a part of his army into the country against those that had been the authors of this commotion, and great numbers were captured, and those that appeared to have had least concern in these tumults he merely put into prison, but such as were the most guilty he crucified to the number of about two thousand.

§ 3. He was also informed that there still remained ten thousand men in arms in Idumæa. And as he found that the Arabians did not act like allies, but managed the war according to their own passions, and did mischief to the country against his wish from their hatred to Herod, he sent them away, and pushed on with his own legions against those that had revolted. And they, at the advice of Achiabus, surrendered to him before it came to a battle. Then did Varus forgive the men their offences, but sent their leaders to Augustus to be examined by him. And Augustus forgave the rest, but gave orders that certain of the king's relations (for some of those that were among them were Herod's kinsmen) should be put to death, because they had engaged in war against a king of their own family. When, therefore, Varus had settled matters at Jerusalem in this manner, and had left the legion formerly there as a garrison, he returned to Antioch.

CHAP. VI.

The Jews greatly complain of Archelaus, and desire that they may be made a Roman Province. And when Augustus had heard what they had to say, he distributed Herod's Dominions among his Sons, according to his own pleasure.

§ 1.

AND now came another accusation from the Jews against Archelaus at Rome, which was made by those ambassadors, who before the revolt had come, at Varus' permission, to plead for the autonomy of their nation; those that came were only fifty in number, but more than eight thousand of the Jews at Rome supported them. And when Augustus had assembled a council of the principal Romans and his friends in Apollo's temple on the Palatine Hill (which he had himself built and adorned at vast expense) the multitude of the Jews stood with these fifty ambassadors, and on the other side stood Archelaus with his friends. As for the friends of the kindred of Archelaus, they stood on neither side; for their hatred and envy of him would not let them stand on Archelaus' side, and they were afraid to be seen by Augustus among his accusers. Besides these Archelaus' brother Philip was present, who had been sent on out of kindness by Varus for two reasons, one to assist Archelaus, and the other, in case Augustus should make a distribution of what Herod possessed among all his posterity, that he might obtain some share of it.

§ 2. And now, upon permission being given the accusers to speak, they first detailed Herod's various lawless acts, and said that they had not had to endure a king, but the most barbarous of all tyrants that ever lived. For when a very great number had been slain by him, those that were left had endured such miseries, that they considered those that were dead happy men; for he had not only tortured the bodies of his subjects, but entire cities. He had also scandalously treated the cities of his own country, while he had adorned those that belonged to foreigners, and had shed the blood of Jews to gratify strangers; and had filled the nation full of poverty and the greatest lawlessness, instead of that happiness and those laws which it had anciently enjoyed. In short, the Jews had borne more calamities from Herod in a few years, than their forefathers had during all the interval of time that had passed since they had returned home from Babylon in the reign of Xerxes. However, the nation had come to so low a condition, by being inured to ill treatment, that they submitted to a self-imposed continuance of bitter slavery. Accordingly, though he was the son of so great a tyrant, they readily hailed Archelaus as king, after the decease of his father, and joined with him in mourning for the death of Herod, and prayed for his succession.

But he, lest he should be in danger of not being thought the genuine son of Herod, began his reign with the slaughter of three thousand citizens, and had offered so many bloody sacrifices to God for his government, and had defiled the temple with as many dead bodies at festival time. Those therefore that were left after so many miseries had just reason to consider now at last the calamities they had undergone, and to oppose themselves, like soldiers in war, to receive stripes upon their faces [and not upon their backs as hitherto]. Wherefore they prayed that the Romans would have compassion upon the remains of Judæa, and not expose what was left of it to such as had barbarously torn it in pieces, but that they would join their country to Syria, and administer the government by their own governors; when it would be apparent that they who were calumniated as seditious persons and lovers of war, knew how to bear governors set over them, if they were moderate ones. The Jews concluded their accusation with this request. Then rose up Nicolaus, and confuted the accusations which were brought against Herod and Archelaus, and himself accused the Jewish nation, as hard to be ruled, and as naturally disobedient to kings. He also inveighed against all those kinsmen of Archelaus' who had left him, and had gone over to his accusers.

§ 3. And Augustus, when he had heard both sides, dissolved the council for the time; but a few days afterwards he gave half of Herod's kingdom to Archelaus, by the name of Ethnarch, and promised to make him king also afterwards, if he showed himself worthy of that dignity. As to the other half, he divided it into two tetrarchies, and gave them to two other sons of Herod, one to Philip, and the other to that Antipas who contested the kingdom with Archelaus. Antipas had Peræa<sup>1</sup> and Galilee, with a revenue of two hundred talents; and Bata-næa,<sup>2</sup> and Trachonitis,<sup>3</sup> and Auranitis,<sup>4</sup> and certain parts of Zeno's house about Jamnia,<sup>5</sup> with a revenue of a hundred talents, were made subject to Philip: while Idumæa,<sup>6</sup> and all Judæa, and Samaria, were made parts of the ethnarchy of Archelaus, but Samaria was eased of one quarter of its taxes, because it had not revolted with the others. Archelaus also received the following as subject cities, viz. Strato's Tower,<sup>1</sup> and Sebaste,<sup>2</sup> and Joppa,<sup>3</sup> and Jerusalem; for as to the Greek cities, Gaza<sup>4</sup> and Gadara<sup>5</sup> and Hippos,<sup>6</sup> Augustus cut them off from the kingdom, and added them to Syria. And the revenue of the country that was given to Archelaus was four hundred talents. Salome, also, besides what Herod had left her in his testaments, was now declared mistress of Jamnia and Azotus<sup>7</sup> and Phasaelis.<sup>8</sup> Augustus moreover bestowed upon her the royal palace in Ascalon.<sup>9</sup> So from all sources she got a revenue of sixty talents. But Augustus put her property under the ethnarchy of Archelaus. As for the rest of Herod's offspring, they each received what was bequeathed to them in his testaments; and besides that, Augustus granted to Herod's two virgin daughters five hundred thousand [drachmæ] of silver, and gave them in marriage to the sons of Pheroras. And after this distribution of the family property, he divided among them what had been bequeathed to himself by Herod, which was a thousand talents, picking out for himself only some inconsiderable presents in honour of the deceased.

resemblance, that he was that Alexander who was slain by Herod, and went to Rome, hoping not to be detected there. He had one of his own nation who was his instigator in this, who knew all the affairs of the kingdom, and instructed him to say that those that were sent to kill him and Aristobulus had pity upon them and stole them away, putting bodies that were like theirs in their places. In this way he deceived the Jews that were at Crete,<sup>1</sup> and got a great deal of travelling-money from them, and sailed thence to Melos,<sup>2</sup> where he was thought so certainly genuine, that he got a great deal more money, and prevailed upon those that had entertained him to sail with him for Rome. And he landed at Dicæarchia,<sup>3</sup> and got very large presents from the Jews who dwelt there, and was escorted by his supposed father's friends as if he were a king. Nay, his personal resemblance procured him so much credit, that those who had seen Alexander, and had even known him very well, swore that he was the very same person. So the whole body of the Jews that were at Rome ran out in crowds to see him, and an innumerable multitude stood in the narrow streets through which he was carried. For the people of Melos were so infatuated, that they carried him in a litter, and maintained a royal retinue for him at their own cost.

§ 2. But Augustus, who knew perfectly well the features of Alexander, because he had been accused by Herod before him, even before he saw the man, doubted the truth of the story, but, putting some belief in cheerful hopes, sent Celadus, who well knew Alexander, and ordered him to bring the young man to him. And when Augustus saw him, he immediately discerned the difference of his countenance, and when he discovered that his whole body was of a more robust texture, and like that of a slave, he detected all the contrivance. But the impudence of what he said greatly provoked Augustus. For he told those who asked about Aristobulus that he also was preserved alive, but was left on purpose in Cyprus<sup>4</sup> for fear of treachery, because it would be harder for plotters to get them both into their power while they were separate. Then Celadus took him apart, and said to him, "The emperor will give thee thy life, if thou wilt discover who it was that persuaded thee to concoct such a story." So he said that he would discover him, and followed Celadus to Augustus, and pointed out the Jew who had trafficked on the personal resemblance as a means of getting money, for he had received more presents in every city than ever Alexander did when he was alive. Augustus laughed at the matter, and put this spurious Alexander among his rowers, on account of the strength of his body, but ordered him that had instigated him to this contrivance to be put to death. As for the people of Melos, they had been sufficiently punished for their folly, by the expenses they had been put to on his account.

§ 3. And now Archelaus took possession of his ethnarchy, and used not only the Jews, but also the Samaritans barbarously, remembering their old quarrels with him. So they both sent ambassadors against him to Augustus, and in the ninth year of his government he was banished to Vienne,<sup>1</sup> a city in Gaul, and his effects were confiscated to Augustus' treasury. And the story goes that, before he was sent for by Augustus, he dreamed he saw nine ears of corn, full and large, devoured by oxen. When, therefore, he had sent for the diviners, and some of the Chaldæans, and inquired of them what they thought this portended, and when one of them gave one interpretation, and another another, Simon, one of the sect of the Essenes, said that he thought the ears of corn denoted years, and the oxen denoted changes of affairs, because by ploughing they made an alteration of the country. He would therefore probably reign as many years as there were ears of corn, and after he had passed through various alterations of fortune, would die. And five days after Archelaus had heard this interpretation, he was called to his trial.

§ 4. I cannot but also think worth recording the dream that Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, had, who had originally been wife of Alexander (the brother of that Archelaus of whom I have been speaking, and the son of Herod the king, by whom he was put to death, as I have previously related), and after his death married Juba king of Libya,<sup>1</sup> and after his death returned home, and lived in widowhood with her father, till Archelaus, the ethnarch, saw her, and fell so deeply in love with her, that he divorced Mariamne, who was then his wife, and married her. Now when she had returned to Judæa, and had been there a little while, she dreamed she saw Alexander standing by her, and that he said to her, "Thy marriage with the king of Libya might have been sufficient for thee; but thou wast not contented with him, but art returned again to my family, to a third husband, and thou hast chosen for thine husband, O impudent woman, my brother. However, I will not overlook the injury thou hast done me; I shall have thee again, whether thou wilt or no." And after telling her dream she barely survived two days.

CHAP. VIII.

Archelaus' Ethnarchy is reduced to a Roman Province. The Rising of Judas of Galilee. The three Sects of the Jews.

§ 1.

AND now Archelaus' portion of Judæa was reduced to a Roman province; and Coponius, a man of the equestrian order among the Romans, was sent as governor, having the power of life and death put into his hands by Augustus. It was under his administration that a certain Galilæan, whose name was Judas, induced his countrymen to revolt, and said they were cowards if they would endure paying tribute to the Romans, and after God submit to mortal men as their lords. This man was a founder of a peculiar sect of his own, and was not at all like the other founders of sects.

§ 2. For there are three philosophical sects among the

<sup>1</sup> The country west of Egypt. Antiq. i. 6, § 2; i. 15; Jewish War, vii. 11, § 1.

Jews, the followers of the first of which are called Pharisees, those of the second Sadducees, and those of the third sect, which seems to practise a severer discipline, Essenes. These last are Jews by birth, and seem to have a greater affection for one another than the other sects have. They reject pleasures as vice, and esteem continence and the conquest over our passions to be virtue. They despise marriage, but choose out other persons' children while they are pliable and fit for learning, and adopt them as their kindred, and form them according to their own manners. They do not absolutely repudiate marriage, and the continuance of the human race thereby, but are on their guard against the lascivious behaviour of women, and are persuaded that none of them preserve fidelity to one man.

§ 3. These men are despisers of riches, and wonderfully communistic, nor is there any one to be found among them who possesses more than another. For it is a law among them, that those who join their sect must let what they have be common to the whole body; insomuch that among them all there is no appearance of abject poverty, or excess of riches, but everyone's property forms a common stock, and is, as it were, one patrimony for all the brethren. They think oil a defilement, and if any one of them gets any on his body against his will, he wipes his body; for they think to be dry is a good thing, as also to be continually clothed in white garments. They also elect people to manage their common affairs, who have each no business of their own, but only act for the society.

§ 4. They have no one particular city, but many of them dwell in every city; and if any of their sect come from other places, what they have is open to them just as if it were their own, and they go into the houses of those whom they never knew before, as if they were their most intimate friends. Accordingly they carry nothing at all with them when they travel, though they take their weapons with them for fear of robbers. And they have in each city a person specially told off to take care of strangers, and to provide garments and other necessaries for them. And the dress and management of their bodies is such as children use who are in fear of their tutors. They do not change their garments or shoes, till they are first entirely torn to pieces, or worn out by time. Nor do they either buy or sell anything to one another, but every one of them gives what he has to him that wants it, and receives from him again in lieu of it what is useful to himself; and even though no requital be made, they are fully allowed to take what they want of whomever they please.

§ 5. As for their piety towards God, it is very extraordinary; for before sun-rise they speak not a word about profane matters, but offer up certain prayers, which they have received from their forefathers, as if they made a supplication for its rising. After this, every one of them is dismissed by the managers to carry out the work in which they are proficient, at which they labour with great diligence till the fifth hour, after which they assemble together again in one place, and when they have clothed themselves in linen, they bathe their bodies in cold water; and after this purification they assemble in an apartment of their own, into which none of another sect are permitted to enter; and they go pure into the dining-room, as into a holy temple. And when they have quietly sat down, the baker lays loaves before them in order, and the cook brings a single plate of one sort of food, and sets it before each of them. And a priest offers a prayer, before which it is unlawful for any one to taste of the food, and after the meal is over he offers up a prayer again, and when they begin, and when they end, they praise God, as the giver of their food. After this they lay aside their linen garments, as sacred, and betake themselves to their labours again till the evening; they then return home and sup in the same manner, and if there be any strangers there, they sit down with them. Nor does any clamour or disturbance ever pollute their house, but they give every one leave to speak in turn; and the silence of the inmates appears to those outside like some tremendous mystery; but the cause of it is their perpetual sobriety, and the fact that the meat and drink that is allotted them comes short of satiety.

§ 6. And indeed in all other things, they do nothing but according to the injunctions of their managers; only two things are done among them at their own option, namely assisting those that want assistance, and showing mercy. For they are permitted at their own option to succour such as are deserving when they stand in need of succour, and to give food to those that are in distress; but they cannot give any thing to their kindred without the leave of the managers. They dispense their anger in a just manner, and restrain their passion. They are eminent for fidelity, and are the ministers of peace. Whatever they say also is firmer than an oath; but swearing is avoided by them, and they esteem it worse than perjury; for they say that what cannot be believed without [swearing by] God, is already condemned. They also take great pains in studying the writings of the ancients, and choose out of them what is most for the advantage of soul and body, and inquire after such roots and medicinal stones as may cure their diseases.

§ 7. Now if any one has a mind to come over to their sect, he is not immediately admitted, but he is prescribed the same method of living as they use for a year, while he continues excluded, and they give him also a small hatchet, and the forementioned girdle, and the white garment. And when he has during that time given evidence of his continence, he approaches nearer to their way of living, and is made a partaker of their waters of purification; yet is he not even now admitted to live with them; for after this demonstration of his fortitude, his character is tested two more years, and if he appear to be worthy, they then admit him into their society. And before he is allowed to touch their common food, he is obliged to take tremendous oaths, in the first place that he will exercise piety towards God, and next that he will observe justice towards men, and that he will do no harm to any one, either of his own accord, or at the command of others, and that he will always hate the wicked, and help the righteous, and that he will ever show fidelity to all men, and especially to those in authority, because no one rules without the will of God, and that if he be in authority, he will at no time whatever abuse his authority, or endeavour to outshine his subjects, either in dress or any other finery; and that he will ever be a lover of truth, and propose to himself to reprove those that tell lies; and that he will keep his hands clean from theft, and his soul from unlawful gain; and that he will neither conceal any thing from those of his own sect, nor discover any of their doctrines to others; no, not though any one should try to compel him so to do at the risk of his life. Moreover, he swears to communicate their doctrines to no one in any other way than as he received them himself; and that he will abstain from robbery, and will equally preserve the books belonging to their sect, and the names of their angels. These are the oaths by which they secure their proselytes to themselves.

§ 8. As for those that are caught in any heinous sins, they cast them out of their society, and he who is thus expelled often dies in a most miserable manner. For as he is bound by the oaths he has taken, and by the customs he has followed, he is not at liberty to partake of the food that he meets with elsewhere, but is forced to eat herbs, and so wastes away with hunger, and dies. And so they receive many of them again, when they are at their last gasp, out of compassion, thinking the miseries they have endured till they came to the very brink of death a sufficient punishment for the sins they have been guilty of.

§ 9. As to the judgments they exercise they are most strictly just, nor do they pass sentence by the votes of a court of fewer than a hundred persons. But what is once determined by that number is unalterable. And what they most of all honour, after God himself, is the name of their legislator, whom if any one blaspheme, he is punished by death. They also think it a good thing to obey their elders and the majority: so if ten are sitting together, none of them will speak if the other nine are against speaking. They also avoid spitting in the midst, or on the right hand, and are stricter than any other of the Jews in resting from their labours on the seventh day. For they not only get their food ready the day before, that they may not be obliged to kindle a fire on that day, but they will not on that day remove any vessel out of its place, nor even go to stool. On other days they dig a small pit, a foot deep, with a paddle (a kind of hatchet given them when they are first admitted into the society), and covering themselves round with their garment, that they may not affront the divine rays of light, they ease themselves into that pit, after which they put the earth that was dug out again into the pit, and even this they do only in the more lonely places, which they choose out for this purpose: and although this easement of the body be natural, yet it is a rule with them to wash themselves after it, as if they were defiled.

§ 10. Now after the time of their probation is over, they are divided into four classes; and so much are the juniors inferior to the seniors, that if the seniors are touched by the juniors, they must wash themselves, as if they had been defiled by touching a foreigner. They are long-lived also, insomuch that many of them live above a hundred years, owing to the simplicity of their diet, I think, and regularity of life. They despise the miseries of life, and are above pain by their spirit; as for death, if it come with glory, they esteem it better than living always. And indeed our war with the Romans gave abundant evidence what great souls they all had, for though they were tortured and racked, burnt and torn to pieces, and suffered all kinds of instruments of torment, that they might either blaspheme their legislator, or eat what was forbidden them, yet could they not be made to do either, nor once to flatter their tormentors, nor to shed a tear; but they smiled amid their pains, and laughed those to scorn who inflicted the torments upon them, and cheerfully resigned up their souls, expecting to receive them again.

§ 11. For the opinion is prevalent among them that bodies are corruptible, and that the matter they are made of is not permanent, but that souls are immortal and continue for ever, and that they come out of the most thin air, and are united to bodies as to prisons, into which they are drawn by a certain natural enticement; and when they are set free from the bonds of the flesh, they then rejoice and mount upwards as if released from a long bondage. They think also, like the sons of the Greeks, that good souls have their habitations beyond the ocean, in a region that is neither oppressed with storms of rain or snow, nor with intense heat, but refreshed by the gentle breathing of the west wind, which perpetually blows from the ocean; while they allot to bad souls a murky and cold den, full of never-ceasing punishments. And indeed the Greeks seem to me to have the same notion, when they allot the Islands of the Blest to their brave men, whom they call heroes and demigods, but to the souls of the wicked the region of the ungodly in Hades, where their mythology relates that certain persons are punished, such as Sisyphus and Tantalus and Ixion and Tityus; on the supposition first that souls are immortal, and next with a view to repel people from vice and exhort them to virtue; for they hold that good men become better in the conduct of their life by the hope they have of reward after death, and that the vehement inclinations of bad men to vice are restrained by fear, and by the expectation they are in, that although they may escape detection in this life, they will suffer immortal punishment after death. These are the divine doctrines of the Essenes about the soul, which unavoidably attract such as have but once tasted their philosophy.

§ 12. There are also those among them who profess to foretell things to come, by reading the holy books, and using several sorts of purifications, and being conversant with the sayings of the prophets: and it is but seldom that they miss in their predictions.

§ 13. There is also another order of Essenes, who agree with the rest as to their way of living and customs and laws, but differ from them as regards marriage. For they think that those who do not marry cut off the principal part of human life, which is the continuance of mankind, nay, more, that if all men should be of the same opinion, the whole race of mankind would soon fail. However, they try their spouses for three years, and if they find that they have their menses thrice, as a trial that they are likely to be fruitful, they then marry them. But they do not go with their wives when they are with child, showing that they do not marry out of regard to pleasure, but only to have children. Now the women go into the baths with some of their garments on, as the men do with drawers on. Such are the customs of this order of Essenes.

§ 14. As to the two other sects first mentioned, the Pharisees are esteemed most skilful in the exact interpretation of their laws, and are the first sect. They ascribe all things to fate and God, and yet allow that to do what is right or the contrary is principally in men's own power, although fate co-operates in every action. They think also that all souls are immortal, but that the souls of good men only are removed into other bodies, while the souls of bad men are punished with eternal punishment. But the Sadducees, the second sect, take away fate entirely, and suppose that God is not the cause of our doing or not doing what is bad, and they say that to do what is good or bad lies in men's own choice, and that the one or the other so belongs to every one, that they may act as they please. They also take away belief in the immortality of the soul, and in punishments and rewards in Hades. Moreover, the Pharisees are friendly to one another, and cultivate concord for the general utility, but the behaviour of the Sadducees to one another is rather rude, and their intercourse with those of their own party is as bearish as if they were strangers to them. Such is what I had to say concerning the philosophic sects among the Jews.

The Death of Salome. The Cities which Herod and Philip built. Pilate's action causes Disturbances. Tiberius puts Agrippa into Bonds, but Caius frees him from them, and makes him King. Herod Antipas is banished.

§ 1.

AND now, when the ethnarchy of Archelaus had become a Roman province, the other sons of Herod, Philip and Herod who was called Antipas, administered their own tetrarchies. And when Salome died, she bequeathed to Julia, the wife of Augustus, both her toparchy and Jamnia,<sup>1</sup> as also her grove of palm-trees in Phasaelis.<sup>2</sup> And when the Roman empire devolved upon Tiberius, the son of Julia, upon the death of Augustus, who had reigned fifty-seven years six months and two days, both Herod and Philip continued in their tetrarchies, and the latter of them built the city of Cæsarea<sup>3</sup> near the fountains of the Jordan in the region of Paneas, as also the city of Julius<sup>1</sup> in Lower Gaulanitis. Herod also built the city of Tiberias<sup>2</sup> in Galilee, and one in Peræa called Julius.<sup>3</sup>

§ 2. Now Pilate, who was sent into Judæa as governor by Tiberius, introduced into Jerusalem by night covered up those images of Cæsar that are called standards. This excited a very great tumult among the Jews when it was day; for those that were near them were astonished at the sight of them, feeling that their laws were trodden under foot, for those laws do not permit any sort of image to be brought into the city. And besides the indignation which the citizens themselves had at this proceeding, a vast number of the people came flocking out of the country. They hastened to Cæsarea<sup>4</sup> to Pilate, and besought him to have those standards removed from Jerusalem, and to respect their ancient laws. And upon Pilate's denial of their request, they fell down prostrate upon the ground, and continued immoveable in that posture for five days and as many nights.

§ 3. On the next day Pilate sat upon his tribunal in the great circus, and called to him the multitude, as if desirous to give them an answer, and then gave a signal to the soldiers according to a preconcerted arrangement to surround the Jews with their weapons. So the band of soldiers stood round about the Jews in three ranks, and the Jews were in the utmost consternation at that unexpected sight, and Pilate told them that they should be cut in pieces, unless they would receive Cæsar's images, and gave a signal to the soldiers to draw their swords. Thereupon the Jews, as if by agreement, fell down in vast numbers together, and bared their necks, and cried out that they were ready to be slain rather than that their law should be transgressed. Thereupon Pilate was greatly surprised at their invincible regard to their religion, and gave orders that the standards should be at once carried away from Jerusalem.

§ 4. After this he raised another disturbance by expending the sacred treasure which is called Corban on an aqueduct,<sup>1</sup> whereby he brought water from a distance of four hundred furlongs. At this the multitude were indignant, and when Pilate was come to Jerusalem, they flocked round his tribunal, and made a clamour. Now, as he was apprised beforehand of this disturbance, he mixed up his own soldiers in their armour with the multitude, and ordered them to conceal themselves in the dress of private men, and not to use their swords, but to beat with their staves those that made the clamour, and he gave them the signal to do so from his tribunal. And the Jews were so beaten, that many of them perished from the stripes they received, and many of them were trodden to death by one another in their flight. And the multitude was dismayed at the calamity of those that were slain, and held their peace.

§ 5. Meantime Agrippa, the son of that Aristobulus who had been put to death by his father Herod, went to Tiberius, to accuse Herod the tetrarch. But though Tiberius did not receive his accusation, he stayed at Rome, and cultivated a friendship with other men of note, and especially with Caius the son of Germanicus, who was then but a private person. Now this Agrippa, on one occasion feasting Caius, was very complaisant to him in several other ways, and at last stretched out his hands, and openly prayed that Tiberius might die, and that he might soon see him emperor of the world. This was told Tiberius by one of Agrippa's domestics, and he was very angry, and shut up Agrippa in prison, and had him ill treated there for six months, until Tiberius died, after he had reigned twenty-two years six months and three days.

§ 6. But when Caius was made emperor, he released Agrippa from his bonds, and made him king of Philip's tetrarchy, for Philip was now dead. And Agrippa's arriving at that degree of dignity inflamed the ambitious desires of Herod the tetrarch; who was chiefly induced to hope for royalty by his wife Herodias, who reproached him for his sloth, and told him that it was only because he would not sail to the emperor, that he had lower rank; for since the emperor had made Agrippa a king from a private person, much more would he advance him from a tetrarch to the same dignity. These arguments prevailed with Herod, so that he went to Caius, by whom he was punished for his ambition by being banished into Spain. For Agrippa followed him to accuse him and Caius also gave him Herod's tetrarchy. And Herod died in Spain, where his wife joined him in exile.

CHAP. X.

Caius commands that his Statues should be set up in the Temple itself; and how Petronius acted in the case.

§ 1.

NOW Caius Cæsar did so grossly abuse the fortune he had arrived at, as to take himself to be a god, and to desire to be called so, and to cut off those of the greatest nobility in his own country, and to extend his impiety to the Jews. Accordingly, he sent Petronius with an army to Jerusalem, to place his statues in the temple, and commanded him, in case the Jews would not receive them, to slay those that opposed this step, and to enslave all the rest of the nation. But God concerned himself with these commands. And Petronius marched out of Antioch into Judæa with three legions and many Syrian auxiliaries. Now some of the Jews could not believe the rumours of war, but those that did believe them were in the utmost anxiety how to defend themselves. And a panic diffused itself presently through the whole nation, for the army was already come to Ptolemais.

of a hundred furlongs. The very small river Belæus<sup>1</sup> runs by it, at the distance of two furlongs from the city, near which is Memnon's monument, which has near it a remarkable place no larger than a hundred cubits; which is round and hollow, and yields such sand as glass is made of, and when this sand has been emptied by the many ships loaded there, the place is filled again by the winds, which sweep into it, as if on purpose, sand which lay remote, and was common sand, which this mine turns at once entirely into a glassy sand. And what seems to me still more wonderful, the glassy sand which once leaves that place becomes common sand again. Such is the nature of the place we are speaking of.

§ 3. And now the Jews assembled together in great numbers with their wives and children in the plain that was near Ptolemais, and made supplications to Petronius, first on behalf of their laws, and next on behalf of themselves. So he was prevailed upon by the multitude of the supplicants, and by their supplications, and left his army and the statues at Ptolemais, and went on to Galilee, and called together the multitude and all the men of note of Tiberias, and declared to them the power of the Romans, and the threatenings of Caius, and, also argued that their petition was unreasonable. For as all the nations subject to Rome had placed the images of the emperor in their several cities among the rest of their gods, for them alone to oppose it was almost like the behaviour of rebels, and was insulting to the emperor.

§ 4. And when they insisted on their law, and the custom of their country, and how it was not lawful for them to put even an image of God, much less of a man, in any profane part of their country, much less in the temple, Petronius replied, "And am not I also bound to keep the law of my lord? For if I transgress it, and spare you, I shall justly perish. And he that sent me, and not I, will war against you; for I am under command as well as you." Thereupon the whole multitude cried out, that "they were ready to suffer for their law." Petronius then tried to quiet their noise, and said to them, "Will you then make war against the emperor?" The Jews said that they offered sacrifices twice every day for the emperor and the Roman people ; but if he would set up his statues, he must first sacrifice the whole Jewish nation ; and they were ready to expose themselves to be slain with their children and wives. At this Petronius felt both astonishment and pity on account of their invincible regard to their religion, and their courage which made them ready to die for it. And they were dismissed for the time without effecting their object.

§ 5. But on the following days he assembled together the influential men privately, and the multitude publicly, and sometimes besought them, and sometimes advised them, but chiefly threatened them, insisting upon the power of the Romans, and the anger of Caius, and also the necessity he was himself under. But as they could be no way prevailed upon, and he saw that the country was in danger of continuing unsown (for it was about seed-time that the multitude continued for fifty days together idle), he at last assembled them together, and told them that it was best for him to run some hazard himself ; “ for either, by the divine assistance, I shall persuade the emperor, and shall myself gladly escape danger as well as you, or if he continue in his rage, I will readily expose my own life for such a great number as you are.” Thereupon he dismissed the multitude, who prayed greatly for his success, and led his army back from Ptolemais, and returned to Antioch ;<sup>1</sup> from whence he sent a letter at once to the emperor, and informed him of the march he had made into Judæa, and of the supplications of the nation ; and said that, unless he had a mind to lose both the country and the men in it, he must permit them to keep their law, and must countermand his former injunction. Caius answered his letter in no measured terms, and threatened to have Petronius put to death for his being so tardy in carrying out his commands. But it happened that those who brought Caius’ answer were tempest-tossed on the sea for three months, while others that brought the news of Caius’ death had a good voyage. So Petronius received news of Caius’ death twenty-seven days before he received the emperor’s answer against himself.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning the Empire of Claudius and the Reign of Agrippa. Concerning the Deaths of Agrippa and of Herod, and what Family they both left behind them.

§ 1.

NOW when Caius had been emperor three years and eight months, and had been slain by treachery, Claudius was carried off by the army that was in Rome and made emperor. But the senate, at the suggestion of the consuls, Sentius Saturninus and Pomponius Secundus, gave orders to the three regiments of soldiers that sided with them to keep the city quiet, and assembled in the Capitol, and resolved to oppose Claudius by force, on account of the barbarous treatment they had met with from Caius; for they determined either to settle the nation under an aristocracy, as it had of old been governed, or at least to choose by vote such an emperor as was worthy of the position.

§ 2. Now it happened that Agrippa at this time sojourned at Rome, and that not only the senate called him to consult with them, but also Claudius sent for him from the camp, that he might help him in this emergency. And he, perceiving that Claudius was in effect emperor already, went to him. And Claudius sent him as an ambassador to the senate, to let them know what his intentions were, and to state first that it was against his will that he was carried off by the soldiers, but he thought it was not right to leave them in the lurch in their zeal for him, and if he should do so, his own fortune would be uncertain, for it was dangerous to have been once called to the empire. Claudius added further, that he would administer the government as a good prince, and not as a tyrant; for he would be satisfied with the honour of being called emperor, but would, in every one of his actions, permit them all to give him their advice; for even if he had not been by nature a man of moderation, yet the death of Caius would be a sufficient lesson how soberly he ought to act.

§ 3. This message was delivered by Agrippa. And the senate, relying on their army and wise counsels, replied that they would not endure a voluntary slavery. When Claudius heard what answer the senate had made, he sent Agrippa again to take to them the following message, that he would not betray those that had sworn to be true to him, and if he had to fight, would fight unwillingly against such as he had no mind to fight with; however [if it must come to that], it was proper to choose a place without the city to fight in; for it was impious to pollute the temples of their city with the blood of their fellow-countrymen simply because of their ill-advisedness. And when Agrippa had heard this message, he delivered it to the senate.

§ 4. Meantime one of the soldiers on the side of the senate drew his sword, and cried out, "Fellow-soldiers, what is the meaning of our choosing to kill our brothers, and to attack our kindred who are with Claudius, when we have one for our emperor whom no one can blame, and who has so many just claims on those against whom we are going to fight?" When he had said this, he marched through the whole senate, and attracted to his side all his fellow-soldiers. Upon this all the patricians were immediately in a great fright at being thus deserted; but as there appeared no other course of safety, they made haste to Claudius the same way as the soldiers. But those that had more eagerly wooed fortune met them before the walls with their naked swords; and there was reason to fear that those that reached the camp first would have been in danger, before Claudius knew what violence the soldiers were going to offer them, had not Agrippa rushed up and told him what danger they were incurring, and that unless he restrained the violence of those men who were mad against the patricians, he would lose those on whose account it was glorious to rule, and would be emperor over a desert.

§ 5. When Claudius heard this, he restrained the violence of the soldiers, and received the senate in the camp, and treated them in an obliging manner, and went out with them at once to offer thank-offerings to God on his accession to the empire. And he bestowed on Agrippa his whole paternal kingdom immediately, and also added Tracho-nit<sup>1</sup> and Auranitis,<sup>1</sup> those countries that had been given by Augustus to Herod, and also besides these the kingdom which was called the kingdom of Lysanias.<sup>2</sup> This gift he signified to the people by a decree, and ordered the magistrates to have the donation engraved on tables of brass and set up in the Capitol. He also bestowed on his brother Herod (who was also his son-in-law as he had married Berenice) the kingdom of Chalcis.<sup>3</sup>

§ 6. So now riches quickly flowed in to Agrippa from his enjoyment of such large dominions, nor did he waste the money he had on small matters; but he began to surround Jerusalem with such a wall that, had it been brought to perfection, would have made it impracticable for the Romans to take it by siege; but his death, which happened at Cæsarea,<sup>4</sup> before he had raised the walls to the intended height, prevented this. He had then reigned three years, and had governed his tetrarchies three previous years. He left behind him three daughters, by his wife Cypros, viz. Berenice, Mariamne, and Drusilla, and a son Agrippa by the same mother. And as he was a very young child, Claudius made the country a Roman province again, and sent Cuspius Fadus to be its governor, and after him Tiberius Alexander, who, making no alterations in the ancient laws, kept the nation in tranquillity. After this Herod the king of Chalcis also died, and left two sons by his brother's daughter Berenice, whose names were Berenicianus and Hyrcanus. He also left a son Aristobulus by his former wife Mariamne. There was besides another brother of his that died a private person; his name was also Aristobulus, and he left a daughter whose name was Jotape. These, as I formerly said, were the children of Aristobulus the son of Herod. Now Aristobulus and Alexander were sons of Herod by Mariamne, and were put to death by their father. As for Alexander's posterity, they reigned in Greater Armenia.

CHAP. XII.

§ 1.

NOW after the death of Herod, king of Chalcis, Claudius set Agrippa, the son of Agrippa, over his uncle's kingdom; and Cumanus succeeded Alexander in the administration of the other province, under whom began troubles and new calamities for the Jews. For when the multitude were come together to Jerusalem to the feast of Unleavened Bread, and a Roman cohort was stationed above the portico of the temple, (for they always kept guard under arms at the festivals, to prevent any outbreak which the multitude thus gathered together might make,) one of the soldiers pulled up his clothes, and stooped down, and indecently exposed his backside to the Jews, and spoke such words as you might expect from such a posture. At this the whole multitude were indignant, and made a clamour to Cumanus that he would punish the soldier; while the hot-headed youth, and such as were naturally most riotous, fell to fighting, and snatched up stones, and threw them at the soldiers. Upon this Cumanus was afraid lest all the people should make an assault upon him, and sent for more armed men. And as they poured into the porticoes in great numbers, the Jews were seized with a very great panic, and being beaten out of the temple, fled pell-mell into the city; and the violence with which they crowded to get out was so great, that they trod upon each other, and jostled one another, till more than ten thousand of them were killed; insomuch that this feast became the cause of mourning to the whole nation, and brought lamentation to every family.

§ 2. Now there followed after this another calamity, which arose from a tumult made by robbers; for on the public road near Beth-horon,<sup>1</sup> one Stephen, a servant of the emperor, was carrying some furniture, which the robbers fell upon, and seized. Upon this Cumanus sent men to go round to the neighbouring villages, and to bring their inhabitants to him bound, laying it to their charge that they had not pursued after the robbers and arrested them. Then it was that a certain soldier, finding in a certain village the sacred book of the law, tore it to pieces, and threw it into the fire.<sup>2</sup> Thereupon the Jews were in great confusion, as if their whole country were in a flame, being drawn together by their zeal for their religion as if mechanically, and rushed with united clamour to Cæsarea to Cumanus, and made supplication to him, that he would not let this man go without punishment who had offered such an affront to God and their law. And he, perceiving that the multitude would not be quiet unless they had a comfortable answer from him, gave order that the soldier should be brought up and led to execution through those that required to have him punished; and after that the Jews went their ways.

§ 3. After this there happened a fight between the Galilæans and Samaritans. For at a village called Geman,<sup>3</sup> which lies in the great plain of Samaria, as a great number of Jews were going up to Jerusalem to the feast [of Tabernacles], a certain Galilæan was slain. At this a vast number of people flocked together out of Galilee to fight with the Samaritans; but the principal men among them went to Cumanus, and begged him, before the evil became incurable, to go into the Samaritan district,<sup>4</sup> and bring the authors of this murder to punishment, for there was no other way to separate the multitudes without coming to blows. However, Cumanus postponed their supplications to other affairs he was then about, and sent the petitioners away without effecting their object.

§ 4. But when this murder was reported at Jerusalem, it greatly disturbed the multitudes, and they left the feast, and set out for Samaria<sup>1</sup> without any generals, nor would they be ruled by any of the magistrates that endeavoured to restrain them. But their factious and marauding bands were led by one Eleazar, the son of Dinaeus, and by Alexander, who fell upon those that bordered on the Acrabatene toparchy,<sup>2</sup> and slew them, without sparing any age, and set their villages on fire.

<sup>2</sup> Reland notes here, that the Talmud, in recounting ten sad accidents for which the Jews ought to rend their garments, reckons this for one: "When they hear that the law of God is burnt."—W.

§ 5. But Cumanus took one troop of horse, called the troop of Sebaste,<sup>3</sup> from Cæsarea, and came to the assistance of those that were being devastated. He also seized upon many of those that followed Eleazar, but slew most of them. As for the rest of the multitude of those that went so zealously to fight against the Samaritans, the rulers of Jerusalem ran out in sackcloth and with ashes on their heads, and begged of them to go their ways, and not by their attempt to revenge themselves upon the Samaritans to provoke the Romans to come against Jerusalem, but to have compassion upon their country and temple, their children and wives, and not to bring the utmost risk of destruction upon them merely to avenge one Galilæan. The Jews listened to them and dispersed; but still a great many betook themselves to robbery in hope of impunity, and plundering and insurrection on the part of the more daring happened over the whole country. And the influential persons among the Samaritans went to Tyre to Ummidius Quadratus, the governor of Syria, and desired that they that had laid waste their country might be punished: the great men also of the Jews, and Jonathan (son of Ananus), the high priest, went there and said that the Samaritans were the beginners of the disturbance, because of the murder they had committed, and that Cumanus had caused what had happened from his unwillingness to punish the actual perpetrators of that murder.

§ 6. But Quadratus put off both parties for the time, and told them, that when he went to those places, he would make a diligent inquiry into all the circumstances.

After this he went to Cæsarea, and crucified all those whom Cumanus had taken alive; and when he was come from thence to the city of Lydda,<sup>1</sup> he heard the statement of the Samaritans, and sent for eighteen of the Jews who he learned had been concerned in that fight, and had them beheaded: but he sent two others of those that had the greatest influence, and also Jonathan and Ananias, the high priests, as also Ananus the son of Ananias, and some other eminent Jews, to Claudius, as also the most illustrious of the Samaritans. He also ordered Cumanus and the tribune Celer to sail to Rome, to give Claudius an account of what had been done. When he had arranged all this, he went up from Lydda to Jerusalem, and finding the multitude celebrating the feast of Unleavened Bread without any tumult, he returned to Antioch.

§ 7. Now when Claudius at Rome had heard what Cumanus and the Samaritans had to say (in the presence of Agrippa, who zealously espoused the cause of the Jews, as many influential men stood by Cumanus), he condemned the Samaritans, and commanded that three of the most influential persons among them should be put to death: and he banished Cumanus, and had Celer sent bound to Jerusalem, to be delivered over to the Jews to be tortured, and drawn round the city, and then beheaded.

§ 8. After this Claudius sent Felix, the brother of Pallas, to be governor of Galilee and Samaria and Peræa, and removed Agrippa from Chalcis to a greater kingdom; for he gave him the tetrarchy which had belonged to Philip, which contained Batanæa and Trachonitis and Gaulanitis: and he added to it the kingdom of Lysanias, and the province which Varus had governed. Now Claudius himself died when he had reigned thirteen years eight months and twenty days, and left Nero as his successor in the empire, whom he had adopted by his wife Agrippina's intrigues as his successor, although he had a son of his own, whose name was Britannicus, by Messalina his former wife, and a daughter whose name was Octavia, whom he had married to Nero. He had also a daughter Antonia by Petina.

CHAP. XIII.

Nero adds four Cities to Agrippa's Kingdom; but the other Parts of Judæa are under Felix. The disturbances raised by the Sicarii, and the Magicians, and by an Egyptian false Prophet. The Jews and Syrians have a Contest at Cæsarea.

§ 1.

NOW as to the many ways in which Nero, becoming mad from his excessive felicity and riches, abused his good fortune, and how he slew his brother and wife and mother, after whom he transferred his barbarity to the most noble persons, and how, at last, he was so distracted that he became an actor in the scenes and upon the theatre, all this I shall pass over because it is universally known. But I shall turn to what happened to the Jews in his time.

§ 2. Nero, then, bestowed the kingdom of Lesser Armenia<sup>1</sup> upon Herod's son Aristobulus, and he added to Agrippa's kingdom four cities, with the toparchies belonging to them, as Abila<sup>2</sup> and Julias in Peræa,<sup>3</sup> and Tarichea<sup>4</sup> and Tiberias in Galilee; but he made Felix governor over the rest of Judæa. This Felix captured Eleazar the arch-robber, who had ravaged the country for twenty years, and many that were with him, alive, and sent them to Rome; while the robbers he crucified, and the people who were caught in their company, whom he brought to punishment, were an innumerable multitude.

§ 3. When the country was rid of these, there sprang up another sort of robbers in Jerusalem, who were called Sicarii, who slew men in the day-time and in the midst of the city, especially at the festivals, when they mixed with the multitude, and concealed little daggers under their garments, with which they stabbed those that were their enemies; and when any fell down dead, the murderers joined the bystanders in expressing their indignation, so that from their plausibility they could by no means be discovered. The first man who was slain by them was Jonathan the high priest, after whom many were slain every day, and the fear men were in of being so treated was more harassing than the calamity itself, everybody expecting death every hour, as men do in war. So men kept a look out for their enemies at a great distance, and even if their friends were coming, they durst not trust them any longer, but were slain in the midst of their suspicions and precautions. Such was the celerity of the plotters, and so cunning was their contrivance against detection.

§ 4. Another body of wicked men also sprung up, cleaner in their hands, but more wicked in their intentions, who destroyed the peace of the city no less than did these murderers. For they were deceivers and deluders of the people, and under pretence of divine illumination were for innovations and changes, and prevailed on the multitude to act like madmen, and went before them into the wilderness, pretending that God would there show them signs of liberty. But Felix thought this step the beginning of a revolt; so he sent some horse and foot, and cut to pieces a great number of them.

§ 5. But an Egyptian false prophet did the Jews more mischief still. He was a cheat and impostor, and yet got credited as a prophet, and came into Judæa, and got together thirty thousand deluded men, whom he led round from the wilderness to the Mount which was called the Mount of Olives, and intended to break into Jerusalem by force from that place; and if he could but once conquer the Roman garrison and the people, he intended to domineer over them by the assistance of those body-guards of his that were to break into the city with him. But Felix prevented his attempt, and met him with his Roman soldiers, and all the people assisted Felix against him, so that, when it came to a battle, the Egyptian ran away with a few others, but most of those that were with him were either killed or taken alive: and the rest of the multitude dispersed every one to their own homes, and there concealed themselves.

§ 6. Now when these had been quieted, it happened, as it does in a diseased body, that another part caught the infection. For several impostors and robbers assembled together, and urged the Jews to revolt, and exhorted them to assert their liberty, inflicting death on those that continued in obedience to the Roman government, and saying that such as willingly chose slavery ought to be by force detached therefrom. And they divided themselves into different bodies up and down the country, and plundered the houses of well-to-do people, and slew the men themselves, and set villages on fire; so that all Judæa was filled with the effects of their madness. And thus this war was every day more and more fanned into flame.

§ 7. There was also another disturbance at Cæsarea,<sup>1</sup> the Jews, who were a mixed population there with the Syrians, raising a tumult against them. The Jews maintained that the city was theirs, and said that he who built it was a Jew, namely king Herod. The Syrians admitted that its builder was a Jew, but argued that it was none the less built for Greeks; for he who set up statues and temples in it could not design it for Jews. On this matter both parties had a controversy with one another, and the quarrel came at last to arms, and the bolder on both sides daily marched out to fight. For the elders of the Jews were not able to put a stop to their own people that were disposed to be riotous, and the Greeks thought it a disgrace for them to be overcome by Jews. Now the Jews had the best of it in riches and strength of body, but the Greeks had the advantage of assistance from the soldiers; for most of the Roman army there was raised out of Syria, and thus being kinsmen they came readily to their assistance. However, the commanders were anxious to allay the disturbance, and kept arresting those that were most for fighting on either side, and punished them with stripes and bonds. But the sufferings of those that were arrested did not frighten the rest, or make them desist; but they were still more exasperated and riotous. And on one occasion when the Jews had beaten the Syrians, Felix came into the market place, and commanded them to go their ways, and threatened them if they would not; and as they did not obey him, he sent his soldiers against them, and slew a great many of them, and also plundered their property. And as the disturbance still continued, he chose out the leading men on both sides, and sent them as ambassadors to Nero, to argue on the merits of the case.

CHAP. XIV.

Festus succeeds Felix, who is succeeded by Albinus, and he by Florus; who by the Barbarity of his Rule forces the Jews into War.

§ 1.

NOW Festus succeeded Felix as governor, and tried to put down those that most ravaged the country. So he arrested most of the robbers, and slew a great many of them. But Albinus, who succeeded Festus, did not execute his office in the same manner, for there was no kind of wickedness but he had a hand in it. For not only did he in his official position steal and plunder every one's substance, and burden the whole nation with taxes, but he permitted the relations of such as were in prison for robbery, and had been put there either by the senate of every city or by former governors, to redeem them for money, and nobody remained in the prisons as a malefactor, but he who gave him nothing. At this time the audacity of the innovating party at Jerusalem was very great, as the opulent by their money got impunity for their rioting from Albinus, while those of the people who delighted not in quiet joined themselves to the associates of Albinus. And every one of these wicked wretches was surrounded by his own band of robbers, while himself, like an arch-robber or tyrant, made a figure among his company, and abused his authority over his satellites to plunder those that lived quietly. So it happened that those who were robbed of their goods were forced to hold their peace, though they had cause for great indignation, and those who had escaped were forced to flatter him that deserved punishment, from fear of suffering the same things. And to sum up, nobody durst speak their minds, for tyranny was generally prevalent; and at this time the seeds were sown which brought the city to destruction.

§ 2. And though such was the character of Albinus, yet Gessius Florus, who succeeded him, showed him to have been a most just person by comparison. For the former did most of his ill-deeds in private and with a sort of dissimulation, but Gessius made a show of his lawlessness to the nation, and as though he had been sent as an executioner to punish condemned malefactors, omitted no sort of outrage. For in cases that required pity he was most barbarous, and in disgraceful things he was most shameless; nor could any one outdo him in disguising the truth, nor contrive more subtle ways of deceit. He indeed thought it a poor thing to get money out of individuals, so he spoiled whole cities, and ruined entire bodies of men at once, and did all but publicly proclaim all over the country that everybody had liberty to turn robber, upon condition that he went shares in the spoil. And owing to his cupidity entire toparchies were brought to desolation; and many people left their country, and fled into strange provinces.

§ 3. Now as long as Cestius Gallus administered the province of Syria, nobody durst send an embassy to him against Florus. But when he came to Jerusalem at the approach of the feast of Unleavened Bread, the people crowded round him, not fewer in number than three millions,<sup>1</sup> and besought him to commiserate the calamities of their nation, and clamoured against Florus as the bane of their country. But as he was present, and stood by Cestius, he mocked at their petition. But Cestius quieted the excitement of the multitude, and assured them that he would take care that Florus should hereafter treat them in a more gentle manner, and returned to Antioch. And Florus conducted him on his way as far as Cæsarea, and deluded him, for he had at that very time the intention in his anger of procuring war against the nation, for by that means alone he thought he could conceal his crimes. For he expected that, if peace continued, he should have the Jews for his accusers before the emperor, but if he could make them revolt, he should divert the emperor's<sup>1</sup> attention from smaller matters by this greater evil. So he every day augmented their calamities, in order to induce them to revolt from the Romans.

§ 4. Now it happened at this time, that the Greeks of Cæsarea had won their case, and obtained of Nero the government of the city, and had brought back his judicial decision in writing, and at the same time began the war, in the twelfth year of the reign of Nero, and seventeenth of the reign of Agrippa, in the month of Artemisius. Now the cause of this war was by no means proportioned to the heavy calamities which it brought upon us. For the Jews that dwelt at Cæsarea having a synagogue near the place, whose owner was a certain Cæsarean Greek, had frequently endeavoured to purchase the place, and had offered for it a sum many times its value; but as the owner contemptuously refused their offers, and also raised other buildings upon the place by way of affront to them, and built workshops, and left the Jews but a narrow and very difficult passage to their synagogue, the hotheaded Jewish youths went hastily at first to the workmen and forbade them to build, and as Florus stopped their violence, the leading men of the Jews, among whom was John the publican, being in the utmost distress what to do, tried to bribe Florus by eight talents to hinder the work. He then, being intent upon nothing but getting money, promised he would do for them all they desired of him, and took the money and went away from Cæsarea<sup>2</sup> to Sebaste,<sup>3</sup> and left the riot to take its course, as if he had sold a licence to the Jews to fight it out.

§ 5. The next day, which was the seventh day of the week, when the Jews were crowding apace to their synagogue, a certain riotous person of Cæsarea turned an earthen vessel bottom upwards at the entrance of the synagogue, and sacrificed birds in it.<sup>1</sup> This thing terribly exasperated the Jews, because their laws were affronted, and the place was polluted. And the sober and moderate portion of the Jews thought it well to have recourse to their governors again; but the riotous portion, and such as were in the fervour of their youth, were vehemently inflamed to fight. The riotous Greeks also of Cæsarea stood ready for the same purpose (for they had, by agreement, conducted the man to sacrifice), so they soon came to blows. Then Jucundus, the master of the horse, who was ordered to prevent the fight, came up and took away the earthen vessel, and endeavoured to put a stop to the riot. But as he was overcome by the violence of the people of Cæsarea, the Jews seized the books of their law, and retired to Nabata, a place so called belonging to them, which was sixty furlongs from Cæsarea. But John, and twelve of the principal men with him, went to Florus to Sebaste, and complained bitterly of what had happened, and besought him to help them, modestly reminding him of the eight talents they had given him. But he had them arrested, and put in prison, on the charge of carrying the books of their law from Cæsarea.

§ 6. At this the people of Jerusalem were very indignant, but they restrained their passion. However, Florus, as if he had a contract for the work, blew up the war into a flame, and sent some to the sacred treasure to take seventeen talents out, pretending that the emperor wanted them. At this the people were in confusion immediately, and ran together to the temple with piercing cries, and called upon the emperor's name, and besought him to free them from the tyranny of Florus. Some also of the insurgents hurled the most disgraceful reproaches against Florus, and carried a basket about and begged some small coins for him, as for a miserable beggar. But he was not made ashamed thereby of his love of money, but was provoked to get still more. And instead of going to Cæsarea, as he ought to have done, and quenching the flame of war which was beginning there, and so taking away the causes of any disturbance, for which purpose indeed he had received a sum of money, he set out with an army of horse and foot for Jerusalem, that he might carry out his purpose by the arms of the Romans, and by terrorism and threats fleece the city.

§ 7. But the people, wishing to make Florus ashamed of his impetuosity, met his soldiers with acclamations, and prepared to receive him obsequiously. But he sent on Capito a centurion with fifty horsemen, and bade them go back, and not now make a show of receiving him in an obliging manner, when they had so foully reproached him before; and said that if they were brave and bold, they ought to jeer him to his face, and to show themselves lovers of liberty, not only in words, but with their weapons also. At this message the multitude was dismayed, and upon the charging of Capito's horsemen into the midst of them, they dispersed before they could salute Florus, or manifest their submissive behaviour to the soldiers. And they retired to their own houses, and spent the night in fear and dejection.

§ 8. And now Florus took up his quarters at the palace; and on the next day he had his tribunal set before it, and sat upon it, when the high priests, and the principal people, and all those of the greatest eminence in the city, came before his tribunal; upon which Florus commanded them to deliver up to him those that had abused him, and told them that they should themselves share in his vengeance, if they did not produce the guilty persons. But they affirmed that the people were peaceably disposed, and begged forgiveness for those that had spoken amiss; for they said it was no wonder at all that in so great a multitude there should be some too bold and because of their youth foolish, but it was impossible to distinguish those that had offended from the rest, as each one was sorry for what he had done, and would deny it from fear of what would follow. They said he ought, however, to provide for the peace of the nation, and to determine to preserve the city for the Romans, and rather for the sake of a great number of innocent people to forgive a few that were guilty, than because of a few wicked to trouble so large and loyal a body of men.

§ 9. Florus was more provoked at this, and called out aloud to the soldiers to plunder that which was called the upper market-place, and to slay those whom they met. And they, taking this exhortation of their commander in a sense to suit their desire of gain, did not only plunder the place they were sent to, but rushed into every house, and slew the inhabitants. And the citizens fled along the narrow lanes, and the soldiers slew those that they caught, and no sort of plunder was omitted. They also arrested many quiet people, and brought them before Florus, whom he first insulted by scourging, and then crucified them. And the entire number of those that perished that day, with their wives and children (for they did not spare even infants), was about three thousand and six hundred. And what made this calamity the heavier, was the following novelty in Roman barbarity: for Florus ventured now to do what no one had done before, that is, to have men of the equestrian order scourged<sup>1</sup> and nailed to the cross before his tribunal; who, although they were by birth Jews, yet had that Roman dignity.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning Berenice's Petition to Florus to spare the Jews, which was in vain, as also how, after the seditious Flame was quenched, it was kindled again by Florus.

§ 1.

AT this time king Agrippa had set out for Alexandria, to congratulate Alexander on his having obtained the government of Egypt from Nero. But his sister Berenice was at Jerusalem, and when she saw the lawless conduct of the soldiers, she was sorely affected at it; and frequently sent the masters of her horse, and her body-guards, to Florus, and begged of him to leave off these slaughters. But he would not comply with her request, and paid no regard either to the number of those already slain, or to the nobility of her that interceded, but only thought of the gain he might make by plundering. And the violence of the soldiers raged even against the queen herself; for they not only ill-treated and killed those whom they took under her very eyes, but would indeed have killed her also, had she not prevented them by fleeing to the palace, and staying there all night with her guards, fearing the violence of the soldiers. Now she was staying at this time at Jerusalem, in order to perform a vow which she had made to God. For it is usual with those that have been afflicted either with disease, or with any other distresses, to make vows, and for thirty days before they offer their sacrifices to abstain from wine, and to shave the hair of their head. Berenice was now performing all this, and she stood barefoot before Florus' tribunal, and besought him [to spare the Jews]. But so far was she from having any reverence paid to her, that she ran some danger of being slain herself.

§ 2. These events happened on the sixteenth day of the month Artemisius. Now the next day the multitude, who were in great distress, ran together to the upper market-place, and made the loudest lamentations for those that had perished; and most of their cries reflected on Florus. At this the principal persons were terrified, as also the high priests, and rent their garments, and fell down before each of them, and begged them to be quiet, and not to provoke Florus to some irremediable act of violence in addition to what they had already suffered. And the multitude complied immediately, out of reverence to those that besought them, and in the hope that Florus would do them no more injury.

§ 3. But Florus was vexed that the disturbance was over, and endeavoured to kindle the flame again, and sent for the high priests and the other eminent persons, and said that the only proof that the people would desist from any further rioting would be for them to go out and meet the soldiers that were coming up from Cæsarea, for two cohorts were on the road. And while they were still calling the multitude together, he despatched messengers with directions to the centurions of the cohorts on the road to tell the soldiers that were under them not to return the Jews' salutations, and if they said anything against Florus, they were to use their weapons. Now the high priests assembled the multitude in the temple, and desired them to go and meet the Romans, and to salute the cohorts civilly, before their miserable case should become incurable. This the riotous party refused to do, and the remembrance of those that had been slain made the people incline to the bolder policy.

§ 4. Then every priest, and every minister of God, brought out the holy vessels, and the ornamental garments wherein they used to conduct their services, and the harpers and singers of hymns with their instruments of music fell down before the multitude, and begged of them that they would preserve those holy ornaments to them, and not provoke the Romans to carry off their sacred treasures. One might also see the high priests themselves, with dust sprinkled on their heads, and their bosoms bared as their clothes were rent; these besought every one of the eminent men by name, and the multitude en masse, that they would not by offending in a very small matter betray their country to those that were desirous to lay it waste. They asked what benefit it would bring to the Roman soldiers to have a salutation from the Jews, or what improvement in their own fortunes would come from their not going out now to meet them? For if they saluted them civilly, all pretext for beginning a war would be cut off from Florus, and they would thereby gain their country, and freedom from all further sufferings. Besides, it would argue great weakness in them to hearken to a few riotous persons, when it behoved them, who were so numerous a body, to force the others to act soberly.

§ 5. They used these arguments to the multitude, and restrained some of the riotous by threats, and others by the respect that was paid them. They then led them out quietly and orderly to meet the soldiers, and when they were come up with them, they saluted them. But as they made no answer, the riotous cried out against Florus, which was the signal given for falling upon them. The soldiers therefore surrounded them at once, and struck them with their clubs, and as they fled away, the horsemen pursued them and trampled them down, so that many fell down dead by the strokes of the Romans, but more by their crushing one another. And there was a terrible squeeze near the gates, and as every body made haste to get before another, the flight of all was retarded. And there was a terrible destruction among those that fell down, for they were so crushed and bruised by the number of those that trampled upon them, that none of them could be recognised by his relations for burial. The soldiers also fell pell-mell upon those whom they met, and beat them, and thrust back the multitude through the place called Bezetha, forcing their way to get in, and seize upon the temple and Antonia. Florus also, being desirous to get those places into his possession, led out of the king's palace such as were with him, and did his utmost to get to the citadel. But his attempt failed, for the people turned round on him, and checked his impetuosity, and as they stood upon the tops of their houses, threw their darts at the Romans. And as they were sorely galled by those weapons that came from above, and were not able to cut their way through the multitude, who blocked up the narrow streets, they retired to the camp which was at the palace.

§ 6. But the riotous were afraid lest Florus should come upon them again, and get possession of the temple through Antonia; so they got immediately upon those cloisters of the temple that joined Antonia, and cut them down. This cooled the avarice of Florus, for whereas he was eager to obtain the treasures of God, and so was desirous of getting into Antonia, he left off his attempt now the cloisters were broken down. And he sent for the high priests and the Sanhedrim, and told them that he was himself indeed going to leave the city, but that he would leave them as large a garrison as they should desire. Thereupon they promised that everything should be secure, and that they would make no innovations, in case he would leave them one cohort only, but not the one which had fought with the Jews, because the multitude bore it ill-will in consequence of what they had suffered from it; so he changed the cohort as they desired, and returned with the rest of his force to Cæsarea.

CHAP. XVI.

Cestius sends Neapolitanus the Tribune to see in what Condition the Affairs of the Jews were. Agrippa makes a Speech to the Jews to divert them from their intention of making War against the Romans.

§ 1.

FLORUS next tried another plan to bring about war, and wrote to Cestius, falsely accusing the Jews of revolting, and imputing the beginning of the former fight to them, and pretending that they had been its authors, whereas they had only been the sufferers. However, the rulers of Jerusalem were not silent upon this occasion, but also themselves wrote to Cestius, as did Berenice also, about the lawlessness of Florus against the city. And he, upon reading both accounts, consulted with his captains. Now some of them thought it best for Cestius to go up with his army, either to punish the revolt, if revolt there really was, or to make the Jews more settled if they remained faithful to the Romans, but he thought it best himself to send on one of his intimate friends to see the state of affairs, and to give him a faithful account of the state of mind of the Jews. So he sent one of his tribunes, whose name was Neapolitanus, who met with king Agrippa at Jamnia,<sup>1</sup> as he was returning from Alexandria, and told him who it was that sent him, and on what errand he was sent.

§ 2. Now at this time the high priests, and influential persons among the Jews, as also the Sanhedrim, came to greet king Agrippa. And after they had paid him their court, they lamented their own calamities, and related to him the barbarous treatment they had met with from Florus; at which Agrippa was really very indignant, but craftily transferred his anger towards the Jews whom he really pitied, wishing to abate their high thoughts of themselves, and by trying to make them believe that they had not been ill treated, to dissuade them from avenging themselves. And they, being of better understanding than the rest, and because of their wealth wishing for peace, understood that this rebuke which the king gave them was meant kindly. The people also came sixty furlongs out of Jerusalem, and greeted both Agrippa and Neapolitanus. But the wives of those that had been slain came running first of all and lamenting, and the people at their wailing turned to lamentation also, and besought Agrippa to assist them: they also loudly complained to Neapolitanus of the many miseries they had endured under Florus, and showed both him and Agrippa, when they had come into the city, how the market-place was desolate, and the houses plundered. They then persuaded Neapolitanus, by means of Agrippa, to walk round the city with only one attendant as far as Siloam,<sup>1</sup> that he might see for himself that the Jews submitted to all the rest of the Romans, and hated only Florus because of his exceeding barbarity to them. So he walked round, and had sufficient experience of the mildness of the people, and then went up to the temple, where he called the multitude together, and highly commended them for their fidelity to the Romans, and earnestly exhorted them to keep the peace; and having done such reverence to the temple of God as he was allowed to do, returned to Cestius.

§ 3. But as for the multitude of the Jews, they addressed themselves to king Agrippa and to the high priests, and begged they might have leave to send ambassadors to Nero against Florus, and not by their silence after such great slaughter raise the suspicion that they were disposed to revolt; for they said they would seem to have been the first beginners of the war, if they did not first show who it was that began it. And it appeared plain that they would not be quiet, if any body should hinder them from sending such an embassy. And although Agrippa thought it an invidious thing for them to appoint persons to go and accuse Florus, yet he did not think it for his interest to allow the Jews to drift into war. He therefore called the multitude together into the colonnade, and placed his sister Berenice in a conspicuous place on the house of the Asamonæans<sup>1</sup> (which was above the colonnade opposite the upper city, and a bridge joined the temple to the colonnade), and spoke to them as follows.

§ 4.<sup>2</sup> "If I saw that you were all determined to go to war with the Romans, and that the purest and most single-hearted of the people did not purpose to live in peace, I should not have come forward to speak to you, nor been so bold as to give you counsel. For all discourse that tends to persuade men to do what they ought to do is superfluous, when the hearers are all agreed to do what is wrong. But because some are impelled to war because they are young, and without experience of the miseries it brings, and others from an unreasonable expectation of regaining their liberty, and others from cupidity and the hope that, if affairs are in confusion, they may make gain at the expense of the weak, I have thought it right to convene you all together, and to say to you what I think to be for your advantage, that so the former may grow wiser and change their minds, and that the best men may come to no harm by the ill-advisedness of some. And let not any one raise a clamour against me, if what he hears me say does not please him. For as to those who are absolutely resolved upon revolt, it will still be in their power to retain the same sentiments after my exhortation, but my discourse will fall to the ground, even with relation to those that have a mind to hear me, unless you will all keep silence. I am well aware that many declaim on the injuries that have been done you by your Roman governors,

<sup>2</sup> In this speech of king Agrippa we have an authentic account of the extent and strength of the Roman empire when the Jewish war began. He is the same Agrippa who said to Paul, "Almost thou persuadedst me to be a Christian," Acts xxvi. 28, and of whom St. Paul said, "He was expert in all the customs and questions of the Jews," ver. 3. See another intimation of the limits of the same Roman empire, Jewish War, iii. 5, § 7.—W.

and pass encomiums on liberty. But before I examine who you are and against whom you intend to fight, I shall first separate this complication of pretexts. For if you aim at avenging yourselves on those who have done you injury, why do you sing the praises of liberty? But if you think all servitude intolerable, complaint against particular governors is superfluous; for even if they treated you with moderation, it would still seem equally disgraceful to be in servitude. Consider now these cases one by one, and see how little reason there is for your going to war; and first consider the accusations you make against your Roman governors. Now one ought to be submissive to those in authority, and not to give them any provocation. But when you reproach men greatly for small offences, you excite those whom you reproach to be your adversaries; for this will only make them leave off hurting you privately, and with some degree of modesty, and lay you waste openly. Now nothing so much mitigates strokes as bearing them with patience; and the quietness of those who are injured diverts injurious persons from afflicting. But suppose the Roman officials are injurious to you, and are incurably severe; yet it is not all the Romans who thus injure you, nor has the Emperor, against whom you are going to make war, injured you. For it is not by their command that any wicked governor is sent to you; for those who are in the West cannot see those that are in the East; nor indeed is it easy for them there even to hear of what is done in these parts. Now it is absurd to make war against a great many for the sake of one, and against such a mighty nation for a small cause, and that when they do not even know of what we complain. Nay, what we complain of may soon be corrected. For the same Roman governor will not continue for ever, and it is likely that his successors will come with more moderate inclinations. But if war be once begun, it is not easily laid down again, nor borne without calamities. Next, as to the desire of now recovering your liberty, it is somewhat late in the day for that, for you ought before to have striven earnestly not to have lost it. For the first experience of slavery is hard to endure, and the struggle that you might never have been subjected to it would have been just. But that slave who has once been brought into subjection, and then revolts, is rather a refractory slave than a lover of liberty. It was the proper time for doing all that was possible to keep out the Romans when Pompey first came into the country. But indeed our ancestors and their kings, though they were much better situated than you are, both as to money and bodies and souls, did not resist a small body of the Roman army. And yet do you, who have inherited obedience, and who are so much inferior in your circumstances to those who first submitted, venture to oppose the entire empire of the Romans? Even the Athenians, who, to preserve the liberty of Greece, did once set fire to their own city, and pursued as a fugitive in a single ship that haughty Xerxes (who sailed on the land and walked on the sea, and could not be contained by the seas, but led an army too broad for Europe), and broke the tremendous power of Asia at small Salamis,<sup>1</sup> are yet at this time servants to the Romans, and the orders sent from Italy manage the leading city of Greece. The Lacedæmonians also, after Thermopylæ<sup>2</sup> and Platæa<sup>3</sup> and Agesilaus' promenade through Asia, are content with the same masters. The Macedonians also, who still plume themselves on Philip and Alexander, and see the empire of the world panting for them, endure so great a change, and pay their homage to those whom fortune has advanced in their stead. Nay, ten thousand other nations have greater right than we to claim their liberty, and yet submit. You are the only people who think it a disgrace to be servants to those to whom all the world has submitted. What army do you rely on? What arms do you depend on? Where is your fleet, that may sweep the Roman seas? Where the treasures that will suffice for your attack on them? Do you think that you will war against Egyptians and Arabians? Will you not carefully reflect upon the strength of the Roman empire? Will you not compare with it your own weakness? Has not your army been often beaten even by the neighbouring nations, while the power of the Romans is invincible throughout the known world? Nay, rather, they seek for something still beyond that. For all the Euphrates is not a sufficient boundary for them on the east, nor the Ister<sup>1</sup> on the north, and for their southern limit Libya<sup>2</sup> has been traversed by them as far as countries uninhabited, as Gades<sup>3</sup> is their limit on the west; but they have sought for another world beyond the ocean, and have carried their arms as far as Britain which was never known before. What then are you? Are you richer than the Gauls, stronger than the Germans, wiser than the Greeks, more numerous than all men in the world? Why does confidence stir you up against the Romans? Some one will say, It is hard to endure slavery. Yes, but how much harder is this to the Greeks, who are esteemed the noblest of all people under the sun, yet, though they inhabit so large a country, obey six Roman fasces. The same is the case with the Macedonians, who have juster reason to claim their liberty than you have. What is the case with the five hundred cities of Asia? Do they not without any garrison pay their homage to a single governor and to the consular fasces? Why need I speak of the Heniochi<sup>4</sup> and Colchians,<sup>5</sup> and the nation of the Tauri,<sup>6</sup> and those that inhabit the Bosphorus,<sup>7</sup> and the nations about Pontus<sup>8</sup> and Mæotis,<sup>9</sup> who formerly knew not so much as a lord of their own, but are now subject to three thousand armed men, and forty long ships keep in peace the sea which before was unnavigable and tempestuous? How strong a plea may Bithynia, and Cappadocia, and the people of Pamphylia, the Lycians, and Cilicians,<sup>10</sup> put in for liberty! Yet they pay tribute without a struggle. tends in breadth five days' journey, and in length seven, and is much more rugged and easily defended than yours, and by the rigour of its cold keeps off armies, do not they submit to two thousand Romans in garrison? Are not the Illyrians, who inhabit the adjoining country as far as Dalmatia and the Ister, governed by barely two legions; by which also they put a stop to the incursions of the Dacians?<sup>1</sup> As for the Dalmatians, who made such frequent insurrections to regain their liberty, and who could never before be so thoroughly subdued but that they always gathered their forces together again and revolted, are they not now very quiet under one Roman legion? However, if great advantages might provoke any people to revolt, it might the Gauls most of all, who are so thoroughly fortified by nature, on the east by the Alps, on the north by the river Rhine, on the south by the Pyrenees, and on the west by the ocean. Now although these Gauls have such bulwarks, and have no fewer than three hundred and five nations among them, and have, one may say, the fountains of happiness within themselves, and send out plentiful streams of their good things over almost the whole world, yet they endure being tributary to the Romans, and deriving their prosperous condition from them; and they undergo this, not because they are of effeminate minds, or because they are of an ignoble stock, since they warred for eighty years to preserve their liberty; but because they were cowed not only by the power of the Romans, but by their good fortune, which does more for them than their arms. They are therefore kept in servitude by twelve hundred soldiers, a number hardly as many as their cities. Nor has the gold dug out of the mines of Spain sufficed to support the war to preserve Spanish liberty, nor their vast distance from the Romans by land and by sea, nor the martial tribes of the Lusitanians<sup>2</sup> and Cantabri,<sup>3</sup> nor the neighbouring ocean with its tide, which was yet terrible to the ancient inhabitants. Nay, the Romans have extended their arms beyond the pillars of Hercules, and have walked among the clouds on the Pyrenees, and have subdued these nations. And one legion is a sufficient guard for these people, although they were so hard to conquer and so remote from Rome. Who is there among you again who has not heard of the great number of the Germans? You have no doubt yourselves frequently observed their strength and size, since the Romans have them among their captives everywhere. Yet these Germans, who dwell in an immense country, who have spirit even greater than their bodies, and a soul that despises death, and who are in rage more fierce than wild beasts, have the Rhine as the boundary of their impetuosity, and are tamed by eight Roman legions. Such of them as were taken captive became their servants; and the rest of the entire nation were obliged to save themselves by flight. Do you also, who depend on the walls of Jerusalem, consider what a wall the Britons had. For the Romans sailed to them and subdued them, though they were surrounded by the ocean, and inhabited an island that is not less than our world, and four legions hold so large an island. And why should I say more? since even the Parthians, that most warlike race, lords of so many nations, and possessed of such mighty power, send hostages to the Romans; and you may see in Italy the nobility of the east on the pretext of peace submitting to serve them. Now as almost all people under the sun pay homage to the Roman arms, will you be the only people that will war against them? Will you disregard the fate of the Carthaginians, who, in the midst of their brags about the great Hannibal, and the nobility of their Phœnician extraction, fell by the hand of Scipio? Nor indeed have the Cyrenæans<sup>1</sup> of Lacedæmonian extraction, nor the Marmaridæ,<sup>2</sup> a nation extending as far as the regions uninhabitable for want of water, nor the Syrtæ,<sup>3</sup> terrible to such as barely hear them mentioned, nor the Nasamonēs<sup>1</sup> and Moors,<sup>2</sup> and the immense multitude of the Numidians,<sup>3</sup> been able to put a stop to Roman valour. As for the third part of the habitable earth [Africa] (whose nations are not easy even to number), which is bounded by the Atlantic Sea and the pillars of Hercules,<sup>4</sup> and supports an innumerable multitude of Ethiopians as far as the Red Sea, this the Romans have subdued entirely; and besides the annual fruits of the earth, which feed the population of Rome eight months in the year, its inhabitants over and above pay all sorts of tribute, and readily afford revenues for the necessities of the government, not like you esteeming subordination to Rome a disgrace, though they have but one Roman legion quartered among them. And indeed what need is there for showing you the power of the Romans in remote countries, when it is so easy to learn it from your neighbour Egypt, which extends as far as the Ethiopians and Arabia Felix,<sup>5</sup> and borders upon India, and contains seven million five hundred thousand men, besides the inhabitants of Alexandria, as may be inferred from the revenue of the poll tax; yet it is not ashamed to submit to the Roman government, although it has in Alexandria a great incentive to revolt, because it is so populous and rich, and also exceeding large, its length being thirty furlongs, and its breadth no less than ten; and it pays more tribute to the Romans in one month than you do in a year; and besides what it pays in money, it sends corn to Rome that feeds its population four months [in the year]: it is also fortified on all sides either by almost impassable deserts, or by seas that have no havens, or by rivers, or by lakes. But none of these things has been found too strong for the good fortune of the Romans; but two legions that are quartered in that city are a bridle both for the remoter parts of Egypt, and for the parts inhabited by the nobility of the Macedonians. Whom then will you take for your allies for the war from the uninhabited parts of the world? For all that are in the inhabited part of the world are Romans; unless indeed any of you extends his hopes beyond the Euphrates, and supposes that those of your own nation that dwell in Adiabene<sup>1</sup> will come to your assistance. But certainly they will not embarrass themselves with so great a war on unjustifiable grounds, nor, if they should follow such ill advice, will the Parthians permit them so to do; for it is their concern to maintain the truce that is between them and the Romans, and they will be supposed to violate its conditions, if any people under their rule march against the Romans. Nothing remains, therefore, but that you have recourse to divine assistance; but this also is already on the side of the Romans; for it is impossible that so vast an empire should be maintained without God's favour. Reflect also how impossible it will be for you zealously to observe your religious customs, which are hard to be observed even when you fight against those whom you are easily able to conquer; and how can you then most of all hope for God's assistance, when, by being forced to transgress his law, you will make him turn his face from you? And if you keep the sabbath days, and will not be prevailed on to do any thing on them, you will easily be taken, as your forefathers were by Pompey, who pushed on his siege most vigorously on those days on which the besieged rested. But if in time of war you transgress the laws of your country, I cannot tell on what account you will afterwards go to war. For your concern is but one, not to break any of your country's laws. And how will you call upon God to assist you, when you are voluntarily transgressing against his religion? Now all men enter into war either relying on divine or on human assistance; but since your going to war will cut off both those assistances, those that are for war choose evident destruction. What hinders you from slaying your children and wives with your own hands, and burning this most excellent native city of yours? For by this mad prank you would any way escape the reproach of being beaten. But it is well, my friends, it is well, while the vessel is still in the haven, to foresee impending dirty weather, and not to sail out of port into the midst of the storm to certain ruin (for we justly pity those that fall into great misfortunes without foreseeing them, but he who rushes into manifest ruin gains reproaches as well). For certainly no one can imagine that one can war by agreement, or that when the Romans have got you in their power, they will treat you with moderation, and will not rather, for an example to other nations, burn your holy city, and utterly destroy your whole nation. Nor will those of you who shall survive the war be able to find a place where to flee to, since all men have the Romans for their lords already, or are afraid they shall have hereafter. And the danger concerns not those Jews that dwell here only, but those that dwell in other cities also; for there is no people in the world who have not some of you among them. And all of these your enemies will slay if you go to war, and so every city which has Jews in it will be filled with slaughter because of the ill-advisedness of a few men; and they who slay them will be pardoned. And if that slaughter should not take place, consider how wicked a thing it is to take up arms against those that are so kind to you. Have pity, therefore, if not on your children and wives, yet upon this your metropolis, and its sacred precincts. Spare the temple, and preserve the sanctuary with its holy things for yourselves. For if the Romans get you in their power, they will no longer abstain from them, when their former forbearance shall have been so ungratefully requited. I call your sanctuary, and the holy angels of God, and our common country, to witness that I have not kept back any thing that is for your safety. And if you will follow my good advice, which you ought to do, you will have peace in common with me; but if you shall be led on by passion, you will incur danger which I shall be free from."

§ 5. When Agrippa had spoken thus, both he and his sister wept, and by their tears repressed a great deal of the violence of the people. But still they cried out that they would not fight against the Romans, but they would against Florus because of what they had suffered at his hands. To this Agrippa replied, that what they had already done was like warring against the Romans. "For you have not paid the tribute which is due to the Emperor, and you have cut off the porticoes from the tower Antonia. You will therefore prevent any occasion of revolt, if you will but join these together again, and pay your tribute. For the citadel does not now belong to Florus, nor are you to pay the tribute money to Florus."

CHAP. XVII.

How the War of the Jews with the Romans began. Also concerning Manahem.

§ 1.

THE people hearkened to this advice, and went up into the temple with the king and Berenice, and began to rebuild the porticoes; the rulers also and senators divided among them the villages, and collected the tribute, and soon got together forty talents, which was the sum that was deficient. And thus Agrippa put a stop for the present to the war which seemed imminent. Moreover, he tried to persuade the multitude to obey Florus, until the Emperor should send out his successor. But they were very provoked at this advice, and cast reproaches upon the king, and bade him go out of the city; nay, some of the riotous had the impudence to throw stones at him. So as the king saw that the violence of those that were for innovations was not to be restrained, and was very angry at the insults he had received, he sent their rulers and influential persons to Cæsarea<sup>1</sup> to Florus, that he might appoint whom he thought fit to collect the tribute in the country, and departed himself to his own kingdom.

§ 2. Now at this time some of those that mainly brought about the war assembled together and marched against a certain fortress called Masada.<sup>2</sup> They took it by treachery, and slew the Roman garrison that was in it, and put in some of their own party to keep it. At the same time Eleazar, the son of Ananias the high priest, a very bold youth, who was at that time governor of the temple, per-sualed those that officiated in the divine service to receive no gift or sacrifice for any foreigner. And this was the beginning of our war with the Romans; for the priests rejected sacrifices both on behalf of the Emperor and the Romans generally. And though many of the high priests and principal men besought them not to omit the customary sacrifice for their emperors, they would not be prevailed upon, relying much upon their numbers (for the most vigorous of the innovators co-operated with them), but paying the chief regard to Eleazar, the governor of the temple.

§ 3. Thereupon the influential persons assembled together and conferred with the high priests and the leading men among the Pharisees, and thinking all was at stake, and that their calamities were becoming incurable, took counsel what was to be done. And they determined to try what they could do with the riotous by words, and assembled the people before the brazen gate, which was the gate of the inner temple that faced east. And first they inveighed at some length against this attempt at a revolt, and at bringing so great a war upon their country, and next they showed their pretext to be unreasonable, for they said that their forefathers had mainly adorned their temple with donations bestowed on them by foreigners, and had always received what had been presented to them by foreign nations, and had not only not rejected any person's sacrifice, (for that was most impious,) but had also placed donations round the temple which were still visible, and had remained there so long a time. They added that they did now but irritate the Romans to take up arms against them, and invited them to make war upon them, and introduced a novel and strange divine worship, and determined to run the hazard of having their city condemned for impiety, if among the Jews only no foreigner might either sacrifice or worship. And whereas if such a law should ever be introduced in the case of an individual, they would be indignant at it, as an instance of definite inhumanity, they had no regard to the Romans and the Emperor being excluded from such privileges! However, they could not but fear, if they rejected their sacrifices, that they would not be allowed to offer their own, and that their city would be put out of the ban of the empire, unless they grew wiser quickly, and restored the sacrifices as formerly, and indeed amended their insolence before the report of it came to the ears of those that had been insulted.

§ 4. And as they said these things, they produced those priests that were skilful in the customs of their country, who declared that all their forefathers had received sacrifices from foreigners. But not one of the innovators would hearken to what was said, nay, even those that ministered in the temple would not attend to their divine service, but tried to stir up war. So the influential persons, perceiving that the sedition was too much for them to put down, and that the danger which would arise from the Romans would come upon themselves first, tried to secure their own personal safety, and sent some ambassadors to Florus, the chief of whom was Simon the son of Ananias, and others to Agrippa, among whom the most eminent were Saul and Antipas and Costobarus, who were of the king's kindred. And they begged both Florus and Agrippa to come with an army to the city, and cut off the sedition before it should grow too great to be put down. Now this terrible message was good news to Florus, and because his design was to kindle a war, he gave the ambassadors no answer at all. But Agrippa was equally solicitous for those that were revolting, and for those against whom the war was being stirred up, and wished to preserve the Jews for the Romans, and the temple and metropolis for the Jews; he was also aware that it was not for his own advantage that the disturbances should continue, so he sent three thousand horse to the assistance of the people from Auranitis and Batanæa and Trachonitis,<sup>1</sup> under Darius the master of his horse, and Philip (the son of Jacimus) the general of his army.

§ 5. Upon this the influential persons and the high priests, and all those of the multitude that desired peace, took courage, and occupied the upper city; for the seditious party were masters of the lower city and the temple. And they hurled stones and slings perpetually against one another, and threw darts continually on both sides; and sometimes they made sorties by troops, and fought hand to hand, the seditious being superior in boldness, but the king's soldiers in skill. These last strove chiefly to make themselves masters of the temple, and to drive out those who profaned the sanctuary; while the seditious with Eleazar, besides what they had already, strove to get possession of the upper city. Thus there was perpetual slaughter on both sides for seven days; and each side kept the ground they had won.

§ 6. Now the next day was the festival of Xylophory, at which the custom was for every one to bring wood for the altar (that there might never be a want of fuel for the fire which was unquenchable and always burning); upon that day the seditious party excluded their adversaries from the observance of this part of religion. And when they had joined to themselves many of the Sicarii, (that was the name given to such robbers as had under their bosoms swords called Sicæ,) who rushed up with those that were not so well armed, they grew bolder, and carried their undertaking further; insomuch, that the king's soldiers were overpowered by their numbers and daring, and gave way, and were forced out of the upper city. They then attacked and set fire to the house of Ananias the high priest, and to the palaces of Agrippa and Berenice: after which they set fire to the archives, hastening to burn the bonds belonging to creditors, and so to cancel all debts; and this was done to gain over the multitude of debtors, and that they might persuade the poor to join with less fear in insurrection against the more wealthy. And when the keepers of the records fled away, they set fire to them. And when they had thus burnt down the nerves of the city, they rushed against the enemy. Thereupon some of the influential persons and high priests went into vaults under ground and concealed themselves, while others fled with the king's soldiers to the upper palace, and shut the gates immediately, among whom were Ananias the high priest, and his brother Ezekias, and the ambassadors that had been sent to Agrippa. And now the seditious were contented with the victory they had got, and the buildings they had burnt down, and proceeded no further.

§ 7. But on the next day, which was the fifteenth day of the month Lous, they made an assault upon Antonia, and besieged the garrison which was in it two days, and took it, and slew them, and set the citadel on fire; after which they marched to the palace, where the king's soldiers were fled, and divided themselves into four bodies, and made an attack upon the walls. As for those that were within, none had the courage to sally out, because those that assaulted them were so numerous; but they posted themselves among the breast-works and turrets, and shot at the besiegers, whereby many of the robbers fell under the walls. Nor did they cease to fight with one another either by night or by day, as the seditious supposed that those within would be exhausted for want of food, and those within supposed the besiegers would be worn out by their exertions.

§ 8. In the mean time one Manahem, the son of Judas who was called the Galilæan, (who was a very cunning sophist, and had formerly reproached the Jews in the days of Cyrenius, because after God they were subject to the Romans,) took some influential persons with him, and went to Masada, where he broke open king Herod's armoury, and gave arms not only to his own people, but to other robbers also, and made them his body-guards, and returned with the state of a king to Jerusalem, and became the leader of the sedition, and directed the siege. But they wanted proper instruments, and it was evidently impracticable to undermine the wall, because the darts came down upon them from above. So they dug a mine from a great distance under one of the towers and made it totter, and having done that, they set on fire what was combustible, and left it, and when the foundations were burnt below, the tower fell down suddenly. But then another wall was apparent, that had been built within; for the besieged were aware of what they were doing, and probably the tower shook as it was being undermined, so they made for themselves another fortification. And when the besiegers saw this unexpectedly, as they thought they had already gained the place, they were dismayed, but those that were within sent to Manahem, and to the other leaders of the sedition, and asked that they might go out upon capitulation. And this was granted to the king's soldiers and their own countrymen only, who went out accordingly, but the Romans that were left alone were greatly dejected. For they were not able to force their way through so great a multitude, and they thought it would be a disgrace to ask them to give them their right hand for their security, and besides, if they should give it them, they could not depend upon it. So they deserted their camp, as it was easy to capture, and fled to the royal towers, called respectively Hippius and Phasaelus and Mariamne. But Manahem and his men rushed to the place where the soldiers had fled from, and slew as many of them as they could come up with before they got up to the towers, and plundered their baggage, and set fire to their camp. This was done on the sixth day of the month Gorpiaeus.

§ 9. And the next day the high priest Ananias was captured where he had concealed himself in an aqueduct of the royal palace, and was slain with his brother Ezekias by the robbers: and the seditious diligently guarded the towers, lest any of the soldiers should escape. Now the overthrow of the strong places and the death of the high priest Ananias so puffed up Manahem, that he became barbarously cruel, and, as he thought he had no rival to dispute the management of affairs with him, he was an insupportable tyrant. But Eleazar and his party, after they had interchanged their ideas, rose up against him, on the ground that it was not right, as they had revolted from the Romans out of the desire of liberty, to surrender that liberty to any of their own people, and to put up with a master, who, though he should be guilty of no violence, was yet meaner than themselves; as also, if they were obliged to set some one over their public affairs, it was fit they should give that privilege to any one rather than to him. So they made an assault upon him in the temple; for he had gone up there to worship in a pompous manner, adorned with royal garments, and had his followers with him armed. And when Eleazar and his party fell violently upon him, so did also the rest of the people, and taking up stones to attack him with they threw them at the sophist, for they thought if he were once killed that the entire sedition would fall to the ground. Now Manahem and his party made resistance for a while, but when they perceived that the whole multitude were rushing upon them, they fled which way every one was able: and those that were taken were slain, and those that hid themselves were searched for. But a few got off safe and privately escaped to Masada,<sup>1</sup> among whom was Eleazar, the son of Jairus, who was akin to Manahem, and acted the part of a tyrant at Masada afterwards. As for Manahem himself, he fled to the place called Ophla,<sup>2</sup> and there lay skulking in private; but they took him alive, and dragged him out into the open, and tortured him with many sorts of torments, and killed him, and they did the same to those that were captains under him also, and particularly to the principal instrument of his tyranny, whose name was Absalom.

§ 10. The people then, as I said, co-operated in this, hoping to put a stop to the whole sedition; but others were in no haste to put an end to the war, but hoped to prosecute it with less danger, now they had slain Manahem. It is true, that when the people earnestly desired that they would leave off besieging the soldiers, they were the more earnest about it, till Metilius, who was the Roman general, sent to Eleazar and his party, asking for their lives only, and agreeing to deliver up their arms and whatever else they had with them. The others readily complied with their request, and sent to them Gorion the son of Nicomedes, and Ananias the son of Sadduk, and Judas the son of Jonathan, to give them the security of their right hands and of their oaths. After this Metilius brought down his soldiers, who, as long as they were in arms, were not meddled with by any of the seditious, nor was there any manifestation of treachery; but as soon as, according to the articles of capitulation, they had all laid down their shields and swords, and without any further suspicion of harm were going away, Eleazar's men attacked them in a violent manner, and surrounded them and slew them, while they neither resisted nor begged for mercy, but only cried out upon this breach of the articles of capitulation and their oaths. And thus were all these men barbarously butchered except Metilius, for when he begged for mercy, and promised that he would turn Jew and be circumcised, they saved him only alive. The loss to the Romans was but light, there being no more than a few slain out of an immense army, but still it appeared to be a prelude to the Jews' own destruction. And men made public lamentation when they saw that the causes of the war were incurable, and that the city was polluted with such abominations, from which it was but reasonable to expect some wrath from God, even though they should escape vengeance from the Romans, and the city was full of dejection, and every one of the moderate men in it were in great alarm, as likely themselves to be punished for the seditious. And indeed it so happened, that this butchery took place on the sabbath day, on which day the Jews have a respite from their works on account of divine worship.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Calamities and Slaughter that came upon the Jews.

§ 1.

NOW the people of Cæsarea<sup>1</sup> slew the Jews that were among them the very same day and hour, as if by divine Providence, so that in one hour's time above twenty thousand Jews were killed, and all Cæsarea was emptied of them. And Florus arrested such as ran away, and sent them in bonds to the dockyards. At this stroke that the Jews received at Cæsarea, the whole nation was greatly enraged; so they divided themselves into several parties, and laid waste the villages of the Syrians, and their neighbouring cities, Philadelphia<sup>2</sup> and Sebonitis<sup>3</sup> and Gerasa<sup>4</sup> and Pella<sup>5</sup> and Scythopolis.<sup>6</sup> And after them they attacked Gadara<sup>7</sup> and Hippos<sup>8</sup> and Gaulanitis,<sup>9</sup> and some cities they destroyed, and some they set on fire, and then went to Kedasa<sup>1</sup> which belonged to the Tyrians, and to Ptolemais<sup>2</sup> and Gaba<sup>3</sup> and Cæsarea. Nor were either Sebaste<sup>4</sup> or Ascalon<sup>5</sup> able to oppose their violence; but when they had burnt these to the ground, they entirely demolished Anthedon<sup>6</sup> and Gaza.<sup>7</sup> Many also of the villages that were round every one of these cities were plundered, and an immense slaughter made of the men who were taken in them.

§ 2. However, the Syrians were even with the Jews in the number of the men whom they slew, for they killed those whom they took in their cities, and that not only out of the hatred they bore them, as formerly, but now to prevent the danger under which they were from them. And dire confusion spread through all Syria, and every city was divided into two armies encamped against one another, and the preservation of the one party lay in the destruction of the other; so the days were spent in shedding blood, and the nights in fear, which last was of the two the more terrible. For when the Syrians thought they had killed all the Jews, they were suspicious also of the Judaizers, and as each side did not care to slay those whom they only suspected on the other, so did they greatly fear them when they were mixed with the others, as if they were certainly foreigners. Moreover, desire of gain was a provocation even to such as had of old appeared very mild and gentle to kill the opposite party; for they plundered without fear the effects of the slain, and carried off the spoils of those whom they slew to their own houses, as if they had been gained on the field of battle; and he was esteemed a man of mark who got the greatest share, as having overcome the greatest number of enemies. It was common to see cities full of dead bodies lying unburied, and those of old men and infants, all dead and scattered about together; dead women also lay amongst them, without any covering for their nakedness; and the whole province was full of inexpressible calamities, while the threats of still more barbarous practices everywhere inspired greater terror than what had been already perpetrated.

§ 3. Hitherto the conflicts had been between Jews and foreigners; but when they made a raid upon Scythopolis,<sup>1</sup> they found Jews that acted as enemies; for they stood in battle array with those of Scythopolis, and preferred their own safety to the tie of kindred, and fought against their own countrymen. However, their excessive zeal was suspected. For those of Scythopolis were afraid that they would make an assault upon the city in the night-time, and so, to their great detriment, would excuse themselves to their fellow-countrymen for their defection from them. So they commanded them, if they would confirm their concord and demonstrate their fidelity to them, who were of a different nation, to go out of the city with their families to a neighbouring grove. And when they had done as they were commanded, without suspecting any thing, the people of Scythopolis were quiet for two days, to tempt them to be secure, but on the third night they watched their opportunity, and cut all their throats, some being off their guard, and some asleep. The number that was slain was above thirteen thousand, and they plundered them of all that they had.

§ 4. It is worth relating what befell Simon, who was the son of one Saul (a man of reputation among the Jews), and eminent for strength of body and boldness, although he abused them both to the hurt of his fellow-countrymen. For he went out every day and slew a great many of the Jews of Scythopolis, and frequently put them to flight, and became himself alone the cause of his army's conquering. But a just punishment overtook him for the slaughter of those of the same nation as himself. For when the people of Scythopolis surrounded them and threw their darts at them in the grove, he drew his sword, but did not attack any of the enemy (for he saw that he could do nothing against such a multitude), but he cried out in a very moving manner, and said, "O, ye people of Scythopolis,

I deservedly suffer for what I have done with relation to you, in giving you such proof of my fidelity to you, by slaying so many of those that were my kinsmen. Wherefore we very justly experience the perfidiousness of foreigners, as we treated our own nation most impiously. I will therefore die, polluted wretch as I am, by mine own hands; for it is not fit I should die by the hand of our enemies; and the same action will be to me both a punishment for my great crimes, and a testimony of my courage to my commendation, that so no one of our enemies may be able to brag that it was he that slew me, or insult me as I fall." When he had said this, he looked round about him upon his family, with eyes of mingled pity and rage (that family consisted of his wife and children and aged parents); and first he took his father by his grey hairs, and ran his sword through him, and after him he did the same to his mother, who was not reluctant, and after them he did the same to his wife and children, each all but offering themselves to his sword, being desirous to anticipate the enemy. And when he had slain all his family, he stood upon their bodies in the sight of all, and stretching out his right hand, that his action might be observed by all, he sheathed his entire sword in his own bowels. This young man is worthy of pity on account of the strength of his body and courage of his soul; but suffered what he deserved because of his fidelity to foreigners.

§ 5. Besides this butchery at Scythopolis, each of the other cities rose up against the Jews that were in them, for those of Ascalon<sup>1</sup> slew two thousand five hundred, and those of Ptolemais<sup>2</sup> slew two thousand, and put not a few into bonds; and those of Tyre<sup>3</sup> put a great number to death, but kept a greater number in prison; moreover, those of Hippos<sup>4</sup> and Gadara<sup>5</sup> did the same, for they put to death the boldest of the Jews, but kept those of whom they were afraid in custody; as did the rest of the cities of Syria, according as each of them either hated or feared the Jews. Only the Antiochians, the Sidonians, and Apameans,<sup>6</sup> spared those that dwelt with them, and had not the heart either to kill any of the Jews, or to put them in bonds. Perhaps indeed they spared them because their own numbers were so great that they despised their attempts, but I think most of this favour was owing to their pitying those whom they did not see making any innovations. As for the Gerasenes, they did no harm to those that abode with them, and conducted those who had a mind to go away as far as their borders.

§ 6. There was also a plot laid against the Jews in Agrippa's kingdom. He had himself gone to Antioch to Cestius Gallus, but had left one of his companions, whose name was Noarus, who was akin to king Sohemus, to see to public affairs. Now there came seventy men from Batanæa,<sup>1</sup> who were the most considerable of their citizens for their birth and understanding, and asked for some troops, that if any tumult should happen, they might have about them a guard sufficient to restrain the insurgents. Then Noarus sent out some of the king's armed men by night, and slew all those seventy, which bold action he ventured upon without consulting Agrippa, and was such a lover of money, that he chose to be so wicked to his own countrymen, although he brought ruin on the kingdom thereby: and he continued thus cruelly treating the nation contrary to the laws, until Agrippa was informed of it, who did not indeed dare to put him to death because of Sohemus, but deposed him from his official position. As to the seditious, they seized the fortress which was above Jericho, called Cypros,<sup>2</sup> and cut the throats of the garrison, and utterly demolished the fortifications. And about the same time, the multitude of the Jews that were at Machærus<sup>3</sup> urged the Romans who were in garrison to evacuate the place and deliver it up to them. And they, being afraid that the place would be taken by storm, made an agreement with them to depart upon certain conditions; and when they had obtained the security they desired, they delivered up the citadel, which the people of Machærus fortified with a garrison and occupied themselves.

§ 7. As for Alexandria, the dissension between the people of that place and the Jews was perpetual from the time when Alexander [the Great], finding the Jews very ready in assisting him against the Egyptians, gave them as a reward for that assistance equal privileges in the city with the Greeks themselves. And this honour continued to them under his successors, who also set apart for them a particular place, that they might live purer, if less mixed up with foreigners, and they gave them this further privilege, that they should be called Macedonians. And when the Romans got possession of Egypt, neither the first Cæsar, nor any of his successors, thought of diminishing the honours which Alexander had bestowed on the Jews. But still conflicts perpetually arose between them and the Greeks, and although the governors of both these nations did every day punish many of them, yet did the sedition grow worse; but at this time especially, when there were tumults in other places also, the disorders among them broke out into a greater flame. For when the Alexandrians had once a public assembly, to deliberate about an embassy they were sending to Nero, a great number of Jews and Greeks came flocking promiscuously to the amphitheatre; and when the Greeks noticed the Jews, they immediately cried out, and called them their enemies, and said they came as spies upon them, and rushed at them and laid violent hands upon them. As for the rest of the Jews they were slain as they ran away; but there were three men whom they captured and hauled along to burn them alive; but all the Jews came in a body to defend them, and at first threw stones at the Greeks, but after that they took torches, and rushed with violence into the amphitheatre, and threatened that they would burn the people to a man; and would soon have done so, had not Tiberius Alexander, the governor of the city, restrained their passion. However, he did not first teach them wisdom by arms, but privately sent among them some of the principal men, and entreated them to be quiet, and not provoke the Roman army against them. But the seditious made a jest of the entreaty of Tiberius, and railed at him.

§ 8. Now when he perceived that those who were for innovation would not be pacified till some great calamity should overtake them, he let loose upon them those two Roman legions that were in the city, and together with them five thousand other soldiers, who by chance were there from Libya<sup>1</sup> to the ruin of the Jews. And he permitted them not only to kill them, but to plunder them of what they had, and to set fire to their houses. These soldiers rushed violently into that part of the city that was called Delta (where the Jews lived together), and did as they were bidden, though not without bloodshed. For the Jews got together, and set those that were the best armed among them in the front, and made resistance for a great while; but when once they gave way, they were destroyed freely, and their destruction was complete, some being taken in the open, and others forced into their houses, which were first plundered of what was in them, and then set on fire by the Romans. And no mercy was shown to infants, or regard paid to the aged, but they went on slaughtering persons of every age, till all the place overflowed with blood, and fifty thousand lay dead upon heaps. Nor would the remainder have been spared had they not betaken themselves to supplication, when Alexander commiserated their condition, and gave orders to the Romans to retire. And they, being accustomed to obey orders, left off killing at the first intimation; but the populace of Alexandria bore such excessive hatred to the Jews, that it was difficult to recall them, and it was a hard thing to make them leave even their dead bodies.

§ 9. Such was the miserable calamity which at this time befell the Jews at Alexandria. Thereupon Cestius thought fit no longer to lie still, as the Jews were everywhere involved in war: so he took from Antioch<sup>2</sup> the twelfth legion entire, and from each of the rest he selected two thousand, with six cohorts of foot and four troops of horse, besides those auxiliary troops which were sent by the kings; of which Antiochus sent two thousand horse, and three thousand foot, all archers; and Agrippa sent the same number of foot, and one thousand horse; Sohemus also followed with four thousand, a third of which were horse, and the rest archers; and thus did Cestius set out for Ptolemais.<sup>3</sup>

There were also great numbers of auxiliaries gathered together from various cities, who indeed had not the same skill in war as the soldiers, but made up in zeal and hatred to the Jews what they wanted in skill. Agrippa himself also was with Cestius, both as a guide in his march over the country, and an adviser of what was fit to be done. And Cestius took part of his forces, and marched against Zabulon,<sup>1</sup> a strong city of Galilee, which was called the city of men, and divides Ptolemais from our nation. This city he found deserted by its men, the population having fled to the mountains, and full of all sorts of good things; these he gave leave to the soldiers to plunder, and set fire to the city, although its houses were of admirable beauty, and built like those in Tyre and Sidon and Berytus.<sup>2</sup> After this he overran all the country, and plundered whatever came in his way, and set fire to the villages round about, and returned to Ptolemais. But when the Syrians, and especially those of Berytus, continued plundering, the Jews plucked up their courage again, for they knew that Cestius had retired, and unexpectedly fell upon those that were left behind, and cut to pieces about two thousand of them.

§ 10. And Cestius himself after leaving Ptolemais arrived at Cæsarea, but he sent on part of his army to Joppa,<sup>3</sup> and gave order, that if they could surprise that city they should occupy it; but if the citizens should perceive they were coming to attack them, they were then to wait for him and the rest of the army. So some of them made a forced march by the sea-side, and some by land, and so coming upon them on both sides, they took the city with ease: and as the inhabitants had made no provision beforehand for flight, and far less for fighting, the soldiers fell upon them, and slew them all, with their families, and then plundered and burnt the city. And the number of the slain was eight thousand four hundred. In like manner Cestius sent also a considerable body of horse to the toparchy of Narbata<sup>4</sup> that was near Cæsarea, who devastated the country, and slew a great multitude of its inhabitants, and plundered what they had, and burnt their villages.

§ 11. Cestius also sent Gallus, the commander of the twelfth legion, into Galilee, entrusting to him as large a force as he thought sufficient to subdue that nation. He was received by Sepphoris,<sup>1</sup> the strongest city of Galilee, with acclamations of joy, and at this wise conduct the rest of the cities were quiet. But the insurgents and robbers fled to the mountain which lies in the very middle of Galilee opposite Sepphoris, and is called Asamon.<sup>2</sup> And Gallus led his forces against them. Now while these men were on higher ground, they easily threw their darts upon the Romans as they approached them, and slew about two hundred of them; but when the Romans made a détour and got on higher ground still, they were soon beaten, nor could they who had only light armour on stand a hand to hand fight with men armed all over; nor when they were beaten could they escape the enemy's horse; so that only some few concealed themselves in certain places hard to get at, while over two thousand were slain.

CHAP. XIX.

What Cestius did against the Jews; and how, upon his besieging Jerusalem, he most unexpectedly retired from that City. Also how he was harassed by the Jews in his Retreat.

§ 1.

THEN Gallus, seeing nothing more that looked like innovation in Galilee, returned with his army to Cæsarea. But Cestius removed from there with his whole army, and marched to Antipatris;<sup>3</sup> and when he heard that a large Jewish force was concentrated in a certain tower called Aphek,<sup>4</sup> he sent a party on to fight them. But they dispersed the Jews by fright before it came to a battle: so they went on, and finding their camp deserted burnt it, as also the villages that lay near it. And when Cestius had marched from Antipatris to Lydda,<sup>5</sup> he found the city empty of its men, for the whole multitude had gone up to Jerusalem for the feast of Tabernacles. But he slew fifty of those that showed themselves, and burnt the city, and then marched on, and ascending by Beth-horon,<sup>1</sup> pitched his camp at a certain place called Gabao,<sup>2</sup> fifty furlongs from Jerusalem.

§ 2. Now when the Jews saw the war already approaching their metropolis, they left the feast and betook themselves to their arms, and taking courage greatly from their numbers, rushed into the fight without order and with a great noise, and without paying any consideration to the rest of the seventh day, although the Sabbath was the day to which they paid usually the greatest regard. But the fury which made them forget their piety made them prevail over their enemies in the fight. With such violence indeed did they fall upon the Romans, as to break their ranks, and march through the midst of them, making great slaughter as they went. And had not the horse and such of the foot as were not yet tired out in the action wheeled round, and come up to the aid of that part of the army which had not yet given way, Cestius and his whole army would have been in danger. However, five hundred and fifteen of the Romans were slain, of whom four hundred were foot and the rest horse, while the Jews lost only twenty-two, of whom the most valiant were the kinsmen of Monobazus king of Adiabene,<sup>3</sup> whose names were Monobazus and Cenedæus, and next to them were Niger of Peræa,<sup>4</sup> and Silas of Babylon (who had deserted to the Jews from king Agrippa, for he had formerly served in his army). When the Jews were checked in front they retired into the city, but Simon, the son of Gioras, fell upon the rear of the Romans, as they were ascending Beth-horon, and threw it into disorder, and carried off many of the beasts of burden, and led them into the city. And as Cestius tarried there three days, the Jews seized upon the elevated parts of the city, and guarded the entrances into the city, and appeared resolved not to remain quiet, when once the Romans should begin to march.

§ 3. Thereupon Agrippa observing that the Romans were in danger, as such an immense multitude of their enemies occupied the mountains, determined to try the effect of argument on the Jews; thinking that he should either persuade them all to desist from fighting, or at least detach from the opposite party all that did not agree with them. So he sent Borcæus and Phœbus, the persons of his party that were best known to them, and promised them the right hand of Cestius, and the entire forgiveness of the Romans for what they had done amiss, if they would throw away their arms, and come over to them. But the insurgents, fearing that the whole multitude in hope of indemnity would go over to Agrippa, proceeded to kill his ambassadors. Accordingly they slew Phœbus before he said a word, but Borcæus was only wounded, and prevented his fate by flight; and those of the people who were angry at this the seditious beat with stones and clubs, and drove before them into the city.

§ 4. Then Cestius, observing that this discord among the Jews gave him a good opportunity to attack them, led forward his whole army, and put the Jews to flight, and pursued them to Jerusalem. He then pitched his camp upon the elevation called Scopos,<sup>1</sup> which was seven furlongs from the city, but he did not assault the city for three days, expecting perhaps that those within would surrender, and meantime he sent out a great many of his soldiers into the neighbouring villages to seize corn; but on the fourth day, which was the thirtieth day of the month Hyperberetæus, when he had put his army in battle-array, he led it into the city. Now the people were kept under by the insurgents; and the insurgents themselves were greatly dismayed at the good order of the Romans, and retired from the suburbs to the inner parts of the city and the temple. But when Cestius was come into the city, he set the part called Bezetha, which is also called Cænopolis,<sup>1</sup> on fire, as he did also what was called the Timber-market: after which he went into the upper city, and pitched his camp opposite the royal palace.<sup>2</sup> And had he but at this very time attempted to get within the walls by force, he would have taken the city at once, and the war would have been put an end to. But Tyrannius Priscus, the quarter-master of the army, and a great number of the officers of the horse, had been bribed by Florus, and diverted him from that attempt; and that was why the war lasted so very long, and why the Jews were involved in such irremediable calamities.

§ 5. Meantime many of the principal men of the city, persuaded by Ananus the son of Jonathan, invited Cestius into the city, promising to open the gates to him. But he neglected this offer, partly from his anger at the Jews, and partly because he did not altogether trust them, so he delayed the matter so long that the insurgents perceived the treachery, and threw Ananus and those of his party down from the wall, and drove them into their houses, pelting them with stones, while they themselves stood at regular intervals on the towers, and threw their darts at those that were trying to get over the wall. So the Romans made their attack against the wall on all sides for five days, but to no purpose; but on the sixth day Cestius took a great many picked men and archers, and attempted to break into the temple on its north side. But the Jews beat them off from the portico, and repulsed them several times when they got near the wall, till at last the shower of darts beat them back and made them retire. But the front rank of the Romans rested their shields upon the wall, and those that were behind them rested their shields on them, and those that were next did the same, and so guarded themselves by forming what they call Testudo,<sup>3</sup> upon which the darts that were thrown fell and glided off without doing any harm; so the soldiers undermined the wall without being themselves hurt, and got all things ready for setting fire to the gate of the temple.

§ 6. And now a dreadful panic seized upon the insurgents, insomuch that many of them fled at once from the city, as though it were likely to be taken immediately. And the people upon this took courage, and where the wicked of the city gave way, there did they come to open the gates, and to admit Cestius as their benefactor, who, had he but continued the siege a little longer, would certainly have taken the city at once. But it was, I suppose, owing to the aversion God had already to the sanctuary because of the wicked of the city, that he hindered the war being put an end to that very day.

§ 7. Cestius, however, not knowing either the despair of the besieged, or the friendly spirit of the people, suddenly recalled his soldiers, and despairing of taking the city, most unexpectedly retired from it, without having received any reverse. And at this unexpected retreat of his, the robbers resumed their courage, and harassed the rear of his army, and slew a great number both of horse and foot. That night Cestius bivouacked at the camp which was at Scopos, and as he retired further next day, he thereby invited the enemy still more to follow him, who pressed upon his rear and slew the men there, and also fell upon each flank and threw darts at them obliquely. Nor durst those that were in the rear turn back upon those who wounded them behind, for they imagined that the number of those that pursued them was immense; nor did they venture to check those that pressed them on each side, because they were heavy armed and afraid of breaking their ranks, and because they saw the Jews were light armed and so nimble in attack, and this was why the Romans suffered greatly, without being able to retaliate upon their enemies. So they were galled all the way, and those that fell out of their ranks were slain, and many perished thus, among whom were Priscus, the commander of the sixth legion, and Longinus the tribune of the soldiers, and Æmilius Jucundus, the commander of a troop of horse. And it was not without difficulty that they got to Gabao,<sup>1</sup> their former camp, and that not without the loss of most of their baggage. There Cestius stayed two days, and was in great distress to know what he should do, but when, on the third day, he saw a still greater number of enemies, and all the parts round about full of Jews, he perceived that delay would be to his detriment, and that if he stayed any longer there, he should have still more enemies upon him.

§ 8. That therefore he might flee the faster, he gave orders to abandon whatever might hinder the army's march. So they killed the mules and other beasts of burden, excepting those that carried the darts and engines of war, for they retained these for their own use, principally because they were afraid that the Jews would seize upon them. He then led on his army to Beth-horon.<sup>1</sup> Now the Jews did not so much press upon them when they were in large open places, but when they were crowded together in their descent through defiles, then some of them got before and hindered them from getting out of them, and others of them thrust the rear ranks down into the ravines, and the whole multitude lined the heights on each side of their march, and covered the Roman army with their darts. In these circumstances the foot knew not how to defend themselves, and danger pressed the horse still more, for they were so shot at with darts that they could not keep their ranks as they marched along the road, and the heights were so steep that the cavalry were not able to get at the enemy. And on each side were precipices and ravines into which they slipped and rolled down, and they had neither place to flee to nor any plan for their defence; till the distress they were in was at last so great, that they betook themselves to lamentation, and to such mournful wailing as men use in the utmost despair; and this was re-echoed by the cheers and shouts of the Jews, who were at once both glad and angry. Indeed the Jews would have almost taken Cestius' entire army prisoners, had not night come on, when the Romans fled to Beth-horon, and the Jews occupied all the places round about, and watched for their coming out.

§ 9. Then Cestius, despairing of an open road, deliberated how best he might run away, and when he had picked out four hundred of the most courageous of his soldiers, he placed them at the intrenchments, and gave orders, that when they mounted guard they should set up their standards, so that the Jews might believe that the entire army was there still, while he himself took the rest of his men with him, and quietly marched thirty furlongs. But when the Jews perceived in the morning that the camp was deserted, they rushed at the four hundred who had deluded them, and quickly slew them with their darts, and pursued after Cestius. But he had already got the start of them during a great part of the night, and marched still quicker when it was day; so that the soldiers in their panic and fear left behind them their battering-rams and engines for throwing missiles, and most of their other matériel of war, which the Jews then captured and afterwards used against those that had left them behind. And they went on pursuing the Romans as far as Antipatris,<sup>1</sup> after which, seeing they could not overtake them, they returned, and took the engines, and spoiled the dead bodies, and, gathering the prey together which the Romans had left behind them, returned singing songs of triumph to their metropolis: for they themselves had lost a few only, while they had slain of the Romans five thousand three hundred foot and three hundred and eighty horse. This defeat happened on the eighth day of the month Dios, in the twelfth year of the reign of Nero.

CHAP. XX.

Cestius sends Ambassadors to Nero. The People of Damascus slay those Jews that dwelt with them. The People of Jerusalem, after they had left off pursuing Cestius, return to the City, and get things ready for its Defence, and make a great many Generals for their Armies, and among others Josephus, the Writer of these Books. Some Account of his Administration.

§ 1.

AFTER this calamity had befallen Cestius, many of the most eminent of the Jews swam away from the city, as from a ship going to sink. Thus Costobarus and Saul, who were brothers, ran away from the city, with Philip the son of Jacimus, who was the commander of king Agrippa's forces, and joined Cestius. As to how Antipas, who was besieged with them in the king's palace, would not flee with them, and was afterwards slain by the insurgents, I shall relate hereafter. And Cestius sent Saul and his friends, at their own request, to Achaia<sup>1</sup> to Nero, to inform him of the great distress they were in, and to transfer the blame of the war upon Florus, for he hoped to make his own danger less by stirring up Nero's anger against Florus.

§ 2. Meantime the people of Damascus, when they heard of this slaughter of the Romans, set about butchering the Jews that dwelt among them. And as they had them already cooped up together in the gymnasium because of their suspicion of them, they thought they should meet with no difficulty in the attempt; but they were afraid of their own wives, who were almost all of them addicted to the Jewish religion, so their greatest concern was how to conceal this from them. And they fell upon the Jews, who were ten thousand in number, and all of them unarmed, and in a narrow place, and cut their throats in one hour with impunity.

§ 3. As to those who had pursued after Cestius, when they had returned to Jerusalem, they induced those that favoured the Romans, some by violence and some by persuasion, to join with them, and assembled in great numbers in the temple, and appointed several generals for the war. Joseph also, the son of Gorion, and Ananus the high priest, were chosen as supreme governors of all affairs within the city, and with a particular charge to repair the walls of the city. For they did not put Eleazar the son of Simon at the head of affairs, although he had got in his possession the spoil taken from the Romans, and the money taken from Cestius, together with a great part of the public treasures, because they saw he aimed to be a king, and that his followers behaved like body-guards. However, the want they were in of money, and Eleazar's subtle tricks, soon got round the the people, so that they submitted themselves to his authority in all matters.

§ 4. They also chose others as generals for Idumæa,<sup>1</sup> as Jesus the son of Sapphias, one of the high priests, and Eleazar, the son of Ananias the high priest. They also enjoined Niger, the then governor of Idumæa (who was of a family that belonged to Peræa<sup>2</sup> beyond the Jordan, and so was called the Peræite), that he should be obedient to those fore-named commanders. Nor did they neglect other parts of the country, for Joseph the son of Simou was sent as general to Jericho, as was Manasses to Peræa, and John the Essene to the toparchy of Thamua;<sup>3</sup> Lydda<sup>4</sup> was also assigned to him, and Joppa and Emmaus.<sup>5</sup> And John, the son of Ananias, was made governor of the toparchies of Gophnitice<sup>6</sup> and Acrabatene,<sup>7</sup> as was Josephus, the son of Matthias, of both the Galilees. Gamala<sup>8</sup> also, which was the strongest city in those parts, was put under Josephus' command.

§ 5. As to every one of the other commanders, they administered affairs in their districts with their utmost zeal and ability; and the first care of Josephus, when he came into Galilee, was to gain the good-will of the people of that country, as he knew he would thereby have good success in general, although he might fail in some points. And seeing that, if he communicated part of his power to influential persons, he should make them his firm friends, and that he should gain the favour of all the people if he executed his commands generally by persons of their own country with whom they were well acquainted, he chose out seventy of the wisest old men, and appointed them to be rulers of all Galilee, and appointed seven judges in every city to hear the lesser quarrels; for as to greater affairs and capital cases, he enjoined they should be brought before him and the seventy elders.

§ 6. Now when Josephus had settled these rules for determining causes by the law in every city, he betook himself to make provision for their external safety: and as he knew the Romans would invade Galilee, he fortified suitable places, as Jotapata<sup>1</sup> and Bersabee<sup>2</sup> and Selamis,<sup>3</sup> and also Capharecho<sup>4</sup> and Japha<sup>5</sup> and Sigoph,<sup>6</sup> and the mount called Mount Tabor,<sup>7</sup> and Tarichee<sup>8</sup> and Tiberias.<sup>9</sup> Moreover, he fortified the caves near the lake of Gennesar<sup>10</sup> in what is called Lower Galilee, and in Upper Galilee the rock called the rock of the Achabari,<sup>11</sup> and Seph<sup>12</sup> and Jamnith<sup>13</sup> and Meroth;<sup>14</sup> and in Gaulanitis he fortified Seleucia<sup>15</sup> and Sogane<sup>16</sup> and Gamala.<sup>17</sup> But to those of Sepphoris<sup>18</sup> only did he give leave to build walls for themselves, and that because he perceived they were rich and wealthy, and zealous for war without any orders. Similarly Gischala<sup>1</sup> had a wall built round it by John the son of Levi himself, but at the bidding of Josephus; who himself had a hand in all the other fortifications, and was present to give all the necessary orders. Josephus also got together an army out of Galilee of more than a hundred thousand young men, all of whom he drilled and armed with old weapons which he had got together.

§ 7. And when he reflected that the Roman power became invincible chiefly by discipline and constant exercise in arms,<sup>2</sup> he despaired of teaching his men the use of arms, which was only to be obtained by exercise, but observing that their readiness in obeying their officers was owing to the number of them, he arranged his army more in the Roman manner, and appointed a great many subalterns. He also distributed the soldiers into various classes, whom he put under captains of tens, and captains of hundreds, and then under captains of thousands; and besides these he had commanders of larger bodies of men. He also taught them to pass on signals to one another, and how to cheer on or recall the soldiers by the trumpets, and how to expand and wheel the wings, and when one wing had had success, to bring it up to assist those that were hard set, and to reinforce those that had most suffered. He also continually instructed them in what concerned the courage of the soul, and the endurance of the body; and above all he exercised them for war, by describing to them the discipline of the Romans, and how they were to fight against men who by the strength of their bodies and courage of their souls had conquered nearly the whole world. He told them that he could test the good order they would observe in war even before it came to battle, if they abstained from common crimes, such as theft and robbery and rapine, and from defrauding their own countrymen, and never esteemed harm done to those that were so near akin to them as any advantage to themselves. For he said wars were managed best when the warriors preserved a good conscience; for such as were bad men in private life, would not only have those for enemies who attacked them, but God himself also hostile to them.

§ 8. Thus did he frequently admonish them. Meantime his force was enlisted and got ready for war. It consisted of sixty thousand foot and two hundred and fifty horse, and besides these, in whom he put the greatest trust, there were about four thousand five hundred mercenaries. He had also six hundred picked men as his own body-guards. Now the cities easily maintained the rest of the army except the mercenaries, for every one of the cities enumerated above sent out half of their men to the army, and retained the other half at home to get provisions for them; so that the one part went to the war, and the other part to their work, and so those that sent their corn were paid for it by the security which they enjoyed from those that were in arms.

CHAP. XXI.

§ 1.

WHILE Josephus was thus engaged in superintending the affairs of Galilee, there sprung up in Gischala, a deep designing fellow, whose name was John. He was the son of Levi, and a very cunning and very knavish person, indeed more so than any of the men of eminence there, and for wicked practices he had not his fellow anywhere. He was at first poor, and for a long time his neediness was a hindrance to him in his wicked designs. He was a ready liar, and clever in gaining credit for his lies, and thought it virtue to delude people, and would delude even such as were dearest to him. He pretended to be humane, but where he had hope of gain was most bloody, ever aiming at great things, and feeding his hopes on his mean wicked tricks. He was at first a solitary robber, but in process of time he got companions in his audacious schemes, at first but a few, but as he proceeded in his evil course, ever more and more. He took care to have no partner who would be easily detected, but chose out such men as had the strongest constitutions of body, and the greatest courage of soul, together with great skill in martial affairs. Thus he got together a band of four hundred men, who came principally from the country of Tyre, and were fugitives from its villages; and with them he plundered all Galilee, and harassed a great many who were on the tiptoe of expectation as to the coming war.

§ 2. However, his want of money had hitherto restrained him in his ambition for military command and attempts to advance himself. But when he saw that Josephus was highly pleased with his energy, he persuaded him first to intrust him with the repairing the walls of his native city,<sup>1</sup> in which work he made a great gain of the rich citizens. He next contrived a very shrewd trick, for pretending that the Jews who dwelt in Syria were obliged to make use of oil that was made by others than those of their own nation, he asked leave of Josephus to send oil to the borders: and bought four amphoræ of oil with Tyrian money of the value of four Attic drachmæ, and sold every half amphora at the same price. And as Galilee was very fruitful in oil, and was peculiarly so at that time, by sending away great quantities to those who wanted oil, and having the monopoly, he got together an immense sum of money, which he immediately used against him who had given him that means of gain. And, as he supposed if he could once overthrow Josephus that he would himself be master of Galilee, he gave orders to the robbers that were under his command to be more zealous in their plundering, that, if the revolutionary party grew numerous in the country, he might catch the general in his snares and kill him as he came to the country's assistance, or, if he should take no notice of the robbers, he might accuse him to the people of the country of negligence. He also spread abroad a report far and near, that Josephus intended delivering up

Galilee to the Romans: and many such things did he invent in order to ruin him.

§ 3. Now at this very time certain young men of the village of Dabaritta,<sup>1</sup> who kept guard in the great plain, laid snares for Ptolemy, who was Agrippa and Berenice's steward, and stripped him of all that he had with him, among which there were a great many costly garments, and a number of silver cups, and six hundred pieces of gold; but not being able to divide their spoil secretly, they brought it all to Josephus to Tarichææ.<sup>2</sup> Thereupon he blamed them for this outrage on the king and queen, and deposited what they brought to him with Annæus, the most influential person in Tarichææ, with the intention of sending the things back to the owners at a convenient opportunity: which intention brought upon Josephus the greatest danger. For those that had stolen the things were indignant at him, not only because they got no share of them for themselves, but also because they perceived what Josephus' intention was, namely to restore what had cost them so much pains to the king and queen; so they ran about by night among their villages, and declared to all their inhabitants that Josephus was a traitor. They also filled the neighbouring cities with tumult, so that in the morning a hundred thousand armed men came running together against him. And the multitude crowded together in the hippodrome at Tarichææ, and raised a very angry clamour against him; for some cried out to stone the traitor, and others to burn him. Now John incited most of them, as did also with him one Jesus the son of Sapphias, who was then governor of Tiberias. And Josephus' friends and body-guards were so frightened at this violence on the part of the multitude, that they all fled but four; and as he was asleep, they awoke him, just as the people were going to set fire to the house. And although those four that remained with him urged him to flee away, he was neither dismayed at his being deserted, nor at the great multitude of those that came against him, but leaped out to them with his clothes rent, and dust sprinkled on his head, with his hands behind him, and his sword hanging at his neck. At this sight his friends, especially those of Taricheæ, commiserated his condition; but those that came out of the country, and those in the neighbourhood to whom his rule seemed burdensome, reproached him, and bade him produce quickly the money which belonged to them all, and to confess the agreement he had made to betray them. For they imagined, from the guise in which he appeared, that he would deny nothing of what they suspected concerning him, and that it was to obtain pardon that he had done everything to move their pity. But this humble appearance was only designed as preparatory to a stratagem of his, for he thereby contrived to set those that were so angry at him at variance with one another as to the things they were angry at. However, he promised he would confess all: so he was permitted to speak, when he said, "I did neither intend to send this money back to Agrippa, nor to take it for my own gain; for I could never esteem one that was your enemy my friend, nor could I consider what would tend to your disadvantage to be to my advantage. But I saw, O people of Taricheæ, that your city stood in more need than others of fortifications for your security, and that it wanted money for the building it a wall. I was also afraid lest the people of Tiberias and the other cities should lay a plot to seize upon these spoils, and therefore it was that I intended to retain this money privately, that I might invest you with a wall. But if this does not please you, I will produce what was brought me, and leave it to you to plunder it; but if I have well looked after your interests, you are desirous to injure your benefactor."

§ 4. At this the people of Taricheæ loudly applauded him, but those of Tiberias and the rest abused him and threatened him; and both sides left Josephus alone, and fell to quarrelling with one another. So he grew bold upon the dependence he had on his friends (who were the people of Taricheæ, and about forty thousand in number), and spoke more freely to the whole multitude. He reproached them greatly for their vehemence, and told them that with this money he would build walls about Tari-cheæ, and would put the other cities in a state of security also; for they should not want money, if they would but agree for whose benefit it was to be procured, and not suffer themselves to be incensed against him who had procured it for them."

§ 5. Then the rest of the multitude that had been deluded retired, though angry, but two thousand rushed at him in their armour, and as he had already got into his house, they stood without and threatened him. On this occasion Josephus again used a second stratagem. He got upon the top of his house, and with his right hand waved to them to be silent, and said he could not tell what they wanted, nor hear what they said for the confused noise, but he would comply with all their demands, if they would but send some of their number in to him, that might talk with him quietly. And when the most influential of them and the leaders heard this, they went inside the house. He then drew them to the most retired part of the house, and shut the door of the hall where he put them, and then had them whipped till he laid bare their inward parts. Meantime the multitude stood round the house, supposing that he was holding a long discussion with those that had gone in. He then had the doors set open suddenly, and sent the men out all bloody, which so terribly frightened those that had before threatened him, that they threw away their arms and fled.

§ 6. At this John's envy grew more intense, and he framed a new plot against Josephus; he pretended to be ill, and in a letter begged that Josephus would give him leave to use the hot baths at Tiberias for the recovery of his health. And he (for hitherto he suspected not John as a plotter) wrote to the governors of the city to provide a lodging and necessaries for John. And when he had enjoyed these favours, he did after two days what he went there for, for he corrupted some with his lies, and others with money, and so tried to persuade them to revolt from Josephus. Now when Silas, who had been appointed to guard that city by Josephus, got to know of this, he wrote to him immediately, and informed him of the plot against him. And when Josephus had received his letter, he marched a forced march by night, and arrived early in the morning at Tiberias. And the rest of the multitude met him, but John, though he suspected that arrival was not for his advantage, yet sent one of his friends, and pretended that he was ill, and that, being confined to his bed, he could not come to pay him his respects. And as soon as Josephus had collected the people of Tiberias together in the Stadium, and tried to discourse with them about the letters he had received, John secretly sent some armed men, and gave them orders to slay him. But when the people saw that these armed men were drawing their swords, they cried out; at which cry Josephus turned round, and when he saw that their swords were just at his throat, he hurried off to the sea-shore, and left off the speech he was making to the people on an elevation six cubits high. He then leaped into a ship which lay in the haven, and took refuge with two of his body-guards in the middle of the lake.

§ 7. And now his soldiers took up their arms immediately, and marched against the plotters. Thereupon Josephus, being afraid that a civil war would be raised by the envy of a few men, and would bring the city to ruin, sent to his own party to tell them to do no more than provide for their own safety, and not to kill anybody, nor to accuse any of their guilt. And they obeyed his orders, and were quiet. But the people of the neighbouring country, when they were informed of this plot, and of the plotter, assembled together against John. But he was too quick for them, and fled to Gischala<sup>1</sup> his native city. And the Galilæans came flocking out of their several cities to Josephus, and were now grown to many myriads of armed men, and cried out that they were come against John the universal plotter, and would at the same time burn him and the city which had received him. Then Josephus told them that he took their good-will kindly, but tried to restrain their fury, preferring to subdue his enemies by prudent conduct rather than by slaying them. So he excepted by name those of every city who had joined in this revolt with John, who were readily pointed out to him by their fellow-citizens, and caused public proclamation to be made, that he would seize upon the effects of those who did not leave

John within five days, and would burn both their houses and families with fire. Thereupon three thousand of John's party left him immediately, and came to Josephus, and threw down their arms at his feet. John then betook himself, together with the two thousand Syrian fugitives that stayed with him, from more open attempts to secret plots. So he privately sent messengers to Jerusalem to accuse Josephus of having too great power, and to let them know that he would soon come as a tyrant to their metropolis, unless he was prevented. To this the people, who were aware of the real state of affairs, paid no heed. But the leading men out of envy, and some of the rulers also, sent money to John privately, that he might be able to levy an army of mercenaries to fight against Josephus. They also made a decree among themselves to recall Josephus from his command, but they did not think that decree sufficient; so they sent two thousand five hundred armed men, and four notable persons, Joaesdrus the son of Nomicus, and Ananias the son of Sadduk, and Simon and Judas, the sons of Jonathan, all very able speakers, that they might divert the good-will of the people from Josephus. They were further instructed, if he would voluntarily come, to permit him to [come and] give an account of his conduct, but if he obstinately insisted upon continuing in his command, they were to treat him as an enemy. Now Josephus' friends had sent him word that an army was coming against him, but they did not reveal to him what the reason of its coming was, as his enemies had deliberated secretly. And so, as he was not on his guard, four cities revolted from him immediately, Sepphoris<sup>1</sup> and Gamala<sup>2</sup> and Gischala and Tiberias. But he soon recovered those cities without war, and when he had routed the four commanders and the pick of their soldiers by stratagem, he sent them to Jerusalem. But the people were very indignant at them, and in a mind to slay not only these forces, but also those that sent them, had they not prevented it by running away.

§ 8. Now John kept himself henceforth within the walls of Gischala from the fear he was in of Josephus. And a few days afterwards Tiberias revolted again, the people within it inviting back king Agrippa. And when he did not come at the time appointed, and a few Roman horse appeared that day, they expelled Josephus out of the city. Now news of this revolt of theirs was at once carried to Taricheæ,<sup>1</sup> and as Josephus had sent out all the soldiers that were with him to get corn, he could not either march out alone against the revolters or stay where he was, because he was afraid the king's soldiers, if he tarried, would get the start of him and into the city: for he did not intend to do any thing on the next day, because it was the sabbath-day, and would hinder his proceeding. So he contrived to circumvent the revolters by a stratagem. He first ordered the gates of Taricheæ to be shut, that nobody might go out and inform [those of Tiberias], for whom it was intended, what stratagem he was about: he then got together all the ships that were upon the lake, which were found to be two hundred and thirty, and put on board each only four mariners. So he sailed to Tiberias with haste, and kept at such a distance from the city, that it was not easy for the people to see the vessels, and ordered that the empty vessels should float up and down in the offing, while he himself, and only seven of his body-guards unarmed with him, went so near as to be seen. And when his adversaries, who were still reproaching him, saw him from the walls, they were so dismayed, that they supposed all the ships were full of armed men, and threw down their arms, and made signals of supplication, and besought him to spare the city.

§ 9. Upon this Josephus threatened them terribly, and reproached them, as they first took up arms against the Romans, for expending their strength beforehand in civil strife, and doing what their enemies desired above all things, and also for being so anxious to seize upon him who saw to their safety, and for not being ashamed to shut the gates of their city against him that had built their walls. He said, however, that he would receive any that came to apologise for the matter, and with whom he could make arrangements for the city's security. Thereupon ten of the most influential men of Tiberias went down to him at once, and when he had taken them on board one of his vessels, he ordered them to be carried a very great way off. He then commanded that fifty others of their senate, such as were men of the greatest eminence, should come to him, as he wished to receive from them also some security. After that he called forth others one after another, on one novel pretext or another, as if for a convention. He then gave orders to the pilots of those vessels which he had thus filled to sail away quickly to Taricheæ, and to confine these men in the prison there. So at last he took all their senate, consisting of six hundred persons, and about two thousand of the people, and carried them away in ships to Taricheæ.

§ 10. And when those that remained of the people cried out, that one Clitus was the chief author of this revolt, and besought him to confine his anger to him, Josephus, whose intention it was to slay nobody, commanded Levias, one of his guards, to go out of his vessel, and cut off both Clitus' hands; but he was afraid to go by himself alone to such a large body of enemies, and refused to go. Now Clitus saw that Josephus was in a great passion in his ship, and ready to leap out of it to execute the punishment himself; so he begged from the shore that Josephus would leave him one of his hands, which he agreed to upon condition that he would himself cut off the other hand; so he drew his sword, and with his right hand cut off his left, so great was the fear he was in of Josephus himself, who thus took the people of Tiberias prisoners, and recovered the city again, with empty ships and seven body-guards. Moreover, a few days afterwards he took Gischala,<sup>1</sup> which had revolted with the people of Sepphoris,<sup>2</sup> and gave his soldiers leave to plunder it. However, he got all the plunder together again, and restored it to the inhabitants, and he did the same to the inhabitants of Sepphoris and Tiberias. For when he had subdued them, he wished to give them a lesson, by letting them be plundered, while at the same time he regained their good-will by restoring them their money again.

§ 1.

THUS were the disturbances in Galilee composed. And upon their ceasing from civil strife, they betook themselves to making preparations against the Romans. Now in Jerusalem the high priest Ananus, and as many influential persons as did not side with the Romans, both repaired the walls, and made a great many warlike instruments. And in all parts of the city darts and all sorts of armour were being forged, but the mass of the young men were engaged in exercises without any regularity, and all places were full of tumult. And people of moderation were exceedingly dejected, and many foreseeing the calamities that were coming upon them made loud lamentation. There were also such omens observed as were understood to be forerunners of evil by such as loved peace, but were interpreted by those that kindled the war so as to suit their inclinations; and the condition of the city, even before the Romans came against it, was that of a place doomed to destruction. However, Ananus' concern was to lay aside for a while the preparations for the war, and to persuade the seditious to consult their own interest, and to restrain the madness of those that were called zealots; but their violence was too much for him. As to the end he came to I shall relate that hereafter.

§ 2. As for the toparchy of Acrabatta,<sup>1</sup> Simon, the son of Gioras, got together a great number of those that were fond of innovation, and betook himself to ravaging the country; nor did he only ransack rich men's houses, but also tortured their bodies, and appeared openly thus early to aim at playing the tyrant. And when an army was sent against him by Ananus and the rulers, he and his band fled to the robbers that were at Masada,<sup>2</sup> and stayed with them, and plundered the country of Idumæa<sup>1</sup> with them, till both Ananus and his other enemies were slain, and until the rulers of that country were so afflicted with the multitude of those that were slain, and with the continual plundering of what they had, that they raised an army, and put garrisons in the villages to secure them from such outrages. In such a state were the affairs of Judæa at this time.

§ 1.

WHEN Nero was informed of the Roman reverses in Judæa, a secret consternation and fear, as was natural enough, fell upon him; although he openly treated the matter disdainfully, and was very angry, and said that what had happened was owing rather to the negligence of the commanders than to any valour of the enemy: and as he thought it fit for himself, who bore the burden of empire, to despise such misfortunes, he now pretended to do so, and to have a soul superior to all evils. However, the trouble of his soul plainly appeared from the anxiety he was in.

§ 2. And as he deliberated to whom he should commit the care of the East, now it was disturbed, who should punish the Jews for their rebellion, and prevent the infection from spreading to the neighbouring nations also, he found no one but Vespasian equal to the task, and able to undergo the great burden of so mighty a war, as he was a man who had grown old in military service from his youth up. He had also long ago pacified the West, and made it subject to the Romans, when it had been disturbed by the Germans, and had also won by his arms Britain, which had been little known before; whereby he got a triumph bestowed on his father<sup>1</sup> Claudius without any sweat of his own.

§ 3. So Nero esteemed these circumstances as favourable omens, and saw that Vespasian's age gave him steadiness mixed with experience, and that he had sons as hostages for his fidelity, whose vigorous prime would make them fit instruments to carry out their father's plans. Perhaps also there was some interposition of Providence, which was paving the way for Vespasian's being himself emperor afterwards. So Nero sent him to take the command of the armies that were in Syria, and that not without great encomiums and flattery, such as necessity required to induce him to take the command. And Vespasian sent his son Titus from Achaia,<sup>2</sup> where he had been with Nero, to Alexandria, to fetch from thence the fifth and the tenth legions; while he himself crossed over the Hellespont,<sup>3</sup> and went by land into Syria, where he concentrated the Roman forces and the considerable number of auxiliaries from the neighbouring kings.

§ 1.

NOW after the Jews had beaten Cestius, they were so elated with their unexpected success, that they could not control their impetuosity, but, as if blown into a flame by their good fortune, carried the war to remoter places. Accordingly they at once got together all of their boldest soldiers, and marched for Ascalon,<sup>1</sup> an ancient city five hundred and twenty furlongs from Jerusalem, and ever hated by the Jews, so they determined to make their first efforts against it. This expedition was led by three men, who were eminent both for strength and ability, Niger the Peræite,<sup>2</sup> Silas the Babylonian, and besides them John the Essene. Now Ascalon was strongly fortified, but had almost no protection in the way of troops, for the garrison consisted of but one cohort of foot and one troop of horse, whose commander was Antonius.

§ 2. Now these Jews, in their anger, marched faster than usual, and, as if they had come but a little way, were soon near the city. But Antonius, who was not ignorant that they were going to make an attack upon the city, drew out his horse, and being neither daunted at the numbers nor courage of the enemy, received their first attack stoutly, and when they crowded to the walls repulsed them. Now the Jews were easily beaten, for they were men unskilful in war pitted against those that were skilful therein, they were foot pitted against horse, they were in disorder against men drawn up in order of battle solid and compact, they were poorly armed against men completely armed, they fought more from rage than judgment, and were pitted against soldiers that were obedient and did every thing they were bidden at the least intimation. So they were easily beaten, for as soon as their front ranks were once in disorder, they were put to flight by the enemy's cavalry, and as they fell foul of those behind them struggling for the wall, they became one another's enemies, till they all gave way to the charges of the horse, and were dispersed all over the plain, which was wide and everywhere fit for cavalry; which circumstance was very convenient for the Romans, and occasioned most slaughter of the Jews. For they could outstrip such as ran away, and make them turn back, and when they were crowded together in their flight, they stabbed them, and slew a vast number of them; and in different quarters of the field, wherever the fugitives turned, they wheeled and galloped round them, and slew them easily with their arrows. And the great number there were of the Jews seemed to themselves a solitude because of the distress they were in, while the Romans had such good success with their small numbers, that they seemed to themselves to be the larger force. And as the Jews strove zealously under their misfortunes, from shame at their quick flight, and hope of a change in the fortunes of the day, so did the Romans feel no weariness in their good fortune, so that the fight lasted till evening, when ten thousand Jews lay dead, and two of their generals, John and Silas; and most of the rest were wounded, as well as Niger, their remaining general, who all fled away together to a small city of Idumæa, called Sallis.<sup>1</sup> Some few also of the Romans were wounded in this battle.

§ 3. However, the spirits of the Jews were not broken by so great a calamity, but the losses they had sustained rather quickened their courage; for, disregarding the dead bodies which lay at their feet, they were enticed by their former successes to venture on a second destruction. So, when they had hardly given time for their wounds to heal, they concentrated all their forces, and returned to Ascalon with greater fury and in much greater numbers. But their former ill fortune followed them in addition to their unskilfulness and other deficiencies in war. For as Antonius laid ambushes for them on the roads they were to go by, they fell into snares unexpectedly, and were surrounded by the enemy's horse before they could form themselves in fighting order, and so above eight thousand of them were slain, and all the rest ran away, and with them Niger, who yet displayed great bravery in his flight. However, they were driven along before the enemy, who pressed hard upon them, into a certain strong tower belonging to a village called Bezedel.<sup>2</sup> Then Antonius and his troops, that they might neither waste any time about this tower which was hard to take, nor suffer the commander and most noble man of the enemy to escape, set the wall on fire. And as the tower was on fire, the Romans went away rejoicing, taking it for granted that Niger had perished; but he leaped out of the tower into a cavern, in the innermost part of the fort, and was preserved, and on the third day afterwards he spoke from below to those that with great lamentations were searching for him, to give him a decent funeral; and when he came out, he filled all the Jews with an unexpected joy, as though preserved by God's providence to be their commander for the time to come.

§ 4. And now Vespasian took his army with him from Antioch<sup>1</sup> (which is the metropolis of Syria, and without dispute is the third city<sup>2</sup> in the Roman empire, both from its size and prosperity in other respects), where he found king Agrippa with all his forces waiting for his coming, and pushed on to Ptolemais.<sup>3</sup> And at this city the inhabitants of Sepphoris in Galilee met him, who were for peace with the Romans, who had beforehand thought of their own safety and the power of the Romans, and had before Vespasian came given their faith to Cestius Gallius, and received the security of his right hand, and had admitted a Roman garrison; and now too they received the Roman general very kindly, and readily promised to assist him against their own countrymen. And the general handed over to them, at their desire, as many horse and foot as he thought sufficient to oppose the inroads of the Jews, if they should come against them. For indeed the danger of losing Sepphoris<sup>4</sup> would be no small one in the ensuing war, seeing it was the largest city in Galilee, and built in a place by nature very strong, and might be a military post to keep the whole nation in order.

§ 1.

NOW Phœnice and Syria surround the two Galilees, which are called Upper and Lower Galilee. They are bounded on the west by the borders of the territory belonging to Ptolemais, and by Carmel,<sup>1</sup> which mountain of old belonged to the Galilæans, but now to the Tyrians; and next it is Gaba,<sup>2</sup> which is called "the city of horse-men," because those horsemen that were dismissed by Herod the king dwelt therein: they are bounded on the south by Samaris<sup>3</sup> and Scythopolis,<sup>4</sup> as far as the streams of the Jordan; on the east by Hippene<sup>5</sup> and Gadaris,<sup>6</sup> and also by Gaulanitis,<sup>7</sup> and the borders of the kingdom of Agrippa; and their northern parts are bounded by Tyre,<sup>8</sup> and the country of the Tyrians. As for what is called Lower Galilee, it extends in length from Tiberias to Chabulon,<sup>9</sup> and Ptolemais<sup>10</sup> is its neighbour on the coast, and its breadth is from the village called Xaloth,<sup>11</sup> which lies in the great plain, to Bersabe,<sup>12</sup> from which beginning the breadth of Upper Galilee is also taken to the village Baca,<sup>13</sup> which divides the land of the Tyrians from Galilee; its length is also from Meloth<sup>14</sup> to Thella,<sup>15</sup> a village near the Jordan.

§ 2. These two Galilees, being so great in size, and surrounded by so many foreign nations, have always been able to make a strong resistance in war. For the Galilæans are inured to war from their infancy, and have been always very numerous, nor has their country ever been destitute of men of courage or of a large population, for the soil is universally rich and fruitful, and planted with trees of all sorts, so that by its fruitfulness it invites even the most slothful to take pains in its cultivation. Accordingly, it is all cultivated by its inhabitants, and no part of it lies idle. Moreover, the cities lie very thick, and the very many villages are everywhere so populous from the richness of the soil, that the very least of them contains more than fifteen thousand inhabitants.

§ 3. In short, if any one admits that Galilee is inferior to Peræa in size, he will be obliged to prefer it to it in its capacities; for all of it is capable of cultivation, and it is every where fruitful; whereas Peræa,<sup>1</sup> which is indeed much larger in extent, is mostly desert and rough, and much less adapted for the growth of cultivated fruits. However, its softer soil is very fertile, and produces all kinds of fruits, and its plains are planted with various trees, though the olive the vine and palms are chiefly cultivated there. It is also sufficiently watered with torrents, which issue out of the mountains, and with springs that never fail to run, even when the torrents fail them, as they do in the dog-days. Now the length of Peræa is from Machærus<sup>2</sup> to Pella,<sup>3</sup> and its breadth from Philadelphia<sup>4</sup> to the Jordan: its northern parts are bounded by Pella, as I have already said, and its western by the Jordan; the land of Moab is its southern border, and its eastern limits extend to Arabia and Silbonitis,<sup>5</sup> and also to Philadelphene<sup>6</sup> and Gerasa.<sup>7</sup>

§ 4. As to the district of Samaria, it lies between Judæa and Galilee (for it begins in a village that is in the great plain called Ginæa,<sup>8</sup> and ends at the toparchy of Acrabatta),<sup>9</sup> and is entirely of the same nature as Judæa. For both are full of hills and valleys, and are soft enough for agriculture and very fruitful, and are well wooded, and abound both in wild fruit, and in that which is the effect of cultivation. They are not naturally watered by many rivers, but derive their chief moisture from rain. As for the streams which they have, all their water is exceedingly sweet: and because of the excellent grass they have, their cattle yield more milk than elsewhere. And the greatest sign of their excellence and abundance is that both of them are very populous.

§ 5. On the borders of Samaria and Judæa lies the village of Anuath,<sup>1</sup> which is also called Borceos.<sup>2</sup> This is the northern boundary of Judæa. The southern parts of Judæa, if it be measured lengthways, are bounded by a village adjoining the confines of Arabia, which the Jews that dwell there call Iardas.<sup>3</sup> And its breadth extends from the river Jordan to Joppa.<sup>4</sup> The city of Jerusalem is situated in the very middle; on which account some have called that city not amiss the navel of the country. Nor indeed is Judæa destitute of such delights as come from the sea, for it extends on the coast as far as Ptolemais. And it is divided into eleven portions, over which, as the royal city, Jerusalem is supreme, and presides over all the neighbouring country, as the head does over the body. As to the other cities after it, they are parcelled out among the several toparchies. Gophna<sup>5</sup> is the second, and next to it is Acrabatta,<sup>6</sup> and after them Thamna,<sup>7</sup> and Lydda,<sup>8</sup> and Emmaus,<sup>9</sup> and Pella, and Idumæa,<sup>10</sup> and Engaddi,<sup>11</sup> and Herodium,<sup>12</sup> and Jericho,<sup>13</sup> and after them Jamnia<sup>14</sup> and Joppa preside over their neighbours, and besides these there

§ 1.

NOW the reinforcements sent by Vespasian to assist the people of Sepphoris consisted a thousand horse and six thousand foot under Placidus the tribune, and encamped in the great plain, and were divided into two bodies ; for the foot were put into the city to garrison it, but the horse were quartered in the camp. These last, by marching continually one way or other, and scouring the country all round, were very troublesome to Josephus and his men, although they were quiet. They also plundered all the places outside the city, and interfered with such as ventured abroad. So Josephus marched against Sepphoris, hoping to take it, though he had strongly fortified it before it revolted from the Galilæans, that the Romans might have much trouble to take it. In consequence of this he failed in his hope, and proved unable either to take the place by storm or to prevail upon the people of Sepphoris to deliver it up to him. And he stirred up war only the more throughout the district : for the Romans in their anger at this attempt, left off neither by night nor day ravaging in the plain, and carrying off the cattle that were in the country, and ever killing all that seemed capable of fighting, and enslaving the weak. So all Galilee was filled with fire and blood; nor was it exempt from any kind of misery or calamity, for the only refuge they had was that, when they were pursued, they could retire to the cities which had been fortified by Josephus.

§ 2. As to Titus, he sailed over from Achaia<sup>1</sup> to Alexandria, and that quicker than the winter season usually permitted, and brought with him the forces he was sent for, and marching with great expedition, arrived quickly at Ptolemais. And there he found his father, together with the two legions which were the finest of all, namely, the fifth and the tenth, and joined to them the fifteenth legion which he had brought. And eighteen cohorts followed these legions. There came also from Cæsarea<sup>2</sup> five cohorts and one troop of horse, and five other troops of horse from Syria. Ten of these cohorts had a thousand foot apiece, but the remaining thirteen cohorts had only six hundred foot apiece, and a hundred and twenty horse. There were also a considerable number of auxiliaries got together, that came from the kings Antiochus and Agrippa and Sohemus, each of them contributing two thousand foot that were archers, and a thousand horse. Malchus, also, the Arabian, sent a thousand horse, besides five thousand foot (most of whom were archers). So the whole army, as well horse as foot, including the auxiliaries sent by the kings, amounted collectively to sixty thousand, besides the servants, who followed in vast numbers, and, because they had been trained for war with the rest, ought not to be distinguished from the fighting men, for as they were in their masters' service in times of peace, so did they undergo danger with them in times of war, insomuch that they were inferior to none except their masters either in skill or in strength.

CHAP. V.

§ 1.

NOW here one cannot but admire the forethought of the Romans, in providing themselves with such household servants as might not only serve in the common duties of life, but might also be useful in their wars. And, indeed, if any one does but look at all their military organisation, he will recognize that their great empire is the fruit of their valour, and not the gift of fortune. For they do not begin to use their weapons first in time of war, nor do they only exercise their hands in emergencies, while they avoid doing so in times of peace, but as if they were glued to their weapons, they have never any truce from warlike exercises, nor do they wait for times of war. For their drill differs not at all from real war, but every soldier is every day exercised, and that with real diligence, as if in war, which is the reason why they bear the fatigue of battles so easily. For neither does any disorder remove them from their wonted organisation, nor does fear frighten them out of it, nor does labour tire them. And this makes them always conquer those that have not the same steadiness, nor would he be far out who called their drill unbloody battles, and their battles bloody drill. Nor can their enemies easily surprise them by a sudden attack, for as soon as they have marched into an enemy's land, they do not begin to fight till they have fortified their camp. Nor do they raise their vallum at random or unevenly, nor do they all raise it, nor do those that do take their places at random, but if it happens that the ground is uneven, it is first levelled, and their camp is also measured square. And carpenters follow the army in great numbers with their tools to erect any necessary wood-work.

§ 2. As for the inside of the camp, they occupy it with tents, but the outside resembles a wall, and is furnished with towers at equal distances. And between the towers they place the engines for throwing arrows and darts and stones, and all other engines for throwing missiles, all ready for use. They also erect four gates, one at each end of the camp, large enough for the entrance of the beasts of burden, and wide enough to make a sally from, if occasion should require. They divide the camp within into streets with much arrangement. And they place the tents of the commanders in the middle, and in the very midst of all is the general's own tent like a temple; so that the camp appears to be an improvised city with its market-place and place for handicraft trades, and with seats for the superior and inferior officers, where, if any differences arise, the cases are heard and decided. The camp, and all that is in it, is quickly fortified by the multitude and skill of the workers; and, if occasion require, a trench is drawn round the whole, whose depth is four cubits, and its breadth the same.

§ 3. When they have thus fortified themselves, they bivouac in companies in quietness and order. And all their other affairs are managed with good order and security. Each company has also its wood and corn and water brought it, when needful. For they neither sup nor dine when each pleases, but all together. Their times also for sleeping and watching and rising are notified beforehand by the sound of trumpets, nor is any thing done without orders. And in the morning all the soldiers go to their centurions, and these centurions to their tribunes, to salute them, with whom all the superior officers go to the general of the whole army. And then he according to custom gives them the word for the day and other orders, to be by them carried to all that are under their command; which is also observed when they go to fight, and so they wheel round quickly, so that, if need be, they can either attack or retreat en masse.

§ 4. Now when they are to go out of their camp, the trumpet gives the signal, when nobody lies still, but at the first intimation they take down their tents, and all is made ready for their going out, and the trumpets sound again, to bid them get ready for the march. Then they lay their baggage quickly upon their mules and other beasts of burden, and stand, as at the starting place, ready to march; and also set fire to their camp, and they do this because it will be easy for them to erect another camp, and that this one may not ever be of use to their enemies. Then do the trumpets give signal to them the third time that they are to go out, to hasten up those that are on any account a little slow, that so no one may be out of his ranks when the army marches. And a marshal stands at the general's right hand, and asks them thrice in their own tongue, if they are ready for war. To which they reply as often, with a loud and cheerful voice, saying, "We are ready." And this they do almost before the question is asked them, and as if filled with a kind of martial fury, and when they cry this out, they also lift up their right hands.

§ 5. When, after this, they are gone out of their camp, they all march without noise and in order, and every one keeps his own ranks as in war. The foot are armed with breast-plates and helmets, and wear a sword on each side, but the sword which is upon their left side is much longer than the other, for that on the right side is not longer than a span. Those foot also that are chosen out from the rest to be about the general himself, have a lance and shield, but the rest of the foot-soldiers have a spear and large oblong shield (shaped like a door), and a saw and basket, a pickaxe, and an axe, a thong of leather, and a hook, and provisions for three days, so that a foot-soldier has no great need of a mule to carry his burdens. The cavalry have a long sword on their right side and a long pole in their hand, and an oblong shield lies across their horse's side, and three or more darts are carried in their quiver, with broad points, and not smaller than spears. They have also helmets and breast-plates like all the foot-soldiers. As for those that are chosen to be about the general, their armour in no way differs from that of the cavalry belonging to other troops, and he always leads the legions to whom that duty is assigned by lot.

§ 6. This is the manner of marching and resting of the Romans, and these are the different weapons they use. And when they are to fight, they leave nothing without forecast nor to be done on the spur of the moment, but counsel is ever first taken before any work is begun, and what has been resolved upon is put into execution; so they seldom commit any errors, and if they make mistakes at any time, they easily correct those mistakes. They also esteem any errors they commit after taking counsel beforehand, to be better than the successes which are owing to fortune only; because such a chance advantage tempts men to be careless, while consideration, though it may sometimes fail of success, has this good in it, that it makes men more careful afterwards; while the advantages that arise from chance are not owing to him that gains them; and as to the reverses that happen unexpectedly, there is this comfort in them, that they had anyhow deliberated the best they could to prevent them.

§ 7. Now in the exercise of their arms they make not only the bodies of the soldiers but also their souls stout. They are, moreover, hardened for war by fear. For their laws inflict capital punishment not only for desertion, but also for slight remissness, and their generals are more severe than their laws; for they screen their seeming cruelty towards those they punish by the great rewards they bestow on valiant soldiers. And their obedience to their commanders is so great, that it brings about order in peace, and in a battle the whole army is one body. So welded together are their ranks, so quick their wheelings round, so sharp their hearing the orders given them, so quick their sight of the signals given them, and so nimble their hands in action. So what they do is done quickly, and what they suffer they bear with the greatest patience. Nor can we find any examples where they have been conquered in battle, when they came to a close fight, either by the multitude of the enemies, or by their stratagems, or by the difficulties of the ground, no, nor by fortune either, for their victories have been surer to them than fortune. With a people, therefore, where counsel still goes before action, and where what is resolved upon is followed out by so energetic an army, what wonder is it that Euphrates on the east, the Ocean on the west, the most fertile regions of Libya<sup>1</sup> on the south, and the Ister<sup>2</sup> and Rhine on the north, are the limits of the Roman empire? One might well say that the Roman possessions are inferior to their possessors.

§ 8. I have given the reader this account not so much with the intention of commending the Romans, as of consoling those that have been conquered by them, and deterring others from attempting to rise against them. This account of the Roman military system may also perhaps be of use to such as are ignorant of it, and yet curious to know it. I will return now from my digression.

CHAP. VI.

§ 1.

NOW Vespasian with his son Titus tarried some time at Ptolemais,<sup>1</sup> and put his army in order. But when Placidus, who had scoured all Galilee, and had also slain a great number of those whom he had taken (who were only the weaker part of the Galilæans, and such as were of timorous souls), saw that the fighting men always took refuge in the cities that had been fortified by Josephus, he marched against Jotapata,<sup>2</sup> which was the strongest of them all, supposing he should easily take it by a coup de main, and win great fame for himself among the commanders, and gain a great advantage for the Romans for the future campaign; for if the strongest place of all were once taken, the rest would surrender from fear. But he was mightily mistaken in his hope. For the men of Jotapata heard of his coming to attack them, and went out of the city to meet him, and engaged with the Romans unexpectedly, being both many in number, and prepared and eager for fighting, because they esteemed their country and wives and children in danger, and soon put the Romans to flight, and wounded many of them, but slew only seven of them, because their retreat was made in an orderly manner, and their wounds were only flesh wounds, as their bodies were covered with their armour in all parts, and because the Jews rather threw their missiles at them from a distance, than ventured to come to close quarters, and had only light armour on, while the others were completely armed. And three men were slain on the Jews' side, and a few wounded. And Placidus, finding himself too weak to assault the city, retreated.

§ 2. Then Vespasian set out to invade Galilee, and marched from Ptolemais, having put his army in the order wherein the Romans march. He ordered those auxiliaries who were lightly armed and the archers to march first, that they might check any sudden assaults of the enemy, and might search the woods that looked suspicious and fit for ambuscades. Next to them followed those of the Romans who were completely armed, both foot and horse. Next to them followed ten out of every hundred, carrying with them their arms, and what was necessary to measure out a camp, and after them road-makers, to make crooked roads straight, and to level uneven ground, and to cut down woods that hindered their march, that the army might not be impeded or tired with their march. Behind these he put such baggage of the army as belonged to himself and the other commanders, with a strong troop of horse for their security. After these he marched himself, having with him some picked foot and horse and pikemen; and he was followed by the cavalry belonging to his legion, for a hundred and twenty horse belonged to each legion. Next to these came the mules that carried the battering-rams and the other military engines. After them came the other commanders and prefects of the cohorts and tribunes, having with them picked soldiers. Then came the ensigns encompassing the eagle, which is at the head of every Roman legion, being the king and strongest of all birds, which seems to them a signal of dominion, and an omen that they shall conquer all against whom they march. These sacred ensigns were followed by the trumpeters, and behind them came the main army in column six deep, who were followed by a centurion, who, according to custom, saw that the ranks were well kept. As for the servants of every legion, they all followed the foot, and brought up the baggage of the soldiers, which was carried by the mules and other beasts of burden. And behind all the legions came the crowd of mercenaries, and next to them came those that brought up the rear for the security of the whole army, who were foot-soldiers, both light-armed and heavy-armed, and a strong force of cavalry.

§ 3. Thus did Vespasian march with his army, and arrived at the borders of Galilee, where he pitched his camp and restrained his soldiers who were eager for war, and also showed his army to the enemy to frighten them, and to afford them opportunity to change their minds before it came to a battle. At the same time he made preparations for besieging their strongholds. And indeed the sight of the general induced many to repent of their revolt, and threw all into consternation. Those indeed that were in Josephus' camp, which was at the city called Garis,<sup>1</sup> not far from Sepphoris,<sup>2</sup> when they heard that the war was come near them, and that the Romans were all but fighting with them hand to hand, dispersed and fled, not only before a battle, but before ever the enemy came in sight. So Josephus was left with but a few others, and as he saw that he had not an army sufficient to cope with the enemy, and that the spirits of the Jews were depressed, and that the greater part would willingly come to terms, if they could get trusted, he already began to be afraid as to the issue of the whole war, and determined to get as far as he could out of danger; so he took those that continued loyal to him, and fled to Tiberias.

CHAP. VII.

Vespasian, after taking the City of Gadara, marches to Jotapata. After a long Siege, that City is betrayed by a Deserter, and taken by Vespasian.

§ 1.

AND Vespasian marched to the city of Gadara,<sup>3</sup> and took it at the first assault, because he found it destitute of a fighting population, and entered into it and slew all the population from the youths upwards, the Romans having no mercy on any age whatever, because of the hatred they bore to the Jewish nation, and because of their remembrance of the lawlessness of the Jews in the affair of Cestius. He also set fire not only to the city itself, but to all the villages and small cities that were round it; some of them were quite destitute of inhabitants, but from others he carried the inhabitants into captivity as slaves.

§ 2. As to Josephus, his retiring to the city of Tiberias,<sup>1</sup> which he chose for his security, filled it with great alarm. For its people did not imagine that he would have fled at all, unless he had entirely despaired of the issue of the war. And indeed as to that point, they were not mistaken about his opinion; for he saw how the affairs of the Jews would end at last, and was sensible that they had but one way of escaping, and that was by changing their conduct. As for himself, although he expected that the Romans would forgive him, yet he preferred to die many times over, rather than to betray his country, and to disgrace that command of the army which had been intrusted to him, or to live happily under those against whom he was sent to fight. He determined, therefore, to write an exact account of affairs to the principal men at Jerusalem, that he might not by exaggerating the power of the enemy make them too timorous, nor by understating that power encourage them to stand out when they were perhaps disposed to repentance, and that, if they thought of coming to terms, they might quickly write him an answer, or if they resolved upon war, send him an army sufficient to fight the Romans. So he wrote these things, and sent messengers to carry his letter with all despatch to Jerusalem.

§ 3. Now Vespasian was very desirous of rasing Jotapata<sup>2</sup> to the ground, for he had heard that most of the enemy had retired there, and that it was also a strong point d'appui for them. So he sent both foot and horse to level the road, which was mountainous and rocky, and not without difficulty to be travelled over by foot, and absolutely impracticable for horse. And they accomplished this in four days' time, and opened a broad way for the army.

Now on the fifth day (which was the twenty-first of the month Artemisius) Josephus anticipated him, and got into Jotapata from Tiberias, and raised the drooping spirits of the Jews. And a certain deserter told this good news to Vespasian that Josephus had removed there, so he hastened to that city, supposing that with taking it he should take all Judæa, if he could but get Josephus in his power. So he took this news to be of the vastest advantage to him, and believed it to be brought about by the providence of God, that he who appeared to be the most intelligent of all their enemies should go into a self-chosen prison. So he sent Placidus with a thousand horse, and the decurion Ebutius, a person of eminence both in council and in action, to invest the city, that Josephus might not escape away privately.

§ 4. Vespasian himself followed them the very next day with his whole army, and by marching till late in the evening arrived at Jotapata. And taking his army to the north side of the city, he pitched his camp on a certain hill which was seven furlongs from the city, being most desirous to be well seen by the enemy, to put them into consternation; indeed such a panic seized the Jews immediately, that not one of them durst go outside the walls. But the Romans put off an immediate attack at that time, because they had marched all the day, but they placed a double line round the city, with a third line of cavalry behind, in order to stop up every way out. Now this, making the Jews despair of escaping, excited them to act more boldly; for nothing makes men fight so desperately in war as necessity.

§ 5. Now when an assault was made next day by the Romans, the Jews at first maintained their ground and opposed the enemy face to face, having encamped before the city walls. But when Vespasian had set against them the archers and slingers, and all those that threw missiles from a distance, he bade them shoot, while he himself with the foot mounted an acclivity, where the wall was easily to be taken. Josephus was then in fear for the city, and made a sally, and all the Jewish multitude with him. And they fell upon the Romans en masse, and drove them away from the wall, and performed a great many glorious and bold actions. But they suffered as much as they made the enemy suffer. For as despair of safety encouraged the Jews, so did a sense of shame equally encourage the Romans; and these last had skill as well as strength, while the others were only armed by courage, which made them fight furiously. And when the fight had lasted all day, it was put an end to by the coming on of night. A very great many of the Romans were wounded, and thirteen of them killed, while seventeen of the Jews were slain, and six hundred wounded.

§ 6. On the next day the Jews sallied out and made another attack upon the Romans, and fought much more desperately than the day before, for they were now become more confident on account of their unexpectedly holding their own the day before, and they found that the Romans also fought more desperately; for a sense of shame inflamed them into passion, as they thought not winning victory at once a kind of defeat. Thus did the Romans attack the Jews continually till the fifth day, while the people of Jotapata made sallies out, and fought from the walls most desperately; neither were the Jews dismayed at the strength of the enemy, nor were the Romans discouraged at the difficulties they met with in regard to taking the city.

§ 7. Now Jotapata is almost all of it a precipice, having on all sides of it but one ravines immensely deep, so that those who try to look down find their sight fail them before it reaches the bottom. It is only to be got at on the north side, where the city is built on the mountain, as it ends obliquely at a plain. Josephus had surrounded this mountain with a wall when he fortified the city, that its summit might not be able to be seized upon by the enemies. The city is covered all round with other mountains, and is invisible till one comes just upon it. Such was the strong situation of Jotapata.

§ 8. Vespasian, therefore, being put on his mettle by the natural strength of the place, as well as the bold defence of the Jews, resolved to prosecute the siege with vigour. To this end he called the commanders that were under him to a council of war, and consulted with them as to the assault. And when it was resolved to raise a bank against that part of the wall which was accessible, he sent his whole army abroad to collect materials. So when they had cut down all the trees<sup>1</sup> near the city, and had got together a great heap of stones besides the wood they had cut down, some of them spread fascines over their works, to avoid the effects of the darts that were shot from above at them, under cover whereof they kept on forming their bank, and so were hurt little or nothing by the darts that were thrown upon them from the wall, while others pulled the neighbouring hillocks to pieces, and perpetually brought them earth, so nobody was idle, as they were busy three sorts of ways. But the Jews cast great stones from the walls and all sorts of darts upon the fascines which protected the men, and their noise, though they did not reach them, was so terrible, that it was some impediment to the workmen.

§ 9. Vespasian then put into position all round the city the engines for throwing stones and darts (the number of which was in all an hundred and sixty), and bade the engineers shoot at those that were upon the wall. Then simultaneously the catapults hurled lances with a great noise, and stones of the weight of a talent were thrown by the engines for hurling stones, and fire and a vast multitude of arrows, which not only made the walls difficult of access to the Jews, but also reached the parts within the walls. For the mass of the Arabian archers, as well as all those that threw darts and slung stones, hurled their shot at the same time as the engines. However, the others did not lie still when they could not fight the Romans from the higher ground. For they then made sallies, like robbers, in bands, and tore away the fascines that covered the workmen, and struck them when they were thus unprotected; and when those workmen gave way, they shovelled away the earth that composed the bank, and burnt the woodwork of it and the fascines, till Vespasian perceived that the intervals between the works caused this damage, for these intervals gave the Jews opportunity to attack the Romans. So he united the fascines, and at the same time concentrated all his army close to them, which prevented these sallies of the Jews.

§ 10. And when the bank was now raised, and brought very close to the battlements, Josephus thought it would be strange if he could make no counter-contrivance for the city's preservation, so he got together his workmen, and ordered them to build the wall higher. And when they said that it was impossible to build while they were being pelted with so many darts, he invented the following shelter for them. He bade them fix stakes, and stretch over them the raw hides of oxen just killed, that these hides, by yielding and hollowing themselves when the stones were thrown at them, might receive them, and the other darts would slide off them, and fire that was thrown would be quenched by the moisture that was in them. And these he set over the workmen, and under them they went on with their work in safety, and raised the wall higher both by day and night, till it was twenty cubits higher. He also built frequent towers upon the wall, and fitted to it strong battlements. This greatly discouraged the Romans, who thought by now they would have already got inside the city, and they were at once dismayed at Josephus' contrivance and at the courage of the citizens.

§ 11. And Vespasian was irritated at the great subtlety of this stratagem, and at the boldness of the men of Jotapata. For taking heart again upon the building of this wall, they made fresh sallies upon the Romans, and had every day conflicts with them in bands, together with all such contrivances as robbers make use of, as plundering all that came to hand, as also setting fire to all the Roman works; till Vespasian made his army leave off fighting them, and resolved to sit down before the city, and to starve it into a surrender, supposing that they would either be forced to petition him for mercy by want of provisions, or, if they should have the courage to hold out till the last extremity, that they would perish by famine: and he concluded he should conquer them the more easily in fighting, if he left them alone for a time, and then fell upon them when they were weakened by famine. But he gave orders that they should guard all the outlets from the city.

§ 12. Now the besieged had plenty of corn and indeed of all other things within the city, but they wanted water, because there was no fountain in the city, the people there being supplied with rain water. But it is a rare thing in that country if ever to have rain in summer. And as the siege was at this season, they were in great distress for some contrivance to satisfy their thirst, and they chafed as if already entirely in want of water. For Josephus, seeing that the city abounded with other necessaries, and that the men were of good courage, and wishing to protract the siege longer than the Romans expected, ordered their drink to be given them by measure. But they deemed this scanty distribution of water by measure a thing harder than the want of it; and their not being able to drink as much as they would stimulated still more their desire for drinking, and they were as much disheartened thereby as if they were come to the last degree of thirst. Nor were the Romans ignorant of the condition they were in; for where they stood opposite them above the wall, they could see them running together, and taking their water by measure, which made them throw their javelins there, the place being within their reach, and kill a great many of them.

§ 13. And Vespasian hoped that their cisterns of water would in no long time be emptied, and that they would be forced to deliver up the city to him. But Josephus, being minded to frustrate his hope, commanded a great many to wet their clothes, and hang them out upon the battlements, till the entire wall was of a sudden all wet with the running down of the water. At this the Romans were discouraged and in consternation, seeing them able to throw away in sport so much water, when they supposed them not to have enough to drink. And the Roman general despaired of taking their city by famine, and even betook himself again to arms and force, which was what the Jews greatly desired. For as they despaired of safety for either themselves or their city, they preferred death in battle to death by hunger and thirst.

§ 14. However, Josephus contrived another stratagem, besides the foregoing one, to get plenty of what they wanted. Through a certain ravine that was almost inaccessible, and so was neglected by the soldiers, Josephus sent out certain persons along the western parts of it, and by them sent letters to whom he pleased of the Jews that were outside the city, and procured from them in abundance whatever necessaries they wanted in the city. He ordered them also to creep along generally when near the watch as they returned to the city, and to cover their backs with fleeces, that if any one should observe them by night, they might be believed to be dogs. This was done till the watch perceived their contrivance, and surrounded the ravine.

§ 15. And now Josephus perceived that the city could not hold out long, and that his own safety would be doubtful if he continued in it, so he deliberated about flight with the most influential men of the city. When the multitude were aware of this, they all came round about him, and begged of him not to leave them, as they entirely depended on him and him alone; for there was still hope of the city's deliverance, if he would stay with them, because everybody would zealously fight for him, and there would be some comfort for them, even if they should be captured. They added that it became him neither to flee from his enemies, nor to desert his friends, nor to leap out of the city, as out of a ship that was sinking in a storm, into which he came in a calm; for by going away he would wreck the city, for nobody would any longer venture to oppose the enemy, when he was once gone on whom they wholly relied.

§ 16. Then Josephus concealed from them that he was going away to provide for his own safety, and told them that he was going out of the city for their sakes; for if he stayed with them, he should be able to do them little good, while they were in a safe condition, and if they were once taken, he should only perish with them to no purpose; whereas if he once got out of the siege, he should be able to help them very much from outside; for he would then with all speed get the Galilæans together out of the district, and divert the Romans from their city by another war. He said also that he did not see what advantage he could do them now by staying among them, for that would only provoke the Romans to besiege them more closely, since they deemed it a very great point to take him; but if they heard that he had escaped, they would greatly relax in their eagerness against the city. But he did not persuade the people, but incited them the more to hang on him.

Indeed children and old men and women with their infants came mourning to him, and fell down before him, and all of them caught hold of his feet and held him fast, and besought him with much wailing to share their fortunes, and I think they did this, not envying his deliverance, but hoping for their own; for they did not think they should suffer any great misfortune, if Josephus did but stay with them.

§ 17. Now Josephus thought, if he resolved to stay, that it would be ascribed to their entreaties, and if he resolved to go away by force, he would be put into custody. His pity also for the people in their lamentation had much broken his eagerness to leave them; so he resolved to stay, and arming himself with the common despair of the citizens, he said to them, "Now is the time to begin to fight, when there is no hope of deliverance left. It is noble to prefer glory to life, and having done some noble deed to be remembered by late posterity." When he had said this, he turned to deeds, and with his bravest men made a sally, and dispersed the enemies' outposts, and ran as far as the Roman camp itself, and pulled the coverings of their tents upon their bank to pieces, and set fire to their works. And he never left off fighting in the same manner either the next day or the day after that, or for a considerable number of both days and nights.

§ 18. Upon this Vespasian, as he saw the Romans distressed by these sallies, (for they were ashamed to be put to flight by the Jews, and when at any time they made the Jews run away, their heavy armour would not let them pursue them far, and the Jews, when they had done any mischief, before they could be hurt themselves, still retired into the city,) ordered his armed men to avoid their attacks, and not fight it out with men in desperation, for nothing was more courageous than despair, and their violence would be quenched when they saw they failed of their purposes, as fire was quenched when it wanted fuel. He said also that it became the Romans to gain their victories as cheaply as they could, since they did not fight for their existence, but only to enlarge their dominions. So he repelled the Jews most by the Arabian archers, and Syrian slingers and stone-throwers. Nor was there any intermission of the numerous engines that hurled missiles. Now the Jews suffered greatly by these engines and gave way before them, but when they threw stones or javelins a great distance, then the Jews came to close quarters and pressed hard upon the Romans, and fought desperately, without sparing either soul or body, one detachment relieving another by turns when it was tired out.

§ 19. Now Vespasian, looking upon himself as besieged in turn by these sallies of these Jews and the long time the siege lasted, as his banks were now not far from the walls, determined to apply his battering-ram. This is a vast beam of wood like the mast of a ship, its forepart is armed with a thick piece of iron at the head of it, which is so carved as to be like the head of a ram, whence its name is taken. This ram is slung in the air by its middle by ropes, and is hung, like the balance in a pair of scales, from another beam, and braced by strong beams on both sides of it. When this is pulled backward by a great number of men, and then with united force thrust forward by the same men, it batters walls with the iron part which is prominent. Nor is there any tower so strong, or walls so broad, if they resist its first battery, but are forced to yield to it at last. This was the experiment which the Roman general betook himself to, as he was eagerly bent upon taking the city, for he found lying in the field so long to be to his disadvantage, as the Jews would never be quiet. So the Romans brought their catapults and other engines for galling an enemy nearer to the walls, that they might reach such as were upon the walls who endeavoured to frustrate their attempts, and threw stones and javelins at them, and the archers and slingers in like manner came closer to the wall. This brought matters to such a pass that none of the Jews durst man the walls, and then other Romans brought forward the battering-ram that was cased with wicker-work all over, and in the upper part was covered by skins, and this both for the security of themselves and it. Now the wall was shaken at the very first stroke of this battering-ram, and a terrible clamour was raised by the people within the city, as if they were already taken.

§ 20. Now when Josephus observed this ram frequently battering the same place, and saw that the wall would quickly be thrown down by it, he resolved to elude for a while the force of that contrivance. So he gave orders to fill sacks with chaff, and to let them down before the place where they saw the ram always battering, that the stroke might be turned aside, or that the place might feel less of the stroke in consequence of the yielding nature of the chaff. This very much delayed the Romans, because, let them remove their battering-ram to what part they pleased, those that were on the walls also removed their sacks, and placed them opposite the strokes it made, insomuch that the wall was not at all injured in consequence of the resistance that the sacks made, till the Romans made a counter-contrivance of long poles, and by tying scythes at their ends cut off the sacks. Now when the battering-ram thus became effective again, and the wall (having been but newly built) was giving way, Josephus and those about him had thenceforward recourse to fire to defend themselves. So they took whatever materials they had that were dry, and made a sally three ways, and set fire to the machines and wicker-work and banks of the Romans. And they could not well come to their assistance, being at once in consternation at the Jews' boldness, and being prevented by the flames from coming to their aid. For the materials being dry, and bitumen and pitch and brimstone also being among them, the fire spread quicker than one would think, and what cost the Romans a great deal of labour was in one hour consumed.

§ 21. And here a certain Jew appeared worthy of our relation and commendation. He was the son of Samæas, and was called Eleazar, and was born at Saab<sup>1</sup> in Galilee. He took up a stone of vast size, and threw it down from the wall upon the ram, and that with such force that it broke off the head of it. He also leaped down and took the head of the ram from the midst of the enemies, and without the slightest fear carried it to the top of the wall. And all the while he stood as a mark for all the enemies, and received their strokes upon his naked body, and was pierced with five darts: nor did he mind any of them till he got up to the top of the wall, where he stood in the sight of all conspicuous for his boldness, after which he writhed with pain from his wounds, and fell down dead with the ram. Next to him two brothers Netiras and Philip showed their courage most conspicuously, both of them from the village Ruma,<sup>1</sup> and both Galilæans also. They leaped upon the soldiers of the tenth legion, and fell upon the Romans with such a noise and force as to disorder their ranks, and to put to flight all upon whom they rushed.

§ 22. After them Josephus, and the rest of the multitude with him, took a great deal of fire, and burnt both the machines and their coverings and the works belonging to the fifth and tenth legions, whom they put to flight, and others followed them immediately, and buried their instruments and all their materials under ground. However, about evening the Romans raised and applied the battering-ram again where the wall had suffered before; and there a certain Jew that defended the city from the Romans, hit Vespasian with a dart in the flat of his foot, and wounded him only a little, the distance being so great that it broke the force of the missile. However, this caused the greatest confusion among the Romans, for as those who stood near were alarmed at the sight of his blood, a report spread through the whole army that the general was wounded, and most left the siege and came running in dismay and fear to the general; and before them all came Titus, in the concern he had for his father, so that the soldiers were in great anxiety both from the regard they had for their general and because of the agony that the son was in. But Vespasian soon put an end to his son's fear, and to the alarm of the army. For rising superior to pain, and taking care to show himself to all that had been anxious about him, he incited them to fight the Jews with more sternness: for now every body was willing to expose himself to danger to avenge the general, and encouraging one another with a shout they rushed to the wall.

§ 23. But those who were with Josephus, though they fell one after another being struck by the darts and stones which the engines threw at them, could not for all that be driven from the wall, but attacked with fire and iron weapons and stones those who were propelling the ram under the protection of the wicker-work: though they could do little or nothing, but fell themselves perpetually, because they were seen by those whom they could not see. For the light of their own fire shone about them, and made them as visible a mark to the enemy as they were in the day-time, while the enemy's engines could not be seen at a great distance, and so what was thrown at them could not well be avoided. For the force with which these engines threw stones and darts made them wound many at a time, and the whizzing stones that were cast by the engines carried away the battlements, and broke off the corners of the towers. Indeed, no body of men could be so strong as not to be overthrown to the last rank by the size of the stones. And any one may learn the force of the engines by what happened this very night: for as one of those that stood round Josephus was on the wall, his head was knocked off by a stone, and his skull carried as far as three furlongs. In the day-time also a woman with child had her belly so violently struck, as she had just come out of her house, that the unborn babe was carried to the distance of half a furlong, so great was the force of that engine. The whirr of the instruments and the noise of the missiles was more terrible still. Dire too was the noise the dead bodies made when they were knocked down one after another on the walls, and dreadful was the clamour which the women raised within the city, which was echoed back by the cries of those outside who were being slain; and the whole space of ground whereon they fought ran with blood, and the wall might have been climbed up to over dead bodies. The mountains also contributed to increase the noise by their echoes, nor was there on that night any thing wanting that could terrify either the ear or eye. And very many of those that fought nobly at Jotapata fell, and very many were wounded, and the morning watch was come ere the wall yielded to the machines employed against it, though it had been battered without intermission; and those within covered their bodies with their armour, and built up again what was thrown down of the wall, before those scaling machines were laid to the wall by which the Romans were to ascend into the city.

§ 24. In the morning Vespasian mustered together his army to take the city, after a little rest from the fatigues of the night. And as he wished to draw off those that checked him from the places where the wall had been thrown down, he made the most courageous of his cavalry dismount from their horses, and placed them in three files opposite these breaches in the wall, defended by their armour on every side, and with poles in their hands, that so they might begin the ascent as soon as the machines for such ascent were laid to the wall. And behind these he placed the flower of his foot, and he ordered the rest of the horse to deploy from the walls over all the hills to prevent any from escaping out of the city when it should be taken; and behind these he placed the archers all round, and commanded them to have their arrows ready to shoot. He gave the same commands to the slingers, and to those that managed the engines, and bade others bring ladders and apply them to those parts of the wall that were uninjured, that those who tried to hinder their ascent might leave off guarding the breaches in the wall, while the rest of the besieged might be overpowered by the darts cast at them, and yield an entrance into the city.

§ 25. But Josephus, seeing through Vespasian's plan, set the old men and those that were tired out at the sound part of the wall, as not at all likely to be hurt there, but set the most efficient of his soldiers at the place where the wall was broken down, and in front of them all six men by themselves, among whom he himself shared in the post of greatest danger. He also gave orders that when the legions made a shout they should stop their ears, that they might not be dismayed at it, and also that, to avoid the shower of the enemies' darts, they should bend down on their knees, and cover themselves with their shields, and retreat a little backwards for a while, till the archers should have emptied their quivers; and that, when the Romans should lay their machines for ascending the walls, they should leap out, and with their own instruments meet the enemy, and that every one should strive to do his best, not to defend his own city, as if it were possible to be preserved, but to revenge it, as if it was already destroyed ; and that they should try and picture before their eyes how their old men would be slain, and their children and wives killed immediately by the enemy ; and that they should beforehand spend all their fury on account of the calamities coming upon them, and pour it out on the perpetrators of them.

§ 26. Thus did Josephus dispose of both his bodies of men. As for the useless part of the citizens, the women and children, when they saw their city surrounded by a triple line (for none of the former guards were withdrawn for battle), and their enemies with swords in their hands at the breaches in the wall, as also the hilly country above them shining with arms, and the darts ready and poised in the hands of the Arabian archers, they made a final wail at their capture, as if their ruin was not only imminent, but had actually come upon them already. But Josephus ordered the women to be shut up in their houses, lest they should unnerve the courage of the men by pity, and commanded them to hold their peace, and threatened them if they did not, and went himself to the breach, where his position was allotted. As to those who brought up ladders to the other places, he took no notice of them, but earnestly waited for the expected shower of arrows.

§ 27. And now the trumpeters of all the Roman legions sounded together, and the army raised a terrible shout, and as a shower of darts were hurled at a preconcerted signal, the air was darkened by them. But Josephus' men remembered the orders he had given them ; they stopped their ears at the shouts, and protected their bodies against the darts ; and as for the scaling engines that were laid to the wall, the Jews sallied out at them, before those that should have used them were got upon them. And now, on the ascending of the soldiers, there was a great hand to hand fight, and much valour both of hands and soul was exhibited, while the Jews earnestly endeavoured, in the extreme danger they were in, not to show less courage than those who, without being in danger, fought so stoutly against them, nor did they leave struggling with the Romans till they either fell down dead themselves, or killed their antagonists. But as the Jews grew weary with defending themselves continually, and had not enough men to relieve them, so on the side of the Romans fresh men still succeeded those that were tired, and still new men quickly got upon the scaling engines in the room of those that were thrust down, encouraging one another, and joining side to side, and protecting themselves with their shields over their heads, so that they became an invincible body, and as they pushed back the Jews with their whole line, as though they were but one body, they began already to get upon the wall.

§ 28. Then did Josephus in this utmost distress take for his counsellor necessity (which is very clever in invention when it is sharpened by despair), and gave orders to pour scalding oil upon those whose shields protected them. Whereupon they soon got it ready, for many brought it and in great quantities, and poured it on all sides upon the Romans, and threw down upon them the vessels as they were still hissing from the heat of the fire. This so burnt the Romans, that it dispersed their compact body, who now tumbled down from the wall in dreadful pain, for the oil easily ran down their whole bodies from head to foot under their full armour, and fed upon their flesh like fire, its fat and unctuous nature rendering it soon heated and slowly cooled. And as the men were encumbered with their helmets and breast-plates, they could in no way get free from this burning, and could only leap and roll about in pain, as they fell off their gangways. And as they thus were beaten back, and retired to their own party, who still pressed them forward, they became an easy prey to those that wounded them from behind.

§ 29. However, in spite of this ill success of the Romans, their courage did not fail them, nor did the Jews want wit; for the Romans, although they saw their own men in a miserable condition from this oil that was poured on them, yet tried with all their might to get at those that poured the oil upon them, each reproaching the man before him as a coward that hindered him from exerting his strength. As for the Jews they made use of another stratagem to prevent the ascent of the Romans, and poured boiling fenugreek upon their planks, to make them slip and fall down; so that neither could those that were coming up, nor those that were going down, stand on their feet; but some of them fell backward upon the machines by which they were ascending and got trampled under foot, and many fell upon the bank they had raised, and when they fell were slain by the Jews. For as the Romans could not keep their feet, the Jews, being freed from fighting hand to hand, had leisure to throw their darts at them. And in the evening the general called off those soldiers that had suffered so sorely in the assault, of whom the slain were not a few, and the wounded were still more numerous; while of the people of Jotapata only six men were killed, though more than three hundred were carried off wounded. This fight happened on the twentieth day of the month Dæsius.

§ 30. Now when Vespasian comforted his army as to what had happened, he found them angry, and rather wanting action than exhortation, so he gave orders to them to raise the banks still higher, and to erect three towers, each fifty feet high, covered with plates of iron on every side, that they might be both firm from their weight, and not liable to be set on fire. These towers he set upon the banks, and placed upon them such as could shoot darts and arrows, and the lighter engines for throwing stones and darts also; and also set upon them the strongest of the slingers, who not being descried themselves because of the height they stood upon and the parapets of the towers, hurled their missiles at those that were upon the wall, who were easily seen by them. Thereupon the Jews, being neither able easily to escape those darts that were thrown down upon their heads, nor to avenge themselves on those whom they could not see, and perceiving that the height of the towers was so great that a dart which they threw with their hand could hardly reach it, and that the iron on them made them fire-proof, left the walls, and made sallies upon those that tried to take their city by assault. Thus did the people of Jotapata hold out, though a great number of them were every day killed, without their being able to retaliate upon their enemies, except that they kept them out of the city, though not without danger to themselves.

against a city called Japha,<sup>1</sup> that lay near to Jotapata, and was disaffected to Rome, and elated by Jotapata against all expectation holding out so long. This Trajan was the commander of the tenth legion, and to him Vespasian entrusted one thousand horse and two thousand foot. When Trajan arrived at that city, he found it hard to be taken, for besides the natural strength of its situation, it was also secured by a double wall; but when he saw the people coming out of it ready for battle, he engaged with them, and after a short resistance put them to flight. And as they fled to their first wall, the Romans followed them so closely that they got inside it with them: but when the Jews endeavoured to get also inside the second wall, their fellow-citizens shut them out, being afraid that the Romans would enter in with them. It was certainly God who, to gratify the Romans by the woes of the Galilæans, did now expose the people of the city every one of them, being shut out by their own hands, to be utterly destroyed by their bloody enemies. For they rushed at the gates en masse, earnestly calling on those that kept them by name, but they had their throats cut in the very midst of their supplications. For the enemy shut the gates of the first wall, and their own citizens shut the gates of the second, so that they were closely cooped up between the two walls, and many were run through by the swords of their own men, and many by their own swords, besides an immense number that were slain by the Romans. Nor had they any courage to retaliate, for to the consternation they were in from the enemy was added their being betrayed by their own friends, which quite broke their spirits; and at last they died, cursing not the Romans, but their own citizens, till they were all slain, being twelve thousand in number. Then Trajan, inferring that the city was empty of people that could fight, and although there should be a few of them therein, supposing that they would be too timorous to venture upon any opposition, reserved the actual taking of the city for the general; so he sent messengers to Vespasian, and desired him to send his son Titus to put the finishing strokes on the victory he had gained. Vespasian, thereupon, imagining there might be some work still necessary, sent his son with an army of five hundred horse and one thousand foot. And he quickly arrived at the city, and put his army in order of battle, and set Trajan in command of the left wing, while he took the right himself, and led the blockading force in person. And when the soldiers applied ladders to the wall on every side, the Galilæans opposed them for a while from above, but soon abandoned the walls. Then did Titus' men leap into the city, and master it quickly, but when they had got inside a fierce battle took place between them and the Jews who formed against them. For those that could fight fell upon the Romans in the narrow streets, and the women threw whatever came to hand at them from the houses; and the fight was kept up for six hours' time; but when the fighting men were despatched, the rest of the multitude had their throats cut, both young and old together, partly in the open air, and partly in their own houses. So there were now no males remaining besides the infants, who, with the women, were carried as slaves into captivity. And the number of those both now slain in the city, and at the former fight, was fifteen thousand, and the captives were two thousand one hundred and thirty. This calamity befell the Galilæans on the twenty-fifth day of the month Dæsius.

§ 32. Nor did the Samaritans escape their share of misfortunes. For they assembled upon the mountain called Gerizim,<sup>1</sup> which is their holy place, and there they remained: and this mustering together of them, and the spirit they showed, seemed to threaten war. Nor were they rendered wiser by the miseries that had come upon the neighbouring cities, but notwithstanding the great success the Romans had had, marched on very foolishly considering their own weakness, being ripe for any tumult. Vespasian therefore thought it best to anticipate their movements, and to cut short their attempts. For although all the district of Samaria had always had garrisons posted throughout it, yet the number of those that had gathered together at Mount Gerizim and their organisation gave ground for alarm. He therefore despatched there Cerealis, the commander of the fifth legion, with six hundred horse and three thousand foot. And he did not think it safe to go up the mountain, and give them battle, because many of the enemy were on the higher ground, so he surrounded all the lower part of the mountain with his army, and watched them all that day. Now it happened that the Samaritans, who were short of water, suffered terribly from the violent heat (for it was summer time, and the multitude had not provided themselves with necessaries), so that some of them died that very day from thirst, while others of them preferred slavery to such a death, and fled to the Romans; from whom Cerealis understood, that those who still stayed there were very much cowed by their misfortunes. So he went up the mountain, and having placed his forces round about the enemy, he first besought them to take the security of his right hand, and come to terms with him, and so save themselves; and assured them that, if they would lay down their arms, he would secure them from any harm; but as he could not prevail upon them, he fell upon them and slew them all, being eleven thousand six hundred. This took place on the twenty-seventh day of the month Dæsius. Such were the calamities that befell the Samaritans.

§ 33. However, the people of Jotapata still held out manfully, and bore up under their miseries beyond all that could be hoped for, and on the forty-seventh day [of the siege] the banks thrown up by the Romans were become higher than the wall. And on that day a certain person deserted to Vespasian, and told him how few were left in the city, and how weak they were, and how they were worn out with perpetual watching and continual fighting, so that they could not now oppose any energetic force that came against them, and that they might be taken by stratagem, if any one attacked them; for about the last watch of the night, when they thought they might have some rest from their unremitting toil, and when morning sleep steals most upon people thoroughly weary, he said the watch used to fall asleep, and his advice was that they should make their attack at that hour. But Vespasian suspected this deserter, knowing how faithful the Jews were to one another, and how much they despised any punishments that could be inflicted on them; for one of the people of Jotapata (who had been taken prisoner before this) had undergone all sorts of torments, and though they tortured him with fire, he would inform his enemies nothing of the affairs within the city, and when he was crucified, smiled at death. However, the probability of the story made the deserter credited, and Vespasian thought he probably spoke the truth, and that they would be no great sufferers if it was a trap; so he commanded them to keep the man in custody, and prepared the army for taking the city.

§ 34. At the appointed hour they marched without noise to the wall; and Titus himself first got upon it, with one of his tribunes Domitius Sabinus, and a few of the fifteenth legion also. And they cut the throats of the watch, and entered the city very quietly. After them came Sextus Cerealis the tribune and Placidus, who led on those that were under them. Now though the citadel was taken, and the enemy were moving about in the very midst of the city, and it was already day, the taking of the city was not yet known to those that were taken; for most were tired out and fast asleep, and a great mist, which then by chance fell upon the city, hindered those that got up from distinctly seeing the case they were in, till the whole Roman army had got in, and they rose up only to find the miseries they were in, and perceived the city was taken only by their being slain. As for the Romans, they so well remembered what they had suffered during the siege, that they neither spared nor pitied any, but thrust the people down the precipice from the citadel and so slew them, where the difficulty of the ground hindered those that were still able to fight from defending themselves. For as they were crowded in the narrow streets, and could not keep their feet sure along the precipice, they were overwhelmed with the crowd of those that came fighting them from the citadel. This incited many, even of those chosen men that were about Josephus, to kill themselves with their own hands. For when they saw that they could kill none of the Romans, they resolved to prevent being slain by the Romans, and got together in the outlying parts of the city, and killed themselves.

§ 35. However, such of the watch as fled at once, at the first intimation that the city was taken, went up into one of the towers on the north of the city, and for a while defended themselves there; but as they were surrounded by a multitude of enemies, they offered to surrender when it was too late, and then courageously offered themselves for slaughter. And the Romans might have boasted that the conclusion of the siege was without blood [on their side], had not a centurion Antonius been slain at the taking of the city. His death was occasioned by the following treachery: one of those that had fled into the caverns, who were a great number, begged that this Antonius would reach him his right hand, both to assure him that he would preserve him, and to give him his assistance in getting up out of the cavern; and he incautiously reached him out his right hand, when the other was too quick for him, and stabbed him from below in the groin with a spear, and killed him immediately.

§ 36. On this day the Romans slew all the people that appeared openly; and on the following days they searched the hiding places, and attacked those that were under ground and in caverns, and spared males of no age, but only infants and women. And twelve hundred were gathered together as captives. As for those that were slain at the taking of the city, and in the former fights, forty thousand were counted. And Vespasian gave orders that the city should be rased to the ground, and all the fortifications burnt down. Thus was Jotapata taken, in the thirteenth year of the reign of Nero, on the first day of the month Panemus.

CHAP. VIII.

How Josephus was informed against by a Woman, and was willing to deliver himself up to the Romans; and what Speech he made to his own Men, when they endeavoured to hinder him; and what he said to Vespasian, when he was brought before him; and how Vespasian treated him.

§ 1.

AND now the Romans searched for Josephus, both from the hatred they themselves bore him, and because their general was very desirous to have him taken; for he reckoned that, if he were taken, the chief fomentor of the war would be removed. So they searched among the dead, and looked into the hiddeu nooks of the city. But when the city was first taken, Josephus was assisted by a certain supernatural providence, for he stole away from the enemy when he was in the midst of them, and leaped into a certain deep pit, which had a large cavern adjacent to it, which could not be seen by those that were above; and here he met with forty persons of note that had concealed themselves, and had provisions enough to last for not a few days. So in the day-time he hid himself from the enemy who occupied all places, and in the night-time he came out of his cavern, and looked about for some way of escaping, and reconnoitred the watch. But as all places were guarded everywhere on his account, so that there was no way of getting off unseen, he went down again into the cavern. Thus he concealed himself two days; but on the third day, when they had taken a woman who had been with them, he was informed against by her. Thereupon immediately, without losing a moment, Vespasian sent two tribunes, Paulinus and Gallicanus, and ordered them to give Josephus their right hands as a security for his life, and to exhort him to come up.

§ 2. So they went and invited him to come up, and gave him assurances that his life should be preserved: but they did not prevail upon him; for he was suspicious from the probability that one who had done so much against the

Romans would have to suffer for it, though not from the mild temper of those that invited him. And he was afraid that they invited him to come up in order to be punished, until Vespasian sent to him a third tribune also, Nicanor, who was well known to Josephus, and had been his intimate friend formerly. When he was come, he enlarged upon the natural mildness of the Romans towards those they had once conquered, and told him that he had behaved himself so valiantly that the superior officers rather admired than hated him; and that the general was very desirous to have him brought to him, not to punish him, for he could do that though he should not surrender, but because he was determined to preserve a man of his courage. He also added that Vespasian, had he meant to lay a trap for him, would not have sent to him a friend of his, nor have put the fairest colour upon the vilest action, by pretending friendship and meaning treachery, nor would he himself have acquiesced and come to him, had it been to deceive him.

§ 3. Now when Josephus hesitated about accepting Nicanor's proposal, the Roman soldiers were so angry, that they desired to set fire to the cavern, but the tribune would not permit them to do so, being very desirous to take Josephus alive. And now, as Nicanor earnestly pressed Josephus to comply, and he noticed how the multitude of the enemies threatened him, he called to mind the dreams which he had dreamed in the night-time, whereby God had signified to him beforehand both the future calamities of the Jews, and the events that concerned the Roman emperors. Now Josephus was able to conjecture well as to the interpretation of such dreams as have been ambiguously delivered by the deity; moreover, he was not unacquainted with the prophecies contained in the sacred books, being himself a priest, and of the posterity of priests. So at that moment he became inspired, and remembering the dreadful character of the dreams he had lately had, he put up a secret prayer to God, and said, "Since it pleases thee, who hast created the Jewish nation, to depress the same, and since all their good fortune is gone over to the Romans, and since thou hast made choice of my soul to foretell what is to come to pass hereafter, I willingly surrender to the Romans, and am content to live. But I declare that I do not go over to the Romans as a deserter, but as thy minister."

§ 4. When he said this, he gave himself up to Nicanor. But when those Jews who had fled with Josephus understood that he meant to surrender to those that invited him to come up, they stood round him in a body, and cried out, "Now, indeed, may the laws of our forefathers groan aloud, now may God himself well be dejected, who has created the souls of the Jews of such a temper, that they despise death. O Josephus! art thou fond of life? and canst thou bear to see the light in a state of slavery? How soon hast thou forgotten thyself! how many hast thou persuaded to lose their lives for liberty! Thou hast then had a false reputation for manhood, and a false reputation for wisdom, if thou hopest for preservation from those against whom thou hast fought so valiantly, and art willing to be preserved by them, if they be in earnest. But although the good fortune of the Romans has made thee forget thyself, we ought to see to the glory of our forefathers. We will lend thee our right hand and sword. And if thou wilt die willingly, thou wilt die as general of the Jews; but if unwillingly, thou wilt die as a traitor." At the same time that they said this, they began to thrust their swords at him, and threatened they would kill him, if he surrendered to the Romans.

§ 5. Upon this, Josephus was afraid of their attacking him, and yet thought he should be a traitor to the commands of God, if he died before they were delivered, so he began to philosophize to them in the emergency he was in, and spoke to them as follows. "O my friends, why are we so earnest to kill ourselves? and why do we set our dearest things, the soul and body, at such variance? Does any one say that I am changed? Nay, the Romans are sensible how the matter stands well enough. It is a brave thing to die in war, but only according to the law of war, by the hand of conquerors. If, therefore, I flee from the sword of the Romans, I truly deserve to die by my own sword and my own hand; but if they will spare their enemy, how much more justly ought we to spare ourselves? For it is certainly a foolish thing to do that to ourselves which we quarrel with them for doing to us. I admit that it is noble to die for liberty; but only in war, and at the hands of those who try to take that liberty from us ; but now our enemies are neither meeting us in battle, nor killing us. Now, he is equally a coward who wishes not to die when he is obliged to die, and he who wishes to die when he is not obliged to do so. What are we afraid of that we will not go up to the Romans? Is it death? If so, shall we inflict on ourselves for certain what we are afraid of, when we but suspect our enemies will inflict it on us? But some one will say that we fear slavery. Are we then altogether free at present? It may also be said that it is a manly act to kill oneself. No, certainly, but a most unmanly one, as I should esteem that pilot most cowardly, who, out of fear of a storm, should sink his ship of his own accord. Indeed suicide is unknown to the common nature of all animals, and is impiety to God our Creator. For no animal dies by its own contrivance, or by its own means. For the desire of life is a strong law of nature with all ; on which account we deem those that openly try to take it away from us to be our enemies, and we take vengeance on those that try to do so by treachery. And do you not think that God is very angry when a man despises what he has bestowed on him? For it is from him that we have received our being, and we ought to leave it to his disposal to take that being away from us. The bodies of all men are indeed mortal, and created out of corruptible matter ; but the soul is ever immortal, and is a part of God that inhabits our bodies. Besides, if any one destroys or misuses deposit he has received from a mere man, he is esteemed a wicked and perfidious person ; and if any one cast out of his own body the deposit of God, can we imagine that he who is thereby affronted does not know of it? Moreover, our law justly ordains that slaves which run away from their masters shall be punished, though the masters they run away from may have been wicked masters to them. And shall we endeavour to run away from God, who is the best of all masters, and not think ourselves guilty of impiety? Do not you know that those who depart out of this life according to the law of nature, and pay the debt which was received from God, when he that lent it us is pleased to require it back again, enjoy eternal fame ; that their houses and posterity are sure, and that their souls are pure and obedient, and obtain the most holy place in heaven, from whence, in the revolution of ages, they are again sent into pure bodies; while the souls of those whose hands have acted madly against themselves, are received in the darkest place in Hades, and God, who is their father, punishes those that offend against either soul or body in their posterity. So God hates suicide, and it is punished by our most wise legislator. For our laws ordain that the bodies of such as kill themselves shall be exposed till sunset without burial, although it be lawful to bury even our enemies. The laws of other nations also enjoin to cut off such men's right hands when they are dead, as they had used them in destroying themselves, for they reckoned that, as the body is alien from the soul, so is the hand also alien from the body. It is, therefore, my friends, a noble thing to reason justly, and not to add to the calamities which men bring upon us impiety towards our Creator. If we have a mind to preserve ourselves, let us do so; for to be preserved by our enemies, to whom we have given so many proofs of our courage, is no way inglorious; and if we have a mind to die, it is good to die by the hand of those that have conquered us. For my part, I shall not transfer myself to our enemies' ranks, to be a traitor to myself. For certainly I should then be much more foolish than those who deserted to the enemy, since they did it in order to save themselves, and I should do it for destruction, and that my own destruction. However, I heartily wish the Romans may prove treacherous in this matter; for if, after the offer of their right hand for security, I be slain by them, I shall die cheerfully, and carry away with me the sense of their perfidiousness, as a consolation greater than victory itself."

§ 6. Much similar language did Josephus use to these men to deter them from committing suicide. But they shut their ears in desperation, having long ago devoted themselves to die, and were irritated at Josephus; and ran upon him with their swords, one from one place, another from another, and called him a coward, and each seemed as if going at once to smite him. But he calling one of them by name, and looking like his general at another, and taking a third by the right hand, and making a fourth ashamed of himself by praying him to forbear, though distracted in this emergency by various emotions, kept off every one of their swords from killing him, and was forced to act like wild beasts surrounded on every side, who ever turn on the last assailant. And the right hands of some were paralysed by the reverence they still bore their general even in these extremities, and their swords dropped out of their hands, and several while pointing their swords at him spontaneously desisted.

§ 7. However, in this emergency Josephus was not destitute of his usual sagacity; but trusting himself to the providence of God, he put his life into hazard. So he said, "Since you are determined to die, come on, let us commit our mutual deaths to settlement by lot. He whom the lot falls on first, let him be killed by him that has the second lot, and thus fortune shall take us all; nor shall any of us perish by his own right hand, for it would be unfair if, when the rest are gone, somebody should repent and save himself." This proposal appeared to them very fair, and when he had prevailed upon them to determine this matter by lots, he drew one of the lots for himself also. He who had the first lot laid his neck bare to him that had the next, supposing that the general would die among them immediately; for they thought death sweeter than life, if Josephus might but die with them. And he was left with another to the last, whether we must say it happened so by chance, or by the providence of God. And as he was very desirous neither to be condemned by the lot, nor, if he were left to the last, to imbrue his right hand in the blood of his fellow-countryman, he persuaded him to trust to him and to live as well as himself.

§ 8. Thus Josephus escaped both in the war with the Romans, and in this war with his own friends, and was led by Nicanor to Vespasian. And all the Romans flocked to see him; and as the multitude crowded round the general, there was a confused clamour, some rejoicing that Josephus was taken, and some threatening him, and some pressing very near to see him. And those that were at greater distance cried out to have their enemy put to death, while those that were near called to mind the actions he had done, and marvelled at the reverse in his fortunes; nor were there any of the Roman commanders, however enraged they had been at him before, but relented at the sight of him. And Titus was moved above all the rest, by Josephus' endurance under his reverses and pity for his youth; for he recalled to mind that but a little while ago he was fighting, and now lay in the hands of his enemies, which made him consider the power of fortune, and how quick is the turn of affairs in war, and how no condition of men is stable and sure. So he then induced a great many as well as himself to commiserate Josephus. He had also very great influence in persuading his father to save his life. However, Vespasian gave strict orders that he was to be kept with great care, as though he intended forthwith to send him to Nero.

§ 9. When Josephus heard this, he said that he had something that he wished to say to the general alone. When therefore all were ordered to withdraw, except Titus and two friends, Josephus said, "Thou, O Vespasian, thinkest no more than that thou hast taken Josephus himself captive, but I come to thee as a messenger of greater things. For had not I been sent by God to thee, I knew the custom of the Jews, and how it becomes generals to die. Dost thou intend to send me to Nero? Why? Will not<sup>1</sup> Nero have successors up to thee? Thou, Vespasian, wilt be Cæsar and emperor, and so will thy son here. Bind me now still more carefully, and keep me for thyself, for thou, O Cæsar, wilt not only be lord over me, but over the land and sea and all mankind. And certainly I deserve to be kept in closer custody than I now am in, in order to be punished, if I falsely affirm any thing as from God." When he had said this, Vespasian at first did not believe him, but supposed that Josephus said this, as a cunning trick, in order to be saved alive; but in a little time he was induced to believe what he said to be true, God stirring him up already to think of obtaining the empire, and by other signs foreshowing his advancement. He also found Josephus to have spoken truth on other occasions. For when one of those friends that were present at the secret conference said to Josephus, "I cannot but wonder why thou couldst not foretell to the people of Jotapata that they would be taken, nor couldst foretell this captivity which has happened to thyself, unless what thou now sayest be silly talk to evade the consequences of the anger against thee ;” Josephus replied, “I foretold to the people of Jotapata that they would be captured on the forty-seventh day, and that I should be taken alive by the Romans.” Now when Vespasian had inquired of the captives privately about these predictions, he found them to be true, and then he began to believe those that concerned himself. But he did not set Josephus at liberty from his bonds or from custody, but gave him suits of clothes and other precious gifts ; he treated him also in a very kind manner, and continued to do so, Titus co-operating very much in the honour paid to him.

CHAP. IX.

§ 1.

NOW Vespasian returned to Ptolemais<sup>1</sup> on the fourth day of the month Panemus, and from thence he went to Cæsarea,<sup>2</sup> which lay on the coast, and was a very great city of Judæa, and mostly inhabited by Greeks. Here the citizens received both the Roman army and its general with all sorts of acclamations and rejoicing, partly from the good-will they bore to the Romans, but principally from the hatred they bore to those that were conquered by them. So they came en masse clamouring against Josephus, and begged that he might be punished. But Vespasian passed over this petition concerning him, as offered by an inconsiderate multitude, with mere silence. He also placed two of the legions at Cæsarea for their winter quarters, perceiving that the city was fit for such a purpose ; but he placed the tenth and the fifth at Scythopolis,<sup>3</sup> that he might not distress Cæsarea with the entire army. Cæsarea was warm even in winter, and suffocating hot in the summer-time, as it lay in a plain and was near the sea.

§ 2. Meantime there was gathered together a great number, as well of such as had through sedition revolted from the Romans as those that had escaped out of the cities that had been overthrown, and they repaired Joppa<sup>1</sup> (which had been laid desolate by Cestius) that it might serve them as a point d'appui; and because the adjoining region had been laid waste in the war, and was not capable of supporting them, they determined to shift their operations to the sea. So they built themselves a great many piratical ships, and turned pirates on the seas near Syria and Phœnicia and Egypt, and made those seas unnavigable to all men. Now as soon as Vespasian knew of their organisation, he sent both foot and horse to Joppa, who entered into it by night as it was unguarded. And those that were in it perceived that they would be attacked, and were afraid, and did not endeavour to keep the Romans out, but fled to their ships, and lay at sea all night out of the reach of darts.

§ 3. Now Joppa is without a haven naturally, for it ends in a rough shore, straight all the rest of it, but the two ends converge towards each other, where there are deep precipices, and great rocks that jut out into the sea, and where the chains wherewith Andromeda was bound are still shown, attesting the antiquity of that fable, and the north wind blows and beats upon the shore, and dashes mighty waves against the rocks which receive them, and renders the haven more dangerous than the open sea. Now as these people from Joppa were tossing about in the offing, in the morning a violent wind blew upon them (it is called by those that sail there Black Boreas), and dashed some of their ships against one another there, and some against the rocks; and many that were violently striving against the advancing tide to get into the open sea (for they were afraid of the rocky shore and the enemy upon it) were submerged by the waves that rose mountains high. Nor was there any place where they could flee to, nor any safety if they stayed where they were, as they were thrust off the sea by the violence of the wind, and out of the city by the violence of the Romans. And there was loud lamentation when the ships dashed against one another, and a terrible noise when they were broken to pieces; and some of the multitude in them were swallowed up by the waves, and so perished, and a great many were entangled in the wrecks. And some of them thought that to die by their own swords was an easier death than by the sea, and so they killed themselves, however, most were carried away by the waves, and dashed to pieces against the rocks, so that the sea was bloody a long way, and the shore was full of dead bodies, and the Romans watched for those that were carried ashore safe and slew them. And the number of bodies that came ashore was four thousand two hundred. The Romans also took the city without opposition, and rased it to the ground.

§ 4. Thus was Joppa taken twice by the Romans in a short time. And Vespasian, to prevent pirates from flocking together there any more, placed a camp in the citadel, and left a troop of horse in it and a few foot, that these last might stay there and guard the camp, and that the horse might plunder the surrounding country, and might destroy the neighbouring villages and small towns. So they scoured the country, as they were ordered to do, and every day ravaged and desolated the whole region.

§ 5. Now when the fate of Jotapata<sup>1</sup> was reported at Jerusalem, most at first disbelieved it, not only because of the vastness of the calamity, but also because they had no eye-witness to attest the truth of what was reported, for not a single person escaped to carry the news, but rumour, naturally apt to spread bad tidings, had of itself spread abroad news that the city was taken. However, the truth oozed out by degrees from the places near Jotapata, and the tidings appeared to all to be too true; but fictitious additions were made to what had really happened, for it was reported that Josephus was slain at the taking of the city. This news filled Jerusalem with the greatest sorrow; and in every house, and among all to whom any of the slain were related, there was lamentation for them, but the mourning for the commander was a public one; and some mourned for people who had been their guests, others for their kindred, others for their friends, others for their brothers, but all mourned for Josephus; insomuch that the lamentation did not cease in the city before the thirtieth day, and a great many hired flute-players<sup>1</sup> to lead off their coronachs.

§ 6. But as the truth came out in time, and the real state of affairs at Jotapata, it was found that the death of Josephus was a fiction; and when the people of Jerusalem understood that he was alive and that the commanders treated him differently than they generally treated captives, they showed as much anger at his being alive as they had shown good-will before when they thought he was dead. He was abused by some as having been a coward, and by others as having been a traitor; and the city was full of indignation and reproaches against him: their rage was also aggravated by their afflictions, and more inflamed by their ill success; and what usually produce caution in wise men, I mean reverses, became a spur to them to venture on further calamities, and the end of one misery became ever the beginning of another. They therefore were more eager to fight the Romans, intending to take their revenge on Josephus also as well as them. Such was the confusion that now reigned at Jerusalem.

§ 7. Now Vespasian, in order to see the kingdom of Agrippa (which that king himself invited him to do, partly to treat the general and his army in the best and most splendid manner his private means would enable him to do, and partly by their help to correct such things as were amiss in his kingdom), removed from Cæsarea<sup>2</sup> by the sea-side to that which is called Cæsarea Philippi.<sup>3</sup> And there he rested his army for twenty days, and himself feasted, and returned public thanks to God for the success he had had in his undertakings. But as soon as he was informed that Tiberias was on the eve of insurrection, and that Taricheæ<sup>1</sup> had revolted (both which cities were part of the kingdom of Agrippa), being resolved to subdue the Jews every where, he thought it opportune to make an expedition against these cities, and for the sake of Agrippa, in return for his hospitality, to bring those cities to reason. So he sent his son Titus to [the other] Cæsarea, that he might bring the army that lay there to Scythopolis,<sup>2</sup> which is the largest city of Decapolis, and in the neighbourhood of Tiberias, where he also himself went, and waited for his son. He then marched forward with three legions, and pitched his camp thirty furlongs from Tiberias, at a certain station easily seen by the insurgents, called Sennabris.<sup>3</sup> He also sent Valerian, a decurion, with fifty horse, to speak peaceably to those that were in the city, and to exhort them to give him assurances of their fidelity; for he had heard that the people were desirous of peace, but were factiously overpowered by some who tried to force them to fight. When Valerian had ridden up to the place, and was near the wall, he alighted off his horse, and made those that were with him do the same, that they might not be thought to come to skirmish with them. But before he could speak to them, the most warlike of the insurgents made a sally upon them with their arms; their leader was one whose name was Jesus, the son of Shaphat, the captain of a band of robbers. Now Valerian, not thinking it safe to fight contrary to the commands of the general, even if he were sure of victory, and knowing that it was a hazardous undertaking for a few to fight against many, and for those that were unprovided to fight against those that were ready, and being also alarmed at this unexpected audacity of the Jews, fled away on foot, as did five of the rest in like manner, and left their horses behind them; which horses

Jesus and his men led off to the city, and rejoiced as if they had taken them in battle and not by surprise.

§ 8. Now the elders of the people, and such as seemed of principal authority among them, fearing what would be the issue of the matter, fled to the camp of the Romans : and taking their king with them, fell down before Vespasian as suppliants, and besought him not to despise them, nor to impute the madness of a few to the whole city, but to spare a people that had ever been friendly to the Romans, and to bring the authors of this revolt to punishment, who had hitherto so watched them, that though they had long been anxious to give the Romans the security of their right hands, they had not yet found an opportunity to do so. To these supplications the general hearkened (though he was very angry with the whole city because of the carrying off the six horses), for he saw that Agrippa was greatly concerned about this. And when Vespasian and Agrippa had accepted of their right hands by way of security, Jesus and his party thought it not safe for them to continue any longer at Tiberias, so they fled to Taricheæ. The next day Vespasian sent Trajan on with some horse to the mountain-ridge, to make trial of the multitude, whether they were all disposed for peace. And as soon as he knew that the people were of the same mind as the suppliants, he took his army, and went to the city ; upon which the citizens opened to him their gates, and met him with acclamations of joy, and called him their saviour and benefactor. But as the army was a great while getting in at the gates because they were so narrow, Vespasian commanded the south wall to be broken down, and so made a broader entrance. However, he charged his men to abstain from rapine and injustice, in order to gratify the king, and on his account also spared the walls, as the king undertook that the citizens would continue [faithful to the Romans] for the time to come. And thus did he restore this city to a quiet state, after it had been grievously afflicted by faction.

CHAP. X.

How Taricheæ was taken. A Description of the River Jordan, and of the Country round the Lake of Gennesar.

§ 1.

AND now Vespasian pitched his camp between Tiberias and Taricheæ, and fortified his camp very strongly, suspecting that the war there would be long; for all the insurgents flocked into Taricheæ, relying on the strength of that city, and on the lake that lay near it, which is called Gennesar<sup>1</sup> by the people of the country. The city itself is situated, like Tiberias, at the foot of a mountain, and on all sides not washed by the sea had been strongly fortified by Josephus, though not so strongly as Tiberias. For the walls of Tiberias had been made strong at the beginning of the Jews' revolt with much expenditure of money and strength, but Taricheæ had enjoyed only the remains of that liberality. But they had many ships ready upon the lake, in order that, if they were beaten on land, they might retire to them, and they were also equipped for a sea-fight if necessary. But as the Romans were fortifying their camp, Jesus and his party were neither dismayed at the numbers nor discipline of the enemy, but made a sally upon them, and at the very first onset dispersed those that were fortifying the camp, and pulled what little work they had done to pieces; but as soon as they saw the armed men mustering together, before they had suffered any thing themselves, they retired to their own men. But the Romans pursued them, and drove them to their ships, where they launched out just as far as might give them the opportunity of reaching the Romans with their missiles, and then cast anchor, and drew up their ships close as in line of battle, and so fought a sort of sea-fight with the enemy who were on land. And Vespasian, hearing that great numbers of them were concentrated in the plain that was before the city, sent his son with six hundred picked horse against them.

§ 2. But when Titus perceived that the enemy was very numerous, he sent to his father, and informed him that he should want a larger force. But as he saw that most of his cavalry were eager to fight, and that before any reinforcement could come to them, though some were secretly dismayed at the number of the Jews, he stood in a place whence he might be heard, and spoke to his men as follows. “Men and Romans! for it is well for me to remind you in the beginning of my speech what nation you are, that so you may not be ignorant who you are, and against whom we are going to fight. For as to us Romans, no part of the world has been able to escape our hands hitherto; while the Jews, that I may speak of them too, do not yet grow weary of being beaten. And it would be monstrous for us to grow weary in success, when they bear up under reverses. As to the eagerness which you openly show, I see it and rejoice at it; but I am afraid lest the numbers of the enemy should bring secret panic to any individual among you. Let such an one consider again who he is, and against whom he is to fight. For these Jews, though they be very bold and despise death, are but a disorderly body and unskilful in war, and may rather be called a mob than an army. And I need say nothing of our skill and good order; for the only reason why we Romans are exercised for war in time of peace, is that we may not think of numbers when we come to fight with our enemies. For what advantage should we reap by our continual military training, if we must still be equal in numbers to such as have not been used to war? Consider, further, that you are to contend against men unarmed, while you are well armed, against foot, while you are horse, and against those that have no general, while you have one; and as these advantages make you in effect many times as numerous as you really are, so do their disadvantages mightily diminish their number. Now it is not the number of men, though they be soldiers, that manages wars with success, but it is their bravery that does it, though there be but a few. And indeed a few are easily set in battle array, and can easily assist one another, while armies too numerous are more hurt by themselves than by the enemy. It is boldness and rashness, emotions caused by despair, that lead the Jews, emotions powerful indeed in the flush of victory, but quite extinguished at the least ill success; but we are led by courage and discipline and fortitude, which shows itself indeed in our good fortune, and does not desert us for ever even in our bad fortune. Moreover, you will fight for greater stakes than the Jews; for although they run the hazard of war for liberty and country, yet what can be a greater motive to us than glory, and that it may never be said, after we have got dominion of the world, that the Jews are able to confront us? We ought also to reflect that there is no fear of our suffering any irreparable disaster in the present case, for many are ready to assist us, and at hand also, but it is in our power to win this victory by ourselves, and I think we ought to anticipate those troops my father is sending to our assistance, that our success may be unshared and so greater. And I cannot but think that now my father and I and you are all put on our trial, whether he is worthy of his former glorious performances, whether I am his son, and whether you are really my soldiers. For it is usual for him to conquer, and for myself, I could not bear the thought of returning to him if I were defeated. And for you, how will you not be ashamed, if you are beaten, when your commander goes before you into danger? For know well that I shall go into danger first, and first attack the enemy. Do not you therefore desert me, but be persuaded that God will assist and encourage my charge. Know this also before we begin, that we shall have better success in a hand to hand fight than we should have if we were to fight at a distance."

§ 3. As Titus was saying this, a divine fury fell upon his men, and when Trajan came up with four hundred horse, before the fight began, they chafed because the fame of the victory would be diminished by being shared with others. Vespasian had also sent Antonius Silo with two thousand archers, and had charged them to occupy the mountain opposite the city, and repel those that were upon the wall. And they did as they were commanded, and prevented those that attempted to assist them in that quarter. And now Titus rode first against the enemy, and the others with a shout after him, and they deployed so as to make as large a front in the plain as the enemy, so that they appeared much more numerous than they really were. Now although the Jews were dismayed at their attack and good order, they resisted their charge for a little while; but being pricked with their long poles, and upset by the charge of the horse, they got trampled under foot. And as many of them were slain on every side, they dispersed and fled to the city as fast as each of them was able. And Titus hotly pursued and slew some from behind, and some he cut his way through as they were en masse, and some he charged face to face, and ran them through, and many he charged as they fell one upon another, and stabbed them. And he intercepted the retreat of all to the walls, and turned them back into the plain, till at last they forced a passage by their numbers, and got away, and fled into the city.

§ 4. And now a terrible disturbance awaited them inside the city. For the inhabitants themselves, who had possessions there, and to whom the city belonged, were indisposed to fight from the very beginning, and much more so now they had been beaten; but the foreigners, who were very numerous, tried to force them to fight so much the more, insomuch that there was a clamour and a tumult among them, all being angry with one another, and all but fighting. And when Titus heard this tumult, for he was not far from the wall, he cried out, "Fellow soldiers, now is our time; why do we make any delay, when God is giving up the Jews to us? Take the victory which is given you: do not you hear what a noise they make? Those that have escaped our hands are at variance with one another. We have the city, if we make haste. But besides haste we want energy and courage. For no great thing is wont to be accomplished without danger. And we must not only prevent the enemy uniting again, which necessity will soon compel them to do, but we must also anticipate the coming of our own men to our assistance, that (few as we are) we may conquer so great a multitude, and may ourselves alone take the city."

§ 5. Directly Titus had said this, he leaped upon his horse, and led the way to the lake, through which he rode, and entered the city first, and the others followed him. Thereupon those that were upon the walls were seized with panic at his boldness, nor durst any one venture to fight or hinder him, but Jesus and those that were with him left the garrison and fled through the country, while others ran down to the lake, and met the enemy face to face; and some were slain as they were trying to get on board their ships, and others as they attempted to swim to those ships that had already put out to the middle of the lake. There was also a great slaughter made in the city, as those foreigners that had not fled already fought against the Romans, but the inhabitants were killed without fighting (for in hope of Titus' giving them his right hand for their security, and being conscious that they had not given their counsel for war, they avoided fighting), till Titus had slain the authors of this revolt, and then put a stop to any further slaughter, feeling pity for the inhabitants of the place. As for those that had fled to the lake, upon seeing the city taken, they sailed as far as they possibly could from the enemy.

§ 6. Thereupon Titus sent one of his horsemen to his father, to announce to him the good news of what he had done: at which, as was natural, he was very joyful, both on account of the courage and glorious success of his son (for he thought now the greatest part of the war was over). He then went to Taricheæ himself, and set men to surround and guard that city, and commanded them to take care that nobody got privately out of it, and to kill such as attempted to do so. And on the next day he went down to the lake, and commanded rafts to be constructed to pursue those that had fled in their ships. These rafts were quickly constructed accordingly, because there was plenty of material, and a great number of carpenters also.

§ 7. Now this lake of Gennesar<sup>1</sup> is so called from the country adjoining it. Its breadth is forty furlongs, and its length a hundred and forty, and its water is sweet and very agreeable for drinking, for it is finer than the thick water of marshes, the lake also is pure, and on every side ends directly at the shores and sands; it is also of a temperate nature when you draw it up, and of a softer nature than river or fountain water, and cooler invariably than one would expect from the extent of the lake. Indeed, when this water is kept in the open air, it is as cold as snow, so the country people keep it in the open air by night in summer. There are also several kinds of fish in it, different both in taste and appearance to those elsewhere. It is divided into two parts by the river Jordan. Now Panium<sup>1</sup> is thought to be the source of the Jordan, but in reality it is carried to it underground in some secret manner from the place called Phiala:<sup>2</sup> which is, as you go up to Trachonitis,<sup>3</sup> a hundred and twenty furlongs from Cæsarea,<sup>4</sup> and not far from the road on the right hand. Indeed the lake gets its name of Phiala<sup>3</sup> very justly from its roundness, being round like a wheel; and its water continues always up to its edge, without either sinking or running over. And though this source of the Jordan was not formerly known, it was discovered when Philip was tetrarch of Trachonitis. For he had chaff thrown into Phiala, and it was found carried down the water to Panium, where the ancients thought the source of the river was. As for Panium itself, its natural beauty has been improved by the royal liberality of Agrippa, and set off by his wealth. Now the Jordan's visible stream rises at this cavern, and divides the marshes and swamps of the lake of Semechonitis;<sup>5</sup> and when it has run another hundred and twenty furlongs, it first passes by the city of Julias,<sup>7</sup> and then passes through the middle of the lake of Gennesar,<sup>8</sup> after which it runs a long way over a desert, and then has its exit into the lake Asphaltitis.<sup>9</sup>

§ 8. The country also that is near the lake has the same name of Gennesar,<sup>10</sup> and is wonderful for its nature as well as its beauty. For its soil is so fruitful that all sorts of trees can grow upon it, and the inhabitants accordingly plant all sorts of trees there; for the temper of the air is so well mixed that it agrees very well with different sorts. Thus walnuts, which of all trees require the coldest air, flourish there in vast plenty; there are palm-trees also, which grow best in hot air; fig-trees also and olives grow near them, though they require a more temperate air. One might call this country the ambitious display of nature (as it forces those plants that are naturally enemies to one another to agree together), and the happy contention of the seasons (as if every one of them laid claim to this country); for it not only nourishes different sorts of fruit beyond men's expectation, but preserves them a great while. For it supplies the principal fruits, as grapes and figs, continually during ten months of the year, and the rest of the fruits as they become ripe through the whole year. For besides the good temperature of the air, it is also watered from a most fertile fountain, which the people of the country call Capharnaum.<sup>1</sup> Some have thought this to be a vein of the Nile, because it produces a fish<sup>2</sup> similar to that produced by the lake near Alexandria. And the length of this country extends along the banks of the lake that bears the same name for thirty furlongs, and it is in breadth twenty furlongs. Such is the nature of the district.

§ 9. And when the rafts were constructed, Vespasian put upon them as many of his troops as he thought sufficient to deal with those that were upon the lake, and put out after them. Now those who had been driven on to the lake, could neither flee to the land, where all was in the enemies' hand, nor could they fight upon equal terms on the water. For their vessels were small and fitted only for piracy, and were too weak to fight with Vespasian's rafts, and the men on board them were so few, that they were afraid to come to close quarters with the Romans, who attacked them en masse. However, as they sailed round the rafts, and sometimes came near them, they threw stones at the Romans when they were a good way off, or came closer and smote them; but they received most hurt themselves in both cases. As for the stones they threw at the Romans, they only made a continuous rattle (for they threw them against men in complete armour), while the Roman darts pierced them, and when they ventured to come near the Romans, they suffered themselves before they could do any harm to them, and were submerged, they and their ships together. And as for those that endeavoured to break through, the Romans reached at them and ran many of them through with their long pikes, and others they slew leaping into their vessels with their swords in their hands, and some who were entangled by the collision of the rafts they captured as also their vessels. And for such as were submerged, if they lifted their heads up above the water, they were either killed by darts, or captured by the rafts, and if, in the desperate case they were in, they attempted to swim to the enemies, the Romans cut off either their heads or their hands. And indeed they were slain in various manners everywhere, till those that remained being routed were forced to get on land, as their vessels were surrounded. And as many were prevented getting ashore, they were killed by the darts upon the lake, and the Romans slew many who leaped out of their vessels on to the land. And one might then see the lake all bloody, and full of dead bodies, for none escaped. And a terrible stench and dreadful sight was there on the following days all over that country; for the shores were full of wrecks and of dead bodies all swollen; and as the dead bodies were burnt by the sun and putrefied, they corrupted the air, so that this tragic sight was not only a pitiable object to the Jews, but was even hateful to those who had been the authors of it. This was the upshot of the sea-fight. The number of the slain, including those that were killed in the city before, was six thousand five hundred.

war), and he consulted with his generals whether he ought to save the inhabitants or not. And when they all said that the letting them go would be detrimental to the Roman interests (for if they were set at liberty, they would not be quiet, since they would be people destitute of homes, and might be able to compel such as they fled to to fight against them), Vespasian came to the conclusion that they did not deserve to be saved alive, and that, if they escaped, it would be to the detriment of those who let them go, and considered with himself how they should be slain. For if he had them slain there, he suspected the people of the country would become his bitter enemies; for they would never put up with so many that had been suppliants to him being killed; and he could not himself bear the idea of offering violence to them, after they had surrendered on promise of their lives. However, his friends carried the day, for they said that nothing done against the Jews could be impious, and that he ought to prefer what was expedient to what was honourable, when both could not co-exist. So he gave the Jews a doubtful security, for he permitted them to go out along no other road than that which led to Tiberias. And as they readily believed what they wished to be true, and went along securely and openly with their effects on the road which was allowed them, the Romans occupied all the road that led to Tiberias, that none of them might escape, and shut them up in the city. Then came Vespasian, and ordered them all to stand in the stadium; and commanded to kill the old men together with the others that were useless for war, who were twelve hundred in number. Out of the young men he chose six thousand of the strongest, and sent them to Nero to dig through the Isthmus of Corinth,<sup>1</sup> and sold the remainder for slaves, namely thirty thousand and four hundred, besides such as he made a present of to Agrippa; for as to those that belonged to his kingdom, he gave him leave to do what he pleased with them: and the king sold these also. As for the rest of the multitude, who were Trachonites,<sup>2</sup> and Gaulanites,<sup>3</sup>

and from Hippos,<sup>1</sup> and some from Gadara,<sup>2</sup> most were factious persons and fugitives, whose bad characters in peace commended war to them. All these were taken prisoners on the eighth day of the month Gorpizæus.

THE SIEGE OF GAMALA TO THE COMING OF TITUS TO

§ 1.

NOW all those Galilæans who had revolted from the Romans after the capture of Jotapata, joined them again upon the capture of Tarichææ, and the Romans got possession of all the fortresses and cities, except Gischala<sup>3</sup> and the fortresses on Mount Tabor.<sup>4</sup> Gamala<sup>5</sup> also, a city opposite Tarichææ, lying above the lake, joined with these. This city formed part of Agrippa's kingdom, as did also Sogane<sup>6</sup> and Seleucia.<sup>7</sup> Now both Sogane and Gamala belonged to Gaulanitis<sup>8</sup> (for Sogane was a part of what was called Upper Gaulana, as was Gamala of Lower Gaulana), and Seleucia was situated near the lake of the Semichonitæ,<sup>9</sup> which lake is thirty furlongs in breadth, and sixty in length ; and its marshes extend to the place called Daphne,<sup>1</sup> which in other respects is a delicious place, and has fountains which supply water to what is called the Little Jordan,<sup>2</sup> under the temple of the golden calf,<sup>3</sup> and send it on to the Great Jordan.<sup>4</sup> Now Agrippa had united Sogane and Seleucia to himself by treaty at the very beginning of the revolt from the Romans, but Gamala did not come over to him, as it relied upon the difficulty of getting at it even more than Jotapata.<sup>5</sup> For it was situated upon the rugged ridge of a high mountain, with a kind of hump in the middle; for where it begins to ascend, it lengthens itself, and declines as much before as behind, so that it is like a camel in shape, from which indeed it gets its name,<sup>6</sup> though the people of the country do not pronounce it accurately. Both on its side and front it breaks off in inaccessible ravines; but behind it is somewhat easier of ascent, where it joins the mountain, but this too the people belonging to the place have by an oblique trench made difficult of ascent. On its acclivity, which is almost perpendicular, houses are built, terribly thick and close to one another. The city also hangs so, that it looks as if it would fall down upon itself, so sharp is it at the top. It faced south, and its southern ridge, which reached to an immense height, served as a citadel to the city; and above that was a precipice not walled in, ending in a very deep ravine. There was also within the walls a spring of water, where the city came to an end.

§ 2. Though the city was naturally so hard to take, Josephus had made it still stronger by building a wall round it, and by mines and underground passages. The people that were in it were made more bold by the nature of the place than the people of Jotapata had been, but they had much fewer fighting men in it, and had such confidence in the natural strength of the place, that they did not take in any more. For the city was full of those that had fled to it for safety, on account of its strength. So it held out against those whom Agrippa sent to besiege it for seven months.

§ 3. And now Vespasian removed from Emmaus,<sup>1</sup> where he had encamped before the city of Tiberias (now Emmaus, if it be interpreted, may be rendered Warm Baths, for in it is a spring of warm water useful for healing), and went to Gamala. But its situation was such, that he was not able to surround it with soldiers to watch it; but where it was practicable, he set his men to watch it, and occupied the mountain which lay above it. And as the legions, according to their usual custom, fortified their camp on it, he began to cast up earthworks at the bottom, at the part towards the east, where the highest tower of the city was, and there the fifteenth legion pitched their camp; while the fifth legion was on duty opposite the middle of the city, and the tenth legion filled up the ditches and the ravines. Now at this time, when king Agrippa came near the walls, and endeavoured to speak to those that were on the walls about surrender, he was hit with a stone on his right elbow by one of the slingers. As for the king, he was immediately surrounded by his own men, but the Romans were excited to set about the siege from their indignation on the king's account, and fear on their own account; for they concluded that these men would omit no kinds of barbarity against foreigners and enemies, seeing they were so savage against one of their own nation, who advised them to nothing but what was for their advantage.

§ 4. So when the earthworks were finished, which was soon done owing to the multitude of hands and their being accustomed to such work, the Romans brought up their machines. But Chares and Joseph, who were the most influential men in the city, set their armed men in order, though they were greatly afraid, because they did not suppose that the city could hold out long, since they had not a sufficient quantity either of water or other necessaries. However, these their leaders encouraged them, and brought them out upon the walls, and for a while indeed they drove away those that were bringing up the machines; but when those machines hit them with darts and stones, they retired into the city. Then did the Romans bring up battering-rams to three separate points, and battered in the wall, and poured in over the breaches made, with a mighty sound of trumpets and din of armour, and shouts of the soldiers, and rushed in upon those that were in the city. But they resisted the Romans for some time at their first entrance, and prevented their going any further, and with great courage repelled them; and the Romans were so overpowered by the numbers who routed them on every side, that they were obliged to flee to the upper parts of the city; whereupon the people turned round and fell upon their enemies who attacked them, and thrust them down hill, and kept slaying them as they were crowded together on the narrow and difficult ground. And as the Romans could neither repel those that were above them, nor go back through their own men that were forcing their way forward, they were compelled to take refuge on the roofs of their enemies' houses, which were close to the ground. But these, being thus full of soldiers, could not bear the weight, and soon fell in; and when one house fell in it shook down a great many of the houses under it, as they again did those that were under them. In this way a very great number of the Romans perished, for they were in such a hopeless condition, that although they saw the houses subsiding, they still leaped upon the roofs of them. So many were buried in the ruins, and many of those that got from under them were injured in some part of their bodies, and a still greater number were suffocated by the dust that choked them. The people of Gamala supposed this to be an assistance afforded them by God, and without regarding what injury they suffered themselves, pressed upon the enemy, and thrust them on to the tops of the houses, and when they stumbled in the steep and narrow streets, and were perpetually tumbling down, they threw their missiles at them from above, and kept slaying them. And the very ruins afforded them stones, and for iron weapons the dead bodies of the enemies afforded them what they wanted; for drawing the swords of those that were dead, they made use of them to despatch such as were half dead. Many also fell down from the roofs of the houses, and died from the fall. Nor indeed was flight easy for those that were beaten back, for they were so ignorant of the roads, and the dust was so thick, that they wandered about without recognising one another, and fell foul of one another.

§ 5. Now those that were able with great difficulty to find their way out of the city retired. But Vespasian ever stayed among those that were hard pressed (for he was deeply affected at seeing the city falling in ruins about his army), and, neglecting his own safety, went up gradually to the highest parts of the city before he was aware, and was left there in the midst of dangers, having only a very few with him; for even his son Titus was not with him at this time, having been sent into Syria to Mucianus. However, he thought it neither safe nor decorous to flee, but calling to mind the actions he had done from his youth, and recollecting his courage, as if possessed by a divine fury, he ordered those that were with him to form the testudo with their shields over their bodies and armour, and so bore up against the enemy's attack, who came running down from the top of the city, and without showing any dread at the numbers of the men or of their darts, he stood his ground, until the enemy took notice of the divine courage of his soul, and abated in their ardour. And when they pressed less keenly upon him, he retired slowly, not showing the enemy his back till he had got outside the walls. Now a very great number of the Romans fell in this battle, among whom was Ebutius, the decurion, a man who appeared not only in this engagement, wherein he fell, but everywhere and on former occasions, to be of the truest courage, and he was one that had done very great harm to the Jews. And a certain centurion, whose name was Gallus, being surrounded in the confusion, stole with ten soldiers into the house of a certain person, where he overheard them talking at supper about what the people intended to do against the Romans, or about themselves (for both Gallus and those with him were Syrians). And he got up in the night-time, and cut all their throats, and got back safe, he and the other ten soldiers, to the Romans.

§ 6. And now Vespasian set himself to comfort his army, which was much dejected by reflecting on its ill success, both because they had never before fallen into such a calamity, and still more because they were greatly ashamed that they had left their general alone in great dangers. As to what concerned himself, he avoided saying any thing, that he might by no means seem to complain of their conduct. He said that they ought to bear manfully what was common in war, considering the nature of war, and that conquest could never be without bloodshed, for fortune was fickle. And as they had killed so many myriads of the Jews, they now paid fortune only a small return. And as it was the part of weak people to be too much elated by success, so it was the part of cowards to be too much disheartened in reverses. "For the change from the one to the other is quick, and he is the best warrior who is of a sober mind under misfortunes, that he may continue in that temper, and cheerfully repair mistakes. As to what has now happened, it is neither owing to our own effeminacy, nor to the valour of the Jews; but the difficulty of the ground is the reason both of their success and our defeat. As to this one might blame your excess of zeal. For when the enemy had retired to their heights, you ought to have restrained yourselves, and not have exposed yourselves to the dangers that presented themselves at the top of the city; but upon having mastered the lower parts of the city by degrees, you ought to have provoked those that had retired to the heights to a safe and steady battle; whereas, by being so keen for victory, you took no care for your own safety. But this incautiousness in war and mad zeal is not the habit of the Romans, for we get our success by skill and good order; it is rather the conduct of barbarians, and what the Jews mainly owe their usual defeats to. We ought therefore to return to our own virtue, and to be rather angry than any longer dejected at this unworthy reverse. And let every one seek for his best consolation from his own hand; for so he will avenge those that have been slain, and punish those that have killed them. For myself, I will endeavour, as I have now done, to go first before you against your enemies in every engagement, and to retire last.”

§ 7. Vespasian encouraged his army by this speech. As for the people of Gamala, they took courage for a little while after such great and unexpected success. But when they considered with themselves afterwards that they had now no hopes of any terms of accommodation, and reflected that they could not escape (and their provisions began already to be short), they were exceedingly cast down, and their courage failed them; however, they did not neglect what might ensure their safety, as far as they were able, but the most courageous of them manned those parts of the wall that were broken down, while the rest manned as much of the wall as still remained entire. And as the Romans raised their earthworks, and attempted again to take the city by assault, a great many fled out of the city by ravines difficult of access, where no guards were placed, as also through underground passages. But all those citizens who were afraid of being taken, and so stayed in the city, perished for want of food, for what food there was was brought together from all quarters, and reserved for the fighting men.

§ 8. Such was the unfortunate condition of the people of Gamala. And Vespasian besides this siege marched against those that had seized upon Mount Tabor<sup>1</sup> (a place that lies midway between the great plain and Scythopolis<sup>2</sup>); whose top reaches as high as thirty furlongs, and is almost inaccessible on its north slope; its top is table land of twenty-six furlongs, and it is entirely surrounded by a wall; which Josephus erected, long as it is, in forty days, who was furnished with other materials and with water from below, for the inhabitants only made use of rain water. As, therefore, a great multitude of people had gathered together upon this mountain, Vespasian sent Placidus with six hundred horsemen. Now, as it was impossible for him to ascend the mountain, he invited many of them to peace, by the offer of his right hand for their security, and of his intercession for them; and they came down, but with treacherous designs. Placidus also had treacherous designs upon them, though he spoke mildly to them, intending to capture them when he got them in the plain; they also came down as if to comply with his proposals, but really intended to fall upon him when he was off his guard. However, Placidus' stratagem carried the day. For when the Jews began to fight, he pretended to run away, and when they pursued, he drew them a great way along the plain, and then made his horsemen turn round. Thereupon he beat them, and slew most of them, and cut off the retreat of the rest, and prevented their return. So they left Mount Tabor, and fled to Jerusalem, whereupon the people of the country came to terms with him, for their water failed them, and delivered up both the mountain and themselves to Placidus.

§ 9. Now the bolder of the people of Gamala fled away and hid themselves, while the infirm perished by famine; but the men of war sustained the siege till the two and twentieth day of the month Hyperberetæus, when three soldiers of the fifteenth legion, about the morning watch, got under a high tower that was near them, and secretly undermined it, nor did those that guarded it perceive them, either when they were approaching it, for it was night, nor when they had actually got up to it. These soldiers avoided making a noise, and when they had rolled away five of the strongest stones, leaped away; and the tower fell down suddenly with a very great noise. And its guards fell headlong with it, whereupon those that kept guard at other places were so alarmed that they fled, and the Romans slew many of those that ventured to try and break through, among whom was Joseph, who was slain by a dart, as he was trying to escape at that part of the wall that was broken down. And as those that were in all parts of the city were greatly confounded at the noise, they ran hither and thither, and a great panic fell upon them, as though all the enemy had burst in upon them. Then it was that Chares, who was in bed and in the doctors' hands, gave up the ghost, the fear he was in greatly contributing to make his illness fatal. However, the Romans so well remembered their former ill success, that they did not enter the city till the three and twentieth day of the forementioned month.

§ 10. At that time Titus (who was now with the army), in his indignation at the reverse the Romans had undergone while he was absent, took two hundred chosen horse and some foot with them, and entered without noise into the city. Now when the watch perceived that he had passed by them, they shouted out and betook themselves to their arms ; and as his entrance was soon known to those that were in the city, some of them caught hold of their children and wives, and dragged them after them, and fled up to the citadel with lamentation and cries, while others of them encountered Titus, and were killed without any intermission. And all who were hindered from running up to the citadel, not knowing what in the world to do, fell among the Roman guards. And the groans of those that were being killed were endless everywhere, and the blood ran down all the lower parts of the city from the upper. And now Vespasian himself came up to Titus' assistance against those that had fled to the citadel, and brought his whole army with him. Now this upper part of the city was everywhere rocky and difficult of ascent, and elevated to a vast height, and very full of people on all sides, and surrounded by precipices, and there the Jews cut down those that came up to them, and did much mischief to the others by their darts, and rolled down large stones upon them, while they themselves were so high that the enemies' darts could hardly reach them. However, there arose such a terrible storm as was directly instrumental to their destruction, for it carried the Roman darts against them, and made those which they threw return back, or drove them obliquely away from the foe. Nor could the Jews stand upon the precipices because of the violence of the wind, as they had no firm footing, nor could they see those that were ascending up to them. So the Romans got up and surrounded them, and slew some as they were defending themselves, and others as they were holding out their hands for quarter. For the remembrance of those that had been slain at their former entrance into the city increased their rage against them now. And a great number of those who were surrounded on every side, and despaired of escaping, threw their children and wives and themselves also headlong into the ravine below near the citadel, which had been dug out a vast depth. And it so happened that the anger of the Romans appeared to be milder than the desperation of those that were now taken; for the Romans slew but four thousand, whereas the number of those that threw themselves down was found to be five thousand. Nor did any one escape except two women, who were the daughters of Philip's sister, and Philip himself was the son of a certain eminent man called Jacimus, who had been general of king Agrippa's army; and these escaped because they lay concealed from the rage of the Romans when the city was taken. For they spared not so much as infants; of whom many were flung down by each of them from the citadel. Thus was Gamala taken on the three and twentieth day of the month Hyperberetæus, the city having first revolted on the four and twentieth day of the month Gorpiaëus.

CHAP. II.

The Surrender of Gischala; when John flees from it to Jerusalem.

§ 1.

NOW no place in Galilee remained to be taken but the small city of Gischala,<sup>1</sup> whose people were desirous of peace, for they were mostly husbandmen, and ever applied themselves to cultivating the fruits of the earth. However, a great band of robbers had crept in among them to their detriment, and some of their community were infected with the same contagion. It was John, the son of a certain man whose name was Levi, that drew them into this revolt, and encouraged them in it. He was a cunning knave, and very versatile in character, sanguine in expecting great things, and very clever in getting what he hoped for, and it was known to every body that he desired war that he might thrust himself into authority. And the seditious part of the people of Gischala put themselves under his management, owing to whom probably the people, who had already sent ambassadors to treat of surrender, waited for the coming of the Romans in battle array. Vespasian sent Titus against them with a thousand horsemen, but withdrew the tenth legion to Scythopolis, and himself returned to Cæsarea<sup>1</sup> with the two other legions, that he might allow them to refresh themselves after their long and hard campaign, thinking also that the plenty which was in those cities would recruit their bodies and spirits for the struggles that still lay before them. For he saw there would be no little trouble about Jerusalem, as it was the royal city, and the principal city of the whole nation, and as those that had fled all flocked into it. It was also naturally strong, and the walls that were built round it made him not a little anxious about it. Moreover, he thought the men that were in it so courageous and bold, that even without the walls it would be hard to subdue them. So he exercised his soldiers beforehand for the work, as they train athletes for their contests.

§ 2. Now when Titus rode up to Gischala, he saw it would be easy for him to take the city by assault; but he knew also that, if he took it by storm, the people would be butchered by the soldiers without mercy (and he was already glutted with blood), and he pitied the majority who would then perish indiscriminately with the guilty, so he desired rather that the city might be surrendered up to him on terms. Accordingly, as he saw the walls full of men, who were mostly those that had been led astray, he said to them, that he wondered what it was they relied on, when they alone stayed to fight the Romans, after every other city had been taken by them, when they had seen cities much better fortified than theirs overthrown by a single assault, while all that had trusted themselves to the good faith of the Romans, which he now offered them, without regarding their former insolence, enjoyed their possessions in safety. For their hope of liberty might be pardoned, but their continuing to fight for what was impossible was inexcusable.

He added that, if they would not comply with his humane offer and promise of security, they should have experience of a war that would spare nobody, and should soon be made sensible that their walls would be but amusement for the Roman battering-rams, in relying on which walls they demonstrated themselves to be the only Galilæans that were arrogant captives.

§ 3. To these words of Titus the people could not only make no reply, but could not so much as get upon the wall, for it was all occupied by the robbers, who also guarded the gates, that nobody should go out for submission, nor admit any of Titus' horsemen into the city. But John answered that for himself he was content to accept Titus' offer, and that he would either persuade or force those that refused them. However, he said, Titus ought to pay so much regard to the Jewish law, as to grant them that one day (for it was the sabbath), on which it was unlawful not only to fight, but to treat of peace also. For even the Romans were not ignorant how the period of the seventh day was among them a cessation from all labour; and he who should compel them to transgress the law about that day, would be equally guilty as those who were compelled to transgress it. He added that this delay could be of no disadvantage to Titus (for what could any body think of doing in the night, unless fleeing away? which he could prevent by placing his camp round them), and that they should think it a great point gained, if they were not obliged to transgress the laws of their country; and that it would be becoming in him, who intended to grant them peace beyond their expectation, to regard the laws of those he saved alive. He thus put a trick upon Titus, not so much out of regard to the seventh day, as to his own preservation, for he was afraid that he would be left in the lurch directly the city was taken, and that his only hopes of life lay in his flight that night. Now this was the work of God, who so preserved this John for the destruction of Jerusalem, so that not only was Titus prevailed upon by this pretext for delay, but also pitched his camp further off the city at Cydyssa.<sup>1</sup> This Cydyssa was a strong inland village of the Tyrians, which always hated and was at war with the Galilæans, and had also a great number of inhabitants, and was well fortified, which made it a convenient place for its enmity to our nation.

§ 4. Now during the night, when John saw that there was no guard of the Romans about the city, he seized the opportunity, and, taking with him not only the armed men that were with him, but also a considerable number of those that had little to do together with their families, he fled to Jerusalem. And indeed, though the man was making haste to get away, and was tormented with fears of being a captive or losing his life, yet could he take out of the city with him a multitude of women and children as far as twenty furlongs; but there he left them, as he proceeded further on his journey, when sad were the lamentations of those that were left behind; for the further every one of them had come from his own people, the nearer they thought themselves to be to their enemies. They also frightened themselves with the idea that those who would carry them into captivity were close at hand, and kept turning back at the mere noise they themselves made in their hasty flight, as if those from whom they fled were close upon them. Many of them also missed their ways, and the struggling of those on the road who tried to get before the rest crushed many to death. Indeed, miserable was the destruction of women and children, and some of them ventured to call their husbands and kinsmen back, beseeching them with the bitterest lamentations to wait for them. But John's exhortation prevailed, who cried out to them to save themselves and flee to a place where, if the Romans should seize upon those whom they left behind, they could take their revenge on them for it. So this multitude that ran away was scattered abroad, according as each had strength or speed of foot.

§ 5. The next day Titus came to the walls to complete the arrangements for the surrender of the city; whereupon the people opened their gates to him, and came out to him with their children and wives, and hailed him as their benefactor, who had delivered the city from its garrison. They also informed him of John's flight, and besought him to spare them, and to enter the city and bring any insurgents that remained to punishment. But Titus, disregarding the supplications of the people, sent part of his horse to pursue John, but they could not overtake him, for he was got to Jerusalem by now, but they slew six thousand of those who had gone out with him, and surrounded and brought back with them almost three thousand of the women and children. However, Titus was greatly vexed that he could not bring this John, who had deluded him, to immediate punishment; though he had captives enough, as well as slain enough, to satisfy his anger, though he missed of John. And he entered the city amidst acclamations of joy; and when he had given orders to the soldiers to pull down a small part of the wall to show a military occupation, he repressed those that disturbed the city rather by threats than by punishment, for he thought that many would accuse innocent persons from private hatred and variance, if he should attempt to distinguish those that were worthy of punishment from the rest; and that it was better to leave a guilty person in suspense with his fears, than to destroy with him one that did not deserve it. For probably such a one would learn prudence from fear of punishment, and feel shame at his former offences when he was forgiven; whereas the punishment of such as had once been put to death could never be undone. However, he placed a garrison in the city for its security, by which means he could restrain those that were likely to revolt, and could leave those that were peaceably disposed in greater security. Thus was all Galilee reduced, but not till after it had cost the Romans much pains first.

CHAP. III.

Concerning John of Gischala. Also concerning the Zealots, and the High Priest Ananus ; as also how the Jews raised Factions in Jerusalem.

§ 1.

NOW upon John's entry into Jerusalem the whole body of the people poured forth, and ten thousand of them crowded about every one of the fugitives, and inquired of them what misfortunes had happened abroad, as their breath was so short, and hot, and quick, that of itself it declared the great distress they were in. But the fugitives talked big under their misfortunes, and pretended that they had not fled from the Romans, but only come there to fight them with less hazard ; for it would be an unreasonable and fruitless thing for them to expose themselves to desperate hazards about Gischala<sup>1</sup> and such weak cities, when they ought to husband up their weapons and vigour, and reserve them for the metropolis. But when they related to them the taking of Gischala, and their "decent departure," as they expressed it, from that place, most people understood it to be no better than a flight. And when the people were told of those that were made captives, they were in great alarm, and inferred these things to be plain indications that they would be taken also. As for John, he blushed very little for those he had left behind him, but went about among the people individually, and egged them on to war by the hopes he gave them, for he affirmed that the affairs of the Romans were in a weak condition, and extolled his own power. He also bantered the ignorance of the inexperienced, as if the Romans, even if they could take to themselves wings, could never fly over the walls of Jerusalem, who found such great difficulty in taking the villages of Galilee, and wore out their engines of war against their walls.

were led astray and excited to the war, but as to the more prudent and older men, there was not one of them who did not foresee what was coming, and make lamentation as if the city was already undone. In such confusion were the people at Jerusalem, but the population all over the country was at variance before the sedition at Jerusalem began. For Titus went from Gischala to Cæsarea,<sup>1</sup> and Vespasian went from Cæsarea to Jamnia<sup>2</sup> and Azotus,<sup>3</sup> and took them both, and when he had put garrisons into them he returned with a great number of the people who had come over to him upon his offering them his right hand. There was also disorder and civil war raised in every city, and all those that had a respite from the Romans turned their hands against one another. There was also a bitter contest between those that were enamoured of war and those that desired peace. At first this quarrelsome temper attacked persons in families who could not agree among themselves, and afterwards those people that were dearest to one another broke away from one another, and every one associated with those who held his own opinions, and already began to range themselves on different sides throughout the community. And faction was everywhere, and those that were for innovation and desirous of war were by their youth and boldness too powerful for the aged and prudent. And first all the people of the country betook themselves individually to plunder, after which they got together in companies to rob the people of their district, so that in barbarity and lawlessness those of the same nation in no way differed from the Romans; nay, it seemed to be a much lighter thing to be destroyed by the Romans than to be undone by one another.

§ 3. And the Roman garrisons in the cities, partly from their disinclination to trouble themselves, partly from the hatred they bore to the nation, did little or nothing towards relieving the miserable, till the captains of these companies of robbers everywhere, being satiated with rapine all over the country, got together from all parts, and became a compact band of wickedness, and stole into

Jerusalem, which was now a city without a governor, and which, as the ancient custom was, received without distinction all that belonged to the nation, and now still more, because all men supposed that those who flocked into the city came out of kindness and for their assistance. And yet these very men, besides the sedition they raised, were the direct cause of the city's destruction eventually; for as they were an unprofitable and idle population, they consumed those provisions beforehand which might otherwise have been sufficient for the fighting men, and besides the war brought sedition and famine on the Jews.

§ 4. There were other robbers besides that came out of the country and entered the city, and joining to them those in the city who were worse than themselves, committed every kind of barbarity; for they did not confine their audacity to rapine and plundering only, but proceeded as far as murdering men, and that not in the night-time or privately, or ordinary persons, but openly in the day-time, and began with the most eminent persons. For the first man they meddled with was Antipas, one of the royal race, and the most influential man in the whole city, insomuch that the public treasures were committed to his care; him they arrested and put in prison: and next they did the same to Levias, a person of great note, and to Sophas the son of Raguel, both of whom were of royal race also; and besides these, they did the same to the principal men of the country. This caused a terrible consternation among the people, and every one contented himself with seeing to his own safety, as if the city had been taken in war.

§ 5. But they were not satisfied with the confinement into which they had put these men, nor did they think it safe for them to keep them thus in custody long, since they were influential men, and had numerous relations who were able to avenge them. Nay, they thought the people also would perhaps be so moved at these unlawful proceedings, as to rise in a body against them. They therefore resolved to put these prisoners to death, so they despatched to the prison one John, who was the ripest for murder of them all; he was called the son of Dorcas in the language of our country. Ten men accompanied him into the prison with their swords drawn, and they cut the throats of those that were in custody there. The chief pretext they feigned for so flagrant a crime was that these men had discussed the surrender of Jerusalem with the Romans, and so they said they had slain only such as were traitors to their common liberty, and by degrees came to boast of this bold act of theirs, as though they had been the benefactors and saviours of the city.

§ 6. Now the people were come to that degree of meanness and fear, and these robbers to that degree of insolence, that these last took upon them to appoint high priests. And when they had set aside the succession of those families out of which the high priests used to be made, they appointed certain unknown and lowborn persons to that office, that they might have their assistance in their wicked undertakings. For those who obtained this highest of all honours without any desert were forced to obey those that bestowed it on them. They also set the principal men at variance with one another by various contrivances and tales, and gained the opportunity of doing what they pleased owing to the mutual quarrels of those who might have obstructed their measures, till, satiated with the unjust actions they had done to men, they transferred their insolence to God himself, and went into the sanctuary with polluted feet.

§ 7. And now when the multitude were already going to rise up against them (for Ananus, the oldest of the high priests, instigated them to it, a very wise man, who would perhaps have saved the city, if he could have escaped the hands of those who plotted against him), these men made the temple of God their stronghold against the troubles they feared from the people, and the sanctuary became their refuge and head-quarters of tyranny. They also mixed jesting among the miseries they introduced, which was more painful than what they actually did. For to test the submission of the populace, and to see how far their own power extended, they attempted to dispose of the high priesthood by lots, whereas, as I have said already, it was to descend by family succession. The pretext they made for this plan was ancient usage, for they said that the high priesthood was of old determined by lot; but it was actually the abrogation of a constant law, and a cunning contrivance to seize upon power, by making what appointments they themselves pleased.

§ 8. Thereupon they sent for one of the pontifical tribes, which is called Eniachim,<sup>1</sup> and cast lots which of it should be the high priest; and by fortune the lot fell so as to demonstrate their iniquity in the plainest manner, for it fell upon one whose name was Phannias, the son of Samuel, of the village of Aphtha,<sup>2</sup> a man not only not sprung from high priests, but one that did not clearly know what the high priesthood was, such a rustic was he; yet did they drag this man against his will from the country, and gave him a part to play foreign to his character, as if on the stage, and also put upon him the sacred garments, and instructed him what he was to do at the right time. This horrid wickedness was sport and pastime to them, but the other priests, who at a distance saw their law made a jest of, could not but shed tears, and sorely lamented the cessation of their sacred honours.

§ 9. And now the people could no longer bear this act of audacity, but all were moved with zeal as if to overthrow a tyranny. Those that seemed the most prominent were Gorion, the son of Joseph, and Symeon, the son of Gamaliel, who encouraged them (by going up and down when they were assembled together in crowds, and by going to each apart), to inflict punishments upon these destroyers of their liberty, and to purge the temple of these bloody polluters of it. The best esteemed also of the high priests, as Jesus the son of Gamala, and Ananus the son of Ananus, at their assemblies bitterly reproached the people for their apathy, and excited them against the Zealots, for that was the name those audacious persons went by, as if they were zealous in good practices, and were not rather zealous and extravagant in the worst actions.

§ 10. So when the multitude were gathered together in assembly, and every one was in indignation at these men

<sup>1</sup> This tribe or course of the high priests, or priests here called Eniachim, seems to the learned Mr. Lowth, one well versed in Josephus, to be that, 1 Chron. xxiv. 12, "the course of Jakim," where some copies have "the course of Eliakim"; and I think this to be by no means an improbable conjecture.—W.

occupying the sanctuary, and at their rapine and murders, but had not yet begun to retaliate upon them (because they imagined it to be a difficult thing to suppress these Zealots, as indeed it was), Ananus stood in the midst of them, and frequently gazing at the temple, with his eyes full of tears, spoke as follows. "Certainly it had been good for me to die before I had seen the house of God full of so many abominations, or those sacred places that ought not to be trodden crowded by the feet of these blood-stained wretches. And yet I, who am clothed with the vestments of the high priest, and am called by that most venerable of august names, still live and am fond of life, and cannot endure to undergo a death which would be the glory of my old age. If indeed I were the only person concerned, and as it were in a desert, I would give up my life alone for God's sake. For to what purpose is it to live among a people insensible of their calamities, and where there is no notion remaining of any remedy for their present miseries? For when you are spoiled you bear it, when you are beaten you are silent, and when people are murdered, nobody dares even groan openly. O bitter tyranny that we are under! But why do I blame the tyrants? Was it not you, and your sufferance of them, that nourished them? Was it not you that overlooked those that first banded together, for they were then but a few, and by your silence made them grow to be many, and by remaining quiet when they took up arms, turned them in effect against yourselves, when you ought to have prevented their first attempts, when they fell to abusing your relations? But by neglecting that you encouraged these wretches to plunder, and when houses were pillaged, nobody said a word. That was why they carried off the owners of those houses, and when they were dragged through the midst of the city, nobody came to their assistance. They then proceeded to outrage by bonds those whom you betrayed. I do not say how many they were, and what character they bore, but certainly they were such as were accused by none, and condemned by none. And as nobody succoured them when they were put in bonds, the consequence was that you saw them slain. We looked on at this also, as if the best of a herd of brute animals was still being dragged to the sacrifice, nor did anybody say one word, or move his right hand. Will you bear, then, will you bear to see your sanctuary trodden, and will you yourselves lay steps for these profane wretches to mount to still higher degrees of insolence? Are you not disgusted at their exaltation? Nay, they would have proceeded to still greater enormities, if they had been able to overthrow any thing greater than the sanctuary. They have seized upon the strongest place in the whole city; you may call it the temple, if you please, though it is more like a citadel or fortress. Now, while you have so great a tyranny planted like a fort in your midst, and see your enemies over your heads, to what purpose is it to take counsel, and what do you support your minds with? Perhaps you wait for the Romans, that they may protect our holy places? Are matters then brought to that pass in our city, and are we come to that degree of misery, that our enemies themselves are expected to pity us? O most patient of mortals, will you not rise up, and turn upon those that strike you, which you may observe even wild beasts themselves do, will you not retaliate on those that smite you? Will you not call to mind the calamities every one of you have suffered, will you not set before your eyes the afflictions you have undergone, and will not such things sharpen your souls to revenge? Is then that most honourable and most natural of passions utterly dead in you, I mean the desire of liberty? And are we in love with slavery, and in love with those that lord it over us, as if we had received the principle of subjection from our ancestors? Why, they went through many and great wars for the sake of liberty, nor were they so overcome by the power of the Egyptians or the Medes, as to disobey their own laws. But why need I speak of our forefathers? And what is the cause of our present war with the Romans? I waive now decision on the point whether it be an advantageous and profitable war or not. Is it not that we may enjoy our liberty? Then, if we will not bear the lords of the world as lords over us, shall we bear tyrants of our own fellow-countrymen? And yet submission to foreigners may be borne, because fortune has already doomed us to it, but submission to wicked people would argue unmanliness and choice. And since I have once mentioned the Romans, I will not conceal a thing that comes into my mind as I am speaking, and turns my attention to them ; it is this, that though we should be taken by them (God forbid the event should be so !), yet we can undergo nothing that will be harder to bear than what these men have already brought upon us. How then can we avoid shedding tears, when we see the votive offerings of the Romans in our temple, while those of our own nation spoil us and plunder our glorious metropolis and slaughter our fellow-countrymen, enormities from which the Romans themselves would have abstained ; and when we see those Romans never going beyond the limit assigned to profane persons, and never violating any of our sacred customs, nay, feeling a holy awe when they view at a distance our sacred precincts ; while some that have been born in this very country, and brought up in our customs, and called Jews, walk about in the midst of the holy places, when their hands are still warm with the slaughter of their fellow-countrymen ? Who therefore fears war from without, or people much milder by comparison than our own people ? For truly, if we suit words fitly to the things they represent, it is probable one may find the Romans as much the supporters of our laws as those within our walls the enemies of them. And now I think that every one of you are absolutely persuaded that these plotters against our liberty deserve to be destroyed, and that no one could devise adequate punishment for what they have done, and that you are all exasperated, even before my words, by their wicked actions, from which you have suffered. But perhaps most of you are frightened at their numbers and audacity, as also at the advantage they have over us in their position. For as these things have been brought about by your carelessness, so will they become still greater by being any longer neglected ; for their numbers are every day augmented, as every bad man deserts to those who are like himself, and their audacity is increased by their meeting with no opposition up to now ; and as to their higher position, they will make use of it for engines also, if we give them time to do so. But be assured of this, that if we mount up to fight them, they will be made tamer by their own consciences, and the advantage they have in their high position will be counter-balanced by their moral sense. Perhaps also God himself, who has been affronted by them, will turn what they hurl at us against themselves, and these impious wretches will be killed by their own missiles. Let us but only make our appearance before them, and they will be dejected. However, it is a noble thing, if there should be any danger in the attempt, to die before these holy gates, and to expend our very lives, if not for the sake of our children and wives, yet for God's sake and for his sanctuary. I myself will assist you both with my counsel and with my hand; nor shall any device of mine be wanting for your support, nor shall you see me sparing of my body either."

§ 11. By these words Ananus encouraged the multitude to go at the Zealots, although he knew how difficult it would be to crush them, because of their numbers and youth and the courage of their souls, but chiefly because of their consciousness of the ill deeds they had done; for they would not be likely to yield in consequence of hoping for pardon at last for what they had done. However, Ananus preferred undergoing any suffering whatever to allowing things to continue in such disorder. And the multitude cried out to him to lead them on against those whom he had described in his exhortation to them, and every one of them was most ready to run any hazard.

§ 12. Now while Ananus was choosing out his men, and drawing up those that were fit for his purpose in battle array, the Zealots got wind of his intention (for there were some who went to them and told them all that the people were doing), and were irritated at it, and rushing out of the temple, some en masse, some in companies, spared none whom they met with. Upon this Ananus got the populace together quickly, who were more numerous indeed than the Zealots, but inferior to them in arms and also in organisation. But ardour supplied all that was wanting on both sides, the citizens being animated by a passion stronger than arms, and deriving a degree of courage from the temple superior to any numbers whatever, and indeed thinking the city uninhabitable, unless they could cut off the robbers that were in it; while the Zealots thought, unless they won the day, there would be no punishment that would not be inflicted on them. So both parties were led by their passions in the fight, and at first they only cast stones at each other in the city and before the temple, and threw their javelins from a distance; but when either side gave way, the victorious one made use of their swords; and great slaughter was made on both sides, and a great number were wounded. As for any of the people that were wounded, their relations carried them into their own houses; but when any of the Zealots were wounded, they went up into the temple, and stained its sacred floor with their blood, so that one might say it was their blood alone that polluted the sanctuary. Now in these encounters the robbers sallied out and always got the best of it, till the populace grew very angry, and ever flocked up in greater numbers, and reproached those that gave way, and those behind would not give room to those that were retreating, but forced them back again, and so turned their whole force against their adversaries, and when the robbers could no longer stand against their vehemence, but were forced gradually to retire into the temple, Ananus and his party rushed into it with them. This threw the robbers into a panic, because it deprived them of the first court; so they fled into the inner court quickly, and shut the gates. Now Ananus did not think fit to make any attack against the holy gates, although the others threw their stones and darts at them from above, but deemed it unlawful, even should he be victorious, to introduce the multitude before they were purified. He therefore chose out of them all by lot six thousand armed men, and placed them as guards in the porticoes; so there was a succession of such guards one after another, and every one was forced to mount guard in turn. But many of the chief men in the city were discharged from this duty by those that took on them the government, upon their hiring poorer persons and sending them to mount guard in their own stead.

§ 13. Now it was John, who as I said ran away from Gischala,<sup>1</sup> who was the cause of all these being destroyed. He was a man of great craftiness, and bore about in his soul a strong passion after tyranny, and had long plotted against the government. And at this time he pretended to be of the people's opinions, and went about with

Ananus, who consulted with the great men by day, and in the night-time went round the watch; but he divulged secrets to the Zealots, and every thing that the people intended to do was by his means known to their enemies, even before it had been well agreed upon. And that he might not be brought into suspicion, he cunningly paid extravagant court to Ananus and the chiefs of the people; yet did this overacting of his turn against him, for he flattered them so immoderately that he was but the more suspected; and his constant presence everywhere, even when he was not invited, made him strongly suspected of betraying their secrets to the enemy. For they plainly perceived that the enemy knew of all the resolutions taken at their consultations, nor was there any one whom they had so much reason to suspect of revealing them as John. But it was not easy to get rid of him, so powerful had he grown by his wickedness, and besides that he was a remarkable man, was supported by many who were always consulted upon all considerable public affairs. It was therefore thought well to oblige him to give them assurance of his good-will upon oath. And John took oath readily, that he would be on the people's side, and would not betray any of their counsels or acts to their enemies, and would assist them in putting down those that attacked them both by his hand and advice. And Ananus and his party believed his oath, and now received him to their consultations without further suspicion; nay, they actually sent him as their ambassador to the Zealots with proposals of accommodation. For they were very desirous to avoid the pollution of the temple as much as they possibly could, and that no one of their nation should be slain in it.

§ 14. But now John, as if his oath had been made to the Zealots, and in good-will to them, and not against them, went into the temple, and stood in the midst of them, and said that he had run many hazards on their account, to let them know of every thing that was planned against them by Ananus and his party; and that both he and they would now be all cast into the most imminent danger, unless some providential assistance were afforded them. For Ananus (he added) would make no longer delay, but had prevailed upon the people to send ambassadors to Vespasian, to invite him to come quickly and take the city; and that he had appointed a religious service for the next day against them, that his party might either enter the temple on the pretext of worship, or force their way in and fight with them there; and he did not see how long they could either endure a siege, or how they could fight so many enemies. He added further, that it was by the providence of God, that he was himself sent as ambassador to them for an accommodation: for Ananus offered them these proposals, that he might attack them when they were unarmed; and they ought, to save their lives, either to supplicate those that besieged them, or to get some help from outside. For if they cherished the hope of pardon, in case they were subdued, they had forgotten what desperate acts they had done, or supposed, as soon as the actors repented, that those that had suffered by them were sure to be at once reconciled to them: whereas even the repentance of those that had done injuries was frequently hated, and when those who were wronged got the power into their hands, they were very severe. He said also that the friends and kindred of those who had been killed by them would always be lying in wait for them; and that a large body of people were very angry with them because of their having put down their laws and law-courts, so that if some commiserated them, they would be quite outvoted by the majority who were very incensed with them.

CHAP. IV.

The Idumæans being sent for by the Zealots, come immediately to Jerusalem, and are excluded from the City. Jesus, one of the High Priests, makes a Speech to them; and Simon the Idumæan makes a reply to it.

§ 1.

BY this crafty speech John made the Zealots afraid: and though he durst not directly state what help from outside he meant, he intimated the Idumæans. And that he might also privately irritate the leaders of the Zealots, he calumniated Ananus as a savage person, and as having particularly threatened them. Their leaders were Eleazar (the son of Simon), who seemed the most reliable man of them all, both in considering what was fit to be done, and in the execution of the same, and Zacharias (the son of Phalek), both of whom were of priestly descent. Now when these two men had heard, not only of the common threats, but also of those peculiarly levelled against themselves; and also how Ananus and his party, in order to secure their own power, had invited in the Romans (for that also was part of John's lie), they doubted a great while what they should do, considering the shortness of time by which they were pressed. For the people were prepared to attack them very soon, and the suddenness of the plot laid against them almost cut off all their hopes of getting any help from outside; for they might suffer everything before any of their allies could hear of it. However, it was resolved to invite in the Idumæans. So they wrote a short letter to them to the effect that Ananus had deceived the people, and intended to betray their metropolis to the Romans: that they themselves had revolted for liberty's sake and were besieged in the temple: that a short time would settle the question of their safety; for unless the Idumæans came quickly to their assistance, they would themselves soon be in the power of Ananus and their enemies, and the city would be in the hands of the Romans. They also charged the messengers to narrate generally the state of the case to the rulers of the Idumæans. Now two active men were proposed for the carrying of this message, men well able to speak, and to persuade the Idumæans as to the state of affairs, and what was a qualification still more necessary, they were very swift of foot. For they knew well enough that the Idumæans would immediately comply with their request, as they were a tumultuous and unsettled nation, always eager for disturbances and delighting in changes, and upon ever so little flattery on the part of petitioners ready to take up arms, and hastening to battle as if to a feast. There was indeed occasion for quick despatch in the carrying of this message, in which point the messengers (who both had the name of Ananias), were no way defective, and they soon arrived before the rulers of the Idumæans.

§ 2. Now these rulers were greatly surprised at the contents of the letter, and at what those that came with it further told them, so they ran about the nation like mad men, and made proclamation for war. And their population was mustered together sooner than the time appointed in the proclamation, and all snatched up arms as if to maintain the liberty of their metropolis; and twenty thousand of them marched in battle array to Jerusalem, under four commanders, John and Jacob, the sons<sup>1</sup> of Sosas, and besides these Simon the son of Cathlas, and Phineas the son of Clusoth.

§ 3. Now this departure of the messengers was not known either to Ananus or to the garrison, but the approach of the Idumæans was. And as Ananus knew of it before they came, he ordered the gates to be shut against them, and that the walls should be guarded. Yet did not he by any means think of fighting against them, but, before they came to blows, he wished to try what argument would do. So Jesus, the eldest of the high priests next to Ananus, stood upon the tower that was opposite the Idumæans, and spoke to them as follows. "Many and various troubles indeed have fallen upon this city, yet in none of them have I so much as now wondered that fortune should in so extraordinary a manner play into the hands of wicked men. For I see that you are come to support the vilest of men against us, and that with such zeal as you could hardly exhibit if our metropolis had called you to her assistance against barbarians. And if I had perceived that your army was composed of men like those who invited you, I should not have deemed your impetuosity unreasonable: for nothing so much cements the minds of men together as similarity of manners. But as it is, if one were to examine these men who have invited you one by one, each one of them would be found to have deserved ten thousand deaths; for the very rascality and offscouring of the whole country, who have spent their own substance in debauchery, and exercised their violence on the neighbouring villages and cities, have at last stolen into this holy city; robbers, who by their prodigious wickedness have profaned this most sacred floor, and who are now to be seen drinking themselves drunk fearlessly in the sanctuary, and expending the spoils of those whom they have slaughtered upon their insatiable bellies. Whereas for your numerous host, one can see that they are as decently adorned in their armour, as it would become them to be, had their metropolis called them to her assistance against foreigners. What can a man call this but the sport of fortune, when he sees a whole nation coming to protect a sink of wicked wretches? I have a good while been in doubt what it could possibly be that should move you to do this so quickly; because certainly you would not put on your armour on behalf of robbers, and against a people akin to you, without some very great cause for your so doing. But since we have heard something about the Romans and treason (for some of your men have lately made a clamour about these matters, and have said they are come to set this metropolis free), we wonder more at these wretches devising such a lie as this against us than at their other audacity. For they knew there was no other way to irritate against us men that are naturally lovers of liberty, and so chiefly disposed to fight against foreign enemies, but by concocting the story that we were going to betray that so much loved liberty. But you ought to consider who they are that spread this calumny, and against whom, and to gather the truth not from false speeches, but from palpable facts. For what reason is there for us to sell ourselves now to the Romans, since it was in our power either not to have revolted from them at first, or, when we had once revolted, to have returned to their yoke again, before all the surrounding country was laid waste? Whereas it is no easy thing to be reconciled to the Romans, even if we desire it, now they have subdued Galilee, and are thereby become proud and insolent; and to pay court to them now they are so near us, would bring reproach upon us worse than death. As for myself indeed, I should have preferred peace with them to death; but now I have once warred against them, and fought with them, I prefer glorious death to living in captivity. But further, do they say that we, the rulers of the people, have sent privately to the Romans, or has it been done by the common suffrages of the people? If it be us, let them name those friends of ours that have been sent, as our servants, to negotiate this treason. Has any one been detected going out on this errand, or been taken as he came back? Are they in possession of our letters? How could we escape the notice of so many of our fellow-citizens, among whom we live every hour; when what is done secretly in the country is, it seems, known by the Zealots, who are but few in number and besieged, and are not able to come out of the temple into the city? But now they know that they must be punished for their crimes; but as long as they were free from fear, none of us were suspected to be traitors. If, however, they lay this charge against the people generally, the decision must of course have been arrived at openly (for everybody is present<sup>1</sup> at a general assembly), so that public news of this matter would have come to you sooner than any private information. But how could that be? Would not ambassadors have been sent in that case to confirm the agreements? Let them tell us then who was voted for that purpose. But this is only a pretext of men who are loath to die, and are trying to escape the punishments that are at hand for them. For indeed if fate had determined that this city was to be betrayed, only these men that accuse us falsely would have had the impudence to do it, there being no wickedness wanting in them but treason only. And now that you Idu-mæans are actually come here with your arms, it is your duty to come to the rescue of our metropolis, and to join with us in cutting off those tyrants who have infringed the rules of our regular tribunals, trampled upon our laws, and made their swords the arbiters of right and wrong. For they have seized men of great eminence lying under no accusation in the market-place, and further outraged them by putting them into bonds, and, refusing to hear what they had to say, or their supplications, put them to death. You may, if you please, come into the city, though not in the way of war, and see proofs of what I say, as houses stripped bare by their rapacious hands, and wives and families in black for their slaughtered relations, as also you may hear groaning and lamentation all over the city. For there is nobody who has not suffered from the attack of these profane wretches, who have proceeded to that degree of desperate recklessness, as not only to have transferred their robbing impudence from the country and the remote cities to this city, the very face and head of the whole nation, but also from this city to the temple. For that is now made their point d'appui and refuge, and base of operations against us. And this place, which is adored by the world, and honoured by strangers from the ends of the earth who know it by report, is trampled upon by these wild beasts born among ourselves. They now triumph in the desperate condition of affairs, when they hear that one people is going to fight against another people, and one city against another city, and that our nation has got an army together against its own bowels. Instead of which the best and fit thing to do would be, as I said, for you to join with us in cutting off these wretches, and to be revenged on them for putting this cheat upon you, I mean, for having the impudence to invite you in as allies, when they ought to have stood in fear of you as avengers. But if you have some regard to these men's invitation, you may yet lay aside your arms, and come into the city in the guise of kinsmen, and take upon you a middle name between that of allies and enemies, and so become judges in this case. And yet consider how much these men will gain by being called into judgment before you, after such undeniable and flagrant crimes, seeing that they would not allow such as had no accusations laid against them to speak a word for themselves. However, let them get this favour from your coming. But if you will neither join in our indignation nor judge in the matter, the third thing is to let us both alone, and neither insult our calamities, nor remain with these plotters against our metropolis. For though you should have ever so great a suspicion that some of us have had dealings with the Romans, it is in your power to watch the approaches to the city; and if any thing that we have been accused of is brought home to us, you can then come and guard our metropolis, and inflict punishment on those that are found guilty; for the enemy cannot anticipate you as you are so near to the city. But if none of these proposals seem acceptable or moderate, do not wonder that the gates are shut against you, as long as you are in arms."

§ 4. Thus spoke Jesus, but the multitude of the Idumæans gave no attention to what he said, but were in a rage, because they did not meet with a ready entrance into the city. The generals also were indignant at the idea of laying down their arms, and looked upon it as tantamount to captivity to throw them down at any man's injunctions. But Simon, the son of Cathlas, one of their commanders, quieted with some difficulty the tumult of his men, and stood where the high priests could hear him, and spoke as follows. "I can no longer wonder that the patrons of liberty are besieged in the temple, since there are some who now shut the gates of a city common to the nation, and at the same time are prepared to admit the Romans into it, nay, perhaps are disposed to crown the gates with garlands at their coming, while they speak to the Idumæans from their towers, and enjoin them to throw down arms taken up for the preservation of liberty. And while they will not intrust the guard of the metropolis to their kinsmen, they propose to make them judges of the differences between them; nay, while they accuse some men of having slain others without trial, they themselves would condemn a whole nation to dishonour; and have now walled off from their own kinsmen that city which used to be open to even all foreigners that came to worship there. It is a likely idea that we have hurried here to slaughter and war against our own countrymen, when we have only made such haste to keep you who are so unhappy free! You have doubtless been wronged in a similar way by those whom you besiege, and have, I suppose, made a list of the like plausible suspicions against them also! And then, after besieging all those inside the city who are interested in public affairs, and having also shut the gates of the city against a whole nation most nearly related to you, and after giving such insulting orders to others, you complain that you are yourselves tyrannized over, and attach the name of tyrants to those who are really tyrannized over by you! Who can bear this assumption in words, who looks to the facts which are totally contrary, unless indeed the Idumæans are now excluding you from the metropolis, and not you yourselves excluding them from the national rites! One may indeed justly complain that those who are besieged in the temple, when they dared to punish those traitors whom (because they were your companions) you call eminent and unaccused men, did not begin with you, and so cut off beforehand the most dangerous traitors. But if they have been more merciful than they should have been, let us Idumæans watch over this house of God, and fight for our common country, and repel as enemies both those that attack us from without and those that betray us from within. Here will we stay before the walls in arms, till either the Romans grow weary of waiting for you, or till you change your behaviour and become friends to liberty."

§ 5. At these words all the Idumæans made acclamation. But Jesus went away sorrowful, as he saw that the Idumæans were against all moderate counsels, and that the city was threatened with two wars. Nor indeed were the minds of the Idumæans at rest, for they were in a rage at the injury that had been offered them by their exclusion from the city; and as they had thought the Zealots strong, but saw no support likely to come from them, they knew not what to think, and many repented that they had come. But the shame that would be theirs if they returned without doing any thing at all, so prevailed over their regret, that they stayed there all night before the wall, though in a very wretched bivouac. For a prodigious storm broke out in the night, and violent winds with very heavy showers of rain, and continuous lightning, and terrible thunderings, and extraordinary noises as of the earth shaken by an earthquake. These things were a manifest indication that some destruction was coming upon men, when the system of the world was thus put out of joint, and any one would guess that these prodigies portended some great calamities.

§ 6. Now the opinion of the Idumæans and of those in the city was one and the same, for the Idumæans thought that God was angry at their expedition, and that they would not escape punishment for taking up arms against the metropolis, while Ananus and his party thought that they had gained the day without fighting, and that God was on their side. But truly they proved ill conjecturers of what was to come, and prognosticated for their enemies what they were themselves to undergo. For the Idumæans formed in close order with their bodies and kept one another warm, and connecting their shields over their heads, were not so much hurt by the rain. But the Zealots were more deeply concerned for the danger these men were in than they were for themselves, and mustered together, and looked about to see whether they could devise any means of assisting them. The more rash of them thought it best to force their way through the garrison with their arms, and after that to rush into the midst of the city, and publicly open the gates to those who had come to their assistance; for they supposed the garrison would be in disorder and give way at such an unexpected attack of theirs, especially as most of them were unarmed and unskilled in war, and also because the multitude of the citizens would not be easily got together, as they would be confined to their houses by the storm; and even if there were any danger, it became them to suffer anything whatever rather than to allow so great a multitude to perish miserably on their account. But the more prudent despaired of force, because they saw not only that the garrison round them was very numerous, but also that the walls of the city were carefully watched because of the Idumæans, and they also supposed that Ananus would be everywhere, and visit the garrison every hour; which indeed was done on other nights, but was omitted that night, not because of any remissness on the part of Ananus, but by the overruling appointment of fate, that so both he himself and the whole of the garrison might perish. For as the night was far spent, and the storm at its height, Ananus gave the garrison in the portico leave to go to sleep, and it came into the heads of the Zealots to take the saws belonging to the temple, and to cut through the bars of the gates. The noise of the wind and the continuous thunder played into their hands, so that the noise of the saws was not heard.

§ 7. So they secretly went out of the temple to the walls, and made use of their saws, and opened the gate which was next the Idumæans. But at first there came a fear upon the Idumæans themselves, as they imagined that Ananus and his party were about to attack them, so that every one of them had his right hand upon his sword to defend himself; but they soon recognized who had come to them, and entered the city. And had the Idumæans then fallen upon the city, nothing could have hindered them from destroying every man of the people, such was the rage they were in; but, as it was, they first of all made haste to get the Zealots out of custody, which those that brought them in earnestly desired them to do, and not to leave those for whose sakes they were come in the midst of their distresses, nor to bring them into still greater danger; for when they had once captured the garrison, it would be easy for them to enter the city; but if the city were first roused, they would not then be able to master the garrison, because as soon as they should perceive who they were there, they would put themselves in battle-array and would bar their approach.

CHAP. V.

The Cruelty of the Idumæans, when they got into the Temple during the Storm, and of the Zealots. Concerning the Slaughter of Ananus, and Jesus, and Zacharias. Also how the Idumæans returned home.

§ 1.

THIS advice pleased the Idumæans, and they ascended through the city to the temple, and the Zealots were impatient and anxious for their coming. Directly therefore they entered, they also came boldly out of the inner temple, and mixed themselves with the Idumæans, and attacked the garrison. And they killed some of those that were on guard but had fallen asleep, but as those that were now awakened made a cry, the whole multitude arose, and in spite of their alarm caught hold of their arms and betook themselves to their defence. And as long as they thought it was only the Zealots who attacked them, they felt confidence, hoping to overpower them by their numbers; but when they saw others pouring in upon them from without, they perceived that the Idumæans were got in; and most of them laid aside their arms and courage together, and betook themselves to lamentations. But some few of the youths covered themselves with their armour, and valiantly received the Idumæans, and for some time protected the more inert multitude. Others revealed to those that were in the city the dreadful situation they were in by their cries: but when they got to know that the Idumæans had entered the city, none of them durst come to their assistance, only they loudly wailed and shrieked back, and great howling of the women took place also, and every one of the garrison was in danger. The Zealots also joined in the shouts raised by the Idumæans; and the storm itself rendered the shouts of everybody more terrible. Nor did the Idumæans spare anybody, for as they are naturally a most barbarous and bloody nation, and had been distressed by the tempest, they used their weapons against those that had shut the gates against them, and treated in the same manner those that supplicated for their lives as those that fought them; and ran through many with their swords, who reminded them of the relation there was between them, and begged them to have regard to their common temple. Now there was no opportunity for flight, nor any hope of preservation, but as they were thrust against one another so were they slain, and as most were driven along (as there was now no place to retire to, and the murderers hotly pursued them) in their distress they threw themselves down headlong into the city, undergoing, in my opinion, a more miserable destruction than that which they avoided, because it was a voluntary one. And now all the outer temple overflowed with blood, and that day saw eight thousand five hundred dead bodies.

§ 2. But the rage of the Idumæans was not satiated by these slaughters, but they now betook themselves to the city, and plundered every house, and slew every one they met. As for the rest of the multitude, they esteemed it idle to go on killing them, but they sought for the high priests, and most rushed against them, and as soon as they took them they slew them, and then, standing over their dead bodies, jeered at Ananus for his goodwill to the people, and at Jesus for his speech made to them from the wall. Nay, they proceeded to that degree of impiety, as to cast away their dead bodies without burial, although the Jews usually take so much care of the burial of people, that they take down and bury those that are condemned and crucified before the going down of the sun. I should not be wrong if I said that the death of Ananus was the beginning of the destruction of Jerusalem, and that from the day whereon they saw their high priest, and champion of their safety, slain in the midst of their city, may be dated the overthrow of their walls, and the fall of the Jews. He was in various respects a very worthy and just man, and besides the grandeur of the nobility and dignity and honour which he had, he was a lover of equality even in regard to the meanest of the people; and he was a prodigious lover of liberty, and an admirer of democracy, and ever preferred the public welfare to his own advantage, and peace above all things (for he knew that the Romans were invincible), and he foresaw that, unless the Jews made up matters with them cleverly, a war would of necessity follow, and that they would be destroyed. And to say all in a word, if Ananus had survived, the Jews would certainly have come to terms with the Romans. For he was an able man in speaking and persuading the people, and if he had already got the mastery of those that opposed his designs, or were for the war, the Jews would have put abundance of delays in the way of the Romans under such a general as he was. Jesus was also joined with him, and although he was inferior to him upon comparison, he was superior to all the rest. And I cannot but think that it was because God had doomed the city to destruction as a polluted city, and wished to purge his sanctuary by fire, that he cut off these its great defenders and well-wishers, so that those that had a little before worn the sacred garments, and had presided over the public worship, and had been esteemed worthy of respect by those who from the whole world visited our city, were cast out naked, and seen to be the food of dogs and wild beasts.

And I cannot but think that virtue itself groaned at these men's cases, and lamented that she was so terribly conquered by wickedness. For such was the end of Ananus and Jesus.

§ 3. Now, after these were slain, the Zealots and the multitude of the Idumæans fell upon the people as upon a flock of profane animals, and cut their throats. As for the common people, they were slain wherever they were captured, but they arrested and bound the noblemen and the youths, and shut them up in prison, and put off their slaughter, in hopes that some of them would come over to their party. But not one of them would comply, for all preferred death to being enrolled among wicked wretches against their own country. But this refusal of theirs brought upon them terrible torments, for they were so scourged and tortured, that their bodies could no longer bear their torture, when at last with difficulty they got the favour to be slain. Those whom they captured in the daytime were slain in the night, and their bodies were carried out and thrown away, that there might be room for other prisoners. And the terror of the people was so great, that no one had courage enough either to weep openly for any dead man that was related to him, or to bury him; but those that were shut up in their own houses could only shed tears in secret, and dared not even groan without great caution, lest any of their enemies should hear them; for if they did, those that mourned for others soon underwent the same death as those whom they mourned for. Only by night they would take a little dust in their hands, and throw it upon their bodies, and here and there a very bold person would do so even in the day. And no less than twelve thousand noble youths perished in this manner.

§ 4. And now they were quite weary of simple butchery, so they set up fictitious tribunals and courts for that purpose; and as they intended to have Zacharias, the son of Baruch, one of the most eminent of the citizens, slain (for what provoked them against him was that hatred of wickedness and love of liberty which were so remarkable in him: he was also a rich man, so that by taking him off, they not only hoped to seize his effects, but also to get rid of a man able to put them down), so they called together by public proclamation seventy of the principal men of the populace, nominally as judges, but they had no real authority, and accused Zacharias of a design to betray them to the Romans, and of having traitorously sent to Vespasian for that purpose. Now there appeared no proof or evidence of what he was accused of, but they affirmed that they were themselves quite satisfied of his guilt, and desired such affirmation to be taken as evidence sufficient. Now when Zacharias saw clearly that there was no hope left him of escape (for he had been treacherously summoned to prison, rather than a court of justice), he took great liberty of speech from his despair of life, and stood up and jeered at their specious accusation, and in a few words confuted the crimes laid to his charge; after which he turned his speech to his accusers, and enumerated all their transgressions of the law, and made great lamentation over the confusion they had brought public affairs to. But the Zealots made an uproar, and had much ado to abstain from drawing their swords, although they wished to preserve the appearance and farce of a trial to the end, and were also desirous to test the judges, whether they would consult the interests of justice at their own peril. Now the seventy judges brought in their verdict that the accused was not guilty, choosing rather to die themselves with him, than to have his death laid at their doors; whereupon there arose a great clamour of the Zealots at his acquittal, and they were all indignant at the judges, for not understanding that the authority that was given them was but a farce; and two of the boldest of them fell upon Zacharias in the middle of the temple, and slew him, and as he fell mocked at him and said, "Thou hast also our verdict, and a more sure acquittal;" and immediately threw him down from the temple into the ravine beneath it. Moreover, they insolently struck the judges with the backs of their swords, and thrust them out of the temple precincts, and spared their lives with no other design than that, when they were dispersed among the people in the city, they might let all know they were no better than slaves.

§ 5. But by this time the Idumæans repented that they had come, and were displeased at what was taking place. And when they were assembled together by one of the Zealots, who came privately to them, he declared to them what a number of lawless acts they had done in conjunction with those that had invited them, and enumerated what had been done in the metropolis. He said that they had taken up arms on the idea that the high priests were betraying the metropolis to the Romans, but had found no evidence of any such treason, but they had supported those that pretended to believe such a thing, while they ventured to do their works of war and tyranny. It would indeed have been their business to have hindered them at first, but seeing they had once been partners with them in shedding the blood of their own countrymen, it was high time to put a stop to such crimes, and not continue to afford any more assistance to such as were subverting the laws of their forefathers. For if any took it ill that the gates had been shut against them, and that they had not been permitted to come into the city, yet those who had excluded them had been punished, and Ananus was dead, and almost all those people had been slain in one night. He added that many of themselves might now be seen repenting of what they had done, and they might also see the horrid barbarity of those that had invited them, who had no regard to those who had saved them, but were so impudent as to perpetrate the vilest things under the eyes of their allies, and their wicked actions would be laid to the charge of the Idumæans, as long as nobody obstructed them, or separated himself from their actions. They ought therefore to retire home (since the imputation of treason appeared to be a calumny, and there was no expectation of the coming of the Romans at present, and the city was secured by such walls as could not be easily thrown down), and, by avoiding any further fellowship with these bad men, make some excuse for themselves as to their previous participation with them under a delusion.

CHAP. VI.

How the Zealots, when they got rid of the Idumæans, slew a great many more of the Citizens. Also how Vespasian dissuaded the Romans, when they were very earnest to march against the Jews, from proceeding in the War at present.

§ 1.

THE Idumæans listened to these arguments, and first set those that were in the prisons at liberty (who were about two thousand of the populace; who thereupon fled immediately and betook themselves to Simon, of whom I shall speak presently), and then retired from Jerusalem, and went home. Now this departure of theirs was a great surprise to both parties; for the people, not knowing of their repentance, took courage for a while, as being eased of their enemies, while the Zealots grew more insolent, not as being deserted by allies, but as being rid of men who might put them out of countenance, and repress their wickedness. So they made no longer any delay, nor took any deliberation in their crimes, but made use of the shortest methods in all their plans, and what they had once resolved upon, they put in practice almost sooner than they imagined it. But they thirsted chiefly for the blood of valiant men and men of good families, the latter of whom they destroyed out of envy, the former out of fear; for they thought their whole security lay in leaving no influential person alive. And so among many others they slew Gorion, a person eminent for merit and family, and inclined to democracy, and full of a liberal spirit, if ever any of the Jews was. The principal thing that ruined him, added to his eminence in other respects, was his boldness of speech. Nor did Niger of Peræa escape their hands, a man who had displayed great valour in the wars with the Romans, but was now drawn through the middle of the city, frequently crying out and showing the scars of his wounds. And when he was drawn out of the gates, and despaired of his life, he besought them to grant him burial; but they threatened him first that they would not grant him any spot of earth for a grave, which he so greatly desired, and then slew him. Now while they were slaying him, Niger prayed that the Romans might be his avengers, and that the Jews might undergo both famine and pestilence in the war, and besides all that that they might come to mutual slaughter of one another; all which imprecations God ratified against these impious men, and what came most justly upon them was that not long afterwards they experienced their madness in their factions against one another. But when Niger was killed, their fears of being put down were diminished. And indeed there was no section of the people but they found out some pretext to destroy them. Some were slain because they had had some longstanding differences with some of them, and as to those that had not opposed them in time of peace, they watched their opportunity to accuse them; and if any one did not come near them at all, he was suspected by them as a proud man, if any one came with boldness, he was esteemed a despiser of them, and if any one paid court to them, he was supposed to be a plotter against them. And the only punishment of crimes, whether they were of the greatest or smallest sort, was death; nor could any one escape, unless he was very inconsiderable from the meanness of his birth or fortune.

§ 2. And now all the rest of the commanders of the Romans thought this dissension of their enemies a wind-fall, and were very eager to march against the city, and were urgent with Vespasian as he was armed with full authority, and said that the providence of God was on their side, by setting their enemies at variance with one another; but that changes in such cases were sudden, and the Jews might quickly be united again, either because they were tired or repented of their civil strife. But Vespasian replied, that they were greatly mistaken as to what was necessary, desiring as on a theatre to make a show of their hands and weapons, but doing so at their own hazard, without considering what was for their advantage and security. For if they attacked the city immediately, they would but unite their enemies together, and turn their strength now at its acme against themselves; but if they stayed a while, they would have fewer enemies, because they would be consumed in this civil strife. For God made a better general of the Romans than he was, who was giving the Jews up to them without any trouble, and granting their army a victory without any danger. He said that it was therefore their best course, while their enemies were destroying each other with their own hands, and experiencing the greatest misfortune, which was civil strife, to sit still as spectators of dangers rather than to fight with men that loved murder and were mad against one another. "And if (he proceeded) any one imagines that the glory of victory will be more insipid when it is got without fighting, let him know that success quietly obtained is more profitable than the uncertainty of a battle. For we ought to esteem those who have done great things by self-control and prudence no less glorious than those who have gained great reputation by their actions in war. For such will have a stronger army to lead, when their enemies are weakened, and their own army is refreshed by rest from continual labours; moreover this is not a proper time to propose to ourselves the glory of victory. For the Jews are not now employed in forging armour or building walls, or in getting together allies, in which case delay would be prejudicial to those who gave them time for such, but they are harassed to death every day by their civil strife and dissensions, and suffer greater miseries than, if they were once taken, could be inflicted on them by us. Whether therefore any one has regard to what is for our safety, he ought to suffer these Jews to be consumed by one another, or whether he has regard to the glory of success, he ought by no means to attack men who are suffering from domestic troubles. For it would be said speciously that our conquest was not owing to our bravery, but to their dissensions."

§ 3. And now the other commanders assented to what Vespasian said, and it was soon evident how wise an opinion he had given. For many of the Jews deserted every day, and fled from the Zealots, although flight was difficult, since they guarded every outlet from the city, and slew every one that was captured at them, taking it for granted he was going over to the Romans. However, he who gave them money was allowed to go, and only he that gave them none was a traitor; so the upshot was that the rich purchased their flight so, and none but the poor were slain. Along all the roads also vast numbers of dead bodies lay in heaps, and many of those that had been anxious to flee changed their minds and preferred rather to perish within the city; for the hope of burial made death in their own city appear of the two the less terrible to them. But these Zealots came at last to that degree of barbarity, that they did not bestow burial either on those slain in the city or on the roads, but as if they had made an agreement to cancel both the laws of their country and the laws of nature, at the same time that they ill-treated men they outraged the Deity also, and allowed dead bodies to rot in the sun. And the same punishment was allotted to such as buried any of their relations as to those that deserted, which was no other than death; so that he that granted the favour of a grave to another forthwith stood in need of a grave himself. And to say all in a word, no good emotion was so entirely lost among them during those unhappy times as mercy; for what ought to have excited pity irritated these wretches, and they transferred their rage from the living to those that had been slain, and from the dead to the living. Nay, the terror was so very great, that he who survived called those that had died before them happy, as being at rest already, and those that were under torture in the prisons declared that, upon comparison with themselves, those that lay unburied were happy. These men, therefore, trampled upon every ordinance of men, and laughed at the laws of God: and they mocked at the oracles of the prophets as the tricks of impostors. And yet these prophets foretold many things as to virtue and vice, which when these Zealots violated, they occasioned the fulfilling of prophecies against their own country. For there was a certain very ancient prophecy of inspired men, that the city would be taken and the sanctuary burnt by right of war, when dissensions should break out and their own hands should pollute the temple of God. Now though these Zealots did not disbelieve these predictions, they made themselves the instruments of their accomplishment.

CHAP. VII.

How John tyrannized over the rest ; and what Mischief the Zealots did at Masada. Also how Vespasian got possession of Gadara : and the actions that were performed by Placidus.

§ 1.

BY this time John began to tyrannize, and thought it beneath him to accept merely the same honours that others had ; and joining to himself by degrees some of the wickedest men of all, he detached them from their own faction. And as he ever disagreed with the opinions of others, and gave injunctions of his own in a rather improper manner, it was evident he was setting up monarchical claims. Now some submitted to him out of fear, and others out of good-will (for he was clever at enticing men to him by delusion and deception), and many thought they would be safer themselves, if the crimes that they perpetrated should be referred to one person and not many. His activity also was so great, and that both in action and counsel, that he had not a few body-guards. But a large part of his antagonists left him ; among whom envy had a good deal of influence, as people thought it monstrous to be in subjection to one who was formerly their equal. But the main reason that moved men against him was the dread of monarchy, for they could not hope easily to put an end to his power, if he once obtained it, and they knew he would always have this objection against them, that they had opposed his having power. So each one chose rather to suffer anything whatever in war than, when they had been in voluntary slavery for some time, afterwards to perish like slaves. So the faction was divided into two parts, and John reigned in opposition to his adversaries over one of them. And these two factions watched one another, nor did they at all, or at least very little, meddle with arms in their quarrels ; but they fought earnestly against the people, and vied with one another which should get most spoil. And since the city was exposed to three of the greatest misfortunes, war, and tyranny, and faction, it appeared to the people upon comparison that war was the lightest of the three. Accordingly, they fled from their own people to foreigners, and sought that preservation from the Romans, which they despaired of obtaining among their own people.

§ 2. And now a fourth misfortune arose to bring our nation to destruction. There was a very strong fortress not far from Jerusalem, which had been built by our ancient kings, both as a repository for their effects in the hazards of war, and for their personal safety. It was called Masada.<sup>1</sup> Those who were called Sicarii had occupied it, and for a time scoured the country all round it, but only to procure themselves necessaries, for the fear they were in prevented further ravages; but when they heard that the Roman army was quiet, and that the Jews were divided by faction and private tyranny, they boldly undertook greater matters; and at the feast of Unleavened Bread (which the Jews celebrate in memory of their deliverance from the Egyptian bondage, when they were sent back into the country of their forefathers) they made a descent by night, without being discovered by those who might have stopped them, and ravaged a certain small town called Engaddi, where they were too quick for those inhabitants that might have repelled them, for they dispersed them before they could arm themselves and fight them, and drove them out of the town, while of such as could not run away, as women and children, they slew more than seven hundred, and then stripped their houses of every thing, and seized upon all the ripe fruit, and took all their spoil home to Masada. And indeed these men laid all the villages waste that were round the fortress, and ravaged the whole country, and slew daily on all sides of them no few people. At this time all the other regions of Judæa were disturbed by the robbers who had hitherto been quiet. Now as in the body, if some principal part be inflamed, all the members suffer with it, so owing to the faction and disorder that was in the metropolis, the wicked men that were in the country had security to ravage, and when every one of them had plundered their own villages, they then retired into the desert: and now banding together and joining the confederacy by companies, too small for an army, and too many for a gang of thieves, they fell upon the holy places<sup>1</sup> and cities. But it happened that they were sometimes very ill handled by those whom they attacked in war, thinking them isolated, but sometimes they anticipated retaliation, as robbers directly they have done their plundering run away. Nor was there now any part of Judæa that was not in a miserable condition, as well as its most eminent city.

§ 3. These things were told Vespasian by deserters. For although the factious watched all the outlets of the city, and slew whoever approached for whatever purpose, yet there were some who evaded them and fled to the Romans, and urged the Roman general to come to their city's assistance, and save the remainder of the people; for they said that it was because of the people's good-will to the Romans that many of them had been already slain, and that the survivors were in danger of the same treatment. And Vespasian, who already pitied the calamities these men were in, moved his camp to all appearance as if he was going to besiege Jerusalem, but in reality to deliver them from the siege they were already enduring. However, he was obliged first to overthrow what remained elsewhere, and to leave nothing in his rear to interrupt him in that siege. Accordingly, he marched against Gadara,<sup>2</sup> the strong metropolis of Peræa, and entered that city on the fourth day of the month Dystrus. For its influential persons had sent an embassy to him, without the knowledge of the factious, to treat about a surrender, which they did out of the desire they had for peace, and to save their property, for many of the citizens of Gadara were rich men. The opposite party knew nothing of this embassy, but discovered it as Vespasian drew near the city. And they despaired of being able to keep possession of the city, as they were inferior in number to their enemies who were within the city, and as they saw the Romans very near the city; so they resolved to flee, but thought it dishonourable to do so without shedding some blood, and revenging themselves on those who had invited in Vespasian. So they seized upon Dolesus (a person not only the first in rank and family in the city, but also the one who was thought responsible for the embassy to Vespasian), and slew him, and treated his dead body in a barbarous manner, so very violent was their anger at him, and then fled from the city. And as the Roman army was now just upon them, the people of Gadara admitted Vespasian with joyful acclamations, and received from him the security of his right hand, and also a garrison of horse and foot to guard them against the incursions of the fugitives: for as to their wall, they had pulled it down before the Romans desired them to do so, that they might thereby give them assurance that they were lovers of peace, and had no mind to war against them.

<sup>1</sup> By these hiera or "holy places," as distinct from cities, must be meant "proseuchæ," or "houses of prayer," out of cities; of which we find mention made in the New Testament and elsewhere. See Luke vi. 12; Acts xvi. 13. 16: Antiq. xiv. 10, § 23; Life, § 54. "In qua te quero proseucha?" Juvenal Sat. iii. 296. They were situated sometimes by the side of rivers, or by the sea side.—W.

§ 4. And now Vespasian sent Placidus with five hundred horse and three thousand foot to pursue those that had fled from Gadara, while he himself returned to Cæsarea<sup>1</sup> with the rest of the army. But as soon as these fugitives saw the cavalry pursuing them, before an engagement came off, they crowded together in a certain village, which was called Bethennabris,<sup>2</sup> where finding a great multitude of young men, and arming them, some by their own consent, some by force, they rashly rushed upon Placidus and the troops that were with him. And they at the first onset gave way a little, so contriving to entice them further from the walls. And when they had drawn them into a place fit for their purpose, they rode round them, and threw their darts at them, and the horse cut off the flight of the fugitives, while the foot cut to pieces those that fought against them. For the Jews did no more than show their courage, and were then cut to pieces. For as they attacked the Romans, who were in close formation, and, as it were, walled in by their panoply, they could not find any place where their darts could penetrate, nor were they able to break the enemy's ranks, while they themselves were run through by the Roman darts, and, like the wildest of beasts, rushed upon the sword. And some of them were slain by being stabbed by their enemies' swords in their faces, and others were dispersed by the cavalry.

§ 5. For Placidus was anxious to cut off their return to the village, and riding continually on that side by them, he would then wheel round and at the same time make use of his darts, and take sure aim at those that were nearest, and make those that were further off turn back from the terror they were in, till at last the most courageous of them cut their way through and fled to the wall of the village. And now those that guarded the wall were in great doubt what to do; for they could not bear the thoughts of excluding those that came from Gadara, because of their own people that were among them, and yet if they should admit them, they expected to perish with them; as indeed happened; for as they were forcing their way together to the wall, the Roman horsemen all but entered in with them. However, the guards prevented them and shut the gates, when Placidus ordered a general assault, and fighting stoutly till it was evening, made himself master of the wall and of those that were in the village; when the feeble part of the population was cut to pieces, but those that were more able ran away, and the soldiers plundered the houses, and set the village on fire. As for those that escaped from the village, they excited such as were in the country, and exaggerating their own calamities, and telling them that the whole army of the Romans were upon them, put them in great fear on every side. So they all got together en masse and fled to Jericho,<sup>1</sup> for it alone afforded them any hopes of safety, as it was a city that was strong from its wall and large population. But Placidus, relying upon his horse and former success, followed them, and slew all that he came up with as far as the Jordan: and when he had driven the whole multitude to the river side, where they were stopped by the stream (for it was swollen by rain and not fordable), he drew up his soldiers in battle array opposite to them. And necessity induced those who had no place to flee to to hazard a battle. So they extended themselves as much as possible along the banks of the river, and received the darts that were thrown at them, as well as the charges of the cavalry, who wounded many of them and thrust them into the stream. In this hand to hand fight fifteen thousand of them were slain, while the number of those that were unwillingly forced to leap into the Jordan was countless. Two thousand two hundred were also taken prisoners, besides immense spoil consisting of asses and sheep and camels and oxen.

§ 6. Now this blow that fell upon the Jews was not inferior to any of the rest, but appeared greater than it really was, because not only the whole country through which they fled was filled with slaughter, and the Jordan could not be crossed over because of the dead bodies that were in it, but also because the lake Asphaltitis<sup>1</sup> was full of dead bodies, that were carried down into it by the river. And now Placidus, making the most of his good fortune, marched against the neighbouring small towns and villages, and took Ábila,<sup>2</sup> and Julias,<sup>3</sup> and Besimoth,<sup>4</sup> and all the others as far as the lake Asphaltitis, and put such deserters into each of them as he thought proper. He then put his soldiers on board ships, and slew those who had fled on to the lake. So all Peræa either surrendered or was taken by the Romans as far as Machærus.<sup>5</sup>

How Vespasian, upon hearing of Commotion in Gaul, made haste to finish the Jewish War. A Description of Jericho, and of the Great Plain; with an Account also of the Lake Asphaltitis.

§ 1.

MEANTIME news came of commotion in Gaul,<sup>1</sup> and that Vindex with the influential persons of that country had revolted from Nero; which affair is more accurately described elsewhere. This news excited Vespasian to go on briskly with the war, for he foresaw already the civil wars which were coming, nay, he saw that the very empire was in danger, and he thought, if he could first reduce its eastern parts to peace, he should make the anxiety less about Italy. As long therefore as the winter continued, he put garrisons for their security into the villages and small towns which he had subdued, and put decurions into the villages, and centurions into the cities; he also rebuilt many places that had been laid waste. But at the beginning of spring he took most of his army, and led it from Cæsarea<sup>2</sup> to Antipatris,<sup>3</sup> where he spent two days in settling the affairs of that city, and on the third day marched on, laying waste and burning all the neighbouring villages. And when he had subdued all the places in the toparchy of Thamna,<sup>4</sup> he marched on to Lydda<sup>5</sup> and Jamnia.<sup>6</sup> And when both those cities had been subdued first, he placed a great many of those that had come over to him [from other places] as inhabitants therein, and then went to Emmaus,<sup>7</sup> where he seized upon the passes which led thence to their metropolis, and fortified his camp, and, leaving the fifth legion there, went on to the toparchy of Bethleptepha.<sup>8</sup> He then destroyed it and the neighbouring region by fire, and fortified at convenient places the strongholds all about Idumæa;<sup>1</sup> and when he had seized upon two villages, which were in the very midst of Idumæa, Betaris<sup>2</sup> and Caphartoba,<sup>3</sup> he slew more than ten thousand, and carried into captivity more than a thousand, and expelled the rest of the population, and placed no small part of his own forces in them, who over-ran and laid waste the whole of the mountainous country; while he himself with the rest of his forces returned to Emmaus, whence he came down through the country of Samaria, and near the city called by others Neapolis,<sup>4</sup> but by the people of that country Mabortha, to Corea,<sup>5</sup> where he pitched his camp on the second day of the month Dæsius, and on the following day he arrived at Jericho, on which day Trajan, one of his commanders, joined him with the forces he brought from Peræa,<sup>6</sup> as all the places beyond the Jordan were already subdued.

§ 2. Now most of the people of Jericho anticipated the approach of the Romans, and fled to the mountainous region over against Jerusalem, while no few of those who were left behind were slain. So they found the city desolate. It is situated in a plain, but a naked and barren mountain of very great length overhangs it, which extends northwards to the land about Scythopolis,<sup>7</sup> and southwards as far as the country of Sodom and the boundaries of the lake Asphaltitis. This mountain is all of it very uneven, and uninhabited because of its barrenness; and there is a mountain situated opposite it near the Jordan, which begins at Julius<sup>8</sup> and the northern region, and extends southwards as far as Somorrhon,<sup>9</sup> which is the boundary of Petra<sup>10</sup> in Arabia. In this ridge of mountains there is one called the Iron Mountain, that extends as far as Moab. Now the region that lies in the middle between these two mountains is called the Great Plain;<sup>11</sup> it extends from the village of Ginnabris<sup>1</sup> to the lake Asphaltitis; its length is two hundred and thirty furlongs, and its breadth a hundred and twenty, and it is bisected by the Jordan. It has two lakes in it, that of Asphaltitis and that of Tiberias,<sup>2</sup> whose natures are opposite to each other; for the former is salt and unfruitful, but that of Tiberias is sweet and fruitful. This plain is much burnt up in summer-time, and because of the extraordinary heat has a very pestilential air; it is entirely destitute of water excepting the river Jordan, which water of the Jordan is the reason why those plantations of palm-trees that are near its banks are more flourishing and fruitful, as those that are remote from it are less so.

§ 3. However, there is a fountain near Jericho,<sup>3</sup> that is copious and very fit for watering the ground; it bubbles up near the old city, which Joshua, the son of Nun, the general of the Hebrews, first took in the land of Canaan by his spear. The story goes that this fountain originally caused not only the blasting of the fruit of the earth and trees, but also made women miscarry, and was injurious and pernicious to all things, but that it was made mild on the contrary and very wholesome and fruitful by the prophet Elisha. This prophet was intimate with Elijah and his successor, and when he was once the guest of the people of Jericho, and the men of that city had treated him very kindly, he requited them and benefited their country by an everlasting favour. For he went out of the city to this fountain, and threw into the water an earthen vessel full of salt, after which he stretched out his righteous right hand to heaven, and pouring into the fountain propitiatory libations, he prayed that the water might be mollified, and that veins of sweet water might be opened; also that God would temper the water with more fertile air, and would bestow upon the people of the country plenty of the fruits of the earth, and a succession of children, and that this prolific water might never fail them while they continued to be righteous. To these prayers Elisha joined proper operations of his hands in a skilful manner, and changed the fountain, and the water, which had been the cause of barrenness and famine before, did from that time supply a numerous posterity, and afford great abundance to the country. Indeed, the power of it is so great in watering the ground, that if it does but once touch the land, it gives greater returns than other waters do, though they remain on the ground to satiety: so the advantage gained from other waters flowing in great plenty is but small, while that of this water is great, when it flows even in little quantities. And it waters a larger space of ground than the other waters do, for it glides through a plain seventy furlongs long and twenty broad, and affords nourishment to most excellent and frequent gardens. There are also many sorts of palm-trees watered by it, differing from each other in taste and name; the richer sort of which, when they are pressed, yield an excellent kind of honey, not much inferior to other honey; and the region abounds with bees. It also produces that balsam which is the most precious of all the fruits in that place, and the cypress tree and the myrobalanus; so that he would not be mistaken who should pronounce this place to be divine, wherein such plenty of very rare and most excellent trees are produced. And, indeed, if we speak of other fruits, it will not be easy to light on any climate in the world that can well be compared to this, for whatever is here sowed comes up with such wonderful returns; the cause of which seems to me to be the warmth of the air, and the fertility of the waters: the warmth calling forth and diffusing what is planted, and the moisture making every thing planted take root firmly, and supplying it with strength in summer-time. For this country is then so burnt up, that nobody can easily go into the open air. But if the water be drawn before sun-rise, and is after that exposed to the air, it becomes exceedingly cold, and has a nature quite contrary to the surrounding air; as in winter again it becomes warm, and to those who bathe in it appears very mild. The air here is also so well-tempered, that the people of the country dress in linen only, even when it snows in the rest of Judæa. Jericho<sup>1</sup> is one hundred and fifty furlongs from Jerusalem, and sixty from the Jordan. The country as far as Jerusalem is desert and stony, but that as far as the Jordan and the lake Asphaltitis is more level, though equally desert and barren. But thus much shall suffice to say about Jericho and its great fertility.

§ 4. The nature of the lake Asphaltitis<sup>1</sup> is also worth describing. It is, as I have said, bitter and unfruitful, and so light that it bears up the heaviest things that are thrown into it, nor is it easy for any one to make things sink to the bottom of it, if he tries to do so. For example, when Vespasian went to see it, he commanded that some who could not swim should have their hands tied behind them, and be thrown into its depths, when it happened that they all floated on the top as if a wind forced them upwards. Moreover, the change of colour in this lake is wonderful, for it changes its appearance thrice every day, and its light is variously reflected according to the rays of the sun. And it casts up black clods of bitumen in many parts of it, which float on the top of the water, and resemble both in shape and size headless bulls. And when the labourers that belong to the lake come to it, and catch hold of it as it is in a composite mass, they drag it into their boats; but when the boats are full, it is not easy to detach it, for it is so tenacious as to make the boat adhere to its mass, till they set it loose with the menstrual blood of women and urine, to which alone it yields. This bitumen is not only useful for the caulking of ships, but also for the cure of men's bodies, so it is mixed in a great many medicines. The length of this lake is five hundred and eighty furlongs, as it extends as far as Zoar<sup>2</sup> in Arabia, and its breadth is a hundred and fifty. The country of Sodom borders upon it, which was of old a happy land, both for the fruits it bore and the riches of its cities, although it is now all burnt up. They say that it was burnt by lightning for the impiety of its inhabitants. And there are still vestiges of that divine fire, and the traces of five cities are still to be seen, as also ashes growing on the fruits, which fruits look as if they were fit to eat, but if people pluck them with their hands, they dissolve into smoke and ashes. And thus what is related about the land of Sodom is borne out by our eyesight.

CHAP. IX.

How Vespasian, after he had taken Gadara, made Preparations for the Siege of Jerusalem; and how he changed his Intention on hearing of the Death of Nero. Also concerning Simon of Gerasa.

§ 1.

AND now Vespasian invested Jerusalem on all sides, and erected fortresses at Jericho and Adida,<sup>1</sup> and placed garrisons in them both, partly consisting of Romans, and partly of a body of auxiliaries. He also sent Lucius Annius to Gerasa,<sup>2</sup> and delivered to him a troop of horse and a considerable number of foot. And when he had taken the city, which he did at the first onset, he slew a thousand of those young men who could not get away first, and he took their families captive, and permitted his soldiers to plunder their effects; after which he set fire to their houses, and went away to the adjoining villages. And the able bodied fled away while the weak were slain, and everything that was left was burnt. And now the war having gone through all the mountainous country, and all the plain country also, those that were at Jerusalem were prevented from leaving the city. For such as had a mind to desert were watched by the Zealots; and such as were not yet on the side of the Romans, were kept in by their army, which surrounded the city on all sides.

§ 2. Now when Vespasian had returned to Cæsarea,<sup>3</sup> and was getting ready to march with all his army upon Jerusalem itself, he was informed that Nero was dead, after having reigned thirteen years and eight days. As to how Nero abused his imperial power, and committed the management of affairs to those vile wretches Nymphidius and Tigellinus, his unworthy freedmen; and how he was plotted against by them, and deserted by all his guards, and fled with four of his most trusty freedmen, and slew himself in the suburbs of Rome; and how those who brought about his death were in no long time themselves brought to punishment; how also the war in Gaul ended, and how Galba was made emperor, and returned from Spain to Rome, and how he was accused by the soldiers of being a pusillanimous person, and slain by treachery in the middle of the forum at Rome; and how Otho was declared emperor, and of his expedition against the commanders of Vitellius, and overthrow; as also what troubles there were under Vitellius, and of the fight near the Capitol; as also how Antonius Primus and Mucianus slew Vitellius and his German legions, and so put an end to the civil war; I have omitted to give an exact account of all this, because it would be tedious to everybody, and has been related by a great number of Greeks and Romans. Yet, for the sake of the connexion of matters, and that my history may not be incomplete, I have just touched upon each of these things briefly. So Vespasian put off at first his expedition against Jerusalem, and stood waiting to see to whom the empire would be transferred after Nero. Again, when he heard that Galba was made emperor, he attempted nothing till he also should send him some directions about the war; but he sent his son Titus to him, to salute him, and to receive his commands as to the Jews. King Agrippa sailed with Titus upon the very same errand to Galba; but as they were in their long ships coasting by Achaia<sup>1</sup> (for it was winter-time) Galba was slain before they could get to him, after he had reigned seven months and as many days. After him Otho became emperor, and assumed the management of public affairs. And Agrippa resolved to go on to Rome, without any fear on account of the change in the government; but Titus by a divine impulse sailed back from Greece to Syria, and went in great haste to Cæsarea to his father. And now both Vespasian and he were in suspense about the state of affairs, the Roman empire being now in an unstable condition, and did not go on with their expedition against the Jews, for they thought that to make any attack upon foreigners was now unseasonable, because of the anxiety they were in as to their own country.

§ 3. And now there arose another war in Jerusalem. There was one Simon, the son of Gioras, a young man, and native of Gerasa (not so cunning indeed as John [of Gischala],<sup>1</sup> who had already seized upon the city, but superior to him in strength of body and courage, on which account he had been expelled by Ananus the high priest from the toparchy of Acrabatta,<sup>2</sup> which he once held, and joined those robbers who had seized upon Masada).<sup>3</sup> At first they suspected him, and only permitted him and the women he brought with him to enter the lower part of the fortress, while they dwelt in the upper part of it themselves. But afterwards (on account of his similarity of character to them, and because he seemed trusty), he went out with them, and ravaged and devastated the country in the neighbourhood of Masada; but when he urged them to undertake greater things, he could not prevail upon them to do so. For, as they were accustomed to dwell in that fortress, they were afraid of going far from what was as it were their lair, but he, desiring to play the monarch, and being ambitious, when he heard of the death of Ananus, left them, and went into the mountainous part of the country, and proclaimed liberty to those in slavery, and rewards to those already free, and got together a band of bad men from all quarters.

§ 4. And as he had now a strong body of men, he overran the villages that lay in the mountainous country, and as still more and more flocked to him, he ventured to descend to the plain. And, since he was now become formidable to the cities, many influential persons were attracted to him by his strength and success, so that his army was no longer composed only of slaves and robbers, but also of a great many of the populace, who were obedient to him as to their king. He then over-ran the toparchy of Acrabatta, and the district as far as the Great Idumæa. And he walled a certain village called Nain,<sup>1</sup> and made use of it as a fortress for his security; and at the ravine called Pharán<sup>2</sup> he widened many of the caves, and many others he found fit for his purpose, and these he used as repositories for his treasures and receptacles for his spoil, and in them he laid up the fruits that he got by rapine; and many of his bands dwelt in them; and he made no secret that he was training his men beforehand, and making preparations to attack Jerusalem.

§ 5. Thereupon most of the Zealots, fearing his plots, and wishing to nip in the bud one that was growing strong to their hurt, went out against him with their weapons. And Simon met them, and joined battle with them, and slew a considerable number of them, and drove the rest before him into the city, but durst not trust his forces so much yet as to make an assault upon the walls, so he resolved first to subdue Idumæa, and as he had now twenty thousand armed men, he marched with them to the borders of that country. Thereupon the rulers of the Idumæans concentrated quickly the most warlike part of their people, amounting to about twenty-five thousand in number, and left the rest to guard their own country, because of the incursions that were made by the Sicarii that were at Masada, and received Simon at their borders, where he fought them, and continued the battle all that day, and left the field after a drawn contest. And he went back to Nain, and the Idumæans returned home. But it was not long ere Simon burst into their country again with a larger force, when he pitched his camp at a certain village called Thecoe,<sup>3</sup> and sent Eleazar, one of his companions, to the garrison at Herodium,<sup>4</sup> which was near, to try and persuade them to surrender that fortress to him. The garrison received this man readily, as long as they knew not what he came about; but when he began to speak of the surrender of the place, they pursued him with their drawn swords, till finding he had no chance of escape, he threw himself down from the walls into the ravine below, and so died immediately. But the Idumæans, who were already much afraid of Simon's power, thought it well to reconnoitre the enemy's army before they hazarded a battle.

§ 6. Now there was one of their commanders named Jacob, who offered to serve them readily upon this occasion, but intended to betray them. He set out therefore from the village Alurus,<sup>1</sup> where the army of the Idumæans was concentrated, and went to Simon; and first agreed to betray Alurus to him, and took assurances upon oath from him that he would always hold him in esteem, and next promised to assist him in subduing all Idumæa. Upon this he was feasted in a friendly manner by Simon, and being elated by his handsome promises, when he returned to his own men, he first stated falsely that the army of Simon was much larger than it really was; after which he addressed and urged the commanders, and by degrees the whole multitude, to receive Simon, and to surrender to him the whole government without fighting. And as he was negotiating this, he invited Simon by messengers, and promised to disperse the Idumæans, which he also did. For as soon as Simon's army drew near, he first mounted his horse, and fled with those whom he had corrupted. Thereupon a panic seized on the whole multitude, and before an engagement came on, they broke their ranks, and every one retired to his own home.

§ 7. Thus unexpectedly did Simon march into Idumæa without bloodshed, and first made a sudden attack upon the city of Hebron, and captured it, and got possession of a great deal of spoil in it, and plundered it of a vast quantity of fruit. Now its inhabitants say that Hebron is a more ancient city, not only than any in that country, but than Memphis<sup>2</sup> in Egypt, and reckon it to be two thousand three hundred years old. They also relate that it was the habitation of Abraham, the progenitor of the Jews, after he had removed from Mesopotamia, and they say that his posterity went down from thence into Egypt, whose monuments are to this very day shown in that small city, wrought of very excellent marble in a most elegant manner. There is also shown there at the distance of six furlongs from the city, a very large turpentine tree, and they say that this tree has lasted from the creation of the world to now. From thence Simon marched through all Idumæa, and did not only ravage the cities and villages, but laid the whole country waste. For, besides his men at arms, he had forty thousand men that followed him, so that he had not provisions enough for such a multitude. And, besides this want of provisions, he was of a savage disposition, and very angry at this nation, so it came to pass that Idumæa was greatly devastated. For, as one may see all the woods despoiled of their leaves by locusts after they have been there, so was there nothing left behind Simon's army but a desert. Some places they burnt down, some they utterly demolished; and whatever grew in the country they either trod it down or fed upon it, and by their marches they made cultivated ground harder than that which was barren. In short there was no indication remaining that those places that had been laid waste had ever existed.

§ 8. This success of Simon excited the Zealots afresh, and though they were afraid to fight him in open battle, they laid ambushes in the passes, and seized upon his wife, and a considerable number of her attendants; whereupon they returned to the city rejoicing as if they had taken Simon himself captive, and almost expected that he would lay down his arms, and make supplication to them for his wife. But instead of feeling merciful, he was very angry with them for seizing his wife; so he went to the wall of Jerusalem, and, like wild beasts when they are wounded, and cannot get at those that wounded them, he vented his spleen upon all persons he met with. Accordingly he seized all those who came out of the city gates, either to gather herbs or sticks, who were unarmed and in years, and tortured them and slew them, so immense was his rage, and all but tasted the very flesh of their dead bodies. He also cut off the hands of many, and sent them into the city to dismay his enemies, and at the same time to try and make the people rise against those that had been the authors of his wife's seizure. He also enjoined them to tell the people, that Simon swore by God, the ruler of the universe, that unless they quickly restored him his wife, he would break down their wall, and inflict the like punishment upon all the citizens, without sparing any age, and without making any distinction between the guilty and the innocent. These threats so greatly frightened, not the people only, but the Zealots themselves also, that they sent his wife back to him, when he became a little milder, and left off his perpetual slaughtering.

§ 9. And now faction and civil war was rampant not only throughout Judæa, but also in Italy. For Galba was slain in the middle of the forum at Rome, and Otho was declared Emperor, and fought against Vitellius, who set up for Emperor also, for the legions in Germany had chosen him. But when he gave battle at Bedriacum<sup>1</sup> in Gaul to Valens and Cæcinna, who were Vitellius' generals, Otho gained the advantage on the first day, but on the second day Vitellius' soldiers had the victory: and when Otho heard of this defeat after much slaughter, he slew himself at Brixellum,<sup>2</sup> after he had been at the head of affairs three months and two days. Otho's army also went over to Vitellius' generals, and Vitellius himself marched for Rome with his army. Meantime Vespasian removed from Cæsarea<sup>3</sup> on the fifth day of the month Dæsius, and marched against those places in Judæa which were not yet overthrown. So he went up into the mountainous country, and took those toparchies that were called the Gophnitic and Acrabattene toparchies,<sup>4</sup> after which he took Bethela<sup>5</sup> and Ephraim,<sup>6</sup> two small cities, and, when he had put garrisons into them, he rode as far as Jerusalem, taking many prisoners, and slaying many on his march. And Cerealis, one of his commanders, took a body of horse and foot, and laid waste that part of Idumæa which was called Upper Idumæa, and took Caphethra,<sup>1</sup> which pretended to be a small town, at the first onset and burnt it down. He also attacked another place called Capharabin,<sup>1</sup> and laid siege to it, for it had a very strong wall, and he expected to have to spend a long time in the siege, when those that were within opened their gates on the sudden, and came to beg pardon, and surrendered themselves up to him. When Cerealis had reduced them he went to Hebron, another very ancient city, situated, as I have said already, in the mountainous country not far from Jerusalem; and when he had broken into the city by force, he slew all that he captured therein from the youths upwards, and burnt down the city. So as all fortified places were now taken, excepting Herodium<sup>2</sup> and Masada<sup>3</sup> and Machærus,<sup>4</sup> which were in the possession of the robbers, Jerusalem was the mark at which the Romans henceforth aimed.

§ 10. And now, as soon as Simon had recovered his wife from the Zealots, he returned back to what remained of Idumæa, and, harassing the nation on all sides, compelled a great number of them to flee to Jerusalem; and followed them himself also to the city, and surrounded the wall again, and when he lit upon any labourers that were coming there out of the country, he slew them. Now this Simon without was a greater terror to the people than the Romans themselves, and the Zealots within were more trouble to them than either. And during this time mischievous contrivances and audacity corrupted the army of the Galilæans; for they had advanced John to power, and he made them returns from the authority he had obtained by their means, permitting them to do everything that any of them desired to do. And their inclination to plunder was insatiable, as was their zeal in searching the houses of the rich, and murdering men and ravishing women was sport to them. They also devoured the spoil they took with blood, and indulged themselves to the full in sodomitical practices with impunity, arranging their hair and putting on women's garments, and smeared all over with perfume, and that they might appear more comely, painting their eye-lashes. And they imitated not only the attire, but also the lusts of women, and were guilty of such intolerable uncleanness, that they contrived unlawful pleasures; and wallowed in the city as in a brothel, and defiled it entirely with their impure actions. And though their faces looked like the faces of women, they killed with their right hands, and though their gait was effeminate, they suddenly attacked people and became warriors, and drew their swords from under their finely dyed cloaks, and stabbed every body through whom they met. And Simon was on the look out for those that fled from John, and was the more bloody of the two: and he who had escaped the tyrant within the walls, was slain by the one before the gates, so that all chance of fleeing and deserting to the Romans was cut off, if any had a mind to do so.

§ 11. But the army that was under John rose against him, and all the Idumæans in it separated themselves from him, and plotted against the tyrant, out of envy at his power, and hatred of his cruelty. And they fought and slew many of the Zealots, and drove the rest before them into the royal palace that was built by Grapte (who was a relation of Izates, the king of Adiabene),<sup>1</sup> and the Idumæans rushed in with them, and drove the Zealots out thence into the temple, and betook themselves to plundering John's effects; for he himself dwelt in the forementioned palace, and had laid up there the spoils he had acquired by his tyranny. Meantime the multitude of the Zealots that were dispersed all over the city gathered together to the temple to those that had fled there, and John prepared to lead them out against the people and the Idumæans. And they were not so much afraid of being attacked by them, because they were themselves better soldiers, as at their desperation, lest they should privately sally out of the temple by night, and not only destroy them but set the city on fire also. So they assembled themselves together with the high priests, and took counsel how they should guard against their assault. And God it seems turned their opinions to bad advice, and they devised a remedy for their safety worse than ruin. For in order to overthrow John, they determined to admit Simon, and to supplicate for the introduction of a second tyrant among them. This was the resolution of the council. So they sent Matthias the high priest, and besought this Simon, of whom they had been so greatly afraid, to enter their city. Those also from Jerusalem who had fled from the Zealots joined in this request to him, from the desire they had of preserving their houses and their effects. And he in an arrogant manner granted them his lordly protection, and entered the city as if to deliver it from the Zealots, being hailed with acclamations by the people as their saviour and preserver: but when he was come in with his army, he took care to secure his own authority, and looked upon those who had invited him in as no less his enemies than those against whom he had been invited in.

§ 12. Thus did Simon get possession of Jerusalem, in the third year of the war, in the month of Xanthicus; whereupon John and his crowd of Zealots, being not only prevented from coming out of the temple, but also having lost their property in the city, (for Simon and his party robbed them at once of what they had,) were in despair of deliverance. Simon also made an assault upon the temple, with the assistance of the people, while the Zealots stood upon the porticoes and battlements, and defended themselves from their assaults. However, a considerable number of Simon's party fell, and many were carried off wounded; for the Zealots threw their darts easily from the higher ground, and seldom failed of hitting their enemies. And having the advantage of situation, they further erected four very large towers, that their darts might come from still higher places, one at the north-east corner, another above the Xystus,<sup>1</sup> the third at another corner opposite the lower city, and the last was erected above the top of the Pastophoria, where one of the priests usually stood and gave a signal beforehand in the evening with a trumpet at the beginning of every seventh day, as also in the evening when the sabbath day was finished, giving notice to the people when they were to leave off work, and when they were to go to work again.<sup>1</sup> They also set upon those towers engines to cast darts and stones, and archers and slingers. And now Simon made his assaults upon the temple less energetically, because most of his men were weary, yet he held out because his army was superior in numbers; but the missiles which were thrown by the engines were carried a great way, and slew many of the fighting men.

CHAP. X.

How the Soldiers, both in Judæa and Egypt, proclaimed Vespasian Emperor, who released Josephus from his Bonds.

§ 1.

NOW about this very time heavy calamities came on Rome. For Vitellius arrived from Germany with his soldiers, and drew along with him a great multitude of other men besides, and as the spaces allotted for the soldiers could not contain him and his following, he made all Rome itself his camp, and filled every house with armed men. And they, when they saw the riches of Rome with eyes which had never seen such riches before, and had the glitter all round them of silver and gold, had much ado to contain their covetous desires, so as not to betake themselves to plunder, and to the slaughter of such as opposed them. Such was the state of affairs in Italy at this time.

§ 2. Now when Vespasian had overthrown all the places that were near Jerusalem, he returned to Cæsarea,<sup>2</sup> and there heard of the troubles at Rome, and that Vitellus was emperor. This produced indignation in him, although he well knew how to be governed as well as to govern, for he thought him unworthy of being his lord who so madly seized upon the empire as if it were going a begging, and as this sorrow of his was violent, he was not able to support the torment he felt, nor to apply himself to other wars, when his native country was being laid waste. But as much as his passion excited him to vengeance, so much was he restrained by the consideration of his distance from home; because fortune might anticipate him and do a world of mischief before he could himself sail over the sea to Italy, especially as it was still the winter season, so he restrained his anger, though vehement, for the time.

§ 3. But now his commanders and soldiers met in companies, and consulted openly about a change, and cried out in their indignation that the soldiers at Rome lived delicately, and though they did not venture so much as to hear the fame of war, voted whom they pleased as rulers, and in hopes of gain made them emperors; while they themselves who had gone through so many labours, and grown old under their helmets, gave away their power to others, and that though they had among themselves one more worthy to rule. And what juster opportunity would they ever have of requiting their general, if they did not seize that now before them? and there was as much juster reason for Vespasian being emperor than Vitellius, as they were themselves more deserving than those who had declared the other emperor. For they had undergone as great wars as had the troops that came from Germany, nor were they inferior in arms to those who brought that tyrant to Rome. Nor was there any need for a contest: for surely neither the Roman senate nor people would put up with such a lascivious emperor as Vitellius, instead of the chaste Vespasian; nor would they endure a most barbarous tyrant instead of a good governor, nor choose one that was childless to rule over them instead of one that was a father; because the advancement of their own sons to dignities was certainly the greatest security for peace that kings could give. If then they estimated the capacity for governing from the experience of years, they ought to have Vespasian, or if from the strength of youth, they ought to have Titus; for so they would have the advantage of the different ages of both. And they would not only supply strength to those whom they should make emperors, as they had already three legions, besides other auxiliaries from the neighbouring kings, and would have further all the armies in the East to support them, as also all those in Europe which were out of the reach and dread of Vitellius, and also such allies as they had in Italy itself, as Vespasian's brother<sup>1</sup> and other son,<sup>2</sup> the latter of whom would win over a great many of the young men that were of rank, while the other was entrusted with the charge of the city, which office of his would be no small help towards Vespasian's obtaining the empire. In short, if they themselves made any further delays, the senate might choose an emperor, whom the soldiers, who were the saviours of the empire, would hold in contempt.

§ 4. Such was the language the soldiers held in their various knots, after which they mustered together en masse, and encouraging one another declared Vespasian emperor, and exhorted him to save the empire which was in danger. Now Vespasian had been concerned for a considerable time about the state of public affairs, but he did not himself intend to set up for emperor, though his actions made him think himself worthy of it, for he preferred the safety of a private life to the dangers of an illustrious position. But on his refusing the empire, the commanders insisted the more earnestly upon his acceptance of it, and the soldiers flocked about him with their drawn swords in their hands, and threatened to kill him, unless he would now live as became his merits. And when he had shown his reluctance a great while, and had endeavoured to thrust away empire from him, at last, not being able to persuade them, he yielded to those who hailed him emperor.

§ 5. So upon consenting to the urgent requests of Mucianus and the other commanders that he would be emperor, and to those of the rest of the army who cried out that they were willing to be led against all his rivals, his first idea was to become master of Alexandria, knowing that Egypt was of the greatest consequence to the empire, because of its supplying corn (so that if he could get master of Egypt, he hoped to dethrone Vitellius, if he tried to keep the empire by force, for the population of Rome would not stand hunger), and also because he was desirous to join the two legions that were at Alexandria to his present army. He also considered that he should then have that country for a defence against the uncertainty of fortune. For Egypt is hard to enter by land, and has no havens by sea. It is protected on the west by the dry deserts of Libya, and on the south by Syene,<sup>1</sup> which divides it from Ethiopia, and by the cataracts of the Nile that cannot be sailed over, and on the east by the Red Sea that extends as far as Coptos,<sup>2</sup> and it is fortified on the north by the land that extends to Syria, and by what is called the Egyptian Sea, which has no havens in it for ships. Thus is Egypt walled about on every side. Its length between Pelusium<sup>3</sup> and Syene is two thousand furlongs, and the passage by sea from Plinthine<sup>4</sup> to Pelusium is three thousand six hundred furlongs. And the Nile is navigable as far as the city called Elephantine, the forementioned cataracts hindering ships from going any further. The haven also of Alexandria is not approached by mariners without difficulty, even in time of peace; for the entrance is narrow, and full of sunken rocks, which obliges mariners to turn from the straight course. And its left is fortified by artificial moles, and on its right lies the island called Pharos, which has a very great tower, which gives light to such as sail within three hundred furlongs of it, so that ships may cast anchor some distance off in the night because of the difficulty of sailing in. Round this island is built a very great artificial sea-wall, and when the sea dashes itself against it, and its waves are broken against that breakwater, navigation becomes very troublesome, and the entrance through so narrow a passage is rendered dangerous; but the haven itself inside is a very safe one, and is thirty furlongs in extent, and into it is brought what the country wants in order to its happiness, as also the abundance the country affords more than it wants is distributed hence all over the world.

§ 6. With reason, therefore, did Vespasian desire to get possession of Alexandria to support his attempt upon the whole empire. So he immediately sent to Tiberius Alexander, who was then governor of Egypt and Alexandria, and informed him of the devotion of the army, and how, being forced to accept the burden of empire, he was desirous to have him for his confederate and supporter. Now as soon as Alexander had read this letter, he promptly obliged the legions and the populace to take the oath of fidelity to Vespasian. And both of them willingly obeyed, being already acquainted with his excellence from his command in that neighbourhood. And Alexander, being now entrusted with all things relating to the empire, got all things ready for Vespasian's arrival at Alexandria. Now rumour carried the news that he was emperor over the East quicker than one would have thought, upon which every city kept festivals, and had sacrifices and thank-offerings; and the legions that were in Mysia<sup>1</sup> and Pannonia,<sup>2</sup> who had been in commotion a little before because of the audacity of Vitellius, took the oath of fidelity to Vespasian with greater joy. Vespasian then removed from Cæsarea to Berytus,<sup>3</sup> where many embassages came to him from Syria, and many from other provinces, bringing with them crowns and congratulatory decrees from every city. Mucianus came also, who was the governor of the province, and told him of the devotion of the people, and how in every city they had taken the oath of fidelity to him.

§ 7. And as Vespasian's fortune succeeded to his wishes everywhere, and affairs mostly turned out favourably to him, he considered that he had not arrived at power without divine Providence, but that a righteous fate had brought the empire to him. And as he called to mind the other signs, which had been frequent, that foretold he should obtain the empire, he remembered also what Josephus said to him, who had ventured to hail him as emperor while Nero was still alive. So he was much concerned that this man was still in bonds with him, and called for Mucianus and his other commanders and friends, and first informed them of the valour that Josephus had shown, and what great trouble he had given him in the siege of Jotapata;<sup>1</sup> and then related those predictions of his, which he had at the time suspected as made up from fear, but which were now by time and facts proved to be divine. "It is a shameful thing (added he) that this man who foretold my coming to the empire, and was the minister of the voice of God to me, should still be detained in the condition of a captive or prisoner." So he called for Josephus, and commanded that he should be set at liberty; whereupon the commanders hoped for glorious things for themselves, as Vespasian made this requital to a stranger. And Titus, who was then present with his father, said, "O father, it is but just that the reproach of prisoner should be taken from Josephus by the steel. For if we do not loose his bonds, but cut them off, he will be like a man that has never been bound at all." For that is the usual method of treating such as have been bound without cause. This suggestion seemed good to Vespasian, so a man came in, and cut off the chain with his axe. So Josephus received this testimony of his integrity for a reward, and was moreover esteemed a person of credit as to the future.

CHAP. XI.

How upon the Conquest and Slaughter of Vitellius, Vespasian hastened his Journey to Rome, but Titus his Son returned to Jerusalem.

§ 1.

AND now, when Vespasian had given answers to the embassages, and had disposed of his preferments justly and according to every one's deserts, he went to Antioch. And deliberating which way he had best take, he preferred to go to Rome, rather than to march to Alexandria, because he saw that Alexandria was secured to him already, while affairs at Rome were in disorder owing to Vitellius. So he sent Mucianus to Italy, and committed a considerable army both of horse and foot to him. But Mucianus was afraid of going by sea, because it was the middle of winter, and so he led his army on foot through Cappadocia and Phrygia.<sup>1</sup>

§ 2. Meantime Antonius Primus took the third legion of the troops that were in Mysia, for he was governor of that province, and hastened to fight Vitellius. Whereupon Vitellius despatched Cæcinna with a great army, having great confidence in him because of his having beaten Otho. And Cæcinna marched from Rome by forced marches, and came up with Antonius near Cremona<sup>2</sup> in Gaul, a city which is on the borders of Italy. But when he saw that the enemy there were numerous and in good order, he durst not fight them, and as he thought retreat dangerous, he began to think of treason. So he assembled together the centurions and tribunes that were under his command, and urged them to go over to Antonius, diminishing the reputation of Vitellius, and exaggerating the strength of Vespasian. He also told them that with the one there was only the bare name of emperor, but the other had the power, and it was better for them to anticipate necessity and gain favour, and, as they were sure to be beaten in battle, to avoid danger by taking that course of action. For Vespasian was able without them to get what still remained, while Vitellius could not with them keep what he already had.

§ 3. Cæcinna said this and much more to the same purpose, and persuaded them to comply with him, and both he and his army deserted to Antonius. But the very same night the soldiers repented of what they had done, and a fear seized on them, lest perhaps Vitellius who sent them should come off the stronger: and they drew their swords and rushed at Cæcinna intending to kill him. And the deed would have been done by them, had not the tribunes fallen upon their knees, and besought them not to do it. So the soldiers did not kill him, but put him in bonds as a traitor, and intended to send him to Vitellius. When Primus heard of this, he roused his men immediately, and made them put on their armour, and led them against those that had revolted. And they drew themselves up in order of battle, and made resistance for a while, but were soon routed and fled to Cremona. Then Primus took his cavalry, and cut off their access to that city, and surrounded and cut to pieces a great number of them before the city, and rushed into the city with the rest, and gave leave to his soldiers to plunder it. And here many strangers who were merchants perished, and many of the inhabitants, and Vitellius' whole army, consisting of thirty thousand and two hundred men; while Antonius lost only four thousand five hundred of those that came with him from Mysia. He then set Cæcinna free, and sent him to Vespasian to report to him what had happened. And he went and was well received by him, and covered the disgrace of his treachery by the unexpected honours he received from Vespasian.

§ 4. And now, upon the news that Antonius was at hand, Sabinus took courage at Rome, and mustered together those bands of soldiers that kept watch by night, and during the night seized upon the Capitol. And at daybreak many nobles flocked to him, and among them Domitian, his brother's son, who added greatly to their hopes of victory. Now Vitellius was not much concerned about Primus, but was very angry with those who had revolted with Sabinus, and thirsting from his own natural barbarity for noble blood, let loose upon the Capitol that part of his army which had come with him from Germany. And both those on this side, and those who occupied the temple,<sup>1</sup> fought with great bravery; but at last the soldiers that came from Germany, being too numerous for the others, got possession of the hill. Domitian himself, with many other of the principal Romans, providentially escaped, while all the rest of the multitude were cut to pieces, and Sabinus himself was brought before Vitellius and put to death, and the soldiers plundered the temple<sup>1</sup> of its votive offerings, and set it on fire. But the next day Antonius arrived with his army, and was met by Vitellius and his army; and after they had fought in three different places, the last were all cut to pieces. Then did Vitellius come out of his palace drunk, and glutted with an extravagant and luxurious meal, as availing himself of his last chance; and being dragged along by the multitude, and undergoing all sorts of ill-treatment,<sup>1</sup> was butchered in the middle of Rome, having reigned eight months and five days, and had he lived much longer, I think the empire would not have sufficed for his lust. Of the others who were slain, were counted more than fifty thousand. This battle was fought on the third day of the month Apellæus, and the next day Mucianus entered the city with his army, and ordered Antonius and his men to leave off killing; for they were still searching the houses, and killing many of Vitellius' soldiers, and many of the populace, supposing them to be of his party, their rage preventing any accurate discrimination between friends and foes. He then produced Domitian, and recommended him to the multitude as emperor, until his father should arrive in person. And the people, being now freed from their fears, made acclamations of joy for Vespasian as their emperor, and kept festival for his establishment in power and for the fall of Vitellius.

§ 5. And now, upon Vespasian's arrival at Alexandria, this good news reached him from Rome, and simultaneously came embassies from all the world, now his own, to congratulate him upon his advancement; and though Alexandria was the greatest of all cities next to Rome, it proved too narrow to contain the multitudes that now flocked to it. And the empire being now secured to him, and the Roman state being now unexpectedly saved from ruin, Vespasian turned his thoughts to what remained still undone in Judæa. However, he himself was in a hurry to set out for Rome, as the winter was now almost over, so he soon set the affairs of Alexandria in order, and despatched his son Titus with a picked force to capture Jerusalem. And Titus went by land as far as Nicopolis,<sup>2</sup> which is twenty furlongs from Alexandria; and there he put his army on board some men-of-war, and sailed up the Nile to the district of Mendes<sup>1</sup> as far as the city Thmuis;<sup>2</sup> and there he disembarked, and marched by land, and bivouacked at a small city called Tanis.<sup>3</sup> His second station was Heracleopolis,<sup>4</sup> and his third Pelusium.<sup>5</sup> He then refreshed his army at that place for two days, and on the third passed over the mouth of the Nile at Pelusium; he then proceeded one station over the desert, and pitched his camp at the temple of Casian Zeus,<sup>6</sup> and on the next day encamped at Ostracine.<sup>7</sup> This station had no water, for the people of the country make use of water brought from elsewhere. After this he rested at Rhinocorura,<sup>8</sup> and from thence he went to Raphia,<sup>9</sup> which was his fourth station. This city is the beginning of Syria. For his fifth station he pitched his camp at Gaza,<sup>10</sup> after which he went to Ascalon,<sup>11</sup> and thence to Jamnia,<sup>12</sup> and after that to Joppa,<sup>13</sup> and from Joppa to Cæsarea,<sup>14</sup> having determined to concentrate all his forces there.

CHAP. I.

Concerning the Factions at Jerusalem; and the terrible Miseries that afflicted the City owing to them.

WHEN Titus had marched over the desert which lies between Egypt and Syria in the forementioned manner, he arrived at Cæsarea, having resolved to concentrate his forces there, before he began the war. Now while he was assisting his father at Alexandria to get firmly settled in the empire which had been newly conferred upon him by God, it so happened that the civil strife at Jerusalem revived, and formed three factions, and each faction fought against the others, which in such evil cases may be said to be a good thing and the result of justice. Now the attack the Zealots made upon the people, which was the cause of the city's destruction, has been set forth already in an accurate manner, as also whence it arose, and what a height of mischief it grew to. But for the present sedition, one would not be wrong if one called it a sedition begotten by another sedition, and like a wild beast grown mad, which, for want of food from without, fell at last to eating its own flesh.

§ 2. For Eleazar, the son of Simon, who first separated the Zealots from the people, and made them retire into the temple, appeared very angry at John's daily outrages upon the people (for he never left off murdering), but the truth was that he could not bear to submit to a tyrant who was later in point of time than himself. So being desirous of gaining the entire power and dominion for himself, he severed his connection with John, and formed a party consisting of Judas the son of Chelcias, and Simon the son of Ezron, who were influential persons, and Ezekias the son of Chobari, a person of eminence. Each of these were accompanied by a great many of the Zealots, and they seized upon the inner court of the temple, and placed their arms over the holy gates and upon the sacred fronts. And as they had plenty of provisions they were of good courage (for there was a great abundance of what was consecrated to sacred uses for such as scrupled not to make use of them), but they were afraid on account of their small numbers, and when they had laid up their arms there, they did not stir from the spot. As to John, whatever advantage he had over Eleazar in the number of his followers, he had as much disadvantage in the situation he was in; for as he had his enemies over his head, he could not make any assault upon them without loss, yet his anger was too great to let him be at rest. And although he suffered more mischief from Eleazar and his party than he could inflict upon them, yet he would not leave off assaulting them, so that there were continual sallies and hurling of missiles against one another, and the temple was defiled everywhere with slaughter.

§ 3. And now Simon, the son of Gioras, whom the people had invited in, hoping for his assistance in the great distresses they were in, but finding a tyrant, having in his power the upper city and a great part of the lower, made more effective assaults upon John and his party, because they too were fought against from above. For he was beneath them when he attacked them, as they were beneath those above them. And John, being fought against on both sides, did easily both receive and inflict great damage, and the same advantage that Eleazar and his party had over him, since he was beneath them, had he by his higher situation over Simon, so that he easily repelled the attacks that were made from below by weapons thrown by the hand only; but was obliged to repel those that threw their darts from the temple above him by his engines of war: for he had many engines which threw darts and javelins and stones, and that in no small number, by which he not only kept off such as fought against him, but slew moreover many of the priests who were engaged in their sacred ministrations. For although these men were mad with all sorts of impiety, yet did they still admit those that desired to offer their sacrifices, although they took care to search the people of their own country, and both suspected and watched them, while they were not so much afraid of strangers, who, although at their entrance they pleaded earnestly against their cruelty, were yet often destroyed incidentally by the sedition. For those darts that were thrown by the engines flew over with such force that they reached as far as the altar and sanctuary itself, and fell upon the priests and those that were engaged in the sacred offices, insomuch, that many persons who came there with great zeal from the ends of the earth, to offer sacrifices at this famous place which was esteemed holy by all mankind, fell down themselves before their own sacrifices, and sprinkled the altar which was venerated by all men, both Greeks and Barbarians, with their own blood. And the dead bodies of strangers were mixed with those of their own countrymen, and the corpses of profane persons with those of the priests, and the blood of all sorts of dead carcases made quite a lake in the holy precincts. Most wretched city, what misery equal to this didst thou suffer from the Romans, when they came to purify thee from thy civil strife? For thou couldst no longer be a place fit for God, nor couldst thou longer continue in being, after thou hadst been a sepulchre for the bodies of thy own people, and hadst made the sanctuary itself a burying-place in this civil war of thine. Yet mayst thou again grow better, if ever thou dost appease the anger of God who is the author of thy destruction. But I must restrain my emotion by the rules of history, since this is not the time for domestic lamentations, but for historical narrative. I therefore return to the events that followed in this sedition.

§ 4. For now there were three different sets of plotters in the city. Eleazar and his party, who guarded the sacred first-fruits, came against John in their cups, and those that were with John plundered the populace, and were excited against Simon, who had his supply of provisions from the city contrary to the interests of the rival factions. When, therefore, John was assaulted on both sides, he made his men turn about, and threw his darts from the porticoes upon those from the city that came up against him, while he repelled by his engines of war those that attacked him from the temple. And if at any time he was free from those that were above him (which happened frequently from their being drunk and tired), he sallied out the more securely with a large force upon Simon and his party. And whatever parts of the city he came to, he set on fire those houses that were full of corn and all other kinds of necessaries. The same thing was done by Simon, who upon John's retreat attacked the city also; as if they had done so on purpose to serve the Romans, by destroying what the city had laid up against the siege, and by thus cutting off the sinews of their own strength. Accordingly, it so came to pass, that all the places round the temple were burnt down, and the city became half desert and half camp, and almost all the corn was burnt, which would have sufficed them for a siege of many years. So they were captured eventually owing to famine, which it was almost impossible they would have been, unless they had thus paved the way for it for themselves.

§ 5. And now that the city was infested on all sides by plotters and rabble, the people of the city, between them, were like a great body being torn to pieces. And the aged men and the women were in such distress in consequence of their internal calamities, that they prayed for the coming of the Romans, and earnestly hoped for an external war to free them from their domestic miseries.

The citizens themselves were in terrible consternation and fear, nor had they any opportunity of taking counsel and changing their conduct, nor was there any hope of coming to an agreement with their enemies, nor could such as wished flee away. For guards were set at all places, and the chiefs of the robbers, although they were at rivalry with one another in other respects, yet agreed in killing as their common enemies those that were for peace with the Romans, or were suspected of an inclination to desert, though they agreed in nothing but this, to kill those that deserved to be safe. The shouts also of those who were fighting were incessant both by day and night, but the continual lamentations of those that mourned were more dreadful still. And their calamities gave perpetual cause for lamentations, although the deep consternation they were in prevented their outward wailing; for being constrained by their fear to conceal their inward passions, they were inwardly tormented, without daring to open their lips in groans. Nor was any regard paid by their relations to those who were still alive, nor was any care taken for the burial of those who were dead; the reason for both was that every one despaired about himself. For those who were not among the seditious had no great desires for any thing, expecting for certain that they would very soon be killed; and the seditious fought against each other, and trod upon the dead bodies as they lay heaped one upon another, and taking up a mad rage from the dead bodies that were under their feet, became the fiercer; and were still inventing something or other that was pernicious against one another, and when they had resolved upon any thing, they executed it without mercy, and omitted no kind of outrage or barbarity. Nay, John wickedly employed the sacred timber in the construction of his engines of war. For the people and the high priests had formerly determined to underprop the temple, and raise the sanctuary twenty cubits higher, for king Agrippa had at very great expense, and with very great pains, brought from Mount Libanus <sup>1</sup> such timber as was adapted for that purpose, being wood well worth seeing both for for straightness and size. But as the war interrupted this work, John had them cut, and built towers with them, finding them long enough to oppose from them his adversaries that fought from the temple above him. He also had them brought and placed behind the inner court opposite the west end of the cloister, where alone he could place them, for the other sides were for a long way occupied by steps.

§ 6. Now John hoped to be too much for his enemies by these engines constructed by impiety, but God made his labour vain by bringing the Romans upon him before he had reared any of his towers. For Titus, when he had concentrated part of his force, and had ordered the rest to meet him at Jerusalem, marched from Cæsarea. There were the three legions that had accompanied his father when he laid Judæa waste, and also the twelfth legion which had been formerly beaten with Cestius; which legion, on other occasions remarkable for its valour, now marched with greater zeal to avenge itself on the Jews for what it had formerly suffered at their hands. Of these legions he ordered the fifth to march by Emmaus<sup>1</sup> to meet him, and the tenth to march by Jericho;<sup>2</sup> and himself set out with the rest, among whom were all those numerous auxiliaries that came from the kings, and a considerable number that came to his assistance from Syria. The gaps also made in these four legions by the picked men who were sent by Vespasian with Mucianus to Italy were filled up by the soldiers that came with Titus. These were two thousand men, chosen out of the army of Alexandria, and three thousand also followed him of those that guarded the river Euphrates, as also Tiberius Alexander, who was a most valuable friend of his both for his good-will to him and for his intelligence. He had formerly had the management of Egypt, but was now thought worthy to be general of the army, as he had been the first who had welcomed the new emperor,<sup>3</sup> and had joined himself to him with great fidelity, when things were uncertain, and fortune had not yet declared for him. He now accompanied Titus as a counsellor in the emergencies of war, a position for which he was well qualified both from his age and experience.

CHAP. II.

How Titus marched to Jerusalem, and how he was in Danger, as he was making a Reconnaissance of the City. Of the place also where he pitched his Camp.

§ 1.

NOW as Titus advanced into the enemy's country, the auxiliaries that were sent by the kings marched first, and all the other auxiliaries with them, after whom followed those who were to make the roads and measure out the camp; then came the commanders' baggage, and after that the soldiers completely armed to guard it, and then came Titus himself, having with him another select body and the pikemen; and behind him the cavalry belonging to the legion. All these marched before the engines, and after them the tribunes and leaders of the cohorts with picked men; and after them the standards with the eagle, and before the standards the trumpeters belonging to them; next to these came the main body of the army, every legion being six deep; and the servants belonging to every legion came after these; and before these last the baggage; the mercenaries came last, and those that guarded them brought up the rear. Now Titus, according to the Roman usage, went in the front of the army in order, and marched through Samaria to Gophna,<sup>1</sup> a city that had been formerly taken by his father, and was now garrisoned by Roman soldiers. And when he had lodged there one night, he marched on in the morning; and when he had gone a day's march, he pitched his camp in the valley which the Jews, in their own tongue, call the Valley of Thorns,<sup>2</sup> near a certain village called Gabath-saul<sup>3</sup> (which signifies the hill of Saul), about thirty furlongs from Jerusalem. From thence he took with him six hundred picked horsemen, and went to make a reconnoissance of the city, to gauge its strength and the courage of the Jews, and to see whether, when they saw him, before a battle came off, they would be frightened and submit; for he had been informed, as was really true, that the people who had fallen into the hands of the seditious and the robbers were greatly desirous of peace, but being too weak to rise against the rest remained still.

past without hurting him, as if all of them missed him on purpose. And he perpetually kept off with his sword those that came on his side, and overturned many of those that met him face to face, and made his horse ride over those that were overthrown. The enemy indeed made a great shout at the boldness of Titus, and urged one another on to rush upon him, but those against whom he rode fled, and dispersed pell-mell; while those that were in the same danger with him kept up close to him, though they were wounded both on their backs and on their sides; for they had each of them but one hope of safety, namely to assist Titus in opening a way before he was surrounded by his enemies. Now there were two of these at some distance from him, one of whom the enemy surrounded and slew with their darts, and his horse also, and slew the other as he leaped down from his horse, and carried off his horse with them. But Titus escaped with the rest, and got back safe to his camp. This success of the Jews in their first encounter with the Romans elated their minds, and gave them an ill-grounded hope, and this transient inclination of fortune on their side made them very confident as to the future.

§ 3. As the legion from Emmaus<sup>1</sup> joined him at night, Titus removed thence when it was day, and advanced to the place called Scopos;<sup>2</sup> from whence the city could well be descried, and the splendour and size of the temple, as the place, joining the north quarter of the city, was a plain, and very truly called Scopos.<sup>3</sup> And as he was then seven furlongs from the city, Titus ordered a camp to be constructed for two of the legions to be there together, and ordered another camp to be constructed three furlongs behind for the fifth legion; for he thought that they might be tired by their night march, and deserved being protected from the enemy, and so would with less fear construct their camp. And as they were just beginning to do so, the tenth legion had already arrived which came through Jericho, where a certain party of armed men had formerly lain to guard the pass which had been occupied before by Vespasian. These troops had orders to encamp six furlongs from Jerusalem, at the mount called the Mount of Olives, which lies opposite the city on the east side, and is parted from it by a deep ravine lying between called Cedron.

§ 4. Now, although hitherto the several parties in the city had been contending with one another perpetually, this foreign war now suddenly coming upon them in full stream put the first stop to their mutual strife, and, as the seditious now saw with alarm the Romans pitching three different camps, they began to think of an evil sort of concord, and said to one another, "What are we thinking of to suffer three fortified camps to be built to coop us in, so that we shall not be able to breathe freely? for while the enemy is securely fortifying himself in opposition to us, we sit still within our own walls, and become spectators only of their fine and excellent works, with our hands idle and our armour laid by. We are, it seems (so did they cry out), only courageous against ourselves, while the Romans are likely to gain the city without bloodshed owing to our factions." Thus did they encourage one another when they were got together, and seized their armour immediately, and sallied out upon the tenth legion, and rushed through the ravine, and fell upon the Romans with a prodigious shout, as they were fortifying their camp. And as the Romans were in different parties at their work, and so had mostly laid aside their arms (for they thought the Jews would not have ventured to make a sally upon them, and even had they been disposed to do so they supposed their sedition would have absorbed their attention), they were thrown into disorder unexpectedly, and some of them left the work they were about, and immediately retired, while many ran to their arms, but were struck and slain before they could turn round on the enemy. The Jews also flocked up perpetually in greater numbers, being encouraged by the good success of those who first made the attack, and as they had such good fortune, seemed both to themselves and the enemy to be more numerous than they really were. The disorderly way of their fighting also at first threw the Romans into disorder, as they had been constantly used to fight in good order, and keeping their ranks, and obeying the orders given them. So the Romans were now taken at disadvantage, and gave way to the assaults made upon them; and although whenever those that were overtaken turned round upon the Jews, they checked them in their course, and wounded them, as they were less on their guard owing to their impetuosity; yet as more and more Jews sallied out of the city, the Romans were at last thrown into more and more disorder, and repulsed from their camp. Nay, things looked as though the entire legion would have been in danger, had not Titus been informed of the case they were in, and sent them succours immediately. So he reproached them for their cowardice, and turned back those that were running away, and fell himself upon the flank of the Jews with those picked troops that came with him, and slew a considerable number, and wounded more of them, and put them all to flight, and pushed them down the ravine. Now these Jews suffered greatly in the declivity, but when they were got through it, they turned about and faced the Romans, and there fought them with the ravine between them. Thus did they continue the fight till noon; but when it was already a little after noon, Titus set those that had come to the rescue with him, and those that belonged to the cohorts, in battle-array against the Jews who sallied out, and then sent the rest of the legion to the mountain-ridge to fortify their camp.

§ 5. This move of the Romans seemed to the Jews flight, and when the watchman who was placed upon the wall gave a signal by shaking his garment, a fresh swarm of Jews sallied forth with such impetuosity, that one might compare it to the running of the most savage wild beasts. Indeed none of those that were drawn up in battle-array against them could stand their attack, but, as if they had been hurled from an engine, they broke the enemies' ranks, who were put to flight and fled to the mountain; none but Titus himself, and a few others with him, being left in the midst of the declivity. Now these friends of his despised the danger they were in and stood their ground, being ashamed to leave their general, but earnestly exhorted him to give way to these Jews that were fond of dying, and not to run into danger for those that ought to fight for him, but to consider what his position was, and not to fill the place of a common soldier, nor to stand his ground in such a sudden crisis as this, as he was general in the war, and lord of the world, on whom everything depended. These words Titus seemed not so much as to hear, but opposed those that ran upon him, and smote them on the face, and forced them back and slew them, and also fell upon the enemy as they marched en masse down the declivity, and thrust them back. But though they were so dismayed at his courage and strength, they did not flee even then to the city, but fell off from him on both sides, and pressed upon those that fled up the hill. But he still fell upon their flank, and checked their ardour. Meantime disorder and terror again seized those that were fortifying the camp at the top of the hill, upon their seeing those beneath them running away, and the whole legion was dispersed, for they thought that the sallies of the Jews were irresistible, and that Titus was himself put to flight; for they took it for granted, that, if he had stood his ground, the rest would never have fled. Thus were they possessed by a kind of panic fear, and some dispersed one way, some another, till some of them saw their general in the very heat of action, and being in great concern for him, loudly proclaimed the danger he was in to the entire legion. And now shame made them turn back, and they reproached one another with having done worse than running away by deserting their prince, so they used their utmost force against the Jews, and when they once lost ground on the declivity, they drove them to the bottom of the valley. The Jews fought indeed as they retired, but as the Romans had the advantage of the ground, and were above the Jews, they drove them all into the ravine. Titus also pressed upon those that faced him, and sent the legion again to fortify their camp, while he himself and those that were with him before resisted the enemy, and kept them back. Thus, if I must neither add any thing out of flattery, nor extenuate anything out of envy, but speak the plain truth, Titus himself twice delivered the entire legion when it was in jeopardy, and gave them security to fortify their camp.

CHAP. III.

How Faction again revived in Jerusalem, and yet the Jews contrived Snares for the Romans. How Titus also threatened his Soldiers for their headlong Rashness.

§ 1.

AS now the war abroad ceased for a while, faction within revived; and as the feast of Unleavened Bread was now come, on the fourteenth day of the month Xanthicus, on which day it is believed the Jews were first freed from the Egyptians, Eleazar and his party opened the gates, and admitted such of the people as wished to worship God.<sup>1</sup> But John made use of this feast as a cloak for his treacherous designs, and armed the most obscure of his own party, most of whom were not purified, with weapons concealed under their garments, and sent them quickly into the temple to occupy it. And they, when they were got in, threw their garments away, and were at once seen to be in armour. Upon this there was very great disorder and disturbance in the sanctuary, as the people, who had no part in the sedition, supposed that this assault was made against all without exception, but the Zealots thought it was made against themselves only. So they left off guarding the gates any longer, and leaped down from the battlements before they came to an engagement, and fled to the underground parts of the temple; while the people that stood trembling at the altar were jostled and trampled upon in the sanctuary, and were beaten both with clubs and steel without mercy. Such also as had differences with others slew many persons that were quiet, out of private enmity and hatred, pretending that they belonged to some rival faction; and everyone that had formerly offended any of these plotters, <sup>1</sup> Here we see the true reason of such vast numbers of Jews being in Jerusalem during this siege of Titus, and perishing therein; that the siege began at the feast of the Passover, when such prodigious multitudes of Jews and proselytes of the gate were come from all parts of Judæa, and from other countries, in order to celebrate that great festival.—W.

if now recognised, was led away to slaughter as a Zealot. And when they had cruelly treated the innocent in various ways they granted a truce to the guilty, and let those go off that came out of the underground parts; and themselves seized upon the inner temple, and upon everything stored therein, and then ventured to oppose Simon. Thus that sedition, which had been divided into three factions, was now reduced to two.

§ 2. Now Titus, intending to pitch his camp nearer the city than Scopos, placed opposite the Jews as many picked horse and foot as he thought sufficient to prevent their sallying out, and gave orders to the whole army to level all the ground up to the walls of the city. So they threw down all the hedges and fences which the inhabitants had put round their gardens and trees, and cut down all the fruit-trees that lay between them and the walls of the city, and filled up all the hollow places and gullies, and levelled projecting rocks with iron instruments, and so made all the place level from Scopos to Herod's tomb, which was close to the pool called the Serpent's Pool.<sup>1</sup>

§ 3. Now at this very time the Jews contrived the following stratagem against the Romans. The bolder sort of the seditious went out of the city at the towers called the Women's Towers, as if they had been ejected out of the city by those who were in favour of peace, and rambled about as if they were afraid of being assaulted by the Romans, and were in fear of one another; while those that stood at intervals upon the wall, and seemed to be men of the people, cried out aloud for peace, and entreated they might have security for their lives given them, and invited the Romans, promising to open the gates to them; and at the same time that they cried out this, they threw stones at their own people, as though they would drive them away from the gates. These also pretended that they were excluded by force, and that they begged those that were within to let them in; and rushing towards the Romans perpetually, they then turned back, and seemed to be in great alarm. Now the Roman soldiers did not suspect this trick of theirs, but thinking they had the one party in their power, and could punish them when they pleased, and hoping that the other party would open their gates to them, set about the matter at once. But Titus himself viewed this surprising conduct of the Jews with suspicion; for whereas he had invited them by Josephus to come to terms of accommodation only one day before, he could then receive no civil answer from them, so he ordered the soldiers to stay where they were. However, some of those that were in front of the works were too quick for him, and catching up their arms ran to the gates. Thereupon those that feigned to have been ejected at first retired: but as soon as the Romans had got between the towers on each side of the gate, the Jews ran out and surrounded them, and fell upon them behind, while the multitude that stood upon the wall threw a quantity of stones and darts of all kinds at them, insomuch that they slew a considerable number and wounded most of them. For it was not easy for the Romans to escape from the walls, because those behind them pressed them forward; besides which, the shame they were in for their mistake, and the fear they were in of their commanders, encouraged them to persevere in their false step. So they fought with their spears a great while, and received many blows from the Jews, though indeed they gave as many blows again, and at last repelled those that had surrounded them. But the Jews pursued them as they retired, and followed them, and threw darts at them as far as the tomb of Queen Helena.<sup>1</sup>

§ 4. At this the Jews grew insolent at their good fortune, and in bad taste jeered at the Romans for being deluded by the trick they had put upon them, and brandished their shields, and leaped and shouted for joy. But the Roman soldiers were received with threats by their officers, and with indignation by Titus himself, who spoke as follows. "These Jews, who are only led by desperation, do everything with care and circumspection; they contrive stratagems, and lay ambushes, and fortune gives success to their stratagems, because they are obedient, and preserve their good-will and fidelity to one another; while the Romans, to whom fortune is ever subservient because of their good discipline and ready submission to their commanders, have now met with reverse owing to the contrary behaviour, and have been beaten in consequence of not being able to restrain their hands from action, and what is most to their reproach, have fought without the orders of their commanders in the very presence of their Prince. Truly, the laws of war cannot but groan heavily, as will my father himself also when he shall be informed of this blow, for he, who is grown old in wars, never made such a mistake. Our laws also ever inflict capital punishment on those who in the least break good order, while now they have seen an entire army leaving their post. However, those that have been so insolent shall be made immediately sensible, that even those who conquer among the Romans without orders are in disgrace." When Titus had spoken vehemently to the commanders in this way, it appeared evident that he would carry out the law against all that were concerned; so the soldiers' minds sunk in despair, as they expected to be put to death, and knew they deserved it. However, the other legions flocked round Titus, and supplicated him on behalf of their fellow-soldiers, and begged that he would pardon the rashness of a few because of the good discipline of all the rest; and promised on their behalf that they would make amends for their present fault by better behaviour for the time to come.

§ 5. And Titus attended to their petition and to expediency also; for he esteemed it fit to punish individuals in deed, but he thought that the punishment of multitudes should proceed no further than word: so he was reconciled to the soldiers, but gave them many directions to act more wisely for the future, and considered with himself how he might be even with the Jews for their stratagem. And now, when the space between the Romans and the walls had been levelled, which was done in four days, as he wished to bring the baggage of the army and the rest of the multitude safely to the camp, he posted the strongest part of his army opposite the wall which lay on the north of the city facing west, and drew up his army seven deep, with the foot in front, and the horse behind, each of the last in three ranks, whilst the archers stood in the midst in seven ranks. And as the Jews were now prevented by so great a host from making sallies upon the Romans, both the beasts of burden of the three legions and the multitude marched on without fear. As for Titus himself, he encamped about two furlongs from the wall, at that part of it where was an angle opposite the tower called Psephinus, at which tower the compass of the wall extending north bent towards the west. And the other part of the army fortified itself at the tower called Hippicus,<sup>1</sup> and was also only two furlongs from the city. However, the tenth legion continued in its position upon the Mount of Olives.

CHAP. IV.

§ 1.

THE city of Jerusalem was fortified with three walls, where it was not girt with impassable ravines (for in such places it had but one wall), and was built upon two hills opposite to one another, but divided in the middle by a ravine, at which the rows of houses ended. Of these hills, that which contained the upper city was much higher, and in length more direct; and because of its being fortified was called the Citadel by king David (he was the father of that Solomon who first built the temple), but it is by us called the Upper Market-place.<sup>2</sup> But the other hill, which was called Acra,<sup>3</sup> and supported the lower city, was the shape of the crescent moon. And opposite this was a third hill, but naturally lower than Acra, and parted formerly from the other by a broad ravine; but afterwards, when the Asamonæans reigned, they filled up the ravine with earth, wishing to join the city to the temple, and took off part of the height of Acra, and reduced it to a lower elevation than it was before, that the temple might be higher than it. Now the ravine of the Cheese-makers, as it was called, which (as I said before) separated the hill of the upper city from that of the lower, extended as far as Siloam; for that was the name we gave a fountain which had sweet water in it in great abundance. And on their outsides these two hills were surrounded by deep ravines, and because of the precipices on both sides were everywhere impassable.

§ 2. Now of the three walls the old one was hard to be taken, both because of the ravines and of the hill above them on which it was built. But besides that great advantage as to the place where it was situated, it was also built very strong, because David, and Solomon, and the kings who were their successors, were very zealous about this work. This wall began on the north at the tower called Hippius, and extended as far as what was called Xystus, and then joined the council-house, and ended at the west portico of the temple.<sup>1</sup> But the other side westwards it began at the same tower, and extended through a place called Bethso to the gate of the Essenes, and after that it turned southwards above the fountain of Siloam, where it also again turned eastwards towards Solomon's Pool, and reached as far as a certain place which they called Ophlas,<sup>2</sup> where it joined the east portico of the temple. The second wall took its beginning at the gate which they called Gennath,<sup>3</sup> which belonged to the first wall; it only encompassed the north quarter of the city, and reached as far as the tower Antonia.<sup>4</sup> The beginning of the third wall was at the tower Hippius, whence it reached towards the north quarter of the city as far as the tower Psephinus, and then

<sup>2</sup> The wall passed by the Protestant Cemetery, and then curved round to the pool of Siloam, taking in a larger area than that included within the present wall; it then passed round the hill of Ophel to the eastern cloister of the Temple. Solomon's Pool has not been identified.

<sup>4</sup> The course of the second wall is the subject of much dispute. Some writers draw it so as to include the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; others so as to exclude it. No certain trace of the wall has yet been found; and the point at which it commenced is still unknown.

extended as far as the tomb of Helena, who was queen of Adiabene, and mother of Izates: it then extended further, and passed by the sepulchral caverns of the kings, and turned off again at the corner tower at what is called the Monument of the Fuller, and joined the old wall at the ravine called Cedron.<sup>1</sup> Agrippa added this wall to the new portions of the city, which had been all unprotected before; for as the city became more populous, it gradually outgrew its old walls, and the people joining to the city those parts that were north of the temple near the hill, made the city considerably larger, and caused the fourth hill (which is called Bezetha<sup>2</sup>) to be inhabited also. This fourth hill lies opposite the tower Antonia, but is divided from it by a deep ditch, which was dug on purpose to prevent the foundations of the tower of Antonia<sup>3</sup> from joining this hill, and from being accordingly easy of access and less high. And the depth of the ditch made the height of the towers more remarkable. This new-built part of the city was called Bezetha in our language, which, if interpreted in the Greek language, might be called New Town. As therefore its inhabitants stood in need of protection, Agrippa, the father of the present king of the same name, began the wall I have been speaking of: but he left off building it when he had only laid the foundations, being afraid that Claudius Cæsar might suspect that so big a wall was built for the purpose of some innovation or rebellion. For the city could not possibly have been taken, if that wall had been finished in the same manner as it was begun; as it was constructed with stones twenty cubits long and ten cubits broad, which could never have been either easily undermined by any iron tools, or shaken by any engines. The wall was, however, ten cubits wide, and would probably have been greater in height than it was, had not his zeal who began it been hindered from exerting itself. After this, though it was raised with great diligence by the Jews, it only rose as high as twenty cubits, above which were battlements two cubits high, and turrets on the top of them three cubits high, so that the whole height extended to twenty-five cubits.

§ 3. Now the towers on this wall were twenty cubits in breadth, and twenty cubits in height, and were square and solid as the wall itself, and the masonry and beauty of the stones were no way inferior to those of the sanctuary itself. Above this solid height of towers, which was twenty cubits, there were rooms of great magnificence, and over them upper rooms, and several cisterns to receive rain-water, and broad ascents to each. Of such towers the third wall had ninety, and the space between each of them was two hundred cubits; and the middle wall had fourteen towers, and the old wall was divided into sixty. And the whole compass of the city was thirty-three furlongs. Now though the third wall was all of it wonderful, yet the tower Psephinus<sup>1</sup> was more wonderful still at the north-west corner, and there Titus took up his position. For as it was seventy cubits high, it not only afforded a prospect of Arabia at sunrise, but also of the utmost limits of the land of the Hebrews as far as the sea. It was an octagon. And opposite it was the tower Hippicus,<sup>2</sup> and near it were two others erected by king Herod in the old wall, which for size, beauty, and strength, exceeded all that were in the world. For besides the magnanimity of his nature, and his munificence towards the city, Herod built these in such a splendid manner to gratify his own private affection, for he dedicated these towers to the memory of the three persons who had been dearest to him, and from whom he named them, namely, his brother, his friend, and his wife. He had slain his wife in love [and jealousy,] as I have already related, and had lost the other two in war, courageously fighting. Hippicus, so called from his friend, was square, its length and breadth were each twenty-five cubits, and its height thirty, and it was solid throughout. Over this solid building, which was composed of great stones united together, was a reservoir twenty cubits deep, over which was an house of two stories (whose height was twenty-five cubits), divided into several parts; over which were turrets two cubits high, and all round battlements three cubits high, so that the entire height added together amounted to fourscore cubits. The second tower, which he called after his brother Phasaelus,<sup>1</sup> had its breadth and height equal, each of them being forty cubits; over which was a solid height of forty cubits; over which a portico ran round ten cubits high, defended by breastworks and bulwarks. There was also built over the portico in the middle another tower, divided into magnificent rooms and a place for bathing, so that this tower wanted nothing that might make it appear a royal palace. Its roof was also adorned with more battlements and turrets than the one I mentioned before, and its entire height was about ninety cubits, and the appearance of it resembled the tower of Pharos, which is a lighthouse for such as sail for Alexandria, but it was much larger than it in compass. It was now the place where Simon exercised his tyranny. The third tower Mariamne<sup>2</sup> (for that was the queen's name) was solid as high as twenty cubits; its breadth and its length were each twenty cubits. Its upper buildings were more magnificent and more ornate than the other towers, for the king thought it most proper for him to adorn that which was called after his wife handsomer than those called after men, as those were built stronger than this one that bore his wife's name. The entire height of this tower was fifty-five cubits.

§ 4. Now though these three towers were very high, they appeared much loftier because of their position; for the old wall whereon they were, was built on a high hill, and was itself a kind of crest of the hill but thirty cubits higher, and as the towers were situated on it, they appeared much higher. The size also of the stones was wonderful; for these towers were not made of common-sized stones, nor of such as men could carry, but of white marble hewn out of the rock; each stone was twenty cubits in length, and ten in breadth, and five in depth. They were so exactly joined to one another, that each tower looked like one entire and natural block of stone, afterwards moulded by the hands of the artificers into its present shape and angles; so little, or not at all, did their joints or connexion appear.<sup>1</sup> Now these towers were on the north side of the wall, and the king had a palace on the inside joining them, which exceeds all my ability to describe it. For it wanted no cost nor skill in its construction, but was entirely walled about to the height of thirty cubits, and was adorned with towers at equal distances, and with large dining rooms that would hold a hundred guests apiece; in which the variety of the stones is not to be expressed (for a large quantity of those that were everywhere rare was collected together), and the roofs were also wonderful, both for the length of the beams, and the splendour of their ornaments. The number of the rooms were also very great, and the variety of the carving in them was prodigious; and the furniture of all was complete, and most of the vessels that were put in them were of silver and gold. There were also many colonnades, one after another, round about, and in each of them curious pillars. And all the places exposed to the air were everywhere green; and there were several groves of trees, and long walks through them, and round them deep canals and cisterns, that in several places had brazen statues, through which the water ran out, and there were also many dove-cotes of tame pigeons round the canals. But indeed it is not possible to give a complete description of this palace, and the very remembrance of it is a torture to one, as reminding one what vastly rich buildings the fire which was kindled by the robbers consumed; for these were not burnt by the Romans, but by the plotters within the city, as I have already related, in the beginning of the rebellion. The fire began at the tower of Antonia, and went on to the palace, and consumed the roofs of the three towers.

CHAP. V.

§ 1.

NOW the temple, as I have already said, was built upon a strong hill, and at first the plateau on its top was hardly sufficient for the sanctuary and the altar, for all round it was steep and precipitous. But when king Solomon, who was the person that built the temple, had built a wall on its east side, a portico was then added on an artificial mound, and on all its other sides the sanctuary was unprotected. But in subsequent ages the people added new mounds, and the hill became a larger plain. They then broke down the wall on the north side, and took in as much as sufficed afterwards for the area of the entire temple. And when they had built walls round three sides of the temple from the bottom of the hill, and had performed a work that was greater than could be hoped for (in which work long ages were spent by them, and all their sacred treasures were exhausted, which were replenished by those tributes which were sent to God from the whole world), they then built round the upper precincts as well as the lower part of the temple. The lowest part of this was erected to the height of three hundred cubits, and in some places more. However, the entire depth of the foundations did not appear, for they brought earth and filled up the ravines, desiring to level the narrow streets of the city. And they made use of stones of forty cubits in size. For the great quantity of money they then had, and the liberality of the people, made this attempt of theirs succeed wonderfully, and what could not so much as be hoped ever to be accomplished, was, by perseverance and length of time, brought to perfection.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Recent surveys and excavations have shown that there is not so much exaggeration in the description of Josephus as was at one time supposed. See "Recovery of Jerusalem," and P. E. F. Memoir, "Jerusalem," for an account of the excavations.

worthy of them. For all the porticoes were double, and the pillars that supported them were twenty-five cubits in height, and were of one entire stone each of them, and that stone was white marble, and the roofs were adorned with fretwork of cedar curiously graven. The natural magnificence and excellent polish and good masonry made a handsome spectacle, thought it was not adorned on the outside with any work of the painter or sculptor. The porticoes were in breadth thirty cubits, and their entire area measured six furlongs, including the tower of Antonia. And all the space exposed to the air was laid with stones of various sorts. When you went through this space to the second temple, there was a partition of stone, whose height was three cubits, of very elegant construction; upon which stood pillars, at equal distances from one another, declaring the law of purity, some in Greek, others in Roman letters,<sup>1</sup> that no foreigner was to enter the holy place; for the second temple was called the holy place, and had an ascent of fourteen steps from the first temple, and was square, and had its own wall round it. Its exterior height, although forty cubits, was hidden by the steps, and inside the height was but twenty-five cubits. For being built on higher ground with steps, all the interior was not visible, being covered by the hill. Behind these fourteen steps to the wall was the distance of ten cubits, all level. Then there were other steps, each five cubits apiece, that led to the gates, which gates on the north and south sides were eight, on each of those sides four, and of necessity two on the east; for since there was a partition built for the women on that side, as the proper place where they were to worship, there was a necessity for a second gate for them; this gate was cut opposite the first gate. There was also on the other sides one south and one north gate, through which was a passage into the court of the women: for the women were not allowed to pass through the other gates, nor when they went through their own gate could they pass beyond their own wall of partition. This court was allotted for worship to the women of our own country and of other countries equally, provided they were of our nation. The western side of this court had no gate at all, but the wall was built entire on that side. And the porticoes between the gates extended from the wall inward in front of the treasure-chambers, and were supported by very fine and large pillars. These porticoes were single, and, except for size, were no way inferior to those of the lower court.

§ 3. Now nine of the gates were on every side covered over with gold and silver, and similarly the door-posts and their lintels: but there was one gate outside the sanctuary of Corinthian brass, which greatly excelled those that were only covered over with silver and gold. Each gate had two doors, the height of each was thirty cubits, and the breadth fifteen. However, they had large spaces within containing rooms on each side built like towers, thirty cubits both in breadth and in length, and in height more than forty cubits. Two pillars twelve cubits in circumference supported each of these rooms. Now the size of the other gates was the same, but that beyond the Corinthian gate, which opened on the east opposite the gate of the sanctuary, was much larger; for its height was fifty cubits, and its doors were forty cubits, and it was adorned in a more costly manner, having much richer and thicker plates of silver and gold than the others. These nine gates had the silver and gold plates made for them by Alexander the father of Tiberius. Now fifteen steps led from the wall of the court of the women to the larger gate; whereas but ten steps led from there to the other gates.

§ 4. As to the sanctuary itself, the most sacred place, which was placed in the midst, it was ascended to by twelve steps. In front its height and breadth were equal, each being a hundred cubits, but behind it was forty cubits narrower, for on its front it had as it were shoulders on each side, that passed twenty cubits further. Its first gate seventy cubits high, and twenty-five cubits broad, had no doors; for it represented the invisible infinity of heaven; and its front was covered with gold all over, and through it all the first house within appeared, which was very large, and all the parts about the inward gate appeared to glitter with gold to those that saw them. And as the sanctuary was divided into two parts within, only the first house was open to view. Its height was ninety cubits, and its length fifty cubits, and its breadth twenty cubits. And all the gate which opened into this first house, was, as I have said, covered with gold, as was the whole wall about it: it had also golden vines above it, from which clusters of grapes hung as tall as a man. But as the sanctuary was divided into two parts, the inner part was lower than the outer, and had golden doors fifty-five cubits in height, and sixteen in breadth. And before these doors was a veil of equal size as the doors, a Babylonian curtain, embroidered with blue and fine linen and scarlet and purple, and of a contexture that was truly wonderful. Nor was this mixture of colours without its mystical interpretation, but was a kind of image of the universe; for by the scarlet seemed to be enigmatically signified fire, by the fine linen the earth, by the blue the air, and by the purple the sea; two of them suggesting this resemblance by their colours, while the other two, the fine linen and the purple, suggest that resemblance by their origin, the earth producing the one, and the sea the other. This curtain had also embroidered upon it all that was to be seen in the heavens, except the signs of the Zodiac.

§ 5. When any persons entered within, the floor of the sanctuary received them. Its height was sixty cubits, and its length the same, and its breadth twenty cubits, and that sixty cubits in length was divided again, and the first part of it was cut off at forty cubits, and had in it three things very wonderful and famous among all mankind, the candlestick, the table [of shew bread,] and the altar of incense. Now the seven lamps, for so many lamps branched out from the candlestick, signified the seven planets, and the twelve loaves that were upon the table signified the circle of the Zodiac and the year; and the altar of incense by its thirteen kinds of sweet-smelling spices, with which the sea and earth and air replenished it, signified that all things belong to God and are all for his use. And the inmost part of all the temple was of twenty cubits, and was also separated from the outer part by a veil. In it there was nothing at all, but it was inaccessible and inviolable, and not to be seen by any.

and was called the Holy of Holies. Now about the sides of the lower part of the sanctuary were several chambers three stories high with passages out of one into another, to which there were entrances on each side from the gate of the temple. But the upper part of the temple had no such chambers, because the temple was narrower there, and forty cubits higher, and plainer than the lower part. Thus we gather that the whole height, including the sixty cubits from the floor, amounted to a hundred cubits.

§ 6. Now the outward front of the temple wanted nothing that could strike either men's minds or eyes. For it was covered all over with massive plates of gold, and reflected at the first rising of the sun a very fiery splendour, and made those who forced themselves to look upon it turn their eyes away, just as they would have done at the sun's own rays. But it appeared to strangers, when they were approaching it at some distance, like a mountain covered with snow, for where it was not gilt, it was exceeding white. On its top were spikes with sharp points, to prevent any pollution of it by birds sitting upon it. Of its stones some were forty-five cubits in length, five in height, and six in breadth. Before it stood the altar, fifteen cubits high, and fifty cubits both in length and breadth. It was built square, and had corners projecting like horns, and the ascent to it from the south was a gentle rise. It was made without any iron tool, nor did any iron tool so much as touch it at any time. There was also a wall of partition, about a cubit in height, made of fine stones, and pleasant to the sight, which ran round the sanctuary and altar, and kept the people that were outside away from the priests. Now those that had gonorrhoea and leprosy were excluded from the city entirely: women were also shut out of it when their courses were upon them, nor, when they were free from that impurity, were they allowed to go beyond the limit before mentioned. Men, also, that were not thoroughly pure, were prohibited to come into the inner court of the temple; nay, the priests themselves that were not pure were prohibited to come into it also.

§ 7. Now all those of the stock of the priests that could not minister because of some bodily imperfection came within the partition, together with those that had no such imperfection, and had their share of the sacrifices with them because of their stock, but only used private garments; for nobody but the officiating priest had on sacred vestments. And those priests that were pure and without any blemish went up to the altar and sanctuary clothed in fine linen, and abstained from wine chiefly from the fear lest otherwise they should make some mistake in their ministrations. The high priest also went up with them, not always indeed, but on the sabbath days and new moons, and on the occasion of any festival belonging to our nation, or public festal gathering. When he officiated, he had on drawers that hid his person and thighs, and had on an under garment of linen, together with a blue round garment, without seam and with fringe-work, reaching to the feet. There were also golden bells that hung upon the fringes, and pomegranates intermixed among them. The bells signified thunder, the pomegranates lightning. And the girdle that fastened the garment to the breast was embroidered with five zones of various colours, as gold and purple and scarlet and fine linen and blue, with which colours I said before the veils of the temple were embroidered also. Similar embroidery was upon the ephod, but the quantity of gold thereon was greater. Its figure was that of a breast-plate to be worn. There were upon it two golden buttons like small shields, which buttoned the ephod to the garment: in these buttons were enclosed two very large and fine sardonyxes, having the names of the tribes of the nation inscribed upon them. On the front side hung twelve stones, three in rows one way, and four the other; a sardius, a topaz, and an emerald; a carbuncle, a jasper, and a sapphire; an agate, an amethyst, and a ligure; an onyx, a beryl, and a chrysolite; upon every one of which stones again was engraved the name of one of the twelve tribes. A mitre also of fine linen covered his head, which was tied by a blue riband, about which there was another golden crown, on which were engraven the sacred letters. They consisted of four vowels. However, the high priest did not wear these garments generally, but a more plain habit: he only wore them when he went into the most sacred part of the temple, which he did but once in a year, on the day when our custom is for everybody to keep a fast to God. And thus much concerning the city and sanctuary, but about the customs and laws thereto relating I shall speak more fully another time; for much remains to be said about them.

§ 8. As to the tower of Antonia,<sup>1</sup> it was situated at the corner of the two porticoes of the first temple that faced west and north; and was erected upon a rock fifty cubits high and precipitous throughout. It was the work of king Herod, wherein he displayed his natural magnificence. In the first place, the rock itself was covered over with smooth tablets of stone from its foundation, partly for ornament, partly that any one who either tried to get up or down it might slip; and next, before the edifice of the tower, was a wall three cubits high, and within that wall all the space of the tower of Antonia was raised to the height of forty cubits. The interior had the size and form of a palace, being divided into all kinds of rooms and other conveniences, such as porticoes and places for bathing, and broad spaces for camps, so that, from having all conveniences, it seemed a city, but from its magnificence it seemed a palace. And the entire structure resembled that of a tower, and had also four other towers, namely at its four corners, whereof three were but fifty cubits high, but the one which lay at the south-east corner was seventy cubits high, so that from it the whole temple could be viewed. And where it joined the two porticoes of the temple, it had passages down to them both, by which the guard descended (for there always lay in this tower a Roman legion) and spread among the porticoes fully armed at the Jewish festivals, in order to watch the people, that they might not attempt any innovation; for the temple was a fortress that guarded the city, and the tower Antonia guarded the temple; and in that tower were the guards of all three. There was also a private fortress belonging to the upper city, which was

Herod's palace.<sup>1</sup> As for the hill Bezetha, it was divided from the tower of Antonia, as I have already said, and being the highest of all joined part of the new city, and was the only hill that shut out the view of the temple on the north. Thus much shall suffice at present about the city and walls, as I propose to make a fuller description elsewhere.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning the Tyrants Simon and John. How Nicanor was wounded by a Dart, as Titus was going round the Wall of the City; which Event provoked Titus to press on the Siege.

§ 1.

NOW the warlike men that were in the city, and the multitude of the seditious that were with Simon, were ten thousand, besides the Idumæans, and these ten thousand had fifty commanders, over whom Simon was supreme. And the Idumæans that joined him were five thousand, and had ten commanders, among whom those of greatest eminence were Jacob the son of Sosas, and Simon the son of Cathlas. And John, who had seized upon the temple, had six thousand armed men under twenty commanders: the Zealots also that now came over to him, and left off their opposition, were two thousand four hundred, and had the same leader that they had formerly, Eleazar, as also Simon the son of Arus. Now, while these factions fought against one another, the people were their prey on both sides, as I have said already, and those of the people who would not join with them in their wicked practices were plundered by both factions. Now Simon held the upper city,<sup>2</sup> and the great wall as far as Cedron, and as much of the old wall as bent from Siloam to the east, and which went down to the palace of Monobazus, who was king of the Adiabeni beyond the Euphrates: he also held the fountain, and Acra (which was no other than the lower city), and all that reached to the palace of queen Helena, the mother of Monobazus. And John held the temple and the neighbouring parts for a great way, as also Ophla,<sup>1</sup> and the ravine called the ravine of Cedron. And they burnt all the space between them, and left it as a ground whereon they might fight against each other. For their internal dissensions did not cease even when the Romans were encamped near their walls, and although they had grown wiser for a while at the first attack the Romans made upon them, they returned to their former madness, and quarrelled and fought with one another again, and did every thing that the besiegers could desire them to do. Nor did they ever suffer any thing worse at the hands of the Romans than they made each other suffer, nor was there any misery experienced by the city after them that could be considered new, but it was most unhappy of all before it fell, while those that took it did it more good. For I venture to affirm that faction destroyed the city, and the Romans destroyed the faction, which was much stronger than our walls. So we may reasonably ascribe our misfortunes to our own people, but only justice to the Romans. But as to this matter let every one determine by the actions on both sides.

§ 2. Now, when affairs within the city were in this posture, Titus went round the outside of the city with some chosen horsemen, and looked about for a fit place where he might attack the walls. But as he was in doubt as to all sides (for approach was impossible where the ravines were, and on the other side the first wall appeared too strong for the engines), he thought it best to make his assault near the tomb of John the high priest. For there the first fortification was lower, and the second was not joined to it, the builders neglecting to build the wall strong where the new city was not much inhabited; and there was an easy passage to the third wall, through which he thought to take the upper city, and, through the tower of Antonia, the temple itself. Now, as he was going round the city, one of his friends, whose name was Nicanor, was wounded with a dart on his left shoulder, as he approached with Josephus too near the wall, and attempted to discuss terms of peace with those that were upon the wall, for he was a person not unknown to them. This circumstance provoked Titus, who recognized by it their passion, that they would not keep their hands off even such as approached them for their safety, to press on the siege. He also at the same time gave his soldiers leave to ravage the suburbs, and ordered them to bring up timber and raise banks against the city. And when he had divided his army into three parts in order to set about those works, he placed the archers and those that shot darts in the midst of the banks, and before them he placed the engines that threw javelins and darts and stones, that he might prevent the enemy from sallying out upon their works, and stop those on the wall from being able to obstruct them. So the trees were cut down immediately, and the suburbs left bare. However, the Jews did not remain quiet, while the timber was being brought to raise the banks, and the whole army was earnestly engaged in the work. But the people of Jerusalem, who had been hitherto plundered and murdered, now felt good courage, for they supposed they would have breathing time, while the others were busy in opposing their enemies outside the city, and that they would now be avenged on those that had been the authors of their miseries, if the Romans did but come off victorious.

§ 3. However, John remained quiet from fear of Simon, even though his own men were anxious to make a sally upon their enemies outside. But Simon did not lie still, for he was near the besiegers, but placed his engines of war at due intervals upon the wall, both those which they took from Cestius formerly, and those which they got when they captured the garrison in the tower of Antonia. But though they had these engines in their possession, most of them had so little skill in using them, that they were in great measure useless, but there were a few who had been taught by deserters how to use them, and they used them, though in an awkward manner. They also threw stones and shot arrows from the wall at those who were making the banks; they also ran out upon them in companies, and engaged with them. But those that were at work protected themselves with spreading hurdles over their banks, and pointed their engines at them when they sallied out from the city. Now the engines that all the legions had prepared were admirable, but especially those that belonged to the tenth legion, for their engines that threw darts were more powerful, and those that threw stones were larger than the rest, so that they not only repelled the sallies of the Jews, but also knocked down those that were upon the walls. Now, the stones that were thrown were of the weight of a talent, and they were carried two furlongs and further; and the blow they gave was irresistible, not only to those that stood first in the way, but also to those that were far behind them. As for the Jews, they at first watched the coming of the stone, for it was white, and could therefore be perceived not only by the great noise it made, but could be seen also before it came because of its brightness. So the watchmen that sat upon the towers gave them notice when the engine was let off and the stone projected, and cried out aloud in their national language, "The missile is coming."<sup>1</sup> Then those that were in its way moved out of it, and threw themselves down flat upon the ground; and by their taking this precaution the stone when it fell did them no harm. But the Romans contrived to prevent that by blacking the stone. They could then aim at them with success, when the stone was not seen beforehand, as it had been till then, and so they slew many at one blow. However, the Jews in spite of all this galling fire did not permit the Romans to raise their banks undisturbed; but with ingenuity and boldness kept repelling them both by night and day.

§ 4. And now, upon the finishing of the Roman works, the workmen measured the distance there was from the wall by lead and line, which they threw from their banks, for they could not measure it otherwise, as the Jews shot at them from above. And when they found that the battering-rams could reach the wall, they brought them up, and Titus placed his catapults at certain intervals nearer to the wall, that the Jews might not be able to repel the battering-rams, and gave orders that these last should go to work.

And when thereupon a prodigious noise rang all round on the sudden from three places, there was a great cry of alarm raised by the citizens that were within the city, and no less terror fell upon the seditious themselves. And both factions, seeing the common danger they were in, contrived to make common defence. So the different factions cried out to one another to act entirely in concert because of their enemies; saying they ought, anyhow, in their present circumstances, if God did not grant them a lasting concord, to lay aside their enmity against one another, and to unite together against the Romans. Accordingly, Simon gave those in the temple leave by proclamation to go upon the walls; John also himself, though he could hardly trust Simon, gave them the same leave. So on both sides they forgot their hatred and private quarrels, and formed themselves into one body, and manned the walls, and having a vast number of torches, threw them from the walls at the machines, and shot darts perpetually at those who impelled the battering-rams. Nay, the bolder sort leaped out en masse upon the hurdles that covered the machines, and pulled them to pieces, and fell upon those who were in charge of them, and got the better of them, not so much by any skill they had, as by their daring. However, Titus himself ceased not to send assistance to those that were the hardest pressed, and placed both horsemen and archers on each side of the engines, and so kept off those that tried to apply fire to them, and also repelled those that hurled missiles from the towers, and then set the battering-rams to work. But the wall did not yield to these blows, excepting where the battering-ram of the fifteenth legion knocked off the corner of a tower, while the wall continued unhurt; for the wall was not immediately in the same danger as the tower, for the latter jutted out a long way, so it could not easily break off any part of the wall with itself.

§ 5. And now the Jews intermitted their sallies for a while, but when they observed the Romans dispersed all abroad at their works and in their various camps, (for they thought the Jews had retired from weariness and fear,) they all at once made a sally near the tower Hippicus<sup>1</sup> through an obscure gate, and at the same time brought fire to burn the works, and went boldly up to the Romans, and to their very fortifications. And at the cry they made, those that were near them came quickly to their assistance, and those further off came running up. And the boldness of the Jews was too much for the good order of the Romans, and as they beat those whom they first fell upon, so they pressed hard those that were now gathered together. And the fight round the machines was very hot, for the Jews tried hard to set them on fire, and the Romans to prevent this; and on both sides there was a confused cry raised, and many of those in the forefront of the battle were slain. However, the Jews had the best of it from their desperate valour, and the fire caught hold of the works, and both all those works, and the engines themselves, would have been in danger of being burnt, had not most of the picked soldiers from Alexandria resisted this, and behaved with courage such as surprised even themselves, for they outdid in this fight those that had greater reputation than themselves. Such was the state of things till Titus took the stoutest of his horsemen, and attacked the enemy, and slew with his own hand twelve of those that were in the van of the Jews; and at the death of these men the rest of the multitude gave way, and he pursued them, and drove them all into the city, and saved the works from fire. Now, it happened in this fight, that a certain Jew was taken alive, and he by Titus' order was crucified before the walls, to see whether the rest of them would be terrified at the sight and give in. And after the retreat John, who was commander of the Idumæans, and was talking to a certain soldier of his acquaintance before the wall, was wounded in the breast by a dart shot at him by an Arabian, and died immediately, leaving the greatest grief to the Jews, and sorrow to the seditious. For he was distinguished both in action and for intelligence.

CHAP. VII.

How one of the Towers erected by the Romans fell down of its own accord; and how the Romans after great Slaughter got possession of the first Wall. Also how Titus made Assault upon the second Wall; also concerning Longinus the Roman, and Castor the Jew.

§ 1.

THE following night an unexpected panic fell upon the Romans. For whereas Titus had given orders for the erection of three towers fifty cubits high, that by setting men upon them at every bank, he might from thence drive back those who were upon the wall, it so happened that one of these towers fell down about midnight. And as its fall made a very great noise, a panic fell upon the army, and they all ran to arms, supposing that the enemy was coming to attack them. And a disturbance and tumult arose among the legions, and as no one could tell what had happened, they were in the greatest anxiety and doubt, and as no enemy appeared, they were afraid of one another, and every one demanded of his neighbour the watchword with great earnestness, as though the Jews had invaded their camp. And now they were like people beset by a panic fear, till Titus was informed of what had happened, and gave orders that all should be acquainted with the real state of things, and then, though not without some difficulty, they got rid of their alarm.

§ 2. Now these towers very much harassed the Jews, who otherwise opposed the Romans very courageously; for they were shot at by the enemy's lighter engines from those towers, as also by the javelin-men and archers and slingers. For the Jews could not get at them because of their height; and it was not practicable to take the towers, or to overturn them, because they were so heavy, or to set them on fire, because they were covered with plates of iron. So they retired out of the reach of the darts, and no longer endeavoured to hinder the shocks of the battering-rams, which by continually beating at the wall gradually prevailed against it. And as the wall already gave way to Nicon<sup>1</sup> (for by that name did the Jews themselves call the largest of the Roman battering-rams, because it conquered all things), and they were now for a long while grown weary of fighting and mounting guard, and of bivouacking at a distance from the city, most grew faint-hearted and retired, especially as from their sloth and ill-advisedness on all occasions they thought it superfluous to guard the wall, there being, besides that, two other walls still remaining. Then the Romans mounted the breach, where Nicon<sup>1</sup> had made one, and all the Jews left guarding that wall, and retired to the second wall. So the Romans that had got over that wall opened the gates, and admitted all the army. Thus did the Romans get possession of the first wall on the fifteenth day of the siege, which was the seventh day of the month Artemisius, when they rased to the ground a great part of it, as they did also to the northern parts of the city, which had been also demolished by Cestius formerly.

§ 3. And now Titus pitched his camp within the city, at the place which was called the Camp of the Assyrians,<sup>2</sup> occupying all that lay between as far as Cedron, but taking care to be so far from the second wall as to be out of reach of the Jews' darts, and at once began his attacks upon it. Upon this the Jews divided themselves into several bodies, and courageously defended the second wall, while John and his men fought from the tower of Antonia, and from the north portico of the temple, and before the tomb of king Alexander; and Simon's division occupied the spot of ground near John's tomb, and fortified it as far as the gate<sup>3</sup> where water was brought in to the tower Hippicus. And the Jews frequently made violent sallies en masse from the gates, and fought the Romans, and when they were pursued all together to the wall, they were beaten in those conflicts, lacking the skill of the Romans, but they got the best of it in the battles from the walls. And the Romans were encouraged by their power joined to their skill, as the Jews were by their boldness, which was nourished by the fear they were in, and that stoutness which is natural to our nation under calamities; they were also encouraged still more by the hope of deliverance, as the Romans were by their hopes of subduing them in a little time. So neither side grew weary; but attacks and fightings upon the walls, and perpetual sallies out in bodies, took place all day long; nor was there any mode of fighting that was not then put in use. Nay, night itself scarcely stopped them, though they began to fight in the morning, for night was passed without sleep on both sides, and was more trying than the day to them, for the Jews were afraid lest the wall would be taken, and the Romans lest the Jews should attack their camps: so both sides spent all night in their armour and were therefore ready to fight at the first dawn of light. And the rivalry among the Jews was who should first undergo danger, and so gratify their commanders, and they had a great veneration and dread of Simon above all, for to that degree was he regarded by every one of those that were under him, that at his command they were very ready to kill themselves with their own hands. And what made the Romans so courageous was their usual habit of conquering, and their inexperience of defeat, and their constant wars, and their perpetual drill, and the grandeur of their empire; and above all the constant presence of Titus everywhere. For it appeared disgraceful to play the coward when their Prince was present and fought bravely with them, and was himself at once an eye-witness of such as behaved themselves valiantly, and was there to reward them also; so it was esteemed an advantage to have one's valour known to the Prince, which made many display more valour than their strength warranted. For example, as the Jews were about this time standing in battle-array in a strong body before the wall, while both parties were throwing their darts at each other from a distance, Longinus, one of equestrian order, leaped out of the army of the Romans, and leaped into the very midst of the army of the Jews; and as they dispersed upon this attack, he slew two of their bravest men, striking one of them in the mouth as he was coming to meet him, and slaying the other with the very spear which he drew out of the body of the first, with which he had pierced him through the side, as he was running away from him; and when he had done this, he got back safe from the midst of his enemies to his own side. Thus did he distinguish himself for his valour, and there were many who were ambitious of gaining the like reputation for bravery. And now the Jews were unconcerned at what they suffered at the hands of the Romans, and were only solicitous about what harm they could do them; and death itself seemed a very small matter to them, if at the same time as they fell they could but kill one of their enemies. But Titus considered the personal safety of his soldiers as important as their victory, and he said that inconsiderate valour was madness, and that that alone was true courage that was joined with prudence. He therefore commanded his men to take care when they fought their enemies that they received no harm from them, and so to show themselves to be truly valiant men.

§ 4. And now Titus brought up his battering-ram to the middle tower of the north wall, where a certain crafty Jew, whose name was Castor, lay in ambush with ten others like himself, the rest having fled away because of the archers. These men lay still for a while crouching under their breastworks, but when the tower began to rock they rose up, and Castor stretched out his hands as a petitioner, and called for Titus, and begged him in a miserable voice to have mercy upon them. And Titus, in his simplicity, believing him to be in earnest, and hoping that the Jews did now repent, stopped the working of the battering-ram, and forbade them to shoot at these suppliants, and bade Castor say what he wished. And when he said that he would come down, if Titus would give him his right hand for his security, Titus replied that he was well pleased at his good sense, and would be well pleased if all the Jews were of the same mind, and that he was ready to offer the same security to the city. Now five of the ten dissembled with him, and pretended to beg for mercy, while the rest cried out aloud that they would never be slaves to the Romans, when it was in their power to die free. Now while these men were quarrelling for a long while, the attack was delayed, and Castor sent to Simon, and told him that he might take his time to deliberate about urgent matters, for he himself would elude the power of the Romans for a considerable time. And at the same time that he sent this message, he appeared openly to exhort those that were unwilling to accept Titus' offer of security; but they seemed very angry at this, and brandished their naked swords upon the breastworks, and struck themselves upon their breastplates, and fell down as if they had been slain. Thereupon Titus, and those that were with him, were amazed at the courage of the men; and as they were not able, being on lower ground, to see exactly what was taking place, they marvelled at their great fortitude, and pitied their calamity. Meantime a certain person shot a dart at Castor, and wounded him in the nose, whereupon he at once pulled out the dart, and showed it to Titus, and complained that this was unfair treatment. And Titus reproved him that shot the dart, and sent Josephus, who stood by him, to offer his right hand to Castor. But Josephus said that he would not go to him, for these petitioners meant nothing that was good; he also restrained those friends of his who were anxious to go. But one Æneas, a deserter, said he would go to him. Castor also called out to them, that somebody should come and receive the money which he had with him; which made Æneas the more earnestly run to him with his bosom open. Then Castor took up a great stone, and threw it at him, which missed him because he guarded himself against it, but it wounded another soldier who was advancing. When Titus understood that this was a trick, he saw that mercy in war is a pernicious thing, because such cunning tricks have less scope for them in the school of severity. So he set his battering-ram to work more strongly than before, because of his anger at the trick put upon him. But Castor and his companions set the tower on fire when it began to give way, and leaped through the flames into a hidden vault that was under it, which made the Romans again suppose that they were men of great courage, as having cast themselves into the fire.

CHAP. VIII.

How the Romans took the second Wall twice, and got ready for taking the third Wall.

§ 1.

NOW Titus took the second wall the fifth day after he had taken the first, and as the Jews fled from it, he entered inside it with a thousand armed men, and those his choice troops, at the place where were the wool market and smiths' shops, and the market for garments, of New Town,<sup>1</sup> and where the narrow streets led obliquely to the wall. Now if Titus had either demolished a considerable part of the wall immediately, or on entering in had, according to the law of war, destroyed what was left, his victory would not, I suppose, have been mixed with any detriment to himself. But as it was, out of the hope he had that he should make the Jews ashamed of their obstinacy, by his showing himself unwilling though he was able to afflict them more than was actually necessary, he did not widen the breach of the wall to make retreat easy upon occasion; for he did not think those whom he thought of benefiting would lay snares for him. When therefore he entered in, he did not permit his soldiers to kill any of those they captured, nor to set fire to their houses, nay, he gave leave to the seditious, if they had a mind to fight without any harm to the people, to do so, and promised to restore the people's effects to them. For he was very desirous to preserve the city for himself, and the temple for the city. As to the people, they had been for a long time ready to comply with his proposals, but to the fighting men this humanity of his seemed weakness, and they imagined that Titus made these offers because he was not able to take the whole city. They also threatened death to the people, if any one of them should say a word about surrender, and cut the throats of such as talked of peace, and attacked the Romans that had come inside the wall,

some meeting them in the narrow streets, and some fighting from their houses, and others made a sally at the upper gates outside the wall, at whom those that guarded the wall were so frightened, that they leaped down from their towers, and retired to their camps. Upon this a great shouting was made by the Romans that were within, because they were surrounded on every side by their enemies; as also by those Romans that were without, because they were in fear for those that were left in the city. And the Jews kept continually flocking up, and had great advantage over the Romans from their knowledge of the narrow streets, and they wounded many of them, and fell upon them and drove them out of the city. Now these Romans were forced to make the best resistance they could, for they were not able to get out en masse at the narrow breach in the wall; indeed it is probable that all those who had entered in would have been cut to pieces, had not Titus come to their aid. For he ordered the archers to stand at the upper ends of the narrow streets, and stood himself where the greatest number of the enemy was, and with his darts kept them back, as did also Domitius Sabinus with him, a valiant man, and one that in this battle showed himself so. And Titus continued to shoot darts at the Jews perpetually, to hinder them from coming at his men, until all his soldiers had withdrawn.

§ 2. Thus were the Romans driven out, after they had got possession of the second wall. Whereupon the fighting men that were in the city were lifted up in their minds, and elated at their success, and began to think that the Romans would never venture to come into the city any more, and that, if they themselves fought, they would not be any more beaten. For God had blinded their minds because of the transgressions they had been guilty of, nor did they realize how much greater forces the Romans had than those that were now repelled, any more than they saw that famine was creeping upon them. For they could still feed themselves on the public miseries, and drink the blood of the city. But now poverty had for a long time seized upon the good, and a great many had already died from want of necessaries; but the factious thought the destruction of the people a relief to themselves. For they desired that none might be preserved but such as were against a peace with the Romans, and were resolved to live in opposition to them, and they were pleased when those of the contrary opinion died off en masse, as being then freed from a heavy burden. Such was their disposition of mind with regard to those who were within the city. And they covered themselves with their armour, and tried to prevent the Romans who were trying to get into the city again, and fortified with their own bodies the breach in the wall. Thus did they valiantly defend themselves for three days; but on the fourth day they could not hold out against the energy of Titus' assault, but were compelled to flee where they had fled before. So he got possession again of the wall, and at once rased it to the ground entirely; and when he had put a garrison into the towers that were on the south of the city, he considered how he might storm the third wall.

CHAP. IX.

As the Jews were not at all mollified by his leaving off the Siege for a while, Titus set himself again to prosecute the same; but soon sent Josephus to treat with his fellow-countrymen about Peace.

§ 1.

TITUS now determined to relax the siege for a little while, and to afford the factious an interval for consideration, and to see whether the rasing to the ground of their second wall would not make them a little more compliant, or the fear of famine (for the spoils they had got by rapine would not be sufficient for them long), and he made use of this relaxation in order to compass his own ends. Accordingly, when the appointed time came for him to distribute provision-money to the soldiers, he gave orders that his commanders should draw up the army in battle-array in the face of the enemy, and then give every one of the soldiers their pay. Then the soldiers, according to custom, opened the cases in which their arms before lay covered, and marched with their breastplates on, and the cavalry led their horses in their fine trappings. Then did the places before the city glitter with silver and gold a long way; nor was any thing so agreeable to Titus' own men, or so terrible to the enemy, as that sight. For the whole of the ancient wall, and the north side of the temple, was full of spectators, and one might see the houses full of people peeping out to look at them; nor was there any part of the city which was not covered with people. And a very great consternation seized upon the boldest, when they saw all the army in one place, and observed the fineness of their arms, and the good order of the men. And I cannot but think that the factious would have changed their minds at that sight, had not the crimes they had committed against the people been so dreadful, that they despaired of forgiveness from the Romans; and as they believed that death with torture would be their punishment if they surrendered, they thought it much better to die in war. Fate also so far prevailed over them, that the innocent had to perish with the guilty, and the city was doomed to destruction with the seditious that were in it.

§ 2. Now the Romans spent four days in distributing their provision-money to the several legions. But on the fifth day, as no proposal for peace came from the Jews, Titus divided his legions into two parts, and began to raise banks both at the tower of Antonia<sup>1</sup> and at John's tomb, intending to take the upper city at that tomb, and the temple at the tower of Antonia; for if the temple were not taken, it would be dangerous to occupy the city. So at each of these places he raised banks, each legion raising one. As for those that worked at John's tomb, the Idunæans and Simon's soldiers made sallies upon them, and hindered their work, while John's party and the multitude of Zealots did the same to those who were before the tower of Antonia. The Jews were now too much for the Romans, not only in direct fighting, because they stood upon higher ground, but also because they had now learned to use their engines, for their continual use of them one day after another by degrees improved their skill. For they had three hundred engines for darts, and forty for stones, and by them they made it more difficult for the Romans to raise their banks. But Titus, knowing that the city would be either saved or destroyed for himself, not only pressed on the siege, but did not neglect to exhort the Jews to repentance. So he mixed counsel with action, and being aware that argument is frequently more effectual than force, he urged them to surrender the city which was now in a manner already taken, and so to save themselves, and sent Josephus to speak to them in their own language, for he imagined they might yield to the persuasion of a fellow-countryman of their own.

§ 3. So Josephus went round the wall, and tried to find a place that was out of reach of their darts, and yet within their hearing, and besought them in many words to spare themselves and the people, and to spare their country and temple, and not to be more hard-hearted in these matters than foreigners. For the Romans, though they had no part in those things, respected what their enemies regarded as sacred, and had till now kept their hands off them, while those who were brought up among them, and who, if they were preserved, would be the only people that would reap the benefit of them, were urgent to have them destroyed. Moreover, they had seen their strongest walls rased to the ground, and the wall still remaining was weaker than those that had been taken; and they knew the power of the Romans was invincible, and to serve them was no new experience. And if it was noble to fight for liberty, that ought to have been done at first; for after having once fallen under the power of the Romans, and having submitted to them for so long a time, then to try to shake off their yoke was the action of such as had a mind to die miserably, not of such as were lovers of liberty. Besides, it was right to despise ignoble masters, but not those who had all things under their feet. For what parts of the world had escaped the Romans, unless such as were of no use either from intense heat or intense cold? And it was evident that fortune had on all sides been transferred to them, and that God, who had given all the nations power in turn, had now settled in Italy. Moreover, it was a strong and fixed law, among brute beasts as well as among men, to yield to those that were too strong for them, and that the dominion should be with those who were supreme in war. That was why their forefathers, who were far superior to them both in souls and bodies and other advantages besides, had yet submitted to the Romans, which they would not have done, had they not known that God was with them. As for themselves, what did they rely on in holding out, when most of their city was already taken, and when those that were within it were in greater misery than if they had been taken, if their walls were still standing? For the Romans were not unacquainted with the famine which was in the city, whereby the people were already consumed, and the fighting men would soon be so too. For even if the Romans should raise the siege, and not fall upon the city with their swords in their hands, yet was there an irresistible war that beset them within, and grew bigger every hour, unless indeed they were able to wage war with famine, and fight against it, or could alone of mankind conquer their natural appetites. He added further, that it would be well to change their conduct, before their calamities were become incurable, and to have recourse to safety while they had opportunity. For the Romans would not bear malice for their past actions, unless they persevered in their obstinate behaviour to the end; for they were by nature mild in their conquests, and preferred what was expedient to gratifying their passions. And what advantage could there be in having a city empty of inhabitants, and a desert region? That was why Titus was now willing to offer them his right hand; whereas, if he took the city by force, he would not spare any of them, especially if they rejected his offers in this their dire distress. For the walls that were already taken assured him that the third wall could not but be quickly taken also; and, even if their fortifications should prove too strong for the Romans to break through them, yet would famine fight for the Romans against them.

§ 4. While Josephus was making this exhortation to the Jews, many of them jested at him from the wall, and many railed at him, nay, some threw their darts at him. And as he could not persuade them by open advice, he betook himself to the history of their nation, and cried out, "O miserable people, and unmindful of your own helpers, will you fight with weapons and hand to hand against the Romans? When did we ever conquer any other nation by such means? and when did God, the creator of the Jews, not avenge them when they had been injured? Will not you turn and consider what made you fight with such success, and how great a divine helper you have profanely abused? Will not you recall to mind the prodigious things done for your forefathers, and with regard to this holy place, how great enemies of yours God in days of old subdued unto you? I indeed tremble to declare the works of God to people unworthy to hear them: however, hearken to me, that you may know that you are fighting not only against the Romans, but also against God himself. In old times one Nechao king of Egypt (who was also called Pharaoh) came with a countless army of soldiers, and seized queen Sarah, the mother of our nation. What did Abraham our progenitor then do? Did he defend himself against this tyrant by war, although he had three hundred and eighteen captains under him, and an immense army under each of them, or did he deem them no number at all without God's assistance, and only spread out his hands towards this holy place, which you have now polluted, and enlisted God as his invincible supporter? Was not his queen sent back undefiled to her husband the very next evening, while the king of Egypt fled away, adoring this place which you have defiled by shedding therein the blood of your own countrymen, and trembling at the visions which he saw in the night-season, and bestowing both silver and gold on the Hebrews, as on people beloved by God? Shall I be silent, or speak of the removal of our fathers into Egypt, who, when they were used tyrannically, and had fallen under the power of foreign kings for four hundred years together, though they might have defended themselves by war and by fighting, did yet do nothing but commit themselves to God? Who is there that does not know that Egypt was over-run with all sorts of wild beasts, and harassed by all sorts of plagues, that their land did not bring forth its fruit, that the water of the Nile failed, and that the ten plagues of Egypt followed one upon another, and that owing to this our fathers were sent away with a guard without any bloodshed, and without running any danger, because God conducted them as his peculiar servants? Moreover, did not Palestine groan under the ravage the Assyrians made, when they carried away our sacred ark? And did not their idol Dagon groan, as also the entire nation of those that carried the ark away; for they were smitten with a loathsome disease in the secret parts of their bodies, and their very bowels came down with what they had eaten, till those hands that stole the ark away were obliged to bring it back again, and that with the sound of cymbals and kettledrums, and with oblations to appease the anger of God for the violation of his holy ark? God was then our general, and accomplished those great things for our fathers, because they did not meddle with war and fighting, but committed it to him to judge about the affair. When Sennacherib, king of the Assyrians, brought in his train all Asia, and encompassed this city with his army, did he fall by the hands of men? Were not those hands lifted up to God in prayers, without meddling with arms, when the angel of God destroyed that countless host in one night? And did not the Assyrian king, when he arose the next day, find an hundred and eighty-five thousand dead bodies, and did he not with the remainder of his army flee away from the Hebrews, though they were unarmed and did not pursue after him? You also know of our slavery at Babylon, where our people were captives for seventy years, and not restored till Cyrus gratified God by bringing it about; when they were restored by him, and again celebrated the worship of their deliverer in his temple. And, to speak generally, we can produce no example wherein our fathers got any success by war, or failed of success without war, when they committed themselves to God. When they stayed at home they conquered, as it pleased their Judge, but when they went out to fight, they always met with reverses; for example, when the king of Babylon besieged this very city, and our king Zedekiah fought against him, contrary to the prophecies of Jeremiah, he was himself taken prisoner, and saw the city and sanctuary overthrown. Yet how much greater was the moderation of that king than is that of your present rulers, and that of the people under him than is that of you at this time! For when Jeremiah cried out aloud, that God was very angry with them because of their transgression, and told them they would be taken prisoners unless they surrendered up their city, neither did the king nor the people put him to death. But you (to pass over what you have done within the city, which I am not able to describe as your wickedness deserves), you I say abuse me, and throw darts at me, who only exhort you to save yourselves, being provoked when you are put in mind of your sins, and being unable to bear the very mention of those crimes which you every day perpetrate. To take another example, when Antiochus, who was called Epiphanes, besieged this city, and was guilty of many outrages against God, and our forefathers met him in arms, they themselves were slain in the battle, and the city was plundered by our enemies, and the sanctuary was desolate for three years and six months. Why need I bring any more examples? Indeed, what can it be that has stirred up an army of the Romans against our nation? Is it not the impiety of the people of our country? And whence did our servitude originate? Did it not proceed from the dissensions of our forefathers, when the madness of Aristobulus and Hyrcanus and their mutual quarrels brought Pompey upon this city, when God reduced those who were unworthy of liberty to subjection to the Romans? For after a siege of three months they had to surrender, although they had not been so guilty of offences with regard to our sanctuary and our laws as you have been, and that though they had much greater resources for war than you have! Do we not know what end Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, came to, in whose reign God again punished the people's offences by the capture of this city? And when Herod, the son of Antipater, brought upon us Sossius, and Sossius brought upon us the Roman army, they were then surrounded and besieged for six months, till as a punishment for their sins they were captured, and the city was plundered by the enemy. Thus it appears that warfare is never allowed our nation; but that capture always follows our fighting. For I suppose that such as inhabit this holy place ought to commit the disposal of all things to God, and to disregard the hand of men, when they plead to the Judge above. But as for you, what have you done of the things approved of by our legislator? and what have you not done of the things that he condemned? How much more impious are you than those who were so quickly captured! You have not disdained so much as those sins that are done in secret, as thefts, and treacherous plots against men, and adulteries. Do you not vie with one another in rapine and murders, and do you not invent strange modes of wickedness? Nay, the temple itself is become the receptacle of all, and the divine place is polluted by the hands of our own countrymen, although it was revered by the Romans who lived at a distance, for they suffered many of their own customs to give place to our law. And, after all this, do you expect him whom you have so impiously abused to be your helper? You have forsooth a right to be petitioners, and to call upon him to assist you, so pure are your hands! Did our king lift up such hands in prayer against the king of Assyria, when God destroyed that great army in one night? And do the Romans commit such wickedness, as did the king of Assyria, that you may hope for the like vengeance upon them? Did not that king accept of money from our king on condition that he should not destroy the city, and yet, contrary to the oath he had taken, did he not come down to burn the temple? Whereas the Romans demand no more than the accustomed tribute which our fathers paid to their fathers; and if they but once obtain that, they will neither destroy this city, nor touch this sanctuary. Nay, they will in that case grant you besides, that your posterity shall be free, and your possessions secured to you, and they will preserve your holy laws inviolate. It is indeed madness to expect that God should appear as well disposed towards the wicked as towards the righteous, for he knows when it is proper to punish people for their sins immediately. Accordingly, he broke the power of the Assyrians the very first night that they pitched their camp. And had he judged our nation worthy of freedom, or the Romans deserving of punishment, he would have immediately inflicted punishment upon those Romans (as he did upon the Assyrians) when Pompey began to meddle with our nation, or when after him Sossius came up against us, or when Vespasian laid waste Galilee, or lastly now, when Titus drew near the city. Whereas Magnus<sup>1</sup> and Sossius did not only suffer nothing, but took our city by storm, and Vespasian went from the war he made against you to become emperor. As for Titus, those springs that were formerly dried up for you run very plentifully for him. For you know very well how Siloam,<sup>2</sup> as well as all the other springs outside the city, so failed that water was sold by measure;<sup>3</sup> whereas they are now so full of water for your enemies, that there is sufficient drink not only for themselves and their cattle, but for their gardens also. The same wonderful phenomenon you experienced formerly at the time of the capture of our city, when the forementioned king of Babylon made war against us, and when he took our city, and burnt our temple, though I believe the Jews of that age were not so impious as you are. So that I think God is fled from his sanctuary, and stands on the side of those against whom you now fight. Why, even a good man will flee from an impure house, and will hate those that are in it; and do you think that God will abide with you in your crimes, who sees all secret things, and hears things kept most private? Though what crime is there that is so much as kept secret or concealed by you? nay, what is not open to your enemies? For you make a pompous show of your lawless doings, and vie with one another daily which of you shall be the worse, and make a public display of your vice as if it were virtue. However, there is yet a road left for your preservation, if you are willing to take it; for God is easily reconciled to those that confess their faults and repent of them. Ye men of iron, cast away your arms, and take pity on your country already going to ruin; return from your wicked ways, and have regard to the beauty and excellence of the city you are going to betray, and of the temple rich with the donations of so many nations! Who will first set these things on fire? who wishes that these things should be no more? and what is there that can better deserve to be preserved? O hard-hearted creatures, and more unfeeling than stones! And if you do not look on these things with genuine eyes, yet have pity upon your families, and let every one of you set before your eyes your children and wives and parents, who will soon perish either by famine or war. I am aware that this danger extends to my mother and wife, and to my not ignoble family, and house very eminent in old time; and perhaps you imagine that it is on their account only that I give you this advice. If that be so, kill them, nay, take my blood as the hire of your safety; for I am ready to die, if you will but return to a sound mind after my death."

CHAP. X.

How many of the People had a great inclination to desert to the Romans; also what intolerable things those that stayed in the City suffered from Famine, and the sad Consequences thereof.

§ 1.

AS Josephus uttered these words in a loud voice, not without tears, the seditious would neither yield to what he said, nor did they deem it safe to alter their conduct; but the people had a great inclination to desert to the Romans. So some of them sold what they had for very little, and others swallowed down their most precious treasures, namely pieces of gold, that they might not be found out by the robbers, and when they had escaped to the Romans, went to stool, and so had wherewithal to provide plentifully for themselves. For Titus let a great number of them go away into the country, wherever each pleased. And the main reason why they were so ready to desert was that now they would be freed from those miseries which they endured in the city, and yet would not be slaves to the Romans. However, John and Simon, and their factions, more carefully watched these men's going out, than they did the coming in of the Romans; and if any one did but afford the least shadow of suspicion of such an intention, his throat was cut immediately.

§ 2. As for the richer sort, their staying in the city brought death all the same; for they were put to death on the pretext that they were going to desert, but in reality that the robbers might get their property. The recklessness of the seditious did also increase with the famine, and both these miseries grew every day worse. And as there was no corn anywhere apparent, the robbers came running up, and ransacked houses; and if they found any corn, they tortured persons as if they had denied they had any; and if they found none, they tortured them worse, because they supposed they had more carefully concealed it. The test they made use of whether they had any or not was the bodies of these miserable wretches. If they were in good condition, they supposed they were in no want at all of food; but if they were wasted away, they walked off without searching any further; for they did not think it reasonable to kill such as would very soon die for want of food. Many indeed privately sold their possessions for one measure of wheat, if they were of the richer sort, but of barley if they were poorer; and when they had so done, they shut themselves up in the inmost rooms of their houses, and ate the corn they had got, some without grinding it because of the extreme want they were in; and others baked bread of it, as necessity and fear dictated. Nowhere was a table laid for a distinct meal, but they snatched the bread out of the fire only partially baked, and ate it greedily.

§ 3. Miserable were now their meals, and it was a sight for tears, for the strong had more than their share, and the weak lamented their going short. But famine overcomes all other passions, and is destructive of nothing so much as modesty; for what is otherwise worthy of reverence is in this case despised. Indeed wives pulled the morsels that their husbands were eating out of their very mouths, and children did the same to their fathers, and what was still more pitiable, so did mothers to their infants; and when those that were most dear were perishing in their hands, they were not ashamed to take from them the very last drops that might have preserved their lives. Yet while they ate in this manner, they were not unobserved in so doing; for the seditious everywhere stood over them, and snatched away from them what they had got from others. For whenever they saw any house shut up, this was to them an indication that the people within had got some food; whereupon they straightway broke open the doors, and ran in, and took pieces of what they were eating almost out of their very throats by force. And old men who held their food fast were beaten, and if women hid what they had within their hands, their hair was torn for so doing. Nor was there any pity shown either to grey hairs or to babes, but they lifted up children from the ground, as they hung upon the morsels they had got, and dashed them down upon the ground. But they were still more barbarous and cruel to those who tried to prevent their coming in, and had actually gulped down what they were going to seize upon, as if they had been unjustly defrauded of their rights. They also invented terrible methods of torment to discover where any food was, stopping up with pulse the passages of the private parts of these miserable wretches, and driving sharp stakes up their fundaments. And a man was forced to bear what it is terrible even to hear, in order to make him confess that he had but one loaf of bread, or that he might bring out a handful of barley-meal that was concealed. And this was done when these tormentors were not themselves hungry, for the thing would have been less barbarous had necessity forced them to it, but it was only done to keep their recklessness in exercise, and to get before-hand provisions for themselves for the following days. These men went also to meet those that had crept out of the city by night as far as the Roman outposts, to gather plants and herbs that grew wild; and when such people thought they had got clear of the enemy, they snatched from them what they were bringing with them, even while they frequently entreated them, invoking the awful name of God, to give them back some part of what they had at great danger brought, but they would not give them the least crumb; and it was a subject of congratulation to these poor wretches that they were only spoiled, and not killed also.

§ 4. Such was the treatment that the lower sort of people suffered from the tyrant's body-guards; but the men that were of rank and rich were carried before the tyrants themselves. Some of them were falsely accused of laying treacherous plots, and were consequently put to death, others of them were charged with designs of betraying the city to the Romans; but the readiest way of all was to suborn somebody to inform that they were resolved to desert to the enemy. And he who was utterly despoiled of what he had by Simon, was sent back again to John, as of those who had been already plundered by John, Simon got what remained; so that they drank in turn among themselves the blood of the populace, and divided the dead bodies of the poor creatures between them. And though they contended with each other for the mastery, yet they very well agreed in their wicked practices. For he who did not share with another what he had got by the miseries of others seemed only partially guilty, and he that did not go shares in such barbarity grieved at the loss, as at the loss of something valuable.

§ 5. It is however impossible to narrate in detail every instance of these men's lawlessness. I shall therefore say briefly, that neither did any other city ever suffer such miseries, nor did any age ever breed a generation more fruitful in wickedness from the beginning of the world; and at last they disparaged the Hebrew nation, that they might appear less impious to strangers, and confessed (what was indeed true) that they were slaves and the scum and base refuse of the nation. Indeed it was they that overthrew the city, and forced the Romans against their will to gain a melancholy reputation by their success, and all but drew that fire upon the temple, which they seemed to think came too slowly. And certainly, when they saw that temple burning from the upper city, they neither grieved at it nor wept, though these emotions were noticed among the Romans themselves. But these things I shall speak of hereafter in their proper place, when I come to treat of them.

CHAP. XI.

How the Jews were Crucified before the Walls of the City. Concerning Antiochus Epiphanes ; and how the Jews overthrew the Earthworks that had been raised by the Romans.

§ 1.

AND now Titus' earthworks had made great progress, although his soldiers were much galled from the walls. He then sent a troop of horse, and ordered they should lay ambushes for those that went out into the valleys to get food. Some of these last were indeed fighting men, who were not contented with what they got by rapine, but most of them were poor people, who were deterred from deserting by the concern they were in for their relations; for they could not hope to escape with their wives and children without the knowledge of the seditious, nor could they think of leaving these relations to be slain by the robbers instead of themselves. It was the severity of the famine that made them thus bold in going out, though nothing remained for them, if they escaped the notice of the robbers, but capture by the enemy. And when they were going to be taken, they resisted from necessity for fear of punishment, and after they had fought they thought it too late to make any supplications for mercy. So they were first scourged, and then tormented with all sorts of tortures before they died, and were crucified opposite the walls of the city.<sup>1</sup> Their misery made Titus pity them, as every day five hundred Jews were taken, and sometimes more, but it did not appear to be safe for him to let those that were taken by force go their way, and to guard so many would be, he saw, to turn all his men into guards. But the main reason why he did not forbid these crucifixions was that he hoped the Jews might perhaps yield at that sight, from fear lest they might themselves afterwards suffer the same. So the soldiers, in their wrath and hatred to those they captured, nailed them in different ways to the crosses by way of jest, though their numbers were so great that room was wanting for the crosses, and crosses wanting for the bodies.

§ 2. But so far were the seditious from repenting at this sad sight, that, on the contrary, they tried to make the rest of the multitude believe the case was different. For they dragged the relations of those that had deserted upon the walls, as also such of the populace as were eager to go over upon the security offered them, and showed them what miseries those underwent who fled to the Romans; and told them that those who had been arrested [and crucified] by them were suppliants, and not prisoners taken after resistance. This kept many of those who were eager to desert within the city, till the truth was known. However, some ran away immediately as unto certain punishment, esteeming death from their enemies to be rest,<sup>1</sup> if compared with death by famine. So Titus commanded that the hands of many that were taken should be cut off, that they might not be thought deserters, and might be credited on account of this bad treatment, and sent them in to John and Simon, with this exhortation, that they would now at length cease fighting, and not force him to destroy the city, but by repentance even at the eleventh hour to preserve their own lives and city, and that temple which was their peculiar glory. He then went round the earthworks, and hastened on the workers at them at the same time, to show that his words would in no long time be followed by deeds. At this the seditious cast reproaches upon Titus himself and upon his father also, and cried out with a loud voice, that they despised death, and did well to prefer it to slavery; and that they would do all the mischief to the Romans they could, while they had breath in them; and as for their city, since they were, as he said, to be destroyed, they had no concern about it, and the world itself was a better temple to God than this. However, this temple would yet be preserved by him that dwelt therein, whom they had for their helper in this war, and therefore laughed at all his threatenings, which would come to nothing, because the conclusion of the whole depended upon God only. These words they mixed with reproaches and loudly vociferated.

§ 3. Meantime Antiochus Epiphanes came to the city, having with him a considerable number of other armed men, and a band called the Macedonian band about his person, who were all of the same age, and tall, and just past their boyhood, and armed and trained in the Macedonian manner, from which circumstance they got their name, yet most of them were unworthy of so famous a nation. For it had so happened, that the king of Commagene<sup>1</sup> had flourished more than any other kings that were under the power of the Romans, till he experienced a change in his condition; but when he became an old man, he was an instance that we ought not to call any man happy before his death. However, this son of his, who was now present when his father was still in his prime, said that he wondered what made the Romans so tardy to storm the wall. Now he was a warlike man, and naturally bold in exposing himself to dangers; he was also so strong a man that his boldness seldom failed of success. And though Titus smiled, and said "We will go shares in the labour," Antiochus went as he was, and with his Macedonians made a sudden assault upon the wall. And as for himself his strength and skill were so great that he kept off the Jewish darts, and yet shot his darts at them, while the young men with him were almost all sorely galled. For they had so great a regard to the vaunts that had been made of their courage, that they would needs persevere in fighting, and at last many of them retired wounded; and then they perceived that true Macedonians, if they were to be conquerors, must have Alexander's good fortune also.

§ 4. Now the Romans began to raise their earthworks on the twelfth day of the month Artemisius, and had much ado to finish them by the twenty-ninth day of the same month, after they had laboured hard for seventeen days continually. For there were now four great earthworks raised, one of which was at the tower of Antonia, which was raised by the fifth legion opposite the middle of the pool called Struthius.<sup>1</sup> Another was thrown up by the twelfth legion, at the distance of about twenty cubits from the other. But the labours of the tenth legion, which lay a great way off these, was on the north quarter at the pool called Amygdalon;<sup>2</sup> and that of the fifteenth legion was about thirty cubits from it at the high priest's tomb.<sup>3</sup> Now when the engines were brought up, John had from within already undermined the space that was opposite the tower of Antonia as far as the earthworks, and had propped up the ground over the mine with beams laid across one another, whereby the Roman works stood upon an insecure foundation. Then did he order such materials to be brought up as were daubed over with pitch and bitumen, and set them on fire; and as the cross-beams that propped up the earthworks burnt, all the mine suddenly subsided, and the earthworks fell in with a prodigious noise. Now at first there arose a very thick smoke and dust, as the fire was choked with the fall of the earthworks; but when the materials that pressed it down were gradually consumed, an evident flame broke out. On the sudden appearance of this flame consternation fell upon the Romans, and the cleverness of the contrivance dejected them; and indeed this happening to them at a time when they thought they had already gained their point, cooled their hopes for the time to come. They also thought it would be no good taking pains to extinguish the fire, since, even if it should be extinguished, the earthworks were swallowed up already.

§ 5. Two days after this Simon and his party made an attack upon the other earthworks; for the Romans had brought their battering-rams up there, and began already to make the wall shake. And here one Tephthæus of Garsis,<sup>4</sup> a city of Galilee, and Megassarus, one of queen Mariamne's servants, and with them the son of Nabatæus, from Adiabene,<sup>5</sup> who was called by the name of Chagiras from the ill fortune he had, (the word signifying a lame man,) snatched some torches, and ran suddenly upon the engines. Nor were there during this war any men that ever sallied out of the city who were their superiors, either in boldness, or in the terror they struck into their enemies. For they ran out upon the Romans, not as if they were a band of enemies, but friends, without fear or delay: nor did they withdraw till they had rushed violently through the midst of them, and set their engines on fire. And though they had darts thrown at them on every side, and were on every side assaulted with the enemies' swords, yet they did not withdraw from the danger they were in, till the fire caught hold of the enemies' engines. And when the flame mounted up, the Romans came running from their camp to save their engines, but the Jews hindered them from the wall, and fought with those that endeavoured to quench the fire without any regard to the danger their own bodies were in. And the Romans tried to pull the battering-rams out of the fire, while the hurdles that covered them were on fire, but the Jews caught hold of the battering-rams through the flames and held them fast, although the iron upon them was now red-hot. And now the fire spread from the battering-rams to the earth-works, and prevented those that came to defend them; for the Romans were now surrounded with the flames, and despairing of saving their works from them retired to their camp. Then did the Jews flock up in ever increasing numbers, those that were within the city coming up to their assistance; and as they were flushed with victory their impetuosity carried everything before it, and they got as far as the fortifications of the enemies' camp, and fought with their guards. Now a body of soldiers relieved by turns always stands armed before every camp, and as to these the law of the Romans is terrible, that he who leaves his post, whatever the occasion be, must die. So this body of soldiers, preferring rather to die fighting courageously than as a punishment for their cowardice, stood their ground, and at the necessity these men were in of standing their ground, many of the others that had run away turned back again from shame. And when they had placed in position their engines for hurling darts against the wall, they tried to prevent the multitude from flocking out of the city, who took no pains either to preserve their lives or guard their bodies; for the Jews fought with all they met, and without any caution rushed against the points of their enemies' spears, and dashed against them with their very bodies, and now overpowered the Romans, not so much by their actions, as by their courage, for the Romans gave way to their boldness more than because they were much hurt.

§ 6. And now Titus came up from the Tower of Antonia, where he had gone to look out for a place for throwing up other earthworks: and he reproached the soldiers greatly for permitting their own camp to be in danger, when they had carried two of the walls of their enemies, and for sustaining themselves the fortune of men besieged, and for allowing the Jews to sally out against them, though they were in a sort of prison. He then made a détour with some chosen troops, and fell upon the enemies' flank in person. And the Jews, though they were attacked in front as well, wheeled round and fought stoutly against Titus. And when the armies were now engaged, the dust that was raised so hindered them from seeing one another, and the noise that was made so hindered them from hearing one another, that neither side could any longer discern foe from friend. And the Jews did not flinch, though not so much from their real strength, as from their despair of safety, and the Romans were nerved by the regard they had to their glory and reputation in war, and because Titus himself led them into danger; so that I think the Romans would eventually have overpowered the whole of the Jews, so enraged were they, had not these anticipated the upshot of the battle, and retired into the city. However, as their earthworks were done for, the Romans were very dejected at the loss in one hour of what had cost them such pains. Indeed many despaired of taking the city with the usual engines of war.

CHAP. XII.

Titus determines to surround the City with a Wall ; after which the Famine consumes the People by whole Houses and Families.

§ 1.

AND now Titus consulted with his commanders what was to be done. Those that were the most sanguine thought he should lead up the whole army against the city and storm the wall ; for hitherto the Jews had fought with only a fragment of their army, but if the entire army were to attack en masse, the Jews would not be able to bear their attack, but would be overwhelmed by their darts. But of those that were more cautious some were for constructing earthworks again, and others advised without these to sit before the city, to prevent the coming out of the Jews and the introduction of provisions, and so to leave the enemy to famine, without direct fighting with them ; for despair made men invincible, who hoped to die by the sword, because a more terrible end was reserved for them. However, Titus did not think it right for so great an army to be entirely idle, though he felt that it was unnecessary to fight against those who would be destroyed by one another ; he also showed them how difficult it was to throw up any more earthworks, for want of material, and still more difficult to prevent the Jews making sallies. Nor was it easy to surround the whole city with his army, because of its size and the difficult ground, and it was also dangerous because of the sallies the Jews might make from the city ; for although they might guard the known outlets from the place, yet the Jews could contrive secret passages out in their necessity, and from knowledge of such places ; and if any provisions were carried in by stealth, the siege would thereby be longer protracted. He also owned that he was afraid that the length of time thus spent would diminish the glory of his success ; for though it was true that length of time would perfect every thing, yet celerity was necessary for gaining reputation. His opinion therefore was, that if they aimed at celerity joined with safety, they must build a wall round about the whole city; for that was, he thought, the only way to prevent the Jews from coming out any way, and then they would either entirely despair of saving the city, and so would surrender it up to him, or they would be the more easily conquered when the famine had further weakened them. Nor did he intend to be entirely idle in other respects, but would take care to raise earth-works again, when their enemies had become weaker. And if any one should think such a work great and hard to accomplish, he ought to consider that it was not fit for Romans to undertake any small work, and that none but God himself could with ease accomplish any great thing.

§ 2. These arguments prevailed with the commanders. So Titus gave orders that the army should be distributed to their several shares of this work. And indeed there now came upon the soldiers a certain divine fury, so that in the division of the whole wall that was to be built among them, not only did one legion vie with another, but the lesser divisions of the army did the same; so that each soldier was ambitious to please his decurion, each decurion his centurion, each centurion his tribune, and the ambition of the tribunes was to please their superior commanders. And Titus himself took notice of and rewarded the like friendly rivalry in those commanders; for he went round about the works many times every day, and reconnoitered what was done. He began the wall at the camp of the Assyrians, where his own camp was pitched, and extended it to the lower parts of Cænopolis, from whence it went along Cedron to the Mount of Olives; it then turned off to the south, and encompassed the mount as far as the rock called Peristereon, and the hill next it which lies opposite the ravine near Siloam; whence it turned off again to the west, and went down to the ravine of the Fountain. After this it went up again to the tomb of Ananus the high priest, and taking in the mountain where Pompey had formerly pitched his camp, it returned back to the north side of the city, and extended as far as a certain village called the House of the Erebinthi; after which it took in Herod's tomb, and then on the east joined Titus' own camp again, where it began.<sup>1</sup> Now the length of this wall was thirty-nine furlongs, and on the outside of it were erected thirteen forts, whose circumferences amounted to ten furlongs. And the whole work was completed in three days, so that what would have been adequate work for some months, was done in so short a time as is almost incredible. And as soon as Titus had surrounded the city with this wall, and put men into these forts, he went round the wall at the first watch of the night, and observed how the guard was kept; the second watch he allotted to Alexander; and the commanders of legions took the third watch. They also cast lots among themselves who should be upon the watch in the night, and who should go all night long round the spaces that were between the forts.

§ 3. So all hope of safety was now cut off from the Jews, as also their liberty of going out of the city. And famine increased its dimensions, and devoured the people by whole houses and families; the roofs were full of women and children that were dying of starvation, and the lanes of the city were full of dead bodies of the aged; the children also and the young men wandered about the market-places like shadows, all wasted away with famine, and fell down dead, wherever death seized them. As for burying their relations, those that were sick themselves were not able to do it, and those that were hearty and well were deterred from doing it by the great quantity of those dead bodies, and by the uncertainty of their own life; for many died as they were burying others, and many went to their coffins before the fatal hour was come. Nor was there any lamentation made in these calamities, nor was any wailing heard, but the famine stifled all natural emotions. For those who were just going to die looked upon those that were gone to their rest before them with dry eyes and smiling mouths, and a deep silence and kind of deadly night had seized upon the city. But the robbers were still more terrible than these miseries were, for they broke into houses which were little else than graves of dead bodies, and plundered the dead, and stripped off the coverings of their bodies, and went away laughing, and tested the points of their swords in their dead bodies, and in order to prove what metal they were made of, thrust some of those through that still lay alive upon the ground. As for those that entreated them to lend them their right hand and sword to despatch them, they contemptuously refused, and left them to perish by famine. Now every one of these as he died fixed his eyes earnestly upon the temple, at the idea of leaving the seditious alive behind him. And they at first gave orders that the dead should be buried out of the public treasury, not being able to endure the stench of their dead bodies. But afterwards, when they could not do that, they had them cast down from the walls into the ravines below.

§ 4. Now when Titus, going his rounds along these ravines, saw them full of dead bodies, and observed the thick matter running from these clammy corpses, he groaned and spread out his hands to heaven, and called God to witness that this was not his doing. Such was the sad state of affairs in the city. But the Romans were very joyful, because none of the seditious could now make sallies out of the city, for they were now dejected, and the famine already touched them; but the Romans had quantity of corn and other necessaries from Syria and the neighbouring provinces; and many of them would stand near the wall of the city, and show the people what great quantities of provisions they had, and so make the enemy more sensible of their famine from the great plenty even to satiety which they themselves had. However, as the seditious showed no signs of yielding in spite of famine, Titus pitying the people that remained, and earnestly desiring to rescue those that were still left, began to raise earthworks again, although material for them was hard to come at; for all the trees that were about the city had been already cut down for the making of the former earthworks. But the soldiers brought other material from a distance of ninety furlongs, and raised earthworks much bigger than the former at four places, though only near the tower of Antonia. And Titus went his rounds through the legions, and hastened on the work, and showed the robbers that they were now in his hands. But these men only were incapable of repenting of the wickedness they had been guilty of, and, separating their souls from their bodies, they used them both as if they belonged to other people. For no gentle affection could touch their souls, nor could any pain affect their bodies, since they still tore the dead bodies of the people as dogs do, and filled the prisons with those that were feeble.

CHAP. XIII.

§ 1.

SIMON would not even suffer Matthias, by whose aid he got possession of the city, to die without being tortured. This Matthias was the son of Boethus, and was descended from high priests, and was one that had been very faithful to the people, and was held in great esteem by them; and it was he, when the multitude were distressed by the Zealots, to whom John had already attached himself, who urged the people to admit this Simon to come in to assist them, though he had made no conditions with him, nor expected any thing that was evil from him. But when Simon had come in, and had got the city in his power, he esteemed him that had advised them to admit him as much his enemy as the rest, looking upon that advice as a piece of simplicity. So he had him brought at once before him, and condemned him to death for being on the side of the Romans, without giving him leave to make his defence, and passed the same sentence upon three of his sons, for the fourth had already fled to Titus. And when he begged as a favour that he might be slain before his sons, because he had got the gates of the city opened to him, Simon gave orders that he should be slain the last of all. So he was not slain till he had seen his sons slain before his eyes, and was himself led out to execution opposite the Romans; for such was the charge given by Simon to Ananus, the son of Bamadus, who was the most barbarous of all his body-guards. Simon also jeered at him, and told him that he might now see whether those to whom he had intended to go over, would send him any succour or not. He also forbade their dead bodies being buried. After them a certain priest Ananias, the son of Masambalus, a person of eminence, and Aristeus, the scribe of the sanhedrim, a native of Emmaus,<sup>1</sup> and with them fifteen men of note among the people, were slain. They also shut Josephus' father in prison, and kept him there, and made public proclamation that no citizens should associate or assemble together, for fear of treason, and also slew without trial all that lamented this dreadful state of affairs.

§ 2. Now when Judes, the son of Judes, who was one of Simon's under-officers, and a person entrusted by him to guard one of the towers, saw this conduct of Simon, he called together ten of those under him, that were most faithful to him (partly perhaps from pity to those that had so barbarously been put to death, but mainly to provide for his own safety), and spoke to them as follows. "How long shall we bear these miseries? or what hopes have we of safety by continuing faithful to such a wicked wretch? Is not the famine already come against us, and are not the Romans almost within the city, and is not Simon unfaithful to his benefactors, and is there not reason to fear he will very soon bring us too to the like punishment, while the security the Romans offer us is sure? Come then, let us surrender the wall, and save ourselves and the city. Nor will Simon be very much hurt, if, since he despairs of deliverance, he be brought to justice a little sooner than he expects." Now, these ten were prevailed upon by these arguments, and Judes sent at daybreak the rest of those that were under him, some one way, some another, that no discovery might be made of what they had resolved upon, and himself invited the Romans from his tower about the third hour. But some of them treated what he said disdainfully, and others of them did not believe him to be in earnest, but most postponed action because they believed they would get possession of the city in a little time without any hazard. But when Titus was just coming up with his armed men, Simon saw the state of affairs before he came, and quickly occupied the tower, and seized upon these men, and put them to death in the sight of the Romans, and when he had mangled their dead bodies, threw them down before the wall of the city.

§ 3. Meantime, as Josephus was going round the city, for he did not cease exhorting the Jews, he was wounded on the head by a stone that was thrown at him; upon which he fell down at once, being stunned. At this fall of his the Jews made a sally, and he would have been dragged into the city, had not Titus quickly sent men to protect him. And while these men were fighting, Josephus was taken up, though he knew little of what had happened. And the seditious supposed they had now slain that man whom they most desired to kill, and raised thereupon a great shout by way of rejoicing. News of this spread about the city, and the multitude that remained were very dejected at the news, believing that he, on whose account alone they could venture to desert to the Romans, was really dead. And when Josephus' mother heard in prison that her son was dead, she said to her jailors that she had always been of opinion, since the siege of Jotapata,<sup>1</sup> that she would never enjoy him alive again. She also made great lamentation privately to the maid-servants that were about her, and said that this was the advantage she had had of bringing so extraordinary a person as this into the world, that she should not be able even to bury him by whom she expected to have been buried herself. However, this false report did not long put his mother to pain, nor afford joy to the robbers. For Josephus soon recovered of his wound, and came forward, and cried aloud, that it should not be long before they should be punished for this wound they had given him. He also again besought the people to trust in him. This sight of Josephus encouraged the people greatly, and brought great consternation upon the seditious.

§ 4. Now some of the deserters, having no other means, leaped down from the wall quickly, and others went out of the city with stones as if to battle, but soon fled to the Romans. But a worse fate soon came upon these, than what they would have found within the city, and they met with a quicker despatch from the too great abundance they had among the Romans, than they could have done from famine among the Jews. For when they first came to the Romans, they were puffed up by famine, and swollen like men in a dropsy; after which they all over-filled those bodies that were before empty, and so burst asunder, excepting such only as were prudent enough to restrain their appetites, and took food by degrees into bodies unaccustomed to it. And another trouble came to those who were thus preserved; for among the Syrians a certain deserter was detected picking pieces of gold out of his excrements. For the deserters used to swallow their gold, as I said before, when they came out, as the seditious searched them all (for there was a great quantity of gold in the city; insomuch that as much was now purchasable for twelve Attic drachmæ as was sold before for twenty-five). But when this contrivance was discovered in one instance, the rumour spread about the camp, that deserters came full of gold. So the multitude of Arabians and Syrians ripped up those that came as suppliants, and searched their bellies. Nor does it seem to me that any misery more terrible than this befell the Jews, for in one night about two thousand of these deserters were thus ripped up.

§ 5. When Titus heard of this lawless conduct, he was within an ace of surrounding those that had been guilty of it with his cavalry, and shooting them dead; and would have done so, had not so great a number been involved in it, for those that were liable to punishment would have been many times more than those whom they had slain. However, he called together the commanders of the allies and of his own legions (for some of his own soldiers were also accused of the same conduct), and was very indignant against both. "What? (said he) have any of my own soldiers done such things as this for uncertain gain, without respecting their own weapons, which are made of silver and gold? Moreover, do the Arabians and Syrians now first begin to indulge their passions as they please in a foreign war, and then get their barbarity in murdering men and hatred to the Jews ascribed to the Romans?" For this infamous practice was said to have spread among some of his own soldiers also. Titus next threatened to put to death any one who should dare to act so again if detected; moreover, he charged the legions, that they should make a search for such as were suspected of such conduct, and should bring them before him. But it appeared that the love of money overcame all their dread of punishment, for a vehement desire for gain is innate in men, and no passion is so venturesome as covetousness; though such passions have generally certain bounds, and are subordinate to fear. But in this case God condemned the whole nation, and turned to their destruction every step that was taken for their safety. What therefore was forbidden by Titus on pain of death was ventured upon privately against the deserters. For these barbarians would go out still, and meet those that ran away before they were themselves descried, and looking about to see that no Romans spied them, would rip them up, and pull this impure money out of their bowels; which was only found in a few of them, though a great many were killed from the bare hope of getting it. Now this miserable treatment made many deserters return back again to the city.

§ 6. As for John, when he could no longer plunder the people, he betook himself to sacrilege, and melted down many of the votive offerings in the temple, as also many of the vessels which were necessary for divine service, as the bowls, the dishes, and the tables. Nay, he did not keep his hands off those ewers that had been sent by Augustus and his wife. For the Roman emperors did ever both honour and adorn our temple; whereas this man, who was a Jew, seized upon what were the donations of foreigners, and said to his friends that they might use divine things without fear, as they were fighting for the deity, and that those who were fighting for the temple might live on the temple. So he emptied the vessels of the sacred wine and oil, which the priests kept to pour on the burnt-offerings, and which lay in the inner part of the temple, and distributed it among the multitude, and they without fear used above a hin each in their anointing and drinking. And here I cannot but speak my mind, and state what the concern I am in dictates to me. I suppose, had the Romans made any longer delay in coming against these wretches, that the city would either have been swallowed up by the ground opening, or been deluged by water, or else been destroyed by such lightning as the inhabitants of Sodom perished by, for it had brought forth a generation of men much more impious than those were who suffered those punishments. At any rate it was by their madness that all the people came to be destroyed.

§ 7. But why need I relate particular calamities? Why, Mannæus, the son of Lazarus, fled to Titus at this very time, and told him that there had been carried out, through that one gate that was entrusted to his care, no less than a hundred and fifteen thousand eight hundred and eighty dead bodies, in the interval between the fourteenth day of the month Xanthicus, when the Romans pitched their camp by the city, and the first day of the month Panemus. This was an immense multitude. And though this man was not himself set over the duty of carrying these bodies out, yet he was appointed to pay the public stipend for carrying these bodies out, and so of necessity numbered them. And the rest were buried by their relations; though all their burial was to take them away, and cast them out of the city. After him many of the eminent citizens fled to Titus, and told him the entire number of the poor that were dead was no less than six hundred thousand who were thrown out at the gates, and that the number of the rest could not be discovered. They told him further, that when they were no longer able to carry out the dead bodies of the poor, they laid their corpses on heaps in very large houses, and shut them up therein; as also, that a measure of wheat was sold for a talent, and that afterwards, when it was not possible to gather herbs because the city was all walled in, some persons were driven to such terrible distress that they searched the common sewers and old dunghills of cattle, and ate the dung which they got there; and what of old they could not endure so much as to look at, they now used for food. When the Romans heard this, they felt great pity, but the seditious, who saw it, did not repent, but suffered the same distress to come upon themselves. For they were blinded by the fate which was already coming upon the city and upon themselves.

CHAP. I.

How the Miseries of the Jews still grew worse ; and how the Romans made an Assault upon the Tower of Antonia.

§ 1.

THUS did the miseries of Jerusalem grow worse and worse every day, and the seditious were still more irritated by the calamities they suffered, for the famine finally preyed upon them after it had preyed upon the people. Indeed the multitude of carcasses that lay in heaps one upon another throughout the city was a horrible sight, and produced a pestilential stench, and was an hindrance to those that wanted to make sallies out of the city and fight the enemy. For they were obliged, as men that had in battle been initiated in ten thousand murders, to tread upon those dead bodies as they marched along ; but they did not shudder, nor did they pity the poor men as they marched over them, nor did they deem this affront offered to the dead an ill omen to themselves ; but with their right hands already polluted with the murder of their fellow-countrymen, they ran out to fight with foreigners, casting a reproach (as it seems to me) on the deity for slowness in punishing them ; for the war was now gone on with, not as if they had any hope of victory, but were nerved by the energy of despair. And although the Romans had great trouble in getting together material, they raised their earthworks in one and twenty days, after they had cut down all the trees that were in the country near the city, and that for ninety furlongs round about, as I have already related. And truly the very appearance of the land was a melancholy sight; for those places which were before adorned with trees and gardens, were now become desolate country everywhere, and stripped of all their trees. Nor could any foreigner that had formerly seen Judæa and the most beautiful suburbs of the city, and now saw a desert, but lament and mourn sadly at so great a change. For the war had played havoc with every sign of beauty, nor had any one, that had known the place before, come on a sudden to it now, would he have known it again, but though he were at the city, he would have inquired for it.

§ 2. And now that the earthworks were finished, they afforded grounds for fear both to the Romans and to the Jews. For the Jews expected that the city would be taken, unless they could burn these earthworks, and the Romans expected that, if these were once destroyed, they should never be able to take it. For there was a great scarcity of material, and the bodies of the soldiers began to faint under such hard labours, as their souls were dispirited at so many reverses one upon another; and the very sufferings of those in the city proved a greater discouragement to the Romans than to those within it. For they found the fighting men of the Jews to be no less energetic for their sore afflictions, while they had themselves perpetually less and less hope of success, as their earthworks were forced to yield to the stratagems of the enemy, their engines to the hardness of their wall, and their hand to hand fights to the boldness of their attack. And what was the greatest discouragement of all, they found the Jews' courage of soul to be superior to such great evils as they were suffering from, as their sedition, their famine, and the war itself; so that they imagined that the violence of their attacks was invincible, and that the spirit they showed would never be cowed by their calamities; and what would not those be able to bear, if they should be fortunate, who turned their very misfortunes to courage? These considerations made the Romans keep a stronger guard about their earthworks than they had formerly done.

§ 3. And now John and his party in the tower of Antonia took care for securing themselves afterwards, even if their last wall should be thrown down, and set about attacking the Roman earthworks before the battering-rams were placed in position upon them. But their attempt did not succeed, for though they went out with torches, they came back under great discouragement before they got near the earthworks. For first their plan did not seem to be unanimous, but they went out in distinct parties and at distinct intervals, and in a slow and timorous manner, and, to say all in a word, not like Jews. For they were now defective in what is peculiar to our nation, that is, boldness and impetuosity, and rushing upon the enemy en masse, and returning without serious reverse. For they now went out in a more languid manner than usual, and found the Romans drawn up in battle array, and more courageous than usual. And they guarded their earthworks both with their bodies and their entire armour on all sides, so that they left no room for the fire to get among them, and each one nerved up his soul rather to die than leave their ranks. For besides that all their hopes were cut off, if these works were once burnt, the soldiers were greatly ashamed that craft should prevail over courage, desperation over armour, numbers over experience, and Jews over Romans. The Romans had now also another advantage, in that their engines for throwing darts and stones reached the Jews as they were rushing out of the city, and when any one fell he got in the way of the one that was next, and the danger of going further made them less zealous. As for those that had run within shot, some of them were terrified at the good order and closeness of the enemies' ranks before they came to a close fight, and others were pricked by their spears, and turned back again; and at last they reproached one another for their cowardice, and retired without doing any thing. This sortie was made upon the first day of the month Panemus. And when the Jews retired, the Romans brought up their battering-rams, although they had all the while stones thrown at them from the tower of Antonia, and were assaulted by fire and sword, and by all sorts of missiles which necessity supplied the Jews with. For though they had great reliance on their own wall, and a contempt of the Roman battering-rams, yet did they endeavour to hinder the Romans from bringing them up. The Romans struggled hard, on the contrary, to bring them up, as they thought that this zeal of the Jews was to prevent any harm being done to the tower of Antonia, because its wall was but weak, and its foundations they hoped rotten. However, that tower did not yield to the blows given it by the battering-rams, but the Romans bore up against the enemies' darts, which were perpetually cast at them from above, and did not succumb to their dangers, but brought their battering-rams into play. And as they were beneath the Jews, and sadly wounded by the stones thrown down upon them, some of them placed their shields over their bodies,<sup>1</sup> and partly with their hands, partly with crowbars, undermined its foundations, and with great trouble removed four of its stones. And night put an end on both sides to this struggle. However, that night the wall, that had been shaken by the battering-rams where John had ingeniously undermined the previous earthworks, as the ground gave way, fell down suddenly.

§ 4. When this event unexpectedly happened, the minds of both parties were encouraged. For though one would have expected that the Jews would be dejected, as this fall of their wall was unexpected by them, and they had made no provision to meet the case, yet were they full of confidence because the tower of Antonia was still standing; and the unexpected joy of the Romans at this fall of the wall was soon quenched by the sight they had of another wall, which John and his party had built inside the other wall. However, to attack this second wall appeared less difficult than the storming of the former wall, because it seemed easier to get up to it through the breach in the former wall. This new wall appeared also to be much weaker than the tower of Antonia, and the Romans imagined that they should soon overthrow it, because it had been only a temporary erection. However, nobody

§ 5. And now Titus, considering that the alacrity of soldiers in war is chiefly excited by hope and argument, and that exhortations and promises frequently make men forget the hazards they run, nay, sometimes despise death itself, got together the most courageous part of his army, and tried to work on his men by the following speech. "Fellow-soldiers, to exhort men to do what has no peril in it, is merely inglorious to those to whom the exhortation is made, and in him that makes the exhortation suggests cowardice. I therefore think that such exhortations ought only to be made use of when affairs are in a critical condition, and yet worthy of being attempted by every one. I grant you that it is a difficult task to scale this wall; but I shall proceed to show that it is proper for those that desire reputation for valour to cope with difficulties, and that it is a noble thing to die with glory, and that the courage of those who take the initiative shall not go unrewarded. And let my first argument to urge you on be taken from what probably some would think likely to deter you, I mean the constancy and patience of these Jews in spite of their reverses. For it is unbecoming in you, who are Romans and my soldiers, who have been taught in peace how to make war, and who have also been used to conquer in war, to be inferior to Jews either in hand or soul, especially as you are near final victory, and are assisted by God. For our reverses have been owing to the desperation of the Jews, while their sufferings are intensified by your valour and the assistance of God. For what can their internal dissensions, and the famine and siege, and the fall of their wall without our engines, signify but God's anger against them, and his assistance of us? It will not therefore be proper for you, either to show yourselves inferior to those to whom you are really superior, or to betray the divine assistance which is afforded you. And how can it be esteemed other than disgraceful that, while the Jews, who need not be much ashamed if they be defeated, because they have long learned to be slaves, do yet despise death that they may be so no longer, and make sallies into the midst of us frequently, not in hopes of conquering us, but merely as a bare demonstration of their courage; yet we, who have conquered almost every land and sea, to whom it will be a great disgrace if we are not victorious, do not once run any risk against our enemies, but with such arms as we have sit still and inactive, and only wait till famine and fortune do their work against them, and that though we have it in our power, with some small risk, to gain all that we desire? For if we get up to the tower of Antonia, we gain the city. For if there should be any more occasion for fighting against those within the city, which I do not suppose there will be, yet our being then upon the top of the hill,<sup>1</sup> and being upon the enemy before they can take breath, promises us a complete victory. As for myself, I shall at present waive any commendation of those who die in war,<sup>2</sup> and omit to speak of the immortality of those men who are slain in the midst of their martial bravery, yet I cannot forbear to pray for those who are of a different temper that they may die of disease in time of peace, and their souls be condemned to the grave together with their bodies. For who does not know that the souls of good men which are severed from the flesh in battle by the sword are received by the ether, that purest of elements, and placed among the stars, and manifest themselves as good genii and heroes propitious to their posterity; whereas upon those souls that waste away in diseased bodies, notwithstanding they be mostly clean from spots and defilements, comes a subterraneous night to dissolve them to nothing, and a deep oblivion to take away all remembrance of them, so that in their case the soul at the same time comes to the termination of its life and body and memory? But since death is of necessity fated to all men, and a sword is an easier instrument of it than any disease, how is it not a very mean thing for us not to yield up to the public benefit what we must yield up to fate? I have said all this upon the supposition that those who first attempt to scale this wall must needs be killed, although men of true courage have a chance to escape even in the most hazardous undertakings. For first, that part of the former wall that is thrown down is easy to ascend; in the next place everything that is built is easily destroyed. As for the rest of you, pluck up your courage, and set about the work, and mutually encourage and assist one another, for your daring will soon cow the spirit of your enemies. And perhaps your glorious undertaking may be accomplished successfully without bloodshed. For although it is probable that the Jews will try to hinder your scaling the wall, yet if you once steal a march on them and storm their wall, they will not be able to withstand you any longer, though only a few of you get the start of them. As for that person who first mounts the wall, I should be ashamed if I did not make him envied by others for the rewards I should bestow upon him. If such a one escapes with his life, he shall have the command of others that are now only his equals, but the happiest rewards will be theirs who fall in the attempt."

<sup>1</sup> Reland notes here, very pertinently, that the tower of Antonia stood higher than the floor of the temple or court adjoining to it; and that accordingly they descended thence into the temple, as Josephus elsewhere speaks also. See vi. 2, § 5.—W.

<sup>2</sup> In this speech of Titus we may clearly see the notions which the Romans then had of death, and of the happy state of those who died bravely in war, and the contrary estate of those who died ignobly in their beds by sickness.—W.

§ 6. At this speech of Titus, the rest of the soldiers were frightened at so great a danger: but one whose name was Sabinus, a soldier that served among the cohorts, and was a Syrian by birth, showed himself very brave, both in hand and soul, though any one would have thought at first sight from his habit of body that he was not fit to be a soldier. For his colour was black, and he was lean, and his flesh lay close together, but an heroic soul dwelt in this lean body, and one far more noble<sup>1</sup> than his strength. And he was the first that rose up, and spoke as follows. "I readily offer myself to thee, Prince. I will first ascend the wall, and I pray that thy fortune may follow my strength and resolution. And if some Nemesis is on my undertaking, take notice that my ill success will not be unexpected, but that I choose death voluntarily for thy sake." When he had said this, he held his shield over his head with his left hand, and with his right hand drew his sword, and marched up to the wall, just about the sixth hour of the day. There followed him only eleven others, who resolved to imitate his bravery: but he went a long way ahead of them all, as if possessed by a divine fury. Now those that guarded the wall shot at them from thence, and threw innumerable darts upon them from every side; they also rolled very huge stones upon them, which knocked down some of the eleven that were with him. As for Sabinus himself, he faced the darts that were thrown at him, and though he was deluged by them, he did not relax his ardour before he had got up on the top of the wall, and put the enemy to flight. For as the Jews were dismayed at his strength and bravery, and as they also imagined more persons had got upon the wall than really had, they fled. And here one cannot but complain of fortune as envious of virtue, and ever hindering the performance of glorious achievements; for this hero, when he had all but attained his purpose, stumbled at a certain large stone, and fell down upon it headlong with a very great noise. Upon this the Jews turned back, and when they saw that he was alone, and had fallen down also, they showered darts at him from all sides. However, he leaned upon his knee, and covered himself with his shield, and at first defended himself against them, and wounded many of those that came near him; but he was soon forced to relax his right hand, from the number of wounds that had been given him, and at last he was quite deluged with darts before he gave up the ghost. He was a man who deserved a better fate because of his bravery, but he fell as might be expected in so great an attempt. As for the remaining eleven, the Jews crushed three of them to death with stones, when they had already got up to the top of the wall; the other eight, who were knocked down and wounded, were carried back to the camp. This happened on the third day of the month Panemus.

§ 7. Now two days afterwards twenty of the men that were in the front, and kept guard at the earthworks, got together, and called to them the standard-bearer of the fifth legion, and two others of a troop of horse, and one trumpeter, and marched without noise about the ninth hour of the night through the breach in the wall to the tower of Antonia; and when they had cut the throats of the first guards of the place they met, as they were asleep, they occupied the wall, and ordered the trumpeter to sound his trumpet. Upon this the rest of the guards rose up suddenly and ran away, before any body could see how many had scaled the wall; for, partly from the fear they were in, and partly from the sound of the trumpet which they heard, they imagined that the enemy had scaled the wall en masse. But as soon as Titus heard the trumpet, he ordered the army to put on their armour quickly, and went there with his commanders, and ascended first of all with the picked men that were with him. And as the Jews fled towards the temple, they rushed into the mine which John had dug under the Roman earthworks. Then the seditious of both sections of the Jews, as well those of John's as those of Simon's party, formed themselves into two masses, and tried to keep the Romans back, and indeed fought with the greatest of energy and vigour; for they esteemed themselves entirely ruined if once the Romans got into the temple, and the Romans looked upon the same thing as the beginning of entire conquest. So a terrible battle was fought at the entrance of the temple, for the Romans tried to force their way in to get possession of the temple, and the Jews tried to drive them back to the tower of Antonia. In this battle the darts were on both sides useless, as well as the spears, so both armies drew their swords, and fought it out hand to hand, and during this struggle the positions of the men were indistinguishable on both sides, and they fought at random, the men being intermixed with one another, and jumbled together because of the narrowness of space; while the shouts of the combatants fell on the ear in an indistinct manner because they were so loud. And great slaughter was now made on both sides, and the combatants trod upon the bodies and armour of those that had fallen, and crushed them to pieces. And to which ever side the battle inclined, those that were victorious encouraged one another, and those that were beaten made great lamentation; but there was no room for flight or pursuit, but doubtful phases and changes succeeded one another, as the armies were intermixed. And those that were in the front ranks were under the necessity of killing or being killed, without any chance of escape ; for those on both sides that were behind forced those before them to go on, without leaving any space between the armies. But as the Jews' ardour was too much for the Romans' skill, and the whole Roman line was beginning already to give way (for the fight had lasted from the ninth hour of the night till the seventh hour of the day), and the Jews came on en masse, and had the danger of capture as an incitement to valour, whereas the Romans had here only a part of their army (for those legions on which their soldiers relied had not yet come up) it was thought by the Romans sufficient at present to occupy the tower of Antonia.

§ 8. But one Julian, a centurion that came from Bithynia,<sup>1</sup> a man of great reputation, and the most excellent of all whom I observed in the war for skill in arms, strength of body, and courage of soul, seeing the Romans giving ground and making a feeble defence (for he stood near Titus at the tower of Antonia), rushed forward and himself alone put the Jews to flight, when they were already conquerors, and made them retire as far as the corner of the inner part of the temple. For the Jews fled from him en masse, supposing that neither his strength nor daring could be those of a mere man. And he rushed through the midst of the Jews, as they all fled pell mell, some in one direction some in another, and killed those that he came up with ; nor, indeed, was there any sight that appeared more wonderful in the eyes of Titus, or more terrible to the others, than this. However, he was himself pursued by fate, which it was not possible for him, who was but a mortal man, to escape ; for as he had shoes full of thick and sharp nails. as had every one of the other soldiers, while he was running on the pavement of the temple, he slipped, and fell down upon his back with a very great noise, which was made by his armour. This made those that were running away turn back ; whereupon those Romans that were in the tower of Antonia set up a great shout, as they were in fear for the man, but the Jews crowded round him en masse, and struck at him with their spears and swords on all sides. And he received a great many of the strokes of these iron weapons on his shield, and often attempted to get up, but was kept down by those that struck at him; yet did he, as he lay on the ground, stab many with his sword. Nor was he soon killed, as he was covered with his helmet and breastplate in all those parts of his body where he could be mortally wounded; he also pulled his neck close to his body, till all his other limbs being hacked about, and nobody daring to come to defend him, he yielded to his fate. Now Titus was deeply affected at this man of such great bravery being killed in the sight of so many people: and wished himself to come to his assistance, but the place gave him no chance, and such as might have done so were too much terrified to attempt it. So, when Julian had struggled with death a great while, and had let but few of those that had given him his mortal wounds go off unhurt, he at last had his throat cut, though not without difficulty, and left behind him a very great fame, not only with the Romans and Titus himself, but with his enemies also. But the Jews snatched up his dead body, and put the Romans to flight again, and shut them up in the tower of Antonia. Now those that most distinguished themselves, and fought most bravely in this battle on the Jewish side, were one Alexas and Gyphthæus of John's party, and of Simon's party Malachias and Judas the son of Merto, and James the son of Sosas, the commander of the Idumæans; and of the Zealots two brothers, Simon and Judes, the sons of Arus.

CHAP. II.

How Titus gave Orders to demolish the Tower of Antonia, and commanded Josephus to urge the Jews again to surrender.

§ 1.

AND now Titus gave orders to his soldiers that were with him to rase to the ground the foundations of the tower of Antonia, and make an easy ascent for all his army; and himself had Josephus brought to him (for he had been informed that on that very day, which was the seventeenth day of Panemus,<sup>1</sup> the sacrifice called the continual sacrifice had not been offered to God for want of men to offer it, and that the people were grievously dejected at this), and commanded him to say the same things to John that he had said before, namely, that if he had any evil inclination for fighting, he might come out to fight with as many men as he pleased, without destroying either city or temple; but he desired he would not any longer defile the temple, nor offend against God. He added that the sacrifices which had been discontinued might be offered up by any of the Jews whom he should choose. And Josephus stood in a place where he might be heard, not by John only, but by many more, and then gave them the message of Titus in the Hebrew language, and earnestly prayed them to spare their city, and to prevent that fire which was just ready to seize upon the sanctuary, and to offer their usual sacrifices to God therein. At these words of his a great sadness and silence were observed among the people, but the tyrant<sup>2</sup> cast many reproaches and imprecations upon Josephus, and at last added that he did not fear the taking of the city, because it was God's own city. Then Josephus cried out with a loud voice, "Certainly you have kept this city pure for God! the sanctuary also continues unpolluted! Nor have you been guilty of any impiety against him for whose assistance you hope! He still receives the accustomed sacrifices! Vilest wretch, if any one should deprive you of your daily food, you would esteem him an enemy, yet do you hope to have for your supporter in this war that God whom you have deprived of his everlasting worship? And do you impute your sins to the Romans, who to this very time take care to have our laws observed, and almost compel those sacrifices to be still offered to God, which have by you been intermitted? Who is there that would not groan and lament at the amazing change in regard to this city, that foreigners and enemies do now correct your impiety, while you, who are a Jew, and were educated in our laws, are become a bitterer enemy to them than they are? But, John, it is never dishonourable to repent, and turn from what is bad, even at the last extremity, and you have a good example before you, if you desire to save the city, in Jechoniah, the king of the Jews, who, when the king of Babylon made war against him in old days, did of his own accord go out of the city before it was taken, and did undergo a voluntary captivity with his family, that this sanctuary might not be delivered up to the enemy, and that he might not see the house of God set on fire: on which account he is celebrated among all the Jews in their sacred memorials, and his memory is become immortal, and will be handed down fresh to posterity through all ages. This, John, is an excellent example, even if danger be involved. But I promise that the Romans will forgive you. And remember that I, who advise you thus, am one of your own nation; I, who promise you this, am a Jew; and it is right to consider who gives advice and where it comes from. For while I am alive may I never be such a slave as to forego my own kindred, or forget the laws of our forefathers. You are indignant at me again, and make a clamour at me, and reproach me, and I cannot deny that I am worthy of worse treatment than this, because I advise you thus in opposition to fate, and endeavour strongly to save those whom God has condemned. And who does not know the writings of the ancient prophets, and particularly the oracle which is just now going to be fulfilled upon this unhappy city? For they foretold that this city should be taken when somebody should begin the slaughter of his fellow-countrymen. And are not both the city and the entire temple now full of the dead bodies of your fellow-countrymen? It is God therefore, it is God himself, who in concert with the Romans is bringing fire to purge the city and temple, and is going to root up this city, which is full of so many pollutions."

§ 2. As Josephus spoke these words with groans and tears, his voice was broken by sobs. And the Romans pitied his emotion and admired his good intention; but John and his party were only the more exasperated against the Romans, and desired to get Josephus also into their power. But his speech influenced many of the better sort. And some only stayed where they were, because they were afraid of the guards set by the seditious, though they were satisfied that both they and the city were doomed to destruction. Some also watched for a convenient opportunity to get quietly away, and fled to the Romans, among whom were the high priests Joseph and Jesus, and of the sons of the high priests, three of the sons of Ishmael, who was beheaded in Cyrene,<sup>1</sup> and four sons of Matthias, as also one son of the other Matthias, who ran away after his father's death, for his father was slain by Simon the son of Gioras, with three of his sons, as I have already related; many other noble men also went over to the Romans with the high priests. And Titus not only received these men very kindly in other respects, but also, knowing they would not willingly live after the customs of other nations, sent them to Gophna,<sup>2</sup> and desired them to remain there for the present, and told them, that when he had finished the war, he would restore their possessions again to each of them at his leisure. So they gladly retired to the small city which was allotted them, without fear of any danger; but as they were not seen again, the seditious spread it abroad again that deserters were slain by the Romans, which they did of course to deter the rest from running away from fear of the same treatment. This trick of theirs succeeded for a while as before; for others were deterred from deserting by fear of the same treatment.

§ 3. So Titus recalled these men from Gophna, and bade them go round the walls with Josephus, and show themselves to the people, upon which a very great many fled to the Romans. They also assembled en masse, and standing before the Romans, besought the seditious with lamentations and tears first to receive the Romans into the city while it was entire, and save their country again, and if not, at least to depart out of the temple, and save the holy house for them; for the Romans would not venture to set the sanctuary on fire except on the most pressing necessity. But the seditious were only the more obstinate in their opposition, and cast loud reproaches upon these deserters, and also mounted their engines for throwing darts and bolts and stones upon the sacred gates of the temple at due distances from one another, so that all the space round the temple was like a cemetery, so great was the number of dead bodies therein, and the holy house itself was like a citadel. For they rushed into the Holy and Holy of Holies in their armour, while their hands were yet warm with the blood of their fellow-countrymen, nay, they proceeded to such great lawlessness, that the Romans had now against the Jews the very same indignation, for their impiety in regard to their own religious customs, that the Jews would naturally have had against the Romans, had they been guilty of such abuses against them. Indeed, there were none of the Roman soldiers who did not look with awe at the holy house, and adore it, and wish that the robbers would repent before their sufferings were past remedy.

§ 4. Now Titus was deeply affected with this state of things, and again reproached John and his party, and said to them, "Did not you, vilest of wretches, put up a wall of partition before your Holy of Holies? Did you not put up pillars in the temple at due distances, and engrave on them in Greek and Roman letters the order that no one should go beyond that wall? And did we not give you leave to kill any that went beyond it, even though he were a Roman? And what do you do now, accursed wretches? Why do you trample upon dead bodies in the temple? and why do you pollute this holy house with the blood of both foreigners and Jews themselves? I appeal to the gods of my own country, and to every god that ever had any regard to this place (for I do not suppose it is now regarded by any of them); I also appeal to my own army, and to those Jews that are now with me, and even to yourselves, that I do not force you to defile your sanctuary; and if you will but change your battle-ground, no Roman shall either come near your sanctuary, or offer any affront to it. Nay, I will endeavour to preserve to you your holy house, whether you will or not."

§ 5. When Josephus was the spokesman of these words of

Titus, both the robbers and the tyrant<sup>1</sup> thought that this exhortation proceeded from Titus' fear, and not from his good-will, and treated it with contempt. And as Titus saw that these men were neither to be moved by pity for themselves, nor had any concern about the holy house being spared, he proceeded unwillingly to war again. He could not indeed lead all his army against them, the space was so narrow, but choosing thirty of the most valiant soldiers out of every hundred, and committing a thousand to each tribune, and making Cerealis the commander in chief, he gave orders that they should attack the garrison of the Jews about the ninth hour that night. And when he was now in his armour, and intending to go down with them, he was stopped by his friends because of the greatness of the danger, and by the remarks of the commanders; for they said that he would do more by sitting in the tower of Antonia, as a dispenser of rewards to those soldiers that distinguished themselves in the fight, than by coming down, and hazarding his own person in the front; for they would all fight stoutly while Titus looked on. To this Titus hearkened, and said that the only reason which made him listen to the soldiers was that he might so be able to judge of their valour, and that no brave soldier might be unnoticed and lose his reward, and that no cowardly soldier might go unpunished; but that he might himself be a spectator and eye-witness of all that was done, who was to be the disposer of punishments and rewards. So he sent the soldiers about their work at the forementioned hour, and went himself to a watch-tower in the tower of Antonia, and there waited with impatience to see the event.

§ 6. However, the soldiers that were sent did not find the garrison asleep, as they hoped to have done, but were obliged to engage with them immediately, as they rushed upon them with a great shout. And as soon as the rest heard the shout of those that were upon the watch, they sallied out upon them en masse. And the Romans received the onset of those that came first upon them, but those that followed them fell upon their own troops, and many of them treated their own soldiers as if they had been enemies. For the confused noise that was made on both sides hindered them from accurately distinguishing one another's voices, and the darkness of the night hindered them from distinguishing them by sight; besides that blindness which was inspired by passion in some, and by fear in others. So it was all one to the soldiers whom they struck at. However, this ignorance did less harm to the Romans than to the Jews, for they fought more shoulder to shoulder, and advanced in better order, and each of them remembered their watch-word: while the Jews were perpetually scattered about, and made their attacks and retreats at random, and frequently seemed to one another to be enemies; for every one of them received those of their own men that came back in the dark as Romans who were attacking them. And so more of them were wounded by their own men than by the enemy, till, upon the coming of day, the nature of the fight was henceforth discerned by the eye; they then stood in line of battle, and regularly cast their darts and defended themselves. Nor did either side yield or grow weary. The Romans vied with each other who should fight the most energetically, both single men and entire regiments, as being under the eye of Titus, and every one concluded that this day would be the beginning of his promotion, if he fought bravely; while the great encouragements which the Jews had to act vigorously were their fear for themselves and for the temple, and the presence of their tyrant,<sup>1</sup> who urged on some, and scourged and threatened others. Now it so happened that this fight was for the most part a stationary one, as the soldiers had to manœuvre in small space and quickly; for there was no great space of ground for either party for flight or pursuit. And at every phase of the battle there was an appropriate cry raised by the Romans from the tower of Antonia, who loudly cried out to their own men to press on courageously, when they were getting the best of it, and to stand their ground when they were retreating; so that here was a kind of theatre of war; for what was done in this fight could not be concealed either from Titus or from those that were with him. And this fight, which began at the ninth hour of the night, was not over till past the fifth hour of the day, and was fought on the same ground where the battle began, and neither party could say they had made the other retire, but both armies left the victory in uncertainty between them. Now those that distinguished themselves on the Roman side were a great many, but on the Jewish side, of those that were with Simon, Judas the son of Merto, and Simon the son of Josias; and of the Idumæans, James and Simon, the latter of whom was the son of Cathlas, as James was the son of Sosas; and of those that were with John, Gyphæus and Alexas; and of the Zealots, Simon the son of Arus.

§ 7. Meantime, the rest of the Roman army had, in seven days' time, overthrown the foundations of the tower of Antonia, and had made ready a broad way up to the temple. Then did the legions come near the first wall, and began to raise their earthworks, one opposite the north-west corner of the inner temple, another at the hall facing north which was between the two gates; and of the other two, one was at the western portico of the outer temple, the other outside opposite the northern portico. However, these works were not thus far advanced by the Romans without great pains and difficulty, particularly as they were obliged to bring their materials from the distance of a hundred furlongs. They were still further injured sometimes by ambushes, being over-secure because of their frequent victories, and finding the Jews over-bold from their despair of safety. For when some of their horsemen, when they went out to gather wood or hay, let their horses feed without having their bridles on, while they were foraging, the Jews sallied out en masse, and carried them off. And as this was continually being done, and Titus believed, what was indeed the truth, that the horses were stolen more from the negligence of his own men than the valour of the Jews, he determined to use great severity to force the rest to take care of their horses; so he commanded that one of those soldiers who lost their horses was to be put to death, whereby he so terrified the rest, that they took care of their horses for the time to come. For they did not any longer let them graze about, but as if they were joined to them, went always with them when they wanted necessaries. And the Romans still continued to besiege the temple, and to raise their earthworks.

§ 8. Now the day after the Romans had ascended the breach, many of the seditious were so pressed by famine, as plunder now failed them, that they gathered together and made an attack on those Roman guards that were upon the Mount of Olives, about the eleventh hour of the day, supposing first that they would not expect an attack, and next that they were then taking care of their bodies, and that therefore they would very easily cut their way through them. But the Romans were apprized beforehand of their coming to attack them, and quickly ran up from the neighbouring camps, and prevented them from getting over their fortifications, and breaking through and forcing their lines. Upon this came on a sharp fight, and here many great actions were performed on both sides; for the Romans showed both their strength and skill in war, and the Jews rushed at them with headlong impetuosity and intolerable passion. The former were urged on by shame, and the latter by necessity; for it seemed very disgraceful for the Romans to let the Jews go, now they were taken in a kind of net, while the Jews had but one hope of safety, and that was if they could by violence break through the Roman lines. And when the Jews were already routed and driven down the ravine, a trooper, whose name was Pedanius, spurred his horse on their flank with great vehemence, and caught up a certain young man belonging to the enemy by his ancle, as he was running away, and a man too of a robust body and in his armour; so low did Pedanius bend himself down from his horse even as it was galloping, and so great was the strength of his right hand, as of the rest of his body, and so skilful was he in horsemanship. So he seized this man as a treasure, and carried him off captive to Titus. Thereupon Titus admired the man that had seized the other for his great strength, and ordered the man that was captured to be punished for his attempt on the Roman lines, and himself went on with the siege of the temple, and the raising of the earthworks.

§ 9. Meantime the Jews were so distressed by their various fights, as the war ever mounted higher and higher, and crept up to the holy house, that they cut off as it were those limbs of their body which were infected, in order to prevent the distemper spreading further. For they set on fire the north-west portico, which was joined to the tower of Antonia, and afterwards broke off about twenty cubits, and so with their own hands made a beginning of burning the sanctuary. And two days after, on the twenty-fourth day of the forenamed month,<sup>1</sup> the Romans set fire to the next portico, when the fire went fifteen cubits further. The Jews, in like manner, cut off the roof, nor did they at all desist from their work till the tower of Antonia was disconnected from the temple, even though it was in their power to have stopped the fire. But they were inactive when the temple was first set on fire, and deemed this spreading of the fire to be for their advantage. And both armies kept still fighting against one another in the neighbourhood of the temple, and the war was full of continual sallies against one another by turns.

§ 10. Now there was at this time a man among the Jews, of low stature and despicable appearance, and of no note either as to his family or in other respects, whose name was Jonathan. He went out near the high priest John's tomb,<sup>2</sup> and uttered many other insolent things to the Romans, and challenged the best of them to single combat. But most of those in the Roman army disdained him, and some (as well they might be) were afraid of him. Some also reasoned justly enough that it was not wise to fight with a man that desired to die, because those that utterly despaired of safety had besides other things a headlong impetuosity in attack, and had no regard to God; and to hazard oneself against persons, whom to overcome was no great matter, and by whom to be beaten was dangerous and disgraceful, was a proof not of courage but temerity. Now as nobody came out to accept this man's challenge, and the Jew twitted them with a great number of reproaches as cowards (for he was a very bragging fellow himself, and a great despiser of the Romans), a trooper whose name was Pudens, disgusted at the other's words and impudence (and perhaps inadvisedly elated at the other's lowness of stature), ran out to him, and was too much for him in other respects, but was betrayed by fortune. For he fell down, and as he was down, Jonathan came running to him, and cut his throat, and then standing upon his dead body, brandished his sword, bloody as it was, and shook his shield with his left hand, and shouted loudly to his own army, and insulted over the dead man, and jeered at the Romans who were looking on, till one Priscus, a centurion, shot a dart at him, as he was leaping about and playing the fool, and pierced him through: upon which a shout was set up both by the Jews and Romans, though from different motives. And Jonathan swooned away from the pain of his wound, and fell down upon the body of his adversary, showing the very quick vengeance that can come upon men that have success in war without deserving the same.

CHAP. III.

Concerning a Stratagem that was devised by the Jews, by which they burnt many of the Romans, with a Description of the terrible Famine that was in the City.

§ 1.

AND now the seditious that were in the temple openly endeavoured every day to beat off the soldiers who were upon the earthworks, and on the twenty-seventh day of the forenamed month<sup>1</sup> contrived the following stratagem. They filled that part of the western portico, which was between the beams and the roof underneath, with dry wood, as also with bitumen and pitch, and then retired from the place, as though they were quite exhausted with the pains they had taken. At this proceeding on their part many of the inconsiderate among the Romans, who were carried away by their impetuosity, followed hard after them as they were retiring, and applied ladders to the portico, and jumped upon it, but the more prudent of them, thinking this unaccountable retreat of the Jews suspicious, remained where they were. However, the portico was full of those that had mounted on it, and meantime the Jews set it all on fire. And as the flames burst out suddenly from all sides, the Romans that were out of danger were seized with very great consternation, as those that were in the midst of danger were in the utmost distress. And when they perceived themselves surrounded with the flames, some of them threw themselves down headlong backwards into the city, and others among their enemies, and many in hope of safety leaped down among their own men, and broke their limbs, but most of those that were going to take these violent steps were prevented by the fire, but some anticipated the fire by their own swords. However, the fire soon so spread as to surround immediately those who would have otherwise perished. As for Titus, he could not but pity those that thus perished, since there was no way of bringing them any relief, although he was angry with them for going up there without orders. Yet was it some comfort to those who perished that they saw him grieve for whose sake they were lavish of their lives; for he was visible crying out to them, and leaping up, and exhorting those that were about him to do their utmost to relieve them. So every one of them died cheerfully, carrying off with them the words and grief of Titus as a splendid epitaph. Some indeed retired to the wall of the portico, which was broad, and so got safe out of the fire, but were then surrounded by the Jews, and although they resisted for a long time, yet were they wounded by them, and at last all fell.

§ 2. Finally a young man among them, whose name was Longus, threw a lustre on all this tragedy, and while every one of them that perished was worthy of a memorial, this man appeared the bravest of them all; and the Jews admired him for his courage, and were also unable to kill him, so they urged him to come down to them, upon security being given him for his life; but Cornelius his brother besought him, on the contrary, not to tarnish his own glory, nor that of the Roman army. He listened to him, and lifted up his sword in the presence of both armies, and slew himself. But one Sertorius among those surrounded by the fire escaped by his cleverness. For when he had with a loud voice called Lucius, one of his fellow-soldiers that lay in the same tent, he said to him, "I leave thee heir of all I have, if thou wilt come and receive me. Upon this he came running to receive him readily, and Sertorius threw himself down upon him, and saved his own life, while he that received him was dashed so violently against the pavement by the other's weight, that he died immediately. This tragedy made the Romans dejected for a while, but yet it made them more upon their guard for the future, and was of advantage to them against the treachery of the Jews, by which they were greatly damaged through their ignorance of the localities, and through the nature of the inhabitants. Now this portico was burnt down as far as John's tower, which he had built in the war he made against Simon over the gates that led to the Xystus.<sup>1</sup> The Jews also cut off the rest of that portico, after they had slain those that had got upon it. And the next day the Romans burnt down the north portico entirely as far as the east portico, whose connecting angle was built over the ravine that was called Cedron, so that the depth was frightful. Such was the state of the temple at this time.

§ 3. Now the number of those that perished by famine in the city was prodigious; and the miseries they underwent were unspeakable; for if so much as the shadow of any kind of food anywhere appeared in any house, a fight ensued, and the dearest friends fell to contending with one another for it, snatching from each other the wretched supports of life, Nor would men believe that those who were dying had no food, but the robbers would search them even when they were expiring, lest any one should have concealed food in his bosom and counterfeited death. And the robbers themselves gaped for want, and ran about staggering like mad dogs, and reeling against the doors of houses like drunken men, and would also in their dire distress rush into the same houses two or three times in one hour. And their hunger was so intolerable, that it obliged them to chew every thing, and they picked up such things as the filthiest animals would not touch, and actually eat them. Nor did they at last abstain from girdles and shoes, and pulled off and gnawed the very leather which belonged to their shields. And wisps of old hay became food to some, and some gathered up fibres, and sold a very small weight of them for four Attic [drachmæ]. But why need I describe the shamelessness that the famine brought on men in eating inanimate things? For I am going to relate a fact such as no history records either among Greeks or Barbarians, horrible to speak of it, and incredible when heard. I would indeed have willingly omitted this tragic story, that I might not seem to be merely telling marvels to posterity, but that I have innumerable witnesses to it of my contemporaries. Besides, my country would have little reason to thank me for suppressing the miseries that she underwent at this time.

§ 4. There was a certain woman that dwelt beyond the Jordan, whose name was Mary, and her father was Eleazar, of the village of Bethesob<sup>1</sup> (which signifies the House of Hyssop). She was eminent for her family and wealth, and had fled to Jerusalem with the rest of the community, and was besieged with them at this time. All the other effects that she had brought with her from Peræa,<sup>2</sup> and removed to the city, had been seized upon by the tyrants, and any scraps that she had treasured up besides, as also any food that she had contrived to save, had been also carried off by the rapacious guards, who came every day running to her house. This greatly provoked the poor woman, and from the frequent reproaches and imprecations she cast at these robbers, she incensed them to anger against her. But as none of them either in rage or pity would take away her life, and if she found any food, she perceived her labours were for others, and it was now become almost hopeless for her to find any, and the famine pierced through her very bowels and marrow, her passion was fired to a degree beyond the famine itself, nor did she take any counsellor but her rage and the necessity she was in. So she proceeded to a most unnatural thing, and, snatching up her son, who was a child sucking at her breast, she exclaimed, "O thou miserable infant! for whom shall I preserve thee in war, famine, and sedition? As to the Romans, even if they preserve our lives, we must be slaves; but the famine will anticipate that slavery, yet are these seditious persons more terrible than both the other plagues. So be thou my food, and be thou a fury to these seditious persons, and a by-word to the world, which is all that is now wanting to complete the calamities of us Jews." As soon as she had said this, she slew her son, and then roasted him, and eat half of him, and kept the rest by her concealed. And straight-way the seditious came in, and smelling the scent of this uncanny food, threatened to cut her throat immediately, if she did not show them the food she had dressed. She replied that she had saved a very fine portion of it for them, and uncovered what was left of her son. There-upon they were seized with horror and amazement of mind, and their blood ran cold at the sight. And she said to them, "This is mine own son, and this is my doing. Come, eat of this food, for I have eaten of it myself, and be not more tender than a woman, or more compassionate than a mother. But if you are too scrupulous, and abhor my sacrifice, as I have eaten half, let the rest be reserved for me also." At this they went out trembling, being cowards at this sight alone, and with some difficulty prevailed on themselves to leave the rest of that meat to the mother. And the whole city was full of this horrid action immediately, and as every body considered this miserable case before their eyes, they shuddered, as if this unheard-of action had been done by themselves. And those that were thus distressed by the famine were very desirous to die, and those already dead were esteemed happy, because they had not lived long enough either to hear or see such miseries.

§ 5. This tragic story soon spread among the Romans, some of whom hardly believed it, and others felt intense pity, but most were excited by it to a more bitter hatred than before against our nation. As for Titus, he excused himself before God as to this matter, and said, that for his part he had offered peace and liberty to the Jews, as well as amnesty for all their former audacity, but that they instead of concord had chosen sedition, and instead of peace war, and before satiety and abundance famine, and had begun with their own hands to burn down the temple, which the Romans had preserved hitherto, and so they deserved to eat such food as this. However, this horrid action of eating a child ought (he said) to be covered by the overthrow of their country, and men ought not to leave such a city upon the earth to be seen by the sun, where mothers were thus fed; although such food was fitter for the fathers than for the mothers, since it was they that continued still in a state of war, even after such miseries as these. At the same time that he said this, he reflected on the desperate condition these men must be in, for they would hardly ever be likely to come to their senses, who had endured all kinds of sufferings, when they need not by repenting have suffered at all.

CHAP. IV.

The Earthworks being completed, and the Battering-rams brought up, to no purpose, Titus gives orders to set fire to the Gates of the Temple; in no long time after which the Holy House itself is burnt down against his Wish.

§ 1.

AND now two of the legions had completed their earthworks on the eighth day of the month Lous, whereupon Titus gave orders that the battering-rams should be applied to the western hall of the inner temple. For before they were brought up, the strongest of all the siege-engines had been incessantly applied to the walls for six days without making any impression upon them; but the great size and excellent masonry of the stones was too much for those and for these also. And some of the Romans undermined the foundations of the northern gate, and after a world of pains removed the outermost stones; but the gate was upheld by the inner stones, and continued in its position, till the workmen, despairing of all attempts by battering-rams and crowbars, brought up ladders to the porticoes. Now the Jews did not interrupt them in so doing, but when they had got on these ladders, they fell upon them, and fought with them, and some they thrust down, and threw back headlong, and others they met and slew. They also struck and slew with their swords many that were getting off the ladders before they could protect themselves with their shields, nay, some of the ladders, when they were full of armed men, they tipped over and threw down from above. And no small slaughter was made of the Jews also. Those Romans that bore the standards fought especially hard for them, deeming it a terrible thing, that would tend to their great shame, if they permitted them to be seized by the enemy. But the Jews at last got possession of those standards, and slew those that had gone up the ladders, while the rest were so cowed by the fate of those who had been slain that they retired. Now none of the Romans died without having slain some of his foes first; and of the seditious, those that had fought bravely in the former battles did the like now, as also did Eleazar, the nephew of Simon the tyrant. But when Titus perceived that his endeavours to spare a foreign temple turned to the damage of his soldiers, and got them killed, he gave orders to set the gates on fire.

§ 2. Meantime there deserted to him Ananus of Emmaus,<sup>1</sup> the most bloody of all Simon's body-guards, and Archelaus, the son of Magadatus, who hoped to be forgiven, because they deserted at a time when the Jews were victorious. Titus accused these men of this as a cunning trick, and as he had been informed of all their barbarity to the Jews, he had a great mind to have them both put to death, for he said that they were only driven to this desertion by necessity, and had not come there from choice, and that they did not deserve to be saved alive who now hurried away from their own city which was already on fire owing to them. However, the security he had promised deserters overcame his resentment, and he dismissed them accordingly, though he did not put them in the same rank that he had placed others. And now the soldiers had already put fire to the gates, and the silver melting quickly made the flames spread to the wood-work, whence the flames continually extended till they reached the porticoes. Upon the Jews seeing this fire all about them, their spirits sunk together with their bodies, and they were in such a panic that not one of them attempted either to defend himself or to quench the fire, but they stood as mute spectators. However, they did not so grieve at the loss of what was now burning, as to grow wiser for the time to come, but they whetted their passion against the Romans, as though the sanctuary itself was on fire already. This fire prevailed during that day and the following night; for the soldiers were not able to burn the porticoes all together at one time, but only partially.

§ 3. The next day, Titus commanded part of his army to quench the fire, and to make a road for the more easy marching up of the legions, while he himself summoned the commanders together. And when the six principal ones were assembled together, namely, Tiberius Alexander, the general of the whole army, and Sextus Cerealis, the commander of the fifth legion, and Larcus Lepidus, the commander of the tenth legion, and Titus Phrygius, the commander of the fifteenth legion, and Liternius Fronto, the leader of the two legions that came from Alexandria, and Marcus Antonius Julianus, the procurator of Judæa, and after them the rest of the procurators and tribunes, Titus asked for their advice about the temple. Now some thought it would be best to act according to the rules of war [and demolish it], for the Jews would never leave off rebelling while the temple was standing, where they all used to congregate from all quarters. Others were of opinion, that if the Jews would leave it, and cease to make it their arsenal, they might save it, but if the Jews fought from it any more, they must burn it; for it must then be looked upon not as a temple but as a citadel; and the impiety of burning it would belong to those that forced this to be done, and not to them. But Titus said, that even if the Jews did get upon the temple and fight them from thence, yet they ought not to avenge themselves on inanimate things instead of on men, nor ought they in any case to burn down such a work as that; for that would be a loss to the Romans themselves, as it would be an ornament to their empire as long as it continued. And Fronto and Alexander and Cerealis confidently agreed with the opinion of Titus. Then Titus broke up the meeting, when he had first given orders to the commanders that their other forces should rest, that they might be more vigorous in action, but that picked men from the cohorts should make their way through the ruins, and quench the fire.

§ 4. On that day the Jews were so weary, and in such a panic, that they refrained from any attacks: but on the next day they gathered their whole force together, and very boldly sallied forth through the east gate upon those that guarded the outer part of the temple, about the second hour of the day. And they received their attack with great bravery, and by covering themselves with their shields in front closed in their ranks like a wall, but it was evident they could not stand their ground very long, but would be overcome by the numbers and passion of those that sallied out upon them. So Titus, seeing from the tower of Antonia that these troops would be likely to give way, sent some picked cavalry to reinforce them. Thereupon the Jews were not able to sustain their onset, and upon the slaughter of those in the front, most of the rest were put to flight. But as the Romans retired, the Jews turned back upon them, and pressed upon them, but when the Romans wheeled round, they retreated again, until about the fifth hour of the day they were beaten and shut themselves up inside the temple.

§ 5. Then Titus retired again to the tower of Antonia, and resolved to invest and storm the temple the next day early in the morning with his whole army. As for it, God had certainly long ago doomed it to the fire, and now the fated day had come round in the revolution of ages, namely the tenth day of the month Lous, upon which it was formerly burnt by the king of Babylon. Howbeit, these flames took their rise from the Jews themselves, and were occasioned by them. For upon Titus' retiring, the sedition were quiet for a little while, and then attacked the Romans again, when those that guarded the sanctuary fought with those that tried to quench the fire that was burning the outside of the temple; but these Romans put the Jews to flight, and proceeded as far as the sanctuary. At this time one of the soldiers, without staying for any orders, and without any horror at so great a crime, being possessed by a certain weird fury, snatched a brand out of the wood that was on fire, and being lifted up by another soldier, set fire to a golden window, through which there was a passage to the rooms round the sanctuary on the north side. As the flames went upwards, the Jews made a great clamour worthy of so mighty an affliction, and ran up to prevent it; and now they were reckless of their lives, and spared not their strength at all, since that was perishing which they had long been fighting to protect.

§ 6. And now a certain person came running to Titus, and told him of this fire, as he was resting himself in his tent after the recent fight, and he leaped up in great haste as he was, and ran to the temple to put a stop to the fire; and all the commanders followed him, and the legions accompanied them in great agitation. And there was a great clamour and tumult raised, as was natural upon the disorderly movement of so great an army. Then Titus, both by calling to the soldiers that were fighting in a loud voice, and by giving a signal to them with his right hand, ordered them to quench the fire. But they did not hear what he said, though he spoke so loud, having their ears already dinned by a greater noise, nor did they attend to the signal he made with his hand either, as the attention of some of them was diverted by fighting, and of others by passion. As for the legions that came running up, neither any exhortation nor threatening could restrain their violence, but each one's passion was his leader; and as they jostled one another in the entrances into the temple, many of them were trampled on by one another, while a great number fell among the still hot and smoking ruins of the porticoes, and perished in the same miserable way as those whom they had conquered. And when they were near the sanctuary, they pretended not to have heard Titus' orders, and encouraged those that were before them to set it on fire. As for the seditious, they were in too great distress already to afford their assistance [towards quenching the fire], for they were everywhere slain, and everywhere beaten. As for most of the people, they were weak and without arms, and had their throats cut wherever they were taken, and a quantity of dead bodies lay heaped upon one another round about the altar, and at the steps going up to it ran a great quantity of blood, and the dead bodies also that were slain above slipped down.

§ 7. And now, as Titus was unable to restrain the fury of his enthusiastic soldiers, and the fire prevailed more and more, he went into the Holy of Holies with his generals, and saw it and what was in it, which he found to be far superior to the report of foreigners, and not inferior to what we ourselves boasted and thought of it. But as the flame had not as yet reached its inner parts, but was consuming the rooms round the sanctuary, Titus supposing, as was the case, that the sanctuary might yet be saved, rushed up, and endeavoured in person to persuade the soldiers to quench the fire, and gave orders to Liberalis the centurion to beat and keep back the soldiers that were refractory with the staves of the spearmen that were round him. But their passion overcame the regard they had for Titus, and the dread they had of him who forbade them, as also did their hatred of the Jews, and a certain vehement inclination to fight them. Moreover, the hope of plunder induced many to go on, as they thought that all the places within were full of money, and they saw that all round it was made of gold. And, besides, one of those that had entered the place anticipated Titus, when he rushed up to restrain the soldiers, and put fire under the hinges of the gate in the dark, and as the flame burst out from within immediately the generals retired with Titus, and nobody any longer forbade those that were without to set fire to the sanctuary. Thus was it burnt down against Titus' wish.

§ 8. Now, although one could not indeed but greatly lament the destruction of such a splendid pile as this was, since it was the most wonderful of all the works that we have seen or heard of, not only for its curious structure and size, but also for the vast cost of every part of it, and for the glorious reputation of its Holy of Holies, yet might such a one greatly comfort himself with the thought that it was fate that decreed it so to be, which neither living creatures nor works and places can avoid. However, one cannot but wonder at the exactness of the period. For the same month and day were now observed, as I said before, as that whereon the temple was burnt before by the Babylonians. Now the number of years that passed from its first building, commenced by king Solomon, till this destruction of it, which happened in the second year of the reign of Vespasian, are inferred to be one thousand one hundred and thirty, besides seven months and fifteen days; and from the second building of it by Haggai, in the second year of Cyrus the king, till its destruction under Vespasian, there were six hundred and thirty-nine years and forty-five days.

CHAP. V.

The great Distress the Jews were in upon the Burning of the Temple. Concerning a false Prophet, and the Signs that preceded this Destruction.

§ 1.

WHILE the temple was on fire, every thing was plundered that came to hand, and ten thousand of those that were taken were slain: nor was there pity for any age, nor any regard paid to dignity, but children, and old men, and profane persons, and priests, were all slain in the same manner; so that this war pursued and included all sorts of men, as well those that made supplication for their lives as those that defended themselves by fighting. The flames also spread a long way and roared in unison with the groans of those that were slain, and because the hill was high, and the size of the burning pile so great, one would have thought the whole city had been on fire; nor could one imagine any thing either greater or more terrible than the noise. For there was at once the shouting of the Roman legions, who were all marching together, and the cries of the seditious, who were now surrounded with fire and sword, and the flight of the people that were left above in great panic to the enemy, and their wailing at their woes; and the people also in the city joined those that were upon the hill in this lamentation. Many also of those that were wasted away by famine, and their mouths almost closed, when they saw the sanctuary on fire, exerted their utmost strength, and broke out into groans and wailing again; and Peræa and the mountains round Jerusalem returned the echo, and augmented the hubbub. But the sufferings were more terrible than this uproar. For one would have thought that the hill itself, on which the temple stood, was seething hot from its base, so full of fire was it on every side, and that the blood was larger in quantity than the fire, and that those that were slain were more in number than those that slew them. For the ground was nowhere visible for the dead bodies that lay on it, and the soldiers went over heaps of those bodies as they pursued those who fled from them. And now the multitude of the robbers with some difficulty thrust back the Romans, and broke through their ranks into the outer temple, and thence into the city, while the remainder of the populace fled to the outer portico. As for the priests, some of them plucked off from the sanctuary the spikes that were upon it, and their bases which were made of lead, and shot them at the Romans as missiles. But as they gained nothing by so doing, and as the fire burst out upon them, they then retired to the wall, which was eight cubits broad, and there they stayed. However, two of eminence among them, who might have saved themselves by going over to the Romans, or have borne up with courage and shared the fortune of others, threw themselves into the fire, and were burnt with the temple, namely Meirus the son of Belgas, and Joseph the son of Dalæus.

§ 2. And now the Romans, as the temple was on fire, judging it idle to spare anything in its vicinity, burnt everything, as the remains of the porticoes, and the gates, two excepted, one on the east side, and the other on the south; both of which, however, they destroyed afterwards. They also burnt the treasuries, in which was an immense quantity of money, and an immense number of garments, and other precious things; indeed, to say all in a few words, the entire riches of the Jews were heaped up there, for the rich had built themselves store-chambers there. The soldiers also went to the remaining portico of the outer temple, where the women and children, and a very great mixed multitude of people had fled, in number about six thousand. And before Titus had determined any thing about these people, or given the commanders any orders relating to them, the soldiers, carried away by their rage, set the portico on fire; whereupon some of these persons were destroyed by throwing themselves down headlong to avoid the flames, and some were burnt in them. Nor did any out of so many escape. A false prophet was the cause of these people's destruction, who had made a public proclamation in the city that very day, that God commanded them to ascend up to the temple, and that they should there receive miraculous signs of their deliverance. Now many prophets were suborned by the tyrants at this time to impose on the people, who announced to them that they should wait for deliverance from God, and this was in order to keep them from deserting, and that they might be buoyed up above fear and care by such hopes. Now a man in adversity quickly listens to such comfort; and whenever a deceiver makes him believe that he shall be delivered from the miseries which oppress him, then the sufferer is full of hope.

§ 3. Thus were the miserable people led astray by these deceivers, who falsely said they were sent by God himself; while they did not attend nor give credit to the signs that were so evident and so plainly foretold their future desolation, but like men stupefied, without either eyes to see or mind to consider, did not regard the public intimations that God gave them. Thus there was a star resembling a sword, which stood over the city, and a comet that continued a whole year. And before the Jews' rebellion, and before those commotions which preceded the war, when the people were come in great crowds to the feast of Unleavened Bread, on the eighth day of the month Xanthicus, at the ninth hour of the night, so great a light shone round the altar and sanctuary, that it appeared to be bright day-light, and this light lasted for half an hour. This light seemed to be a good sign to the unskilful, but was interpreted by the sacred scribes to portend those events that immediately followed. At the same feast also an heifer, as she was led by the high priest to be sacrificed, brought forth a lamb in the midst of the temple. Moreover, the eastern gate of the inner temple, which was of brass and exceedingly heavy, and was with difficulty shut every evening by twenty men, and rested upon bars covered with iron, and had posts let down very deep into the firm floor, which consisted of one entire stone, was seen to open of its own accord about the sixth hour of the night. Thereupon those that kept watch in the temple ran to the captain of the temple, and told him of it, and he went up there, and was not able without great difficulty to shut it again. This also appeared to the ignorant to be a very happy omen, as if God did thereby open to them the gate of happiness; but the men of learning understood by it that the security of their temple was dissolved of its own accord, and that the gate opened for the advantage of their enemies, and they declared that the sign foreshowed the desolation that was coming upon them. Besides these, a few days after the feast, on the one and twentieth day of the month Artemisius, a certain marvellous and incredible phenomenon appeared. I suppose what I am going to tell would seem a fable, were it not related by those that saw it, and were not the sad events that followed it deserving of such signs. Before sunset chariots were seen in the air, and troops of soldiers in their armour running about among the clouds and besieging cities. Moreover, at the feast which is called Pentecost, as the priests were going by night into the inner temple, as their custom was, to perform their sacred ministrations, they said that first they felt a quaking, and heard a great noise, and after that they heard a sound as of a multitude saying, "Let us remove hence." But, what is still more terrible, there was one Jesus the son of Ananus, a rustic and one of the people, who, four years before the war began, and at a time when the city was in very great peace and prosperity, came to that feast wherein it is our custom for every one to make tabernacles to God in the temple, and began on a sudden to cry aloud, "A voice from the east, a voice from the west, a voice from the four winds, a voice against Jerusalem and the temple, a voice against bridegrooms and brides, and a voice against the whole people!" This he cried, as he went about by day and by night, in all the streets of the city. Now some of the most eminent of the people were very indignant at this ill-omened cry of his, and arrested the man, and gave him a great number of severe stripes. But he neither said any thing for himself, nor any thing privately to those who scourged him, but still went on uttering the same words as before. Thereupon the rulers, supposing, as the case proved to be, that the notion of the man proceeded from the Deity, brought him before the Roman procurator, where he was scourged till his bones were laid bare; yet did not he make any supplication for himself, nor shed any tears, but turning his voice to the most lamentable tone possible, at every stroke of the scourge his utterance was, "Woe to Jerusalem!" And when Albinus (who was then our procurator) asked him, "Who he was? and whence he came? and why he uttered these words?" he made no reply at all to this, but still did not leave off repeating his melancholy lament over the city, till Albinus saw that he was a madman, and let him go. Now, during all the time that passed before the war begun, this man did not go near any of the citizens, nor was he seen speaking, but every day he uttered these lamentable words, as if he were repeating a prayer, "Woe to Jerusalem!" Nor did he give ill words to any of those who beat him every day, nor good words to those who gave him food. But this was his one reply to all men, which was indeed no other than a melancholy presage of what was to come. This cry of his was loudest at the feasts, and he continued repeating it for seven years and five months, without growing hoarse, or being tired therewith, until the very time that he saw his presage fulfilled in earnest in our siege, when he stopped. For as he was going round upon the wall, he cried out in a loud voice, "Woe to the city again, and to the people, and to the temple!" And just as he added at last, "Woe to myself also!" there came a stone out of one of the engines, and struck him, and killed him immediately; and as he was still uttering the very same presages, he gave up the ghost.

§ 4. Now, if any one consider these things, he will find that God takes care of mankind, and in all ways foreshows our race what is for their safety, and that men perish by their own folly and self-chosen evils. For example, the Jews, by demolishing the tower of Antonia,<sup>1</sup> had made their temple square, though they had it written in their sacred oracles, that their city and sanctuary should be taken, when their temple should become square. But what most stirred them up to the war, was an ambiguous oracle that was found also in their sacred writings, that about that time one from their country should become ruler of the world. The Jews took this prediction to belong to themselves, and many wise men were thereby deceived in their judgment. Now, this oracle certainly denoted the rule of Vespasian, who was declared emperor in Judæa. However, it is not possible for men to avoid fate, although they see it beforehand. And these men interpreted some of these signs according to their own pleasure, and some of them they utterly despised, until their madness was shown both by the capture of their city and their own destruction.

How the Romans carried their Standards to the Temple, and made joyful Acclamations to Titus. The Speech that Titus made to the Jews when they begged for Mercy. What Reply they made, and how that Reply moved Titus' Indignation against them.

§ 1.

AND now the Romans, upon the flight of the seditious into the city, and upon the burning of the temple itself and of everything round it, brought their standards to the temple, and set them opposite its eastern gate, and there offered sacrifices to them, and hailed Titus as Emperor with the greatest acclamations of joy. And now all the soldiers had got by plunder such vast quantity of spoil, that in Syria a lump<sup>2</sup> of gold was sold for half its former value. As for the priests that remained still upon the wall of the sanctuary, a lad of theirs, because of the thirst he was in, begged some of the Roman guards to give him their right hand, and confessed he was very thirsty. These guards pitied his youth and distress, and gave him their right hands accordingly. So he came down himself, and drank some water, and filled the vessel he had with him when he came to them with water, and then went away and fled up to his own friends; nor could any of these guards overtake him, but they reproached him for his perfidiousness. To which he answered that he had not broken his agreement; for the security he had had given him was not about his staying with them, but only about his coming down and taking some water, both which things he had done, and therefore thought himself faithful to his engagement. Thereupon those whom the lad had imposed upon marvelled at his cunning because of his youth. On the fifth day afterwards the priests who were half starved came down, and when they were brought to Titus by the guards, begged for their lives. But he replied that the time of pardon was over for them, for the temple, for whose sake he could have reasonably spared them, was destroyed, and it was fitting that priests should perish with their temple. So he ordered them to be put to death.

§ 2. As for the tyrants themselves and those who sided with them, when they found that they were surrounded on every side, and, as it were, walled in without any chance of escape, they invited Titus to a colloquy. And such was the kindness of his nature, and desire to preserve the city from destruction, joined to the advice of his friends, who now thought the robbers were become more moderate, that he accepted this, and stood on the west side of the outer temple; for there were gates on that side above the Xystus, and a bridge connected the upper city with the temple,<sup>1</sup> which bridge lay between the tyrants and Titus. And the multitude was numerous on each side, the Jews round Simon and John, in suspense as to their hope of pardon, and the Romans round Titus, wondering how he would receive the supplication of the Jews. And Titus charged his soldiers to restrain their rage, and to let their darts alone, and placed an interpreter by his side, and began to speak first, which was a sign that he was the conqueror. "I hope, sirs, you are now satisfied with the miseries of your country, who had no conception either of our power or your own weakness, but in inconsiderate fury and madness have brought your people and city and temple to destruction, and will also yourselves rightly perish. Your nation has never left off rebelling since Pompey first conquered you, and since that time you have made open war upon the Romans! Have you relied on your numbers? Why, a very small part of the Roman soldiers has been strong enough for you. Have you relied on the fidelity of allies? Pray what nations outside our empire would prefer to assist Jews rather than Romans? Are your bodies stronger than ours? Nay, you know that the Germans themselves are our servants. Have you stronger walls than we have? Pray, what greater defence is there than the wall of the ocean, with which the Britons are surrounded, and yet they bow down before the arms of the Romans? Do you exceed us in stoutness of soul, and in the skill of your commanders? However, you know that we conquered even the Carthaginians. It can therefore be nothing but the humanity of the Romans that has excited you against them. For they, in the first place, gave you this land to possess, and, in the next place, set over you kings of your own nation, and, in the third place, preserved the laws of your forefathers to you, and also permitted you to live, either by yourselves or among others, as you pleased. And, what is our chief favour of all, we have given you leave to pay your tribute to God,<sup>1</sup> and to collect such other gifts as are dedicated to him, nor have we called those that offered these gifts to account, nor prohibited them, and the end has been that you have become only richer enemies, and have made preparations for war against us with our own money. Thus, after enjoying all these advantages, you turned your satiety against those that gave it you, and, like untamable serpents, spit your venom on those that treated you kindly. It is possible, indeed, that you might despise the easiness of Nero, and, like parts of the body fractured or ruptured, you quietly waited formerly, though with malicious intent, and have only now shown your true selves in the climax of the disease, and extended your desires to impudent and immense hopes. My father came to this country, not to punish you for what you had done under Cestius, but to admonish you. For had he come to overthrow your nation, he would have hastened at once to your fountain-head, and immediately sacked this city, whereas he ravaged Galilee and the neighbouring parts, and so gave you time for repentance. But that humanity of his you took as a sign of weakness, and nourished your audacity on our mildness. And when Nero was dead, you did as the wickedest wretches would have done, and encouraged yourselves to act against us because of our civil dissensions, and abused the time, when both I and my father were away in Egypt, in making preparations for this war. Nor were you ashamed to give trouble to those as emperors, whom you had found to be mild generals. For when the empire devolved upon us, and all other people were thereupon quiet, and foreign nations sent embassies and congratulated us on our accession, then did you Jews show yourselves again our enemies. You sent embassies to those of your own nation that were beyond the Euphrates, to assist you in raising disturbances, and you built new walls round your city, and seditions arose, and one tyrant contended against another, and a civil war broke out among you; things indeed such as became none but so wicked a people as you are. I then came to this city on a sad errand from my unwilling father; and when I heard that the people were disposed to peace, I rejoiced at it. I exhorted you to leave off your action before I began the war, I spared you even when you had fought against me a long while, I gave my right hand to deserters, I kept faith with those that fled to me, I had compassion on many of those that I had taken captive, I tortured those that were eager for war in order to restrain them, I unwillingly brought my engines of war against your walls, I always checked my soldiers when they were set upon your slaughter, and after every victory I invited you to peace, as though I had been myself the conquered party. When I came near your temple, I again willingly forgot the laws of war, and exhorted you to spare your own sanctuary, and to preserve your temple for yourselves, and allowed you a quiet exit out of it and pledged you your personal security, nay, if you had a mind, I gave you opportunity to fight on other ground. But you despised every one of my offers, and set fire to your temple with your own hands. And now, vilest of wretches, do you invite me to a colloquy? To what end would you save such a holy house as this was,<sup>1</sup> which is now destroyed? What safety can you now claim after the destruction of your temple? Yet you still stand at this very time in your armour, nor can you bring yourselves so much as to pretend to be suppliants even in your utmost extremity. O miserable creatures, what is it you depend on? are not your people dead? is not your temple burnt to the ground? is not your city in my power? and are not your very lives in my hands? and do you then deem it a proof of valour to be unwilling to die? However, I will not try to rival your madness. If you will throw down your arms, and deliver up your persons to me, I grant you your lives, and will act like a mild master of a family, punishing what cannot be healed, and preserving the rest for myself."

<sup>1</sup> Spanheim notes here, that the Romans used to permit the Jews to collect their sacred tribute, and send it to Jerusalem: of which we have had abundant evidence in Josephus already on other occasions.—W.

§ 3. To this offer of Titus they replied that they could not accept his right hand, because they had sworn never to do so, but they desired they might have leave of exit through the enemy's lines with their wives and children; for they would go into the desert and leave the city to him. At this Titus was very indignant, when they were in the case of men already taken captives, that they should offer their own terms to him, as if they had been conquerors. So he ordered proclamation to be made to them, that they were no more to come out to him as deserters, nor hope for any further offers of security, for he would henceforth spare nobody, but fight them with his whole army, and they might save themselves as well as they could; for he would from henceforth treat them with all the rigour of war. And he gave orders to the soldiers both to burn and plunder the city. And they did nothing indeed that day, but the next day they set fire to the archives, and Acra, and the council-house, and the place called Ophlas,<sup>1</sup> and the fire spread as far as the palace of queen Helena, which was in the middle of Acra. The streets also were burnt down, as were also the houses, which were full of the dead bodies of those who had died of famine.

§ 4. On the same day the sons and brothers of king Izates, together with many other prominent men of the people, assembled together there, and besought Titus to give them his right hand. And he, though he was very angry at all who were now left, did not change his character, but received these men. For the time indeed, he kept them all in custody, but bound the king's sons and kinsmen, and afterwards took them away with him to Rome, to be hostages for their country's fidelity to the Romans.

CHAP. VII.

What afterwards befell the Seditious, when they had done a great deal of Mischief, and suffered many Misfortunes; as also how Titus became Master of the Upper City.

§ 1.

AND now the seditious rushed to the royal palace,<sup>2</sup> into which many had put their effects, because it was so strong, and drove the Romans away from it. They also slew all the people that had crowded into it, who were in number about eight thousand four hundred, and plundered everything. They also took two Romans alive, one a horse-soldier, the other a foot-soldier. They cut the throat of the foot-soldier immediately, and dragged him through the whole city, as if revenging themselves upon all the Romans in this one person. But the horse-soldier said he had something to suggest to them for their safety, whereupon he was brought before Simon, but having nothing to say when he was there, he was handed over to Ardalis, one of the Jewish commanders, to be punished. And he bound his hands behind him, and put a bandage over his eyes, and then led him out opposite the Romans, intending to cut off his head. But he was too quick for this, and ran away to the Romans, while the Jewish executioner was drawing his sword. Now as he had got away from the enemy, Titus could not think of putting him to death, but he deemed him unworthy of being a Roman soldier any longer, because he had been taken alive by the enemy, so he took away his arms, and turned him out of the legion to which he belonged; which, to one that had a sense of shame, was a penalty severer than death itself.

§ 2. On the next day the Romans drove the robbers out of the lower city, and set all on fire as far as Siloam.<sup>1</sup> They were indeed glad to see the city destroyed, but they missed getting any plunder, because the seditious had carried off everything beforehand, and had retired into the upper city. For these last did not at all repent of the mischief they had done, but were insolent, as if they had done well. At any rate, when they saw the city on fire, they appeared cheerful, and put on joyful countenances in expectation, as they said, of death ending their miseries, for as the people were now slain, and the temple burnt down, and the city on fire, there was nothing further left for the enemy to do. However, even in this utmost extremity, Josephus did not grow weary of begging them to spare what was left of the city, but spoke largely to them about their barbarity and impiety, and gave them much advice tending to their safety, though he gained nothing more thereby than being laughed at by them. And as they would not hear of surrender because of the oath they had taken, and were not strong enough to fight against the Romans any longer upon equal terms, being a kind of prisoners already, yet were they so accustomed to kill people, that they could not restrain their right hands from doing so. So they dispersed themselves in front of the city, and laid ambush among its ruins, to catch those that attempted to desert to the Romans. And many were caught by them, and all slain (for they were too weak from want of food to flee away), and their dead bodies were thrown to the dogs. Now every kind of death was thought more endurable than famine, so that, though the Jews despaired of mercy, they would yet flee to the Romans, and would also of their own accord court death by falling upon the murdering insurgents. Nor was there any place in the city that had no dead bodies in it, but every place was full of those that were killed, either by the famine or the sedition.

§ 3. And now the last hope which comforted the tyrants and the robbers who were with them, was in the underground passages, into which if they once fled, they did not expect to be tracked out, but thought that, after the whole city should be destroyed, and the Romans gone away, they might come out again and escape. This was no better than a dream of theirs, for they were not destined to lie hid either from God or from the Romans. However, they relied on these underground passages, and set more places on fire than did the Romans themselves; and killed without mercy, and pillaged also, those that fled out of their burning houses into the underground passages, and if they discovered food belonging to any one, they seized upon it, and gulped it down all bloody as it was. They also now fought with one another about the plunder; and I cannot but think that, had not their destruction prevented it, their barbarity would have made them eat even dead bodies.

CHAP. VIII.

How Titus raised Earthworks round the Upper City, and when they were completed, gave orders that the Battering-rams should be brought up. He then became master of the whole City.

§ 1.

NOW when Titus perceived that the upper city was so precipitous that it could not possibly be taken without raising earthworks, he distributed this work among his troops on the twentieth day of the month Lous. Now the bringing up of wood was a difficult task, since all the trees, as I have already said, round the city for a hundred furlongs had been stripped bare already to make the former earthworks. The works raised by the four legions were erected on the west side of the city, opposite the royal palace, and the whole of the auxiliary troops and the rest of the soldiers erected their earthworks towards the Xystus, and the bridge, and that tower which Simon had built as a citadel for himself against John, when he was at war with him.<sup>1</sup>

§ 2. During these days the commanders of the Idumæans assembled together privately, and deliberated about surrender to the Romans, and sent five men to Titus, and entreated him to give them his right hand. And Titus, thinking that the tyrants would yield if the Idumæans, who played a great part in the war, were but once detached from them, after some delay complied with them, and gave them security for their lives, and sent the five men back. But as these Idumæans were preparing to depart, Simon perceived it, and immediately slew the five men that had gone to Titus, and arrested their commanders, of whom the most eminent was James, the son of Sosas, and put them in prison; but as for the rank and file of the Idumæans, who did not at all know what to do now their commanders were taken from them, he had them watched, and manned the walls with a more careful garrison. Yet could not that garrison stop desertion, for, although a great number of them were slain, the deserters were far more numerous. They were all received by the Romans, because Titus himself, owing to his clemency, grew negligent as to his former orders, and because the soldiers themselves grew weary of killing them, and hoped to get some money by sparing their lives. For they left only the populace, and sold the rest of the multitude with their wives and children, and every one of them at a very low price, because such as were sold were very many, and the buyers were few. And although Titus had made proclamation beforehand that no deserter should come alone by himself, that so they might bring out their families also with them, yet did he receive such as came alone also; however, he set over them such as were to decide if any of them deserved to be punished. And the number of those that were sold was immense, but more than forty thousand of the populace were saved alive, whom Titus allowed to go where each of them pleased.

§ 3. During the same days one of the priests, the son of Thebuthi, whose name was Jesus, upon his having security given him by the oath of Titus that he should be preserved, on condition that he would deliver up to him certain of the holy treasures, came out, and delivered up to him from the wall of the holy house two candlesticks, like those that lay in the holy house, and tables and bowls and vials, all made of solid gold and very heavy. He also delivered up to him the veils and vestments of the high-priests with the precious stones, and many other vessels that belonged to their sacred worship. The treasurer of the temple also, whose name was Phineas, was arrested, and showed Titus the cassocks and girdles of the priests, and much purple and scarlet, which were kept there to make the veils, as also a great deal of cinnamon and cassia, and a quantity of other spices, which used to be mixed together and burnt as incense to God every day. A great many other treasures were also delivered up by him, and not a few sacred ornaments, the delivery up to Titus of which things obtained for this man, though captured by force, the same pardon that was given to such as deserted.

§ 4. And now the earthworks were finished, which took eighteen days, on the seventh day of the month Gorpæus, and the Romans brought up their engines; and some of the seditious, already despairing of saving the city, retired from the wall to Acra; others hid themselves in the underground passages, though many of them stood their ground and defended themselves against those that brought up the battering-rams. But the Romans overcame them by their numbers and strength, and what was the principal thing of all, by going cheerfully about their work, while the Jews were already quite dejected and worn out. Now, as soon as part of the wall was battered down, and some of the towers yielded to the impression of the battering-rams, those that manned the wall fled, and a much greater terror fell upon the tyrants than the occasion required; for, before the enemy got over the breach they were numb with fear and keen for flight. And now now one might see those men, who had hitherto been so insolent and arrogant in their wicked practices, cast down and trembling, so that the change excited pity even for such vile persons. And although their idea now was to make a rush on the Roman lines, and to try to thrust back those that guarded them, and to break through and get away; yet, when they nowhere saw those who had formerly been faithful to them (for indeed they fled wherever necessity suggested), and when some came running up who told them that the western wall was entirely overthrown, while others said the Romans had got in, and others that they were near at hand and seeking for them, and others that they saw the enemy on the towers, fear made their eyes roll, and they fell upon their faces, and loudly lamented their own mad conduct, and their nerves were so terribly paralysed, that they could not even flee. And here one may chiefly see the power of God in the case of these wicked wretches, and the good fortune of the Romans. For these tyrants now wholly deprived themselves of the security they had, and came down of their own accord from those very towers, whereon they could have never been taken by force, but could only have succumbed to famine. Thus did the Romans, when they had taken such great pains about weaker walls, get by good fortune what they could never have got by their engines: for three of these towers, which I have spoken about before, were too strong for any siege-engines whatever.

§ 5. So now they left these towers, or rather were ejected from them by God himself, and fled forthwith to the ravine which was below Siloam. And they again recovered for a while from their panic, and rushed against the Roman lines on that side. But as their courage was too much depressed for them to make their attacks with sufficient vigour, and their strength was now broken with fear and reverses, they were repulsed by the guards, and dispersed from each other, and slunk down into the underground passages. And the Romans, being now masters of the walls, placed their standards upon the towers, and made joyful acclamations for the victory they had gained, having found the end of this war much less arduous than its beginning. For having got upon the last wall without any bloodshed, they could hardly believe their eyes, and seeing nobody to oppose them, stood in doubt what such an unusual solitude could mean. However, rushing into the streets of the city with their swords drawn, they slew those whom they met without mercy, and set fire to the houses into which the Jews had fled, and burnt every soul in them. And in their frequent search for plunder, whenever they came inside any houses to plunder them, they found in them entire families of dead men, and the bedrooms full of corpses of such as had died of famine. They then stood in horror at the sight, and went out without touching any thing. But although they pitied such as died in this manner, they did not feel the same pity for those that were still alive, but they ran everyone through whom they met, and blocked up the streets with dead bodies, and made the whole city run with blood, to such a degree indeed, that the fire of many of the burning houses was quenched with these men's blood. And they left off slaying at evening, but the fire greatly prevailed in the night. And the eighth day of the month Gorpiaeus, when it dawned, found all Jerusalem burning, a city that had suffered such fearful horrors during the siege, that if it had enjoyed as much happiness from its first foundation, it would justly have been the envy of the world. Nor did it on any other account so much deserve these sore misfortunes, as for its producing such a generation of men as caused its overthrow.

CHAP. IX.

The Instructions Titus gave when he entered the City. The number of the Captives, and of those that perished in the Siege ; as also concerning those who escaped into the Underground Passages, among whom were the tyrants Simon and John themselves.

§ 1.

NOW when Titus entered the city, he admired not only the other places of strength in it, but particularly those towers<sup>1</sup> which the tyrants in their madness had relinquished. For when he saw their solid height, and the size of each stone, and the excellence of their masoury, as also their great breadth and extent, he said, " We have certainly had God for our helper in this war, and it was no other than God who ejected the Jews out of these fortifications, for what could engines or the hands of men do towards overthrowing these towers ? " At this time he held many such discourses to his friends ; and also let such go free as had been put in bonds by the tyrants and left in the prisons. Moreover, when he entirely demolished the rest of the city, and rased its walls to the ground, he left these towers as a monument of his good fortune, which had fought on his side and enabled him to take what he could not otherwise have taken.

§ 2. And now, as his soldiers were already quite tired of their butchery, and yet there appeared to be a vast multitude still surviving, Titus gave orders that they should kill none but those that were in arms and opposed them, but should take the rest alive. However, they slew the aged and infirm as well as those whom they had orders to slay, but as for those that were in the flower of their age, and might be useful to them, they drove them all into the temple, and shut them up within the walls of the court of the women ; and Titus set as guard over them one of his freedmen, and also Fronto, one of his own friends, which last was to determine every one's fate according to his deserts. And Fronto slew all those that had been seditious and robbers, who were informed against by one another, but chose out the tallest and most beautiful of the young men, and reserved them for Titus' triumph. As for the rest of the multitude that were more than seventeen years old, he put them into bonds, and sent them to the Egyptian mines. Titus also distributed very many among the provinces, that they might be destroyed in the theatres by the sword or by wild beasts.<sup>1</sup> But those that were under seventeen years of age were sold as slaves. Now during the days in which Fronto was adjudicating about these men, eleven thousand perished for want of food, some of whom did not get any food owing to the hatred their guards bore to them, and others would not take it when it was offered them. And corn also ran rather short in proportion to their numbers.

§ 3. Now the number of all those that were captured during the whole war was conjectured to be ninety-seven thousand, and the number of those who perished during the whole siege was eleven hundred thousand. Of these most were Jews, but not inhabitants of Jerusalem. For they had come up from all parts of the country to the feast of Unleavened Bread, and suddenly found themselves meshed in with the war, which density of population first produced a pestilence, and very soon afterwards a famine. And that this city could contain so many people in it, is manifest by the numeration taken under Cestius, who being desirous to inform Nero, who despised our nation, of the number of those in their prime in the city, asked the high priests, if the thing were possible, to number the whole multitude. And they, upon the coming of that feast which is called the Passover, when they slay their sacrifices from the ninth hour till the eleventh, and a company of not less than ten men belongs to every sacrifice (for it is not lawful to feast alone, and many form a company of even twenty), counted the number of sacrifices to be two hundred and fifty-six thousand five hundred. Now this, upon the allowance of ten feasting together, amounts to two million five hundred and sixty-five thousand persons that were all pure and holy; for as to those who had the leprosy or gonorrhœa, or women that had their monthly courses, or such as were otherwise defiled, it was not lawful for them to be partakers of this sacrifice, nor indeed for any foreigners either, who came to Jerusalem for worship.

§ 4. Now this vast multitude was indeed collected from various places, but the entire nation was now shut up by fate as in prison, and the Roman army invested the city when it was crowded with men. Accordingly the number of those that perished therein exceeded all the destructions that either men or God ever brought upon the world. For, in the case of those who openly appeared, the Romans slew some of them, and some they carried captive; but others they had to search for underground, when they broke up the ground and slew all they met with. There were also found there more than two thousand dead persons, who had perished partly by their own hands, and partly by one another's hands, but chiefly by the famine. And the stench of the dead bodies was so offensive to those that lit upon them, that many were obliged to go away immediately, while others were so greedy of gain, that they would go in and tread upon the dead bodies that lay on heaps. For a great deal of treasure was found in these caverns, and the hope of gain made every way of getting it esteemed lawful. Many also were now brought out who had been put in prison by the tyrants; for they had not left off their barbarous cruelty even in their utmost need. But God avenged himself upon them both as they deserved; for John and his brothers wanted food in these caverns, and begged that the Romans would now extend to him that right hand which he had often proudly rejected before: and as for Simon, he struggled hard with the distress he was in, till he was forced to surrender, as I shall subsequently relate. He indeed was reserved for Titus' triumph, to be then slain, and John was condemned to perpetual imprisonment. And now the Romans set fire to the extreme parts of the city, and rased the walls to the ground.

CHAP. X.

How whereas the City of Jerusalem had been taken five times before, this was the second time of its utter Destruction.

§ 1.

THUS was Jerusalem taken in the second year of the reign of Vespasian, on the eighth day of the month Gorpiaëus. It had been taken five times before, though this was the second time of its utter destruction. For Shishak, the king of Egypt, and after him Antiochus, and after him Pompey, and after them Sossius and Herod, all took the city, but still preserved it; but before them the king of Babylon conquered it, and utterly destroyed it, one thousand four hundred and sixty-eight years and six months after it was built. Now he who first built it was a ruler of the Canaanites, and is in our tongue called The Righteous King,<sup>1</sup> for such he really was; on which account he was the first priest of God, and first built a temple, and called the city Jerusalem, which was formerly called Solyma.<sup>2</sup> However, David, the king of the Jews, ejected the Canaanites, and settled his own people there. It was utterly destroyed by the Babylonians, four hundred and seventy-seven years and six months after David. And from King David, who was first of the Jews who reigned there, to this utter destruction under Titus, were one thousand one hundred and seventy-nine years. And from its first building till this last destruction two thousand one hundred and seventy-seven years elapsed. So neither its great antiquity, nor its vast riches, nor the spread of our nation all over the world, nor the greatness of the veneration paid to it on religious accounts, were sufficient to preserve it from being destroyed. Thus ended the siege of Jerusalem.

How the entire City of Jerusalem was demolished, except three Towers; and how Titus commended his soldiers in a Speech made to them, and distributed rewards to them, and then discharged many of them.

§ 1.

NOW as soon as the army had no more people either to slay or plunder, because there remained none to be the objects of their fury (for they would not have spared any, had there remained any more such work to be done), Titus gave orders that they should now demolish the entire city and temple, but should leave as many of the towers standing as were of the greatest eminence, namely, Phasaelus,<sup>1</sup> and Hippicus, and Mariamne, and so much of the wall as enclosed the city on the west. The wall was spared that it might serve as a camp for those who were to be left in garrison there, and the towers were spared to show to posterity what kind of city it was, and how well fortified, which the Roman valour had subdued. But as for all the rest of the compass of the city, it was so thoroughly levelled by those that razed it to the ground, that there was nothing left to make those that came there believe it had ever been inhabited. Such was the end that Jerusalem came to, owing to the madness of those that were for innovations, a city of great magnificence, and of mighty fame among all mankind.

§ 2. Now Titus resolved to leave as a garrison there the tenth legion, and some troops of horse and companies of foot. And having entirely completed the war, he was desirous to commend his whole army on account of the great exploits they had performed, and to bestow proper rewards on such as had distinguished themselves. He had therefore a great tribunal made for him in the midst of the place where he had formerly encamped, and stood upon it with his principal commanders about him within hearing of everybody, and told the whole army that he was very much obliged to them for the good-will which they had continually showed to him. He commended them for the ready obedience they had exhibited in the whole war, which obedience had appeared in the many and great dangers which they had courageously undergone, for they had not only thereby augmented themselves their country's power, but had also made it evident to all men, that neither the number of their enemies, nor the strength of their fortresses, nor the size of their cities, nor the rash boldness and brutish savageness of their antagonists, were sufficient at any time to cope with Roman valour, although some of their enemies might have fortune in many respects on their side. He said also that they had put a noble end to this war which had lasted so long. Nor had they wished for anything better when they entered into it. He said also that it was more excellent still, and more for their glory, that all people willingly accepted as governors and administrators of the Roman empire those whom they had chosen for them, and had sent into their countries for that purpose, and still continued under the administration of those whom they had selected, and were thankful to them for selecting them. He also said that he admired and loved them all, because he knew that every one of them had exhibited zeal to the utmost extent of their ability. However, he said he would immediately bestow rewards and honours on those who had fought the most bravely, and adorned their lives by their glorious deeds, and had made his army more famous by their success, for no one who had been willing to take more pains than another should fail to receive a just return. For he attached great importance to this matter, since he would much rather reward the virtues of his fellow-soldiers than punish such as had offended.

§ 3. Thereupon Titus ordered those whose business it was to read out the list of all that had performed great exploits in the war. He next called them to him by their names, and praised them as they came up to him, and rejoiced in them as a man would have rejoiced in his own exploits, and put on their heads crowns of gold, and golden ornaments about their necks, and gave them long spears of gold, and standards that were made of silver, and gave every one of them promotion. Moreover, he plentifully distributed among them, out of the spoil and other booty they had taken, silver and gold and garments. And when they had had all these honours bestowed on them, according to his decision in regard to each one, and he had wished all sorts of happiness to the whole army, he came down from his tribunal amidst great acclamations, and betook himself to offering thank-offerings for victory, and sacrificed a vast number of oxen that stood ready at the altars, and distributed them among the army to feast on. And when he had feasted three days with the principal commanders, he sent away the rest of his army to the several places where they would be each best quartered, but permitted the tenth legion to garrison Jerusalem, and did not send them back to the Euphrates, where they had been before. And as he remembered that the twelfth legion had been beaten by the Jews, under Cestius, as their general, he expelled them out of all Syria (for they had been stationed formerly at Raphanæ),<sup>1</sup> and sent them away to a place called Melitine,<sup>2</sup> near the Euphrates, on the confines of Armenia and Cappadocia. He also thought fit that two of the legions, the fifth and the fifteenth, should attend upon him till he should go to Egypt. He then went down with his army to Casarea,<sup>3</sup> by the sea-side, and there stored up the bulk of his spoils, and gave orders that the captives should be kept there: for the winter season hindered sailing for Italy.

§ 1.

NOW at the time when Titus Cæsar was busy in the siege of Jerusalem, Vespasian went on board a merchant ship, and sailed from Alexandria to Rhodes.<sup>1</sup> From thence he sailed away in ships with three rows of oars, and was joyfully received at all the cities that he touched at that lay on his road, and so passed over from Ionia into Greece; whence he set sail from Coreyra<sup>2</sup> to the Iapygian promontory,<sup>3</sup> whence he took his journey by land. But Titus marched from Cæsarea by the sea-side, and arrived at what is called Cæsarea Philippi,<sup>4</sup> and stayed there a considerable time, and exhibited all sorts of shows there. And here a great number of the captives were destroyed, some being thrown to wild beasts,<sup>5</sup> and others in companies forced to fight with one another.<sup>6</sup> And here Titus was informed of the capture, in the following manner, of Simon, the son of Gioras. This Simon, during the siege of Jerusalem, was in the upper city, but when the Roman army had got within the walls, and was ravaging all the city, he then took the most faithful of his friends with him, and among them some that were stone-cutters, with the iron tools which belonged to their occupation, and as many provisions as would last for many days, and let himself and all of them down into a certain subterraneous cavern that was not visible above ground. Now they went onward along it as far as it had been dug of old, and where they met with solid earth, they dug a mine under ground, in the hope that they should be able to proceed so far as to emerge from under ground in a safe place, and so escape. But when they came to make the experiment, they were disappointed of their hope; for the miners could make but small progress, and that only with difficulty, and their provisions, although they distributed them by measure, began to fail. And now Simon, thinking he might be able to elude the Romans by frightening them, put on white raiment, and buttoned over it a purple cloak, and appeared out of the ground in the place where the temple had formerly been.<sup>1</sup> At first indeed those that saw him were greatly terrified, and stood still where they were, but afterwards they came nearer to him, and asked him who he was. Now Simon would not tell them this, but bade them call for their general. And when they quickly ran to fetch him, Terentius Rufus, who was left in command of the army, learned of Simon the whole truth, and kept him in bonds, and let Titus know that he was taken. Thus did God bring Simon to justice at the hands of those who were his worst enemies, for the bitter and savage tyranny he had exercised against his fellow-citizens, not getting into their power by violence, but having voluntarily delivered himself up to be punished, because he had falsely accused many Jews of intending to go over to the Romans, and had in consequence barbarously slain them. For wicked actions do not escape the divine anger, nor is justice weak, but at last overtakes those who transgress its laws, and inflicts punishment so much the more severe upon the wicked, because they expect to escape it because of their not being punished immediately. Simon recognized this when he fell under the wrath of the Romans. And his coming up out of the ground caused the discovery of a great number of others of the seditious also who had hidden themselves under ground in those days. As for Simon, he was brought in bonds to Titus, when he had returned to Cæsarea by the sea-side; and he gave orders that he should be reserved for the triumph which he intended to celebrate at Rome.

CHAP. III.

How Titus, upon the Celebration of His Brother's and Father's Birth-days, had many of the Jews slain. Also concerning the Danger the Jews were in at Antioch, because of the Transgression and Impiety of one Antiochus a Jew.

§ 1.

WHILE Titus was staying at Cæsarea, he kept the birth-day of his brother<sup>1</sup> in a splendid manner, and inflicted condign punishment on many of the Jews in his honour. For the number of those who were now slain in fighting with beasts, or were burnt alive, or killed in fighting with one another,<sup>2</sup> exceeded two thousand five hundred. Yet all this seemed to the Romans, though they were thus destroyed in ten thousand various ways, to be a punishment beneath their deserts. After this Titus went to Berytus<sup>3</sup> (which is a city in Phœnice, and a Roman colony), and stayed there somewhat longer, and exhibited on his father's birth-day shows more splendid still, both from the magnificence of the spectacles, and the vast expense of the various devices. And the mass of the captives perished then in the same manner as on Domitian's birth-day.

§ 2. It happened also about this time, that the Jews who remained at Antioch<sup>4</sup> were under accusations, and in danger of destruction, as the city of Antioch was excited against them, both because of the slanders spread abroad at this time against them, and because of what had happened there not long before; which I am obliged to describe briefly, that I may make my account of what passed after this easier to understand.

§ 3. As the Jewish nation is widely dispersed over all the world among its various inhabitants, so is it peculiarly prevalent in Syria because of its proximity, and it was especially numerous in Antioch, because of the size of that city, and because the kings after Antiochus had granted them secure habitatiou there. For though Antiochus, who was called Epiphanes, devastated Jerusalem and spoiled the temple, yet those who succeeded him in the kingdom restored all the votive offerings that were made of brass to the Jews of Antioch, and placed them in their synagogue, and granted them the enjoyment of equal privileges with the Greeks as citizens. And as the succeeding kings treated them in the same manner, they greatly multiplied, and gloriously adorned their temple with fine ornaments and very costly votive offerings, and also made proselytes of a great many of the Greeks continually, and so in a sort made them part of themselves. But about the time when the Jewish war began, and Vespasian had recently sailed to Syria, and the hatred against the Jews was at its acme among all men, a certain person, whose name was Antiochus, who was one of the Jewish nation, and greatly respected on account of his father (who was governor of the Jews at Antioch),<sup>1</sup> entered the theatre when the people of Antioch were assembled together, and came forward as an informer against his father, and accused both him and the other Jews of intending to burn the whole city in one night; he also handed over to them some foreign Jews as privy to the design. When the people heard this, they could not restrain their anger, but commanded that those who were handed over to them should have fire brought to burn them, and accordingly they were all burnt in the theatre immediately. They also rushed violently upon the Jewish population, supposing that by punishing them quickly they would save their own city. As for Antiochus, he increased the rage they were in, and thought to give them a proof of his own conversion, and of his hatred of the Jewish customs, by sacrificing after the manner of the Greeks; he urged them also to compel the rest of the Jews to do the same, because they would by that means discover who they were that had plotted against them, since they would refuse to do so; and when the people of Antioch tried the experiment, some few complied, and those that would not were slain. As for Antiochus himself, he obtained soldiers from the Roman governor, and became a severe despot over his own citizens, not permitting them to rest on the seventh day, but forcing them to do all that they usually did on other days; and so strict did he make that necessity, that the rest of the seventh day was annulled not only at Antioch, but, the habit beginning there, in other cities also in like manner for a short time.

§ 4. Now, after these misfortunes had happened to the Jews at Antioch, a second calamity befell them, the description of which I was about to give when I made the late digression. For when it happened that the square market-place was burnt down, and the archives, and the place where the public records were preserved, and the town-hall (and it was not without difficulty that a stop was then put to the fire, which was likely, from the violent way in which it spread, to have consumed the whole city), Antiochus accused the Jews of doing this, and induced the people of Antioch (who were now very soon persuaded, because of the alarm they were in, that this calumny was true, and would have been under the same persuasion, even though they had not had ill-will to the Jews before), to believe his accusation, especially when they considered what had happened before, so that, as if they had all but seen the Jews bringing fire against them, they all fell violently upon those that were accused, like madmen in a very furious rage. Nor was it without difficulty that one Cnæus Collega, the imperial lieutenant, could prevail upon them to permit the matter to be laid before the emperor. For as to Cæsennius Pætus, the president of Syria, Vespasian had already despatched him, but he had not yet arrived. Now when Collega had made a careful inquiry into the matter, he found out the truth, that <sup>1</sup> not one of those Jews that were accused by Antiochus had any hand in it, but that it was all done by some vile wretches greatly in debt, who supposed that, if they could once set fire to the market-place, and burn the public records, they would have no further demands made upon them. So the Jews were in great alarm and terror, in the uncertain expectation of what would be the upshot of these accusations against them.

CHAP. IV.

How Vespasian was received at Rome, as also how the Germans revolted from the Romans, but were subdued. Also how the Sarmatians overran Mæsia, but were compelled to return to their own country again.

§ 1.

AND now Titus Cæsar, upon the news that was brought him concerning his father, that his arrival was very welcome to all the Italian cities, and that Rome especially received him with great loyalty and pomp, betook himself to much joy and pleasure of mind, being now freed from the anxiety he had been in about him in the most agreeable manner. For all men that were in Italy showed the respect they had in their minds to Vespasian while he was still a long way off, as if he were already come, considering the very expectation they had of him to be his real presence, because of the great desire they had to see him, and because the good-will they bore him was entirely spontaneous and natural. For to the senate, who well remembered the calamities they had undergone in the late changes of their emperors, it was a desirable thing to receive one who was adorned with the gravity of age, and with the greatest fame as a military commander, whose advancement would be, they knew, for nothing else but the safety of those that were under his rule. And the people had been so harassed by civil dissensions, that they were still more earnest for his coming, supposing they would then be certainly delivered from their calamities, and believing they should recover security and prosperity. As for the soldiers, they looked to him especially, for they knew best his great exploits in war; and since they had experienced want of skill and want of courage in other emperors, they were desirous to be freed from the great shame such had brought, and longed to receive the only emperor who could be a security and credit to them. And as this good-will to Vespasian was universal, those men that were eminent for rank had not patience enough to wait for him at Rome, but made haste to meet him at a very great distance from it. And, indeed, none of the rest could endure delay in seeing him, but all poured out of the city en masse, and it seemed to all easier and more convenient to go out than to stay there, so that this was the very first time that Rome gladly perceived itself almost empty of its citizens; for those that remained in it were fewer than those that went out. And as soon as news came that he was approaching, and those that had gone on to meet him related with what good humour he received every one that came to him, the whole population that had remained in the city, with their wives and children, lined the road to see him pass, and those whom he passed by all made all sorts of acclamations because of the joy they felt at seeing him, and the graciousness of his countenance, and hailed him as their benefactor and saviour, and the only person who was worthy to be emperor of Rome. And the whole city was like a temple, full of garlands and sweet odours. Nor was it easy for him to reach the imperial palace for the crowd of people that stood about him, but at last he performed his sacrifices of thanksgiving to his household gods for his safe return to the city. The multitudes then betook themselves to feasting, and celebrated their feasts by their tribes and families and neighbourhoods, and prayed God not without libations to grant that Vespasian, and his sons, and all their posterity, might continue in the Roman empire for a very long time, without their position being contested. So joyfully did the city of Rome receive Vespasian, and advanced immediately into a state of great prosperity.

§ 2. But before this time, while Vespasian was still at Alexandria, and Titus was employed in the siege of Jerusalem, a large body of the Germans rose in rebellion, and as the Gauls in the neighbourhood joined with them, they conspired together, and had great hopes of success, and that they should free themselves from the dominion of the Romans. The motives that induced the Germans to engage in this revolt, and to begin war, were first the nature of the people, which was destitute of just reasoning, and ready to venture into danger with small hope of advantage, and next the hatred they bore to their masters, as their nation had never known compulsory subjection to any but the Romans. But it was the opportunity that now offered itself that most encouraged them. For as they saw the Roman empire in great internal disorder from the continual changes of its emperors, and heard that every part of the world under the Romans was in an unsettled and tottering condition, they thought this was the best opportunity that could offer itself for them to rise against the Romans when their affairs were at so bad a pass. Classicus also and Vitellius, two of their commanders, were the instigators of this rising, and puffed them up with these hopes. These two men had for a long time plainly been desirous of such a revolution, and were encouraged by the present opportunity to venture upon declaring their sentiments: and as the nation was well affected to the idea they intended to make the attempt. Now when a great part of the Germans had already agreed to rebel, and the rest were no better disposed, Vespasian, as if guided by divine providence, sent letters to Petilius Cerealis, who had formerly had the command of Germany, giving him the rank of consul, and commanding him to depart to the government of Britain. So he set out where he was ordered to go, and when he heard en route of the revolt of the Germans, he put his army in battle-array, and fell upon them as soon as they were concentrated, and slew a great number of them in the fight, and forced them to leave off their madness and grow wiser. But had he not come thns quickly to the spot, it would not have been long before they would have been brought to punishment. For as soon as ever the news of their revolt reached Rome, and Cæsar Domitian heard of it, he made no delay in spite of his age, for he was very young, but undertook this weighty affair, for he inherited the courage of his father, and was better trained in the art of war than his youth would have led one to infer, so he marched against the barbarians immediately. And their hearts failed them at the very rumour of his approach, and they submitted to him from fear, and thought it a gain

to be brought under their old yoke again without suffering any further calamities. And when Domitian had put all the affairs of Gaul into such good order, that they would not be easily thrown into disorder any more, he returned to Rome with honour and glory, having performed such exploits as were above his own age, and would have thrown lustre even on his father.

§ 3. At the very same time as the forementioned revolt of the Germans, did the bold attempt of the Scythians against the Romans take place. These Scythians, who are called Sarmatians, and are a very numerous people, crossed the Ister into Mœsia<sup>1</sup> without being observed, and then with much violence, being formidable by their entirely unexpected assault, slew a great many of the Romans that guarded the frontiers, and when the consular legate Fonteius Agrippa came to meet them, and fought courageously against them, he was slain by them. They then overran all the region that had been under him, ravaging and devastating everything that fell in their way. But when Vespasian was informed of what had happened, and how Mœsia was laid waste, he despatched Rubrius Gallus to punish these Sarmatians, and he slew many of them in the battles he fought against them, and the remnant that escaped fled with fear to their own country. And when the general had put an end to the war, he provided for the future security of the country also; for he placed more and larger garrisons in the place, till he made it altogether impossible for the barbarians to cross over the river any more. Thus this war in Mœsia had a quick conclusion.

CHAP. V.

Concerning the Sabbatic River, which Titus saw as he was journeying through Syria; and how the People of Antioch came with a Petition to Titus against the Jews, but were rejected by him: also concerning Titus' and Vespasian's Triumph.

§ 1.

NOW Titus Cæsar tarried some time at Berytus,<sup>1</sup> as I said before, and then removed thence and gave magnificent shows in all the cities of Syria through which he went, and exhibited the captive Jews as proof of the destruction of that nation. He saw on his march a river<sup>2</sup> of such a nature as deserves to be recorded in history. It runs between Arcæa,<sup>3</sup> which is part of Agrippa's kingdom, and Raphanæa,<sup>4</sup> and has something very wonderful and peculiar in it. For when it runs, its current is strong, and has plenty of water; after which its springs fail for six days together, and leave its channel dry, as any one may see. After this it runs on the seventh day as it did before, and as though it had undergone no change at all, and it has been observed to keep this order perpetually and exactly: whence they call it the Sabbatic River,<sup>5</sup> so naming it from the sacred sabbath of the Jews.

§ 2. Now when the people of Antioch were informed that Titus was approaching, they could not keep within their walls for joy, but hastened away to meet him, and went as far as thirty furlongs and more with that intention, and not men only, but a multitude of women also and

<sup>5</sup> Since in these later ages, this Sabbatic river, once so famous, which, by Josephus' account here, ran every seventh day, and rested on six, but according to Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxi. 11, ran perpetually on six days, and rested every seventh (though it no way appears by either of their accounts that the seventh day of this river was the Jewish seventh day, or Sabbath), is quite vanished, I shall add no more about it; only see Dr. Hudson's note.—W.

children, poured out of the city. And when they saw him coming up to them, they lined both sides of the road, and stretched out their right hands, saluting him, and making all sorts of acclamations to him, and turned back with him. They also besought him all the time, among all the acclamations they made to him, to eject the Jews from their city. But Titus did not give any assent to this petition, but merely listened to it in silence. However, the Jews were in a great and terrible fright from the uncertainty they were in as to what his opinion was, and how he intended to act in regard to them. For Titus did not stay at Antioch, but continued his journey immediately to Zeugma,<sup>1</sup> which lies on the Euphrates, where messengers came to him from Vologesus, king of Parthia, and brought him a crown of gold for the victory he had gained over the Jews; which he accepted, and feasted the king's messengers, and then returned to Antioch. And when the senate and people of Antioch requested him frequently to come into their theatre, where the whole multitude were assembled and expected him, he graciously complied with their request. But when they pressed him again with much earnestness, and continually begged of him, to eject the Jews from their city, he gave them the following very pertinent answer: "How can this be done, since that country of theirs, where the Jews would then be obliged to retire to, is destroyed, and no other place will now receive them?" Thereupon the people of Antioch, having failed in their first request, made him a second; for they begged that he would order those tablets of brass, on which the Jews' privileges were engraven, to be removed. However, Titus would not grant that either, but permitted the Jews of Antioch to continue to enjoy the very same privileges in that city which they had before, and then departed for Egypt. And as he came to Jerusalem on his route, and compared the melancholy desolation he saw it now in with the ancient glory of the city, and considered the greatness of its present ruins as well as its ancient splendour, he pitied the destruction of the city, so far was he from boasting that he had taken by storm so great and goodly a city; nay, he frequently cursed those that had been the authors of the revolt, and had brought such a punishment upon the city, so that it plainly appeared, that he did not desire that his renown should be founded on such a calamity as this punishment of theirs. Now there was still found among its ruins no small quantity of the riches that had been in the city, for though the Romans had dug up a great deal, yet more was discovered by the information of those who were captives. And so the Romans carried off gold and silver, and the rest of the most precious things which the Jews had, which their owners had treasured up under ground against the uncertain fortunes of war.

§ 3. And Titus went on with his intended journey to Egypt, and travelled over the desert very quickly, and arrived at Alexandria, and resolved to sail for Italy. And as he had been accompanied by two legions, he sent each of them again to the places where they had come from, the fifth to Mœsia,<sup>1</sup> and the fifteenth to Pannonia.<sup>2</sup> As for the leaders of the captives, Simon and John, and the other seven hundred men, whom he had selected out of the rest as being eminently tall and handsome in body, he gave orders that they should forthwith be transported to Italy, intending to exhibit them in his triumph. And after a prosperous voyage, the people of Rome received and met him just as they had his father. But what was the most splendid welcome to Titus was his father's meeting him, and receiving him. And the crowd of citizens felt the greatest joy when they saw all three princes together,<sup>3</sup> as they did at this time. Nor had many days elapsed, when they determined to have but one triumph, that should be common to both Vespasian and Titus, on account of the glorious exploits they had performed, although the senate had decreed each of them a separate triumph. And when notice had been given beforehand of the day appointed for the splendid triumphal procession on account of their victories, not one of the immense multitude was left in the city; but every body went out and occupied every place where they might but stand, and left only such room as was necessary for those who were to be the observed of all observers in the triumphal procession.

§ 4. Now, while it was still night, all the soldiers marched out in companies, and in their several ranks, under their several commanders, and stationed themselves near the doors, not of the upper palace, but near the temple of Isis; for it was there that the emperors had rested that night. And as soon as ever it was day, Vespasian and Titus came out crowned with laurel, and clothed in the purple robes customary to emperors, and then went as far as Octavia's Walks; for there the senate, and the principal magistrates, and those that belonged to the equestrian order, waited for their arrival. Now a tribunal had been erected before the porticoes, and ivory chairs had been set upon it, and they came and sat down upon them, whereupon the soldiers made acclamations of joy immediately, and all gave them many attestations of valour. And they were without their arms, and only clad in silken garments, and crowned with laurel. And Vespasian graciously accepted these acclamations of theirs, but as they were still disposed to go on with such acclamations, he made them a sign to be silent. And when silence reigned in the entire assembly, he stood up, and covering most of his head in his cloak, put up the accustomed prayers; and Titus did the same. And after these prayers Vespasian made a short speech to all the people, and then sent the soldiers away to the usual dinner prepared for them by the emperors; and retired himself to the gate which was called the gate of Triumph, because triumphal processions always passed through it. They there tasted some food, and when they had put on their triumphal garments, and had offered sacrifices to the gods whose statues were at the gate, they went on with the triumph, and marched through the theatres, that they might the more easily be seen by the multitudes.

§ 5. It is impossible to describe adequately the multitude of the shows, and the magnificence of them in all things such as man could devise, either by the labour of workmen, or the variety of riches, or the rarities of nature. For almost all such curiosities, both admirable and costly, as the most fortunate men ever got by piecemeal, were here heaped one upon another, and all brought together on that day, showing the vastness of the empire of the Romans. For there was here to be seen a mighty quantity of articles of all kinds in silver and gold and ivory, not as if carried in the triumphal procession only, but, as a man might say, like a running stream. Some hangings of the rarest purple were carried along, and others accurately represented to the life what was embroidered by the art of the Babylonians. There were also precious stones that were transparent, some set in crowns of gold, and others of other workmanship, and such a vast number of these were brought, that we could not but see how erroneous our idea was that any of them were rare. Images of the gods were also carried, as wonderful for their size as artistic and finished in their workmanship; nor were any of these images made of any other than very costly material. And many species of animals were exhibited, all with their own natural ornaments. The numerous men also who introduced each of these shows were adorned with purple and gilt garments, and those who were chosen to conduct the triumphal procession were dressed in a very striking and costly way. Moreover, one could see that even the crowd of captives was not unadorned, while the variety and beauty of their garments concealed from sight any deformity of their bodies arising from their hardships. But what afforded the greatest admiration of all, was the structure of the pageants that were borne along; for indeed he that met them could not but be afraid that the bearers would not be able adequately to support them, such was their size. For many of them were three or even four stories high, and the magnificence of their structure excited both pleasure and astonishment; for upon many of them was laid cloth of gold, and wrought gold and ivory were attached to all of them. And various episodes in the war by many representations conveyed a very clear picture of what war was like. For there might be seen a fertile country laid waste, and entire armies of enemies slain, and some running away, and others being carried into captivity, and walls of great thickness knocked down by battering-rams, and strong fortifications taken, and the walls of populous cities upon the tops of hills scaled, and an army pouring in over the walls, and every place full of slaughter, and the supplications of those who could no longer lift up their hands in opposition, and fire put to temples, and houses overthrown and falling upon their owners, and rivers, after passing through a large and melancholy desert, flowing not into a land cultivated, or furnishing drink for men or cattle, but through a land still on fire on every side. For the Jews had given themselves to war to undergo such things. Now the artistic magnificence of these representations was so good, that it exhibited what had taken place to those who were ignorant of the facts, as if they had been really present there. On the top of every one of these pageants was placed the commander of the city that had been taken, just as he was captured. Many ships also followed. Other spoils were also carried in the procession in great plenty, but those that were taken in the temple of Jerusalem made the greatest figure of them all, namely, a golden table which weighed many talents, and a candlestick likewise made of gold, though its construction was somewhat different from that in use among us. For its middle branch was fixed upon a pedestal, and small branches came out of it, like a trident in appearance, and each having a lamp of brass on its top. There were seven of these lamps, which represented the honour paid to the number seven by the Jews. And last of all the spoils, was carried the law of the Jews. After these spoils passed many men, carrying images of victory, all made of ivory and gold. Behind these rode Vespasian first, and Titus followed him; Domitian also rode with them, himself also splendidly dressed and mounted on a handsome horse.

§ 6. The end of the procession was at the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and when they reached it they halted; for it was the ancient custom to stay there till somebody brought the news, that the general of the enemy was slain. This general was Simon, the son of Gioras, who had now been led in triumph among the captives; a rope had also been thrown round him, and he had been dragged into a place over the forum, where the law of the Romans required that malefactors condemned to death should be slain, and he had also been scourged by those that dragged him along. And when it was reported that there was an end of him, and all the people had shouted for joy, they then began to offer the sacrifices which they consecrated by the accustomed prayers, and then went away to the palace. And the emperors entertained some at their own feast, and for all the rest there were noble preparations made for their feasting at home. For the city of the Romans celebrated this day as a festival for the victory obtained by their army over their enemies, and for the end of their own intestine dissensions, and for the commencement of their hopes of future happiness.

§ 7. After these triumphs were over, and after the Roman empire was settled on the surest foundation, Vespasian resolved to build a temple to Peace, which he finished in a very short time, and in a manner beyond all human expectation. For bestowing his vast wealth upon it, besides what he had formerly gained in his other successes, he had this temple adorned with pictures and statues. And all such rarities were collected and deposited in this temple, as men before used to wander all over the world to see, when they had a desire to see one of them after another. He also deposited in it the golden vessels that were taken out of the Jewish temple, and was very proud of them. And he gave orders that they should place their law, and the purple veils of the sanctuary, in the royal palace, and keep them there.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning Machærus, and how Lucilius Bassus took that Fortwess and other Places.

§ 1.

NOW Lucilius Bassus was sent out as imperial legate to Judæa, and there he received the army from Cerealis Vitellianus, and made himself master of the fortress of Herodium<sup>1</sup> and the garrison that held it: after which he got together all the soldiers available (for many were distributed about the country) and the tenth legion, and resolved to march against Machærus.<sup>1</sup> For it was quite necessary that that fortress should be demolished, lest it might draw away many into rebellion because of its strength: for the nature of the place was very capable of affording sure hope of safety to those who held it, and delay and fear to those who attacked it. For what was defended by a fort was itself a rocky hill, rising to a very great height, which circumstance alone made it very difficult to capture it. It was also so contrived by nature, that it could not be easily approached; for it is intrenched by ravines on all sides, so deep that the eye cannot reach their bottoms, nor are they easy to cross over, and it is quite impossible to fill them up with earth. For the ravine which hems it in on the west extends threescore furlongs, and does not end till the lake Asphaltitis<sup>2</sup> (and it is on the same side also that Machærus has its highest peak elevated above the rest); and although the ravines that lie on the north and south sides are not so large as that just described, yet it is similarly impracticable to think of storming them. As for the ravine that lies on the east side, its depth is found to be no less than a hundred cubits, and it extends as far as a mountain that lies opposite Machærus.

§ 2. Now Alexander the king of the Jews, having observed the nature of this place, was the first who built a fortress there, which was afterwards demolished by Gabinius, when he warred against Aristobulus. But when Herod came to be king, he thought the place to be worthy of the utmost regard, and of being fortified in the strongest manner, especially as it lay so near to Arabia: for it is situated conveniently in respect to that country which it faces. He therefore surrounded a large space of ground with walls and towers, and built a city there, from which a way led up to the very top of the hill. Moreover, he built a wall round the top of the hill, and erected towers a hundred and sixty cubits high at the angles. And in the middle of this walled area he built a magnificent palace, wherein were large and beautiful rooms. He also made a great many cisterns to hold water, that there might be a plentiful supply in the most fit places, as if having a friendly contest with nature, that he might make the natural strength of the place, which made it hard to be taken, still greater by defences made by the hands of men. Moreover, he put a large quantity of darts and other engines of war into it, and contrived to store up every thing there that might enable its inhabitants to stand a very long siege.

§ 3. Now in this palace there grew a sort of rue, that deserves our wonder on account of its size, for it was as large as any fig-tree both in height and thickness; and the report went that it had lasted ever since the times of Herod, and it would probably have lasted much longer had it not been cut down by the Jews who occupied the place afterwards. And in the ravine which surrounds the city on the north side, there is a certain place called Baaras,<sup>1</sup> which produces a root of the same name as itself. Its colour is like that of fire, and towards evening it sends out a ray like lightning, and is not easily taken by such as approach it and wish to take it, but recedes from their hands, and is not stationary until either a woman's urine or menstruous blood be poured upon it; nay, even then it is certain death to those that touch it, unless one take and hang the root itself down from the hand, and so carry it away. It is also taken another way without danger, namely, as follows. Persons dig quite round it, till the hidden part of the root is very small; they then tie a dog to it, and when the dog starts to follow the person that tied him, the root is easily plucked up; but the dog dies immediately, as if a victim instead of the man that would take the plant away. Nor after this need any one be afraid of taking it into his hands. Yet after all this risk in getting it, it is only sought after on account of one property it has, that if it be only brought to sick persons, it quickly drives away those who are called demons (who are no other than the spirits of the wicked) that enter into men that are alive, and kill them, unless they can obtain some help against them. There are also springs of hot water that flow out of this place, which have a very different taste from one another : for some of them are bitter, and others of them are very sweet. Cold waters also gush out frequently, and have their springs near one another, not only on the more level ground, but what is still more wonderful, there is to be seen a certain cave hard by of no great depth, covered over by a rock that juts out; and above this rock there stand out two small round [hills like] breasts, a little distant from one another, one of which sends out a fountain that is very cold, and the other sends out one that is very hot; and these waters, when mixed together, form a most pleasant bath, medicinal indeed in other complaints, but especially good for strengthening the nerves. This place also contains mines of sulphur and alum.

§ 4. Now when Bassus had made a complete reconnaissance of the fortress, he resolved to make his approach to it by filling up the ravine on the east side; so he fell hard to work, and took great pains to raise the earth as soon as possible, and so to make the storm of the place easy. As for the Jews who were shut up inside the place, they separated themselves from the strangers that were with them, and forced these strangers, as they considered them a merely useless multitude, to stay in the lower city, and bear the brunt of danger first, while they themselves occupied the upper citadel, and held it, both on account of its great strength, and to provide for their own safety; for they thought they might obtain their pardon if they surrendered the fortress eventually to the Romans. However, they wished to make trial first whether the hopes they had of escaping a siege were feasible. So they energetically made sallies every day, and fought with those that met them, in which conflicts many of them were slain, and they also slew many of the Romans. But still it was opportunity that chiefly gained both sides their victories, they were gained by the Jews, when they fell upon the Romans as they were off their guard, and by the Romans when, upon the Jews' sallies against their banks, they foresaw their coming, and were upon their guard to receive them. But the conclusion of the siege did not depend upon these skirmishes; but a certain unexpected chance event forced the Jews to surrender the fortress. There was a certain young man among the besieged, of great boldness, and very active with his hand, whose name was Eleazar. He greatly distinguished himself in the sallies, and encouraged the Jews to go out in great numbers, in order to hinder the raising of the banks, and did the Romans a great deal of hurt when it came to fighting, and for those who were bold enough to sally out with him he made their attack easy, and caused their retreat to be without danger by still bringing up the rear himself. Now it happened on one occasion, when the fight was over, and both sides had retired, that he, despising the enemy, and thinking that none of them would begin the fight again at that time, stayed outside the gates, and talked a long time to those that were upon the wall, and his mind was wholly intent upon them. Now a certain person belonging to the Roman camp, whose name was Rufus, by birth an Egyptian, observed his opportunity, and ran at him suddenly, when nobody expected such a thing, and snatched him up armour and all, while those that saw it from the wall were in such consternation, that Rufus carried Eleazar off to the Roman camp before they could stop him. And the general of the Romans ordered that he should be hoisted up naked, and set before the city so as to be seen by all the citizens, and severely scourged before their eyes. At this sad event that befell the young man the Jews were terribly confounded, and the whole city sorely lamented him, and the wailing was greater than one would have expected at the calamity of a single person. When Bassus perceived that, he began to think of using a stratagem against the enemy, and wished to heighten their grief, in order to prevail upon them to surrender the city for Eleazar's safety, nor did he fail of his hope. For he commanded them to set up a cross, as if he were just going to crucify Eleazar immediately. And the sight of this occasioned still greater grief among those that were in the fortress, and they groaned aloud, and cried out that they could not bear to see his tragic end. Thereupon Eleazar besought them not to allow him to suffer the most wretched of deaths, and exhorted them to save themselves by yielding to the Roman power and fortune, as all other people had been now conquered by them. And they were greatly moved by what he said, there being also many within the city that interceded for him (for he was of an eminent and very numerous family), so they now yielded to compassion contrary to their usual custom. Accordingly they quickly sent out certain messengers, and treated with the Romans about the surrender of the fortress, and desired that they might be permitted to go away safe, and take Eleazar with them. And the Romans and their general accepted these terms, but the multitude of strangers in the lower part of the city, hearing of the agreement that was made by the Jews for themselves alone, resolved to flee away privately in the night. But as soon as they opened the gates, those who had come to terms with Bassus told him of it, whether they envied the others' safety, or whether they acted so from fear, lest the Romans should accuse them of their escape. Now the most courageous of these strangers that went out anticipated the enemy, and broke through and escaped, while those men of them that were taken within were slain, to the number of one thousand seven hundred, and the women and children were made slaves. But as to those that had surrendered the fortress, Bassus thought it right to perform the covenant he had made with them, so he let them go, and restored Eleazar to them.

§ 5. When Bassus had settled these affairs, he pushed on his army to what is called the wood of Jardes, for news was brought him that many of those who had fled from the sieges of Jerusalem and Machærus formerly were concentrated there. When he was therefore come to the place, and perceived that the news was correct, he first surrounded the whole place with his cavalry, that such of the Jews as were bold enough to try to break through might have no possible way of escape because of the cavalry, while he ordered his foot-soldiers to cut down the trees that were in the wood where they had fled. So the Jews were under the necessity of performing some glorious exploit, and of greatly exposing themselves in battle, as they might perhaps so escape. So they rushed forward en masse, with a great shout, and fell upon those that surrounded them. And the Romans received them with great courage, and as the one side fought desperately, and the other would not yield, the fight was prolonged on that account, but the issue of the battle was very different to the two armies.

For it so happened, that only twelve fell on the Roman side, while a few were wounded, but of the Jews not one escaped out of this battle, but they were all killed, being no less than three thousand, including Judas, the son of Arus, their general, concerning whom I have before said that he had been a captain of a certain band at the siege of Jerusalem, and by going down into certain underground passages had privately made his escape.

§ 6. About the same time the emperor wrote to Bassus, and to Liberius Maximus (who was the procurator), and gave orders that all the land of the Jews should be sold. For he did not find any city there, but reserved the country for himself; however, to eight hundred men only, whom he had disbanded from his army, he gave for their habitation a place called Emmaus,<sup>1</sup> which is thirty furlongs from Jerusalem. He also laid a tribute upon the Jews wherever they dwelt, and enjoined every one of them to contribute two drachmæ every year to the Capitol, as they used previously to pay the same to the temple at Jerusalem. Such was the state of the Jewish affairs at this time.

Concerning the Calamities that befell Antiochus, King of Commagene. Also concerning the Alani, and what great Hurt they did to the Medes and Armenians.

§ 1.

AND now, in the fourth year of the reign of Vespasian, it came to pass, that Antiochus, the king of Commagene, and all his family, fell into very great calamities on the following account. Cæsennius Pætus, who was president of Syria at this time, whether stating the real truth, or only out of hatred of Antiochus, (for the real motive was never thoroughly discovered,) sent a letter to Vespasian telling him that Antiochus and his son Epiphanes had resolved to revolt from the Romans, and had made a league with the king of Parthia; and urging that it was necessary to anticipate them, lest, if they got the start of the Romans, they might begin such a war as would cause a general disturbance in the Roman empire. Now Vespasian was not disposed to neglect the matter, as this information reached him; for the neighbourhood of those kings made the matter of greater importance. For Samosata,<sup>1</sup> the capital of Commagene, lies upon the Euphrates, so that the Parthians, had they any such design, could most easily cross over it, and would also have a secure retreat back. Pætus was accordingly believed, and had authority given him to act as he should think proper in the case, so without delay he suddenly marched against Commagene before Antiochus and his people had the least expectation of his coming: having with him the tenth legion, and also some cohorts and troops of horse. The following kings also came to his assistance, Aristobulus, king of the country called Chalcidice,<sup>2</sup> and Sohemus, king of what was called Emesa.<sup>3</sup> Nor was any opposition made to his forces when they entered the kingdom; for none in that country would so much as lift up their hands against them. When Antiochus heard this unexpected news, he could not think in the least of making war upon the Romans, but determined to leave all his kingdom in the state wherein it now was, and to retire privately with his wife and children, thinking thereby to prove himself to the Romans to be innocent of the charge laid against him. So he went a hundred and twenty furlongs from Samosata into the plain, and there encamped.

§ 2. Pætus then sent some of his men to occupy Samosata, and by them took possession of that city, while he went himself to attack Antiochus with the rest of his army. However, the king was not prevailed upon by the necessity he was in to do anything in the way of war against the Romans, but bemoaned his own hard fate, and was for enduring with patience what he had to suffer. But his sons, who were young and inexperienced in war, but of strong bodies, were not easily induced to bear this calamity without fighting. Epiphanes and Callinicus, therefore, betook themselves to force. And as the battle was stoutly contested and lasted all day long, they showed their own valour in a remarkable manner, and nothing but the approach of night put an end to the battle, and that without any diminution of their forces; but Antiochus, although the battle had terminated in this way, did not venture to continue there, but took his wife and daughters, and fled with them to Cilicia, and, by so doing, quite discouraged the spirit of his own soldiers. So they revolted and went over to the Romans, as he despaired of keeping the kingdom, for now the case was looked upon by all as quite desperate. It was therefore necessary that Epiphanes and Callinicus should get safe from their enemies before they became entirely destitute of helpers. Nor were there any more than ten horsemen with them, when they crossed the Euphrates, whence they reached Vologesus, the king of Parthia, in safety, where they were not disregarded as exiles, but had the same respect paid them as if they had retained their ancient prosperity.

§ 3. Now when Antiochus arrived at Tarsus<sup>1</sup> in Cilicia, Pætus despatched a centurion to arrest him, and sent him in bonds to Rome. However, Vespasian could not endure to have the king brought to him in that manner, but thought it fit rather to have regard to their ancient friendship than to preserve an inexorable anger because of this war. So he gave orders, while Antiochus was still upon the road, that they should take off his bonds, and that he should put off his visit to Rome, and for the present go and live at Lacedæmon; he also gave him large revenues, that he might not only live in plenty, but like a king also. Now when Epiphanes and Callinicus, who were before in great fear for their father, were informed of this, their minds were freed from the great concern and anxiety they had been in. They also hoped that Vespasian would be reconciled to them, upon the intercession of Vologesus; for although they lived in plenty, they knew not how to bear living out of the Roman empire. And Vespasian graciously gave them leave, and they went to Rome; and as their father came at once to them from Lacedæmon, they had all sorts of respect paid them there, and there they remained.

§ 4. Now the nation of the Alani who (as I said before somewhere) are Scythians, and dwell near the Tanais<sup>1</sup> and the lake Mæotis,<sup>2</sup> formed about this time the design of invading Media and the country beyond it, in order to plunder them. Accordingly they negotiated with the king of the Hyrcani,<sup>3</sup> for he was master of the pass that king Alexander had shut up with iron gates. And as he gave them leave to come through them, they came en masse, and fell upon the Medes who expected nothing of the kind, and plundered their country, which was populous and rich in cattle, and nobody durst make any resistance against them. For Pacorus, the king of the country, had fled away for fear into places where they could not easily get at him, and had yielded up every thing he had to them, and had only with difficulty saved his wife and concubines from them, after they had been made captives, by paying a hundred talents for their ransom. These Alani therefore plundered the country with great ease and without opposition, and proceeded as far as Armenia, laying all waste before them. Now Tiridates was king of that country, and he met them and fought them, but was nearly taken alive in the battle; for a certain man threw a net over him from some distance, and would soon have drawn him to him, if he had not quickly cut the cord with his sword, and fled first. And the Alani, being still more provoked by this fight, laid waste the country, and carried off with them a great multitude of men, and a great quantity of other spoil they had got from both kingdoms, and then retired back to their own country.

Concerning Masada, and the Sicarii who held it; and how Silva besieged that Fortress. Eleazar's Speeches to the besieged.

§ 1.

WHEN Bassus had died in Judæa, Flavius Silva succeeded him as governor there; and when he saw that all the rest of the country had been subdued in this war, and that there was only one fortress that was still in revolt, he concentrated all his army that was in those parts, and made an expedition against it. This fortress was called Masada,<sup>1</sup> and the commander of the Sicarii, who occupied it, was one Eleazar, an able man, and a descendant of that Judas who had persuaded no few of the Jews, as I before stated, not to submit to the census, when Cyrenius was sent into Judæa to take it. For it was then that the Sicarii banded together against those who were willing to submit to the Romans, and treated them in all respects as if they had been their enemies, plundering them of what they had, and driving away their cattle, and setting fire to their houses. For they said that they differed not at all from foreigners, as they betrayed so ignobly their freedom which the Jews thought ought to be fought for to the utmost, and owned that they preferred slavery under the Romans. Now this was in reality only a pretext and cloak for their barbarity and avarice, as they afterwards made evident by their actions. For those that were partners with them in their rebellion joined them also with in the war against the Romans, and went further lengths in their audacity against them. And when they were again convicted of dissembling in such pretexts, they still more abused those who justly reproached them for their wickedness. And somehow, indeed, that was a time most fertile in all manner of wicked practices among the Jews, insomuch that no kind of villainy was then left undone; nor could any one so much as devise any bad thing that was new if he wished. So deeply were they all infected both privately and publicly, and vied with one another who should run the greatest lengths in impiety towards God, and in unjust actions towards their neighbours, men in power oppressing the multitude, and the multitude earnestly endeavouring to destroy men in power. The latter desired to tyrannize, and the former to offer violence to and plunder those who were richer than themselves. Now the Sicarii first began this lawlessness and barbarity to their kindred, and left no word of reproach unsaid, or deed undone, to destroy those whom they plotted against. However, John showed by his actions that these Sicarii were more moderate than he was himself. For he not only slew all who counselled him to do what was right and expedient, treating them worst of all, as the most bitter enemies that he had among all the citizens, but also filled his country generally with ten thousand woes, such as a man who was already hardened in impiety towards God would naturally do. For he had unlawful food set upon his table, and rejected the purity that the laws of his country had ordained, so that it was no longer a wonder if he, who was so mad in his impiety towards God, did not observe any gentleness or kindness towards men. Again, what evil did not Simon, the son of Gioras, do? or what kind of abuses did he abstain from as to the persons of those very freemen who had set him up as a tyrant? What friendship or relationship did not make them more bold in their daily murders? For they looked upon doing hurt to strangers as only a work of ignoble villainy, but thought barbarity towards their nearest relations a glorious feat. The Idumæans also vied with these men in their fury. For they, vilest wretches that they were, cut the throats of the high priests, that so no part of piety to God might be preserved, and destroyed utterly every vestige of forms of law, and introduced the most complete lawlessness in all cases, in which the class of people called Zealots excelled, who indeed made their name good by their acts. For they were zealous in every bad work, and if their memory recalled any evil thing that had formerly been done, they did not omit zealously to do the same; and yet they gave themselves their name as if zealous for what was good, either bantering those they treated ill because of their brutish disposition, or thinking the greatest of evils good. Accordingly, they each had a fitting end, God awarding to them punishment completely adequate to their deserts. For all such chastisements lit upon them as man's nature is capable of undergoing, till the utmost end of their lives, and till death came upon them in various torments. However, one might say that they suffered less than they inflicted, because it was impossible they could be punished quite according to their deserts. But this is not the proper place to make adequate lamentation for those who were the victims of these men's barbarity. I will therefore return again to the remaining part of my narrative.

§ 2. The Roman general then came and led his army against Eleazar and those Sicarii who held the fortress of Masada with him. As for the whole adjacent country he made himself master of it at once, and put garrisons into the most suitable places of it, and built a wall quite round the entire fortress, that none of the besieged could easily escape, and also set his men to guard the several parts of it. He also carefully pitched his camp in the most suitable place for the siege, where the rocks belonging to the fortress were nearest to the neighbouring mountain, though it was indeed a difficult place for getting plenty of provisions. For not only had food to be brought from a great distance with a great deal of exertion on the part of those Jews who were told off for that purpose, but water also had to be brought to the camp, because the place supplied no fountain that was near. When, therefore, Silva had first seen to these matters, he turned his attention to besieging the place, a task which required a great deal of skill and hard work because of the strength of the fortress, the nature of which I will now describe.

§ 3. There was a rock, not small in circumference, and very high, surrounded by ravines of such vast depth that the eye could not reach their bottom, which were precipitous, and such as no animal could climb except at two places in the rock, where it admits of ascent, though not without difficulty. Now, of these two ways one is from the lake Asphaltitis towards the east, and the other, where the ascent is easier, on the west. One of these ways they call the Serpent,<sup>1</sup> using that comparison because of its narrowness and perpetual windings; for it breaks off where the crags jut out, and returns frequently into itself, and lengthens again by degrees, and proceeds forward not without difficulty. And he that would walk along it must first tread firmly with one foot and then with the other; for to slip is certain destruction; for on each side yawn precipices deep enough to quell all courage by terror. Now when a man has gone along this way for thirty furlongs, what remains is the top of the hill, not ending in a sharp point, but forming table-land as it were on the summit of the hill. Upon this summit Jonathan the high priest first built a fortress and called it Masada. And afterwards the rebuilding of this place employed the care of king Herod to a great degree. For he built a wall made of white stone, seven furlongs long, twelve cubits high, and eight broad, round the entire area of the top of the hill. Thirty-seven towers, each of them fifty cubits high, were also erected upon this wall from which you might pass into chambers built on the inside round the entire wall. For the king reserved the top of the hill, which was rich soil and softer than all the plain, for agriculture, that such as committed themselves for their safety to this fortress, might not even there be quite destitute of food, in case they should ever want it from abroad. He also built a palace thereon at the western ascent, beneath the walls of the fortress, and facing north. Now the wall of this palace was very high and strong, and it had at its corners four towers sixty cubits high. The furniture also of the chambers within and of the porticoes and bath-rooms was of great variety, and very costly, and these buildings were supported by pillars made each of a single stone on every side, and the walls and floors of the chambers were beautified by marble being inlaid. He also cut many deep tanks out of the rocks as reservoirs for water, at every one of the places that were inhabited above and round the palace, and before the wall, and by this contrivance he endeavoured to have as plentiful a supply of water as if there had been fountains there. There was also a road dug from the palace, which led to the very top of the hill, but could not be seen by such as were outside the fortress. Nor indeed could enemies easily make use of the roads they could see. For the road on the east side, as I have already stated, was inaccessible because of its nature; and the western road he blocked up by a large tower at its narrowest place, at no less a distance from the top of the hill than a thousand cubits, which tower could not possibly be passed by, nor could it be easily taken. Indeed those that walked along it without any danger<sup>1</sup> could not, such was its contrivance, easily get to the end of it. So strong was this fortress both by nature and art against the attacks of enemies.

§ 4. As for the various things that were stored up within it, one would wonder still more at their abundance and the time they lasted. For here was laid up corn in great quantity, such as would suffice for a long time, and also wine and oil in abundance; and all kinds of pulse, and dates, were stored up there; all which things Eleazar found there, when he and his Sicarii got possession of the fortress by treachery. These fruits also were in prime condition, and not at all inferior to fruits newly stored up, although it was little short of a hundred years from the storing up of these provisions till the fortress was captured by the Romans. The Romans also found those fruits that were left not at all spoilt. Nor would one be wrong in supposing the air to be the cause of their lasting good so long, as owing to the height of the fortress the air is so free from the mixture of everything earthy and muddy. There was also found here a large quantity of all sorts of weapons of war, which had been stored up by king Herod, sufficient for ten thousand men: there was also unwrought iron and brass, and moreover lead, which show that Herod had taken much pains to have all things ready here for great emergencies. For it is said that he prepared this fortress for himself, as a refuge against two kinds of danger which he anticipated, one from the Jewish people, lest they should depose him, and restore their former kings to the throne, but the other danger was greater and more formidable, namely from Cleopatra, the queen of Egypt, who did not conceal her intentions, but spoke often to Antony, asking him to take off Herod, and entreating him to bestow the kingdom of Judæa upon her. And certainly one might wonder that Antony never complied with her imperiousness in this point, as he was such a slave to his passion for her; for one would not have expected that he would not have gratified her in this. However, it was the fear of these dangers that made Herod rebuild Masada, and leave it for the finishing stroke of the Romans in this Jewish war.

§ 5. When the Roman commander Silva had now built a wall outside round the whole fortress, as I have said already, and had so made the most careful provision to prevent any of the besieged escaping, he undertook the siege in person, though he found but one place that would allow of his raising earthworks. For behind the tower which blocked up the road that led to the palace and to the top of the hill from the west, there was a certain rock jutting out, very broad and very prominent, three hundred cubits lower than the summit of Masada, which was called Leuce.<sup>1</sup> So Silva got upon that rock, and ordered the army to bring earth. And as they fell to that work with alacrity, and there were many hands, the bank was solidly raised two hundred cubits high. However, this bank was not thought sufficiently firm and strong to support the scaling ladders, so another embankment of great stones compacted together, fifty cubits both in breadth and height, was put upon it. The structure of the other engines was like that of those that had been first devised for sieges by Vespasian, and afterwards by Titus. There was also a tower constructed sixty cubits high, plated all over with iron, from which the Romans threw missiles and stones from their engines, and soon made those that fought on the wall retire, and prevented their lifting up their heads over it. At the same time Silva constructed a great battering-ram, and ordered it to be frequently applied against the wall, and with some difficulty broke down a part of the wall, and quite overthrew it. However, the Sicarii had anticipated him by having built another wall within, which should not be liable to the same misfortune from the battering-rams as the other: for it was made soft and yielding, and so was capable of weakening the terrible battering of the ram. It was constructed in the following manner. Great beams were laid lengthways, near one another at their ends: laid at such a distance from each other in two parallel rows as the breadth of the wall required, and earth was put into the space between these rows. Now, that the earth might not fall away upon the elevation of this bank to a greater height, they further bound those beams together that lay lengthways by other beams across them. And so this work of theirs was like a real building. And when the battering-rams were applied, their blows were weakened by its yielding, and as the materials were by such concussion shaken closer together, the wall became firmer than before. When Silva saw this, he thought it best to endeavour to take this wall by setting fire to it, so he gave orders to the soldiers to throw a great number of burning torches against it; and as it was chiefly made of wood, it soon took fire; and when it was once set on fire, its hollowness made the fire spread to a mighty flame. Now at the very beginning of this fire, a north wind that blew was terrible to the Romans; for by bringing the flame down it drove it upon them, and they were almost in despair, fearing their engines would be burnt. But after this suddenly the wind veered round to the south, as if by divine providence, and blew strongly the contrary way, and carried back the flame, and drove it against the wall, which was now on fire from top to bottom. Thus the Romans, being thus divinely assisted, returned to their camp with joy, and resolved to attack their enemies the next day, and set their watch more carefully than usual that night, lest any of the enemy should steal a march on them and escape.

§ 6. However, neither did Eleazar himself once think of fleeing away, nor would he permit any one else to do so. But when he saw their wall burned down by the fire, and could devise no other way of escaping, or opportunity for further exhibition of courage, and set before his eyes what the Romans would do to them and their children and wives, if they were victorious, he thought about having them all slain. Now, as he judged this the best thing to do in the present circumstances, he got together the most courageous of his companions, and encouraged them to take that course by the following speech. "Since we, long ago, my brave friends, resolved never to be slaves to the Romans, nor to any other than to God himself (who alone is the true and just lord of mankind), the time is now come that obliges us to carry out that resolve in act. And let us not at this crisis bring the reproach upon ourselves that, whereas we would not formerly undergo slavery without danger, we now together with slavery choose such punishments also as will be intolerable, if we fall alive into the power of the Romans. We were the very first of all that revolted from them, and we are the last that fight against them; and I cannot but esteem it as a favour that God has granted us that it is still in our power to die nobly and in a state of freedom, which has not been the case of others who were conquered against their expectation. It is very plain that we shall be captured within a day's time, but we have still the choice to die in a glorious manner with our dearest friends. This our enemies themselves cannot by any means hinder, although they are very desirous to take us alive, nor can we hope any more to fight them and beat them. It was indeed our duty, perhaps, at the very first, when we were so desirous of defending our liberty, and when we received such sore treatment from one another, and worse treatment from our enemies, to have conjectured the purpose of God, and to have recognized that the Jewish nation, of old dear to him, was now doomed to destruction. For had he either continued favourable, or been only in a minor degree displeased with us, he would not have allowed the destruction of so many men, or abandoned his most holy city to be burnt and demolished by our enemies. But we, it seems, hoped to have preserved ourselves alone of all the Jewish race in a state of freedom, as if we had been guilty of no sins ourselves against God, nor been partners with those of others, when we even taught others! Wherefore, consider how God convinces us that our hopes are vain, by bringing such distress upon us, beyond our expectation, in the desperate case we are now in. For not only has the invincible nature of this fortress not proved our safety, but also, though we have still great abundance of food, and a great quantity of arms, and other necessaries more than we want, we are openly deprived by God himself of all hope of deliverance. For the fire which did drive upon our enemies, did not of its own accord turn back upon the wall which we had built, but it was God's anger that brought it against us for the many mad crimes we have been guilty of in regard to our own countrymen; the punishments for which let us not receive from the Romans, but from God himself, executed by our own hands; for these will be more easy than the treatment we should experience from the Romans. Let our wives die before they are outraged, and our children before they have tasted of slavery, and after we have slain them, let us bestow that glorious benefit upon one another mutually, and preserve our freedom as a noble end of our lives. But first let us destroy our money and the fortress by fire. For I am well assured that this will be a great grief to the Romans, that they shall not be able to seize upon our bodies, and shall fail to get our wealth also. And let us spare nothing but our provisions; for they will testify when we are dead, that we were not subdued for want of necessaries, but that, according to our original resolve, we preferred death to slavery."

§ 7. Such was Eleazar's speech to them. However, the opinions of those present did not acquiesce therein. For although some were eager to obey, and were all but filled with pleasure at the idea, thinking such a death noble, yet those that were more tender had compassion for their wives and families; and as these men were especially moved at the prospect of their own certain death, they looked wistfully at one another, and declared by the tears that were in their eyes their dissent from his opinion. When Eleazar saw them in such fear, and that their souls were dejected at so stern a resolve, he was afraid lest perhaps they should by their lamentations and tears cow the spirit of those that had heard what he said courageously. So he did not leave off exhorting them, but stirred up himself, and, being full of matter, attempted to speak more clearly to them concerning the immortality of the soul, and with indignation fixing his eyes intently on those that wept, he spoke as follows. "Truly I was very greatly mistaken, when I thought I was assisting brave men in struggling hard for their liberty, and men who were resolved either to live with honour or else to die. For I find that you are no better than others either in virtue or in courage, since you are afraid of dying, though you would be delivered thereby from the greatest miseries, while you ought to make no delay in this matter, nor wait for any one to give you advice. For divine revelation and our national ideas have continually taught us, from the earliest moment that we could use our reason, and our forefathers have corroborated the same teaching by their actions and spirit, that it is life that is a calamity to men, and not death. For this last gives our souls liberty, and lets them depart to their own place of purity, where they will be insensible to all misery. For while souls are tied down to a mortal body, they are partakers of its miseries, and to speak the real truth, are themselves dead; for the union of what is divine to what is mortal is unbecoming. It is true, the power of the soul is great, even when it is imprisoned in the body: for by moving it in a way that is invisible, it makes the body a sensible instrument of its own, and causes it to advance further in its actions than mortal nature could otherwise do. However, when it is freed from the weight which hangs to it and draws it down to the earth, it gets again its own proper place, and becomes then a partaker of blessed power and abilities entirely free, continuing invisible to the eyes of men, as God himself. For certainly it is not seen when it is in the body, for it comes there in an invisible manner, and when it is freed from it, it is still not seen, for its nature is one and incorruptible, but yet it is the cause of change in the body. For whatever the soul touches lives and flourishes, but whatever is removed from it withers away and dies; so much is there in it of immortality. Let sleep be a most evident proof to you of what I say, for in it souls, when the body does not distract them, have the sweetest rest in themselves, and conversing with God because of their relationship to him, go everywhere, and foretell many future things. And why ought we to fear death, while we are pleased with the rest we have in sleep? And how is it not absurd to pursue after liberty while we are alive, and yet to grudge it to ourselves when it will be eternal? We, therefore, who have been brought up in our national ideas, ought to set an example to others in readiness to die. However, if we stand in need of foreigners to support us in this matter, let us consider those Indians who profess to practise philosophy. Those good men unwillingly undergo the time of life as a necessary burden of nature, and hasten to let their souls loose from their bodies: nay, when no misfortune presses them to it, nor drives them upon it, they have such a desire of the life of immortality, that they tell other men beforehand that they are about to depart, and nobody hinders them; but every one thinks them happy men, and gives them letters to be carried to their familiar friends. So firmly and certainly do they believe that souls converse with one another [in the other world]. And when they have heard all such commands as are given them, they deliver their body to the fire, that they may get their soul separated from the body in the greatest purity, and die in the midst of hymns of commendation. For their dearest friends conduct them to their death more willingly than do any of the rest of mankind conduct their fellow-citizens when they are going a very long journey, and weep indeed on their own account, but look upon the others as happy persons, as so soon to be received among the immortal order of beings. Are not we, therefore, ashamed to have lower notions than the Indians, and by our own cowardice to lay a base reproach upon the laws of our country, which are so much emulated by all mankind? And even if we had been brought up from the first in other notions, and taught that life is the greatest good for men, and that death is a calamity, yet the circumstances we are now in exhort us to bear it courageously, since it is by the will of God and by necessity that we are to die. For long ago God made, as it seems, this decree against the whole Jewish nation, that we were to be deprived of life, as we would not make a good use of it. For do not ascribe the causes of our present sad condition to yourselves, nor gratify the Romans by thinking that this war we have had with them has undone us all. For these things have not come to pass by their might, but a more powerful cause has intervened, and made them seem our conquerors. By what Roman weapons, pray, were those Jews who inhabited Cæsarea<sup>1</sup> slain, who, when they were no way disposed to rebel, but were all the while keeping their sabbath, and did not so much as lift up their hands against them, yet had their throats cut by the people of Cæsarea, who ran upon them, and also cut the throats of their wives and children, and that without any regard to the Romans, who never took us for their enemies till we revolted from them? But, perhaps, some one will say that the people of Cæsarea always quarrelled with those that lived among them, and that they only seized the opportunity to satisfy their old hatred against them. What then shall we say of those in Scythopolis,<sup>2</sup> who ventured to wage war with us on account of the Greeks, but did not avenge themselves upon the Romans in concert with our kinsmen? Much therefore, did their good-will and fidelity profit them, as they and their whole families were slain in the most inhuman manner, which was the return they had for their assistance! For they suffered the very same things which they had prevented from falling upon the others, as if they had themselves wished to inflict them. It would be too long for me to speak at this time of every particular in detail. For you cannot be ignorant that there was not any city in Syria which did not slay its Jewish inhabitants, though they were more hostile to us than the Romans were. Nay, the inhabitants of Damascus, though they were able to allege no specious pretext against us, filled their city with the most barbarous slaughter of our people, cutting the throats of eighteen thousand Jews, together with their wives and children. As to the number of those who were tortured to death in Egypt, we have been informed that they were more than sixty thousand. They indeed were so killed perhaps in a foreign country because they found no one to help them against their enemies; but as for all those of us who have waged war against the Romans in our own country, had we not sufficient reason to have hope of sure victory? For we had arms and walls, and fortresses so constructed as not to be easily taken, and courage not to be shaken by any dangers in the cause of liberty, which encouraged us all to revolt from the Romans. But these advantages did us good only for a short time, and only raised our hopes, while they really appeared to be the cause of greater miseries. For all we had has been taken from us, and all has fallen into the hands of our enemies, as if these advantages were only to render their victory over us the more glorious, and were not for the safety of those by whom these preparations for war were made. As for those who have already died in battle, we ought to esteem them blessed (for they died in defending, not in betraying, liberty), but as to the multitude of those who are now under the Romans, who would not pity their condition? and who would not be eager to die before he suffered the same miseries as them? For some of them have been put upon the rack, and tortured with fire and scourgings, and so died. Others have been half-devoured by wild beasts, and yet have been preserved alive to be devoured by them a second time, in order to afford laughter and sport to our enemies. And those that are alive still are to be looked on as the most miserable, who, though they frequently pray for death, cannot have that boon. And where is now that great city, the metropolis of the whole Jewish nation, which was fortified by so many walls round it, and had so many fortifications and huge towers to defend it, and could hardly hold the stores prepared for the war, and had so many myriads of men to fight for it? Where, I say, is our city that was believed to have God himself inhabiting it? It is now rased to its very foundations, and the only memorial of it that is preserved is the camp of those who destroyed it, which is still erected upon its ruins. Some unfortunate old men also sit among the ashes of the temple, and a few women are kept there by the enemy for the most shameful lust. Who is there that revolves these things in his mind, and yet can bear the sight of the sun, though he might live free from danger? Who is so much his country's enemy, or so cowardly and fond of life, as not to be sorry that he is still alive? How I would that we had all died, before we had seen the holy city demolished by the hands of our enemies, before we had seen our holy temple rased to the ground in so profane a manner! But since a generous hope deluded us that perhaps we might be able to avenge our country's ruin on our enemies, though it has now vanished, and left us alone in our distress, let us lose no time in dying bravely. Let us pity ourselves, our children, and our wives, while it is in our power to show pity to them. For we were born to die, as also those whom we have begotten, nor is it in the power of the most happy of our race to avoid this; but outrage and slavery, and to see our wives and children led away for disgrace, these are not such evils as are natural and necessary among men; although such as do not prefer death to them, when death is in their power, must undergo even them because of their cowardice. We revolted from the Romans, pluming ourselves greatly upon our courage, and when now, at the very last, they offered us the chance of safety, we would not listen to them. Who can, therefore, doubt that they will certainly be in a rage with us if they take us alive? Miserable will then be the young men, who will be strong enough in their bodies to bear much torture, miserable also will be those of older years, who will not be able to bear such ill treatment as young men can! One will see his wife led off to be outraged, another will hear the voice of his son, imploring help of his father whose hands are bound. But while our hands are still at liberty, and have a sword in them, let them minister to us in our glorious design! Let us die before we become slaves of our enemies, and let us go out of the world with our children and wives in a state of freedom! This our laws command us to do, this our wives and children crave at our hands. God himself has sent this necessity upon us, while the Romans desire the contrary, and are afraid lest any of us should die before we are captured. Let us therefore make haste, and instead of giving them the pleasure they hope for in getting us in their power, let us leave them awe at our death and admiration at our courage."

How the People that were in the Fortress were prevailed on by the Words of Eleazar, except two Women and five Children, and submitted to be killed by one another.

§ 1.

NOW though Eleazar wished to pursue his exhortation, they all cut him short, and made haste to do the work, being full of an unconquerable ardour of mind, and went their way as if possessed, one still endeavouring to anticipate another, and thinking that this eagerness would be a proof of their courage and judgment, if they could avoid appearing among the last to do as Eleazar urged; so great an ardour came upon them to slay their wives and children and themselves also. Nor indeed, when they came to the work itself, did their courage fail them, as one might imagine it would have done, but they then held fast without wavering to the same resolution which they had upon the hearing of Eleazar's speech, though every one of them still retained the natural passion of love to themselves and their families, because the thought carried the day with them that they were consulting for the best interests of those who were nearest and dearest to them. For husbands tenderly embraced their wives, and took their children into their arms, and clung to their parting kisses with tears in their eyes; but at the same time they carried out what they had resolved on, as if doing it with the hands of strangers, making their anticipation of the miseries they would suffer, if they fell into the hands of their enemies, their comfort for the necessity of this. Nor was there at last any one of these men found who did not act his part in this terrible execution, but every one of them despatched his nearest relations. Miserable men indeed were they for the necessity they were in, to whom to slay their wives and children with their own hands seemed the lightest evil before them! Then not being able to bear the grief they were in for what they had done any longer, and esteeming it a wrong to those they had slain to live even the shortest space of time after them, they quickly laid all they had on a heap, and set fire to it; and chose ten men by lot out of them to slay all the rest, and every one laid himself down by his wife and children on the ground, and threw his arms about them, and offered his neck to the stroke of those who executed the melancholy office. And when these ten had intrepidly slain all the others, they made the same rule for casting lots for themselves, that he on whom the lot fell should first kill the other nine and then himself. All of these had courage sufficient to be no way behind one another in doing or suffering; and eventually the nine offered their necks to the last one left, and he took a view of all the other bodies, lest perchance someone or other in so large a butchery might want his assistance to be despatched, and when he perceived that they were all dead, he set fire to the palace, and with great force ran his sword into his body, and fell down dead near his own relations. And all these died in the idea that they had not left one soul among them alive to be subject to the Romans; but one old woman, and another who was akin to Eleazar, and superior to most women in intelligence and wisdom, and five children, had secretly concealed themselves in caverns under ground, and had carried water there for their drink, when the rest were intent upon the slaughter of one another, who were nine hundred and sixty in number, women and children being included in that computation. This tragedy happened on the fifteenth day of the month Xanthicus.

§ 2. As for the Romans, they expected a battle in the morning, so they put on their armour, and with their scaling ladders bridged over a way from their banks, and began their assault upon the fortress. But they saw no enemy, but a terrible solitude on every side, and fire and perfect silence within the place, so they were at a loss to make out what had happened; and at last they raised a shout, as they used to do when they hurled missiles, to try if they could bring out any one that was within: and the two women heard this noise, and came out of their underground caverns, and informed the Romans of what had been done, just as it had happened, and one of them clearly described how everything had been said and done. But they did not readily credit her account, for they could hardly believe such a desperate act: but attempted to put the fire out, and quickly cutting a way through it, entered the palace. And when they met with the multitude of the slain, they did not rejoice though it had happened to their enemies, but marvelled at the courage of their resolution, and the intrepid contempt of death which so great a number of them had shown by such a deed as this.

CHAP. X.

How many of the Sicarii fled to Alexandria, and what Dangers they were in there; on which account the Temple, which had formerly been built by Onias the High Priest, was destroyed.

§ 1.

WHEN Masada was thus taken, the general left a garrison in the fortress, and himself went to Cæsarea with his army. For there were now no enemies left in the country, but it was all overthrown by so long a war, which brought about perception and danger of disorder even in places very remote. Moreover, it came to pass that many Jews were slain at Alexandria in Egypt after this. For as many of the Sicarii as were able to flee there were not content with having saved their lives, but again attempted to make new disturbances, and urged many of those who entertained them to assert their liberty, and to esteem the Romans as no better than themselves, and to look upon God as their only lord and master. And when some of the leading Jews opposed them, they slew some of them, and were very pressing in their exhortations to the others to revolt from the Romans. But when the principal members of the Jewish council saw their madness, they thought it no longer safe for themselves to overlook it, so they got all the Jews together to an assembly, and laid before them the madness of the Sicarii, and showed that they had been the authors of all the evils that had come upon them. They said also that these men, since they had no sure hope of escape, now they had fled from Judæa (because as soon as ever it was known they were there, they would at once be destroyed by the Romans), had come there to give those who had not been partakers with them in any of their crimes a share in their own richly-deserved misfortunes. So they exhorted the multitude to have a care lest they should be brought to destruction by them, and to make their apology to the Romans for their own conduct in harbouring them by delivering these men up to them. And they, recognising the greatness of the danger they were in listened to what was said, and ran with great violence upon the Sicarii, and arrested them. And six hundred of them were captured immediately, and it was not long before all those that fled into Egypt and to the Egyptian Thebes<sup>1</sup> were arrested also and brought back; whose stout-heartedness, whether recklessness or obstinacy of opinion, everybody was amazed at. For though all sorts of torture and ill-treatment of their bodies were devised, they could not get any of them to confess or be willing to say that the emperor was their lord, though that was all that was required of them, but they maintained their own opinion in spite of all the distress they were brought to, as if they received these torments and fire itself with bodies insensible of pain, and with a soul that all but rejoiced under them. But what was most of all astonishing to the spectators was the courage of the children; for not one of these children was so far overcome as to call the emperor lord. So much does the strength of courage prevail over the weakness of the body.

§ 2. Now Lupus at this time administered Alexandria, and quickly sent the emperor word of this commotion. And he suspecting the restless temper of the Jews for innovation, and being afraid lest they should get together to a head again, and join others with them, gave orders to Lupus to demolish the Jewish temple which was in the region called the region of Onias. It was in Egypt, and owed both its building and name to the following cause. Onias, the son of Simon, one of the high priests at Jerusalem, fled from Antiochus the king of Syria, when he made war against the Jews, and went to Alexandria. And as Ptolemy received him very kindly, on account of his hatred to Antiochus, Onias assured him, if he would comply with his proposal, that he would make all the Jews his allies. And when the king agreed to do all that he was able, Onias desired him to give him leave to build a temple somewhere in Egypt, and that he might worship God according to the customs of his own country; for he said the Jews would then be so much readier to fight against Antiochus, who had laid waste the temple at Jerusalem, and would have greater good-will to him, and if he granted them security for their religion, many of them would come over to him.

§ 3. And Ptolemy listened to what he said, and gave him a region a hundred and eighty furlongs from Memphis.<sup>1</sup> It was the district called the district of Heliopolis,<sup>2</sup> where Onias built a fortress, and a temple not like that at Jerusalem, but resembling a tower. He built it of large stones to the height of sixty cubits, and constructed the altar in imitation of that in our own country, and adorned it similarly with gifts, except as regards the candlestick. For he did not make a candlestick, but had one golden lamp made, which illuminated the place with its light, and which he hung by a chain of gold. And the whole temple enclosure was surrounded with a wall of burnt brick, though it had gates of stone. The king also gave him a large district for a revenue in money, not only that the priests might have a plentiful provision made for them, but also that God might have abundance of what was necessary for his worship. However, Onias did not do all this from sound judgment, but because he was at variance with the Jews at Jerusalem, cherishing malice because of his exile, and he thought that by building this temple he should draw away the multitude from them to it. There had also been a certain ancient prediction made by [a prophet] whose name was Isaiah about six hundred years before, that this temple should be built by a man that was a Jew in Egypt.<sup>3</sup> Such is the history of the building of this temple.

§ 4. And now Lupus, the governor of Alexandria, upon the receipt of the emperor's letter, went to this temple, and carried out of it some of the votive offerings, and closed it. And as Lupus died a little afterwards, Paulinus, who succeeded him as governor, left none of the votive offerings there (for he threatened the priests severely if they did not bring them all out), nor did he permit those who were desirous of worship even to come near the sacred enclosure, but shut the gates, and made it entirely inaccessible, so that there remained no longer any trace of any divine worship having been in that place. Now the time from the building of this temple till it was shut up again was three hundred and forty-three years.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning Jonathan, one of the Sicarii, who stirred up a Sedition in Cyrene, and was a false Accuser.

§ 1.

AND now the madness of the Sicarii spread, like a disease, as far as the cities in the neighbourhood of Cyrene.<sup>1</sup> For one Jonathan, a very vile person, and by trade a weaver, escaped there, and prevailed upon no small number of the poorer sort to give ear to him, and led them into the desert, promising them that he would shew them signs and apparitions. As for the other Jews of Cyrene, he concealed his knavish tricks from them, but those of the greatest dignity among them informed Catullus, the governor of the Libyan Pentapolis, of his march into the desert, and of the preparations he had made. And he despatched both horse and foot, and easily overcame them, because they were unarmed men: and most were slain in the fight, but some were taken alive, and brought before Catullus. As for Jonathan, the leader of the plot, he fled away for the time, but upon a great and very diligent search all over the country for him, he was captured also. And when he was brought before Catullus, he devised a way whereby he not only escaped punishment himself, but also gave Catullus a handle for doing much mischief. For he falsely accused the richest of the Jews, and said that they had suggested to him his plot.

§ 2. Now Catullus readily listened to his calumnies, and exaggerated the matter greatly in a very theatrical way, that he also might be supposed to have had success in a Jewish war. But what was still harder, he not only gave too easy belief to his stories, but he also taught the Sicarii to accuse men falsely. He bade this Jonathan, at any rate, to name one Alexander, a Jew (with whom he had formerly had a quarrel and open hostility), and also got him to name his wife Berenice, as concerned with him. These two Catullus ordered to be slain first, and after them he caused all the rich and wealthy Jews to be slain, in number no less than three thousand. This he thought he might do safely, because he confiscated their effects, and added them to the emperor's revenues.

§ 3. Moreover, lest any Jews that lived elsewhere should convict him of his villainy, he extended his false accusations further, and persuaded Jonathan, and some others who were taken with him, to bring an accusation of desire for innovation against Jews that were of the best character both at Alexandria and at Rome. One of those who were insidiously accused was Josephus, the writer of this history. However, this plot, thus contrived by Catullus, did not succeed according to his hope. For though he went himself to Rome, and brought Jonathan and his companions with him in bonds, and thought he should have had no further inquiry made as to the lies that were forged under his government, or by him, Vespasian suspected the matter, and made an inquiry into the truth. And when he found out that the accusation laid against the Jews was an unjust one, he cleared them of the crimes charged upon them at the instigation of Titus, and brought the punishment he deserved upon Jonathan; for he was first tortured, and then burnt alive.

But not long afterwards he fell into a complicated and incurable disease, and died miserably. He was not only afflicted in body, but the disease in his mind was heavier still. For he was terribly disturbed by fears, and continually cried out that he saw the ghosts of those whom he had slain standing before him; and was not able to contain himself, but leaped out of his bed, as if both torture and fire were brought to him. And his disease grew worse and worse continually, and his very entrails were so corroded, that they fell out of his body, and so he died. Thus he became as great an instance of divine providence as ever was, and demonstration that God punishes wicked men.

§ 5. And here I shall put an end to my history, which I formerly promised to deliver with all accuracy to such as should wish to know in what manner this war between the Romans and the Jews was managed. As to its style, I must leave that to the determination of my readers; but as for the agreement with the facts, I shall not scruple to say, and that boldly, that truth has been the only thing I have aimed at through its entire composition.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS, ON THE ANTIQUITY OF THE JEWS
AGAINST APION.

BOOK I.

I SUPPOSE that by my history of the Antiquities of the Jews, most excellent Épaphroditus, I have made it quite clear to those that peruse it that our Jewish nation is of very great antiquity, and had a distinct existence of its own originally, as also how we came to inhabit the country wherein we now live. These Antiquities contain the history of five thousand years, and are taken out of our sacred books, and written by me in the Greek tongue. However, as I observe a considerable number of people give ear to the reproaches that are uttered against us by some who bear ill-will to us, and disbelieve what I have written concerning the antiquity of our nation, and take as a proof that our nation is of a late date the fact that they are not thought worthy of any mention by the most famous Greek historians, I have thought it right to write somewhat briefly about these matters, to convict those that so reproach us of spite and voluntary falsehood, and to correct the ignorance of others, and also to instruct all those who are desirous of knowing the truth about our antiquity. As for the witnesses whom I shall produce for the proof of what I say, they shall be such as are esteemed by the Greeks to be most trustworthy as regards all antiquarian lore. I shall also show that those who have written reproachfully and falsely about us are refuted by themselves. I shall also endeavour to give the reasons why not many Greeks have mentioned our nation in their histories; I shall, however, bring those to light who have not passed over our history, for the sake of those that either do not know or pretend not to know them.

§ 2. First then I cannot but greatly wonder at those who think that we must attend to none but Greeks as to the most ancient facts, and learn the truth from them only, and that we are not to believe ourselves or other men. For I am convinced that the very reverse is the case, if we will not follow vain opinions, but extract the truth from the facts themselves. For you will find that almost all which concerns the Greeks happened not long ago, nay, one may say, is of yesterday and the day before only; I speak of the building of their cities, the inventions of their arts, and the recording of their laws; and as for their care about compiling histories, it is very nearly the last thing they set about. Indeed they admit themselves that it is the Egyptians the Chaldæans and the Phœnicians (for I will not now include ourselves among those) that have preserved the memory of the most ancient and lasting tradition. For all these nations inhabit such countries as are least subject to destruction from the climate and atmosphere, and they have also taken especial care to have nothing forgotten of what was done among them, but their history was esteemed sacred, and ever written in the public records by men of the greatest wisdom. Whereas ten thousand destructions have afflicted the country which the Greeks inhabit, and blotted out the memory of former actions; so that, ever beginning a new way of living, they supposed each of them that their mode of life originated with themselves. It was also late, and with difficulty, that they came to know the use of letters. For those who would trace their knowledge of letters to the greatest antiquity, boast that they learned them from the Phœnicians and from Cadmus. But nobody is able to produce any writing preserved from that time, either in the temples or in any other public monuments; and indeed the time when those lived who went to the Trojan war so many years afterwards is in great doubt, and it is a question whether the Greeks used letters at that time; and the most prevailing opinion, and that nearest the truth, is, that they were ignorant of the present way of using letters. Certainly there is not any writing among them, which the Greeks agree to be genuine, ancients than Homer's poems. And he plainly was later than the siege of Troy: and they say that even he did not leave his poems in writing, but that their memory was preserved in songs, and that they were afterwards collected together, and that that is the reason why such a number of variations are found in them. As for those who set about writing histories among them, such I mean as Cadmus of Miletus,<sup>1</sup> and Acusilaus of Argos,<sup>2</sup> and any others that may be mentioned after him, they lived but a short time before the Persian expedition into Greece. Moreover, as to those who first philosophized as to things celestial and divine among the Greeks, as Pherecydes the Syrian, and Pythagoras, and Thales, all with one consent agree, that they learned what they knew from the Egyptians and Chaldæans, and wrote but little. And these are the things which are supposed to be the oldest of all among the Greeks, and they have much ado to believe that the writings ascribed to those men are genuine.

§ 3. How can it then be other than an absurd thing for the Greeks to be so proud, as if they were the only people acquainted with antiquity, the only people that have handed down the truth about those early times in an accurate manner? Nay, who is there that cannot easily gather from the Greek writers themselves, that they knew but little on good foundation when they set about writing, but rather jotted down their own conjectures as to facts? Accordingly they frequently confute one another in their own books, and do not hesitate to give us the most contradictory accounts of the same things. But I should spend my time to little purpose, if I should teach the Greeks what they know better than me already, what great discrepancy there is between Hellanicus and Acusilaus as to their genealogies, in how many cases Acusilaus corrects Hesiod, or how Ephorus demonstrates Hellanicus to have told lies in most of his history; or how Timæus in like manner contradicts Ephorus, and the succeeding writers Timæus, and all writers Herodotus. Nor could Timæus agree with Antiochus and Philistus and Callias about Sicilian history, any more than do the several writers of the Atthidæ follow one another as to Athenian affairs, nor do the historians that wrote on Argolic history coincide about the affairs of the Argives. And now what need I say any more about particular cities and smaller places, when in the most approved writers of the expedition of the Persians, and of the actions done in it, there are such great differences? Nay, Thucydides himself is accused by some as often writing what is false, although he seems to have given us the most accurate history of the affairs of his own times.

§ 4. As for the causes of such great discrepancy, many others may perhaps appear probable to those who wish to investigate the matter, but I attach the greatest importance to two which I shall mention. And first I shall mention what seems to me the principal cause, namely, the fact that from the beginning the Greeks were careless about public records of what was done on each occasion, and this would naturally pave the way for error, and give those that wished to write on old subjects opportunity for lying. For not only were records neglected by the other Greeks, but even among the Athenians themselves also, who pretend to be Autochthons, and to have applied themselves to learning, there are no such records extant, but they say that the laws of Draco concerning murders, which are now extant in writing, are the most ancient of their public records, yet Draco lived only a little before the tyrant Pisistratus. For as to the Arcadians, who make such boasts of their antiquity, why need I mention them, since it was still later before they learned their letters, and that with difficulty also?

§ 5. There must, therefore, naturally arise great differences among writers, when no records existed, which might at once inform those who desired to learn, and refute those that would tell lies. However, we must assign a second cause, besides the former one, for these discrepancies.

Those who were the most zealous to write history were not solicitous for the discovery of truth, although it is very easy always to make such a profession, but they tried to display their fine powers of writing, and in whatever manner of writing they thought they were able to exceed others, to that did they apply themselves. Some betook themselves to the writing of fabulous narrations; some endeavoured to please cities or kings by writing in their commendation; others fell to finding faults with transactions, or with the writers of such transactions, and thought to make a great figure by so doing. However, such do what is of all things the most contrary to true history. For it is the characteristic of true history, that all both speak and write the same about the same things, whereas these men, by writing differently about the same things, thought they would be supposed to write with the greatest regard to truth. We must indeed yield to the Greek writers as to language and style of composition, but not as regards the truth of ancient history, and least of all as to the national customs of various countries.

§ 6. As to the care of writing down the records from the earliest antiquity, that the priests were intrusted with that function, and philosophized about it, among the Egyptians and Babylonians, and the Chaldæans also among the Babylonians, and that the Phœnicians, who especially mixed with the Greeks, made use of letters both for the common affairs of life, and for handing down the history of public transactions, I think I may omit any proof of this, because all men allow it to be so. But I shall endeavour briefly to show that our forefathers took the same care about writing their records (for I will not say they took greater care than the others I spoke of), and that they committed that office to their high priests and prophets, and that these records have been written all along down to our own times with the utmost accuracy, and that, if it be not too bold for me to say so, our history will be so written hereafter.

§ 7. For our forefathers not only appointed for that purpose from the beginning the best of men and those that attended upon the divine worship, but also made provision that the stock of the priests should continue unmixed and pure. For he who is partaker of the priesthood must marry a wife of the same nation, without having any regard to money or other honours, and he is to carefully take his wife's genealogy from the ancient records, and procure many witnesses to it.<sup>1</sup> And this is our practice not only in Judæa itself, but wherever any body of men of our nation live, and an exact account of our priests' marriages is kept even in Egypt and Babylon, and any other place in the rest of the world wherever any of our priests are scattered. For they send to Jerusalem the names and pedigree of their parents in writing, as well as those of their remoter ancestors, and state who are the witnesses. And if any war breaks out, as has frequently happened before now, as when Antiochus Epiphanes invaded our country, as also when Pompey the Great and Quintilius Varus did so also, and especially in the wars that have happened in our own times, those priests that survive them compose new tables of genealogy out of the old records, and examine into the state of the women that remain. For they do not receive those that have been captives, suspecting that they have frequently had sexual intercourse with strangers. But what is the strongest proof of our accuracy in this matter is that we have the names of our high priests from father to son set down in our records for two thousand years. And whatever priest violates any of these rules is prohibited to stand at the altar, or to participate in any other of our holy rites. And this is justly, or rather necessarily done, because every one is not permitted of his own accord to be a writer, nor is there any discrepancy in what is written, as only prophets have written the original and earliest accounts of things, as they learned them of God himself by inspiration, as they have also written clearly what happened in their own times.

§ 8. For we have not ten thousand books among us, disagreeing with and contradicting one another, but only twenty-two books, which contain the records of all time, and are justly believed to be divine. And five of them are by Moses, and contain his laws and the traditions of the origin of mankind and the subsequent history of the Jews till his death. This time was little short of three thousand years. And as to the time from the death of Moses till the reign of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, who reigned after Xerxes, the prophets who succeeded Moses wrote down what happened in their times in thirteen books; and the remaining four books contain hymns to God, and precepts for the conduct of human life. Our history has also been written in detail from Artaxerxes to our own times, but is not esteemed equally authoritative as the before-mentioned books, because there was not then an exact succession of prophets. And how much we credit these books of ours is evident by our action. For though so many ages have already passed, no one has ventured either to add any thing to them, or to take any thing from them, or to make any change in them. But it is innate in all Jews, immediately from their very birth, to esteem these books to contain divine doctrines, and to abide by them, and, if necessary, gladly to die for them. For many Jewish captives have frequently been seen ere now to endure racks and deaths of all kinds in the theatres, not to say one word against our laws and the records that contain them. Whereas who among the Greeks would undergo the least harm on their account, even if all the writings that are among them were to be destroyed? For they take them to be narratives concocted according to the inclinations of those that write them. And they justly hold this view of their more ancient writers, as they see some of the present generation bold enough to write about affairs at which they were not present, without caring to get information about them from those who knew the circumstances. Indeed about this late war of ours some persons have written histories and published them, without having been in the places concerned, or having been near them when the actions were done, but only putting a few things together from false hearsay, and very impudently and shamelessly calling these writings by the name of history.

§ 9. As for myself, I have composed a true history of the whole war, and of all the particulars that occurred therein, having been myself present at all its transactions. For I acted as general of those who are called among us

Galilæans, as long as it was possible for us to make any opposition. I was then arrested by the Romans, and became a captive, and Vespasian and Titus had me kept in custody, and forced me to attend upon them continually. At first I was in bonds, but was freed from them afterwards, and sent to accompany Titus when he went from Alexandria to the siege of Jerusalem. And during that time there was nothing done that escaped my knowledge; for what happened in the Roman camp I saw, and wrote down carefully, and I alone took cognizance of the news that deserters brought. Afterwards I had leisure at Rome, and when all my materials were prepared for the work, I employed some collaborateurs to be quite au fait in the Greek idioms, and so composed my history of those transactions. And so confident was I of the truth of what I related, that I appealed first of all to those that had the supreme command in that war, namely, Vespasian and Titus, as witnesses for me, for to them I presented my books first of all, and after them to many of the Romans who had taken part in the war. I also sold them to many of our own men who understood the Greek learning, among whom were Julius Archelaus, the most august Herod, and the most admirable king Agrippa himself. And all these men bore testimony to me that I had paid the strictest regard to truth, and they were not men who would have disguised their real thoughts or been silent, if I, either out of ignorance or to curry favour, had given false colours to actions, or omitted any thing.

§ 10. Some paltry persons have indeed attempted to calumniate my history, and taken it to be a kind of scholastic performance for the training of young men by a strange accusation and calumny, since it ought to be generally known that every one who undertakes to deliver the history of actions truly, ought to know them accurately himself first, either from having been concerned in them himself, or from having been informed of them by such as were acquainted with them; both which branches of knowledge I may very properly claim in the composition of both my works. For, as I said, I translated the Antiquities out of our sacred books, which I could easily do, since I was a priest by race, and had studied the philosophy contained in those writings: and as for the History of the War which I wrote, I had been myself an actor in many of its transactions, and an eye-witness of most, nor was I unacquainted with any thing whatever that was either said or done in it. How impudent then should those be esteemed, who undertake to contradict me as to the truth of those affairs! for although they say they have perused the military notes of both Vespasian and Titus, they could not be acquainted with the state of things with us Jews who fought against them.

§ 11. I have been obliged to make this digression as I wished to expose the recklessness of those who undertake to write histories: and I think I have sufficiently shown that the transmitting down the history of ancient times has been better done by those nations which are called barbarians than by the Greeks themselves. I now wish first to say a few things to those who endeavour to prove that our polity is of late date, because, as they say, the Greek writers have said nothing about us; after which I shall produce testimonies for our antiquity out of the writings of foreigners, and shall also prove that such as cast reproaches upon our nation do so very unjustly.

§ 12. As for ourselves, we neither inhabit a maritime country, nor delight in commerce, nor in such intercourse with other men as arises from it; but the cities we dwell in are remote from the sea, and as we have a fruitful country to dwell in, we take pains in cultivating it; but our principal care of all is to educate our children well, and to observe the laws, and we think it to be the most necessary business of our whole life to keep that religion that has been handed down to us. Since, then, besides what I have already said, we had a peculiar way of living of our own, there was no opportunity offered us in ancient times for such intercourse with the Greeks, as they had with the Egyptians owing to their exports and imports, as also with the Phœnicians, who lived by the sea-side, and were moved by the love of lucre to trade and merchandise. Nor did our forefathers betake themselves, as did some others, to robbery, nor did they, in order to gain more wealth, turn to wars, although our country contained many myriads of men of courage. Now the Phœnicians themselves became known to the Greeks from the first by their commerce and navigation, and by them the Egyptians became known to the Greeks also, as did also all those people from whom the Phœnicians in long voyages over the seas carried wares to the Greeks. The Medes also and the Persians afterwards, when they were lords of Asia, became well known to them, especially the Persians, who led their armies as far as the other continent.<sup>1</sup> The Thracians were also known to the Greeks because of the nearness of their country, and the Scythians owing to those who sailed to Pontus;<sup>2</sup> for generally speaking all the maritime nations, dwelling near either the eastern or western seas, became most known to those who were desirous to write history; but such as had their habitation further from the sea were for the most part unknown. This appears to have been the case in Europe also, since the city of Rome, that has for a long time been possessed of so much power, and performed such great actions in war, is yet never mentioned by Herodotus, nor by Thucydides, nor by any one of their contemporaries, and it was only late, and with great difficulty, that the Romans became known to the Greeks. And those who are reckoned the most exact historians, as Ephorus for one, were so ignorant of the Gauls and the Spaniards, that he supposed the Spaniards, who inhabit so great a part of the west of the earth,<sup>3</sup> to be only one city; and they also ventured to describe as customs of theirs things which they had never either done or said. And the reason why these writers did not know the truth was that they had no intercourse with those nations, and the reason why they wrote what was false was that they wished to seem to know things which others did not know. How can it then be any wonder, if our nation was not known to many, and gave them no opportunity to mention it in their writings, as it was so remote from the sea, and had its own peculiar mode of life?

§ 13. Suppose that we thought good to apply this argument to the Greeks, that their nation is not ancient, because nothing is said of them in our records: would they not laugh at us altogether, and probably give the same reasons for our silence of them that I have now adduced for their silence of us, and produce the neighbouring nations as witnesses to their antiquity? Now I shall endeavour to do this very thing. For I shall bring the Egyptians and Phœnicians as my principal witnesses, because nobody can complain of their testimony as false. For all the Egyptians in general, and of the Phœnicians the Tyrians, are known to have borne the greatest ill-will to us. However, I cannot say the same of the Chaldæans, since our original ancestors were Chaldæans, and they mention us Jews in their records because of the relationship between us. Now, when I shall have made my case good as far as concerns these, I shall show that some of the Greek historians have mentioned us Jews also, that those who slander us may no longer have this pretext for contradicting what I have said about our nation.

§ 14. I shall begin with the writings of the Egyptians; not indeed of those that have written in the Egyptian language, which it is impossible for me to do; but Manetho was a man who was by race an Egyptian, but had made himself master of the Greek learning, as is very evident; for he wrote the history of his own country in the Greek tongue, translating it, as he himself says, out of their sacred records: he also finds great fault with Herodotus for his ignorance and false account of Egyptian affairs. Now this Manetho, in the second book of his Egyptian history, writes concerning us in the following manner. I shall set down his very words, as if I were producing the very man himself as a witness. "There was a king of ours whose name was Timaus, in whose reign it came to pass, I know not why, that God was displeased with us, and there came unexpectedly men of ignoble birth out of the eastern parts, who had boldness enough to make an expedition into our country, and easily subdued it by force without a battle. And when they had got our rulers under their power, they afterwards savagely burnt down our cities, and demolished the temples of the gods, and used all the inhabitants in a most hostile manner, for they slew some, and led the children and wives of others into slavery. At length they made one of themselves king, whose name was Salatis. And he lived at Memphis,<sup>1</sup> and made both Upper and Lower Egypt pay tribute, and left garrisons in places that were most suitable for them. And he made the eastern parts especially strong, as he foresaw that the Assyrians, who had then the greatest power, would covet their kingdom, and invade them. And as he found in the district of Sais<sup>2</sup> a city very fit for his purpose (which lay east of the arm of the Nile near Bubastis,<sup>3</sup> and with regard to a certain theological notion was called Auaris), he rebuilt it, and made it very strong by the walls he built round it, and by a numerous garrison of two hundred and forty thousand armed men whom he put into it to keep it. There Salatis went every summer, partly to gather in his corn, and pay his soldiers their wages, and partly to train his armed men and so to awe foreigners. When he had reigned nineteen years he died. After him reigned another, whose name was Beon, for forty-four years. After him reigned another, called Apachnas, thirty-six years and seven months. After him Apophis reigned sixty-one years, and then Janias fifty years and one month. After all these reigned Assis forty-nine years and two months. And these six were the first rulers among them, who were always warring with the Egyptians, and were very desirous to pluck up Egypt by the roots. Their whole nation was called Hycsos, that is shepherd-kings; for Hyc according to the sacred dialect denotes a king, as does Sos a shepherd and shepherds in the ordinary dialect, and of these is compounded Hycsos. But some say that these people were Arabians." Now, in another copy it is said, that Hyc does not denote kings, but on the contrary captive shepherds; for Hyc again in the Egyptian tongue, and Hac with the aspirate, expressly denotes captives. And this seems to me the more probable opinion, and more agreeable to ancient history. [Then Manetho goes on,] "These people, whom we have before named kings, the sons of those who were called shepherds, and their descendants, kept possession of Egypt five hundred and eleven years. After this the kings of Thebais

and of the rest of Egypt made an insurrection against the shepherds, and a terrible and long war burst out between them." Manetho says further, "Under a king, whose name was Alisphragmuthosis, the shepherds were subdued, and driven out of other parts of Egypt, and shut up in a place that contained ten thousand acres. This place was called Auaris." Manetho says further, "The shepherds built a large and strong wall round all this place, to keep all their possessions and spoil in security. But Thummosis, the son of Alisphragmuthosis, made an attempt to take them by storm and by siege, sitting before their walls with four hundred and eighty thousand men, and upon his despairing of taking the place by siege, he made an agreement with them, that they should all evacuate Egypt, and depart unharmed wherever they would. Upon these conditions they went away with their whole families and effects, being no fewer in number than two hundred and forty thousand, and journeyed through the wilderness from Egypt to Syria. And as they were in fear of the Assyrians, who were then masters of Asia, they built a city in the country now called Judæa, large enough to contain so many myriads of men, and called it Jerusalem." And Manetho says, in another book of his Egyptian history, that this nation called shepherds were also described as captives in their sacred books. And this account of his is correct. For feeding of sheep was the employment of our earliest ancestors, and as they led such a wandering life in feeding sheep, they were called shepherds. Nor was it again without reason that they were called captives by the Egyptians, since our ancestor Joseph told the king of Egypt that he was himself a captive, and afterwards sent for his brothers to Egypt by the king's permission. But as for these matters, I shall make a more exact investigation into them elsewhere.

§ 15. And now I produce the Egyptians as witnesses of the antiquity of our nation. I shall therefore set down again what Manetho writes as to the order of the times. He speaks as follows. "When this nation of shepherds had gone from Egypt to Jerusalem, Tethmosis, the king of Egypt, who drove them out, reigned afterwards twenty-five years and four months, and then died, and after him his son Chebron took the kingdom and reigned thirteen years. After him reigned Amenophis twenty years and seven months. Then his sister Amessis reigned twenty-one years and nine months. After her reigned Mephres twelve years and nine months. After him reigned Mephramuthosis twenty-five years and ten months. After him reigned Thmosis nine years and eight months. After him reigned Amenophis thirty years and ten months. After him reigned Orus thirty-six years and five months. Next reigned his daughter Acenchres twelve years and one month. Next reigned her brother Rathotis nine years. Next reigned Acencheres twelve years and five months. Next reigned another Acencheres twelve years and three months. After him reigned Armais four years and one month. After him reigned Ramesses one year and four months. After him reigned Armesses Miammou sixty-six years and two months. After him Amenophis reigned nineteen years and six months. After him reigned Sethosis, and Ramesses, who had an army of cavalry and a navy. He appointed his brother Armais to be his viceroy in Egypt, and also gave him all the authority of a king, except that he ordered him not to wear a diadem, nor be injurious to the queen and mother of his children, nor to meddle with the other concubines of the king. And he himself made an expedition against Cyprus and Phœnicie,<sup>1</sup> and another against the Assyrians and Medes, and subdued them all, some by his arms, and some without fighting by the terror of his great army; and being puffed up by the great success he had, he went on still more boldly, and overthrew the cities and countries that lay towards the east. But after some time Armais, who was left in Egypt, did all those very things without fear which his brother had forbidden him to do, for he forced the queen, and meddled freely with the rest of the concubines, and at the persuasion of his friends wore a diadem, and rose up against his brother. Then he who was set over the priests of Egypt wrote a letter to Sethosis, and informed him of all that had happened, and how his brother had risen up against him. So he returned to Pelusium<sup>2</sup> immediately, and recovered his kingdom again. The country also was called Egypt after his name. For Manetho says that Sethosis was called Ægyptus, and that his brother Armais was called Danaus."

§ 16. This is Manetho's account. And it is evident from the number of years stated by him, if they are added together, that these so-called shepherds, our ancestors, migrated from Egypt, and inhabited Judæa, three hundred and ninety-three years before Danaus went to Argos. And yet the Argives look upon him as most ancient. Manetho, therefore, bears this testimony to two points of the greatest consequence to us from the Egyptian records; first that we came out of another country into Egypt, and next that our migration from it was so ancient in time as to have preceded the siege of Troy almost a thousand years. But as to those things which Manetho adds, not from the Egyptian records, but, as he confesses himself, from some stories of uncertain authority, I shall refute them hereafter in detail, and shall prove that they are no better than incredible falsehoods.

§ 17. I shall now, therefore, pass from these records, and come to those written by the Phœnicians concerning our nation, and shall produce my proofs out of them. There are records then among the Tyrians that take in the history of many years, and they are public writings kept with great exactness, and are accounts of things worth recording done among themselves, as also of their transactions with other nations. Among these it is recorded, that the temple was built by king Solomon at Jerusalem, a hundred and forty-three years and eight months before the Tyrians built Carthage, and the building of our temple is recorded in their archives. For Hiram, the king of Tyre, was the friend of Solomon our king, who had inherited that friendship from his father.<sup>1</sup> So he was ambitious to contribute to the splendour of this edifice of Solomon's, and made him a present of a hundred and twenty talents of gold, and also cut down the most excellent timber of that mountain which is called Libanus, and sent it to him for the roof. And Solomon not only made him many other presents by way of return, but also gave him a country in Galilee that was called Chabulon.<sup>1</sup> But what mainly cemented the friendship between them was the passion both had for wisdom; for they sent problems to one another, with a desire to have them unriddled, and in these Solomon was superior to Hiram, as he was wiser in all other respects. And many of the letters that passed between them are still preserved among the Tyrians. Now, to show that this account is not made up by me I shall produce as a witness Dius, a man who is believed to have written the Phœnician history in an accurate manner. This Dius then writes as follows in his history of the Phœnicians. "Upon the death of Abibalus, his son Hiram became king, and raised banks at the eastern parts of the city, and enlarged its area, and also joined the temple of Olympian Zeus, which stood before on an island by itself, to the city, by connecting them with a causeway, and adorned that temple with donations of gold. He moreover went up to Libanus, and had its timber cut down for the building of temples. They also say that Solomon, when he was king of Jerusalem, sent riddles to Hiram to guess, and desired he would send others back for him to guess, and he who could not guess them was to pay money to him that did. And as Hiram agreed to the proposal, but was not able to guess the riddles, he was obliged to pay a great deal of money as a penalty. They also relate that one Abdemon, a man of Tyre, guessed the riddles, and propounded others which Solomon could not, upon which he was obliged to repay a great deal of money to Hiram." This is the witness which Dius bears to what I have before said.

§ 18. And now I shall add the Ephesian Menander as an additional witness. This Menander wrote the acts that were done both by the Greeks and Barbarians under every one of the Tyrian kings, and took much pains to gather their history from the national records. Now, when he was writing about the kings that had reigned at Tyre, when he came to Hiram, he speaks as follows. "Upon the death of

He levelled what is called the Broad Place, and erected the golden pillar in Zeus' temple, and also went and cut down timber from the mountain called Libanus. namely cedar wood for the roofs of temples. He also pulled down the old temples, and built new ones, and consecrated temples to Hercules and Astarte. He first built Hercules' temple in the month Peritius, and that of Astarte when he made his expedition against the Tityi, who would not pay him tribute, and when he had subdued them to himself, he returned home again. Under this king there was a younger son of Abdemon,<sup>1</sup> who mastered the problems which Solomon the king of Jerusalem set." Now the time from this king to the building of Carthage is calculated as follows. "Upon the death of Hiram, Beleazarus his son succeeded to the kingdom, who lived forty-three years, and reigned seven years, and was succeeded by his son Abdastratus, who lived twenty-nine years, and reigned nine. Four sons of his nurse plotted against him, and slew him, the eldest of whom reigned twelve years. After them came Astartus, the son of Delæastartus, who lived fifty-four years, and reigned twelve. After him came his brother Aserymus, who lived fifty-four years, and reigned nine. He was slain by his brother Pheles, who took the kingdom, and reigned but eight months, though he lived fifty years. He was slain by Ithobalus, the priest of Astarte, who reigned thirty-two years, and lived sixty-eight years. He was succeeded by his son Badezorus, who lived forty-five years, and reigned six. He was succeeded by Matgenus his son, who lived thirty-two years, and reigned nine. Pygmalion succeeded him, who lived fifty-six years, and reigned forty-seven. In the seventh year of his reign, his sister Dido fled away from him, and built the city of Carthage in Libya." So the whole time from the reign of Hiram to the building of Carthage amounts to one hundred and fifty-five years and eight months. Since, then, the temple was built at Jerusalem in the twelfth year of the reign of Hiram, there were one hundred and forty-three years and eight months from the building of the temple to the building of Carthage. What need is there then for bringing any more testimonies out of the Phœnician histories? For the truth is seen to be strongly confirmed. And of course our ancestors came into the country long before the building of the temple; for it was not till we had got possession of the whole land by war that we built our temple. These points I have clearly proved out of our sacred writings in my Antiquities.

§ 19. I will now relate what is written about us in the Chaldæan histories, which have great agreement with our books in various respects. Berossus bears me out in what I say: he was by race a Chaldæan, and well known by the learned on account of his publication of the Chaldæan notions of astronomy and philosophy for the use of the Greeks. This Berossus, then, following the most ancient records, has given us a history of the flood, and of the destruction of mankind thereby, very similar to that of Moses; and of the ark wherein Noah, the founder of our race, was preserved, when it was carried to the summit of the Armenian mountains. He then gives us a catalogue of the posterity of Noah, and adds the years of their chronology, and at length comes down to Nabopalassar, who was king of Babylon and of the Chaldæans, and in relating the acts of this king he describes, "How he sent his son Nabuchodonosor against Egypt, and against our land, with a great army, upon his being informed that they had revolted from him, and how he subdued them all, and set our temple that was at Jerusalem on fire, and removed our people entirely from their own country, and transferred them to Babylon. So it happened that Jerusalem was desolate for seventy years until Cyrus king of Persia." He then says that "this Babylonian conquered Egypt, and Syria, and Phœnice, and Arabia, and excelled in his exploits all that had reigned before him in Babylon and Chaldæa." A little lower down Berossus adds what follows in his history of ancient times; I shall set down the very words of Berossus, which are as follows. "When Nabopalassar, father of Nabuchodonosor, heard that the satrap whom he had set over Egypt, and over the regions of

Cœle-Syria and Phœnice, had revolted from him, being unable to bear any longer the fatigues of a campaign, he committed certain parts of his army to his son Nabuchodonosor, who was then but young, and sent him against the rebel. And Nabuchodonosor joined battle with him, and conquered him, and reduced the country at once to his dominion. And it so fell out that his father Nabopolassar fell ill at this time, and died in the city of Babylon, after he had reigned twenty-nine years. And when Nabuchodonosor heard, not long afterwards, that his father was dead, he set the affairs of Egypt and the rest of the district in order, and committed the captives he had taken from the Jews, and Phœnicians, and Syrians, and from the nations belonging to Egypt, to some of his friends, that they might conduct the heavy-armed troops and the baggage to Babylonia, while he himself pushed over the desert with but a few to Babylon. And when he arrived there he found that public affairs had been managed by the Chaldæans, and that the principal person among them had preserved the kingdom for him, so he was now entire master of all his father's dominions, and ordered the captives when they arrived there to be assigned colonies in the most convenient places in Babylonia. As for himself, he adorned the temple of Belus, and the other temples, in a liberal manner, out of the spoils he had taken in war, and rebuilt the old city, and added another to it on the outside, and to prevent any who should afterwards besiege it from having it in their power to divert the river and so enter it, he built three walls about the inner city, and three about the outer. Some of these walls he built of burnt brick and bitumen, and some of brick only. And when he had thus fortified the city with walls in an excellent manner, and had adorned the gates magnificently, he added a new palace to that which his father had dwelt in close by it, and exceeding it in its height and its great splendour. It would perhaps take too much time to describe it, however, prodigiously large and magnificent as it was, it was finished in fifteen days. Now in this palace he erected very high walks, supported by stone pillars, and by planting what was called a hanging paradise, and replenishing it with all sorts of trees, he rendered the prospect an exact resemblance of a mountainous country, to please his queen, because she had been brought up in Media, and was fond of a mountainous situation."

§ 20. This is what Berosus relates concerning the fore-mentioned king, as he relates many other things about him also in the third book of his Chaldaic history, wherein he complains of the Greek historians for supposing, without any foundation, that Babylon was founded by Semiramis the queen of Assyria, and for falsely stating that those wonderful things there were her workmanship. And indeed in these affairs the Chaldaic history cannot but be the most credible. Moreover, we meet with a confirmation of what Berosus says in the archives of the Phœnicians, concerning this king of the Babylonians, that he<sup>1</sup> conquered Syria and all Phœnicie. As to these things Philostratus agrees with the others in his history, when he mentions the siege of Tyre; as does Megasthenes also in the fourth book of his Indian history, wherein he tries to prove that the fore-mentioned king of the Babylonians was superior to Hercules in strength and in the greatness of his exploits; for he says that he conquered a great part of Libya and Iberia<sup>2</sup> also. Now, as to what I have said before about the temple at Jerusalem, that it was burnt by the Babylonian army, and began to be rebuilt again when Cyrus got the kingdom of Asia, shall now be proved clearly from what Berosus adds further, for he says as follows in his third book. "Nabuchodonosor, after he had begun to build the fore-mentioned wall, fell ill, and departed this life, when he had reigned forty-three years. And his son Evilmerodach obtained the kingdom. He reigned in a lawless and high-handed manner, and had a plot laid against him by Neriglissoor, his sister's husband, and was slain by him when he had reigned two years. After he was slain, Neriglissoor, who had plotted against him, succeeded him in the kingdom, and reigned four years; and his son Laborosoarchod obtained the kingdom, though he was but a lad, and kept it nine months, but because he seemed in most respects an ill-disposed lad, he was beaten to death by his friends. After his death the conspirators assembled together, and by common consent put the crown upon the head of Nabonnedus, a Babylonian who had taken part in the insurrection against Laborosoarchod. It was in his reign that the walls of the city of Babylon near the river were handsomely built of burnt brick and bitumen. But in the seventeenth year of his reign, Cyrus came out of Persia with a great army, and having already conquered all the rest of Asia, marched into Babylonia. When Nabonnedus perceived he was coming to attack him, he met him with his forces, and joined battle with him, and was beaten, and fled away with a few of his troops with him, and was shut up within the city of Borsippus.<sup>1</sup> Thereupon Cyrus took Babylon, and gave orders that the outer walls of the city should be demolished, because the city had proved very troublesome and hard to him to take. He then marched away to Borsippus to besiege Nabonnedus; but as Nabonnedus did not wait for a siege, but delivered himself first into his hands, he was kindly treated by Cyrus, who gave him Carmania<sup>2</sup> to dwell in, but sent him out of Babylonia. And Nabonnedus spent the rest of his time in that country, and there died."

§ 21. This account states the truth as in our books. For it is written in them that Nabuchodonosor in the eighteenth year of his reign destroyed our temple, and that it remained in that state for fifty years; but that in the second year of the reign of Cyrus its foundations were laid again, and it was finished in the second year of the reign of Darius. I will now add the records of the Phœnicians; for we must not omit to give abundance of proofs. The following is the computation of the chronology. "Nabuchodonosor besieged Tyre for thirteen years, in the days of Ithobalus their king. After him reigned Baal ten years. After him were judges appointed, who judged the people, as Ecnibalus, the son of Baslachus, two months, Chelbes, the son of Abdæus, ten months, Abbar, the high priest, three months, Mytgonus and Gerastratus, the sons of Abdelemus, were judges six years. After them Balatorus reigned one year; after whose death they sent and fetched Merbalus from Babylon, who reigned four years. After his death they sent for his brother Hiram, who reigned twenty years. Under his reign Cyrus became king of Persia." So that the whole time is fifty-four years and three months; for Nabuchodonosor began to besiege Tyre in the seventh year of his reign, and Cyrus the Persian took the kingdom in the fourteenth year of the reign of Hiram. And so the records of the Chaldæans and Tyrians agree with our writings about the temple, and the testimonies here produced are an admitted and indisputable attestation to the antiquity of our nation. And I suppose that what I have already said will be sufficient for such as are not very contentious.

§ 22. But now it is proper to satisfy the desire of those who disbelieve the records of barbarians, and think none but Greeks worthy of credit, and to produce many of those very Greeks who were acquainted with our nation, and to quote such as, when occasion demanded, have made mention of us in their writings. Pythagoras then of Samos,<sup>1</sup> who lived in very ancient times, and was esteemed superior to all philosophers in wisdom and piety towards God, plainly not only knew of our doctrines, but was to a very great degree an admirer of them. There is not indeed extant any admitted writing of his, but many have written his history, of whom Hermippus is the most celebrated, who was a person very painstaking in all sorts of history. Now Hermippus, in his first book concerning Pythagoras, speaks as follows. "Pythagoras, upon the death of one of his intimate friends, whose name was Calliphon, a native of Crotona,<sup>2</sup> affirmed that this man's soul conversed with him both night and day, and enjoined him not to pass over a place where an ass had fallen down, as also not to drink such waters as caused thirst again, and to abstain from all railing." After which he adds the following words. "This he did and said in imitation of the doctrines of the Jews and Thracians, which he transferred into his own philosophy." For it is very truly affirmed of this Pythagoras, that he transferred a great many of the ideas of the Jews into his own philosophy. Nor was our nation unknown of old to several of the Greek cities, indeed it was thought worthy of imitation by some of them. This is shown by Theophrastus, in his writings concerning laws. For he says that the laws of the Tyrians forbid men to swear foreign oaths; among which he enumerates several others, and particularly that called Corban; which oath can only be found among the Jews, and signifies, as one may say, when translated from the Hebrew, A gift of God. Nor indeed was Herodotus of Halicarnassus<sup>1</sup> unacquainted with our nation, but clearly mentions us in the following passage in his second book,<sup>2</sup> speaking about the Colchians.<sup>3</sup> His words are as follows. "The only people circumcised originally were the Colchians, the Egyptians, and the Ethiopians. For the Phœnicians, and those Syrians that are in Palestine, confess that they learned it from the Egyptians. As for those Syrians who live near the rivers Thermodon<sup>4</sup> and Parthenius,<sup>5</sup> and their neighbours the Macrones, they say they learned it recently from the Colchians. And these are the only people that are circumcised among mankind, and appear to have acted in the same way as the Egyptians. As for the Egyptians and Ethiopians themselves, I am not able to say which of them learnt the practice from the other." Thus Herodotus says that the Syrians that are in Palestine practise circumcision; but there are no inhabitants of Palestine that are circumcised except the Jews; and so Herodotus must have known and spoken of them. Chærilus also, a still older writer, and a poet, mentions of our nation that it shared in the expedition of Xerxes king of the Persians against Greece. For in his enumeration of all the nations that did so, he last of all inserts ours among the rest, when he says, "Behind there passed over a people, wonderful to look at, who spoke the Phœnician tongue with their mouths; they dwelt among the mountains of Solyma near a broad lake: their heads were rough and shaven all round, and on the top of them they wore the smoke-dried hides of horses' heads." Now I think it is evident to everybody that Chærilus means us, because the mountains of Solyma<sup>1</sup> are in our country, which we inhabit, as is also the lake called Asphaltitis, which is a broader and larger lake than any other that is in Syria: and so Chœrilus makes mention of us. And that not only the commonest Greeks, but those that are held in the greatest admiration for their philosophy, both knew and admired the Jews, when they fell in with any of them, is easy to show. For Clearchus, who was a pupil of Aristotle, and inferior to none of the Peripatetics, says in his first book concerning sleep, that Aristotle his master related what follows of a Jew, and sets down Aristotle's own account, which is as follows. "It would be too long to recite a great part of what this Jew said, but it may not be amiss to quote what includes in it both wonder and philosophy. Know clearly, said he, Hyperochides, I shall seem to thee to relate things like dreams. Then Hyperochides answered modestly, and said, For that very reason all of us desire to hear what you are going to say. Then, replied Aristotle, according to the rule of the rhetoricians, let us first give an account of the man's nation, that so we may not disobey our masters in our narrative. Then said Hyperochides, Say whatever you please. This man then [answered Aristotle] was by race a Jew, and came from Cœle-Syria;<sup>2</sup> these Jews are descendants of the Indian philosophers. For philosophers are called by the Indians Calani, and by the Syrians Judæi, getting that name from the country they inhabit, which is called Judæa. And the name of their city is a very strange one, for they call it Jerusalem. Now this man, being hospitably treated by a great many, and coming down from the interior of the country to the parts near the sea, was a Greek not only in his language, but in his soul also. And when we ourselves dwelt in Asia at that time, he came to the same places where we were and conversed with us, and with other philosophical persons, and tested their wisdom. And as he had lived with many learned men, he communicated to us more information than he received from us." This is Aristotle's account of the matter, as given us by Clearchus, and Aristotle spoke also of the great and wonderful self-denial of this Jew in his diet and chaste way of living. And those that please may learn more about him from Clearchus' book itself: for I avoid quoting any more than is sufficient for my purpose. Now Clearchus said this, and made mention of us, by way of digression, for his main design was of another nature. But Hecatæus of Abdera,<sup>1</sup> who was both a philosopher and very competent in active life, and was a contemporary of king Alexander in his youth, and was afterwards associated with Ptolemy the son of Lagus, did not write about the Jewish affairs cursorily only, but composed an entire book about the Jews themselves, from which book I intend to extract briefly a few things of which I have been treating. And first I shall show the time when this Hecatæus lived; for he mentions the fight between Ptolemy and Demetrius near Gaza,<sup>2</sup> which was fought the eleventh year after the death of Alexander, and in the one hundred and seventeenth Olympiad, as Castor says in his history. For when he had mentioned that Olympiad, he says, "In this Olympiad Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, beat in battle at Gaza Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, who was called Poliorcetes." Now it is agreed by everybody that Alexander died in the hundred and fourteenth Olympiad. It is therefore evident that our nation flourished in his time, and in the time of Alexander. Again Hecatæus speaks as follows. "Ptolemy got possession of the places in Syria after the battle at Gaza; and many men, when they heard of Ptolemy's moderation and humanity, wished to go with him to Egypt, and to share his fortunes; one of whom (Hecatæus says) was Hezekiah, the high priest of the Jews, a man of about sixty-six years of age, held in great esteem among his own people, and a very sensible man, and a very good speaker, and very skilful in the management of affairs, if any one ever was; and yet, he says, all the priests of the Jews, who took tithes of the products of the earth, and managed public affairs, were in number about fifteen hundred." Hecatæus mentions this Hezekiah a second time, and says, "As he received this honour, and became intimate with us, he took some of those that were with him, and read to them all the difference between their habits and ours, as he had our habitation and polity down in writing." Hecataeus shows again what regard we pay to our laws, and that we resolve to endure any thing rather than transgress them, because we think it right to act so. "And so (he adds) although the Jews are in bad reputation among their neighbours, and among all strangers that visit them, and have been often treated very badly by the kings and satraps of Persia, yet can they not be dissuaded from acting as they think right, but in their forlorn condition most bravely bear the torments inflicted upon them, and the most terrible kinds of death, on this account, and will not renounce the religion of their forefathers." Hecataeus also affords not a few proofs of this obstinacy of theirs in regard to their laws. For he says, "When Alexander was once at Babylon, and purposed to rebuild the temple of Belus that was fallen to decay, and so commanded all his soldiers alike to bring earth there, the Jews and they only would not comply with that command, but underwent many stripes and suffered great punishments, till the king forgave them, and permitted them to live in quiet." He adds further, "That when the Macedonians went into their country, and constructed temples and altars, the Jews demolished them all, and either paid the penalty to the satraps, or sometimes obtained forgiveness. He adds further, "That these men deserve to be admired on that account." He also speaks of the populousness of our nation, and says, "That the Persians formerly carried away many myriads of our people to Babylon, as also that not a few myriads were removed after Alexander's death into Egypt and Phœnice, because of an insurrection that arose in Syria." The same Hecataeus has recorded in his history the extent of the country which we inhabit, as well as its beauty; for he says, "The land which the Jews inhabit contains three millions of arouræ,<sup>1</sup> and is generally of most excellent and fruitful soil ; for such are the dimensions of Judæa." Moreover, that we have inhabited from the most ancient times the most beautiful and large city of Jerusalem, as also about our population, and about the construction of the temple, he speaks as follows. "There are many strongholds and villages in the country of Judæa ; and one strong city there is, about fifty furlongs in circumference, which is inhabited by about a hundred and twenty thousand men ; they call it Jerusalem. There is about the middle of the city an enclosure of stone, in length five hundred feet, and in breadth a hundred cubits, with two gates. And in this enclosure is a square altar, not made of hewn stone, but merely composed of unwrought stones gathered together, having each side twenty cubits long, and in height ten cubits. Hard by it is a large edifice, wherein is an altar and candlestick both of gold, two talents in weight. Upon these is a light that is never extinguished either by night or day. And there is no image or votive offering therein at all, nor is there any thing planted there at all, as grove or any thing else of the kind. The priests stay in the temple both nights and days, performing certain purifications, and drinking not the least drop of wine while they are in the temple." Moreover he attests that we Jews served in the army under king Alexander, and afterwards under his successors. I will add further what he says happened in the case of a man who was a Jew, when he was himself on the same expedition. His words are as follows. "As I was myself going to the Red Sea, we were accompanied by a man whose name was Mosollamus, who was one of the Jewish horsemen who conducted us ; he was a person of great courage, and of a strong body,

<sup>1</sup> This number of arouræ, or Egyptian acres, as contained in the country of Judæa, will be about one-third of the entire number of arouræ in the whole land of Judæa, supposing it 160 miles long, and seventy miles broad; which estimation, for the fruitful parts of it, as perhaps here in Hecataeus, is not therefore very wide from the truth.

The fifty furlongs in compass for the city of Jerusalem presently are not very wide from the truth also, as Josephus himself, Jewish War, v. 4, § 3, makes its wall thirty-three furlongs, besides the suburbs and gardens ; nay, he says, v. 12, § 2, that Titus' wall about it, at some small distance, after the gardens and suburbs were destroyed, was not less than thirty-nine furlongs. Nor perhaps were its constant inhabitants, in the days of Hecateus, many more than these 120,000, because room was always to be left for vastly greater numbers which came up at the three great festivals ; to say nothing of the probable increase in their number between the days of Hecateus and Josephus, which was at least 300 years.—W.

and allowed by all to be the most skilful archer either among the Greeks or barbarians. Now this man, as many were passing along the road, and a certain augur was observing a bird for the purpose of augury, and required them all to stand still, inquired why they halted. Thereupon the augur showed him the bird from which he was taking his augury, and told him, if the bird stayed where it was, they ought all to stand still, but if it got up and flew on they must go forward, but if it flew back, they must retire again. Mosollamus made no reply, but drew his bow, and shot at the bird, and hit it, and killed it. And as the augur and some others were very angry, and uttered imprecations against him, he answered them as follows. "Why are you so mad as to take this most unhappy bird into your hands? for how can this bird give us any true information concerning our march, seeing that it could not foresee how to save itself; for had it been able to foreknow the future, it would not have come to this place, but would have been afraid that Mosollamus the Jew would shoot at it, and kill it." But of Hecataeus' testimonies I have said enough: for such as desire to know more of them can easily peruse his book. However, I shall not shrink from naming Agatharchides, who has mentioned us Jews, though in way of derision at our simplicity, as he supposes it to be, in narrating about Stratonice, how she went out of Macedonia into Syria, and left her husband Demetrius, though Seleucus would not marry her as she expected, and how, while he was raising an army at Babylon, she stirred up an insurrection at Antioch; and how, upon the king's return and capture of Antioch, she fled to Selencia,<sup>1</sup> and though it was in her power to sail away immediately, listened to a dream that forbade her to do so, and so was taken and put to death. When Agatharchides had related this story, and jested at Stratonice for her superstition, he gives a similar example of what was reported about us, and writes as follows. "There are a people called Jews, who dwell in the strongest of all cities, which its inhabitants call Jerusalem, who are accustomed to rest every seventh day,<sup>2</sup> at which times they do not carry arms, nor meddle with husbandry, nor attend to any of the affairs of life, but spread out their hands in their temple, and pray till the evening. Now when Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, came into this city with his army, these men observed this mad custom of theirs instead of guarding the city, and so their country had to submit to a bitter lord, and their law was openly proved to have a foolish practice. This event taught all other men but the Jews to disregard dreams, and traditional fancies of their law, when in the uncertainty of human reason they were at a loss what to do." Now this behaviour of ours seems ridiculous to Agatharchides, but it will appear great and worthy of many encomiums, to such as consider it without prejudice, that any people should constantly prefer the observation of their laws, and their religion towards God, to the preservation of themselves and their country.

§ 23. Next, I think I can prove that some writers have omitted to mention our nation, not because they knew nothing of us, but because they envied us, or for some other unjustifiable reasons. For Hieronymus, who wrote the history of [Alexander's] successors, lived at the same time as Hecatæus, and was a friend of king Antigonus, and was governor of Syria. But Hecatæus wrote an entire book concerning us, while Hieronymus nowhere mentions us in his history, although he was bred up very near the places where we live. So different are the views of men; while the one thought we deserved careful attention, some ill-disposed passion blinded the other's mind so entirely, that he could not discern the truth. However, these records of the Egyptians and Chaldæans and Phœnicians, and so many of the Greek writers in addition to them, are certainly sufficient to prove our antiquity. Moreover, besides those I have mentioned, Theophilus, and Theodotus, and Mnaseas, and Aristophanes, and Hermogenes, and Euhemerus, and Conon, and Zopyrion, and perhaps several others (for I have not perused all books), have made no mere incidental mention of us. It is true that most of those I have mentioned have made mistakes about the true history of our nation in the earliest times, because they had not perused our sacred books; but all of them in common have borne testimony to our antiquity, the subject which I am now treating. And Demetrius Phalereus, and the elder Philo, and Eupolemus, have not greatly deviated from absolute correctness. Their mistakes ought therefore to be forgiven them; for it was not in their power to follow our writings with entire accuracy.

§ 24. One main point still remains of those I at first proposed to speak about, and that is to show that the calumnies and reproaches, which some have thrown upon our nation, are lies, and to make use of those writers' own testimonies against themselves. For that this has happened to many other authors, because of their ill-will to some people, I think is not unknown to such as have read histories with sufficient care. For some writers have endeavoured to tarnish the lustre of nations and most glorious cities, and to cast reproaches upon certain forms of government. Thus Theopompus railed against Athens, and Polycrates against Lacedæmon, as he that wrote the Tripoliticus (who is not Theopompus, as is supposed by some) did against Thebes.<sup>1</sup> Timæus also in his histories has greatly railed against those states I have mentioned and against others also. And they act so chiefly when they have to deal with people of the greatest reputation, some out of envy and malignity, and others supposing that by their novel style of writing they may be thought worthy of being remembered themselves. And indeed they do by no means fail of this hope among foolish people, but men of sober judgment censure their great malignity.

§ 25. Now the Egyptians were the first that cast reproaches upon us; and some others, wishing to please them, attempted to pervert the truth, who would neither own that our forefathers went into Egypt from another country, as the fact was, nor would give the true account of our departure from thence. And indeed the Egyptians had many reasons to hate and envy us, first because our ancestors<sup>1</sup> ruled over their country, and when they removed from Egypt to their own country again, lived there in prosperity; and next the difference between our religion and theirs excited great animosity in them, as our mode of divine worship did as much exceed that which their laws appointed, as the nature of God exceeds that of brute beasts. For it is the common custom of their country to esteem animals as gods, although they differ individually in the worship they pay to them, being men entirely stupid and foolish, accustomed from the beginning to have erroneous ideas about the gods. For they could not induce themselves to imitate the dignity of our theology, but when they saw us approved of by many, they were moved with envy. For some of them proceeded to that degree of folly and meanness, that they did not scruple to contradict their own ancient records, nay, to contradict themselves also in their writings, and yet were so blinded by their passions as not to discern it.

§ 26. I will now turn my discourse to one of their principal writers, whom I quoted a little before as a witness to our antiquity, I mean Manetho. Now he, having undertaken to interpret the Egyptian history out of the sacred writings, first stated that our ancestors had come into Egypt, many myriads in number, and subdued its inhabitants, and then himself confessed that they went out of that country some time afterwards and settled in the country which is now called Judæa, and founded Jerusalem and built the temple. Now thus far he followed the ancient records, but afterwards he permitted himself, that he might say he had recorded<sup>2</sup> the legends and stories current about the Jews, to introduce incredible narrations, wishing to mix up with us the multitude of the Egyptians, who were lepers, and were condemned for other distempers, as he says, to flee from Egypt. For he mentions king Amenophis, a fictitious name, and so he durst not set down the number of years of his reign, though he had accurately done so as to the other kings he mentions, and ascribes certain fabulous stories to this king, having pretty well forgotten what he had before related, that the departure of the shepherds for Jerusalem was five hundred and eighteen years before; for Tethmosis was king when they departed. Now the reigns of the kings afterwards, according to Manetho, amounted to three hundred and ninety-three years, to the two brothers Sethos and Hermæus, of whom the one Sethos was also called Ægyptus, and the other Hermæus was called Danaus. He also says that Sethos expelled Hermæus from Egypt, and reigned fifty-nine years, and that his eldest son Rampses reigned after him sixty-six years. When Manetho had therefore acknowledged that our forefathers had gone out of Egypt so many years before, he then introduces his fictitious king Amenophis, and says that he desired to see the gods, as Orus, one of his predecessors in the kingdom, had done, and that he communicated his desire to his namesake Amenophis, the son of Paapis, who seemed to partake of a divine nature both as to wisdom and the knowledge of the future. Manetho adds that this namesake of his told him that he might see the gods, if he would clear the whole country of the lepers and other impure people; and that the king was pleased with this answer, and got together all that had any defect in their bodies in Egypt (the number of whom was eighty thousand), whom he sent to the quarries which were on the east side of the Nile, that they might work in them, and might be separated from the rest of the Egyptians. He says also that there were some of the learned priests among them afflicted with the leprosy. Now this Amenophis, the wise man and seer, was afraid that the gods would be angry at him and at the king, if violence should appear to have been offered these afflicted persons; and he also added that certain people would come to the assistance of these impure persons, and would be masters of Egypt for thirteen years. However, he durst not tell the king of these things, but he left a writing behind him about all these matters, and then slew himself. And the king was disconsolate. After which Manetho writes as follows verbatim. "After those that were sent to work in the quarries had continued in that miserable state for a long while, the king being asked that he would set apart the city of Auaris,<sup>1</sup> which was then left empty of shepherds, for their habitation and protection, granted what was asked. Now this city, according to the ancient theology, was Typhon's city. And when these men had got into it, and found the place fit for a revolt, they appointed as their leader one of the priests of Heliopolis,<sup>2</sup> whose name was Osarsiph, and they took oaths that they would be obedient to him in all things. And he first drew up the following laws for them, that they should neither worship the Egyptian gods, nor keep their hands off any of those sacred animals which the Egyptians held in the highest esteem, but kill and destroy them all, and that they should associate with none but those that belonged to their confederacy. After having made such laws as these and very many more, mostly contrary to the customs of the Egyptians, he gave orders that the many hands they had should build walls round their city, and make themselves ready for a war against king Amenophis. He next, in co-operation with the other priests and polluted persons, sent messengers to those shepherds who had been driven out of the land by Tethmosis to the city called Jerusalem; and informed them of the state of his own affairs, and of those others who had been treated in an ignominious manner, and begged that they would join him with one accord in an expedition against Egypt. He also promised that he would first restore them to their ancestral city of Auaris, and provide plentiful maintenance for their multitudes, and that he would fight for them when necessary, and would easily bring the district under their dominion. And they were all very glad at this message, and set out with zeal all together, being in number two hundred thousand men, and soon reached Auaris. And Amenophis, the king of Egypt, on being informed of their approach, was in great concern, remembering what Amenophis, the son of Paapis, had foretold him. And first he assembled the multitude of the Egyptians, and took counsel with their leaders, and had the sacred animals that were chiefly worshipped in their temples brought to himself, and particularly charged the priests that they should hide the images of the gods with the utmost care. He also sent his son Sethos (who was also called Ramesses after his father Rampses), who was only five years old, to a friend of his. He then passed on with the rest of the Egyptians, who were three hundred thousand of the most warlike, and met the enemy, but did not join battle with them, but thinking that would be to fight against the gods, returned back and went to Memphis,<sup>1</sup> where he took Apis and the other sacred animals that he had had sent for, and at once marched into Ethiopia with his whole army and multitude of Egyptians. For the king of Ethiopia was under an obligation to him, so he received him, and took care of all the multitudes that were with him, for the district supplied all that was necessary for the food of the men. He also allotted them sufficient cities and villages for the fated thirteen years of exile from the king's dominions. Moreover, he stationed his Ethiopian army as a guard for king Amenophis and his men on the borders of Egypt. Such was the state of things in Ethiopia. But the people of Jerusalem, when they invaded Egypt with the polluted Egyptians, treated the people in such a barbarous manner, that their conquest seemed the worst of evils to those who beheld at the time their impious deeds. For they not only set cities and villages on fire, and were not satisfied with being guilty of sacrilege and destroying the wooden images of the gods, but also used them continually in roasting the sacred animals that used to be worshipped, and forced the priests and prophets to be the sacrificers and slayers of those animals, and then ejected them from the country naked. It is also reported, that the priest, who founded their polity and laws, was a native of Heliopolis, and that his name was Osarsiph, from Osiris, who was the god of Heliopolis, but that, when he had gone over to these people, his name was changed, and he was called Moses."

§ 27. This and much more, which I omit for the sake of brevity, do the Egyptians relate about the Jews. And Manetho says again that Amenophis returned from Ethiopia after this with a great army, as did his son

Rampses with an army also, and that both of them joined battle with the shepherds and the polluted people, and beat them, and slew a great many of them, and pursued them as far as the borders of Syria. These and similar accounts are written by Manetho. But I shall prove that he writes foolishly and tells evident lies, after I have first made a remark which will bear on what I am going to say about him. This Manetho has conceded and admitted that our nation was not originally Egyptian, but had come from another country, and subdued Egypt, and then went away again out of it. And I shall endeavour to prove from Manetho's own account that those Egyptians, who were thus diseased in their bodies, were not associated with us afterwards, and that Moses, the leader of the people, was not one of them, but lived many generations earlier.

§ 28. Now as to the first statement in his romance, Manetho supposes what is ridiculous. He says that "king Amenophis desired to see the gods." What gods, pray, did he desire to see? If he meant the gods whom their laws ordered to be worshipped, as the ox, and the goat, and the crocodiles, and the dog-faced baboons, he saw them already; but how could he see the heavenly gods? And why had he this desire? Because, by Zeus, another king before him had already seen them! He had therefore learned from him what sort of gods they were, and how he had seen them, so that he did not stand in need of any new artifice. Furthermore, Manetho tells us that this prophet, by whom the king thought to compass his design, was a wise man. If so, how came he not to know that his desire was impossible? for the event did not come off. And what grounds had he to suppose that the gods could not be seen because of people's maims in their bodies or leprosy? for the gods are not angry at the imperfection of bodies, but at wicked acts. And as to eighty thousand persons, who were either lepers or otherwise afflicted, how is it possible they could have been gathered together in one day? Nay, how came the king not to comply with the prophet? For his injunction was, that those that were maimed should be expelled from Egypt, while the king only sent them to work in the quarries, as if he were rather in want of labourers than intended to purge the country. Manetho says also that the prophet slew himself, foreseeing the anger of the gods, and the events which would come to pass in Egypt afterwards, and that he left his prediction for the king in writing. But how came it to pass that the prophet did not foreknow his own death at first? nay, how came he not to contradict the king at once when he desired to see the gods? how was that fear of evils that were not to happen in his lifetime reasonable? nay, what worse thing could he have suffered, which made him in such a haste to kill himself? But now let us see the silliest thing of all. Although the king had been informed of these things, and terrified with the fear of what was to come, yet did he not even then eject these maimed people out of his country, though it had been foretold him that he was to clear Egypt of them; but, as Manetho says, "he then, upon their request, gave them that city to inhabit, which had formerly been inhabited by the shepherds, and was called Auaris. And when they had gone there en masse (he continnes), they chose one who had formerly been a priest, and native of Heliopolis, to be their leader, and he ordered them neither to worship the Egyptian gods, nor to keep their hands off those animals that were worshipped by the Egyptians, but to kill and eat them all, and to associate with nobody but those who belonged to their confederacy; and he bound the multitude by oaths that they would verily abide by his laws; and when he had fortified Auaris, he made war against the king." Manetho also adds that "this priest sent to Jerusalem, to invite the people there to come to his assistance, and promised to give them Auaris; for it had belonged to the forefathers of those who would come from Jerusalem; for they might make it their point d'appui, and get possession of all Egypt." He says also that "they came with an army of two hundred thousand men, and that Amenophis, the king of Egypt, not thinking that he ought to fight against the gods, ran away at once into Ethioopia, and committed Apis and some other of their sacred animals to the priests, and commanded them to take care of them." He says next that "the people of Jerusalem came and overthrew their cities, and burnt their temples, and slew their horsemen, and in short abstained from no sort of wickedness or barbarity. As for the priest who settled their polity and their laws, he was (he says) a native of Heliopolis, and his name was Osarsiph, from Osiris the god of Heliopolis, but he changed his name, and called himself Moses." He then says that "in the thirteenth year afterwards Amenophis, according to the fated time of the duration of his exile, set out from Ethiopia with a great army, and fought a battle with the shepherds and the polluted people, and overcame them, and slew a great many of them, and pursued them as far as the borders of Syria."

§ 29. Here again Manetho does not reflect upon the improbability of his false account. For even if the lepers and the multitude with them were before angry with the king, and with those who had treated them so badly, according to the prediction of the prophet, yet when they had come out of the quarries, and had received from the king a city and district, they would certainly have grown milder towards him. But if they did hate him, they might have laid a private plot against himself, but would hardly have made war against all the Egyptians, because of the great quantity of kinsfolk they must have had, as they were so numerous. Moreover, if they had resolved to fight with the men, they would not have dared to fight against their gods, nor would they have made laws quite contrary to those of their own country in which they had been themselves bred up. But we ought to feel beholden to Manetho, in that he does not make those that came from Jerusalem the ringleaders in this lawlessness, but says that it was the Egyptians themselves, and that it was their priests who mainly contrived these things, and made the multitude take their oaths. But how absurd it is to suppose that none of these people's own relations or friends could be prevailed upon to revolt, or to undergo the hazards of war with them, and that they sent to Jerusalem for these polluted people, and got auxiliaries from thence! What friendship, pray, or what relations had there formerly been between them? Why, on the contrary, these people were enemies, and differed from them in most of their customs. And he says that they complied immediately, upon their promising them that they should occupy Egypt, as if they did not themselves very well know the state of the country out of which they had been driven by force. Now had these men been in want or misery, perhaps they might have undertaken so hazardous an enterprize, but as they dwelt in a rich city, and had a large territory, and one better than Egypt itself, how was it at all likely that for the sake of those who had of old been their enemies, and for those who were maimed in their bodies, whom none of their own relations would endure, they should run such hazards in assisting them? For they could not of course foresee that the king would run away from them. Nay, Manetho says himself, that "Amenophis' son had three hundred thousand men with him, and met them at Pelusium."<sup>1</sup> Now those that came could not be ignorant of all this; and how could they possibly conjecture that the king would repent and flee? He then says that those who made this invasion from Jerusalem, when they got Egypt into their possession, perpetrated many dreadful actions. And he reproaches them about these things, as though he had not himself introduced them as enemies, or as though he might justly accuse such as were invited from another place for so doing, when the native Egyptians had done the same things themselves before their coming, and had taken oaths so to do! "However, Amenophis (he adds) some time afterwards came upon them, and conquered them in battle, and slew his enemies, and drove them before him as far as Syria." As if Egypt were so easily taken by people that came from any place whatever, and as if those that had just conquered it by war, though they knew that Amenophis was alive, neither fortified the passes from Ethiopia into it, although they had great opportunity for doing so, nor got their other forces ready for their defence. "But (he says) he followed them over the sand of the desert, slaying them all the way, as far as Syria." Now it is plainly no easy thing for an army to cross the desert even without fighting.

§ 30. Our nation, therefore, according to Manetho, was not derived from Egypt, nor were any of the Egyptians mixed with us. For it is probable that many of the lepers and diseased people died in the quarries, since they had been there a long time and had been badly treated, and that many died in the battles that happened afterwards, and more still in the last battle and flight.

§ 31. It now remains that I contradict Manetho as to Moses. The Egyptians think him a wonderful and divine person, and wish to claim him for themselves, though with unplausible abuse they say that he was one of the priests of Heliopolis who was ejected with others because of his leprosy. Yet it is proved by the records that he lived five hundred and eighteen years earlier, and brought our fathers out of Egypt into the country that is now inhabited by us. And that he was not personally afflicted with any such calamity, is evident from his own laws. For he has forbidden lepers either to continue in a city, or to dwell in a village, and has commanded that they should go about by themselves with their clothes rent; and regards such as either touch them, or live under the same roof with them, as unclean. Moreover, if any one be healed of the disease and recover his normal condition again, he has appointed certain purifications, and washings in baths of spring water, and the shaving off all the hair, and enjoins that they shall offer several sacrifices of various kinds, and then only be admitted into the holy city. Now, had he suffered from the same calamity, so far from legislating thus, he would have taken care of such persons, and treated them in a kind manner, as being in the same evil plight with himself. Nor did he make such laws only for lepers, but also he did not permit such as were maimed in the smallest part of their body to officiate as priests: and if any priest should have such a calamity fall upon him afterwards, he ordered him to be deprived of his position. How then is it likely that Moses should ordain such laws against himself, to his own reproach and hurt? Nor indeed is that other notion of Manetho's at all probable about the change of his name. He says that he was formerly called Osarsiph. But this is a name no way agreeable to the other. For his true name was Moüses,<sup>1</sup> and signifies a person preserved out of the water, for the Egyptians call water Moü. I think, therefore, I have made it sufficiently evident that Manetho did not much wander from the truth while he followed the ancient records, but that, when he turned to unauthorized stories of uncertain authors, he either concocted them himself without any plausibility, or else gave credit to some men who spoke so out of ill-will to us.

§ 32. And now I have done with Manetho, and will inquire into what Chæremon says. For he also, professing to write Egyptian history, sets down the same name for his king as Manetho did, namely Amenophis, and also calls his son Ramesses, and then goes on as follows: "The goddess Isis appeared to Amenophis in his sleep, and blamed him because her temple had been demolished in the war. And Phritiphantes the sacred scribe told him, if he would purge Egypt of the men who had pollutions upon them, that he would be no longer troubled with such scares. Amenophis accordingly chose out two hundred and fifty thousand of those who were thus diseased, and expelled them from the country. And their leaders Moses and Joseph were scribes, and Joseph was a sacred scribe: and their names were Egyptian originally, that of Moses was Tisithen, and that of Joseph Peteseeph. And these two went to Pelusium, and fell in there with three hundred and eighty thousand who had been left there by Amenophis, as he was unwilling to transfer them to Egypt. And these two made a league of friendship with them, and led them on an expedition against Egypt. And Amenophis could not stand against their attack, but fled into Ethiopia, and left his wife behind him, who was with child, and lay concealed in certain caverns, and there she brought forth a son, whose name was Messenes,<sup>1</sup> who, when he was grown up to man's estate, pursued the Jews, who were about two hundred thousand, into Syria, and then restored his father Amenophis from Ethiopia."

§ 33. This is the account Chæremon gives us. Now I take it as obvious at once that what I have already said has plainly proved the falseness of both Manetho's and his accounts. For had there been any real truth at bottom, it is impossible there would have been such great discrepancy between them. But those who concoct lies do not write what agrees with others, but invent what pleases themselves. Thus Manetho says that the king's desire of seeing the gods was the cause of the ejection of the polluted people; but Chæremon has made it a dream of his sent him by Isis. Manetho again says that the person who suggested this purgation of Egypt to the king was Amenophis, but Chæremon says it was Phritiphantes. As to the numbers of the people that were expelled, they agree admirably, Manetho reckoning them as eighty thousand, and Chæremon as two hundred and fifty thousand! Moreover, Manetho describes these polluted persons as first sent to work in the quarries, and says that after that the city Auaris was given them for their habitation, and that it was not till after they had made war with the rest of the Egyptians, that they invited the people of Jerusalem to come to their assistance; but Chæremon says that on their departure from Egypt they fell in with three hundred and eighty thousand men near Pelusium, who had been left there by Amenophis, and that they invaded Egypt with them again, and that Amenophis fled into Ethiopia. But what is most rich, Chæremon does not inform us who this army of so many ten thousands were, or whence they came, whether they were native Egyptians, or whether they came from a foreign country; nor indeed has he given any reason why the king would not take them into Egypt, though he concocted a dream from Isis about the lepers. Chæremon also describes Joseph as expelled at the same time as Moses, though he died four generations before Moses, which four generations make about a hundred and seventy years. Moreover, Ramesses, the son of Amenophis, was a young man by Manetho's account, and assisted his father in war, and left the country at the same time as him, and fled with him into Ethiopia; whereas Chæremon makes him to have been born in a certain cave after his father was dead, and then to have overcome the Jews in battle, and driven them into Syria, being in number about two hundred thousand. O the recklessness of the man! For he neither told us before who these three hundred and eighty thousand were, nor how the four hundred and thirty thousand perished, whether they fell in war, or went over to Ramesses! And, what is the strangest of all, it is not possible to learn from him who they were whom he calls Jews, or to which of these two parties he applies that name, whether to the two hundred and fifty thousand lepers, or to the three hundred and eighty thousand in the neighbourhood of Pelusium. But perhaps it would be silly in me to make any lengthier refutation of such writers as sufficiently refute themselves; for had they been only refuted by others, it would have been more tolerable!

§ 34. I shall now add to these writers Lysimachus, who has taken the same line of falsehood as those before-mentioned, but has gone far beyond them in the incredibility of his fictions: which plainly shows that he concocted them out of virulent hatred to our nation. His words are as follows. "The people of the Jews being lepers and scabby, and having other diseases, in the days of Bocchoris king of Egypt, fled to the temples, and got their food there by begging; and as the numbers were very great that were afflicted with disease, there arose a scarcity in Egypt. Thereupon Bocchoris, the king of Egypt, sent some to consult the oracle of Zeus Ammon about this scarcity; and the god's answer was that he must purge his temples of impure and impious men, by expelling them out of those temples into desert places; but as to the scabby people and lepers, he must drown them, the sun being indignant at these men being suffered to live, and purge his temples, and then the land would bring forth its fruits. When Bocchoris had received these oracles, he called for the priests and attendants at the altars, and ordered them to gather together the impure people, and to deliver them to the soldiers to carry away to the desert, but to take the lepers and wrap them in sheets of lead, and let them down into the sea. Thereupon the lepers and scabby people were drowned, and the others were gathered together and sent into desert places, to be exposed to destruction. And these last assembled together, and took counsel what they should do, and determined, as the night was coming on, that they would kindle fires and light lamps and keep watch, and that they would fast the next night, and so propitiate the gods to deliver them. And on the next day one Moses advised them to venture upon a journey, and go along one road till they should come to inhabited places, and charged them to have no kindness for any man, and to give good counsel to none, but always to advise people for the worst, and to overturn all the temples and altars of the gods they should meet with. And as the rest commended what he said, they did what was resolved on, and journeyed over the desert, and after suffering a good many hardships came to an inhabited country, and there they ill-treated the men, and plundered and burnt their temples, and went into the land which is now called Judæa, and there built a city and dwelt therein; and their city was called Hierosyla from this spoiling of the temples; but afterwards being successful, in process of time they changed its name, that it might not be a reproach to them, and called the city Hierosolyma,<sup>1</sup> and themselves Hierosolymi."

§ 35. Now this man did not invent the same name for his king as Manetho and Chæremon, but concocted a newer name, and omitting the dream and the Egyptian prophet, sent his king to Zeus Ammon to get oracles about the lepers and scabby people. For he says that a multitude of Jews gathered together at the temples. Now it is uncertain whether he ascribes the name of Jews to all these lepers, or to those Jews only that were subject to such diseases; for he says the people of the Jews. What people do you mean? foreigners or natives? Why do you call them Jews, if they were Egyptians? And if they were foreigners, why do you not tell us where they came from? And how is it that, after the king had drowned many of them in the sea, and ejected the rest into desert places, there could still be so great a multitude remaining? Or how did they pass over the desert, and get possession of the land which we now dwell in, and found a city, and build that temple which has been famous among all mankind? Lysimachus ought also not only to have given our legislator's name, but also to have informed us of what nation he was, and what parents he sprung from, and to have stated why he undertook to make such laws for them concerning the gods, and why he ordered them to act so harshly to people on their march. For if they were by birth Egyptians, they would not so easily have changed the customs of their country: and if they were foreigners, they had certainly some laws which had been observed by them from long custom. If indeed they had sworn never to bear good-will to those who had ejected them, they would have had a plausible reason for so acting, but to resolve to wage an implacable war against all men, if they acted as badly as he says they did, while they needed the assistance of all men, shows not their folly, but the great folly of him who tells such lies, who has also the assurance to say, that a name implying spoiling<sup>1</sup> of temples was given to their city, and that this name was afterwards changed; obviously because the former name brought reproach and hatred upon them in subsequent times, while those who founded the city thought they did honour to it by giving it that name. Now this fine fellow had such an unbounded inclination to reproach us, that he did not observe that spoiling of temples is not expressed by the same word among the Jews as it is among the Greeks! But why should one say any more to a person who tells such impudent lies? However, since this book has reached such large dimensions, I will make another beginning, and endeavour to add what still remains to complete my design.

BOOK II.

§ 1.

IN the former book, my most honoured Epaphroditus, I have shown our antiquity, and confirmed the truth by the writings of the Phœnicians and Chaldæans and Egyptians. I have, moreover, produced many of the Greek writers as witnesses thereto. I have also made a refutation of Manetho and Chæremon and some others.

I shall now therefore<sup>1</sup> begin a refutation of the remaining authors who have written anything against us, although I confess I have had a doubt about Apion the grammarian, whether I ought to take the trouble of confuting him or not. For some of his writings contain much the same accusations which others have laid against us, and some things that he has added are very frigid, and most of what he says is very scurrilous, and, to speak no more than the plain truth, shows great ignorance, and what he has put together looks like the work of a man of very bad morals, and of one during his whole life a mountebank. Yet since most men are so foolish that they are rather caught by such orations than by what is written with care, and take pleasure in abuse, but are vexed at praise, I thought it to be necessary not to let this man go off without examination, who had written such an indictment against us, as if in open court. For I also have observed that it is usual for most men to be much delighted when a man, who first began to reproach another, is himself proved to be guilty of vices. However, it is not easy to peruse his argument, nor to know clearly what he means; yet does he seem, amidst a great confusion and disorder in his falsehoods, to relate such things as resemble what I have examined already as to the departure of our forefathers out of Egypt, and secondly he accuses the Jews who dwell in Alexandria. And thirdly he mixes with these things accusations as to the sacred purifications and other rites used in the temple.

§ 2. Now although I cannot but think that I have already proved, and that much more than was necessary, that our fathers were not originally Egyptians, and were not expelled from thence either on account of bodily disease or any other calamities of that sort, yet I will briefly take notice of what Apion adds upon that subject. For in the third book of his Ægyptiaca he speaks as follows. "I have heard from old Egyptians that Moses was a native of Heliopolis, and that he thought himself obliged to follow the customs of his forefathers, and offered his prayers in the open air at all the city walls, and turned all the city so as to face east, which is the situation of Heliopolis. He also set up pillars instead of gnomons,<sup>1</sup> under which was represented a figure in relief like a concave sundial, and the shadow that fell from their tops fell down upon it, that it might go round the same course as the sun itself goes round in the ether." Such is the wonderful account of this grammarian. But that it is a false one is so plain, that it stands in need of but few words to prove it, for it is manifest from the facts. For when Moses erected the first tabernacle to God, he neither himself ordered any such kind of figure in relief to be made for it, nor did he order those that came after him to make such a one. And when Solomon afterwards built his temple in Jerusalem, he abstained from all such curiosities as Apion has here invented. He says further that he had heard from old men, that Moses was a native of Heliopolis, doubtless because, being a younger man himself, he believed that those owing to their greater age were acquainted with and had conversed with Moses! Now Apion, critic as he was, could not confidently tell us the poet Homer's birth-place, any more than he could the birth-place of Pythagoras, who lived comparatively speaking but a little while ago; yet he thus easily determines the age of Moses, who preceded them such a vast number of years, relying on the old men's tale, showing what a liar he was. And then as to the date when he says Moses brought the lepers and the blind and lame out of Egypt, see how well this most accurate critic agrees with those who have written before him! For Manetho says that the Jews departed out of Egypt in the reign of Tethmosis, three hundred and ninety-three years before Danaus fled to Argos, and Lysimachus says it was in the days of king Bocchoris, that is, one thousand and seven hundred years ago, and <sup>1</sup> This seems to have been the first dial that had been made in Egypt, and was a little before the time that Ahaz made his dial in Judæa, about 755, in the first year of the seventh Olympiad, as we shall see presently. See 2 Kings xx. 11; Isa. xxxviii. 8.—W.

Molo and some others have fixed the time as they pleased ; but this Apion, the most trustworthy of all, has exactly fixed it to have been in the seventh Olympiad, and in the first year of that Olympiad, the very same year in which he says that Carthage was built by the Phœnicians. He no doubt added this building of Carthage, thinking it would be a very clear proof of his accuracy : but he was not aware that he thereby drew refutation on himself. For if we may credit the Phœnician records as to their colony, they record that Hiram their king was more than a hundred and fifty years earlier than the building of Carthage, concerning whom I have formerly produced proofs out of those Phœnician records, that this Hiram was a friend of Solomon, when he was building the temple at Jerusalem, and that he gave him great assistance in building it. But Solomon himself built that temple six hundred and twelve years after the Jews went out of Egypt. As for the number of those that were expelled out of Egypt, Apion has contrived to have the very same number as Lysimachus, for he says they were a hundred and ten thousand. He then assigns a certain wonderful and plausible cause for the name of Sabbath ; for he says that “when the Jews had travelled six days’ journey, they had buboes, and so they rested on the seventh day, having got safely into the country which is now called Judæa, and they called that day Sabbath, preserving the language of the Egyptians, because that malady of buboes was called Sabbatosis by the Egyptians.” Would not anyone now laugh at this fellow’s trifling, or rather hate his impudence in writing thus ? For it is clear that all these hundred and ten thousand men had these buboes. And yet, if those men had been blind and lame, and had all sorts of diseases, as Apion says they had, they could not have gone a single day’s journey : and if they were able to travel over a large desert, and besides that to fight and conquer those that opposed them, they could not all of them have had buboes after the sixth day. For no such disease comes naturally and of necessity upon those that travel, and when many ten thousands are in a camp together, they constantly march a fixed distance every day. Nor is it at all probable that such a thing would happen by chance: this idea is the most absurd of all. However, the admirable Apion had before told us, that they reached Judæa in six days, and again, "Moses went up to a mountain that lay between Egypt and Arabia, which was called Sinai, and was concealed there forty days, and when he came down from thence, he gave laws to the Jews." And yet how was it possible for them to tarry forty days in a desert place where there was no water, and at the same time to travel over all the country between Egypt and Judæa in six days? And as for the grammatical translation of the word Sabbath, it is either a proof of his great impudence or gross ignorance. For the words Sabbo and Sabbath are widely different from one another: for the word Sabbath in the Jewish language denotes rest from all sorts of work, whereas it is the word Sabbo, as he affirms, that denotes among the Egyptians the malady of bubo.

§ 3. Such is the novel account which the Egyptian Apion gives us concerning the Jews' departure from Egypt, he being more inventive than the others. But why should we wonder at the lies he tells about our forefathers, in affirming them to be of Egyptian origin, when he lies also about himself? For although he was born at Oasis<sup>1</sup> in Egypt, he pretends to be, as a man may say, superior to all the Egyptians, and forswears his real country and progenitors, and by falsely pretending to be born at Alexandria, admits the depravity of his race. Naturally therefore he calls those Egyptians whom he hates and wishes to abuse. For had he not deemed Egyptians very poor specimens of humanity, he would not have denied his real origin, for we know that those who brag of their own native countries, value themselves upon the name they acquire thereby, and reprove such as unjustly lay claim thereto. As for the Egyptians' claim to be of our kindred, they either make it because they value themselves upon it, or else they would draw us in to share in their own ill repute. But the excellent Apion seems to wish to bestow this reproach against us on the Alexandrians as a reward for the privilege they gave him of fellow-citizenship with them, and knowing the ill-will the Alexandrians bear to the Jews who dwell among them, he proposed to himself to reproach them, although he must thereby include all the other Egyptians also, and in both cases he is no better than an impudent liar.

§ 4. But let us now see what those dreadful and shocking crimes are, which Apion charges upon the Jews dwelling at Alexandria. "They came (says he) out of Syria, and settled near a harbourless sea, and dwelt near the dashing of the waves." Now, if the place of habitation includes any thing that is reproachful, this man reproaches not his own real native country [Egypt], but what he states to be his own country, Alexandria. For all agree that the part of that city which is near the sea is the best of all to dwell in. Now, if the Jews gained that part of the city by force, and have kept it hitherto without being ejected, this is a proof of their valour. But Alexander himself gave them that part of the city for their habitation, and they obtained equal privileges with the Macedonians. I do not know what Apion would have said, had they dwelt at Necropolis,<sup>1</sup> and not been stationed near the royal palace, and if their nation had had the name of Macedonians given them to this very day. Now had he read the letters of king Alexander, or those of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, or met with the writings of the succeeding kings of Egypt, or seen the pillar still standing at Alexandria, and containing the privileges which the great Cæsar bestowed upon the Jews; had he, I say, known of these things, and yet had the impudence to write the opposite to them, he was a bad man: and if he knew nothing of these things, he was an ignorant man. And when he appears to wonder how Jews could be called Alexandrians, this is another similar instance of his ignorance. For all such as are invited to any colony, although they differ ever so much from one another in their nationality, take their names from those who invite them. But what need is there to speak of others, when those of us Jews that dwell at Antioch<sup>2</sup> are called Antiochians, because Seleucus the founder of that city gave them the rights of citizenship? In like manner do the Jews at Ephesus, and in the rest of

Ionia, have the same name as the citizens that were natives there, by the grant of the successors of Alexander. And the liberality of the Romans has granted leave not only to men, but also to great and entire nations, to take the name of Romans. For instance, those anciently called Iberes<sup>1</sup> and Tyrrheni<sup>2</sup> and Sabini<sup>3</sup> are now called Romans. And if Apion reject this way of obtaining the privilege of citizenship, let him cease to call himself an Alexandrian. For how can he be an Alexandrian, who was born, as I said before, in the very heart of Egypt, if citizenship by grant, as he himself has alleged in our case, be denied? And yet the Romans, who are now the masters of the world, have forbidden the Egyptians alone to have the privileges of any citizenship. But he is so generous as to wish to obtain himself a privilege he is forbidden to make use of, yet endeavours by calumnies to deprive those of it that have justly received it. For Alexander did not settle some of our nation in Alexandria, because he wanted inhabitants for a city on whose founding he had bestowed so much pains, but it was given to our people as a reward, because he had, upon a careful trial, found them all men of virtue and fidelity. For, as Hecatæus says concerning us, Alexander honoured our nation to such a degree, that, for the good behaviour and fidelity which the Jews had exhibited to him, he permitted them to hold the country of Samaria free of tribute. Of the same mind also was Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, to those Jews who dwelt at Alexandria. For he put the fortresses of Egypt into their hands, believing they would hold them faithfully and valiantly for him, and when he wished to have a firm hold on the government of Cyrene<sup>4</sup> and the other cities of Libya, he sent a party of Jews to inhabit them. As for his successor Ptolemy, who was surnamed Philadelphus, he not only set all those of our nation free who were captives under him, but also frequently gave them money, and what was most important, he had a great desire to know our laws, and to read the books of our sacred scriptures. So he sent and desired that men might be sent him to interpret our law to him, and that he might have them well compiled, he committed that care to no ordinary persons, but ordained that Demetrius Phalereus and Andreas and Aristeeas should take care of the matter (Demetrius being the most learned person of his age, and the others being intrusted with the guard of his body); nor would he certainly have been so desirous of learning our laws and the philosophy of our nation, had he despised, and not held in high admiration, the men that used them.

§ 5. Now this Apion was almost unacquainted with all the kings of those Macedonians whom he pretends to have been his progenitors; who were very well affected towards us. For the third Ptolemy, who was called Euergetes, when he had got possession of all Syria by force, did not offer his thank-offerings for victory to the Egyptian gods, but went to Jerusalem, and offered many sacrifices to God according to our laws, and dedicated to him such gifts as were worthy of such a victory. And as for Ptolemy Philometor and his wife Cleopatra, they committed their whole kingdom to the Jews, and Onias and Dositheus, both Jews, were the generals of their whole army; whose names are laughed at by Apion, when, instead of abusing them, he ought to have admired their actions, and returned them thanks for saving Alexandria, whose citizen he pretends to be. For when the Alexandrians were warring against queen Cleopatra, and were in danger of perishing miserably, these Jews negotiated terms of agreement, and freed them from the miseries of civil war. "But afterwards (says Apion) Onias led a small army against the city, when Thermus the Roman ambassador was present there." And, I venture to say, acting rightly and very justly. For Ptolemy, who was surnamed Physcon, came from Cyrene upon the death of his brother Philometor, and would have ejected Cleopatra, as well as her sons, out of their kingdom, that he might obtain it for himself unjustly; and that was why Onias undertook a war against him on Cleopatra's behalf, nor would he desert the trust the royal family had placed on him in their distress. And God bore remarkable witness to his righteous behaviour. For when

Ptolemy Physcon had the presumption to fight against Onias' army, and had arrested all the Jews that were in the city with their children and wives, and exposed them naked and bound to his elephants, that they might be trodden to death by them, and had made those elephants drunk for that purpose, the event proved contrary to his plans. For these elephants left the Jews who were exposed to them, and fell violently upon Physcon's friends, and slew a great number of them. And after this Ptolemy saw a terrible apparition, which prohibited his hurting those men: and his favourite concubine, whom some call Ithaca, and others Irene, making supplication to him, that he would not perpetrate so great a wickedness, he complied with her request, and repented of what he had either already done, or was about to do. In consequence of this it is well known that the Jews settled at Alexandria do with good reason celebrate this day, because they had thereon been vouchsafed such an evident deliverance from God. However Apion, the calumniator of all men, has the presumption to accuse the Jews for making this war against Physcon, when he ought to have commended them for the same. He also mentions Cleopatra, the last queen of Alexandria, and as it were abuses us, because she was ungracious to us; whereas he ought to have reproved her, seeing that she indulged herself in all kinds of injustice and wicked practices, both with regard to her nearest relations, and also her husbands who loved her, and indeed in general with regard to all the Romans, and those emperors that were her benefactors; and also had her sister Arsinoe slain in a temple, when she had doue her no harm; and also had her brother slain by treachery, and robbed the gods of her country and the sepulchres of her progenitors.<sup>1</sup> And though she had received her kingdom from the first Cæsar, she had the impudence to rebel against his son<sup>2</sup> and successor: nay, she corrupted Antony with her love tricks, and caused him to be an enemy to his country, and made him unfaithful to his friends, stripping some of their royal rank, and forcing others in her madness to act wickedly. But why need I enlarge upon this any further, when she left Antony in his sea-fight, though he was her husband, and the father of their common children, and compelled him to resign his position with the army as commander in chief, and to follow her? And when last of all Augustus had taken Alexandria, she came to that pitch of cruelty, that she declared she had some hope of preserving her affairs still, if she could kill the Jews with her own hand; to such a degree of cruelty and perfidiousness did she arrive! And do you think that we cannot boast ourselves of any thing, if, as Apion says, this queen did not in time of famine distribute wheat amongst us? However, she at length met with the punishment she deserved. As for us Jews, we appeal to the greatest Cæsar to bear witness to the assistance we brought him and the fidelity we showed him against the Egyptians; we appeal also to the senate and its decrees, and the letters of Augustus Cæsar, wherein our merits are acknowledged. Apion ought to have inspected these letters, and in particular to have examined the testimonies given on our behalf under Alexander and all the Ptolemies, and the decrees of the senate, and of the greatest Roman emperors. And if Germanicus was not able to make a distribution of corn to all the inhabitants of Alexandria, that only shows what a barren time it was, and how great a want there was then of corn, and is no accusation of the Jews; for what all the emperors have thought of the Jews living at Alexandria is well known; for this distribution of wheat was no otherwise omitted with regard to the Jews, than it was with regard to the other inhabitants of Alexandria. And they were desirous to keep the most important trust that the Ptolemies had formerly committed to their care, I mean the entire charge of the river, by no means thinking themselves unworthy of this charge.

§ 6. But besides this, Apion objects, "If the Jews are citizens of Alexandria, why do they not worship the same gods as the Alexandrians do?" To which I answer: Since you are yourselves Egyptians, why do you also have implacable wars with one another about religion? At this rate we must not call you all Egyptians, nor indeed in general men, because you breed up with great care beasts of a nature quite contrary to that of men, since the nature of all men seems to be one and the same. Now, if there are such differences in opinion among you Egyptians, why are you surprised that those who came to Alexandria from another country, and had original laws of their own, persevered in the observance of those laws? But Apion further charges us with being the authors of sedition: which accusation, if it be a true one against the Jews settled in Alexandria, why is it not brought against us all, since we are known to be all of one mind? Moreover, any one will soon discover, that the authors of sedition have been such citizens of Alexandria as Apion is. For while Greeks and Macedonians were in possession of that city, they raised no sedition against us, but permitted us to observe our ancient worship. But when the number of the Egyptians came to be considerable because of the confusions of the times, these seditions were always breaking out, though our people continued uncorrupted. They themselves, therefore, were the authors of these troubles, having by no means the constancy of Macedonians, nor the prudence of Greeks, but truly indulging all of them the evil manners of Egyptians, and exercising their ancient hatred against us. For what is here so presumptuously charged upon us, is owing to the difference between us and them. For as most of them do not easily obtain the privileges of citizens, they call<sup>1</sup> those foreigners who are well known to have had that privilege extended to them all. For it does not appear that any of the Ptolemies formerly bestowed the privileges of citizenship upon Egyptians, nor do any of the Roman emperors now; whereas Alexander introduced us into the city, and the Ptolemies augmented our privileges therein, and the Romans have been pleased to preserve them always inviolable. Moreover, Apion would defame us, because we do not put up images of our emperors, as if these emperors did not know this before, or stood in need of Apion as their defender; whereas he ought rather to have admired the magnanimity and moderation of the Romans, since they do not compel those who are subject to them to transgress the laws of their own countries, but receive the honours due to them as it is pious and lawful for those who offer them to pay them. For they do not thank people for conferring honours upon them, when they are compelled by violence so to do. Moreover, the Greeks and some other nations think it a right thing to make images. Nay, when they have painted the pictures of their parents and wives and children, they dance for joy, and some have pictures of persons who are no way related to them : some even have the pictures of slaves whom they are fond of. What wonder is it, then, if such appear willing to pay the same respect to their princes and lords? But our legislator forbade us to make images, not telling us as it were beforehand that the Roman authority was not to be honoured, but as it were despising a thing that was useful neither to God nor man ; and he forbade them, as I shall show hereafter, to make images of any part of the animal creation, and much less of God himself, who is inanimate. However, our legislator has nowhere forbidden us to pay honours to worthy men, provided they are of another kind, and inferior to those we pay to God, and with such honours we willingly show our respect to our emperors and to the people of Rome. We also offer continual sacrifices for them : and not only do we offer these every day at the common expense of all the Jews, but also, although we offer no other such sacrifices at the common expense, even for our own children, we do this as a peculiar honour to the emperors, and to them alone, while we do the same to no other person whatever. Let this suffice for an answer in general to Apion, as to what he says with relation to Alexandria.

§ 7. However, I wonder at those who furnished this man with his materials, I mean Posidonius and Appollonius Molo ; since they accuse us for not worshipping the same gods whom others worship ; but they do not think themselves guilty of impiety when they tell lies of us, and make up absurd blasphemies about our temple : though it is a most shameful thing for freemen to tell lies on any occasion, and much more so about a temple famous all over the world, and awful for its sanctity. For Apion has the impudence to declare that the Jews placed an ass's head in their holy place, and worshipped it, and made it worthy of so great religion, and he affirms that it was discovered when Antiochus Epiphanes spoiled our temple, and found the

ass's head there made of gold, and worth a great deal of money. To this I first answer that, had there been any such thing among us, an Egyptian ought by no means to have thrown it in our teeth, since an ass is not a more contemptible animal than ***<sup>1</sup> and goats, and other creatures, which among them are gods. In the next place, how came Apion not to know that this is no other than a palpable lie, and proved by facts to be utterly incredible? For we Jews are always governed by the same laws, to which we are always consistent. And although various misfortunes have befallen our city, as have also befallen the cities of others, and although Antiochus called God,<sup>2</sup> and Pompey the Great, and Licinius Crassus, and last of all Titus Cæsar, have conquered us in war, and got possession of our temple, yet they found no such thing there, nor indeed anything but what was agreeable to the strictest piety, though what they found we are not at liberty to reveal to other nations. As for Antiochus, he had no just cause for spoiling our temple, but only came to it when he wanted money, without declaring himself our enemy, and moreover attacked us when we were his associates and friends, nor did he find any thing there worthy of derision. This is attested by many worthy writers, as Polybius of Megalapolis, Strabo of Capadocia, Nicolaus of Damascus, Timagenes, Castor the annalist, and Apollodorus;<sup>3</sup> who all say that it was out of Antiochus' want of money, that he broke his league with the Jews, and spoiled their temple when it was full of gold and silver. Apion ought to have had a regard to these facts, unless he himself rather had an ass's heart and a dog's impudence, for the dog is wont to be worshipped among the Egyptians,<sup>4</sup> and he had no other external reason

<sup>3</sup> It is a great pity that these six Pagan authors, here mentioned to have described the famous profanation of the Jewish temple by Antiochus, should be all lost; I mean so much of their writings as contained that description; for it is plain Josephus perused them all, and that they were therefore extant in his time.—W.

for this lie he tells. As for us Jews, we ascribe no honour or power to asses, as the Egyptians do to crocodiles and asps, since they esteem such as are carried off by the former, or bitten by the latter, to be happy persons, and persons worthy of God. Asses are with us as with other wise men, viz., creatures that bear the burdens that we lay upon them; but if they come to our threshing-floors and eat our corn, or do not perform what we impose upon them, they receive a great many stripes, because it is their business to minister to us in other work and in things necessary in husbandry. But either Apion was most unskilful in the composition of falsehoods, or at least, when he began, he was not able to persevere in what he had undertaken, since he has no success in the reproaches he casts upon us.

§ 8. But he adds another fable from the Greeks, full of detraction of us; as to which, it will be enough to say, that they who presume to speak about divine worship, ought not to be ignorant that it is less impure to pass through temples, than to concoct wicked calumnies about priests. But such men as he are more zealous to defend a sacrilegious king, than to write what is just and true about us and our temple. For wishing to gratify Antiochus, and to conceal the perfidiousness and sacrilege, with regard to our nation, which he was guilty of when he wanted money, they endeavour to detract from us even in regard to the future, and have told lies. Apion becomes indeed the spokesman of others, and says, "That Antiochus found in our temple a couch and a man lying upon it, with a small table placed before him full of dainties of earth and sea and air, and that he was amazed at the sight. And this man immediately prostrated himself before the king upon his coming in, hoping he would afford him all possible assistance, and fell down upon his knees, and stretched out to him his right hand, and begged to be released. And when the king bade him sit down, and tell him who he was, and why he dwelt there, and what was the meaning of those various sorts of food that were set before him, the man made a lamentable complaint, and with sighs and tears gave him the following account of the distress he was in. He said that he was a Greek, and that, as he was travelling over the province to get his living, he was on a sudden seized upon by foreigners, and brought to the temple, and shut up therein, and was seen by nobody, but was being fattened up by these various provisions thus set before him. And truly at first such unexpected comforts excited in him joy, but after a while suspicion, and after that astonishment; and at last he inquired of the servants who attended upon him, and was informed by them that he was thus fed in order to fulfil a law of the Jews which they must not tell him, and that they did the same at a certain time every year. For they would get hold of some Greek foreigner, and fat him up thus every year, and then lead him to a certain wood and kill him, and offer up his body as a sacrifice with their accustomed rites, and taste of his entrails, and take an oath upon thus sacrificing a Greek, that they would ever be at enmity with the Greeks; and they would then throw what remained of the miserable wretch into a certain pit." Apion adds further, "that the man said he was to be killed in a few day now, and he implored Antiochus to respect the Greek gods, and to disappoint the snares the Jews laid for his blood, and to deliver him from the miseries with which he was surrounded." Now a tale of this kind is not only most full of all tragedy, but also abounds in cruel impudence. It does not however clear Antiochus of sacrilege, as those who wrote it to please him imagined. For he could not presume beforehand that he should meet with any such thing in coming to the temple, but must have found it unexpectedly. He was therefore still impious for his wicked desires, and just as much without regard to God, whatever he was bade to do by this superfluous lie, for lie it is, as is most easy to see from the circumstance itself. For the difference of our laws is known not to regard the Greeks only, but quite as much or even more the Egyptians and many other people also. For from what part of the world do not men sometimes come and sojourn among us, that we should conspire only against the Greeks, and endeavour to shed only their blood! Or how is it possible that all the Jews should assemble together at these sacrifices, and that the entrails of one man should be sufficient for so many thousands to taste of them, as Apion alleges? Or why did not the king carry this man, whoever he was, and whatever his name was

(which is not set down in Apion's book), with great pomp back into his own country? For, had he done so, he might have been esteemed a religious person himself, and a mighty lover of the Greeks, and might thereby have procured himself great assistance from all men against the hatred of the Jews. But I leave this matter: for the proper way of confuting fools, is not to use words, but to appeal to facts. All then who have seen the construction of our temple, know well enough its nature, and that the purity of it was never to be profaned. For it had four courts round about it, each one of which was by our law separated from the rest. Into the first court every body was allowed to go, even foreigners, none but menstruous women being prohibited to enter it; into the second court went all the Jews, as also their wives when they were free from any uncleanness; into the third went in the Jewish men when they were clean and purified; into the fourth went the priests, having on their sacerdotal garments: but none went into the most sacred place but the high priests, clothed in their peculiar robes. Now there is such care exercised in our religion, that the priests can only go into the temple at certain hours. For in the morning, at the opening of the temple, those that are to officiate enter and receive the victims: and again at noon, till the temple is shut. Furthermore it is not lawful to carry any vessel into the holy house, nor is there any thing placed therein, but the altar (of incense), the table (of show-bread), the censer, and the candlestick, all which things are written in the law. For there is nothing more there, nor are there any mysteries performed that may not be spoken of, nor is there any feasting within the temple. What I have now said is publicly known, and supported by the testimony of our whole nation, and the method of their operations. For although there are four courses of priests, and each of these courses have more than five thousand men in them, yet they officiate on certain days only; and when those days are over, other priests succeed to the performance of the sacrifices, and assemble together in the temple at mid-day, and receive the keys of the temple, and all the vessels by tale, from their predecessors, without any food or drink being carried into the temple. Nay, we are not allowed to offer such things at the altar, except what is prepared for the sacrifices.

§ 9. What then can we say of Apion, but that he examined none of these things, while he uttered incredible words about them? But it is a great shame for a critic not to be able to write true history. And if he knew the purity of our temple, he has entirely omitted to mention it; while he has concocted a story about the seizing of a Greek, about unspeakable food, and the most delicious preparation of dainties; and pretends that strangers could go into a place, where the noblest men among the Jews are not allowed to enter, unless they be priests. This, therefore, is the utmost degree of impiety, and a voluntary lie, to delude those who will not examine into the truth. By such unspeakable calumnies as are above related, they have tried to detract from us.

§ 10. Nay, this miracle of piety derides us further, and adds the following idle tale to his former one. For he says that Antiochus related that, "while the Jews had once a long war with the Idumæans, there came a man out of one of the cities of the Idumæans, who had worshipped Apollo there. This man, whose name is said to have been Zabidus, went to the Jews, and promised that he would deliver Apollo, the god of the people of Dora, into their hands, and that he would come to our temple, if they would all come up with him, and bring the whole multitude of the Jews with them. Then Zabidus made a certain wooden instrument, and put it round him, and set three rows of lamps thereon, and walked in such a manner that he appeared to those that stood a great way off a kind of star walking upon the earth. And the Jews were terribly frightened at so surprising a sight, and stood very quiet at some distance; and Zabidus, while they continued so very quiet, went into the holy house, and carried off the golden head of an ass, (so facetiously does he write,) and then went his way back again to Dora in great haste." We might say then that Apion loads the ass, that is himself, and lays on him a burden of fooleries and lies. For he writes of places that do not exist, and not knowing the cities he speaks of, he changes their situation. For Idumæa borders upon our country, and is near Gaza, and there is no such city as Dora in it; there is, indeed, a city called Dora<sup>1</sup> in Phœnice, near Mount Carmel, but that is four days' journey from Idumæa. And why, again, does this man accuse us, as not having gods in common with other nations, if our forefathers so easily believed that Apollo would come to them, and thought they saw him walking upon the earth, and the stars with him? For certainly those who have so many festivals, wherein they light lamps, must at this rate have never seen a lamp! It seems also that when Zabidus took his journey over the country, where there were so many myriads of people, nobody met him. He also, it seems, even in time of war, found the walls of Jerusalem destitute of guards. I omit all the rest; but the doors of the holy house were seventy cubits high, and twenty cubits broad, and they were all plated over with gold, and almost of solid gold, and there were no fewer than twenty men required to shut them every day, nor was it lawful ever to leave them open. But it seems this lamp-bearer of ours opened them easily, or thought he opened them, as he thought he carried off the ass's head! But whether he returned it to us again, or whether Apion took it and returned it to the temple again, that Antiochus might find it, and give Apion a second tale, is uncertain.

§ 11. Apion also lies as to an oath of ours, that we swear by God, the maker of the heaven and earth and sea, to bear no good-will to any foreigner, and especially to none of the Greeks. But he ought to have said falsely at once, that we swear to bear no good-will to any foreigner, and especially to none of the Egyptians. For so his story about the oath would have tallied with the rest of his former fictions, if indeed our forefathers were driven away by their kinsmen the Egyptians, not on account of any wickedness, but on account of their calamities. As to the Greeks, we are rather remote from them in place than different from them in institutions, so that we have no enmity with them, nor any jealousy of them. On the contrary, it has so happened, that many of them have come over to our laws, and some have continued in their observance, though others had not courage enough to persevere, and seceded from them again. Nor did anybody ever hear this oath sworn by us: Apion, it seems, was the only person that heard of it, indeed he concocted it himself.

§ 12. However, Apion deserves to be admired for his great understanding in what I am going to speak of next. He says it is a plain proof that we neither have just laws, nor worship God as we ought to do, because we are not independent, but are rather in subjection to Gentiles, sometimes to one nation, sometimes to another, and because our city has suffered from several calamities, while their city was from of old an independent city, and not accustomed to be in subjection to the Romans. And yet it would be wiser in any one to abstain from such boasting. For everybody but himself would think, that Apion says what he has said against himself. For few nations have had the good fortune to continue many generations in independence, and the mutations in human affairs have put these also in subjection to others; and most nations have often had to obey others. But the Egyptians pretend that they alone had this extraordinary privilege, to serve none of the monarchs who subdued Asia and Europe, because the gods fled into their country, and saved themselves by changing themselves into the forms of wild beasts; whereas in point of fact these very Egyptians<sup>1</sup> appear to have never in all past time had one day of freedom, not even with their own lords. I will not reproach them with relating how the Persians used them, not once only, but many times, laying their cities waste, and demolishing their temples, and cutting the throats of those animals whom they esteemed gods; for it is not right to imitate the clownish ignorance of Apion, who has no regard to the misfortunes of the Athenians or of the Lacedæmonians, the latter of whom are affirmed by all men to have been the most courageous, and the former the most religious, of the Greeks. I say nothing of such kings as have been famous for piety, as one of them whose name was Crœsus, nor what calamities he met with in his life: I say nothing of the Acropolis of Athens, of the temples at Ephesus and Delphi, nor of ten thousand others which have been burnt down, and nobody cast reproaches on those who were the sufferers, but only on those who were the actors therein. But now we have met with a new accuser of our nation in Apion, who quite forgets the miseries of his own people the Egyptians. Sesostris, the legendary king of Egypt, has blinded him. However, we will not brag of our kings, David and Solomon, though they conquered many nations: we will not speak of them. But Apion is ignorant of what everybody knows, that the Egyptians were servants to the Persians, and afterwards to the Macedonians, when they were lords of Asia, and were no better than slaves, while we enjoyed liberty, and moreover, had the dominion of the cities round about us, for about a hundred and twenty years, till Pompey the Great. And when all nations were conquered by the Romans, who are kings everywhere, our ancestors were the only people who continued to be esteemed their allies and friends because of their fidelity.

§ 13. But, says Apion, "We Jews have not had any wonderful men amongst us, as inventors of arts, nor any eminent for wisdom." He then enumerates Socrates, and Zeno, and Cleanthes, and some others of the same sort; and then he adds himself to them, which is the richest thing of all that he says, and pronounces Alexandria to be happy, because it has such a citizen as him. For he had to bear witness to himself. For he appeared to all others no better than a wicked mountebank, corrupt both in his life and conversation, so that one may with reason pity Alexandria, if it is proud of such a citizen as he is. But as to our own men, such as have perused our Antiquities cannot be ignorant that many are as deserving of commendation as any people.

§ 14. As to the other things which he sets down in his accusation, it may perhaps be the best way to let them pass without apology, that he may be his own accuser, and the accuser of the rest of the Egyptians. For he accuses us of sacrificing animals, and of abstaining from eating swine's flesh, and laughs at us for practising circumcision. Now as for the slaughter of tame animals, it is common to us and to all other men, and Apion, by making it a crime to sacrifice them, demonstrates himself to be an Egyptian; for a Greek or Macedonian would have had no objection to such a thing; for those people vow to sacrifice whole Hecatombs to the gods, and make use of the victims for feasting; and the world is not thereby rendered destitute of cattle, as Apion feared it would be. However, if all men had followed the manners of the Egyptians, the world would certainly have been bereft of human beings, but filled full of the wildest beasts, which, because they suppose them to be gods, they carefully nourish. Now if any one should ask Apion, which of all the Egyptians he thinks to be the most wise and most pious, he would certainly acknowledge the priests to be so. For they say that two things were originally committed to their care by their kings' injunctions, the worship of the gods and the pursuit of wisdom. And their priests are all circumcised, and abstain from eating swine's flesh. Nor do any of the other Egyptians assist them in sacrificing to the gods. Apion was therefore quite blinded in his mind, when, for the sake of the Egyptians, he devised reproaching us, whereas he really accuses them, seeing that they not only adopt those habits which he so much abuses, but have also taught other men to practise circumcision, as Herodotus says.<sup>1</sup> And I think Apion was justly punished for his casting such reproaches on the laws of his own country; for he was circumcised himself of necessity, on account of an ulcer on his person, which, as he received no benefit from that circumcision, rotted away, and he died in great torments. For well-intentioned people ought to observe carefully their own laws concerning religion, and not to abuse the laws of other nations, whereas this Apion did not observe his own laws, and told lies about ours. Such was the end of Apion's life, and let this be our last reference to him.

§ 15. Now as Apollonius Molo, and Lysimachus, and some others, partly out of ignorance, but chiefly out of ill-will, have written treatises about our lawgiver Moses, and about our laws, which are neither fair nor true, calumniating Moses as an impostor and deceiver, and asserting that our laws teach us wickedness and not virtue, I intend to state briefly, to the best of my ability, the whole constitution of our polity and its details. For I think it will then be plain that the laws we have are most excellently adapted for the advancement of piety, and for the interests of society, and for general philanthropy, as also for justice, and for sustaining labours with fortitude, and for contempt of death. And I beg of those who shall peruse this work of mine, to read it without ill-will. For it is not my purpose to write an encomium upon ourselves, but I esteem it the most just defence for us, against the many and lying accusations that have been made against us, to cite those laws, according to which we lead our lives; especially as Apollonius does not, like Apion, lay a continuous accusation against us, but accuses us only by fits and starts, and here and there throughout his treatise. Sometimes he reproaches us as atheists and misanthropes, and sometimes twits us with our want of courage, and yet sometimes, on the contrary, accuses us of too great boldness and recklessness. He also says that we are the stupidest of all barbarians, and that this is why we are the only people who have contributed no invention to life. All this I think I shall have sufficiently disproved, when it shall appear that our laws enjoin the very reverse of what he says, and that we very carefully observe those laws. And should I be compelled to mention the laws of other nations that are contrary to ours, they who have thought good to depreciate our laws in comparison with their own must thank themselves for this. Nor will there, I think, be any opportunity left them to say, either that we have not these laws, the chief of which I shall present to the reader, or that we do not, above all men, continue in the observance of them.

§ 16. To begin then a little back, I would say this first, that those who were lovers of order and common laws, and who first introduced them, when men were living without law and order, may well have this testimony, that they were better than other men in mildness and natural virtue. And certainly such persons endeavour to have every thing they introduce believed to be very ancient, that they may not be thought to imitate others, but may rather seem themselves to have suggested a regular way of living to others. Since, then, this is the case, the excellency of a legislator is seen in seeing what is best, and in persuading those who are to use the laws he ordains to have a good opinion of them, and the excellency of a people is seen in their abiding by the laws, and making no changes in them either in prosperity or adversity. Now I say that our legislator is the most ancient of all the legislators who are anywhere recorded. For Lycurgus and Solon, and Zaleucus the legislator of the Locrians, and all those legislators who are admired by the Greeks, seem to be of yesterday if compared with our legislator, indeed the very name of law was not so much as known in old times among the Greeks. Homer bears me out in this, for he never uses the word law in all his poems;<sup>1</sup> for indeed there was in his time no such thing, but the multitude was governed by undefined opinions and by the orders of their kings. They continued also a long time after Homer in the use of these unwritten customs, although they frequently changed them to suit a particular emergency. But our legislator, who was of so much greater antiquity than the rest (as even those who speak against us upon all occasions admit), exhibited himself to the people as their best guide and counsellor, and included in his legislation the whole conduct of life, and persuaded them to receive it, and brought it to pass that those who were acquainted with his laws did most carefully observe them.

§ 17. Now let us consider his first and greatest work. When it was resolved on by our forefathers to leave Egypt, and to return to their own country, he took the many myriads of the people, and safely rescued them out of many difficulties. For it was necessary for them to travel over a waterless and sandy desert, and to overcome their enemies, and during their battles to preserve their children and wives and spoil; on all which occasions he showed himself a most excellent general, and a most sagacious counsellor, and one that took the truest care of them all. He also so brought it about, that the whole multitude depended upon him, and while he made them always obedient to what he enjoined, he never used his authority for his own private advantage. And at the time when eminent men do most gain great power for themselves, and pave the way for tyranny, and accustom the people to live very lawlessly, our legislator, on the contrary, though he had such great authority, thought he ought to have regard to piety, and to show his great good-will to the people; for so he thought he might best show his own virtue, and might secure the most lasting prosperity to those who had made him their leader. As therefore his intentions were so good, and he had performed such wonderful exploits, we justly looked upon ourselves as having a divine leader and counsellor. And when he had first persuaded himself that his actions and designs were agreeable to God's will, he thought it his duty to impress that notion above all things upon the multitude: for those who believe that God surveys their lives cannot bear the thought of sin. Such then was the character of our legislator, who was no impostor, or deceiver, as his revilers say unjustly, but such a one as they boast Minos to have been among the Greeks, and other legislators after him. For some of them maintained that they had their laws from God, and Minos referred the oracular origin of his laws to Apollo and his oracle at Delphi, whether they thought they were really so derived, or that they could so more easily persuade the people to obey them. And as to who made the best laws, and who had the justest ideas as to faith in God, it is easy to determine this by comparing the laws themselves together, for it is time that we come to that point. Now there are innumerable differences in detail in the customs and laws that obtain among all mankind; for some legislators have permitted their governments to be monarchies, others oligarchies, and others democracies. But our legislator had no regard to any of these things, but ordained our government to be what, by a strained expression, may be termed a Theocracy, ascribing the sovereignty and authority to God, and persuading all the people to look to him as the author of all good things that were enjoyed either in common by all mankind, or by each individual privately, and of all that they themselves obtained by praying to him in their greatest straits. He informed them also that it was impossible to escape God's observation, either in any of their outward actions, or in any of their inward thoughts. Moreover, he represented God as unbegotten, and immutable through all eternity, surpassing all mortal conception in beauty, and though known to us by his power, yet unknown to us as to his essence. I do not now say that the wisest of the Greeks were taught these notions of God by principles that Moses supplied them with; but they have borne emphatic witness that these notions are good and agreeable to the nature and majesty of God. For Pythagoras, and Anaxagoras, and Plato, and the Stoic Philosophers that succeeded them, and almost all other philosophers, seem to have had the same notions about the nature of God. But these men durst not disclose those true notions to more than a few, because the body of the people were prepossessed by other opinions, while our legislator, who made his actions square with his laws, not only prevailed upon his contemporaries to agree to his notions, but so firmly imprinted this faith in God upon all their posterity, that it could never be removed. And the reason why our lawgiver in his legislation far exceeded all other legislators in utility to all, is that he did not make religion a part of virtue, but had the insight to make the various virtues parts of religion; I mean justice, and fortitude, and self-control, and the mutual harmony in all things of the members of the community with one another. For all our actions and studies and words have a connection with piety towards God; for he has left none of these things indefinite or undetermined. For there are two ways of arriving at any discipline or moral conduct of life; the one is by instruction in words, the other by exercises in practice. Now all other lawgivers separated these two ways in their codes, and choosing the one of those methods which best pleased them, neglected the other. Thus did the Lacedæmonians and the Cretans teach by exercises in practice, and not by words; while the Athenians and almost all the other Greeks made laws about what was to be done or left undone, but neglected exercising people thereto in practice.

exercises in practice to go on without verbal instruction, nor did he permit the hearing of the law to proceed without exercises in practice; but beginning immediately with the earliest infancy, and the appointment of every one's diet, he left nothing of the very smallest consequence to be done at the pleasure and caprice of the persons themselves; but made fixed rules and laws what sorts of food they should abstain from, and what sorts they should make use of, as also what intercourse they should have with others; what diligence they should use in their occupations, and what times of rest should be interposed; that, by living under those laws as under a father and a master, we might be guilty of no sin either from wilfulness or ignorance. For he did not suffer the pretext of ignorance to be valid, but showed the law to be the best and most necessary of instructions, for he bade the people leave off all their other employments, and assemble together to hear the law, and to be perfectly instructed in it, not once or twice or often, but every week; a thing which all other legislators seem to have neglected.

§ 19. Indeed most of mankind are so far from living according to their own laws, that they hardly know them, but when they have sinned, then they learn from others that they have transgressed the law. Even those who are in the highest and most important offices confess they are not acquainted with their laws, and are obliged to take such persons as profess to have skill in those laws for their assessors in the administration of public affairs. But if any body do but ask any one of our people about our laws, he could more easily tell them all than he could tell his own name. For because of our having learned them as soon as ever we became sensible of any thing, we have them as it were engraven on our souls. And our transgressors of them are but few, and it is impossible, when any do offend, to escape punishment by entreaty for pardon.

§ 20. And it is this very thing that principally creates such wonderful oneness of mind amongst us all. For our having one and the same opinion about God, and our having no difference from one another in our course of life and manners, brings about among us the most excellent accord in manners that is anywhere among mankind. For among us alone will no one hear any discourses about God that contradict one another, which are yet frequent among other nations (and this is true not only among ordinary persons, according as every one is personally disposed, but some of the philosophers also have been bold enough to indulge in such speculations, some of them having attempted to take away all the nature of God, as others of them have taken away his providence over mankind), nor will any one perceive amongst us any difference in the conduct of our lives, but the works of all among us are common, and we have one doctrine about God, which chimes in with our law, and affirms that he surveys all things. And as to the conduct of our lives, that we consider that all things ought to have piety for their end, any body may hear from our women and servants.

§ 21. Hence indeed has arisen the accusation which some bring against us, that we have produced no men that have been inventors of new deeds or words. For all other nations think it a fine thing to stick to nothing that has been handed down from their forefathers, and testify to the clever wisdom of men who are bold enough to ignore their traditions; whereas we, on the contrary, suppose it to be our only wisdom and virtue neither to act nor think contrary to our original laws. Now this is a reasonable proof that our legislation is admirable; for laws which are not thus well made are proved upon trial to want amendment.

§ 22. And as we are ourselves persuaded that our law was made agreeably to the will of God, it would be impious for us not to observe the same. For what is there in it that any body would change, or what could one invent better, or what could one borrow from other people's laws more excellent? Would any have the entire frame-work of our polity altered? And what could be a better or more righteous constitution than ours, which makes us esteem God the governor of the universe, and commits to the priests generally the administration of the principal affairs, and again intrusts the rule over the other priests to the high priest who is supreme over everything? Nor did our legislator, at their first appointment, advance these priests to that dignity for their riches, or for any other fortuitous advantages, but he intrusted the management of divine worship mainly to those who exceeded others in powers of persuasion and in self-control. These men had the strict care of the law, and had the rest of the people's conduct committed to them: for the priests were ordained to be overseers of everything, and to be judges in doubtful cases, and to be the punishers of those who were condemned to suffer punishment.

§ 23. What form of government then can be more holy than this? what more worthy worship can be paid to God than we pay, where the entire body of the people are prepared for religion, where an extraordinary degree of care is required in the priests, and where the whole polity is so ordered as if it were a sort of religious solemnity? For what foreigners, when they solemnize such festivals, and call them mysteries and initiations, are not able to observe even for a few days, we observe with much pleasure and unshaken resolution during our whole lives. What are the things then that we are commanded or forbidden? They are simple and well known. The first command is concerning God, and affirms that God is almighty and perfect and happy, self-sufficing and sufficient for all other beings, the beginning, the middle, and the end of all things. He is manifest in his works and benefits, and more conspicuous than any other being whatever; but as to his form and size he is most obscure. All materials, let them be ever so costly, are unworthy to compose an image of him, and all arts are inartistic to express the notion of him. We cannot see any thing like him, nor is it agreeable to piety to conjecture about him. We see his works, the light, the heaven, the earth, the sun and moon, the waters, the generations of animals, and the growth of fruits. God did not make these things with hands nor with labour, nor did he need the assistance of any to co-operate with him: but as his will resolved they should be made and be good also, they were made and became good immediately. All men ought to follow and worship him in the exercise of virtue; for this way of worship of God is the most holy.

§ 24. There is also but one temple for one God (for likeness is the constant foundation of agreement<sup>1</sup>), common to all men, because God is common to all men. His priests are continually about his worship, over whom he that is head of the family presides. His business is to offer sacrifices to God with his fellow-priests, to see that the laws are observed, to determine controversies, and to punish those who are convicted of wrong-doing. And he that does not submit to him is subject to the same punishment as if he had been guilty of impiety towards God himself. When we offer sacrifices to him, we do not do so to surfeit ourselves or to be drunk (for such excesses are against the will of God, and the sacrifices would then be an excuse for riot and luxury), but by keeping ourselves sober, orderly, and ready for our other occupations, and being more temperate<sup>1</sup> than others. And at the sacrifices themselves, we ought first to pray for the common welfare of all, and after that for our own (for we are made for fellowship with one another), and he who prefers the common good to his own private good is especially acceptable to God. And let our prayers and supplications be made to God, not so much that he would give us what is good, (for he has already given that of his own accord, and distributed it alike to all,) as that we may duly receive it, and when we have received it keep it. The law has also appointed several purifications at our sacrifices, whereby we are cleansed after a funeral, after any nocturnal pollution, and after connection with our wives, and after several other things which it would be too long now to set down. Such is our rationale concerning God and his worship, and the law is also the same.

§ 25. What, again, are our laws about marriages? The law recognizes no connection of the sexes but the natural connection between a man and his wife, and that only for the procreation of children; and it abhors sodomy, and death is the punishment for that crime. The law commands us also, when we marry, not to have regard to dowry, nor to take a woman by violence, nor to persuade her by deceit and guile, but to demand her in marriage of him who has power to dispose of her, and is fit<sup>2</sup> to give her away because of his nearness of kin. For the legislator says that a woman is inferior to her husband in all things. Let her, therefore, be obedient to him; not that he should ill-treat her, but that she may acknowledge her position to be a subordinate one, for God has given the authority to the husband. A husband is to lie only with his wife, and to seduce another man's wife is a wicked thing, which, if any one ventures upon, death is inevitably his punishment, as it is also his who forces a virgin betrothed to another man. The law, moreover, enjoins us to bring up all our offspring, and forbids women to cause abortion of what is begotten, or to destroy the foetus in any other way,<sup>1</sup> for she will be an infanticide who thus destroys life and diminishes the human race. If any one, therefore, commits adultery or seduction, he cannot be clean. Why, even after the regular connection of man and wife, the law enjoins that they shall both wash themselves. For there is a defilement contracted thereby both of soul and body, as if they had travelled into another country. For the soul suffers from its union with the body,<sup>2</sup> and is only freed therefrom again by death. On this account the law requires purification in all such cases.

§ 26. Moreover the law does not permit us to feast at the births of our children, and so make excuses for drinking to excess, but it ordains that the very beginning of life should be sober. It also commands us to bring our children up in learning, and to make them conversant with the laws, and acquainted with the acts of their forefathers, that they may imitate them, and being nourished up in them may neither transgress them, nor have any excuse for ignorance of them.

§ 27. Our law also provides for the decent burial of the dead, but without any extravagant expense at their funerals, and without the erection of any handsome monuments for them, and orders that the nearest relations should perform their obsequies. It also ordains that all who pass by when any one is buried should accompany the funeral, and join in the lamentation. It also orders that the house and its inhabitants should be purified after the funeral is over, that every one may thence learn to be as far as pos-

§ 28. The law also ordains, that parents should be honoured next after God himself, and orders the son who does not requite them for the benefits he has received from them, but comes short on any occasion, to be handed over to justice and stoned. It also says that young men should pay due respect to every elder, since God is the eldest of all beings. It does not give leave to conceal any thing from our friends, for that is not friendship which will not trust them in all things. It also forbids the revelation of their secrets, if subsequent enmity arise between them. If any judge take bribes, his punishment is death. He that neglects one that begs for aid, when he is able to relieve him, is liable to be called to account. What one has not intrusted to another, cannot be required back again. No one is to touch another's goods. He that lends money must not receive interest. These, and many more of the like sort, are the rules that unite us in the bonds of society with one another.

§ 29. It will also be worth our while to see what equity our legislator would have us exercise in our intercourse with strangers. For it will then appear that he made the best provision he possibly could, that we should neither infringe our own polity, nor show a grudging spirit to those who would cultivate a friendship with us. Thus our legislator receives in a friendly manner all those who wish to come and live under our laws, esteeming relationship to lie not only in race but also in similarity of life and manners. But he does not allow those who come to us only to sojourn for a time to be admitted into communion with us.

§ 30. There are, however, various things which our legislator ordered us as obligatory on us to impart to all men; as to give fire, water, and food, to such as require them, and to show them the way, and not to let any one lie unburied. He also would have us treat those accounted<sup>1</sup> our enemies with moderation. For he does not allow us to set their country on fire, nor does he permit us to cut down their fruit trees; he also forbids us to strip those that have been slain in war. He has also provided for such as are taken captive, that they may not be ill-treated, and especially the captive women. Indeed, he has taught us gentleness and humanity so effectually, that he has not neglected the care of brute beasts, permitting no other than the regular use of them, and forbidding any other. And if any of them flee to our houses as suppliants, we are forbidden to slay them. Nor may we kill the dams with their young ones; and we are obliged, even in an enemy's country, to spare and not kill those animals that labour for mankind. Thus has our lawgiver contrived to teach us merciful conduct every way, by using us to such laws as instruct us therein: while at the same time he has ordained, that such as break these laws should be punished without excuse.

§ 31. Now most offences with us are capital, as if any one is guilty of adultery, if any forces a virgin, if any one is so impudent as to attempt to commit sodomy with a male, or if the person solicited submits to be so used. The law is also equally inexorable for slaves. And if any one cheats another in measures or weights, or makes a knavish bargain and sale to cheat another, or if any one steal what belongs to another, and takes what he never deposited, all these have punishments allotted them, and that not such as are met with among other nations, but more severe ones. And as to misbehaviour to parents, or impiety to God, for the very intention the offender is put to death immediately. For those, on the other hand, who act according to the laws the reward is not silver nor gold, nor again a crown of wild olive or parsley, nor any such public mark of commendation; but each one, having his own conscience bearing him witness, believes (on the word of the legislator, confirmed by the sure testimony of God) that to those that observe these laws, even though they should be obliged to die willingly for them, God has granted that they shall come into being again, and after their vicissitudes have a better life than they had before. I should hesitate to write thus at this time, were it not well known to all from their actions, that many of our people have frequently bravely resolved to endure any sufferings, rather than speak one word against our law.

§ 32. Indeed, had our nation not happened to be known to all men, and had our voluntary submission to our laws not been open and manifest, but somebody read these laws to the Greeks, either pretending to have written them himself, or asserting that he had met with men outside the limits of the known world who had such sublime notions of God, and had continued many a century in the steady observance of such laws as ours, I cannot but suppose that all men would admire our nation because of the frequent changes they had themselves been subject to. For those who have attempted to write something of the same kind as a polity and code of laws, are accused of composing monstrous things, and are said to have undertaken an impossible task. I will say nothing here of those other philosophers who have undertaken any thing of this kind in their writings. But Plato, who is admired by the Greeks as remarkable for his lofty life and force of language, and who in powers of persuasion excelled all other philosophers, continues to be little better than laughed at and publicly ridiculed as on the stage by those that pretend to sagacity in political affairs: although he who shall diligently peruse his writings, will find them mild and pretty near to the customs of the generality of mankind. And Plato himself confesses that it is not safe to publish the true notion concerning God among the ignorant multitude. Yet some men look upon Plato's discourses as no better than certain idle words tricked out with great artifice. However, they admire Lycurgus most of all legislators, and all men celebrate Sparta for having continued in the observance of his laws for a very long time. So let it be admitted a proof of virtue to obey the laws. But then let such as admire this in the Lacedæmonians, compare the duration of their polity with the more than two thousand years that our polity has lasted, and let them further consider that, though the Lacedæmonians seemed to observe their laws strictly, while they enjoyed their liberty, yet, when they underwent a change of fortune, they almost forgot all those laws; while we, though we have had ten thousand reverses, owing to the frequent changes of rulers in Asia, have never abandoned our laws in the most pressing distresses we have been in, nor neglected them either from sloth or luxury; yet, if any one will consider the matter, the difficulties and labours laid upon us have been far greater than what seem to have been borne by the fortitude of the Lacedæmonians. For they neither cultivated their land, nor exercised any trades, but lived in their own city, free from all labour, in the enjoyment of plenty, and using such exercises as might improve their bodies, while they made use of other men to minister to them in all the necessaries of life, and had their food prepared for them by them; enduring all toils and hardships merely for this one<sup>1</sup> noble and humane end, that they might be able to conquer all those against whom they made war! I need not add that they did not always succeed in this; for not only a few individuals, but multitudes of them have frequently en masse neglected the precepts of their law, and surrendered with their arms to their enemies.

§ 33. Now, as for ourselves, I venture to say, that no one can tell of so many, nay, of more than one or two, that have abandoned our laws, or feared death, I do not mean that easiest of deaths which happens in battles, but that which comes with bodily tortures, and seems to be the hardest death of all. Indeed I think those that have conquered us have put us to such deaths, not from their hatred to us when they had got us in their power, but rather from their desire to see a wonderful sight, namely, that there are men in the world, who believe the only evil is being compelled to do or to speak any thing contrary to their laws! Nor ought men to wonder at us, if we are more courageous in dying for our laws than all other men are. For other men do not easily submit to what seem the easiest of our practices, I mean such things as working with our hands, and simple diet, and being contented to eat and drink and lie with our wives by rule, as also in respect to luxury, and again in the constant observance of our days of rest. For those that can use their swords in war, and can put their enemies to flight when they attack them, cannot bear to submit to rules about their mode of living; whereas our being accustomed willingly to submit to laws in these cases makes us readier to show our fortitude upon other occasions also.

§ 34. Yet the Lysimachuses and the Molos, and some other such writers, reprobate sophists, and deceivers of young men, abuse us as the vilest of mankind. Now I had no mind to make an inquiry into the laws of other nations. For the custom of our country is to keep our own laws, and not to bring accusations against the laws of others; and indeed our legislator has expressly forbidden us to jeer or rail at those that are esteemed gods by other people,<sup>1</sup> out of respect to the very name of God. But as our antagonists think to run us down by a comparison of their religion and ours, it is not possible to keep silence, especially as what I shall say to confute these men will not be now first said, but has been already said by many of the highest reputation. For who among those that have been admired among the Greeks for wisdom has not greatly censured not only the most famous poets, but also the most esteemed legislators, for spreading originally among the masses such notions concerning the gods as that they may be allowed to be as numerous as they themselves have a mind to declare, and that they are begotten by one another, and that in all kinds of ways imaginable. They also classify them in their places and ways of living, as one would classify various kinds of animals, placing some under the earth,<sup>2</sup> and some in the sea,<sup>3</sup> and they represent the ancientest of them all as bound in Tartarus;<sup>4</sup> whereas in the case of those gods to whom they have allotted heaven, they have set over them one, who in name is their father, but in his actions a tyrant and despot;<sup>5</sup> so that his wife, and brother, and daughter (which daughter<sup>6</sup> he brought forth from his own head), made a conspiracy against him to seize upon him and confine him, as he had himself seized upon and confined his own father.<sup>7</sup>

§ 35. Justly do the wisest men think such notions as these deserving of severe rebukes, and also laugh at the idea that we ought to believe some of the gods to be beardless and striplings, and others of them to be old and bearded,<sup>1</sup> and that some are set to trades, as one god is a smith,<sup>2</sup> and one goddess a weaver,<sup>3</sup> and that another god is a warrior and fights with men,<sup>4</sup> and that others of them are harpers,<sup>5</sup> or delight in archery;<sup>6</sup> and also that mutual strife arises among them, and that they quarrel about mankind, till they not only lay hands upon one another, but are also wounded by men and lament and wail.<sup>7</sup> But what is grossest of all are those unbridled lusts and amours ascribed to almost all of them. Indeed, how can it be other than most absurd to ascribe all this to gods and goddesses? Then the most noble and chief of all the gods, and himself also their father,<sup>8</sup> neglects those goddesses<sup>9</sup> whom he has seduced and got with child, and suffers them to be put in prison or exposed to the sea.<sup>10</sup> He is also so mastered by fate, that he cannot save his own offspring, nor can he bear their deaths without shedding tears. These are fine things indeed, as are the rest that follow! Adultery truly was so shamelessly looked on in heaven by the gods, that some of them confessed they envied those who were taken in the very act! And why should they not do so, when the eldest of them and their king could not in the violence of his lust wait for connection with his wife till they could get into their bedchamber?<sup>11</sup> And some of the gods are fabled to have been servants to men, sometimes as builders for pay,<sup>12</sup> and sometimes as shepherds,<sup>13</sup> while others, like malefactors, are bound in a prison of brass.<sup>14</sup> Now what sensible person would not be provoked at such stories, to rebuke those that made them up, and to condemn the great silliness of those that believe them? Nay, others have personified as gods terror and fear, and even madness and fraud, and other of the vilest passions. And they have persuaded cities to offer sacrifices to the better sort of these gods. Thus they have been absolutely forced to esteem some gods as the givers of good things, and to call others averters of evil. And these last they endeavour to move, as they would the vilest of men, by gifts and presents, expecting to receive some great mischief from them, unless they bribe them as it were by such offerings.

§ 36. What then is the cause of such irregularity and scandal as to the Deity? I suppose it to be derived from the imperfect knowledge their legislators had from the first of the true nature of God, and because they did not explain to the people even so much as they themselves comprehended of it, nor did they frame the rest of their polity in accordance with it, but omitted it as a thing of very little consequence, and not only gave leave to the poets to introduce what gods they pleased, subject to all sorts of passions, but also allowed the orators to enroll by plebiscite such foreign gods as they thought proper. The painters also and statuaries of Greece enjoyed great power in this respect, as each of them could devise the similitude of a god, the one forming it out of clay, and the other by painting a picture; but the most admired sculptors used ivory and gold as the constant materials for their new statues. Moreover, the gods, who first flourished in the honours done them, are now grown old, and certain other new gods are introduced and worshipped. As for the temples, some of them are desolate, and others are built anew, according to the pleasure of individual men; whereas they ought on the contrary to have preserved their opinion about God and the honour due to him without change.<sup>1</sup>

§ 37. Now Apollonius Molo belonged to the category of foolish and vain men. However, nothing that I have said was unknown to those who were real philosophers among the Greeks, nor were they ignorant of the frigid pretensions of allegories. And so they justly despised them, and agreed with us in true and becoming notions of God. From this standpoint Plato would not admit into his republic any one of the other poets, and dismisses even Homer himself with panegyric, after placing a garland on his head and pouring ointment upon him, that he should not destroy right notions about God with his fables. Plato also especially imitated our legislator in that he enjoined his citizens to pay to nothing more attention than to this, that every one of them should learn their laws accurately; as also that they should not have foreigners mixing with their own people at random, but that the republic should be pure, and consist only of such as obeyed the laws. Apollonius Molo did no way consider this, when he accused us of not admitting such as have their own preconceptions about God, and having no fellowship with those who choose to observe a different way of living to ourselves. For this method is not peculiar to us, but common to all men, not to Greeks only, but also to such as are of the greatest reputation among the Greeks. Why, the Lacedæmonians continually expelled foreigners, and would not suffer their own citizens to travel abroad, suspecting that both these things would tend to the detriment of their own laws. And perhaps there may be some reason to blame the rigid severity of the Lacedæmonians, for they gave no one the privilege of citizenship or indeed leave to live among them; whereas we, though we do not think fit to imitate the ways of others, yet willingly admit those that desire to share ours. And I think I may reckon this a proof both of our humanity and magnanimity also.

§ 38. But I shall say no more about the Lacedæmonians. And as to the Athenians, who glory in having made their city common to all men, Apollonius did not know what their behaviour was either, for they punished without mercy those who did but speak one word about the gods contrary to their laws. For on what other account was it that Socrates was put to death? For certainly he neither betrayed their city to its enemies, nor was he guilty of any sacrilege with regard to any of their temples; but it was because he swore by novel oaths, and affirmed either in earnest, or, as some say, only in jest, that a demon<sup>1</sup> used to intimate to him [what he should or should not do,] that he was condemned to die by drinking hemlock; and his accuser<sup>1</sup> also complained that he corrupted the young men, because he induced them to despise the policy and laws of their city. Such was the punishment of Socrates, though a citizen of Athens. And Anaxagoras of Clazomenæ<sup>2</sup> was within a few votes of being condemned to death, because he said the sun, which the Athenians thought a god, was a red-hot mass of fire. They also made public proclamation, that they would give a talent to any one who would kill Diagoras of Melos,<sup>3</sup> because he was said to have laughed at their mysteries. Protagoras also, who was thought to have written something about the gods that was not admitted by the Athenians, would have been arrested and put to death, if he had not fled quickly. Nor need we at all wonder that they thus treated such considerable men, seeing that they did not even spare women. For indeed they slew a certain priestess, because she was accused by somebody of initiating people into the worship of strange gods, for it was forbidden to do so by one of their laws, and capital punishment was decreed to such as introduced a strange god. But it is manifest that those who made such a law did not believe the gods of other nations to be really gods, else they would not have grudged themselves the advantage of more gods than they already had. Such was the happy administration of the affairs of the Athenians! The Scythians also take a pleasure in killing men, and differ little from brute beasts, yet they think it reasonable to have their institutions observed; and they put to death Anacharsis,<sup>4</sup> a person greatly admired for his wisdom by the Greeks, because on his return home to them he appeared full of Greek customs. One may also find many to have been punished among the Persians on the very same account. But it is plain that Apollonius was greatly pleased with the laws of the Persians, and admired them, doubtless because the Greeks enjoyed the advantage of their courage and similar opinions about the gods! This similarity of opinion in religious matters was exhibited in their burning temples; and their courage in coming and almost entirely enslaving the Greeks. And Apollonius imitated all the Persian institutions, forcing other men's wives, and castrating their sons. Now with us it is a capital crime, if any one thus ill-treats even a brute beast: and neither the fear of our conquerors, nor the desire of imitating what other nations hold in esteem, has been able to draw us away from our own laws. Nor have we exercised our courage in undertaking wars to increase our wealth, but only to continue in the observance of our laws: for though we bear other losses with patience, yet when any persons would compel us to violate our laws, we then choose to go to war, even against tremendous odds, and bear the greatest calamities to the last with much fortitude. And why indeed should we desire to imitate the laws of other nations, when we see that they are not even observed by their own legislators? For why should not the Lacedæmonians condemn that polity which suffers them not to associate with others, as also their contempt of matrimony? And why should not the people of Elis<sup>1</sup> and the Thebans abolish that unnatural and unrestrained lust of sodomy so common among them?<sup>2</sup> For they do not admit their objection to what they of old thought to be very excellent and very convenient to do, unless they entirely avoid all such practices in their actions, nay, they corrupt their laws, which had once such a power among the Greeks, that they ascribed these sodomitical practices to the gods themselves,<sup>3</sup> and represented in the same way that the gods married their own sisters,<sup>4</sup> contriving this apology for their own strange and unnatural lusts.<sup>5</sup>

§ 39. I omit now to speak concerning punishments, and how many ways of compounding for them most legislators of old gave evil-doers, as for adulteries fines in money, and for seducing virgins to marry them, as also how many loopholes they supply to deny the facts, if any one attempts to inquire into them. For amongst most nations it is quite a studied art, how men may transgress their laws; but it is not so amongst us. For though we should be deprived of our wealth and cities and any other advantages we have, our law continues immortal: nor can any Jew go so far from his own country, nor be so afraid of a harsh despot, as not to fear the law more than him. If, then, this is the disposition we are in with regard to our laws because of the excellency of them, let our enemies make this concession that our laws are most admirable; but if they still imagine, though we so firmly adhere to them, that they are bad laws notwithstanding, what penalties then do they not deserve to undergo, who do not observe their own laws, which they esteem superior to ours? And since length of time is esteemed to be the truest touchstone in all cases, I would make that a witness of the excellence of our legislator, and of the account delivered to us by him concerning God. For since immense time has intervened, if any one will but compare his period with the period of other legislators, he will find our legislator to have been the most ancient of all.

§ 40. I have already fully shown our laws, and they have always inspired imitation and still more admiration in all other men.<sup>1</sup> For the earliest Greek philosophers, though to all appearance they observed the laws of their own countries, yet in their actions and philosophical notions followed our legislator, instructing men to live sparingly, and to have friendly communications with one another. Moreover, multitudes have had a great inclination now for a long time to follow our religious observances; nor is there any city of the Greeks, nor any barbarian city, nor any nation, where our custom of resting on the seventh day has not reached, and by whom our fasts, and burning of lamps, and many of our prohibitions as to food, are not observed. They also endeavour to imitate our mutual concord with one another, and the charitable distribution of our goods, and our diligence in our trades, and our fortitude in undergoing the distresses we are exposed to on account of our laws. And what is most wonderful, our law has no bait of pleasure to allure men to it, but only gains ground on its own merits; and as God himself pervades all the world, so has our law passed through all the world also. If any one will but reflect on his own country and family, he will not discredit what I say. It is therefore but just either to condemn all mankind of voluntary depravity, for their desire to follow laws foreign to them and evil in themselves, rather than following laws of their own that are of a better character, or else our accusers must leave off their spite against us. For we are not guilty of any grudging behaviour to them in honouring our own legislator, and in believing what he has prophetically taught us about God. For even if we were unable ourselves to understand the excellence of all our laws, yet would the number of those who desire to imitate them induce us to plume ourselves greatly upon them.

§ 41. But I have given an accurate account of our laws and polity in my work on the Antiquities; and have only mentioned them so far now as was necessary to my present purpose, neither proposing to myself to blame the laws of other nations, nor to make an encomium upon our own, but only to confute those who have written unjustly about us, and in shameless antagonism to the truth. And now I think I have sufficiently done what I proposed in writing these two books.<sup>1</sup> For whereas our accusers have said that our nation are a people of very late origin, I have proved that they are exceedingly ancient; for I have produced as witnesses many ancient writers, who have mentioned us in their books, while they affirmed no writer had done so. Moreover, they said that our ancestors were Egyptians, while I have proved that we came from another country into Egypt. They also told lies of us, as if we were expelled thence on account of disease in our bodies, whereas it has appeared on the contrary that we returned to our own country by our own choice, and with sound and strong bodies. They reproached our legislator again as a very paltry fellow: whereas God in old time bore witness to his virtuous conduct, and since Him time itself has been found to have borne witness to the same.

§ 42. As to our laws themselves, more words are unnecessary. For they can be seen for themselves, and evidently do not teach impiety, but the truest piety in the world, not calling men to misanthropy, but encouraging people to share what they have with one another freely; being enemies to injustice, and eager for righteousness, and anxious to banish idleness and expensive living, and teaching men to be content with what they have, and to be laborious in their callings; and forbidding men to make war from a desire of greed, and making men bold in defending the laws; and inexorable in punishing malefactors; and admitting no sophistry of words, but ever establishing themselves by actions, which we ever adduce as surer proofs than what is written only. And so I make bold to say, that we are become the teachers of other men in the greatest number of things, and those the most excellent. For what is more excellent than inviolable piety? what is more just than obedience to the laws? and what is more advantageous than mutual love and concord, and neither to be divided by calamities, nor to become injurious and seditious in prosperity, but to despise death when we are in war, and to apply ourselves in peace to trade and agriculture, while we are persuaded that God surveys and directs every thing everywhere. If these precepts had either been written before by others, or more exactly observed, we should have owed them thanks as their disciples, but if it is plain that we have made more use of them than any other men, and if we have proved that the original invention of them is our own, let the Apions and Molos, and all others who delight in lies and abuse, stand confuted. And let this and the previous book<sup>1</sup> be dedicated to you, Epaphroditus, who are so great a lover of truth, and for your sake to those who like you wish to know about our nation.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> I take this opportunity of stating that I have found the edition of Josephus "Against Apion" of J. G. Müller, Basel, 1877, very useful indeed. Had he but extended his labours to all Josephus! His Notes are most thorough and complete.
