biles, intoxicating beverages, forged checks, convict-made goods, explosives, prostitutes, firearms, lottery tickets, and kidnaped children. Federal laws prohibiting commerce in such subjects are usually designed to assist the states in fighting crime or protecting their citizens against social, moral, or economic harm. (See NATIONAL POLICE POWER.) But Congress has also banned the interstate shipment of ordinary objects of trade, like lumber, in opposition to state policy. Any such federal law must of course bear a reasonable relationship to interstate commerce. Thus, according to UNITED STATES V. DARBY (1941), Congress may validly bar the interstate shipment of goods produced in violation of a federal MAXIMUM HOUR AND MINIMUM WAGE law so that "interstate commerce [does not become] the instrument of competition in the distribution of goods produced under substandard labor conditions."

The commerce clause, however, is not merely an authorization to Congress to enact laws for the protection of the subjects of commerce. It serves also by its own force to prevent the states from erecting trade barriers or passing any legislation that would obstruct the movement of goods from state to state. As a practical matter the states, not Congress, regulate most subjects (and aspects) of commerce. They may do so out of a legitimate concern for the health, welfare, and safety of their own citizens. Yet, the exercise of this valid STATE POLICE POWER is often in tension with the value of free and open borders that informs the commerce clause. (See STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE; STATE TAXATION OF COMMERCE.)

A central development in modern commerce clause jurisprudence is the Supreme Court's identification as legitimate articles of commerce many subjects historically regarded as the exclusive preserve of the states. Such subjects include insurance contracts, natural resources, fish and wild game, and even valueless material such as solid and liquid wastes. Prevailing DOCTRINE holds that the shipment in and out of the states of these subjects of commerce is protected by the commerce clause unless Congress ordains otherwise. Most recently, in Sporkase v. Nebraska (1982), the Supreme Court added ground water to its list of legitimate subjects of commerce. As the Court noted in PHILADELPHIA V. NEW JERSEY (1978), no object of interstate trade is excluded by definition from this list.

Still the tension between state power and the commerce clause remains. In the watershed case of COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS (1851) the Court tried to resolve this tension by declaring that states may not regulate a subject of commerce the nature of which requires a single (national) uniform plan of regulation, even in the absence of any federal law. The Cooley rule has not yielded a long list of particular subjects requiring exclusive national regulation. It has been applied mainly to identify subjects whose number and diversity might require, when regulated, local knowledge and experience. State or local regulation of such subjects, whether justified to facilitate trade or to protect the public, is valid unless it conflicts with a law of Congress. Cooley itself upheld state regulation of harbor traffic, over commerce clause objections, because of the local peculiarities of port facilities.

Today, however, the Court rarely finds the Cooley rule applicable. The modern approach to commerce clause analysis applies a "balancing" test that weighs the interest served by a local regulation of a subject of commerce against the regulation's burden upon interstate commerce. If the burden substantially outweighs the local benefit, even if the legislation is nondiscriminatory, the regulation is unlikely to survive constitutional analysis. (If the Cooley rule forbids state regulation there is of course no balancing.) Generally, an article of commerce, although it may be taxed or regulated by the state, may not be so burdened as to prevent or seriously to obstruct its transportation in interstate commerce.

Yet the states do bar some "subjects of commerce" from entering their borders. Local inspection laws, for example, may exclude goods such as diseased cattle, adulterated food, and infectious plants. Such articles do not fall within the Court's classification of legitimate subjects of commerce. Correspondingly, the states may validly prevent some goods from leaving their borders. Certain natural resources, like rare birds and fish, may be withheld from commercial exploitation altogether. Such resources assume the character of subjects of commerce, however, when they are permitted legally to be sold or are reduced to personal possession. At that point, even though the private acquisition of such resources may be regulated by law in the interest of their preservation, the states are generally forbidden to restrict their use or sale to their own citizens.

DONALD P. KOMMERS
(1986)

Bibliography

BENSON, PAUL R., JR. 1970 The Supreme Court and the Commerce Clause, 1937–1970. Cambridge, Mass.: Dunnellen.

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1936 The Commerce Power Versus States Rights. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

SCHWARTZ, BERNARD 1979 Commerce, the States, and the Burger Court. Northwestern University Law Review 74:409–439.

SUBPOENA

A subpoena is a court order that compels a person to appear for the purpose of giving testimony at a trial or a pretrial proceeding, such as a preliminary examination or pretrial deposition. A court also can issue a subpoena for documents or other items of tangible EVIDENCE. Parties to civil suits, and the prosecution in criminal cases, had a COMMON LAW right to compel testimony before the creation of the Constitution. The Sixth Amendment provides defendants in criminal cases a basis for fairly presenting their defense by giving them the power to subpoena witnesses. The government in some circumstances may have an affirmative duty to help a defendant find a witness, such as a government informer, or to refrain from restricting the defendant's ability to locate a witness essential to the presentation of a defense.

The Sixth Amendment, in part, provides that accused persons have the right of witnesses and the right "to have compulsory process" for obtaining witnesses in their behalf. The confrontation and compulsory process clauses permit the defendant to use the power of the courts to obtain witnesses and they limit governmental interference with the defendant's ability to examine witnesses at trial. These clauses have been incorporated into the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT by the Supreme Court; thus they govern both federal and state prosecutions.

A defendant may compel a person to testify in a court proceeding by applying to the court for a subpoena ordering the person to appear in court or at a pretrial hearing. However, the defendant's ability to use the court's subpoena power is not unlimited. A court can require a defendant to provide it with information that justifies the production of the witness.

When a defendant has a court issue a subpoena to a witness, the witness normally is entitled to a statutory fee to offset his expenses for attendance at the judicial proceeding. An INDIGENT defendant may use the court's subpoena power to compel witnesses to testify in his behalf even though he cannot pay the witness fee. In these circumstances, however, a court may require the indigent defendant to show that the persons whom he subpoenas are likely to give testimony relevant to the charge.

An indigent defendant may try to use the subpoena power to compel an expert (such as a psychiatrist or a ballistics expert) to attend court to testify on the defendant's behalf. Whether the government must pay the cost for providing the defendant with an expert witness is primarily a DUE PROCESS, rather than a subpoena power, issue. However the issue be phrased, courts must determine whether, under the circumstances of the case, a fair trial depends on government provision of the expert witness.

The Sixth Amendment's confrontation clause, together with the compulsory process clause, restricts the government's ability to limit the testimony of potential defense witnesses and the cross-examination of prosecution witnesses. If a person who has received a subpoena to give testimony believes that his testimony would not be relevant to the trial, or that his testimony is subject to an EVIDENTIARY PRIVILEGE, he may move to quash the subpoena. A witness may assert a constitutionally based privilege, such as the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION, or a common law or statutory privilege, such as a doctor-patient privilege. One who has no such privilege may not refuse to respond to the subpoena or refuse to give testimony.

JOHN E. NOWAK
(1986)

Bibliography

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. and ISRAEL, JEROLD H. 1984 Criminal Procedure. Section 23.3. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing.

WRIGHT, CHARLES ALAN and GRAHAM, K. 1980 Federal Practice and Procedure: Evidence. Section 5436. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing.

SUBSIDIES TO BUSINESS

See: State Tax Incentives and Subsidies to Business

SUBSIDIZED SPEECH

Americans customarily view FREEDOM OF SPEECH as a matter of personal right. A FIRST AMENDMENT thus conceived serves both the individual and the community—at least in the context of traditional command and control regulation. In this context, a person may wish to speak but the government commands him not to do so, on pain of punishment if that order is ignored. The person's right to speak, though, countermands the order. With this countermand, the individual gains as his or her will to speak is secured. As for the community, it gains as it receives the speech.

But consider personal rights in a context apart from that of traditional command and control regulation. This other context is that of our large public sector, wherein government-controlled wealth amounts to about one-third of the national economy. In this context, the government, instead of ordering a person not to speak, may "buy him off" by offering him some benefit for not speaking. Should a person accept the payment, and not speak, his "right" to speak will not have been taken, the reason being that personal rights are as a rule alienable. A person may transfer or forgo a personal right as he or she wishes, the object being, as Thomas Hobbes said, "some good to himself." To view a right as other than alienable would, as many have noted, be contrary to the principles of free choice and autonomy that underlie individual rights.

No personal right may be taken, but the community's interest is; as the speaker is bought off, the community is denied the speech. For instance, in RUST V. SULLIVAN (1991), federal funds were provided to family planning and maternal health clinics, but only on the condition that these clinics and their doctors not provide counseling to their clients about ABORTION. To a claim that these conditions violated the free speech rights of the clinics and their private sponsors, the Court responded that the clinics were not forced to forgo abortion counseling; rather, they might refuse the federal aid and speak as they wished. No free speech rights were taken by the government "offering that choice." Still in all, speech for a particular community, that of the clientele of the family clinics, had surely diminished.

The predicament, then, is that subsidized speech breaks the tie between the rights of the speaker and the interests of the community. This disconnect is one of the greater problems of modern First Amendment jurisprudence, for which problem there is, unfortunately, presently no reliable solution. There are, however, various approaches that may be discerned in the case law. One such approach has been a formal observation of the relation of rights, wherein the courts characterize government attempts to buy up speech not as an inducement (which would leave choice and free will intact) but as an order (coercion) that binds the speaker and thus amounts to a taking of personal speech. In SPEISER V. RANDALL (1958), the Supreme Court reviewed a state law under which veterans might claim a tax exemption, but only on the condition that they forswear certain types of political association. The Court overturned that arrangement by characterizing the inducement respecting speech as a coercive taking of speech rather than as a matter of incentive and choice. As explained in the MAJORITY OPINION, "the denial of tax exemption for engaging in certain speech necessarily will have the effect of coercing the claimants to refrain from the proscribed speech." But at other times, as in Grove City College v. Bell (1984), the courts have instead characterized a benefit conditioned on forgoing speech as offering the speaker a choice that in no sense violates the right to speak. This rights-oriented approach to subsidized speech has not yielded consistent results for it has required the courts to engage in psychological speculation as to when inducement shades over into coercion. Indeed, as noted by Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, the decisions seem more the result of "idiosyncratic discretion."

Another, more promising approach, is that of rereading the First Amendment so that it does not establish free speech as solely a matter of personal right. Instead, the amendment impersonally provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech." In light of this text, we may plausibly view the First Amendment as establishing free speech as a common good, as a state of lively and unfettered discourse among the people that advances knowledge, politics, and culture to the benefit of all. The First Amendment simply precludes the government from "abridging" this good, whether by command or by purchase. The Supreme Court has approached this position in a number of cases by assessing whether a government benefit conditioned on speech might diminish speech as a common good. For instance, in ROSENBERGER V. RECTORS AND VISITORS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA (1995), the Court held that an award of public funds could not be conditioned on the recipients' refraining from religiously oriented speech, because that condition "risks the suppression of free speech and inquiry in one of the vital centers for the nation's intellectual life, its college and university campuses." When Congress conditioned subsidies to public broadcasters on the stations' agreement to refrain from editorials, the Court, in Federal Communications Commission v. League of Women Voters (1984), overturned that arrangement on the grounds that "debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open."

A third approach has to do not with speech per se, but with FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. The First Amendment provides that Congress shall not abridge "the freedom of speech, or of the press." This specific reference to the press may plausibly be taken as marking the press as a constitutionally protected business, independent and free of the government by virtue of being a for-profit enterprise. Consistent with this view, several decisions of the Supreme Court (mostly involving the print media) have struck down government subsidies (often in the form of special tax exemptions or other tax breaks); such subsidies would have diminished the independence of the press by making it beholden to the government. In these opinions, there is no talk of speech as a personal right that might appropriately be bought by the government. Instead, the focus is elsewhere, to how a subsidy might amount to a governmental derangement of the free-market basis of a free press.

WILLIAM T. MAYTON
(2000)

Bibliography

KREIMER, SETH F. 1984 Allocational Sanctions: The Problem of Negative Rights in a Positive State. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 132:1293–1397.

MAYTON, WILLIAM T. 1994 "Buying-Up Speech": Active Government and the Terms of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. William & Mary Bill of Rights Journal 3:373–418.

POST, ROBERT C. 1996 Subsidized Speech. Yale Law Journal 106:151–195.

VAN ALSTYNE, WILLIAM W. 1968 The Demise of the Right-Privilege Doctrine in Constitutional Law. Harvard Law Review 81:1439–1464.

SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS

To say that governmental action violates "substantive due process" is to say that the action, while adhering to the forms of law, unjustifiably abridges the Constitution's fundamental constraints upon the content of what government may do to people in the name of "law." As the Supreme Court put the matter most succinctly in HURTADO V. CALIFORNIA (1884), "Law is something more than mere will exerted as an act of power. . . . [It] exclud[es], as not due process of law, acts of attainder, bills of pains and penalties, acts of confiscation . . . and other similar special, partial and arbitrary exertions of power under the forms of legislation. Arbitrary power, enforcing its edicts to the injury of the persons and property of its subjects, is not law, whether manifested as the decree of a personal monarch or of an impersonal multitude."

Substantive due process thus restricts government power, requiring coercive actions of the state to have public as opposed to merely private ends, defining certain means that government may not employ absent the most compelling necessity, and identifying certain aspects of behavior which it may not regulate without a clear showing that no less intrusive means could achieve government's legitimate public aims.

The phrase DUE PROCESS OF LAW derives from King John's promise in MAGNA CARTA to abide "by the law of the land," as translated four centuries later by Sir EDWARD COKE. But the belief that even the sovereign must follow a HIGHER LAW can be traced further back still. Even before the Middle Ages, kings symbolically acknowledged their limitations when they accepted their crowns; royal coronations were religious rites in which the rulers supposedly received power directly from God. The medieval notion of a divine law that even the sovereign might not transgress lay at the heart of English COMMON LAW and of the barons' demands at Runnymede. By the eighteenth century, the idea was phrased in terms of a natural law philosophy of SOCIAL COMPACT between sovereign and citizen. Although individuals were thought to surrender certain freedoms to the state, other rights were considered so much a part of personhood that they lay outside the scope of the social compact. Indeed, protection of such rights had to be the aim of any valid government; a state would abrogate its essential function were it to deny its citizens these fundamental freedoms.

The most famous articulation of that social compact philosophy in American history is the statement in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE that "all men . . . are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights . . . among these are Life, Liberty and the Pursuit of Happiness . . . to secure these Rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just Powers from the Consent of the Governed." Although the Declaration of Independence does not, of course, use the words "due process," the notion that substantive limits may be implied from the character of our society and from our reasons for ceding coercive authority to the state underlies both that document and the system of law and politics structured by our Constitution. The Fifth and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS to the Constitution provide, respectively, that neither the federal government nor the states may deprive persons "of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." The Supreme Court has long recognized that STATE ACTION that follows fair procedures and thus satisfies PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS may nonetheless violate substantive due process by exceeding the limits of the proper sphere of government. In the name of substantive due process, the Supreme Court has accordingly struck down hundreds of statutes governing matters ranging from wages and hours to sexual conduct.

Some commentators have called "substantive due process" a contradiction in terms. But a dismissal on semantic grounds of the very notion of substantive due process is unwarranted. First, the very idea of "process" has often been taken to include concerns as to the nature of the body taking an action, and legislatures have at times been understood as structurally improper sources of particular kinds of public actions. Second, the Constitution guarantees "due process of law," and, as the passage quoted above from Hurtado suggests, the term "law" can itself be taken to imply various normative requirements. Third, even the purest "procedural" norms inevitably embody substantive choices. Finally, the choice of the constitutional phrase on which substantive review has been pinned is to a large degree accidental; the Fourteenth Amendment's "privileges or immunities" clause might have been a happier selection—but the real question is whether and how individual rights not explicitly guaranteed by the Constitution should be protected under that document taken as a whole, not whether courts have picked a felicitous phrase to describe that protective task.

The Constitution, however, does not specify the essential rights of personhood; the BILL OF RIGHTS lists only certain rights that particularly warranted articulation in 1791, and the NINTH AMENDMENT makes clear that the list is not to be taken as exhaustive. It is on a largely open landscape that courts, including the Supreme Court, have had to mark out our fundamental freedoms. The process has necessarily been one of continual redefinition, responding to the changing—one hopes evolving—values and concerns of the Justices and the nation. Due process, as FELIX FRANKFURTER noted, has a "blessed versatility."

Not until the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868 did the Constitution explicitly require state deprivations of liberty or property to comply with "due process of law"; BARRON V. BALTIMORE (1833) had interpreted the parallel Fifth Amendment bar to limit only the federal government. Well before 1868, however, both the Supreme Court and various state courts had begun to articulate inherent, judicially enforceable bounds on governmental interference with individual autonomy. Insofar as these limits were announced and enforced by federal judges, such holdings occurred in cases not involving specific provisions of the United States Constitution but falling within the DIVERSITY JURISDICTION of federal courts because the opposing parties were citizens of different states. The liberties the courts protected were almost exclusively economic: the ability to contract as one wished and to do as one pleased with one's own property.

Thus, as early as 1798, Justice SAMUEL CHASE wrote in CALDER V. BULL that any law that "takes property from A. and gives it to B." is invalid as contrary to "general principles of law and reason," even if it is not "expressly restrained" by the Constitution. Justice Chase reasoned that such a law would usurp judicial authority if intended to correct an injustice A had done to B, and, if intended simply to improve matters, would not be "law" at all but would instead transgress limitations implied by the very notion of representative government: "the nature, and ends of legislative power will limit the exercise of it."

From time to time throughout the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court struck down state statutes it judged to exceed these inherent limits on legislative power. Typically, however, the Court left unclear whether the limits derived from the purpose and character of legislatures, as Justice Chase had argued; or from an ahistorical body of natural law; or from specific, if unnamed, provisions of the Constitution. In FLETCHER V. PECK (1810), for example, the Supreme Court invalidated a Georgia statute that attempted to revoke state land grants. Writing for the Court, Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL explained only that the statute was rendered invalid "either by general principles which are common to our free institutions, or by the particular provisions of the Constitution." Similarly, when the Supreme Court in TERRETT V. TAYLOR (1815) struck down Virginia's attempt to divest the Episcopal Church of its property, it rested its holding on "principles of natural justice" and "fundamental laws of every free government," as well as on the "spirit and letter" of the Constitution.

Within a decade or so after the Civil War, however, the Supreme Court more clearly embraced a theory of implied limitations. When, in LOAN ASSOCIATION V. TOPEKA (1875), the Court invalidated a tax designed to finance a bonus for local industry, it did not mention the Constitution at all; exercising the common law power of a federal court sitting in a diversity case, the Court simply found the tax "purely in aid of private or personal objects" and hence "beyond the legislative power and . . . an unauthorized invasion of private right." Echoing Calder v. Bull, the Loan Association Court declared that there are "rights in every free government beyond the control of the state" and that limitations on sovereign power "grow out of the essential nature of free governments."

Ironically, it was a notion of intrinsic limits on proper government action, including judicial action—a notion similar to that underlying the Court's invalidation of state and local laws in Fletcher v. Peck, Terrett v. Taylor, and Loan Association v. Topeka—that initially constrained substantive review of state legislation under the Fourteenth Amendment. By prohibiting state laws that "abridge the PRIVILEGES OR IMMUNITIES of citizens of the United States," the amendment's framers may have intended to provide federal protection against state encroachment of fundamental rights, but the Supreme Court in the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) construed the clause narrowly to safeguard only rights peculiarly associated with national CITIZENSHIP, such as the right to vote in national elections. In the Court's view, the clause did not protect the essential freedoms traditionally protected by the states themselves in intrastate disputes and protected by federal courts under Article IV, section 2, only from state laws unjustly discriminating against out-of-staters. Upholding the constitutionality of a state-granted monopoly on slaughterhouses around New Orleans, the Slaughterhouse Court held that the right to pursue one's trade was a right of state not national citizenship.

Writing for the Court in Slaughterhouse, Justice SAMUEL F. MILLER—who two years later penned the majority opinion in Loan Association v. Topeka—made clear that the main motivation for the Slaughterhouse decision lay in the Court's fear that a more expansive interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment would allow the federal government to exceed the proper bounds of its authority and to intrude on the regulatory domain of the states. Construing the amendment's privileges or immunities clause or its due process clause to protect all fundamental rights, Miller explained, "would constitute this Court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the states" and, by virtue of the affirmative enforcement power granted Congress in section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, would allow Congress to "pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the states in their most ordinary and useful functions." In contrast, the largely nonconstitutional review carried out in Fletcher, Terrett, and Loan was seen by the Court as guided and constrained by well-developed common law notions of the inherent limits of legitimate state action, gave no affirmative power to Congress, and fell within one of the federal government's clearly proper roles: adjudicating cases in which diversity of citizenship cast doubt on the impartiality of state tribunals.

But the doctrinal distinction between constitutional and common law review of the substantive legitimacy of state legislation was internally unstable: if natural law limitations on government could guide and constrain the Court in diversity-of-citizenship cases, they could do the same in cases brought pursuant to the Fourteenth Amendment. Moreover, the Court could apply common law principles to invalidate any congressional attempt under the guise of the Fourteenth Amendment to prohibit perfectly legitimate state activity.

Partly because of this doctrinal instability, and partly because of strong pressure from the organized bar for a more expansive review of state ECONOMIC REGULATION, the Court moved rapidly in the years following Loan Association and Slaughterhouse toward substantive review of state legislation under the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. Throughout the last quarter of the nineteenth century, the Court often warned in OBITER DICTA that the due process clause prohibited states from transgressing common law limitations on legitimate governmental action. In particular, the Court gave notice that unreasonable state deprivations of property or of the FREEDOM OF CONTRACT would be struck down as unconstitutional. In ALLGEYER V. LOUISIANA (1897) this line of dicta finally ripened into a landmark HOLDING: the Court there invalidated a Louisiana restriction on insurance contracts as substantively incompatible with due process of law. By barring companies not licensed by the state from insuring Louisiana property, the Court held, Louisiana had exceeded its STATE POLICE POWER and had unconstitutionally impaired the freedom of contract.

In the four decades following Allgeyer, the Supreme Court scrutinized socioeconomic legislation more aggressively and persistently than ever before or since, striking down scores of federal and state statutes as violative of substantive due process. The period from 1897 to 1937 has come to be known as "the Lochner era," after its most infamous product, LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905). Lochner invalidated a New York law limiting the work week of bakery employees to sixty hours; the Court found the statute an unreasonable infringement of the freedom of contract. In dissent, Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES protested that "[t]he fourteenth amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer's Social Statics."

Throughout the Lochner era, the Court closely examined both the means and the ends of socioeconomic legislation. The Court required that the relationship between a statute and its legitimate objectives be "real and substantial," and it repeatedly invalidated laws that it deemed to burden individual economic liberty more than strictly necessary to accomplish the goals of such laws. Thus, the majority in Lochner reasoned that regulation of bakery work hours exceeded the proper bounds of the police power in part because the state could protect the health of bakery employees without infringing so fundamentally on contractual freedom. Similarly, ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923) struck down minimum wage laws for women partly because the Court deemed narrower wage regulations sufficient to achieve the legislature's legitimate ends, and Liggett Co. v. Baldridge (1928), which invalidated Pennsylvania restrictions on corporate ownership of pharmacies, noted less objectionable regulatory means the state could employ to protect the same interests in public health.

In addition to demanding a tight fit between ends and means, the Lochner Court required that the statutory ends themselves fit its sense of the proper aims of lawmaking. Informed by earlier doctrines of implied limitations, as well as by the popular notions of social Darwinism and the writings of conservative legal COMMENTATORS ON THE CONSTITUTION such as THOMAS M. COOLEY and CHRISTOPHER G. TIEDEMAN, the Court viewed protection of individual common law rights and advancement of the general health, safety, and moral welfare to be the only valid objectives of government regulation. Laws aimed at redistributing economic and social power—giving A's property to B—by their very nature fell outside the realm of legitimate legislative action. Thus, for example, in Adair v. United States (1908) and COPPAGE V. KANSAS (1915), the Court invalidated prohibitions against YELLOW DOG CONTRACTS that conditioned employment on workers' promises not to join unions. Writing for the majority in Coppage, Justice MAHLON PITNEY rejected the argument that inequality of bargaining power could justify infringing contractual liberty: it is "impossible to uphold freedom of contract and the right of private property without at the same time recognizing as legitimate those inequalities of fortune that are the necessary result of the exercise of those rights."

Although the Court in the Lochner era struck down close to 200 statutes under the due process clauses, it upheld even more. Many of the laws sustained were distinguished from invalidated statutes only by subtle factual differences supporting findings that they served the Court's narrow vision of the general welfare. After repeatedly striking down price controls, for example, the Court in NEBBIA V. NEW YORK (1934) upheld regulation of milk prices, concluding that the regulation was plausibly connected to public health on the theory that price competition encouraged suppliers to cut corners on sanitation. Other statutes, however, were sustained for a more specific reason: the Court exempted from its general liberty-of contract approach statutes designed to protect especially disadvantaged or vulnerable groups. Thus, in HOLDEN V. HARDY (1897), the Court upheld restrictions on the hours worked by coal miners; the Court stressed the ultrahazardous nature of coal mining and the ability of coal companies in company-run towns virtually to dictate the terms of employment. Similarly, the Court in MULLER V. OREGON (1908), moved in part by the supposed physical vulnerability of women and by sexist notions of their maternal mission, permitted Oregon to limit women's hours of work outside the home.

Just as prior doctrinal instabilities had helped to usher in the Lochner era, so these exceptions to the regime of laissez-faire presaged the era's close. By acknowledging that a state could protect at least some groups at the expense of others, Holden and Muller made available in every substantive due process case the argument that the legislature might reasonably have determined that the class protected by the challenged statute was unable to, or should not be forced to, fend for itself. Indeed, Lochner v. New York was itself drastically limited sub silentio in 1917, when the Court in BUNTING V. OREGON (1917) relied on Muller in upholding a state law limiting to ten hours the work day of manufacturing employees.

With the onset of the Depression, moreover, it became progressively more difficult to view the relative wealth of A and B as a matter of purely private concern, outside the domain of proper governmental authority. Increasingly, economic transactions were seen as interrelated, and the general welfare was understood as intimately linked to the welfare of disadvantaged groups. The Supreme Court's persistent invalidation of redistributive legislation was sharply criticized by labor unions, the liberal press, and NEW DEAL politicians, all of whom argued that extensive economic regulation, both state and federal, was necessary to alleviate the Depression. The perceived legitimacy of such regulation was further bolstered by the work of "realist" legal scholars such as MORRIS R. COHEN and Robert Hale, who portrayed distributions of private wealth and power as the results of public choices expressed, for example, in the law of property and contract.

After much outcry, the Supreme Court parted dramatically with Lochner in WEST COAST HOTEL V. PARRISH (1937), which abandoned earlier precedent and upheld a statutory minimum wage for women as reasonable in light of women's vulnerability to economic exploitation and the public interest in minimizing the number of workers requiring government relief. In the years that followed, the Court confirmed its abandonment of Lochner by repeatedly rejecting challenges to expansive New Deal regulation of private economic arrangements, and in 1949 the Court unanimously and explicitly rejected the "Allgeyer Lochner-Adair-Coppage constitutional doctrine."

Never, however, did the Supreme Court explicitly abandon Lochner's substantive theory of what constitutes legitimate legislation; it remains the official dogma to this day that regulatory power may not be exercised solely to transfer property from one private party to another. Instead, the Court relaxed the STANDARD OF REVIEW it applied to socioeconomic regulation: the close scrutiny of the Lochner era was replaced with extreme deference to legislative determinations. Thus, in UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS CO. (1938) the Court promised to uphold socioeconomic legislation if any known or reasonably inferable state of facts supported the legislature's judgment.

In the intervening decades, this extreme deference has become virtually complete judicial abdication. Although substantive scrutiny has occasionally been smuggled in through the privileges or immunities clause of Article IV or the CONTRACT CLAUSE, in due process review the Court has required of economic regulation only "minimum rationality" and has shown itself willing to uphold laws on the basis of purely hypothetical facts or objectives, or on blind trust in legislative rationality. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST carried the Court's approach to its logical extreme in his opinion for the majority in Railroad Retirement Board v. Fritz (1980). Rejecting a due process challenge to legislation that phased out the eligibility of long-retired railroad employees to receive both social security and railroad retirement benefits, but preserved the similar eligibility of more recently retired employees of equally long (or longer) tenure, the majority reasoned that the statute was clearly a rational way to accomplish its precise result: cutting off the dual benefits of the very employees adversely affected by the law. "The plain language" of the statute, Justice Rehnquist wrote, "marks the beginning and end of our inquiry."

The Supreme Court has not been entirely without textual guidance in its post-1937 effort to define the fundamental freedoms protected by the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. Although the Bill of Rights formally applies only to the federal government, the Court has relied heavily on the first eight amendments in determining which rights—both procedural and substantive—are so essential that governmental action abrogating them violates due process of law. Most of the guarantees in the Bill of Rights have now been "selectively incorporated" into the Fourteenth Amendment, although the Court has decisively repudiated the view, espoused by Justice HUGO L. BLACK, that the Fourteenth Amendment applies the Bill of Rights to the states in toto.

At the close of the Lochner era, the Justices laid down a fairly restrictive rule for determining which provisions of the Bill of Rights were "incorporated." Writing for the Court in PALKO V. CONNECTICUT (1937), Justice BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO limited incorporation to those rights "implicit in the concept of ORDERED LIBERTY." Eventually recognizing the irrelevance of an inquiry into whether "a civilized system could be imagined that would not accord the particular protection," the Court in the late 1960s adopted a more contextual approach, asking whether a particular right was essential to the American political order. Thus, in DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA (1968) the Court held that criminal trial safeguards provided by the Bill of Rights are absorbed by the Fourteenth Amendment if they are "fundamental in the context of the criminal processes maintained by the American states." Over time, Duncan has come to stand for the more general proposition that guarantees in the Bill of Rights should be incorporated—and guarantees not expressly mentioned should be added—if they are necessary to protect values basic to our society. (See INCORPORATION DOCTRINE.)

Although substantive due process protection of implied rights to contractual liberty virtually vanished with the close of the Lochner era, judicial solicitude has grown in the ensuing years for a different set of liberties not expressly protected by the Constitution—a diverse group of claims to personal autonomy that have been collectively labeled the RIGHT OF PRIVACY. In contrast to the narrow contractual liberty to which the Lochner Court devoted the bulk of its concern, the right of privacy has come to embrace a wide array of freedoms, including rights of association and reproduction as well as of seclusion and intellectual independence. Some of these freedoms have been derived by extrapolation (or, perhaps, excavation) from the Bill of Rights or other clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. Yet the stirring rhetoric that has typically accompanied the elaboration of these personal freedoms testifies to a judicial perception that they are in some way more fundamental than the textual provisions to which they are pegged.

The Supreme Court made clear the essential nature of these "privacy" or "personhood" rights when it gave them their earliest articulation during the Lochner era itself. Striking down a state law that forbade the teaching of foreign languages before the eighth grade, the Court in MEYER V. NEBRASKA (1923) stressed the importance of allowing teachers to pursue their calling and parents to raise their children as they saw fit. Justice JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS's majority opinion gave broad scope to the liberty protected by the due process clauses: "Without doubt, [it] denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men." Two years later, in PIERCE V. SOCIETY OF SISTERS (1925), the Court marshaled similar rhetoric in invalidating a state requirement that all students attend public schools. Still more sweeping—and perhaps of more lasting influence—was Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS's formulation in his dissent in OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1928): "The makers of our Constitution . . . sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions, and their sensations. They conferred, as against the government, the right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men."

Despite the broad language of these early opinions, Meyer and Pierce evinced special judicial solicitude primarily for family autonomy—freedom from government intrusion into the traditionally intimate realms of marriage, reproduction, and child-rearing. That emphasis, along with recognition of personal autonomy rights as fundamental, was furthered by the watershed case of SKINNER V. OKLAHOMA (1942), the Supreme Court's first important privacy decision following the demise of Lochner. Invalidating a state statute providing for the STERILIZATION of persons convicted two or more times of "felonies involving moral turpitude," the Court termed the right to reproduce "one of the basic civil rights of man." Part of the Court's concern stemmed from fear of the invidious and possibly genocidal ways in which government control over reproduction might be exercised: the Court observed that the "power to sterilize, . . . [i]n evil or reckless hands . . . can cause races or types which are inimical to the dominant group to wither and disappear."

The right to REPRODUCTIVE AUTONOMY recognized in Skinner has since been elaborated and considerably expanded. As recently as 1978, the Court in ZABLOCKI V. REDHAIL "reaffirm[ed] the fundamental character of the right to marry," holding that a state may not forbid marriage of parents unable to meet their child support obligations. More controversial has been the extension of Skinner to BIRTH CONTROL practices. In GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965) the Supreme Court ruled that a married couple's decision to purchase and use contraceptives is a private matter beyond the proper reach of government authority. Perhaps not surprisingly, Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS's majority opinion focused on the intimacy of marital choices, invoking "a right of privacy older than the Bill of Rights" and defending the "sacred precincts of marital bedrooms." The freedom to practice contraception was not freed of its familial trappings until 1972, when Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN wrote for the Court in EISENSTADT V. BAIRD that, if "the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or unmarried, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusions into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child." That Baird singled out as decisive in Griswold the element of reproductive autonomy was made clear by CAREY V. POPULATION SERVICES INTERNATIONAL (1977), which invalidated a state statute allowing contraceptives to be sold only by licensed pharmacists and only to persons over sixteen.

When the Court assessed the constitutionality of ABOR-TION laws in ROE V. WADE (1973), its commitment to reproductive autonomy collided with an equally basic concern for the sanctity of human life. Writing for the majority, Justice HARRY L. BLACKMUN reasoned that the liberty protected by the due process clauses includes a woman's fundamental right to decide, with her physician, whether to end or to continue a pregnancy, but that certain state interests are sufficiently compelling to override that right. During the final trimester of pregnancy, the state's interest in preserving the fetus, by then viable, justifies a ban on abortions; before the third trimester, however, abortions may not be prohibited and may be regulated only as necessary to protect the woman's health; and, before the second trimester, the state may require only that abortions be performed by licensed physicians.

As an element of substantive due process, the right to privacy has received its doctrinally purest exposition in reproductive autonomy cases. Equally important rights to personal autonomy, however, have been found in the "penumbras" of constitutional provisions less abstract than the requirement of "due process of law," most notably the FIRST AMENDMENT. In West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette (1943) the Court construed the First Amendment, along with the Fifth and the Fourteenth, to establish for each individual a sphere of intellectual and spiritual independence. Striking down a compulsory flag salute in public schools, Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON wrote for the Court that, "[i]f there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein." The Court appealed to the same notion when it held, in Wooley v. Maynard (1977), that New Hampshire could not punish a person for obscuring the words "Live Free or Die" on his license plate because he found it religiously or philosophically repugnant to display the state's slogan on his car. The Court reasoned that the state had impermissibly invaded the private "sphere of intellect and spirit" by requiring individuals "to use their private property as a 'mobile billboard' for the State's ideological message."

In NAACP V. ALABAMA (1958) and Talley v. California (1960) the Court found in the First Amendment guarantees of associational and expressive freedom correlative rights to anonymity. And in MOORE V. CITY OF EAST CLEVELAND (1977) the Court protected a special right to familial association by invalidating a single-family zoning ordinance that prevented a woman from living with her son and two grandsons. Renewing its special commitment to traditional visions of family autonomy, the Court distinguished the zoning law upheld in Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas (1974) on the basis that "the ordinance there affected only unrelated individuals," whereas East Cleveland had "chosen to regulate the occupancy of its housing by slicing deeply into the family itself."

Other penumbral rights to personal autonomy have been found in the intersection of several textual provisions, or in the constitutional system taken as a whole. In SHAPIRO V. THOMPSON (1969), for example, the Court alluded to the COMMERCE CLAUSE, the privileges or immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and the similar language in Article IV, section 2, as well as to the Fifth Amendment's due process clause and "the nature of our Federal Union" in finding that "our constitutional concepts of personal liberty" imposed a general requirement that "all citizens be free to travel throughout the length and breadth of our land uninhibited by statutes, rules, or regulations which unreasonably burden or restrict this movement." The newly vitalized RIGHT TO TRAVEL had earlier been recognized in the context of international mobility, at least when other First Amendment rights were also at stake: the Court in APTHEKER V. SECRETARY OF STATE (1964) had struck down a congressional denial of passports to members of the Communist party. In HAIG V. AGEE (1981) the Court sustained revocation of the passport of a former intelligence agent who was engaged in exposing undercover agents stationed abroad. In Haig the Court distinguished sharply between the "right" of inter*state* travel and the "freedom" of inter*national* travel, refusing to extend to congressional regulation of the latter the close scrutiny it had given state regulation of the former.

The Supreme Court attempted to unify some of these disparate doctrinal threads in WHALEN V. ROE (1976), its most comprehensive treatment thus far of the right of privacy. Writing for a unanimous Court, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS upheld a carefully crafted state scheme for maintaining computerized records of prescriptions for certain dangerous drugs, but only after examining the statute's implications for what he described as the two components of the right to privacy: an interest in confidentiality—"avoiding disclosure of personal matters"—and an interest in free choice—"independence in making certain kinds of important decisions."

Despite this seemingly broad formulation, the Court has resisted the creation of a generic right to choose how one lives. In Kelley v. Johnson (1976), for example, the Court upheld police department rules regulating officers' hair styles and prohibiting them from having beards. Writing for the majority, Justice Rehnquist argued that the rules did not violate the right of privacy recognized in Roe, Baird, and Griswold; he distinguished those cases as involving "substantial claims of infringement on the individual's freedom of choice with respect to certain basic matters of procreation, marriage, and family life." Nor is the Court apparently prepared to protect even all intimate decisions central to one's self-definition; the Justices have, for example, passed up several opportunities to review statutes punishing or burdening private homosexual activity between consenting adults. (See FREEDOM OF INTIMATE ASSOCIATION.)

Some lower courts have been more willing to expand the protected sphere of personal autonomy, recognizing broad rights of lifestyle choice as well as, in some cases, freedom to decide how and when one will die. The Supreme Court, however, appears unlikely to follow very quickly. Not only are some Justices concerned about the open-ended and potentially radical nature of such decisions, but the Court has repeatedly dropped unsubtle hints that there are fairly sharp limits to its tolerance. The "blessed versatility" of substantive due process is limited by the Justices' awareness that the Supreme Court is an institution of government.

LAURENCE H. TRIBE
(1986)

Bibliography

BLACK, CHARLES L. 1969 Structure and Relationship in Constitutional Law. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

BREST, PAUL and LEVINSON, SANFORD 1983 Processes of Constitutional Decisionmaking: Cases and Materials. Boston: Little, Brown.

CHOPER, JESSE H. 1980 Judicial Review and the National Political Process: A Functional Reconsideration of the Role of the Supreme Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

ELY, JOHN HART 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

GUNTHER, GERALD 1975 Cases and Materials on Constitutional Law. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

KENNEDY, DUNCAN 1980 Toward an Historical Understanding of Legal Consciousness: The Case of Classical Legal Thought in America 1850–1940. Research in Law & Sociology 3:3–57.

LOCKHART, WILLIAM B.; KAMISAR, YALE; and CHOPER, JESSE H. (1964) 1980 Constitutional Law: Cases—Comments—Questions. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

PENNOCK, ROLAND J. and CHAPMAN, JOHN W., eds. 1977 Due Process. New York: New York University Press.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1978 American Constitutional Law. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

——— 1985 Constitutional Choices. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS
(Update 1)

In the period preceding the NEW DEAL, DUE PROCESS OF LAW meant more than a guaranty of procedural regularity; it also embodied a substantive dimension that curtailed the role of the state in altering the outcomes of private marketplace decisions. This was the era of LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), in which the Supreme Court decreed that government could intervene only to aid parties deemed in special need of paternalistic measures, such as minors and women, or to address externalities (where private bargains impose uncompensated costs on third parties). During a time of considerable social unrest, Lochnerian jurisprudence imposed sharp limits on the domain of ordinary politics while, in many quarters, also placing in question the very legitimacy of JUDICIAL REVIEW.

With the onset of the Great Depression, the growing political demands on government to curb instability in markets, to reduce widespread unemployment, and to bolster consumer demand forced the Court to alter its conception of the role of the state. Thus, in NEBBIA V. NEW YORK (1934) and WEST COAST HOTEL CO. V. PARRISH (1937), the Court rejected Lochner's narrow definition of permissible governmental goals. Legislative efforts to redistribute wealth through social programs or enhance the bargaining positions of weaker parties were now legitimate exercises of power. With the permissible ends of government thus broadened, the Court soon indicated in UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS CO. (1938) that Lochner's rigorous insistence on a close fit of "ends" and "means" in ECONOMIC REGULATION had to yield to a policy of judicial deference to reasonably debatable economic measures. The hands-off approach to economic regulations with a RATIONAL BASIS also extended to decisions narrowly construing the reach of the CONTRACT CLAUSE and the takings clause.

This policy of judicial deference would not necessarily extend beyond the economic sphere, however. Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE, in his famous footnote four to Carolene Products, explained that regulations interfering with fundamental personal liberties and burdening disadvantaged minority groups would be subjected to a more demanding level of scrutiny. This dual standard for review allowed the Court in a number of decisions that culminated in ROE V. WADE (1973) to apply STRICT SCRUTINY to government action interfering with private decisions within a "zone of privacy" that included the intimate realms of marriage, reproduction, and child rearing.

In the years since 1985, without rejecting this dual framework, the Court has confined the privacy interests protected by substantive due process to those that reflect deeply entrenched, widely held traditional values. In Michael H. v. Gerald D. (1989) the state's traditional interest in the "unitary family" prevailed over a natural father's paternity claim where the child was born into an extant marital family. Most prominently, in BOWERS V. HARDWICK (1986) the Court held that Georgia could criminalize the act of homosexual sodomy between consenting adults committed in the privacy of the home. Justice BYRON R. WHITE's opinion for the majority explained that the right to engage in such conduct had no textual support in the constitutional language. Moreover, he said, the claimed right could not be deemed fundamental, given the long-standing proscription of such conduct in state law and the Court's policy of "great resistance to expand[ing] the substantive reach of [the due process clauses of the Fifth Amendment and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT ], particularly if it requires redefining the category of rights deemed to be fundamental."

As critical commentators like Ronald Dworkin have shown, the Court's position in Bowers that prohibition of private sexual conduct may be based solely on the moral preferences of majorities is difficult to reconcile with the principle of cases like Roe v. Wade (1973). Indeed, in WEBSTER V. REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES (1989), the PLURALITY OPINION of Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST openly stated that the Court was prepared "to revisit the holding of Roe" in an appropriate case. In the meantime, he suggested, the Court would sustain state laws barring the use of public facilities for the performance of ABORTIONS and requiring nonmedically indicated tests for the purpose of determining fetal viability. Proponents and opponents of abortion alike have viewed Webster as a remand of the abortion controversy to the political arena.

In De Shaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services (1989), the Court held that states were not constitutionally accountable for failure to intervene effectively to curb family domestic violence. "In the substantive due process analysis," Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote, "it is the State's affirmative act of restraining the individual's freedom to act on his own behalf . . . which is the "deprivation of liberty' triggering the protections of the Due Process Clause, not its failure to act to protect his liberty interests against harms inflicted by other means."

Along with this partial constriction of the "zone of privacy," there have been some stirrings toward greater judicial protection of ECONOMIC LIBERTIES. The Court's COMMERCIAL SPEECH decisions have extended FIRST AMENDMENT protections to individual professionals facing regulatory restrictions arguably put in place by professional associations to protect established interests from new forms of competition. The Court also has indicated a willingness to depart from traditional deferential review of land use regulation. In Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987), the Court used the doctrine of UNCONSTITUTIONAL CONDITIONS to find a regulatory TAKING OF PROPERTY under the Fifth Amendment. At issue was a zoning board's decision to permit construction of a larger house on a beachfront lot on condition that the owners allow the public an easement to pass across their beach. Some writers have argued that the unconstitutional conditions doctrine should be widely deployed to accomplish a resurrection of ECONOMIC DUE PROCESS protections.

As a general matter, the post-New Deal resistance to substantive due process now appears to be on the wane in the academy. Critics from both the Left and the Right have advocated theories of aggressive CONSTITUTIONALISM at variance with the judicial deference to economic regulations typified by Carolene Products. Richard Epstein, among others, has argued that the retreat from Lochner after the Great Depression was an unprincipled abandonment of economic liberties thought fundamental by the Constitution's Framers; in his view, the Court properly may confine government intervention to true instances of market failure, such as externalities. Such writers as Frank Michelman and Cass Sustein reject Lochner's facile reliance on laissez-faire economic principles, but they nevertheless agree that the Court properly may, in the service of reconstructed "republican" values, proscribe the use of governmental power simply to further the self-interest of established economic groups.

These academic commentaries derive support in part from JUDICIAL ACTIVISM on behalf of racial equality and voting rights. Social acceptance of the Supreme Court's active role in the latter areas has diluted the concerns over "government by juiciary" that led Harlan Fiske Stone, FELIX FRANKFURTER, and others to seek to limit judicial interference with political outcomes. It remains to be seen, however, whether these new versions of substantive due process can be implemented free of a crisis of legitimacy similar to the one that marked the Court's handiwork during the Lochner era.

SAMUEL ESTREICHER
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Economic Equal Protection; Economy; Reproductive Autonomy.)

Bibliography

EPSTEIN, RICHARD A. 1985 Takings: Private Property and the Power of Eminent Domain. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

ESTREICHER, SAMUEL 1981 Platonic Guardians of Democracy: John Hart Ely's Role for the Supreme Court in the Constitution's Open Texture. New York University Law Review 56: 547–582.

MICHELMAN, FRANK 1986 The Supreme Court Term—Foreword: Traces of Self-Government. Harvard Law Review 100: 4–77.

POSNER, RICHARD A. 1987 The Constitution as an Economic Document. George Washington Law Review 59:4–38.

SUNSTEIN, CASS 1987 Lochner's Legacy. Columbia Law Review 87:873–919.

SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS
(Update 2)

The Supreme Court has long construed the Constitution's DUE PROCESS clauses to have both procedural and substantive components. PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS guarantees against deprivation of life, liberty, or property without notice and an adequate hearing. Substantive due process, on the other hand, establishes substantive limits on the government's power to interfere with individual liberty. That is, even when no constitutional provision explicitly prohibits a particular governmental action, courts employing the DOCTRINE of substantive due process may invalidate that action as an undue infringement of individual liberty. The text of the Constitution provides little, if any, guidance in fleshing out the contours of substantive due process.

While substantive due process has nineteenth-century antecedents, the Court first regularly applied it early in the twentieth century. During the so-called Lochner era—named for LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905)—the Court invalidated maximum hour laws, minimum wage laws, union protective laws, and other economic LEGISLATION on the ground of undue interference with FREEDOM OF CONTRACT—a right that the Court protected under the rubric of substantive due process. In the 1930s, however, the Court repudiated these decisions and seemed to indicate the demise of substantive due process.

Over the next thirty years, the Court, reflecting widespread revulsion against what were perceived to have been Lochner-era abuses of JUDICIAL POWER, generally refrained from invoking substantive due process. Occasionally during this period, Justices would invoke the lessons of the Lochner era as justification for refusing to strike down a particular law on substantive due process grounds, but then proceed to invalidate it under a different constitutional provision. For example, in SKINNER V. OKLAHOMA (1942) the Court invalidated an Oklahoma statute authorizing sterilization of three-time recidivist criminals on the ground that the guarantee of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS afforded a fundamental right to procreation. Later, the Court also found shelter under the equal protection clause for the RIGHT TO TRAVEL, the right not to be excluded because of indigency from appealing a criminal conviction, and VOTING RIGHTS. Some commentators have questioned the practical significance of deriving rights not explicitly enumerated in the Constitution from one clause rather than another. Nevertheless, much of the WARREN COURT activism of the 1960s assiduously avoided the due process clause, while significantly expanding protections under other open-ended constitutional provisions.

Most observers identify GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965) as the font of modern substantive due process doctrine. Employing the same due process clause that during the Lochner period had been invoked to protect various ECONOMIC LIBERTIES, the Court now began invalidating laws interfering with various aspects of personal privacy and autonomy, most notably sexual freedom. In Griswold the Court struck down a criminal ban on the use of contraceptives, as applied to married couples. In ROE V. WADE (1973) the Court invalidated legislation restricting access to ABORTION. In MOORE V. CITY OF EAST CLEVELAND (1977) the Court nullified a local ordinance constraining the ability of blood relatives to live in the same household. The Court drew the line, however, in BOWERS V. HARDWICK (1986), narrowly rejecting the claimed right of adults to engage in private, consensual sexual activity with members of the same sex.

Modern substantive due process has been intensely controversial, both within the Court and among commentators. Critics of the doctrine accuse the Court of simply duplicating the abuses of the Lochner era, inventing rights without firm foundation in the Constitution. Such a practice is said to be antidemocratic, because it involves unelected, lifetime-tenured judges invalidating laws enacted by popularly elected legislatures on the basis of subjective value judgments not tethered to the constitutional text. Defenders of modern substantive due process respond in various ways. Some argue that the correct lesson to draw from the Lochner experience is not that the Court should refrain from identifying unenumerated constitutional rights, but simply that economic rights do not warrant such protection. These rights are said to be less important, or at least less appropriate for judicial protection, than the personal autonomy rights articulated under modern substantive due process. Other defenders contend that the judicial identification of unenumerated rights is plainly authorized by open-ended constitutional provisions such as the NINTH AMENDMENT or the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. It is said that the meaning of such provisions is difficult to discern if they were not intended to authorize judicial formulation of unenumerated rights. Finally, some proponents of modern substantive due process concede the antidemocratic implications of unenumerated rights adjudication but embrace those implications as a virtue rather than repudiate them as a vice. For these commentators, the legitimacy of the political regime depends on its affording protection to fundamental human liberties, whether or not they are inscribed in the constitutional text or endorsed by the more majoritarian political branches.

The Court's RIGHT-TO-DIE decisions of the 1990s illustrate both the Justices' unwillingness to repudiate substantive due process and their discomfort with the doctrine's antidemocratic implications. The Court's decisions in Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health (1990) and Washington v. Glucksberg (1997) share a common form. In both cases, a majority of the Court rejected the particular right-to-die claim at issue, while a different majority of five Justices stated or strongly implied that substantive due process guarantees some measure of individual control over the circumstances of one's death. In Cruzan the Court ruled that the Constitution permitted the state of Missouri to maintain a vegetative patient on extraordinary life support, contrary to the wishes of her parents and a court-appointed guardian, in the absence of clear and convincing evidence of her own preferences expressed when competent. Yet five Justices plainly stated that the Constitution requires compliance with the terms of a "living will" executed by a competent adult. Similarly, in Glucksberg, while the Court unanimously rejected the argument that terminally ill patients possess a constitutional right to commit suicide with physician assistance, a majority of five Justices intimated that the Constitution would not permit a state to forbid physicians from prescribing drugs for terminally ill patients suffering great pain, even if those drugs were likely to induce death.

Glucksberg sheds light on the status of substantive due process in the late 1990s. The open-ended discretion to right perceived wrongs afforded by such a doctrine is too attractive for the Justices entirely to repudiate it. At the same time, however, the lesson that the Court seems to have derived from a quarter-century's worth of criticism in the face of Roe v. Wade is that it must be more cautious in applying the doctrine. Roe effectively nullified the abortion statutes of forty-six states. In Glucksberg, the Court was unwilling to invalidate the laws of the forty-nine states that, as of 1997, continued to criminalize physician-assisted suicide. How substantive due process doctrine evolves in the future with regard to the right to die will depend, as CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION generally does, on changes in social mores.

MICHAEL J. KLARMAN
(2000)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1911 The Doctrine of Due Process Before the Civil War. Harvard Law Review 24:366–385; 460–479.

ELY, JOHN HART 1973 The Wages of Crying Wolf: A Comment on Roe v. Wade. Yale Law Journal 82:920–949.

GILLMAN, HOWARD 1993 The Constitution Besieged: The Rise and Demise of Lochner Era Police Powers Jurisprudence. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press.

GREY, THOMAS 1978 Origins of the Unwritten Constitution. Stanford Law Review 30:843–893.

PERRY, MICHAEL 1976 Abortion, the Public Morals and the Police Power: The Ethical Function of Substantive Due Process. UCLA Law Review 23:689–736.

SHERRY, SUZANNA 1987 The Founders' Unwritten Constitution. University of Chicago Law Review 54:1127–1177.

SUNSTEIN, CASS R. 1997 The Right to Die. Yale Law Journal 106:1123–1163.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD

The INTERNAL SECURITY ACT of 1950 created the Subversive Activities Control Board (SACB). This agency was to determine, on request of the ATTORNEY GENERAL, whether a particular organization was a communist-action, communist-front, or communist-infiltrated organization. After SACB had issued an order so designating an organization and after the order had been sustained by the courts, various disabilities and sanctions could be imposed on the group and its members. These included being barred from federal jobs, being denied employment in defense-related industries, and being prohibited from using United States passports.

Eleven years after SACB's creation, the Supreme Court sustained its findings that the Communist party was a communist-action organization as defined by the act and upheld an order requiring the party to register. (See COMMUNIST PARTY V. SACB, 1961.) The Court subsequently declared unconstitutional attempts to implement the sanctions of the act, and in 1965 (ALBERTSON V. SACB) it ruled that the forced registration of individual members of the party would violate the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. By the late 1960s, SACB was moribund. Congress, attempting salvage, gave it authority to register with the attorney general the names of persons it had determined were members of communist organizations, and SACB eventually declared seven persons to be in this category. Such limited action, as well as a 1967 decision holding unconstitutional provisions barring members of registered organizations from jobs in defense-related industries, further limited SACB's utility. In 1974, the RICHARD M. NIXON administration, bowing to SACB's critics, requested no further funding, effectively ending its life.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

MURPHY, PAUL L. 1972 The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1918–1969. New York: Harper & Row.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITY

Activity is "subversive" if it is directed toward the overthrow of the existing form of government by force or other unlawful means. Subversive activity comprises SEDITION, insurrection, and sabotage, as well as other unlawful acts committed with the requisite intent. Although individuals may engage in subversive activity, concerted or organized subversion is more common and excites more public concern. Active, purposive membership in subversive organizations—such as the Communist party, the American Nazi party, or the Ku Klux Klan—is a federal crime, and between 1950 and 1974 the ATTORNEY GENERAL'S LIST was maintained as an official catalog of such groups.

In twentieth-century America, the suppression of subversion has been controversial where the "activity" has seemed to consist primarily of SUBVERSIVE ADVOCACY. But the controversy should not obscure the fact that there is such a thing as subversive activity and that the survival of constitutional government requires that such activity be controlled.

The critical distinction is not between words and deeds, speech and action. Even the staunchest defenders of CIVIL LIBERTIES agree that INCITEMENT TO UNLAWFUL CONDUCT may be punished by law, at least when the speaker has the intention and capability of inducing his hearers to engage in insurrection, riot, or disobedience of law. Some forms of subversive activity—for example, the attack on the House of Representatives by Puerto Rican nationalists in 1954—are extreme forms of SYMBOLIC SPEECH, known in revolutionary jargon as "propaganda of the deed." The political goal toward which it is aimed is precisely what distinguishes subversive activity.

Because the government of the United States is one of limited and ENUMERATED POWERS, its authority to define and punish subversive activities as crimes is not entirely clear. Treason is defined in Article III, section 2, of the Constitution, and as the same section limits the range of punishment for treason, it implies the power of Congress to prescribe punishment within the permitted range. The Constitution does not define any lesser degree of subversive activity, nor does it expressly grant to Congress the power to define and punish such crimes. Instead, the power must be an IMPLIED POWER incidental to the power to punish treason or else NECESSARY AND PROPER for the carrying out of one or more of the enumerated powers.

In the absence of statutes against insurrection or rebellion, the perpetrators of FRIES' REBELLION and the WHISKEY REBELLION were tried for treason. The prosecutors argued that an armed rising to prevent the execution of federal law—the normal definition of insurrection—was at least a constructive treason as the COMMON LAW had understood the term. Similarly, when AARON BURR assembled an armed force in the Western territories, for purposes that are still not entirely clear, the only federal offense for which he could be tried was treason. But a charge of treason seems manifestly to have been inappropriate in each of these cases.

On the other hand, the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS, enacted when the country was on the brink of war with France, generously defined offenses against the United States. Although section 2, defining SEDITIOUS LIBEL, is more famous, section 1 of the Sedition Act proscribed certain subversive activities: combination or conspiracy to impede the operation of law or to intimidate government officials, procuring or counseling riot or insurrection—whether or not the activity was successful. The ESPIONAGE ACT OF 1917, enacted while the country was fighting World War I, treated as criminal any attempt to procure draft evasion or to interfere with military recruitment while the Sedition Act of 1918 proscribed all advocacy of revolution, however remote the prospect of success.

In the latter half of the twentieth century, the phenomenon of political terrorism raised new problems. Frequently directed from outside the United States, terrorist activity, like the extreme forms of subversive activity, employs politically motivated violence. Although the aim of terrorism may not be the overthrow of the American government, terrorism shares with the more extreme forms of subversive activity the substitution of violence for public deliberation and constitutional government.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

GRODZINS, MORTON 1956 The Loyal and the Disloyal: Social Boundaries of Patriotism and Treason. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

HURST, JAMES WILLARD 1971 The Law of Treason in the United States. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

SUBVERSIVE ADVOCACY

The quest for NATIONAL SECURITY has placed strains on the FIRST AMENDMENT when the country has been at war, or threatened by war, or torn by fear of an external enemy or domestic social unrest. Federal and state governments have sought to silence those regarded as "subversives" and internal enemies because they supported a foreign cause or advocated revolutionary change in American institutions.

The ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS, passed only seven years after ratification of the First Amendment, were the most extreme of these measures in our history. President JOHN ADAMS and the Federalist Congress used them to stifle the opposition Republicans who were accused of being "servile minions" of France, with which war seemed imminent in early 1798. Seventeen prosecutions were instituted against Republican newspaper editors, officeholders, and adherents, with only one acquittal.

The constitutionality of the Sedition Act was never tested in the Supreme Court, which then had no JURISDICTION to review federal criminal convictions. But the act was sustained by the lower federal courts, including three Supreme Court Justices sitting as trial judges. The modern Supreme Court, in NEW YORK TIMES CO. V. SULLIVAN (1964), has stated that the First Amendment bars prosecution for SEDITIOUS LIBEL. Opposition to the government in power, accompanied by criticism of official policy and conduct, cannot constitutionally be proscribed as "seditious" or "subversive."

During the nineteenth century there was no federal legislation limiting FREEDOM OF SPEECH or FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. No official efforts were made to silence the Federalist denunciation of the War of 1812. Abolitionist sentiment did not fare so well in the succeeding decades of bitter controversy over slavery. Southern states passed laws limiting the freedom to criticize slavery. During the CIVIL WAR no sedition act was passed to suppress the widespread opposition to the war in the North. But President ABRAHAM LINCOLN suspended the writ of HABEAS CORPUS, controlled the mails, telegraph, and passports, and approved military detention of thousands of persons accused of disloyalty.

The rapid industrialization and urbanization of the country after the Civil War was accompanied by social unrest. The Haymarket Square bombing in Chicago in 1886, the violent Homestead and Pullman strikes in the 1890s, the assassination of President WILLIAM MCKINLEY in 1901 by a presumed "anarchist," and the militant tactics of the Industrial Workers of the World led to the passage of the first state Criminal Anarchy Law in New York in 1902. By 1921, thirty-three states had enacted similar laws making it a crime to advocate the overthrow of existing government by force or violence. Unlike the Sedition Act of 1798, these laws forbade only the advocacy of illegal means to effect political change.

Together with the federal ESPIONAGE ACT of 1917, these state laws were used to suppress opposition to WORLD WAR I voiced by pacifists, sympathizers with Germany, and international socialists. The 1917 act made it criminal to obstruct recruiting, cause insubordination in the armed forces, or interfere with military operations. Amendments to the Espionage Act (the SEDITION ACT of 1918) made it an offense, among other things, to say or do anything that would favor any country at war with the United States, oppose the cause of the United States in the war, or incite contempt for the American form of government or the uniform of the Army or Navy. Under the Espionage Act 877 people were convicted, almost all for expressing opinions about the merits and conduct of the war. The Supreme Court sustained these convictions, rejecting the contention that they violated the First Amendment.

SCHENCK V. UNITED STATES (1919) was the first of the Espionage Act cases to reach the Supreme Court. Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES wrote the Court opinion affirming the conviction and, for the first time, enunciated the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER test to determine when advocacy of unlawful conduct is protected by the First Amendment. Holmes also wrote the opinions of the Court in FROHWERK V. UNITED STATES (1919) and DEBS V. UNITED STATES (1919), sustaining the convictions of a newspaper editor for questioning the constitutionality of the draft and charging that Wall Street had dragged the country into the war, and of Eugene V. Debs, the railroad union and Socialist party leader, for denouncing the war as a capitalist plot. Just what the "clear and present danger" was in these cases was doubtful, and Holmes and Brandeis soon began to dissent from the way the majority used the test.

Their first great dissent came in ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919). In his dissenting opinion, which Brandeis joined, Holmes gave new content to the clear and present danger test by emphasizing the immediacy of the danger that must exist. Although Holmes would have softened this requirement, permitting punishment of speech with the specific intent to bring about the danger even if the danger itself was not "immediate," he did not think the necessary intent had been shown in Abrams.

The Red Scare of 1919 and 1920 was induced not only by fear of the Bolshevik revolution and the Communist International but also by the economic and social insecurity that accompanied demobilization after World War I. The PALMER RAIDS expressed the federal government's fears and antiradical sentiments. The states resorted to their criminal anarchy laws and the Supreme Court sustained convictions under these laws in GITLOW V. NEW YORK (1925) and WHITNEY V. CALIFORNIA (1927).

In Gitlow the Court assumed that freedom of speech and press, protected by the First Amendment from abridgment by Congress, was a "liberty" protected by the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT against state impairment. In both Gitlow and Whitney the Court refused to apply the clear and present danger test because the state legislatures had prohibited a particular class of speech—the advocacy of the doctrine that the government should be overthrown by violence. Gitlow's advocacy of violent revolution violated the law even if there were no clear and present danger of revolution. The legislature might reasonably seek "to extinguish the spark without waiting until it has enkindled the flame or blazed into the conflagration."

Dissenting in Gitlow, Holmes argued for application of the clear and present danger test, but did not confront the majority's position. But Brandeis, concurring in Whitney, insisted that courts and juries must be free to decide whether, under the circumstances of each case, "the evil apprehended is [relatively serious and its incidence] so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for full discussion. . . . Only an emergency can justify repression."

From the end of the Red Scare to the outbreak of WORLD WAR II, federal action against alleged subversives was limited to deportation of alien communists. State prosecutions under criminal anarchy laws were infrequent after the middle 1920s. The Sedition Act of 1918 was repealed in 1921 and has never been revived.

The Smith Act of 1940 was modeled on the New York Criminal Anarchy law. During World War II, twenty-eight pro-Nazi individuals were prosecuted under it for conspiring to cause insubordination in the armed forces, but the judge died and the prosecution was dropped. Eighteen members of the Trotskyist Socialist Workers party, which opposed the war, were convicted of conspiracy to cause insubordination in the armed forces and to advocate violent overthrow of the government.

On the whole, the country supported World War II. After the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union, in June 1941, communists became the staunchest supporters of the war. But as soon as the war was won, the activities of the international communist movement resumed. In 1949 eleven leaders of the Communist party were convicted under the Smith Act for conspiring to advocate violent overthrow of the United States government and establishment of a dictatorship of the proletariat, and to organize the Communist party to advocate these goals. The Supreme Court affirmed the convictions, 6–2, in DENNIS V. UNITED STATES (1951).

In 1948 the Soviet Union had blockaded Berlin and engineered the communist coup that overthrew the parliamentary regime in Czechoslovakia. By the time the Supreme Court decided Dennis, several Soviet spy rings in the West had been exposed, the communists had taken control in China, and Americans were dying in the KOREAN WAR. The domestic and foreign policies of the American Communist party were consistent with Soviet policies and directives. In light of these events, a plurality of four Justices, speaking through Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON, reformulated the clear and present danger test into a BALANCING TEST that weighed the seriousness of the danger, discounted by its improbability, against the degree of invasion of freedom of speech.

Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER concurred, deferring to Congress's judgment regarding the extent of the danger posed by the Communist party and the world communist movement. With the experience of the Nuremberg war crimes trials still fresh in his memory, Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON also concurred, joining Frankfurter in rejecting the appropriateness of the clear and present danger test to the communist conspiracy.

Though not purporting to overrule Dennis, the Supreme Court, in YATES V. UNITED STATES (1957), reversed convictions of the officers of the Communist party in California. Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN's plurality opinion read the Smith Act as requiring proof that the defendants had advocated "unlawful action" and not merely "abstract doctrine" that the United States government should be overthrown. Yates did not represent a return to the Holmes-Brandeis version of the clear and present danger test. It emphasized the content of the advocacy, not its consequences. On this view, advocacy of unlawful action was punishable, irrespective of the immediacy of the danger.

After Yates was decided, the government concluded that it could not satisfy the requirements of proof demanded by the Supreme Court and abandoned all prosecutions under the Smith Act. Altogether twenty-nine communists were convicted under that act, including the leaders involved in Dennis and the only person convicted under the provision proscribing membership in the Communist party. His conviction was upheld in SCALES V. UNITED STATES (1961) because he was an "active member" who knew of the Party's unlawful goals and had a "specific intent" to achieve them.

In 1950, shortly after the outbreak of the Korean War, Congress enacted the SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL ACT, which required communist organizations to register with the ATTORNEY GENERAL. When the Communist party failed to register, the attorney general asked the Subversive Activities Control Board to order it to register and list its members. In COMMUNIST PARTY V. SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD (1961) the Court upheld the board's finding that the party was a communist-action organization and its order requiring the party to register. Only Justice HUGO L. BLACK dissented from the majority view that the First Amendment did not prohibit Congress from removing the party's "mask of anonymity."

The Supreme Court in 1961 did not pass upon the contention that compulsory registration would violate the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION afforded by the Fifth Amendment because it would subject party members to prosecution under the Smith Act and the 1954 COMMUNIST CONTROL ACT. This contention was eventually sustained in ALBERTSON V. SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD (1965). As a result, neither the Communist party nor any of its members ever registered under the act, and no organization ever registered as a communist front. In 1968, Congress removed the registration obligation. Instead, the Subversive Activities Control Board was authorized to keep records, open to public inspection, of the names and addresses of communist organizations and their members. But in 1969 and 1970 the courts held that mere membership in the party was protected by the First Amendment, and the board was disbanded in 1973.

The Communist Control Act of 1954 purported to deprive the Communist party of the "rights, privileges, and immunities attendant upon legal bodies." It was not clear whether Congress intended this provision to dissolve the party as a legal organization or only to bar it from the ballot and benefits such as mailing privileges. Though the Supreme Court has not passed upon its constitutionality, the act has become a dead letter.

Although the Espionage Act and the Smith Act remained in force during the VIETNAM WAR, no prosecutions were brought under either measure. In Bond v. Floyd (1966) the Supreme Court assumed that opposition to the war and the draft was protected by the First Amendment.

In 1967 a Ku Klux Klan leader was convicted of violating the Ohio CRIMINAL SYNDICALISM LAW by making a speech at a Klan rally to which only television newsmen had been invited. The speech was derogatory of blacks and Jews and proclaimed that if the white race continued to be threatened, "it's possible that there might have to be some revengence [sic] taken." In a PER CURIAM opinion in BRANDENBURG V. OHIO (1969) the Supreme Court reversed the conviction and held the Ohio statute unconstitutional. In so doing, it overruled Whitney v. California and again reformulated the clear and present danger doctrine: "constitutional guarantees of free speech and free press do not permit a State to forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing such action." Although the Court purported to follow Dennis, commentators generally conclude that Brandenburg overruled Dennis. In Communist Party of Indiana v. Whitcomb (1974) the Supreme Court held that it was unconstitutional for Indiana to refuse a place on the ballot to the Communist party of Indiana because its officers had refused to submit an oath that the party "does not advocate the overthrow of local, state or national government by force or violence."

The Brandenburg formula, the most speech-protective standard yet evolved by the Supreme Court, has been criticized from opposing sides. Concurring in Brandenburg, Justices WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS and Black would have abandoned the clear and present danger test in favor of a distinction between ideas and overt acts. Some critics reject even this concession on the ground that an incitement-of-overt-acts test can be manipulated by the courts to cut off speech just when it comes close to being effective.

Others argue that advocacy of the forcible overthrow of the government, or of any unlawful act, is not protected by the First Amendment. Such advocacy is not political speech because it is a call to revoke the results that political speech has produced; violent overthrow destroys the premises of our system. An organization that seeks power through illegal means refuses to abide by the legitimate conditions of party competition in a democracy.

Furthermore, in suppressing totalitarian movements, even if they purport to reject illegal means, a democratic society is not acting to protect the status quo but the very same interest which freedom of speech itself seeks to secure—the possibility of peaceful progress under freedom. In this view, the Brandenburg formula would deny our democracy the constitutional right to act until it might be too late to prevent a totalitarian victory.

Although one may disagree with the view that the problem of a totalitarian party's competing for political power in a democracy is solely one of "freedom of expression," the reasons for toleration—to keep even the freedom of expression open to challenge lest it become a "dead dogma," and to allow extremist groups to advocate revolution because they may represent real grievances that deserve to be heard—must be seriously considered by legislators in determining whether suppression is a wise policy. But if wisdom may sometimes dictate toleration, that conclusion does not imply that the Constitution gives the enemies of freedom the right to organize to crush it.

CARL A. AUERBACH
(1986)

Bibliography

GUNTHER, GERALD 1975 Learned Hand and the Origins of Modern First Amendment Doctrine: Some Fragments of History. Stanford Law Review 27:719–773.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1985 Emergence of a Free Press. New York: Oxford University Press.

LINDE, HANS A. 1970 "Clear and Present Danger" Reexamined: Dissonants in the Brandenburg Concerto. Stanford Law Review 22:1163–1186.

NATHANSON, NATANIEL L. 1950 The Communist Trial and the Clear-and-Present-Danger Test. Harvard Law Review 63: 1167–1175.

SUFFRAGE

See: Alien Suffrage; Woman Suffrage; Woman Suffrage Movement

SUGARMAN v. DOUGALL
413 U.S. 634 (1973)

GRIFFITHS, IN RE
413 U.S. 717 (1973)

In Sugarman, the Supreme Court held, 8–1, that New York's law making ALIENS ineligible for civil service employment was unconstitutional. In Griffiths, the Court held, 7–2, that Connecticut could not constitutionally bar resident aliens from the practice of law. Both decisions rested on EQUAL PROTECTION grounds. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, writing for the Court in Griffiths, concluded that the state had not shown that excluding aliens from law practice was necessary to serve an interest sufficiently substantial to justify the rule. In Sugarman, Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN wrote for the Court, repeating what he had said in GRAHAM V. RICHARDSON (1971), that discrimination against aliens must survive STRICT SCRUTINY by the courts. Here the bar to aliens was not necessary to achieve any substantial interest. Justice Blackmun added that some discrimination against aliens would be justified in the name of "political community": the right to vote or to hold high public office, for example, might be limited to citizens. These OBITER DICTA assumed importance in the later cases of FOLEY V. CONNELIE (1978) and AMBACH V. NORWICK (1979).

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

SUGAR TRUST CASE

See: Knight Company, E. C., United States v.

SULLIVAN, UNITED STATES v.
332 U.S. 689 (1948)

In no other case has the Supreme Court more sweepingly construed the COMMERCE CLAUSE. To protect consumers the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938, passed under the NATIONAL POLICE POWER, prohibited the misbranding of drugs "held for sale after interstate shipment." Nine months after a bottle of sulfathiazole tablets had been shipped from Chicago to Atlanta, a retail druggist in Columbus, Georgia, who had purchased the bottle, properly labeled with a warning that the drug could be toxic, sold twelve tablets in a box without the mandatory warning. The local druggist thereby committed a federal crime. A federal court of appeals reversed his conviction on the ground that the words "held for sale after interstate shipment" extended only to the first intrastate sale and could not apply to all subsequent local sales after any lapse of time.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice HUGO L. BLACK for a bare majority, reversed and sustained the constitutionality of the statute. Black declared that it prohibited misbranding no matter when the drug was sold and without regard to how many local sales intervened; the statute remained in force "to the moment of . . . delivery to the ultimate consumer" in an intrastate transaction. Sullivan, the druggist, had contended that the statute so construed exceeded the commerce power and invaded powers reserved to the states under the TENTH AMENDMENT. Black replied merely that a 1913 precedent, McDermott v. Wisconsin, which had sustained the misbranding provision of the PURE FOOD AND DRUG ACT of 1906, controlled the case. He thought that the "variants" between the two cases were "not sufficient" to distinguish McDermott, although he conceded that the retailer in McDermott had been the direct consignee of an interstate shipment. That fact should have made the precedent inapplicable. Black did not take notice that in McDermott the Court had reversed the state conviction of a grocer who misbranded under state law but complied with federal law. Black did not consider that under the ORIGINAL PACKAGE DOCTRINE the druggist sold local merchandise. Justice WILEY RUTLEGE concurred without reaching the constitutional issue and like the three dissenters wrote only on the construction of the statute.

After Sullivan the commerce power seemed to have no statable limits, though the rationale of the decision is unclear. The transaction involved in Sullivan was neither INTRASTATE COMMERCE that affected INTERSTATE COMMERCE, nor the PRODUCTION of goods for interstate commerce. The reach of the national police power, which began with CHAMPION V. AMES (1903), seems to have no end.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

SUMNER, CHARLES
(1811–1874)

In 1833 Charles Sumner, a protege of JOSEPH STORY, graduated from Harvard Law School. Until 1851 he practiced law, taught at Harvard Law School, annotated Vesey's Chancery Reports, and became a well-known lecturer advocating, among other reforms, world peace and abolition of SLAVERY. In 1848 Sumner was an unsuccessful Free Soil candidate for Congress, campaigning against the "lords of the lash and the lords of the loom." In ROBERTS V. BOSTON (1849) Sumner unsuccessfully challenged government compulsion of SEGREGATION in Boston schools, arguing that racially separate schools denied equality. In upholding segregation, Massachusetts Chief Justice LEMUEL SHAW enunciated, for the first time, the doctrine of SEPARATE BUT EQUAL.

In 1851 Sumner won the SENATE seat once held by DANIEL WEBSTER. In his first speech, "Freedom National, Slavery Sectional," Sumner attacked the fugitive slave law and congressional support of slavery for nearly four hours. In an 1856 speech, "The Crime Against Kansas," Sumner vilified senators who had supported the KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT. He described STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS as "the squire of slavery, its very Sancho Panza, ready to do all its humiliating offices." South Carolina's Andrew Butler was, in Sumner's view, the Don Quixote of slavery who had "chosen a mistress to whom he has made his vows, and who, though ugly to others . . . is chaste in his sight; I mean the harlot slavery." Two days later Congressman Preston Brooks, a relative of Butler, repaid Sumner for these remarks by beating him insensible with a cane. Many Northerners viewed this incident as a symbol of a violent slavocracy which threatened the Constitution and the nation. After a three-and-a-half-year convalescence Sumner returned to the Senate in 1860, renewing his crusade against bondage with a four-hour oration, "The Barbarism of Slavery." This speech became a Republican campaign document in 1860.

From the beginning of the CIVIL WAR Sumner urged the abolition of slavery. He argued that secession was STATE SUICIDE, that the Confederate States had reverted to territorial status, and that, despite the decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD, Congress had the power to end slavery in these TERRITORIES. On a less theoretical level Sumner successfully sponsored legislation to repeal the fugitive slave laws and to allow black witnesses to testify in federal courts. Sumner was unsuccessful, however, in his attempts to gain congressional support for the integration of Washington's street railroads and other facilities. As chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sumner was constantly at odds with Secretary of State WILLIAM SEWARD, and often served as President ABRAHAM LINCOLN's unofficial adviser on foreign policy. Sumner exploited that position to gain diplomatic recognition for Haiti and Liberia and to secure a passport for a black constituent. As chairman of the Select Committee on Slavery and Freedmen, Sumner laid the groundwork for the FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

During Reconstruction, Sumner was the Senate's most vociferous advocate of black rights and an early opponent of ANDREW JOHNSON. Sumner's increasingly moralistic and uncompromising posture undermined his legislative effectiveness during Reconstruction. Sumner initially opposed the THIRTEENTH and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS because they failed to give blacks enough rights. He gave little support to the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT because he believed the Constitution embodied the highest moral principles and thus enabled Congress under existing constitutional powers to enfranchise blacks. After 1870 Sumner devoted himself to a comprehensive CIVIL RIGHTS bill, which would give the freedmen complete equality. Its passage, in a somewhat truncated form, as the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875 was a posthumous tribute to Sumner's integrity and his passionate devotion to racial equality.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

DONALD, DAVID HERBERT 1960 Charles Sumner and the Coming of the Civil War. New York: Knopf.

——— 1970 Charles Sumner and the Rights of Man. New York: Knopf.

SUNDAY CLOSING LAWS

The first compulsory Sunday observance law in what is now the United States was promulgated in Virginia in 1610. It made absence from church services punishable by death for the third offense. Although there is no record of any person suffering the death penalty, lesser penalties, including whipping, were in effect in all the colonies and were continued after independence. Implicit constitutional recognition of Sunday observance is found in Article I, section 7, which excepts Sundays from the ten days wherein the President is required to exercise his veto of bills adopted by Congress.

Before the Supreme Court ruled that the FIRST AMENDMENT was applicable to the states, it held, in Hennington v. Georgia (1896), that Georgia had not unconstitutionally burdened INTERSTATE COMMERCE by regulating the movement of freight trains on Sundays. Four years later, it held, in Petit v. Minnesota (1900), that the state had not denied DUE PROCESS in refusing to classify barbering as an act of necessity or charity that could legally be performed on Sundays.

In 1961, after the Court had ruled the First Amendment applicable to the states, it considered the constitutionality of three state Sunday closing laws under that Amendment in four cases, known collectively as the Sunday Closing Law Cases. Two, McGowan v. Maryland and Two Guys from Harrison-Allentown, Inc. v. McGinley, concerned owners of highway discount stores that were open for business seven days a week. The other two, Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Super Market and Braunfeld v. Brown, involved stores owned by Orthodox Jews, who, by reason of religious convictions, abstained from all business activities on Saturdays.

In these cases the statutes were challenged on three principal grounds: that the laws violated the ban on the ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION; that the statutes' crazy-quilt pattern of exemptions was arbitrary, constituting a denial of due process and the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS (for example, in one of the states it was legal to sell fish and food stuffs wholesale, but not at retail; in another, merchandise customarily sold at beaches and amusement parks might be sold there, but not elsewhere); that, at least in respect to Jews, Seventh-Day Adventists, and others whose religions required rest on Saturday, the laws violated the constitutional protection of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY by making it economically difficult if not impossible for them to observe their own Sabbath when their competitors operated six days each week.

In all four cases the Court upheld the constitutionality of the challenged laws, with all the prevailing opinions written by Chief Justice EARL WARREN. He recognized that the laws challenged in these cases had been enacted in colonial times with the purpose of ensuring observance of the majoritarian Christian Sabbath as a religious obligation. However, he said, the religious origin of these statutes did not require their invalidation if their present purpose was secular.

Warren said that the modern purpose of the challenged statutes was to set aside a day for "rest, repose, relaxation, tranquillity"; the purpose was therefore secular rather than religious. The Maryland statutes, for example, permitted such Sunday activities as the operation of bathing beaches, amusement parks, and even pinball and slot machines, as well as the sale of alcoholic beverages and the performance of professional sports. That such exemptions are directly contrary to the religiosity of the Sabbath indicated clearly that the Sunday laws' present purpose was not religious.

Viewed as welfare legislation, the Sunday laws presented little constitutional difficulty. The Chief Justice noted in McGowan that numerous federal and state laws affecting public health, safety, conditions of labor, weekend diversion at parks and beaches, and cultural activities of various kinds, had long been upheld. To forbid a state from prescribing Sunday as a day of rest solely because centuries ago such laws had their genesis in religion would be a CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION based on hostility to the public welfare rather than the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

The Court had more difficulty in sustaining laws applied against persons observing a day other than Sunday as their divinely ordained day of rest. Six Justices agreed that state legislatures, if they so elected, could constitutionally exempt Sabbatarians from complying with Sunday law restrictions, but the free exercise clause did not mandate that they do so. However, a majority of the Court could not agree upon one opinion to that effect. The Chief Justice, speaking for a plurality of four, noted that while the clause secured freedom to hold any belief, it did not forbid regulation of secular practices merely because some persons might suffer economically if they obeyed the dictates of their religion. Income tax laws, for example, did not violate the clause even though they limited the amount of deductions for religious contributions. If a state regulated conduct by a general law, the purpose and effect of which were to advance secular goals, its action was valid despite its indirect burden on the exercise of religion unless the purpose could practicably be otherwise accomplished. A sabbatarian exemption would be hard to enforce, and would interfere with the goal of providing a uniform day of rest that as far as possible eliminated the atmosphere of commercial activity. The laws thus did not violate the free exercise clause.

In THORNTON V. CALDOR, INC. (1985) the Court went even further. It ruled unconstitutional, under the effect aspect of the purpose-effect-entanglement test of constitutionality under the establishment clause, a Connecticut law that accorded employees an absolute right not to work on their chosen Sabbath.

LEO PFEFFER
(1986)

Bibliography

PFEFFER, LEO (1953) 1967 Church, State and Freedom. Boston: Beacon Press.

STOKES, ANSON PHELPS 1950 Church and State in the United States. New York: Harper & Brothers.

SUPERMAJORITY RULES

A supermajority rule is a rule that requires a legislative body to pass a class of legislative enactments, such as treaties or bills of certain types, by more than a bare majority. Supermajority rules are created either by the legislature or by the Constitution. An example of a legislative supermajority rule is the requirement first adopted by the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES in the 104th Congress that three-fifths of those voting are needed to pass an increase in income tax rates. Examples of constitutional supermajority rules include the clause requiring that two-thirds of the U.S. SENATE approve treaties and the provision allowing Congress to propose constitutional amendments only if two-thirds of the House and the Senate approve.

Supermajority rules have a number of justifications. Some matters such as constitutional amendments are thought to be so important that they require a greater-than-majority consensus. For other matters, supermajority rules are justified as necessary to offset what is thought to be the disproportionate power of special interests in a legislature governed by majority rule. For example, proposals to require supermajorities for tax increases has been based on the view that the power of special interests would otherwise lead to higher taxes than the majority of citizens actually prefers.

Controversy over federal legislative supermajority rules centers on whether Congress has the constitutional authority to enact them. Defenders of the constitutionality of such rules have argued (1) that the clause authorizing "each House [to] determine the Rules of its Proceedings" allows either house to pass whatever rules it chooses unless they violate a constitutional provision and (2) that no constitutional provision precludes supermajority rules. Those who attack the constitutionality of legislative supermajority rules argue that the constitutional clause allowing Congress to pass bills should be read to mean "pass by a majority." Defenders counter that neither constitutional history nor structure support this reading. One proposition accepted by both sides of the debate is that neither house may prevent a majority from repealing supermajority rules. This proposition, however, raises questions about the utility of such rules. If simple legislative majorities can undo legislative supermajority rules, they may not greatly restrain such majorities.

Constitutional supermajority rules, however, are more entrenched political norms and cannot be so easily undone. Constitutional supermajority rules represent a compromise between the two other principal forms of constitutional governance: rule by legislative majority and absolute constitutional limitations, such as those contained in the BILL OF RIGHTS. Like rule by legislative majority, supermajority rules allow Congress to make the decision whether to pass a bill. Like absolute constitutional limitations, however, supermajority rules restrain a simple majority from passing certain types of laws.

Proponents of constitutional supermajority rules argue that, as a third distinct form of constitutional governance, such rules will under certain circumstances be preferable to both legislative majority rule and absolute limitations. Supermajority rules will be superior to legislative majority rule when special interests (or other defects) undermine the majoritarian process. In these circumstances, supermajority rules may act as a constitutional filter, blocking more undesirable LEGISLATION than desirable legislation. Supermajority rules will function better than absolute limitations in areas where there is no determinate principle for judges to enforce or where it is inappropriate to give judges the authority that absolute limitations generally provide.

Opponents of supermajority rules suggest that they are inconsistent with democracy because they detract from majority rule and the principle that citizens should have equal influence on legislation. Proponents of constitutional supermajority rules respond that all constitutional limitations constrain simple democracy, and say that the question is whether these limitations will work well. Moreover, if supermajority rules are employed to limit special interests, proponents argue that such rules will in fact advance the democratic goal of equal influence.

MICHAEL B. RAPPAPORT
JOHN O. MCGINNIS (2000)

Bibliography

AMAR, AKHIL REED et al. 1995 An Open Letter to Congressman Gingrich. Yale Law Journal 104:1539–1544.

MCGINNIS, JOHN O. and RAPPAPORT, MICHAEL B. 1995 The Constitutionality of Supermajority Rules: A Defense. Yale Law Journal 105:470–483.

——— 1997 The Rights of Legislators and the Wrongs of Interpretation: A Further Defense of the Constitutionality of Legislative Supermajority Rules. Duke Law Journal 47:327–349.

——— 1999 Supermajority Rules as a Constitutional Solution. William and Mary Law Review 40:365–470.

RUBENFELD, JED 1996 Rights of Passage: Majority Rule in Congress. Duke Law Journal 46:73–90.

SUPREMACY CLAUSE

The supremacy clause of Article VI, clause 2, declares: "This Constitution and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the Land." This principle of national supremacy was a radical departure from the constitutional order that prevailed under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. Whereas the Articles created a short-lived confederation of states—according to its terms a mere "league of friendship" founded on the good faith of sovereign states—the Constitution established a federal union designed to last in perpetuity. The distinguishing feature of the "more perfect union" created by the Constitution was a strong national government capable of dealing with the problems and complexities of a growing nation and strong state governments acting within their sphere of authority. The Constitution does not establish the supremacy of the national government in all things. National supremacy is limited to laws made Pursuant to the Constitution. What is not granted to the national government under its ENUMERATED POWERS is, as a general rule, reserved to the people or to the states under the TENTH AMENDMENT.

The supremacy clause may truly be regarded as the linchpin of American FEDERALISM. It holds the republic together by providing a principle for the resolution of conflicts between the states and the nation. Valid national law is clearly paramount in the face of conflicting state law. But whether a state law conflicts with federal law or a federal constitutional provision is not always clear. When doubts exist over the compatibility of federal and state law, and a real controversy arises from these doubts, the judiciary is usually called upon to work out the implications of the supremacy clause through interpretation. The outcome of such cases often depends on inferences drawn by the courts from the structure of the federal system and the values it represents.

The problems of interpretation generated by the supremacy clause have taken two forms epitomized by the celebrated cases of MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) and GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824). In the first Maryland taxed a national bank doing business within its borders; in the second New York granted a monopoly over steamboat navigation on its internal waterways. The supremacy clause operated to invalidate both measures. McCulloch stands for the principle that even a power reserved to the states—here the ordinary and indispensable power of taxation—may not be exercised in such a way as to impede or unduly burden a federal agency or activity; Gibbons stands for the principle that the state's regulation of a subject matter within its territory, and normally under its control, must give way before a conflicting, and valid, federal statute. "It is of the very essence of [national] supremacy," wrote Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL, "to remove all obstacles to its action within its own sphere, and to so modify every power vested in subordinate governments as to exempt its own operation from . . . their influence." In both cases, Marshall underscored the plenary nature of the enumerated powers of Congress; they admit of no limitations save those prescribed in the Constitution. When combined with McCulloch's doctrine of IMPLIED POWERS, fortified by the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE, the reach of federal power cuts a potentially deep furrow into the field of state SOVEREIGNTY.

This expansive view of federal power was for almost a century strongly contested by the doctrine of DUAL FEDERALISM. It held that nation and states were essentially equal in their respective spheres of influence. The doctrine did not hold that the states could decide for themselves the extent of their sovereign powers. Once again this was a judicial task, for dual federalism was an axiom of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. Beginning roughly in 1835, shortly after ROGER B. TANEY replaced Marshall as Chief Justice, the Supreme Court deployed and developed the concept of STATE POLICE POWER—broadly characterized as the power of a state to provide for the general welfare of its people—to limit the reach of national law. This movement attained its apogee in the first third of the twentieth century when the Supreme Court used the Tenth Amendment to invalidate numerous federal laws, all of them regulating various aspects of the economy. Most of these decisions supported the ideology of individualism and capitalism. The national statutes struck down by the Court were deemed to interfere with state police power yet arguably enacted pursuant to the delegated powers of Congress and clearly not expressly forbidden by the Constitution.

The year 1937 marks the collapse of the doctrine that state sovereignty constitutes a limitation on the exercise of power delegated by the Constitution to Congress. Since then the Supreme Court has returned and held steadfastly to the spirit of McCulloch and Gibbons. Even activities sponsored or operated by the state are subject to federal regulation when imposed pursuant to a delegated power. NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976) is the only exception to this principle: in striking down a federal wage and hour provision as applied to state and local public employees, a closely divided Supreme Court ruled that such power—in this instance the federal commerce power—may not be exercised to interfere with "functions essential to the separate and independent existence" of the "states as states." The ghost of dual federalism lurks in Usery. In 1985, however, a closely divided Court overruled Usery in GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY.

In interpreting the supremacy clause today, the Supreme Court has given up the search for bright lines separating federal and state authority. The two levels of government are no longer perceived as antagonistic rivals, whatever the tensions between them. The supremacy clause once operated to immunize persons closely related to the federal government from most forms of state taxation. The pre-1937 doctrine of federal tax immunity, based on the generalized notion of federal supremacy rooted in McCulloch, was construed to invalidate such levies as state or local taxes on the income of federal employees, on interest income from federal bonds, on income derived from property leased by the federal government, and on sales to the United States. Since 1937, however, the Supreme Court with the help of Congress has wiped out most of this RECIPROCAL TAX IMMUNITY. The prevailing doctrine today, particularly after United States v. New Mexico (1982), is that a nondiscriminatory state tax even upon private contractors with close and intricate relationships with the federal government will not violate the supremacy clause unless the tax is imposed directly upon the United States.

In the field of regulation, too, sharp lines between federal and state authority are often difficult to find. Modern government is complex, involving the entanglement of federal and state policy in fields once regarded as exclusively state concerns. Education, conservation, aid to the poor and the handicapped, and environmental protection are prominent examples of such fields. The relationship between levels of government in all these areas today is one of cooperation and reciprocity. By means of FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID and other funding programs the national government, pursuant to its power of taxing and spending for the GENERAL WELFARE, has actually encouraged the states to pass laws and adopt policies in response to local needs. This new context of COOPERATIVE FEDERALISM does not mean, however, that the supremacy clause has lost its bite. Indeed, it has operated to establish the primacy of the national government even in some of the aforementioned fields. An example is Blum v. Bacon (1982), where the Supreme Court invalidated a New York law excluding recipients of a federal program aiding poor families with dependent children from receiving aid under the state's federally funded emergency welfare program. (Blum involved a state statutory policy that conflicted with a federal administrative regulation.)

As the preceding suggests, contemporary supremacy clause analysis is largely a matter of statutory interpretation. The supremacy clause has not been interpreted to prevent federal and state governments from regulating the same subject, partly out of the judiciary's recognition of the reality of cooperative federalism. The nature of some subjects (e.g., IMMIGRATION and NATURALIZATION, bankruptcy, PATENTS, and some articles of commerce) may require national uniform legislation. But most problems of American national life are valid topics of both national and state legislation (e.g., air and water pollution, motor carrier transportation, labor relations, consumer protection, and CIVIL RIGHTS). States and nation may legislate on these topics for similar or different reasons. The key to the validity of such concurrent or parallel legislation is whether both federal and state regulations can be enforced without impairing federal superintendence of the field. Even apparently conflicting state legislation may survive supremacy clause analysis if the state law deals with a field traditionally occupied by the state and the state's interest is substantial enough to offset any presumption that Congress may have intended to occupy the field all by itself. A principle of comity has thus replaced the earlier antagonism between nation and states characteristic of dual federalism. Today, as a general rule, unless Congress statutorily declares its intent to occupy a field, federal regulation preempts state law only where the latter seriously impedes the former.

Jones v. Roth Packing Company (1977) is a leading example of a case in which federal policy displaced state law notwithstanding the absence of explicit preemptive language in the congressional statute. Here the federal Fair Packaging and Labeling Act, enacted under the COMMERCE CLAUSE, was construed to conflict with a state consumer protection law dealing with the weight of certain goods packaged for sale. The Supreme Court read into the federal statute a congressional intent to supersede state law. Supersession was inferred from the supremacy clause because the enforcement of the state law was an obstacle to the full accomplishment and execution of the congressional purpose. In other cases federal PREEMPTION has been inferred because "[t]he scheme of federal regulation may be so pervasive as to make reasonable the inference that Congress left no room for the states to supplement it" or because "the Act of Congress may touch a field in which the federal interest is so dominant that the federal system will be assumed to preclude enforcement of state laws on the same subject." The supremacy clause thus remains a vital operative principle of American constitutional law even though the Supreme Court tends to presume the validity of concurrent state legislation, barring proof of its interference with federal policy.

DONALD P. KOMMERS
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWIN S. 1913 National Supremacy: Treaty Power versus State Power. New York: Holt.

SCHMIDHAUSER, JOHN R. 1958 The Supreme Court as Final Arbiter of Federal-State Relations. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

SUPREME COURT
(History)

The only court whose existence is mandated by the Constitution is the Supreme Court. Article III states: "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Besides its existence, a few attributes are constitutionally entrenched by Article III. The tenure of the judges is to be "during GOOD BEHAVIOR," and their compensation "shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." These provisions, modeled on English law and made applicable to all federal judges, were obviously intended to assure the independence of a judiciary appointed, pursuant to Article II, by the President with the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the SENATE.

Other features having a bearing on the character and independence of the Court were not addressed, presumably to be left at large or determined from time to time by Congress. Qualifications for membership on the Court were not specified; nor were the size of the Court, the period of its TERMS, or the level of the judges' compensation. The Court was to have both ORIGINAL JURISDICTION and APPELLATE JURISDICTION, but the latter was subject to "such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make." Nothing was said concerning the relation of the Supreme Court to the courts of the STATES.

Thus from the outset the Court was only partially sheltered from the politics of republican government. The status of the Court was one of those creative ambiguities that have marked the Constitution as no less an organism than a mechanism, Darwinian as well as Newtonian. The position of the Court may have been in the mind of an eminent modern foreign-born mathematician who, contemplating American CITIZENSHIP, regretted that he could not swear allegiance to the Constitution because "it is full of inconsistencies." In a self-governing nation, to be sure, the Court is detached but not disengaged, distant but not remote. Therein lay its potential either for popular neglect and scorn or for power and prestige.

The need for a federal judiciary, and so for an ultimate tribunal, was felt by the Framers as part of the transition from a confederation to a federal union. The ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION supplied no such institution, except a supreme tribunal for prize and admiralty cases. A system of federal courts, parallel to those of the states, was one of the innovative conceptions of 1787. Their function was to serve as impartial tribunals, free of local bias, in suits between states, or controversies involving citizens of different states or a foreign country; to establish a uniform interpretation of federal laws; and to maintain the supremacy of federal law in cases where a state law conflicted with the Constitution, federal statutes, or treaties of the United States. In sum, the JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS could rest on the nature of the parties or of the question presented. Only in cases where a state, or a foreign country or its diplomatic representative, was a party was the Supreme Court given original (nonappellate) jurisdiction.

These skeletal provisions of Article III were fleshed out by Congress in the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789. That act set the number of Supreme Court Justices at five associate Justices and one CHIEF JUSTICE, with salaries of $3,500 and $4,000, respectively. (The monetary differential remained at $500 until 1969, when it was increased to $2,500.) Three provisions of the act led to developments that proved to be of seminal importance for the prestige and power of the Supreme Court: a requirement that the Justices serve on regional CIRCUIT COURTS ("circuit riding"); a provision in section 13 that seemed to grant original jurisdiction to the Court to issue WRITS OF MANDAMUS; and a grant of power in section 25 to review the decisions of state supreme courts in cases turning on the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. Each of these merits attention.

The circuit duties meant sitting with a federal district judge to form a circuit court, which heard appeals from district courts and had original jurisdiction in diversity of citizenship cases. In the early years circuit riding consumed the greater part of a Justice's time and surely his energy; travel by carriage or horseback over rough roads and stopovers at uncomfortable inns resulted in a weariness of flesh and spirit, against which the Justices complained bitterly, but which they forbore to resist. Yet these excursions into the local courthouses brought them into touch with lawyers, journalists, and townspeople, and gave a reality to the Supreme Court that its functioning in the capital city could not match. Moreover, the assignment of each Justice to a particular circuit affected significantly the appointments to the Court, for a vacancy on the Court would normally be filled by an appointment from the same circuit, and so at any time the practical range of nominees was limited and the influence of a small group of senators was proportionately great. Not until 1891, with the passage of the CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS ACT, were the Justices fully relieved of circuit-riding duties. Thereafter geography played a decreasing role in appointments. A striking instance was the widely acclaimed appointment by President HERBERT C. HOOVER in 1932 of Judge BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO of New York to succeed Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES of Massachusetts, although two New Yorkers, Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES and Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE, were already on the Court. A comparable instance was the appointment by President Reagan in 1981 of Judge SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR of Arizona to succeed Justice POTTER STEWART of Ohio even though another Arizonan, Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, was already serving.

As circuit riding was a cardinal factor in gaining popular recognition of the Court (at considerable cost to the Justices) and in determining appointments, so did the practice furnish an early opportunity for the Court to judge the validity of an act of Congress. In the waning days of the Federalist administration, Congress passed the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801, compounded of partisanship and principle, which created new judgeships and abolished circuit riding. When the Jeffersonians took office, however, they countered with the Judiciary Act of 1802, which abolished the judgeships and restored circuit riding. Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL, sensing a political crisis for the Court, solicited the opinions of his brethren on the question of complying with the law or treating it as beyond the authority of Congress. The Justices had serious doubts about the law's validity, and a strong distaste for the resumption of the burden it imposed, yet a majority counseled compliance, in accord with Marshall's own inclination. But a private litigant, defeated in a circuit court in Virginia at which Marshall himself presided, appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing the unconstitutionality of the 1802 act. The Congress, fearing a judgment voiding the act, had abolished the 1802 term of the Supreme Court. When the case, STUART V. LAIRD, was decided, in February of 1803, the Court, with Marshall not participating, surprised and gratified the Jeffersonians by upholding the act, in a brief opinion which simply declared that acquiescence by the Court in circuit duty for twelve years under the Judiciary Act of 1789 had given a practical construction of the Constitution that would not now be disturbed. That the Court would at least consider the validity of an act of Congress had been resolved just six days earlier in the landmark case of MARBURY V. MADISON (1803).

That case, establishing the power of JUDICAL REVIEW of acts of Congress, marked the second of the three germinal developments from the Judiciary Act of 1789. Section 13, which gave the Court power to issue mandamus and other writs, might have been read simply as conferring the power where the jurisdiction of the Court rested on one of the grounds specified in Article III. But the Court was not of a mind for so narrow a reading. When William Marbury of Maryland invoked the original jurisdiction of the Court to enforce a right to an office of justice of the peace pursuant to an appointment by President JOHN ADAMS, and sought a mandamus to compel Secretary of State JAMES MADISON to deliver his commission, the Court regarded section 13 as conferring jurisdiction, and as so construed beyond the ambit of original jurisdiction defined in Article III. The suit for mandamus was therefore dismissed, again to the gratification of the Jeffersonians, but in the process the Court had declared the far more significant principle that in the decision of a case where a federal law was arguably incompatible with the Constitution, the Court, in deciding what "the law" was, must, if necessary, vindicate the HIGHER LAW and treat the legislative act as ineffectual.

Despite some provocative language in Marshall's opinion (the executive branch cannot "sport away" the rights of others), the Jeffersonians focused on the immediate result and regarded it as a victory at the hands of a still-Federalist Court. Indeed, judicial review was not then the divisive party issue; the Jeffersonians would have welcomed a Supreme Court decision holding the Sedition Act of 1798 unconstitutional. Whether Marshall's doctrine of judicial review was a usurpation later became a subject of heated debate, scholarly and unscholarly. Although the Constitution contains no specific mention of the power, and although Marshall's opinion, resting on the logic of the decisional process, can be said to beg the question of who is to decide, the debates in the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION do indicate obliquely an acceptance of the power, in explaining the rejection of attempts to involve judges in an extrajudicial power of veto of legislation. But the debates were not cited in Marbury; MADISON'S NOTES, the most authoritative source, pursuant to the policy of secrecy, were not published until fifty years after the Convention.

The third of the salient projections from the Judiciary Act of 1789, involving section 25, produced more immediate partisan repercussions. Section 25 empowered the Court to review decisions of state courts that denied rights claimed under the federal Constitution, statutes, or treaties. Again, no constitutional provision explicitly conferred such power on the Supreme Court, although Article VI does declare the supremacy of federal law: "the judges in every state shall be bound thereby." By their silence, the Framers may have sought to avoid confrontations in the ratifying process, as in forbearing to be explicit about a national power to issue paper money or to establish a national bank.

The storm over the Court's power to review state court decisions was precipitated by its decision in MARTIN V. HUNTER'S LESSEE (1816) sustaining the validity of section 25. The case was a contest over title to the extensive Fairfax estate in the northern neck of Virginia, turning on the intricate interrelations of Virginia land law and treaties of the United States with Great Britain concerning ownership of land by British nationals. Holding that the Virginia court had misapplied both Virginia and federal law, the Supreme Court in 1813, through Justice JOSEPH STORY, reversed the state court's judgment and remanded the case to that court. A number of factors weakened the force of the decision. Story's opinion controverted the state court's even on points of the interpretation of state law, although section 25 itself limited review to federal questions. At a time when seven Justices constituted the Court, only four participated in the decision; the vote was 3–1, and the mandate to the Virginia court was unfortunately in the traditional form addressed to an inferior court, "you are hereby commanded, etc." The Virginia court was outraged and refused to obey the mandate. On a new WRIT OF ERROR to the Supreme Court, Story elaborated the justification of Supreme Court review in terms of the need for uniformity and supremacy of national law. The nature of the cause, not the court, was determinative of the Supreme Court's power to review (though critics wondered, no doubt unfairly, if the Supreme Court could then be given authority to review certain decisions of the House of Lords). John Marshall could not have uttered a pronouncement more nationalistic than that of the New England Republican appointed by President JAMES MADISON. (Marshall had excused himself because of his family's ownership of part of the land. Story, appointed in 1811 at the age of thirty-two, one of the most learned and powerful of Justices and a firm ally of Marshall, had been Madison's fourth choice to succeed WILLIAM CUSHING of Massachusetts: LEVI LINCOLN declined the nomination, Alexander Wolcott was rejected by the Senate, and JOHN QUINCY ADAMS also declined. Thus are the inevitabilities of history determined.)

In a sequel to the decision, the Court took the further step of sustaining its power to review even criminal judgments of state courts where a federal question, such as the interpretation of a federal law, was implicated. The opinion by Chief Justice Marshall in COHENS V. VIRGINIA (1821) was the climactic realization of the Court's vision of a uniform federal law and a Constitution that was supreme in reality as well as in principle.

Reaction to the Cohens decision by Jeffersonians, particularly in Virginia, was intense. Judge SPENCER ROANE, who instead of Marshall would probably have become Chief Justice if OLIVER ELLSWORTH had not resigned before Jefferson took office, published a series of bitter letters under pseudonyms, paying his respects to "A most monstrous and unexampled decision. It can only be accounted for from that love of power which all history informs us infects and corrupts all who possess it, and from which even the upright and eminent Judges are not exempt." The Court's "extravagant pretension" reached "the zenith of despotic power." In the following years a series of bills were introduced in Congress to repeal, in whole or in part, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Under these genial auspices was thus established a particularly sensitive and probably the most crucial power of the highest court in our federal union: the review of decisions of state courts in the interest of vindicating rights secured by the Constitution.

Conflicts between the Supreme Court, on the one hand, and the executive or legislative branches, or both, on the other, have occurred continually. The other branches have utilized the full spectrum of measures made available by the constitution. The most drastic of these, IMPEACHMENT, was the first to be tried; indeed it was designed as a trial run by Jefferson to prepare the way for a similar attack on Chief Justice Marshall. The immediate target was Justice SAMUEL CHASE, ardent Federalist, whose partisan outbursts in charges to the grand jury in Maryland furnished the occasion. The attempt misfired, however; Chase was narrowly acquitted in the Senate, owing probably to comparable overreaching by the fiery JOHN RANDOLPH, who managed the case for the Jeffersonians.

A milder form of resistance to the Court was the doctrine of departmental independence, whereby the President was as free to act on his view of constitutional authority as the Court was to act on its own. Despite the prospect of endless oscillation that this theory implied, it was espoused in some form by Jefferson, ANDREW JACKSON, and ABRAHAM LINCOLN. President JACKSON'S VETO OF THE BANK BILL (1832) was based partly on grounds of unconstitutionality, although the earlier law creating the bank had been sustained by the Supreme Court. In his message justifying the veto, Jackson had the advice and aid of his attorney general, ROGER B. TANEY. By an irony of history, when President Lincoln in his first inaugural address dealt with Taney's opinion in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), he adopted something of the Jackson-Taney philosophy, maintaining that although he offered no resistance to the decision as a settlement of the lawsuit he could not regard it as binding on the political branches for the future.

The indeterminate size of the Court became a weapon in the contest between President ANDREW JOHNSON and Congress over RECONSTRUCTION. By successive statutory changes, following the admission of new states and the creation of new circuits, the authorized membership of the Court had been increased to ten. A radical Congress, distrustful of Johnson and wishing to deprive him of the power to make new appointments to the Court, reduced the number of seats prospectively to seven. (Contributing to the move was a plan of Chief Justice SALMON P. CHASE to induce a reluctant Congress to increase the Justices' salaries in return for a decrease in the number to be compensated. That plan failed, but Chase did succeed in having the title of his office changed from Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to Chief Justice of the United States.) The actual number of Justices did not fall below eight, and in 1869 the number was fixed at nine.

More famous is the action of the same Congress in withdrawing the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in cases under a HABEAS CORPUS act, giving rise to the decision in EX PARTE MCCARDLE in 1869. While the immediate issue in the case was whether a military commission in Mississippi could try a newspaper editor for inflammatory writings urging citizens not to cooperate with the military government, Congress was fearful that a politically minded majority on the Court would hold the entire plan of Reconstruction unconstitutional. The Court, which had already heard argument in the case, bowed to the withdrawal of jurisdiction, but carefully pointed out that another appellate route remained unaffected by the repealing statute. Consequently the value of McCardle as a PRECEDENT, which is the centerpiece of constitutional argument on the extent of congressional power to limit the Court's jurisdiction, is at best doubtful.

The post-Reconstruction Court alienated labor and progressives by decisions taking a narrow view of state power to regulate and tax business; the COMMERCE CLAUSE and FREEDOM OF CONTRACT protected by SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS served as shields for industry. The Progressive party platform in 1912, under the aegis of THEODORE ROOSEVELT, advocated the RECALL of judges and judicial decisions by popular vote. Although this thrust was aimed at state courts rather than the Supreme Court, the latter had set a tone for judicial review in a triad of decisions in 1895. UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT CO. held that a combination of sugar refiners controlling ninety percent of sugar production in the nation was not subject to the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT because processing is not commerce. IN RE DEBS held that a labor leader could be imprisoned for violating a federal court's INJUNCTION in a railroad labor strike, without judicial reliance on any statutorily defined offense. POLLOCK V. FARMERS LOAN AND TRUST CO. held the federal income tax law unconstitutional as applied to income from real property, stocks, and bonds, though valid as applied to wages, because an income tax is tantamount to a tax on its source, and where the source is property in some form the tax is a DIRECT TAX which under the constitution is forbidden to Congress unless apportioned according to population.

The most serious conflict with the Court, certainly since Marshall's time, culminated in President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's Court reorganization plan in early 1937. The Court had held unconstitutional a series of major NEW DEAL measures designed for economic recovery and reform: the NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT; AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT; Railway Pension Act; Farm Mortgage Act; Guffey-Snyder Bituminous Coal Act; Municipal Bankruptcy Act; and a state minimum wage law for women. Still to be decided was the validity of the WAGNER NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT, the SOCIAL SECURITY ACT, the PUBLIC UTILITY HOLDING COMPANY ACT, and the TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY ACT in its full scope. The administration was persuaded that the barrier did not inhere in the Constitution but was the handiwork of Justices who were out of sympathy both with the New Deal and with the best traditions of constitutional decision. Apparently accepting the validity of this analysis, Chief Justice Hughes, appointed by President Hoover, though he greatly disliked 5–4 decisions, nevertheless joined Justices LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, Stone, and Cardozo as dissenters in the last five of the cases listed above as holding measures invalid. During his first term President Roosevelt had no opportunity to make an appointment to the Court.

The reorganization plan, which was formulated by Attorney General HOMER S. CUMMINGS, called for the appointment of an additional member of the Court for each Justice who did not retire at the age of seventy, up to a maximum membership of fifteen. Despite the President's sweeping electoral victory in 1936, and intensive political efforts by the administration for four months, the plan failed to pass the Senate. A number of factors contributed to the result. The argument based on age and inefficiency, stressed by proponents at the outset, was transparently disingenuous. A letter from Chief Justice Hughes, joined by Justices WILLIS VAN DEVANTER and Brandeis, to Senator Burton K. Wheeler, at the latter's request, effectively refuted the charge that the Court needed additional members to keep abreast of its docket. The Court itself, while the bill was pending, sustained a state minimum wage law, the National Labor Relations Act, an amended Farm Bankruptcy Act, and the Social Security Act. As one senator remarked, "Why keep on running for the bus after you've caught it?" Moreover, Congress enacted a new retirement act for Supreme Court Justices, which made retirement more acceptable. Since 1869 a full pension had been provided for, but as retirement was equivalent to resignation under the statute, the pension was subject to the will of Congress and in 1932, as an economy measure, it had been reduced by half and was later restored. The act of 1937, by enabling retired Justices to serve on the lower federal courts, placed their retirement compensation under constitutional protection against diminution. Justice Van Devanter availed himself of this new law, giving the President his first opportunity to make an appointment and lessening further the need for enactment of his plan. But perhaps the most powerful factor leading to its defeat was a pervasive feeling, even among groups holding grievances against particular decisions, that the independence of the judiciary was too important a principle to be sacrificed, even under the extreme provocation furnished by a majority of the Court itself.

The appellate jurisdiction of the Court became a target of attack in 1958, as it had been in the early nineteenth century. Senator William E. Jenner of Indiana, reacting against decisions curtailing governmental actions in the field of loyalty investigations, introduced a series of bills withdrawing Supreme Court jurisdiction in this and related classes of cases. Passage was narrowly averted by the efforts of the then majority leader, Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Comparable bills were introduced in 1982 to preclude review of decisions concerning abortion and school prayers. Such efforts, if successful, would produce chaotic results. In the name of the federal Constitution, varying decisions, for and against local laws, would stand unreconciled; the Supreme Court would have no opportunity to reconsider or modify its precedents; state and federal judges would be left to take different positions on the binding effect of prior Supreme Court decisions.

It is apparent that in the recurrent clashes of party, section, and class that have marked American history, the Court, whose role, in principle, is that of an arbiter, has not escaped the role of participant. In these judicial involvements, extraordinary force on one side has induced similar force on the other. A dramatic example is the contest over the production of the White House tapes for use as evidence in the prosecutions growing out of the Watergate break-in. President RICHARD M. NIXON refused to comply with a subpoena issued by the district court, on the ground of EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE. The tension between the rule of law and presidential immunity from suit had been resolved in part by bringing suit against a subordinate who was carrying out presidential orders, as in the steel seizure case, YOUNGSTOWN SHEET AND TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1952), where the named defendant was the secretary of commerce. President Nixon, however, forced the issue by taking sole custody of the tapes. On appeal, the Supreme Court responded with the countervailing measure of holding the President amenable to the process of a court where the need of EVIDENCE in a criminal trial outweighs a generalized claim of privilege. The unanimity of the decision (with one abstention) was doubtless a factor impelling the President to yield, thus avoiding an ultimate confrontation.

That the supreme judicial tribunal, without the power of purse or sword, should have survived crises and vicissitudes and maintained its prestige can be ascribed partly to its own resourcefulness and partly to the recognition by a mature people of the Court's necessary functions in the American constitutional democracy. The Court's resourcefulness owes much to the central paradox of its work: it decides issues of great political moment, yet it does so in the context of a controversy between ordinary litigants in a conventional lawsuit. That setting provides a test of concreteness in the formulation of DOCTRINE, allows flexibility of development, and enables the Court to adapt and refine doctrine as new factual and procedural settings may suggest.

The Supreme Court's essential functions, performed within the framework of conventional lawsuits, are fourfold: to resolve controversies between states; to assure the uniform application of national law; to maintain a common market in a continental union; and to enforce the guarantees of liberty and equality embodied in the BILL OF RIGHTS, the post-CIVIL WAR amendments, and other provisions of the Constitution.

Although the Court's jurisdiction over suits between states is statistically insignificant, the function is of practical and symbolic importance, serving as a substitute for diplomacy and war in disputes over boundaries, allotment of waters, and the like. Because these cases originate in the Supreme Court, factual disputes are referred to a SPECIAL MASTER for hearings, findings, and recommendations, which are then presented to the Court for argument and decision.

The uniform interpretation and application of national law has become increasingly important with the proliferation of federal regulatory statutes and administrative rules. For almost a century, until 1938, the Supreme Court essayed a broader concept of uniformity in the COMMON LAW itself, in fields such as commercial law and torts, under the doctrine of SWIFT V. TYSON (1842), which empowered the federal courts to pronounce a FEDERAL COMMON LAW without regard to the common law of particular states. Sweeping as it was, the doctrine was truncated, for the federal common law could have no binding authority in state courts, and thus a bifurcated system of common law developed, along with a practice of forum shopping by lawyers as between federal and state courts. The doctrine was repudiated by the Court in ERIE RAILWAY V. TOMPKINS (1938) in an opinion by Justice Brandeis that branded as unconstitutional the course theretofore pursued by the federal courts. With the demise of Swift v. Tyson the rationale for retaining DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP JURISDICTION in the federal courts, for the decision of matters of state law, was materially weakened.

The maintenance of a common market is a modern description of a historic function of the Court, exercised since Marshall and his colleagues decided in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) that the constitutional power of Congress over commerce among the states implied a negative on state power, even when Congress has not acted, and that the Supreme Court would enforce that implied prohibition. For a generation these commerce clause cases elicited a series of decisions upholding or setting aside state regulations—of quarantine, pilotage, intoxicating liquors, entry fees—by classifying them as either regulations of commerce, and so invalid, or regulations of local health or safety, and so valid as POLICE POWER measures. This effort at classification obscured the process of judgment by treating a conclusory label as if it were a premise for reasoning. A pivotal change in methodology occurred in COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS (1852), a pilotage case where the opinion by Justice BENJAMIN CURTIS recognized that commercial regulation and police power were not mutually exclusive categories, and that decision should turn on an empirical judgment, weighing the necessity of the local law, the seriousness of the impact on commerce, the need for uniformity of treatment, and the possible discriminatory impact on out-of-state enterprise. This kind of scrutiny, and comparable analysis of local taxation when challenged by multistate business, have been staples of Supreme Court adjudication and exemplars for other economic federations struggling to accommodate local interests and those of a union.

The most intensive, acclaimed, and in some quarters questioned, aspects of the Court's work has been the elaboration of fundamental human rights. While in England the great expressions of these rights are found in the writings of philosophers and poets—the secular trinity of JOHN MILTON, JOHN LOCKE, and JOHN STUART MILL—in America the pronouncements are embodied—Jefferson apart—in the judicial opinions of Holmes, Brandeis, Hughes, Stone, ROBERT H. JACKSON, HUGO L. BLACK, and other Justices. The development of a body of CIVIL LIBERTIES guarantees, mainly under the Bill of Rights and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, reached its fullest flowering during the Chief Justiceship of EARL WARREN (1953–1969), though the seeds were planted in the HUGHES COURT.

During the 1930s, while public attention was focused on the Court's struggle with national power over the economy, path-breaking advances were made in a series of decisions applying federal constitutional guarantees against the states. It is more than coincidence that this development occurred at a time of rising totalitarianism abroad. FREEDOM OF THE PRESS and FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION AND ASSEMBLY were unmistakably put under the protection of the liberty secured by the Fourteenth Amendment in NEAR V. MINNESOTA (1931) and DEJONGE V. OREGON (1937), respectively. The principle that a conviction in a state court following the use of a coerced confession is a violation of DUE PROCESS OF LAW was announced for the first time BROWN V. MISSISSIPPI (1936). A state's duty to afford racial equality in education was sharpened in MISSOURI EX REL. GAINES V. CANADA (1938): it could not be satisfied by resort to a neighboring state. Mayors and governors were subjected to the reach of federal judicial process in HAGUE V. CIO (1939) and Sterling v. Constantin (1932), an accountability that came to be important in later contests over desegregation.

If the drama of these seminal developments was largely overlooked, the same cannot be said of the great expansion of civil liberties and CIVIL RIGHTS by the WARREN COURT. The leading decisions have become familiar landmarks. BAKER V. CARR (1962), requiring substantial equality of population in electoral districts within a state, asserted judicial power over what had previously been deemed a POLITICAL QUESTION; Chief Justice Warren regarded it as the most important decision of his tenure, because of its potential for redistributing basic political power. BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954, 1955) was both the culmination and the beginning in the long drive against RACIAL DISCRIMINATION: doctrinally a climax, practically a starting point in the devising of remedies. MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), limiting POLICE INTERROGATION of suspects in custody and giving suspects the RIGHT TO COUNSEL during interrogation, has become a symbol of the Court's intense concern for standards of CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, a concern that has sometimes been viewed as an index to a society's civilization. The EQUAL PROTECTION guarantee, which Justice Holmes in 1927 could call the last refuge of a constitutional lawyer, was revitalized in the service not only of racial minorities but of other stereotyped groups: ALIENS, illegitimates, and women. Freedom of the press was extended well beyond freedom from restraint on publication: In actions for LIBEL brought by PUBLIC FIGURES following NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964), the defendant publisher would be liable only if he acted with legal malice, that is, with knowledge of the publication's falsity or with reckless disregard for its truth or falsity.

A constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY, of uncertain scope, extending beyond the explicit SEARCH AND SEIZURE guarantee to encompass at least certain conjugal intimacies, was established in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965). The religion clauses of the FIRST AMENDMENT were given new vitality in decisions rejecting organized prayer in the public schools, such as ENGEL V. VITALE (1962).

On any measure, it is an impressive performance. The momentum was somewhat slackened during the first decade and a half of Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER's tenure, particularly in the areas of criminal procedure and nonestablishment of religion; yet during this period the Court reached the high-water mark of constitutionally protected autonomy in ROE V. WADE (1973), upholding freedom of choice respecting abortion in the first two trimesters of pregnancy.

Criticism of the modern Court has taken diverse directions. Some critics have complained that the Court has been unfaithful to the historic meaning of constitutional provisions. But the argument begs the question of "meaning." If the term signifies denotative meaning, the particular instances that the Framers envisioned as comprehended in the text, the original meaning has indeed been departed from. If, however, the purposive meaning is accepted, and the application does not contradict the language of the text, there is no infidelity. Such an analysis will not disapprove, for example, the "meaning" ascribed to the freedom of the press in the First Amendment.

Another criticism charges defenders of the Court with a double standard: the modern Court is a mirror image of the pre-1937 Court, the judicial vetoes coming now from the left instead of the right. The asserted parallel, however, is inexact. The problem is to identify the appropriate role for judicial review in a representative democracy. The older Court set aside such products of the political process as minimum wage, price control, and tax legislation. The modern Court, by and large, has given its intensive scrutiny to two areas of law that are of peculiarly legitimate concern to the judiciary. One is the field of procedure, in a large sense, civil and criminal. The other is the set of issues concerning representation of interests in the formation of public opinion and lawmaking. This category would include FREEDOM OF SPEECH and press and association, VOTING RIGHTS, education, and the interests of groups underrepresented in the formulation of public policy. This approach gives a certain coherence to constitutional theory: as the commerce clause protects out-of-state enterprise against hostility, open or covert, the Bill of Rights and the Civil War amendments especially protect the political, social, or ethnic "outsider" against official neglect or ostracism.

A more qualified criticism is addressed to two tendencies of the modern Court. One is a perceived disposition to carry a constitutional safeguard to excessive lengths, as in BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976), which held invalid, in the name of freedom of expression, statutory limits on expenditures by or on behalf of candidates for federal offices. The other, illustrated by the abortion and police interrogation cases, is an inclination, when holding a state law or practice invalid, to prescribe only a single form of corrective that will not offend constitutional standards.

A problem faced by the Court throughout much of its history, one that has again become acute, is the burden of an expanding caseload. In the last hundred years two statutory jurisdictional revisions brought temporary relief. The Circuit Courts of Appeals Act of 1891, by establishing a system of regional appellate courts, assured litigants of one opportunity for review without resort to the Supreme Court. The JUDICIARY ACT OF 1925, sponsored by the Justices themselves and promoted by Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, made discretionary review by WRIT OF CERTIORARI, instead of APPEAL as of right, the normal mode of access to the Supreme Court.

Each solution, however, has in time become part of the problem. With thirteen courts of appeals, and the burgeoning of federal statutory law, there is a growing incidence of conflicting decisions calling for review. Moreover, the disposition of petitions for certiorari has occupied an increasing amount of the Justices' time, with more than 4,000 filed each term. Of these, approximately 175 are granted and the cases decided with full opinion after oral argument.

A study group appointed under the auspices of the Federal Judicial Center reported in 1972 that the caseload was reaching the saturation point. Certain ameliorative measures had already been taken. The normal time allowed for oral argument had been reduced from an hour to a half hour for each side. The number of law CLERKS had been increased in stages from one to four for each Justice. The study group expressed disquiet at what it viewed as a bureaucratic movement, and recommended the creation of a national court of appeals to review decisions that warranted review but not necessarily by the Supreme Court. Others proposed variations on this plan, notably one or more courts of appeals having specialized jurisdiction, in tax or criminal or regulatory cases. Sixty years after the 1925 act, the problem has not been resolved. And yet without adequate time for reflection, collegial discussion, critical scrutiny, mutual accommodation, and persuasive exposition, the Court cannot function at its best.

At its best, the Court can recall the legal profession and the people to an appreciation of their constitutional heritage, by translating the ideals and practices embodied in an eighteenth-century charter of the Enlightenment into the realities of a modern industrial democracy.

PAUL A. FREUND
(1986)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

CONGRESSIONAL QUARTERLY 1981 The Supreme Court and Its Work. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly.

FREUND, PAUL A. 1961 The Supreme Court of the United States. Cleveland and New York: Meridian Books.

FREUND, PAUL A. and SCHMIDT, BENNO C., JR. 1984 The Judiciary and Responsible Government, 1910–1921.

FRIEDMAN, LEON and ISRAEL, FRED L., eds. 1969–1978 The Justices of the United States Supreme Court, 1789–1969. 5 Vols. New York: Chelsea House.

LEWIS, ANTHONY 1964 Gideon's Trumpet. New York: Random House.

POLLAK, LOUIS H., ed. 1966 The Constitution and the Supreme Court: A Documentary History. 2 Vols. Cleveland: World Publishing Co.

SWINDLER, WILLIAM F. 1970 Court and Constitution in the Twentieth Century: The New Legality, 1932–1968. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

WARREN, CHARLES 1926 The Supreme Court in United States History. 2 Vols. Boston: Little, Brown.

WESTIN, ALAN, ed. 1961 The Supreme Court: Views from Inside. New York: Norton.

SUPREME COURT
(Role in American Government)

The Supreme Court is the only court in the United States whose existence is mandated by the Constitution, yet the Constitution designates no number of judges for the Supreme Court and sets no qualifications for judicial service. So far as the Constitution is concerned, the Supreme Court could as readily consist of two or of twenty-two judges, rather than of nine as has been the case since 1870. And so undemanding is the Constitution in setting qualifications for appointment to the Supreme Court that its members could consist entirely of persons not qualified to serve in either House of Congress, for which at least a few minimum standards of eligibility (of age and of CITIZENSHIP) are constitutionally prescribed. The Constitution speaks simply to the vesting of the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES in "one supreme court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," but it leaves much else to discretion and a great deal to chance.

The role of the Supreme Court in American government is much like this overall. Some impressions of what the Court's role was meant to be can be gained from what the Constitution says and from the immediate history of 1789, as well as from the categories of JURISDICTION assigned to the Court by Article III. But much of that role is also the product of custom and of practice about which the Constitution itself is silent.

The constitutional text itself suggests several ways of describing the Supreme Court's role, in conformity with Article III's prescriptions of the Court's jurisdiction. The useful jurisdictional distinctions are of four principal kinds, each providing some insight into what the Court was originally expected to do.

First mentioned is the Supreme Court's jurisdiction as a trial court, an ORIGINAL JURISDICTION invocable by certain parties in particular (states and representatives of foreign states) but by no one else. Second is that branch of its appellate jurisdiction applicable also solely because of who the parties are, irrespective of the nature of the dispute between them. Third is the Court's appellate jurisdiction that attaches solely because the case involves a federal statute or treaty of the United States, or arises under ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME LAW, without regard to who the parties may be and whether or not any constitutional question may be involved. Finally, the Court may exercise an appellate jurisdiction over "all cases arising under [the] Constitution," a phrase construed broadly to include any case in which the outcome may be affected by a question of constitutional law. It is the application of this phrase, of course, that tends to fix the Supreme Court's most important role, but as can be seen from the foregoing larger enumeration, it is not by any means the sole business to which the Court was expected to attend.

The role of the Supreme Court as a court of original jurisdiction has been useful but minor. Ordinarily, the Court's small complement of original jurisdiction has merely expedited its speedy examination of certain legal issues raised by states against other states (typically involving boundary or interstate river claims) or against the national government, as in OREGON V. MITCHELL—a 1970 decision holding unconstitutional one portion of an act of Congress that sought to override state voting age restrictions. Because Congress can provide for expedited Supreme Court review of cases originating in other courts, however, it is doubtful whether this feature of Article III has been terribly vital. Its one theoretical importance may be that the original jurisdiction it provides to the states is guaranteed against elimination by Congress—for unlike the Court's appellate jurisdiction, its original jurisdiction is not subject to the "exceptions" clause of Article III.

Dwarfing the Court's role as a court of original jurisdiction is its much larger and more familiar role as the ultimate appellate court in the United States for a vastly greater number and variety of disputes, although the Court is not obliged to review all such cases and in fact hears but a small fraction of those eligible for review. The cases eligible for review, some on APPEAL and a larger number on petition for a WRIT OF CERTIORARI, are divisible into two principal categories: those in which the character of the contesting parties makes the case reviewable, and those in which the nature of the legal issue raised by the case makes the case reviewable.

In the first category of cases within the Court's appellate jurisdiction there are many that raise no constitutional questions and indeed need not raise any kind of federal question. As these cases are within the Court's power of review solely because of the parties, regardless of the subject in dispute between them, they may involve very ordinary legal issues (for example, of contract, tort, or property law) as to which there is no special expertise in the Supreme Court and no obvious reason why they need be considered there. And in practice, they are not reviewed.

Part of the original interest in providing the Supreme Court as the ultimate appellate tribunal in the United States reflected the Framers' desire to provide an appellate court for litigants likely to be sued in hostile jurisdictions—cases, for instance, arising in state courts which nonresident defendants might fear would be inclined to favor local parties as against outsiders. Since the furnishing of lower federal courts (to hear such cases) was left entirely optional with Congress to provide or not provide as it liked, the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction even from state court diversity cases was directly provided for in Article III. Nonetheless, in the course of 200 years the felt need for such cases to be heard in the Supreme Court has never materialized—although such cases remain a staple of lower federal court jurisdiction. (Efforts in Congress to repeal this entire category of lower federal court jurisdiction are more than a half-century old, but they have been only partly successful, largely in restricting such cases to those involving sums in excess of $10,000.) In the meantime, however, the Supreme Court does not review such cases and, by act of Congress, it is under no obligation to take them. This particular anticipated role of the Supreme Court, as an active court in hearing appeals in ordinary diversity cases presenting no federal question and implicating no general interest of the United States, has never been significant in fact.

In contrast, the second branch of the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction—identified not by the parties but by the nature of the legal questions—remains intensely active. Indeed, the principal role the Court plays today as an appellate court undoubtedly arises almost entirely from this subject matter assignment of appellate jurisdiction of cases involving disputes of national law. In these cases the Court interprets acts of Congress and treaties of the United States as well as the Constitution as the ultimate source of governing law in the United States.

Specifically, these cases may raise any of the following four kinds of basic conflicts: conflicts between claims relying upon mutually exclusive interpretations of concededly valid acts of Congress or treaties of the United States; between constitutional claims of state power and claims of federal power (FEDERALISM conflicts); between constitutional claims by Congress and claims by the President or claims by the judiciary (SEPARATION OF POWERS conflicts); or between constitutional claims of personal right and claims of either state or of national power (personal rights conflicts). A principal function of Article III was to establish the Supreme Court as the ultimate national court of appeals to provide finality and consistency of result in the interpretation and application of all federal and constitutional law in the United States, within the full range of these four fundamental and enduring concerns.

For nearly the first hundred years (1789–1875), almost all appeals to the Supreme Court on such federal questions as these came from state courts rather than from lower federal courts. Not until 1875, in the aftermath of the CIVIL WAR, were lower federal courts given any significant original (trial) jurisdiction over private civil cases arising under acts of Congress or treaties of the United States. Since 1875, moreover, many federal question cases still proceed from state courts to the Supreme Court, because reliance on some federal law or on the Constitution often arises only in answer to some claim filed in a state court and thus emerges only by way of defense rather than as the basis of complaint.

The fact that this arrangement of the Court's appellate jurisdiction places the Supreme Court in appellate command over all other courts in the United States in all federal question cases is exactly what makes the Supreme Court supreme. In constitutional matters, for instance, this fact is the basis of Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON's observation, in speaking of the Court, that "[w]e are not final because we are infallible, but we are infallible only because we are final," that is, superior in constitutional authority to review the determinations of other courts and in turn unreviewable by any other court. It likewise animates the 1907 observation by CHARLES EVANS HUGHES (later Chief Justice of the United States). "We are under a Constitution," Hughes acknowledged, "but the Constitution is what the judges say it is," since it is their view and, most important, the Supreme Court's view, that ultimately controls in each case. And even when no constitutional issue is present, but the issue is how an act of Congress shall be interpreted and applied, the finality of the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction is equally pivotal; it is the Americanized version of Bishop Hoadley's observation in 1717, in reference to the power of the English courts in interpreting acts of Parliament. "Whoever hath an absolute authority to interpret any written or spoken laws," Hoadley observed, "it is he who is truly the lawgiver, to all intents and purposes, and not the person who first spoke or wrote them." From an early time Americans seem to have believed in the wisdom of reposing in the courts—and ultimately in the Supreme Court—the responsibility of substantive constitutional review, and it seems clear (despite some scholars' qualified doubts) that the Supreme Court was indeed meant to exercise that responsibility. (See JUDICIAL REVIEW.) It is unquestionably this role of substantive constitutional review that marks the special position of the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court's decisions in constitutional cases may be roughly divided into three kinds, according to which its role in American government is occasionally assessed or described. The three kinds of decisions are these: legitimizing, braking, and catalytic.

A decision is said to be legitimizing whenever the Court examines any act of government on constitutional grounds and finds it not wanting. In holding that the act as applied is in fact authorized by the Constitution and not offensive to any of its provisions (for example, the BILL OF RIGHTS or the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT), the Court thus vouches for its constitutional legitimacy. A decision may be called a braking decision whenever its immediate effect is necessarily to arrest the further application of an act of Congress because the Court holds the act either inapplicable or unconstitutional, or whenever OBITER DICTA accompanying the decision serve notice of constitutional barriers in the way of similar legislation. Finally, a decision may be called catalytic when its immediate practical effect is to compel highly significant action of a sort not previously forthcoming from national or state government.

A significant and controversial example of the legitimizing sort is PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896), the case sustaining certain state racial SEGREGATION laws as not inconsistent with the Fourteenth Amendment, despite intense argument to the contrary. A modern example of the same sort may be FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980), a case sustaining a limited form of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in favor of certain minority contractors as not inconsistent with the Fifth Amendment, despite intense argument as well. In each case, the Court considered a previously untested kind of race-related law. In each, the Supreme Court's decision could be said effectively to have impressed the operative law with a judicial imprimatur of constitutional legitimacy, given that in each case the challenged statute was sustained.

Examples of the braking sort may be found in the Court's early NEW DEAL decisions holding Congress unauthorized by the COMMERCE CLAUSE to supplant state laws with its own much more sweeping and detailed ECONOMIC REGULATIONS. In this instance, the critical decisions of the Court forced a momentary pause in the onrush of legislation, compelling more deliberate attention to what the nation had been and what it meant to become. As it happened, the braking effect of these cases was eventually overcome, but it is nonetheless true that in the meantime the position taken by the Court played a sobering role. In a few other instances, the braking effect of equivalent cases was overcome by formal amendment of the Constitution itself: the SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT, for instance, was adopted principally to overcome the effect of the Court's decision in POLLOCK V. FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST (1895); the Thirteenth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment displaced the Court's decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857); and the TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT displaced the decision in Oregon v. Mitchell. These reactions are by themselves not an indication that the Court has erred, of course, since the Constitution itself separates the role of the Court from the formal processes of constitutional modification. (See AMENDING PROCESS.) Any decision in the Supreme Court holding a statute unconstitutional may provide occasion to activate the AMENDING PROCESS provided for in Article V. Amendments by themselves are not proof that the decisions they effectively overrule were necessarily poorly conceived. They may, rather, but mark new Cambrian rings in what is meant to be a living constitution.

An example of a catalytic decision would be one holding certain prison conditions to be so inadequate as to constitute a form of CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT, such that either the prisoners must be released (which public authorities are loath to do), or large sums must be raised and less congested prisons must be built. The change-forcing nature of the Court's catalytic decision is but descriptive of its practical implications. By itself it thus carries no suggestion that the Court acted from impulse rather than from obligation, in ruling as it did. The same observation may apply equally to the other two categories of decisions.

Thus, in the "legitimizing" decision there is no necessary insinuation that the measure that has been sustained is on that account also necessarily desirable or well-taken legislation; such questions are ordinarily regarded as no proper part of the judicial business. Adjudicated constitutionality properly vouches solely for an act's consistency with the Constitution, which consistency may still leave much to be desired, depending upon one's own point of view and one's feeling of constitutional adequacy. Similarly, it does not follow that an act's adjudicated unconstitutionality necessarily implies its undesirability or, indeed, that there would be anything terribly wrong were the Constitution amended so that similar legislation might subsequently be reenacted and sustained. It means merely that the act does not pass muster under the Constitution as it is and as the judges are oath-bound to apply it until it is altered.

So also with catalytic decisions: such forced change as a particular decision may produce is required simply to bring the conduct of government back within constitutional lines as they are, and not as they need be. As conscientiously applied by the Court, the Constitution thus speaks to such constitutional boundaries as were put in place sometime in the past, from a considered political judgment of the time that such boundaries would be important. The judgment is wholly an inherited one, however, and contemplates the possibility of amendment to cast off such restraints as subsequent extraordinary majorities may find unendurable. Viewed in this way, the Constitution is a device by means of which past generations signal to subsequent generations their cumulative assessment of what sorts of restraints simple majoritarianism needs most. The Supreme Court is the ultimate judicial means by which the integrity of those restraints is secured against the common tendency to think them ill-conceived or obsolete, sustaining them when pressed by proper litigants with suitable standing, until instructed by amendment to acknowledge the change. It is a signal responsibility and an unusual power—one which few other national supreme courts have been given.

On the other hand, the phrases "legitimizing," "braking," and "catalytic" are not always used so descriptively, however well they capture the by-products of the Court's work. Rather, they are sometimes used prescriptively, and thus in an entirely different sense. In this different usage they presume to provide a more jurisprudential blueprint for the role of the Supreme Court: that it is appropriate for the Court actively to serve these three functions politically as it were, and to involve the Constitution only instrumentally in their service. Employed in this different locution, they are phrases used to express faith in a specific kind of judicial activism, according to which the right role of the Court is to identify the needs of efficient and humane government and to adjust its own adjudications accordingly.

In this view, it is in fact the proper role of the Supreme Court to legitimate (by holding constitutional) such laws as circumstances persuade it ought not be disapproved, to brake (by adverse construction or by holding unconstitutional) such developments as it determines to have been precipitously taken or otherwise to have been ill-advised, and to catalyze (by artful action) such changes it deems highly desirable but unlikely to be forthcoming from government unless the Court so requires. The persuasive justification for the Supreme Court lies in what it can do best as a distinct institution, in this view, and only secondarily in adhering to the Constitution. And what the Supreme Court can do better than others is to compensate for such gaps as it finds in the Constitution or in the political process, and to take such measured steps as it can to repair them. Accordingly, the more appropriate role of the Supreme Court is to conduct itself institutionally as best it can to contribute actively to a better political quality of life in the United States: in deciding which cases to hear, when to hear them, on what grounds to decide them, and how to make them come out in ways most in keeping with these three vital functions of granting legitimacy to the good, putting brakes on the bad, and compelling such changes as are overdue.

As an original jurisprudence of proposed judicial role, this perspective on the Supreme Court has had considerable occasional support. In the concrete, moreover, there is good reason to believe that certain Justices—probably a nontrivial number—have embraced it in selected aspects of their own work. At the least, there are a large number of constitutional decisions that appear to reflect its view of what judges should seek to do, as indeed some Justices have virtually absorbed it as an articulate feature of proper judicial review; their decisions seem sometimes to be based on little else.

Still, and for obvious reasons, it remains deeply problematic, for at bottom it would have the judges struggle against the obligation of their oaths. Insofar as cases such as Plessy or Fullilove were to any extent self-conscious efforts by a Supreme Court majority simply to legitimate race-based arrangements it thought desirable, and not decisions reporting a difficult judicial conclusion respecting the lack of constitutional restrictions on the legislative acts at issue, for instance, it is doubtful whether the "legitimacy" thus established was appropriate or, indeed, constitutionally authorized. Likewise, insofar as the early New Deal cases were to any extent simply a deliberate institutional attempt by the majority Justices to arrest what they thought to be ill-advised varieties of market intervention, and not decisions reflecting an attentive interpretation respecting the limits of Congress's commerce power, it is debatable whether the "braking" thus applied was appropriate or authorized. So, too, with such decisions as may be catalytic, but which may be driven more by a judicial desire to see changes made than by a mere firm resolve that the Constitution shall be obeyed.

Without doubt, however, the tendency to urge the Supreme Court to compose its interpretations of the Constitution in subordination to allegedly significant social tasks remains widespread. Moreover, the malleability of many constitutional clauses invites it, and the political staffing mechanism (provided by Article III) for selecting the judges may appear obliquely to legitimate it. The tendency to rationalize its propriety is deeply entrenched.

Even so, the conscious treatment of constitutional clauses as but textual or pretextual occasions for judicial legitimation, braking, or social catalysis, does tend to pit the Court against itself in its disjunction of fundamentally incompatible roles. The resulting tension has split the Court virtually from the beginning. It divides it even now: between these two visions of the Court, as a professional court first of all or as a political court first of all, lie two centuries of unsteady swings of actual judicial review. The history of the Supreme Court in this respect but reiterates a classic antinomy in American constitutional law. It doubtless reflects the conflicts Americans tend to sense within themselves—as to what role they genuinely wish this Court to fulfill.

With certain highly notable exceptions (including West Germany, Japan, Australia, and most recently Canada), the written CONSTITUTIONS of most modern nation-states serve merely as each nation's explanation of itself as a government. Such a constitution typically presents a full plan of government, a statement of its purposes and powers, and an ample declaration of rights. Yet, unlike the Constitution of the United States, such a constitution cannot be invoked by litigants and does not require or even permit courts of law to use it as against which all other laws may be examined. It is, rather, a nonjusticiable document. It is intended to be taken seriously (at least this is the case generally), but only in the political sense that legislative and executive authorities are meant to reconcile their actions with the constitution at the risk of possible popular disaffection should they stray too far from what the constitution provides. Whether the authorities have thus strayed, however, and what consequences shall follow if they have, is not deemed to be the appropriate business of courts of law.

The enormous distinction of American constitutional law has thus rested in the very different and exceptional role of the judiciary, from the most unprepossessing county courts through the hierarchy of the entire federal court system. The unique role of the Supreme Court has been its own role as the ultimate appellate court in reference to that judiciary, most critically in all constitutional cases. The arrangement thus established does not lessen the original obligation of other government officials separately to take care that their own actions are consistent with the Constitution, but it is meant to provide—as effectively as human institutions can arrange—an additional and positive check. When official action is not consistent with the Constitution, as ultimately determined under the Supreme Court's authority, the courts are given both the power and the obligation to intercede: to interpose such authority as they have and to provide such redress as appears to be due. Judged even by international standards, this is an ample role. It is not this role that now appears fairly open to question, moreover, but rather the definition of role that would assume something more or accept something less.

WILLIAM W. VAN ALSTYNE
(1986)

Bibliography

ABRAHAM, HENRY J. 1986 The Judicial Process, 5th ed. New York: Oxford University Press.

AGRESTO, JOHN 1984 The Supreme Court and Constitutional Democracy. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill.

COX, ARCHIBALD 1976 The Role of the Supreme Court in American Government. New York: Oxford University Press.

ELY, JOHN HART 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

FREUND, PAUL 1961 The Supreme Court of the United States. Cleveland, Ohio: World Publishing Company.

HOROWITZ, DONALD L. 1977 The Courts and Social Policy. Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution.

JACKSON, ROBERT H. 1955 The Supreme Court in the American System of Government. New York: Harper & Row.

MASON, ALPHEUS THOMAS 1979 The Supreme Court from Taft to Burger, 3d ed. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

MCCLOSKEY, ROBERT G. 1960 The American Supreme Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

WOLFE, CHRISTOPHER 1986 The Rise of Modern Judicial Review. New York: Basic Books.

SUPREME COURT, 1789–1801

On January 8, 1801, twelve days before President JOHN ADAMS appointed JOHN MARSHALL as Chief Justice, a Jeffersonian newspaper reported: "JOHN JAY, after having thru' decay of age become incompetent to discharge the duties of Governor, has been appointed to the sinecure of Chief Justice of the United States. That the Chief Justiceship is a sinecure needs no other evidence than that in one case the duties were discharged by one person who resided at the same time in England, and by another during a year's residence in France." The one in France was OLIVER ELLSWORTH, sent there by President Adams as a special ambassador to negotiate peace. Ellsworth had recently resigned, and Jay, whose appointment as Ellsworth's successor had been confirmed by the Senate, had himself been the first Chief Justice, whom President GEORGE WASHINGTON had sent to England to negotiate a treaty that bore Jay's name. The chief justiceship was no sinecure: although the Supreme Court then met for only two short terms a year, the Justices also served as circuit court judges, and riding circuit was extremely arduous. When Jay was offered the position again, he declined it because of the circuit responsibilities and because the Court had neither "the energy, weight and dignity" necessary for it to support the national government nor "the public confidence and respect."

Jay's judgment was harsh although the Court did have problems, some of its own making. All the Justices were Federalists; their decisions EN BANC or on circuit seemed partisan—pro-Administration, pro-English, or procreditor—and they presided at trials under the infamous Sedition Act, whose constitutionality they affirmed. But the Court was not responsible for most of its difficulties. It had no official reporter (ALEXANDER J. DALLAS's unofficial reports first appeared in 1798) and the press publicized only a few of the Court's decisions. The public knew little about the Court, and even members of its own bar were unfamiliar with its decisions. Nothing better symbolizes the nation's neglect of the Court than the fact that when the United States government moved to Washington, D.C., in late 1800, the Court had been forgotten. Not only did it lack a building; it had no courtroom. Congress hastily provided a small committee room in the basement of the Senate wing of the Capitol for the Court to meet.

The Court's beginnings were hardly more auspicious, however distinguished its membership. At its first term in February 1790 it had nothing to do except admit attorneys to its bar, and it shortly adjourned. It began as a court without a reporter, litigants, a docket, appeals, or decisions to make. It was chiefly an appellate court whose APPELLATE JURISDICTION scarcely matched the breadth of the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES stated in Article III. Congress in the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 had authorized the Court to review state court decisions that denied claims based on federal law, including the Constitution. Review was not authorized when the state court upheld a claim of federal right. The system of appellate jurisdiction thus permitted the Supreme Court to maintain federal law's supremacy but not its uniform interpretation. The Court's review of civil decisions of the lower federal courts was limited to cases involving more than $2,000 in controversy, and it could not review criminal cases from those courts. Congress had stingily authorized the Court to hear cases in its appellate capacity in order to keep it weak, to prevent centralization of judicial powers, to preserve the relative importance of state courts, and to insulate the Court from many matters that concerned ordinary citizens. For its first two years it heard no cases, and it made no substantive decisions until 1793. Its docket never got crowded. Dallas reported less than seventy cases for the pre-Marshall Court, and fewer than ten percent of them involved constitutional law. The Court was then first a COMMON LAW court, second a court of ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME JURISDICTION.

Although its members were able, the pre-Marshall Court had difficulty attracting and keeping them. When Marshall became Chief Justice, only WILLIAM CUSHING of the original six Justices appointed by Washington remained. Robert H. Harrison, one of the original six, was confirmed but declined appointment, preferring instead the chancellorship of Maryland. JAMES IREDELL accepted Harrison's place, so that the first Court consisted of Chief Justice Jay and Justices Cushing, JOHN BLAIR, JOHN RUTLEDGE, JAMES WILSON, and Iredell. Rutledge performed his circuit duties but had never attended a session of the Court when he resigned after two years to become chief justice of South Carolina. CHARLES C. PINCKNEY and Edward Rutledge declined appointment to John Rutledge's seat, preferring to serve in their state legislature. THOMAS JOHNSON accepted that seat but resigned it in less than two years because circuit riding was too strenuous. WILLIAM PATERSON succeeded him. The February 1794 term was Jay's last. That he reentered New York politics after negotiating JAY'S TREATY says something about the Court's prestige at the time. So too does the fact that ALEXANDER HAMILTON preferred private practice to the chief justiceship. At that point, John Rutledge, who had quit the Court, applied for the post vacated by Jay. Washington appointed Rutledge, who attended the August 1795 term of the Court when it decided only two cases. The Senate, having reconvened, rejected him because of his opposition to Jay's Treaty. Washington offered the chief justiceship to PATRICK HENRY who declined it. The President then named Justice Cushing, whom the Senate confirmed; but he too declined, preferring to remain Associate Justice. In 1796, Oliver Ellsworth became Chief Justice but quit after four years. John Blair retired early in 1796 and Washington again had to fill a vacancy on the Court. After EDMUND RANDOLPH refused the position, SAMUEL CHASE accepted. In 1798, Wilson became the first Justice to die in office. RICHARD PETERS refused to be considered for the position, and John Marshall also declined. Adams then appointed BUSHROD WASHINGTON, and after Iredell died in 1798, he appointed ALFRED MOORE, who resigned within five years. When Ellsworth resigned and Jay declined reappointment, even though the Senate confirmed him, Adams turned to Marshall. The rapid turnover in personnel during the Court's first decade did not ease its work or enhance its reputation.

Jeffersonians grumbled about the Court's Federalist constitutional theories, but Jay kept his Court out of politics and established its independence from the other branches of the government. That achievement and the Court's identification of its task as safeguarding the supreme law of the land kept the Court a viable institution, despite its many problems during the first decade, and laid the groundwork for the achievements of the MARSHALL COURT.

Late in 1790, Virginia's legislature denounced as unconstitutional the bill for national assumption of state debts. Washington allowed Hamilton to send a copy of the Virginia resolves to Jay and to inquire whether the various branches of the government should employ their "collective weight . . . in exploding [Virginia's STRICT CONSTRUCTION] principles." Hamilton warned that Virginia had shown "the first symptom of a spirit which must either be killed or it will kill the Constitution of the United States." However, Jay, who privately advised Washington and drafted his PROCLAMATION OF NEUTRALITY, recognized the difference between a judicial pronouncement and an extrajudicial one. The Court, strongly believing in the principle of SEPARATION OF POWERS, would not express ex officio opinions except in judicial cases before it. Jay calmly declined the executive's invitation.

Similar principles motivated the Justices when confronted by Congress's Invalid Pensioners' Act of 1792 which required the circuit courts to pass on the pension applications of disabled veterans, subject to review by the secretary of war and Congress. Justices Wilson and Blair together with Judge Peters on circuit in the district of Pennsylvania, having refused to pass on an application from one Hayburn, explained their conduct in a letter to the President. They could not proceed because first, the business directed by the statute was not judicial in nature, there being no constitutional authority for it, and second, because the possible revision of the Court's judgment by the other branches of government would be "radically inconsistent with the independence" of the judiciary. In their circuits, Jay, Cushing, and Iredell similarly explained that a judicial decision must be a final decision. HAYBURN'S CASE (1792), which was not really a "case" and in which nothing was judicially decided, was important because the Court, in Wilson's words, affirmed "a principle important to freedom," that the judicial branch must be independent of the other branches.

Similarly, Jay established another principle vital to the Court's independent, judicial, and nonpolitical character when he declined Washington's request for an ADVISORY OPINION. That request arose out of apparent conflicts between American treaty obligations to France and the Proclamation of Neutrality. The French commissioned privateers in American ports and established prize courts to condemn vessels captured by those privateers. Washington sought the Court's opinion on twenty-nine questions involving international law and treaty interpretation, in connection with the French practices. Jay, relying again on the principle of separation of powers, observed that the Court should not "extra-judicially" decide questions that might come before it in litigation. Thus, by preserving its purely judicial character, the Court was free to decide some of those questions when real cases posed them. From the beginning, the Court staked its power and prestige on its special relationship to the supreme law of the land, which it safeguarded, expounded, and symbolized.

The pre-Marshall Court also exercised the power of JUDICIAL REVIEW. The Justices on circuit quickly held state acts unconstitutional for violating the supreme law of the land. Jay and Cushing on circuit in the district of Connecticut held that that state, by adversely affecting debts owed to British creditors, had violated the treaty of peace with Britain; Iredell in Georgia and Paterson in South Carolina made similar decisions. The Justices held that United States treaties were superior to state laws. The Supreme Court confronted the issue in WARE V. HYLTON (1796). With Iredell alone dissenting, the Court rejected the arguments of John Marshall, making his only appearance before the Justices, as counsel for the debtor interests of Virginia. He opposed "those who wish to impair the sovereignty of Virginia" and contended first that the Constitution had not authorized the Court to question the validity of state statutes and, second, that a treaty could not annul them. Seriatim opinions by Chase, Paterson, Wilson, and Cushing held otherwise.

In Clarke v. Harwood (1797) the Court ruled that Ware "settled" the question before it. Clarke was the Court's first decision against the validity of a state act in a case arising on a WRIT OF ERROR to a state court under section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1789. Section 25 authorized the Court to reverse or affirm state decisions that denied rights claimed under United States treaties. Maryland's high court, relying on a state statute sequestering debts owed to British creditors, had barred a claim based on the treaty of peace with Britain. By reversing the Maryland court, the Supreme Court in effect voided the state act. However, the Court rarely heard cases on a writ of error to a state court. Indeed, it had not decided its first such case until shortly before Clarke. In Olney v. Arnold (1796) the Court had reversed a Rhode Island decision that misconstrued a revenue act of Congress. The Court's power of reviewing state decisions under Section 25 did not become controversial until 1814. (See MARTIN V. HUNTER'S LESSEE, 1816.) During the Court's first decade, judicial review of state legislation was uncontested, and it was exercised.

On circuit the Justices also struck down state acts as violating the CONTRACT CLAUSE of the Constitution. The first such decision occurred in 1792 in CHAMPION AND DICKASON V. CASEY, which voided a Rhode Island state law. Given the hullaballoo in that state when its own judiciary was suspected of having voided a state act in TREVETT V. WEEDEN (1787), the meek acceptance of the 1792 decision showed the legitimacy of judicial review over the states.

In HYLTON V. UNITED STATES (1796) the Court for the first time determined the constitutionality of an act of Congress, ruling that an EXCISE on carriages, not being a DIRECT TAX, was valid even if not apportioned among the states. Those hoping for the Court to hold the federal excise unconstitutional were Jeffersonians; they did not then or at any time during the Court's first decade challenge the legitimacy of the Court's power to refuse to enforce an unconstitutional statute. Until the debate on the repeal of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801 (see JUDICIARY ACTS OF 1802), scarcely anyone opposed judicial review, whether over state or over congressional legislation. Hayburn's Case in 1792 was misunderstood throughout the nation. Not only did Attorney General Randolph believe that the Court had annulled an act of Congress; so did Congress. The House established an investigating committee, "this being the first instance in which a Court of Justice had declared a law of Congress unconstitutional." Jeffersonians gleefully praised the Justices and hoped the Court would extend the precedent by holding unconstitutional other congressional legislation that promoted Hamilton's economic programs. Later, Jeffersonians in Sedition Act trials sought to persuade the Justices on circuit that they should declare the statute void. Repeatedly during the first decade, bills arose in Congress that provoked members in both houses to state that the Court should and would hold them unconstitutional. The way to the doctrine of judicial review announced in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) was well paved, and the opposition to the Court's opinion did not derive from its assumption of a power to void an act of Congress.

Another major theme in the work of the Court during its first decade was nationalism. Once again, the Marshall Court built on what the Jay and Ellsworth Courts had first shaped. The early Courts helped vindicate the national character of the United States government, maintain the supremacy of the nation over the states, and keep the states from undermining the new constitutional system. On circuit duty the Justices frequently lectured federal GRAND JURIES, inculcating doctrines from THE FEDERALIST, and these grand jury charges were well publicized in the newspapers. In one of his charges, Jay, in 1790, having declared, "We had become a Nation," explained why national tribunals became necessary for the interpretation and execution of national law, especially in a nation accustomed only to state courts and state policies. Circuit court opinions striking down state laws in violation of the contract clause or federal treaties preached nationalism and national supremacy. Many of the criminal prosecutions before the federal circuit courts during the first decade were connected with national suppression of the WHISKEY REBELLION and the FRIES REBELLION. Similarly, prosecutions under the Sedition Act were intended to vindicate the reputations of Congress and the President.

The development of a FEDERAL COMMON LAW OF CRIMES, expanding the jurisdiction of the national courts, fit the nationalist pattern. Whether the courts could try nonstatutory offenses was a question that first arose in Henfield's case (1793). Wilson maintained that an American citizen serving on a French privateer commissioned in an American port and attacking ships of England, with whom the United States was at peace, had committed an indictable offense under the Proclamation of Neutrality, the law of nations, and the treaty with England, even though Congress had not made his act a crime.

The same nationalist pattern unified several of the Court's opinions in cases dealing with various issues. In CHISHOLM V. GEORGIA (1793) the Court's holding, that its jurisdiction extended to suits against a state by citizens of another state, was founded on nationalist principles as well as on the text of Article III. Wilson, for example, began with the principles that the people of the United States form a nation, making ridiculous the "haughty notions of state independence, state SOVEREIGNTY, and state supremacy." "As to the purposes of the Union," he said, "therefore, Georgia is not a sovereign state." Jay's opinion also stressed "the national character" of the United States and the "inexpediency" of allowing state courts to decide questions that involved the performance of national treaties. The denunciation of the Court for its "consolidation of the Union" and its "annihilation of the sovereignty of the States" led to the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT, which was intended to nullify Chisholm.

In Glass v. Sloop Betsy (1794) the Court supported the government's neutrality policy by ruling that France, after capturing a neutral ship, could not hold or award her as a prize in an American port. Only the United States courts could determine the lawfulness of prizes brought into its ports, and no foreign nation controlled its admiralty law or could subvert American rights under international law. In Penhallow v. Doane (1795) the Court resolved an old dispute over the ownership of a prize. One party's claims relied on decisions of a New Hampshire court, the other's on a decision of a prize court established by the old Congress of the Confederation. Paterson, in the Supreme Court's principal opinion, upheld the lower federal courts, which had decided against the state court and claimed jurisdiction. No nation, he said, had recognized the states as sovereign for the purpose of awarding prizes. The old Congress had been the supreme council of the nation and center of the Union, he claimed, whose sovereignty was approved by the people of America and recognized by foreign nations. The federal courts succeeded to that sovereignty in prize matters. New Hampshire angrily remonstrated against the "destruction" of its sovereignty but the Court's ruling prevailed.

Its decision in Hylton v. United States gave life to the government's revenue powers. When the Court upheld federal treaties as paramount to state laws, in Ware v. Hylton (1796), Chase, in the principal opinion for the Court, indulged in fanciful nationalism when declaring, "There can be no limitation on the power of the people of the United States. By their authority the State Constitutions were made."

Other notable cases of the first decade were VAN HORNE'S LESSEE V. DORRANCE (1794) and CALDER V. BULL (1798), in which the Court laid the foundation for the judicial doctrine of VESTED RIGHTS, which it developed further in contract clause and HIGHER LAW decisions during Marshall's chief justiceship. Although the Court was left out of the planning for the new national capital, it had been enunciating doctrines—of judicial review, national supremacy, and vested rights—that helped shape the United States and would in time make the judicial branch of government impossible to ignore.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

CURRIE, DAVID P. 1981 The Constitution in the Supreme Court: 1789–1801. University of Chicago Law Review 48: 819–885.

GOEBEL, JULIUS 1971 Antecedents and Beginnings. Vol. I of the Oliver Wendell Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court, ed. Paul Freund. New York: Macmillan.

HAINES, CHARLES GROVE 1944 The Role of the Supreme Court in American Government and Politics, 1789–1835. Berkeley: University of California Press.

HENDERSON, DWIGHT F. 1971 Courts for a New Nation. Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press.

WARREN, CHARLES 1923 The Supreme Court in United States History. Vol. I. Boston: Little, Brown.

SUPREME COURT AT WORK

In its first decade, the Supreme Court had little business, frequent turnover in personnel, no chambers or staff, no fixed customs, and no institutional identity. When the Court initially convened on February 1, 1790, only Chief Justice JOHN JAY and two other Justices arrived at the Exchange Building in New York City. They adjourned until the next day, when Justice JOHN BLAIR arrived. With little to do other than admit attorneys to practice before its bar, the Court concluded its first sessions in less than two weeks. When the capital moved from New York City to Philadelphia in the winter of 1790, the Court met in Independence Hall and in the Old City Hall for ten years, until the capital again moved to Washington, D.C. Most of the first Justices' time, however, was spent riding circuit. Under the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789, they were required twice a year to hold CIRCUIT COURT, in the company of district judges, to try some types of cases and to hear appeals from the federal district courts. Hence, the Justices resided primarily in their circuits rather than in Washington and often felt a greater allegiance to their circuits than to the Supreme Court.

When the capital moved to Washington, D.C., in 1800, no courtroom was provided. Between 1801 and 1809, the Justices convened in various rooms in the basement of the Capitol. In 1810, they shared a room in the capitol with the Orphans' Court of the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. This room was destroyed when the British burned the Capitol on August 24, 1814, and for two years, the Court met in the Bell Tavern. In 1817, the Court moved back into the Capitol, holding sessions in a small dungeonlike room for two years. In 1819, it returned to its restored courtroom, where it met for almost half a century.

For most of the nineteenth century, the Justices resided in their circuits and stayed in boardinghouses during the Court's terms. Chief Justice ROGER BROOKE TANEY (1836–1864) was the first to reside in the Federal City, and as late as the 1880s most Justices did not maintain homes there. Lacking offices and sharing the law library of Congress, the Justices relied on a single clerk to answer correspondence, collect fees, and to locate boardinghouse rooms for them.

Coincident with the 1801 move into the Capitol, JOHN MARSHALL assumed the Chief Justiceship. During his thirty-four years on the Court, Marshall established regularized procedures and a tradition of collegiality. He saw to it that the Justices roomed in the same boardinghouse and, thereby, turned the disadvantage of transiency into strategic opportunity for achieving unanimity in decision making. After a day of hearing ORAL ARGUMENTS, the Justices would dine together, and around 7:00 p.m. they would discuss cases.

After 1860, the Court met upstairs in the old Senate Chamber, between the new chambers of the Senate and those of the House of Representatives. The Justices still had no offices or staff of their own. After the CIVIL WAR, however, the caseload steadily grew, the Court's terms lengthened, and the Justices deserted boardinghouses for fashionable hotels along Pennsylvania Avenue. Instead of dining together and discussing cases after dinner, they held CONFERENCES on Saturdays and announced decisions on Monday.

By the turn of the century, the Justices resided in the capitol and for the most part worked at home, where each had a library and employed a messenger and a secretary. The Court's collegial procedures had evolved into institutional norms based on majority rule. The CHIEF JUSTICE assumed a special role in scheduling and presiding over conferences and oral arguments. But the Court's deliberative process was firmly rooted in the Justices' interaction as equals. Each Justice was considered a sovereign in his or her own right, even though the Justices decided cases together and strove for institutional opinions.

After becoming Chief Justice in 1921, WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT persuaded four Justices to support his lobbying Congress for the construction of a building for the Court. Taft envisioned a marble temple symbolizing the modern Court's prestige and independence. Yet, when the building that houses the Court was completed in 1935, none of the sitting Justices moved in, although sessions and conferences were held there in the later years of the HUGHES COURT (1930–1941). Upon his appointment in 1937, HUGO L. BLACK was the first to move in, leading the way for President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's other appointees. Even when HARLAN FISKE STONE was elevated from Associate to Chief Justice, he still worked at home. The VINSON COURT (1946–1953) was the first to see all nine Justices regularly working in the Supreme Court building.

The marble temple stands for more than a symbol of the modern Court. Once again, the institutional life of the Court changed. As Taft hoped, the building buttressed the Court's prestige and reinforced the basic norms of secrecy, tradition, and collegiality that condition the Court's work. The Justices continued to function independently, but the work of the Court grew more bureaucratic. Along with the rising caseload in the decades following WORLD WAR II, the number of law clerks more than tripled and the number of other employees dramatically increased as well. The Justices in turn delegated more and incorporated modern office technology and managerial practices into their work. The WARREN COURT (1953–1969) started delivering opinions on any day of open session, and the BURGER COURT (1969–1986) moved conferences back to Fridays.

When POTTER STEWART joined the Court in 1958, he expected to find "one law firm with nine partners, if you will, the law clerks being the associates." But Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN told him, "No, you will find here it is like nine firms, sometimes practicing law against one another." Even today, each Justice and his or her staff works in rather secluded chambers with little of the direct daily interaction that occurs in some appellate courts. Nor do recent Justices follow FELIX FRANKFURTER's practice of sending clerks ("Felix's happy hotdogs") scurrying around the building to lobby other clerks and Justices.

A number of factors isolate the Justices, but most important is the caseload. The Justices, in Justice BYRON R. WHITE's view, "stay at arm's length" and rely on formal printed communications because the workload discourages them "from going from chamber to chamber to work things out." Each chamber averages about seven: the Justice, three to four law clerks, two secretaries, and a messenger. As managing chambers and supervising paperwork consumes more time, the Justices talk less to each other and read and write more memoranda and opinions. Each chamber now has a photocopying machine and four to five terminals for word processing and legal research.

Law CLERKS became central to the work of the Court. In 1882, Justice HORACE GRAY initiated the practice of hiring a "secretary" or law clerk. When OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR. succeeded Gray, he continued the practice, and other Justices gradually followed. By Chief Justice Stone's time it was well established for each Justice to have one clerk. During the chief justiceships of FRED M. VINSON and EARL WARREN, the number increased to two. In the 1970s, the number grew to three and to four. The number of secretaries likewise increased—initially, in place of adding clerks and, later, to assist the growing number of clerks. A Legal Office, staffed by two attorneys, was created in 1975 to assist with cases in the Court's ORIGINAL JURISDICTION and with expedited appeals.

Although the duties and functions of clerks vary with each chamber, all share certain commonly assigned responsibilities. Most notably, Justices have delegated to them the task of initially screening all filings for writs of CERTIORARI. This practice originated with the handling of INDIGENTS' petitions by Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES and his clerks. Unlike the "paid" petitions that are filed in multiple copies, an indigent's petition is typically a handwritten statement. Except when an unpaid petition raised important legal issues or involved a capital case, Hughes neither circulated the petitions to the other Justices nor discussed them at conference. Stone, Vinson, and Warren, however, circulated to the chambers their clerks' memoranda, which summarized the facts and questions presented, and recommended whether the case should be denied, dismissed, or granted a review. But Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER refused to have his clerks shoulder the entire burden of screening these petitions. And in 1972, a majority of the Justices began to pool their clerks, dividing up all paid and unpaid filings and having a single clerk's certiorari memo circulate to those Justices participating in what is called "the cert. pool." With more than a hundred filings each week, even those Justices who objected to the "cert. pool" have found it necessary to give their clerks considerable responsibility for screening petitions. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS describes his practice: "[The clerks] examine them all and select a small minority that they believe I should read myself. As a result, I do not even look at the papers in over 80 percent of the cases that are filed."

Law clerks have also assumed responsibility for the preliminary drafting of the Justices' opinions. Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST's practice, for instance, is to have one of his clerks do a first draft, without bothering about style, in about ten days. Before beginning work on an opinion, Rehnquist goes over the conference discussion with the clerk and explains how he thinks "an opinion can be written supporting the result reached by the majority." Once the clerk finishes a draft and Rehnquist works the draft into his own opinion, it circulates three or four times among the other clerks in the chambers before it circulates to the other chambers.

In addition to law clerks, five officers and their staffs also assist the Justices. Central to the Court's work is the Office of the Clerk. For most of the Court's history, the clerk earned no salary, but this changed in 1921 when Taft lobbied for legislation making the clerk a salaried employee. The clerk's office collects filing and admission fees; receives and records all motions, petitions, BRIEFS, and other documents; and circulates those necessary items to each chamber. The clerk also establishes the oral-argument calendar and maintains the order list of cases granted or denied review and final judgments. In 1975, the office acquired a computer system that automatically notifies counsel in over ninety-five percent of all cases of the disposition of their filings.

There was no official reporter of decisions during the first quarter-century of the Court, and not until 1835 were the Justices' opinions given to the clerk. Early reporters worked at their own expense and for their own profit. In 1922, Congress established the present arrangement (at Chief Justice Taft's request): the reporter's salary is fixed by the Justices and paid by the government, and the Government Printing Office publishes the United States Reports. The reporter has primary responsibility for supervising the publication of the Court's opinions, writing headnotes or syllabi that accompany each opinion, and for making editorial suggestions subject to the Justices' approval.

Order in the courtroom was preserved by U.S. marshals until 1867, when Congress created the Office of Marshal of the Supreme Court. The Marshal not only maintains order in the courtroom and times oral arguments but also oversees building maintenance and serves as business manager for the more than two hundred Court employees, including messengers, carpenters, police and workmen, a nurse, physiotherapist, barber, seamstress, and cafeteria workers.

The Justices acquired their first small library in 1832. It was run by the clerk until the marshal's office took over in 1884. In 1948, Congress created the Office of the Librarian, which employs several research librarians to assist the Justice.

Unlike other members of the Court, the Chief Justice has special administrative duties. Over fifty statutes confer duties ranging from chairing the JUDICIAL CONFERENCE and the Federal Judicial Center to supervising the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts and serving as chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution. Unlike Taft and Hughes, Stone felt overwhelmed by these duties. His successor, Vinson, appointed a special assistant to deal with administrative matters, whereas Warren delegated such matters to his secretary. By contrast, Burger became preoccupied with administrative matters and pushed for judicial reforms. In historical perspective, he brought Taft's marble temple into the world of modern technology and managerial practices. Burger also lobbied Congress to create a fifth legal officer of the Court, the administrative assistant to the Chief Justice. While also employing an administrative assistant, Chief Justice Rehnquist has less interest in judicial administration, and his assistant is less occupied with liaison work with organizations outside the Court.

The caseload remains the driving force behind the Court's work; its increase has changed the Court's operations. After Taft campaigned for relief for the Court, Congress passed the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1925, which enlarged the Court's discretionary JURISDICTION and enabled it to deny cases review. Subsequently, on a piecemeal basis, the Court's discretion over its jurisdiction was further expanded, and in 1988, virtually all mandatory appeals were eliminated. As a result, the Court has the power to manage its docket and set its agenda for decision making.

The cornerstone of the modern Court's operation, in Justice John Harlan's words, "is the control it possesses over the amount and character of its business." The overwhelming majority of all cases are denied review; less than three percent of the more than 5,000 cases on the Court's annual docket are granted and decided by fully written opinion.

When a petition is filed at the Court, the clerk's staff determines whether it satisfies the rules as to form, length, and fees. After receiving opposing papers from respondents, the clerk circulates to the chambers a list of cases ready for consideration and a set of papers for each case. For much of the Court's history, every Justice reviewed every case, but this practice no longer prevails. Since the creation of the "cert. pool" in 1972, most of the Justices have delegated to their clerks much of this initial screening task. Moreover, the Court has found it necessary to hold its initial conference in the last week of September, before the formal opening of its term. At this conference, the Justices dispose of more than 1,000 cases, discussing less than two hundred. Before the start of the term, the Court has thus disposed of approximately one-fifth of its entire docket, with more than four-fifths of those cases effectively screened out by law clerks and never collectively considered by the Justices.

In conference, attended only by the Justices, the Court decides which cases to accept and discusses the merits of argued cases. During the weeks in which the Court hears oral arguments, conferences are held on Wednesday afternoons to take up the four cases argued on Monday, and then on Fridays to discuss new filings and the eight cases argued on Tuesday and Wednesday. In May and June, when oral arguments are not heard, conferences are held on Thursdays, from 10:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m., with a forty-five-minute lunch break around 12:30 p.m.

Summoned by a buzzer five minutes before the hour, the Justices meet in their conference room, located directly behind the courtroom itself. Two conference lists circulate to each chamber by noon on the Wednesday before a conference. On the first list are those cases deemed worth discussing; typically, the discuss list includes about fifty cases. Attached is a second list, the "Dead List," containing those cases considered unworthy of discussion. Any Justice may request that a case be discussed, but over seventy percent of the cases on the conference lists are denied review without discussion.

For a case to be heard by the Court, at least four Justices must agree that it warrants consideration. This informal RULE OF FOUR was adopted when the Justices were trying to persuade Congress that important cases would still be decided after the Court was given discretionary controll over much of its jurisdiction under the Judiciary Act of 1925, Unanimity in case selection, nevertheless, remains remarkably high becaues the Justices agree that only a limited number of cases may be taked. "As a rule of thumb," Justice White explains, "the Court should not be expected to produce more than 150 opinions per term in argued cases." The rule of four, however, also permits an ideological bloc to grant review in cases it wants to hear and thus to influence the Court's agenda.

Since the Chief Justice presides over conferences, he has significant opportunities for structuring and influencing the Court's work. Chief Justices, however, vary widely in their skills, style, and ideological orientations. Hughes is widely considered to be the greatest Chief Justice in this century because of his photographic memory and ability to state concisely the relative importance of each case. "Warren was closer to Hughes than any others," in Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS's view, and "Burger was closer to Vinson. Stone was somewhere in between." Rehnquist, by all accounts, is an effective Chief Justice because he moves conferences along quickly and has the intellectual and temperamental wherewithal to be a leader.

For a case to be heard by the Court, at least four Justices must agree that it warrants consideration. This informal RULE OF FOUR was adopted when the Justices were trying to persuade Congress that important cases would still be decided after the Court was given discretionary control over much of its jurisdiction under the Judiciary Act of 1925. Unanimity in case selection, nevertheless, remains remarkably high because the Justices agree that only a limited number of cases may be taken. "As a rule of thumb," Justice White explains, "the Court should not be expected to produce more than 150 opinions per term in argued cases." The rule of four, however, also permits an ideological bloc to grant review in cases it wants to hear and, thus, to influence the Court's agenda.

Immediately after conference, the Chief Justice traditionally had the task of reporting to the clerk which cases were granted review, which were denied review, and which were ready to come down. Burger, however, delegated this task to the junior Justice. The clerk then notifies both sides in a case granted review that they have thirty days to file briefs on merits and supporting documents. Once all briefs (forty copies of each) are submitted, cases are scheduled for oral argument.

The importance of oral argument, Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes observed, lies in the fact that often "the impression that a judge has at the close of a full oral argument accords with the conviction which controls his final vote." Because the Justices vote in conference within a day or two of hearing arguments, oral arguments come at a crucial time. Still, oral arguments were more prominent in the work of the Court in the nineteenth century. Unlimited time was allowed, until the Court began cutting back on oral argument in 1848, allowing eight hours per case. The time has been reduced periodically, and since 1970, arguments have been limited to thirty minutes per side. The argument calendar permits hearing no more than 180 cases a year. For fourteen weeks each term, from the first Monday in October until the end of April, the Court hears arguments from 10:00 to 12:00 and 1:00 to 3:00 on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday about every two weeks.

Justices differ in their preparation for oral arguments. Douglas insisted that "oral arguments win or lose a case," but Chief Justice Earl Warren claimed that they were "not highly persuasive." Most Justices come prepared with "bench memos" drafted by their law clerks, identifying the central facts, issues, and possible questions. On the bench, they also vary in their style and approach toward questioning attorneys. Justices SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR and ANTONIN SCALIA, for example, are aggressive and relentless in the questioning of attorneys, while Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN and HARRY A. BLACKMUN tend to sit back and listen.

Conference discussions following oral arguments no longer play the role they once did. When the docket was smaller, conferences were integral to the Court's work. Cases were discussed in detail, differences hammered out, and the Justices strove to reach agreement on an institutional opinion for the Court. As the caseload grew, conferences became largely symbolic of past collective deliberations. They currently serve only to discover consensus. "In fact," Justice Scalia points out, "to call our discussion of a case a conference is really something of a misnomer. It's much more a statement of the views of each of the nine Justices."

Most of the time spent in conference is consumed by the Justices deciding which cases should be granted review. Moreover, less time is spent in conference (now about 108 hours) each term. The caseload and conference schedule permits on average only about six minutes for each case on the discuss list and about twenty-nine minutes for those granted full consideration. Perhaps as a result, the Justices agree less often on the opinion announcing the Court's decision and file a greater number of separate opinions. In short, the combination of more cases and less collective deliberation discourages the compromises necessary for institutional opinions and reinforces the tendency of the Justices to function independently.

All votes at conference are tentative until the final opinion comes down. Voting thus presents each Justice with opportunities to negotiate which issues are to be decided and how they are to be resolved. Before, during, and after conference, Justices may use their votes in strategic ways to influence the outcome of a case. At conference, a Justice may vote with others who appear to constitute a majority, even though the Justice may disagree with their reasoning. The Justice may then suggest changes in draft opinions to try to minimize the damage, from his or her perspective, of the Court's decision.

Because conference votes are tentative, the assignment, drafting, and circulation of opinions is crucial to the Court's work. Opinions justify or explain votes at conference. The OPINION OF THE COURT is the most important and most difficult to write because it represents a collective judgment. Writing the Court's opinion, as Justice Holmes put it, requires that a "judge can dance the sword dance; that is he can justify an obvious result without stepping on either blade of opposing fallacies." Because Justices remain free to switch votes and to write separate opinions, concurring in or dissenting from the Court's decision, they continue after conference to compete for influence on the final decision and opinion.

The power of opinion assignment is the Chief Justice's "single most influential function," observed Justice TOM C. CLARK, and an exercise in "judicial-political discretion." By tradition, when the Chief Justice votes with the majority, he assigns the Court's opinion. If the Chief Justice is not with the majority, then the senior Associate Justice in the majority either writes the opinion or assigns it to another Justice.

Chief Justices may keep the Court's opinion for themselves, especially when a case is unanimously decided. Since Vinson, however, Chief Justices have generally sought parity in their opinion assignments. Opinions may be assigned to pivotal Justices to ensure or expand the size of the majority joining the opinion for the Court. But the Chief Justice may also take other factors into account, such as a Justice's expertise or what kind of reaction a ruling may engender. Hughes, for example, was inclined to assign the opinions in "liberal" decisions to "conservative" Justices.

The circulation of draft opinions among the chambers has added to the Supreme Court's workload and changed its deliberative process. The practice of circulating draft opinions began around 1900 and soon became pivotal in the Court's decision-making process, especially with the Justices spending less time in conference discussing and reconciling their differences. Occasionally, proposed changes in a draft opinion will lead to a complete recasting or to having the opinion reassigned to another Justice. To accommodate the views of others, the author of an opinion for the Court must negotiate language and bargain over substance. At times, however, Justices may not feel that a case is worth fighting over; as Justice GEORGE SUTHERLAND noted on the back of one of Stone's drafts, "probably bad—but only a small baby. Let it go."

Final published opinions for the Court are the residue of compromises among the Justices. But they also reflect changing norms in the work of the Court. Up until the 1930s, there were few concurring or dissenting OPINIONS. But individual opinions now predominate over opinions for the Court. When the Court's practice in the 1980s is compared with that of forty years ago, there are roughly ten times the number of CONCURRING OPINIONS, four times more DISSENTING OPINIONS, and seven times the number of separate opinions in which the Justices explain their views and why they concur and dissent from parts of the Court's opinion. Even though the business of the Court is to give institutional opinions, as Justice Stewart observed, "that view has come to be that of a minority of the Justices."

The Justices are more interested in merely the tally of votes at conference than in arriving at a consensus on an institutional decision and opinion. As a result, whereas unanimity remains high on case selection (around eighty percent), unanimous opinions for the Court count for only about thirty percent of the Court's written opinions. The number of cases decided by a bare majority also sharply grew in the 1970s and 1980s, and frequently, no majority could agree on an opinion announcing the Court's rulings.

A Justice writing separate concurring or dissenting opinions carries no burden of massing other Justices. Concurring opinions explain how the Court's decision could have been otherwise rationalized. A concurring opinion surely is defensible when a compromised opinion might be meaningless or impossible to achieve. The cost of concurring opinions is that they add to the workload and may create confusion over the Court's rulings.

A dissenting opinion, in the words of Chief Justice Hughes, appeals "to the brooding spirit of the law, to the intelligence of a future day, when a later decision may possibly correct the error into which the dissenting judge believes the Court to have been betrayed." Even the threat of a dissent may be useful in persuading the majority to narrow its holding or tone down the language of its opinion.

The struggles over the work of the Court (and among the Justices) continue after the writing of opinions and final votes. Opinion days, when the Court announces its decisions, may reveal something of these struggles and mark the beginning of larger political struggles for influence within the country.

Decisions are announced in the courtroom, typically crowded with reporters, attorneys, and spectators. Before 1857, decisions came down on any day of the week, but thereafter they were announced only on Mondays. In 1965, the Court reverted to its earlier practice, and in 1971, the Justices further broke with the tradition of "Decision Mondays." On Mondays, the Court generally releases memorandum orders and admits new attorneys to its bar. In weeks when the Justices hear oral arguments, opinions are announced on Tuesdays and Wednesdays and then on any day of the week during the rest of the term. By tradition, there is no prior announcement of the decisions to be handed down. In 1971, the practice of reading full opinions was abandoned; typically, only the ruling and the line-up of the Justices is stated.

Media coverage of the Court's work has grown since the 1930s, when fewer than a half-dozen reporters covered the Court and shared six small cubicles on the ground floor, just below the courtroom, where they received copies of opinions sent down through pneumatic tube. In 1970, the Court established a Public Information Office, which provides space for a "press room" and makes available all filings and briefs for cases on the docket, as well as the Court's conference lists and final opinions. More than fifty reporters and all major television networks currently cover the Court, although cameras are still not allowed in the courtroom.

When deciding major issues of public law and policy, Justices may consider strategies for winning public acceptance of their rulings. When holding "separate but equal" schools unconstitutional in 1954 in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION, for instance, the Court waited a year before issuing its mandate for "all deliberate speed" in ending school SEGREGATION. Some of the Justices sacrificed their preference for a more precise guideline in order to achieve a unanimous ruling, and the Court tolerated lengthy delays in the implementation of Brown, in recognition of the likelihood of open defiance.

Although the Justices are less concerned about public opinion than are elected public officials, they are sensitive to the attitudes of their immediate "constituents": the SOLICITOR GENERAL, the ATTORNEY GENERAL AND DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, counsel for federal agencies, states' attorneys general, and the legal profession. These professionals' responses to the Court's rulings help determine the extent of compliance. With such concerns in mind, Chief Justice Warren sought to establish an objective bright-line rule that police could not evade, when holding, in MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), that police must inform criminal suspects of their Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION and their Sixth Amendment RIGHT TO COUNSEL, which included the right to consult and have the presence of an attorney during POLICE INTERROGATION. The potential costs of securing compliance may also convince the Justices to limit the scope or application of their decisions.

Compliance with the Court's decisions by lower courts is uneven. They may extend or limit decisions in anticipation of later rulings. Ambiguities created by PLURALITY OPINIONS, or 5–4 decisions invite lower courts to pursue their own policy goals. Differences between the facts on which the Court ruled and the circumstances of a case at hand may be emphasized so as to reach a different conclusion.

Major confrontations between Congress and the Court have occurred a number of times, and Congress has tried to pressure the Court in a variety of ways. The Senate may try to influence the APPOINTMENT OF SUPREME COURT JUSTICES, and Justices may be impeached. More frequently, Congress has tried to pressure the Court when setting its terms and size and when authorizing appropriations for salaries, law clerks, secretaries, and office technology. Only once, in 1802, when repealing the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801 and abolishing a session for a year, did Congress actually set the Court's term in order to delay and influence a particular decision. The size of the Court is not preordained, and changes generally reflect attempts to control the Court. The Jeffersonian Republicans' quick repeal of the act passed by the FEDERALISTS in 1801, reducing the number of Justices, was the first of several attempts to influence the Court. Presidents JAMES MADISON, JAMES MONROE, and JOHN ADAMS all claimed that the country's geographical expansion warranted increasing the number of Justices. Congress, however, refused to do so until the last day of ANDREW JACKSON's term in 1837. During the Civil War, the number of Justices increased to ten. This was ostensibly due to the creation of a circuit in the West, but it also gave ABRAHAM LINCOLN his fourth appointment and a chance to secure a pro-Union majority on the bench. Antagonism toward ANDREW JOHNSON's RECONSTRUCTION policies, then, led to a reduction from ten to seven Justices. After General ULYSSES S. GRANT's election, Congress again authorized nine Justices. In the nineteenth century at least, Congress rather successfully denied Presidents additional appointments in order to preserve the Court's policies, and increased the number of Justices so as to change the ideological composition of the Court.

More direct attacks are possible. Under Article III, Congress is authorized "to make exceptions" to the Court's APELLATE JURISDICTION. This has been viewed as a way of denying the Court review of certain kinds of cases. But Congress succeeded only once in affecting the Court's work in this way; an 1868 repeal of jurisdiction over writs of HABEAS CORPUS was upheld in Ex Parte McCardle (1869).

Court-curbing legislation is not a very viable weapon. Congress has greater success in reversing the Court by constitutional amendment, which three-fourths of the states must ratify. The process is cumbersome, and thousands of amendments to overrule the Court have failed. But four rulings have been overturned by constitutional amendment. CHISHOLM V. GEORGIA (1793), holding that citizens of one state could sue another state in federal courts, was reversed by the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT, guaranteeing SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY for states from suits by citizens of other states. The THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, abolishing SLAVERY and making blacks citizens of the United States, technically overturned DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857). With the ratification in 1913 of the SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT, Congress reversed POLLOCK V. FARMERS' LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY (1895), which had invalidated a federal income tax. In 1970, an amendment to the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 lowered the voting age to eighteen years for all elections. Although signing the act into law, President RICHARD M. NIXON had his attorney general challenge the validity of lowering the voting age in state and local elections. Within six months, in OREGON V. MITCHELL (1970), a bare majority held that Congress had exceeded its power. Less than a year later, the TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT was ratified, thereby overriding the Court's ruling and extending the franchise to eighteen-year-olds in all elections.

Even more successful are congressional enactments and rewriting of legislation in response to the Court's rulings. Congress, of course, cannot overturn the Court's interpretations of the Constitution by mere legislation. But Congress may enhance or thwart compliance with its rulings. After the landmark ruling in GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT (1963) that indigents have a right to counsel, for instance, Congress provided attorneys for indigents charged with federal offenses. By contrast, in the Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, Congress permitted federal courts to use evidence obtained from suspects who had not been read their Miranda rights if their testimony appeared voluntary based on the "totality of the circumstances" surrounding their interrogation.

Congress may also openly defy the Court's rulings. When holding in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983) that Congress may not delegate decision-making authority to federal agencies and still retain the power of vetoing decisions with which it disagrees, the Court invalidated over two hundred provisions for congressional vetoes of administrative actions. Congress largely responded by deleting or substituting joint resolutions for one-House veto provisions. However, in the year following Chadha, Congress passed no less than thirty new provisions for LEGISLATIVE VETOES.

Congress indubitably has the power to delay and undercut implementation of the Court's rulings. On major issues of public policy, Congress is likely to prevail or at least temper the impact of the Court's rulings.

The Court has often been the focus of presidential campaigns and power struggles as well. Presidents rarely openly defy particular decisions by the Court, and in major confrontations, they have tended to yield. Still, presidential reluctance to enforce rulings may thwart implementation of the Court's rulings. In the short and long run, Presidents may undercut the Court's work by issuing contradictory directives to federal agencies and assigning low priority for enforcement by the Department of Justice. Presidents may also make broad moral appeals in response to the Court's rulings, and those appeals may transcend their limited time in office. The Court put school DESEGREGATION and ABORTION on the national political agenda. Yet JOHN F. KENNEDY's appeal for CIVIL RIGHTS captivated a generation and encouraged public acceptance of the Court's ruling in Brown v. Board of Education. Similarly, RONALD REAGAN's opposition to abortion focused attention on "traditional family values" and served to legitimate resistance to the Court's decisions.

Presidential influence over the Court in the long run remains contingent on appointments to the Court. Vacancies occur on the average of one every twenty-two months, and there is no guarantee as to how a Justice will vote or whether that vote will prove the key to limiting or reversing past rulings with which a President disagrees. Yet through their appointments, Presidents leave their mark on the Court and possibly align it and the country or precipitate later confrontations.

The Supreme Court at work is unlike any other. It has virtually complete discretion to select which cases are reviewed, to control its work load, and to set its own substantive agenda. From the thousands of cases arriving each year, less than two hundred are accepted and decided. The Court thus functions like a superlegislature. But the Justices' chambers also work like nine separate law offices, competing for influence when selecting and deciding those cases. The Justices no longer spend time collectively deliberating cases at conference. Instead, they simply tally votes and then hammer out differences, negotiating and compromising on the language of their opinions during the postconference period when drafts are circulated among the chambers. When the final opinions come down, the Court remains dependent on the cooperation of other political branches and public acceptance for compliance with its rulings. The work of the Court, in Chief Justice EDWARD D. WHITE's words, "rests solely upon the approval of a free people."

DAVID M. O' BRIEN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Jeffersonianism.)

Bibliography

ABRAHAM, HENRY J. 1986 The Judicial Process, 5th ed. New York: Oxford University Press.

CHOPER, JESSE 1980 Judicial Review and the National Democratic Process. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

CONGRESSIONAL QUARTERLY 1989 Guide to the U.S. Supreme Court, 2nd ed. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly Press.

DIAMOND, PAUL 1989 The Supreme Court & Judicial Choice: The Role of Provisional Judicial Review. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

FISHER, LOUIS 1988 Constitutional Dialogues. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

JOHNSON, CHARLES and CANNON, BRADLEY 1984 Judicial Policies: Implementation and Impact. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly Press.

O'BRIEN, DAVID M. 1990 Storm Center: The Supreme Court in American Politics, 2nd ed. New York: W. W. Norton.

STERN, ROBERT and GRESSMAN, EUGENE 1987 Supreme Court Practice, 6th ed. Washington, D.C.: Bureau of National Affairs.

SUPREME COURT BAR

The bar of the Supreme Court is not cohesive, and it is not active in any organizational sense. The number of lawyers admitted to practice before the Supreme Court is greatly in excess of the number who actually appear there.

The first rule of the Supreme Court with respect to admissions was adopted on February 5, 1790, three days after the Court opened in New York. The Court then made the provision, which continues to this day, that applicants for admission shall have been admitted "for three years past in the Supreme Courts of the State to which they respectively belong." The formula also provided, then and throughout the nineteenth century, that the private and professional character of the applicants "shall appear to be fair." As the American language evolved, the word "fair" acquired a dual meaning, and the use of the phrase in oral motions sometimes produced a laugh in the courtroom. So the wording was changed, and for most of the twentieth century the sponsor was required to say that he "vouched" for the applicant. Under the rule as it stands now, he affirms "that the applicant is of good moral and professional character." All motions for admissions were made in open court until about 1970. Now the whole procedure can be done by mail.

Under the first rule for admission, the applicant was required to elect whether he would practice as an attorney (office lawyer) or as a counselor (appearing in court), and he could not practice as both. If this rule had remained in effect (it was eliminated in 1801), the long-established division in England between solicitors and barristers would have been perpetuated in the United States and the bar of the Supreme Court would have been drawn from a much narrower group.

There is no published list of the members of the bar of the Supreme Court. Indeed, no one knows how many members there are. The clerk of the Supreme Court maintains a list of those admitted since October 1925. In early 1990 the number of those who had been admitted was about 185,000. But there is no record of those who have died or retired from active practice (though the list does record 800 names of lawyers who have been disbarred). By an estimate there are now 75,000 lawyers in the United States who have been admitted to practice before the Supreme Court and thus are members of its bar. No more than 300 of these actually present arguments before the Supreme Court in any year, and there are probably fewer than 5,000 living lawyers in the country (out of a total of close to 700,000 lawyers altogether) who have ever made a personal appearance before the Court.

The first member of the bar of the Supreme Court was Elias Boudinot of New Jersey, who was admitted to practice in February 1790. There was, of course, no one to move his admission. No procedure had yet been established for the filing of credentials. After a short interval, the Court turned to the attorney general, EDMUND RANDOLPH. Though he was never admitted to practice before the Court, he was treated as an officer of the Court. Before long, the practice was established of admission to the bar on motions of persons already admitted.

During the first ten years of its existence, the Supreme Court heard very few cases. ALEXANDER HAMILTON made his sole appearance before the Court in the case of HYLTON V. UNITED STATES in 1796. JOHN MARSHALL made his sole appearance before the Court in WARE V. HYLTON (1796). This was the famous British debts case, and Marshall was unsuccessful.

As time passed, and the country developed, the number of cases before the Court steadily increased. Thomas A. Emmet arrived in New York from Ireland in 1804 and was soon established as a leading lawyer. He appeared before the Supreme Court for the first time in 1815. The culmination of his career was his argument in the famous steamboat case of GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824). Another of the early leaders was Littleton W. Tazewell of Virginia, who specialized in criminal law and admiralty. DANIEL WEBSTER wrote of him, "He is a correct, fluent, easy & handsome speaker and a learned, ingenuous & subtle lawyer"—a standard to which any Supreme Court lawyer might aspire. Others who appeared during the early years of the nineteenth century were LUTHER MARTIN, WILLIAM PINKNEY, and Francis Scott Key of Maryland; Roger Griswold of Connecticut; Edmund J. Lee and WILLIAM WIRT of Virginia; JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Samuel Dexter, LEVI LINCOLN, and Rufus G. Amory of Massachusetts; JARED INGERSOLL and HORACE BINNEY of Pennsylvania; and Edward Livingston of New York and Louisiana.

Daniel Webster made his first appearance in 1814. Early in his career he argued DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1818). The decision of the Court in this case, announced in 1819, relied on the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS clause in the Constitution to uphold the charter of Dartmouth College against efforts of the legislature of New Hampshire to change it. The argument in Dartmouth College lasted for three days and was a great social event in Washington. Webster concluded with an emotional peroration that has become part of American folklore. He is supposed to have said, "It is . . . a small college. And yet there are those who love it." But there is no contemporaneous record of this passage. It first appeared in a eulogy on Webster spoken by Rufus Choate in July 1853, thirty-five years after the argument. Choate's source was a letter written to him in 1852 by Chauncey Goodrich, a professor at Yale University, who attended the March 1818 argument.

Webster (perhaps aided by geography and travel limitations of the times) was for more than thirty years the acknowledged leader of the Supreme Court bar. Indeed, he still holds the record for arguing the most cases before the Court—more than three hundred of them. The second largest total of cases argued was also achieved at this time by a little-known figure, Walter Jones, a District of Columbia lawyer. He appeared in more than two hundred cases before the Court. The next highest total of arguments, and the highest total in the twentieth century, was made by JOHN W. DAVIS, who was active from about 1910 to 1954. He argued a total of 141 cases. Davis was SOLICITOR GENERAL of the United States from 1913 to 1918 and in 1924 was the Democratic presidential candidate. Today no one makes such a high number of arguments unless he is a solicitor general or a member of the staff of the solicitor general's office.

The first black lawyer to be admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court was Dr. John S. Rock, who was born of free parents in New Jersey in 1825. He was admitted on February 1, 1865, just short of his fortieth birthday. Before then, he had been a teacher, a dentist, and a doctor. He had moved to Boston in 1853 and was one of the founders of the Republican party in Massachusetts. In 1858 he wanted to go to France for medical treatment, but he was refused a passport on the ground that he was not a citizen. The Massachusetts legislature then passed a law providing for state passports, and this was accepted in France.

A year or so later, Dr. Rock returned to Boston where he read law. He was admitted to practice in Massachusetts in September 1861 and in the Supreme Court in 1865, shortly after the appointment of SALMON P. CHASE as Chief Justice. It is interesting to note that this came before the termination of the CIVIL WAR and before the adoption of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments—and with DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) still on the books. As the New York Times reported, "By Jupiter the sight was good." Rock's admission was moved by Senator CHARLES SUMNER. The newspaper reporter observed that the "assenting nod" of the Chief Justice "dug . . . the grave to bury the Dred Scott decision."

The next of these significant events was the admission of the first woman to the Supreme Court bar. In BRADWELL V. ILLINOIS (1873) the Supreme Court refused to interfere with the action of the supreme court of Illinois, which denied admission to Myra Bradwell, publisher of a successful legal newspaper in Chicago. Bradwell relied in the Supreme Court on the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of the recently adopted Fourteenth Amendment, but persuaded only Chief Justice Chase.

Less than seven years later, however, Belva A. Lockwood became the first woman admitted to practice before the Supreme Court. This was on March 3, 1879. So quick was the change of view that this action evoked no opinion from any member of the Court. Indeed, Myra Bradwell herself, who had been denied admission in 1872, was finally admitted when she applied again in 1892.

Despite this opening of the door, it took fifty years, or until 1929, before the number of women admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court reached a total of one hundred. Some of the early admittees had distinguished careers in the law. These included Florence Allen, who became the first woman judge of a constitutional federal court; Mabel Walker Willebrandt, who was assistant attorney general under President HERBERT C. HOOVER; and Helen Carloss, who had a long and distinguished career in the Tax Division of the Department of Justice. The great increase in the number of women lawyers, however, has occurred in the past fifteen years. In another fifteen years, if present trends continue, they will constitute perhaps thirty percent of the members of the bar of the Supreme Court.

There have been periods when relatively few lawyers were widely recognized as leaders of the bar practicing before the Supreme Court. There were the orators of the nineteenth century, starting with Daniel Webster and continuing through John G. Johnson of Pennsylvania. There was such a bar in the 1920s and the 1930s, when CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, Owen D. Roberts, John W. Davis, George Wharton Pepper, and William D. Mitchell made frequent appearances before the Court. By this time, oratory had become passé. The presentations were less flowery, but they were mellifluous. Davis showed great skill in persuasion, though his record of wins over losses was not especially high, reflecting the fact that the cases in which he was retained were often especially difficult. There is one case that brought together three of these giants. In United States v. George Otis Smith (1932) the question was whether the Senate could reconsider its confirmation of a presidential nomination after the President had acted on it by making the appointment. The Senate retained Davis as its counsel. Attorney General William D. Mitchell appeared for the United States, essentially representing the President, and George Wharton Pepper represented Smith, the nominee. That argument was one of the high points of advocacy in this century.

One group has long provided the backbone of the Supreme Court bar: the solicitor general and his staff, and his associates in the Department of Justice. This office has long maintained a high standard and a great tradition. It appears, in one way or another, in nearly half the cases heard on the merits by the Court and in a high percentage of all applications for review.

A considerable number of cases are now brought to the Supreme Court by parties representing particular interests. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was first represented by one of the country's great lawyers, CHARLES H. HOUSTON—work carried on with great ability by THURGOOD MARSHALL. Other similar work has been done by lawyers representing groups interested in the rights of women, in other civil rights, in the environment, and in other causes.

The bar of the Supreme Court can never be assembled, nor is it possible to take a consensus of the bar. It is clear that it plays an important role in the work of the Court. Yet the demands on the Court are such that the bar has difficulty in making its full contribution. In 1935, arguments were heard five days a week for a total of about seventy-five days a year. Now the Court hears arguments on about forty-five days during the year. Fifty years ago, the time made available for oral argument was an hour on each side, and there were frequent substantial allowances of additional time. Now the time allotted is thirty minutes on a side, and additional time is rarely granted. This inevitably presents problems for oral arguments and requires a wholly different type of argument from that customary even fifty years ago. The advocate today can rarely present his case as a case. He has to pick out certain salient points and hope that with questioning by the justices he will still have time to deal with the matters he regards as vital. The printed briefs filed by counsel today appear to be much better than they were fifty years ago, probably more greatly improved than is commonly recognized. But oral argument remains a difficult and tantalizing field.

The Supreme Court moved into its new building in 1935. According to newspaper articles, the first words spoken by Chief Justice Hughes in the new courtroom were "Are there any admissions?" Thus was the bar recognized, and thus has it been recognized at every session since.

The bar of the Supreme Court, diverse and divided as it is, plays an important part in the work of the third branch of American constitutional government. Though Alexander Hamilton called the judiciary "the least dangerous branch," its role is central to the effective operation of our federal system. If the work of the Court is central to American government, the efforts of the Supreme Court bar may well be regarded as an essential buttress to the Court.

ERWIN N. GRISWOLD
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Supreme Court's Work Load; Women in Constitutional History.)

Bibliography

CONTEE, CLARENCE G. 1976 The Supreme Court Bar's First Black Member. Pages 82–85 in Supreme Court Historical Society Year Book, 1976. Washington, D.C.: Supreme Court Historical Society.

HARBAUGH, WILLIAM H. 1973 Lawyer's Lawyer. New York: Oxford University Press.

O'DONNELL, ALICE L. 1977 Women and Other Strangers Before the Bar. Pages 59–62 in Supreme Court Historical Society Year Book, 1977. Washington, D.C.: Supreme Court Historical Society.

WARREN, CHARLES (1908) 1970 History of the Harvard Law School and of Early Legal Conditions in America. New York: DaCapo.

——— (1911) 1980 A History of the American Bar. Boston: Longwood.

WHITE, EDWARD G. 1988 The Marshall Court and Cultural Change, 1815–34. New York: Macmillan.

SUPREME COURT DECISIONS, IMPACT OF

The Supreme Court's DECISIONS have regularly embroiled it in controversy. Its rulings have considerable impact. In its early years, the Court, over strenuous objection from the states, shaped our federal system and helped establish the national government's supremacy. The Court also had substantial effects on the ECONOMY, aiding in the creation of an American economic common market and providing opportunities for the private sector to develop. The Court's major effects on FEDERALISM and the economy subsided after the 1930s. However, its effect on CIVIL RIGHTS, visible earlier with respect to SLAVERY and its emasculation of RECONSTRUCTION civil rights statutes, again became apparent as questions such as school DESEGREGATION came to the fore in the 1950s.

The Supreme Court's impact includes ways in which federal and state agencies and lower federal and state courts carry out the Court's decisions, but it also includes the ways in which the agencies and courts delay, circumvent, misunderstand, and erode them. It includes the response to decisions by different "populations"—those who explain or elaborate its rulings, those supposed to apply or implement them, those for whom the rulings are intended, and the general population. Because the Court, "the least dangerous branch," lacks the capacity to enforce its rulings directly, assistance from those at whom a ruling is directed or from others (legislatures, executive agencies, courts) is required. The Court is now recognized to be a political actor, but one must abandon the tacit assumption held by earlier scholars that Supreme Court decisions are self-executing and recognize that the law is what the judges say it is only after all others have had their say.

Impact and compliance are not identical but are related. Compliance, the process by which individuals accept a decision prior to its impact or effect, cannot occur unless a person knows of the ruling and is required to take or abstain from a certain action. Compliance means an individual's intentionally conforming behavior to the ruling's dictates, that is, doing what the decision commands because of the ruling. Because noncompliance, or refusal to obey, occurs relatively seldom despite the attention it receives, it is important to pay heed to implementation of decisions, the process by which they are put into effect. Short-run resistance may blend into longer-run obedience, as resulted in the aftermath of the REAPPORTIONMENT decisions.

Impact includes all effects, direct and indirect, resulting from a ruling of the Court, regardless of whether those affected knew about the decision; it includes the results of rulings permitting but not requiring the adoption of certain policies. When effects of a ruling indirectly induce behavior congruent with the ruling, that behavior is better viewed as impact than as compliance. Impact encompasses actions neither directly defiant nor clearly obedient, such as attempts at evasion coupled with technical obedience and efforts to anticipate the Court's decisions ("anticipatory compliance"). Impact also includes both short-term and long-run consequences of a decision, for example, massive resistance to school desegregation rulings and the rulings' arguable contribution to "white flight" to the suburbs. There will also be situations in which no response occurs, that is, where there is an absence of obvious impact.

The Supreme Court's effect on the President has generally been one of support and reinforcement. The Court has been least willing to overturn his acts in time of war, when presidential resistance to Court decisions would be most likely. Although limiting somewhat the President's authority to remove certain government employees, the Court, since the NEW DEAL, has sustained DELEGATIONS OF POWER to the President and the executive branch and has generally been deferential to the REGULATORY COMMISSIONS since WORLD WAR II. Confrontations between Court and President have been relatively infrequent; when the Court invalidates policies the President had espoused, for example, WIRETAPPING, it is not attacking the presidency as an institution. Presidents may have been reluctant to assist in enforcing the Court's decisions, but direct defiance is rare indeed. Both President HARRY S. TRUMAN and President RICHARD M. NIXON complied with orders when their actions (seizure of the steel mills and withholding of tapes) were ruled improper. In those situations, as with IMPOUNDMENT of appropriated funds, the Court insisted that the President follow the law as interpreted by the courts rather than determine for himself whether he should be subject to it; in the case of the STEEL SEIZURE, the Court insisted that he follow a course of action legislated by Congress.

The Court has had considerable impact on Congress's internal processes—its authority to exclude members, LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATIONS, and the CONTEMPT POWER. Congressional reaction to the Court's decisions has been manifested in a number of ways. After the Court has engaged in statutory interpretation or, less frequently, has invalidated statutes for VAGUENESS, Congress has often rewritten or reenacted the laws to reestablish its "legislative intent," in effect establishing a continuing dialogue between Court and Congress. Congress has also shown negative reaction to the Court's ruling through proposals to eliminate APPELLATE JURISDICTION in particular classes of cases, for example, internal security, abortions, and school prayer, but these attempts have been less frequent and far less successful than those to rewrite statutes. Efforts to overturn the Court's rulings have also resulted in introduction of numerous proposals to amend the Constitution, but most such proposals die. Only a few—the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT, CIVIL WAR amendments, SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT, and TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT—have been both submitted and ratified.

The impact of the Supreme Court's decisions extends well beyond the other branches of the national government. Controversial Supreme Court rulings have affected public opinion and have produced divided editorial reaction on a wide range of decisions. Changes in the public's feelings of trust or confidence in the Court have paralleled changes in feeling about the presidency and Congress but generally have been somewhat more positive. Such ratings have changed rapidly, but shifts in the Court's doctrine on controversial topics (such as CRIMINAL PROCEDURE) in the direction of public opinion usually are not immediately reflected in changed public opinion ratings.

The public generally supports the Court's work. Those giving the Court general (or "diffuse") support, however, outnumber those giving the Court specific support (for particular rulings) by a large ratio. The proportion of the public that feels the Court may legitimately produce structural political change is quite small. Acquiescence in the Court's rulings, which helps produce compliance, has been more common than active approval of the decisions.

The public also has little information about the Court. Even many controversial decisions fail to penetrate the general public's consciousness. The greater the knowledge, however, the greater the *dis*approval, but those reporting negative views on specific cases outnumber those whose general view of the Court is negative. Those with negative views also tend to hold them more intensely, but seldom would most members of the public do more than write letters of protest; demonstrations and other overt protest are atypical. Negative views about the Court are usually accounted for by reactions to the few specific decisions that catch the attention of large proportions of the public. Those salient decisions change with considerable rapidity, shifting in the 1960s from civil rights and school prayer to criminal procedure.

The Supreme Court's impact on the states and local communities is varied. Effectuating many decisions involves little controversy, and implementation may be prompt and complete, particularly if actions of only a few public officials are necessary. Other rulings, such as those on school DESEGREGATION, school prayer, and criminal procedure, produce a disproportionate amount both of resistance or attempts to evade and of critical rhetoric—rhetoric at times not matched by reality. Despite claims that the warnings required by MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) would have a negative impact on police work, suspects and defendants often talk to police after being "read their rights." However, even these criticized rulings have definite impacts, for example, more professional police work as a result of criminal procedure rulings. Although opponents of the rule that improperly seized evidence should be excluded (the EXCLUSIONARY RULE of MAPP V. OHIO, 1961) have claimed that the rule does not deter illegal seizures and is too costly because guilty defendants are set free, some studies have suggested that the rule might be having some of its intended effect. At least in some cities, few cases were dropped after motions to suppress evidence and a higher proportion of searches conducted after the rule was promulgated were constitutional.

If people are to comply with Supreme Court rulings or if the rulings are to have an impact, they must be communicated to those expected to implement or adhere to them. One cannot, however, assume that effective communication takes place. A ruling may have to be transmitted through several levels, at each of which distortion can be introduced, before reaching its ultimate audience. Lawyers may be accustomed to easy access to the Court's published opinions, but many others, such as police or school officials, often do not receive the opinions or have such direct access to them and must therefore rely on other means of communication through which to learn of them.

The mass media, with the exception of a few newspapers, provide only sketchy information about the Court's decisions. Specialized media, for example, trade publications, provide only erratic coverage even of decisions relevant to the groups for which they are published. Most newspapers and radio and television stations must rely on the wire services for information about Supreme Court rulings. Disproportionate nationwide emphasis is given to decisions the wire services emphasize, with little or no coverage given to other rulings. The media also have different patterns of coverage ("profiles"). Newspapers, for example, give more attention to postdecision events, while the wire services and television pay more attention to cases before they are decided. All the media, however, generally convey much information about immediate reaction to, or impact of, decisions instead of emphasizing the content of, or rationale for, the Court's rulings.

The lower courts do not constitute a bureaucratic structure through which decisions are fully communicated downward. Lawyers thus become particularly important in transmitting the Court's rulings, as they are in transmitting any law. Lower court judges who do not routinely follow the Court's decisions may find out about them only if lawyers arguing cases cite the decisions, which they do not always do accurately. Lawyers, either individually or through their bar associations, do little to inform the general public about developments in the law. Some state attorneys general and local prosecutors undertake to inform state and local officials of recent rulings affecting their work. The failure of these officials to do so in most locations has led some local agencies, which can afford to do so, to hire their own lawyers, for example, police department "police legal advisers," to monitor the Court's rulings, provide appropriate information to the agency, and arrange for implementation.

Training programs—effective because they combine printed materials with oral presentation—can be particularly important in the transmission of rulings. They are especially necessary because the educational system has generally done little to educate students, later to be members of the general public, about the Court's functioning or its rulings. Training programs are, however, not available to all those expected to be cognizant or familiar with the Court's rulings. Many members of some important occupational groups such as the police do not receive adequate legal training about the Court's decisions. Even if initially well-trained, they are less likely to receive adequate follow-up through in-service training.

The impact of the Court's decisions is, of course, affected by far more than deficiencies and distortions in the lengthy, often convoluted process by which the decisions are communicated. Numerous other factors affect both the communication process, thus indirectly affecting impact, and impact itself. One is the legitimacy attributed to the Court and its work. If a particular audience, for example, the police during the WARREN COURT's "criminal procedure revolution," feels that the Court is not acting fairly or lacks appropriate information on which to base its decisions, that audience will heed the Court's word less carefully even when the opinions are fully communicated. Characteristics of the Court's rulings, such as their relative unanimity and relative clarity or ambiguity, are also important, as both unanimity and clarity are thought to produce greater compliance. In new and sensitive areas of policy such as civil rights and criminal procedure, the lower courts can exercise power over the Supreme Court by their resistance. Rulings by lower court judges applying and extending (or narrowing) the Court's decisions are particularly important in such situations and in those where gaps in doctrinal development—a result of case-by-case development of the law—leave unanswered questions. In many, perhaps most, areas of the law, however, lower court judges enforce Supreme Court rulings because those rulings are a matter of relative personal indifference for the judges, because they have been socialized to follow those rulings, and because they wish to avoid being reversed.

Whether someone follows up a decision, who that "someone" is, and how they act, also affect a decision's impact. Elites' support for a decision may be able to calm negative public reaction. The likelihood that desegregation would be accepted in either the short or long run was decreased because southern elites were not favorably disposed toward either the result of BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) or the Court's opinion. Because most rulings of the Court are not self-enforcing, follow-up by government agencies is often crucial for effective implementation. Officials not committed to the values in the Court's rulings are less likely to be assiduous in their follow-up; thus the attitudes of individual decision makers, particularly those in key policymaking or enforcement positions, are of considerable importance.

The situation into which a Supreme Court ruling is "injected"—whether in a crisis or in normal times—also affects the ruling's impact. A local community's belief system and its past history both are part of that situation. So are community pressures on the individuals expected to carry out the Court's dictates. Often a wide variety of enforcement mechanisms must be used before compliance is achieved. Incentive systems in organizations can lead individuals either to follow the Court's rulings or to continue existing practices. Because organizations have considerable interest in maintaining such practices, externally imposed penalties may be insufficient to produce required change.

To overcome problems of communicating Supreme Court rulings so that they reach the appropriate audience might seem insuperable. The Court's rulings are, however, often complied with and do have widespread impact. Were it otherwise, we should not hear so much about the problems occurring in particularly sensitive areas of the law such as civil rights and CIVIL LIBERTIES. The difficulties in implementing the Court's decisions to achieve their greatest impact should remind us that, as an active policymaker, the Supreme Court faces many of the same problems faced by other policymaking institutions.

STEPHEN L. WASBY
(1986)

Bibliography

BECKER, THEODORE L. and FEELEY, MALCOLM, eds. 1973 The Impact of Supreme Court Decisions: Empirical Studies, 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press.

JOHNSON, CHARLES A. and CANON, BRADLEY C. 1984 Judicial Policies: Implementation and Impact. Washington D.C.: Congressional Quarterly Press.

KRISLOV, SAMUEL, ed. 1972 Compliance and the Law: A Multidisciplinary Approach. Beverly Hills, Calif.: Sage Publications.

WASBY, STEPHEN L. 1970 The Impact of the United States Supreme Court: Some Perspectives. Homewood, Ill.: Dorsey Press.

SUPREME COURT OPINIONS

See: Advisory Opinion; Concurring Opinion; Dissenting Opinion; Grounds of Opinion; Opinion of the Court; Plurality Opinion; Public Understanding of Supreme Court Opinions

SUPREME COURT PRACTICE

The SUPREME COURT is the only judicial body created by the Constitution. Article III, Section 1, specifies that "The JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." The judges of that "one supreme Court," like the judges of the inferior courts created by Congress, are to hold their offices "during GOOD BEHAVIOUR" and to suffer no diminution of compensation during their continuance in office. Supreme Court Justices can be impeached, however. And it is not constitutionally clear that their "good Behaviour" term of office is the equivalent of a life term, as generally thought.

In practice, this "one supreme Court" has always acted as a unitary body. That means that the Court never divides into panels or groups of Justices for purposes of resolving matters submitted to the Court. All petitions and briefs are circulated to, and considered by, all participating Justices; and all Court decisions are rendered on behalf of the Court as a unit of nine Justices.

Article III of the Constitution, in establishing the judicial institution known as the Supreme Court, vests in the Court two basic kinds of jurisdiction: ORIGINAL JURISDICTION and APPELLATE JURISDICTION. The Court's original jurisdiction is its power to decide certain cases and controversies in the first instance. Its appellate jurisdiction is its power to review certain cases and controversies decided in the first instance by lower courts.

In COHENS V. VIRGINIA (1821), Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL stated that the Court "must decide" a case before it that is properly within one of these two areas of jurisdiction, and that the Court has "no more right to decline the exercise of jurisdiction which is given, than to usurp that which is not given . . . [either of which] would be treason to the Constitution." But in the Court's judicial world, Marshall's proposition is no longer universally true, if it ever was. The modern need to control and limit the voluminous number of cases clamoring for review has forced the Court to resist demands that every facet of the Court's vested jurisdiction be exercised. Limitations of time and human energy simply do not permit the luxury of resolving every dispute that comes before the Court. Notions of judicial prudence and sound discretion, given these limitations, have thus become dominant in the Court's selection of those relatively few cases it feels it can afford to review in a plenary fashion and to resolve the merits. Such factors are evident in the Court's control of both its original docket and its appellate docket.

Section 2 of Article III specifies that the Supreme Court "shall have original jurisdiction" in all cases "affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party." Compared with cases on the appellate docket, cases on the original docket are quite few in number. Indeed, cases involving ambassadors, ministers, and consuls have never been common and have virtually disappeared from the original docket. The typical original case has thus become that in which a state is the plaintiff or defendant; most frequent are suits between two or more states over boundaries and water rights, suits that cannot appropriately be handled by any other tribunal. States have also sued each other over state financial obligations, use of natural resources, multistate domiciliary and escheat problems, breaches of contracts between states, and various kinds of injuries to the public health and welfare of the complaining state.

States can also invoke the Court's original jurisdiction to sue private nonresident citizens, or ALIENS, for alleged injuries to the sovereign interests of the complaining state. And a state may bring such suits on behalf of all its citizens to protect the economy and natural resources of the state, as well as the health and welfare of the citizens. The ELEVENTH AMENDMENT bars an original action against a defendant state brought by a private plaintiff who is a citizen of another state; and the sovereign immunity principle recognized by that Amendment also bars such an action by a citizen of the defendant state. Because that amendment does not apply to the federal sovereign as plaintiff, the United States can bring an original action in the Supreme Court against a defendant state. All cases brought by a state against a private party defendant, however, fall within the nonexclusive category of the Court's original jurisdiction; such suits can alternatively be brought in some other federal or state court. The Court in recent years has sought to reduce its original docket workload by rejecting some nonexclusive causes of action and requiring the parties to proceed in an available alternative forum.

Original cases often involve factual disputes. In processing such cases, the Court considers itself the equivalent of a federal trial court, though with significant differences. The Court's rules and procedures in this respect are not very specific, and practices may vary from case to case. The case starts with a motion for leave to file a complaint, a requirement that permits the Court to consider and resolve jurisdictional and prudential objections. If the Court denies the motion for leave to file, the case terminates. If the motion is granted, the complaint is ordered filed, the defendant files an answer, and in most instances a trial ensues.

The Justices themselves do not conduct trials in original cases. Instead, they appoint a member of the bar or a retired lower court judge to serve as a special master. The special master then takes evidence, hears witnesses, makes fact-findings, and recommends legal conclusions. But all rulings, findings, and conclusions of the special master are subject to review by the Court. That review occurs after parties aggrieved by the special master's actions have filed exceptions thereto; all parties then brief and orally argue the exceptions before the entire Court, which decides the case by written opinion. A complicated case may require more than one hearing before the special master and more than one opinion by the Court, prolonging the case for years.

The Court itself has admitted that it is "ill-equipped for the task of factfinding and so forced, in original cases, awkwardly to play the role of factfinder without actually presiding over the introduction of evidence." Original cases take away valuable time and attention from the Court's main mission, the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, where the Court serves as the prime overseer of important matters of federal constitutional and statutory law. The Court is thus increasingly disposed to construe its original jurisdiction narrowly, exercising that jurisdiction only where the parties cannot secure an initial resolution of their controversy in another tribunal. If there is such an alternative proceeding, the Court prefers to REMAND the parties to the lower court and to deal with any important issues in the case on review of the lower court's determination.

The Court's appellate jurisdiction is also defined and vested by Article III, section 2. That jurisdiction extends to all categories of CASES AND CONTROVERSIES, decided in the first instance by lower federal courts or state courts, that fall within the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES. Those categories include: cases arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States; cases affecting ambassadors, ministers, and consuls; cases of ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME JURISDICTION; controversies to which the United States is a party; controversies between two or more states; and controversies between a state and citizens of another state, between citizens of different states, between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants of different states, or between a state or its citizens and foreign states or citizens. The Court's appellate jurisdiction extends "both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."

The exceptions clause in section 2 contains within it a constitutional enigma, as yet unsolved. The problem is the extent of Congress's power to control and limit the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction. The Court has never held that its appellate jurisdiction is coterminous with the section 2 categories of judicial power. Consistently since Wiscart v. Dauchy (1796) the Court has said, albeit often by way of OBITER DICTUM, that it can exercise appellate jurisdiction only to the extent permitted by acts of Congress, and that a legislative denial of jurisdiction may be implied from a failure by Congress to make an affirmative grant of jurisdiction. The Court, in other words, assumes that its appellate jurisdiction comes from statutes, not directly from section 2 of Article III. The assumption is that Congress cannot add to the constitutional definitions of appellate jurisdiction, but that Congress can subtract from or make exceptions to those definitions.

It is clear that Congress has made broad statutory grants of jurisdiction to the Court, though not to the full extent permitted by section 2. These affirmative grants have always been sufficient to permit the Court to fulfill its essential function of interpreting and applying the Constitution and of insuring the supremacy of federal law. So far, the statutory omissions and limitations have not hobbled the performance of that function.

At the same time, periodic proposals have been made in Congress to use the exceptions clause to legislate certain exclusions from the appellate jurisdiction previously granted by Congress. Such proposals usually spring from displeasure with Court decisions dealing with specific constitutional matters. The proponents would simply excise those areas of appellate jurisdiction that permit the Court to render the objectionable decisions. Many commentators contend that the exceptions clause was not designed to authorize Congress to strip the Court of power to perform its essential function of overseeing the development of constitutional doctrines and guarantees. Objections are also raised that such legislative excisions are mere subterfuges for overruling constitutional rights established by the Court, a most serious infringement of the separation of powers doctrine. Because no jurisdictional excisions of this broad nature have been enacted, the Court has yet to speak to this constitutional conundrum. (See JUDICIAL SYSTEM.)

Whatever the outer limits of the exceptions clause, Congress since 1789 has vested in the Court broad appellate power to review lower court decisions that fall within the constitutional "case or controversy" categories. Statutes permit the Court to review virtually all decisions of lower federal appellate courts, as well as a limited number of decisions of federal trial courts. And Congress has from the start given the Court jurisdiction to review decisions of the highest state courts that deal with federal constitutional, treaty, or statutory matters.

An ingredient of most jurisdictional statutes are legislative directions as to the mode by which the Court's appellate powers are to be invoked. In modern times, most lower court decisions are made reviewable by way of WRIT OF CERTIORARI or, in a declining number of specialized instances, by way of APPEAL. Congress permits the Court to issue its own extraordinary writs, such as HABEAS CORPUS or MANDAMUS, and to review certain matters not otherwise reviewable on certiorari or appeal; and there is a rarely used authorization for lower federal appellate court CERTIFICATION of difficult questions to be answered by the Supreme Court.

At COMMON LAW, the term "certiorari" means an original writ commanding lower court judges or officers to certify and transfer the record of the lower court proceedings in a case under review by a higher court. In the Supreme Court lexicon, the common law meaning of the term has been modified and expanded. Certiorari refers generally to the entire process of discretionary review by the Supreme Court of a lower court decision. Such review is sought by filing a petition for writ of certiorari. That document sets forth in short order the reasons why the questions presented by the decision below are so nationally important that the Court should review the case and resolve those questions on the merits. In most cases, the record in the court below is not routinely filed in the Court along with the petition.

Each Justice, after reviewing the petition for certiorari, the brief in opposition, and the opinion below, makes his or her own subjective assessment as to the appropriateness of plenary review by the entire Court. Such review is granted only if at least four Justices vote to grant the petition, a practice known as the RULE OF FOUR. If the petition is granted, a formal order to that effect is entered; copies of the order are sent to the parties and to the court below, which is then requested to transmit a certified copy of the record. But at no time does any writ of certiorari issue from the Court. The parties proceed thereafter to brief and argue orally the questions presented in the petition.

An appeal, on the other hand, refers to a theoretically obligatory type of review by the Supreme Court. That means that once the appeal is properly filed and docketed, the Court must somehow consider and dispose of the case on its merits. There is said to be no discretion to refuse to make such a decision on the merits of the appeal, which serves to distinguish an appeal from a certiorari case.

To invoke the Court's review powers by way of appeal, the aggrieved party first files a short notice of appeal in the lower court and then dockets the appeal in the Supreme Court by filing a document entitled "jurisdictional statement." Apart from the different title, a jurisdictional statement is remarkably like a petition for writ of certiorari. Like a petition, the jurisdictional statement sets forth briefly the reasons why the issues are so substantial, or important, "as to require plenary consideration, with briefs on the merits and oral argument, for their resolution." The Rule of Four is followed in considering whether to grant plenary consideration of an appeal. Such a grant takes the form of an order to the effect that "probable jurisdiction is noted," although if there remains any question as to whether the case complies with the technical jurisdictional requirements of an appeal, the order is changed to read: "further consideration of the question of jurisdiction is postponed to the hearing of the case on the merits." The appeal then follows the pattern of a certiorari case with respect to obtaining the record from the lower court(s), briefing the questions presented, and arguing orally before the Court.

As if to underscore the similarity between a jurisdictional statement and a petition for writ of certiorari, Congress has directed the Court, in situations where a party has "improvidently" taken an appeal "where the proper mode of review is by petition for certiorari," to consider and act on the jurisdictional statement as if it were a petition for writ of certiorari, and then either granting or denying certiorari. Thus a party cannot be prejudiced by seeking the wrong mode of Supreme Court review.

There is, however, one historical and confusing difference in the Court's summary disposition of certiorari cases and appeals, a difference springing from the notion that the Court is obliged to dispose of all appeals on their merits. When a petition for writ of certiorari is denied, the order denying the petition has no precedential value. It means only that fewer than four Justices, or perhaps none at all, want to hear and decide the merits of the questions presented. That is the end of the case.

But when fewer than four Justices wish to hear an appeal in a plenary manner, the long-held theory is that the Court is still compelled to dispose of the appeal on the merits of the questions presented. To comply with this theory, which is judge-made and not dictated by Congress, the Court has constructed a number of one-line orders, any one of which can be used to dismiss or dispose of the appeal without further briefing or oral argument. A typical order of this nature, used particularly in appeals from state court decisions, reads: "the appeal is dismissed for want of a substantial FEDERAL QUESTION." Such summary orders, which are devoid of explanation of the insubstantiality of the question involved, consistently have been held to be precedents. The Court has said that they must be understood and followed by state and lower federal courts.

In 1978, all nine Justices publicly conceded to the Congress that, while these summary dispositions of appeals are decisions on the merits, experience has shown that they "often are uncertain guides to the courts bound to follow them and not infrequently create more confusion than clarity." The Justices accordingly asked Congress to eliminate virtually all appeals, thereby recognizing formally that the Court's appellate jurisdiction is almost wholly discretionary. Congress has yet to respond.

At the start in 1789 and for a century thereafter, the Court was authorized to exercise only mandatory jurisdiction, either by way of appeal or a closely related process known as WRIT OF ERROR. But as the nation expanded and matured, litigation proliferated. It became evident toward the end of the nineteenth century that the Court could not keep up with its growing docket if it had to continue resolving the merits of every case that was filed. Gradually, Congress began to withdraw some of this mandatory jurisdiction from the Court, replacing it with discretionary jurisdiction by way of certiorari. But it was not until 1925 that Congress decreed a major shift toward discretionary review powers. At that time the dockets of the Court were so clogged with mandatory appeals and writs of error that litigants had to wait two and three years to have their cases decided. In the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1925, written largely at the suggestion of the Court, Congress transferred large segments of appellate jurisdiction from the obligatory to the discretionary category. Fully eighty percent of the Court's docket thereafter was of the certiorari variety.

But the 1925 transfer proved insufficient. During the 1970s, Congress eliminated many of the remaining appeals that could be taken from lower federal courts, leaving only a handful within the federal sector of Supreme Court jurisdiction. The largest pocket of mandatory appeals left untouched consists of appeals from state court decisions validating state statutes in the face of federal constitutional challenges. The caseload explosions in the 1970s and 1980s, which saw the Court's annual case filings rising near the 5,000 mark, created pressure to eliminate all significant remnants of mandatory appeal jurisdiction.

Nearly one-half of these filed cases are petitions and applications filed by prisoners, petitions that are often frivolous and thus quickly disposed of. But from the overall pool of some 5,000 cases the Justices select about 150 cases each term for plenary review and resolution. The Justices feel that time limitations do not permit them to dispose of many more than 150 important and complex controversies, although they do manage to dispose of another 200 or so cases in a summary fashion, without briefs or oral arguments. In any event, the number of cases granted full review has hovered around the 150 mark for many of the last fifty years. This constancy is largely the product of the discretion and the docket control inherent in the certiorari jurisdiction. Without discretion to deny review to more than ninety-five percent of the certiorari petitions filed each year, the Court's ability to function efficiently would soon cease.

The procedures by which the Court achieves this docket control and makes this vital selection of cases for plenary review are simple but not well understood by the public. And some of the processes change as workloads increase and issues tend to become more difficult of resolution. As of the 1980s, the procedures may be summarized as follows:

By law, the Supreme Court begins its annual TERM, or working session, on the first Monday in October. Known as the October Term, this session officially runs for a full year, eliminating the prior practice of convening special sessions during the summer to hear urgent matters. But for most administrative purposes, each term continues for about nine months, October through June, or until all cases considered ready for disposition have been resolved. At that point, the Court normally recesses without formally adjourning until the following October.

The Court usually disposes of requests for review, hears oral arguments, and issues written opinions only during the nine-month working portion of the term. But the Court never closes for purposes of accepting new cases, as well as briefs and motions in pending cases. That means that filing time requirements are never waived during the summer recess; parties must respect those requirements in all seasons. In most civil cases, certiorari petitions and jurisdictional statements must be filed within ninety days from the entry of judgment, or from the denial of rehearing, in the court below. This filing period is only sixty days in criminal cases, federal or state.

As soon as opposing parties have filed briefs or motions in response to a certiorari petition or jurisdictional statement, these documents are circulated to all nine Justices. These circulations occur on a weekly basis all year round. The circulated cases are then scheduled by the Court's clerk for disposition by the Justices at the next appropriate CONFERENCE. Cases circulated during the summer recess accumulate for consideration at a lengthy conference held just before the opening of the new October term. Cases circulated during term time are considered at a conference held about two weeks after a given weekly circulation.

The massive numbers of case filings make it impossible for every Justice personally to examine these thousands of documents, although some may try. Most are aided in this task by law CLERKS, each Justice being entitled to employ four. The clerks often have the task of reading these documents and reducing them to short memoranda for the convenience of their respective Justices. In recent years, a number of Justices have used a "cert pool" system, whereby law clerk resources in several chambers are pooled to produce memoranda for the joint use of all the participating Justices. But whether a Justice reads all these matters or is assisted by law clerk memoranda, the ultimate discretionary judgments made respecting the grant or denial of review are necessarily those of each Justice. Law clerks simply do not make critical judgments or cast votes.

Law clerks are selected personally by each Justice, a practice dating back to 1882 when Justice HORACE GRAY first employed a top Harvard Law School graduate. In modern times, clerks are invariably selected from among recent law school graduates with superior academic records. And many Justices require that their clerks also have clerked for lower court judges. The clerks normally stay with their Justices for one term only, though some have served longer. Many law clerks have gone on to distinguished legal careers of their own. Three of them have become Supreme Court Justices: Justices BYRON R. WHITE, WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, and JOHN PAUL STEVENS.

An important element of each Justice's workload is to act in the capacity of Circuit Justice, a vestigial remnant of the earlier circuit-riding tasks. For this purpose, each Justice is assigned one or more federal judicial circuits, which divide the nation into twelve geographical areas. The Justice assigned to a particular circuit handles a variety of preliminary motions and applications in cases originating in the area covered by the circuit. Included are such matters as applications for stays of lower court judgments pending action on a petition for certiorari, applications in criminal cases for bail or release pending such action, and applications to extend the time for filing certiorari or appeal cases. Law clerks frequently assist in processing these applications, and on occasion an application may be disposed of by a written "in chambers" opinion of the Circuit Justice.

The Court no longer discusses every certiorari petition at conference. The excessive number of petitions makes it necessary and appropriate to curtail collegial discussion of petitions at the formal conferences of the Justices. At present, the Chief Justice circulates a "discuss list," a list of cases in a given weekly circulation deemed worthy of discussion and formal voting at conference. All appeals are discussed at conference, but rarely more than thirty percent of the certiorari cases are listed for discussion. Any Justice may add an omitted case to the list, however. Review is then automatically denied to any unlisted case, without conference consideration.

Decisions whether to grant or deny review of cases on the "discuss list" are reached at one of the periodic secret conferences. During term time, conferences are normally held each Friday during the weeks when oral arguments are heard, and on the Friday just before the commencement of each two-week oral argument period. Conferences can be held on other days as well. Only the Justices are present at these conferences; no law clerks or secretaries are permitted to attend.

Conferences are held in a well-appointed room adjacent to the Chief Justice's chambers, which are to the rear of the courtroom. The conference begins with exchanges of handshakes among the Justices, a custom originating in 1888. Coffee is available from a silver urn. The typical conference begins with discussion and disposition of the "discuss list" cases, appeals being considered first. The Chief Justice leads the discussion of each case, followed by each associate Justice in order of seniority. Any formal voting takes place in reverse order of seniority. Then, if there are argued cases to be decided, a similar order of discussion and voting is followed. Argued cases, however, may be discussed at other conferences scheduled immediately after a day or two of oral arguments, thus making the Friday conferences less lengthy.

Using the Rule of Four at these conferences, the Court selects from the pool of "discuss list" cases those that it will review and resolve on the merits, following full briefs and oral argument. A few cases, however, may be granted review and then resolved immediately in a summary manner without briefs or oral argument, by way of a PER CURIAM written opinion. Such summary disposition has been much criticized by those who lose their cases without being fully heard, but the practice has been codified in the Court's rules. The important point is that it is the cases that are selected at these conferences for plenary review that account for the 150 or so cases at the core of the Court's workload each term.

The cases thus selected for full review reflect issues that, in the Justices' view, are of national significance. It is not enough that the issues are important to the parties to the case; they must be generally important. But the Court rarely if ever explains why review is denied, or why the issues were not deemed important enough to warrant plenary attention. There are occasional written explanatory dissents from the denial of review, but these can only express the views of a minority. Review is granted only when four or more Justices are subjectively convinced that there are special and important reasons for reviewing the questions presented, which may or may not involve a conflict among lower courts as to how to resolve such questions. It bears emphasis that the exercise of this kind of discretionary judgment enables the Court to control its docket and to limit the extent of its plenary workload.

When a "discuss list" case is granted review, the petitioning party has forty-five days in which to file a brief on the merits, together with a printed record appendix. The opposing party then has thirty days to file a brief on the merits. Briefs of intervening parties and AMICI CURIAE, if there are any in a given case, are filed during these periods. When all briefs are in, the case is ready to be scheduled for oral argument.

Oral argument before the Justices occurs only on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of a scheduled week of argument, leaving the other weekdays available for work and conferences. Usually, fourteen weeks of oral argument are scheduled, in two-week segments from October through April. One hour of argument is allowed in most cases, one-half hour for each side. Arguments start promptly at 10 a.m. and end at 3 p.m., with a lunch adjournment from noon to 1 p.m. The Justices are well prepared, having read the briefs. Some may also be aided by "bench memos" prepared by their law clerks, memoranda that outline the critical facts and the opposing arguments. Counsel arguing a case may thus expect sharp and penetrating questions from the bench; and counsel are warned by the Court's rules not to read arguments from a prepared text.

Sometime during the week in which a particular case has been argued, the Court meets in secret conference to decide the merits of that case. With the Chief Justice presiding and leading the discussion, the normal pattern of collegial discussion and voting takes place. But the vote reached at conference is necessarily tentative and subject to change as work begins on opinion writing. Shortly after the vote is taken, the case is assigned to one of the Justices to draft an opinion for the Court. The assignment is made by the senior Justice in the majority, if the vote is split. Normally, the assignment is made by the Chief Justice, unless he is in dissent.

The Justice assigned to write an opinion for the Court then begins work on a draft. This is essentially a lonely task. Following the conference discussion, there is little time for further collegial consultation among the Justices in the preparation of an opinion. Depending upon the work patterns of a particular Justice, the law clerks may engage in much of the research and analysis that underlie scholarly opinions; some clerks may be assigned the task of producing drafts of an opinion, while some Justices may do all the drafting themselves. Since 1981, drafting of opinions has been mechanically made easier by the installation of word processors in each Justice's chambers.

Once the draft of the majority opinion has been completed, it is circulated to all other members of the Court. The other Justices may suggest various changes or additions to the draft. To become an opinion of the Court, the draft opinion must attract the adherence and agreement of a majority of five Justices, which sometimes requires the author of the draft to accept modifications suggested by another Justice as the price of the latter's adherence. One or more of the Justices who cannot accept the reasoning or the result of the draft opinion then may produce their own drafts of CONCURRING or DISSENTING OPINIONS. The circulation of these separate opinion drafts may in turn cause the author of the majority draft to make further changes by way of answer to arguments made in a draft concurrence or dissent. Thus nothing is truly final until the collegial exchange of opinions is complete, the votes are set in concrete, and the result is considered ready for public announcement. Even then, there are cases in which the Court cannot reach a majority censensus, resulting in simply an announcement of the judgment of the Court accompanied by a number of PLURALITY, concurring, and dissenting opinions. The difficulty sometimes encountered in reaching a clear-cut majority result, while distressing to the bar and the lower courts, is generally reflective of the difficulty and complexity of some of the momentous issues that reach the Court.

The opinions and judgments of the Court in argued cases are announced publicly in the courtroom. At one time, opinions were uniformly announced on what became known as Opinion Monday. But the Court found that too many opinions announced on a Monday, particularly toward the end of a term, made it difficult for the press to give adequate media coverage to important Court rulings. The Court now announces opinions on any day it sits, thereby spreading out opinion announcements. In weeks in which oral arguments are scheduled for three days, the practice is to announce opinions only on a Tuesday or Wednesday, leaving Monday for the announcement of summary orders. Opinions may still be announced on a Monday, particularly if no oral arguments are scheduled for that day. After all oral arguments have been heard, usually by the end of April, opinions can be announced on any given Monday, when the Court sits to announce summary orders, or on any other day of the week that the Court wishes to sit solely to announce opinions.

The practices regarding the announcement of opinions in open court change from time to time. At one time, many opinions were read by the authors in full or in substantial part. More recently the Justices have tended merely to give short summaries save in the most important cases; in some less important cases only the result is announced. All opinions and orders are made available to the public and the news media a few moments after the courtroom announcements. Eventually, opinions and orders appear in bound volumes known as the United States Reports.

When the Court first convened in February of 1790, one of its first actions was to prescribe qualifications for lawyers wishing to practice before the Court. The original rule, in language very like that of the present rule, established two requirements: the attorney must have been admitted to practice in a state supreme court "for three years past," and the attorney's "private and professional character" must appear to be good.

Nearly 200,000 attorneys have been admitted to the Supreme Court bar since the Court was established. In recent times, as many as 6,000 have been admitted in a year. Prior to 1970, an attorney could be admitted only on motion of a sponsor in open court, before all the Justices. But the Court found that so much time was taken in listening to these routine motions and admissions and that it was often so expensive for a lawyer to travel to Washington from afar just to engage in this briefest of ceremonies, that an alternative "mail-order" procedure should be made available. Most attorneys today are admitted by mail, although some prefer to follow the earlier practice of being admitted in open court.

The modern Supreme Court bar has no formal structure or leadership. It is largely a heterogeneous collection of individual lawyers located in all parts of the nation. Many members of the bar never practice before the Court, and even fewer ever have the opportunity to argue orally. Most private practitioners who do have occasion to argue orally do so on a "once-in-a-lifetime" basis. Those who appear with some regularity before the Court are usually connected with an organization or governmental group specializing in Supreme Court litigation, such as the office of the SOLICITOR GENERAL of the United States. Gone are the days when private legal giants, such as DANIEL WEBSTER, were repeatedly employed specially by litigants to present oral arguments before the Court.

While a lay litigant may prepare and file petitions and briefs on the litigant's own behalf, without the aid of a member of the bar, the complexities and subtleties of modern practice make such self-help increasingly inadvisable. Only in the rarest of circumstances will the Court permit a lay litigant to present oral argument. Those imprisoned have frequently filed their own petitions for certiorari, seeking some sort of review of their criminal convictions. Indeed, about half of the nearly 5,000 case filings per year can be ascribed to prisoner petitions. The Court catalogues these petitions on its IN FORMA PAUPERIS docket but gives them the same careful treatment it gives petitions filed on behalf of clients who can afford to pay filing and printing costs.

The Court will, on application by an impecunious litigant or prisoner, appoint a member of the Court's bar to prepare briefs on the merits and to present oral arguments, once review has been granted in the case. But the Court will not appoint a lawyer to aid in preparing and filing a petition for certiorari or jurisdictional statement. Legal aid programs operating in most lower courts usually insure that a lawyer appointed or volunteering to represent a prisoner in the lower courts will be available to file such documents in the Supreme Court.

Such are the basic processes and procedures that enable the Court to perform its historic missions. As the Court approaches its third century, the Justices are deeply concerned with the Court's growing workload and the resulting effect upon the quality of its decision making. The Court's internal and external procedures have been streamlined and perfected about as much as possible. Some restructuring of its jurisdiction and functions seems necessary. Yet despite these perceived shortcomings, the Court has managed to maintain its prime role in the evolving history of the American legal system. The Court's effective performance of that role is due in no small part to the procedures and rules established for those who practice before it.

EUGENE GRESSMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

STERN, ROBERT L.; GRESSMAN, EUGENE; and SHAPIRO, STEPHEN M. 1986 Supreme Court Practice, 6th ed. Washington, D.C.: Bureau of National Affairs.

SUPREME COURT'S WORK LOAD

With the growth of population and the enormous expansion of federal law in the post-NEW DEAL period, the business of the federal courts has mushroomed. This increase is most striking in the first two tiers of the federal judicial pyramid. In the years 1960–1983, cases filed in UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS more than tripled, from 80,000 to 280,000, but cases docketed in the UNITED STATES COURTS OF APPEALS during the same period increased eightfold, from 3,765 to 25,580. To cope with this rise in appeals, Congress more than doubled the number of appellate judgeships. Not surprisingly, a similar growth can be found in Supreme Court filings: decade averages have increased in units of a thousand, from 1,516 per term in the 1950s to 2,639 in the 1960s, to 3,683 in the 1970s, to 4,422 in the 1981 term and 4,806 in the 1988 term.

The contrast between this explosion in federal judicial business and the fixed decisional capacity of the Supreme Court—the nine Justices sitting as a full bench hear an average of 150 argued cases per year—has led to persistent calls for enhancing the appellate capacity of the federal system. A number of proposals have emerged since 1970, none resulting in legislation. In 1971 the Study Commission on the Caseload of the Supreme Court, chaired by PAUL A. FREUND of the Harvard Law School, recommended creation of a National Court of Appeals (NCA) that would assume the Supreme Court's task of selecting cases for review. The Freund committee believed that the selection process consumed time and energy the Justices might better spend in deliberation and opinion writing. This proposal died at birth. In 1972, Congress created the Commission on Revision of the Federal Court Appellate System, chaired by Senator Roman Hruska. The Hruska commission envisioned a mechanism for national resolution of open intercircuit conflicts, recommending an NCA that would hear cases referred to it by the Supreme Court or the United States Courts of Appeals. This NCA was to be a permanent tribunal, with its own institutional identity and personnel. In 1983, Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER publicly endorsed proposed legislation to create on an experimental basis an Intercircuit Tribunal of the United State Courts of Appeals (ICT), which would decide cases referred to it by the Supreme Court. The ICT would be comprised of judges drawn from the current courts of appeals who would sit for a specified number of years. This proposal drew faint support.

Other proposals have sought to enhance national appellate capacity without establishing new tribunals. The most recent recommendation of this type can be found in the 1990 report of the Federal Courts Study Committee, chaired by Judge Joseph F. Weis, Jr. The report urges Congress to give the Supreme Court authority, for an experimental period, to refer cases presenting unresolved intercircuit conflicts to a randomly selected court of appeals for a ruling by that court's full bench. These EN BANC determinations would be binding on all other courts, save the Supreme Court.

Many of these proposals are conceived as measures to alleviate the Supreme Court's work load. The work load problem is, however, not one of obligatory jurisdiction; the Court's APPELLATE JURISDICTION has been largely discretionary as far back as the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1925, but even more so after 1988 legislation repealing virtually all mandatory appeals. The Justices do have to screen all of the petitions filed. It is doubtful, though, that any of the recent proposals promise much relief on this score. The Freund committee's NCA did, but received widespread criticism for suggesting delegation of the selection function. It is hard to believe referral to an NCA or a randomly selected court of appeals would reduce the Court's screening burden, for the losing party would still be free to appeal to the High Court. Moreover, the Justices will not likely tolerate nationally binding resolutions with which they disagree. Indeed, the Court's case selection process may be significantly complicated by adoption of any of these proposals.

If the Court's overload is not a function of its mandatory jurisdiction and if its selection burden cannot be alleviated (under current proposals), what function is the Court failing to perform that it ought to perform?

Critics claim that the Court is unable to ensure uniformity in federal law, because 150 appeals a year must leave unresolved an intolerable number of intercircuit conflicts. The evidence for this contention is largely anecdotal, and what little empirical work exists is sharply contested in the literature. Significant disagreement exists as to what constitutes a "conflict." Are conflicts clear disagreements over a governing issue of law or simply different approaches to a legal issue that are capable ultimately of being reconciled? Much also depends on one's view of the costs and benefits of leaving particular conflicts unresolved for a time. Does the absence of a rule of intercircuit STARE DECISIS in the federal system reflect a deliberate policy of allowing disagreements to percolate? The continuing conflicts may aid the Court's selection process by highlighting legal issues requiring national resolution. Through the process of multicourt consideration, the conflicts may improve the final decision of the Supreme Court when it does intervene. Moreover, some conflicts do not require immediate resolution, because they involve questions of local procedure, or do not frustrate planning concerns of multicircuit actors, or are not capable of being exploited by litigant forum shopping.

A broader claim, one not dependent upon the incidence of intercircuit conflict, is also made: that the problem is fundamentally one of insufficient supervision of the panel rulings of the courts of appeals. That conflicts are appropriately left unresolved does not matter, the argument goes. Given the sheer number of appeals, the practical inability of many of the circuits to engage in en banc review, and the infinitesimal probability of Supreme Court review, the panels operate as a law unto themselves. This version of the case for enhancing appellate capacity does have some force. It is undeniable that the Court can no longer engage in the kind of direct oversight of the courts of appeals that was possible in the 1920s, when it reviewed one in ten appellate rulings.

Whether this inability to supervise creates a problem requiring new institutional arrangements is, however, debatable. At present the Supreme Court appears not to have on its docket enough cases warranting plenary review to fill its argument calendar. Moreover, whether the panels operate as such wayward institutions is not clear. Many a circuit has, for example, adopted a "mini" en banc procedure to ensure uniformity of law within the circuit and to promote reconciliation of intercircuit splits. Even if one concedes that the Supreme Court has a work load problem (or that there is a need for additional appellate capacity), will the oversight benefits of an additional layer of review in, say, another 150 cases outweigh the attendant costs? Or will these otherwise nationally binding rulings be irresistible candidates for immediate plenary review by the Supreme Court—and hence a new category of practically mandatory jurisdiction?

The expansion of federal judicial business is the result of an explosion in federal law. Creating new layers of appeals creates more law, but not law enjoying the peculiar finality of a Supreme Court resolution. Improvements can be made. They are more likely to be found, however, in legislation reducing forum choice in federal statutes and imposing sanctions for unwarranted appeals; better management by the courts of appeals of panel disagreements and a greater willingness to reconsider circuit law in light of developments elsewhere; and strategic deployment by the High Court of its scarce decisional resources.

SAMUEL ESTREICHER
(1992)

Bibliography

BAKER, THOMAS E. and MCFARLAND, DOUGLAS D. 1987 The Need for a New National Court. Harvard Law Review 100: 1401–1416.

ESTREICHER, SAMUEL and SEXTON, JOHN E. 1986 Redefining the Supreme Court's Role: A Theory of Managing the Federal Judicial Process. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

GINSBURG, RUTH BADER and HUBER, PETER W. 1987 The Intercircuit Committee. Harvard Law Review 100:1417–1435.

POSNER, RICHARD 1985 The Federal Courts: Crisis and Reform. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

STRAUSS, PETER L. 1987 One Hundred Fifty Cases per Year: Some Implications of the Supreme Court's Limited Resources for Judicial Review of Agency Action. Columbia Law Review 87:1093–1136.

SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION

Long before the term "suspect classification" gained currency, Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE captured the idea in his opinion for the Supreme Court in UNITED STATES V. CAROLENE PRODUCTS CO. (1938). While insisting on RATIONAL BASIS as the appropriate STANDARD OF REVIEW for cases involving ECONOMIC REGULATION, Stone suggested that "prejudice against DISCRETE AND INSULAR MINORITIES [that is, religious, or national, or racial minorities] may be a special condition, which tends seriously to curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities, and which may call for a correspondingly more searching judicial inquiry." In modern idiom, to call a legislative classification "suspect" is to suggest the possibility that it resulted from prejudice against the group it burdens, a possibility that justifies strict judicial scrutiny to assure that it is necessary to achieve a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST. In practice, most laws subject to this exacting standard are held invalid.

Irony attends the origins of the expression. Justice HUGO L. BLACK, writing for a majority in Korematsu v. United States (1944), one of the JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES, found no denial of EQUAL PROTECTION in an EXECUTIVE ORDER excluding American citizens of Japanese ancestry from the West Coast. Along the way to this extraordinary conclusion, however, he said: "all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect. That is not to say that all such restrictions are unconstitutional. It is to say that courts must subject them to the most rigid scrutiny." In Korematsu itself, the Court did no such thing; it paid the greatest deference to a "military" judgment that was chiefly political and steeped in racial prejudice. Yet Korematsu's main doctrinal legacy was that racial classifications were suspect.

In one view, this two-stage analysis, first identifying a classification as suspect and then subjecting it to STRICT SCRUTINY, is a roundabout way of addressing the issue of illicit legislative motives. (See LEGISLATION; WASHINGTON V. DAVIS.) Strict scrutiny is required in order to allay the suspicion that a law was designed to disadvantage a minority that lacked effective power in the legislature. That suspicion is laid to rest only by a showing that the law is well designed to achieve a legitimate purpose that has real importance. In another view, a classification based on race should be subjected to strict scrutiny because the immutable characteristic of race lends itself so well to a system thought dominated by stereotype, which automatically consigns a person to a general category, often implying inferiority. This concern for stigmatic harm is part of the substantive core of the equal protection clause, the principle of equal citizenship; the concern retains vitality even in an era when members of racial minorities have become electoral majorities in many of our major cities.

A number of egalitarian decisions in the later years of the WARREN COURT suggested a wide range of classifications that were candidates for inclusion by the Supreme Court in the "suspect" category: alienage, sex, ILLEGITIMACY, age, indigency. In the event, none of these candidates was accepted fully. Some classifications disadvantaging ALIENS were held "suspect," but many were not. The Court did significantly heighten the standard of review for most cases involving claimed denials of SEX DISCRIMINATION and gave some "bite" to the rational basis standard in cases involving illegitimacy. On the whole, however, the Court's behavior since the late 1970s suggests a determination to limit expansion of the list of suspect classifications, and thus to limit the occasions for active judicial supervision of legislation.

Some racial classifications are adopted as remedies for past societal discrimination based on race. Such an AFFIRMATIVE ACTION program presents neither of the principal dangers that have been said to require strict judicial scrutiny of racial classifications. There is less reason to suspect an illicit motive when a majoritarian body such as a legislature discriminates in favor of a historically disadvantaged minority, and the risk of stigmatic harm to a racial group is much reduced. Thus, varying majorities of the Supreme Court have consistently agreed that the appropriate standard of review for such remedial legislation, including RACIAL QUOTAS, is considerably less exacting than the strictest form of strict scrutiny.

The whole "suspect classifications" idea would seem to have outlived its usefulness. Surely the Supreme Court no longer needs the doctrine to justify its highest levels of intensity of judicial review. In race cases, for example, the Court needs no such locution in order to continue imposing on government a "heavy burden of justification" of laws imposing invidious racial discrimination. Abandonment of the rhetoric of suspect classifications would promote candor, by easing the way for open recognition of the sliding scale of standards of review now serving to cloak the Court's interest balancing. It would also remove a barrier, built into the very language of suspect "classifications," to doctrinal growth in the direction of affirmative governmental responsibility to alleviate those inequalities that prevent the realization of the principle of equal citizenship.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

BREST, PAUL A. 1976 The Supreme Court, 1975 Term—Foreword: In Defense of the Antidiscrimination Principle. Harvard Law Review 90:1–54.

ELY, JOHN HART 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

SUTHERLAND, GEORGE
(1862–1942)

George Sutherland, Supreme Court Justice from 1922 to 1938, was born in England in 1862. A year thereafter, he was brought by his parents to Brigham Young's Utah. Although he himself was never a Mormon, Sutherland attended a Mormon academy; in 1882–1883, he studied at the law school at the University of Michigan. On leaving the university, Sutherland was admitted to the Utah bar. He attained immediate prominence, both professionally and politically. He was elected to the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES as a Republican in 1900 and to the SENATE in 1905, where he remained until 1917.

Sutherland's tenure in Congress forced him to confront issues in a political context that he would later deal with as a Supreme Court Justice. Generally he supported a conservative position. Yet his most enduring legislative achievements centered on improving conditions for seamen; advancing a federal WORKER'S COMPENSATION program; and promoting woman suffrage. Sutherland's congressional tenure enabled him as early as 1910 to establish his credentials for appointment to the Supreme Court. The 1920 election of Warren Harding, attributed in considerable part to Sutherland in his role of principal confidential adviser to the candidate, virtually assured him the nomination. The nomination was sent to an approving Senate on September 5, 1922.

Anyone interested in the new Justice's approach to legal and political problems had not far to look. In the five years since his retirement from the Senate, Sutherland had delivered major addresses setting forth his conservative philosophy. In his presidential address to the American Bar Association in 1917, he chose to speak on "Private Rights and Government Control." The message was clear. "Prying Commissions" and "governmental intermeddling" were unnecessary and at war with the "fundamental principle upon which our form of government depends, namely, that it is an empire of laws and not of men." Four years later Sutherland was telling the New York State Bar Association "that government should confine its activities, as a general rule, to preserving a free market and preventing fraud." He further explained that "fundamental social and economic laws" were beyond the "power of official control."

Once on the Court, Sutherland readily joined his conservative colleagues invoking SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS to strike down exertions of governmental power. His first major opinion, in ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923), was directed at the minimum wage. Here, in the area of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT, no presumptive validity could be accorded to the exercise of legislative power. Rather, its legitimacy could be established only by "exceptional circumstances" and certainly not by considerations of a worker's needs or bargaining power. In short order, state attempts to regulate prices of gasoline, theater tickets, and employment agency services were similarly condemned. Other forms of state regulation fared no better. Nor was substantive due process the sole doctrinal reliance. In the Court's continuing battle with state legislatures, Sutherland led his colleagues in discovering hitherto unrealized prohibitions in the EQUAL PROTECTION, COMMERCE, and CONTRACT CLAUSES. And, under his hand, the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, neglected and forgotten for decades, sprang to life as a restraint on state power in COLGATE V. HARVEY (1935).

Eventually, of course, the Court repudiated the Sutherland approach to state legislative power and little of it remains. Yet, in at least two respects, his contribution in this area is of continuing significance. The first has to do with his seminal opinion in Frost and Frost Trucking v. Railroad Commission (1926) where he elaborated the theory of unconstitutional conditions. This theory destroyed the notion that a state's power to withhold a privilege somehow gives it authority to discriminate without check in granting the privilege. The second is his opinion for a divided court in EUCLID V. AMBLER REALTY (1926) which furnishes the constitutional foundation for the modern law of ZONING.

When Sutherland came to deal with the actions of Congress and the President, he exhibited the same jealousy of authority that characterized his response to state legislatures. Accordingly, he remained to the end unconvinced of the constitutionality of many of the New Deal enactments and in time was overwhelmed by the arrival of our modern-day Constitution of "powers." Even so, Sutherland's lasting impact will be found on close examination to have been highly significant. Particularly, he made highly personalized contributions to our structural Constitution; he had a distinctive role in shaping the Constitution as a guarantor of CIVIL RIGHTS; and he, more than anyone else, supplied the intellectual underpinnings for the FOREIGN AFFAIRS power.

As for the structural Constitution, Sutherland's opinion in Massachusetts v. Mellon (1923), and its companion case of FROTHINGHAM V. MELLON (1923), is still, despite scores of intervening qualifying decisions, the basic starting point in determining when a federal "taxpayer" has STANDING to raise a constitutional question in actions in the federal courts. Here plainly is one of the most telling limitations on federal judicial power. In a number of cases, Sutherland wrote opinions enforcing restraint on Supreme Court review of state decisions that were found to rest on independent and ADEQUATE STATE GROUNDS. In still others, he resisted effectively the pleas of reformers to whittle down guarantees of the right to TRIAL BY JURY, in civil as well as criminal cases. And in the highly technical matter of the relationship between state and federal courts, Sutherland's influence continues. Finally, Sutherland's views have been decisive in regard to the President's power to remove federal office holders. Early in his judicial career he concurred in Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT's unnecessarily wide-ranging opinion in MYERS V. UNITED STATES (1926), sanctioning a presidential power to remove without restraint. In HUMPHREY'S EXECUTOR V. UNITED STATES (1935) he started the Court on the way to new DOCTRINE. The removal power must take account of the nature of the office involved.

Sutherland's tenure on the Court spanned the years in which the Court began to take the BILL OF RIGHTS seriously as a check on STATE ACTION. His role in this development was not all of one piece. But he did write a leading opinion, in GROSJEAN V. AMERICAN PRESS COMPANY (1936), condemning a state tax on the press because of the levy's impermissible motive to make costly the criticism of public officials. And in POWELL V. ALABAMA (1932), he charted for the Court the first steps a state must take to assure counsel in legal proceedings. His problem there was counsel in a capital case. But Sutherland's opinion was not so confined in its implications and has proved influential even beyond the bounds of the criminal law.

Long before he went on the Court, Sutherland was given to speculation about the foreign relations powers, producing in 1919 a book on the subject, Constitutional Power and World Affairs. In his book and elsewhere, Sutherland developed the theory that the powers of the United States in respect to foreign affairs were largely unrelated to any grant from the states and existed as an incident of SOVEREIGNTY devolved directly on the United States from Great Britain. Their employment and their distribution were to be governed by rules not applicable to the specific delegations of the Constitution. In 1936, in CURTISS-WRIGHT EXPORT CORP. V. UNITED STATES, Sutherland was able to incorporate these views in an opinion for a unanimous Court.

Sutherland retired from the Court in 1938. He died in 1942.

J. FRANCIS PASCHAL
(1986)

Bibliography

PASCHAL, JOEL FRANCIS 1951 Mr. Justice Sutherland: A Man against the State. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

SWAIN v. ALABAMA
380 U.S. 202 (1965)

A 6–3 Court, speaking through Justice BYRON R. WHITE, rejected the claim of a black defendant to proportional representation of his race on grand and petit juries. Although blacks were substantially underrepresented on the jury panel, and although the prosecutor had used his peremptory challenges to exclude blacks in this case (there had been eight blacks on the venire), the Court found no evidence on the record of purposeful discrimination. The Court hinted that systematic use of peremptory challenges to exclude blacks from all juries would be unconstitutional, but it said that the record in Swain failed to show such systematic discrimination. In BATSON V. KENTUCKY (1986) the Court partially overruled Swain, holding that a prosecutor cannot constitutionally use peremptory challenges to exclude potential jurors solely on account of their race.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Jury Discrimination.)

SWANN v. CHARLOTTE-MECKLENBURG BOARD OF EDUCATION
402 U.S. 1 (1971)

Three years before Swann was decided, the Supreme Court had established a school board's affirmative duty to dismantle a school system that had been racially segregated by the command of law or by the board's deliberate actions. (See GREEN V. COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD.) In Swann, the Court was asked to apply this standard to a large metropolitan school district including the city of Charlotte, North Carolina, and its surrounding county. President RICHARD M. NIXON had made two appointments to the Court in the intervening years, and some observers expected the Justices' previous unanimity in school DESEGREGATION cases to be shattered in this case. In the event, no such thing happened; a unanimous Court affirmed a sweeping order by the federal district judge, James B. McMillan, calling for districtwide busing of children for the purpose of improving the schools' RACIAL BALANCE. (After issuing this order, Judge McMillan received death threats and was given police protection.) The Swann opinion was signed by Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER. However, internal evidence strongly suggests that the opinion was a negotiated patchwork of drafts, and ivestigative journalists have asserted plausibly that Justice POTTER STEWART contributed its main substantive points.

Once a constitutional violation was found, the Court said, the school board had an obligation to take steps to remedy both present de jure segregation (see DE FACTO/DE JURE) and the present effects of past de jure segregation. These steps must achieve "the greatest possible degree of actual desegregation, taking into account the practicalities of the situation." The Court thus approved Judge McMillan's use of districtwide racial percentages as "a starting point" in shaping a remedy and placed on the school board the very difficult burden of showing that the continued existence of one-race schools was not the result of present or past de jure segregation. Finally, the Court approved the busing of children to schools not in their own neighborhoods as one permissible remedy within a court's discretion. The matter of busing, however, was not left to lower court discretion. In a COMPANION CASE from Mobile, Alabama, Davis v. Board of School Commissioners, the Court required busing the lower courts had not ordered.

Swann set the pattern for school desegregation litigation not only in southern cities but in the North and West as well. Once a court finds deliberate acts of segregation, Swann's affirmative duties arise.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Columbus Board of Education v. Penick; Keyes v. School District No. 1; School Busing.)

Bibliography

FISS, OWEN M. 1974 School Desegregation: The Uncertain Path of the Law. Philosophy & Public Affairs 4:3–39.
WOODWARD, BOB and ARMSTRONG, SCOTT 1979 The Brethren:

Inside the Supreme Court. Pages 96–112. New York: Simon & Schuster.

SWAYNE, NOAH H.
(1804–1884)

Noah Haynes Swayne was the first of President ABRAHAM LINCOLN's five Supreme Court appointees. Geography, antislavery credentials, and support for the Union constituted Lincoln's chief criteria when he made his first appointments to the Court. Swayne fulfilled these qualifications.

Because of his hostility to SLAVERY, Swayne left his native Virginia and in 1823 moved to Ohio, where he served in the state legislature. In 1830 President ANDREW JACKSON named him United States Attorney. During the next several decades, he continued his active political career, and he appeared as counsel in a number of FUGITIVE SLAVERY cases. In 1855, he joined the fledgling Republican party and became a leading figure in the Ohio group. His close friend, Justice JOHN MCLEAN, had suggested Swayne as his successor. When McLean died early in 1861, Swayne quickly marshaled support from leading Ohio Republicans; Lincoln appointed him in January 1862.

On the Supreme Court, Swayne enthusiastically supported the administration, approving of Lincoln's blockade of southern ports in the PRIZE CASES (1862), upholding the Legal Tender Act of 1862 in Roosevelt v. Meyer (1863), and sustaining military trials in EX PARTE VALLANDIGHAM (1864). After the war, in EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866), he joined the Court's minority faction which declined to discuss the question of congressionally authorized military tribunals.

During RECONSTRUCTION, Swayne again demonstrated consistent support for the congressional Republican program. For example, he dissented in the TEST OATH CASES (1867), and he voted to decline JURISDICTION in the unreported case of Mississippi v. Stanton (1868), when the Court divided evenly on whether to take another case that might have decided the fate of the Reconstruction program. Perhaps Swayne's clearest deference to congressional determination of Reconstruction was expressed in his dissent in TEXAS V. WHITE (1869). He rejected the majority fiction that Texas was not out of the Union and insisted that Texas's relationship to the Union must be determined by Congress. Swayne recognized that the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT had been designed in part to benefit the freedmen, as evidenced by his vote in STRAUDER V. WEST VIRGINIA (1880), striking down RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in jury selection. Yet he repeatedly supported the Court's narrow construction of the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT, thus limiting black VOTING RIGHTS.

After the CIVIL WAR, Swayne continued to back Republican programs. He dissented when the majority struck down the legal tender laws in 1870, but the next year he joined the new majority that reversed that decision. (See LEGAL TENDER CASES.) A decade later, just before his retirement, Swayne delivered the Court's opinion in SPRINGER V. UNITED STATES (1881) upholding the Civil War income tax. He impressively rejected arguments that the tax confiscated property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW and that it was a DIRECT TAX, and therefore need not be apportioned among the states according to population. That decision subsequently was temporarily overruled in POLLOCK V. FARMER'S LOAN AND TRUST (1895), but Swayne's opinion generally is regarded as the more historically valid.

In its time, Swayne's opinion in GELPCKE V. CITY OF DUBUQUE (1864) had enormous influence. Speaking for the Court, Swayne held that a state court could invalidate a lawfully controlled municipal bonding arrangement. The decision left countless municipalities responsible for maintaining railroad financing, despite popular protests against the practice as well as deceitful activities on the part of the railroads. Later, Swayne joined JOSEPH P. BRADLEY, STEPHEN J. FIELD, and SALMON P. CHASE in dissent in the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873). Swayne's dissent lacked the elaborate rhetoric and logic of the Bradley and Field dissents, but he invoked the same mystical faith in the sanctity of property.

Swayne ranks as an ordinary Justice, not greatly appreciated even in his own time. His colleagues disapproved of his aggressive campaigning for the Chief Justiceship in 1864 and 1873, and he remained on the bench long after his physical and mental capacities had noticeably declined. He wrote few major opinions in his two decades on the bench.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

FAIRMAN, CHARLES 1939 Mr. Justice Miller and the Supreme Court, 1862–1890. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

GILLETTE, WILLIAM 1969 Noah H. Swayne. In Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., The Justices of the Supreme Court, Vol. 2:789–1010. New York: Chelsea House.

SWEATT v. PAINTER
339 U.S. 629 (1950)
MCLAURIN v. OKLAHOMA STATE REGENTS
339 U.S. 637 (1950)

Texas had established a separate law school for blacks; the state university law school thus rejected Sweatt, a black applicant. In McLaurin, the state university admitted a black to graduate study in education but made him sit in segregated classroom alcoves and at separate tables in the library and cafeteria. In both cases, state courts upheld the challenged SEGREGATION. In Sweatt the NAACP recruited some law professors to file a brief AMICUS CURIAE urging the Supreme Court to abandon the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE and hold that state-sponsored segregation was unconstitutional. Eleven states supported the Texas position.

The Court unanimously held the practices of segregation in these cases unconstitutional, but it did not reach the broader issue. Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON wrote both opinions. In Sweatt he emphasized the intangibles of legal education: faculty reputation, influential alumni, traditions, prestige, and—most significant for the doctrinal future—a student body including members of a race that would produce an overwhelming majority of the judges, lawyers, witnesses, and jury members Sweatt might face. Assuming the continued vitality of "separate but equal," the new law school for blacks was not equal to the state university law school, and Sweatt must be admitted to the latter.

The McLaurin opinion, too, avoided direct attack on the separate-but-equal principle, but it sapped that principle's foundations: segregation impaired McLaurin's ability to study and learn, to discuss questions with other students and be accepted by them on his merits; thus the state must lift its restrictions on him.

In neither case did the Court discuss segregation's stigmatizing effects. In neither did the Court consider any asserted justifications for segregation. The only question was whether segregation produced significant inequality; affirmative answers to that question ended the Court's inquiries. Taken seriously, these decisions must lead—as they did, four years later—to the conclusion that racial segregation in public education is unconstitutional. (See BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION.)

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

SWEEZY v. NEW HAMPSHIRE

See: Watkins v. United States

SWIFT v. TYSON
41 U.S. (16 Peters) 1 (1842)

In Swift v. Tyson the Supreme Court gave to the Rules of Decision Act (JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789, section 34) a construction that was to stand until ERIE RAILROAD CO. V. TOMPKINS (1938), almost a century later. As a result of this construction, the federal courts came to exercise COMMON LAW authority over a wide variety of disputes, some of which involved matters outside the limits of federal legislative power. Because these federal court decisions did not purport to bind state courts, the result was often the parallel existence of two different rules of law applicable to the same controversy.

Proceeding on the basis of diversity of citizenship (see DIVERSITY JURISDICTION), Swift sued Tyson in a New York federal court on a bill of exchange. A critical question in the case was whether, in light of the particular facts, Swift was a "purchaser for value" of that bill. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice JOSEPH STORY, held that he was, resolving the question on the basis of "general principles and doctrines of commercial jurisprudence," not on the basis of the decisional law of New York.

Tyson had argued that although there was no relevant state statute, the decisions of the New York state courts were controlling because the Rules of Decision Act provided that the "laws of the several states . . . shall be regarded as rules of decision . . . in cases where they apply." This provision, the Court replied, was limited in application to "the positive statutes of the state, and the construction thereof by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality." It did not require adherence to state judicial decisions on such matters as "questions of general commercial law, where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves, that is, to ascertain, upon general reasoning and legal analogies . . . what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case."

Historians disagree on the justification and soundness of the Swift decision. But there is general agreement that in the years that followed, Swift was expanded well beyond its originally intended scope, and that its OVERRULING, in Erie, reflected a very different perception of the proper role of the federal courts.

DAVID L. SHAPIRO
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Federal Common Law, Civil.)

SWIFT & COMPANY v. UNITED STATES
196 U.S. 375 (1905)

Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES's opinion for a unanimous Supreme Court in Swift announced the STREAM OF COMMERCE doctrine, fundamental to constitutional COMMERCE CLAUSE adjudication ever since.

In 1902 Attorney General PHILANDER C. KNOX ordered that an EQUITY complaint be filed against the Beef Trust, the five largest meat-packing concerns in the country. The complaint alleged conspiracy and combination in restraint of interstate trade, suppression of competition, and price-fixing, all in violation of the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT. In 1903 federal district court judge PETER S. GROSSCUP issued a perpetual INJUNCTION against the packers. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the packers, though admitting the truth of the government allegations, contended that they were not involved in INTERSTATE COMMERCE. The entire transaction between the packers and those who purchased meat from them had occurred completely within the state where the packers slaughtered and prepared their meat. The sale had been consumated in-state and thus only INTRASTATE COMMERCE was involved. Knox's successor, WILLIAM H. MOODY, asserted that the restraint of trade directly affected interstate commerce even if no interstate acts were involved. Armed with the packers' admissions, Moody stressed the unity of the transactions, arguing that the operation had to be viewed as a whole.

The Court accepted Moody's view. The trust's "EFFECT UPON COMMERCE is not accidental, secondary, remote, or merely probable," Holmes declared, as he revised the Court's view of interstate commerce, affecting decisions for decades to come: "Commerce among the states is not a technical legal conception, but a practical one, drawn from the course of the business." Livestock moving from the range to the retailer, "with the only interruption necessary to find a purchaser at the stock yards," created "a current of commerce among the states, and the purchase of cattle is a part and incident of such commerce." Thus a local activity might be seen as part of interstate commerce. This stream of commerce doctrine fundamentally redirected the Court's examination of commerce clause questions and brought the Court face-to-face with economic reality, modifying the doctrinal effect of UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT COMPANY (1895).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

GORDON, DAVID 1983 The Beef Trust: Antitrust Law and the Meat Packing Industry, 1902–1922. Ph.D. diss., Claremont Graduate School.

SWISHER, CARL BRENT
(1897–1968)

Carl Brent Swisher taught constitutional history for many years at Johns Hopkins University. A pioneer in the field of judicial biography, Swisher published Stephen J. Field: Craftsman of the Law (1930), still highly regarded. His Roger B. Taney (1935), the leading biography, and his posthumously published The Taney Period, 1836–1864 (1974; Vol. 5, Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court) describe Taney's accomplishments as Chief Justice as well as his failures of judgment and proslavery bias, thereby rescuing Taney from the limbo to which most historians had consigned him in the wake of DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857). Swisher also published several general studies of constitutional law and the Supreme Court, including American Constitutional Development (1943; rev. ed. with E. M. Sait, 1954) and The Supreme Court in Modern Role (1958; rev. ed., 1965). In the most influential of these works, The Growth of Constitutional Power in the United States (1946; rev. ed., 1963), Swisher questioned the continuing usefulness of the doctrine of SEPARATION OF POWERS, fearing that it prevented government from achieving the ends which society increasingly expected government to achieve; he also urged government supervision of large corporations to check their political and economic power.

RICHARD B. BERNSTEIN
(1986)

SYMBOLIC SPEECH

Does communication by conduct rather than by words constitute "speech" within the FIRST AMENDMENT's guarantee of FREEDOM OF SPEECH? The status of communicative conduct, as with most free speech questions, is usually presented in an emotion-laden context: does the burning of a flag, or of a draft card, constitute a First-Amendment-protected activity? Is the act of marching in a public DEMONSTRATION (as distinguished from the placards which the marchers carry) a form of protected "speech?" Are school or other governmental regulations of hair styles an abridgment of freedom of speech? Does nude dancing constitute a form of First Amendment "speech?" Although the lower federal and state courts frequently have wrestled with all of these questions, the United States Supreme Court has yet to articulate a theoretical base that explains the status of symbolic speech under the First Amendment.

At least since STROMBERG V. CALIFORNIA (1931), the Supreme Court has assumed that "speech" within the meaning of the First Amendment's guarantee of "freedom of speech" includes more than merely verbal communications. In Stromberg the Court declared invalid a California statute that prohibited the public display of "any flag, badge, banner or device . . . as a sign, symbol or emblem of opposition to organized government." Among other decisions applying the First Amendment to nonverbal conduct, perhaps the most striking was TINKER V. DES MOINES INDEPENDENT COMMUNITY SCHOOL DISTRICT (1969). The Court there upheld the right of high school students to wear black armbands as a protest against American participation in the VIETNAM WAR, calling their conduct "the type of symbolic act that is within the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment."

But if conduct sometimes constitutes protected "speech," sometimes it does not. UNITED STATES V. O'BRIEN (1968) affirmed a conviction for draft card burning. Chief Justice EARL WARREN, speaking for the Court, answered the defendant's symbolic speech defense by opining, "We cannot accept the view that an apparently limitless variety of conduct can be labeled "speech' whenever the person engaging in the conduct intends thereby to express an idea."

Any attempt to disentangle "speech" from conduct that is itself communicative will not withstand analysis. The speech element in symbolic speech is entitled to no lesser (and also no greater) degree of protection than that accorded to so-called pure speech. Indeed, in one sense all speech is symbolic. At this moment the reader is observing black markings on paper which curl and point in various directions. We call such markings letters, and in groups they are referred to as words. What is being said in this sentence is meaningful only because the reader recognizes these markings as symbols for particular ideas. The same is true of oral speech which is simply the use of symbolic sounds. Outside the science fiction realm of mind-to-mind telepathic communication, all communications necessarily involve the use of symbols.

But because all expression necessarily requires the use of symbols, it does not necessarily follow as a matter of logic that First Amendment protection is or should be available for all symbolic expressions. The "speech" protected by the First Amendment might be limited to expressions in which the symbols employed consist of conventional words. The Supreme Court has found so restrictive a reading of the First Amendment to be unacceptable. Significantly, in First Amendment cases, the Court often refers to "freedom of expression" as the equivalent of freedom of speech. Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES's "free trade in ideas" may not be reduced to mere trade in words. It is the freedom to express ideas and feelings, not merely the freedom to engage in verbal locutions, that must be protected if the First Amendment's central values are to be realized.

In COHEN V. CALIFORNIA (1971) the Supreme Court held that the emotive form of speech is as entitled to First Amendment protection as is its cognitive content. Emotive expression can be fully as important as intellectual, or cognitive, content in the competition of ideas for acceptance in the marketplace. Of course, most communications encompass both cognitive and emotive content. But even if a communication is substantially devoid of all cognitive content, its emotive content surely lies within the First Amendment scope. Symphonic compositions or nonrepresentational art are protected against governmental censorship, notwithstanding their lack of verbal or cognitive content.

Of course, not all conduct should be regarded as "speech" within the meaning of the First Amendment. Not even the most ardent free speech advocate would contend that all legislation regulating human conduct is subject to First Amendment restrictions. If, as the Court stated in the O'Brien opinion, the First Amendment is not to apply to a "limitless variety of conduct," what standards should be applied in determining whether given restrictions on conduct constitute First Amendment abridgment of symbolic speech?

If government's purpose in restricting is to suppress the message conveyed by the conduct, then the state should not be heard to deny the actor's claim that the conduct in question was intended to communicate a message. Such a message-restricting motivation by the state should also establish that the conduct in question constitutes symbolic speech. But such a conclusion does not necessarily imply that the speech is entitled to First Amendment protection. Even speech in words may in some circumstances be subordinated to a counter-speech interest. Likewise, no First Amendment ABSOLUTISM will protect communicative conduct. In some contexts symbolic speech may be overbalanced by counter-speech interests. If, however, the asserted or actual counter-speech interest is simply commitment to a particular view of the world—political, ethical, aesthetic, or otherwise—this interest will not justify abridgment of the right to express a contrary view, either by words or by conduct.

Just as First Amendment principles apply equally to expression in the symbols of the English or French languages, for example, the same principles govern when the symbols are of neither of these languages, nor of any conventional language. The crucial question under the First Amendment is whether meaningful symbols are being employed by one who wishes to communicate to others.

The courts have resisted equating symbolic speech with verbal speech because of a fear of immunizing all manner of conduct from the controls of the law. This fear is unjustifiable; it stems from a false premise as to the First Amendment protection accorded to verbal speech. In fact, speech in words is not immune from regulation. For example, an interest in excluding trespassers will justify abridging the verbal speech of those who wish to speak on property from which they may properly be excluded. Similarly, words that presage an imminent and likely BREACH OF THE PEACE will justify regulation just as much as if the idea be conveyed by nonverbal symbols. These are but two of many instances when verbal speech is subordinated to counter-speech interests.

According full and equal status to symbolic speech under the First Amendment will not open the floodgates to abuses, immunizing O'Brien's "apparently limitless variety of conduct" from legal regulation. Recognition of such equality of forms of expression would mean that no one will be penalized because he chooses to communicate—or is able to communicate—only in a language other than conventional words. We shall all be the richer for such recognition.

MELVILLE B. NIMMER
(1986)

Bibliography

NIMMER, MELVILLE B. 1973 The Meaning of Symbolic Speech to the First Amendment. UCLA Law Review 21:29–62.

Encyclopedia of the American Constitution

Original 1986 Editorial Board

Encyclopedia of the American Constitution

SECOND EDITION

Edited by
Leonard W. Levy
and
Kenneth L. Karst

Adam Winkler, Associate Editor for the Second Edition

Dennis J. Mahoney, Assistant Editor for the First Edition
John G. West, Jr., Assistant Editor for Supplement I

MACMILLAN REFERENCE USA
An imprint of the Gale Group
New York

Macmillan Library Reference USA
1633 Broadway
New York, NY 10019

Printed in the United States of America

Printing Number
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Encyclopedia of the American Constitution / edited by Leonard W. Levy and Kenneth L. Karst.—2nd ed. / Adam Winkler, associate editor for the second edition.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
ISBN 0-02-864880-3 (hard cover : alk. paper)
1. Constitutional law—United States—Encyclopedias. I. Levy, Leonard Williams, 1923– II. Karst, Kenneth L. III. Winkler, Adam.
KF4548 .E53 2000
342.73—dc21 00-029203

This paper meets the requirements of ANSI-NISO Z39.48-1992 (Permanence of Paper).

T

TAFT, ROBERT A.
(1889–1953)

Senator Robert Alphonso Taft, the son of President and Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, was a leader of Republican opposition to the NEW DEAL policies of FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT. A graduate of Yale University and Harvard Law School, Taft served in the Ohio legislature from 1921 to 1933. His public crusade against the Roosevelt revolution began in 1935; in 1938 he was elected to the United States SENATE, sworn to do battle against "the mistaken belief that government can remove all poverty, redistribute all wealth, and bestow happiness on every citizen."

An advocate of STRICT CONSTRUCTION of constitutional provisions that confer power on government, Taft severely criticized Roosevelt's appointees to the Supreme Court for acting as if "constitutional principles are weak as water" by abdicating their duty to keep the government within the limits set by the Constitution. He strongly urged that Congress become the locus of responsible CONSTITUTIONALISM, and he opposed, both in peacetime and wartime, DELEGATIONS OF POWER to the executive branch.

Taft continued to oppose expansion of the executive power after HARRY S. TRUMAN became President. During the STEEL SEIZURE CONTROVERSY Taft argued that if the President could increase his own powers by simply declaring a national emergency the Constitution would become a dead letter. Taft used his position as chairman of the Senate Labor Committee to sponsor a comprehensive reform of federal labor law, now known as the TAFT-HARTLEY ACT.

After a decade and a half of being "Mr. Republican," Taft felt entitled to his party's presidential nomination in 1952. However, the nomination, and election to the presidency, went to General DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, hero of WORLD WAR II. Nevertheless, Taft had a major share in formulating the domestic policy of the new administration during its first year in office.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

KIRK, RUSSEL and MCCLELLAN, JAMES 1967 The Political Principles of Robert A. Taft. New York: Fleet Press Corporation.

TAFT, WILLIAM HOWARD
(1857–1930)

William Howard Taft's life was amazing both for length of public service (1881–1930) and for the variety of his activities: prosecuting attorney in his native state of Ohio, superior court judge in Cincinnati, SOLICITOR GENERAL of the United States, federal circuit court judge, governor general of the Philippine Islands, cabinet member, President of the United States (1908–1912), professor of law at Yale, and CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States (1921–1930).

Taft appeared to be almost the prototype of a Chief Justice. Large of frame and good-natured, weighing well over 350 pounds, he filled out the popular image. His gallantry was famous. "I heard recently," Justice DAVID J. BREWER reported, "that he arose in a street car and gave his seat to three women."

Taft idolized Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL. One day, passing by the west entrance to the Capitol, he paused in front of the bronze statue of Marshall. "Would you rather have been Marshall than President?" a friend asked. "Of course," Taft answered, "I would rather have been Marshall than any other American unless it had been Washington, and I am inclined to think I would rather have been Marshall than Washington. He made this country." Taft himself became the only man in history to occupy both the White House and the Supreme Court's center chair.

During THEODORE ROOSEVELT's administration Taft rejected two opportunities to join the Supreme Court as associate justice. As successor to Roosevelt in the White House, Taft thought longingly about the future and pined to succeed aging Chief Justice MELVILLE W. FULLER. "If the Chief Justice would only retire," Taft lamented, "how simple everything would become!"

As President Taft signed Associate Justice EDWARD D. WHITE's commission as Chief Justice, he grieved: "There is nothing I would have liked more than being Chief Justice of the United States. I can't help seeing the irony in the fact that I, who desired that office so much, should now be signing the commission of another man." Rating Supreme Court appointments as among his most important presidential functions, Taft had the opportunity to appoint five associate Justices as well as the Chief—WILLIS VAN DEVANTER, HORACE H. LURTON, JOSEPH R. LAMAR, CHARLES EVANS HUGHES, and MAHLON PITNEY. Each appointment was a continuing source of pride to Taft, who at every opportunity underscored the importance of the judiciary.

Taft's cordial relations with Roosevelt did not last. Differences developed during Taft's presidency over questions of policy and administration. Finally the clash led to a split in the Republican Party. As a result, when Taft ran for reelection in 1912 Roosevelt ran as a Progressive. The upshot was a Democratic victory and the election of WOODROW WILSON as President.

After Justice Lamar died, rumor began to spread that the new President might, rising above party politics, follow the example of his predecessor's high-mindedness when in 1910 Taft had selected as Chief Justice a southern Democrat and Roman Catholic, Associate Justice Edward D. White. But Wilson appointed LOUIS D. BRANDEIS instead, and Taft, outraged by that appointment, declared that Brandeis was "not a fit person to be a member of the Court."

In 1919, Taft was off the public payroll for the first time. Soon he took a position at Yale, teaching constitutional law. Meanwhile, the chief justiceship seemed a remote possibility. Prospects brightened in 1920 with the smashing Republican victory of WARREN G. HARDING. Shortly after Harding's election the unblushing aspirant made the pilgrimage to Marion, Ohio. Taft was "nearly struck dumb" when the President-elect broached a Supreme Court appointment. Of course, the former President was available, but he made it clear that, having appointed three of the present bench and three others and, having vigorously opposed Brandeis's appointment in 1916, he would accept only the chief justiceship.

Taft's opportunity to achieve his ambition was not altogether accidental. During his presidency, when Chief Justice Fuller died, two choices loomed as possibilities—CHARLES EVANS HUGHES and Edward D. White. The latter, seventeen years Hughes's senior, received the nod. Had Taft chosen Hughes, instead of White, his lifelong ambition would not have been realized.

The office of Chief Justice carries scant inherent power. He manages the docket, presents the cases in conference, and guides discussion. When in the majority, he assigns the writing of opinions. In 1921 Taft remarked: "The Chief Justice goes into a monastery." Yet it is difficult to think of a Chief Justice who more frequently violated the American Bar Association's canons of judicial propriety on so many fronts. During the presidency of CALVIN COOLIDGE he was often a White House visitor. His political activities ranged widely over legislation and judicial appointments at all levels. In his choice of judges his alleged purpose was competence. But Taft even opposed selection of the eminent New York Judge BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO, fearful lest he "herd with [OLIVER WENDELL] HOLMES and Brandeis." At the outset, he had kind words for HARLAN F. STONE, indeed claimed credit for his appointment to the Court. But when Stone began to join Holmes and Brandeis, the Chief Justice became increasingly critical.

As institutional architect, Taft ranks second only to OLIVER ELLSWORTH, the third Chief Justice, who originally devised the judicial system. Taft's best known extrajudicial achievement, "The Judges' Bill" of 1925, giving the Supreme Court control over its docket, passed with only token opposition. Soon Congress authorized other procedural changes Taft had long advocated. To achieve these reforms Taft lobbied Presidents and members of Congress and sought press support. The most striking example of his effectiveness as a lobbyist was his campaign for the marble palace in which the Court now sits. At the cornerstone ceremony, in October 1932, Chief Justice Hughes declared: "For this enterprise progressing to completion we are indebted to the late Chief Justice William Howard Taft more than anyone else. The building is the result of his intelligent persistence."

Taft's goals as Chief Justice were efficiency, prompt dispatch of the Court's business, and harmonious relations among his colleagues. His overwhelming desire was to "mass" the Court. For the ex-President, Brandeis's appointment had been "one of the deepest wounds that I have had as an American and a lover of the constitution and a believer in progressive conservatism." Naturally Taft anticipated strained relations with his new colleague. To smooth this possible difficulty he wrote Brandeis long letters on the desirability of taking prompt steps to make the Court more efficient. Such friendly appeals moved his brother Horace to predict: "I expect to see you and Brandeis hobnobbing together with the utmost good will." Taft's strategy worked. Soon he was able to write: "I've come to like Brandeis very much." The feeling was mutual. Brandeis thought of Taft as "a cultivated man" and enjoyed talking with him. The Chief Justice's brother thought Brandeis "had been taken into camp." Justice JOHN H. CLARKE resigned because he believed that Brandeis could no longer be counted on to uphold the liberal stance.

"Things go happily in the CONFERENCE room with Taft," Brandeis commented. "The judges go home less tired emotionally and less weary physically than in White's day. When we differ, we agree to differ without any ill feelings." It seems likely that certain of Brandeis's unpublished opinions reflect his high regard for the Chief Justice. In one decision in particular, the second child labor case, BAILEY V. DREXEL FURNITURE CO. (1922), Taft writing for the Court invoked the authority of HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918), a singularly conservative ruling. Yet, Brandeis went along with the majority, explaining: "I can't always dissent. I sometimes endorse an opinion with which I do not agree. I acquiesce." Brandeis's silence may have been the measure of Taft's gift for leadership.

In ALEXANDER BICKEL's volume, The Unpublished Opinions of Mr. Justice Brandeis (1957), eight out of eleven were prepared during less than ten years of Taft's chief justiceship. Taft went to great pains to create esprit de corps. Seemingly trivial personal considerations—the sending of a salmon to Justice WILLIS VAN DEVANTER, the customary ride he gave Holmes and Brandeis after the Saturday conference, the Christmas card that always went out to Justice JOSEPH MCKENNA—all such thoughtful attention to highly dissimilar human beings contributed immeasurably to judicial teamwork.

Justice Van Devanter posed a unique problem. He was indispensable in conference where Taft was not always acquainted with judicial technicalities or even facts of the cases. But Van Devanter was "opinion shy." This, however, evoked no complaint from the Chief Justice, even if he wrote no opinions at all. Taft regarded him as "the mainstay of the Court" and dubbed him "my Lord Chancellor."

Taft was determined to make the Court's promptness "a model for the courts of the country." His colleagues, as Holmes said, approved the Chief's "way of conducting business . . . especially his disinclination to put cases over." To accelerate the Court's work, Taft urged cutting vacations from seventeen to twelve weeks and using various time-saving devices.

Taft's first major opinion, TRUAX V. CORRIGAN (1921), involved the constitutionality of an Arizona statute barring state courts from issuing injunctions in LABOR cases, except under special conditions. Owners of a restaurant sought an injunction against a BOYCOTT and PICKETING of their place of business. A majority of five Justices, concluding that the bar against injunctions denied DUE PROCESS OF LAW and EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAW, declared the act unconstitutional. "A law which operates to make lawful such a wrong as described in the plaintiff's complaint," the Chief Justice observed, "deprives the owner of the business and the premises of his property without due process of law and cannot be held valid under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. . . . The Constitution was intended, its very purpose was to prevent experimentation with the fundamental rights of the individual."

Taft's next major opinion, STAFFORD V. WALLACE (1922), upheld broad federal power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE, announcing that Congress had a "wide area of discretion, free from judicial second guessing." At issue was the PACKERS AND STOCKYARD ACT of 1929, regulating the business of packers done in INTERSTATE COMMERCE. The "chief evil" Congress aimed at was the monopoly of packers, "enabling them unduly and arbitrarily to lower prices to the shipper who sells, and unduly and arbitrarily to increase the price to the consumer who buys." In deciding Stafford Taft relied mainly on Holmes's majority opinion in SWIFT V. UNITED STATES (1905). "That case," wrote the Chief Justice, "was a milestone in the interpretation of the Commerce Clause of the Constitution. It recognized the great changes and development in the business of this vast country and drew again the dividing line between interstate and intrastate commerce where the Constitution intended it to be. It refused to permit local incidents of great interstate movements which, taken alone, were intrastate, to characterize the movement as such. The Swift case merely fitted the Commerce Clause to the real and practical essence of modern business growth."

Another example of Taft's effort to keep the Court "consistent with itself" was ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923) involving an act of Congress fixing the minimum wage for women and minors. Speaking for the Court, Justice Sutherland invalidated the act, relying primarily on Justice RUFUS PECKHAM's reactionary decision in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905). Refusing to endorse Lochner, Taft and Holmes dissented: "It is impossible," the Chief Justice explained, "for me to reconcile the Bunting [v. Oregon] case of 1917 and the Lochner case and I have always supposed that the Lochner case was thus overruled sub silentio." Although Sutherland and Taft disagreed in Adkins, Taft could not bring himself to endorse Holmes's dissent because of its irreverent treatment of the FREEDOM OF CONTRACT doctrine. And in Wolff Packing Co. v. Court of Industrial Relations (1923) Taft for the Court approvingly cited Sutherland's Adkins opinion on that doctrine.

The year 1926 witnessed a significant decision in American constitutional history: the 6–3 ruling in MYERS V. UNITED STATES upholding the President's power to remove a postmaster without the consent of the Senate. Said Taft: "I never wrote an opinion that I felt to be so important in its effect." The Chief Justice's unqualified appraisal reflects his White House experience. There were three dissenters—Holmes, JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS, and Brandeis. Brandeis wrote: "The separation of powers of government did not make each branch completely autonomous. It left each in some measure dependent on the other. . . . The doctrine of SEPARATION OF POWERS was adopted by the [CONSTITUTIONAL] CONVENTION OF 1787, not to promote efficiency but to preclude the exercise of arbitrary power. The purpose was not to avoid friction, but by means of the inevitable friction incident to the distribution of governmental powers among the departments, to save the people from autocracy."

Taft did not live to see the Court's later qualification of the President's power to remove executive officers. In HUMPHREY'S EXECUTOR V. UNITED STATES (1935) the President was denied executive power to remove a federal trade commissioner, appointed for seven years with the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the Senate, on the score of inefficiency or neglect of duty. Speaking for the Court in that later case, Justice Sutherland, who had enjoyed most cordial relations with Taft, went out of his way to say that the authority of the Myers case remained intact. The Court did not adopt the views of the Myers dissenters, but shifted emphasis from the "simple logic" of Article II of the Constitution—that the removal power is inherently "executive"—to the theory that a postmaster "is merely one of the units in the executive department and hence inherently subject to the exclusive and illimitable power of removal by the Chief Executive whose subordinate and aide he is."

As Taft's tenure drew to a close, dissents came more frequently and vehemently. Holmes and Brandeis, who had dissented from Taft's first major opinion in Truax, dissented from his last major opinion in OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1928). Justice Stone and even Justice PIERCE BUTLER joined the dissenters. Taft, a crusader for stricter enforcement of the criminal law, narrowly construed the FOURTH AMENDMENT's ban on unreasonable searches and seizures by ruling that evidence obtained by wiretapping could be introduced at a criminal trial. In the face of hostile criticism of his Olmstead opinion, Taft declared privately, "If they think we are going to be frightened in our effort to stand by the law and give the public a chance to punish criminals, they are mistaken, even though we are condemned for lack of high ideals." Taft thought that Holmes's dissent was sentimental in declaring that "it is a lesser evil that some criminals should escape than that the Government should play an ignoble part."

Near the end, Taft winced nervously whenever he contemplated his probable successor. Knowing that President HERBERT C. HOOVER's attachment to Stone was "very great," Taft feared the worst: "I have no doubt that if I were to retire or die, the President would appoint Stone head of the Court." Once in the Chief Justice's good graces, Stone had fallen into profound disfavor. "He definitely has ranged himself with Brandeis and with Holmes in a good many of our constitutional differences." Nor was Stone's "herding" with the Court's "kickers" his only shortcoming. He was "not a great leader and would have a great deal of trouble in massing the Court." The Chief was not entirely without hope: "With Van and Mac and Sutherland and you and Sanford," he wrote to Justice Butler in 1929, "there will be five to steady the boat. So there would be a great deal of difficulty in working through reversals of present positions, even if I either had to retire or were gathered to my fathers, so that we must not give up at once."

Taft's triumphant march continued to the end, but the future was clouded with uncertainty. By 1929 the world he had known and the people on whom he relied were in eclipse. As the economy slid rapidly toward the abyss, government intervention was openly advocated. To combat these forces, Taft's determination stiffened. "As long as things continue as they are and I am able to answer in my place," he resolved to "stay on the Court in order to prevent the Bolsheviki from getting control." President Hoover, Taft thought, "would put in some rather extreme destroyers of the Constitution. . . ."

None of Taft's predecessors, with the possible exception of Marshall, entertained so expansive a view of the chief justiceship, or used it so effectively on so many fronts. Taft was a great administrator, a great judicial architect, a skillful harmonizer of human relations. Yet he is not commonly considered a great Chief Justice.

ALPHEUS THOMAS MASON
(1986)

Bibliography

MASON, ALPHEUS THOMAS 1930 The Labor Decisions of Chief Justice Taft. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 78:585–625.

——— 1964 William Howard Taft: Chief Justice. New York: Simon & Schuster.

——— 1979 The Supreme Court from Taft to Burger. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

MCHALE, FRANCIS 1931 President and Chief Justice: The Life and Public Services of William Howard Taft. Philadelphia: Dorrance.

MURPHY, W. F. 1961 In His Own Image: Mr. Justice Taft and

Supreme Court Appointments. Supreme Court Review 1961: 159–193.

——— 1962 Chief Justice Taft and the Lower Court Bureaucracy. Journal of Politics 24:453–476.

PRINGLE, H. F. 1939 The Life and Times of William Howard Taft. New York: Farrar & Rinehart.

TAFT COURT
(1921–1930)

WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT became Chief Justice of the United States on June 30, 1921. Never before or since has any person brought such a range of distinguished experience in public affairs and professional qualifications to the bench. Taft presided over a court that included Justices of highly varied abilities and achievements. In 1921, OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, already a great figure of the law, had served nineteen years on the Supreme Court. He remained on the Court throughout Taft's tenure and beyond. Holmes's only equal on the Court was LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, who had been on the Court barely five years at Taft's accession. Taft, a private citizen in 1916, had vigorously opposed the appointment of Brandeis to the High Court. Although they remained ideological opponents and although some mistrust persisted on both sides, they maintained cordial relations, carrying on their opposition in a highly civil manner.

The rest of the Court that Taft inherited lacked the stature or ability of Holmes and Brandeis. Three Justices, JOHN H. CLARKE, MAHLON PITNEY, and WILLIAM R. DAY would retire within the first two years of Taft's tenure. Their retirements gave President WARREN C. HARDING a chance to reconstitute the Court. The President appointed his former Senate colleague GEORGE H. SUTHERLAND to one of the vacancies. The other two spots were filled by men strongly recommended by Taft: PIERCE BUTLER and EDWARD T. SANFORD.

The other Justices on the Court in 1921 were WILLIS VAN DEVANTER, JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS, and JOSEPH MCKENNA. Van Devanter had been appointed to the bench by Taft when he was President. He, like Butler and Sanford, continued to be strongly influenced by the Chief Justice. During the Taft years, he served the Chief Justice in the performance of many important institutional tasks outside the realm of decision making and opinion writing. For example, Van Devanter led the drive to revamp the JURISDICTION of the Supreme Court in the "Judges' Bill," the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1925. McReynolds, a Wilson appointee, was an iconoclastic conservative of well-defined prejudices.

Finally, Taft inherited Joseph McKenna, whose failing health impaired his judicial performance. In 1925, Taft, after consulting the other justices, urged McKenna to retire. McKenna was succeeded by HARLAN F. STONE. Though deferential to Taft at the outset, by the end of the decade Stone became increasingly identified with the dissenting positions of Holmes and Brandeis. From early 1923 through Taft's resignation only that one change took place.

Because of the substantial continuity of personnel the Taft Court can be thought of as an institution with a personality and with well-defined positions on most critical issues that came before it. Outcomes were as predictable as they ever can be, and the reasoning, persuasive or not, was consistent.

Taft was a strong Chief Justice. He lobbied powerfully for more federal judges, for a streamlined federal procedure, for reorganization of the federal judiciary, and for greater control by the Supreme Court over the cases it would decide. The most concrete of Taft's reforms was a new building for the Court itself, though the building was not completed until after his death.

A second major institutional change was completed during Taft's term. In 1925 Congress passed the "Judges' Bill." The Supreme Court's agenda is one of the most important factors in determining the evolution of constitutional law. Until 1891 that agenda had been determined largely at the initiative of litigants. In 1891 the Court received authority to review certain classes of cases by the discretionary WRIT OF CERTIORARI. However, many lower court decisions had continued to be reviewable as of right in the Supreme Court even after 1891. The 1925 act altered the balance by establishing the largely discretionary certiorari jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as it has remained for six decades. The act was one of Taft's major projects. It relieved the docket pressure occasioned by the press of obligatory jurisdiction, and placed agenda control at the very center of constitutional politics.

The successful initiatives of the Court in seizing control of its own constitutional agenda and constructing a new home should not obscure the fact that the Court's institutional position was, as always, under attack during the 1920s. A spate of what were perceived as antilabor decisions in 1921–1922 led to calls from the labor movement and congressional progressives to circumscribe the Court's powers. In the 1924 election ROBERT LA FOLLETTE, running as a third-party candidate on the Progressive ticket, called for a constitutional amendment to limit JUDICIAL REVIEW. Both the Republican incumbent, CALVIN COOLIDGE, and the 1924 Democratic candidate, JOHN W. DAVIS, defended the Court against La Follette. The upshot of the unsuccessful La Follette campaign was a heightened sensitivity to judicial review as an issue and a firm demonstration of the consensus as to its legitimacy and centrality in the American constitutional system.

Much of the labor movement had supported La Fol-lette's initiatives against judicial review, but labor specifically sought limitations on federal court labor INJUNCTIONS. Labor's campaign against injunctions peaked in 1927 after the Supreme Court simultaneously declined to review a series of controversial injunctions in the West Virginia coal fields and approved an injunction in BEDFORD CUT STONE COMPANY V. JOURNEYMAN STONECUTTERS, holding that a union's nationwide refusal to handle nonunion stone should be enjoined as an agreement in RESTRAINT OF TRADE. Between 1928 and 1930 the shape of what was to become the NORRIS-LAGUARDIA ACT OF 1932 emerged in Congress. The impetus behind that law, the politics of it, indeed, the language and theory of the statute itself are rooted in the Taft years.

A description of the Court's institutional role must consider the relations between CONGRESS AND THE COURT in shaping constitutional law and constitutional politics. During the Taft years a dialogue between Court and Congress persisted on a variety of crucial constitutional issues. The decision of the Court striking down the first Child Labor Act in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918) led to congressional interest in using the taxing power to circumvent apparent limitations on the direct regulatory authority of Congress under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. The second Child Labor Act imposed an excise tax on the profits of firms employing child labor. That act was struck down as unconstitutional in 1922.

From 1922 on Congress had before it various versions of antilynching legislation—most notably the Dyer Bill, which had actually passed the House. Opponents of the antilynching legislation argued that it was an unconstitutional federal usurpation of state functions. In Moore v. Dempsey (1923), decided shortly after the Dyer Bill had nearly succeeded in passage, the Court held that a state criminal trial dominated by a mob constituted a denial of DUE PROCESS OF LAW, appropriately redressed in a federal HABEAS CORPUS proceeding. Moore v. Dempsey did not establish that an antilynching law would be constitutional. Yet a conclusion that mob domination of a criminal trial did not deny due process surely would have been a constitutional nail in the coffin of antilynching laws. And, prior to Moore v. Dempsey the relatively recent PRECEDENT of FRANK V. MANGUM (1915) had pointed toward just such a conclusion. Considerations concerning the response of Congress regularly influenced the constitutional decision making of the Taft Court. When Taft was appointed, three important labor cases were pending that had been argued but not decided by the WHITE COURT. The Court had reached an impasse. Two of the cases presented questions about the use of injunctions to restrain labor picketing. Section 20 of the Clayton Act appeared to deny the federal courts the power to issue such injunctions subject to certain exceptions, most notably the power to use the injunction to protect property from damage. American Steel Foundries v. Tri-City Labor Council presented questions of construction of this section, and TRUAX V. CORRIGAN, involving a state law, presented a constitutional variant of the Clayton Act problem.

In American Steel Foundries, Taft's first significant opinion as Chief Justice, the Court read section 20 to encompass protection of the property interest in an ongoing business from unreasonable or intimidating picketing or from illegal BOYCOTTS or strikes. Statutory construction thus preserved the injunction as a restraint on labor.

But not all state courts saw the issue as the Taft Court did. The Arizona Supreme Court read its statute to bar injunctions in labor disputes, at least where actual destruction of physical property was not threatened. In Truax v. Corrigan, decided a week after American Steel Foundries, Taft wrote for a majority of five, holding that Arizona had unconstitutionally denied employers the injunction in labor disputes. Truax in effect created a constitutional right to a labor injunction. It did so on two grounds. First, it held that employers were denied the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS insofar as their particular type of property interest was denied the same protection afforded other property interests. Second, it held that the failure to protect the interest in the continued operation of a business deprived the business owner of property without due process of law. Truax v. Corrigan was the cornerstone of the Taft Court edifice of industrial relations. Not only did the decision suggest that Congress could not constitutionally prevent the federal courts from granting labor injunctions, but it also ushered in a decade of the most intensive use of the labor injunction the country had ever seen. A desperate battle was fought to save the unionized sector of coal from competition from the newer, largely nonunion, southern mines. That union campaign was broken by dozens of labor injunctions upheld by the Fourth Circuit in a consolidated appeal. The Supreme Court's refusal to review those decisions in 1927 attracted larger headlines than all but the most significant of Supreme Court opinions ever get. The Fourth Circuit opinion later cost Circuit Judge John J. H. Parker a seat on the Supreme Court. In fact, however, his conclusion was an all but inevitable consequence of the Supreme Court's position in Truax v. Corrigan.

The industrial order that the Taft Court sought to protect from labor insurgency was itself built upon uncertain constitutional foundations. The Taft Court was not committed, unambiguously, to a laissez-faire market. The Court distinguished sharply between legislation regulating the price (wage or rent) terms of a contract and laws regulating other terms. Thus, in the best known of its apparent inconsistencies, the Taft Court held void a District of Columbia law prescribing a minimum wage for women, although only a year later it upheld a New York law establishing maximum hours for women. The Court also struck down a state statute regulating fees or commissions for employment brokers while intimating that other reasonable regulatory measures directed at employment brokerage would be upheld.

Sutherland, in his peculiar majority opinion in the minimum wage case—ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923)—seemed preoccupied with the redistributive aspects of the minimum wage law. There was nothing wrong with a legislative preference for a living (minimum) wage; the problem lay in imposing an obligation on the employer to pay it. One person's need, he argued, could not, in itself, justify another's obligation to satisfy it. The regulation of nonprice terms need not be redistributive in effect, for the costs of any such regulation could be recaptured by negotiated changes in price. If the Court was seeking to protect bargains against regulation with redistribution effect, then shielding price terms from governmental interference was the most visible and easily understood way to accomplish its purpose.

In general the Taft Court sought to maintain principled distinctions among three forms of economic activity. Government enterprise was subject to the usual constitutional constraints upon government. This form of economic activity was relatively unimportant in the 1920s, although in cases involving municipal utilities the Court had some opportunity to address such issues as contractual rate structure. The Court spoke more frequently to the problem of transition from private to public or from public to private enterprise. WORLD WAR I had seen government control of the railroads, shipping, coal, and, to a lesser degree, labor relations generally. The Court had to develop principles of compensation to govern the takeover and return of such large-scale enterprises.

More important than the dichotomy between governmental and private economic activity was the distinction drawn between private activity AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST and the more general run of private economic endeavor. Upon this distinction turned the constitutionality of public regulation—including price regulation in some circumstances—of various forms of economic activity. Although the category of business affected with a public interest had been part of the Court's rhetorical stock in trade for almost half a century when Taft took his seat, it assumed particular significance through the decade beginning with a case from Kansas. In 1920, having survived the effects of a bitter coal strike, Kansas passed its Industrial Court Act, declaring all production and distribution of food, clothing, shelter, and fuel for human consumption or use to be business affected with a public interest. Public transportation and public utilities were also so labeled. The act forbade strikes, lockouts, and plant closings in all such industries except by order of the Kansas Court of Industrial Relations. Moreover, that court upon its own motion or upon the petition of virtually any person could adjudicate the fitness or adequacy of wages and prices in any such business. The act contemplated a form of compulsory arbitration to replace labor bargaining against a background of strikes and lockouts.

In a series of unanimous opinions the Supreme Court struck down one after another of these innovative aspects of the Kansas act. Taft, in the leading opinion, WOLFF PACKING CORPORATION V. COURT OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS (1923) held that the state could not, by legislative fiat, declare businesses to be affected with a public interest for purposes so comprehensive as to include supervision of their wage and price structures. Taft's opinion wholly failed to state a principled distinction between those businesses traditionally subject to price regulation (such as grain elevators), on the one hand, and meat packing, on the other. In OBITER DICTUM he suggested that the competitive structure of the industry was not determinative of the legislature's power to regulate. But the opinion did acknowledge that long-established law permitted regulation of publicly conferred monopolies and of common carriers or inns even if not monopolies.

The Taft Court thus rejected a generalization, based on the war experience, that all basic economic activity could be defined as affected with a public interest. But the Court was not unmindful of the war's lessons. Unanimously it upheld the recapture provisions of the [Railroad] Transportation Act of 1920 despite the overt redistributive effect of the law. The act required the payment into a federal trust fund of half the profits earned by strong railroads, for redistribution to failing ones. The Chief Justice, at least, understood the recapture provisions as justified in part because the alternative to such a scheme might have to be nationalization. Furthermore, the Court had already gone to great lengths to uphold other, seemingly inevitable, characteristics of rate regulation in an integrated transportation system. The Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC), if it were to be effective at all, needed power to regulate joint rates over hauls using more than one line for a single journey. It was apparent that the apportionment of joint rates could be used to redistributive effect. In the New England Divisions Case (1923) the Court had already upheld the ICC's explicit consideration of the need to strengthen the weaker New England lines when it apportioned revenues from joint rates. It was a short step from such use of joint rates to the recapture provisions.

The Court's willingness to accept some qualifications of vested property rights in the interest of planning was not confined to such traditional areas of regulation as transportation and public utilities. The Court decided its first cases challenging general ZONING ordinances in the 1920s and, on the whole, upheld the power, though not without significant dissent and important qualifications.

Despite the Court's upholding of zoning and of regulatory initiatives, the Taft Court has long been considered to have been ardent in imposing constitutional limits upon legislation that restricted vested property interests. That reputation is soundly based, although the extent to which the Taft Court differed from predecessor and successor Courts has been substantially exaggerated by FELIX FRANKFURTER and his followers.

Perhaps the best known of the Taft Court pronouncements on the constitutional protection of property is Justice Holmes's opinion for the Court in Pennsylvania Coal Company v. Mahon (1923). Pennsylvania's Kohler Act required anthracite coal mining to be done so as to avoid subsidence of surface areas at or near buildings, streets, and other structures used by human beings. The Court held unconstitutional the application of the law to mining in an area where the mining company had conveyed surface rights, expressly reserving to itself and to its successors the subsurface mining rights.

Despite Brandeis's dissenting opinion, Holmes's opinion was moderate in tone and antithetical to the sort of dogmatics that characterized Sutherland's opinions in the wage and price regulation area. Indeed, Holmes's methodology was explicitly one that reduced the takingsregulation distinction to a matter of degree—as Holmes himself once recognized in a flippant reference to "the petty larceny of the police power." Moreover, the Court that decided Pennsylvania Coal decided the case of Miller v. Schoene (1928) five years later, upholding a Virginia law providing for the uncompensated (or less than fully compensated) destruction of cedar trees infected with cedar rust, a condition harmful only to neighboring apple trees.

The Court also had to face the implications of the constitutional protection of property in considering the methodology of public utility rate regulation. In a series of cases beginning in 1923 and proceeding throughout the Taft period, Justice Brandeis posed a major challenge to the "fair value" methodology of SMYTH V. AMES (1895). Industry during the 1920s argued that the rate base—the "property" upon which the Constitution guaranteed a reasonable rate of permissible return—should be valued according to the replacement cost of capital items—despite a general inflationary trend, accelerated by World War I. Brandeis formulated a comprehensive critique both of this particular windfall calculation and of the rule that produced it. Brandeis first reformulated the problem in a characteristically daring way. The issue was not so much a vested right to a return on capital as it was the necessity for a level of profit that could attract the new capital required for effective operation of the public utility. Brandeis lost the battle for a new approach to rate-making. Yet here, no less than in other arenas for disputes over the constitutional protection of property, doctrinal lines had been drawn that anticipated the issues of the New Deal.

Traditional, genteel conservativism is neither overtly ideological in content nor strident in manner. In most respects the Taft Court was traditionally conservative. The Court was hostile to labor and to any insurgency from the left, but the hostility usually took the form of a neutral defense of civil order. That neutrality, though it almost always worked against the left, was not explicitly one-sided and was, in fact, applied occasionally against rightist militant politics and street activity as well.

The constitutional defense of civil order entailed a strong commitment to ratify the acts of local government and of the national political branches so long as their power and authority were used to put down militant politics and especially politics of the street. Thus, the Court consistently upheld CRIMINAL SYNDICALISM LAWS, even while recognizing, in GITLOW V. NEW YORK (1925), that the FIRST AMENDMENT limited state as well as federal legislative power. Moreover, in a theoretically interesting, though practically less significant case, the Court upheld a New York law requiring the registration and disclosure of names of members of certain secret societies—a measure directed against the Ku Klux Klan. Brandeis and Holmes repeatedly dissented in the criminal syndicalism cases, sketching an alternative version of the political process far more hospitable to insurgent initiatives for change.

A second pillar of the defense of civic order was the reliance upon independent courts as guarantors of vested property rights against street politics. To this end the injunction was elevated to a constitutional pedestal. Truax v. Corrigan, which constitutionalized capital's right to a labor injunction, must be seen not only as a part of a larger antilabor corpus but also as the link between that work and the principle of civic order.

For traditional conservatives the injunction had much to commend it. It was in the hands of politically independent judges, who were less susceptible than other officials to mass pressure. It was governed—or supposed to be governed—by neutral principles rather than special interests; it permitted the adaptation of principle to local needs and adjusted the level of intervention to that necessary to shore up appropriately sound local elites. No wonder, then, that the issue of the injunction pervaded the constitutional politics of the 1920s.

If Taft was committed to the courts' playing a dominant role in labor discipline and the guarantee of civic order, he was at the same time committed to an efficient, unintimidated, and uncorrupted judiciary to do the job. In Tumey v. Ohio (1927) he wrote for a unanimous Court striking down as a denial of due process an Ohio scheme through which a public official judging traffic violations was paid a percentage of the fines collected. Of greater significance was MOORE V. DEMPSEY (1923), in which a divided Court upheld the power of a federal district court in federal HABEAS CORPUS proceedings to go behind the record of a state court murder conviction to determine whether the trial had been dominated by a mob.

Racist justice was a deeply rooted problem, not high on the conservative agenda for reform. Taft was, however, very concerned with the potential for corruption of the courts inherent in the great national experiment of the decade, prohibition. The Chief Justice realized that there were many opportunities for organized crime in the liquor business to buy friendly judges and other officials, especially in states where prohibition was unpopular. The Court refused to extend the protection of the DOUBLE JEOPARDY principle to cases of successive prosecutions under state and federal law for substantially the same conduct. Part of the reason for this limit upon the double jeopardy principle was the potential under any contrary rule of insulating conduct from federal prosecution by securing a state conviction and paying a small fine. The Court's interpretation of FEDERALISM to tolerate structural redundancy was thus a major prophylactic against the dangers of local corruption of courts.

Like all its predecessors, however conservative, the Taft Court paid lip service to the idea that the people are sovereign and, consequently, that popular government is a pervasive and overriding principle in constitutional interpretation. Even though dissenters within the court (Holmes and Brandeis) and critical commentators without (Frankfurter, EDWARD S. CORWIN, and THOMAS REED POWELL) claimed that the Justices ignored the presumption of constitutionality that ought to attach to the work of the popular branches, the simple fact is that no Justice denied, as an abstract principle, either the presumption of constitutionality or the deference that ought to be paid to legislative judgments. It was the application of the principle that divided the Court.

Most of the Justices were skeptical of the capacity of the masses intelligently to exercise the rights and discharge the obligations of participatory, popular government. Taft himself welcomed a leading role for elites in suppressing, or at least damping, the demands of the rabble and in representing the "better class" of citizens. But Taft's views in these matters were not very different from those of Holmes. Holmes doubted the capacity of the masses and considered a dominant role for elites in politics to be almost a natural law. Brandeis, the only real contrast, was considerably more committed to reform and to its promise. But he, in his own way, also distrusted the masses. He saw hope for change in a shift from a propertied oligarchy to a technically trained meritocracy. At the same time Brandeis understood the limits of this vision. His support of STATES' RIGHTS and localism in politics and his hostility to concentration in industry had common roots: the recognition of limits to techniques of effective organization; the affirmation of political principles limiting concentrations of power; and the affirmation of the principles of maximum participation in public affairs. Chiefly in this last respect, Brandeis stood committed to a principle that the other Justices ignored or rejected.

In what ways did the general attitudes of the Justices to popular government affect the work of the Court? Perhaps the most direct effect was visible in the great, perennial debate over the power of judicial review. The Justices appear to have been unanimous in their private opposition to schemes such as that of LaFollette to limit the power of judicial review by statute or constitutional amendment. Even Brandeis, who was personally close to LaFollette and who supported the Wisconsin senator's positions on many substantive issues, opposed initiatives to curb the Court.

In at least one important area the Taft Court initiated a significant reform in the mechanics of popular government itself. The Court struck down the first version of the Texas system of white primaries which, through official state action, denied blacks the right to vote in statewide PRIMARY ELECTIONS. NIXON V. HERNDON (1927) was the first in a line of cases that ultimately destroyed the white primary device.

The Court upheld the power of Congress to conduct LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATIONS and to use COMPULSORY PROCESS to that end. The Court also appeared to uphold an enlarged vision of an exclusive PRESIDENTIAL POWER to remove executive officers. A special constitutional status for government of TERRITORIES was approved. Finally, the Court struggled mightily but produced no satisfactory or consistent principles in the area of STATE TAXATION OF COMMERCE and STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE.

The 1920s saw a determined attack upon the ethnic pluralism, the cultural and ethical relativism, and the absence of traditional controls that characterized a newly emergent urban America. The prohibition movement, resurgent religious fundamentalism, virulent nativism, and racism gave rise to a reactionary program for legal reform. In the area of prohibition the Court did more than give full effect to a constitutional amendment and its implementing legislation. The Justices also decided a host of criminal procedure issues in such a way as to arm the enforcers against what was perceived as a concerted attack on law and order themselves.

But the Court was actively hostile to groups like the "new" Ku Klux Klan. It not only upheld a Klan registration statute but also, in PIERCE V. SOCIETY OF SISTERS (1925), held invalid an Oregon statute that had effectively outlawed private schools. The law was the product of a popular initiative organized and vigorously supported by the Klan as part of its nativist and anti-Catholic crusade. The decision in MEYER V. NEBRASKA (1923) striking down laws forbidding the teaching of German in the schools also reflected the Justices' unwillingness to permit nativist sentiment to cut too deeply into the social fabric.

But the Court did uphold state ALIEN land ownership laws directed principally against Asian immigrants and upheld the disgraceful national discrimination against Asian immigration in the face of constitutional attack. The Court also permitted the continuation of restrictive covenants in housing (CORRIGAN V. BUCKLEY, 1926) and segregation in public schools (GONG LUM V. RICE, 1927), though in each instance it avoided an explicit articulation of constitutional approval for these practices.

The constitutional work of the Taft Court extended over the customary broad area of national life, but it was dominated by the motif of conflict between property and labor. Civil strife, policies toward insurgency, free or regulated markets, confiscation—all were issues that arose principally from the overarching conflict. It is a measure of the Taft Court's achievement that, through Brandeis on the one hand and Taft on the other, a measure of clarity was achieved in articulating the implications of this conflict for constitutional structure and doctrine over a wide range of subjects. It was Taft's vision alone, however, that dominated the Court's action—consistently hostile to labor and its interests. The traditional conservative structure of property and order was one legacy of Taft's Court to the era of the Great Depression; Brandeis's vision—as yet wholly unrealized—was the other.

ROBERT M. COVER
(1986)

Bibliography

BERNSTEIN, IRVING 1960 The Lean Years: A History of the American Worker, 1920–1933. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1957 The Unpublished Opinions of Mr. Justice Brandeis: The Supreme Court at Work. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.

DANELSKI, DAVID J. 1964 A Supreme Court Justice Is Appointed. New York: Random House.

FRANKFURTER, FELIX and GREENE, NATHAN 1930 The Labor Injunction. New York: Macmillan.

MASON, ALPHEUS THOMAS 1946 Brandeis: A Free Man's Life. New York: Viking.

——— 1956 Harlan Fiske Stone: Pillar of the Law. New York: Viking.

——— 1964 William Howard Taft: Chief Justice. New York: Simon & Schuster.

MURPHY, WALTER F. 1964 Elements of Judicial Strategy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

PRINGLE, HENRY F. 1939 The Life and Times of William Howard Taft. New York: Farrar & Rinehart.

RABBAN, DAVID M. 1983 The Emergence of Modern First Amendment Doctrine. University of Chicago Law Review 50: 1205–1355.

TAFT-HARTLEY LABOR RELATIONS ACT
61 Stat. 136 (1947)

Passed over President HARRY S. TRUMAN's veto, the Taft-Hartley Act represented Republican hostility to the power of labor unions and the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB); its provisions limit the authority and conduct of unions and their officials and curtail the Board's authority.

In amending the WAGNER (NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS) ACT, the measure banned the CLOSED SHOP; permitted employers to sue unions for strike-incurred damages; forbade union contributions to political campaigns; required public disclosure of union finances; required unions to give sixty days notice before inaugurating strikes; and allowed the President to halt a major strike by seeking a court INJUNCTION for an eighty-day "cooling off" period. Although the right to COLLECTIVE BARGAINING was further guaranteed, section 14b permitted states to adopt RIGHT-TO-WORK LAWS, forbidding any requirement that workers join unions to hold jobs. Most constitutionally suspect were provisions requiring labor union officials, in order to use the facilities of the NLRB, to sign affidavits denying communist party membership or belief. These noncommunist oath provisions were unsuccessfully challenged in the courts in AMERICAN COMMUNICATIONS ASSOCIATION V. DOUDS (1950).

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

SUTHERLAND, ARTHUR E. 1948 The Constitutionality of the Taft-Hartley Law. Industrial and Labor Relations Review 1: 177–205.

TAKAHASHI v. FISH AND GAME COMMISSION
334 U.S. 410 (1948)

Under California law, ALIENS ineligible for CITIZENSHIP (mainly Asians) could not hold commercial fishing licenses. Citing the broad power of Congress to regulate aliens, the Supreme Court held, 7–2, that the PREEMPTION DOCTRINE barred the law. The CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 was taken to protect the rights of aliens to pursue their livelihoods under nondiscriminatory state laws. The OPINION also conveyed overtones of FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT reasoning.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

TAKING OF PROPERTY

The authority of government to acquire private PROPERTY from an involuntary owner (usually called the power of EMINENT DOMAIN) is recognized in the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution, which provides: "nor shall private property be taken for public use, without JUST COMPENSATION." The public use and compensation requirements of the Constitution apply not only to acquisitions by the federal government but—by INCORPORATION in the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT—to acquisitions by the states as well. Similar provisions appear in the state constitutions, and the state and federal requirements are usually identically interpreted. It is, however, possible that a taking would pass muster under the federal Constitution and still be held to violate the state constitutional provision (or vice versa).

The requirement of PUBLIC USE has been liberally interpreted by the courts, which rarely find that a taking is not for a public use. For example, property may be taken for resale to private developers in an urban renewal project, or for the development of an industrial park. Indeed, the courts have permitted authority to take private property to be vested by LEGISLATION in privately owned public utilities, such as water companies. The test is not ultimate public ownership, or even direct public benefit, but rather the general benefit to the public from projects that are publicly sponsored or encouraged to promote the economy or the public welfare. The only clear limits on the broad interpretation of "public use" would be (1) the grant of the taking authority to a private company simply to improve its private economic position; or (2) the use of the taking power by the government if government itself were simply seeking to make money by engaging in strictly entrepreneurial activities.

The requirement of "just compensation" has been interpreted to mean the amount a willing seller would get from a willing buyer in the absence of the government's desire to acquire the property. The owner is not entitled to receive more for the property simply because the government has an urgent need for it—as for a military base. Neither may the owner receive less compensation because the government's plan for the area—to install a garbage dump, for example, has depressed neighborhood values. Nor is the owner entitled to increased compensation merely because the property has special value to him, such as sentimental or family value, or because he would not sell the property at any price. Compensation must be given in cash immediately upon the taking; government cannot oblige the owner to accept future promises of payment which may be unmarketable, or marketable only at a discount from the just compensation value.

Ordinarily there is no ambiguity about whether a property has been taken. Nor is there any ambiguity about the principle of takings law, stated at the most general level: if the public wants something, it should pay for it and not coerce private owners into contributing their property to the public. If government wants a site for a post office, for example, it is obliged to institute condemnation proceedings in court, leading to an involuntary transfer of title and possession, at which time it will pay the owner just compensation. But in many instances government legislates or behaves in a way that reduces or destroys the value of private property without formally taking title or possession and without instituting condemnation proceedings. If the owner complains, seeking just compensation for a taking, government may reply that it has simply regulated under the POLICE POWER, but has not "taken" the property and thus need not compensate. The great bulk of all legal controversies over the taking of property turn on the question whether there has been a "taking" at all.

Plainly government sometimes gets the benefits of a taking without any of the formal incidents of ownership. A celebrated case, Causby v. United States (1946), involved the flight of military planes just above the surface of privately owned farmland adjacent to a military airport. As a result of noise from the overflights the farm was made virtually worthless for agricultural purposes. The farmer claimed that his farm had in practical effect been taken, that government was using it as a sort of extension of the runway, and that government should have to pay for it as it had for the rest of the airport. The Supreme Court agreed that this use of the farmland was a taking in effect, if not in form, and that the farmer was entitled to just compensation for what is called INVERSE CONDEMNATION.

This ruling does not mean that the neighbors of a public airport or highway subjected to noise that reduces their property values will always be compensated. In general such disadvantaged neighbors are not viewed by the courts as having had their property taken in the constitutional sense. The reason is that although a nearly total loss (such as the farmer sustained) is judicially viewed as a taking, some modest diminution of value resulting from neighboring public activities is viewed as one of the disadvantages of modern life that must be accepted by property owners.

The judicial focus on the quantum of loss as a test of a taking is called the diminution of value theory and was put forward many years ago by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOL-MES in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon (1922). There is no clear line, Holmes believed, between the formal taking of property by government (in which title and possession are acquired) and the various forms of government regulation (such as zoning and pollution control), which do not transfer ownership formally, but restrict private owners' uses and values for the benefit of the general public. In both cases, according to Holmes, the traditional rights of private owners are being restricted for the benefit of the public. If there were no legal limits on such restrictions, he said, private property would be worthless and wholly at the mercy of government. On the other hand, Holmes said, if every value-diminishing regulation were viewed as a compensable taking of property, government would be unable to function, for essentially all of its regulatory activities (speed limits, liquor control, safety standards, rent control) disadvantage property owners to some degree.

He thus devised a practical test. We must all accept some impairment of property values so that society can function in a civilized way, and government must be permitted to make regulations requiring such impairments. If, however, the losses from such regulations become extreme—nearing total destruction of the property's value for any owner—then the society should compensate the owner and bear the losses of the regulation commonly. Thus, under the Holmesian theory, the amount of the loss and the ability of the owner to continue to earn some return from his property after the regulation has been imposed become the critical determinants of the constitutional question: has there been a taking for which compensation must be paid?

Although Holmes's test continues to dominate taking cases, there are a number of other theories that are widely found in the literature and in judicial opinions. One theory holds that prohibitions of certain socially undesirable uses do not qualify as compensable takings despite considerable loss to the owners, because one cannot be viewed as having a property right to engage in "noxious" conduct, and losses flowing from prohibition of such conduct is not a taking away of property. The illegalization of manufacture and sale of a dangerous drug, or of polluting activity, has been so categorized.

Another theory sometimes advanced is that certain government restrictions imposed on property owners are not a taking of property from the owners by the government, but are the merely regulation by the government of activities by which it mediates between various private uses in conflict with each other. Under this theory compensation is required only when the government as an enterprise itself benefits directly from the regulation (it gets additional space for its military airport, for example). The enterpriseregulation theory has sometimes been used to justify ZONING and other LAND USE controls that restrict the amount or type of building permitted to a landowner on his land. Modern historic preservation ordinances as well as safety and environmental controls are sometimes justified on this theory.

Still another view suggests that government may, without compensation, impose much greater restrictions to prevent future additional exploitation of property, while leaving existing uses, than it may cut back on existing uses. Thus, in PENN CENTRAL TRANSPORTATION CO. V. NEW YORK (1978), an important case, the Supreme Court upheld a historic preservation ordinance prohibiting the owners of Grand Central Station in New York from building a high rise office tower above the railroad station, noting that the existing station did produce some economic return to the owners. The claimed "taking" of a property right to build a bigger building was rejected.

Although no single theory wholly dominates taking law, two guidelines permit safe prediction about the great majority of cases. Courts will find a taking and require just compensation if (1) the government acquires physical possession of the property; or if (2) regulation so reduces the owner's values that virtually no net economic return is left to the proprietor.

JOSEPH L. SAX
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Dames & Moore v. Regan; Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff.)

Bibliography

ACKERMAN, BRUCE A. 1977 Private Property and the Constitution. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

BOSSELMAN, FRED et al. 1973 The Taking Issue. Washington, D.C.: Council on Environmental Quality.

MICHELMAN, FRANK I. 1967 Property, Utility and Fairness: Comments on the Ethical Foundations of "Just Compensation" Law. Harvard Law Review 80:1165–1258.

SAX, JOSEPH L. 1971 Taking and the Police Power. Yale Law Journal 74:36–76.

——— 1971 Takings, Private Property and Public Rights. Yale Law Journal 81:149–186.

TAKING OF PROPERTY
(Update 1)

Recent historical scholarship indicates that the taking clause was something of an innovation. Only two of the state constitutions adopted between 1776 and 1780 required the government to pay compensation when private PROPERTY was taken for a public use. The lack of constitutional protection for PROPERTY RIGHTS was consistent with the republican ethos of the period. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, for example, once said that "Private Property . . . is a Creature of Society, and is subject to the Calls of that Society, whenever its Necessities shall require it, even to its last Farthing; its contributions therefore to the public Exigencies are . . . to be considered . . . the Return of an obligation previously received, or the Payment of a just Debt." The taking clause seems to represent a victory of Lockean liberalism over this earlier republican philosophy.

The Supreme Court has recently used the taking clause to strike down a variety of government regulations. In one case, the federal government claimed that the public had the right to use a marina that a private developer had connected with a public waterway. The Court held that giving the public access to the marina would be an unconstitutional taking of the developer's property. In another case, Congress was concerned because certain lands belonging to American Indians had so many owners that managing the lands had become impractical. As a way of consolidating landholdings, a federal statute mandated that some of the tiniest interests would revert to the tribe on the owners' deaths. This, too, was an unconstitutional taking. The Court also found a taking when New York required landlords to give their tenants access to cable television. The reason was that the cable box would "take" some of the space on the building's roof.

A 1987 case, Nollan v. California Coastal Commission, exemplifies the Court's revived interest in protecting property rights. The case involved a couple who wanted to build a larger beach house. As a condition for receiving a permit, the California Coastal Commission required them to allow the public to walk along the beach. The majority opinion was written by Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, who had quickly emerged as the strongest guardian of property rights on the REHNQUIST COURT. Scalia was willing to concede, at least for the purposes of argument, that California could have banned the construction entirely as a means of preserving the public's right to see the ocean from the street. Alternatively, he conceded, the Nollans could have been required to allow the public to walk from the street around to the back of their house. But because the government had chosen to give the public direct access laterally along the beach, rather than from the street, Justice Scalia held the permit condition unconstitutional.

The Court's rationale in Nollan was that lateral access was not closely enough related to the government's right to protect the view of the ocean. Justice Scalia seemed suspicious of the government's motives in imposing the permit condition, at one point referring to similar permit conditions as a form of "extortion."

In contrast to Nollan, another 1987 case rather surprisingly failed to find a taking. Keystone Bituminous Coal Association v. DeBenedictus was a replay of Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon (1922), the classic decision of Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR. Holmes had struck down a Pennsylvania statute that required underground coal mines to maintain adequate support for surface structures. The DeBenedictus Court, however, found a similar but more recently enacted Pennsylvania statute to be constitutional. The Court distinguished Mahon on the ground that the newer statute had a broader public purpose. No taking was found, because the statute required mining companies to leave only a small fraction of their coal in the ground.

It is often difficult to predict whether a given government regulation will be found to be a taking, but two factors seem particularly significant. First, if the regulation takes away the owner's right to control physical access to the property, it is much more likely to be found a taking—and almost sure to be found a taking if there is a permanent physical occupation of the property. Second, unless physical access is involved, the owner probably will not be able to claim a taking unless the regulation virtually destroys the value of the property.

At present, takings doctrine is in flux. Under Chief Justices HARLAN F. STONE and EARL WARREN, the Court took little interest in the taking clause. The BURGER COURT began to take a renewed interest in the area, but did not aggressively use the taking clause as a means of attacking important government regulations. It remains to be seen whether the Rehnquist Court will introduce a greater degree of activism.

Most of the current scholarship on the taking clause may be divided into three camps. One group argues for minimal judicial scrutiny of economic regulations, so that very few government actions would be held a taking. In contrast, a second group argues for vigorous scrutiny under the auspices of the taking clause—reminiscent of the era of LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905). A third group argues for renewed judicial protection, but limited to a particular category of property, that of peculiar personal significance to individuals, as opposed to ordinary business interests. It is uncertain whether any of these groups of scholars will succeed in influencing the Justices. At present, the Court seems content to muddle through taking cases without the benefit of a broad theoretical perspective.

DANIEL A. FARBER
(1992)

Bibliography

EPSTEIN, RICHARD A. 1985 Takings: Private Property and the Power of Eminent Domain. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1988 Property as a Human Right. Constitutional Commentary 5:169–184.

NOTE 1985 The Origins and Original Significance of the Just Compensation Clause of the Fifth Amendment. Yale Law Journal 94:694–716.

TAKING OF PROPERTY
(Update 2)

The Fifth Amendment includes the command, "nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation."

Putting aside the perhaps puzzling fact that the PUBLIC USE limitation has been largely read out of existence— the government can take PROPERTY for almost any reason, including the improvement of "slums" or the conveyance of clear title to tenants—the so-called takings clause has been easy enough to apply in most cases. If the government wants property, it can assert its right of EMINENT DOMAIN and take it. But then it must pay JUST COMPENSATION. The hard cases arise when government has not simply appropriated property outright but instead has taken a legislative or regulatory action that lessens the value of private property.

The fountainhead for so-called REGULATORY TAKINGS cases is the Supreme Court's opinion in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon (1922), credited as the first to apply the takings clause to government regulation short of complete appropriation. Pennsylvania law prohibited coal companies from mining subsurface coal "in such a way as to cause the subsidence of, among other things, any structure used as a human habitation." Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., first held that the law was a proper exercise of the POLICE POWER. "Government could hardly go on if to some extent values incident to property could not be diminished without paying for every such change in the law." But Holmes also found that such power "must have its limits." Therein lies the rub, for Holmes could not pin down what those limits were to be. "The general rule at least is, that while property may be regulated to a certain extent, if regulation goes too far it will be recognized as a taking." How far is too far? Four years later, the Court held that ZONING was not necessarily a taking in EUCLID V. AMBLER REALTY CO. (1926), even though the regulation caused the private owner to lose three-quarters of the property's value.

Holmes's majority opinion in Mahon is famous. Far less attention has been paid to the dissent of LOUIS D. BRANDEIS. Brandeis noted that every law affects private values. He would thus emphasize the nature of the government action more than the private party's loss. "[R]estriction imposed to protect the public health, safety or morals from dangers threatened is not a taking."

The Holmes–Brandeis fault line has played itself out over the ensuing decades. It is often hard to understand the law of regulatory takings except in fairly bald, political terms. Liberal advocates of the NEW DEAL, such as Brandeis and, later, WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., have tended to find no government taking, a trend that reached its high point in PENN CENTRAL TRANSPORTATION CO. V. NEW YORK CITY (1978).

Conservative and libertarian commentators have long been critical of the takings jurisprudence of the WARREN COURT, as epitomized in Penn Central. If government has to pay in order to act, it often will not act. The BURGER COURT and REHNQUIST COURT have aimed to stem the tide of government expanse, in part by putting teeth in Holmes's takings test.

One front in the battle has been the articulation of per se rules to give greater clarity to the field. One such rule is that any regulation that effects a "permanent physical occupation" will be considered a compensable taking, regardless of how slight the physical intrusion may be. In LORETTO V. TELEPROMPTER, INC. (1982), New York City required landlords to install cable for tenants' televisions. The just compensation for the resulting "taking" of the air space occupied by the cable wires was held to be $1 per building. A second per se takings rule, formalized in LUCAS V. SOUTH CAROLINA COASTAL COUNCIL (1992), is triggered whenever a governmental act deprives a landowner of "all economically beneficial or productive use" of land.

The tightening of the takings clause has gone beyond per se rules. The Court in Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987) required an "essential nexus" between the harms associated with development and the conditions that government can place on granting a building permit. In DOLAN V. CITY OF TIGARD (1994), the Court added a prong to the Nollan test, ruling that such conditional exactions must also satisfy a "rough proportionality" test—the burden on the private party must be loosely in keeping with the impact of the proposed development.

Application of the takings clause has always depended on an understanding of what "property" is in the first place, a point noted by Brandeis in his Mahon dissent. In Phillips v. Washington Legal Foundation (1998), the Court, in a 5–4 decision with Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST writing for the majority, held that the interest accrued on lawyer trust-fund accounts was "property" of the client for purposes of the Fifth Amendment. As with Loretto, Phillips may foreshadow another move to tighten the takings clause by finding even relatively minor government actions to be covered in its sweep.

These recent cases have brought with them divided courts, vigorous DISSENTING OPINIONS, and a plethora of scholarly commentary. Critics charge the majorities of resurrecting Lochner-era SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS to invalidate government regulations that are normally accorded only RATIONAL BASIS review. Practical politicians have leapt in to fill what they perceive as a void, advancing legislative proposals to require the government to pay whenever a regulation diminishes private property values by more than a given, objective limit—say one-third. Such proposals have both practical and theoretical difficulties, of course, and have been criticized by legal scholars and others.

Paraphrasing Sigmund Freud, sometimes a question of degree is just a question of degree. Seven decades have not fleshed out Holmes's vague pronouncements in Mahon. Absent some major shift in the political landscape, we may just have to live with uncertainty in the contours of regulatory takings law.

EDWARD J. MCCAFFERY
(2000)

Bibliography

BEEN, VICKI 1991 "Exit" as a Constraint on Land Use Exactions: Rethinking the Unconstitutional Conditions Doctrine. Columbia Law Review 91:473–545.

FISCHEL, WILLIAM A. 1995 Regulatory Takings. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

MICHELMAN, FRANK I. 1995 A Skeptical View of "Property Rights" Legislation. Fordham Environmental Law Journal 6: 409–421.

RUBENFELD, JED 1993 Usings. Yale Law Journal 102:1077–1163.

TREANOR, WILLIAM MICHAEL 1995 The Original Understanding of the Takings Clause and the Political Process. Columbia Law Review 95:782–887.

TANEY, ROGER BROOKE
(1777–1864)

Roger B. Taney, CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States from 1836 until his death in 1864, profoundly shaped American constitutional development in cases dealing with states' regulatory powers, CORPORATIONS, SLAVERY, and the JURISDICTION of federal courts. His reputation long suffered from invidious and inappropriate comparisons with his predecessor Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL and because of his disastrous opinion in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857). But his influence has been enduring and, on balance, beneficial.

Taney was born in 1777 in Calvert County, Maryland. His father, a well-to-do planter, destined him for a career in law. After graduation from Dickinson College (Pennsylvania), he was admitted to the bar in 1799 and began a thirty-six-year career of politics and law practice in Maryland. He served intermittently in both houses of the state legislature until 1821, at first as a Federalist. But finding that affiliation intolerable because of the conduct of New England Federalists during the War of 1812, he assumed leadership of a local faction known as Coodies and then after 1825 supported ANDREW JACKSON. Practicing first in Frederick, where he maintained his lifelong residence, and then in Baltimore, he became a preeminent member of the Maryland bar, state attorney general from 1827 to 1831, and then attorney general of the United States, a position he held until 1833, when he served for a year as secretary of the treasury.

Taney urged President Jackson to veto the bill to recharter the Bank of the United States and contributed that part of JACKSON'S VETO OF THE BANK BILL in which the President denied that the Supreme Court's opinion on constitutional matters bound the President. As treasury secretary, Taney ordered removal of the federal deposits from the Bank and their distribution to certain "pet banks." In these bank matters, Taney was not the mere pliant tool of Jackson; rather, he acted in accord with his own deep suspicions of centralized and monopolistic economic power.

As attorney general, Taney also had occasion to explore issues involving slavery and free blacks. Upholding South Carolina's Negro Seamen's Act, which prohibited black seamen from disembarking from their vessels while in Carolina waters, Taney insisted that the state's sovereign right to control slaves and free blacks overrode any inconsistent exercise of federal treaty and commerce powers. Presaging his Dred Scott opinion, he maintained that blacks were "a separate and degraded people," incapable of being citizens. He also expressed doubt that a Supreme Court decision holding the statute unconstitutional would bind the states.

As Chief Justice of the United States after 1836, Taney left an enduring imprint on the American Constitution. Most of the landmark cases coming before the Court in the first decade of his tenure involved questions of the power of the states to regulate the economic behavior of persons or corporations within their jurisdictions. In CHARLES RIVER BRIDGE V. WARREN BRIDGE (1837) Taney employed a paradigmatic balance between investors' demands for autonomy and the states' insistence on public control of that new legal creature, the private corporation. Refusing to read into a bridge company's charter an implicit grant of a transportation monopoly, Taney held that "in charters, . . . no rights are taken from the public, or given to the corporation, beyond those which the words of the charter, by their natural and proper construction, purport to convey." (See RESERVED POLICE POWERS.)

Subsequent decisions of the Taney Court confirmed the Charles River Bridge DOCTRINE: where the state had explicitly conveyed monopoly rights or otherwise conferred valuable privileges, a majority of the Court honored the grant and held the state to it under CONTRACT CLAUSE doctrines deriving from FLETCHER V. PECK (1810). On the other hand, the Court refused to infer monopoly grants or other restrictions on state regulatory power if they were not explicitly conferred in a corporate charter. Thus in BANK OF AUGUSTA V. EARLE (1839) Taney held that states could regulate the activities of foreign corporations within their jurisdictions, or exclude them altogether, but that such regulations would have to be explicit. Absent express declarations of state policy, the TANEY COURT refused to hold that banking corporations could not enter into contracts outside the state that chartered them.

Yet Taney entertained an instinctive sympathy for states' efforts to control economic activity within their jurisdictions. In another case from his maiden term, BRISCOE V. BANK OF KENTUCKY (1837), Taney supported the majority's holding that a state was not precluded from creating a bank wholly owned by it and exercising note-issuing powers, so long as the state did not pledge its credit to back the notes. Such notes would have been a subterfuge form of the state BILLS OF CREDIT that had been struck down in CRAIG V. MISSOURI (1830). In BRONSON V. KINZIE (1843), however, Taney invalidated state statutes that restricted foreclosure sales and granted mortgagors rights to redeem foreclosed property. Even here, however, he emphasized that states could modify contractual remedies so long as they did not tamper with the substance of existing contracts.

Taney's opinions dealing with the jurisdiction of federal courts proved to be among his most significant. Some of these restricted the autonomy of the states in the interests of protecting the national market. Thus in SWIFT V. TYSON (1842) the Court unanimously supported an opinion by Justice JOSEPH STORY holding that in commercial law matters, federal courts need not look to the forum state's COMMON LAW for rules of decision, but instead might formulate commercial law doctrines out of "the general principles and doctrines of commercial jurisprudence," a principle that survived until Swift was overruled in ERIE RAILROAD V. TOMPKINS (1938). (See FEDERAL COMMON LAW.) In PROPELLER GENESEE CHIEF V. FITZHUGH (1851), Taney discarded the English tidewater rule of ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION that Story had imported into American law, and held instead that the inland jurisdiction of federal courts in admiralty matters extended to all navigable waters, tidal or not, thus expanding the reach of federal admiralty jurisdiction to the Great Lakes and the interior rivers. But in LUTHER V. BORDEN (1849), he reasserted the POLITICAL QUESTION doctrine, holding that a challenge to the legitimacy of Rhode Island's government after the Dorr Rebellion of 1842 was to be resolved only by the legislative and executive branches of the national government, not the judicial.

It might be expected that Taney would have been warmly sympathetic to the emerging doctrine of the POLICE POWER, first fully articulated by Massachusetts Chief Justice LEMUEL SHAW in Commonwealth v. Alger (1851). But Taney held unspoken reservations about the police power doctrine, fearing that if the states' regulatory powers were defined too explicitly or couched under a rubric, they might somehow be restricted by the federal Constitution. He thus preferred to avoid an explicit definition of the police power, and instead emphasized the states' inherent powers of SOVEREIGNTY over persons and things within their jurisdiction, believing that if the issue were framed in terms of sovereignty rather than regulatory power, the states' autonomy from external interference might be more secure.

This issue of state regulatory power remained sensitive throughout Taney's tenure and was prominent in cases arising out of the attempt of Democratic majorities in the Ohio legislature to levy taxes on banks that had been exempted from certain forms of taxation by their charters. In Ohio Life Insurance & Trust Co. v. Debolt (1854) Taney held, in accordance with the Charles River Bridge paradigm, that the Court would not read into bank charters an implicit exemption from taxes. But in DODGE V. WOOLSEY (1856), Taney joined a majority in defending an explicit charter exemption against a state constitutional amendment empowering the state to tax exempted banks. Taney was not hostile to banks and corporations as such; he had an alert appreciation of the role that they would play in developing the national market.

Another issue—indeed, the critical one—that kept Taney and his colleagues sensitized to issues of state regulatory power was the protean matter of slavery and black people. This issue, deep in the background, skewed all but one of the Taney Court's COMMERCE CLAUSE decisions. In his first term, the Court skirted slavery complications in a case, MAYOR OF NEW YORK V. MILN (1837), challenging the right of a state to impose some measure of control over the ingress of foreign passengers, by holding that the challenged authority was not a regulation of commerce but rather an exercise of the police power. But this evasion would not dispose of subsequent cases challenging the power of the state to control the importation of liquor or the immigration of persons. In the LICENSE CASES (1847), the Court rendered six opinions, including one by Taney who was with the majority for the result, sustaining the efforts of three New England states to prohibit the importation and sale of liquor. But in the PASSENGER CASES (1849), raising issues similar to Miln, the court produced eight opinions, this time with Taney in the minority, striking down state laws regulating or taxing the influx of ALIENS. Taney was consistent throughout, insisting that no federal constitutional restraints existed on the power of the states to control persons or objects coming into their borders. His brush with the controversy over the Negro Seamen's Act as United States attorney general had left him hostile to any constitutional restraints that might inhibit the power of the slave states to control the ingress of free blacks, slaves, abolitionists, or antislavery propaganda.

The Taney Court did manage to filter slavery complications out of one major commerce clause case, thereby producing another paradigm of state regulatory power. In COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS OF PHILADELPHIA (1851) the Court, with Taney in the majority, held that the commerce clause did not restrain the states from regulating matters essentially local in nature (such as, in this case, pilotage fees or harbor regulations) even if they had some impact on interstate or foreign commerce.

Curiously, the Court was more successful, in the short run, in disposing of cases where the question of slavery was overt rather than implicit. Taney, deeply dedicated to the welfare of his state and region, and anxious above all to protect the slave states from external meddling that would threaten their control of the black population, free or slave, or that would promote widespread emancipation, adopted passionate and extremist postures in slavery cases. In GROVES V. SLAUGHTER (1841), which involved the validity of a contract for sale of a slave under a state constitution that prohibited the commercial importation of slaves, Taney was provoked to a sharp reiteration of his attorney general's opinion, insisting that the power of a state to control blacks within its borders was exclusive of all federal power, including that under the commerce clause.

In PRIGG V. PENNSYLVANIA (1842) Taney was again prodded into another concurrence. Though he agreed with most of Justice Joseph Story's opinion for the majority holding unconstitutional a Pennsylvania PERSONAL LIBERTY LAW, he firmly disavowed Story's dic-1860tum that states need not participate in the recapture and rendition of fugitive slaves. Taney rejected Story's assertion that states could not enact legislation supplemental to the federal Fugitive Slave Act, and maintained that states must do so; his colleagues PETER V. DANIEL and SMITH THOMPSON merely asserted that a state could adopt such laws.

In STRADER V. GRAHAM (1851) Taney spoke for the Court in a case raising American variants of issues earlier canvassed in SOMERSET'S CASE (1772), a doctrinally seminal English decision that had passed into the mainstream of American constitutional thought. Appellant sought to have the Court overturn a Kentucky Court of Appeals decision that slaves permitted by their master to sojourn in a free state who then returned to their slave domicile did not become liberated because of their free-state sojourn. Taney held that the state court determination of the slaves' status was conclusive on federal courts (a point consistent with his emphasis on state control of blacks and a doctrinal opportunity for evading the issues of Dred Scott later). But Taney uttered OBITER DICTA disturbing to the free states. He suggested that the power of states over persons in their jurisdictions was unfettered "except in so far as the powers of the states in this respect are restrained . . . by the Constitution of the United States," thus hinting that there might be some federal constitutional impediment to the abolition statutes of the free states. He further insisted, needlessly, that the antislavery provisions of the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE were defunct, no longer an effective prohibition of the introduction of slavery in the states that had been carved out of the Northwest Territory.

Dred Scott (1857) was Taney's definitive utterance on the slavery question. His opinion, though one of nine, was taken by contemporaries to be for the Court, and Taney himself so considered it. Taney first excluded blacks descended from slaves from the status of "Citizens" as that term was used both in the Article III diversity clause and the Article IV PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause. In order to support this conclusion, Taney asserted, incorrectly, that blacks in 1787 had been "considered as a subordinate and inferior class of beings, who . . . had no rights which the white man was bound to respect." Taney further insisted that the meaning of the Constitution does not change over time, so that the connotations of its words in 1787 remained rigid and static, unalterable except by formal amendment.

In the second half of his long opinion, Taney held that the federal government lacked power to exclude slavery from the territories, thus holding the MISSOURI COMPROMISE unconstitutional (even though it had already been declared void by the KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT of 1854). He grounded this lack of federal power not in the territories clause of Article IV, but in its textual sibling, the new states clause, insisting that Congress could not impose conditions on the admission of new states that would put them in a position inferior to those already admitted. Taney also suggested in passing that the DUE PROCESS clause of the Fifth Amendment prohibited Congress from interfering with the property rights of slaveholders. But the significance of this utterance as a source of the later doctrine of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS has been overrated. Taney was not a devotee of HIGHER LAW doctrines, such as those enunciated by Justice SAMUEL CHASE in CALDER V. BULL (1798), by Justice Story in cases like TERRETT V. TAYLOR (1815) and Wilkinson v. Leland (1829), and by numerous state court judges, most recently in the landmark case of WYNEHAMER V. NEW YORK (1856).

In his Dred Scott opinion Taney also adopted three points of proslavery constitutional thought previously voiced in Southern legislatures and doctrinal writings: the federal government had no power over slavery except to protect the rights of slaveholders; the federal government was the "trustee" of the states for the territories, and as such must protect the interests of all of them there; and the territorial legislature could not exclude slavery during the territorial period. His performance in the Dred Scott case was widely condemned. Justice BENJAMIN R. CURTIS effectively controverted it in his scholarly dissent in Dred Scott; northern legislators, political leaders, attorneys, and polemicists poured forth innumerable rebuttals; and the Vermont legislature and the Maine Supreme Judicial Court flatly rejected its doctrines. ABRAHAM LINCOLN insisted that Dred Scott's doctrine must be overruled.

Taney remained unmoved by such criticism, insisting in private correspondence that his position would be validated in time. Though aged and in intermittent ill health, he continued his judicial labors unabated. In ABLEMAN V. BOOTH (1859), a magisterial treatise on the role of the federal judiciary in the American federal system, Taney held that state courts could not interfere with the judgment of a federal court through use of the writ of HABEAS CORPUS. He adumbrated the doctrine of dual sovereignty: the federal and state governments "are yet separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other." (See DUAL FEDERALISM.) But he insisted on the unfettered independence of federal courts in their execution of federal laws. In dictum, he asserted that the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 was constitutional.

Taney produced significant published and unpublished opinions during the CIVIL WAR. In private communications, he supported SECESSION and condemned Lincoln's resort to force to save the Union. In keeping with such views, he drafted opinions, probably to be incorporated into conventional judicial opinions when the opportunity arose, condemning the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION, CONSCRIPTION, and the Legal Tender Acts. He also extended the first half of his Dred Scott opinion to exclude all blacks, not just those descended from slaves, from CITIZENSHIP; and he reasserted the obligation of the free states to return fugitive slaves. In an official opinion on circuit he condemned Lincoln's suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in EX PARTE MERRYMAN (1861), an opinion Lincoln refused to honor. He also joined the dissenters in the PRIZE CASES (1863), who insisted that because only Congress can declare war, Lincoln's military response to secession and southern military actions was "private" and of no legal effect. His death in 1864 relieved him from the painful necessity of seeing his vision of the constitutional and social order destroyed by the victory of Union arms.

Taney's lasting contributions consisted of his reinforcement of the political question doctrine, his strong defense of the states' regulatory powers, and his vigorous aggrandizement of the jurisdiction of the federal courts. More than his colleagues, he keenly appreciated the role of technological change in American law, a sensitivity apparent in Charles River Bridge and Genesee Chief. His defense of regional autonomy and his hostility to the power of concentrated capital retain a perennial relevance. His instinct for dynamic balance in the formulation of enduring rules of law, as in the Charles River Bridge paradigm, evinced judicial statesmanship of the first rank.

Constitutional problems related to slavery combined with Taney's personal failings to blight his reputation and eclipse his real achievements. Dred Scott remains a monument to judicial hubris, and all the slavery cases that came before the Taney Court bear the impress of Taney's determination to bend the Constitution to the service of sectional interest. Though he manumitted nearly all his own slaves and was in his personal relations a kind and loving man, Taney as Chief Justice was immoderate and willful when the times called for judicial caution. His tolerance of multiple opinions permitted dissents and concurrences to proliferate, blurring the clarity of doctrine in commerce clause cases. In any case touched directly or indirectly by slavery, Taney's sure instincts for viable doctrine, as well as his nobler personal qualities, deserted him and gave way to a blind and vindictive sectionalism unworthy of the Chief Justice of the United States.

It is the tragic irony of Taney's career that his virtues were so closely linked to his faults, especially in their results. He fully merited FELIX FRANKFURTER's warm appreciation of his role in shaping the American federal system: "the intellectual power of his opinions and their enduring contribution to a workable adjustment of the theoretical distribution of authority between two governments for a single people, place Taney second only to Marshall in the constitutional history of our country." Yet no other Justices have so gravely damaged the federal system because of sectional bias, and the real merits of Taney's defense of localist values have been obscured by his racial antipathies and sectional dogmatism.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

FEHRENBACKER, DON E. 1979 The Dred Scott Case: Its Significance in American Law and Politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

HARRIS, ROBERT J. 1957 (1966) Chief Justice Taney: Prophet of Reform and Reaction. Pages 93–118 in Leonard W. Levy, ed., American Constitutional Law: Historical Essays. New York: Harper & Row.

LEWIS, WALKER 1965 Without Fear or Favor: A Biography of Chief Justice Roger Brooke Taney. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

SWISHER, CARL B. 1935 Roger B. Taney. New York: Macmillan.

——— 1974 The Taney Period, 1835–64. Volume 5 of The Oliver Wendell Holmes Devise History of The Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Macmillan.

TANEY COURT
(1836–1864)

The Supreme Court under Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY (1836–1864) has not been a favorite among historians, perhaps because it defies easy generalization. There were few great constitutional moments and no dramatic lawmaking DECISIONS comparable to those handed down by the MARSHALL COURT. The fifteen Justices who served with Taney (not counting ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S CIVIL WAR appointees) varied immensely in ability—from JOSEPH STORY of Massachusetts who was the leading scholar on the bench until his death in 1845 to JOHN MCKINLEY of Alabama whose twenty-five years on the Court left barely a trace. Institutional unity and efficiency were often disrupted by abrasive personalities like HENRY BALDWIN (who became mentally unstable shortly after his appointment in 1830) and PETER V. DANIEL (whose passion for STATES' RIGHTS drove him into chronic dissent). Division was constant and bitter as the Justices disagreed openly over corporation, banking, and slavery questions—all of which tended to be seen from a sectional point of view. Fortunately for the ongoing work of the Court, most of its members shared a respect for the Constitution and had a common commitment to economic progress and property rights that cut across ideological and sectional differences. All were Democrats, too, except Story, JOHN MCLEAN, and BENJAMIN R. CURTIS. Most of the Court respected the Chief Justice—whose legal mind was of a high order—and responded well to his patient, democratic style of leadership. Still the Court under Taney did not quite cohere. There was no "leading mind," as DANIEL WEBSTER complained, and no clear-cut doctrinal unity.

Clearly the Taney Court was not the Marshall Court—but then again it was not the age of Marshall. The society that conditioned the Taney Court and defined the perimeters within which it made law was democratic in its politics, pluralistic in social composition, divided in ideology, and shaped by capitalist forces which increasingly sought freedom from traditional governmental restraints. Most threatening to judicial unity, because it was directly reflected in the opinions of the Court, was the intensification of sectional rivalry. As northern states committed themselves to commerce and manufacturing, they came to see themselves—taking their cultural cues from the abolitionists—as a section united in defense of liberty and freedom. The South found ideological conservatism an ideal umbrella for an expansive social-economic system based on cotton and organized around plantation slavery. As the sections competed for political power and control of the new West, each came to think of itself as the last best hope of mankind. And each insisted that the Constitution accommodate its policy preferences—a demand that the Supreme Court could satisfy only by compromising doctrinal purity and finally could not satisfy at all.

In short, the political and economic problems of the new age became constitutional problems just as ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE had said they would. Whether the Supreme Court would be the primary agency to resolve those problems was, of course, a matter of debate. ANDREW JACKSON, armed with a mandate from the people, did not believe that the Court had a monopoly of constitutional wisdom. Newly organized POLITICAL PARTIES stood ready to dispute judicial decisions that offended their constituencies. States armed with JOHN C. CALHOUN's theory of NULLIFICATION insisted that they, not the Court, had the final word on the Constitution. Accordingly, the margin of judicial error was drastically reduced. The Court was obliged to make the Constitution of 1787 work for a new age; the high nationalism of the Marshall Court, along with its Augustan style of judging, would have to be toned down. Changes would have to come. The question—and it was as yet a new one in American constitutional law—was whether they could be made without disrupting the continuity upon which the authority of the law and the prestige of the Court rested.

The moment of testing came quickly. Facing the Court in its 1837 term were three great constitutional questions dealing with state banking, the COMMERCE CLAUSE, and corporate contracts. Each had been argued before the Marshall Court and each involved a question of FEDERALISM which pitted new historical circumstances against a precedent from the Marshall period. The Court's decisions in these cases would set the constitutional tone for the new age.

In BRISCOE V. BANK OF KENTUCKY the challenge was simple and straightforward. The issue was whether notes issued by the state-owned Commonwealth Bank were prohibited by Article I, section 10, of the Constitution, which prevented states from issuing BILLS OF CREDIT. The Marshall Court had ruled broadly against state bills of credit in CRAIG V. MISSOURI (1830), but the new Jacksonian majority ruled for the state bank. Justice McLean's opinion paid deference to legal continuity by distinguishing Briscoe from Craig, but political and economic expediency controlled the decision as Story's bitter dissent made clear. The fact was that, after the demise of the second Bank of the United States, state bank notes were the main currency of the country. To rule against the bank would put such notes in jeopardy, a risk the new Court refused to take.

Policy considerations of a states' rights nature also overwhelmed doctrinal consistency in commerce clause litigation, the Court's primary means of drawing the line between national and state power. Marshall's opinion in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) had conceded vast power over INTERSTATE COMMERCE to Congress, although the Court had not gone so far as to rule that national power automatically excluded states from passing laws touching FOREIGN and INTERSTATE COMMERCE. The new age needed a flexible interpretation of the commerce clause that would please states' rights forces in both the North and the South and at the same time encourage the growth of a national market.

In MAYOR OF NEW YORK V. MILN, the second of the trio of great cases in 1837, the Court struggled toward such a reinterpretation. A New York law required masters of all vessels arriving at the port of New York to make bond that none of their passengers should become wards of the city. The practical need for such a law seemed clear enough; the question was whether it encroached unconstitutionally on federal power over interstate commerce as laid out in the Gibbons decision. The Chief Justice assigned the opinion to Justice SMITH THOMPSON who was prepared to justify the New York law as a police regulation and as a legitimate exercise of concurrent commerce power. His narrow definition of STATE POLICE POWER displeased some of his brethren, however, and even more so his position on CONCURRENT POWER. When he refused to compromise, the opinion was reassigned to PHILIP P. BARBOUR, who upheld the state regulation as a valid exercise of state police power. Barbour's contention that police power was "unqualified and exclusive" far exceeded anything that precedent could justify, however, as Story pointed out in his dissent. Indeed, Barbour's opinion, so far as it ruled that states could regulate interstate passengers, went beyond the position agreed upon in CONFERENCE and lacked the full concurrence of a majority.

The Miln case settled little except that the New York regulation was constitutional. The Court remained sharply divided over the basic questions: whether congressional power over foreign and interstate commerce was exclusive of the states or concurrent with them and, if it was concurrent, how much congressional action would be necessary to sustain national predominance. The doctrine of state police power had taken a tentative step toward maturity, but its relation to the commerce clause remained unsettled. That the states reserved some power to legislate for the health and welfare of their citizens seemed clear enough, but to establish an enclave of state power prior to, outside the scope of, and superior to powers delegated explicitly to Congress was to beg, not settle the crucial constitutional question.

The uncertainty regarding the questions generated by Miln continued throughout the 1840s in such cases as GROVES V. SLAUGHTER (1841) where the Court refused to rule on whether the provision of the Mississippi Constitution of 1832 touching the interstate slave trade was a violation of national commerce power. Confusion increased in the LICENSE CASES (1847) and the PASSENGER CASES (1849), which dealt with state regulation of alcohol and immigration respectively. The Justices upheld state authority in the first and denied it in the second, but in neither did they clarify the relation of state police power to federal authority over interstate commerce.

Not until COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS (1852), which considered the constitutionality of a Pennsylvania law regulating pilotage in the port of Philadelphia, did the Court supply guidelines for commerce clause litigation. Congress had twice legislated on pilotage, but in neither case was there any conflict with the Pennsylvania law. The issue came, therefore, precisely and unavoidably to focus on EXCLUSIVE POWER versus concurrent power: whether the constitutional grant of commerce power to Congress automatically prohibited STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE or whether the states could regulate commerce as long as such regulations did not actually conflict with congressional legislation.

Justice Curtis's majority opinion upheld the state law and in the process salvaged some doctrinal regularity. Starting from the undeniable premise that the commerce power granted to Congress did not expressly exclude the states from exercising authority over interstate commerce, he ruled that exclusive congressional JURISDICTION obtained only when the subject matter itself required it. The SUBJECTS OF COMMERCE, however, were vast and varied and did not require blanket exclusiveness. Some matters, he said, needed a "single uniform rule, operating equally on the commerce of the United States in every port." Some just as certainly admitted of local regulation. Power, in other words, followed function: if the subject matter required uniform regulation, the power belonged to Congress; if it did not, the states might regulate it. State police power remained to be settled, but the pressure to do so was lessened because the concurrent commerce power of the states was now clearly recognized.

SELECTIVE EXCLUSIVENESS, as the Court's approach in Cooley came to be called, was not a certain and final answer to the problem of allocating commerce power between the national government and the states, however. The rule was clear enough but how to apply it was not, which is to say that Curtis gave no guidelines for determining which aspects of commerce required uniform regulation or which permitted diversity. What was clear was that the Court had retreated from the constitutional formalism of the Marshall period. The opinion was short, only ten pages long; it made no reference to precedent, not even Gibbons. The Justices now willed to do what they had previously done unwillingly: they decided cases without a definitive pronouncement of DOCTRINE. The important difference in Cooley was that the Court devised a rule of thumb recognizing the judicial interest-balancing that previously had been carried on covertly in the name of formal distinctions. Ordered process, not logical categories, would be the new order of the day.

The Court's flexibility also signaled a shift of power in the direction of the states. The constitutional legacy of the Marshall Court had been altered to fit Jacksonian priorities. Still, national authority had not been destroyed. The Taney Court had refused to extend the nationalist principles of MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) and Gibbons, to be sure, but the principles stood. The Court's new federalism did not rest on new states' rights constitutional doctrine. Neither did the new federalism threaten economic growth, as conservatives had predicted. Agrarian capitalism, for example, fared as well under the Taney Court as it had under its predecessor. The Justices did sometimes resist the most exorbitant demands of land speculators, and occasionally a dissenting Justice spoke for the little man as did Daniel in Arguello v. United States (1855). But the majority took their cue from FLETCHER V. PECK (1810), which is to say that plungers in the land market mostly got free rein, as for example in Cervantes v. United States (1854) and Fremont v. United States (1855). That slaveholding agrarian capitalists were to benefit from this judicial largess was clear from the decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857).

The Court's promotion of commercial-industrial-corporate capitalism proved more difficult because of the sectional disagreements among the Justices. But there is no doubt that the Taney Court served as a catalyst for the release of American entrepreneurial energies. Its plan for a democratic, nonmonopolistic capitalism, Jacksonian style, was unveiled in CHARLES RIVER BRIDGE V. WARREN BRIDGE, the last of the three landmark decisions of the 1837 term. Here the question was whether the toll-free Warren Bridge, chartered and built in 1828 a few hundred feet from the Charles River Bridge, destroyed the property rights of the old bridge, in violation of its charter as protected by DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819). The difficulty was that the charter of 1785, although granting the Charles River Bridge the right to collect tolls, had not explicitly granted a monopoly. The fate of the old bridge depended, therefore, on the willingness of the Taney Court to extend the principle of Dartmouth College by implication.

Taney, who spoke for the new Jacksonian majority on the Court, refused to do so. The Chief Justice agreed that "the rights of private property are sacredly guarded," but he insisted "that the community also have rights, and that the happiness and well-being of every citizen depends on their faithful preservation." The Court should not venture into the no-man's land of inference and construction when the public interest rested in the balance, Taney argued. He cleverly supported this position by citing Marshall's opinion in PROVIDENCE BANK V. BILLINGS (1830). And the public interest, as Taney saw it, lay in extending equality of economic opportunity. "Modern science," he said with an eye on new railroad corporations, would be throttled and transportation set back to the last century if turnpike and canal companies could turn charter rights into monopoly grants.

The Bridge decision, like the Court's decisions in banking and commerce, revealed a distinct instrumentalist tone as well as a new tolerance for state legislative discretion. The Court also showed its preference for dynamic over static capital. Still, property rights were not generally threatened. To be sure, in WEST RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY V. DIX (1848) the Court recognized the power of state legislatures to take property for public purposes with JUST COMPENSATION, but conservatives themselves were willing to recognize that power. The Court also took a liberal view of state debtor's relief legislation, especially laws applying to mortgages for land, but even here the Court could claim the Marshall Court's decision in OGDEN V. SAUNDERS (1827) as its guide. There was no doubt, on the other hand, as BRONSON V. KINZIE (1843) showed, that state relief laws that impaired substantial contractual rights would not be tolerated.

Corporate property also remained secure under the Bridge ruling. Indeed, corporate expansion was strongly encouraged by the Taney Court despite the resistance of some of the southern agrarian Justices. After 1837 the Court consistently refused to extend charter rights by implication, but it also upheld corporate charters that explicitly granted monopoly rights even though in some cases such rights appeared hostile to community interest. Corporations also greatly profited from BANK OF AUGUSTA V. EARLE (1839), which raised the question whether corporations chartered in one state could do business in another. Taney conceded that the legislature could prohibit foreign corporations from doing business in the state and some such laws were subsequently passed. But such prohibitions, he went on to say, had to be explicit; practically speaking, this limitation assured corporations the right to operate across state lines. Hardly less important to corporate expansion was Louisville Railroad v. Letson (1844) which held that corporations could be considered citizens of the states in which they were chartered for purposes of DIVERSITY JURISDICTION—Thus removing the increasingly unworkable fiction created in Bank of United States v. Deveaux (1809) and assuring corporate access to federal courts where the bias in favor of local interests would be minimized.

The Court's promotion of capitalism showed the basic continuity between the Marshall and Taney periods and the fact that antebellum law followed the contours of economic development. Acknowledgment of this continuity, however, should not obscure the real changes in constitutional federalism as the Taney Court deferred more to state power and legislative discretion. Overall the Court spoke more modestly, too, readily acknowledging former errors and generally toning down its rhetoric. In LUTHER V. BORDEN (1849), it went so far as to promise judicial self-restraint regarding POLITICAL QUESTIONS, though that promise ought not to be confused with a hard-and-fast doctrine, which it clearly was not. Although the Court avoided stridency, it did not claim less power. The constitutional nationalism which the Taney Court reduced was not the same as the judicial nationalism which it actually extended. In short, the Court did things differently, but it did not surrender its power to do them. Although the Bridge case conceded new power to state legislatures and promised judicial restraint, the Court still monitored the federal system in corporate contract questions. The Court's commerce clause decisions worked to make the federal system more flexible. But in every case from Miln through Cooley, the Court retained the right to judge—and often, as in Cooley, by vague constitutional standards. This judicial authority, moreover, was used throughout the Taney period to expand the jurisdiction of the Court, often at the expense of state judiciaries which the Court claimed to respect.

Never was federal judicial expansion more striking than in SWIFT V. TYSON (1842), a commercial law case which arose under federal diversity jurisdiction. For a unanimous Court, Story held that, in matters of general commercial law, state "laws," which section 34 of the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 obliged the federal courts to follow in diversity cases, did not include state court decisions. In the absence of controlling state statutes, then, federal courts were free to apply general principles of commercial law, which they proceeded to do until Swift was overruled in 1938. Almost as expansive was Taney's opinion in PROPELLER GENESEE CHIEF V. FITZHUGH (1851), which bluntly overturned the tidewater limitation imposed by the Marshall Court and extended the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts over the vast network of inland lakes and rivers.

Both these decisions were part of the Court's consistent effort to establish a system of uniform commercial principles conducive to the interstate operation of business. Both paved the way for federal judicial intrusion into state judicial authority. When state courts objected to this judicial nationalism, as the Wisconsin Supreme Court did in the slave rendition case of ABLEMAN V. BOOTH (1859), Jacksonian Roger Taney put them in their place with a ringing defense of federal judicial authority that was every bit as unyielding as was Federalist John Marshall's in COHENS V. VIRGINIA (1821). Ableman was an assertion of power that would have astonished conservative critics in 1837 who predicted the imminent decline and fall of the Court. Instead, by 1850 the Taney Court was even more popular than the Marshall Court had been and the Chief Justice was praised by men of all political persuasions. All this would change when the Court confronted the issue of SLAVERY.

Adjudicating the constitutional position of slavery fell mainly to the Taney Court; there was no escape. Slavery was the foundation of the southern economy, a source of property worth billions, a social institution that shaped the cultural values of an entire section and the politics of the whole nation. Moreover, it was an integral part of the Constitution, which the Court had to interpret. At the same time, it was, of all the issues facing the antebellum Court, least amenable to a rational legal solution—and in this respect, it foreshadowed social issues like abortion and AFFIRMATIVE ACTION which have troubled the contemporary Court. No other single factor so much accounts for the divisions on the Taney Court or its inability to clearly demarcate power in the federal system.

Given the slavery question's explosive nature, the Justices not surprisingly tried to avoid confronting it directly. Thus the obfuscation in Groves v. Slaughter (1841), where the issue was whether a provision in the Mississippi Constitution prohibiting the importation of slaves for sale after 1833 illegally encroached upon federal power over interstate commerce. The Court circumvented this issue by ruling that the state constitutional clause in question was not self-activating—a position that, while avoiding trouble for the Court, also guaranteed the collection of millions of dollars of outstanding debts owed slave traders and in effect put the judicial seal of approval on the interstate slave trade. The Court also dodged the substantive issue in STRADER V. GRAHAM (1851), which raised the question whether slaves who resided in Kentucky had become free by virtue of their temporary residence in the free state of Ohio. The Court refused jurisdiction on the ground that Kentucky law reasserted itself over the slaves on their return, so that no federal question was involved.

Where the substantive question could not be sidestepped, the Court aimed to decide cases on narrow grounds and in such a way as to please both North and South. Thus in The Amistad (1841), Justice Story ruled that Africans on their way to enslavement who escaped their Spanish captors were free by virtue of principles of international law and a close reading of the Treaty of 1794 with Spain. Extremists in neither section were pleased. Even less were they content with Story's efforts to juggle sectional differences, morality, and objective adjudication in PRIGG V. PENNSYLVANIA (1842). There the question was whether and to what extent states were allowed to pass PERSONAL LIBERTY LAWS protecting the rights of free Negroes in rendition cases. The South was pleased when Story declared the Pennsylvania liberty law of 1826 to be a violation of the constitutional and statutory obligation to return fugitive slaves. He went on to say, with his eye on northern opinion (and with doubtful support from a majority on the Court), that the power over fugitives belonged exclusively to the federal government and that states were not obliged to cooperate in their return. The decision encouraged northern states to pass personal liberty laws but also necessitated the more stringent federal fugitive slave law of 1850. Both developments fueled sectional conflict. (See FUGITIVE SLAVERY.)

The Court's strategy of avoidance aimed to keep slavery on the state level where the Constitution had put it, but the slavery question would not stay put. What brought it forth politically and legally as a national question was SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES, a problem which confronted the Court and the nation in Dred Scott. The nominal issue in that famous case was whether a Negro slave named Scott, who had resided in the free state of Illinois and the free territory of Minnesota (made free by the MISSOURI COMPROMISE of 1820) and who returned to the slave state of Missouri, could sue in the federal courts. Behind this jurisdictional issue lay the explosive political question of whether Congress could prohibit slavery in the territories, or to put it another way, whether the Constitution guaranteed it there. The future of slavery itself was on the line.

The first inclination of the Justices when they confronted the case early in 1856 was to continue the strategy of avoidance by applying Strader v. Graham (1851); by that precedent Scott would have become a slave on his return to Missouri with no right to sue in the federal courts. This compromise was abandoned: in part because of pressure from President JAMES BUCHANAN and Congress; in part because northern Justices McLean and Curtis planned to confront the whole issue in dissent; in part because the proslave, pro-South wing of the Court (led by Taney and Wayne) wanted to silence the abolitionists by putting the Constitution itself behind slavery in the territories; in part because the Justices pridefully believed they could put the troublesome question to rest and save the Union.

Taney's was the majority opinion so far as one could be gleaned from the cacophony of separate opinions and dissents. It was totally prosouthern and brutally racist: Scott could not sue in the federal courts because he was not a citizen of the United States. He was not a citizen because national CITIZENSHIP followed state citizenship, and in 1787 the states had looked upon blacks as racially inferior (which the states in fact did) and unqualified for citizenship (which several states did not). Scott's argument that he was free by virtue of residence in a free state was wrong, said Taney, because of Strader (which had been relied upon by the Supreme Court of Missouri); Scott's argument that residence in a free territory made him free carried no weight because Congress had no authority to prohibit slavery in the territories—an assertion that ignored seventy years of constitutional practice and permitted Taney to set forth the SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS theory of the Fifth Amendment against the TAKING OF PROPERTY. Scott was still a slave. Congress could not prohibit slavery in the territories, because the Constitution guaranteed it there; neither, as the creatures of Congress, could territorial legislatures prohibit slavery as claimed by proponents of the doctrine of POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY. Taney's Constitution was for whites only.

Instead of saving the Union the decision brought it closer to civil war and put the Court itself in jeopardy. In effect, the decision outlawed the basic principle of the Republican party (opposition to the extension of slavery in the territories), forcing that party to denounce the Court. The Democratic party, the best hope for political compromise, was now split between a southern wing (which in 1860 chose the certainty of Dred Scott over the vagueness of popular sovereignty) and northern antislavery forces who, if they did not defect to the Republicans, went down to defeat with STEPHEN DOUGLAS and popular sovereignty. Sectional hatred intensified and the machinery of political compromise was seriously undercut—along with the prestige of the Court. From its peak of popularity in 1850 the Taney Court descended to an all-time low. After SECESSION it served only the section of the Union that ignored Dred Scott entirely, condemned the Court as a tool of southern expansionism, and looked upon the Chief Justice as an arch-traitor to liberty and national union.

Fortunately, these disabilities were not permanent. Northern hatred focused less on the Court as an institution and more on the particular decision of Dred Scott, which was obliterated by the THIRTEENTH and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS. Dred Scott seemed less important, too, after President Lincoln "Republicanized" the Court with new appointments (five, including a new Chief Justice who had been an abolitionist). More important, the Court brought itself into harmony with the northern war effort by doing what the Supreme Court has always done in wartime: deferring to the political branches of government and bending law to military necessity. Sometimes the Court deferred by acting (as in the PRIZE CASES of 1863 where it permitted the President to exercise WAR POWERS and still not recognize the belligerent status of the Confederacy) and sometimes it deferred by not acting (as when it refused to interfere with the broad use of martial law during the war).

The Taney Court not only survived but it also salvaged its essential powers—and with time even a grudging respect from historians. The memory of Dred Scott could not be totally exorcised, of course, but it diminished along with the idealism of the war years and with the recognition that the racism of the opinion was shared by a majority of white Americans. In any case, the reform accomplishments of the Taney Court helped to balance the reactionary ones. Its modest style of judging fit the new democratic age. Through its decisions ran a new appreciation of the democratic nature and reform potential of state action and a tacit recognition as well of the growing maturity of legislative government. The Court's pragmatic federalism, while it could support the evil of slavery, also embodied a tradition of cultural pluralism, local responsibility, and suspicion of power. This it did without destroying the foundations of constitutional nationalism established by the Marshall Court. Change is the essence of American experience. The Taney Court accepted this irresistible premise and accommodated the Constitution to it. The adjustment was often untidy, but the Court's preference for process over substance looked to the modern age and prefigured the main direction of American constitutional law.

R. KENT NEWMYER
(1986)

Bibliography

COVER, ROBERT M. 1975 Justice Accused: Antislavery and the Judicial Process. New Haven: Yale University Press.

FEHRENBACHER, DON E. 1978 The Dred Scott Case: Its Significance in American Law and Politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

FRANKFURTER, FELIX 1937 The Commerce Clause under Marshall, Taney and Waite. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

HARRIS, ROBERT J. 1957 Chief Justice Taney: Prophet of Reform and Reaction. Vanderbilt Law Review 10:227–257.

KUTLER, STANLEY 1971 Privilege and Creative Destruction: The Charles River Bridge Case. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott.

SWISHER, CARL B. 1974 The Taney Period, 1836–1864. Volume V of The Oliver Wendell Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Macmillan.

WARREN, CHARLES 1926 The Supreme Court in United States History, Vol. 2. New and revised ed. Boston: Little, Brown.

TARIFF ACT
4 Stat. 270 (1828)

Known as the "Tariff of Abominations," this act was designed to embarrass JOHN QUINCY ADAMS and help ANDREW JACKSON win the Presidency. Jacksonians controlling the House Committee on Manufactures wrote a tariff with excessively high duties for iron, hemp, flax, and numerous other raw materials. The bill's authors believed Adams's New England supporters would have to oppose the bill, and that the failure to pass a tariff would cost Adams the Middle States and the election. When New Englanders tried to amend the bill they were voted down by a coalition of southern and Middle State representatives organized by MARTIN VAN BUREN. The plan ultimately failed when representatives from everywhere but the South voted for the bill. Legislatures in South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, and Virginia denounced the act. JOHN C. CALHOUN anonymously wrote the South Carolina EXPOSITION AND PROTEST which laid out a theory of state NULLIFICATION of federal laws. While not adopting the Exposition, the South Carolina legislature printed 5,000 copies for distribution and declared the tariff unconstitutional. Although nullification was defeated at this juncture, and the tariff was amended in 1832, the 1828 act set the stage for the nullification crisis of 1832–1833.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

FREEHLING, WILLIAM W. 1965 Prelude to Civil War: The Nullification Controversy in South Carolina, 1816–1836. New York: Harper & Row.

TAXATION

See: State and Local Government Taxation; State Taxation of Commerce; State Tax Incentives and Subsidies to Business; Taxing and Spending Powers

TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION

Taxation without representation was the primary underlying cause of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Taxation by consent, through representatives chosen by local electors, is a fundamental principle of American CONSTITUTIONALISM. From the colonial period, REPRESENTATION had been actual: a legislator was the deputy of his local electors. He represented a particular geographic constituency, and like his electors he had to meet local residence requirements. Thus, representation of the body politic and government by consent of the governed were structurally connected in American thought.

Taxation without representation deprived one of his property contrary to the first principles of the SOCIAL COMPACT and of the British constitution. No Englishmen endorsed the constitutionality of taxation without representation; that it violated FUNDAMENTAL LAW was the teaching of the CONFIRMATIO CARTARUM, the PETITION OF RIGHT, and the BILL OF RIGHTS. Englishmen claimed, however, that Parliament "virtually" represented the colonies—every member of Parliament represented the English nation, not a locality—and therefore could raise a revenue in America. Rejecting the concept of virtual representation, Americans insisted that they were not and could not be represented in Parliament. The argument of virtual representation implicitly conceded the American contention that taxation was the function of a representative body, not merely a legislative or sovereign body. American legislatures, facing parliamentary taxation for the first times in 1764 and 1765, resolved that Parliament had no constitutional authority to raise a revenue in America. Pennsylvania's assembly, for example, resolved "that the taxation of the people of this province, by any other . . . than . . . their representatives in assembly is unconstitutional." Similarly, the STAMP ACT CONGRESS resolved that the colonies could not be constitutionally taxed except by their own assemblies. The resolutions of the colonies, individually and collectively, claimed an exemption from all parliamentary taxation including customs duties and trade regulations whose purpose was to raise revenue.

The American claims were not simply concocted to meet the unprecedented taxation levied by Parliament in 1764 and after. The experience of Virginia, the first colony, was typical. Its charter guaranteed the rights of Englishmen, which Virginia assumed included the exclusive right of its own representative assembly to tax its inhabitants; the assembly so declared in a statute of 1624. In 1652 planters in a county not represented in the assembly protested the imposition of a tax. In 1674, when Virginia sought confirmation from the crown of its exclusive right to tax its inhabitants, the crown's attorney in England endorsed "the right of Virginians, as well as other Englishmen, not to be taxed but by their consent, expressed by their representatives." The Committee for Foreign Plantations and the Privy Council approved, too, but the king withheld approval because of Bacon's Rebellion. Virginia nevertheless persisted in its position. In 1717 the imposition of a royal postal fee produced, in the words of the colony's royal governor, "a great clamor. . . . The people were made to believe that Parliament could not levy any tax (for so they called the rates of postage) here without consent of the General Assembly." In 1753, when Virginia's governor imposed a trivial fee for the use of his seal on each land patent, the assembly lectured him on the theme that subjects cannot be "deprived of the least part of their property but by their own consent: Upon this excellent principle is our constitution funded." The history of any colony would yield similar incidents, showing how entrenched were the claims that Americans advanced when Parliament first sought to tax the colonies.

When the Declaratory Act of 1766 claimed for Parliament a power to "legislate" for America "in all cases whatsoever," some members of Parliament argued the American position that Parliament could tax only in its representative capacity and therefore could not tax America. WILLIAM PITT and Lord Camden (CHARLES PRATT) endorsed that position. Pitt denounced virtual representation as a contemptible idea and declared that taxation "is no part of the governing or legislative power"; he also distinguished taxes levied for revenue from trade regulations that incidentally but not deliberately produced some revenue. The dominant British position, however, assumed that because taxation was inseparable from SOVEREIGNTY, Parliament as the sovereign legislature in the empire had the power to tax in matters of imperial concern, even though the tax fell on unrepresented members of the empire. That position provoked Americans to distinguish the powers belonging to local governments (the idea of FEDERALISM); to develop the concepts of LIMITED GOVERNMENT, fundamental law, and a CONSTITUTION as supreme law over all government; and to frame written constitutions that enumerated the powers of government.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BAILYN, BERNARD 1967 The Ideological Origins of the American Revolution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

MORGAN, EDMUND S. 1976 The Challenge of the American Revolution. Chap. 1. New York: W. W. Norton.

MORTON, RICHARD L. 1960 Colonial Virginia, 2 vols. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

TAX COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

When the Internal Revenue Service determines a deficiency, a taxpayer who disagrees can either pay the additional tax and sue for a refund in a federal district court or withhold payment and petition the Tax Court to set aside the deficiency. Tax Court decisions are reviewed in the UNITED STATES COURTS OF APPEALS.

The Tax Court, until 1942 called the Board of Tax Appeals, was declared by Congress in 1970 to be a "court." It is not, however, a CONSTITUTIONAL COURT created under Article III, but a LEGISLATIVE COURT. Its members do not have life tenure but serve for fifteen-year terms.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

TAX CREDITS AND RELIGIOUS SCHOOLS

See: Government Aid to Religious Institutions

TAXING AND SPENDING POWERS

A principal weakness of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION was that Congress had no power of taxation. It could request the states to contribute their fair shares to the national treasury but it had no power to collect when, as often happened, the states did not pay. Hence, the first grant of power to Congress in the Constitution was to "have Power to Lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defense and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." The Constitution also imposed two other limitations. Congress could not tax exports nor lay a "Capitation, or other direct, Tax" unless "in Proportion to the Census or Enumeration herein before directed to be taken."

The direct limitations on taxing power pose few problems. Congress does not impose capitation or property taxes, which would be direct taxes and require apportionment among the states in accordance with population. Other taxes must be uniform—which means that the same subject or activity must be taxed at the same rate wherever it is found. Congress, like the states, cannot tax exports to foreign countries.

More difficult problems have risen because taxes not only raise revenue but also regulate. A tax on liquor may be designed to raise money but also to discourage consumption. A deduction for interest in computing income tax encourages home ownership. A tax may be high enough to virtually stop the production and sale of a particular product. Before the Civil War the federal government derived most of its revenue from the customs and in many years had no internal revenue beyond that. But beginning with the Civil War, Congress expanded the scope of federal taxation at a time when the Supreme Court had fairly restrictive views as to congressional powers to regulate local activities. The question became how far Congress could use taxation to achieve policies that were forbidden to it through direct regulation.

When Congress imposed a ten percent tax on local banknotes for the purpose of achieving a federal government monopoly in the issuing of currency, the Court in VEAZIE BANK V. FENNO (1869) indicated that the tax was constitutional but said that in any event no regulatory problem was presented; Congress did have an independent MONETARY POWER, and the tax was merely a means of implementing it. Thirty-five years later the Court faced the problem more directly. Congress had imposed a ten cents per pound tax on oleomargarine that was colored and only one-quarter cent per pound if it was white. The Court in MCCRAY V. UNITED STATES (1904) said that even though Congress did not have the power to pass a statute forbidding the sale of colored oleomargarine, it could still tax it and the courts would not interfere merely on the grounds that the tax was too high. And the Court also held that Congress could impose a tax on distributing narcotic drugs and include in the same statute regulations as to how such drugs were to be distributed. The Court in UNITED STATES V. DOREMUS (1919) said that a tax was not invalid just because it had regulatory as well as taxation purposes and that the regulations attached to the tax were constitutional as facilitating the collection of the tax.

But in the Child Labor Tax Case (1922) the Court concluded that a tax might really be a regulation and thus invalid. A federal statute prohibiting interstate transportation of goods made by child labor had been held to exceed Congress's power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918). So Congress imposed a tax of ten percent of the net profits for the year for any manufacturing business that employed children within certain age limits. Here, the court said, the challenge was not merely that the tax was too high. Rather, Congress had imposed a regulation and used the tax as a penalty for violation. "[A] court must be blind not to see that the so-called tax is imposed to stop the employment of children within the age limits prescribed. Its prohibitory and regulatory effect and purpose are palpable." In United States v. Constantine (1935) the Court similarly held invalid a special tax of $1,000 upon anyone dealing in liquor in a state or locality where such dealing was illegal. The Court said that the law clearly was not a tax but rather a penalty for violating state law.

In a series of later cases, however, the Court upheld the taxes. A heavy tax on sale of special weapons such as sawed-off shotguns was upheld in SONZINSKY V. UNITED STATES (1937). In United States v. Sanchez (1950) and United States v. Kahriger (1953) the Court upheld taxes on narcotics and gambling in which taxpayers were required to register with the federal government, even though that registration would make it easier for the states to enforce their gambling and narcotics laws. In Sanchez the Court said: "It is beyond serious question that a tax does not cease to be valid merely because it regulates, discourages, or even definitely deters the activities taxed. . . . The principle applies even though the revenue obtained is obviously negligible, . . . or the revenue purpose of the tax may be secondary. . . . Nor does a statute necessarily fall because it touches on activities which Congress might not otherwise regulate. . . . These principles are controlling here. The tax in question is a legitimate exercise of the taxing power despite its collateral regulatory purpose and effect." Later, in MARCHETTI V. UNITED STATES (1968), the Court eliminated the use of the taxing power tocompel violators of state laws to register with the federal government on the grounds that it violates the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. And since the power of the federal government to regulate has received such major expansion in modern times, there is little need to use the taxing power to expand federal powers. Even though the Child Labor Tax Case may still be good law in defining when a tax ceases to be a tax and becomes a regulation, it is of minor importance. Congress will almost always have power to regulate and can cast its regulation in the form of a tax.

The SPENDING POWER has also raised constitutional questions. Before the early 1900s, Congress spent money chiefly to defray its routine powers of government. It made a few grants to the states to encourage the construction of roads and universities, granting the money outright with no matching requirements or federal supervision. In 1902 the grants amounted to only seven million dollars per year. Soon, however, Congress began to see that grants could be used to encourage states to take action meeting federal standards even with respect to parts of the economy then thought to be outside congressional power.

The SHEPPARD-TOWNER MATERNITY ACT of 1921 provided for federal grants to states that would agree to spend the money for reducing maternal and infant mortality. Massachusetts, which had refused the grants, and Frothingham, a citizen and taxpayer, brought suits. The Supreme Court in Massachusetts v. Mellon and FROTHINGHAM V. MELLON (1923) held that neither had STANDING to litigate the issue. Massachusetts had no real interest at stake, for it had refused the grant. Frothingham had no standing as a taxpayer because her interest in the funds spent was miniscule and shared with all other federal taxpayers. The result of this suit was to make most government spending programs impossible to challenge in court.

As a result, it was not until 1936 that a major question as to the scope of the spending power was settled. Congress has power to levy taxes "to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States." What does the GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE mean? JAMES MADISON had argued that money could be spent only to carry out the other powers given to Congress—that there was not, in essence, any additional power granted by the general welfare language. ALEXANDER HAMILTON had said that the clause granted a substantive power to tax and spend so long as it was for the general welfare of the United States.

The Court finally had an opportunity to decide the issue in 1936 in UNITED STATES V. BUTLER. The AGRICULTURE ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1933 had provided for agreements between the secretary of agriculture and farmers to reduce acreage in exchange for benefit payments. The money for the payments came from a tax levied on the processors of the commodity concerned with all of the tax proceeds directed to that purpose. The Court held first that the processors upon whom the tax was levied did have standing to challenge the expenditure, because they paid a substantial tax earmarked for that expenditure. Next, the Court adopted the Hamilton position that the power to spend might be exercised for the general welfare and was not limited to the other direct grants of legislative power. Finally, the Court said it did not have to decide whether the expenditure in this case was for the general welfare, because this law was a regulation, not an expenditure, and invalid as going beyond congressional regulatory power.

The Butler interpretation of the spending power, however, soon became the basis to uphold expenditures. In HELVERING V. DAVIS (1937) the Court upheld the SOCIAL SECURITY ACT, concluding that expenditures for old age pensions were expenditures for the general welfare. And in BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976) the Court held that expenditures of funds to finance campaigns of presidential candidates was valid as an expenditure for the general welfare. (See CAMPAIGN FINANCING.) The Court said: "Congress was legislating for the "general welfare'—to reduce the deleterious influence of large contributions on our political process, to facilitate communication by candidates with the electorate, and to free candidates from the rigors of fundraising. . . . Congress has concluded that the means are "necessary and proper' to promote the general welfare, and we thus decline to find this legislation without the grant of power in Art. I, § 8."

The use of grants to states as a means of federal regulation has proceeded apace, almost totally free of challenge by the courts. Only where the challenge is based on the ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION has the Court recognized standing to challenge by taxpayers. And that holding, in FLAST V. COHEN (1968), is not absolute, as was shown by VALLEY FORGE CHRISTIAN COLLEGE V. AMERICANS UNITED FOR SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE (1982). The seven million dollars of such grants in 1902 had risen to seven billion in 1960 and to over one hundred billion in the early 1980s—about one-third percent of state and local receipts from their own sources. Again, however, the constitutional issues have lost their former importance. If the expenditure can be said to be for the general welfare, the intrusion of the federal government into a local area does not matter. Because congressional powers to spend for the general welfare and to regulate under the commerce clause are so broad, there is little prospect of a successful constitutional challenge to federal spending.

Both as to taxation and as to expenditure, no major constitutional problems remain. Congress has such broad regulatory powers that it no longer needs to attempt to get around power limitations by using taxation and expenditure. These methods of regulation are used today as convenient devices for accomplishing goals within congressional power. The major limitations on them are political. If the increase in federal grants to states appears to be slowing and if some recent Presidents have talked about a New Federalism policy to decrease such federal spending, the reasons lie not in constitutional limitations but in governmental policy.

EDWARD L. BARRETT, JR.
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Direct and Indirect Taxes; Economic Regulation; Import-Export Clause; Impoundment of Funds; National Police Power.)

Bibliography

GRANT, J. A. C. 1936 Commerce, Production, and the Fiscal Powers of Congress. Yale Law Journal 45:751–778.

POWELL, THOMAS R. 1922 Child Labor, Congress and the Constitution. North Carolina Law Review 1:61–81.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1978 American Constitutional Law. Pages 225–227, 244–250. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

TAXING AND SPENDING POWERS (Update)

The distinction between real and sham taxes (so-called taxes that, in substance, are really punishments) was used in BAILEY V. DREXEL FURNITURE CO. (1922) (also known as the Child Labor Tax Case) and United States v. Constantine (1935) to vindicate the principle of enumerated federal powers. The Supreme Court applied this distinction again in Department of Revenue of Montana v. Kurth Ranch (1994) to invalidate a state's assessment of a tax on possession of prohibited drugs after the possessor had been separately prosecuted for the crime of possession. Holding the "tax" really a penalty, the Court held that assessing it after the possession had already been the subject of criminal prosecution violated the guarantee against DOUBLE JEOPARDY.

To mark the always debatable boundary between real and sham taxes, the Court in Kurth Ranch employed some of the same factors used in Constantine and the Child Labor Tax Case. Montana's drug possession "tax" was extremely high in amount (a factor not determinative by itself), and the "tax" was conditioned on the possession's being a crime. This was different from "mixed-motive taxes," imposed not only to raise revenue but also to discourage the activity taxed. With cigarette taxes, for example, deterrence of smoking might be a goal, but that goal is moderated not only by the desire to raise revenue but also by other objectives, such as permitting satisfaction of consumer demand and avoiding severe detriment to tobacco industry employment. The Court said, however, that "when the taxed activity is completely forbidden" the evident motivation is not so mixed, and the so-called tax ceases to be justifiable as a revenue measure because "the legitimate revenue-raising purpose that might support such a tax could be equally well served by increasing the fine imposed upon conviction." When a government "taxes" an activity that is completely unlawful, the "tax" is not a revenue device, but rather a penalty to enforce the prohibition.

The Court in Kurth Ranch also deemed it significant that the "tax" was for possessing property that could not be possessed lawfully and that had been confiscated and destroyed before the tax was assessed. "A tax on 'possession' of goods that no longer exist and that the taxpayer never lawfully possessed has an unmistakable punitive character," the Court said.

In the past, one could remark that this distinction between real taxes and "taxes" that amount to regulatory penalties is "of minor importance," given Congress's LEGISLATIVE POWER over INTERSTATE COMMERCE. However, the Court began reemphasizing the federal government's ENUMERATED POWERS limitations in UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995). If this emphasis continues, the distinction between real and sham taxes might become important for federal laws again. Even though Kurth Ranch involved only state LEGISLATION, it is notable for reinforcing the Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON description of a tax in United States v. Kahriger (1953) as a "good-faith revenue measure," in contrast to what Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER characterized in the same case as regulation "merely . . . wrapped . . . in the verbal celophane of a revenue measure."

Spending power DOCTRINE has continued to mature as the ramifications of ALEXANDER HAMILTON's classic view of that power have gradually been recognized. For example, in PENNHURST STATE SCHOOL V. HALDERMAN (1981) the Court observed that "legislation enacted pursuant to the spending power is much in the nature of a contract: as consideration for federal funds, the States [or other grantees] agree to comply with federally imposed conditions." Spending conditions thus are enforcible not as legislation (by virtue of some lawmaking power), but rather as contracts (by virtue of consideration and consent). Hamilton understood the very practical point that Congress may spend even for things beyond the scope of its powers to legislate: Because "money talks," federal payments (and promises made in exchange for federal payments) can strongly influence things that the federal government has no power to govern. JAMES MADISON's mistake was his failure to distinguish between governing behavior and inducing it by payment.

Even the 1937 decisions upholding the SOCIAL SECURITY ACT, including STEWARD MACHINE COMPANY V. DAVIS (1937) and HELVERING V. DAVIS (1937), repeated Madison's mistake by assuming that in order to uphold social welfare spending, relief of the elderly or unemployed (for example) must be considered an "end legitimately national," one "within the scope of national policy and power." Not until the following decade did the Court fully grasp the point of Hamilton's spending power thesis: The Justices held in Oklahoma v. United States Civil Service Commission (1947) that by grant condition Congress could influence something outside the scope of any national power, a grantee's policy regarding its own employees.

In the Pennhurst case, the contract character of spending conditions led the Court to conclude that in order to be enforcible, conditions must be clear enough in advance "that we can fairly say that the State [or other grantee] could make an informed choice." Where the condition is clear, however, the recipient's acceptance makes it contractually binding regardless of whether Congress would have constitutional power to impose it legislatively. Thus in South Dakota v. Dole (1987) the Supreme Court upheld a condition curtailing highway funds to states refusing to raise the drinking age, "[e]ven if Congress might lack the power to impose a national minimum drinking age directly." However, the Court has explained that because their force derives from contract rather than legislative competence, spending conditions are enforcible only against "those who are in a position to accept or reject those obligations as a part of the decision whether or not to 'receive' federal funds."

Persisting confusion about the spending power can produce anomalous results. For example, because they depend on contract rather than legislative power, spending conditions cannot evoke the SUPREMACY CLAUSE; yet as late as 1988 the Court was uncritically assuming that conditions in grants to individuals and local governments could trump laws of states that were not contracting parties.

Similarly, sometimes a "germaneness" restriction on spending conditions has been asserted. Following her DISSENTING OPINION in South Dakota v. Dole, Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR wrote for six Justices in NEW YORK V. UNITED STATES (1992) that "conditions must . . . bear some relationship to the purpose of the federal spending." If this statement means that conditions must relate to some enumerated power, it reiterates Madison's error. On the other hand, if this germaneness rule means that every condition must pertain to an objective of the particular spending program involved (even though, as Hamilton understood, spending objectives need not pertain to any enumerated power), it is supported neither by constitutional text nor by logic or PRECEDENT, and it imperils conditions like those against RACIAL DISCRIMINATION and SEX DISCRIMINATION, which Congress has attached to all spending programs regardless of program objectives. Calls for germaneness disclose a spending power doctrine that is not fully coherent.

One perennial source of confusion is misattributing the spending power to the taxing clause (which contains the "GENERAL WELFARE" phrase). Congress may spend not only tax proceeds, but also the proceeds of fines, sales, gifts, and investments. Money is property, and power to dispose of federal property resides in the legislative branch by virtue of the Constitution's Article IV. This power, however, is a prerogative of ownership, not of SOVEREIGNTY; the history of land grants has much to contribute toward full understanding of the spending power.

DAVID E. ENGDAHL
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Child Labor Tax Act.)

Bibliography

ENGDAHL, DAVID E. 1994 The Spending Power. Duke Law Journal 44:1–109.

MCCOY, THOMAS R. and FRIEDMAN, BARRY 1988 Conditional Spending: Federalism's Trojan Horse. Supreme Court Review 1988:85–127.

ROSENTHAL, ALBERT J. 1987 Conditional Federal Spending and the Constitution. Stanford Law Review 39:1103–1164.

TAXPAYERS' AND CITIZENS' SUITS

Federal courts will rule on the merits of a legal claim only at the request of one with a "personal stake in the outcome of the controversy." As a corollary of this central, entrenched STANDING doctrine, the federal judiciary turns away attacks on the legality of government behavior by citizens suing only as such. The rule stems from a SEPARATION OF POWERS premise: that federal judges should not review conduct of Congress or the Executive absent the need to protect a plaintiff from distinct personal injury. The rule has been applied mostly to reject challenges by United States citizens to acts of the political branches of the federal government, although it also appears to bar federal court suits by state or local citizens against acts of their governments. In essence, the citizen interest in lawful governance is viewed as an ideological, not a personal, interest, an interest best left to political rather than judicial resolution. Nonetheless, if a plaintiff can show concrete individual injury, as in SIERRA CLUB V. MORTON (1972), the public interest may then be argued in behalf of the personal claim, even if the primary motive for suing is not the personal but the citizen interest.

The law of taxpayer standing is more elaborate, because taxpayers' suits are sometimes deemed sufficiently personal to permit standing and sometimes rejected as disguised citizens' suits. Taxpayers contesting their own tax liability have a "personal stake," of course, but such an individualized interest is less clear for taxpayers disputing how tax revenues are spent. In FROTHINGHAM V. MELLON (1923) the Supreme Court found the pecuniary interest of a federal taxpayer in federal spending too remote to justify JUDICIAL REVIEW of congressional appropriations, but it reaffirmed its previous approval of federal court suits by local taxpayers attacking local spending programs. In FLAST V. COHEN (1968) the Court created an exception, allowing federal taxpayers to challenge congressional spending as an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION because the establishment clause gives taxpayers a special interest in challenging the use of tax dollars to support religion. The dissent objected that the Court was recognizing standing to bring a "public action" having no effect on the suing taxpayer's financial interest.

Since Flast, the Court has denied standing to federal taxpayers who raised other constitutional objections in United States v. Richardson (1974) and Schlesinger v. Reservists Committee (1974). And in VALLEY FORGE CHRISTIAN COLLEGE V. AMERICANS UNITED (1982), a decision that substantially undermines the premise of Flast, the Court denied standing to taxpayers who raised establishment clause objections, but challenged federal distribution of surplus property rather than congressional appropriations of money. Even at the state taxpayer level, invoking the establishment clause will not suffice if the claim is not of government financial support of religion but of regulatory support, as in DOREMUS V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1952). In short, a federal court will recognize taxpayer standing only when there is a tangible financial connection between a local or state taxpayer's interest and government spending, or when a local, state, or federal taxpayer challenges legislative appropriations on establishment clause grounds.

The federal judiciary's rejection of citizen suits and most taxpayer attacks on spending reflects a view that the power of judicial review is only a by-product of the need to apply law, including constitutional law, to decide the rights of those claiming injury. To entertain public actions would be to expand judicial scrutiny of acts of the elected branches of government—usurpation that might bring retaliation, in the eyes of those who take this view. For those who think judicial review is founded on a broader obligation to assure government adherence to the Constitution, such an expanded scrutiny would be desirable. If Congress were to authorize the federal courts to take jurisdiction over public actions, the Supreme Court probably would not find Article III's "case" or "controversy" requirement an insurmountable barrier. But the Court has always been reluctant to entertain public actions on its own authority.

JONATHAN D. VARAT
(1986)

Bibliography

WRIGHT, CHARLES A.; MILLER, ARTHUR R.; and COOPER, EDWARD H. 1984 Federal Practice and Procedure. Vol. 13:634–663. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

TAYLOR, JOHN
(1753–1824)

John Taylor of Caroline read law in the office of his uncle, EDMUND PENDLETON. He became involved early in Virginia revolutionary politics and was a delegate to the FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS. He served as an Army officer and almost continuously as a member of the House of Delegates (1779–1785). In the legislature he supported a measure to end ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION in Virginia.

As a delegate to the state convention in 1788 Taylor opposed RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION, which lacked a BILL OF RIGHTS, gave too much power to the general government, and was insufficiently republican. Even so, he involved himself immediately in the politics of the new government, becoming the foremost publicist of Jeffersonian democracy. Both in the SENATE (1792–1794) and in the public press he was a leading opponent of the economic policies of ALEXANDER HAMILTON. In the controversy over the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS, Taylor introduced the Virginia Resolutions (written by JAMES MADISON) in the state legislature. (See VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS.)

An ardent supporter of THOMAS JEFFERSON, Taylor returned briefly to the Senate in 1803. He supported the TWELFTH AMENDMENT and defended the constitutionality of the LOUISIANA PURCHASE when even the President doubted it. Taylor broke with the Republican party over the War of 1812 and the renomination of President Madison, but he did not deviate from its principles. In his final term in the Senate (1822–1824) and in his last books Taylor denounced the growing power of the federal judiciary, JOHN MARSHALL'S decision in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), and HENRY CLAY'S AMERICAN SYSTEM, with its INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS and protective tariff. He advocated STRICT CONSTRUCTION of constitutional grants of power to the federal government.

Taylor saw himself as the defender of a liberty in constant danger and a republic in perpetual crisis. He thought that, in every generation, the American people were presented with a choice between the political principles and practice of Thomas Jefferson and those of JOHN ADAMS—the former conducive to, and the latter destructive of, self-government and public happiness. He believed that the civic virtue of farmers, tradesmen, and professional persons was the indispensable basis of free institutions; and for him banks and corporations raised the specter of economic oligarchy, undermining both that virtue and those institutions. Big government was the creature and ally of big business; and bigness was the enemy of liberty and equality. Incongruously, for all his concern with liberty and equality he unqualifiedly supported black slavery. Taylor is probably best known as a theorist of STATES' RIGHTS: his ideas bridged the gap between the Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions and JOHN C. CALHOUN's doctrine of NULLIFICATION.

Taylor's most important books are An Enquiry into the Principles and Policies of the Government of the United States (1814), a comprehensive statement of the political theory of agrarian democracy, and Construction Construed and Constitutions Vindicated (1820), an attack on the expansion of federal court JURISDICTION and the use of JUDICIAL REVIEW to reduce the independence of the states.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

HILL, CHARLES W. 1977 The Political Theory of John Taylor of Caroline. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press.

LLOYD, THOMAS GORDON 1973 The Danger Not Yet Over: The Political Thought and Practice of John Taylor of Caroline. Ph.D. dissertation, Claremont Graduate School.

TAYLOR, ZACHARY
(1784–1850)

A professional soldier and hero of the Mexican War, Zachary Taylor was elected President as a WHIG in 1848. A moderate on most issues, Taylor was a Louisiana slaveholder who was politically close to New Yorkers Thurlow Weed and WILLIAM SEWARD. Taylor opposed any interference with slavery in the South but also opposed opening the Mexican Cession to slavery. Similarly, he opposed the WILMOT PROVISO but advocated immediate admission of California and New Mexico as free states. He opposed the COMPROMISE OF 1850 and would probably have vetoed most of its provisions, had he not died in July 1850.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

HAMILTON, HOLMAN 1941 Zachary Taylor: Soldier of the Republic. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

TAYLOR v. LOUISIANA
419 U.S. 522 (1975)

Under Louisiana law women were selected for jury service only when they explicitly volunteered for duty; men were selected irrespective of their desires. In Hoyt v. Florida (1961), the Supreme Court had employed a RATIONAL BASIS standard of review to uphold a similar law against DUE PROCESS and EQUAL PROTECTION attacks. In Taylor, however, the Court invalidated this jury selection system as a denial of the Sixth Amendment right of the accused to "a jury drawn from a fair cross section of the community." That the accused was male was irrelevant to this claim. The vote was 8–1; Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST dissented, and Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER concurred only in the result.

Writing for the other seven Justices, Justice BYRON R. WHITE declined to follow Hoyt; if the fair cross section requirement ever "permitted the almost total exclusion of women, this is not the case today." Women had entered the work force in large numbers, undermining their exemption "solely on their sex and the presumed role in the home." Taylor is not only an important JURY DISCRIMINATION precedent but also a strong judicial rejection of laws resting on stereotypical assumptions about "woman's role."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

TELEVISION

See: Broadcasting

TEMPORAL LIMITS ON LAWMAKING POWERS

A republic derives its power from the people, and as JAMES MADISON declared in THE FEDERALIST #39 and #53, the persons elected to administer it hold office only "for a limited period" and enjoy no license to extend the length of their terms. Although in contemporary America such a concept seems almost beyond dispute, Madison's pronouncement marked a radical departure from English tradition.

By the Triennial Act of 1694 the English Parliament limited the term of Parliament to three years. In 1716, however, the members of Parliament, in their final year of service and concerned that elections might be perilous to the ruling party, repealed the Triennial Act. In its place they enacted the Septennial Act, by which the legal duration of the sitting Parliament was immediately extended to seven years. The powers of the incumbent members of the House of Commons were thus prolonged by four years. Although the English might have regarded this exercise of legislative authority as contemptuous or extravagant, they did not consider it ULTRA VIRES in a system constructed on the concept of parliamentary supremacy.

The United States Constitution rejects the cornerstone of legislative supremacy. The recognition of the citizenry as an external force from which all power originates severed the umbilical connection with English tradition. The Preamble's opening phrase, "We the people," is more than flashy prose. The legislators were transformed from the masters of the electorate to their servants. The people are the source of all power; the legislators are merely designated agents.

There is, as ALEXANDER HAMILTON pronounced in The Federalist #78, "no position which depends on clearer principles, than that every act of a delegated authority, contrary to the tenor of the commission under which it is exercised, is void." Agency may be limited in duration as well as scope. The Framers devoted considerable attention to the appropriate length of a representative's term of office. The decision to limit the terms of the members of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES to two years was prompted by a recognition that in order to ensure liberty, government must have an immediate dependence on, and intimate sympathy with, the people. Frequent elections, warned Madison in The Federalist #53, are "the only policy by which this dependence and sympathy can be effectively secured." Although the longer six-year term for senators was a concession to the need for some continuity and stability in government, the expiration of the terms of one-third of the body every two years provides a reminder of accountability (the dependence factor) and permits infusions of new directions from the electorate (the sympathy factor) at more frequent intervals.

Just as American legislatures lack the power to extend their terms beyond those set by their constitutive documents, they may not undermine the spirit of that document by "entrenching" their legislative efforts. Each election furnishes the electorate with an opportunity to provide new directions for its representatives. The process would be reduced to an exercise in futility were newly elected representatives bound by the policy choices of a prior generation of voters. The fundamental, although often debatable, assumption of American political life—that legislative action reflects current majoritarian preferences—could be finally laid to rest if shifting majorities were unable to alter prior majoritarian preferences.

Instances of legislative entrenchment rarely are the subjects of judicial decision. To begin with, most legislators share an understanding of the temporal limits of their authority. Of equal import, successor legislators usually find ways to outflank entrenched restrictions, but if they cannot, they may simply choose to ignore their predecessors' directives, safe in the knowledge that courts are unlikely to void their efforts. Nonetheless, the prohibition against entrenchment has been at the heart of numerous congressional debates.

The CLOTURE rule of the Senate requires the assent of a supermajority (sixty members) to terminate a filibuster. On more than eighty occasions since this rule's adoption, a majority of senators have unsuccessfully attempted to cut off debate and bring an issue to a vote. Such failures have often been followed by efforts to amend the cloture rule; but the supermajority requirement has been entrenched. Rule 32(2) of the Senate's Standing Rules explicitly mandates, "The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in these rules." Thus, any effort to change the cloture rule may itself be blocked by a filibuster. The defenders of this entrenchment argue that because each biennial election only affects one-third of the Senate's membership, the Senate is a continuing body capable of binding itself. Periodically, senators mount constitutional attacks against Rule 32(2) on the ground that no legislative body can so limit its successors. In 1957, Vice-President RICHARD M. NIXON, the Senate's presiding officer, announced his personal opinion that a rule limiting the right of the Senate's current majority to promulgate its own rules was unconstitutional. In the end, however, Nixon and his successors have left the ultimate issue of constitutionality with the membership of the Senate itself. Numerous votes of that body have rejected Nixon's constitutional assessment. Today an overwhelming majority of the senators are of the view that the "continuous" nature of the Senate permits this narrow exception to the rule against entrenchment.

Entrenchment issues also surround much of the constitutional AMENDING PROCESS. Thus, the binding power of legslative bodies has been at the heart of debates about (1) the power of Congress to extend time limits for RATIFICATION placed on a proposed constitutional amendment by a prior Congress; (2) the right of state legislature to rescind its predecessor's ratification vote; and (3) Congress's ability, by legislation, to establish the rules of operation for futrue constitutional conventions that might occur.

One of the few entrenchment issues to have received a judicial airing concerns the extent to which contractual commitments made by legislatures bind subsequent legislatures. The CONTRACT CLAUSE of the Constitution prohibits states from impairing the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS. There exists no evidence, however, that the Framers intended or expected the contract clause to be applied to obligations involving the state itself. In spite of this unequivocal history, Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL, in FLETCHER V. PECK (1810), extended the reach of the contract clause to legislatively created obligations, finding it sufficient that the words of the Constitution drew no distinction between private and public contracts. The tension between Fletcher's extension of the contract clause and the temporal nature of lawmaking power was first clearly articulated by ROGER BROOKE TANEY during his tenure as ATTORNEY GENERAL. Legislatures, said Taney, "cannot bind the state by contract . . . beyond the scope of the authority granted them by their constituents." The power to limit contractually the legislative powers of successors, Taney asserted, is one that the agent cannot enjoy consistent with "the principles upon which our political institutions are founded." Even Marshall was mindful of the entrenchment implications of his interpretation. Recognizing that his reading potentially allowed legislatures to limit the power of their successors, he endeavored to draw a distinction between "general legislation" (which could not bind successor legislators) and "contracts" (which could). Marshall therefore concluded that when a law is in its nature a contract, vesting absolute rights, "a repeal of the law cannot devest those rights."

The dichotomy Marshall posited between general legislation and contracts matured in later years into a judicial understanding that at least some state action was beyond the reach of the contracting power. No body of representatives can bargain away the so-called POLICE POWER of the state. Thus, in STONE V. MISSISSIPPI (1880), the Supreme Court sustained a legislative revocation of its predecessor's grant of a twenty-five-year charter to operate a lottery, noting that the police power must remain a continuing power to be exercised "as the special exigencies of the moment may require." This limitation ultimately proved the contract clause's undoing as the exception swallowed the rule, and the contract clause faded from the judicial scene following the 1930s.

In the 1970s the Supreme Court temporarily resurrected the specter of contractual entrenchment. New Jersey and New York issued bonds in 1962 to construct bridges and tunnels, and promised bondholders that none of the tolls pledged to secure such bonds would be used for "any railroad purpose." By 1974, the public call for increased mass transit made such a commitment unwieldy. Massive toll increases were announced. A reserve fund was established for the bondholders, but in 1974 the commitment not to spend any surplus toll money for mass transit was repealed. There was no evidence of a diminution in the value of the bonds as a result of this broken promise. Nonetheless, the Court, in UNITED STATES TRUST CO. OF NEW YORK V. NEW JERSEY (1977), ruled that the state legislature had impaired the bondholders' contractual rights. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, in dissent, reminded his colleagues that "one of the fundamental premises of our popular democracy is that each generation of representatives can and will remain responsive to the needs and desires of those whom they represent." Nothing, he summed up, so jeopardized the "legitimacy of a system of government that relies on the ebbs and flow of politics to clean out the rascals than the possibility that those same rascals might perpetuate their polices simply by locking them into binding contracts." Justice Brennan may have struck a resonant chord. Since United States Trust, no legislative commitment has been enforced against a recalcitrant successor legislature. It is ordinarily in a legislature's best interest to maintain a reputation for honoring its word. On those occasions, however, when the public interest leads a legislature to abandon a prior commitment, it will be rare for courts to enforce the promise.

JULIAN N. EULE
(1992)

Bibliography

EULE, JULIAN N. 1987 Temporal Limits on the Legislative Mandate: Entrenchment and Retroactivity. American Bar Foundation Research Journal 1987:379–459.

HOCHMAN, CHARLES B. 1960 The Supreme Court and the Constitutionality of Retroactive Legislation. Harvard Law Review 73:692–727.

KAHN, PAUL W. 1987 Gramm-Rudman and the Capacity of Congress to Control the Future. Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 13:185–231.

TEN BROEK, JACOBUS
(1911–1968)

The major contribution of Jacobus ten Broek to American constitutional scholarship was The Antislavery Origins of the Fourteenth Amendment (1951; rev. ed., Equal under Law, 1965), in which he described the influence of the abolitionist movement on the drafting and ratification of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Ten Broek argued that the abolitionists identified the NATURAL RIGHTS of human beings as constitutional rights requiring a national constitutional power of enforcement. He maintained that the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of the amendment protected these natural rights and the auxiliary rights necessary to their enjoyment; that the EQUAL PROTECTION clause required the states to supply full legal protection to natural rights and authorized Congress to protect these rights if the states failed to do so; and that the amendment applied to the states those provisions of the federal Bill of Rights guaranteeing natural rights, as well as those natural rights not mentioned in the Bill of Rights. Ten Broek, a lawyer, was a political scientist at the University of California, Berkeley.

RICHARD B. BERNSTEIN
(1986)

TENNESSEE v. GARNER
471 U.S. 1 (1985)

At the time of this case a majority of police departments in the nation prohibited the use of deadly force against nonviolent suspects, and the Supreme Court sought by its decision to stimulate a uniformity of that practice. Justice BYRON R. WHITE for a 6–3 majority held unconstitutional on FOURTH AMENDMENT grounds a state act authorizing an officer to shoot to kill in order to prevent an escape after he gave notice of an intent to arrest. The DOCTRINE of the case is that to kill a fleeing, unarmed felon as a last resort in order to prevent his getaway constitutes an unreasonable seizure unless the officer believes that failure to use deadly force will result in serious harm to himself or others. Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, for the dissenters, would have permitted deadly force at least against residential burglars who resist arrest by attempting to flee the scene of the crime.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Unreasonable Search.)

TENNESSEE v. SCOPES
289 SW 363 (1925)

In 1925 Dayton, Tennessee, authorities arrested a local high school teacher, John T. Scopes, for violating the state's Butler Act, which prohibited public school instructors from teaching "any theory that denies the story of the Divine Creation of man as taught in the Bible, and to teach instead that man has descended from a lower order of animals." Scopes admitted to teaching about evolution from George Hunter's Civic Biology, a book approved by Tennessee's textbook commission. The Scopes trial, soon known throughout the nation as "the monkey trial," came in the middle of a decade punctuated by the Red Scare, increased urban-rural tensions, and the resurgence of the Ku Klux Klan. The Dayton courtroom soon became an arena of cultural and political conflict between fundamentalist Christians and civil libertarians.

The former, led by William Jennings Bryan, a three-time presidential candidate and ardent prohibitionist who joined the prosecution staff, argued that the Butler Act was a traditional exercise of STATE POLICE POWER with respect to public education, little different from mandating other curricula and fixing the qualifications of teachers. They also saw the statute as a defense of traditional folk values against the moral relativism of modern science and other contemporary religious beliefs. Scopes's defenders, including the AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION (ACLU) and the celebrated criminal lawyer Clarence Darrow, saw in the Butler Act a palpable threat to several constitutional guarantees, including SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE and FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

The trial judge, John T. Raulston, rejected all constitutional attacks against the statute; he also declined to permit testimony by scientific and religious experts, many of whom hoped to argue the compatibility between evolution and traditional religious values, including the belief in a supreme being. The only issue for the jury, Raulston noted, was the narrow one of whether or not John Scopes had taught his class that man had descended from a lower form of animals. Because Scopes has already admitted doing so, the jury's verdict was never in doubt. Darrow and the defense gained a public relations triumph by putting Bryan on the stand to testify as an expert about the Bible. The Great Commoner, who collapsed and died several days after the trial ended, affirmed his faith in biblical literalism, including the story of Jonah and the whale. The jury, however, found Scopes guilty and Raulston fined him the statutory minimum of $100.

Darrow and the ACLU encountered only frustration when they attempted to APPEAL the conviction. The state supreme court, with one judge dissenting, upheld the constitutionality of the Butler Act. However, they reversed Scopes's conviction on a technicality, holding that the Tennessee constitution prohibited trial judges from imposing fines in excess of $50 without a jury recommendation. The state supreme court also urged Tennessee officials to cease further prosecution of John Scopes—advice which the attorney general followed. The Butler Act remained on the Tennessee statute books but was not enforced against other educational heretics.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Creationism.)

Bibliography

GINGER, RAY 1958 Six Days or Forever? Tennessee v. John Thomas Scopes. New York: Oxford University Press.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY ACT
48 Stat. 58 (1933)

A debate over the best use for an uncompleted defense plant site at Muscle Shoals—in the heart of a chronically depressed region—emerged after WORLD WAR I, ending with passage of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. In 1933, President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT urged creation of "a corporation clothed with the power of government but possessed of the flexibility and initiative of a private enterprise" to rehabilitate and develop the resources of the Tennessee River valley.

The resultant act, largely written by Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, encompassed a variety of objectives including national defense; flood control and the improvement of navigation; the development of agriculture, industry, and electric power; and even reforestation. To accomplish these goals, Congress created the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA), granting it the power to construct dams and power works in the valley and to increase production of badly needed fertilizers. The act also authorized the TVA to sell any energy produced in excess of its needs, giving preference to publicly owned organizations; the TVA further received authority to build power lines to facilitate sales and transmission of power. A series of amendments in 1935 and 1939 sought to liquidate the system's costs by providing for sales of electric power, producing "gross revenues in excess of the costs of production," to acquire major utility properties, and even to issue credit to assist the distribution of its power.

Supporters of the act relied on arguments including the GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE, the commerce power, and the WAR POWERS. The Supreme Court sustained a TVA contract for the sale of surplus power in ASHWANDER V. TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY (1936), thus effectively sustaining the act's constitutionality.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

TENNEY v. BRANDHOVE
341 U.S. 367 (1951)

This decision established the absolute immunity of state legislative officials from damages actions, brought under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, alleging violations of constitutional rights. William Brandhove claimed that Senator Jack B. Tenney and other members of a California state legislative committee had violated his constitutional rights by conducting hearings to intimidate and silence him. In an opinion by Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, the Supreme Court noted the history of parliamentary immunity in England, and cited the SPEECH OR DEBATE CLAUSE as a recognition of the need for a fearless and independent legislature. It held that, despite the unequivocal language of section 1983, Congress had not meant to "impinge on a tradition so well grounded in history and reason." (See LEGISLATIVE IMMUNITY.)

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

TEN POUND ACT CASES
N.H. (1786–1787)

These cases, about which little is known (not even the names of the litigants are known), are notable as the first instances in our history of a state court's holding unconstitutional an act of a state legislature. The Inferior Court of Common Pleas of Rockingham County, sitting in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, in 1786 and 1787, voided the "Ten Pound Act," which had been passed in 1785 for the speedy recovery of small debts. Our scanty knowledge of the cases derives from newspaper reports and legislative records. The act of 1785 allowed justices of the peace to try certain civil cases, involving sums less than ten pounds, without juries. The state constitutional guarantee of TRIAL BY JURY extended to all civil cases except those which juries customarily did not try. New Hampshire practice had previously allowed a justice of the peace to try a case without a jury if the sum amounted to less than two pounds. After the court ruled that the act conflicted with the right to trial by jury, petitions to the state House of Representatives demanded IMPEACHMENT of the judges. The house, by a 3–1 majority, voted that the act was constitutional, but the judges stood by their initial decision or reaffirmed it in another case. Following the failure of a motion to impeach the judges, the house capitulated and repealed the Ten Pound Act.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

TENTH AMENDMENT

Adopted in 1791 as part of the BILL OF RIGHTS, the Tenth Amendment declares that "powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution . . . are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." This language was an attempt to satisfy the public that the new constitution would not make a reality of that most repeated of Anti-Federalist fears: a completely centralized or "consolidated" government. But while the Tenth Amendment reminded Congress that its concerns were limited, the Constitution envisioned the effective exercise of national power, as the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE and the SUPREMACY CLAUSE indicated. The inevitable question was to be: what happens when Congress's responsibilities require measures the states say are beyond Congress's powers? JOHN MARSHALL attempted the Supreme Court's first answer to this question in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819). McCulloch is best interpreted as advancing the following propositions: by granting and enumerating powers, the Constitution envisions the pursuit of a limited number of ends (see ENUMERATED POWERS); the framers did not and could not have enumerated all the legislative means appropriate to achieving constitutional ends in changing historical circumstances; Congress can select appropriate means to authorized national ends without regard for state prerogatives; the states, by contrast, cannot enact measures conflicting with lawful congressional policies.

To reach these conclusions Marshall observed that in drafting the Tenth Amendment the First Congress had refused to limit national powers to those "expressly granted," as the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION had done, and that a STRICT CONSTRUCTION of national powers would defeat the vital purposes for which the Constitution had been established. By rejecting a rigid line between state and national powers McCulloch opened the way to the future assumption of state responsibilities by the national government as needed to achieve national ends. Critics charged that Marshall would consolidate all power in the national government by permitting unlimited means to an ostensibly limited number of national ends. Marshall defended his theory by insisting that judges should invalidate pretextual congressional acts, that is, congressional acts cloaked in the commerce power and other national powers but actually aimed at state concerns, not at the free flow of commerce or other authorized national ends. The Court did not always conform to this view of McCulloch in upholding the expansions of national power in the twentieth century. The SOCIAL SECURITY ACT, the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT, and the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT of 1964 were good faith exercises of national power because they were plausible as means to the nation's economic health or the ends of the Civil War amendments. The same cannot be said for the MANN ACT, the Little Lindbergh Act, and other uses of national power for POLICE POWER purposes. (See GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE.)

From the late 1840s to the late 1930s judges unfriendly either to national power or to government generally lapsed into a static conception of state-federal powers that exempted "state instrumentalities" from federal taxation (see INTERGOVERNMENTAL IMMUNITIES) and removed aspects of the nation's economic life (such as labor relations and other incidents of manufacturing) from Congress's reach. (See COMMERCE CLAUSE.) Scholars have imputed a theory of DUAL FEDERALISM to many of the decisions of this period because the Court seemed to say that the RESERVED POWERS of the states constituted a line Congress could not cross in exercising its admitted powers. The most infamous of dual federalist decisions, HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918), prevented Congress from using its power over INTERSTATE COMMERCE to combat child labor, a practice then considered reserved to state control. After the Depression changed attitudes toward federal power, the Court all but eliminated the tax immunity doctrine, leaving only hypothetical protection from federal taxes that might interfere with "essential state functions," as might a federal tax on a statehouse. And in the landmark case of UNITED STATES V. DARBY (1941) the Court overruled Hammer, holding that Congress, regardless of its underlying purposes, could stop any goods from moving in interstate commerce, even though they were produced in conformity to state policies toward child labor and other conditions of manufacturing. For the Darby majority Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE said that the Tenth Amendment declared the "truism" that Congress could only exercise granted powers but that it had no effect on the question of what powers had actually been granted. Stone thus returned the Court to Marshall's view that Congress could disregard state prerogatives in the pursuit of what it saw as the nation's economic health in changing circumstances. But by disavowing judicial inquiries into underlying legislative purposes, Stone rejected the view that judges should invalidate pretextual uses of power—the essence of Marshall's defense of McCulloch as a decision compatible with the concept of a national government with limited concerns. Time had run out on this concept by the mid-1940s as Congress had advanced far in the use of its commerce, taxing, and spending powers for purposes of admitted state concern. (See NATIONAL POLICE POWER.)

Such was the general picture in the postwar constitutional law of state-federal power until a surprise decision in 1976 invalidated federal wage and hour standards for state employees. A plurality opinion in NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976) likened STATES' RIGHTS "regarding the conduct of integral governmental functions" to the rights of individuals protected by the Bill of Rights. Here was an even clearer statement of dual federalism than Hammer, and critics charged that this radical departure from McCulloch threatened federal standards in areas such as CIVIL RIGHTS and environmental protection. But after evading extension of Usery for a decade the Court overruled Usery in GARCIA V. SAN ANTONIO METROPOLITAN TRANSIT AUTHORITY (1985), on the theory that representation of state governmental interests in Congress, as opposed to judicial vindication of states' rights, is the constitutionally preferred way to protect state prerogatives. Garcia thus abandoned Usery without returning to the theory of McCulloch.

Beyond fluctuations in judicial doctrine one can attribute the decline of the Tenth Amendment to the social and economic interdependencies of an industrial society and an enhanced public commitment to minority and other fundamental rights with which states' rights historically clashed.

SOTIRIOS A. BARBER
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1950 The Passing of Dual Federalism. Virginia Law Review 36:1–24.

FLAX, KAREN H. 1983 In the Wake of National League of Cities v. Usery: A "Derelict" Makes Waves. South Carolina Law Review 34:649–686.

WECHSLER, HERBERT 1954 The Political Safeguards of Federalism: The Role of the States in the Composition and Selection of the National Government. Columbia Law Review 54:543–560.

TENURE OF OFFICE ACT
14 Stat. 430 (1867)

After a complete political rupture between President ANDREW JOHNSON and congressional Republicans over RECONSTRUCTION policy, Congress enacted the Tenure of Office Act in March 1867, providing that all officials of the executive branch, except cabinet officers whose appointment had required Senate confirmation, would hold office until their successors had likewise been confirmed. Cabinet officers were to hold office only during the term of the president appointing them plus one month. The act also provided for interim appointments while the SENATE was not in session.

In February 1868, President Johnson removed Secretary of War EDWIN M. STANTON, who was hostile to his Reconstruction policies, and appointed General Lorenzo Thomas in his place. The House promptly voted to impeach Johnson. Though Republicans sought to remove him from office because of his stubborn obstruction of their Reconstruction program, debates in his Senate trial turned on the constitutionality of the statute. The President's counsel maintained that it was unconstitutional as an interference with the president's removal power, a prerogative distinct from the appointive power. The Senate could not muster the two-thirds vote necessary for conviction. Congress repealed the act in 1887.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Appointing and Removal Power, Presidential.)

Bibliography

BENEDICT, MICHAEL LES 1973 The Impeachment and Trial of Andrew Johnson. New York: Norton.

TERM
(Supreme Court)

As prescribed by congressional statute, the Supreme Court holds a regular annual term of court, beginning on the first Monday in October. The term usually concludes in late June or early July of the following year. The Court is also authorized to hold special terms outside the normal October terms but does so only infrequently, in urgent circumstances (EX PARTE QUIRIN, 1942, German saboteurs convicted by military commission; O'BRIEN V. BROWN, 1972, seating of delegates to Democratic National Convention).

Although Congress manipulated the Court's terms to postpone decision of MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) for nearly a year, modern times have seen no similar stratagems.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

TERMINIELLO v. CHICAGO
337 U.S. 1 (1949)

Terminiello was convicted of disorderly conduct after a meeting in a private hall outside of which a thousand persons violently protested his anti-Semitic, antiblack, and anticommunist harangue. The Court reversed because the jury had been instructed that it might convict on a finding that Terminiello's speech "invite[d] dispute." This instruction failed to require a finding of CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER of violence. Terminiello frequently is coupled with FEINER V. NEW YORK (1951) as illustrations of the HOSTILE AUDIENCE problem.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

TERM LIMITS

After the 1994 elections, twenty-two states had acted to limit the terms of office of their federal legislators. Term limits supporters hope to rid Congress of professional politicians because they believe that such lawmakers inevitably act in ways contrary to the public interest. They seek to replace the professionals with amateurs who have little experience in politics but a great deal of experience as ordinary citizens. The democratic theories prompting support for term limits are diverse. Some advocates argue that lawmakers will become more responsive to the demands of the electorate. Others contend that term limits will insulate lawmakers from reelection pressures and allow them to fulfill a Madisonian vision of representative democracy. All believe that this reform will eliminate unseemly close relationships between elected officials and special INTEREST GROUPS.

Some analysts are skeptical that term limits will result in positive change. For example, a study of the political opportunities that remain open to term-limited lawmakers suggests that political careers will remain possible, although a careerist will be forced to adopt a strategy of "progressive" political ambition by moving periodically to a new political job. Even those who enter the legislature intending to leave after a short time will often decide to pursue longer political careers so that they can continue to benefit from the skills they have developed as lawmakers. Once legislators have developed the human capital to perform political functions, they may find the benefits of holding similar office are greater than the benefits of pursuing unrelated careers.

Some critics object to term limits because they will deprive legislatures of their most experienced members, thereby reducing Congress's ability to pass controversial or complex LEGISLATION. Reduced legislator effectiveness also may shift the balance of power between the branches of government. In the federal system, bureaucrats will represent a source of expertise for congressional amateurs, strengthening the executive branch relative to Congress. Similarly, term-limited politicians may rely more heavily on staff or on lobbyists. Finally, some opponents argue that interest groups will continue to influence representatives disproportionately by giving campaign money either to them or to POLITICAL PARTIES, and that term limits will provide special interests with an even more powerful tool for influence: post-service jobs for term-limited representatives.

At the same time that voters adopted term limits on federal legislators, they also voted in most cases to reelect incumbents. Einer Elhauge argues that this seeming inconsistency in voter behavior disappears when one understands the collective action problems facing voters. "Incumbents . . . have more seniority than challengers, and this seniority gives them more legislative clout. Any individual district that ousts its incumbent is thus penalized by a smaller share of legislative power and governmental benefits unless the other districts also oust their incumbents." Voters might prefer the ideological views of a challenger, but they will continue to vote for the incumbent who has more power in an institution like Congress that is organized according to seniority. On balance, voters will choose the more influential representative, who can send constituents a greater share of benefits. If, however, voters can be sure that no district can vote for incumbents because of term limits, the penalty of electing a challenger is greatly reduced.

As the debate about state-imposed term limits on federal lawmakers heated up, the Supreme Court declared them to be unconstitutional in U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton (1995). The petitioner challenged a popularly enacted amendment to the Arkansas state constitution that prohibited the name of an otherwise eligible candidate for Congress from appearing on the ballot if the candidate had already served three terms in the U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES or two terms in the U.S. SENATE. The Court applied the reasoning of POWELL V. MCCORMACK (1969) where it had held that Congress lacked the power to impose qualifications for federal legislators other than those set forth in Article I, section 5. State-imposed qualifications similarly undermine the "fundamental principle of our representative democracy" identified in Powell—the idea that "the people should choose whom they please to govern them."

The dissent by Justice CLARENCE THOMAS found the Court's use of democratic principles "ironic" because the majority invalidated a provision that 60 percent of voters in a statewide election had supported. Moreover, he stated, "the authority to narrow the field of candidates . . . may be part and parcel of the right to elect Members of Congress. That is, the right to choose may include the right to winnow." The restriction on incumbents might actually increase the electorate's choices by leveling the political playing field and improving the chances that a challenger could mount a successful campaign for office. "The voters of Arkansas evidently believe that incumbents would not enjoy such overwhelming success if electoral contests were truly fair" and the advantages incumbents enjoy (such as greater name recognition) were balanced by the handicap of running as a write-in candidate.

The dissent contended that the Constitution's silence concerning the ability of states to add to the constitutional qualifications meant that the power was reserved to them under the TENTH AMENDMENT. The majority's notion of reserved powers was different. Relying on Justice JOSEPH STORY's treatise on constitutional law, the Court determined that the only powers reserved to the states under the Tenth Amendment were those that they had possessed before the Constitution was ratified and that they had retained. The states did not have an "original power" to appoint a national official; thus, the power to set qualifications for such offices cannot be a reserved power. Furthermore, the majority's reading of the history of the drafting and ratification of the Constitution as well as early congressional practice convinced it that "the Qualifications Clauses were intended to preclude the States from exercising [the power to adopt qualifications] and to fix as exclusive" the constitutional qualifications.

Importantly, the Arkansas amendment was phrased as a BALLOT ACCESS provision. Long-time incumbents could run for federal office but only as write-in candidates. The Court held that this phrasing was "an indirect attempt to accomplish what the Constitution prohibits [the state] from accomplishing directly." Because the state provision had the "avowed purpose and obvious effect" of evading the qualifications clauses, it was unconstitutional.

The majority acknowledged the intensity and importance of the debate concerning the merits of term limits, a debate that began at the time of ratification, when some argued in favor of a rotation requirement so that lawmakers would be forced to return to private life occasionally. Noting that a constitutional amendment had imposed term limits on the presidency, the Court concluded that such a "fundamental change in the constitutional framework" must come through Article V's AMENDING PROCE-DURES. Interest groups supporting legislative term limits at the federal level have responded to that challenge. For example, some states have tried to increase the pressure on federal legislators to propose a constitutional amendment by requiring that the election ballot reflect a candidate's opposition to term limits through designations like "Disregarded Voters' Instructions on Term Limits." Challenges to these "scarlet letter" amendments have been successful, with courts holding that the designations interfere with the deliberative process or violate candidates' First Amendment rights.

Term limitations are common in state and local government. Nearly half of the states place limitations on state legislators; forty states limit the number of terms of their governors; and many local officials face term limits. State term limits on legislators have generally been upheld. In the leading case, Legislature of the State of California v. Eu (1991), the California Supreme Court balanced the interests of incumbents to stay in office and of voters to have the choice of reelecting them against the state's interest in ending the advantage of incumbency. The court found that voters have no FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT to vote for a particular candidate and that the state's interest in structuring its own government was considerable. In some states, term limits have very little effect on the political dynamics because legislators did not tend to serve for long periods of time before the limitations were imposed. In states like California, however, where legislatures were full of career politicians, term limits have caused significant, and sometimes complete, turnover, helped bring to power new leaders, and may have affected the ability of legislators to pass controversial or significant laws. Such states are just beginning to feel the impact of limitations; with more experience over the next few years, researchers will be able to draw firmer conclusions based on empirical evidence about the consequences of legislative term limitations.

ELIZABETH GARRETT
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Initiative; Referendum.)

Bibliography

ELHAUGE, EINER 1997 Are Term Limits Undemocratic? University of Chicago Law Review 64:83–201.

GARRETT, ELIZABETH 1996 Term Limitations and the Myth of the Citizen-Legislator. Cornell Law Review 81:623–697.

GROFMAN, BERNARD, ed. 1996 Legislative Term Limits: Public Choice Perspectives. Boston: Kluwer Academic Publishers.

TERRETT v. TAYLOR
9 Cranch 43 (1815)

This was the first case and one of the very few in which the Supreme Court relied exclusively upon the concept of a HIGHER LAW as the sole basis for holding a state act unconstitutional. After adopting THOMAS JEFFERSON's statute of religious liberty, which separated church and state in Virginia, the legislature confiscated certain Episcopal glebe lands and sold them, using the proceeds for charity. The lands in question having been donated to the church by private persons, no contract and therefore no CONTRACT CLAUSE issue existed. Justice JOSEPH STORY for the Court held the confiscation act void, offering as grounds: "we think ourselves standing upon the principles of natural justice, upon the fundamental laws of every free government, upon the spirit and letter of the constitution. . . ." Story did not mention which letter. Usually the Court applied the DOCTRINE OF VESTED RIGHTS in a way that absorbed the higher law within express provisions of the Constitution.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

TERRITORIAL COURT

From the beginning the United States has held TERRITORIES outside the existing states. Some territories have been destined for statehood, others for independence, and still others for "permanent" territorial status. (See COMMONWEALTH STATUS.) Early in our history Congress established courts to serve the territories, but it did not give their judges the life tenure and salary guarantees demanded by Article III for judges of CONSTITUTIONAL COURTS. The constitutional status of these territorial courts was thus uncertain.

Chief Justice John Marshall sought to resolve the uncertainty in AMERICAN INSURANCE CO. V. CANTER (1828) by inventing a new category called LEGISLATIVE COURTS. Such a court, Marshall said, is not created under Article III, which provides for the establishment of constitutional courts to exercise the JUDICIAL POWER of the United States. Rather it is created by Congress in carrying out its general legislative powers under Article I, including the power to provide for the government of the territories. Although the case at hand was one of ADMIRALTY AND MARITIME JURISDICTION, plainly within the federal judicial power, the fact that it arose in a territory made it appropriate for disposition by such a "legislative" territorial court. The result made good sense in a territory (Florida) that was to become a state; upon statehood, most of the work of the territorial courts would be taken over by the state courts, and there would be no place for a large body of life-tenured judges in the new federal courts. Furthermore, independence from the President and Congress receded in importance in a territorial government that had essentially the same power as a state to discard the principle of SEPARATION OF POWERS.

Today legislative courts continue to serve in territories such as Guam and the Virgin Islands. In the Commonwealth of PUERTO RICO, Congress has created a dual court system matching that of the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA: one set of constitutional courts, operating wholly within the terms of Article III, and one set of commonwealth courts roughly equivalent to state courts.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

WRIGHT, CHARLES ALAN 1983 The Law of Federal Courts, 4th ed. Pages 14–15, 40–42, 49, 139–140. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

TERRITORIES OF THE UNITED STATES

The United States has five permanent territories. PUERTO RICO, in the Caribbean, and Guam, in the Western Pacific, were acquired as a result of the Spanish-American War in 1899. American Samoa, the only U.S. TERRITORY south of the equator, was ceded to the United States by the matai (the chiefs) of the islands in 1900 and 1904. The U.S. Virgin Islands, in the Caribbean east of Puerto Rico, were purchased from Denmark in 1917. The people of what is now the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands (CNMI), formerly a part of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, voted in a 1976 plebiscite to become a part of the United States. Residents of each of the territories, except American Samoa, enjoy United States CITIZENSHIP at birth. Residents of American Samoa are United States nationals at birth, and may obtain immediate United States citizenship upon establishing a domicile in a U.S. state (which they, along with other territorials, have an absolute right to do). Official and unofficial REFERENDA indicate that large majorities in each of the territories favor continued affiliation with the United States.

The United States has had territories from its inception. The Northwest Territory was a part of the nation when the Constitution was ratified. That the Framers of the Constitution contemplated the existence of nonstate territories is demonstrated by Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2, commonly called the "territorial clause." It provides, "The Congress Shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States."

In 1826, Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL held, in American Insurance Co. v. 356 Bales of Cotton (David Canter, claimant), that Congress, acting under this clause, could treat territories differently from states and could create courts in territories that combine the functions of Article III federal courts and state courts.

So far as the rest of the Constitution is concerned, early cases seemed to follow the "ex proprio vigore" (by its own force) DOCTRINE, which was summed up in the phrase "the Constitution follows the flag." In the INSULAR CASES (1901) (especially Downes v. Bidwell), the Supreme Court moved toward the "incorporation doctrine," which was clearly accepted law by the time of Balzac v. Porto Rico (1922). Under the incorporation doctrine, the Constitution is not fully applicable in a territory unless that territory has been "incorporated into and made a part of the United States." (Modern examples of incorporation are Alaska and Hawai'i.) Although Congress has granted U.S. citizenship to the residents of most of the territories, none of the current territories are deemed to be incorporated.

The Supreme Court has not OVERRULED the "incorporation" doctrine, but lower courts have considered it modified by decisions such as REID V. COVERT (1957), which held that the Sixth Amendment right to TRIAL BY JURY applied to a civilian on a U.S. Air Force base in Great Britain. At least two federal CIRCUIT COURTS—in King v. Morton (1975) and Wabol v. Villacrusis (1992)— have adopted a rule of construction which holds that in any given case there is a presumption that the Constitution applies. However, that presumption can be rebutted by proof that a particular application is "impractical" (i.e., that it would not work because of cultural differences) or that it would be "anomalous" (i.e., that it would be destructive of the indigenous culture).

In addition to the distinction between incorporated and unincorporated territories, there is a distinction between organized and unorganized territories. An organized territory has an organic act, an act of Congress that establishes its local government. An unorganized territory was traditionally governed under the authority of the President of the United States. Today, American Samoa is the only territory with a substantial indigenous population that is "unorganized." However, American Samoa has some protection for its local self-government in that federal law now provides that no changes can be made in the Samoan constitution without the approval of the U.S. Congress. Thus the distinction between organized and unorganized territories has become less significant.

Puerto Rico and the CNMI are designated "commonwealths." The principal identifying characteristic of a commonwealth is that the organic act is in the form of a covenant or compact between the U.S. government and the people of the territory. In general, Congress has respected these agreements. However, the courts have held that Congress, acting under the territorial clause, can enact valid LEGISLATION that is inconsistent with the covenants.

The United States is in a relationship of "free association" with the Federated States of Micronesia, the Republic of the Marshall Islands, and the Republic of Palau. These island nations, along with what is now the CNMI, were formerly the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, for which the United States was trustee. The relationship between the United States and these islands is close. The U.S. government is pledged to defend these nations as if they were part of the United States, and has a veto over any action of any of their governments if the United States considers such action inconsistent with its obligation to defend them. Nevertheless, the three are recognized as sovereign and independent nations by the UNITED NATIONS, and hence the U.S. Constitution has no application to them (except perhaps as to U.S. government officials acting in their official capacities there).

STANLEY K. LAUGHLIN, JR.
(2000)

Bibliography

LAUGHLIN, STANLEY K. 1995 The Law of United States Territories and Affiliated Jurisdictions (with 1997 supplement). New York: Lawyers Cooperative-West Group.

TERRITORY

At the time of independence several states had extensive claims to territory on the western frontier. A dispute over whether such territories were to be administered by the claimant states or by and for the United States long delayed ratification of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. In 1780 Congress passed a resolution urging the states to cede their claims to the United States. The resolution contained three promises which became the basic principles of American CONSTITUTIONALISM as extended to the territories: that the territories would be "disposed of for the common benefit of the United States"; that they would be "settled and formed into distinct republican states"; and that they would eventually "become members of the federal union and have the same rights of SOVEREIGNTY, freedom, and independence as the other states." After the cession was complete and the western boundary was settled by the Treaty of Paris (1783), Congress embodied these three principles in measures for the temporary government of the territories: the ORDINANCE OF 1784 and the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE OF 1787. The same principles were reaffirmed by the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. Although some delegates advocated maintaining the western lands as a federal colony to be exploited and governed permanently by the existing states, the Constitution provided for the admission of new states on an equal basis with the original states.

The first acquisition of territory beyond the original borders of the nation was the LOUISIANA PURCHASE. After brief debate about the constitutional propriety of such territorial expansion, Congress proceeded to organize the Louisiana Territory following the model of the Northwest Ordinance. Exploration, purchase, and cession, as well as the conquests of the Mexican War, resulted in further territorial expansion.

Congress's power to make rules and regulations for the territories derives from the second clause of Article IV, section 3. In the first important case on territories to be decided by the Supreme Court, AMERICAN INSURANCE COMPANY V. CANTER (1828), Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL suggested that the power to govern the territories was also implied in the power to acquire them through the use of the TREATY POWER or the WAR POWERS. He added that, whatever its source, Congress's power over the territories was plenary, whether exercised directly or through a local legislature, and extended even to creation of TERRITORIAL COURTS with JURISDICTION beyond the JUDICIAL POWER of the United States.

In the early nineteenth century the question of SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES divided the country and sparked new controversy over the constitutional status of territories. Southerners maintained that the federal government held the territories in trust for the states and that Congress could not properly prohibit slavery in them, while northern Whigs such as ABRAHAM LINCOLN maintained that the territories were national possessions and failure to prohibit slavery in them would constitute a national endorsement of the institution. STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS proposed to avoid the issue by leaving it to a vote of the settlers in each territory. Congress sought to allay sectional contention in the MISSOURI COMPROMISE by permitting slavery in one part of the Louisiana Purchase while prohibiting it in the rest. In the COMPROMISE OF 1850, Douglas's formula (which he called POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY) was adopted for the territory acquired in the Mexican War (except California). In DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) the Supreme Court held that Congress did not have the power to exclude slavery from the territories. The CIVIL WAR, by eliminating the slavery issue, ended the sectional dispute over the status of territories.

By 1869 American territorial acquisition on the mainland of North America was complete. A new debate about the status of territories began when, at the end of the nineteenth century, the United States started to acquire overseas possessions, not a part of the continent and apparently not destined for statehood. The place of this "colonial empire" in the constitutional system was a subject of political dispute in the 1900 elections; but it was not resolved until the Supreme Court decided the INSULAR CASES. In these cases the Court formulated the doctrine of INCORPORATION OF TERRITORIES, according to which territorial possessions do not become part of the United States until Congress, by some positive action, makes them so.

Territories may be either incorporated or unincorporated, and either organized or unorganized. The former refers to the degree of constitutional protection enjoyed by inhabitants and to Congress's ultimate intention to confer statehood or not; the latter refers to the provision Congress has made for government of the territory. There are now no incorporated territories, but there are both organized and unorganized unincorporated territories. In 1934 the special status of "commonwealth" was created for the Philippines, which became independent after WORLD WAR II; PUERTO RICO and the Northern Marianas currently have COMMONWEALTH STATUS and enjoy virtually complete internal self-government. After World War II the United States accepted a mandate over the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. Authority over that territory was exercised by virtue of the UNITED NATIONS CHARTER until the trusteeship ended in 1981.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

BLOOM, JOHN PORTER, ed. 1973 The American Territorial System. Athens: Ohio University Press.

LIEBOWITZ, A. H. 1979 United States Federalism: States and Territories. American University Law Review 28:449–482.

PERKINS, WHITNEY T. 1962 Denial of Empire. Leyden, Netherlands: A. W. Sythoff.

TERRORISM CONTROL AND THE CONSTITUTION

Terrorism inspires fear, politically charged rhetoric, and, too often, official overreaction. Much like Communism in the 1950s, terrorism today raises a number of constitutional issues. One reason it does so is that it is an inevitably politically loaded term of art, used more often to divide our enemies from our friends that to describe a particular form of conduct. Thus, in the 1980s the U.S. State Department routinely labeled the African National Congress and the Irish Republican Army as terrorist organizations, but did not assign that term to the Nicaraguan Contras or the Afghanistan Mujahedin, organizations that engaged in similar military tactics to further their insurrections, but whose battles the United States supported.

The most common definition of terrorism—the use of force against noncombatants in a manner designed to instill fear for political ends—would apply to virtually any bombing of an urban or residential area, and thus would cover the military activities of most nations that have been at war, including the United States. Under U.S. IMMIGRATION law, "terrorist activity" is defined even more broadly, to encompass any unlawful use of a firearm to endanger person or PROPERTY (except for personal monetary gain), a definition that would encompass injuries inflicted in a lovers' quarrel. Because of its almost limitless applicability, the term is almost always used selectively; when that selectivity is enacted into law, serious constitutional questions under the FIRST AMENDMENT are implicated.

Government responses to terrorism thus far have raised two principal constitutional issues: (1) the extent to which those who associate with or support terrorist organizations may be punished; and (2) the extent to which the threat of terrorism justifies departures from DUE PROCESS.

As with Communism, the fear associated with terrorism has induced governments to act not only against those who actually engage in terrorism, but also against those who are merely associated in some way with groups that engage in terrorism. For example, the U.S. government has sought to expel and deny visas to foreign citizens for associating with so-called terrorist organizations, and has criminalized the provision of material support to such organizations, even where the support is intended to further (and in fact furthers) only the groups' wholly nonviolent and lawful activities.

These efforts repeat the excesses of MCCARTHYISM. The anticommunist laws of the McCarthy Era presumed that anyone working with or assisting the Communists was guilty of the Communist Party's illegal ends, even if the individual cooperated only for legal purposes, such as LABOR organizing or CIVIL RIGHTS activism. The injustices of that experiment with guilt by association led the Supreme Court to rule that where the government seeks to hold someone accountable for her connection to a group, it must prove that the individual specifically intended to further the group's unlawful ends. The requirement of "specific intent" distinguishes individual culpability from associational guilt.

Under the ANTITERRORISM AND EFFECTIVE DEATH PENALTY ACT OF 1996, however, persons who support the wholly lawful ends of designated groups face prison sentences. Under the law, the U.S. Secretary of State may designate any foreign group that uses unlawful force as "terrorist," and it then becomes a crime, punishable by ten years in prison, to support that group's lawful activities. The Secretary's designation is for all practical purposes unreviewable. If this law had been in place in the 1980s, the thousands of Americans who supported the lawful anti-apartheid work of the African National Congress in South Africa would have faced ten-year prison sentences. Congress justified the law on the theory that any support for a terrorist organization will free up resources that the organization can use for terrorist ends, but if that argument were accepted, guilt by association would be permissible wherever an organization had engaged in any unlawful activity, whether it be the African National Congress or the Democratic Party.

The terrorist threat has also induced the federal government to dispense with the most basic requisite of due process—the right to confront evidence against oneself. Citing NATIONAL SECURITY concerns, the 1996 antiterrorism law authorizes the government to expel immigrants accused of connections to terrorism on the basis of secret evidence that neither the immigrant nor his attorney would ever see. The government may submit evidence behind closed doors to a judge, and may make secret arguments and take secret appeals outside the immigrant's presence. The government has not yet invoked this particular provision, but in other immigration settings the government has increasingly used secret evidence against immigrants.

The only two federal courts to address the issue in the past decade have ruled that the use of secret evidence against immigrants residing here violates due process. As Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER said in a related setting, "Secrecy is not congenial to truth-seeking. . . . No better instrument has been devised for arriving at truth than to give a person in jeopardy of serious loss notice of the case against him and opportunity to meet it."

The government argues that secret evidence procedures are needed because it sometimes has classified information that it would like to use without having to reveal its source. But the government faces this situation every day in criminal courts across the country, where it must choose between revealing the source and not using the evidence. This rule applies in criminal court no matter how heinous the crime, no matter how sensitive the information, and no matter how serious the threat to national security. There simply is no other way in a fair system of justice, because it is impossible to defend oneself against secret evidence.

Proponents of the measures described above warn that America's open society makes it especially vulnerable to terrorist attack. But one of the principal benefits of an open society with substantial political freedoms is that it provides peaceful ways to express opposition and to work for political change. Repressive governments tend to breed rather than contain violence. Empowering government to blacklist disfavored groups and use secret evidence plays into the hands of zealots; it feeds their paranoia. At the same time, it is likely to drive extremists underground, where they will be more difficult to track. The United States has until now been relatively free of terrorism, and arguably that is because of, not in spite of, our political freedoms.

DAVID COLE
(2000)

Bibliography

DEMPSEY, JAMES X. and COLE, DAVID 1999 Terrorism and the Constitution: Sacrificing Civil Liberties in the Name of National Security. Los Angeles: First Amendment Foundation.

HEYMANN, PHILIP B. 1998 Terrorism and America: A Commonsense Strategy for a Democratic Society. Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press.

TERRY v. ADAMS
345 U.S. 461 (1953)

With confidence, we can call Terry the last of the series of "Texas primary cases" beginning with NIXON V. HERNDON (1927). The decision is also a clear modern example of the "public function" strand of STATE ACTION doctrine. In a Texas county, a group called the Jaybird Democratic Association conducted pre-PRIMARY ELECTIONS, from which black voters were excluded. The winners of these elections consistently won both the Democratic primaries and the general elections. The Supreme Court held that black plaintiffs were entitled to a DECLARATORY JUDGMENT that their exclusion from the Jaybird election amounted to state action in violation of the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT. There was no MAJORITY OPINION. Three Justices said that the state could not constitutionally permit a racial exclusion from the only election that mattered in the county. The electoral process was inescapably public, subject to the Fifteenth Amendment's commands. Four other Justices said the Jaybirds were an auxiliary of the local Democratic party organization, and thus included within the doctrine of SMITH V. ALLWRIGHT (1944). Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER found state action in the participation of state election officials as voters in the Jaybird election. Justice SHERMAN MINTON dissented, calling the Jaybirds nothing but a "pressure group."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

TERRY v. OHIO
392 U.S. 1 (1968)
SIBRON v. NEW YORK
392 U.S. 40 (1968)

Terry v. Ohio marked the first attempt by the Supreme Court to deal with a pervasive type of police conduct known as STOP AND FRISK. Where an individual's suspicious conduct gives rise to an apprehension of danger, but PROBABLE CAUSE for an arrest does not exist, it is common police practice to stop the suspect for questioning and to pat down (frisk) his outer clothing in a search for concealed weapons. While this may be an effective way to deter crime it is susceptible to abuse. Though far less intrusive on privacy and security than formal arrest and thorough search, a stop and, especially, a frisk can be a frightening and humiliating experience.

It was this consideration that led the Court in Terry to hold that stop and frisk is subject to limitations established by the FOURTH AMENDMENT. Chief Justice EARL WARREN declared that the forcible restraint of an individual, however temporary, is a "seizure," and a frisk, though limited in scope, is a "search," within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. However, the imperative of sound law enforcement, as well as the need of the police to assure their own safety and that of the citizenry, requires that the amendment's reasonableness clause—rather than the probable cause standard of the warrant clause—should govern this type of police conduct. Balancing individual freedom against community needs, Warren concluded that if "a reasonably prudent [officer] in the circumstances [is] warranted in the belief that his safety or that of others [is] in danger," he is, under the reasonableness clause, entitled to stop and frisk the suspect in order to avoid the threatened harm. Any weapon thus seized is admissible at trial. However, in Terry's companion case, Sibron v. New York the Court held that where the motivation for the frisk is the discovery of EVIDENCE rather than the confiscation of weapons, the evidence seized is inadmissible.

The officer's apprehension of danger must be based on articulable facts rather than mere hunch; the difference between probable cause and the less strict standard authorized in Terry is a difference between reasonable belief and reasonable suspicion. Paradoxically, the case both significantly limited and momentously expanded the police search power: it placed "on the street" police-citizen encounters under the protection of the Fourth Amendment even as it allowed, for the first time, a standard less exacting than probable cause to meet the requirement of reasonableness for searches made in EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES.

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

TEST CASE

Whenever a unit of government, or an interest in the private sector, wants a favorable constitutional DECISION on a point in question, a test case is often organized to gain a ruling from the Supreme Court. The Court has not defined the term, and need not, as there is no judicial criterion for "test case" under the CASES AND CONTROVERSIES clause of Article III. Scholarship on the judicial process provides the best understanding of the term as a strategy employed by different interests, for differing ends. FLETCHER V. PECK (1810) showed that systematically plotting a test case, so framing it as to elicit particular answers based on prediction concerning how the Justices are likely to respond, and then using the judicial decision for political advantage is not a strategy unique to recent CIVIL RIGHTS cases but a durable aspect of constitutional litigation since the early years of the Republic.

Organizers of test cases sometimes look upon victory in the Supreme Court as a secondary goal. For example, the arguments of the National Woman Suffrage Association that women, as citizens, were already enfranchised by terms of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT breathed new life into the organization through publicity of test cases. MINOR V. HAPPERSETT (1875) and two other cases failed but they produced national news.

The Department of Justice took little initiative in enforcing new legislation in the nineteenth century, largely because Congress intended enforcement to come through complaints of individuals entitled to sue violators. An example of this is the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883). Individuals challenged about a hundred violations of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875. Eventually, five came to the Supreme Court as test cases, where they were unsuccessfully argued by the SOLICITOR GENERAL. These test cases were not managed; they simply happened as individual blacks complained.

Business interests may bring test cases to prevent enforcement of new regulatory legislation, as in 1917 when David Clark for the Southern Cotton Manufacturers sought to invalidate the KEATING-OWEN ACT which prohibited shipment in INTERSTATE COMMERCE of designated products manufactured in plants employing children. Stephen Wood reports the advice of a Philadelphia lawyer to the manufacturers:

> No legal proceeding will lie until the [Keating-Owen] bill is in operation. Some action must be taken under some provision of the bill so that a real and not a moot question is raised. A court, in order to pass upon any phase of it, must have before it an actual case, and if the measure is to be contested, the case should not only be carefully selected in order that the constitutional principle desired to be raised may be clearly presented, but I believe then that when the issue is raised, if possible, a judicial district should be selected in which the judge is a man of known courage. This is no case to try before a weak character [1968: 87–88].

Clark proceeded to raise money, select suitable counsel, identify Judge James Edmund Boyd as courageous, and locate cotton companies in the western district of North Carolina ready to cooperate. After searching for the "perfect combination of factors," Clark worked up four possible test cases to submit to the attorneys in New York. There the Dagenhart case was selected as the best. The Dagenharts, a father and two minor sons, and the company "were mere figureheads" whom Clark persuaded to set up the case. First, the company posted notices that under-age employees would be dismissed when the Keating-Owen law went into effect. The attorneys employed by Clark then prepared a complaint for Dagenhart asserting that this threat would deprive him of his VESTED RIGHTS, because he was entitled to the services of his minor sons and the compensation arising from their labors. By moving before the law became effective, the cotton manufacturers put the Department of Justice on the defensive, trapped within the confines of their test case. Judge Boyd, who ruled the Keating-Owen Act invalid under the FIFTH and TENTH AMENDMENTS, was upheld by the Supreme Court in 1918 in HAMMER V. DAGENHART.

Success in managing constitutional litigation requires understanding of both substantive law and litigation practice. Following enactment of the WAGNER ACT in 1935, lawyers for the National Labor Relations Board combined these talents in impressive fashion, gaining a stunning triumph from the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin in March 1937. (See WAGNER ACT CASES.) Against hostile attacks by the National Lawyers' Committee of the American Liberty League, NLRB lawyers carefully developed cases running the gamut of size and type to make the first tests establishing wide congressional power to regulate labor practices in businesses affecting interstate commerce.

NLRB lawyers, even before the Wagner Act was signed, had designed a "master plan" envisioning test cases built around COMMERCE CLAUSE issues stressing the type of industry, characteristics of individual businesses, the degree of actual or threatened obstruction of commerce, and the type of unfair labor practices charged. In Peter Irons's words, this "master plan" gave clear directions for "sifting through their massive case loads in search of ideal test cases, charting a clear path from the picket line to the Supreme Court." The NLRB staff functioned as legal craftsmen, "as much meticulous technicians as partisan advocates," who "winnowed and selected cases with care; scrutinized records with a fine-tooth comb; chose courts with a shopper's discriminating eye; wrote briefs to draw the issues narrowly and precisely."

Although numerous voluntary associations with litigation programs, such as the Anti-Saloon League of America, the National Consumers' League, and the AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS, have sponsored test cases as a way of influencing public policy, the organizations most noted for this practice have been the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), formed in 1909, and the NAACP LEGAL DEFENSE FUND, Inc., organized in 1939.

Modern test cases by associations, public interest law firms, or lawyers working pro bono publico are often cast as CLASS ACTIONS under the FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE. Although they may attack conditions that are widespread, these cases rest on particularized explorations of fact, often through discovery and expert testimony. In attacking school segregation in the five cases styled as BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION, the NAACP sought to develop full factual records, building upon the experience of THURGOOD MARSHALL and others as counsel in the earlier white primary cases and racial RESTRICTIVE COVENANT cases. Widespread test cases will continue because both government and private counsel can approach the Supreme Court only by representing particular parties with particular concrete claims.

CLEMENT E. VOSE
(1986)

Bibliography

CORTNER, RICHARD C. 1964 The Wagner Act Cases. Pages 106–141. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press.

FREUND, PAUL A. 1951 On Understanding the Supreme Court. Pages 77–116. Boston: Little, Brown.

IRONS, PETER 1982 The New Deal Lawyers. Pages 234–289. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

KLUGER, RICHARD 1975 Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality. Pages 256–540. New York: Vintage Books.

VOSE, CLEMENT E. 1959 Caucasians Only: The Supreme Court, the Naacp, and the Restrictive Covenant Cases. Pages 50–73, 151–176. Berkeley: University of California Press.

WOOD, STEPHEN B. 1968 Constitutional Politics in the Progressive Era. Pages 81–110. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

TESTIMONIAL AND NONTESTIMONIAL COMPULSION

In the 1960s the Supreme Court ruled that the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION was not infringed when police compelled the driver of an accident vehicle to give a blood sample for analysis of its alcoholic content, compelled a suspect in a LINEUP to utter before witnesses the words used by a bank robber, and compelled another suspected bank robber to submit a sample of his handwriting for comparison with a note given to a bankteller. In the 1970s the Court held that the right against self-incrimination did not protect a person from the compulsory production of business and tax records in the possession of his or her accountant or lawyer, and did not protect a person from a court order to make a voice recording for a federal GRAND JURY seeking to identify a criminal by the sound of a voice on a legally intercepted telephone conversation. All these decisions shared a thorny problem: if a person is compelled to provide the state with evidence to incriminate him, is he necessarily a witness against himself in the Fifth Amendment sense?

The Court prefers a different formulation: does nontestimonial compulsion force a person to be a witness against himself criminally? The consistent answer has been "no," even if there was a testimonial dimension to the forced admissions. If that testimonial dimension loomed too large, the Court loosened its distinction between testimonial and nontestimonial compulsion and relied on some other distinction. Thus, when the driver of a vehicle involved in an accident was required by state law to stop and identify himself, though doing so subjected him to criminal penalties, the Court saw no Fifth Amendment issue, only a regulation promoting the satisfaction of civil liabilities. Similarly, when a lawyer or accountant was forced to turn over a client's incriminating records, the client had not been compelled at all, though he paid the criminal penalty and lost the chance to make a Fifth Amendment plea. And when the police during the course of a lawful search found incriminating business records, the records were introduced in evidence, although they could not have been subpoenaed directly from the businessman. In these cases, where the compulsion was communicative or testimonial in character, the Court inconsistently discoursed on the need to decide as it did in order to avoid a decision against the introduction of nontestimonial evidence that had been compelled.

More often the Court relied on a supposed distinction between forcing a person to furnish evidence against himself of a testimonial nature and forcing him to be the source of nontestimonial or physical evidence against himself, usually derived from his body. The word "witness" implies giving testimony based on one's knowledge, not displaying one's person. Compulsion to reveal information other than one's physical characteristics is generally unconstitutional, especially if the information is derived directly from the party himself, though not if the police lawfully find his records. The Court's distinction between testimonial and nontestimonial compulsion is obviously a bit porous. That distinction derived from the realistic need to prevent the Fifth Amendment from disabling police identifications based on fingerprints, handwriting, photographs, blood samples, voice exemplars, and lineups. The distinction had its origin in a passing remark by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES in 1910, when he dismissed as "an extravagant extension of the Fifth Amendment" the claim that requiring a defendant to model a shirt for identification purposes breached the right against self-incrimination.

The trouble with the distinction, apart from the Court's own inconsistency, is that physical or identifying evidence can be communicative in character, as when a laboratory report, the result of a drunken driver's blood sample, is introduced against him, or when a grand jury indicts one whose voice identifies him as the culprit. Whether by writing, speaking, or giving blood involuntarily, an individual has been compelled to furnish evidence against himself. That he has not been forced to "testify" is a distinction less persuasive than semantically catchy. However, some such distinction seems necessary. The fundamental meaning of the Fifth Amendment is that a person need not be the unwilling instrument of his own undoing and that the state must find its own evidence against him without his involuntary cooperation, and a literal reading of the amendment would prevent the police from fingerprinting a suspect or making him stand in a lineup for identification purposes. Thus the Court must find ways around the amendment.

A minority of Justices have sought a compromise by permitting as nontestimonial that evidence which does not require volition or affirmative cooperation; thus, the lineup and taking blood, photographs, and fingerprints require merely passive conduct. If, however, incriminating evidence can be secured only by the active volition of one asked to repeat certain words, model clothing, or give a handwriting sample, these minority Justices would sustain a Fifth Amendment plea. But their distinction between volitional and passive acts is as hairsplitting as the majority's between testimonial and nontestimonial compulsion. Anyone overpowered to give a sample of his blood would scarcely think he affirmatively cooperated.

The Justices in the majority also make unreal distinctions, as between the physical properties of one's voice and the testimonial content of what he says: "This is a stickup" communicates more than pitch and resonance. If the right against self-incrimination protects a defendant at his trial from having to speak up for the benefit of witnesses, why does it not protect him in the grand jury room, the interrogation room, or the lineup?

The distinction between testimonial and nontestimonial compulsion derives from the needs of law enforcement and seems to be a permanent addition to constitutional law. The Court, which can reach whatever results it desires, probably will add to the roster of nontestimonial evidence that can be compelled and will narrow the meaning of testimonial compulsion or find exceptions to it.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BAUER, W. J. 1977 Formalism, Legal Realism, & Constitutionally Protected Privacy under the Fourth & Fifth Amendments. Harvard Law Review 90:945–991.

KOONTZ, HAL and STODEL, JEFFREY 1973 The Scope of Testimonial Immunity under the Fifth: Kastigar v. United States. Loyola (Los Angeles) Law Review 6:350–383.

TESTIMONIAL IMMUNITY

See: Immunity Grant

TEST OATH CASES

Cummings v. Missouri
4 Wallace 277 (1867)
Ex Parte Garland
4 Wallace 333 (1867)

Historically test oaths were weapons to inflict penalties and punishments on obnoxious minorities and were enemies of freedom of political and religious thought. A test or LOYALTY OATH should not be confused with an oath of allegiance, which is a promissory oath by which one swears to support the government and, if assuming office, to discharge its duties faithfully. An oath of allegiance concerns future conduct. A test oath is retroactive and purgative, because it is a disclaimer of specific beliefs, associations, and behavior deemed criminal or disloyal.

Missouri by its constitution prescribed a series of disavowals of belief and past conduct in the form of oaths to be taken by all voters, jurors, state officers, clergymen, lawyers, teachers, and corporation officers. All must swear as a condition of voting, holding office, teaching, and the like, that they had never been in armed hostility to the United States, had never by word or deed manifested adherence to the enemies of the country or desired their victory, had never been connected with any organization inimical to the United States, and had never been a Southern sympathizer. Anyone teaching, preaching, voting, or engaging in any of the specified activities without first taking the oaths was subject to fine and imprisonment. Cummings, a Roman Catholic priest, carried on his religious duties without taking the oath and was convicted.

The test oath prescribed by Congress was a disclaimer of having served the Confederacy and applied only to federal officials until extended in 1865 to members of the federal bar. It could be construed as a wartime qualification for office until it was extended to peacetime and to members of the federal bar. Until then it was not passed to inflict punishment for past offenses. The oath disqualified AUGUSTUS H. GARLAND, who had spent the war as a member of the Confederate Congress, from resuming his prewar practice before the Supreme Court, although he had been given a presidential pardon.

The Supreme Court, Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD writing for a bare majority, held unconstitutional both the Missouri requirement of a test oath and the federal requirement of 1865. Field reasoned that each violated the bans against EX POST FACTO laws and BILLS OF ATTAINDER. To conclude that they constituted ex post facto laws, Field had to demonstrate that they retroactively imposed punishment for acts not criminal when committed. Missouri's dragnet covered not only hostile acts against the government but "words, desires, and sympathies also," and some of the acts were not even blameworthy. The federal statute reached acts that under certain circumstances might not have been offenses, such as assisting persons in armed hostility to the United States, serving in innocuous positions in the South, or reluctantly obeying the existing order. Persons who were incapable of truthfully taking the oaths suffered disabilities that constituted punishment, such as the deprivation of civil and political rights, disqualifications from office and from the pursuit of lawful professions, and, in the case of Garland, disbarment. Justice SAMUEL F. MILLER for the dissenters replied that an ex post facto law punished only in a criminal sense by imposing fines and imprisonment, not civil disabilities.

Field described a bill of attainder as a legislative act that inflicts punishment without a judicial trial. Attainders, he insisted, could be directed against whole classes, not just named individuals, and might inflict punishments conditionally, as in these cases. Cummings the priest and Garland the lawyer were presumed guilty until they removed that presumption by their expurgatory oaths; if it was not removed, they faced the punishment of being deprived of their professions without trial and conviction. Miller could see no attainder because the required oaths designated no criminal by name or description, declared no guilt, and inflicted neither sentence nor punishment. He saw merely a qualification for office, a position that Field savaged. Miller accurately argued, however, that Field stretched the conventional meanings of ex post facto laws and bills of attainder to cover the cases before the Court. For that reason, these decisions are today considered triumphs for CIVIL LIBERTIES; in their time, however, they exposed the Court to accusations of sympathizing with the Confederate cause, opposing Reconstruction, and assisting enemies of the Union.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

FAIRMAN, CHARLES 1939 Mr. Justice Miller and the Supreme Court. Pages 129–136. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

SWISHER, CARL BRENT (1930) 1963 Stephen J. Field: Craftsman of the Law. Pages 138–154. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books.

TEXAS v. BROWN
460 U.S. 730 (1983)

This case is significant for Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST'S exposition of the scope and applicability of the PLAIN VIEW DOCTRINE, which had emerged in COOLIDGE V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1971) as an exception to the warrant requirement for a SEARCH AND SEIZURE. According to Rehnquist, the answer to the question whether property in plain view may be seized depends on the lawfulness of the intrusion that allows the police to see that property. Plain view therefore provides the basis for seizure if an officer's access to the object has a prior FOURTH AMENDMENT justification. The police may seize a suspicious object if they are engaged in a lawful activity; they do not have to know at once that the object inadvertently exposed to their sight is EVIDENCE of a crime. Reasonable suspicion on PROBABLE CAUSE is sufficient even if the property seized was not immediately apparent as evidence of crime. No Justice dissented in this case, but Rehnquist spoke for a mere plurality, and a mere plurality had announced the plain view doctrine in Coolidge. Accordingly, judicial controversy about the doctrine will continue, as will controversy about its application to particular facts.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

TEXAS v. JOHNSON

See: Flag Desecration

TEXAS v. WHITE
7 Wallace 700 (1869)

In 1867 the Court accepted ORIGINAL JURISDICTION of Texas v. White because one party was a state (Article III, section 2). So doing, the Court raised again, as in EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866) and the TEST OATH cases, a possibility of judicial intervention into military reconstruction. Some decision on the state-status question was needed. Democrats insisted that the nation was not empowered to answer the state-status question and that the South's states, like bottom-weighted dolls, had sprung up, fully restored, with prevailing race hierarchies intact, in the wake of Union Army advances. Almost all Republicans assumed that the South's states, by attempting to secede, had twisted themselves out of their proper federal relations; that the Constitution (Article IV, section 4) imposed a duty on the nation to guarantee every state a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT; and that the nation also possessed temporary "grasp of war" dominion over the defeated states.

Post-Appomattox Texas wished to recover possession of state bonds that secessionist Texas had sold. Counsel for bond buyers argued in 1869, when the Supreme Court heard Texas v. White, that Texas was always a state and the sales were valid. Special counsel for Texas, Unionist George Washington Paschal, author of a recent treatise on the Constitution, insisted that though Texas remained a state, its acts adverse to federal responsibilities invalidated the bond sales; the state should recover the bonds.

Chief Justice SALMON P. CHASE, for the majority of the Court, accepted and restated Paschal's position. The Constitution "looks to an indestructible Union composed of indestructible States." SECESSION was void. Texas's acts supportive of rebellion, performed while seceded, were unsupportable.

Justices ROBERT C. GRIER, SAMUEL F. MILLER, and NOAH SWAYNE insisted that Texas was as much out of the Union in 1869 as in 1861. Therefore the original jurisdiction clause of the Constitution did not apply.

Both the majority and the minority stressed Congress's primacy in defining a state's status. Chase, though insisting that he was not pronouncing upon military reconstruction, by implication approved its constitutional bases and reinforced Court pretensions to at least an equal share, if not more, in implementation of policy, through its review authority.

HAROLD M. HYMAN
(1986)

TEXAS ANNEXATION

See: Annexation of Texas

TEXAS MONTHLY, INC. v. BULLOCK
489 U.S. 1 (1989)

The decision in this case affected the fifteen states whose statutes on sales and use taxes exempted religious publications. Texas exempted periodicals that consisted entirely of writings promulgating a religious faith. Voting 6–3, the Court held the act unconstitutional. Justice BYRON R. WHITE believed that because the statute discriminated on the basis of the content of publication, it violated the free-press clause. A bare majority believed that the statute violated the ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, for the Court, concluded that the statute failed to serve the secular purpose of maintaining the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, but rather, had the purpose of advancing the religious mission of a particular faith. The exemption of the religious periodical in effect subsidized its teachings at the expense of taxpayers who were not exempt from the tax.

Brennan went further, thereby losing Justices HARRY A. BLACKMUN and SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, when he also declared the statute violative of the free-exercise clause. Blackmun and O'Connor preferred to rest exclusively on the establishment clause, believing that Brennan's free-exercise argument subordinated RELIGIOUS LIBERTY to the establishment clause. In dissent, Justlices ANTONIN SCALIA, WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, and ANTHONY M. KENNEDY protested that the Court had mangled its own PRECEDENTS and diminished the free-exercies clause. Their views, however would have altered the constitutional law of the subject.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1992)

TEXTUALISM

Textualism denotes the opinion that whenever possible, judges resolving questions of constitutional law should rely primarily on the language of the Constitution itself. The text should guide decision and the text itself, rather than other considerations such as ORIGINAL INTENT, ratifier intent, history, principles inferred from the text, altered circumstances, judicial readings of societal values, or even judicial precedents. Justice OWEN J. ROBERTS, for the Court in UNITED STATES V. BUTLER (1936), manifested an allegiance to textualism when he declared that the constitutionality of a contested statute should be squared against the appropriate language of the text to see if they match.

This view of the best way to determine constitutionality was the most prevalent one at the time of the making of the Constitution. THOMAS JEFFERSON and ALEXANDER HAMILTON differed on the question as to whether an act of Congress incorporating a bank was constitutional; but, as Hamilton said, Jefferson would agree "that whatever may have been the intention of the framers of a constitution, or of a law, that intention is to be sought for in the instrument itself, according to the usual established rules of construction." Hamilton accurately stated the truth of the matter to the founding generation.

Despite near unanimity on the propriety of interpreting the Constitution according to established rules of construction, the Framers arrived at contradictory results when applying those rules to numerous important constitutional issues. Their belief in textualism did not prevent them from dividing on the removal power, the power to charter a corporation, the power to declare neutrality, the scope of executive powers, the power to enact excise and use taxes without apportioning them on population, the power of a treaty to obligate the House to appropriate money, the power of JUDICIAL REVIEW, the power to deport aliens, the power to pass an act against SEDITIOUS LIBEL, the power to abolish judicial offices of life tenure, and the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to decide suits against states without their consent or to issue writs of MANDAMUS against executive officers.

Rules of constitutional construction by which to construe the text are comparable to those of statutory construction, which a current federal judge, Frank Easterbrook, called "a total jumble." For every rule, as Karl Llewellyn demonstrated in his Common Law Tradition, "there is an equal and opposite rule." A master commentator, Justice JOSEPH STORY, discoursed on the rules of construction for some sixty pages in his Commentaries on the Constitution, yet he failed completely to convince his Jacksonian colleagues on the bench. Rules of construction in effect free, rather than fetter, judicial discretion. The fact remains, however, that textualism should be the bedrock of judicial review; as Story said, "Nothing but the text itself was adopted by the whole people." Whenever the fair or plain meaning of the Constitution can be ascertained, it should guide judgment.

The problem is that the Constitution is a brief elliptical document framed by common lawyers trained to believe that a few comprehensive and expansive principles supplementing a structural description will be infinitely adaptable and will provide guides that can serve to answer virtually any question that might arise on a case-to-case basis. In some crucial respects, the Constitution resembles Martin Chuzzlewit's grandnephew, who, Dickens said, "had no more than the first idea and sketchy notion of a face." The Framers had a genius for studied imprecision and calculated ambiguity. They relied on many general terms because common lawyers expressed themselves that way out of conviction and because politics required compromise, and compromise required ambiguity and vagueness.

The text, even with twenty-six amendments that have been added in two centuries, is scarcely 7,000 words long, and only about two percent of the verbiage possesses any significance in constitutional law. Almost without exception, these are the purposefully or unavoidably general terms: commerce among the states, OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS, NECESSARY AND PROPER, BILLS OF CREDIT, REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT, DUE PROCESS OF LAW, PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES, direct taxes, GENERAL WELFARE, liberty, UNREASONABLE SEARCHES, EQUAL PROTECTION, and the like.

For the most part, the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 designed the Constitution with the utmost diligence and attention to detail. The Convention usually chose words with craft and craftsmanship. This is the reason that constitutional law does not involve the bulk of the Constitution. It does not have to be litigated because it is clear and understandable. Consequently, the vagueness and ambiguities found in the Constitution were probably deliberate. In THE FEDERALIST #37, JAMES MADISON replied to the Anti-Federalist criticism that the Constitution's lack of clarity on some matters threatened the states and liberty. Obscure and equivocal language was inevitable, he contended, but its meaning would be clarified in time by adjudications. ABRAHAM BALDWIN of Georgia, another Framer, declared that some subjects were left "a little ambiguous and uncertain" for political reasons and would be settled in time by practice or by amendments. Some textual language remained open-ended to avoid giving offense by explicitness. Treaty powers, judicial powers, and rival powers of legislation fell into these categories, according to Baldwin.

Ambiguity and vagueness arise in the nonstructural sections. Ambiguous words permit different understandings; vague words do not allow for much understanding. The exceptions clause of Article III is a good example of ambiguity. It might mean that Congress may switch APPELLATE JURISDICTION to ORIGINAL JURISDICTION, thereby adding to the Supreme Court's original jurisdiction, as counsel in MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) argued, or it might mean that the original jurisdiction of the Court is fixed, as JOHN MARSHALL held. If the exceptions clause means that Congress may make exceptions to the Court's jurisdiction by diminishing its appellate jurisdiction, how far can Congress go? And how can the Court exercise the jurisdiction specified in Article III as belonging to the JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES if it is dependent on Congress's will?

The text of Article I, section 8, poses problems too. Congress may pass no capitation or "other direct tax" unless apportioned among the states on the basis of population. Although the Framers probably regarded direct taxes as only taxes imposed on people per capita and on land, they did not say so. They left "other direct taxes" open to interpretation. Article I, section 8, on the tax power is all the more puzzling because it is not known whether the tax power connotes an equally expansive power to spend, and the meaning of the "general welfare" is equally mystifying. Constitutional government as the Framers understood it cannot survive a national power to legislate for the general welfare, nor can the federal system survive a national power authorized to spend for the general welfare, yet the text gives credibility to these views.

The term "in pursuance of" in Article VI (the SUPREMACY CLAUSE) is also ambiguous. Usually this term is taken to mean that in order for acts of Congress to be constitutional, they must be consistent with the Constitution. The "in pursuance of" clause is a mainstay of the argument that the Supreme Court may exercise judicial review over acts of Congress. Yet at the time of the framing, the text of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION showed that "in pursuance of" meant "under authority of" or "done in prosecution of."

The EXECUTIVE POWER with which the President is endowed is ambiguous too. It is not known what is meant by the executive power, apart from an obligation to execute the laws faithfully. Moreover, the text indicates that the President can call on the armed forces to suppress rebellions or repel attacks, but not whether he can engage in military hostilities without either congressional support or a congressional DECLARATION OF WAR. In the case of EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS, there is not even a vague provision of the Constitution to construe. Nothing in the document authorizes treaty-making by the President without the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the Senate. Nothing in the document authorizes the Congress to empower the President to make international agreements that have the force of the supreme law of the land or authorizes such agreements to have this force when both branches of Congress retroactively or subsequently approve of an international agreement made by the President on the President's own initiative. Nevertheless, Presidents have been making executive agreements with foreign nations throughout U.S. history and on major matters, without successful constitutional challenge. Moreover, the text of the Constitution does not provide for the device of the JOINT CONGRESSIONAL RESULTION. By this device, Congress has considerably augmented its powers in foreign affairs, as when it annexed Texas and then Hawaii to circumvent the requirement of a two-thirds vote of the Senate to approve treaties.

Three major provisions of the Constitution are among the vaguest: Congress has the power to regulate commerce among the states; neither the national government nor a state may take life, liberty, or property without due process of law; and no state may deny to any person the equal protection of the laws. These are the most litigated clauses in U.S. constitutional history because they are among the muddiest and most important.

Even the seemingly specific injunctions and provisions of the BILL OF RIGHTS are vague or ambiguous, offering little guidance for interpretation. A good example of such ambiguity is the term ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION in the FIRST AMENDMENT. James Madison, its author, mistakenly used the term interchangeably with "religious establishment," which denotes an institution of religion such as a church or sectarian school. "Religious establishment" carries no implication of government aid to religion or government involvement with it, as does "establishment of religion." When Madison misquoted the clause as if it outlawed religious establishment, he meant that the government had no authority to legislate on religion or its institutions. Nevertheless, the term itself has no self-evident meaning. History supplies that meaning, and historians differ.

The term FREEDOM OF THE PRESS constitutes another ambiguity. In Anglo-American thought and law, it meant an exemption from PRIOR RESTRAINT; it did not exclude liability under the criminal law for seditious, obscene, or blasphemous LIBEL. In contrast, the Framers, who did not adopt or reject the definition of a free press under the COMMON LAW, knew only a rasping, corrosive, and licentious press. They did not likely use the term "freedom of the press" without intending to protect the freedom that in fact existed and that they knew. The text itself surely lacks clarity. It declares in absolute terms that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or press, but the COPYRIGHT clause of the Constitution authorizes Congress to make laws that do abridge the freedom of speech and press of those who would infringe copyrights.

This same clause, in Article I, section 8, refers only to "authors and inventors," making a literal interpretation of it fail to protect artists, sculptors, composers, computer-software designers, television programmers, and many others who come under its protection. If only authors and inventors benefited from the clause, they could not even assign a copyright to others. The problem with the copyright clause is not that it is ambiguous or vague; it is utterly clear. But, it possesses inappropriate specificity and therefore cannot mean what it says.

The First Amendment exhibits the same problem. Assuming that its framers chose their language carefully, the fact that they failed to give adequate protection to the free exercise of religion must be confronted. The text declares that the freedom of the press may not be abridged, but by contrast, only says that freedom of religion may not be prohibited. This is a comparatively diminished protection because freedom of religion may be abridged in many ways without being prohibited. The same amendment also suffers from terminological exactitude: Congress shall make "no law" abridging freedom of the press. A reliance on textualism would mean that neither PORNOGRAPHY nor direct and successful verbal incitements to crime can be abridged. Yet the absolute of "no law" cannot apply to copyright laws, which can constitute abridgments.

The Fifth Amendment's self-incrimination clause cannot be taken literally either. If the text meant what it says, it meant little when framed because defendants then had no right to give sworn testimony for or against themselves. Moreover, the clause protected the right only in criminal cases, but the right existed in civil as well as criminal cases and in nonjudicial proceedings such as grand jury and legislative investigations. Finally, a person may be compelled to be a witness against himself or herself in noncriminal ways; at the time of the adoption of the Bill of Rights, the Fifth Amendment right protected persons from being forced to expose themselves to public infamy. In 1892, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the text does not mean what it says; the Court declared, "It is impossible that the meaning of the constitutional provision can only be that a person shall not be compelled to be a witness against himself in a criminal prosecution against himself."

Other examples of the text not meaning what it says appear in the Sixth Amendment, which enumerates a variety of RIGHTS OF THE CRIMINALLY ACCUSED available to them "in all criminal prosecutions." "All" is an absolute that admits of no exceptions. Yet the Framers did not intend to extend the right of TRIAL BY JURY to misdemeanants; persons accused of petty crimes were tried in a more summary manner than trial by jury. In this regard, the Sixth Amendment reinforced the provision in Article III, section 2: "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury. . . ." "All crimes" here means merely all felonies; the exception for impeachments really extended to misdemeanors also. Misdemeanants are still not entitled to trial by jury unless they can be imprisoned for more than six months. The text misleads.

Similarly, the right to the assistance of counsel in all criminal prosecutions does not mean what it says: "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused . . . shall have the assistance of counsel." "Shall" conveys an imperative; but the amendment merely meant that one might have counsel if he or she could afford it. Not until 1932 did indigents receive the benefit of court-appointed counsel in capital cases in state courts; not until 1938 did all federal defendants receive the right to court-appointed counsel in any criminal prosecution. Juveniles have long been deprived of the right to trial by jury, and no one is entitled to be represented by counsel before a GRAND JURY, which initiates a criminal prosecution. Furthermore, the text does not mean what it says in the provision that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall be confronted with the witnesses against them; the exceptions to this, in fact, are numerous.

The problem of inappropriate specificity appears in the DOUBLE JEOPARDY clause of the Fifth Amendment: "Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." Here the Constitution neither means what it says, nor says what it means. It means "life or liberty," not "life or limb." The reference to "limb" is meaningless because we have long ceased to tear people apart or crop their ears. One cannot be put in jeopardy of loss of limb even if convicted by due process of law at a single trial. The double jeopardy clause implies, however, that a conviction can result in loss of limb. This would surely constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment's guarantee against CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT. The text also leads to a logical puzzle. Life may be taken if one receives due process and is not exposed to double jeopardy. But if limb may not be taken, why may life be taken?

The SECOND AMENDMENT is both vague and ambiguous. Some think it upholds the collective right of state militias to bear arms, while others argue that it protects the right of individuals to bear arms. But this right existed only to maintain militias. If a standing army, even in peacetime, has succeeded militias, and if the armed forces provides weapons to those in the service, the reason for the right to bear arms may no longer be as apparent as it once was. "Arms" once meant a flintlock rifle. Does the right to bear arms include a right to bear a Saturday-night special, an assault rifle, or a bazooka?

Vagueness, not ambiguity, saturates the FOURTH AMENDMENT, which prohibits "unreasonable" SEARCH AND SEIZURE and provides that no warrants shall issue "but on probable cause." "Unreasonable" and "probable" rank high on any list of indefinite terms. It is possible, similarly, to parse every provision of the Bill of Rights and be bewildered by the meaning of the text. Terms such as SPEEDY TRIAL, JUST COMPENSATION, PUBLIC USE, "impartial jury," "excessive bail," "excessive fines," and "cruel and unusual" simply do not permit a constitutional jurisprudence to be based securely on textualism. To speak of STRICT CONSTRUCTION is faintly ridiculous given the imprecision of the provisions of the Bill of Rights and of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Ambiguity cannot be strictly construed. Strictly construing vagueness as well as inappropriately specific terms can equally lead to ludicrous, tragic, or unjust results.

The Constitution is, indeed, as Jefferson once said in exasperation, "a thing of wax that the Judiciary may twist and shape into any form they please." Unlike Humpty Dumpty, the Framers of the Constitution were unable to make words mean what they wanted them to mean. Perhaps they sensed that America would change beyond their grasp, and they did not think they could master the future. Perhaps they understood, with JAMES WILSON, that they were representatives "not merely of the present age, but of future times; not merely of the territory along the seacoast, but of regions immensely extended westward." This is the reason the Constitutional Convention accepted the advice of EDMUND RANDOLPH to keep the Constitution focused on "essential principles" so it can "be accomodated [sic] to times and events." The text is merely a point of departure; textualism as constitutional gospel is as impractical as original intent. Like original intent, however, textualism is entitled to serious attention, within its distinct limits, because Story was right: the people of the United States ratified the text, only the text, and it is the fundamental and supreme law of the land.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1992)

Bibliography

LAYCOCK, DOUGLAS. 1984 Taking Constitutions Seriously: A Theory of Judicial Review. Texas Law Review 59:343–394.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1988 Original Intent and the Framers' Constitution. New York: Macmillan.

SCHAUER, FREDERICK 1985 Easy Cases. Southern California Law Review 58:399–440.

TUSHNET, MARK V. 1985 A Note on the Revival of Textualism in Constitutional Theory. Southern California Law Review 58:683–700.

THAYER, JAMES BRADLEY
(1831–1902)

American jurist, Harvard law professor, and author of a masterful treatise on EVIDENCE. Thayer is important in constitutional studies for his powerful advocacy of judicial self-restraint, or deference to legislation challenged as unconstitutional. He influenced Justices LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, FELIX FRANKFURTER, and OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, and Judge LEARNED HAND.

Thayer invoked a supposedly established judicial rule which, recognizing that the Constitution admitted of different interpretations and allowed legislatures a vast range of permissible choice, required that all rational legislative choices be adjudged constitutional. Properly holding legislation unconstitutional only in cases clear beyond REASONABLE DOUBT, courts should not consider their own views on unconstitutionality, but should consider instead whether the legislature could reasonably have thought its actions constitutional. (See RATIONAL BASIS.)

Thayer regarded JUDICIAL REVIEW as a legitimate outgrowth of American experience and as a valuable conservative admixture in popular government. But he warned that this "outside" corrective threatened to curtail the people's political education. His strictures against JUDICIAL ACTIVISM were published just as the Supreme Court was embarking on a course of active defense of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT against ECONOMIC REGULATION. In a later era, when the Court's activism turned to personal liberties of another kind, Thayer's rule came under criticism: it was not an "established rule," but a policy preference; its reasonable doubt standard either would enfeeble judicial review or would be too flexible to restrain courts effectively; its applicability in Supreme Court review of state legislation was unclear; it was particularly inappropriate for legislation affecting specific BILL OF RIGHTS guarantees. Regrettably, Thayer himself had not adequately explored either the strengths and weaknesses of his rule or the broader underlying problem—how to square JUDICIAL REVIEW AND DEMOCRACY.

HOWARD E. DEAN
(1986)

Bibliography

THAYER, JAMES BRADLEY 1893 The Origin and Scope of the American Doctrine of Constitutional Law. Harvard Law Review 7:129–156.

THEORIES OF THE UNION

Political unions are organizations of states possessing specific powers for carrying out purposes of mutual interest to constituent polities. Unions are formed by means of confederation or federation, and by definition are combinative or compound in nature rather than unitary or homogeneous. In American history the Union refers to the general structure of political authority created during the Revolution by the American people, acting through their colonial and state governments, for the pursuit of common purposes as an expression of their incipient nationality. Theories of the Union are explanations of the American state system, descriptive and normative in purpose, which have been formulated to guide political action and resolve controversies among the member states. Especially important in the period from 1789 to 1868, theories of the Union have been concerned with four principal issues: the origin and nature of statehood; the nature and extent of state powers; the origin, nature, and extent of the powers of the central government; and the manner of resolving conflicts between the states and the central authority.

Although intercolonial cooperation occurred intermittently before the Revolution, in an effective political sense the formation by the colonies in 1774 of an assembly to deal with imperial matters of common concern marked the beginning of the American Union. In 1776 this assembly, the CONTINENTAL CONGRESS, issued the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, proclaiming that the colonies "are, and of right ought to be, free and independent states." Yet the Declaration also referred to the people in the colonies as "one people," and to the colonies as "the United States of America." The practical effect was to announce the existence of a national Union comprising thirteen state governments and a central body, Congress, which, although not constituted as a government and incapable of legislating for individuals in the states, was more than merely the agent of the states. Although theory and principle to explain this new compound political organization were yet to be formulated, the fact of a division of SOVEREIGNTY characterized the American Union from the outset.

The Union thus existed as political reality before it was rationalized in a formal instrument of government, the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION (1781). Asserting that "[e]ach State retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every Power, JURISDICTION, and right which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States," the Articles conformed to the model of a league of autonomous states. However, the language of state sovereignty notwithstanding, the states were not perfect states. And Congress, although empowered only to make resolutions and recommendations rather than to make law, in matters submitted to its consideration acted as a real government. In practical effect the Union resembled the operation of the British empire, in which sovereignty had been divided between the colonial governments managing local affairs and the authority of Parliament regulating matters of general interest in the empire.

Theory of the Union was relevant to territorial problems of the 1780s, which raised the question of the origin and nature of statehood. The original colonies based their claim to statehood on their COLONIAL CHARTERS and the fact of succession to previously existing political establishments. This theory of the creation of states implied a fixed or determinate Union, and was useless to those people—either in existing states or outside them—who desired to form new states and join the Union. An alternative approach was to claim a revolutionary right of self-government; Vermont may be said to have employed this principle in its struggle to separate from New York and achieve statehood. A third method of state making was to form a political community and secure recognition from the other states. This technique was developed in the 1780s when Virginia and other states with extensive land claims, desiring to confirm their sovereignty, ceded some of their lands to Congress and secured in return approval of their claims and state boundaries. Implicit in these transactions was an expansive rather than static conception of the Union: although states might proclaim their sovereignty, the determination of statehood—the very existence of the states—depended on the sanction of the other states acting through Congress.

The CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 altered the nature and structure of the Union by creating a central government, capable of making law and regulating individuals, in place of the noncoercive authority of the Confederation. Precisely how much and in what ways the restructured Union differed from the Confederation was debated during the process of RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION. These debates gave rise to the classic theories of the Union expounded by statesmen of the early national period.

In providing for a government based on the SEPARATION OF POWERS and comprising a legislature elected in part by the people, the Framers of the Constitution applied republican principles to the problem of organizing the American Union. They did not, however, completely reject the essential principle of the Confederation, the idea that the states were the constituent power. This principle was retained in the provisions for equal state representation in the Senate and for the contingency plan for electing the President in the House of Representatives, where each state was to have had one vote. The result, as JAMES MADISON wrote in THE FEDERALIST #39, was a government partly national and partly federal in respect of the source, operation, and extent of its powers; the constituent basis on which it was established; and the nature of the amending authority. Some of these functions embodied the idea that the American people as a single national community were the constituent power; others, the idea that the states as separate political communities were constituting the central government.

In contemporary usage the term "federal" referred to a confederation of sovereign states, and the word "national" to a unitary government operating directly on individuals. Accordingly, the Articles of Confederation were described as a federal government. But the supporters of the new government, combining elements of both a confederation and a unitary national government, called it a federal government. In doing so they gave a new definition to FEDERALISM as the division of sovereignty among a central government and separate state governments operating on the same population in the same area.

In the ratification controversy Federalists and Anti-Federalists combined arguments from history, the constitutional text, and political theory to fashion competing theories of the Union in pursuit of their divergent political goals. Denying that sovereignty could be divided, Anti-Federalists warned that the proposed central government would transform the Union into a consolidated state. The Federalists, in order to allay STATES' RIGHTS apprehensions, stressed the division of authority between the states and the central government and the ultimate sovereignty of the people. Although the Federalists glossed over conflicts that were bound to arise in a governmental system based on a division of sovereign authority, their constitutional theory confirmed the main tendencies in the operation of the American Union from its inception.

Perhaps the single most important formulation of Unionist theory was contained in the VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS of 1798–1799, written by JAMES MADISON and THOMAS JEFFERSON. Seeking a constitutionally legitimate way to prevent the enforcement of the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS, the Republican party leaders advanced the compact theory of the Union. On this theory were based all subsequent assertions of states' rights and state sovereignty, including those supporting SECESSION in 1861.

Jefferson and Madison argued that the Union was a compact made by the states, which as the constituent parties retained the right to judge whether the central government had violated the compact. Exercising this right by the accepted practices for implementing compacts, the states, according to Madison, could "interpose" their authority to stop unconstitutional acts of the central government. In the Kentucky Resolutions of 1799 Jefferson declared that a NULLIFICATION by the sovereign states of all unauthorized acts of the federal government was "the rightful remedy." The theory thus propounded held that the states created the Union; the federal government could exercise only delegated powers, not including regulation of speech and press, which were reserved to the states; and the states had authority to question the exercise of central authority and by implication to settle constitutional disputes over federal-state relations.

Whether Madison and Jefferson contemplated peaceful concerted action by the states, or single-state defiance of federal authority (possibly by force, as was later proposed in South Carolina), their action served as precedent and model for one of the basic strategies of constitutional politics throughout the antebellum period. From the standpoint of constitutional law the most significant feature of the compact theory was the proposition that the states had created the Constitution and the Union. The argument could mean any number of things depending on how a state was defined. A state could be considered to be the territory occupied by a political community, the governing institutions and officers of the community, or the people forming the community. In his report to the Virginia legislature in 1800, Madison used the third of these definitions to explain how the states, through the ratification process, had made the Constitution. On this theory, the TENTH AMENDMENT expressed the equivalence of state and people, reserving powers not delegated to the federal government "to the States respectively or to the people." A fixed feature of later states' rights and state sovereignty teaching, this popular conception of statehood enabled compact theorists to define the nation as self-governing political communities founded on common republican principles.

An alternative theory of the Union was propounded by the Federalist party. Federalists held that the Constitution and the Union had been made by the people of the United States, who as the constituent power had divided sovereignty between the states and the central government. The government of the United States possessed limited powers, but within its sphere of action it was supreme. Federalists, and their Whig political descendants in the 1830s, further reasoned that according to the original constitutional design conflicts in federal-state relations were to be resolved by the federal judiciary. In his debate with Robert Y. Hayne of South Carolina in 1830 on the nature of the Union, DANIEL WEBSTER said the judicial article and the SUPREMACY CLAUSE were the "key-stone of the arch" of Union. "With these," he declared, "it is a constitution; without them, it is a confederacy."

Distrusting localism, Federalists identified the nation with the central government, and theirs is often referred to as the nationalist theory of the Union. This reference is misleading, however, insofar as it implies that the compact theory was not a valid expression of American nationality. Properly regarded, the Federalist-Whig doctrine is the central supremacy theory of the Union. Acknowledging divided sovereignty and the limited nature of federal authority, Federalists and Whigs recognized states' rights as essential to the Union. But, believing the nation could act only through the central government, they insisted on the supremacy of federal power when it conflicted with an otherwise legitimate state power. The supremacy clause of the Constitution was the positive expression of the principle of federal paramountcy that its proponents believed was intended to guide national development.

In refuting the compact theory, central supremacy theorists made the popular origins of the Union their most distinctive tenet. They insisted that the Constitution was not a compact made by the states but an instrument of government made by "the people of the United States." The meaning of this term is not self-evident. It might be taken to mean that the American people constituted and could act as a single political community. Webster seemed to have this conception in mind when in the debate with Hayne he argued that the Constitution "pronounces that it is established by the people of the United States in the aggregate," not by the states or even by the people of the several states. JOHN MARSHALL stated the popular-origins thesis more carefully in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819). Marshall observed that the Constitution was "submitted to the people" for ratification, and they acted on it "by assembling in Convention." In a sense Marshall conceded the compact theorists' main point—that the Constitution had been ratified by the people acting as separate political communities. "It is true," he wrote, "they assembled in their several States." But he discounted the significance of this fact, adding: "and where else should they have assembled? No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States, and of compounding the American people into one common mass. Of consequence, when they act they act in their States." Thus the same facts on which the compact theorists based their conclusion that the Union was made by the states supported the central supremacy contention that the Union was made by the people of the United States.

From 1830 to 1860 theories of the Union continued to have political significance as Americans expanded territorially and struggled with the slavery question. Two variations of the compact theory were developed to protect slavery within the state system: DUAL FEDERALISM and the nullification theory of JOHN C. CALHOUN of South Carolina. Within the central supremacy theory, meanwhile, the idea of the Union as perpetual and indissoluble was elaborated.

Although formally accepting divided sovereignty, dual federalists in a practical sense sought to remove actual or potential central government restraints on state power, including the power to protect slavery. Insisting that the reserved powers of the states constituted a limitation on the federal government, they regarded the Tenth Amendment as a kind of supremacy clause for the states. Accordingly, in cases such as NEW YORK V. MILN (1837) the Supreme Court under Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY, reversing the effect of Marshall's central supremacy unionism, held that state powers over matters of "police" had not been surrendered to federal authority.

Calhoun's doctrine of nullification, employed in South Carolina's fight against the tariff in 1832, was a more radical extension of the compact theory of the Union. Calhoun held that federal powers were granted in trust by the states, which he defined as the people exercising indivisible sovereignty in separate political communities. He thus rejected the principle of divided sovereignty. Picking up where Madison and Jefferson had left off, Calhoun sought to devise a constitutional means of obstructing unconstitutional acts of the central government. His ingenious, if ultimately perverse, solution was to transform the creative constituent power of the states, identified in the Article V amending power, into an instrument of negation. Calhoun reasoned that a state, acting in popular convention, might interpose its authority to nullify a federal measure. The states would then be consulted, and if three-fourths of them did not approve the objectionable measure it would be withdrawn. If, however, the states upheld the central government, the nullifying state could secede from the Union.

Placed on the defensive by the nullificationists, central supremacy advocates were moved to insist on the perpetuity of the Union. This idea was implicit in the very creation of the Constitution. The fact that the Articles of Confederation referred to the Union as "perpetual" did not prevent men from believing that a state might withdraw its membership; by the same token the omission from the Constitution of the language of perpetuity did not mean that the Framers considered the Union to be anything less than a permanent government. It is nevertheless significant that while the terms disunion and secession were employed in the early nineteenth century, not until the nullification crisis did central supremacy theorists like Webster and JOHN QUINCY ADAMS explicate the perpetuity idea. Their argument may be described as declaratory in nature. But it was not only Whig keepers of the central supremacy tradition but also Democrats who met the South Carolina challenge by asserting perpetual Unionism. In his Proclamation to South Carolina (1832) President ANDREW JACKSON condemned secession as unconstitutional and affirmed the Constitution as a binding obligation on the states.

Changing little as constitutional doctrine, the central supremacy theory of the Union formed part of a nationalist ideology that emerged in the North in the pre-Civil War period. In contrast to the universalistic, democratic, and decentralized nationalism associated with the compact school, northern nationalism, based on New England Federalist sources and developed by Whig and Republican politicians, was historical, ethnic, cultural, and religious in nature. Whereas President GEORGE WASHINGTON in his Farewell Address had said it was the "unity of government which constitutes you one people," central supremacy theorists such as FRANCIS LIEBER turned the equation around by regarding the American people as forming a sovereign national community, from which emanated the Constitution and the Union. In this sectionally sponsored nationalism, the Union, without ceasing to be a means of securing liberty, became as well an end in itself: an organically rooted thing of absolute and intrinsic value.

Theories of the Union had a configurative as well as causative effect on the Civil War and Reconstruction. The existence of the compact theory—and the reiteration of this theory from 1798 to 1860 as the basis for states' rights, nullification, and disunionist demands—provided an arguably constitutional course of action for Southerners to follow in seceding from the Union in response to the antislavery threat. In the North the tradition of central supremacy constitutionalism was available to rationalize and sustain the Republican party's decision to resist secession. Pronouncing secession "the essence of anarchy," President ABRAHAM LINCOLN in 1861 affirmed the perpetuity of the Union, declared its primacy over the states, and asserted that "the States have their status in the Union, and they have no other legal status." The war would be fought, Congress resolved in 1861, "to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired."

Applying central supremacy tenets, the United States government between 1861 and 1868 regarded the Union as unbroken in a constitutional sense. It denied any legal effect to secession, treated the rebellious states as disorganized communities, and adopted measures to form loyal state governments capable of resuming their place in the Union. Acknowledging at most that the seceded states were out of their proper practical relation with the Union, federal authorities were forced to consider the fundamental question in Unionist theory: the origin, nature, and meaning of statehood.

Was a state to be defined as territory, population, governmental institutions and officers, or political community? Federal reconstruction policy held that a state was a body of people constituting a political community whose existence was dependent on and qualified by the Union. Implicit in the history of the state system, this relationship was explicitly rationalized in Article IV, section 4, of the Constitution, which states: "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government." In choosing the guarantee clause as a reconstruction basis, Congress rejected the idea that a state was mere territory, or population, or governmental institutions and officers whose acts of disloyalty could destroy the state and cause it to revert to a territorial condition, subject to the plenary power of Congress. The progression to statehood out of the territorial condition, if not a constitutional right enjoyed by the people as a political community, was at least irreversible.

Although compact theorists had long feared the transformation of the Union into a consolidated government, when political conditions in the 1860s were most favorable for this development, reconstruction policymakers evinced a concern for states' rights and divided sovereignty as essential to Unionism. The Supreme Court expressed this outlook in TEXAS V. WHITE (1869), confirming the congressional view of statehood as an irreversible condition. The Court declared that a "State, in the ordinary sense of the Constitution, is a political community of free citizens, occupying a territory of defined boundaries." Without the states in the Union, the Court reasoned, there could be no such political body as the United States. The conclusion therefore followed that "the preservation of the States, and the maintenance of their governments, are as much within the design and care of the Constitution as the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the National government. The Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States."

The triumph of the central government in the Civil War signified the rejection of the compact theory of the Union as a framework for national development. Although aspects of the theory continued to be used in political and constitutional debate, it was repudiated in relation to the practical question that made it a vital element in antebellum politics: the mounting of single or concerted state resistance to central authority, including the possibility of secession. After the war secession was no longer a constitutionally conceivable or politically practical course of action. The central supremacy theory prevailed as the framework for constitutional development.

Although it is doubtful whether the American people, to use John Marshall's formulation, could in a constitutional sense be described as having been compounded into a single common mass as a result of the war, nevertheless in a political and ideological sense the idea of the people as a single national community, rather than as similar yet separate political communities, gained wider acceptance. Moreover, within the central supremacy theory the adoption of the THIRTEENTH, FOURTEENTH, and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS greatly altered federal-state relations. The nature and extent of federal and state powers of course continued to be a major issue in constitutional law and politics. But the nature of statehood, the nature of the Union, and the propriety of federal resolution of conflicts in the operation of the state system were now settled issues. Theories of the Union, associated with fundamentally different conceptions of nationalism, ceased to be relevant to basic political choices as Americans entered the period of industrialization.

HERMAN BELZ
(1986)

Bibliography

ARIELI, YEHOSHUA 1966 Individualism and Nationalism in American Ideology. Baltimore: Penguin Books.

BENNETT, WALTER HARTWELL 1964 American Theories of Federalism. University: University of Alabama Press.

CARPENTER, JESSE T. 1930 The South as a Conscious Minority 1789–1861: A Study in Political Thought. New York: New York University Press.

DAVIS, S. RUFUS 1978 The Federal Principle: A Journey through Time in Quest of Meaning. Berkeley: University of California Press.

DIAMOND, MARTIN 1974 What the Framers Meant by Federalism. In R. A. Goldwin, ed., A Nation of States: Essays on the American Federal System. Chicago: Rand McNally.

ONUF, PETER S. 1983 The Origins of the Federal Republic: Jurisdictional Controversies in the United States, 1775–1787. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.

STAMPP, KENNETH M. 1978 The Concept of a Perpetual Union. Journal of American History 65:5–33.

THIRD AMENDMENT

Quartering of troops in private houses, except in cases of military necessity, has long been regarded as contrary to British political traditions. Illegal quartering figured in important controversies between the king and the people, and it was condemned in the PETITION OF RIGHT (1628) and the English BILL OF RIGHTS (1689).

The British government sent regular troops to America in 1765 to discourage resistance to parliamentary taxation. Parliament, in the Quartering Act, required that the soldiers be housed at the expense of the province to which they were sent, and provided that, if existing barracks were insufficient, private buildings would be commandeered for the purpose. This measure was one of the specific grievances cited in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

During the debates over RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION several state conventions suggested a prohibition against quartering of troops. It was among JAMES MADISON's original proposals for the BILL OF RIGHTS, and the First Congress approved it unanimously and virtually without change. The amendment affirms the sanctity of private property in our constitutional system: the refusal of an individual property owner is an absolute bar to quartering in peacetime. The amendment represents a principle so fundamental that no act of Congress has ever been seriously challenged under it.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

THIRD-PARTY CONSENT

When someone invites the police into his or her home, the police need neither PROBABLE CAUSE nor a warrant to accept the invitation. Acting on one person's invitation or consent to search, however, the police may uncover evidence that incriminates some other person. For example, a spouse or child may consent to a search that uncovers evidence against another spouse or a parent; a landlord may permit a search that reveals evidence useful in prosecuting the landlord's tenant; a common carrier may authorize the police to open a package shipped by a suspected drug dealer; or a school principal may authorize the police to search a student's locker. In litigation under the FOURTH AMENDMENT, the issues raised by cases of this sort have been treated under the rubric "third-party consent." Courts have held that the consent of someone other than the person against whom evidence is offered can sometimes justify seizure of this evidence despite the lack of probable cause or a SEARCH WARRANT.

No unitary theory explains when third-party consent justifies a search under the Fourth Amendment. In some cases, courts have invoked concepts of agency. In an extreme and unlikely case, the agency might be express; a person might execute a document authorizing an agent to admit the police to his or her premises at the agent's unfettered discretion. In these circumstances, a court could easily conclude that the principal himself or herself had authorized the search. Agency principles appear to justify both holdings that a manager of business premises may consent to a search that uncovers evidence against the owner of the business and rulings that the consent of a secretary or maintenance worker to a search of areas not open to casual visitors is ordinarily insufficient.

Courts also have upheld third-party consent searches that could not have been justified on agency principles. For example, a husband may assault his wife, and the wife may admit the police to the home that she owns with her husband to reveal the location of the assault weapon. In this case, the husband may be present and may inform the police that his wife has no authority to waive his Fourth Amendment rights. When the wife admits the police, however, she does not act as the agent of her husband, and she does not waive his rights. Instead, she exercises her own PROPERTY RIGHTS. As in other cases of third-party consent, the husband's Fourth Amendment rights are limited by the authority of others to control premises in which he otherwise would have a reasonable expectation of privacy. Whether the authority of others is grounded in agency, PROPERTY, license, contract, or something else does not matter.

The general rule articulated in United States v. Matlock (1974) is that when two or more people have joint access to or control over premises that the police wish to search, "any of the co-inhabitants has the right to permit inspection." The Supreme Court cautioned that "the authority which justifies third-party consent does not rest upon the law of property, with its attendant historical and legal refinements." In practice, the consenting party's authority is determined largely by general cultural understandings, and as in other situations in which courts consider expectations of privacy, these understandings may be ad hoc, changing, and difficult to assess.

For example, an inhabitant ordinarily may invite a guest to enter the house that he or she shares with another, but the inhabitant may not invite his or her guest surreptitiously to observe the inhabitant's housemate in the shower. Even sole ownership of a house does not confer a privilege to invade the privacy of a guest or to permit others to do so. Similarly, a lease may give a landlord authority to inspect the leased premises, but the landlord would exceed his or her authority if he or she invited the television crew of "Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous" to participate in the inspection. (Courts have in fact held the consent of a landlord insufficient to justify a police search of leased premises.) In Stoner v. California (1964), although a hotel clerk had authorized the search of a hotel room, the Supreme Court held the search invalid. Maids and other hotel employees might legitimately have entered the room, but they could not properly have brought along their friends, their relatives, or the police.

Whether a person should have greater or lesser authority to permit the police to search than he or she would have to authorize a search by someone other than a police officer may be a difficult question. A wife whose husband has permitted a police search might protest, "I have no reasonable expectation that my husband will not invite guests to our home; but in most situations I do expect that he will not invite the police to enter for reasons hostile to my interests." On this view, a person's consent to a search by a police officer might be invalid, although consent to a similar inspection by a nonpolice officer would be permissible.

A person is likely to have stronger legitimate reasons to cooperate with the police than to permit inspection by others, however, and courts have upheld police searches based on third-party consent when consent to inspection by anyone else—even by a close friend—probably would have been unauthorized. For example, a husband probably would violate customary norms of privacy by permitting a friend to rummage through a dresser used not only by him but by his wife. In Matlock and in Frazier v. Cupp (1969), however, the Supreme Court upheld searches in which the police had opened closets and luggage used in common by consenting and nonconsenting parties. To consider what authority a consenting party would have had to permit inspection by someone other than a police officer may be helpful as a starting point, but courts cannot avoid fact-specific assessments of expectations of privacy in particular situations. Because most police searches lack close analogues in everyday experience, this task is often difficult.

Under the Supreme Court's decision in Illinois v. Rodriguez (1990), courts judge the authority of a third party to consent to a search from the perspective of a reasonable police officer; they do not require that the consenting party have authority in fact. This approach may seem harsh when a thief who pretends to be the owner of luggage that he or she has stolen gives the police permission to open it—with the result that the police uncover evidence against the owner. This owner may be incriminated by evidence that the police obtained without his or her consent and without probable cause.

Nevertheless, the Constitution guards almost exclusively against governmental abuse, and the Fourth Amendment proscribes only UNREASONABLE SEARCHES and seizures. When the police act on the basis of reasonable appearances, the objectives of the amendment seem satisfied. These objections do not include protection against all unjustified invasions of privacy but only against improper invasions of privacy by the government. Permitting the police to rely on a consenting party's apparent authority seems especially appropriate when the police might have conducted their search with a warrant had a seemingly valid consent not been given.

The third party's consent must reasonably appear to the police to be voluntary. When the police coerce a person to consent to a search that reveals evidence against another, the incriminated person has the same power to object to the search that he or she would have had if the police had not obtained the third party's consent at all.

This principle applies to cases of ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING just as it does to cases in which the police have seized tangible evidence. Although state statutes sometimes forbid electronic monitoring even when one party to a conversation has consented to it, the Fourth Amendment as construed by the Supreme Court permits electronic monitoring so long as any party to a conversation has agreed to it. The Court has concluded that this monitoring is indistinguishable from the disclosure of a conversation by one of the participants after it has occurred.

If consensual electronic monitoring is indistinguishable from a participant's later disclosure of a conversation, however, any party who could assert that another's consent to electronic monitoring was involuntary also should be allowed to object to an informant's involuntary disclosure of a conversation after the fact. Yet he or she is not. Although the question has been litigated raely, no one other than the informant himself or herself has been permitted to challenge the voluntariness of the informant's disclosure. The rule that a person lacks STANDING to object to the violation of another person's rights has been thought to foreclose a challenge o the voluntariness of an informant's statements by a person othe than the informant.

The principles that courts have developed in cases of third-party consent thus have not been consistently applied, and these principles might work important changes in the police informant system. Permitting others to challenge the use of coercive tactics against informants would subject some common police practices to new judicial scrutiny (for example, the practice of threatening to charge potential informants with crimes and to hold them on high bond). The coercion of third-party informants may invade the reasonable expectations of privacy of people whom the informants incriminate. This coercion can violate the rights of these people along with the rights of the informants themselves.

ALBERT W. ALSCHULER
(1992)

Bibliography

ALSCHULER, ALBERT W. 1983 Interpersonal Privacy and the Fourth Amendment. Northern Illinois University Law Review 4:1–57.

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. 1987 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment, 2nd ed, Vol. 3, pp. 235–331.

THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT
(Framing)

Scholars and jurists have virtually ignored the Thirteenth Amendment, the Constitution's first formal addition in sixty-one years. Reasons for this indifference seem, initially, to be both obvious and adequate. The Thirteenth Amendment, ratified in December 1865, appears to be a simple, brief statement of the noble, limited effect of the CIVIL WAR.

Its succinct text, written by Illinois Senator LYMAN TRUMBULL, echoed clauses of the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE. In the Civil War's last weeks, during the closing session of the 38th Congress, Senator CHARLES SUMNER tried to substitute for the proposed Amendment's second section one specifying that every person was equal before both national and state laws. Trumbull, a constitutional specialist, favored section 2 in its present form. Sumner and many other congressmen assumed that all parts of the Constitution, including amendments, implicitly authorized enforcement; Trumbull wished to have the amendment empower enforcement explicitly. There was almost no other discussion on the amendment. In a sense, abolition had been before the congressmen and the nation since 1861.

Persons who celebrated abolition's arrival in 1865 did not foresee that race problems and derivative strains in federal relations were to require a FOURTEENTH and a FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT plus enforcement legislation, and would lead to the first IMPEACHMENT of a President. Celebrants of 1865 stressed the "war-gulf" that separated the ratified Thirteenth Amendment from one in early 1861 that Congress had proposed and three states had ratified in a desperate effort to seduce the South from seceding. The aborted Thirteenth Amendment would have forbidden the nation perpetually from curtailing SLAVERY in states where it existed. Thereafter the nation steadily raised both its sense of self-interest and its moral sights. Union troops in the South reported that the only trustworthy residents were black. Though few Negroes lived outside the South, most Northern states had long been racist in laws and customs, if never so fiercely as in the slave states. During the war Northern racism softened, partially as a result of pro-Negro reports from Union soldiers and partly from the diffusion of ABOLITIONIST CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY. Before the war, abolitionists, long hard-pressed even in the North, had come to scorn the Constitution, for it did not protect them against unpunished harassments. But once the war started, Union and abolition became identified. Gradually, Congress and ABRAHAM LINCOLN caught up to Union soldiers' needs, constituents' altering race sentiments, and abolitionists' aspirations and perceptions.

In 1861 and 1862, CONFISCATION ACTS threatened disloyal individuals with the loss of their title to property, including slaves, after individual prosecutions in federal courts. In September 1862, Lincoln's EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION, an executive, war-power order, offered slaveowners ninety days in which to give up the rebellion or lose their slaves. That grace period having expired, Lincoln in January 1863 ordered also the recruitment of Negroes, most of whom lived in the South, into the Union's armies. In December 1863 and July 1864 respectively, Reconstruction policies issued by the President and the Congress provided for emancipation as a prerequisite for state restorations. The fall 1864 election proved the growth of a Northern consensus in favor of irreversible emancipation as a war result, though, save for abolitionists, it had not been an original war aim. Therefore the 38th Congress, with Lincoln's warm support, prepared the present Thirteenth Amendment, and when the war ended it sent it to the states for ratification.

Despite its simplicity, the Thirteenth Amendment was a momentous, perhaps revolutionary change in constitutional relationships. It prohibited not only the national or state governments or officials but every American institution and person from allowing slavery or involuntary servitude to exist, and it specifically authorized Congress to enforce the prohibition. If states, the traditional parents of slavery, did not comply with the prohibition and allowed individuals to hold other people in a slave status, the nation now had authority to punish directly either the oppressing persons or the states.

Democrats strongly opposed ratification. Even before the Civil War, most Democrats rejected a view of the Constitution as an adaptable, organic instrument. The amendment's enforcement clause allowed Congress to initiate changes in race relationships beyond abolition. Some Democrats insisted that abolition was illicit even by means of an amendment; that slave property remained totally a state's right to define; and that the unrepresented Southern states could not properly be asked to ratify the amendment.

Republicans argued for the amendment's ratification, in part because Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation might have left slavery alive in the unseceded border states and in some Confederate areas earlier reconquered. It was clear also that individual confiscation trials could never reach the millions of slaveholders and slaves. Republicans also worried because the amendment voided the Constitution's THREE-FIFTHS CLAUSE. The South's Negroes were now to count as whole persons in determining the size of a state's congressional representation. Ironically, the South, after initiating and carrying on a civil war for four years, would substantially increase its strength in the House of Representatives. "Radical" Republicans looked at the Thirteenth Amendment as the culmination of abolitionist constitutional theory. Radicals asserted that the amendment, freeing slaves, also equalized all Americans in the protections due to them in their states for the exercise of both public and private rights. The DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE and the BILL OF RIGHTS defined the duties all states owed to every resident; the nation's duty was to see to state performance. State justice, down to the remotest hamlet, must protect every resident equally against hurtful positive acts or discriminatory nonacts by public officers and private persons, in both civil and criminal relationships.

No Republicans advocated centralization; all Republicans were STATES' RIGHTS nationalists. State sovereignty was dead but state rights flourished. State wrongs that diminished individuals' rights as defined by state laws, were, however, unacceptable; they again threatened the nation's stability. Republicans assumed that the ex-rebel states would emulate, in their formal law at least, the lessened racism of the rest of the nation, and afford Negroes the same protections that whites enjoyed. But it became apparent from evidence such as the BLACK CODES that the South would not behave as expected.

All through 1865, Democrats criticized the fact that President ANDREW JOHNSON required the reconstructing states to ratify the Thirteenth Amendment, and they insisted that those states were entitled to be represented in Congress. The Johnson provisional states, excepting Florida and Texas where reconstruction proceeded slowly, did ratify the Thirteenth Amendment, though reluctantly, with spokesmen expressing special distaste for the enforcement clause. Johnson pressured recalcitrant states with threats of indefinite military rule if ratification failed; Secretary of State WILLIAM SEWARD calmed Southerners by asserting that the amendment restricted Congress to enforcing only a prohibition of formal slavery, a dubious interpretation. On December 15, 1865, Seward proclaimed the amendment to be in effect. Were the southern states truly states for the purposes of ratification? The question asked in 1865 and again in 1868 and 1870 when the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments were ratified, and repeated endlessly since, has a metaphysical quality. Ratification was a mandate to the nation by a clear majority of the American people, not an act of the national government. Lincoln's insight that the South's states were still states, although out of their proper relationship to the Union of states, neither supported immediate restorations of those states nor diminished their capacities to perform certain state functions including ratification of amendments. In 1865 the southern states ratified in number beyond the Constitution's requirement (Article V) that three-fourths of the states approve an amendment. Additional states ratified subsequently to end all doubts as to the amendment's validity. But in 1865, those doubts existed and enhanced the doubts that Democrats spread, and Republicans also felt, about President Johnson's unlimited authority over the South.

The 39th Congress assembled in December 1865 for its first postwar session. Its Republican members, upon examination of the Black Codes and other evidence from the South of lingering vestiges of servitude, resorted immediately to the just-ratified Thirteenth Amendment's enforcement clause. Sharing a mobile, organic view of the Constitution, Republicans were ready to confirm that the nation had an interest in and a duty to personal equality in states, as defined by state law and customs; their readiness is evident in the quick formulation of the CIVIL RIGHTS BILL (the world's first), the second FREEDMAN'S BUREAU BILL, and the Fourteenth Amendment. Republicans created these measures in light of the Thirteenth Amendment, a far more complex and inclusive statement than most accounts suggest.

HAROLD M. HYMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

BUCHANAN, SIDNEY G. 1976 The Quest for Freedom: A Legal History of the Thirteenth Amendment. Houston: Reprint from Houston Law Review.

HOWE, MARK A. DEWOLFE 1965 Federalism and Civil Rights. [Massachusetts Historical Society] Proceedings 77:15–67.

HYMAN, HAROLD M. and WIECEK, WILLIAM M. 1982 Equal Justice under Law: Constitutional Development 1835–1875. Chaps. 10–11. New York. Harper & Row.

TEN BROEK, JACOBUS 1951 The Antislavery Origins of the Fourteenth Amendment. Chap. 13. Berkeley: University of California Press.

THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT
(Judicial Interpretation)

Ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment in 1865 not only diminished the urgency of the debate over the constitutionality of the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION but also wrote a new substantive value into the Constitution. The amendent's first section abolished SLAVERY and involuntary servitude throughout the nation, and its second section empowered Congress to enforce abolition. If any of the amendment's framers expected it to end the system of racial dominance and dependence, they were soon divested of that illusion. The persistence of a plantation economy and the adoption in southern states of the BLACK CODES kept blacks in a position of subordination that was not only economic but political and social as well.

The question thus arose whether section 2 of the Thirteenth Amendment gave Congress the power to do more than provide sanctions against slavery or involuntary servitude, narrowly defined. Over a presidential veto, Congress adopted the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866, which not only declared the CITIZENSHIP of the freed slaves but also protected them against the sort of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION that had been embodied in the Black Codes, such as disqualification to own property, to make contracts, or to serve on juries. President ANDREW JOHNSON had explained his veto of the bill partly on the ground that the Thirteenth Amendment had not empowered Congress to adopt legislation aimed at such purposes. Reacting to this argument, Congress proposed the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT as a means of assuring the validity of the 1866 Act and placing beyond doubt the power of Congress to enforce the CIVIL RIGHTS of the freed slaves.

From the beginning it was arguable that the abolition of slavery implied that the persons so freed would take on the status of free citizens—that the amendment should be read broadly as a response to the whole social system of racial subordination associated with slavery. But in the early years, this view did not prosper in the Supreme Court; it was found mainly in OBITER DICTA and in dissenting opinions. All agreed that section 1 of the amendment was self-executing: slavery and involuntary servitude were abolished, whether or not Congress enacted civil or criminal sanctions to enforce the abolition. Because the amendment contained no STATE ACTION limitation, it operated directly, of its own force, against either public or private conduct that imposed slavery. But the Court limited the notion of "involuntary servitude" to personal servitude, refusing to extend it (by analogy to feudal servitudes) to cover the granting of monopolies or other similar privileges. (See SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES). By the end of the nineteenth century, the Court was saying that slavery implied no more than "a state of bondage," and the lack of "a legal right to the disposal of [one's] own person, property, and services"; thus the Thirteenth Amendent standing alone did not even forbid a state to impose racial segregation on seating in railroad cars. (See PLESSY V. FERGUSON.)

This narrow view of the Thirteenth Amendment's self-executing reach was reflected in the Supreme Court's treatment of the power granted to Congress by section 2. In the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883) the Court, in the face of a powerful dissenting opinion by Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, held invalid the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875, a congressional statute forbidding racial discrimination in such PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS as hotels, theaters, and railroads. Both the majority and the dissent agreed that the Thirteenth Amendment was designed to put an end to the "incidents" of slavery as well as slavery itself. The question was whether racially based refusals of access to public accommodations amounted to "badges of slavery and servitude," and the majority held that they did not. This severely restrictive interpretation of the power of Congress to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment culminated in 1906, when the Court decided HODGES V. UNITED STATES. Congress could prohibit no more than the "entire subjection" of one person to another, as in laws forbidding PEONAGE; Congress was not empowered by section 2 to go further in erasing "badges" or "incidents" of slavery.

So matters stood for six decades. The Thirteenth Amendment, like the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS, lay dormant, offering no effective protection against racial discrimination. The judicial interpretation of the Thirteenth Amendment mirrored the nation's political history; Congress adopted no civil rights legislation from the time of Reconstruction to the late 1950s. The first modern civil rights law of major importance was the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964; its public accommodations provisions were upheld by the Supreme Court, but on the basis of the COMMERCE CLAUSE, not the Thirteenth or Fourteenth Amendments. (See HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL V. UNITED STATES; KATZENBACH V. MCCLUNG.) The Court seemed determined to uphold congressional legislation aimed at establishing racial equality, and in UNITED STATES V. GUEST (1966) six Justices agreed in two separate opinions that Congress could reach even private conduct that interfered with the exercise of Fourteenth Amendment rights. The state action limitation, in other words, would not bar congressional enforcement of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment's prohibition on private discrimination.

The reach of the equal protection clause, of course, is not limited to racial inequalities. Perhaps some of the Justices were reluctant to pursue the line of doctrinal development suggested by the separate opinions in Guest, for fear of giving Congress an invitation without apparent limitation. The solution to this puzzle—if it was a puzzle—came only two years after the Guest decision, in the form of a complete turnabout in the interpretation of the power of Congress to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment.

The turnabout came in JONES V. ALFRED H. MAYER CO. (1968), when the Court interpreted the 1866 Civil Rights Act to prohibit all racial discrimination in the sale of property and upheld the act as so construed. The Court overruled the Hodges decision and essentially adopted the dissenting views of Justice Harlan in the Civil Rights Cases. The Thirteenth Amendment was held to empower Congress not only to eliminate slavery but also to eliminate slavery's "badges and incidents." Furthermore, said the Court, it is for Congress itself "rationally to determine what are the badges and incidents of slavery," and to enact laws to eradicate any such "relic of slavery" it might find.

This broad language is not limited to racial discrimination. Commentators have asked whether the Court, in seeking to avoid an open-ended interpretation of congressional power under the Fourteenth Amendment, has offered Congress a different set of constitutional bootstraps. In the quoted passage from the Jones opinion, the Court appears to authorize Congress to define a given right—any right—as one that is essential to freedom, to define its impairment as an incident of slavery, and to enact a law protecting the right against both public and private interference.

When the right in question is a right to be free from racial discrimination, this line of reasoning accords not only with the language of the Jones opinion but also with the decision's place in the historical process of constitutional validation of modern civil rights legislation. Outside the racial context, however, the reasoning is unlikely to be adopted by the Supreme Court. Of course the Thirteenth Amendment prohibits the enslavement of anyone, of any race. And the Court has upheld an application of the 1866 act to a case of racial discrimination against whites, evidently (but without discussion) on the basis of Congress's power to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment, in McDonald v. Santa Fe Trail Transportation Co. (1976). The decision is defensible, despite the lack of historic links between slavery and discrimination against whites. There is a basis in experience for a congressional conclusion that discrimination against one racial group affects attitudes toward race generally and promotes discrimination against other races. It would be much harder to justify a similar conclusion about the effects of discrimination on the basis of gender, or sexual preference, or physical handicap. Even if the analogy were stronger, the doctrinal context of the Jones decision cautions against a prediction that its "badges and incidents" reasoning will be extended beyond cases of racial discrimination. The Thirteenth Amendment seems to have had its main appeal as a basis for congressional power precisely because that power could be contained within the confines of remedies for racial discrimination. The "badges and incidents of slavery" which justify congressional intervention are to be found in racial discrimination if they are to be found at all.

The power of Congress to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment, like any other congressional power, is subject to the limitations of the BILL OF RIGHTS. Without question, the amendment empowers Congress to prohibit racial discrimination in all the public areas of life, including commercial dealings. In RUNYON V. MCCRARY (1976), for example, the Supreme Court relied on the Thirteenth Amendment to uphold application of the 1866 act to a private school that accepted applicants from children in the public at large but excluded blacks. The potential limitations of the Bill of Rights found expression in that case. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, concurring, cautioned that some hypothetical congressional enforcements of the Thirteenth Amendment might violate constitutional rights of PRIVACY or associational freedom, as when a litigant might seek application of the 1866 act to a case of racial discrimination in the selection of a home tutor or babysitter.

The expansion of the power of Congress to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment has not been accompanied by a corresponding expansion of the amendment's reach as a self-executing provision. The Jones opinion left open the question whether the amendment "by its own terms did anything more than abolish slavery," and although MEMPHIS V. GREENE (1981) raised the issue, the Court did not reach it. Thus, even though a great many forms of private racial discrimination may constitute "badges and incidents of slavery" justifying congressional action to secure their elimination, if Congress has not acted, these same "badges and incidents" are insufficient to trigger the operation of the amendment's section 1. The practical significance of this difference, however, is slight. The Supreme Court has construed existing civil rights legislation broadly enough to prohibit a wide range of private acts of racial discrimination.

Even assuming that the Thirteenth Amendment's self-executing force is limited to cases of bondage to personal service, there is room for debate about the kinds of compulsion that constitute involuntary servitude. Debt bondage—the requirement that a person work in discharge of a debt—is a classic case of peonage and is plainly forbidden by the amendment. However, compulsory military service (or alternative service for CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS), hard labor for persons imprisoned for crime, and restrictions on the right to strike all have been sustained against Thirteenth Amendment attacks.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

CASPER, GERHARD 1968 Jones v. Mayer: Clio, Bemused and Confused Muse. Supreme Court Review 1968:89–132.

FAIRMAN, CHARLES 1971 Reconstruction and Reunion: 1864–1888, Part One. Chapter XIX. New York: Macmillan Company.

NOTE 1969 The "New" Thirteenth Amendment: A Preliminary Analysis. Harvard Law Review 82:1294–1321.

THOMAS, CLARENCE
(1948– )

In 1991, President GEORGE H. W. BUSH nominated Clarence Thomas to fill the U.S. Supreme Court seat vacated in the retirement of Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL. Thomas's qualifications that appealed to Bush were not those of legal accomplishment and judicial experience. At the time of his nomination, Thomas was at forty-three a young man whose experience consisted largely of service in the administration of President RONALD REAGAN. By 1991, Thomas had served for little more than one year as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Because Marshall was the Supreme Court's first and only African American Justice, Bush apparently wanted to have an African American replacement to avoid being blamed for creating an all-white Supreme Court once again. With virtually no experienced federal African American judges whose decisions were sufficiently conservative to satisfy Bush, the President selected Thomas, who had expressed his commitment to conservative doctrines.

Thomas's confirmation hearings before the SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE caught the nation's attention when Anita Hill, a law professor who had previously worked as Thomas's assistant in the Reagan administration, accused Thomas of sexual harassment. In the aftermath of the controversy, Thomas's nomination was confirmed by the narrowest of margins—fifty-two to forty-eight—in a nationally televised vote in the U.S. SENATE. During his confirmation testimony, Thomas consistently distanced himself from the many speeches he had made endorsing controversial conservative positions, such as opposition to ABORTION and AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, during his years as a Reagan administration official. Although Thomas portrayed himself to the Judiciary Committee as open-minded and moderate, his subsequent performance as a Justice casts him as a confident, doctrinaire jurist whose opinions seek to make significant changes in constitutional law.

Thomas aspires to follow a coherent theory of CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION. Rather than reacting to individual issues as they arise, Thomas consistently expresses a commitment to interpret the Constitution according to the ORIGINAL INTENT of the Framers who wrote the document. Thomas seeks to eliminate what he sees as JUDICIAL ACTIVISM, interfering in the policies established by legislators and other elected officials. Thomas claims that by following the intentions of the Framers he avoids the pitfall of applying his own values and policy preferences in judicial decisions. Nonetheless, the legal conclusions he designates as dictated by the Framers' intentions consistently produce conservative results that apparently fit his values and policy preferences. Unlike other scholars and jurists who debate whether the intentions of the Framers can be determined for each provision of the Constitution and whether original intent should be based on the understandings of the authors or the ratifiers of each provision, Thomas manifests confidence about the certainty of his historical knowledge. That confidence is often translated into strident opinions that show little respect for alternative interpretations. Thomas's tone may deter Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, with whom Thomas agrees on the outcomes of nearly all cases, from giving Thomas the responsibility for writing important majority opinions. Although Thomas receives his fair share of majority opinion assignments, his assignments nearly always concern either taxation and other statutory issues, or unanimous constitutional decisions. Thomas's first assignment to write the majority opinion in a controversial constitutional-rights case came in Kansas v. Hendricks (1997), in which the Court rejected DUE PROCESS, EX POST FACTO, and DOUBLE JEOPARDY claims to permit states to detain sex offenders indefinitely after they have already served out their entire criminal sentences. Thomas's uncompromising positions may limit his potential for shaping constitutional law on behalf of the Supreme Court majority. Often he finds himself writing CONCURRING and DISSENTING OPINIONS to express views with which no Justice other than ANTONIN SCALIA agrees.

Thomas's views, if adopted by majority, would change constitutional law significantly. In a dissenting opinion in Helling v. McKinney (1993), joined only by Scalia, Thomas argued that the drafters of the Eighth Amendment never intended for the prohibition against "CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENTS" to protect convicted offenders inside prisons. Thomas concluded that the Eighth Amendment only prevents a judge from announcing a cruel and unusual punishment as a sentence for a crime. If Thomas's views had governed the Eighth Amendment, federal judges never would have been able to order correctional institutions to end the brutal practices and inhuman conditions that were characteristic of prisons in several states prior to the 1980s.

Thomas's concurring opinion in UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995) argued that the Framers' original intentions for the COMMERCE CLAUSE preclude congressional regulation of manufacturing, agriculture, and mining. This argument contradicted sixty years of development in constitutional law. Carried to its logical conclusion, it would require a return to nineteenth-century constitutional DOCTRINES that forbade the federal government from regulating most areas of business endeavor. However, Thomas recognized that adherence to PRECEDENT "may convince us that we cannot wipe the slate clean" of the Court's more recent decisions. Thus, he does not seem to anticipate that the Court will follow his preferred theory by invalidating a wide range of federal laws affecting minimum wages, EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION, consumer protection, and a variety of other areas in which the federal government has actively regulated economic activities since the 1930s.

Because Thomas believes that his originalist theory of interpretation holds the answers to virtually all constitutional questions presented to courts, he is critical of courts' reliance on what he calls "the easy answers" of SOCIAL SCIENCE. But relying on formal legal theory rather than empirical evidence often leads to unrealistic assumptions about difficult constitutional problems. In a concurring opinion in Graham v. Collins (1993), for example, Thomas suggested that mandatory CAPITAL PUNISHMENT for all offenders convicted of first-degree murder would cure problems of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in capital SENTENCING. Thomas has been criticized for not recognizing that mandatory sentences cannot eliminate the discriminatory impact of discretionary decisions occurring throughout the criminal process, such as decisions by prosecutors about which defendants to charge with first-degree murder and the discretion of juries in convicting offenders of lesser homicide offenses.

Drawing on his mistrust of social science, Thomas appears implicitly to criticize the Court's revered decision in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954) for relying on social science evidence indicating that school SEGREGATION was harmful to African American children. In his concurring opinion in MISSOURI V. JENKINS (1995), Thomas suggested that such conclusions rest on "an assumption of black inferiority." In light of Thomas's belief in limiting the authority of judges to remedy social problems as well as historical evidence that the Framers of the EQUAL PROTECTION clause did not intend to end racial segregation, it is difficult to square Thomas's theory of constitutional interpretation with Brown.

Thomas's consistent adherence to his version of original intent jurisprudence has established him as the most conservative Justice of the REHNQUIST COURT. Although his colleagues Scalia and Rehnquist reject individuals' constitutional claims with similar frequency, Thomas's approach to constitutional interpretation has the most dramatic implications for changing constitutional law.

CHRISTOPHER E. SMITH
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Appointment of Supreme Court Justices; Confirmation Process.)

Bibliography

BAUGH, JOYCE and SMITH, CHRISTOPHER E. 1996 Doubting Thomas: Confirmation Veracity Meets Performance Reality. Seattle University Law Review 19:455–496.

MAYER, JANE and ABRAMSON, JILL 1994 Strange Justice: The Selling of Clarence Thomas. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

ROSEN, JEFFREY 1996 Moving On. The New Yorker, April 29 & May 6, pp. 66–73.

SMITH, CHRISTOPHER E. 1996 Bent on Original Intent. American Bar Association Journal 82(October):48–52.

——— 1997 Clarence Thomas: A Distinctive Justice. Seton Hall Law Review 28:1–28.

THOMAS v. REVIEW BOARD
450 U.S. 707 (1981)

Reaffirming its decision in SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963), the Supreme Court, 8–1, invalidated Indiana's refusal of unemployment compensation to a Jehovah's Witness who, for religious reasons, had quit his job rather than work on weapons production. The state had not shown that denying benefits was the LEAST RESTRICTIVE MEANS of achieving a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

THOMAS v. UNION CARBIDE AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS CO.
473 U.S. 568 (1985)

The Supreme Court's decision in NORTHERN PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION CO. V. MARATHON PIPE LINE CO. (1982) left considerable confusion about the power of Congress to confer JURISDICTION on administrators or LEGISLATIVE COURTS over cases falling within the judicial power of the United States. Thomas provided some useful clarification.

The Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodentcide Act (FIFRA) requires a manufacturer, as a condition on registering a pesticide, to supply research data on the pesticide's health, safety, and environmental effects to the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). These data may be used in evaluating a second manufacturer's registration of a similar product, provided that the second manufacturer offers to compensate the first. If the two manufacturers cannot agree on the compensation, FIFRA requires binding arbitration of the dispute. An arbitrator's decision is reviewable by a court only for "fraud, misrepresentation or other misconduct."

Various pesticide manufacturers sued the EPA administrator challenging the constitutionality of the scheme of binding arbitration with limited court review. The federal district court held that the scheme violated Article III of the Constitution; on direct APPEAL, the Supreme Court unanimously reversed, upholding the law.

Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, writing for the Court, recognized a broad policy in Article III "that federal judicial power shall be vested in courts whose judges enjoy life tenure and fixed compensation." Marathon effectuated a part of that policy but was distinguishable here. Considering the origin of the claims to compensation in federal law, along with the reasons of public policy that persuaded Congress to impose binding arbitration, the manufacturers' claimed rights were properly considered "public rights," the adjudication of which Congress could place in administrative hands. Cases involving "public rights" were not limited to those in which the government itself was a party. Nor, said the Court in an important OBITER DICTUM, is Article III's requirement of independent judges irrelevant merely because the government is a party. Here the assignment of decision to nonjudicial arbitrators was softened somewhat by FIFRA's provision of some minimal review by CONSTITUTIONAL COURTS of arbitrators' decisions. (In some cases, the Court noted, DUE PROCESS considerations might independently require further court review.)

Thomas thus adopted a flexible approach to Article III's limitations on Congress's employment of nonjudicial tribunals—the very approach urged by the Marathon dissenters. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, for three Justices, concurred separately on the basis of his PLURALITY OPINION in Marathon. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS concurred, saying the manufacturers lacked STANDING to challenge the law's validity.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

THOMPSON, SMITH
(1763–1843)

Smith Thompson was among the most experienced judges ever appointed to the Supreme Court, and his tenure on the bench (1823–1843) linked the constitutional doctrines of the MARSHALL COURT and the TANEY COURT. After sixteen years on the New York Supreme Court (1802–1818), four years as chief justice, Thompson had been secretary of the navy (1818–1823). His experience in JAMES MONROE's cabinet made Monroe feel so comfortable with Thompson, presumably including his constitutional views, that the President insisted that the New Yorker fill the seat vacated by the death of a fellow New Yorker, H. BROCKHOLST LIVINGSTON.

Thompson did not change his jurisprudence significantly during his twenty years on the Court. He remained a black-letter lawyer, whose most interesting contributions to constitutional jurisprudence can be traced to his New York judicial and cabinet experiences. Besides adhering to precedent, Thompson concerned himself with maintaining judicial independence while showing a willingness to let the legislature have free rein. Having served in an era when Congress was relatively inactive, Thompson appears today as a STATES' RIGHTS advocate, or more precisely an adherent to states' responsibilities. Yet his values did not differ greatly from those of his nationalistic brethren on the Marshall Court. He was, for example, aware of the business community's needs. Unlike Livingston, his predecessor on the Marshall Court, Thompson was more willing to express his differences with the rest of the Court.

He was absent when GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) was argued, but in Livingston v. Van Ingen (1812), decided by the New York court, he had resolved some of the questions involved in Gibbons in favor of the steamboat monopoly. Although Thompson's Van Ingen opinion did not consider the commerce clause question, that of his colleague, JAMES KENT, did and commerce clause cases subsequent to Gibbons show that Thompson subscribed to Kent's doctrine of concurrent powers to regulate commerce. JOHN MARSHALL's language in Gibbons was, moreover, sufficiently broad to allow Thompson to render lip service to Gibbons while taking a contrary position. In BROWN V. MARYLAND (1827), Thompson dissented from Marshall's majority opinion holding that Maryland's law imposing license taxes on wholesalers of imported goods violated both the import and export and the COMMERCE CLAUSE. Like Kent, Thompson did not examine the nature of the power underlying state regulations. Whether the state regulated commerce or not was immaterial so long as the statute did not conflict with a congressional act. In rejecting Marshall's ORIGINAL PACKAGE DOCTRINE in Brown, Thompson set forth the position that goods became subject to a state's jurisdiction upon crossing its borders. Thompson continued his adherence to the doctrine of concurrent commerce powers in MAYOR OF NEW YORK V. MILN (1837), to the extent that he wrote separately rather than subscribe to the majority's reasoning that regulation of immigrant passengers was simply a valid exercise of the STATE POLICE POWER. Subsequently, the concurrent powers doctrine became an integral part of ROGER B. TANEY's constitutional thought. Taney had not advanced that doctrine while arguing for the state in Brown, and it is reasonable to assume that he borrowed it from Thompson.

On the slavery question, Thompson assumed the doughface position later followed by his replacement on the Court, SAMUEL NELSON, of providing support for the peculiar institution, while striving to confine the question at hand and giving the appearance of sticking rigidly to precedent. Typical, in this respect, was GROVES V. SLAUGHTER (1841), where Thompson, speaking for the Court's majority, was able to avoid the question whether Mississippi's constitutional ban on uncontrolled slave shipments from other states violated the commerce clause. In PRIGG V. PENNSYLVANIA (1842), Thompson differed from JOSEPH STORY's opinion that the fugitive slave clause did not prohibit state laws designed "faithfully" to enforce the clause. In contrast with Thompson's adherence to legal formalism in slavery cases was his activism in Cherokee Nation v. Georgia (1831). Dissenting, in the most elaborate opinion of his career, he asserted that regardless of their relative weakness to their white neighbors, the Cherokees constituted an independent, foreign, sovereign, nation. The following year, Thompson's dissent became the majority position in WORCESTER V. GEORGIA. (See CHEROKEE INDIAN CASES.)

Thompson's conservative attitude toward government and business sometimes put him at odds with both Marshall and Taney. Perhaps none of his contemporaries had more concern for protecting VESTED RIGHTS than did Thompson. He joined Story's CHARLES RIVER BRIDGE dissent (1837), and in his own Wheaton v. Peters (1834) dissent he said that as a matter of "sound reason and abstract morality" the COMMON LAW provided COPYRIGHT protection. It was his concern for vested rights alone with his administrative experience that caused Thompson to distinguish between cabinet officers' political and ministerial duties. Only the latter functions were "subject to the control of the law, and the direction of the president," he said in United States ex rel. Stokes et al. v. Kendall (1838). Thompson's conservatism meshed with his adherence to states' responsibilities in interpreting the CONTRACT CLAUSE. In his view contracts were subject to the existing law of a place, including insolvency laws. Such laws, like the long-standing New York system, were also good for business. These beliefs explain Thompson's opposition to Marshall in OGDEN V. SAUNDERS (1837), and partially explains his CRAIG V. MISSOURI dissent (1830). Thompson's impact on constitutional law was slight, and only a few Whig politicians lamented his death.

DONALD M. ROPER
(1986)

Bibliography

DUNNE, GERALD T. 1969 Smith Thompson. In Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., The Justices of the United States Supreme Court. Pages 475–492. New York: Chelsea House.

THOMPSON v. OKLAHOMA
487 U.S. 815 (1988)

The Court held that the CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT clause of the Eighth Amendment, applicable to the states by the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE, prohibited the death sentence against a first-degree murderer who committed the offense at the age of fifteen. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS spoke for a four-member plurality in whose JUDGMENT Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR joined. Stevens asserted that the execution of the juvenile would "offend civilized standards of decency" and be "abhorrent to the conscience of the community."

O'Connor discerned no such consensus from the EVIDENCE adduced by the plurality. Indeed, the Court divided 4–4 on the question as to whether such a consensus existed. O'Connor believed that the sentence must be set aside because of the risk that the state did not realize that its CAPITAL PUNISHMENT statute might apply to fifteen-year-olds.

Stevens had a second string to his bow. He declared that the execution of the minor did not contribute to the purposes underlying the death penalty. O'Connor and the dissenters believed that the plurality Justices failed to understand that some fifteen-year-olds were as blameworthy as adults.

Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, for the three dissenters (Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY did not participate), believed that a consensus existed showing that the execution of juveniles under fifteen years of age did not offend community standards and therefore did not violate the Eighth Amendment. In STANDFORD V. PENRY (1988) the Court ruled that the execution of juveniles who murdered at sixteen years of age was constitutional.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1992)

THORNBURGH v. AMERICAN COLLEGE OF OBSTETRICIANS AND GYNECOLOGISTS
476 U.S. 747 (1986)

Although this 5–4 decision struck down a series of Pennsylvania laws restricting ABORTION, it also showed that support within the Supreme Court for the principles of ROE V. WADE (1973) had eroded. The invalidated restrictions covered a wide range: (1) a twenty-four-hour waiting period; (2) a requirement that a doctor provide a woman seeking an abortion with literature and oral statements, including warnings about medical risks, an estimate of the fetus's gestational age, a description of the probable physical characteristics of the fetus at two-week gestational increments, information about possible medical benefits for childbirth, and a reminder of a father's responsibility for child support; (3) detailed reporting requirements for doctors, including a statement of the basis for the doctor's finding that the fetus was not viable; and (4) a second-physician requirement. Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN wrote for the Court, reaffirming Roe v. Wade and concluding that all of the challenged requirements subordinated women's interest in privacy "in an effort to deter a woman from a decision that, along with her physician, is hers to make."

Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER dissented, noting his willingness to "reexamine Roe." Justice BYRON R. WHITE, joined by Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, filed a lengthy and vigorous dissent that called for Roe to be overruled and specifically challenged the majority's rulings on each of the provisions invalidated here. Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, the fourth dissenter, reasserted what she had said in an earlier opinion, that was unworkable and should be replaced by a principle that would uphold a law unless it were "unduly burdensone" on a woman's decision to have an abortion. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS concurred in a long opinion, taking issue with Justice White's attack on Roe. The White-Stevens debate encapsulates many of the main points made in the debate over the proper role of the judiciary in the field of abortion.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

THORNHILL v. ALABAMA
310 U.S. 88 (1940)

This case involved a FIRST AMENDMENT challenge to convictions under an Alabama antipicketing statute. Normally one has STANDING only to plead one's own constitutional rights. In Thornhill, however, the Supreme Court did not ask whether the particular activity in which the pickets had engaged was constitutionally protected. Instead it asked whether the statute itself, rather than its application to these particular persons, violated the First Amendment. Because the statute was INVALID ON ITS FACE, it could be challenged, even by a union that itself might have engaged in violent picketing not protected by the First Amendment. The theory was that the statute's general ban on all labor dispute picketing would threaten peaceful picketers as well, even though no peaceful picketers had even been prosecuted.

Justice FRANK MURPHY acknowledged that the state legislature legitimately might have written a narrowly drawn statute that condemned only violent or mass picketing. Instead it wrote a general ban on all picketing in labor-management disputes. "The existence of such a statute . . . which does not aim specifically at evils within the allowable area of state control but, on the contrary, sweeps within its ambit other activities that in ordinary circumstances constitute an exercise of freedom of speech . . . readily lends itself to . . . discriminatory enforcement by local prosecuting officials [and] results in a continuous and pervasive unconstitutional restraint on all freedom of discussion." Subsequently the Court was to speak of the unconstitutional CHILLING EFFECT of such "facially overbroad" statutes.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

THORNTON v. CALDOR, INC.
472 U.S. 703 (1985)

The Supreme Court held unconstitutional, on establishment clause grounds, a state act authorizing employees to designate a sabbath day and not work that day. Applying the three-part test of LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971), Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER found that by vesting in employees an "absolute and unqualified" right not to work on the sabbath of one's choice, and by forcing employers to adjust work schedules to the religious practices of employees, the act constituted a law respecting an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. In purpose and effect it advanced religion, preferring those who believe in not working on the sabbath to those who hold no such belief. By implication, a statute giving employers some leeway would be constitutional. Only Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST dissented, without opinion. No member of the Court defended the statute as a state effort to prevent discrimination against sabbath believers by preventing the imposition of employment penalties on those acting in obedience to conscience by refusing to work. (See SHERBERT V. VERNER.)

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

THORPE, FRANCIS N.
(1857–1926)

Francis Newton Thorpe, professor of history at the University of Pennsylvania, edited seven volumes of American Charters and Constitutions. He also wrote several books on political and constitutional history from a post-CIVIL WAR nationalist viewpoint. He emphasized the UNWRITTEN CONSTITUTION by which the written Constitution is continually extended and adapted.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

THREE-FIFTHS CLAUSE

Article I, section 2, clause 3, of the United States Constitution originally provided that members of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES would be apportioned among the states on a formula that added to "free Persons" (including indentured servants but excluding untaxed Indians) "three fifths of all other Persons." The 1840 publication of JAMES MADISON's notes of debates in the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 revealed that the euphemism "all other Persons" referred to slaves.

The clause originated in an unsuccessful 1783 proposal in the Confederation Congress to amend the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION by changing the method of apportioning taxes among the states to a per capita basis that would include all free persons and "three-fifths of all other persons." At the Philadelphia convention, JAMES WILSON, a Pennsylvania delegate, resurrected the three-fifths formula as an amendment to the VIRGINIA PLAN and thereby touched off heated debates on counting slaves for apportionment purposes. The underlying conflict of interests between slave and free states provoked a great crisis of the convention. The deadlock was resolved by a complex formula that was part of the GREAT COMPROMISE basing both representation and DIRECT TAXES on the three-fifths formula and, for good measure, making the direct-tax provisions of Article I, section 9, unamendable (Article V).

Madison in THE FEDERALIST #54 defended the clause as an arbitrary but reasonable compromise that roughly reflected the anomalous legal status of a slave, a human for certain purposes and a chattel for others. The slave was "debased by servitude below the equal level of free inhabitants, which regards the slave as divested of two-fifths of the man." NATHANIEL GORHAM of Massachusetts had earlier agreed, accepting the clause as "pretty near the just proportion."

The three-fifths formula gave the slave states an additional political weight in Congress quite close to what they would have enjoyed if they had counted all slaves for purposes of apportionment. In 1811 this produced eighteen slave-state representatives more than the southern states would have had if slaves had been excluded altogether from apportionment. The clause therefore rankled New England and middle-state Federalists, who used the clause as a vehicle to voice their resentment at the Virginia Dynasty and the rising political power of the west. Reviving arguments of 1787 that if Virginia counted its slaves Massachusetts should be able to count its cattle, New Englanders complained with JOHN QUINCY ADAMS that "slave representation has governed the union." The HARTFORD CONVENTION demanded in 1814 that the clause be abrogated.

Later debates during the abolition controversy renewed this dispute. Abolitionists either disingenuously tried to construe the clause as referring to persons other than slaves (indentured servants or ALIENS) or demanded that the clause be expunged. Defenders of SLAVERY and Garrisonian abolitionists both cited the clause as an explicit assurance of the privileged constitutional status of that unique form of property, human chattels.

Though the abolitionist debates proved inconclusive, the clause bedeviled Republicans during Reconstruction. After the abolition of slavery, all blacks became "free Persons" and thus the congressional representation of the former Confederate states would be augmented by perhaps a dozen congressmen, endangering the Republicans' objectives for the war and Reconstruction. To forestall this, Republicans first temporarily excluded ten of the former seceded states from representation in Congress, then forced ratification of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, whose section 2 provides that representatives shall be apportioned simply on "the whole number of persons in each State," and that a state's representation should be reduced in proportion to its denial of the vote to male citizens over twenty-one years old, except for participation in rebellion or crime.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

OHLINE, HOWARD A. 1971 Republicanism and Slavery: Origins of the Three-Fifths Clause in the United States Constitution. William and Mary Quarterly 28:563–594.

SIMPSON, ALBERT F. 1941 The Political Significance of Slave Representation, 1787–1821. Journal of Southern History 7: 315–342.

THREE-JUDGE COURT

The Supreme Court's decision in EX PARTE YOUNG (1908) made it possible for one federal judge to tie up an entire state legislative program by granting preliminary injunctive relief. In 1910 Congress required certain applications for federal-court INTERLOCUTORY injunctions against state officers to be heard by three judges. Such a court's order was made directly appealable to the Supreme Court. A similar statutory scheme had been devised earlier for certain ANTITRUST and railroad regulation cases. The 1948 revision of the JUDICIAL CODE made clear that the three-judge requirement applied to all hearings on applications for interlocutory or permanent INJUNCTIONS against state officers.

A considerable body of law developed out of this statute. Applications for DECLARATORY JUDGMENTS were not subject to the requirement, although injunctive relief is authorized to enforce a declaratory judgment. Three-judge courts were required only for actions seeking to enjoin state officers in carrying out statutes of general and statewide application, not local ordinances. While three judges were ordinarily necessary to deny injunctive relief as well as grant it, a single judge could dismiss such an action when it was "insubstantial."

The system of three-judge courts was enormously burdensome, both on the lower federal courts and on the Supreme Court. In 1976, Congress drastically limited the three-judge requirement, retaining it only in certain cases involving legislative REAPPORTIONMENT or VOTING RIGHTS and some cases under the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

WRIGHT, CHARLES ALAN 1983 The Law of Federal Courts, 4th ed. Pages 295–299, 728–729. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

"THREE STRIKES" LAWS

See: Career Criminal Sentencing Laws

TIEDEMAN, CHRISTOPHER G. (1857–1903)

Christopher G. Tiedeman, a professor of law, published A Treatise on the Limitations of Police Power in the United States (1886). Second only to THOMAS COOLEY's Constitutional Limitations in its influence on American constitutional law, Tiedeman's book spurred the conversion of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT into a bulwark of VESTED RIGHTS. He believed that liberty found its highest expression in laissez-faire economics and that the POLICE POWER, which he sought to reduce to the role of policeman, was making "socialism, communism, and anarchism . . . rampant in America." He found evidence for that claim in the advocacy of prolabor legislation and state protection of the weak against the strong. CONSERVATISM, he wrote, feared "the advent of an absolutism more tyrannical and more unreasoning than any before experienced by man, the absolutism of a democratic majority." JUDICIAL REVIEW in support of written constitutions that limited government provided the only hope, and Tiedeman's exposition of cases was calculated to assist courts in their task of thwarting invasions of private rights. In 1900, in the preface to a revised second edition, Tiedeman expressed gratification that "the first edition of this book has been quoted by the courts in hundreds of cases."

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

TILTON v. RICHARDSON

See: Lemon v. Kurtzman

TIMBER CULTURE ACT

See: Environmental Regulation and the Constitution

TIMES-MIRROR CO. v. CALIFORNIA

See: Bridges v. California

TIMMONS v. TWIN CITIES AREA NEW PARTY 520 U.S. 351 (1997)

Beginning with Williams v. Rhodes (1968), the Supreme Court rebuffed attempts by state legislatures to justify BALLOT ACCESS restrictions or other election laws favoring the Democratic and Republican parties on grounds that such laws favored the "two-party system." Though the Williams Court did not reject the idea that a state in theory could defend an election law on these grounds, the Court struck down Ohio's ballot access law because it favored "two particular parties—the Republicans and the Democrats—and in effect tends to give them a complete monopoly."

The 6–3 Timmons decision, in which the Court for the first time accepted the two-party rationale, suggests a major shift in favor of allowing state legislatures to protect the Democratic and Republican parties. The Twin Cities Area New Party, a minor political party, wished to nominate Andy Dawkins as its candidate for state representative in the Minnesota legislature. Dawkins was already the candidate of the Democratic Party (known in Minnesota as the Democratic–Farmer–Labor Party, or DFL). Though neither Dawkins nor the DFL objected to this multiple-party or "fusion" candidacy, Minnesota officials refused to accept the New Party's nominating petitions because Minnesota law prohibits fusion. A majority of states similarly ban fusion, though a few states, most notably New York, allow the practice.

The New Party challenged Minnesota's antifusion law as unconstitutional under the FIRST and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS. The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, upheld the law's constitutionality. In ballot access and similar election law cases, the Court does not use a single level of scrutiny (or "litmus-paper test") to judge a challenged law's constitutionality. Instead, the Court calibrates the scrutiny to the severity of the law's burden on First Amendment rights; the greater the burden, the higher the scrutiny. The Timmons majority first held that the burden on the New Party was not severe, though it recognized that the law slightly burdened the party by reducing the universe of potential party nominees and by limiting the ability of the party to send a message to voters and to its preferred candidates through its nomination process.

Nonetheless, the Court held that three "sufficiently weighty" state interests justified the burden. First, the fusion ban prevented parties from joining with sham parties with popular catch phrases, like the "No New Taxes" party. Second, the ban prevented a minor party from capitalizing on the popularity of another party's candidate, rather than its own appeal to the voters, in order to secure access to the ballot. Finally, the Court agreed that states "have a strong interest in the stability of their political systems" and therefore they may "enact reasonable regulations that may, in practice, favor the traditional two-party system."

The first two reasons hardly seem "sufficiently weighty" to overcome even a minor burden on the New Party's First Amendment rights. As for the first interest, reasonable ballot access laws can prevent the formation of sham parties, and the Court expressly denied it was concerned about voter confusion. The second argument ignores the ability of the state to list candidates on the ballots once under each party and then count only the votes cast for the candidate under the minor party label to meet that minor party's future ballot access requirements. This leaves the state's interest in promoting the two-party system, which the Court stated "temper[s] the destabilizing effects of party-splintering and excessive factionalism."

Unfortunately, the Timmons majority failed to examine with care the propositions that the two-party system deserves or needs the Court's protection. Proponents of a strong two-party system have argued that it promotes political stability, decreases interest-group politics, and provides a valuable voting cue to busy voters. But these proponents have not been able to demonstrate that the existence of only two major political parties actually promotes stability or decreases factionalism; and increasing the number of parties may enhance the voting cue by increasing the salience of differences among parties and candidates. Moreover, even if the two-party system is a valuable institution, the Court need not uphold antifusion and similar laws in order to preserve it; instead, the predominant first-past-the-post, single-member district voting mechanism appears to drive a political system with only two viable political parties.

Three Justices dissented in Timmons. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, for himself and Justice RUTH BADER GINSBURG, found the risk to political stability engendered by fusion politics "speculative at best," but Justice DAVID H. SOUTER rejected the two-party system argument only on the ground that the state had failed to raise it.

Given the lack of evidence that the two-party system deserves or needs protection, and given the agency problem that stems from having these laws passed by legislatures made up almost exclusively of Democrats and Republicans, the Court should be wary of such flimsy justifications for infringing First Amendment rights.

RICHARD L. HASEN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Political Parties and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

ARGERSINGER, PETER H. 1980 "A Place on the Ballot": Fusion Politics and Antifusion Laws. American Historical Review 85: 287–306.

HASEN, RICHARD L. 1998 Entrenching the Duopoly: Why the Supreme Court Should Not Allow the States to Protect the Democrats and Republicans from Political Competition. Supreme Court Review 1997:331–371.

ISSACHAROFF, SAMUEL and PILDES, RICHARD H. 1998 Politics as Markets: Partisan Lockups of the Democratic Process. Stanford Law Review 50:643–717.

TINKER v. DES MOINES INDEPENDENT COMMUNITY SCHOOL DISTRICT
393 U.S. 503 (1969)

Tinker is a leading modern decision on the subjects of SYMBOLIC SPEECH and CHILDREN'S RIGHTS. A group of adults and students in Des Moines planned to protest the VIETNAM WAR by wearing black armbands during the 1965 holiday season. On learning of this plan, the public school principals adopted a policy to forbid the wearing of armbands. Two high school students and one junior high school student wore armbands to school, refused to remove them, and were suspended until they might return without armbands. They sued in federal court to enjoin enforcement of the principals' policy and for nominal damages. The district court dismissed the complaint, and the court of appeals affirmed by an equally divided court. The Supreme Court reversed, 7–2, in an opinion by Justice ABE FORTAS.

The wearing of these armbands was "closely akin to "pure speech" and protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT. The school environment did imply limitations on the freedom of expression, but here the principals lacked justification for imposing any such limitations. The authorities' "undifferentiated fear" of disturbance was insufficient. While student expression could be forbidden when it materially disrupted school work or school discipline, these students had undertaken "a silent, passive expression of opinion, unaccompanied by any disorder or disturbance." Furthermore, only this "particular symbol . . . was singled out for prohibition"; political campaign buttons had been allowed, and even "the Iron Cross, traditionally a symbol of Nazism." (Justice Fortas may have been unaware of the vogue among surfers and their inland imitators.)

Justice HUGO L. BLACK dissented, accusing the majority of encouraging students to defy their teachers and arguing that the wearing of the armbands had, in fact, diverted other students' minds from their schoolwork. He did not ask how much the principals' reaction to the planned protest might have contributed to that diversion.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

TITLES OF NOBILITY

In the twentieth century, the idea of a hereditary ruling elite using titles of nobility as a device for maintaining its authority seems a bit frivolous. To the founding generation, however, the threat was only too real. Moreover, the threat that a foreign potentate might suborn an American citizen or official by proffering such a title was also perceived as significant. The ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION forbade the acceptance of foreign titles by any person holding federal or state office and forbade the granting of titles by the United States or by any state. The prohibitions were carried over into the Constitution, except that there is no longer a ban on state officers accepting foreign titles, and Congress may authorize acceptance of titles by federal officers. In both documents, titles of nobility are treated, along with gifts and offices, as items of value that foreign governments might offer in exchange for favors, and Governor EDMUND RANDOLPH, at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, asserted that the provision was designed to guard against corruption.

As it appears in the Constitution, the prohibition against accepting foreign titles applies only to those holding a federal office of trust or profit. On the eve of the War of 1812, Congress proposed to the states a constitutional amendment extending the prohibition to every citizen of the United States. Under the proposed amendment, acceptance of a title of nobility would have caused automatic forfeiture of United States CITIZENSHIP and permanent disqualification from holding federal or state office. The titles-of-nobility amendment was one of only six constitutional amendments ever proposed by Congress to fall short of ratification by the states.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

TOCQUEVILLE, ALEXIS DE
(1805–1859)

The French magistrate and political theorist Alexis Clerel de Tocqueville spent nine months of 1831 and 1832 in the United States. He believed that democracy was the inescapable destiny of all nations and that America, as the first avowedly democratic nation in the modern world, offered an opportunity for the student of politics to observe democracy in action. One product of Tocqueville's sojourn on our shores was Democracy in America.

Tocqueville thought that the main problem of democracy was a tendency toward radical equality of condition which was destructive of the liberty necessary for excellence in human endeavors. He perceived in America two undesirable developments: a pervasive tyranny of the majority and a centrifugal individualism. He proposed, as a solution to democracy's problems, a "new science of politics" based on enlightened self-interest. He emphasized the utility, rather than the beauty or nobility, of virtue and public-spiritedness.

A shrewd observer of political affairs, Tocqueville was one of the first to discern the American tendency toward JUDICIAL SUPREMACY. American judges, he noted, although confined to deciding particular cases, and only those presenting justiciable controversies, possess immense political power. This is possible because "scarcely any political question arises in the United States which is not resolved, sooner or later, into a judicial question," and because of the simple fact that the Americans have acknowledged the right of judges to found their decisions on the Constitution rather than on the laws, or, in other words, they have permitted them not to apply such laws as may appear to them to be unconstitutional. The political power of the judges, arising out of the exercise of JUDICIAL REVIEW, appeared to Tocqueville a salutary check on potential legislative excess. Tocqueville's observation, made when the Supreme Court had voided only a single federal law as unconstitutional, seems all the more perceptive today.

Tocqueville also recognized the unique status of the Constitution in American political life. The English constitution was alterable by ordinary legislation and the constitutions of continental monarchies were immutable save by violent revolution; only in America was the Constitution regarded as an expression of the SOVEREIGNTY of the people, not subject to change at the whim of legislators, but amendable by the common consent of the citizens in accordance with established rules.

Not all of Tocqueville's observations remain valid. For example, he wrote that the states were more powerful than the national government and that Congress was more powerful than the President. In each case, however, he identified the factors that have caused those relationships to be reversed in our own day.

Tocqueville's purpose in writing Democracy in America was not merely to describe American institutions. He addressed himself to the universal problems of modern politics—economic and social, as well as governmental. America provided illustrations and examples, and from the American experience he made generalizations applicable to all modern nations. In America Tocqueville learned how to make democracy safe for the world.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

PIERSON, G. W. 1959 Tocqueville in America. New York: Basic Books.

ZETTERBAUM, MARVIN 1965 Tocqueville and the Problem of Democracy. New York: Basic Books.

TODD, THOMAS
(1765–1826)

Thomas Todd served as a Justice of the United States Supreme Court for nearly nineteen years, but he had only a small impact on the Court's decisions. Born into a fairly prominent Virginia family, he was orphaned at an early age. Because the bulk of his father's estate went to his eldest brother, he was forced to fend for himself. Following a short enlistment in the army during the Revolutionary War he went to Liberty Hall in Lexington, Virginia (later Washington and Lee University), where he studied the classics and mathematics. Todd then entered the household of his cousin Harry Innes, an accomplished lawyer and respected member of the Virginia legislature, where he served as a tutor in return for room and board. In 1784 Innes and his family removed to Kentucky where he became a judge, and Todd accompanied them. Through his cousin's political connections Todd quickly became involved in the movement to make Kentucky a separate state, serving as secretary and clerk for the various conventions that were called, and helped to write Kentucky's first CONSTITUTION in 1792.

Admitted to the bar in 1788, Todd developed a lucrative law practice, with a specialty in land titles. During the 1790s he served as secretary to the Kentucky legislature and as clerk to the federal district court. In 1799 he was appointed judge of that court, and five years later he became chief judge. In 1807 Congress increased the number of United States Supreme Court Justices from five to six in order to accommodate the newly created western circuit (Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee) and to resolve the special problems in land law arising there. As this was Todd's area of expertise and because Todd was popular with the congressmen from the western states, President THOMAS JEFFERSON appointed him to the newly created post.

Although a Republican, Todd invariably supported the strongly nationalist and probusiness decisions of the MARSHALL COURT. Reportedly he was opposed to the Supreme Court's ruling in DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819), but he was absent when it was handed down. In fact, bad health combined with the difficulties of riding the western circuit forced him to miss many of the Supreme Court sessions. He wrote only fourteen decisions, eleven for the majority, two concurring, and one dissenting in the relatively unimportant case of Finley v. Lynn (1810). With the exception of his last opinion, Riggs v. Taylor (1824), which dealt with an evidentiary problem, all his opinions dealt with problems involving land titles. He remained active in various local and state civic affairs until his death.

RICHARD E. ELLIS
(1986)

Bibliography

ISRAEL, FRED L. 1969 Thomas Todd. Pages 407–412 in Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., Justices of the Supreme Court, 1789–1969. New York: Chelsea House.

TOLERATION ACT
1 William & Mary ch. 18 (1689)

The principle of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY denies that the state has any legitimate authority over the individual's religion or irreligion; the principle of toleration insists that a state which maintains an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION indulge the existence of nonconformist religious groups. Toleration is a step between persecution and liberty. The Toleration Act, which accompanied the Glorious Revolution of 1688–1689, was a political necessity that restored peace to a religiously pluralistic England and ended a period of persecution during which thousands of nonconformist Protestant ministers had died in jail.

The act, entitled "A Bill of Indulgence," exempted most nonconformists from the penalties of the persecutory laws of the Restoration, leaving those laws in force but inapplicable to persons qualifying for indulgence. Subjects who took the requisite oaths to support the new king and reject the authority of the pope might have the privilege of worshipping as they pleased, because they were exempted from the penalties that had suppressed them. Baptists and Quakers received special indulgences. Thus the act had the effect of permitting the existence of lawful nonconformity, though nonconformists still had to pay tithes to the established church and endure many civil disabilities. One section of the act excluded from its benefits Roman Catholic recusants and Protestant antitrinitarians. England still regarded the former as political subversives, the latter as virtual atheists. For all its faults the statute of 1689 ushered in an era of toleration under the established church and ultimately benefited dissenters in those American colonies that maintained establishments of religion.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

SEATON, A. (1911) 1972 The Theory of Toleration under the Later Stuarts. Pages 92–236. New York: Octagon Books.

TONKIN GULF RESOLUTION

See: Gulf of Tonkin Resolution

TOOMBS, ROBERT A.
(1810–1885)

A Georgia attorney educated at Schenectady's Union College, Robert Augustus Toombs was a congressman (1843–1853) and senator (1853–1861) before becoming a SECESSION leader. Initially a conservative WHIG and an ally of ALEXANDER STEPHENS, Toombs became a Democrat, but not a fire-eater, after the COMPROMISE OF 1850. In 1856 he supported the admission of Kansas without SLAVERY, if the settlers there voted for statehood on that basis. In 1860 Toombs worked for a united Democratic Party, but despite this goal and his previous support for STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS in the SENATE, Toombs opposed Douglas's presidential aspirations. After ABRAHAM LINCOLN's election Toombs supported the Crittenden Compromise, and he also offered his own. When compromise failed, he returned to Georgia as a secession leader, writing a report for the Georgia Secession Convention explaining why disunion was necessary. Appointed Confederate secretary of state, Toombs resigned after five months to accept a rebel army commission. When he was denied a promotion after Antietam, Toombs left the army and became a critic of JEFFERSON DAVIS's economic inefficiency, confederate violations of CIVIL LIBERTIES, and CONSCRIPTION. In 1865 he escaped to England; he returned in 1867 to lead Georgia's anti-RECONSTRUCTION forces. He dominated Georgia's 1877 CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, which paved the way for black disfranchisement, and, at Toombs's insistence, severely limited corporate charters and railroad development. Toombs never petitioned for CITIZENSHIP, and although a successful attorney, never again held public office.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

THOMPSON, ROBERT Y. 1966 Robert Toombs of Georgia. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

TOOMER v. WITSELL
334 U.S. 385 (1948)

South Carolina required state residents to pay a $25-per-boat license fee to gather shrimp in state waters; for nonresidents, the fee was $2,500. The Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON, held that this discrimination violated both the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of Article IV and the COMMERCE CLAUSE. (See STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE.) The commerce ground was easy and unanimously supported by the Justices. The decision's main importance lay in its approach to the privileges and immunities clause; on this issue the Court divided, 6–3. Earlier decisions had suggested that the clause protected only "fundamental rights." Toomer redirected the inquiry: discrimination against nonresidents was permissible only if it bore a substantial relation to solving a problem distinctively presented by nonresidents. South Carolina's discriminatory tax failed this test.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

TORCASO v. WATKINS
367 U.S. 488 (1961)

The Maryland Constitution provided: "No RELIGIOUS TEST ought ever to be required as a qualification to any office . . . other than a declaration of belief in the existence of God. . . ." For Justice HUGO L. BLACK, speaking for the Supreme Court, the Maryland requirement contravened the ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT. Black, quoting his own opinion for the Court in EVERSON V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1947), repeated that government may not "force a person to profess a belief . . . in any religion."

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

TORT CLAIMS ACT

See: Federal Tort Claims Act

TORT LIABILITY AND JOURNALISTIC PRACTICES

See: Journalistic Practices, Tort Liability, and Freedom of the Press

TORTS

The Constitution intersects with tort law, broadly conceived, in various ways. Most basically, the DUE PROCESS clauses of the Fifth Amendment and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT require that in any legal proceeding enforced by public authority in which a property interest is at stake, as it almost invariably is in a tort suit, the parties must be accorded PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS and the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. These requirements, however, are not cumbersome. As the Supreme Court said in Snyder v. Massachusetts (1934), a state remains "free to regulate procedure of [its] courts in accordance with [its] own conception of policy and fairness unless in so doing it offends some principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our peoples as to be ranked as fundamental." Moreover, due process of law does not always require a proceeding in court. The states are free, for example, to replace the traditional COMMON LAW approach to employee injuries with an administrative workers' compensation system, as all states have now done.

Beyond these rudimentary requirements of procedural due process, which apply to all state-enforced proceedings, the interactions between the Constitution and tort law become considerably more complex. To begin with, the Constitution sometimes functions as a sword, that is, as a source of rights that may be protected by tortlike civil action and damage remedies, and sometimes functions as a shield, that is, as an obstacle to civil actions and remedies that would otherwise be available under state or federal law. Moreover, the Constitution interacts with tort law as a sword and as a shield both directly and obliquely. We begin with the Constitution's more indirect interactions.

By virtue of the SUPREMACY CLAUSE (Article VI, clause 2), the Constitution is the ultimate source of congressional authority. Thus, the Constitution is indirectly the source of all tortlike civil causes of action created by federal statutes. Where a statute explicitly creates a private cause of action, this area of law raises few problems. However, many federal regulatory and criminal statutes specify standards of conduct without expressly authorizing suits for money DAMAGES. Not surprisingly, individuals injured by violations of these laws often ask the federal courts to create private causes of action with damages as a remedy. All agree that the issue of whether the federal courts should infer such a cause of action is a matter of statutory construction and that what must ultimately be determined is whether Congress intended to create the private remedy asserted. Yet, the question of what constitutes sufficient evidence of congressional intent and how restrictive or liberal the Court should be in finding implied private causes of action is highly controversial and has sharply divided the Court. It is clear, however, that during the twenty-five years since its 1964 decision in J. I. Case Co. v. Borak, where the Court seemed willing to create a private right of action wherever doing so would help effectuate the purpose of the statute, the Court has generally grown increasingly hostile toward implied causes of action. The prevailing view on the Court now seems to be that first expressed by Justice LEWIS F. POWELL in his dissent in Cannon v. University of Chicago (1979): "absent the most compelling evidence of affirmative congressional intent, a federal court should not infer a private cause of action."

The Constitution is also the ultimate source of authority for the FEDERAL TORT CLAIMS ACT, which provides that the "United States shall be liable . . . to tort claims in the same manner and to the same extent as a private individual under like circumstances" (28 U.S.C. 2674). The act does not create new causes of action. Rather, it constitutes a waiver of SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY by the United States for negligent acts by its employees that would constitute torts in states where the conduct occurs. The act has many important express exceptions (such as an exception for intentional acts and for "discretionary functions") and the Supreme Court has inferred additional exceptions (such as the bar to suits by members of the ARMED FORCES for injuries they incur while in the military). Nevertheless, the act, which was not passed until 1946, remains the only basis for recovery of damages from the United States for the torts of its employees.

Not only is the Constitution the ultimate source of authority for federal statutes that create or permit tortlike causes of action, but it is also the ultimate source of authority for federal statutes that preclude state tort remedies that would otherwise be available. In this case, too, the issue is one of statutory interpretation (did Congress intend to displace state laws dealing with the same subject matter as the federal statute?), and here, also, the issue is easily resolved where Congress made it clear that the federal statute is intended to preempt the relevant state law. For example, in Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Environmental Study Group, the Court upheld the Price-Anderson Act, which expressly limited aggregate liability for a single nuclear power plant accident to $560 million, thereby limiting the tort remedies that might otherwise be available to plaintiffs in state courts. The Court rejected the claim that the statute resulted in an unconstitutional deprivation of the property rights of potential accident victims.

More difficult issues arise where Congress's intent with respect to state law is unclear. For example, the Federal Cigarette Label and Advertising Act requires that cigarette packages be marked with certain specified warning labels. Although the act forbids states to require additional warnings of any kind, the act does not make it clear whether, or to what extent, state courts are precluded from allowing tort actions by smokers who claim to have been harmed by smoking cigarettes sold with the requisite federal warnings. This issue is now being widely litigated in state and lower federal courts.

Although there are limits to generalizations that can be drawn, it seems that the Supreme Court has been unwilling to find PREEMPTION of state tort remedies in the absence of clear legislative intent to displace state law. For example, in Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp. (1984), the Court held that state laws awarding punitive damages for injuries resulting from the escape of plutonium from a nuclear plant were not preempted by the extensive federal regulatory scheme governing the safety of nuclear plants.

Both the implied-cause-of-action cases and the preemption cases raise issues of statutory interpretation. Unquestionably, Congress has broad constitutional power to create new tortlike causes of action or, instead, to abolish or replace existing causes of action. In recent years, however, the Supreme Court has tended to construe federal statutes narrowly, leaving things as they are in the absence of a clear indication of an intent by Congress to change them. Thus, the Court has been reluctant either to infer private causes of action from federal statutes or to find that state law has been preempted by federal statutes.

The Constitution not only affects tort law indirectly through the commands of federal statutes, but bears directly on tort law as a source of tortlike causes of action against governmental officials and entities and as an obstacle to tort actions and remedies that would otherwise be available. We begin with the constitution as a sword.

The idea that compensatory and punitive-damage actions could be premised on the Constitution itself took some time to develop, particularly where the defendant was an official of the federal government. The common-law courts tended to treat an official who invaded the protected interests of another without legal authority simply as a private individual who had committed a tort. The BILL OF RIGHTS, which originally applied only to the federal government, incorporated some common-law norms against unjustified official invasions of person and property. For example, it forbids federal officials from making unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES, forbids issuance of SEARCH WARRANTS without probable cause, and forbids deprivations of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

Until the CIVIL WAR, the Constitution played only an indirect role in tort actions against federal officials. A person who believed that his or her person or property had been wrongfully invaded by a federal officer would bring a common-law trespass action against him. The official pleaded justification—that he or she had been acting within his or her constitutional and statutory authority, so the action was not tortious. For example, an official might argue that a seizure of the plaintiff's property was reasonable. The issue of reasonableness could have been characterized as a question of whether the plaintiff's FOURTH AMENDMENT rights had been violated. But neither the parties, nor the courts it seems, perceived the action as different from an ordinary tort action because the constitutional and preexisting common-law standards were largely coextensive.

The constitutional amendments and legislation of the RECONSTRUCTION era increased the interplay of tort law and the Constitution, particularly in actions against state and local officials. With the Fourteenth Amendment, the common-law protections against unjustified invasions of liberty or property were now constitutionalized as against state and local officials rather than only against federal officials. And new rights that were not recognized at common law, such as the right to equal protection of the laws, were added to the Constitution.

In addition, the 1871 Civil Rights Act recognized under COLOR OF STATE LAW a cause of action for invasion of rights secured by the Constitution, and the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1875 extended FEDERAL COURT JURISDICTION to FEDERAL QUESTION cases generally. Before the Civil War, plaintiffs had brought suits against government officers as tort claims, and the constitutional issues arose by way of answer and reply. The Reconstruction legislation, however, offered the plaintiffs a federal forum if they pleaded a constitutional violation in their complaints. Over time these "constitutional" torts came to be viewed as separate from the common-law tort actions from which they derived. This separation occurred in part because constitutional rights came to include some rights that had not received protection in common-law actions, such as rights to free speech. In addition, the demise of the concept of a general nationwide common law made lawyers look for federal or state positive-law sources for interests that the courts would protect and look to the source of constitutional tort actions as the Constitution rather than general tort law.

Today federal court actions against state and local officials for constitutional invasions are primarily brought under SECTION 1983 of the 1871 Civil Rights Act. Suits against LOCAL GOVERNMENT entities—although not states, which are usually shielded from federal court liability by the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT—can also be brought in federal courts under section 1983. (Local governments are liable, however, only for their own unconstitutional policies, not for the unauthorized tortious acts of their employees.) There is no counterpart to section 1983 for suits against federal officials. Therefore, a claim against a federal official, such as the claim that an FBI agent violated the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights, must be rooted in the Constitution itself. Although the general federal-question statute empowers federal courts to adjudicate cases arising under the Constitution, neither that statute nor the Constitution itself expressly creates a cause of action for money damages. It was not until 1971, in the landmark case of BIVENS V. SIX UNKNOWN NAMED AGENTS, that the Supreme Court ruled that a federal official can be sued for money damages as a cause of action implied from the Constitution itself—in this case, from the Fourth Amendment. Bivens made clear that the constitutional claim was not tied to the niceties of state tort law: "The federal question becomes not merely a possible defense to the State Law action, but an independent claim both necessary and sufficient to make out the . . . cause of action."

Since Bivens, the Court has recognized other constitutional provisions, such as the Eighth Amendment's proscription on CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT, as bases for damage actions. Bivens, however, leaves many open questions, most crucially, whether the availability of a cause of action against federal officers for money damages is required by the Constitution itself or is federal common law that Congress could abolish by statute. In recent years the Court has rejected a variety of constitutional damage claims either because, in the Court's view, Congress had provided an alternative remedy or, more broadly, because the Court perceived "special factors" counseling caution in inferring a constitutional cause of action for damages. Moreover, the Supreme Court has ruled that both state officials sued under section 1983 and federal officials sued in a Bivens action possess some degree of immunity from liability (municipalities sued under section 1983 do not). Some officials, such as judges and prosecutors performing their official duties, enjoy absolute immunity from suit, but most officials are accorded only a "qualified," or "good faith," immunity. This form of immunity, which has little support in the common law and is not mentioned either in section 1983 or in the Constitution itself, must be claimed as an affirmative defense. Although this partial immunity is often called good-faith immunity, the Supreme Court's most recent formulation in Harlan v. Fitzgerald (1982) makes clear that the test is an objective one: "[G]overnment officials performing discretionary functions generally are shielded from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known."

Although the rights litigated in these "section 1983" and Bivens suits are rights secured by the Constitution and the various immunity doctrines are peculiar to suits against governmental officials, these actions are still seen in some respects as in the nature of tort actions, as shown by the borrowing of state-tort statutes of limitation. In addition, many such constitutional actions, for example, those seeking damages for illegal searches or arrests, resemble common-law actions that may be brought under state tort law or, in limited cases, under the Federal Tort Claims Act if the violator is a federal law enforcement official. Other "constitutional tort" actions go beyond the common law—for example, an action under the 1871 Act claiming that one was dismissed from public employment for exercising one's FIRST AMENDMENT rights. Actions for official negligence typically are relegated to traditional tort remedies, as are some intentional torts, such as libel.

If it took a surprisingly long time for the Court to rule that the Constitution could itself be the source for tortlike causes of action for damages, it took almost as long for it to rule that the Constitution could be an obstacle to tort remedies otherwise available. The primary constitutional limit on common-law private tort actions is the First Amendment's prohibition against "law[s] . . . abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." Originally, this prohibition applied only to Congress, but with the INCORPORATION of the Bill of Rights into the Fourteenth Amendment, it became applicable to state governments as well. Nevertheless, it was not until NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964) that the Supreme Court interpreted the First Amendment as a limitation on damage remedies in private suits brought under the states' common law of libel. Although it might seem anomalous that constitutional language securing rights against the government would also come into play in legal actions between private parties, by the time of Sullivan it had become clear that a state could infringe constitutionally protected interests by enforcing a legal judgment as well as by enacting a statute.

In Sullivan, a city commissioner of Montgomery, Alabama, brought a libel action in state court against the New York Times and four black ministers who had advertised in the Times, appealing for contributions to a legal-defense fund for MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., who had recently been arrested in Alabama on a perjury charge. The ad, which had not mentioned Sullivan, made several assertions about the conduct of the Montgomery police that were largely, though not entirely, accurate. Sullivan claimed that because his duties included supervision of the Montgomery police, the allegations against the police defamed him personally. An Alabama jury awarded him $500,000. By the time the case reached the Supreme Court, it was but one of eleven LIBEL claims totaling $5,600,000 pending against the Times in Alabama; it was obvious that the Sullivan litigation was part of a concerted effort to discourage the press from supporting the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT in the South and to silence the movement's leaders. This effort, moreover, seemed likely to succeed, for under the common law of Alabama and most other states it was difficult to defeat these libel claims. Under standard common-law rules governing libel actions, truth was an affirmative defense, but the evident inability of civil rights advocates to prove to hostile juries the "truth" of statements criticizing popularly elected officials posed the clear danger that speech would be stifled by the threat of crushing civil liability. And in most states the common-law rule of strict liability for defamation recognized no privilege of "fair comment" for statements of fact that were false. To combat this danger to First Amendment values, the Court in Sullivan ruled that a statement criticizing a public official and relating to matters of public concern could be actionable under state libel law only if the statement were defamatory, false, and made with actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not."

In subsequent years, the Court recognized that "the establishment" against which caustic political speech was often addressed encompassed more individuals than merely those who actually held public office. Indeed, there are many people, such as labor leaders or prominent business leaders, who may be so powerful or influential that their actions clearly affect the outcome of political controversies. Acknowledging this reality, the Court, in the cases of Associated Press v. Walker and Curtis Publishing Company v. Butts (1967), extended the Sullivan rules to libel actions brought by PUBLIC FIGURES. However, in GERTZ V. ROBERT WELCH, INC. (1974), the Court recognized that there are other people who, although perhaps well known, have not so injected themselves into public controversy as to become public figures for purposes of the First Amendment's limitations on libel actions. Where such a nonpublic figure brings a libel suit, there is much less likelihood that a libel action is a state-supported attempt to silence unpopular speech. Moreover, such private individuals have a correspondingly lesser opportunity than public figures or public officials to obtain access to the media to rebut the allegedly defamatory statements. Thus, the Court ruled in Gertz that private plaintiffs in such cases need only to show whatever standard of fault the state requires, although some level of fault (at the least negligence) is a constitutional requirement for recovery.

First Amendment concerns ebb as the public status of the plaintiff decreases, but the status of the plaintiff is not the only factor that determines whether the challenged speech is entitled to special constitutional protection. In DUN & BRADSTREET V. GREENMOSS BUILDERS, INC. (1985) the Supreme Court ruled that special First Amendment protection extends only to speech relating to matters of public concern. If the challenged statement touches only matters of private concern, there is little danger that state libel law is being used to silence unpopular political speech, and so the states are free to apply whatever libel law they choose. It is possible, in theory, that public officials or public figures might thus succeed in silencing the speech of unpopular critics. But it is clear that a given topic of interest may change categories as the social status of the plaintiff changes, so that matters that are "private" in the context of statements about private citizens may be of public concern in the context of statements about public officials or public figures.

The Court's First Amendment libel jurisprudence has become extremely—some would say unduly—complex and has required extensive revamping of not only substantive libel law, but procedural and remedial libel law as well. For example, in a "public concern" case the defendant no longer bears the burden of persuasion on the issue of the truth of the alleged defamation. Now, in a departure from the common law, it is the plaintiff who must prove that the challenged statement contains an untrue assertion before any liability will exist. And although falsehood may be established by the common-law standard of a preponderance of the evidence, "actual malice" (in the case of a "public official" or "public figure" plaintiff) or negligence (in the case of a "private individual" plaintiff) must now be established by clear and convincing evidence. In addition to these changes in trial procedure, the Court has effected a change in appellate procedure in libel actions, ruling in Bose Corporation v. Consumers Union of United States, Inc. (1984) that a reviewing court is not to accord trial court findings the normal "clearly erroneous" standard of deference. Instead, said the Court, the First Amendment requires that an appellate court independently evaluate the evidence in the record to determine whether there is clear and convincing evidence of "actual malice" or the appropriate level of fault.

With respect to remedies for libel and defamation, the law is also complex and, perhaps, in a state of flux. But in essence, the current rule is the following: where the speech relates to matters of public concern, regardless of the social status of the target of the speech, presumed and punitive damages may be awarded only upon a showing of actual malice (of course, where the plaintiff is a public official or public figure, no damages at all will lie, absent a showing of actual malice); but where the subject matter of the speech is purely private, the First Amendment places no limitation on any type of damages.

Many libel plaintiffs also allege that they are entitled to recover on some other basis, such as invasion of privacy or intentional infliction of emotional distress. Like libel, these other causes of action also present the risk of state-supported attempts to silence controversial or unpopular speech. Not surprisingly, when the Court in HUSTLER MAGAZINE V. FALWELL (1988) considered whether the First Amendment places any limitations on actions for intentional infliction of emotional distress, it held that a public official or a public-figure plaintiff in such an action must prove that the statement at issue contains a false assertion made with actual malice. The Court did not discuss the public concern/private concern distinction of Dun & Bradstreet, but its reasoning suggests that emotional distress actions, as well as other tort actions based on defendant's speech, must be analyzed in light of the same First Amendment principles as libel actions.

Until now, the First Amendment has been by far the most important source of constitutionally based limitations on tort law. But the Court will soon consider whether the due-process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment places some limits on the award of punitive damages under state law, not only for speech related torts, such as libel and slander, but for all torts. As punitive-damage awards have skyrocketed in recent years, business interests have argued for some constitutionally based limits on the size of punitive awards. In Browning-Ferris Industries of Vermont Inc. v. Kelco Disposal Inc. (1989) the Court ruled that the Eighth Amendment's EXCESSIVE FINES clause applies only to criminal cases and not to awards of punitive damages in civil suits between private parties. However, the Court expressly left open the possibility that the due-process clause regulates in some way the imposition of punitive damages in such suits.

SILAS WASSERSTROM
ANNE WOOLHANDLER
(1992)

Bibliography

JEFFRIES, JOHN C. 1989 Compensation for Constitutional Torts: Reflections on the Significance of Fault. Michigan Law Review 88:82–103.

NICHOLS, GENE 1989 Bivens, Chilicky, and Constitutional Damages Claims. Virginia Law Review 75:1117–1154.

SMOLLA, RODNEY 1987 Dun & Bradstreet, Hepps, and Liberty Lobby: A New Analytic Primer on the Future Course` of Defamation. Georgetown Law Journal 75:1519–1573.

TOTH, UNITED STATES EX REL., v. QUARLES
350 U.S. 11 (1955)

Five months after his honorable discharge from the Air Force, Toth was charged with committing murder while on active duty in Korea. Taken to Korea for trial by court martial, Toth sought HABEAS CORPUS in a DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA court. On APPEAL, the Supreme Court held, 6–3, that a civilian was entitled to TRIAL BY JURY in a civilian court established under Article III; court-martial JURISDICTION was constitutionally limited to actual members of the armed forces.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Judicial Power; Military Justice.)

TOWNSEND v. SAIN
372 U.S. 29 (1963)

When a state prisoner seeks federal HABEAS CORPUS review of a constitutional error in his or her case, the federal court must decide what weight to give the state court fact findings that are relevant to the prisoner's claim. The fairness and accuracy of such findings are crucial to the proper adjudication of federal constitutional rights, because most habeas corpus petitions raise mixed questions of law and fact, such as the VOLUNTARINESS of a WAIVER OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS, or the suggestiveness of a LINE-UP identification. In Townsend, a unanimous Supreme Court held that a federal court in a habeas corpus proceeding always has the power to try the facts anew, and that it must do so if the defendant did not receive a full and fair evidentiary hearing in any state court proceeding. The Court split 5–4 over the need for more specific directives concerning mandatory hearings, with Chief Justice EARL WARREN setting forth the majority's view that a hearing is required in six particular circumstances.

In 1966, Congress enacted a modified form of the Townsend criteria in an amendment to the JUDICIAL CODE, specifying eight circumstances when the validity of state court findings may not be presumed. In other circumstances, the habeas corpus petitioner bears the burden of proving that the state fact findings were erroneous.

CATHERINE HANCOCK
(1986)

TOWNSHEND ACTS
(1767)

The Townshend Acts imposed duties upon American imports of glass, lead, paint, paper, and tea and authorized WRITS OF ASSISTANCE as one means of enforcing payment. Although "external" in form, the duties were not levied to regulate trade but to raise revenue to help pay for maintaining British soldiers and officials in America. The colonists protested that the levies constituted TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION. The Townshend Act duties (except that on tea) were repealed in 1770.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

TRADE UNIONS

See: Labor and the Constitution

TRAFFIC STOPS

Although traffic stops are not the most burdensome seizures regulated by the FOURTH AMENDMENT, they have become among the most controversial—partly because they are so common. Most Americans have never been arrested, but the vast majority have been pulled over. More importantly, traffic enforcement is highly discretionary. Vehicle codes are so widely breached that the police can stop almost any car if they follow it with a modicum of patience. This discretion is a boon for law enforcement; police departments increasingly have found vehicle codes a useful tool for finding and apprehending violators of more serious laws.

But the discretionary nature of traffic enforcement also has a worrisome side. Because vehicle codes give police officers authority to stop practically any motorist, they present some of the same risks of arbitrariness posed in colonial America by GENERAL WARRANTS and WRITS OF ASSISTANCE, the very instruments against which the Fourth Amendment was most clearly aimed. And a growing body of evidence suggests that the police are far more likely to pull over cars driven by members of racial minorities, particularly African Americans, and that minority motorists stopped by the police are more likely to be verbally or physically abused.

Recent decisions by the Supreme Court have exacerbated these dangers. In the most important of these decisions, Whren v. United States (1996), the Court held unanimously that the police can stop a car whenever they have PROBABLE CAUSE to believe that the driver has violated traffic laws, regardless of the officers' true motivation, and regardless of whether the violation would prompt a reasonable officer to pull the car over. Whren put to rest a persistent ambiguity in constitutional CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, ruling that "[s]ubjective intentions play no role in ordinary, probable-cause Fourth Amendment analysis." The decision also rejected the reasoning of some scholars and lower courts that a traffic stop should be deemed unconstitutionally pretextual if it departed so sharply from usual police practices that a reasonable officer would not have made the stop for the reasons given. Writing for the Court, Justice ANTONIN SCALIA saw this alternative approach as an unwieldy and unjustifiable attempt to bring subjective intentions back into the analysis through the back door.

In other recent cases the Court has broadened the power that the police can exercise once they pull over a car. Having held in Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977) that during any lawful traffic stop the police can order the driver out of the car, the Court in Maryland v. Wilson (1997) extended the Mimms rule to passengers. In Ohio v. Robinette (1996), the Court ruled that the police can seek consent to search a car without first explaining that the traffic stop has ended; Robinette built on SCHNECKLOTH V. BUSTAMONTE (1973), which held that a suspect can validly consent to a search without knowing he or she has the right to refuse.

In all these cases the Court demonstrated a commendable regard for law enforcement necessities and the considerable hazards faced by officers carrying out traffic stops. What the decisions unfortunately lack is similar attention to ways in which traffic stops lend themselves to particularly troubling forms of police harassment.

DAVID A. SKLANSKY
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Search and Seizure.)

Bibliography

DAVIS, ANGELA J. 1997 Race, Cops, and Traffic Stops. University of Miami Law Review 51:425–443.

SALKEN, BARBARA C. 1989 The General Warrant of the Twentieth Century? A Fourth Amendment Solution to Unchecked

Discretion to Arrest for Traffic Offenses. Temple Law Review 62:221–275.

SKLANSKY, DAVID A. 1998 Traffic Stops, Minority Motorists, and the Future of the Fourth Amendment. Supreme Court Review 1997:271–329.

TRANSACTIONAL IMMUNITY

See: Immunity Grant

TRANSFORMATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

Over the past two hundred years, American CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION has undergone a transformation from its early static and TEXTUALIST tradition to a modern, dynamic approach wherein a "LIVING CONSTITUTION" changes to accommodate the needs of the times. Two pivotal periods in constitutional thought have catalyzed this shift away from ORIGINALISM, initially starting with the Progressive reaction to the excesses of the Lochner Court, and later continuing with the WARREN COURT and its broad constitutional reforms.

For the first hundred years, American constitutional interpretation firmly adhered to what historian Michael Kammen describes as a Newtonian conception of the Constitution. Constitutional concepts and principles were static and unchanging, akin to the timeless scientific truths of Newtonian mechanics. Indeed, so firmly entrenched was this originalist approach to judicial thinking that the Supreme Court all but ignored Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL's statement in MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) that "[the] constitution was intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs." The passage was cited only once in a Court opinion during the entire nineteenth century, and only a total of six times by 1945.

The dominance of literal constitutional interpretation was not entirely surprising given the strong influence of Protestant thought early in American history. Protestants rejected the priestly interpretations of the Bible espoused by Catholics, supporting instead textualist interpretations that were more freely available to laypersons. Indeed, at the time of the writing of the Constitution, the only established competitor to originalism was the COMMON LAW methodology, which by the early eighteenth century had been recognized as changing and evolutionary. Nonetheless, despite the Framers' acceptance of the dynamic nature of the common law, they largely held to the originalist view. For instance, when constructing the Virginia code, THOMAS JEFFERSON would entertain only ancient, "timeless" English common law rules, excluding the "uncertain" reforms proffered in the then-recent common law jurisprudence of Lord Mansfield.

The originalist approach had internal conflicts and difficulties. One problem was the degree of literalness to be applied. Were judges to interpret the Constitution on its face, considering only express terms, or were they to consider historical context and implied meaning as well? The former, the plain meaning approach, faced semiotic difficulties, since as JAMES MADISON suggested, "no language is so copious as to supply words and phrases for every complex idea. . . ." The preference for the letter of the Constitution over the spirit also clashed with early Christian foundations, which militated against extreme literalism. "[F]or the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life" (2 Corinthians 3:6). The historical context approach suffered its own interpretative problems, for the Constitution and its amendments had been adopted through a process of debate, representing a multitude of often contradictory intentions. Intent was not just difficult to discover; oftentimes a unified intent did not even exist. These deficiencies led Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., later to criticize historical analysis as "arrogance cloaked as humility." It was plainly arrogant, if not unbelievable, to think that a court could accurately guess the intent of the Framers decades or centuries later.

The high-water mark for a static conception of constitutional meaning centered around LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), where the Court struck down a maximum hour law for bakers as a violation of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. Lochner's holding, however, demonstrated the great deficiency of static, originalist constitutional interpretation; it was simply incapable of adapting to a changing world. Abstract legal concepts such as freedom of contract had grown out of touch with the practical realities of an increasingly exploitative industrial society, and originalist thinking provided no easy alternative. Lochner thus provoked a fervent reaction from the Progressives, who sought to transform the conception of constitutional law from static to dynamic to meet the rapidly changing needs of twentieth-century society.

The stage for a dynamic conception of constitutional law was set by Darwin's theory of evolution, which served to undermine the static Newtonian model of constitutionalism while concurrently suggesting that law, like science, might change over time. Progressives argued for an organic Constitution premised on Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR.'s, classic maxim from The Common Law (1881): "The life of the law has not been logic; it has been experience." Constitutional principles were not to be derived solely from the text, but rather were changed by customs and common experiences over time. Justice THOMAS M. COOLEY of the Michigan Supreme Court similarly supported this organic conception of constitutional interpretation, suggesting that the Constitution's "peculiar excellence is that it is forever adapted to the people, and expands to accommodate new circumstances and new and higher conditions of society." By the turn of the century, then-Professor WOODROW WILSON summarized PROGRESSIVE CONSTITUTIONAL THOUGHT most markedly: "government is not a machine, but a living thing. . . . It is accountable to Darwin, not to Newton."

To introduce a dynamic, orgainc concept of a "living Constitution" into a still predominantly originalist legal community, the Progressives used the justification of "changed circumstances." This DOCTRINE, pioneered by future-Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS's brief to the Court in MULLER V. OREGON (1908), created a fiction by which the Court could maintain the aura of originalism. The Constitution remained static and unchanging; instead, the factual situation was the novelty, requiring a new, but still originalist interpretation of the Constitution. In Muller, despite the foreboding PRECEDENT of Lochner, the "BRANDEIS BRIEF", as it became commonly known, successfully argued the constitutionality of an Oregon maximum hour law for women by using the "changed circumstances" argument, daringly submitting 110 pages of sociological and economic data on the modern situation of working women.

The originalist underpinning of the changed circumstances doctrine was tenuous, and failed to confine the doctrine for very long. Quickly, the doctrine became a key point of departure from static originalism. Justice BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO soon expanded the doctrine to embrace the idea of a "living Constitution," advocating in The Nature of the Judicial Process (1921) that "[t]he great generalities of the constitution have a content and significance that vary from age to age." No longer was a court applying a previously fixed rule to new facts. Indeed, as Cardozo suggested, the meaning of the rule itself could not be determined independently of its times or its specific applications. Cardozo's theory of a dynamic Constitution was poignantly expressed in his unpublished CONCURRING OPINION in the Minnesota Mortgage Moratorium Case (1934):

> [The Framers] did not see the changes in the relation between states and nation or in the play of social forces that lay hidden in the womb of time. It may be inconsistent with things that they believed or took for granted. Their beliefs to be significant must be adjusted to the world they knew.

Cardozo withdrew his concurrence, however, when his charge was boldly echoed in the MAJORITY OPINION by Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES:

> It is no answer to say that this public need was not apprehended a century ago, or to insist that what the provision of the Constitution meant to the vision of that day it must mean to the vision of our time. . . . It was to guard against such a narrow conception that Chief Justice Marshall uttered the memorable warning—'We must never forget, that it is a constitution we are expounding'—'a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs.'

Among its multitude of reforms and constitutional reinterpretations, the Warren Court's treatment of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, specifically the EQUAL PROTECTION clause, best evinced its commitment to a dynamic and changing Constitution. Shortly after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, the RECONSTRUCTION Court had sought to limit and narrow the amendment's scope. In the twenty-eight years between the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment and PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896), which legalized "SEPARATE BUT EQUAL" SEGREGATION, the Court did not once rule in favor of blacks seeking protection against RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. The Court instead consistently struck down or narrowly construed CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION. As Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, JR., suggested in REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978), the equal protection clause was "[v]irtually strangled in infancy by post-civil-war reactionism." The Warren Court endeavored to revisit and rewrite Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence, notably in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), HARPER V. VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966), and REYNOLDS V. SIMS (1964).

The theory under which the Court reached its decision in Brown, which held school segregation unconstitutional, remains ambiguous. Was Plessy incorrect from the day it was decided, or had Plessy been previously correct but changed circumstances mandated a reevaluation? Chief Justice EARL WARREN's opinion hinted at both theories. On one hand, it held that "[s]eparate educational facilities are inherently unequal," suggesting timeless, originalist principles. On the other hand, the Court also stated that it could not "turn the clock back to 1868 when the Amendment was adopted," but instead had to "consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life," implying changed circumstances.

Brown's theoretical basis proves particularly difficult to grasp because the Court desired unanimity due to legitimacy concerns. Consequently, Warren was forced to draft the opinion to avoid any specter of moral superiority that might alienate the Southern members of the Court. A suggestion that Plessy had always been incorrect would have disparaged "the Southern way of life" as it had been widely practiced for the previous fifty years.

Law clerk (and future professor) ALEXANDER M. BICKEL's memo to Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER on the eve of Brown offered an alternative theory of a changing Constitution.

Examining legislative history, Bickel concluded that the drafters of the Fourteenth Amendment had not intended to invalidate segregation at the time it was drafted. However, they had used broad language, anticipating and intending that the Court might adapt and change the interpretation in the future.

In Harper, the Court struck down a Virginia POLL TAX as violative of the equal protection clause, OVERRULING a PRECEDENT of thirty years. The ensuing exchange in Harper between Justices WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS and HUGO BLACK depicts the victory of the dynamic theory over the static. Douglas, writing for the majority, espoused a living Constitution, holding that "the Equal Protection Clause is not shackled to the political theory of a particular era." He further cited Brown for the proposition that the concept of equality changes with changed circumstances. This reasoning, however, provoked a bitter dissent from Black, who unequivocally denied "hold[ing] segregation in public schools unconstitutional on any such theory." For Black, who had grown increasingly disenchanted with dynamic constitutional theory, Plessy had been wrong the day it had been decided.

Reynolds further demonstrated the Court's shift to a living Constitution. In Reynolds, the Court held that the equal protection clause required equal ELECTORAL DISTRICTING for both houses of state legislatures, to which Warren applied the maxim "ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE". Given that the U.S. SENATE is comprised of two senators per state regardless of population, the Reynolds holding could scarcely have derived from an original understanding. Its only justification was that democratic principles had evolved to mandate the "one person, one vote" principle, irrespective of ORIGINAL INTENT. After the WORLD WAR II, democracy had become a desirable ideal, no longer confined and feared as leading to a "tyranny of the majority," but rather nurtured by JUDICIAL REVIEW to further inclusiveness in a pluralistic society.

The Warren Court's expansive view of judicial power and dynamic constitutional interpretation provoked a backlash from conservatives in the early 1980s. Focusing on judicial restraint and yearning for a truer and simpler past, Attorney General Edwin Meese proposed a return to originalism, a view often adopted by the REHNQUIST COURT.

A major departure from the Rehnquist Court's originalist tendencies, however, occurred in PLANNED PARENTHOOD V. CASEY (1992). In Casey, the Court considered whether to overrule the case that legalized abortion, ROE V. WADE (1973). Writing to reaffirm Roe, Justice DAVID H. SOUTER in his part of a joint plurality opinion suggested a standard under which the Court can overrule prior precedent and disregard the traditional, conservative doctrine of STARE DECISIS. Examining the cases overruling Lochner and Plessy, the plurality opinion concluded that overruling decisions are based primarily on changing circumstances. "[T]he decisions were . . . defensible, not merely as the victories of one doctrinal school over another by dint of numbers (victories though they were), but as applications of constitutional principle to facts as they had not been seen by the Court before." Despite the recent emphasis on a static Constitution, the dynamic conception had resurfaced yet again.

MORTON J. HORWITZ
(2000)

Bibliography

BARRON, DAVID J. 1999 The Promise of Cooley's City: Traces of Local Constitutionalism. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 147:487–612.

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1955 The Original Understanding and the Segregation Decision. Harvard Law Review 69:1–65.

CARDOZO, BENJAMIN N. 1921 The Nature of the Judicial Process. New Haven Conn.: Yale University Press.

FRIEDMAN, BARRY and SMITH, SCOTT B. 1998 The Sedimentary Constitution. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 147:1–90.

HOLMES, OLIVER W., JR. 1881 The Common Law. Boston: Little, Brown.

HORWITZ, MORTON J. 1993 The Constitution of Change: Legal Fundamentality Without Fundamentalism. Harvard Law Review 107:30–117.

——— 1998 The Warren Court and the Pursuit of Justice. New York: Hill and Wang.

KAMMEN, MICHAEL G. 1986 A Machine That Would Go of Itself: The Constitution and American Culture. New York: Knopf.

MEESE, EDWIN, III 1985 Address Before the D.C. Chapter of the Federalist Society Lawyers Division. UC Davis Law Review. 19:22–30.

RAKOVE, JACK N. 1996 Original Meanings: Politics and Ideas in the Making of the Constitution. New York: Knopf.

TRANS-MISSOURI FREIGHT ASSOCIATION v. UNITED STATES
166 U.S. 290 (1897)

A 5–4 Supreme Court, holding that the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT extended to railroads, rejected the RULE OF REASON advanced by Justice EDWARD D. WHITE in dissent. In 1889, eighteen railroads had combined to form the Trans-Missouri Freight Association "for the purpose of mutual protection, by establishing and maintaining reasonable rates, rules and regulations [over their mutual] freight traffic." Any member's proposed rate reduction for a route shared with another member needed Association approval.

Justice RUFUS PECKHAM, the Court's spokesman, found two questions: Did the Sherman Act apply to railroads and, if so, was the Freight Association agreement a violation of that act? He dismissed the railroads' claim of exemption on two grounds. Their business was commerce, and the lower courts and the dissenters had relied on a mistaken belief that the Sherman Act could not apply to railroads because the INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT already regulated carriers. He refused "to read into the act by way of judicial legislation an exception that is not placed there [by Congress]." Policy matters were not questions for judicial determination; any alteration of the law was for Congress to undertake. Peckham concluded that the Sherman Act prohibited all restraints of INTERSTATE COMMERCE; adopting the rule of reason would "substantially . . . leave the question of reasonableness to the companies themselves." Endorsing free competition, the Court declared that intent need not be proved: the Association agreement clearly restrained commerce.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

TRAVEL

See: Right to Travel

TREASON

Treason is the only crime defined in the United States Constitution. Article III, section 3, declares that > Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court. The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no ATTAINDER OF TREASON shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted.

State constitutions contain similar limiting definitions of treason against a state. However, since national independence there has been little action or development of doctrine under the state provisions. The notable exceptions are the trials of Thomas Wilson Dorr (1844) and of John Brown (1859) which ended in convictions of treason by levying war against the states of Rhode Island and Virginia, respectively. State histories include a few abortive attempts to employ treason INDICTMENTS against people who incurred the wrath of powerful elements in the community. Thus indictments were brought against Mormon leaders in Missouri in 1838 and in Illinois in 1844; for political reasons the Missouri charge was not pressed and the defendants escaped jail; a mob murdered Joseph Smith shortly after his arrest on the Illinois indictment. Such isolated instances aside, the law of treason in the United States has been almost wholly the product of debates over making the national Constitution and decisions of federal courts under Article III, section 3.

As it has developed under the Constitution, the law regarding treason has strikingly mingled concern for the security of government and the legal order and concern for the freedom of private individuals and groups. The crime deals with the most serious threats to the existence of the state. In adopting the Constitution everyone took for granted that, since the people were creating a new SOVEREIGNTY, it must have authority to protect itself. Congress has reflected this judgment of the gravity of the matter by prescribing penalties that may extend to life imprisonment, or perhaps even to execution. Where charges have fallen fairly within the constitutional definition of the offense, judges have not hesitated to make firm application of the law. However, on its face the Constitution takes a limiting approach to the crime. Treason, says Article III, section 3, shall consist "only" in two named types of conduct; Congress is thus barred from adding new categories of treason, as it is also explicitly limited in fixing penalties. Moreover, the treason clause puts a stringent limit on the executive in prosecuting the crime; absent a confession in open court, by constitutional mandate the prosecution must muster testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act that the accused committed in seeking to carry out the treason. Federal judges in cases arising under the treason clause have followed a restrictive approach in marking the outer boundaries of the crime. Thus in one aspect the treason clause guards the security of the government. But in another dimension it sets limitations that make it functionally analogous to provisions of the BILL OF RIGHTS, protecting CIVIL LIBERTIES of private individuals and groups.

The constitutional emphasis on restricting the scope of the crime of treason is a marked departure from the main directions the law had taken in England and in this country before 1789. Before the eighteenth century, in practice, official policy had given clear primacy to the security of government, often more obviously to serve the interests of particular powerholders than to serve the common good.

From the fourteenth to the eighteenth century, English political history included aggressive use of charges of treason as weapons of partisan conflict; prosecution was usually vindictive and pressed with scant regard to fair procedure or careful insistence on clear proof or reliable evidence. The only counterweight to this abusive trend was the continuance of the statute of 25 Edward III (1350), stating seven categories of high treason—notably those of levying war, adhering to enemies, or seeking "to compass or imagine the death of our lord the King"—and asserting that only Parliament might enlarge the definitions of treason, thus forbidding judges to extend the offense by interpretation. The restrictive emphasis of the statute of Edward III was stressed by the English treatise writers from whom lawmakers in the new United States got most of their knowledge of the course of English policy regarding treason. In particular, EDWARD COKE, Matthew Hale, and WILLIAM BLACKSTONE spoke of abuse of vague, extended definitions of the crime as instruments of partisan combat, imperiling the general liberty. Thus Hale warned, "How dangerous it is by construction and analogy to make treasons, where the letter of the law has not done it; for such a method admits of no limits or bounds, but runs as far as the wit and invention of accusers, and the odiousness and detestation of persons accused will carry men." Offsetting such warnings, however, the English treatises also brought to the knowledge of lawmakers in North America a considerable range of decisions in which English judges had, despite the limit declared in Edward III's statute, greatly enlarged the offense of treason by construction.

Security in the most elemental sense was at stake for the English colonies in North America under the threat of French and Indian wars and in the new states torn through the AMERICAN REVOLUTION by bitter divisions between those loyal to the Crown and those asserting independence. Thus in the colonies and in the new states during the years of the Revolutionary War, statute books included many broadly and sometimes vaguely defined offenses of subversion, in dramatic contrast to the limited definition of treason later written into the national Constitution and thereafter typically included in constitutions of the states. Though colonial and early state legislation sometimes borrowed the language of the act of Edward III, we must realize that at least by the late eighteenth century lawyers here would be familiar, through the standard English treatises, with the expansive readings which English courts had given the old statute.

With adoption of the national Constitution we encounter introduction of a restrictive emphasis to balance the security concerns previously dominant in the law of treason. There is not a great deal about the treason clause in the records of the framing and RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION. But what there is shows sensitivity to lessons that policymakers here felt they should draw from English experience of the dangers to individual and political liberty of loose resort to treason prosecutions. JAMES WILSON was probably the ablest lawyer on the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION's Committee of Detail, which took the responsibility of adopting a restrictive rather than an extensive approach to defining treason. In the Pennsylvania ratifying convention, Wilson twice—on his own initiative and without any criticisms of the provision voiced by an alert and suspicious opposition—praised the treason clause as including protection of civil liberty along with protection of government. In his law lectures delivered at the College of Philadelphia in 1790 and 1791, Wilson emphasized the constitutional provision by devoting an entire lecture to it. He made the centerpoint of his analysis the importance of carefully bounding the crime: "It is the observation of the celebrated Montesquieu, that if the crime of treason be indeterminate, this alone is sufficient to make any government degenerate into arbitrary power." Two fears were prominent in the limited attention given the treason clause in adopting the Constitution: that holders of official power would use the treason charge to suppress legitimate, peaceful political opposition and to destroy those who were out of official favor, and that popular fear and emotion might be stirred under the dread charge to produce convictions without additional evidence. Subsequent federal court opinions recognized this restrictive background, in decisions limiting extension of the offense. Speaking for the Supreme Court in EX PARTE BOLLMAN AND SWARTWOUT (1807) in a matter indirectly involving a treason charge, Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL declared that "to prevent the possibility of those calamities which result from the extension of treason to offences of minor importance, that great fundamental law which defines and limits the various departments of our government, has given a rule on the subject both to the legislature and the courts of America, which neither can be permitted to transcend." In the first treason case to reach the Supreme Court, CRAMER V. UNITED STATES (1945), the Court reaffirmed the propriety of this approach, quoting with approval Marshall's further admonition that "It is, therefore, more safe, as well as more consonant to the principles of our constitution, that the crime of treason should not be extended by construction to doubtful cases; and that crimes not clearly within the constitutional definition, should receive such punishment as the legislature in its wisdom may provide."

Three key elements enter into the crime of treason: an obligation of allegiance to the legal order, and intent and action to violate that obligation. First, treason is a breach of allegiance. A citizen owes loyal support to the sovereignty within which he lives or from which he derives his citizen's status. There are circumstances under which by the law of a foreign state an individual may owe it allegiance at the same time that he owes fealty to the United States; thus an individual may be a citizen of the United States because he was born here, and also be a citizen of another nation because he was born to nationals of that country. But dual nationality does not relieve an individual of obligation to refrain from volunteering aid or comfort to the foreign nation when it is at war with the United States. The restrictive tone attending treatment of treason charges had an analogy in WORLD WAR II decisions which put on the government the burden of proving by clear and convincing evidence that citizens of the United States who had been lawfully present in an enemy country at the outbreak of war and were conscripted into enemy military service on the basis of their dual nationality had not complied under duress. However, in 1961 Congress amended the governing legislation to put the burden of proving duress on the individual claiming to hold United States CITIZENSHIP. The change from the court decisions to Congress's amendment revealed the persistence of tension between values placed on governmental security and on individual security, familiar in the treatment of the treason offense. One other facet of the allegiance element deserves note. Though the matter has not been presented to a court in this country, a resident alien enjoying the nation's protection owes it obedience to its laws while he is a resident. Such an individual is probably guilty of treason if he commits acts that would constitute the offense if done by a citizen.

To convict one of treason, the government must prove that the accused had a treasonable intent to levy war or to adhere to an enemy and to give aid and comfort to that enemy. Since betrayal of allegiance is at the heart of the offense, the requisite wrongful intent must be specific—a focused purpose to bring about a betrayal. In many crimes requiring proof of a guilty mind, the law holds an individual responsible as intending the reasonably foreseeable consequences of his conduct, even though he pleads that he did not intend to bring about the particular outcome for which he is charged. In Cramer v. United States the Supreme Court opinion included some incautious language which appeared to adopt that position. But the weight of authority in earlier federal court decisions and in rulings after Cramer indicates that the prosecution must prove that the defendant did intend to challenge the full authority of government at home (levy war) or to deliver aid to an enemy, as a substantial, independent element in his purpose, whatever other ends he may have had in mind. To this extent it appears that the prosecution must prove that the accused had a specific intent to levy war or to aid enemies. However, this requirement does not necessitate proof of guilty purpose by explicit statement or direct admission; the prosecution may prove the guilty intent by strong inference from the context of the accused's behavior.

The calculated limitations of the treason clause of the Constitution offer persuasive evidence that proof of the crime should require showing a specific intent. The Constitution obviously narrows the prior scope of treason by omitting any analogue to the offense of "compassing" or "imagining" the death of the king. Under that head, old English doctrine erected "constructive" treasons by inferring the wrongful intent from speech or writings that complaisant judges ruled might have the "natural consequences" of stirring popular discontent out of which violence might erupt to endanger the state. The weight of authority in federal court decisions has recognized that the policy of Article III, section 3, is to prevent expansion of the offense by building upon loose inferences of intention.

The character of the requisite wrongful intent varies according to which of the two heads of the offense is in issue. To be guilty of levying war against the United States, the individual must intend to use organized force to overthrow the government. Under the older English law treason existed if there was intent by collective force to prevent enforcement of a particular statute or other lawful order, or to obtain some particular benefit for a group, contrary to law. This English doctrine was followed in two early instances involving violent group resistance to enforcing particular federal laws—collection of a federal excise on whiskey (the WHISKEY REBELLION in western Pennsylvania in 1794) and collection of a federal property tax (the FRIES' REBELLION, also in Pennsylvania, 1799). However, the later weight of authority is that nothing short of intention to overthrow the government suffices to make out the offense. Significant of this trend was the disposition of a late nineteenth-century effort to revive the old English doctrine. Following the Homestead Riot of 1892, several strike leaders were indicted for levying war against the state of Pennsylvania. But the indictments were later quietly dropped, while use of the treason charge met with prompt criticism even from conservative legal commentators. Violent group actions short of challenge to the existence of the government are now treated under heads of INCITEMENT, riot, or unlawful assembly.

Adhering to an enemy requires intent to render the enemy tangible support ("aid and comfort"). Established doctrine has defined "enemies" as only those against whom a legally declared STATE OF WAR exists. However, in the twentieth century, experience of such undeclared shooting hostilities as the Korean POLICE ACTION has raised the question of the continued vitality of the older limitation. The accused does not rebut the existence of the requisite intent for treason by pleading that he acted for mixed purposes, as to make money by selling goods to an enemy, if one of his purposes was in fact to render performance useful to the enemy. However, the accused may seek to persuade the court that he acted solely for a nontreasonable purpose, as when out of parental affection a father gave shelter to his son who was present in the country in wartime as an enemy agent. So, too, one whom the outbreak of war finds in a hostile country probably will not be found to have had treasonable intent merely because he took a job there to meet the necessities of earning a living, though the employment may have made some contributions to the enemy's strength.

In addition to proving wrongful intent, the government must prove that the accused committed some overt act to carry out his treasonable purpose. The calculated omission from the constitutional definition of treason of any counterpart of the English charge of compassing the death of the king underlines the requirement of proving overt action. The function of the overt act element, said the Supreme Court in Cramer v. United States, is to ensure "that mere mental attitudes or expression should not be treason." However, the Court's opinion in Cramer clouded definition of the requirement thus put on the prosecution; the Court seemed to say that the act must be of such character as itself to be evidence of the treasonable intent—a position apparently contrary to the emphasis common in other court rulings that the intent and the act elements are distinct. But in HAUPT V. UNITED STATES (1947) the Court somewhat clarified the matter: the behavior of the accused proved by the required testimony of two witnesses need not on its face evidence treasonable intent; an act apparently innocent, such as a transfer of money, might suffice if, in the light of other evidence of the context of the action, what the accused did could fairly be understood to aid an enemy. However, Haupt indicated that evidence of the context illuminating the significance of the overt act must also be supplied by two witnesses to the same circumstances. On the other hand, by the weight of authority, to prove the offense the prosecution need not establish that the accused succeeded in delivering aid to the enemy; it is enough that he took overt action to attempt delivery, though the Cramer opinion also contains language suggesting that effective delivery of aid should be shown. Mindful of abuses of charges of treason to suppress peaceful political opposition, English doctrine, adopted by judges in the United States, declares that a meeting to plan against the government is not a sufficient overt act to establish treason; conspiracy to levy war is not the levy of war, said Coke. But there is no comparable line of authority that a meeting to plan giving aid to an enemy is insufficient as an overt act of adherence to the enemy.

About the constitutional requirement of "testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act" hangs the uncertainty earlier noted, created by the Supreme Court opinion in Cramer, whether the act so proved must itself evidence treasonable intent or constitute actual delivery of aid to the enemy. Otherwise, rulings under the two-witness requirement have been straightforward. Courts have shown care to enforce the substance of the requirement, but not with doctrinaire rigidity. Two witnesses must testify directly to the act charged in the indictment; it will not suffice that there is two-witness evidence of a separate act from which it might be inferred that the charged act occurred. Two-witness testimony to the accused's admissions of an act does not meet the requirement of two-witness evidence to the act itself. However, the testimony of the two witnesses need not be identical or precise as to all aspects of the behavior cited as the overt act, nor need the testimony minutely cover every element into which an episode of behavior might be analyzed; the evidence is sufficient if it joins in identifying what reasonable jurors can regard as a connected transaction. Thus in Haupt the Supreme Court held that it was not fatal to the government's case that two-witness testimony did not show the enemy agent entering the accused's apartment, where it did show that he entered the building in which the accused had an apartment, and entered only as the accused's licensee, since the prosecution showed by other two-witness testimony that no other tenant in the building sheltered the agent.

This record suggests regard for the restrictive policy embodied in the constitutional history of treason. However, probably in large measure it also indicates that through most of its history the country has enjoyed substantial political stability. In any event the record shows little vindictive resort to the charge and few cases carrying politically controversial tones. Most actions taken against Loyalists in the American Revolution were to confiscate property. Because of the scale of the CIVIL WAR and the de facto belligerent status which events assigned the Confederacy, there was no material resort to treason prosecutions in that contest, though clearly those who took arms in behalf of the seceded states levied war against the United States. JEFFERSON DAVIS, President of the Confederacy, was indicted for treason. But the government faced strong arguments that it improperly charged treason against those conducting a rebel government which had achieved the status of a recognized belligerent. Though the government did not formally concede the point, neither did it bring Davis to trial on the indictment. Treason cases arising out of the Whiskey Rebellion (1795), the Fries disturbance (1799–1800), the Burr conspiracy (1807), THOMAS JEFFERSON's embargo (1808), and resistance to enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Law (1850), grew out of difficult domestic political issues but were of limited practical impact. Treason prosecutions by state authorities incident to the Dorr Rebellion in Rhode Island (1844) and John Brown's raid in Virginia (1859) were exceptional for their broad political bearing. Some cases carried tones of domestic ideological disputes over the country's entry into WORLD WAR I. But this cast was notably absent from treason prosecutions incident to World War II.

By its terms the constitutional definition of treason puts some limits on governmental agencies in dealing with subversion. Congress may not increase the categories of conduct which the government may prosecute under the name of treason, nor may it extend the reach of the offense by including under the heads of adherence to enemies or levying war conduct lacking the historic elements of those crimes, or by mandating an extensive view of the evidence deemed relevant to establishing the elements of such treasons. The treason clause pointedly restricts Congress's authority to fixing penalties for the crime, and the position of the clause in Article III (establishing the JUDICIAL POWER of the United States) underlines the implication that problems of applying the law of treason are ultimately for the courts. In their turn, federal judges have generally found in the language and history of Article III, section 3, a mandate against extending the range of the offense in doubtful cases. The two-witness requirement implies a further limitation on Congress. In light of that strict limitation on the prosecution's case, Congress should not have authority to avoid the two-witness requirement simply by changing labels and legislating under other names against offenses that involve all the elements of treason within the constitutional definition. However, the Supreme Court's decision in EX PARTE QUIRIN (1942) cast doubt on the validity of this analysis. One of several Nazi agents landed secretly on the east coast of the United States to sabotage war production plants was an American citizen. The Court rejected the argument that he must be prosecuted for treason by adhering to the enemy, and not for an offense against the laws of war incorporated in an act of Congress. Clearly the accused had committed treason. But the Court focused on the fact that the offense under the laws of war included another element—that the accused, having the status of an enemy belligerent, had passed the country's defenses in civilian dress with a hostile purpose.

Though it approaches the borderline of propriety, the Court's decision in Quirin might find support in analogues that date from the First Congress. There is no evidence that those who adopted the limiting constitutional definition of "treason" meant thereby to bar legislators from creating other crimes of subversion, the elements of which did not turn on the distinctive character of levying war or adhering to enemies. Congress in fact has defined and provided for punishment of other offenses of subversive or hostile activity against the security of the government, and federal courts have sustained such statutes. United States v. Rosenberg (1953) presented charges of conspiracy to violate the Federal ESPIONAGE ACT, which provides penalties for "whoever, with intent or reason to believe that it is to be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of a foreign nation," communicates or delivers to any foreign government or its agents information relating to the national defense. The federal court of appeals held that the treason clause did not bar creation of this offense, because "in the Rosenbergs' case, an essential element of treason, giving aid to an "enemy' is irrelevant to the espionage offense." In United States v. Drummond (1965) the same appeals court dealt with a charge of conspiracy to violate the same statute by a serviceman in the United States Navy who between 1957 and 1962 delivered classified military materials to Soviet agents. Reaffirming that the treason clause did not bar creation of the espionage offense, the court found it "unnecessary" to invoke the difference relied on in Rosenberg, because it found differences in the required mental element in the crimes of treason and espionage. It pointed out that the espionage act required a showing only (1) that the defendant transmitted information with intent "or reason to believe" that it would be used for a forbidden result; and (2) with intent or reason to believe that it would be used either "to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of a foreign nation." In contrast, the court implied, treason requires proof of a specific intent, and a specific intent both to aid an enemy and to injure the United States.

Though the constitutional definition of treason may do no more formally than limit the kinds of conduct that may be prosecuted under the name of treason, there are respects in which it may have broader practical effect in restricting action of official agencies. The Constitution abolished the barbarous or oppressive penalties that were once a distinguishing mark of the crime. But legislation still allows heavy penalties for the offense; in light of Supreme Court limitations put on resort to the death penalty in other crimes there may be doubt whether a court may order execution of a convicted traitor, but the law still permits imposing a life sentence. Thus it may be of consequence whether the prosecutor can make out a case of "treason" or is limited to another charge which may carry a lesser penalty. Political history teaches that the mere accusation of treason, rather than of another crime, carries peculiar intimidation and stigma. Federalist treason prosecutions arising out of the Whiskey Rebellion (1794) were designed to stain supporters of Jefferson and JAMES MADISON with the imputation of subversive intent. The Jefferson administration sought to use the charge of treason (1808) to make examples against widespread opposition to the Embargo imposed to press England to respect rights of neutral use of the high seas. Democratic accusations of treason against the HARTFORD CONVENTION protesting the conduct of war with England (1814–1815) helped that venture to weaken a tottering Federalist party structure. A prosecution for treason undertook to discredit opposition to enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Law (1850). To break rank-and-file morale, Pennsylvania authorities brought treason indictments against leaders of the Homestead Strike (1892). In the cold war emotions of the 1950s, epithets of "treason" were employed in reckless attacks on the record of Democratic administrations in conducting relations with communist Russia and China. Such episodes validate the cautions expressed among those who adopted the national Constitution, that the definition of treason be limited so that this country would not repeat the old English experience of using the charge to destroy legitimate, peaceful political competition. Adoption of the FIRST AMENDMENT guarantees of free speech, press, assembly, and petition provided more direct and comprehensive declarations of the values of free political processes, and eventually these guarantees found substantial enforcement in decisions of the Supreme Court. That the First Amendment tended to preempt the field was early indicated when it became the prime reliance of those who attacked the constitutionality of the Sedition Act of 1798. (See ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS.) However, given the extent to which concern for safeguarding peaceful public policy debate and activity figured in adopting a restrictive definition of treason, constitutional history here offers as yet unrealized possibilities for safeguarding First Amendment values.

JAMES WILLARD HURST
(1986)

Bibliography

ABRAMS, STUART E. 1976 Threats to the President and the Constitutionality of Constructive Treason. Columbia Journal of Law and Social Problems 12:351–392.

CHAPIN, BRADLEY 1964 The American Law of Treason: Revolutionary and Early National Origins. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

HILL, L. M. 1968 The Two-Witness Rule in English Treason Trials. American Journal of Legal History 12:95–111.

HURST, JAMES WILLARD 1971 The Law of Treason in the United States. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

SIMON, WALTER G. 1961 The Evolution of Treason. Tulane Law Review 35:667–704.

STILLMAN, ARTHUR M. and ARNER, FREDERICK R. 1954 Federal Case Law Concerning the Security of the United States. 83rd Congress, 2d session. Printed for the use of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office.

WIENER, FREDERICK BERNAYS 1962 Uses and Abuses of Legal History. The Law Society's Gazette 59:311–315.

TREATY OF GUADALUPE HIDALGO
9 Stat. 922 (1850)

In 1821 Mexico, having declared its independence from Spain, took control of the territory that now includes all of California, Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas, and parts of Nevada, Utah, and Colorado. But within twenty-five years, present-day Texas had been annexed by the United States, and at the end of the Mexican War the remaining areas were ceded to the United States under the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

The treaty, signed in 1848, was not ratified by the Senate until 1850; the delay was caused by the unsuccessful efforts of Republicans to attach to the treaty the WILMOT PROVISO, banning SLAVERY in the newly acquired territory. For more than a decade an important constitutional issue was debated but not resolved: the question whether the treaty's provisions preserving Spanish or Mexican local law in the territory were themselves sufficient to abolish slavery.

The Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo gave all inhabitants of the affected territory the option of becoming United States citizens or of relocating within the new Mexican borders. Although some moved to Mexico, the overwhelming majority remained at home in what had become United States territory. As a result, for the first time in the nation's history United States CITIZENSHIP was conferred on people who were not citizens of any state. This action added fuel to a constitutional debate about the relation of national citizenship to state citizenship, a debate that continued until the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT was ratified in 1868.

The international border remained unmarked and for most purposes unreal. Until 1894 there was no formal control over the border; United States IMMIGRATION statistics recorded the arrival of Mexicans only at seaports. Many border areas remained integrated economic regions, with workers traveling in both directions to fill fluctuating labor demands. Many Mexicans, especially those in direct conflict with Americans in the border region, continued to think of the southwest as "lost" territory that was rightfully Mexico's. These views, long expressed by the Mexican government, are echoed among today's Chicanos in support of diffuse if underdeveloped positions concerning the legal (including constitutional) effects of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo: for example, that the territory rightfully belongs to Mexicans or Chicanos, or that United States violations of the treaty have voided its effects. Whatever one may think of such claims, one should appreciate the collective sense of group identification reflected in their public assertion.

GERALD P. LÓPEZ
KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Compromise of 1850; Slavery in the Territories.)

TREATY ON THE EXECUTION OF PENAL SENTENCES
24 U.S.T. 7399 (1977)

The Mexican American Treaty on the Execution of Penal Sentences was signed on November 25, 1976. Legislation implementing the treaty became law on October 28, 1977.

Since that time, thousands of prisoners have been exchanged under its provisions.

The treaty, a model for later agreements with countries such as Canada, responded to concerns about the treatment of Americans imprisoned in Mexican jails, concerns that became increasingly acute as the two countries in the 1970s began a crackdown on drug traffic from Mexico to the United States. Preexisting procedures for monitoring and improving the conditions of Americans incarcerated in Mexico, mainly action taken by United States consular offices, had proven unsatisfactory.

Under the treaty, any American imprisoned in Mexico can, with his consent and the consent of Mexico and the United States, be sent to serve his sentence in the American prison system. Mexican prisoners can similarly be transferred from the United States to Mexico. Once transferred, the prisoner's sentence can be reduced by any procedures such as parole or conditional release applicable in the receiving country. The treaty covers only acts criminal in both countries, and does not extend to political crimes or to infractions of IMMIGRATION laws or "purely military" laws.

The attorney general administers the obligations of the United States under the treaty. The implementing legislation requires the attorney general to verify the prisoner's consent to transfer, and also provides a right to appointed counsel during the verification proceedings should the prisoner be unable to pay.

Lower federal courts have held that the treaty does not violate the Constitution despite the fact that under it the United States incarcerates United States citizens whose trials may not have complied with the BILL OF RIGHTS.

GERALD L. LÓPEZ
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Prisoners' Rights.)

TREATY POWER

To enhance the pledged word of the United States in foreign relations, the Framers of the Constitution granted to the President, in cooperation with the Senate, the power to make and enter into treaties. They also provided that this power should vest exclusively in the federal government. The Framers neglected to define the term "treaty," however, leaving its meaning to subsequent clarification. Today, under international law, the term is used for all manner of formal instruments of agreement between or among nations that, regardless of the titles used, create relationships of reciprocal rights and obligations. Under United States law, the term "treaty" usually denotes only those international agreements that are concluded by the federal government and ratified by the President upon receiving the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the SENATE. All other international agreements—EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS, for example—are brought into force for the United States upon a constitutional basis other than senatorial advice and consent.

The process of treaty making involves negotiation, signature, ratification, exchange of instruments of ratification, publication, and proclamation; but, other than prescribing that two-thirds of the senators present must give their advice and consent to the ratification of a treaty, the Constitution is silent on the subject. In the early days of the Republic, it was thought that the Senate would participate with the President by giving its advice and consent at every negotiating juncture. Today, it is the accepted practice for the President to solicit the advice and consent of the Senate only after a treaty has been negotiated and signed, although in many—especially important—instances, Senate and even House committees play active roles in advance of the conclusion of a treaty, sometimes on their own initiative, sometimes at the behest of the executive branch.

Once the negotiation of a treaty is complete, the President decides whether to sign the treaty and, if so, whether to submit it to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification. If the Senate is perceived as hostile, the President may choose to let the treaty die rather than suffer defeat. If the Senate receives the treaty, it refers the treaty to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which may or may not report the treaty to the full Senate for its advice and consent. Committee inaction is the usual method for withholding consent to controversial treaties. Sometimes the executive branch will request that the committee withhold or suspend action. Few treaties are defeated by direct vote of the full Senate.

After the Senate gives its advice and consent to ratification, often subject to "reservations," "understandings," and "declarations" initiated by the Senate or the executive branch itself (to clarify, alter, or amend the treaty), the treaty is returned to the President for ratification. The President may choose to ratify the treaty or to return it to the Senate for further consideration. The President also may choose not to ratify the treaty at that time.

After a treaty is ratified, which is a national act, some international act—typically the exchange or deposit of instruments of ratification—usually is required to bring the treaty into force. Also upon ratification, the President issues a proclamation making the treaty officially public. There is disagreement over whether proclamation of a treaty is constitutionally required before the treaty takes effect domestically, but it is the norm to issue such a proclamation which, in any event, is useful in determining the date on which the treaty enters into force.

The Constitution does not limit the treaty power explicitly. Moreover, no treaty or treaty provision has ever been held unconstitutional. Nevertheless, it is generally agreed that such limitations exist. For example, the Supreme Court held, in REID V. COVERT (1957), that treaties may not contravene any constitutional prohibition, such as those in the BILL OF RIGHTS or in the THIRTEENTH, FOURTEENTH, and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS. Further, although MISSOURI V. HOLLAND (1920) largely disposed of the argument that the subject matter of treaties is limited by the TENTH AMENDMENT, it remains possible, as the Court hinted in DeGeofroy v. Riggs (1890), that the treaty power may be limited by "restraints . . . arising from the nature . . . of the states."

Beyond these limitations, however, the treaty power is perceived as a broad power, extending to all matters of "international concern," a phrase that some claim limits the treaty power, but that the courts have used to illustrate the power's broad scope. Ordinarily it is difficult to show that a treaty matter is not of international concern even in the presence of domestic effects.

In addition to granting the power to make and enter into treaties, the Framers of the Constitution provided that resulting treaties, together with the duly enacted laws of the United States, should constitute part of the "supreme law of the land." Thus, as well as giving rise to international legal obligations, treaties have force as domestic law, to be applied as federal statutes and consequently to prevail at all times over inconsistent state laws (assuming no conflict with the Constitution).

Still, not all treaties are automatically binding on American courts. Aside from the general constitutionality requirement, two additional conditions must obtain for treaties to have domestic effect. First, a treaty must not conflict with a subsequent act of Congress. This is in keeping with the judiciary's interpretation of the SUPREMACY CLAUSE, ranking treaties and acts of Congress equally and therefore ruling that the law later in time prevails. With the sole exception of Cook v. United States (1933), cases in this area have involved conflicts between an earlier treaty and a later statute, with the latter prevailing. The courts presume, however, that Congress does not intend to supersede treaties, and consequently the courts are disposed toward interpretations that will achieve compatibility between treaties and federal statutes on the same subject.

Second, for a treaty to bind courts it must be "self-executing" or, alternatively, "non-self-executing" but supported by enabling legislation. Such was the holding in Foster v. Neilson (1829). Judicial decisions vary widely in their application of this requirement, however. The distinction between "self-executing" and "non-self-executing" treaties is more easily stated than applied. A determination that a treaty fits one category or the other often may be shown to depend on subjective, at times political, considerations.

Although the Constitution is silent on the question of who has the power to suspend or terminate treaties and under what circumstances, it is generally accepted that the President has such power, without the advice and consent of the Senate, based on the President's established constitutional authority to conduct the foreign affairs of the United States. A challenge to the President's authority in this connection has thus far arisen only in the one case of GOLDWATER V. CARTER (1979), and that case was decided, on purely jurisdictional grounds, against the challenge. Were the Senate to consent to a treaty on the condition that its advice and consent would be required for the treaty's suspension or termination, however, such a condition might be binding on the President. Also, based on the power of Congress to declare war, it is arguable that the entire Congress (not just the Senate) might legitimately claim a voice in the termination of a treaty where such termination might threaten war.

BURNS H. WESTON
(1986)

Bibliography

AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE 1965 Restatement of the Law, Second—Foreign Relations Law of the United States. Pages 361–448. St. Paul, Minn.: American Law Institute.

——— 1980 Restatement of the Law—Foreign Relations Law of the United States (Revised), Tentative Draft No. 1. Pages 71–144. Philadelphia: American Law Institute.

FOSTER, J. 1901 The Treaty-Making Power under the Constitution. Yale Law Journal 11:69–79.

HENKIN, LOUIS 1972 Foreign Affairs and the Constitution. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

MCLAUGHLIN, C. H. 1958 The Scope of the Treaty Power in the United States. Minnesota Law Review 42:709–771; 43: 651–725.

WRIGHT, QUINCY 1919 The Constitutionality of Treaties. American Journal of International Law 13:242–266.

TRENCHARD, JOHN

See: Cato's Letters

TRESPASS

A person commits trespass when he or she enters or remains on the property of another without the permission of the property owner. Violation of trespass laws may result in civil action by the property owner or criminal prosecution. Constitutional issues arise in civil or criminal trespass actions when a defendant claims that the basis for his or her exclusion from the property violates the Constitution. A defendant may assert that she was excluded from the property because she engaged in an activity protected by the Constitution (such as the FREEDOM OF SPEECH protected by the FIRST AMENDMENT) or because she is a member of a constitutionally protected class (such as a racial group) disfavored by the property owner.

If a property owner uses the property to perform a public function or if the property owner has become associated with the government in the operation of a business located on the property, the owner may not exclude persons on a basis that is incompatible with constitutional values. A public function is an activity that traditionally has been within the exclusive province of government, such as the operation of a municipality. When a state allowed a private company to own and operate a company town, which included residential and business districts, the First Amendment protection for freedom of speech prohibited exclusion of a woman who wished to distribute religious literature within the town. Operation of a store or SHOPPING CENTER on privately owned property is not held to be a public function. Thus, the First Amendment is not violated when a shopping center owner relies on trespass laws to exclude persons from the shopping mall who wish to engage in speech, PICKETING, or distribution of leaflets.

The Supreme Court will not allow trespass laws to be used to exclude persons from private property because of their race or political activity if the property owner has been directed or encouraged by the government to use the trespass laws in such a discriminatory manner. The Court has held that statutes requiring or specifically allowing a restaurant owner to provide separate areas for customers of different races encouraged racial segregation so that the owner could not use the trespass laws to exclude persons seeking service on a race neutral, integrated basis. Similarly, the owner of a restaurant operated in a government building could not exclude persons from the premises because of their race.

Federal statutes or state law may also limit the use of trespass laws. The National Labor Relations Board, for example, may order store or shopping center owners to allow labor picketers to walk on privately owned sidewalks or parking lots adjacent to businesses involved in a labor dispute. A state supreme court may interpret its state constitution to prohibit shopping center owners from excluding persons who wish to engage in political speech. These state and federal limitations on property owners' use of the trespass laws to exclude persons from their property do not violate any right guaranteed the property owners by the United States Constitution.

JOHN E. NOWAK
(1986)

Bibliography

NOWAK, JOHN E.; ROTUNDA, RONALD D.; and YOUNG, J. NELSON 1983 Constitutional Law. Pages 497–525. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

VAN ALSTYNE, WILLIAM W. and KARST, KENNETH L. 1961 State Action. Stanford Law Review 14:3–58.

TREVETT v. WEEDEN
(Rhode Island, 1786)

A Rhode Island case of 1786, this is the best known of the alleged state precedents for JUDICIAL REVIEW. The Superior Court of Judicature, the state's highest tribunal, did not hold a state act unconstitutional but it did construe it in a manner that left it inoperative. The case arose under a force act passed by the legislature to compel observance of the state paper-money laws; anyone refusing to accept paper money at par with specie was triable without a jury or right of appeal "according to the laws of the land" and on conviction was subject to a 100 pound fine and costs or be committed "till sentence be performed." Trevett filed an INFORMATION before the state chief justice charging that Weeden refused tender of paper money at face value. James Varnum, representing Weeden, argued that the force act violated the right to TRIAL BY JURY, guaranteed by the unwritten state constitution, which was FUNDAMENTAL LAW that limited legislative powers; the legislature could make law "not repugnant to the constitution" and the judiciary had "the sole power of judging those laws . . . but cannot admit any act of the legislative as law, which is against the constitution."

The court refused to decide the issue, ruling that it lacked JURISDICTION. Its JUDGMENT was simply that Trevett's complaint "does not come under the cognizance of the Justices . . . and it is hereby dismissed." Orally, however, some of the judges, according to the newspaper accounts, declared the force act "to be repugnant and unconstitutional," and one of them pointed out that its phrase, "without trial by jury, according to the laws of the land," was self-contradictory and thus unenforceable.

The governor called the legislature into special session, and the legislature summoned the high court judges to explain their reasons, the legislature said, for holding an act "unconstitutional, and so absolutely void," an "unprecedented" judgment that tended "to abolish the legislative authority." Judge David Howell, the court's main spokesman, defended judicial review and judicial independence. Although he summarized Varnum's argument that the act was unconstitutional, Howell insisted that the legislature had confused the argument, for the judgment was just that the complaint was "cognizable."

The legislature, unconvinced by the court's technical distinction, recognized that the judgment made the paper money laws unenforceable; in effect the court had exercised judicial review, which the legislature deemed subversive of its supremacy. Howell, by contrast, had claimed that if the legislature could pass on the court's judgment,

"the Legislature would become the supreme judiciary—a perversion of power totally subversive of civil liberty." Anticipating a motion to unseat them, the judges presented a memorial demanding DUE PROCESS OF LAW. Varnum and the attorney general supported them, arguing that they could not be removed except on a criminal charge. The motion to remove the judges failed, and the legislature even repealed the force act, but it revenged itself on the judges by failing to reelect four of the five members when their annual terms expired, and by ousting Congressman Varnum and the state attorney general. Varnum published a one-sided pamphlet on the case, giving it publicity even in Philadelphia while the CONSTITUTION CONVENTION OF 1787 met. Although the pamphlet popularized the doctrine of judicial review, in Rhode Island no judge endorsed it for seventy years after.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

TRIAL BY JURY

The right to jury trial is provided in three clauses of the Constitution of the United States. Jury trial in federal criminal cases is required by Article III, which is otherwise given to defining the role of the federal judiciary: "The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of IMPEACHMENT, shall be by Jury." This provision is repeated in the Sixth Amendment, which is otherwise given to the rights of the accused: "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and PUBLIC TRIAL, by an impartial jury. . . ." The BILL OF RIGHTS also included a provision for jury trial in civil matters; this right is embodied in the SEVENTH AMENDMENT: "In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved. . . ."

The federal Constitution makes no explicit provision regarding the right to trial by jury in proceedings in state courts. State constitutions contain many similar provisions, although the interpretations of the right in state courts have varied significantly from the standards applied in federal courts. Substantial variation survived the enactment of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, which for the first time subjected the state courts to the strictures of the DUE PROCESS clause. It was early held, and appears still to be the law, that the Fourteenth Amendment does not incorporate the Seventh, that there is no federal constitutional requirement of a right to jury trial in civil cases in state court. (See WALKER V. SAUVINET.) More recently, the Supreme Court has held that due process does require some form of access to a jury in major criminal prosecutions in state courts. (See DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA.)

Although the institution of jury trial has been known to American and English courts for a millennium, there have been significant changes in its form and nature over that period. Indeed, the origins of the institution are shrouded in the uncertainties of prehistory. Germanic tribes, like most stable societies, made early use of laymen in official resolution of disputes. Such practices were well known to Saxons and their neighbors at the time of the Norman Conquest in 1066. Nevertheless, at that time and place, more common resort was made to various ordeals, which were essentially religious services purporting to reveal the will of the deity. One variation on trial by ordeal was trial by battle, in which the Saxon disputants, or their champions, waged a ritual struggle to determine the side of the diety. Yet another variation was trial by wager of law, which engaged the services of the neighbors as oath helpers. By their willingness in numbers to risk salvation to stand up for a disputant, the oath helpers were perceived to express a divine will. In some sense witnesses and in some sense decision makers, these laymen can be viewed as early jurors. The nature, origin, and extent of the use of such institutions in the several shires of Saxon England doubtless varied and are the subject of some uncertainty.

The royal judges appointed by Norman kings embraced Saxon traditions, including trial by ordeal, oath helping, wager of law, and the use of laymen to share responsibility for official decisions. A papal decree in 1215, which withdrew the clergy from participation in trials by ordeal, had the effect of withdrawing the imprimatur of the deity from the decisions of the royal courts. This apparently stimulated interest in alternative methods of trial that might deflect some of the odium of decision from the royal surrogate. Thus, the PETIT JURY (to be distinguished from the GRAND JURY) emerged in more nearly contemporary form in the thirteenth century as a feature of the Norman royal courts.

Thirteenth-century jury trial emerged chiefly in proceedings of TRESPASS, a form of action in which the lash of royal power was applied to maintain the peace of the realm. As trespass and its derivative forms of action came to dominate the COMMON LAW, so trial by jury became the dominant method of trial in civil matters coming before the royal law courts. Thus, jury trial was associated with the various forms of trespass on the case (from which the modern law of torts emerged), of assumpsit (from which the modern law of contracts emerged), and of replevin, an action important to the development of personal property rights. Indeed, one reason for the demise of some of the earlier royal writs, such as the writ of right, or even the writ of debt, was dissatisfaction with the mode of trial that accompanied the use of such writs.

A concurrent evolution led to the emergence of the jury as an important element of criminal justice in the royal courts. The royal inquest was a feature of early Norman royal governance; it was an important device for centralizing power in the royal government and was a proceeding for calling local institutions and affairs to account. The grand jury was a group of local subjects of the crown who were called upon to investigate, or answer from their own knowledge, regarding the observance by their neighbors of the obligations imposed upon them by royal command. By stages, the inquest came to be followed by a further proceeding to impose royal punishment on apparent wrongdoers. In the latter half of the twelfth century, the royal government was initiating such enforcement proceedings, thus supplementing the trespass proceedings which had earlier provided protection for the peace of the realm, but only on the initiative of a victim of wrongdoing. By 1164, there was a clear beginning of the use of petit juries in crown proceedings. By 1275, it was established that the petit jury of twelve neighbors would try the guilt of an accused, provided the accused consented to such a means of trial, which he was coerced to do.

One major theme in the evolution of the right to jury trial in royal courts was the development of a system of accountability to constrain lawlessness by juries. For some time, the only method available to royal courts to deal with such behavior was to prosecute (or, more precisely, to attaint) the jurors for rendering a false verdict. If a second jury so decided, a jury could be punished for this offense. The harshness of this remedy led to its demise, for the attaint jurors were reluctant to expose an earlier jury to disgrace and punishment. In the seventeenth century the writ of attaint was gradually replaced by the practice of granting a new trial when the first verdict was against the weight of the evidence. This practice came to be equally applicable to criminal as well as civil proceedings, except insofar as an accused could not twice be placed in jeopardy of conviction. (See DOUBLE JEOPARDY.)

A second major theme in the evolution of the right to jury trial in civil cases was its confinement to the common law courts when the Chancery emerged as an alternative system of adjudicating the use of the royal power. English chancellors were exercising a form of judicial power as early as the fifteenth century. An important feature of the Chancery (or proceedings in EQUITY as they came to be known) was the absence of the jury. Another important feature was the use by the chancellor of a broader range of judicial remedies, most prominently including the INJUNCTION, which were personal commands of the judge under threat of punishment for contumacy.

Nineteenth-century English law reform ultimately brought about the demise not only of equity as a separate judicial system, but also of the right to jury trial in civil cases. In a search for greater efficiency and dispatch, the jury system in the law courts was modified and limited, so that the jury trial is now seldom used in the United Kingdom, or in other parts of the Commonwealth, except in criminal cases.

The right to jury trial took quite a different turn in the United States. At the time of the Revolution, that right came to be celebrated as a means of nullifying the power of a mistrusted sovereign; hence the several constitutional provisions guaranteeing the continued exercise of the right. Moreover, there was a special mistrust of equity (where the English recognized no right to jury trial) in eighteenth-century America, based in large part on its close connection to the royal power. Accordingly, some of the states abolished it, others conferred its powers on their legislatures, while only some retained its colonial forms or created state chanceries to continue the English tradition.

In many parts of the early United States, there was a widely shared mistrust of professional lawyers and of judges drawn from that profession. Mistrust of officials in general and professional judges in particular was a feature of the Jacksonian politics of the first half of the nineteenth century, which was reflected in provisions for the election of judges and the reaffirmation of the importance of jury trial as a means of deprofessionalizing the exercise of judicial power. These political impulses were magnified in the populism of the late nineteenth century.

Indeed, the American legal profession came to be shaped in important degree around the institution of the jury; jury advocacy became in the popular mind the central activity of the American lawyer. During much of the nineteenth century, the most powerful intellectual force in American law was the work of WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, an English scholar of the previous century. Blackstone's Commentaries (1776) was the one book read by almost all American lawyers, and perhaps the only law book read by some. By no coincidence Blackstone was a staunch advocate of the right to jury trial in civil cases, an institution already in decline in his own country; his belief in the institution of the lay jury was one of his strongest links to the frontier society which he so significantly influenced.

Beginning as early as 1848 in New York, most American states adopted "merged" systems of procedure in civil cases. Merger united law and equity in a single judicial system; reformers were careful to retain the right to jury trial in actions "at law" and in some states even extended it to some matters properly described under the former system as "suits in equity." Through most of the nineteenth century, the federal courts played a secondary role in the American legal system, and Congress required their procedures to conform "as near as may be" to the procedural legislation of the states in which they sat. For the most part, this conformity seemed to apply to the forms of jury practice as well as to other details of procedure. It was not until 1938 that the FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE were promulgated for the federal courts, for the first time formally merging law and equity in federal courts in accordance with national standards. The FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE soon followed. A national system or method of conducting jury trials in federal courts for defining the scope of the jury's power and the judge's responsibility and for prescribing the limits of the right to jury trial at last emerged.

For a period of several decades following the reform era of the 1930s, the Supreme Court made the protection of the right to jury trial in civil cases a major item on its agenda. A number of its decisions enlarged on previous expectations about the scope of the right and increased the authority of the jury, for example, Beacon Theaters, Inc. v. Westover (1959) and Rogers v. Missouri Pacific Railroad Co. (Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER's dissent, 1957). Interest in the right to jury trial became very intense in the mid-1960s as a result of widespread CIVIL RIGHTS litigation, preoccupation with EQUAL PROTECTION, and the possible NULLIFICATION or impairment of federal law by locally selected juries.

In the last decade, there may have been some growth in consciousness of the disadvantages of jury trial in civil cases. Increasing attention has focused on trial efficiency, the effectiveness of the law, and alternative methods of dispute resolution. But it is too early to say that we have entered a period in which the distinctly American institution of jury trial will be seriously reexamined.

As much as for any procedural right, the beauty of the right to jury trial is in the eye of the beholder. For as long as there have been lay decision makers, there have been strong-minded critics and devoted defenders who have disputed the wisdom of the system with equal vehemence. The practice rests on values so basic and so unsuitable to proof or disproof that the debate seems unlikely to terminate. It is at least in part for this reason that so many reforms, from the Seventh Amendment to the Rules Enabling Act, sought to evade debate on the fundamental issues by ostensibly preserving the status quo in regard to the right to jury trial, leaving the issues of the scope of jury trial to other times and other forums. Rarely has Congress or any state legislature been able to address the merit of the right to jury trial without having its deliberative processes impaled on the sharp point of the debate. For the same reason, decisions to expand or contract, preserve or alter, existing practices have been and will continue to be greatly influenced by the predominance of one view or the other of the merits of the institution.

Supporters of the right to jury trial regard it as a keystone of democratic government. It is, indeed, a method of sharing power with those who are governed. It deflects the hostility toward public institutions otherwise engendered by the lash of public power. It is a remedy for judicial megalomania, the occupational hazard of judging. Particularly in regard to criminal legislation, the right to jury trial provides a limit on the power of legislatures who eventually must countenance the nonenforceability of laws which citizens are unwilling to enforce. It is also a means of education: jurors learn about the law and share their learning with families and neighbors. In all these respects, it engenders trust. In general, supporters and critics alike agree that those benefits are more substantial in criminal than in civil litigation.

Critics observe, however, that juries are inefficient and may well be quite inaccurate in their perceptions and decisions. Involving many people in the making of a decision is inherently inefficient. It is necessary to invest time and expense in the selection of jurors. Trials proceed much more slowly because of the shorter attention span of lay persons in courtroom contexts and because additional participants entail additional interruptions and delays for personal reasons. Because of the inexperience of jurors, there has developed a substantial body of rules governing the admission of EVIDENCE which have as their purpose the protection of the jury from confusion and inflammation of prejudice. These strictures operate at times to increase the complexity of trials and to enlarge the possibility of mistrial or new trial, which is the result of error in the application of such rules of evidence. For these reasons, jury trials take substantially longer than nonjury trials and are substantially more expensive for the participants.

Moreover, as other critics emphasize, the deliberations of juries are undisciplined. Although jurors tend to be conscientious in the application of the governing law, the controlling rules are often dimly understood and not infrequently sacrificed in order to secure the requisite consensus. Whatever guidance or control the trial judge may supply, the chance of erratic decision is greater in jury than in nonjury trials.

Other adverse factors are less frequently mentioned. Jury service is in many cases a substantial burden to jurors; although they receive token payment, they are coerced to perform a duty that can sometimes be onerous. Particularly in communities characterized by disorder and social disintegration, jurors may even be frequent objects of intimidation and bribery; they are, in general, more difficult to protect from these vices than are judges, and they are perhaps also more vulnerable to such pernicious influences.

To a substantial degree, the perceived merits or demerits of the system will depend on particular features of the system which are designed to respond to the problems the system presents. Unfortunately, techniques for diminishing the demerits of jury trial often tend also to diminish its merits: the more control exercised over juries, the less advantage there is in assembling them. In the final analysis, almost every issue regarding the right to jury trial turns on the degree to which power is to be confided in professional officers of the law. Consensus on that basic issue being so distant a prospect, the contours of the institution as described below must be regarded as an unstable compromise, quite subject to change.

Instability is nowhere more clearly exemplified than in regard to JURY SIZE. Perhaps as early as the thirteenth century, Englishmen understood that a jury is a group composed of twelve persons. The method of selecting the jury might have varied, the duties assigned to the group may have been altered, but the one element of stability was their number, twelve. Some states experimented with the use of smaller juries, particularly in the trial of lesser crimes, and the Supreme Court in WILLIAMS V. FLORIDA (1970) held that the use of such groups as six is not itself a deprivation of due process of law. It was, however, long presumed that a common law jury is twelve and that such a number was required in federal courts by the Sixth and Seventh Amendments, unless a smaller number be agreed to by the parties. This presumption is reflected in the language of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 48, which authorizes parties to agree to smaller juries.

Nevertheless, most federal district courts have in the last decade adopted local rules of court designating civil juries to consist of six persons. The validity of these local rules was sustained by the Supreme Court in Colegrove v. Battin (1973). The Court rested its decision on the absence of any straightforward legislative prohibition on juries of less than twelve and on the dubious assumption that there were no solid data demonstrating that twelve-person juries reach substantially different verdicts from six-person juries. The Court also manifested a conviction that six-person juries are more efficient than those composed of larger numbers, a conviction which is itself not amenable to solid empirical proof. However, in BALLEW V. GEORGIA (1978) the Court held that a five-member group was too small to be properly deliberative, representative, and free from intimidation and therefore did not afford due process. The Court's decisions have stimulated increased interest in the scientific examination of judicial institutions; the decisions have also called into question other traditional presumptions about juries, none of which carries more historical weight than did the tradition of twelve.

A second traditional feature of the common law jury has been the requirement of JURY UNANIMITY in reaching a verdict. Some states have experimented with the acceptance of verdicts supported by juries that are less than unanimous. In general, such provisions have called for super-majorities, such as a vote of ten or twelve jurors. The Supreme Court held in Minneapolis and St. Louis Railway Co. v. Bombolis (1916) that such provisions were not denials of due process for state court proceedings involving issues of federal law, but later, in BURCH V. LOUISIANA (1979), it invalidated a Louisiana law that authorized verdicts of conviction on the basis of a five-to-one vote of a six-person jury. Despite these variations at the state level, however, the unanimity requirement remains a standard feature of federal jury practice, unless, as the Federal Rules authorize in civil cases, the parties agree on a lesser majority.

One effect of the unanimity requirement is to assure that the jury will deliberate on its decision rather than settle for a mere nose count. A secondary effect is to increase the likelihood that no decision will be reached, with the result that a new trial before a new jury will be required, unless the controversy is privately resolved without further litigation. A third effect is to enhance the role and responsibility of each individual juror, making each an important actor with power to control the ultimate outcome of the process. To the extent that the jury is intended to be a representative body, the unanimity requirement tends to protect litigants and interests that are associated with minority groups.

A third important feature of traditional common law jury practice was the mode of selecting the jury. Using the Norman nomenclature, the court administrative arm assembles a venire of citizens from whom the jury will be selected. Veniremen may be excused or disqualified by the judge and those remaining are then subject to a further process of selection by the parties. The latter process, known as VOIR DIRE examination, proceeds from a questioning of the jurors to their challenge by the parties on grounds of cause, or peremptorily if the parties would simply prefer other members of the venire. Peremptory challenges have perhaps always been limited in number, a somewhat larger number being allowed in criminal than in civil cases.

In recent decades, this traditional process has been subject to substantial criticism and pressure. Criticism proceeds from the premise that the jury should be in some degree representative of the community it helps to govern. Most of the criticism has been directed at the process of selecting veniremen, the usual earlier practice in this country having been to authorize a court administrator to select prospective jurors by methods that were usually elitist in premise and effect. In many communities, the usual method was the "key man" system, which invoked the assistance of community leaders to identify citizens of stature who would be deserving of the trust reposed in jurors. Such systems were common in federal courts. Indeed, it was not uncommon for a federal court to maintain a BLUE RIBBON list of veniremen of more than ordinary intelligence and experience who might be summoned to decide cases requiring more than ordinary skill on the part of the decision maker. Such methods produced juries that were anything but representative, in the proportional sense, of the communities from which they were selected.

In a legal environment favoring egalitarianism, such practices were doomed. As early as 1945, in Thiel v. Southern Pacific Co., the Supreme Court upheld a challenge by a federal litigant to a venire selection method that seemed likely to result in underrepresentation of the working class in local jurors. In Carter v. Jury Commission of Greene County (1970), the Supreme Court refused to declare a state key-man system invalid on its face absent a showing that the scheme was purposefully adopted as a means of preventing some group (usually blacks) from being represented. Nevertheless, when such a scheme underrepresents a group consistently, a prima facie case of JURY DISCRIMINATION is established and the scheme may then be found unconstitutional as applied, as in Turner v. Fouche (1970). Congress anticipated these holdings by enacting federal jury selection legislation in 1968. Current legislation does repose some authority in local federal courts to administer jury selection, on condition that their methods produce juries that bear proximate resemblances to randomness. Of course, individual litigants are not entitled under the statute or the Constitution to have a jury that actually reflects the demography of the community; all that is assured is that the method of selection be one that is reasonably likely to produce such a panel.

In recent years, mounting attention has been given to the process of peremptory challenge and the practice of some local prosecutors to use these challenges to prevent minority representation on particular juries, especially those called to try minority members on serious criminal charges. The Supreme Court has held that a prosecutor's use of peremptory challenges in any single case is immune from attack; the Court held in SWAIN V. ALABAMA (1965) that the very concept of peremptory challenges entailed the right to act without explanation. Still, the Court did leave open the possibility that systematic use of peremptories to exclude members of some group might be found to violate the equal protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment. In subsequent cases, however, proving to the Court's satisfaction that systematic discrimination did exist has been virtually impossible. Some state courts have gone beyond the federal standards and ruled that peremptory challenge of veniremen on the basis of membership in any group violates provisions of their state constitutions, for example, California in People v. Wheeler (1978).

Partly as a result of the practice of making juries more representative, a new issue has arisen regarding the competence of juries to deal with intricate technical disputes beyond the ken of ordinary citizens. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals held in Matsushita Electric Industrial Company v. Zenith Radio Corporation (1980) that the Seventh Amendment is subject to the Fifth Amendment, that the use of juries in very complex civil cases may be a denial of due process of law. This question, also, has not reached the Supreme Court.

Litigants having a right to jury trial are entitled to a jury decision only on questions of fact, not on matters of law. The distinction between questions of fact and law can be stated clearly enough: the former pertain to the specific events in dispute; the latter to the legal principles to be applied. But the application of the distinction is often problematic. For this reason, juries often have to deal with issues containing substantial elements of legal interpretation. The classic example, which arises in both civil and criminal contexts, is a decision applying a general standard of negligence to the conduct of the accused or the defendant; the general standard takes more specific shape in the minds of jurors as they apply it to the events at hand.

Since the seventeenth century, it has been the responsibility of the trial judge to assure that the controlling law is obeyed by the jury; the trial judge is accountable to the appellate court for the effective performance of this duty. There are several steps in the usual common law jury trial at which the trial judge is obliged to perform this function.

A major function of the judge at a jury trial is to instruct the jury on the controlling law. This instruction is usually the last event before the jury retires to deliberate. If either party makes a timely objection to the judge's statement of law in his charge to the jury, any error in the instructions will be a solid ground for reversal.

In a civil trial, the judge should not instruct the jury at all unless there is a dispute in the evidence presented which might raise some doubt in a reasonable mind or about which jurors might reasonably differ. If the judge finds that there is no such dispute, he should direct the jury to find a verdict for the part entitled under the law to JUDGMENT. In cases of doubt about the application of this standard, the judge may prefer to reserve his ruling on a motion for directed verdict until after the jury has rendered a verdict. If the verdict is rendered contrary to the law, the judge may then enter a judgment notwithstanding the verdict in favor of the verdict loser. The Supreme Court has held in Baltimore and Carolina Line v. Redman (1935) that the judge may not take this latter step unless the motion for directed verdict was timely and the question properly reserved; otherwise, there is a violation of the Seventh Amendment because the judgment notwithstanding the verdict was unknown to English practice at the time of adoption of the Amendment.

In a criminal case the judge should direct a verdict for the accused when the prosecution has failed to offer proof of one or more elements of the offense charged. But the trial judge may not direct a verdict of guilty in a criminal case; to this extent, the Sixth Amendment assures the role of the jury as a bulwark against punishment deemed oppressive by the community, even if the punishment is required by the positive law. An element of natural justice is thereby introduced to the legal system.

In addition to his role as law officer, the trial judge also has some responsibility for the quality of fact-finding done by the jury. In either civil or criminal cases, he may set aside a verdict as contrary to the weight of the evidence. When exercising this prerogative, the trial judge is obliged to order a new trial before a second jury. In a criminal case, the power to order the new trial is confined by the constitutional constraint against double jeopardy. In a civil case, the power to grant a new trial may be exercised conditionally, but this power is subject to constitutional limitations. A conditional order of new trial is likely to occur where the trial judge regards a jury verdict as correct on the matter of liability but excessive in regard to the award of damages.

Some factual issues arising in jury-tried cases may be reserved for the judge. For example, in civil cases, issues of fact arising in a determination of the jurisdiction of the court must be decided by the judge. In criminal cases, sentencing is a function of the judge, not the jury, although the wisdom and propriety of the sentence often require factual determination.

With the exceptions noted, the division of function between judge and jury in federal courts has not been deemed a matter for constitutional adjudication. A fortiori, state practice in respect to these issues has not generally been regarded as presenting any constitutional problems of due process of law. The Supreme Court, however, has on occasion intervened to reverse state court judgments in actions arising under federal law on the ground that the federal law posed an issue for a jury which under the state practice was incorrectly left to the decision of a judge. Particularly in cases arising under the federal EMPLOYERS LIABILITY ACT, the Court was strict in limiting the role of the trial judge. Its decisions, based upon statutory grounds, may indicate that state jury practice must meet federal standards when state courts are called upon to enforce federal law. It is even possible that the Seventh Amendment will be found to be applicable to litigation of federal claims in state courts, not by reason of the Fourteenth Amendment, but by an inference of congressional intent.

The Sixth Amendment applies only to criminal proceedings that could have been tried by a jury at the time of its adoption in 1791. Even at that time, it was well understood that "petty" offenses might be tried without a jury. Federal legislation gives specific meaning to such offenses as those involving a punishment of imprisonment for six months or less and fines of $500 or less. In BALDWIN V. NEW YORK (1970) the Supreme Court held that due process requires jury trial in state court prosecutions for offenses involving imprisonment for more than six months. In Bloom v. Illinois (1968) the Court applied a similar standard to punishments imposed for contempt of court, although it conceded that there was some historical basis for treating contempt as a matter between litigant and judge, particularly where the contumacious act is committed in the presence of the court. In MCKEIVER V. PENNSYLVANIA (1971), however, the Court held that the right to jury trial is not applicable to a proceeding to determine the delinquency of a juvenile, even though a decision adverse to the juvenile might result in imprisonment for a period significantly in excess of six months; such proceedings, the Court said, are not strictly criminal because they involve less moral judgment about the conduct of the juvenile.

The Seventh Amendment has proved much more complex and troublesome. One major question has been the applicability of the amendment to claims brought under federal legislation enacted after the adoption of the amendment. A narrowly historical view would preclude the application of the right to such legislation-based claims, since they are not strictly actions "at common law." The Court has, however, generally extended the right to jury trial to statutory actions where the remedy pursued in the judicial proceeding was one that resembled a common law remedy. Thus, in Pernell v. Southall Realty Co. (1974) the Court held that there was a right to jury trial in a statutory action of eviction that was closely analogous to a common law action for ejectment. And in Curtis v. Loether (1974) the Court held that there was a right to jury trial in an action brought under the fair housing provisions of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 because the remedy sought was compensatory damages of the sort that might have been recoverable in a common law action of trespass on the case.

In other cases, however, the Court has approved legislation creating administrative procedures and remedies that displace common law rights and thus eliminate jury-triable actions. In National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. (1937), the Court upheld the award of back pay in proceedings before the board, despite the close analogy to common law contract actions. This decision was extended in Atlas Roofing Co. v. Occupational Safety and Health Administration (1977), in which the Court upheld legislation providing for the recovery by a government agency of a civil penalty in a court proceeding where there was no right to jury trial. The Court emphasized that the case involved a "public right," to be distinguished from common law rights of private parties. In Lorillard v. Pons (1978) the Court interpreted the legislature to intend a statutory right to jury trial in proceedings brought under the AGE DISCRIMINATION ACT. In that case, as in Curtis, the Court avoided any indication of the applicability of the Seventh Amendment to the employment discrimination provisions of the Civil Rights Act, which, like the Age Discrimination Act, provides for back pay awards to be made by courts, not administrative agencies.

The most complex issues of the scope of the right to jury trial arise in complex litigation where matters that are within the compass of the Seventh Amendment coincide with other matters outside that compass. In general, the Supreme Court has tended to insist upon protection of the right to jury trial in such situations, even at the risk of submitting to a jury matters that would not be jury-triable if litigated alone. Illustrative is DAIRY QUEEN, INC. V. WOOD (1962) in which the plaintiff sought both an injunction and compensatory damages. Injunctive relief, unlike compensatory damages, is an equitable rather than a legal remedy and so is not subject to the right of trial by jury. The trial court deemed the injunction to be the primary relief sought and undertook to try the case without a jury, albeit with the intention of seating a jury to decide the measure of damages should it appear that a wrong had been committed. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the jury-triable claim for damages must be tried first in order to protect the constitutional right to jury trial, leaving it for the judge later to decide on the availability of injunctive relief if the jury should determine that a wrong had been committed. Similarly, in BEACON THEATERS, INC. V. WESTOVER (1959) the Court held that a jury-triable counterclaim would have to be tried first, before a determination could be made on a related claim by the plaintiff that was not jury-triable.

These cases illustrate that the constitutional right to jury trial now tends to depend on the specific substantive right and remedy involved in the litigation, not on the general (common law or equity) context in which that right is disputed. This approach was illustrated in Ross v. Bernhard (1970), in which the Court held that a claim brought by a shareholder on behalf of the CORPORATION was jury-triable when the claim would have been triable by a jury had it been brought by the corporation itself; this decision would seem to be applicable as well to claims for damages brought by class representatives. This is so even though the procedures of STOCKHOLDER SUITS and CLASS ACTIONS are derived from the equity tradition, not from the practices of law courts. Thus, the increasingly widespread use of complex procedural devices that unite equitable and legal matters may in fact operate to enlarge the practical scope of the right to jury trial. This seems true despite the disclaimers set forth in such law reforms as the Federal Declaratory Judgment Act and the Federal Rules Enabling Act, which express the intent not to alter the existing scope of the right. That intent was not practicably attainable consistent with achieving the other aims of the procedural reforms, which include efficiency and dispatch.

On the other hand, a rule that the Seventh Amendment right to jury trial depends on the substantive right and remedy involved in the litigation is not always applied. Illustrative is Katchen v. Landy (1966), which upholds the power of the court to determine without a jury claims brought against a bankrupt estate, whether or not the claims might have been jury-triable if asserted directly against the bankrupt. The Court emphasized the practical needs of the bankruptcy system for dispatch in making such decisions; it was said that these considerations justified Congress in directing that they be made without juries. Thus, the scope of the constitutional right to jury trial in civil cases is a complex question, drawing heavily on historical analogues but also influenced by considerations of contemporary practicality. It is not a static right, but it is likely to take on new dimensions in the hands of future courts.

It may be concluded that the right of accused persons to a trial by jury has become a deeply entrenched feature of criminal litigation in the United States, broadly protected by the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments, with the selection and role of the jury being aspects of the right that are themselves subject to constitutional control. The right to jury trial in civil cases, on the other hand, rests upon a different constitutional provision, which is inapplicable in state courts and may be somewhat less rigidly maintained even in federal courts, for the reason that it is less assuredly beneficial to the citizens to be protected.

PAUL D. CARRINGTON
(1986)

Bibliography

DAWSON, JOHN P. 1962 A History of Lay Judges. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

HELLER, FRANCIS H. 1951 The Sixth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press.

JAMES, FLEMING 1963 Right to Jury Trial in Civil Cases. Yale Law Journal 72:655–693.

KALVEN, HARRY and ZEISEL, HANS 1966 The American Jury. Boston: Little, Brown.

MCCART, SAMUEL N. 1964 Trial by Jury. Philadelphia: Chilton Books.

SCHULTZ, MARJORIE S., ed. 1980 The American Jury. Law and Contemporary Problems. Durham, N.C.: Duke University.

SPOONER, LYSANDER 1852 An Essay on the Trial by Jury. Boston: John P. Jewett Co.

VAN DYKE, JON M. 1977 Jury Selection Procedures. Cambridge, Mass.: Ballinger.

WOLFRAM, CHARLES 1973 The Constitutional History of the Seventh Amendment. Minnesota Law Review 57:639–747.

TRIBAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT AND THE CONSTITUTION

Contact between non-Indians and Native American tribal nations largely destroyed the traditional economies of tribal nations, which included agriculture, hunting and fishing, and associated trade networks. Fish and game were slaughtered or depleted, tribal land bases and water resources were lost or placed under federal control, populations declined, and traditional sociopolitical organizations that structured economic activity were disrupted and replaced with an oppressive federal bureaucracy. Today, despite the presence of significant mineral, water, timber, and other assets on some reservations, most of the 554 Indian nations recognized by the United States experience severe poverty and related social consequences. Unemployment rates as high as 50 percent are common, with some tribes suffering 90 percent unemployment or higher.

The Constitution played a supporting role in the devastation of traditional tribal economies and the impoverishment of reservations. Although the Constitution makes few and cryptic references to tribes, the constitutional plan of federal supremacy over Indian affairs has emboldened the Supreme Court to develop a body of constitutional COMMON LAW in this area. The grant of federal power over "commerce . . . with the Indian Tribes" in Article I, section 8, for example, has been embellished with notions of a federal guardianship over tribes to allow Congress nearly unlimited authority over internal tribal matters. Since the last decades of the nineteenth century, Congress has invoked this authority, also known as "plenary power," to support LEGISLATION abrogating TREATY promises that set aside lands for the "perpetual" use of the tribes. For example, Congress constructed dams that flooded tribal lands, divided or allotted tribal lands for individual tribal members, and opened tribal lands for homesteading by non-Indians. Congress also used its broad power to impose bureaucratic restraints on tribal resource use, to open tribal timber and mineral resources for exploitation by non-Indians without market-rate compensation, and to dictate tribal constitutions that organize tribal governing institutions as well as the ordinances that tribal governments enact. Experts on tribal economic development, such as Joseph Kalt of Harvard's Kennedy School of Government, have shown that without tribal control over the management of tribal affairs and the use of tribal resources, sustained economic development does not occur on reservations.

Constitutional constraints on congressional action, such as the DUE PROCESS and JUST COMPENSATION clauses of the Fifth Amendment, have not provided substantial protection for tribal resources and rights of self-government against federal interference. A partial explanation for this failure is the fact that tribes do not fit comfortably into the philosophy of individual rights reflected in the Constitution. Tribes' important rights and resources are held communally, and social groups such as clans or religious societies, rather than individuals, are viewed as the constituent social and political units. In constitutional decisions of the Supreme Court, these differences have meant, for example, that aboriginal tribal lands are not viewed as "PROPERTY" subject to just compensation in the event of expropriation unless Congress has "recognized" the tribal property claims by treaty or statute. Furthermore, federal conversion of tribal lands into allotted, individually owned lands has not been treated as a TAKING of those lands or a deprivation of due process or EQUAL PROTECTION. Federal laws that single out tribes for restrictions on economic activities or that regulate tribal members directly do not fall under the weight of federal constitutional protections for racial or ethnic minorities because tribes are treated as political entities rather than racial or ethnic groups. At most, the Court has provided theoretical protection for tribes by fashioning a federal trust responsibility that is supposed to ground and color federal plenary power, and by insisting that Congress be explicit when it curtails tribal property and self-government rights.

Since the 1970s, the federal government has proclaimed policies encouraging tribal self-determination and economic development. Two DOCTRINES within the constitutional common law of Indian affairs have helped advance this policy agenda. Both of these doctrines affirm and support tribal SOVEREIGNTY. First, federal constitutional supremacy has precluded states from imposing many of their taxes and regulations within tribal territories unless Congress consents. The lucrative gaming enterprises found on some reservations stem from this limitation on state regulation. However, tribes are not wholly protected against state restrictions. Responding to states' concerns, Congress has chosen to exercise its plenary power with respect to gaming, and has afforded states authority to preclude or negotiate over certain forms of tribal gaming. Furthermore, the Court has said that states may tax reservation-based retail sales to nonmembers where products are merely imported onto the reservation to take advantage of tax exemptions. Second, tribes are recognized as governments that enjoy SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY, subject to congressional or tribal waiver. According to the chair of the Mississippi Choctaw Tribe, which has one of the most thriving economies of any Indian nation in the United States, tribal sovereign immunity has been essential in fostering economic development because it nourishes institutions of self-government and protects the tribe against costly litigation and potential BANKRUPTCY. Thus contemporary tribal economic development is partly a legal artifact, born of constitutionally based doctrines reflecting the special status of tribes as governments engaged in business enterprises. These doctrines have created economic opportunities for tribes by conferring monopoly status in states where certain activities, such as WASTE disposal or gaming, are outlawed or heavily regulated. The new economic possibilities must be understood, however, in relation to a long history of economic devastation.

CAROLE GOLDBERG
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: American Indians and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

CLINTON, ROBERT N. 1993 Redressing the Legacy of Conquest: A Vision Quest for A Decolonized Federal Indian Law. Arkansas Law Review 46:77–159.

CORNELL, STEPHEN and KALT, JOSEPH, eds. 1992 What Can Tribes Do? Strategies and Institutions in American Indian Economic Development. Los Angeles: UCLA American Indian Studies Center.

DELORIA, VINE, JR. 1974 Behind the Trail of Broken Treaties: An Indian Declaration of Independence. Austin: University of Texas Press.

GOULD, SCOTT L. 1996 The Consent Paradigm: Tribal Sovereignty at the Millenium. Columbia Law Review 97:809–902.

MOHAWK, JOHN C. 1991 Indian Economic Development: An Evolving Concept of Sovereignty. Buffalo Law Review 39:495–503.

WORTHEN, KEVIN J. and FARNSWORTH, WAYNE R. 1996 Who Will Control the Future of Indian Gaming? "A Few Pages of History Are Worth a Volume of Logic." Brigham Young University Law Review 1996:407–448.

TRIMBLE, ROBERT
(1776–1828)

Robert Trimble, appointed to the Supreme Court by JOHN QUINCY ADAMS on April 11, 1826, was born in Virginia and raised in Kentucky. He studied law, began practice in Paris, Kentucky, and became one of the leading lawyers of the state with a specialty in land litigation. To the Supreme Court he brought an independence of character, a respect for legality, and considerable judicial experience. From 1807 to 1808 he served on the Kentucky Court of Appeals and from 1817 to 1826 on the federal district court. His years on the district bench corresponded to a period of political-economic upheaval during which Kentucky openly resisted federal ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION and federal judicial interference with state relief measures. Both as district judge and as circuit partner with his friend Justice THOMAS TODD, Trimble held the line for federal judicial authority and objective legality as he saw it—so firmly in fact that he was threatened with IMPEACHMENT.

His integrity, ability, and nationalism won him an appointment to the Court on Todd's death. He served only twenty-seven months before his own death but long enough to have won the respect of JOHN MARSHALL and JOSEPH STORY; Story eulogized him as belonging "to that school, of which Mr. Chief Justice Marshall (himself a host) is the acknowledged head and expositor." Trimble spoke for the Court only fifteen times; ironically his lone constitutional opinion in OGDEN V. SAUNDERS (1827) called forth Marshall's only dissent in a constitutional case. The question was whether a state bankruptcy law applying to contracts made after the passage of the law was a violation of the CONTRACT CLAUSE. Trimble's clear-headed, practical opinion upholding state power remained controlling for most of the nineteenth century despite the dissents of Marshall and Story.

R. KENT NEWMYER
(1986)

Bibliography

STORY, JOSEPH 1829 Memoir of Judge Trimble. American Jurist and Law Magazine 1:149–157.

TRIMBLE v. GORDON
430 U.S. 762 (1977)

A year before this decision, the Supreme Court had refused, in Mathews v. Lucas (1976), to hold that ILLEGITIMACY was a SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION requiring strict judicial scrutiny. In Trimble, a 5–4 majority invalidated an Illinois law that prevented illegitimate children from inheriting from their fathers who had not made wills. Discriminations based on illegitimacy, said Justice LEWIS F. POWELL for the majority, must be "carefully attuned to alternative considerations." Although paternity might be hard to prove in some cases, wholesale disinheritance of illegitimate children was unjustified. In this case a judicial paternity proceeding had determined the decedent to be the father.

Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST dissented at length, criticizing the development of modern EQUAL PROTECTION doctrine. Except for classifications based on race or national origin, he would abandon all forms of STRICT SCRUTINY, requiring no more than a RATIONAL BASIS for legislative discrimination. Laws classifying according to legitimacy of parentage deserved no more heightened judicial scrutiny than did "other laws regulating economic and social conditions."

Only a year later, in LALLI V. LALLI (1978), a fragmented Court made Trimble's precedential status uncertain.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

TROP v. DULLES
356 U.S. 86 (1958)

PEREZ v. BROWNELL
356 U.S. 44 (1958)

In two cases decided the same day the Supreme Court ruled on the constitutionality of the EXPATRIATION provisions of the Nationality Act of 1940. In Perez the Court held (5–4) that revocation of CITIZENSHIP for voting in a foreign election was a valid exercise of governmental control over FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

In Trop, however, the Court held unconstitutional (5–4) the involuntary expatriation of a wartime deserter. Chief Justice EARL WARREN, for a plurality, contended that expatriation is CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT; but WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, the one justice who changed sides, argued only that Congress's power over citizenship is less extensive when foreign affairs are not involved.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

TRUAX v. CORRIGAN
257 U.S. 312 (1921)

A 1913 Arizona law, similar to the labor provisions of the CLAYTON ANTITRUST ACT, prohibited state court INJUNCTIONS against peaceful PICKETING. Following a dispute with restaurant proprietor William Truax, a local union peacefully picketed and distributed handbills calling for a BOYCOTT. Truax's business receipts dropped dramatically, and after the Arizona courts denied him relief, he appealed to the Supreme Court, contending that the state law deprived him of his property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW and violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, speaking for a 5–4 majority, held the state statute unconstitutional. He reasoned that Truax held a property right in his business; free access to it by employees and customers was incidental to that right. Concerted action that intentionally injured that right was a conspiracy and a tort. In this case, the union's activities constituted an "unlawful annoyance and hurtful nuisance." Such wrongs, Taft concluded, could not be remediless, and he declared that the anti-injunction law deprived Truax of due process. He also ruled that the law violated equal protection by limiting the application of an injunction to a particular class.

Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, dissenting, maintained that even if the employer had a constitutional right to be free from boycotting and picketing, the state was not compelled to protect that right with an injunction, as states were free to expand or control their EQUITY jurisdiction. In a separate dissent, Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES argued that the state law was a valid "social experiment," however "futile or even noxious." Beyond that, he challenged the assumption equating "business" with a property right. Business, he asserted, was "a course of conduct," and like any other was subject to modification regarding what would justify doing it a harm.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

TRUMAN, HARRY S.
(1884–1972)

The thirty-third President began his career in local Democratic politics in Missouri. Truman served in various capacities, including county judge and planning official, and helped coordinate employment and relief programs during the early 1930s. After his election to the United States SENATE in 1934, he supported the NEW DEAL programs and specialized in transportation policy. Declining President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's offer of an appointment to the Interstate Commerce Commission, he was reelected to the Senate in 1940. During the war years he attracted notice as the effective chairman of a Senate investigating committee established to oversee the efficiency and fairness of defense contracting. Elected vice-president in 1944, he succeeded to the presidency the next year when Roosevelt died. He returned to the White House in 1949 for a second term, following an unexpected election victory.

Truman believed in a strong and active presidency, operating within a Constitution sufficiently flexible to accommodate executive initiatives for the public good. The Framers of the Constitution, Truman said, had deliberately left vague the details of presidential power, allowing the "experience of the nation to fill in the outlines." He disagreed with scholars who claimed that history makes the man: "I think that it is the man who makes history." His roster of favorite Presidents included GEORGE WASHINGTON, THOMAS JEFFERSON, ANDREW JACKSON, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, GROVER CLEVELAND, THEODORE ROOSEVELT, WOODROW WILSON, and Franklin Roosevelt.

Although criticized at times by liberals for providing inadequate leadership and action on CIVIL RIGHTS, Truman's record is impressive. In 1946 he created the President's Committee on Civil Rights. A year later it issued an important document, To Secure These Rights, that took a firm stand against various forms of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. In 1948 Truman issued EXECUTIVE ORDER 9981, ending discrimination in the armed services, and in that same year delivered a powerful civil rights message to Congress and supported the inclusion of a civil rights plank in the Democrats' platform.

Truman's commitment to the BILL OF RIGHTS was tested by the issue of subversion that overshadowed his administration. As a student of history he was keenly aware of the hysteria that had fanned repressive episodes, from the Salem witch trials to the Red Scare of 1919. He felt prepared to handle the new cycle that took the form of anticommunism and indiscriminate labeling of "subversives." (See SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES AND THE CONSTITUTION.)

EXECUTIVE ORDER 9835, issued by Truman in 1947, established procedures to control subversive infiltration of the federal government. The effect was to deprive agency employees of fundamental elements of DUE PROCESS, including the right to receive specific charges against them and to confront their accusers. Even when an accused received clearance from a loyalty board, the data remained in the files, forcing the employee to answer the same charges with each move to a new job. Truman later admitted that the program, which thrived on secret evidence and secret informers, was filled with defects and injustices.

Truman began to give closer attention to CIVIL LIBERTIES. In a message to Congress on August 8, 1950, he warned that pending legislation on internal security would forbid dissent. When the internal security bill reached his desk in the fall of 1950, he delivered a ringing denunciation, protesting in his veto message that the bill would put government in the "thought control business." Especially objectionable to him was a provision requiring "Communist-front" and "Communist-action" groups to register with the attorney general. This placed on the government the responsibility for probing the "attitudes and states of mind" of organization leaders. Groups could be linked to the Communist party whenever their positions failed to "deviate" from those of the Communist movement. Thus, any organization dedicated to low-cost housing or other humanitarian goals espoused by the party could be branded a communist front. Truman called this feature "the greatest danger to FREEDOM OF SPEECH, press and assembly, since the ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS of 1798." The veto message, delivered in the midst of an election campaign that featured charges from some Republicans about Democrats being soft on communism, was courageous and principled. Within a day both Houses of Congress easily overrode the veto. (See INTERNAL SECURITY ACT.)

Following North Korea's invasion of the south in June 1950, Truman dispatched American soldiers to Korea without seeking congressional support or approval. A month later the State Department issued a belated memorandum defending the President's legal authority to repel the attack. The memo claimed that Truman's action was justified by international law, the UNITED NATIONS CHARTER, "and the resolution pursuant thereto." However, the United Nations issued two resolutions on Korea, one of June 25 calling for the cessation of hostilities and the withdrawal of North Korean forces to the 38th parallel, and a second resolution (adopted two days later) recommending armed force to repel the attack. Truman intervened militarily before passage of the second resolution. (See KOREAN WAR.)

Truman placed General Douglas MacArthur in command of American forces in Korea. MacArthur wanted to widen the military front, probing deeply into North Korea. He objected repeatedly, in public, to the limited war policy adopted by the administration. Eventually he alienated Truman, top cabinet officials, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the National Security Council. Over the course of almost a year, Truman became convinced that MacArthur was untrustworthy and insubordinate, but his abrupt dismissal of the general on April 11, 1951, triggered a storm of protest across the nation. In explaining his decision, Truman said it was fundamental that "military commanders must be governed by the policies and directives issued to them in the manner provided by our laws and Constitution."

Only a few members of Congress questioned Truman's authority to send troops to Korea, but as part of a "Great Debate" in 1951, legislators challenged his constitutional power to send ground forces to Europe. Resolutions were introduced in each house to require congressional authorization before military forces could be sent abroad. Although these measures were not enacted, uneasiness about the scope of presidential war-making power persisted. After President LYNDON B. JOHNSON's commitment of American troops to Southeast Asia and subsequent military actions there by President RICHARD M. NIXON, Congress passed the WAR POWERS RESOLUTION of 1973 to restrict the President's military powers. (See EMERGENCY POWER.)

Truman's attitude about presidential power and constitutional constraints is illuminated by his 1952 seizure of steel mills. He believed that a pending strike would prevent production of materials needed for the war in Korea. (See EXECUTIVE ORDER 10340; STEEL SEIZURE CONTROVERSY.) At a news conference on April 17 he was asked whether his INHERENT POWERS permitted seizure of newspapers and radio stations. To the consternation of the press he replied that the President could act "for whatever is for the best of the country." A week later, complaining that speculation about him seizing the press and the radio was "hooey," he stated that he had "difficulty imagining the Government taking over and running those industries." Continuing to respond to concerns about his views of emergency power, on April 27 he wrote in a letter that presidential powers are "derived from the Constitution, and they are limited, of course, by the provisions of the Constitution, particularly those that protect the rights of individuals."

Meanwhile, the Justice Department was developing a different scenario for District Judge David Pine. Assistant Attorney General Homer Baldridge told Pine on April 24 that "there is not power in the Courts to restrain the President. . . ." After Pine had declared the seizure invalid, Truman claimed at a news conference on May 22 that "nobody" (including Congress and the Court) could take from the President his power to seize private property and to protect the welfare of the people. However, he said that he would abide by the Supreme Court's verdict, and when the decision fell on June 2 (see YOUNGSTOWN SHEET & TUBE CO. V. SAWYER), declaring the seizure invalid, he immediately ordered the government to relinquish possession of the mills.

Often careless with his remarks at press conference, for which he paid dearly, Truman came to the White House with a solid understanding of history and governmental institutions and processes. He maintained a deep respect for individual rights and civilian government. Through his personal integrity and honesty he helped moderate many of the repressive forces that operated during his years in office.

LOUIS FISHER
(1986)

Bibliography

HAMBY, ALONZO L. 1973 Beyond the New Deal: Harry S. Truman and American Liberalism. New York: Columbia University Press.

TRUMAN, HARRY S. 1955 Year of Decisions. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday.

——— 1956 Years of Trial and Hope. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday.

——— 1960 Mr. Citizen. New York: Bernard Geis.

TRUMBULL, LYMAN
(1813–1896)

An Illinois state supreme court judge (1848–1853) and United States senator (1855–1873), Lyman Trumbull opposed all SLAVERY expansion before 1861, and during the SECESSION crisis he argued that the Constitution already adequately protected slavery and no amendments, concessions, or compromises were necessary. A strong supporter of the Union war effort, Trumbull nevertheless believed that the war should be fought within the framework of the Constitution. Thus, he opposed President ABRAHAM LINCOLN's unilateral suspension of HABEAS CORPUS, arbitrary arrests, and the closing of northern newspapers. Nonetheless, he supported legislation authorizing such actions. Trumbull gave mild support to the EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION but doubted its constitutionality, and thus he introduced the resolution which led to the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT. As chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee during the war and Reconstruction, Trumbull initiated the first and second CONFISCATION ACTS, the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866, the FREEDMEN'S BUREAU Extension Act (1866), and the first civil service reform legislation (1870). Despite his opposition to slavery and support of CIVIL RIGHTS, Trumbull was at heart a white supremacist and only reluctantly voted for the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT. He opposed both punitive legislation for southern states that discriminated against blacks and the 1871 Ku Klux Klan Act, because of his lack of sympathy for blacks and his refusal to accept the fact that the CIVIL WAR had radically altered the nature of STATES' RIGHTS. He gave unenthusiastic support for ANDREW JOHNSON in 1865–1866, and, although disgusted with Johnson's vetos of his Civil Rights and Freedman's Bureau Bills, Trumbull voted against conviction of Johnson in the trial following IMPEACHMENT because he doubted Johnson had committed an impeachable act under the Constitution. A successful corporate lawyer, Trumbull argued EX PARTE MCCARDLE (1867) at the express request of General ULYSSES S. GRANT and was paid $10,000 for his services, even though he was a senator at the time. In 1876 Trumbull unsuccessfully argued the cause of Samuel Tilden before the Election Commission that considered the disputes over the Tilden-Hayes presidential election. (See COMPROMISE OF 1877.) Late in life he supported populism and the rights of workers, and in his last Supreme Court case he defended the labor organizer Eugene V. Debs in IN RE DEBS (1895).

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

KRUG, MARK M. 1965 Lyman Trumbull: Conservative Radical. New York: A. S. Barnes & Co.

TRUPIANO v. UNITED STATES

See: Search and Seizure; Search Incident to Arrest

TRUTH, SOJOURNER
(c. 1799–1883)

Sojourner Truth (née Isabella Baumfree), nineteenth-century ABOLITIONIST and FEMINIST, was born a slave, was not literate, and lived in poverty much of her life. Yet, in an age before mass media, she was a nationally renowned figure, known for her advocacy before, during, and after the CIVIL WAR.

Born in the Hudson River Valley in New York around 1799, she performed hard labor for a series of masters and was so renowned for her physical strength—she was nearly six feet tall—that her owner reneged on a promise to reward her exceptional hard work with her freedom. Refusing to rely anymore on a "slaveholders' promise," she freed herself by walking away from his farm in 1826, a year before the state's gradual manumission law freed her. Her five-year-old son was illegally sold in violation of the manumission law, and after a desperate search, she successfully sued to recover him.

In 1829, she left for New York City after experiencing a profound religious awakening. Her new life as preacher and advocate began on Pentecost, June 1, 1843, when she discarded her slave name and became Sojourner Truth. Leaving New York and joining the Northampton Association, an abolitionist community in Massachusetts, she became associated with important figures in the movement, such as WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON and Frederick Douglass. In 1850, she authored her autobiography—an "as told to" account of her life story. By "selling the shadow to support the substance," as she often said, the book's sales proceeds became her primary and meager source of support.

Her lifelong work as a public speaker also began in earnest. By many accounts, she was a spellbinding speaker, often drawing on events from her difficult life to expose the evils of SLAVERY and reveal the interconnectedness between the abolitionist and feminist struggles. In 1851, Sojourner delivered a speech to an abolitionist convention in Akron, Ohio, where she made this linkage preeminent in what has become a piece of legendary oratory. As a formerly enslaved woman, Truth recalled that she had been worked "like a man," yet she was still a woman and like all women and black people was entitled to the rights due all human beings. This speech became well-known when, in 1863, Frances Gage, a prominent feminist, published a colorful rendition, using the phrase "And ar'n't I a woman?" Despite the fact that many historians consider it unlikely that this account is literally accurate, as other contemporaneous reports of the speech do not include the phrase, and Sojourner, whose first language was Dutch, did not speak in this dialect, "Ar'n't I a woman?" became her emblem, embodying her unrelenting focus on the relationship between the abolitionist and feminist causes.

Her insistence on this connection carried over into the RECONSTRUCTION era, where she strenuously argued that in the struggle for the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT, suffrage for women should not be sacrificed in order to secure the vote for black men. Her refusal to compromise, as some prominent male abolitionists had, was grounded in her concern that the failure to secure women's suffrage in conjunction with black male suffrage would mean that the vote for women would be indefinitely deferred and the interests and voices of black women marginalized—a concern that proved prophetic. In the period following the Civil War, between 1864 and 1870, she devoted herself to addressing the often horrendous living conditions facing the formerly enslaved black population. Without jobs or land, freedom was severely undermined and it was Sojourner's view, expressed in a petition to President ULYSSES S. GRANT in 1870, that freed people should be resettled in the West on public lands. In 1875, she returned to Battle Creek, Michigan, following the death of a beloved grandson who had been her constant companion. She did not have many active public appearances from that time until her death in 1883. She remained a commanding presence however, and a living symbol that repudiated racialized conceptions of womanhood and affirmed the importance of resisting all forms of subordination.

CHERYL I. HARRIS
(2000)

Bibliography

HARRIS, CHERYL I. 1993 Whiteness as Property. Harvard Law Review 106:1707–1791.

——— 1996 Finding Sojourner's Truth: Race, Gender and the Institution of Property. Cardozo Law Journal 18:309–409.

PAINTER, NELL IRVIN 1996 Sojourner Truth: A Life, a Symbol. New York: W. W. Norton.

WASHINGTON, MARGARET, ed. 1993 Narrative of Sojourner Truth. New York: Vintage Books.

TUCKER, HENRY ST. GEORGE
(1780–1848)

A political leader, scholar, and jurist, Henry St. George Tucker studied law under his father, ST. GEORGE TUCKER. He was a congressman (1815–1819), state judge (1824–1841), and professor of law at the University of Virginia (1841–1848). In his classroom lectures and in his textbook entitled Lectures on Constitutional Law (1843), he took a moderate STATES' RIGHTS position, steering, as he said, "a middle course between [the] dangerous extremes" of NULLIFICATION and centralization. His book is intended as a refutation of the nationalist position of JOSEPH STORY, but, although he regarded the Constitution as a compact among the states, he rejected nullification and SECESSION as remedies for violations by the federal government.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

BAUER, ELIZABETH KELLEY 1952 Commentaries on the Constitution, 1790–1860. New York: Columbia University Press.

TUCKER, JOHN RANDOLPH
(1823–1897)

A political leader, scholar, and attorney, John Randolph Tucker was the son of HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER and the grandson of ST. GEORGE TUCKER. He was attorney general of Virginia (1857–1865), congressman (1875–1887), professor of law at Washington and Lee University (1870–1875, 1888–1897), and president of the American Bar Association (1894). From his retirement from Congress until his death he worked on his two-volume commentary, The Constitution of the United States, which was published posthumously in 1899. Tucker continued the family's tradition of STATES' RIGHTS constitutionalism, proposing that the TENTH AMENDMENT was the key to understanding the Constitution. He was strikingly influenced by European political theorists, including J. K. Bluntschli, and rejected the ideas of NATURAL RIGHTS, human equality, and SOCIAL COMPACT in favor of the concept of an organic state.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

TUCKER, N. BEVERLEY
(1784–1851)

Jurist, scholar, and novelist Nathaniel Beverley Tucker developed his political views under the influence of his half-brother, JOHN RANDOLPH. As a judge and politician in Missouri (1815–1830) he fiercely resisted the MISSOURI COMPROMISE. Later, as a professor of law at William and Mary College (1834–1851) he was one of the most extreme advocates of a STATES' RIGHTS interpretation of the Constitution. He argued that SOVEREIGNTY resided in the several states and that the people of Virginia were obliged to obey federal law only because Virginia commanded them to do so. He defended SLAVERY and supported NULLIFICATION. His novel, The Partisan Leader (1836), advocated SECESSION and predicted a civil war.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

BAUER, ELIZABETH KELLEY 1952 Commentaries on the Constitution, 1790–1860. New York: Columbia University Press.

TUCKER, ST. GEORGE
(1751–1827)

St. George Tucker, who became known as the "American Blackstone," wrote the first commentary on the Constitution since THE FEDERALIST, a book that he recommended as a "masterly discussion." After a dozen years as a judge in Virginia, Tucker succeeded GEORGE WYTHE, with whom he had studied law, as professor of law at the College of William and Mary. Using WILLIAM BLACKSTONE's Commentaries on the Laws of England as his text, Tucker updated and domesticated Blackstone in his lectures, showing how the English law had changed in the United States and in Virginia. His lectures led in 1803 to the publication in five volumes of an annotated edition of Blackstone. Notwithstanding Tucker's 1,400 notes, the most creative parts of his work are to be found in his appendices, which run to 425 pages in the first volume, mostly an analysis of the United States Constitution. Although Tucker preferred a "federal" to a "consolidated" Union, he was a moderate who defended the American constitutional system, championed democracy, opposed SLAVERY, and made constructive criticisms. The appendix argued against a FEDERAL COMMON LAW OF CRIMES. Volume two's appendices included an extended proposal for the gradual abolition of slavery and a libertarian essay on FIRST AMENDMENT freedoms, in which Tucker discoursed on the reasons that religion, speech, and press should be "absolute" and "unrestricted," except for laws against personal defamation. Tucker's edition of Blackstone led to his appointment to the highest court of Virginia, where he served with distinction, followed in 1813 by an appointment as a United States district judge. Tucker held that position until shortly before his death. He ranks with the best of Jeffersonian jurists and theorists.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

TUCKER ACT
24 Stat. 505 (1887)

Thirty-two years after establishing the Court of Claims, Congress enacted the Tucker Act, expanding that court's JURISDICTION to decide claims against the United States. Henceforth, the court might decide not only contract claims but also claims against the government founded on the Constitution and other damage claims not based on tort. Today the act confers jurisdiction over such cases on the United States CLAIMS COURT, along with jurisdiction over claims founded on various federal statutes and regulations. If the amount in controversy in such a case is less than $10,000, the UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT exercises

CONCURRENT JURISDICTION—thus allowing persons with small claims to bring suit in their home districts rather than in Washington, D.C. The act creates no substantive rights but merely provides jurisdiction in cases in which the government's liability is founded on other principles of law. In effect, however, the act amounts to a waiver of the federal government's SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY, in recognition of the vital principle that government should not be above the law.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Federal Tort Claims Act.)

Bibliography

WRIGHT, CHARLES A.; MILLER, ARTHUR R.; and COOPER, EDWARD H. 1985 Federal Practice and Procedure, 2nd ed. Vol. 14:270–294. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

TUGWELL, REXFORD G.
(1891–1979)

Economist Rexford Guy Tugwell was a member of President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's "brain trust" and an advocate of centralized economic planning by the federal government. After serving as undersecretary of agriculture and governor of Puerto Rico, he began a second career as a historian and constitutional theorist. His books on the Roosevelt years include The Democratic Roosevelt (1957, 1969) and The Brains Trust (1968). Tugwell's years as a government official convinced him that only a rewriting of the Constitution, emphasizing provisions for centralization, economic planning, and emergency powers, would produce an effective form of government. He denounced as undemocratic the accepted principles of FEDERALISM, and SEPARATION OF POWERS, and he stressed the need for total revision of the Constitution rather than gradual evolution through judicial interpretation. Tugwell frequently published his own proposals for a rewritten constitution. In The Emerging Constitution (1975) his proposals included: reduction of the states to administrative districts of a unitary national government; expansion of executive power, including EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE; curtailment of the judiciary's power to pass judgment on actions of the national government to supervise the economy; and periodic revision of the Constitution through a simplified AMENDING PROCESS.

RICHARD B. BERNSTEIN
(1986)

TUITION GRANTS

While parents have a constitutional right to send their children to private rather than public schools (see PIERCE V. SOCIETY OF SISTERS, 1925), the exercise of that right costs money. Such parents not only bear their share of the taxes that support public schools but also pay tuition to their children's schools. Not surprisingly, a regular item of business in Congress and the state legislatures is a proposal to relieve this "double burden" through some form of governmental relief. Two types of constitutional problems beset such proposals. Governmental aid to private schools may be attacked as STATE ACTION that promotes racial SEGREGATION or as an unconstitutional ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION.

Soon after the decision in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954–1955), a number of southern states adopted a series of devices aimed at evading DESEGREGATION. One such device was the payment of state grants to private schools or to parents of private school children. The assumption was that when public schools were ordered to desegregate, white children would be withdrawn and placed in private schools. Some states went so far as to give local school boards the option of closing public schools and even selling those schools' physical plants to the operators of private schools which would be supported by tuition subsidized by the state. These private schools, it was expected, would be limited to white students. (More recently, federal CIVIL RIGHTS legislation has been applied to forbid that type of "segregation academy" to refuse black applicants. See RUNYON V. MCCRARY.) The Supreme Court held these tuition grant programs unconstitutional as evasions of Brown in cases such as GRIFFIN V. COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD (1964) and Poindexter v. Louisiana Financial Assistance Commission (PER CURIAM, 1968).

More recently, private schools in the North and West have acquired new white students following orders desegregating urban school systems. "White flight" means not only the departure of white families for the suburbs but also the transfer of white students from public to private schools. Estimates in the late 1970s suggested that as many as one-fifth of all enrollments in the nation's private schools were the result of "white flight." Proposals for governmental aid to private school children and their parents must therefore face a challenge based on the likely racially discriminatory impacts of various proposed forms of aid. Such impacts would not, of themselves, establish a constitutional violation; they would, however, be some evidence of an improper governmental purpose. (See LEGISLATION.)

Tuition grants limited to low-income parents of children enrolled in religious schools were held to violate the establishment clause in COMMITTEE FOR PUBLIC EDUCATION

V. NYQUIST (1973). That decision did not settle the question of the constitutionality of a hypothetical program in which the state gave all parents education vouchers, to be used to support schools of their choosing, public or private, religious or secular. (See GOVERNMENT AID TO RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS; MUELLER V. ALLEN.)

Proponents of voucher plans designed to aid private schools and their clienteles have gone to some lengths in an effort to tailor their proposals to meet these two types of constitutional objection. One proposal provides elaborate incentives for racial integration, such as bonuses for integrated schools. In the absence of strong incentives of some kind, it seems obvious that significant aid to private elementary and secondary education will have the effect of increasing racial segregation by increasing the educational mobility of middle class whites.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

SUGARMAN, STEPHEN D. 1974 Family Choice: The Next Step in the Quest for Equal Educational Opportunity? Law and Contemporary Problems 38:513–565.

TURNER BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC. v. FCC
512 U.S. 622 (1994)

The development of the cable television industry has revolutionized the way most Americans watch television. Until the 1960s, television signals were broadcast through the air into people's homes and picked up by receivers in their television sets. Such signals used the electromagnetic spectrum, which has limited frequencies, and could only travel relatively short distances. Because of these technological limitations, Congress, through the Federal Communications Commission, claimed the power to regulate BROADCASTING in order to license and control the use of the limited number of frequencies or "channels" and to impose certain content restrictions and public interest obligations on the broadcasters given those licenses. In a 1969 case, RED LION BROADCASTING CO. V. FCC, the Supreme Court rejected a FIRST AMENDMENT challenge to those restrictions. The Court reasoned that the law was designed to expand, not restrict, the diversity of programming and was thus consistent with FREEDOM OF SPEECH principles.

Because of the short range of broadcast signals, however, viewers could only receive programs transmitted by local broadcasting "stations," and people in remote areas often received very poor signal reception. Cable television revolutionized this system. First, cable transmits video signals through fiberoptic cables, not electromagnetic frequencies, and thus has the capacity to carry or "broadcast" dozens, if not hundreds, of different channels at one time. Second, cable facilities can easily send their programs to distant places because they transmit their signals through cable wires, rather than through the air.

Initially, cable was primarily used to improve reception of broadcast stations in crowded urban or remote rural areas. But because of the large number of channels a cable system could transmit, the cable industry developed many new sources of programming. Because of better reception and broader programming, cable soon became the source of transmission of programming to approximately 60 percent of the households in America, although, unlike broadcasting, subscribers had to pay a monthly fee for the cable service.

Broadcasters felt threatened by this new source of programming and, more importantly, by the control that cable operators had over the broadcasters' ability to reach their audience. The broadcasters were dependent on cable operators to carry their programs, yet, they were in competition with the cable industry over channels and programming. Cable operators had a "chokehold" over broadcasters and television programming, threatening the future of "free T.V."

At the urging of the broadcast industry and others, Congress sought to address such concerns in the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992. That law mandated that all cable operators had to carry a reasonable number or percentage of "local commercial television stations" and local "noncommercial educational television stations" among the channels on their cable systems. The larger the number of channels, the more broadcast stations the system had to carry. Overall, the result was that approximately one-third of the channels on any cable system had to be made available for use by local commercial or noncommercial broadcast stations.

This "MUST CARRY" LAW was promptly challenged by cable system operators and cable channel programmers as violating their free speech rights. The cable operators claimed they were being forced by government to carry programming against their will. The programmers claimed that, as a consequence, there would be fewer cable channels available for their programming. In Turner Broadcasting System v. FCC, the Supreme Court held that those "must carry" rules passed constitutional muster. The Solomon-like decision contained something for both sides of the debate.

First, the Court gave the cable industry an important victory by clearly holding that the First Amendment broadly protects cable operators and programmers and affords them powerful rights of speech and press. In doing so, the Court rejected the government's contention that the permissible regulation of cable should be measured by the same deferential approach that marked the Red Lion framework for assessing the rights of broadcasters. The Court reasoned that greater deference to governmental regulation is premised on the spectrum scarcity that uniquely affects broadcasting and which does not obtain in cable technology. Accordingly, normal First Amendment standards apply in deciding whether the restrictions and requirements of the "must carry" law are constitutional.

Nevertheless, under those standards, the strictest judicial scrutiny is reserved for those rules that are content-based, rather than content-neutral. Here, the regulation was premised on the medium, not the message. Congress required cable operators to carry commercial and noncommercial broadcast stations not because of any favored content communicated by those media, but to insure that those media remain healthy and diverse in order to serve the 40 percent of American households that, by necessity or choice, prefer to rely on free television as their source of programming. Nor did the Court find any persuasive evidence that Congress was trying to discriminate against the viewpoints allegedly associated with cable programming or in favor of the viewpoints purportedly associated with broadcasting. Rather, Congress was validly concerned with the "chokehold" capacity of cable operators to shut out broadcasters. (The dissenters, however, contended that Congress did see content differences between the two separate media and was impermissibly preferring one set of viewpoints over another.)

As a result, said the Court, the content-neutral, "must carry" rules would be judged by an intermediate standard of First Amendment review, with the critical question being whether those requirements were important to protecting broadcasting strength and diversity. On this point, the Justices concluded that more evidence was necessary on how vulnerable the broadcast industry really was and whether the special protections afforded it were justified. Accordingly, the Court sent the matter back to the lower courts for the development of a more complete record on those issues. In 1997, the case returned to the Court. The majority ruled that the justifications for the law were valid and survived the standard of intermediate scrutiny; the four dissenters, however, insisted that STRICT SCRUTINY was warranted by the law's content-based purposes and that, even under intermediate scrutiny, the government had failed to demonstrate threats to the broadcast industry that would be cured by the "must carry" rules.

JOEL M. GORA
(2000)

Bibliography

MASETH, MICHAEL W. 1995 Comment: The Erosion of First Amendment Protections of Speech and Press: The "Must Carry" Provisions of the 1992 Cable Act. Capital University Law Review 24:423–456.

MEYERSON, MICHAEL I. 1995 Authors, Editors, and Uncommon Carriers: Identifying the "Speaker" Within the New Media. Notre Dame Law Review 71:79–125.

SYMPOSIUM 1997 Telecommunications Law: Unscrambling the Signals, Unbundling the Laws. Columbia Law Review 97:819–1201.

TWELFTH AMENDMENT

The ELECTORAL COLLEGE, as contemplated in Article II of the Constitution, was to be a kind of "search committee," nominating outstanding men of various regions from among whom Congress would elect the President and Vice-President. The Framers expected each elector to cast his first vote for a candidate from his home state and his second for a national figure from another state. The delegates to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION assumed that the primary electoral divisions in the country were, and would remain, sectional.

The rise of POLITICAL PARTIES, which began almost immediately after the Constitution went into effect, belied that assumption. The parties nominated candidates, and the Electoral College had only to choose between the party slates; sectional loyalties were subordinated to ideological ones. In 1796, when party discipline was still developing, the Electoral College chose a Federalist President and a Republican Vice-President. In 1800 straight party voting produced a tie between THOMAS JEFFERSON and AARON BURR, the Republican nominees for President and Vice-President, respectively. The disgraceful performance of the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, which required thirty-five ballots to ratify the voters' choice, led directly to adoption of the Twelfth Amendment.

The amendment provided that the electors would vote for President and Vice-President in separate ballots; if no candidate obtained a majority of electoral votes, the House of Representatives (voting by states) would elect the President and the SENATE the Vice-President. Introduced by Senator DeWitt Clinton of New York, the amendment faced congressional opposition from Federalists and representatives of small states, each group fearing that its influence on presidential selection would be diminished. Once Congress proposed the Twelfth Amendment in 1804, the necessary thirteen states ratified it in less than six months—only the TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT (1971) was ratified more quickly.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

TWENTIETH AMENDMENT

Congress proposed the Twentieth Amendment, sponsored by Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS of Nebraska, on March 2, 1932; ratification was completed on January 23, 1933. The amendment provided that the President, Vice-President, and Congress begin their terms in the January following their election. Under the old scheme of Article I, section 4, congressmen had not taken their seats until thirteen months after their election, and a short "lame duck" session in election years included members who had already been defeated. The amendment also made provisions for PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION and authorized Congress to provide for a situation in which a President-elect or Vice-President-elect does not qualify by inauguration day.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

TWENTY-FIFTH AMENDMENT

Congress proposed the Twenty-Fifth Amendment in July 1965, and ratification by the state legislatures was completed in February 1967. The amendment revised the constitutional provisions dealing with PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION, specifically providing that when a vacancy occurs in the office of President the Vice-President becomes (rather than "acts as") President. The amendment also provides for the orderly transfer of executive power in the event of a temporary presidential disability and for filling a vacancy in the office of Vice-President.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

FEERICK, JOHN D. 1976 The Twenty-Fifth Amendment. New York: Fordham University Press.

TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT

The Twenty-First Amendment repealed the EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT and rescinded the constitutional mandate for national PROHIBITION of alcoholic beverages. Congress proposed the amendment in February 1933; RATIFICATION was complete in December 1933. To the extent that the VOLSTEAD ACT depended upon the constitutional authority of the Eighteenth Amendment, that statute became inoperative upon the passage of the Twenty-First Amendment.

The second clause of the Twenty-First Amendment prohibits transportation or importation of intoxicating liquors into states or territories in contravention of local law. The clause apparently gives the states power to regulate interstate commerce in alcoholic beverages, including the authority to discriminate against out-of-state producers and distributors, thus freeing the states, as far as liquor is concerned, from COMMERCE CLAUSE restrictions. The Supreme Court has upheld that interpretation in several cases, notably State Board v. Young's Market (1936). The Court suggested an even broader scope for state regulatory power under the amendment in California v. LaRue (1972), when it upheld a regulation banning sexually explicit entertainment in licensed taverns, and in Elks' Lodge v. Ingraham (1973), when it upheld a statute denying liquor licenses to private clubs that practiced RACIAL DISCRIMINATION.

The Twenty-First Amendment is the only constitutional amendment to have been ratified by state conventions rather than by the state legislatures. Congress chose this variant of the AMENDING PROCESS because proponents of repeal feared that antiliquor sentiment was dominant in many state legislatures, because of the overrepresentation of rural areas.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

TWENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT

The Twenty-Fourth Amendment, written by Senator Spessard Holland of Florida, was proposed by Congress on August 27, 1962, and became part of the Constitution on February 4, 1964. The amendment provides that the right of United States citizens to vote for federal officers shall not be denied or abridged for nonpayment of a POLL TAX or other tax.

A poll tax is simply a per capita tax and has no necessary relationship to election polling. However, several southern states made payment of the poll tax an electoral qualification in order to diminish the VOTING RIGHTS of black citizens. Bills to abolish the practice were introduced every year from 1939 on, and Holland, who believed statutory abolition to be beyond Congress's power, introduced his amendment every year from 1949 on.

By 1964, only five states retained payment of the poll tax as a qualification for voting. Because the Twenty-Fourth Amendment governed only federal elections, four states divided their elections, continuing to require poll tax payment for voting in state elections; but the Supreme Court held, in HARPER V. VIRGINIA BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966), that this practice violated the Constitution by denying EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

TWENTY-SECOND AMENDMENT

Although, as ALEXANDER HAMILTON explained in THE FEDERALIST #69, the President was "to be re-eligible as often as the people of the United States shall think him worthy of their confidence," a constitutional custom dating back to the administration of GEORGE WASHINGTON limited the President of the United States to two terms in office. In 1940, however, with the Great Depression finally coming to an end and with most of the world already engaged in WORLD WAR II, FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT sought and won election to a third term. He was subsequently elected to a fourth term, although he died sixty days after that term began.

The Twenty-Second Amendment makes the two-term limit a part of the formal Constitution. Congress proposed the amendment in March 1947 and RATIFICATION was complete four years later.

The effect of the amendment on the balance of power between the executive and the legislature is not clear. Hamilton, who personally had advocated a life term for the President, speculated in The Federalist #71 that Presidents would become more submissive to Congress as elections approached; and DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER argued during his second term that his ineligibility for reelection was a guarantee that he was more disinterestedly public-spirited than congressmen who opposed him. In the 1980s, on the other hand, journalists and political scientists who had come to see elections as retroactively legitimating, rather than prospectively legitimating, began referring to President RONALD REAGAN as a "lame duck" even before his second inauguration.

The two-term limit is no longer controversial. Ever since the Constitutional Convention of 1789 there have been proposals for limiting the President to a single term, generally longer than four years, but none of these has ever been seriously considered as a constitutional amendment.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

TWENTY-SEVENTH AMENDMENT

The Twenty-Seventh Amendment provides: "No law, varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives, shall take effect, until an election of Representatives shall have intervened." It is rooted in a recurring issue in Anglo-American legislative design: Who should pay representatives? In England, at first, constituents paid members of the House of Commons; throughout the eighteenth century members and candidates promised to take ever-lower wages or no wages at all, and, to win voters' support, competed to assume costs for municipal improvements such as new public buildings or repaved streets. Guarding against real and perceived corruption, American colonial and (after 1776) state governments paid legislators' salaries. Similarly, colonial and state governments paid delegates to the confederation and CONTINENTAL CONGRESSES.

The CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 had to decide what compensation senators and representatives should receive and from whom. The delegates concluded that having each state pay its own senators and representatives would create inequities among states and might preclude the ablest candidates from seeking office. Therefore, they framed the Constitution's compensation clause of Article I to have the general government pay senators and representatives and to empower Congress to set its own rate of compensation. ANTI-FEDERALISTS criticized the provision for assigning Congress that power and for insulating senators and representatives from state control. The ratifying conventions of Virginia, New York, and North Carolina recommended amendments barring laws changing legislative compensation from taking effect until after an election of representatives.

Responding to the nationwide demands for amendments, Representative JAMES MADISON of Virginia sorted through the over two hundred proposals to devise those he offered to the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES on June 8, 1789. He chose rights-protecting amendments and "structural amendments" that did not invade the general government's just powers, with the compensation amendment in the latter group. It was the second of twelve amendments proposed by Congress to the states on September 26, 1789. Amendments three through twelve were ratified, becoming known as the BILL OF RIGHTS.

From 1791 through 1982, the compensation amendment languished in limbo, with two exceptions. On May 6, 1873, protesting the Forty-Second Congress's "salary grab" (by which Congress retroactively increased its pay by half), Ohio's legislature ratified the compensation amendment. On March 3, 1978, Wyoming's legislature ratified the amendment, protesting congressional compensation.

In 1982, Gregory D. Watson, then a sophomore at the University of Texas, wrote a paper arguing that the compensation amendment could still be ratified by the states. He then launched a one-man campaign to persuade state legislatures to ratify the amendment.

Most constitutional scholars argued that an implied time-limit on unratified proposed amendments invalidated the 1789 REAPPORTIONMENT and compensation amendments, the 1810 TITLES OF NOBILITY amendment, the 1861 Corwin Amendment, and the 1924 child-labor amendment. Yet, from 1983 to 1992, a parade of states ratified the compensation amendment. By May 7, 1992, it had amassed thirty-eight ratifications (counting those in 1789–1791, 1873, and 1978), enough to meet the three-fourths requirement of the Article V AMENDING PROCESS.

Should all the state ratifications or only those from 1983 through 1992 be deemed valid? Who decides whether an amendment is validly ratified? This latter task was a ministerial one left (1789 to 1951) to the Secretary of State, then (1951 to 1984) to the Administrator of General Services, and finally (since 1984) to the archivist of the United States. When, on May 18, 1992, Archivist Don W. Wilson accepted all the states' ratifications and certified the Amendment, House and SENATE leaders invoked the precedent of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to establish Congress's final authority to confirm an amendment's ratification. On May 20, 1992, the House (414–3) and the Senate (99–0) confirmed the Twenty-Seventh Amendment.

Would the Twenty-Seventh Amendment invalidate the 1989 Ethics in Government Act, which established cost-of-living adjustments automatically keying congressional compensation to the cost-of-living index? In Boehner v. Anderson (1992), the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia refused to decide the amendment's status but, assuming its validity, upheld the statute. On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld the district court but also held the amendment a valid part of the Constitution.

The Twenty-Seventh Amendment's strange history continues to preoccupy constitutional scholars concerned with the theory and practice of constitutional change, but its uniqueness, the modest change it worked in the fabric of the constitutional system, and its pedigree as an amendment proposed by Madison will limit its significance to the abstract realm of CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY.

RICHARD B. BERNSTEIN
(2000)

Bibliography

ANASTAPLO, GEORGE 1995 The Amendments to the Constitution: A Commentary. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press.

BERNSTEIN, RICHARD B. 1992 The Sleeper Wakes: The History and Legacy of the Twenty-Seventh Amendment. Fordham Law Review 61:497–557.

BERNSTEIN, RICHARD B. and AGEL, JEROME 1993 Amending America: If We Love the Constitution So Much, Why Do We Keep Trying to Change It? New York: Times Books/Random House.

KYVIG, DAVID E. 1996 Explicit and Authentic Acts: Amending the U.S. Constitution, 1776–1995. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press.

PORRITT, EDWARD and PORRITT, ANNIE G. 1909 The Unreformed House of Commons: Parliamentary Representation Before 1832. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press.

VILE, JOHN R. 1993 Contemporary Questions Surrounding the Constitutional Amending Process. Westport, Conn.: Praeger.

——— 1994 Constitutional Change in the United States: A Comparative Study of the Role of Constitutional Amendments, Judicial Interpretations, and Legislative and Executive Actions. Westport, Conn.: Praeger.

——— 1996 Encyclopedia of Constitutional Amendments, Proposed Amendments, and Amending Issues, 1789–1995. Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-CLIO.

TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT

Congress proposed the Twenty-Sixth Amendment on March 23, 1971. Ratification was completed in 107 days, the shortest time ever required to complete the AMENDING PROCESS. The amendment standardized the voting age in all federal, state, and local elections at eighteen.

Under the Constitution the power to establish qualifications for voting in all elections was left to the states, except that the qualifications to vote for representatives in Congress (and, after the SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT, for senators) had to be the same as those to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the state legislature. Under various amendments, VOTING RIGHTS could not constitutionally be denied or abridged on account of race, color, previous servitude, sex, or failure to pay taxes; the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT set twenty-one as the highest minimum age a state could require for voters. Before 1970 only four states had enacted a minimum voting age lower than twenty-one.

In the VOTING RIGHTS AMENDMENTS of 1970, Congress purported to lower the voting age to eighteen for all elections. The Supreme Court, in OREGON V. MITCHELL (1970), upheld the statute, insofar as it pertained to federal elections, under Article I, section 4, which authorizes Congress to regulate the time and manner of elections of its members; but the Court held the act unconstitutional insofar as it pertained to state elections. The decision threatened to throw the 1972 elections into chaos, because in most states the voting age for balloting for federal officials would have been different from the voting age for state races. The rapidity with which the amendment was ratified is attributable to a general desire to avoid such chaos.

Although Congress, in proposing the amendment, expressed confidence in the "idealism and concern and energy" the new voters would bring to the political system, the actual effect of the amendment has been less than revolutionary. Empirical studies have shown that eighteen-to-twenty-one-year-olds have the lowest voter turnout rate of any age group; and those who do vote do not differ markedly from the rest of the population concerning political parties or issues.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

TWENTY-THIRD AMENDMENT

Proposed by Congress on June 17, 1960, the Twenty-Third Amendment became effective on March 29, 1961. The amendment includes residents of the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA in the process of electing the President and Vice-President by allowing them to choose members of the ELECTORAL COLLEGE. The influence of the district is limited by the proviso permitting it no more electoral votes than the least populous state—in practice fixing the district's electoral votes at three.

As the amendment was introduced by Senator Kenneth Keating, of New York, it would have allocated the District of Columbia as many electoral votes as a state with the same population and would have permitted the district to elect representatives to Congress on the same basis. Representative Emmanuel Celler, of New York, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, reduced it to its final form in order to insure passage. Celler's committee also separated the District of Columbia suffrage amendment from two other amendments (on Congressional vacancies and POLL TAXES) to which the SENATE had linked it.

There was some opposition from Republicans, who predicted the district would inevitably support Democratic candidates, and Southerners, who feared the amendment would increase the political power of blacks.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

TWINING v. NEW JERSEY
211 U.S. 78 (1908)

Twining formed part of the line of decisions, from HURTADO V. CALIFORNIA (1884) and MAXWELL V. DOW (1900) to PALKO V. CONNECTICUT (1937), in which the Supreme Court denied that the traditional Fifth and SIXTH AMENDMENT rights of accused persons were FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS protected against state infringement by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. In Twining, an eight-man majority, speaking through Justice WILLIAM H. MOODY, held that neither the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause nor the DUE PROCESS clause incorporated the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. The Court also considered whether some of the personal rights safeguarded by the BILL OF RIGHTS might be safeguarded against the states because to deny those rights would be to deny due process of law. That is, apart from the question whether the Fourteenth Amendment's protection of immunities and liberty had the effect of incorporating the Fifth Amendment right, the Court also decided the question whether the concept of due process itself was of such a nature as to include the right against self-incrimination. Was a denial of that right a denial of due process?

Although Moody admitted that the Court would not allow history to "strait-jacket" constitutional law, he resorted to "every historical test" to determine how history "rated" the right in question. Moody was a pathetically poor historian; his mangling of the little evidence he knew led him wrongly to conclude that the right against self-incrimination was neither a fundamental right nor part of due process of law. On that reading of history he decided that the state had not violated the Constitution by permitting a trial court to instruct the jury that they might draw adverse inferences against a defendant because of his reliance on the right against self-incrimination or his failure to testify.

Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN delivered another lone dissenting opinion, arguing that immunity against self-incrimination, like the right to INDICTMENT by GRAND JURY and the right to TRIAL BY JURY, should be deemed fundamental and applicable to the states. Whether he believed that the privileges and immunities clause or the due process clause, or both, incorporated the right is not clear; but he certainly believed it to be essential to due process.

At the time the Court held a narrower view of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS, it used an expanded SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS to protect CORPORATIONS and prevent Congress from protecting trade unions (see Adair v. United States, 1908). Adamson v. California (1947) reaffirmed Twining, but the Court overruled both cases in MALLOY V. HOGAN (1964).

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Incorporation Doctrine.)

TWO GUYS FROM HARRISON-ALLENTOWN v. MCGINLEY

See: Sunday Closing Laws

TWO-LEVEL THEORY

In an important 1960 article, Harry Kalven, Jr., coined the phrase "two-level theory." As he described it, FIRST AMENDMENT methodology classified speech at two levels. Some speech was so unworthy as to be beneath First Amendment protection: no First Amendment review was necessary. Thus the Court in CHAPLINSKY V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1942) had referred to "certain well-defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which has never been thought to raise any constitutional problem. These include the lewd and obscene, the profane, the libelous, and the insulting or fighting words." At the second level, speech of constitutional value was protected unless it presented a CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER of a substantive evil.

In a subsequent article Kalven observed that in NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964) neither the two-level approach nor the clear and present danger test was an organizing strategy or guiding methodology. He expressed the hope that the Sullivan Court's unwillingness to employ the two-level theory presaged the theory's demise along with the clear and present danger test. Kalven's hopes have been only partially realized. Perhaps partly as a result of his persuasive efforts, the Court has been willing to scrutinize state justifications for regulating some types of speech previously thought to raise no constitutional problem. Chaplinsky's off-hand assumption that each class of speech in its litany raises no constitutional problem is no longer credible. Nonetheless, the Court continues to be impressed by Chaplinsky's famous OBITER DICTUM that speech beneath the protection of the First Amendment occupies that status because its slight contribution to truth is outweighed by the state interests in order and morality.

Kalven's hope for the complete repudiation of the clear and present danger doctrine also remains unfulfilled. A variation of the doctrine occupies a secure doctrinal place in the context of INCITEMENT TO UNLAWFUL CONDUCT, and the DENNIS V. UNITED STATES (1951) version of the test has been employed by the Court in other contexts, as in Landmark Communications, Inc. v. Virginia (1978) and NEBRASKA PRESS ASSOCIATION V. STUART (1976).

If doctrine were described today in terms of levels, many levels would be necessary. At one level, there is the question whether a First Amendment problem is presented: an effort to communicate a message by assassination presumably raises no First Amendment problem. If cognizable First Amendment values are present, there remains the question whether any legal protection is appropriate: advocacy of illegal action often is unprotected despite the existence of cognizable First Amendment interests. If some protection is appropriate, further questions remain: what protection in what contexts, at what times, in what places, and concerning what modes of expression? A multitude of doctrinal tests now govern a multitude of contexts. Harry Kalven would appreciate the Court's sensitivity to the vicissitudes of human conduct, but likely would regret the absence of an overall vision.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1986)

Bibliography

KALVEN, HARRY, JR. 1960 The Metaphysics of the Law of Obscenity. Supreme Court Review 1960:1–45.

——— 1964 The New York Times Case: A Note on "The Central Meaning of the First Amendment." Supreme Court Review 1964:191–221.

TWO SOVEREIGNTIES RULE

This rule, which the Supreme Court repudiated in Murphy v. Waterfront Commission (1964), was a limitation on the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. Based on the federal principle that one sovereignty has no interest in the law enforcement activities of another, the rule was that a person could not refuse to testify on the grounds that his disclosure would subject him to prosecution by another sovereignty or JURISDICTION. Thus he could be convicted of a federal crime on the basis of testimony compelled in a state proceeding or of a state crime on the basis of testimony compelled in a federal proceeding. In matters involving national supremacy, Congress can grant immunity against state prosecutions, but a state cannot immunize against a federal prosecution and one state cannot immunize against prosecution in another.

The rule entered American constitutional law in 1906 in Hale v. Henkel as a result of the Court's factual mistakes. In that case the appellant, who had received a grant of immunity against federal prosecution, sought reversal of his conviction for contempt by a federal court for refusing to answer questions that exposed him to state prosecution. The Court needlessly declared that English COMMON LAW had settled the question by a rule that "the only danger to be considered is one arising within the same jurisdiction and under that same sovereignty." The Court cited two English cases, one not in point and the other soon discredited by a decision unknown to the Court. In United States v. Murdock (1933), a unanimous Court "definitely settled that one under examination in a federal tribunal could not refuse to answer on account of probable incrimination under state law," a proposition resting on Hale and the two English precedents. By 1944 the Court made the two sovereignties rule reciprocal, so that a suspect could be whipsawed into incriminating himself in one jurisdiction by receiving a grant of immunity from another. State and federal authorities sometimes assisted each other, one compelling disclosure, the other prosecuting. So matters stood until the Murphy case.

Although granted immunity by New York and New Jersey, Murphy remained silent because his answers might incriminate him under federal law. He won a reversal of his conviction when the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG, exposed the erroneous basis of the precedents and concluded that the two sovereignties rule had no support in history or in the policies underlying the Fifth Amendment right. On the same day, in MALLOY V. HOGAN (1964), the Court extended that right to the states. Given that extension and a broad view of the right, the Court held that a state witness is protected against incrimination under both federal and state law and a federal witness is similarly protected. Justices BYRON R. WHITE and POTTER STEWART concurred separately. Murphy also stands for the proposition that use immunity rather than TRANSACTIONAL IMMUNITY satisfies the demand of the Fifth Amendment at least in a two sovereignties case.

A two sovereignties rule still operates with respect to DOUBLE JEOPARDY: a person may be prosecuted for both state and federal crimes committed by the same act.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

TYLER, JOHN
(1790–1862)

A Virginia lawyer, governor, and United States senator, John Tyler, a Democrat elected Vice-President as a Whig in 1840 became America's first accidential President upon the death of William Henry Harrison in 1841. This peaceful transition of leaders underscored the strength of the Constitution even though it frustrated the Whig politicians who had nominated Harrison. As President, Tyler was usually a constitutional strict constructionist, and many of his policies resembled those of ANDREW JACKSON. Tyler refused to interfere with the SOVEREIGNTY of Rhode Island during Dorr's Rebellion, but he was an early advocate of Texas annexation which was accomplished in the last months of his administration. In 1861 Tyler chaired the Washington Peace Conference, but after its failure he advocated SECESSION. The only former President to serve the Confederacy, Tyler was elected to the provisional Congress and the Confederate House of Representatives.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

MORGAN, ROBERT J. 1954 A Whig Embattled: The Presidency of John Tyler. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.

TYSON & BROTHER v. BANTON
273 U.S. 418 (1927)

Citing Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT's opinion in WOLFF PACKING COMPANY V. COURT OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS (1923), Justice GEORGE SUTHERLAND found unconstitutional a New York statute regulating ticket "scalpers." The state based the law on a declaration that theater prices were AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST, but because the theater business did not fit Taft's categories, the law fell as a violation of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT and a denial of DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES dissented: "a state legislature may do whatever it sees fit to do unless it is restrained by some express prohibition in the [federal or state] constitution." Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS joined him and Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE wrote a separate dissent. All three urged rejection of the public interest concept—"a fiction intended to beautify what is disagreeable to the sufferers"—in favor of state regulation wherever the public welfare demanded it.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: New State Ice Company v. Liebmann; Ribnik v. McBride.)

U

ULLMANN v. UNITED STATES
350 U.S. 422 (1956)

Ullmann, relying on his right not to be a witness against himself, refused to testify before a federal GRAND JURY concerning his alleged communist activities. Though he received immunity against prosecution for any criminal transaction concerning which he was compelled to testify, he continued pertinacious. Ullmann argued against the constitutionality of the congressional Immunity Act of 1954 on the grounds that it did not immunize him from such disabilities as loss of job, expulsion from labor unions, compulsory registration as a subversive, passport ineligibility, and general public opprobrium. Thus he distinguished his case from BROWN V. WALKER (1896) on the theory that he had not received full transactional immunity. The Court rejected Ullmann's argument, 7–2. Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER for the majority reasoned that the Fifth Amendment's right to silence operated only to prevent the compulsion of testimony that might expose one to a criminal charge. The disabilities to which Ullmann claimed exposure were not criminal penalties. Justices WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS and HUGO L. BLACK, dissenting, would have held the immunity act unconstitutional on the ground that the right of silence created by the Fifth Amendment is beyond the reach of Congress. Douglas contended that the amendment was designed to protect against INFAMY, as well as prosecution, and against forfeitures—those disabilities of which Ullmann spoke—as well as criminal fines and imprisonment.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

ULTRA VIRES

(Latin: "Beyond powers.") This term applies either to acts taken by a CORPORATION beyond the limits of its chartered (legally authorized) powers or to acts of a public official beyond his or her delegated authority.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

"ULYSSES," ONE BOOK ENTITLED, UNITED STATES v.
5F. Supp. 182 (1933)
72 F.2d 705 (1934)

Although it was not a decision of the Supreme Court, Ulysses was not merely a case involving a famous book and prominent judges but also a harbinger of modern decisions on OBSCENITY. Its standards for construing the COMMON LAW terms embodied in federal customs regulations were transmuted in UNITED STATES V. ROTH (1957) into constitutional principles for testing both federal and state legislation on the subject.

The handful of early obscenity cases that reached the Supreme Court mainly presented claims of technical error in the trials below. Ulysses presented clear questions of substantive standards for adjudging obscenity and lewdness. The established reputation of the book insured careful attention; Judge John M. Woolsey's lower court opinion was unmistakably written for the anthologies it ultimately graced. Judge AUGUSTUS N. HAND's appellate majority opinion was straightforward, but Judge Martin T. Manton's dissent was somewhat verbose.

Woolsey declared that the book successfully showed "how the screen [sic] of consciousness with its ever-shifting kaleidoscopic impression carries, as it were on a plastic palimpsest, . . . a penumbral zone residual of past impressions . . . not unlike the result of a double or, if that is possible, a multiple exposure on a cinema film. . . ."

The relevant statute on importation of books prohibited not pandering but obscenity. Woolsey announced without discussion that the test for obscenity required examination of the whole work. The standard was the effect on "what the French would call l'homme moyen sensuel—who plays, in this branch of legal inquiry . . . the same role . . . as does the "reasonable man in the law of torts. . . ." With this standard he found the book "somewhat emetic, nowhere . . . an aphrodisiac." He also found Joyce to have been sincere and lacking pornographic intent or the "leer of the sensualist."

At the appellate level Augustus Hand for himself and LEARNED HAND managed to come to grips with the central legal issue—whether isolated passages could render a work of art obscene. This was the test derived from Regina v. Hicklin (1868), the classic British case, and, they conceded, followed in United States v. Bennett (1879), a CIRCUIT COURT decision by Justice SAMUEL BLATCHFORD. They discounted other alleged precedents and argued that the isolated passages concept was not followed for works of science or medicine and should not be followed for literature either. They cited state decisions embracing the "dominant effect" notion, and read that test (together with their definition of the relevant audience) into the statute, concluding that other readings would be impractical and overrestrictive.

Manton, dissenting, insisted that federal decisions in the past had accepted the "isolated passages" test. As literature was for amusement only, the community could reasonably demand that it meet moral standards—those of average, not exceptional, individuals.

SAMUEL KRISLOV
(1986)

Bibliography

LOCKHART, WILLIAM B. and MCCLURE, ROBERT C. 1954 Literature, the Law of Obscenity, and the Constitution. Minnesota Law Review 38:295–395.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL CONDITIONS

Although government may not be obligated to provide its citizens with a certain benefit or privilege, it is not free to condition granting the benefit or privilege on the recipient's relinquishing a constitutional right. Likewise, the government may not withhold or cancel the benefit by way of penalizing the assertion of a constitutional right. For example, in SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963) the Supreme Court held South Carolina's unemployment compensation act unconstitutional as applied to exclude a Seventh Day Adventist from benefits when she would not find a job releasing her from work on Saturdays. Withholding the benefits effectively penalized exercise of the claimant's RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

It has sometimes been argued that a legislature's greater power of withholding a benefit must necessarily include the lesser power of granting the benefit with restrictions. On this theory, the recipient of the benefit is deprived of no right, for the right can be retained simply by rejecting the proffered benefit. This logic leads to drastic consequences as government becomes increasingly involved in supplying such vital needs as jobs, housing, welfare, and EDUCATION.

As early as Frost & Frost Trucking Company v. Railroad Commission (1926) the Court recognized the potential for excess conditions on the exercise of constitutional rights: "If the state may compel the surrender of one constitutional right as a condition of its favor, it may, in like manner, compel a surrender of all. It is inconceivable that guarantees embedded in the Constitution of the United States may thus be manipulated out of existence."

Subsequent courts have rarely been persuaded by arguments claiming an absolute power of government to condition and limit the grant of general benefits. Rather, they have generally recognized that the revocation of benefits amounts to regulatory activity by government, for which sufficient justification must be established if constitutional rights are restricted. This doctrine of unconstitutional conditions has been successfully applied to restrain assertions of unlimited governmental power in four major substantial areas: the privilege of out-of-state corporations to engage in local business; the use of public property and facilities; the receipt of entitlements and social service benefits; and government employment.

As early as 1839, the Supreme Court announced that a state might exclude out-of-state corporations from conducting business within its borders. In early cases, this power to exclude was held sufficient to justify highly unreasonable conditions on entry and even the arbitrary revocation of a corporation's license. Subsequent Court decisions, however, have subjected such regulations to DUE PROCESS standards. Given the Court's increasing sensitivity to national interests in economic growth and the smooth functioning of the federal system, it is not surprising that the Court invoked the doctrine of unconstitutional conditions to check a power previously thought to be virtually absolute.

In 1897 the Court upheld an ordinance that prohibited public speaking in a municipal park without a permit from the mayor. The Court reasoned that ownership of the land gave the city the right to withhold access completely; the city therefore could grant access on any conditions, including those restricting FIRST AMENDMENT freedoms. This logic has been invalidated by later decisions which have viewed the manipulation of access to streets and parks as regulatory activity subject to constitutional attack. (See PUBLIC FORUM.)

Given the large number of benefits now provided by government, the imposition of conditions on the recipients of such benefits raises a significant possibility of undermining individual liberties. The Supreme Court has used unconstitutional condition analysis to prevent such a result in cases involving unemployment compensation, WELFARE BENEFITS, public housing, tax exemptions, public education, and the mail services. One leading doctrinal basis for these decisions has been the guarantee of PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS.

In McAuliffe v. Mayor of New England (1892) the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court denied the petition of a policeman who had been fined for violating a regulation restricting his political activity. Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, speaking for the state court, stated: "The petitioner may have a constitutional right to talk politics, but he has no constitutional right to be a policeman. . . . There are few employments for hire in which the servant does not agree to suspend his constitutional right of free speech, as well as of idleness, by the implied terms of his contract. The servant cannot complain, as he takes his employment on the terms which are offered him." More recently, however, courts have found conditions on employees unconstitutional irrespective of any abstract right to public employment. The courts have asked whether the condition restricts employment in a "patently arbitrary and discriminatory manner" in violation of due process, as set forth in WIEMAN V. UPDEGRAFF (1952), and whether, in withholding or revoking employment under conditions capable of improper application, the state is penalizing specific constitutional freedoms.

Although claims of unconstitutional conditions in these four areas have become less common in recent years, the doctrine has recently emerged in the sphere of CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, particularly in cases involving the guilty plea. PLEA BARGAINING effectively penalizes the exercise of the right to trial by rewarding those who plead guilty. In addition, it denies the individual the RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION and the right to confront and cross-examine witnesses against him. The Court, however, has endorsed the use of plea bargaining. Rather than address the challenges raised by the unconstitutional conditions doctrine, the Court has insisted only that guilty pleas be "voluntary and intelligent" and that the plea bargaining process conform to certain standards of fairness. The tension between the principle of unconstitutional conditions and the Court's endorsement of plea bargaining seems likely to produce future controversy.

ARTHUR ROSETT
(1986)

Bibliography

VAN ALSTYNE, WILLIAM W. 1968 The Demise of the Right-Privilege Distinction in Constitutional Law. Harvard Law Review 81:1439–1464.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL CONDITIONS
(Update)

Unconstitutional conditions problems arise when government conditions allocation of a benefit such as public PROPERTY, jobs, or funds upon surrender of a constitutional right. Government's coercive deprivation of a right through the imposition of criminal or civil liability normally triggers a demand for strong justification. Government's mere exercise of budgetary discretion, however, normally triggers only deferential JUDICIAL REVIEW. The DOCTRINE of unconstitutional conditions holds that some selective allocations of benefits are equivalent to coercive deprivations of rights. The difficulty is in determining when this is so.

The Supreme Court has tended to steer between two polar positions. On the one hand, it has declined to hold that government has absolute allocative discretion when it acts in its capacity as property owner, employer, or patron. This view is epitomized by the famous epigram of Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., in McAuliffe v. Mayor of New England (1892) that a policeman "may have a constitutional right to talk politics, but he has no constitutional right to be a policeman." On the other hand, the Court has also declined to hold that constitutional limits extend to government in these proprietary capacities as completely as they do to government in its sovereign capacity. Instead, the Court has tended to draw a series of public/private distinctions among conditions on benefits, categorizing some as akin to the exercise of sovereign power subject to strong constitutional constraints and others as the mere exercise of managerial prerogative.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH claims provide the most abundant recent examples of such categorization, which may be considered separately with respect to conditions upon speech on public property, speech by PUBLIC EMPLOYEES, and speech by recipients of public funds. Under a long line of decisions recognizing certain public property as PUBLIC FORUMS, government may not condition speakers' access to public streets or parks on submission to government content control or excessive time, place, or manner regulation. But a more recent line of decisions exempts a wide range of government property other than streets and parks from such constitutional limitations. For example, government may pick and choose which speakers may place circulars in public school teachers' mailboxes, solicit funds in charitable fund drives in public workplaces, demonstrate or petition on sidewalks abutting post offices, solicit donations in airport terminals, or participate in a candidate debate broadcast on public television—even though such discrimination would not be allowed among speakers in streets and parks. Each of these locations within the vast realm of government property has been deemed a "nonpublic forum," in which government may condition access as selectively as it likes so long as it acts reasonably and avoids discrimination on the basis of viewpoint.

The Court has divided claims against speech-restrictive conditions on public employment along similar lines. On the one hand, public employees do not shed their First Amendment rights at the workplace gate, and government may not without strong justification condition retention of their jobs on silence in their public capacities as citizens. A public school teacher may criticize a school board for spending too much on athletics, a clerical worker in a sheriff's office may express bantering disappointment that an attempted assassination of the President was unsuccessful, and civil servants may receive honoraria for their off-duty speeches or articles—all without job sanction unless the government can make a particularized showing that such speech will disrupt the workplace or impair government efficiency. On the other hand, public employees may be freely discharged or demoted for expressing mere LABOR grievances internal to their workplace, such as soliciting coworker expression of hostility toward the boss. Similarly, a government job or contract may not be conditioned upon PATRONAGE or the recipient's association with the incumbent POLITICAL PARTY, except in a narrow set of confidential or policymaking positions.

In challenges to the selective allocation of public funds to some speakers and not others, the Court has distinguished between the mere refusal to subsidize speech of particular content, which is constitutional unless aimed at the suppression of a particular viewpoint, and the impermissible use of the leverage of the government funding to alter what the speaker would otherwise say with private resources. For example, government may not condition a public BROADCASTING subsidy on a station's foregoing all editorializing even if funded with private contributions. But government may withhold a subsidy in the form of tax benefits from the lobbying efforts of a nonprofit organization when this nonsubsidy does not affect the nonlobbying speech or advocacy of the organization, and may limit family planning funds to those health care entities that agree not to advocate or counsel women about ABORTION. As the MAJORITY OPINION in RUST V. SULLIVAN (1991) stated, "when the government appropriates public funds to establish a program it is entitled to define the limits of that program."

The doctrine of unconstitutional conditions in the First Amendment area was largely the handiwork of the late Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., who wrote in SPEISER V. RANDALL (1958) and in SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963) that in an expanded WELFARE STATE, the deprivation of a government benefit might penalize or deter the exercise of constitutional rights to the same extent as a criminal fine. His assumption seemed to be that if government had enough market power, it could distort the interplay of ideas in society by wielding carrots as well as sticks. At the extreme, this is certainly true; if government were the sole provider of an opportunity, then a condition on government allocation of that opportunity would have the same effects as a coercive regulation, for there would be no escape from government monopoly. Brennan may also have assumed that, even if the public sector were more limited, rights-pressuring conditions on government benefits would create a caste system in which those who are dependent on government aid enjoy more constricted opportunity to exercise constitutional rights than those with private means.

The REHNQUIST COURT might well have been expected to be less receptive to the doctrine of unconstitutional conditions. Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST himself has been an ardent critic of the doctrine. For example, he criticized the majority's decision to give First Amendment scrutiny to public school library book removals in Pico v. Board of Education (1982), arguing that "the role of government as sovereign is subject to more stringent limitations than is the role of government as employer, property owner, or educator." He likewise criticized the majority in Federal Communications Commission v. League of Women Voters (1984), which invalidated anti-editorializing conditions on public broadcasting subsidies, for treating the government as "the 'Big Bad Wolf' " to the public broadcaster's " 'Little Red Riding Hood' " when in fact "some of the food in the basket was given to Little Red Riding Hood by the Big Bad Wolf himself."

This view, as opposed to Brennan's, appears to assume that for most purposes government is not a monopolist but rather just one speaker among many, and therefore is not able to repress dissent as effectively through conditions on benefits as it can through regulation. One who loses public funds may seek private patrons, and there are private substitutes for public space or jobs. On this view, a condition on the allocation of public space, salary, or subsidy is not a coercive exercise of power so much as a contractual offer and acceptance. For example, Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, concurring in the Court's decision in National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley (1998), which upheld a condition that public arts grants meet general standards of "decency" and "respect" for public values, wrote that there is a fundamental difference "between 'abridging' speech and funding it," and that the First Amendment is simply inapplicable to the selective allocation of funds.

Nonetheless, the Holmesean views expressed in these examples by Rehnquist and Scalia have failed to garner a majority on the Court, leaving the doctrine of unconstitutional conditions intact if somewhat curtailed. The Court has continued to hold, moreover, that even when acting in its proprietary capacities, government, unlike a purely private landlord, employer, or patron, may not engage in viewpoint discrimination unless it is enlisting the sponsored person to express a message on the polity's behalf. For example, in ROSENBERGER V. RECTOR & VISITORS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA (1995), a majority of the Court (joined among others by Rehnquist and Scalia) held that a public university that funds a range of student publications from a mandatory student activities fee may not decline to subsidize an avowedly Christian student magazine for reason of its religious perspective.

Nor are recent applications of the unconstitutional conditions principle limited to the First Amendment. In South Dakota v. Dole (1987), which upheld a requirement that states receiving federal highway funds raise their minimum drinking age, the Court suggested that there is some outer limit to how far the federal government may go in using regulatory conditions on federal funding to induce state adherence to federal policy. And in Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987) and DOLAN V. TIGARD (1994), the Court held that government may not use its power to withhold a ZONING variance as leverage to take access to property for reasons not closely related to the zoning law's purpose. In both the FEDERALISM and the TAKING OF PROPERTY areas, as in the free speech area, unconstitutional conditions doctrine helps limit the use of government economic leverage to influence the exercise of constitutional rights.

KATHLEEN M. SULLIVAN
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Government as Proprietor.)

Bibliography

COLE, DAVID 1992 Beyond Unconstitutional Conditions: Charting Spheres of Neutrality in Government-Funded Speech. New York University Law Review 67:675–749.

EPSTEIN, RICHARD 1994 Bargaining with the State. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

POST, ROBERT C. 1996 Subsidized Speech. Yale Law Journal 106:151–195.

SULLIVAN, KATHLEEN M. 1989 Unconstitutional Conditions. Harvard Law Review 102:1413–1506.

UNCONSTITUTIONALITY

The American concept of unconstitutionality was born before the Constitution was adopted. The STAMP ACT CONGRESS of 1765, for example, declared that acts of Parliament imposing TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION were unconstitutional and need not be obeyed. Then as now, of course, the British constitution was an unwritten collection of customs and usages, only partly reflected in statutes and COMMON LAW principles. Since the adoption of the earliest state constitutions, however, the statement that a governmental action is unconstitutional has been taken as an assertion that the action violates a written constitution. In common speech, "unconstitutional" normally refers to an action's invalidity under the United States Constitution, but in law the term also refers to invalidity under a state constitution. Legislation is not the only form of governmental action that may be unconstitutional. When police officers conduct unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES, for example, they act unconstitutionally. Similarly, a state court acts unconstitutionally when it enforces a racially RESTRICTIVE COVENANT.

An assertion of unconstitutionality can be made by anyone: a citizen making a complaint, a newspaper editorial writer, a lawyer arguing a case. The assertion may take on a more authoritative character when it is made by a public officer acting in a governmental capacity. Thus, the President might veto a bill passed by Congress on the ground that it is unconstitutional. (See CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866; JACKSON'S VETO OF THE BANK BILL.) Or, the President might refuse to enforce an act of Congress on similar grounds. Such a presidential refusal led the House of Representatives to adopt ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT against ANDREW JOHNSON, thus registering its view that Johnson's conduct was itself unconstitutional. An executive officer may decline to enforce a law for the purpose of allowing others to frame a TEST CASE, thus allowing the courts to rule on the law's validity. BOARD OF EDUCATION V. ALLEN (1968) resulted from one such refusal.

The official in Allen thought it important to get a judicial ruling on the constitutionality of the law in question. In fact, Americans have become accustomed to identifying the idea of unconstitutionality with a judicial declaration of unconstitutionality—and, in particular, with such a declaration by the Supreme Court. A lawyer, asked by a client whether a law is or is not constitutional, ordinarily will respond with a prediction of what the courts will hold.

From MARBURY V. MADISON (1803) forward, American courts have assumed that they have the power to disregard a statute that violates a constitutional norm. When a court holds a statute unconstitutional it refuses to give effect to the law in the case before it. Indeed, the Marbury opinion grounded the principle of JUDICIAL REVIEW in the need for a court to decide the case before it according to law, including the Constitution as the supreme law. Federal courts are not permitted to give ADVISORY OPINIONS on the law but make their constitutional rulings only in the context of concrete CASES AND CONTROVERSIES. Yet there is a sense in which any opinion is, in part, advisory. The statement of a reason for decision requires a court to move from the particulars of the case before it to the more abstract level of a rule or principle which can be applied later as a precedent in deciding another appropriate case. Occasionally, particularly in the area of the FREEDOMS OF SPEECH and of the PRESS, a court may hold a law INVALID ON ITS FACE. But even if the court merely says it is holding the law "invalid as applied," the ruling becomes a precedent for other applications to similar facts.

In a statement now famous for its inaccuracy, the Supreme Court said in Norton v. Shelby County (1886) that an unconstitutional law "is not a law; it confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords no protection; it creates no office; it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never been passed." The statement is misleading in two respects. First, courts are no better than anyone else at undoing the past. A great many actions may be taken on the basis of a statute in the time between its enactment and its judicial invalidation. Justice often requires that those actions be given effect: a corporation organized under an invalid statute will be bound under its contracts; an official who enforces a law in good faith before the law is held invalid will not be liable in damages for the action. In Lemon v. Kurtzman II (1973), the Supreme Court allowed Pennsylvania to reimburse church schools for educational services performed under a statute before the Court had held the law invalid in LEMON V. KURTZMAN I (1971).

Second, the Norton statement is misleading in the context of an OVERRULING of a previous decision that has held a statute invalid. In ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923) the Supreme Court had held the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA MINIMUM WAGE LAW unconstitutional, but in WEST COAST HOTEL CO. V. PARRISH (1937), the Court overruled Adkins. Was it then necessary for Congress to reenact the law for it to be effective? The attorney general issued an opinion answering this question negatively, and no one now challenges that opinion's soundness.

Determining whether a court has actually held a law unconstitutional may prove more difficult than identifying the court's HOLDING on the underlying constitutional law. In dealing with a federal statute, for example, the Supreme Court may make clear its view of the Constitution's command, but it may not make clear whether it has held the statute invalid or construed the statute narrowly to avoid holding it unconstitutional. Such an ambiguity still bemuses collectors of antique trivia when they contemplate HODGSON V. BOWERBANK (1809).

Ultimately, the notion of unconstitutionality refers not so much to a fact—or even an opinion, judicial or otherwise—as to a decisional process. In that process courts play the most prominent role, but now and then they yield the center of the stage to other actors. (See ABRAHAM LINCOLN; THOMAS JEFFERSON; WATERGATE AND THE CONSTITUTION.)

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. 1962 The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

FIELD, OLIVER P. 1935 The Effect of an Unconstitutional Statute. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

UNENUMERATED RIGHTS

The starting point for interpreting the NINTH AMENDMENT is its text: "The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." The text and the rule of construction that requires plain meaning to be followed clearly establishes the existence of unenumerated rights. Why would the Framers have included an amendment that protects such rights in the midst of the BILL OF RIGHTS, which specifies rights in the first eight amendments?

The Framers scarcely had an alternative after they botched an explanation for their failure to have included a bill of rights as part of the original Constitution. They protected a few rights in it, but ignored most; and they subsequently made several frail and foolish explanations instead of confessing misjudgment and promising subsequent amendments. As a result they placed RATIFICATION in serious jeopardy. The Constitution was finally ratified only because crucial states, where ratification had been in doubt, accepted a pledge that a bill of rights would be added to the Constitution in the form of amendments.

THE FEDERALIST #84 presented a commonplace ratificationist argument that boomeranged and made necessary a provision safeguarding unspecified rights. According to ALEXANDER HAMILTON, a bill of rights was unnecessary and even dangerous, because by containing exceptions to powers not granted, it would provide a basis for repressive LEGISLATION. For example, to say that liberty of the press ought not be restricted furnished "a plausible pretense" for the very power feared, a power to legislate on the press, because a provision "against restraining the liberty of the press afforded a clear implication that a power to prescribe proper regulations concerning it was intended to be vested in the national government." Equally dangerous, the omission of some right in a catalogue of rights allowed the assumption that it was meant to be unguarded. JAMES MADISON, OLIVER ELLSWORTH, and JAMES WILSON, among other leading Framers, made the same damaging argument.

Their logic, which nearly undid their cause, surely merited public rejection. They proved that the particular rights that the unamended Constitution protected—no RELIGIOUS TESTS, bans on BILLS OF ATTAINDER and EX POST FACTO LAWS, and TRIALS BY JURY in criminal cases, among other rights—stood in grave jeopardy because to specify a right implied a power to violate it. Moreover, the inclusion of some rights in the Constitution implied, contradictorily, that all unenumerated ones were relinquished. The unsatisfactory arguments by ratificationists imperiled their cause and obliged them to reconsider.

Madison switched to the cause of amending the Constitution with a bill of rights in order to appease the fears of the people. When he rose in Congress to propose constitutional amendments, he asserted that the Constitution must "expressly declare the great rights of mankind." He acknowledged that a major objection to a bill of rights consisted of the argument that "by enumerating particular exceptions to the grant of power, it would disparage those rights which were not placed in that enumeration; and it might follow, by implication, that those rights which were not singled out, were intended to be assigned into the hands of the General Government, and were consequently insecure." This claim had become a ratificationist cliché that self-destructed because the Constitution explicitly protected several rights exposing all those omitted, including "the great rights of mankind" to governmental violation. Madison's solution was the simple proposal that became the Ninth Amendment. It was, he said, meant to guard against the possibility that unenumerated rights might be at risk as a result of the enumeration of some. By excepting enumerated rights from the grant of powers, no implication was intended and no inference should be drawn that rights not excepted from the grant of powers were at risk. As Madison phrased his proposal, it read as follows: "The exceptions [to power] here or elsewhere in the constitution made in favor of particular rights, shall not be so construed as to diminish the just importance of other rights retained by the people. . . ."

What were the unenumerated rights retained by the people? They had to be either "natural rights" or "positive rights," to use Madison's own terms. He distinguished "the preexistent rights of nature" from those "resulting from a SOCIAL COMPACT." He mentioned freedom of "speach" (sic) as a natural right, but failed to include it in his recommendations. (A committee rectified this oversight.) His omission illustrates his acknowledgment of an important right that briefly fell within the unenumerated category. In Madison's thinking, this category also included the natural right of the people to govern themselves and to alter their government when it was inadequate to its purposes. Those purposes embodied another unenumerated natural right: governments are instituted to secure the people "in the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right of acquiring and using property and generally of pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety." Madison had borrowed from the preamble of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, which expressed opinions on natural rights that were shared by virtually all Americans and were central to the meaning of the Ninth Amendment.

Its text meant what it said; its context consists of the widespread endorsement of natural rights at the time of the framing of the Bill of Rights. STATE CONSTITUTIONS referred to natural rights. Virginia's 1788 recommendations for amendments to the Constitution did so also, as had New York's and North Carolina's. At the Pennsylvania ratifying convention, James Wilson, second only to Madison as an architect of the Constitution, quoted the preamble of the Declaration of Independence and added, "This is the broad basis on which our independence was placed; on the same certain and solid foundation this system [the Constitution] is erected."

The Framers also believed that all people had a right to equal justice and to equality of rights before the law. That slaveholders subscribed to such opinions proves the inconsistency of some of the Framers and their inability to transform their societies. But ABRAHAM LINCOLN understood when he described the creation of a new nation "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." The Ninth Amendment embodied the principle of equality as well as that of liberty. Madison himself, when presenting his recommended amendments, spoke of "the perfect equality of mankind." Other natural rights that were unenumerated included the right, then important, to hunt and fish; the RIGHT TO TRAVEL; the right to associate freely with others; and the right to intimate association or privacy in matters concerning family and sex, at least within the bounds of marriage. Such rights were fundamental to the pursuit of happiness.

In addition to natural rights, the unenumerated rights included some that were positive, deriving not from "Nature's God," but from social compacts that created governments. What positive rights were familiar when the Ninth Amendment became part of the Constitution, yet were not enumerated in the original text or the first eight amendments? The right to vote and hold office, the right of free elections, the right not to be taxed except by consent through representatives of one's choice, the right to be free from monopolies, the right to be free from standing armies in time of peace, the right to refuse military service on grounds of religious conscience, the right to choose a profession, and the right of an accused person to an initial presumption of innocence and to have the prosecution shoulder the responsibility of proving guilt beyond a REASONABLE DOUBT—all these were among existing positive rights protected by various state laws, state constitutions, and the COMMON LAW; and all were unenumerated. Any of these rights, among others, could legitimately be regarded as rights of the people before which the powers of government must be exercised in subordination.

In addition to rights then known, the Ninth Amendment probably had the purpose of providing the basis for unknown rights that time alone might disclose. Nothing in the thinking of the Framers foreclosed the possibility that new rights might claim the loyalties of succeeding generations. As EDMUND PENDLETON, Virginia's chief justice and a leading ratificationist, mused when the Bill of Rights was being framed, "May we not in the progress of things, discover some great and important [right], which we don't now think of?"

Without doubt, to read the Ninth Amendment as a cornucopia of unenumerated rights is an invitation to JUDICIAL ACTIVISM. As Professor John Hart Ely has written, if natural rights in particular are read into the amendment, it does not lend itself "to principled judicial enforcement." But neither do enumerated rights—natural or positive. FREEDOM OF SPEECH and DUE PROCESS OF LAW, to mention one of each kind of right, have resulted in some of the most subjective result-oriented constitutional JURISPRUDENCE in our history. The fact that judicial decisions can be unprincipled or biased does not detract from the principle expressed in a right, whether or not it is enumerated.

If the Ninth Amendment instructs us to look beyond its four corners for unenumerated rights of the people, as it does, it must have some content. To read it as if it is merely the converse side of the TENTH AMENDMENT is to confuse the two amendments, as did Professor Raoul Berger. He spoke of "the ninth's retention of rights by the states or the people." It is the Tenth Amendment that reserves powers, not rights, to the states or to the people. The Ninth Amendment, according to Berger, "was merely declaratory of a basic presupposition: all powers not "positively' granted are reserved to the people. It added no unspecified rights to the Bill of Rights." In fact, however, an explicit declaration of the existence of unenumerated rights is an addition of unspecified rights to the Bill of Rights. Confusion between the Ninth and Tenth amendments originated with proposals for amendments by Virginia in 1788. Moreover, Madison himself argued that the line between a power granted and a right retained by the people amounted to the same thing if a right were named. Unenumerated rights, however, are not named, and no affirmative power has been delegated to regulate or abridge them.

Without doubt, the Ninth Amendment and its problem of identifying unenumerated rights continue to bedevil interpreters, on and off the bench. Courts do continue to discover rights that have no textual existence and might be considered unenumerated, but for the judicial propensity to ignore the Ninth Amendment and make believe that some unspecified right under discussion derives from a right that is enumerated. Opponents of such rights howl their denunciation of judicial activism. Court-invented rights exceed in number the rights enumerated. Judges have composed rights great and small, including the MIRANDA RULES, the right to engage in nude dancing with pasties and G-string, the right to engage in FLAG DESECRATION, the right to secure an ABORTION, or the right against the invasion of an expectation of privacy.

So long as we continue to believe that government is instituted for the sake of securing the rights of the people and must exercise its powers in subordination to those rights, the Ninth Amendment should have the vitality intended for it. The problem is not so much whether the rights it guarantees are as worthy of enforcement as are the enumerated rights; the problem, rather, is whether our courts should read out of the amendment rights worthy of our respect, which the Framers might conceivably have meant to safeguard, at least in principle.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Freedom of Assembly and Association; Freedom of Intimate Association; Right of Privacy.)

Bibliography

BARNETT, RANDY E., ed. 1988 Symposium on Interpreting the Ninth Amendment. Chicago-Kent Law Review 64:37–268.

BERGER, RAOUL 1980 The Ninth Amendment. Cornell Law Review 61:1–26.

CAPLAN, RUSSELL L. 1983 The History and Meaning of the Ninth Amendment. Virginia Law Review 69:223–268.

REDLICH, NORMAN 1989 The Ninth Amendment as a Constitutional Prism. Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 12: 23–28.

UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE ACT

See: Military Justice

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD CO. v. UNITED STATES

See: Sinking Fund Cases

UNITARY EXECUTIVE

The idea of a unitary executive is neither new nor radical. The Framers rejected several proposals to split the executive, and there have been adherents of a strong centralized executive ever since, from GEORGE WASHINGTON to WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT to RONALD REAGAN. The language of Article II of the Constitution seemingly embraces some form of unitary executive by vesting "the EXECUTIVE POWER" in a President; assigning the President the responsibility to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed"; and directing the President to appoint all principal officers of the United States. Arguments today for greater centralized control based on the unitary executive ideal coalesce around two virtues: accountability and effective leadership.

The constitutional structure stresses accountability in order to secure individual liberty. Articles I, II, and III delineate powers that the branches are to exercise, the better to clarify the lines of constitutional authority. The President stands responsible for all discharge of policy, and is judged by his or her performance on election day. To be sure, voters cannot always call the President to account with respect to one particular issue given that they vote for a candidate based on that candidate's entire record. Nonetheless, the political process remains open to air misgivings about presidential leadership, and as those concerns mount in importance, they may become determinative at election time.

This is not to suggest that the President must personally craft all foreign and domestic policy initiatives. Congress can create new offices pursuant to the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE and delegate responsibility to government officials. But the President must be able to superintend that policy in order not to fragment and dissipate accountability. As ALEXANDER HAMILTON noted in Federalist No. 70:

> [It] often becomes impossible, amidst mutual accusations, to determine on whom the blame or the punishment of a pernicious measure . . . ought really to fall. . . . [The] circumstances which may have led to any national miscarriage or misfortune are sometimes so complicated that where there are a number of actors who may have had different degrees and kind of agency . . . it may be impracticable to pronounce to whose account the evil which may have been incurred is truly chargeable.

Liberty is gained to the extent that one electorally accountable official stands responsible for such law implementation efforts. With a plural executive, responsibility may be shrouded, and the costs of determining who was responsible for what will increase.

Given the pervasive delegations by Congress, the President can maintain control for law administration principally through the APPOINTING AND REMOVAL POWER exercised over executive officials. Although there may be disagreement about the level of officer subject to the President's appointment power, those adhering to the unitary executive regard restrictions on the President's appointment authority with great suspicion. Congress's decision to reserve for its own officers implementation authority, as in the FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT, or Congress's decision to vest appointment authority in the judiciary, as with the INDEPENDENT COUNSEL, undermine the accountability imperative.

Similarly, the power to remove officers represents the only formal means by which the President can control subordinates' ongoing exercise of power and ensure unified execution of the law. The power to remove an official is emblematic of a continuing relationship between the President and subordinate officials and, in the public eye, links those officials' conduct to the presidency itself. When Congress prevents the President from removing executive officers, as with the TENURE OF OFFICE ACT during RECONSTRUCTION, accountability is diminished.

Disagreement remains over the type of removal authority that must be wielded to ensure the rudiments of centralized control. The Supreme Court delphically stated in Morrison v. Olson (1988) that Presidents must retain control sufficient to discharge their "constitutionally appointed functions." Morrison apparently authorizes Congress to prevent the President from discharging most officials except upon a showing of "good cause," such as misconduct in office. Some would argue instead that the President must be able to discharge at will any senior executive official to preserve the close connection between the President and the exercise of administrative authority. A middle position is that the President should be able to remove any senior official for refusing to abide by lawful presidential policy. But, whatever the line drawn, those believing in the unitary executive insist that Congress not have the power to establish shadow executive departments.

At the same time, the idea of a unitary executive accords a single executive the responsibility to manifest "energy" in execution of the laws passed by Congress. Consolidating power in an energetic executive provides the best hope for protecting the public from external threats to the nation's SOVEREIGNTY as well as from internal threats of violence or anarchy. JAMES MADISON wrote in Federalist No. 37 that "[e]nergy in government is essential to . . . security against external and internal danger, and to prompt and salutary execution of the laws." A single executive can implement the laws with greater dispatch and efficiency.

The risks attendant upon conduct of FOREIGN AFFAIRS by a plural entity are perhaps most clear. A deliberative body cannot easily take the decisive measures, in diplomacy or in war, upon which our NATIONAL SECURITY depends. Disagreement may paralyze the governing body, preventing it from acting vigorously in response to foreign threats. These reasons presumably explain why Article II mandates that the President serve as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF of the ARMED FORCES.

Similar arguments are valid on the domestic policy front. Congress sets the policy, but enormous influence can be wielded by those carrying out the legislative directives. Whether the issue be implementing health care reform initiatives or administering the grazing fee system, a unitary executive permits greater vigor in law administration. Consolidating control in the executive also permits flexibility in enforcement efforts as conditions change. In short, a unitary executive not only safeguards individual liberty by ensuring an avenue of political redress for all law administration but facilitates effective governance as well.

HAROLD J. KRENT
(2000)

Bibliography

CALABRESI, STEPHEN G. 1995 Some Normative Arguments for the Unitary Executive. Arkansas Law Review 48:23–104.

CALABRESI, STEPHEN G. and PRAKASH, SAIKRISHNA 1994 The President's Power to Execute the Laws. Yale Law Journal 104: 541–665.

CAMINKER, EVAN 1997 The Unitary Executive and State Administration of Federal Law. Kansas Law Review 45:1075–1112.

KRENT, HAROLD J. 1990 Fragmenting the Unitary Executive: Congressional Delegations of Administrative Authority Outside the Federal Government. Northwestern University Law Review 85:62–112.

LESSIG, LAWRENCE and SUNSTEIN, CASS R. 1994 The President and the Administration. Columbia Law Review 94:1–119.

STRAUSS, PETER L. 1984 The Place of Agencies in Government: Separation of Powers and the Fourth Branch. Columbia Law Review 84:573–669.

UNITED BUILDING & CONSTRUCTION TRADES COUNCIL v. MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF CAMDEN

See: Privileges and Immunities

UNITED JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS v. CAREY

430 U.S. 144 (1977)

Under the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 New York sought approval of the United States attorney general for its REAPPORTIONMENT of voters in state legislative districts in Greater New York City. To increase the nonwhite majorities in certain districts, and thus secure approval, the legislature divided a Hasidic Jewish community into two districts, each with a nonwhite majority. Petitioners claimed that assignment of voters solely on the basis of race violated the FOURTEENTH and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS.

By a 7–1 vote, the Supreme Court upheld the race-conscious reapportionment. There was no majority opinion but a series of overlapping alignments. Four Justices, noting that the percentage of nonwhite-majority districts was less than the percentage of nonwhites in the county in question, said that the use of racial criteria to comply with the act was not limited to compensating for past discrimination. Other Justices emphasized the lack of stigma or legislative purpose to disadvantage the Hasidim. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, in a comprehensive opinion on race-conscious remedies, appeared to look ahead to REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978). Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER dissented.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

UNITED MINE WORKERS v. CORONADO COAL COMPANY

259 U.S. 344 (1922)

CORONADO COAL COMPANY v. UNITED MINE WORKERS

268 U.S. 295 (1925)

In two nearly identical cases, the Supreme Court provided opposite answers to the same question: does the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT apply to local strikes that indirectly restrain commerce? The United Mine Workers (UMW) struck to prevent an employer from closing its mines despite valid union contracts; violence and property damage resulted. The company sued the union claiming a Sherman Act conspiracy to restrain INTERSTATE COMMERCE. In its defense, the UMW claimed that it was exempt from suit because it was unincorporated and, because mining was local, that there had been no Sherman Act violation. On APPEAL to the Supreme Court, Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT declared for a unanimous bench that, although unions (even though unincorporated) could clearly be sued, the union had not violated the Sherman Act here. Mining was merely local; any interference concerned the PRODUCTION rather than the distribution of goods. Taft said no restraint of trade existed, absent an explicit showing of intent to restrain trade, unless the obstruction had "such a direct, material and substantial effect to restrain [commerce] that intent reasonably may be inferred." Taft thus introduced new tests of reasonableness (see RULE OF REASON) and intent.

The company soon appealed with new EVIDENCE. Again unanimous, the Supreme Court now said that when intent to restrain trade attended a decrease in production, a previously "indirect and remote obstruction" became a direct interference in violation of the law. The Court asserted that the evidence at the second trial demonstrated such intent. The Court's near reversal, a finding of intent where none had previously existed, probably resulted from a fear of the implications of the first decision. The effect of the later opinion was to hamper union organizing efforts and cast doubt on the legality of strikes generally; certainly intent could be found by Justices who were looking for it.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Labor and the Antitrust Laws.)

UNITED MINE WORKERS v. UNITED STATES
330 U.S. 258 (1947)

When John L. Lewis and the United Mine Workers went on strike in the spring of 1946 against coal operators throughout the country, President HARRY S. TRUMAN, acting as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF, seized the mines by EXECUTIVE ORDER to protect the national interest during the emergency. The failure of subsequent negotiations prompted a call that autumn for a second strike, which the government forestalled by obtaining an INJUNCTION in federal district court. Lewis defied the injunction, incurring contempt citations, a personal fine of $10,000, and a fine against his union of $3,500,000.

Lewis appealed to the Supreme Court. Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON, for a 7–2 majority, held that neither the NORRIS-LAGUARDIA nor the CLAYTON ACT deprived the district court of JURISDICTION to issue the injunction pending judicial interpretation of the contract between the government and the miners. The majority denied the assertion that the "employer" referred to in the acts included the government; neither legislative history nor subsequent policy demonstrated any intent to make those acts applicable to government-employee disputes. Moreover, even if the Norris-LaGuardia Act applied, the Court could legitimately issue an injunction to maintain existing conditions pending the court's decision on its jurisdiction. The Court upheld the contempt findings—asserting that the same conduct might constitute both civil and criminal contempt for which both coercive and punitive measures might be imposed—and the fine against Lewis, but remanded the case for redetermination of the union fine.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

UNITED NATIONS CHARTER
59 Stat. 1031 (1945)

The United Nations Charter, a multilateral treaty which serves as the "constitution" of the United Nations Organization, was drafted in San Francisco at the United Nations Conference on International Organization in 1945 and ratified by fifty-one original member states. Like the Constitution of the United States, the charter has proved to be a flexible instrument subject to broad interpretation.

The charter was ratified by the United States Senate, 89–2, and it became law, binding both internally and externally, when it entered into force on October 24, 1945. Treaties, properly executed and ratified, are international law, at least formally, and in the United States they also are domestic law by virtue of the SUPREMACY CLAUSE of Article IV of the Constitution.

Despite the charter's nearly unanimous endorsement by the Senate, it was eagerly suggested that, in removing the right of the United States to go to war at will and in authorizing the Security Council to commit the member states to war in certain circumstances, the charter improperly delegated to the United Nations powers and functions belonging to the federal government, including the power to declare war, vested in Congress, and the power to conduct war, vested primarily in the President as commander-in-chief.

Congress and the President are not, however, deprived by the charter of the powers to declare and conduct war, only of the right to exercise these powers in contravention of international law (including the charter). All treaties, the charter included, limit only the international legal right—not the constitutional authority—of states to do freely that which is within their power to do freely in the absence of a treaty. Moreover, as a sovereign nation, the United States has the final authority to decide how it will comply with the particular terms and requirements of a treaty; and as a permanent member of the Security Council, the United States retains, in any event, an absolute veto over any action that would commit the United States to unwelcome policy. When Congress and the President act to comply with their charter obligations, in accordance with the United Nations Participation Act of 1945, they do so pursuant to the TREATY POWER and to their more general FOREIGN AFFAIRS powers.

Another, more recent, matter of constitutional concern is the question of whether United States courts, state and federal, are bound by the human rights clauses of the charter and related instruments, such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The United States Supreme Court has never addressed the question of whether the charter's human rights provisions are self-executing in the United States; lower courts have answered that question in the negative.

BURNS H. WESTON
(1986)

Bibliography

CAHILL, J. 1952 "The United Nations Charter as Law of the Land." Albany Law Review 15–16:51–57.

Charter of the United Nations and Statute of the International Court of Justice. Office of Public Information, United Nations, New York.

GOODRICH, M. and HAMBRO, E. 1949 Charter of the United Nations: Commentary and Documents. Boston: World Peace Foundation.

HENKIN, LOUIS 1972 Foreign Affairs and the Constitution. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

UNITED RAILWAYS & ELECTRIC CO. OF BALTIMORE v. WEST

280 U.S. 234 (1930)

This obscure case has no significance except to illustrate how the Supreme Court manipulated the FAIR RETURN rule of SMYTH V. AMES (1898) to prevent rate regulation, which the Court disapproved. A public service commission fixed rates that permitted the company to earn a profit of 6.26 percent. The company sought rates returning 7.44 percent. The Court used SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS to void the commission's rates and decided that rates returning "7 percent, or even 8 percent, on the value of the property" might be "necessary to avoid confiscation." Justices LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, OLIVER W. HOLMES, and HARLAN FISKE STONE dissented.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

UNITED STATES v. . . .

See entry under name of other party

UNITED STATES COIN & CURRENCY, UNITED STATES v.

See: Marchetti v. United States

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FEDERAL CIRCUIT

This court was created by the FEDERAL COURTS IMPROVEMENT ACT (1982), to take over the JURISDICTION of the COURT OF CUSTOMS AND PATENT APPEALS and the COURT OF CLAIMS. Its first judges were the judges of the superseded courts. It is a CONSTITUTIONAL COURT, whose twelve judges serve for life during good behavior.

The Federal Circuit, like the other UNITED STATES COURTS OF APPEALS, is an intermediate appellate court; its jurisdiction, however, is defined not by region but by subject matter. It has nationwide jurisdiction to hear APPEALS in cases chiefly of the types previously heard by the superseded courts: customs and patent matters, and claims against the United States. In the future, however, other types of cases may be added to the Federal Circuit's jurisdiction—tax appeals, for example. Such developments might relieve some of the pressure on the Supreme Court's docket, effectively removing certain technical and specialized areas from the Court's workload. Many proponents of the 1982 act regard the creation of this opportunity as the act's most important achievement.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

UNITED STATES COURTS OF APPEALS

The United States Courts of Appeals form the intermediate component of the three-tiered federal judiciary, lying between the UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS and the SUPREME COURT of the United States. As such, they normally serve as the first courts of review in the federal JUDICIAL SYSTEM. But because of the natural limitations upon the Supreme Court's capacity, the Courts of Appeals are often also the final courts of review.

Article III, section 1, of the Constitution provides: "The JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Thus, in contrast to the Supreme Court, inferior federal courts were not required by the Constitution; rather, their creation was left to the discretion of Congress. Such treatment reflected a compromise between two views, one favoring the mandatory creation of inferior courts, and the other completely opposed to the existence of any such courts.

The Courts of Appeals are relative newcomers to the federal judicial system, having been born with the CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS ACT (Evarts Act) of 1891. The Courts of Appeals were created to solve an acute crisis in the federal judiciary stemming from the limited capacity of the existing system, which had remained largely unchanged since the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789. That act had established a bilevel system of inferior federal courts. There were, first of all, single-judge "district courts," generally one per state. The Union was also divided into several "circuits." CIRCUIT COURT was to be held twice a year in each of the districts encompassed by a given circuit. At these sittings, cases would be heard by a three-judge panel consisting of two Supreme Court Justices and the district judge for the district in which the circuit court was being held.

Having determined to avail itself of its constitutional prerogative to establish inferior federal courts, Congress faced the further issue of those courts' appropriate function and JURISDICTION. In the debates over Article III, there had been substantial support for giving Congress the power to create only admiralty courts, rather than inferior courts of general jurisdiction. No such limitation was adopted, however. It has therefore been generally assumed that Congress is constitutionally free to define the role of the inferior federal courts however it chooses.

The manner that Congress selected in the 1789 act is of some interest. The district courts were, and remain today, trial courts or courts of first instance. The circuit courts, in distinct contrast to today's middle-tier courts, also functioned primarily as trial courts. In the area of private civil law, the circuit courts' jurisdiction was largely concurrent with that of the district courts: it encompassed cases within the DIVERSITY JURISDICTION, but not FEDERAL QUESTION cases. (Original federal jurisdiction was not extended to federal question cases until 1875.) Similarly, with respect to civil suits by the United States, both circuit and district courts were given ORIGINAL JURISDICTION, the only difference being that the requisite amount in controversy was higher for circuit court jurisdiction.

The circuit courts even had certain original jurisdiction that the district courts lacked. The first removal jurisdiction was vested in the circuit courts alone. And the circuit courts had exclusive jurisdiction over most federal crimes.

Nonetheless, the seeds of the modern federal courts of appeals were planted by the first Judiciary Act. The early circuit courts had appellate jurisdiction in civil cases involving disputes over amounts exceeding $50, and in admiralty cases exceeding $300. (A district judge sitting as a circuit judge was not, however, permitted to vote on appeals from his own decisions.) Unlike the modern courts of appeals, however, the circuit courts were the final federal forum for many of these cases. In civil suits, circuit court judgments were reviewable only when the amount in dispute exceeded $2,000. Judgments in criminal cases were categorically unreviewable.

The early circuit courts proved problematic, in the main because of the burden that circuit riding placed on the Supreme Court Justices. Congress attempted to alleviate that hardship by reducing from two to one the number of Justices required to sit on a circuit court, but the benefit of the reduction was more than outweighed by several important augmentations of the High Court's jurisdiction that were enacted by Congress during the century following the 1789 Judiciary Act. Most notable of such legislation was the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1875, which granted the lower courts, as well as the Supreme Court, nearly the full scope of Article III jurisdiction, including original federal question jurisdiction in the district and circuit courts. The federal courts, already vastly overloaded with cases, were virtually submerged after this act. Reform was inevitable.

Indeed, attempts to improve the judicial system had more than once been made. In 1801 Congress had enacted the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1801 (the "Law of the Midnight Judges"), which among other things had established permanent circuit judgeships, three to a circuit. When political tides shifted the following year, however, the act was repealed, and the system reverted essentially to its original condition, except that Congress permitted circuit court to be held by a single judge, rather than three. Much later, in 1869, Congress partially restored the plan of 1801 by creating a single permanent circuit judgeship for each of the nine circuits then in existence. And in 1887 and 1888 Congress passed a series of measures aimed at pruning the expanded jurisdiction of the lower federal courts.

But it was not until the Evarts Act that Congress provided structural reforms adequate to the crisis of judicial overload. The act established three-judge courts of appeals for each of the nine circuits, and increased the number of permanent circuit judgeships to two per circuit. The third appeals judge would in most instances be a district judge (though Supreme Court Justices remained eligible), but the act, following the rule set down by the Act of 1789, barred district judges from reviewing their own decisions.

Curiously, the Evarts Act left the old circuit courts standing, although it did remove their APPELLATE JURISDICTION. Until these courts were abolished in 1911, there thus functioned two sets of federal trial courts.

The Evarts Act provided for direct review by the Supreme Court of the decisions of the district courts and the old circuit courts, in some important cases. The new circuit courts of appeals would review the remainder. Under the act, a circuit court's decision in an admiralty or diversity case would be final, unless that court certified a question to the Supreme Court or the Supreme Court granted a WRIT OF CERTIORARI in order to review the circuit court's decision. In most other cases, circuit court decisions were appealable as of right.

Since the Evarts Act, only a few significant alterations have been made to the federal judicial system in general, and the courts of appeals in particular. The rules governing Supreme Court review are perhaps the most important arena of change. In 1925, Congress replaced appeal as of right with discretionary review for all circuit court judgments except those holding a state statute unconstitutional. In 1937, Congress passed a law permitting appeal to the Supreme Court from any judgment by a federal court holding an act of Congress unconstitutional in any civil case to which the United States is a party.

In 1948 the circuit courts established by the Evarts Act were renamed; each court is now known as the United States Court of Appeals for theCircuit. The number of circuits has also been increased; and there is now a "Federal Circuit" court to hear appeals from the CLAIMS COURT and from district courts in patent cases or in cases arising under the TUCKER ACT. Finally, procedures in the various courts of appeals were standardized in 1968 in the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure. Each circuit, however, retains its own rule-making power for matters not covered by the Federal Rules.

The chief work of the courts of appeals is the review of final judgments of the United States district courts. The courts, however, are also empowered to review certain orders that are not strictly final, essentially when the benefit of such review clearly outweighs any attendant disruption and delay of district court proceedings. In addition, Congress has enabled the appeals courts to issue the extraordinary WRIT OF MANDAMUS and WRIT OF PROHIBITION in cases in which district courts may abuse their constitutional powers. Finally, the statutes governing many of the various federal administrative agencies provide for direct review of agency adjudication and rule-making in the court of appeals for the circuit in which the party seeking review resides, or in the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The latter circuit court has been a frequent forum for challenges, constitutional and otherwise, to federal agency action.

To understand the role of the courts of appeals in the development of constitutional law, it is necessary to understand the relationship between the appeals courts and the Supreme Court. As was noted above, since the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1925, the "Judges Bill," the Supreme Court has had a discretionary power of review of most circuit court decisions. Again, however, appeal as of right lies in cases in which the appeals court has held a state statute to be repugnant to the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, and in civil cases in which either a court of appeals or a district court has held an act of Congress unconstitutional and the United States is a party. Nonetheless, neither type of case in which appeal is of right bulks very large in the overall volume of appeals from circuit courts, and of those, many are denied Supreme Court review for want of a substantial federal question.

Accordingly, the Supreme Court has the discretion to review or not to review the vast majority of decisions by the courts of appeals. Not surprisingly, because of the limited capacity of the High Court, its discretion is much more often exercised to deny review than to grant it. As a general rule, in fact, the Supreme Court tends not to review appeals court decisions unless the issues involved either have an urgent importance or have received conflicting treatment by different circuits, or both.

One might conclude that, because the Supreme Court does review important cases, the appeals courts have no significant role in the development of constitutional law. Constitutional law, however, is not the product solely of the Supreme Court.

To begin, the Supreme Court can only review a decision that a party seeks to have reviewed; not every losing party in the court of appeals may do so. For example, in Kennedy v. Sampson (1974) the District of Columbia Circuit construed the POCKET VETO clause of the Constitution (Article 1, section 7, clause 2) to bar the President from exercising the pocket veto power during brief, intrasession adjournments of Congress. The President then declined to seek review in the Supreme Court; he chose instead to acquiesce in the rule laid down by the appeals court. The court's decision thus became a cornerstone of the law respecting the presentation of laws for presidential approval.

Of course, as a glance at any constitutional law textbook or casebook reveals, the vast majority of important constitutional PRECEDENTS are produced not by the courts of appeals but by the Supreme Court. Decisions like Ken- nedy are thus the exception, not the rule. Nonetheless, in several ways the appeals courts contribute significantly to the development of constitutional law.

Before a constitutional issue is decided by the Supreme Court, it will often have received a thorough ventilation by one or more circuit courts. The Supreme Court thus has the benefit of the circuit judges' consideration of difficult constitutional matters, and may sometimes explicitly adopt the reasoning of the court of appeals. For example, in United States v. Dennis (1950) the Second Circuit faced the difficult issue of whether, and if so, how, the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER test applied to a conspiracy to advocate the overthrow of the government by force and violence and to organize a political party for the purpose of such advocacy. The Court of Appeals, in an opinion by Judge LEARNED HAND, held that such advocacy was unprotected by the FIRST AMENDMENT even though the actual forceful overthrow of the government was not imminent. The Supreme Court affirmed the decision in DENNIS V. UNITED STATES (1951), and its opinion adopted much of Judge Hand's analysis, including Judge Hand's "clear and present danger" formula, namely, "whether the gravity of the "evil,' discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger."

The role of the courts of appeals in resolving novel issues of constitutional law, however, is only half of the picture. Equally important is the appeals courts' adjudication of cases raising issues on which the Supreme Court has already spoken. Because the High Court can only sketch the broad outlines of constitutional DOCTRINE, it remains for the lower courts to apply precedent, elaborate or clarify it, and extrapolate from it. Because appeal from the district courts to the appeals court is of right, and because most litigation never reaches the Supreme Court, it is in the courts of appeals that the Supreme Court's sketch is worked into a fully drawn landscape.

When the Supreme Court decides not to give plenary review to a case arising from an appeals court, what implication should be drawn concerning the value of the appeals court's opinion as a precedent? By denying a petition for certiorari or dismissing an appeal as of right for want of jurisdiction, the Court formally indicates no view of the merits or demerits of the appeals court's decision. Nonetheless, it is commonly thought that the Supreme Court generally does not decline to review an appeals court decision that it finds clearly incorrect. Similarly, when the Supreme Court summarily affirms an appeals court's decision, it is formally signaling its agreement with the result only, and not necessarily the reasoning of the lower court. Yet, such affirmances are popularly thought to indicate at least the Court's tentative agreement with the substance of the lower court's opinion.

Since the early 1960s, the federal courts at all three levels have experienced a dramatic and continuing increase in their workload. At the district and circuit levels, Congress has responded by adding judges to existing courts. When the number of judges in a circuit has become sufficiently great, Congress has divided the circuit into two. That course is not entirely satisfactory, however, because it tends to push the appeals courts in the direction of being regional, rather than national courts, and increases the likelihood of intercircuit conflict.

At the Supreme Court level, Congress has made no significant changes. Various proposals for reducing the Court's workload would also affect adjudication at the appeals court level. A frequent suggestion has been to establish a national court of appeals. In one version, the national court would sit only to resolve conflicts among the circuits, thereby eliminating a significant share of the Supreme Court's annual docket. In another version, the national court would screen cases to determine those worthy of Supreme Court review. Another proposal would reduce the Supreme Court's workload by eliminating appeal as of right. One effect of such a measure, of course, would be to increase the number of appeals court decisions that are effectively final.

CARL MCGOWAN
(1986)

Bibliography

BATOR, PAUL M. et al. 1973 Hart and Wechsler's The Federal Courts and the Federal System, 2nd ed. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

WRIGHT, CHARLES A. 1983 Handbook of the Law of Federal Courts. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN, UNITED STATES v.
407 U.S. 297 (1972)

Most Presidents have claimed inherent executive authority to use electronic surveillance for national security purposes without complying with conventional FOURTH AMENDMENT requirements such as prior court approval. In several earlier decisions, such as KATZ V. UNITED STATES (1967), and in the 1968 statute authorizing federal and state officials to use ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING, the issue had been left open.

During the VIETNAM WAR, Attorney General John N. Mitchell approved a wiretap "to gather intelligence information deemed necessary to protect the nation from attempts of domestic organizations to attack and subvert the existing structure of the government." The Supreme Court unanimously ruled that where threats by domestic organizations were concerned, neither section 2511(3) of the 1968 act nor the Constitution gave the President authority to use electronic surveillance without first obtaining a warrant from a magistrate. The Court thus rejected the President's claim of INHERENT POWER. The Court did not decide whether the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement applied to activities of foreign powers or their agents; a 1978 statute now governs this. The Court also suggested that Congress could authorize standards for intelligence gathering for domestic security purposes that are less stringent than for law enforcement; Congress has not done so.

HERMAN SCHWARTZ
(1986)

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS

In enacting Article III, the Framers of the Constitution authorized the establishment of a federal judicial system consisting of a SUPREME COURT and such inferior courts as Congress might decide to establish. In the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 Congress created a Supreme Court, divided the country into three circuits, authorized a CIRCUIT COURT to sit in each circuit, and established a federal district court in each of the states. The Supreme Court was the only truly appellate court in the system. Unlike the modern courts of appeal, the old circuit courts, while exercising some appellate jurisdiction, were intended to be the chief federal trial courts. A Supreme Court Justice riding the circuit and judges of the district courts in the circuit manned each of these circuit courts.

The federal district courts were empowered to sit at various times in specified locations within the states where they were located. They were tribunals of very limited JURISDICTION and originally had as their main function the adjudication of admiralty and maritime matters. It was anticipated that the state trial courts or federal circuit courts would handle, as trial courts, the most important legal issues facing the new nation. The federal district courts were empowered to try minor criminal cases. In addition, they had CONCURRENT JURISDICTION with the circuit courts over suits by ALIENS for tort violations of a treaty or the law of nations, suits against consuls, and disputes in which the federal government initiated the proceeding and the matter in controversy was $100 or less. However, district court jurisdiction was exclusive in admiralty, over seizures of land for violation of federal statutes, and over seizures under import, navigation, and trade statutes.

This limited and specialized jurisdiction has steadily expanded. Today the district court is the only federal nonspecialized court, handling both criminal and civil matters. Among the latter are admiralty cases, federal question cases, and cases within the DIVERSITY JURISDICTION (cases between different states). In a diversity case the matter in controversy must exceed $10,000. No jurisdictional amount is normally required for the other exercises of the district court's civil jurisdiction. Appeals from a district court go to the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS.

The first district court to be organized was the district court of New York. That court began functioning on November 3, 1789, and was the predecessor to the current district court for the Southern District of New York. Even today judges of the Southern District refer to theirs as the "Mother Court."

As the system was originally conceived, each state was to contain at least one federal district and one federal court. There has been no deviation from this pattern as the country has expanded from thirteen to fifty states. In addition, the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA and the federal TERRITORIES (the Virgin Islands, PUERTO RICO, and Guam) are each organized as a federal district with a district court. In over half the states, although there may be a number of federal district judges who sit in separate locations throughout the state, there is only one federal district. Twelve states are divided into two federal districts; some states have three federal districts; and California, New York, and Texas are subdivided into four federal districts.

As the country has expanded, the number of federal district judges has increased. Since 1954 the roster of federal judges has grown through enactment of legislation authorizing additional judgeships for federal district courts nationwide. The Omnibus Judgeship Act of 1978 raised the number of authorized district judges from 399 to 516. The Southern District of New York has twenty-seven authorized judgeships, the largest number of any district in the country.

Federal district judges are nominated by the President and appointed with the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the Senate. The prevailing practice is for the selection of the nominee to come to the President from the Department of Justice. If one or both of the senators from the state in question belong to the President's party, the candidate for nomination is proposed by one or both senators and submitted to the Department of Justice for approval and recommendation to the President for nomination. Today few candidates are nominated and sent to the Senate for confirmation without first being found qualified by the American Bar Association. When the President decides to nominate a candidate, the FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION undertakes a security check. If the candidate is cleared, the President announces the nomination and sends the name to the Senate. The SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE holds hearings, which are usually one-day affairs for candidates for federal district courts. If the Senate Judiciary Committee approves, the nomination is voted on by the full Senate.

An Article III judge has life tenure during GOOD BEHAVIOR, and his salary cannot be diminished while he is in office. The only way to remove a federal district judge from office is by IMPEACHMENT. Of course, a federal judge, like any other person, may be prosecuted for criminal law violations. Bribery has been the most frequent charge, but criminal prosecutions of federal judges are rare and attempts to remove them by impeachment have been infrequent.

When the first change of political power occurred in the United States at the national level, from the Federalist party to the Republican party of THOMAS JEFFERSON, the Jeffersonians commenced impeachment proceedings against two judges appointed by the Federalists and disliked by the Republicans: JOHN PICKERING, a judge of the district court in New Hampshire, and SAMUEL CHASE, an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. Pickering was convicted by the Senate in 1803, but the requisite two-thirds Senate majority could not be mustered to convict Chase. Since that time impeachment to unseat a federal judge has not been a successful political weapon. Partisan politics has from time to time generated unsuccessful calls for impeachment of various judges.

A federal district court judgeship carries considerable prestige. It is a presidential appointment; it is a national rather than a local office; and federal district court judgeships are limited in number. District judges in the main have had prior careers as prominent or distinguished lawyers before going on the bench. They are drawn for the most part from the middle and upper strata of our society. They are generally alumni of the best known law schools of the nation or of the state in which they will serve. They have generally had successful careers in private practice, often with backgrounds as federal, state, or local prosecutors. A few are former academics, and some come to court from public service careers outside government.

Until the twentieth century, all federal district judges were white males. The first woman to be confirmed as a federal judge was Florence Allen, who was appointed to the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit in 1934. The first woman appointed to the district court was Burneta Matthews, who was given an interim appointment to the District of Columbia bench in 1949. She was confirmed by the Senate in 1950 for a permanent appointment. Constance Baker Motley was the first black woman to be appointed to the federal bench. She was appointed to the District Court for the Southern District of New York in 1966, and in 1982 became chief judge of that court.

WILLIAM HASTIE was the first black to be made a federal judge. He was appointed to the District Court of the Virgin Islands in 1937 and in 1949 was named to the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. James Parsons, appointed judge of the Northern District of Illinois in 1961, was the first black named a district judge in the continental United States. Since these initial appointments the number of blacks, women, and members of other ethnic minorities has grown steadily.

The first Judiciary Act authorized each court to make rules for conducting its own business, and in 1842 the Supreme Court was empowered to regulate process, pleading, proof and DISCOVERY in EQUITY, admiralty, and law cases in the district and circuit courts. In 1938 uniform rules for conducting civil cases, entitled the FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE, were adopted for the federal system. In 1946 the FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE were enacted. These rules have achieved uniformity of procedure and practice in the federal district courts throughout the nation.

The typical calendar of civil cases in a federal district court contains a plethora of complex cases involving PATENT, trademark, and COPYRIGHT infringement claims; federal securities law violations; CIVIL RIGHTS infractions; private antitrust claims; shareholders' derivative suits; IMMIGRATION and NATURALIZATION cases; employment, age, and housing discrimination claims; and claims under a variety of other federal statutes, such as the FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT, Investment Advisers Act, Commodities Exchange Act, FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT, and Federal Employers' Liability Act. In addition, there are seamen's injury and cargo damage claims, HABEAS CORPUS petitions by both state and federal prisoners, and litigation based on diversity jurisdiction. The criminal case load involves a variety of infractions defined in the United States criminal code.

Among the primary functions of the federal district courts are the vindication of federal rights secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States. The federal district court is often called upon to hold a state law or act unconstitutional because it violates federal constitutional guarantees or has been preempted by federal legislation. Obviously, the exercise of this power by federal district courts has the potential for creating friction and disharmony between state and federal courts. A lower federal court's power to strike down a state law on federal constitutional grounds, in the face of a contrary ruling by the highest court of the state, is not an easy pill for state judges to swallow. Federal courts have devised doctrines of COMITY and ABSTENTION to ease the friction. A growing number of federal judges, recognizing that state judges, too, have a duty to protect and enforce federal rights, have been inclined to give increasing deference to state court determinations of federal constitutional questions.

A burgeoning federal caseload undoubtedly promotes this inclination toward accommodation and also promotes a tightening of limitations on federal habeas corpus review of state court criminal convictions. A habeas corpus petition enables a state prisoner, after unsuccessfully appealing his conviction through the state court system, to have the matter reviewed by the federal district court to determine whether the trial and conviction violated the defendant's federal constitutional rights. Not surprisingly, habeas corpus petitions have inundated the federal courts. While most are without merit, the few petitions of substance that succeed are another cause of federal-state court friction. Rules of limitations have been imposed requiring exhaustion of state remedies and forbidding review if the state court's denial of the appeal of the criminal conviction rests on the defendant's failure to conform to state governing procedure absent a showing of cause and prejudice. (See WAINWRIGHT V. SYKES.)

Diversity jurisdiction brings to the federal courts issues of state law that would ordinarily be tried in the state courts. The initial justification for giving federal courts jurisdiction over such cases was concern that parochialism would put the out-of-state complainant at a disadvantage in seeking redress in state court against a resident of the forum state.

Exercise of federal diversity jurisdiction was at one time a cause of federal-state confusion if not friction. The district courts in diversity cases have been required to follow applicable state statutes, but until 1938 they were free to disregard state decisional law and decide on the basis of their own notions of what the COMMON LAW was or should be. With the Supreme Court's decision in ERIE RAILROAD V. TOMPKINS (1938) federal courts were no longer free to disregard state court decisions. Federal courts may apply their own rules as to pleading and practice but on substantive issues must function as adjuncts of the state judiciary.

ERIE V. TOMPKINS has made clear that the diversity jurisdiction is a wasteful use of federal judicial resources. State court parochialism is no longer a justifiable basis for federal diversity jurisdiction. Because the federal court must apply state law, apart from federal procedural rules, the litigant is seldom better off in federal court than he would be if relegated to state courts, where increasing numbers of federal judges feel such cases belong. Congress, however, has shown little interest in divesting federal district courts of the diversity jurisdiction.

The federal district court is the place where litigation usually commences to test the constitutional validity of state or federal governmental action with national implication. These TEST CASES usually seek injunctive relief or DECLARATORY JUDGMENTS. These are suits in EQUITY; thus no jury is empaneled, and the district judge must determine both the facts and the law. The judge will articulate his or her findings of the facts and legal conclusions as to the constitutional validity of the governmental action being tested. The trial record and the district court's analysis are thus extremely important for appellate courts, particularly in cases of first impression.

It is the district court that decides in the first instance whether the government is violating a newspaper's FIRST AMENDMENT rights, an accused's RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION, or a minority citizen's right to the equal protection of the laws. Organizations such as the AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Jehovah's Witnesses, environmental groups, corporations, and individuals initiate litigation in the district court to test the constitutionality of some federal, state, or local legislation or practice. (See TEST CASES.)

Such a case was McLean v. Arkansas Board of Education (D. Ark., 1982). The American Civil Liberties Union sought to challenge an Arkansas law requiring that creationism—a biblical story of man's and the world's creation, as opposed to Darwin's evolutionary theory for explaining the genesis of mankind—be taught in the public schools. The issue was tried first in the federal district court, which framed the issue in these terms: is creationism a religious doctrine or a valid scientific theory? The court heard and weighed testimony, chiefly from experts on both sides, and held that the Arkansas statute was an unconstitutional ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION.

Sometimes prior DOCTRINE has forecast the outcome. For instance, although the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE on which school SEGREGATION had been founded was not overruled until BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), earlier decisions such as SWEATT V. PAINTER (1950) and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents (1950) pointed to that overruling. Nonetheless, the record amassed by several district courts, showing the psychological and education deprivation inflicted by segregation on black children, was crucial in enabling the Supreme Court to take the final step of overruling PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896) and holding that segregated schools violated the right of minority school children to equal protection of the law.

Similarly, a federal district court facing a constitutional challenge to the HYDE AMENDMENT, a congressional provision largely denying Medicaid funds for the cost of abortions, held hearings for about a year. The trial record contained some 400 exhibits and 5,000 pages of testimony. The judge was required to digest this mountain of testimonial and documentary evidence and prepare cohesive findings of facts and conclusions of law. (See HARRIS V. MCRAE.)

The need for so long a trial and the condensation of so voluminous a record into a coherent decision is not commonplace. However, it is not unusual for a district judge to be required to master the facts in a complex trial lasting many months, and to set forth the facts found and legal conclusions in a comprehensive fashion.

In some cases the district court, as a supplement to its own adjudicative fact-finding, must make findings as to LEGISLATIVE FACTS as well. For instance, in FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980) Congress had required at least ten percent of federal funds granted for local public works projects to be set aside for minority businesses. This legislation was attacked as unconstitutional racial discrimination. The district court framed the issue as the power of Congress to remedy past discrimination. The district judge relied on congressional findings that minorities had been denied access to entrepreneurial opportunities provided in building construction works financed by public funds. Based on this legislative finding and Congress's purpose to take remedial action, the district court found the set-aside to be a legitimate remedial act. The Supreme Court adopted this rationale, and upheld the quota.

At times, in a constitutional controversy, the district court, although adhering to judicial precedent requiring it to dismiss the constitutional challenge, may help to bring about a reversal of precedent by recognizing that a wrong exists which should be remedied. BAKER V. CARR (1962) was a challenge to Tennessee's malapportioned legislature. The district court, in its opinion, carefully and sympathetically tracked the contentions of the plaintiffs that the legislators had condoned gross inequality in legislative REPRESENTATION and debased the VOTING RIGHTS of a large number of citizens. The court, however, relied on COLEGROVE V. GREEN (1946) and dismissed the action. On review of this order, the Supreme Court ruled that the plaintiffs' allegations had stated a case within the district court's jurisdiction. Subsequently, REYNOLDS V. SIMS (1964) embodied the Supreme Court's famous ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE principle, requiring legislative districts to be constructed as nearly as possible of an equal number of voters. (See REAPPORTIONMENT.)

Issues of such magnitude are highly charged; it is not unusual, in these controversial circumstances, for the judge who decides a case contrary to the majority's view to face public criticism and in some cases even social ostracism.

Judge Waties Waring's unpopular decision in favor of blacks in voting and school cases led to his social ostracism in Charleston, South Carolina; Judge Skelly Wright became anathema to many whites in New Orleans for the same reason, and escaped that environment through appointment to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia Circuit. Similarly, Judge William Ray Overton, who decided the creationism case adversely to local sentiments, and Judge James B. MacMillan, who ordered a complex program of SCHOOL BUSING in Charlotte, North Carolina, were subjected to severe community criticism.

Although not so dramatic as the examples given, public criticism meets almost every district judge at one time or another for rendering an unpopular decision. Because most public controversies have a way of ending up in the federal courts, district judges must decide whether seniority systems must be modified to prevent the employment gains of minorities and women from being wiped out; whether regulations requiring physicians to report to parents abortions performed on teenagers are valid; whether the overcrowding and the rundown conditions of a prison require it to be closed; or whether permitting school authorities to provide for prayer or meditation violates the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE. The district judge normally sits alone, and does not share decision with others, as do federal appellate judges—and therefore is singularly exposed to abuse and pressure.

Life tenure helps secure the independence of the district judge in facing such issues. This independence is crucial, not only for the judge but also for a constitutional system that seeks to secure the rights of the unpopular and despised.

ROBERT L. CARTER
(1986)

Bibliography

ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES COURT. Annual Report of the Director. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office.

CLARK, D. S. 1981 Adjudication to Administration: A Statistical Analysis of Federal District Courts in the 20th Century. Southern California Law Review 55:65–152.

HALL, KERMIT 1976 The Antebellum Lower Federal Judiciary, 1829–1861. Vanderbilt Law Review 29:1089–1129.

——— 1981 California's Lower Federal First Judicial Appointments. Hastings Law Journal 32:819–837.

HENDERSON, DWIGHT F. 1971 Courts for a New Nation. Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press.

HOUGH, CHARLES M. 1934 The U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York. New York: Maritime Law Association.

Management Statistic for United States Courts. 1981.

STECKLER, WILLIAM E. 1978 Future of the Federal District Courts. Indiana Law Review 11:601–620.

SURRENCY, ERWIN C. 1963 History of Federal Courts. Missouri Law Review 28:214–244.

THOMPSON, FRANK, JR. 1970 Impeachment of Federal Judges: A Historical Overview. North Carolina Law Review 49:87–121.

UNITED STATES RAILROAD RETIREMENT BOARD v. FRITZ

See: Rational Basis; Substantive Due Process

UNITED STATES TRUST CO. v. NEW JERSEY
431 U.S. 1 (1977)

This decision marked the beginning of the modern revitalization of the CONTRACT CLAUSE as a limitation on state legislative power. New York and New Jersey had promised, on issuing bonds to support their Port Authority, to limit severely their use of Authority revenues to subsidize rail passenger transportation. Twelve years later the states sought to divert commuters from automobiles to railroads; they raised bridge and tunnel tolls and, repealing their earlier promise, authorized use of the increased revenues to subsidize commuter railroads. The Supreme Court, 4–3, held the repeal unconstitutional as an impairment of the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACT.

The dissenters, led by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, accurately described the decision as the first in nearly forty years to invalidate economic legislation under the contract clause and argued vigorously for maintaining judicial deference to legislative power. For the majority, Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN commented that the outright repeal had deprived bondholders of an important security interest and could be justified only if it were both "reasonable and necessary to serve an important public purpose." The repeal failed this heightened STANDARD OF REVIEW, because alternative means of diverting commuters to railroads were available: taxing parking or gasoline, for example.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Allied Structural Steel Company v. Spannaus.)

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA v. WEBER
443 U.S. 193 (1979)

This was one of an important series of decisions upholding the legality of AFFIRMATIVE ACTION. In Weber, the Court held, 5–2, in an opinion by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, that a private affirmative action plan reserving for blacks fifty percent of the openings in a training program leading to plant employment did not violate Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964. Weber left open important questions about the permissible scope of affirmative action, including whether governments might resort to affirmative action without violating the Fifth or FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, and the extent to which private affirmative action programs may "trammel the interests" of white employees.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING AND SERVICE ACT

See: Selective Service Acts

UNREASONABLE SEARCH

"Unreasonable" is the controlling word in the FOURTH AMENDMENT. In its first clause the amendment guarantees the right of the people to be free from unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES; its second clause stipulates the terms for issuance of a judicial warrant: probable cause, oath or affirmation, particularity of description. What is an unreasonable and therefore forbidden search? Conversely, what is a reasonable and permitted one? The amendment does not say. The answer, in large measure, depends on one's understanding of the relationship of the two clauses.

Two polar positions have dominated debate in the Supreme Court on this matter. The view that was in the ascendancy before 1946 and that has generally prevailed again since CHIMEL V. CALIFORNIA (1969), treats the two clauses in conjunction so that the unreasonable searches forbidden by the first clause are defined by the warrant requirements in the second clause: a reasonable search is one conducted subject to a proper warrant, an unreasonable search is one that is not. A second view, generally dominant between HARRIS V. UNITED STATES (1946) and 1969, holds that reasonableness is an autonomous principle, to be measured by all the circumstances rather than by the securing of a warrant (although this is one factor to be considered).

The conflict between the two readings of "unreasonable" essentially has centered on SEARCH INCIDENT TO ARREST, a recognized "emergency" exception to the warrant requirement since WEEKS V. UNITED STATES (1914). According to the second interpretation, once the privacy of the dwelling has legitimately been invaded to make a lawful arrest, it is reasonable to allow the search (for the purpose of disarming the arrestee and seizing EVIDENCE which he may seek to destroy) to blanket the entire premises in which the arrest was made. This is a matter of the greatest consequence, for the vast majority of searches are carried out incident to arrest. If, however, the warrant requirement is considered to be the core of the amendment, the search must be circumscribed to the extent required by the emergency and therefore confined to the person arrested and the area within his immediate reach.

To treat reasonableness as an independent standard is contrary to both history and logic. On logical grounds there seems little value to stringent warrant requirements that can be readily negated by "reasonable" WARRANTLESS

SEARCHES. History, too, sets its face against the notion. The Fourth Amendment's proscription of unreasonable searches, alone among the provisions of the BILL OF RIGHTS to set fair standards for the apprehension and trial of accused persons, has a rich historical background in American, as well as English, experience. The amendment is rooted in the restrictions which seventeenth- and eighteenth-century COMMON LAW judges in England placed on the search power (for example, WILKES CASES, 1763–1770). This power had been abused through the government's relentless hunt for political and religious dissidents during a phase of English history well understood in the colonies. The amendment stems more directly from the public outcry against indiscriminate searches for smuggled goods (authorized by GENERAL WARRANTS known as WRITS OF ASSISTANCE) during the last years of the colonial period in America, notably in Massachusetts. The main object of the Fourth Amendment, to prevent the recurrence of the detested general warrant, was to be accomplished by placing strict limits on the issuance of a warrant. The reasonableness clause, as seems clear from the historical record of the amendment's drafting in the first Congress, was meant to reemphasize, and perhaps strengthen, the warrant requirements in the second clause. To detach the reasonableness clause from the warrant clause by infusing it with independent potency serves to dilute the amendment's protection, exactly the opposite of the result its framers intended. It is insufficient to leave the initial determination of reasonableness to the police, with JUDICIAL REVIEW taking place retrospectively when the prosecutor seeks to introduce the fruits of the search in evidence. Many searches will produce no evidence, and even when evidence is found, the pressure on judges to rule against obviously guilty defendants will be great despite the illegality of the searches.

Consonant with the amendment's history, the Court at one time assigned an even broader meaning to "unreasonable" than is taken by the first view. In BOYD V. UNITED STATES (1886) the Court held that private papers are immune to seizure even under warrant—on the theory that one test of the reasonableness of a search is whether or not its purpose is to seize evidence that will force the person to incriminate himself. In contrast, contraband goods and fruits and instrumentalities of crime are deemed seizable because their possessor has no legal property right in them. In Gouled v. United States (1921) the Court logically extended the immunity granted private papers to all kinds of evidentiary materials (for example; clothing). However, this MERE EVIDENCE RULE, as it came to be known, was overturned as "wholly irrational" in WARDEN V. HAYDEN (1967), and probably little remains of the immunity granted to private papers (Fisher v. United States, 1976).

Other EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES, in addition to search incidental to arrest, which, in either view, permit the police to bypass the warrant requirement, include the rule of CARROLL V. UNITED STATES (1925), which permits the search of a moving vehicle on PROBABLE CAUSE to believe that it is transporting contraband; the ruling in Schmerber v. California (1966), which permits the compulsory taking of a blood sample from a driver to measure its alcoholic content where there is probable cause to believe he was intoxicated while driving; and the rule of Warden v. Hayden (1967), which permits the "hot pursuit" of a felon into a dwelling. Even in the absence of evidence that a crime has been committed, where the suspicious conduct of an individual leads an officer to believe that he or others are in danger and imminent action is imperative, he may stop the suspect and "frisk" the individual's outer clothing in order to disarm him of weapons he may be carrying. (See TERRY V. OHIO.)

In the case of search incidental to arrest, hot pursuit, or STOP AND FRISK, the emergency is self-evident, but it is no less genuine in the case of a moving vehicle or a blood test, for the delay involved in the obtaining of a warrant will usually defeat the object of the search. The automobile might by that time be far away, perhaps in another jurisdiction, and the percentage of alcohol in the blood gradually diminishes once intake ceases. These are only examples. Clearly any real emergency, as the sound of a shot or a cry for help coming from behind closed doors, would justify a warrantless search by the police.

The only kinds of searches known to the framers, and to which the Fourth Amendment was originally addressed, contained two elements: (1) entry into the dwelling (2) for the purpose of seizing evidence of crime. At first the Court considered the definition of search to be governed by this experience and maintained that warrants were not required for more modern types of searches that lacked one or the other of these elements. Thus searches for oral utterances conducted by WIRETAPPING which do not involve entry onto premises, as in OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1928), or inspection of dwellings to uncover nuisances to public health or safety, as in Frank v. Maryland (1959), were held not to be covered by the amendment. Subsequently, however, ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING (including wiretapping) and ADMINISTRATIVE SEARCHES were both brought under the amendment's protective umbrella in KATZ V. UNITED STATES (1967) and CAMARA V. MUNICIPAL COURT (1967), respectively. But a visit to the home by a caseworker for the purpose of determining whether a public assistance grant is being properly used does not amount to an unreasonable search and requires no warrant, as the Court held in WYMAN V. JAMES (1971).

A court order for the surgical removal of a bullet from the body of a suspect was ruled unreasonable in Winston v. Lee (1985)—at least when the need for the evidence is not "compelling"—because of the serious intrusion on privacy and the medical risks entailed.

In order to prevent the Fourth Amendment from being reduced to a mere parchment guarantee, evidence obtained through unreasonable search has since 1914 been excluded from trials in the federal courts (Weeks v. United States), and in the state courts as well since MAPP V. OHIO (1961). (See EXCLUSIONARY RULE.) Although the amendment contains no express command of exclusion, it has been construed to authorize the judiciary to apply such sanctions as are necessary to ensure compliance with the standard of reasonableness.

Like the rest of the Bill of Rights, the ban on unreasonable searches was originally intended to place restrictions only on the federal government. That ban became applicable to the states, as an element of FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT due process, in 1961 (Mapp v. Ohio), and the same standard of reasonableness now governs searches made by federal and state authorities (KER V. CALIFORNIA, 1963). (See INCORPORATION DOCTRINE.)

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

Bibliography

FELLMAN, DAVID 1976 The Defendant's Rights Today. Pages 277–284. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. 1978 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. Vol. 2:406–476, 498–609; vol. 3:2–140. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

LANDYNSKI, JACOB W. 1966 Search and Seizure and the Supreme Court. Pp. 30–44, 387–417. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

——— 1971 "The Supreme Court's Search for Fourth Amendment Standards: The Warrantless Search." Connecticut Bar Journal 45:2–39.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1974 Against the Law. Pages 75–117. New York: Harper & Row.

UNREASONABLE SEARCH
(Update)

"Unreasonable search and seizure" is a technical phrase that refers to any governmental SEARCH AND SEIZURE deemed to violate the FOURTH AMENDMENT of the Constitution. In general, searches and seizures are unreasonable if the government undertakes them without properly authorizing SEARCH WARRANTS or, in exceptional circumstances not requiring warrants, in violation of the rules laid down for those exceptions. The Fourth Amendment provides, "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." The amendment defines neither "unreasonable" nor "searches and seizures," and the judiciary has taken on the task of definition. The Supreme Court has concluded that particularized searches and seizures with a warrant, as called for by the amendment's warrant clause, establish the norm for reasonableness. It is the neutral, detached, judicial determination of good reason or "probable cause" to search foror seize particular persons or things in particular places that makes such acts presumptively "reasonable." Unauthorized searches and seizures, unless specially justified, are generally thought unreasonable.

Although searches and seizures based on proper warrants are the accepted constitutional norm, not all WARRANTLESS SEARCHES and seizures violate the Fourth Amendment. They do not if they are directed at objects or interests the amendment does not protect, if they do not constitute "searches" or "seizures" in the legal sense, or if they fall within one of the recognized exceptions to the warrant or probable cause requirements.

In KATZ V. UNITED STATES (1967), the Supreme Court stated that the Fourth Amendment, among other things, protected certain individual interests in privacy from unreasonable government search and seizure. Subsequent opinions have said the amendment protects an individual's REASONABLE EXPECTATION OF PRIVACY, a test involving both a subjective expectation of privacy and one that society is prepared to recognize as "reasonable." Where an individual has no reasonable expectation of privacy, the government may search and seize without a warrant and even without probable cause. Consequently, the government may search and seize things or matters that an individual of necessity or willingly exposes to the public. For example, the government may photograph one's features, lift one's fingerprints, tape public lectures, or place tracking devices on cars.

The second part of the Katz test requires that the expectation of privacy be one that society—here represented by the Supreme Court—is prepared to recognize as reasonable. One consequence of the Court's "reasonable expectation" definitions has been that police may freely examine some places where people might actually expect some privacy, at least in the sense of not contemplating that the government would seek evidence against them there. For example, the Court has held that persons have no reasonable expectation of privacy in trash placed out for collection. The Court has also held, in effect, that persons have no expectation that items hidden from ordinary view on real property will be free from aerial surveillance. Finally, it has held that an occupant of real property has an expectation of privacy only with regard to his or her home and its "curtilage," or the area immediately surrounding it and associated with intimate home uses. Consequently, even were one to hide something in dense, secluded woods on one's private property, the government could legitimately search the woods without a warrant or probable cause.

There are a number of recognized exceptions to the warrant requirement and even some to the probable cause requirement. These exceptions are made in situations in which, while the police have probable cause to search for and seize particular evidence or persons in particular places, some other circumstance—usually referred to as an "exigent" or emergency circumstance—makes it impossible, impracticable, self-defeating, or unwise to obtain a warrant. In situations in which the government demonstrates a special and important need for a limited search, the reasonableness of the search depends upon a balancing of the need to search against the intrusion the search entails. For such reasons, the Court has held several kinds of warrantless searches reasonable: SEARCHES INCIDENT TO ARREST; investigative STOPS-AND-FRISKS; AUTOMOBILE SEARCHES and searches of other mobile vehicles; inspection and regulatory searches, including BORDER SEARCHES; some employer drug-testing searches; and CONSENT SEARCHES.

An ARREST is a seizure of a person. Under COMMON LAW and constitutional rule, when police see a crime being committed or have probable cause to think that a specific person has committed a FELONY and may escape unless arrested, they may arrest without a warrant. Arrest may place police officers at risk if the person arrested has a weapon, and one arrested may wish to dispose of incriminating evidence. To protect themselves and others and to prevent destruction of evidence, officers arresting on probable cause may conduct a full BODY SEARCH of the arrestee and the area within his or her ready reach.

In contrast, warrantless searches and seizures within a home are presumptively unreasonable. Consequently, when police have probable cause to arrest someone who is at home and unlikely to flee while a warrant is sought, they must obtain an ARREST WARRANT.

There are police-civilian encounters short of arrest, usually called "investigative detentions" or "stops-and-frisks." Police rightly investigate suspicious circumstances or characters, and good police work may entail stopping and questioning persons on some reasonable suspicion. If police do stop someone to investigate, however, they may place themselves at risk if the person carries a weapon. On the other hand, a general police authority to stop and question anyone for any reason opens possibilities of police harassment. The Court has held therefore that although the procedure entails a seizure and a search, it is reasonable for officers to stop persons they reasonably suspect of criminal activity and of being armed and dangerous, for the purpose of questioning them and searching for weapons. Under this authority, when police have reasonable suspicion to think that luggage, parcels, or other containers contain contraband or EVIDENCE of a crime, they may detain them for a limited, unintrusive inspection, such as sniffing by a trained narcotics-detection dog.

Mobile vehicles present a special problem. Were police to seek a warrant for a vehicle they have probable cause to suspect contains evidence of a crime, the vehicle might leave the JURISDICTION in the interim. In addition, as the Court has held, because of extensive regulation of vehicles and the character of their public uses, there is a lesser expectation of privacy in vehicles than there is in homes or offices. Consequently, the Court has laid down the rule that when police have probable cause regarding a mobile vehicle, they may undertake a warrantless search of it. The authority remains even if the vehicle is unlikely to be moved or the police have immobilized it.

Governments undertake inspection or regulatory searches for a variety of purposes. Fire inspection codes often require home and building safety inspection. Airline safety dictates some inspection of luggage and persons flying. Entry into an agricultural pest quarantine zone calls for inspection for designated pests. Crossing an international border calls for inspection to ensure right of entry and search to ensure against smuggling of contraband or dutiable goods. In these situations, the need to inspect or search is great, any inconvenience is small, and the scope and the extent of associated interrogation and search is limited. Similarly, public safety or security may require mandatory drug testing for railway or airline employees where their inattention or dereliction of duty would involve an immediate risk of serious harm. In general, the combination of an overriding public interest and the relatively limited character of the search are thought to make such searches reasonable.

Consent searches constitute the final major exception to the warrant and probable cause requirements. Individuals may voluntarily waive their constitutional rights. One can therefore give up the search and seizure protections the Fourth Amendment accords by agreeing to a search. The major questions in such a case are whether there was voluntary consent to the search and whether the party consenting had authority to do so. Whether consent was voluntary or coerced is a factual question, but the state need not show that the person who allegedly gave consent knew that he or she had a right to refuse to give consent. The Court has also indicated that anyone who has common authority over premises or effects can consent to a search of them and that such consent holds against an absent nonconsenting person who shares the authority. In other words, third parties, who are not the targets of a search, can sometimes consent to searches aimed at securing evidence against a target.

GARY GOODPASTER
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Exigent Circumstances Search; Open Fields Doctrine; Plain View Doctrine.)

Bibliography

AMSTERDAM, ANTHONY 1974 Perspectives on the Fourth Amendment. Minnesota Law Review 58:349–477.

LAFAVE, WAYNE 1987 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment, 3 vols. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

LANDYNSKI, J. 1966 Search and Seizure and the Supreme Court. Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science, ser. 84, No. 1.

TAYLOR, TELFORD 1969 Two Studies in Constitutional Interpretation. Columbus: Ohio State University Press.

UNWRITTEN CONSTITUTION

When the American colonists charged that some British colonial policies and practices were unconstitutional, they appealed to what was generally conceived as an unwritten constitutional tradition that combined the practical good sense of English experience with standards of conduct that were simply, or naturally, equitable and right. Though the principles of this constitutional tradition were scattered among state documents, reported cases of the COMMON LAW, treatises, and other writings, their status derived not from having been written or enacted but from their perceived origin in sources like custom, divine will, reason, and nature. These principles were thought superior to acts of Parliament, whose status did depend on their enactment.

While invoking unwritten HIGHER LAW, however, the colonists were implicitly challenging its efficacy. To the charge of TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION, Parliament responded with the theory of virtual representation. The colonists rejected this DOCTRINE and insisted that as a practical matter responsible government depended on the ballot, not on government's respect for natural justice. Belief in a higher law thus coexisted with a pessimistic view of human nature and a corresponding distrust of government.

Unlike Britain's constitution, the American Constitution was established through RATIFICATION, a form of enactment. As the supreme law of the land this enacted Constitution consigns appeals from its authority to the category of extralegal considerations. But foreclosing the constitutionality of appeals from the highest written law did not depreciate unwritten law as such, for the written or enacted law could still reflect unwritten standards of natural justice and reason whose status did not depend on enactment. This was the claim of those who campaigned for ratification, as was to be expected from the rhetoric typical of public attempts to persuade.

This is not to say that anyone saw the proposed constitution as entirely consistent with the dictates of reason and justice. SLAVERY and the equal REPRESENTATION in the SENATE of small and large states are examples of acknowledged compromises with contingencies that would not bend to principle. Nevertheless, the argument for ratification was full of references to higher norms as standards for evaluating constitutions, as principles behind its rules and institutions, and as objectives of the system as a whole. In THE FEDERALIST #9 and #10, ALEXANDER HAMILTON and JAMES MADISON not only presented the Constitution as an attempt to reconcile democracy with minority rights and the common good, but they also stated that the fate of democracy justly depended on that reconciliation. In The Federalist #78 Hamilton defended JUDICIAL REVIEW and recognized the role of judges in "mitigating the severity and confining the operations" of "unjust and partial" enactments. In The Federalist #51 Madison said, "Justice is the end of government" and that it "ever will be pursued until it is obtained, or until liberty be lost in the pursuit." And in the same number he described CHECKS AND BALANCES as a "policy of supplying, by opposite and rival interests, the defects of better motives." Taking this statement at face value would require as a prerequisite to a full understanding of the Constitution knowledge of the "better motives" that constituted part of the model for what the Framers wrote.

It is a matter of central importance that appeals to ideas like justice were not expressed as appeals to this or that particular version but to the general idea itself. Aware of the difference, Hamilton urged readers of The Federalist #1 to rise above "local prejudices little favorable to the discovery of truth." He recalled the frequent claim that Americans would decide the possibility of rational government for the whole of mankind, a claim that might redouble efforts to rise above parochialism by adding "the inducements of philanthropy to those of patriotism." Equally important, however, was his acknowledgment of the great number and power of "causes which . . . give a false bias to . . . judgement." And he urged "moderation" on those "ever so thoroughly persuaded of their being in the right." This appeal suggests the value of self-critical striving for truth, an attitude more of confidence in progress toward truth than in claims to possess it.

Further indication of the Constitution's dependence on commitments that some theorists believe written constitutions can displace is the fact that properties of the Constitution as a whole influence the interpretation of its parts. In addition to the rhetoric of its PREAMBLE and of its draftsmen, the document reflects a concern for simple justice by virtue of its written character. As written communication to an audience of indefinite composition, size, and duration, the document presupposes that virtually anyone can come to understand what it means. Presupposing a large and lasting community of meaning, it anticipates a community of interests embracing all to whom it would potentially apply or who would accept it as a model.

Because of their content, provisions like the TENTH AMENDMENT and the old fugitive slave clause are at odds with the community of interests presupposed by the Constitution as a whole. They are at odds with themselves by virtue of their enunciation as parts of the whole. This tension justified JOHN MARSHALL's nationalist construction of the Tenth Amendment, ABRAHAM LINCOLN's view that the Constitution had put slavery on the path of ultimate extinction, and the Supreme Court's application of the BILL OF RIGHTS to the states through the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE. Observers have interpreted the acceptance of this kind of construction as a sign that the nation has an unwritten constitution. But therapeutic constructions might as easily indicate the power of a written constitution to undermine the parochial and particularistic aspects of its content, separable as the written word is from the physical presence of its authors and their particular needs and conceptions.

The implications of the Constitution's written character bear on a protracted debate among constitutional theorists over the possibility of limiting the discretion of judges in difficult constitutional cases involving human rights, especially rights to SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS and EQUAL PROTECTION. Many participants in the debate share an academic moral skepticism that finds no meaning in general normative concepts beyond the particular conceptions of historical individuals or communities. They diminish simple justice with quotation marks, and they hold particular conceptions of justice interesting primarily as facts that influence other facts, not as beliefs that can be morally better or worse than other beliefs. Rejecting the object of its quest, they also reject traditional moral philosophy as a method of acquiring knowledge. They treat the beliefs of persons and communities as matters essentially of historical fact, to be established by empirical methods, with some room for conceptual analysis, but not for judgments of right and wrong.

To these commentators, talk of reason and justice is essentially rationalization of personal preference, class interest, community morality, and the like. And because they tend to believe that elected officials have a stronger claim to represent the community, they argue that judicial review often involves the imposition of minority preferences on the majority. In an effort to reconcile judicial review with majoritarianism these theorists have tried to link the meaning of general constitutional norms with the intentions of the Framers, tradition, existing and projected community morality, the institutional prerequisites of democratic decision, and other sources whose content they perceive essentially as matters of fact or uncontroversial inference. The effort has failed largely because each source yields conflicting options, not simple, consistent answers. And when the skeptics make their selections, they inevitably (if covertly and therefore irresponsibly) make normative judgments whose rationality their position would force them to deny.

The failure of these skeptical theorists to extirpate normative judgments from decisions about the meaning of constitutional provisions has strengthened the case for moral philosophy in constitutional inquiry, which, in turn, has exacerbated apprehension of unrestrained judicial power. But renewed concern for natural justice need not threaten hopes for limiting judicial discretion. Those who take seriously the idea of justice as something higher than their particular conceptions will value the self-critical striving for moral and political truth recommended in The Federalist #1. This attitude is itself a limitation on discretion of the most objectionable variety because it is the antithesis of willful assertiveness.

Arguments for taking natural justice seriously might begin by reflecting on the apparent power of ordinary political debate to change minds about justice and related ideas. This familiar fact shows that, as ordinary citizens understand it, political life presupposes simple justice. Moral skeptics err in supposing that continuing disagreement about justice proves that debate is pointless or that there is nothing to debate about. If there are moral truths to be known, as is ordinarily presupposed, agreement is not the test of what is right. Holding that agreement is the test may signal that one abandons ordinary presuppositions, but it is not an argument for doing so. Academic inquiry begins with ordinary presuppositions. And though constitutional theorists have not reached agreement (a good thing, for universal consensus would remove the impetus for reflection and improvement), they have been unable to avoid ordinary presuppositions about justice and the value of reasoning in deciding what the Constitution means. Perhaps this is a reason to value self-critical striving for the best constructions to which constitutional language, tradition, and opinion are open.

SOTIRIOS A BARBER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Higher Law; Limited Government; Natural Rights and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

BREST, PAUL 1981 The Fundamental Rights Controversy: The Essential Contradictions of Normative Constitutional Scholarship. Yale Law Journal 90:1063–1109.

GREY, THOMAS C. 1978 Origins of the Unwritten Constitution: Fundamental Law in American Revolutionary Thought. Stanford Law Review 30:843–893.

HARRIS, WILLIAM F., II 1982 Bonding Word and Polity: The Logic of American Constitutionalism. American Political Science Review 76:34–45.

MOORE, MICHAEL S. 1982 Moral Reality. Wisconsin Law Review 1982:1061–1156.

——— 1985 A Natural Law Theory of Interpretation. Southern California Law Review 58:277–398.

UPHAUS v. WYMAN
360 U.S. 72 (1959)

In PENNSYLVANIA V. NELSON (1956) the Court appeared to hold that the Smith Act preempted state antisubversion laws. Here the Court held that state JURISDICTION over sedition against the state, as opposed to sedition against the federal government, was not preempted. In Sweezy v. New Hampshire (1956) the Court had invalidated a subversion investigation by the New Hampshire attorney general. Here, using the interest-balancing techniques of BARENBLATT V. UNITED STATES (1959), decided the same day, the Court upheld a similar investigation by him in his capacity as a one-man legislative investigating committee.

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

URSEY, UNITED STATES v.

See: Civil Forfeiture

USE IMMUNITY

See: Immunity Grant

UTILITY REGULATION

See: Economic Regulation

V

VACCINATION

Vaccination is the introduction into the body of a vaccine to prevent disease. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries a number of states made smallpox vaccination compulsory. The Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of such a law in JACOBSON V. MASSACHUSETTS (1905), and Jacobson's continuing vitality as a precedent is routinely assumed.

The Jacobson opinion was written by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, who regarded the case as he regarded LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), decided later the same year over his dissent. For Holmes, the question in both cases was whether the legislative judgment had passed the bounds of reason. For the majority who found a violation of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS in Lochner's sixty-hour limit on bakers' weekly work but validated compulsory vaccination, the difference surely was that they saw vaccination as a soundly based health requirement. Yet the subsequent collapse of substantive due process as a constitutional limit on ECONOMIC REGULATION should not be taken as a return to the Holmes view equating invasions of the body with the general run of restrictions on liberty. Undoubtedly the standard of judicial review in such cases today is far more demanding than it was for Holmes in Jacobson.

A patient who refuses medical treatment, for example, surely has a constitutional right to do so, founded on the liberty protected by the due process clauses, absent the most compelling justification for state-ordered intrusion into his or her body. The right may come to be described in the privacy language used to explain the abortion decisions, which really rest not so much on privacy in its ordinary sense as on a woman's control over her own body and her own life. Similarly, the decisions involving invasion of the body to extract blood or other EVIDENCE for use in detecting crime make clear that such invasions must pass the test of strict judicial scrutiny of their justifications. Claims of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY may be added to the constitutional mix, as when a Jehovah's Witness refuses a blood transfusion, but with or without that ingredient the constitutional claim to autonomy over the body is strong.

The strength of the countervailing governmental interest in compelling vaccination would, of course, depend on the degree of danger to the public posed by unvaccinated persons. Now that smallpox is approaching worldwide eradication, the constitutional claim of a latter-day Jacobson would be far more substantial. Many doctors now recommend against smallpox vaccination, because—as Jacobson himself argued—the procedure involves a risk of contracting the disease. Given the vastly reduced public health justification for the inoculation, it is by no means clear that a compulsory smallpox vaccination law would survive constitutional challenge today. Undoubtedly, however, a state could constitutionally require vaccination for other diseases that significantly endanger public health.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1978 American Constitutional Law. Pages 913–921. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

VACCO v. QUILL

See: Right to Die

VAGRANCY LAWS

Historically, society has used vagrancy laws to punish undesirable or immoral persons considered to be dangerous because of their potential for engaging in criminal conduct. Such laws differed significantly from traditional criminal statutes in that they made it a crime to be a person of a specified status or condition. In the United States, the types of persons punished as "vagrants" have included rogues, vagabonds, habitual loafers, and others considered to be of immoral character.

The first vagrancy laws, which originated in England, required workers to live in specified locations and proscribed giving assistance to able-bodied beggars who refused to work. Late-fifteenth-century vagrancy laws provided that beggars and idle persons, after punishment, were to be banished.

Vagrancy legislation in the United States began in colonial times and closely followed the English model. In the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court in MAYOR OF NEW YORK V. MILN (1837) implicitly recognized both the objectives and necessity of such laws, stating in OBITER DICTUM: "We think it as competent and as necessary for a state to provide precautionary measures against this moral pestilence of paupers, vagabonds, and possible convicts; as it is to guard against the physical pestilence. . . ." More recently, the Court in EDWARDS V. CALIFORNIA (1941) expressly rejected this notion, observing that "[w]hatever may have been the notion then prevailing, we do not think that it will now be seriously contended that because a person is without employment and without funds he constitutes a "moral pestilence.' Poverty and immorality are not synonymous."

Edwards, however, was a narrow decision, which struck down under the COMMERCE CLAUSE a California statute making it a misdemeanor to bring an indigent, nonresident alien into the state. Thus, notwithstanding Edwards, vagrancy laws continued broadly to proscribe various types of status crimes until the Supreme Court's decision in Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville (1972).

In Papachristou the Court held under the VAGUENESS DOCTRINE that a vagrancy statute was unconstitutional on its face. The ordinance, a typical example of a traditional vagrancy law, subjected the following persons to criminal penalty because the city deemed them to be "vagrants":

> Rogues and vagabonds . . . dissolute persons who go about begging, common gamblers, persons who use juggling or unlawful games or plays, common drunkards, common night walkers, thieves, pilferers or pickpockets, traders in stolen property, lewd, wanton and lascivious persons, keepers of gambling places, common railers and brawlers, persons wandering or strolling around from place to place without any lawful purpose or object, habitual loafers, disorderly persons, persons neglecting all lawful business and habitually spending their time by frequenting houses of ill fame, gaming houses, or places where alcoholic beverages are sold or served, [and] persons able to work but habitually living upon the earnings of their wives or minor children.

Two fundamental constitutional defects arise from the vagueness inherent in traditional vagrancy laws. Initially, the definition of "vagrant" fails to give adequate notice of what criminal conduct is proscribed. As recognized in Connally v. General Construction Co. (1926), when a criminal statute "either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application," the DUE PROCESS CLAUSE requires its invalidation under the vagueness doctrine. This doctrine was first applied to a vagrancy-type statute in Lanzetta v. New Jersey (1939), which held unconstitutional for vagueness a New Jersey "gangster" statute punishing any "person not engaged in any lawful occupation, known to be a member of a gang consisting of two or more persons, who has been convicted [of a crime or at least three disorderly person offenses]." Papachristou applied this doctrine to traditional vagrancy laws, in which the generalized and all-inclusive definitions may encompass many types of innocent behavior.

The second aspect of the vagueness doctrine, even more important than the requirement of fair notice, is that a criminal statute must set forth minimal guidelines to govern law enforcement. Absent such guidelines, a criminal statute is subject to substantial abuse by police officers, prosecutors, and jurors on the basis of their own personal predilections. Imprecise definitions, like those contained in traditional vagrancy statutes, give law enforcement officers virtually unbridled discretion to make arrests on mere suspicion rather than on PROBABLE CAUSE, and to use such arrests as a law enforcement tool to gather information and to interview persons about unrelated crimes. Moreover, as suggested in Justice HUGO L. BLACK's dissenting opinion in Edelman v. California (1953), they are also easily susceptible of being used against persons expressing unpopular views, as well as against the poor and minorities.

Traditional vagrancy statutes may also suffer from other constitutional defects. For example, Robinson v. California (1962) struck down a provision of a California vagrancy statute that made it a crime to be a "narcotics addict," on the ground that the statute violated the CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT clause of the Eighth Amendment. In Powell v. Texas (1968), by contrast, the Court upheld a state statute that proscribed public drunkenness, even though the person so charged might suffer from chronic alcoholism. The Court noted in Powell that such a proscription differs from convicting someone for being an addict, a chronic alcoholic, mentally ill, or a leper. Rather than punishing mere status, the proscription focuses on the specific act of appearing drunk in public on a particular occasion—conduct that the state has an interest in prohibiting.

To the extent that vagrancy laws have been used to exclude undesirables from a state or otherwise to confine them geographically, Edwards recognizes that they may unreasonably burden INTERSTATE COMMERCE. Moreover, such restrictions also may unconstitutionally impair the RIGHT TO TRAVEL. And provisions of vagrancy laws that prohibit association with known thieves and other undesirables not only suffer from vagueness but also may violate an individual's right of association.

In view of the Supreme Court's decisions in the area of vagrancy laws, most of the antiquated provisions of such laws—which focus on controlling undesirables by proscribing various types of status or condition—no longer can withstand constitutional scrutiny.

JAMES R. ASPERGER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Kolender v. Lawson.)

Bibliography

AMSTERDAM, ANTHONY G. 1967 Federal Constitutional Restrictions on the Punishment of Crimes of Status, Crimes of General Obnoxiousness, Crimes of Displeasing Police Officers, and the Like. Criminal Law Bulletin 3:205–241.

FOOTE, CALEB 1956 Vagrancy-Type Law and Its Administration. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 104:603–650.

LACEY, FORREST W. 1953 Vagrancy and Other Crimes of Personal Condition. Harvard Law Review 66:1203–1226.

VAGUENESS

The Fifth Amendment and FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT respectively prohibit the federal and state governments from taking life, liberty, or property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW. These provisions forbid the enforcement of any law that, in the classic words of Connally v. General Construction Co. (1926), "either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application." Vagueness imperils the fair administration of legal sanctions in several ways. First, it threatens punishment of people who had no fair warning of what conduct to avoid. Second, by creating interpretive latitude for those who apply the law—police, prosecutors, judges, juries, and others—vagueness permits punishment to be inflicted selectively for arbitrary or improper reasons. Third, a law's vagueness hinders the efforts of reviewing courts to control such abuses in the law's enforcement; the less clear the law is, the less visible—and correspondingly more difficult to detect and correct—are irregular instances of its administration.

To minimize these dangers, the due process requirement of reasonable clarity forbids enforcement even if the legislature constitutionally could have prohibited, through a clearer law than it did enact, all the behavior its vague law might have been intended to reach. When the uncertain coverage of a vague law might extend into areas of behavior that are constitutionally protected from regulation, however, the ordinary dangers of arbitrary enforcement are heightened, and two additional concerns emerge: the risk that a vague law, which inevitably poses an uncertain risk of prosecution, will inhibit people from exercising precious liberties that the government has no right to outlaw, and the possibility that the legislature did not explicitly focus on the liberty interest and thus did not actually decide that there was compelling reason to regulate it.

The deterrence of constitutionally guaranteed activity that vagueness may produce is akin to the deterrence produced by overbroad laws that encompass both behavior that legitimately may be regulated and behavior that is constitutionally protected. Vagueness differs from overbreadth in that the source of potential inhibition is the law's lack of clarity, not its excessive reach. Yet in both cases the ultimate threat is that those who wish to exercise constitutional rights will refrain from doing so for fear of being penalized. That vagueness may have the practical effect of overbroad regulation explains the common doctrinal confusion between the two concepts. Vagueness also differs from OVERBREADTH in another way: an uncertain law that addresses, even in its most expansive interpretation, only behavior that constitutionally may be regulated may still be void for vagueness, but, by definition, cannot be void for overbreadth.

Two questions dominate the law of vagueness: how much vagueness is tolerable before the law violates due process, and who may raise the vagueness objection. The Supreme Court appears to give different answers to each question, depending on whether or not the vagueness implicates constitutionally protected activity. Still, the constitutional issue of vagueness is always a question of degree, of how much interpretive uncertainty is tolerable before the legitimate regulatory interests of government must yield to the perils of vagueness. If the constitutional definition of vagueness is itself uncertain, the reason is that language is inherently imprecise. The public interest in regulating antisocial behavior would be sacrificed if due process mandated impossible standards of clarity before laws validly could be enforced.

The starting point for vagueness analysis is to ascertain the nature of the standard that the law sets. This inquiry requires judges to consider not only the statutory language but also all interpretive aids that may add to the law's precision, such as accepted meanings in the relevant community (or in other areas of law) for terms contained in the statute, implementing regulations, past judicial interpretations that have clarified uncertain terms, and even judicial clarification in the very case raising the vagueness objection—if this after-the-fact clarification does not disregard the legislature's intent and if the challenger reasonably could have anticipated that the law could be construed to cover his conduct. The interpretive option often allows the Supreme Court and lower federal courts to avoid invalidating vague federal laws. When federal courts confront state laws, however, they are limited to determining whether state court clarification has cured any constitutional problems of vagueness. This difference largely explains why state laws are stricken for vagueness more often than are federal laws.

Once a law has received the benefit of all available clarification, a wide range of factors affects a court's judgment whether the law's remaining vagueness renders it unconstitutional. In a case in which the vagueness does not bear on constitutionally shielded behavior, only two vagueness objections are permitted: that the law is vague as applied to the particular behavior of the individual challenger, or that the law is INVALID ON ITS FACE for being unduly vague as applied to anyone, including the challenger, because no one who consulted it could derive fair warning of what conduct was prohibited or could determine whether the legislature meant one thing rather than another. In Hoffman Estates v. Flipside (1982) the Supreme Court confirmed that in deciding cases in which the latter objection is raised, greater uncertainty is constitutionally permissible when the law regulates a relatively narrow subject matter; when the law regulates economic behavior (because businesses more reasonably can be expected to consult laws in advance of acting than can individuals); when the law imposes civil rather than criminal penalties (because the consequences of noncompliance are less severe); and when the law applies only to those who intentionally or knowingly violate it (because there is less risk of unfair surprise). Historically, once the Supreme Court determined that ECONOMIC REGULATION posed no significant threat to constitutional freedoms, it became more tolerant of the imprecision in laws banning "unreasonable," "unjust," or "unfair" prices or business practices, as United States v. National Dairy Products Corp. (1963) illustrates. Moreover, the Court permits more uncertainty when it perceives the government's regulatory objective to be especially important—as SCREWS V. UNITED STATES (1945) demonstrated in upholding a rather vague CIVIL RIGHTS law protecting individuals—and also when it would be difficult for the legislature to delineate more precisely the penalized behavior.

The Court is especially receptive to a challenge based on vagueness when a law's uncertain coverage risks inhibiting constitutionally safeguarded freedoms. In the last half-century this receptivity has been manifested primarily in FIRST AMENDMENT cases. One indicator of the Court's increased sensitivity is the wide range of people who may now raise the vagueness objection. In cases implicating constitutionally protected activity, the Court not only entertains complaints that a law is vague as applied to the individual litigant or vague in all applications, but it sometimes permits those to whom a law clearly applies to object that it is facially invalid because it is unduly vague as to others. Despite Supreme Court rulings to the contrary both in earlier periods and in cases as recent as PARKER V. LEVY (1974) and BROADRICK V. OKLAHOMA (1973), and despite continuing voices of dissent that this practice allows one as to whom enforcement is fair to assert the hypothetical rights of others and confuses vagueness and overbreadth, the Court currently maintains, in such cases as YOUNG V. AMERICAN MINI THEATRES (1976) and KOLENDER V. LAWSON (1983), that such a person may have the whole law invalidated if the deterrent effect of its vagueness on others is real and substantial.

All of the factors that bear on the acceptable degree of vagueness in laws encompassing only unprotected conduct still apply, some more heavily, to laws that potentially reach constitutionally protected conduct. In addition, the Supreme Court seems to be concerned with other factors: how much protected freedom the vagueness might deter; how important the asserted freedom is; the judges' capacity to preserve the freedom through case-by-case application; the legislature's ability to reformulate the law in less inhibiting fashion; and the extent and importance of legitimate regulation that must be foregone if the law is voided for vagueness.

Although the Court does not always articulate these considerations, they appear to underlie many decisions. In Baggett v. Bullitt (1964) and Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction (1961), for example, the invalidation of LOYALTY OATH requirements for undue vagueness arrayed important freedoms of association against dubious government needs for assurance. More generally, when the enactment's vagueness risks suppression of unpopular expression or criticism of government, the Court's tolerance level is low. Thus in Coates v. Cincinnati (1971) an ordinance barring assembly of three or more persons "annoying" passers-by was held void, as was a law prohibiting "contemptuous treatment" of the American flag in Smith v. Goguen (1974).

On the other hand, even vagueness that inhibits valued expression is sometimes indulged if regulatory interests are perceived as powerful. Good examples are the extreme vagueness Parker v. Levy permitted the military in punishing "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman" and the lesser, yet undoubted, uncertainty of laws prohibiting partisan political activity by PUBLIC EMPLOYEES that the Court upheld in Broadrick v. Oklahoma.

Similarly divergent assessments of the acceptable level of indefiniteness in statutes defining and proscribing OBSCENITY reflect conflict within the Court over the value of sexually explicit, but constitutionally protected, materials. The judgment that deterrence of some sexually explicit adult movies was no cause for alarm led a plurality in Young v. American Mini Theatres to uphold a ZONING ordinance restricting the concentration of adult theaters and bookstores in downtown Detroit. A similar judgment underlies the Court's willingness to permit inevitably vague definitions of obscenity to serve as the basis for criminal punishment. By contrast, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, who is more concerned about the potentially protected sexual expression that might be lost, declared in his important dissent in Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton (1973) his firm, if belated, conviction that vagueness in defining obscenity is virtually an insuperable problem. Even he, however, did not conclude that the distribution of obscene materials must consequently remain unregulated; rather, he suggested that the protection of juveniles and the privacy of unconsenting adults might render vagueness tolerable, though protection of consenting adults and community mores and aesthetics would not.

The complexity of the vagueness doctrine stems, then, from the dual nature of the constitutional protection that it offers. Individuals are protected in any case from arbitrary enforcement without a fair opportunity to conform their conduct to legitimate law, and the social interest in maximizing constitutional freedoms is central to judgments about vagueness when the law's indefiniteness threatens to inhibit those freedoms.

JONATHAN D. VARAT
(1986)

Bibliography

AMSTERDAM, ANTHONY B. 1960 The Void-for-Vagueness Doctrine in the Supreme Court. University of Pennsylvania Law Review 109:67–116.

BOGEN, DAVID S. 1978 First Amendment Ancillary Doctrines. Maryland Law Review 37:679, 714–726.

SCHAUER, FREDERICK 1978 Fear, Risk and the First Amendment: Unravelling the "Chilling Effect." Boston University Law Review 58:685.

VALENTINE v. CHRESTENSEN

See: Commercial Speech

VALLANDIGHAM, EX PARTE
1 Wallace 243 (1864)

In 1863, soldiers arrested, tried, and found guilty Negrophobic Democratic congressman Clement L. Vallandigham (Ohio) for violating Army orders against public expressions of Confederate sympathies. After returning to this country from banishment in rebel lines, which ABRAHAM LINCOLN had ordered, Vallandigham applied to the Supreme Court for a WRIT OF CERTIORARI to annul the military proceedings. The Court, accepting JURISDICTION, decided, without dissent, that it had no jurisdiction over appeals from military courts. The likelihood of direct clashes between the Court and the COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF thus receded to revive in EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1867).

HAROLD M. HYMAN
(1986)

VALLEY FORGE CHRISTIAN COLLEGE v. AMERICANS UNITED FOR SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE
454 U.S. 464 (1982)

Severely limiting the precedent of FLAST V. COHEN (1968), the Supreme Court here tightened the requirements for STANDING in a TAXPAYER'S SUIT against the federal government.

Under a general power from Congress to dispose of surplus federal property, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) transferred land and buildings worth over $500,000 to a religious college that trained students for the ministry. Because HEW calculated that the government benefited from the transfer at a rate of 100 percent, the college paid nothing.

Federal taxpayers sued to set aside the transfer, contending that it amounted to an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. The Supreme Court held, 5–4, that the taxpayers lacked standing. The majority distinguished Flast, which had upheld taxpayer standing to challenge federal subsidies to church schools: Flast challenged an act of Congress; here plaintiffs challenged a decision by HEW. Furthermore, Flast involved injury to the plaintiffs as taxpayers: tax money was to be spent unconstitutionally. Here the Court dealt not with Congress's spending power but with the power to dispose of property.

The dissenters emphasized what everyone knew: absent taxpayer standing, no one has standing to challenge government donations of property to churches. In such cases the establishment clause is enforceable in the consciences of government officials, but not in court.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

VALUE PLURALISM AND THE CONSTITUTION

Value pluralism is the idea that legitimate human values and goals are many, often incompatible, and not reducible to any single overarching principle or conception of the good. Individuals, and certainly societies, have aspirations that conflict and therefore cannot all be fully realized. A society cannot have perfect human equality and perfect liberty, for example, because people will often exercise freedom to differentiate themselves, and hence to make themselves unequal to their fellows. Equality or freedom may be at odds with other values as well, like tradition, or the desire for social unity, or for social tolerance; good government may be at odds with self-government; secularism with the desire for shared faith; and so forth. Value pluralism implies the need for compromise and conciliation, and an open MARKETPLACE OF IDEAS—many of which may be good, although conflicting. Value pluralism is a theme closely identified with the thought of Sir Isaiah Berlin, the English philosopher and historian of ideas. As Berlin pointed out, pluralism itself is at odds with the dream of philosophical harmony: the quest for a unified system of true values, and for consistent right answers about how we should live. Many systems of belief in human history have held out this hope of ultimate unity—Platonist, religious, rationalist, or Marxist. Such "monism" can smack of tyranny, however. The idea that any one ideal or system of values represents all that is good may imply enforcing the ideal "by whatever means necessary."

Value pluralism, on the other hand, is associated with LIBERALISM, for a defining element of liberalism is respect for human autonomy—freedom for people to make their own choices about what is good and worthy in life. (Free people inevitably make various and conflicting choices. This does not trouble the pluralist who sees the possibility of good in many of these choices. It is the believer in a single ideal who may be more troubled by people making "wrong" choices.) As an outlook, therefore, value pluralism is congenial to the U.S. Constitution, since the Constitution is a liberal charter.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH, for example, has obvious overtones of value pluralism: among conflicting ideas, many may be good. So likewise for RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. The detailed plan for elective office-holding, which occupies a large chunk of the Constitution, also implies value pluralism. Free elections mean that officials and parties with conflicting ideals will tend to alternate with each other. This might seem perverse to a believer in a single ideal or in a unified system of values who would question why falsehood and wrong should be allowed to alternate with truth and goodness. But popular elections make more sense if there might be good in many of the conflicting ideals, from Federalist to Whig, and Democratic to Republican.

Value pluralism has equivocal implications for JUDICIAL REVIEW, one of the most distinctive features of American constitutionalism. The courts' power to strike down the acts of other branches of government can sometimes promote plurality of values in American life. Judicial review of censorship, or of restrictions on religious freedom, for example, can protect pluralism of thought or of religion at times when there might be strong majority pressures for uniformity. By striking down acts of Congress as going beyond federal power under the Constitution's FEDERALISM provisions, judicial review can also be a counterweight against the tendency of the national government to impose national uniformity. The courts can ensure that state or local governments are free to adopt various values and policies, instead of a single policy or ideal that is enforced nationwide.

But on the whole, the implications of value pluralism are in the direction of judicial restraint. Judicial review tends to impose a single standard, and to preempt the coexistence of competing interpretations of the Constitution in different parts of the country and at different times. This is because courts are hierarchical. Appellate review, supervised ultimately by the Supreme Court, means that only one judicial interpretation can prevail, at least in principle, at any given time. Deference to PRECEDENT and STARE DECISIS tends to preserve such sole, exclusive interpretations even over time. Nonjudicial branches of government, by contrast, are more pluralist. There are more of them—federal and state—and they are more independent of one another. A policy decision (or an interpretation of the Constitution) by any of them is more easily changed or OVERRULED than are the constitutional doctrines of the courts.

The perennial debate in America about the courts and the Constitution is not whether there should be judicial review, but how aggressive it should be and how broadly public issues should be treated as questions of constitutional law. To what extent (if at all) should ABORTION be a constitutional question? What about routine police procedure and public aid to private (including parochial) schools or their students? What about CAMPAIGN FINANCE or laws that treat the sexes differently? Value pluralism weighs against JUDICIAL ACTIVISM, at least during times when there is little realistic threat that social pressures would impose their own uniformity across the country in the absence of judicial intervention. With somewhat less constitutional law, there would be more scope for a plurality of policies, ideals, and values—many of which might conflict, but nonetheless (at least some of them) be good.

MAIMON SCHWARZSCHILD
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Nonjudicial Interpretation of the Constitution.)

Bibliography

BERLIN, ISAIAH 1997 The Proper Study of Mankind: An Anthology of Essays. Henry Hardy and Roger Hausheer, eds. London: Chatto & Windus.

GRAY, JOHN 1996 Isaiah Berlin. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

IGNATIEFF, MICHAEL 1998 Isaiah Berlin: A Life. New York: Metropolitan Books.

SCHWARZSCHILD, MAIMON 1988 Value Pluralism and the Constitution: In Defense of the State Action Doctrine. Supreme Court Review 1988:129–161.

——— 1996 Pluralist Interpretation: From Religion to the First Amendment. Journal of Contemporary Legal Issues 7: 447–472.

VAN BUREN, MARTIN
(1782–1862)

Martin Van Buren of Kinderhook, New York, was admitted to the bar in 1803 and quickly established himself as a successful lawyer and politician. While serving in the New York legislature, Van Buren and a group of close associates known as the Albany Regency constituted the first political machine with a modern cast in the nation. As such the Regency gave a new direction to American politics.

But Van Buren did not consider the political process an end in itself; he saw in it a mode for achieving his notion of a Jeffersonian republic, in which a judicious division of power and responsibility between the central government and the states turned on a STRICT CONSTRUCTION of the Constitution. Opposition was expressed in BROAD CONSTRUCTION, along Hamiltonian lines. Between these two positions, the one emphasizing state power, the other national, the very essence of SOVEREIGNTY would be in constant conflict over public questions, a conflict he thought essential to the democratic governance of the states and the nation. He carried his ideas of an adversarial party system to Washington when elected a United States senator in 1821, and over the two terms he served, developed, and promoted them. Van Buren bound together into a cohesive program the personal factions that constituted his party. As he had planned, his partisan coalition gave impetus to a specific political opposition. Thus, he played a significant role in the formation of the current two-party system.

Van Buren articulated a historical view of strict construction. He was a frequent critic of the centralizing doctrines of the MARSHALL COURT and supported measures to curb JUDICIAL REVIEW. He drafted ANDREW JACKSON's veto of the MAYSVILLE ROAD BILL, the first comprehensive treatment of the responsibility of the central government to fund INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS in the various states. Van Buren distinguished projects that were clearly intrastate from those that were interstate in character. In withholding the support of the national government for the economic development of the individual states, he relied partly on JAMES MONROE's veto of the Cumberland Road Bill, but he took care to assert that many projects purely local in character and initiated by a state might deserve support under constitutional provisions that provided for the common defense and the GENERAL WELFARE. His distinction depended upon many variables which could change with time and with circumstance.

Van Buren's second expression of what might be properly called the New Jeffersonianism was in the financial policy he pursued as President (1837–1841): the subtreasury system, which looked to the separation of the federal government from the state deposit banks. The federal government held most of the nation's specie currency, the basis of the paper money supply; thus it would act as a restraint on state banks, curbing their tendencies to speculation and ensuring a more equitable distribution of credit. His means may have been orthodox and deflationary, but they acted as a restriction upon state power, contrary to THOMAS JEFFERSON's ideas on government.

Van Buren's stand on the powers of Congress over the TERRITORIES, however, was a restatement of Jeffersonian views expressed in the NORTHWEST ORDINANCE of 1787. Van Buren added his own interpretation of Article IV, section 3, of the Constitution, which delegates to the Congress the power "to make needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States." In doing so he went further than JOHN MARSHALL and agreed with JOSEPH STORY who asserted that the power was exclusive and that "rules and regulations" covered all possible contingencies. Van Buren had supported the MISSOURI COMPROMISE as a proper exercise of congressional power even though, as a matter of precedent, he thought the Ordinance of 1787 excluded slavery from all territories. In the United States SENATE he voted against the bill organizing a territorial government for Florida because it sustained slavery. The most complete exposition of his stand on the territorial question of the late 1840s and 1850s is expressed in an address he prepared for the New York Democratic legislative caucus. It was the basis for the platform of the Free Soil party in the campaign of 1848 and the spirit and the substance of the Republican party platform in the campaigns of 1856 and 1860.

W. JOHN NIVEN
(1986)

Bibliography

NIVEN, W. JOHN 1983 Martin Van Buren and the Romantic Age of American Politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

VAN DEVANTER, WILLIS
(1859–1941)

Colleagues and contemporary observers agreed that Willis Van Devanter was enormously influential during his twenty-six years on the Supreme Court. Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, who as President appointed him in 1911, described his Wyoming associate as "my mainstay," "the most valuable man in our court," and the Justice who had "more influence" than any other. Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, Van Devanter's ideological antipode, praised him as a "master of formulas that decided cases without creating precedents." Harvard's Professor FELIX FRANKFURTER aptly dubbed him Taft's "Lord Chancellor."

Van Devanter's backstage prominence contrasted vividly with his well-known "pen paralysis." He rarely spoke for the Court in major constitutional cases. During his tenure, Van Devanter averaged only fourteen written opinions each year; during the 1930s he averaged only three a year.

Van Devanter came to the Court after a career in Wyoming law and politics, followed by five years in the Interior Department. President THEODORE ROOSEVELT appointed him to the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals in 1903; eight years later, President Taft elevated him to the Supreme Court. Taft, himself a former circuit judge, prized judicial experience as a criterion for appointment to the Supreme Court.

Although Van Devanter was one of the conservative "Four Horsemen" of the NEW DEAL era, two of his earlier opinions aligned him with the "liberal nationalistic" wing of the Court. In the second of the EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY CASES (1913) he upheld a federal statute holding railroads liable for injuries suffered by workers engaged in INTERSTATE COMMERCE. He boldly generalized about the sweep of the COMMERCE CLAUSE, describing the commerce power as "complete in itself," but he added that it did not extend to matters that had no "real or substantial relation to some part of such commerce." The previous year, in Southern Railway Co. v. United States (1911), he had written for the Court to sustain federal railroad safety legislation in a case involving an intrastate railroad which carried goods that had passed through interstate commerce. Again, Van Devanter found the commerce power plenary and operative if an intrastate matter affected interstate commerce. The decision anticipated Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES's consideration of intrastate effects on the commerce power in the Shreveport Case (Houston, East and West Texas Railroad Company v. United States, 1914), an opinion Van Devanter supported; yet, in the 1930s he consistently rejected similar arguments to expand the scope of federal ECONOMIC REGULATION.

Van Devanter's most important and enduring contribution to constitutional law came with his opinion broadly approving Congress's investigative powers. In McGrain v. Daugherty (1927) the plaintiffs had challenged a Senate committee's investigation of Harding administration scandals. Van Devanter recognized that historically "the power of inquiry—with process to enforce it—is an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function"; that the power might be abused, he added, was no argument against its existence.

Van Devanter usually supported governmental repression of political dissent in the WORLD WAR I era. In the early 1930s, however, he deviated from his ideological allies as he joined the majority in invalidating a section of California's criminal anarchy law in STROMBERG V. CALIFORNIA (1931). He also supported Justice GEORGE H. SUTHERLAND's pathbreaking opinion on Sixth Amendment rights in POWELL V. ALABAMA (1932). But a few years later, when the Court reverted to the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER doctrine for FIRST AMENDMENT cases, Van Devanter led the "Four Horsemen" in dissent. In HERNDON V. LOWRY (1937), which involved a black communist who had been convicted under Georgia state law, Van Devanter thought that Herndon's appeal to blacks was especially dangerous; Van Devanter's dissent reflected the suppressive BAD TENDENCY TEST and racist rhetoric, as well.

During the constitutional struggles over the New Deal, Van Devanter opposed the administration in every case except ASHWANDER V. TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY (1936). Even when his conservative colleagues resurrected the restrictive doctrines of UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT COMPANY (1895), a decision which he had circumvented in some of his early opinions, Van Devanter steadfastly opposed the expansion of national regulatory power. But he never spoke for that viewpoint, either in the majority or in dissent. Fittingly, however, he played a key role in what may have been FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT' s most significant political defeat. During the consideration of Roosevelt's court-packing proposal in April 1937, Van Devanter announced his intention to take advantage of a new law allowing Justices to retire at full pay. The impending vacancy offered promise of a shift in the Court's ideological stance, and made the President's plan unnecessary for many administrative supporters. After his retirement from the Supreme Court, Van Devanter apparently was the first retired Justice who served regularly as a reserve judge.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

PASCHAL, JOEL F. 1951 Mr. Justice Sutherland: A Man Against the State. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

PRINGLE, HENRY F. 1939 The Life and Times of William Howard Taft. New York: Farrar & Rinehart.

VAN HORNE'S LESSEE v. DORRANCE
2 Dallas 304 (1795)

Van Horne's Lessee, a circuit court case in the District of Pennsylvania, is memorable because of Justice WILLIAM PATERSON's charge to the jury, instructing them that a state act unconstitutionally violated property rights. His opinion can be read as a roadmap of the direction that constitutional law would take as a law of judicially implied limitations on legislation adversely affecting property rights. In lucid nonlegal language, Paterson spelled out judicial presuppositions and constitutional principles that were to become orthodox for well over a century. In discussing "What is a Constitution?" and analyzing the legislature's authority to pass its act divesting land titles, Paterson joined together the doctrines of JUDICIAL REVIEW and VESTED RIGHTS. Prefiguring FLETCHER V. PECK (1810) as well as the basic principle of MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), Paterson invoked the HIGHER LAW concept and the CONTRACT CLAUSE against the statute.

Having declared that "it will be the duty of the Court to adhere to the constitution, and to declare the act null and void" if it exceeds the legislature's authority, Paterson discoursed on the relationship between FUNDAMENTAL LAW and the rights of property. He found such rights inalienable, their preservation a primary object of "the social compact." Property, when vested, must be secure. For the government to take property without providing a recompense in value would be "an outrage," a "dangerous" display of unlimited authority, "a monster in legislation" that would "shock all mankind." To divest a citizen of his freehold even with compensation was a necessary "despotic" power to be exercised only in "cases of the first necessity." The reason was that the Constitution "encircles, and renders [a vested right] an holy thing. . . . It is a right not ex gratia from the legislature, but ex debito from the constitution. It is sacred. . . ."

Paterson informed the jury that courts must hold unconstitutional legislative encroachments on sacred property rights even in the absence of a written constitutional limitation on legislative powers. He relied on "reason, justice, and moral recitude," "the principles of social alliance in every free government," and the "letter and spirit of the constitution." The letter, in this instance, turned out to be the clause in Article I, section 10, of the Constitution, prohibiting a state law impairing the OBLIGATION OF A CONTRACT. Paterson assumed that the contract clause extended to contracts to which the state was a party; that a previous state act recognizing a property interest of the original claimant was a contract within the protection of the contract clause; and that the divestiture of the titles, even with compensation, violated the clause. Paterson's charge was a textbook exposition of CONSTITUTIONALISM, higher law limitations, judicial review, courts as bulwarks of property rights, and the contract clause.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

VATTEL, EMERICH DE
(1714–1767)

Emerich de Vattel, the Swiss-born statesman and theorist of LIMITED GOVERNMENT, wrote his Law of Nations (1758) as an attempt to explain international law on the basis of NATURAL RIGHTS. He argued that men compacted to form sovereign states, and the state ordained a CONSTITUTION superior to any prince or legislature. Vattel reasoned that because the "legislature derives its power from the constitution, it cannot overleap the bounds of it without destroying its own foundation"—and this maxim was frequently cited by American revolutionary leaders including JAMES OTIS and SAMUEL ADAMS. Even more important for American constitutional thought was his assertion, often quoted by JAMES MADISON, that states joining a federal union retained their SOVEREIGNTY but were nevertheless bound by the terms of the union.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

VEAZIE BANK v. FENNO
8 Wallace 533 (1869)

During the CIVIL WAR, Congress introduced national bank notes, secured by United States bonds, as one form of currency. Congress then decided to make its money supreme by driving out of circulation bank notes issued by state banks, and to that end it imposed a prohibitory ten percent tax on those notes. Veazie Bank objected on the grounds that the tax was not levied for revenue purposes but to drive state notes out of existence by the device of a DIRECT TAX, which must be apportioned among the states on the basis of population. Chief Justice SALMON P. CHASE, for a seven-member majority, upheld the constitutionality of the congressional tax statute. Chase declared that only taxes on land and CAPITATION TAXES were direct taxes. He found the constitutional authority for the statute in Congress's power to control the currency of the nation and for that purpose to restrain "the circulation as money of any notes not issued under its own authority." Without such a restraining power the attempt by Congress to secure a "sound and uniform currency for the country must be futile."

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

VENUE

"Venue" refers to the location of a trial. Article III of the Constitution specifies that federal crimes be tried "in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed." This provision is reinforced by the SIXTH AMENDMENT's guarantee of TRIAL BY JURY "of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed." Although the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE has made the Sixth Amendment's jury trial guarantee applicable to the states, the Supreme Court has not yet had occasion to decide whether that amendment's venue provision also limits the states. However, state law itself usually provides for trial in the locality where the crime is alleged to have been committed.

Both the FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE and a number of state laws contemplate a change of venue when trial in the district otherwise appropriate risks prejudicing the fairness of a criminal trial. The availability of a change of venue has been offered by the Supreme Court as one argument against GAG ORDERS forbidding the press to publish information about pending prosecutions. (See FREE PRESS/FAIR TRIAL.)

Some crimes are committed in more than one place: interstate transportation of a stolen automobile, for example, or certain criminal conspiracies. The Supreme Court has upheld congressional legislation allowing prosecution in any of the districts in which such a crime is committed.

Venue in civil actions is not limited by the Constitution. By statute, Congress has established an elaborate set of rules governing venue in federal civil cases. Because these rules are designed for the parties' convenience, the right to assert them can be waived. Thus a defendant in a federal court civil action must raise the objection of improper venue before trial, at the pleadings stage of the case.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

Bibliography

WRIGHT, CHARLES ALAN 1983 The Law of Federal Courts, 4th ed. Chap. 7. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

VERMONT CONSTITUTION OF 1777
(July 8, 1777)

In significant respects Vermont's early constitutional history was unique. It was never a colony, had no charter, and was not recognized as a separate government or state by the original thirteen, although it fully supported the American cause during the Revolution. Vermonters declared their independence not only from Great Britain but also from New York. A "convention" adopted a CONSTITUTION, prefaced by a declaration of rights, that was modeled after the extremely democratic PENNSYLVANIA CONSTITUTION OF 1776, but Vermont added three notable provisions. Its constitution was the first to outlaw slavery, the first to allow all male residents over twenty-one to vote even if they owned no property and paid no taxes, and the first to include a provision for JUST COMPENSATION in cases of EMINENT DOMAIN. Vermont joined the union as the fourteenth state in 1791.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

VESTED RIGHTS

"Vested rights" are claims enforceable under law. Early in the history of the Republic, an assertive concept of vested rights became the core of a highly refined legal and constitutional doctrine that was invoked as a shield for private property against regulation by government. In EDWARD S. CORWIN's phrase, this became "the basic doctrine of American constitutional law."

An early expression of the doctrine was Justice WILLIAM PATERSON'S opinion in VAN HORNE'S LESSEE V. DORRANCE (1795), stating that preservation of private property is "a primary object of the SOCIAL COMPACT," so that any law taking one person's freehold and vesting it in another without compensation must be seen as "inconsistent with the principles of reason, justice and moral rectitude . . . [and] contrary to the principle of social alliance in every free government." In expounding this doctrine, judges and treatise writers cited general principles of justice from natural law, civil law, and COMMON LAW. In pre-1860 contract and property law, the doctrine served in tandem with the CONTRACT CLAUSE and was regularly invoked by those opposing the expansion of state interventions under the taxation, EMINENT DOMAIN, and POLICE POWERS.

There is a difference between "vested interests" and "vested rights." The former are claims and expectations based on private contractual relationships and upon a property owner's understanding of the privileges, immunities, and responsibilities associated by law with the property in question. Interests become "rights" when courts agree to enforce such contractual relationships and understandings concerning property. This difference was recognized by Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON, in his opinion in United States v. Willow Run Power Company (1945), declaring: "Not all economic interests are "property rights'; only those economic advantages are "rights' which have the law back of them. . . ." A claim to a right (or "advantage"), Jackson stated, "is really a question to be answered" in judicial proceedings and decisions; it is not something to be taken a priori, even when ancient maxims and rules can be adduced in favor of the claim.

Justice Jackson's robust LEGAL REALISM was not the view that prevailed in legal and constitutional discourse during the nineteenth century. On occasion, individual judges or courts did defend legislative prerogatives against claims of vested rights in terms that foreshadowed Jackson's formulation. For example, a New York judge in 1835 denounced vested rights as an "indefinite" term that was "resorted to when no better argument exists." Any governmental action, he contended, imposed "burthens and duties" that redefined rights. Much more commonly found, however, were views founded on the notion that it was "manifest injustice by positive law" when legislation took away what Justice SAMUEL CHASE described in CALDER V. BULL (1798) as "that security for personal liberty, or private property, for the protection whereof the government was established."

State judges regularly invoked the vested rights doctrine, often explicitly merged with DUE PROCESS declarations, to review and sometimes invalidate legislation. Many judges applied natural-law principles associated with the Fifth Amendment, contending that they were a check upon the abuse of legislative power no less important than explicit state constitutional provisions or than the contract clause. Much relied upon, in such decisions, was Justice JOSEPH STORY's opinion in Wilkinson v. Leland (1829), contending that "the fundamental maxims of a free government seem to require that the rights of personal liberty and private property should be held sacred."

During JOHN MARSHALL's tenure as Chief Justice, the court introduced "vested rights" doctrine into contract clause rulings, as in Marshall's opinions in FLETCHER V. PECK (1810) and DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819). When conservative, property-minded state and federal judges applied Marshall's doctrines in broad terms in the 1830s and 1840s, the debate over vested rights began to center on whether or not corporate privileges, broadly construed, should be given the same protection as property held by individuals and quasi-public institutions. To conservatives such as DANIEL WEBSTER and Justice Story, a corporation's privileges and property rights under a franchise were merely a variant of an individual's rights in fee simple to a house or a tract of farmland. Webster, for example, viewed the action of Massachusetts in CHARLES RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY V. WARREN BRIDGE COMPANY (1837) as part of a "revolution against the foundations on which property rests." He raised the alarm again in his argument in WEST RIVER BRIDGE V. DIX (1848), denouncing broad use of the power of eminent domain as a dangerous kind of agrarian radicalism. There was a pragmatic side, as well, to the arguments of conservatives; both Story and Webster warned on many occasions that to allow legislatures unrestrained use of the police power or eminent domain, in derogation of vested property rights whether personal or corporate, would risk bringing all new investment (and material progress) to a halt.

Beginning with the decision in the Charles River Bridge case, the antebellum Supreme Court softened its stand on vested rights; state judges, however, kept the doctrine before the bar and the public. The high-sounding rhetoric of vested rights doctrine can easily obscure one of the important facts of the pre-Civil War period—the irony that in practice the antebellum state courts, as James Willard Hurst has shown, "tended to uphold vested rights only so long as they were felt to yield substantial or present returns in social function." Seldom did the courts support claims of vested rights that were invoked to protect "static" economic interests, attempting to block technological innovation or new forms of investment. Judges favored instead claims of "dynamic" rights that could be seen as forces for change and growth.

The adoption of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT opened the way to revival of vested rights doctrine in federal constitutional law. If anything, "vested rights" were now championed in enlarged forms. Leading conservative lawyers such as WILLIAM M. EVARTS, former Justice JOHN A. CAMPBELL, and John N. Jewett seized on the Fourteenth Amendment to forge the new, broader doctrine. Citing the concept of property as an "established expectation," they denied that government could deprive property owners of any expectation unless it paid compensation. They expanded the notion of property to include the right to engage in occupations; and they contended broadly that the rights of ownership included the right to compete freely in the quest for profits. Taking up arguments presented earlier by Campbell, Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD even attempted in his dissenting opinion in the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) to fuse the Fourteenth Amendment with the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE—and thereby to throw the mantle of vested rights over economic interests and activities that he viewed as embraced by the phrase "pursuit of happiness." As he believed, such rights were beyond the legitimate reach of state regulation. Some conservative jurists and lawyers also found in the amendment's PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause another prop for vested rights doctrine.

The newly expanded version of vested rights soon found its way into constitutional law, as Justice Field's views came to prevail with those of his colleagues. The traditional rhetoric of vested rights was harnessed to the FREEDOM OF CONTRACT doctrine, which became standard fare in the Court's decisions concerning the validity of laws regulating labor and business practices. In giving content to the doctrine of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS in the field of economic and social regulation, the Supreme Court marked out a meandering, uncertain, often absurd boundary between what it found to be legitimate police power and the "sacred" rights of property. The view, as Laurence Tribe has phrased it, "that certain settled expectations of a focused and crystallized sort should be secure against governmental disruption, at least without appropriate compensation" became a powerful weapon in the hands of the new industrial corporate interests—and at the same time became the center of political storms in the Populist and Progressive eras. Only with abandonment of economic due process in the late 1930s, together with the ascendancy of views such as Justice Jackson's harshly realist version of vested rights, did the concept recede in importance in constitutional law and in political strife.

In HOME BUILDING & LOAN ASSOCIATION V. BLAISDELL (1934), the Court gave notice that it was ready to uphold even so dramatic a state abridgment of private rights as a mortgage moratorium law. The Court would not, the majority declared, "throttle the capacity of the States to protect their fundamental interests." The common good, or the public interest, must also be honored in any system allocating constitutional powers and immunities. Thus the career of vested rights in the Webster-Story-Field tradition clearly had run its course. Nor for more than thirty years did debates in legislatures and courts return to the concerns of the conservative era; and even then the notion of "settled expectations" and related vested rights ideas were exhumed for application only in a fairly narrow context, relating to land use regulation and INVERSE CONDEMNATION. To that degree, at least, echoes of a doctrine rooted in natural law do continue to be heard in our own day.

HARRY N. SCHEIBER
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1914 The Basic Doctrine of American Constitutional Law. Michigan Law Review 12:247–276.

HURST, JAMES WILLARD 1956 Law and the Conditions of Freedom in the Nineteenth Century United States. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

MCCLELLAN, JAMES 1971 Joseph Story and the American Constitution. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

MCCURDY, CHARLES W. 1975 Justice Field and the Jurisprudence of Government-Business Relations. Journal of American History 61:970–1005.

TWISS, BENJAMIN R. 1942 Lawyers and the Constitution: How Laissez Faire Came to the Supreme Court. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

VETO POWER

After rejecting an absolute veto for the President, the delegates at the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 granted the President a qualified power to veto congressional legislation, subject to an override by a two-thirds majority of each house of Congress. Some anti-Federalists objected to the veto as an encroachment upon the legislative power in violation of the SEPARATION OF POWERS doctrine, but ALEXANDER HAMILTON answered in THE FEDERALIST #73 that the President needed a veto to protect the executive branch from "depredations" by the legislature. The veto was also designed to be used against bills that were constitutionally defective, poorly drafted, or injurious to the community.

The Constitution provides that any bill not returned by the President "within ten Days (Sundays excepted)" shall become law "unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevent its Return, in which Case it shall not be a Law." The latter procedure, known as the POCKET VETO, was first used by President JAMES MADISON in 1812. In the POCKET VETO CASE of 1929, the Supreme Court decided that "adjournment" did not refer merely to final adjournment at the end of a Congress. The pocket veto could be used during any adjournment, final or interim, that "prevented" a bill's return to Congress. However, in Wright v. United States (1938) the Court considered a three-day recess by the Senate too short a period to constitute adjournment.

Further clarification of the pocket veto resulted from an action by President RICHARD M. NIXON. In 1970, during an adjournment of Congress for less than a week, he pocket-vetoed the Family Practice of Medicine Bill. An appellate court, in Kennedy v. Sampson (1974), held that an *intra*session adjournment of Congress does not prevent the President from returning a bill so long as Congress makes appropriate arrangements to receive presidential messages. The GERALD R. FORD and JIMMY CARTER administrations renounced pocket vetoes during *inter*session adjournments as well. This political accommodation restricted the pocket veto to the final adjournment at the end of the second session. President RONALD W. REAGAN, however, has used the pocket veto between the first and second sessions, provoking renewed litigation.

Other court decisions have clarified the boundaries of the veto power. In 1919, in Missouri Pacific Railway Co. v. Kansas, the Supreme Court announced that the Constitution required only two-thirds of a quorum in each House to override a veto, not two-thirds of the total membership. In 1899 the Court decided, in La Abra Silver Mining Co. v. United States, that the President could sign a bill after Congress recessed, and in Edwards v. United States (1932) the Court ruled that he could sign a bill after a final adjournment of Congress.

Statistics underscore the effectiveness of the President's veto. Of the 1,380 regular (return) vetoes from GEORGE WASHINGTON through Jimmy Carter, Congress overrode only ninety-four. There have also been 1,011 pocket vetoes, more than half of them directed by GROVER CLEVELAND and FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT against private relief bills.

Most of the governors of the states have been granted authority to veto individual items of a bill (the "item veto"). Congress has thus far resisted giving this power to the President, despite popular belief that such a power would increase "economy and efficiency" by combating "logrolling" and "pork-barrel" politics in Congress. Prominent among the arguments against the item veto is the danger that Presidents could use the authority to control the votes of individual members of Congress. A project in a member's district or state could be held hostage until he or she agreed to support a nominee or legislative proposal backed by the White House.

An informal type of item veto has evolved because Presidents selectively enforce the law. In signing a bill, Presidents have announced that they would refuse to carry out certain provisions which they considered unconstitutional or undesirable. The IMPOUNDMENT of funds has been a common example, but Presidents have also severed from authorization bills a number of sections they considered a "nullity," without binding force or effect.

LOUIS FISHER
(1986)

Bibliography

FISHER, LOUIS 1985 Constitutional Conflicts between Congress and the President. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

JACKSON, CARLTON 1967 Presidential Vetoes, 1792–1945. Athens: University of Georgia Press.

MASON, EDWARD CAMPBELL 1890 The Veto Power. New York: Russell & Russell.

VICE-PRESIDENCY

The American vice-presidency has historically occupied an ambiguous position. Although protocol ranks it the nation's second office, the duties assigned it have not been commensurate with that status. Pundits have frequently ridiculed the office and reformers have generously proposed modifying it. Yet for an institution that has engendered so much criticism the vice-presidency has undergone remarkably little constitutional change.

The office was conceived in the final days of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 for reasons that remain obscure. Some delegates suggested the need for an officer to preside over the SENATE and resolve tie votes. Others viewed the vice-presidency as a way to handle unexpected presidential vacancies. Finally, some saw the office as an expedient to ensure the election of a national President. They feared that presidential electors would invariably support their own state's favorite son, thereby frustrating efforts to select a chief executive. By creating a second office and by giving electors a second vote subject to the proviso that one of the votes must go to a person from a state other than the elector's these constitutional architects believed they would overcome provincial tendencies and provide the new nation with a consensus leader. The candidate with the most votes (provided that they constituted a majority) would be President, the runner-up Vice-President.

The system provided not only a national President but also vice-presidents of rare ability—JOHN ADAMS, THOMAS JEFFERSON, and AARON BURR. In 1800, however, the electoral votes for Jefferson and Burr deadlocked, although the Republican party had clearly intended Jefferson to be President. The constitutional crisis required thirty-six ballots of the House of Representatives before Jefferson prevailed. The initial system accordingly fell into disfavor, and in 1804 the states ratified the TWELFTH AMENDMENT which provided for separate election of President and Vice-President. Many legislators feared that the vice-presidency would attract only inferior candidates and accordingly proposed its abolition.

Although the office survived, the high caliber of its occupants did not. Most Vice-Presidents during the remainder of the nineteenth century were nonentities who brought few credentials to the office, did little while in it, and disappeared from public attention once their term ended. Presidents had little influence on the selection of their running mates. Party leaders typically chose the second candidate from a different wing of the party in order to balance the ticket. Presidents and Vice-Presidents frequently feuded over policy and personal differences. The Vice-President presided over the Senate, but did little else. As WOODROW WILSON wrote, "The chief embarrassment in discussing his office is, that in explaining how little there is to be said about it one has evidently said all there is to say."

The nineteenth century did, however, provide four occasions for Vice-Presidents to succeed to the presidency on the death of the incumbent. JOHN TYLER, MILLARD FILLMORE, ANDREW JOHNSON, and CHESTER A. ARTHUR all became President when their predecessors died in office. None, however, won a term of his own.

The ambiguous constitutional status of the office was one source of its problem. The office was a hybrid between the legislative and executive branches; its occupant was selected with the President, and yet his only constitutional duty resided in the legislative branch. Neither the Senate not the President was disposed to give great power to an officer which neither had selected and neither could remove. Some Presidents have viewed the vice-presidency as a legislative office and argued that the principle of SEPARATION OF POWERS precludes delegation of duties. Some Vice-Presidents have advanced this reasoning (or rationalization) to resist executive assignments. Moreover, since the presidency itself was relatively inactive for much of the nineteenth century, the President typically had little need to delegate duties to a Vice-President, especially one not politically or personally compatible.

During the twentieth century, the vice-presidency achieved greater importance. The rise in status of the office occurred primarily because of political change rather than constitutional reform. The presidency became the main beneficiary of increased activity of the federal government, especially from the New Deal onward. The President became the distributor of increased patronage, and therefore other political actors responded more willingly to his influence. Accordingly, presidential candidates, rather than party leaders, began to assume a larger role in selecting the running mate. Presidents thus had a chance to select compatible Vice-Presidents and an incentive to provide them with some assignments. Moreover, increased demands on the presidency provided opportunities for vice-presidential activity. Presidents have tended to use their Vice-Presidents as foreign envoys, commission chairmen, party leaders, public spokesmen, legislative liaison, and advisers. Ratification in 1967 of the TWENTY-FIFTH AMENDMENT, which in part provided a means for filling unexpected vice-presidential vacancies, recognized the new significance of the office. With a few notable exceptions, twentieth-century Vice-Presidents have been men of some accomplishment. Many have been presidential candidates prior to accepting the second position: virtually all subsequently were considered for their party's presidential nomination or received it. Since 1900, five Vice-Presidents—THEODORE ROOSEVELT, CALVIN COOLIDGE, HARRY S. TRUMAN, LYNDON B. JOHNSON, and GERALD FORD—have succeeded to the presidency upon death or resignation of the incumbent. Each one except Ford subsequently won his own term—and Ford lost but narrowly. Presidents JIMMY CARTER and RONALD REAGAN have done much to enhance the office by granting Vice-Presidents Walter F. Mondale and GEORGE BUSH, respectively, broad access to, and influence in, decision making.

The vice-presidency's enlarged significance this century has not silenced its critics. Some prominent students of American government recommend abolishing the office: they would generally handle an unexpected presidential vacancy by designating an interim President and holding special elections. Others would retain the vice-presidency but would attempt to augment its powers either by requiring that the Vice-President hold a leading cabinet position or have a vote or significant powers in the Senate. Finally, a third group of reformers seeks to change the process of nominating or electing Vice-Presidents. Proposals range from having presidential and vice-presidential candidates run together during primaries to holding separate elections for President and Vice-President. Although these proposals stimulate interesting debates, the prospects of significant formal changes in the vice-presidency are slim. Constitutional change rarely, if ever, comes easily. Proposed reforms of the vice-presidency would tend to create as many problems as they would solve. Growth in the office will probably depend largely on further changes in American politics and on the relation between future Presidents and Vice-Presidents.

JOEL K. GOLDSMITH
(1986)

Bibliography

FEERICK, JOHN 1965 From Failing Hands. New York: Fordham University Press.

GOLDSTEIN, JOEL K. 1982 The Modern American Vice Presidency: Transformation of a Political Institution. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

WILLIAMS, IRVING G. 1956 The Rise of the Vice Presidency. Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press.

VICINAGE

Of all the features constituting a citizen's right to a TRIAL BY JURY, none is so outdated or less of service than the Sixth Amendment provision guaranteeing "an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime [charged] shall have been committed." This specification of the geographic area from which jurors must be drawn should not be confused, however, with VENUE, which fixes the location of the trial itself.

The clause providing for a jury of the vicinage or neighborhood enjoys a time-worn heritage. In the thirteenth century jurors were usually witnesses or had personal knowledge of the event at issue. Although jurors eventually lost their character as witnesses, both EDWARD COKE and WILLIAM BLACKSTONE discussed the precise number of jurors who must come from the immediate locality. Vicinage became an issue in the colonial debate with England, and the Virginia Assembly, in 1769, asserted the colonists' right to "the inestimable Privilege of being tried by a Jury from the vicinage," a position echoed by the Continental Congress and listed as a grievance against the king in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. The Sixth Amendment, framed shortly after the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789, probably refers to the judicial districts established by that act.

Nevertheless, a federal defendant today "does not have a right under the Sixth Amendment to have jurors drawn from the entire district" (Zicarelli v. Dietz, 1980), and the Supreme Court has denied that trial juries "must mirror the community and reflect the various distinctive groups in the population" (Taylor v. Louisiana, 1975). State courts have generally been willing to narrow the vicinage requirement to a unit as small as an individual county, although federal courts have asserted that the Sixth Amendment clause applies "only to federal criminal trials, not to state criminal trials" (Zicarelli).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

VIETNAM WAR

Throughout American history, Presidents have dispatched armed forces abroad to protect the lives and property of United States citizens as well as American security interests. However, these military operations usually were limited in scope and duration, were conducted against relatively defenseless nations, and did not involve major powers. Thus, there was little opportunity to test the President's constitutional authority to send armed forces abroad without prior congressional authorization or a DECLARATION OF WAR. For various reasons, the KOREAN WAR did not furnish the occasion to test President HARRY S. TRUMAN's constitutional powers. The Vietnam War (1965–1973) was the first modern undeclared war that provided the opportunity to test the President's authority as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

During the Vietnam War numerous litigants challenged the President's authority to initiate and conduct military hostilities without a congressional declaration of war or other explicit prior authorization. Such litigants denied that the GULF OF TONKIN RESOLUTION constituted authorization. Despite these challenges, the federal courts exhibited extreme caution in entering this twilight zone of concurrent power. The federal judiciary's reluctance to decide WAR POWERS controversies reveals a respect for the constitutional SEPARATION OF POWERS, an appreciation for the respective constitutional functions of Congress and the President in FOREIGN AFFAIRS, and a sense of judicial self-restraint. Nevertheless, toward the end of the Vietnam War, several lower federal courts entered the political thicket to restore the constitutional balance between Congress and the President.

Despite factual variations, the Vietnam War cases can be classified into four broad categories. One federal district court asserted categorically that the complaint raised a POLITICAL QUESTION beyond the court's JURISDICTION. A second agreed that the President's authority to conduct military activities without a declaration of war posed a nonjusticiable political question, but proceeded to determine whether the President had acted on his own authority, pursuant to, or in conflict with either the expressed or implied will of Congress. Courts in the third category concluded that the political question doctrine did not foreclose them from inquiring into the existence and constitutional sufficiency of joint congressional-presidential participation in prosecuting the war. Finally, some district courts decided cases on the substantive merits. Yet the Vietnam War ended without an authoritative Supreme Court decision.

At the war's end Congress enacted the War Powers Resolution (1973), which attempted to resolve the constitutional ambiguities posed by the separation of the congressional war powers from the President's office of commander-in-chief. Under the resolution, Congress can alternatively authorize continuation of military hostilities that the President has initiated or require him to disengage armed forces from foreign combat within sixty to ninety days. Practical problems aside, the resolution seems constitutionally flawed. The Supreme Court's decision in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983) cast doubt on the constitutionality of the resolution's LEGISLATIVE VETO provision, which states that Congress can direct the disengagement of troops by CONCURRENT RESOLUTION. Moreover, if the Constitution vests the authority to initiate military hostilities exclusively in the Congress, can Congress constitutionally delegate this authority to the President, even for a limited period? Is the War Powers Resolution an undated declaration of war that allows the President to choose the time, the place, and the enemy?

The Framers of the Constitution conferred only a limited set of defensive war powers on the President. As commander-in-chief he superintends the armed forces in war and peace, defending the nation, its armed forces, and its citizens and their property against attack, and directing military operations in wartime. The Framers did not authorize the President to initiate military hostilities, to transform defensive actions into aggressive wars, or to defend allies against attack.

In the Framers' view, only Congress could change the nation's condition from peace to war. Yet neither the constitutional text nor the records of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION conclusively draw the boundary between congressional power to initiate war and presidential power to defend against attack. In the twentieth century, international terrorism, the Vietnam War, guerrilla and insurgency warfare, wars of "national liberation," and the global conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union have virtually erased the Framers' distinction between defensive and offensive war.

A long history of undeclared war and military hostilities demonstrates that the constitutional questions raised during the Vietnam War are inherent in the American constitutional system. Presidents will be confronted with demands and opportunities to intervene militarily to protect American national security interests and the security interests of the nation's allies. Before yielding to this temptation, future Presidents should recall one of the Vietnam War's most important lessons: the nation should not wage a protracted undeclared war without a continuing agreement between Congress and the President that reflects broad, sustained public support.

EDWARD KEYNES
(1986)

Bibliography

KEYNES, EDWARD 1982 Undeclared War. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.

REVELY, W. TAYLOR, III 1981 War Powers of the President and Congress: Who Holds the Arrows and Olive Branch? Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia.

SOFAER, ABRAHAM D. 1976 War, Foreign Affairs, and Constitutional Power. Cambridge, Mass.: Ballinger Publishing Co.

VIETNAM WAR
(Update)

The Vietnam War, more accurately labeled America's Indochina War, claimed 46,400 American lives. During its most active phase, from 1964 to 1973, it cost over $107 billion. American troop strength in the conflict reached a peak of 536,100 in March 1969. Yet the war was never formally declared.

Direct American involvement in Indochina began in 1949–1950 when Congress provided for financial and material assistance in "the general area of China" and for the use of noncombatant military advisers. Using this authority, President HARRY S. TRUMAN began sending aid to the associated states comprising French Indochina. When the KOREAN WAR heightened America's commitment in the Far East, Congress anticipated the pattern of coming years by approving additional aid. Following the end of France's military involvement in Indochina in 1954, the United States took the initiative in negotiating the Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty, which committed each of its adherents to meet "armed attack in the treaty area . . . in accordance with its constitutional processes." Prior to the treaty's approval by the Senate in 1955, Secretary of State John Foster Dulles interpreted this provision as meaning the President would seek congressional support before launching major military moves, but others hedged on whether such action was constitutionally required. Between 1954 and 1964, the United States provided more than $1 billion in military aid to South Vietnam and by late 1963 the American Military Assistance Advisory Group there had grown to 16,300.

In 1964 the war took on a new constitutional cast. South Vietnam's position having deteriorated, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON sought to continue a policy of measured firmness. In May and June he directed the State Department to begin drafting possible congressional resolutions to affirm the American commitment in Vietnam. This approach drew partly on the experience of the 1950s and early 1960s, when the United States response to crises involving the Formosa Straits, the Middle East, Berlin, and Cuba included congressional resolutions of support in 1955, 1957, 1961, and 1962. Although temporarily shelved, the project soon became urgent. On August 2, perhaps provoked by American-supported commando raids along the North Vietnamese coast, North Vietnam torpedo boats attacked an American destroyer on an intelligence mission in the Gulf of Tonkin. Two days later, another attack may have occurred. Johnson reported the attacks to the American people, but refrained from mentioning either the intelligence mission or doubts about whether the second attack had actually occurred. Congressional leaders received a fuller briefing but not a complete account. Giving them a draft resolution, Johnson asked for its prompt passage even as he ordered retaliatory air strikes against North Vietnam.

Following a perfunctory hearing and almost no floor debate, the House of Representatives passed the GULF OF TONKIN RESOLUTION by a vote of 416–0. In the Senate, owing especially to questions raised by Wayne Morse about the events in the Tonkin Gulf and about the problem of unconstitutionally delegating Congress's WAR POWERS, the hearing process and floor debate took slightly longer, but the measure won approval by 88 to 2, and Johnson signed it into law on August 10. After stating Congress's support for the President's determination "to take all necessary measures to repel any armed attack against the armed forces of the United States and to prevent further aggression," the resolution declared that peace in Asia was a vital American interest and that "the United States is, therefore, prepared, as the President determines, to take all necessary steps, including use of armed force, to assist any member or protocol state of the Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty requesting assistance in defense of its freedom."

In February 1965 the United States escalated its air war in Vietnam and soon began sending ground combat troops (as opposed to "advisers"). When voting in 1964, most congressmen had not contemplated this turn of events, yet Senator J. William Fulbright, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, had admitted during debate that the resolution could undergird major military action. In 1967, Under Secretary of State (and former Attorney General) Nicholas Katzenbach explained that the Tonkin Gulf Resolution was "as broad an authorization for the use of armed forces . . . as any declaration of war so-called could be in terms of our internal constitutional process." Significantly, however, its State Department drafters had carefully avoided any language conceding that congressional authorization was a requirement for escalating the American presence in Vietnam. This allowed continuing reliance on the President's own authority, as illustrated in February 1966 when a State Department legal memorandum argued that the President's direct powers under Article II covered the commitment in Vietnam. That being the case, the Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty's provision for action in accordance with American "constitutional processes" further authorized the war in Vietnam. But, explained the memorandum, the existence of the Tonkin Gulf Resolution and congressional appropriations for the conflict obviated the need to delineate precise constitutional boundaries.

Despite growing public and congressional criticism of the war, Congress enacted at least twenty-four laws supporting it between 1964 and 1969. Senator Morse's 1966 call for repeal of the Tonkin Gulf Resolution met defeat, as, for example, did antibombing amendments to appropriations bills in 1968. In 1967 the Senate Foreign Relations Committee began to consider a "National Commitments Resolution," after Fulbright, its chairman, switched to an antiwar stance. But the resulting measure, as adopted in June 1969, merely expressed "the sense of the Senate" that the commitment of troops abroad should result only from affirmative and explicit joint action by the President and Congress. Finally, in December 1970, Congress included repeal of the Tonkin Gulf Resolution as a rider to the Foreign Military Sales Act, which President RICHARD M. NIXON signed in January 1971.

By this time, Nixon and his backers had accepted the argument of the Johnson administration that the resolution was constitutionally unnecessary—but with a twist. Whatever the constitutional basis for the war under Johnson, as Assistant Attorney General WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST explained after the Cambodian "incursion" in April 1970, Nixon inherited a conflict in progress and had "an obligation as commander-in-chief to take what steps he deems necessary to assure the safety of American forces in the field."

Such claims did not prevent senators of both parties and growing numbers of House Democrats from proposing limits on the war. Between late 1969 and mid-1973, ten restrictive measures became law. One barred use of combat troops in Thailand and Laos; another forbade further expenditures for ground operations in Cambodia. Still another, an amendment to a defense procurement act, stated that United States policy was to cease all military operations "at a date certain," but when Nixon signed the act, he denied that the policy declaration had "binding effect." In actuality, prior to the Vietnam cease-fire in January 1973, congressional "doves" were unable to pass ironclad restrictions.

Finally, after the Vietnam cease-fire, but while air attacks on Cambodia continued, Congress voted that no funds "may be expended to support directly or indirectly combat activities in, over, or from off the shores of Cambodia, or in or over Laos by United States forces." When Nixon vetoed the appropriations bill containing the cutoff and its supporters threatened to add similar language to all appropriations measures, a compromise emerged, signed by Nixon on July 1. The Second Supplemental Appropriations Act for 1973 forbade use of any funds in the act itself for military operations in Indochina and added that "after August 15, 1973, no other funds heretofore appropriated under any other Act may be expended for such purpose."

Doubtful of congressional action, opponents of the war had already turned to the judiciary in efforts to enjoin Johnson's warmaking and then Nixon's. Here the need for STANDING proved an initial barrier. At one time or another, federal district courts and courts of appeal held that taxpayers, citizens qua citizens, reservists, draft registrants, inductees, members of Congress, and probably states lacked the required immediate and concrete stake in the controversy. In some later cases, however, the barrier was relaxed, particularly for servicemen under orders to go to Vietnam, and in a few instances, courts finessed the problem of standing by first examining other issues.

Ultimately the POLITICAL QUESTION doctrine proved insuperable. In Orlando v. Laird (1971), for example, lower federal courts held that once a conflict reached the magnitude and duration of the war in Vietnam, the Constitution imposed the duty of some joint action by the President and Congress. This requirement established a manageable test that allowed judicial determination without running up against the political questions doctrine. The courts found, however, that the Tonkin Gulf Resolution, wartime extension of the SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT, and continuing appropriations satisfied the joint-action requirement. The issue raised by the decision of Congress and the President to use these means for collaboration rather than a DECLARATION OF WAR was a nonjusticiable political question. In Mitchell v. Laird (1973), which arose after repeal of the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution, a court of appeals went further, declaring that it could "not be unmindful of what every schoolboy knows"—that appropriations and draft extensions did not necessarily indicate congressional approval of the war. Yet the court would not substitute its judgment for the President's regarding the appropriate military means for concluding the conflict.

The closest the federal judiciary came to blocking American involvement in Indochina occurred after the Vietnam cease-fire itself. In Holtzman v. Schlesinger (1973) a member of Congress and three Air Force officers sought to enjoin further bombing of Cambodia. Federal District Judge Orin Judd in New York found that all existing legislative authorization for operations anywhere in Indochina had ceased with the end of the war in Vietnam. Moreover, as Judd interpreted it, the compromise specifying a funding cutoff on August 15 conferred no new authority. Accordingly, on July 25, 1973, he ordered the secretary of defense to stop the bombing, but the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit promptly stayed his order. Lawyers for the plaintiffs next asked THURGOOD MARSHALL, the circuit's Justice on the Supreme Court, to vacate the stay, and when he declined, they tracked down Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, then vacationing in Washington State. Douglas issued the necessary order, but at the request of the government, Marshall polled the full Court by telephone and proceeded to reinstitute the stay.

On August 8 the court of appeals reversed Judd, holding that the relation of the continued bombing to implementation of the peace agreement did constitute a political question. In OBITER DICTA, it opined further that Judd had incorrectly interpreted the compromise on the funding cutoff and had erred in granting standing to Congresswoman Elizabeth Holtzman and the Air Force officers. The court's reliance in Holtzman on the political questions doctrine was consistent with the sweeping recognition of the doctrine in Atlee v. Laird (1972), the only lower court decision involving the constitutionality of the war that the Supreme Court affirmed (although without opinion) rather than sidestep by denying CERTIORARI.

Three years earlier, Congress had begun to consider general war-powers legislation. By 1973 the House had passed a version imposing strict consulting and reporting requirements on the President, whereas the Senate's bill sought to define precisely the circumstances in which the President could use force without congressional authorization. In October 1973 both houses accepted a compromise measure. Its detailed mandatory sections stressed requirements for consultation and reporting and provided that if the President did not receive congressional approval within sixty days of committing forces to hostilities or situations of imminent hostilities, he had to withdraw them. (The President had another thirty days for withdrawal if he certified that the safety of the troops required the additional period.) Claiming the War Powers Resolution infringed on the constitutional authority of the President, Nixon vetoed it, but Congress overrode the veto. A clear legacy of the Indochina War, the law triggered ongoing debate in subsequent years regarding its constitutionality, wisdom, and effectiveness.

Throughout the war CIVIL LIBERTIES issues arose. Beginning in 1965–1966 growing numbers of opponents publicly demonstrated against American participation and its escalation and mounted focused protests against recruiting, the draft, and even military training. Ensuing criminal prosecutions (which war resisters often invited) included well-publicized and sometimes chaotic conspiracy trials that swept in prominent antiwar figures like pediatrician Benjamin Spock (of the "Boston Five") and social activist Tom Hayden (of the "Chicago Eight"). In addition, federal and some local agencies responded with domestic intelligence operations involving both surveillance and use of agents provocateurs. In part, the prosecutions and intelligence activities reflected the firm belief of both Johnson and Nixon that the domestic protest movement had connections to communism abroad.

In contrast to its largely hands-off approach to issues of external warmaking, the judiciary supported the antiwar position in key cases. Where juries convicted war resisters, appellate courts often proved receptive to FIRST AMENDMENT arguments and procedural challenges. In COHEN V. CALIFORNIA (1971), for example, the United States Supreme Court held that the words "Fuck the Draft" sewn on a jacket fell within the limits of protected expression. In UNITED STATES V. SEEGER (1965) and Welsh v. United States (1970) the Court in effect rewrote the Selective Service Act in order to broaden permissible grounds for conscientious objection. Oestereich v. Selective Service Board (1968) and Breen v. Selective Service Board (1970) disallowed use of selective service reclassification as a means of punishing opposition to the draft. But UNITED STATES V. O'BRIEN (1968) upheld legislation outlawing draft card destruction. In NEW YORK TIMES V. UNITED STATES (1971), although the Court allowed publication of the so-called Pentagon Papers, a majority of Justices eschewed an absolutist position, revealing instead an openness to some forms of censorship. And in LAIRD V. TATUM (1972) an attempt to stop the United States Army's domestic surveillance program failed when the Court found that the plaintiffs had suffered no personal injury.

Overall, the Vietnam War significantly broadened the range of constitutional debate in America. Although hardly an unambiguous example of executive warmaking, the war helped stigmatize further accretions to an "imperial presidency." Although not blocked by the judiciary, it drew judges partway into defining the external warmaking authority. And although far from the only source of domestic unrest and reaction in the 1960s and early 1970s, the conflict triggered a wide enough spectrum of opposition to give renewed respectability to dissent.

CHARLES A. LOFGREN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Congress and Foreign Policy; Congressional War Powers; Executive Power; Executive Prerogative; Foreign Affairs; Presidential War Powers; Senate and Foreign Policy; War, Foreign Affairs, and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

BANNAN, JOHN F. and BANNAN, ROSEMARY S. 1974 Law, Morality and Vietnam: The Peace Militants and the Courts. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

GIBBONS, WILLIAM C. 1986–1989 The U.S. Government and the Vietnam War: Executive and Legislative Roles and Relationships, 3 vols., series in progress. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

KEYNES, EDWARD 1982 Undeclared War: The Twilight Zone of Constitutional Power. Chaps. 5–7. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.

STRUM, PHILIPPA 1976 The Supreme Court and the Vietnamese War. In Richard A. Falk, ed., The Vietnam War and International Law: The Concluding Phase. Vol. 4, pages 535–572. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

VILLAGE OF . . .

See entry under name of village

VINSON, FRED M.
(1890–1953)

Fred M. Vinson was appointed thirteenth CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States by President HARRY S. TRUMAN in 1946 and served in that office until his death. His appointment followed a distinguished career in all three branches of the federal government. That career profoundly influenced his performance as Chief Justice.

Born and raised in the jail of Louisa, Kentucky—his father was the town jailer—he devoted almost his entire professional career to the public sector. Shortly after his admission to the bar, he served as city attorney and as Commonwealth attorney. Elected to Congress in 1928, he was an influential member of that legislative body during the NEW DEAL years. His judicial experience commenced with appointment as judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in 1937, and was broadened in 1942 when Chief Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE named him Chief Judge of the EMERGENCY COURT OF APPEALS. His executive branch experience began with his 1943 appointment as director of Economic Stabilization, followed in 1945 by three posts in rapid succession: Federal Loan administrator, director of War Mobilization and Reconversion, and secretary of the Treasury.

He was appointed Chief Justice in 1946 to a Court widely regarded as ridden not only with the usual ideological disagreements but also with severe personal animosities. One successful aspect of his tenure as Chief Justice was the substantial reduction of public exposure of these conflicts.

In 1949, the deaths of Justices FRANK MURPHY and WILEY B. RUTLEDGE were followed by the appointments of TOM C. CLARK and SHERMAN MINTON. These changes, which occurred just short of the midpoint of his tenure, shifted the balance of the Court to a more conservative position, one more consonant with his own judicial and political philosophy.

That philosophy must be ascertained more by inference than through direct revelation. During his seven years as Chief Justice, the number of cases heard by the Court declined; as Chief Justice he assigned comparatively few opinions to himself. The evidence makes clear, however, that his philosophy reflected his public and political experience, acquired during the New Deal and WORLD WAR II years, when a strong national government was deemed a sine qua non and loyalty to one's party and political confreres was a necessary condition of the success of the political process.

For him, the governmental institutions were democratically based, sound, and trustworthy; they were entitled to the loyalty of those whom they served and to protection from those who would destroy them. The judgments of the President and Congress that communism threatened both from without and from within were entitled to respect. The nation and its people fared better with a stable regime than with one of disruption; government was entitled at least to have time to respond to conflicts. The lowest person could rise to the highest office. Concomitantly—although the enactments of legislatures were normally to be respected—legal restrictions based upon race, disabling handicaps to the realization of the American dream, were disfavored. Even as his extensive federal governmental experience made him sympathetic to a strong central government, so his executive branch experience rendered him unafraid of strong executive power.

His tenure as Chief Justice spanned the Cold War era in which pro-Soviet attitudes that had developed during World War II became suspect. The rise of McCarthyism, the trial of Alger Hiss, the KOREAN WAR, the theft of atomic secrets, and like events dominated public discussion and government reaction.

These events pervaded the atmosphere in which major constitutional issues were presented. Thus, his views about loyalty are perhaps best represented in those cases that sustained noncriminal deprivations addressed to communists and those considered disloyal, for example, his opinion for the Court in AMERICAN COMMUNICATIONS ASSOCIATION V. DOUDS (1950); denial of TAFT-HARTLEY COLLECTIVE BARGAINING benefits); and his votes in Bailey v. Richardson (1951; denial of federal employment) and JOINT ANTI-FASCIST REFUGEE COMMITTEE V. MCGRATH (1951; blacklisting of suspected organizations).

His lack of sympathy for those whose purpose he viewed as destructive of the governmental institutions is evidenced in his PLURALITY OPINION in DENNIS V. UNITED STATES (1951), which sustained against a FIRST AMENDMENT claim the criminal convictions of communist leaders under the Smith Act, and his majority opinion in FEINER V. NEW YORK (1951), affirming the conviction of an antigovernment speaker who refused to stop speaking when ordered to do so by a police officer after members of the audience threatened to assault him.

His concern for institutional stability is reflected in his opinion in UNITED STATES V. UNITED MINE WORKERS (1947), sustaining the judiciary's use of the CONTEMPT POWER to halt a disruptive strike, and his dissenting opinion in YOUNGSTOWN SHEET & TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1951), where he would have sustained the power of the President to seize steel mills to maintain steel production interrupted by a strike.

Overtaken by later cases, several of Vinson's most significant opinions advanced the elimination of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION and in theoretical terms expanded the interpretation of the EQUAL PROTECTION clause. Although the unanimous opinions he authored in SWEATT V. PAINTER (1950) and MCLAURIN V. BOARD OF REGENTS (1950) did not in terms overrule the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE of PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896), the rejection of the separate Texas law school in Sweatt and of the special treatment of McLaurin made the demise of that doctrine inevitable. His most interesting and venturesome equal protection opinion was SHELLEY V. KRAEMER (1948), the RESTRICTIVE COVENANT case, whose doctrinal implications have yet to be satisfactorily delineated.

Vinson accorded the federal government expansive legislative power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE. Perceived conflicts between the federal government and the states were resolved in favor of a strong central government. Where the federal government had not spoken, his concern focused on discrimination against INTERSTATE COMMERCE and the out-of-stater, a position most clearly seen in the STATE TAXATION OF COMMERCE cases and TOOMER V. WITSELL (1948), the path-breaking interpretation of the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of Article IV, which in effect extended his commerce clause philosophy to areas he thought the clause did not reach.

His general judicial approach inclined Vinson to focus on the particular facts of the case and to eschew promulgation of sweeping legal principles. He was slow to overrule earlier opinions and DOCTRINES. The power of the Court to invalidate federal executive and legislative actions on constitutional grounds was to be used sparingly; he never voted to invalidate an act of Congress or a presidential action. He was as apt as any member of his Court, save perhaps Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, to avoid constitutional questions and, when those issues were faced, to take an intermediate rather than ultimate constitutional position. Clearly, Fred M. Vinson belonged to the "judicial restraint" school of Supreme Court Justices.

MURRAY L. SCHWARTZ
(1986)

Bibliography

KIRKENDALL, K. 1969 Fred M. Vinson. In Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, The Justices of the United States Supreme Court. Vol. 4:2639–2649. New York: Chelsea House.

PRITCHETT, C. HERMAN 1954 Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

SYMPOSIUM 1954 Northwestern University Law Review 49:1–76.

VINSON COURT
(1946–1953)

FRED M. VINSON was Chief Justice of the United States from June 24, 1946, until his death on September 8, 1953. During his seven-year period of service the Supreme Court was considerably less interesting, colorful, or originative of significant constitutional DOCTRINE than its predecessor, the STONE COURT, or its successor, the WARREN COURT. However, the Vinson Court did deal with serious and important issues, particularly Cold War challenges to CIVIL LIBERTIES and awakening concerns about RACIAL DISCRIMINATION.

Vinson was a close friend of President HARRY S. TRUMAN and an active Democrat who had had the unique experience of serving in all three branches of the federal government. Immediately preceding his appointment to the Court he had been secretary of the treasury. President Truman had made one previous appointment, naming HAROLD BURTON, a Republican and former SENATE colleague of Truman, to replace OWEN ROBERTS in 1945. The other seven justices were of course all holdovers from the Stone Court, which guaranteed a continuation of the judicial dialogue that had pitted the liberal activism of HUGO L. BLACK, WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, FRANK MURPHY, and WILEY B. RUTLEDGE against the brilliant critiques of FELIX FRANKFURTER and ROBERT H. JACKSON, with the moderate STANLEY F. REED somewhere in the center.

The four-judge liberal bloc had within itself the votes required to grant CERTIORARI petitions, which ensured that civil liberties issues would continue to appear on the Court's agenda. When the liberals agreed, they needed only one additional vote to constitute a majority. But in the summer of 1949 Justices Murphy and Rutledge died, cutting the liberal bloc in half. President Truman filled these two vacancies by the appointment of TOM C. CLARK, his attorney general, and SHERMAN MINTON, who had been a New Deal senator from Indiana. The two new justices joined with Vinson, Reed, and Burton in a moderately conservative bloc which dominated the remaining four terms of the Vinson Court. An indication of the balance of power on the Court is provided by the number of dissents registered by each of the Justices during this four-year period: Clark 15, Vinson 40, Burton 44, Minton 47, Reed 59, Jackson 80, Frankfurter 101, Douglas 130, Black 148.

The most famous decision of the Vinson Court in terms of public reaction, and probably the most noteworthy as a contribution to constitutional theory, was YOUNGSTOWN SHEET TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1952), generally known as the Steel Seizure Case. Here the Court by a vote of 6–3 held unconstitutional President Truman's seizure of the nation's steel mills in 1952, an action he justified as necessary to avert a nationwide strike that might have affected the flow of munitions to American troops in Korea. The President had no statutory authority for the seizure, which consequently had to be justified on a theory of inherent presidential power to meet emergencies.

Justice Black, supported by Douglas, flatly denied the existence of any inherent presidential powers. Justices Jackson and Frankfurter were less dogmatic, and the doctrine of the case is generally drawn from their opinions. As they saw it, the controlling factor was that Congress had considered granting the President seizure power to deal with nationwide strikes when adopting the TAFT-HARTLEY ACT in 1947 but had decided against it. In addition, Jackson contributed a situational scale for ruling on claims of executive emergency power. Vinson, in his most famous dissent, upheld the President as having moved in an emergency to maintain the status quo until Congress could act, and he rejected the majority's "messenger boy" concept of the presidential office.

The fact that the Court could have avoided the constitutional issue in the Steel Seizure Case by various alternatives suggested that most of the justices believed it important to announce a check on presidential power. The decision was enormously popular with the press and public and has subsequently been accepted as an authoritative statement on the SEPARATION OF POWERS, establishing that actions of the president are subject to JUDICIAL REVIEW. There had been some doubt on this point since the failure of the post-CIVIL WAR suit against the president in MISSISSIPPI V. JOHNSON (1867). It established also that executive claims of power for which statutory authority is lacking, and which must consequently rely on the President's general Article II authority, are subject to strict judicial scrutiny.

Less significant in its doctrine than the Steel Seizure Case but almost as controversial was the Court's contempt ruling against John L. Lewis, leader of the coal miners, in 1947 (UNITED STATES V. UNITED MINE WORKERS). The government had seized the nation's bituminous coal mines in 1946 to end a crippling strike and had entered into a contract with Lewis on wages and working conditions. When Lewis subsequently terminated the contract unilaterally and resumed the strike, the government secured a contempt JUDGMENT and heavy fine against Lewis and the union. In his first major opinion Vinson upheld the conviction for contempt, ruling that the NORRIS-LAGUARDIA ACT limiting the issuance of labor INJUNCTIONS was not binding on the government as an employer.

A significant difference between the Stone and Vinson Courts was that WORLD WAR II had ended and the Cold War against communism had begun. The hunt for subversives in which the nation was caught up soon after the shooting war was over tainted the entire period of the Vinson Court and created difficult civil liberties issues. The government's principal weapon against suspected subversion was the Smith Act of 1940, which made it unlawful to teach and advocate the overthrow of the United States government by force and violence, or to organize a group for such a purpose.

Convictions of eleven leaders of the American Communist party under the Smith Act were upheld by the Supreme Court in DENNIS V. UNITED STATES (1951). In the most memorable event of his judicial career, Chief Justice Vinson wrote the Court's majority opinion defending the Smith Act against contentions that it violated the FIRST AMENDMENT. The defendants admittedly had taken no action with the immediate intention of initiating a revolution. But Vinson held that the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER TEST, developed by Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, did not require the government to wait until a "putsch" was about to be executed before acting against a conspiracy. Vinson accepted the reformulation of the test developed by Judge LEARNED HAND: "Whether the gravity of the "evil,' discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." He considered the communist "evil" to be that grave. Justices Black and Douglas dissented; Douglas pointed out that the prosecution had introduced no evidence of Communist party action aimed at overthrow of the government.

Vinson also wrote the Court's opinion in AMERICAN COMMUNICATIONS ASSOCIATION V. DOUDS (1950), upholding the Taft-Hartley Act noncommunist oath. This statute denied the protections and services of the WAGNER (NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS) ACT to any labor organization whose officers failed to file affidavits that they were not members of the Communist party. The Chief Justice held that Congress in adopting this statute was acting to prevent the obstruction of commerce by "political strikes." The law was not aimed at speech but rather at harmful conduct carried on by persons who could be identified by their political affiliations and beliefs.

The Vinson Court was caught up in the final moments of the Cold War's most spectacular event, the execution of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, who were charged with passing atomic "secrets" to the Russians. Review of the lower court conviction and subsequent APPEALS was routinely denied by the Supreme Court in 1952 and early 1953, as were also the initial petitions for STAY OF EXECUTION. But Justice Douglas thought that one final petition filed the day before execution was scheduled raised a new legal issue deserving consideration. He consequently granted a stay which the full Court set aside the next day, and the executions were then carried out. Douglas's action caused a brief furor and a congressman demanded his IMPEACHMENT. In the last opinion before his death Vinson defended Douglas's action as a proper response to protect the Court's JURISDICTION over the case pending a consideration of the legal issue raised. Black and Frankfurter joined Douglas in asserting that the stay should have been granted.

During the era of the Vinson Court, congressional committee investigations of communism developed into major political and media events. Senator Joseph McCarthy's pursuit of "Fifth Amendment Communists" got under way in 1950, too late to create issues for the Vinson Court. But the HOUSE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES had begun operations in 1938, and by 1947 petitions for review of contempt citations against witnesses who had refused to reply to committee interrogation began to reach the Supreme Court. However, it declined review of all the cases that would have required a ruling on the constitutionality of the use of investigatory power, and it dealt only with certain less controversial issues of committee procedure and use of the Fifth Amendment privilege by witnesses.

A prominent feature of the Cold War period was concern about the loyalty of government employees. A LOYALTY OATH fad developed in nearly every state, which the Vinson Court legitimated in GERENDE V. BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF ELECTIONS (1951) by upholding a Maryland law that required candidates for public office to file affidavits that they were not "subversive persons."

A loyalty program covering federal employees was set up by President Truman in 1947 and was continued by President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER. It required checking the loyalty of all incumbent employees and all applicants for federal employment. A complex administrative organization of loyalty review boards was created, and to assist the boards the attorney general issued a list of organizations he found to be "totalitarian, fascist, communist, or subversive." Consideration of the constitutionality of this program split the Court 4–4 in Bailey v. Richardson (1951). But in JOINT ANTI-FASCIST REFUGEE COMMITTEE V. MCGRATH (1951), decided the same day, the Court by a vote of 5–3 challenged the attorney general's list as having been drawn up without appropriate investigation or DUE PROCESS. The dissenters were Reed, Vinson, and Minton. In spite of this opinion the list continued to be used for a number of years in government hiring and investigation.

At the state level a New York law providing for the removal of public school teachers on grounds of membership in listed subversive organizations was upheld in ADLER V. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF NEW YORK (1952), Justice Minton reasoning that the purpose was constitutional and that procedural protections provided by the statute were adequate. Justices Black and Douglas dissented, and Frankfurter would have denied the appeal on technical grounds of STANDING and RIPENESS.

Apart from Cold War cases, FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS did not suffer seriously at the hands of the Vinson Court. BURSTYN V. WILSON (1952) was in fact an advance in its holding that a motion picture could not be censored on the ground that it was "sacrilegious." A law censoring magazines featuring bloodshed and lust was struck down in Winters v. New York (1948) as void for vagueness. Poulos v. New Hampshire (1953) upheld licensing of meetings in public parks and streets, but only if the licenses were granted without discrimination, and the use of licensing ordinances to prevent unpopular religious groups or preachers from holding meetings in public parks was rebuffed in NIEMOTKO V. MARYLAND (1951) and KUNZ V. NEW YORK (1951).

In TERMINIELLO V. CHICAGO (1949) a divided Court reversed on rather technical grounds the conviction of a rabble-rouser for BREACH OF THE PEACE resulting from an incendiary speech. But FEINER V. NEW YORK (1951) upheld the conviction of a soap-box orator even though the situation was much less inflammatory than in Terminiello. Moreover, BEAUHARNAIS V. ILLINOIS (1952) approved a state law treating critical comments about racial groups as criminal and subjecting their authors to prosecution for GROUP LIBEL.

The Vinson Court dealt with a number of conflicts between freedom of expression and privacy but without producing any theories justifying or limiting privacy claims such as those subsequently developed in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965) by the Warren Court. Use of sound trucks in streets and parks was initially upheld in Saia v. New York (1948) against contentions of infringement on privacy, but in the following year the Court conceded that "loud and raucous" sound trucks could be forbidden (KOVACS V. COOPER). Radio broadcasts including commercial messages in DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA streetcars were permitted to continue by Public Utilities Commission v. Pollak (1952), even though CAPTIVE AUDIENCES might suffer, but Breard v. City of Alexandria (1951) protected householders by approving an ordinance forbidding door-to-door selling of magazine subscriptions. Justice Black charged that the latter decision violated the "preferred position" for First Amendment freedoms originated by the Roosevelt Court. The severest blow to that philosophy was United Public Workers v. Mitchell (1947) which upheld by a vote of 4–3 the HATCH ACT limits on political activity by public employees.

In a 1940 case, THORNHILL V. ALABAMA, the Court had strongly asserted that PICKETING in labor disputes was protected by the First Amendment. Almost immediately, however, the Court found it necessary to announce limits on this holding, a process the Vinson Court continued. The most significant case was GIBONEY V. EMPIRE STORAGE ICE CO. (1949), where the Court ruled unanimously against a union that was picketing to force an employer to enter into an illegal restrictive contract.

The issue of public financial aid to religious schools required the Vinson Court to make the first significant effort to interpret and apply the First Amendment ban on ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. EVERSON V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1947) involved a state arrangement under which parents could be reimbursed from public moneys for their children's bus fare to parochial schools. An unusual five-judge majority composed of three liberals (Black, Douglas, and Murphy) and two conservatives (Vinson and Reed) held that the subsidy was simply a social welfare measure and that the First Amendment did not require exclusion of persons of any faith from the benefits of "public welfare legislation." Rutledge's vigorous dissent regarded payment for transportation to church schools as a direct aid to religious education and so unconstitutional.

The following year MCCOLLUM V. BOARD OF EDUCATION presented another church-state issue. The case involved a RELEASED TIME program of religious education under which public school children attended classes in Protestant, Roman Catholic, or Jewish religious instruction during school hours and in the school building. The Court's almost unanimous verdict of UNCONSTITUTIONALITY aroused a storm of criticism in church circles, and within four years the Court substantially reversed this ruling, upholding a New York City released time program that differed from McCollum only in that the classes were held off the school grounds (ZORACH V. CLAUSEN, 1952.) A similar reluctance to disturb the religious community was seen as the Court avoided on technical grounds of standing a ruling on the constitutionality of Bible-reading in the public schools (DOREMUS V. BOARD OF EDUCATION, 1952).

The Vinson Court's civil liberties record was distinctly better than that of its predecessors in one area, protection of minorities from discrimination. The prevailing constitutional rule was that established by PLESSY V. FERGUSON in 1896—that SEGREGATION of the races was constitutional provided treatment or facilities were equal. In practice, they were never equal, but over the years the Court had consistently avoided the difficult task of enforcing the Plessy rule. In the field of education, none of the few efforts to challenge unequal facilities had been successful. But in 1938 the HUGHES COURT made a small beginning, ruling in MISSOURI EX REL. GAINES V. CANADA that Missouri, which denied blacks admission to state law schools, must do so or set up a separate law school for blacks. MORGAN V. VIRGINIA (1946) invalidated a state Jim Crow law requiring racial segregation of passengers on public motor carriers, but the constitutional ground given was burden on INTERSTATE COMMERCE rather than denial of EQUAL PROTECTION.

The Vinson Court undertook cautiously to build on these beginnings. The COMMERCE CLAUSE justification used in the Virginia bus case was likewise employed in BOB-LO EXCURSION CO. V. MICHIGAN (1948). But the Vinson Court's boldest action against segregation came shortly thereafter in SHELLEY V. KRAEMER (1948). With Vinson writing the opinion, the Court declared that RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS binding property owners not to sell to minorities, although within the legal rights of property owners, were unenforceable. For a court to give effect to such a discriminatory contract, Vinson held, would amount to STATE ACTION in violation of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

The separate law school for blacks that Texas had established was declared unequal in SWEATT V. PAINTER (1950). The University of Oklahoma, forced to admit a black graduate student, required him to sit in a separate row in class, at a separate desk in the library, and at a separate table in the cafeteria. MCLAURIN V. OKLAHOMA STATE REGENTS (1950), with Vinson again writing the opinion, held these practices to be an unconstitutional impairment of the student's ability to learn his profession.

Vinson's opinion, however, rejected the opportunity to consider the broader issue of the Plessy SEPARATE BUT EQUAL rule. So attacks on the segregation principle continued, and the TEST CASES moved from the universities and graduate schools to the primary and secondary schools. In December 1952 BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION and four other school segregation cases were argued for three days before the Court. But instead of a decision in June, the Court set the cases for reargument in October. The Chief Justice died in September, and so the Vinson Court's most momentous issue was passed on to the Warren Court.

Although the Stone Court had broken some new ground in CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, its record was mixed, particularly in guaranteeing the RIGHT TO COUNSEL and protection against UNREASONABLE SEARCHES and seizures. This latter issue surfaced in the Vinson Court's first term. One of the oldest problems in American constitutional law is whether the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment "incorporated" and made effective in state criminal proceedings the protections of the Fourth through the Eighth Amendments. As recently as 1937 in PALKO V. CONNECTICUT the Court had reiterated the principle that all state procedures consistent with ORDERED LIBERTY are acceptable.

In Adamson v. California (1947) the Palko doctrine survived on the Vinson Court, but by only a 5–4 vote. Justice Black led the minority. He relied on legislative history to establish his version of the intention of the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment and attacked the ORDERED LIBERTY test as substituting natural law and the notions of individual Justices for the precise and protective language of the BILL OF RIGHTS.

Although Black lost in Adamson, "ordered liberty" was a standard powerful enough to bring state criminal processes within the ambit of the FOURTH AMENDMENT in WOLF V. COLORADO (1949). However, Justice Frankfurter for the six-judge majority held only that SEARCHES AND SEIZURES by state law officers are bound by the standard of reasonableness; he declined to go further and impose on state prosecutions the EXCLUSIONARY RULE which prevents EVIDENCE secured by unconstitutional means from being offered in federal prosecutions. Justices Murphy, Douglas, and Rutledge, dissenting, contended that the exclusionary rule provided the only effective protection against police violation of the Fourth Amendment, and their view was finally adopted on the Warren Court in MAPP V. OHIO (1961).

With respect to right to counsel, the Vinson Court accepted the rule announced by the Stone Court in BETTS V. BRADY (1942) that the necessity for counsel depended upon the circumstances, such as the seriousness of the crime, the age and mental capacity of the defendant, and the ability of the judge. Applying the "special circumstances" rule in twelve cases, the Vinson Court concluded that in six the absence of counsel had resulted in denial of a FAIR TRIAL. In only one of the twelve was the Court unanimous. This experience was a factor in the Warren Court's decision in GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT (1963) to abolish the confusing special circumstances rule and make counsel mandatory in all state felony prosecutions.

What was potentially one of the Vinson Court's most significant decisions for the federal system was nullified by Congress. In 1947 the Court ruled that subsurface land and mineral rights in California's three-mile coastal area belonged to the federal government (United States v. California), and in 1950 the Court applied the same rule to Texas. Congress retaliated in 1953 by ceding to the states ownership of land and resources under adjoining seas up to a distance of three miles from shore or to the states' historic boundaries.

In summary, the tendency of the Vinson Court was to follow a policy of judicial restraint, rejecting innovation or activism. The number of cases decided by full opinion fell below one hundred during three of the last four years, far less than the number typically decided by earlier Courts. The five justices who dominated the Court in its latter period were capable but lacking in style or originality. The four Justices of intellectual distinction—Black, Douglas, Frankfurter, and Jackson—generally paired off and pulled in opposite directions.

The pall of the Cold War hung over the Court. Confronted with the scandal of MCCARTHYISM, it was quiescent. Facing Smith Act prosecutions, the loyalty inquisition of federal employees, lists of subversive organizations, scrutiny of school teachers' associates, loyalty oaths, and deportation of ex-communists, the Court's response was usually to legitimate the government's action.

But in one field, significantly, there was a different kind of response. The Vinson Court did not evade the issue of racial discrimination. Although moving cautiously, as was appropriate considering the enormity of the problem, the Court nevertheless proceeded to bring denial of equal protection out of the limbo of neglect and unconcern into the focus of national consciousness and thereby prepared the way for its successor's historic decision on May 17, 1954.

C. HERMAN PRITCHETT
(1986)

Bibliography

FRANK, JOHN P. 1954 Fred Vinson and the Chief Justiceship. University of Chicago Law Review 21:212–246.

MURPHY, PAUL L. 1972 The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1919–1969. New York: Harper & Row.

PRITCHETT, C. HERMAN (1954) 1966 Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

SWINDLER, WILLIAM F. 1970 Court and Constitution in the Twentieth Century: The New Legality, 1932–1968. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN ACT
108 Stat. 1903 (1994)

The Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) is a federal law passed by Congress in 1994 that allows people who have been subjected to acts of violence because of their sex to sue their victimizers in federal court for SEX DISCRIMINATION. It provides that "a person (including a person who acts under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of any State) who commits a crime of violence motivated by gender and thus deprives another of the right [to be free from crimes of violence motivated by gender] shall be liable to the party injured [in a civil action for relief]."

The basic idea is to place the power to sue and hold perpetrators accountable for sex-discriminatory acts of violence, such as rape and battery, in the hands of the survivors. This CIVIL RIGHTS remedy, in addition to empowering survivors of these abuses concretely to act on their own behalf, exposes the commonness and pervasiveness of these acts, puts them in context by connecting them with discrimination across society, dignifies the survivors of violent sex discrimination as bearers of civil rights, and states authoritatively that perpetrators are bigots as well as criminals.

The VAWA raises some old constitutional debates that, once resolved, open new constitutional possibilities.

The VAWA was passed because states, which enforce most criminal laws, were documented to have failed in protecting women from sexual and other physical violence on a large scale. By declaring a policy of zero tolerance for such abuse, and by conceiving gender-based violence to be a civil rights violation, Congress raised a new constitutional question: Is freedom from sexual assault a sex equality right? If so, should it be guaranteed under the Constitution's FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT as well as by a statute? Have state instrumentalities that failed to give women equal protection of the criminal laws been violating the Constitution all this time in a way that needs new legal scrutiny? Cases permitting suit against officials for sexual harassment, of men by men as well as of women by men, provide supportive PRECEDENTS.

Congress predicated its power to pass the VAWA both on the COMMERCE CLAUSE and on the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, SECTION 5, rekindling the old legal debates about the proper constitutional foundation and reach of federal civil rights laws. Early legal challenges to the VAWA have argued that men's violence against women is private, not public; reserved for states, not the federal government; criminal, not civil; and that it does not implicate INTERSTATE COMMERCE. Responses to these arguments have documented the substantial impact of violence against women on women's participation in economic life. Advocates for the law have argued that sex-based violence is a form of sex discrimination against which Congress is permitted to legislate. The states' abdication of, and bias in, enforcing laws against violence against women is hardly a private act. It is hardly private in the sense of being unique, personal, protectable, or exclusively individual. Nothing in the Constitution says it cannot be addressed civilly as well as criminally. They have also argued that the remedy supplements, rather than supplants, state criminal laws.

Assuming the law is found constitutional, concerns for its effectiveness arising from its language, passed as a compromise to restrict the number of cases brought, may arise. For example, the definition of "gender-motivated" is "because of gender or on the basis of gender, and due, at least in part, to an animus based on the victim's gender." One benefit of this language is that it clearly permits combined race-and-sex-based claims. One potential problem is that "animus," which requires some proof of perpetrator mental state, is often inaccessible to the victim other than through the act itself. Perpetrator mental state may also be beside the point of the injury to the victim. Future legislation and litigation under the VAWA will have to confront this and other barriers to effective recovery, and to the social change—equality of the sexes—that the VAWA was passed to promote.

CATHARINE A. MACKINNON
(2000)

Bibliography

FRAZEE, DAVID; NOEL, ANN M.; and BRENNEKE, ANDREA 1997 Violence Against Women: Law and Litigation. Deerfield, Ill.: Clark, Boardman, Callaghan.

NOURSE, VICTORIA F. 1996 Where Violence Relationship and Equality Meet: The Violence Against Women Act's Rights Remedy. Wisconsin Women's Law Journal 11:1–36.

SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE 1992 Violence Against Women: A Week in the Life of America: A Majority Staff Report. Washington, D.C.: United States Government Printing Office.

VIRGINIA, EX PARTE

See: Strauder v. West Virginia

VIRGINIA, UNITED STATES v.
518 U.S. 515 (1996)

Virginia Military Institute (VMI) is a military-style school of higher education founded in 1839 with an all-male admissions policy. By the 1970s, VMI was the only single-sex public college in Virginia and had a record of producing leaders in government and business. At the request of a potential woman applicant, the United States brought suit in 1990 claiming that VMI's admissions policy violated the EQUAL PROTECTION guarantee of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. After trial the district court rejected the claim, finding that VMI offered diversity to Virginia's higher educational system and that admission of women would alter VMI's distinctive adversative method, which involved barracks without privacy, strenuous exercise, and bonding through torment by upperclassmen.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit reversed, holding that Virginia's provision of diversity for men only was unconstitutional. On remand the district court approved a "substantively comparable" program at a private women's college in Virginia. The Fourth Circuit affirmed.

The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that Virginia had relied on stereotypes about women and had not proved that the admission of women would destroy the adversative method. Justice RUTH BADER GINSBURG wrote the majority opinion for six Justices. Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST concurred, while Justice ANTONIN SCALIA dissented and Justice CLARENCE THOMAS did not participate. After applying "skeptical scrutiny" of official discrimination, detailing many inadequacies of the "comparable" program, and noting that there was no equivalent school for women, the Court held that Virginia had violated the equal protection clause; that women should be admitted to VMI; and that VMI should alter housing and skills requirements to accommodate "celebrated differences" of the female cadets. After the Supreme Court's decision, VMI considered abandoning state support and remaining all-male, but decided instead to admit women.

The VMI case footnoted, without comment, the argument that women's schools "dissipate" gender stereotypes. The constitutionality of all-women's schools or separate-but-equal SINGLE-SEX SCHOOLS was not before the court and, therefore, not decided.

CANDACE SAARI KOVACIC-FLEISCHER (2000)

Bibliography

EPSTEIN, CYNTHIA FUCHS 1997 The Myths and Justifications of Sex Segregation in Higher Education: VMI and the Citadel. Duke Journal of Gender Law & Policy 4:101–118.

KOVACIC-FLEISCHER, CANDACE SAARI 1997 United States v. Virginia's New Gender Equal Protection Analysis with Ramifications for Pregnancy, Parenting, and Title VII. Vanderbilt Law Review 50:845–915.

NEMKO, AMY 1998 Single-Sex Public Education after VMI: The Case for Women's Schools. Harvard Women's Law Journal 21:19–77.

VIRGINIA v. RIVES

See: Strauder v. West Virginia

VIRGINIA v. TENNESSEE

See: Interstate Compact

VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS
(1798–1799)

These resolutions declared the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS unconstitutional and sought to arouse political opposition by appealing to the legislatures of the several states. The strategy was devised by THOMAS JEFFERSON, the Vice-President, who secretly drafted the resolutions that were adopted by the Kentucky legislature. A similar but milder series was drafted by JAMES MADISON for the Virginia assembly. Both set forth the compact theory of the Constitution, holding that the general government was one of strictly delegated powers; that acts beyond its powers were void; and that, there being no ultimate arbiter of the Constitution, each state had "an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions as of the mode and measure of redress." (See THEORIES OF THE UNION.) Jefferson baptized the theory "NULLIFICATION," though the name was omitted by Kentucky; and Virginia spoke instead of the right of each state to "interpose" to arrest the evil.

Five of the nine Kentucky Resolutions were devoted to proving the unconstitutionality of the Alien and Sedition Laws. The Alien Law was attacked for want of power, for violation of a specific constitutional provision (Article I, section 9), and for denial of TRIAL BY JURY and other fair procedures. The Sedition Act was asserted to be outside the scope of the Constitution as well as a direct violation of the FIRST AMENDMENT. The resolutions offered no broadly philosophical plea for FREEDOM OF SPEECH and PRESS but met the threat of the Sedition Law at its most vulnerable point, as an invasion of rights reserved to the states. It belonged to each state, not the general government, to determine "how far the licentiousness of speech and of the press may be abridged without lessening their useful freedom." Kentucky urged the other state legislatures to concur in declaring the acts unconstitutional and void.

Replies to the resolutions, mostly from Northern legislatures under Federalist control, were uniformly unfavorable. Prodded by Jefferson, Kentucky adopted a second set of resolutions in November 1799, reaffirming the principles of the first and, incidentally, introducing the word "nullification." In January 1800 the Virginia assembly adopted Madison's Report, a masterly exposition of the dual sovereignty theory of the federal union and a powerful defense of CIVIL LIBERTIES.

The principal object of the resolutions was to secure the freedom of opposition, of debate, and of change through the political process. This object was secured by the Republican victory in the election of 1800. But in pursuing "a political resistance for political effect," in Jefferson's words, he and his associates were somewhat careless on points of constitutional theory. Whether the resolutions were meant as a declaration of opinion or as a "nullification" of federal law, whether the right claimed for the state was limited to "usurpations" of the compact or extended to "abuses" as well, whether the ultimate recourse was the natural right of revolution or a constitutional right of SECESSION, these points were left unclear. It mattered little in 1800, after the resolutions had done their work and then were forgotten; but it mattered a great deal a generation later when the "Resolutions of '98" were revived and tortured by JOHN C. CALHOUN into a defense, not of liberty, but of slavery.

MERRILL D. PETERSON
(1986)

Bibliography

KOCH, ADRIENNE and AMMON, HARRY 1948 The Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions: An Episode in Jefferson's and Madison's Defense of Civil Liberties. William and Mary Quarterly (3rd. ser.) 5:145–176.

MALONE, DUMAS 1962 Jefferson and the Ordeal of Liberty. Boston: Little, Brown.

VIRGINIA CHARTER OF 1606
(April 10, 1606)

This was the first royal charter issued for the planting of a colony in America. Charters were usually issued to private trading companies, as in this case, or to proprietary lords. The charter laid out boundaries, defined the relationship of the colony to the crown, and provided for a government. In this first charter, the government consisted only of a council. Subsequent charters for Virginia in 1609 and 1612 established the office of the governor; by 1619, in accord with a document called the "Great Charter" of 1618, elections were held and the first representative legislature in American history met at Jamestown. The enduring significance of Virginia's first charter lies in its provision that the colonists and their descendants "shall have and enjoy all Liberties, Franchises, and Immunities . . . as if they had been abiding and born, within this our Realm of England. . . ." Later charters for Virginia contained similar clauses. Their meaning was doubtless restricted at the time to legal rights of land tenure and inheritance, trial by jury, and little else; but the vague language (repeated in numerous other charters for colonies from New England to the South) allowed American colonists to believe that they were entitled to all the rights of Englishmen—their constitutional system and common law. Charters could be revoked and some were, but the American experience eventually led to written constitutions of fundamental law that contained bills of rights.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

VIRGINIA DECLARATION OF RIGHTS AND CONSTITUTION OF 1776
(June 12 and 29, 1776)

Virginia, the oldest, largest, and most prestigious of the original states, adopted a Declaration of Rights on June 12, 1776, and two weeks later its "Constitution or Form of Government." Each document was the first of its kind and considerably influenced constitution-making in the other states. The primary draftsman of both documents was GEORGE MASON, although the self-styled "convention" that adopted them included many luminaries, among them JAMES MADISON. The convention was actually an extralegal or provisional legislature similar in membership to the last House of Burgesses under the royal charter before the Revolution. The same convention enacted ordinary legislation and elected a governor under the new CONSTITUTION.

THOMAS JEFFERSON in his Notes on Virginia, written in 1781, observed that "capital defects" marred the work of the constitution-makers of 1776 who were acting without precedent. Property qualifications on the right to vote disfranchised about half the men of the state who served in the militia or paid taxes, and gross malapportionment, which benefited the old tidewater counties, diminished the representative character of the new government. The governor was little more than a ceremonial figurehead. The assembly elected him and his councillors as well as the state judges, and the governor had no veto power. Jefferson believed that concentrating the powers of government in the legislature, notwithstanding recognition of the principle of separation of powers, "is precisely the definition of despotic government. . . . An elective despotism was not the government we fought for." In fact, however, legislative supremacy characterized all the new state governments, excepting those of Massachusetts and New York.

The gravest deficiency of the Virginia system, according to Jefferson, was that the legislature, having framed the constitution and declaration of rights without having provided that they be perpetual and unalterable, could change them by ordinary legislation. That was true in theory, although the constitution lasted over half a century and rarely did the legislature enact measures inconsistent with it. In practice it was regarded a FUNDAMENTAL LAW, especially the declaration of rights.

That declaration was the most significant achievement of the convention. As the first such American document, it contained many constitutional "firsts," such as the statements that "all men" are equally free and have inherent rights which cannot be divested even by compact; that among these rights are the enjoyment of life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness; and that all power derives from the people who retain a right to change the government if it fails to secure the people's objectives. The declaration recognized "the free exercise of religion and FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, and included clauses that were precursors, sometimes in rudimentary form, of the FOURTH through the Eighth AMENDMENTS of the Constitution of the United States. Inexplicably the convention voted down a ban on BILLS OF ATTAINDER and on EX POST FACTO LAWS and omitted the FREEDOMS OF SPEECH, assembly, and petition, the right to the writ of HABEAS CORPUS, GRAND JURY, proceedings, the right to compulsory process to secure EVIDENCE in one's own behalf, the RIGHT TO COUNSEL, and freedom from DOUBLE JEOPARDY. Although RELIGIOUS LIBERTY was guaranteed, the ban on an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION awaited enactment of the VIRGINIA STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM in 1786. Madison's familiarity with his own state's bill of rights strongly influenced his draft of the amendments that became the BILL OF RIGHTS of the Constitution.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

LINGLEY, CHARLES R. 1910 The Transition of Virginia from Colony to Commonwealth. New York: Columbia University Press.

VIRGINIA PLAN

At the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, EDMUND RANDOLPH, arguing that the government of the union under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION could not defend itself against state encroachments, introduced the alternative of a "national plan," probably the work of JAMES MADISON. In effect Virginia proposed to supersede the Articles by providing for a strong, central government of three branches, each with broad, undefined powers. The plan included a congress of two houses, the first elected by the people and the second by the first, both to be apportioned on the basis of a state's population of free inhabitants or its contributions to the national treasury. The most significant provision empowered congress to legislate in all cases of state incompetency or whenever state legislation might disrupt national harmony. Congress was also empowered to veto state laws. The sole check on congress was a qualified veto power vested in a council consisting of the executive and some judges. One provision required state officers to swear support of the new constitution, and another authorized the use of force against recalcitrant states. The Virginia Plan structured the deliberations of the Constitutional Convention and became the nucleus of the Constitution of the United States.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

BRANT, IRVING 1950 James Madison: Father of the Constitution, 1787–1800. Pages 23–54. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

VIRGINIA PRIVATE SCHOOL CASES

See: Runyon v. McCrary

VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF PHARMACY v. VIRGINIA CITIZENS CONSUMER COUNCIL
425 U.S. 748 (1976)

Traditionally COMMERCIAL SPEECH was assumed to lie outside the FIRST AMENDMENT's protection. This decision made clear that this assumption was obsolete. Virginia's rules governing professional pharmacists forbade the advertising of prices of prescription drugs. The Supreme Court, 7–1, held this rule invalid at the behest of a consumers' group, thus promoting the notion of a "right to receive" in the FREEDOM OF SPEECH. (See LISTENERS' RIGHTS.) The Court's opinion indicated that false or misleading commercial advertising might be regulated—a rule the Court would never apply to political speech. For a few years, this decision stood as the Court's principal commercial speech precedent, only to be assimilated in the comprehensive opinion in CENTRAL HUDSON GAS V. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION (1980).

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

VIRGINIA STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM (1786)

This historic statute, one of the preeminent documents in the history of RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, climaxed a ten-year struggle for the SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE in Virginia. On the eve of the Revolution Baptists were jailed for unlicensed preaching, and JAMES MADISON exclaimed that the "diabolical Hell conceived principle of persecution rages." The Church of England (Episcopal) was the established church of Virginia, supported by public taxes imposed on all. The state CONSTITUTION of 1776 guaranteed that everyone was "equally entitled to the free exercise of religion," but the convention defeated a proposal by Madison that would have ended any form of an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. By the close of 1776 the legislature, responding to dissenter petitions, repealed all laws punishing any religious opinions or modes of worship, exempted dissenters from compulsory support of the established church, and suspended state taxation on its behalf. But the legislature reserved for future decision the question whether religion ought to be supported by voluntary contributions or by a new establishment of all Christian churches.

In 1779 an indecisive legislature confronted two diametrically opposed bills. One was a general assessment bill, providing that the Christian religion should be "the established religion" supported by public taxation and allowing every taxpayer to designate the church that would receive his money. The other was THOMAS JEFFERSON's Bill for Religious Freedom, which later provided the philosophical basis for the religion clauses of the FIRST AMENDMENT. The preamble, a classic expression of the American creed on intellectual as well as religious liberty, stressed that everyone had a "natural right" to his opinions and that religion was a private, voluntary matter of individual conscience beyond the scope of the civil power to support or restrain. Jefferson rejected the BAD TENDENCY TEST for suppressing opinions and proposed "that it is time enough for the rightful purposes of the civil government for its officers to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order. . . ." The bill, which protected even freedom of irreligion, provided that no one should be compelled to frequent or support any worship. Neither Jefferson's bill nor the other could muster a majority, and for several years the legislature deadlocked.

Each year, however, support for an establishment grew. When a liberalized general assessment bill was introduced in 1784, omitting subscription to articles of faith and giving secular reasons for the support of religion, the Presbyterian clergy backed it. Madison angrily declared that they were "as ready to set up an establishment which is to take them in as they were to pull down that which shut them out." Only Madison's shrewd politicking delayed passage of the general assessment bill until the legislature had time to evaluate the state of public opinion. MADISON'S MEMORIAL AND REMONSTRANCE turned public opinion against the assessment; even the Presbyterian clergy now endorsed Jefferson's bill. Madison reintroduced it in late 1785, and it became law in early 1786, completing the separation of church and state in Virginia and providing a model for a nation.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

STOKES, ANSON PHELPS 1950 Church and State in the United States. Vol. 1:366–394. New York: Harper & Row.

VIRTUAL REPRESENTATION

See: Representation; Taxation without Representation

VISAS

Although the Constitution does not directly mention the power to control and regulate IMMIGRATION, the Supreme Court, in CHAE CHAN PING V. UNITED STATES (1889), held that immigration control was an implied power inherent in national sovereignty. The Court has subsequently held that Congress has virtual plenary power to regulate or condition immigration and NATURALIZATION, and can admit noncitizens to the United States, regulate their presence within the country, and expel, deport, or exclude them. Congress may also accord resident ALIENS and citizens different treatment, but because aliens are persons within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment protection of persons, they are entitled to some PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS rights. With that exception, the regulation of immigration and other admission of aliens to the United States is a matter of statutory law.

Congress, through various immigration and naturalization statutes, has created an elaborate system and set of rules and procedures governing the admission of foreigners to the United States and regulating their stay within the country. American law, like the law in other countries, requires most persons seeking to enter the United States to obtain visas from United States consular offices abroad. A visa is an official document indicating that the party to whom it was issued appears to qualify for legal entry into the United States in accordance with the immigration laws. As aliens enter the United States for many varied reasons (e.g., to transit, to visit, to study, to work, to conduct business, to join a relative, to become a resident), the visa also designates the purpose or type of entry. The latter factor governs the length of stay and the alien's lawful activities while in the United States. A visa is consequently a preliminary determination of admissibility, a designation of entry category, and a permission to apply for admission at the border. The issuance of a visa, while necessary, does not guarantee admission into the United States, for immigration officers, disagreeing with a consul's determination, may refuse to admit persons with valid visas. Such refusals occur infrequently, however, and in most cases a visa is tantamount to a permission to enter.

There are two broad classes of visas: immigrant visas, issued to those seeking permanent admission into the United States, and nonimmigrant visas, issued to those seeking only temporary admission for business or pleasure. The United States limits the number of those who may seek permanent admission, with the exception of immediate relatives of citizens—defined as spouses, children under twenty-one, and parents of American citizens over twenty-one. A complicated system of seven preferences sets priorities among immigration seekers according to statutory criteria of desirability. For example, this scheme assigns the first preference among immigration applicants to adult unmarried sons and daughters of American citizens. The statute assigns twenty percent of the total number of available immigrant visas to this category. Consequently, in passing on immigrant visa applications, consular officers must prefer unmarried sons and daughters over other applicants for up to twenty percent of immigrant visas.

There are thirty-two statutory grounds for denying immigrant visa applications, including ill health, homosexuality, poverty, criminal convictions, insanity, narcotic addiction, entry for purposes of prostitution, subversive affiliations, and participation in Nazi persecution.

Many classes of persons are eligible for nonimmigrant visas, including visitors for business or pleasure, foreign officials and international representatives, intracompany transferees, exchange visitors, students, temporary workers and trainees, transit aliens, treaty traders and investors, foreign media representatives, fiancés or fiancées of U.S. citizens, and spouses and children of persons in some of these categories. Each class has its own type of visa, and entry periods and other restrictions depend on the type of visa issued.

As the consular decision whether to issue a visa depends on factual determinations and judgments, consuls exercise considerable discretion. Because the immigration statutes do not provide for JUDICIAL REVIEW of visa denials, the issue arises whether the Constitution, at least in some cases, requires such review. In Kleindienst v. Mandel (1972) the American government excluded a Belgian Marxist seeking to enter the United States to attend lectures. Asserting a FIRST AMENDMENT right to receive information and ideas, persons who wished to hear, speak, and debate with Mandel claimed that the Constitution required the government to waive his excludability—in effect to issue him a nonimmigrant visa. Relying on Congress's plenary power over the admission of aliens, the Supreme Court held that the First Amendment did not override the ostensibly legitimate exclusion. Lower courts have read Mandel to preclude judicial review of consular visa denials. Consequently, short of administrative relief or statutory change, applicants denied visas have no remedy and cannot gain admission to the United States.

GARY GOODPASTER
(1992)

Bibliography

GORDON, CHARLES and ROSENFIELD, HARRY 1959 Immigration Law and Procedure. Albany N.Y.: Banks Publishing Co.

VLANDIS v. KLINE
412 U.S. 441 (1973)

A Connecticut statute gave resident students at a state university certain tuition preferences. A student who had entered the university as a nonresident was relegated to that status for his or her full student career. The Supreme Court, 6–3, held the latter provision unconstitutional. A majority of five Justices, speaking through Justice POTTER STEWART, held that the provision created "a permanent and IRREBUTTABLE PRESUMPTION of non-residence." Because this presumption was "not necessarily or universally true in fact," it denied a student PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS by denying a hearing on the issue of residence. Justice BYRON R. WHITE concurred on EQUAL PROTECTION GROUNDS. The dissenters suggested that the Court had, in fact, drifted into an area of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS that the Court had abandoned in the 1930s. The irrebuttable presumptions DOCTRINE had a brief vogue, but Weinberger v. Salfi (1975) placed it in mothballs.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

VOICE SAMPLES

See: Testimonial and Nontestimonial Compulsion

VOID FOR VAGUENESS

See: Vagueness

VOIR DIRE

Voir dire (Old French: "to speak the truth") refers to the questioning by the court or counsel of prospective jurors to determine their qualification for jury service.

Two types of objections may be raised to disqualify prospective jurors: peremptory challenges and challenges for cause. A peremptory challenge allows dismissal of a juror without cause. Most states provide each side with twenty such challenges for a capital offense, and a lesser number for other felonies and misdemeanors.

A challenge for cause requires the challenging party to prove potential prejudice to the case if the challenged juror should be accepted. There is generally no limit to such challenges. The typical statute permits such an objection if the juror is of unsound mind, lacks the qualifications required by law, is related to a party in the litigation, has served in a related case or GRAND JURY investigation, or has a "state of mind" that will prevent him from acting with impartiality.

In Wainwright v. Witt (1985) the Supreme Court stated that the standard to determine when a prospective juror should be excluded for cause is whether the juror's views would prevent or substantially impair the juror's duties in accordance with hisher instructions and oath.

Commonly, a prosecutor calls and examines twelve veniremen, exercises his challenges for cause and peremptory challenges, replaces those excused with others, and then tenders a group of twelve to the defense. The defendant follows a similar procedure. This process continues until the parties have exhausted their challenges or expressed their satisfaction with the jury.

Voir dire proceedings are usually open to the public. In Press-Enterprise v. Superior Court (1984) the trial judge had ordered that all but three days of a six-week voir dire for a rape-murder trial of a teenage girl be closed to the public and press and had refused to grant the defendant's pretrial motion for release of the voir dire transcript. The Supreme Court unanimously reversed, holding that voir dire proceedings in criminal trials should be presumptively open to the public, unless fair trial interests would be better served by closure.

Voir dire vests broad authority in the trial judge. A judge may refuse to allow questions deemed irrelevant or inappropriate. The Constitution, however, requires certain inquiries. In Ham v. South Carolina (1973) the Supreme Court held that where racial issues permeate or are inextricably bound up in a trial, the defendant is entitled to questioning specifically directed at racial prejudice. In Ristano v. Ross (1976), however, the Court held that this right does not extend to all cases in which the victim and the defendant are of different races. Questioning about general bias or prejudice will normally suffice. The Court held in Rosales-Lopez v. United States (1981) that judges may decide on a case-by-case basis whether racial overtones justify such questioning.

Finally, voir dire violates DUE PROCESS if its exclusion of a particular group seriously detracts from the jury's impartiality and ability to reflect dominant community values. In Witherspoon v. Illinois (1968) the Supreme Court invalidated a statute that had the effect of screening out jurors not enthusiastic about CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, but accepting those who were. Jurors may constitutionally be disqualified, however, by expressing an absolute refusal to impose the death penalty.

CHARLES H. WHITEBREAD
(1986)

Bibliography

KALVEN, HARRY and ZEISEL, HANS 1966 The American Jury. Boston: Little, Brown.

VOLSTEAD ACT
41 Stat. 305 (1919)

Congress passed the Volstead National Prohibition Act, sponsored by Representative Andrew J. Volstead (Republican, Minnesota), on October 28, 1919. The act provided both for the continuation of wartime PROHIBITION and for enforcement of the EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT. It was enacted over the veto of President WOODROW WILSON, who objected to the linking of those "two distinct phases of prohibition legislation."

To enforce the Eighteenth Amendment against private conduct the Volstead Act defined "intoxicating beverages" as any beverages containing at least 0.5% alcohol by volume, and provided stringent penalties for their manufacture, importation, transportation, sale, possession, or use. The constitutionality of the act was upheld in the National Prohibition Cases (Rhode Island v. Palmer, 1920), in which the Supreme Court, speaking through Justice WILLIS VAN DEVANTER, held that Congress's power under the amendment was complete and extended to intrastate as well as interstate transactions.

The Beer-Wine Revenue Act of March 1933 amended the Volstead Act by permitting the manufacture and sale of beer and wine with an alcohol content of up to 3.2%.

Passage of the TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT later the same year rendered the Volstead Act void.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

VOLUNTARINESS

See: Police Interrogation and Confessions

VON HOLST, HERMANN EDUARD
(1841–1904)

A German immigrant who became chairman of the department of history at the University of Chicago, Hermann E. von Holst published a seven-volume Constitutional and Political History of the United States (1876–1892). The work is malproportioned; the last four volumes cover 1850–1861. Intent on condemning the "slavocracy," the author blamed the ANNEXATION OF TEXAS, the Mexican War, the KANSAS-NEBRASKA ACT, and the CIVIL WAR on a slaveholders' conspiracy. The decision in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), wrote von Holst, was "an unparalleled prostitution of the judicial ermine." Von Holst believed that centralized SOVEREIGNTY and a free society stood for morality and national salvation. Despite his valuable use of newspapers and public documents, his style is so turgid and his judgments are so biased that he is no longer read.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

VOTING RIGHTS

"The right to vote freely for the candidate of one's choice is of the essence of a democratic society, and any restrictions on that right strike at the heart of representative government." So spoke Chief Justice EARL WARREN, on behalf of the Supreme Court, in REYNOLDS V. SIMS (1964).

The Chief Justice's words were in direct philosophic succession to principles of the primacy of representative political institutions announced by the FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS 190 years before, in the Declaration and Resolves of October 14, 1774:

> [T]he foundation of English liberty, and of all free government, is a right in the people to participate in their legislative council: and as the English colonists are not represented, and from their local and other circumstances, cannot properly be represented in the British parliament, they are entitled to a free and exclusive power of legislation in their several provincial legislatures, where their right of representation can alone be preserved, in all cases of taxation and internal policy, subject only to the negative of their sovereign, in such manner as has been heretofore used and accustomed.

The failure of King George III, through his ministers, to recognize the urgency of the colonists' demand for true representative institutions was one of the chief causes of revolution set forth in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE: "He has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions in the rights of the people. He has refused for a long time, after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the Legislative Powers, incapable of Annihilation, have returned to the People at large for their exercise."

The severing of the ties with Britain required the establishment, at the state level and at the national level, of new and more representative institutions of government. American constitutional history is characterized in part by the continuing enlargement of the right to vote, the mechanism which, in the American political tradition, has become the sine qua non of a valid system of REPRESENTATION. An anomaly presents itself: The Constitution, as amended, addresses aspects of the right to vote with far greater frequency than any other topic. Nonetheless, it has never been the function of the Constitution affirmatively to define the universe of voters. The Constitution's function has been narrower—progressively to limit the permissible grounds of disenfranchisement.

Prior to the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, eligibility to vote was not uniform among the colonies, but the variations were relatively minor. Broadly speaking, voting for colonial (as distinct from township or borough) officials was reserved to adult (generally meaning twenty-one or older) "freeholders." In equating property ownership and suffrage, the colonies were following a familiar English model. But landowning was far more widely dispersed in the colonies than in the mother country, so the proportion of colonists eligible to vote was larger.

There were not more than a few black or women freeholders in any of the colonies, and pursuant either to convention or to formal legal specification those few did not vote. Religious restrictions were also commonplace but varied somewhat among the colonies and at different times. In general, the franchise was the prerogative of the propertied, Protestant, white male.

With the coming of independence, all of the newly sovereign states except Connecticut and Rhode Island adopted new charters of government—"constitutions." Impelled by the rhetoric of revolution and the eagerness of thousands of militiamen to participate in the processes of governance, the drafters of the new state constitutions relaxed but did not abandon the property and religious qualifications for voting for state officials (and the correlative, and generally more stringent, qualifications for holding state office). As Max Farrand observed, Americans > might declare that "all men are created equal," and bills of rights might assert that government rested upon the consent of the governed; but these constitutions carefully provided that such consent should come from property owners, and, in many of the States, from religious believers and even followers of the Christian faith. "The man of small means might vote, but none save well-to-do Christians could legislate, and in many states none but a rich Christian could be a governor." In South Carolina, for example, a freehold of 10,000 currency was required of the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and members of the council; 2,000 of the members of the Senate; and, while every elector was eligible to the House of Representatives, he had to acknowledge the being of a God and to believe in a future state of rewards and punishments, as well as to hold "a freehold at least of fifty acres of land, or a town lot."

Under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, the state delegates in Congress constituted the nation's government. The Articles limited the numbers of delegates (no fewer than two and no more than seven per state) but left each state legislature free to determine the qualifications of those selected and the mode of their annual selection. The Articles did not preclude popular election of delegates, but the word "appointed," in the phrase "appointed in such manner as the legislature of each State shall direct," suggests that it was not anticipated that legislatures would remit to their constituents the power to choose those who would speak and vote for the states in Congress.

At the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787, the Framers divided on how the lower house was to be selected. JAMES MADISON told his fellow delegates that he "considered an election of one branch at least of the legislature by the people immediately, as a clear principle of true government." Madison's view carried the day. But then the Convention faced the question whether the Constitution should set the qualifications of those who were to elect representatives. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS of Pennsylvania proposed that only freeholders should vote. Colonel GEORGE MASON of Virginia found this proposal regressive: "Eight of nine States have extended the right of suffrage beyond the freeholders. What will the people there say, if they should be disfranchised." OLIVER ELLSWORTH of Connecticut also challenged Morris's proposal: "How shall the freehold be defined? Ought not every man who pays a tax to vote for the representative who is to levy and dispose of his money?" Morris was unpersuaded: "He had long learned not to be the dupe of words. . . . Give the votes to people who have no property, and they will sell them to the rich who will be able to buy them." But BENJAMIN FRANKLIN took decisive issue with his fellow Pennsylvanian: "It is of great consequence that we should not depress the virtue and public spirit of our common people; of which they displayed a great deal during the war, and which contributed principally to the favorable issue of it." Morris's proposal was decisively defeated. The Convention instead approved the provision that has endured ever since, under which eligibility to vote for representatives is keyed, in each state, to that state's rules of eligibility to vote for members of the most numerous house of the state legislature.

When it came to designing the method of selecting the President and vice-president, the Convention devised the indirect election system of the ELECTORAL COLLEGE. The expectation was that the electors—themselves chosen from among the leading citizens of their respective states—would, through disinterested deliberation, select as the nation's chief executive officials the two persons of highest civic virtue, wholly without regard for the vulgar demands of "politics." According to ALEXANDER HAMILTON in THE FEDERALIST #68, "[t]he mode of appointment of the Chief Magistrate of the United States is almost the only part of the system, of any consequence, which has escaped without severe censure, or which has received the slightest mark of approbation from its opponents." But, measured against its intended purpose, no other structural aspect of the Constitution has wound up wider of the mark. The Framers of the Constitution wholly failed to anticipate the development of national political parties whose chief political goal would be the election of the party leader as President. That development has meant that since the fourth presidential election—that of 1800, in which THOMAS JEFFERSON defeated JOHN ADAMS—the electors in each state have themselves been selected as adherents of the political party prevailing in that state and thus have, with the rarest of exceptions, cast their electoral votes for the party's presidential and vice-presidential candidates. The system of electors remains to this day, but it has been entirely drained of its intended function.

Those who drafted the Constitution in 1787, and who saw it through ratification to the launching of the new ship of state in 1789, were America's aristocracy. The transformation of American politics from 1789 to the Civil War can be measured in the marked shift in class status of those who occupied the Presidency. The Presidents from GEORGE WASHINGTON to JOHN QUINCY ADAMS were all patricians. Most of the Presidents from ANDREW JACKSON to ABRAHAM LINCOLN were not. The growth of national parties, beginning with Jefferson and accelerating with Jackson, democratized politics by putting politicians in the business of seeking to enlarge their voting constituencies. Property qualifications gave way, for the most part, to taxpayer qualifications. And, in many states, these in turn were soon largely abandoned.

The erosion of property tests for voting did not mean that anything approximating universal suffrage was at hand. As one political scientist has summarized the situation:

> Apart from a few midwestern states, hungry for settlers, no one was very warm to the prospect of aliens and immigrants at the polls; all the states but Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and New York explicitly barred free blacks from voting, and New York imposed special property requirements on blacks which, while repeatedly challenged, were repeatedly upheld in popular referenda. Even in the tiny handful of northern states that did not exclude blacks by law, social pressures tended to accomplish the same end. New Hampshire and Vermont in 1857 and 1858 had to pass special laws against excluding blacks from voting. Chancellor James Kent concluded that only in Maine could the black man participate equally with the white man in civil and political rights. Women were universally denied the vote [Elliott 1974, p. 40].

In 1848, a year of revolution in Europe, 300 people gathered in a church in the little upstate New York town of Seneca Falls to consider the status of women. The most revolutionary item on the agenda was voting. Half a century before there had been a small outcropping of female voting in New Jersey, whose 1776 constitution had, perhaps inadvertently, used the word "inhabitants" to describe those who, if they met the property qualifications, could vote. It appears that by 1807, respectable New Jersey opinion had reached the consensus that laxity was slipping into license (at a local election in Trenton even slaves and Philadelphians were said to have cast ballots). At this point, "reform" was clearly called for: the legislature promptly altered the electoral code to bring New Jersey's voting qualifications back into conformity with the white maleness that characterized the electorate in the rest of the country and remained the accepted order of things until Seneca Falls.

The chief driving energies behind the SENECA FALLS CONVENTION were ELIZABETH CADY STANTON and Lucretia Mott. Stanton drafted the "Declaration of Principles" and the several resolutions which the convention was asked to adopt. The only resolution to receive less-than-unanimous endorsement was the ninth: "Resolved, that it is the duty of the women of this country to secure to themselves their sacred right to the elective franchise." That the franchise was a far more chimerical goal than other concerns (for example, property rights for married women) was recognized by Mott. She had asked Stanton not to submit the ninth resolution for the reason that "Thou will make us ridiculous." The factor that may have tipped the balance in Stanton's decision not to subordinate her principle to Mott's pragmatism was the strong encouragement of Frederick Douglass. The great black leader supported the ninth resolution. He joined the cause of equal rights for women to the cause of abolition.

The women's movement maintained its close association with abolitionism through the CIVIL WAR. After the freeing of the slaves, the country's attention focused on the terms on which American blacks were to be brought into the mainstream of American life. The leaders of the women's movement hoped that the drive for women's suffrage would complement and be reinforced by the drive for black suffrage. But that was not to be. As the war neared its end, a number of Republican leaders began to recognize a strong partisan interest in creating black voters to counter the feared resurgence of the Democratic party; there were no comparable reasons for creating women voters. Many of the women leaders, recognizing the political realities, accepted—albeit with no enthusiasm—the priority given to the rights of blacks. But not Elizabeth Cady Stanton and SUSAN B. ANTHONY. Said Anthony: "I will cut off this right arm before I will ever work for or demand the ballot for the Negro and not the woman." (Anthony and Stanton then formed the National Woman Suffrage Association, while the other leaders worked through the American Woman Suffrage Association; the split was not to be healed for twenty-five years.)

In 1864 Abraham Lincoln appointed SALMON P. CHASE—Lincoln's former secretary of the treasure and one of his chief rivals for the Republican presidential nomination in 1860—to succeed ROGER B. TANEY as CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States. Chase's elevation to the Court did not abate his presidential ambitions and his attendant interest in promoting a favorable political environment. The new Chief Justice wrote to Lincoln, as he subsequently wrote to President ANDREW JOHNSON, urging that black suffrage be made a condition of the reconstruction of the rebel states. And by 1867 Chase had taken the position that Congress had constitutional authority to enfranchise blacks as a mode of enforcing the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT: "Can anything be clearer than that the National Legislature charged with the duty of "enforcing by appropriate legislation' the condition of universal freedom, is authorized and bound to provide for universal suffrage? Is not suffrage the best security against slavery and involuntary servitude? Is not the legislation which provides the best security the most appropriate?" Chase lost interest in active promotion of black voting when it became apparent that his modest chances of being nominated for the presidency were more likely to be realized in the Democratic party than in the Republican party. In any event, the question whether the Thirteenth Amendment could have been a platform for enlarging the franchise became moot upon the adoption of the two other post-Civil War amendments, both of which expressly addressed the franchise—for blacks, not for women.

The FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, ratified in 1868, dealt with black voting by indirection. By declaring that "[a]ll persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside," the first sentence of the first section of the amendment overruled Roger B. Taney's pronouncement in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), that blacks, whether slave or free, could not be citizens within the contemplation of the Constitution. The second sentence of the first section sought to protect the CIVIL RIGHTS of blacks: First, it guaranteed "the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States" against state abridgment and, second, it prohibited state denial to any person, whether citizen or not, of "life, liberty or property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW," or deprivation of the "EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS." The second section of the amendment spoke to the political rights of blacks. It provided that any state that denied participation in federal or state elections to "any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States . . . except for participation in rebellion, or other crime," should have its allocation of representatives and of presidential electors proportionately reduced. The framers of the amendment thus preserved the states' entitlement to discriminate but proposed a substantial penalty as the price of discrimination.

By 1869, after General ULYSSES S. GRANT's narrow victory in the 1868 presidential election, the Republican party recognized that black votes were essential to its survival. So the Republican leadership in Congress fashioned the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT. That amendment, ratified in 1870, addressed the question of black voting directly. A citizen's entitlement to vote could not be "abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

Notwithstanding that the express language of the Fourteenth Amendment addressed male voting, and that the express language of the Fifteenth Amendment addressed discriminations rooted in "race, color or previous condition of servitude," some leaders of the women's movement contended that women were constitutionally entitled to vote. Arguing that the right to vote in a federal election was a privilege of national citizenship protected by section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, Susan B. Anthony actually persuaded election officials in Rochester, New York, to let her vote in 1872 notwithstanding that the New York constitution limited the franchise to men. Anthony was promptly charged with the crime of casting a ballot in a federal election in which she was not an eligible voter. The presiding judge was Justice WARD HUNT of the Supreme Court. Justice Hunt rejected Anthony's constitutional claim in the following words:

> The right of voting, or the privilege of voting, is a right or privilege arising under the constitution of the state, and not under the Constitution of the United States. The qualifications are different in the different states. Citizenship, age, sex, residence, are variously required in the different states, or may be so. If the right belongs to any particular person, it is because such person is entitled to it by the laws of the state where he offers to exercise it, and not because of citizenship of the United States. If the state of New York should provide that no person should vote until he had reached the age of thirty years, or after he had reached the age of thirty years, or after he had reached the age of fifty, or that no person having grey hair, or who had not the use of all his limbs, should be entitled to vote, I do not see how it could be held to be a violation of any right derived or held under the Constitution of the United States. We might say that such regulations were unjust, tyrannical, unfit for the regulation of an intelligent state; but, if rights of a citizen are thereby violated they are of that fundamental class, derived from his position as a citizen of the state, and not those limited rights belonging to him as a citizen of the United States.

Read through the prism of a century of doctrinal hindsight, Justice Hunt's words seem—at least at first blush—somewhat surprising. The surprise is not occasioned by the fact that the Justice gave such short shrift to arguments based on the Fourteenth Amendment's PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES CLAUSE, for we are accustomed to the fact that, ever since the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873), the Supreme Court has read the grant of privileges and immunities flowing from national citizenship very restrictively. The surprise stems from Hunt's failure—which may also have been counsel's failure—to approach sex-based denial of the franchise (not to mention the assertedly analogous hypothetical denials based on age, physical handicap, or color of hair) in equal protection terms. The likely explanation is that in Slaughterhouse the Court doubted that "any action of a State not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the" equal protection clause.

Justice Hunt directed the jury to return a verdict of guilty and imposed a fine of $100.

Justice Hunt's rejection of Anthony's privileges and immunities claim was vindicated two years later by Chief Justice MORRISON R. WAITE's opinion for the unanimous Court in MINOR V. HAPPERSETT (1875). This was a civil suit brought in a Missouri state court by Virginia L. Minor, and her lawyer husband Francis Minor, to challenge the refusal of a Missouri election official to register her as a voter. The Minors contended that the provision of the Missouri constitution limiting the electorate to male citizens transgressed the privileges and immunities clause. In rejecting the Minors' contention, Chief Justice Waite demonstrated that limitation of the franchise to males had been the norm, despite the fact that women were citizens. Voting had not been a privilege of national citizenship prior to the Fourteenth Amendment. As the amendment "did not add to the privileges and immunities of a citizen," but merely "furnished an additional guaranty for the protection of such as he already had," Missouri's refusal to let Minor vote was not unconstitutional. Minor v. Happersett ended attempts to win the campaign for woman's suffrage by litigation. The road to the ballot box was to be political—persuading male legislators to pass laws giving women the vote.

It was to be a long road. In 1870 Wyoming's territorial legislature enacted a law entitling women to vote. Utah followed suit, but the victory there was temporary. An 1887 congressional statute forbidding Utah's Mormons from practicing polygamy also overrode the territorial legislature's grant of the franchise to women. Three years later Wyoming's first state constitution called for women's suffrage. Thereafter progress was slow. Many state campaigns were fought and most were lost. In the South, votes for women were seen as a harbinger of votes for blacks, and the states resisted accordingly; in the East, many industrialists mistrusted the links between some women's suffragists and trade union and other reform groups; in the Midwest, the women's suffrage movement was seen by the brewing interests as the advance guard of prohibition. By 1913 women could vote in only nine states; in that year Illinois admitted women to participation in presidential elections.

In 1912, THEODORE ROOSEVELT's Progressive party endorsed women's suffrage. This endorsement served as a reminder that Susan B. Anthony and her associates had sought to achieve women's suffrage not state-by-state but by amending the Constitution. Pressure for a women's suffrage amendment mounted during World War I when women entered the work force in record numbers. In 1918 WOODROW WILSON announced support for the proposed amendment, notwithstanding that women's suffrage was anathema to the white Democratic South. In 1919, with Democrats divided and Republicans strongly in favor, Congress submitted to the states a proposed amendment barring denial or abridgment of the right to vote in any election on grounds of sex. In 1920, the NINETEENTH AMENDMENT was ratified. In the 1920 elections one of the voters was Charlotte Woodward Pierce who, as a nineteen-year-old farm girl, had attended the Seneca Falls Convention in 1848.

Following the Civil War, the military occupation of the South ushered in a period in which blacks not only voted but were elected to office. With the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment, there appeared to be some ground for supposing that black voting had achieved a legal infrastructure which might suffice even after the army departed. However, although the amendment bars race, color, and previous condition of servitude as criteria of eligibility to vote, it does not proscribe other criteria—such as literacy or taxpayer status—susceptible of adaptation as surrogates for racism. The lesson was that most blacks might be prevented from voting by educational or property qualifications.

Following the COMPROMISE OF 1877, which led to the withdrawal from the South of the last military units, the twilight of black participation in the southern political process began. Through the 1880s, some black voting continued—frequently in Populist alliance with poor whites. But in the 1890s, as a corollary of the spreading gospel of Jim Crow, the southern white political leadership forged a consensus to exclude blacks from the ballot box. Some of this was achieved by force, and some by skulduggery, but in large measure the forms of law were utilized. LITERACY TESTS and POLL TAXES were common exclusionary devices, as was closing Democratic primaries—the only real elections in most of the South—to blacks. The underlying rationale was that offered by Senator James Vardaman of Mississippi: "I am just as much opposed to Booker Washington as a voter, with all his Anglo-Saxon reinforcements, as I am to the cocoanut-headed, chocolate-covered, typical little coon, Andy Dottson, who blacks my shoes every morning. Neither is fit to perform the supreme function of citizenship."

By and large, the legal stratagems employed by the southern states to disenfranchise blacks succeeded. Poll taxes and literacy tests which did not on their face show a discriminatory purpose easily passed constitutional muster from BREEDLOVE V. SUTTLES (1937) to Lassiter v. Northampton Election Board (1959). To be sure, the Supreme Court did intervene in those rare instances in which the purpose to discriminate was evident on the face of the challenged restraint. A flagrant example was the so-called GRANDFATHER CLAUSE in Oklahoma's 1910 constitution, which exempted from the literacy requirement any would-be voter "who was, on January 1, 1866, or at any time prior thereto, entitled to vote under any form of government, or who at that time resided in some foreign nation, and [any] lineal descendant thereof." In GUINN V. UNITED STATES (1915) the Supreme Court held this literacy test invalid.

Because during the first half of the twentieth century the decisive voting in the South took place in Democratic primaries, not in the general elections, the cases of greatest practical as well as doctrinal consequence were those that challenged devices to maintain the whiteness of the "white primary."

In NIXON V. HERNDON (1927) a unanimous Court, speaking through Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, sustained the complaint of L. A. Nixon, who contended that he had been unconstitutionally barred from voting in a Texas Democratic primary through enforcement of a Texas statute that recited that "in no event shall a negro be eligible to participate in a Democratic party primary election held in the state of Texas." The Court held that this statutory racial exclusion contravened the Fourteenth Amendment.

The consequence of this ruling was described by Justice BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO in his opinion in NIXON V. CONDON (1932): "Promptly after the announcement of [the Herndon] decision, the legislature of Texas enacted a new statute . . . repealing the article condemned by this court; declaring that the effect of the decision was to create an emergency with a need for immediate action; and substituting for the article so repealed another bearing the same number. By the article thus substituted, "every political party in this State through its State Executive Committee shall have the power to prescribe the qualifications of its own members and shall in its own way determine who shall be qualified to vote or otherwise participate in such political party. . . ." Thereupon the executive committee of the Texas Democratic party voted to limit party membership and participation to whites, and L. A. Nixon was once again barred from voting in the Democratic primary. Once again Nixon brought a lawsuit, and once again he prevailed in the Supreme Court. Justice Cardozo, speaking for a majority of five, concluded that the new Texas statute delegated exercise of the state's power over primaries to party executive committees, with the result that the racial exclusion decided on by the executive committee was in effect the racially discriminatory act of the State of Texas and hence prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment. Justice JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS, joined by three other Justices, dissented.

Three years later, in GROVEY V. TOWNSEND (1935), the Court considered the next refinement in the Texas Democratic primary—exclusion of blacks by vote of the party convention. Speaking through Justice OWEN J. ROBERTS, the Court this time unanimously concluded that the action taken by the Texas Democratic party was an entirely private decision for which the State of Texas was not accountable; accordingly, neither the Fourteenth nor the Fifteenth Amendment was transgressed.

Nine years later, toward the end of World War II, the Court, in SMITH V. ALLWRIGHT (1944), again considered the Grovey v. Townsend question. In the interval, seven of the Justices who had participated in Grovey v. Townsend had died or retired. Approaching the matter in a common sense way, the Court, with Justice Roberts dissenting, concluded that the role of the primary as a formal and vital predicate of the election made it an integral part of the state's voting processes and hence subject to the requirement of the Fifteenth Amendment. Accordingly, the Court in Smith v. Allwright overruled Grovey v. Townsend.

The resumption, after three-quarters of a century, of significant black participation in the southern political process dates from the decision in Smith v. Allwright. But the elimination of the most egregious legal barriers did not mean that all blacks were automatically free to vote. Hundreds of thousands of would-be black voters were still kept from the polls by fraud or force or both. In 1957, three years after the Court, in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), held that legally mandated racial SEGREGATION contravened the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress passed the first federal civil rights law enacted since the 1870s: a voting rights law which authorized modest federal supervision of the southern voting process. And the year 1964 witnessed ratification of the TWENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT, barring exclusion of American citizens from voting in any federal election on grounds of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax. But as black demands for equal treatment multiplied, responsive abuses escalated.

In the spring of 1965, a Boston minister, one of scores of clergymen who had gone to Selma, Alabama, to help MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., launch a voter registration drive, was murdered. A few days later, on March 15, 1965, President LYNDON B. JOHNSON addressed Congress:

> Many of the issues of civil rights are very complex and most difficult. But about this there can and should be no argument. Every American citizen must have an equal right to vote. There is no reason which can excuse the denial of that right. There is no duty which weighs more heavily on us than the duty we have to ensure that right.
>
> Yet the harsh fact is that in many places in this country men and women are kept from voting simply because they are Negroes.
>
> Every device of which human ingenuity is capable has been used to deny this right. The Negro citizen may go to register only to be told that the day is wrong, or the hour is late, or the official in charge is absent. And if he persists and if he manages to present himself to the registrar, he may be disqualified because he did not spell out his middle name or because he abbreviated a word on the application. And if he manages to fill out an application, he is given a test. The registrar is the sole judge of whether he passes this test. He may be asked to recite the entire constitution, or explain the most complex provisions of state laws. And even a college degree cannot be used to prove that he can read and write.
>
> For the fact is that the only way to pass these barriers is to show a white skin.
>
> Experience has clearly shown that the existing process of law cannot overcome systematic and ingenious discrimination. No law that we now have on the books—and I have helped to put three of them there—can ensure the right to vote when local officials are determined to deny it. . . .

This time, on this issue, there must be no delay, or no hesitation or no compromise with our purpose.

We cannot, we must not refuse to protect the right of every American to vote in every election that he may desire to participate in. And we ought not, we must not wait another eight months before we get a bill. We have already waited a hundred years and more and the time for waiting is gone. . . .

But even if we pass this bill, the battle will not be over. What happened in Selma is part of a far larger movement which reaches into every section and state of America. It is the effort of American Negroes to secure for themselves the full blessings of American life.

Their cause must be our cause too. Because it is not just Negroes, but really it is all of us, who must overcome the crippling legacy of bigotry and injustice. And we shall overcome.

As a man whose roots go deeply into Southern soil I know how agonizing racial feelings are. I know how difficult it is to reshape the attitudes and the structure of our society.

But a century has passed, more than a hundred years, since the Negro was freed. And he is not fully free tonight.

It was more than a hundred years ago that Abraham Lincoln, the great President of the Northern party, signed the Emancipation Proclamation, but emancipation is a proclamation and not a fact.

A century has passed, more than a hundred years since equality was promised. And yet the Negro is not equal.

A century has passed since the day of promise. And the promise is unkept.

The time of justice has now come. I tell you that I believe sincerely that no force can hold it back. It is right in the eyes of man and God that it should come. And when it does, I think that day will brighten the lives of every American.

Congress enacted the VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. The act provided, among other things, for the suspension of literacy tests for five years in states or political subdivisions thereof in which fewer than "50 per cent of its voting-age residents were registered on November 1, 1964, or voted in the presidential election of November, 1964." This and other major provisions of the 1965 act were thereafter sustained in SOUTH CAROLINA V. KATZENBACH (1966), Rome v. United States (1980), and KATZENBACH V. MORGAN (1966), as appropriate ways of enforcing the Fifteenth and Fourteenth Amendments. Subsequent amendments to the 1965 act have broadened its coverage.

The 1944 decision in Smith v. Allwright was more than a new and hospitable judicial approach to the right of blacks to participate in the American political process. It was a major advance (as, four years later, was SHELLEY V. KRAEMER, 1948) toward the day—May 17, 1954—when a unanimous Court, speaking through Chief Justice Warren, was to hold, in Brown v. Board of Education, that the equal protection clause barred the legally mandated racial segregation of school children. Subsequent decisions, building on Brown v. Board of Education, soon made it plain that the equal protection clause barred all the legal trappings of Jim Crow. Brown v. Board of Education worked a fundamental change in the Court's and the nation's perception of the scope of judicial responsibility to vindicate those values.

In 1962, eight years after Brown v. Board of Education, the Court, in Baker v. Carr, held that allegations that a state legislature suffered from systematic malapportionment, under which districts of widely different populations were each represented by one legislator, stated a claim cognizable under the equal protection clause. The importance of Baker v. Carr cannot be overestimated. Chief Justice Warren thought it the most significant decision handed down by the Court during his sixteen years in the center chair. Even those who rank Brown v. Board of Education ahead of Baker v. Carr must nonetheless acknowledge that the latter decision set in motion a process that resulted in the redesign of numerous state legislatures and a myriad of local governing bodies, and, indeed, of the House of Representatives. That redesign has been required to meet the Court's pronouncement, in GRAY V. SANDERS (1963), that "[t]he conception of political equality from the Declaration of Independence, to Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, to the Fifteenth, Seventeenth, and Nineteenth Amendments can mean only one thing—one person, one vote." Long-standing patterns of malapportionment in which rural districts with relatively few inhabitants were represented on equal terms with heavily populated urban districts have become a thing of the past. (See REAPPORTIONMENT.)

Guaranteeing the voting rights of women and blacks and overcoming rampant malapportionment have cured the major inexcusable deficiencies of the American political process. In recent decades, certain lesser inequalities have also begun to be addressed.

From the beginning of the republic, Americans residing in the continental United States but not within any state—for example, those who lived in federal territories—had no way of voting in national elections. In the most egregious of anomalies, residents of the nation's capital were voiceless in the selection of the President who dwelt and governed in their own home town. So matters stood until 1964, when the TWENTY-THIRD AMENDMENT was added to the Constitution, giving the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA a minimum of three electoral votes in presidential elections.

In the late 1960s, profound divisions in American opinion about America's military involvement in the VIETNAM WAR forced recognition of another anomaly—that tens of thousands of young men were being drafted to fight in an unpopular foreign war although they were not old enough to vote in national elections choosing the officials responsible for making decisions for war or for peace. In 1970, Congress, in amending the Voting Rights Act, included a provision forbidding abridgment of the right of any citizen to vote "on account of age if such citizen is eighteen years or older." The statute was promptly challenged in OREGON V. MITCHELL (1970). Four Justices concluded that Congress had the power to lower the voting age to eighteen. Four Justices concluded that Congress had no such power. The casting vote was that of Justice Hugo L. Black, who held that Congress could regulate the voting age in national elections but not in state elections. Because Americans vote every two years for state and national officials at the same time, Oregon v. Mitchell was an invitation to chaos. Within six months, Congress proposed and the requisite three-fourths of the states ratified, the TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT which accomplished by constitutional mandate what Congress had been unable to achieve by statute.

In the course of two centuries law and conscience have combined to make the American suffrage almost truly universal. One massive obstacle remains: apathy. In recent national elections in the European democracies, seventy-two percent of the eligible electorate voted in Great Britain, seventy-nine percent in Spain, eighty-five percent in France, and eighty-nine percent in Italy and West Germany. By contrast, in the American presidential election of 1980, only fifty-three percent of those eligible voted. In America's 1984 presidential election, after both major parties had made massive efforts to register new voters, not more than fifty-five percent of those who could have voted made their way to the ballot box. A fateful question confronting American democracy is whether tens of millions of self-disenfranchised Americans will in the years to come find the energy and good sense to exercise the precious right won at such great labor at the Constitutional Convention, in Congress and state legislatures and the Supreme Court, and at Selma and Seneca Falls.

LOUIS H. POLLAK
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Rogers v. Lodge.)

Bibliography

CHUTE, MARCHETTE G. 1969 First Liberty: A History of the Right to Vote in America, 1619–1850. New York: Dutton.

DUBOIS, ELLEN CAROL, ed. 1981 Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony: Correspondence, Writings, Speeches. New York: Shocken.

ELLIOTT, WARD E. Y. 1974 The Rise of Guardian Democracy: The Supreme Court's Role in Voting Rights Disputes, 1845–1969. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

FAIRMAN, CHARLES 1971 Reconstruction and Reunion, 1864–1888. New York: Macmillan.

FARRAND, MAX, ed. 1911 The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

———, ed. 1921 The Fathers of the Constitution. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

FLEXNER, ELEANOR 1975 Century of Struggle: The Woman's Right to Vote Movement in the United States. Rev. ed. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

HIGGINBOTHAM, A. L., JR. 1984 "States' 'Rights' and States' 'Wrongs': Apartheid, Virginia and South African Style." Dubois Lecture, Harvard University.

MCKAY, ROBERT B. 1965 Reapportionment: The Law and Politics of Equal Representation. New York: Twentieth Century Fund.

WILLIAMSON, CHILTON 1960 American Suffrage from Property to Democracy, 1760–1860. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

WOODWARD, C. VANN 1951 Origins of the New South, 1877–1913. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

——— 1957 The Strange Career of Jim Crow. New York: Oxford University Press.

VOTING RIGHTS
(Update)

The 1980s began inauspiciously for supporters of minority voting rights when a plurality of the Supreme Court ruled in MOBILE V. BOLDEN (1980) that the VOTING RIGHTS ACT prohibited only intentional RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. Yet two years later, CIVIL RIGHTS forces, over the objections of the administration of President RONALD REAGAN, amended the Act to make clear that it was meant to prohibit laws or practices that had either the intent or the effect of discriminating against people on the basis of race. The bipartisan consensus in favor of a strengthened Voting Rights Act, the explicit standards in the authoritative U.S. SENATE report on the act, and the attention and élan that the 1981–1982 struggle restored to voting rights carried the movement to successes through the rest of the 1980s. At-large elections like those at issue in Bolden, which tend to minimize minority voting power, were declared illegal in many areas in the South and some outside it.

Even though the Court sustained attacks on at-large elections in its most important interpretation of the 1982 amendments in Thornburg v. Gingles (1986), critics such as political scientist Abigail Thernstrom and Justice CLARENCE THOMAS harshly denounced the trend. Electoral structures, Thernstrom thought, should be overturned only in the most egregious cases of discrimination against African Americans. Latinos, she claimed, did not suffer from enough discrimination to deserve protection. The Voting Rights Act, she announced, should never have deviated from what she asserted was its sole original intent, to protect the right to cast a ballot. In a lengthy concurrence to Holder v. Hall (1994), Thomas not only agreed with Thernstrom, but also went on to argue that the amended Voting Rights Act was never intended to apply to such electoral structures as at-large elections and redistricting, but only to guard an individual's right to register and vote, which he believed to be of merely symbolic importance anyway. Not only were Thernstrom's and Thomas's empirical assertions of racial electoral equality factually incorrect, but they also failed to apply their value judgments consistently when the Court vetoed prominority redistricting in SHAW V. RENO (1993) and its progeny, decisions that threatened to reverse many of the voting rights victories of the 1980s.

In the other major voting rights development of the 1990s, the Clinton Administration passed the National Voter Registration Act (NVRA), popularly known as "motor voter," which facilitated voter registration by requiring states to register voters for federal elections in offices that served the public, such as departments of motor vehicles and welfare and unemployment bureaus. Fearing a surge of new lower-class, pro-Democratic voters, several Republican governors refused to effectuate the law and unsuccessfully took it to court. By the time that the Court rejected the challenge, it had become clear that the large number of new registrants did not affiliate disproportionately with either major party. Estimates of additional registration produced by the NVRA ranged from 3.5 million to 9 million people in 1995–1996.

J. MORGAN KOUSSER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Electoral Districting; Reapportionment.)

Bibliography

CASPER, LYNNE M. and BASS, LORETTA E. 1998 Voting and Registration in the Election of November 1996. U.S. Bureau of the Census, Current Population Reports: Population Characteristics. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office.

DAVIDSON, CHANDLER and GROFMAN, BERNARD, eds. 1994 Quiet Revolution in the South: The Impact of the Voting Rights Act, 1965–1990. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

GROFMAN, BERNARD and DAVIDSON, CHANDLER, eds. 1992 Controversies in Minority Voting: The Voting Rights Act in Perspective. Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution.

THERNSTROM, ABIGAIL M. 1987 Whose Votes Count? Affirmative Action and Minority Voting Rights. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 AND ITS AMENDMENTS
79 Stat. 437 (1965)

Despite Congress's efforts in the CIVIL RIGHTS ACTS OF 1957, 1960, and 1964 to protect the right to vote, the case-by-case approach of these laws proved ineffective in dealing with denials of VOTING RIGHTS to millions of blacks. By 1965, only seventy-one voting rights cases had been filed by the Department of Justice. And in 1964 only 19.4, 6.4, and 31.8 percent of eligible blacks were registered to vote in Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, respectively. In Louisiana, comparable white registration stood at 80.2 percent.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965, amended in 1970, 1975, and 1982, provided additional protection of the right to vote. The 1965 act's most extraordinary features, its preclearance requirements, applied only to states or political subdivisions with low voter registration or participation. In such jurisdictions, most of which were in the South, the act suspended literacy, educational, and character tests of voter qualifications used to deny the right to vote in any elections. In addition, with a view to New York's Puerto Rican population, the act prohibited conditioning the right to vote on any English comprehension requirement for anyone who had completed sixth grade in a school in which the predominant classroom language was other than English. States and political subdivisions subject to the suspension of voting tests were barred from implementing other voting practices that had the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote without obtaining preclearance from a federal court or the ATTORNEY GENERAL.

The Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1970 and 1975 enhanced the preclearance provisions. The 1965 act's coverage had been triggered by low electoral participation in the 1964 election. The 1970 amendments extended the preclearance requirement through 1975 and suspended voting qualification tests or devices until 1975 in all jurisdictions, not just in jurisdictions covered by other provisions of the original 1965 act. The 1975 amendments extended the preclearance requirement through 1982 and suspended tests or devices indefinitely. The 1970 and 1975 amendments also added 1968 and 1972 to 1964 as years in which low electoral participation would trigger the act's coverage. The 1982 amendments imposed new preclearance standards to be effective until 2007.

The Supreme Court has taken an expansive view of the procedures covered by the act's preclearance requirement. In Allen v. State Board of Elections (1969), Dougherty County Board of Education v. White (1978), and other cases, the Court applied the act to voting practices that might affect minority voter effectiveness, as well as to practices directly limiting voter registration. Under these rulings, the act's preclearance requirements would govern changes in voting districts, or a county board of education's requirement that employees seeking elective office take an unpaid leave of absence.

A change in voting procedure raises the question whether the change triggers the act's preclearance requirement by having the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote. In deciding whether the requisite effect exists, the Supreme Court has held that the act covers effects even if they are not discriminatorily motivated. This standard, which is more stringent than the purposeful discrimination requirement the Court applies under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT, was upheld against constitutional attack in Rome v. United States (1980).

In addition to the preclearance requirements, the 1965 act included a nationwide prohibition upon voting qualifications or standards that deny or abridge voting rights on account of race. This prohibition applies whether the governmental unit is subject to the act's preclearance requirements or not. And, unlike the preclearance requirements, which apply only to changes in voting procedures, it applies to procedures that have long been in effect. A plurality opinion in MOBILE V. BOLDEN (1980) suggested that this provision only proscribed purposeful discrimination prohibited by the Constitution. In the 1982 amendments, however, Congress rejected a purposeful discrimination requirement and set forth standards governing findings of discriminatory effect.

In one of its remedies, the 1965 act continued and expanded a method of guaranteeing voting rights initiated in the FORCE ACT OF 1871. On a showing of widespread denials of voting rights, the act authorized a federal court to appoint federal voting examiners who themselves would examine and register voters for all elections, thereby superseding state election officials.

Addressing problems not covered by the 1965 act, the 1970 amendments lowered from twenty-one to eighteen the minimum voting age for all elections, prohibited states from imposing RESIDENCY REQUIREMENTS in presidential elections, and provided for uniform national rules for absentee voting in presidential elections. The 1975 amendments also sought to overcome linguistic barriers to political participation by requiring bilingual elections in certain political subdivisions. These language provisions brought Texas and Florida under the act's coverage. The 1982 amendments changed the expiration date of these provisions from 1985 to 1992, and added voter assistance provisions for the handicapped.

In general, the 1965 act and amendments have fared well in the Supreme Court. In SOUTH CAROLINA V. KATZENBACH (1966) and KATZENBACH V. MORGAN (1966) the Court upheld the constitutionality of the act. Following the Court's decision in NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976) that certain integral state operations are beyond Congress's power to regulate under the COMMERCE CLAUSE, the constitutional attack was renewed. In Rome v. United States (1980) the Court held this argument inapplicable to cases involving Congress's power to enforce the Civil War amendments. In United Jewish Organizations of Williamsburgh, Inc. v. Carey, (1977) the Court held that use of racial criteria to favor minority voters in an effort to comply with the Voting Rights Act did not violate the Fourteenth or Fifteenth Amendments. In OREGON V. MITCHELL (1970) the Supreme Court sustained most of the 1970 amendments but invalidated lowering the voting age in state and local elections. The latter ruling in Mitchell, however, soon was overturned by the TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT.

The Voting Rights Act has been the most measurably successful CIVIL RIGHTS statute. In most southern states the gap between black and white voter registration shrank dramatically, and the number of elected black officials tripled between 1970 and 1975. Overt racial appeals no longer are a routinely successful part of southern political campaigns. The 1975 amendments confirmed a shift in attitude on civil rights matters. For the first time in the twentieth century, a majority of southern congressmen voted in favor of a federal civil rights statute.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

BELL, DERRICK A., JR. 1980 Race, Racism and American Law, 2nd ed. Boston: Little, Brown.

DORSEN, NORMAN et al. 1979 Emerson, Haber, and Dorsen's Political and Civil Rights in the United States, 4th ed. Vol. 2: 609–685. Boston: Little, Brown.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY 1982 Senate Report No. 97–417, 97th Congress, 2d Session.

VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965 AND ITS AMENDMENTS

79 Stat. 437 (1965)

(Update)

The Voting Rights Act (VRA) has been used primarily for two purposes: to guarantee African American voters in the South equal access to the ballot; and to enable racial minorities—especially blacks and Hispanics—to achieve political REPRESENTATION through electing their preferred candidates. Because the first purpose was more quickly achieved, BALLOT ACCESS is called the act's first-generation effect, and representation, the second-generation effect.

First-generation results were most dramatic in Mississippi, where the percentage of blacks registered increased from 6.7 in 1964 to 59.4 in 1968. In seven Southern states covered entirely by the act's preclearance provision, the black/white registration gap decreased from 44.1 percentage points in 1965 to 5 points in 1988. Second-generation results are reflected in the increases in black officeholding in the eleven-state South, where approximately 20 percent of the population is African American. In this region, between 1970 and 1985, the percentage of blacks in Congress increased from 0 to 1.7; in state senates, from 1.3 to 7.2; in state houses, from 1.9 to 10.8; and on city councils, from 1.2 to 5.6.

Increases in black and Hispanic officeholding in the South and Southwest, respectively, resulted largely from drawing majority–minority election districts. These were often created through legal challenges to racial GERRYMANDERING or to multimember or "at-large" election schemes, where plaintiffs invoked the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT or sections 2 (as amended in 1982) and 5 of the VRA. Essential to this assault on the exclusion of minority-group members from government office was the concept of minority vote dilution which the Supreme Court endorsed in White v. Regester (1973) and later refined in Thornburg v. Gingles (1986).

The 1990s ELECTORAL DISTRICTING resulted in a sharp increase in Southern black members of Congress— from four in 1990 to seventeen in 1994. The U.S. Department of Justice under both Presidents GEORGE H.W. BUSH and WILLIAM J. CLINTON had required the creation of more "safe" black districts in the region to comply with the act. Several bizarrely shaped majority-black districts were crafted, and white voters challenged one in North Carolina. Consequently, the Court, most notably in SHAW V. RENO (1993) and its progeny, developed a theory under which the creation of districts whose predominant purpose is racial is unconstitutional. This controversial new cause of action threw into question the extent to which race-based redistricting, even as a remedy for minority vote dilution, is permissible. Courts have subsequently required that several majority–minority districts be redrawn.

The Shaw cases appear to respond to a growing chorus of criticism of the act's second-generation phase—criticism holding that federal intervention in redistricting to prevent minority vote dilution is either no longer needed or inevitably leads to proportional representation of minority groups, the right to which is expressly denied under section 2 of the VRA. Critics of Shaw fear that because of extensive racially polarized voting in the South and Southwest, the number of black and Hispanic officeholders there will decline.

CHANDLER DAVIDSON
(2000)

Bibliography

DAVIDSON, CHANDLER, and GROFMAN BERNARD, eds. 1994 Quiet Revolution in the South: The Impact of the Voting Rights Act 1965–1990. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

GUINIER, LANI 1994 The Tyranny of the Majority: Fundamental Fairness in Representative Democracy. New York: Free Press.

ISSACHAROFF, SAMUEL; KARLAN, PAMELA S., and PILDES, RICHARD H. 1998 The Law of Democracy: Legal Structure of the Political Process. Westbury, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

KOUSSER, J. MORGAN 1999 Colorblind Injustice: Minority Voting Rights and the Undoing of the Second Reconstruction. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

LUBLIN, DAVID 1997 The Paradox of Representation: Racial Gerrymandering and Minority Interests in Congress. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

PILDES, RICHARD H. 1995 The Politics of Race. Harvard Law Review 108:1359–1392.

THERNSTROM, ABIGAIL 1987 Whose Votes Count? Affirmative Action and Minority Voting Rights. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

VOUCHERS

Widespread discontent with public schools has precipitated demands that parents be given some choice about which school their children will attend. Several states have adopted laws affording parents some choice among public schools in their area. These laws have attracted few constitutional attacks. Many people argue that choice plans should be broadened to offer parents government vouchers redeemable at any accredited school, public or private, including religious, or parochial, schools. Supporters of this approach cite as a model the GI Bill, under which the federal government pays certain expenses of military veterans to attend any accredited college.

Proponents contend that vouchers will produce better education, especially for poor and minority students who often fare poorly in public schools. They cite the superior performance of private-school students. They also believe that public schools would be shaken out of the complacency induced by their monopoly on state funding and prodded to do better by competition from private schools. Further, proponents want parents to be able to choose for their children an education consistent with their values, whether religiously based or not. Opponents of vouchers deny that private schools generally provide a better education; they ascribe any superior performance to private schools' "skimming the cream" by taking better students. They also question whether public schools would benefit from increased competition. They feel that vouchers would lead to further skimming of the cream, leaving public schools to handle the most difficult students.

Critics further assert that voucher plans would be unconstitutional. They fear that vouchers would exacerbate racial segregation in violation of EQUAL PROTECTION as interpreted in BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954, 1955). They also argue that vouchers redeemed at parochial schools would constitute GOVERNMENT AID TO RELIGIOUS IN-STITUTIONS and an unconstitutional ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION.

Defenders respond that vouchers would not worsen school segregation, which is already widespread, but that if they did, this effect would result from individual choices, not from STATE ACTION, which is necessary to invoke the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Moreover, segregative effects could be avoided by requiring participating schools to meet certain standards of racial composition in admissions procedures. Defenders also deny that vouchers would establish religion. Pointing again to the GI Bill, they see vouchers merely giving parents a choice in obtaining a service that the government subsidizes for secular reasons; any benefit to religious institutions is incidental and thus of no constitutional concern. Critics reply that even an indirect benefit is an unlawful establishment.

No state has yet adopted a true voucher program, although a few have proposed limited programs for low-income children. Confused and conflicting Supreme Court pronouncements on aid to religious schools preclude any prediction of how the Court would handle the issue. Quite possibly, vouchers could be upheld for the same reasons that the GI Bill is considered constitutional, especially if steps were taken to avoid racial segregation. Some kind of voucher program might even be necessary to accommodate children with religious objections to what is taught in public schools.

GEORGE W. DENT
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Establishment Clause; Religion in Public Schools; Religious Fundamentalism; School Choice.)

Bibliography

NOWAK, JOHN E. 1976 The Supreme Court, the Religion Clauses, and the Nationalization of Education. Northwestern University Law Review 70:883–909.

W

WABASH, ST. LOUIS & PACIFIC RAILWAY v. ILLINOIS
118 U.S. 557 (1886)

Tremendous growth in a national railroad network after the CIVIL WAR led to increasingly scandalous and harmful abuses. State efforts to control the problems were generally ineffective until Munn v. Illinois (1877). In that case, Chief Justice MORRISON R. WAITE allowed state regulation of railroads where Congress had not yet acted, "even though it may indirectly affect" those outside the state. Illinois had attempted to curb one area of abuse by forbidding LONG HAUL-SHORT HAUL DISCRIMINATION. So pervasive was this evil that it would be outlawed later in the INTERSTATE COMMERCE and MANN-ELKINS ACTS. The state sued the Wabash company to prevent it from charging more for shorter hauls; because significant portions of most long hauls lay outside Illinois, the issue lay in the constitutionality of a state regulation of INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

A 6–3 Supreme Court struck down the Illinois statute, undercutting the decisions in the GRANGER CASES (1877) without impairing the DOCTRINE of AFFECTATION WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST. Justice SAMUEL F. MILLER looked to the COMMERCE CLAUSE as securing a "freedom of commerce" across the country. The imposition, by individual states, of varying patterns of rates and regulations on interstate commerce was "oppressive" and rendered the commerce clause a "very feeble and almost useless provision." Miller then relied on the decision in COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS OF PHILADELPHIA (1851) to declare that such regulation was clearly national, not local, in character even though Congress had not yet acted. In so doing, he altered the thrust of the Cooley test by examining the impact of state regulation on the nation instead of on the subjects involved. Miller concluded that "it is not, and never has been, the deliberate opinion of a majority of this court that a statute of a state which attempts to regulate the fare and charges by railroad companies [affecting interstate commerce] is a valid law."

Justices Horace Gray, Joseph P. Bradley, and Chief Justice Waite dissented, contending that the Granger Cases should have ruled the decision here. Citing WILLSON V. BLACK BIRD CREEK MARSH COMPANY (1829), Gray and his colleagues argued that "in the absence of congressional legislation to the contrary, [the railroads] are not only susceptible of state regulation, but properly amenable to it." They recited the litany of rights and powers granted the railroads by the state: "its being, its franchises, its powers, its road, its right to charge" all confirmed the state's right to regulate the road. The dissenters asserted that the Illinois statute affected interstate commerce only "incidentally" and not adversely. Subject to future congressional action, they would have affirmed the state action.

This decision effectively created a vacuum—Congress had not acted and the states were forbidden to act or even to control intrastate abuses. Together with an increasingly powerful reform movement, Wabash helped contribute to the passage of the Interstate Commerce Act in 1887, creating the first national regulatory body.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

WADE, UNITED STATES v.
388 U.S. 218 (1967)

Wade's conviction of bank robbery depended heavily on the identification of him as the robber by two bank employees. After he was indicted and counsel appointed for him, the FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION arranged a LINEUP, which included Wade and five or six other people. Wade's counsel was not notified of the procedure; neither he nor anyone else representing Wade's interests was present.

The Supreme Court held that the lineup was a "critical stage" of the proceedings; thus, the Sixth Amendment guarantees a right to the presence of counsel at the pretrial identification if evidence of the lineup were to be used at the trial. The Court reasoned that counsel was necessary at this early stage in order to assure the fairness of the trial itself. The two premises were that eyewitness identification is treacherously subject to mistake, and that police methods in obtaining identifications are often and easily unduly suggestive. If a lawyer has been present at the lineup, later, at the trial, by his questioning of the eyewitnesses he will be able to show how any irregularities have tainted the in-court identification of the defendant.

Wade established a per se rule: if counsel is absent at the pretrial confrontation, the government may not use EVIDENCE that such an event happened. Whether the witness can nevertheless make an in-court identification depends on whether the unfair procedure tainted his present ability to identify: if he had not seen the uncounseled lineup, would he still be able to pick out the defendant?

Finally, the Court suggested that the pretrial confrontation might not be a "critical stage" if other methods were developed to assure against the risk of irreparable mistaken identification. In KIRBY V. ILLINOIS (1972) the Court restricted the holding in Wade to lineups held after defendants have been formally charged with crime.

BARBARA ALLEN BABCOCK
(1986)

WADE-DAVIS BILL
(July 2, 1864)

Republicans worried that under LINCOLN'S PLAN OF RECONSTRUCTION (December 8, 1863), the old state leadership might reverse emancipation. On July 2, 1864, Ohio's Senator Benjamin Wade and Maryland's Representative Henry Winter Davis passed a state-restoration bill that emphasized emancipation's permanence and equalized freedmen's CIVIL RIGHTS.

Their bill, implementing the Constitution's guarantee to each state of a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT (Article IV, section 4), authorized the President to appoint a provisional governor for each conquered state. When a majority of white male citizens swore future loyalty to the Union, the governor was to initiate a CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION. Each new CONSTITUTION must incorporate emancipation, disfranchise high Confederates, and repudiate Confederate debts; then a majority of state voters, the President, and Congress must approve each constitution, and elections could proceed. State laws were to prevail excepting those on slavery. Criminal laws were to apply equally to whites and blacks.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, unwilling to upset Arkansas's and Louisiana's progress under his 1863 policy, pocket-vetoed the bill. Advocating an abolition constitutional amendment to insure the legitimacy of emancipation, Lincoln suggested that Wade-Davis procedures, though vetoed, were satisfactory.

An election impended. If reelected, Lincoln would serve until 1869. His educability on race was outstanding. Almost all Republicans, including Wade and Davis, supported him. Had Lincoln signed their bill, it would have committed his successor to equal state justice for all residents.

HAROLD M. HYMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

HYMAN, HAROLD M. 1963 A More Perfect Union: The Impact of the Civil War and Reconstruction on the Constitution. Chap. 16. New York: Knopf.

WAGNER ACT
49 Stat. 449 (1935)

Named after the New York senator who introduced and fought for it, the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) extended the protection of the United States to organized labor. Robert Wagner framed the act to provide a constitutional basis for the protections given to labor by section 7(a) of the NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT (NIRA) and by a National Labor Relations Board, which had been established and was operating under the sole authority of Public Resolution 44 and an EXECUTIVE ORDER. The Supreme Court confirmed the need for new legislation when, eleven days after the NLRA's enactment, it voided the NIRA in SCHECHTER POULTRY CORP. V. UNITED STATES (1935).

Congress based the Wagner Act on the COMMERCE CLAUSE: the denial by employers of employees' rights to organize and bargain collectively caused "strikes and other forms of industrial strife or unrest, which have the intent or necessary effect of burdening or obstructing [interstate] commerce." Congress added that unequal bargaining positions had exacerbated national economic instability. One section of the act guaranteed employees the right to organize, "to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing," and to act together to further these ends. Another section reinforced these rights by delineating employers' obligations; it defined and prohibited "unfair labor practices," including interference with the exercise of the above-mentioned rights, or discrimination to encourage or discourage union formation, administration, or membership. This section also outlawed discrimination against an employee for filing a complaint against his employer under the act and made it illegal to refuse to bargain collectively with a union's legal representative.

The act also provided for a National Labor Relations Board with broad supervisory powers to administer its provisions. The Board could issue complaints, hear and determine charges, and issue CEASE-AND-DESIST ORDERS which were enforceable upon application to federal circuit courts. Congress further empowered the board to hold representation elections and to certify the winner.

Wagner drafted the act carefully so that it would withstand scrutiny by the Supreme Court. Section 1—outlining the NLRA's policy—was rewritten after the decision in Schechter to specify the burdens placed upon INTERSTATE COMMERCE by labor unrest. The act's policy statement attributed that discord to the denial of workers' rights which this act would secure. Wagner's diligence paid off. A 5–4 majority of the Court upheld the NLRA in NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation (1937). (See WAGNER ACT CASES.) The Wagner Act provided for strong independent unions in an effort to promote COLLECTIVE BARGAINING. By thus indirectly stimulating higher wages and increased consumer demand, the act helped guarantee a stable national economy and social justice for American labor. The TAFT-HARTLEY LABOR MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT, passed in 1947 partly to plug loopholes in the NLRA, governed union conduct much as employers' actions had earlier been regulated.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

MILLIS, HARRY A. and BROWN, EMILY C. 1950 From the Wagner Act to Taft-Hartley: A Study of National Labor Policy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

TAYLOR, BENJAMIN J. and WITNEY, FRED (1970) 1975 Labor Relations Law, 2nd ed. Pages 134–199. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall.

WAGNER ACT CASES

NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp.
301 U.S. 1 (1937)
NLRB v. Fruehauf Trailer Co.
301 U.S. 49 (1937)
NLRB v. Friedman-Harry Marks Clothing Co.
301 U.S. 58 (1937)
Associated Press Co. v. NLRB
301 U.S. 103 (1937)

The reinvigoration of the COMMERCE CLAUSE as a source of congressional power began with the first cases to reach the Supreme Court under the WAGNER (NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS) ACT. That statute had been passed in 1935 in an effort to preserve the rights of employees in interstate industries to choose their own representatives and to bargain collectively with their employers. In 1930 the Supreme Court had held that the Railway Labor Act gave such rights to railroad employees. The NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT (NIRA) of 1933 sought to extend such rights to other employees by requiring all codes of fair competition for other industries to contain similar provisions. The code system collapsed when the NIRA was invalidated in SCHECHTER POULTRY CORP. V. UNITED STATES in May 1935. The President and Congress believed that the denial of COLLECTIVE BARGAINING rights would lead to industrial unrest and strikes, which would necessarily obstruct INTERSTATE COMMERCE, and would also aggravate the Great Depression by depressing wage rates and the purchasing power of wage earners. As a result the National Labor Relations Act became law less than six weeks after the Schechter decision.

The act authorized the newly created National Labor Relations Board (NLRB), which succeeded similar boards created under the NIRA, to prevent employers from engaging in unfair labor practices "affecting [interstate] commerce," which was defined to mean "in commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce," or which had led or might lead to a labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce. These definitions were designed to embody the decisional law upholding the authority of Congress to regulate acts that "directly" obstructed interstate commerce. Congress assumed, correctly as it turned out, that the courts would construe the statute as "contemplating the exercise of control within constitutional bounds."

The NLRB's first cases were brought against employers engaged in interstate transportation and communication (bus lines and the Associated Press) and manufacturers who purchased their supplies and sold their products across state lines. Before these cases were decided, the Supreme Court, in CARTER V. CARTER COAL CO. (1936), held that the substantially identical provisions of the Guffey-Snyder (Bituminous Coal Conservation) Act, enacted shortly after the Labor Relations Act, did not fall within the commerce power of Congress. In the Carter case the government had proved that coal strikes would burden not merely the interstate commerce of the immediate employers but also the interstate rail system and many other industries dependent upon coal. No stronger showing could be made under the Wagner Act for employers engaged in mining or manufacturing. As was to be expected, the courts of appeals, though sustaining the act as to companies engaged in interstate transportation and communication, deemed themselves bound by Carter, as well as Schechter and UNITED STATES V. BUTLER (1936) to hold that the act did not extend to manufacturers.

The first five NLRB cases to reach the Supreme Court involved a bus line, the Associated Press, and three manufacturers. The cases were argued together, beginning on February 8, 1937. Three days before, President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT had announced his plan to appoint up to six new Supreme Court Justices, one for each justice over 70 years of age. On April 12, the Court affirmed the NLRB's rulings in all five cases. The opinions on the commerce clause issue in the bus and press cases were unanimous, although in the press case, four Justices dissented on FIRST AMENDMENT grounds. The cases against manufacturers—the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, the Fruehauf Trailer Co., and a medium-size men's clothing manufacturer—were decided by a 5–4 vote. The membership of the Court had not changed since Schechter and Carter. But Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES and Justice OWEN ROBERTS, who had been part of the majority of six who had rejected the labor relations provisions of the Guffey Act in Carter, now joined with Justices LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, HARLAN FISKE STONE, and BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO. The Chief Justice wrote the opinions in the manufacturers' cases.

In the Carter case, the majority opinion of Justice GEORGE SUTHERLAND had not denied the magnitude of the effect of coal strikes upon interstate commerce. The question, he held, was whether the effect was "direct," and that did not turn upon the "extent of the effect" or its "magnitude," but "entirely upon the manner in which the effect has been brought about"; "it connotes the absence of an efficient intervening agency or condition." The effect must "operate proximately—not mediately, remotely, or collaterally." Why "direct" should be so defined was not otherwise explained, except by the need for preserving the power of the states over PRODUCTION, even in interstate industries in which interstate competition would preclude state regulation. (See EFFECTS ON COMMERCE.)

The opinion of Chief Justice Hughes in the Jones & Laughlin case flatly rejected the Butler approach:

> Giving full weight to respondent's contention with respect to a break in the complete continuity of the "STREAM OF COMMERCE" by reason of respondent's manufacturing operations, the fact remains that the stoppage of those operations by industrial strife would have a most serious effect upon interstate commerce. In view of respondent's far-flung activities, it is idle to say that the effect would be indirect or remote. It is obvious that it would be immediate and might be catastrophic. We are asked to shut our eyes to the plainest facts of our national life and to deal with the question of direct and indirect effects in an intellectual vacuum. . . . When industries organize themselves on a national scale, making their relation to interstate commerce the dominant factor in their activities, how can it be maintained that their industrial labor relations constitute a forbidden field into which Congress may not enter when it is necessary to protect interstate commerce from the paralyzing consequences of industrial war? We have often said that interstate commerce itself is a practical conception. It is equally true that interferences with that commerce must be appraised by a judgment that does not ignore actual experience.

The Chief Justice also met head on the argument that the federal power did not extend to activities in the course of production or manufacturing. Citing many antitrust cases, he declared: "The close and intimate effect which brings the subject within the reach of Federal power may be due to activities in relation to productive industry although the industry when separately viewed is local. . . . It is thus apparent that the fact that the employees here concerned were engaged in production is not determinative."

"The fundamental principle," Hughes stated, "is that the power to regulate commerce is the power to enact 'all appropriate legislation' for "its protection and advancement'; to adopt measures "to promote its growth and insure its safety'; "to foster, protect, control and restrain.' That power is plenary and may be exerted to protect interstate commerce "no matter what the source of the dangers which threatened it." Hughes also invoked the SHREVEPORT DOCTRINE he had announced in HOUSTON EAST AND WEST TEXAS RAILWAY V. UNITED STATES (1914): "Although activities may be intrastate in character when separately considered, if they have such a close and substantial relation to interstate commerce that their control is essential or appropriate to protect that commerce from burdens and obstructions, Congress cannot be denied the power to exercise that control."

In deference to his own opinion in Schechter, the Chief Justice declared that "undoubtedly the scope of this power must be considered in the light of our dual system of government" so as not to "obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local." In Schechter the effect upon commerce had been too "remote"; "to find "immediacy or directness' there was to find it "almost everywhere', a result inconsistent with the maintenance of our Federal system." With little explanation Hughes added that Carter was "not controlling."

Within a few weeks the Court sustained the constitutionality of the SOCIAL SECURITY ACT. Soon after Justices WILLIS VAN DEVANTER and Sutherland retired. And President Roosevelt's court-packing plan, not very surprisingly, got nowhere.

Subsequent Labor Board cases extended the application of the Labor Act far beyond the three manufacturers in the center of the interstate movement; it was sufficient that a strike would interfere with interstate movement of products (for example, Santa Cruz Fruit Packing Co. v. NLRB, 1938; NLRB v. Fainblatt, 1939; Consolidated Edison Co. v. NLRB, 1938). The unanimous opinion of the Court speaking through Justice Stone, with Hughes and Roberts still on the bench, in UNITED STATES V. DARBY (1941) explicitly rejected the concept that the Tenth Amendment limited the powers granted Congress by the Constitution. And other cases by now have extended the commerce power "almost everywhere." Nevertheless, the opinion in Jones & Laughlin remains a landmark in the interpretation of the commerce clause, as the definitive acceptance of the modern theories which recognize the power of Congress to control all aspects of the nation's integrated economic system.

ROBERT L. STERN
(1986)

Bibliography

CORTNER, RICHARD C. 1964 The Wagner Act Cases. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press.

——— 1970 The Jones & Laughlin Case. New York: Knopf.

DODD, E. MERRICK 1945 The Supreme Court and Organized Labor, 1941–1945. Harvard Law Review 58:1018–1071.

GROSS, JAMES A. 1974 The Making of the National Labor Relations Board: A Study in Economics, Politics, and the Law, Vol. 1 (1933–1937). Albany: State University of New York Press.

STERN, ROBERT L. 1946 The Commerce Clause and the National Economy, 1933–1946. Harvard Law Review 59:645–693, 888–947.

WAINWRIGHT v. SYKES
433 U.S. 72 (1977)

In Sykes the ADEQUATE STATE GROUND bar to federal HABEAS CORPUS, buried in FAY V. NOIA (1963), was unearthed and returned to service with little more than a coat of paint for disguise. Noia had held that a state prisoner was not barred from seeking federal habeas corpus relief merely because the applicant had failed to raise his or her federal constitutional claim in the earlier state proceeding as required by state law. Noia was attacked within the Supreme Court and by some scholars for sacrificing finality of decision. State judges trumpeted their resentment at giving federal district courts the last word in the state criminal process.

Sykes was the culmination of the attack on Noia from within the Court. A state prisoner sought federal habeas corpus, arguing that his rights to a warning under MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) had been violated when his statement was admitted into EVIDENCE at his state trial. He had not objected when the evidence was offered, as state law required. The Supreme Court held, 7–2, that federal habeas corpus was barred.

Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, for the majority, announced that failure to raise a federal constitutional claim in the manner required by state law bars resort to federal habeas corpus unless the applicant shows "cause" for the procedural default and "prejudice" from the forfeiture of the federal claim. Defendant had asserted no cause for the absence of timely objection, and prejudice was negated by other evidence of his guilt, independent of his statement.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

WAITE, MORRISON R.
(1816–1888)

Morrison Remick Waite, sixth CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States, successfully led the Supreme Court in dealing with major constitutional problems concerning RECONSTRUCTION and business-government relations between 1874 and 1888.

Son of Henry Matson Waite, Chief Justice of the Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors, Morrison Waite read law after graduating from Yale College in 1837. In 1838 he removed to Ohio, where he built a flourishing legal practice specializing in commercial law, acquired substantial property interests, and joined the Whig party. Although prominent in the legal profession, Waite was virtually unknown in national affairs prior to his appointment as Chief Justice. He served one term in the Ohio legislature and a term on the Toledo city council, was appointed counsel to the Geneva Tribunal to negotiate the Alabama claims in 1872, and was elected president of the Ohio CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION of 1873.

The circumstances of Waite's appointment to the Court were remarkable, not so much because he lacked national political recognition as because he was the fifth person whom President ULYSSES S. GRANT nominated or asked to serve as Chief Justice. Yet Waite had early been touted for the position by leading Ohio politicians, and Grant had considered him a possibility from the beginning. His effective service at the Geneva Arbitration, professional reputation, and unwavering Republican party loyalty recommended him, and in January 1874 the Senate confirmed him by a 63–0 vote.

Waite's significance in American constitutional history is threefold. He wrote the first Supreme Court opinions interpreting the FOURTEENTH and FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS in cases involving Negroes' CIVIL RIGHTS. Second, his 1877 opinions in Munn v. Illinois and the other GRANGER CASES established the basic principles of constitutional law governing state governments as they attempted to deal with economic changes caused by the industrial revolution. Third, Waite expressed a conception of JUDICIAL REVIEW that summarized dominant nineteenth-century ideas about constitutional adjudication and provided a model for twentieth-century theorists of judicial restraint.

The northern retreat from RECONSTRUCTION was well underway when Waite became Chief Justice, and the WAITE COURT did not attempt to reverse this political development. Under the circumstances, and given the circumscribed role of the judiciary in nineteenth-century constitutional politics, it had little choice but to acquiesce. In determining the meaning of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments and in applying federal civil rights laws, however, the Court could choose among several possible conceptions of national legislative power and federal-state relations. Waite guided the Court toward a moderate position of STATES' RIGHTS nationalism which upheld national power to protect civil rights within the framework of traditional FEDERALISM.

To understand this development it is necessary to advert to the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873) and to Justice JOSEPH P. BRADLEY's circuit court opinion in UNITED STATES V. CRUIKSHANK (1874). In the former, the Supreme Court confirmed the theory of dual American CITIZENSHIP, stated that the Fourteenth Amendment did not add to the rights of national citizenship, and concluded that ordinary civil rights were attributes of state citizenship, regulation of which was beyond the authority of the United States. In the Cruikshank case, involving prosecution of whites in Colfax, Louisiana, for violating the civil rights of Negro citizens, Justice Bradley held that although the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited state rather than private denial of civil rights, under certain conditions the federal government was authorized to guarantee civil rights against interference by private individuals. The relevant circumstance, according to Bradley, was state failure to fulfill its affirmative duty to protect citizens' rights.

Chief Justice Waite wrote the majority opinion when United States v. Cruikshank (1876) was decided in the Supreme Court. Defendants were indicted under a section of the Force Act of 1870 that declared it a federal crime for two or more persons to deprive any citizen of rights secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. Like Bradley in the CIRCUIT COURT, Waite found numerous flaws in the INDICTMENTS and on that ground ordered the defendants to be discharged, thus frustrating the federal civil rights enforcement effort. Nevertheless, Waite asserted national authority to enforce civil rights.

The Chief Justice followed the Slaughterhouse opinion in positing separate federal and state citizenships and in stating that the federal government could protect only those rights placed within its JURISDICTION. He held further that the FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY, which the defendants were charged with violating, was a right of state rather than federal citizenship. The indictment, however, had incorrectly stated that denial of freedom of assembly by private persons was a federal crime within the meaning of the Force Act; therefore the indictment was invalid. Yet federal authority was not nugatory in civil rights matters. Waite pointed out that if the indictment had charged a violation of the right to assemble in order to petition the national government, it would have been proper under the act. Thus in protecting a federal right national authority was putatively effective against private individuals as well as states. Waite furthermore asserted an indirect federal power to protect rights of state citizenship against both state and private interference. The ordinary right of assembly was a state right, said Waite, over which "no direct power" was granted to Congress. This appeared to mean that if states failed to uphold civil rights within their jurisdiction, the federal government could provide the needed protection. Finally Waite noted that the indictments did not allege that the full and equal benefit of laws for the protection of whites was denied to blacks on account of race; accordingly the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866 was not in point. The implication was that if a racially discriminatory purpose had been alleged, federal authority under the 1866 law could have been employed against private as well as against state denial of rights.

Waite also gave the opinion in UNITED STATES V. REESE (1876), the first Supreme Court case involving Fifteenth Amendment VOTING RIGHTS. State officials in Kentucky were indicted for refusing to accept the vote of a Negro citizen. Again the Court ruled against the federal government. Waite declared two provisions of the Force Act of 1870 unconstitutional because they did not in express terms limit the offense of state officials to denial of the right to vote on account of color. Insisting on the need for STRICT CONSTRUCTION of criminal statutes, he interpreted the act in a strained and technical manner as preventing any wrongful interference with voting rights, rather than simply interferences that were racially motivated. The Fifteenth Amendment authorized the federal government to deal only with the latter. It did not, said Waite, secure the right to vote, but only the right not to be discriminated against in voting on racial grounds. Observing that "Congress has not as yet provided by "appropriate legislation' for the punishment of the offense charged in the indictment," Waite in effect invited Republican lawmakers to enact a more tightly drawn enforcement act.

Waite's personal sympathies were enlisted in efforts to assist Negroes. As a trustee of the Peabody Fund in 1874 he signed a report endorsing a constitutional argument for federal aid to education, thus breaking the rule against extra-Court political involvement to which he scrupulously adhered throughout his judicial career. Although Waite accepted the abandonment of Reconstruction and held that Congress had no power "to do mere police duty in the States," his opinions nevertheless authorized federal interference against state and in some circumstances private denial of rights when racially motivated. In subsequent cases, most notably UNITED STATES V. HARRIS (1883), the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883), and EX PARTE YARBROUGH (1884), the Waite Court amplified the principles set forth in the Cruikshank and Reese cases.

In the sphere of government-business relations, Waite was sympathetic to regulatory legislation within a political and legal framework that encouraged industrial expansion and a national free trade area. In the early 1870s, in response to farmers' and merchants' demands for relief from high shipping costs, several midwestern states adopted legislation setting maximum railroad rates. These laws appeared to discourage further railroad construction, and within a few years most of them were repealed or modified. Nevertheless, in the landmark Granger Cases the Supreme Court ruled on the constitutionality of these regulatory measures.

Munn v. Illinois (1877), Waite's most famous opinion, sustained an 1871 Illinois law that established maximum rates for grain elevators. Waite based his approval of the legislation on a broad conception of the STATE POLICE POWER, which he said authorized states to regulate the use of private property "when such regulation becomes necessary for the public good." He rejected the contention that state regulation of the rates charged by ferries, common carriers, or bakers was a deprivation of property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Support for Waite's conclusion lay in numerous state COMMON LAW precedents asserting a public interest in certain kinds of property, such as lands bordering on watercourses, which were subject to government regulation. Like other judges in similar cases, and influenced by a memorandum prepared by Justice Bradley dealing with the instant case, Waite relied on a treatise of the seventeenth-century English judge Lord Chief Justice Sir Matthew Hale in asserting: "When property is "AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST, it ceases to be juris privati only." The grain elevator companies, Waite explained, exercised a virtual monopoly in the regional market structure; thus, they were affected with a public interest and subject to regulation by the state legislature. In the other Granger Cases Waite employed this principle to uphold state regulation of railroad rates.

Waite also approved state regulation of CORPORATIONS in a series of decisions that carried to a logical conclusion the principle by which the CONTRACT CLAUSE of the Constitution did not prevent state legislatures from reserving the power to alter charter grants. These cases included STONE V. MISSISSIPPI (1880), Ruggles v. Illinois (1883), and Spring Valley Water Works v. Schotteler (1883). This trend culminated in STONE V. FARMERS LOAN AND TRUST CO. (1886), known as the Railroad Commission Cases, in which Waite held that a state charter authorizing railroads to set reasonable rates did not divest a state of the power ultimately to determine what was a reasonable rate.

While generally approving regulatory legislation, Waite placed limitations on the POLICE POWER with a view toward protecting private property. In the Railroad Commission Cases he admonished: "This power to regulate is not a power to destroy; and limitation is not the equivalent of confiscation. Under pretence of regulating fares and freights the state cannot require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a TAKING of private property without due process of law." Rather than suggesting an irresistible tendency to accept the argument for SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS that was later adopted by the Supreme Court, these and similar dicta indicate that Waite, like Justice STEPHEN J. FIELD who dissented in Munn and the other Granger cases, believed the essential constitutional problem in cases involving government-business relations was to determine the extent of the police power. Shortly after the Munn decision Waite wrote: "The great difficulty in the future will be to establish the boundary between that which is private, and that in which the public has an interest."

Waite epitomized nineteenth-century thinking about the nature of the judicial function and the power of judicial review. He believed the judiciary should play a subordinate role in public-policy making, and should especially defer to the political branches in questions concerning the reasonableness of legislation. His clearest and most forceful expression of this view appeared in Munn v. Illinois when he stated: "For us the question is one of power, not of expediency. If no state of circumstances could justify such a statute, then we may declare this one void, because in excess of the legislative power of the States. But if it could we must presume it did. Of the propriety of legislative interference within the scope of legislative power, the legislature is the exclusive judge." Waite acknowledged that legislative power might be abused. But "[f]or protection against abuses by legislatures," he observed, "the people must resort to the polls, not to the courts."

Waite effectively balanced the competing demands of state and federal authority as constitutional equilibrium was restored after the end of Reconstruction. In addition to the decisions already noted, he wrote the opinions in Louisiana v. Jumel (1882) and New Hampshire v. Louisiana (1882), both of which held that the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT prevented suits by bondholders attempting to force a state government to redeem its bonds. These decisions expressed the political logic of the COMPROMISE OF 1877 and marked a significant broadening of states' SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY under the Eleventh Amendment. In another notable case involving state power and women's rights, MINOR V. HAPPERSETT (1875), Waite adhered to a narrow interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment in deciding that the right to vote was not an attribute of federal citizenship and that states could regulate the suffrage as they saw fit.

On the other hand, Waite upheld federal authority in the controversial SINKING FUND CASES (1879) and in PENSACOLA TELEGRAPH CO. V. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. (1878). In the former, the Court confirmed the constitutionality of an act of Congress requiring the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railroads to set aside money from current income for the subsequent payment of its mortgage debts. In the latter case the Court upheld the rights of an interstate telegraph company operating under authority of an act of Congress against the rights of a company acting under a state charter. Waite also voted to strike down state tax legislation when it interfered with INTERSTATE COMMERCE, although he was less inclined than his colleagues to regard STATE TAXATION OF COMMERCE in this light.

Overcoming the resentment of several Justices who had aspired to the Chief Justiceship, Waite performed the administrative and other tasks of his position with great skill. In a larger political sense he was also a successful judicial statesman. During his tenure, as at few times in American constitutional history, the Supreme Court was remarkably free of congressional criticism. Waite achieved this success by confining JUDICIAL POLICYMAKING within limits approved by the nation's representative political institutions and public opinion.

HERMAN BELZ
(1986)

Bibliography

BENEDICT, MICHAEL LES 1979 Preserving Federalism: Reconstruction and the Waite Court. Supreme Court Review 1978: 39–79.

FRANTZ, LAUREN B. 1964 Congressional Power to Enforce the Fourteenth Amendment Against Private Acts. Yale Law Journal 73:1352–1384.

MAGRATH, PETER C. 1963 Morrison R. Waite: The Triumph of Character. New York: Macmillan.

SCHEIBER, HARRY N. 1971 The Road to Munn: Eminent Domain and the Concept of Public Purpose in the State Courts. Perspectives in American History 5:329–402.

TRIMBLE, BRUCE R. 1938 Chief Justice Waite: Defender of the Public Interest. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

WAITE COURT
(1874–1888)

A new age of American constitutional law was at hand when MORRISON R. WAITE became CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States in 1874. Not only had the CIVIL WAR discredited many antebellum glosses on the "old" Constitution, consisting of the venerable document framed in 1787 and the twelve amendments adopted during the early republic, but it had also generated a "new" Constitution consisting of the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, and the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT. The range of choices at the Court's disposal was virtually unlimited as it reconstituted the old organic law and integrated the new. CHARLES SUMNER said it best just four years before Waite took the Court's helm. The tumultuous events of 1861–1869, he exclaimed, had transformed the Constitution into "molten wax" ready for new impression. An extraordinarily homogeneous group of men made this impression. Of the fourteen associate Justices who sat with Waite between 1874 and his death in 1888, only NATHAN CLIFFORD had been appointed by a Democrat and all but two—SAMUEL F. MILLER and JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, both of Kentucky—had been born in the free states. All of them were Protestants. Thus the Republican party, which had subdued the South and created the "new" Constitution, had also reconstructed the federal judiciary. As the Waite Court proceeded to refashion the structure of American constitutional law, its work ineluctably reflected the values, aspirations, and fears that had animated the Republican party's northern Protestant constituency since the 1850s.

Fierce opposition to state SOVEREIGNTY concepts was a core element of Republican belief from the party's very inception. Republicans asociated state sovereignty with proslavery constitutionalism in the 1850s, with SECESSION in 1861, and ultimately with the tragic war both engendered. Waite and his colleagues shared this aversion to state sovereignty dogma and repeatedly expressed it in controversies involving the IMPLIED POWERS of Congress under the "old" Constitution. In case after case the Court resisted limitations on federal power derived from state sovereignty premises and held, in effect, that Congress's authority to enact statutes deemed NECESSARY AND PROPER for the ENUMERATED POWERS had the same scope under the Constitution as it would if the states did not exist. On several occasions the Court even revived the idea that Congress might exercise any power inherent in national sovereignty as long as it was not specifically prohibited by the Constitution. This doctrine, first expounded by Federalist congressmen during debate on the Sedition Act of 1798, had been regarded as "exploded" by most antebellum statesmen. But its revival after the Civil War did have a certain logic. If there was one impulse that every member of the Waite Court had in common, it was the urge to extirpate every corollary of "southern rights" theory from American constitutional law and to confirm the national government's authority to exercise every power necessary to maintain its existence.

The revival of the implied powers doctrine began in the often overlooked case of Kohl v. United States (1876). There counsel challenged Congress's authority to take private property in Cincinnati as a site for public buildings on the ground that the Constitution sanctioned federal exercise of the EMINENT DOMAIN power only in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. Article I, section 8, vested Congress with authority to acquire land elsewhere "for the erection of forts . . . and other needful buildings" only "by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be." This was by no means a novel argument. JAMES MADISON and JAMES MONROE had pointed to the national government's lack of a general eminent domain power when vetoing INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT bills, and proslavery theorists had invoked the same principle as a bar to compensated emancipation and colonization schemes. In Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan (1845), moreover, the TANEY COURT had said that "the United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain within the limits of a State or elsewhere, except in the cases in which it is expressly granted." But WILLIAM STRONG, speaking for the Court in Kohl, refused to take this doctrine "seriously." Congress's war, commerce, and postal powers necessarily included the right to acquire property for forts, lighthouses, and the like. "If the right to acquire property for such uses be made a barren right by the unwillingness of property holders to sell, or by the action of a State prohibiting a sale to the Federal Government," Strong explained, "the constitutional grants of power may be rendered nugatory. . . . This cannot be." Congress's eminent domain power must be implied, Strong concluded, for commentators on the law of nations had always regarded it as "the offspring of political necessity, and . . . inseparable from sovereignty."

HORACE GRAY sounded the same theme in the Legal Tender Cases (Juilliard v. Greenman, 1884), where the Court sustained Congress's authority to emit legal tender notes even in peacetime. With only STEPHEN J. FIELD dissenting, Gray asserted that because the power to make government paper a legal tender was "one of the powers belonging to sovereignty in other civilized nations, and not expressly withheld from Congress by the Constitution," it was unquestionably "an appropriate means, conducive and plainly adapted" to the execution of Congress's power to borrow money. In EX PARTE YARBROUGH (1884), decided the same day, the Court spoke the language of national sovereignty in an especially significant case. At issue there was the criminal liability of a Georgia man who had savagely beaten a black voter en route to cast his ballot in a federal election. The Court unanimously sustained the petitioner's conviction under the 1870 CIVIL RIGHTS ACT, which made it a federal crime to "injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States." It did so on the ground that Congress's duty "to provide in an ELECTION held under its authority, for security of life and limb to the voter" arose not from its interest in the victim's rights so much as "from the necessity of the government itself." Samuel F. Miller explained that Congress's power to regulate the time, place, and manner of holding federal elections, conferred in Article I, section 4, implied a "power to pass laws for the free, pure, and safe exercise" of the suffrage. "But it is a waste of time," he added, "to seek for specific sources to pass these laws. . . . If this government is anything more than a mere aggregation of delegated agents of other States and governments, each of which is superior to the general government, it must have the power to protect the elections on which its existence depends from violence and corruption."

The Court's decisions in Kohl, Juilliard, and Yarbrough merely jettisoned antebellum canons of STRICT CONSTRUCTION. They did not impair the autonomy of state governments. The eminent domain power of the several states was not threatened by Kohl, the Constitution expressly prohibited the states from making anything but gold and silver a legal tender, and Yarbrough did not jeopardize Georgia's power to prosecute political assassins for assault or murder. Yet the Waite Court was as quick to defend exercises of Congress's powers in situations where counsel claimed that the states' autonomy was in jeopardy as in cases where their reserved powers remained unimpaired. Ex parte Siebold (1880) was the leading case in point. There the Court sustained a conviction for ballot stuffing under the 1871 ENFORCEMENT ACT, which made it a federal crime for any state official at a congressional election to neglect duties required of him by either state or federal law. Counsel for the petitioner argued that in PRIGG V. PENNSYLVANIA (1842) and Kentucky v. Dennison (1861) the Taney Court had held that the principle of divided sovereignty precluded acts of Congress compelling the cooperation of state officials in the execution of national law. "We cannot yield to such a transcendental view of State sovereignty," JOSEPH BRADLEY proclaimed for the Court in Siebold. "As a general rule," he said, "it is no doubt expedient and wise that the operations of the State and National Governments should, as far as practicable, be conducted separately, in order to avoid undue jealousies and jars." But the Constitution neither mandated an immutable boundary between spheres of federal and state power nor restricted Congress's choice of means in implementing its enumerated authority to regulate federal elections.

The Court's constitutional nationalism did have limits. Like most Republicans of the age, Waite and his colleagues resisted the idea of centralization with as much ardor as the concept of state sovereignty. They regarded the national government's competence as deriving from the powers specified in the Constitution or fairly implied from it; the residual powers of government, usually called "internal police," belonged exclusively to the several states. Thus decisions like Kohl and Siebold, as Waite and his associates understood them, did not contract the ambit of state JURISDICTION. Rather the court simply refused to recognize implied limitations on the powers of Congress derived from state sovereignty premises. The Trade-Mark Cases (1879) underscored the Waite Court's allegiance to this view of the federal system. There a unanimous Court, speaking through Miller, held that Congress had no authority to enact a "universal system of trade-mark registration." Miller's method of analysis was more revealing than the result. His first impulse was to determine which sphere of government ordinarily had responsibility for such matters in the constitutional scheme. "As the property in trade-marks and the right to their exclusive use rest on the laws of the States, and like the great body of the rights of persons and of property, depend on them for security and protection," he explained, "the power of Congress to legislate on the subject . . . must be found in the Constitution of the United States, which is the source of all the powers the Congress can lawfully exercise." This two-tier method not only reified DUAL FEDERALISM but also put the burden of demonstrating Congress's authority to act on the government. In the Trade-Mark Cases it could not do so. Trade-marks lacked "the essential characteristics" of creative work in the arts and sciences, consequently the statute could not be sustained under the COPYRIGHT or PATENT powers. And the commerce power, though admittedly "broad," could not be construed as to permit federal regulation of commercial relations between persons residing in the same state.

When the Waite Court turned to cases involving the "new" Constitution, the instinct to conceptualize rights and powers in terms of dual federalism had fateful consequences. Beginning in UNITED STATES V. CRUIKSHANK (1876), the Court emasculated Congress's power "to enforce, by appropriate legislation," the rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. At issue was the validity of conspiracy convictions under the 1870 Civil Rights Act against a band of whites who had attacked a conclave of blacks in Grants Parish, Louisiana, killing from sixty to one hundred of them. The government claimed that the defendants had deprived the black citizens of their constitutional rights to hold a peaceful assembly, to bear arms, to vote, and to EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS safeguarding persons and property. The Court unanimously overturned the convictions. The CONSPIRACY law was not voided; indeed, the Court sustained a conviction under that very statute in Yarbrough. But Waite and his associates were determined to confine Congress's power to enact "appropriate legislation" in such a way to preserve what Miller called "the main features of the federal system." The Court had no choice in the matter, Joseph Bradley remarked on circuit in 1874, unless it was prepared "to clothe Congress with power to pass laws for the general preservation of social order in every State," or, in short, with a plenary power of "internal police."

Waite's opinion for the Court in Cruikshank contained two separate lines of argument. He began the first foray by pointing out that every American citizen "owes allegiance to two sovereigns, and claims protection from both." Because the two levels of government could protect the rights of citizens only "within their respective spheres," federal authorities could assert jurisdiction over perpetrators of violence only if the rights denied to victims were derived from the Constitution and laws of the United States. But in the SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873), decided ten months before Waite came to the Court, a majority of five had concluded that there were very few PRIVILEGES OR IMMUNITIES of national CITIZENSHIP and that the Fourteenth Amendment had not created any new ones. Fundamental rights of life, liberty, and property still rested upon the laws of the states, and citizens had to rely upon the states for the protection of those rights. Among the privileges of state citizenship, Waite explained in Cruikshank, were the rights to assemble, to bear arms, and to vote. Although guaranteed against infringement by Congress in the BILL OF RIGHTS, the rights to assemble and bear arms were not "granted by the Constitution" or "in any manner dependent upon that instrument for existence." The right to vote in state and local elections stood on the same footing because "the right to vote in the States comes from the States." The Fifteenth Amendment did give citizens a new right under the Constitution—exemption from RACIAL DISCRIMINATION when attempting to vote. Because the Grants Parish indictments did not aver that the defendants had prevented their victims "from exercising the right to vote on account of race," however, that count was as defective as the rest.

Waite's second line of argument in Cruikshank was designed to hold the votes of Joseph Bradley, Stephen J. Field, and NOAH SWAYNE. They had dissented in the Slaughterhouse Cases, claiming that the Fourteenth Amendment had been designed to reconstruct the federal system by creating a third sphere in the constitutional scheme—that of the individual whose FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS were now protected against unequal and discriminatory state laws. Waite satisfied them by stating what came to be known as the STATE ACTION doctrine. He not only conceded that "[t]he equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism" but strongly implied that the Fourteenth Amendment had nationalized this principle under the equal protection clause, if not the privileges or immunities clause. But the amendment, he added, "does not . . . add any thing to the rights which one citizen had under the Constitution against another." The very language of the amendment's first section—"No state shall . . ."—suggested that it must be read not as a grant of power to Congress but as a limitation on the states. It followed that the exercise of fundamental rights did not come under the Constitution's protection until jeopardized by the enactment or enforcement of a state law. "This the amendment guarantees, but no more," Waite declared. "The power of the national government is limited to the enforcement of this guaranty."

The principles announced in Cruikshank doomed the rest of Congress's CIVIL RIGHTS program, all of which had been based on the assumption that the "new" Constitution might be employed as a sword to protect any interference with fundamental rights. A voting rights statute went down in UNITED STATES V. REESE (1876) because Congress had failed to limit federal jurisdiction over state elections to the prevention of racially motivated fraud or dereliction; the antilynching provisions of the 1871 Civil Rights Act were invalidated for want of state action in UNITED STATES V. HARRIS (1883). One latent function of Cruikshank, however, was to draw renewed attention to the equal protection clause as a shield for blacks and other racial minorities whose civil rights were imperiled by discriminatory state laws. Soon the docket was crowded with such cases, and the Court was compelled to wrestle with longstanding ambiguities in the Republican party's commitment to racial equality.

Republicans had always been quick to defend equal rights in the market, for it was the rights to make contracts and own property that distinguished free people from slaves. But many Republicans regarded the idea of equality before the law as wholly compatible with legalized race prejudice in the social realm. Words like "nation" and "race" were not merely descriptive terms in the nineteenth century; they were widely understood as objective manifestations of natural communities, the integrity of which government had a duty to maintain. Thus most Republicans never accepted the proposition that blacks ought to be free to marry whites and many denied the right of blacks to associate with whites even in public places. The framers of the "new" Constitution had neither abjured this qualified view of equality not incorporated it into the Fourteenth Amendment. The discretion of Waite and his colleagues was virtually unfettered. They could weave prevailing prejudices into equal protection jurisprudence or they could interpret the equality concept broadly, declare that the "new" Constitution was color-blind, and put the Court's enormous prestige squarely behind the struggle for racial justice.

Exponents of racial equality were greatly encouraged by STRAUDER V. WEST VIRGINIA (1880), the case of first impression. There a divided Court reversed the murder conviction of a black defendant who had been tried under a statute that limited jury service to "white male persons." The Fourteenth Amendment, William Strong explained for the majority, "was designed to secure the colored race the enjoyment of all the civil rights that under the law are enjoyed by white persons." This formulation was acceptable even to the two dissenters. According to Stephen J. Field and Nathan Clifford, however, jury service was not a "civil right." It was a "political right." The only rights Congress intended to protect with the Fourteenth Amendment, they contended, were those enumerated in the Civil Rights Act of 1866—to own property, to make and enforce contracts, to sue and give evidence. The equal protection clause, Field said, "secures to all persons their civil rights upon the same terms; but it leaves political rights . . . and social rights . . . as they stood previous to its adoption." But the Strauder majority was unimpressed by Field's version of the "original understanding" and it set a face of flint against his typology of rights. "The Fourteenth Amendment makes no attempt to enumerate the rights it designed to protect," Strong declared. "It speaks in general terms, and those are as comprehensive as possible." The very term equal protection, he added, implied "that no discrimination shall be made against [blacks] by the law because of their color."

Strauder seemed to open the door for judicial proscription of all racial classifications in state laws. John R. Tompkins, counsel for an interracial couple that had been sentenced to two years in prison for violating Alabama's antimiscegenation law, certainly read the case that way. But the idea of distinct spheres of rights—"civil" and "social" if no longer "political"—furtively reentered the Waite Court's jurisprudence in PACE V. ALABAMA (1883). Field, speaking for a unanimous Court, held that antimiscegenation laws were not barred by the Fourteenth Amendment as long as both parties received the same punishment for the crime. Equal protection mandated equal treatment, not freedom of choice; antimiscegenation laws restricted the liberty of blacks and whites alike. Underlying this disingenuous view was an unarticulated premise of enormous importance. In settings involving the exercise of "social rights" the equal protection clause did not prohibit state legislatures from enacting statutes that used race as a basis for regulating the rights of persons. The legal category "Negro" was not suspect per se. (See SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION.)

The concept of "social rights" also figured prominently in the CIVIL RIGHTS CASES (1883), decided ten months after Pace. There the Court struck down the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875, which forbade the owners of theaters, inns, and public conveyances to deny any citizen "the full and equal benefit" of their facilities. Joseph Bradley, speaking for the majority, rejected the claim that the businesses covered by the act were quasi-public agencies; consequently the state action doctrine barred federal intervention under the Fourteenth Amendment. But Bradley conceded that the state action doctrine was not applicable in Thirteenth Amendment contexts. It not only "nullif[ies] all state laws which establish or uphold slavery," he said, but also "clothes Congress with power to pass all laws necessary and proper for abolishing all badges and incidents of slavery in the United States." With the exception of John Marshall Harlan, however, every member of the Waite Court equated the "badges and incidents of slavery" with the denial of "civil rights" and concluded that Congress had nearly exhausted its authority to enact appropriate legislation under the Thirteenth Amendment with the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866. "[A]t that time," Bradley explained, "Congress did not assume, under the authority given by the Thirteenth Amendment, to adjust what may be called the social rights of man and races in the community; but only to declare and vindicate those fundamental rights which appertain to the essence of citizenship, and the enjoyment or deprivation of which constitutes the essential distinction between freedom and slavery." Bradley's opinion was circumspect in only one respect. Whether denial of equal accommodation "might be a denial of a right which, if sanctioned by the state law, would be obnoxious to the [equal protection] prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment," he said, "is another question." But that was true only in the most formal sense. Once the Court had identified two distinct spheres of rights under the Thirteenth Amendment, one "civil" and another "social," it was difficult to resist the impulse to link that standard with the doctrine expounded in Pace when deciding equal protection cases. Stephen J. Field and Horace Gray, the only members of the Civil Rights Cases majority still alive when PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1896) was decided, had no qualms about state laws that required SEPARATE BUT EQUAL accommodations for blacks on public conveyances. Harlan was the sole dissenter on both occasions.

Equal opportunity in the market was one civil right that every member of the Waite Court assumed was guaranteed by the equal protection clause. Thus in YICK WO V. HOPKINS (1886) the Court invalidated the racially discriminatory application of a San Francisco ordinance that required all laundries, except those specifically exempted by the board of supervisors, to be built of brick or stone with walls one foot thick and metal roofs. No existing San Francisco laundry could meet such stringent building regulations, but the ordinance had the desired effect. The authorities promptly exempted the city's white operators and denied the petitions of their 240 Chinese competitors. "[T]he conclusion cannot be resisted," STANLEY MATTHEWS asserted for a unanimous Court, "that no reason for [this discrimination] exists except hostility to the race and nationality to which the petitioners belong, and which in the eye of the law is not justified." Yet the type of right divested was at least as important in Yick Wo as the fact of discrimination. The Court described laws that arbitrarily impaired entrepreneurial freedom as "the essence of slavery" while laws that denied racial minorities free choice in the selection of marriage partners and theater seats were not. But that was not all. The court invoked the absence of standards for administering the laundry ordinance as an independent ground for its unconstitutionality. The boundless discretion, or, as Matthews put it, "the naked and arbitrary power" delegated to the authorities was as decisive for the Court as the fact that the ordinance had been applied with "an evil eye and an unequal hand." In the Waite Court's view, however, the same kind of concern about official discretion was neither possible nor desirable in jury-service cases. In Strauder Strong conceded that jury selection officials might constitutionally employ facially neutral yet impossibly vague tests of good character, sound judgment, and the like. The Court had no choice but to presume that the jury commissioners had acted properly, Harlan explained in Bush v. Kentucky (1883), in the absence of state laws expressly restricting participation to whites. As blacks began to disappear from jury boxes throughout the South, it became clear that although Strauder put jury service in the "civil rights" category, in practical application it stood on a far lower plane than the rights enumerated in the Civil Rights Act of 1866. When Booker T. Washington counseled blacks to place economic opportunities ahead of all others in 1895, he expressed priorities that the Waite Court had long since embroidered into equal protection jurisprudence.

The path of DUE PROCESS was at once more tortuous and less decisive than the development of equal protection doctrine. In Dent v. West Virginia (1888), decided at the close of the Waite era, the Court conceded, as it had in the beginning, that "it may be difficult, if not impossible, to give to the terms 'due process of law' a definition which will embrace every permissible exertion of power affecting private rights and exclude such as are forbidden." Yet two generalizations about the Waite Court's understanding of due process can be advanced with confidence. First, the modern distinction between PROCEDURAL and SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS had no meaning for Waite and his colleagues. In their view, the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments furnished protection for fundamental rights against arbitrary action, regardless of the legal form in which the arbitrary act had been clothed. In HURTADO V. CALIFORNIA (1884), where the majority rejected counsel's claim that the Fourteenth Amendment INCORPORATED the Bill of Rights, Stanley Matthews explained that because the due process concept embraced "broad and general maxims of liberty and justice," it "must be held to guaranty not particular forms of procedure, but the very substance of individual rights to life, liberty, and property." Even Miller, the most circumspect member of the Court, agreed in 1878 that a law declaring the property of A to be vested in B, "without more," would "deprive A of his property without due process of law." It is equally clear that the Court assumed that CORPORATIONS were PERSONS within the meaning of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments long before Waite acknowledged as much during oral argument in Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co. (1886). As early as the GRANGER CASES (1877) the Court decided controversies in which railroad corporations challenged state regulation on due process grounds, and neither the defendant states nor the Justices breathed a doubt about the Court's jurisdiction. In the SINKING FUND CASES (1879), moreover, Waite stated emphatically in obiter dictum that the Fifth Amendment had always barred Congress "from depriving persons or corporations of property without due process of law."

Although every member of the Court accepted the essential premises of substantive due process, no statute was voided on due process grounds during the Waite era. Conventional assumptions about the boundary between the legislative and judicial spheres were largely responsible for the Court's reticence. In due process cases, at least, most of the period's Justices meant it when they stated, as Waite did in the Sinking Fund Cases, that "[e]very possible presumption is in favor of the validity of a statute, and this continues until the contrary is shown beyond a reasonable doubt." The most disarming demonstration of that Court's adherence to this principle came in Powell v. Pennsylvania (1888). At issue was an act that prohibited the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. The legislature had labeled the statute as a public health measure, but it was no secret that the law really had been designed to protect the dairy industry against a new competitor. Harlan, speaking for everyone but Field, conceded that counsel for the oleomargarine manufacturer had stated "a sound principle of constitutional law" when he argued that the Fourteenth Amendment guaranteed every person's right to pursue "an ordinary calling or trade" and to acquire and possess property. Indeed, the Court had furnished protection for those very rights in Yick Wo. "But we cannot adjudge that the defendant's rights of liberty and property, as thus defined, have been infringed," Harlan added, "without holding that, although it may have been enacted in good faith for the objects expressed in its title . . . it has, in fact, no real or substantial relation to those objects." And this the Court was not prepared to do. Defendant's offer of proof as to the wholesomeness of his product was insufficient, for it was the legislature's duty, not the judiciary's, "to conduct investigations of facts entering into questions of public policy." Nor could the Court consider the reasonableness of the means selected by the legislature: "Whether the manufacture of oleomargarine . . . is, or may be, conducted in such a way . . . as to baffle ordinary inspection, or whether it involves such danger to the public health as to require . . . the entire suppression of the business, rather than its regulation . . . are questions of fact and of public policy which belong to the legislative department to determine." Field, dissenting, claimed that the majority had not simply deferred to the legislature but had recognized it as "practically omnipotent."

Field overstated the predisposition of his colleagues, and he knew it. The Court seldom spoke with a luminous, confident voice in due process cases; majority opinions almost invariably revealed lingering second thoughts. Each time the Court said yes to legislatures, it reminded them that someday the Court might use the due process clause to say no. In Powell, for example, Harlan warned lawmakers that the Court was ready to intercede "if the state legislatures, under the pretence of guarding the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, should invade the rights of life, liberty, and property." Harlan did not explain how the Court might identify an act that had been passed "under the pretence" of exercising the police power, but he seemed to be confident that the Justices would be able to identify a tainted statute once they saw one. Waite's opinion in Munn v. Illinois (1877) was equally ambiguous. In one series of paragraphs he stated that the power to regulate prices was inherent in the police power; in another he suggested that price fixing was legitimate only if the regulated concern was a "business AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST." It followed from the latter proposition, though not from the former, that "under some circumstances" the Court might disallow regulation of prices charged by firms that were "purely and exclusively private." In Munn Waite was more certain about the reasonableness of rates lawfully fixed. "We know that it is a power which may be abused," he said; "but . . . [f]or protection against abuses by the legislatures the people must resort to the polls, not the courts." By 1886, however, Waite and some of his colleagues were not so sure. "[U]nder the pretense of regulating fares and freights," Waite declared in the Railroad Commission Cases (1886), "the State cannot require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without JUST COMPENSATION, or without due process of law." This statement, like Harlan's similar remark in Powell, warranted many conflicting inferences. At the close of the Waite era, then, the scope of the JUDICIAL POWER under the due process clause was as unsettled as the clause's meaning.

When Waite died in 1888, a St. Louis law journal observed that he had been "modest, conscientious, careful, conservative, and safe." It was a shrewd appraisal not only of the man but of his Court's work in constitutional law. The Court's unwillingness to use judicial power as an instrument of moral leadership evoked scattered protests from racial egalitarians, who accused Waite and his colleagues of energizing bigotry, and from exponents of laissez-faire who complained that the Court had failed to curb overweening regulatory impulses in the state legislatures. But no criticism was heard from the Republican party's moderate center, where the Court had looked for bearings as it reconstructed the "old" Constitution and integrated the "new." In retrospect, it was THOMAS M. COOLEY, not Charles Sumner, who supplied the Waite Court with an agenda and suggested an appropriate style for its jurisprudence. The Republican party had resorted to "desperate remedies" and had treated the Constitution as if it were "wax" during the Civil War, he said in 1867. Now it was time for the bench and bar to ensure that postwar institutions were "not mere heaps of materials from which to build something new, but the same good old ship of state, with some progress toward justice and freedom."

CHARLES W. MCCURDY
(1986)

Bibliography

BENEDICT, MICHAEL LES 1979 Preserving Federalism: Reconstruction and the Waite Court. Supreme Court Review 1978: 39–79.

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1913 National Supremacy: Treaty Power versus State Power. New York: Henry Holt.

——— 1948 Liberty against Government. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

MAGRATH, PETER C. 1963 Morrison R. Waite: The Triumph of Character. New York: Macmillan.

MCCURDY, CHARLES W. 1975 Justice Field and the Jurisprudence of Government-Business Relations. Journal of American History 61:970–1005.

SCHMIDT, BENNO C. 1983 Juries, Jurisdiction, and Race Discrimination: The Lost Promise of Strauder v. West Virginia. Texas Law Review 61:1401–1499.

WAIVER OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

A potential beneficiary may waive almost any constitutional claim. Rights not of constitutional dimension also may be waived. The Supreme Court has struggled with the questions whether any special DOCTRINE governs waivers of constitutional rights and, if so, whether the special doctrine applies to all constitutional rights. These waiver issues, like much of the rest of constitutional law, took on massive new proportions with the rapid expansion of constitutional rights in the 1960s and 1970s. Prior to that era, there were relatively few rights eligible for waiver.

Distinctions between waivers of constitutional rights and waivers of other rights do not appear in very early cases. The most frequent waiver issue probably was whether a civil litigant had waived the SEVENTH AMENDMENT right to TRIAL BY JURY. Hodges v. Easton (1882), a case raising this issue, was the setting for one of the Supreme Court's important statements concerning waiver. In Hodges the Court acknowledged that litigants may waive the right but cautioned, in an oft-quoted statemt that seemed to contemplate special treatment for waivers of constitutional rights, that "every reasonable presumption shold be indulged against . . . waiver."

Then, as later would be true, there seemed to be a gap between the Court's statement of the waiver standard and its application of the standard in deciding cases. The Court's casual attitude toward waiver emerged in Pierce v. Somerset Railway (1898) and Eustis v. Bolles (1893), in which the Court found waivers of claims that state laws unconstitutionally impaired the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACT. In each case not only was "every reasonable presumption" against waiver not indulged; the Court went so far as to indicate that a state court's finding of waiver of constitutional rights did not even raise a federal issue reviewable by the Supreme Court. It may be, however, that the Court was insufficiently attentive to differences between the waiver issue and the existence of an independent and ADEQUATE STATE GROUND for decision, which would preclude Supreme Court review of the state court's judgment.

Although the Court had not become deeply involved in waiver issues, the legal community knew that waiver doctrine might have to be attuned to differences among constitutional rights. Through eight editions from 1868 to 1927, THOMAS M. COOLEY's treatise on constitutional law acknowledged that litigants may waive constitutional rights but it stated that in criminal cases this "must be true to a very limited extent only." Subsequent Supreme Court waiver doctrine at first would adhere to, and later partially undermine, Cooley's suggested distinction. But in his time, Cooley, himself a state supreme court justice, was on safe ground. As long as there were few constitutional rights regulating CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, one easily could limit their waivability.

The Court became more involved with waivers of constitutional rights in the 1930s. In Aetna Insurance Co. v. Kennedy (1937) and JOHNSON V. ZERBST (1938), cases raising civil and criminal procedure waiver issues, the Court seemed to indulge presumptions against waiver. And Johnson v. Zerbst supplied a new guiding rhetoric. Waiver required "an intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right or privilege." Again, though, the Court's articulated waiver standard sometimes was difficult to reconcile with the standard it applied. In Rogers v. United States (1951) a GRAND JURY witness who answered many questions was held to have waived her Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION with respect to additional information.

The 1930s doctrinal seeds restricting waiver flowered in the 1960s. The most significant waiver developments concerned the question of a state criminal defendant's waiver of the right to assert a federal constitutional claim in a federal HABEAS CORPUS proceeding. A habeas corpus case, FAY V. NOIA (1963), became the touchstone for analysis of waiver of constitutional rights. Fay reaffirmed Johnson v. Zerbst's waiver standard and required a conscious decision to forgo the privilege of seeking to vindicate federal rights. On the language of Fay, accidental waivers seemed impossible. The Court's reluctance to allow waivers of constitutional rights reached a high point in MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), when the Court required that police inform suspects of their constitutional rights to assure that any waiver would be knowing.

The late WARREN COURT's reluctance to allow waivers of constitutional rights contrasts with the BURGER COURT's attitude. In one respect, a retreat from the 1960s standard seemed inevitable. For Fay and Johnson soon collided with the realities of the American criminal justice system. Through the PLEA BARGAINING process, the entire system depends upon widespread waivers of constitutional rights. In the trilogy of McMann v. Richardson (1970), Parker v. North Carolina (1970), and Brady v. United States (1970), holdings difficult to reconcile with the Fay-Johnson standard, this reality took hold. The trilogy effectively made a plea of guilty a waiver of nearly all constitutional procedure rights, known or unknown.

Another waiver issue, one with perhaps less of a foregone conclusion, further signaled the Court's shift in attitude. The FOURTH AMENDMENT guarantees the right to be free of UNREASONABLE SEARCHES and seizures and often requires police to obtain a warrant before conducting a search. For many years there was doubt about the relationship between searches conducted with consent, which need not comply with the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement, and the concept of waiver. If consent were equated with a waiver of Fourth Amendment rights, then the Johnson standard seemed applicable. But since few who consent to searches are informed of their Fourth Amendment rights, it was difficult to characterize any waiver as knowing. The widespread practice of CONSENT SEARCHES seemed to hang in the balance.

A Court reluctant to allow waivers of constitutional rights might have adopted the Miranda-like solution of generally requiring the police to inform suspects of their Fourth Amendment rights before obtaining consent to a search. In SCHNECKLOTH V. BUSTAMONTE (1973) the Court, opting for a different extreme, preempted most Fourth Amendment waiver problems. It found that the Johnson standard had, almost without exception, "been applied only to those rights which the Constitution guarantees to a criminal defendant in order to preserve a FAIR TRIAL." Fourth Amendment claims were held not to be subject to the knowing and intelligent waiver requirement.

Schneckloth's reasoning may have implications for other constitutional rights. It suggests that rights other than those relating to a fair trial are subject to a waiver standard more lenient than the Johnson test. But it did not signal a wholesale retreat from Johnson. After Schneckloth, in cases such as EDWARDS V. ARIZONA (1981), the Court reaffirmed that the Johnson standard governs waivers of the RIGHT TO COUNSEL.

In WAINWRIGHT V. SYKES (1977), where the Court squarely confronted Fay, it further limited 1960s waiver doctrine. Under Wainwright, failure to comply with state procedural rules effectively waives the right to raise a constitutional claim on federal habeas corpus. A habeas applicant must both explain his failure to comply with state procedures and show that his case was prejudiced by the constitutional flaw. The Court rejected Fay's requirement of a knowing and deliberate waiver. In effect, the burden of proving nonwaiver had been placed on the defendant.

The waiver question also continued to arise in contexts not involving criminal procedure. In D. H. Overmyer Co. v. Frick Company (1972) and Swarb v. Lennox (1972) the Court reconfirmed earlier holdings that at least some civil litigants may contractually waive due process rights to NOTICE and hearing prior to a JUDGMENT and thereby effectively waive the opportunity to contest the validity of a debt. In Parden v. Terminal Railway (1964) states may have been surprised to learn that certain activities effectively waived their constitutional immunity from suit in federal court. For many years prior to Parden, it appeared that only an express waiver by states would be effective. But the Court found that by operating a railroad in INTERSTATE COMMERCE, a state effectively waived its immunity from employees' suits in federal court under the federal EMPLOYERS LIABILITY ACT. Parden's reach was limited by Employees v. Department of Public Health and Welfare (1973), which refused to rely on the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT to subject states to federal damage suits by employees. More important, EDELMAN V. JORDAN (1974) held that state participation in a federal program did not amount to consent to suit in federal court on claims relating to the program.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

Bibliography

COVER, ROBERT M. and ALEINIKOFF, T. ALEXANDER 1977 Dialectical Federalism: Habeas Corpus and the Court. Yale Law Journal 86:1035–1102.

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. 1978 Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment 8.1, 8.2, 11.1, 11.7 (f). St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

TIGAR, MICHAEL E. 1970 Foreword: Waiver of Constitutional Rights: A Disquiet in the Citadel. Harvard Law Review 84: 1–28.

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. 1978 American Constitutional Law. Pages 133–138. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

WALKER, TIMOTHY
(1802–1856)

Born in Massachusetts, Timothy Walker attended Harvard College and Harvard Law School where he studied with Justice JOSEPH STORY. He settled in Cincinnati in 1830 and opened a private law school, which eventually became part of the University of Cincinnati. He wrote on various legal subjects, but his primary contribution was his compilation of his lectures, An Introduction to American Law (1837), which he dedicated to Story, whose teachings and viewpoint he spread. A third of the work is on constitutional law, strongly nationalist in its orientation. By 1905 the book had gone through eleven editions.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WALKER v. BIRMINGHAM
388 U.S. 307 (1967)

The Supreme Court, 5–4, upheld criminal contempt convictions of eight black ministers, including MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., for holding a CIVIL RIGHTS protest parade in violation of an INJUNCTION issued by an Alabama state court. The injunction, which forbade them from engaging in street parades without a permit, was issued EX PARTE, two days before the intended march. The order was based on a city ordinance that the Court later held unconstitutional for VAGUENESS in Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham (1969), a case arising out of the same events.

For the majority, Justice POTTER STEWART concluded that the ministers, once enjoined by a court order, were not entitled to disregard the injunction even if it had been granted unconstitutionally. Rather, they were obliged to ask the court to modify the order, or to seek relief from the injunction in another court.

Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, for the four dissenters, pointed out that, in the absence of a court order, the FIRST AMENDMENT would have entitled the marchers to disregard the ordinance, which was INVALID ON ITS FACE. It was incongruous, he argued, to let the state alter this result simply by obtaining "the ex parte stamp of a judicial officer on a copy of the invalid ordinance." These views were echoed in separate dissents by Chief Justice EARL WARREN and Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS. The Walker principle, though much criticized, remains the DOCTRINE of the Court.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Demonstration.)

WALKER v. SAUVINET
92 U.S. 90 (1876)

Walker lost a civil judgment in a trial decided by a judge, in conformance with state law, after the jury deadlocked and after Walker had demanded TRIAL BY JURY. The Court held, 7–2, that the SEVENTH AMENDMENT to the Constitution, guaranteeing trial by jury in civil actions at law, applied only in federal courts, and that the right to a jury trial in similar state cases was not a privilege of United States citizenship guaranteed by the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. This was the earliest rejection of the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE. Its result is still good law, long after the latter doctrine's triumph.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WALLACE v. JAFFREE
472 U.S. 38 (1985)

A 6–3 Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, held UNCONSTITUTIONAL an Alabama statute that required public school children to observe a period of silence "for meditation or voluntary prayer." No member of the Court contested the constitutionality of the period of silence for meditation. As Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR said in her CONCURRING OPINION, no threat to RELIGIOUS LIBERTY could be discerned from a room of "silent, thoughtful school children." Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER added that there was no threat "even if they chose to pray." Burger willfully misunderstood or missed the point. Any student in any public school may pray voluntarily and silently at almost any time of the school day, if so moved. The state, in this case, sought to orchestrate group prayer by capitalizing on the impressionability of youngsters. Compulsory attendance laws and the coercive setting of the school provided a CAPTIVE AUDIENCE for the state to promote religion. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS emphasized the fact that the state act was "entirely motivated by a purpose to advance religion" and had "no secular purpose." The evidence irrefutably showed that. Accordingly, the Alabama act failed to pass the test of LEMON V. KURTZMAN (1971) used by the Court to determine whether a state violated the FIRST AMENDMENT's prohibition against an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION.

Justice O'Connor, observing that Alabama already had a moment of silence law on its books, noted that during the silence, no one need be religious, no one's religious beliefs could be compromised, and no state encouragement of religion existed. "The crucial question," she wrote, "is whether the State has conveyed or attempted to convey the message that children should use the moment of silence for prayer." The only possible answer was that the state, by endorsing the decision to pray during the moment of silence, sponsored a religious exercise, thereby breaching the First Amendment's principle of SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WALZ v. TAX COMMISSION
397 U.S. 664 (1970)

In this 8–1 decision, the Supreme Court added a new element to the test for the constitutionality of financial aid to religious institutions. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER rejected Walz's claim that a state's grant of tax exemption to property used only for religious purposes violated the ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT. Adding to tests already elaborated in ABINGTON SCHOOL DISTRICT V. SCHEMPP (1963), Burger required assurance that "the end result—the effect—[of a grant of tax exemption] is not an excessive government entanglement with religion. The test is inescapably one of degree." Commenting that "the course of constitutional neutrality in this area cannot be an absolutely straight line," he said that taxing a church would have involved even more "entanglement" than exempting them. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, dissenting, believed that TORCASO V. WATKINS (1961) governed. He concluded that "a tax exemption is a subsidy."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Government Aid to Religious Institutions.)

WAR, DECLARATION OF

See: Declaration of War

WAR, STATE OF

See: State of War

WARD v. ILLINOIS
431 U.S. 767 (1977)

The Supreme Court upheld, 5–4, a conviction for selling "sado-masochistic" materials. (See MISHKIN V. NEW YORK.) Justice BYRON R. WHITE, for the majority, said that a state law could pass the "patent offensiveness" part of the test of MILLER V. CALIFORNIA (1973) although it did not specifically define the proscribed materials; state court interpretations had followed Miller's guidelines. The dissenters, led by Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, argued that the absence of the statutory definition specified by Miller left the law unconstitutionally vague.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

WARDEN v. HAYDEN
387 U.S. 294 (1976)

In Gouled v. United States (1921) the Court announced a rule that rings strange to the modern ear; when conducting an otherwise lawful search, police are authorized to search for contraband, fruits of crime, means and instrumentalities of crime, or weapons of escape, but they are not authorized to search for "mere evidence." The rationale for the MERE EVIDENCE RULE was never clear, but its main theme was that police could not take objects from an accused without asserting a superior property interest in the object seized. This requirement spurred judicial creativity in recognizing property interests and in broadly defining their scope.

In Warden v. Hayden the Supreme Court rejected this property-centered conception of FOURTH AMENDMENT jurisprudence. Police could seize evidence after all. Questions remained concerning the scope of searches for items previously regarded as mere evidence (such as diaries) and concerning the applicable standards for SEARCHES AND SEIZURES of "mere evidence" belonging to innocent parties.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1986)

WARE v. HYLTON
3 Dallas 199 (1796)

Ware established the fundamental principle of constitutional law that a state act may not violate a national treaty. An act of Virginia during the Revolution sequestered sterling debts owed by Virginians to British subjects and provided that such debts be discharged on payment (in depreciated currency) to the state. The Treaty of Paris of 1783 provided that creditors should meet with no lawful impediments to the recovery of full value in sterling, and Article VI of the Constitution made treaties of the United States the supreme law of the land. Ware, a British subject, brought an action in a federal court seeking such a recovery from Hylton, a Virginian. The prewar debts of Virginians to British creditors exceeded $2,000,000. Justice JAMES IREDELL, on circuit, ruled that the treaty did not revive any debt that had been discharged, and on the WRIT OF ERROR from the circuit court, JOHN MARSHALL, for Hylton, argued that a United States treaty could not annul a statute passed when the state was sovereign. He also denied the authority of the Supreme Court to question the validity of a state law, arguing that the Constitution had not expressly granted such an authority.

Iredell persisted in his opinion expressed below, but Justice SAMUEL CHASE, supported by the concurring opinions of the remainder of the Justices, declared that the SUPREMACY CLAUSE (Article VI), operating retroactively, nullified the state act, thereby reviving the sterling debt. Chase cloaked his opinion in sweeping nationalist doctrine that twisted history: "There can be no limitations on the power of the people to change or abolish the state constitutions, or to make them yield to the general government, and to treaties made by their authority." A treaty, he ruled, could not be supreme law if any state act could stand in its way; state laws contrary to the treaty were prostrated before it and the Constitution, which was the "creator" of the states. The Ware decision intensified Jeffersonian hostility to the consolidating and procreditor opinions of the federal courts. The decision's imperishable principle of the supremacy of national treaties survived its origins—no doubt in part because JAY'S TREATY of 1794 had provided that the United States should assume the payment of the controversial debts.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WAR, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, AND THE CONSTITUTION

The United States became a nation among nations on July 4, 1776, fully endowed with SOVEREIGNTY, that is, the capacity to do whatever nations do in world politics. International law acknowledges that nations have the power to breach their international legal obligations and take the consequences so far as other nations are concerned. Constitutionally, breaches of international law by Congress or the President are binding on courts and citizens alike as official acts within the discretion of the political branches of the government. Thus the FOREIGN AFFAIRS powers, including the WAR POWERS, draw their substance from the matrix of public international law. In the language of PEREZ V. BROWNELL (1958), the Constitution recognizes in the national government "the powers indispensable to its functioning effectively in the company of sovereign nations."

In the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, a majority led by JAMES WILSON insisted that an "energetic" and independent President was needed to maintain the unity of a country that was already large and destined to become larger, and above all to help assure its safety in a turbulent and dangerous world. As EDWARD S. CORWIN wrote:

> [T]he fact is that what the Framers had in mind was not the cabinet system, as yet nonexistent even in Great Britain, but the "balanced constitution" of [JOHN] LOCKE, MONTESQUIEU, and [WILLIAM] BLACKSTONE, which carried with it the idea of a divided initiative in the matter of legislation and a broad range of autonomous executive power or "prerogative." Sir Henry Maine's dictum that "the American constitution is the British constitution with the monarchy left out," is, from the point of view of 1789, almost the exact reverse of the truth, for the presidency was designed in great measure to reproduce the monarchy of George III with the corruption left out, and also of course the hereditary feature [1957, pp. 14–15].

Actually, all comparisons of the British and American constitutions break down. The President is effectively both king and prime minister, but Congress is not Parliament, and its relation to the President is necessarily at arm's length.

The entire authority of the United States to act as a sovereign nation in world politics is confined by the Constitution to the national government and denied to the states. It is divided by the Constitution between the President and Congress.

The President is head of state as well as head of government, and therefore the ultimate embodiment of the nation's sovereignty, especially in times of crisis. ABRAHAM LINCOLN turned to his prerogative and residual powers as the source of much of his authority during the CIVIL WAR. In addition, the Constitution endows the President with "the" executive power of the United States, including without limitation the power to conduct diplomacy; to make treaties, with the ADVICE AND CONSENT of the Senate; and to serve as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF of the armed forces; moreover, he is enjoined to see to it that the laws are faithfully executed.

The constitutional definition of the role of Congress in foreign affairs is comparably broad. Article I provides that "all LEGISLATIVE POWERS herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States." Among the powers expressly granted to Congress are the powers to lay and collect taxes and provide for the common defense; regulate foreign commerce; establish an uniform rule of NATURALIZATION; define and punish piracies and FELONIES committed on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations; declare war, grant LETTERS OF MARQUE AND REPRISAL, and make rules concerning captures on land and water; and raise and support the armed forces, make rules for their government and regulation, and provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia and calling forth the armed forces and the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. The problems of CITIZENSHIP and of foreign affairs in their more general aspects are not mentioned, but Congress's authority to legislate on such issues has been readily inferred by the Supreme Court as inherent in national sovereignty.

In short, the Constitution prescribes that the foreign affairs powers of the nation—including the war power—be shared between Congress and the President in accordance with the overriding principle of functional necessity. All the powers the nation requires in the international environment exist. Those which are executive in character are to be exercised by the President. Those which are legislative in nature are reserved for Congress. When in recess, however, Congress can meet only at the President's call, and can act in all cases only subject to the President's VETO POWER. As Corwin concluded, the Constitution invites the President and Congress "to struggle for the privilege of directing American foreign policy."

Sooner or later, most aspects of the conduct of foreign affairs involve both legislative and executive decisions; they are therefore the proper business of both Congress and the President, in a pattern that reflects subtle political judgments about how their cooperation can best be organized under the circumstances. A few functions are unique to each branch. Only the President can command the armed forces, call a special session of Congress, or conduct the diplomacy of the nation; and only Congress can declare war, appropriate money, or make certain conduct criminal. On the other hand, the President sometimes asks members of Congress to serve on diplomatic delegations. And Congress sometimes attempts to restrict the President's power to deploy or use the armed forces, although many constitutional authorities have regarded such restrictions as invasions of the President's executive power.

The flexibility of the constitutional arrangements for making and carrying out foreign policy is not peculiar to the field of foreign affairs. As JAMES MADISON saw from the beginning, the principle of the SEPARATION OF POWERS does not mean that the three branches of the government are really separate. Most of their powers are commingled. The branches are not independent but interdependent, and the preservation of the functional boundaries between the legislative and the executive depends as much on the reflexes of the political system as on rulings of the Supreme Court.

It was realized from the beginning that rigid rules about how Congress and the President should work together in the field of foreign affairs would be undesirable and indeed dangerous. As ALEXANDER HAMILTON wrote in THE FEDERALIST #23, "the authorities essential to the common defense . . . ought to exist without limitation, because it is impossible to foresee or define the extent and variety of national exigencies or the correspondent extent and variety of the means which may be necessary to satisfy them. The circumstances that endanger the safety of nations are infinite, and for this reason no constitutional shackles can wisely be imposed on the power to which the care of it is committed."

Diplomacy without force behind it has been and will remain a nullity. The use or the threat of armed force has been a normal instrument of American diplomacy, from secret warnings, "showing the flag," and conducting maneuvers, at one end of the spectrum, to programs of rearmament, partial mobilization, and the actual use of armed force—in times of "war" and of "peace," as international law defines those words—at the other. In the early days of the Republic, raids across the borders were commonplace. The problems of piracy and the slave trade required the frequent use of force, pursuant to treaty, statute, or the decisions of the President acting alone. Then and now, international law recognized the right of all states to use limited force in peacetime to cure forceful breaches of international law when no peaceful remedy was available. The United States has taken advantage of its rights in this regard to protect its borders, its ships, its citizens in peril abroad, and indeed, the rights of citizens whose monetary claims had not been paid by foreign governments. Moreover, the United States and other Western nations have sometimes intervened abroad on humanitarian grounds where organized government has broken down. Such exercises by the United States of its "inherent" right of self-defense have been carried out mainly, but not exclusively, on the authority of the President.

The threat to use force and even the use of force have been familiar features of diplomacy from the opening of Japan to President RICHARD M. NIXON's secret nuclear warnings that induced the Soviet Union not to attack Chinese nuclear installations. At the end of the Civil War, we deployed 50,000 troops along the Mexican border. France heeded our suggestion, withdrew its troops from Mexico, and left Maximilian to his fate. Similarly, in 1962, President JOHN F. KENNEDY assembled some 250,000 troops in Florida, and halted a Soviet vessel carrying military supplies to Cuba; the Soviet Union withdrew its nuclear missiles from Cuba. A few years earlier, at a moment of severe Soviet pressure against Turkey, President HARRY S. TRUMAN ordered the battleship Missouri to carry the body of a deceased Turkish ambassador to Istanbul for burial—manifestly a journey intended to be more than a courteous gesture to the people of Turkey. Such threats of force have been almost entirely within the province of the President.

The list of such incidents is long enough to demonstrate that throughout its history the United States government has called upon its armed forces to perform a wide variety of functions in support of its foreign policy. There have been five DECLARATIONS OF WAR in our national experience, and more than 200 episodes in which the President ordered the armed forces into combat, sometimes with the support of a treaty or of legislation passed before or after the event, more often on his own authority. The number of occasions on which the President secretly threatened to use force in aid of his diplomacy cannot be counted accurately, but is surely considerable.

The pattern of cooperation between the President and Congress with respect to war and foreign affairs has been the same since the first administration of President GEORGE WASHINGTON. This continuity of practice arises from the nature of things. Congress could and did admonish the President to protect frontier settlements from Indian raids but could not meet and vote every time the risk arose. In any event, it was the President's duty to protect the settlements with or without the support of a statute. The circumstances which may require the use of or the threat to use armed force are too protean, and pervade the conduct of foreign affairs too completely, to be compressed within a single procedure.

From the beginning of our government under the Constitution, a great deal of energy has been absorbed by attempts to define the respective roles of the President and of Congress in carrying out these functions. The participants in the debate are divided into two camps.

Hamilton's view of the Presidency dominates the judicial opinions, the pattern of practice, the writings of scholars, and the pronouncements of senators and representatives. To Hamiltonians, all national powers not granted to Congress or the courts are "executive" and therefore presidential, especially if they concern relations with foreign powers or the duties of the nation under international law.

But a dissenting opinion has persisted, based on the fear of executive power as dictatorship in disguise. Corwin calls it the "ultra-Whig" view. It opposes almost all claims to presidential independence, and regards the executive as no more than an obstreperous but indispensable servant of a "sovereign" Congress. This conception of the Presidency has been a mainstay of political attacks on Presidents for unpopular wars.

The Hamiltonian position crystallized during the neutrality controversy of 1793, an episode of immense importance to the formation of the Constitution. France had declared war against Great Britain. The United States was bound to France by the 1778 treaties of perpetual alliance which seemed to require the infant Republic, in the event of war between France and Britain, to give various forms of belligerent aid to France. Any such assistance would have been an act of war against Great Britain, which could easily have snuffed out the new nation. Washington and his cabinet were determined to preserve neutrality despite the treaties with France and the strongly pro-French bias of public opinion. After the Supreme Court refused Washington's request for an ADVISORY OPINION determining whether the President could issue a proclamation of neutrality on his own authority, Washington did so, and took special precautions to assure Great Britain of America's pacific intentions.

The concurrent nature of the foreign relations power was soon demonstrated. Juries would not convict American seamen for violating the President's neutrality proclamation. Congress then grudgingly passed a Neutrality Act, supporting the President's interpretation of the treaties with France. In due course, the Neutrality Act was enforced. Congress had the last word, but acted under circumstances carefully arranged by the President, acting independently.

Hamilton's Pacificus papers, defending the President's right to issue the Proclamation of neutrality, are among the most cogent of all our state papers on the conduct of foreign affairs. The President, said Hamilton, has the foreign affairs and war powers of the British monarch minus the limitations on those powers mentioned in the Constitution. Those limitations, being exceptions to the President's executive powers, should be strictly construed.

The President is the sole officer of the government empowered to communicate with foreign nations. This is an executive power. It was therefore the President's role to inform the nations about the position of the United States with respect to the European war. Next, Hamilton argued, it is the President's duty to preserve peace until Congress declares war. In this case, the President's duty required him faithfully to execute the international law of neutrality, and thus avoid giving offense to foreign powers. To carry out that duty, the President had to determine for himself whether a status of neutrality conformed to our national interests and was compatible with our obligations under the French treaties, and then to announce his position diplomatically. Hamilton said that the President has the authority and the duty to determine the operation of treaties in the first instance, an important example of his right as President to decide upon the obligations of the country to foreign nations until Congress does so within its own sphere.

Hamilton's analysis would lead to the conclusion that while only Congress can move the nation into a state of general war, the President can authorize more limited uses of force in peacetime for purposes of self-defense, the protection of citizens abroad, the fulfillment of treaty obligations, and the support of diplomacy.

The Ultra-Whig dissenting view draws an altogether different boundary between the respective war powers of the President and Congress. For the dissenters, Congress's power to "declare" war gives Congress entire control over every aspect of the war power, including neutrality. It means, they contend, that the President can never employ the armed forces, save to repel a sudden attack, unless Congress has first passed a "declaration of war." Some dissenters agree that Congress may authorize limited war in the international law sense, but insist that the declaration of war clause requires congressional action before the President uses force at all, except in cases of sudden attack. A few concede that circumstances may justify congressional approval after the event—after Pearl Harbor, for example, or the firing on Fort Sumter. And some even accept the decision of the Supreme Court in THE PRIZE CASES (1863), which upheld acts of Congress ratifying President Lincoln's blockade of the Confederacy, enacted some months after the President had instituted the blockade. But all the dissenters are dubious about statutes, treaties, or joint resolutions—and many have been put on the books since 1792—that may be invoked to support presidential uses of force years later. The Ultra-Whigs admit that the United States may, like other nations, sign treaties that have military provisions, but they are uneasy about the propriety of such commitments unless they are reiterated by Congress when they become the basis for military action.

There is no reason for such confusion to persist. The "declaration of war" authorized in the Constitution is bracketed in Article I, section 8, with "letters of marque and reprisal" and "captures on land and sea." All are terms of specific meaning in international law. A declaration of war has far-reaching consequences, including: the authorization of unlimited hostilities, the possible internment of enemy ALIENS, the sequestration of enemy property, and the imposition of regulations, such as censorship, that would be unthinkable in peacetime. But many kinds of hostilities recognized as legitimate under international law do not constitute "general war," and can therefore be initiated by official action less sweeping than a declaration of war. Most familiar are exercises of the right of self-defense against certain breaches of international law. Many are short, quick responses to a sudden threat; others become more prolonged conflicts. International law limits all such defensive campaigns to the use of as much force as is reasonably necessary to eliminate the original breach.

Hamilton's theory of presidential power is clearly the operative model of American constitutional law with respect to the international use of force. But the practice has not been nearly so symmetrical as Hamilton's logic. Every American President who has felt obliged to use the armed forces has vividly remembered the political attacks on "JOHN ADAMS' Undeclared War," and therefore sought to obtain congressional support for his policies as soon as it was politically feasible to do so. But such prudence has never helped a President saddled with an unpopular war. John Adams was supported by four successive statutes; they had no effect on the political outcry against him, or the fate of the Federalist party. Presidents Truman and LYNDON B. JOHNSON endured similar trials. As Johnson commented: "I said early in my Presidency that if I wanted Congress with me on the landing of Vietnam, I'd have to have them on the take off. And I did just that. . . . But I failed to reckon with one thing: the parachute. I got them on the take off, but a lot of them bailed out before the end of the flight."

Between the Congress of Vienna and the turn of the twentieth century, the United States was not a major actor in world politics; the central features of American foreign policy were Manifest Destiny and the MONROE DOCTRINE. Nonetheless, there were periods of tension between Congress and the President with respect to the conduct of foreign relations. The most acute of these episodes concerned the expansion of the nation to the Pacific and controversies about problems in Latin America and Canada. Some of the controversies reflected deep divisions between the parties and among the people, others no more than normal rivalry between the political branches of the government.

But the collapse of the old state system in 1914 imposed new burdens on the United States, which in turn gave rise to profound disquiet in American opinion, exacerbating the traditional tension between Congress and the President with respect to the war power, and reaching a climax during the early 1970s. The VIETNAM WAR dragged on, accompanied by antiwar rioting of a kind the nation had not experienced since the Civil War. At the same time, the controversy over President Nixon's behavior with respect to Watergate poisoned the political atmosphere, and produced so strong a movement for the President's impeachment that he resigned.

In this atmosphere of extreme political excitement, Congress passed the War Powers Resolution of 1973. Its political purpose was to assure the people that Congress could and would protect the nation against future Vietnams. For the first time in nearly two hundred years, the Hamiltonian view of the Presidency and the war power suffered at least a nominal defeat.

The Resolution asserts congressional supremacy with regard to the war power, but it does not adopt an extreme form of the Ultra-Whig view. It does not say, for example, that the President can use force only if Congress has first declared war. Not does it seek to confine the President's use of force without prior congressional approval to cases of "sudden attack."

The Resolution purports to fulfill the intent of the Framers of the Constitution, as summarized in three propositions. First, the armed forces should not be involved in hostilities without the collective judgment of Congress and the President. Second, Congress has the power to pass all laws NECESSARY AND PROPER for carrying into execution the powers of the President. Third, the constitutional powers of the President as Commander-in-Chief can be exercised by him to introduce the forces into hostile situations only pursuant to a declaration of war or a "specific" statute, or in a national emergency created by an attack upon the United States. Clearly, this attempt at restatement omits the nation's obligations under treaties.

The Resolution requires the President to consult with Congress "in every possible instance" before introducing the armed forces into situations where hostilities are an imminent risk, and also to "consult" regularly with Congress after hostilities have begun until they are terminated. The resolution makes no attempt to define the term "consult," which is a word of political but not of constitutional meaning.

The War Powers Resolution requires the President to report to Congress within forty-eight hours and regularly thereafter whenever he has introduced armed forces into situations risking hostilities without a declaration of war. It further requires the President to terminate such a use of the armed forces within sixty days unless Congress has declared war, authorized hostilities in another "specific" form, or extended the sixty-day period to not more than ninety days. Where hostilities are being conducted abroad without a declaration of war or "specific" authorization in another form, the resolution authorizes Congress, by CONCURRENT RESOLUTION, to require the President to terminate hostilities and remove the armed forces.

If the War Powers Resolution were carried out literally, it would constitute the most revolutionary change in the Constitution ever accomplished—far more drastic in its effects than the shift of authority from the states to the national government which began after Civil War. It would subject the President to the orders of an omnipotent Congress. No future President could do what Lincoln did during the Civil War, or rely on the behavior of every strong President between Washington and Lyndon Johnson as precedents. The deterrent influence of American military power and of American treaties, already weakened after Vietnam, would decline even further. The United States would be the only country in the world that lacked the capacity to enter into treaties or conduct secret negotiations contemplating the use of force, and it would be hampered in many other ways in the conduct of its foreign relations. Enforcing the resolution would produce paradoxes. Although no future President could do what President Kennedy did during the Cuban Missile Crisis in 1962, the highly "specific" legal arrangements for the Vietnam War would have satisfied the Resolution's requirements. That war was authorized not only by the United Nations Charter and the Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty of 1954, but by the GULF OF TONKIN RESOLUTION of 1963 and other explicit acts of Congress as well. On the other hand, the sponsors of the Resolution have said that it does not affect the President's unique responsibilities with regard to the nuclear weapon. Above all, as has been evident in the decade since it was passed, the Resolution would convert almost every serious foreign policy problem into a debate between Congress and the President about constitutional power, making the conduct of foreign relations even more cumbersome and contentious than is the case already.

The War Powers Resolution is in profound conflict with the necessities of governance in a turbulent world and with the concept of the Presidency that has evolved from the experience of the nation under the Constitution. We can therefore predict that the Hamiltonian conception of the war powers will prevail as the constitutional norm, and that the War Powers Resolution will become a footnote to history, either through repudiation or desuetude.

Institutional pride may keep Congress from repealing the resolution, although repeal disguised as revision is not unthinkable. The courts will almost surely declare the Resolution unconstitutional if an appropriate case should arise. The ruling of the Supreme Court in IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983) is applicable to the chief operative parts of the War Powers Resolution. Chadha ruled that congressional action can have legislative effect only through acts or joint resolutions fully subject to the President's veto. If Congress cannot constitutionally terminate a war by passing a concurrent resolution, it can hardly do so by failing to pass such a resolution within sixty or ninety days.

In holding the War Powers Resolution unconstitutional, the Supreme Court may well go beyond Chadha to deal with more fundamental aspects of the separation of powers principle: the resolution's effect, for example, on the President's hitherto unquestioned power to conduct secret negotiations, receive surrenders, or negotiate cease-fire agreements; and its attempt, recalling the proposed BRICKER AMENDMENT, to require legislation before treaties can become the supreme law of the land.

Even if the resolution is neither repealed nor declared unconstitutional by the courts, it is unlikely to be an important influence on Presidents. The resolution does not correspond to the nature of the problems of foreign policy and national security with which the government has to deal, and therefore cannot function as effective law. At least eleven episodes involving the use of force or the imminent risk of using force occurred during the first decade after the War Powers Resolution was passed. In each case the President, while protesting that the resolution was unconstitutional, consulted with congressional leaders and kept Congress informed about events. In no case did the procedure mandated by the resolution prove convenient or appropriate, and in no case was it followed. In each case there were some congressional protests that the War Powers Resolution was being violated, and even suggestions that the President be impeached.

The President and Congress, separately and together, have been entrusted by history with sovereign prerogatives in exercising the foreign affairs and war powers of the nation. Those prerogatives have been in uneasy balance for two hundred years, an instance of the friction between the branches of government on which the Founding Fathers relied to preserve the liberties of the people. Over a wide range, the President and Congress can exercise their joint and several political discretion in dealing quickly with complex and swiftly moving events, often on the basis of fragmentary information. Within that zone, the only constitutional restraints on which the people can rely to secure them from the abuse of such political discretion is the electoral process itself, as Chief Justice Marshall remarked in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824).

But the choices committed by the Constitution to the care of Congress and the President are not unlimited, even when one gives full weight to the view that the war power is the power to wage war successfully. The foreign affairs and war powers are aspects of a government organized under a written Constitution dominated by the principle of democratic responsibility. Although the Supreme Court has hesitated to pass on many conflicts between the President and Congress, it has intervened where exercises of the war power impinged upon CIVIL RIGHTS, or attempted radically to alter the equilibrium of the constitutional order.

Thus, certain constitutional limits on the President's war power emerged in its first major test—the neutrality crisis of 1793. President Washington could have used the armed forces or called up the militia to keep French privateers at the docks of Philadelphia or Charleston; in the event, he prudently refrained from such action. But he could not get American juries to convict American citizens indicted for violating a presidential proclamation. Similarly, YOUNGSTOWN SHEET & TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1952) decided that the President had no INHERENT POWERS to seize steel mills as a step toward settling a strike during the Korean War when Congress had rejected such a procedure.

There are comparable constitutional limits on what Congress and the President acting together can do in the name of the war power. Congress can make it an offense to recruit soldiers within the United States for wars in which the United States is neutral, but it is doubtful whether it would be constitutional for Congress to forbid American citizens from going abroad to fight. In Ex parte Merryman (1861) and Ex parte Milligan (1867) the courts held that even in the midst of the Civil War, courts-martial could not try civilians while the ordinary courts were available. And in REID V. COVERT (1957) and Kinsella v. United States (1960) the Supreme Court struck down convictions imposed by courts-martial on the wives of military personnel living on American bases abroad.

The only exceptions to this line of cases are the JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES, decided during WORLD WAR II. These cases upheld the constitutionality of a statute authorizing the President to exclude citizens of Japanese descent from California, Oregon, and Washington, and requiring their internment in camps until they could be resettled in other parts of the country. These decisions have been severely criticized, and the Court's opinion in DUNCAN V. KAHANAMOKU (1946) can be interpreted as overruling them sub silentio. Until they are more decisively repudiated, however, they remain, as Justice Jackson said in KOREMATSU V. UNITED STATES (1944), "a loaded weapon ready for the hand of any authority that can bring forward a plausible claim of an urgent need."

EUGENE V. ROSTOW
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. (1940) 1957 The President: Office and Powers, 1787–1957. New York: New York University Press.

HENKIN, LOUIS 1972 Foreign Affairs and the Constitution. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press.

RANDALL, JAMES G. (1926) 1951 Constitutional Problems under Lincoln. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

REVELY, W. TAYLOR, III 1981 The War Powers of the President and Congress. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia.

ROSTOW, EUGENE V. 1945 The Japanese American Cases: A Disaster. Yale Law Journal 54:489–533, reprinted in The Sovereign Prerogative (1962). New Haven: Yale University Press.

——— 1973 Statement, in Appendix to War Powers, Hearings before Subcommittee on National Security Policy and Scientific Developments, Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, 93rd Congress, 1st Session, March 7–20, 1973, pp. 395–502; also in Rostow, Eugene v. 1972 Great Cases Make Bad Law: The War Powers Act. Texas Law Review 50:833–900.

SOFAER, ABRAHAM D. 1976 War, Foreign Affairs, and Constitutional Power: The Origins. Cambridge, Mass.: Ballinger Publishing Co.

TURNER, ROBERT F. 1983 The War Powers Resolution: Its Implementation in Theory and Practice. Philadelphia: Foreign Policy Research Institute.

WAR POWERS

Not appearing in the Constitution, the phrase "war powers" nonetheless describes a cluster of powers exercised by the President or Congress, together or separately, to combat both domestic insurgency and foreign military enemies. They comprise those activities necessary "to wage war successfully," including the raising of troops, the provision of equipment and supplies, the mobilization of opinion, and the maintenance of security in loyal areas (during civil war or insurgency) or on the home front (during foreign war).

As with all governmental activity, the legitimacy of the war powers depends ultimately on explicit or implicit sources in the Constitution. Among these are the grants to Congress of authority "to declare War," to raise, maintain, and make rules for federal military forces, and "to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions." Other sources include the Article I authorization to suspend the privilege of the writ of HABEAS CORPUS "when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it," the Article II clauses making the President COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF, giving him power to make treaties subject to Senate consent, and charging him to "take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed," and the Article IV commitments guaranteeing "to every State . . . a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT" and pledging protection against invasion and domestic violence. Magnifying all these grants is the NECESSARY AND PROPER CLAUSE.

Contrariwise, only in exceptional circumstances have officials instituted TREASON prosecutions, for in Article III the Framers laid out strict evidentiary requirements, owing to the crime's draconian connotations. But such seemingly plausible restrictions as the FIRST AMENDMENT and Fifth Amendment, the principle of SEPARATION OF POWERS, and the rule against delegation of power have seldom proved real barriers to effective wartime government; and generally JUDICIAL REVIEW has had little impact on the power to make war.

As early as 1792, Congress empowered the President to call forth state militias when "combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings" prevented the execution of federal law. Used during the WHISKEY REBELLION (1794), and subsequently modified to include regular military forces and to clarify the President's authority to determine the existence of emergency, this provision later helped undergird President ABRAHAM LINCOLN's response to the siege of Fort Sumter. The ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS of 1798 provide another early illustration of legislative-executive collaboration; adopted during the Quasi-War with France, they posed the enduring issue of reconciling CIVIL LIBERTIES with the perceived requirements of internal security.

Although Presidents THOMAS JEFFERSON and ANDREW JACKSON confronted serious opposition to enforcement of federal law during the Embargo and NULLIFICATION crises, the CIVIL WAR produced the first comprehensive test of the war powers' true potential. With only a slender statutory base—or none at all—for much of his action, Lincoln called out the militia, requested federal volunteer troops, increased the size of the regular army and navy, spent money from the treasury, established a naval blockade of the Confederacy, and suspended the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. When Congress finally met at Lincoln's call, on July 4, 1861, it confronted not only a program already in place but also the President's explanation that his actions, "whether strictly legal or not, were ventured upon under what appeared to be a popular demand and a public necessity, trusting . . . that Congress would readily ratify them."

Besides retroactively endorsing much of the Lincoln program, Congress voted appropriations and passed confiscation, legal tender, and draft legislation to support the defeat of the rebellion. It also authorized Lincoln's seizure of the Union's telegraphs and railways in January 1862. The general rule of the Civil War, however, was executive initiative under the theory that the Constitution had been intended to provide government adequate to all contingencies. This view built on THE FEDERALIST #23 and LUTHER V. BORDEN (1849) and gained important wartime endorsement in the PRIZE CASES (1863). Its fullest elaboration appeared in War Powers under the Constitution of the United States, a massive exposition and compilation by William Whiting, the War Department's solicitor.

Even Lincoln's internal security program, which emphasized military arrest without warrant, detention without trial, and release once danger had passed, escaped serious censure during the war itself, despite the short-term imprisonment of some 13,000 to 25,000 northern civilians. Typical of Court review of war powers disputes, Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY's attack on the suspension of habeas corpus, in Ex parte Merryman (1861), was feeble and futile, while the more serious blow in EX PARTE MILLIGAN came in 1866, after the war had ended.

In WORLD WAR I, WOODROW WILSON by no means ignored the Lincoln model; such key agencies as the War Industries Board and the Committee on Public Information rested solely on executive authority. But the bulk of the internal effort during 1917–1918 relied on congressional delegation of power. Wilson in turn delegated authority to a host of administrative agencies that exercised direct control of the sinews of war.

The resulting intervention contrasted markedly with the Civil War experience. Bolstering prewar statutes that had given the President power to place mandatory defense contracts with private firms, the Lever Act (1917) constituted the war's largest delegation of power. It allowed sweeping regulation of priorities, production, and prices throughout the economy; yet in only a minor detail did the Supreme Court eventually rule the act unconstitutional, in United States v. Cohen Grocery Company (1921). The Trading with the Enemy Act (1917) permitted control of foreign commodity and currency transactions, encountered no significant judicial challenge, and later provided a statutory base for President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's "Bank Holiday" during the economic emergency of the Great Depression. (Not until 1977 did Congress limit the law's availability to periods of declared war—and then provided a slightly narrower set of financial powers for use in other crises.) The SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT (1917) gave free rein to Wilson in establishing draft machinery and received strong endorsement in the SELECTIVE DRAFT LAW CASES (1918), a decision supplying precedent for upholding selective service legislation in World War II and the Cold War. The ESPIONAGE ACT (1917) and SEDITION ACT (1918) enlisted the judicial system and were upheld in SCHENCK V. UNITED STATES (1919), ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919), and Pierce v. United States (1920). Over 1,900 prosecutions took place under these two measures, with 930 convictions.

In WORLD WAR II, President Roosevelt effectively combined the Lincoln and Wilson approaches. He based many actions and agencies on his INHERENT POWERS as commander-in-chief, even when tackling problems of domestic mobilization. The National War Labor Board is an example. Created in January 1942 to insure against labor strife and work stoppages in war industries, its orders were in theory only "informatory," "at most advisory"; yet companies violating the orders were denied federal contracts and needed materials. Recalcitrant workers risked revocation of their draft exemptions and denial of other jobs within the jurisdiction of the United States Employment Service. Although avowedly established under authority vested in Roosevelt "by the Constitution and the statutes of the United States" (a commonly used formula for World War II agencies), until June 1943 the Board actually had no statutory base but rather fell under the Office of Emergency Management, itself a creation within the Executive Office of the President.

Other action rested on legislation. In September 1939, well before American entry into the war, Roosevelt's declaration of a national emergency activated laws, some dating to before World War I, that empowered him to increase the size of the army and navy, regulate banking and currency dealing, take over factories and power plants, reallocate appropriations among executive departments and agencies, and censor wire and radio communications. The Lend-Lease Act (1941) delegated the broadest procurement powers ever given to a President, yet it was never challenged judicially. The Office of Price Administration, established under the Emergency Price Control Act (1942), provided the major wartime inflation fighting program; like the nonstatutory agencies, it often employed indirect sanction that proved impossible to challenge judicially. Decisions validating the act included YAKUS V. UNITED STATES (1944), Bowles v. Willingham (1944), and Steuart and Brothers v. Bowles (1944). Not surprisingly, the war's proliferation of alphabetical agencies dwarfed the New Deal's.

In addition, the government had a sedition law available (the Smith Act of 1940), but widespread support for the war meant relatively few prosecutions. The Japanese American relocation program—the single most blatant obstruction of CIVIL LIBERTIES in the nation's history—instead had its own flimsy legislative base and for practical purposes received judicial sanction in the Japanese American Cases—Hirabayashi v. United States (1943) and Korematsu v. United States (1944).

The lesson of the two world wars, as Clinton Rossiter accurately summarized, is "that in time of war Congress can pass just about any law it wants as a "necessary and proper' accessory to the delegated war powers; that the President can make just about any use of such law he sees fit; and that the people with their overt or silent resistance, not the Court with its power of judicial review, will set the only practical limits to arrogance of abuse." Indeed, even popular resistance, real or imagined, generally has proved more of a challenge to be subdued than a restrictive hurdle.

Punctuated by limited wars in Korea and Vietnam, the period of Cold War since 1945 conveys a similar lesson: if Congress and the President act together, little likelihood exists of judicial challenge. In this respect President HARRY S. TRUMAN erred during the KOREAN WAR, when a plant seizure triggered Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer (1952). As for the VIETNAM WAR, Presidents LYNDON B. JOHNSON and RICHARD M. NIXON found that despite flagging public support, Congress kept voting supplies until the main fighting was over. For its part, the judiciary moved only gingerly when limiting use of war-related powers, as in NEW YORK TIMES V. UNITED STATES (1971) (government secrecy), and UNITED STATES V. UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT (1972) (national security electronic surveillance). Moreover, the Supreme Court in LAIRD V. TATUM (1972) held that the courts lacked jurisdiction over a challenge to the use of military personnel to gather domestic intelligence pertaining to potential public disorder; and other courts managed to discover executive-legislative agreement in Congress's decision finally to cut appropriations for operations in or over Cambodia.

Future Presidents may not benefit so readily from legislative acquiescence. Soon after enacting the War Powers Resolution (1973) to control external warmaking by the President, Congress passed the NATIONAL EMERGENCIES ACT (1976). Recent studies had disclosed that four declarations of national emergency were still in effect, one dating to 1933 and another to 1950; these proclamations activated 470 provisions of federal law, many of which lingered from the two world wars and Korea. The 1976 law ended these existing emergencies two years after its passage, mandated periodic six-month review of any future emergency declarations, and made them terminable by CONCURRENT RESOLUTION—a procedure of doubtful constitutionality under IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983). The act also required Presidents to inform Congress fully of the legislative basis for emergency actions. But subsequent response to President JIMMY CARTER's declaration of national emergency over the Iranian hostage crisis (1979) indicated little congressional desire to adhere rigorously to the new requirements.

Whenever a crisis plausibly justifies their exercise, the war powers seem likely to continue to generate government centered in the executive branch, emphasizing energetic administration that transcends normal restrictions, and on occasion sufficiently vigorous to warrant the label "constitutional dictatorship."

CHARLES A. LOFGREN
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Congressional War Powers; Presidential War Powers.)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. (1957) 1984 The President: Office and Powers, 1787–1984, 5th ed., revised by Randall W. Bland, Theodore T. Hindson, and Jack W. Peltason. New York: New York University Press.

FISHER, LOUIS 1985 Constitutional Conflicts between Congress and the President. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

ROSSITER, CLINTON (1948) 1963 Constitutional Dictatorship: Crisis Government in the Modern Democracies. New York: Harcourt, Brace.

——— (1951) 1976 The Supreme Court and the Commander in Chief. Expanded edition by Richard P. Longaker. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

WAR POWERS
(Update 1)

The phrase "war powers" does not appear in the Constitution. By the mid-1980s a complex of specific grants in the document nonetheless provided the federal government broad authority to protect national security through military action abroad and domestic mobilization. Court decisions and practice had established that when Congress and the President acted in concert, hardly any barriers existed, except on those rare occasions involving violations of the BILL OF RIGHTS. Executive action lacking congressional endorsement had proved more debatable, although less litigated. Courts had not effectively challenged presidential ventures abroad, nor had Congress itself institutionally challenged the President, save when the VIETNAM WAR was nearly over.

In the late 1980s little changed. Because of the absence of foreign conflicts sufficient to require domestic mobilization and controls, existing case law pertaining to the home front in wartime remained undisturbed, encapsulated in an earlier era. Indeed, this situation seemed likely to continue, because by the end of the decade shifts within the former "Communist bloc" significantly lessened the chance that the nation would again see massive domestic build-ups like those of WORLD WAR I and WORLD WAR II. (Reserve call-ups during the American confrontation and war with Iraq in 1990–1991 proved, however, that lesser mobilizations could still occur.)

Even the JAPANESE AMERICAN CASES sat untouched. To be sure, Congress offered its tardy amends for the World War II relocation program, providing modest compensation for surviving internees; and with an assist from academic researchers who uncovered evidentiary deficiencies and procedural irregularities in the wartime prosecutions, the original federal trial courts used the old writ of error coram nobis to vacate the convictions of Gordon Hirabayashi, Fred Korematsu, and Minoru Yasui. But the major Supreme Court decisions from 1943 and 1944 now served amazingly as authority for viewing race as a SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION.

Abroad, presidential war making continued. Following his popular intervention in Grenada in 1983 and his more controversial use of marines in Lebanon during the same period (which Congress finally authorized), President RONALD REAGAN sent naval forces to the Persian Gulf in 1987–1988 to protect oil shipments during the Iran-Iraq War. In December 1989 his successor, GEORGE BUSH, committed troops to combat in Panama, after failing to dislodge Panamanian dictator Manuel Noriega by other means. Then, beginning in August 1990, Iraq's invasion and occupation of Kuwait triggered an escalating response by Bush that recalled memories of both the KOREAN WAR and the VIETNAM WAR. Both Presidents skirted the reporting requirements of the 1973 War Powers Resolution. By late 1990 some twenty-one instances of presidential war making had arguably fallen under the coverage of the law since its passage, but in only one (during GERALD R. FORD's tenure) had a President explicitly reported to Congress that he had sent forces into hostilities or situations of imminent hostility.

The Panamanian episode typified the practice. Bush informed Congress, but stated that his report was "consistent with" the War Powers Resolution, not pursuant to it. In particular, he carefully avoided mention of section 4(a)(1), the provision defining the commitment of forces that triggers the law's requirement for troop withdrawal after sixty days unless Congress authorizes continuation. The military operations, Bush said, "were ordered pursuant to my constitutional authority with respect to the conduct of foreign relations and as Commander in Chief."

Such actions did not go entirely unchallenged. After Reagan ordered naval forces to the Persian Gulf, just as in 1982 after he sent military advisers into El Salvador, individual members of Congress asked the federal District Court for the District of Columbia to enjoin the President to file the report required to start the War Powers Resolution's sixty-day "clock." In Lowry v. Reagan (D.D.C. 1987) the court declined, invoking the D.C. Circuit's doctrine of "remedial discretion" by finding that the members' dispute was not with the President, but with their legislative colleagues who refused to pass legislation starting the clock. The court added that the POLITICAL QUESTIONS doctrine also barred the suit in its present form, because a court injunction could endanger diplomatic initiatives through multiple pronouncements on a sensitive matter.

The demonstrated ineffectiveness of the War Powers Resolution in turn led to proposals to amend it. This step became more urgent because most authorities viewed IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983) as invalidating the law's provision for use of a CONCURRENT RESOLUTION to terminate a military action prior to the sixty-day deadline. Suggested changes included tightening key definitions within the law, substituting joint resolutions for concurrent resolutions as the disallowance mechanism, specifying which members of Congress the President was to consult under the act's consultation requirement, eliminating the sixty-day limit on the use of force without congressional approval, and granting individual members of Congress standing in court challenges under the War Powers Resolution. By mid-1991, none of the proposals had passed.

These disputes, along with covert arms-for-hostages deals in the Middle East and support for the Contra rebels in Nicaragua, produced renewed debate over the constitutional locus of the external war-making power. Defenders of presidential initiatives predictably trotted out arguments for inherent EXECUTIVE POWER that dated back to ALEXANDER HAMILTON's "Pacificus" essays in 1793 and had received apparent endorsement in UNITED STATES V. CURTISS-WRIGHT EXPORT CORP. (1936). Critics again quickly pointed out the egregious historical errors in such defenses. Talk of an "imperial Congress" also missed the point, they argued, because the constitutional framework contemplated congressional control of foreign commitments and policy decisions relating to military force. In December 1990, while the Iraqi crisis heightened, U.S. District Judge Harold H. Greene agreed in Dellums v. Bush (D.D.C. 1990) that the Constitution gives Congress authority over offensive warfare. At the same time, relying on the doctrine of RIPENESS, he declined to enjoin President Bush from acting without congressional authorization. Although denying he needed it before ordering an attack on Iraq, Bush requested congressional approval anyway in January 1991, and received it with votes of 52–47 in the Senate and 250–183 in the House of Representatives.

Overall, neither side clearly prevailed in the recurring constitutional disputes over warmaking. The subject remained largely within the "zone of twilight" identified during the Korean War by Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON in YOUNGSTOWN SHEET & TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1952).

CHARLES A. LOFGREN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Congress and Foreign Policy; Congressional War Powers; Foreign Affairs and the Constitution; Presidential War Powers; Senate and Foreign Policy; War, Foreign Affairs, and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

ELY, JOHN HART 1988 Suppose Congress Wanted a War Powers Act That Worked. Columbia Law Review 88:1379–1431.

HENKIN, LOUIS et al. 1989 The Constitution in Its Third Century: Foreign Affairs. American Journal of International Law 83:713–900. Symposium Issue.

WORMUTH, FRANCIS D. and FIRMAGE, EDWIN B. 1989 To Chain the Dog of War: The War Power of Congress in History and Law, 2nd ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

WAR POWERS
(Update 2)

The war powers have generated two principal constitutional issues. The first concerns the locus of power to initiate hostilities. The Constitution gives Congress the power to decide whether the nation should go to war while leaving the President authority to "repel sudden attacks." Since the 1950s, however, Presidents have repeatedly claimed that their FOREIGN AFFAIRS and COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF powers now permit them to initiate hostilities of any type, without Congress's approval.

This claimed presidential war power is defended on several grounds, none of which squares with ORGINAL INTENT. First, it is said that, given their "limited objectives," today's military conflicts are not "wars"; instead, they are labeled "peacekeeping" operations, "police actions," "humanitarian interventions," "offensive military attacks," or "nation building," for which congressional approval is allegedly unnecessary. Second, it is asserted that the power to "repel sudden attacks" permits the executive to initiate so-called "defensive wars" to protect U.S. interests throughout the world. Third, it is argued that because Presidents have previously used military force without Congress's approval, the power to declare war now belongs to the executive; this ignores YOUNGSTOWN SHEET AND TUBE CO. V. SAWYER (1952), IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), and NEW YORK V. UNITED STATES (1992), which held that even long-standing practice cannot justify one branch's usurping the power of another. Finally, Presidents assert that they may use military force to implement the UNITED NATIONS CHARTER and mutual defense pacts such as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and the South East Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO) even though these treaties commit the U.S. to respond only in accord with its "constitutional processes."

President WILLIAM J. CLINTON has relied on these arguments in using military force without congressional approval. He unilaterally ordered missile strikes against Baghdad, Iraq, claiming this was an act of "self-defense" against an earlier attempt on the life of President GEORGE H. W. BUSH. Clinton used combat troops for "nation building" in Somalia without congressional sanction. He threatened to invade Haiti "to carry out the will of the United Nations," denying that Congress's permission was needed. He ordered air strikes in Bosnia and Kosovo as part of joint UN–NATO operations, without prior consent from Congress.

Lawsuits challenging presidential war-making have uniformly failed on JUSTICIABILITY grounds. Raines v. Byrd (1997) will make future challenges by members of Congress even more difficult. Raines suggested that as a matter of SEPARATION OF POWERS, Congress lacks STANDING to challenge actions of the President because the role of Article III courts is to protect the "rights and liberties of individual citizens," not redress "injury to official authority or power."

The second major question involving the war powers is the extent to which they may support domestic LEGISLATION. This became a critical issue after WORLD WAR I when Congress invoked its war powers to enact liquor PROHIBITION, operate the nation's rail and communications systems, outlaw profiteering, prosecute strikers, suppress radicals, and censor the leftist press. The Supreme Court, though upholding most of these laws, agreed that war powers legislation is subject to JUDICIAL REVIEW. Since the expansion of the COMMERCE CLAUSE in the late-1930s, Congress has had little need to use its war powers for domestic purposes. Yet to the extent UNITED STATES V. LÓPEZ (1995) signals a narrowing of the commerce power, Congress may again be tempted to invoke its war powers in the domestic sphere. Should this occur, questions concerning the scope of these powers may return to center stage.

CHRISTOPHER N. MAY (2000)

(SEE ALSO: Congress and Foreign Policy; Congressional Standing; Congressional War Powers; Presidential Powers; Senate and Foreign Policy; War, Foreign Affairs, and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

ELY, JOHN HART 1993 War and Responsibility: Constitutional Lessons of Vietnam and its Aftermath. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

FISHER, LOUIS 1995 Presidential War Power. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas.

MAY, CHRISTOPHER N. 1989 In the Name of War: Judicial Review and the War Powers since 1918. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS 1967 National Commitments. Senate Report No. 797, 90th Congress, 1st Session. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office.

WAR POWERS ACTS
First War Powers Act
55 Stat. 838 (1941)
Second War Powers Act
56 Stat. 176 (1942)

Enacted less than two weeks after the bombing of Pearl Harbor (see WORLD WAR II), the First War Powers Act was similar to the WORLD WAR I Overman Act (1917). It delegated to the President virtually complete authority to reorganize the executive branch, the independent government agencies, and government corporations in any manner he deemed appropriate to expedite prosecution of the war. That power, and reorganizations accomplished under it, were to remain in force until six months after the end of the war. The act also authorized the President to censor mail and other forms of communication between the United States and foreign countries.

The Second War Powers Act, passed three months after the first, further strengthened the executive branch for conduct of the war. It authorized acquisition of land for military or naval purposes, by condemnation if necessary. It also suspended some provisions of the HATCH ACT (1939), relaxed NATURALIZATION standards for ALIENS serving in the armed forces, established procedures for war production contracting, and authorized several other adjustments of governmental affairs.

The War Powers Acts, like their predecessors, represented an attempt to accommodate the concentration of power necessary for the prosecution of the war to the accustomed forms of constitutional government.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

WARRANT

See: Arrest Warrant; General Warrant; Search Warrant

WARRANTLESS SEARCH

The FOURTH AMENDMENT makes no explicit provision for warrantless searches. The first clause of the amendment provides simply that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES, shall not be violated." This general prohibition is followed by another clause that provides more particularly for the issuance of SEARCH WARRANTS. The amendment itself does not indicate what connection there is between the two clauses (which are separated only by a comma and the word "and"). Accordingly, its application to various kinds of warrantless searches has depended heavily on which clause the Supreme Court favors. On the one hand, the first clause might be regarded as the main provision, searches pursuant to a warrant being only one type of reasonable search that is authorized. Or, if the second clause be emphasized, the absence of a search warrant might be regarded ordinarily as itself making a search unreasonable, the requirement of a warrant being disregarded only in exceptional circumstances including particularly lack of an opportunity to obtain one.

Some kinds of warrantless search are obviously necessary to the performance of other official duties. A police officer who unexpectedly makes an ARREST of someone committing a violent crime may necessarily search him for weapons. If the Fourth Amendment were deemed to prohibit every search without a warrant, one would be driven to the conclusion that the arresting officer's conduct was not a search at all within its contemplation. Current interpretation of the Fourth Amendment has avoided such an all-or-nothing approach. The amendment is applicable to a very wide range of official conduct interfering with expectations of privacy; within that context, the prevailing rules have established a number of situations in which a warrant to search is unnecessary.

The first such situation is the SEARCH INCIDENT TO AN ARREST. The need for an arresting officer to ensure that the person whom he arrests does not have in his possession a weapon or means of escape is the basis for the most frequently applied exception to the requirement of a warrant. Because police actively engaged in crime prevention often come on circumstances calling for an arrest without advance notice, a search incident to the arrest must be made without a warrant. Although not strictly necessary to effectuate the arrest, another reason for allowing a search is to prevent the arrestee from destroying EVIDENCE in his possession. The Supreme Court said in CHIMEL V. CALIFORNIA (1969) that all three justifications are sufficient to authorize a search of the arrestee's person and the area "within his immediate control" from which he might grab something. That general rule defines an area that may be searched without a warrant following an arrest, whether or not there is particular reason to believe that anything subject to seizure is there to be grabbed and, indeed, whether or not there is reason to believe that the arrestee is likely to grab anything. In effect, the rule authorizes a not-too-intensive search of the arrestee, including small containers on his person like a wallet or purse, and a small area around the place of the arrest. If a person were arrested in his home, the rule would authorize a limited search of the table or desk at which he sat, but not all the contents of the room or the contents of other rooms.

The scope of this rule illustrates a general feature of the exceptions to the warrant requirement. Although from time to time the Court has intimated that such exceptions depend on an emergency that demands a search before a warrant could practicably be obtained, the rule does not depend on a particularized finding of that kind. In some cases, the rule has been applied to uphold a search even though the arresting officers could easily have (or even had) removed the person from the area searched or immobilized him. (One might note also that the rule applies fully to arrests that are not unanticipated, even though in that case a warrant could presumably have been obtained.) The evident rationale is that a warrantless search incident to an arrest is so often necessary that it is impractical to require particular justification in each case.

Warrants are not required for AUTOMOBILE SEARCHES in various circumstances. Although automobiles (and other motor vehicles) as private places enjoy the protection of the Fourth Amendment, two distinct lines of analysis have markedly limited the application to them of the requirement of a search warrant. Automobiles, the Supreme Court has said, are subject to much greater regulation and inspection than dwellings; the expectation of privacy in them is much less. Having reached that judgment, the Court has not modified it to differentiate between areas like the back seat that are generally open to view and closed or concealed areas like the trunk or glove compartment that are not.

If police officers obtain lawful custody of an automobile which they have PROBABLE CAUSE to search for evidence of a crime, a warrantless search is allowed for some period, a few hours at least, after custody is obtained. This rule is based not only on the lesser expectation of privacy attached to an automobile but also on its mobility and the unpredictability with which custody often is obtained. The Supreme Court has not been persuaded that the immobilization of the car while it is in custody ordinarily makes it unnecessary to allow a search until a warrant has been obtained. Second, if officers have lawful custody of an automobile and routinely follow a regular custodial procedure, like an inventory of its contents, a search performed as part of the procedure is permitted. The routine nature of such practices, which are followed by many police departments, has persuaded the Supreme Court that they are reasonable. (Also, the arrest-incident exception authorizes a thorough search of the passenger compartment of an automobile, including all containers within it, as an incident of the arrest of an occupant.)

A search at the time and place of an arrest is likely to be limited by the circumstances to weapons or means of escape and only the most obvious evidentiary items. Later, when the person is about to be placed in detention or while he is in detention, there is opportunity for a more thorough search; sometimes, the evidentiary significance of an item is not plain at the time of the arrest and is revealed as the investigation proceeds. The police have authority to make a very thorough search without a warrant of items removed from the arrested person and held by them while he is lawfully detained temporarily in a jail or similar facility. The arrest, it has been said, being the more significant interference with liberty, includes the lesser intrusion on privacy occasioned by the search. Furthermore, a search is authorized at the time and place of the arrest and it is routine administrative procedure to impound and perhaps inventory a person's effects before he is placed in a cell; therefore, it is reasoned, the fact that some time elapses between the arrest and the search has no constitutional significance.

The most general exception to the requirement of a search warrant allows the police and other public officials to search without a warrant in EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES: an emergency furnishing adequate grounds for a search that has to be carried out before a warrant can be obtained. A search incident to the unanticipated arrest of a potentially dangerous person is an example of this more general category, although justified by a special rule. Another example is an entry and search of private premises while in "hot pursuit" of someone who has just committed a crime; police officers are not required to interrupt the chase until they have obtained a warrant. Similarly, officers responding to a cry for help or acting to avert a danger inside private premises need not wait to obtain a warrant. It has usually been held also that if officers have particular, reliable information that specific evidence of crime is about to be destroyed and there is not time to obtain a warrant, they can enter to prevent its destruction.

In such cases, authority to search without a warrant is tailored to the emergency. The officers claiming the authority must not themselves be responsible for the existence of the emergency; if, for example, they unreasonably delayed applying for a warrant until it was too late, they could not then assert their inability to obtain a warrant. Also, the authority extends only as far as the emergency requires. Entering in hot pursuit, officers could also search for weapons that the person whom they are pursuing might use against them; but once having him in custody, they could not continue to search solely for evidence.

The regulation of persons and goods entering or leaving the country has always been understood to provide a special basis for warrantless searches. Public officials who supervise traffic across the border are authorized to inspect goods and to require a person crossing the border to submit to a thorough search. (See BORDER SEARCHES.) Some comprehensive statutory programs for the regulation of industry and commerce have authorized warrantless entries and inspections. Such procedures have been upheld if a requirement of a warrant might be expected to frustrate the regulatory program and the business in question is generally subject to close governmental supervision: for example, gun and liquor dealerships, and mines. Similarly, the Supreme Court has held that inspection visits to the home by a welfare official can be made a condition of receipt of public welfare. In other cases, the Court has concluded that the regulatory purpose of a statute did not require that warrantless (unannounced) searches be allowed.

In some circumstances, a brief invasion of personal privacy less intrusive than a full search is allowed without a warrant. Most common is the protective "frisk" or patdown of a person whose conduct a police officer has reason to investigate and who he reasonably suspects may be armed. There being no opportunity to obtain a warrant, the safe performance of the officer's investigative duty justifies a limited search for weapons. Likewise, traffic officers are allowed to make routine checks for driver's licenses and automobile registrations, so long as the checks follow an established pattern or there are specific grounds for a departure from the pattern. Routine inspection of passengers and carry-on luggage has been upheld as a regulatory measure to prevent airplane hijacking. In these cases, not only is the procedure in question thought to be less objectionable than a full search; there is no way to accomplish the legitimate objective of the procedure consistently with a requirement of a warrant.

The Fourth Amendment does not insist that persons protect a privacy that they are willing to forego. Accordingly, a warrant to search is not required if a person having authority to do so voluntarily admits public officials and permits them to search. A consensual search that is successful often is challenged later on the grounds that consent was not given fully voluntarily or did not extend to the actual search; or, if the premises are shared by others, it may be claimed that the person who consented did not have the independent authority to do so. While a resolution of such issues may depend on difficult matters of fact, the basic principle that a search with consent does not require a warrant is unquestioned.

Those who believe that the requirement of a search warrant is a significant protection against UNREASONABLE SEARCHES may conclude that the Supreme Court has drawn the categories of lawful warrantless searches too broadly. Categories like the search incident to arrest, automobile search, and jail search appear to depend only on the premises that such searches often are fruitful and sometimes have to be made before a warrant can be obtained. But the categories are general and require neither premise to be fulfilled in the particular case; each of them encourages the police to make a large number of searches routinely, without particular justification. This approach, it can be argued, is inconsistent with the plain purpose of the Fourth Amendment to prohibit general searches: unfocused, unlimited rummaging in the privacy of individuals.

Critics of the Court have observed also that its analysis of warrantless searches is to a considerable degree incoherent. Why, for example, should an arrest justify the search of any area surrounding the arrestee, if he can be and often is removed from that place before the search is made? Why should automobiles, which often are used for the same private purposes as dwellings, be treated categorically as less private? Why should an arrest automatically defeat the person's separate interest in the privacy of items in his possession? The Court's failure to provide convincing answers to such questions has rendered this part of Fourth Amendment DOCTRINE only a set of rules without supporting rationale.

A defense of the rules for warrantless searches begins with the premise that warrants are peculiarly appropriate for planned investigative searches and have much less utility in the ordinary unplanned encounters between police or other public officials and private persons. If legitimate police duties justify an encounter, then a search related in purpose is also legitimate. This approach places a great deal of emphasis on the requirement that a search be "reasonable" and construes that term with attention to common police practices as well as the individual interest in privacy. To limit warrantless searches to cases of manifest necessity would blink the natural—and therefore reasonable—impulse of police officers to search whatever is legitimately in their custody and may furnish evidence of crime. Some explanation for the breadth of the exceptions to the requirement of a warrant may lie also in the fact that the issue is almost always tested in the context of a criminal prosecution, when the defendant seeks the protection of the EXCLUSIONARY RULE to avoid the admission of incriminating evidence that a search has uncovered.

LLOYD L. WEINREB
(1986)

Bibliography

AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE 1975 A Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure. Philadelphia: American Law Institute.

AMSTERDAM, ANTHONY G. 1974 Perspectives on the Fourth Amendment. Minnesota Law Review 58:349–477.

LAFAVE, WAYNE R. 1978 Search and Seizure. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

LANDYNSKI, JACOB W. 1966 Search and Seizure and the Supreme Court. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

WEINREB, LLOYD L. 1974 Generalities of the Fourth Amendment. University of Chicago Law Review 42:47–85.

WARREN, CHARLES
(1868–1954)

Charles Warren was a Boston lawyer who, as assistant attorney general of the United States, drafted the ESPIONAGE ACT and argued many cases before the Supreme Court. He became an expert on constitutional and legal history. He wrote excellent books in the tradition of the old school of high-minded conservative nationalists who rejected CHARLES BEARD's economic interpretation. Among his leading books are A History of the American Bar, A History of Harvard Law School, The Supreme Court in United States History, which won the Pulitzer Prize, Congress, the Constitution, and the Supreme Court, and The Making of the Constitution. His works still merit reading and remain influential. His article on the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 helped lead the Supreme Court in ERIE RAILROAD V. TOMKINS (1938) to overrule almost a century of decisions based on SWIFT V. TYSON (1842).

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WARREN, EARL
(1891–1974)

The fourteenth CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States, Earl Warren presided over the most sweeping judicial reinterpretation of the Constitution in generations. He served from October 1953 to June 1969. In that time the SUPREME COURT, overruling the doctrine that SEPARATE BUT EQUAL facilities for black persons satisfied the requirement of EQUAL PROTECTION, outlawed official racial SEGREGATION in every area of life. The Court ended the long-established rural bias of legislative representation by opening the question to judicial scrutiny and then ruling that citizens must be represented equally in state legislatures and the national House of Representatives. It imposed constitutional restraints for the first time on the law of LIBEL, hitherto a matter entirely of state concern. It applied to the states the standards set by the BILL OF RIGHTS for federal CRIMINAL PROCEDURE: the right of all poor defendants to free counsel, for example, and the prohibition of unreasonable SEARCHES AND SEIZURES, enforced by the EXCLUSIONARY RULE. It limited government power to punish unorthodox beliefs and enlarged the individual's freedom to express herself or himself in unconventional, even shocking ways.

The WARREN COURT, as it was generally called, had as profound an impact on American life as any Supreme Court since the time of JOHN MARSHALL. It was extraordinary not only in the scale but in the direction of its exercise of power. From Marshall's day to the Court's clash with President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT in the 1930s judges had exercised a conservative influence in the American system. Shortly before his appointment to the Court in 1941 ROBERT H. JACKSON wrote that "never in its entire history can the Supreme Court be said to have for a single hour been representative of anything except the relatively conservative forces of its day." But the Warren Court in its time was perhaps the principal engine of American liberal reform.

Earl Warren seemed an unlikely figure to lead such a judicial revolution. He was a Republican politician, the elected attorney general of California and for three terms its phenomenally popular governor. In 1948 he was the Republican candidate for vice-president, on the ticket headed by Thomas E. Dewey. On naming him Chief Justice, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER emphasized his "middle-of-the-road philosophy." Yet within a few years billboards in the South demanded Warren's IMPEACHMENT, and the paranoid right charged that he was doing the work of communism. Putting aside the rantings of extremists, there was no doubt that as Chief Justice Warren consistently favored liberal values and unembarrassedly translated them into constitutional doctrine. Where did that commitment come from in a man whose appearance was that of a bland, hearty political figure?

There were in fact clues in his life and earlier career. He was born in Los Angeles in 1891, the son of a Norwegian immigrant who worked for the Southern Pacific Railroad. He knew poverty and personal tragedy. As a young man he was a railroad callboy, waking up the gangs, and he saw men with their legs cut off in accidents carried in on planks. His father was murdered, the murderer never found: a traumatic event that must have helped to point Warren in the direction of justice, legal and social. He put himself through college and law school at the University of California. After a brief try at private practice he spent all his life in public office, as a local prosecutor and crusading district attorney before winning statewide office.

In California politics he at first had the support of conservatives. As attorney general he blocked the nomination of Max Radin, a law professor known as a legal realist, to the state supreme court because Radin was a "radical." As attorney general and governor Warren was a leading proponent of the WORLD WAR II federal order removing all persons of Japanese ancestry from the West Coast and putting them in desolate camps; opposing their return in 1943, he said, "If the Japs are released, no one will be able to tell a saboteur from any other Jap." (In a memoir published after his death, Warren wrote: "I have since deeply regretted the removal order and my own testimony advocating it, because it was not in keeping with our American concept of freedom and the rights of citizens. . . .")

But in 1945 Warren astounded political California by proposing a state program of prepaid medical insurance. Characteristically, he did so not for ideological but for human, practical reasons: he had fallen ill and realized how catastrophic serious illness would be for a person without resources. Then, in his last two terms as governor, he became an apostle of liberal Republicanism. A later Democratic governor, Edmund G. Brown, said Warren "was the best governor California ever had. . . . He felt the people of California were in his care, and he cared for them."

Many Americans and other people around the world saw that same paternal image in Earl Warren the Chief Justice, for he became an international symbol. He represented the hope of authority bringing justice to the downtrodden, an American vision of change by law rather than by rebellion. A single case gave Warren that status: BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION, the 1954 school segregation decision. In recent years the Supreme Court had chipped away at PLESSY V. FERGUSON, the 1896 decision allowing what were termed "separate but equal" facilities but what were almost always in fact grossly inferior schools and other public institutions for blacks. Yet in 1953 seventeen southern and border states, with forty percent of the national enrollment, still confined black children to separate public schools; moreover, there was involved here, unlike higher education, the compulsory daily association of children. The emotional content of the legal question was high. The Court had given the most gingerly handling to the question, restoring the issue to the calendar for reargument.

Warren became Chief Justice before the second argument. The following May he delivered the opinion for a unanimous Court holding public school segregation unconstitutional. The unanimity was itself a striking feature of the result, and a surprising one. Expected southern resistance made unanimity politically essential, but the known attitudes of some members of the Court had suggested the likelihood of dissents. Richard Kluger's exhaustive study has demonstrated that the new Chief Justice played a crucial part in his management of the process inside the Court. After argument he delayed formal discussion of the cases in conference to avoid the development of rigid positions among the nine Justices. Then he stated as his view that the separate-but-equal doctrine could not be maintained unless one thought blacks inherently inferior: an approach likely to induce shame in any judge prepared to argue for that outcome. He persuaded his colleagues even then to avoid a formal vote but to continue discussing the cases, in tight secrecy, among themselves. He wrote an opinion in simple terms. Finally, he persuaded reluctant members of the Court to join for the sake of unanimity. A law clerk present at a late meeting between the Chief Justice and the most reluctant, STANLEY F. REED, remembers him saying, "Stan, you're all by yourself in this now. You've got to decide whether it's really the best thing for the country."

What is known about the process of decision in the school cases throws lights on one question asked during his lifetime: did Chief Justice Warren exercise leadership or have influence in the Court beyond his own vote in conference? He shared that bench with men of strong personality and conviction: in particular HUGO L. BLACK, who said the judicial duty was to follow the literal language of the Constitution and found in it absolutes, and FELIX FRANKFURTER, who scorned absolutes and said the Court should defer to the political branches of government in applying the uncertain commands of the Constitution. Warren came to the Court utterly inexperienced in its work; how could he have effective influence? The school cases show that he did.

No Chief Justice can command his associates' beliefs. If Warren had served with different, more conservative colleagues, many of the views that made history might have been expressed by him in dissent. Changes while he was on the Court greatly affected the trend of doctrine, in particular the retirement of Justice Frankfurter in 1962 and his replacement by ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG, who was much readier to join Warren in intervening on behalf of liberal values. But the identification of that Court with its Chief Justice, for all its logical imperfection, has substantial basis in reality.

Warren wrote the opinions of the Court not only in Brown but in later cases that dramatically overturned expectations. The most important of these—Warren himself thought them the weightiest decisions of his years on the Court—were the REAPPORTIONMENT cases. A divided Supreme Court in COLEGROVE V. GREEN (1946) had refused to entertain an attack on numerical inequality in political districts, an opinion by Justice Frankfurter saying that courts must stay out of the "political thicket." In 1962 the Warren Court, in an opinion by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, overthrew that doctrine of reluctance and said that federal courts could consider issues of fairness in districting. The decision in BAKER V. CARR left open the substantive questions: must the population be the test of equality, or may states weigh geography or other factors in districting? Does the same standard apply to both houses of legislatures? The answers were given by Chief Justice Warren in 1964, in terms so firm that some who listened in the courtroom felt as if they were at a second American constitutional convention. In REYNOLDS V. SIMS Warren said for a 6–3 majority that every house of every state legislature must be apportioned on the basis of population alone, with the districts as nearly equal as practicable. Few cases in any court ever had so direct and immediate an impact on a nation's politics; reapportionment was required in most of the fifty states, ancient legislative expectations were upset, new suburban power vindicated. Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN predicted in dissent, as had Justice Frankfurter in Baker v. Carr, that the courts would not be able to manage the apportionment litigation—or to enforce their decisions against political resistance. But the gloomy prediction was wrong. Resistance from political incumbents quickly collapsed; nothing like the emotional public opposition to the school segregation cases developed in any region.

Emotions were aroused by Warren's opinion in MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), holding that before questioning an arrested person the police must warn him that he has a right to remain silent and a right to see a lawyer first—one provided by the state if he cannot afford one—and that a confession obtained in violation of that rule is inadmissible at trial. The decision touched a nerve among police, prosecutors, and others convinced that judges were impeding the fight against crime. Miranda climaxed a series of cases holding local police to the standards of the Bill of Rights: for example, MAPP V. OHIO (1961), exclusion of illegally obtained evidence; GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT (1963), right to counsel; Griffin v. California (1965), right against self-incrimination;, each overruling an earlier decision. In Spano v. New York (1959) Warren commented: "The abhorrence of society to the use of involuntary confessions does not turn alone on their inherent untrustworthiness. It also turns on the deep-rooted feeling that the police must obey the law while enforcing the law; that in the end life and liberty can be as much endangered from illegal methods used to convict those thought to be criminals as from the actual criminals themselves." Impatient with reviewing the facts in case after case of claimed coercion, the Court under Warren sought a general prophylactic rule—and wrote it in Miranda.

Objection to the Miranda decision came not only from the law enforcement community. More dispassionate critics saw it as an example of overreaching by the Warren Court. The opinion seemed more legislative in character than judicial, laying out what amounted to a code of police procedure with little basis in precedent. Moreover, the Court did not confront a situation in which reform by other means was blocked, as it had with school segregation and malapportioned legislatures; various reformers were working on the confession problem.

Freedom of expression was another subject of fundamental constitutional development during the Warren years. The most important single decision was probably NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964), holding that a public official may not recover libel damages unless the statement was published with knowledge of its falsity or in reckless disregard of truth or falsity. That opinion was by Justice Brennan. Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS wrote for the Court in LAMONT V. POSTMASTER GENERAL (1965), holding that a statute requiring the post office to detain "Communist political propaganda" from abroad unless the addressee requested its delivery violated the FIRST AMENDMENT—the first federal statute that the Supreme Court ever held invalid under that amendment. Warren joined in these and other expansive decisions. He wrote for a 5–4 majority in UNITED STATES V. ROBEL (1967), striking down a law that forbade the employment in defense plants of any member of an organization required to register under the Subversive Activities Control Act. Warren's opinion for a unanimous Court in Bond v. Floyd (1966) held that the Georgia legislature could not exclude a duly elected member because he had expressed admiration for draft resisters.

The one area of expression in which Warren departed from the majority of his colleagues was OBSCENITY. He thought that local and national authorities should have a relatively free hand to combat what he evidently regarded as a social evil. Thus, while in Miranda imposing a national standard for fair pretrial procedures in criminal cases, he argued in dissent in JACOBELLIS V. OHIO (1964) that each local community should be allowed to fix its own standard of obscenity, a view that became the law under Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER in MILLER V. CALIFORNIA (1973). Another example of a departure from Warren's usual approach came when gambling was involved. He generally favored broad application of the right against self-incrimination; but when the rule was applied for the benefit of a gambler in MARCHETTI V. UNITED STATES (1968), he alone dissented. Once again he saw a social evil.

Scholarly critics of Chief Justice Warren saw the obscenity and gambling cases as illustrating a fundamental shortcoming in a judge: a concern to reach particular results rather than to work out principles applicable whoever the parties in a case might be. In Warren's view, it seemed, justice consisted not in providing a philosophically satisfactory process and basis of decision but in seeing that the right side, the good side, won in each case. Many of the commentators regretted the lack of a consistent doctrinal thread in his opinions. There was nothing like Justice Black's exaltation of the constitutional text, or Justice Frankfurter's institutional concern for self-restraint.

G. Edward White, in a full-length study of Warren's work, rejected the general scholarly view that Warren had no rudder as a judge and lacked craftsmanship. He was an ethicist, White concluded, who saw his craft as "discovering ethical imperatives in a maze of confusion"—and in the Constitution. Thus the prosecutor so hard on corruption that he was called a boy scout, the Californian politician who stood aloof from party machines lest he be sullied, became a judicial enforcer of ethical imperatives. In general his sympathy lay with the little person, with victims, with people excluded from the benefits of our democracy. But he also was in the tradition of the American Progressives, who thought that government could be made to work for the people. Those two themes came together in the reapportionment cases, decisions designed to make democracy work better by making the electoral process fairer. John Hart Ely, in an analysis of judicial review as practiced in the Warren years, suggested that many of the pathbreaking decisions had a democratic structural purpose: to assure access for the powerless and thus make the system work.

There was a directness, a simplicity in Warren's opinions on the largest issues. "Legislators represent people," he wrote in the reapportionment cases, "not acres or trees. Legislators are elected by voters, not farms or cities or economic interests. . . . The weight of a citizen's vote cannot be made to depend on where he lives." When the Court held unconstitutional a statute depriving a native-born American of his citizenship for deserting the armed forces in time of war, TROP V. DULLES (1958), Warren for a plurality argued that EXPATRIATION was a CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The death penalty would not have been "cruel," he conceded, but the deprivation of citizenship was, for it caused "the total destruction of the individual's status in organized society" and cost him "the right to have rights."

Warren's whole career suggests that he was a person born not to muse but to act—and to govern. That view provides a connecting thread through all the offices he held. In each he exerted his powerful abilities in the ways open to him. As a prosecutor he fought crime. As wartime attorney general and governor he was a patriot, worrying about spies. In the postwar years, he turned to the social problems of an expanding California. As Chief Justice, too, he was committed to action, to using the opportunities available to make an impression on American life: to break the pattern of malapportionment, to attack local police abuses, to condemn racial discrimination. The instinct to govern did not leave Earl Warren when he put on a robe.

Many regarded him as a heroic figure because he put aside philosophical concerns and technical legal issues and dealt squarely with what he considered outrageous situations. And there were outrages in American life: official racism, political discrimination, abuse of police authority, suppression of free expression. Warren as Chief Justice had the conviction, the humanity, and the capacity for growth to deal effectively with those issues inside that prickly institution, the Supreme Court. But there were those who shared Justice LEARNED HAND's doubts about rule by judges, however beneficent. "For myself," Hand wrote in 1958, with the contemporary Supreme Court in mind, "it would be most irksome to be ruled by a bevy of Platonic Guardians, even if I knew how to choose them, which I assuredly do not." Earl Warren may have been the closest thing the United States has had to a constitutional Platonic Guardian, dispensing law without any sensed limit of authority except what he saw as the good of society. He was a decent, kindly law-giver. But the exercise of such power by other judges—before and after Warren—has not always had kindly or rational results. The questions about judicial power remain after its extraordinary uses in the Warren years.

ANTHONY LEWIS
(1986)

Bibliography

ELY, JOHN HART 1980 Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

KLUGER, RICHARD 1975 Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality. New York: Knopf.

SCHWARTZ, BERNARD 1983 Superchief. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday.

WHITE, G. EDWARD 1982 Earl Warren: A Public Life. New York: Oxford University Press.

WARREN COURT

It was surely the best known Supreme Court in history, and probably the most controversial. Its grand themes—racial equality, REAPPORTIONMENT, the separation of religion and education, DUE PROCESS—became matters of public consciousness. Its leading judges—HUGO L. BLACK, WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, FELIX FRANKFURTER, JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, and EARL WARREN—became personages in whom the general public took an interest. When the Warren Court came into being in October 1953, the Supreme Court was the least known and least active of the major branches of government; by the retirement of Chief Justice Warren in June 1969, nearly everyone in American life had been affected by a Warren Court decision, and a great many Americans had firm opinions about the Supreme Court. When Warren was appointed Chief Justice, few commentators took note of the fact that he had had no previous judicial experience and had spent the last twelve years as a state politician. By the time WARREN E. BURGER succeeded Warren as Chief Justice the process of nominating a Justice to the Supreme Court had become an elaborate search for the "experienced," uncontroversial, and predictable nominee, and the Court was to lower its profile again.

The Warren Court years, then, were years in which the Supreme Court of the United States made itself a vital force in American culture. A striking pattern of interchange between the Court and the general public emerged in these years. As public issues, such as CIVIL RIGHTS or legislative malapportionment surfaced, these issues became translated into constitutional law cases. The Court, expanding the conventional ambit of its JURISDICTION, reached out to decide those cases, thereby making an authoritative contribution to the public debate. As the Court continued to reach out, the public came to rely on its presence, and the American JUDICIAL SYSTEM came to be perceived as a forum for the resolution of contemporary social problems. The use of the Supreme Court as an institution for redressing grievances ignored by Congress or state legislatures became common with the Warren Court.

The origins of the Warren Court can officially be traced to September 8, 1953, when Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON died of a heart attack. By September 30, President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER had named Warren, the governor of California who had been a rival candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 1952, as Vinson's successor. This nominal creation of the Warren Court did not, however, hint at its character. Indeed that character was not immediately apparent. Even the Court's first momentous decision, BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), announced in May of its first term, was in some respects a holdover from the Vinson Court. Brown had been argued before the Vinson Court, was based in part on Vinson Court precedents chipping away at RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in education, and was decided by a Court whose only new member was its Chief Justice. It was a cautious decision, apparently assuming that DESEGREGATION would be a long and slow process.

But Brown was also the Warren Court's baptism of fire. All the elements that were to mark subsequent major Warren Court decisions were present in Brown. Brown involved a major social problem, racial discrimination, translated into a legal question, the constitutionality of SEPARATE BUT EQUAL public schools. It posed an issue that no other branch of government was anxious to address. It raised questions that had distinctively moral implications: in invalidating racial SEGREGATION the Court was condemning the idea of racial supremacy. And it affected the lives of ordinary citizens, not merely in the South, not merely in public education, for the Court's series of PER CURIAM decisions after Brown revealed that it did not consider racial segregation any more valid in other public facilities than it had in schools. The Warren Court had significantly altered race relations in America.

The context of the Warren Court's first momentous decision was decisive in shaping the Court's character as a branch of government that was not disinclined to resolve difficult social issues, not hesitant to foster social change, not reluctant to involve itself in controversy. By contrast, the legislative and executive branches appeared as equivocators and fainthearts. The Warren Court was deluged with criticism for its decision in Brown, both from persons who resisted having to change habits of prejudice and from scholars who faulted the reasoning of the Court's opinion. This response only seemed to make the Court more resolute.

The deliberations of Brown also served to identify some of the Justices whose presence was to help shape the character of the Warren Court. Earl Warren transformed a closely divided Court, which had postponed a decision on Brown because it was uncertain and fragmented on the case's resolution, into a unanimous voice. That transformation was a testament to Warren's remarkable ability to relate to other people and to convince them of the rightness of his views. In Brown he had argued that those who would support the separate but equal doctrine should recognize that it was based on claims of racial superiority. That argument struck home to at least two Justices, TOM C. CLARK and STANLEY F. REED, who had grown up in the South. When Warren had finished his round of office visits and discussions, he had secured nine votes for his majority opinion and had suppressed the writing of separate concurrences. ROBERT H. JACKSON, a long holdout in Brown who was dubious about the possibility of finding a doctrinal rationale to invalidate the separate but equal principle, joined Warren's opinion and left a hospital bed to appear in court the day the decision was announced.

A silent partner in the Brown decision had been Felix Frankfurter. By the late 1950s Frankfurter's jurisprudence, which stressed a limited role for judges in reviewing the constitutionality of legislative decisions, had rigidified, isolating Frankfurter from many other justices and identifying him as one of the guardians of a theory of judicial self-restraint. Judicial self-restraint in Brown would have supported the separate but equal doctrine, since that doctrine itself signified a judicial reluctance to disturb legislative enactments forcibly separating persons on the basis of race. Frankfurter, however, could not abide the consequences of continued deference to the separate but equal doctrine, but he did not want to expose the lack of "restraint" that his position assumed. He accordingly confided his views on Brown only to Warren and worked toward fashioning a decree—containing the controversial phrase ALL DELIBERATE SPEED as a guideline for implementing desegregation—that would temper the shock of the Brown mandate. At the appropriate moment he joined Warren's opinion.

The partnership of Warren and Frankfurter in the segregation cases contrasted with the usual posture of both Justices on the Warren Court. Warren's approach to judging, with its relative indifference to doctrinal reasoning and to institutional considerations, its emphasis on the morally or ethically appropriate result, and its expansive interpretation of the Court's review powers, was the antithesis of Frankfurter's. For the most part the two men sharply disagreed over the results or the reasoning of major Warren Court decisions, with Frankfurter enlisting a stable of academic supporters in his behalf and Warren seeking to bypass doctrinal or institutional objections to make broad ethical appeals to the public at large.

The presence of two other significant Warren Court Justices, HUGO BLACK and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, was also felt in Brown. Black, a native of Clay County, Alabama, and fleetingly a member of the Ku Klux Klan, had been an opponent of racial discrimination since being elected to the Senate in 1926. He had supported the Vinson Court precedents crippling "separate but equal," for which he had received outspoken criticism in his home state. His position in Brown was well known early on: an uncompromising opposition to discriminatory practices. Such positions were characteristic of Black on the Warren Court. He staked out positions decisively, held them with tenacity, and constantly sought to convert others to his views. His theory of constitutional adjucation, which placed great emphasis on a "literal" but "liberal" construction of BILL OF RIGHTS protections, was a major contribution to Warren Court jurisprudence.

Equally outspoken and tenacious, and even more activist than Black, was William O. Douglas, whose academic experience, which paralleled Frankfurter's, had generated a strikingly different conception of judicial behavior. Douglas did not agonize over issues of institutional deference and doctrinal principle; he took his power to make law as a given and sought to use it to promote values in which he believed. The values were principally those associated with twentieth-century libertarianism and egalitarianism. Douglas spoke out for small business, organized labor, disadvantaged minorities, consumers, the poor, dissidents, and those who valued their privacy and their freedom from governmental restraint. Douglas's role on the Warren Court was that of an ideologue, anxious to secure results and confident that he could find doctrinal justifications. Together, Black and Douglas prodded the Court to vindicate even the most unpopular forms of free expression and minority rights.

While the Warren Court was generally regarded as an activist Court and a liberal Court, it was not exclusively so, and not all its members could be characterized as either activists or liberals. Until his retirement in 1962, at the midway point of Warren's tenure, Frankfurter had vociferously protested against an excessively broad interpretation of the Court's review powers, a position that resulted in his supporting the constitutionality of a number of "conservative" legislative policies. Other Justices on the Warren Court were either disinclined to exercise sweeping review powers or less enthusiastic than Warren, Black, or Douglas about the policies of twentieth-century liberalism. Most influential among those Justices was John Harlan, an Eisenhower appointee who joined the Court in 1955 and remained until 1971.

Harlan frequently and adroitly rejected the assumptions of Warren Court majorities that "every major social ill in this country can find its cure in some constitutional "principle" and that the Court could be "a general haven for reform movements." Moreover, in a group of Justices who were often impatient to reach results and not inclined to linger over the niceties of doctrinal analysis, Harlan distinguished himself by producing painstakingly crafted opinions. Often Harlan's quarrels with a majority would be over the method by which results were reached; his concurrences and dissents regularly demonstrated the complexities of constitutional adjudication.

The Warren Court will be best known for its identification with three themes: egalitarianism, liberalism, and activism. From Brown through POWELL V. MCCORMACK (1969), Earl Warren's last major opinion, the Court demonstrated a dedication to the principle of equality, a principle that, in Archibald Cox's felicitous phrase, "once loosed . . . is not easily cabined." Race relations were the initial context in which the Court attempted to refine the meaning of equal justice in America. Once the ordeal of Brown was concluded, that meaning seemed comparatively straightforward. In a series of per curiam opinions, the Court extended Brown to public beaches, parks, recreational facilities, housing developments, public buildings, eating facilities, and hospitals. The conception of equality embodied by these decisions was that of equality of opportunity: blacks could not be denied the opportunity of access to public places.

Brown had been rationalized by the Court on similar grounds: the gravamen of the injustice in a segregated school system was a denial of equal educational opportunities to blacks. But equality of opportunity became difficult to distinguish, in the race cases, from the conception of equality of condition. The Court presumed that classifications based on race were constitutionally suspect and seemed to suggest that equal justice in the race relations area required something like color-blindness. Classifications based on race or skin color not only denied black Americans equal opportunities, they also were not based on any rational judgment, since the human condition transcended superficial differences of race. After the per curiams, the massive resistance to Brown, and the civil rights movement of the 1960s, the Court gradually perceived that equality in race relations necessitated the eradication of stigmas based on skin color. This momentum of egalitarianism culminated in Loving v. Virginia (1967), in which the Court invalidated state prohibitions of miscegenous marriages, thereby affirming the absence of fundamental differences between blacks and whites.

Between the per curiams and Loving had come skirmishes between the Court and groups resisting its mandates for change in race relations. COOPER V. AARON (1963) involved a challenge by the governor of Arkansas to compulsory integration in the Little Rock school system. The Court, in an unprecedented opinion signed individually by all nine Justices, reaffirmed the obligations of Southern schools to integrate. Goss v. Board of Education (1963) invalidated minority-to-majority transfer plans whose purpose was to allow students to attend schools outside their districts in which their race was in the majority. HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL V. UNITED STATES (1964) and Katzenbach v. McClung (1964) used the Constitution's COMMERCE CLAUSE and the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 to prevent hotels and restaurants from refusing service to blacks. BURTON V. WILMINGTON PARKING AUTHORITY (1961) and Evans v. Newton (1966) showed the Court's willingness to use the DOCTRINE of "STATE ACTION" to compel ostensibly private establishments (restaurants and parks) to admit blacks.

After Loving the Court grew impatient with resistance to the implementation of its decrees in Brown. In GREEN V. NEW KENT COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD (1968) the Court scrutinized the actual effect of "freedom of choice" plans, where students attended schools of their own choice. The Court found that the system perpetuated segregation when eighty-five percent of the black children in a school district had remained in a previously all-black school and no white child had chosen to attend that school, and advised that "delays are no longer tolerable." Finally, in ALEXANDER V. HOLMES COUNTY BOARD OF EDUCATION (1969) the Court declared that the time for racial integration of previously segregated school systems was "at once." Green and Alexander compelled integration of schools and other public facilities. Equality of condition had become the dominant means to achieve the goal of equality.

One can see a similar trend in the area of reapportionment. For the first half of the twentieth century, including the early years of the Warren Court, state legislatures were not apportioned solely on the basis of population. Upper houses of legislatures had a variety of means for electing their members, some deliberately unresponsive to demographic concerns, and few states apportioned legislative seats on the basis of ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE. In Baker v. Carr (1962), however, the Court announced that it would scrutinize Tennessee's system of electing state legislators to see if it conformed to the population of districts in the state. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, a former student of Frankfurter's, rejected the POLITICAL QUESTION doctrine Frankfurter had consistently imposed as a barrier to Court determination of reapportionment cases. Frankfurter wrote an impassioned dissent in Baker, but the way was clear for constitutional challenges to malapportioned legislatures. By 1964 suits challenging legislative apportionment schemes had been filed in more than thirty states.

Chief Justice Warren's opinion for the Court in REYNOLDS V. SIMS (1964), a case testing Alabama's reapportionment system, demonstrated how the idea of equality had infused the reapportionment cases. "We are cautioned," he wrote, "about the dangers of entering into political thickets and mathematical quagmires. Our answer to this: a denial of constitutionally protected rights demands judicial protection; our oath and our office require no less of us. . . . To the extent that a citizen's right to vote is debased, he is that much less a citizen." Equality did not mean merely an equal opportunity to have representatives from one's district in a state legislature, but that all votes of all citizens were to be treated equally: voting, like race relations, was to be an area in which equality of condition was to prevail.

The Court provided for such equality even where the state's citizens had indicated a preference for another scheme. In LUCAS V. FORTY-FOURTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY (1964), the Court invalidated Colorado's districting plan apportioning only one house of the legislature on a population basis. This plan had been adopted after a statewide referendum in which a majority rejected population-based apportionment for both houses. Warren found that the scheme did not satisfy the equal protection clause because it was not harmonious with the principle of one person, one vote. Voting was a condition of CITIZENSHIP, not just an opportunity to participate in government.

In free speech cases, the Warren Court struggled to move beyond a "marketplace" approach, in which majorities could perhaps suppress speech with distasteful content, to an approach where all speakers were presumed to have an equal right to express their thoughts. The approach was first developed in "communist sympathizer" cases, where a minority of the Court objected to laws making it a crime to be a member of the Communist party or to advocate Communist party doctrine. Eventually, in BRANDENBURG V. OHIO (1969), a unanimous Court distinguished between "mere advocacy" of views and "incitement to imminent lawless action." That case involved statements made by a member of the Ku Klux Klan at a rally that were derogatory of blacks and Jews. The fact that the speaker was known to belong to an organization historically linked to racism and violence was not enough to hinder expression of his views.

Brandenburg united, without entirely clarifying, a number of strands of Warren Court FIRST AMENDMENT doctrine. In the OVERBREADTH cases, such as NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Flowers (1964), APTHEKER V. SECRETARY OF STATE (1964), KEYISHIAN V. BOARD OF REGENTS (1967), and UNITED STATES V. ROBEL (1967), the Court found that legitimate governmental prohibitions on speech that employed "means which sweep unnecessarily broadly" violated the First Amendment, because they might deter the behavior of others who could not legitimately be prohibited from speaking. In the SYMBOLIC SPEECH cases, the Court considered the permissibility of wearing black arm bands (TINKER V. DES MOINES COMMUNITY SCHOOL DISTRICT, 1969) or burning draft cards (UNITED STATES V. O'BRIEN, 1968) or mutilating flags (Street v. New York, 1969) as a means of protesting the Vietnam War. Finally, in the "sit-in" and "picketing" cases, such as COX V. LOUISIANA (1964), Brown v. Louisiana (1966), and ADDERLEY V. FLORIDA (1966), the Court sought to distinguish protected "expression" from unprotected but related "conduct." In none of these areas was the Court's doctrinal position clear—draft card burners and picketers were denied constitutional protection, although flag mutilators and "sit-in" demonstrators were granted it—but the decisions revealed the Warren Court's interest in carving out an area of First Amendment protection that was not dependent on public support for the speaker or his actions.

The Warren Court also attempted to extend the First Amendment's reach into other doctrinal areas, notably defamation and OBSCENITY. In NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN (1964) the Court concluded that common law libel actions could raise First Amendment issues. The Court's opinion, which found that the First Amendment gave rise to a constitutional privilege to make false and defamatory statements about public officials if the statements were not made with recklessness or malice, expressed concern that libel law could be used as a means of punishing "unpopular" speech. Justice Brennan's majority opinion referred to "a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open," and spoke of the "inhibiting" effects of civil damages on "those who would give voice to public criticism."

Once the First Amendment was seen as relevant to defamation cases, the future of common law principles in the area of libel and slander seemed precarious. New York Times v. Sullivan had established a constitutional privilege to publish information about "public officials." Rosenblatt v. Baer (1966) widened the meaning of "public official" to include a supervisor of a county-owned ski resort; Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts (1967) and Associated Press v. Walker (1967) included "public figures" as well as public officials in the category of those in whose affairs the general public had a special interest; Time, Inc. v. Hill (1967) found a privilege to disclose "private" but newsworthy information.

The defamation cases showed the tendency of the equality principle to expand once set in motion: it seemed hard to distinguish different rules for public officials, public figures, and matters of public interest. Such was also true in the area of obscenity. Once the Court recognized, as it did in ROTH V. UNITED STATES (1957), that First Amendment concerns were relevant in obscenity cases, and yet a core of unprotected expression remained, it was forced to define obscenity. Thirteen obscenity cases between 1957 and 1968 produced fifty-five separate opinions from the Justices, but the meaning of "obscene" for constitutional purposes was not made much clearer. Some Justices, such as Black and Douglas, decided that obscene speech was entitled to as much constitutional protection as any other speech, but a shifting majority of the Court continued to deny protection for expressions that, by one standard or another, could be deemed "obscene." Among the criteria announced by Court majorities for labeling a work "obscene" was that it appeal to a "prurient interest," and that it be "patently offensive" and "utterly without redeeming social value." Justice Stewart, in JACOBELLIS V. OHIO (1964), announced a different criterion: "I know [obscenity] when I see it." Eventually, after Redrup v. New York (1967), the Court began to reverse summarily all obscenity convictions whenever five Justices, for whatever reason, adjudged a work not to be obscene.

A final area of unprotected expression involved the FIGHTING WORDS doctrine of CHAPLINSKY V. NEW HAMPSHIRE (1942). A series of Warren Court cases, including Edwards v. South Carolina (1963), Gregory v. Chicago (1969) and even New York Times v. Sullivan, with its language about "vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials," may have reduced Chaplinsky to insignificance.

The pattern of First Amendment decisions, taken with its opinions on race relations and reapportionment, not only demonstrated the Warren Court's shifting conceptions of equality but stamped it in the popular mind as a "liberal" Court. Liberalism has been identified, in the years after World War II, with support for affirmative government and protection of civil rights; the Warren Court was notable for its efforts to insure that interventionist government and civil libertarianism could coexist. But in so doing the Warren Court redefined the locus of interventionist government in America. Brown v. Board of Education was a classic example. Congress and the state legislatures were not taking sufficient action to preserve the rights of blacks, so the Court intervened to scrutinize their conduct and, where necessary, to compel them to act. This role for the Court was a major change from that performed by its predecessors. "Liberal" judging in the early twentieth century, according to such defenders of interventionist government as Felix Frankfurter and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, meant judicial self-restraint: the Supreme Court was to avoid scrutiny of state and federal legislation whose purpose was to aid disadvantaged persons. The Warren Court eschewed that role to become the principal interventionist branch of government in the 1950s and 1960s.

In addition to its decisions in race relations and reapportionment, two other areas of Warren Court activity helped augment its public reputation as a "liberal" Court. The first area was CRIMINAL PROCEDURE: here the Court virtually rewrote the laws of the states to conform them to its understanding of the Constitution's requirements. The most important series of its criminal procedure decisions, from a doctrinal perspective, were the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE cases, where the Court struggled with the question of whether, and to what extent, the due process clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT incorporates procedural protections in the Bill of Rights, making those protections applicable against the states. The Warren Court began a process of "selective incorporation" of Bill of Rights safeguards, applying particular protections in given cases but refusing to endorse the incorporation doctrine in its entirety. This process produced some landmark decisions, notably MAPP V. OHIO (1961), which applied FOURTH AMENDMENT protections against illegal SEARCHES AND SEIZURES to state trials, and BENTON V. MARYLAND (1969), which held that the Fifth Amendment's DOUBLE JEOPARDY guarantee applied to the states. Other important "incorporation" cases were GRIFFIN V. CALIFORNIA (1965), maintaining a RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION; MALLOY V. HOGAN (1964), applying the Fifth Amendment's self-incrimination privilege to state proceedings; and DUNCAN V. LOUISIANA (1968), incorporating the Sixth Amendment's right to TRIAL BY JURY in criminal cases.

A major consequence of selective incorporation was that fewer criminal convictions were obtained in state trials. Particularly damaging to state prosecutors were the decisions in Mapp and Mallory, which eliminated from state court trials illegally secured evidence and coerced statements of incrimination. The Court also tightened the requirements for police conduct during the incarceration of criminal suspects. Malloy v. United States (1957) insisted that criminal defendants be brought before a magistrate prior to being interrogated. MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) announced a series of constitutional "warnings" that the police were required to give persons whom they had taken into custody. Miranda had been preceded by another significant case, ESCOBEDO V. ILLINOIS (1964), which had required that a lawyer be present during police investigations if a suspect requested one. Further, the landmark case of GIDEON V. WAINWRIGHT (1963) had insured that all persons suspected of crimes could secure the services of a lawyer if they desired such, whether they could afford them or not.

The result of this activity by the Warren Court in the area of criminal procedure was that nearly every stage of a POLICE INTERROGATION was fraught with constitutional complexities. The decisions, taken as a whole, seemed to be an effort to buttress the position of persons suspected of crimes by checking the power of the police: some opinions, such as Miranda, were explicit in stating that goal. By intervening in law enforcement proceedings to protect the rights of allegedly disadvantaged persons—a high percentage of criminals in the 1960s were poor and black—the Warren Court Justices were acting as liberal policymakers.

Church and state cases were another area in which the Court demonstrated its liberal sensibility, to the concern of many observers. Affirmative state action to promote religious values in the public schools—heretofore an aspect of America's educational heritage—was likely to be struck down as a violation of the establishment clause. In ENGEL V. VITALE (1962) the Court struck down nondenominational prayer readings in New York public schools. A year after Engel the Court also invalidated a Pennsylvania law that required reading from the Bible in ABINGTON TOWNSHIP SCHOOL DISTRICT V. SCHEMPP (1963) and a Maryland law that required recitation of the Lord's Prayer in Murrary v. Curlett (1963). (See RELIGION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.) In McGowan v. Maryland (1961), however, the Court permitted the state to impose SUNDAY CLOSING LAWS. Chief Justice Warren, for the Court, distinguished between laws with a religious purpose and laws "whose present purpose and effect" was secular, even though they were originally "motivated by religious forces." The Court invoked McGowan in a subsequent case, BOARD OF EDUCATION V. ALLEN (1968), which sustained a New York law providing for the loaning of textbooks from public to parochial schools.

Liberalism, as practiced by the Warren Court, produced a different institutional posture from earlier "reformist" judicial perspectives. As noted, liberalism required that the Court be both an activist governmental institution and a defender of minority rights. This meant that unlike previously "activist" Courts, such as the Courts of the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, its beneficiaries would be nonelites, and unlike previously "reformist" Courts, such as the Court of the late 1930s and 1940s, it would assume a scrutinizing rather than a passive stance toward the actions of other branches of government. Had the Warren Court retained either of these former roles, Brown, Baker v. Carr, and Miranda would likely not have been decided as they were. These decisions all offended entrenched elites and required modifications of existing governmental practices. In so deciding these cases the Warren Court was assuming that activism by the judiciary was required in order to produce liberal results. With this assumption came a mid-twentieth-century fusion of affirmative governmental action and protection for CIVIL LIBERTIES.

Maintaining a commitment to liberal theory while at the same time modifying its precepts required some analytical refinements in order to reconcile the protection of civil liberties with claims based on affirmative governmental action. In Brown the desires of some whites and some blacks to have a racially integrated educational experience conflicted with the desires of some whites and some blacks to limit their educational experiences to persons of their own race. The Court chose to prefer the former desire, basing its judgment on a theory of the educational process that minimized the relevance of race. That theory then became a guiding assumption for the Court's subsequent decisions in the race relations area.

Similar sets of intermediate distinctions between goals of liberal theory were made in other major cases. In the REAPPORTIONMENT cases the distinction was between REPRESENTATION based on population, a claim put forth by a disadvantaged minority, and other forms of proportional representation that had been endorsed by legislative majorities. The Court decided to prefer the former claim as more democratic and then made the one-person, one-vote principle the basis of its subsequent decisions. In the school prayer cases the distinction was between the choice of a majority to ritualize the recognition of a public deity in the public school and the choice of a minority to deny that recognition as out of place. The Court decided to prefer the latter choice as more libertarian. In the criminal procedure cases the distinction was between a majoritarian decision to protect the public against crime by advantaging law enforcement personnel in their encounters with persons suspected of committing crimes, and the claims of such persons that they were being unfairly disadvantaged. The Court chose to prefer the latter claims as being more consistent with principles of equal justice.

When the Warren Court reached the end of its tenure, liberalism clearly did not merely mean deference toward the decisions of democratic and representative bodies of government. It meant deference toward these decisions only if they promoted the goals of liberal policy: equality, fairness, protection of civil rights, support for disadvantaged persons. Under this model of liberal policymaking, the Supreme Court was more concerned with achieving enlightened results than it was with the constitutional process by which these results were reached. Liberalism and judicial activism went hand in hand.

As it became clear that the Court's activism was designed to promote a modified version of liberalism, the Court became vulnerable to public dissatisfaction with liberal policies. Such dissatisfaction emerged in the 1970s. The internal contradictions of liberalism became exposed in such areas as AFFIRMATIVE ACTION in higher education and forced busing in primary education, and the saving distinctions made by the Court in earlier cases appeared as naked policy choices whose legitimacy was debatable. If affirmative preference, based on race, for one class of applicants to an institution of higher learning results in disadvantage to other classes, equality of condition has not been achieved and equality of educational opportunity has been undermined. If some families are compelled to send their children to schools where they are racial minorities in order to achieve "racial balance" throughout the school system, the resulting "balance" may well disadvantage more people than it advantages. Equality and social justice have turned out to be more complicated concepts than mid-twentieth-century liberalism assumed.

The egalitarianism and the liberalism of the Warren Court paled in significance when compared to its activism. If contemporary America has become a "litigious society," as it is commonly portrayed, the Warren Court helped set in motion such trends. Social issues have habitually been transformed into legal questions in America, but the Warren Court seemed to welcome such a transformation, finding constitutional issues raised in contexts as diverse as reapportionment and prayers in the public schools. As the Court created new sources of constitutional protection, numerous persons sought to make themselves the beneficiaries. Sometimes the Court went out of its way to help the organizations litigating a case, as in the civil rights area. The result was that the lower courts and the Supreme Court became "activist" institutions—repositories of grievances, scrutinizers of the conduct of other branches of government, havens for the disadvantaged.

In the academic community, Warren Court activism was from the first regarded as more controversial than Warren Court egalitarianism. The reason was the prominence in academic circles of a two-pronged theory of JUDICIAL REVIEW, one prong of which stressed the necessity of grounding judicial decisions, in the area of constitutional law, in textually supportable principles of general applicability, and the other prong of which resurrected Frankfurter's conception of a limited, deferential role for the Court as a lawmaking institution. The Warren Court, according to academic critics, repeatedly violated the theory's dual standards. Decisions like Brown v. Board, Baker v. Carr, GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965), a case discovering a RIGHT OF PRIVACY in the Constitution that was violated by statutes forbidding the use of BIRTH CONTROL pills, and HARPER V. VIRGINIA BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966), a case invalidating POLL TAX requirements on voting as violating the EQUAL PROTECTION clause because such requirements conditioned VOTING RIGHTS on wealth, had not been sufficiently grounded in constitutional doctrine. There was no evidence that the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to reach segregated schools and there were no judicial decisions supporting that position. The Constitution did not single out for protection a right to vote, let alone a right to have one's vote weighed equally with the votes of others. "Privacy" was nowhere mentioned in the constitutional text. The framers of the Constitution had assumed a variety of suffrage restrictions, including ones based on wealth. In short, leading Warren Court decisions were not based on "neutral principles" of constitutional law.

Nor had the Court been mindful, critics felt, of its proper lawmaking posture in a democratic society where it was a conspicuously nondemocratic institution. In Brown it had ostensibly substituted its wisdom for that of Congress and several Southern states. In Baker it had forced legislatures to reapportion themselves even when a majority of a state's voters had signified their intention to staff one house of the legislature on grounds other than one person, one vote. In Engel v. Vitale it had told the public schools that they could not have government-formulated compulsory prayers, even though the vast majority of school officials and parents desired them. It had fashioned codes of criminal procedure for the police, ignoring Congress's abortive efforts in that direction. It had decided, after more than 200 years of defamation law, that the entire area needed to be reconsidered in light of the First Amendment.

A role for the Court as a deferential, principled decision maker was, however, not sacrosanct. Few Supreme Courts had assumed such a role in the past. All of the "great cases" in American constitutional history could be said to have produced activist decisions: MARBURY V. MADISON (1803), establishing the power of judicial review; MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) and GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824), delineating the scope of the federal commerce power; DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857), legitimizing SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES; the LEGAL TENDER CASES, deciding the constitutionality of legal tender notes; POLLOCK V. FARMERS LOAN AND TRUST (1895), declaring an income tax unconstitutional; LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905), scuttling state hours and wages legislation; UNITED STATES V. BUTLER (1936), invalidating a major portion of the New Deal's administrative structure. Activism was an ancient judicial art.

The Warren Court's activism differed from other Courts' versions principally not because its reasoning was more specious or its grasp of power more presumptuous but because its beneficiaries were different. Previous activist decisions had largely benefited entrenched elites, whether slaveowners, entrepreneurs, "combinations of capital," or businesses that sought to avoid government regulation. The activist decisions of the Warren Court benefited blacks, disadvantaged suburban voters, atheists, criminals, pornographers, and the poor. The Warren Court's activism facilitated social change rather than preserving the status quo. The critics of the Court had forgotten that the role they espoused for the judiciary had been created in order to facilitate change and promote the interests of the disadvantaged. In the 1950s and 1960s the "democratic" institutions charged with that responsibility had become unresponsive, so the Warren Court had acted in their stead. It was ironic that the same critics who were shocked at the Court of the 1930s' resistance to the New Deal should protest against a Court that was reaching the results they had then sought.

Activism was the principal basis of the Court's controversiality; egalitarianism its dominant instinctual reaction; liberalism its guiding political philosophy. The combination of these ingredients, plus the presence of some judicial giants, gave the Warren Court a prominence and a visibility that are not likely to be surpassed for some time. But even though countless persons in the American legal profession today were shaped by Warren Court decisions, one can see the Warren Court receding into history. That Court seemed to have been led, in the final analysis, by a conception of American life that appeared vindicated by the first fifty years of twentieth-century experience. That conception held that American society was continually progressing toward a nobler and brighter and more enlightened future. As Earl Warren wrote in a passage that appears on his tombstone:

> Where there is injustice, we should correct it;
> where there is poverty, we should eliminate it;
> where there is corruption, we should stamp it out;
> where there is violence, we should punish it;
> where there is neglect, we should provide care;
> where there is war, we should restore peace;
> and wherever corrections are achieved we should add them permanently to our storehouse of treasures.

In that passage appears the Warren Court sensibility: a sensibility dedicated to the active pursuit of ideals that have seemed less tangible and achievable with the years.

G. EDWARD WHITE
(1986)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER 1970 The Supreme Court and the Idea of Progress. New York: Harper & Row.

BLACK, CHARLES 1970 The Unfinished Business of the Warren Court. University of Washington Law Review 46:3–45.

COX, ARCHIBALD 1968 The Warren Court. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

KURLAND, PHILLIP 1970 Politics, the Constitution, and the Warren Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

LEVY, LEONARD W., ed. 1972 The Supreme Court under Earl Warren. New York: Quadrangle Books.

MCCLOSKEY, ROBERT 1960 The American Supreme Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

WECHSLER, HERBERT 1959 Toward Neutral Principles of Constitutional Law. Harvard Law Review 73:1–23.

WHITE, G. ROBERT 1976 The American Judicial Tradition. New York: Oxford University Press.

——— 1982 Earl Warren: A Public Life. New York: Oxford University Press.

WARTH v. SELDIN

See: Simon v. Eastern Kentucky Welfare Rights Organization

WASHINGTON, BUSHROD
(1762–1829)

Bushrod Washington served on the United States Supreme Court for thirty-one years, but he did not hand down many important DECISIONS. Lacking the analytical sweep of JOHN MARSHALL and the erudition and energy of JOSEPH STORY, he invariably supported their opinions which strengthened the power of the central government and encouraged the development of the economy. In fact, he was so closely allied with Chief Justice Marshall that another Justice on that Court, WILLIAM JOHNSON of South Carolina, observed that the two "are commonly estimated as a single judge."

Washington was well connected by birth. His mother came from a prominent Virginia family and his father, John, was a particularly close brother of GEORGE WASHINGTON. He graduated from the College of William and Mary in 1778 and served in the Continental Army. After the war he studied law in Philadelphia under JAMES WILSON. Returning to Virginia in 1787, he was admitted to the bar and elected to the Virginia state ratifying convention, where he supported the adoption of the United States Constitution. Following this he practiced law in Richmond, where he developed a reputation for being diligent and extremely knowledgeable. Many young men, including HENRY CLAY, came to read law under his direction. During the 1790s he joined the Federalist Party, and in 1798 JOHN ADAMS appointed him to the Supreme Court. A short time later, as the "favorite nephew" of the former President, he became executor of Washington's will and inherited Mount Vernon and his uncle's public and private papers, which he made available to Marshall for his Life of George Washington.

Bushrod Washington was particularly effective and conscientious in the performance of his circuit-riding duties, especially when he presided over jury trials. His tact and sense of fair play allowed him to enforce the Sedition Act of 1798 in a number of cases without engaging in the partisan politics that made SAMUEL CHASE and WILLIAM PATERSON so controversial. His most famous circuit court decision came in the case United States v. Bright (1809). This was the TREASON trial of a general of the Pennsylvania state militia who had been formally authorized to resist the United States Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Peters (1809). Following a confrontation with a federal marshal, and after President JAMES MADISON threatened to use force, the state eventually backed down, whereupon Bright and several other officers were arrested, tried, and convicted. (Madison eventually pardoned them on humanitarian grounds.) Bushrod Washington handled the trial, which took place in Philadelphia amid a highly charged atmosphere, with great skill, maintaining both decorum and the authority of the federal government. Sentencing Bright, he declared, "A State has no constitutional power . . . to employ force to resist the execution of a decree of a federal court, though such decree is deemed to have been beyond the JURISDICTION of the Court to make. . . ."

Several other decisions rendered by Bushrod Washington are of interest. In a concurring opinion in DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819) he tried to reign in some of the implications of Marshall's more sweeping decision. In GREEN V. BIDDLE (1823) he handed down what proved to be an unenforceable decision invalidating various Kentucky statutes adopted to protect settlers from absentee landlords. Finally, in OGDEN V. SAUNDERS (1827), he openly broke with Marshall, abandoned his own earlier circuit court decision in Golden v. Prince (1814), and declared that a state BANKRUPTCY ACT that had a prospective application did not violate the CONTRACT CLAUSE.

Bushrod Washington died in Philadelphia on November 26, 1829.

RICHARD E. ELLIS
(1986)

Bibliography

BLAUSTEIN, ALBERT P. and MERSKY, ROY M. 1969 Bushrod Washington. Pages 243–257 in Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., Justices of the Supreme Court, 1789–1969. New York: Chelsea House.

WASHINGTON, GEORGE
(1732–1799)

The people of the United States are indebted to no man so much as they are to George Washington. And the debt extends to his role in the creation of the American Constitution. As the general who led the revolutionary armies to victory and so vindicated American independence, as one of the few men who had traveled in virtually every part of the United States, including the vast Western wilderness, and as a leading citizen of northern Virginia, Washington was actively involved in the movement of affairs that culminated in the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. When the Convention met, he became its presiding officer. During the controversy over the RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION, the opposition to a strong executive was overcome by the universal assumption that Washington would be the first man to hold the office. When the Constitution was ratified and Washington did become President, he self-consciously seized the opportunity to set precedents for the conduct of governmental affairs. And when, after two terms in that office he handed over the reins of executive authority, he did so in perfect constitutional order and retired to his country seat.

The third son of a prosperous planter, Washington learned the surveying trade in his teens, and as a surveyor he traveled widely in the area west of the Appalachian Mountains. At twenty-one he was appointed to major in the Virginia militia, and when the French and Indian War broke out in 1754 he was promoted to lieutenant colonel and placed second in command of a regiment dispatched to the Ohio Valley. On his colonel's death, Washington took command and managed, without supplies, funds, competent subordinates, or trained noncommissioned officers and troops, to achieve initial military success. He was subsequently made an aide to the British commanding general, and in 1755, at the age of twenty-three, was promoted to colonel and made commander-in-chief of all Virginia forces, the highest ranking American military officer.

In 1759, Washington married Martha Custis, the wealthiest widow in Virginia, and, adding her holdings to his own, achieved a financial independence that would subsequently permit him to engage in a career of uncompensated public service. For a decade and a half he lived the life of a gentleman planter, with the attendant civic duties of serving as a justice of the peace and as a member of the House of Burgesses.

In 1769 Washington introduced in the House of Burgesses a series of resolutions (drafted by his friend and neighbor GEORGE MASON) denying the right of the British Parliament to tax the colonies and initiating the first ASSOCIATION. After passage of the Intolerable Acts in 1774, Washington introduced in the house the Fairfax County Resolves closing Virginia's trade with Britain. He was also elected a delegate to the FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS, which he attended in military uniform.

The Revolutionary War began in Spring 1775 when the Massachusetts militia forcibly resisted the attempt of British troops to seize its weapons and supplies. In June, on the motion of JOHN ADAMS, the CONTINENTAL CONGRESS adopted the Massachusetts militia as the Continental Army and appointed Washington commander-in-chief. The war lasted eight and one-half years, and Washington was the American commander for the whole period. The war was not an unrelieved military success on the American side, but the commander did learn to deal with Congress and with foreign allies, and he became, in his own person, the symbol of American national unity. Just before resigning his commission in 1783, he resisted the suggestion that the army, which had been shamefully left unpaid, should overthrow the Congress and establish its own government.

After his return to private life in 1784, Washington devoted his time to management of his property in Virginia and in the Ohio Valley. He became president of the Potomac Company, which had as its object the development of the Potomac River as a navigable waterway. And he engaged in a wide correspondence, always urging, in letters dealing with politics, the strengthening of the Union and an increase in the powers of Congress under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. In March 1785 he was host to a conference of commissioners from Maryland and Virginia that was supposed to discuss the navigation of the Potomac River but that, in the event, called for a broader conference—the Annapolis Convention—that ultimately led to the Constitutional Convention of 1787.

Pleading pressures of financial reverses and ill health, Washington was reluctant to accept election as a delegate to the Convention, but he did so at the repeated urging of JAMES MADISON and EDMUND RANDOLPH. At Philadelphia he was unanimously elected president of the Convention, although, as most of the debates were conducted in a committee of the whole house, he did not actually have to preside on most occasions. Although Washington did not take an active part in the recorded debates of the Convention, his attendance and his signature on the document as president of the Convention were offered as a guarantee of the result.

The first ELECTORAL COLLEGE under the new Constitution was elected in January 1789, and every member cast one of his two votes for George Washington. Washington learned of the result on April 14. His journey from Virginia to New York took a week, and involved parades and ceremonies in every town he passed through along the way; the affection and gratitude of the population were genuine, and Washington's task was to retain them while directing the executive affairs of the government.

Following his inauguration on April 30, Washington immediately began the business of running the executive branch of government. Everything he did set a precedent, not only for America but for the world, because his position as a republican chief executive was unique. Attention had to be given to such matters as the form of address and the conduct of social events so as to insure both the dignity of the federal executive and the republicanism of the country.

Every act in the process of governing had to be done a first time: the performance of each executive task, however routine, set the pattern for the permanent conduct of the presidency. The first bill to pass the new Congress was presented for Washington's signature on June 1: he affixed his signature, and the first statute under the Constitution became law. The first occasion for negotiating a treaty arose in August; in strict compliance with Article II, section 2, Washington appeared in person before the Senate to ask for ADVICE AND CONSENT and, when the Senate referred the matter to committee he stalked out. Since that day, Presidents have submitted treaties to the Senate after they are negotiated, but no President has asked for the Senate's advice before negotiations begin.

Statutes creating the three executive departments of state, war, and treasury were enacted during the summer of 1789. Washington appointed his fellow Virginian THOMAS JEFFERSON to be the first secretary of state, his wartime chief of artillery, General Henry Knox, to be secretary of war, and his former aide, Colonel ALEXANDER HAMILTON, to be secretary of the treasury. Although the Constitution provides only that the President may require written opinions from the principal executive officers, and that only as to their peculiar duties, Washington began the practice of meeting regularly with the three secretaries and the attorney general, Edmund Randolph, to discuss affairs of state generally. From this practice has come the notion of the American CABINET, as well as the accepted opinion that the heads of the executive departments are responsible primarily to the President, and not to Congress, for their official conduct.

But Washington had to appoint not only his cabinet officers but also every official in the executive branch down to customs inspectors and lighthouse keepers. Although the Constitution permitted Congress to vest inferior appointments in the chiefs of the departments, Congress did not immediately do so. Washington was besieged with applications from would-be federal bureaucrats. Indeed, had Congress desired to hamstring the President it might have been enough just to leave all federal appointments in his hands.

Besides the cabinet officers, the most important appointees were the Justices of the Supreme Court. The JUDICIARY ACT OF 1789 provided for six Justices. Washington nominated his friend JOHN JAY, who had been secretary of foreign affairs in the old government, to be Chief Justice. The other five nominees were drawn from different states, both to facilitate their performance of circuit duty and to make the Court representative of the whole country. Among them were three men who had been Washington's fellow delegates to the Constitutional Convention, JAMES WILSON, JOHN RUTLEDGE, and JOHN BLAIR. (See SUPREME COURT, 1789–1801.)

Once the machinery was in place, the issue became what policy the new government would follow. Washington, who had relied on Congressman James Madison for the machinery, turned to Secretary of the Treasury Hamilton for the policy. Hamilton's program was set forth in a series of reports submitted over the next two years. The program called for an alliance between the federal government and the wealthier citizens to promote the unity and prosperity of the nation. The Hamiltonian program provoked a controversy over the proper interpretation of constitutional provisions conferring power on the national government. Hamilton argued for BROAD CONSTRUCTION; Jefferson, for STRICT CONSTRUCTION. The arguments were reduced to writing at Washington's request to help him to decide whether to sign or to veto the BANK OF THE UNITED STATES ACT (1790). Washington, convinced by Hamilton's doctrine of IMPLIED POWERS, signed the act.

The French Revolution of 1789 provoked a further division between Washington's chief advisers. Most Americans initially sympathized with the French overthrow of the monarchy and the attempt to establish a republican form of government. But as the French Revolution became more extreme and expansionary, and as the conservative states of Europe mobilized to resist it, opinion became divided. Jefferson and his supporters continued to sympathize with the revolution, while Hamilton and his allies were inclined to side with the embattled British.

By 1793, the Wars of the French Revolution had become global, and American interests, particularly American shipping, were suffering the effects. Washington, with the assent of his whole cabinet, issued a PROCLAMATION OF NEUTRALITY in April 1793, warning American citizens to refrain from becoming involved on either side. Hamilton published a series of newspaper articles asserting, among other things, that the proclamation had been necessary because of the active support of France on the part of the Jeffersonians. Madison, replying in his own newspaper essays, claimed that Washington, by his unilateral issuance of the proclamation, had usurped the power of Congress to declare war and of the Senate to share in treaty making.

The first party lines in American politics under the Constitution had been drawn, and drawn on constitutional grounds. Jefferson resigned from the cabinet at the end of 1793. Thereafter, Washington's was a "Federalist" administration, with Jefferson, Madison, and the "Republicans" in opposition.

The WHISKEY REBELLION of 1794 presented the first organized resistance to the national government. Western Pennsylvania farmers, upset by an excise on whiskey that seemed unduly to burden their section of the country, threatened to use force to impede collection of the tax. Washington called 15,000 militiamen into federal service and himself set out to command the expedition. The rebellion was ultimately put down without bloodshed, and when two rebel leaders were subsequently convicted of TREASON, Washington pardoned them.

The administration's foreign policy also led to controversy at about the same time. Chief Justice Jay had been sent to Britain to negotiate a settlement of certain continuing difficulties in relations between the two countries. JAY'S TREATY contained many provisions favorable to British interests, and apparently detrimental to the economic interests of some regions of the United States, especially the South and West. The treaty also provoked constitutional controversy about the operation of the TREATY POWER. For example, would the Senate be required to advise and consent to the treaty as it was presented, or could the Senate amend a treaty? And could the President and the Senate enter into treaty commitments that would involve the expenditure of funds without the concurrence of the House of Representatives whose agreement was required for the appropriation of the funds? The treaty was approved in a partisan vote, but with a reservation suspending operation of certain objectionable provisions.

Washington chose not to seek a third term as President in the election of 1796. He was dismayed and distressed by the bitterness of the partisan rivalries that had grown up among men who had once been close colleagues, and he himself attempted always to remain above the partisan fray. WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS to his countrymen contained his strictures against the spirit of party, as well as his advice on foreign affairs and on public morality.

Even after his retirement to his estate at Mount Vernon, Washington could not escape either public service or partisan intrigue. When war with France seemed inevitable in 1798, President JOHN ADAMS nominated and the Senate unanimously confirmed Washington as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF. There immediately followed a scramble among Federalist military men for the subordinate general officer positions. Washington supported Hamilton, who ultimately became second in command. Under the circumstances it is not surprising that Washington thought of the Republicans, who had been pro-French, as dangerous men and that he supported the ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS.

Nevertheless, when Washington died in 1799 he was eulogized by Federalists and Republicans alike. More than any other individual, Washington was responsible for America's being independent, adopting the Constitution, and having a functioning republican government.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

COOKE, JACOB E. 1987 Organizing the National Government. In Levy, Leonard W., and Mahoney, Dennis J., eds., The Constitution: A History of Its Framing and Ratification. New York: Macmillan.

FLEXNER, JAMES THOMAS 1965–1972 George Washington. 4 Vols. Boston: Little, Brown.

FREEMAN, DOUGLAS SOUTHALL 1948–1957 George Washington. 7 Vols. New York: Scribner's.

MARSHALL, JOHN (1804–1807) 1925 The Life of George Washington. 5 Vols. New York: Wm. H. Wise & Co.

MATTESON, DAVID M. 1970 The Organization of the Government under the Constitution. New York: Da Capo Press.

WASHINGTON v. DAVIS
426 U.S. 229 (1976)

This landmark decision concerns the relevance of a decision maker's motives in EQUAL PROTECTION cases. Black candidates for the Washington, D.C., police force alleged that the District's selection criteria had an adverse discriminatory effect upon the employment prospects of minorities and that the effect violated the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT's equal protection clause and ANTIDISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION. In an opinion by Justice BYRON R. WHITE, the Supreme Court held that discriminatory effects, standing alone, are insufficient to establish an equal protection violation. Proof of purposeful discrimination is necessary. The Court also rejected the candidates' statutory claim. In an opinion that did not address the constitutional question, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, joined by Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, dissented from the Court's disposition of the statutory issue. In a concurring opinion, Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS discussed the relationship between discriminatory effects and proof of discriminatory intent and articulated his reasons for rejecting the statutory claim.

In settling a long-standing controversy over whether a decision maker's motives may constitute the basis for an equal protection claim, the Court climbed two interesting doctrinal hills. Prior to Davis, cases such as Whitcomb v. Chavis (1971) and White v. Regester (1973) expressly had suggested that unintentional disproportionate effects on a minority may constitute the basis for an equal protection claim. Justice White's opinion ignores these precedents but warns against the broad consequences of such a HOLDING. Such a rule "would raise serious questions about, and perhaps invalidate, a whole range of tax, welfare, public service, regulatory, and licensing statutes that may be more burdensome to the poor and to the average black than to the more affluent white."

In addition, contrary to Davis's holding, a line of opinions dating back to FLETCHER V. PECK (1810) and reaffirmed in UNITED STATES V. O'BRIEN (1968) and PALMER V. THOMPSON (1971), clearly had stated that legislators' motives may not form the basis of constitutional attacks on statutes. Without alluding to all of the relevant precedents, the Court reinterpreted Palmer and suggested that some of its language had constituted mere OBITER DICTA.

As a practical matter, Davis, when combined with subsequent similar cases such as ARLINGTON HEIGHTS V. METROPOLITAN HOUSING DEVELOPMENT CORP. (1977) and MOBILE V. BOLDEN (1980), curtailed litigants' ability to bring successful equal protection claims. Proof of intentional discrimination is difficult to obtain and judges are reluctant to deem officials intentional wrongdoers. Indeed, it was six years after Davis before the Court, in Rogers v. Lodge (1982), sustained a finding of intentional discrimination in a racial equal protection case.

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

WASHINGTON v. GLUCKSBERG

See: Right to Die

WASHINGTON v. HARPER
494 U.S. 1028 (1990)

A Washington state prison policy authorized the treatment of a prisoner with antipsychotic drugs against his or her will, provided that the prisoner be (1) mentally ill, and (2) either gravely disabled or likely to do serious harm to others. These two findings were to be made by a committee consisting of a psychiatrist, a psychologist, and an official of the institution in which mentally ill prisoners were held. The state supreme court held that this procedure, which lacked fully adversarial procedural guarantees such as those available in a court proceeding, denied a mentally ill prisoner PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS OF LAW. The Supreme Court reversed, 6–3.

Justice ANTHONY M. KENNEDY wrote for the Court. The prisoner had a "liberty interest" in being free from arbitrary administration of a psychotropic drug; however, the procedure provided by the state was sufficient to satisfy the demands of due process. A court in a single proceeding cannot adequately evaluate the intentions or likely behavior of a medically ill person; such an evaluation requires ongoing observation of the kind available to the members of the committee given responsibility for the decisions here. The risks of an antipsychotic drug are mainly medical risks, which can best be evaluated by professionals. Although the state's policy does not allow representation by counsel, it does provide for a lay adviser who understands the psychiatric issues; this assistance is sufficient to satisfy due process.

Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS wrote for the dissenters. In his view, the state policy violated both SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS and procedural due process. In support of the first objection, he argued that the policy authorized invasion of the prisoner's liberty not only for his own medical interests but also to maintain order in the institution. The second objection was that, considering the seriousness of the invasion of the prisoner's liberty interest, the committee was insufficiently independent of the institution's administration to satisfy the requirements of a fair hearing.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

WASHINGTON v. SEATTLE SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 1

See: Crawford v. Board of Education

WASHINGTON v. TEXAS

See: Compulsory Process, Right to; Evidence

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS
(September 17, 1796)

When President GEORGE WASHINGTON decided, in the summer of 1796, not to seek a third term, he published an address to the American people embodying his advice on how to insure the survival of the new constitutional order. The first draft was prepared by Washington himself; the final version was drafted under Washington's direction by ALEXANDER HAMILTON, incorporating suggestions from JAMES MADISON and JOHN JAY.

The first, and longest, section of the address comprises an encomium of the federal union and a warning against the dangers of factionalism, and especially of sectionalism. Washington urged that Americans regard the Union as "the support of your tranquility at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize." The central section of the address commends religion as a support for free government. Anything that weakened religious belief, he argued, would corrupt public morals, undermine the efficacy of oaths, and threaten the national capacity for self-government. The final section of the address contains Washington's advice on FOREIGN AFFAIRS and defense. Washington opposed permanent alliances and standing armies as incompatible with constitutional democracy.

Advice in the address concerning specific constitutional questions includes Washington's deprecation of the "spirit of encroachment" that would subvert the SEPARATION OF POWERS and his admonition against hasty adoption of constitutional amendments.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

EIDELBERG, PAUL 1974 A Discourse on Statesmanship: The Design and Transformation of the American Polity. Chicago: University of Illinois Press.

WASTE, POLLUTION, AND THE CONSTITUTION

The rise of environmental consciousness since the early 1970s has made solid waste disposal through recycling an important issue of public policy. The disposal of solid wastes raises interstate issues as some states find it difficult to use local landfills for their locally generated wastes. Air and water pollution also have important interstate effects, as pollution generated in one state flows into another.

Most regulation of air and water pollution occurs through federal statutes, the Clean Air and Clean Water Acts. These statutes prescribe federal standards and are largely administered by the federal Environmental Protection Agency. State environmental agencies play a role in enforcing them, but only if the state agencies comply with rather detailed federal requirements. Solid waste disposal is regulated under the Resource Recovery and Conservation Act, which prescribes relatively strict federal standards for disposing of hazardous wastes, and less strict ones for disposing of other solid wastes. States receive federal funds to administer plans that comply with the federal requirements.

States have done relatively little to regulate the interstate effects of air and water pollution. Solid wastes are different. Many local landfills are full or nearly so, and local residents frequently do not wish to expand environmentally unattractive landfills. States and cities have therefore adopted regulations to conserve local landfill space. The Supreme Court has considered the constitutionality of such regulations in five cases.

The leading case is PHILADELPHIA V. NEW JERSEY (1978), invalidating a statute prohibiting the importation of waste generated outside the state. The Court held that the statute expressly discriminated against out-of-state commerce, and was therefore subject to a "virtually per se rule" of invalidity. The state's reason for imposing the ban was simply to conserve a local resource, landfill space. But conservation could be achieved by restricting intakes, no matter what their source. The COMMERCE CLAUSE, the Court said, was designed to prohibit states from addressing their problems by insulating themselves from other states. The Court followed this holding in Fort Gratiot Sanitary Landfill, Inc. v. Michigan Department of Natural Resources (1992), invalidating a Michigan statute barring local landfills from accepting waste generated outside the county in which the landfill was located.

The Court also invoked the Philadelphia principle to invalidate Alabama and Oregon statutes that taxed the deposit in local landfills of waste generated elsewhere at a higher rate than locally generated waste, Chemical Waste Management, Inc. v. Hunt (1992); Oregon Waste Systems v. Department of Environmental Quality (1994). The higher fee would discourage out-of-state waste producers from using local landfills, but this was simply another version of the pure conservation goal found insufficient in Philadelphia. Nor did the extra fee compensate the state for any special costs it incurred in accepting out-of-state waste for disposal.

Flow-control ordinances are the most important techniques for dealing with solid wastes. They direct all waste generated in a town to a single recycling facility, and are thought to encourage recycling because expensive recycling facilities require a guaranteed flow of waste to be financially viable, while waste producers prefer to dispose of waste at cheaper, nonrecycling landfills. The Court struck down a flow-control ordinance in C & A Carbone, Inc. v. Clarkstown (1994), finding that it denied out-of-state waste haulers access to locally generated waste. In the wake of Carbone, lower courts have divided over the constitutionality of other flow-control ordinances.

Congress can authorize states to enforce even discriminatory regulations. None of the Court's decisions deals with the question of congressional authorization, but the Court has generally required a rather specific statement by Congress before it will find authorization for discriminatory regulation.

MARK TUSHNET
(2000)

Bibliography

HEINZERLING, LISA 1995 The Commercial Constitution. Supreme Court Review 1995:217–276.

VERCHICK, ROBERT R. M. 1997 The Commerce Clause, Environmental Justice, and the Interstate Garbage Wars. Southern California Law Review 70:1239–1310.

WATERGATE AND THE CONSTITUTION

The Watergate scandal, starting with an illegal break-in at Democratic National Committee headquarters in June 1972 and ending with President GERALD R. FORD pardoning RICHARD M. NIXON in September 1974, produced one of the most significant constitutional crises in modern times. It raised a number of unsettling issues central to the constitutional structure of SEPARATION OF POWERS.

The two major constitutional issues Watergate brought into focus were EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE and the scope of the IMPEACHMENT power. In September 1972 a GRAND JURY indicted the Watergate burglars but the Justice Department closed the investigation despite evidence of a wider conspiracy. Following the November election, the Watergate burglary trial began. In it defendants claimed they had been pressured to remain silent and plead guilty; that perjury was committed; and that "others" were involved. Such allegations led to the creation of a Senate Watergate Committee, headed by SAM ERVIN, which began taking testimony, revealing a White House program of political espionage that included Watergate. Witnesses suggested that the President was participating in a coverup and that the President had made tape recordings of conversations in his office. The Ervin Committee attempted to subpoena such tapes, but the President refused to surrender them, claiming executive privilege. The committee then went to the courts, which in two cases (Nixon v. Sirica, 1973, and Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities v. Nixon, 1974) attempted to define the line between a committee's power to compel testimony in order to perform its functions and the need for privacy in presidential communications. A third case, UNITED STATES V. NIXON (1974), arose out of a criminal prosecution of the President's aides. Both the prosecutor and the defense sought to subpoena the tapes, and the President again resisted. Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, for a unanimous Supreme Court, conceded a "presumptive privilege" for executive communications, but ruled that respect of the integrity of the judicial process required the courts to weigh any such claim against the importance of assuring the production in court of relevant evidence and ultimately of protecting the system of criminal justice. The Court thus ordered certain tapes produced. Their disclosures, which came at the height of the House of Representatives' impeachment process, demonstrated the President's active complicity in the coverup conspiracy from the first moment. This led Nixon to resign to avoid impeachment for "high crimes and misdemeanors."

The impeachment process was fraught with constitutional difficulties. Nixon's firing of a Senate-approved special prosecutor, given sweeping powers to investigate the Watergate scandal, had produced the initial demands for his impeachment. In October the House Judiciary Committee launched an impeachment inquiry. Questions promptly arose as to what constituted an impeachable offense, and what "other high crimes and misdemeanors" might include. Must these be criminal in nature and intent, or might they be quasi-political, involving gross breach of public trust? Was maladministration impeachable, or must a statutory offense or a serious crime be demonstrated? The President's attorneys argued the latter. The committee staff indicated a President might be removed for "substantial misconduct," not necessarily of specific criminal nature. This controversy was mooted by the revelations of the disputed tapes and by the resignation, but not before the House committee recommended three ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT to the House at large. Rejecting two articles dealing with income tax violations and the secret bombing of Cambodia, which raised the question of the extent of presidential emergency power in FOREIGN AFFAIRS, the Committee contended that "Richard M. Nixon warrants impeachment and trial and removal from office" for other charges. These were: that he prevented, obstructed, and impeded the administration of justice; that he repeatedly engaged in conduct violating the constitutional rights of citizens, impairing the due and proper administration of justice and the conduct of lawful inquiries, or contravening the laws governing agencies of the executive branch and the purposes of these agencies; and that he failed without lawful cause or excuse to produce papers and things as directed by duly authorized subpoenas issued by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives. Included as substantiating detail were fourteen examples of interfering or endeavoring to interfere with conduct of investigations by the Department of Justice of the United States, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Watergate special prosecutor, and congressional committees; endeavoring to misuse the Central Intelligence Agency; the electronic surveillance of private citizens; the break-in of a psychiatrist's office; and the unlawful campaign financing practices of the Committee to Re-elect the President.

An unresolved constitutional issue arose in September 1974: whether a subsequent President can issue a pardon in the absence of either a conviction or an INDICTMENT. A final question will trouble historians for years: did the Constitution work in Watergate, or did the crisis demonstrate fundamental failures in the governmental system?

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

Bibliography

KURLAND, PHILLIP 1978 Watergate and the Constitution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

MILLER, ARTHUR S. 1979 Social Change and Fundamental Law. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

MURPHY, PAUL L. 1979 Misgovernment by Judiciary? Watergate and the Constitution. Harvard Civil RightsCivil Liberties Law Review 14:783–799.

WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACT

See: Environmental Regulation and the Constitution

WATER POWER ACT
41 Stat. 1063 (1920)

The failure to capitalize on the vast water power resources of the country led increasingly, in the early twentieth century, to efforts to develop and regulate unused power on public lands and navigable rivers. After a number of failed attempts at national legislation, Congress finally passed the Water Power Act in 1920.

The act established a Federal Power Commission (FPC), to be composed of the secretaries of war, agriculture, and interior, with authority to approve water power projects "for the development and improvement of navigation, and for the development, transmission, and utilization of power" on any navigable river or public lands. The act empowered the FPC to license projects for up to fifty years; it also directed preferential treatment for state or municipal projects. The rates charged for the use of water were to include only FPC expenses; moreover, the act required licensees to charge "reasonable, nondiscriminatory and just" rates and prohibited combinations or other agreements to limit output or fix prices. The act stipulated that rate-fixing and regulation be administered according to the procedures outlined in the INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT.

The Supreme Court approved extensive federal controls in UNITED STATES V. APPALACHIAN ELECTRIC POWER COMPANY (1940).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

WATER QUALITY IMPROVEMENT ACT

See: Environmental Regulation and the Constitution

WATERS v. CHURCHILL
511 U.S. 661 (1994)

Cheryl Churchill disliked her supervisor, Cynthia Waters, and the new cross-training program for nurses established at the public hospital that employed her. When Churchill aired some of these complaints in the hospital cafeteria, her conversation was overheard by another nurse. After a short investigation in which that nurse and the other party to the conversation claimed that Churchill had made "unkind" remarks about Waters, Waters fired Churchill. A lower federal court ruled that the firing violated Churchill's FIRST AMENDMENT right to FREEDOM OF SPEECH because she had not, in fact, criticized her boss.

The Supreme Court reversed. The majority held that PUBLIC EMPLOYEES may be discharged on the basis of remarks their supervisors, after a reasonable investigation, thought they said, even when the actual remarks were constitutionally protected speech. The government interest in "efficient employment decisionmaking," Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR'S declared in her PLURALITY OPINION, justified abandoning "the evidentiary rules used by courts" when evaluating the speech rights of public employees. The Justices could not tell from the record whether Churchill was constitutionally fired for expressing distaste for her employer or unconstitutionally fired for criticizing the cross-training program. Hence, the case was remanded to the lower court.

Waters v. Churchill highlights the tendency of the REHNQUIST COURT to make case-specific decisions, particularly when O'Connor is the swing vote. Her MAJORITY OPINION gives little indication of what constitutes a reasonable investigation, except to indicate that one was conducted in this case. Nor is the constitutional difference between criticizing a public employer and criticizing a program instituted by a public employer spelled out. The main lesson may be that public employees should not criticize their supervisors in places where others may overhear their conversations.

MARK A. GRABER
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: National Treasury Employees Union, United States v.; Public Employees and Free Speech.)

WATKINS v. UNITED STATES
354 U.S. 178 (1957)

SWEEZY v. NEW HAMPSHIRE
354 U.S. 234 (1957)

Watkins, a labor leader called to testify before the House Committee on Un-American Activities, had been told by the union president that he would lose his position if he claimed his RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION. He thus claimed a FIRST AMENDMENT privilege when he declined to answer the committee's questions about the membership of other people in the Communist party. He also objected that these questions were beyond the scope of the committee's activities. For his refusal to answer, Watkins was convicted of contempt of Congress. The Supreme Court reversed his conviction, 8–1.

Writing for the Court, Chief Justice EARL WARREN rested decision on a narrow point: Watkins had been denied PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS, for he had not been given a sufficient explanation of the subject of inquiry, and thus could not know whether the committee's questions were "pertinent to the questions under inquiry," as the contempt statute specified. Warren's opinion, however, strongly suggested that the Court would be prepared to confront the whole issue of LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATIONS into political association. He remarked on the use of such investigations to subject people to public stigma, and the absence in such proceedings of effective protection of procedural fairness. "We have no doubt that there is no congressional power to expose for the sake of exposure," Warren wrote. "Who can define the meaning of "un-American'?" Justice TOM C. CLARK, the sole dissenter, appeared to object as much to these broad OBITER DICTA as to the actual decision. He complained of the Court's "mischievous curbing of the informing function of Congress."

In Sweezy, a COMPANION CASE to Watkins, the Court held, 6–2, that a state legislative investigation could not constitutionally compel Sweezy to answer questions about the Progressive party and about a lecture he had given at the University of New Hampshire. Chief Justice Warren wrote a PLURALITY OPINION for four Justices, concluding that Sweezy's contempt conviction violated procedural due process because the state legislature had not clearly authorized the attorney general, who conducted the investigation, to inquire into those subjects. Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER, joined by Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, concurred, arguing that the state had unconstitutionally invaded Sweezy's FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT liberty—here, his "political autonomy," a plain reference to the First Amendment. Justice Frankfurter used a (for him) familiar BALANCING TEST, but articulated a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST standard for cases of invasions of political privacy. The Frankfurter opinion is notable for its early articulation of the constitutional dimension of ACADEMIC FREEDOM. It also led, the following year, to the Court's explicit recognition of the FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION in NAACP V. ALABAMA (1958). Justice Clark again dissented, now joined by Justice HAROLD H. BURTON.

A number of members of Congress reacted angrily to these opinions and others decided the same year, such as YATES V. UNITED STATES (1957) and Jencks v. United States (1957). (See JENCKS ACT.) Bills were proposed in Congress to limit the Supreme Court's jurisdiction over cases involving controls of subversive activities. In the event, not much "curbing" was done, and in retrospect Watkins and Sweezy appeared to be no more than trial balloons. Two years later, in BARENBLATT V. UNITED STATES (1959), a majority of the Court backed away from the expected confrontation with Congress.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

WAYNE, JAMES M.
(1790?-1867)

After service as an elected official and judge in Georgia and as a Jacksonian Democrat in Congress, James Moore Wayne served thirty-two years as an Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. Despite this lengthy tenure he produced no significant opinions, though he consistently strove to protect national authority, CORPORATIONS, and SLAVERY. During the CIVIL WAR, his nationalist outlook induced him to remain on the Court as a Unionist.

Wayne, son of a well-to-do Savannah factor and rice planter, was educated at the College of New Jersey (Princeton), read law in New Haven and in his native Savannah, and was admitted to the Georgia bar in 1811. He was a member of the Georgia House of Representatives from 1815 to 1817, mayor of Savannah from 1817 to 1819, and successively judge of a court of common pleas and of the Superior Court. He later served in two state CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS, the second time as president. In 1829, Wayne was elected to the United States House of Representatives, where he prominently supported ANDREW JACKSON. He promoted Indian removal from his native state, backed Jackson's Bank policies, and stood by the President during the Nullification Crisis in South Carolina. He was the only member of the Georgia delegation to support the FORCE BILL. In his last term, he became chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Jackson nominated Wayne to take the seat of Justice WILLIAM JOHNSON of South Carolina, and he was confirmed in 1835. Justice BENJAMIN R. CURTIS later called Wayne one of the "most high-toned Federalists on the bench," referring to Wayne's tenacious nationalism. This outlook was most apparent in COMMERCE CLAUSE cases. In the PASSENGER CASES (1849), Wayne was one of a majority that held unconstitutional state statutes regulating the ingress of ship passengers on the ground that insofar as such laws "practically operated as regulations of commerce, or as restraints upon navigation," they were unconstitutional. The power to regulate foreign and INTERSTATE COMMERCE was "exclusively vested in congress." Unlike his fellow Southerner, Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY, he was not troubled by the implications of this position for the states' control of slavery. Wayne joined in Justice JOHN MCLEAN's nationalist dissent in COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS (1851), arguing that Congress's control of interstate and FOREIGN COMMERCE was exclusive of state power.

The same nationalist spirit produced other opinions upholding federal authority. In Dobbins v. Erie County (1842) Wayne struck down a local tax on a federal officer. He was an enthusiastic proponent of federal admiralty jurisdiction, and in Waring v. Clarke (1847) he extended that jurisdiction to tidal waters of the Mississippi River well above New Orleans. In Louisville, Cincinnati, and Charleston Railroad Co. v. Letson (1844) Wayne rejected a rule, origi nally fashioned by Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL, that restricted the access of corporations to federal courts by requiring that for purposes of DIVERSITY JURISDICTION, all their shareholders be citizens of a state different from all parties on the other side. Wayne instead adopted the rule that a corporation's CITIZENSHIP for diversity purposes is derived from the state where it was chartered and where its officers conducted business.

Wayne was sympathetic to corporate investors, as his CONTRACT CLAUSE opinions reveal. He dissented without opinion in WEST RIVER BRIDGE V. DIX (1848), in which the Court permitted a state to use its EMINENT DOMAIN powers to destroy a corporate charter. In the Ohio Bank Tax cases, Wayne consistently voted to strike down state attempts to modify tax exemptions claimed by banks. One of these cases, DODGE V. WOOLSEY (1856), produced what was probably Wayne's most memorable opinion. Condemning the effort of Ohio Democrats to destroy a tax exemption by an amendment to the state constitution, Wayne sermonized: "moral obligations never die. If broken by states and nations, though the terms of reproach are not the same with which we are accustomed to designate the faithlessness of individuals, the violation of justice is not the less."

Wayne was himself a slaveholder and no less dedicated to his section than other southern jurists such as Taney and PETER DANIEL. He considered slavery a vital component of southern society, beyond control of the federal government except for purposes of protection. But, unlike Taney, Wayne remained coolly assured about the constitutional security of slavery, and he was not blinded by the state-sovereignty dogmatism that warped his Chief's opinions in slavery cases. The Constitution itself, Wayne believed, incorporated express protections for slavery's security. In his concurrence in PRIGG V. PENNSYLVANIA (1842) Wayne went along with JOSEPH STORY's assertion that states need not support enforcement of the federal Fugitive Slave Act, but only on the ground that to admit any state role at all would be to invite Northern states to interfere with the capture and rendition of fugitives.

Wayne played a mischievous role in DRED SCOTT V. SANDFORD (1857) though his brief concurring opinion merely endorsed entirely Taney's opinion. Wayne first urged that the Chief Justice write the opinion for the Court's majority rather than Justice SAMUEL NELSON, whose opinion would evade the larger issues in the case by a narrow jurisdictional ruling, and he formally moved that the Court address itself to all issues, not just the jurisdictional ones. Scholars have suggested that Taney's opinion incorporated portions of a draft opinion that Wayne did not submit. Yet Wayne was no fanatic on the subject of slavery. On circuit, he delivered a vigorous jury charge in the trial of officers of the notorious slave ship Wanderer, upholding the power of the federal government to hang slavers.

The Civil War forced a severe test of Wayne's conflicting loyalties. After SECESSION, he supported his son's decision to resign his commission in the United States Army and accept appointment as Georgia's adjutant general, but Wayne elected to remain on the federal bench. Georgia retaliated by confiscating his property and declaring him an enemy alien. In 1861, Wayne denied a HABEAS CORPUS petition from a soldier who claimed that ABRAHAM LINCOLN's call for troops was illegal. In conformity with that position, Wayne joined the five-member majority in the PRIZE CASES (1863), upholding the legality of Lincoln's action in imposing a blockade around the seceding states. He wrote for the Court in EX PARTE VALLANDIGHAM (1864), refusing to review the conviction of an Ohio Copperhead congressman by a military commission. In EX PARTE MILLIGAN (1866), where the majority held that Congress could not authorize military commissions for areas outside the theater of war, Wayne joined the four-man minority who argued for congressional discretion in using military commissions. But there are indications that Wayne's Unionist views would not be extrapolated to accept all aspects of Republican RECONSTRUCTION. He joined the majority in the TEST OATH CASES (1867), holding state and federal proscriptive oaths unconstitutional. He refused to hold CIRCUIT COURTS in his circuit in areas under military occupation. His death on July 5, 1867, ended his grief at the devastation that secession, war, and Reconstruction had brought to his beloved state.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK
(1986)

Bibliography

GATELL, FRANK O. 1969 James M. Wayne. In Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel eds., The Justices of the United States Supreme Court 1789–1969: Their Lives and Major Opinions. New York: Chelsea House Publishers.

LAWRENCE, ALEXANDER A. 1943 James Moore Wayne: Southern Unionist. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

WAYTE v. UNITED STATES
470 U.S. 598 (1985)

After a presidential proclamation directing young men to register for a possible draft, David Wayte did not register, but wrote letters to government officials stating that he did not intend to do so. These letters went into a SELECTIVE SERVICE file of men who had given similar notices or who had been reported by others for failing to register. The government adopted a policy of "passive enforcement" of registration: it would prosecute only men named in this file. Government officials wrote letters warning the men to register or face prosecution, and FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION agents urged Wayte in person to register during a grace period. He refused and was indicted for failure to register. The federal district court dismissed Wayte's indictment, holding that the government had not rebutted his preliminary showing of selective prosecution. The court of appeals reversed, holding that Wayte had not shown that the government had prosecuted him because of his protest. The Supreme Court affirmed, 7–2.

Justice LEWIS F. POWELL wrote the OPINION OF THE COURT. Claims of selective prosecution, he said, must be judged under ordinary EQUAL PROTECTION standards, which, as the Court held in WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976), require a showing of intentional discrimination. Here, the government's awareness that "passive enforcement" would fall disproportionately on protesters was an insufficient showing of intent to punish protest. Given the government's policy of urging compliance after receiving notice of failure to register, Wayte was not prosecuted for protesting, but for persisting in refusing registration.

Wayte's FIRST AMENDMENT challenge also focused on the enforcement system's disparate impact on protesters. Applying the formula of UNITED STATES V. O'BRIEN (1968), Justice Powell concluded that "passive enforcement" passed the test. The government interest in national security was important, and unrelated to the suppression of expression; and the enforcement system burdened speech no more than was necessary to secure registration.

Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL dissented, joined by Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, arguing that Wayte had been denied effective opportunity for DISCOVERY of information concerning the motivations of high government officials for prosecuting him. Thus, he could not fully support his claim that the prosecution was designed to punish his protest. The majority dismissed this argument, saying—contrary to the dissenters' view—that Wayte had not presented the issue to the Supreme Court.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

WEALTH DISCRIMINATION

Wealth discrimination—the state's allocation of resources on the basis of ability to pay—has received the attention of the courts only recently. Sensitivity to the plight of the poor was an outgrowth of the CIVIL RIGHTS movement of the 1960s. Thus, the first constitutional issue raised by EQUAL PROTECTION claims of the poor was whether poverty-based discrimination is analogous to RACIAL DISCRIMINATION for purposes of the applicable STANDARD OF REVIEW.

Advocates of this analogy stress the poor's lack of political power and the public's antipathy to the poor and to programs, such as welfare, enacted to ameliorate poverty. They argue that the Supreme Court should give less deference to legislative judgments when reviewing poverty discrimination claims than it does when reviewing ECONOMIC REGULATIONS challenged by those able to pursue nonjudicial means of redress. However, at no time during the more than quarter of a century since the Court's first decision in this area, GRIFFIN V. ILLINOIS (1956), has a majority of the Court ever embraced the analogy to race for purposes of equal protection review.

The Griffin decision held unconstitutional a state's refusal to provide an INDIGENT convicted criminal defendant with a free transcript necessary to obtain meaningful appellate review. In so holding, Griffin enunciated a potentially expansive principle of "equal justice": "[A] state can no more discriminate on account of poverty than on account of religion, race, or color. . . . There can be no equal justice when the kind of trial [or APPEAL ] a man gets depends on the amount of money he has."

Since Griffin, the Supreme Court has struck down poverty-based discrimination in only a few other cases, most notably DOUGLAS V. CALIFORNIA (1963) and BODDIE V. CONNECTICUT (1971). Douglas held unconstitutional a state's refusal to appoint counsel for an indigent seeking appellate review of a criminal conviction; and Boddie held unconstitutional a state's refusal to waive court access fees which deprived an indigent plaintiff of access to the only available forum for obtaining a divorce.

In the vast majority of poverty-based discrimination cases, however, the Supreme Court has treated the poor's claims, whether they involve access to the judicial process itself, equal educational opportunity, or the very means of survival, the same as any other challenged "social and economic" regulation. Thus, the Court has applied the RATIONAL BASIS standard of review to uphold a $50 bankruptcy filing fee against a debtor too poor to pay it; a state financing system that allocated educational resources according to the tax bases of school districts; and an allocation of WELFARE BENEFITS that discriminated on the basis of family size. (See United States v. Kras, 1973; SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ, 1973; DANDRIDGE V. WILLIAMS, 1971.)

Several reasons may underlie the Court's refusal actively to scrutinize legislation adversely affecting the poor. If the Court holds a payment requirement unconstitutional as applied to the poor, someone must decide who is poor enough to qualify for this affirmative relief. Moreover, such a holding may require the legislative branch to reallocate its budget to provide the funds necessary to pay for what the poor cannot afford, something which the courts are always reluctant to do, especially in times of economic recession.

Another reason for judicial restraint lies in the need for line-drawing. If not all poverty-based inequalities or deprivations are unconstitutional—as surely they are not in a market economy—then the Court must delineate those interests that are sufficiently "vital" or "fundamental" to justify stricter judicial scrutiny when the state allocates such interests through a pricing system that deprives poor people from access to them. Obvious candidates include basic necessities such as food, housing, and other means of subsistence. Beginning with its 1971 decision in Dandridge, however, the Supreme Court consistently has refused to treat any such interests as entitled to a heightened equal protection standard of review. Moreover, in MAHER V. ROE (1977) the Court carried this refusal to apply a meaningful equal protection standard to any discriminatory "social and economic" legislation to the extreme of validating a provision prohibiting Medicaid funding of abortion although other, including pregnancy-related medical care costs, were funded and the choice to seek an abortion rather than bear a child had been held to be constitutionally protected. Moreover, Maher upheld this discrimination even though, unlike the discrimination upheld in all similar prior cases, it cost rather than saved taxpayer dollars. (See HARRIS V. MCRAE, 1980.)

The Court's refusal since 1971 to treat "vital interests" of the poor as comparable to constitutionally guaranteed rights is one matter. In Maher, however, the Court validated discrimination only among the poor and solely on the basis of the poor's attempt to exercise a constitutionally guaranteed right of choice otherwise available to everyone. The recent jurisprudence of wealth discrimination legitimates and reinforces a dual system of constitutional rights, leaving the poor—who disproportionately are composed of women, children, the aged, and racial minorities—with paper rights beyond their financial reach.

BARBARA BRUDNO
(1986)

Bibliography

BINION, GAYLE 1982 The Disadvantaged Before the Burger Court: The Newest Unequal Protection. Law & Policy Quarterly 4:37–69.

BRUDNO, BARBARA 1976 Poverty, Inequality, and the Law. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

——— 1980 Wealth Discrimination in the Supreme Court: Equal Protection for the Poor from Griffin to Maher. Pages 229–246 in Ron Collins, ed., Constitutional Government in America. Durham, N.C.: Carolina Academic Press.

WEBB-KENYON ACT
37 Stat. 699 (1913)

Although the Supreme Court had generally refused to uphold laws that it characterized as STATE REGULATION OF COMMERCE, a series of decisions in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries deferred to such action. Reacting to a clear invitation in the Court's opinion in LEISY V. HARDIN (1890), holding that absent congressional authorization a state could not prevent the importation and first sale of liquor in the original package, Congress passed the Wilson Act. The law subjected intoxicating liquor "to the operation and effect of the laws of [a] State or territory enacted in the exercise of its [STATE ] POLICE POWERS" despite the liquor's journey in INTERSTATE COMMERCE and the ORIGINAL PACKAGE DOCTRINE. The Court sustained that act in In re Rahrer (1891).

The Webb-Kenyon Act, passed over the veto of President WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, divested liquor of its interstate character when introduced in violation of state law. Congress thus effectively allowed state prohibition laws to regulate national commerce in liquor. The Court upheld this act in CLARK DISTILLING COMPANY V. WESTERN MARYLAND RAILWAY CO. (1917).

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

SEMONCHE, JOHN E. 1978 Charting the Future: The Supreme Court Responds to a Changing Society, 1890–1920. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

WEBSTER, DANIEL
(1782–1852)

As a leading lawyer and politician for forty years, Daniel Webster influenced constitutional development as few others have. When the young New Hampshire representative arrived in Washington in 1813, he immediately became a spokesman for New England interests and remained so until the mid-1820s despite an interruption of congressional service (1817–1823) upon moving to Boston. For most of the time from 1827 to his death in 1852, he was an eloquent nationalist in the SENATE. Except for two periods as secretary of state under Tyler and Fillmore, he spent the last quarter-century of his life in that body, expounding the principles of a perpetual Union and a flexible Constitution. In either role, sectionalist or nationalist, he applied constitutional ideas to political issues with uncommon ability.

During the early years his FEDERALIST partisanship and loyalty to a commercial constitutency led him to oppose Republican policies of embargo and war. Using economic coercion to maintain maritime rights, he believed, intolerably stretched the power to regulate commerce, indeed, it destroyed commerce. And prosecuting an offensive war against Britain caused other constitutional errors: misuse of militia, proposals for federal conscription, encroachment on STATES' RIGHTS. Though not a delegate to the HARTFORD CONVENTION, Webster approved its resolutions. Later he sought, unconvincingly, to dissociate himself from it. His sectionalism persisted when he opposed the postwar trend toward a protective tariff (1816–1824). Again he voiced a strict constructionist interpretation of the COMMERCE CLAUSE to promote low rates desired by merchants and a system of laissez-faire in the first phase of industrialization.

In the late 1820s, he shifted to a nationalist position concurrently with JOHN C. CALHOUN's shift in the opposite direction. In behalf of rising manufacturers, he joined HENRY CLAY in advocating governmental policies to achieve economic growth and American self-sufficiency. No longer did he oppose use of the commerce power for broad goals. When South Carolina nullified the tariff of 1832, his oratorical duel with Calhoun provided an opportunity to reiterate more comprehensively his constitutional thought, dramatically set forth in his earlier debate with ROBERT HAYNE. Beyond the tariff question, he countered the doctrines of state sovereignty and NULLIFICATION with the concept of a perpetual Union, created by the people, not the states, and composed of two spheres of authority, national and state, both responsible to the people. In event of conflict, Article VI of the Constitution required national supremacy; and the Supreme Court had long performed its proper duty of upholding that rule.

Soon slavery became the focus of politics. Ever since writing a memorial on the Missouri question in 1820, Webster had advocated a national power to prevent western extension of slavery; but he conceded Congress could not touch it in existing states and he soft-pedaled the moral question. Subsequently he opposed ANNEXATION OF TEXAS and further territorial acquisitions from Mexico, fearing they would disrupt the Union. When, in the great congressional debate of 1850, controversy reached a climax, he preferred compromise to save the Union instead of legislation against extension of slavery, constitutionally possible though it was. Antislavery forces attacked him furiously—the more so when the fugitive slave law, a part of the compromise, appeared to violate CIVIL LIBERTIES. As senator, he had inclined toward TRIAL BY JURY for suspected runaways; as secretary of state he insisted upon strict observance of the statute prescribing summary process.

He was very active in the Supreme Court as well as in Congress. Altogether, he argued 168 cases, of which twenty-five involved constitutional questions. He won about half and influenced doctrinal development even in some he lost. Regularly, he set forth nationalistic arguments to limit state power in a day when most congressional powers were dormant. More successful when JOHN MARSHALL was Chief Justice (to 1835) than when ROGER B. TANEY presided, he made a deep impression on the governmental structure. Of the cases strengthening nationalism, MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) stands out. Here, though overshadowed by WILLIAM PINKNEY, Webster contributed to a definition of the Union identical to that in his Senate speeches against nullification. And he introduced the aphorism that the power to tax involves the power to destroy. OSBORN V. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES (1824) provided opportunities to advocate expansion of federal court JURISDICTION in the whole field of corporate rights.

The first commerce case the Court heard involved steamboat monopoly (GIBBONS V. OGDEN, 1824). Contending for an exclusive congressional power over INTERSTATE COMMERCE, Webster would have been satisfied with a rule of partially concurrent power. Marshall sympathized with the first option but did not rest his decision on either formula, therefore postponing a judicial guideline. Over the next twenty-five years, Webster participated in several other cases, such as the LICENSE CASES (1847) and the PASSENGER CASES (1849), in an unavailing effort to obtain an exclusive-power decision. At last, in COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS (1851), his protege, Justice BENJAMIN CURTIS, spoke for a majority in laying down a partially concurrent-power standard which preserved about as much exclusive national authority as Webster wished. Cooley remains good constitutional law.

Webster's nationalism was not an abstract idea. He connected it with the sanctity of property rights as the very foundation of a dynamic economy. Best illustrating this belief are the CONTRACT CLAUSE cases in which he appeared. DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819) is a classic in the long history of VESTED RIGHTS shielded from state interference. He relied upon the contract clause of the Constitution as if it were an early version of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS of law. Though the contract clause, even the concept of vested rights of property, has declined, the notion of active judicial defense of individual constitutional rights flourishes in the area of civil liberties. The Dartmouth case was only Webster's first of several dealing with the contract clause.

Webster's career reflected the junction of personal capacity with a favorable setting to establish nationhood and to invigorate a capitalist economy. Still, he may have been flawed by moral oversights and may have encouraged an inequitable distribution of wealth and privilege. Perhaps his contemporaries sensed weaknesses such as these as they passed over him in electing their presidents.

MAURICE G. BAXTER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Constitutional History, 1801–1829; Constitutional History, 1829–1848.)

Bibliography

BARTLETT, IRVING H. 1978 Daniel Webster. New York: W. W. Norton.

BAXTER, MAURICE G. 1966 Daniel Webster and the Supreme Court. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.
——— 1984 One and Inseparable: Daniel Webster and the Union. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.
FUESS, CLAUDE M. 1930 Daniel Webster, 2 vols. Boston: Little, Brown.

WEBSTER v. REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES
492 U.S. 490 (1989)

The Webster case had been advertised as the one in which the Supreme Court might overrule ROE V. WADE (1973), but in the event the decision offered only minor adjustments at the margins of the constitutional doctrine governing a woman's right to have an ABORTION. The decision's political consequences, however, were anything but minor.

From the time of the Roe decision, Missouri has produced a steady stream of legislation designed to restrict women who seek abortions and the doctors who attend them. In this case the Court considered several provisions of a 1986 Missouri law: (1) the preamble, containing the legislature's "findings" that human life begins at conception and that "unborn children have protectable interests in life, health, and well-being"; (2) a prohibition on the use of public facilities or employees to perform abortions; (3) a prohibition against public funding of abortion counseling; and (4) a requirement that a doctor conduct a fetal viability test before performing an abortion. Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST wrote for the Court.

The Court refused to pass on the preamble, saying that, for all the Justices knew, the "findings" had no effect beyond the expression of the legislature's value judgment. The Court upheld the prohibition on using public facilities or public employees in performing abortions, reaffirming the holdings of MAHER V. ROE (1977) and HARRIS V. MCRAE (1980) that the state has no constitutional duty to provide assistance to women who cannot afford abortions. The controversy over the prohibition on using public money for abortion counseling was dismissed for MOOTNESS because the plaintiffs agreed that this part of law did not affect them.

On the validity of the viability-testing provision there was no OPINION OF THE COURT. Chief Justice Rehnquist, for three Justices, interpreted this requirement to conflict with the analysis in Roe v. Wade and concluded that, to the extent of the conflict, Roe must give way. The testing requirement might make abortions more costly, but it "permissibly further[ed] the State's interest in protecting potential human life" and was constitutional. Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR agreed that the testing requirement was valid, but thought it was consistent with the Court's prior decisions. She thus resisted the invitation to address the question of Roe's continuing force and reaffirmed her earlier position that a law should not be invalidated unless it "unduly burdens" the right to seek an abortion. Justice ANTONIN SCALIA, concurring in upholding the testing requirement, agreed with the dissenters that the Chief Justice's opinion on this issue would effectively overrule Roe. He thought, however, that the Court should perform its overruling of Roe more explicitly and criticized the majority for failing to do so. In an especially scornful footnote, he rejected Justice O'Connnor's position and lectured her on the vocabulary of "viability."

Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, for three Justices, dissented, strongly reaffirming the correctness of Roe v. Wade and its successor decisions. He saw the Chief Justice's opinion on Missouri's requirement of viability testing as, in effect, calling for Roe to be overruled and added his gloomy prediction of a piecemeal process of overruling "until sometime, a new regime of old dissenters and new appointees will declare what the plurality intends: that Roe is no longer good law."

The most important result of Webster was political: the mobilization of nationwide support for reproductive freedom. In the year following Webster, forty-four legislatures met, and about two-thirds of them considered proposals to restrict abortions; only four adopted restrictions. If Roe was a catalyst for the "prolife" movement, Webster was a catalyst for the "prochoice" movement. Governors, legislators, and even the President seemed to recognize that two strong views now demanded a hearing.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

WEEKS v. UNITED STATES
232 U.S. 383 (1914)

Weeks v. United States was the Court's single most creative decision under the FOURTH AMENDMENT. To save the amendment as a living constitutional guarantee, the Court endowed it with an enforcement feature, ordering the exclusion from federal trials of EVIDENCE obtained through unlawful seizure. Without this EXCLUSIONARY RULE, seized evidence, regardless of its origin, would always be admissible. The rule thus has provided the occasion for judicial articulation of Fourth Amendment reasonableness in later cases.

Under COMMON LAW, and for the first century of the Constitution's existence, evidence unlawfully seized by government officers was nonetheless admissible in evidence. In BOYD V. UNITED STATES (1886) the Court implicitly discarded this common law principle, but the exclusionary rule, as it has come to be called, was not explicitly enthroned until the Weeks decision. The reason for admitting unlawfully seized evidence, a standard still followed in nearly all other countries, is readily understood. Unlike coerced confessions, which are excluded from trial in all civilized countries because of their untrustworthiness, the fruit of an illegal search is just as reliable when taken without a shadow of authority as when taken under warrant. To exclude the evidence allows a criminal to go free. Absent the exclusionary rule, however, the Fourth Amendment might become a mere paper guarantee of freedom from UNREASONABLE SEARCHES without an effective enforcement process. Unlike other guarantees in the BILL OF RIGHTS (for example, RIGHT TO COUNSEL), the Fourth Amendment affects the pretrial stage of the case and is—apart from the exclusionary rule—not within the power of the trial court to enforce. The secrecy in which searches are planned and executed makes it impossible to seek the advance protection of an INJUNCTION, a regular practice when FIRST AMENDMENT freedoms are threatened.

The unanimous Weeks opinion said that if unconstitutionally seized evidence were admitted, the Fourth Amendment "might as well be stricken from the Constitution." Furthermore, if the evidence were admitted, courts become parties to the misdeeds of the police, thus compromising the integrity of the judicial process.

The opinion did not, however, make clear whether the exclusionary rule was required by the Constitution or merely was the product of the Court's supervisory power over the lower federal courts and thus subject to negation by Congress. Even if the rule is rooted in the Fourth Amendment, the question remains whether it is a personal right of the defendant or just a deterrent against unlawful searches, discardable if other deterrents can be found. The Weeks opinion appeared to endorse the first position; use of the evidence, said the Court, would constitute "a denial of the constitutional rights of the accused." More recent decisions, however, favor the deterrent theory. Nonetheless, one who is not himself the victim of an unlawful search but is implicated in crime by the seizure does not have STANDING to challenge admission of the evidence.

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

WEEMS v. UNITED STATES
217 U.S. 349 (1910)

In Weems, the Court held that punishment is cruel and unusual if it is grossly excessive for the crime. Paul Weems, a government official in the Philippines, was convicted of falsifying pay records. Under a territorial law inherited from the Spanish penal code, Weems was sentenced to cadeña temporal, a punishment involving fifteen years of hard labor in chains, permanent deprivation of political rights, and surveillance by the authorities for life. Since the Philippine Bill of Rights was Congress's extension to the Philippines of rights guaranteed by the Constitution, the meaning of CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT was the same in both documents.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

WELFARE BENEFITS

Nothing in the Constitution requires the United States or any state to provide public relief to those unable to earn adequate subsistence. Throughout most of history that relief has been the responsibility of private charity or local government. But several provisions of the Constitution impose an obligation on government officials, where such relief is provided, to refrain from imposing arbitrary standards or procedures. That obligation is generally recognized by legislative bodies and, since the late 1960s, has become a special concern of the federal courts.

The courts have treated questions concerning the extension or withdrawal of public welfare benefits under the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES, EQUAL PROTECTION, and DUE PROCESS clauses of the Constitution. In SHAPIRO V. THOMPSON (1969) the Supreme Court held that a one-year RESIDENCE REQUIREMENT for welfare eligibility infringed the right of interstate migration, a privilege protected by Article IV and the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, and also denied equal protection of the laws to indigent interstate travelers. In GRAHAM V. RICHARDSON (1971) the Court held that denial of benefits to resident ALIENS was a denial of equal protection. However, in DANDRIDGE V. WILLIAMS (1970) the Court decisively rejected argument that WEALTH DISCRIMINATION was a SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION or that welfare subsistence was a FUNDAMENTAL INTEREST. And in Jefferson v. Hackney (1972), the Court declined to hold that the equal protection clause required a state to compute the need for public assistance according to the same standard for each of the various welfare programs. Nonetheless in GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1970) the Court held that once benefits were granted they could not be discontinued without PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS, including NOTICE and FAIR HEARING.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

WELFARE PROGRAMS

See: Entitlement

WELFARE RIGHTS

Is there a constitutional right of indigent people to basic survival assistance from the state? The current Supreme Court says no, but there is a strong argument that a future Supreme Court should recognize a positive constitutional right to basic subsistence.

The current Court's view was essentially settled in DANDRIDGE V. WILLIAMS (1971), when the Court ruled that a state law setting a maximum grant of WELFARE BENEFITS to any one family, regardless of family size, was to be categorized as ECONOMIC REGULATION. On this assumption the law should be upheld if it were supported by a RATIONAL BASIS, which the Court found to be present.

For a decade and a half prior to that time, the Court had tantalized scholars and advocates with a series of holdings requiring provision of transcripts to indigent criminal defendants in GRIFFIN V. ILLINOIS (1956), outlawing the POLL TAX because of its impact in barring indigent people from voting in HARPER V. VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966), mandating a face-to-face hearing before welfare benefits could be terminated in GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1970), and invalidating durational RESIDENCE REQUIREMENTS for welfare in SHAPIRO V. THOMPSON (1969).

These opinions suggested there was something particularly unacceptable or vulnerable about indigence that required special treatment of indigent people by the state. Some welfare advocates thought the Court might strike down America's patchwork income-maintenance system, in which there was no statutory obligation to help two-parent families and states could set payment levels as they chose.

Dandridge was the Court's response, followed as the decade wore on by declarations, in Lindsey v. Normet (1972), that there is no constitutional right to any minimum level of housing and, in MAHER V. ROE (1977), that there is no right to any minimum level of health care.

Yet a kernel of DOCTRINE remains to support the notion of a right to subsistence help. Indigence does require the state to take steps it would not otherwise have to take, at least when some other liberty or property interest is also at stake. The state, for example, has no obligation to provide a transcript to the rich, and it can impose durational residential requirements or differential fees for nonresidents applicable to a number of state benefits. But when indigence is involved, the liberty or property interests concerned become vital enough to require a different response from the state.

The Court's handling of public education provides a particularly important clue. In SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIQUEZ (1973), the Court, while upholding Texas's system of school finance, noted that a refusal to provide public education altogether would present a different case, a point it reiterated in Papasan v. Allain (1986). Considering that the wealthy can purchase education for their children, these references imply some obligation to provide education for those who cannot afford it. One argument supporting such a claim is that it is difficult to exercise one's political rights effectively without education. The same commonsense argument applies more generally to the status of indigence. Lack of food and shelter impedes political participation, among other things. Insofar as families with children are involved, indigence interferes gravely with the liberty interest in family relations recognized in MEYER V. NEBRASKA (1923). The door left open in Rodriguez has important implications.

If the state has a special obligation to protect some liberty and property interests when indigence is also present, it is arguable that there is an analogous liberty interest in not being indigent. Because indigence in an extreme form represents a threat to life itself, it is arguable that the state has an obligation to provide basic subsistence.

The Supreme Court has been reluctant throughout American history to declare any positive constitutional rights—rights creating affirmative obligations for the state to act, even though it has committed no legal wrong. Nonetheless, an alternative stream of doctrine, more muted and episodic, has permitted the Court to impose on the states affirmative obligations to act. For example, the Court's strained efforts to find state action in SHELLEY V. KRAEMER (1948) and MARSH V. ALABAMA (1946) might be characterized as imposing constitutional obligations on states to intervene to nullify unacceptable private arrangements or outcomes of private activities. The claim of a right to a subsistence, or "survival," income can well be said to rest on a similar state obligation to intervene to alter unacceptable market outcomes and vindicate individual liberty interests.

The argument for a right to subsistence does not need to rest solely on the idea of a positive right. For the nonelderly the current welfare system, in terms of cash and cash-equivalent assistance, consists primarily of Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) and food stamps. Because the states set payment levels for AFDC benefits, combined payment levels under the two programs vary from less than half the poverty level up to a point near the poverty level ($9,435 for a family of three in 1988). The states do not seek to justify this variation by reference to any regional difference in the cost of living—or, indeed, by reference to any other factor. The median state's benefits approximate two-thirds of the poverty-level income. In other words, in half the states welfare assistance brings a family with children up to less than two-thirds of what the government itself says is required to achieve a bare minimum standard of living. No substantial cash or cash-equivalent federal assistance other than food stamps is available to nondisabled nonelderly individuals or to couples without children.

It is not excessive to argue that this system lacks a rational basis. If any degree of heightened scrutiny were attached to legislation affecting the indigent, it is hard to see how the current welfare system could be justified in the face of an EQUAL PROTECTION challenge. Surely the current Supreme Court would not respond positively to these arguments. Yet similar arguments might be taken seriously by Justices of the future.

PETER B. EDELMAN
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Economic Equal Protection; Welfare State.)

Bibliography

BLACK, CHARLES L., JR. 1985 Further Reflections on the Consitutional Justice of Livelihood. Columbia Law Review 86: 1103–1117.

EDELMAN, PETER B. 1987 The Next Century of Our Constitution: Rethinking Our Duty to the Poor. Hastings Law Journal 39:1–61.

WELFARE RIGHTS
(Update)

The twentieth century has witnessed the continuing evolution of a variety of governmental programs aimed at providing aid, in cash or in kind, to the poor. Once a supplement to private and religious charitable programs, governmental aid to the poor has become the single most important source of poverty relief in contemporary America. Some of these programs are denominated insurance programs, providing benefits to people who make, or have made for them, contributions to a fund upon the occurrence of certain events. The most important examples of these types of programs are Social Security and unemployment insurance. The former provides payments to certain categories of the aged, the infirm, and their dependents, and the latter provides for a finite number of periodic payments in the event of certain kinds of job loss. In each case, such payments can significantly exceed and usually bear very little relationship to an individual's contributions to the "fund" from which payments are made. What we have come to know as "welfare" does not include programs such as these. Instead, welfare, or public assistance, has come to mean public programs, financed from federal, state, or local funds, that furnish financial assistance or assistance in kind to families or individuals who meet specific conditions. The most important program of in-kind aid is administered through the Food Stamp Act of 1964, which subsidizes the purchase of food by permitting a recipient to pay for food with program vouchers (or "food stamps"). For able-bodied unemployed men, for women without minor children, or for two-parent families, the most likely sources of public assistance are state or local programs of general assistance. These are the oldest programs of American public assistance and trace their origins directly to the Elizabethan Poor Laws. These programs serve as the last resort of governmental aid for people who are ineligible for unemployment compensation or Social Security related programs, and who are unable to qualify for any other program of governmental assistance.

For roughly sixty years prior to 1996, however, the largest and most significant form of welfare was the elaborate system of federal supplemental payments to states for payments to certain categories of the poor, primarily poor women with minor children. This federal grant program was known as Aid to Families with Dependant Children (AFDC). AFDC was originally conceived as a program to provide supplemental federal assistance to state welfare programs targeted to destitute children where the family breadwinner was dead, disabled, or absent. Most of the beneficiaries were white widows. By the 1990s, it had evolved into a primary source of benefits for poor women who headed their households alone and had minor children. Disproportionate numbers of beneficiaries were Latina or African American. While the federal government provided most of the funds for the program, and imposed significant regulations for the administration and availability of the program, participating states retained great latitude in the construction of their programs. Under AFDC rules, no eligible person could be denied benefits, but states had wide latitude in setting benefit levels and in implementing the minimal program requirements imposed by federal rules. The AFDC program proved highly controversial during the last forty or so years of its existence. Political liberals tended to believe that the program was too restrictive, its benefit levels too low, and its reliance on state administration archaic. Political conservatives insisted that the AFDC program benefits were too high, subsidized out-of-wedlock births and single-parent homes (which they considered an undesirable substitute for MARRIAGE), and created a "culture of dependency" passed down from mothers to children.

By 1995, political conservatives had won the day. Their solution to the problem posed by AFDC was the enactment of the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996 (PRWORA). The act eliminated the entitlement status of payments, replacing AFDC with Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF). Federal assistance continues to be delivered to the states as a targeted supplement to state assistance programs, but now such payments are bundled as block grants to the states. TANF grants remain contingent upon compliance with a number of minimum federal requirements, but the quantity and scope of such requirements have decreased substantially from those under the old AFDC program. PRWORA tightens the rules for the receipt of food stamps, permits states the power to deny cash assistance to children born to women while they are receiving benefits, and tightens rules of eligibility for Medicare and Supplemental Social Security Income payments. Under PRWORA, state aid programs must impose significant work requirements on recipients and must meet certain minimum state funding requirements based on the level of state contributions to their AFDC programs. In addition, PRWORA gives a state broad authority to limit the amount of aid recipients may receive over their lifetime and to restrict aid to young mothers and documented and undocumented noncitizen immigrants. PRWORA also creates a comprehensive system for collecting child support payments from absent fathers.

Beyond these minimal federal requirements, PRWORA devolved substantial authority over the scope and means of the provision of benefits to the individual states. Subject to minimal standards set forth in PRWORA or in related regulations, states have authority to set benefit levels, eligibility criteria, and time limits for welfare benefits. Indeed, a state now appears to have power to determine the form of benefit as well as its level. In-kind benefits may be substituted for cash benefits, though few states have chosen to shift significantly to programs of in-kind benefits. States have leeway to define work requirements and the punishments for individual failure to comply, and to set the terms for income and asset acquisition for recipients making the transition from welfare benefits to self-sufficiency. As a result, much of the political conflict over welfare policy has shifted from the federal level to the state level, and the possibility of uniform standards of poverty relief is remote.

The Supreme Court has given great deference to legislative judgments, both state and federal, concerning WELFARE BENEFITS. As the Court wrote in DANDRIDGE V. WILLIAMS (1970), "here we deal with state regulation in the social and economic field, not affecting freedoms guaranteed by the Bill of Rights." "Congress is not, by virtue of having instituted a social welfare program, bound to continue it at all, much less at the same benefit level," the Court explained in Bowen v. Gilliard (1987). Where the Justices are persuaded that the issue is "economic" or "social," they have declined to extend federal constitutional protection to the substantive right to benefits. Thus, the Court held that the federal Constitution does not create a right to subsistence nor does it compel states to raise benefit levels to some minimally acceptable level. Nor is the federal government constitutionally compelled to maintain programs at any particular funding level. In contrast, several state courts have interpreted their state constitutions as requiring the provision of benefits.

The Supreme Court's deference has extended beyond the realm of welfare benefit programs. In a perversely ironic example of this reasoning, the Court held in United States v. Kras (1973) that the poor have no constitutional right to seek the protection of the federal bankruptcy laws without paying filing fees. The Court reasoned that there existed no constitutional right to bankruptcy protection and that the fees did not deny the indigent plaintiff the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. Rather than being a fundamental right, "bankruptcy legislation is in the area of economics and social welfare. This being so, the applicable standard, in measuring the propriety of Congress' classification, is that of the rational justification." A similar result was reached in Ortwein v. Schwab (1973), in which the Court held that the Constitution does not prohibit the imposition of a fee for appellate review of state administrative determination of welfare benefits.

On the other hand, the Court has applied federal constitutional principles of procedural fairness to deprivations of property in both the commercial and welfare context. In a celebrated decision, GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1970), the Court held that constitutional DUE PROCESS principles required the state to afford recipients meaningful notice and a meaningful opportunity to be heard before terminating welfare benefits. But the rights accorded under Goldberg left the basic structure of welfare untouched. It increased the cost to the state of individual deprivations but did not prohibit the state from limiting or eliminating welfare entirely.

Litigation over programs in aid of the poor has generated a significant body of case law treating issues of FEDERALISM, but not really touching on the fundamental constitutional condition of the poor themselves. In each of these cases, all decided under the AFDC rules, the Court shifted to the federal government the locus of the authority to interpret and control state welfare programs largely dependent on federal support. In these cases, the Court has consistently reasoned that because federal money was being used to subsidize and largely finance state welfare programs, and because the transfer of such money was conditioned by compliance with a host of complicated and far-reaching rules, the proper interpretation and implementation of such programs at the state level became the province of the federal government, subject to limitations, if any, of the federal Constitution.

This reasoning was sharpened in three cases in which the Court chose to concentrate on issues of federalism in the interpretation of the welfare statutes themselves. In King v. Smith (1968), the Court interpreted federal welfare rules to preclude Alabama from denying welfare benefits to otherwise eligible families because the mother might have an intimate relationship with a man who was not her husband. In Townsend v. Swank (1971), the Court determined that states had no power to vary the terms of optional programs under federal welfare legislation. In Carlson v. Remillard (1972), state rules that denied benefits to the family of a soldier serving in the VIETNAM WAR were voided for conflicting with federal welfare eligibility rules. In each of these cases, the Court focused on a determination of the appropriate level of governmental authority to make and alter the challenged welfare rules, rather than on the substance of the welfare rules themselves. In each of the cases, the Court favored the federal over the state power to regulate welfare. The Court, however, carefully avoided constitutionalizing its placement of power or limiting the power of government to change the substance of the rules at issue. The federal government was constitutionally free to devolve power to the states, or to legislate a different substantive result—just as Congress did when it overhauled the federal government's involvement in welfare in the form of PRWORA.

The poor fare better when deprivations related to their socioeconomic position also directly affect another constitutionally protected right or interest. The most important "fundamental interests" protected by the courts are the RIGHT TO TRAVEL, the right to family life, and the right to liberty. The most significant case in this vein was SHAPIRO V. THOMPSON (1969), which held that special waiting period requirements for eligibility for federal categorical relief programs unreasonably burdened the constitutionally protected right to travel. State residency rules were not at issue in this case; instead, the Court was concerned only with the power of states to create, through waiting period rules, unacceptable local deviations in a federally subsidized program, which might hinder the ability of beneficiaries to take advantage of the program's terms nationally. In a sense, the case held no more than that the right of the poor to travel was no less worthy of protection than the right to interstate commerce in goods.

In SAENZ V. ROE (1999), the Court again visited the issue of state residency rules for the receipt of state government assistance. In striking down a California provision limiting new residents, for the first year they lived in California, to the amount of benefits they would have received in the state of their former residence, the Court reaffirmed the constitutional protection of the right to travel and, more importantly, expanded on the meaning of the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court held that the privileges and immunities clause guarantees the right of newly arrived citizens of a state to be treated the same as all other citizens. Though the Constitution does not restrict a state's right to limit benefits, a state cannot create different levels of benefits based on the duration of residence of its citizens.

The Court has also been solicitous of a poor person's right to family life. A poor person has a constitutionally protected right to access to a divorce court under BODDIE V. CONNECTICUT (1971). Preservation of the right of indigents to control their family lives has also been protected based on the Court's interpretation of the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. In Lassiter v. Department of Social Services (1981), the Court held that under certain circumstances the state is constitutionally required to appoint counsel for an indigent person seeking to defend against state proceedings to terminate parental rights. The poor also have, under M.L.B. V. S.L.J. (1996), the right to access to appeals from decisions terminating their parental rights without having to pay court fees.

In criminal cases, the poor have been conceded the RIGHT TO COUNSEL and access to the courts, without charge, under some circumstances. These include, under GIDEON V. WAINRIGHT (1963), when the indigent defendant is charged with a felony or, under DOUGLAS V. CALIFORNIA (1963), when the indigent defendant is accorded an appeal as of right. Indigents must also, under GRIFFIN V. ILLINOIS (1956), be provided with the record required for a criminal appeal.

LARRY CATÁ BACKER
(2000)

Bibliography

ABRAMOVITZ, MIMI 1988 Regulating the Lives of Women: Social Welfare Policy From Colonial Times to the Present. Boston: South End Press.

BACKER, LARRY CATÁ 1995 Medieval Poor Law in Twentieth Century America: Looking Back Towards a General Theory of Modern American Poor Relief. Case Western Reserve Law Review 1995:871–1041.

——— 1996 Poor Relief, Welfare Paralysis, and Assimilation. Utah Law Review 1996:1–49.

HANDLER, JOEL F. and HASENFELD, YEHESKEL 1991 The Moral Construction of Poverty: Welfare Reform in America. Newbury Park, Calif.: Sage Publication.

KATZ, MICHAEL 1989 The Undeserving Poor: From the War on Poverty to the War on Welfare. New York: Pantheon Books.

MARMOR, THEODORE 1990 America's Misunderstood Welfare State: Persistent Myths, Enduring Realities. New York: Basic Books.

MURRAY, CHARLES 1984 Losing Ground: American Social Policy, 1950–1980. New York: Basic Books.

WELFARE STATE

The United States Constitution, unlike many constitutions in the world, does not mandate WELFARE RIGHTS. For example, the Soviet Constitution of 1977 provided for "guaranteed work, health protection, [and] education." In contrast, our Constitution guarantees FREEDOM OF SPEECH, FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, and VOTING RIGHTS that cannot be denied because of race or sex. The people can then use the right to vote and the right of free speech and other such rights to persuade legislators to enact laws providing for welfare rights such as WORKERS' COMPENSATION, public education, aid to dependent children, Social Security benefits, medicare, and so forth. The United States Constitution, in short, guarantees democracy, and with democracy the people can choose to have as much or as little of a welfare state as they wish.

Such is the modern view of the American Constitution, but it was not always so. To understand the modern view we must first look briefly at the historical background. Toward the end of the last century and during the first part of this century until President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT'S 1937 COURT-PACKING plan, the Supreme Court was antagonistic toward the early efforts of the state and federal governments leading to the modern welfare state. The Court, often over biting dissents, invalidated efforts to enact a progressive federal income tax, minimum-wage legislation, maximum-hour laws, child labor laws, and so forth.

Justice OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., was one who dissented from the Court's efforts (through the use of the DUE PROCESS clause, a belief in "liberty of contract," and a narrow interpretation of federal commerce powers) to limit the power of the government to engage in social welfare legislation. Holmes's dissent in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) objected to the majority's decision invalidating a state law setting sixty hours as the maximum workweek for bakers. "The liberty of the citizen to do as he likes so long as he does not interfere with the liberty of others to do the same, which has been a shibboleth for some well-known writers, is interfered with by school laws, by the Post Office, by every state or municipal institution which takes his money for purposes thought desirable, whether he likes it or not. The Fourteenth Amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer's Social Statics." Later, in ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923), when the Court invalidated a federal law setting minimum wages for women and children in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Holmes said in dissent, "Pretty much all law consists in forbidding men to do some things that they want to do, and contract is no more exempt from law than other acts."

Within five years of Holmes's leaving the Court (after FDR's Court-packing plan of 1937 failed), the Court effectively overruled more than a quarter-century of opinions and recognized the power of the state and federal governments to engage in a wide range of activities that promoted various aspects of a modern welfare state. Although the constitutional power of government to provide welfare benefits does not constitutionally obligate it to do so, the Constitution does place important limits on the government's discretion.

The Constitution assures that once the state grants welfare rights, those benefits are not distributed in a way that violates substantive guarantees. For example, there is no constitutional requirement that a state enact legislation providing public housing for poor people. However, the Fourteenth Amendment forbids the state, once it has provided for public housing, to pass out such benefits in a way that violates the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAW. Thus, if a state builds public housing, it cannot then exclude poor people who are black, for to do so would constitute RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in violation of the equal protection clause. Similarly, if the state provides for medical services as part of its welfare program, the state cannot deny those medical services to Democrats or Socialists, because that would unconstitutionally deprive someone of a governmental benefit because of that person's beliefs, in violation of the FIRST AMENDMENT as applied to the states through the INCORPORATION DOCTRINE.

Implied constitutional rights, like explicit ones, limit the states when they distribute welfare benefits. For example, the Constitution does not explicitly grant a RIGHT TO TRAVEL within the United States, and yet the right certainly exists. As Justice POTTER J. STEWART noted in UNITED STATES V. GUEST (1966), although the right to travel "finds no explicit mention in the Constitution," the explanation may be that "a right so elementary was conceived from the beginning to be a necessary concomitant of the stronger Union the Constitution created. In any event, freedom to travel throughout the United States has long been recognized as a basic right under the Constitution."

Thus, in EDWARDS V. CALIFORNIA (1941) the Court invalidated, under the commerce clause, a California statute that made it a misdemeanor to assist in bringing into that state any indigent person who was not already a resident of California and was known to be an indigent. The Court rejected the state's argument that the migration of poor persons brought severe health and financial problems to the state. The concurring opinion of Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON noted that "indigence' itself is neither a source of rights nor a basis for denying them." Otherwise, the heritage of our constitutional privileges and immunities "is only a promise to the ear to be broken to the hope, a teasing illusion like a munificent bequest in a pauper's will."

Later, in SHAPIRO V. THOMPSON (1969), the Court invalidated several state statutes and a District of Columbia statute that denied welfare benefits to persons who had not resided within the jurisdiction for at least one year. The Court struck these durational RESIDENCE REQUIREMENTS because the state laws violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and because the law of the District of Columbia (which is not governed by the Fourteenth Amendment because it is not a state) violated the equal protection component that has been found within the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment (which restricts the federal government).

The Court argued that the effect of the residence requirements was to deter the entry of indigents into jurisdictions with durational residence requirements, thus burdening the indigents' right to interstate travel. Because this right to travel is "fundamental," the Court would invalidate the statutory classification unless the state could show that it was "necessary to promote a compelling governmental interest" (emphasis in original). The majority rejected the argument that the durational residence requirement was necessary to deter indigents who migrated solely to obtain another jurisdiction's more favorable welfare benefits, holding that no state has the right to exclude poor persons from its borders. Nor may a state distinguish between new and old residents when that distinction burdens the fundamental right to travel. The states (and the District of Columbia), said the Court, may not create subclasses of citizens based on the length of time that persons have been residents. The states, in short, may require that indigents be residents of the state at the time they apply for welfare benefits, but the states may not impose durational residence requirements.

Similarly, in Memorial Hospital v. Maricopa County (1974) the Court invalidated an Arizona statute requiring a one-year durational residence in a county as a condition for receiving nonemergency medical care at the county's expense. The Court said that medical care, like welfare assistance, is "a basic necessity of life"; hence, the case was governed by Shapiro v. Thompson.

However, in Starns v. Malkerson (1971) the Court upheld a University of Minnesota regulation providing that no student could qualify as a resident for purposes of lower in-state tuition unless the student had been a resident of Minnesota for a year. College tuition, unlike food, clothing, or shelter, is not one of the basic necessities of life.

In HARPER V. VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF ELECTIONS (1966) the Court invalidated a Virginia law conditioning voting on payment of an annual POLL TAX of $1.50. Voting, said the Court, is a FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT preservative of our other rights, and hence, a state violates the equal protection clause whenever it makes the affluence of the voter or payment of any fee a requirement for voting. The state has the power to fix qualifications for voting, such as requiring residence and voting registration. But "wealth, like race, creed, or color, is not germane to one's ability to participate intelligently in the electoral process."

The Court has also held that indigents must be granted equal access to various aspects of the criminal process that are basic to the fair determination of their guilt or innocence. Once the state has fulfilled this duty by giving indigents the opportunity for a FAIR TRIAL and access to the initial appellate process, there is no requirement that the state go further and level all economic distinctions by continuing to provide free counsel throughout successive appeals and collateral attacks.

These cases illustrate an important aspect of Supreme Court jurisprudence involving welfare rights and the Constitution. When the Court reviews certain classifications under the equal protection clause—for example, a classification based on race or color—the Court treats the classification as "suspect" and unlikely to be approved unless the state can demonstrate that the SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION is necessary to promote a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST. Thus, in cases like BROWN V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1954), the Court invalidated state laws requiring school SEGREGATION according to race. Similarly, the Court engages in active review under the equal protection clause of state laws that classify "fundamental" rights (like the right to travel or the right to vote) on the basis of poverty.

Modern Supreme Court Justices have concluded that where suspect classes or fundamental rights are not at issue there is nothing in the Constitution that authorizes judges to decide economic policy regarding the allocation of income and wealth through the review of legislative classifications. Poverty, unlike race, is not a suspect classification. And there is no fundamental constitutional right to be free of poverty. As a general matter, the state constitutionally may engage in legislative classifications that pass out benefits or burdens in ways that disadvantage poorer people so long as the law has a RATIONAL BASIS. Thus, a state may enact a progressive income tax, even though such a law requires richer persons to pay a greater percentage of their income to the states than poorer persons. Or a state may enact a sales tax on food, although such a regressive tax requires poorer persons to pay a greater percentage of their income to the states than do richer persons.

For example, the Court rejected the challenge to the welfare law involved in DANDRIDGE V. WILLIAMS (1970). In that case, the Court upheld state legislation that set a maximum amount for welfare aid to any one family; the law, in effect, offered lessened benefits for children born to families over a certain size. The appellees in that case argued that the law violated the equal protection clause by discriminating against them because of their larger families. The majority rejected the claim: "In the area of economics and social welfare, a State does not violate the Equal Protection Clause merely because the classifications made by its laws are imperfect. If the classification has some "reasonable basis,' it does not offend the Constitution simply because the classification "is not made with mathematical nicety or because in practice it results in some inequality.'" There is a fundamental right to travel; there is no fundamental right to welfare.

Similarly, although a woman may have a constitutional right to an ABORTION under certain circumstances, it is constitutional for the state to deny state funding for medically necessary abortions, even when it is providing funds for childbirth. The state need not provide affirmative assistance to a poor woman to procure an abortion any more than the state must provide subsidized airfare to protect an indigent's right to travel.

SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ (1973) upheld the constitutionality of a state property tax system that financed primary and secondary education in such a way as to create different districts with large variations in the amount of money spent on the education of children, depending on where the children lived. Some districts were much richer than others, with the poorer districts having much less taxable wealth subject to the property tax. The majority found nothing in the allocation of education opportunities based on district wealth that furnished a constitutional justification for active and close judicial supervision of the legislative policy. The Court emphasized that it had never adopted an active standard of review solely because the law burdened poor persons in the allocation of benefits, unless those benefits were deemed to be fundamental constitutional rights.

However, in a footnote to the majority opinion in Rodriguez, Justice LEWIS F. POWELL suggested that if a state set up an educational system that absolutely deprived poor children of the opportunity for any education, legislative choice might raise problems under the equal protection clause: "If elementary and secondary education were made available by the State only to those able to pay a tuition assessed against each pupil, there would be a clearly defined class of "poor' people—definable in terms of their inability to pay the prescribed sum—who would be absolutely precluded from receiving an education. That case would present a far more compelling set of circumstances for judicial assistance than the case before us today."

In short, the issue in fundamental rights cases is whether the statute in question limits the fundamental right in a way that violates the Constitution, and not whether the statute is fair or unfair to poor people. In fact, the law in question may be unconstitutional, even though it seeks to level wealth distinctions in the exercise of the fundamental right rather than to create wealth distinctions. In BUCKLEY V. VALEO. (1976), for example, the Court invalidated limits on campaign spending by candidates for public office as an unconstitutional burden on the fundamental right to free speech, guaranteed by the First Amendment. Although Congress designed the legislation in part to equalize the ability to run for office between persons of differing wealth, the Court found no interest of a sufficiently compelling magnitude to justify the limitation on free speech rights.

In addition to these substantive guarantees, the Constitution also provides procedural protections for persons entitled to welfare benefits under state or federal law. The due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment forbids a state to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The Fifth Amendment similarly restricts the federal government. Since 1970, the Supreme Court has recognized that government welfare benefits may constitute statutory ENTITLEMENTS , a new type of "property" that the government may not take away without offering basic procedural protections.

In GOLDBERG V. KELLY (1970) the Court held that a state could not constitutionally terminate public assistance payments for a recipient without affording her the opportunity for an evidentiary hearing prior to the termination. As the Court later explained in BOARD OF REGENTS V. ROTH (1972):

> To have a property interest in a benefit, a person clearly must have more than an abstract need or desire for it. . . . He must have a legitimate claim of entitlement to it. It is a purpose of the ancient institution of property to protect those claims upon which people rely in their daily lives, reliance that must not be arbitrarily undermined. It is a purpose of the constitutional right to a hearing to provide an opportunity for a person to vindicate those claims.
>
> Property interests, of course, are not created by the Constitution. Rather, they are created and their dimensions are defined by existing rules or understandings that secure certain benefits and that support claims of entitlements to those benefits. Thus, the welfare recipients in Goldberg v. Kelly had a claim of entitlement to welfare benefits that was grounded in the statute defining eligibility for them.

Government need not offer welfare or other such benefits to its citizens. But once government decides to offer such benefits and establishes standards that define when a person is eligible, the government has created an entitlement and cannot arbitrarily deny those benefits. It must provide PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS. The government may provide benefits in cash, such as social security benefits or farm subsidies; it may offer benefits in kind, such as free housing in a publicly-owned building; it may offer benefits in hybrid forms, such as food stamps, which can only be redeemed for particular items. In all cases, once the government establishes such benefits as entitlements, the government can withdraw them from particular individuals only after it offers procedural protections such as fair notice and an opportunity to be heard.

The U.S. Constitution does not demand a welfare state. Yet the Constitution is flexible and adaptable enough to allow it. The Constitution guarantees that if the state does provide for welfare protection, the state's largess will be subject to various substantive and procedural limitations.

RONALD D. ROTUNDA
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Campaign Finance; Economic Due Process; Economic Equal Protection; Economic Regulation; Poverty Law and the Constitution; Substantive Due Process.)

Bibliography

NOWAK, JOHN E. and ROTUNDA, RONALD D. 1991 Constitutional Law, 4th ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

REICH, CHARLES 1964 The New Property. Yale Law Journal 73:733–787.

ROTUNDA, RONALD D. et al. 1986 Treatise on Constitutional Law: Substance and Procedure. 3 vols. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co.

VAN ALYSTYNE, WILLIAM 1968 The Demise of the Right-Privilege Distinction in Constitutional Law. Harvard Law Review 81:1439–1464.

WINTER, RALPH 1972 Poverty, Economic Equality, and the Equal Protection Clause. Supreme Court Review 1972:41–102.

WELSH v. WISCONSIN
466 U.S. 740 (1984)

In Welsh the Supreme Court considered and rejected an exception to its rule of PAYTON V. NEW YORK (1984) that the FOURTH AMENDMENT prohibits a warrantless arrest in one's home in the absence of EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES. Police made a warrantless night entry of a private home to arrest a man for committing the nonjailable offense of driving while drunk. Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN for a 6–2 Court rejected the state's reliance on the hot pursuit doctrine because the police had not in fact engaged in a pursuit. In view of the state's classification of a first-offense drunk-driving offense as a minor crime meriting merely a fine, the Court also rejected the argument that the need to get a blood-alcohol test without delay provided an exigent circumstance.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WENGLER v. DRUGGISTS MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY
446 U.S. 142 (1980)

Missouri's workers' compensation law provided death benefits to all widows but only to widowers who proved actual dependence on their wives or incapacity to earn a living. The Supreme Court, 8–1, held this SEX DISCRIMINATION invalid, following CRAIG V. BOREN (1976) and CALIFANO V. GOLDFARB (1977).

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

WESBERRY v. SANDERS
376 U.S. 1 (1964)

After BAKER V. CARR (1962) held that legislative districting presented a justiciable controversy, the Supreme Court held in Wesberry, 8–1, that a state's congressional districts are required by Article I, section 2, of the Constitution to be as equal in population as is practicable. That section provides that representatives are to be chosen "by the People of the several States." Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN dissented on both textual and historical grounds.

Later decisions make clear that no justifications can excuse substantial deviation from population equality in congressional districting.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

WEST COAST HOTEL COMPANY v. PARRISH
300 U.S. 379 (1937)

This decision sustaining a Washington state minimum wage statute in March 1937 signaled a seismic shift in judicial philosophy toward acceptance of the validity of social and economic legislation. Together with the WAGNER ACT CASES, the decision reflected a new, favorable judicial attitude toward the NEW DEAL, thus defusing FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT'S COURT-PACKING proposal.

The constitutionality of minimum wage legislation had a peculiar history. In MULLER V. OREGON (1908) and BUNTING V. OREGON (1917) the Justices had approved state laws regulating maximum working hours, including provisions for overtime wages. In 1917, the Court divided evenly on an Oregon minimum wage law. WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, among others, confidently presumed that LOCHNER V. NEW YORK's (1905) rigorous FREEDOM OF CONTRACT doctrines no longer applied. Yet in 1923, a 5–3 majority of the Court reaffirmed the Lochner ruling, and in ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923) the Court invalidated a DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA minimum wage statute. New Chief Justice Taft sharply attacked the majority's reasoning. He found no distinction between MAXIMUM HOUR AND MINIMUM WAGE LAWS: one was the "multiplier and the other the multiplicand." Although Taft reiterated his belief that Lochner had been tacitly overruled, Lochner nevertheless persisted until the Parrish decision in 1937.

After Adkins, the Court invalidated other state minimum wage laws. The Great Depression, however, stimulated new state laws, perhaps encouraged by Justice GEORGE SUTHERLAND'S OBITER DICTUM that "exceptional circumstances" might justify such legislation. But in MOREHEAD V. NEW YORK EX REL. TIPALDO (1936), a 5–4 majority held to the Adkins precedent and invalidated a recent New York law. The Court's opinion masked Justice OWEN J. ROBERTS's uneasiness. Roberts had supported PIERCE & BUTLER, JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS, George Sutherland, and WILLIS VAN DEVANTER in Tipaldo, but he later revealed that the state counsel's argument that Adkins merely be distinguished, and not overthrown, had obliged him to follow the precedent. Six months later, Roberts provided the key vote to consider the Washington law. On the surface, the procedure was justified on the ground that the state court had upheld the statute, but the combination of the Tipaldo dissenters' strongly held views on constitutionality and Roberts's skepticism toward Adkins dictated a full-scale review of the issue.

Roberts later stated that he had decided in favor of the statutes after arguments in December 1936 and that he had successfully urged delaying the decision pending HARLAN FISKE STONE's recovery from illness in order to mass a majority. Stone returned shortly after Roosevelt submitted his court-packing proposal in early February. Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES then withheld the announcement until March 29, perhaps to avoid appearances of political submission.

Hughes's majority opinion decisively repudiated Lochner and Adkins. He argued that the Constitution nowhere enshrined freedom of contract and that "regulation which is reasonable in relation to its subject and is adopted in the interests of the community is DUE PROCESS." Seeking to deflect the outraged protests of his more conservative brethren, Hughes invoked Taft's Adkins dissent: "That challenge persists and is without any satisfactory answer."

Invoking the public interest doctrine of NEBBIA V. NEW YORK (1934), Hughes asked what could be "closer to the public interest than the health of women and their protection from unscrupulous and overreaching employers?" Accordingly, Hughes held that the minimum wage statute was reasonable and not "arbitrary or capricious." That, he concluded, "is all we have to decide."

Sutherland, speaking for the dissenters, passionately reiterated his Adkins doctrine. More broadly, Sutherland also implicitly addressed Stone's scathing dissent in UNITED STATES V. BUTLER (1936), which had pleaded for judicial self-restraint and an end to judges' imposition of their own social and economic predilections. The notion of self-restraint, Sutherland retorted, was "ill considered and mischievous"; it belonged "in the domain of will and not of judgment." Judges were bound to enforce the Constitution, he said, according to their own "conscientious and informed convictions." Sutherland concluded that freedom of contract remained the rule. The intervening economic conditions altered nothing, for "the meaning of the Constitution," he said, "does not change with the ebb and flow of economic events." Sutherland's dissent was both an apologia and an obituary for a judicial philosophy eclipsed by new realities.

STANLEY I. KUTLER
(1986)

Bibliography

MASON, ALPHEUS T. 1956 Harlan Fiske Stone. New York: Viking Press.

WESTON v. CITY COUNCIL OF CHARLESTON
2 Peters 449 (1829)

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL, held unconstitutional a city ordinance taxing interest-bearing stock of the United States, on the grounds that the tax burdened the ENUMERATED POWER of the United States to borrow money on its credit. The principle of the opinion, that an instrumentality of the United States is immune from taxation by state and local governments, derived from MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819).

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Intergovernmental Immunity.)

WEST RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY v. DIX
6 Howard 529 (1848)

The West River Bridge case challenged a Vermont law of 1839 authorizing county officials to expropriate the rights of way, real estate, or entire franchises of chartered companies in order to provide their communities with free public roads. County officials condemned the entire franchise and property of the West River Bridge Company, which had been given a hundred-year franchise under a charter of 1795 for a bridge near Brattleboro, an important market town. The stockholders were awarded $4,000 in damages. The company's appeal was rejected by the Vermont Supreme Court, and the case was then carried to the United States Supreme Court.

DANIEL WEBSTER, as counsel for the company, sought in his arguments to reopen virtually all the issues of CHARLES RIVER BRIDGE V. WARREN BRIDGE COMPANY (1837). He contended that rising popular disregard for franchised rights of corporations would legitimate the worst "levelling ultraisms or Antirentism or Agrarianism or Abolitionism." Eminent domain was a power inappropriate to republican government, he contended, and the bridge taking was in blatant violation of the CONTRACT CLAUSE. Nonetheless, the Court, with Justice JAMES M. WAYNE dissenting, upheld Vermont's action. Each of the three opinions filed declared that eminent domain was a power fundamental to the states, had long been exercised by them, was not restrained by the contract clause, and extended as much to franchises as to any other type of property. As the first Supreme Court ruling that dealt directly with the states' power of eminent domain and related procedural matters, West River Bridge complemented the Charles River Bridge decision; both supported the states' authority to accommodate technological change and social and entrepreneurial needs.

HARRY N. SCHEIBER
(1986)

WEST VIRGINIA BOARD OF EDUCATION v. BARNETTE

See: Flag Salute Cases

WHALEN v. ROE
429 U.S. 589 (1977)

Rejecting a claim based on the constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY, a unanimous Supreme Court upheld a New York law requiring storage in a computer file of the names and addresses of persons who obtain, by doctors' prescriptions, such drugs as opium, methadone, cocaine, and amphetamines. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, writing for the Court, noted that previous decisions recognizing a right of privacy had involved two different kinds of interests: (1) "avoiding disclosure of personal matters"; and (2) "independence in making certain kinds of important decisions." Both interests were arguably implicated here; there was some risk of disclosure of a drug user's name, and that risk could have deterred the prescription or use of such drugs even when they were medically advisable. Nonetheless, and despite a district court finding that the state had not proved the necessity of storing this personal information, the Court concluded that the law was valid. The state's interest in DRUG REGULATION was vital; the legislature was entitled to experiment with reasonable means for achieving that end. Balanced against this objective, the invasions of privacy were too slight to constitute invasions of either patients' or doctors' constitutional liberties.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

WHEATON, HENRY
(1785–1848)

Henry Wheaton read law in his native Providence, Rhode Island, and studied civil law in France in 1805–1806. While in France he translated the new Code Napoléon into English. He became the first official reporter for the United States Supreme Court under an 1816 statute creating that position. From 1816 to 1827 Wheaton edited twelve volumes of United States Reports. While official reporter he argued a number of cases, including GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824). In Wheaton v. Peters (1834) he unsuccessfully sued his successor, Richard Peters. The Supreme Court ruled that no individual could hold a COPYRIGHT on Supreme Court opinions. From 1827 to 1846 Wheaton held various diplomatic positions and wrote extensively on international law. His works included Elements of International Law, History of the Law of Nations (1842) and an essay on the African slave trade (1842). He was the foremost American expert on international law during his lifetime.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

BAKER, ELIZABETH F. 1937 Henry Wheaton, 1785–1848. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.

WHEELER, BURTON K.
(1882–1975)

A Montana Democrat, Burton K. Wheeler ranked with GEORGE NORRIS of Nebraska and William Borah of Idaho as one of the major liberal leaders of the United States SENATE, where Wheeler served from 1923 to 1946. In the 1924 presidential campaign, ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE of Wisconsin headed the Progressive party ticket, with Wheeler as his running mate. They attracted more votes than any previous third party, and their platform provided an agenda for the NEW DEAL. One plank urged an amendment to the Constitution providing that a two-thirds majority in both houses of Congress might override any judicial decision holding a congressional enactment unconstitutional. Although Wheeler was a critic of the Supreme Court and of JUDICIAL REVIEW, he insisted that a constitutional amendment was the only proper means of reform; accordingly, he broke with FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT in 1937 by opposing his COURT-PACKING plan. It was Wheeler, an ally of Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, who produced the letter by Chief Justice CHARLES EVANS HUGHES that contributed to the 10–8 vote against the bill by the Senate Judiciary Committee. Wheeler remained a liberal, though he was an isolationist in foreign affairs.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

WHEELER, BURTON K. with HEALY, PAUL F. 1962 Yankee from the West. New York: Doubleday.

WHIG PARTY

The Whig party emerged as a coalition of politicians opposed to ANDREW JACKSON and Jacksonian Democracy. Some prominent Whigs, like DANIEL WEBSTER, traced their political roots to the old FEDERALIST party, while others, like HENRY CLAY, had been Jeffersonian Democrats. Most had also been National Republicans and, as such, supported the presidencies of JAMES MONROE and JOHN QUINCY ADAMS. When the Anti-Masonic party collapsed, most of its members became Whigs. Some extreme STATES' RIGHTS southerners briefly affiliated with the Whigs in reaction to Jackson's heavy-handed response to South Carolina in the NULLIFICATION controversy. A few Democrats joined the Whigs because they disagreed with Jackson over the BANK OF THE UNITED STATES or because they were disillusioned with Old Hickory's successor, MARTIN VAN BUREN. In the 1850s the Whig party collapsed. Most northern Whigs joined the REPUBLICAN PARTY, while southern Whigs became Know-Nothings or Democrats.

Whigs favored high tariffs, federally funded INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, a national banking system, a relatively weak presidency, and deference to Supreme Court rulings on constitutional questions. In 1832 the Young Men's National Republican Convention, which nominated Henry Clay for President, resolved "that the Supreme Court of the United States is the only tribunal recognized by the constitution for deciding, in the last resort, all questions arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, and that, upon the preservation of the authority and jurisdiction of that court inviolate, depends the existence of the Union."

The Whig party avoided taking any position on SLAVERY, seeking northern compromise on the issue in return for southern support for northern economic interests. Northern Whigs, like Daniel Webster, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, and WILLIAM H. SEWARD, opposed slavery with differing degrees of passion. In the 1830s some Whig congressmen, led by John Quincy Adams and Joshua Giddings, fought for the right to petition Congress on slavery. Adams viewed this as a constitutional right guaranteed by the petition clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT. However, when Whigs controlled Congress and the White House in the early 1840s, they, too, adopted gag rules to prevent the reading of abolitionist petitions. Southern Whigs supported slavery, but they never supported southern extremists. Indeed, southern Whigs opposed states' rights, southern nationalism, and SECESSION; however, in 1861 southern ex-Whigs, like ALEXANDER STEPHENS, ROBERT TOOMBS, and Judah P. Benjamin, became confederate leaders.

Whigs from both sections opposed the ANNEXATION OF TEXAS, the Mexican War, and other aggressions of Manifest Destiny. During the Mexican War they argued that President JAMES K. POLK had exceeded his constitutional authority by sending troops into southern Texas and Mexico to provoke war.

The Whigs won only two presidential elections. General William Henry Harrison, elected in 1840, died a month after taking office and was succeeded by JOHN TYLER, a former states' rights Democrat who had little sympathy for many Whig positions. Under Tyler the Whigs passed a major but short-lived BANKRUPTCY law and a higher tariff. President Tyler vetoed two Whig-sponsored bills to reestablish a national banking system.

In 1848 the Whigs captured the White House with another war hero, General ZACHARY TAYLOR, by avoiding taking a stand on any major issues. Whigs generally supported the COMPROMISE OF 1850, which was passed as individual pieces of legislation and signed into law by the deceased Taylor's vice-president, MILLARD FILLMORE, a moderate Whig from New York. By 1852, however, the party was deeply divided over the compromise and slavery in general. After 1850 the Whig party collapsed in the South, as southerners abandoned the party that appeared to be dominated by staunch antislavery men such as Senator William Seward of New York. After 1854 most northern Whigs also abandoned the party, either for the nativist American (Know-Nothing) party or the Republican party.

Constitutionally the Whigs stood for a strong Union and federal intervention in the economy. Whigs argued for a broad reading of federal power under the COMMERCE CLAUSE and an expansive JUDICIAL POWER. Although neither was appointed by a Whig President, Justices JOSEPH STORY and JOHN MCLEAN came to symbolize Whig views of the Constitution. The greatest symbol of the party's constitutional position was not, however, a judge, but the attorney and politician Daniel Webster.

Even before the Whig party was formed, Webster presented "Whig-like" arguments in the DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819) and GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824), in which he argued for a strict interpretation of the CONTRACT CLAUSE and a reading of the Constitution that gave Congress exclusive jurisdiction over INTERSTATE COMMERCE. He made similar arguments in GROVES V. SLAUGHTER (1841), the LICENSE CASES (1847), and the PASSENGER CASES (1849). The bedrock of Whig constitutional nationalism was best stated by Webster's 1830 reply to Senator ROBERT YOUNG HAYNE's argument in favor of nullification and Webster's speech supporting the Compromise of 1850. In answering Hayne, Webster declared, "I go for the Constitution as it is, and for the Union as it is." Webster argued, "It is, sir, the people's Constitution, the people's government, made for the people, made by the people, and answerable to the people." He concluded with the ringing plea for "Liberty and Union, now and for ever, one and inseparable." In his March 7, 1850, speech Webster supported the compromise measures, declaring, "I wish to speak today, not as a Massachusetts man, nor as a Northern man, but as an American, and a member of the Senate of the United States." He told his colleagues, "I speak today for the preservation of the Union." These measures, introduced by the Whig Clay and supported by Webster, symbolize the constitutional principles of the Whigs—support for the Union and compromise above all else—and the reason for their collapse. By the mid-1850s, compromise based on blind fidelity to the Union was no longer possible in a nation torn by sectional strife and about to go to war over slavery. Significantly, perhaps, the last Whig President, Millard Fillmore, opposed secession but also opposed all of Lincoln's policies to stop secession. By this time, however, the supporters of Whig nationalism and CONSTITUTIONALISM had followed such Whigs as Seward and Lincoln into the Republican party.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1992)

Bibliography

BARTLETT, IRVING H. 1978 Daniel Webster. New York: Norton.

MCCORMICK, RICHARD P. 1966 The Second American Party System. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

VAN DEUSEN, GLYNDON G. 1973 The Whig Party. In Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., ed., History of U.S. Political Parties. Vol. 1, pages 332–493. New York: Chelsea House.

WHISKEY REBELLION
(1794)

The "rebellion" in western Pennsylvania provided the first test of the power of the federal government to suppress insurrections and enforce obedience to its laws. Frontier farmers, who were also small distillers, resisted the whiskey excise from its passage in 1791. When the resistance erupted in violence in July 1794, President GEORGE WASHINGTON issued a proclamation ordering the rebels to submit to the law or face military coercion under an act authorizing employment of the militia in such cases. After a peace mission failed, he called up 15,000 militia from Pennsylvania and neighboring states. The army marched, and the rebellion quickly collapsed without bloodshed; two ringleaders, tried and convicted of TREASON, were subsequently pardoned by the President. FEDERALIST leaders exulted in this crushing of rebellion, which they viewed as part of a plot against the government, while their Republican counterparts denounced the force as excessive and intended to overawe opposition to the administration.

MERRILL D. PETERSON
(1986)

Bibliography

BALDWIN, LELAND D. 1939 Whiskey Rebels: The Story of a Frontier Uprising. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press.

WHITE, BYRON R.
(1917– )

In 1962 President JOHN F. KENNEDY appointed Byron R. White to replace CHARLES E. WHITTAKER and become the ninety-third Justice to serve on the Supreme Court. White was forty-four years old and had no previous judicial experience. He had been a CLERK for Chief Justice FRED N. VINSON in 1946–1947, however, and was the first former law clerk subsequently appointed to that tribunal. His only other significant government experience had come during the preceding year, after President Kennedy had appointed him deputy attorney general. White had managed the Justice Department, recruited lawyers, and evaluated candidates for federal judgeships. His CIVIL RIGHTS enforcement experience included a stint in Montgomery, Alabama, where local authorities had failed to prevent mob violence against the freedom riders, an interracial group protesting racial SEGREGATION in public transportation. White restored order with the help of 400 federal marshals, providing Kennedy with a significant national victory over recalcitrant state officials.

Whatever White lacked in government experience, he made up in personal capacities. Born in rural Colorado, White came of age there during the Depression. He worked in the beet fields as a boy and later won a scholarship to the University of Colorado, where he was first in his class and an all American football player. He played professional football, and for several months, until the European outbreak of World War II, he studied as a Rhodes scholar in England, where he first met John Kennedy. He began studying law at Yale in 1939 and again topped his class. The war interrupted his studies, and he served as a naval intelligence officer in the South Pacific, where he again encountered Kennedy. He was graduated in 1946, and after his clerkship, returned to Colorado to practice law. In 1959 he organized support for Kennedy as the Democratic nominee for President. Following Kennedy's nomination, he chaired Citizens for Kennedy, a nationwide volunteer group. His public service followed.

When White joined the WARREN COURT, its most vigorous efforts to nationalize CIVIL LIBERTIES and limit government power in favor of individual rights and egalitarian values lay just ahead. White voted regularly with the majority to invalidate discrimination against racial minorities and the politically powerless in areas such as school DESEGREGATION and REAPPORTIONMENT, and to sustain the constitutionality of federal civil rights legislation. Nonetheless, he acquired a reputation as a moderate-to-conservative Justice for his frequent dissents in major decisions, such as MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), which imposed new constitutional limits on police discretion; for his willingness to uphold laws excluding communists from government positions; and for his general inclination toward judicial self-restraint.

With President RICHARD M. NIXON's four Court appointments from 1969–1971, the deferential positions White previously had articulated in dissent increasingly became majority views in the BURGER COURT. But White also dissented from decisions undermining egalitarian opinions he had joined in the Warren era. The Court had changed around him—not an uncommon occurrence for Justices serving for long periods.

The Court's shift, together with White's failure to articulate a comprehensive personal vision of an ideal balance of individual liberty and government power, has led some observers to conclude that White lacks a coherent judicial philosophy. The votes and written opinions of this independent, tough-minded jurist, however, do reveal a distinctive vision of the Supreme Court's role in constitutional law, a vision compatible with White's personal history.

One pervasive attitude in White's approach is skepticism and humility about the authority and capacity of the Court to second-guess the efforts of other government officials in dealing with difficult societal problems. White's opinions reflect deference to the good faith assessments and pragmatic judgments of police, administrative officials, and state and federal judges—particularly when he is convinced that they have readier access to relevant information than the Court does, or that government flexibility is needed. He reserves the highest deference for legislative judgments, out of respect for LEGISLATIVE POWER, especially that of the national Congress, as the most legitimate source of law in a democratic society. This second tenet emphasizes the primacy of legislative decisions in allocating the benefits and burdens of government programs, balancing individual rights and community needs, and structuring government operations.

The corollary is that White's deference disappears if good faith and pragmatism are absent. When prejudice infects government decision making, when the interests of the disadvantaged systematically are excluded from consideration in government processes, or when individual liberty is sacrificed for minimal public gain, White readily and consistently supports constitutional prohibitions. He embraces a strongly individualistic ideology that demands fair government treatment of citizens as individuals and holds ordinary citizens and government officials accountable for their individual conduct.

White's individualism produces a powerful egalitarian ethic that takes two different forms. One is constitutional invalidation of government action that treats people stereotypically, with insufficient regard for their individual worth, merits, and capacities. The other is constitutional approval of government efforts to equalize opportunities for the disadvantaged.

These general themes explain much of Justice White's participation in the Court's work. His opposition to stringent constitutional limits on law enforcement practices, absent significant abuse of a particular defendant's liberty, reflects deference to the difficulties of enforcement and the flexibility it requires, as well as to the judgment that guilty individuals have no great claim to benefit from police misconduct that has not harmed them. Deference, pragmatism, and rugged individualism underlie White's position in Miranda and his majority opinion in United States v. Leon (1984), establishing a GOOD FAITH EXCEPTION to the EXCLUSIONARY RULE. His Court opinions holding that the states must provide TRIAL BY JURY if substantial imprisonment is possible, but that the states may convict with less than unanimous verdicts and with juries of only six members, illustrate a compromise between a belief in the importance of the jury in protecting individual liberty and tolerance for pragmatic modifications of its traditional features when the modifications do not seriously undermine its basic value. The heavy weight he has placed behind sanctioning guilty individuals gives way, however, when government interferes with a fair presentation of the defendant's side, as by denying the RIGHT TO COUNSEL. In civil cases, too, in contexts as diverse as PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS and the CONTRACT CLAUSE, he has tolerated pragmatic (and unbiased) responses to perceived governmental needs.

White's deference to national LEGISLATIVE POWER has led him to reject both FEDERALISM objections that Congress has usurped reserved state power, as in OREGON V. MITCHELL (1970) and NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES V. USERY (1976), and SEPARATION OF POWERS objections that Congress has invaded the Court's or the President's power, as in his provocative dissents in NORTHERN PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION CO. V. MARATHON PIPELINE CO. (1982), dealing with the powers of LEGISLATIVE COURTS in BANKRUPTCY cases, and IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), in which the majority struck down the LEGISLATIVE VETO. He also opposed individual rights challenges to legislative efforts that promote equality, such as the affirmative action program upheld in FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980), and Congress's attempt to equalize campaign spending, partially invalidated over White's dissent in BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976). In these cases, deference and attachment to egalitarian values worked together; when they are in conflict, however, White tends to put aside deference and vote to strike down federal laws that discriminate on such invidious bases as race or sex.

White is as vigorous in opposing biased or arbitrary government judgments as he is in supporting justifiable, pragmatic ones. He will not invoke the Constitution to impose affirmative obligations on government, but will do so to prevent the government from imposing unfair burdens. He is reluctant to recognize constitutional immunities for even the highest level officials, preferring to hold that no one is above the law. That frequent theme appears most prominently in his dissent in NIXON V. FITZGERALD (1982), arguing that the President is legally accountable for abuse of government power, and in his opinions interpreting the SPEECH AND DEBATE CLAUSE as fully immunizing members of Congress from inquiry into legislative conduct, but providing no immunity for nonlegislative acts.

More broadly, White has voted to invalidate government policies founded on prejudice or bad motive without more, but usually would not invalidate laws adopted with proper motives, whatever their impact. Thus, in WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976) White led the Court in making proof of intentional discrimination a necessary condition for finding a violation of the equal protection clause. He also would have made intent a sufficient condition, however, as he articulated in dissent in PALMER V. THOMPSON (1971). He has been both generous in finding proof of illicit intent and forceful in insisting that, once wrongdoing is shown, the harm be remedied fully, especially in cases of RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. And when the impact of governmental action significantly impairs the democratic process, as in reapportionment cases, White also has supported judicial intervention.

In FIRST AMENDMENT cases, too, White is strict about disallowing government discrimination against disfavored viewpoints, but tolerant of significant limitations on individual expression that are inevitable byproducts of legitimate government aims, a theme illustrated by his opinion in BROADRICK V. OKLAHOMA (1973). That opinion also represents White's consistent belief that the OVERBREADTH and VAGUENESS doctrines should be used only sparingly to strike statutes with a neutral and uncertain inhibiting effect on the general populace—a position readily held by a believer in hardy individualism. He is likewise unreceptive to arguments that the press needs wide immunity from libel and other actions lest fear of liability deter them from vigorous and important expression. Thus, although this Justice with considerable personal experience as the object of media attention strongly supported First Amendment limits on press liability for reporting about public officials, he vigorously dissented in GERTZ V. ROBERT WELCH, INC. (1974) from the Court's granting the powerful media constitutional immunity from liability to helpless individuals who seek redress for the ravaging of their reputations. Indeed, he generally opposes affording the press any special privileges, except in cases of prior restraint or when the press serves as the public's monitor of government. Finally, White has been relatively deferential to regulations of OBSCENITY and SUBVERSIVE ADVOCACY, the former an example of deference to strong community views which invade little important freedom and the latter an example of deference to the community's right to protect its democratic character.

White's concern for the constitutional obligation to purge arbitrariness from government decision making extends naturally to questions of procedural fairness. Although White would allow government considerable flexibility in defining procedures, he has insisted that appropriate procedures be provided if government deprives a person of a government-created liberty or property entitlement, even if the government was under no initial obligation to create it. So conceived, procedural due process promotes individualized application of law on the basis of personal responsibility and guards against arbitrary decisions.

White's emphasis on equality and fair, if flexible, process generally stops short of imposing substantive limits on government policy. His normal disinclination to go beyond constitutional text or history and recognize new fundamental liberties tends to yield, however, when a state restricts personal autonomy by a law that deviates from most other states' laws or is of minimal efficacy in achieving proper objectives. Thus, White dissented in ROE V. WADE (1973), where the Court used SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS analysis to invalidate laws regulating abortion, but he concurred in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965), arguing that the state's atypical law against marital use of contraceptives violated substantive due process because of its "marginal utility to the declared objective" of deterring illicit sexual relationships. Similarly, he initially voted against the death penalty in Furman v. Georgia (1972), not because it constituted CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT but because it was administered arbitrarily and too infrequently to achieve its deterrent aims. Later, he voted to uphold mandatory death penalty laws applied broadly and consistently. Still, he wrote the major opinion in COKER V. GEORGIA (1977), holding the death penalty for rape cruel and unusual, largely because most states had refrained from imposing it for crimes not producing death.

Normally, White's limited belief in NATURAL RIGHTS jurisprudence surfaces as increased scrutiny of legislative means when government policy implicates broadly accepted liberties and the threat of inequality or arbitrariness is high. Perhaps not surprisingly, given his personal experience, he not only finds family choice fundamental, but educational opportunity, too. Thus, he has been especially adamant to invalidate school SEGREGATION, inequality of expenditures among a state's school districts, and school discipline that involves corporal punishment or lacks procedural safeguards. He is equally adamant that public aid to the secular functions of parochial schools, a policy that supports educational choice and quality, does not constitute a prohibited ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION—a distinct minority view on the Court.

JONATHAN D. VARAT
(1986)

Bibliography

ISRAEL, FRED 1969 Byron R. White. In Leon Friedman and Fred Israel, eds., The Justices of the Supreme Court: Their Lives and Major Opinions. Vol. 4:2951–2961. New York: Chelsea House.

LIEBAMAN, LANCE 1972 Swing Man on the Supreme Court. New York Times Magazine, October 8, 1972.

SERNARD, SCHWARTZ 1983 Super Chief: Earl Warren and His Supreme Court: A Judicial Biography. New York: New York University Press.

WOODWARD, BOB and ARMSTRONG, SCOTT 1979 The Brethren: Inside the Supreme Court. New York: Simon & Schuster.

WHITE, BYRON R.
(1917– )
(Update 1)

When he was appointed to the Supreme Court in 1962, Byron White, at the age of forty-four, was a symbol of the vigor, youth, and intellectual power of the JOHN F. KENNEDY administration. From a poor rural background, he had ranked first in the class of 1938 at the University of Colorado, becoming a football All American and winning a Rhodes Scholarship. By the time he graduated from Yale Law School in 1946, he had briefly studied at Oxford, played two seasons of professional football, served as a naval intelligence officer in the Pacific, and twice encountered John Kennedy (once at Oxford, once in the Pacific). After clerking for Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON, White joined a law practice in Denver where he remained for fourteen years. When Kennedy won the Democratic nomination for President in 1960, White chaired the nationwide volunteer group Citizens for Kennedy. His service as deputy attorney general under ROBERT KENNEDY included screening candidates for judicial appointments and supervising federal marshals protecting workers in the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT in the South. He had been at the job only fourteen months when the President nominated him to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of CHARLES WHITTAKER.

During his nearly thirty years on the Court, White has generally reflected the commitments of the President who appointed him: to equal opportunity, to effective law enforcement, and to enablement of government as it responds to new challenges—with less concern for individual rights, group rights, and STATES' RIGHTS. To the distress of those who would prefer greater elaboration of a philosophical vision, he has approached the judicial task in a lawyerly and pragmatic fashion, although sometimes in excessively cryptic opinions. His independence and analytic bent of mind have often isolated him from more ideological colleagues. As he has served with twenty other Justices during times of great ferment on the Court, his role has changed considerably. He was in the majority in fewer than half of the 5–4 decisions during the 1960s, in more than sixty percent of the 5–4 decisions during the 1970s, and in nearly three-fourths of the 5–4 decisions during the 1980s—more frequently than any other Justice during that decade. Although profound changes in American society (often shaped by the Court itself) have significantly affected the issues before him and, to a lesser extent, his resolution of particular issues, a review of his work on the Court reveals significant consistency in perspective, method, and conviction.

White knows that judges make law. His time at Yale Law School was the heyday of that school's celebration of LEGAL REALISM. As he explained in dissent in MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966), "[T]he Court has not discovered or found the law in making today's decision; what it has done is to make new law and new public policy in much the same way that it has in the course of interpreting other great clauses of the Constitution. . . . [I]t is wholly legitimate . . . to inquire into the advisability of its end product in terms of the long-range interest of the country."

White also understands that the triumph of the administrative state, marked especially by an affirmative and vigorous federal government, has forever altered the shape of American political institutions, including the Court. For White, however, neither legal realism nor expanding concepts of national political authority and responsibility justify the exercise of "raw judicial power." A recurring theme of his opinions is that the judiciary undermines its own legitimacy when it seeks to achieve political objectives not sanctioned by the other branches of government or when it promotes social transformation resisted by the democratic institutions of society.

White's confidence in the good faith and capabilities of democratic institutions—Congress especially, but also the executive, state legislatures, and juries—exceeds that of other justices of the "left" or of the "right." For White, the powers of government are limited neither by abstract conceptions of individual autonomy, nor by any extrademocratic mandate for perfection in human affairs. Rather, government power is limited by the very forces that legitimate it: the people acting through fair and free elections and a Constitution that both authorizes and specifically checks government actors.

In the spirit of the NEW DEAL and of President Kennedy, White gives great weight to securing and preserving federal authority, especially Congress's authority. Where Congress has legislated (or federal agencies have acted pursuant to delegated power), he is disposed to find federal PREEMPTION of state law. Where Congress has not legislated, he gives wide berth to the DORMANT COMMERCE CLAUSE. Where states seek to regulate federal entities, he is disposed to place limits on state power. He does not view the TENTH AMENDMENT as a limitation on Congress's regulatory power; he would permit Congress to abrogate state SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY under the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT; and he recognizes significant legislative power to implement the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Where Congress has delegated interpretative authority to ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES, he is strongly disposed to defer to agency interpretations of statutes. In many ways, he has been the preeminent nationalist on the Court in the modern era. For instance, White was the only dissenter to the Court's 1978 decision upholding the multistate tax compact, which had not been approved by Congress, because of its "potential encroachment on federal supremacy."

White's understanding of the SEPARATION OF POWERS in our national government, as set forth in a series of powerful dissents, is similarly rooted in his recognition that Congress needs latitude to solve economic problems and to reallocate governance authorities in response to the growing demands on national institutions in the post-New Deal era. Thus, he urged in BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976) that "Congress was entitled to determine that personal wealth ought to play a less important role in political campaigns than it has in the past." He lamented in NORTHERN PIPELINE CO. V. MARATHON PIPE LINE CO. (1982) that "at this point in the history of constitutional law" the Court should not have "looked[ed] only to the constitutional text" to determine Congress's power "to create adjudicatory institutions designed to carry out federal policy." He explained in IMMIGRATION NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983) that the LEGISLATIVE VETO "is an indispensable political invention that . . . assures the accountability of independent regulatory agencies and preserves Congress' control on lawmaking." And the budget-balancing legislation of BOWSHER V. SYNAR (1986) was "one of the most novel and far reaching legislative responses to a national crisis since the New Deal."

White conceives of a more limited role for the federal courts, not to supplement or second-guess Congress's policies, but to ensure their implementation by state and federal actors. His concurrence in Chapman v. Houston Welfare Rights Organization (1979)—urging that in the CIVIL RIGHTS legislation of the RECONSTRUCTION Congress had provided a remedy for denial not only of constitutional rights but also of rights created by federal statutes—was subsequently adopted by a majority of the Court. White would also more narrowly construe EXECUTIVE IMMUNITY than would a majority of his colleagues. He is less willing than many others on the Court, however, to infer a private cause of action to enforce federal rights where Congress has lodged responsibility for enforcement with a federal agency or has provided for administrative remedies. Nor is he uniformly activist on issues of POLITICAL QUESTION, STANDING, and other prudential limitations on JUDICIAL REVIEW. Although he has sometimes resisted efforts to restrict HABEAS CORPUS jurisdiction, he has joined in limiting the bases on which habeas review may upset a criminal conviction.

To achieve consistency in CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION, White has taken an expansive view of the Supreme Court's JURISDICTION over state court decisions. Moreover, often dissenting from denial of CERTIORARI, he has regularly urged the Court to use its discretionary jurisdiction to review apparent inconsistencies in the lower courts. His longstanding extrajudicial campaign for creation of a national court of appeals or similar structure to ensure uniformity in federal law may finally have run its course in view of the reduction in the Supreme Court's workload in recent terms.

White's clear sense of the primacy of democratic institutions is reflected in his commitment to the protection of rights to participate in the electoral process. From AVERY V. MIDLAND COUNTY (1968) to Board of Estimate of the City of New York v. Morris (1989), he has led the Court in expansively interpreting the principle of ONE PERSON, ONE VOTE to subject varieties of political apportionment and GERRYMANDERING to judicial review, even as he has taken a relatively permissive and pragmatic approach to apportionment disparities. His dissent in MOBILE V. BOLDEN (1980) effectively became the majority position two terms later in ROGERS V. LODGE (1982), which eased the burden of minority challenges to electoral districting schemes that perpetuate purposeful RACIAL DISCRIMINATION. As indicated in Buckley and subsequent cases, White would go further than other Justices in permitting Congress to regulate the electoral processes to root out potential corruption and inequality, even at the cost of some inhibition of free speech.

More generally, his FIRST AMENDMENT jurisprudence permits significant intrusions on the media, whether in the form of the FAIRNESS DOCTRINE as in RED LION BROADCASTING CO. V. FCC (1969); SEARCH WARRANTS, as in ZURCHER V. STANFORD DAILY (1978); SUBPOENAS, as in BRANZBURG V. HAYES (1972); or LIBEL law, as in HERBERT V. LANDO (1979) and his dissent in GERTZ V. ROBERT WELCH, INC. (1974). White is likewise deferential toward regulation and prosecution of OBSCENITY, CHILD PORNOGRAPHY, and SUBVERSIVE ADVOCACY. He has been a leading opponent of a strict, separatist conception of the ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION and would, for instance, permit state aid for secular activities in parochial schools.

Although White gives broad scope to LEGISLATIVE POWER, he has usually subjected the legislative product to close scrutiny for invidious purpose or for insufficient relationship to a legitimate purpose. For a time, White's purpose analysis produced a more activist Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence than the majority of the Court was willing to embrace; for example, he argued in dissent in PALMER V. THOMPSON (1971) that a Mississippi town should not be permitted to close its swimming pool where its purpose was to prevent implementation of a DESEGREGATION order. White's scrutiny of purpose is decidedly nonactivist, however, in the face of minority challenges to government programs that have disparate racial impact without discriminatory intent. In the seminal case of WASHINGTON V. DAVIS (1976), he held for a 7–2 majority that disparate impact alone does not constitute the kind of racial discrimination that presumptively violates the constitutional principle of EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. White has not adopted the view that the Constitution prohibits all "reverse discrimination" to counteract diffuse societal discrimination. His joint opinion in REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA V. BAKKE (1978), permitting government to take race into account in university admissions, reflects his oft-demonstrated concern for equal educational opportunity. His votes, in FULLILOVE V. KLUTZNICK (1980) and METRO BROADCASTING, INC. V. FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION (1990), to uphold federal minority "set-aside" and race-preference requirements underscore his deference to Congress even as he voted, in RICHMOND (CITY OF) V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989), to strike down a LOCAL GOVERNMENT's "set-aside" scheme.

For a decade after he joined the majority opinion in GRIGGS V. DUKE POWER CO. (1971), White appeared content with permitting disparate impact alone to be sufficient for broad RACE-CONSCIOUS remedies in EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION cases brought under Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964. In 1979, he even joined in endorsing a private employer's use of RACIAL QUOTAS intended to eliminate the effects of societal discrimination. White began to express significant dissatisfaction with aspects of the prevailing Title VII jurisprudence in a series of opinions, mostly dissenting, in the mid-1980s. By the end of the decade, amid indications that the disparate-impact test invited use of racial quotas, White commanded a majority in Wards Cove Packing Co. v. Antonio (1989) to shift the BURDEN OF PROOF in disparate-impact cases.

In school desegregation cases, however, White has been as ready as any member of the Court to find evidence of past purposeful discrimination and to approve broad remedies. His majority opinion in COLUMBUS BOARD OF EDUCATION V. PENICK (1979) permitted inference of purposeful discrimination from evidence of long-past misconduct and a continued discriminatory effect, and placed the burden on the defendant school system to prove that it had not caused any current racial SEGREGATION in its schools. In addition, he would hold the state, not the defendant school district, ultimately responsible for removing the effects of purposeful discrimination; in this view, neither the happenstance of school-district boundaries nor state laws impeding school funding may stand in the way of remedial decrees. Thus he was in a minority in MILLIKEN V. BRADLEY (1974) in arguing and a remedy of interdistrict SCHOOL BUSING, and he wrote the 5–4 decision in Jenkins v. Missouri (1990) upholding the power of the federal district court to order a defendant school board to impose tax increases in violation of fiscally restrictive state law.

One may infer several reasons for White's different stances in school desegregation cases and employment discrimination cases. Even outside the race-discrimination context, White has adopted an ethic of group equality in EDUCATION, as demonstrated in his dissent in SAN ANTONIO INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT V. RODRIGUEZ (1973), where he would have struck down school-financing schemes that leave the poorest school districts with the most impoverished schools. Moreover, the proof of purposeful racial discrimination by school districts is often palpable, but it is difficult to trace disparate racial impact in the job market to purposeful discrimination by a defendant employer. In addition, although busing does not deny schooling to any child, White has expressed particular unhappiness with quota systems that take jobs away from nondiscriminating white workers. Finally, judicial imposition of systems of RACIAL PREFERENCE in employment would cause upheavals in collective bargaining, seniority systems, and other underpinnings of industrial society.

White's belief in the legitimacy of the law in ordering our social life, along with his confidence in the institutions of government, have made him reluctant to impose "decriminalization," either directly (by limiting legislative power to punish) or indirectly (by insisting on perfection from police, prosecutors, and others charged with achieving criminal justice). Even as he joined the holding in Furman v. Georgia (1972), striking down a scheme of CAPITAL PUNISHMENT that provided no guidance for the sentencing authority, White noted the good faith of Georgia in granting discretion to sentencing juries out of a "desire to mitigate the harshness" of capital punishment laws. Subsequently, he has voted to uphold carefully structured death penalty laws, rejecting the arguments that juries "disobey or nullify their instructions" and that others who retain discretion, such as prosecutors, inevitably wield it arbitrarily. Invoking the Court's ill-famed journey earlier in this century into the realm of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, he has refused to make the judgment that the death penalty cannot comport with the Constitution. White has, however, recognized substantive limitations on the types of crimes for which this penalty may be imposed; he wrote the Court's opinion in COKER V. GEORGIA (1977), holding the death penalty disproportionate for the rape of an adult, and the Court's opinion in ENMUND V. FLORIDA (1982), holding capital punishment improper where a murder conviction was based solely on a theory of felony murder.

The criteria of "reasonableness" and "good faith," at the core of much of White's JURISPRUDENCE, are especially prominent in his approach to the FOURTH AMENDMENT—which has largely become the law of the land. He has been the leading proponent of clear and simple rules governing police SEARCH AND SEIZURE. He understands the Constitution's requirement that searches and seizures be "reasonable" to have broad applicability, if shallow in depth; he wrote the opinion in CAMARA V. MUNICIPAL COURT (1967), which spawned a new jurisprudence upholding an array of regulatory searches on less than PROBABLE CAUSE, but he also wrote TENNESSEE V. GARNER (1985), which prohibited use of deadly force against fleeing felons, and he has recognized the Fourth Amendment's applicability to subpoenas issued by GRAND JURIES. His oft-stated antipathy to the EXCLUSIONARY RULE as a remedy for Fourth Amendment violations finally led to adoption of the GOOD FAITH EXCEPTION to this rule in United States v. Leon (1984). White has likewise taken a functional and pragmatic approach to the Sixth Amendment's right to TRIAL BY JURY. He has resisted efforts to limit criminal investigations and forfeitures through broad application of the RIGHT TO COUNSEL; he has dissented from interpretations of the Fifth Amendment RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION that depart from historical practice and impede reliable administration of justice; and he has been at the forefront of the Court in permitting great leeway in PLEA BARGAINING, as in Brady v. United States (1970).

White's opinions on CRIMINAL PROCEDURE reveal not only his perspective on issues of criminal justice but also his unusual commitment to the rule of STARE DECISIS in constitutional adjudication, which has sometimes led to the perception that he is "unpredictable." Like many Justices, White is ready to overrule previous decisions that prove unworkable or ill-advised. For instance, he joined BATSON V. KENTUCKY (1986), which, overruling his own SWAIN V. ALABAMA (1965), subjected preemptory jury challenges to judicial review for racial discrimination; Batson acknowledged that Swain's confidence in state prosecutors had not been vindicated. Yet White, more than other Justices and regardless of ideological inclination, has on most issues sought to adhere to constitutional PRECEDENT not yet overruled. Thus, although he dissented forcefully in Miranda, he has clearly accepted the major contours of that decision. Indeed, he wrote EDWARDS V. ARIZONA (1981), which went beyond the core of Miranda in prohibiting all questioning once the suspect in custody has requested an attorney. Similarly, despite his long, carefully composed dissent in PAYTON V. NEW YORK (1980), which required an ARREST WARRANT to arrest persons in their homes, White ten years later wrote the majority opinion applying Payton to the arrest of someone hiding out overnight in a friend's home. Even where he would vote to overrule a precedent, White has sometimes exasperated observers by refusing to cast the fifth vote for simply narrowing the reach of the precedent, insisting he is bound until it is expressly overruled.

The most controversial decision by White upholding government power to invoke the criminal process is BOWERS V. HARDWICK (1986), which refused to strike down a Georgia law forbidding consensual sodomy between men.

White conceived the issue much as he had the issue in the death penalty cases: whether the Supreme Court should bypass political institutions to establish a new social order. White had long objected to the Court's discovery of new constitutional rights deriving from the concept of "privacy." His concurrence in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965) declined to find a general RIGHT OF PRIVACY, emphasizing instead the lack of a rational relationship between the statute's ban on distributing BIRTH CONTROL information to married persons and the purported purpose of the statute. ROE V. WADE (1973), the decision establishing a broad right to ABORTION throughout pregnancy, evoked a response reminiscent of his Miranda dissent: "The Court simply fashions and announces a new constitutional right . . . with scarcely any reason or authority." In dissents in subsequent privacy rights cases during the 1970s and early 1980s, including MOORE V. CITY OF EAST CLEVELAND (1977), which struck down a ZONING ordinance that narrowly defined "single family," White even more explicitly compared the Court's "new" substantive due process with the efforts of the Court in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) to impose its will on a divided polity. By 1986, in THORNBURGH V. AMERICAN COLLEGE OF OBSTETRICIANS AND GYNECOLOGISTS, he advocated overruling Roe, urging that the right it recognized was neither "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty," nor "deeply rooted in the nation's history and traditions." For White, Bowers was a replay of Thornburgh, with the important difference that he was writing the majority opinion. As White must have anticipated, once the majority had adopted his approach to enunciation of a FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT, it was only a matter of time before Roe itself would begin to collapse, as indeed it did in WEBSTER V. REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES (1989).

Yet White himself had recognized certain fundamental liberty interests that may be subsumed under the label substantive due process—including, in Griswold, "the right to be free of regulation of the intimacies of the marriage relationship" and, in a long series of cases (continuing even after Bowers) dealing with ILLEGITIMACY, the rights of natural parents "in the companionship . . . of their children." White's purpose-based jurisprudence might have considered proscriptions of sodomy as different from anti-abortion laws. In the latter, the organized community may have the purpose of protecting human life, whereas in the former, its motiviation may simply be antipathy towards homosexuals—a purpose that could be recognized (but that White in 1986 declined to recognize) as invidious. Here as elsewhere, White's jurisprudence seldom puts the Court ahead of the country. For him, the Court's primary role in constitutional lawmaking is not to pioneer or even to lead, but rather to secure for the whole nation the democratic consensus that has already been reached.

KATE SMITH

(1992)

Bibliography

HUTTON, MARY CHRISTINE 1986 The Unique Perspective of Justice White: Separation of Powers, Standing and Section 1983 Cases. Administrative Law Review 40:377–414.

LIEBMAN, LANCE 1987 Justice White and Affirmative Action. University of Colorado Law Review 58:471–496.

NELSON, WILLIAM E. 1987 Deference and the Limits to Deference in the Constitutional Jurisprudence of Justice Byron R. White. University of Colorado Law Review 58:347–364.

O'DONNELL, PIERCE 1987 Common Sense and the Constitution: Justice White and the Egalitarian Ideal. University of Colorado Law Review 58:433–470.

STUDENT NOTE 1987 The Intercircuit Tribunal and Perceived Conflicts: An Analysis of Justice White's Dissents from Denial of Certiorari During the 1985 Term. New York University Law Review 62:610–650.

WHITE, BYRON R.
(1917– )
(Update 2)

When Byron R. White retired from the Supreme Court in 1993, the vacancy he created received more attention than his legacy. For the first time since 1967 (with the appointment of THURGOOD MARSHALL), and only the second time since his own appointment in 1962, a President from the Democratic Party would have the power to nominate a member to the Court. The New York Times editorially dismissed White's career: acknowledging that he was "one of the more remarkable people to serve on the Court," the Times nonetheless found him to be "more a witness than a moving force." White indirectly demurred and was later quoted as saying, "I don't have a doctrinal legacy; I shouldn't"—implying, as he often said, that the role of Justices is to decide particular cases, not to build theoretical structures.

Notwithstanding his own modesty and the judgments of the press, White had a substantial impact on the work of the Court during his lengthy tenure. He played a major role in the development of FIRST AMENDMENT doctrine, especially in the areas of press shield laws, BRANZBURG V. HAYES (1972); LIBEL, HERBERT V. LANDO (1979); CHILD PORNOGRAPHY; and the PUBLIC FORUM doctrine. He wrote major opinions for the Court in LABOR, ANTITRUST, and FEDERAL JURISDICTION. He was one of the leading exponents, and protectors, of a broad reading of congressional power, particularly vis-à-vis claimed STATES' RIGHTS. From AVERY V. MIDLAND COUNTY (1968) to ROGERS V. LODGE (1982), he was one of the Court's resident experts on VOTING RIGHTS law. He also played a central role in the development of doctrinal exceptions to the EXCLUSIONARY RULE.

White will probably be remembered not for his opinions for the Court but for a number of DISSENTING OPIN-IONS, in which he took the majority to task—often in fierce terms—for its reasoning and for the practical consequences of its decision. From MIRANDA V. ARIZONA (1966) to ROE V. WADE (1973) to GERTZ V. WELCH (1974) to IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA (1983), White never hesitated to express his misgivings over the Court's craft or what he viewed as its audacity. "Judges have an exaggerated view of their role in our polity," he told a friend privately after a decade on the Court, and his sharply worded separate opinions drove home the point.

The credo manifested indelibly in two areas, SEPARATION OF POWERS and SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS. His first major statement on separation of powers was a separate opinion in BUCKLEY V. VALEO (1976), in which he was prepared to defer to Congress's judgment that limitations on both raising and spending money in federal elections were necessary notwithstanding concerns, embraced by the majority, that FREEDOM OF SPEECH protected spending decisions. He again voted to sustain Congress's device for handling the flood tide of federal litigation in NORTHERN PIPELINE CO. V. MARATHON PIPELINE CO. (1982). In Chadha, he dissented heatedly when the Court invalidated the LEGISLATIVE VETO in what he saw as both a wooden and unnecessary reading of the Constitution.

His written record on substantive due process was not fully developed or so widely respected. His dissent in Roe v. Wade was more a declaration of conviction than a sustained theoretical statement, and it was not until his dissent in MOORE V. CITY OF EAST CLEVELAND (1977) that he produced a fully expressed critique of the Court's revival of the old doctrine associated with LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905). His complaint was that the Court was using vague language in the Constitution to impose its own will on a divided polity—an exercise both illegitimate and, he eventually suggested, dangerous to the Court's own political capital. The issue was fundamental to White's view of his role, and so it is ironic that his final major opinion in the area is among his most widely and severely criticized. In BOWERS V. HARDWICK (1986), he wrote for a five-Justice majority rejecting a claim that consensual homosexual conduct in private between adults was protected by the DUE PROCESS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. To argue that the "claimed right" was "deeply rooted in this nation's history and tradition" or "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty"—the traditional formula used by the Court for upholding such a right—was, White wrote, "at best, facetious." The opinion seemed not to take the claim seriously and was condemned by many as an intellectual "hit-and-run incident." White was not uniformly hostile to claims labeled substantive due process: he joined the majority in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965), where he acknowledged constitutional protection for the "intimacies of the marriage relationship," and was committed—both before and after Bowers—to supporting the constitutional claims of natural parents to the "companionship . . . of their children." For White, well-established social norms enjoyed constitutional protection, but novel or controversial claims were beyond the constitutional pale.

Assessment of White's career which focused only on his views or his often difficult opinions tended to obscure the fact that he was one of the hardest working Justices on the Court during the period in which he served. He wrote 1,275 opinions—495 opinions for the Court, 249 concurring opinions, and 572 dissents. He sat during a period in which the Court grew more fractionated and participated in more 5–4 decisions than any other Justice in the Court's history except WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR. His tenure was also one of the longest in the institution's history: only nine others sat longer. In retirement, he continued to sit actively on federal courts of appeals and he also chaired a special commission charged with advising Congress on the structure of the federal Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

DENNIS J. HUTCHINSON
(2000)

Bibliography

HUTCHINSON, DENNIS J. 1998 The Man Who Once Was Whizzer White. New York: Free Press.

IDES, ALLAN 1993 The Jurisprudence of Byron White. Yale Law Journal 103:419–461.

LEE, REX and WILKINS, RICHARD G. 1994 On Greatness and Constitutional Vision: Justice Byron R. White. Brigham Young Law Review 1994:291–312.

WHITE, EDWARD D.
(1845–1921)

Born and raised in Louisiana, the son of a slaveholding sugar planter and a Confederate veteran, Edward Douglass White was an archetype of the "New South" political leader. The masters of the region's economic and social development from the 1880s until WORLD WAR I combined the interests of antebellum planters with those of northern and local capitalists eager to build railroads and tap the area's coal, iron, and timber. The South's new ruling class "redeemed" Dixie from the egalitarian schemes of Radical Republicans and carpetbaggers by supporting RUTHERFORD B. HAYES for President and accepting the national hegemony of the GOP's conservative wing. In return, these leaders of the "New South" received from the Republicans a promise to remove federal troops from the region, a free hand with respect to the Negro, and a junior partnership in the management of the nation's economic affairs. (See COMPROMISE OF 1877.)

While tending his family's plantation and building a prosperous legal practice in New Orleans, White became a chief political confidant and ally of Governor Francis Nicholls, the leader of the state's conservative Democrats, who rewarded him with an appointment to the Louisiana Supreme Court and then a seat in the United States SENATE in 1891. While in Washington, the portly, florid, long-haired junior senator from Louisiana adopted a rigid STATES' RIGHTS and laissez-faire posture on most issues. However, he fervently supported high duties on foreign sugar and lavish federal bounties to the planters in his home state. White led the Senate's successful revolt against President GROVER CLEVELAND's efforts to lower the protective tariff in 1893. Nevertheless, the beleaguered head of the Democratic party nominated him to the Supreme Court a year later, following the death of SAMUEL BLATCHFORD and the Senate's rejection of two earlier nominees.

White took his seat as the junior member of the FULLER COURT at one of the important turning points in the history of the federal judiciary. The country seethed with unrest generated by the worst depression of the nineteenth century. Violent confrontations between workers and employers erupted on the nation's major railroads as well as in coal mines, steel mills, and other factories. Debt-ridden farmers formed the radical Populist Party, which demanded government control of the money supply and banking system and nationalization of the major trunk rail lines. Insurgent Democrats nominated the youthful William Jennings Bryan, who ran on a platform promising inflation of the money supply, higher taxes on the wealthy, and a curb on trusts and other monopolies. In this atmosphere of class strife and regional polarization, men of property and standing looked to the Supreme Court to defend the constitutional ark against dangerous innovations. Fuller and most of his colleagues were equal to the task of repelling the radical hordes.

Even before the economic collapse, a majority of the Justices had served warning that they would not tolerate legislative attacks on corporate property and profits. Legislative power to fix railroad rates, they warned, was not without limits; corporations were PERSONS, entitled to the judicial protection of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT'S DUE PROCESS clause; and no rate imposed by legislative fiat could be deemed "reasonable" without final judicial review. Then, in a series of cases that reached the Court together during the depths of the depression in 1895, the Justices quashed federal efforts to prosecute the sugar trust under the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT in UNITED STATES V. E. C. KNIGHT CO. (1895); upheld the contempt conviction of the labor leader Eugene V. Debs for his role in the Pullman boycott in IN RE DEBS (1895); and declared unconstitutional the first federal income tax levied since the Civil War in POLLACK V. FARMER'S LOAN AND TRUST CO. (1895). These three decisions displayed the FULLER COURT's conservative colors and represented a major victory for big business, the wealthy, and the enemies of organized labor.

Like the majority of his brethren, Justice White showed no sympathy for Debs and the militant working class movement he represented. White also endorsed Fuller's reasoning in the sugar trust case, which limited the scope of the Sherman Act to monopolies of interstate trade or commerce and left to the individual states all authority to curb monopolies over production. But he joined Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, the outspoken champion of nationalism and federal power, in denouncing the majority's assault on the income tax statute. White had been a member of the Senate that passed the income tax measure as part of the tariff package in 1892, and, although he did not endorse the levy, neither did he doubt the constitutional power of Congress to adopt it. In order to invalidate the law, the majority had to ignore two weighty precedents, one dating from 1796. This was too much for White, who argued eloquently that "the conservation and orderly development of our institutions rests on our acceptance of the results of the past, and their use as lights to guide our steps in the future. Teach the lesson that settled principles may be overthrown at any time, and confusion and turmoil must ultimately result."

The income tax dissent revealed an important aspect of White's jurisprudence which remained constant during his years as an associate Justice and later as Chief Justice after 1911. Although deeply conservative and devoted to the judicial protection of private property, White was also a pragmatist capable of endorsing moderate reforms that had clear constitutional sanction and that served to cap the pressures for more radical change. Though not adverse to overturning a few precedents himself, White usually did so in the pursuit of policies that strengthened rather than weakened the dominant economic forces of corporate capitalism.

In this spirit, he endorsed the judicial imperialism inherent in Justice Harlan's opinion in SMYTH V. AMES (1898), which made the federal judiciary the final arbiter of utility rates, but he also enforced the progressive reforms of the Theodore Roosevelt-William Howard Taft era which revitalized the regulatory authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) over the nation's major railroads. In a series of decisions, culminating in White's opinion in INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION V. ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD CO. (1910), the majority sustained the ICC's fact-finding and rate-fixing powers as mandated by Congress. White's views were compatible with the interests of the railroads, which looked to the ICC to prevent financially ruinous rate wars, and with those of reformers like Roosevelt, who believed that such regulation would curb the appetite for government ownership of the carriers.

White rendered his greatest service to the conservative cause in the area of antitrust law by promoting the view that the Sherman Act prohibited only "unreasonable" restraints of trade, a perspective pregnant with possibilities for enlarged judicial control over the country's economic structure, yet wholly compatible with the desires of big business. But it took White over a decade to defeat the contrary views of other Justices, who remained more wedded to the old Jacksonian belief in competition and the dangers of monopoly.

In the wake of the E. C. Knight decision restricting federal antitrust efforts to INTERSTATE COMMERCE, the Department of Justice began a campaign to stamp out railroad cartels and pools designed to divide up traffic and fix rates. A majority of the Justices, led by Harlan and RUFUS W. PECKHAM, a passionate spokesman for laissez-faire economics, sustained the government's efforts in this area on the theory that the Sherman Act outlawed all restraints of trade, even those that might be deemed "reasonable" in view of particular business conditions such as rate wars and destructive competition. In the first of these cases, UNITED STATES V. TRANS-MISSOURI FREIGHT ASSOCIATION (1897), White wrote a long, rambling dissent which accused the majority of misreading the antitrust law, defying the traditions of the COMMON LAW with respect to restraints of trade, and jeopardizing the economic progress brought to the nation by business combinations and consolidations.

White continued to dissent in the Joint Traffic Association Case (1898) and in NORTHERN SECURITIES CO. V. UNITED STATES (1904), where a five-Justice majority upheld the government's suit against the Morgan-Harriman rail monopoly between Chicago and the Pacific Northwest. In each case, White argued that the antitrust law, incorporating the ancient doctrines of the common law, prohibiting only "unreasonable" restraints of trade. Technically, White was correct, but all of the methods condemned in Trans-Missouri, Joint Traffic Association, and Northern Securities would have been indictable at common law as well, because their fundamental objective had been to fix prices contrary to the public interest. This fact seems to have eluded White, who believed that the Harlan-Peckham approach threatened the demise of valuable business enterprises by virtue of judicial abdication to the prosecutorial zeal of misguided reformers in the executive branch. In this perception, he enjoyed the support of three other justices, including OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, who also looked upon the Rockefellers, Morgans, and Harrimans as agents of social and economic progress.

Four changes in the personnel of the Court between 1909 and 1911 gave White a new majority for his doctrine a year later when the government's suits against Standard Oil and American Tobacco finally reached the Justices after years of litigation. Speaking now as Chief Justice of the United States, having been appointed to the center chair by President Taft, White sustained the government's case against the monopolists but cast aside the Harlan-Peckham interpretation of the Sherman Act. Henceforth, the majority decreed, only "unreasonable" trade restraints would be indictable under the Sherman Act and the Justices on the Supreme Court would determine where the line should be drawn between legal and illegal competitive behavior. Harlan wrote a melancholy dissent against this sharp reversal of doctrine, which seemed to teach that "settled principles may be overthrown at any time, and confusion and turmoil must ultimately result."

White's RULE OF REASON doctrine provoked a storm of protest from progressives in the Congress, who denounced the Justices for mutilating the antitrust law, arrogating to themselves too much power over the economic system, and giving big business a hunting license to continue its predatory ways. Although Congress added the CLAYTON ACT amendments to the antitrust law in 1914, specifically outlawing a substantial list of business practices, White's rule of reason carried the day. The Court quashed the government's efforts to break up the shoe machinery monopoly in 1913 and also threw out the case against United States Steel in 1920, a year before White died. There was extraordinary historical irony in the fact that it was a Southerner and a veteran of the Rebel army who advanced antitrust doctrines that sealed the triumph of industrial capitalism and big business in American life.

For a Southerner, a Democrat, and a spokesman for states' rights in the Senate, White displayed considerable toleration for the expansion of federal economic controls by means of the COMMERCE CLAUSE and the TAXING AND SPENDING POWER. In the Senate he had taken an active role in fighting a federal law to regulate the trade in agricultural "futures," noting that it would invade the JURISDICTION of the states and create "the most unlimited and arbitrary government on the face of God's earth." As a Justice, however, he joined Harlan's path-breaking opinion in the Lottery Case, CHAMPION V. AMES (1903), which greatly expanded the NATIONAL POLICE POWER via the interstate commerce clause. A year later he wrote the Court's opinion in MCCRAY V. UNITED STATES (1904), which affirmed the power of Congress to impose a prohibitive levy upon oleomargarine and thus employ its tax powers for regulatory purposes.

White drew back, however, from the logical implications of the national police power when Congress sought to apply it to other areas of social and economic life. He was willing to permit the extension of the commerce power to federal regulation of adulterated foods and interstate traffic in prostitution, but he joined Justice WILLIAM R. DAY's opinion in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918), which declared unconstitutional Congress's attempt to eradicate child labor. He also rejected federal efforts to tax and regulate narcotics traffic in UNITED STATES V. DOREMUS (1919), although the majority found this use of the federal taxing power compatible with White's own views in McCray. He sanctioned Congress's adoption of an eight-hour day for interstate train crews which brought an end to the disastrous nationwide rail strike, but he joined three other dissenters in Block v. Hirsh (1921) when Holmes and the majority upheld the national legislature's power to impose rent controls upon property in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA during the emergency of World War I.

White displayed equal inconsistency in cases where state ECONOMIC REGULATIONS came under DUE PROCESS challenge. The one thread of coherence seemed to be his growing conservatism and abiding dislike for organized labor. He dissented in LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) along with Harlan and Day, noting that "no evils arising from such legislation could be more far-reaching than those that might come to our system of government if the judiciary . . . should enter the domain of legislation, and upon grounds merely of justice or reason or wisdom, annul statutes that had received the sanction of the people's representatives." He also voted to sustain the Oregon and California maximum hours laws for women in MULLER V. OREGON (1908) and Miller v. Wilson (1915). But he balked at the overtime pay provisions and general maximum hours limitation in BUNTING V. OREGON (1917) and sided with the majority in the three leading cases of the period which protected employers' use of YELLOW DOG CONTRACTS against both state and federal efforts to eliminate this notorious antiunion device: Adair v. United States (1908), COPPAGE V. KANSAS (1915), and HITCHMAN V. HITCHMAN COAL & COKE CO. (1917).

In 1919, White joined JOSEPH MCKENNA, WILLIS VAN DEVANTER, and JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS in dissent against the Court's opinion in the Arizona Employers' Liability Cases (1919), which upheld that state's law shifting the cost of industrial accidents to employers. And during his final term on the Court, he joined the majority in scuttling the anti-INJUNCTION provisions of the Clayton Antitrust Act and affirming the illegality of secondary boycotts. If not the most reactionary member of the Supreme Court with respect to organized labor, White certainly ran a close race for that honor with Justices Day, MAHLON PITNEY, and McReynolds.

White had been elevated to the chief justiceship by William Howard Taft, who coveted the position for himself and feared that a younger nominee might forever prevent that happy development. Taft realized his lifelong ambition in 1921, when White died. Predictably, White's eulogizers compared his career to that of John Marshall and other immortals of the bench, but a more accurate assessment is that constitutional law showed his imprint until 1937.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

Bibliography

DISHMAN, ROBERT 1951 Mr. Justice White and the Rule of Reason. The Review of Politics 13:229–248.

HIGHSAW, ROBERT B. 1981 Edward Douglass White: Defender of the Conservative Faith. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

KLINKHAMER, MARIE CAROLYN 1943 Edward Douglass White, Chief Justice of the United States. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University Press.

SEMONCHE, JOHN E. 1978 Charting the Future: The Supreme Court Responds to a Changing Society, 1890–1920. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

WHITE, UNITED STATES v.
401 U.S. 745 (1971)

During the reign of OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1927) the Supreme Court consistently ruled, in cases including ON LEE V. UNITED STATES (1952) and LOPEZ V. UNITED STATES (1963), that government informers who deceptively interrogated criminal suspects and either secretly transmitted the conversations to eavesdropping government agents with concealed recorders or secretly recorded the conversations, had committed no TRESPASS, and therefore the FOURTH AMENDMENT was inapplicable. The use of spies without complying with Fourth Amend ment controls was reaffirmed in HOFFA V. UNITED STATES (1966). KATZ V. UNITED STATES (1967), however, abolished the trespass requirement for Fourth Amendment protection and focused on the personal PRIVACY interests that were entitled to protection. Some therefore thought On Lee was no longer good law. In United States v. White, however, the Court held otherwise. Though there was no clear majority for either approving or disapproving On Lee, four Justices voted to reaffirm that decision, and Justice HUGO L. BLACK concurred to make a majority on the ground that Olmstead's trespass requirement should be retained. The On Lee doctrine was thus reaffirmed.

Justice BYRON R. WHITE, for the plurality, ruled that a person is not protected by the Fourth Amendment against a faithless friend, regardless of whether a trespass is involved. An expectation of such protection is not "justifiable" under the Katz standard. Police have always been allowed to use the evidence of faithless associates who turn to the police or are informers: "one contemplating illegal activities must realize and risk that his companions may be reporting to the police." The fact that the faithless friend was wired, transmitting the conversation to others or recording it for later replaying, makes no constitutional difference.

The dissents focused on the latter point. Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN rejected the "assumption of risk" rationale of the majority, stressing that the real question was which risks the law should force people to assume. Whereas the use of unwired spies or contemporaneous recording to ensure reliability are both justifiable, simultaneous overhearing by third parties is different; free discourse would be seriously jeopardized if people were forced to assume the risk that their words were being simultaneously transmitted to third parties and transcribed. "Were third-party bugging a prevalent practice, it might well smother that spontaneity—reflected in frivolous, impetuous, sacrilegious, and defiant discourse—that liberates daily life." Justice Harlan emphasized that the dissenters' views would not prohibit the use of wired informers but would only bring the practice under Fourth Amendment warrant and other procedures.

Even though the principal White opinion did not command a majority, it kept On Lee in effect and freed the government from Fourth Amendment restrictions on the use of spies and informers, wired or otherwise.

HERMAN SCHWARTZ
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Electronic Eavesdropping.)

WHITE COURT
(1910–1921)

"The condition of the Supreme Court is pitiable, and yet those old fools hold on with a tenacity that is most discouraging," President WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT wrote in May 1909 to his old friend HORACE H. LURTON. Taft would have his day. One year later, Chief Justice MELVILLE W. FULLER spoke at the Court's memorial service for Justice DAVID J. BREWER: "As our brother Brewer joins the great procession, there pass before me the forms of Mathews and Miller, of Field and Bradley and Lamar and Blatchford, of Jackson and Gray and of Peckham, whose works follow them now that they rest from their labors." These were virtually Fuller's last words from the bench, for he died on Independence Day, 1910, in his native Maine. RUFUS W. PECKHAM had died less than a year earlier. WILLIAM H. MOODY, tragically and prematurely ill, would within a few months have to cut short by retirement one of the few notable short tenures on the Court. JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN had but one year left in his remarkable thirty-four-year tenure. By 1912, five new Justices had come to the Court who were not there in 1909: a new majority under a new Chief Justice.

The year 1910 was a significant divide in the history of the country as well. The population was nearly half urban, and immigration was large and growing. The country stood on the verge of enacting humane and extensive labor regulation. A year of Republican unrest in Congress and THEODORE ROOSEVELT's decisive turn to progressive agitation, 1910 was the first time in eight elections that the Democrats took control of the House. In the same year, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was founded. It was a year of progressive tremors that would eventually shake the Supreme Court to its foundations with the appointment of LOUIS D. BRANDEIS in 1916. But the five appointments with which President Taft rehabilitated his beloved Court between 1909 and 1912 had no such dramatic impact. There was a significant strengthening of a mild progressive tendency earlier evident within the Court, but the new appointments brought neither a hardening nor a decisive break with the DOCTRINES of laissez-faire constitutionalism and luxuriant individualism embodied in such decisions as LOCHNER V. NEW YORK (1905) and Adair v. United States (1908). Taft's aim was to strengthen the Court with active men of sound, if somewhat progressive, conservative principles. Neither Taft nor the nation saw the Court, as both increasingly would a decade later, as the storm center of pressures for fundamental constitutional change.

Taft's first choice when Peckham died in 1909 was his friend Lurton, then on the Sixth Circuit, and a former member of the Tennessee Supreme Court. Lurton, a Democrat, had been a fiery secessionist in his youth, and in his short and uneventful four-year tenure he combined conservationism on economic regulation, race, and labor relations. Taft's second choice was not so modest. When Taft went to Governor CHARLES EVANS HUGHES of New York to replace Brewer, he brought to the Court for the first of his two tenures a Justice who would emerge as one of the greatest figures in the history of American law, and a principal architect of modern CIVIL LIBERTIES and CIVIL RIGHTS jurisprudence. As governor of New York, Hughes was already one of the formidable reform figures of the Progressive era, and his later career as a presidential candidate who came within a whisper of success in 1916, secretary of state during the 1920s, and Chief Justice during the tumultuous years of the New Deal, mark him as one of the most versatile and important public figures to sit on the Court since JOHN MARSHALL.

Taft's choice of the Chief Justice to fill the center seat left vacant by Fuller was something of a surprise, although reasons are obvious in retrospect. EDWARD D. WHITE was a Confederate veteran from Louisiana, who had played a central role in the Democratic reaction against Reconstruction in that state and had emerged as a Democratic senator in 1891. He had been appointed Associate Justice in 1894 by President GROVER CLEVELAND and had compiled a respectable but unobtrusive record in sixteen years in the side seat. He had dissented with able force from the self-inflicted wound of POLLOCK V. FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST CO. (1895), holding unconstitutional the federal income tax, and his antitrust dissents in TRANS-MISSOURI FREIGHT ASSOCIATION (1897) and UNITED STATES V. NORTHERN SECURITIES COMPANY (1904) embodied sound good sense. He had done "pioneer work," as Taft later called it, in ADMINISTRATIVE LAW. White had a genius for friendship and, despite a habit of constant worrying, extraordinary personal warmth. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES summed him up in these words in 1910: "His writing leaves much to be desired, but his thinking is profound, especially in the legislative direction which we don't recognize as a judicial requirement but which is so, especially in our Court, nevertheless." White was sixty-five, a Democrat, a Confederate veteran, and a Roman Catholic, and his selection by Taft was seen as adventurous. But given Taft's desire to bind up sectional wounds, to spread his political advantage, to put someone in the center seat who might not occupy Taft's own ultimate ambition for too long, to exemplify bipartisanship in the choice of Chief Justice, and on its own sturdy merits, the selection of White seems easy to understand.

Along with White's nomination, Taft sent to the Senate nominations of WILLIS VAN DEVANTER of Wyoming and JOSEPH R. LAMAR of Georgia. Van Devanter would sit for twenty-seven years, and would become one of the Court's most able, if increasingly conservative, legal craftsmen. Lamar would last only five years, and his death in 1915, along with Lurton's death in 1914 and Hughes's resignation to run for President, opened up the second important cycle of appointments to the White Court.

The Taft appointees joined two of the most remarkable characters ever to sit on the Supreme Court. John Marshall Harlan, then seventy-eight, had been on the Court since his appointment by President RUTHERFORD B. HAYES in 1877. He was a Justice of passionate strength and certitude, a man who, in the fond words of Justice Brewer, "goes to bed every night with one hand on the Constitution and the other on the Bible, and so sleeps the sleep of justice and righteousness." He had issued an apocalyptic dissent in Pollock, the income tax case, and his dissent in PLESSY V. FERGUSON (1986), the notorious decision upholding racial SEGREGATION on railroads, was an appeal to the conscience of the Constitution without equal in our history. The other, even more awesome, giant on the Court in 1910 was Holmes, then seventy, but still not quite recognized as the jurist whom BENJAMIN N. CARDOZO would later call "probably the greatest legal intellect in the history of the English-speaking judiciary." The other two members of the Court were JOSEPH MCKENNA, appointed by President WILLIAM MCKINLEY in 1898, and WILLIAM R. DAY, appointed by President Theodore Roosevelt in 1903.

The Supreme Court in 1910 remained in "truly republican simplicity," as Dean Acheson would recall, in the old Senate chamber, where the Justices operated in the midst of popular government, and in the sight of visitors to the Capitol. No office space was available, and the Justices worked in their homes. Their staff allowance provided for a messenger and one clerk, and their salaries were raised in 1911 to $14,500 for the Associate Justices and $15,000 for the Chief Justice. The Court was badly overworked and the docket was falling further and further behind, not to be rescued until the JUDICIARY ACT OF 1925 gave the Court discretion to choose the cases it would review.

In the public's contemporaneous view, if not in retrospect, the most important cases before the White Court between 1910 and 1921 did not involve the Constitution at all, but rather the impact of the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT on the great trusts. UNITED STATES V. STANDARD OIL COMPANY (1911) and American Tobacco Company v. United States (1911) had been initiated by the Roosevelt administration to seek dissolution of the huge combinations, and when the cases were argued together before the Supreme Court in 1911, the Harvard Law Review thought public attention was concentrated on the Supreme Court "to a greater extent than ever before in its history."

The problem for the Court was to determine the meaning of restraint of trade amounting to monopoly. The answer offered by Chief Justice White for the Court was the famous RULE OF REASON, under which not all restraints of trade restrictive of competition were deemed to violate the Sherman Act, but rather only those "undue restraints" which suggested an "intent to do wrong to the general public . . . thus restraining the free flow of commerce and tending to bring about the evils, such as enhancement of riches, which were considered to be against public policy." Under this test, the Court deemed Standard Oil to have engaged in practices designed to dominate the oil industry, exclude others from trade, and create a monopoly. It was ordered to divest itself of its subsidiaries, and to make no agreements with them that would unreasonably restrain trade. The court ruled that the American Tobacco Company was also an illegal combination and forced it into dissolution.

Antitrust was perhaps the dominant political issue of the 1912 presidential campaign, and the rule of reason helped to fuel a heated political debate that produced the great CLAYTON ACT and FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT of 1914. Further great antitrust cases came to the White Court, notably United States v. United States Steel Company, begun in 1911, postponed during the crisis of WORLD WAR I, and eventually decided in 1920. A divided Court held that United States Steel had not violated the Sherman Act, mere size alone not constituting an offense.

The tremendous public interest generated by the antitrust cases before the White Court was a sign of the temper of the political times, in which the regulation of business and labor relations was the chief focus of progressive attention. In this arena of constitutional litigation, the White Court's record was mixed, with perhaps a slight progressive tinge. On the great questions of legislative power to regulate business practices and working arrangements, the White Court maintained two parallel but opposing lines of doctrines, the one protective of laissez-faire constitutionalism and freedom from national regulation, the other receptive to the progressive reforms of the day.

In the first four years after its reconstitution by Taft, the Supreme Court handed down a number of important decisions upholding national power to regulate commerce for a variety of ends. The most expansive involved federal power to regulate railroads—and to override competing state regulation when necessary. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad v. Riverside Mills (1911) upheld Congress's amendment of the HEPBURN ACT imposing on the initial carrier of goods liability for any loss occasioned by a connecting carrier, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the bill of lading. FREEDOM OF CONTRACT gave way to the needs of shippers for easy and prompt recovery. More significantly, in the second of the EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY CASES (1912), the Court upheld congressional legislation imposing liability for any injury negligently caused to any employee of a carrier engaged in INTERSTATE COMMERCE. This legislation did away with the fellow-servant rule and the defense of contributory negligence, again notwithstanding contracts to the contrary. In 1914, in the famous Shreveport Case (Houston, East & West Texas Railway Company v. United States), the Court upheld the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to set the rates of railroad hauls entirely within Texas, because those rates competed against traffic between Texas and Louisiana. The Court overrode the rates set by the Texas Railroad Commission in the process. And in the most important COMMERCE CLAUSE decision of the early years of the White Court, the MINNESOTA RATE CASES (1913), the Court upheld the power of the states to regulate railroad rates for intrastate hauls, even when that regulation would force down interstate rates, so long as there had been no federal regulation of those rates. Thus, state power over rates was not invalidated because of the possibility of prospective federal regulation, and a large loophole between state and federal power was closed.

Outside the area of carrier regulation, the White Court was also friendly to national regulation by expanding the NATIONAL POLICE POWER doctrine. HIPOLITE EGG CO. V. UNITED STATES (1911) upheld the PURE FOOD AND DRUG ACT of 1906 in regulating adulterated food and drugs shipped in interstate commerce, whether or not the material had come to rest in the states. "Illicit articles" that traveled in interstate commerce were subject to federal control, the Court said, although with a doctrinal vagueness and confusion that would come back to haunt the Court in HAMMER V. DAGENHART (1918). In HOKE V. UNITED STATES (1913) the Court upheld the MANN ACT, which punished the transportation in interstate commerce of women "for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for any other immoral purpose."

Taft got his opportunity for a sixth appointment—more appointments in one term than any President in our history since GEORGE WASHINGTON—when Harlan died in 1911. He filled the vacancy with MAHLON PITNEY, chancellor of New Jersey. The reasons for this appointment are obscure, but like other Taft appointments Pitney was a sound, middle-of-the-road, good lawyer with little flair or imagination. As if to prepare for the coming flap over Brandeis, the Pitney appointment ran into trouble because of the nominee's alleged antilabor positions. But Pitney prevailed, and he would serve on the Court until 1922.

If ever in the history of the Supreme Court successive appointments by one President have seemed to embrace dialectical opposites, WOODROW WILSON's appointments of JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS in 1914 and Louis D. Brandeis in 1916 are the ones. McReynolds would become an embittered and crude anti-Semite; Brandeis was the first Jew to sit on the Supreme Court. McReynolds would become the most rigid and doctrinaire apostle of laissez-faire conservatism in constitutional history, the most recalcitrant of the "Four Horsemen of Reaction" who helped to scuttle New Deal legislation in the early 1930s. Brandeis was the greatest progressive of his day, on or off the Court. McReynolds was an almost invariable foe of CIVIL LIBERTIES and CIVIL RIGHTS for black people; Brandeis was perhaps the driving force of his time for the development of civil liberties, especially freedom of expression and rights of personal privacy. What brought these opposites together in Wilson's esteem, although he came to regret the McReynolds appointment, was antitrust fervor. McReynolds's aggressive individualism and Brandeis's progressive concern for personal dignity and industrial democracy coalesced around antitrust law, and this was the litmus test of the day for Wilson. Thus, possibly the most difficult and divisive person ever to sit on the Supreme Court and possibly the most intellectually gifted and broadly influential Justice in the Court's history took their seats in spurious, rather Wilsonian, juxtaposition.

Wilson's third appointment was handed him by the resignation of his rival in the presidential election of 1916. As it became plain that Hughes was the only person who could unite the Republican party, he came under increasing pressure from Taft and others to make himself available. He did. Wilson nominated JOHN H. CLARK of Ohio to replace Hughes. One of the most pregnant speculations about the history of the Supreme Court is what might have happened had Hughes remained on the bench. He might well have become a Chief Justice in 1921 instead of Taft, and under his statesmanlike influence, the hardening of doctrine that led to the confrontation over the New Deal and the Court-packing plan might not have happened.

Although two of Wilson's three appointments were staunch progressives, the Supreme Court seemed to adopt a somewhat conservative stance as it moved toward the decade of erratic resistance to reform that would follow in the 1920s. Federal reform legislation generally continued to pass muster, but there was the staggering exception of the Child Labor Case in 1918. And the Court seemed to strike out at labor unions, in both constitutional and antitrust decisions.

In Hammer v. Dagenhart (1918) the Supreme Court stunned Congress and most of the country when it invalidated the first federal CHILD LABOR ACT. The extent of child labor in the United States during the Progressive era was an affront to humanitarian sensibilities. One child out of six between the ages of ten and fifteen was a wage earner. Prohibition and regulation of child labor became the central reform initiatives of the progressive impulse. In 1916, overcoming constitutional doubts, Wilson signed the KEATING-OWEN ACT, which forbade the shipment in interstate or foreign commerce of the products of mines where children sixteen and under had been employed, or of factories where children younger than fourteen worked, or where children fourteen to sixteen had worked more than eight hours a day, six days a week. Child labor was not directly forbidden, but was severely discouraged by closing the channels of interstate commerce.

A narrow majority of the Court, in an opinion by Justice Day, held that this law exceeded the federal commerce power. Day reasoned that the goods produced by child labor were in themselves harmless, and that the interstate transportation did not in itself accomplish any harm. This reasoning was entirely question-begging, because it was the possibility of interstate commerce that imposed a competitive disadvantage in states that outlawed child labor in comparison with less humanitarian states. Moreover, the reasoning was flatly inconsistent with the opinion in Hipolite Egg and Hoke. But the majority plainly regarded the federal child labor legislation as an invasion of the domestic preserves of the states. Holmes, joined by McKenna, Brandeis, and Clarke, issued a classic dissent.

With the preparations for an advent of American involvement in World War I, the Supreme Court recognized broad federal power to put the economy on a wartime footing. The burden of constitutional resistance to reform legislation shifted to cases involving state laws. Here the main hardening in doctrinal terms came in cases involving labor unions. Otherwise, a reasonable progressivism prevailed. Thus, in BUNTING V. OREGON (1917) the Court upheld the maximum ten-hour day for all workers in mills and factories, whether men or women. However, two minimum wage cases from Oregon were upheld only by the fortuity of an equally divided Supreme Court, Brandeis having recused himself.

The most chilling warning to progressives that laissez-faire constitutionalism was not dead came in COPPAGE V. KANSAS (1915). The issue was the power of a state to prohibit by legislation the so-called YELLOW DOG CONTRACT, under which workers had to promise their employers not to join a union. The Court in Coppage held such laws unconstitutional: to limit an employer's freedom to offer employment on its own terms was a violation of freedom of contract.

The Supreme Court's race relations decisions between 1910 and 1921 constitute one of the Progressive era's most notable, and in some ways surprising, constitutional developments. Each of the Civil War amendments was given unprecedented application. For the first time, in the Grandfather Clause Cases (1915), the Supreme Court applied the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT and what was left of the federal civil rights statutes to strike down state laws calculated to deny blacks the right to vote. For the first time, in BAILEY V. ALABAMA (1911) and UNITED STATES V. REYNOLDS (1914), the Court used the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT to strike down state laws that supported PEONAGE by treating breach of labor contracts as criminal fraud and by encouraging indigent defendants to avoid the chain gang by having employers pay their fines in return for commitments to involuntary servitude. For the first time, in BUCHANAN V. WARLEY (1917), it found in the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT constitutional limits on the spread of laws requiring racial separation in residential areas of cities and towns, and also for the first time, in McCabe v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway (1914), it put some teeth in the equality side of the SEPARATE BUT EQUAL DOCTRINE by striking down an Oklahoma law that said that railroads need not provide luxury car accommodations for blacks on account of low demand.

To be sure, only with respect to peonage could the White Court be said to have dismantled the legal structure of racism in any fundamental way. After the White Court passed into history in 1921, blacks in the South remained segregated and stigmatized by Jim Crow laws, disfranchised by invidiously administered LITERACY TESTS, white PRIMARY ELECTIONS, and POLL TAXES; and victimized by a criminal process from whose juries and other positions of power they were wholly excluded. But if the White Court did not stem the newly aggressive and self-confident ideology of racism inundating America in the Progressive era, neither did it put its power and prestige behind the flood, as had the WAITE COURT and FULLER COURT that preceded it—and, at critical points, it resisted. The White Court's principled countercurrents were more symbols of hope than effective bulwarks against the racial prejudice that permeated American law. But the decisions taken together mark the first time in American history that the Supreme Court opened itself in more than a passing way to the promises of the Civil War amendments.

World War I generated the first set of cases that provoked the Supreme Court for the first time since the FIRST AMENDMENT was ratified in 1791 to consider the meaning of freedom of expression. The cases, not surprisingly, involved dissent and agitation against the war policies of the United States. The war set off a major period of political repression against critics of American policy.

In the first three cases, SCHENCK V. UNITED STATES, FROHWERK V. UNITED STATES, and IN RE DEBS (1919), following the lead of Justice Holmes, the Supreme Court looked not to the law of SEDITIOUS LIBEL for justification in punishing speech but rather to traditional principles of legal responsibility for attempted crimes. In English and American COMMON LAW, an unsuccessful attempt to commit a crime could be punished if the attempt came dangerously close to success, while preparations for crime—in themselves harmless—could not be punished. With his gift of great utterance, Holmes distilled these doctrinal nuances into the rule that expression could be punished only if it created a CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER of bringing about illegal action, such as draft resistance or curtailment of weapons production. Given his corrosive skepticism and his Darwinian sense of flux, the clear and present danger rule later became in Holmes's hands a fair protection for expression. But in the hands of judges and juries more passionate or anxious, measuring protection for expression by the likelihood of illegal action proved evanescent and unpredictable.

There were other problems with the clear and present danger rule. It took no account of the value of a particular expression, but considered only its tendency to cause harmful acts. Because the test was circumstantial, legislative declarations that certain types of speech were dangerous put the courts in the awkward position of having to second-guess the legislature's factual assessments of risk in order to protect the expression. This problem became clear to Holmes in ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919), in which a statute punishing speech that urged curtailment of war production was used to impose draconian sanctions on a group of radical Russian immigrants who had inveighed against manufacture of war material that was to be used in Russia. In this case, Holmes and Brandeis joined in one of the greatest statements of political tolerance ever uttered.

In 1921, the year Edward Douglass White died and Taft became Chief Justice, Benjamin Cardozo delivered his immortal lectures, "The Nature of the Judicial Process." Cardozo pleaded for judges to "search for light among the social elements of every kind that are the living forces behind the facts they deal with." The judge must be "the interpreter for the community of its sense of law and order . . . and harmonize results with justice through a method of free decision." Turning to the Supreme Court, Cardozo stated: "Above all in the field of constitutional law, the method of free decision has become, I think, the dominant one today."

In this view, we can see that Cardozo was too hopeful, although his statement may have been offered more as an admonition than a description. The method of "free decision," exemplified for Cardozo by the opinions of Holmes and Brandeis, remained in doubt notwithstanding the inconsistent progressivism of the White Court, and would become increasingly embattled in the decades to come.

BENNO C. SCMIDT, JR.
(1986)

Bibliography

BICKEL, ALEXANDER M. and SCHMIDT, BENNO C., JR. 1984 The Judiciary and Responsible Government 1910–1921. Vol. IX of the Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court. New York: Macmillan.

CARDOZO, BENJAMIN N. 1921 The Nature of the Judicial Process. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

CHAFEE, ZECHARIA 1949 Free Speech in the United States. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

HIGHSAW, ROBERT B. 1981 Edward Douglass White. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

SEMONCHE, JOHN E. 1978 Charting the Future: The Supreme Court Responds to a Changing Society 1890–1920. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

SWINDLER, WILLIAM F. 1969 Court and Constitution in the 20th Century: The Old Legality 1889–1932. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

WHITE PRIMARIES

See: Grovey v. Townsend; Nixon v. Condon; Nixon v. Herndon; Primary Election; Smith v. Allwright; Terry v. Adams

WHITING, WILLIAM

See: Commentators on the Constitution

WHITNEY v. CALIFORNIA
274 U.S. 357 (1927)

SCHENCK V. UNITED STATES (1919), ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919), GITLOW V. NEW YORK (1925), and Whitney are the four leading FREEDOM OF SPEECH cases of the 1920s in which the CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER rule was announced but then rejected by the majority in favor of the BAD TENDENCY test announced in Gitlow. In Whitney, Justice EDWARD SANFORD repeated his Gitlow argument that a state law does not violate FIRST AMENDMENT rights by employing the "bad tendency" test as the standard of reasonableness in speech cases. The state may reasonably proscribe "utterances . . . tending to . . . endanger the foundations of organized government." Here Justice Sanford added that "united and joint action involves even greater danger to the public peace and security than the isolated utterances . . . of individuals." Miss Whitney had been convicted of organizing and becoming a member of an organization that advocated and taught CRIMINAL SYNDICALISM in violation of the California Criminal Syndicalism Act of 1919. The Court upheld the act's constitutionality.

After Schenck, the clear and present danger position had been reiterated in dissenting opinions by OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and LOUIS D. BRANDEIS in Abrams and Gitlow. Brandeis, joined by Holmes, concurred in Whitney. Brandeis's reason for concurring rather than dissenting was that Whitney had not properly argued to the California courts that their failure to invoke the danger test was error, and that the Supreme Court might not correct errors by state courts unless those errors were properly raised below.

Brandeis's concurrence was a forceful reiteration of the value to a democracy of freedom of speech for even the most dissident speakers. The framers knew that "fear breeds repression; that repression breeds hate; that hate menaces stable government; that the path of safety lies in the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances . . . and that the fitting remedy for evil counsels is good ones." Brandeis reemphasized the imminence requirement of the danger rule. "To courageous, self-reliant men, with confidence in the power of free and fearless reasoning applied through the processes of popular government, no danger flowing from speech can be deemed clear and present, unless the incidence of the evil apprehended is so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for full discussion. If there be time . . . to avert the evil by the process of education, the remedy to be applied is more speech, not enforced silence."

Whitney is often cited for an addition by Brandeis to the original clear and present danger formula. The evil anticipated must be not only substantive but also serious. "The fact that speech is likely to result in some violence or in destruction of property is not enough to justify its suppression. There must be the probability of serious injury to the state. . . ."

The Court overruled Whitney in BRANDENBURG V. OHIO (1969).

MARTIN SHAPIRO
(1986)

WHITTAKER, CHARLES
(1901–1973)

A considerable number of Justices who served on the United States Supreme Court resembled T. S. Eliot's famous Mr. Prufrock: "an attendant lord, one that will do [to swell a progress, start a scene or two. . . .] Deferential, glad to be of use, [Politic, cautious, and meticulous;] Full of high sentence, but a bit obtuse. . . ." Charles Whittaker, a self-made man from Kansas, appointed to the Court by President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, was one of these.

Whittaker joined the WARREN COURT in 1957, after earlier service on the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals. His tenure was distinguished only by its brevity and by his own inability to develop a coherent judicial philosophy apart from the orthodox political and social conservatism of the Republican Middle West. His retirement and that of Justice FELIX FRANKFURTER in 1962 marked the beginning of the Warren Court's most liberal and activist phase.

Several DEPORTATION and coerced confession cases best exemplified Whittaker's ad hoc approach to constitutional issues and the confusion that often plagued his opinions. Writing for a majority of six Justices in Bonetti v. Roger (1958), he overturned the federal government's attempt to deport an ALIEN who had entered the country in 1923, joined the Communist party for a brief period during the 1930s, left the country to fight in the Spanish Civil War, and finally returned to the United States without rejoining the party. Earlier, Whittaker had voted to sustain the deportation of another alien who had resided continuously in the United States for forty years and whose only offense did not constitute a crime when he committed it (Lehmann v. Carson). Two years after Bonetti, he voted to uphold the termination of Social Security benefits to aliens deported for their membership in the Communist party during the Great Depression in Fleming v. Nestor (1960).

Whittaker displayed little more consistency in the coerced confession cases. In Moore v. Michigan (1957), he voted to reverse the murder conviction of a black teenager with a seventh-grade education and a history of head injuries, who had confessed to the crime without the benefit of a lawyer. During the next term, however, he voted, in Thomas v. Arizona (1958), to sustain the murder conviction of a black man in Arizona, who had confessed after a twenty-hour interrogation which included the placing of a rope around his neck by a member of the sheriff's posse.

Sometimes, Whittaker joined the Warren Court's liberal bloc, as in TROP V. DULLES (1958), where five Justices declared unconstitutional a provision of the Nationality Act of 1940 depriving wartime deserters of their CITIZENSHIP. He also joined the liberals in Perez v. Brownell (1958) when they dissented against the EXPATRIATION of American citizens who voted in foreign elections. (See TROP V. DULLES, 1958.) Whittaker also wrote the opinion in Staub v. Baxley (1958), invalidating a city ordinance that required union organizers to secure a permit before soliciting new members.

More frequently, however, Whittaker cast his vote with the Court's conservative bloc led by Justices John Marshall Harlan, Tom C. Clark, and FELIX FRANKFURTER. In Beilan v. Board of Education (1958) he helped to sanction the firing of public school teachers who refused to answer questions about their possible affiliation with the Communist party. He approved the contempt conviction of a college professor who refused to cooperate with a state legislative committee investigating subversive groups in UPHAUS V. WYMAN (1959). He likewise voted to compel the registration of the Communist party under the Subversive Activities Control Act and to allow bar examiners in California to deny admission to a candidate who refused to answer their inquiries about his past membership in the party. (See COMMUNIST PARTY V. SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD, 1961; KONIGSBERG V. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA, 1961.)

During his final term on the Court, Whittaker continued to affirm his conservative leanings by dissenting in MAPP V. OHIO (1961). He also joined in the Court's dismissal on jurisdictional grounds of an attack on Connecticut's anti-birth control statute in Poe v. Ullman (1961). After retiring from the bench, he became a legal adviser to the General Motors Corporation as well as a shrill critic of the CIVIL RIGHTS and anti-VIETNAM WAR protest movements.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

Bibliography

BERMAN, D. M. 1959 Mr. Justice Whittaker: A Preliminary Appraisal. Missouri Law Review 24:1–28.

FRIEDMAN, LEON 1969 Charles Whittaker. Pages 2893–2904 in Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., The Justices of the United States Supreme Court, 1789–1969: Their Lives and Major Opinions. New York: Chelsea House.

WICKARD v. FILBURN
317 U.S. 111 (1942)

In 1941, by an amendment to the AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT of 1938, Congress brought the national power to regulate the economy to a new extreme, yet the Supreme Court unanimously sustained the regulation in a far-reaching expansion of the commerce power. The price of wheat, despite marketing controls, had fallen. A bushel on the world market in 1941 sold for only forty cents as a result of a worldwide glut, and the wheat in American storage bins had reached record levels. To enable American growers to benefit from government fixed prices of $1.16 per bushel, Congress authorized the secretary of agriculture to fix production quotas for all wheat, even that consumed by individual growers. Filburn sowed twenty-three acres of wheat, despite his quota of only eleven, and produced an excess of 239 bushels for which the government imposed a penalty of forty-nine cents a bushel. Filburn challenged the constitutionality of the statute, arguing that it regulated production and consumption, both local in character; their effects upon INTERSTATE COMMERCE, he maintained, were "indirect."

Justice ROBERT H. JACKSON for the Court wrote that the question would scarcely merit consideration, given UNITED STATES V. DARBY (1941), "except for the fact that this Act extends federal regulation to production not intended in any part for commerce but wholly for consumption on the farm." The Court had never before decided whether such activities could be regulated "where no part of the product is intended for interstate commerce intermingled with the subjects thereof." Taking its law on the scope of the commerce power from GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) and the SHREVEPORT DOCTRINE, the Court repudiated the use of mechanical legal formulas that ignored the reality of a national economic market; no longer would the reach of the COMMERCE CLAUSE be limited by a finding that the regulated activity was "production" or its economic effects were "indirect." The rule laid down by Jackson, which still controls, is that even if an activity is local and not regarded as commerce, "it may still, whatever its nature, be reached by Congress if it exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce, and this irrespective of whether such effect is what might at some earlier time have been defined as 'direct' or 'indirect.'" (See EFFECTS ON COMMERCE.)

How could the wheat grown by Filburn, which he fed to his own animals, used for his own food, and kept for next year's seed, be regarded as having a "substantial economic effect" on interstate commerce? Wheat consumed on the farm by its growers, the government had proved, amounted to over twenty percent of national production. Filburn consumed a "trivial" amount, but if he had not produced what he needed for his own use in excess of his allotted quota, he would have had to buy it. By not buying wheat, such producer-consumers depressed the price by cutting the demand. His own contribution to the demand for wheat was trivial, but "when taken with that of others similarly situated," it was significant. Congress had authorized quotas to increase the price of the commodity; wheat consumed on the farm where grown could burden a legitimate congressional purpose to stimulate demand and force up the price. Thus, even if a single bushel of Filburn's infinitesimal production never left his farm, Congress could reach and regulate his activity, because all the Filburns, taken collectively, substantially affected commerce.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

STERN, ROBERT L. 1946 The Commerce Clause and the National Economy, 1933–1946. Harvard Law Review 59:901–909.

WICKERSHAM, GEORGE
(1858–1936)

Appointed attorney general in 1909 by WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, George Wickersham argued and won STANDARD OIL COMPANY V. UNITED STATES (1911) and American Tobacco Company v. United States (1911). He initiated more prosecutions under the SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT in four years than his predecessor had in seven, prompting business leaders to call for his resignation. As chairman of the Wickersham Committee from 1929 to 1931, he directed an investigation of the entire system of federal jurisprudence. The commission reported on problems raised by political penetrations of courts, lax criminal law enforcement, abuses of constitutional rights, and various sociological influences contributing to crime.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

WIDMAR v. VINCENT
454 U.S. 263 (1981)

In order to avoid activity that might constitute an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, the University of Missouri at Kansas City barred a student religious group from meeting on the campus for religious teaching or worship. The Supreme Court, 8–1, held that the University, having "created a forum generally open for use by student groups," was forbidden by the FIRST AMENDMENT's guarantee of the FREEDOM OF SPEECH to exclude the religious group. Because the exclusion was based on the content of the group's speech, it was unconstitutional unless necessary to serve a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST. The exclusion was not necessary to avoid establishment clause problems, for no state sponsorship of religion was implied when the university provided a forum generally open to all student groups.

Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS, concurring, said that any university necessarily makes many distinctions based on speech content. Here, however, the university discriminated on the basis of the viewpoint of particular speakers, and that was forbidden by the First Amendment.

Justice BYRON R. WHITE dissented, arguing that the state could constitutionally "attempt to disentangle itself from religious worship."

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Public Forum.)

WIEMAN v. UPDEGRAFF
344 U.S. 183 (1952)

In an OPINION written by Justice TOM C. CLARK, the Supreme Court struck down an Oklahoma LOYALTY OATH for state employees that required signers to affirm that they were not and had not been for five years members of organizations designated by the attorney general of the United States as "communist front" or "subversive." Clark, who as attorney general had initiated the federal list in 1947, held that the statute violated the DUE PROCESS clause because it did not distinguish innocent membership from knowing membership in the proscribed organizations.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH
(1986)

WIGMORE, JOHN HENRY
(1863–1943)

John Henry Wigmore was perhaps the foremost American legal scholar and educator of the twentieth century. A professor of law at Northwestern University Law School for fifty years (1893–1943), nearly thirty of them as its dean (1901–1929), Wigmore played the leading role in developing it into one of the nation's leading law schools. Wigmore also helped to found numerous professional and academic organizations, among them the American Institute of Law and Criminology (1909) and the American Bar Association's Sections on Criminal Law (1920) and on International and Comparative Law (1934).

Wigmore wrote an extraordinary number of books and articles on almost every field of the law, but his most significant works focused on evidence, criminal law and criminology, and international and comparative law. His great Treatise on Evidence (1904; third ed., 1940; subsequently revised by others) established itself as the dominant work in its field and was acclaimed as the greatest treatise on any single subject of the law. Although some critics objected to the Treatise's introduction of new terms, its length and elaborate organization, and its occasional divergence from the current state of the law, most scholars welcomed it as the most systematic overview of its subject, and it had great influence on many states' revisions of their rules of EVIDENCE and on the Federal Rules of Evidence (1969–1975). Wigmore's other major works on evidence were his Pocket Code of Evidence (1910; third ed., 1942) and his Principles of Judicial Proof (1913, third ed., 1937). His other books include A Panorama of the World's Legal Systems (1928; second ed., 1936), A Kaleidoscope of Justice (1941), Problems of Law: Its Past, Present and Future (1920), and casebooks on evidence (1906; third ed., 1932) and on torts (1910–1912).

RICHARD B. BERNSTEIN
(1986)

Bibliography

ROALFE, WILLIAM R. 1977 John Henry Wigmore: Scholar and Reformer. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press.

WILKES CASES
19 Howell's State Trials (1763–1768)

Counting derivative trials, the Wilkes Cases embraced at least forty cases from 1763 to 1769; all emanated ultimately from a single GENERAL WARRANT issued by the British secretaries of state on April 26, 1763, against The North Briton, No. 45, a periodical trenchantly critical of the Grenville administration. Numerous categories of the general warrant, which allowed its bearer to arrest, search, and seize at his discretion, had operated in England for centuries. The warrant of April 26, however, was of an atypical variety, based on custom rather than statute, which the government used against dissident publications; it resulted in the search of at least five houses, the arrest of forty-nine persons, and the seizure of thousands of manuscripts and books.

Although hundreds of such warrants had issued since the Restoration, the latest crop of victims included John Wilkes, a powerful member of Parliament and principal author of The North Briton. When Wilkes sued every official connected with the warrant, many of the others arrested promptly did the same.

The trials unfolded in distinct series. In Huckle v. Money, the first trial on July 6, 1763, CHARLES PRATT, the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, criticized the North Briton warrant because it specified no person, had been issued without a formal complaint under oath, and thus lacked PROBABLE CAUSE. When this case reached the full Common Pleas, Pratt extended his attack to the general search feature of the warrant, holding that it, as well as its companion power of general arrest, violated MAGNA CARTA.

The outcome of the North Briton trials incited suits by earlier victims of secretarial warrants. In the most famous of these trials, Entick v. Carrington (1765), which accrued from a general warrant against The Monitor, the emphasis shifted to the powers of general, confiscatory seizure in such warrants. Pratt, now ennobled as Lord Camden, condemned the use of seized personal papers against their owner as self-incriminatory. Moreover, Camden continued, because private property was inherently sacred, any invasion of it without express legal authority was a trespass even if it merely involved touching the soil or grass. He conceded that the inspection of private papers was not itself a legal trespass, but he insisted that the disclosure of the personal secrets they contained greatly magnified the harm from the physical trespass of their seizure.

Although Pratt in Wilkes v. Wood (1763) had condemned even general warrants authorized by statute, WILLIAM MURRAY (Lord Mansfield), in a final appeal of Huckle v. Money, upheld statutory warrants and denounced only those not based on parliamentary enactment. When Pratt shifted to the same grounds in Entick, the effect was to confine the assault on general warrants to the variant based on custom, and to preserve a greater number that derived from statute. In 1766 a resolution against general warrants did emerge from the House of Commons, but an effort to transform it into binding, comprehensive legislation failed.

WILLIAM J. CUDDIHY
(1986)

Bibliography

HOLDSWORTH, SIR WILLIAM 1938 A History of English Law. 7th ed. 15 vols. Vol. 10:99–100, 658–672. London: Methuen.

NOBBE, GEORGE 1939 The North Briton. New York: Columbia University Press.

WILLIAMS, ROGER
(1603–1683)

Arriving in New England in 1631, Roger Williams preached in Plymouth and Salem, but almost immediately clashed with the Massachusetts authorities over issues involving both church and state. He attacked Massachusetts's right to its land on the grounds that the land had not been purchased from the Indians—only granted by the king. He claimed that the colonial churches had not broken sharply enough with the Church of England, and he denied that magistrates had power to punish in religious matters. Under sentence of banishment from Massachusetts, Williams fled to Providence in 1636 and formed a settlement there. By 1644 he had secured a patent from the English government combining his own and neighboring towns into the colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations.

Although always a Calvinist, Williams adhered to no church after his departure from Massachusetts except for a brief period as a Baptist; rather, he lived as a Seeker. RELIGIOUS LIBERTY was his abiding passion, and he defended it primarily for its benefits to religion. Drawing the analogy of church as garden and world as wilderness, he insisted that only a wall between the two could preserve the integrity of the church.

Williams believed that allowing the state any power in church affairs made the state the arbiter of religious truth, an area in which its lack of competence only perverted religion. To demonstrate the absurdity of state attempts to proclaim the true church, he cited history, especially the recent multiple changes in religious allegiance on the part of the English government, and he expressed the psychological insights that rulers tended to advance their own religious preferences as truth and that persecutors always justified their actions in religion's name.

Williams's political views flowed from his religious theories. For him the Israel of the Old Testament was a figurative entity and not, as Massachusetts Puritans claimed, a model for government. He saw government as a SOCIAL COMPACT drawn up between citizens for secular purposes only. Just as civil interference ruined religion, so religious interference disrupted government—by accusations of heresy against civil leaders and demands for their removal from office. He believed that governing was an art, for which Christianity did not necessarily constitute a gift.

Carrying his arguments in favor of religious liberty to their logical and remarkably radical conclusions, Williams contended that liberty should be extended to all law-abiding citizens, including Roman Catholics (whom he abhorred), non-Christians, and even those he considered blasphemers. By opposing monopolization of Rhode Island's land by its original settlers, he strove to keep the colony open to newcomers of all religions and to enable them to settle there on an equal social and economic basis with already-established inhabitants.

Beyond Rhode Island's fidelity to his ideals of religious freedom, Williams exerted hardly any influence. His views shocked his contemporaries, and throughout his life he bore the stigma of radicalism. During the colonial years, his writings almost disappeared. Succeeding centuries, however, have restored his reputation by correctly perceiving him as a prophet and forerunner of modern religious liberty.

THOMAS CURRY
(1986)

Bibliography

MILLER, PERRY 1953 Roger Williams: His Contribution to the American Tradition. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

MORGAN, EDMUND S. 1967 Roger Williams: The Church and the State. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World.

WILLIAMS v. FLORIDA
399 U.S. 78 (1970)

The rule of Williams is that trial by a jury of six in a noncapital FELONY case does not violate the constitutional right to TRIAL BY JURY in a state prosecution. Trial by jury had historically meant trial by a jury of twelve, neither more nor less. Justice BYRON R. WHITE for the Supreme Court found no rationale for the figure of twelve, which he called "accidental" and "superstitious." If Congress enacted a statute providing for juries of less than twelve in federal prosecutions, the Sixth Amendment would be no bar, according to this case. A jury of six is practical: it can be selected in half the time, costs only half as much, and may reach its verdict more quickly. According to White, "there is no discernible difference between the results reached by the two different-sized juries," but in fact a jury of six hangs less frequently, significantly changes the probability of conviction, and convicts different persons. White claimed that the size of the jury should be large enough to promote group deliberation and allow for a representative cross-section of the community, and he claimed that a jury of six serves those functions as well as a jury of twelve. In fact the Court was wrong. Only Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL dissented on the question of jury size, in an opinion that rested strictly on precedent. Williams also contended that Florida violated his RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION by its notice-of-alibi rule, but he convinced only Justices HUGO L. BLACK and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Jury Size.)

WILLIAMS v. MISSISSIPPI
170 U.S. 213 (1898)

Williams is a realistic snapshot of our constitutional law on race at the turn of the century. A black man was tried in Mississippi for the murder of a white, convicted by an all-white jury, and sentenced to death. He alleged that he had been denied the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS guaranteed by the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, because the laws of the state were rigged in such a way as to exclude members of his race from jury service. In Mississippi, to be eligible for jury service one must be qualified to vote. To be a voter one must have paid his POLL TAX and have satisfied registration officials that he could not only pass a LITERACY TEST but also could understand or reasonably interpret any clause of the state constitution; registration officials had sole discretion to decide whether an applicant had the requisite understanding. In Mississippi at that time, a black graduate of Harvard Law School could not satisfy white officials. The state convention of 1890 clearly adopted new qualifications on the right to vote in order to insure white supremacy by disfranchising black voters. Under prior laws there were 190,000 black voters; by 1892 only 8,600 remained, and these were soon eliminated. Blacks disappeared from jury lists after 1892.

A unanimous Supreme Court, speaking through Justice JOSEPH MCKENNA, held that the state constitution and laws passed under it, prescribing the qualifications of voters and jurors, did not on their face discriminate racially. McKenna also declared that the discretion vested in state and local officials who managed elections and selected juries, while affording the opportunity for unconstitutional RACIAL DISCRIMINATION, was not constitutionally excessive. Yet McKenna said, "We gather . . . that this discretion can be and has been exercised against the colored race, and from these lists jurors are selected." The Court recognized that a law on its face might be impartial and be administered "with an evil eye and an unequal hand," but it held that "it has not been shown that their actual administration was evil; only that evil was possible under them."

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WILLIAMS v. VERMONT
472 U.S. 14 (1985)

Vermont levied a use tax on automobiles, collected upon each car's registration. No tax was imposed if the car was bought in Vermont, and a Vermont sales tax was paid. If the car was purchased outside Vermont, the use tax was reduced by the amount of any sales tax paid to the other state—but only if the registrant was then a Vermont resident. Persons who had bought cars outside Vermont before becoming Vermont residents sued in state court, challenging the constitutionality of this scheme. The Vermont courts denied relief, but the Supreme Court, 6–3, held that the discrimination against newcomers violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause. Justice BYRON R. WHITE wrote the OPINION OF THE COURT.

As it had done for half a century, the Court avoided the much-discussed question whether a state must give a credit for payment of another state's sales tax in such circumstances. Instead, the Court followed ZOBEL V. WILLIAMS (1982) and held that the discrimination against newcomers to Vermont served no legitimate statutory purpose. As in Zobel, Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, concurring, wrote that the discrimination threatened the "federal interest in free interstate migration." (See RIGHT TO TRAVEL.) Justice HARRY A. BLACKMUN, for the dissenters, favored a REMAND to the state courts for clarification whether the law in fact so discriminated. Even if it did, he argued, Vermont could legitimately tax in rough proportion to automobiles' use on Vermont roads.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

WILLIAMSON, HUGH
(1735–1819)

Hugh Williamson, mathemetician, physician, and Presbyterian minister, signed the Constitution as a North Carolina delegate to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. A frequent but not very influential speaker, he was the first to propose the six-year term for senators. He supported RATIFICATION in the North Carolina convention and served in the first two Congresses.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

WILLIAMSON v. LEE OPTICAL CO.
348 U.S. 483 (1955)

Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, for an 8–0 Supreme Court, announced that "the day is gone when this Court uses the DUE PROCESS CLAUSE to strike down state business regulation. Without any inquiry into actual legislative history, Douglas upheld an Oklahoma law regulating eyeglass sales, suggesting various hypothetical reasons why the legislature might have thought it necessary.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

WILLOUGHBY, WESTEL W.
(1867–1945)

Westel Woodbury Willoughby taught political science at Johns Hopkins University (1894–1933) and was a founder of the American Political Science Association. He wrote nearly two dozen books, including The Supreme Court of the United States (1890), The Nature of the State (1896), The American Constitutional System (1904), and The Con- stitutional Law of the United States (1910; second edition, 1922).

Willoughby rejected the notion that FEDERALISM implied division of SOVEREIGNTY between the central government and the states. He described the Constitution in terms of LIMITED GOVERNMENT, but regarded the central government as possessing the ultimate authority in the country and believed that in crisis situations (such as civil war) the rights of both states and citizens must yield to the INHERENT POWER of national self-preservation. Because he thought the government must at other times be limited to constitutionally DELEGATED POWERS he was especially critical of the decisions in the INSULAR CASES.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

WILLSON v. BLACK BIRD CREEK MARSH CO.
2 Peters 245 (1829)

Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL's opinion for a unanimous Supreme Court cannot be reconciled with his opinions in GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824) and BROWN V. MARYLAND (1827), neither of which he mentioned in Willson. Delaware had authorized the company to dam a navigable tidewater creek, obstructing the navigation of Willson's sloop, licensed under the same Federal Coastal Licensing Act that had proved decisive in Gibbons. The Court sustained the constitutionality of the state statute as a measure calculated to improve marshland property and the health of its inhabitants. The Coastal Licensing Act notwithstanding, the Court found that Congress had chosen not to govern the many small navigable creeks of the eastern coast. In effect, the Court sustained the POLICE POWER in a case involving local circumstances affecting the COMMERCE CLAUSE "in its dormant state," that is, unexercised by Congress.

Marshall's Willson opinion is so laconic, almost unreasoned, and uncharacteristic of the great Chief Justice that it has never been satisfactorily explained. FELIX FRANKFURTER, in his book The Commerce Clause, surmised that Marshall understood that a completely exclusive commerce power might overdiminish STATES' RIGHTS and that Marshall realized the need for effective state regulation of local problems. Taking into consideration "the circumstances of the case," Marshall acknowledged the state interest in enhancing property values and improving the public health. Accordingly he opened the door to the police power because the state's objectives, unlike the situations in Gibbons and Brown, were not the regulation of commerce per se. Willson, however, left a confused legacy for the TANEY COURT, which divided in MAYOR OF NEW YORK V. MILN (1837) and produced doctrinal chaos in the LICENSE CASES (1847) and the PASSENGER CASES (1849). Not until COOLEY V. BOARD OF WARDENS (1851) did the Taney Court find a formula that purported to reconcile Marshall's doctrines in Gibbons and Willson.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WILMOT PROVISO
(1846)

The proviso was introduced by Congressman David Wilmot (Democrat, Pennsylvania) as an amendment to a $2,000,000 appropriations bill requested by President JAMES K. POLK to finance the Mexican War. The proviso prohibited SLAVERY in any territory acquired from Mexico, thus enabling northern Democrats, like Wilmot, to support the war without supporting slave expansion and more slave states. The proviso passed the HOUSE, but the SENATE adjourned without acting on the appropriations bill. In 1847 the proviso was added to a new $3,000,000 war appropriations bill. The Senate refused to accept the proviso, and in a bitterly debated compromise, the House agreed to the appropriation without the proviso. Despite its failure in Congress, the proviso raised serious constitutional and political issues. Southerners argued that they had contributed to the war effort and ought to be allowed to settle in the conquered territories without any special disabilities. Northerners condemned the war, especially after the defeat of the proviso, as aggression by an expansionist "slave power." The proviso led to the formation of the Free Soil Party, which was committed to prohibiting SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES. Free Soilers ran particularly well in some northern Democratic districts.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

MORRISON, CHAPLAIN W. 1967 Democratic Politics and Sectionalism: The Wilmot Proviso Controversy. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

WILSON, JAMES
(1742–1798)

James Wilson was one of the most influential members of the founding generation. He was born in Scotland and educated as a classical scholar at the University of St. Andrews. He immigrated to America in 1765, whereupon he served as a tutor at the College of Philadelphia while he studied law with the celebrated JOHN DICKINSON. His keen and perceptive mind, superb classical education, and excellent legal training prepared him to play a major role in the creation of the new American republic. He was a frequent delegate from Pennsylvania to the Second CONTINENTAL CONGRESS, one of six men who signed both the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE and the Constitution, and second only to JAMES MADISON in his contribution to the deliberations of the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION. He produced what was probably the most widely distributed and discussed defense of the new Constitution in his Statehouse Speech of October 6, 1787. He was the principal figure in the efforts to secure RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION by Pennsylvania, whose approval was indispensable to the success of the whole constitutional movement. He was a major architect of the significant Pennsylvania Constitution of 1790. He was one of the six original Justices of the United States Supreme Court. He was the first professor of law appointed after the founding of the new republic, and he was the only Framer to formulate a general theory of government and law—this in his lectures on law, delivered in 1791–1792 at what would later become the University of Pennsylvania.

Wilson was and remains influential, however, not so much because of the roles he played as for the ideas he articulated, the arguments he made, and the institutional arrangements he favored. Among the principal Framers, Wilson was the most committed to, and trusting of, unmitigated majoritarian democracy. He favored the simplicity of immediate consent and self-restraint to the complexity of procedural protections and constitutional contrivances. Relying heavily on the Scottish moralists (especially Thomas Reid), Wilson argued that men are naturally social; imbued with a sense of goodness, veracity, and benevolence; and possessed of a progressive intuitive sense that can be improved with practice so as to carry society "above any limits which we can now assign." As a consequence, he trusted them to elect leaders who would govern soberly and well, especially over a large and "comprehensive Federal Republic" such as the United States. He saw no need to protect the people from themselves. Madison's "republican remed[ies] for the diseases most incident to republican government" were, he believed, unnecessary. The government would be good to the extent that its branches were prompted, through their competition with one another, to serve the people and to reflect faithfully their wishes. Wilson brought this view of government and his commitment to majoritarianism to the Federal Convention, where his influence was clearly felt. He contributed significantly to the Convention's understanding of SEPARATION OF POWERS, figured prominently in determining the institutional arrangements and powers of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches, and helped to make FEDERALISM possible with his arguments concerning the dual SOVEREIGNTY of the people.

Wilson contributed to the Convention's understanding of separation of powers by arguing that it properly consists not of functionally separated branches but of coordinate and equal branches that perform a blend of functions in order to balance, not separate, powers. As he declared, "The separation of the departments does not require that they should have separate objects but that they should act separately tho' on the same objects." Wilson was aware that the various governmental branches, even though popularly elected, would occasionally be activated by "an official sentiment opposed to that of the General Government and perhaps to that of the people themselves." On those occasions, separation of powers would be necessary to insure the fidelity of these popular agents. Wilson also contributed to the Convention's understanding by stressing that separation of powers not only prevents governmental tyranny but also contributes to governmental efficiency. Aware that the democratic process of mutual deliberation and consent can paralyze government when swift and decisive action is necessary, he argued that government would be more efficient if its different functions were performed by separate and distinct agencies.

Wilson's influence on the legislative branch was felt primarily in the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES and in his promotion of reflective, as opposed to refining, representation. He argued in the Convention that "the Government ought to possess not only first, the force but secondly, the mind or sense of the people at large. The Legislature ought to be the most exact transcript of the whole Society." Wilson regarded representation as a "chain of communication" between the people and those to whom they have delegated the powers of government. Its purpose is not to "refine" the people's sentiments; rather, it is to communicate through links "sound and strong" the exact feelings of the people. Strong as this chain might be, however, Wilson was unwilling to trust it completely. So long as the legislature was perfectly reflective of the people, no problem was presented; however, there was no way to ensure this. On occasion, the legislature might come to possess and perceive an interest distinct from, and perhaps contrary to, the public at large. On that occasion, a single legislature would be dangerous, and thus Wilson argued for a divided legislature with a numerous House of Representatives, so close in political style and feelings to those it represented that it would constitute their "exact transcript," and a popularly elected Senate organized around the principle of proportional representation, thereby providing a "double representation" for the people. Wilson was one of the first to argue that it is possible for the people, simply through the electoral process, to have two different agents or representatives speaking for them at the same time. He did not fear that this common election would erode the material distinctions, and consequently the benefits that resulted from these material distinctions, between the two branches of the legislature. He trusted in the development of a "point of honor" between the two branches: they would "be rivals in duty, rivals in fame, rivals for the good graces of their common constituents." His views on the Senate, though unsuccessful at the Convention, were largely vindicated with the passage of the SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Wilson's contributions to the shape and powers of the executive branch were perhaps most significant of all. He was the first delegate to propose "that the Executive consist of a single person." He argued that the executive, no less than the legislature, needed to be restrained and controlled. But, "in order to control the legislative authority, you must divide it. In order to control the Executive, you must unite it." The advantage of clear-cut responsibility would reinforce and assure those other "very important advantages" that are also obtained from a single executive, including energy, vigor, dispatch, firmness, consistency, and stability. Wilson was also the first delegate at the Convention to suggest that the President should be elected directly by the people. When this proposal failed to gain general support, he was then the first to propose an ELECTORAL COLLEGE scheme, a modification of which ultimately found its way into the Constitution. He also favored a relatively brief presidential tenure of three years and reeligibility. These features would insure that the President would become and remain "the Man of the People."

Wilson's "Man of the People" was to be more than simply derived from their midst; he was also to be capable of acting vigorously on their behalf. As Wilson stressed in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention, the President was to be captain of the ship of state, holding firmly to the helm and allowing the vessel to "proceed neither in one direction or another without his concurrence." He was to be powerful and independent enough to protect the people from the excesses, instabilities, and injustices of legislative dominance. Wilson's captain was to take his bearings from the people and set his course according to their dictates. Because the people would not be easily misled, Wilson, unlike THE FEDERALIST, would not have the President provide the people with direction or resist them when they were wrong.

Wilson also labored at the Convention for the establishment of a powerful judiciary. Because the judges would be appointed by the President and confirmed by the SENATE, he understood the judiciary to be "drawn from the same source, animated by the same principles, and directed to the same ends" and therefore "as much the friend of the people" as the other branches. As a consequence, it could be entrusted with the power of JUDICIAL REVIEW. So entrusted, it could serve as a "noble guard" defending the fundamental principles and will of the people as expressed in the Constitution from governmental sentiments—especially legislative sentiments—which from time to time might come to oppose them.

Wilson also helped to make federalism possible by arguing in the Convention that the people could create and assign power to more than "one set of immediate representatives." The delegates could preserve the states and at the same time establish a new national government because of the dual sovereignty of the people. He argued that both the states and the national government receive their authority directly from the people and owe their responsibility directly to them. The people are the sovereign foundation of all governments. As such, they can construct two levels of government and assign different powers to them. They can take powers from the state governments and place them in the national government. Wilson employed this same argument in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention to taunt those Anti-Federalists who contended that the people could not give to the national government whatever powers and for whatever purposes they pleased. He also operated from these premises in CHISHOLM V. GEORGIA (1793), his only truly important Supreme Court decision, in which he declared that the people of the United States had formed themselves into "a nation for national purposes" and that, consequently, states as well as individual persons were subject to the JUDICIAL POWER of the United States.

Wilson embraced and defended the "comprehensive Federal Republic" created by the Constitution not only because the people had chosen to construct such a level of government over them but also because he believed that a reciprocating relationship existed between the structure of government and the character of the people. A petty state would produce, he believed, petty men. The only lessons they would learn would be those of "low Vice" and "illiberal Cunning." Only a large republic would sustain and nourish the good qualities of the people. Only a large republic would produce noble citizens, worthy of the great political trust Wilson would place in them.

Central to Wilson's constitutional thought was his confidence in the good qualities of the people. In this regard, he differed from his fellow Framers, in that he relied upon what The Federalist considered "the weaker springs of human character." This difference was critical then and remains so now: Wilson's commitment to unrestrained majoritarian democracy stands in sharp contrast to the Con-stitution's more complex mitigated democracy that relies not so much on men as on institutions for our political salvation.

RALPH A. ROSSUM
(1986)

Bibliography

ADAMS, RANDOLPH GREENFIELD, ed. 1930 Selected Political Essays of James Wilson. New York: Knopf.

MCCLOSKEY, ROBERT GREEN, ed. 1967 The Works of James Wilson. 2 Vols. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

ROSSUM, RALPHY A. 1976 James Wilson and the "Pyramid of Government": The Federal Republic. Political Science Reviewer 6:113–142.

SMITH, CHARLES PAGE 1956 James Wilson: Founding Father. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

WILSON, WOODROW
(1856–1924)

Dr. Thomas Woodrow Wilson was both a scholar and an active participant in American constitutional development. Trained in history and law, Wilson became one of the first practitioners of the new academic political science that was born in America toward the close of the nineteenth century. He taught at Bryn Mawr College and Wesleyan University, and became a professor at, and later president of, Princeton University.

As a political scientist, Wilson urged fundamental reforms in the American system of government. In his first book, Congressional Government (1885), he argued that instead of the balance of powers envisaged by the Founders, American government was dominated by the legislative branch and, in particular, by a few powerful congressional committees. Wilson advocated cabinet government as he supposed it to exist in Great Britain, dominated by a strong executive. In Constitutional Government in the United States (1908), Wilson argued that under the Constitution the President had authority to exercise vigorous leadership of the whole American political system. In other works, Wilson advocated the scientific study of techniques of public administration and the training of a new class of civil servants who would be independent of political influence or control. Professional administrators, Wilson believed, should be left free to devise the most efficient means of carrying into effect the general policy decisions of the political branches of the government. (See PROGRESSIVE CONSTITUTIONAL THOUGHT.)

A progressive Democrat, Wilson was elected governor of New Jersey in 1910, and President of the United States two years later, when THEODORE ROOSEVELT broke with President WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT and split the Republican party. Wilson's platform called for a "New Freedom," characterized by a vigorous ANTITRUST policy, reduced tariffs, legislation to benefit organized labor, and creation of the federal reserve banking system.

During Wilson's terms of office, the Seventeenth, Eighteenth, and NINETEENTH AMENDMENTS were added to the Constitution. But ordinary legislation did as much to change the distribution and use of governmental power as did formal constitutional amendments. The FEDERAL RESERVE ACT (1913) placed control of the nation's money and credit in the hands of an independent, semi-private banking system. The FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT (1914), brainchild of Boston attorney LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, created an independent REGULATORY AGENCY with specific authority to make regulations having the force of law.

Among the least creditable achievements of the Wilson administration was the introduction of official racial SEGREGATION in executive departments of the federal government for the first time since the CIVIL WAR. Wilson himself approved the change of policy, arguing that segregation was in the best interests of black federal employees, but he did not regard it as a matter of major concern.

Wilson asserted a broad conception of executive power in military and FOREIGN AFFAIRS. In 1913 the United States assumed control of the foreign policy of Nicaragua and American marines put down an insurgent movement in that country. Wilson also deployed marines twice, in 1914 and 1916, to suppress insurrections in the Dominican Republic. Between 1913 and 1917 the United States intervened continuously, and ultimately unsuccessfully, in the internal politics of Mexico. For none of these military adventures did Wilson have specific congressional authorization; he relied instead on his power as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF of the armed forces.

Although Wilson campaigned for reelection in 1916 on the slogan, "He kept us out of war," the United States entered WORLD WAR I just one month after his second inauguration. The war emergency provided the rationale for a vast expansion of federal power. The Overman Act (1917) created a virtual presidential dictatorship over the machinery of the government; the RAILROAD CONTROL ACT commandeered the private rail network and consolidated it under government auspices; the SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT authorized the drafting of millions of young men into the military; and the ESPIONAGE ACT and the SEDITION ACT provided a basis for controlling civilian dissent. In a sense, the war provided the essential basis—a strongly held vision of the public good—for many of the reforms the Progressives had long advocated. For at least two decades afterward, political activists and reformers would hark back to the sense of unity that World War I provided.

American intervention enabled Britain and France to defeat the Germans and their allies, and so the American government was entitled to a leading voice in dictating the peace terms. Wilson was unable, however, to secure ratification of the Treaty of Versailles and the League of Nations Covenant by the United States Senate. Republicans, led by Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, opposed these measures, which seemingly would have subordinated American SOVEREIGNTY to an international body and permanently involved the United States in European quarrels.

In 1919, exhausted by a national campaign to win support for the Versailles Treaty, Wilson suffered a debilitating stroke. For the last year of his presidency the erstwhile advocate of strong presidential leadership tried, and failed, to govern the country from his sickbed. The constitutional problem of presidential disability would not be resolved until passage of the TWENTY-FIFTH AMENDMENT.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

BETH, LOREN P. 1971 The Development of the American Constitution: 1877–1917. New York: Harper & Row.

BRAGDON, HENRY W. 1967 Woodrow Wilson: The Academic Years. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press.

LINK, ARTHUR S. 1947–1974 Woodrow Wilson, 6 vols. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

WILSON v. NEW
243 U.S. 332 (1917)

Congress passed the ADAMSON EIGHT-HOUR ACT in 1916 to avert a threatened nationwide railroad strike and to prevent disruption of INTERSTATE COMMERCE. The act prescribed an eight-hour day for railway workers and prohibited any reduction in pay for the shorter hours. Congress thereby regulated wages (pending the report of a commission established by the act) as well as hours. A United States District Court enjoined enforcement of the act, and that decision was appealed to the Supreme Court.

Chief Justice EDWARD D. WHITE, for a 5–4 Supreme Court, sustained the act as a legitimate exercise of congressional power. Asserting that Congress's power to establish working hours was "so clearly sustained as to render the subject not disputable," White faced the issue: did the COMMERCE CLAUSE give Congress the power to set wages? Despite reservations about government interference with FREEDOM OF CONTRACT, the majority held that the Adamson Act only supplemented contracting parties' rights. Moreover, Congress might set a temporary wage standard to protect interstate commerce when private parties failed to exercise their contract rights. Although the strike threatened an emergency, the emergency created no new powers, but it might provide an occasion for exercise of the commerce power.

The dissenters contended either that the act violated the Fifth Amendment as a TAKING OF PROPERTY or that the act lay outside the scope of Congress's commerce power because wages and hours were only remotely connected with interstate commerce.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

WINONA AND ST. PETER RAILROD CO. v. BLAKE

See: Granger Cases

WINSHIP, IN RE
397 U.S. 358 (1970)

A 6–3 Supreme Court, speaking through Justice WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, held here that among the constitutional rights available in juvenile proceedings is the standard of proof beyond a REASONABLE DOUBT. A twelve-year-old was charged with a crime which, if done by an adult, would be larceny. The applicable New York statute required only a preponderance of evidence for conviction, and three successive New York courts rejected the contention that the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT required a higher standard of proof. Tracing the requirement back to early United States history, Brennan found "virtually unanimous adherence" to the reasonable doubt standard in COMMON LAW jurisdictions. He extolled its protective value and spoke of the "vital role" of this "indispensable" standard. "We explicitly hold that the DUE PROCESS Clause protects the accused against conviction except upon proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every fact necessary to constitute the crime with which he is charged." Moreover, Brennan could find no obstacle to extending this right to juveniles. Justice HUGO L. BLACK, dissenting, charged the majority with amending the BILL OF RIGHTS. "Nowhere in that document is there any statement that conviction of crime requires proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

WIRETAPPING

Telephone tapping is probably the best known form of electronic surveillance. The Supreme Court originally ruled in OLMSTEAD V. UNITED STATES (1928) that neither the Fifth nor the FOURTH AMENDMENT could be used to control wiretapping. In KATZ V. UNITED STATES (1967), however, the Supreme Court declared that what people reasonably expect to keep private is entitled to constitutional protection under the Fourth Amendment.

Both before and after the Katz decision, wiretapping was regulated by statute. Between 1934 and 1968, Section 605 of the COMMUNICATIONS ACT prohibited virtually all wiretapping except for NATIONAL SECURITY purposes. The Justice Department construed the statute so narrowly, however, that it had little effect: federal and state officials tapped extensively, as did private parties, and there were few prosecutions.

In 1968, Congress enacted Title III of the OMNIBUS CRIME CONTROL AND SAFE STREETS ACT, which prohibits telephone tapping except by federal and state officials who obtain prior judicial approval. Before issuing such approval, the court must have PROBABLE CAUSE to believe that EVIDENCE of a specific crime listed in the statute, and relating to a particular person, will be found by tapping a specific phone. Interceptions must be minimized, and notice of the interception must ultimately be given to the target of the surveillance.

Critics claim that the minimization and judicial supervision requirements are ineffective, that wiretapping is inherently indiscriminate, and that it is of little value for major crimes. Proponents assert that the technique is useful, and that the procedural protections are effective.

Wiretapping within the United States to obtain foreign national security intelligence is governed by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (1978), which creates a special warrant procedure for judicial issuance of permission to wiretap. Both wiretap statutes have been held constitutional.

HERMAN SCHWARTZ
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Criminal Justice and Technology; Electronic Eavesdropping.)

Bibliography

SCHWARTZ, HERMAN 1977 Taps, Bugs, and Fooling the People. New York: Field Foundation.

WIRT, WILLIAM
(1772–1834)

A Virginian lawyer, William Wirt helped defend James Callender in his SEDITION trial (1800) and helped prosecute AARON BURR for TREASON (1806). As United States attorney general under JAMES MONROE and JOHN QUINCY ADAMS (1817–1829), Wirt initiated the system of preserving the "opinions of the Attorneys General" for future use. While attorney general, Wirt followed the common practice of arguing private cases. In association with DANIEL WEBSTER he helped successfully to argue DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819), MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819), and GIBBONS V. OGDEN (1824). Wirt's national perspective in these cases was similar to his official policy as attorney general.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

KENNEDY, JOHN P. 1850 Memoirs of the Life of William Wirt. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard.

WISCONSIN v. MITCHELL
508 U.S. 476 (1993)

On October 7, 1989, in Kenosha, Wisconsin, Todd Mitchell, a nineteen-year-old black man, directed and encouraged a number of young black men and boys to attack a fourteen-year-old white boy, Gregory Riddick. Mitchell selected Riddick solely on the basis of his race. Mitchell was convicted of aggravated battery for his role in the severe beating—a crime that carries a maximum sentence of two years under Wisconsin law. His crime also implicated the Wisconsin HATE CRIME statute that provides for the enhanced penalty of bias motivated crimes. Under this statute, the potential penalty for an aggravated battery is increased by five years if the perpetrator of the assault selected his victim on the basis of a set of enumerated group characteristics, including race, ethnicity, and religion.

Mitchell challenged his conviction under the hate crime statute, claiming that the enhancement of his prison term was a violation of his right to FREEDOM OF SPEECH under the FIRST AMENDMENT. The Wisconsin Supreme Court reversed the conviction in an opinion announced the day after R. A. V. V. CITY OF ST. PAUL (1992) was decided by the U.S. Supreme Court, and adopted much the same approach as did Justice ANTONIN SCALIA for the majority of the Court in R. A. V. The Wisconsin court held that the penalty enhancement law "punishes the defendant's biased . . . thought and thus encroaches upon First Amendment rights."

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the Wisconsin court and upheld Mitchell's sentence, including the enhanced portion. In defending its bias crime statute from constitutional attack, Wisconsin emphasized the precise form and content of that statute, particularly stressing that the statute punished discriminatory selection of a victim. Wisconsin contended that R. A. V. had been concerned with the regulation of expression while the Wisconsin bias crime statute proscribed not expression but conduct—the intentional discriminatory selection of a victim.

The U.S. Supreme Court largely based its decision on this speech-conduct distinction. Indeed, this was precisely the basis of the Court's distinction between the St. Paul ordinance that was struck down in R. A. V. and the Wisconsin statute. Writing for a unanimous Court, Chief Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST wrote that "whereas the ordinance struck down in R. A. V. was explicitly directed at expression (i.e., 'speech' or 'messages' . . .), the statute in this case is aimed at conduct unprotected by the First Amendment."

Although the speech-conduct distinction has been criticized by scholars as deeply flawed, since Mitchell, states have defended the constitutionality of their bias crime laws by arguing that their statutes do not interfere with the expression of prejudicial ideas but are addressed solely to the implementation of those views in conduct.

FREDERICK M. LAWRENCE
(2000)

Bibliography

JACOBS, JAMES B. and POTTER, KIMBERLY 1998 Hate Crimes: Criminal Law and Identity Politics. New York: Oxford University Press.

LAWRENCE, FREDERICK M. 1999 Punishing Hate: Bias Crimes Under American Law. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

WISCONSIN v. YODER
406 U.S. 205 (1972)

Wisconsin's school-leaving age was sixteen. Members of the Old Order Amish religion declined, on religious grounds, to send their children to school beyond the eighth grade. Wisconsin chose to force the issue, and counsel for the Amish defendants replied that while the requirement might be valid as to others, the free exercise clause of the FIRST AMENDMENT required exemption in the case of the Amish.

Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, speaking for the Supreme Court, was much impressed by the Amish way of life. He rejected Wisconsin's argument that belief but not action was protected by the free exercise clause, and cited SHERBERT V. VERNER (1963). Nor was the Chief Justice convinced by the state's assertion of a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST. Nothing indicated that Amish children would suffer from the lack of high school education. Burger stressed that the Amish would have lost had they based their claim on "subjective evaluations and rejections of the contemporary social values accepted by the majority."

Justice BYRON R. WHITE filed a concurring opinion in which Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN and POTTER STEWART joined. White found the issue in Yoder much closer than Burger. White pointed out that many Amish children left the religious fold upon attaining their majority and had to make their way in the larger world like everyone else.

Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS dissented in part. He saw the issue as one of CHILDREN'S RIGHTS in which Frieda Yoder's personal feelings and desires should be determinative. Justice Stewart, joined by Justice Brennan, filed a brief concurrence which took issue with Douglas on this point, and noted that there was nothing in the record which indicated that the religious beliefs of the children in the case differed in any way from those of the parents.

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

WISDOM, JOHN MINOR
(1905–1999)

John Minor Wisdom, a patrician son of the Old South who became one of the prime architects of the progressive New South, is, along with LEARNED HAND, HENRY J. FRIENDLY, and Irving Kaufman, one of a select group of judges who never sat on the Supreme Court but is regarded as producing the most long-lasting and profound impact on American jurisprudence in the twentieth century. Although universally known for his learned, literate, and path-breaking opinions in the field of CIVIL RIGHTS, among the more than 1,500 opinions Wisdom authored over the course of his forty-two years as an active and senior judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, are numerous seminal opinions in a diverse area of subjects, including trust, railroad reorganization, criminal, tax, and maritime law.

Wisdom's roots run deep in Southern soil. His mother was a descendant of the Minors of Virginia, a wealthy and socially prominent member of the landed gentry whose ancestors arrived in the state from Holland in the 1650s. The Wisdoms emigrated from England to America in 1730 and eventually settled in New Orleans in the 1840s where John Wisdom's grandfather built a successful cotton and tobacco commission business. John Wisdom's maternal grandfather, David Cohen Labatt, a leading Jewish lawyer in New Orleans and distant cousin of Judah P. Benjamin, received the first law degree conferred by the forerunner of what became Tulane Law School. Eighty-one years later, John Wisdom also received a law degree from Tulane.

A legal career, however, was not preordained for young John Wisdom. Following in his father's footsteps, John Wisdom received his undergraduate degree at Washington & Lee University. (Throughout his career, John Wisdom proudly displayed his father's certificate of scholarly achievement containing the faded signature of the college's president, Robert E. Lee.) Anticipating a career as a literary critic, John Wisdom enrolled at Harvard University in 1925, where he intended to obtain a Master of Arts, and possibly, thereafter, a doctoral degree in English. But after arriving, he learned that his lack of training in Latin or Greek precluded his participation in the program, so he stayed for only one year, choosing to audit courses at the Law School. The experience convinced him that he wanted to become a lawyer, and so he returned home to attend Tulane Law School, where he was graduated at the top of his class in 1929.

While building a highly successful law firm with a law school classmate, Wisdom turned some of his boundless energy to the field of politics. Committed to the notion that a strong two-party system was an essential element of a vibrant democracy, Wisdom committed himself to resuscitating Louisiana's long dormant REPUBLICAN PARTY. With the help of his wife, the former Bonnie Mathews, and a small band of devoted followers, Wisdom built up a political machine in the state and was instrumental in securing the Republican Party presidential nomination for DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER in 1952. Five years later, Eisenhower turned to Wisdom to fill a vacant spot on the Fifth Circuit, the appellate court with JURISDICTION over the entire Deep South—Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas, and Louisiana. Wisdom served on that court until his death in 1999, two days shy of his ninety-fourth birthday.

Wisdom's opinions are noted for their unpretentious eloquence, comprehensive and scholarly reliance on history, philosophy, and literature, their vision, and their bedrock commitment to fairness. As the intellectual leader of a group of progressive Fifth Circuit judges derisively called "The Four," Wisdom was the author of opinions that ordered the enrollment of James Meredith into the then-segregated University of Alabama, overturned the racially discriminatory jury selection system in Orleans Parish, mandated the DESEGREGATION of all public parks and playgrounds in New Orleans, struck down Louisiana's racist voter registration law, upheld the use of voluntary, racially based AFFIRMATIVE ACTION by a private employer, and held that involuntarily committed psychiatric patients had a constitutional right to adequate treatment in state mental institutions. In United States v. Jefferson County Board of Education (1966), the case Wisdom viewed as his most important opinion, he rejected the widely held view in the South that while the Constitution prohibited discrimination, it did not affirmatively require integration. He held that school boards had an affirmative duty to develop desegregation plans and advised them "the only school desegregation plan that meets constitutional standards is one that works."

JOEL WM. FRIEDMAN
(2000)

Bibliography

BASS, JACK 1981 Unlikely Heroes. New York: Simon & Schuster.

READ, FRANK T. and MCGOUGH, LUCY S. 1978 Let Them Be Judged. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press.

FRIEDMAN, JOEL WM. 1995 John Minor Wisdom's Battle Against the Political Bosses. Tulane Law Review 69:1439–1511.

——— 1996 Judge Wisdom and the 1952 Republican National Convention. Washington and Lee Law Review 53:33–97.

WITNESSES, JURORS, AND THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH

The 1990s witnessed a dramatic increase in "checkbook journalism," in which individuals are paid for providing information to the print or electronic media. Although numerous aspects of this practice may be troubling, the greatest concern has been expressed over the prospect of payment to actors in the judicial system who sell their stories to the news. Specifically, the specter of witnesses at trial and jurors realizing financial gain from their service in high-profile trials has caused many to argue for legal restrictions on the ability of certain trial participants to cash in on their fifteen minutes of fame. In turn, such a prospect has raised the fear that critical FIRST AMENDMENT rights to FREEDOM OF SPEECH will be sacrificed.

Obviously, most criminal trials proceed without anyone being compensated by the media for telling his or her story. In the vast majority of crimes, public interest would not sustain the payment of money for the "exclusive" scoop. In high-profile trials, however, the lure of the dollar may very well prevail. Although the frenzy of tabloid journalism surrounding the O. J. Simpson murder trial comes most readily to mind, the practice of checkbook journalism long preceded that case. For example, the woman who assisted the alleged rape victim of William Kennedy Smith—and who later became a pivotal witness at trial—received $40,000 from the media for her story. Two witnesses in the child-molestation charges against pop star Michael Jackson sold their stories to television.

Yet the Simpson trial set new records both for press coverage and for prices paid for stories concerning the double-murder of Nicole Brown Simpson and Ron Goldman. Witness Jill Shively sold her story of seeing O. J. Simpson driving near the murder scene; two other witnesses who worked in a knife store and who testified at a preliminary hearing that Simpson had purchased a knife were paid $12,500 for their story by the tabloid National Enquirer.

Witnesses (or potential witnesses) are not the only ones to cash in on their involvement in the judicial system; jurors have also discovered that jury duty can be profitable. Perhaps the best-known example of juror journalism arose out of the trial of Bernard Goetz, who was accused of shooting several youths after they had attempted to mug him on the New York subway. Two jurors ultimately sold their views about the case to the news media. During another high-profile trial, the boyfriend of the jury forewoman tried to negotiate with several newspapers for the sale of the foreperson's account of the trial. One juror during the Rodney King trial stated that although she had no current plans to sell her story, the idea appealed to her capitalistic instincts.

What, if anything, is wrong about such financial endeavors, either by witnesses or jurors? Simply, the concern is that money corrupts. Permitting witnesses to profit from selling their stories may threaten the integrity of a criminal trial in several ways. It may lead the jury to discredit the testimony of a truthful witness, or even cause an attorney to decide not to call a witness out of fear that the jury will react negatively. Alternatively, a witness may testify falsely on the stand, because the lure of money has prompted the witness to lie or embellish the truth to the media, and that false story has become the version frozen in place.

The integrity of the judicial system is also threatened when a juror sells—or anticipates selling—the story of his or her JURY SERVICE. The lure of the dollar may encourage a potential juror to lie during VOIR DIRE in order to obtain a seat on a high-profile jury. The juror's perception of the testimony may be altered by her conflicting roles of juror and journalist. A juror seeing dollar signs may seek the "truth" that most effectively sells a story. Finally, there is the concern that a juror will manipulate a verdict to ensure the most dramatic—and salable—outcome.

These are legitimate concerns, and they have led several states to adopt laws restricting the ability of witnesses or jurors—or both—to profit from their service. These laws, however, constitute a restriction on speech and hence raise potential First Amendment problems. Information concerning criminal acts—be it about the victim, the alleged perpetrator, the behavior of the police, or others—provides useful information on matters of public concern. Financial remuneration, moreover, may cause a critical witness to come forward who otherwise might not. Suppose this nation faced a scandal on the magnitude of WATERGATE, and the only person with information refused to divulge it without monetary gain.

Similarly, juror speech is valuable. A juror's report may explore or criticize the workings of the judiciary and expose flaws and potential abuses. Explanations of how the deliberations progressed could reinforce notions that the jury system does work, and thus increase public confidence in the justice system.

Ultimately, whether laws restricting juror or witness speech violate the freedom of speech will turn on information that today remains merely a matter of speculation. How real is the risk that the payment of money will subvert a witness's oath to tell the truth or the juror's promise to be impartial? The evidence remains theoretical. Until such time—if ever—that the alleged harm of checkbook journalism becomes more substantiated, it is unlikely that the courts will—or should—sanction a law that decreases expression on critical social and political issues.

MARCY STRAUSS
(2000)

Bibliography

STRAUSS, MARCY 1994 Juror Journalism. Yale Law and Policy Review 12:389–423.

——— 1996 From Witness to Riches: The Constitutionality of Restricting Witness Speech. Arizona Law Review 38:291–329.

WITTERS v. WASHINGTON DEPARTMENT OF SERVICES FOR THE BLIND
474 U.S. 481 (1986)

Suffering from a progressive eye condition, Witters sought state financial assistance to attend a Bible college to prepare himself for a career as a minister. Washington State generally provided aid to visually handicapped persons seeking education or training for careers so they could be self-supporting. Nevertheless, the state denied Witters aid, citing the Washington State constitution's prohibition of public aid to religion. The state supreme court upheld the denial, but on ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE grounds, holding that aid to Witters would advance religion as its primary effect and thus violate the second prong of the LEMON TEST. The U.S. Supreme Court unanimously reversed.

Writing the opinion of the Court, Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL said it would be inappropriate to view the funds ultimately flowing to the Bible college in this case as the result of state action to aid religion. Marshall noted that the financial assistance "is paid directly to the student, who transmits it to the educational institution of his or her choice. Any aid provided under Washington's program that ultimately flows to religious institutions does so only as a result of the genuinely independent and private choices of aid recipients." Marshall further emphasized that the program "is in no way skewed toward religion" and "creates no financial incentive for students to undertake sectarian education." Finally, Marshall stressed that nothing indicated any significant proportion of state money provided under the program would flow to religious institutions if Witters's claim was granted.

That last reason was not dispositive for a majority of Justices, five of whom joined concurring opinions that noted the applicability of MUELLER V. ALLEN (1983) to Witters. In Mueller the Court had upheld general tax deductions for certain school expenses, despite the fact that over ninety percent of these tax benefits went to those who sent their children to religious schools.

JOHN G. WEST, JR.
(1992)

WOLF v. COLORADO
338 U.S. 25 (1949)

In Wolf the Supreme Court held that "the core" of the FOURTH AMENDMENT's freedom from UNREASONABLE SEARCHES was "basic" and thus incorporated in the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT as a restriction on searches by state officers, but that its enforcement feature, the EXCLUSIONARY RULE (in effect for federal trials since 1914), was not. The refusal to require the exclusionary rule for state trials was largely based on considerations of FEDERALISM. The Court reasoned, first, that the exclusionary rule could scarcely be considered "basic" when the COMMON LAW rule of admissibility was still followed both in the English-speaking world outside the United States and in most of the American states, and second, that suits in tort against offending officers could be "equally effective" in deterring unlawful searches. The experience of the following twelve years proved the suit in tort to be a paper remedy rather than an effective sanction, leading the Court to overrule Wolf and impose the exclusionary rule on the states in MAPP V. OHIO (1961).

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

WOLFF PACKING COMPANY v. COURT OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS
262 U.S. 522 (1923)

Reversing a trend of broad definitions of public utilities, the Supreme Court voided a Kansas law declaring certain businesses to be AFFECTED WITH A PUBLIC INTEREST, and thus subject to regulation. A unanimous Court could find no justification for the statute and held that affectation derived from the nature of a business, not from the declaration of a state legislature. The Court thus returned to a concept implicit in Munn v. Illinois (1877): that a public interest inhered in monopolistic enterprises. (See GRANGER CASES.) Chief Justice WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT defined three categories of businesses clothed with a public interest: public utilities, occupations traditionally regulated (such as innkeepers), and those "businesses which, though not public at their inception, may be fairly said to have risen to be such, and have become subject in consequence to some government regulation."

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Economic Regulation; Public Use.)

WOLMAN v. WALTER
433 U.S. 229 (1977)

Ohio's aid plan for independent schools had six components: (1) the loan of textbooks; (2) the supply of standardized testing and scoring material; (3) the provision of diagnostic services aimed at identifying speech, hearing, and psychological problems; (4) the provision, off non-public school premises, of therapeutic, guidance, and remedial services; (5) the loan to pupils of instructional materials such as slide projectors, tape recorders, maps, and scientific gear; and (6) the provision of transportation for field trips similar to the transportation provided public school students.

Justice HARRY BLACKMUN delivered what was in part an opinion of the Supreme Court and in part a PLURALITY OPINION in which only Chief Justice WARREN E. BURGER, Justice POTTER STEWART, and Justice LEWIS F. POWELL joined.

The Court upheld the loan of textbooks, the supply of testing materials, the therapeutic services, and the provision of diagnostic services on non-public school premises. The Court found unconstitutional the provisions for lending secular instructional materials and for field trip transportation.

This case indicated the extent to which the "wall between church and state" was in fact a blurred, indistinct, and variable barrier.

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

WOMAN SUFFRAGE

When American women voted in the election of 1920, they did so for the first time as a constitutional right protected by the NINETEENTH AMENDMENT. The amendment's ratification marked the end of a long struggle that was bound up with both the shifting status of the ballot and the political development of a women's movement.

The struggle, which began formally at the women's rights convention at SENECA FALLS, New York, in 1848, emerged when most states had already dropped their property qualifications for white male voters. "Resolved," averred ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, "that it is the duty of the women of this country to secure to themselves the sacred right to elective franchise." Yet in the context of the mid-nineteenth century the right to elective franchise still was not a national, constitutional issue. Moreover, voting embodied so powerful a symbol of personal autonomy that granting it to women was profoundly controversial. In fact, woman suffrage, as contemporaries called it, barely won the support of the delegates at Seneca Falls.

RECONSTRUCTION transformed woman suffrage into a compelling constitutional issue. The second clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT introduced the word "male" into the Constitution, and the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT, which prohibited abridging the VOTING RIGHTS of black males, was silent on the disfranchisement of females. Inasmuch as the two amendments seemed at once essential to the rights of freedmen and inimical to the cause of woman suffrage, the women's movement divided over their ratification.

The spacious terms of the first clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, however, sparked numerous challenges to women's disfranchisement. SUSAN B. ANTHONY created a dramatic test in the election of 1872 by registering and voting with fifteen other New York women, thereby violating a federal election statute, but her case did not reach the Supreme Court. The case that did was launched by Virginia Minor, who with her attorney-husband, Francis, sued the state of Missouri for restricting suffrage to males. The plaintiff's brief in MINOR V. HAPPERSETT (1875) argued that women had been empowered to vote in federal elections from the inception of the Constitution, had actually voted for a time in New Jersey, and were simply reaffirmed in their right to vote by the terms of the Fourteenth Amendment. The disfranchisement of women, the brief asserted, was a BILL OF ATTAINDER, an infringement on FREEDOM OF SPEECH, a form of involuntary servitude, and a violation not only of DUE PROCESS but of the constitutional guarantee that every state shall have a REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT. In a unanimous decision drafted by Chief Justice MORRISON R. WAITE, the Court ruled that suffrage was neither protected in the original text of the Constitution nor incorporated in the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES of CITIZENSHIP guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

By the 1890s, the drive for suffrage had stalled, despite the unification of the two wings of the women's movement. State-by-state campaigns yielded disappointing results, and after Minor a constitutional amendment was needed to ensure suffrage nationwide. Headway came with the bold campaigns of the Congressional Union (later called the Woman's party), an organization founded in 1913 by Alice Paul and Lucy Burns to replicate the militant tactics of English feminists. Picketing, arrests, and hunger strikes generated attention at a time when resistance to women voting was ebbing. Giving women the vote was regarded increasingly as a way of bringing their domestic concerns into the political arena and therefore as a potential instrument of Progressive reform. The final strategy for victory came from the lobbying efforts of Carrie Chapman Catt, president of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, who not only pulled a recalcitrant WOODROW WILSON into the suffrage camp but also capitalized on the temporary gratitude of the nation for the wartime service of its women.

NORMA BASCH
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Feminist Theory and Constitutional Law; Gender Rights; Progressive Constitutional Thought; Progressivism; Woman Suffrage Movement; Women in Constitutional History.)

Bibliography

DUBOIS, ELLEN CAROL 1987 Outgrowing the Compact of the Fathers: Equal Rights, Woman Suffrage, and the United States Constitution, 1820–1878. Journal of American History 74:836–862.

FLEXNOR, ELEANOR (1959) 1968 Century of Struggle: The Woman's Rights Movement in the United States. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT

The first formal demand for equal political rights for women was made by ELIZABETH CADY STANTON at the 1848 SENECA FALLS CONVENTION. Among the radical pioneers of the early women's rights movement, woman suffrage was at first controversial, because electoral politics was considered disreputable and partisanship fundamentally male. However, after the CIVIL WAR and the abolition of SLAVERY, questions of CITIZENSHIP and enfranchisement had moved to the top of the national political agenda, and woman suffrage was widely accepted by women's rights activists as their foremost demand. At this point we can properly begin to speak about an American woman suffrage movement.

At war's end, woman suffrage leaders expected that white women would win the franchise along with freedmen and freedwomen via the establishment of universal suffrage. However, the Republican authors of the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT refused to include "sex" alongside "race, color and previous condition of servitude" as federally prohibited disfranchisements. The woman suffrage forces disagreed over how to deal with this setback, as a result of which two rival organizations were formed. In one last effort to secure woman suffrage as part of RECONSTRUCTION, one of these societies, the National Woman Suffrage Association, developed an innovative constitutional argument. They contended that women as well as men had been made national citizens by the first clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT; inasmuch as the franchise must be regarded as the defining right of citizenship, women thus already possessed the ballot and had merely to exercise it. In 1875, in MINOR V. HAPPERSETT the Supreme Court ruled against this construction and held that while women were indeed citizens, voting was not a right but a privilege, which could be constitutionally denied to women.

Over the next decades, the woman suffrage movement gained adherents. Of greatest importance was the endorsement of woman suffrage, as the best means to control liquor and protect the home, by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union under the leadership of Frances Willard. By 1890, woman suffrage, which had begun as a radical demand among a handful of antebellum ultraist reformers, was gaining ground among respectable, politically mainstream middle-class American women. That year, the two suffrage societies buried their differences and combined to form the National American Woman Suffrage Association. As woman suffrage became more acceptable, the movement, which had been forged in the fires of abolition and emancipation, became increasingly racist in its arguments and organizations. Nonetheless, in these same years African American women, who well knew the power of the vote, actively pursued votes for women through their own pro-suffrage societies, such as the National Association of Colored Women.

The constitutional upheavals of the Reconstruction era had left unresolved the question of where SOVEREIGNTY over the electorate lay, with the several states or with the federal government. Through the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, while the progress to federal woman suffrage was stalled, advocates of votes for women concentrated on securing their goal by amending the constitutions of particular states. In 1869 and 1870, respectively, the territorial legislatures of Wyoming and Utah enacted woman suffrage provisions, which were retained when they became states in the 1890s. In 1893, Colorado became the first state in which the male electorate voted to amend the state constitution so as to grant women full VOTING RIGHTS. Idaho (1896), Washington (1910), and California (1911) followed. By 1912, there were ten "woman suffrage states," all west of the Mississippi. In the East, however, the "state method" could not prevail. In 1915, voters in four major eastern states—New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts—decisively defeated woman suffrage referenda. At this point, woman suffragists turned their attention back to winning a federal amendment.

By the first decade of the twentieth century, the suffrage movement itself was also changing. Steady growth in the female labor force and massive immigration altered both the composition and approaches of suffragism. New suffrage organizations oriented toward wage-earning women were founded in New York, Boston, and San Francisco. Female college graduates, whose numbers were growing, also flooded into the movement. The suffragist tactical arsenal was reinvented as well, as advocates moved their demands into public spaces, organized mass parades, conducted automobile caravans, and became adept at street-corner speaking.

As an expression of these changes, a second national organization, the Congressional Union (subsequently known as the Woman's Party) was formed in 1913. Its goal was to pursue more aggressively a woman suffrage amendment to the federal Constitution. Known as the "militants," this new wing turned to the voting women of the ten "suffrage states," urging women to vote against the reelection of President WOODROW WILSON in 1916 to punish the Democrats for refusing to support a federal suffrage amendment. Once the United States entered WORLD WAR I, however, the militants switched from electoral methods to civil disobedience, picketing the White House, for which many were arrested and jailed. Meanwhile, the majority of American suffragists, who were associated with the moderate National American Woman Suffrage Association, continued to rely on congressional lobbying.

By 1920, the combination of these approaches, plus the political transformations following the war, finally led to the passage and ratification of the NINETEENTH AMENDMENT to the Constitution, which prohibited the states from disfranchising its citizens on the grounds of sex.

ELLEN CAROL DUBOIS
(2000)

Bibliography

DUBOIS, ELLEN CAROL 1978 Feminism and Suffrage. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press.

——— 1998 Woman Suffrage and Women's Rights. New York: New York University Press.

FLEXNER, ELEANOR and FITZPATRICK, ELLEN 1996 Century of Struggle: The Woman's Rights Movement in the United States. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

KRADITOR, AILEEN 1965 Ideas of the Woman Suffrage Movement, 1890–1920. New York: Columbia University Press.

WHEELER, MARJORIE SPRUILL, ed. 1995 One Woman, One Vote:

Rediscovering the Suffrage Movement. Troutdale, Oregon: New Sage Press.

WOMEN IN CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY

At first glance, women seem missing from much of the historical landscape of the Constitution, and in the few instances where they do appear, they suffer negative consequences for their legal status. Before the CIVIL WAR sex did not even figure as a contested constitutional classification, and for a century after the war virtually every effort to eradicate its discriminatory aspects met with defeat at the hands of the Supreme Court. Indeed, until the 1970s, when the Court began to apply closer scrutiny to sex as a discriminatory category, the Constitution seems to have treated women as women with either casual indifference or zealous paternalism. Yet, on closer inspection, the role of gender in the life of the Constitution has been longer, larger, and more subtle than this first impression suggests. The constitutional status of gender, moreover, has been shaped by shifting conceptions of legal equality, the evolving relationship between the states and the federal government, and the changing circumstances in women's day-to-day lives.

FEDERALISM goes a long way toward illuminating the constitutional role of gender in the first stage of its development. Given the sharp delineation between the appropriate rights and duties of men and women in both the life and the law of the early Republic, the original text of the Constitution, which employs terms such as "persons," is remarkably gender-neutral. The Framers could afford to be gender-neutral in their language precisely because state laws were gender-specific. The Framers were hardly indifferent, then, to gender as a legal classification; rather, federalism obviated the need to frame it in national constitutional terms.

State statutes and constitutions spelled out the exclusion of women from the political process, while COMMON LAW assumptions and precedents informed their legal disabilities. The principles of coverture, which placed a married woman under the tutelage of her husband, influenced legal attitudes toward women in general. Of course, single women, unlike their married counterparts, could enter into contracts, sue, and be sued. However, the tendency of the law to define all women as wives and mothers rather than as citizens, property owners, or wage earners, or as dependent and relative rather than as independent and autonomous, was pervasive in constitutional approaches to gender. But reform efforts to define the role of women more broadly were also pervasive. They began officially in the 1840s when women's rights advocates organized to demand both legal and political equality at the state level, and these efforts have animated new conceptions of constitutional equality from the antebellum era to the present day.

After the Civil War, gender entered into formal constitutional discourse largely as a corollary of race. Although the second section of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT incorporated the word "male" into the Constitution, the DUE PROCESS and EQUAL PROTECTION clauses of the first section held the potential to apply to gender as well as to race. The consequences for women were ambiguous. On the one hand, SEX DISCRIMINATION acquired a new legitimacy as a result of constitutional tests of the RECONSTRUCTION amendments; on the other hand, it became a legal issue that was suffused with constitutional import.

Nonetheless, postbellum efforts to enhance the constitutional status of women via judicial decision failed miserably. In BRADWELL V. ILLINOIS (1873), the Supreme Court denied Myra Bradwell's claim that her right to practice law was among the PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES of citizenship protected under the Fourteenth Amendment. In MINOR V. HAPPERSETT (1875), the Court denied that Missouri's restriction of suffrage to males violated the privileges and immunities of Virginia Minor's citizenship. And despite admitting Belva Lockwood to practice before its bar, the Court in In re Lockwood (1894) held that states could apply the word "person" in the Fourteenth Amendment to men only.

However, legal equality between women and men was not a consistent goal of the women's movement, and by the turn of the century, female reformers were clearly selective in their support of it. They backed special protective labor legislation for women workers not only in the hope that such legislation would be extended to all workers but also in the belief that long hours and hazardous working conditions were particularly injurious to women as potential mothers. If in hindsight their arguments seem oblivious to the constitutional risks of protecting women exclusively and to the disadvantages created for women in the labor market, in their own day they evoked a powerful appeal.

That appeal was perhaps best encapsulated in the voluminous BRANDEIS BRIEF, written for MULLER V. OREGON (1908), a case in which the Court upheld maximum-hour laws for women and thereby exempted them from a laissez-faire commitment to the principle of FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. The rationale in the brief remained popular among progressive reformers long after Muller. Indeed, by the 1920s the vast majority of women who had worked for women's political equality by supporting the NINETEENTH AMENDMENT were against the proposed EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT largely because they feared its effects on special health and labor legislation for women. The Supreme Court, however, was now prepared to view women as the complete equals of men, at least with regard to their capacity to contract for wages. In ADKINS V. CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL (1923), the Court undermined statutory attempts to put a floor under women's wages by invalidating a DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA MINIMUM WAGE LAW. Underscoring the equality women enjoyed as a result of the Nineteenth Amendment, the Adkins opinion applied the principle of freedom of contract to women workers without overtly overturning Muller, and Adkins itself was not overruled until WEST COAST HOTEL CO. V. PARRISH (1938).

Efforts to apply the equal protection clause to sex as a discriminatory classification met with further defeats in the post-WORLD WAR II era. In GOESAERT V. CLEARY (1948), for example, adjudicated at a time when men were returning to jobs that had been filled temporarily by women, the Court upheld a Michigan statute prohibiting a woman from selling or serving liquor unless she was the wife or daughter of the tavernkeeper. Equal protection, the decision averred, did not require perfect symmetry, and in Hoyt v. Florida (1961) the Court relied on similar reasoning to reject an effort to block sex discrimination in the jury selection process.

Yet as women entered the work force in unprecedented numbers after World War II and as the divorce rate soared, it became even harder to sustain the old legal prototype of protection and dependence. As a result of a burgeoning CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT and a revitalized women's movement, the analogies between sex and race as discriminatory categories came to the forefront of constitutional discourse in the 1960s, and they were applied in turn to a host of new federal CIVIL RIGHTS statutes. Significant breakthroughs in the constitutional status of women came in the 1970s not only with the heightened judicial scrutiny of sex discrimination but also with the growing legitimation of REPRODUCTIVE AUTONOMY. No less important symbolically was the 1981 appointment of SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR, the first woman to serve as a Justice of the Supreme Court.

The change in constitutional attitudes toward gender was heralded by Reed v. Reed (1971), a decision that invalidated a statutory preference for males in appointing the administrators of intestate estates on the ground of the law's inherent irrationality. Inasmuch as the state's purposes were "as well served by a gender-neutral classification as one that gender-classifies and therefore carries with it the baggage of sexual stereotypes," the Court determined that the state "cannot be permitted to classify on the basis of sex." FRONTIERO V. RICHARDSON (1973), the closest the Court came to regarding sex as a suspect classification, struck down a rule that disadvantaged the dependents of servicewomen, relative to the dependents of servicemen, in calculating dependency benefits. A series of subsequent cases equalized Social Security payments, welfare benefits, and workers' compensation. Stanton v. Stanton (1975) ruled that girls were entitled to child support up to the same age as boys; Orr v. Orr (1979) held that a state law could not exempt women of means from paying alimony on the same basis as men; and CRAIG V. BOREN (1976) invalidated a law that differentiated between the sexes in setting the statutory age for buying 3.2 percent beer.

Clearly the decision that most dramatically altered both the lives and the status of women in this blizzard of judicial reinterpretation was ROE V. WADE (1973), which followed the rationale the Court had used in GRISWOLD V. CONNECTICUT (1965) to prohibit a state ban on BIRTH CONTROL. The Roe decision, which struck down a Texas statute defining ABORTION as a criminal offense, did so not on the equality-based theory that it was a violation of women's rights but rather on the ground that it violated an implied constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY. Nonetheless, except for the last trimester of pregnancy, the Roe opinion significantly subordinated the power of the state to that of a woman and her doctor.

However, ambivalence toward scrutinizing sex discrimination strictly was evident in many quarters. Even as the Court moved toward upholding equal rights for women through its reinterpretations of the equal protection clause, it never subjected its scrutiny of sex to the same rigorous standards that it applied to race, and there were some indications in the 1980s of a retreat from the stance it had taken in the 1970s. Because the issues were by no means simple, to cite rules on pregnancy leave as one example, there were radical feminists as well as conservative women who continued to support preferential or differential treatment for women. Furthermore, the right of reproductive autonomy, a hotly contested issue that right-to-life adherents elevated into a political litmus test for candidates at all levels of government, became especially vulnerable to inroads by the end of the 1980s. Finally, the political campaign for women's constitutional rights stalled on a distinct note of defeat. The failure of the EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT to be ratified by three-quarters of the states after it had passed Congress meant that the Constitution still stood without a discrete provision on which to ground the eradication of the remaining sex inequalities in state law, much less to prevent new ones from emerging.

NORMA BASCH
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Anthony, Susan Brownell; Feminist Theory; Gender Rights; Labor and the Constitution; Labor Movement; Racial Discrimination; Stanton, Elizabeth Cady; Woman Suffrage; Women Suffrage Movement.)

Bibliography

BAER, JUDITH 1986 The Chains of Protection: The Judicial Response to Women's Labor Legislation. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

BERRY, MARY FRANCES 1986 Why Era Failed: Politics, Women's Rights, and the Amending Process of the Constitution. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

WONG KIM ARK, UNITED STATES v.
169 U.S. 649 (1898)

This case, decided at a time when prejudice against people of Chinese ancestry was widespread, maintained the integrity of the CITIZENSHIP clause of section one of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Congressional legislation, known as the CHINESE EXCLUSION ACTS, denied citizenship to Chinese immigrants, and a treaty with China provided that no subject of China in the United States could be naturalized. Neither the exclusion acts nor the treaty applied in this case, however, because Wong Kim Ark had been born in San Francisco. When he was about twenty-one he visited his parents who had returned to China after living in the United States approximately twenty years. On his return to San Francisco, he was denied entry to the United States on the grounds that he was not a citizen. The Supreme Court held, 6–2, that the government's policy in refusing NATURALIZATION to persons of Chinese ancestry could not constitutionally be applied to anyone born in the United States whose parents, regardless of ancestry, were domiciled in this country and did not have diplomatic status.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WONG SUN v. UNITED STATES
371 U.S. 471 (1963)

In Wong Sun the Supreme Court held that an incriminating oral statement made by a suspect that derives immediately from his unlawful arrest is inadmissible in evidence as a FRUIT OF THE POISONOUS TREE, no less than the derivative EVIDENCE obtained from an unlawful search, as in SILVERTHORNE V. UNITED STATES (1920), or from unlawful wiretapping, as in NARDONE V. UNITED STATES (1939). However, when the taint of the earlier illegality is dissipated (as it was in this case, by a suspect voluntarily returning to make a statement several days after his arraignment and release on his own recognizance), the evidence is admissible.

In addition, Wong Sun contributed to the elaboration of PROBABLE CAUSE standards by holding that flight from an officer is not in itself such a strong inference of guilt as to establish probable cause for an arrest.

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

WOOD v. STRICKLAND
420 U.S. 308 (1975)

This was an early case in the development of EXECUTIVE IMMUNITY from DAMAGES in CIVIL RIGHTS actions alleging constitutional violations. The case involved the liability of school board members for alleged violations of students' DUE PROCESS rights. The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice BYRON R. WHITE, clarified its holding in SCHEUER V. RHODES (1974) by expressly stating that the good faith defense of executive officials contained both subjective and objective elements. An official must subjectively believe he is doing right and must not act in "ignorance or disregard of settled, indisputable law." Harlow v. Fitzgerald (1982) later undermined the subjective component of Wood's test. (See NIXON V. FITZGERALD.)

THEODORE EISENBERG
(1986)

WOODBURY, LEVI
(1789–1851)

Levi Woodbury was a New Hampshire lawyer, state supreme court justice (1817–1823), governor (1823–1824), United States senator (1825–1831; 1841–1842), secretary of the navy (1831–1834), secretary of the treasury (1834–1841), and United States Supreme Court Justice (1845–1851). A staunch Jacksonian Democrat, Woodbury supported territorial expansion, STRICT CONSTRUCTION, and STATES' RIGHTS, while opposing the BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, abolitionists, and high tariffs. Although a conservative, Woodbury advocated public schools, female education, and prison reform. He personally disliked slavery but believed it was constitutionally protected and that all agitation over it should cease.

On the New Hampshire bench Woodbury supported the state in DARTMOUTH COLLEGE V. WOODWARD (1819). As treasury secretary, Woodbury continued President ANDREW JACKSON's Bank War and advocated an independent treasury. He believed that Congress lacked constitutional power to recharter the Bank, and as late as 1841 he asserted that MCCULLOCH V. MARYLAND (1819) neither set a valid precedent nor determined the constitutionality of any future bank charter.

In 1830, as a senator, Woodbury criticized the Supreme Court for its "manifest and sleepless opposition . . . to the strict construction of the Constitution" which had created "a diseased enlargement of the powers of the General Government and throwing chains over States-Rights. . . ." Woodbury attempted to stop these tendencies in his brief tenure on the Supreme Court. In the LICENSE CASES (1847), Woodbury joined the majority in upholding state PROHIBITION statues. In the PASSENGER CASES (1849), he asserted, in dissent, that states could constitutionally regulate immigrants without violating the Constitution's COMMERCE CLAUSE. In LUTHER V. BORDEN (1848), he agreed with the majority that the case involved a POLITICAL QUESTION beyond the court's JURISDICTION, but he nevertheless modified his states' rights position to condemn the use of martial law in Rhode Island. In Warning v. Clarke (1847), he again dissented, this time to assert state jurisdiction over navigable rivers. In a rare deviation from his states' rights philosophy, Woodbury wrote the majority opinion in Planters' Bank v. Sharpe (1848), overturning a Mississippi statute and court decision because both impaired the OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS in violation of the Constitution.

Woodbury's most important majority opinion was written in Jones v. Van Zandt (1847), where he upheld a particularly harsh interpretation of the Fugitive Slave Law of 1793. Van Zandt, an Ohio Quaker, had given a ride to a group of blacks walking on a road in Ohio. Woodbury held Van Zandt financially liable for the escape of these fugitive slaves, even though at the time Van Zandt had no notice they were fugitives. Woodbury asserted that the Constitution had "flung its shield" over slavery, giving masters a COMMON LAW right to recapture their property. Woodbury held that the Fugitive Slave Law was a constitutionally proper enforcement of this right. Somewhat inconsistently, he then asserted that slavery itself was "a political question, settled by each State for itself." In 1848 Woodbury sought the presidential nomination. He was considered a likely candidate in 1852, because his Van Zandt opinion gave him southern support, while as a Northerner he might get grudging support from Free Soil Democrats. He campaigned for the nomination from the bench until his death in 1851.

PAUL FINKELMAN
(1986)

Bibliography

GATELL, FRANK O. 1968 Levi Woodbury. Pages 843–872 in Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, eds., The Justices of the United States Supreme Court, 1789–1969: Their Lives and Major Opinions. New York: Chelsea House.

WOODRUFF v. PARHAM
8 Wallace 123 (1869)

Woodruff produced a retreat from the broad enunciation of the ORIGINAL PACKAGE DOCTRINE in BROWN V. MARYLAND (1827). In that case Chief Justice JOHN MARSHALL had said in an OBITER DICTUM that the DOCTRINE applied "equally to importations from a sister State. . . ." In this case the city of Mobile, Alabama, had taxed various commodities and transactions including goods imported from other states and sold in their original and unbroken packages. Woodruff alleged that this tax violated the constitutional clause forbidding state IMPOSTS or duties on imports. The Court ruled unanimously that the clause applied only to goods imported from foreign countries. Because the tax did not discriminate against the products of other states, it did not burden INTERSTATE COMMERCE.) In effect, the Court limited the original package doctrine to FOREIGN COMMERCE.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WOODS, WILLIAM B.
(1824–1887)

William Burnham Woods of Ohio was appointed to the Supreme Court in 1880 after eleven years of service as United States circuit judge for the Fifth Circuit. His tenure on the Supreme Court was brief (1881–1887); virtually all of his OPINIONS for the Court dealt with private law questions that came up under DIVERSITY JURISDICTION. He is remembered primarily for his collaboration with Justice JOSEPH P. BRADLEY, first on circuit, then on the Supreme Court, in the formulation of a jurisprudence for the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. Although initially disposed to give the amendment a BROAD CONSTRUCTION, Woods ultimately retreated in the face of a more circumspect majority on the Supreme Court.

Woods's first meeting with Bradley, who had been assigned to the circuit upon his appointment to the Supreme Court, occurred at New Orleans in 1870. There they advanced a broad interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment's PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES clause in Live Stock Dealers & Butchers Assn. v. Crescent City Co. & Board of Metropolitan Police (1870), the first case, Woods noted in the report, in which the amendment was fully considered by a federal tribunal. The privileges and immunities of United States citizens, they contended, embraced all "fundamental rights," including that of pursuing any lawful employment in a lawful manner. "It is possible," Bradley admitted, "that those who framed the article were not themselves aware of the far reaching character of its terms," but its language clearly applied "as well to white as colored persons" and protected the rights of both against arbitrary state laws. Working from memoranda prepared by Bradley, Woods indicated in United States v. Hall (1871) that FREEDOM OF SPEECH and FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY were among the FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment, opening the door for IN-CORPORATION of the BILL OF RIGHTS through the privileges and immunities clause. Over the dissents of Bradley and three others, however, the Supreme Court rejected each of these pioneering doctrinal formulations in the landmark SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES (1873). Eleven years later, in BUTCHERS UNION SLAUGHTERHOUSE CO V. CRESCENT CITY LIVE STOCK CO. (1884), Woods joined with Bradley and Justices STEPHEN J. FIELD and JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN in one last trenchant protest against the majority's emasculation of the privileges and immunities clause. Woods surrendered altogether in Presser v. Illinois (1886), where he spoke for a unanimous Court in holding that the Bill of Rights was a limitation only on the power of the federal government and in no way restricted the states.

Woods's initial construction of Congress's affirmative powers under the Fourteenth Amendment was especially spacious. In Hall, the case of first impression, Woods overruled defendants' demurrer to a conspiracy INDICTMENT under the Civil Rights Act of 1870. A federal statute punishing private action such as assault, he asserted, was certainly an "appropriate" exercise of national power, for "denying the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS included the omission to protect, as well as the omission to pass laws for protection." (See STATE ACTION.) In UNITED STATES V. CRUIKSHANK (1874), however, Bradley led a retreat from this position. There counsel for the defendants again attacked the constitutionality of the conspiracy measure, insisting that it usurped the state's exclusive JURISDICTION over crimes such as murder. Woods disagreed and stood on the DOCTRINE advanced in his Hall opinion. But Bradley conceded that protection of rights against private action was primarily the duty of the states, and his views prevailed in the Supreme Court. Woods then abandoned the Hall formulation. Seven years later in UNITED STATES V. HARRIS (1883), his most important Supreme Court opinion, Woods prominently displayed his penchant for following the lead of others. The results were tragic. In Harris he not only embraced Bradley's Cruikshank position but also invalidated the Ku Klux Klan Act (FORCE ACT OF1871) on the grounds that it failed to restrict criminal liability to persons who conspired to divest rights because of the victim's race. As drafted, Woods explained for the Court, the statute covered instances even where whites assaulted whites; consequently it was "broader than is warranted" by the Thirteenth Amendment.

CHARLES W. MCCURDY
(1986)

Bibliography

FILLER, LOUIS 1969 William B. Woods. In Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel (eds.), The Justices of the United States Supreme Court 1789–1969: Their Lives and Major Opinions. Pp. 1327–1336. New York: Chelsea House.

FRANTZ, LAURENT B. 1964 Congressional Power to Enforce the Fourteenth Amendment against Private Acts. Yale Law Journal 73:1353–1384.

WOODS v. CLOYD W. MILLER COMPANY

333 U.S. 138 (1948)

A unanimous Supreme Court here upheld the Housing and Rent Act of 1947 which had extended wartime price controls into peacetime. Writing for the Court, Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS declared that legislation adopted under the WAR POWERS could constitutionally be continued in effect in economically essential areas of public policy even after the cessation of hostilities.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

WOODSON v. NORTH CAROLINA

See: Capital Punishment Cases of 1976

WORCESTER v. GEORGIA

See: Cherokee Indian Cases

WORKERS' COMPENSATION LEGISLATION

Workers' compensation legislation provides workers compensation for losses resulting from injury, disablement, or death when the losses result from work-related accidents, casualties, or disease. The legislation replaces TORT liability with a schedule of benefits based upon the loss or impairment of the wage-earning capacity of the worker. All fifty states in the Union have workers' compensation statutes.

Under the COMMON LAW, employers often were able to defeat employees' tort actions by invoking the doctrines of contributory negligence, negligence of fellow servants, or assumption of risk. Frequently the employer did not even need these defenses, for the employee first had to prove the employer's negligence in order to recover. Accordingly, many victims of work-related injuries went uncompensated.

In order to extend the protection afforded workers and to contain costly and time-consuming litigation of industrial accidents, states enacted workers' compensation legislation with no requirement of negligence or fault as a prerequisite to liability. Employers were simultaneously protected against what were perceived to be excessively large JUDGMENTS through a limited and determinant payout. The statutes essentially substitute a system of insurance for liability based on fault.

In Ives v. South Buffalo Railway Company (1911) New York's highest court struck down the state's first compulsory compensation requirements as unconstitutional, on the ground that they violated the state and federal DUE PROCESS clauses. However, the Supreme Court held in NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY V. WHITE (1917) that a compulsory compensation system does not violate the United States Constitution, at least for "hazardous employment." In the case of the New York statute, New York promptly amended its constitution to authorize compulsory plans.

The general rule in this area of law is that if an injury is fully or partly covered by the statute, the statutory remedy is exclusive. Many jurisdictions do not allow compensation for injuries caused by a worker's willful misconduct or unreasonable failure to observe safety rules or use safety devices.

WILLIAM B. GOULD
(1986)

Bibliography

MALONE, WEX S. et al. 1980 Cases and Materials on Workers' Compensation and Employment Rights, 2nd ed. St. Paul, Minn: West Publishing Co.

WORKPLACE HARASSMENT AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT, I

Workplace harassment law punishes speech that is "severe or pervasive" enough to create a "hostile, abusive, or offensive work environment" based on race, religion, sex, national origin, age, disability, or veteran status and, in some jurisdictions, sexual orientation, marital status, or political affiliation.

This is a broad standard, and courts have applied it broadly. Courts have imposed liability based on religious proselytizing, sexually themed jokes, offensive political statements, and other speech that is generally entitled to full FIRST AMENDMENT protection. They have even gone so far as to enjoin private employees from, for instance, any "remarks or slurs contrary to their fellow employees' religious beliefs," and "any and all offensive . . . speech implicating considerations of race."

The breadth of harassment law is exacerbated by its VAGUENESS, and by the fact that it must be enforced by employers. To prevent liability, a cautious employer must suppress any statement that, when aggregated with other statements, may be found by a jury to create an "offensive work environment." This risk causes many employment experts to urge employers to, for instance, take down even legitimate sexually suggestive art, suppress all sexually themed jokes, and "proscribe all speech . . . that may constitute [religious] harassment."

Does harassment law infringe the FREEDOM OF SPEECH? It is a content- and viewpoint-based restriction on speech. It is imposed by the government acting as sovereign, not as employer or proprietor. It does not fit within the traditional exceptions to free speech protections, such as FIGHTING WORDS or OBSCENITY. It cannot be salvaged through a CAPTIVE AUDIENCE argument, because courts have long recognized that, outside the home, people must often be captive to offensive speech (for instance, picket lines that call them "scab," and that they must see twice a day for many weeks). And it cannot fit into a workplace speech exception, because the cases have (correctly) recognized no such exception: The lunchroom or office water cooler is where many Americans talk about social and political questions; and virtually every place, including a street, a university, or a library is, after all, someone's workplace.

Of course, private employers may restrict their employees' speech without First Amendment problems; the First Amendment applies only to government action. But harassment law involves the government's pressuring employers to restrict their employees' speech, on pain of multimillion-dollar liability. Private colleges, private newspaper owners, private commercial landlords, and private employers certainly can restrict speech on their own property; but this right does not empower the government to require that these property owners impose such restrictions.

A useful thought experiment is to imagine a law that says: "Any employer who tolerates speech critical of soldiers shall be liable to lawsuits by veterans and relatives of soldiers killed in action who find that such speech creates an offensive work environment for them." (This is actually not far from what veteran-status harassment law does.) Surely this law would be condemned as unconstitutional; and in most respects, harassment law is structurally similar to this proposal.

Lower courts are all over the map on this question; in coming years, the Supreme Court probably will have to resolve it and decide under what conditions harassment law, when applied to otherwise protected speech, is constitutional. (To the extent that harassment law also punishes sexual extortion, unwanted physical conduct, and speech that is otherwise proscribable, such as threats, it poses no First Amendment difficulty.)

EUGENE VOLOKH
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Employee Speech Rights (Private).)

Bibliography

BROWNE, KINGSLEY R. 1991 Title VII as Censorship: Hostile-Environment Harassment and the First Amendment. Ohio State Law Journal 52:481–550.

EPSTEIN, DEBORAH 1996 Can a "Dumb Ass Woman" Achieve Equality in the Workplace? Running the Gauntlet of Hostile Environment Harassing Speech. Georgetown Law Journal 84:399–451.

ESTLUND, CYNTHIA 1997 Freedom of Expression in the Workplace and the Problem of Discriminatory Harassment. Texas Law Review 75:687–777.

VOLOKH, EUGENE 1992 Freedom of Speech and Workplace Harassment Law. UCLA Law Review 39:1791–1872.

——— 1997 What Speech Does "Hostile Work Environment" Harassment Law Restrict? Georgetown Law Journal 85:627–648.

WORKPLACE HARASSMENT AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT, II

Claims of sexual and racial harassment have been routinely adjudicated by courts on statutory and constitutional grounds as discrimination for twenty-five years in cases in which many or most of the acts being litigated have been words, pictures, and expressive conduct. Although most sexual and racial harassment plaintiffs seek relief for verbal and other arguably expressive conduct, including threats and rape, in only a very few instances have defendants even attempted to claim that such activity, while actionable as discrimination, is nonetheless protected from judicial redress by the FREEDOM OF SPEECH guarantee of the FIRST AMENDMENT. Defendants have not claimed that saying "have sex with me or you're fired" or "sleep with me and I'll give you an A" or hanging a noose over an African American's desk and posting Ku Klux Klan literature is First Amendment protected expression at work and at school, where—unlike in the rest of society—equality is legally guaranteed. Sexual and racial harassment have been treated as acts rather than as speech.

Those cases that have frontally addressed the potential legal conflict between equality and speech at work have centered on the presence and use of PORNOGRAPHY. In the two such cases to date, Robinson v. Jacksonville Shipyards (1991) and Johnson v. Los Angeles (1994), one court held that the pornography displays were actionable as discrimination; the other held that they were protected speech, so long as the materials were used privately.

In schools, the question of a possible conflict between equality rights and speech rights in the harassment setting has been adjudicated principally in the context of free expression challenges to antidiscrimination procedures in public universities. In two leading actions in which this challenge has been made, Doe v. University of Michigan (1989) and UMW Post, Inc. v. Board of Regents (1991), both focusing on the schools' prohibitions on racist and homophobic HATE SPEECH, the procedures lost. The equality interest that might have supported the procedures was barely raised, however.

Legal academics have produced a substantial theoretical literature arguing both sides of this question that the world of practice has treated as a virtual nonissue.

The ultimate resolution of any tension in this unsettled area remains in doubt. The Supreme Court's major PRECEDENT in the area, R. A. V. V. CITY OF ST. PAUL (1992), invalidated a local bias-crime ordinance under the First Amendment in its application to an incident of cross-burning as an impermissible restraint on free speech on the basis of content. Yet the ruling appeared to permit the prohibition of sexually derogatory words under Title VII. Although St. Paul's statute was found to reach too broadly into protected expression, the question remains open whether acts legally actionable as sexual harassment, including those found to create discriminatorily hostile environments when sexually abusive conduct is severe or pervasive, will be found to be protected by the free speech guarantee.

Given the fact that, where STATE ACTION exists, sexual harassment claims are also recognized under the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT EQUAL PROTECTION clause, a potential for conflict between two clauses of the Constitution arises. The First Amendment may thereby be challenged to adapt to equality rights that were not part of the original Constitution.

CATHARINE A. MACKINNON
(2000)

(SEE ALSO: Employee Speech Rights (Private); Racial Discrimination; Sex Discrimination.)

Bibliography

BECKER, MARY 1996 How Free is Speech at Work? UC Davis Law Review 29:815–873.

BROWNE, KINGSLEY R. 1991 Title VII As Censorship: Hostile Environment Harassment and the First Amendment. Ohio State Law Journal 52:481–550.

FALLON, RICHARD H., JR. 1994 Sexual Harassment, Content Neutrality, and the First Amendment Dog That Didn't Bark. Supreme Court Review 1994:1–56.

MACKINNON, CATHARINE A. 1993 Only Words. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

VOLOKH, EUGENE 1997 What Speech Does "Hostile Work Environment" Harassment Law Restrict? Georgetown Law Journal 85:627–648.

WORLD WAR I

The United States entered World War I on a note of Wilsonian idealism, but the shattering experience of wartime mobilization ended the era of PROGRESSIVISM. Broad federal powers, previously used to further domestic reforms, were expanded to meet the demands of international conflict. These changes accelerated the trends toward national centralization and executive authority. Thus, ironically, WOODROW WILSON, who had been elected on a platform of firm but limited government control, brought Leviathan to the nation.

With little in the way of precedents, Congress and the President were pressed to extend national government control to a vast new range of complex subjects. The result was multitudinous delegations of power to President Wilson, designed to allow the executive branch to develop programs to meet the changing requirements of a fluid war situation. The breadth of this legislation was startling. Acts to achieve wartime economic mobilization and efficient use of natural resources were augmented by a SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT vesting the President with authority to raise an army by conscription. Espionage and sedition legislation afforded power to punish dissenting expression that might impede the war effort. The Trading with the Enemy Act gave the government power to control trade with enemy nations and to become an alien-property custodian for the duration of the war. The same measure authorized censorship of all communications by mail, cable, radio, or otherwise with foreign countries, and gave the postmaster general almost absolute censorship powers over the American foreign-language press. More sweepingly, the act empowered the chief executive to take over and operate the rail and water transportation systems of the country, along with the telegraph and telephone systems. In creating a modified executive dictatorship for the war period, these actions also raised complex constitutional questions, the answers to which reflected crisis pressures.

The LEVER FOOD AND DRUG CONTROL ACT of 1917 is a case in point. One of the most important war measures, it authorized broad federal control of the domestic economy, a sphere of regulation traditionally reserved to the states. The law gave the President virtually unlimited discretionary power to license the manufacture and distribution of food and related commodities, to take over and operate mines and factories, to regulate exchanges, and to fix commodity prices. The measures precipitated a bitter debate in Congress. Critics called it a violation of the TENTH AMENDMENT and thus of STATES' RIGHTS, but Congress enacted it on a theory of the WAR POWERS and on the argument that the industries controlled were affected with a public interest. During the war, the act was not challenged in court. In United States v. L. Cohen Grocery Co. (1921) the Supreme Court voided the price-fixing provision, which failed to specify what constituted unjust process. By concentrating on the detailed phrasing of only one section, the Court implicitly accepted the broad grant of power. Indeed, it did not reach the issue of the government's authority to regulate prices under the war power. The Court thus recognized that the requirements of modern war left little FEDERALISM in wartime.

Another example of expanding federal power and increased executive authority was presidential seizure and governmental operation of the nation's rail networks. As early as 1916, the Army Appropriations Act had authorized the President "'in time of war . . . to take possession and assume control of any system of transportation." After Wilson took over the railroads in 1917, Congress passed the Railway Administration Act of 1918, providing for government operation of the rails and compensation of their owners. The Court upheld this executive seizure in Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. North Dakota (1919), Chief Justice EDWARD D. WHITE invoking Congress's war powers, which, he argued, reach as far as necessary to meet the emergency. The Court also approved the government's takeover of telephone and telegraph lines in a series of cases argued with the railroad suit, notably Dakota Central Telephone Co. v. South Dakota (1919).

The wartime period also brought the long crusade for PROHIBITION to a successful conclusion. The Lever Act, under the mandate of preserving scarce food resources, authorized the President to limit or forbid the use of foodstuffs for production of alcoholic beverages. Beginning in December 1917, Wilson issued a series of war proclamations that in effect established near total prohibition. Congress joined in, passing the Wartime Prohibition Act in November 1918, prohibiting the manufacture or distribution of alcoholic beverages until the war came to a formal end and demobilization had been completed.

In the meantime, Congress had approved the EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT, which the states ratified in January 1919, although not without an attack on the constitutionality of the amendment, the first time such action had taken place. Subsequently, a case reached the Supreme Court, Rhode Island v. Palmer (1920), where a large number of "wet" attorneys submitted briefs against the measure. The Constitution, they contended, had not created an unlimited amendment power, and ordinary legislation should not be made part of it. Thus, the Eighteenth Amendment had exceeded legitimate amending limits. Second, they argued that Section 2 altered traditional lines of authority by giving both Congress and the states concurrent enforcement powers, thereby undermining the federal system. The Court brushed aside these and other arguments, seeing no radical invasion of the original POLICE POWER of the states.

The Overman bill came before Congress in early 1918 and provoked substantial resistance to further expansion of presidential authority. The measure was inspired by a desire to introduce some order and flexibility into the chaotic welter of wartime bureaus, commissions, and other special agencies, and to straighten out overlapping jurisdictions that were creating administrative confusion. The measure gave the President a blank check to reorganize the executive agencies "as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred on any executive department." The act was to remain in force until a year after the close of the war. By its terms the President could reassign any function, no matter where it had been lodged previously, even if Congress had specifically given that responsibility to a particular agency. The bill imposed no checks on presidential discretion and provided no standards for evaluating the executive's conduct.

The constitutionality of the measure elicited vigorous debate. Supporting senators argued that the bill was a necessity and that it was limited, for the President could create no new functions but merely transfer those already in existence. But critics argued that the bill could not be justified by the war power, for many departments and functions unrelated to the war might be affected by its terms. Republican Senator Frank Brandagee of Connecticut denounced the bill as an attempt to force Congress to "abdicate completely its legislative power and confer it upon the executive branch of the government." The measure passed in the SENATE in late April, with the majority senators overlooking constitutional doubts. A bitter Brandagee then offered an ironic amendment, providing that "if any power, constitutional or not, has been inadvertently omitted from this bill, it is hereby granted in full." The Overman Act, like the Lever Act, demonstrated that ordinary restraints upon delegation of legislative power to the President had been shelved for the duration of the war. The Supreme Court was not afforded an opportunity to pass on the act's constitutionality.

President Wilson wisely did not exercise the tremendous authority delegated to him by this measure and previous ones. Instead, he used ordinance-making powers to establish a series of commissions, boards, bureaus, and government-owned corporations to carry on wartime functions. These agencies included the Office of Food Administration; the Office of Fuel Administration; the National War Labor Board, for handling labor disputes during the war; and other agencies to deal solely with aspects of wartime transportation. The War Industries Board had complete authority over all war purchases and eventually came to exercise almost total control over all industry.

Wilson also created, by EXECUTIVE ORDER, the Committee on Public Information, whose principal responsibility was to "manufacture" public sentiment favorable to measures necessary to the conduct of the war. Run by a flamboyant journalist, George Creel, the committee operated as a loosely knit, ever-changing, but always powerful organization spreading information and propagating beliefs for the American people. With no authority beyond the executive order that created it, the committee worked alongside the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, and many other agencies, pouring out publicity and propaganda to promote the war effort. It also worked with the Post Office Department to restrict circulation of news and propaganda, in the process imposing a type of informal censorship.

The CIVIL LIBERTIES implications of the Committee on Public Information were troubling to a number of liberal Americans, yet it faced no court challenge to its actions. Other governmental restrictions on individual freedoms, however, did elicit legal challenges. The Selective Service Act was the first. As opponents of the war questioned its constitutionality, lower courts expedited various draft cases, permitting an early test case in the Supreme Court. In the SELECTIVE DRAFT LAW CASES of January 1918, a unanimous Court found the constitutional authority to impose compulsory military service in Congress's powers to declare war and to "raise and support armies." Pushing aside states' rights challenges and a charge that conscription was "involuntary servitude," forbidden by the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT, the Court also shrugged off a challenge that the measure's conscientious-objection exception violated the FIRST AMENDMENT because it amounted to an ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION. Thus sustained, the act was administered at the local level through "neighborhood" civilian draft boards, the government hoping thereby to create the illusion that the process was democratic and free of national control.

While conscription curtailed the freedom of those drafted, the freedom of critics of the war was constrained through other legislation. Although Congress adopted no general censorship law, it did enact two statutes limiting press and speech freedoms. The ESPIONAGE ACT of 1917 drafted to "outlaw spies and subversiveon expression that might disrupt the war effort by causing disobedience in the armed forces or by obstructing recruitment and enlistment. The Justice Department prosecuted more than 2,000 cases under the 1917 act, and a comparable number of prosecutions were brought under similar state laws. Congress's SEDITION ACT amendment (1918) broadened the scope of punishable criticism, providing criminal penalties for eight offenses, coming generally under the concept of SEDITIOUS LIBEL, or unjustifiably criticizing the government, its officials, and its policies. Again the act was enforced broadly to silence public criticism.

Test cases on the two measures had to await the postwar period. In SCHENCK V. UNITED STATES (1919), OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., spoke for the Court in sustaining the Espionage Act, finding the expression of a Socialist party leader presented a CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER to recruitment. However, in ABRAMS V. UNITED STATES (1919), when the Court sustained the amended Sedition Act, Holmes dissented, contending that the defendant's expression had not met that standard. The Court sustained all federal and state curtailment of unpopular expression, leaving a restrictive set of precedents to govern interpretation of the First Amendment. But criticism of this behavior and of the Palmer raids spawned a civil liberties movement, which in subsequent years became a central feature of American constitutional development.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Executive Power; Executive Prerogative; Presidential Ordinance-Making Power; Presidential Powers; War, Foreign Affairs, and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

CUFF, ROBERT D. 1973 The War Industries Board: Business-Government Relations During World War I. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press.

KENNEDY, DAVID M. 1980 Over Here: The First World War and American Society. New York: Oxford University Press.

MURPHY, PAUL L. 1979 World War I and the Origin of Civil Liberties in the United States. New York: Norton.

WORLD WAR II

The inherent conflict between the organizational needs of a nation at war and individual rights raised several constitutional questions during World War II. Although the Roosevelt administration showed far greater sensitivity to the protection of CIVIL LIBERTIES than did the administration of WOODROW WILSON, restrictions on individual rights did take place, most notably the incarceration of thousands of Japanese American citizens.

As the nation prepared for war even before Pearl Harbor, FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT adopted the view that the Constitution allowed the President great flexibility in meeting his obligations as COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF. With Congress reluctant to act, Roosevelt expanded his foreign policy prerogatives by negotiating secret EXECUTIVE AGREEMENTS. In October 1939 the United States and nineteen Latin American states established a "neutrality belt" through the Declaration of Panama. In August 1941, Roosevelt and Winston Churchill defined the war aims of the free world in the Atlantic Charter. The most famous executive agreement involved a swap of fifty overage American destroyers in exchange for British naval bases in the Caribbean. Although conservatives attacked the President's alleged dictatorial behavior, a majority in Congress and of the American people supported the agreements.

In May 1941 the President proclaimed an "unlimited" emergency to justify various defensive measures for the western hemisphere. What this meant, and on what constitutional authority it relied, remained uncertain. Attorney General FRANK MURPHY declared that "the constitutional duties of the Executive carry with them the constitutional powers necessary for their proper performance." Like ABRAHAM LINCOLN and Woodrow Wilson before him, Roosevelt believed in "the adequacy of the Constitution"—that whether or not specific powers were spelled out, the Constitution granted the President and Congress sufficient authority to meet any crisis.

Roosevelt's use of executive agreements and EXECUTIVE ORDERS, revolutionary in themselves, masked the fact that more often than not he sought—and received—legislative authorization. The Neutrality Act of 1939, the Draft Act of 1940, the Lend-Lease Act of 1941 all gave the President broad discretion; following Pearl Harbor, Congress passed a series of measures giving the chief executive extensive powers over the economy and the government. Roosevelt not only fully utilized these powers but told the nation that he would exercise whatever authority he thought necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. At one point, Roosevelt warned that if Congress failed to repeal a portion of the 1942 Price Control Act, "I shall accept the responsibility and I will act. . . . The President has the power, under the Constitution, and under Congressional acts, to take measures necessary to avert a disaster." But, he assured the people, he would always act with due regard to the Constitution, and "when the war is won, the powers under which I act automatically revert to the people—where they belong."

Although wartime measures are often challenged in the courts, unless there is an egregious violation of a specific constitutional prohibition the courts will affirm the law or delay a decision until the end of hostilities. The Supreme Court heard several challenges to the sweeping price-fixing provisions in the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942. Although Congress had set few limitations on presidential discretion and although these delegations of authority far exceeded the scope of those struck down in SCHECHTER POULTRY CORPORATION V. UNITED STATES (1935), the Court rejected all challenges to the law; the judiciary would not second-guess the executive and legislative branches on what had to be done to win the war.

The seizure of property to avert labor disputes, the freezing of wages and prices, and even executive agreements with the force of law are less troubling in wartime than restrictions placed on individual liberties. In World War I the Justice Department and the postal authorities had shown little regard for constitutional protection of dissident speech and publication. Because no pro-German or antiwar sentiment existed between 1941 and 1945 comparable to that of the earlier war, the Roosevelt administration expressed—and, for the most part, maintained—a firmer commitment to civil liberties. The wartime Justice Department, headed successively by Frank Murphy, ROBERT H. JACKSON, and FRANCIS BIDDLE, showed itself unwilling to stifle expression in the name of national unity.

Many of the worst abuses during World War I had resulted from prosecutions under state criminal laws, but the Roosevelt administration avoided a repetition of those abuses. It asserted sole federal control over internal security through the ALIEN REGISTRATION ACT of 1940, and a few months later the Supreme Court affirmed federal supremacy. In HINES V. DAVIDOWITZ (1941) the Court overturned a Pennsylvania alien registration statute on the ground that the federal law had preempted the field.

The administration did, however, seek to revoke the citizenship of allegedly disloyal naturalized citizens of German and Italian origin, on the supposition that current disloyal or even dissident behavior proved they had earlier secured citizenship under false pretenses. The case testing this policy happened to involve neither a Nazi nor a Fascist sympathizer but a communist. The government based its case on the claim that membership in the Communist party proved the defendant did not have the "true faith and allegiance to the United States" that citizenship demanded. The Court, by a 6–3 majority, rejected the government's claim in Schneiderman v. United States (1943). Although citizenship constituted a privilege granted by Congress, Justice Frank Murphy explained, once a person became a citizen he or she enjoyed all the rights guaranteed by the Constitution, especially freedom of thought and expression. This and other cases reversing denaturalization orders indicated how far the nation had moved from its anti-alien hysteria of World War I, at least in terms of freedom to express unpopular ideas.

The country did, however, deprive one group of basic constitutional rights in what has remained the greatest civil liberties stain on the Roosevelt administration's record—the incarceration of more than 110,000 men, women, and children of Japanese origin, two-thirds of them native-born American citizens, solely on the basis of race. Anti-Japanese sentiment, especially on the West Coast, long predated the war, but the attack on Pearl Harbor whipped it up to hysterical proportions. Fears of fifth-column attacks and sabotage, reinforced by Japanese military victories, led to demands that both Japanese aliens (Issei) and American citizens of Japanese ancestry (Nisei) be removed from the coastal areas and relocated inland.

On February 19, 1942, President Roosevelt signed EXECUTIVE ORDER 9066 authorizing military officials to designate parts of the country as "military areas" from which any and all persons might be excluded. Roosevelt issued the order on his authority as commander-in-chief, but army lawyers feared that so slender a constitutional reed might not support evacuating large numbers of citizens solely on the basis of their race. So they asked for, and received, congressional affirmation of 9066 on March 21.

Three days later, the army declared a curfew along the coastal plain for German and Italian nationals and for all persons of Japanese ancestry. Three days after that, both Issei and Nisei were prohibited from leaving the military areas, and then on May 9, they were excluded from West Coast military zones. Japanese Americans could comply with these contradictory orders only by reporting to central depots, from which they would be transferred to relocation centers in the interior. Although families could stay together, they had to leave homes and jobs and dispose of their property within a matter of days, often sustaining severe losses in the process. Amazingly, the Japanese and Japanese Americans responded cooperatively, and a number of younger Nisei volunteered to serve in the army, where their units turned out to be among the most highly decorated in the European theater of operations.

A race-based policy of such striking dimensions could hardly avoid constitutional challenge, and within a short time the nation's High Court had placed its imprimatur on relocation. In Hirabayashi v. United States (1943), a native-born citizen had been arrested for failing to report to a control center and for violating the curfew. The Court, speaking through Chief Justice HARLAN F. STONE, unanimously affirmed the curfew as lying within the presidential WAR POWERS as well as congressional authority. Although any RACIAL DISCRIMINATION was "odious to a free people," the Court would not challenge the discretion of the military in its interpretation of the war powers.

Justices Murphy, WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, and WILEY B. RUTLEDGE entered concurring opinions that practically amounted to dissents; Murphy in particular noted the "melancholy resemblance" between American treatment of the Japanese and the incarceration of Jews in Nazi-dominated Europe. But the three reluctantly consented to what they perceived as an unconstitutional program because of the supposedly critical military situation.

The Justices heard two other relocation cases in 1944, and in both they shied away from the central question of constitutional authority for the detention of peaceful American citizens. In Korematsu v. United States, an American citizen, turned down for voluntary army service because of ulcers, had refused to leave the military zone. Justice HUGO L. BLACK's majority opinion tried to separate the issue of exclusion from that of detention and found the war powers of Congress and the President sufficient to sustain an order excluding certain persons, for whatever reason, from designated military zones. Black rather ingenuously said that race had nothing to do with the case; Fred Korematsu had been ordered to leave the area not merely because he was Japanese, but because of military necessity. This time Justices Murphy, Jackson, and OWEN J. ROBERTS entered strenuous dissents, with Roberts bluntly declaring that Korematsu had been convicted "for not submitting to imprisonment in a concentration camp."

The same day, in Ex parte Endo, the Court unanimously authorized a writ of HABEAS CORPUS to free Mitsuye Endo, a citizen whose loyalty had been clearly established. Although the AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION had hoped to make this case a challenge to the entire relocation program, Justice Douglas carefully skirted that issue. He confined his ruling to the narrow question of whether the government could detain persons whose loyalty had been confirmed. There is evidence that Douglas wanted to go further, but that even this late in the war, other members of the Court still did not feel free to challenge the relocation program.

There has been general condemnation of the relocation program and of the Court's decisions affirming it from that day forward, and the judgment of history has clearly been that the Roosevelt administration and the Court erred badly. In later years, Congress took several steps to apologize to the Japanese Americans and, at least partially, to indemnify them for their suffering and losses. Gordon Hirabayashi, Fred Korematsu, and others also succeeded in overturning their convictions on the basis of the misconduct of government attorneys in misleading the Supreme Court.

The Court also considered constitutional issues involving treason and espionage. Ever since Aaron Burr's trial (1807), the Court had held to a restricted definition of treason, from which it did not depart during World War II. It drew a sharp distinction between civilian trials for treason and military trials for espionage, in which different criteria for evidence and guilt prevailed.

The first case arose from the arrest of eight Germans put ashore from submarines with orders to sabotage American defense plants. Quickly arrested and tried by military tribunals, which sentenced six of them to death, they appealed to the Supreme Court. In Ex parte Quirin (1942) a unanimous Court affirmed the powers of the President to establish military commissions with appropriate jurisdiction to try such cases. Chief Justice Stone's elaborate opinion, however, also implied that even spies and prisoners of war had some rights under the Constitution; that implication had no basis in either American or English law, and the Court soon backed down. In Ex parte Yamashita (1946) Stone conceded that a Japanese general tried for war crimes had no constitutional rights and could appeal his conviction only to military authorities.

In two treason cases involving American citizens arising from the German saboteur incident, the Court adhered to a strict interpretation of treason, "levying War against [the United States], or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort." In CRAMER V. UNITED STATES (1945), Justice Jackson held for a 5–4 Court that the overt act had to be traitorous in intent by itself, and not merely appear so because of surrounding circumstances. In HAUPT V. UNITED STATES (1947), however, the Court moved away from this rigorous intent standard to sustain the conviction of the father of one of the Germans, whose activities were "'steps essential to his design for treason."

The government then prosecuted other Americans who had aided the enemy during the war, such as Douglas Chandler, who had broadcast English-language programs from Berlin during the war. The Chandler case raised the issue of whether treason could take place only within the territorial limits of the United States. In Kawakita v. United States (1952) the Court ruled that treason encompassed activities by American citizens anywhere.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Executive Power; Executive Prerogative; Japanese American Cases; Naturalization; Stone Court; War, Foreign Affairs, and the Constitution.)

Bibliography

HURST, J. WILLARD 1971 The Law of Treason in the United States. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

IRONS, PETER 1983 Justice at War. New York: Oxford University Press.

ROSSITER, CLINTON L. 1976 The Supreme Court and the Commander-in-Chief. Ithaca, N.Y.:Cornell University Press.

WORTMAN, TUNIS
(?–1822)

A New York lawyer prominent in Tammany politics, Tunis Wortman contributed significantly to the emergence of a libertarian theory of the FIRST AMENDMENT following the Sedition Act of 1798. His philosophic book, An Enquiry, Concerning the Liberty, and Licentiousness of the Press (1800), whose publication ALBERT GALLATIN and other Jeffersonian congressmen helped underwrite, was the era's most systematic presentation of the case for an absolutist interpretion of freedom of publication (excluding personal libels). Wortman regarded prosecutions for SEDITIOUS LIBEL as incompatible with republican government.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WRIGHT, J. SKELLY
(1911–1988)

J. Skelly Wright was serving as the U.S. attorney for New Orleans when he was appointed to the Federal District Court bench by President HARRY S. TRUMAN in 1948. At the time of his appointment, Wright, at thirty-seven, was the youngest judge on the federal bench. From 1956 to 1962, he presided over the DESEGREGATION of the New Orleans school district, becoming in the process "the most hated man in New Orleans." Displaying real boldness, he ruled unconstitutional various state statutes adopted with the apparent goal of thwarting desegregation. In 1962, President JOHN F. KENNEDY wanted to appoint Wright to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals (whose jurisdiction then covered much of the South). This appointment, however, was blocked by Senator Russell Long, for reasons of Louisiana politics. Instead, the President ended up appointing Wright to the District of Columbia Circuit. Wright sat on this court for twenty-five years, eventually becoming its Chief Judge.

On the D.C. Circuit, Wright proved to be a liberal activist; indeed, his career is one of the purest examples of this genre of judging. A genuinely humble man, he was distinctly gratified by a judicial position that enabled him, in his words, to "make a contribution." He was the author of a large number of noteworthy opinions, dealing with such issues as the unconscionability defense in contract law, the implied warranty of habitability in residential leases, the broad rule-making powers of the Federal Trade Commission, the impermissibility of ex parte contracts in the course of informal rule making, and the proper scope of the National Environmental Protection Act. Designated in one instance to sit as a district court judge, Wright issued an opinion that required the D.C. school system to equalize spending between schools that were de facto white and those that were black, to cure problems of teacher segregation, and to end a rigid system of student ability grouping. In its time, the Wright opinion was a leader in the development of what was then called the "new equal protection."

Judge Wright's interests in public law were also reflected in his authorship of a significant number of major law review articles, including one advocating the revival of the antidelegation doctrine. In his articles and his opinions as well, Wright was a remarkable stylist, writing with a directness and sense of purpose that gave his work a distinctive voice.

Having retired from the court a year before, Wright died in 1988.

GARY T. SCHWARTZ
(1992)

Bibliography

MILLER, ARTHUR SELWYNE 1984 A "Capacity for Outrage": The Judicial Odyssey of J. Skelly Wright. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press.

SYMPOSIUM 1980 Judge J. Skelly Wright. Hastings Constitutional Quarterly:857–999.

WRIGHT v. VINTON BRANCH OF MOUNTAIN TRUST BANK OF ROANOKE
300 U.S. 440 (1937)

Despite the decision in LOUISVILLE JOINT STOCK LAND BANK V. RADFORD (1935), Congress had to act on behalf of farmers losing their farms through foreclosures. A revised FRAZIER-LEMKE ACT fixed a three-year stay of proceedings with the proviso that a federal bankruptcy court might shorten that period if the economic emergency ended. The new act also provided that the mortgagee retained a lien on the property. But except for a few other minor changes the act remained the same, allowing the bankrupt mortgagor to retain possession of the property and to purchase it at its newly appraised value. Justice LOUIS D. BRANDEIS, for a unanimous Supreme Court, found that the new act was free of the objectionable features of the original and did not violate the Fifth Amendment's DUE PROCESS clause. President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT's COURT-PACKING plan may have influenced the Court to temper its views.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WRIGHTWOOD DAIRY CO., UNITED STATES v.
315 U.S. 110 (1942)

ROCK ROYAL CO-OP, INC., UNITED STATES v.
307 U.S. 533 (1939)

These decisions are among the more significant results of the post-1936 interpretation of the COMMERCE CLAUSE as a source of federal power extending to virtually the entire national economy. The AGRICULTURAL MARKETING AGREEMENT ACT of 1937 authorized the secretary of agriculture to fix minimum prices for all milk in INTERSTATE COMMERCE, or burdening or affecting commerce. In Rock Royal the price-fixing provisions governed sales by local dairy farmers to dealers who processed the milk and transported it. Those opposing federal authority contended that the regulated transactions included INTRASTATE COMMERCE whose sales were fully completed before any interstate commerce began. Holding the statute constitutional, the Court declared that the national power to fix production quotas and prices applied to local milk because its marketing was "inextricably intermingled with and directly affected the marketing of milk which moved across state lines." In Wrightwood, the milk subject to regulation under the same statute was entirely intrastate and none of it was intermingled with milk that crossed state lines. Nevertheless the Court unanimously held that it was the EFFECT ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE, not the source of the injury to it, that was "the sole criterion of Congressional power." Accordingly, the commerce power extended to intrastate transactions whose regulation made the regulation of interstate commerce effective, including intrastate transactions whose competitive price affected interstate ones. Both cases were decided on a thoroughgoing application of the SHREVEPORT DOCTRINE.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

WRIT OF ASSISTANCE

See: Assistance, Writ of

WRIT OF CERTIORARI

See: Certiorari, Writ of

WRIT OF ERROR

See: Error, Writ of

WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS

See: Habeas Corpus

WRIT OF MANDAMUS

See: Mandamus, Writ of

WRIT OF PROHIBITION

See: Prohibition, Writ of

WRITS OF ASSISTANCE CASE

See: Paxton's Case

WYGANT v. JACKSON BOARD OF EDUCATION
476 U.S. 267 (1986)

Although the Wygant decision did not produce a majority opinion, it advanced the growth of constitutional doctrine governing AFFIRMATIVE ACTION. A school board and a teachers' union had approved an affirmative action plan as a response to complaints of past RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in the hiring of teachers. To maintain minority-hiring gains in the event of a contraction in teacher employment, the plan protected some minority teachers against layoffs. When some minority teachers were retained while some nonminority teachers with greater seniority were laid off, the laid-off teachers challenged the layoff provision in federal court. By a 5–4 vote, the Supreme Court held the provision a violation of the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS.

Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, for four Justices, concluded that the appropriate STANDARD OF REVIEW was STRICT SCRUTINY. Using this standard, he rejected the lower courts' two justifications for the layoff provision: as a means of keeping minority teachers to serve as role models for students and as a remedy for past societal discrimination. He agreed that past discrimination by the school board itself was a COMPELLING STATE INTEREST that would justify some RACE-CONSCIOUS remedies, assuming that the board had evidentiary support for determining that remedial action was warranted. Here no such determination had been made, but Justice Powell was unwilling to remand the case for exploration of this issue. Even if the purpose were remedial, he concluded, the layoff provision was an impermissible remedy because it was too burdensome on innocent nonminority teachers. Preferential hiring, he intimated, would be acceptable; layoffs, however, placed the whole burden on particular individuals.

Justice SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR concurred separately to emphasize that a public employer that wished to adopt an affirmative action plan need not make a contemporaneous finding of past wrongdoing. Such a requirement would undermine the employer's incentive to meet its civil rights obligations. Rather, the employer could show "a disparity between the percentage of qualified blacks on a school's teaching staff and the percentage of qualified minorities in the relevant labor pool" that would support a prima facie case of EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION under Title VII of the CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964. Justice BYRON R. WHITE added a brief concurrence emphasizing the difference between a hiring preference and a preference in avoiding layoffs.

Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL dissented, joined by Justices WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., and HARRY A. BLACKMUN. Marshall argued that the case should be remanded to the trial court for further findings about the board's past discrimination, but also disagreed with the majority Justices' disposition on the merits. The board's interest in preserving a valid policy for affirmative action in hiring, he argued, was a sufficient state purpose, and the layoff provision was sufficiently narrowly tailored to pass the test of constitutionality. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS also dissented, arguing that the board's interest in educating children justified measures to assure a racially integrated faculty, irrespective of any showing of past discrimination.

Wygant was a way station on the road to RICHMOND V. J. A. CROSON CO. (1989), in which a majority of the Supreme Court explicitly adopted the rhetoric of strict scrutiny for reviewing state-sponsored affirmative action programs. Justice Powell's and Justice O'Connor's opinions, taken together, also provided a "how to do it" manual for public employers that want to adopt affirmative-action plans for achieving integrated work forces.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1992)

Bibliography

KARST, KENNETH L. 1989 Belonging to America: Equal Citizenship and the Constitution, pages 158–167. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press.

SULLIVAN, KATHLEEN 1986 Sins of Discrimination: Last Term's Affirmative Action Cases. Harvard Law Review 100:78–98.

WYMAN v. JAMES
400 U.S. 309 (1971)

In Wyman the Supreme Court held that a recipient of Aid to Families with Dependent Children must permit a home visit by a caseworker, when the law requires it, or forfeit her right to public assistance. The Supreme Court did not consider it to be a search in FOURTH AMENDMENT terms. Even if the visit were a search, the Court said it was reasonable: it was made for the benefit of the child; it was "a gentle means" of assuring that tax funds are properly spent; the caseworker was not a "uniformed authority"; and the recipient had the choice of invoking her right to refuse or forfeiting the benefits. Three dissenting Justices (WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, THURGOOD MARSHALL), protested that the Court had granted more protection to a commercial warehouse than to a "poor woman's home."

JACOB W. LANDYNSKI
(1986)

WYNEHAMER v. PEOPLE OF NEW YORK
13 N.Y. 378 (1856)

Although out of joint with its times, Wynehamer became a classic case of pre-1937 American constitutional history, exemplifying our constitutional law as a law of judicially implied limitations on legislative powers, drawn from the DUE PROCESS clause for the benefit of VESTED RIGHTS. The case involved the constitutionality of a state prohibition act. More than a dozen states had such legislation before the Civil War. The New York law involved in Wynehamer prohibited the sale of intoxicating liquor and the possession of liquors for sale, and it ordered the forfeiture and destruction of existing supplies as public nuicances. The fundamental issue raised by such legislation was whether property which had not been taken for a public use could be destroyed in the name of the public health and morals, without any compensation to the owner. Everywhere, except in New York, the state courts held that a mere license to sell liquor was not a contract in the meaning of the CONTRACT CLAUSE, and that a charter to make and sell liquor was subject to the RESERVED POLICE POWER to alter, amend, or repeal it. Moreover, liquor, like explosives or narcotics, was a peculiar kind of property, dangerous to the public safety, morals, and health. Legislatures could never relinquish their control over such matters, not even by a contract in the form of a charter. As Chief Justice ROGER B. TANEY had said in the 1847 LICENSE CASES, nothing in the United States Constitution prevented a state from regulating the liquor traffic "or from prohibiting it altogether."

The New York Court of Appeals, however, held the state prohibition statute unconstitutional on the grounds that it violated the due process clause of the state constitution. The various opinions of the state judges used the novel concept of SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS about half a century before the Supreme Court of the United States accepted that concept. The conventional and previously sole understanding of due process had been that it referred to regularized and settled procedures insuring mainly a fair accusation, hearing, and conviction. And, the doctrine of vested rights notwithstanding, the orthodox view of the POLICE POWER authorized the legislature, as Chief Justice LEMUEL SHAW of Massachusetts had said, "to declare the possession of certain articles of property . . .

unlawful because they would be injurious, dangerous, and noxious; and by due process of law, by proceeding IN REM, to provide both for the abatement of the nuisance and for the punishment of the offender, by the seizure and confiscation of the property, by the removal, sale or destruction of the noxious article" (Fisher v. McGirr, 1854). Accordingly the opinion of the New York court was startling when it said, "All property is alike in the characteristic of inviolability. If the legislature has no power to confiscate and destroy property in general, it has no such power over any particular species." The court showed that the prohibition statute simply annihilated existing property right in liquors. The crucial lines of the opinion declared that the right not to be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law "necessarily imports that the legislature cannot make the mere existence of the rights secured the occasion of depriving a person of any of them, even by the forms which belong to "due process of law.' For if it does not necessarily import this, then the legislative power is absolute."

Thus even if the legislature provided all the forms of due process by laying down proper procedures for prosecuting violators of the statute, as in this case, due process had still been denied. The court, in effect, looked at the substance of the statute, found it denied persons of their property, and then held it unconstitutional for denying "due process," even if it did not deny due process. One can make sense out of this by realizing that the court had rewritten the due process clause to mean that property cannot be deprived with or without due process. The Court in effect redpenciled the due process clause out of the constitution, or as EDWARD S. CORWIN said, Wynehamer stands for "nothing less than the elimination of the very phrase under construction from the constitutional clause in which it occurs." The difficulty, however, is that the court had to its own mind kept and relied on the due process clause. It added a new meaning to supplement the old one. It constitutionally changed process into substance by holding that the statute's infirmity lay in what it did, not how it did it. Due process as a substantive limitation on legislative powers was then an absurd concept. Substantive process was oxymoronic, like thunderous silence.

Another way of understanding Wynehamer's substantive due process is to realize that the court believed that due process had substance. The court in effect accused the legislature of retaining the forms of due process without its substance, that is, of providing mere empty formalities and labeling them due process, because the effective deprivation of property was not by judicial process but by legislative fiat.

Wynehamer, an aberration at the time, was everywhere repudiated yet destined for ultimate acceptance by the highest court of the land and destined, too, to become the source of a major doctrine in American constitutional history.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

Bibliography

CORWIN, EDWARD S. 1948 Liberty against Government. Chap. 3. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.

MOTT, RODNEY L. 1926 Due Process of Law. Pages 311–326. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill.

WYTHE, GEORGE
(1726–1806)

George Wythe served almost uninterruptedly in Virginia's House of Burgesses from 1754 to 1775 and was a delegate to the FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS in 1774, later signing the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. With his pupil Thomas Jefferson (John Marshall and HENRY CLAY were also his students) and EDMUND PENDLETON, Wythe revised Virginia's laws. He was appointed to the Virginia Court of Chancery in 1778; one year later he became the first professor of law in the United States, enabling him to influence the course of American jurisprudence. His opinion in COMMONWEALTH V. CATON (1782) approved, in theory, a court's right to restrain a legislative act violative of the constitution. Wythe was a delegate to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787 and chairman of its rules committee, but judicial duties obliged him to leave the convention early. At the Virginia convention he worked for RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION. Wythe opposed slavery and freed the slaves he inherited.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

Bibliography

CLARKIN, WILLIAM 1970 Serene Patriot: A Life of George Wythe. Albany, N.Y.: Alan Publications.

WYZANSKI, CHARLES E., JR.
(1906–1986)

Charles E. Wyzanski, Jr., contributed to constitutional law both as a barrister and as a federal judge. He was the son of a Boston real estate developer and graduated with distinction from Phillips Exeter Academy, Harvard College, and Harvard Law School. He had been attracted to law by a reading of Freedom of Speech, by ZECHARIAH CHAFEE, JR. On the recommendation of Professor FELIX FRANKFURTER, he served successively as law clerk to Judges AUGUSTUS N. HAND and LEARNED HAND, whose broad cultivation, legal acumen, and largeness of spirit became the greatest influence on his professional life.

After a brief association with the Boston law firm of Ropes and Gray, and not yet thirty years old, he was called to Washington to be solicitor of the Labor Department under Secretary Frances Perkins. There he drafted the public works provisions of the Industrial Recovery Act and the Charter of the International Labor Organization. For the Immigration and Naturalization Service, then within the Labor Department, he drew up a plan for collective private guarantees of the welfare of immigrants, which unblocked entry into the United States; this remained his proudest achievement.

He was brought to the Office of the SOLICITOR GENERAL in 1935 to strengthen the presentation of crucial New Deal cases in the Supreme Court. He had a central role in the government's victories in the National Labor Relations Act and the Social Security cases in 1937, although when congratulated on his success he would reply that the cases were won "not by Mr. Wyzanski but by Mr. Zeitgeist." He had been on the point of resigning because of his opposition to the Court-packing plan, but was persuaded by Judge A. N. Hand to remain until he could present the government's arguments in these cases.

After returning to Ropes and Gray, he was appointed by President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT in 1941 to the UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT in Massachusetts, where he served for forty-five years. As a judge he was morally demanding, bold, and courageous, sometimes testing the limits of judicial power, whether on the side of severity, as in municipal corruption cases, or of leniency, as in cases of draft resistance. Notable among the latter was United States v. Sisson (1969), where he rejected the defendant's argument that the VIETNAM WAR was an undeclared war and therefore unconstitutional, holding that this claim presented a POLITICAL QUESTION. Wyzanski then set aside the guilty verdict on the ground, barely advanced by counsel, that the defendant's CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION to the conflict, though not strictly satisfying the statutory religious standard for an exemption, nevertheless warranted acquittal under American moral traditions. In his judicial opinions, as in his probing essays and speeches, Wyzanski's search was for enduring, historically attested values.

PAUL A. FREUND
(1992)

(SEE ALSO: Immigration and Alienage.)

Bibliography

IN MEMORIAM 1987 In Memoriam: Charles E. Wyzanski, Jr. Harvard Law Review 100:705–727.

WYZANSKI, C. E., JR. 1965 Whereas: A Judge's Premises. Boston: Little, Brown.

Y

YAKUS v. UNITED STATES
321 U.S. 414 (1944)

The EMERGENCY PRICE CONTROL ACT of 1942 delegated power to fix prices and rents to the Office of Price Administration (OPA). Under the act, challenges to the legality of OPA regulations could not be made in federal district court enforcement proceedings, even those aimed at imposing criminal penalties, but must be made in separate proceedings in the EMERGENCY COURT OF APPEALS. The Supreme Court sustained this limitation on the district courts in civil enforcement proceedings in Lockerty v. Phillips (1944). In Yakus, the Court upheld the limitation in the context of a criminal prosecution. The Court also rejected attacks on the act as an unconstitutional DELEGATION OF POWER for failing to provide sufficient guidelines. Chief Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE, for the Court, said that the act contained specific objectives: "to stabilize prices and to prevent speculative, unwarranted and abnormal increases in prices and rents." It also mentioned standards for price-setting: administrators should consult industry and consider current prices. Because the act accorded with earlier decisions and because its standards were "sufficiently definite and precise," Stone could find no unauthorized delegation of power. Justice OWEN ROBERTS, dissenting, believed that the case presented substantially the same issue as SCHECHTER POULTRY CORPORATION V. UNITED STATES (1935) which the majority, he said, had clearly overruled. Justice WILEY RUTLEDGE also dissented, joined by Justice FRANK MURPHY. Rutledge argued that Congress could not constitutionally command the federal courts to enforce administrative orders, disregarding their possible unconstitutionality. The Rutledge view seems likely to prevail in the absence of a wartime emergency.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

YAMASHITA, IN RE
327 U.S. 1 (1947)

A 6–2 Supreme Court here refused to consider the claim of an enemy officer, charged with war crimes before an American military tribunal in the Philippines, that he had been denied the DUE PROCESS OF LAW guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment. The Court held that it had JURISDICTION only to consider whether the military tribunal had authority to try the accused.

When General Tomoyuki Yamashita surrendered in 1945, an American military commission tried him on charges that he permitted atrocities against both civilians and prisoners of war, in violation of the law of war. Yamashita's military counsel applied to the Supreme Court for leave to file petitions for writs of HABEAS CORPUS and prohibition, challenging the jurisdiction and legal authority of the commission. Chief Justice HARLAN FISKE STONE, for the majority, denied leave to file but wrote an opinion on the jurisdictional issues. He found that Congress had legally authorized the commission's establishment under the WAR POWERS, and that the charge was adequate to state a violation of the law of war. Stone also denied that the American Articles of War (which incorporated the law of war) forbade the admission of hearsay and opinion EVIDENCE.

Justices FRANK MURPHY and WILEY RUTLEDGE, dissenting, argued eloquently for the extension of the due process clause.

DAVID GORDON
(1986)

YARBROUGH, EX PARTE
110 U.S. 651 (1884)

This is the only nineteenth-century case in which the Supreme Court sustained the power of the United States to punish private persons for interfering with VOTING RIGHTS. Yarbrough and other members of the Ku Klux Klan assaulted a black citizen who voted in a congressional election. The United States convicted the Klansmen under a federal statute making it a crime to conspire to injure or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise of any right secured to him by the laws of the United States. The Court, in a unanimous opinion by Justice SAMUEL F. MILLER, held that the United States "must have the power to protect the elections on which its existence depends, from violence and corruption." Miller's reasoning is confused. Congress had passed the statute in contemplation of its power to enforce the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. In UNITED STATES V. CRUIKSHANK (1876) the Court had ruled that the same statute could not reach private, rather than state, actions. Miller thought the situation different when Congress sought to protect rights constitutionally conferred, and he stressed Article I, section 4, which empowered Congress to alter state regulations for the election of members of Congress. But that provision did not apply here. In UNITED STATES V. REESE (1876) the Court had ruled that the FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT did not confer the right to vote on anyone, but only a right to be free from RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in voting. Here, however, Miller ruled that "under some circumstances," the Fifteenth Amendment, which was not the basis of the statute, may operate as the source of a right to vote. In the end Miller declared, "But it is a waste of time to seek for specific sources of the power to pass these laws." In JAMES V. BOWMAN (1903), involving the right to vote in a federal election, the Court held unconstitutional an act of Congress without reference to Yarbrough.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

YATES, ROBERT
(1738–1801)

Judge Robert Yates, who in 1777 had served on the committee that drafted the state constitution, was a delegate from New York to the CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787. A trusted, if undistinguished, follower of Governor George Clinton, Yates represented the antinationalist viewpoint then dominant in New York politics. He and JOHN LANSING consistently outvoted ALEXANDER HAMILTON and kept New York in the STATES' RIGHTS camp. But on July 10 Yates and Lansing walked out, charging that the Convention was exceeding its authority.

In the contest over RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION Yates was an active ANTI-FEDERALIST. His "Brutus" letters were an able and articulate presentation of the dangers opponents feared would result from adoption of the Constitution, including annihilation of the states and usurpation by the federal courts. Yates was a delegate to the New York ratifying convention where he voted against ratification.

Yates kept notes of the debates of the federal convention from its first meeting through July 5. He did not publish the notes himself, but they were published in 1821 and are, after JAMES MADISON's, the best record of the early proceedings.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

Bibliography

ROSSITER, CLINTON 1966 1787: The Grand Convention. New York: Macmillan.

YATES v. UNITED STATES
354 U.S. 298 (1957)

Following DENNIS V. UNITED STATES (1951), Smith Act conspiracy prosecutions were brought against all second-rank United States Communist party officials, and convictions were secured in every case brought to trial between 1951 and 1956. In June 1957, however, the Supreme Court, in Yates, reversed the convictions of fourteen West Coast party leaders charged with Smith Act violations. The Court, speaking through Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN, declared that the Dennis decision had been misunderstood. The Smith Act did not outlaw advocacy of the abstract doctrine of violent overthrow, because such advocacy was too remote from concrete action to be regarded as the kind of indoctrination preparatory to action condemned in Dennis. The essential distinction, Harlan argued, was that those to whom the advocacy was addressed had to be urged to do something, now or in the future, rather than merely believe in something. Without formally repudiating the "sliding scale" reformulation of CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER set forth in the Dennis opinion, the Court erected a stern new standard for evaluating convictions under the Smith Act, making conviction under the measure difficult. As to INDICTMENTS for involvement in organizing the Communist party in the United States, the Court also took a narrow view. Organizing, Harlan maintained, was only the original act of creating such a group, not any continuing process of proselytizing and recruiting. Since the indictments had been made some years following the postwar organizing of their party, the federal three-year statute of limitations had run out. The Court cleared five of the defendants, remanding the case of nine others for retrial. The ruling brought an abrupt end to the main body of Smith Act prosecutions then under way.

PAUL L. MURPHY
(1986)

YBARRA v. ILLINOIS
444 U.S. 85 (1979)

Although three dissenting Justices complained that the Supreme Court majority had narrowed the STOP-AND-FRISK RULE of TERRY V. OHIO (1968), Justice POTTER STEWART for the Court did not doubt that an officer may pat down a suspect for a concealed weapon. Stewart regarded Terry as an exception to the requirement of PROBABLE CAUSE. Here no such cause existed to search a person suspected neither of criminal activity nor of having a weapon. A police officer, having a warrant to search a tavern and its bartender, patted down a bystander, felt no weapon, but removed from his pocket a cigarette pack containing heroin. The Court reversed the man's conviction, because the warrant did not include him, and probable cause to search him was absent.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

YELLOW DOG CONTRACT

The yellow dog contract was a device used by employers prior to the NEW DEAL era to prevent collective bargaining by employees. By a yellow dog contract a worker agreed not to join or remain a member of a labor organization and to quit his job if he joined one. At a time in our history when the courts shaped the law so that its major beneficiary was industrial capitalism, yellow dog contracts were enforceable, even though workers had little choice in accepting their terms. Workers either signed such contracts or forfeited the opportunity of working. In effect, a yellow dog contract blackmailed an employee into promising not to join a union; his supposed free choice to accept a job or look elsewhere for work turned out to be a choice between being blackmailed or blacklisted. In one perspective, yellow dog contracts robbed workers of their FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. The courts thought otherwise, however.

In the 1890s fifteen states enacted laws that promoted COLLECTIVE BARGAINING by outlawing yellow dog contracts, and in 1898 section 10 of the ERDMAN ACT, passed by Congress, also outlawed their use by interstate railroads. In Adair v. United States (1908) the Supreme Court held the Erdman Act unconstitutional. SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS of law provided one ground of decision. The Court reasoned that section 10 abridged freedom of contract, a liberty the Court found in the Fifth Amendment's DUE PROCESS CLAUSE, because Congress had violated the right of workers to make contracts for the sale of their labor. In COPPAGE V. KANSAS (1915) the Court applied this reasoning to state statutes that had banned yellow dog contracts.

Having disabled both the national commerce power and the STATE POLICE POWER from forbidding yellow dog contracts, the Court then sustained the legality of such contracts. In HITCHMAN COAL AND COKE CO. V. MITCHELL (1917) the Court reversed a federal circuit court's determination that a yellow dog contract was not an enforceable contract. Justice MAHLON PITNEY for a six-member majority declared, "The employer is as free to make nonmembership a condition of employment as the worker is free to join the union." The Court added that the right to make such a contract was "part of the constitutional rights of personal liberty and private property, not to be taken away even by legislation," which the Court had already voided. The extent to which these decisions thwarted unionization cannot be gauged.

Congress revived the Erdman Act's provision when it passed the Railway Labor Act of 1926, and in the NORRIS-LAGUARDIA ACT of 1932 declared yellow dog contracts to be contrary to American public policy and unenforceable "in any court of the United States." The major industrial states passed "little Norris-LaGuardia acts." By the time these statutes came before the Supreme Court, it found ways to sustain them.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

YICK WO v. HOPKINS
118 U.S. 356 (1886)

This is one of the basic decisions interpreting the EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS clause of the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT. A San Francisco ordinance made criminal the conduct of a laundry business in any building not made of stone or brick, with such exceptions for wooden structures as administrative officials might make. Officials used their discretion in a grossly discriminatory manner, licensing about eighty wooden laundries run by Caucasians and denying licenses to about two hundred applicants of Chinese extraction. The Supreme Court unanimously held, in an opinion by Justice STANLEY MATTHEWS, that the ordinance, though racially neutral on its face, was applied so unequally and oppressively by public authorities as to deny equal protection. Thus the Court looked beyond the law's terms to its racially discriminatory administration and applied the benefits of the Fourteenth Amendment to Oriental ALIENS, that is, "to all persons . . . without regard to any difference of race, of color, or of nationality."

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

YOUNG, EX PARTE
209 U.S. 123 (1908)

The question in this case—one of the most important of the present century—was whether a citizen might resort to a federal court to vindicate a constitutional right against state infringement and, pending a final JUDGMENT, obtain freedom from civil or criminal suits by a temporary INJUNCTION directed to an officer of the state. The Supreme Court held that, the ELEVENTH AMENDMENT notwithstanding, a federal court might issue such an injunction.

A Minnesota statute fixed railroad rates and (to deter institution of a TEST CASE) made the officers and employees of the railroads personally liable to heavy fines and imprisonment if those rates were exceeded. A STOCKHOLDER'S SUIT in EQUITY was filed in federal Circuit Court to prevent enforcement of or compliance with the statute, on the ground that it violated the FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT by depriving the railroads of property without DUE PROCESS OF LAW. The federal court issued a temporary injunction restraining the state attorney general, Edward T. Young, from taking steps to enforce the statute. When Young defied the injunction the court found him in contempt and committed him to the custody of the United States marshal.

Young petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of HABEAS CORPUS, contending that the suit for injunction was really against the state and that, under the Eleventh Amendment, the state could not be sued in federal court without its consent. The Court denied Young's petition, Justice JOHN MARSHALL HARLAN alone dissenting.

Justice RUFUS PECKHAM, for the Court, argued that if the Minnesota law was unconstitutional, then Young, attempting to enforce it, was stripped of his official character and became merely a private individual using the state's name to further his own illegitimate end. Incongruously, the end Young was furthering was unconstitutional only because it involved STATE ACTION. The "private wrong" was a fiction adopted by the Court to circumvent the Eleventh Amendment.

Congress reacted to the Young decision by passing a law (substantially repealed in 1976) requiring that federal court injunctions against enforcement of state laws alleged to be unconstitutional issue only from special THREE-JUDGE COURTS and providing, in such cases, for direct APPEAL to the Supreme Court.

The doctrine of Young remains valid law today. Although it originally arose in connection with due process protection of economic liberty, the doctrine provides a remedy for state action infringing CIVIL RIGHTS or CIVIL LIBERTIES. But the doctrine of Young applies only to equitable relief, and the Eleventh Amendment remains bar to actions for monetary damages that will be paid out of the state treasury.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Edelman v. Jordan; Osborn v. Bank of the United States.)

YOUNG v. AMERICAN MINI THEATRES, INC.
427 U.S. 50 (1976)

In Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc. the Supreme Court upheld a Detroit ZONING ordinance requiring adult theaters to be located certain distances from residential areas and specified businesses. Four Justices led by Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS argued that adult movies ranked low in the hierarchy of FIRST AMENDMENT values. Four dissenting Justices led by Justice POTTER STEWART argued that the First Amendment recognized no hierarchy for types of protected speech. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL agreed with the dissent, but voted to uphold the ordinance, arguing that the theater owners had asserted no First Amendment interest of their own and that the First Amendment interests of others, including moviemakers and potential audiences, were not endangered.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1986)

YOUNGER v. HARRIS
401 U.S. 37 (1971)

Harris, indicted under California's CRIMINAL SYNDICALISM LAW, sought a federal court INJUNCTION to compel the district attorney to cease prosecution in the state court. The district court held the law unconstitutional and issued the injunction. The Supreme Court reversed, 8–1, severely limiting DOMBROWSKI V. PFISTER (1965).

Justice HUGO L. BLACK, for the Court, rested decision on two interlocking grounds. First, a state prosecution was pending; because any claim that the underlying state law was unconstitutional could be made in the state proceeding, there was no "irreparable injury" to justify an injunction. Second, the national government should avoid intruding into "the legitimate activities of the state." Although a federal court might enjoin a state prosecution commenced in bad faith to harass the exercise of FIRST AMENDMENT rights, the claim that the law was unconstitutional on its face did not satisfy this bad-faith harassment requirement. (See ABSTENTION DOCTRINES.)

After Younger, the California courts held the syndicalism law invalid.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

YOUNGSTOWN SHEET & TUBE CO. v. SAWYER
343 U.S. 579 (1952)

In a landmark restriction on presidential power, the Supreme Court in 1952 held invalid President HARRY S. TRUMAN's seizure of the steel mills. Justice HUGO L. BLACK, joined by five other Justices, delivered the opinion of the Court. Chief Justice FRED M. VINSON, dissenting with Justices STANLEY F. REED and SHERMAN MINTON, believed that military and economic emergencies justified Truman's action.

Each of the five concurring Justices wrote separate opinions, advancing different views of the President's emergency power. Only Justices Black and WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS insisted on specific constitutional or statutory authority to support presidential seizure of private property. Assigning the lawmaking function exclusively to Congress, they allowed the President a role only in recommending or vetoing laws. On existing precedent, this concept of the SEPARATION OF POWERS doctrine was far too rigid. Previous Presidents had engaged directly in the lawmaking function without express constitutional or statutory authority, often with the acquiescence and even blessing of Congress and the courts.

The other four concurring Justices (FELIX FRANKFURTER, ROBERT H. JACKSON, HAROLD BURTON, and TOM C. CLARK) did not draw such a strict line between the executive and legislative branches, nor did they try to delimit the President's authority to act in future emergencies. Frankfurter thought it inadvisable to attempt a comprehensive definition of presidential power, based on abstract principles, without admitting powers that had evolved by custom: a "systematic, unbroken, executive practice, long pursued to the knowledge of the Congress and never before questioned . . . may be treated as a gloss on "executive Power." Burton withheld opinion on the President's constitutional power when facing an "imminent invasion or threatened attack," while Clark agreed that the Constitution gave the President extensive authority in time of grave and imperative national emergency.

Jackson identified three categories of presidential power, ranging from actions based on express or implied congressional authorization (putting executive authority at its maximum) to executive measures that were incompatible with congressional policy (reducing presidential power to its lowest ebb). In between lay a "zone of twilight" in which President and Congress shared authority. Jackson said that congressional inertia, indifference, or acquiescence might enable, if not invite, independent presidential action. He further argued that the ENUMERATED POWERS of the President required "scope and elasticity" and said he would "indulge the widest latitude of interpretation" when presidential powers were turned against the outside world for the security of the United States.

Considering the four concurrences and three dissents, the Steel Seizure Case was far from a repudiation of the inherent power doctrine. Nevertheless, a majority of the Court did reach agreement on important principles: presidential actions, including those of an "emergency" nature, are subject to JUDICIAL REVIEW; the courts may enjoin executive officers from carrying out presidential orders that conflict with statutory policy or the Constitution; and independent presidential powers in domestic affairs are especially vulnerable to judicial scrutiny when Congress has adopted a contrary statutory policy. The Steel Seizure Case has supplied the Supreme Court with an important precedent for curbing subsequent exercises of presidential power in areas such as the Pentagon Papers case (NEW YORK TIMES V. UNITED STATES, 1971), electronic surveillance, IMPOUNDMENT, and EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE.

LOUIS FISHER
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Executive Order 10340; Steel Seizure Controversy.)

Bibliography

MARCUS, MAEVA 1977 Truman and the Steel Seizure Case: The Limits of Presidential Power. New York: Columbia University Press.

WESTIN, ALAN F. 1958 The Anatomy of a Constitutional Law Case. New York: Macmillan.

Z

ZABLOCKI v. REDHAIL
434 U.S. 374 (1978)

In LOVING V. VIRGINIA (1967) the Supreme Court had struck down a MISCEGENATION statute flatly forbidding interracial marriage, resting decision on both EQUAL PROTECTION and SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS grounds. In Zablocki the Court protected the "right to marry" in a setting where race was irrelevant. Wisconsin required a court's permission for the marriage of a resident parent who had been ordered to support a child not in his or her custody. Permission would be granted only when the candidate proved compliance with the support obligation and showed that the children were not likely to become public charges. Because he could not comply with the law, Redhail was denied a marriage license. The Supreme Court held, 8–1, that this denial was unconstitutional.

The case produced six opinions. Justice THURGOOD MARSHALL, for the majority, rested on equal protection grounds. Marriage was a FUNDAMENTAL INTEREST, protected by the constitutional RIGHT OF PRIVACY. The Wisconsin law interfered "directly and substantially" with the right to marry and was not necessary to effectuate important state interests. Justice POTTER STEWART concurred on due process grounds. Justice LEWIS F. POWELL, also concurring, objected to the Court's STRICT SCRUTINY test; such an inquiry would cast doubt on such limits on marriage as "bans on incest, bigamy, and homosexuality, as well as various preconditions to marriage, such as blood tests." Using a more relaxed STANDARD OF REVIEW, he nonetheless found the statute wanting on both due process and equal protection grounds. Justice JOHN PAUL STEVENS concurred, calling the law a "clumsy and deliberate legislative discrimination between the rich and poor" whose irrationality violated equal protection. Justice WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST, in lone dissent, rejected the notion that marriage was a "fundamental" right and argued for the strict judicial nonscrutiny that had become his trademark.

For all the diversity of the Justices' views, little turns on the choice between equal protection and due process grounds, or on conclusory assertions about the proper standard of review. Zablocki makes clear that significant state interference with the freedom to marry demands correspondingly weighty justification.

KENNETH L. KARST
(1986)

ZEMEL v. RUSK
381 U.S. 1 (1965)

In Zemel the Supreme Court sustained (6–3) the constitutionality of the secretary of state's refusal to validate passports for travel to Cuba. Chief Justice EARL WARREN, for the majority, rejected two arguments for the petitioner: that he had a RIGHT TO TRAVEL under the DUE PROCESS clause of the Fifth Amendment; and that he had a FIRST AMENDMENT right to travel to Cuba to gather information.

DENNIS J. MAHONEY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia.)

ZENGER'S CASE
(1735)

Had John Peter Zenger, the printer of the New-York Weekly Journal, attacked the provincial assembly of New York instead of its hated royal governor, he would have been summarily convicted at the bar of the house, jailed, and forgotten by posterity. But he was tried by a jury, brilliantly defended by a great lawyer, and saved for posterity by James Alexander's report of A brief Narrative of the Case and Tryal of John Peter Zenger (1736). Alexander, the editor of the paper which Zenger printed, probably wrote the articles that led to the prosecution and, as a lawyer, prepared the case for Andrew Hamilton.

Scalded by the paper's weekly articles against his administration, Governor William Cosby ordered an information against its printer for SEDITIOUS LIBEL; a GRAND JURY had refused to indict, the assembly had refused to cooperate, and the local government, defending "liberty of the press," protested. Zenger, in other words, symbolized the popular party against a detested administration. Not surprisingly the jury acquitted him after brief deliberation, against the instructions of Chief Justice James DeLancey, who presided at the trial before the Supreme Court of Judicature.

The law was against Zenger. Both the prosecutor and the judge accurately informed the jury that seditious libel consisted of scandalizing the government by adversely reflecting on those entrusted with its administration, by publishing material tending to breed popular contempt for the administration, or by alienating the affections of the people for government in any way. Moreover, the truth of a libel magnified its criminality. But Hamilton's reply had greater appeal. If the people could not remonstrate against the oppressions and villainies of their governors, confining themselves always to truthful accusations, they would in no time lose their liberty and property. Hamilton did not repudiate the law of seditious libel; he argued, rather, that Zenger's statements being true were not libels. When the court rejected the proposition that truth should be a defense to a charge of seditious libel, Hamilton appealed to the jury over the court. He argued that the jury, like the press, was a bastion of popular liberty. It should ignore the court's instruction to return a special verdict on the question whether Zenger had, in fact, published the statements charged; a special verdict would leave to the court a ruling on the question of law whether those statements were criminal. Hamilton urged the jury, instead, to return a general verdict of "not guilty," thus deciding the law as well as the fact. The jury returned a general verdict of "not guilty."

The jury's general verdict was a safe way of striking at the unpopular governor and endorsing the right of the people, through the press, to criticize their government. The jury's verdict did not, however, alter the settled law. Not until the Sedition Act of 1798 (see ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS) did truth as a defense and the power of the jury to render a general verdict in cases of seditious libel become part of American law; and, as the enforcement of that infamous statute showed, embattled libertarians came to discover that they should have repudiated the doctrine of seditious libel rather than grasp at Zengerian principles.

LEONARD W. LEVY
(1986)

(SEE ALSO: New York Times v. Sullivan; People v. Croswell.)

Bibliography

KATZ, STANLEY NIDER 1972 A Brief Narrative of the Case and Trial of John Peter Zenger . . . by James Alexander. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

LEVY, LEONARD W. 1960 Did the Zenger Case Really Matter? Freedom of the Press in Colonial New York. William and Mary Quarterly, 3d ser., 17:35–50.

ZOBEL v. WILLIAMS

See: Privileges and Immunities; Right to Travel

ZONING

When a local government decides how to allocate land uses it acts under the POLICE POWER exercised by the states and their governmental subdivisions to regulate for the public health, safety, and welfare. The first zoning ordinances appeared early in the twentieth century as a result of urbanization and the encroachment of factories and noxious uses in residential neighborhoods. In EUCLID V. AMBLER REALTY (1926) the Supreme Court upheld a comprehensive local zoning ordinance, rejecting a SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS attack. Although today's zoning ordinances are more sophisticated than the simple division of land uses upheld in Euclid, the basic constitutional issues raised by zoning decisions remain an unusually stable area of constitutional law.

Because a zoning ordinance is adopted by a legislative body, and because zoning amendments are legislative decisions in most states, the constitutional scrutiny applied to zoning is no different from that applied to LEGISLATION at any governmental level. The courts use the due process analysis of Euclid to uphold zoning if they find a reasonable relationship between the zoning and the city's police power objectives. Like other social and economic legislation, zoning comes to court clothed with a presumption of validity. A court will not question the wisdom or the motives of legislators. If a court finds any RATIONAL BASIS to support zoning as an implementation of the public health, safety, and welfare, the ordinance will be held valid. A court considers factors such as increased traffic and congestion, compatibility with adjacent uses, and impact on land values of neighboring properties. Courts often apply a fairly debatable rule: if reasonable minds can differ on the reasonableness of an ordinance, the municipal decision must be upheld. Some state courts are more willing than the federal courts to use theories of STATE CONSTITUTIONAL LAW to strike down zoning regulations.

Although a court may be reluctant to question the police power objectives of zoning, it may be more inclined to examine the effects of a zoning restriction on the value of property. Even when a zoning ordinance achieves public objectives, it may be held to be a TAKING OF PROPERTY if it denies a property owner all economic use of his land. The leading case is Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon (1972).

Other guarantees may also serve as bases for constitutional challenges to zoning ordinances. The FIRST AMENDMENT repeatedly forms the basis of attacks on local sign ordinances and ordinances regulating adult businesses. In the 1960s and 1970s, a series of "exclusionary zoning" cases challenged a municipal refusal to rezone to allow mobile homes, apartments, or anything other than single family homes on large lots. Arguing that such practices violated the EQUAL PROTECTION clause, landowners and hopeful future residents had varying success. The Supreme Court was originally not interested in fashioning a federal constitutional remedy. In ARLINGTON HEIGHTS V. METROPOLITAN HOUSING DEVELOPMENT CORP. (1977) it severely restricted the authority of the federal courts to find RACIAL DISCRIMINATION in exclusionary zoning. Some state courts have been more aggressive. In Southern Burlington County NAACP v. Mount Laurel (1975), for example, the New Jersey Supreme Court held, on both substantive due process and equal protection grounds, that a municipality cannot close its doors to the housing needs of the region, including low-cost housing. Then, in Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc., (1985) the Supreme Court gave some indication that it would examine more rigorously the exclusionary classifications in zoning ordinances.

Zoning ordinances also require landowners to obtain development permission under a host of administrative procedures that vary from one JURISDICTION to another. Whether it be subdivision or site plan approval, variances, special or conditional uses, or environmental permits, the process is rife with constitutional pitfalls for local administrative bodies. The standards for approving or denying permits must be made specific in the ordinance; otherwise, a state court may hold that the ordinance unconstitutionally delegates legislative authority to an administrative body. Applicants must be given PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS, including NOTICE and an opportunity to be heard, and, in some states, even quasi-judicial procedures. The agency's decision must be based on evidence sufficient to support it.

Perhaps the most serious danger to the constitutional status of zoning is the threat of a radical departure in the judicial relief afforded a victorious landowner. Under the SEPARATION OF POWERS doctrine, the traditional judicial relief for invalid zoning has been to grant an INJUNCTION prohibiting its enforcement and allow the municipality to rezone. A few courts in the 1970s held that confiscatory zoning amounted to taking of property for public purposes and required cities to compensate landowners. The Supreme Court has not yet decided the availability of this remedy under the federal Constitution.

Damages for a taking may be available under SECTION 1983, TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE. In MONELL V. DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES (1978) the Supreme Court held that municipalities can be sued under Section 1983, and the specter of money damages for any denial of constitutional rights in the zoning process became a reality. The damage to a landowner whose economic return is restricted by zoning and who must proceed through a time-consuming local zoning process perhaps including litigation can be substantial. The traditional constitutional deference afforded local government under its police power remains, but the possible consequences of stepping outside constitutional bounds have become severe.

Zoning ordinances now include sophisticated techniques, such as computer-based point systems for approving new development, incentive and bonus programs, and the transfer of development rights. These new techniques have not yet been extensively tested in the courts, but they raise constitutional problems similar to those raised by conventional zoning. Judicial attention in the years to come will focus on the constitutionality of these techniques and on the suitability of a damage remedy in zoning cases.

DANIEL R. MANDELKER BARBARA ROSS
(1986)

Bibliography

MANDELKER, DANIEL R. 1982 Land Use Law. Charlottesville, Va.: Michie Co.

WILLIAMS, NORMAN, JR. 1974 American Land Planning Law. Chicago: Callaghan Co.

ZONING
(Update)

Zoning—the public allocation into use categories of privately held land and the subsequent regulation of land development—is by and large a legislative act undertaken by thousands of local governments. As a legislative exercise of the POLICE POWER, zoning determinations have long been presumed to be constitutionally and statutorily valid by the courts. This acceptance has not prevented the leveling of strong criticism at the zoning process. The criticism occurs on two levels: first, there is the belief that expanded social welfare conceptions of the police power are uneasily reconciled with private PROPERTY and the constitutional protection thereof, and second, even if a particular zoning measure is constitutional, its effects may be economically inefficient or socially exclusionary.

The constitutional concern over modern zoning practice is often raised in terms of the Fifth Amendment's prohibition against the TAKING OF PROPERTY for public use without the payment of JUST COMPENSATION. This constraint against the federal government has been judicially incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment's due process limitations upon state power. Influenced by WILLIAM BLACKSTONE and JOHN LOCKE, the founding generation understood the taking clause as protecting the liberty engendered by private property. The most significant—perhaps only—qualifications of this liberty was that property not be used to injure one's neighbor. The principal drafter of the Fifth Amendment, JAMES MADISON, affirmed this conception by excluding from the idea of private property uses that harmed others by not "leav[ing] to everyone else the like advantage."

Had modern applications of zoning been similarly confined to the prevention of harms or nuisances, such public control would have triggered little controversy. It is scarcely surprising, though now often overlooked, that the initial case favoring zoning's general constitutionality, EUCLID V. AMBLER REALTY (1926), stressed a nuisance-prevention rationale for public land use control. The highly influential AMICUS CURIAE brief filed in favor of the ordinance for the National Conference of City Planning stated that "the Police Power endeavors to prevent evil by checking the tendency toward it and seeks to place a margin of safety between that which is permitted and that which is sure to lend to injury or loss." Fifty years later, however, conceptions of the police power had grown dramatically, and as a consequence, governmental control of land use had become far more intrusive. The opinion of the Supreme Court in PENN CENTRAL TRANSPORTATION CO. V. NEW YORK CITY (1978) boldly asserted that valid exercises of the police power do not depend upon the "noxious' quality of the prohibited uses but rather on the ground that the restrictions were reasonably related to the implementation of a policy . . . expected to produce a widespread public benefit."

Recent Supreme Court decisions may curb somewhat this accelerated growth of the police power. Rejecting as constitutionally infirm prior state doctrines that had limited relief for overzealous zoning exercises to invalidation, the Court has now clearly held that the compensation clause of the Fifth Amendment is self-executing; moreover, the Court held in First English Evangelical Lutheran Church v. County of Los Angeles (1987) that just compensation is required for either temporary or permanent regulatory takings—that is, substantial deprivations of economic value by regulation. In actual fact, the Court seldom finds a taking based on a single factor of economic loss; generally, the Court also considers the investment expectations of the landowner and the relations between the zoning objective and both the regulatory means chosen to advance it and the landowner's contribution to the land use "problem" to be solved. One closely divided opinion of the Court, Nollan v. California Coastal Commission (1987), held that zoning regulations are to be judged by a higher level of judicial scrutiny than that applied in the review of other economic legislation.

Other cases such as LORETTO V. TELEPROMPTER, INC. (1982) make clear that any regulation accompanied by physical invasion or use by the public merits compensation. The total destruction of a "core" PROPERTY RIGHT, such as the ability to transfer property interests at death, is also constitutionally improper, as the Court stated in Hodel v. Irving (1987). Overall, the Court's recent decisions in the zoning area have established a constitutional outer limit premised upon the distinction between regulatory burdens that can be fairly placed on an individual property owner and those that more properly should be borne by the community at large through a general tax system. This principle may mean that exotic uses of the zoning power—say, withholding permits until an office developer makes a substantial contribution to the community housing or cultural fund—will be increasingly suspect.

While the Supreme Court has recently addressed the more egregious abuses of zoning, there remains substantial dissatisfaction with zoning in practice. Zoning measures continue to be presumed valid in state and federal courts, notwithstanding the Supreme Court's suggestion of heightened scrutiny, with the frequent result that physically and locationally indistinguishable property may be arbitrarily classed in very different use categories. Because the resulting value differences are profound, zoning measures are under the constant pressure of amendment or variance without meaningful standards. Regrettably, in some communities the wide-ranging discretion exercised by zoning authorities has invited serious corruption.

Zoning is also heavily reliant upon "specification standards" to accomplish land use objectives indirectly. For example, a typical zoning ordinance employs height, minimum lot, and setback limits to encourage open space and reduce or disperse density. Meeting these limits produces a monotony of design and often is not the most efficient method for accomplishing the open space objective. The advance specification of use requirements also introduces a highly static impediment to change, not to mention the consequent administrative cost and delay. These costs are most often borne by the housing consumer, and recent studies suggest that the regulatory cost burden can be as high as twenty-five percent of the finished price of a home.

The costly administrative burdens of zoning are most strongly felt by the least-affluent. To the extent that the lower economic stratum of society in a given locality is predominantly composed of members of racial or ethnic minorities, this cost obviously worsens racial SEGREGATION in housing. Absent a racially discriminatory intent, this effect does not constitute a denial of federal EQUAL PROTECTION, as the Court held in ARLINGTON HEIGHTS V. METROPOLITAN HOUSING DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION (1977). However, zoning practices that exclude low-income, multifamily structures and have a discriminatory impact may constitute a violation of the federal Fair Housing Act, as was the case in Huntington Branch, NAACP v. Town of Huntington (2nd Cir. 1988).

A variety of alternatives have been proposed to overcome these undesirable zoning effects. To supply greater procedural and distributional fairness, some JURISDICTIONS have more closely tied zoning decisions to comprehensive land use planning and have recharacterized zoning as an administrative or quasi-judicial decision. Such reforms not only supply more specific standards but also supply greater judicial supervision of abuse. To enhance the efficiency of zoning, other communities are experimenting with performance zoning systems, which articulate overall community objectives but leave the actual accomplishment of land use goals to plans submitted by individual landowners. Finally, as a general matter, modern subdivisions with detailed private covenants restricting use are less affected by zoning than are land areas within older central cities. Arguably, private controls are more sensitive to market demand and less apt to be applied uniformly over an entire community, and are therefore less exclusionary.

DOUGLAS W. KMIEC
(1992)

Bibliography

BLAESSER, BRIEN et al., eds. 1989 Land Use and the Constitution. Chicago: Planners Press, American Planning Association.

ELLICKSON, ROBERT C. and TARLOCK, A. DAN, eds. 1981 Land Use-Controls. Boston: Little, Brown.

HAAR, CHARLES M. and KAYDEN, JERROLD S., eds. 1989 Zoning and the American Dream. Chicago: Planners Press, American Planning Association.

KMIEC, DOUGLAS W. 1986 Zoning and Planning Deskbook (with 1991 Supplement). New York: Clark Boardman.

SYMPOSIUM 1988 The Jurisprudence of Takings. Columbia Law Review 88:1581–1794.

ZORACH v. CLAUSEN
343 U.S. 306 (1952)

This was the Supreme Court's second encounter with a RELEASED TIME program. In MCCOLLUM V. BOARD OF EDUCATION (1948), the Court had invalidated an arrangement by which teachers entered public schools to provide religious instruction. Zorach involved New York City's released time program in which instruction was offered off school premises. According to the requests of their parents, public school children were allowed to leave school for specific periods of time to go to church facilities. Nonparticipating students remained in their regular classrooms.

Justice WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS delivered the OPINION OF THE COURT sustaining the constitutionality of New York's program. Douglas emphasized that, as opposed to McCollum, no public facilities were used. The schools, Douglas said, were merely rearranging their schedules to accommodate the needs of religious people.

Justices HUGO L. BLACK, ROBERT H. JACKSON, and FELIX FRANKFURTER dissented. Black and Jackson argued that children were compelled by law to attend public schools and that to release them for religious instruction used governmental compulsion to promote religion. In a slap at Douglas's presumed presidential ambitions, Jackson said, "Today's judgment will be more interesting to students of psychology and of the judicial process than to students of constitutional law."

RICHARD E. MORGAN
(1986)

ZURCHER v. STANFORD DAILY
436 U.S. 547 (1978)

In Zurcher v. Stanford Daily the police chief of Palo Alto, California, appealed from a federal district court decision declaring that a search of a college newspaper's office conducted pursuant to a duly authorized search warrant had infringed upon FOURTH AMENDMENT and FIRST AMENDMENT rights. There was no contention that the newspaper or any of its staff was reasonably suspected of the commission of a crime, nor was it contended that weapons, contraband, or fruits of a crime were likely to be found on the premises. Rather, the police secured a warrant on a showing of PROBABLE CAUSE for the conclusion that photographic evidence of a crime was to be found somewhere on the premises. The Supreme Court thus addressed the general question of the standards that should govern the issuance of warrants to search the premises of persons not themselves suspected of criminal activity and the specific question whether any different standards should apply to press searches.

The Court ruled that the innocence of the party to be searched was of no constitutional importance. So long as there was probable cause to believe that evidence of a crime was to be found on premises particularly described, no further showing was needed. Specifically, the Court declined to "reconstrue the Fourth Amendment" to require a showing that it would be impracticable to secure a subpoena duces tecum before a warrant could be issued.

That the party to be searched was a newspaper the Court regarded as of some moment but not enough to prefer subpoenas over warrants. Instead, the Court observed that warrant requirements should be applied with "particular exactitude when First Amendment interests would be endangered by the search."

The Court expressed confidence that magistrates would safeguard the interests of the press. Magistrates could guard against the type of intrusions that might interfere with the timely publication of a newspaper or otherwise deter normal editorial and publication decisions. Nor, said the Court, "will there be any occasion or opportunity for officers to rummage at large in newspaper files." The Court asserted that "the warrant in this case authorized nothing of this sort." Yet, as the Zurcher opinion discloses, the police searched "the Daily's photographic laboratories, filing cabinets, desks, and wastepaper baskets." The Court's application of the particular exactitude standard seems neither particular nor exact.

Zurcher is the first case squarely to authorize the search and seizure of mere evidence from an innocent party; it has raised difficult questions of Fourth Amendment reasonableness as applied to searches of other innocent third parties such as lawyers and judges. By suggesting that press values be considered in an assessment of reasonableness, it opens the door for further distinctions between searches of media and nonmedia persons. By suggesting that the reasonableness of a search is a requirement that may go beyond probable cause and specificity, it reopens discussion about the relationship between the two clauses of the Fourth Amendment.

STEVEN SHIFFRIN
(1986)

Appendix 1

The Call for the Federal Constitutional Convention

RESOLUTION OF CONGRESS

1787, February 21

WHEREAS there is provision in the Articles of Confederation & perpetual Union for making alterations therein by the Assent of a Congress of the United States and of the legislatures of the several States; And whereas experience hath evinced that there are defects in the present Confederation, as a means to remedy which several of the States and particularly the State of New York by express instruction to their delegates in Congress have suggested a convention for the purposes expressed in the following resolution and such Convention appearing to be the most probable means of establishing in these states a firm national government

Resolved that in the opinion of Congress it is expedient that on the second Monday in May next a Convention of delegates who shall have been appointed by the several states be held at Philadelphia for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation and reporting to Congress and the several legislatures such alterations and provisions therein as shall when agreed to in Congress and confirmed by the states render the federal constitution adequate to the exigencies of Government & the preservation of the Union.

Appendix 2

Articles of Confederation

Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union between the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

ARTICLE I. The style of this Confederacy shall be "The United States of America."

ART. II. Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled.

ART. III. The said States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common defence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretence whatever.

ART. IV. The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in this Union, the free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States; and the people of each State shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other State, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions, and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof respectively, provided that such restrictions shall not extend so far as to prevent the removal of property imported into any State, to any other State of which the owner is an inhabitant; provided also, that no imposition, duties, or restriction shall be laid by any State, on the property of the United States, or either of them.

If any Person guilty of or charged with treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor in any State, shall flee from justice, and be found in any of the United States, he shall, upon demand of the governor or executive power of the State from which he fled, be delivered up and removed to the State having jurisdiction of his offence.

Full faith and credit shall be given in each of these States to the records, acts, and judicial proceedings of the courts and magistrates of every other State.

ART. V. For the more convenient management of the general interests of the United States, delegates shall be annually appointed in such manner as the legislature of each State shall direct, to meet in Congress on the first Monday in November, in every year, with a power reserved to each State to recall its delegates, or any of them, at any time within the year, and to send others in their stead, for the remainder of the year.

No State shall be represented in Congress by less than two, nor by more than seven members; and no person shall be capable of being a delegate for more than three years in any term of six years; nor shall any person, being a delegate, be capable of holding any office under the United States for which he or another for his benefit receives any salary, fees, or emolument of any kind.

Each State shall maintain its own delegates in a meeting of the States, and while they act as members of the committee of the States.

In determining questions in the United States, in Congress assembled, each State shall have one vote.

Freedom of speech and debate in Congress shall not be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Congress, and the members of Congress shall be protected in their persons from arrests and imprisonments, during the time of their going to and from, and attendance on, Congress, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace.

ART. VI. No State, without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, shall send any embassy to, or receive any embassy from, or enter into any conference, agreement, alliance, or treaty with any king, prince, or state; nor shall any person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States, or any of them accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince, or foreign state; nor shall the United States in Congress assembled, or any of them, grant any title of nobility.

No two or more States shall enter into any treaty, confederation, or alliance whatever between them, without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, specifying accurately the purposes for which the same is to be entered into, and how long it shall continue.

No State shall lay any imposts or duties, which may interfere with any stipulations in treaties entered into by the United States in Congress assembled, with any king, prince, or state, in pursuance of any treaties already proposed by Congress, to the courts of France and Spain.

No vessels of war shall be kept up in time of peace by any State, except such number only as shall be deemed necessary by the United States in Congress assembled, for the defence of such State or its trade; nor shall any body of forces be kept up by any State, in time of peace, except such number only as in the judgment of the United States in Congress assembled shall be deemed requisite to garrison the forts necessary for the defence of such State; but every State shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred, and shall provide and constantly have ready for use, in public stores, a due number of field-pieces and tents, and a proper quantity of arms, ammunition, and camp equipage.

No State shall engage in any war without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, unless such State be actually invaded by enemies, or shall have received certain advice of a resolution being formed by some nation of Indians to invade such State, and the danger is so imminent as not to admit of a delay till the United States in Congress assembled can be consulted; nor shall any State grant commissions to any ships or vessels of war, nor letters of marque or reprisal, except it be after a declaration of war by the United States in Congress assembled, and then only against the kingdom or state, and the subjects thereof, against which war has been so declared, and under such regulations as shall be established by the United States in Congress assembled, unless such State be infested by pirates, in which case vessels of war may be fitted out for that occasion, and kept so long as the danger shall continue, or until the United States in Congress assembled shall determine otherwise.

ART. VII. When land forces are raised by any State for the common defence, all officers of or under the rank of colonel shall be appointed by the legislature of each State respectively, by whom such forces shall be raised, or in such manner as such State shall direct; and all vacancies shall be filled up by the State which first made the appointment.

ART. VIII. All charges of war and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the value of all land within each State, granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled, shall from time to time direct and appoint.

The taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the Legislatures of the several States within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled.

ART. IX. The United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war, except in the cases mentioned in the sixth article—of sending and receiving ambassadors—entering into treaties and alliances, provided that no treaty of commerce shall be made whereby the legislative power of the respective States shall be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners as their own people are subjected to, or from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities whatsoever—of establishing rules for deciding, in all cases, what captures on land or water shall be legal, and in what manner prizes taken by land or naval forces in the service of the United States shall be divided or appropriated—of granting letters of marque and reprisal in times of peace—appointing courts for the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and establishing courts for receiving and determining finally appeals in all cases of captures, provided that no member of Congress shall be appointed a judge of any of the said courts.

The United States in Congress assembled shall also be the last resort on appeal in all disputes and differences now subsisting or that hereafter may arise between two or more States concerning boundary, jurisdiction, or any other cause whatever; which authority shall always be exercised in the manner following:—Whenever the legislative or executive authority or lawful agent of any State in controversy with another shall present a petition to Congress stating the matter in question and praying for a hearing, notice thereof shall be given by order of Congress to the legislative or executive authority of the other State in controversy, and a day assigned for the appearance of the parties by their lawful agents, who shall then be directed to appoint, by joint consent, commissioners or judges to constitute a court for hearing and determining the matter in question; but if they cannot agree, Congress shall name three persons out of each of the United States, and from the list of such persons each party shall alternately strike out one, the petitioners beginning, until the number shall be reduced to thirteen; and from that number not less than seven, nor more than nine names, as Congress shall direct, shall, in the presence of Congress, be drawn out by lot, and the persons whose names shall be so drawn, or any five of them, shall be commissioners or judges, to hear and finally determine the controversy, so always as a major part of the judges who shall hear the cause shall agree in the determination; and if either party shall neglect to attend at the day appointed, without showing reasons, which Congress shall judge sufficient, or, being present, shall refuse to strike, the Congress shall proceed to nominate three persons out of each State, and the Secretary of Congress shall strike in behalf of such party absent or refusing; and the judgment and sentence of the court to be appointed, in the manner before prescribed, shall be final and conclusive; and if any of the parties shall refuse to submit to the authority of such court, or to appear or defend their claim or cause, the court shall nevertheless proceed to pronounce sentence or judgment, which shall in like manner be final and decisive, the judgment or sentence and other proceedings being in either case transmitted to Congress, and lodged among the acts of Congress for the security of the parties concerned: provided that every commissioner, before he sits in judgment, shall take an oath, to be administered by one of the judges of the Supreme or Superior court of the State where the cause shall be tried, "well and truly to hear and determine the matter in question according to the best of his judgment, without favor, affection, or hope of reward," provided also that no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States.

All controversies concerning the private right of soil, claimed under different grants of two or more States, whose jurisdictions as they may respect such lands and the States which passed such grants are adjusted, the said grants or either of them being at the same time claimed to have originated antecedent to such settlement of jurisdiction, shall, on the petition of either party to the Congress of the United States, be finally determined as near as may be in the same manner as is before prescribed for deciding disputes respecting territorial jurisdiction between different States.

The United States in Congress assembled shall also have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the alloy and value of coin struck by their own authority, or by that of the respective States—fixing the standard of weights and measures throughout the United States—regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians, not members of any of the States, provided that the legislative right of any State within its own limits be not infringed or violated—establishing and regulating post-offices from one State to another, throughout all the United States, and exacting such postage on the papers passing through the same as may be requisite to defray the expenses of the said office—appointing all officers of the land forces in the service of the United States, excepting regimental officers—appointing all the officers of the naval forces, and commissioning all officers whatever in the service of the United States—making rules for the government and regulation of the said land and naval forces, and directing their operations.

The United States in Congress assembled shall have authority to appoint a committee, to sit in the recess of Congress, to be denominated "A Committee of the States," and to consist of one delegate from each State; to appoint such other committees and civil officers as may be necessary for managing the general affairs of the United States under their direction; and to appoint one of their number to preside, provided that no person be allowed to serve in the office of president more than one year in any term of three years—to ascertain the necessary sums of money to be raised for the service of the United States, and to appropriate and apply the same for defraying the public expenses—to borrow money, or emit bills on the credit of the United States, transmitting every half-year to the respective States an account of the sums of money so borrowed or emitted—to build and equip a navy—to agree upon the number of land forces, and to make requisitions from each State for its quota, in proportion to the number of white inhabitants in such State; which requisition shall be binding, and thereupon the legislature of each State shall appoint the regimental officers, raise the men, and cloathe, arm and equip them in a soldier-like manner, at the expense of the United States, and the officers and men so cloathed, armed, and equipped shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on by the United States in Congress assembled; but if the United States in Congress assembled shall, on consideration of circumstances, judge proper that any State should not raise men, or should raise a smaller number than its quota, and that any other State should raise a greater number of men than the quota thereof, such extra number shall be raised, officered, cloathed, armed, and equipped in the same as the quota of such State, unless the legislature of such State shall judge that such extra number cannot be safely spared outside of the same, in which case they shall raise, officer, cloath, arm, and equip as many of such extra number as they judge can be safely spared: and the officers and men, so cloathed, armed and equipped shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on, by the United States in Congress assembled.

The United States in Congress assembled shall never engage in a war, nor grant letters of marque and reprisal in time of peace, nor enter into any treaties or alliances, nor coin money, nor regulate the value thereof, nor ascertain the sums and expenses necessary for the defence and welfare of the United States, or any of them, nor emit bills, nor borrow money on the credit of the United States, nor appropriate money, nor agree upon the number of vessels of war to be built or purchased, or the number of land or sea forces to be raised, nor appoint a commander-in-chief of the army or navy, unless nine States assent to the same; nor shall a question on any other point, except for adjourning from day to day, be determined, unless by the votes of a majority of the United States in Congress assembled.

The Congress of the United States shall have power to adjourn to any time within the year, and to any place within the United States, so that no period of adjournment be for a longer duration than the space of six months, and shall publish the journal of their proceedings monthly, except such parts thereof relating to treaties, alliances, or military operations, as in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the delegates of each State on any question shall be entered on the journal, when it is desired by any delegate; and the delegates of a State, or any of them, at his or their request, shall be furnished with a transcript of the said journal, except such parts as are above excepted, to lay before the legislatures of the several States.

ART. X. The Committee of the States, or any nine of them, shall be authorized to execute, in the recess of Congress, such of the powers of Congress as the United States in Congress assembled, by the consent of nine States, shall from time to time think expedient to vest them with: provided that no power be delegated to the said Committee, for the exercise of which, by the Articles of Confederation, the voice of nine States in the Congress of the United States assembled is requisite.

ART. XI. Canada acceding to this Confederation, and joining in the measures of the United States, shall be admitted into and entitled to all the advantages of this Union; but no other colony shall be admitted into the same, unless such admission be agreed to by nine States.

ART. XII. All bills of credit emitted, monies borrowed, and debts contracted by or under the authority of Congress, before the assembling of the United States in pursuance of the present Confederation, shall be deemed and considered as a charge against the United States, for payment and satisfaction whereof the said United States and the public faith are hereby solemnly pledged.

ART. XIII. Every State shall abide by the determinations of the United States in Congress assembled, on all questions which by this Confederation are submitted to them. And the Articles of this Confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the Union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every State.

AND WHEREAS it hath pleased the Great Governor of the world to incline the hearts of the legislatures we respectively represent in Congress to approve of and to authorize us to ratify the said Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union. KNOW YE, that we, the undersigned delegates, by virtue of the power and authority to us given for that purpose, do by these presents, in the name and in behalf of our respective constituents, fully and entirely ratify and confirm each and every of the said Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union, and all and singular the matters and things therein contained: and we do further solemnly plight and engage the faith of our respective constituents that they shall abide by the determinations of the United States in Congress assembled, on all questions which by the said Confederation are submitted to them. And that the Articles thereof shall be inviolably observed by the States we respectively represent, and that the Union shall be perpetual.

Appendix 3

The Constitution of the United States

In the following printed copy of the Constitution, spelling, capitalization, and punctuation conform to the text of the engrossed parchment.

We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION. 1. All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

SECTION. 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States, and the Electors in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature.

No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the Age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons. The actual Enumeration shall be made within three Years after the first Meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent Term of ten Years, in such Manner as they shall by Law direct. The Number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty Thousand, but each State shall have at Least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to chuse three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New-York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

When vacancies happen in the Representation from any State, the Executive Authority thereof shall issue Writs of Election to fill such Vacancies.

The House of Representatives shall chuse their speaker and other Officers; and shall have the sole Power of Impeachment.

SECTION. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six Years; and each Senator shall have one Vote.

Immediately after they shall be assembled in Consequence of the first Election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three Classes. The Seats of the Senators of the first Class shall be vacated at the Expiration of the second Year, of the second Class at the Expiration of the fourth Year, and of the third Class at the Expiration of the sixth Year, so that one third may be chosen every second Year; and if Vacancies happen by Resignation, or otherwise, during the Recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary Appointments until the next Meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such Vacancies.

No Person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no Vote, unless they be equally divided.

The Senate shall chuse their other Officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the Absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the Office of President of the United States.

The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.

Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to law.

SECTION. 4. The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators.

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every Year, and such Meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by Law appoint a different Day.

SECTION. 5. Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members, and a Majority of each shall constitute a Quorum to do business; but a smaller Number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the Attendance of absent Members, in such Manner, and under such Penalties as each House may provide.

Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behaviour, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member.

Each House shall keep a Journal of its Proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such Parts as may in their Judgment require Secrecy; and the Yeas and Nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the Desire of one fifth of those Present, be entered on the Journal.

Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other Place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

SECTION. 6. The Senators and Representatives shall receive a Compensation for their Services, to be ascertained by Law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place.

No Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been encreased during such time; and no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office.

SECTION. 7. All Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with Amendments as on other Bills.

Every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a Law, be presented to the President of the United States; If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his Objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such Reconsideration two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent, together with the Objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a Law. But in all such Cases the Votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and Nays, and the Names of the Persons voting for and against the Bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten Days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the Same shall be a Law, in like Manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevent its Return, in which Case it shall not be a Law.

Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill.

SECTION. 8. The Congress shall have Power To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

To borrow Money on the credit of the United States;

To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes;

To establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization, and uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States;

To coin Money, regulate the Value thereof, and of foreign Coin, and fix the Standard of Weights and Measures;

To provide for the Punishment of counterfeiting the Securities and current Coin of the United States;

To establish Post Offices and post Roads;

To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries;

To constitute Tribunals inferior to the supreme Court;

To define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offences against the Law of Nations;

To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make rules concerning Captures on Land and Water;

To raise and support Armies, but no Appropriation of Money to that Use shall be for a longer Term than two Years;

To provide and maintain a Navy;

To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces;

To provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions;

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress;

To exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten Miles square), as may, by Cession of particular States, and the Acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like Authority over all Places purchased by the Consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be for the Erection of Forts, Magazines, Arsenals, dock-Yards, and other needful Buildings;—And

To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

SECTION. 9. The Migration or Importation of such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a Tax or duty may be imposed on such Importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each Person.

The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it.

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or Enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

No Tax or Duty shall be laid on Articles exported from any State.

No Preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another; nor shall Vessels bound to, or from, one State, be obliged to enter, clear or pay Duties in another.

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time.

No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

SECTION. 10. No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing it's inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controul of the Congress.

No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE II.

SECTION. 1. The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows

Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by Ballot for two Persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a List of all the Persons voted for, and of the Number of Votes for each; which List they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the Presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the Certificates, and the Votes shall then be counted. The Person having the greatest Number of Votes shall be the President, if such Number be a Majority of the whole Number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such Majority, and have an equal Number of Votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by Ballot one of them for President: and if no Person have a Majority, then from the five highest on the List the said House shall in like Manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the Votes shall be taken by States, the Representation from each State having one Vote; A quorum for this Purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a Majority of all the States shall be necessary to a Choice. In every Case, after the Choice of the President, the Person having the greatest Number of Votes of the Electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal Votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by Ballot the Vice President.

The Congress may determine the Time of chusing the Electors, and the Day on which they shall give their Votes; which Day shall be the same throughout the United States.

No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

In Case of the Removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation, or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of the said Office, the Same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by Law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation or Inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such Officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

The President shall, at stated Times, receive for his Services, a Compensation, which shall neither be encreased nor diminished during the Period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that Period any other Emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Before he enter on the Execution of his Office, he shall take the following Oath or Affirmation:—"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

SECTION. 2. The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session.

SECTION. 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

SECTION. 4. The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

ARTICLE III.

SECTION. 1. The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

SECTION. 2. The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State;—between Citizens of different States;—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury; and such Trial shall be held in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the Trial shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by Law have directed.

SECTION. 3. Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the Testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

The Congress shall have Power to declare the Punishment of Treason, but no Attainder of Treason shall work Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture except during the Life of the Person attainted.

ARTICLE IV.

SECTION. 1. Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

SECTION. 2. The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

A person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on Demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime.

No Person held to Service or Labour in one State, under the Laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in Consequence of any Law or Regulation therein, be discharged from such Service or Labour, but shall be delivered upon on Claim of the Party to whom such Service or Labour may be due.

SECTION. 3. New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

SECTION. 4. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.

ARTICLE V.

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

ARTICLE VI.

All Debts contracted and Engagements entered into, before the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution, as under the Confederation.

This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.

ARTICLE VII.

The Ratification of the Conventions of nine States, shall be sufficient for the Establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the Same.

DONE in Convention by the Unanimous Consent of the States present the Seventeenth Day of September in the Year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and Eighty seven and of the Independence of the United States of America the Twelfth. IN WITNESS whereof We have hereunto subscribed our Names:

G° WASHINGTON

Presidt and deputy from Virginia

The Word “the”, being interlined between the seventh and eighth Lines of the first Page, the Word “Thirty” being partly written on an Erazure in the fiftienth Line of the first Page, The Words “is tried” being interlined between the thirty second and thirty third Lines of the first Page and the Word “the” being interlined between the forty third and forty fourth Lines of the second Page.

Attest William Jackson
Secretary

| | |
|---|---|
| DELAWARE | GEO: READGUNNING BEDFORD junJOHN DICKINSONRICHARD BASSETTJACO: BROOM |
| MARYLAND | JAMES MCHENRYDAN OF ST. THOS. JENIFERDANL. CARROLL |
| VIRGINIA | JOHN BLAIR—JAMES MADISON JR. |
| NORTH CAROLINA | WM. BLOUNTRICHD. DOBBS SPAIGHTHU WILLIAMSON |
| SOUTH CAROLINA | J. RUTLEDGECHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEYCHARLES PINCKNEYPIERCE BUTLER |
| GEORGIA | WILLIAM FEWABR BALDWIN |
| NEW HAMPSHIRE | JOHN LANGDONNICHOLAS GILMAN |
| MASSACHUSETTS | NATHANIEL GORHAMRUFUS KING |
| CONNECTICUT | WM. SAML. JOHNSONROGER SHERMAN |
| NEW YORK | ALEXANDER HAMILTON |
| NEW JERSEY | WIL: LIVINGSTONDAVID BREARLEYWM. PATTERSONJONA: DAYTON |
| PENNSYLVANIA | B. FRANKLINTHOMAS MIFFLINROBT. MORRISGEO. CLYMERTHOS. FITZSIMONSJARED INGERSOLLJAMES WILSONGOUV MORRIS |

AMENDMENT I

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

AMENDMENT II

A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

AMENDMENT III

No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

AMENDMENT IV

The right of the People to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularity describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

AMENDMENT V

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

AMENDMENT VI

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

AMENDMENT VII

In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

AMENDMENT VIII

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

AMENDMENT IX

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

AMENDMENT X

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

AMENDMENT XI

The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

AMENDMENT XII

The Electors shall meet in their respective states, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate;—The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;—The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.—The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President, shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

AMENDMENT XIII

SECTION 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SECTION 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XIV

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SECTION 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SECTION 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

SECTION 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SECTION 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

AMENDMENT XV

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XVI

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

AMENDMENT XVII

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

AMENDMENT XVIII

SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

SECTION 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

SECTION 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

AMENDMENT XIX

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XX

SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

SECTION 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

SECTION 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

SECTION 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

SECTION 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission.

AMENDMENT XXI

SECTION 1. The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

SECTION 2. The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

SECTION 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

AMENDMENT XXII

SECTION 1. No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than two years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once. But this Article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this Article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this Article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

SECTION 2. This Article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress.

AMENDMENT XXIII

SECTION 1. The District constituting the seat of Government of the United States shall appoint in such manner as the Congress may direct:

A number of electors of President and Vice President equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives in Congress to which the District would be entitled if it were a State, but in no event more than the least populous State; they shall be in addition to those appointed by the States, but they shall be considered, for the purposes of the election of President and Vice President, to be electors appointed by a State; and they shall meet in the District and perform such duties as provided by the twelfth article of amendment.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XXIV

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote in any primary or other election for President or Vice President, for electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Representative in Congress, shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XXV

SECTION 1. In case of the removal of the President from office or of his death or resignation, the Vice President shall become President.

SECTION 2. Whenever there is a vacancy in the office of the Vice President, the President shall nominate a Vice President who shall take office upon confirmation by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress.

SECTION 3. Whenever the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that he is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, and until he transmits to them a written declaration to the contrary, such powers and duties shall be discharged by the Vice President as Acting President.

SECTION 4. Whenever the Vice president and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive departments or of such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice President shall immediately assume the powers and duties of the office as Acting President.

Thereafter, when the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that no inability exists, he shall resume the powers and duties of his office unless the Vice President and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive department or of such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit within four days to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office. Thereupon Congress shall decide the issue, assembling within forty-eight hours for that purpose if not in session. If the Congress, within twenty-one days after receipt of the latter written declaration, or, if Congress is not in session, within twenty-one days after Congress is required to assemble, determines by two-thirds vote of both Houses that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice President shall continue to discharge the same as Acting President; otherwise, the President shall resume the powers and duties of his office.

AMENDMENT XXVI

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States, who are eighteen years of age or older, to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of age.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XXVII

No law, varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives, shall take effect, until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

Appendix 4

Resolution Transmitting the Constitution to Congress

IN CONVENTION

Monday, September 17, 1787

PRESENT, The States of New-Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Mr. Hamilton from New-York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

Resolved, That the [following] Constitution be laid before the United States in Congress assembled, and that it is the opinion of this convention, that it should afterwards be submitted to a convention of delegates, chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its legislature, for their assent and ratification; and that each convention assenting to, and ratifying the same should give notice thereof to the United States in Congress assembled.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this convention, that as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this Constitution, the United States in Congress assembled should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which the electors should assemble to vote for the President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this Constitution; that after such publication the electors should be appointed, and the senators and representatives elected; that the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President, and should transmit their votes certified, signed, sealed, and directed, as the Constitution requires, to the secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the senators and representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the senators should appoint a president of the Senate, for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President; and that after he shall be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should without delay proceed to execute this Constitution.

By the unanimous order of the convention.

GEORGE WASHINGTON, President.

WILLIAM JACKSON, Secretary.

Appendix 5

Washington's Letter of Transmittal

IN CONVENTION

September 17, 1787

SIR,

WE HAVE now the honor to submit to the consideration of the United States in Congress assembled, that Constitution which has appeared to us the most advisable.

The friends of our country have long seen and desired, that the power of making war, peace, and treaties, of levying money and regulating commerce, and the correspondent executive and judicial authorities should be fully and effectually vested in the general government of the Union: but the impropriety of delegating such extensive trust to one body of men is evident—Hence results the necessity of a different organization.

It is obviously impracticable in the federal government of these States, to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all—Individuals entering into society, must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest. The magnitude of the sacrifice must depend as well on situation and circumstances as on the object to be obtained. It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered, and those which may be reserved; and on the present occasion this difficulty was increased by a difference among the several States as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interests.

In all our deliberations on this subject we kept steadily in our view, that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American, the consolidation of our Union, in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety, perhaps our national existence. This important consideration, seriously and deeply impressed on our minds, led each State in the Convention to be less rigid on points of inferior magnitude, than might have been otherwise expected; and thus the Constitution, which we now present, is the result of a spirit of amity, and of that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable.

That it will meet the full and entire approbation of every State is not perhaps to be expected; but each will doubtless consider, that had her interest alone been consulted, the consequences might have been particularly disagreeable or injurious to others; that it is liable to as few exceptions as could reasonably have been expected, we hope and believe; that it may promote the lasting welfare of that country so dear to us all, and secure her freedom and happiness, is our most ardent wish.

With great respect,
We have the honor to be
SIR,
Your Excellency's most Obedient and Humble Servants,
GEORGE WASHINGTON, President

By Unanimous Order of the Convention
HIS EXCELLENCY
THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS

Appendix 6

The Birth of the Constitution: A Chronology

1786

| | |
|---|---|
| September 11–14 | Annapolis Convention. |
| September 20 | Report of Annapolis Convention, calling for a Constitutional Convention, submitted to Congress. |
| October 11 | Congress sends Annapolis Convention report to committee. |
| November 23 | New Jersey elects delegates. |
| December 4 | Virginia elects delegates. |
| December 30 | Pennsylvania elects delegates. |

1787

| | |
|---|---|
| January 6 | North Carolina elects delegates. |
| January 17 | New Hampshire elects delegates. |
| February 3 | Delaware elects delegates. |
| February 10 | Georgia elects delegates. |
| February 21 | Congress calls Constitutional Convention. |
| March 3 | Massachusetts elects delegates. |
| March 6 | New York elects delegates. |
| March 8 | South Carolina elects delegates. |
| March 14 | Rhode Island refuses to elect delegates. |
| April 23–May 6 | Maryland elects delegates. |
| May 14 | Day appointed for beginning of Convention; quorum not present. |
| May 14–17 | Connecticut elects delegates. |
| May 25 | Quorum is present (seven states represented); Convention begins. |
| May 29 | Governor Edmund Randolph introduces the Virginia Plan. |
| June 15 | William Paterson introduces the New Jersey Plan. |
| July 16 | Great Compromise approved: voting power in first house of Congress to be apportioned by population; states to have equal voting power in the second house. |
| August 6 | Committee on Detail submits draft to Convention. |
| September 12 | Committee on Style submits draft to Convention. |
| September 15 | Draft Constitution approved by unanimous vote of the states represented in the Convention. |
| September 17 | Constitution is signed; Convention adjourns. |
| September 26–28 | Proposed Constitution debated in Congress. |

| | |
|---|---|
| September 28 | Congress transmits Constitution to the states for ratification action. |
| September 29 | Pennsylvania calls state convention. |
| October 17 | Connecticut calls state convention. |
| October 25 | Massachusetts calls state convention. |
| October 26 | Georgia calls state convention. |
| October 31 | Virginia calls state convention. |
| November 1 | New Jersey calls state convention. |
| November 6 | Delegates to Pennsylvania convention elected. |
| November 10 | Delaware calls state convention. |
| November 12 | Delegates to Connecticut convention elected. |
| November 19–January 7, 1788 | Delegates to Massachusetts convention elected. |
| November 20 | Pennsylvania convention begins. |
| November 26 | Delegates to Delaware convention elected. |
| November 27–December 1 | Delegates to New Jersey convention elected. |
| December 1 | Maryland calls state convention. |
| December 3 | Delaware convention begins. |
| December 4–5 | Delegates to Georgia convention elected. |
| December 6 | North Carolina calls state convention. |
| December 7 | Delaware convention ratifies Constitution (30–0). |
| December 11 | New Jersey convention begins. |
| December 12 | Pennsylvania convention ratifies Constitution (46–23). |
| December 14 | New Hampshire calls state convention. |
| December 18 | New Jersey convention ratifies constitution (38–0). |
| December 25 | Georgia convention begins. |
| December 31–February 12, 1788 | Delegates to New Hampshire convention elected. |

1788

| | |
|---|---|
| January 3 | Connecticut convention begins. |
| January 9 | Connecticut convention ratifies Constitution (128–40). |
| January 9 | Massachusetts convention begins. |
| January 19 | South Carolina calls state convention. |
| February 1 | New York calls state convention. |
| February 6 | Massachusetts convention ratifies Constitution (187–168) and proposes amendments. |
| February 13–22 | New Hampshire convention holds first session. |
| March 1 | Rhode Island calls state referendum on Constitution. |
| March 3–31 | Delegates to Virginia convention elected. |
| March 24 | Rhode Island voters reject Constitution in referendum (2711–239). |
| March 28–29 | Delegates to North Carolina convention elected. |
| April 7 | Delegates to Maryland convention elected. |
| April 11–12 | Delegates to South Carolina convention elected. |
| April 21 | Maryland convention begins. |
| April 26 | Maryland convention ratifies Constitution (63–11). |
| April 29–May 3 | Delegates to New York convention elected. |
| May 12 | South Carolina convention begins. |
| May 23 | South Carolina convention ratifies Constitution (149–73) and proposes amendments. |
| June 2 | Virginia convention begins. |
| June 17 | New York convention begins. |
| June 18 | New Hampshire convention begins second session. |
| June 21 | New Hampshire convention ratifies Constitution (57–47) and proposes amendments. |
| June 25 | Virginia convention ratifies Constitution (89–79) and proposes amendments. |

| | |
|---|---|
| July 2 | New Hampshire's ratification received by Congress; as this is the ninth state ratification, a committee is appointed to effect the transition from government under the Articles of Confederation to government under the Constitution. |
| July 21 | North Carolina convention begins. |
| July 26 | New York convention ratifies Constitution (30–27) and proposes amendments. |
| August 2 | North Carolina convention proposes amendments, but does not ratify the Constitution. |
| September 13 | Congress sets dates for presidential election and for first meeting of Congress under the Constitution. |
| November 20 | Virginia legislature requests Congress to call a second constitutional convention. |
| November 30 | North Carolina calls second state convention. |

1789

| | |
|---|---|
| May 4 | Representative James Madison announces, during congressional debate, his intention to introduce constitutional amendments. |
| May 5–6 | Petitions to Congress from legislatures of Virginia and New York, asking Congress to call a second constitutional convention, are reported and filed. |
| June 8 | Madison, in a speech in the House of Representatives, introduces amendments that will become the Bill of Rights. |
| July 21 | Madison's proposed amendments referred to select committee of the House of Representatives. |
| July 28 | Select committee reports back the proposed amendments; its report is tabled. |
| August 14–18 | Congress debates proposed amendments in Committee of the Whole. |
| August 21–22 | Delegates to second North Carolina convention elected. |
| August 24 | House of Representatives approves and sends to the Senate seventeen proposed amendments, including the provisions of the Bill of Rights. |
| September 2 | Senate begins debate on the Bill of Rights. |
| September 9 | Senate approves a version of the Bill of Rights. |
| September 21 | The Senate and House versions of the Bill of Rights are referred to a conference committee. |
| September 24 | House of Representatives approves (37–14) conference committee version of the Bill of Rights. |
| September 25 | Senate approves conference committee version of the Bill of Rights. Twelve amendments to the Constitution, including the ten now known as the Bill of Rights, are proposed by Congress to the states. |
| November 16 | Second North Carolina convention begins. |
| November 20 | New Jersey legislature ratifies the Bill of Rights. |
| November 21 | North Carolina convention ratifies Constitution (194–77) and proposes amendments. |
| December 19 | Maryland legislature ratifies the Bill of Rights. |
| December 22 | North Carolina legislature ratifies Bill of Rights. |

1790

| | |
|---|---|
| January 17 | Rhode Island calls state convention. |
| January 18 | South Carolina legislature ratifies the Bill of Rights. |
| January 25 | New Hampshire legislature ratifies the Bill of Rights. |
| January 28 | Delaware legislature ratifies the Bill of Rights. |
| February 8 | Delegates to Rhode Island convention elected. |
| February 24 | New York legislature ratifies the Bill of Rights. |

| | |
|---|---|
| March 1 | Rhode Island convention begins. |
| March 10 | Pennsylvania legislature ratifies the Bill of Rights. |
| May 29 | Rhode Island convention ratifies Constitution (34–32) and proposes amendments. |
| June | Rhode Island legislature ratifies the Bill of Rights. (N.B.: exact date in June of Rhode Island's ratification is unknown.) |

1791

| | |
|---|---|
| March 4 | Vermont admitted to the Union. |
| November 3 | Vermont legislature ratifies Bill of Rights. |
| December 15 | Virginia legislature ratifies the Bill of Rights. |

Appendix 7

Important Events in the Development of American Constitutional Law

| | |
|---|---|
| 1215 | Magna Carta. |
| 1225 | Magna Carta reissued in the modified form that became the English statute. |
| 1295 | Parliament of three estates established, the model for all future English parliaments. |
| 1297 | Confirmatio Cartarum. |
| 1322 | That no statute could be made except by consent of both lords and commons was established and declared. |
| 1354 | The phrase "due process of law" was first used in a statute. |
| 1387 | By statute the king was forbidden to levy imposts, duties, or surcharges without consent of Parliament; the king could no longer legally raise revenue by his own authority alone. |
| 1407 | The king agreed that all revenue measures must originate in the House of Commons; this practice was followed in Article I, section 7, of the Constitution. |
| 1606 | Edward Coke was appointed Chief Justice of Common Pleas. He was made Chief Justice of the King's Bench ("Lord Chief Justice of England") in 1613. |
| | First Virginia Charter. |
| 1608 | Calvin's Case. |
| 1610 | Bonham's Case. |
| 1619 | The General Assembly of Virginia met, the first representative assembly in the New World. |
| 1620 | Mayflower Compact. |
| 1628 | Petition of Right. |
| 1629 | Charter of Massachusetts Bay Company. |
| 1635 | Massachusetts General Court established a committee to write fundamental laws to limit magistrate, "in resemblance to a Magna Carta." |
| | Roger Williams banished by the General Court of Massachusetts. He founded Providence Plantation in 1636. |
| | In instructions to Governor Wyatt, the Virginia Assembly was officially recognized as a permanent institution, to meet at least annually. |
| 1639 | Fundamental Orders of Connecticut. |
| 1641 | Courts of High Commission and Star Chamber abolished; oath ex officio abolished. |
| | Massachusetts Body of Liberties. |
| | The Grand Remonstrance charged King Charles I with various unlawful acts and demanded that executive power be exercised by ministers in whom Parliament had confidence. |
| 1643 | Roger Williams's The Bloudy Tenent of Persecution. |
| 1644 | John Milton's Areopagitica, a plea against prior restraint and censorship, published. |
| 1644 | Massachusetts General Court became bicameral, as Assistants met separately from Assembly. |
| 1647 | Massachusetts General Laws and Liberties. |

| | |
|---|---|
| 1649 | Maryland Toleration Act. |
| 1652 | Roger Williams's pamphlet The Bloudy Tenent Yet More Bloudy published. |
| 1653 | The Instrument of Government, the short-lived written constitution of the English commonwealth, promulgated by Oliver Cromwell. |
| 1660–1696 | Navigation Acts. |
| 1662 | Royal Charter for Connecticut (constitution until 1818). |
| 1663 | Royal Charter of Rhode Island (constitution until 1842). |
| 1664 | New York granted to Duke of York as proprietary colony; the proprietor to have complete power to make laws. |
| 1670 | Bushell's Case. |
| 1679 | Habeas Corpus Act. |
| 1682 | Pennsylvania Frame of Government. |
| 1687 | William Penn's The Excellent Priviledge of Liberty and Property published; it included the first text of and commentary on Magna Carta published in America. |
| 1689 | Act of Toleration. |
| | English Bill of Rights. |
| | John Locke's Letter Concerning Toleration. |
| 1690 | John Locke's Two Treatises of Government. |
| 1695 | The last English licensing act, restricting freedom of the press, expired. |
| 1698 | Algernon Sidney's Discourses Concerning Government. |
| 1701 | Pennsylvania Charter of Liberties. |
| 1720–1721 | Trenchard and Gordon's essays, Cato's Letters and The Independent Whig, first published. |
| 1733 | Molasses Act. |
| 1735 | Zenger's Case. |
| 1748 | Montesquieu's Spirit of the Laws. |
| 1754 | Albany Plan of Union proposed by the Albany Congress. |
| 1758 | Emerich de Vattel's Law of Nations and of Nature. |
| 1762 | Massachusetts General Court voted a ban on general warrants; it was disallowed by the Governor. |
| 1763 | Paxton's Case (Writs of Assistance Case). |
| 1764 | James Otis, in The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved, denied the right of Parliament to tax the Americans and maintained that a court could judge an act of Parliament void if it was contrary to natural justice. |
| | The Sugar Act (American Revenue Act) was the first attempt by the British Parliament to tax the colonists for revenue purposes. |
| 1765 | Entick v. Carrington. |
| | Stamp Act. |
| | Stamp Act Congress. |
| 1765–1769 | William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England published. |
| 1766 | A county court in Northhampton County, Virginia, in an advisory opinion, declared the Stamp Act unconstitutional and therefore void. |
| | Declaratory Act. |
| 1767–1768 | John Dickinson's Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania published. |
| 1768 | Massachusetts Circular Letter. |
| 1772 | Somerset's Case. |
| 1773 | Constitutional debate in Massachusetts; Governor James Hutchinson, in a message to the General Court, asserted that supreme power must rest somewhere; the alternatives were parliamentary rule or independence. The General Court replied that sovereignty could be, and, in fact, already was, divided. |
| 1774 | Coercive Acts (Intolerable Acts), including Administration of Justice Act. |
| | First Continental Congress. |
| | The Association. |
| | Joseph Galloway proposes his Plan of Union. |
| | Thomas Jefferson's Summary View of the Rights of British America. |
| 1775 | Second Continental Congress convened. |
| | Declaration of the Causes and Necessity of Taking Up Arms. |

| | |
|---|---|
| 1776 | Thomas Paine's Common Sense. |
| | Declaration of Independence. |
| | Dickinson's draft of Articles of Confederation submitted to Congress. |
| 1776–1780 | First state constitutions written. |
| 1777 | Articles of Confederation approved by Congress and submitted to states. |
| 1779 | Congressional resolution asked states to cede their western lands to the United States. |
| 1780 | Holmes v. Walton (New Jersey). |
| 1781 | Articles of Confederation ratified and in force. |
| 1783 | Quock Walker's Case (Massachusetts). |
| 1784 | Rutgers v. Waddington (New York). |
| | James Madison's "Memorial and Remonstrance" against religious assessments. |
| 1786 | Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom. |
| | Ten Pound Act Cases (New Hampshire). |
| | Trevett v. Weeden (Rhode Island). |
| | Annapolis Convention. |
| 1787 | Bayard v. Singleton. |
| | Congress adopted resolution calling federal Constitutional Convention. |
| | John Adams's Defense of the Constitutions of Government of the United States. |
| | Constitutional Convention met in Philadelphia and drafted Constitution of the United States. |
| | Northwest Ordinance. |
| | Congress transmitted Constitution to the states for ratification. |
| 1787–1788 | The Federalist. |
| 1788 | Constitution ratified by required nine states. |
| | Congress adopted ordinance to put Constitution into effect. |
| 1789 | George Washington chosen President. |
| | Departments of State, War, and Treasury created. |
| | Judiciary Act of 1789. |
| | Habeas Corpus Act. |
| | Bill of Rights proposed. |
| | President Washington appeared in person to ask the Senate's advice and consent relative to an Indian treaty; failure to act cost the Senate a role as the President's council of advice. |
| 1790 | Alexander Hamilton's Report on the Public Credit. |
| | Treason Act. |
| 1791 | Champion and Dickason v. Casey. |
| | Bank of the United States Act. |
| | Bill of Rights ratified and in effect. |
| | Hamilton's Report on Manufactures. |
| 1792 | Hayburn's Case. |
| | President Washington used the presidential veto power for the first time, vetoing a reapportionment bill he thought unconstitutional. |
| 1793 | Chisholm v. Georgia. |
| | First Fugitive Slave Act. |
| | The Supreme Court, presented with a list of questions from the President and the cabinet concerning relations with France, refused to give an advisory opinion. |
| | Washington's Proclamation of Neutrality in the Wars of the French Revolution. |
| 1794 | Jay's Treaty. |
| | Whiskey Rebellion in Pennsylvania against federal alcohol tax. Suppressed by militia of four states under federal control. |
| 1795 | Van Horne's Lessee v. Dorrance. |
| | Post Office Department created. |
| | Ware v. Hylton. |
| 1796 | Hylton v. United States. |
| | Washington's Farewell Address. |
| | XYZ Affair began three-year undeclared war with France. |
| 1798 | Alien and Sedition Acts. |
| | Calder v. Bull. |

| | |
|---|---|
| | Department of the Navy created. |
| | Eleventh Amendment ratified and in effect. |
| | Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions. |
| 1799 | Second set of Kentucky Resolutions claimed states could nullify unconstitutional acts of Congress. |
| 1801 | Electoral College tie between Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr resolved in House of Representatives; this led to the Twelfth Amendment. |
| | John Marshall became Chief Justice. |
| | Judiciary Act of 1801. |
| 1802 | Judiciary Act of 1801 repealed; Judiciary Act of 1802 enacted. |
| 1803 | Marbury v. Madison. |
| | Stuart v. Laird. |
| | Louisiana Purchase Treaty. |
| 1804 | John Pickering, United States District Court judge for New Hampshire, having been impeached by the House of Representatives of malfeasance and intemperance, was convicted by the Senate and removed from office. |
| | Twelfth Amendment ratified and in effect. |
| 1805 | Samuel Chase, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, having been impeached by the House of Representatives of oppressive and partisan conduct, was acquitted by the Senate. |
| 1807 | Ex Parte Bollman and Swartwout. |
| | Abolition of the Slave Trade Act. |
| | Embargo Act. |
| | Trial of Aaron Burr (United States v. Burr). |
| 1809 | Massachusetts Resolutions declared the Embargo unconstitutional and not legally binding. |
| | United States v. Judge Peters (Olmstead Case). |
| 1810 | Fletcher v. Peck. |
| 1812 | New Jersey v. Wilson. |
| | United States v. Hudson and Goodwin. |
| 1814 | Hartford Convention. |
| 1815 | Terrett v. Taylor. |
| | Second Bank of the United States Act. |
| 1816 | Martin v. Hunter's Lessee. |
| 1817 | Madison's veto of Bonus Bill (on constitutional grounds). |
| 1819 | Secretary of War Calhoun recommended a program of internal improvements as a defense measure. |
| | Dartmouth College v. Woodward. |
| | McCulloch v. Maryland. |
| | Sturges v. Crowninshield. |
| 1820 | John Taylor of Caroline's Construction Construed published, arguing that the Supreme Court was destroying the independence of the states and of the other branches of the federal government. |
| | Missouri Compromise. |
| 1821 | Cohens v. Virginia. |
| 1822 | Cumberland Road Bill vetoed by President James Monroe, who also recommended a constitutional amendment authorizing the United States to build and operate internal improvements. |
| 1823 | Monroe Doctrine. |
| | Corfield v. Coryell. |
| 1824 | Gibbons v. Ogden. |
| | Osborn v. Bank of the United States. |
| 1825 | John Quincy Adams (who had finished second in the Electoral College vote) elected president by the House of Representatives. |
| | Eakin v. Raub. |
| 1826–1830 | James Kent's Commentaries on American Law. |
| 1827 | Brown v. Maryland. |
| | Martin v. Mott. |
| | Ogden v. Saunders. |

| | |
|---|---|
| 1828 | South Carolina Exposition and Protest. |
| | American Insurance Company v. Canter. |
| 1829 | Willson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Company. |
| 1830 | Maysville Road Bill vetoed by President Andrew Jackson. |
| | Daniel Webster and Robert Young Hayne participated in a great debate in the Senate on the nature of the Constitution. |
| | Craig v. Missouri. |
| | Providence Bank v. Billings. |
| 1831 | William Lloyd Garrison founded The Liberator. |
| | Cherokee Nation v. Georgia (first of the Cherokee Indian Cases). |
| 1832 | Jackson's Veto of the Bank Bill. |
| | Vice-President John C. Calhoun, in his Fort Hill Address, explained his theory of nullification. |
| | South Carolina Ordinance of Nullification of the Tariff Act of 1828. |
| | Jackson's Proclamation to the People of South Carolina. |
| | Worcester v. Georgia. |
| 1833 | Force Act of 1833. |
| | Joseph Story's Commentaries on the Constitution. |
| | Barron v. Baltimore. |
| 1836 | First congressional "gag rule" on antislavery petitions imposed. |
| | Roger B. Taney became Chief Justice. |
| 1837 | Membership of Supreme Court increased from seven to nine. |
| | New York v. Miln. |
| | Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky. |
| | Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge Company. |
| 1839 | Bank of Augusta v. Earle. |
| 1841 | Groves v. Slaughter. |
| 1842 | Reapportionment Act required representatives to be elected by district. |
| | Dobbins v. Erie Company. |
| | Swift v. Tyson. |
| | Prigg v. Pennsylvania. |
| 1843 | Bronson v. Kinzie. |
| 1844 | Texas Annexation Treaty signed; rejected by Senate. |
| 1845 | Congress, by joint resolution, approved the annexation of Texas and provided for admission of Texas as a state. |
| | Congress provided for uniform presidential election day. |
| 1847 | License Cases. |
| 1848 | Oregon Act. |
| | Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. |
| | West River Bridge Company v. Dix. |
| 1849 | Passenger Cases. |
| | Luther v. Borden. |
| 1850 | Compromise of 1850. |
| | Nashville Convention Resolutions asserted fight of secession. |
| | Strader v. Graham. |
| 1850–1858 | Personal Liberty Laws adopted by states: Vermont in 1850; Connecticut and Rhode Island in 1854; Maine, Massachusetts, and Michigan in 1855; Kansas in 1857; Wisconsin in 1858. |
| 1851 | Cooley v. Board of Wardens. |
| 1852 | Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Company. |
| | The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh. |
| 1854 | Kansas-Nebraska Act. |
| | Ohio Life Insurance & Trust Company v. DeBolt. |
| | In re Booth (Wisconsin Supreme Court held Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 unconstitutional). |
| 1855 | Connecticut adopted law requiring literacy test for voting. |
| | Court of Claims created. |
| 1856 | Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land Improvement Company. |
| | Wynehamer v. New York. |
| | Dodge v. Woolsey. |

1857 Dred Scott v. Sandford.
1858 Lincoln-Douglas debates.
1859 Ableman v. Booth.
1860 Crittenden Compromise proposed.
Senator Jefferson Davis introduced a proposal for a federal slave code.
South Carolina Ordinance of Secession.
1861 First federal income tax imposed as a war measure.
President Abraham Lincoln proclaimed insurrection, called for troops, suspended habeas corpus.
Secession of ten other states; Confederate Constitution adopted.
Kentucky v. Dennison.
1862 Abolition of slavery in the territories.
Emancipation Proclamation.
Homestead Act.
1863 Gettysburg Address.
Lincoln's Proclamation of Amnesty and Reconstruction.
1864 Lincoln's pocket veto of the Wade-Davis Bill.
Salmon P. Chase became Chief Justice.
1865 Freedmen's Bureau founded.
Joint Committee on Reconstruction established.
Thirteenth Amendment ratified and in effect.
Writ of habeas corpus restored by presidential proclamation.
1866 Civil Rights Act of 1866.
Ex Parte Milligan.
1867 First Reconstruction Act.
Habeas Corpus Act.
Tenure of Office Act.
1868 Ex parte McCardle.
Fourteenth Amendment ratified and in effect.
Impeachment of Andrew Johnson.
Johnson's proclamation of general amnesty.
Texas v. White.
1869 Wyoming adopts women's suffrage.
1870 Department of Justice established.
Fifteenth Amendment ratified and in effect.
Hepburn v. Griswold.
1871 Force Act of 1871.
Knox v. Lee.
Ku Klux Klan Act.
1872 Congress established uniform date for congressional elections.
1873 Slaughterhouse Cases.
1874 Morrison R. Waite became Chief Justice.
1875 Civil Rights Act of 1875.
1876 Disputed election: Tilden-Hayes.
Munn v. Illinois.
United States v. Cruikshank.
United States v. Reese.
1877 Compromise of 1877 settled disputed election and ended Reconstruction.
1880 Chinese Exclusion Treaty.
Strauder v. West Virginia.
1881 Kansas adopted prohibition of alcohol (first state prohibition statute).
Springer v. United States.
Kilbourn v. Thompson.
1882 Chinese Exclusion Act (enacted over presidential veto).
1883 Civil Rights Cases.
1884 Juilliard v. Greenman.
Ex parte Yarbrough.
Hurtado v. California.

| | |
|---|---|
| 1886 | Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway v. Illinois. |
| | Boyd v. United States. |
| | Yick Wo v. Hopkins. |
| 1887 | Interstate Commerce Act. |
| 1888 | Melville W. Fuller became Chief Justice. |
| 1890 | Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad v. Minnesota. |
| | Leisy v. Hardin. |
| | Sherman Antitrust Act. |
| 1892 | Counselman v. Hitchcock. |
| 1894 | Force Act of 1871 repealed. |
| | Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company. |
| 1895 | United States v. E. C. Knight Company. |
| | Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company. |
| | In re Debs. |
| 1896 | Plessy v. Ferguson. |
| | Allgeyer v. Louisiana. |
| 1897 | Trans-Missouri Freight Case. |
| | Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad v. Chicago. |
| 1898 | Holden v. Hardy. |
| | Smyth v. Ames. |
| | Williams v. Mississippi. |
| 1899 | United States v. Wong Kim Ark. |
| 1901 | New Alabama constitution: literacy and property tests, plus grandfather clause, required for voting (effect was to disenfranchise blacks). |
| 1903 | Champion v. Ames. |
| | First direct primary elections (in Wisconsin). |
| | Panama Canal Treaty (Hay-Bunau Treaty). |
| 1904 | Northern Securities Company v. United States. |
| 1905 | Swift & Company v. United States. |
| | Lochner v. New York. |
| 1906 | Hepburn Act. |
| 1908 | Muller v. Oregon. |
| | Adair v. United States. |
| | Loewe v. Lawlor. |
| | Ex parte Young. |
| | Twining v. New Jersey. |
| 1910 | Edward D. White became Chief Justice. |
| | Mann-Elkins Act. |
| 1911 | United States v. Grimaud. |
| | Standard Oil Company v. United States. |
| 1913 | Federal Reserve Act (Owen-Glass Act). |
| | Sixteenth Amendment ratified and in effect. |
| 1914 | Federal Trade Commission Act. |
| | Weeks v. United States. |
| | Shreveport Rate Case. |
| 1916 | Child Labor Act (Keating-Owen Act). |
| 1917 | Selective Service Act. |
| 1918 | Selective Draft Law Cases. |
| | Hammer v. Dagenhart. |
| 1919 | Eighteenth Amendment ratified and in effect. |
| | Schenck v. United States. |
| | Senate rejects Treaty of Versailles. |
| | Volstead Act. |
| | Abrams v. United States. |
| 1920 | Esch-Cummings Transportation Act. |
| | Missouri v. Holland. |
| | United States v. United States Steel Corporation. |

| | |
|---|---|
| | Nineteenth Amendment ratified and in effect. |
| | Palmer Raids. |
| 1921 | Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Company. |
| | Budget and Accounting Act. |
| | William Howard Taft became Chief Justice. |
| 1923 | Adkins v. Children's Hospital. |
| | Moore v. Dempsey. |
| | Massachusetts v. Mellon. |
| 1924 | Child Labor Amendment proposed by Congress. |
| 1925 | State v. Scopes (Tennessee). |
| | Pierce v. Society of Sisters. |
| | Gitlow v. New York. |
| 1926 | Meyers v. United States. |
| 1927 | Nixon v. Herndon. |
| 1928 | Olmstead v. United States. |
| 1930 | Charles Evans Hughes became Chief Justice. |
| 1931 | Near v. Minnesota. |
| 1932 | Norris-La Guardia Act. |
| | Powell v. Alabama. |
| 1933 | National Industrial Recovery Act. |
| | Securities Act of 1933. |
| | Tennessee Valley Authority Act. |
| | Twentieth Amendment ratified and in effect. |
| | Twenty-First Amendment ratified and in effect. |
| 1934 | Communications Act. |
| | Nebbia v. New York. |
| | Home Building and Loan Company v. Blaisdell. |
| | Securities Exchange Act of 1934. |
| 1935 | National Labor Relations Act (Wagner Act). |
| | Social Security Act. |
| | Schechter Poultry Corporation v. United States. |
| | Norris v. Alabama. |
| | Humphrey's Executor v. United States. |
| 1936 | Brown v. Mississippi. |
| | United States v. Butler. |
| | Ashwander v. Tennessee. |
| | Carter v. Carter Coal Company. |
| 1937 | Franklin D. Roosevelt announced Court-packing scheme. |
| | West Coast Hotel Company v. Parrish. |
| | Wagner Act Cases. |
| | Social Security Act Cases. |
| | United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation. |
| | Palko v. Connecticut. |
| 1938 | Fair Labor Standards Act. |
| | Food, Drug and Cosmetics Act. |
| | House of Representatives establishes committee to investigate un-American activities. |
| | Johnson v. Zerbst. |
| | Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada. |
| 1939 | Graves, New York ex rel., v. O'Keefe. |
| | Hatch Act. |
| 1940 | Alien Registration Act (Smith Act). |
| | Cantwell v. Connecticut. |
| 1941 | Fair Employment Practices Commission established by executive order. |
| | Harlan F. Stone became Chief Justice. |
| | United States v. Darby Lumber Company. |
| 1942 | Wickard v. Filburn. |
| | Betts v. Brady. |

| | |
|---|---|
| | President Roosevelt approved program of relocation of Japanese Americans. |
| | Skinner v. Oklahoma. |
| 1943 | McNabb v. United States. |
| | Hirabayashi v. United States. |
| | West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (Second Flag Salute Case). |
| 1944 | Korematsu v. United States. |
| | Smith v. Allwright. |
| 1946 | Frederick M. Vinson became Chief Justice. |
| 1947 | Everson v. Board of Education. |
| | First Hoover Commission established. |
| | National Labor-Management Relations Act (Taft-Hartley Act) passed over President Harry S. Truman's veto. |
| | National Security Act. |
| 1948 | Executive orders banned racial segregation in the armed forces and in civilian federal employment. |
| | Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education. |
| | Shelley v. Kraemer. |
| | Selective Service Act. |
| | Sipuel v. Board of Regents. |
| 1949 | Wolf v. Colorado. |
| 1950 | American Communications Association v. Douds. |
| | Internal Security Act (McCarran Act). |
| | Sweatt v. Painter. |
| | McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents for Higher Education. |
| 1951 | Dennis v. United States. |
| | Twenty-Second Amendment ratified and in effect. |
| 1952 | Immigration and Nationality Act (McCarran-Walter Act) became law over Truman's veto. |
| | President Truman ordered seizure of steel mills. |
| | Youngstown Sheet & Tube Company v. Sawyer (Steel Seizure Case). |
| 1953 | Earl Warren became Chief Justice. |
| 1954 | Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka. |
| | Censure of Joseph McCarthy by the United States Senate. |
| | Communist Control Act. |
| 1955 | Brown v. Board of Education II ("all deliberate speed"). |
| 1956 | Ullmann v. United States. |
| 1957 | Civil Rights Act of 1957. |
| | President Dwight D. Eisenhower ordered federal troops to enforce desegregation order in Little Rock, Arkansas. |
| | Watkins v. United States. |
| | Yates v. United States. |
| | Mallory v. United States. |
| | Roth v. United States, Alberts v. California. |
| 1958 | Cooper v. Aaron. |
| 1959 | Barenblatt v. United States. |
| 1960 | Civil Rights Act of 1960. |
| 1961 | Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board. |
| | Mapp v. Ohio. |
| | Twenty-Third Amendment ratified and in effect. |
| 1962 | Baker v. Carr. |
| | Engel v. Vitale. |
| 1963 | Edwards v. South Carolina. |
| | Gray v. Sanders. |
| | Gideon v. Wainwright. |
| 1964 | Civil Rights Act of 1964. |
| | Gulf of Tonkin Resolution. |
| | Wesberry v. Sanders. |
| | Reynolds v. Sims. |

New York Times Co. v. Sullivan.
Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States.
Malloy v. Hogan.
Escobedo v. Illinois.

1965 Pointer v. Texas.
Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Board.
Griswold v. Connecticut.
Voting Rights Act of 1965.

1966 Miranda v. Arizona.
South Carolina v. Katzenbach.
Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections.
Miranda v. Arizona.

1967 Klopfer v. North Carolina.
In re Gault.
Warden v. Hayden.
Katz v. United States.
Thurgood Marshall became the first African American Justice of the Supreme Court.

1968 Duncan v. Louisiana.
Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co.
Terry v. Ohio.

1969 Benton v. Maryland.
Chimel v. California.
Warren E. Burger became Chief Justice.

1970 In re Winship.
Williams v. Florida.

1971 New York Times Company v. United States (Pentagon Papers Case).
Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg County Board of Education.
McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, In re Burrus.
Lemon v. Kurtzman.
New York Times Co. v. United States, United States v. The Washington Post.

1972 Equal Rights Amendment proposed by Congress.
Furman v. Georgia (Capital Punishment Cases of 1972).
Kastigar v. United States.
Johnson v. Louisiana.
Apodaca v. Oregon.
Jackson v. Georgia.
Branch v. Texas.
Argersinger v. Hamlin.
Branzburg v. Hayes.

1973 Miller v. California.
Roe v. Wade.

1974 Resignation of President Richard M. Nixon.
United States v. Nixon.

1976 Buckley v. Valeo.
National League of Cities v. Usery.
Gregg v. Georgia, Proffitt v. Florida, Jurek v. Texas (Capital Punishment Cases of 1976).

1977 Panama Canal Treaties.

1978 Ballew v. Georgia.
First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti.
Regents of University of California v. Bakke.
District of Columbia Representation Amendment proposed by Congress.
Simple majority of Congress voted to extend ratification deadline for Equal Rights Amendment (original proposal had required a two-thirds vote).

1979 United Steelworkers of America v. Weber.

1981 Sandra Day O'Connor became the first woman Justice of the Supreme Court.

1982 Extended deadline for ratification of Equal Rights Amendment expired.
Plyler v. Doe.

| | |
|---|---|
| 1983 | Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha. |
| 1985 | Deadline for ratification of District of Columbia Representation Amendment expired. |
| | Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Balanced Budget Act. |
| | American Booksellers Association v. Hudnut (7th Cir.; judgment affirmed by U.S. Supreme Court, 1986). |
| 1986 | Batson v. Kentucky. |
| | Bowers v. Hardwick. |
| | Iran-Contra Affair. |
| | Pacific Gas & Electric Company v. Public Utilities Commission of California. |
| | William H. Rehnquist became Chief Justice. |
| 1987 | McCleskey v. Kemp. |
| 1988 | Hustler Magazine and Larry Flint v. Jerry Falwell. |
| | Morrison v. Olson. |
| 1989 | DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Service. |
| | Richmond (City of ) v. J. A. Croson Co. |
| | Texas v. Johnson. |
| 1990 | Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990. |
| | Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health. |
| | Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith. |
| | Missouri v. Jenkins. |
| 1992 | Lee v. Weisman. |
| | Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council. |
| | New York v. United States. |
| | Planned Parenthood v. Casey. |
| | R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul. |
| | Twenty-Seventh Amendment ratified and in effect. |
| 1993 | Nixon v. United States. |
| | Shaw v. Reno. |
| 1994 | Turner Broadcasting System v. FCC. |
| | Violence Against Women Act. |
| 1995 | Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña. |
| | Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston. |
| | Rosenberger v. Rectors & Visitors of the University of Virginia. |
| | United States v. López. |
| | U.S. Term Limits v. Thornton. |
| 1996 | Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act. |
| | 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island. |
| | Romer v. Evans. |
| | Seminole Tribe v. Florida. |
| | United States v. Virginia. |
| 1997 | Agostini v. Felton. |
| | Boerne v. Flores. |
| | Clinton v. Jones. |
| | Printz v. New York. |
| | Reno v. ACLU. |
| | Washington v. Glucksberg and Vacco v. Quill. |
| 1998 | Clinton v. New York. |
| | Impeachment of President William J. Clinton. |
| 1999 | Alden v. Maine. |
| | Saenz v. Roe. |

Glossary

abstention Any of several doctrines by which federal courts delay or avoid decision, allowing issues of state law or entire cases to be decided by state courts.

action A court case. Before the unification of law and equity, an "action" at law was distinguished from a proceeding in equity.

advisory opinion A judicial opinion on a question of law, rendered without deciding the rights of parties to an adversary proceeding. In the federal courts, advisory opinions are barred by the "case or controversy" requirement.

amicus curiae [Latin: friend of the court] One who, although not a party to the case, submits a brief suggesting how the case, or certain issues in the case, should be decided.

appeal Review of a court decision by a higher court to determine whether errors of law were made. Appeal is a particular type of review, but the word is sometimes used more generally, to refer to any review of a lower court decision.

appellate jurisdiction The legitimate authority of a higher court to hear and decide appeals from lower courts.

bail Money deposited with a court to guarantee the appearance of a defendant for trial, permitting his release from jail until trial.

bill of attainder A legislative finding of guilt and imposition of punishment without a court trial.

brief A document filed on behalf of a litigant, at trial or on appeal, stating the facts of the case and arguing the legal basis for a decision in the litigant's favor.

case law The body of law established in court decisions, as distinct from customary and statutory law. Case law is the most important component of the common law.

certification A procedure by which a lower court requests from a higher court (or a federal court requests from a state court) guidance on questions of law relative to a case pending in the lower court.

certiorari [Latin: to be made more certain] A form of writ directing a lower court to forward the record of a case to a higher court for review; it is the primary form of discretionary appellate review by the U.S. Supreme Court.

civil law (1) the body of law dealing with the private rights and duties of individuals, distinguished from criminal law; (2) a body of law derived from the Roman legal codes that is in force in continental Europe and elsewhere, distinguished from common law. Civil law, in the latter sense, is the basis of much of the private law of Louisiana, and it is the original source of some aspects of property law in Texas and in states formed from the Mexican Cession.

* Entries marked with an asterisk have a separate article in the Encyclopedia.

class action A legal action brought by one or more litigants in the name of a numerous class of whom the particular litigants claim to be representative, or an action against a numerous class of defendants.

comity The respect owed by one court or governmental agency to the official acts of a court or agency in another jurisdiction.

common law The body of legal custom and accumulated precedent inherited from England, sometimes inaccurately described as "judge-made law."

concurrent powers Governmental powers that may be exercised either by the national or by the state government.

concurring opinion A separate opinion filed by a judge of a multimember court indicating agreement with the decision of a case but setting forth alternative or additional reasons for reaching the result.

consent decree A court order that makes legally binding an agreement between the parties to a case to settle it without further litigation.

declaratory judgment A judicial order determining the legal rights of the parties in a particular case, anticipating future controversy rather than remedying past injury. Equitable in form, declaratory relief is available in federal court by virtue of an act of Congress.

de facto [Latin: in fact] Existing in fact, whether or not existing in law or by right.

defendant The party against whom an action is brought. At the appellate level the party moved against is called the appellee or respondent.

de jure [Latin: in law] Existing in law or by virtue of official acts; distinguished from de facto (q.v.).

dictum (pl. dicta) [Latin: something said] Formerly, an authoritative pronouncement. Now, commonly used as an abbreviation of "obiter dictum" (q.v.).

dissenting opinion An opinion by a judge of a multimember court who disagrees with the court's decision in a case.

diversity jurisdiction The legitimate authority of federal courts to hear cases in which the parties have "diversity of citizenship," that is, when they are citizens of different states or of a state and a foreign country.

dual federalism A doctrine of constitutional interpretation according to which the reserved powers of the states operate as limitations on the power of the national government.

due process of law The fair and regular procedures established by law. Under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, the government may deprive a person of life, liberty, or property only after due process. The due process clauses of the Constitution protect both procedural and substantive rights.

equity A system of jurisprudence parallel to and corrective of the common law, based on principles of fairness rather than on the letter of the law. In most American jurisdictions, law and equity have been merged.

error A form of writ issued by a higher court directing a lower court to submit a case for appellate review. The writ of error is no longer used in the federal courts, having been superseded by appeal (q.v.).

exclusionary rule A rule excluding evidence obtained in violation of a defendant's rights from admission at the defendant's trial as proof of guilt.

ex parte [Latin: from one party; from the part (of)] (1) A hearing or other legal act at which only one side of a case is represented; (2) in the heading of a case, an identification of the party who is applying for judicial relief.

ex post facto [Latin: from after the fact] A law that makes criminal, or that increases the criminal penalty for, an act committed before the law was passed.

ex relatione [Latin: from what has been related (by)] Legal actions brought by the state upon information supplied by or at the instigation of a private party are said to be "ex relatione." In reports, it is abbreviated "ex rel."

federal question jurisdiction The legitimate authority of a federal court to hear and decide cases "arising under" the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States.

grand jury An investigatory body that is usually empowered to issue indictments or presentments charging persons with crimes.

habeas corpus [Latin: you shall have the body] A form of writ directing a custodial official to appear before a judge with the person of a prisoner and to give a satisfactory legal justification for having the person in custody. The writ of habeas corpus is frequently used by state prisoners to obtain federal court review of their convictions.

immunity In criminal cases, a grant of exemption from prosecution made in return for testimony; in intergovernmental relations, the exemption of government instrumentalities from taxation by other levels of government. In general, an exemption from a legally imposed duty or liability; along with privileges, immunities are protected by Article IV and by the Fourteenth Amendment.

incorporation (1) A doctrine according to which certain specific provisions of the Bill of Rights are made applicable against state authority by virtue of the "due process" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment; (2) a doctrine according to which certain territories are made so intimately a part of the United States that certain constitutional protections become applicable to the inhabitants.

indictment A formal statement by a grand jury charging a person with a criminal offense.

in forma pauperis [Latin: in the manner of a poor person] A proceeding in which the court waives requirements that a litigant pay certain fees and comply with certain formal requirements, granted because the litigant cannot afford to comply but ought not to be barred from access to the court.

injunction A form of writ prohibiting or .requiring the performance of a specific act by a particular person. An injunction is a form of remedy available under a court's equity power.

in personam [Latin: against the person] A manner of proceeding in a case so that the decision and remedy are directed against a particular person.

in re [Latin: in the matter (of )] A way of titling the report of a case in which there are no adversary parties.

in rem [Latin: against the thing] A manner of proceeding in a case so that the decision and remedy affect the status of property with reference to the whole world rather than to particular individuals.

judgment The official decision by a court of a case or controversy, including the remedy ordered, excluding the reasons for the ruling.

judicial review The power of a court to review legislation or other governmental acts, including the acts of administrative agencies. The term is used especially for court review to determine whether an act is in conformance with the Constitution.

jurisdiction Legitimate authority. The term is sometimes limited to the legitimate authority of courts to hear and decide cases.

jury A body of lay citizens exercising responsibility for hearing and deciding facts in the judicial system; a jury is either a grand jury (q.v.) or a petit jury (q.v.).

justiciability The status of a case or controversy indicating that it may appropriately be heard and decided by a court.

litigant A party to a legal action.

magistrate At the time the Constitution was written and in general, a government official, especially of the executive or judicial branch. In contemporary technical usage, a judicial officer authorized to conduct certain kinds of hearings, to issue certain kinds of orders, or to try minor offenses.

mandamus [Latin: we command] A form of writ directed to a government official or a lower court directing the performance of an act appropriate to that official's or court's duties.

mootness The status of a case or controversy indicating that it no longer involves a legal question appropriate to be heard and decided by a court.

nolo contendere [Latin: I do not wish to contest (it).] A plea entered by a criminal defendant equivalent in effect to a plea of guilty in the criminal case but not amounting to an admission of guilt that might be used in another case, either civil or criminal.

obiter dictum [Latin: said by the way] Any words in a court's opinion that are not required for the decision of the case, and that are therefore, in theory, not binding as precedent. The term is often misleadingly abbreviated to "dictum" or to its plural, "dicta."

original jurisdiction The legitimate authority of a court to hear and decide cases in the first instance. Original jurisdiction is distinguished from appellate jurisdiction (q.v.).

ordinance Any statute. In recent times, most commonly used for enactments by cities, counties, or other local governments.

per curiam [Latin: by the court] An unsigned opinion, attributable to the whole court and not to an individual judge as author.

petit jury The ordinary trial jury; a body of lay persons who hear evidence and decide questions of fact in a civil or criminal case.

plaintiff The party who brings an action. At the appellate level, the moving party is called the appellant or the petitioner.

police power The general authority of government to regulate the health, safety, morals, and welfare of the public.

political question An issue reserved for decision by the legislative and executive branches of government, and so not appropriately decided by a court.

precedent A past decision, resolving issues of law, which is relied on in the decision of later cases.

preemption A doctrine according to which legislation by the national government explicitly displaces or conflicts with state legislation or has so pervaded a particular area or topic of regulation as to preclude state legislation on the same subject.

presentment A formal report of a grand jury charging a person with a criminal offense; a presentment differs from an indictment in that the former is prepared on the grand jury's own initiative while the latter is initiated by the public prosecutor. Reports of the results of grand jury investigations are often referred to as "presentments" even when they do not contain criminal charges.

ratio decidendi [Latin: reason for being decided] The reasoning supporting the decision of a court in a particular case, establishing a precedent.

remand The action of a higher court in returning a case to a lower court for decision or for further proceedings.

ripeness The status of a case when circumstances have advanced to the point of sufficient specificity and concreteness to justify decision or review.

seriatim [Latin: serially] One at a time, in sequence; used to describe the opinions of judges on multimember tribunals where custom does not permit a single "opinion of the court."

special master A person appointed by a court to perform certain functions in a case, especially to hear evidence and to make findings of fact.

standing The legal status of a litigant indicating that he is a proper party to litigate an issue or a case or controversy.

stare decisis [Latin: to stand by what has been decided] A doctrine requiring that courts, in deciding cases, should adhere to the principles of law established in prior cases, called precedents (q.v.).

state action Official action by a state or under color of state law, an essential element of a claim of right raised under the "due process" or "equal protection" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

statute A law enacted by a legislature; a part of the formal, written law. Also called an "act" of Congress or of the legislature, a statute is to be distinguished from a constitution and also from customary or common law and case law.

subpoena [Latin: under penalty] An order to appear and testify at a proceeding (subpoena ad testificandum) or to produce physical evidence at a proceeding (subpoena duces tecum).

transactional immunity Immunity from prosecution for any offense mentioned in testimony given in exchange for the grant of immunity, regardless of other evidence that may be acquired independently.

ultra vires [Latin: beyond (its) power] An action by a person, corporation, or public agency that is beyond the actor's legitimate authority.

use immunity Immunity from prosecution based upon or using evidence of an offense given by a witness in exchange for the grant of immunity. Prosecution may occur only if it is based on independently acquired evidence.

venue The place where a case is to be heard.

vested rights Legally recognized rights, especially property rights, of which a person may not be deprived without due process of law.

writ A court order.

Case Index

HOW TO READ A CASE CITATION

A case citation tells the reader where the decision and opinion in a case have been reported. It gives, in shorthand form, all the information necessary to find a copy of the report.

The elements of a typical citation are the volume number, the name of the reporter or of the compilation, (the series number,) the page number of the first page of the report, (the court or jurisdiction,) and the year in which the case was decided. Any information that is unnecessary or inapplicable is omitted. Thus,

384 U.S. 346 (1966)

is the citation to the case reported in volume 384 of the United States Reports, beginning on page 346; the case (Miranda v. Arizona) was decided in 1966 by the Supreme Court of the United States. So far, there is only one series of volumes in the United States Reports, and all cases in the United States Reports are Supreme Court cases or matters disposed of by Supreme Court Justices. And is the citation to the case reported in volume 13 of the New York Reports beginning on page 378; the case (Wynehamer v. People) was decided in 1858 by the New York Court of Appeals (the highest court of New York).

13 N.Y. 378 (1858)

Many volumes of reports, especially reports of older cases, bear the name of the reporter rather than of the jurisdiction. Some volumes of reports, especially specialized volumes, have names indicating neither the reporter nor the jurisdiction. The table that follows lists the reports in which cases cited in this Encyclopedia are to be found:

| | |
|---|---|
| U.S. | United States Reports |
| Dall. | Dallas (= United States Reports, vols. 1–4) |
| Cranch | Cranch (= U.S. Reports vols. 5–13) |
| Wheat. | Wheaton (= U.S. Reports vols. 14–25) |
| Pet. | Peters (= U.S. Reports vols. 26–41) |
| How. | Howard (= U.S. Reports vols. 42–65) |
| Black | Black (= U.S. Reports vols. 66–67) |
| Wall. | Wallace (= U.S. Reports vols. 68–90) |
| S.Ct. | West's Supreme Court Reporter (cited only when the citation to U.S. Reports was unavailable at the time of compilation) |

| | |
|---|---|
| F. | Federal Reporter (F. 2d = Federal Reporter, 2d series) |
| F. Supp. | Federal Supplement |
| F. Cas. | Federal Cases |
| Ct. Cl. | U.S. Court of Claims Reports |
| Dane Abr. | Dane's Abridgment of American Law |
| Gill & J. | Gill & Johnson (Maryland) |
| Pick. | Pickering (= Massachusetts Reports vols. 18–41) |
| Metc. | Metcalf (= Massachusetts Reports vols. 42–54) |
| Cush. | Cushing (= Massachusetts Reports vols. 55–66) |
| Gray | Gray (= Massachusetts Reports vols. 67–82) |
| Quincy | Quincy's Reports (Massachusetts) |
| Hals. | Halsted's New Jersey Reports |
| N.J. Super. | New Jersey Superior Court Reports |
| Abb. Prac. | Abbott's New York Practice Reports |
| Hill | Hill's New York Reports |
| Johns. | Johnson's New York Reports |
| Johns. Cas. | Johnson's New York Cases |
| N.Y.S. | New York Supplement (N.Y.S. 2d = N.Y. Supplement, 2d series) |
| Martin | Martin's North Carolina Reports |
| Serg. & R. | Sergeant & Rawles's Pennsylvania Reports |
| Whart. | Wharton's Pennsylvania Reports |
| Bay | Bay's South Carolina Reports |
| P. | West's Pacific Reporter (P. 2d = Pacific Reporter, 2d series) |
| State Abbreviations | Reports of the state's highest court |
| A.C. | Appeal Cases (English) |
| E.R. | East's King's Bench Reports (English) |
| Eng. Rep. | English Reports |
| How. St. Tr. | Howell's State Trials (English) |
| Mod. | Modern English Cases |

Numbers in boldface refer to the main entry on the subject.

A

Abbate v. United States [359 U.S. 187 (1959)], 164

Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner [387 U.S. 136 (1967)], 2279

Abington School District v. Schempp [374 U.S. 203 (1963)], 1, 167, 421, 855, 859, 1206, 1585, 1602, 2176–2177, 2322, 2370, 2372, 2541, 2833, 2856

Ableman v. Booth [21 How. 506 (1859)], 1–2, 4, 341, 409, 430, 1160, 1248, 2432, 2650, 2654

Abood v. Detroit Board of Education [431 U.S. 209 (1977)], 4, 1552, 1553

Abrams v. United States [250 U.S. 616 (1919)], 15–17, 328, 422, 426, 1046, 1127, 1135, 1264, 1296, 1298, 1299, 1300, 1670–1671, 1983, 1990, 2077, 2318, 2319, 2352, 2353, 2580, 2841, 2901, 2902, 2929

Adair v. United States [208 U.S. 161 (1908)], 25–26, 684, 838, 920, 1115, 1162, 1163, 1175, 1268, 1547, 1572, 1642, 1709, 1911, 2278, 2571, 2744, 2896, 2897, 2939

Adams v. New York [192 U.S. 585 (1904)], 2334

Adams v. Storey [1 F. Cas. 141, No. 66 (C.C.D. N.Y. 1817)], 1635

Adams v. Tanner [244 U.S. 590 (1917)], 32

Adams v. Williams [407 U.S. 143 (1972)], 120, 2552

Adamson v. California [332 U.S. 46 (1947)], 33, 186, 187, 814, 815, 816, 830, 1008, 1086, 1102, 1231, 1233, 1267, 1271, 1355, 1665, 1769, 1896, 2037, 2293, 2302, 2744, 2796

Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña [505 U.S. 200 (1995)], 33–34, 57, 58, 401, 432, 469, 623, 917, 1845, 2108, 2169, 2456, 2538

Adderley v. Florida [385 U.S. 39 (1966)], 34, 816, 1082, 1213, 2855

Addington v. Texas [441 U.S. 418 (1979)], 1718, 1884, 2060
Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States [175 U.S. 211 (1899)], 106, 429, 1162, 1711
Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co. [348 U.S. 144 (1970)], 444–445
Adkins v. Children's Hospital [261 U.S. 525 (1923)], 15, 35–36, 263, 284, 743, 797, 838, 845, 1115, 1313, 1699, 1710, 1715, 1760, 1761, 1764, 1869, 2281, 2310, 2509, 2529, 2544, 2571, 2626, 2635, 2639, 2752, 2878, 2882, 2921
Adler v. Board of Education of City of New York [342 U.S. 485 (1952)], 22, 36, 1536, 2794
Aetna Life Insurance Co. v. Haworth [300 U.S. 227 (1937)], 51, 2831
Aetna Life Insurance Co. v. Kennedy [301 U.S. 389 (1937)], 2831
Afroyim v. Rusk [387 U.S. 253 (1967)], 59, 367, 957, 1077
Agins v. Tiburon [447 U.S. 255 (1980)], 889, 2510
Agnello v. United States [269 U.S. 20 (1925)], 61, 355, 2343
Agostini v. Felton [521 U.S. 203 (1997)], 61, 202, 1209, 1604, 1846, 2179, 2426
Aguilar v. Felton [473 U.S. 402 (1985)], 61, 63, 202, 1209, 1603, 1842, 2375, 2378
Aguilar v. Texas [378 U.S. 108 (1964)], 63–64, 1327, 1368, 2024, 2330–2331, 2469
Agurs, United States v. [427 U.S. 97 (1976)], 793, 972, 2004
Ah Sin v. Wittman [198 U.S. 500 (1905)], 2088
Air Pollution Variance Board of Colorado v. Western Alfalfa Corp. [416 U.S. 861 (1974)], 902
Ake v. Oklahoma [470 U.S. 68 (1985)], 64, 1680, 1719, 2045
Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health [462 U.S. 416 (1983)], 10, 192, 1175, 1841, 1843, 1870, 2206, 2207, 2208
Alabama Public Service Commission v. Southern Railway [341 U.S. 341 (1951)], 19
Alabama v. King & Boozer [314 U.S. 1 (1941)], 1384
Alabama v. White [496 U.S. 325 (1990)], 1096
A.L.A. Schechter Poultry Corp v. United States. See Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States
Alaska, United States v. [521 U.S. 1 (1997)], 1840
Alberts v. California [354 U.S. 476 (1957)], 1538, 1837, 2296
Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Board [382 U.S. 70 (1965)], 64, 1335, 1385, 2578, 2581
Alden v. Maine [119 S.Ct. 2240 (1999)], 625, 777, 881, 904, 2169, 2459
Alderman v. United States [394 U.S. 165 (1969)], 64–65, 1083, 1857, 2335
Alexander v. Holmes County Board of Education [396 U.S. 19 (1669)], 65, 69, 773, 2854
Alexander v. United States [509 U.S. 544 (1993)], 985
Alfred Dunhill of London, Inc. v. Republic of Cuba [425 U.S. 682 (1976)], 25
A.L.I.V.E., State v. See State v. A.L.I.V.E.
Allegheny Pittsburgh Coal Co. v. County Commission of Webster County [488 U.S. 336 (1989)], 428–429, 840
Allen v. Alabama State Board of Education (1999) [164 F. 3d 1347 (11th Cir. 1999)], 57
Allen v. Illinois [478 U.S. 364 (1986)], 1720, 2373
Allen v. McCurry [449 U.S. 90 (1980)], 193
Allen v. State Board of Elections [393 U.S. 544 (1969)], 2812
Allen v. Wright [468 U.S. 737 (1984)], 70, 122, 1844, 2473, 2532
Allenberg Cotton Co. v. Pittman [419 U.S. 20 (1974)], 2517
Allen-Bradley Company v. Local Union #3 [325 U.S. 797 (1945)], 70, 107, 1545
Allgeyer v. Louisiana [165 U.S. 578 (1897)], 32, 70, 241, 844–845, 1115, 1175, 1499, 1890, 2243, 2571
Allied Structural Steel Co. v. Spannaus [438 U.S. 234 (1978)], 70–71, 677, 678, 1836
Allstate Insurance Co. v. Hague [450 U.S. 971 (1981)], 357, 358, 960
Almeida-Sanchez v. United States [413 U.S. 266 (1973)], 71, 209
Alvarez-Machain, United States v. [504 U.S. 655 (1992)], 71–72
Amalgamated Food Employees Union v. Logan Valley Plaza [391 U.S. 308 (1968)], 1676, 1677, 1907, 2414, 2415, 2487
Ambach v. Norwick [441 U.S. 68 (1979)], 66, 72, 858, 2583
Amerada Hess Corp. v. Director, New Jersey Division of Taxation [490 U.S. 66 (1989)], 83, 2516
American Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co. [213 U.S. 347 (1909)], 958, 959
American Booksellers Assn., Inc. v. Hudnut [475 U.S. 1001 (1986)], 1054, 1057, 1967–1968
American Civil Liberties Union v. Reno. See Reno v. ACLU
American Communications Association v. Douds [339 U.S. 382 (1950)], 79, 187, 279, 1108, 1241, 2642, 2792, 2794
American Federation of Labor v. American Sash & Door Co. [335 U.S. 538 (1949)], 1458
American Insurance Company v. Canter [26 U.S. (I Pet.) 511 (1828)], 83, 563, 568, 569, 1019, 1589–1590, 1612, 1644, 1686, 2671, 2673
American Party of Texas v. White [415 U.S. 767 (1974)], 1942
American Power & Light Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission [329 U.S. 90 (1947)], 1768, 1796, 2079–2080
American Publishing Company v. Fisher [166 U.S. 464 (1897)], 1517
American Steel Foundries v. Tri-City Labor Council [257 U.S. 184 (1921)], 2638
American Tobacco Co., United States v. [221 U.S. 106 (1911)], 455–456, 749, 1030, 1165, 2298, 2472, 2898, 2904
Amistad, The [40 U.S. (15 Pet.) 518 (1841)], 2555, 2654
Anderson, United States v. [17 U.S.C.M.A. 588, 38 C.M.R. 386 (1968), 2505
Anderson v. Celebrezze [460 U.S. 780 (1983)], 158, 1942
Anderson v. Dunn [19 U.S. 204 (1821)], 1433, 1589
Anderson v. Laird [446 F. 2d 283 (D.C. Cir. 1971)], 2186
Anderson v. Liberty Lobby [477 U.S. 242 (1986)], 1609
Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co. [328 U.S. 680 (1946)], 967
Andrews v. Ballard [498 F. Supp. 1038 (S.D. Tex. 1980)], 2328
Antelope, The [23 U.S. (10 Wheat.) 66 (1825)], 334
Anthony, United States v. [24 F. Cas. 833 (C.C. N.Y. 1877) (No., 14, 460)], 360, 361

Anthony v. County of Sacramento [898 F. Supp. 1435 (E.D. Cal. 1995)], 2092
Apex Hosiery Company v. Leader [310 U.S. 469 (1940)], 107
Apodaca v. Oregon [406 U.S. 404 (1972)], 264, 830, 1434–1435, 1510, 1517, 1518
Appalachian Electric Power Co., United States v. [311 U.S. 377 (1940)], 107, 2866
Aptheker v. Secretary of State [378 U.S. 500 (1959)], 116, 187, 1200, 1400, 1868, 1950, 2276, 2574, 2854
Archibald Freeland v. Heron, Lenox and Company [11 U.S. 147 (1812)], 832
Argersinger v. Hamlin [407 U.S. 25 (1972)], 23, 116, 971, 1745, 2262
Arguello v. United States [444 U.S. 860 (1855)], 2653
Arizona v. Evans [514 U.S. 1 (1995)], 2169
Arizona v. Fulminante [499 U.S. 279 (1991)], 1271, 2455
Arizona v. Hicks [480 U.S. 321 (1987)], 1913, 1914
Arizona v. Mauro [481 U.S. 520 (1987)], 1743, 2240
Arizona v. Robertson [486 U.S. 675 (1988)], 1743, 1744
Arizona v. Rumsey [467 U.S. 203 (1984)], 1869
Arizona v. Youngblood [488 U.S. 51 (1988)], 2032
Arizona Governing Committee v. Norris [463 U.S. 1073 (1983)], 2393
Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona [520 U.S. 43 (1997)], 20, 1197, 1759, 1848
Arkansas v. Sanders [442 U.S. 753 (1979)], 2332
Arkansas Educational Television Commission v. Forbes [523 U.S. 666 (1998)], 470
Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland [481 U.S. 221 (1987)], 1055
Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corporation [429 U.S. 252 (1977)], 96, 116, 1586, 1593, 1875, 2107, 2220, 2862, 2945, 2947
Armour & Co. v. Wantock [323 U.S. 126 (1944)], 967
Armstrong, United States v. [517 U.S. 456 (1996)], 2058, 2059, 2088
Arnett v. Kennedy [416 U.S. 134 (1974)], 118–119, 184, 898, 1205, 2025, 2027, 2033, 2158
Arnold, Schwinn & Co., United States v. [388 U.S. 365 (1967)], 2542
Arredondo, United States v. [31 U.S. (6 Pet.) 691 (1832)], 156
Ash, United States v. [413 U.S. 300 (1973)], 127, 962, 2264
Ashcraft v. Tennessee [320 U.S. 728 (1944)], 1924
Ashton v. Cameron County Water Improvement District [298 U.S. 513 (1937)], 127–128, 161, 1767
Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority [297 U.S. 288 (1936)], 128, 142, 220, 1444, 1714, 2543, 2667, 2780
Associated Press v. NLRB [301 U.S. 103 (1937)], 921, 2819–2821
Associated Press v. Walker [388 U.S. 130 (1967)], 1805, 2709, 2855
Association of Data Processing Service Organizations v. Camp [397 U.S. 150 (1970)], 2474
Atascadero State Hospital v. Scanlon [473 U.S. 234 (1985)], 133, 193
Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., United States v. [233 U.S. 173 (1914)], 749, 1642, 1666
Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. v. Robinson [219 U.S. 219 (1914)], 1642
Atlantic Coast Line Railroad v. Riverside Mills [219 U.S. 186 (1911)], 2899
Atlas Roofing Co. v. Occupational Safety and Health Administration [430 U.S. 442 (1976)], 902, 2729
Atlee v. Laird [347 F. Supp. 689 (E.D. Pa 1972)], 2790
Attorney General of New York v. Soto-Lopez [476 U.S. 898 (1986)], 137, 914, 2277, 2305
Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce [494 U.S. 652 (1990)], 139–140, 296, 688, 691, 1237, 2535
Austin v. United States [509 U.S. 602 (1993)], 985
Avery v. Midland County [390 U.S. 474 (1968)], 142, 2890, 2892
Ayers, In re [123 U.S. 443 (1887)], 877

B

Babbitt v. United Farm Workers [442 U.S. 289 (1979)], 1867
Badham v. Eu [694 F. Supp. 664 (N.D. Cal. 1988)], 1189
Baehr v. Lewin [852 P. 2d 44 (Haw. 1993)], 147, 2307, 2309
Baehr v. Miike [910 P. 2d 112 (Haw. 1996)], 2309
Baggett v. Bullitt [377 U.S. 360 (1964)], 1867, 2776
Bailey, United States v. [444 U.S. 394 (1980)], 193, 194
Bailey v. Alabama [219 U.S. 219 (1911)], 151, 1310, 1897, 2900
Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Co. [259 U.S. 20 (1922)], 151–152, 349, 350, 1261, 1585, 1704, 1779, 2452, 2635, 2660
Bailey v. Richardson [341 U.S. 918 (1951)], 279, 946, 2792, 2794
Bajakajian, United States v. [524 U.S. 321 (1998)], 985, 2056
Baker v. Carr [369 U.S. 186 (1962)], 152–153, 229, 233, 237, 440, 500, 659, 869, 871, 1042, 1188, 1203, 1227, 1239, 1476, 1477, 1486, 1488, 1579, 1612, 1949, 1950, 1951–1952, 1953, 1987, 2131, 2132, 2133, 2138, 2202, 2210, 2227–2228, 2228, 2383, 2450, 2594, 2765, 2810, 2849, 2854, 2856, 2857, 2858, 2881
Bakery Drivers Local v. Wohl [315 U.S. 769 (1942)], 1550
Baldwin v. Fish & Game Commission [436 U.S. 371 (1978)], 157, 2020
Baldwin v. Franks [120 U.S. 678 (1887)], 1024
Baldwin v. G.A.F. Seelig, Inc. [294 U.S. 511 (1935)], 314, 1864, 2514, 2523
Baldwin v. New York [399 U.S. 66 (1970)], 157, 1516, 1745, 2729
Ball, State v. See State v. Ball
Ball v. United States [470 U.S. 856 (1985)], 2158
Ballard, United States v. [322 U.S. 78 (1944)], 734, 1047, 2172, 2190
Ballew v. Georgia [435 U.S. 223 (1978)], 157–158, 264, 1516, 1517, 1518, 2441, 2727
Baltimore and Carolina Line v. Redman [295 U.S. 654 (1935)], 2728

Baltimore City Department of Social Services v. Bouknight [493 U.S. 549 (1990)], 2241
Balzac v. Porto Rico [258 U.S. 398 (1922)], 1376, 2080, 2672
Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino [376 U.S. 398 (1964)], 25, 1077, 1390, 1468
Bancroft, United States v. [260 U.S. 706 (1922)], 2505
Bank of Augusta v. Earle [38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 519 (1839)], 156, 325, 1710, 2648, 2653
Bank of Nova Scotia v. United States [487 U.S. 250 (1988)], 1223
Bank of United States v. Deveaux [9 U.S. (5 Cranch) 61 (1809)], 1705, 2653
Bank of United States v. Planters' Bank of Georgia [22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 904 (1824)], 25
Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan [372 U.S. 58 (1963)], 161–162
Barber v. Page [390 U.S. 719 (1968)], 933
Barbier v. Connolly [113 U.S. 27 (1885)], 2508
Barclay v. Florida [463 U.S. 939 (1983)], 303 Barefoot v. Estelle [463 U.S. 880 (1983)], 162
Barenblatt v. United States [360 U.S. 109 (1959)], 155, 162–163, 187, 188, 421, 1193, 1241, 1305, 1595, 1596, 2772, 2867
Barker v. Hardway [394 U.S. 905 (1969)], 1082
Barker v. Wingo [407 U.S. 514 (1972)], 163, 2465–2467
Barnard v. Thorstenn [489 U.S. 546 (1989)], 1530
Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc. [501 U.S. 560 (1991)], 1830, 1832
Barr v. Matteo [360 U.S. 546 (1959)], 943
Barron v. Baltimore [32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 243 (1833)], 119, 178, 722, 888, 1086, 1090, 1353, 1354, 1356, 1462, 1809, 2217, 2426, 2497, 2508, 2570
Barron v. Burnside [121 U.S. 186 (1887)], 585
Barron v. City of Baltimore [32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 243 (1833)], 163
Barrows v. Jackson [346 U.S. 249 (1953)], 163–164, 2223
Barsky v. Board of Regents [347 U.S. 442 (1954)], 231, 234
Bartels v. Iowa [262 U.S. 404 (1923)], 315
Bartkus v. Illinois [359 U.S. 121 (1959)], 164, 808
Bas v. Tingy [4 U.S. 322 (4 Dall. 37) (1800)], 549, 1756, 2505
Bassett v. Mayhew [137 U.S. 496 (1890)], 1889
Bates v. Little Rock [361 U.S. 516 (1960)], 1193, 1773
Bates v. State Bar of Arizona [433 U.S. 350 (1977)], 165, 190, 193, 1109, 1868
Batson v. Kentucky [476 U.S. 79 (1986)], 165, 195, 1510, 1511, 1514, 1680, 1898–1899, 2088, 2106, 2170, 2490, 2627, 2891
Bauman v. Ross [167 U.S. 348 (1897)], 1519
Bayard v. Singleton [1 Martin 42 (North Carolina, 1787)], 165–166, 541, 1756, 2462
Beacon Theatres, Inc. v. Westover [359 U.S. 500 (1958)], 166, 2388, 2726, 2730
Beal v. Doe [432 U.S. 438 (1977)], 194, 1665, 2205
Beauharnais v. Illinois [343 U.S. 250 (1952)], 167, 187, 815, 1130, 1235–1236, 1411, 1837, 1966, 2145, 2795
Beazell v. Ohio [269 U.S. 167 (1925)], 958
Beck v. Ohio [479 U.S. 89 (1964)], 2023, 2330
Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Journeymen Stonecutters Association [273 U.S. 37 (1927)], 107, 167–168, 831, 2638
Behrens v. Pelletier [516 U.S. 299 (1996)], 1336
Beilan v. Board of Education [357 U.S. 599 (1958)], 2903
Bekins, United States v. [304 U.S. 37 (1938)], 128, 161, 1767
Bell v. Hood [327 U.S. 678 (1946)], 1344
Bell v. Maryland [378 U.S. 226 (1964)], 168, 816, 2420, 2486
Bell v. Wolfish [441 U.S. 520 (1979)], 205, 729, 2005, 2244
Belle Terre (Village of) v. Boraas [416 U.S. 1 (1974)], 973, 1123–1124, 1757, 2574
Bellotti v. Baird [443 U.S. 622 (1979)], 6, 2208
Belmont, United States v. [301 U.S. 324 (1937)], 168, 737, 942, 951, 1073, 1390, 1909–1910, 1997
Benanti v. United States [355 U.S. 96 (1955)], 873, 1774
Bender v. Williamsport [475 U.S. 534 (1986)], 168–169, 906
Bendix Autolite Corp. v. Midwesco Enterprises, Inc. [486 U.S. 888 (1988)], 2517
Bennett, United States v. [24 F. Cas. 1093, No. 14, 571 (C.C.D. N.Y. 1879)], 2748
Bennis v. Michigan [517 U.S. 1163 (1996)], 2056
Benton v. Maryland [395 U.S. 784 (1969)], 169–170, 722, 808, 1355, 1676, 1875, 2039, 2856
Berea College v. Kentucky [211 U.S. 45 (1908)], 170, 1168, 1890
Berger v. New York [388 U.S. 41 (1967)], 170, 187, 873, 874, 971, 1296, 1527
Berman v. Parker [348 U.S. 26 (1954)], 889, 2076, 2079, 2506
Bethel School District v. Fraser [478 U.S. 675 (1986)], 170, 351, 381, 860, 1134, 1281, 2535
Betts v. Brady [316 U.S. 455 (1942)], 170, 186, 280, 1102, 1193–1194, 1462, 1869, 2039, 2261, 2263, 2265, 2282, 2796
Bibb v. Navajo Freight Lines, Inc. [359 U.S. 520 (1959)], 171, 2514
Bigelow v. Virginia [421 U.S. 809 (1975)], 190, 193
Bishop v. Wood [426 U.S. 341 (1976)], 119, 184, 1888, 2026, 2029
Bishop Processing Company v. Gardner [275 F. Supp. 780 (1968)], 900
Biswell, United States v. [404 U.S. 983 (1972)], 44
Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics [403 U.S. 388 (1971)], 185, 192, 238, 652, 653, 739, 740, 741, 748, 979, 1218, 1344, 2708
Blackburn v. Alabama [361 U.S. 199 (1960)], 1923
Blackmer v. United States [284 U.S. 421 (1932)], 1765
Blanchette v. Connecticut General Insurance Corps. [419 U.S. 102 (1974)], 420
Bland, United States v. [283 U.S. 636 (1931)], 1198
Block v. Community Nutrition Institute [464 U.S. 991 (1984)], 1218
Block v. Hirsh [256 U.S. 135 (1921)], 2896
Blockburger v. United States [284 U.S. 299 (1932)], 809, 811, 982, 983, 985
Bloom v. Illinois [391 U.S. 194 (1968)], 435, 2729
Blum v. Bacon [457 U.S. 132 (1982)], 2587–2588
Blum v. Yaretsky [454 U.S. 815 (1982)], 200, 2492
Blyew v. United States [80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 581 (1872)], 200–201, 403, 2424, 2564
BMW of North America v. Gore [517 U.S. 559 (1996)], 2055, 2056, 2083

Board of Curators v. Horowitz [435 U.S. 78 (1978)], 201, 856
Board of Directors of Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte [481 U.S. 537 (1987)], 1110, 1237, 2017, 2398
Board of Education v. Allen [392 U.S. 236 (1968)], 201–202, 348, 349, 1206, 1601, 2373, 2468, 2751–2752, 2856
Board of Education v. Nyquist [413 U.S. 757 (1973)], 349
Board of Education v. Pico [457 U.S. 853(1982)], 21, 202, 235, 351, 860, 1137, 1216
Board of Education v. Rowley [458 U.S. 176 (1982)], 860
Board of Education of Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet [512 U.S. 687 (1994)], 202, 927, 1604, 1783, 2179, 2195, 2456
Board of Education of Oklahoma City Public Schools v. Dowell [498 U.S. 237 (1991)], 859
Board of Education of the Westside Community Schools v. Mergens [496 U.S. 226 (1990)], 203, 906, 1207, 1602, 2178, 2185, 2323
Board of Estimate of the City of New York v. Morris [489 U.S. 688 (1989)], 2890
Board of Public Utilities Commissioners v. Ynchausti [251 U.S. 401 (1920)], 1376
Board of Regents v. Roth [408 U.S. 564 (1972)], 203, 897, 1678, 2026, 2053, 2054, 2880
Board of Regents v. Tomanio [444 U.S. 939 (1980)], 2227
Board of Trade v. Olsen [262 U.S. 1 (1922)], 2416
Board of Trustees of State University of New York v. Fox [492 U.S. (1989)], 203–204, 462
Bob Jones University v. United States [461 U.S. 574 (1983)], 97, 204, 1237, 2017
Bob-Lo Excursion Co. v. Michigan [333 U.S. 28 (1948)], 204, 2795
Boddie v. Connecticut [401 U.S. 371 (1971)], 23, 204, 799, 1121, 1269, 1362, 2869, 2877
Boehner v. Anderson [809 F. Supp. 138 (D.D.C. 1992)], 2743
Boerne (City of) v. Flores [521 U.S. 507 (1997)], 625, 991, 992, 1092, 1531, 1824, 1845, 2169, 2182, 2195, 2456, 2504
Bogan v. Scott-Harris [523 U.S. 44 (1998)], 1335
Bolger v. Youngs Drug Product Corporation [463 U.S. 60 (1983)], 2206
Bolling v. Sharpe [347 U.S. 497 (1954)], 53, 179, 206–207, 253, 388, 912, 1172, 1265, 2015, 2099, 2408
Bollman, Ex parte, v. Swartwout [8 U.S. (4 Cranch) 75 (1807)], 207, 278, 1246, 2716
Bollman et al., United States v. [5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 373 (1807)], 705, 2284
Bolton v. Harris [395 F. 2d 642 (1968)], 1718, 1719
Bonaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co. [3 F. Cas. 821, No. 1, 617 (C.C.D. N.J. 1830)], 360
Bond v. Floyd [385 U.S. 116 (1966)], 2582, 2850
Bonham's Case [8 Coke 113b (English) (1610)], 207–208, 439, 512, 1286, 1473, 1865, 1866, 1888–1889
Bonitz v. Fair [804 F. 2d 164 (1st Cir. 1986)], 205
Booth v. Maryland [482 U.S. 496 (1987)], 208–209, 1889, 2369
Borden Milk Co. v. Barella [325 U.S. 679 (1945)], 1539
Bose Corporation v. Consumers Union of the United States, Inc. [466 U.S. 485 (1984)], 1377, 1805, 2709–2710
Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts [97 U.S. 25 (1878)], 211–212, 1350, 1829, 2507
Boston Firefighters Union, Local 718 v. Boston Chapter, NAACP [468 U.S. 1206 (1983)], 1760
Boston Stock Exchange v. State Tax Commission [429 U.S. 318 (1977)], 2521
Boston Water Power Co. v. Boston & Worcester Railroad [23 Pick. 360 (Mass. 1839)], 889 Bounds v. Smith [430 U.S. 817 (1977)], 23, 212
Bourjaily v. United States [483 U.S. 171 (1987)], 492
Bouvia v. Superior Court [179 Cal. App. 3d 1127 (1986)], 2269
Bowen v. Gilliard [483 U.S. 587 (1987)], 2876
Bowen v. Kendrick [487 U.S. 589 (1988)], 212–213, 924, 925, 1207, 1208, 1843, 2378–2379
Bowen v. Owens [476 U.S. 340 (1986)], 2397
Bowen v. Roy [486 U.S. 693 (1986)], 2380
Bowers v. Hardwick [478 U.S. 186 (1986)], 192, 213, 381, 400, 700, 1813, 1831, 1979, 2162, 2247, 2287, 2308, 2401, 2403, 2404, 2405, 2575–2576, 2577, 2891–2892, 2893
Bowie v. City of Columbia [378 U.S. 374 (1964)], 2223
Bowles v. Willingham [321 U.S. 503 (1944)], 886, 887, 2841
Bowlin v. Commonwealth [2 Bush 5 (Ky.) (1867)], 403
Bowman v. Chicago & Northwestern Railway [125 U.S. 465 (1888)], 213–214, 1266, 1698
Bowman v. Iowa [62 N.W. 729 (Iowa 1895)], 1168
Bowsher v. Synar [478 U.S. 714 (1986)], 214, 269, 621, 762, 949, 1454, 2536, 2889
Boyd v. Nebraska ex rel. Thayer [143 U.S. 135 (1892)], 1785
Boyd v. United States [116 U.S. 616 (1886)], 215–216, 218, 2141, 2236, 2334, 2339, 2340, 2767, 2872
Boynton v. Virginia [364 U.S. 454 (1960)], 136
Braden v. United States [365 U.S. 431 (1961)], 187, 1305
Bradfield v. Roberts [175 U.S. 291 (1899)], 348, 2371
Bradley v. Fisher [80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 335 (1872)], 1453
Bradwell v. Illinois [83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 130 (1873)], 218, 218, 342, 1185, 1199, 2392, 2612, 2920
Brady v. Maryland [373 U.S. 83 (1963)], 720, 793, 2004
Brady v. United States [397 U.S. 742 (1970)], 2367, 2831, 2891
Bram v. United States [168 U.S. 532 (1897)], 1923, 2237
Branch v. Texas [408 U.S. 238 (1972)], 309–310
Brandenburg v. Ohio [395 U.S. 444 (1969)], 225–226, 238, 427, 709, 724, 769, 770, 815, 1056, 1109, 1127, 1129, 1135, 1154, 1264, 1353, 1871, 1966, 2353, 2454, 2582, 2854, 2902
Brandon v. Guilderland [635 F. 2d 971 (2d Cir. 1980)], 906
Branti v. Finkel [445 U.S. 507 (1980)], 226, 892, 1886, 1939, 2535
Branzburg v. Hayes [408 U.S. 665 (1972)], 226–227, 271, 1143, 1145, 1215, 1976, 2199–2200, 2413, 2890, 2892
Brass v. North Dakota ex rel. Stoeser [153 U.S. 391 (1894)], 2414
Braswell v. United States [487 U.S. 99 (1988)], 227, 2241 Braunfeld v. Brown [366 U.S. 599 (1961)], 2191, 2412, 2584 Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic [506 U.S. 263 (1993)], 227, 2399–2400
Bread v. Alexandria [341 U.S. 622 (1951)], 461, 2795
Breard v. Greene [523 U.S. 371 (1998)], 71, 1081, 1390

Breed v. Jones [421 U.S. 519 (1975)], 1184, 1523
Breedlove v. Suttles [302 U.S. 277 (1937)], 228, 284, 1271, 1961, 2808
Breen v. Selective Service Local Board [396 U.S. 460 (1970)], 2790–2791
Breithaupt v. Abram [352 U.S. 432 (1957)], 229
Brewer v. Hoxie School District [238 F. 2d 91 (1956)], 2488
Brewer v. Williams [430 U.S. 378 (1977)], 242, 1922, 1929, 2238, 2264
Brewster v. United States [408 U.S. 501 (1972)], 242, 501, 2464
Bridges v. California [309 U.S. 649 (1941)], 187, 244, 426, 1102, 1149, 2076
Briggs v. Elliott [349 U.S. 294 (1954)], 748
Briggs v. McKellar [2 Abb. Prac. 30 (1855)], 1594
Bright, United States v. [24 F. Cas. 1232, No. 14642 (C.C.D. Pa. 1809)], 2859
Brignoni-Ponce, United States v. [422 U.S. 873 (1975)], 209
Brinegar v. United States [338 U.S. 160 (1949)], 244, 721, 1410, 2330
Briscoe v. Bank of Commonwealth of Kentucky [36 U.S. (11 Pet.) 257 (1837)], 162, 244–245, 1686, 1712, 2556–2557, 2648, 2651
Broadrick v. Oklahoma [413 U.S. 601 (1973)], 250–251, 1275, 1802, 1868, 2776–2777, 2887
Brock v. Roadway Express, Inc. [481 U.S. 252 (1987)], 2033
Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc. [472 U.S. 491 (1985)], 251, 1867, 1968
Brolan v. United States [236 U.S. 216 (1915)], 1081
Bronson v. Kinzie [42 U.S. (1 How.) 311 (1843)], 251–252, 677, 1301, 2648, 2653
Bronson v. Rodes [74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 229 (1869)], 1753
Brooks v. United States [267 U.S. 432 (1925)], 1262
Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia [377 U.S. 1 (1964)], 1109
Broussard v. Patton [410 U.S. 942 (1972)], 2505
Brower v. County of Inyo [489 U.S. 543 (1989)], 2338
Brown, United States v. (1965), 174, 1561
Brown v. Allen [344 U.S. 443 (1953)], 253, 1245, 1250, 1253, 1255
Brown v. Board of Education [347 U.S. 483 (1954); 349 U.S. 294 (1955)], 5, 6, 15, 53, 69, 83, 88, 136, 153, 155, 206, 207, 210, 225, 229, 232, 237, 253–256, 273, 277, 280, 352, 375, 376, 380, 383, 388, 389, 390, 391, 394, 395, 396, 399, 411, 497, 510, 607, 630, 658, 664, 683, 700, 701, 725, 748, 771, 772, 774, 801, 818, 859, 863, 909–910, 991, 1002, 1008, 1025, 1042, 1086, 1229, 1265, 1267, 1373, 1393, 1449, 1458, 1485, 1488, 1528, 1579, 1615, 1631, 1645, 1676, 1678, 1740, 1744, 1748–1749, 1774, 1792, 1822, 1860, 1870, 1915, 1918, 1950, 1987, 2062, 2078, 2094, 2098, 2099, 2100, 2108, 2109, 2145, 2157, 2159, 2219, 2228, 2253, 2282, 2293, 2309–2310, 2320, 2321, 2355, 2369–2370, 2403, 2420, 2438, 2441, 2443, 2444, 2446, 2458, 2485–2486, 2594, 2608, 2610, 2615, 2677, 2696, 2713–2714, 2738, 2764, 2796, 2809–2810, 2814, 2849, 2852, 2853, 2855, 2857, 2858, 2879
Brown v. Glines [444 U.S. 348 (1980)], 117
Brown v. Louisiana [383 U.S. 131 (1966)], 1082, 2855
Brown v. Maryland [25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) 419 (1827)], 256, 341, 832, 1348, 1612, 1686, 1864, 2521, 2523, 2697–2698, 2908, 2923
Brown v. Mississippi [297 U.S. 278 (1936)], 256, 329, 1741, 1923, 1924, 2038, 2087, 2238, 2594
Brown v. Socialist Workers '74 Campaign Committee [459 U.S. 87 (1982)], 257, 295, 2535
Brown v. Texas [443 U.S. 47 (1979)], 826, 1913, 2023
Brown v. United States [12 U.S. (8 Cranch) 100 (1814)], 2554
Brown v. United States [381 U.S. 437 (1965)], 257, 1648, 2005
Brown v. Walker [161 U.S. 591 (1896)], 252, 257, 1334, 2236, 2414, 2747
Browning-Ferris Industries of Vermont Inc. v. Kelco Disposal Inc. [492 U.S. 257 (1989)], 2081–2082, 2710
Bruton v. United States [391 U.S. 123 (1968)], 480–481, 492, 933
Bryant v. Zimmerman [278 U.S. 63 (1928)], 1109
Buchanan v. Angelone [522 U.S. 269 (1998)], 306
Buchanan v. Warley [245 U.S. 60 (1917)], 259, 388, 909, 2219, 2222, 2354, 2484, 2900
Buck v. Bell [274 U.S. 200 (1927)], 259, 284, 789, 791–792, 840, 909, 973, 1296, 1298, 1720–1721, 2528
Buckley v. American Constitutional Law Foundation [525 U.S. 182 (1999)], 788, 1372
Buckley v. Fitzsimmons [509 U.S. 259 (1993)], 654, 1335
Buckley v. Valeo [424 U.S. 1 (1976)], 76, 91, 139–140, 155, 238, 257, 260, 274, 295, 296, 297, 298, 369, 872, 987, 1047, 1060, 1108, 1130, 1131–1132, 1216, 1275, 1827, 1932–1933, 1937, 1938, 1941, 1942, 2007, 2052, 2154, 2214, 2278, 2384, 2469, 2594, 2659, 2880, 2887, 2889, 2893
Buckley II. See Buckley v. American Constitutional Law Foundation
Budd v. New York [143 U.S. 517 (1892)], 199, 241, 1166, 1227
Budd v. State [117 N.Y. 621 (1889)], 1288
Bullington v. Missouri [451 U.S. 430 (1981)], 302, 810, 812
Bunting v. Oregon [243 U.S. 426 (1917)], 35, 36, 263, 421, 838, 845, 1639, 1699, 1764, 2572, 2635, 2881, 2896, 2900
Burbank v. Lockheed Air Terminal [411 U.S. 624 (1973)], 263, 901
Burch v. Louisiana [441 U.S. 130 (1979)], 264, 1517, 1518, 2727
Burdick v. Takushi [504 U.S. 428 (1992)], 264–265
Burford v. Sun Oil Company [319 U.S. 315 (1943)], 19, 20
Burlington (City of) v. Dague [505 U.S. 557 (1992)], 414
Burlington Industries, Inc. v. Ellerth [524 U.S. 742 (1998)], 2400
Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co. [285 U.S. 393 (1932)], 1869, 1987
Burnham v. Superior Court of California [495 U.S. 604 (1990)], 2162, 2163
Burns Baking Co. v. Bryan [264 U.S. 504 (1924)], 278, 2445
Burns v. Fortson [410 U.S. 686 (1973)], 831, 2275
Burns v. Ohio [360 U.S. 252 (1950)], 2262
Burns v. Reed (1991), 654, 1335

Burr, United States v. [4 Cranch 469 (1807)], 433, 953, 1488, 1673
Burr v. Duryee [68 U.S. (1 Wall.) 578 (1864)], 1230
Burroughs v. United States [290 U.S. 534 (1934)], 1941, 2007
Burson v. Freeman [504 U.S. 191 (1992)], 278–279
Burstyn, Inc., v. Wilson [343 U.S. 495 (1952)], 198, 279, 1147, 2189, 2794
Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority [365 U.S. 715 (1961)], 200, 280, 420, 1411, 1758, 2486, 2492, 2854
Bush v. Kentucky [107 U.S. 110 (1883)], 1038, 2828
Bush v. Lucas [462 U.S. 367 (1983)], 653, 740, 1344
Bush v. Vera [517 U.S. 952 (1996)], 2137, 2159
Bushell's Case [6 How. St. Tr. 999 (English) (1670)], 282–283, 1512, 1892, 1894
Busher, United States v. [817 F. 2d 1409 (9th Cir. 1987)], 983
Butcher's Union Slaughterhouse v. Crescent City Slaughterhouse [111 U.S. 746 (1884)], 283, 2924
Bute v. Illinois [333 U.S. 640 (1948)], 280, 2261
Butler, United States v. [297 U.S. 1 (1936)], 62, 152, 284–285, 457, 458, 486–487, 1186, 1284, 1313, 1715, 1780, 1797, 2281, 2288, 2468, 2540, 2544, 2545, 2561, 2659, 2681, 2820, 2858, 2882
Butler v. McKellar [494 U.S. 407 (1990)], 2156
Butler v. Michigan [352 U.S. 380 (1957)], 285, 351
Butler v. Perry [240 U.S. 328 (1916)], 506
Butler v. United States [297 U.S. 1 (1936)], 697
Butterworth v. Smith [494 U.S. 624 (1990)], 1223
Butz v. Economou [438 U.S. 478 (1978)], 185, 285, 944, 1335
Byars v. United States [273 U.S. 28 (1925)], 2416
Byers v. Edmondson [712 So.2d 681 (1998)], 1154

C

C & A Carbone, Inc. v. Town of Clarkstown [511 U.S. 383 (1994)], 1010, 2518, 2864
Caban v. Mohammed [441 U.S. 380 (1979)], 973, 2395
Cabell v. Chávez-Salido [454 U.S. 432 (1982)], 66, 194, 368, 1331
Cadman, State v. See State v. Cadman
Calandra, United States v. [414 U.S. 338 (1974)], 290, 938, 1362, 1667, 2044, 2335
Calder v. Bull [3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 386 (1798)], 290, 337, 376, 561, 842, 844, 958, 1174, 1286–1287, 1404, 1883, 2209, 2225, 2424, 2570, 2603, 2649, 2783
Caldwell v. Jennison [Mass., unreported (1781)], 467, 1623
Calhoun v. Cook [332 F. Supp. 804 (1975)], 773–774
Califano v. Aznavorian [439 U.S. 170 (1978)], 2276
Califano v. Gautier Torres [435 U.S. 1 (1978)], 2080
Califano v. Goldfarb [430 U.S. 199 (1977)], 293, 2392, 2393, 2399, 2445, 2881
Califano v. Jobst [429 U.S. 1089 (1977)], 1671–1672
Califano v. Webster [430 U.S. 313 (1977)], 293, 2392, 2399
Califano v. Westcott [443 U.S. 76 (1979)], 293–294, 2391
California, Legislature of the State of v. Eu [816 P. 2d 1309 (Cal. 1991)], 2671
California, United States v. [297 U.S. 175 (1936)], 1211
California, United States v. [332 U.S. 19 (1947)], 1840
California, United States v. [381 U.S. 139 (1965)], 1840
California v. Acevedo [500 U.S. 565 (1991)], 2169
California v. Ciraolo [476 U.S. 207 (1986)], 712, 1093, 2140, 2141, 2337, 2342
California v. Green [399 U.S. 149 (1970)], 933
California v. Greenwood [486 U.S. 35 (1988)], 294, 1093, 2337
California v. Hodari [499 U.S. 621 (1991)], 2455
California v. LaRue [409 U.S. 109 (1972)], 1830, 2741
California v. Prysock [452 U.S. 355 (1981)], 2044
California v. Ramos [463 U.S. 992 (1983)], 303
California v. Thompson [312 U.S. 672 (1941)], 792 California v. Zook [336 U.S. 725 (1949)], 1988
California Federal Savings & Loan v. Guerra [479 U.S. 272 (1987)], 1844, 2397, 2399
California Medical Association v. FEC [453 U.S. 182 (1981)], 1933
Callins v. Collins [510 U.S. 1141 (1994)], 196, 306, 733 Calvin's Case [2 How. St. Tr. 559 (English) (1608)], 294, 363, 1227
Camara v. Municipal Court [387 U.S. 523 (1967)], 42, 43, 44, 294, 1095, 2331, 2333, 2336, 2341, 2767, 2891
Caminetti v. United States [242 U.S. 470 (1917)], 1294, 1396, 1777 Camps Newfound/Owatonna, Inc. v. Town of Harrison, Maine [520 U.S. 564 (1997)], 806, 2494–2495, 2524
Cannon v. University of Chicago [441 U.S. 677(1979)], 853, 1975, 2706
Canton (City of) v. Harris [485 U.S. 933 (1989)], 2158
Cantwell v. Connecticut [310 U.S. 296 (1940)], 179, 299, 734, 894, 1107, 1317, 2174, 2185, 2186, 2188, 2189, 2198
Canty v. Alabama [309 U.S. 629 (1940)], 1924
Capital Punishment Cases of 1972. See Furman v. Georgia; Jackson v. Georgia; Branch v. Texas
Capital Punishment Cases of 1976. See Green v. Oklahoma; Gregg v. Georgia; Jurek v. Texas; Proffitt v. Florida; Roberts v. Louisiana; Woodson v. North Carolina
Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette [515 U.S. 753 (1995)], 312–313, 2173, 2194
Caplin & Drysdale, Chartered v. United States [491 U.S. 617 (1989)], 983, 2043, 2112
Carey v. Board of Education [598 F. 2d 535 (1979)], 860, 2206
Carey v. Piphus [435 U.S. 247 (1978)], 739, 2350
Carey v. Population Services International [431 U.S. 678 (1977)], 182, 316–317, 1118, 1234, 1672, 2204, 2208, 2242, 2573
Carleson v. Remillard [406 U.S. 598 (1972)], 2877
Carlson v. Green [442 U.S. 940 (1980)], 185, 739, 740, 1344
Carlson v. Landon [342 U.S. 524 (1952)], 149, 150, 187, 2005
Carolene Products Company, United States v. [304 U.S. 144 (1938)], 317–318, 382, 383, 793, 794, 838, 845, 910, 1050, 1101, 1116, 1177, 1237, 1263, 1288, 1311, 1381, 1447, 1810, 1814, 1957–1958, 1990, 2121–2122, 2293, 2302, 2471, 2545, 2549, 2572, 2575, 2576, 2624

Carpenters & Joiners Union, Local No. 213 et al. v. Ritter's Cafe et al. [314 U.S. 595 (1942)], 1550, 1555
Carrington v. Bash [380 U.S. 89 (1965)], 2542
Carroll v. President and Commissioners of Princess Anne [393 U.S. 175 (1968)], 319
Carroll v. United States [267 U.S. 132 (1925)], 244, 319–320, 956, 1714, 2332, 2340, 2767
Carter v. Carter Coal Co. [298 U.S. 238 (1936)], 184, 314, 321, 457, 458, 459, 737, 743, 744, 1313, 1547, 1715, 1760, 1778, 2281, 2388–2389, 2415, 2543, 2560, 2820–2821
Carter v. Jury Commission of Greene County [396 U.S. 320 (1970)], 1510, 2728
Carter v. Texas [177 U.S. 442 (1900)], 1510
Carter v. West Feliciana Parish School Board [396 U.S. 290 (1970)], 773
Castanada v. Partida [430 U.S. 482 (1977)], 794, 2441
Causby v. United States [328 U.S. 256 (1946)], 2643
Central Greyhound Lines v. Mealey [334 U.S. 653 (1948)], 2494
Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York [447 U.S. 557 (1980)], 190, 203, 204, 327, 461, 462, 463–464, 1969, 2351, 2801
Central Pacific Railroad Co. v. Gallatin [99 U.S. 727 (1879)], 2419–2420
Central Transportation Co. v. New York City [438 U.S. 104 (1978)], 2646
Cervantes v. United States [57 U.S. (16 How.) 619 (1854)], 2653
Chadwick, United States v. [433 U.S. 1 (1977)], 2332, 2344
Chae Chan Ping v. United States [130 U.S. 581 (1889)], 128–129, 130, 328, 356, 1071, 1163, 1328, 1329, 1330, 2801
Chamberlain v. Chandler [5 F. Cas. 413, No. 2, 575 (C.C.D. Ma. 1823)], 360
Chambers v. Florida [309 U.S. 227 (1940)], 185–186, 329, 383, 1924, 2238
Chambers v. Maroney [399 U.S. 42 (1970)], 329–330, 2332
Chambers v. Mississippi [405 U.S. 1205 (1973)], 480, 933–934, 1976 Champion v. Ames [188 U.S. 321 (1903)], 241, 330, 350, 586, 804, 821, 1161, 1244, 1261, 1290, 1294, 1666, 1704, 1709, 1777, 1830, 1890, 2414, 2583, 2895
Champion and Dickason v. Casey [Cir.Ct., Rhode Island (1792)], 330, 2602
Chandler v. Florida [449 U.S. 560 (1981)], 330, 972, 1143, 1151, 1152
Chandler v. Miller [620 U.S. 305 (1997)], 330–331, 824, 827
Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire [315 U.S. 568 (1942)], 331, 1042, 1056, 1128, 1141, 1769, 1808, 1838, 2189, 2744–2745, 2855
Chapman, In re [166 U.S. 661 (1897)], 1594, 1981
Chapman v. California [386 U.S. 18 (1967)], 260, 1107, 1109, 1237, 1270, 2045
Chapman v. Houston Welfare Rights Organization [441 U.S. 600 (1979)], 2227, 2889
Chapman v. United States [365 U.S. 610 (1961)], 2344
Chappell v. Wallace [462 U.S. 296 (1983)], 653
Charles River Bridge Company v. Warren Bridge Company [36 U.S. (11 Pet.) 420 (1837)], 162, 325, 331–334, 675, 1000, 1300, 1686, 2059, 2556, 2647–2648, 2648, 2650, 2653, 2698, 2783, 2883
Charlton v. Kelly [229 U.S. 447 (1913)], 1950
Chemical Waste Management, Inc. v. Hunt [504 U.S. 334 (1992)], 2864
Cherokee Indian Cases [5 Peters 1 (1831), 6 Peters 515 (1832)], 80, 343–345
Cherokee Nation v. Georgia [5 Pet. 1 (1831)], 81, 343–345, 1535, 2698
Chevron USA Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council [467 U.S. 837 (1984)], 269, 1599
Chicago v. Morales [527 U.S. 41 (1999)], 345
Chicago and Alton Railroad v. Tranbarger [238 U.S. 67 (1915)], 1350
Chicago and Southern Air Lines v. Waterman S. S. Corp. [333 U.S. 103 (1948)], 951
Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen [262 U.S. 1(1923)], 456
Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad v. Chicago [166 U.S. 226 (1897)], 178, 345–346, 1267, 2079
Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad v. Illinois ex rel. Drainage Commissioners [200 U.S. 561 (1906)], 2508
Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co. v. Iowa [94 U.S. 155 (1877)], 1224–1225
Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co. v. Ackley [94 U.S. 179 (1877)], 1224–1225
Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. v. Minnesota [134 U.S. 418 (1890)], 199, 217, 240–241, 322, 346, 970, 1166, 1227, 1559, 1572, 1734
Chimel v. California [395 U.S. 752 (1969)], 355, 2333, 2344, 2766, 2845
Chisholm v. Georgia [2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419 (1793)], 198, 356, 497, 673, 876, 877, 878, 879, 1217, 1404, 1418, 1467, 1673, 1863, 2440, 2459, 2603, 2609, 2910
Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints v. United States [136 U.S. 1 (1890)], 218, 358–359, 734, 1961
Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah [508 U.S. 520 (1993)], 359, 2181, 2194, 2456
Cicenia v. La Gay [357 U.S. 504 (1959)], 2263
Cipriano v. Houma [395 U.S. 701 (1966)], 1542
Citizens Against Rent Control v. Berkeley [454 U.S. 290 (1981)], 295, 1933
City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent [466 U.S. 789 (1984)], 369
City of . . . See name inverted, e.g., Canton (City of) v. Harris Civil Rights Cases [109 U.S. 3 (1883)], 201, 217, 375, 389, 401, 403, 408–410, 479, 527, 709, 909, 1038, 1089, 1166, 1168, 1240, 1267, 1293, 1437, 1459, 1698, 1919, 2217, 2354, 2483, 2485, 2486, 2487, 2491, 2676, 2693, 2823, 2828
Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers. See United States Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers
Clark v. Barnard [108 U.S. 436 (1883)], 1468
Clark v. Jeter [486 U.S. 456 (1988)], 400, 915, 1824
Clark v. Nash [198 U.S. 361 (1905)], 1890, 2079

Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland Railway Co. [242 U.S. 311 (1917)], 421, 2870
Clarke v. Harwood [3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 342 (1797)], 2602
Classic, United States v. [313 U.S. 299 (1941)], 410, 423, 1025, 1042, 1796, 1797, 1940, 1941, 2007, 2282, 2329, 2436, 2550
Cleburne (City of) v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc. [473 U.S. 432 (1985)], 428–429, 790, 792, 857, 914, 1382, 1721, 2061, 2122, 2287, 2397, 2405, 2533, 2945
Clements v. Logan [455 U.S. 942 (1981)], 347
Cleveland v. United States [329 U.S. 14 (1946)], 1961
Cleveland Board of Education v. LaFleur [414 U.S. 632 (1974)], 430, 1120, 1122, 1405, 1565, 2155, 2394
Cleveland Board of Education v. Loudermill [467 U.S. 1204 (1985)], 492, 898, 2033
Clinton v. City of New York [524 U.S. 417 (1998)], 243, 626, 1627, 2169, 2386
Clinton v. Jones [520 U.S. 681 (1997)], 243, 432, 433–434, 625, 954, 1335, 1342, 1994, 2169, 2386, 2537
Clinton v. Virginia [377 U.S. 158 (1964)], 1850
Clyatt v. United States [197 U.S. 207 (1905)], 1897
Coates v. Cincinnati [402 U.S. 611 (1971)], 2776
Cochran v. Louisiana [281 U.S. 370 (1930)], 349, 434–435
Codispoti v. Pennsylvania [418 U.S. 506 (1974)], 435
Coffin v. Reichard [142 F. 2d 443 (6th Cir. 1944)], 2012
Cohen v. California [403 U.S. 15 (1971)], 192, 313, 331, 435–436, 1042, 1269, 1808, 1846, 1966, 2631, 2790
Cohen v. Cowles Media Co. [501 U.S. 663 (1991)], 436, 1377, 1438
Cohen Grocery Co., United States v. [255 U.S. 81 (1921)], 1605, 2841, 2927
Cohens v. Virginia [6 Wheat. 265 (1821)], 162, 436–439, 556, 741, 878, 1191, 1250, 1469, 1477, 1496, 1674, 1683, 1690, 1910, 2280, 2554, 2555, 2590–2591, 2616, 2654
Coker v. Georgia [433 U.S. 584 (1977)], 302, 440, 2368, 2888, 2891
Colautti v. Franklin [439 U.S. 379 (1979)], 1916, 2207
Cole v. Richardson [405 U.S. 676 (1972)], 1648
Cole v. Young [351 U.S. 536 (1956)], 946
Colegrove v. Battin [413 U.S. 149 (1973)], 1950, 1951, 2388, 2727
Colegrove v. Green [328 U.S. 549 (1946)], 152, 186, 233, 237, 440–441, 500, 870, 1203, 1852–1853, 2132, 2133, 2202, 2765, 2849
Coleman v. Miller [307 U.S. 433 (1939)], 73, 74, 349, 441, 2117
Colgate v. Harvey [296 U.S. 404 (1935)], 441, 1655, 2626
Colgrove v. Battin [413 U.S. 149 (1973)], 1516, 1517
Collector v. Day [78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 113 (1871)], 218, 340, 442, 580, 999, 1037, 1226, 1319, 1383, 1384, 2544
College Savings Bank v. Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Education Expense Board [527 U.S. 666 (1999)], 625, 880, 881
Colliflower v. Garland [342 F. 2d 369 (9th Cir. 1965)], 82
Collins v. City of Harker Heights [503 U.S. 115 (1992)], 442
Collins v. Hardyman [341 U.S. 651 (1948)], 96, 1230, 1410, 2485
Colonnade Catering Corporation v. United States [396 U.S. 814 (1970)], 44
Colorado v. Barrett [479 U.S. 523 (1987)], 2240
Colorado v. Connelly [479 U.S. 157 (1986)], 444, 1743, 1930, 2240
Colorado v. Spring [479 U.S. 564 (1987)], 1743, 1930–1931, 2240
Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission [518 U.S. 604 (1996)], 297, 1938
Colorado River Water Conservation District v. United States [424 U.S. 800 (1976)], 18
Columbia (City of) v. Omni Outdoor Advertising, Inc. [499 U.S. 365 (1991)], 2558
Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Davis [510 U.S. 1315 (1994)], 1378
Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee [412 U.S. 94 (1973)], 271, 445, 1628
Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission [453 U.S. 367 (1981)], 247, 445–446
Columbus Board of Education v. Penick [443 U.S. 449 (1979)], 446–447, 759, 2320, 2890
Commercial National Bank of Cleveland v. Iola [154 U.S. 617 (1873)], 783
Commissioner of Internal Revenue v. Glenshaw Glass Co. [348 U.S. 426 (1955)], 2421
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist [413 U.S. 757 (1973)], 464, 2187, 2321, 2375–2376, 2738–2739
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Regan [444 U.S. 646 (1980)], 464–465, 1207, 2371, 2375
Commodity Future Trading Commission v. Schor [478 U.S. 833 (1986)], 949, 1827
Common Cause v. Schmitt [512 F. Supp. 489 (1982)], 295
Commonwealth v. Alger [7 Cush. 53 (Mass. 1851)], 562, 2506, 2648 Commonwealth v. Aves [18 Pick. 193 (Mass. 1836)], 466–467, 560, 819
Commonwealth v. Blackington [24 Pick. 352 (Mass. 1837)], 2507
Commonwealth v. Caton [4 Call. Reports (Va., 1782)], 198, 467, 541, 1891–1892, 2500, 2935
Commonwealth v. Griffin [2 Pick. 11 (Mass. 1823)], 1159
Commonwealth v. Hunt [4 Metc. 111 (Mass. 1842)], 561, 708, 1546–1547
Commonwealth v. Jennison [Mass., unreported (1783)], 467, 737
Commonwealth v. Kneeland [20 Pick. 206 (Mass. 1838)], 198
Commonwealth v. Moffett [383 Mass. 201 (1981)], 2263
Commonwealth v. Sacco and Vanzetti [255 Mass. 369 (1921)], 467–468, 921, 1101
Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Montana [453 U.S. 927 (1981)], 455, 1565
Communist Party of Indiana v. Whitcomb [414 U.S. 441 (1974)], 871, 2582

Communist Party of the United States v. Subversive Activities Control Board [367 U.S. 1 (1961)], 472, 2581
Community Communications Co. v. City of Boulder [456 U.S. 1001 (1982)], 363
Complete Auto Transit, Inc. v. Brady [430 U.S. 274 (1977)], 194, 806, 2494, 2522
Connally v. General Construction Co. [269 U.S. 385 (1926)], 2774, 2775
Connally v. Georgia [429 U.S. 245 (1977)], 2332
Connecticut v. Doehr [501 U.S. 1 (1991)], 2035
Connecticut v. Menillo [423 U.S. 245 (1975)], 2206
Connecticut Board of Pardons v. Dumschat [452 U.S. 458 (1981)], 2366
Connell Construction Co. v. Plumbers & Steam Fitters Local [100 421 U.S. 616 (1975)], 1545, 1546
Connick v. Myers [461 U.S. 138 (1983)], 892, 1677
Consolidated Edison Co. v. NLRB [305 U.S. 197 (1938)], 2821
Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Commission [447 U.S. 530 (1980)], 1237
Constantine, United States v. [296 U.S. 287 (1935)], 2658, 2660
Continental Illinois National Bank and Trust Co. v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co. [294 U.S. 648 (1935)], 161
Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, Inc. [433 U.S. 36 (1977)], 2542
Cook v. United States [288 U.S. 102 (1933)], 2722
Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Philadelphia [53 U.S. (12 How.) 299 (1851)], 455, 681–682, 735, 742, 807, 844, 1162, 1712, 1739, 1904, 2356, 2512–2513, 2566, 2593, 2649, 2652, 2654, 2817, 2867, 2871, 2908
Coolidge, United States v. [14 U.S. (I Wheat.) 415 (1816)], 981
Coolidge v. New Hampshire [403 U.S. 443 (1971)], 187, 682–683, 1913, 1914, 2332, 2345, 2541, 2680
Cooper v. Aaron [358 U.S. 1 (1958)], 237, 607, 667, 683, 772, 1458, 1475, 1488, 1583, 1822, 1824, 1915, 2078, 2298, 2853–2854
Coppage v. Kansas [236 U.S. 1 (1915)], 684–685, 749, 838, 1115, 1309, 1547, 1699, 1911, 2278, 2571, 2896, 2900, 2939
Corbin's Case [S.Ct., New Hampshire (1891)], 802
Cordwainers Cases [Phila. Mayor's Ct. (1806); New York (1810)], 561, 1546
Corfield v. Coryell [6 F. Cas. 546 No. 3, 230 (1823)], 360, 686, 842, 1172, 2019, 2021, 2274, 2424
Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund [473 U.S. 788 (1985)], 686–687, 1237, 1899
Cornell Steamboat Co. v. United States [321 U.S. 634 (1944)], 1103
Coronado Coal Company v. United Mine Workers [268 U.S. 295 (1925)], 107, 2756–2757
Corporation of Presiding Bishop of Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints v. Amos [483 U.S. 327 (1987)], 924, 2175, 2193, 2195, 2380
Corrigan v. Buckley [271 U.S. 323 (1926)], 403, 693, 2222, 2410, 2642
Cortez, United States v. [449 U.S. 411 (1981)], 2552
Costello v. United States [350 U.S. 359 (1956)], 1222, 1361, 1362
Costello v. Wainwright [397 F. Supp. 20 (M.D. Florida, 1975)], 2012
Cotting v. Kansas City Stockyards Co. [183 U.S. 79 (1901)], 52
Counselman v. Hitchcock [142 U.S. 547 (1892)], 64, 257, 694–695, 1334, 1526, 2232, 2236
County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union [492 U.S. 573 (1989)], 203, 695, 924, 925, 1054–1055, 1530, 1602, 1843, 1846, 2166, 2196, 2197, 2379
County of Sacramento v. Lewis [523 U.S. 833 (1998)], 711, 1932, 2456 County of Washington v. Gunther [452 U.S. 161 (1981)], 474 Cousins v. Wigoda [419 U.S. 477 (1975)], 1942–1943, 2007
Cox v. Louisiana [379 U.S. 536 (1965)], 188, 371, 702, 1200, 1922, 2855
Cox v. New Hampshire [312 U.S. 569 (1941)], 373, 702, 1082, 2189, 2198
Cox Broadcasting Co. v. Cohn [420 U.S. 469 (1975)], 702–703, 2014
Coy v. Iowa [487 U.S. 1012 (1988)], 491, 703, 1844
Coyle v. Smith [221 U.S. 559 (1911)], 703
Craig v. Boren [429 U.S. 190 (1976)], 229, 233, 238, 293, 400, 704, 857, 915, 917, 1157, 1196, 1746, 1902, 2392, 2399, 2530, 2533, 2538, 2881, 2921
Craig v. Harney [331 U.S. 367 (1947)], 1149, 1150
Craig v. Missouri [29 U.S. (4 Peters) 410 (1830)], 174, 704, 1686, 1712, 2648, 2651
Cramer v. United States [325 U.S. 1 (1945)], 705, 1279, 1282, 2551, 2716–2718, 2931
Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction [368 U.S. 278 (1961)], 2776
Crandall v. Nevada [73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 35 (1868)], 341, 630
Crane v. Kentucky [476 U.S. 683 (1986)], 2043
Crawford v. Los Angeles Board of Education [458 U.S. 527 (1982)], 122, 706, 774, 786
Crawford-El v. Britton [523 U.S. 574 (1998)], 653
Crews, United States v. [445 U.S. 463 (1980)], 1158
Crist v. Bretz [137 U.S. 28 (1978)], 808
Crooker v. California [357 U.S. 433 (1958)], 2263
Crosby, United States v. [11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 115 (1871)], 361
Crowell v. Benson [285 U.S. 22 (1932)], 41, 1481
Crowley v. United States [187 U.S. 651 (1903)], 1376
Cruikshank, United States v. [92 U.S. 542 (1876)], 95, 217, 403, 430, 580, 733, 1024, 1035, 1037–1038, 1041, 1070, 1106, 1125, 1240, 1272, 1319, 1432, 1733, 2485, 2822–2823, 2826–2827, 2924, 2938
Cruz v. Beto [405 U.S. 319 (1972)], 2190
Cruz v. New York [481 U.S. 186 (1987)], 492
Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health [497 U.S. 261 (1990)], 790, 1884–1885, 1915, 2163, 2246, 2267–2268, 2268–2269, 2269, 2314, 2532, 2577–2578
CTS Corp. v. Dynamics Corp. of America [481 U.S. 69 (1987)], 805, 2516–2517
Cummings v. Board of Education [175 U.S. 528 (1899)], 1168

Cummings v. Missouri [71 U.S. (4 How.) 277 (1867)], 257, 339, 1035
Curtis v. Loether [415 U.S. 189 (1974)], 2729–2730
Curtis Publishing Company v. Butts [388 U.S. 130 (1967)], 1607–1608, 2067, 2709, 2855
Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation, United States v. [299 U.S. 304 (1936)], 600, 736–737, 761, 951, 959, 1071–1072, 1328, 1344, 1904, 1997, 2289, 2385, 2627, 2843

D

Dairy Queen, Inc. v. Wood [369 U.S. 469 (1962)], 739, 2388, 2730
Dakota Central Telephone Co. v. South Dakota [250 U.S. 163 (1919)], 2927
Dames & Moore v. Regan [453 U.S. 654 (1981)], 615, 741, 887, 942, 951, 1076, 1992, 1998
Dandridge v. Williams [397 U.S. 471 (1970)], 377, 741–742, 1120, 1677, 1973, 2310, 2870, 2873, 2874, 2876, 2879–2880
Daniel v. Waters [515 F. 2d 485 (6th Cir. 1975)], 2327
Daniel Ball, The [27 U.S. (10 Wall.) 557 (1871)], 340, 1467
Daniels v. Williams [474 U.S. 327 (1986)], 2032, 2035
Darby Lumber Co., United States v. [312 U.S. 100 (1941)], 349, 458, 460, 524, 598, 684, 693, 743–744, 846, 966, 1011, 1012, 1262, 1548, 1700, 1778, 1796, 1822, 1830, 2046, 2293, 2566, 2668, 2821, 2903
Darnel's Case (Five Knights Case) [3 How. St. Tr. 1 (English) (1627)], 148, 1246, 1903
Dartmouth College v. Woodward [17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 518 (1819)], 162, 362, 555, 673, 674–675, 681, 690, 692, 744–746, 802, 832, 1673, 1686, 1910, 2218, 2556, 2611, 2653, 2704, 2783, 2859, 2871, 2885, 2913, 2922
Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc. [509 U.S. 579 (1993)], 58, 243
Davidson v. New Orleans [96 U.S. 97 (1878)], 217, 1732, 1733, 1749
Davis v. Alaska [415 U.S. 308 (1974)], 480, 491
Davis v. Bandemer [478 U.S. 109 (1986)], 868, 871, 1188–1189, 1952, 2137, 2535
Davis v. Beason [133 U.S. 333 (1890)], 748, 1961, 2173, 2186
Davis v. Board of School Commissioners [402 U.S. 33 (1971)], 2627
Davis v. Massachusetts [167 U.S. 43 (1897)], 1212
Davis v. Michigan Department of Treasury [489 U.S. 803 (1989)], 1384, 2533
Davis v. Mississippi [394 U.S. 721 (1969)], 235
Davis v. Monroe County Board of Education [526 U.S. 629 (1999)], 2400
Davis v. North Carolina [384 U.S. 737 (1966)], 2438
Davis v. Passman [442 U.S. 228 (1979)], 185, 739, 740, 748, 1344
Davis v. United States [512 U.S. 452 (1994)], 1931
Day-Brite Lighting, Inc. v. Missouri [342 U.S. 421 (1952)], 1700
Dayton Board of Education v. Brinkman [433 U.S. 406 (1977) and 443 U.S. 526 (1979)], 446–447, 759
Dayton-Goose Creek Railroad Co. v. United States [263 U.S. 456 (1924)], 750, 922, 2415
Dean Milk Company v. Madison [340 U.S. 349 (1951)], 420, 750, 1228, 1573, 2514
DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Building Trades [485 U.S. 568 (1988)], 1553
Debs, In re [158 U.S. 564 (1895)], 241, 430, 448, 583, 750–751, 751, 947, 1164, 1168, 1409, 1851, 2591, 2735, 2894, 2901
Debs v. United States [249 U.S. 211 (1919)], 751, 923, 1299–1300, 2580
De Chastellux v. Fairchild [15 Penn. State 18 (1850)], 833, 1192
Decoster, United States v. [487 F. 2d 1197 (1979)], 2265
DeFunis v. Odegaard [416 U.S. 312 (1974)], 54, 759–760, 1759, 1760, 2104, 2146
DeGeofroy v. Riggs [133 U.S. 258 (1890)], 2722
Degraffenreid v. General Motors Assembly Division [413 F. Supp. 142 (E.D. Mo. 1976)], 2089–2090, 2091
DeGregory v. New Hampshire Attorney General [383 U.S. 825 (1966)], 1596
De Jonge v. Oregon [299 U.S. 353 (1937)], 724, 760, 1107, 1149, 1241, 1311, 2594
Delaware v. Fensterer [474 U.S. 15 (1985)], 492
Delaware v. New York [385 U.S. 895 (1966)], 867, 1765
Delaware v. Prouse [440 U.S. 648 (1979)], 120, 140, 2331
Delaware v. Van Arsdall [475 U.S. 673 (1986)], 491
Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. v. Yurkonis [238 U.S. 439 (1915)], 749
Delaware Tribal Business Committee v. Weeks [430 U.S. 73 (1977)], 80, 81, 2536
DeLima v. Bidwell [182 U.S. 1 (1901)], 1376
Dellinger, United States v. [472 F. 2d 340 (1972)], 709
Dellums v. Bush [752 F. Supp. 1141 (1990)], 2843
De Lovio v. Boit [7 F. Cas. 418, No. 3, 776 (C.C.D. Ma. 1815)], 360
Democratic Party v. LaFollette [448 U.S. 909 (1981)], 1942–1943, 2007
Dennis, United States v. [183 F. 2d 201 (1950)], 225, 226, 1264, 2761
Dennis v. United States [341 U.S. 494 (1951)], 68, 146, 155, 187, 279, 427, 428, 709, 769–770, 1055, 1127, 1135, 1198, 1353, 1411, 1789, 1955, 2249, 2546, 2581, 2582, 2745, 2761, 2792, 2793, 2938
Dent v. West Virginia [129 U.S. 114 (1889)], 2829
Denver Area Education Telecommunications Consortium v. FCC [518 U.S. 727 (1996)], 243, 249
Department of Agriculture v. Moreno [413 U.S. 528 (1973)], 770, 1123, 2287 Department of Agriculture v. Murry [413 U.S. 508 (1973)], 770
Department of Commerce v. Montana [503 U.S. 442 (1992)], 326
Department of Commerce v. United States House of Representatives [525 U.S. 316 (1999)], 326

Department of Justice v. Reporters' Committee for Freedom of the Press [489 U.S. 749 (1989)], 482 Department of Revenue of Montana v. Kurth Ranch [511 U.S. 767 (1994)], 811, 2660
Department of Revenue of Washington v. Association of Washington Stevedoring Companies [434 U.S. 815 (1978)], 194, 1348, 2522
Derby v. Blake [2 Dane Abr. 649 (Mass. 1799)], 673
DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services [489 U.S. 189 (1989)], 195, 774–775, 1529, 2164, 2576
Desist v. United States [394 U.S. 244 (1969)], 1083
Desmond, United States v. [670 F. 2d 414 (3d Cir. 1982)], 1513
DeSylva v. Ballentine [351 U.S. 570 (1956)], 978
DeWitt, United States v. [76 U.S. (9 Wall.) 41 (1869)], 335, 340
Diamond v. Chakrabarty [447 U.S. 303 (1980)], 1881
Diamond v. Charles [476 U.S. 54 (1986)], 1450
DiFrancesco, United States v. [449 U.S. 117 (1980)], 783, 809
Dillon v. Gloss [256 U.S. 368 (1920)], 73, 2117
Dionisio, United States v. [410 U.S. 1 (1973)], 764, 2333
Di Re, United States v. [332 U.S. 581 (1948)], 2023
DiSanto v. Pennsylvania [273 U.S. 34 (1927)], 792, 1879
Dixon, United States v. [509 U.S. 688 (1993)], 811, 985
Dobbins v. Commissioners of Erie County [41 U.S. 435 (1842)], 442, 1384, 2867
Dodge v. Woolsey [59 U.S. (18 How.) 331 (1856)], 298, 325, 801, 2648, 2868
Doe v. Bolton [410 U.S. 179 (1973)], 816, 2020, 2204, 2205, 2206, 2207, 2284–2286, 2394. See Roe v. Wade Doe v. Commonwealth's Attorney [403 F. Supp. 1199 (1976)], 973, 1124, 2407
Doe v. McMillan [412 U.S. 306 (1972)], 2464
Doe v. United States [487 U.S. 201 (1988)], 2240–2241
Doe v. University of Michigan [721 F. Supp. 852 (E.D. Mich. 1989)], 2926
D'Oench Duhme & Co. v. F.D.I.C. [314 U.S. 592 (1942)], 978
Doggett v. United States [505 U.S. 647 (1992)], 2467
Dolan v. City of Tigard [512 U.S. 374 (1994)], 802–803, 905, 2055, 2151, 2646
Dombrowski v. Pfister [380 U.S. 479 (1965)], 803, 1867, 1868, 2941
Donaldson v. O'Connor [422 U.S. 563 (1974)], 789
Donovan v. Dewey [452 U.S. 594 (1981)], 42, 44
Dooley v. United States [182 U.S. 222 (1901)], 1376
Doran v. Salem Inn, Inc. [422 U.S. 922 (1975)], 2156
Dorchy v. Kansas [272 U.S. 306 (1926)], 1553
Doremus, United States v. [249 U.S. 86 (1919)], 350, 804, 1274, 1779, 1790, 2658
Doremus v. Board of Education [342 U.S. 429 (1952)], 804, 1779, 2662, 2795, 2895–2896
Dorr v. United States [195 U.S. 138 (1904)], 1376
Dorsey v. Stuyvesant Town Corporation [299 N.Y. 512 (1949-1950)], 2484
Dothard v. Rawlinson [433 U.S. 321 (1977)], 406
Dougherty County Board of Education v. White [439 U.S. 32 (1978)], 2812
Douglas v. California [372 U.S. 353 (1963)], 23, 741, 817, 935, 1232, 1362, 1415, 2262, 2295, 2310, 2869, 2877
Douglas v. Seacoast Products [431 U.S. 265 (1977)], 1677
Douglass v. Pike County [101 U.S. 677 (1880)], 676
Dow Chemical Company v. United States [476 U.S. 227 (1986)], 712
Dowd Box Co. v. Courtney [369 U.S. 502 (1962)], 1554
Dowdell v. United States [221 U.S. 325 (1911)], 1376
Dowling v. United States [493 U.S. 342 (1990)], 810
Downes v. Bidwell [182 U.S. 244 (1901)], 1376, 2080, 2672
Draper v. United States [358 U.S. 307 (1959)], 818, 1368, 2330
Dred Scott v. Sandford [60 U.S. (I 9 How.) 393 (1857)], 4, 15, 146, 164, 169, 179, 183, 190, 258, 298, 314, 325, 335, 338, 364, 367, 374, 387, 402, 411, 485, 497, 566, 569, 582, 652, 658, 667, 735, 736, 743, 754, 795, 813, 818–820, 829, 884, 908, 909, 1148, 1175, 1230, 1287, 1290, 1293, 1356, 1432, 1459, 1468, 1475, 1572, 1582, 1620, 1623, 1624, 1625, 1670, 1675, 1712, 1736, 1748, 1791, 1821, 1901, 1919, 1947, 1959, 2021, 2054, 2095, 2099, 2216, 2217, 2389, 2424, 2425, 2427, 2432, 2436, 2556–2557, 2561, 2584, 2591, 2598, 2609, 2612, 2630, 2647, 2649–2650, 2653, 2655–2656, 2673, 2804, 2807, 2858, 2868
Dronenburg v. Zech [741 F. 2d 1388 (D.C. Cir. 1984)], 210, 1196, 1197
Drummond, United States v. [350 F. 2d 983 (8th Cir. 1965)], 2719
Duchess of Hamilton's Case [88 Eng. Rep. 651 (1712)], 208
Duckworth v. Arkansas [314 U.S. 390 (1941)], 1103
Duckworth v. Eagan [492 U.S. 195 (1989)], 1253, 1743, 1744, 1931, 2240
Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Environmental Study Group [438 U.S. 51 (1978)], 2278–2279, 2473, 2532, 2706
Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc. [472 U.S. 749 (1985)], 829–830, 1608, 1609, 2709–2710
Dunaway v. New York [442 U.S. 200 (1979)], 120, 2331
Duncan, In re. See Duncan v. McCall
Duncan v. Kahanamoku [327 U.S. 304 (1946)], 385, 830, 886, 1246, 1796, 1998, 2551, 2839
Duncan v. Louisiana [391 U.S. 145 (1968)], 157, 170, 435, 710, 720, 722, 830, 1269, 1288, 1356, 1434, 1510, 1515, 1517, 1700, 1709, 2037, 2039, 2040, 2041, 2138, 2573, 2724, 2856
Duncan v. McCall [139 U.S. 449 (1891)], 2210
Dunn v. Blumstein [405 U.S. 330 (1972)], 830–831, 2275, 2305 Duplex Printing Press Co. v. Deering [254 U.S. 443 (1921)], 422, 831, 1825, 1911
Duren v. Missouri [439 U.S. 357 (1979)], 1510, 2391
Dyer, West Virginia ex rel., v. Sims [341 U.S. 22 (1951)], 901

E

E. C. Knight Company, United States v. See Knight Company, E. C., United States v.
Eagle, The, v. Frazier [75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 15 (1869)], 1791

Eakin v. Raub [12 Sargeant & Rawle 330 (Pa., 1825)], 833, 1192 Earley v. DiCenso [403 U.S. 602 (1971)], 1206, 1601
Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel [524 U.S. 498 (1998)], 905, 2055, 2056, 2226
Eastern States Retail Lumber Dealers' Association v. United States [234 U.S. 600 (1914)], 214
Eastlake (City of) v. Forest City Enterprises, Inc. [426 U.S. 668 (1976)], 2536
Edelman v. California [344 U.S. 357 (1953)], 2774
Edelman v. Jordan [415 U.S. 651 (1974)], 853, 877, 878, 879, 1060, 1468, 1562, 1869, 2832
Edgar v. MITE Corp. [457 U.S. 604 (1982)], 2350, 2516, 2517
Edmond v. United States [520 U.S. 651 (1997)], 2386
Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co. [500 U.S. 614 (1991)], 1514, 1515, 1531, 1899, 2490
Edwards, United States v. [415 U.S. 800 (1974)], 2344
Edwards v. Aguillard [482 U.S. 578 (1987)], 707, 859, 924, 925, 1602, 1603, 2174, 2177, 2185, 2327, 2379
Edwards v. Arizona [451 U.S. 477 (1981)], 861, 1742–1743, 1928, 2831, 2891
Edwards v. California [314 U.S. 160 (1941)], 286, 861, 913, 1362, 1973, 2021, 2274, 2774–2775, 2878
Edwards v. Healy [412 U.S. 772 (1975)], 1196
Edwards v. South Carolina [372 U.S. 229 (1963)], 767, 1305, 2855
Edwards v. United States [286 U.S. 482 (1932)], 2785
Eichman, United States v. [496 U.S. 310 (1990)], 76, 179, 192, 238, 1063–1064, 1136, 2538
Eisenstadt v. Baird [405 U.S. 438 (1972)], 4, 182, 863, 973, 1118, 1120, 1122, 1234, 1672, 1811, 2203–2204, 2242, 2246, 2247, 2248, 2285, 2394, 2573
Eisner v. Macomber [252 U.S. 189 (1920)], 863–864, 2421
Electrical Workers Local No. 501 v. NLRB [341 U.S. 694 (1951)], 215
Electric Bond & Share Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission [303 U.S. 419 (1938)], 2079, 2350
Elfbrandt v. Russell [384 U.S. 11 (1966)], 882, 1536, 2066
Eliason, United States v. [41 U.S. (6 Pet.) 291 (1842)], 1994
Elk v. Wilkins [112 U.S. 94 (1884)], 82, 183, 587, 1227, 1698
Elkins v. United States [364 U.S. 206 (1960)], 882, 936, 2335, 2416
Elk's Lodge #2043 v. Ingraham [422 U.S. 924 (1973)], 2741
Elledge v. Florida [525 U.S. 944 (1998)], 243
Elrod v. Burns [427 U.S. 347 (1976)], 226, 235, 268, 892, 1108, 1885, 1886, 1939, 1940, 2300 Employees v. Department of Public Health and Welfare [411 U.S. 279 (1973)], 853, 1060, 2832
Employers' Liability Cases (First) [207 U.S. 463 (1908)], 459, 893, 1756, 2780, 2899
Employers' Liability Cases (Second) [223 U.S. 1 (1912)], 893
Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith [484 U.S. 872 (1990)], 24, 82, 195, 359, 624, 658, 679, 823, 894–895, 1207, 1351, 1831, 1851, 2165–2166, 2169, 2175, 2176, 2178, 2181, 2182, 2184, 2192, 2194–2195, 2322
Emspak v. United States [349 U.S. 190 (1955)], 1305
Endo, Ex parte [323 U.S. 283 (1944)], 1247, 1415–1417, 2931
Endo v. United States [323 U.S. 282 (1944)], 129
Engel v. Vitale [370 U.S. 421 (1962)], 1, 167, 188, 855, 859, 896, 927, 2176, 2177, 2322, 2323, 2324, 2372, 2594, 2856, 2858
Engle v. Isaac [456 U.S. 107 (1982)], 1841
Enmund v. Florida [458 U.S. 782 (1982)], 302, 896, 2368, 2369, 2891
Entick v. Carrington [19 How. St. Tr. 1029 (1765)], 216, 1099, 2236, 2905
Environmental Protection Agency v. State Water Reserve Control Board [426 U.S. 200 (1976)], 901
Epperson v. Arkansas [393 U.S. 97 (1968)], 706, 855–856, 905–906, 1083, 1520, 1585, 2177, 2327, 2373
Equal Employment Opportunity Commission v. Arabian American Oil Company [499 U.S. 244 (1991)], 960
Equal Employment Opportunity Commission v. Wyoming [460 U.S. 226 (1983)], 59, 193, 881, 907, 1181, 2520
Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins [304 U.S. 64 (1938)], 220, 317, 466, 513, 798, 921, 977, 1103, 1390, 1439, 1468, 1493, 1496, 1869, 2556, 2593, 2629, 2648, 2764
Erznoznik v. Jacksonville [422 U.S. 205 (1975)], 922, 1195
Escobedo v. Illinois [378 U.S. 478 (1964)], 922–923, 1200, 1280, 1741, 1925, 1926, 1927–1928, 2263, 2264, 2856 Esposito, United States v. [1990 U.S. App. Lexis 12631 (3d. Cir. 1990)], 982
Estelle v. Gamble [429 U.S. 97 (1976)], 721, 730–731, 1885, 2350
Estelle v. Smith [451 U.S. 454 (1981)], 302, 929, 1742
Estelle v. Williams [425 U.S. 501 (1976)], 971
Estes v. Texas [381 U.S. 532 (1965)], 330, 929, 972, 1150, 2541
Eu v. San Francisco County Democratic Central Committee [489 U.S. 214 (1989)], 1938–1939, 2008
Euclid (Village of) v. Ambler Realty Company [272 U.S. 365 (1926)], 259, 284, 889, 929, 2151, 2311, 2510, 2626, 2646, 2944, 2946
Eustis v. Bolles [150 U.S. 361 (1893)], 2830
Evans v. Abney [396 U.S. 435 (1970)], 930–931, 2411, 2487
Evans v. Jeff D. [475 U.S. 717 (1986)], 413, 414
Evans v. Newton [382 U.S. 296 (1966)], 930, 2487, 2854
Everson v. Board of Education [330 U.S. 1 (1947)], 24, 179, 187–188, 197, 201, 349, 795, 924, 925, 927, 928, 931–932, 1102, 1206, 1355, 1704, 2157, 2171, 2187, 2302, 2370, 2373, 2706, 2795
Evitts v. Lucey [469 U.S. 387 (1985)], 935, 2045
Examining Board v. Flores de Otero [426 U.S. 572 (1976)], 66, 2081
Ex parte . . . See case name inverted, e.g., McCardle, Ex parte Exxon Corporation v. Eagerton [462 U.S. 176 (1983)], 71
Exxon Corporation v. Governor of Maryland [437 U.S. 117 (1978)], 1381, 2515
Exxon Corporation v. Wisconsin Department of Revenue [447 U.S. 207 (1980)], 2523

F

Fair Assessment of Real Estate Association v. McNary [454 U.S. 100 (1981)], 447
Fairfax Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee [11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 603 (1813)], 1689, 2555
Falbo v. United States [321 U.S. 802 (1944)], 1769
Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley [164 U.S. 112 (1896)], 2075
Faragher v. City of Boca Raton [524 U.S. 775 (1998)], 2400
Fare v. Michael C. [442 U.S. 707 (1979)], 1743
Faretta v. California [422 U.S. 806 (1975)], 974
Farmer v. Brennan [511 U.S. 825 (1994)], 654
Farrington v. Tokushige [273 U.S. 284 (1927)], 858
Farwell v. Boston and Worcester Railroad [4 Metc. 49 (Mass.) (1842)], 561
Fatico, United States v. [579 F. 2d 707 (. 2d Cir. 1978)], 2367
Fay v. New York [332 U.S. 261 (1947)], 35, 199, 1509, 2389
Fay v. Noia [372 U.S. 391 (1963)], 235, 238, 975, 1253, 1269, 1758, 2156, 2821, 2831
Federal Communications Commission v. League of Women Voters of California [458 U.S. 364 (1984)], 247, 2469, 2530, 2534, 2568, 2750
Federal Communications Commission v. National Right to Work Committee [459 U.S. 197 (1982)], 1933
Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica Foundation [438 U.S. 726 (1978)], 235, 247, 248, 351, 981, 1043, 1057, 1147, 1236, 1392, 2530, 2534
Federal Election Commission v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life (MCFL) [479 U.S. 238 (1986)], 296, 691, 1237
Federal Election Commission v. National Conservative Political Action Committee [470 U.S. 480 (1985)], 296
Federal Energy Agency v. Algonquin SNG, Inc. [426 U.S. 548 (1976)], 987
Federal Energy Regulatory Commission v. Mississippi [456 U.S. 742 (1982)], 193, 901, 1181
Federal Power Commission v. Hope Natural Gas Co. [320 U.S. 591 (1944)], 970, 1023, 2437
Federal Power Commission v. Natural Gas Pipeline Company [315 U.S. 575 (1942)], 2437
Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Brothers [289 U.S. 266 (1933)], 761, 1612
Federal Trade Commission v. Gratz [253 U.S. 421 (1920)], 1030, 1714
Federal Trade Commission v. Ruberoid Co. [343 U.S. 470 (1952)], 2384
Feiner v. New York [340 U.S. 315 (1951)], 16–17, 188, 426, 1031, 1055, 1304–1305, 2145, 2669, 2792, 2795
Feldman v. United States Oil Refining Co. [322 U.S. 487 (1944)], 719
Felker v. Turpin [518 U.S. 1051 (1996)], 1503
Ferber v. New York. See New York v. Ferber
FERC v. Mississippi [456 U.S. 742 (1982)], 1637
Ferguson v. Skrupa [372 U.S. 726 (1963)], 691, 838, 839, 1034, 1050, 1175, 2510
Fernandez v. Wiener [326 U.S. 340 (1945)], 784
Ferreira, United States v. [54 U.S. (13 How.) 40 (1853)], 2384
Fiallo v. Bell [430 U.S. 787 (1977)], 1329, 1331
Fibreboard Paper Products v. NLRB [379 U.S. 203 (1964)], 1548
Field v. Clark [143 U.S. 649 (1892)], 1039
Finley v. Lvnn [10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 238 (1810)], 2704
Firefighters Local Union No. 1784 v. Stotts [467 U.S. 561 (1984)], 54, 397, 1044–1045, 1760, 1842
First English Evangelical Lutheran Church v. County of Los Angeles [482 U.S. 304 (1987)], 890, 2535, 2946
First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti [435 U.S. 765 (1978)], 295, 296, 687, 688, 690, 691, 692, 1060, 1275, 1372, 2157, 2160, 2351
First National City Bank v. Banco Nacional de Cuba [406 U.S. 759 (1972)], 25
First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB [452 U.S. 666 (1981)], 1548
Fisher, United States v. [6 U.S. (2 Cranch) 358 (1804)], 1344, 1685
Fisher v. McGirr [1 Gray 1 (Mass. 1854)], 2935
Fisher v. United States [425 U.S. 391 (1976)], 2240, 2241, 2767
Fiske v. Kansas [274 U.S. 380 (1927)], 723–724, 2311
Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer [427 U.S. 445 (1976)], 877, 879, 880, 894, 1060, 1468, 2153, 2504
Five Gambling Devices, United States v. [346 U.S. 441 (1953)], 1410
Five Knights Case (Darnel's Case) 3 How. St.Tr. 1 (English) (1628)], 1186
Flag Salute Cases [310 U.S. (1940); 319 U.S. 624 (1943)], 814, 1064–1066, 2549–2550
Flagg Brothers, Inc. v. Brooks [436 U.S. 149 (1978)], 445, 1064, 1411, 2030, 2489, 2492
Flast v. Cohen [392 U.S. 83 (1968)], 495, 876, 1066–1067, 1465, 2475, 2659, 2662, 2777–2778
Flemming v. Nestor [363 U.S. 603 (1960)], 2445, 2902
Fletcher v. Peck [10 U.S. (6 Cranch) 87 (1810)], 30, 344, 667, 673, 674–675, 744, 745, 802, 1067–1068, 1175, 1260, 1287, 1673, 1682, 1685, 1904, 2554, 2570, 2648, 2653, 2664, 2676, 2781, 2783, 2862
Fletcher v. Weir [455 U.S. 603 (1982)], 1927
Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. [220 U.S. 107 (1911)], 2421
Florida v. Bostick [501 U.S. 429 (1991)], 1097
Florida v. Riley [488 U.S. 445 (1989)], 712, 1093, 2141, 2337
Florida v. Royer [460 U.S. 491 (1983)], 2333, 2338
Florida Avocado Growers v. Paul [372 U.S. 132 (1963)], 2511
Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc. [515 U.S. 618 (1995)], 1068
Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Education Expense Board v. College Savings Bank, U.S. [527 U.S. 627 (1999)], 625, 880, 992, 1845
Florida Star v. B.J.F. [491 U.S. 524 (1989)], 1145
Foley v. Connelie [435 U.S. 291 (1978)], 66, 72, 1068, 2583
Follett v. Town of McCormick [321 U.S. 573 (1944)], 1427, 2191
Fong Haw Tan v. Phelan [333 U.S. 6 (1948)], 1331

Fong Yue Ting v. United States [149 U.S. 698 (1893)], 128, 130, 771, 1167, 1227, 1330
Food Lion, Inc. v. American Broadcasting Co. (ABC) [194 F. 3d 505 (4th Cir. 1999)], 1069, 1438
Ford v. Wainwright [477 U.S. 399 (1986)], 1070–1071, 1720
Fordice, United States v. [505 U.S. 717 (1992)], 58
Ford Motor Company v. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission [454 U.S. 1030 (1981)], 194, 1842
Forsyth County, Georgia v. Nationalist Movement [505 U.S. 123 (1992)], 195, 1082
Fort Gratiot Sanitary Landfill, Inc. v. Michigan Department of Natural Resources [504 U.S. 353 (1992)], 2864
Fortnightly Corp. v. United Artists Television, Inc. [392 U.S. 390 (1968)], 2449
Fort Wayne Books, Inc. v. Indiana [489 U.S. 46 (1989)], 1153
44 Liquormart, Inc v. Rhode Island [517 U.S. 484 (1996)], 464, 1135, 1830, 2170
Foster v. Illinois [332 U.S. 134 (1947)], 2261
Foster v. Nielson [27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253 (1829)], 1612, 1950, 2722
Foster and Elam v. Neilson (1829), 1080
Foster-Fountain Packing Co. v. Haydel [278 U.S. 1 (1928)], 2514
$405,089.23, United States v. [518 U.S. 267 (1996)], 811
Fox v. Washington [236 U.S. 273 (1915)], 1299
Frady, United States v. [456 U.S. 152 (1982)], 1253
Frances and Eliza v. Coates [21 U.S. 398 (1823)], 832
Francis v. Resweber [331 U.S. 786 (1947)], 815
Frank v. Mangum [237 U.S. 309 (1915)], 1100–1101, 1310, 1758, 1911, 2638 Frank v. Maryland [359 U.S. 360 (1959)], 42, 43, 2767
Franklin v. Massachusetts [505 U.S. 788 (1992)], 326
Franks v. Delaware [438 U.S. 154 (1978)], 2345
Frazee v. Illinois Department of Employment Security [489 U.S. 829 (1989)], 1105, 2192, 2380
Frazier v. Cupp [94 U.S. 731 (1969)], 2690
Freedman v. Maryland [380 U.S. 51 (1965)], 1105–1106
Freeman v. Hewitt [329 U.S. 249 (1949)], 1148, 2522
Fremont v. United States [17 How. 542 (1855)], 2653
Freund v. United States [260 U.S. 60 (1938)], 1077
Freytag v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue [501 U.S. 868 (1991)], 2386
Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Environmental Services [120 S.Ct. 693 (2000)], 905
Fries, John, United States v. [3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 515 (1800)], 1902
Frisbie v. United States [157 U.S. 160 (1895)], 241
Frisby v. Schultz [487 U.S. 474 (1988)], 1156
Frohwerk v. United States [249 U.S. 204 (1919)], 709, 923, 1156, 1299, 2580, 2901
Frontiero v. Richardson [411 U.S. 677 (1973)], 229, 232, 238, 508, 704, 1156–1157, 1185, 1196, 2155, 2390, 2391, 2393, 2921
Frost & Frost Trucking Co. v. Railroad Commission [271 U.S. 583 (1926)], 2626, 2748
Frothingham v. Mellon [262 U.S. 447 (1923)], 1066, 1157, 1464, 1795, 1797, 2468, 2481, 2626, 2659, 2661–2662
Fry v. United States [421 U.S. 542 (1975)], 1011, 1012, 1776, 2154, 2155
Fuentes v. Shevin [407 U.S. 67 (1972)], 2053
Fullilove v. Klutznick [449 U.S. 448 (1980)], 53, 54, 55, 56, 391, 397, 623, 794, 1172, 1530, 1587, 1588, 2105, 2106, 2108, 2109, 2110, 2111, 2153, 2160, 2230, 2231, 2530, 2536, 2538, 2597, 2599, 2765, 2887, 2890
Furman v. Georgia [408 U.S. 238 (1972)], 236, 274, 300–301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 309–310, 310, 720, 721, 732, 1288, 2319, 2368, 2443, 2888, 2891

G

Gaffney v. Cummings [412 U.S. 735 (1973)], 1188, 2134
Gagnon v. Scarpelli [411 U.S. 778 (1973)], 2263
Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Super Market [366 U.S. 617 (1961)], 2191, 2584 Gambino v. United States [275 U.S. 310 (1927)], 2416
Gannett Co., Inc. v. DePasquale [443 U.S. 368 (1979)], 1151, 1180–1181, 1214, 1979, 2010, 2077, 2231, 2232
García v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority [469 U.S. 528 (1985)], 59, 190, 191, 193, 276, 362, 623–624, 684, 806, 903, 907, 967, 990, 991, 995, 1012, 1089, 1181–1182, 1211, 1229, 1292, 1477, 1549, 1637, 1776–1777, 1803, 1822, 1841, 1844, 1845, 2155, 2169, 2481, 2503, 2520, 2587, 2668
Gardner v. Florida [430 U.S. 349 (1977)], 302
Garland, Ex parte [71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 333 (1867)], 257, 318, 339, 1030, 1182
Garner v. Florida [430 U.S. 349 (1977)], 2367
Garrett v. United States [471 U.S. 773 (1985)], 982–983
Garrison v. Louisiana [379 U.S. 64 (1964)], 1047, 1805, 2353
Garrity v. New Jersey [385 U.S. 493 (1967)], 1183, 2238
Gaston County v. United States [395 U.S. 285 (1969)], 2102
Gault, In re [387 U.S. 1 (1967)], 352, 492, 1083, 1183–1184, 1269, 1523, 1524, 1709, 1718, 2265
Gebser v. Lago Vista Independent School District [524 U.S. 274 (1998)], 2400
Geduldig v. Aiello [417 U.S. 484 (1974)], 1032, 2394, 2397, 2399
Geer v. Connecticut [161 U.S. 519 (1896)], 1212
Gelbard v. United States [408 U.S. 41 (1972)], 1184
Gelpcke v. Dubuque [68 U.S. (1 Wall.) 175 (1864)], 341, 676, 1733, 2628
Gelston v. Hoyt [16 U.S. (3 Wheat.) 246 (1818)], 1685
General Building Constructors Association, Inc. v. Pennsylvania [16 U.S. 375 (1982)], 403, 2221
General Dynamics Corp., United States v. [410 U.S. 979 (1973)], 2542
General Electric Co. v. Gilbert [429 U.S. 125 (1976)], 406, 2394, 2395
Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada [501 U.S. 1030 (1991)], 1152
Georgia v. McCollum [505 U.S. 42 (1992)], 195, 1899, 2088, 2490

Georgia v. Rachel [384 U.S. 780 (1966)], 414, 2227
Georgia v. Stanton [73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 50 (1868)], 335, 339, 1745–1746, 1950, 2471
Georgia Railroad & Banking Co. v. Smith [128 U.S. 174 (1889)], 1163
Gerende v. Board of Supervisors of Elections [341 U.S. 56 (1951)], 1187, 2794
Gerstein v. Pugh [420 U.S. 103 (1975)], 121, 716, 1369, 2024, 2332
Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. [418 U.S. 323 (1974)], 271, 829, 830, 1189, 1236, 1608, 1671, 1822, 1976, 1978, 1979, 2014, 2709, 2887, 2890, 2893
Gettysburg Electric Railway Co., United States v. [160 U.S. 668 (1896)], 889
Gibbons v. Ogden [22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1 (1824)], 454–455, 456, 459, 660, 675, 693, 743, 832, 835, 844, 845, 861, 1011, 1189–1192, 1266, 1396, 1425, 1534, 1540, 1611–1612, 1636, 1674, 1683, 1686, 1690, 1707, 1768–1769, 1776, 1778, 1896, 1988, 2115, 2274, 2506, 2512, 2555, 2560–2561, 2565, 2586–2587, 2593, 2611, 2652–2653, 2697, 2839, 2858, 2871, 2883, 2885, 2903, 2908, 2913
Gibbs v. United Mine Workers of America [383 U.S. 715 (1966)], 1891
Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice Co. [336 U.S. 490 (1949)], 188, 1192, 1907, 2795
Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee [372 U.S. 539 (1963)], 155, 187, 1192–1193, 1200, 1595–1596, 2243
Gideon v. Wainwright [372 U.S. 335 (1963)], 23, 170, 186, 720, 817, 971, 1083, 1193–1194, 1200, 1369, 1462, 1869, 1981, 2043, 2261–2262, 2263, 2609, 2796, 2856, 2877
Gilbert v. California [388 U.S. 263 (1967)], 1627
Gilbert v. Minnesota [254 U.S. 325 (1920)], 595
Gilchrist v. Collector [10 F. Cas. 355 (C.C.D. S.C. 1808) (No. 5, 420)], 885
Giles v. Teasley [193 U.S. 146 (1904)], 1041
Gillette v. United States [401 U.S. 437 (1971)], 506, 666, 1677, 2188
Gillock, United States v. [445 U.S. 360 (1979)], 2464
Ginsberg v. New York [390 U.S. 629 (1968)], 351, 353, 1083, 1194–1195
Ginzburg v. United States [383 U.S. 463 (1966)], 1270
Girouard v. United States [328 U.S. 61 (1946)], 1198, 2326
Gitlow v. New York [268 U.S. 652 (1925)], 146, 179, 284, 426, 1050, 1126, 1128, 1198–1199, 1285, 1296, 1300, 1352, 1354, 1787, 1959, 2186, 2310, 2311, 2318, 2319, 2580, 2640, 2901–2902
Given, United States v. [25 F. Cas. 1324 (C.C.D.D. 1873) (No. 15, 210)], 360, 361
Gladstone Realtors v. Village of Bellwood [436 U.S. 956 (1979)], 1854
Glass v. The Sloop Betsy [3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 6 (1794)], 1418, 2603
Glickman v. Wileman Brothers and Elliott Inc. [521 U.S. 457 (1997)], 476
Glidden v. Zdanok [370 U.S. 530 (1962)], 419, 696, 1019, 1590
Globe Newspaper Company v. Superior Court [457 U.S. 596 (1982)], 1152, 1199, 1214, 2529 Glona v. American Guarantee & Liability Insurance Co. [391 U.S. 73 (1968)], 1325–1326, 1605–1606
Go Bart v. United States [282 U.S. 344 (1931)], 2344
Godcharles v. Wigeman [113 Pa.St. 431 (Penna. 1886)], 1735–1736
Godfrey v. Georgia [446 U.S. 420 (1980)], 302, 1199
Goesaert v. Cleary [335 U.S. 464 (1948)], 1199, 2392, 2398, 2921
Gold Clause Cases (1935), 211, 734, 1201–1202, 1311, 1488
Goldberg v. Kelly [397 U.S. 254 (1970)], 119, 184, 231, 233–234, 237, 492, 816, 897, 966, 1200–1201, 1362, 1678, 1697–1698, 1887–1888, 1973, 1974, 2026, 2033–2034, 2252, 2445, 2468, 2873, 2874, 2876, 2880
Golden v. Prince [10 F. Cas. 1542 (C.C.D. Pa. 1814) (No. 5, 509)], 2859
Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar [421 U.S. 773 (1975)], 1202
Goldman v. United States [3l6 U.S. 129 (1942)], 711, 873, 1850, 2416
Goldman v. Weinberger [475 U.S. 503 (1986)], 895, 1202, 1822, 2192, 2380
Goldstein v. California [412 U.S. 546 (1973)], 685
Goldwater v. Carter [444 U.S. 996 (1979)], 320, 616, 1075, 1203, 1993, 2360, 2533, 2722
Gomillion v. Lightfoot [364 U.S. 339 (1960)], 362, 1042, 1187, 1203, 1585, 1586, 1637, 2202
Gompers v. Buck's Stove & Range Company [221 U.S. 418 (1911)], 1203–1204, 1559
Gong Lum v. Rice [275 U.S. 78 (1927)], 129, 388, 1204, 2282, 2642
Goodell v. Jackson [20 Johns. 693 (N.Y. 1823)], 1535
Gooding v. Wilson [405 U.S. 518 (1972)], 234, 1042
Goodman v. Lukens Steel Co. [482 U.S. 656 (1987)], 1844
Goss v. Board of Education [373 U.S. 683 (1963)], 2854
Goss v. Lopez [419 U.S. 565 (1975)], 201, 856, 966, 1205, 1975, 2027
Gouled v. United States [255 U.S. 298 (1921)], 1722, 2339, 2340, 2345, 2767, 2833
Grace v. United States [461 U.S. 171 (1983)], 1218
Grady v. Corbin [495 U.S. 508 (1990)], 809, 810, 811, 982, 983, 985, 2112
Graham v. Collins [506 U.S. 461 (1993)], 2696
Graham v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue [490 U.S. 680 (1989)], 2380, 2468
Graham v. John Deere Co. of Kansas City [383 U.S. 1 (1966)], 1881, 1882
Graham v. Richardson [403 U.S. 365 (1971)], 66, 190, 194, 1218–1219, 1331, 1333, 2583, 2873
Grand Rapids School District v. Ball [473 U.S. 373 (1985)], 63, 1603, 1604, 2375, 2378
Granger Cases (1877), 217, 240, 321, 931, 1037, 1164, 1224–1225, 1397, 2817, 2822–2823, 2829
Gravel v. United States [408 U.S. 606 (1972)], 1226, 1323, 2359, 2464

Graver Tank & Manufacturing Co. v. Linde Air Products Co. [340 U.S. 845 (1950)], 1882
Graves v. New York ex rel. O'Keefe [306 U.S. 466 (1939)], 340, 442, 1226, 1384, 1869, 2544
Gray v. Davis [10 F. Cas. 1006 (C. C. W. D. Tx. 1871)], 360
Gray v. Sanders [372 U.S. 368 (1963)], 1227–1228, 1533, 2132–2133, 2810
Gray v. United States [21 Ct.Cl. 340 (1884)], 2505
Great American Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Novotny [442 U.S. 366 (1979)], 894
Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. Cottrell [424 U.S. 366 (1976)], 1228, 2514
Great Northern Railway Co. v. Sunburst Oil & Refining Co. [287 U.S. 580 (1932)], 2224
Greater New Orleans Broadcasting Association v. United States [527 U.S. 173 (1999)], 464
Green v. Biddle [8 Wheaton 1 (1823)], 423, 438, 1228, 1686, 2859
Green v. County School Board of New Kent [391 U.S. 430 (1968)], 229, 232, 237, 397, 772–773, 859, 1229, 2854
Green v. Georgia [442 U.S. 95 (1979)], 302, 934
Green v. Oklahoma [428 U.S. 907 (1976)], 310–312
Green v. United States [356 U.S. 165 (1957)], 720, 807
Greene v. McElroy [360 U.S. 474 (1959)], 421, 946, 1650
Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebraska Penal and Correctional Complex [442 U.S. 1 (1979)], 897, 2367
Greenough v. Greenough [11 Penn. State 489 (1849)], 833
Greenwood v. Peacock [384 U.S. 808 (1966)], 414–415, 2227
Greer v. Spock [424 U.S. 828 (1976)], 117, 2069
Gregg v. Georgia [428 U.S. 153 (1976)], 239, 300, 301, 302, 303, 305, 306, 308, 310–312, 732, 1703, 2368, 2443
Gregoire v. Biddle [339 U.S. 949 (1949)], 943
Gregory v. Ashcroft [501 U.S. 452 (1991)], 624, 991, 1229, 2503
Gregory v. Chicago [394 U.S. 111 (1969)], 188, 2855
Griffin v. Breckenridge [403 U.S. 88 (1971)], 96, 227, 423, 709, 1230–1231, 1241, 1293, 2274, 2487
Griffin v. California [380 U.S. 609 (1965)], 33, 815, 1231, 1665, 2039, 2238, 2458, 2850, 2856
Griffin v. County School Board of Prince Edward County [377 U.S. 218 (1964)], 772, 1231, 1374, 1375, 1585, 1757, 2738
Griffin v. Illinois [351 U.S. 12 (1956)], 23, 377, 741, 817, 1231–1232, 1362, 1750–1751, 2262, 2310, 2869, 2874, 2877
Griffin v. Wisconsin [483 U.S. 868 (1987)], 2337
Griffiths, In re [413 U.S. 717 (1973)], 66, 1987, 2582–2583
Griggs v. Duke Power Co. [401 U.S. 924 (1971)], 96, 99, 100, 396, 406, 408, 1232, 2102, 2107, 2392, 2890
Grimaud, United States v. [220 U.S. 506 (1911)], 1232, 1558
Griswold v. Connecticut [381 U.S. 479 (1965)], 4, 182, 187, 210, 211, 239, 274, 315, 316, 317, 381, 508, 667, 816, 839, 863, 973, 1108, 1118, 1120, 1122, 1175, 1233–1234, 1269, 1289, 1393, 1461–1462, 1480, 1586, 1639, 1671, 1724, 1810, 1812, 1813, 1896, 2052, 2203, 2204, 2242, 2243, 2246, 2247, 2248, 2284, 2285, 2326, 2328, 2394, 2448, 2528, 2573, 2577, 2594, 2795, 2857, 2888, 2892, 2893, 2921
Grosjean v. American Press Co., Inc. [297 U.S. 233 (1936)], 315, 1138–1139, 1234, 1317, 2626
Grossman, Ex parte [267 U.S. 87 (1925)], 1235
Grosso v. United States [390 U.S. 62 (1968)], 1670
Grove City College v. Bell [465 U.S. 555 (1984)], 98, 2568
Groves v. Slaughter [40 U.S. (15 Pet.) 449 (1841)], 156, 1238, 1712, 2649, 2652, 2654, 2698, 2885
Grovey v. Townsend [295 U.S. 45 (1935)], 1238, 1818, 2282, 2436, 2437, 2809
Guardians Association v. Civil Service Commission [463 U.S. 582 (1983)], 1563
Guest, United States v. [383 U.S. 745 (1966)], 423, 709, 733, 1089, 1239–1241, 1679, 2275, 2491, 2694, 2878
Guinn v. United States [238 U.S. 347 (1915)], 909, 1041, 1219, 1242, 1629, 2808
Gully v. First National Bank [299 U.S. 109 (1936)], 1027
Gutknecht v. United States [396 U.S. 295 (1970)], 2448
Guy W. Capps, Inc., United States v. (4th Circuit, 1953), 941

H

Haggar Co. v. Helvering [308 U.S. 389 (1940)], 1860
Hague v. Congress of Industrial Organizations [307 U.S. 496 (1939)], 921, 1107, 1256, 1317, 1549, 1796, 2021, 2067, 2349, 2594
Haig v. Agee [453 U.S. 280 (1981)], 959, 1077, 1141, 1256–1257, 2146, 2574
Hale v. Henkel [201 U.S. 43 (1906)], 2139, 2745
Haley v. Ohio [332 U.S. 596 (1948)], 1522
Hall, United States v. [23 F. Cas. 79 (C.C. Ala. 1871) (No. 15, 282)], 360, 361, 2923
Hall v. DeCuir [95 U.S. 485 (1877)], 204, 217, 430, 1257, 1645, 1761, 2282, 2564
Halper, United States v. [490 U.S. 435 (1989)], 810, 811, 985
Halter v. Nebraska [205 U.S. 34 (1907)], 1061
Ham v. McClaws [1 Bay 93 (S.C. 1789)], 1287
Ham v. South Carolina [409 U.S. 524 (1973)], 2803
Hamilton v. Alabama [368 U.S. 52 (1961)], 2263
Hamilton v. Board of Regents of the University of California [292 U.S. 245 (1934)], 1261
Hamilton v. McClaughry [136 F. 445 (1905)], 2505
Hamm v. City of Rock Hill [379 U.S. 306 (1964)], 2420, 2486
Hammer v. Dagenhart [247 U.S. 251 (1918)], 151–152, 349, 421, 456, 458, 459, 743, 744, 749, 804, 827, 846, 861, 1001, 1011, 1261–1262, 1290, 1528, 1547, 1585, 1709, 1777–1778, 1830, 2049, 2635, 2638, 2658, 2668, 2676–2677, 2895, 2899, 2900
Hampton v. Mow Sun Wong [426 U.S. 88 (1976)], 1262, 1332, 1586–1587, 2529, 2530, 2536
Hampton v. United States [425 U.S. 484 (1976)], 899
Hampton, J. W., & Co. v. United States [276 U.S. 394 (1928)], 760, 1262
Hancock v. Train [426 U.S. 167 (1976)], 901
Hanna v. Plummer [380 U.S. 460 (1963)], 1029

Hanover National Bank v. Moyses [186 U.S. 181 (1902)], 160–161
Hans v. Louisiana [134 U.S. 1 (1890)], 877, 878, 879, 995, 1217, 2504
Hansberry v. Lee [311 U.S. 32 (1940)], 422
Harisiades v. Shaughnessy [342 U.S. 580 (1952)], 771
Harlow v. Fitzgerald [457 U.S. 800 (1982)], 944, 1336, 1819, 1977, 2708, 2922
Harmelin v. Michigan [501 U.S. 957 (1991)], 316, 732, 984
Harmon v. Taylor [273 U.S. 668 (1927)], 2219
Harmon v. Thornburgh [878 F. 2d 484 (D.C. Cir. 1989)], 822
Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections [383 U.S. 663 (1966)], 312, 377, 608, 631, 815–816, 866, 1175, 1269, 1271–1272, 1288, 1362, 1401, 1542, 1679, 1961, 2713–2714, 2741, 2857, 2874, 2879
Harper & Row, Publishers v. Nation Enterprises [471 U.S. 539 (1985)], 1377
Harriman v. Interstate Commerce Commission [211 U.S. 407 (1908)], 749
Harris, United States v. [106 U.S. 629 (1883)], 95–96, 403, 709, 1024, 1038, 1070, 1088, 1230, 1240, 1272, 1698, 1733, 2331, 2823, 2827, 2924
Harris v. Alabama [513 U.S. 504 (1995)], 1254
Harris v. Forklift Systems, Inc. [510 U.S. 17 (1993)], 1136, 2400
Harris v. McRae [448 U.S. 297 (1980)], 6, 7, 1272–1273, 1324, 1885, 2097, 2205–2206, 2394, 2542, 2764, 2872
Harris v. New York [401 U.S. 222 (1971)], 938, 1273, 1743, 1744, 1927
Harris v. Rosario [446 U.S. 651 (1980)], 2080, 2081
Harris v. United States [331 U.S. 145 (1947)], 2344, 2766
Harrison v. United States [392 U.S. 219 (1968)], 1158
Harriss, United States v. [347 U.S. 612 (1954)], 1636
Harte-Hanks Communications v. Connaughton [491 U.S. 657 (1989)], 1609
Hartford Fire Insurance v. California [509 U.S. 764 (1993)], 960
Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection & Insurance Co. v. Harrison [301 U.S. 459 (1937)], 840
Hartzel v. United States [332 U.S. 680 (1944)], 923
Haupt v. United States [330 U.S. 631 (1947)], 1279, 2718, 2931
Havens Realty Corporation v. Coleman [455 U.S. 363 (1982)], 2221, 2475
Haver v. Yaker [76 U.S. (9 Wall.) 32 (1869)], 2359
Hawaii v. Mankichi [190 U.S. 197 (1903)], 1376
Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff [467 U.S. 229 (1984)], 1279
Hawke v. Smith [253 U.S. 221 (1920)], 73, 862, 1950, 2118
Hayburn's Case [2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 409 (1792)], 1279–1280, 1418, 1464, 1902, 2384, 2601
Haynes v. United States [390 U.S. 85 (1968)], 1670
Haynes v. Washington [373 U.S. 503 (1963), 1280
Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier [484 U.S. 260 (1988)], 351, 381, 860, 1134, 1281, 2069, 2167, 2441
Hazen Paper Co. v. Biggins [507 U.S. 604 (1993)], 60
Head v. Amoskeag Manufacturing Company [113 U.S. 9 (1884)], 1227
Head Money Cases [112 U.S. 580 (1884)], 1329
Healy v. James [408 U.S. 169 (1972)], 855, 1108
Healy v. The Beer Institute, Inc. [491 U.S. 324 (1989)], 2517
Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States [379 U.S. 241 (1964)], 390, 405, 420, 459, 913, 1026, 1240, 1282–1283, 2016, 2420, 2486, 2694, 2854
Heath v. Alabama [474 U.S. 82 (1985)], 810–811, 1283
Heck v. Humphrey [512 U.S. 477 (1994)], 654
Heckler v. Chaney [470 U.S. 821 (1985)], 1218
Heffron v. International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Inc. [452 U.S. 640 (1981)], 235, 1283, 2189–2190
Heller v. Doe [509 U.S. 312 (1993)], 428, 2170
Helling v. McKinney [509 U.S. 25 (1993)], 2695
Helstoski, United States v. [442 U.S. 477 (1979)], 2464
Helvering v. Bruun [309 U.S. 461 (1940)], 2421
Helvering v. Davis [301 U.S. 619 (1937)], 314, 1283–1284, 2445, 2481, 2541, 2659, 2660–2661
Helvering v. Gerhardt [304 U.S. 405 (1938)], 2544
Helvering v. Griffiths [318 U.S. 371 (1943)], 2421
Henderson v. New York [92 U.S. 259 (1876)], 1328
Henderson v. United States [314 U.S. 625 (1950)], 280
Henneford v. Silas Mason Co. [300 U.S. 577 (1937)], 314 Hennington v. Georgia [163 U.S. 299 (1896)], 2584 Henry, United States v. [447 U.S. 264 (1980)], 2264
Henry v. United States [361 U.S. 98 (1959)], 1929, 2024
Hensley, United States v. [469 U.S. 221 (1985)], 2553
Hepburn v. Ellzey [6 U.S. (2 Cranch) 445 (1805)], 796
Hepburn v. Griswold [75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 603 (1870)], 335–336, 340, 430, 697, 736, 746, 1175, 1230, 1354, 1572, 1581, 1582, 1732, 1752–1753, 1791, 2563, 2913–2914
Herb v. Pitcairn [321 U.S. 759 (1945)], 722
Herbert v. Lando [441 U.S. 153 (1979)], 1141, 1285, 2200, 2890, 2892
Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue [490 U.S. 680 (1989)], 2380
Hernandez v. Texas [347 U.S. 475 (1954)], 1509
Herndon v. Lowry [301 U.S. 242 (1937)], 284, 354, 426, 1285–1286, 1296, 1353, 1955, 2281–2282, 2780
Hewitt v. Helms [459 U.S. 460 (1983)], 2013, 2532
Hicklin v. Orbeck [437 U.S. 518 (1978)], 157, 1212, 1286, 2020
Hicks v. Miranda [422 U.S. 332 (1975)], 18
Hills v. Gautreaux [425 U.S. 284 (1976)], 1289, 2221
Hinderlider v. La Plata River & Cherry Creek Ditch Co. [304 U.S. 92 (1938)], 977, 1398
Hines v. Davidowitz [312 U.S. 52 (1941)], 1077, 1289–1290, 1593, 1989, 2930
Hipolite Egg Company v. United States [220 U.S. 45 (1911)], 330, 1290, 1294, 2084, 2899, 2900
Hirabayashi v. United States [320 U.S. 81 (1943)], 129, 131–132, 1415–1417, 2841, 2930
Hishon v. King & Spalding [467 U.S. 69 (1984)], 1844
Hitchcock v. Aicken [1 Caines 460; 3 Johns. Cas. 2d ed. 595 New York (1803)], 1635

Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell [245 U.S. 229 (1917)], 219, 421, 1292, 1547, 1825, 1911, 2896, 2939
H. J. Inc. v. Northwestern Bell Telephone Co. [492 U.S. 229 (1989)], 983, 2111
H. L. v. Matheson [450 U.S. 398 (1981)], 353, 1916
Ho Ah Kow v. Nunan [12 F. Cas. 252 (C.C. Ca. 1879) (No. 6, 546)], 130, 360, 1038
Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Commissioner of Florida [480 U.S. 136 (1987)], 2192, 2380
Hobson v. Hansen [265 F. Supp. 902 (D.C.D.C. 1967)], 790
Hodel v. Indiana [452 U.S. 314 (1981)], 1779
Hodel v. Irving [481 U.S. 704 (1987)], 2946
Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Association [452 U.S. 264 (1981)], 459, 901, 907, 1182, 1292, 1345, 1779
Hodges v. Easton [106 U.S. 408 (1882)], 2830
Hodges v. United States [203 U.S. 1 (1906)], 1167, 1168, 1292–1293, 1890, 2087, 2693
Hodgson and Thompson v. Bowerbank [9 U.S. (5 Cranch) 303 (1809)], 65, 1293–1294, 1465, 2752
Hodgson v. Minnesota [497 U.S. 417 (1990)], 1845, 2122, 2248
Hoffa v. United States [385 U.S. 293 (1966)], 873, 1294, 1850, 1914, 2896
Hoffman Estates v. Flipside [455 U.S. 489 (1982)], 2776
Hoke v. United States [227 U.S. 308 (1913)], 330, 749, 1290, 1294, 1652, 1666, 1790, 2899, 2900
Holden v. Hardy [169 U.S. 366 (1898)], 26, 241, 252, 583, 845, 1115, 1162, 1294, 1699, 1764, 2571–2572, 2572
Holder v. Hall [512 U.S. 874 (1994)], 2811
Holland v. Illinois. See Batson v. Kentucky
Hollingsworth v. Virginia [3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 378 (1798)], 73
Holmes v. Jennison [39 U.S. (14 Pet.) 540 (1840)], 156, 258, 1712
Holmes v. Walton [9 N.J. Law 444 (1780)], 541, 1298
Holt v. Sarver [309 F. Supp. 362 (1969)], 1374
Holtzman v. Schlesinger [361 F. Supp. 553 (E. D. N.Y. 1973)], 2790
Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell [290 U.S. 398 (1934)], 70, 252, 628, 631, 677, 1300–1301, 1311, 1350, 1634, 1645, 1789, 1836, 2218, 2226, 2281, 2784
Honda Motor Company v. Oberg [512 U.S. 415 (1994)], 2082–2083
Hood & Sons, H. P., v. DuMond [336 U.S. 525 (1949)], 835, 1103, 1410, 2514
Hooper v. Bernalillo County Assessor [472 U.S. 612 (1985)], 2277
Hooven & Allison Co. v. Evatt [325 U.S. 892 (1945)], 1864
Hopwood v. Texas [78 F. 3d 932 (5th Cir. 1996)], 57, 1304
Horton v. California [496 U.S. 128 (1990)], 1914
Hosmer v. United States [76 U.S. (9 Wall.) 432 (1872)], 2324
Houchins v. KQED, Inc. [438 U.S. 1 (1978)], 1144, 1215, 1979, 2271, 2328
Houston v. Moore [18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) 1 (1820)], 2555
Houston, East & West Texas Railway Co. v. United States [234 U.S. 342 (1914)], 862, 1308, 1310, 1312, 1396, 1652, 1740, 1778, 1912, 2415, 2560, 2780, 2820, 2899
Hoxie, United States v. [26 F. Cas. 397 (C.C. Ver. 1808) (No. 15, 407)], 885
Hoyt v. Florida [368 U.S. 57 (1961)], 274, 1509, 2389–2390, 2663, 2921
Huckle v. Money [95 E.R. 768 (1763)], 1099, 2905
Hudgens v. National Labor Relations Board [424 U.S. 507 (1976)], 369, 1308, 1672, 1677, 2060, 2415, 2487
Hudnut v. American Booksellers Association [475 U.S. 1001 (1986)], 2398
Hudson v. Palmer [468 U.S. 517 (1984)], 205, 1093, 2011
Hudson v. United States [522 U.S. 93 (1997)], 811, 985, 2401
Hudson and Goodwin, United States v. [11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 32 (1812)], 337, 980, 981, 1425, 1433
Hudson County Water Co. v. McCarter [209 U.S. 349 (1908)], 1565
Hughes v. Alexandria Scrap Corp. [426 U.S. 794 (1976)], 1212
Hughes v. Oklahoma [441 U.S. 322 (1979)], 1212, 2158, 2514
Hughes v. Superior Court [339 U.S. 460 (1950)], 1550
Humphrey's Executor v. United States [295 U.S. 602 (1935)], 111, 599–600, 1318–1319, 1772, 1847, 2149, 2384, 2626, 2636
Hunt v. McNair [413 U.S. 734 (1973)], 2375
Hunt v. Washington State Apple Advertising Commission [432 U.S. 333 (1977)], 806, 1381, 2515
Hunter v. City of Pittsburgh [207 U.S. 161 (1907)], 362, 1637
Hunter v. Erickson [393 U.S. 385 (1969)], 785, 787, 1320, 1415, 1503, 1637, 2220, 2487
Hunter v. Underwood [471 U.S. 222 (1985)], 915, 2106
Huntington Branch National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Town of Huntington [844 F. 2d 926 (. 2d Cir. 1988)], 2221, 2947
Hurd v. Hodge [334 U.S. 24 (1948)], 403, 1307, 2223, 2410–2411
Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston [515 U.S. 557 (1995)], 1320
Huron Portland Cement Company v. Detroit [362 U.S. 440 (1960)], 1320
Hurtado v. California [110 U.S. 516 (1884)], 710, 1267, 1321–1322, 1354, 1361, 1510–1511, 1698, 1700, 1874, 2036, 2569, 2744, 2829
Hustler Magazine and Larry Flynt v. Jerry Falwell [485 U.S. 46 (1988)], 436, 1133, 1146, 1322, 2710
Hutcheson, United States v. [312 U.S. 219 (1941)], 107, 1545
Hutchinson v. Proxmire [443 U.S. 111 (1979)], 501, 1323–1324, 2359, 2464
Hutto v. Davis [454 U.S. 370 (1982)], 729, 732, 822
Hutto v. Finney [437 U.S. 678 (1978)], 730, 731
Hylton v. United States [3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 171 (1796)], 337, 784, 1260, 1324, 1404, 1883, 1959, 1960, 2602, 2603, 2611

I

ICC. See Interstate Commerce Commission
Idaho v. Coeur d'Alene Tribe [521 U.S. 261 (1997)], 2504
Idaho v. Wright [497 U.S. 805 (1990)], 492

Illinois v. Gates [462 U.S. 213 (1983)], 64, 1327, 1368, 2024, 2331, 2345, 2469
Illinois v. Krull [480 U.S. 340 (1987)], 2338
Illinois v. Lafayette [462 U.S. 640 (1983)], 2344
Illinois v. Perkins [496 U.S. 292 (1990)], 1327
Illinois v. Rodriguez [497 U.S. 177 (1990)], 1327–1328, 2690
Illinois Central Railroad Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission [206 U.S. 441 (1907)], 1398
Imbler v. Pachtman [424 U.S. 409 (1976)], 1328, 1335, 1454
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Cardoza Fonseca [480 U.S. 421 (1987)], 2314
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha [462 U.S. 919 (1983)], 172, 269, 274, 343, 380, 449, 495, 499, 612, 614, 616, 620, 654, 760, 762, 886, 887, 949, 1219, 1333, 1386, 1460, 1488, 1529, 1599–1600, 2129, 2148, 2385, 2386, 2496, 2609–2610, 2787, 2838–2839, 2842, 2843, 2844, 2887, 2889, 2893
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Delgado [466 U.S. 210 (1984)], 1330, 2338
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Lopez-Mendoza [468 U.S. 1032 (1984)], 2044
Inadi, United States v. [475 U.S. 387 (1986)], 492
Indiana ex rel. Anderson v. Brand [302 U.S. 678 (1938)], 677
Indian Motorcycle Co. v. United States [283 U.S. 570 (1931)], 1384
Industrial Commission v. McCartin [330 U.S. 622 (1947)], 1769
Industrial Union Department, AFL-CIO v. American Petroleum Institute [448 U.S. 607 (1980)], 2536
Ingraham v. Wright [430 U.S. 651 (1977)], 729, 856, 974, 1369–1370, 1975, 2027, 2030, 2350
In re . . . See case name inverted, e.g., Primus, In re Insular Cases [182 U.S. 1 (1901)], 587, 1161, 1169, 1176, 1358, 1375–1376, 2672
International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. United States [431 U.S. 324 (1977)], 406
International Harvester Company, United States v. [274 U.S. 693 (1927)], 2298
International Longshoremen's Association v. Allied International, Inc. [456 U.S. 212 (1982)], 1551 International Longshoremen's Union v. Boyd [347 U.S. 222 (1954)], 2278
International Society for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee [505 U.S. 672 (1992)], 1391, 1531
International Union, UMWA v. Bagwell [512 U.S. 821 (1994)], 195
Interstate Commerce Commission v. Alabama Midland Railway Co. [168 U.S. 144 (1897)], 882, 1266, 1397–1398, 1642
Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. [167 U.S. 479 (1897)], 882, 1397–1398, 1666, 2048
Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Central Railroad [215 U.S. 452 (1910)], 1397, 1398, 2894
Iron Silver Mining Co. v. Campbell [135 U.S. 286 (1890)], 1732
Irvin v. Dowd [366 U.S. 717 (1961)], 1150, 1405, 2077
Irvine v. California [347 U.S. 128 (1954)], 1102, 1405, 1410, 1850
Isaac Williams, United States v. [148 U.S. 654 (1799)], 883
Ives v. South Buffalo Railway Company [127 U.S. 205 (1911)], 2925

J

Jackson, Ex parte [6 U.S. 727 (1878)], 1970
Jackson v. Bishop [404 F. 2d. 571 (1968)], 730
Jackson v. Georgia [408 U.S. Z38 (1972)], 309–310
Jackson v. Indiana [406 U.S. 715 (1972)], 1718
Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Company [419 U.S. 345 (1974)], 1411, 1677–1678, 2487, 2489, 2492
Jackson v. Steamboat Magnolia [61 U.S. (20 How.) 296 (1858)], 298
Jackson v. Virginia [443 U.S. 307 (1979)], 722–723, 1253
Jacobellis v. Ohio [378 U.S. 184 (1964)], 1414, 1452, 1716, 1734, 1965, 2850, 2855
Jacobs, In re [98 N.Y. 98 (1885)], 931, 1414
Jacobson v. Massachusetts [197 U.S. 11 (1905)], 259, 749, 1065, 1415, 1884, 1986, 2190, 2328, 2773
Jaffree v. Board of School Commissioners [459 U.S. 1314 (1983)], 2177
James v. Bowman [190 U.S. 127 (1903)], 1024, 1041, 1415, 2938
James v. Illinois [493 U.S. 307 (1990)], 1530, 2045
James v. Valtierra [402 U.S. 137 (1971)], 1415, 2220
James Daniel Good Real Property, United States v. [510 U.S. 43 (1993)], 2035, 2056
Jamison v. Texas [318 U.S. 413 (1943)], 2189, 2198
Janis, United States v. [428 U.S. 433 (1976)], 2044, 2335, 2416–2417
January and Patterson, United States v. [11 U.S. 572 (1813)], 832
Japanese American Cases (1943-1944), 186, 206, 794, 909, 944, 945, 1241, 1415–1417, 2290, 2293, 2302, 2505, 2550, 2842
Japan Line, Ltd. v. County of Los Angeles [441 U.S. 434 (1979)], 194, 1081, 1390, 2522
Jean v. Nelson [474 U.S. 846 (1985)], 1329, 1331
J. E. B. v. Alabama [511 U.S. 127 (1994)], 195, 1511, 1514, 1899, 2170, 2399
Jefferies v. Harris County Community Action Association [615 F. 2d 1025 (5th Cir. 1980)], 2090–2091
Jefferson v. Hackney [406 U.S. 535 (1972)], 2873
Jefferson County Board of Education, United States v. [372 F. 2d 836 (5th Cir. 1966)], 2915
Jelke Co., John F., v. Emery [193 Wis. 311 (1927)], 1114
Jencks v. United States [353 U.S. 667 (1957)], 607, 1426, 2867
Jenison, In re [375 U.S. 14 (1963)], 2190
Jenkins v. Anderson [447 U.S. 231 (1980)], 1426, 1927
Jenkins v. Missouri [495 U.S. 33 (1990)], 2890
Jenness v. Fortson [403 U.S. 431 (1971)], 158, 1942

Jennison, In re [375 U.S. 14 (1963)], 2192
J. I. Case Co. v. Borak [377 U.S. 426 (1964)], 2706
Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of California [493 U.S. 378 (1990)], 1427, 2380
Jin Fuey Moy, United States v. [241 U.S. 394 (1916)], 821
John Doe, Inc. I, United States v. [481 U.S. 102 (1987)], 1223
Johns, United States v. [469 U.S. 478 (1985)], 1427
Johnson, United States v. [383 U.S. 169 (1966)], 2464
Johnson v. Avery [393 U.S. 483 (1969)], 1434
Johnson v. Los Angeles [865 F. Supp. 1430 (C.D. Cal. 1994)], 2926
Johnson v. Louisiana [406 U.S. 356 (1972)], 264, 1434–1435, 1517, 1518
Johnson v. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore [515 F. Supp. 1287 (1985)], 59
Johnson v. McIntosh [8 Wheat. 543 (1823)], 81
Johnson v. Railway Express Agency, Inc. [421 U.S. 454 (1975)], 403, 893, 1437
Johnson v. Robinson [415 U.S. 361 (1974)], 1482
Johnson v. Texas [491 U.S. 397 (1989)], 2315
Johnson v. Texas [509 U.S. 350 (1993)], 306
Johnson v. Transportation Agency [480 U.S. 616 (1987)], 100, 1435, 1844, 2397–2398
Johnson v. United States [333 U.S. 10 (1948)], 2023, 2330
Johnson v. Zerbst [304 U.S. 458 (1938)], 186, 1193, 1436, 2260, 2261, 2831
Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath [341 U.S. 123 (1951)], 187, 279, 946, 1436, 2025, 2792, 2794
Joint Traffic Association, United States v. [171 U.S. 505 (1898)], 320, 2895
Jones, United States v. [109 U.S. 513 (1883)], 1227
Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co. [392 U.S. 409 (1968)], 96, 98, 146, 403, 405, 407, 911, 1026, 1088, 1241, 1277, 1283, 1293, 1437, 1854, 1887, 2016, 2087, 2099, 2220, 2227, 2299, 2355, 2483, 2487, 2542, 2694
Jones v. North Carolina Prisoners' Union [433 U.S. 119 (1977)], 2012
Jones v. Opelika [319 U.S. 104 (1942)], 814, 1065–1066, 1768, 2302, 2546
Jones v. Rath Packing Co. [430 U.S. 519 (1977)], 1677, 2588
Jones v. Securities & Exchange Commission [298 U.S. 1 (1936)], 1437–1438
Jones v. Thomas [491 U.S. 376 (1989)], 810, 1530
Jones v. United States [463 U.S. 354 (1983)], 1719, 1720
Jones v. Van Zandt [46 U.S. (5 How.) 215 (1847)], 2389, 2923
Jones v. Wolf [443 U.S. 595 (1979)], 2190
Jorn, United States v. [400 U.S. 470 (1971)], 808
Joyce v. City and County of San Francisco [846 F. Supp. 843 (N.D. Cal. 1994)], 1301
Judge Peters, United States v. See Peters, Judge, United States v.
Juilliard v. Greenman [110 U.S. 421 (1884)], 1227, 1582, 2825
Jurek v. Texas [428 U.S. 262 (1976)], 302, 310–312
Just v. Marinette County [201 NW. 2d 761 (Wis. 1972)], 903
Ju Toy, United States v. [198 U.S. 253 (1905)], 1167

K

Kadderly v. City of Portland (Oregon) [74 P. 710 (1903)], 1371–1372
Kadrmas v. Dickinson Public Schools [487 U.S. 450 (1988)], 914, 2397, 2538
Kagama, United States v. [118 U.S. 375 (1886)], 81
Kahn v. Anderson [255 U.S. 1 (1921)], 2505
Kahn v. Shevan [416 U.S. 351 (1974)], 2391
Kahriger, United States v. [345 U.S. 22 (1953)], 152, 996, 1670, 1779, 2658, 2660
Kaimowitz v. Department of Mental Health Civil No. 73-19434-AW [Wayne County, Michigan, Cir. Ct., July 10, 1973)], 2061
Kaiser Aetna v. United States [444 U.S. 164 (1979)], 1564, 2054
Kalina v. Fletcher [522 U.S. 118 (1997)], 654, 1335
Kansas v. Colorado [206 U.S. 46 (1907)], 1344
Kansas v. Hendricks [521 U.S. 346 (1997)], 243, 2406, 2695
Karcher v. Daggett [464 U.S. 725 (1983)], 871, 2134, 2535
Karo, United States v. [468 U.S. 705 (1984)], 875
Kassell v. Consolidated Freightways Corp. of Delaware [450 U.S. 662 (1981)], 1587, 2124, 2514
Kastigar v. United States [406 U.S. 441 (1972)], 64, 622, 694, 1335, 1526–1527, 1857, 2237
Katchen v. Landy [382 U.S. 323 (1966)], 2730
Katz v. United States [389 U.S. 347 (1967)], 711, 873, 1093, 1296, 1527, 1850, 2139–2140, 2169, 2247, 2333, 2336, 2337–2338, 2340, 2342, 2343, 2416, 2542, 2761, 2767, 2768, 2896, 2913
Katzenbach v. McClung [379 U.S. 294 (1964)], 390, 405, 459, 1026, 1089, 1241, 1282–1283, 1778, 2016, 2486, 2694, 2854
Katzenbach v. Morgan [384 U.S. 641 (1966)], 96, 238, 1026, 1090, 1240, 1527, 1629, 1856, 2810, 2813
Kawakita v. United States [342 U.S. 932 (1952)], 2931
Kelley v. Johnson [425 U.S. 238 (1976)], 1811, 2574
Kemmler, In re [136 U.S. 436 (1890)], 1529
Kendall, United States ex rel. Stockes v. [37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 524 (1838)], 289, 705, 2698
Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez [372 U.S. 144 (1963)], 1200
Kennedy v. Sampson [511 F. 2d 430 (D.C. Cir. 1974)], 1816, 1921, 2760–2761, 2784
Kennerley, United States v. [209 F. Supp. 119 (1913)], 1264
Kent v. Dulles [357 U.S. 116 (1958)], 1077, 1535, 1587, 1593, 1950
Kent v. United States [383 U.S. 541 (1966)], 1522
Kentucky v. Dennison [65 U.S. (24 How.) 66 (1861)], 1158, 2825–2826
Kentucky v. Stincer [482 U.S. 730 (1987)], 491
Kentucky Department of Corrections v. Thompson [490 U.S. 454 (1989)], 2033
Kepner v. United States [195 U.S. 100 (1903)], 1376
Ker v. California [374 U.S. 23 (1963)], 1535, 2023, 2768
Kessler v. Strecker [305 U.S. 587 (1939)], 284

Keyes v. School District No. 1 of Denver [413 U.S. 189 (1973)], 229, 232, 237, 446, 447, 773, 859, 1535–1536, 1975, 2320
Keyishian v. Board of Regents [385 U.S. 589 (1967)], 22, 36, 230, 234, 238, 855, 1536, 1552, 1648, 2066, 2854
Keystone Bituminous Coal Association v. DeBenedictis [480 U.S. 470 (1987)], 890, 903, 2053, 2535, 2645
Kidd v. Pearson [128 U.S. 1 (1888)], 1536, 1559, 2513
Kilbourn v. Thompson [103 U.S. 168 (1881)], 1536, 1589, 1594, 1708, 2384 Kimbell Foods, Inc., United States v. [440 U.S. 715 (1979)], 978
Kimel v. Florida Board of Regents [120 S.Ct. 631 (2000)], 881
Kimmelman v. Morrison [477 U.S. 365 (1986)], 1253
King v. Smith [392 U.S. 309 (1968)], 2876–2877
King v. Warickshall [1 Leach 263 (1783)], 1922
Kingsley Books, Inc. v. Brown [354 U.S. 436 (1957)], 1538
Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents [360 U.S. 684 (1959)], 1538
Kinnerbrew, Ex parte [35 F. 52 Court (1888)], 1878
Kinsella v. Krueger [354 U.S. 1 (1957)], 2170
Kinsella v. United States ex rel. Singleton [361 U.S. 234 (1960)], 421, 2839
Kirby v. Illinois [406 U.S. 682 (1972)], 923, 962, 1538–1539, 1627, 2818
Kirchberg v. Feenstra [450 U.S. 455 (1981)], 2390, 2391, 2399
Kirkpatrick v. Preisler [394 U.S. 526 (1969)], 865, 2134
Kirschbaum v. Walling [316 U.S. 517 (1942)], 459, 1539
Klein, In re [1 How. 277 (1843)], 160
Klein, United States v. [80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 128 (1872)], 495, 1469, 1501
Kleindienst v. Mandel [408 U.S. 753 (1972)], 1628, 2802
Kleppe v. New Mexico [426 U.S. 529 (1976)], 900
Klopfer v. North Carolina [386 U.S. 213 (1967)], 440, 1539, 2039, 2465
Knight Company, E. C., United States v. [156 U.S. 1 (1895)], 106, 241, 321, 455, 459, 583, 585, 846, 861, 1037, 1162, 1165, 1266, 1409, 1528, 1539–1540, 1641, 1715, 1778, 1828, 1850, 2046, 2048, 2413, 2414, 2415, 2560, 2591, 2630, 2780, 2894, 2895
Knotts, United States v. [460 U.S. 276 (1983)], 711, 712, 875, 2141
Knowlton v. Moore [178 U.S. 41 (1900)], 784
Knox v. Lee [78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 682 (1871)], 336, 430, 697, 1201, 1581, 1582, 1753, 2563
Knoxville Iron Co. v. Harbison [183 U.S. 13 (1901)], 2414
Kohl v. United States [91 U.S. 367 (1876)], 1970, 2825
Kokinda, United States v. [497 U.S. 720 (1990)], 1213, 2167
Kolender v. Lawson [461 U.S. 352 (1983)], 1540–1541, 1841, 2776
Konigsberg v. State Bar of California [353 U.S. 252 (1957); 366 U.S. 36 (1961)], 606, 1109, 1541
Korematsu v. United States [323 U.S. 214 (1944)], 129, 131–132, 909, 1237, 1247, 1415–1417, 1646, 1769, 2095, 2282, 2624–2625, 2839, 2841, 2930–2931
Kotch v. Board of River Pilot Commissioners [330 U.S. 552 (1947)], 815
Kovacs v. Cooper [336 U.S. 77 (1949)], 461, 1351, 1391, 1542, 1990–1991, 2145, 2453, 2546, 2795
Kramer v. Union Free School District No. 15 [395 U.S. 621 (1969)], 866, 1542
Kras, United States v. [409 U.S. 434 (1973)], 23, 194, 204, 1678, 1680, 2029, 2876
Krofft v. McDonald's Corp. [562 F. 2d 1157 (1977)], 686
Krulewitch v. United States [336 U.S. 440 (1949)], 708, 1241
Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael [526 U.S. 127 (1999)], 243
Kungys v. United States [485 U.S. 759 (1988)], 366
Kunz v. New York [340 U.S. 290 (1950)], 1411, 1542, 2189, 2198, 2795
Kusper v. Pontikes [414 U.S. 51 (1973)], 1942, 2007, 2008

L

La Abra Silver Mining Co. v. United States [175 U.S. 423 (1899)], 2785
La Vengeance, United States v. [3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 297 (1796)], 883
Labine v. Vincent [401 U.S. 532 (1971)], 816
Ladue (City of) v. Gilleo [512 U.S. 43 (1994)], 1556–1557
Laird v. Tatum [408 U.S. 1 (1972)], 481, 1557, 2244, 2791, 2842
Lake v. Cameron [364 F. 2d 657 (1966)], 1718
Lake Country Estates v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency [440 U.S. 391 (1979)], 1335, 1558, 1591
Lakeside v. Oregon [435 U.S. 333 (1978)], 2530
Lalli v. Lalli [439 U.S. 259 (1978)], 1326, 1558, 2395, 2733
Lam v. University of Hawaii [40 F. 3d 1551 (9th Cir.1994)], 2091, 2092
Lambert v. Yellowley [275 U.S. 581 (1926)], 2311
Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District [508 U.S. 384 (1993)], 1209, 1559–1560, 2070, 2179, 2194
Lamont v. Postmaster General of the United States [381 U.S. 301 (1965)], 179, 1560, 1628, 2850
Landgraf v. USI Film Products [511 U.S. 244 (1994)], 99, 2225
Landmark Communications, Inc. v. Virginia [435 U.S. 829 (1978)], 2745
Landon v. Plascencia [459 U.S. 21 (1982)], 1329, 1330
Lane v. Cotton [88 Eng. Rep. 1458 (1701)], 1217
Lane v. Wilson [307 U.S. 268 (1939)], 909, 1219, 1220, 1629, 2349
Lane County v. Oregon [74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 71 (1869)], 1011, 1037
Lanier, United States v. [520 U.S. 259 (1997)], 986, 2400
Lanier v. South Carolina [474 U.S. 25 (1986)], 1844
Lanza, United States v. [260 U.S. 377 (1922)], 164, 1562
Lanzetta v. New Jersey [306 U.S. 451 (1939)], 345, 1109, 2774
Lapeyre v. United States [84 U.S. (17 Wall.) 191 (1873)], 1995
Larkin v. Grendel's Den, Inc. [459 U.S. 116 (1982)], 1562, 1653

Larry P. v. Riles [495 F. Supp. 926 (N.D. Cal. 1979)], 790
Larson v. Domestic and Foreign Commerce Corp. [337 U.S. 682 (1949)], 1562, 2460
Larson v. Valente [456 U.S. 228 (1982)], 734, 1562–1563
Lassiter v. Department of Social Services [452 U.S. 18 (1981)], 23, 974, 1123, 1362, 1524, 1527, 2025, 2033, 2265, 2808, 2877
Lassiter v. Northhampton County Board of Elections [360 U.S. 45 (1959)], 1089, 1527, 1629
Lau v. Nichols [414 U.S. 563 (1974)], 406, 857, 859, 1563
Lauf v. E. G. Shinner & Company [303 U.S. 323 (1938)], 1825–1826
Lawrence County v. Lead-Deadwood School District [469 U.S. 256 (1985)], 1637
Leach v. Carlile Postmaster [358 U.S. 228 (1921)], 1296
Lear v. Robertson [463 U.S. 248 (1983)], 2399
Leary v. United States [395 U.S. 6 (1969)], 1572–1573
Lebron v. National Railroad Passenger Corp [513 U.S. 374 (1995)], 1573–1574, 2018, 2490–2491
Lee, United States v. [455 U.S. 252 (1882)], 1227, 1575, 2191, 2460
Lee v. Illinois [476 U.S. 530 (1986)], 492
Lee v. Madigan [358 U.S. 228 (1959)], 2505
Lee v. Oregon [107 F. 3d 1382 (9th Cir. (1997)], 2270
Lee v. Washington [390 U.S. 333 (1968)], 2011
Lee v. Weisman [505 U.S. 577 (1992)], 1531, 1575–1576, 1603, 1846, 2179, 2324
Lefkowitz, United States v. [285 U.S. 452 (1932)], 284, 2344
Legal Tender Cases [12 Wall. 457 (1870-1884)], 334, 335–336, 340, 580, 2825
Lego v. Twomey [404 U.S. 477 (1972)], 1743
LeGrand v. Darnall [2 Peters 664 (1829)], 832
Lehigh Valley Railroad, United States v. [254 U.S. 255 (1920)], 421
Lehman v. Shaker Heights (City of) [418 U.S. 298 (1974)], 313, 1213 Lehmann v. Carson [352 U.S. 915 (1957)], 771, 2902 Leisy v. Hardin [135 U.S. 100 (1890)], 586, 1168, 1227, 1601, 1864, 2513, 2870
Leland v. Oregon [343 U.S. 790 (1952)], 718
Lemon v. Kurtzman I [403 U.S. 602 (1971)], 61, 63, 464, 924, 925, 926, 1206, 1208, 1560, 1563, 1601–1602, 1603–1604, 1672, 1763, 1842, 1845, 2110, 2196, 2321, 2371, 2374, 2699, 2752, 2833
Lemon v. Kurtzman II [411 U.S. 192 (1973)], 1601–1602, 2752
Leon, United States v. [468 U.S. 897 (1984)], 1204, 2044, 2156, 2335, 2338, 2340, 2886, 2891
Leser v. Garnett [258 U.S. 130 (1922)], 73, 2118
Levitt v. Committee for Public Education [413 U.S. 472 (1973)], 465, 2375
Levy v. Louisiana [391 U.S. 68 (1968)], 816, 915, 1325–1326, 1401, 1605–1606
Lewis v. Casey [516 U.S. 804 (1996)], 2013
Lewis v. New Orleans [415 U.S. 130 (1974)], 1868
Lewis v. United States [385 U.S. 206 (1955)], 1670
License Cases [46 U.S. (5 How.) (1847)], 325, 562, 742, 844, 1601, 1791, 2409, 2506, 2648, 2652, 2871, 2885, 2908, 2923, 2934
Liggett Company v. Baldridge [278 U.S. 105 (1928)], 2545, 2571
Liggett Company v. Lee [288 U.S. 517 (1933)], 220, 314
Lincoln County v. Luning [133 U.S. 529 (1890)], 877, 878, 879, 1767
Lincoln Electric Co. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue [338 U.S. 949 (1951)], 1994
Lincoln Federal Labor Union v. Northwestern Iron & Metal Co. [335 U.S. 525 (1949)], 185, 1175, 2278
Linda R. S. v. Richard D. [410 U.S. 614 (1973)], 201, 2107, 2473
Lindh v. Murphy [521 U.S. 320 (1997)], 103
Lindsey v. Normet [405 U.S. 56 (1972)], 1301, 2874
Linkletter v. Walter [381 U.S. 618 (1965)], 2224
Linmark Associates v. Willingboro [431 U.S. 85 (1977)], 1628
Little v. Barreme [6 U.S. (2 Cranch) 170 (1804)], 448, 1684
Live Stock Dealers & Butchers Association v. Crescent City Live Stock Landing & Slaughterhouse Co. and Board of Metropolitan Police [77 U.S. (10 Wall.) 273 (1870)], 360, 2923
Livingston v. Van Ingen [5 Johns. 507 (1812)], 1534, 2697
Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner [407 U.S. 551 (1972)], 1566, 2415, 2498
Loan Association v. Topeka [87 U.S. (20 Wall.) 455 (1875)], 376, 431, 584, 783, 1037, 1175, 1636, 1733, 1734, 2075, 2570, 2571
Local 28, Sheet Metal Workers International Association v. EEOC [478 U.S. 421 (1986)], 55
Local 174 v. Lucas Flour [369 U.S. 95 (1962)], 1550
Lochner v. New York [198 U.S. 45 (1905)], 5, 11, 12, 33, 35, 36, 154, 224, 252, 263, 284, 314, 382, 667, 685, 692, 725, 749, 838, 839, 845, 1007, 1115, 1162, 1163, 1164, 1166, 1167, 1168, 1175, 1211, 1263, 1288, 1294, 1296, 1479, 1547, 1552, 1572, 1633, 1638–1639, 1699, 1710, 1715, 1724, 1736, 1764, 1768, 1890, 1908, 1911, 1990, 2049, 2095, 2226, 2278, 2339, 2509, 2571, 2572, 2575, 2577, 2635, 2645, 2712–2713, 2714, 2773, 2858, 2878, 2881–2882, 2892, 2893, 2896, 2897
Lockerty v. Phillips [319 U.S. 182 (1943)], 886, 2937
Lockett v. Ohio [438 U.S. 586 (1978)], 303, 308, 2368
Lockwood, In re [154 U.S. 116 (1894)], 2920
Loewe v. Lawlor [208 U.S. 274 (1908)], 25, 1162, 1203, 1641–1642, 1756, 1911
Logan v. Zimmerman Brush Company [455 U.S. 422 (1982)], 193, 2029
Loper v. New York City Police Department [999 F. 2d 699 (2d Cir. 1993)], 1301
López, United States v. [514 U.S. 549 (1995)], 242, 354, 624, 776, 823, 847, 904, 991, 1010, 1277, 1531, 1570–1571, 1642–1643, 2169, 2660, 2696
Lopez v. United States [373 U.S. 427 (1963)], 1643, 1845, 2456, 2844, 2896
Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corporation [458 U.S. 419 (1982)], 890, 1643–1644, 2646, 2946
Lorillard v. Pons [434 U.S. 575 (1978)], 2729

Los Angeles v. Lyons [461 U.S. 95 (1983)], 1218
Los Angeles v. Preferred Communications [476 U.S. 488 (1976)], 249
Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent [466 U.S. 789 (1984)], 2534
Los Angeles Department of Water and Power v. Manhart [435 U.S. 702 (1978)], 406, 2393
Lottery Case. See Champion v. Ames
Loud Hawk, United States v. [474 U.S. 302 (1986)], 2466
Louisiana v. Jumel [107 U.S. 711 (1882)], 2824
Louisiana et al., United States v. [394 U.S. 836 (1969)], 1840
Louisiana ex rel. Francis v. Resweber [330 U.S. 853 (1947)], 280, 1102 Louisiana Light and Power Company v. Thibodaux [360 U.S. 25 (1959)], 19
Louisville, Cincinnati, and Charleston Railroad v. Letson [43 U.S. (2 How.) 497 (1890)], 2653, 2867
Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway v. Mississippi [133 U.S. 587 (1890)], 1645, 1918
Louisville Joint Stock Land Bank v. Radford [295 U.S. 555 (1935)], 161, 677, 1105, 1644–1645, 2932
Louisville Railroad Co. v. Letson [43 U.S. (2 How.) 497 (1844)], 325
Lovasco, United States v. [431 U.S. 783 (1977)], 2466
Lovell v. City of Griffin [303 U.S. 444 (1938)], 1317, 1645, 2186
Lovett, United States v. [328 U.S. 303 (1946)], 174, 257, 495, 629, 1645, 2066
Loving v. Virginia [388 U.S. 1 (1967)], 147, 403, 799, 973, 1118, 1645–1646, 1671, 1724, 1745, 2097, 2098, 2307, 2309, 2355, 2853, 2943
Low v. Austin [80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 29 (1872)], 1725, 1864
Lowe v. City of Monrovia [775 F. 2d 998 (9th Cir. 1985)], 2092
Lowe v. Securities and Exchange Commission [472 U.S. 181 (1985)], 2351
Lowry v. Reagan [676 F. Supp. 333 (D.D.C. 1987)], 2843
Lubin v. Panish [415 U.S. 709 (1974)], 158
Lucas v. Forty-Fourth General Assembly [377 U.S. 713 (1964)], 153, 2228, 2520, 2854
Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council [505 U.S. 1003 (1992)], 848, 905, 1650–1651, 2055, 2149, 2150, 2646
Lugar v. Edmonson Oil Co. [457 U.S. 922 (1982)], 2489, 2492
Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife [504 U.S. 555 (1992)], 905, 1651, 2475
Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah [508 U.S. 520 (1993)], 2456
Lustig v. United States [338 U.S. 74 (1949)], 2416
Luther v. Borden [48 U.S. (7 How.) 1 (1849)], 340, 430, 577, 785, 804, 1238, 1239, 1613, 1652–1653, 1949, 2202, 2210, 2648, 2654, 2840, 2923
Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod v. Federal Communications Commission [141 F. 3d 344 (D.C. Cir. 1998)], 57
Lynch v. Donnelly [465 U.S. 668 (1984)], 924, 1055, 1602, 1603, 1653, 1842, 1843, 1845, 2196, 2198, 2376–2377, 2379
Lynch v. Household Finance Corp. [405 U.S. 538 (1972)], 836, 1256, 2227, 2349
Lynch v. Torquato [343 E. 2d [370 (1965)], 1275
Lyng v. Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers [485 U.S. 360 (1988)], 914
Lyng v. Castillo [477 U.S. 635 (1986)], 914, 2533
Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery [485 U.S. 439 (1988)], 82, 1653, 2192, 2380

M

MacDonald, United States v. [456 U.S. 1 (1982)], 1655, 2465–2466
Machinists v. Street [367 U.S. 740 (1961)], 1552, 1553
Machinists Lodge 76 v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission [427 U.S. 132 (1976)], 1554
MacIntosh, United States v. [283 U.S. 605 (1931)], 507, 1198
Mack v. United States [521 U.S. 98 (1997)], 2169
Madden v. Kentucky [309 U.S. 83 (1940)], 441, 1655, 2021
Madsen v. Women's Health Center, Inc. [512 U.S. 753 (1994)], 94
Mahan v. Howell [410 U.S. 315 (1973)], 1664–1665, 2134
Maher v. Roe [432 U.S. 464 (1977)], 6, 1272, 1665, 1680, 1885, 2205, 2206, 2394, 2870, 2872, 2874
Maine v. Taylor [477 U.S. 131 (1986)], 806
Maine v. Thiboutot [448 U.S. 1 (1980)], 2350
Mallory v. United States [354 U.S. 449 (1957)], 1029, 1713, 1852, 2856
Malloy v. Hogan [378 U.S. 1 (1964)], 722, 1665–1666, 1923, 2041, 2237, 2286, 2744, 2745–2746, 2856
Malone v. Bowdoin [369 U.S. 643 (1962)], 2460
Mann, State v. See State v. Mann
Manson v. Brathwaite [432 U.S. 98 (1977)], 481, 962
Maple Flooring Manufacturers Association v. United States [268 U.S. 563 (1925)], 2311
Mapp v. Ohio [367 U.S. 643 (1961)], 119, 186, 273, 277, 420, 722, 882, 936, 1092, 1102, 1355, 1462, 1535, 1666–1667, 1869, 2039, 2043–2044, 2155, 2169, 2224, 2334, 2614, 2768, 2796, 2850, 2856, 2903, 2917
Marbury v. Madison [5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803)], 109–110, 212, 266, 322, 339, 378, 433, 437–438, 466, 489, 497, 509, 513, 526, 541, 552, 627, 638, 652, 667, 683, 697, 740, 741, 833, 1192, 1287, 1293, 1367, 1393, 1422, 1424, 1443–1444, 1444–1445, 1465, 1468, 1469–1470, 1472, 1474, 1475, 1476, 1477, 1481, 1487, 1496, 1583, 1663, 1667–1670, 1673, 1675, 1682, 1683–1684, 1739, 1821, 1859, 1863, 1883, 1949, 1951, 1953, 1955, 1963, 1986, 1987, 2202, 2236, 2297, 2384, 2460, 2529, 2561, 2589–2590, 2602, 2669, 2682, 2752, 2781, 2858
Marchetti v. United States [390 U.S. 39 (1968)], 1670, 1779, 2452, 2658–2659, 2850
Marion, United States v. [404 U.S. 307 (1971)], 2465
Marks v. United States [430 U.S. 188 (1977)], 2534
Marron v. United States [275 U.S. 192 (1927)], 2339, 2344, 2345
Marsh v. Alabama [326 U.S. 501 (1946)], 389, 692, 1308, 1672, 2015, 2414, 2485, 2487, 2492, 2874
Marsh v. Chambers [463 U.S. 783 (1983)], 1672, 2178, 2376

Marshall v. Baltimore and Ohio Railroad [57 U.S. (16 How.) 314 (1853)], 298, 1230
Marshall v. Barlow's Inc. [436 U.S. 307 (1978)], 44, 1681, 2334
Marshall v. United States [360 U.S. 310 (1959)], 981
Marshfield Family Skateland, Inc. v. Town of Marshfield [464 U.S. 987 (1983)], 482
Marston v. Lewis [410 U.S. 679 (1973)], 831, 2275
Martin v. City of Struthers [319 U.S. 157 (1943)], 1411, 1565, 2189
Martin v. Hunter's Lessee [14 U.S. (1 Wheat.) 304 (1816)], 109, 436, 438, 555, 832, 1250, 1465, 1466, 1496, 1503, 1682, 1685, 1688–1691, 2280, 2554, 2555, 2590
Martin v. Mott [25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) 19 (1827)], 416, 574, 1686, 1691, 2554
Martinez-Fuerte, United States v. [428 U.S. 543 (1976)], 209, 2088
Martino v. Michigan Window Cleaning Co. [327 U.S. 173 (1946)], 1539
Maryland v. Baltimore Radio Show [38 U.S. 912 (1950)], 2077
Maryland v. Buie [494 U.S. 325 (1990)], 1097, 2162
Maryland v. Craig [497 U.S. 836 (1990)], 491, 703, 1691, 2316
Maryland v. Wilson [519 U.S. 408 (1997)], 1097, 2711
Maryland v. Wirtz [392 U.S. 183 (1968)], 967, 990, 1012, 1181, 1211, 1776
Maryland Committee for Fair Representation v. Tawes [377 U.S. 656 (1964)], 2228
Massachusetts v. Laird [400 U.S. 886 (1970)], 755, 1692
Massachusetts v. Mellon [262 U.S. 447 (1923)], 684, 1157, 2468, 2519, 2626, 2659 Massachusetts Board of Retirement v. Murgia [427 U.S. 307 (1976)], 59, 60, 61, 1693–1694
Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten [244 Fed. 535 (1917)], 225–226, 1264, 1696, 2318 Massiah v. United States [377 U.S. 201 (1964)], 1696, 1925, 1929, 2264
Masson v. New Yorker Magazine, Inc. [501 U.S. 496 (1991)], 1609, 1696–1697
Mastro Plastics v. NLRB [348 U.S. 910 (1956)], 1550
Mathews v. DeCastro [429 U.S. 181 (1976)], 2034, 2445
Mathews v. Diaz [426 U.S. 67 (1976)], 66, 368, 1332, 2468
Mathews v. Eldridge [424 U.S. 319 (1976)], 837, 965, 966, 1370, 1565, 1697–1698, 1879, 1979, 2027, 2032–2033, 2445
Mathews v. Lucas [427 U.S. 495 (1976)], 1326, 2732
Matilda's Case (Birney v. Ohio) [80 Ohio 230 (1837)], 560
Matlock, United States v. [415 U.S. 164 (1974)], 2334, 2690
Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp. [631 F. 2d 1069 (1980)], 2728
Maxwell v. Dow [176 U.S. 581 (1900)], 1354, 1700, 1874, 2038, 2744
Mayor of New York v. Miln [36 U.S. (11 Pet.) 102 (1837)], 162, 1328, 1686, 1700, 1712, 2555, 2556, 2648, 2652, 2654, 2698, 2774, 2908
Maze, United States v. [414 U.S. 395 (1974)], 2158
Mazer v. Stein [347 U.S. 201 (1954)], 685
Mazurie, United States v. [419 U.S. 544 (1975)], 761
McAllister v. United States [141 U.S. 174 (1891)], 429
McAuliffe v. Mayor of New Bedford [155 Mass. 216 (1892)], 892, 2065, 2749
McCabe v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad [235 U.S. 151 (1914)], 1310, 2900
McCardle, Ex parte [74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506 (1869)], 318, 335, 339, 340, 497, 579, 746, 1256, 1456, 1469, 1494, 1501, 1701, 1732, 2591, 2609, 2735
McCarthy v. Arndstein [262 U.S. 355 (1924)], 2236
McCleskey v. Kemp [481 U.S. 279 (1987)], 97, 239, 304, 306, 307, 308, 309, 396, 733, 915, 1702–1703, 1980, 2088, 2106–2107, 2164, 2368, 2397, 2443
McClesky v. Zant [499 U.S. 467 (1991)], 2455
McCollum v. Board of Education [333 U.S. 203 (1948)], 188, 1102, 1703–1704, 2145, 2171, 2172, 2176, 2198, 2371, 2377, 2795, 2947
McCormick v. Talbot [61 U.S. (20 How.) 402 (1858)], 1230
McCracken v. Hayward [43 U.S. (2 How.) 608 (1844)], 156
McCray v. Illinois [386 U.S. 300 (1967)], 1368, 2895
McCray v. United States [195 U.S. 27 (1904)], 151, 340, 818, 1704, 2658
McCulloch v. Maryland [17 U.S. 316 (1819)], 75, 160, 250, 258, 317, 376, 410, 436, 438, 442, 458, 484, 497, 498, 555, 559, 627, 628, 630, 659, 667, 690, 692, 693, 744, 777, 900, 995, 999, 1011, 1013, 1015, 1214, 1226, 1259, 1290, 1345, 1346, 1347, 1367, 1383, 1414, 1425, 1446, 1461, 1474, 1487, 1582, 1583, 1585, 1587, 1611, 1633, 1674, 1682, 1685, 1686, 1690, 1705–1707, 1751, 1752, 1753, 1790, 1821, 1855, 1865, 1869, 1910, 1970, 2078, 2280, 2493, 2544, 2554, 2560, 2586–2587, 2653, 2662, 2667–2668, 2687, 2712, 2858, 2871, 2882, 2913, 2922
McDaniel v. Paty [435 U.S. 887 (1978)], 2193, 2197
McDermott v. Wisconsin [228 U.S. 115 (1913)], 2583
McDonald v. Santa Fe Trail Transportation Co. [427 U.S. 273 (1976)], 2155, 2694
McDonald v. Smith [472 U.S. 479 (1985)], 2558
McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green [411 U.S. 792 (1973)], 406
McElvane v. Brush [142 U.S. 155 (1891)], 1529
McGautha v. California [402 U.S. 183 (1971)], 299, 310, 311
McGill v. Brown [Federal, Supreme Court (1833)], 156
McGowan v. Maryland [366 U.S. 420 (1961)], 2122, 2191, 2373, 2584, 2585, 2856
McGrain v. Daugherty [273 U.S. 135 (1927)], 1536, 1594–1595, 1708, 2360, 2780
McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Commission [514 U.S. 334 (1995)], 91
McKeiver v. Pennsylvania [403 U.S. 528 (1971)], 1184, 1523, 1524, 1709, 2729
McLaughlin v. Florida [379 U.S. 184 (1964)], 1646, 1745
McLaughlin v. Tilendis [398 F. 2d 298 (7th Cir. 1968)], 1553
McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents [339 U.S. 637 (1950)], 388, 1745, 2628–2629, 2764, 2792, 2796
McLean v. Arkansas Board of Education [211 U.S. 539 (1909)], 241, 749
McLean v. Arkansas Board of Education [529 F. Supp. 1255 (1982)], 2764

McLemore, United States v. [1714 45 U.S. (4 How.) 286 (1846)], 2459
McMann v. Richardson [397 U.S. 759 (1970)], 1158, 2831
McMillan v. Pennsylvania [477 U.S. 79 (1986)], 2367–2368
McNabb v. United States [318 U.S. 332 (1943)], 1029, 1102, 1713, 2145
McNally v. United States [483 U.S. 350 (1987)], 2535
McRay v. United States [195 U.S. 27 (1904)], 1790
Meachum v. Fano [427 U.S. 215 (1976)], 2532
Mechanik, United States v. [475 U.S. 66 (1986)], 1222–1223
Medina v. California [505 U.S. 437 (1992)], 710
Meech v. Hillhaven West, Inc. [776 F. 2d 488 (Mont. 1989)], 1554
Meek v. Pittenger [421 U.S. 349 (1975)], 349, 2375
Memoirs v. Massachusetts [383 U.S. 413 (1966)], 1194, 1414, 1716–1717, 1734
Memorial Hospital v. Maricopa County [415 U.S. 250 (1974)], 1677, 2275, 2305, 2879
Mempa v. Rhay [389 U.S. 128 (1967)], 2263, 2367
Memphis v. Greene [451 U.S. 100 (1981)], 1679, 1717, 2221, 2694
Memphis Fire Department v. Stotts. See Firefighters Local Union No. 1784 v. Stotts
Mendenhall, United States v. [446 U.S. 544 (1980)], 120
Meritor Savings Bank, FSB v. Vinson [477 U.S. 57 (1986)], 1722–1723, 1844, 2397
Merryman, Ex parte [17 F. Cas 144 (C.C. Ma. 1861) (No. 9, 486)], 164, 886, 1432, 1736, 2839, 2841
Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission [497 U.S. 547 (1990)], 33, 56, 238, 239, 469, 623, 916, 917, 1147, 1304, 1723–1724, 2108, 2109, 2165, 2169, 2456, 2537, 2890
Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego [453 U.S. 490 (1981)], 461, 902, 2529
Metropolitan Board v. Barrie [34 NY 657 (1866)], 1572
Metropolitan Life Insurance Company v. Ward [470 U.S. 869 (1985)], 428, 840, 1724
Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise [501 U.S. 252 (1991)], 2386
Meyer v. Grant [486 U.S. 414 (1988)], 1372, 1939
Meyer v. Nebraska [262 U.S. 390 (1923)], 45, 315, 858, 973, 1118, 1122, 1523, 1671, 1714, 1724, 2188, 2308, 2573, 2642, 2874
Miami Herald Publishing Company v. Tornillo [418 U.S. 241 (1974)], 248, 271, 968, 1047, 1142, 1144, 1147, 1391, 1671, 1725, 2144
Michael H. v. Gerald D. [491 U.S. 110 (1989)], 2162, 2316, 2575
Michael M. v. Superior Court [450 U.S. 464 (1981)], 1725, 2395, 2399, 2418, 2533
Michelin Tire Company v. Administrator of Wages [423 U.S. 276 (1976)], 256, 1348, 1725, 1864, 2493
Michigan v. Chesternut [486 U.S. 567 (1988)], 2338
Michigan v. Long [463 U.S. 1032 (1983)], 34, 2529, 2552
Michigan v. Mosley [423 U.S. 96 (1975)], 1927, 1928
Michigan v. Summers [452 U.S. 692 (1981)], 1725, 2332
Michigan v. Tucker [417 U.S. 433 (1974)], 1927
Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz [496 U.S. 444 (1990)], 826, 1096, 1725–1726, 2162
Middendorf v. Henry [425 U.S. 25 (1976)], 1726, 1726–1727
Midland Asphalt Corp. v. United States [489 U.S. 794 (1989)], 1223
Milkovich v. Lorain Journal Co. [497 U.S. 1 (1990)], 1146, 1729–1730
Milk Wagon Drivers Union v. Meadowmoor Dairies [312 U.S. 287 (1941)], 187
Miller, United States v. [425 U.S. 435 (1976)], 713, 1822, 2140
Miller v. Albright [523 U.S. 420 (1998)], 367, 2400, 2419, 2538
Miller v. Board of Public Works [195 Cal. 477 (1925)], 2510
Miller v. California [413 U.S. 15 (1973)], 251, 1130, 1734–1735, 1839, 1965, 1967, 2833, 2850
Miller v. Horton [152 Mass. 540 (1891)], 943
Miller v. Johnson [515 U.S. 900 (1995)], 58, 868, 1735, 2093, 2137, 2409
Miller v. Schoene [276 U.S. 272 (1928)], 2640
Miller v. United States [78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 268 (1871)], 340, 490, 746
Miller v. United States [307 U.S. 174 (1939)], 2113, 2348
Miller v. Wilson [236 U.S. 373 (1915)], 1309, 1312, 2896
Millett v. People of Illinois [117 Ill. 294 (1886)], 1735–1736
Milligan, Ex parte [71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 2 (1867)], 335, 338–339, 340, 386, 402, 430, 448, 498, 579, 746, 747, 830, 886, 947, 949, 1035, 1246, 1247, 1428, 1463, 1701, 1727, 1732, 1736, 1955, 2085, 2143, 2628, 2777, 2839, 2841, 2868
Milliken v. Bradley [418 U.S. 717 (1974)], 391, 773, 1289, 1638, 1736–1737, 1747, 2221, 2321, 2399, 2890
Milliken v. Bradley [433 U.S. 267 (1977)], 774, 853, 1562, 1736–1737
Mills v. Alabama [384 U.S. 214 (1966)], 872
Mills v. Board of Education [384 F. Supp. 866 (D.D.C. 1973)], 790
Mills v. Duryee [11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 481 (1813)], 1635
Mills v. Hableutzel [456 U.S. 91 (1982)], 1824
Mills v. Rogers [457 U.S. 291 (1982)], 2061
Milnot Co. v. Richardson [350 F. Supp. 221 (N.D. 111. 1972)], 839
Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. v. Burleson [255 U.S. 407 (1920)], 1296
Mina Queen and Child v. Hepburn [11 U.S. 290 (1813)], 832
Mincey v. Arizona [437 U.S. 385 (1978)], 956, 1743
Minersville School District v. Gobitis [310 U.S. 586 (1940)], 814, 1064–1066, 2186, 2189, 2545
Minneapolis and St. Louis Railway Co. v. Bombolis [241 U.S. 211 (1916)], 2727
Minnesota v. Barber [136 U.S. 313 (1890)], 1266, 1739
Minnesota v. Clover Leaf Creamery Co. [449 U.S. 456 (1981)], 2515
Minnesota v. Dickerson [508 U.S. 366 (1993)], 1912, 1913
Minnesota Mortgage Moratorium Case [290 U.S. 398 (1934)], 2713
Minnesota Rate Cases [230 U.S. 352 (1913)], 283, 1308, 1310, 1312

Minnesota State Board for Community Colleges v. Knight [465 U.S. 271 (1984)], 22
Minor v. Happersett [88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 162 (1875)], 68, 91, 370, 1740, 1808, 2210, 2676, 2807–2808, 2824, 2918, 2919, 2920
Miranda v. Arizona [384 U.S. 436 (1966)], 186, 270, 273, 276, 277, 421, 507, 700, 716, 815, 923, 1200, 1269, 1273, 1280, 1579, 1679, 1741–1744, 1802, 1852, 1856, 1922, 1923, 1925, 1926–1929, 1930–1931, 2044, 2087, 2155, 2169, 2229–2230, 2238, 2239–2240, 2255, 2256, 2263–2264, 2444, 2454, 2456, 2594, 2609, 2614, 2821, 2831, 2850, 2856, 2886, 2889, 2893
Mishkin v. New York [383 U.S. 502 (1966)], 2833
Mississippi, United States v. [380 U.S. 128 (1965)], 877
Mississippi v. Johnson [71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475 (1867)], 335, 339, 579, 1745, 1950, 2471, 2793
Mississippi v. Stanton [154 U.S. 554 (1868)], 746, 1745, 2628
Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan [458 U.S. 718 (1982)], 857, 1746, 1842, 1844, 2390, 2392, 2399, 2418, 2538
Missouri v. Holland [252 U.S. 416 (1920)], 243, 631, 901, 940, 992, 1011, 1081, 1389, 1446, 1633, 1746, 1983, 1992, 2722
Missouri v. Jenkins [495 U.S. 33 (1990)], 400, 652, 653, 1471, 1529, 1747
Missouri v. Jenkins [515 U.S. 70 (1995)], 1747
Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada [305 U.S. 337 (1938)], 284, 1307, 1311, 1714, 1748–1749, 1797, 2420, 2594, 2795
Missouri Pacific Railroad v. Humes [115 U.S. 512 (1885)], 1749
Missouri Pacific Railway Co. v. Kansas [248 U.S. 276 (1919)], 2785
Mistretta v. United States [488 U.S. 361 (1989)], 195, 762, 984, 1749–1750, 2386
Mitchell v. Forsyth [472 U.S. 511 (1985)], 1336
Mitchell v. Helms [119 S.Ct. 2336 (1999)], 1604
Mitchell v. Laird [488 F. 2d 611 (D.C. Cir. 1973)], 2790
Mitchum v. Foster [407 U.S. 225 (1972)], 1750
M. L. B. v. S. L. J. [519 U.S. 102 (1996)], 1750–1751, 2877
Mobile v. Bolden [446 U.S. 55 (1980)], 1677, 1679, 1751, 1765, 2102, 2108, 2135, 2202, 2811, 2813, 2862, 2890
Monaco v. Mississippi [292 U.S. 313 (1965)], 877
Monell v. Department of Social Services of New York City [436 U.S. 658 (1978)], 363, 853, 1218, 1751, 1754, 1767–1768, 1871, 2349–2350, 2945
Monge v. California [524 U.S. 721 (1998)], 812
Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy [401 U.S. 265 (1971)], 1805
Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States [148 U.S. 312 (1893)], 1519
Monroe v. Pape [365 U.S. 167 (1961)], 96, 423, 444, 445, 652, 739, 853, 955, 1025, 1104, 1217, 1373, 1751, 1754, 1767–1768, 2329, 2349
Monsanto, United States v. [491 U.S. 600 (1989)], 983, 2112
Montana Department of Revenue v. Kurth Ranch [511 U.S. 767 (1994)], 811, 2660
Monterey (City of) v. Del Monte Dunes [526 U.S. 687 (1999)], 2151
Monterey Mechanical Co. v. Wilson [125 F. 3d 702 (9th Cir. 1998)], 57
Montgomery County Board of Education, United States v. [395 U.S. 225 (1969)], 169
Moody v. Daggett [429 U.S. 78 (1976)], 2013 Mooney, State v. See State v. Mooney
Mooney v. Holohan [294 U.S. 103 (1935)], 722
Moore v. City of East Cleveland, Ohio [431 U.S. 494 (1977)], 274, 973, 1123, 1289, 1756–1757, 1976, 1987, 2052, 2247, 2534–2535, 2574, 2577, 2892, 2893
Moore v. Dempsey [261 U.S. 86 (1923)], 468, 722, 1100, 1321, 1757–1758, 2038, 2638, 2641
Moore v. Illinois [55 U.S. (14 How.) 13 (1852)], 1230
Moore v. Illinois [434 U.S. 220 (1977)], 962
Moore v. Michigan [355 U.S. 155 (1957)], 2902
Moore v. Missouri [159 U.S. 673 (1895)], 316
Moore v. Ogilvie [394 U.S. 814 (1969)], 1464
Moorman Manufacturing Co. v. Blair [437 U.S. 267 (1978)], 2523
Moose Lodge No. 107 v. Irvis [407 U.S. 163 (1972)], 1411, 1758
Mora v. Mejias [115 F. Supp. 610 (D.P.R. 1953)], 2080
Moran v. Burbine [475 U.S. 412 (1986)], 1743, 1931, 2043, 2240
More, United States v. [7 U.S. (3 Cranch) 159 (1805)], 1469
Morehead v. New York ex rel. Tipaldo [298 U.S. 587 (1936)], 284, 697, 838, 1116, 1313, 1699, 1760–1761, 2156, 2281, 2288, 2289, 2544, 2882
Morey v. Doud [354 U.S. 457 (1957)], 840, 1800
Morgan v. Kerrigan [530 F. 2d 401 (1st Cir. 1976)], 2443
Morgan v. Virginia [328 U.S. 373 (1946)], 204, 280, 1257, 1275, 1761, 2145, 2795
Morissette v. United States [341 U.S. 925 (1951)], 2511
Morris, United States v. [125 F. 322 (1903)], 403
Morris v. Mathews [475 U.S. 237 (1986)], 810
Morrison v. Olson [487 U.S. 654 (1988)], 115, 269, 621, 1342, 1359, 1360, 2129, 2157, 2169, 2314, 2386, 2462–2464
Morrissey v. Brewer [408 U.S. 472 (1972)], 2027
Morse v. Republican Party of Virginia [517 U.S. 186 (1996)], 1938, 2008
Morton v. Mancari [417 U.S. 535 (1974)], 83, 1784
Moses v. Railroad [21 111. 516 (1859)], 2507
Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Institute v. State Farm Mutual [463 U.S. 29 (1983)], 269 Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington [243 U.S. 219 (1917)], 1911
Mt. Healthy City Board of Education v. Doyle [429 U.S. 274 (1977)], 1586
Mt. Vernon-Woodberry Co. v. Alabama Interstate Power [240 U.S. 30 (1916)], 2075
Mozert v. Hawkins County Board of Education [827 F. 2d 1058 (6th Cir. 1987)], 859, 2380
Mueller v. Allen [459 U.S. 820 (1983)], 464, 924, 1763, 2322, 2376, 2378, 2739, 2917
Mugler, State v. See State v. Mugler Mugler v. Kansas [123 U.S. 623 (1887)], 240, 357, 889, 1168, 1764, 2050, 2510
Mulford v. Smith [307 U.S. 38 (1939)], 62, 458

Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank & Trust [339 U.S. 306 (1950)], 1830
Muller v. Oregon [208 U.S. 412 (1908)], 36, 224–225, 241, 263, 845, 1115, 1166, 1547, 1591, 1699, 1710, 1756, 1764–1765, 2389, 2399, 2440, 2443, 2446, 2529, 2572, 2713, 2881, 2896, 2920
Munn v. Illinois [94 U.S. 113 (1877)], 52, 53, 199, 217, 240–241, 346, 409, 431, 584, 844, 1166, 1205, 1224–1225, 1698, 1734, 1789, 1890, 2048, 2281, 2509, 2510, 2547, 2563, 2817, 2822–2823, 2829–2830, 2917
Munoz-Flores, United States v. [495 U.S. 385 (1990)], 2533
Munro v. Socialist Workers Party [479 U.S. 189 (1986)], 158
Murchison, In re [349 U.S. 133 (1955)], 970
Murdock, United States v. [290 U.S. 389 (1933)], 2745
Murdock v. Memphis [87 U.S. (20 Wall.) 590 (1875)], 1466
Murdock v. Pennsylvania [319 U.S. 105 (1943)], 460, 814, 1427, 1768, 1990, 2191, 2302
Murphy v. Florida [421 U.S. 794 (1975)], 1770
Murphy v. Ford [390 F. Supp. 1372 (1975)], 1770
Murphy v. Waterfront Commission of New York Harbor [378 U.S. 52(1964)], 1334, 2237, 2745–2746
Murray v. Carrier [477 U.S. 478 (1986)], 1253, 1844
Murray v. Corlett [374 U.S. 203 (1963)], 1, 2856
Murray v. Giarratano [492 U.S. 1 (1989)], 2043
Murray v. Hoboken Land Company [59 U.S. (18 How.) 272 (1856)], 829
Murray v. United States [487 U.S. 533 (1988)], 2338
Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co. [59 U.S. (18 How.) 272 (1865)], 735, 1771, 2036
Muskrat v. United States [219 U.S. 346 (1911)], 323, 1771
Musser v. Utah [333 U.S. 95 (1948)], 511
Myers v. Anderson [238 U.S. 368 (1915)], 1041, 1242
Myers v. United States [272 U.S. 52 (1926)], 110–111, 289, 495, 948, 1318–1319, 1611, 1714, 1772, 1847, 2000, 2149, 2384, 2626, 2636

N

NAACP v. . . . See National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Nabozny v. Podlesny [92 F. 3d 446 (7th Cir. 1996)], 2404
Nader v. Schaffer [429 U.S. 989 (1976)], 1942
Naim v. Naim [197 Va. 80 (1955-1956)], 1744
Napier v. Atlantic Coast Line R.R. [272 U.S. 605 (1926)], 1988
Nardone v. United States [308 U.S. 539 (1937)], 711, 873, 1774, 1774, 1850, 2417, 2922
Nashville Gas Co. v. Satty [434 U.S. 136 (1977)], 2394
Nathanson v. United States [290 U.S. 41 (1933)], 63
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Flowers [377 U.S. 288 (1964)], 35, 2854 National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson [357 U.S. 449 (1958)], 260, 1107, 1109, 1237, 1270, 1549, 1773, 1932, 2243, 2474, 2574, 2867
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Button [371 U.S. 415 (1963)], 229, 230, 231, 234, 238, 1109, 1773, 2071
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Claiborne Hardware Co. et al. [458 U.S. 886 (1982)], 215, 1153, 1237, 1551, 1556, 2529
National Broadcasting Company v. United States [319 U.S. 190 (1943)], 247
National Cable Television Association v. United States [415 U.S. 336 (1974)], 762, 2148
National Collegiate Athletic Association v. Tarkanian [488 U.S. 179 (1988)], 2032, 2489
National Credit Union Administration v. First National Bank & Trust [522 U.S. 479 (1998)], 2474
National Dairy Products Corp., United States v. [372 U.S. 29 (1963)], 2776
National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley [524 U.S. 569 (1998)], 1057, 1137, 1531, 2070, 2751
National Labor Relations Board v. Fainblatt [306 U.S. 601 (1939)], 2821
National Labor Relations Board v. Fansteel Metallurgical Corp. [306 U.S. 240 (1939)], 1550
National Labor Relations Board v. Friedman-Marks Clothing [301 U.S. 58 (1937)], 1715, 2819–2921
National Labor Relations Board v. Fruehauf Trailer Co. [301 U.S. 49 (1937)], 2819–2821
National Labor Relations Board v. Fruit and Vegetable Packers [337 U.S. 58 (1964)], 1550
National Labor Relations Board v. Gissel Packing [395 U.S. 575 (1969)], 1551
National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. [301 U.S. 1 (1937)], 458, 692, 846, 862, 1012, 1035, 1312, 1314, 1547, 1548, 1554, 1639, 2289, 2560, 2677, 2729, 2819–2821
National Labor Relations Board v. Retail Employees Local No. 1001 [447 U.S. 607 (1980)], 215, 1550, 1907
National Labor Relations Board v. Virginia Electric & Power Co. [314 U.S. 469 (1941)], 1551
National League of Cities v. Usery [426 U.S. 833 (1976)], 59, 190, 193, 276, 362, 623, 684, 827, 903, 907, 967, 988, 990, 991, 995, 1002, 1011, 1012, 1089, 1181, 1211, 1292, 1549, 1776–1777, 1845, 2153, 2154, 2155, 2169, 2459, 2481, 2520, 2587, 2668, 2813, 2887
National Mutual Insurance Company v. Tidewater Transfer Company [337 U.S. 583 (1949)], 629, 796, 798
National Organizations For Women, Inc. v. Scheidler [510 U.S. 249 (1994)], 1153
National Prohibition Cases (1920), 73, 862
National Treasury Employees Union v. United States [513 U.S. 454 (1995)], 892, 1782, 2328
National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab [489 U.S. 656 (1989)], 331, 822, 825, 826, 1096, 1529, 1782–1783, 2337, 2423
Native American Church v. Navajo Tribal Council [272 F. 2d 131 (1959)], 81–82
Neagle, In re [135 U.S. 1 (1890)], 947, 2311

Neal v. Delaware [103 U.S. 370 (1880)], 1509
Near v. Minnesota [283 U.S. 697 (1931)], 179, 284, 1138, 1144, 1145, 1149, 1311, 1317, 1714, 1787–1788, 1805, 1806, 2009, 2311, 2326, 2594
Nebbia v. New York [291 U.S. 502 (1934)], 53, 321, 838, 845, 1077, 1116, 1175, 1225, 1301, 1311, 1714, 1760, 1761, 1788–1789, 1796, 2281, 2509, 2510, 2571, 2575, 2882
Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart [427 U.S. 539 (1976)], 271, 1142, 1150–1151, 1179, 1181, 1789, 2010, 2077, 2745
Negre v. Larsen [401 U.S. 437 (1971)], 1049
Neil v. Biggers [409 U.S. 188 (1972)], 962
Nevada v. Hall [440 U.S. 410 (1979)], 447, 881
Newberry v. United States [256 U.S. 232 (1921)], 423
New Energy Company of Indiana v. Limbach [486 U.S. 269 (1988)], 2517
New England Divisions Case [261 U.S. 184 (1923)], 2639
New England Power Co. v. New Hampshire [455 U.S. 331 (1982)], 2514
New Hampshire v. Louisiana [108 U.S. 76 (1882)], 2824
New Hampshire Supreme Court v. Piper [470 U.S. 274 (1985)], 1798–1799, 2020
New Jersey v. Portash [440 U.S. 450 (1979)], 1335
New Jersey v. T.L.0. [468 U.S. 1214 (1984)], 825, 856, 2337, 2532
New Jersey v. T.L.0. [469 U.S. 325 (1985)], 1799
New Jersey v. Wilson [11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 164 (1812)], 1350, 1686, 1799, 1910, 2059
New Jersey Steam Navigation Co. v. Merchant's Bank [47 U.S. (6 How.)], 1791
New Mexico, United States v. [456 U.S. 926 (1982)], 1384, 2587
New Negro Alliance v. Sanitary Grocery Company [303 U.S. 552 (1938)], 1826
New Orleans v. Dukes [427 U.S. 297 (1976)], 840, 1220, 1800
New Orleans Water Works Co. v. St. Tammany Water-Works Co. [14 F. 194 (1882)], 1877–1878
Newport News Shipbuilding of Drydock Co. v. EEOC [462 U.S. 669(1983)], 2395
Newport (City of) v. Fact Concerts, Inc. [453 U.S. 247 (1981)], 1768
New State Ice Company v. Liebmann [285 U.S. 262 (1932)], 220, 838, 998, 1008, 1425, 1788, 1802, 2746
New York, Ex parte No. 1 [256 U.S. 490 (1921)], 878
New York v. Belton [453 U.S. 454 (1981)], 2332
New York v. Burger [482 U.S. 691 (1987)], 43, 44, 2337
New York v. Ferber [458 U.S. 747 (1982)], 350, 351, 1802, 1868, 2529–2530, 2531
New York v. Miln [36 U.S. (11 Pet.) 102 (1837)], 2687
New York v. Quarles [467 U.S. 649 (1984)], 1742, 1802–1803, 1841, 1927–1928
New York v. United States [326 U.S. 572 (1946)], 1211, 1226, 1239, 1845
New York v. United States [505 U.S. 144 (1992)], 354, 624, 904, 991, 992, 1009, 1803–1804, 2169, 2844
New York v. Uplinger [467 U.S. 246 (1984)], 2296
New York Central Railroad Company v. Lockwood [84 U.S. 357 (1873)], 217
New York Central Railroad Company v. White [243 U.S. 188 (1917)], 1554, 1804, 2925
New York City Transit Authority v. Beazer [440 U.S. 568 (1979)], 406
New York ex rel. Bryant v. Zimmerman [278 U.S. 63 (1928)], 1237
New York State Club Association v. New York City [487 U.S. 1 (1988)], 1110, 2398
New York Telephone Co. v. New York State Department [440 U.S. 519 (1979)], 1988
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan [376 U.S. 254 (1964)], 16, 167, 179, 231, 234–235, 237, 354, 461, 482, 815, 1056, 1127, 1130, 1134, 1139, 1141, 1146, 1150, 1189, 1235, 1236, 1285, 1322, 1607, 1608, 1788, 1804–1805, 1821, 1898, 1966, 1978, 2009, 2014, 2067, 2353, 2454, 2558, 2579, 2594, 2708–2709, 2745, 2850, 2855
New York Times Co. v. United States [403 U.S. 713 (1971) (per curiam)], 188, 377, 1129, 1139, 1140, 1145, 1232, 1438, 1805–1807, 2326, 2448, 2464, 2542, 2842, 2941
Niemotko v. Maryland [340 U.S. 268 (1951)], 1807, 2198, 2795
Nishimura Eiku v. United States [142 U.S. 651 (1892)], 129, 365, 1328, 1329
Nix v. Williams [467 U.S. 431 (1984)], 1157, 1815, 2045, 2336, 2338
Nixon, United States v. [418 U.S. 683 (1974)], 328, 377, 433, 609, 952–953, 954, 955, 1044, 1118, 1215, 1342, 1359, 1488, 1816, 1817–1818, 1822, 1955, 1994, 2384, 2448, 2529, 2865
Nixon v. Administrator of General Services [408 F. Supp. 321 (1976)], 1708
Nixon v. Administrator of General Services [433 U.S. 425 (1977)], 269, 1818
Nixon v. Condon [286 U.S. 73 (1932)], 284, 1041, 1238, 1307, 1818, 1941, 2007, 2809
Nixon v. Fitzgerald [457 U.S. 731 (1982)], 433, 944, 954, 1335, 1819, 1994, 2887
Nixon v. Herndon [273 U.S. 536 (1927)], 1041, 1296, 1818, 1819, 1941, 2007, 2349, 2492, 2641, 2675, 2809
Nixon v. Sirica [487 F. 2d 700 (1973)], 2865
Nixon v. United States [506 U.S. 224 (1993)], 1340, 1454, 1819–1820, 1953
NLRB. See National Labor Relations Board
Noble State Bank v. Haskell [219 U.S. 104 (1911)], 2509
Nollan v. California Coastal Commission [483 U.S. 825 (1987)], 802, 890, 903, 905, 1381, 2053, 2054, 2055, 2576, 2645, 2646, 2751, 2946 Nordlinger v. Hahn [505 U.S. 1 (1992)], 787
Norman v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. [294 U.S. 240 (1935)], 1201–1202
Norris v. Alabama [294 U.S. 587 (1935)], 1311, 1825, 1959
Norris v. Clymer [2 Pa. 277 (1845)], 833
North American Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission [327 U.S. 686 (1946)], 459, 1768, 2079
Northeastern Women's Center v. McMonagle (1989), 1153

Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. North Dakota [236 U.S. 585 (1919)], 2927
Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. United States [356 U.S. 1 (1958)], 104, 1540
Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co. [458 U.S. 50 (1982)], 161, 274, 524, 621, 1019, 1464, 1590, 1827–1828, 2154, 2697, 2887, 2889, 2893
Northern Securities Co. v. United States [193 U.S. 197 (1904)], 749, 1163, 1165, 1166–1167, 1168, 1828, 2413, 2895, 2898
North Haven Board of Education v. Bell [456 U.S. 512 (1982)], 853
Northwest Airlines v. Minnesota [322 U.S. 292 (1944)], 1103
Northwest Central Pipeline Corp. v. State Corporation Commission of Kansas [489 U.S. 493 (1989)], 2517
Northwestern Fertilizer Co. v. Hyde Park [97 U.S. 659 (1878)], 675, 1350, 1828–1829
Northwestern Laundry v. Des Moines [239 U.S. 486 (1916)], 901
Norton v. Shelby County [118 U.S. 425 (1886)], 2752
Nortz v. United States [294 U.S. 317 (1935)], 1201–1202
Norwood v. Harrison [413 U.S. 455 (1973)], 2017
Nostrand v. Little [368 U.S. 436 (1960)], 1648
Noto v. United States [351 U.S. 902 (1961)], 68
Nye v. United States [320 U.S. 755 (1941)], 1102, 1103
Nyquist v. Mauclet [432 U.S. 1 (1977)], 66

O

O'Bannon v. Town Court Nursing Center [447 U.S. 773 (1980)], 194, 2029
O'Brien, United States v. [391 U.S. 367 (1968)], 369, 818, 1232, 1584, 1585–1586, 1831, 1836, 1837, 2631, 2632, 2791, 2854, 2862, 2869
O'Brien v. Brown [409 U.S. 1 (1972)], 1837, 2669
O'Callahan v. Parker [395 U.S. 258 (1969)], 1727
O'Connor v. Donaldson [422 U.S. 563 (1975)], 789, 1718, 1846, 1884, 2025, 2061
O'Connor v. Ortega [480 U.S. 709 (1987)], 2337
O'Donoghue v. United States [289 U.S. 516 (1933)], 1463
Oestereich v. Selective Service Board No. 11 [393 U.S. 233 (1968)], 2790
Ogden v. Saunders [12 Wheat. 213 (1827)], 677, 832, 842, 1433, 1662, 1682, 1686, 1752, 1836, 1848–1849, 2653, 2698, 2732, 2859
O'Gorman & Young v. Hartford Insurance Co. [282 U.S. 251 (1931)], 220
O'Hare Truck Service v. City of Northlake [518 U.S. 712 (1996)], 1886
Ohio v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health [110 S.Ct. 2841 (1990)], 196, 1293
Ohio v. Roberts [448 U.S. 56 (1980)], 481, 492, 933
Ohio v. Robinette [519 U.S. 33 (1996)], 2711
Ohio Life Insurance & Trust Co. v. Debolt [57 U.S. (16 How.) 416 (1854)], 2648
Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Association [436 U.S. 447 (1978)], 1135
Okanogan Indian v. United States [279 U.S. 655 (1929)], 1921, 2784
Oklahoma Tax Commission v. Jefferson Lines, Inc. [514 U.S. 175 (1995)], 806, 2494, 2495
Oklahoma v. Civil Service Commission [330 U.S. 127 (1947)], 684, 987, 1780
Olcott v. the Supervisors [83 U.S. (6 Wall.) 678 (1873)], 2075
Olden v. Kentucky [488 U.S. 227 (1988)], 491
Oliver, In re [333 U.S. 257 (1948)], 1849
Oliver v. United States [466 U.S. 170 (1984)], 1849, 2140, 2343
Ollman v. Evans [750 F. 2d 970, 996 (D.C. Cir. 1984)], 210, 1861
Olmstead v. United States [277 U.S. 438 (1928)], 221, 284, 711, 719, 721, 872, 873, 1296, 1527, 1633, 1774, 1849–1850, 1853, 2061, 2139, 2241, 2247, 2290, 2340, 2342, 2542, 2573, 2636, 2767, 2896, 2913
Olney v. Arnold [3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 308 (1796)], 2602
O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz [482 U.S. 342 (1987)], 895, 1201, 1851, 2012, 2380
Olsen v. Nebraska ex rel Reference & Bond Association [313 U.S. 236 (1941)], 1851, 2510
On Lee v. United States [343 U.S. 747 (1952)], 873, 1853, 2896, 2897
Oncale v. Sundowner Offshore Services [523 U.S. 75 (1998)], 100, 2400
O'Neil v. Vermont [144 U.S. 155 (1892)], 1354, 1529, 2037
One 6.5 mm. Mannlicher-Carcano Military Rifle, United States v. [250 F. Supp. 410 (N.D. Tex. 1966)], 372
Oregon v. Bradshaw [462 U.S. 1039 (1983)], 861, 1928
Oregon v. Elstad [470 U.S. 298 (1985)], 1742, 1841, 1856, 1927–1928, 2240
Oregon v. Hass [420 U.S. 714 (1975)], 1927
Oregon v. Mathiason [429 U.S. 492 (1977)], 1927
Oregon v. Mitchell [400 U.S. 122 (1970)], 274, 440, 608, 1089, 1090, 1629, 1856, 1941, 2596, 2598, 2609, 2743, 2811, 2813, 2887
Oregon Waste Systems v. Department of Environmental Quality [511 U.S. 93 (1994)], 2864
Orlando v. Laird [317 F. Supp. 1013 (E.D.N.Y. 1970) (1971)], 2789
Orloff v. Willoughby [345 U.S. 83 (1953)], 117–118
Orozco v. Texas [394 U.S. 324 (1969)], 1742, 1864–1865
Orr v. Orr [440 U.S. 268 (1979)], 973, 2392, 2393, 2921
Ortwein v. Schwab [410 U.S. 656 (1971)], 23, 204, 2876
Osborn v. Bank of the United States [22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 738 (1824)], 423, 438, 555, 740, 877, 1228, 1463, 1466, 1467–1468, 1686, 1865, 2871
Osborn v. Ozlin [310 U.S. 53 (1940)], 1548
Osborne v. Ohio [495 U.S. 103 (1990)], 350
Osgood v. Chicago, Danville, and Vincennes R. R. Co. [18 F. Cas. 876 (C.C. Ill. 1875) (No. 10, 604)], 360
O'Shea v. Littleton [414 U.S. 488 (1974)], 1375, 1454, 1865
Otis v. Parker [187 U.S. 606 (1902)], 1296
Overmeyer, D. H., Co. v. Frick Co. [405 U.S. 174 (1972)], 2831

Owen v. City of Independence [445 U.S. 622 (1980)], 1768, 1871, 2350
Owens, United States v. [484 U.S. 554 (1988)], 492
Ownbey v. Morgan [256 U.S. 94 (1921)], 2544
Oyama v. California [332 U.S. 633 (1948)], 66, 129, 131–132, 1871
Ozawa v. United States [260 U.S. 178 (1922)], 129

P

Pace v. Alabama [106 U.S. 583 (1883)], 1038, 1646, 1698, 1744, 1745, 1873, 2827–2828
Pacific Gas and Electric Company v. California Public Utilities Commission [475 U.S. 1 (1986)], 688, 690
Pacific Gas and Electric Company v. Energy Resources Commission [461 U.S. 190 (1983)], 484
Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip [499 U.S. 1 (1991)], 195, 2314, 2315
Pacific Railroad Removal Cases [115 U.S. 1 (1885)], 1497
Pacific Railway v. Illinois [118 U.S. 557 (1886)], 217
Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Oregon [223 U.S. 118 (1912)], 785, 789, 1238–1239, 1372, 1950, 2210 Padula v. Webster [822 F. 2d 97 (D.C. Cir. 1987)], 2405
Palermo v. United States [360 U.S. 343 (1959)], 1426
Palko v. Connecticut [302 U.S. 319 (1937)], 33, 164, 170, 315, 830, 1176, 1355, 1855, 1874–1875, 1990, 2038, 2238, 2293, 2572–2573, 2744, 2796
Palmer v. Thompson [403 U.S. 217 (1971)], 1585–1586, 1875, 2487, 2862, 2887, 2890
Palmore v. Sidoti [466 U.S. 429 (1984)], 46, 800, 1123, 1875–1876, 2308, 2402
Palmore v. United States [411 U.S. 389 (1973)], 1590
Panama Refining Company v. Ryan [293 U.S. 388 (1935)], 41, 314, 457, 504, 736, 761, 1316, 1776, 1876–1877, 2317, 2385
Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville [405 U.S. 156 (1972)], 816, 2774
Papasan v. Allain [478 U.S. 265 (1986)], 2874
Paquete Habana [175 U.S. 677 (1900)], 1077, 1390
Paradise, United States v. [480 U.S. 149 (1987)], 1877, 2106
Parden v. Terminal Railway [377 U.S. 184 (1964)], 853, 877, 879, 881, 1382, 1468, 2831–2832
Parham v. Hughes [441 U.S. 347 (1978)], 1326, 2395
Parham v. J. R. [442 U.S. 584 (1979)], 353, 974, 1878–1879, 2031
Paris Adult Theater I v. Slaton [413 U.S. 49 (1973)], 235, 1236, 1734–1735, 1831, 1838, 1839, 2443, 2777
Parker v. Brown [317 U.S. 341 (1943)], 1879, 2461, 2511
Parker v. Davis [78 U.S. (12 Wall.) 457 (1871)], 697, 1581, 2563
Parker v. Levy [417 U.S. 733 (1974)], 117, 1727, 1879, 2776–2777
Parker v. North Carolina [397 U.S. 790 (1970)], 2831
Parratt v. Taylor [451 U.S. 527 (1981)], 653, 2350
Passenger Cases [48 U.S. (7 How.) 283 (1849)], 325, 742, 1230, 1328, 1712, 1791, 1869, 2274, 2409, 2648, 2652, 2867, 2871, 2885, 2908, 2923
Patsy v. Board of Regents [457 U.S. 496 (1982)], 19, 955
Patterson v. Colorado [205 U.S. 454 (1907)], 1299, 1354, 2318
Patterson v. Illinois [487 U.S. 285 (1988)], 1743, 1930
Patterson v. McLean Credit Union [491 U.S. 164 (1989)], 98, 398, 407, 1530, 1887
Patton v. Mississippi [332 U.S. 463 (1947)], 1678
Patton v. United States [281 U.S. 276 (1930)], 1515, 1887
Paul v. Davis [424 U.S. 693 (1976)], 442, 482, 653, 1887–1888, 1888, 2155, 2350
Paul v. Virginia [75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 168 (1869)], 341, 585, 736, 805, 1888, 2458, 2513, 2549
Paxton's Case [51 Mass. Repts. 469 (1761)], 208, 1099, 1323, 1865, 1866, 1888–1889
Payne v. Tennessee [501 U.S. 808 (1991)], 1889
Payton v. New York [445 U.S. 573 (1980)], 121, 1820, 1889, 2332, 2333, 2524, 2881, 2891 Peik v. Chicago & Northwestern Railway Co. [94 U.S. 164 (1877)], 1224–1225
Pell v. Procunier [417 U.S. 817 (1974)], 1891, 2011
Penhallow v. Doane's Administrators [3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 54 (1795)], 1404, 1883, 2603
Penn Central Transportation Co. v. New York City [438 U.S. 104 (1978)], 238, 902, 1564, 1892–1893, 2150, 2535, 2644, 2946
Pennell v. City of San Jose [485 U.S. 285 (1988)], 2158
Pennhurst State School & Hospital v. Halderman [451 U.S. 1, 457 U.S. 1131 (1981, 1984)], 19, 775, 790, 1562, 1721, 1780, 1891, 1893–1894, 2660–2661
Penn Mutual Indemnity Co. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue [277 U.S. F. 2d 16 (1976)], 2421
Pennoyer v. Neff [95 U.S. 714 (1878)], 1500
Pennsylvania v. Finley [481 U.S. 551 (1987)], 2043
Pennsylvania v. Mimms [434 U.S. 106 (1977)], 2552, 2711
Pennsylvania v. Nelson [350 U.S. 497 (1956)], 279–280, 421, 606, 1894, 2351, 2772 Pennsylvania v. Ritchie [480 U.S. 39 (1987)], 492
Pennsylvania v. Union Gas Co. [485 U.S. 958 (1989)], 878, 879, 880, 995, 1010, 1529, 2504
Pennsylvania v. Wheeling and Belmont Bridge Co. [59 U.S. (18 How.) 421 (1852, upheld 1856)], 742, 1712, 1791
Pennsylvania Association for Retarded Children v. Pennsylvania [334 F. Supp. 1257 (E.D. Pa. 1971)], 790
Pennsylvania Coal Company v. Mahon [260 U.S. 393 (1922)], 889, 890, 902, 1175, 1296, 1400–1401, 1651, 2054, 2509–2510, 2640, 2644, 2645, 2646, 2647, 2945
Penry v. Lynaugh [492 U.S. 302 (1989)], 306, 1843, 1895, 2369
Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co. [96 U.S. 1 (1878)], 1319, 1896, 2824
Pentagon Papers case. See New York Times v. United States Peonage Cases [320 U.S. 527 (1903)], 1897
People v. Bogdanoff [254 N.Y. 16 (1930)], 2258
People v. Croswell [3 Johnson's Cases 336 (NY 1804)], 1260, 1534, 1897–1898
People v. Hobson [401 NY S. 2d 967 (1976)], 2264
People v. Jackson & Co. [9 Mich. 285 (1861)], 2507
People v. Lemmon [20 N.Y. 562 (1860)], 4

People v. Ruggles [8 Johns. 290 (1811)], 1534
People v. Wheeler [583 P. 2d 748 (1978)], 2728
Perez v. Brownell [356 U.S. 44 (1958)], 1950, 2733, 2834, 2902–2903
Perez v. Ledesma [410 U.S. 82 (1971)], 756
Perez v. United States [402 U.S. 146 (1971)], 459, 1567, 1778–1779, 1899, 2415–2416
Perkins v. Elg [307 U.S. 325 (1939)], 956
Permian Basin Area Rate Cases [390 U.S. 747 (1968)], 2385
Pernell v. Southall Realty Co. [416 U.S. 363 (1974)], 2729
Perry v. Sinderman [408 U.S. 593 (1972)], 203, 897
Perry v. United States [294 U.S. 330 (1935)], 1201–1202, 2288
Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association [460 U.S. 37 (1983)], 686, 1213, 1899–1900, 2052, 2068
Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney [442 U.S. 256 (1979)], 474, 1679, 1902, 2392–2393, 2533
Peters, Judge, United States v. [9 U.S. (5 Cranch) 115 (1809)], 883, 1441–1442, 1685, 1902, 2859
Peters v. Hobby [349 U.S. 331 (1955)], 946, 2438, 2448
Peters v. Kiff [407 U.S. 493 (1972)], 1510
Peters v. New York [392 U.S. 40 (1968)], 2552–2553, 2553
Petersburg Judges of Elections, United States v. [27 F. Cas. 506 (C.C. D.C. 1874) (No. 16, 036)], 207
Peterson v. City of Greenville [373 U.S. 244 (1963)], 371 Petit v. Minnesota [177 U.S. 164 (1900)], 2584 Petition of R.M.G. [454 A. 2d 776 (D.C. Cir. 1982)], 46
Pettigrew v. United States [97 U.S. 385 (1878)], 1727, 1732, 1879
Philadelphia v. New Jersey [437 U.S. 617 (1978)], 806, 1010, 1904, 2514, 2566, 2864
Philadelphia & Reading Railroad v. Pennsylvania [82 U.S. (15 Wall.) 232 (1873)], 747, 1904, 2521
Philadelphia and Trenton Railroad, In re [6 Whart. 25 (1840)], 1192
Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps [475 U.S. 767 (1986)], 1609, 2534
Phillips v. Martin Marietta Corporation [400 U.S. 542 (1971)], 2091
Phillips v. Washington Legal Foundation [524 U.S. 156 (1998)], 2646
Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts [472 U.S. 797 (1985)], 358
Pickering v. Board of Education [391 U.S. 563 (1968)], 856, 892, 1676, 1677, 1886, 2066
Pickett v. Brown [461 U.S. 1 (1983)], 1824
Pico v. Board of Education [457 U.S. 853 (1982)], 2750
Pierce v. Hill Military Academy [268 U.S. 510 (1925)], 2188
Pierce v. Society of Sisters [268 U.S. 510 (1925)], 315, 352, 353, 854, 858, 1118, 1122, 1372, 1714, 1908, 2188, 2321, 2374, 2519, 2573, 2641–2642, 2738
Pierce v. Somerset Railway [171 U.S. 641 (1898)], 2830
Pierce v. United States [386 U.S. 547 (1920)], 1911, 2841
Pierson v. Ray [386 U.S. 547 (1967)], 944, 1335, 1453, 1908–1909, 2319
Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc. [397 U.S. 137 (1970)], 806, 2514–2515, 2516
Pine Grove Township v. Talcott [86 U.S. (19 Wall.) 666 (1874)], 676
Pink, United States v. [315 U.S. 203 (1942)], 737, 942, 951, 1390, 1909–1910, 1997
Pinkerton v. United States [328 U.S. 640 (1946)], 708
Pinkus v. United States [436 U.S. 293 (1978)], 351
Piqua Branch of the State Bank of Ohio v. Knoop [57 U.S. (16 How.) 369 (1854)], 298, 325, 676, 801, 1350, 1712, 1910–1911
Pitts v. Black [608 F. Supp. 696 (S.D. N.Y. 1984)], 1302
Pittsburgh Melting Company v. Toten [248 U.S. 1 (1918)], 749
Place, United States v. [462 U.S. 696 (1983)], 713, 1914
Planned Parenthood v. Casey [505 U.S. 833 (1992)], 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 196, 432, 625, 1531, 1813–1814, 1845, 1914–1916, 2097, 2122–2123, 2159, 2168, 2316, 2456, 2714
Planned Parenthood Association v. Ashcroft [462 U.S. 476 (1983)], 353, 2207, 2208 Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth [428 U.S. 52 (1976)], 5–6, 192, 353, 974, 1916, 2206, 2207, 2208, 2528
Plant v. Woods [176 Mass. 492 (1900)], 1547
Planters Bank v. Sharp [47 U.S. (6 How.) 301 (1848)], 742, 2923
Plessy v. Ferguson [163 U.S. 537 (1896)], 12, 15, 54, 129, 170, 253, 254, 259, 375, 388, 389, 399, 411, 527, 587, 771, 794, 909, 991, 1166, 1167, 1204, 1265, 1267, 1631, 1870, 1918–1920, 1950, 1987, 2062, 2094, 2109, 2159, 2217, 2253, 2282, 2308, 2354, 2369, 2403, 2443, 2458, 2484, 2597, 2599, 2693, 2713–2714, 2764, 2792, 2795, 2796, 2828, 2849, 2898
Plurality Opinion in Board of Education v. Pico (1982), 855, 856
Plyler v. Doe [457 U.S. 202 (1982)], 66, 183, 233, 239, 275, 365, 428, 857, 914, 1077, 1330, 1331, 1920, 1976, 1980
Pocket Veto Case (Okanogan Indians v. United States) [279 U.S. 655 (1929)], 1921, 2784
Poe v. Ullman [367 U.S. 497 (1961)], 12, 1233, 1269, 1270, 1520, 2247, 2456, 2903
Poelker v. Doe [432 U.S. 519 (1977)], 6, 1665, 2205
Poindexter v. Greenhow [114 U.S. 269 (1885)], 1698
Poindexter v. Louisiana Financial Assistance Commission [389 U.S. 571 (1968)], 2738
Pointer v. Texas [380 U.S. 400 (1955)], 932, 1269, 1921, 2039
Polaroid Corp. v. Eastman Kodak Co. [490 U.S. 1047 (1989)], 1882
Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley [408 U.S. 92 (1972)], 1215, 1677, 1907, 1921–1922, 2070
Polk County v. Dodson [454 U.S. 312 (1981)], 2492
Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan [45 U.S. (3 How.) 212 (1845)], 2825
Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company [158 U.S. 601 (1895)], 241, 252, 320, 357, 429, 583, 784, 836, 994, 1036, 1164–1165, 1167, 1168, 1227, 1244, 1268, 1409, 1869, 1959–1960, 1964, 2048, 2421, 2543, 2591–2592, 2598, 2609, 2628, 2858, 2894, 2897
Pollock v. Williams [322 U.S. 4 (1944)], 1960–1961
Pope v. Williams [193 U.S. 621 (1904)], 69
Porterfield v. Webb [263 U.S. 225 (1923)], 129, 131, 284

Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico [478 U.S. 328 (1986)], 462, 464, 1133, 1969
Postal Clerks v. Blount [404 U.S. 802 (1971)], 1553
Pottinger v. Miami [810 F. Supp. 1551 (S.D. Fla.1992)], 1301
Poulos v. New Hampshire [345 U.S. 395 (1953)], 2794–2795
Powell v. Alabama [287 U.S. 45 (1932)], 284, 720, 1193, 1311, 1355, 1959, 1981, 2036, 2038, 2087, 2260–2261, 2263, 2265, 2626, 2780
Powell v. McCormack [395 U.S. 486 (1969)], 501, 502, 1306, 1476, 1488, 1950, 1981, 2670, 2853
Powell v. Pennsylvania [127 U.S. 678 (1888)], 586, 1114, 1115, 2829, 2830
Powell v. Texas [392 U.S. 514 (1968)], 730, 1484, 2774–2775
Powers v. Ohio [499 U.S. 400 (1991)], 165, 1514, 1515, 1899 Preiser v. Rodriguez [411 U.S. 475 (1973)], 955
Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court [464 U.S. 501 (1984)], 1214, 2803
Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court [478 U.S. 1 (1986)], 1152, 1214
Presser v. Illinois [116 U.S. 252 (1886)], 1729, 2113, 2924
Price, United States v. [383 U.S. 787 (1966)], 733, 2006
Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins [490 U.S. 228 (1989)], 1844
Prigg v. Pennsylvania [41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 539 (1842)], 409, 562, 1159, 1230, 1712, 1901, 2006, 2430, 2431, 2506, 2554–2555, 2649, 2654, 2698, 2825, 2868
Primus, In re [436 U.S. 412 (1978)], 2071
Prince v. Bartlett [8 Cranch 431 (1814)], 832
Prince v. Massachusetts [312 U.S. 158 (1944)], 353, 2008, 2191
Principality of Monaco v. Mississippi [292 U.S. 313 (1934)], 878
Printz v. United States [521 U.S. 98 (1997)], 624, 904, 991, 1531, 1803, 1845, 2169, 2456, 2503
Prize Cases [2 Black (67 U.S.) 635 (1863)], 325, 340, 415, 430, 649, 746, 886, 949, 1230, 1736, 1791, 2628, 2837, 2840, 2868
Pro-Choice Network of Western New York v. Schenck [519 U.S. 357 (1997)], 94
Procunier v. Martinez [416 U.S. 396 (1974)], 2012, 2046
Procunier v. Navarette [434 U.S. 555 (1978)], 2319
Proffitt v. Florida [428 U.S. 242 (1976)], 302, 310–312
Progressive, The, United States v. [467 F. Supp. 990 (W.D. Wisc. 1979)], 2326–2327
Propeller Genesee Chief v. FitzHugh [53 U.S. (12 How.) 443 (1851)], 742, 1791, 1870, 2051, 2648, 2650, 2654
Providence Bank v. Billings [29 U.S. (4 Pet.) 514 (1830)], 333, 675, 1686, 2059–2060, 2653
Prudential Insurance Company v. Benjamin [328 U.S. 408 (1946)], 817, 1012, 1822, 2060
Prudential Insurance Company v. Cheek [252 U.S. 567 (1922)], 1045–1046
PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins [447 U.S. 74 (1980)], 1320, 2054, 2060, 2154, 2157–2158, 2415
Ptasynski, United States v. [462 U.S. 74 (1983)], 784
Public Clearing House v. Coyne [194 U.S. 497 (1904)], 1970
Public Utilities Commission v. Pollack [343 U.S. 451 (1952)], 313, 2795
Pulley v. Harris [460 U.S. 1036 (1984)], 303
Pulliam v. Allen [466 U.S. 522 (1984)], 654, 1335, 1454
Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co. [80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 166 (1872)], 1037

Q

Quackenbush v. Allstate Insurance Co. [517 U.S. 706 (1996)], 20
Quern v. Jordan [440 U.S. 332 (1979)], 2–85, 853, 2350
Quick Bear v. Leupp [210 U.S. 50 (1908)], 82, 2371
Quilloin v. Walcott [434 U.S. 246 (1978)], 2395
Quinlan, In re [355 A. 2d 647 (N.J. Super. Ct. (1976)], 2268
Quinn v. United States [349 U.S. 155 (1955)], 1305, 1595, 2237
Quirin, Ex parte [317 U.S. 1 (1942)], 1247, 2085, 2551, 2719, 2931

R

Rabinowitz, United States v. [339 U.S. 56 (1950)], 1102, 1264, 1740, 2344
Rahrer, In re [140 U.S. 545 (1891)], 1168, 1601, 2513, 2870
Railroad Commission Cases [116 U.S. 352 (1886)], 199, 2823, 2830 Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Company [312 U.S. 496 (1941)], 18–19, 1373
Railroad Company, United States v. [84 U.S. (17 Wall.) 322 (1873)], 1319
Railroad Company v. Maryland [88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 456 (1875)], 217
Railroad Company v. Peniston. See Union Pacific Railroad v. Peniston Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton Railroad Co. [295 U.S. 496 (1935)], 457, 459, 1311, 2115, 2115, 2226, 2281 Railway Employees' Department v. Hanson [351 U.S. 225 (1956)], 1552, 1553
Railway Express Agency v. New York [336 U.S. 106 (1949)], 840, 1588, 1592, 2115
Railway Labor Executives' Association v. Gibbons [455 U.S. 457 (1982)], 161
Raines v. Byrd [521 U.S. 811 (1997)], 243, 502, 626, 1627, 2475, 2844
Rakas v. Illinois [439 U.S. 128 (1978)], 2044, 2156, 2335
Ramsey, United States v. [431 U.S. 606 (1977)], 209
Randall v. Brigham [74 (7 Wall.) 523 (1869)], 1335, 1453
Randall v. Meese [854 F. 2d 472 (D.C. Cir. 1988)], 1196
Rassmussen v. United States [197 U.S. 516 (1905)], 1169, 1376
R. A. V. v. City of St. Paul [505 U.S. 377 (1992)], 891, 1056–1057, 1136, 1154, 1276, 1278, 2123–2124, 2538, 2913, 2926
Rawlings v. Kentucky [448 U.S. 98 (1980)], 2044
Ray v. Blair [343 U.S. 214 (1952)], 1942
Raymond Motor Transportation Company v. Rice [434 U.S. 429 (1978)], 2124, 2514

Raynes v. Baird [521 U.S. 811 (1997)], 2387
Reagan v. Farmer's Loan & Trust Co. [154 U.S. 362 (1894)], 241, 346, 970, 1166, 2129–2130, 2437
Real Estate Association v. McNary [454 U.S. 100 (1981)], 2156
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission [395 U.S. 367 (1969)], 247, 248, 249, 446, 968, 969, 1147, 1391, 1671, 1723, 1725, 2144, 2144, 2739–2740, 2890
Redrup v. New York [386 U.S. 767 (1967)], 2855
Reed v. Farley [512 U.S. 339 (1994)], 2467
Reed v. Reed [404 U.S. 71 (1971)], 270, 914, 1032, 1156, 1185, 1196, 2390, 2393, 2398–2399, 2921
Reese v. United States [92 U.S. 214 (1876)], 217, 430, 1024, 1041, 1070, 1319, 1415, 2145–2146, 2822–2823, 2827, 2938
Reeves, Inc. v. Stake [447 U.S. 429 (1980)], 1212, 2052, 2515
Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington, Inc. [461 U.S. 540 (1983)], 1237
Regan v. Wald [468 U.S. 222 (1984)], 2146
Regents of the University of California v. Bakke [438 U.S. 265 (1978)], 22, 35, 53, 54, 55, 57, 96, 122, 169, 194, 232, 238, 239, 277, 376, 391, 397, 406, 760, 794, 917, 1172, 1304, 1379, 1563, 1587, 1677, 1679, 1760, 1976, 1978, 1980, 2078, 2094, 2104, 2109, 2110, 2111, 2146–2147, 2231, 2529, 2713, 2756, 2890
Regina v. Hicklin [16 W.R. 801 (1868)], 2748
Regional Rail Reorganization Act Cases [419 U.S. 102 (1974)], 161, 2278
Reid v. Covert [354 U.S. 1 (1957)], 386, 603, 959, 960, 1727, 1950, 1992, 2170, 2672, 2719, 2722, 2839
Reidel, United States v. [402 U.S. 351 (1971)], 1677
Reitman v. Mulkey [387 U.S. 369 (1967)], 280, 785, 786, 2170–2171, 2220, 2487, 2492
Remington, United States v. (2d Cir. 1953), 1221
Rendell-Baker v. Kohn [457 U.S. 830 (1982)], 200, 2018, 2492
Rennie v. Klein [462 F. Supp. 1131 (D.N.J. 1978)], 790, 1720
Reno v. ACLU [521 U.S. 844 (1997)], 249, 471, 969, 1057, 1148, 1392
Reno v. Condon [120 S.Ct. 666 (2000)], 993
Renton (City of) v. Playtime Theatres [475 U.S. 41 (1986)], 381, 1054, 1057, 1133, 1832, 2199
Respublica v. Chapman [1 Dall. 53 (Penna. 1781)], 364 Retail Clerks v. Schermerhorn [373 U.S. 746 (1963)], 2278
Reves v. Ernst & Young [494 U.S. 56 (1990)], 1860
Rewis v. United States [401 U.S. 808 (1971)], 1570
Reynolds, United States v. [235 U.S. 133 (1914)], 1897, 2008, 2900
Reynolds v. Sims [377 U.S. 533 (1964)], 152, 153, 172, 233, 237, 273, 274, 277, 326, 440, 866, 871, 1227, 1268, 1271, 1462, 1853, 2133, 2134, 2202, 2227–2229, 2520, 2713–2714, 2765, 2804, 2849, 2854
Reynolds v. United States [98 U.S. 145 (1879)], 299, 748, 973, 1048, 1065, 1290, 1768, 1961, 2180, 2186, 2229
Rhode Island v. Innes [446 U.S. 291 (1980)], 1742, 1922, 1928, 2229–2230, 2238
Rhode Island v. Palmer [253 U.S. 350 (1920)], 2803, 2927
Rhodes v. Chapman [452 U.S. 337 (1981)], 730
Rhodes v. Iowa [170 U.S. 412 (1890)], 1168
Ribnik v. McBride [277 U.S. 350 (1928)], 1115, 1851, 2230, 2746
Rice v. Cayetano [120 S.Ct. 1044 (2000)], 1784
Rice v. Paladin Enterprises, Inc. [128 F. 3d 233 (4th Cir. 1997)], 1154
Rice v. Sante Fe Elevator Corp. [331 U.S. 218 (1947)], 1988, 1989
Richards v. Wisconsin [520 U.S. 385 (1997)], 1097
Richardson, United States v. [418 U.S. 166 (1974)], 1215, 2662
Richardson v. Marsh [481 U.S. 200 (1987)], 492
Richardson v. McKnight [521 U.S. 399 (1997)], 243
Richmond (City of) v. Deans [281 U.S. 704 (1930)], 2219, 2468
Richmond (City of) v. J. A. Croson Co. [488 U.S. 469 (1989)], 33, 55, 56, 398, 400, 623, 848, 915, 1530, 1679–1680, 1843, 1845, 2106, 2108, 2165, 2169, 2230–2231, 2313, 2398, 2537, 2538, 2890, 2934
Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia [448 U.S. 555 (1980)], 271, 972, 1107, 1117, 1132, 1142, 1144, 1145–1146, 1151, 1181, 1214, 1215, 1811, 1812, 1979, 2010, 2077, 2231–2232, 2271–2272
Rideau v. Louisiana [373 U.S. 723 (1963)], 1150
Riggs v. Taylor [22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 485 (1824)], 2704
Ristano v. Ross [424 U.S. 589 (1976)], 2803
Rivera v. Marcus [696 F. 2d 1016 (2d Cir. 1982)], 1084
Rivera-Rodriguez v. Popular Democratic Party [452 U.S. 1 (1982)], 865, 1943
Rizzo v. Goode [423 U.S. 362 (1976)], 276, 1375, 2155, 2156, 2280
Robbins v. California [453 U.S. 420 (1981)], 2295
Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing District [120 U.S. 489 (1887)], 217, 1162, 1227
Robel, United States v. [389 U.S. 258 (1967)], 1650, 1868, 2280–2281, 2850, 2854
Roberts v. City of Boston [5 Cush. (Mass.) 198 (1850)], 735, 771, 1086, 1204, 1918, 2282–2283, 2354, 2583
Roberts v. Louisiana [428 U.S. 325 (1976)], 310–312
Roberts v. United States Jaycees [468 U.S. 609 (1984)], 1110, 1119, 1237, 2016–2017
Robertson v. Wegmann [436 U.S. 584 (1978)], 403, 2227
Robinson, United States v. [414 U.S. 218 (1973)], 2156, 2283, 2331–2332, 2343
Robinson v. Cahill [118 NJ Super 223 (1973)], 2498
Robinson v. California [370 U.S. 660 (1962)], 729, 731, 1484, 2542, 2774
Robinson v. DiCenso [403 U.S. 602 (1971)], 1601
Robinson v. Jacksonville Shipyards [760 F. Supp. 1486 (M.D. Fla. 1991)], 2926
Rochin v. California [342 U.S. 165 (1952)], 186, 229, 485, 1102, 1405, 2037, 2039, 2041, 2283–2284, 2561
Rock Royal Co-Op, Inc., United States v. [307 U.S. 533 (1939)], 63, 1316, 2932–2933
Rodriguez v. McLoughlin [49 F. Supp. 2d 186 (S.D. N.Y. 1999)], 1084

Roe v. Wade [410 U.S. 113 (1973)], 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11–12, 13, 14, 92–93, 155, 182, 189, 190, 191, 192, 195, 196, 210, 211, 270, 274, 277, 315, 316, 381, 383, 473, 508, 625, 700, 725, 759, 792, 800, 816, 839, 1008, 1118, 1175, 1196–1197, 1233, 1272, 1291, 1293, 1324, 1393, 1449, 1461–1462, 1480, 1530, 1531, 1615, 1639, 1665, 1680, 1811, 1812, 1813, 1843, 1845, 1861, 1900, 1901, 1914–1916, 1979, 2020, 2052, 2056, 2057, 2078, 2126, 2156, 2158, 2159, 2163, 2168, 2203, 2204–2207, 2208, 2242, 2244, 2246, 2247, 2248, 2268, 2284–2286, 2313, 2328, 2394, 2448, 2454–2455, 2456, 2528, 2574, 2575, 2576, 2577, 2578, 2594, 2699, 2714, 2872, 2888, 2892, 2893, 2921
Roemer v. Board of Public Works [426 U.S. 736 (1976)], 2375
Rogers v. Bellei [401 U.S. 815 (1971)], 366, 957
Rogers v. Lodge [458 U.S. 613 (1982)], 1765, 2286, 2863, 2890, 2892
Rogers v. Missouri Pacific Railroad Co. [352 U.S. 521 (1957)], 2296, 2726
Rogers v. Okin [634 F. 2d 650 (1980)], 1719, 1720
Rogers v. Richmond [365 U.S. 534 (1961)], 1924, 2286
Rogers v. United States [340 U.S. 367 (1951)], 2831
Rome (City of) v. United States [446 U.S. 156 (1980)], 879, 1089, 2810, 2812, 2813
Romer v. Evans [517 U.S. 620 (1996)], 383, 400, 429, 432, 787, 788, 917, 1197, 1531, 2122, 2123, 2170, 2286–2287, 2404, 2405, 2456, 2538
Ronan, Sheriff, United States ex rel. Hover v. [3 F. 117 (1887)], 1878
Roosevelt v. Meyer [68 U.S. (1 Wall.) 512 (1863)], 2628
Rosales-Lopez v. United States [449 U.S. 819 (1981)], 2803
Rosario v. Rockefeller [410 U.S. 752 (1973)], 2007
Rose v. Lundy [455 U.S. 509 (1982)], 193, 2532
Rose v. Mitchell [443 U.S. 545 (1979)], 1253
Rosenberg v. United States [346 U.S. 273 (1953)], 1102, 2294, 2719
Rosenberg v. United States [360 U.S. 367 (1959)], 1426
Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the University of Virginia [515 U.S. 809 (1995)], 926, 1136, 1209, 2070, 2173, 2179, 2194, 2294, 2322, 2456, 2568, 2751
Rosenblatt v. Baer [383 U.S. 75 (1966)], 1805, 2855
Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc. [403 U.S. 29 (1971)], 1189, 1608
Rosenfeld v. New Jersey [408 U.S. 901 (1972)], 1042
Ross, In re [140 U.S. 453 (1891)], 958, 959
Ross, United States v. [456 U.S. 798 (1981)], 2294–2295, 2332
Ross v. Bernhard [396 U.S. 531 (1970)], 2388, 2730
Ross v. Moffitt [417 U.S. 600 (1974)], 23, 817, 2262, 2295
Rostker v. Goldberg [453 U.S. 57 (1981)], 117, 507, 1679, 2295–2296, 2395–2396, 2399, 2418, 2472, 2533
Roth v. United States [354 U.S. 476 (1956)], 235, 1100, 1194, 1269, 1414, 1716, 1734, 1837, 1965, 1968, 2296, 2747, 2855
Rothstein v. Wyman [462 F. 2d 226 (1972)], 1708
Rouse v. Cameron [373 F. 2d 451 (D.C. Cir. 1966)], 1718
Royall, Ex parte [117 U.S. 241 (1886)], 955, 1249
Royster, F. S. Guano, Company v. Virginia [253 U.S. 412 (1920)], 1588
Rubin v. Coors Brewing Co. [514 U.S. 476 (1995)], 1135
Ruggles v. Illinois [108 U.S. 526 (1883)], 2823
Rummel v. Estelle [445 U.S. 263 (1980)], 729, 731, 2299
Rundle v. Delaware and Raritan Canal Co. [55 U.S. (14 How.) 80 (1852)], 742
Runyon v. McCrary [427 U.S. 160 (1976)], 96, 98, 403, 407, 1026, 1277, 1437, 1530, 1887, 2227, 2299–2300, 2488, 2694, 2738
Russell, United States v. [411 U.S. 423 (1973)], 899
Russello v. United States [464 U.S. 16 (1983)], 2112
Rust v. Sullivan [500 U.S. 173 (1991)], 196, 1136, 1531, 2070, 2169, 2300, 2455, 2567–2568, 2750
Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois [497 U.S. 62 (1990)], 948, 1213, 1886, 1939, 2300–2301
Rutgers v. Waddington [New York Mayor's Court (1784)], 541, 828, 1258, 2301

S

Sable Communications of California, Inc. v. FCC [492 U.S. 115 (1989)], 351, 778, 1148
Saenz v. Roe [526 U.S. 489 (1999)], 778, 2277, 2305–2306, 2877
Safeco NLRB v. Retail Store Employees Union. See National Labor Relations Board v. Retail Employees Local No. 1001
Saffle v. Parks [494 U.S. 484 (1990)], 1530
Saia v. New York [334 U.S. 558 (1948)], 2453, 2795
St. Amant v. Thompson [390 U.S. 727 (1967)], 1805
St. Louis and O'Fallon Railroad v. United States [279 U.S. 461 (1929)], 1714
Sakol v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue [439 U.S. 859 (1978)], 2421
Sale v. Haitian Centers Council [509 U.S. 155 (1993)], 71
Salerno, United States v. [481 U.S. 739 (1987)], 150, 1915, 2043, 2162, 2306–2307
San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez [411 U.S. 1 (1973)], 275, 352, 857, 859, 1637–1638, 1677, 1920, 1974–1975, 1977–1978, 1980, 2309–2310, 2387, 2408, 2498, 2874, 2880, 2891
Sanchez, United States v. [340 U.S. 42 (1950)], 2658
San Diego Building Trades v. Garmon [359 U.S. 236 (1959)], 1554
San Diego Gas and Electric Company v. City of San Diego [450 U.S. 621 (1981)], 890, 1401, 2149
Sandin v. Conner [515 U.S. 472 (1995)], 2013
San Francisco Arts & Athletics v. United States Olympic Committee [483 U.S. 522 (1987)], 1377, 2489
San Mateo County v. Southern Pacific Railroad [116 U.S. 138 (1882)], 1900
Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad [118 U.S. 394 (1886)], 526, 687, 1900, 2829
Santa Cruz Fruit Packing Co. v. NLRB [303 U.S. 453 (1938)], 2821
Santobello v. New York [404 U.S. 257 (1971)], 2367
Santosky v. Kramer [455 U.S. 745 (1982)], 974, 1523, 2027
Sauer v. City of New York [206 U.S. 536 (1907)], 1890

Saxbe v. Washington Post Co. [417 U.S. 843 (1974)], 1979
Saylor, United States v. [322 U.S. 385 (1944)], 423
Scales v. United States [367 U.S. 203 (1961)], 68, 1108, 2311–2312, 2581
Scarborough v. United States [431 U.S. 563 (1977)], 2416
Schad v. Mt. Ephraim [452 U.S. 61 (1981)], 1830, 1868, 2317, 2530
Schaeffer v. United States [251 U.S. 466 (1920)], 221
Schall v. Martin [467 U.S. 253 (1984)], 149, 2005, 2307, 2317
Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States [295 U.S. 495 (1935)], 41, 267, 457, 459, 599, 698, 736, 743, 744, 761, 846, 1311, 1313, 1316, 1760, 1776, 1795, 2283, 2288, 2317–2318, 2385, 2560, 2818–2821, 2929, 2937
Schenck v. Pro Choice Network [519 U.S. 357 (1997)], 243, 1050
Schenck v. United States [249 U.S. 47 (1919)], 146, 328, 426, 709, 923, 1135, 1154, 1198, 1264, 1298, 1352, 2186, 2198, 2318–2319, 2580, 2841, 2901, 2902, 2928–2929
Scheuer v. Rhodes [416 U.S. 232 (1974)], 944, 2319
Schick v. Reed [419 U.S. 256 (1974)], 1878, 2319
Schilb v. Kuebel [404 U.S. 357 (1971)], 149
Schiro v. Farley [510 U.S. 222 (1994)], 812
Schlesinger v. Ballard [419 U.S. 498 (1975)], 2391, 2396
Schlesinger v. Reservist Committee to Stop the War [418 U.S. 208 (1974)], 1977, 2662
Schmerber v. California [384 U.S. 757 (1966)], 205, 711, 800, 824, 956, 1083, 2041, 2238, 2310, 2340–2341, 2458, 2767
Schneckloth v. Bustamonte [412 U.S. 218 (1973)], 507, 1250, 2319–2320, 2334, 2711, 2831
Schneider v. District of Columbia [348 U.S. 26 (1953)], 2076
Schneider v. Rusk [377 U.S. 163 (1964)], 1785
Schneider v. State [308 U.S. 147 (1939)], 1317
Schneider v. Town of Irvington [308 U.S. 147 (1939)], 2198
Schneiderman v. United States [320 U.S. 807 (1943)], 2281, 2551, 2930 Schnell v. Davis [336 U.S. 933 (1949)], 1629, 2320
Scholey v. Rew [90 U.S. (23 Wall.) 331 (1875)], 784
School Board of Nassau County v. Arline [480 U.S. 273 (1987)], 791
Schulte, D. A., v. Gangi [326 U.S. 712 (1940)], 1539
Schwabe v. New Mexico Board of Bar Examiners [353 U.S. 232 (1957)], 606, 2325
Schweiker v. Chilicky [487 U.S. 412 (1988)], 653, 740
Schweiker v. Wilson [450 U.S. 221 (1981)], 193
Schwimmer, United States v. [279 U.S. 644 (1929)], 284, 1198, 1296, 1300, 2325–2326
Scopes v. State. See Tennessee v. Scopes
Scott v. Emerson [15 Mo. 682 (1852)], 819
Scott v. Illinois [436 U.S. 925 (1979)], 116, 1745, 2262
Scott v. United States [436 U.S. 128 (1978)], 874
Scottsboro Cases, 1281
SCRAP, United States v. See Students Challenging Regulatory Agency Procedures (SCRAP), United States v.
Screws v. United States [325 U.S. 91 (1945)], 410, 423, 444, 445, 709, 1025, 1103–1104, 1240, 1410, 2329, 2776
Searight v. Stokes [44 U.S. (3 How.) 151 (1845)], 742
Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. San Diego Carpenters [436 U.S. 180 (1978)], 1554
Seattle Times v. Rhinehart [467 U.S. 20 (1984)], 1145, 1152
Sedima, S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co. [473 U.S. 479 (1985)], 2112
See v. City of Seattle [387 U.S. 541 (1967)], 42, 43, 44, 294
Seeger, United States v. [380 U.S. 163 (1965)], 505, 1049, 2173, 2188, 2353–2354, 2790
Selective Draft Law Cases [245 U.S. 366 (1918)], 506, 748
Semayne's Case (1602, 1604), 1098
Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida [517 U.S. 44 (1996)], 87, 776, 880, 881, 904, 992, 1010, 1531, 1845, 2169, 2456, 2504
Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities v. Nixon [498 F. 2d 725 (D.C. Cir. 1974)], 2865
Senn v. Tile Layers Union [301 U.S. 468 (1937)], 220, 1548
Serrano v. Priest [5 Cal. 3d 584 (1971)], 1591, 2387, 2498 Service v. Dulles [354 U.S. 363 (1957)], 946
Sewall v. Hancock (Super. Ct.) Quincy [457 (Mass. 1768)], 1866
Seymour v. McCormick [60 U.S. (19 How.) 96 (1854)], 1230, 1432
Shadwick v. City of Tampa [407 U.S. 345 (1972)], 2332
Shapiro v. Thompson [394 U.S. 618 (1969)], 231, 233, 238, 837, 1973, 1974, 2275, 2277, 2305, 2306, 2408, 2574, 2873, 2874, 2877, 2878–2879
Sharpe, United States v. [470 U.S. 675 (1985)], 2553
Sharpless v. Philadelphia [21 Pa. 147 (1853)], 2074
Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei [354 U.S. 206 (1953)], 719, 1410, 2408
Shaw v. Hunt [517 U.S. 899 (1996)], 2409
Shaw v. Reno [509 U.S. 630 (1993)], 868, 870, 871, 917, 1511–1512, 1735, 1783, 2093, 2108, 2136, 2137, 2169, 2409–2410, 2812, 2814
Sheldon v. Sill [49 U.S. (8 How.) 441 (1850)], 1502
Shelley v. Kraemer [334 U.S. 1 (1948)], 163, 210, 259, 375, 393, 403, 725, 909, 930, 1025, 1042, 1678, 2101–2102, 2219, 2222, 2223, 2410–2411, 2485, 2486, 2487, 2492, 2792, 2795, 2810, 2874
Shelton v. Tucker [364 U.S. 479 (1960)], 1108, 1573, 1773, 2542
Sheppard v. Maxwell [384 U.S. 333 (1966)], 972, 1150–1151, 1179, 2077
Sherbert v. Verner [374 U.S. 398 (1963)], 231, 238, 487, 506, 821, 823, 1105, 2169, 2180–2181, 2181, 2191, 2192, 2194, 2377, 2412, 2469, 2700, 2748, 2750, 2914
Shreveport Case. See Houston, East and West Texas Railway Co. v. United States
Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham [394 U.S. 147 (1969)], 2832
Sibron v. New York [392 U.S. 40 (1968)], 2023, 2552, 2675–2676, 2676
Sicurella v. United States [348 U.S. 385 (1955)], 2186
Siebold, Ex parte [100 U.S. 371 (1880)], 2825–2826
Sierra Club v. Morton [405 U.S. 727 (1972)], 2416, 2565, 2661
Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp. [464 U.S. 238 (1984)], 2706
Silverman v. United States [365 U.S. 505 (1961)], 1850, 2139, 2416

Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States [251 U.S. 385 (1920)], 2336, 2417, 2922
Simmons v. United States [390 U.S. 377 (1968)], 962
Simon v. Eastern Kentucky Welfare Rights Organization [426 U.S. 26 (1976)], 275, 2417, 2565
Simon & Schuster, Inc. v. Members of The New York State Crime Victims Board [502 U.S. 105 (1991)], 1351
Simopouloas v. Virginia [462 U.S. 506 (1983)], 2207
Sims' Case [7 Cush. 285 (Mass. 1851)], 2409
Sinclair v. United States [279 U.S. 263 (1929)], 2360
Sing Tuck, United States v. [194 U.S. 161 (1904)], 1167
Sinking Fund Cases [99 U.S. 700 (1879); 99 U.S. 727 (1879)], 52, 217, 583, 802, 1354, 2419–2420, 2563, 2824, 2829
Sioux Nation of Indians, United States v. [448 U.S. 371 (1980)], 82
Sipuel v. Oklahoma State Hospital Board of Regents [332 U.S. 631 (1948)], 2420
Sisson, United States v. [District Court of Mass. 297 F. Supp. 902 (1969)], 2936
Skinner v. Mid-America Pipeline Company [490 U.S. 212 (1989)], 762, 1401
Skinner v. Oklahoma [316 U.S. 535 (1942)], 182, 1118, 1122, 1289, 1404, 1646, 2097, 2098, 2203, 2244, 2421–2422, 2528, 2550, 2562, 2573, 2577
Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives Association [489 U.S. 602 (1989)], 331, 825, 1529, 1782, 2328, 2337, 2422–2423
Skipper v. South Carolina [476 U.S. 1 (1986)], 2368
Slaughterhouse Cases [83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873)], 201, 217, 218, 283, 298, 313, 319, 336, 341, 342, 402, 430, 431, 527, 580, 581, 733, 746, 844, 909, 912, 1024, 1036, 1037, 1091, 1164, 1173, 1288, 1319, 1354, 1448, 1459, 1732, 1733, 1754, 1809, 1814, 2021, 2048–2049, 2217, 2305, 2349, 2423–2424, 2426, 2509, 2564, 2570, 2571, 2628, 2693, 2784, 2807, 2822, 2826–2827, 2924
Sloan v. Lemon [413 U.S. 825 (1973)], 464
Slochower v. Board of Education [350 U.S. 551 (1956)], 279, 1702, 2238
Smith v. Alabama [124 U.S. 465 (1888)], 977
Smith v. Allwright [321 U.S. 649 (1944)], 411, 423, 692, 1042, 1238, 1275, 1678, 1939, 1941, 2007, 2008, 2145, 2282, 2320, 2436–2437, 2485, 2487, 2550–2551, 2675, 2809–2810
Smith v. Board of School Commissioners [827 F. 2d 684 (11th Cir. 1987)], 859
Smith v. Cahoon [283 U.S. 553 (1931)], 840
Smith v. Goguen [415 U.S. 566 (1974)], 192, 1061, 2776
Smith v. Hooley [393 U.S. 374 (1969)], 2465
Smith v. Illinois [469 U.S. 91 (1984)], 1743
Smith v. Maryland [442 U.S. 735 (1979)], 713, 875, 2140–2141, 2334
Smith v. Murray [477 U.S. 527 (1986)], 1253, 1844
Smith v. Organization of Foster Families [431 U.S. 816 (1977)], 1083, 1124
Smith v. Phillips [455 U.S. 209 (1982)], 793
Smith v. United States [507 U.S. 197 (1993)], 2315–2316
Smith v. Wade [456 U.S. 924 (1983)], 739
Smith, George Otis, United States v. [286 U.S. 6 (1932)], 2612
Smuck v. Hobson [408 F. 2d 175 (1969)], 790
Smyth v. Ames [169 U.S. 466 (1898)], 199, 346, 969, 970, 1023, 1166, 1267, 1285, 1666, 2129–2130, 2437, 2640, 2758, 2894 Snepp v. United States [444 U.S. 507 (1980)], 1140, 2438
Sniadach v. Family Finance Corp. [395 U.S. 337 (1969)], 1362
Snyder v. Massachusetts [290 U.S. 606 (1934)], 315, 1176, 2281, 2706
Société Internationale v. Rogers [357 U.S. 197 (1958)], 960
Sokolow, United States v. [490 U.S. 1 (1989)], 482, 2338
Solem v. Helm [463 U.S. 277 (1983)], 316, 729–730, 732, 983, 1976, 2367, 2446–2447
Solesbee v. Balkcom [339 U.S. 9 (1950)], 1176
Somerset's Case [98 Eng. Rep. 499 (K.B., 1772)], 2, 334, 467, 560, 818, 1771, 2451–2452, 2520, 2649
Sonzinsky v. United States [300 U.S. 506 (1937)], 152, 1186, 2452, 2658
Sorrells v. United States [287 U.S. 435 (1932)], 899
Sosna v. Iowa [419 U.S. 393 (1975)], 799, 1121, 2275, 2277, 2452
South Carolina v. Baker [485 U.S. 505 (1988)], 994, 1384
South Carolina v. Gathers [490 U.S. 805 (1989)], 2369
South Carolina v. Katzenbach [383 U.S. 301 (1966)], 96, 1026, 1240, 1629, 2456–2457, 2810, 2813
South Carolina v. United States [199 U.S. 437 (1905)], 241, 1211
South Carolina State Highway Department v. Barnwell Bros., Inc. [303 U.S. 177 (1938)], 317, 2122, 2456, 2459, 2513, 2514
South Dakota v. Dole [483 U.S. 203 (1987)], 487, 994, 995, 1844, 2468, 2661, 2751
South Dakota v. Neville [459 U.S. 553 (1983)], 1841, 2458
Southeastern Community College v. Davis [442 U.S. 397 (1979)], 2152
South-Eastern Underwriters Association v. United States [322 U.S. 533 (1944)], 106, 459, 1888, 2060, 2458
Southern Burlington NAACP v. Mount Laurel [423 U.S. 808 (1975)], 2945
Southern Pacific Co. v. Arizona ex rel. Sullivan [325 U.S. 761 (1945)], 817, 835, 836, 1591, 2124, 2458–2459, 2513–2514
Southern Pacific Co. v. Jensen [244 U.S. 205 (1917)], 1467
Southern Railway Co. v. United States [222 U.S. 20 (1911)], 2780
Southwestern Bell Tel. Co. v. Public Service Commission [262 U.S. 276 (1923)], 221
Spain, In re [47 F. 208 (1891)], 360
Spallone v. United States [493 U.S. 265 (1990)], 1471, 2221
Spano v. New York [360 U.S. 315 (1959)], 1923, 2039, 2850
Sparf & Hansen v. United States [56 U.S. 51 (1895)], 1513
Spaulding v. Vilas [161 U.S. 483 (1896)], 943
Spaziano v. Florida [468 U.S. 447 (1984)], 303, 2535
Speiser v. Randall [357 U.S. 513 (1958)], 230, 231, 234, 2467, 2568, 2750
Spence v. Washington [418 U.S. 405 (1974)], 1061
Spencer v. Texas [385 U.S. 554 (1967)], 722
Spinelli v. United States [393 U.S. 410 (1969)], 120, 1327, 1368, 2024, 2330, 2469

Spock, United States v. [416 F. 2d 165 (1969)], 709
Sporhase v. Nebraska [458 U.S. 941 (1982)], 2514, 2566
Sprague, United States v. [282 U.S. 716 (1931)], 73, 862, 2118
Springer v. Government of the Philippine Islands [277 U.S. 189 (1928)], 949, 2384
Springer v. United States [102 U.S. 586 (1881)], 784, 1959, 2470, 2628
Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler [110 U.S. 347 (1883)], 2823
Springville City v. Thomas [166 U.S. 707 (1897)], 1517
Stack v. Boyle [342 U.S. 1 (1951)], 148, 149, 150, 2005
Stafford v. Wallace [258 U.S. 495 (1922)], 593, 2470, 2560, 2635
Standard Oil Company of Indiana v. United States [164 F. 376 (1908)], 1234, 1652, 2898, 2904 Standard Oil Company of New Jersey v. United States [221 U.S. 1 (1911)], 88, 106, 455, 688, 749, 1030, 1165, 1557, 2049, 2298, 2472
Stanford v. Kentucky [492 U.S. 361 (1989)], 306, 1843, 2315, 2369, 2475–2476
Stanley, United States v. [483 U.S. 669 (1987)], 653
Stanley v. Georgia [394 U.S. 557 (1969)], 350, 1676, 1734–1735, 1838, 2061, 2247, 2476
Stanley v. Illinois [405 U.S. 645 (1969)], 2243
Stanley v. Illinois [405 U.S. 645 (1972)], 1123, 1404, 1524
Stanton v. Stanton [421 U.S. 7 (1975)], 2391, 2392, 2921
Starns v. Malkerson [401 U.S. 985 (1971)], 2275, 2879
Starret City Associates, United States v. [488 U.S. 946 (1988)], 2221
State v. A.L.I.V.E. [606 P. 2d 769 (1980)], 2496
State v. Ball [124 N.H. 226 (1983)], 2498
State v. Cadman [476 A.2d 1148 (Me. 1984)], 2498
State v. Mann [North Carolina S.Ct. (1829)], 558, 2425
State v. Mooney [588 A. 2d 145 (Conn. 1991)], 1302
State v. Mugler [123 U.S. 623 (1887)], 240
State v. United States & Canada Express Company [60 N.H. 219 (1880)], 802
State Board v. Young's Market [299 U.S. 59 (1936)], 2741
State Freight Tax Case [83 U.S. 232 (1873)], 747, 2563
State of . . . See specific state names
State Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds Case [82 U.S. 300 (1872)], 341
State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts Case [82 U.S. 284 (1872)], 341
Staub v. Baxley [355 U.S. 313 (1958)], 2903
Steagald v. United States [451 U.S. 204 (1981)], 121, 2333, 2526
Steamboat New World v. King [57 U.S. (16. How.) 469 (1854)], 735
Steele v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. [323 U.S. 192 (1944)], 1554
Steele v. United States [367 U.S. 505 (1925)], 2332
Steel Seizure Case. See Youngstown Sheet and Tube v. Sawyer Steelworkers v. United States [361 U.S. 39 (1959)], 1553
Steffel v. Thompson [415 U.S. 452 (1974)], 2279
Stellwagen v. Clum [245 U.S. 605 (1981)], 161
Sterling v. Constantin [298 U.S. 378 (1932)], 2594
Sterling v. Cupp [625 P. 2d 123 (1981)], 2498
Stettler v. O'Hara [243 U.S. 629 (1917)], 35, 263, 2529
Steuart and Brothers v. Bowels [322 U.S. 398 (1944)], 887, 2841
Steward Machine Company v. Davis [300 U.S. 652 (1937)], 314, 987, 1157, 1186, 1284, 1316, 1554, 1780, 2115, 2445, 2540–2541, 2660–2661
Stewart Dry Goods Company v. Lewis [287 U.S. 9 (1935)], 314
Stone v. Farmer's Loan & Trust Company [116 U.S. 307 (1886)], 1037, 1350, 2049, 2547, 2823
Stone v. Graham [449 U.S. 39 (1980)], 855, 1602, 1603, 2177, 2372
Stone v. Mississippi [101 U.S. 814 (1880)], 676, 1350, 2547, 2665, 2823
Stone v. Powell [428 U.S. 465 (1976)], 18, 1251, 1253, 1758, 1975, 2044, 2225, 2319, 2456, 2547–2548
Stone v. Wisconsin [94 U.S. 181 (1877)], 1224–1225
Stoner v. California [376 U.S. 483 (1964)], 2690
Storer v. Brown [415 U.S. 724 (1974)], 158, 1942
Stovall v. Denno [388 U.S. 293 (1967)], 962, 1627
Strader v. Graham [51 U.S. (10 How.) 83 (1951)], 818, 1230, 2431–2432, 2557, 2649, 2654, 2655
Strauder v. West Virginia [100 U.S. 303 (1879)], 95, 200, 388, 403, 408, 414, 1038, 1509, 1919, 2088, 2099, 2558–2559, 2564, 2628, 2827, 2828
Street v. New York [394 U.S. 576 (1969)], 1083, 2855
Streetwatch v. National Railroad Passenger Corp. [875 F. Supp. 1055 (S.D. N.Y. 1995)], 1301
Strickland v. Washington [466 U.S. 668 (1984)], 2043
Strickley v. Highland Boy Gold Mining Co. [200 U.S. 527 (1906)], 2079
Stromberg v. California [283 U.S. 359 (1931)], 179, 284, 1311, 1714, 1788, 2311, 2563, 2630, 2780
Strunk v. United States [412 U.S. 434 (1973)], 2465
Stuart v. Laird [5 U.S. (I Cranch) 299 (1803)], 1498, 1668, 1669, 1684, 2564, 2589
Students Challenging Regulatory Agency Procedures (SCRAP), United States v. [412 U.S. 669 (1973)], 2473, 2475, 2564–2565
Stump v. Sparkman [435 U.S. 349 (1978)], 1335, 1453, 2565
Sturges v. Crowninshield [17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 122 (1819)], 161, 555, 627, 677, 1635, 1673, 1685, 1835–1836, 2565
Sugarman v. Dougall [413 U.S. 634 (1973)], 66, 72, 1068, 2160, 2582–2583
Sullivan, United States v. [332 U.S. 689 (1948)], 1069, 2583
Sullivan v. Little Hunting Park, Inc. [396 U.S. 229 (1969)], 403, 1854
Sumner v. Shuman [483 U.S. 66 (1987)], 2368
Sunshine Anthracite Coal Company v. Adkins [310 U.S. 381 (1940)], 184
Superintendent, Massachusetts Correctional Institution v. Hill [472 U.S. 445 (1985)], 2013, 2033
Superintendent of Belchertown State School v. Saikewicz [370 N.E.2d 417 Mass 728 (1977)], 2268

Supreme Court of Virginia v. Consumers Union of the United States [446 U.S. 714 (1980)], 1591
Sutherland v. Illinois [29 Ill. App. 3d 199 (1976)], 1061
Swain v. Alabama [380 U.S. 202 (1965)], 165, 971, 1509, 1510, 1680, 1898, 2088, 2627, 2728, 2891
Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education [402 U.S. 1 (1971)], 273, 773, 859, 1232, 1459, 1535, 2102, 2111, 2146, 2320, 2627
Swarb v. Lennox [405 U.S. 191 (1972)], 2831
Sweatt v. Painter [330 U.S. 629 (1950)], 253, 388, 2628–2629, 2764, 2792, 2796
Sweezy v. New Hampshire [354 U.S. 234 (1957)], 22, 279, 477, 1595, 1702, 2772, 2866–2867
Swift v. Tyson [41 U.S. 1 (1842)], 220, 360, 466, 921, 977, 1184, 1496, 1559, 1733, 1869, 2555–2556, 2593, 2629, 2648, 2654
Swift & Co. v. United States [196 U.S. 375 (1905)], 252, 455, 861, 1162, 1234, 1540, 1733, 1756, 2413, 2470, 2559–2560, 2629–2630, 2635
Swisher v. Brady [438 U.S. 204 (1978)], 1523
Sylvester, United States v. [C.C. Pa., unreported (1799)], 980
Syracuse Peace Council v. Federal Communications Commission [867 F. 2d 654 (D.C. Cir. 1989)], 969

T

Takahashi v. Fish & Game Commission [334 U.S. 410 (1948)], 66, 129, 131–132, 1077, 1219, 1871, 2642–2643
Talbot v. Janson [311 (3 Dal.) 133 (1795)], 364
Talley v. California [363 U.S. 60 (1960)], 2574
Talton v. Mayes [163 U.S. 376 (1896)], 81
Tarble's Case [80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 397 (1871)], 341, 1037, 1248
Tashjian v. Republican Party of Connecticut [479 U.S. 208 (1986)], 1938–1939, 2008
Taylor v. Alabama [457 U.S. 687 (1982)], 1841
Taylor v. Carry [61 U.S. (20 How.) 583 (1858)], 298
Taylor v. Georgia [315 U.S. 25 (1942)], 286
Taylor v. Louisiana [419 U.S. 522 (1975)], 1196, 1509, 1510, 2391, 2663, 2787
Taylor v. Mississippi [319 U.S. 583 (1943)], 426, 2189
Taylor v. Porter [4 Hill 140 (1843)], 1287
Taylor & Marshall v. Beckham [178 U.S. 548 (1900)], 1950
Teague v. Lane [489 U.S. 288 (1989)], 239, 1253, 1895, 2044, 2156, 2162
Teamsters Local 695 v. Vogt, Inc. [354 U.S. 284 (1957)], 1907
Tennessee v. Davis [100 U.S. 257 (1880)], 445
Tennessee v. Garner [471 U.S. 1 (1985)], 1932, 2338, 2665–2666, 2891 Tennessee v. Scopes [154 Tenn. 105 (1925)], 378, 2327, 2666
Tennessee v. Street [471 U.S. 409 (1985)], 492
Tennessee Coal, Iron & Railroad v. Muscoda Local #123 [321 U.S. 590 (1944)], 967 Tennessee Valley Authority, United States ex rel., v. Welch [327 U.S. 546 (1946)], 889, 2075–2076
Tenney v. Brandhove [341 U.S. 367 (1951)], 1335, 1453, 1558, 1591, 2464, 2667
Tennie v. City of New York Department of Social Services of the New York City Human Resources Administration [W.L. 6156 (S.D. N.Y. 1987)], 2092
Ten Pound Act Cases [New Hampshire, unreported (1786)], 165, 541
Terminiello v. Chicago [337 U.S. 1 (1949)], 426, 767–768, 1031, 2145, 2669, 2795 Terrace v. Thompson [263 U.S. 197 (1923)], 129, 131, 1871 Terrett v. Taylor [13 U.S. (9 Cranch) 43 (1815)], 1175, 1287, 1636, 2280, 2556, 2570, 2649, 2671
Terry v. Adams [345 U.S. 461 (1953)], 1042, 1941, 2007, 2008, 2485, 2492, 2675
Terry v. Ohio [392 U.S. 1 (1968)], 119–120, 205, 937, 956, 1095, 1912, 1913, 2023, 2140, 2331, 2333, 2336, 2337, 2341, 2450, 2552, 2553, 2675–2676, 2767, 2939
Test Oath Cases [4 Wallace 277 (1867); 4 Wallace 333 (1867)], 174, 335, 339, 340, 430, 579, 958
Texas, United States v. [162 U.S. 1 (1892)], 1469
Texas v. Brown [460 U.S. 730 (1983)], 2680
Texas v. Johnson [491 U.S. 397 (1989)], 179, 192, 235, 238, 382, 1053–1054, 1062–1063, 1133, 1530, 2538
Texas v. White [74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 700 (1869)], 336, 339, 340, 580, 746, 999, 1007, 1238, 1424, 1732, 2142, 2143, 2628, 2680, 2680, 2688
Texas & Pacific Railroad Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission [162 U.S. 197 (1896)], 1266
Texas Industries, Inc. v. Radcliff Materials, Inc. [451 U.S. 630 (1981)], 978
Texas Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock [489 U.S. 1 (1989)], 924, 927, 1208, 2193, 2195, 2380, 2680–2681
Textile Workers Union v. Darlington Manufacturing Co. [380 U.S. 263 (1965)], 1548
Textile Workers Union v. Lincoln Mills [383 U.S. 448 (1957)], 1468, 1587
Thiel v. Southern Pacific Co. [316 U.S. 698 (1945)], 1515, 2728
Thind, United States v. [261 U.S. 204 (1923)], 129
Thomas v. Arizona [356 U.S. 390 (1958)], 2902
Thomas v. Collins [323 U.S. 516 (1945)], 1549, 1628, 1990, 2302
Thomas v. Review Board of Indiana [450 U.S. 707 (1981)], 2174, 2188, 2192, 2696
Thomas v. Union Carbide Agricultural Products Co. [473 U.S. 568 (1985)], 2697
Thompson v. Consolidated Gas Utilities Corp. [300 U.S. 55 (1937)], 1175
Thompson v. Louisville [362 U.S. 199 (1960)], 109
Thompson v. Oklahoma [487 U.S. 815 (1988)], 1843, 2369, 2698–2699
Thornburg v. Gingles [478 U.S. 30 (1986)], 869, 1188, 2093, 2136, 2811, 2814
Thornburgh v. Abbott [490 U.S. 401 (1989)], 1134
Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists [476 U.S. 747 (1986)], 192, 196, 2451, 2699, 2892
Thornhill v. Alabama [310 U.S. 88 (1940)], 426, 1192, 1317, 1400, 1550, 1555, 1556, 1769, 1866, 1907, 2699, 2795

Thornton v. Caldor, Inc. [472 U.S. 703 (1985)], 2193, 2195, 2377, 2585, 2699
Thorpe v. Rutland Railroad [26 Verm. 140 (1854)], 2507
Tidal Oil Co. v. Flanagan [263 U.S. 444 (1924)], 676
Tileston v. Ullman [318 U.S. 44 (1943)], 1233
Tilton v. Richardson [403 U.S. 372 (1971)], 1207, 2374–2375
Time, Incorporated v. Firestone [424 U.S. (1976)], 2067
Time, Incorporated v. Hill [385 U.S. 374 (1967)], 260, 1107, 1109, 1237, 1270, 2014 Times-Mirror Company v. California [314 U.S. 252 (1941)], 244
Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party [520 U.S. 351 (1997), 1886, 1938, 2701–2702
Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District [393 U.S. 503 (1969)], 351, 353, 854, 855, 860, 1082, 1281, 2630–2631, 2702–2703, 2854
Tison v. Arizona [481 U.S. 137 (1987)], 306, 2368
Tollett v. Henderson [411 U.S. 258 (1953)], 2265
Tomanio v. Board of Regents [446 U.S. 478 (1980)], 403
Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor [471 U.S. 290 (1985)], 2192, 2380
Toomer v. Witsell [334 U.S. 385 (1948)], 157, 1212, 2020, 2705, 2792
Torcaso v. Watkins [367 U.S. 488 (1961)], 2188, 2190, 2197, 2706, 2833
Toscanino, United States v. [398 F. Supp. 916 (1974)], 959
Toth, United States ex rel., v. Quarles [350 U.S. 11 (1955)], 1018, 1247, 1727, 2710
Town of . . . See name inverted, e.g., West Hartford (Town of) v. Operation Rescue Townsend v. Sain [372 U.S. 293 (1963)], 2710–2711
Townsend v. Swank [404 U.S. 282 (1971)], 2877
Trade-Mark Cases [100 U.S. 82 (1879)], 2826
Trafficante v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Company [409 U.S. 205 (1972)], 323, 2221
Trans-Missouri Freight Association, United States v. [166 U.S. 290 (1897)], 320, 429, 783, 1244, 1711, 1828, 2298, 2413, 2714–2715, 2895, 2898
Trans-World Airlines, Inc. v. Hardison [432 U.S. 63 (1977)], 405
Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab. See National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab
Trebilock v. Wilson [79 U.S. (12 Wall.) 687 (1872)], 1753
Tregor's Case [Y.B. Pasch., 8 Edw. III, pl. 26 (1334)], 208
Treigle v. Acme Homestead Association [297 U.S. 189 (1936)], 2510
Trenton (City of) v. New Jersey [262 U.S. 182 (1923)], 362, 1211
Trevett v. Weeden [Rhode Island (1786)], 541, 2602, 2723–2724
Trial of the Seven Bishops [How. St. Tr. 12:183 (1688)], 2272
Trimble v. Gordon [430 U.S. 762 (1977)], 1326, 1558, 2153, 2155, 2160, 2732–2733
Trono v. United States [199 U.S. 521 (1905)], 1376
Trop v. Dulles [356 U.S. 86 (1958)], 309, 721, 730, 731, 2041, 2733, 2851, 2902 Truax v. Corrigan [257 U.S. 312 (1921)], 1547, 1548, 1911, 2029, 2635, 2636, 2638, 2640, 2733
Truax v. Raich [239 U.S. 33 (1915)], 1310
Trupiano v. United States [334 U.S. 699 (1948)], 119, 1769, 2344
Tucker, United States v. [404 U.S. 443 (1972)], 2367
Tumey v. Ohio [273 U.S. 510 (1927)], 970, 2640–2641
Turkette, United States v. [452 U.S. 576 (1981)], 2111
Turner, In re [455 U.S. 1009 (1867)], 335, 336, 341, 2424
Turner v. Department of Employment Security [423 U.S. 44 (1975)], 2394
Turner v. Fouche [396 U.S. 346 (1970)], 2728
Turner v. Murray [476 U.S. 28 (1986)], 2106
Turner v. Safley [482 U.S. 78 (1987)], 1134, 2012
Turner Broadcasting System v. FCC [512 U.S. 622 (1994)], 249, 469, 691, 969, 1772, 2739–2740
Turner Broadcasting System v. FCC [520 U.S. 180 (1997)], 249, 691, 1147, 1531
Turpin v. Mailet [2d Cir., en banc, 1978-1979], 514
Twining v. New Jersey [211 U.S. 78 (1908)], 33, 256, 1354, 1665, 1756, 1874, 2233, 2237, 2744
Two Guys from Harrison-Allentown, Inc. v. McGinley [366 U.S. 852 (1961)], 2191, 2584 Tyler v. Defrees [78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 331 (1870)], 1732
Tyler Pipe Industries, Inc. v. Washington State Department of Revenue [483 U.S. 232 (1987)], 806 Tyson & Brother v. Banton [273 U.S. 418 (1927)], 52, 838, 1115, 1802, 2230, 2311, 2746

U

Ullmann v. United States [350 U.S. 422 (1956)], 989, 1334, 2233, 2236, 2747
"Ulysses," One Book Entitled, United States v. [5 F. Supp. 182 (1933)], 2747–2748
Umbehr v. Heiser [518 U.S. 668 (1996)], 1886
UMW Post, Inc. v. Board of Regents of Wisconsin [774 F. Supp. 1163 (E.D. Wisc. 1991)], 2926
Underhill v. Hernandez [168 U.S. 250 (1897)], 25
Union Pacific Railroad Co. v. Peniston [85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 5 (1873)], 217
Union Pacific Railroad Co. v. United States [99 U.S. 700 (1879)], 2419–2420
United Building and Construction Trades Council of Camden County and Vicinity v. Mayor and Council of the City of Camden [465 U.S. 208 (1984)], 363, 1212, 1798, 2020, 2468
United Jewish Organization of Williamsburgh, Inc. v. Carey [430 U.S. 144 (1977)], 794, 1188, 2135, 2137, 2202, 2756, 2813
United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co. [359 U.S. 344 (1922)], 422, 2756–2757
United Mine Workers v. Gibbs [383 U.S. 715 (1966)], 1466
United Mine Workers v. Pennington [381 U.S. 657 (1965)], 1545, 1546

United Mine Workers v. United States [330 U.S. 258 (1947)], 2757, 2792, 2793
United Public Workers v. Mitchell [330 U.S. 75 (1947)], 1275, 2145, 2278, 2795 United Railways & Electric Co. of Baltimore v. West [280 U.S. 234 (1930)], 970, 2758
United Shoe Machinery Co., United States v. [247 U.S. 32 (1918)], 421, 2298
United States v. . . . See case name inverted, e.g., Nixon, United States v.
United States & Canada Express Company, State v. See State v. United States & Canada Express Company
United States Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers [413 U.S. 548 (1973)], 251, 268, 1275
United States Coin & Currency, United States v. [401 U.S. 715 (1971)], 1670
United States Department of Agriculture v. Moreno [413 U.S. 528 (1973)], 428
United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, United States v. [407 U.S. 297 (1972)], 649, 873, 875, 1129, 1781, 1816, 2345, 2449, 2761–2762, 2842
United States ex rel. Toth v. Quarles. See Toth, United States ex rel., v. Quarles
United States Glue Co. v. Town of Oak Creek [247 U.S. 321 (1918)], 2521–2522
United States Postal Service v. Greenburgh Civic Association [453 U.S. 114 (1981)], 1900
United States Railroad Retirement Board v. Fritz [449 U.S. 166 (1980)], 193, 2122, 2536, 2572
United States Steel Corporation, United States v. [251 U.S. 417 (1920)], 421, 749, 2298, 2898
United States Term Limits v. Thornton [514 U.S. 779 (1995)], 76, 624, 989, 1531, 2537, 2670
United States Trust Co. of New York v. New Jersey [431 U.S. 1 (1977)], 70, 676, 677, 1381, 1836, 2665, 2766
United Steelworkers of America v. Weber [443 U.S. 193 (1979)], 53, 54, 55, 100, 397, 406, 945, 1172, 1435, 2153, 2155, 2766
Uphaus v. Wyman [360 U.S. 72 (1959)], 187, 1595, 2772, 2903
Ursery, United States v. [518 U.S. 267 (1996)], 811, 985
Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co. [428 U.S. 1(1976)], 2226

V

Vale v. Louisiana [399 U.S. 30 (1970)], 1820, 2332
Valentine v. Chrestensen [316 U.S. 52 (1942)], 460
Vallandigham, Ex parte [68 (1 Wall.) 243 (1864)], 338, 416, 430, 746, 1736, 2628, 2777, 2868 Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United for Separation of Church and State [454 U.S. 464 (1982)], 1067, 1443, 2659, 2662, 2777–2778
Vance v. Bradley [440 U.S. 93 (1979)], 59
Vance v. Terrazas [440 U.S. 970 (1980)], 957
Van Horne's Lessee v. Dorrance [2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 304 (1795)], 290, 360, 673, 1067, 1883, 2603, 2781, 2782
Van Huffel v. Harkelrode [283 U.S. 817 (1931)], 161
Vanzant v. Waddel [2 Yeng. (Tenn.) 260 (1829)], 2510
Vasquez v. Hillery [474 U.S. 254 (1986)], 1223
Veazie Bank v. Fenno [75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 533 (1869)], 151, 340, 784, 1753, 1790, 2658, 2781–2782
Vegelahn v. Guntner [167 Mass. 92 (1869)], 1547
Ventresca, United States v. [380 U.S. 102 (1965)], 1368, 2330
Verdugo-Urquídez, United States v. [494 U.S. 259 (1990)], 960, 1332, 2338
Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Corp. v. Natural Resources Defense Council [435 U.S. 519 (1978)], 2312
Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton [515 U.S. 646 (1995)], 331, 826–827, 2456 Village of . . . See name inverted, e.g., Euclid (Village of) v. Ambler Realty Company
Virginia, Ex parte [100 U.S. 339 (1880)], 2482, 2558–2559, 2564
Virginia, United States v. [518 U.S. 515 (1996)], 400, 917, 1197, 1824, 2092, 2170, 2307, 2398, 2404, 2418, 2456, 2798
Virginia v. Browner [80 F. 3d 869 (4th Cir. 1996)], 904
Virginia v. Rives [100 U.S. 313 (1880)], 403, 1787, 2558–2559, 2564
Virginia v. Tennessee [148 U.S. 503 (1893)], 1072, 1399
Virginia v. West Virginia [78 U.S. (11 Wall.) 39 (1870)], 340, 746
Virginia v. West Virginia [206 U.S. 290 (1907)], 877
Virginia Coupon Cases (1885), 1227
Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens' Consumer Council [425 U.S. 748 (1976)], 165, 190, 193, 194, 461, 462, 836, 1060, 1135, 1628, 2157, 2350–2351, 2800–2801
Vitek v. Jones [445 U.S. 480 (1980)], 492
Vlandis v. Kline [412 U.S. 441 (1973)], 1405, 2277, 2802
Voinovich v. Quilter [507 U.S. 146 (1993)], 2137
Von Moltke v. Gillies [332 U.S. 708 (1948)], 1436
Von's Grocery Co., United States v. [384 U.S. 270 (1966)], 2542

W

Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway v. Illinois [118 U.S. 557 (1886)], 455, 846, 1227, 1397, 1698, 2817
Wabol v. Villacrusis [958 F. 2d 1450 (9th Cir. 1992)], 2672
Wade, United States v. [388 U.S. 218 (1967)], 235, 492, 962, 1083, 1538, 1627, 1852, 2264, 2818
Wagner Act Cases (1937), 349, 692, 743, 1266, 1311, 2677
Wainwright v. Sykes [433 U.S. 72 (1977)], 18, 35, 239, 975, 1101, 1758, 2156, 2764, 2821, 2831
Wainwright v. Witt [469 U.S. 412 (1985)], 2803
Walder v. United States [347 U.S. 62 (1954)], 1273, 2045, 2335
Wales v. Stetson [2 Mass. 142 (1806)], 673
Waley v. Johnston [316 U.S. 101 (1942)], 1248
Walker v. Birmingham [388 U.S. 307 (1967)], 2832
Walker v. Jennison [Mass., unreported (1781)], 467

Walker v. Sauvinet [92 U.S. 90 (1876)], 2724, 2832
Wallace v. Jaffree [472 U.S. 38 (1985)], 859, 924, 1602, 1603, 1842, 1843, 2157, 2174, 2177, 2193, 2322–2323, 2323, 2373, 2832–2833
Wallace v. Van Riswick [92 U.S. 202 (1872)], 134
Wallace & Tiernan Company, United States v. [336 U.S. 793 (1949)], 186
Waller v. Florida [397 U.S. 387 (1970)], 809
Waller v. Georgia [467 U.S. 39 (1984)], 1152
Walter v. United States [447 U.S. 649 (1980)], 2332
Walters v. National Association of Radiation Survivors [473 U.S. 305 (1985)], 2033
Walton v. Arizona [497 U.S. 639 (1990)], 2535
Walz v. Tax Commission [397 U.S. 664 (1970)], 464, 1206, 1207, 2191, 2373–2374, 2833
Ward, United States v. [449 U.S. 851 (1980)], 902
Ward v. Illinois [431 U.S. 767 (1977)], 2833
Ward v. Rock Against Racism [491 U.S. 781 (1989)], 2167–2168
Ward v. Texas [316 U.S. 547 (1942)], 1924
Warden v. Hayden [387 U.S. 294 (1967)], 956, 1722, 1913, 2339, 2344, 2345, 2767, 2833–2834, 2834 Warder v. La Belle Creole [1 Pet. Adm. 31, 29 F. Cas. 215 (No. 17, 165) (1792)], 1902
Wardius v. Oregon [412 U.S. 470 (1973)], 971
Wards Cove Packing Co. v. Antonio [490 U.S. 642 (1989)], 99, 396, 407–408, 2107, 2164, 2890
Ware v. Hylton [3 U.S. (3 Dallas) 199 (1796)], 336, 1284, 1404, 1418, 1883, 2603, 2611, 2834
Waring v. Clarke [46 U.S. (5 How.) 441 (1847)], 2867, 2923
Warth v. Seldin [422 U.S. 490 (1975)], 70, 275, 1464, 1975, 1977, 2220, 2417, 2474–2475, 2565
Washington v. Davis [426 U.S. 229 (1976)], 96, 116, 395, 400, 446, 911, 992, 1232, 1401, 1510, 1875, 1902, 2102, 2164, 2220–2221, 2392, 2862–2863, 2869, 2887, 2890
Washington v. Glucksberg [521 U.S. 702 (1997)], 2057, 2269–2270, 2307, 2577–2578
Washington v. Harper [494 U.S. 210 (1990)], 790, 1530, 1720, 1884, 1885, 2061, 2863
Washington v. Seattle School District No. 1 [458 U.S. 457 (1982)], 122, 706, 785, 786, 1637
Washington v. Texas [388 U.S. 14 (1967)], 479–480, 933
Waters v. Churchill [511 U.S. 661 (1994)], 892, 2866
Watkins v. United States [354 U.S. 178 (1957)], 163, 421, 1305, 1595, 1702, 2237, 2384, 2866–2867
Watson, United States v. [423 U.S. 411 (1976)], 119, 121, 2332, 2333
Watson v. Jones [80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 679 (1872)], 2190
Watts, United States v. [519 U.S. 148 (1997)], 811
Watts v. United States [394 U.S. 705 (1969)], 1153
Waugh v. Board of Trustees of the University of Mississippi [237 U.S. 589 (1915)], 1109
Wayman v. Southard [23 U.S. (10 Wheat.) 1 (1825)], 760
Wayte v. United States [470 U.S. 598 (1985)], 2868–2869
Weatherford v. Bursey [429 U.S. 545 (1977)], 793
Weaver v. Graham [450 U.S. 24 (1981)], 958
Weaver v. Palmer Bros. Co. [270 U.S. 402 (1924)], 284
Weber v. Aetna Casualty and Surety Company [406 U.S. 164 (1972)], 2155
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services [492 U.S. 490 (1989)], 6–7, 9, 11, 12, 93, 192, 196, 381, 625, 1530, 1843, 2078, 2158, 2313, 2454, 2576, 2872, 2892
Weeks v. United States [232 U.S. 383 (1914)], 61, 355, 882, 936, 956, 1092, 1667, 2334, 2335, 2339, 2340, 2343, 2416, 2417, 2766, 2768, 2872–2873
Weems v. United States [217 U.S. 349 (1910)], 730, 731, 1376, 2873
Weinberger v. Salfi [422 U.S. 749 (1975)], 1405, 2445, 2802
Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld [420 U.S. 636 (1975)], 1196, 1587, 2391–2392, 2393, 2445
Weiner v. United States [357 U.S. 349 (1958)], 2149
Weiss v. United States [510 U.S. 163 (1994)], 2386
Welsh v. United States [398 U.S. 333 (1970)], 505, 2173, 2193, 2790
Welsh v. Wisconsin [466 U.S. 740 (1984)], 2881
Welton v. Missouri [91 U.S. 275 (1876)], 2521
Wengler v. Druggists Mutual Insurance Co. [446 U.S. 142 (1980)], 2392, 2881
Wesberry v. Sanders [376 U.S. 1 (1964)], 186, 440, 500, 865, 1227, 1306, 1462, 2133, 2881
Wessman v. Gittens [160 F. 3d 790 (1st Cir. 1998)], 57
West v. Atkins [487 U.S. 42 (1988)], 2018
West Coast Hotel Company v. Parrish [300 U.S. 379 (1937)], 15, 317, 692, 698, 743, 797, 838, 845, 1034, 1116, 1296, 1311, 1313–1314, 1547, 1699, 1714–1715, 1869, 2281, 2289, 2572, 2575, 2752, 2881–2882, 2921
Western Air Lines, Inc. v. Criswell [472 U.S. 400 (1985)], 59
Western Livestock v. Bureau of Revenue [303 U.S. 250 (1938)], 2522
West Hartford (Town of) v. Operation Rescue [915 F. 2d 92, 103 (. 2d Cir. 1990)], 2112
West Lynn Creamery, Inc. v. Healy [512 U.S. 186 (1994)], 806, 2494, 2495, 2518
Weston, United States v. [448 F. 2d 626 (9th Cir. 1971)], 2367
Weston v. City Council of Charleston [27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 449 (1829)], 1384, 1686, 2882
West River Bridge Co. v. Dix [47 U.S. (6 How.) 507 (1848)], 675–676, 742, 887–888, 2074, 2653, 2783, 2868, 2882–2883
Westside Community Schools v. Mergens. See Board of Education of the Westside Community Schools v. Mergens
West Virginia ex rel. Dyer v. Sims [341 U.S. 22 (1951)], 901
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette [319 U.S. 624 (1943)], 313, 426, 814, 855, 858, 1064–1066, 2186, 2188, 2302, 2545–2546, 2574
Whalen v. Roe [429 U.S. 589 (1977)], 482, 800, 2242, 2243, 2245, 2574, 2883
Wheaton v. Peters [33 U.S. (8 Pet.) 591 (1834)], 685, 977, 1712, 2698, 2883
Wheeler, United States v. [4 U.S. 313 (1978)], 80
Wheeler v. Greene [280 U.S. 49 (1979)], 2498
Wheeler et al., United States v. [254 F. 611 (1912)], 1763

Whitcomb v. Chavis [403 U.S. 124 (1971)], 1765, 2862
White, United States v. [401 U.S. 745 (1971)], 711–712, 873, 875, 1853, 2140, 2236, 2333–2334, 2334, 2896, 2896–2897
White v. Hart [80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 646 (1872)], 339, 340
White v. Massachusetts Council of Construction Employers [460 U.S. 204 (1983)], 363
White v. Regester [412 U.S. 755 (1973)], 1665, 1765, 2093, 2134, 2814, 2862
White v. Texas [310 U.S. 530 (1940)], 1924
White v. Weiser [412 U.S. 783 (1973)], 1665
Whiteley v. Warden [401 U.S. 560 (1971)], 2023
Whitney v. California [274 U.S. 357 (1927)], 221, 222, 226, 426, 427, 723, 724, 1050, 1107, 1959, 2311, 2319, 2580, 2582, 2901–2902
Whren v. United States [517 U.S. 806 (1996)], 1097–1098, 2711
Wickard v. Filburn [317 U.S. 111 (1942)], 62, 459, 460, 524, 601, 744, 835, 846, 847, 861, 862, 1192, 1345, 1346, 1396, 1399, 1410, 1549, 1715, 1778, 2046, 2293, 2481, 2549, 2903–2904
Widmar v. Vincent [454 U.S. 263 (1981)], 169, 203, 906, 926, 1560, 2173, 2177, 2193, 2198, 2323, 2372, 2904
Wieman v. Updegraff [344 U.S. 183 (1952)], 187, 421, 892, 1648, 1649–1650, 2066, 2749, 2904
Wiener v. United States [357 U.S. 249 (1958)], 1319
Wilkes v. Wood [19 St.Tr. 1153 (1763)], 1099, 2905
Wilkes Cases [19 How. St. Tr. (1763-1770)], 872, 1186, 1771, 1781, 1912, 2236, 2766, 2905
Wilkinson v. Leland [27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 627 (1829)], 2649, 2783
Wilkinson v. United States [365 U.S. 399 (1961)], 1305
Will v. Michigan Department of State Police [491 U.S. 58 (1989)], 1529
William, The, United States v. [28 F. Cas. 614 (D. Mass. 1808)], 885
Williams v. Florida [399 U.S. 78 (1970)], 830, 1434, 1516, 1517, 1887, 2443, 2727, 2906
Williams v. Georgia [349 U.S. 375 (1955)], 420
Williams v. Mississippi [170 U.S. 213 (1898)], 1629, 2906–2907
Williams v. New York [337 U.S. 241 (1949)], 2367
Williams v. North Carolina [317 U.S. 287 (1942)], 799, 1269
Williams v. Rhodes [393 U.S. 23 (1968)], 158, 872, 1942, 2701
Williams v. United States [189 U.S. 516 (1933)], 419
Williams v. Vermont [472 U.S. 14 (1985)], 2277, 2907
Williamson v. Lee Optical Company [348 U.S. 483 (1955)], 4, 835–836, 839, 840, 1381, 2542, 2907
Willow River Power Co., United States v. [324 U.S. 499 (1945)], 2054, 2783
Willson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co. [27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 245 (1829)], 1686, 2817, 2908
Wilson, Ex parte [114 U.S. 417 (1885)], 1031
Wilson v. Garcia [471 U.S. 261 (1985)], 1844
Wilson v. New [243 U.S. 332 (1917)], 33, 421, 748, 1699, 2912
Wilson v. Seiter [501 U.S. 294 (1991)], 654
Wilton v. Seven Falls Co. [515 U.S. 277 (1995)], 20
Winona and St. Peter Railroad v. Blake [94 U.S. 180 (1877)], 1224–1225
Winship, In re [397 U.S. 358 (1970)], 238, 264, 718, 816, 1184, 1355, 1523, 2041, 2139, 2255, 2912
Winston v. Lee [470 U.S. 753 (1985)], 206, 1094–1095, 2338, 2767–2768
Winters v. New York [333 U.S. 507 (1948)], 2794
Winthrop v. Larkin [421 U.S. 35 (1975)], 2149
Wiscart v. D'Auchy [3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 321 (1796)], 882, 2617
Wisconsin v. Mitchell [508 U.S. 476 (1993)], 1276, 1278, 2124, 2913–2914
Wisconsin v. New York [517 U.S. 1 (1996)], 326
Wisconsin v. Yoder [406 U.S. 205 (1972)], 270–271, 353, 506, 854, 858, 894, 895, 974, 1049, 2174, 2181–2182, 2187, 2192, 2194, 2377, 2914
Witherspoon v. Illinois [391 U.S. 510 (1968)], 2442, 2803
Withrow v. Williams [507 U.S. 680 (1993)], 2456
Witte v. United States [515 U.S. 389 (1995)], 811
Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind [474 U.S. 481 (1986)], 61, 924, 926, 1208, 1209, 1604, 2322, 2378, 2916–2917
Wittmer v. Peters [87 F. 3d 916 (7th Cir. 1996)], 57
Wolf v. Colorado [338 U.S. 25 (1949)], 882, 936, 1405, 1462, 1666, 1870, 2038–2039, 2224, 2334, 2416, 2796, 2917
Wolff v. McDonnell [418 U.S. 539 (1974)], 492, 897, 2011, 2012, 2013
Wolff Packing Co. v. Court of Industrial Relations [262 U.S. 522 (1923)], 52, 1115, 2281, 2635, 2639, 2746, 2917
Wolman v. Walter [433 U.S. 229 (1977)], 349, 2375, 2917
Women's Medical Professional Corporation v. Voinovich [130 F. 3d 187 (6th Cir. 1997)], 14
Wong Kim Ark, In re [71 F. 282 (1897)], 1763
Wong Kim Ark, United States v. [169 U.S. 649 (1898)], 129, 131, 367, 1167, 1227, 1763, 2922
Wong Sun v. United States [371 U.S. 471 (1963)], 121, 1157, 2330, 2336, 2417, 2922
Wong Wing v. United States [163 U.S. 228 (1896)], 1329, 1330, 2414
Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath [339 U.S. 33 (1950)], 266
Wood v. Lovett [313 U.S. 362 (1941)], 677
Wood v. Strickland [420 U.S. 308 (1975)], 944, 2319, 2922
Woodruff v. Parham [75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 123 (1869)], 341, 1864, 2923
Woods v. Cloyd W. Miller Company [333 U.S. 138 (1948)], 2924
Woodson v. North Carolina [428 U.S. 280 (1976)], 301, 310–312
Wooley v. Maynard [430 U.S. 705 (1977)], 2574
Woolmington v. D.P. [A.C.462 (English) (1935)], 718
Wooster v. Plymouth [51 N.H. 193 (1882)], 802
Worcester v. Georgia [31 U.S. (6 Pet.) 515 (1832)], 81, 325, 343–345, 1408, 1535, 1612, 1685, 1712, 2698
Worrall, United States v. [2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 384 (1798)], 337, 980, 1902
Worthen Co. v. Kavanaugh [295 U.S. 56 (1935)], 677

Wright v. Deacon [5 Serg. & R. 62 (Penn., 1819)], 1159
Wright v. Rockefeller [376 U.S. 52 (1965)], 1188, 2202
Wright v. United States [302 U.S. 583 (1938)], 1921, 2784
Wright v. Vinton Branch of Mountain Trust Bank of Roanoke [300 U.S. 440 (1937)], 161, 1105, 1175, 1645, 2932
Wrightwood Dairy Co., United States v. [315 U.S. 110 (1942)], 63, 2415, 2932–2933
Wurts v. Hoagland [114 U.S. 606 (1885)], 1227
Wyatt v. Aderholt [503 F. 2d 1305 (5th Cir. 1974)], 789
Wyatt v. Stickney [344 F. Supp. 387 (1971)], 1374
Wygant v. Jackson Board of Education [476 U.S. 267 (1986)], 55, 57, 915, 1435, 1723, 1843, 1978, 2106, 2398, 2536–2537, 2538, 2933–2934
Wyman v. James [400 U.S. 309 (1971)], 42, 192, 2468, 2767, 2934
Wynehamer v. People of New York [13 N.Y. 378 (1856)], 562, 844, 1572, 2050, 2409, 2649, 2934–2935

Y

Yakus v. United States [321 U.S. 414 (1944)], 886, 887, 2841, 2937
Yamashita, In re [327 U.S. 1 (1947)], 2302, 2931, 2937–2938
Yamataya v. Fisher [189 U.S. 86 (1903)], 129
Yarbrough, Ex parte [110 U.S. 651 (1884)], 423, 1041, 1733, 1940, 2823, 2825, 2938
Yasui v. United States [320 U.S. 115 (1943)], 129
Yates v. United States [354 U.S. 298 (1957)], 68, 187, 226, 427, 428, 511, 709, 769, 770, 815, 1109, 1198, 1296, 1870–1871, 2581, 2867, 2938–2939
Ybarra v. Illinois [444 U.S. 85 (1979)], 2023–2024, 2939
Yerger, Ex parte [75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 85 (1869)], 339, 340, 1256, 1701
Yick Wo v. Hopkins [118 U.S. 356 (1886)], 129, 130, 368, 388, 907, 1038, 1167, 1331, 1698, 2059, 2828, 2829, 2939–2940
Yonkers Board of Education, United States v. [486 U.S. 1055 (1987)], 2221
Young, Ex parte [209 U.S. 123 (1908)], 652, 739, 853, 877, 878–879, 880, 904, 1166, 1167, 1217, 1343, 1373, 1504, 1739, 1893, 2349, 2504, 2940
Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc. [427 U.S. 50 (1976)], 1048, 1236, 1839, 2529, 2776–2777, 2940
Young v. Miller [883 F. 2d 1276 (6th Cir. 1989)], 822
Young v. New York City Transit Authority [903 F. 2d 146 (2d Cir. 1990)], 1301
Youngberg v. Romeo [457 U.S. 307 (1982)], 729, 1718–1719, 1721, 1885, 2061
Younger v. Harris [401 U.S. 37 (1971)], 18, 275, 447, 803, 1008, 1373, 1375, 1750, 1865, 2280, 2284, 2940–2941
Youngstown Sheet & Tube Company v. Sawyer [343 U.S. 579 (1952)], 185, 279, 377, 420, 433, 649, 748, 951, 1010, 1344, 1347, 1569, 1995, 1996, 2145, 2384, 2448, 2460, 2592, 2735, 2792, 2793, 2839, 2842, 2843, 2844, 2941

Z

Zablocki v. Redhail [434 U.S. 374 (1978)], 799, 1118, 1123, 1671–1672, 1724, 2307, 2573, 2943
Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co. [433 U.S. 562 (1977)], 686, 1377, 2014
Zant v. Stephens [462 U.S. 862 (1983)], 303
Zemel v. Rusk [381 U.S. 1 (1965)], 1950, 2146, 2276, 2943
Zenger's Case [New York (1735)], 180, 374, 1138, 1260, 1512, 1870, 1897, 2352–2353, 2944
Zicarelli v. Dietz [406 U.S. 472 (1980)], 2787
Zinermon v. Burch [494 U.S. 113 (1990)], 2035
Zobel v. Williams [457 U.S. 55 (1982)], 428, 1812, 2020, 2275–2276, 2277, 2305, 2907
Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District [509 U.S. 1 (1993)], 61, 1209, 1604, 2456
Zorach v. Clausen [343 U.S. 306 (1952)], 24, 1704, 2145, 2171–2172, 2371, 2372, 2795
Zschernig v. Miller [389 U.S. 429 (1968)], 25, 1073, 1390 Zurcher v. Stanford Daily [436 U.S. 547 (1978)], 1143, 1722, 1822, 2200, 2890, 2947–2948

Name Index

Numbers in boldface refer to the main entry on the subject.

A

Abraham, Kenneth, 627
Abrams, Jacob, 1710
Acheson, Dean, 1101
Ackerman, Bruce, 77, 524, 525, 659–660, 764, 1291, 1826, 2174
Acton, John, 376
Adair, Douglas, 1260
Adams, Charles Francis, 3
Adams, Henry, 26, 665, 676
Adams, John, 26–30, 30, 32, 65, 67, 125, 228, 337, 489, 515, 534, 549, 550, 551, 697, 705, 737, 752, 755, 836, 883, 954, 1016, 1034, 1058, 1156, 1174, 1257, 1418, 1419, 1420, 1423, 1424, 1497, 1610, 1667, 1673, 1681, 1695, 1756, 1866, 1883, 1934, 1963, 2297, 2499, 2579, 2590, 2600, 2601, 2609, 2662, 2785, 2805, 2837, 2860, 2862
Adams, John Quincy, 29, 30–31, 162, 288, 289, 291, 385, 416, 424, 556, 557, 559, 560, 563, 564, 728, 866, 867, 1408, 1412, 1425, 1684, 1712, 1754, 1755, 2001, 2119, 2131, 2554, 2555, 2590, 2611, 2656, 2687, 2700, 2732, 2805, 2884, 2913
Adams, Samuel, 26, 31–32, 85, 1284, 1323, 1664, 1694–1695, 2347, 2781
Addams, Jane, 78
Agee, Philip, 1256–1257
Agnew, Spiro T., 609
Agresto, John, 1459
Akerman, Ames T., 134, 1225
Alberdi, Juan Bautista, 1367
Albright, Madeleine, 2003
Alexander, James, 2944
Allen, Florence, 2612, 2763
Allen, William B., 93
Althusius, Johannes, 634
Alvarez-Machain, Humberto, 71
Amar, Akhil, 1503
Ambrose, Spenser, 1897–1898
Ames, Fisher, 32, 88
Ames, James Barr, 1101
Amory, Rufus G., 2611
Amsterdam, Anthony, 1093
Andros, Sir Edmund, 2183
Annan, Kofi, 2003
Anne, Queen of England, 532
Anthony, Susan Brownell, 91–92, 370, 1092, 1319, 2477, 2806–2808, 2918
Aquinas, Thomas, 369
Archer, Sir John, 1338
Arenella, Peter, 2240
Aristide, Jean-Bertrand, 2003
Aristotle, 185, 343, 634, 668, 1946, 1949, 2297, 2346 Armstrong, Scott, 508
Arnold, Richard S., 1440
Arnold, Thurman, 119, 435, 453, 665
Arrow, Kenneth, 870
Arthur, Chester A., 121, 198, 240, 504, 1164, 1182, 2001–2002, 2786
Ashley, James, 2540
Attucks, Crispus, 2431
Augustine, Saint, 374
Austin, John, 2462

B

Bache, Benjamin, 980
Backus, Isaac, 145
Bacon, Augustus O., 930
Bailey, Gamaliel, 3
Bailyn, Bernard, 1323
Baker, George F., 1594
Baker, Howard, 1402
Bakke, Allan, 54, 1978
Baldridge, Homer, 2735
Baldwin, Abraham, 155–156, 1611, 2682

Baldwin, Henry, 157, 344, 360, 1238, 1412, 1686, 2555, 2651
Baldwin, Roger N., 78, 157, 921, 2324
Ballinger, Richard A., 219
Bancroft, George, 159, 443
Barber, Benjamin, 1947
Barbour, Philip P., 162, 557, 1412, 1700, 2652
Barker, Ernest, 1563
Barrett, Edward, 2516
Bassett, Richard, 164
Bates, Edward, 164, 886
Bator, Paul, 1502
Batson, James, 165
Bayard, James A., 2362
Beale, Robert, 1098
Beard, Charles A., 159, 166–167, 452, 528, 545, 754, 834, 1380, 1660, 1711, 2047
Beauvoir, Simone de, 907
Beck, James M., 452
Becker, Frank J., 167
Beckley, John, 1058
Bedford, Gunning, Jr., 48, 544
Beer, Lawrence Ward, 1365
Begin, Menachem, 320
Belknap, William, 319
Bell, Derrick, 2222
Bell, Griffin B., 135, 1359
Bell, John, 747
Bellah, Robert, 665
Belz, Herman, 776
Benjamin, Judah P., 2884, 2914
Bennett, Robert, 127
Bentham, Jeremy, 526, 1387, 2053
Bentley, Arthur, 2047
Benton, Thomas Hart, 169, 704, 1161, 1412
Berger, Raoul, 631, 952, 1086, 1860, 1861, 2754
Berkeley, John, 1799–1800
Berle, Adolph, 591
Berlin, Isaiah, 2778
Berns, Walter, 895
Bernstein, Richard, 1984
Beveridge, Albert J., 171, 841, 1669, 1705, 1706, 1707
Bickel, Alexander M., 113, 173, 365, 453, 632, 655, 658, 661, 767, 912, 1086, 1477, 1478, 1542, 1587, 1634, 1760, 1792, 2244, 2491, 2525, 2635, 2713–2714
Biddle, Francis, 65, 173, 1416, 2290, 2930
Biddle, Nicholas, 160
Biden, Joseph, 209, 1813, 1814
Bingham, John A., 4, 178, 180–181, 1085, 1088, 1091, 1357, 1528, 2425
Bin Laden, Osama, 2003
Binney, Horace, 181, 2611
Birney, James G., 3, 181–182, 334, 560
Bivens, Webster, 185
Black, Charles, 1502, 1792
Black, Charles L., Jr., 255, 630, 1792, 1861, 2108, 2490
Black, Hugo L., 1, 17, 33, 34, 59, 65, 70, 104, 112, 116, 118, 131–132, 157, 164, 166, 168, 179, 185, 185–188, 201, 204, 226, 244, 253, 276, 279, 280, 317, 381, 383, 420, 427, 440, 441, 458, 603, 604, 667, 696, 699, 710, 720, 739, 769, 786, 787, 807, 814, 815, 816, 830, 838–839, 855–856, 861, 896, 906, 927, 929, 930, 931, 959, 960, 970, 1008, 1034, 1065, 1082, 1086, 1101, 1102, 1103, 1106, 1139, 1140, 1149, 1175, 1192, 1194, 1213, 1231, 1232, 1233, 1235, 1236, 1240, 1256, 1269, 1271, 1288, 1289, 1320, 1355, 1410, 1411, 1415, 1417, 1436, 1447, 1450, 1527, 1538, 1565, 1585–1586, 1591, 1645, 1672, 1702, 1704, 1709, 1716–1717, 1769, 1806, 1810, 1820, 1849, 1856, 1864–1865, 1870–1871, 1874, 1896, 1922, 1924, 1925, 1996, 2021, 2037, 2076, 2079, 2133, 2145, 2159, 2170, 2171, 2246, 2262, 2282, 2283, 2284, 2289, 2292–2293, 2294, 2296, 2302, 2323, 2370, 2408, 2414, 2458, 2510, 2541, 2545, 2546, 2548, 2549, 2562, 2572, 2581, 2582, 2583, 2593, 2604, 2624, 2703, 2706, 2714, 2747, 2793, 2794, 2795, 2796, 2811, 2849, 2851, 2853, 2855, 2896, 2906, 2912, 2930–2931, 2941, 2947
Black, Jeremiah S., 188–189, 200, 1736
Blackmun, Harry A., 7, 8, 10, 12, 14, 15, 72, 157, 185, 189–196, 212, 213, 242, 272, 274, 279, 293, 301, 304, 306, 307, 327, 359, 376, 436, 465, 687, 695, 706, 713, 733, 775, 783, 785, 790, 839, 895, 907, 1012, 1054, 1055, 1082, 1140, 1181, 1202, 1219, 1273, 1283, 1291, 1332, 1518, 1602, 1651, 1665, 1703, 1709, 1749, 1776, 1806, 1817, 1831, 1845, 1915, 1916, 2070, 2081, 2094, 2104, 2123, 2141, 2157, 2161, 2204, 2206, 2231, 2246, 2247, 2284–2285, 2313, 2314, 2379, 2391, 2441, 2537, 2561, 2574, 2583, 2607, 2681, 2699, 2766, 2872, 2907, 2917, 2934
Blackstone, William, 84, 196–197, 208, 245, 361, 373, 440, 450, 501, 512, 593, 641, 661, 681, 753, 828, 836, 842, 1034, 1035, 1049, 1098, 1138, 1177, 1217, 1337, 1338, 1596, 1606, 1640, 1674, 1695, 1807, 1868, 2052, 2057, 2225, 2236, 2252, 2346, 2382, 2461, 2506, 2507, 2716, 2725, 2737, 2787, 2834, 2946
Blaine, James G., 197, 587, 1265
Blair, Francis Preston, 1412
Blair, Henry W., 587
Blair, John, 198, 467, 1279, 2600, 2601, 2603, 2861
Blatchford, Samuel, 198–199, 346, 694, 2748, 2894
Bloch, Charles J., 452
Blount, William, 199, 2358
Blumberg, Abraham, 2444
Bluntschli, J. K., 2737
Blyew, John, 200
Bobitt, Philip, 657
Bodin, Jean, 2461
Boggs, Danny, 14
Bolingbroke, Lord, 84
Bollman, Erik, 705
Bonaparte, Charles J., 134–135, 976
Bond, Hugh Lennox, 207
Bonham, Thomas, 208
Booth, John Wilkes, 2476
Booth, Sherman M., 1, 2432
Borah, William E., 595, 2883
Borden, Lizzie, 1756
Bork, Robert H., 50, 114–115, 209, 507–508, 658, 667, 699, 1291, 1394, 1543, 1612–1613, 1801, 1813, 1860, 1861, 1862, 2121, 2127, 2161, 2246, 2248, 2313, 2314, 2326, 2364, 2454, 2455
Boudin, Louis B., 212, 453
Boudinot, Elias, 2611
Bourne, Randolph, 662
Bouvia, Elizabeth, 2269
Bowditch, William I., 3
Boyd, James Edmund, 2676–2677
Bracton, Henry, 2297
Bradley, Joseph P., 52, 199, 201, 211–212, 215–216, 216–218, 218, 336, 338, 340, 341, 342, 346, 358–359, 360, 403, 408, 409, 479, 909, 1185, 1225, 1581, 1753, 2141, 2420, 2423, 2424, 2482, 2507, 2563, 2564, 2628, 2817, 2821, 2823, 2826–2827, 2828, 2923
Bradley, Stephen R., 2429
Bradwell, Myra, 218, 342, 2612, 2920
Brandagee, Frank, 2928
Brandeis, Louis D., 15, 32, 35, 49, 52, 112, 113, 128, 142, 146, 167, 173, 215, 219–222, 222–225, 241, 278, 285, 314, 317, 321, 348, 375, 377, 388, 421, 426, 427, 441, 457, 458, 468, 495, 595, 709, 711, 719, 721, 723, 724, 792, 831, 864, 872, 873, 921, 970, 977, 998,

1018, 1030, 1050, 1103, 1107, 1129, 1155, 1175, 1198, 1263, 1269, 1274, 1292, 1299, 1314, 1319, 1321, 1352, 1425, 1438, 1444, 1456, 1606, 1633–1634, 1645, 1646, 1681, 1710, 1715, 1760, 1772, 1802, 1849–1850, 1851, 1869, 1874, 1911, 1955, 1987, 2047, 2060, 2115, 2156, 2230, 2241–2242, 2246, 2281, 2310, 2313, 2319, 2325, 2326, 2352, 2437, 2440, 2443, 2445, 2446, 2454, 2502, 2531, 2543, 2544, 2545, 2549, 2573, 2580, 2592, 2593, 2634–2635, 2636, 2637, 2640, 2641, 2642, 2646, 2713, 2733, 2746, 2758, 2780, 2794, 2820, 2855, 2884, 2897, 2899, 2900, 2901, 2902, 2911, 2932
Brandenburg, Clarence, 1136
Brandhove, William, 2667
Brant, Irving, 226
Braxton, Carter, 246, 537, 2499
Brearly, David, 228, 520, 521
Breckenridge, John, 228, 747, 1668
Brennan, William J., Jr., 1, 7, 54, 56, 63, 64, 71, 119, 133, 137, 152, 164, 179, 184, 185, 190, 192, 200, 203, 229–240, 242, 251, 272, 277, 281, 293, 296, 300, 301, 304, 309, 310, 311, 312, 316–317, 327, 350, 369, 380, 440, 444–445, 465, 482, 508–509, 666, 676, 677, 687, 695, 704, 707, 718, 720, 748, 773, 778, 790, 815, 830, 863, 878, 890, 895, 897, 899, 907, 916, 927, 929, 930, 935, 975, 982, 983, 987, 994, 1012, 1054, 1060, 1062, 1063, 1064, 1068, 1106, 1117–1118, 1120, 1125, 1127, 1140, 1157, 1181, 1189, 1194, 1197, 1199, 1202, 1203, 1214, 1229, 1239, 1240, 1273, 1281, 1283, 1285, 1286, 1293, 1327, 1332, 1367, 1401, 1411, 1414, 1426, 1427, 1435, 1450, 1458–1459, 1480, 1481, 1527, 1535, 1538, 1563, 1587, 1602, 1634, 1653, 1665, 1672, 1680, 1703, 1709, 1716, 1723, 1724, 1730, 1735, 1737, 1758, 1776, 1789, 1806, 1810, 1812, 1822, 1837–1838, 1844, 1845, 1851, 1856, 1859, 1877, 1879, 1885, 1888, 1893, 1900, 1902, 1920, 1969, 2033, 2082, 2106, 2127, 2136, 2141, 2149, 2155, 2161, 2168, 2196, 2199, 2200, 2204, 2210, 2214, 2247, 2266, 2267, 2276, 2277, 2295, 2296, 2300, 2306, 2313, 2317, 2319, 2325, 2335, 2338, 2364, 2370–2371, 2379, 2395, 2408, 2412, 2417, 2422, 2438, 2445, 2452, 2453, 2455, 2475, 2476, 2498, 2502, 2548, 2573, 2607, 2646, 2665, 2680–2681, 2697, 2712, 2733, 2750, 2756, 2766, 2777, 2832, 2849, 2854, 2862, 2869, 2881, 2893, 2907, 2912, 2914, 2934
Brest, Paul, 657, 658, 1395
Brewer, David J., 52, 112, 240–242, 263, 330, 750–751, 893, 1164, 1168, 1169, 1267, 1273, 1344, 1415, 1764, 1828, 1897, 2129–2130, 2414, 2437, 2633, 2897
Breyer, Stephen G., 242–243, 297, 307, 312, 431, 433, 1530–1531, 1627, 2083, 2168, 2270, 2387, 2419, 2455, 2456
Brezhnev, Leonid, 616
Bricker, John, 243, 603, 1389, 1921
Bridges, Harry, 244
Brill, Alida, 1577
Bristow, Benjamin, 200, 1265
Brooks, Preston, 2584 Broom, Jacob, 252
Brown, Edmund, 2125, 2848
Brown, Henry B., 252–253, 257, 1036, 1162, 1164, 1169, 1227, 1273, 1294, 1376, 1704, 1756, 1918, 1919, 1960
Brown, John, 1955, 2715, 2718
Brownell, Herbert, 135, 976
Brownmiller, Susan, 1838
Bryan, William Jennings, 1165, 1375, 2048, 2437, 2501, 2666, 2894
Bryce, James, 257–258, 499, 1338, 2501
Buchanan, James, 189, 258–259, 325, 338, 429, 430, 565, 566, 570, 1230, 1413, 1526, 1574, 1620, 1625, 1686, 1822, 1901, 1962, 2064, 2435–2436, 2476, 2480, 2539, 2655
Buck, Carrie, 791
Burdick, Alan, 265
Burger, Warren E., 64, 112, 137, 158, 165, 172, 185, 189, 190, 192, 204, 214, 242, 269–272, 272, 273, 275, 277, 301, 317, 406, 440, 447, 699, 712, 794, 830, 831, 863, 906, 907, 935, 1049, 1068, 1140, 1151, 1172, 1189, 1199, 1202, 1214, 1215, 1273, 1333, 1394, 1453, 1459, 1536, 1557, 1562, 1575, 1599, 1601–1602, 1648, 1653, 1655, 1672, 1679, 1734, 1737, 1757, 1806, 1811, 1817, 1846, 1857, 1876, 1878, 1899, 1920, 1922, 1976, 2077, 2105, 2152, 2157, 2159, 2160, 2168, 2196, 2205, 2208, 2231, 2271, 2276, 2277, 2285, 2351, 2385, 2443, 2579, 2594, 2605, 2606, 2623, 2627, 2663, 2699, 2756, 2833, 2850, 2851, 2865, 2914, 2917
Burgess, John W., 278, 452, 588
Burke, Aedanus, 177
Burke, Edmund, 29, 197, 377, 693, 1874
Burke, John, 980
Burke, Thomas, 538
Burlamacqui, Jean-Jacques, 752
Burns, Lucy, 2918
Burr, Aaron, 207, 278, 550, 552, 866, 1674, 1688, 1934, 2346, 2561, 2740, 2785, 2913, 2931
Burton, Harold, 112, 114, 279–280, 804, 815, 830, 931, 1436, 1704, 1761, 2294, 2793, 2867, 2941
Bush, George H. W., 12, 86, 92–93, 115, 280–282, 407, 431, 432, 617, 623, 625, 776, 969, 1063, 1079, 1242, 1304, 1680, 1826, 1916, 1933, 2002, 2003, 2160, 2161, 2168, 2453, 2454, 2455, 2695, 2786, 2814, 2843, 2844
Butler, Andrew, 2583–2584
Butler, Benjamin F., 283, 504, 884, 1339, 1736
Butler, Pierce (1744–1822), 283, 502, 517, 1610, 2544, 2637
Butler, Pierce (1866–1939), 228, 259, 278, 283–284, 317, 362, 441, 457, 458, 697, 921, 1101, 1261, 1264, 1284, 1311, 1314, 1760, 2326, 2636, 2637
Byrd, Harry F., 2458
Byrd, Robert C., 626, 1627, 2361
Byrnes, James F., 285–286, 861, 2289, 2292–2293, 2302, 2548

C

Cabell, Samuel J., 980
Cady, Margaret Livingston, 2476
Cahn, Edmond, 15, 290, 1991
Cahn, Jean Camper, 1975
Calabresi, Steven, 990
Caldwell, John, 467
Caldwell, Seth, 467
Calhoun, John C., 31, 110, 156, 169, 290–293, 384, 385, 451, 522, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 563, 565, 566, 567, 569, 747, 754, 957, 1392, 1412, 1425, 1612, 1706, 1755, 1832–1833, 2201, 2346, 2359, 2434, 2457, 2519, 2527, 2651, 2663, 2687, 2799, 2871
Callendar, John, 337
Callender, James T., 67, 1339, 2913
Calley, William, 1954
Calvert, Cecil, 1691
Calvert, George, 1647
Camden, Lord. See Pratt, Charles (Lord Camden)
Campbell, John A., 298–299, 325, 801, 2423, 2424, 2783–2784
Cannon, Joseph G., 589, 1825
Cantwell, Jesse, 299
Cantwell, Newton, 299
Cantwell, Russell, 299

Cardozo, Benjamin N., 112–113, 128, 219, 221, 285, 313–316, 317, 321, 376, 441, 457, 458, 601, 677, 1027, 1155, 1176, 1263, 1283, 1284, 1303, 1314, 1355, 1438, 1532, 1563, 1715, 1760, 1855, 1874, 1875, 1877, 1982, 1990, 2038, 2115, 2156, 2281, 2293, 2317–2318, 2445, 2446, 2523, 2540, 2541, 2572, 2589, 2592, 2634, 2713, 2809, 2820, 2898, 2901
Carloss, Helen, 2612
Carmichael, Stokely, 412
Carpenter, Matthew H., 318–319, 2423
Carr, Robert K., 319, 738
Carroll, Daniel, 319
Carswell, G. Harrold, 49, 112, 114–115, 191, 699, 1817, 2364
Carter, James Coolidge, 320, 357, 1876, 1921, 1959, 1960, 1993, 1994, 2003, 2127, 2160, 2357, 2362
Carter, Jimmy, 97, 112, 114, 289, 320, 598, 614–615, 616, 617, 741, 942, 1002, 1003, 1019, 1196, 1359, 1704, 2785, 2786, 2842
Carter, Robert L., 772
Carteret, George, 1799–1800
Cartwright, Thomas, 2236
Cary, John W., 321–322
Cass, Lewis, 3, 563, 566, 569, 1962, 2435
Castro, Fidel, 1532, 1534
Cato, 324
Catron, John, 258, 325, 338, 1230, 2022, 2435
Catt, Carrie Chapman, 2918
Celler, Emmanuel, 167, 2744
Chafee, Zechariah, Jr., 328–329, 592, 1255, 1299, 1606, 1607, 1716, 1736, 1959, 2935
Chambers, Julius L., 1774
Chambers, Whittaker, 604, 1305, 1595
Chandler, Douglas, 2931
Charles I, 444, 529, 1173, 1693, 1903, 2382
Charles II, 532, 1892, 2230, 2382
Chase, Salmon P., 3, 182, 218, 334–336, 337, 339, 340, 342, 360, 560, 567, 746, 1238, 1581–1582, 1652, 1701, 1727, 1732, 1736, 1752–1753, 2142, 2216, 2389, 2591, 2612, 2628, 2680, 2782, 2806
Chase, Samuel, 111, 290, 336–337, 376, 498, 552, 561, 667, 844, 958, 980, 1156, 1175, 1194, 1286–1287, 1339, 1340, 1456, 1478, 1668, 1673, 1682, 1684, 1688, 1821, 1883, 2116, 2209, 2284, 2424, 2570, 2591, 2601, 2602, 2649, 2763, 2783, 2834, 2859
Child, Lydia Maria, 4
Chipman, Nathaniel, 356, 449
Choate, Joseph H., 356–357, 1165, 1764, 1959, 1960
Choate, Rufus, 2611
Choper, Jesse, 1460
Churchill, Cheryl, 2866
Churchill, Winston, 374, 2929
Cicero, 634, 1286, 1731, 2297, 2346
Claiborne, Harry, 1341
Clark, Charles E., 420
Clark, David, 2676–2677
Clark, Grenville, 2290
Clark, Homer, Jr., 46
Clark, Jonas, 2439–2440, 2899
Clark, Kenneth, 772, 2441, 2443
Clark, Ramsey, 420
Clark, Tom C., 1, 136, 152, 229, 279, 280, 410–421, 696, 750, 855, 929, 1150, 1231, 1240, 1405, 1426, 1486, 1595, 1649–1650, 1666, 1667, 1676, 1717, 1741, 1991, 2228, 2262, 2344, 2607, 2791, 2793, 2852, 2867, 2903, 2904, 2941
Clarke, John H., 32, 151, 831, 864, 1030, 1292, 1715, 1911, 2230, 2635, 2637, 2900
Clay, Henry, 30, 88, 110, 169, 292, 423–425, 477, 555, 556, 559, 565, 812, 845, 1228, 1385, 1408, 1409, 1557, 1701, 1706, 1710, 1732, 2359, 2431, 2662, 2859, 2871, 2884, 2885, 2935
Clayton, Henry, 425
Clayton, John M., 566, 2435
Cleland, John, 1716
Cleveland, Grover, 114, 241, 429–430, 582, 681, 751, 755, 920, 1160, 1164, 1182, 1409, 1559, 1711, 1784, 1890, 2291, 2733, 2785, 2894, 2897
Clifford, Nathan, 338, 430–431, 1581, 1582, 1636, 2022, 2559, 2564, 2824, 2827
Clinton, DeWitt, 2740
Clinton, George, 2938
Clinton, Hillary, 625–626
Clinton, Robert, 1503
Clinton, William J., 13, 34, 102, 127, 242, 249, 282, 431–433, 433, 434, 623, 625, 776, 777, 954, 1078–1079, 1080, 1340, 1343, 1360, 1626–1627, 1784, 1826, 1840, 2002–2003, 2168, 2182, 2386, 2405, 2814, 2844
Clymer, George, 434
Cobb, Howell, 2527
Coffin, William Sloane, 709
Cohen, Dan, 436
Cohen, Felix S., 2053
Cohen, Lloyd, 2058
Cohen, Morris R., 435, 1192, 2053, 2572
Cohen, Willliam, 2276
Coke, Sir Edward, 208, 363, 439–440, 512, 634, 638, 641, 828, 1098, 1286, 1321, 1352, 1473, 1571, 1664, 1866, 1888, 1903, 2234, 2236, 2356, 2569, 2716, 2718, 2787
Coker, Ehrlich, 440
Cole, David, 1196
Collins, larry, 442
Commager, Henry Steele, 447–448, 1365
Commons, John R., 692
Condorcet, Marquis de (Marie-Jean Caritat), 870
Conkling, Roscoe, 4, 504, 1182, 1900
Connally, Thomas T., 504, 2362
Connor, Bull, 379
Convitz, Milton R., 738
Cooke, Jay, 1594
Cooley, Thomas M., 196, 197, 451, 583, 584, 593, 674, 680–681, 1288, 1350, 1711, 1736, 2075, 2346, 2347, 2508, 2512, 2571, 2701, 2712–2713, 2830, 2831
Coolidge, Calvin, 590, 593, 594, 595, 682, 1025, 1262, 1263, 1358, 1842, 2543, 2548, 2634, 2637, 2786
Cooper, Thomas, 67, 683, 1832, 2346 Coplon, Judith, 946
Corcoran, Tom, 1101
Corwin, Edward S., 452, 453, 693–694, 698, 827, 927, 946, 995, 1036, 1227, 1244, 1339, 1396, 1474, 1485, 1607, 1634, 1753, 1960, 1986, 2641, 2782, 2834, 2835, 2836, 2935
Corwin, Thomas, 694
Cosby, William, 2944
Cotton, John, 1694
Cover, Robert M., 527, 701–702
Covington, Hayden, 1065, 2189
Cox, Archibald, 152, 153, 209, 1359, 1997, 2204–2205, 2228, 2449, 2450, 2853
Cox, James, 1264
Cramer, Anthony, 705, 1279
Cranch, William, 705
Crandall, Prudence, 558
Crawford, William H., 30, 556, 2430
Creel, George, 2928
Crittenden, John J., 134, 728, 1748, 2435
Croly, Herbert D., 728, 2047
Cromwell, Oliver, 174, 530, 1618, 2212
Crosskey, William W., 453, 516, 517, 728–729, 1396, 1643
Croswell, Harry, 1897
Cruzan, Nancy, 2266, 2267

Cummings, Homer S., 697, 698, 734–735, 2288, 2592
Curry, Betty, 127
Curtis, Benjamin R., 184, 430, 451, 455, 681, 735–736, 820, 1791, 1888, 2356, 2593, 2650, 2651, 2652, 2867, 2871
Curtis, George Ticknor, 450, 736
Cushing, Caleb, 114, 1018
Cushing, William, 467, 737–738, 2554, 2590, 2600, 2601, 2602
Cushman, Robert E., 738
Custis, Martha, 2860

D

Dagenhart, Reuben, 1262
Dahl, Robert, 1478
Dahrendorf, Ralf, 908
Dallas, Alexander, 156, 181, 739, 2600
Dallas, George M., 563
Daly, Charles, Patrick, 1594
Dana, Richard Henry, 504, 1756
Dane, Nathan, 449, 742, 1829, 2556
Daniel, Peter V., 162, 298, 682, 742–743, 1617, 2555, 2649, 2651, 2868
Darby, Fred, 743
Darrow, Clarence, 1281, 2327, 2666
Darwin, Charles, 21, 706, 1633, 2712–2713
Daugherty, Harry M., 134, 1358, 1594–1595, 1708
Davie, William R., 166
Davis, Angela, 1955
Davis, David, 338, 339, 498, 746–747, 1036, 1581, 1736, 1753
Davis, Garrett, 1087
Davis, Henry Winter, 2818
Davis, Jefferson, 451, 566, 567, 747–748, 2436, 2527, 2705, 2718
Davis, John W., 553, 597, 660, 748, 1295, 1685, 2611, 2612, 2637
Davis, Kenneth Culp, 2297
Davis, Wylie, 253
Dawes, Thomas, 516
Dawkins, Andy, 2702
Day, William R., 259, 685, 748–749, 804, 864, 893, 1164, 1261, 1274, 1310, 1651, 2292, 2637, 2895, 2896, 2898, 2900
Dayton, Jonathan, 749–750
Deane, Silas, 2237
Debs, Eugene V., 241, 750, 751, 923, 1710, 1955, 2580, 2894
DeConcini, Dennis, 1813
De Funis, Marco, 54
de la Croix, Jacques Vincent, 1365
Delancey, James, 2944
De Lolme, Jean-Louis, 245
Dennis, Eugene, 769, 770
Denton, Jeremiah, 2365
Derrida, Jacques, 757
DeShaney, Joshua, 774
Deutsch, Jan, 1792
Devanter, Willis Van, 421, 457, 458, 697, 698, 893, 1311, 1314, 1498
Devlin, Lord Patrick, 1801
Dewey, John, 448, 662, 1982–1983, 1984, 2047, 2848
Dewey, Thomas E., 1767
DeWitt, John, 118, 1416
Dexter, Samuel, 2611
Diamond, Martin, 1947
Dicey, Albert V., 633, 2297, 2298
Dickens, Charles, 2681
Dickinson, John, 124–125, 513, 517, 519, 537, 543, 545, 779–780, 1099, 1866, 2225, 2438, 2909
Dies, Martin, 780, 1305, 1595
Dillinger, John, 598
Dillon, John F., 451, 583, 584, 783–784, 2075
Dirksen, Everett M., 2228
Doe, Charles, 802
Dole, Robert, 431
Donaldson, Kenneth, 1846
Dorr, Thomas W., 561, 1652, 2210, 2715
Dottson, Andy, 2808
Douglas, Stephen A., 3, 258, 477, 565, 569, 667, 747, 812–813, 820, 1148, 1149, 1161, 1356, 1475, 1525–1526, 1574, 1620, 1622–1623, 1625, 1962, 1963, 2201, 2217, 2435, 2436, 2452, 2527, 2583, 2655, 2673, 2705
Douglas, William O., 1, 17, 22, 24, 33, 43, 54, 112, 116, 119, 152, 157, 164, 168, 201, 204, 226, 229, 239, 242, 244, 251, 253, 263, 272, 273, 274, 301, 309, 313, 420, 427, 430, 445, 458, 631, 696, 709, 710, 719, 720, 721, 760, 769, 771, 804, 813–817, 817, 818, 830, 839, 861, 882, 896, 929, 930, 1023, 1035, 1065, 1066, 1070, 1102, 1103, 1106, 1108, 1118, 1140, 1148, 1149, 1150, 1183, 1188, 1189, 1198, 1228, 1231, 1233, 1234, 1235, 1240, 1271, 1272, 1282, 1289, 1336, 1401, 1410, 1411, 1434, 1480, 1481, 1485–1486, 1522, 1536, 1538, 1568, 1581, 1588, 1602, 1605, 1702, 1709, 1716–1717, 1735, 1737, 1758, 1768, 1785, 1806, 1810, 1811, 1836, 1851, 1870, 1879, 1896, 1899, 1961, 1990, 2077, 2097, 2115, 2145, 2155, 2172, 2200, 2203, 2228, 2242, 2243, 2246, 2283, 2284, 2289, 2292–2293, 2294, 2296, 2302, 2412, 2421–2422, 2506, 2510, 2528, 2531, 2545, 2546, 2548, 2549, 2550, 2562, 2573, 2582, 2606, 2607, 2714, 2747, 2790, 2793, 2794, 2795, 2796, 2832, 2833, 2850, 2851, 2853, 2855, 2906, 2907, 2914, 2924, 2930, 2931, 2934, 2941, 2947
Douglass, Frederick, 3, 180, 504, 1091, 2366, 2736, 2806
Dowling, Noel T., 817
Downs, Anthony, 764
Drayton, William, 2439
Duane, James, 828, 2301
Duane, William, 1408
Duer, William Alexander, 449
Dukakis, Michael, 282
Dulany, Daniel, 829
Dulles, John Foster, 2788
Dunne, Finley Peter, 589
Dunning, William A., 452
Du Ponceau, Peter S., 831
Duvall, Gabriel, 162, 677, 831–832, 1683
Duxbury, Neil, 1578
Dworkin, Andrea, 1054, 1134, 1965
Dworkin, Ronald, 508, 626, 629, 1394, 1579, 1634, 2576

E

Earl, Robert, 1414
Easterbrook, Frank, 1054, 1967–1968, 2681
Eastland, James O., 2365
Edmunds, George, 2413
Edward III, 1663–1664
Edwards, Pierpont, 980
Ehrlich, Isaac, 311
Eichman, Shawn, 1063
Eisenhower, Dwight D., 112, 133, 136, 190, 191, 232, 236, 244, 254, 255, 270, 281, 288, 289, 603–604, 606, 607, 608, 614, 683, 909, 945, 1003, 1025, 1155, 1265, 1319, 1390, 1430, 1541, 1649, 1815, 1853, 1935–1936, 1969, 2002, 2319, 2438, 2541, 2633, 2742, 2794, 2848, 2852, 2902, 2915
Elhauge, Einer, 2670
Eliot, T. S., 2902
Ellesmere, Lord Chancellor, 294
Elliot, Jared, 512
Elliot, Jonathan, 2120
Ellison, Ralph, 1430, 2354
Ellsberg, Daniel, 126, 1806, 1816, 2010

Ellsworth, Oliver, 515, 517, 520, 882–884, 979, 980, 1011, 1020, 1228, 1668, 1682, 1882, 1883, 2591, 2600, 2601, 2634, 2753, 2805
Ely, John Hart, 318, 383, 658, 767, 1481, 1503, 1860, 2204, 2754, 2850–2851
Emerson, John, 818
Emerson, Thomas I., 1236
Emmet, Thomas A., 2611
Emmett, Thomas, 1190
Endo, Mitsuye, 2931
Enmund, Earl, 896
Epstein, Richard, 2576
Ernst, Morris, 921
Ervin, Samuel J., 135, 922, 1543, 2365, 2865
Escobedo, Daniel, 922, 1925
Estes, Billie Sol, 929, 1143
Eule, Julian N., 787, 929–930
Evarts, William M., 321, 361, 736, 931, 1414, 1903, 2783

F

Fairman, Charles, 1086
Fall, Albert B., 1358
Falwell, Jerry, 1133, 1146, 1322
Farrand, Max, 975, 2805
Faubus, Orville, 607
Feeley, Malcolm, 990
Feeney, Helen, 2392–2393
Fehrenbacher, Don E., 2432
Fenno, Richard F., Jr., 288
Ferguson, Danny, 625
Fessenden, William Pitt, 4, 1034, 1085, 1436
Few, William, 1035
Field, David Dudley, 1035, 1582, 1736
Field, Stephen J., 70, 96, 112, 130, 217, 218, 240, 328, 338, 341, 342, 359, 360, 361, 583, 748, 813, 1035–1039, 1161, 1164, 1224, 1230, 1267, 1354, 1453, 1581, 1709, 1733, 1734, 1749, 1764, 1888, 1982, 2021, 2048, 2311, 2420, 2423, 2424, 2508, 2512, 2559, 2563, 2564, 2628, 2679, 2784, 2823, 2825, 2827, 2828, 2829, 2923
Fillmore, Millard, 49, 416, 565, 574, 728, 735, 1044, 2001, 2431, 2786, 2884, 2885
Filmer, Robert, 1639
Fish, Stanley, 1984
Fishbourn, Benjamin, 2359
Fisher, Sidney George, 451
Fisk, Jim, 1035
Fiske, John, 1060, 1711
FitzSimons, Thomas, 174, 1061
Fleming, Macklin, 723
Foner, Eric, 1291
Ford, Gerald R., 89, 266, 273, 281, 608, 609, 611, 755, 1003, 1070, 1262, 1336, 1339, 1529, 1574, 1770, 1817, 1878, 1994, 2002, 2014, 2125, 2161, 2312, 2529, 2531, 2785, 2786, 2843, 2864
Fortas, Abe, 50, 112, 114, 142, 190, 191, 201, 312, 490, 699, 905, 1082–1083, 1183, 1194, 1240, 1429, 1434, 1523, 2006, 2364, 2703
Foster, Daniel, 370
Foucault, Michel, 724
Fraenkel, Osmond K., 1099
France, Anatole, 395
Franck, Thomas M., 494, 495
Frank, Jerome N., 62, 435, 1099–1100, 1580
Frank, Leo, 1100, 1310
Frankfurter, Felix, 22, 33, 35, 36, 53, 69, 78, 112, 113, 142, 152, 153, 155, 164, 167, 173, 179, 186, 196, 198, 220, 221, 233, 237, 238, 244, 253, 254, 274, 276, 279, 280, 285, 286, 322, 351, 354, 355, 427, 440, 444, 458, 468, 477, 587, 629, 658, 659, 718, 719, 769, 770, 777, 814, 815, 830, 870, 931, 970, 996, 1008, 1018, 1031, 1065, 1066, 1101–1104, 1148, 1155, 1176, 1194, 1195, 1198, 1199, 1200, 1203, 1232, 1235, 1245, 1267, 1268, 1274, 1299, 1355, 1399, 1405, 1410, 1446, 1450, 1458, 1460, 1461, 1465, 1470, 1486, 1497, 1498, 1532, 1542, 1548, 1563, 1569–1570, 1587, 1594, 1595, 1634, 1645, 1704, 1713, 1734, 1768, 1779, 1812, 1825, 1869, 1924, 1949, 1950, 1990–1991, 2025, 2037, 2038, 2076, 2077, 2123, 2132, 2186, 2187, 2202, 2233, 2261, 2284, 2286, 2289, 2292–2293, 2294, 2302, 2313, 2324, 2329, 2344, 2416, 2417, 2445, 2446, 2458, 2522, 2541, 2545, 2546, 2548, 2550, 2561, 2569, 2576, 2581, 2604, 2641, 2650, 2660, 2667, 2675, 2684, 2713, 2726, 2747, 2780, 2792, 2793, 2794, 2796, 2849, 2851, 2852, 2867, 2902, 2903, 2908, 2935, 2941, 2947
Franklin, Benjamin, 29, 124–125, 287, 512, 521, 522, 537, 545, 752, 834, 997, 1104–1105, 1418, 1420, 1647, 1874, 2235, 2644–2645, 2805
Frémont, John C., 884
Freud, Sigmund, 1696–1697, 2647
Freund, Ernst, 1154–1155, 2511
Freund, Paul A., 377, 1155, 2205, 2623
Friederich, Carl, 778
Friedman, Barry, 990
Friedrich, Carl J., 637
Friendly, Henry J., 1155–1156, 1268, 2914
Fries, John, 337, 1156
Fulbright, J. William, 2360, 2362, 2789
Fuller, Alvan T., 468
Fuller, Lon, 525–526, 631, 1578–1579, 2297
Fuller, Melville W., 199, 241, 330, 359, 430, 846, 893, 1160–1163, 1163–1170, 1376, 1601, 1641, 1704, 1959–1960, 2210, 2634, 2897
Fulton, Robert, 454–455, 1636
Furneaux, Philip, 1177, 1870

G

Gage, Frances, 2736
Gallatin, Albert, 26, 551, 1180, 1419, 1998, 2931
Galloway, Joseph, 443, 1059, 1180
Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand, 369
Garfield, James A., 121, 504, 1182, 1698, 1736, 1877, 1892, 2002
Garland, Augustus H., 1182, 2679
Garraty, John, 1528
Garrison, William Lloyd, 2, 182, 558, 561, 1182–1183, 2216, 2736
Gault, Gerald, 1183, 1523
Gelhorn, Walter, 738
Genêt, Edmond, 516, 548
George II, 532, 1888
George III, 27, 294, 385, 536, 636, 753, 2383, 2439, 2834
George, Walter F., 244
Gerry, Elbridge, 174, 175, 503, 522, 542, 544, 545, 755, 1187, 1187, 1457, 2120, 2134
Gibson, John Bannister, 156, 560, 833, 1192
Giddings, Joshua, 3, 385, 562, 1499, 2884
Gideon, Clarence Earl, 1193–1194
Gilbert, Geoffrey, 1922–1923, 2234, 2237
Gilbert, Joseph, 1710
Giles, William, 1194, 1684
Gilligan, Carol, 1032
Gilman, Nicholas, 1194
Gilmore, Gary, 302
Gilmore, Grant, 526
Gingrich, Newt, 775
Ginsburg, Douglas H., 114, 2127, 2364
Ginsburg, Ruth Bader, 307, 313, 330, 431, 473, 1195–1198, 1439, 1530, 1735, 1750, 2168, 2270, 2398, 2418, 2419, 2455, 2456, 2702, 2798

Ginzberg, Eli, 2390
Gitlow, Benjamin, 146
Gladstone, William, 159
Glover, Joshua, 1
Gobitis, Lillian, 1065
Gobitis, William, 1065
Godkin, E. L., 584
Goetz, Bernard, 2916
Goldberg, Arthur J., 1, 116, 168, 238, 242, 274, 277, 702, 929, 1101, 1193, 1200, 1282, 1532, 1595–1596, 1810, 1812, 1925, 2204, 2246, 2528, 2745, 2849
Goldman, Emma, 2325
Goldman, Ron, 2915
Goldwater, Barry, 2126
Golove, David, 1826
Gompers, Samuel, 36, 425, 1203
Goodnow, Frank J., 452, 582, 1205
Goodrich, Chauncey, 2611
Gordon, Thomas, 324
Gorham, Nathaniel, 48, 1205, 1751–1752, 2700
Gortari, Carlos Salinas de, 1826
Goudy, William C., 322, 1205–1206
Gould, Jay, 783, 1035
Graham, Howard Jay, 585
Gramm, Phil, 1219
Grant, Ulysses S., 82, 114, 121, 197, 201, 207, 216, 318, 319, 334, 336, 339, 340, 404, 478, 504, 579, 580, 581, 697, 783, 1018, 1039, 1041, 1070, 1225, 1265, 1319, 1409, 1428, 1581, 1626, 1753, 1816, 2311, 2476, 2563, 2609, 2735, 2736, 2807, 2821
Grassley, Charles E., 2365
Gravel, Mike, 1226, 2359, 2464
Gray, Horace, 198, 429, 1036, 1164, 1226–1227, 1582, 1731, 2604, 2620, 2817, 2825, 2828
Gray, John Chipman, 1226
Grayson, William, 177, 541
Greeley, Horace, 2216
Greene, Harold H., 2843
Greenleaf, Simon, 333
Grey, Thomas, 632, 1984
Gridley, Josiah, 1888
Grier, Robert C., 216, 258, 325, 338, 339, 1229–1230, 1581, 2022, 2680
Griffin, Stephen M, 659, 660
Grimke, Sarah, 2391
Griswold, Erwin N., 1195, 1232–1233
Griswold, Roger, 2611
Grodzin, Morton, 1006
Grosscup, Peter S., 1234–1235, 2630
Grotius, Hugo, 634, 1866
Grow, Galusha A., 1302
Gunier, Lani, 432
Gunther, Gerald, 318, 676, 1502, 1586, 2203, 2562
Gurfein, Murray, 1806
Guthrie, William D., 357, 1244, 1704
Guthrie, Woody, 816

H

Hague, Frank, 379
Haines, Charles G., 1257
Halderman, Terri Lee, 1893
Hale, Sir Matthew, 52, 53, 1098, 1224, 2716, 2823
Hale, Robert, 2053, 2572
Hall, Dominick, 1407
Hamilton, Alexander, 29, 44, 47, 90, 110–111, 113, 123, 159, 174, 175, 214, 250, 265, 268, 278, 287, 291, 336, 343, 356, 377, 386, 449, 484, 489, 493, 496–497, 497, 517, 519, 520, 523, 524, 539, 541, 542, 546, 547–548, 549, 551, 563, 673, 699, 728, 754, 755, 763, 834–835, 841, 845, 864, 869, 877, 883, 899, 949, 950, 957–958, 980, 995, 1013–1015, 1016, 1058, 1059, 1061, 1180, 1185, 1187, 1194, 1204, 1257–1260, 1287, 1290, 1324, 1336, 1337, 1338, 1340, 1346, 1390, 1394, 1404, 1418, 1421, 1454, 1466, 1467, 1469, 1473, 1475, 1487, 1501, 1503, 1534, 1537, 1575, 1610, 1611, 1618–1619, 1621, 1635, 1636, 1641, 1655, 1657, 1658, 1660, 1668, 1674, 1692, 1705, 1752, 1754, 1755, 1762, 1790, 1882, 1883, 1897, 1934, 1947, 1948, 1962, 1997, 2019, 2045, 2116, 2119, 2201, 2209, 2249, 2301, 2324, 2360, 2439, 2461, 2468, 2560, 2601, 2611, 2659, 2660–2661, 2661, 2662, 2664, 2681, 2741–2742, 2752–2753, 2755, 2770, 2784, 2805, 2835, 2836, 2837, 2843, 2861, 2863, 2938
Hamilton, Andrew, 1260, 2352–2353, 2944
Hamilton, Walton H., 53, 119, 517, 633, 639, 1260–1261
Hammond, James Henry, 1833
Hancock, John, 752
Hand, Augustus N., 1262–1263, 2748, 2936
Hand, Learned, 17, 146, 155, 225, 313, 328, 708, 769, 923, 943, 961, 1221, 1263–1264, 1299, 1476, 1478, 1579, 1696, 1792, 2562, 2684, 2748, 2761, 2794, 2851, 2914, 2936
Hanway, Caster, 2539
Harbison, Winfred A., 1528
Harding, Warren G., 106, 112, 261, 283, 288, 289, 590, 593, 595, 699, 751, 1020, 1025, 1264, 1303, 1358, 2002, 2310, 2360, 2411, 2625, 2634, 2637, 2780
Hardwick, Michael, 381, 2401
Harlan, John Marshall (1833–1911), 15, 25, 26, 54, 112, 170, 199, 217, 218, 240, 330, 408, 409, 410, 749, 794, 795, 846, 909, 970, 1038, 1162, 1163, 1164, 1168, 1169, 1227, 1261, 1265–1268, 1272, 1322, 1354, 1376, 1397, 1415, 1540, 1558, 1638, 1700, 1709, 1764, 1787, 1828, 1830, 1918, 1919, 1960, 2037, 2094, 2253, 2298, 2437, 2456, 2472, 2482, 2483, 2487, 2693–2694, 2744, 2824, 2828, 2829–2830, 2894, 2895, 2896, 2898, 2899, 2923, 2940
Harlan, John Marshall (1899–1971), 11, 12, 25, 140, 142, 152, 163, 164, 168, 170, 179, 185, 204, 280, 299, 300, 303, 310, 311, 320, 407, 505, 631, 667, 696, 709, 712, 817, 830, 863, 929, 959, 975, 1034, 1066, 1093, 1107, 1140, 1219, 1228, 1231, 1233, 1237, 1240, 1268–1270, 1271, 1273, 1437, 1527, 1535, 1595, 1605, 1666, 1667, 1670, 1681, 1717, 1741–1742, 1750, 1773, 1806, 1812, 1814, 1856, 1987, 2037, 2038, 2132, 2140, 2159, 2171, 2193, 2247, 2280, 2295, 2296, 2308, 2333–2334, 2342, 2456, 2475, 2487, 2491, 2581, 2604, 2606, 2849, 2851, 2853, 2867, 2881, 2896–2897, 2903, 2938–2939
Harmon, Judson, 429
Harrington, James, 28, 521, 661, 2211, 2215
Harrison, Benjamin, 112, 240, 867, 1164, 1273, 1409, 1711, 1763, 1850, 2291, 2412
Harrison, Robert H., 2600
Harrison, William Henry, 112, 114, 559, 2001, 2434, 2746, 2884
Hart, Henry M., 1246, 1274, 1466, 1469, 1474, 1502, 1578, 1579, 1792, 2313
Hartz, Louis, 1614
Hastie, William Henry, 1275, 1761, 2763
Haswell, Anthony, 1883
Hatch, Orin, 2182
Haupt, Hans Max, 1279
Haupt, Herbert, 1279
Hawthorne, Nathaniel, 892, 1782, 2183
Hay, John, 1169
Hayden, Lewis, 370
Hayden, Tom, 2790

Hayek, F. A., 633, 2297
Hayes, Rutherford B., 207, 218, 387, 478, 504, 581, 582, 803, 867, 1164, 1182, 1265, 1280, 1698, 2893, 2898
Hayne, Robert Y., 559, 1280, 2686, 2885
Haynsworth, Clement F., Jr., 49, 112, 114, 191, 699, 1816, 2364
Hays, Arthur Garfield, 921, 1280–1281
Haywood, William, 1955
Helm, Jerry, 2446–2447
Helms, Jesse, 1079
Helvidius. See Madison, James Hendricks, Leroy, 2406
Henfield, Gideon, 980
Henkin, Louis, 1470, 1826
Hennings, Thomas, 2365
Henry II, 1220
Henry III, 1663
Henry IV, 1987
Henry VIII, 1647
Henry, Patrick, 176, 177, 180, 522, 523, 528, 1011, 1284, 1575, 1610, 1673, 1689, 1785–1786, 1891, 1985, 2119, 2120, 2249, 2346–2347, 2601
Herbert, Anthony, 1141, 1285
Herblock, 1322
Herndon, Angelo, 2281–2282
Hildreth, Richard, 133, 450, 1289
Hill, Anita, 2695
Hill, C. M., 674
Hill, James J., 1594
Hill, Joe, 1954
Hills, Roderick, Jr., 990
Hinckley, John, 1719
Hirabayashi, Gordon, 1417, 2107, 2842
Hiss, Alger, 604, 1305, 1595, 1815, 2792
Hitler, Adolf, 1047, 2545
Hoadley, Bishop, 2597
Hobbes, Thomas, 635, 753, 1052, 1610, 1611, 1639, 1786, 1787, 2461–2462, 2567
Hoffa, James, 1294
Hofstadter, Richard, 1947
Hogan, Joe, 1746, 2418
Hohfeld, Wesley N., 2053
Holdsworth, Sir William S., 175, 1338
Holland, Ray P., 1746
Holland, Spessard, 2741
Hollings, Ernest, 1219
Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr., 15, 16, 17, 32, 35, 36, 52, 53, 69, 111, 112, 146, 151, 154, 167, 173, 222, 226, 236, 252, 259, 278, 284, 313, 314, 328, 388, 421, 426, 427, 428, 429, 435, 468, 527, 585–586, 597, 627, 631, 659, 665, 685, 692, 709, 719, 744, 749, 751, 756, 789, 791, 792, 795, 805, 831, 833, 835, 838, 839, 840, 864, 873, 889, 890, 892, 901, 902, 903, 909, 943, 958, 961, 970, 1041, 1046, 1047, 1050, 1100, 1127, 1128, 1129, 1156, 1162, 1164, 1175, 1184, 1198, 1212, 1261, 1263, 1264, 1267, 1292, 1295–1298, 1298, 1299, 1300, 1308, 1310, 1315, 1352, 1354, 1446, 1459, 1460, 1463, 1473, 1486, 1532, 1548, 1558, 1563, 1565, 1580, 1592, 1606, 1633, 1638, 1646, 1649, 1651, 1652, 1670–1671, 1681, 1682, 1710, 1715, 1716, 1721, 1724, 1746, 1757, 1758, 1761, 1772, 1778, 1802, 1828, 1849–1850, 1851, 1890, 1904, 1911, 1955, 1983, 1987, 1990, 2047, 2054, 2065, 2066, 2075, 2076–2077, 2230, 2251–2252, 2290, 2292, 2310, 2318, 2319, 2325, 2326, 2352, 2353, 2408, 2417, 2437, 2445, 2446, 2470, 2509–2510, 2544, 2545, 2549, 2560, 2571, 2580, 2589, 2593, 2594, 2604, 2607, 2629, 2631, 2634, 2636, 2637, 2640, 2641, 2643–2644, 2645, 2646, 2647, 2678, 2684, 2712, 2733, 2746, 2749, 2758, 2773, 2794, 2809, 2878, 2895, 2898, 2901, 2902, 2928–2929
Holst, Hermann von, 452
Holtzman, Elizabeth, 2790
Hooker, Thomas, 512, 1176, 1303, 1364, 2439
Hoover, Herbert C., 49, 112, 114–115, 281, 313, 456, 590, 593, 595–596, 597, 601, 602, 1018, 1025, 1303, 1310, 1599, 2143, 2281, 2546, 2548, 2589, 2592, 2612, 2636
Hoover, J. Edgar, 873, 976, 1303–1304
Hopkinson, Joseph, 156, 744
Hornblower, William B., 114
Horowitz, Donald, 1947
Hotman, François, 634
House, Edward, 1714
Houston, Charles H., 1307, 1676, 1678, 2411, 2612
Howard, Jacob M., 1085, 1087, 1308, 1357, 2210
Howe, Mark DeWolfe, 1308
Howell, David, 2723
Hruska, Roman, 2623
Hughes, Charles Evans, 15, 107, 112–113, 128, 151, 220, 221, 256, 317, 321, 348, 373, 421, 435, 441, 457, 458, 510, 595, 600, 631, 685, 697, 698, 702, 760, 795, 841, 846, 862, 899, 1018, 1065, 1100, 1107, 1201, 1241, 1256, 1300–1301, 1303, 1308, 1309–1312, 1312, 1314, 1316, 1317, 1337, 1452, 1460, 1463, 1488, 1582, 1645, 1739, 1748, 1753, 1760, 1788, 1825, 1874, 1877, 1912, 1959, 2009, 2078, 2115, 2157, 2173, 2281, 2289, 2292, 2317, 2544, 2546, 2548, 2560, 2563, 2589, 2592, 2593, 2597, 2605, 2606, 2607, 2608, 2612, 2613, 2634, 2713, 2780, 2820–2821, 2882, 2884, 2897, 2899
Hull, William, 1727
Hulme, Obadiah, 515
Hume, David, 1613, 1640, 2053, 2212
Humphrey, Hubert H., 158, 472, 1318, 1815
Humphrey, William, 1318
Hunt, Ward, 361, 1225, 1319, 2564, 2807
Hunter, David, 1688
Hunter, George, 2666
Hurst, J. Willard, 2783, 1321
Hussein, Saddam, 2002, 2003
Hutchinson, R., 674
Hutchinson, Thomas, 31, 512, 997, 1323, 1889, 2461
Huxley, Aldous, 87
Hyde, Henry J., 1324

I

Ingersoll, Jared, 1369, 2611
Innes, Harry, 2704
Innocent III (Pope), 1663
Iredell, James, 166, 290, 356, 980, 1175, 1279, 1286–1287, 1290, 1336, 1403–1404, 1664, 1682, 2462, 2600, 2601, 2602, 2834
Ireton, Henry, 2381
Irons, Peter, 1417, 2677

J

Jackson, Andrew, 30, 90, 110, 112, 114, 157, 160, 162, 169, 288, 291, 292, 325, 344, 345, 384, 424, 425, 499, 525, 556, 557, 559, 560, 565, 566, 575, 667, 675, 742, 832, 866, 954, 1036, 1069, 1274, 1385, 1407–1409, 1411, 1413, 1414, 1424, 1425, 1457, 1474, 1488, 1583–1584, 1614, 1675, 1685, 1700, 1701, 1710, 1711, 1712, 1821, 1833, 1935, 1998, 2457, 2591, 2609, 2628, 2647, 2651, 2656, 2687, 2733, 2746, 2779, 2805, 2840, 2867, 2884, 2922
Jackson, Howell E., 1164, 1165, 1227, 1273, 1409–1410, 1959, 1960
Jackson, James, 1668
Jackson, Jesse, 432

Jackson, Robert H., 117, 204, 244, 254, 444, 452, 459, 461, 600, 705, 708, 719, 721, 804, 814, 835, 840, 858, 861, 913, 931, 942, 951, 978, 1010, 1065–1066, 1103, 1147, 1192, 1202, 1279, 1318, 1344, 1362, 1396, 1410–1411, 1417, 1461, 1543, 1565, 1588, 1704, 1768, 1925, 1960–1961, 1973, 1995, 1996, 2008, 2021, 2054, 2078, 2115, 2152, 2154, 2159, 2172, 2190, 2282, 2283, 2289, 2292–2293, 2302, 2329, 2384, 2408, 2422, 2458, 2546, 2548, 2550, 2574, 2581, 2593, 2597, 2660, 2783, 2793, 2796, 2843, 2848, 2852, 2878, 2903, 2930, 2941, 2947
Jackson, Vicki, 990
Jackson, William, 516
Jacobs, Clyde, 2075
Jaffe, Erik, 2057
Jaffe, Louis, 41
James I (England) and VI (Scotland), 294, 439, 2297
James II, 532, 635, 752, 1173, 1693, 1804, 2183
James, William, 448, 1005, 1263, 1982, 1984
Jameson, J. Franklin, 1909
Jaworski, Leon, 1359, 1955
Jay, John, 126, 288, 330, 346, 356, 449, 518, 540, 549, 947, 1013–1015, 1016, 1020, 1279, 1417–1419, 1419, 1486, 1673, 1682, 1750, 1947, 2440, 2600, 2601, 2603, 2861, 2863
Jefferson, Thomas, 26, 29, 30, 67, 76, 83, 85, 89, 160, 171, 174, 176, 177, 180, 185, 188, 197, 228, 250, 271, 278, 287, 288, 337, 343, 373, 424, 438, 440, 489, 493, 495, 503, 509, 513, 519, 525, 534, 541, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 552, 553, 554, 556, 558, 559, 575, 590, 637, 648, 665, 683, 697, 705, 728, 742, 752, 754, 779, 831, 832, 864, 866, 885, 896, 899, 907, 931, 948, 953, 954, 980, 1013, 1015, 1016, 1045, 1046, 1049, 1174, 1177, 1180, 1194, 1257, 1259, 1268, 1290, 1343, 1365, 1385, 1392, 1412, 1419–1423, 1423–1426, 1432, 1474, 1478, 1487, 1488, 1496, 1498, 1515, 1534, 1575, 1583, 1610, 1611, 1621, 1633, 1635, 1644, 1655, 1658, 1662, 1667, 1675, 1681, 1682–1683, 1684, 1685, 1686, 1689, 1692, 1705, 1707, 1744, 1748, 1752, 1754, 1787, 1790, 1821, 1832, 1855, 1856, 1870, 1874, 1881, 1884, 1891, 1897, 1934, 1947, 1963, 2000, 2045, 2050, 2051, 2052, 2116, 2121, 2125, 2126, 2185, 2193, 2201, 2209, 2249, 2280, 2284, 2290, 2324, 2353, 2370, 2371, 2383, 2387, 2427, 2429, 2434, 2439, 2479, 2499, 2500, 2501, 2519, 2554, 2560, 2561, 2564, 2591, 2593, 2600, 2662, 2671, 2681, 2684, 2686–2687, 2704, 2712, 2718–2719, 2733, 2740, 2763, 2779, 2785, 2798–2800, 2801, 2805, 2840, 2861, 2935
Jeffrey, William W., Jr., 728
Jencks, Clinton E., 1426
Jenifer, Daniel of St. Thomas, 1426
Jenner, William E., 2592
Jennison, Nathaniel, 467
Jensen, Merrill, 518, 1426–1427
Jessup, Philip, 1390
Jeter, Mildred, 2307
Jewett, John N., 2783
John, King, 1663, 2035, 2297, 2569
Johnson, Andrew, 89, 110, 112, 114, 126, 159, 180, 181, 188, 283, 288, 335, 338, 339, 402, 478, 499, 576, 577, 578, 582, 736, 908, 931, 948, 1034, 1084, 1086, 1225, 1307, 1339, 1340, 1343, 1349, 1357, 1413, 1427–1429, 1436, 1625, 1728, 1732, 1736, 1745, 2001, 2142, 2143, 2360, 2389, 2453, 2471, 2476, 2527, 2540, 2584, 2591, 2609, 2669, 2692, 2693, 2735, 2751, 2786, 2806
Johnson, Frank, 276
Johnson, Gregory, 1062–1063
Johnson, John G., 2612
Johnson, Lyndon B., 50, 53, 59, 112, 113, 114, 266, 378, 386, 390, 405, 420, 598, 610, 613, 614, 699, 721, 777, 843, 1002, 1003, 1018, 1026, 1082, 1153, 1200, 1232, 1242, 1318, 1402, 1429–1432, 1533, 1534, 1615, 1640, 1676, 1679, 1704, 1816, 1852, 1876, 1954, 1973, 2220, 2453, 2592, 2734, 2786, 2788–2789, 2790, 2809, 2837, 2838, 2842
Johnson, Paul, 1435
Johnson, Reverdy, 1432
Johnson, Richard, 162, 1228
Johnson, Thomas, 1432, 2601
Johnson, William, 438, 885, 980, 981, 1067, 1191, 1425, 1432–1433, 1635, 1683, 1684, 1689, 2859, 2867
Johnson, William S., 1228, 1433–1434, 1762
Johnston, Samuel, 1403
Jones, Joseph Lee, 2542
Jones, Laura, 2123
Jones, LeRoi, 1955
Jones, Paula Corbin, 433, 625, 2386
Jones, Thomas G., 1897
Jones, Walter, 2611
Joyce, James, 78, 921
Judd, Orin, 2790
Julian, George, 1499
Justinian, 374

K

Kahn, Paul, 1979
Kallen, Horace, 662
Kalt, Joseph, 2731
Kalven, Harry, Jr., 751, 1304, 1510, 1525, 1837, 1900, 1965, 2068, 2744–2745
Kammen, Michael, 1577, 2712
Kanka, Megan, 2400
Kantrowitz, Arthur, 2328
Karst, Kenneth L., 1966, 2393
Katzenbach, Nicholas, 2789
Katzmann, Frederick, 468
Kaufman, Irving, 906, 2914
Kaus, Otto, 865
Keating, Kenneth, 2744
Keller, Helen, 78
Kelly, Alfred H., 1528
Kendall, Amos, 384, 560, 705, 1412
Kennard, George, 200
Kennedy, Anthony M., 7, 9, 12, 14, 55, 56, 98, 139, 192, 202, 203, 265, 296, 298, 359, 380, 382, 624, 695, 732, 787, 848, 916, 918, 925, 926, 983, 989, 1055, 1062, 1068, 1133, 1208, 1293, 1327, 1332, 1391, 1396, 1471–1472, 1515, 1529–1532, 1576, 1602, 1651, 1735, 1747, 1750, 1813, 1831, 1845, 1886, 1915, 1977, 2055, 2082, 2123, 2127, 2137, 2157, 2158, 2159, 2161, 2168, 2169, 2176, 2196, 2226, 2231, 2248, 2313, 2315, 2324, 2338, 2379, 2409, 2419, 2422, 2455, 2456, 2681, 2698, 2863
Kennedy, Duncan, 724
Kennedy, Edward M., 112, 242, 1813, 2157, 2182
Kennedy, John F., 134, 152, 288, 372, 390, 405, 433, 598, 608, 610, 613, 614, 867, 1020, 1025, 1155, 1179, 1200, 1402, 1532–1533, 1676, 1679, 1704, 1781, 1815, 1853, 1854, 1921, 1951, 2002, 2610, 2836, 2838, 2885, 2886, 2888, 2932
Kennedy, Robert F., 134–135, 136, 873, 1532, 1533–1534, 1852, 1951, 2888
Kent, James, 333, 450, 744, 842, 1190, 1191, 1365, 1534–1535, 1617, 1635, 1898, 2075, 2507, 2556, 2697–2698
Key, Francis Scott, 2611
Keynes, John Maynard, 262
Khrushchev, Nikita, 1815

King, Martin Luther, Jr., 369, 370, 407, 411, 412, 873, 875, 1026, 1082, 1153, 1304, 1536–1537, 1607, 1614, 1774, 1804–1805, 1854, 2220, 2486, 2709, 2809, 2832
King, Rodney, 812, 2916
King, Rufus, 517, 542, 647, 673, 1337, 1537–1538, 1751, 1762, 1829
Kirchheimer, Otto, 1954
Kittay, Eva Feder, 1966
Kleindienst, Richard G., 134
Kluger, Richard, 1528, 2849
Knott, James, 1969
Knox, Henry, 288, 546, 2861
Knox, John Jay, 1752
Knox, Philander C., 135, 1540, 1756, 2413, 2629
Korematsu, Fred, 1417, 2107, 2842, 2931
Kosciusko, Thaddeus, 1365
Kosmin, Barry A., 2180
Kramer, Larry, 990
Kristol, Irving, 1838
Krock, Arthur, 1439
Kurland, Philip B., 910, 1542–1543, 1792, 2385, 2411
Kyd, Stuart, 361

L

Labatt, David Cohen, 2914
Lachman, Seymour P., 2180
LaFave, Wayne, 713
La Follette, Robert, 597, 1479, 1557, 2637–2638, 2641, 2884
Laird, Melvin, 1692
Lamar, Joseph R., 113, 1100, 1203, 1232, 1558–1559, 2634, 2898
Lamar, L. Q. C., 359, 430, 1164, 1559
Lambert, Jacques, 1365
Landis, James M., 852, 1101, 1399, 1560, 2147
Lando, Barry, 1285
Langdell, Christopher Columbus, 1226, 1578, 1580
Langdon, John, 537, 1058, 1561
Lansing, John, 519, 1258
Lansing, John, Jr., 1561, 2938
Laski, Harold J., 219, 591, 1299, 1308, 1363, 1563
Latrobe, Benjamin, 1681
Law, Sylvia, 2204
Lawrence, Philip K., 1710
Lawrence, William, 4
Leary, Timothy, 1572
Leavitt, Joshua, 3
Lebron, Michael, 1573
Lee, Charles, 134
Lee, Edmund J., 2611
Lee, Rex Edwin, 1574–1575, 2451
Lee, Richard Henry, 32, 177, 536, 541, 752, 1575, 1692, 2116, 2499
Lee, Robert E., 2915
Leflar, Robert, 253
Leigh, Benjamin W., 558
Leland, John, 1601
Lempert, Richard, 1516
Lerner, Max, 665, 745
Levi, Edward H., 1461
Levinson, Sanford, 510
Levy, Howard, 1879
Levy, Leonard W., 373, 1474, 1606, 1607, 1922–1923, 2239, 2507
Lewinsky, Monica, 127, 433, 434, 625, 954, 955, 1360, 2386
Lewis, Anthony, 2325
Lewis, John L., 2757, 2793
Lewis, Morgan, 1897
Lewis, William Draper, 196, 1705
Lieber, Francis, 451, 2557, 2688
Lilburne, John, 512, 515, 828, 1617–1618, 1664, 2234, 2237, 2238, 2381
Lilienthal, David, 1101
Lincoln, Abraham, 30, 89, 112, 126, 134, 164, 180, 181, 258, 288, 325, 334, 335, 339, 343, 373, 378, 386, 415, 416, 451, 491, 496, 499, 504, 536, 537, 563, 565, 567, 570, 571, 573, 574, 575, 577, 649, 667, 694, 736, 746, 747, 754, 813, 820, 884, 886, 949, 1035, 1148, 1149, 1230, 1256, 1265, 1356, 1409, 1432, 1475, 1583, 1612, 1614, 1619–1623, 1624–1625, 1640, 1648, 1659, 1706, 1731, 1752, 1791, 1821–1822, 1908, 1955, 1959, 1963, 1994, 2001, 2022, 2096, 2125, 2142, 2201, 2216, 2249, 2290, 2291, 2346, 2389, 2427, 2432–2433, 2436, 2457, 2469–2470, 2476, 2480, 2519, 2527, 2539, 2556, 2580, 2584, 2591, 2609, 2628, 2650, 2651, 2673, 2688, 2691–2692, 2705, 2733, 2735, 2753, 2771, 2777, 2805, 2806, 2818, 2835, 2837, 2838, 2840, 2868, 2884, 2885, 2929
Lincoln, Levi, 134, 332, 467, 1623–1624, 2236, 2554, 2590, 2611
Lindbergh, Charles, 1179
Linde, Hans, 2122, 2502
Lindsay, Vachel, 816
Lippman, Walter, 2047
Livingston, Brockholst, 885, 1898
Livingston, Edward, 559, 560, 2611
Livingston, Henry Brockholst, 1635–1636, 1636, 1683, 1684–1685, 2697
Livingston, Robert, 455
Livingston, Robert R., Jr., 752, 1636
Livingston, William, 1636
Llewellyn, Karl N., 1578, 1580, 2443, 2681
Locke, John, 185, 324, 512, 521, 530, 593, 634–635, 649, 661, 673, 752, 760, 836, 886, 1052, 1114, 1117, 1387, 1614, 1639–1640, 1786, 1787, 1946, 1962, 1963, 2051, 2052, 2130, 2193, 2211, 2248, 2290, 2297, 2346, 2382, 2439, 2499, 2593, 2834, 2946
Lockhart, William B., 1640–1641
Lockwood, Belva A., 2612, 2920
Lodge, Henry Cabot, 1641, 2360, 2912
Lofgren, Charles, 2121
Long, Huey, 1139, 1234
Long, Russell, 2932
Longworth, Nicholas, 598
Lovejoy, Owen, 3
Loving, Richard, 2307
Lowell, A. Lawrence, 328, 468, 590
Lowell, James Russell, 527
Luban, David, 224
Lurton, Horace H., 113, 1308, 1651–1652, 2634, 2897, 2898
Luther, Martin, 2188
Lutz, Donald, 659
Lyell, Charles, 706
Lynch, Gerard, 2112
Lyon, Mathew, 67, 1883

M

MacArthur, Douglas, 1367, 2734
Machiavelli, Niccolo, 649
MacKinnon, Catharine, 1054, 1134, 1278, 1965, 1967, 1968
MacMillan, James B., 2765
Macon, Nathaniel, 438, 1412, 1655
Madison, Dolley, 1663
Madison, James, 3, 30, 48, 65, 74, 75, 85, 90, 101, 110–111, 114, 148, 159, 160, 163, 174, 176, 177, 178, 180, 226, 288, 291, 322, 326, 342, 343, 356, 375, 378, 386, 424, 437, 438, 449, 454, 467, 484, 495, 496, 503, 505, 508, 509, 510, 514–515, 516, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 536, 540, 543, 546, 547, 548, 551, 552, 553, 554, 558, 559, 563, 635, 645, 661, 665, 673, 728, 739, 752, 755, 763, 785, 794, 795, 805, 806, 829, 832, 835, 841, 869, 877, 896, 927–928, 931, 947–948, 950, 995, 997, 998, 999, 1010–1011, 1013–1015, 1016, 1045, 1047, 1049, 1057, 1058, 1099, 1180, 1185, 1187, 1190, 1238, 1259, 1274, 1290, 1337, 1344, 1371, 1385, 1389,

1392, 1394, 1418, 1420, 1424, 1442, 1458, 1487, 1564, 1601, 1610, 1613, 1655–1659, 1659–1663, 1668, 1682, 1684, 1687, 1691, 1701, 1705–1706, 1727, 1751, 1752, 1754, 1755, 1762, 1790, 1809, 1812, 1857, 1858, 1880, 1882, 1910, 1933, 1937, 1947, 1951, 1956, 1957, 1962, 1963, 2045–2046, 2047, 2051, 2052, 2063, 2095, 2116, 2118, 2119, 2120, 2157, 2187, 2193, 2194, 2201, 2209, 2212, 2213, 2249, 2251, 2280, 2346, 2347, 2348, 2353, 2358, 2370, 2371, 2381, 2383, 2388, 2440, 2461, 2468, 2479, 2500, 2501, 2519, 2540, 2554, 2560, 2590, 2609, 2659, 2660, 2661, 2662, 2663–2664, 2682, 2686–2687, 2689, 2700, 2712, 2719, 2742–2743, 2753, 2754, 2756, 2770, 2781, 2784, 2798–2800, 2801, 2805, 2825, 2835, 2859, 2860, 2861, 2863, 2909, 2938, 2946
Maine, Sir Henry, 526, 562, 672, 2834
Malcolm, Janet, 1696
Malcolm, Joyce, 2348
Malcolm X, 412
Mann, Horace, 3, 2431
Mansfield, Lord. See Murray, William (Lord Mansfield)
Mapplethorpe, Robert, 1136
Marbury, William, 697, 1444, 1632, 1667–1668, 2297, 2590
Marshall, George C., 118, 373, 1687
Marshall, John, 25, 29, 75, 109–111, 156, 163, 171, 188, 197, 198, 207, 212, 241, 256, 266, 277, 278, 325, 333, 337, 339, 341, 344, 345, 348, 356, 376, 378, 436, 437, 438, 439, 450, 452, 454, 455, 456, 459, 460, 466, 493, 497, 498, 509, 526, 552, 555, 556, 558, 559, 563, 568, 569, 570, 571, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 638, 659, 667, 673, 674, 675, 677, 692, 693, 704, 741, 745, 832, 833, 841, 842, 845, 861, 864, 877, 883, 899, 900, 947, 953, 981, 995, 1011, 1013, 1015, 1019, 1067–1068, 1080, 1163, 1175, 1189, 1190, 1191, 1192, 1265, 1266, 1268, 1284, 1287, 1290, 1294, 1338, 1344, 1345, 1348, 1383, 1394, 1396, 1399, 1422, 1424, 1433, 1441, 1443–1444, 1445, 1446, 1460, 1461, 1463, 1465, 1466, 1468, 1469, 1472, 1473, 1474, 1487, 1496, 1498, 1534–1535, 1582, 1583, 1585, 1587, 1589–1590, 1611–1612, 1617, 1633, 1635, 1652, 1662, 1667, 1668–1670, 1672–1676, 1688, 1700, 1705, 1706, 1707, 1712, 1731, 1739, 1752, 1768, 1778, 1790, 1799, 1821, 1835–1836, 1849, 1854–1855, 1864, 1865, 1869, 1882, 1883, 1902, 1904, 1910, 1953, 1963, 1970, 1986, 2059, 2078, 2119, 2120, 2202, 2236, 2280, 2288, 2297, 2384, 2387, 2408, 2497, 2504, 2506, 2512, 2554, 2555, 2556, 2557, 2560, 2561, 2562, 2564, 2565, 2570, 2587, 2589, 2590, 2591, 2600, 2601, 2602, 2604, 2611, 2616, 2633–2634, 2636, 2647, 2651–2652, 2653–2654, 2662, 2664–2665, 2667–2668, 2671, 2672, 2673, 2682, 2687, 2688, 2698, 2712, 2713, 2716, 2732, 2771, 2779, 2783, 2834, 2839, 2848, 2859, 2867, 2871, 2882, 2896, 2897, 2908, 2923, 2935
Marshall, T. H., 367
Marshall, Thurgood, 7, 23, 64, 112, 113, 139–140, 158, 165, 170, 190, 200, 203, 212, 214, 239, 251, 272, 296, 300, 301, 304, 309, 310, 389, 440, 465, 490, 666, 676, 695, 706, 721, 742, 772, 786, 790, 831, 892, 895, 899, 914, 1012, 1018, 1054, 1060, 1064, 1068, 1071, 1140, 1172, 1181, 1197, 1203, 1214, 1233, 1275, 1283, 1285, 1292, 1293, 1327, 1411, 1415, 1426, 1427, 1429, 1450, 1528, 1532, 1558, 1628, 1648, 1665, 1672, 1676–1681, 1681–1687, 1689, 1690, 1694, 1709, 1717, 1723, 1724, 1730, 1735, 1737, 1758, 1761, 1770, 1774, 1789, 1806, 1831, 1844, 1845, 1879, 1889, 1899, 1902, 1907, 1920, 1922, 1939, 2033, 2082, 2141, 2155, 2157, 2168, 2196, 2200, 2231, 2247, 2275, 2295, 2306, 2307, 2310, 2313, 2314, 2317, 2334, 2379, 2398, 2411, 2414, 2417, 2422–2423, 2438, 2451, 2452, 2453, 2548, 2612, 2677, 2695, 2790, 2862, 2869, 2892, 2906, 2916–2917, 2934, 2943
Martin, Luther, 48, 517, 519, 523, 541, 543, 661, 754, 1228, 1426, 1473, 1687–1688, 1706, 1755, 2611
Marx, Gary, 713
Maslow, Will, 83
Mason, Alpheus, 665, 694
Mason, George, 49, 72, 123, 148, 175, 287, 288, 522, 541, 542, 545, 677, 795, 1337, 1692, 1729, 1751, 2051, 2118, 2119, 2499, 2500, 2503, 2799, 2805, 2860
Mason, James, 2431
Mathews, Bonnie, 2915
Matthews, Burneta, 2763
Matthews, Stanley, 3, 199, 681, 1321–1322, 1698–1699, 2828–2829, 2940
Mayhew, Jonathan, 512
Mayo, Henry B., 865
McAdoo, William, 1338–1339
McBain, Howard L., 453
McCaleb, Theodore H., 1710
McCardle, William, 339, 497, 1701
McCarren, Patrick A., 82–83, 605, 1595, 1649
McCarthy, Joseph R., 605, 606, 780, 789, 863, 976, 1233, 1318, 1595, 1649, 1701–1702, 2358, 2794
McClellan, George B., 884, 1265, 2527
McClosky, Herbert, 1577
McClosky, Robert G., 1702, 1703
McCloy, John J., 2290
McConnell, Michael, 895
McCormack, John, 1981
McCormick, Charles, 1923
McCormick, Cyrus, 1230
McCormick, Robert, 2064
McCree, Wade Hampton, Jr., 1704–1705
McDougal, Myres, 1826
McDougall, Alexander, 2235
McDuffie, George, 558
McFarland, Carl, 734
McFarlane, Robert, 622, 1403
McGowan, Carl, 1460, 1707–1708
McGrath, J. Howard, 1358
McHenry, James, 517, 1708
McIlwain, Charles, 1338, 1708–1709
McKeldin, Theodore R., 2438
McKenna, Joseph, 26, 263, 1290, 1294, 1709–1710, 1711, 2635, 2637, 2896, 2898, 2900, 2907
McKinley, John, 159, 325, 1710–1711, 2651
McKinley, William, 589, 597, 749, 1164, 1329, 1709, 1711, 1763, 1784, 2002, 2048, 2291, 2580, 2898
McKitrick, Eric, 1339
McLaughlin, Andrew C., 159, 1006, 1711, 1909
McLean, John, 184, 245, 675, 681, 820, 1238, 1412, 1617, 1686, 1711–1713, 1791, 2555, 2628, 2651, 2867, 2885
McMillan, James B., 2627
McReynolds, James C., 32, 107, 127, 128, 259, 284, 317, 441, 457, 458, 697, 698, 737, 743, 921, 1030, 1065, 1201–1202, 1284, 1311, 1314, 1714–1715, 1724, 1753, 1772, 1908, 2470, 2544, 2563, 2573, 2636, 2637, 2809, 2882, 2896, 2899
Mead, William, 1512
Meese, Edwin, 135, 616, 667, 1291, 1394, 1715, 1801, 2127, 2451, 2714
Meiklejohn, Alexander, 17, 231, 426, 427, 769, 1047, 1126, 1128, 1628, 1716, 1922, 2214

Mellen, G. W. F., 3
Melville, Herman, 892, 1782
Merriam, Charles E., 717
Metzenbaum, Howard, 46
Michelman, Frank, 1588, 1973, 1974, 2033, 2576
Micke, William, 310
Mifflin, Thomas, 1726
Mill, John Stuart, 15, 350, 1046, 1126, 1671, 1730–1731, 1838, 2534, 2593
Miller, Arthur Selwyn, 1792
Miller, George L., 1224
Miller, John, 355
Miller, Samuel F., 112, 216, 218, 283, 338, 339, 341, 342, 747, 1037, 1175, 1184, 1339, 1536, 1581, 1582, 1594, 1636, 1731–1734, 1736, 1753, 2075, 2423–2424, 2570, 2679, 2680, 2817, 2824, 2825–2826, 2828, 2938
Milligan, Lambden, 1736
Milton, John, 1046, 1671, 1737–1739, 1807, 1949, 2172, 2211, 2381, 2593
Ming, William R., 1528
Minor, Francis, 2807–2808
Minor, Virginia, 2807–2080, 2920
Minton, Sherman, 279, 1740, 1991, 2675, 2791, 2793, 2794, 2941
Miranda, Ernesto, 1741, 1925–1926
Mistretta, John, 1749
Mitchell, Billy, 1954
Mitchell, John N., 134–135, 2761–2762
Mitchell, Todd, 2913
Mitchell, William D., 596, 2612
Monaghan, Henry, 1860, 1862, 1867
Mondale, Walter F., 616, 2786
Monroe, James, 30, 288, 291, 424, 433, 454, 506, 554, 555, 556, 558, 941, 1075, 1190, 1385, 1407, 1425, 1636, 1689, 1712, 1754, 1755, 1874, 2468, 2609, 2697, 2779, 2825, 2884, 2913
Montesquieu, Charles Louis de S., Baron de, 214, 245, 343, 376, 521, 635, 637, 641, 661, 1010, 1013, 1470, 1640, 1755–1756, 2211, 2212, 2382, 2716, 2834
Moody, William H., 135, 893, 1164, 1756, 2292, 2630, 2744, 2897
Moore, Alfred, 1756, 2601
Moore, Inez, 1756
Morgan, J. P., 219, 224, 1594
Morgan, Thomas J., 587
Morison, Samuel Eliot, 1339
Morrill, Justin, 1087, 1761
Morris, Gouverneur, 49, 287, 521, 661, 947, 1487, 1751, 1752, 1753, 1761–1762, 1985, 1986, 2358, 2479, 2805
Morris, Robert, 1761, 1762, 1762–1763
Morrison, Alexia, 2463
Morrow, William W., 1763
Morse, Wayne, 2788–2789
Mosley, Earl, 1922
Motley, Constance Baker, 2763
Mott, Lucretia, 370, 2366, 2477, 2806
Mounier, J. J., 2500
Muhlenberg, Frederick A., 1058
Mulroney, Brian, 1826
Mundt, Karl, 1766–1767
Munro, William B., 453
Murphy, Frank, 33, 129, 131, 136, 244, 331, 385, 458, 605, 815, 830, 861, 945, 1025, 1042, 1065, 1233, 1355, 1417, 1768–1769, 1907, 2008, 2282, 2283, 2289, 2292–2293, 2302, 2329, 2545–2546, 2548, 2549, 2699, 2791, 2793, 2795, 2796, 2929, 2930, 2931, 2937, 2938
Murphy, Jack, 1770
Murphy, Paul L., 1769–1770
Murray, William (Lord Mansfield), 2, 197, 1099, 1338, 1770–1771, 2452, 2712, 2905
Myrdal, Gunnar, 2441

N

Nast, Thomas, 1322
Nathanson, Nathaniel, 2529, 2531
Neagle, David, 2311
Neale, Thomas, 1970
Nearing, Scott, 78
Nedham, Marchamont, 2382
Nell, William C., 370
Nelson, Samuel, 113, 339, 340, 1230, 1581, 1582, 1745, 1791–1792, 2022, 2557, 2698, 2868
Nelson, Steve, 1894
Neuborne, Burt, 378
Newman, Jon O., 1452
Newton, Isaac, 1633, 2712–2713
Nicholls, Francis, 2894
Nietzsche, Friedrich, 757
Nimmer, Melville B., 1807–1808
Nixon, L. A., 2809
Nixon, Richard M., 48, 49, 65, 112, 113, 114–115, 126–127, 158, 190, 191, 209, 248, 250, 260, 262, 266, 270, 272, 281, 289, 377, 380, 433, 494, 495, 498, 609, 610, 614, 615, 617, 618, 679, 699, 715, 755, 773, 863, 875, 886, 949, 1003, 1026, 1070, 1075, 1232, 1242, 1307, 1339, 1341, 1349, 1359, 1360, 1402, 1595, 1615, 1650, 1676–1677, 1737, 1766–1767, 1770, 1781, 1793, 1815–1817, 1817–1818, 1819, 1822, 1878, 1954, 1969, 1994, 1995, 2002, 2152, 2156, 2159, 2160, 2227, 2312, 2320, 2365, 2384, 2414–2415, 2448, 2481, 2487, 2541, 2561–2562, 2592–2593, 2609, 2614, 2627, 2664, 2734, 2784–2785, 2789, 2790, 2836, 2838, 2842, 2864, 2865, 2886
Nixon, Walter, 1340, 1341
Noia, Charles, 975
Noonan, John T., Jr., 92
Noriega, Manuel, 2002, 2843
Norris, Clarence, 1825
Norris, George W., 595, 596, 598, 1310–1311, 1825, 2079, 2666, 2740–2741, 2883
North, Lord, 245
North, Oliver, 622, 1403
Nortz, E. C., 1201

O

Oakely, Thomas, 1190
Oaks, Dallin H., 938
O'Brien, David, 817, 818
O'Brien, John Lord, 1606–1607
O'Connor, Sandra Day, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 14, 24, 55, 56, 58, 63, 70, 98, 112, 113, 137, 165, 203, 251, 273, 277, 312, 359, 508, 616, 686, 695, 703, 732, 827, 848, 892, 894–895, 915, 916, 924, 925, 983, 991, 1032, 1054, 1068, 1110, 1156, 1202, 1209, 1253, 1283, 1293, 1391, 1427, 1435, 1529, 1530, 1531, 1602, 1653, 1691, 1723, 1724, 1735, 1746, 1783, 1813, 1824, 1831, 1841–1846, 1856, 1877, 1885, 1886, 1895, 1915, 1928, 2012, 2020, 2056, 2082, 2108, 2122, 2123, 2127, 2137, 2158, 2159, 2161, 2168, 2169, 2173, 2175, 2196, 2207, 2226, 2231, 2248, 2269, 2270, 2276, 2313, 2314, 2315, 2338, 2379, 2387, 2392, 2409, 2418, 2419, 2456, 2582, 2589, 2607, 2661, 2666, 2681, 2697, 2698, 2699, 2833, 2866, 2872, 2921, 2933, 2934
Ogden, David B., 436
Old, William, 451
Olmstead, Gideon, 1441, 1442
Olmstead, Roy, 1849
Olney, Richard, 429, 1850–1851, 1959
Olson, Theodore, 2463
Ordronaux, John, 452
Ortega y Gassett, José, 378
Otis, James, Jr., 132, 208, 512, 533, 1097, 1099, 1174, 1865–1866, 1888–1889, 2781
Otis, Samuel A., 1058
Overton, William Ray, 2765

P

Pacificus. See Hamilton, Alexander
Paine, Thomas, 27, 84, 246, 513, 537, 1365, 1874, 2297
Paley, William, 85
Palmer, A. Mitchell, 135, 1303, 1875, 2352
Palmieri, Edmund, 1195
Palmore, Linda, 1875–1876
Pardee, Don Albert, 1877–1878
Parker, Isaac, 332, 1159
Parker, Joel, 451
Parker, John J. H., 49, 114–115, 595, 1303, 2638
Parker, Theodore, 370, 2431
Parsons, James, 2763
Paschal, George Washington, 2680
Passman, Otto, 748
Paterson, William, 290, 360, 517, 519, 520, 542–543, 673, 980, 1067, 1324, 1432, 1682, 1800, 1882–1884, 2051, 2564, 2601, 2602, 2781, 2782, 2859
Patman, Wright, 2283
Patterson, James, 1339
Paul, Alice, 2918
Payne, Daniel A., 2433
Peckham, Rufus W., 70, 241, 330, 430, 844, 1163, 1164, 1165, 1166, 1167, 1169, 1288, 1415, 1638, 1651, 1700, 1704, 1710, 1890–1891, 2298, 2414, 2635, 2714–2715, 2895, 2897, 2940
Peckham, Wheeler H., 114
Peirce, Charles, 757, 1982
Pekelis, Alexander A., 83
Pendleton, Edmund, 467, 1692, 1891–1892, 2662, 2754, 2935
Pendleton, George H., 1892
Penn, Lemuel A., 1240
Penn, William, 282, 489, 635, 1512, 1664, 1800, 1892, 1894
Pepper, George Wharton, 2612
Perkins, Frances, 2936
Perot, Ross, 431
Perry, Michael, 1502, 2175
Perry, Twila, 46
Peters, Richard, 156, 980, 1156, 1441, 1902, 2601, 2883
Pfeffer, Leo, 83
Phelps, Edward J., 1903
Philips, Josiah, 174
Phillips, Wendell, 3, 2431, 2540
Pickering, John, 552, 1673, 1684, 1821, 1906, 2763
Pierce, Charlotte Woodward, 2808
Pierce, Franklin, 258, 298, 416, 477, 565, 566, 574, 1413, 1625, 1908
Pierce, William, 517, 1908
Pinckney, Charles, 180, 287, 322, 385, 436, 502, 517, 520, 522, 661, 805, 1800, 1909, 2601
Pinckney, Charles Cotesworth, 522, 1432, 1909
Pine, David, 2527, 2735
Pinkney, William, 1706, 1910, 2611, 2871
Pitney, Mahlon, 684, 864, 1100, 1308, 1309, 1350, 1804, 1911–1912, 2571, 2634, 2637, 2896, 2899, 2939
Pitt, William, 533, 1912, 2657
Pitt, William, the Younger, 245
Plato, 1364, 1946
Plessy, Homer A., 1918
Plutarch, 2211
Pocahontas, 1646
Poindexter, John M., 622, 1403
Polenberg, Richard, 2219
Polk, James K., 159, 416, 430, 563, 565, 574, 1229, 1413, 1620, 1958–1959, 2469–2470, 2527, 2884, 2908
Pollak, Louis, 1792
Pollak, Walter H., 1959
Pollock, Sir Frederick, 527, 751, 1296, 1308
Pollock, Stewart, 2502
Pomeroy, John N., 451, 1429
Posner, Richard, 657, 658, 660, 2444
Pound, Roscoe, 154, 328, 378, 674, 864, 1192, 1580, 1715, 1972, 1982, 2442, 2444, 2445–2446
Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr., 501, 1306, 1981
Powell, Colin, 118
Powell, Lewis F., Jr., 22, 53, 56, 57, 72, 113, 114, 116, 133, 158, 165, 209, 226, 239, 272, 274, 277, 301, 305, 307, 310, 318, 327, 380, 396, 430, 440, 447, 464, 688, 706, 707, 710, 712, 794, 829, 830, 831, 915, 1060, 1071, 1135, 1143, 1157, 1181, 1189, 1203, 1205, 1237, 1250, 1285, 1304, 1326, 1328, 1370, 1394, 1396, 1416, 1426, 1434, 1459, 1526, 1529, 1530, 1535, 1558, 1586, 1587, 1588, 1599–1600, 1602, 1665, 1679, 1702, 1703, 1724, 1737, 1756, 1781, 1789, 1817, 1819, 1849, 1886, 1893, 1920, 1939, 1975–1980, 2046, 2104, 2127, 2146, 2154, 2159, 2161, 2168, 2200, 2205, 2207, 2208, 2232, 2247, 2299, 2309, 2313, 2319–2320, 2385, 2390, 2401, 2415, 2417, 2418, 2450, 2517, 2582–2583, 2694, 2706, 2713, 2732, 2869, 2880, 2917, 2933, 2934, 2940, 2943
Powell, Thomas Reed, 817, 1000, 1007, 1980–1981, 2641
Powys, Sir Thomas, 208
Pratt, Charles (Lord Camden), 216, 512, 1099, 1985, 2236, 2657, 2905
Preston, Thomas, 26
Price, Richard, 512
Prigg, Edward, 2006, 2430
Pritchett, C. Herman, 1461
Prosser, William L., 2014
Proxmire, William, 1324, 2359, 2464
Publius, 1786
Pufendorf, Samuel, 752

Q

Quackenbush, Charles, 20
Quincy, Edmund, 3–4
Quinlan, Karen Ann, 2268

R

Radin, Max, 2848
Raleigh, Sir Walter, 439
Randolph, Edmund, 26, 114, 134, 160, 288, 322, 454, 520, 521, 522, 544, 546, 877, 980, 1015, 1158, 1259, 1882, 1909, 2115–2116, 2119, 2358, 2601, 2611, 2684, 2703, 2800, 2860, 2861
Randolph, John, 337, 551, 558, 1339, 2117, 2346, 2591, 2737
Rantoul, Robert, 560
Ratner, Leonard, 1502
Raulston, John T., 2666
Ravara, Joseph, 980
Rawle, William, 450, 2124, 2346
Rawls, John, 2174, 2297
Read, George, 2124
Reagan, Ronald, 9, 12, 48, 50, 92–93, 98, 112, 113, 114–115, 206, 209, 248, 262, 273, 280, 281, 282, 289, 432, 614, 615, 616, 617, 619, 620, 621–622, 625, 699, 715, 776, 824, 948, 969, 1003, 1008, 1018, 1062, 1079, 1219, 1291, 1304, 1394, 1402, 1529, 1574, 1576, 1626, 1680, 1719, 1744, 1813, 1840, 1841, 1842, 1844, 1857, 1887, 1916, 1993, 1994, 2124–2129, 2154, 2157, 2159, 2160, 2168, 2312, 2313, 2315, 2361, 2451, 2453, 2481, 2501, 2589, 2610, 2695, 2742, 2755, 2785, 2786, 2811, 2843
Redfield, Isaac, 2507
Reed, Sally, 2390

Reed, Stanley F., 33, 107, 244, 253, 254, 317, 458, 804, 921, 1065, 1198, 1256, 1436, 1645, 1655, 1704, 1713, 1761, 1768, 2144–2145, 2289, 2292–2293, 2437, 2548, 2793, 2794, 2795, 2849, 2852, 2941
Rehnquist, William H., 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 15, 56, 64, 71, 98, 115, 117, 118–119, 150, 158, 165, 184, 192, 201, 204, 212, 226, 251, 263, 272, 276, 277, 293, 296, 301, 317, 327, 331, 345, 347, 359, 380, 381, 429, 430, 440, 446, 447, 464, 487, 508, 690, 695, 704, 707, 711, 732, 761, 762, 775, 788, 802, 831, 853, 898, 899, 935, 983, 993, 1012, 1054, 1055, 1060, 1062, 1063, 1064, 1071, 1082, 1157, 1172, 1199, 1202, 1203, 1205, 1214, 1292, 1322, 1327, 1332, 1345, 1391, 1396, 1411, 1443, 1471, 1529, 1530, 1562, 1570, 1587, 1600, 1602, 1634, 1643, 1679, 1722, 1724, 1725, 1726, 1729–1730, 1747, 1750, 1758, 1763, 1776, 1801, 1802, 1817, 1824, 1831, 1841, 1842, 1844, 1879, 1885, 1886, 1888, 1889, 1893, 1900, 1927, 1969, 2012, 2033, 2055, 2056, 2060, 2127, 2152–2160, 2196, 2199, 2205, 2207, 2232, 2246, 2262, 2266, 2268–2269, 2270, 2275, 2287, 2295, 2299, 2300, 2306, 2313, 2314, 2315, 2317, 2351, 2379, 2395, 2409, 2418, 2452, 2455, 2456, 2463, 2472, 2487, 2492, 2502, 2535, 2537, 2572, 2576, 2589, 2605, 2606, 2620, 2646, 2663, 2680, 2681, 2695, 2696, 2699, 2700, 2702, 2732, 2750, 2751, 2789, 2798, 2821, 2872, 2914, 2943
Reich, Charles, 377
Reid, Thomas, 2909
Reno, Janet, 1360
Reston, James, 1104
Reynolds, William Bradford, 616, 2451
Rhett, Robert B., 1833
Rhodes, James, 2319
Richards, David, 1838
Richardson, Elliot, 209, 1359, 2449
Riddick, Gregory, 2913
Ritchie, Thomas, 1412
Roane, Spencer, 438, 555, 1424, 1668, 1686, 1689, 1705, 1706, 1707, 2280, 2590–2591
Roberts, Owen D., 2612
Roberts, Owen J., 107, 284–285, 299, 317, 321, 444, 457, 458, 697, 1065, 1107, 1193, 1256, 1285, 1303, 1311, 1314, 1316, 1317, 1416, 1417, 1447, 1715, 1768, 1789, 2021, 2066, 2115, 2261, 2281–2282, 2329, 2437, 2544, 2548, 2681, 2793, 2809, 2820, 2882, 2931, 2937
Robinson, Joseph T., 698, 2289
Rock, John S., 2611–2612
Rockefeller, John D., 2472
Rockefeller, Nelson, 679
Rodell, Fred, 453
Rodney, Caesar A., 2284
Roe, Gilbert E., 2047
Roosevelt, Eleanor, 607
Roosevelt, Franklin D., 4, 62, 70, 75, 112, 113, 114, 119, 130, 131, 142, 168, 171, 173, 185, 226, 230, 260, 262, 266, 285, 343, 348, 373, 378, 379, 386, 420, 431, 452, 456, 458, 495, 496, 498, 504, 527, 590, 591, 594, 596–597, 597–600, 601–602, 609, 614, 697, 698, 699, 734, 736, 754, 813, 814, 875, 885, 886, 942, 944, 954, 976, 1002, 1101, 1202, 1288, 1301, 1311, 1312–1313, 1316, 1318, 1349, 1366, 1410, 1416, 1429, 1437, 1452, 1456, 1457, 1478, 1479, 1488, 1494, 1532, 1563, 1582, 1595, 1615, 1634, 1714, 1715, 1740, 1751, 1761, 1768, 1775, 1793, 1794, 1796, 1815, 1825, 1935, 1954, 1995, 1999, 2002, 2079, 2085, 2115, 2124, 2125, 2126, 2127, 2143, 2274, 2281, 2287–2291, 2292, 2302, 2317, 2364, 2437, 2453, 2505, 2544, 2548, 2551, 2592, 2604, 2633, 2666, 2733, 2738, 2742, 2780, 2785, 2820, 2841, 2848, 2878, 2881, 2884, 2929, 2930, 2932, 2936
Roosevelt, Theodore, 112, 134, 433, 575, 588, 589–590, 597, 748, 941, 1024, 1025, 1161, 1164, 1167, 1234, 1263, 1284, 1540, 1557, 1641, 1709, 1714, 1756, 1828, 1995–1996, 2047, 2287, 2291–2292, 2413, 2591, 2634, 2733, 2780, 2786, 2808, 2894, 2897, 2898, 2911
Root, Elihu, 1746
Rosenberg, Ethel and Julius, 280, 2294, 2794
Rosenberg, Gerald, 701
Rossiter, Clinton, 265, 324, 1402, 1996, 2295
Rostow, Eugene, 1416, 1792
Roth, Samuel, 1838
Rousseau, Jean-Jacques, 448, 1052, 1904, 2346, 2461
Royce, Josiah, 1263
Rubin, Edward, 990
Ruckleshaus, William, 209, 2449
Rudman, Warren B., 1219
Ruffin, Edmund, 1833
Ruffin, Thomas, 558
Russell, Charles T., 2189
Russell, Francis, 468
Russo, Anthony, 2010
Rutherford, Joseph F., 1065
Rutledge, Edward, 538, 2601
Rutledge, John, 48, 49, 440, 1432, 2301, 2359, 2364, 2600, 2601, 2861
Rutledge, Wiley B., 33, 112, 204, 440, 815, 931, 1199, 1355, 1704, 1740, 1990, 1991, 2008, 2060, 2289, 2292–2293, 2302–2303, 2370, 2529, 2530, 2531, 2535, 2546, 2548, 2549, 2583, 2791, 2793, 2796, 2930, 2937, 2938

S

Sacco, Nicola, 78, 467, 468, 1281
Sacks, Albert, 1274, 1578, 1579
Sadat, Anwar, 320
Sadler, John, 2381–2382
St. Clair, Arthur, Jr., 1594, 1711
St. John, Henry (Viscount Bolingbroke), 512
Sallust, 2211
Sanborn, John B., 191
Sandalow, Terrance, 632
Sanford, Edward, 35, 146, 1198, 1264, 1921, 2310–2311, 2326, 2637, 2902
Sanford, John F. A., 818
Sanger, Margaret, 182, 1122, 2325
Santayana, George, 1263
Sawyer, Charles, 2526
Sawyer, Lorenzo, 2311
Sax, Joseph, 2511
Scalia, Antonin, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 15, 55, 56, 98, 115, 139, 192, 202, 203, 204, 209, 227, 239, 243, 296, 312, 345, 359, 380, 381, 508, 695, 703, 707, 732, 733, 778, 805, 894, 895, 903, 918, 982, 983, 990, 1012, 1055, 1062, 1208, 1253, 1291, 1293, 1327, 1435, 1460, 1529, 1530, 1573, 1576, 1602, 1627, 1651, 1691, 1750, 1766, 1782–1783, 1814, 1831, 1832, 1885, 1886, 1939, 2056, 2082, 2108, 2123–2124, 2127, 2150, 2151, 2157, 2158, 2159, 2160, 2161, 2163, 2168, 2173, 2196, 2231, 2248, 2287, 2300–2301, 2312–2316, 2324, 2327, 2337, 2379, 2387, 2409, 2419, 2454, 2456, 2463, 2475, 2517, 2518, 2568, 2607, 2645, 2681, 2696, 2698–2699, 2711, 2751, 2798, 2913
Scalia, Catherine Louise Panaro, 2312
Scalia, S. Eugene, 2312
Scheiber, Harry N., 889, 890
Schenck, Charles, 1710
Schick, Maurice, 2319
Schlesinger, Arthur, Jr., 1349, 1402, 1996

Schofield, John M., 1429
Schouler, James, 452, 2324
Schroeder, Theodore, 2324–2325
Schuck, Peter, 183
Schumpeter, Joseph, 333
Schwartz, Bernard, 2325
Schwellenbach, Lewis, 1794
Schwimmer, Rosiki, 2325–2326
Scopes, John, 78, 157, 2666
Scott, Dred, 736, 2432
Scott, Winfield, 2476
Seabrook, Whitemarsh, 1832
Seale, Bobby, 1955
Seidman, Louis Michael, 2123
Selden, John, 828, 2355–2356
Sellin, Thorsten, 309
Serrano, Andres, 1136
Seward, William H., 3, 1085, 2117, 2216, 2389, 2431, 2584, 2663, 2692, 2884, 2885
Shakespeare, William, 491
Shapiro, David L., 2154
Shapiro, Martin, 1792
Shapiro, Michael, 2060
Sharfman, Isaiah, 1396
Sharpe, Granville, 512
Shaw, Lemuel, 198, 332, 467, 560, 561, 562, 681, 708, 889, 1160, 1617, 1918, 2282, 2283, 2408–2409, 2417, 2506–2507, 2508, 2510, 2583, 2648, 2934–2935
Shays, Daniel, 2410
Shellabarger, Samuel, 339, 504–505
Sheppard, Sam, 1150, 1179
Sherman, John, 1339, 2412, 2413
Sherman, Roger, 48, 175, 538, 543, 752, 1228, 2412
Sherwood, Forest, 1257
Shiras, George, 112, 330, 1164, 1273, 2413–2414
Shirley, J. M., 674
Shively, Jill, 2915
Sickles, Daniel, 2476
Sidney, Algernon, 2211
Sidoti, Anthony, 1875–1876
Sieyès, Emmanuel Joseph (Abbé), 2500
Simon, Paul, 2365
Simpson, Nicole Brown, 2915
Simpson, O. J., 1152, 2915
Sims, Thomas, 2431
Singer, Joseph William, 1984
Sirica, John, 1817
Skinner, Quentin, 630
Smith, Abby, 370
Smith, Adam, 593, 834, 1946
Smith, Alfred E., 597
Smith, Gerrit, 3
Smith, J. Allen, 453, 754, 2046–2047, 2436
Smith, James Everet, 1932
Smith, James Morton, 738, 1770
Smith, Joseph, 2715
Smith, Melancton, 763
Smith, Roger, 183
Smith, William French, 134–135
Smith, William Kennedy, 2915
Smith, William Loughton, 1058
Smolin, David, 2175
Snepp, Frank W., 2438
Sobeloff, Simon E., 2438
Soper, Philip, 900–901
Sorauf, Frank, 1940
Souter, David H., 12, 14, 50, 103, 202, 211, 238, 281, 282, 312, 359, 436, 732, 803, 1291, 1320, 1530, 1531, 1651, 1680, 1747, 1813, 1831–1832, 1845, 1915, 2161, 2168, 2179, 2246, 2270, 2419, 2453–2456, 2518, 2702, 2714
Spaight, Richard Dobbs, 166, 1403, 2462
Spencer, Herbert, 451, 593, 2878
Spinoza, Baruch, 1870
Spock, Benjamin, 709, 2441, 2790
Spooner, Lysander, 3
Stalin, Joseph, 1702
Stanbery, Henry S., 1429, 1736, 2471
Stanford, Leland, 1709
Stanton, Edwin M., 126, 134, 288, 579, 948, 1225, 1339, 1428, 1745, 2476, 2540, 2669
Stanton, Elizabeth Cady, 91, 370, 1092, 2253, 2366, 2476–2477, 2806, 2918
Stanton, Harriot, 2477
Stanton, Henry Brewster, 2476
Stanton, Theodore, 2477
Starr, Kenneth, 127, 433, 434, 625, 954, 1360, 2386
Steinbeck, John, 861
Stephens, Alexander H., 451, 478, 1622, 1623, 2527–2528, 2705, 2884
Steuben, Friedrich Wilhelm von, 831
Stevens, John Paul, 7, 12, 15, 54, 56, 59, 157, 170, 203, 214, 226, 273, 277, 279, 293, 298, 301, 304, 310, 313, 327, 345, 369, 429, 433, 442, 444, 465, 505, 626, 687, 695, 704, 803, 871, 890, 914, 1012, 1062, 1063, 1064, 1068, 1118, 1144, 1214, 1237, 1254, 1272, 1293, 1435, 1530, 1575, 1586–1587, 1627, 1651, 1672, 1717, 1725, 1726, 1757, 1782, 1783, 1831, 1843, 1877, 1889, 1893, 1915, 1969, 2033, 2052, 2122, 2123, 2137, 2161, 2168, 2182, 2196, 2206, 2208, 2230, 2231, 2232, 2242–2243, 2244, 2245, 2247, 2266, 2267, 2270, 2277, 2295, 2306, 2313, 2314, 2317, 2379, 2392, 2395, 2419, 2438, 2455, 2456, 2529–2539, 2574, 2605, 2620, 2698, 2699, 2702, 2832–2833, 2862, 2863, 2883, 2904, 2940, 2943
Stevens, Thaddeus, 4, 181, 504, 1085, 1339, 1528, 1728, 2216, 2520, 2539–2540
Stevens, Wallace, 668
Stevenson, Adlai, 1200
Stewart, Alvan, 3, 561
Stewart, Potter J., 1, 70, 142, 152, 170, 203, 226, 242, 273, 277, 280, 301, 310, 311, 430, 446, 447, 741, 830, 896, 897, 899, 906, 927, 929, 1018, 1123, 1139, 1140, 1172, 1199, 1230, 1240, 1271, 1272, 1273, 1285, 1320, 1414, 1452, 1527, 1542, 1548, 1602, 1646, 1666, 1716–1717, 1735, 1737, 1741, 1789, 1806, 1812, 1846, 1879, 1899, 1902, 1904, 1928, 1965, 1976, 2102, 2161, 2200, 2228, 2230, 2242, 2271, 2275, 2299, 2412, 2415, 2476, 2487, 2541–2543, 2565, 2589, 2604, 2608, 2627, 2746, 2802, 2832, 2855, 2878, 2914, 2917, 2939, 2940, 2943
Stewart, Richard B., 902
Stimson, Henry L., 2290
Stone, Geoffrey R., 1646
Stone, Harlan Fiske, 52, 107, 112–113, 114, 134, 152, 219, 221, 285, 286, 314, 317, 321, 388, 441, 457, 458, 595, 693, 697, 743, 792, 793, 795, 814, 817, 830, 838, 910, 1011, 1018, 1050, 1065, 1101, 1102, 1177, 1198, 1226, 1256, 1262, 1263, 1290, 1311, 1314, 1381, 1404, 1416, 1438, 1439, 1715, 1760–1761, 1802, 1874, 1879, 1990, 2085, 2115, 2121–2122, 2156, 2172, 2227, 2230, 2281, 2282, 2288, 2289, 2292–2293, 2302, 2310, 2318, 2349, 2422, 2437, 2445, 2458, 2471, 2494, 2522, 2543–2547, 2548, 2575, 2576, 2589, 2592, 2593, 2604, 2605, 2606, 2624, 2634, 2636, 2637, 2645, 2668, 2746, 2758, 2791, 2820, 2882, 2931, 2937
Storing, Herbert J., 101, 2553
Story, Joseph, 112, 156, 159, 162, 245, 298, 333, 344, 360, 362, 423, 437, 438, 450, 466, 555, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 674, 675, 677, 681, 735, 742, 745, 746, 813, 832, 842, 981, 1159, 1175, 1228, 1230, 1265, 1336, 1337, 1365, 1465, 1479, 1503, 1633, 1635, 1662, 1682, 1683, 1685, 1689–1690, 1691, 1700, 1710, 1712, 1901, 1986, 1994, 2006, 2121, 2218, 2346, 2348, 2430, 2506, 2512, 2553–2557, 2590, 2629, 2648,

Story, Joseph (continued)
2649, 2651, 2654, 2670, 2671, 2681, 2684, 2698, 2732, 2736, 2779, 2783, 2832, 2859, 2868, 2885
Stourzh, Gerald, 635
Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 180, 1091
Strader, Jacob, 2431
Strong, William, 200, 216, 336, 338, 340, 1038, 1225, 1581, 1582, 1753, 1904, 2420, 2559, 2563–2564, 2825, 2827
Sullivan, L. B., 1805
Sumner, Charles, 3, 4, 404, 504, 577, 735, 1086, 1339, 2217, 2282, 2360, 2431, 2433, 2520, 2521, 2540, 2557, 2583–2584, 2612, 2691, 2824, 2830
Sumner, William Graham, 451
Sustein, Cass, 2576
Sutherland, George, 35–36, 219, 284, 315, 321, 441, 457, 458, 628, 631, 697, 720, 736–737, 951, 1101, 1157, 1193, 1194, 1234, 1264, 1301, 1311, 1314, 1318, 1344, 1437, 1634, 1710, 1724, 1887, 1904, 2143, 2260, 2281, 2544, 2608, 2625–2627, 2636, 2637, 2746, 2780, 2820, 2882
Swaggart, Jimmy, 1427
Swartwout, Samuel, 705
Swayne, Noah, 218, 338, 339, 341, 403, 1184, 1581, 1698, 1736, 1753, 1829, 2564, 2628, 2680, 2827
Swindler, William, 1458
Swisher, Carl B., 453, 2630
Synar, Michael, 1219

T

Tacitus, 2211
Taft, Horace, 2635
Taft, Robert A., 289, 603, 1651, 1687, 1715, 1935, 2633
Taft, William Howard, 15, 35, 36, 52, 110–111, 112, 113, 114, 151, 219, 221, 260, 261, 281, 283, 346, 348, 421, 448, 460, 588, 589–590, 593, 594, 607, 699, 748, 750, 1020, 1024, 1167, 1262, 1263, 1264, 1309, 1337, 1376, 1452, 1497–1498, 1540, 1558, 1709, 1714, 1764, 1772, 1850, 1911, 1996, 2210, 2281, 2291, 2292, 2298, 2310, 2311, 2314, 2421, 2470, 2501, 2544, 2545, 2546, 2560, 2595, 2604, 2605, 2606, 2626, 2633–2637, 2637–2642, 2733, 2746, 2755, 2757, 2780, 2881, 2882, 2894, 2895, 2896, 2897, 2898, 2899, 2904, 2911, 2917
Talleyrand, Charles, 1673
Tallmadge, James, 1748
Taney, Roger B., 1, 2, 110, 112, 113, 114, 134, 145–146, 159, 164, 169, 183, 190, 244, 252, 256, 258, 325, 333, 335, 364, 367, 416, 455, 568, 569, 579, 667, 675, 735, 742, 754, 801, 819, 820, 829, 832, 844, 886, 908, 909, 1158, 1160, 1230, 1238, 1287, 1290, 1356, 1409, 1412, 1432, 1613, 1617, 1620, 1623, 1625, 1652–1653, 1710, 1712, 1736, 1748, 1791, 1869, 1901, 1910, 1947, 2006, 2022, 2202, 2210, 2216, 2217, 2274, 2408, 2424, 2425, 2432, 2436, 2506, 2512, 2555, 2556, 2557, 2561, 2587, 2591, 2604, 2630, 2647–2650, 2651–2656, 2664–2665, 2687, 2698, 2806–2807, 2841, 2867, 2868, 2871, 2934
Tappan, Lewis, 3
Taylor, Harriet, 1730, 2346
Taylor, John, 438, 450, 556, 1424, 1705, 1707, 2662–2663
Taylor, Zachary, 112, 114, 477, 564, 565, 1044, 1959, 2001, 2430, 2663, 2884
Tazewell, Littleton W., 2611
Ten Broek, Jacobus, 907, 2665
Tenney, Jack B., 2667
Thacher, Oxenbridge, 1888
Thatch, C. C., Jr., 947
Thayer, James Bradley, 1101, 1161, 1263, 1446, 1460, 1588, 1705, 2214, 2684–2685
Thayer, Webster Bradley, 468
Thernstrom, Abigail, 2811–2812
Thomas, Clarence, 12, 15, 58, 282, 298, 345, 407, 727, 733, 990, 1530, 1643, 1750, 1751, 2056, 2108, 2159, 2168, 2169, 2225, 2287, 2315, 2406, 2409, 2419, 2455, 2456, 2670, 2695, 2695–2696, 2798, 2811–2812
Thomas, Lorenzo, 2669
Thomas, Norman, 78
Thompson, Francis, 69
Thompson, Seymour D., 199
Thompson, Smith, 675, 1238, 1683, 1686, 1700, 1898, 2649, 2652, 2697–2698
Thoreau, Henry David, 369, 370, 816, 1049
Thornberry, Homer, 114
Thorpe, Francis Newton, 680, 2700
Thorpe, Merle, 452
Thurmond, Strom, 112, 605, 1813, 2520
Tiedeman, Christopher G., 451, 528, 585, 1155, 2508, 2571, 2701
Tiffany, Joel, 3
Tilden, Samuel J., 189, 319, 478, 581
Tilghman, William, 1159
Tillich, Paul, 2173
Tilson, John G., 589
Tocqueville, Alexis de, 137, 331, 498, 510, 526, 1236, 1365, 1476, 1681, 1837, 1955, 1982, 2073, 2461–2462, 2480, 2651, 2703–2704
Todd, Thomas, 1683, 2704, 2732
Tollison, Robert, 2064
Toombs, Robert A., 2527, 2705, 2884
Tourgee, Albion, 1167
Tower, John, 115, 1402
Trenchard, John, 324
Tribe, Laurence H., 659–660, 1503, 1826, 2094, 2298, 2316
Trimble, Robert, 2732
Truax, William, 2733
Truman, Harry S., 68, 112, 113, 114, 118, 137–138, 279, 289, 319, 389, 393, 420, 433, 503, 598, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 748, 886, 942, 944, 945, 946, 948, 976, 1025, 1075, 1358, 1385, 1402, 1430, 1436, 1532, 1541, 1649, 1687, 1702, 1740, 1921, 2081, 2384, 2411, 2448, 2453, 2526, 2614, 2633, 2642, 2733–2735, 2757, 2786, 2787, 2788, 2791, 2793, 2794, 2836, 2837, 2842, 2932, 2941
Trumbull, John, 1059
Trumbull, Lyman, 339, 842, 1087, 1088, 2691, 2735
Truth, Sojourner, 2735–2736
Tucker, Henry St. George, 197, 450, 1688, 1908, 2424, 2736–2737, 2737
Tucker, John Randolph, 197, 451, 2737
Tucker, Nathaniel Beverly, 197, 2737
Tucker, St. George, 196, 450, 979, 1424, 2736, 2737, 2737
Tugwell, Rexford G., 62, 2738
Tullock, Gordon, 2064
Turgot, Robert Jacques, 28
Turnbull, Robert J., 1832
Turner, Nat, 558
Tussman, Joseph, 907
Twyn, William, 2352
Tyler, John, 49, 90, 113, 292, 425, 558, 559, 561, 563, 1425, 1652, 1791, 2001, 2746, 2786, 2884
Tyndale, William, 2236

U

Unger, Roberto, 2297
Upshar, Abel Parker, 450, 558

V

Vagts, Detlev, 1826
Vallandigham, Clement L., 416, 2777

Van Buren, Martin, 292, 557, 565, 742, 1163, 1190, 1413, 1710, 2430, 2656, 2779–2780, 2884
Vandenberg, Arthur, 2362–2363
Van Devanter, Willis, 112, 284, 2289, 2544, 2592, 2634, 2635, 2636, 2637, 2780–2781, 2803, 2821, 2882, 2896, 2898
Vane, Henry, 515
Vanzetti, Bartolomeo, 78, 467, 468, 1281
Vardaman, James, 2808
Varnum, James, 2723–2724
Vattel, Emerich de, 633, 941, 1694, 2781
Vaughan, John, 282
Vesey, Denmark, 2
Viktora, Robert, 2123
Viner, Charles, 512
Vining, John, 177
Vinson, Fred M., 79, 163, 204, 254, 279, 420, 607, 769, 1031, 1264, 1996, 2144, 2145, 2294, 2411, 2581, 2604–2605, 2607, 2629, 2705, 2757, 2791–2792, 2792–2797, 2852, 2885, 2888, 2941
Volstead, Andrew J., 2803
Voltaire, 245
Von Holst, Hermann Eduard, 26, 2804

W

Wade, Benjamin, 2818
Wagner, Robert, 2818–2819
Waite, Henry Matson, 53, 2229, 2821
Waite, Morrison R., 52, 199, 216, 217, 733, 747, 833, 844, 1168, 1224, 1225, 1257, 1290, 1740, 1789, 1896, 1900, 2145, 2210, 2420, 2547, 2807–2808, 2817, 2821–2824, 2824–2830, 2918
Walker, Quock, 467
Walker, Robert J., 566
Walker, Timothy, 450, 2557, 2832
Wallace, George C., 1815
Wallace, Henry, 62
Wallace, John, 1184, 1338
Walpole, Sir Robert, 245
Walter, Sir John, 1338
Walworth, Reuben, 560
Walwyn, William, 1870
Ward, Lester Frank, 448
Ward, Nathaniel, 1694
Wardle, Lynn, 92
Waring, Waties, 2765
Warner, Richard, 1984
Warren, Charles, 114, 159, 2453, 2847–2848
Warren, Earl, 69, 112, 113, 152, 164, 168, 206, 229, 238, 254, 255, 257, 272, 280, 607, 630, 700, 721, 771–772, 815, 818, 863, 899, 909, 912, 929, 937, 946, 1020, 1066, 1082, 1161, 1240, 1394, 1416, 1451, 1461, 1485–1486, 1538, 1542, 1595, 1615, 1646, 1670, 1679, 1702, 1741, 1792, 1810, 1836, 1839, 1857, 1894, 1923, 1926, 1981, 1987, 2127, 2205, 2228, 2246, 2280, 2290, 2296, 2341, 2408, 2450, 2453, 2457, 2520, 2549, 2584–2585, 2593, 2594, 2605, 2606, 2607, 2608–2609, 2631, 2645, 2676, 2710, 2713, 2733, 2804, 2810, 2832, 2848–2851, 2851–2858, 2858, 2866–2867, 2943
Warren, Robert Penn, 69
Warren, Samuel, 223
Washington, Booker T., 1024, 2808, 2828
Washington, Bushrod, 360, 686, 842, 979, 1172, 1228, 1442, 1682, 1683, 2019, 2424, 2601, 2859
Washington, George, 29, 47, 49, 51, 113, 160, 198, 250, 287, 288, 323, 336, 346, 448, 454, 518, 520, 521, 546, 547, 548, 549, 551, 553, 737, 755, 796, 866, 883, 946, 949, 950, 953, 954, 980, 1013, 1015, 1058, 1074, 1161, 1238, 1257, 1279, 1284, 1290, 1404, 1418, 1419, 1421, 1432, 1464, 1594, 1596, 1610, 1641, 1657, 1692, 1751, 1752, 1762, 1790, 1883, 1897, 1902, 1909, 1934, 1947, 1949, 1991, 2000, 2045, 2115, 2116, 2119, 2124, 2292, 2301, 2359, 2364, 2428, 2468, 2600, 2601, 2634, 2688, 2733, 2741, 2755, 2785, 2805, 2836, 2839, 2859, 2859–2862, 2863, 2885, 2899
Waters, Cynthia, 2866
Watson, Gregory D., 2742
Wayne, James M., 338, 681, 1412, 1712, 1736, 2555, 2867–2868, 2883
Wayte, David, 2868
Weber, Max, 2031
Webster, Daniel, 110, 159, 162, 292, 332, 333, 556, 557, 559, 562, 563, 565, 566, 567, 735, 736, 744, 745, 887–888, 913, 1191, 1280, 1557, 1641, 1686, 1706, 1903, 2359, 2431, 2512, 2556, 2611, 2612, 2622, 2651, 2686, 2783, 2870–2872, 2883, 2885, 2913
Wechsler, Herbert, 255, 990, 1466, 1474, 1475, 1476, 1477, 1502, 1578, 1583, 1744, 1792–1793, 2313, 2545
Weed, Thurlow, 2663
Weis, Joseph F., Jr., 2623
Weisbard, Edward, 494
Wellington, Harry, 1587
Wells, H. G., 588
Weyl, Walter, 2047
Whately, Thomas, 533
Wheare, K. C., 1364
Wheaton, Henry, 2883
Wheeler, Burton K., 698, 2592, 2883–2884
Wheelwright, John, 2235
Whitaker, Johnson, 1955
White, Byron R., 7, 12, 15, 25, 54, 56, 59, 137, 157, 158, 165, 168, 182, 192, 201, 208, 213, 214, 226, 242, 250, 251, 257, 265, 272, 294, 301, 307, 310, 329, 350, 368, 407, 428, 429, 435, 436, 440, 446, 465, 676, 677, 691, 695, 710, 712, 720, 762, 778, 830, 869, 882, 898, 929, 1012, 1044, 1054, 1055, 1060, 1064, 1110, 1140, 1181, 1188, 1189, 1204, 1205, 1206, 1214, 1216, 1226, 1233, 1273, 1281, 1283, 1320, 1322, 1331, 1333, 1370, 1434, 1471, 1529, 1532, 1533, 1536, 1538, 1558, 1574, 1600, 1602, 1666, 1717, 1737, 1741–1742, 1747, 1789, 1799, 1802, 1806, 1819, 1831, 1832, 1868, 1889, 1899, 1926, 1928, 1952, 1976, 2040, 2123, 2156, 2171, 2196, 2200, 2205, 2207, 2232, 2248, 2277, 2280, 2285, 2286, 2295, 2299, 2310, 2313, 2314, 2351, 2379, 2412, 2452, 2476, 2487, 2489, 2575–2576, 2604, 2606, 2620, 2627, 2663, 2665–2666, 2680, 2699, 2746, 2802, 2833, 2862, 2885–2893, 2896, 2904, 2906, 2914, 2922, 2933
White, Edward D., 113, 421, 430, 688, 893, 1164, 1168, 1169, 1242, 1376, 1558, 1704, 1828, 1869, 1960, 2210, 2298, 2356, 2472, 2610, 2634–2635, 2714, 2893–2896, 2897, 2901, 2912, 2927
White, G. Edward, 2850
White, James Boyd, 1514
Whitelock, James, 634
Whiting, William, 451
Whitman, Walt, 816, 999
Whitney, Anita, 222
Whittaker, Charles E., 280, 863, 1203, 2885, 2888, 2902–2903
Wickersham, George, 594, 2904
Wigmore, John H., 480, 1594, 1922, 2237, 2904–2905
Wilkes, John, 2905
Willebrandt, Mabel Walker, 2612
William III, 530, 1693, 1970
Williams, G. Mennen, 1704
Williams, George H., 134
Williams, Roger, 374, 1045, 1870, 2125, 2185, 2197, 2230, 2370, 2905–2906

Williams, Samuel, 2381
Williams, Wendy, 2204
Williamson, Hugh, 2907
Willoughby, Westel W., 452, 2907–2908
Wilmot, David, 568, 2435, 2908
Wilson, Don W., 2743
Wilson, Henry, 2216
Wilson, James, 48, 84, 125, 356, 517, 518, 521, 534, 538, 543, 661, 673, 754, 877, 947, 980, 995, 998, 1067, 1105, 1279, 1336, 1337, 1357, 1467, 1610, 1657, 1682, 1751, 1762, 1949, 2133, 2215, 2600, 2602, 2603, 2684, 2700, 2716, 2753, 2859, 2861, 2908–2911
Wilson, Peter, 183
Wilson, Woodrow, 33, 49, 112, 219, 261, 274, 288, 289, 378, 425, 452, 460, 494, 499, 582, 588, 590, 591, 595, 596, 597, 665, 728, 748, 751, 1025, 1030, 1101, 1167, 1262, 1303, 1309, 1402, 1429, 1528, 1532, 1557, 1633, 1714, 1746, 1772, 1935, 2002, 2047, 2114, 2287, 2292, 2356, 2360, 2634, 2637, 2733, 2786, 2803, 2808, 2899, 2900, 2911–2912, 2918, 2919, 2927, 2928, 2929
Wingate, Edmond, 2235
Winthrop, John, 531
Wirt, William, 334, 2611, 2913
Wisdom, John Minor, 2313, 2914–2915
Wise, Stephen S., 83
Witherspoon, Joseph, 92
Wolcott, Alexander, 2554
Wong Kim Ark, 2922
Wood, Gordon S., 1291
Wood, Stephen, 2676
Woodbury, Levi, 735, 1652, 2922–2923
Woodhull, Victoria, 2477
Woods, William B., 1272, 2923–2924
Woodward, Bob, 508
Woodward, C. Vann, 772
Woolsey, John M., 2747–2748
Worcester, Samuel, 344
Wortman, Tunis, 2931
Wright, J. Skelly, 2765, 2932
Wright, Silas, 1412
Wright, Susan Webber, 433, 434
Wyman, Bruce, 591
Wythe, George, 86, 228, 423, 467, 1419, 1610, 1692, 1891, 2500, 2737, 2935
Wyzanski, Charles E., Jr., 2935–2936

Y

Yamashita, Tomoyuki, 2937
Yancey, William L., 1833
Yasui, Minoru, 1417, 2107, 2842
Yates, Robert, 516, 519, 520, 1258, 1662–1663, 2938
Yñíguez, Maria-Kelly, 1759
Yoder, Frieda, 2914
Young, Arthur, 84
Young, Edward T., 2940

Z

Zeisel, Hans, 1510, 1517, 1525
Zenger, John Peter, 178, 180, 1512, 2352–2353, 2944
Zubly, J. J., 513

Subject Index

Numbers in boldface refer to the main entry on the subject.

A

AAA. See Agricultural Adjustment Act
Abolitionist constitutional theory, 2–4
  Birney cases, 182
  civil disobedience, 1183
  constitutional challenges, 558, 560
  Declaration of Independence, 754
  due process, 2
  fugitive slavery, 1159
  of Garrison, 1183
  guarantee clause, 1239
  incorporated into Fourteenth Amendment, 181 natural law invocation, 2210 personal liberty laws, 3, 4, 1159, 1901, 2006 petition campaigns, 2, 31, 385, 2274, 2425, 2884 privileges and immunities invocation, 1287–1288
  on slavery in the territories, 2425, 2434
  slave trade prohibition, 2050
  state suicide theory, 2520
  substantive due process, 2, 829
  Thirteenth Amendment and, 2691
  See also Slavery and the Constitution
Abolition of slavery. See Emancipation Proclamation; Thirteenth Amendment Abortion and the Constitution, 4–5, 6–9 (update 1a), 9–11 (update 1b), 11–14 (update 2a), 14–15 (update 2b)
  balancing test, 155
  Blackmun opinion legalizing, 190, 191, 192, 196, 1291, 2204, 2284
  and Burger Court, 270, 274, 277, 2163
  civil liberty issue, 376, 380
  communitarians on, 473
  constitutional amendment proposal, 76, 92, 123, 2126, 2127, 2205 counseling restraints, 2300 and Court activism, 1393 and courts as social change agents, 701
  Doe v. Bolton, 2284–2286 equal protection clause argument, 1197 fetal viability, 2207
  Fourteenth Amendment application, 5, 15, 2057
  fundamental interests, 1173, 1175, 2204
  Griswold precedent, 182, 1233–1234 historical abortion practices, 1291
  Hyde Amendment, 6, 7, 1324, 2205–2206
  implied rights, 2163 informed consent, 12
  invalidation of state laws, 2284
  and judicial policymaking, 1461–1462
  Maher v. Roe, 1665, 2286
  minors' rights, 6, 11, 192, 317, 352, 353, 1293, 2123, 2208 parental and spousal consent invalidation, 192 parental notification, 6, 11, 12, 192, 1123, 1293, 2122, 2208 partial-birth bans, 13, 14–15 permissible vs. impermissible restrictions, 13
  Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 1916
  Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 11–14, 625, 1914–1916, 2122–2123, 2168 privacy basis, 5, 8, 10–11, 12, 92, 94, 274, 1118, 1233, 1615, 2052, 2242, 2284, 2285, 2921 privileges and immunities clause application, 2020

Abortion and the Constitution (continued) property rights in human body argument, 2057 public funding restrictions, 6, 7, 1272–1273, 1324, 1665, 1974, 2158, 2205–2206, 2286, 2872, 2880 public understanding of Roe decision, 2078 and race, 2097
rational basis test, 2122–2123
Reagan views, 2126
and Rehnquist Court, 2164, 2168
and reproductive autonomy, 2203–2209
Roe v. Wade, 190, 191, 192, 196, 270, 274, 277, 381, 383, 625, 1461, 1680, 1811, 2163, 2203, 2204–2207, 2242, 2248, 2284–2286, 2921
Roe v. Wade reaffirmation, 2699 and sex discrimination, 2394
spousal consent, 6, 2207
subsidized speech and, 2568
Thomas view, 2695
Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 2699, 2892 undue burden test, 12, 13 and unenumerated rights, 10–11
wealth discrimination, 6, 7, 8–9, 1324, 1665, 1974, 2205, 2286, 2870
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 6–9, 192, 196, 381, 625, 2158, 2872, 2892
and well-being of women, 6–9, 12–13, 1615
See also Anti-abortion movement; Reproductive autonomy Absolutism (freedom of speech and press), 17
Black-Douglas full protection theory, 815
First Amendment rights, 1047, 1051 subject to balancing tests, 154–155
Wortman's exposition, 2931
Abstention doctrine, 17–20, 20–21 (update)
injunction, 1373
Academic freedom, 21–23
constitutional issues, 855–856
as teaching of creationism argument, 2185
Access to the courts, 23
Bounds v. Smith, 212
civil liberties and, 377
as fundamental constitutional right, 212
Griffin v. Illinois, 1231–1232 indigent rights, 204, 380, 799, 817, 1231–1232, 1974, 2877, 2879
in forma pauperis, 1368–1369
for parental rights, 1750
as prisoner's right, 2013, 2046
See also Fair trial
Accommodation of religion, 24
broad vs. narrow view, 2194–2195
endorsement test vs., 2196
establishment clause, 926–927
and religion as "viewpoint" ruling, 1559–1560 religious speech, 2172–2173
specially created school district for disabled Hasidic children, 202
See also Government aid to religious institutions; Religious liberty Accusation. See Right to be informed of accusation
ACLU. See American Civil Liberties Union
Acquittal against the evidence. See Jury nullification Act of state doctrine, 24–25
courts and foreign relations, 1077 exercise of federal common law authority, 978, 1468
Act of Toleration. See Toleration Act
ADA. See Americans with Disabilities Act
Adamson Eight-Hour Act, 33
Erdman Act, 921
ADEA. See Age Discrimination in Employment Act
Adequate state grounds, 34–35
and appellate jurisdiction, 109, 1027
and habeas corpus, 2821
Administrative agencies, 36–38, 38–40 (update) abstention, 19 administrative law, 37, 40–42
for American Indians, 81, 82
damages claims against, 740 delegation of power to, 761–762, 1935 for District of Columbia, 797–798
drug testing, 824, 825–826
executive orders, 944
freedom of contract, 1112
and judicial legislation, 1460
and judicial review, 1481–1482 justification for, 38–40 legislative court as, 1590 legislative powers, 1597, 1598–1599, 1994–1995 and presidential spending power, 2000–2001 regulatory, 2147–2148
ripeness of challenge, 2279
and separation of power, 37–38, 40, 41, 267, 269
World War I, 2928
World War II, 2290
See also Bureaucracy
Administrative law, 40–42
administrative agencies, 37, 40–42 cease and desist orders in, 325 fair hearing, 465–466
inauguration and extension of, 1001 interest group litigation, 1378
judicial review, 1481–1482
regulatory agencies, 2148
Administrative Procedure Act (1946), 37, 39, 266, 267, 2312
Administrative Process, The (Landis), 1560 Administrative search, 42–43, 43–44 (update)
probable cause, 43–44, 294, 1095
reasonable grounds for, 2337
Rehnquist Court expansion of, 1096
unreasonable search, 2767
warrantless, 294
Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, 44–45
Eleventh Amendment, 879 expansion beyond tide ebb and flow, 2051 federal judicial power, 1466–1467, 1489, 1495
Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1029 ocean law, 1840–1841
Peters and, 1902
Story's contribution, 360, 2556
Adolescent Family Life Act (1981), 212
Adoption, race, and the Constitution, 45–47
Adversary trial. See Rights of the criminally accused Advertising. See Commercial speech Advice and consent, 47
appointing and removal power, 109–111, 287, 1059
and appointments clause, 114–116
executive agreements, 939–941
executive power, 947
federal judicial appointments, 1018, 1456 politically motivated withholding of, 776–777, 1079–1080 regulatory agency appointments, 2147 as Senate function, 47, 109, 114–116, 2358, 2359, 2363
treaty power, 1073, 1079–1080, 1991, 1996

Advice and consent to Supreme Court nominations, 47–51
appointment of Justices, 111, 114, 1018–1019 Bork controversial nomination, 209, 210–211, 1393
confirmation process, 112, 489–490, 1018–1019
Hughes controversial nomination as Chief Justice, 1310–1311 judicial independence, 1456
Thomas controversial nomination, 282, 2695
Advisory opinion, 51
adequate state grounds, 34
and judicial independence, 1456
and justiciability, 1520
by legislative court, 1590
AEDPA. See Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act
Affectation doctrine. See Affected with a public interest Affected with a public interest, 52–53
and economic regulation, 52, 844, 2829–2830, 2917
and freedom of contract, 52, 53, 1115, 1166
Granger cases, 52, 53, 1224, 1225, 2817
and Oklahoma law licensing ice dealers, 1802 and state interstate commerce control, 2817
and state milk price-controls, 1788–1789
and wartime federal regulation, 1605
Affirmative action, 53–55, 55–56 (update 1), 57–58 (update 2)
Bakke challenge, 1976, 1978, 2146–2147 in broadcast licensing, 469, 1723–1724, 2165 California direct ballot vote to end, 787 city ordinance invalidated, 2230–2231
and civil liberties, 376
and civil rights, 392, 395, 397–398, 400–401, 406
Clinton administration support, 432, 623 and "colorblind" constitution, 781 Contract with America (1994) opposition, 776
and critical race theory, 727 decisions upholding, 2766 for developmentally disabled people, 775 economics of, 848
as equal protection issue, 54, 55–56, 912, 915–917
executive orders, 945, 1026 gender-based, 2397–2398, 2418 in higher education, 759–760
Hopwood v. Texas, 1304 as past discrimination remedy, 1435 race-consciousness, 2094–2095, 2230–2231
and racial discrimination, 2103–2105 racial discrimination distinction, 232 and racial diversity ruling, 2146–2147
Rehabilitation Act, 2152
Rehnquist Court, 2169, 2170
retrenchment cases, 55–56
Richmond (City of) v. J. A. Croson Co., 2230–2231
Scalia's views, 2313
and seniority, 1044–1045
Stevens's views, 2536, 2538
strict scrutiny, 33–34, 57, 58
Thomas's views, 2695
voluntary racial quota plan upheld, 1172
as voting issue, 393
Wygant v. Jackson Board of Education, 2933–2934
Affirmative action, economics of. See Economics of affirmative action
Afrocentric schools, 58
Age discrimination, 59–60, 60 (update)
antidiscrimination legislation, 95, 881
Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) v. Wyoming, 907 federal civil rights protection, 1027
Railroad Retirement Act, 2114
and uniformed state police, 1693–1694
Age Discrimination Act (1975), 60–61, 406, 1027
as antidiscrimination legislation, 95
Gregory v. Ashcroft, 1229
Age Discrimination in Employment Act (1967), 59–60, 88, 95
Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, 62
and commerce clause, 456–457
unconstitutionality, 284–285, 599, 697, 2288
Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, 62
and commerce clause, 458
Agricultural bankruptcy. See Frazier-Lemke Acts
Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act (1937), 62–63
Parker v. Brown, 1879
Agriculture. See Subjects of commerce
Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), 2874, 2875–2876, 2934
Alban Plan (1754), 1104
Alcohol American Indian prohibitions, 82 blood test from unconscious person, 229 drunk-driving blood test, 205, 2458
as exception to U.S. drug policy, 678 interstate commerce in, 213–214 license cases, 1229, 1230, 1617
minimum drinking age, 994
original package doctrine, 256, 1348, 1612, 1617
Prohibition Amendment, 72, 73, 74–75, 862, 2050, 2927 sobriety checkpoints, 1096, 1726
and state regulation of commerce, 1601, 2870
Volstead Act, 2803–2804
World War I prohibitions, 2927
Alien, 65–67
authorized removal, 1325
birthright citizenship, 65, 131, 183
Blackmun antidiscrimination opinion, 190
Chinese Exclusion Act, 328, 355
citizenship, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368 civil service appointments and, 2582–2583
denaturalization, 768–769
deportation restraints, 1333, 1503–1504 deportation, 65, 67, 128–129, 768–769, 770–771, 1330, 1331
as discrete and insular minority, 794 due process rights, 1077, 1325, 1330, 1332 eligibility for citizenship, 2642 employer sanctions for unauthorized alien workers, 1333 equal protection rights, 130, 131–132, 376, 1077, 1331, 1920
fair hearing rights, 1077
Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act, 1325
Internal Security Act, 1386 and judicial activism, 1448 land ownership, 1871, 2642 migrant workers, 1329–1330
Palmer raids, 65, 1875
preemption doctrine, 1289–1290 property ownership limitations, 129, 131 right to pursue livelihood, 2642–2643
state employment discrimination, 1068, 1262

Alien (continued) status of, 367
suspect classification, 66, 72
undocumented workers, 1330 and unreasonable search, 71 visa, 2802
welfare benefits, 66, 1077, 1218–1219, 1331–1333
Alienage. See Immigration and alienage Alien and Sedition Acts (1798), 67
amnesty, 89
broad construction justifying, 250
as Federalist measure, 1016
First Amendment absolutism argument, 17
and First Amendment rights, 1049, 1126, 1608
as First Amendment violation, 1139
as legislative-executive war power collaboration, 2840 Paterson and, 1883
presidential pardons, 1422
and sedition, 2351
and seditious libel law, 1126, 1138 targets and wide enforcement of, 65, 67, 1016, 1138 Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions against, 65, 67, 228, 1016, 1049, 1421, 2798–2799 and war hysteria, 29, 549, 1016
Alien Registration Act (1940), 67–68
and criminal syndicalism laws, 723
Dennis v. United States, 769–770, 1353 as federal control over internal security, 2930 incitement/abstract teaching distinction, 1109, 1353, 2938–2939
preemption doctrine, 1289–1290
Scales v. United States, 2311 seditious membership, 2351
subversive advocacy, 2581, 2582
Yates conviction reversals, 2938–2939
Alien suffrage, 68–69
All deliberate speed, 69
Alexander v. Holmes County immediate desegregation ruling, 65, 69
Brown II ruling, 255
Frankfurter and, 2852 immediate desegregation vs., 65, 69, 772 in school desegregation, 772
Amending process, 72–75, 75–76 (update) anti-abortion proposals, 76, 92, 123, 2126, 2127, 2205 Article V Conventions Clause, 123–124 balanced-budget amendment, 153–154, 2129
Becker Amendment, 167
Blaine Amendment, 197–198
Bricker Amendment, 243–244
and constitutional reform, 650–651
and constitutional theory, 659
and democratic theory, 765 election regulation, 865, 866
Electoral College, 866
equal rights amendment, 918–919 and federalism principles, 999, 1007 initiatives, 1372
and interposition, 1393
Jacksonian vs. nullifactionist views, 1413 Jeffersonian view, 1423 joint resolution, 1437 line-item veto, 76, 1627, 2129
need for, 2316
new amendment proposals, 76, 2129 prayer in schools proposals, 76, 123, 2125–2126, 2127
Progressive reforms, 2047
Reagan proposals, 2125–2126, 2127, 2129
See also Ratification of constitutional amendments; specific amendments Amendment process (outside Article V), 76–78
and Article V conventions clause, 123–124
and living Constitution, 1633
American Anti-Slavery Society, 2, 3
American Association of University Professors, 21
American Bar Association abortion law, 2285
Bork nomination, 209
Committee on the Federal Judiciary, 112 federal judicial nominee scrutiny, 1019
gag order, 1179
American Civil Liberties Union, 78–79
Bork nomination opposition, 209
and Burger Court, 273
as defender of civil liberties, 379 and draft card burning, 817–818
Fraenkel as counsel, 1099
Hays as counsel and director, 1280–1281
history of, 157
and loyalty oath, 157
public interest law, 2071
on Roosevelt's (Franklin D.) civil liberties record, 2290–2291
Tennessee v. Scopes, 2666
work during the 1920s, 595
American Colonization Society, 181–182
American Commonwealth, The (Bryce), 258
American Constitution, The: Its Origins and Development (Kelly and Harbison), 1528 American Convention of Abolition Societies, 1
American flag. See Flag desecration; Flag salute cases American Indians and the Constitution, 79–81, 81–83 (update)
birthright citizenship, 183
Cherokee Indian Cases, 343–345, 1408, 1535, 2183
citizenship status in late nineteenth century, 587 Civil Rights Act of 1968 protections, 407
and commerce clause, 453–454
Curtis Act granting full citizenship, 594
Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 624, 679 granting of tax immunity, 1799 peyote sacramental use, 82, 821–822, 823, 1653, 2165–2166, 2181, 2192, 2194–2195
removal policy, 1408
Seminole Tribe v. Florida, 880–881
"terminated" tribes, 607 tribal economic development, 2731–2732 tribal sovereignty, 82, 1535, 1612
voting rights, 1306
American Jewish Congress, 83
public interest law, 2071
American Jury, The (Kalven and Zeisel), 1525
American Law Institute, 1451
American Presidency, The (Rossiter), 2295 American Revolution and constitutional theory, 83–86
abolitionist constitutional theory, 2
Articles of Confederation, 124–126
criticism of British constitution, 246
Declaration of Independence, 752–753, 754
fundamental law, 1173
Paine's writings, 27, 1874, 2297 republicanism ideology, 2211, 2212 revolutionaries as constitutionalists, 2249
Rossiter work on, 2295

Washington as commander-in-chief, 2860
Americans with Disabilities Act (1990), 86–87, 87–88 (update)
as antidiscrimination legislation, 791
constitutional aspiration, 664
American System, 88
and internal improvements, 30, 1385, 1700–1701
Jacksonian opposition, 1408, 1412
Amicus curiae, 89
abortion-rights briefs, 7, 9 American Jewish Congress briefs, 83 antisegregation briefs, 259
Brandeis brief, 225
interest group litigation, 1379
Justice Department civil rights briefs, 136 reapportionment brief, 152–153
right to counsel, 2261
Amnesty, 89
for Confederate rebels, 1625 for undocumented residential aliens, 1333
Vietnam War, 89, 1070
See also Pardoning power Amplified speech. See Sound trucks and amplifiers
Ancillary jurisdiction, 89–90
Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1028–1029
Annapolis Convention (1785), 90
Dickinson presidency, 779–780
Annexation of Texas, 90
unconstitutionality arguments, 563
Webster opposition, 2871
Whig opposition, 2884
Anonymous political speech, 90–91
Anti-abortion movement, 92–93, 93–94 (update) clinic demonstration enjoinment, 227 clinic violence, 13
constitutional amendment proposals, 76, 92, 123, 2126, 2127, 2205
Contract with America (1994), 776 no-abortion-counseling case, 2300
public interest law, 2071
Reagan support, 2126 reproductive autonomy restrictions, 2205–2206
RICO Act application to, 1153 state abortion restrictions, 2, 5–15, 2205–2208 strength of, 2286
See also Hyde Amendment
Antidiscrimination legislation, 94–96, 97–98 (update 1), 99–100 (update 2a), 100–101 (update 2b)
age discrimination, 60, 60–61, 95
Civil Rights Act of 1964, 406
color of law, 2092
coverage expansion, 100 disabilities discrimination, 86–88, 790–791, 2152
disintegrating consensus over, 97–98
Education Amendments of 1972 (Title IX), 95, 406, 853, 1027
federal protection of civil rights, 1024, 1025–1027
Fourteenth Amendment, section 5 enforcement, 1089
freedom of association, 1110–1111, 2017 and majoritarian democracy, 766
open housing laws, 1853–1854
public accommodations, 1282–1283 race and sex discrimination, 2089–2093 religious exemptions, 2195
state initiative overturning of, 2170–2172 state vs. private discrimination, 1089, 2017
voting rights, 1042, 2145
Anti-Federalist constitutional thought, 101–102
and Bill of Rights, 176–177, 178, 1091, 1421
constitutional amendments, 72
executive defiance of "unconstitutional" laws, 943 general welfare clause, 1186, 1187
and Jacksonianism, 1412
Martin (Luther) statement, 1688 minoritarian bias concerns, 1957 ratification opposition, 1561, 1575 representation theory, 102, 763
Yates's "Brutus" letters, 2938
Antipeonage Act (1867). See Peonage
Antislavery. See Abolitionist constitutional theory
Anti-Slavery Society (American), 384, 385
Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act (1996), 102–103
and capital punishment, 307
as habeas corpus law revision, 103, 654, 1254–1255, 1503, 1504
as limit on federal jurisdiction, 1503 terrorist designations under, 2674
Antitrust law, 103–107
applied to labor unions, 70, 107, 166–167, 1545–1546, 1555, 1641–1642 applied to legal profession, 1202
Bork writings on, 209–210
Cellar-Kefauver Act, 603
Clarke (John) support of, 421
Clayton Act, 425–426
consent decrees, 507
Federal Trade Commission Act, 1030–1031
and Fuller Court, 1165–1166
Justice Department prosecution, 1540
Knight Company, E. C., United States v., 1539–1540, 1641, 1642, 2046, 2048 manufacturing monopoly exclusion, 1539–1540 McReynolds views, 1714 production exemptions, 2046
rule of reason, 2298, 2895, 2898
Sherman Antitrust Act, 1165–1166, 1641–1642, 2048, 2292, 2298–2299, 2412–2413
Standard Oil Company, United States v., 2298
United States Steel Corporation, United States v., 2298 and White Court, 2898–2899
White's (Edward) conservative views, 2895
APA. See Administrative Procedure Act Appeal, 107–108
access to the courts, 23
in capital punishment cases, 305, 311 direct to Supreme Court, 1499
and double jeopardy, 809
Emergency Court of Appeals, 885–886 harmless error limitations, 2045
indigent rights, 817
interest group litigation, 1378
right to counsel, 2262
rule of four, 2296
Appellate jurisdiction, 108–109
adequate state grounds, 34–35, 1027
appeal, 108
Article III provision, 1468, 1469
certiorari writ, 328, 1490
circuit courts, 360, 361, 1490, 1497
congressional regulation of Court's, 497, 1494 extension to state courts, 1688–1691
federal judicial system, 1490
federal question jurisdiction, 1027
Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 1029
final judgment rule, 1044
habeas corpus review, 1249
judicial collegiality, 1451–1452
Judiciary Act of 1789, 1495
Judiciary Act of 1927, 1498
Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1688–1691
McCardle, Ex parte, 1494

Appellate jurisdiction (continued) original jurisdiction vs., 1468 rehearing, 2152
remand, 2198
of Supreme Court, 108–109, 402, 436–437, 1502, 2588, 2592, 2596, 2616, 2617, 2618
Supreme Court limitation, 1503, 1504
Supreme Court reorganization, 1498 Appointing and removal power, presidential, 109–111
Clay opposition to, 425 and First Congress, 1059 free use of, 1772
and good behavior, 1338
Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 1318–1319, 2149 and impeachment articles of Andrew Johnson, 126, 1428–1429 and independent agency member removal, 2149 and independent counsel, 115 independent regulatory commission members, 600
Jackson's exercise of, 1408–1409
Madison endorsement of removal power, 546
Myers v. United States, 1318, 1319, 2000, 2149 presidential will in, 2000
Senate advice and consent, 47–51
Senate blockage, 1079
Tenure of Office Act, 1428, 2669
Appointment of Supreme Court justices, 111–113
appointment clause, 114
confirmation process, 490
increased number in Grant administration, 1581–1582
and judicial independence, 1455–1456
and judicial strategy, 1485–1486
Senate advice and consent to, 47, 114, 1018–1019
Appointments clause, 113–116
advice and consent, 48
Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 48–49, 113–114 federal judiciary, 1017–1020 Senate confirmation process, 489
Apportionment. See Electoral districting; Reapportionment
Areopagitica (Milton), 1046, 1737–1739 Armed forces, 117–118 civil-military control, 385–387
Civil War, 571
conscientious objection, 505–506
desegregation, 118, 605, 946
as domestic law enforcers, 1568–1569 loyalty-security program, 1649
police action, 1921
Posse Comitatus Act, 448, 1969
President as commander-in-chief of, 448 presidential deployment authority, 1075 public forum doctrine, 2069–2070
quartering of troops prohibition, 2689 segregation, 1024
sexual orientation and, 117, 118, 432, 2401–2403
yalmulke prohibition, 1202, 2192
See also Military justice; Presidential war powers Arrest, 119–120
automobile search, 141
bail, 147–151
felony, 119, 121, 1031
informant's tip, 1368
Miranda rules, 1926
Payton v. New York, 1889 privilege from, 2251
probable cause, 2023–2024
in public vs. private places, 121 search incident to, 2283, 2343–2344, 2845
and warrantless search, 2845
See also Police interrogation and confessions Arrest warrant, 120–121
Fourth Amendment, 1092
Payton v. New York, 1889
probable cause and, 2330
state action and, 2488–2489
See also Warrantless search
Article I courts. See Legislative court Article III. See Judicial independence; Judicial power; Judicial system, federal Article III and public choice theory, 122–123
environmental regulation, 904–905
government wrongs, 1217
taxpayers' suit against public aid to religious schools, 1066 Article III courts. See Constitutional courts
Article IV. See Domestic violence clause; Full faith and credit; Privileges and immunities Article V. See Amending process; Amendment process (outside Article V)
Article V conventions clause, 123–124
and amending process, 74, 75, 77, 123–124
Articles of Confederation, 124–126
Adams (Samuel) and drafting of, 32
and amending process, 75, 539–540
and Annapolis Convention, 90 and citizenship, 364 congressional privileges and immunities, 501
and Constitutional Convention of 1787, 517, 542, 2020
and constitutionalism, 643
Dickinson and drafting of, 779
Duane and drafting of, 828 and emergence of federalism, 989, 997–998, 1010, 1013
executive offices established by Congress, 287 foreign titles prohibition, 2703 Franklin proposal, 105
full faith and credit, 1170
history of, 537, 538, 539
interstate extradition, 1158
Jensen defense of, 1426–1427 lack of taxing power, 2658
McLaughlin on, 1711 and Northwest Ordinance, 1829 privilege from arrest, 2019
privileges and immunities, 805, 2019
and Shays' Rebellion, 803
spending power, 2468
Articles of impeachment of Andrew Johnson, 126
Bingham as committee chairman, 181 and Chase Court, 338 and presidential removal power, 110 seen as precedent against impeachment, 1340 Stanton firing as catalyst, 2476 and Tenure of Office Act, 110, 126, 1339, 1428–1429, 2476, 2669 Articles of impeachment of Richard M. Nixon, 126–127 and Nixon resignation, 1339, 1342 offenses cited, 609, 1341
Articles of impeachment of William J. Clinton, 127
and independent counsel, 625, 1360
offenses as private misconduct, 431, 433, 1340, 1341–1342
Asian Americans and the Constitution, 128–130
Chinese immigrants, 586, 2939–2940 education discrimination against non-English-speaking students, 1563
Japanese American cases, 1415–1417, 2930–2931 naturalization rights upheld, 2922
segregation ruling, 1204

Wong Kim Ark, United States v., 367, 2922
Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 2939–2940
Asian immigrants and constitutional history, 130–132
Chinese Exclusion Act, 355–356, 1328
citizenship, 1167, 1328, 2922
discriminatory measures, 133–1331, 1328–1329, 2939–2940
Fuller Court rulings, 1167
Assembly, freedom of. See Freedom of assembly and association Assistance, writ of, 132 colonial attacks on, 1099, 1174, 2236
Fourth Amendment, 1097
general warrant and, 1098, 1186
Paxton's case, 132, 1099, 1888
Assisted suicide. See Right to die
Association, freedom of. See Freedom of association Association, The, 132–133
Adams (Samuel) and, 32
adopted at First Continental Congress, 534, 672 constitutional history before 1776, 534
Atomic Energy Act (1954), 133, 2326
Attainder, bill of. See Bill of attainder
Attainder of treason, 133–134
Attorney general and Department of Justice, 134–137 antitrust prosecution, 1540
civil rights cases, 136, 404, 405
Civil Rights Division, 404, 410–411, 1025 civil rights enforcement, 1024, 1025, 1533 crime enforcement, 1569
Federal Bureau of Investigation, 975–977, 1304
independent counsel, 115, 620–621, 1358, 1359, 1360, 1361
interest group litigation, 1378
Judiciary Act of 1789, 1495
"opinions" preservation, 2913
and public policy, 134 qualifications for attorney general, 135–136
special prosecutor, 2462
Subversive Activities Control Board, 1385
wiretapping, 2913
See also Solicitor general
Attorney General's Commission on Pornography. See Meese Commission
Attorney General's List, 137–138
Executive Orders 9836 and 10450, 945 innocent vs. knowing membership, 2904 loyalty-security program, 138, 604, 1649 struck down, 1436, 1650 voided, 1436, 1650
Attorney speech, 138–139
First Amendment protection, 165
personal injury solicitation, 1065
Automobile pursuits. See Police pursuits and constitutional rights Automobile search, 140–141, 141 (update) exigent circumstance and, 2332
expectation of privacy and, 2332
incident to arrest, 2283 invalid search warrant, 683
probable cause, 140, 244, 319, 329, 2169, 2846
Ross, United States v., 2294–2295 search warrant for, 140, 141, 329–330
sobriety checkpoints, 1096
traffic stops, 209, 2711
unreasonable, 2769
warrantless, 140, 141, 244, 329, 1427, 2295, 2846, 2847
Avoidance doctrine, 142–143

B

Badges of servitude, 145–146
Civil Rights Cases, 409, 1437, 1919
racial quotas, 2110
restrictive covenant as, 2223 segregation as, 201, 1918, 1919
and Thirteenth Amendment, 1437, 1918, 2016
Bad tendency test, 146–147
and clear and present danger, 422, 426, 1299
and freedom of speech, 146, 1129, 1646, 2311
Gitlow v. New York, 2310, 2902
People v. Croswell, 1898
Pitney and, 1911
and religious liberty, 1177
and revolutionary speech, 1198–1199 Bail, 147–150, 150–151 (update) cost-benefit arguments, 150 and preventive detention, 149, 150, 2005 rights against excessive, 722, 729, 2257
and wealth discrimination, 149, 716
Bail Reform Act (1966), 1984, 2306, 2365
Bail Reform Act (1984), 149, 150, 151
Balanced-budget amendment, 153–154
constitutional convention proposal, 76, 123, 153, 618
Reagan's views, 2126, 2129
Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act. See Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act
Balancing test, 154–155
ballot access, 158
Barenblatt v. United States, 163, 1595, 1596
Blackmun application, 193–194 clear and present danger move to, 115, 225, 427, 769–770
Communist party witness testimony, 163, 1595
conscientious objection, 2187
for constitutional reason of state, 650 dormant commerce clause, 806
drug testing, 824, 826
and drug trafficking, 680
Federal Election Campaign Acts, 260
fighting words, 1043
Fourth Amendment activity, 1095–1096
freedom of association, 1193
freedom of speech, 17, 1043, 1129–1130, 1133
free exercise clause, 1049, 2186–2187
libel and First Amendment, 1146, 1285 low-value test, 1646–1647
peyote sacramental use, 822, 823
search and seizure, 2331, 2340, 2341, 2342
speedy trial, 163, 2256
state regulation of commerce, 2517–2518
warrantless searches, 2337
Baldus study, 1702
Ballot access, 158
established parties, 1941–1942 initiative, 1939 party fusion ban upheld, 1938 restrictions to, 2701
voting rights, 2813
write-in votes, 265
Ballot initiative. See Direct democracy; Initiative; Referendum Bank Holiday of 1933. See Emergency Bank Act Bank of the United States Acts (1791, 1816), 159–160
broad construction, 250
charter, 547
Federalist advocacy, 1015–1016
and implied powers, 160, 250, 1259

Bank of the United States Acts (1791, 1816) (continued)
Jacksonian opposition, 1408, 1412, 1413, 1414, 1583–1584
Jackson's veto, 1414
judicial policymaking, 1461
McCulloch v. Maryland, 1583, 1585, 1587, 1611, 1674, 1688, 1705–1707
and Panic of 1819, 555 veto of second, 1408, 1412, 1414
Washington's signing of first, 2861
Bankruptcy Act (1938), 160
Bankruptcy power, 160–161
bankruptcy law, 160, 161 economic conditions and, 851
Frazier-Lemke Acts (farm bankruptcy), 1105, 1644–1645, 2932
Municipal Bankruptcy Act as unconstitutional under, 127 and obligation of contracts, 1848–1849 state debtor relief, 1300–1301
substantive due process and, 1645 Bankruptcy Reform Act (1978), 161 bankruptcy judges, 1828
bankruptcy power, 160
Becker Amendment, 167
Benign racial classification, 169
discrete and insular minorities, 794
neutrality principle, 2165
racial quotas, 2146
Bias crime. See Hate crime
Bible reading. See Religion in public schools; Religious fundamentalism
Bicameralism, 171–173
as constitutional fundamental, 1947
constitutionalism and, 643
one-house legislative veto and, 762, 1333, 1599
as Senate origin, 2357
and separation of powers, 1948
Wilson's (James) arguments for, 2909–2910
Bill of attainder, 174
Attorney General's List as, 138
Brown v. United States, 257
Lovett, United States v., 1645 loyalty oath, 1648
and rule of law, 2298
and standard of review, 2471 women's disfranchisement as, 2918
Bill of credit, 174
borrowing power, 211
Craig v. Missouri, 704
as legal tender, 216–217 and monetary power, 1751
Taney Court on, 174, 2651
Bill of Rights (English), 174
bail, 148, 174
and British constitution, 245
cruel and unusual punishment prohibition, 729
Fourteenth Amendment transformation of, 1091–1092 freedom of debate, 501 freedom of petition, 1125 as parliamentary statute, 84
quartering of troops, 2689
Bill of Rights (United States), 175–178
and American Civil Liberties Union principles, 78 and American Indian status, 80–81
Anti-Federalist advocacy of, 72, 101, 102, 1091 application to states, 33, 178–180, 181, 1086, 1090–1092, 2217. See also Fourteenth Amendment; Incorporation doctrine as applying solely to federal government, 163, 1356 Black's literal application of, 815, 816 civil liberties embodied in, 375 constitutional fictions on, 526 and Court deference to armed forces, 117 and Court's selective activism and restraint, 1445 criminal justice and, 710, 718 and criminal procedure, 2035–2036, 2043
double standard, 1353–1354, 1356 and drug regulation limitations, 821, 822, 823 and economic liberties, 842
and environmental regulation, 901–902
and establishment of religion, 927–928
exclusionary rule, 938
extraterritoriality, 959–960
and fair trial, 970–972
federal actions limitation by, 1353–1354
as federalism reinforcement, 998 and foreign affairs, 1077
fundamental rights, 1177, 1178, 2038 importance in nation's founding, 546
incorporation doctrine, 814–815, 1008, 1353–1356, 2293
international human rights compared with, 1388 as international influence, 1364
Jefferson's advocacy, 1421
and juvenile proceedings, 1523
Massachusetts Body of Liberties as precursor to, 374 and natural rights, 1233
Northwest Ordinance as precursor, 742
penumbra theory, 1896
and philosophy of Constitution, 1905 and ratification of Constitution, 32, 177–178, 1045, 1421, 1611, 2118–2119 selective incorporation, 2038, 2039
selective judicial activism, 1447, 1448 and social compact doctrine, 802
and states' rights, 1091
See also First Amendment; Fourth Amendment; Ninth Amendment; Second Amendment; Seventh Amendment; Tenth Amendment; Third Amendment Bill of Rights in modern application, 178–180
and Fourteenth Amendment, 1090–1092
use against state and local governments, 178
See also Fourteenth Amendment Birth control, 182–183
advertisement and sale of devices, 316
as civil liberty, 376
contraceptive sales to minors, 2204, 2208
Douglas-Black clash, 816, 1233
Eisenstadt v. Baird, 863 equal protection grounds, 4, 182, 1118, 2204
freedom of association, 1108
freedom of intimate association, 1118, 1122
Griswold v. Connecticut, 1120, 1122, 1233–1234, 1461, 2203
and judicial policymaking, 1461, 1462
minors' rights, 352
penumbra theory, 1896
as reproduction autonomy, 2203
right of privacy, 4, 182, 1118, 1233–1234, 1461, 2203, 2242
See also Abortion and the Constitution; Reproductive autonomy; Sterilization
Birthright citizenship, 183–184
aliens and, 65, 131, 183
for children born to undocumented aliens, 368 Fourteenth Amendment on, 1092
Bituminous Coal Act (1937), 184
Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 321, 457–458
unconstitutionality, 457, 2592

Black Codes, 189
Chase Court, 341
and color of law, 444
as dismantling of Civil Rights Act of 1866, 401, 402 as equal protection violation, 908 Freedmen's Bureau and, 1106
See also Segregation
Blaine Amendment (1875), 197–198
Blasphemy, 198
flag burning seen as secular equivalent, 1061
Block grants. See Federal grants-in-aid; Revenue sharing Blood samples. See Testimonial and nontestimonial compulsion Blue ribbon jury, 199–200 challenges, 1509
Body search, 205–206
intrusive, 1094–1095, 2283–2284
and prisoners' rights, 205, 2013, 2244
and right of privacy, 205–206, 1094, 1095, 2244–2245
stop and frisk, 2552–2553
See also Testimonial and nontestimonial compulsion
Boland Amendment, 206
and defense appropriations, 621, 622
Reagan presidency and, 2128
Border search, 209
body search, 205
for illegal alien workers, 1330
probable cause, 71
unreasonable, 2769
Bork nomination, 209–211
interpretivist position, 1393–1394 judicial philosophy opponents, 50, 115, 210–211
New Right jurisprudence, 1801
and original intent, 2128
and ratifier intent, 2121
Reagan presidency and, 2127
rejection of, 114, 115, 211
Borrowing power, 211
gold clause cases, 1201–1202
Boston Massacre, 26
Boycott, 214–215
advertisement for secondary disallowed, 1203–1204 as antitrust violation, 1555 civil rights, 1551, 1556 picketing standards, 215, 1551
Pitney and, 1911
restriction of secondary, 1561, 1641
Brandeis brief, 219, 224–225
and legislative facts, 1590, 1591 and social science research, 225, 2443 women's maximum hours and minimum wages, 35, 225, 1764, 2920 Breach of the peace, 227–228
clear and present danger, 1031 and demonstration allowances, 767–768 and freedom of assembly, 1107 and picketing, 702 and religious freedom, 299
Bricker Amendment, 243–244
Korean War, 1541, 1921
Brief, 244
British Bill of Rights. See Bill of Rights (English) British constitution, 245–246
and American colonies, 27, 31, 32, 779 American constitutional divergence from, 84–85
bicameralism, 171
Declaration of Independence negating, 754
Founders' view of, 1963
Broadcasting, 246–247, 247–249 (update 1), 249–250 (update 2) abandonment of scarcity premise, 1147 affirmative action in licensing, 1723–1724, 2165 cable television, 469–470, 1147–1148, 2739–2740
cable television explicit programming, 1134
Communications Act, 468–469
Communications Decency Act, 471 and community, 469
and compelled speech, 475–476 and corporate rights, 690–691 and democracy, 470–471
editorial advertisements, 445
fairness doctrine, 246–249, 968–969, 1130, 1391, 2144
First Amendment applications, 249, 445, 1147, 1391–1392
free press/fair trial, 330, 1143
licenses, 2009
"must carry" law, 469–470, 1771–1772, 2739–2740
rape victim's name liability, 702–703
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 968, 969, 2144 restraints on vulgar words, 981, 1043, 1057, 1147, 1392
right of reply, 1142
Supreme Court coverage, 1439–1441 televising of criminal trial, 330 tort liability vs. free press, 1438–1439
Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC, 2739–2740
unconstitutional conditions, 2750
Broad construction, 250
Economic Opportunity Act, 843
and enumerated powers, 1446
Federalist, 1015, 1017, 1260
of implied powers, 250, 1345, 1707 internal improvements, 30, 250
and judicial rule, 1484
and living Constitution, 1632–1634
by Story, 2554
See also Liberal constitutional construction Budget, 260–261
executive, 1999
Office of Management and Budget, 1846–1847 taxing and spending power, 994
See also Budget process Budget and Accounting Act (1921), 261
enactment, 260
Reagan's use of, 262
Budget process, 261–263
balanced-budget amendment, 153–154 balanced-budget amendment effects, 154 budget initiation, 261
Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act, 498–499, 1219
Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act, 214, 1219
line-item veto, 1626–1627
maximum deficit ceilings, 1219
Office of Management and Budget, 1846–1847
Burden of proof, 264
evidence, 932
harmless error, 1270
and presumption of innocence in criminal cases, 718 reasonable doubt, 1434, 2138–2139
Bureaucracy, 265–267, 267–269 (update)
administrative agencies, 38, 39, 40, 42, 266–267
appointments clause, 115
and budget process, 261, 262
Freedom of Information Act, 1117–1118
See also Patronage; Public employees Bureau of Indian Affairs, 82, 83
Bureau of the Budget, 260, 261, 262
Burger Court, 272–278
access to the courts, 23
adequate state grounds, 34
civil liberties, 380, 384

Burger Court (continued)
civil rights, 400, 406
commercial speech, 461 conservative orientation of, 270
equal protection, 2309, 2310
expatriation, 957
federalism, 1008
Fourth Amendment activity, 1095 freedom of speech and freedom of the press decisions, 369 fundamental interests limitation, 1173
habeas corpus review, 975, 1252, 1253, 1254
institutional litigation, 275–276, 2280
liberal activism, 1615
Miranda rules, 273, 276, 1927, 1928, 1929
public forum speech rights, 2167 relationship to social change, 700
Roe v. Wade, 270, 274, 277, 2163
school desegregation, 65
search and seizure, 2340
separation of church and state, 2372 solicitor general role in, 2451
standing, 122
state action, 2491
state action cases and civil rights, 400 state action limitation, 1063
taxpayer suits, 1066–1067
Burke-Wadsworth Selective Training and Service Act. See Selective Service Acts Burning of flag. See Flag desecration Busing, school. See School busing

C

Cabinet, 287–289
executive power, 948
lack of constitutional status, 2000
Senate advice and consent, 115
Washington's inception of, 2861
Cable Act (1922), 594
Cable Communications Policy Act (1983), 248
Cable television community-building applications, 469–470 explicit programming, 1134
First Amendment, 1147–1148
"must carry" law, 469–470, 2739–2740
Calvin's Case, 294
citizenship, 363
Campaign finance, 294–296, 296–297 (update 1), 297–298 (update 2)
balancing test, 155, 1130
Buckley v. Valeo, 260, 295, 297, 298, 1932, 1933, 1938, 1941, 1942, 2052, 2893
constitutional amendment proposals, 76
Court inconsistency, 139–140 and electoral process First Amendment issues, 872
Federal Election Campaign Acts, 260, 986–987
First Amendment and legislative limits on, 1047, 1052 and government speech, 1215, 1216 limits on contributions, 612 limits upheld, 260
Lobbying Disclosure Act, 1636
minor political parties, 257, 1216 political action committees, 1932–1933
and property rights, 2052 public employee prohibitions, 268 soft money, 1938 spending limits, 1941
Capital punishment, 299–304, 304–306 (update 1), 306–307 (update 2)
Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, 103, 1254–1255
Blackmun on unconstitutionality of, 196
Brennan on unconstitutionality of, 236, 239
Burger Court rulings, 272, 274, 700 as civil liberties violation, 376 as cruel and unusual punishment, 236, 239, 300, 301–302, 307, 308, 721, 729, 1070–1071, 1199, 1529, 1702–1703, 2257
and double jeopardy, 812
and drug traffickers, 680 and elected judiciary, 864 equal protection claims, 307, 915, 1702–1703 expedited federal collateral review, 162 and Fourteenth Amendment rights, 307, 309, 1529
Furman v. Georgia, 300–301, 302, 303, 304, 306, 309–310, 721
Gregg v. Georgia, 300, 301, 302, 303, 305, 306, 308, 310–312, 732 habeas corpus writs, 1254
jury nullification, 1512
of juveniles, 2475–2476
Lockett v. Ohio, 303, 308 of mentally incompetent, 2061
Payne v. Tennessee, 1889
Penry v. Lynaugh, 1895
proportionate to culpability, 2369 racial discrimination. See Capital punishment and race rape case decision, 302, 440
Rehnquist Court rulings, 382, 2169 reversed in face of state's standardless imposition, 1199
Rosenberg v. United States, 2294
Scalia's views, 2316
sentencing, 2366
state constitutional law, 2498
stay of execution, 2526
Stevens's views, 2530, 2535
Stewart's views, 2542
victim impact statements, 208–209
Capital punishment and race, 307–309 discrimination implications, 300, 303, 306, 307–309, 310, 732, 733, 1702–1703, 2087, 2106–2107
McCleskey v. Kemp, 307–309, 396
Capital punishment cases of 1972, 309–310
Capital punishment cases of 1976, 310–312
Capitation taxes, 312
apportionment, 1324
Chase Court decision, 341
constitutionality of, 2470
poll tax, 1961
Captive audience, 313
fairness doctrine, 445
silent school prayer as, 2833
Career criminal sentencing laws, 316
Cases and controversies, 322–324 and collusive suit, 443, 1464 decision, 752
doctrine application, 801
Hayburn's Case, 1280
on Indian lands, 1771
judicial power, 1464–1467
judicial power limitations, 122, 1222, 1464
judicial review, 1477
judicial review of administrative acts, 1481–1482
standing, 2472–2473
taxpayer suits, 1464–1465
test case, 2676
Cases on Constitutional Law (Dowling), 817 Categorical grants-in-aid. See Federal grants-in-aid
Cato's Letters, 324
on Lockean ideas, 512 Cease and desist order, 325
antitrust law, 104
Cellar-Kefauver Act (1950), 603
Censorship. See Prior restraint and censorship

Census, 326–327
reapportionment, 2136, 2137
Central Intelligence Agency, 1256–1257 Certification, 327
abstention doctrine, 20
Certiorari, writ of, 327–328 appeal distinguished from, 108 Circuit Court of Appeals Act, 361 introduction of, 1490
rule of four, 2296
and writ of error, 327, 921
Chandler Act. See Bankruptcy Act
Charters, colonial. See Colonial charters
Chase Court, 337–342
antislavery view, 567
ex post facto laws, 290
federal power issues, 340 Johnson (Andrew) impeachment, 338 judicial activism and, 335
Milligan, Ex parte, 338–339, 386, 402
Reconstruction issues, 338–340, 341
Slaughterhouse cases, 336, 341, 580
state regulatory and tax power issues, 340–341
Checks and balances, 342–343
advice and consent as, 47
appointments clause, 115
and bureaucracy, 265, 266
cabinet subject to, 288, 289
constitutional commentary on, 449, 451
as constitutional fundamental, 1947
and constitutionalism, 637, 643
and constitutional theory, 654–655 economic analysis and, 834
for federalism, 995–996 House of Representatives and, 1305–1306 impeachment powers, 1343
legislative power, 1597
limited government and, 1618–1619
Montesquieu as influence, 1755–1756
Paine as influence, 1874
as political philosophy of Constitution, 1944 presidential power seen superseding, 1996, 1997
in republican form of government, 2209, 2213
See also Separation of powers
Cherokee Indian Cases (1831–1832), 343–345
Jackson nullification, 1408 religious fundamentalist defense of Cherokees, 2183 sovereign nation doctrine, 1535
Chief Justice, role of the, 346–348 administrative duties, 2605 clerks, 429
Fuller's concept of, 1163, 1164
as presiding officer over presidential impeachment trial, 346, 1340, 1343
Child benefit theory, 348–349
Elementary and Secondary Education Act, 876 same-race placement preferences as contrary to, 46 Child custody
foster families, 1083–1084
and freedom of intimate association, 1119, 1123 issues in, 799–800
Child labor
Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Company, 151–152
Child Labor Tax Act, 349–350
Fair Labor Standards Act prohibition, 349, 594, 598, 1528 foreign commerce and, 1528
interstate commerce and, 349, 1528, 2048
Keating-Owen Child Labor Act, 1261–1262, 1528
minimum wage, 35–36, 797, 1313, 1547 national police power and, 1777–1779 noxious products doctrine, 1830
Wagner Act cases, 349
White Court rulings, 2900
Child Labor Amendment, 349
non-ratification of, 72, 73, 594, 598 ratification fight in Kansas, 441
See also Keating-Owen Child Labor Act
Child Labor Tax Act, 349–350
Child pornography, 350
and First Amendment, 350, 351, 1802
and free speech, 375
as low-value speech, 1646
Children and the First Amendment, 350–351 bans on sales of sexually explicit materials, 1194–1195 juvenile curfew laws, 1521–1522
Children's rights, 351–354 abortion rights of minors, 6, 11, 192, 317, 352, 353, 1293, 1916, 2123, 2208
blood transfusion, 2191
child abuse, 774–775
child labor regulation, 349, 594, 598, 966, 1261–1262, 1528
contraceptive sales to minors, 2204, 2208
due process for delinquency proceedings, 1183–1184 exposure to sexually explicit materials, 1194–1195 gender rights, 2921
illegitimacy, 1325–1326
judicial activism and, 1448
minimum wage, 35–36, 797, 1313, 1547
parental conduct standards, 973–974
symbolic speech, 2702–2703
Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 2702–2703
See also Education and the Constitution; Family and the Constitution; Juvenile proceedings Child Support Recovery Act (1992), 354
Chilling effect, 354–355
computer data banks, 481–482 Dombrowski v. Pfister, 803
fairness doctrine, 248, 969
and freedom of the press, 1145, 1146
and free speech, 1056, 1134
and Internet free speech, 471 and libel suits, 1146 of sedition, 2351
Chinese Exclusion Act (1882), 355–356
Chae Chan Ping v. United States, 328 legal challenges, 128, 130–131, 132, 1330
upheld, 1328
Chinese immigrants. See Asian Americans and the Constitution; Asian immigrants and constitutional history
Choice of law, 357–358
Allstate Insurance Co. v. Hague, 357, 358
diversity jurisdiction, 798
Choice of law and constitutional rights, 358
Christian Right. See Religious fundamentalism
Church and state. See Establishment clause; Establishment of religion; Separation of church and state Circuit courts, 359–361
abolishment of appellate jurisdiction, 361 concurrent jurisdiction, 1495
De Lovio v. Boit, 360 federal judicial role, 1021, 1489–1490, 1497
Judiciary Act of 1789, 359, 1489, 1495, 1496, 2564, 2603
Judiciary Act of 1801, 1496–1497, 2564
Judiciary act of 1875, 1497
Judiciary Acts of 1802, 1498

Circuit Courts of Appeals Act (1891), 361
and contemporary federal judicial system, 1490 Court jurisdictional control, 1498
Evarts and, 931
United States Courts of Appeals, 361, 2759–2760
Cities and the Constitution, 361–363
Hunter v. Pittsburg, 362 municipal immunity, 1767–1768
public purpose doctrine, 2076
residential segregation, 2219–2222
Citizenship, 363–364 (historical development), 364–366 (theory), 366–367 (update 1), 367–369 (update 2)
abolitionist constitutional theory, 2
Afroyim v. Rusk, 59
alien rights, 65, 131
American Indians, 82, 587, 594
Asian immigrants, 131, 1167, 1328, 2922
as birthright, 183–184 of blacks, 401, 820, 2143, 2354
blacks' excluded from, 364, 819, 820, 1356, 2649
Calvin's Case, 294, 363
Chinese Exclusion Act, 356, 1328
Civil Rights Act of 1866, 401
coexisting state and federal, 989
communitarians on, 472, 473
corporate, 687–689, 798, 805
denaturalization, 768–769
deprivation of as cruel and unusual punishment, 309, 731 District of Columbia residents, 796
diversity jurisdiction, 798, 1468
Dred Scott v. Sandford opinion, 364, 2649
Emancipation Proclamation, 417
expatriation and, 363, 956 and fetal personhood, 8
Fourteenth Amendment, 59, 129, 131, 168, 183–184, 364, 365, 366, 1085, 1087, 1090, 1092, 1167, 1357, 2305, 2497 of freed slaves, 2143, 2354 historical development, 363–364 military relationship, 385
Minor v. Happersett, 1740, 2918, 2919, 2920 national vs. state, 1354
and naturalization, 364–365, 366, 1785 nondiscrimination as basic right of, 97
Paul v. Virginia, 1888 and petition right, 1125 privileges and immunities protection, 364, 686, 1354, 2019, 2021
race-based restrictions, 129, 130–131, 819, 820 Reconstruction definition and basic rights of, 576, 578 residents of territories, 2672 revocation of, 59, 2733
sex discrimination and, 2400
Slaughterhouse cases, 1354, 2822
state residence requirements, 2218–2219 suffrage separated from, 68–69, 91, 2918 theory, 364–366
Thirteenth Amendment, 820, 2143, 2822
voting privileges of, 2388
Waite opinions, 2822
as woman suffrage claim, 91, 370, 1740, 2477, 2918–2919, 2920
Citizens' suits. See Taxpayers' and citizens' suits
Civil disobedience, 369–372
abolitionist, 1183
by anti-abortion movement, 93–94
by civil rights movement, 369, 370–371, 1537 draft card burning, 371, 817–818
and freedom of speech, 371, 1135–1136
by woman suffrage movement, 370
Civil forfeiture, 372–373
in drug regulation, 824
Eighth Amendment limits, 985 in federal criminal law, 985–986
procedural due process, 2056
and punitive damages, 2081–2082
Civil liberties, 373–380, 380–382 (update 1), 382–384 (update 2)
academic freedom, 21
American Civil Liberties Union, 78–79
amicus curiae briefs, 89
ancient antecedents of, 374 and antislavery controversy, 384–385
bail, 148
Bill of Rights, 175–178
Blackstone on, 373
Brennan commitment to, 229, 232, 234–236
Carolene Products Co., United States v., 382, 383
and civil rights, 387
Civil War restrictions, 416
English antecedents of, 374
Frank's judicial opinions, 1100
Free Speech League and, 2324 guilt by association and, 1236–1237
Holmes's positions, 1296–1297
Hughes Court and, 1311
incorporation doctrine and, 2310–2311
Japanese American cases, 131, 1416–1417, 2841
Jeffersonian emphasis on, 1425
Lincoln's Civil War record, 1620–1622, 1624
Pennsylvania colonial charters, 1894
Roosevelt Court and, 2293, 2302
Roosevelt's (Franklin D.) record, 2290–2291
Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, 2365 subversive activity and, 2579
Test Oath Cases, 2679
Truman presidency and, 2734
vagrancy laws and, 345
Vietnam War issues, 2790
Vinson Court rulings, 2793, 2795
Warren Court rulings, 1616
World War I and, 2928–2929
World War II and, 2290–2291, 2929, 2930
See also Natural rights and the Constitution; Slavery and civil liberties Civil liberties and the antislavery controversy, 384–385 gag orders, 2, 31, 560, 2425, 2884
Civil-military relations, 385–387
and Korean War, 1541
Civil procedure. See Federal Rules of Civil Procedure Civil rights, 387–394, 394–398 (update 1), 399–401 (update 2) and Afrocentric schools, 58 and age discrimination, 59
and aliens, 65–66, 72
and American Indians, 80–81, 82
antidiscrimination legislation, 94–101
and Asian Americans, 128–243
as Bork nomination issue, 210, 211
Buchanan v. Warley, 259
cases and controversies, 323–324
circuit court decisions, 360–361
Civil War federal sovereignty over, 572, 573 commentators on the Constitution on, 451 compensation for unconstitutional criminal procedure, 714–715 as constitutional aspiration, 664 and critical legal studies, 724
and critical race theory, 726
and disabled people, 86–88 disparate impact, 99, 100

domestic violence clause, 803
and education, 854
executive immunity from damages, 2922 expansion following World War II, 605 federal district courts caseload, 1491 federal enforcement, 200–201
and federalism, 1001–1002, 1007–1009
federal protection, 200–201, 1023–1027, 1070 fountainhead of modern doctrine, 1754 and Fourteenth Amendment framing, 1084–1087, 1088
Freedmen's Bureau, 1106
Fuller Court and, 1167–1168
Harlan's (1833–1911) dissents, 1267, 1268, 1918, 1919
Hughes's supportive opinions, 1310, 1311 injunction enforcement, 1372, 1373
institutional litigation, 1374
invidious discrimination, 1038
Johnson (Lyndon) legislative program, 1429, 1430
Justice Department Civil Rights Division activity, 136–137
Monroe v. Pape, 1754
noncriminal litigation, 2329 organizational memberships and compelled speech, 476
Paul v. Davis, 1888
pendent jurisdiction, 1891 and police misconduct, 2329 poll tax issue, 1961
and prisoners' rights, 653, 2011–2013
private conspiracy redress, 1230–1231 and private discrimination, 2015–2017
and public accommodations, 2062–2063 Republican party antebellum commitment, 2217 residential segregation challenges, 2219
Revised Statutes of the United States, 2227
Roosevelt Court and, 2293
school busing and, 2321 social rights distinction, 1038
states' rights and, 2519
Strauder v. West Virginia, 1038
Waite Court and, 2823, 2827
White Court and, 2900–2901
Wisdom's opinions, 2914, 2915
See also Civil rights movement; Reconstruction Civil Rights Act of 1866 (framing), 94, 95, 401–402
equal protection of the laws, 908
and Fourteenth Amendment, 1357
Johnson's (Andrew) veto of, 402, 578 racial discrimination targets, 2100
Civil Rights Act of 1866 (judicial interpretation), 402–404
alien protections, 66
Blyew v. United States, 200–201 color of law usage, 444
constitutionality tests, 96
and constitutional remedies, 652
equal protection rights, 375
narrowing focus of, 98
Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 1887 private property discrimination inclusion, 2063 and Revised Statutes of the United States (1875), 2227 twentieth-century open housing applications, 393, 2220, 2221
Civil Rights Act of 1875, 94, 404
enforcement power, 1089
invalidation of, 95, 96, 217–218, 404, 408, 1437
public accommodations application, 2062
Civil Rights Act of 1957, 95, 404
federal enforcement, 1025, 1026 and Justice Department Civil Rights Division, 411
Civil Rights Act of 1960, 95, 404–405
federal enforcement, 1026
Civil Rights Act of 1964, 95
age discrimination and, 59, 60, 61 civil disobedience and, 371
and comparable worth, 474
Court rulings, 98, 1089 coverage, 97, 1026, 1089
disparate impact, 99
employment discrimination and, 100, 893–894
equal protection rights, 375, 911
and Fourteenth Amendment, 96
history of, 390
impact of, 412
interstate commerce restraints, 95
as national standard, 1008
and private discrimination, 2016
public accommodations provision, 168, 391–392, 2063 public accommodations provision upheld, 1282–1283 race-based adoption as violation of, 46 and racial discrimination, 2107
and racial preference, 2109 and racial quotas, 54 reflecting courts' reactions to social change, 700
regulatory agency, 2148
and Rehnquist Court, 2164
and school busing, 1459 and school desegregation implementation, 772 and Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, 2365 and sexual harassment, 100–101
Title VII applications, 100–101, 474, 1232, 1722
Civil Rights Act of 1968, 95, 407
and housing discrimination, 393, 406, 407
as national standard, 1008
Title VIII open housing, 407, 1026, 1437, 1854, 2220, 2221
Civil Rights Act of 1991, 407–408
and disparate impact claims, 99, 100 presumption against statutory retroactivity, 2225 as response to Wards Cove decision, 99–100
Civil Rights Cases (1883), 408–410
badges of servitude, 409, 1437, 1919
and equal protection clause, 389, 909
and federal civil rights enforcement, 201
Harlan (1833–1911) dissent, 1267, 1919 invalidating antidiscrimination legislation, 95, 96, 1919, 2062
invalidating Civil Rights Act of 1875, 404 limiting federal civil rights enforcement, 201, 1089, 1293 and state jurisdictional rights, 1165 and Waite Court, 2828
Civil Rights Commission, 410
Civil Rights Act of 1964, 405
creation of, 404
Civil Rights Division, 410–411
establishment of, 404, 1025
Civil rights movement, 411–413
boycott use, 1551, 1556
Brown decision as catalyst, 255, 1615 civil disobedience use, 369, 370–371, 1537
Cox test for demonstrations, 702 and Fourteenth Amendment-Bill of Rights incorporation, 179–180 indictment for murder of civil rights workers, 2006 and Justice Department, 136
and Kennedy administration, 1532, 1533

Civil rights movement (continued)
King leadership, 1536–1537
political trials, 1955 public accommodations challenges, 2062
sit-ins, 2420
states' rights challenges, 1008
See also Desegregation; Race-consciousness; Racial discrimination; Racial preference Civil rights practice, 413–414
Civil rights removal, 414–415
and Civil Rights Act of 1866, 402, 403
Civil Rights Repeal Act (1894), 415
antidiscrimination legislation, 94
federal protection of civil rights, 1024
Civil service. See Public employees
Civil War, 415–418
and alien suffrage, 68 and Compromise of 1850, 812–813
Confiscation Acts, 134, 490–491, 2432–2433
conscientious objection, 2187
conscription, 506
constitutional results of, 571
Dred Scott v. Sandford, 818–820
Emancipation Proclamation, 417, 573, 884–885 federal judicial system changes, 1490 federal jurisdiction, 1501
Federal Test Acts, 1029–1030
habeas corpus suspension, 1246, 1247, 1256
Homestead Act, 417, 1302
and indestructibility of American federalism, 1007
Legal Tender Cases, 1581
Lincoln's conduct of, 415–417
Lincoln's constitutional theory, 1620–1622, 1624
Lincoln's war powers, 2840–2841
loyalty oaths, 1647–1648, 1649, 2143
Milligan, Ex parte, 2868
as political question, 2022
political trials, 1954, 1955
Prize Cases, 2022
rebel amnesties, 89 Republican party, 2217
and secession, 415, 1007
Senate during, 2358
slavery and, 2427, 2432
sovereignty question, 415
as state of war, 2505
as undeclared war, 755
unionism, 2688
war powers, 2840–2841
See also Reconstruction Civil War amendments. See Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Thirteenth Amendment Claims Court, 419–420
creation of new, 981
Iranian hostage settlement, 741
Tucker Act, 2737
See also United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit Class action, 422–423
amicus curiae briefs, 89
choice of law, 358
doctrinal formula, 801 federal courts litigation, 1491
litigation strategy, 1630 and mootness doctrine, 1464
public interest law, 2071
voting rights, 2320
Clayton Act (1914), 425–426
antitrust law, 104, 106
injunctions, 831
Clean Air Act. See Environmental regulation and the Constitution
Clear and present danger, 426–428
bad tendency test, 146, 1129, 1198
balancing test replacing, 115, 222, 427, 769–770
Brandenburg v. Ohio, 225–226, 1154, 1353
breach of the peace, 1031
Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 331 and criminal syndicalism statutes, 723
Dennis v. United States, 1353, 1955
"discounting" formula, 769–770
Espionage Act, 15–16, 1156, 2929
extremist speech, 961
fighting words, 331, 1042
and First Amendment rights, 146, 426, 1050, 1051, 1149, 1299, 2318–2319, 2901
and freedom of assembly, 1107 as free speech test, 15, 16, 17, 154–155, 769, 1129, 1149, 1955, 1990 free speech vs. criminal advocacy, 1154
Hand (Learned) reformulation, 1264
Herndon v. Lowry, 1285–1286, 1955
Holmes's coining of phrase, 1050, 1296, 1298, 1299, 2901 and hostile audience, 1304–1305 incitement to unlawful conduct as, 1198, 1352, 1353 and Jehovah's Witnesses cases, 2186, 2188, 2189
and political trials, 1955
problems with, 2901
Schenck v. United States, 426 statement of, 1352
and subversive activity, 426, 769, 1050, 1298, 1352–1353
and subversive advocacy, 2580
Whitney v. California, 2901–2902
World War I cases, 2901, 2928–2929
Clerks, 429
Supreme Court, 2604–2605
Closed shop, 434
Taft-Hartley ban, 2642
Cloture, 434
Civil Rights Act of 1964, 405
filibuster, 1043–1044
as temporal limit, 2664
Cocaine. See Crack cocaine and equal protection Coefficient clause. See Necessary and proper clause
Coerced confession. See Police interrogation and confessions Coerced speech. See Compelled speech Coercive acts. See Constitutional history before 1776; First Continental Congress, Declarations and Resolves of Cold War
Alien Registration Act, 67–68
American armed forces abroad, 449
Attorney General's List, 137–138
Dennis v. United States, 769–770
First Amendment absolutism, 17
Internal Security Act, 1385–1386
legislative investigation, 1595
loyalty oaths, 1648
loyalty-security programs, 1649–1650
Marshall Plan, 1687
McCarthyism, 1701–1702
Mundt-Nixon bill, 1766–1767
North Atlantic Treaty, 1827
public employees' right-privilege distinction, 2065–2066
State Department passport denials, 1535
See also Korean War; Vietnam War Collateral attack, 441–442
jurisdiction, 1500
Collective bargaining, 442 antitrust implications, 1545
and commerce clause, 456
employee speech rights, 891 and freedom of association, 4
Wagner Act, 1545, 1548
yellow dog contract, 2939
Collusive suit, 443
case or controversy doctrine, 322, 1464 Colonial charters, 443–444
and colonist rights, 84
and constitutionalism, 635–636

Colorado River Compact (1923), 1398, 1399
Color of law, 444–445
affirmative action and, 55–56 in antidiscrimination law, 2092
Monroe v. Pape, 1754 police misconduct and, 2329 primary elections test case, 423 private actions in concert with state officials, 2006 Comity, judicial, 447
exhaustion of remedies, 975
fugitive from justice, 1158
Comity clause. See Full faith and credit Commander-in-chief, 448–449
and congressional war powers, 502–503
and declaration of war, 755
as enumerated presidential power, 1996, 1998
Executive Order 10340, 945
Polk's development of powers, 1959 presidential plenary authority as, 1075, 2290 presidential power to end wars, 494 presidential war powers, 2844
and undeclared war, 1242, 1541, 2841
Commentaries on American Law (Kent), 1534, 1535
Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States (Story), 559, 561–562, 1633, 2121, 2554
Commentaries on the Laws of England (Blackstone), 196, 197, 512, 1217, 1674, 2057, 2236
Commentators on the Constitution, 449–453
Arnold, Thurman, 453
Bancroft, George, 159
Beard, Charles A., 166–167, 452
Bickel, Alexander M., 173, 453
Boudin, Louis, 212, 453
Brant, Irving, 226
Burgess, John W., 452
Calhoun, John C., 291–292, 451
Chipman, Nathaniel, 356, 449
Commager, Henry Steele, 447–448
on Congress's jurisdiction-limiting authority, 1502–1503
Cooley, Thomas McIntyre, 451, 680–681
Corwin, Edward S., 452, 693–694, 1634, 2834
Crosskey, William W., 453, 728–729, 1643
Curtis, George Ticknor, 450, 736
Cushman, Robert E., 738
Davis, Jefferson, 451
Dillon, John Forrest, 451
Freund, Paul, 1155
Goodnow, Frank J., 1205
Haines, Charles G., 1257
Hamilton, Alexander, 449
Hamilton, Walton Hale, 1260–1261
Hildreth, Richard, 450
Jackson, Robert H., 452
Jay, John, 449
Kelly, Alfred H., 1528
Kent, James, 450, 1535
Kurland, Philip B., 1542–1543
Lee, Rex Edwin, 1574
and legal culture, 1577
Lieber, Francis, 451
Madison, James, 449
Murphy, Paul L., 1769–1770
Powell, Thomas Reed, 1980–1981
Progressive critiques, 2046–2047
on ratifier intent, 2120, 2121
Rawle, William, 450, 2124
St. George Tucker, Henry, 450
Schouler, James, 452
Smith, J. Allen, 2436
Stephens, Alexander H., 451
Story, Joseph, 450, 2554
Swisher, Carl Brent, 453, 2630
Taylor, John, 450
Thorpe, Francis N., 2700
Tiedeman, Christopher G., 451, 2701
Tucker, John Randolph, 451
Tucker, St. George, 2737
Von Holst, Hermann, 452
Willoughby, Westel W., 452, 2907–2908
Commerce
Chief Justice Marshall's definition of, 1191
See also Effects on commerce; Foreign commerce; Interstate commerce; Intrastate commerce; State regulation of commerce; State taxation of commerce; Stream of commerce doctrine; Subjects of commerce
Commerce clause, 453–460
Adair v. United States, 25–26 age discrimination legislation, 59
and American Indians, 80, 81, 82–83, 453–454
Americans with Disabilities Act, 87
antidiscrimination legislation tied to, 95, 1282
and antitrust law, 103, 585, 1828 Bituminous Coal Act upheld under, 184, 457 broad construction of, 250, 1261, 1262
Burger Court use of, 276
child labor and, 350, 2048, 2049
Child Support Recovery Act and, 354
cities and, 362, 363
civil rights cases and, 390
and competition in interstate commerce, 1739 concurrent powers doctrine, 1534–1535 congressional power and, 2317 corporate charter vested rights, 2059–2060 dormant, 804–807
drug regulation, 821, 822, 823
and dual federalism, 827
economic equal protection, 840
Edwards v. California, 861, 2878
Embargo Acts, 885
environmental regulation, 900, 904
exclusive federal control over, 1425 extended to entire national economy, 850, 2932–2933 Fair Labor Standards Act upheld under, 743, 966 federal criminal law jurisdiction, 1567, 1568, 1570 federalism and shared powers, 1011–1012 federal regulation of private activity under, 991 federal treaty power superseding, 1389–1390
Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, 1069
foreign commerce and, 1072–1073, 1081 Frankfurter's views, 1003 freedom of contract and, 1114 and general welfare clause, 1186
Gibbons v. Ogden, 1189–1192, 1396, 1425, 1988
Hughes Court interpretation, 1314
interstate commerce and, 1396
interstate slave trade and, 1238 interstate transport of liquor and, 213–214 intrastate commerce and, 1396, 1399, 1918 jurisdiction to tax under, 1504–1505 limits tests, 1396
Marshall (John) treatise on, 1189–1190, 1191–1192
Marshall Court ruling, 1674, 1686
Minnesota rate cases, 1739–1740, 2899
National Industrial Recovery Act, 2288
navigation and waterways, 107, 454, 455

Commerce clause (continued) original meaning of "commerce" scholarship, 1643
Perez v. United States, 1567, 1899
Philadelphia v. New Jersey, 1904
preemption, 1988
and private-sector discrimination, 2016
and privileges and immunities, 2019–2020
Public Utility Holding Act, 2079–2080 railroads and their employees and, 455, 456, 457 rational basis standard of review, 2122
Rehnquist Court and, 2169
Roosevelt Court broad view of, 2293 securities law and, 2350 and segregated rail transport, 1918 and segregated steamship transport, 204 selective exclusiveness doctrine, 681–682, 2356
Sherman Antitrust Act and, 1828
Shreveport doctrine and, 2415–2416
as social and economic remedy, 330 state and local government taxation and, 2493, 2494 state import tax as violating, 256
state police power, 1320
state regulation of commerce curbs, 1381 state taxation of commerce, 2521 state tax incentives and subsidies to business and, 2523 stream of commerce doctrine, 1396, 2470
subjects of commerce and, 2565
substantive due process and, 2574
supremacy clause and, 2588
Taft Court and, 2638
Taney Court and, 455, 681, 1700, 2651 treaty power superseding, 1390 uniform preemptive national legislation, 996
vagrancy laws and, 2774
Wagner Act cases, 2819–2821
White Court and, 2899
Willson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co., 2908
World War I, 2481
Commerce court, 460
establishment of, 590
Commercial speech, 460–461, 462 (update 1), 462–464 (update 2) alteration of doctrinal formula, 203–204 attorney solicitation, 138–139, 165, 1065
Blackmun doctrinal innovation, 190
Board of Trustees of State University of New York v. Fox, 203
Burger Court and, 275, 316
call for secondary boycott disallowed, 1203–1204
Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v Public Service Commission, 327 chilling effect and, 355
communitarians on, 473
First Amendment four-part test, 461, 462–463, 464
First Amendment protection, 17, 138, 139, 165, 327, 375, 1060, 1118, 1133, 1135, 1556, 2351, 2800
First Amendment restriction on misleading, 1377 interest-balancing formula test, 1969
listeners' rights, 1628
as low First Amendment value, 1056, 1128, 1133, 1646
Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Company, 462 primary purpose test, 460, 461
"reduced protection," 830
"right of publicity" privacy cases, 2014
standard of review, 2472
Virginia Pharmacy Board v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 461, 462 Committees of Correspondence, 32
Common law (Anglo-American), 465–466
affected with a public interest, 52–53 against redelegation of power, 760 antitrust law roots in, 104, 105
arrest warrant, 119, 120, 121
Boyd ruling, 2339 breach of the peace, 227
citizenship, 131
and Civil Rights Cases, 409 Coke's writings, 439–440
collateral attack, 441 conflict law as, 358 and constitutional common law, 513
damages, 739, 2741
de facto/de jure, 759
defendants' rights, 718
de minimis non curat lex, 765 doctrine stemming from, 801 double jeopardy, 807–808 evidence admissibility, 2872 federal court jurisdiction, 1439
feudal privileges, 1034
freedom of contract, 1112, 1113
full faith and credit, 1171
and fundamental law, 1174
habeas corpus, 1245–1246
and higher law, 1571 human body property rights, 2057
jury nullification, 1512
jury size, 1516, 2727
jury unanimity, 2727
juvenile proceedings, 1522 labor activity restrictions, 1546, 1547, 1554, 1555 libel, 1141, 1606, 1608 municipality liability, 1767
obscenity, 2747
official immunity, 1336 precedent, 1986
preferred freedoms, 1051
property, 2052, 2057, 2222
public law litigation vs., 2072
reasonable doubt, 264
right against self-incrimination, 1617–1618, 2233, 2234, 2236
rule of law, 2297, 2298
rules of liability, 1804
seditious libel, 16, 1138, 1606 slavery, 2451–2452 sovereign immunity, 2459
stare decisis, 2477 state constitutional law and, 2496
state police power, 2506
Story's views, 2556
suicide, 2267
women's status, 2920
writ of prohibition, 2050
Common law, constitutional. See Constitutional common law
Common law, federal. See Federal common law, civil; Federal common law of crimes
Common Law, The (Holmes), 1295, 1296, 1308, 1315, 2712
Common Sense (Paine), 27, 537, 2297 Commonwealth status, 468
and federalism, 1004
of Puerto Rico, 2081
Communications Act (1934), 468–469
broadcasting, 246, 247, 249
Federal Communications Commission powers, 445–446 wiretapping prohibition, 1853, 2913
Communications and community, 469–470
Communications and democracy, 470–471
listeners' rights, 1628
Communications Decency Act (1996), 471–472
Internet restraints, 1392
Communism. See Cold War; Communist party; Loyalty-security program;

McCarthyism; Subversive activity; Subversive advocacy Communist Control Act (1954), 472
McCarthyism, 606
Pennsylvania V. Nelson, 1894
subversive advocacy, 2581–2582
Communist party
Attorney General's List, 138, 1436
balancing test, 155, 770, 1595
constitutionally protected activities vs. revolutionary incitements, 769, 770, 1353
Dennis v. United States, 769–770, 1127, 1353
First Amendment protections, 1127, 1595
freedom of association, 1052, 1107, 1108–1109
House Committee on Un-American Activities, 605, 1305
and incitement to unlawful conduct, 1198–1199, 1353
Internal Security Act, 1386 labor union members, 257, 1561
legislative investigations, 1595, 2866 legislative investigation witness testimony, 1595–1596
listeners' rights, 1560, 1628
loyalty oath, 1648
loyalty-security programs, 1649–1650, 1701–1702
Mundt-Nixon Bill, 1766–1767
Palmer raids, 2580
restricted association rights, 1237 right to travel appeal, 116
Robel v. United States, 2280–2281
subversive advocacy, 2581–2582
Yates reversal of Smith Act convictions, 2938–2939
Communitarianism, 472–474
Compact theory. See Social compact theory; Theories of the Union Companion case, 474
Comparable worth, 474–475
as sex discrimination issue, 2397
Compelled speech, 475–476
Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, 1320 Compelling state interest, 477
in abortion, 5, 2204, 2284–2285
in affirmative action, 33, 58, 848 in afrocentric schools, 58 in bail setting, 150–151 and balancing test, 155 in campaign finance, 295 in dial-a-porn restraints, 778 in family choices interference, 1123 in First Amendment infringements, 155 in gun control, 1243–1244
overriding free association challenge, 1110
Paradise, United States v., 1877
Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association, 1899 in public forum speech regulation, 2068 in race- and sex-based antidiscrimination law, 2091, 2106 in religious liberty infringement, 821, 1851, 2178, 2182, 2187, 2192, 2195 in residency requirements, 2306
in same-sex marriage, 147, 2308
in suppressing instructions of violence, 1154
See also Strict scrutiny Competitive federalism, 477
Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act (1970), 821, 823 Comprehensive Forfeiture Act (1984), 680
Compromise of 1850, 477–478
Douglas's (Stephen) role in, 812–813 fugitive slave laws, 1159, 1525
Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1525, 1526
Pierce administration and, 1908
slavery and, 2430, 2431, 2435
Webster statement on, 2885
Whig party position, 2884, 2885
Compromise of 1877, 478–479
and antidiscrimination legislation, 94
Compulsory process, right to, 479–481
and capital punishment, 302
for criminally accused, 2255–2256
and right of confrontation, 491
Computers, 481–483
criminal justice technology, 711, 712–713 Internet and free speech, 471, 1154, 1391–1392 zoning technology, 2945
Concord town meeting resolutions (1776), 483
and constitutional conventions, 515–516
Concurrent jurisdiction, 483–484
abstention doctrine, 18
habeas corpus, 1247
Judiciary Act of 1789, 1495
removal of cases, 2198–2199
United States District Courts, 2762
Concurrent powers, 484
and doctrine of selective exclusiveness, 681
as dormant, 807
and federalism, 1012
in interstate commerce, 1190
Concurrent resolution, 485
emergency powers, 886, 2842
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha, 1219, 2843 joint resolution vs., 1436–1437
and war powers, 1998, 2838, 2843
Concurring opinion, 485
Brandeis on free speech, 222–23 conference, 488
grounds of opinion, 1235
Conditional spending, 485–488
Confederate Constitution, 488
appellate jurisdiction, 109
ban on alien suffrage, 68
line-item veto, 1626
provisions of, 575
slave trade prohibition, 2050
Confederation Congress. See First Congress
Conference, 488
Supreme Court decision, 752
Confessions. See Police interrogation and confessions
Confirmatio cartarum (1297), 489
Confirmation process, 489–490
judicial independence, 1456
politicization of, 2325 for Supreme Court justices, 112, 1018–1019
See also Advice and consent; Advice and consent to Supreme Court nominations Confiscation Acts (1861, 1862), 490–491
and attainder of treason, 134 forfeiture of slaves by, 2432–2433
Conflict of laws. See Choice of law; Choice of law and constitutional rights
Conflict of Laws (Story), 2556
Conformity Act (1789), 1028 Confrontation, right of, 491, 491–493 (update) and administrative agency regulations, 39
and capital punishment, 302
in child abuse, 1691
Coy v. Iowa, 703
for criminally accused, 2255
and fair trial, 971
as fundamental in state and federal courts, 1921 and hearsay evidence, 1282 incorporation into criminal procedural due process, 2039
in juvenile delinquency proceedings, 1183

Confrontation, right of (continued) lineup suspect, 1628
and loyalty-security charges, 1650
Scalia's views, 2316
Congress. See Continental Congress; First Congress; House of Representatives; Senate; Legislative power; specific headings below
Congress and foreign policy, 493–496
Boland Amendment, 206, 2128
commerce regulation, 1081 declaration of war, 755–756
delegation of power, 760, 761
extraterritoriality, 959
Iran-Contra affair, 1402
powers and authority, 1073–1076, 1078–1081 and presidential treaty power, 1991–1993
See also Advice and consent; Congressional war powers; Senate and foreign policy; Treaty power Congress and the Supreme Court, 496–498
appellate jurisdiction, 108–109
constitutional amending process, 73–74, 75 Court's historical judicial restraint, 1445–1446
federal jurisdiction, 1501–1503
Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act (1974), 498–499
and concurrent resolution, 485
and congressional spending, 619–620 as counter-impoundment measure, 1349 and executive power, 949
Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act amending, 1219 as impairing presidential bureaucratic authority, 266 as Nixon impoundment response, 610, 615
as reassertment of fiscal policymaking role, 260, 262
Congressional Budget Office, 260
Congressional contempt power. See Legislative contempt power Congressional government, 499–500
delegation of power, 760–762
Wilson (Woodrow) writings, 2911
Congressional investigation. See Legislative investigation Congressional membership, 500–501
Congressional power. See Legislative power
Congressional privileges and immunities, 501–502
Congressional Record, 2358 Congressional standing, 502
Congressional veto. See Legislative veto Congressional war powers, 502–503
concurrent resolution, 1998, 2843
Confiscation Acts, 490
constitutional and historical, 2835, 2838–2844
declaration of war, 455–456, 755–756, 1080, 1998, 2836 establishment of military forces, 386 original intent and, 1080
as restraints on presidential powers, 449, 1075, 1998
War Powers Resolution, 2838–2839
World War I, 2927–2928
See also Presidential war powers; War powers
Congress of Racial Equality, 412
Connecticut Compromise. See Great Compromise Conquered provinces theory, 504–505
Conscientious objection, 505–506
balancing test, 2187
and civil disobedience, 371
and conscription, 506 exemption as right not privilege, 2187
free exercise clause, 1049, 2187–2188
Jehovah's Witness case, 2186 naturalization eligibility, 1198 religious beliefs definition, 2173, 2180, 2188, 2193, 2353–2354
Seeger, United States v., 2353–2354
state denial of, 1261
Conscription, 506–507
adoption of national, 571
of aliens, 66, 68
draft card burning, 817–818
exclusion of women challenged, 2295–2296
Selective Draft Law Cases, 506, 2173, 2187, 2356, 2868–2869, 2928
Selective Service Act, 2357
Thirteenth Amendment-based involuntary servitude challenge, 506, 2187, 2356, 2928
World War I, 506, 2356–2357, 2927
World War II, 506, 2357
See also Conscientious objection
Conscription Act (1917). See Selective Service Act Conscription Acts (1863, 1940, 1948). See Selective Service Acts Consent decree, 507
Packers & Stockyards Act, 1873 Consent search, 507 broadened conception, 1327–1328 voluntary, 2334
Conservatism, 507–511
anti-abortion movement, 92–94
Bork nomination, 209–211
Burger Court, 270, 272, 273
critique of liberalism, 1616
devolution agenda, 775–778
"Four Horsemen of Reaction," 2899 liberal construction compared with, 1612–1613
New Right, 1801–1802
obscenity views, 1838
Progressive thought vs., 2048–2049
Reagan presidency, 2124–2129
of Rehnquist, 2155, 2156, 2158, 2159, 2160
of Rehnquist Court, 2161–2162, 2168–2169 religious fundamentalism, 2184–2185
Republican party 1994 agenda, 775–776
of Scalia, 2312–2314, 2315
and welfare rights, 2875–2877
of White (Edward), 2894–2895 of White Court, 2899, 2900 Conspiracy law, 511–512
criminal conspiracy, 708–709
Constitution, 512–513 anti-retroactivity provisions, 2225 bicameralism provision, 171 Committee of Eleven's draft of, 287 concept in Massachusetts Circular Letter, 1694 concept of written, 84, 1174–1175, 1364, 1419 constitutional conventions framing of, 514 Declaration of Independence as basis, 31, 534–535, 755, 1174, 1944, 1945, 1946, 1985–1986 as disinterested authority, 1046–2047
English Bill of Rights influence, 175
English roots, 1387
Fourteenth Amendment transformation of, 1090–1092
as fundamental law, 1173–1174 Fundamental Orders of Connecticut as first written, 1176 fundamental principles, 1947 gender-neutrality of original text, 2920
history of, 528–529
impeachment grounds, 1336 influence abroad, 1363–1368 international human rights guarantees compared with, 1387–1389 lack of gender distinctions in, 1185
Madison as father of, 1656–1658, 1659–1662

Massachusetts Constitution as classic, 1695 Montesquieu's influence, 1755–1756 natural, 1639
natural rights and, 1785–1787
nonjudicial interpretation of, 1821–1824 political philosophy of, 1944–1946, 1962–1963 and politics, 1956–1958
Preamble, 1985–1986
presidential powers enumeration, 1996 privileges and immunities clause, 2019–2022 on privileges and rights, 2251
public choice theory, 2063–2064
and republican form of government, 2209 right-privilege distinction, 2251–2252
supremacy of, 1963
textualism, 2682–2684
unwritten, 2770–2771
See also Bill of Rights; British Constitution; Commentaries on the Constitution; Constitutional history; Constitutionalism; Ratification of the Constitution; Ratifier intent; State constitutions Constitutional amendments. See Amending process; Bill of Rights; specific amendments
Constitutional argument. See History in constitutional argumentation Constitutional common law, 513–514
Constitutional convention, 514–516
and amending process, 74, 75, 77, 123–124, 2116
for balanced-budget amendment, 76, 123, 153, 618 as Concord town meeting resolution, 483 and constitutional reform, 651 for states returning to the Union, 2818
Constitutional Convention of 1787, 517–523
Adams (John) and, 28
amending process, 72, 74, 75, 77, 123–124
and Annapolis Convention, 90
Anti-Federalist arguments, 101–102 appointments clause, 48–49, 113–114 backgrounds of delegates, 1610–1611
and Bill of Rights, 175–176
bills of attainder prohibition, 174 bills of credit prohibition, 174
cases and controversies, 322
and commerce clause, 454, 804–805, 806
compromises and shared principles of, 1947 congressional privileges and immunities, 501
contract clause, 673
decisions of, 542
definition of American constitutionalism and, 636, 637 deliberative democratic aspirations of, 763 Dickinson's contribution, 780
District created as federal government seat, 795–796
domestic violence clause, 803 enumerated rights, 1045
Farran's compiled and edited records of, 975
Fitzsimons as delegate, 1061
Franklin as delegate, 1104, 1105
Gerry as delegate, 1187
Gorham as delegate, 1205
Great Compromise, 1228
Hamilton's contribution, 1258
House of Representatives inception, 1305 on impeachable offenses, 1337–1338 interest group theory, 1380
Johnson (William Samuel) as delegate, 1433–1434
on judicial power, 979–819
on judicial review, 1473, 1474
King as delegate, 1537
Langdon as delegate, 1561
Lansing as delegate, 1561 lawyers participating in, 1365, 1610 and Lecompton constitution, 1574
Madison's critical role in, 1656–1658, 1659–1663
Madison's notes, 1662–1663
and originalism, 1394
Pierce as delegate, 1908
Pinckney as delegate, 1909
Preamble drafting, 1985–1986
ratification of constitutional amendments, 2116
ratifier intent, 2120–2121 records of, 516–517, 975, 1662–1663 representation compromise, 2130, 2133
and republican form of government, 2209
Rutledge as delegate, 2301
Senate inception, 2357–2361 slave trade prohibitions, 2050 on Supreme Court justices' appointment method, 489 taxing and spending powers, 1998 theories of Union, 753–754, 997 on veto power, 1349
Virginia Plan, 2800
voting rights issue, 636 on war powers, 755, 1080 Wilson's (James) contributions, 2910–2911
Wythe as delegate, 2935
Yates as delegate, 2938
Constitutional Convention, records of, 516–517
Farran's compiled and edited notes, 975
Madison's notes, 1662–1663
Yates's notes, 2938
Constitutional court, 523–524
cases and controversies, 322
Court of Customs and Patent Appeals as, 696 Court of International Trade as, 696
as distinct from legislative courts, 1589, 1590, 1612 Farran's compiled and edited notes, 975
as federal court, 1017
federal judicial role, 1020–1023
federal question jurisdiction, 1027–1028
habeas corpus writs, 1248–1253
justiciability, 1519–1521
state nonimmunity to suits in, 1060
United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit as, 981
Constitutional Dictatorship (Rossiter), 1996 Constitutional dualism, 524–525
deliberative democracy, 763–764
See also Amendment process (outside Article V); Constitutional theory Constitutional federalism. See Federalism
Constitutional fictions, 525–528
Constitutional Government of the United States (Wilson), 1633, 2047
Constitutional history before 1776, 528–536
Massachusetts Body of Liberties, 149, 374, 531, 828, 1694
Stamp Act Congress, 2470–2471
Constitutional history, 1776–1789, 536–546
Adams (John) and, 27–29
American Revolution, 83–86
Anti-Federalist thought, 101–2, 101–102, 101–2
Articles of Confederation, 124–126, 537, 538, 539

Constitutional history (continued)
civil-military relations, 385, 387
Declaration of Independence, 752–755
domestic violence clause, 803
due process clause, 829
equal protection, 907
federalism, 997–999, 1011
Federalist, The, 1013–1015
First Congress, 1057–1059
first election, 1934
fundamental law, 1173–1174
gender-neutrality of original text, 2920
Hamilton's views, 1257–1260
judicial review, 1473–1474
legislative power, 1596–1597 liberal ideals, 1613–1614 Lockean influence, 1640
Madison's importance, 1656–1658, 1659–1663
Marshall (John) and, 1673
Massachusetts Constitution of 1780, 1695
Northwest Ordinance, 1829
and original intent, 1857
political philosophy of Constitution, 1944–1949 popular sovereignty, 1962–1963
postal power, 1970
Preamble writing, 1985–1986
property's importance, 2051, 2052–2053
referendum, 763
republican form of government, 2209
republicanism, 2212–2213
right against self-incrimination, 2236
state precedent for judicial review, 1298
Washington's impact on, 2860–2861
See also Constitutional Convention of 1789
Constitutional history, 1789–1801, 546–550
amending process, 72, 74
Bill of Rights, 178, 1091
and Federalists, 1016 federal jurisdiction over common law crimes, 980 first act of Congress ruled unconstitutional, 1279–1280, 1324
First Amendment, 1045
Jay as first Chief Justice, 1418
Jay' Treaty, 1419
Judiciary Act of 1789, 1495–1497
Madison and, 1658
Washington's impact on, 546–549, 2861–2862
Constitutional history, 1801–1829, 550–558
devolution cases, 777
and federalism, 1000, 1011–1012
and Federalists, 1017
federal jurisdiction over common law crimes, 980–981
Jefferson presidency, 550–553
judicial review, 1473–1474
Judiciary Act of 1801, 1496–1497
Judiciary Acts of 1802, 1498
labor organization, 1546 liberal constitutional construction, 1611–1612
Madison presidency, 1658–1659
Marbury v. Madison, 1667–1670
Marshall Court, 1681–1687
Marshall's (John) influence, 1673–1675
Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1688–1691
McCulloch v. Maryland, 1611, 1705–1707
Missouri Compromise, 1747–1748
Monroe (James) presidency, 554–555 political parties, 1935
unconstitutionality, 1293–1294
Constitutional history, 1829–1848, 558–564
and federalism, 1000–1001
and Jacksonianism, 1412–1414
Jackson presidency, 558–561
labor organization, 1547
political parties, 1935
Polk presidency, 563
Constitutional history, 1848–1861, 564–570
Polk presidency, 565, 568
republican form of government, 1652, 2210
Constitutional history, 1861–1865, 570–576
Civil War, 415–418
and federalism, 999, 1001
Lincoln presidency, 415–417, 571–575
Constitutional history, 1865–1877, 576–582
amendment ratification, 72
Bill of Rights, 178
civil rights legislation, 94–96, 401–404
and federalism, 191, 999, 1001
Fifteenth Amendment, 1039–1042
Fourteenth Amendment, 1084–1092
Grant presidency, 580, 581
Johnson (Andrew) presidency, 577–579
Judiciary Act of 1875, 1497
Legal Tender Cases, 1581–1582
Military Reconstruction Acts, 1728
postal power, 1970
Reconstruction's significance, 764
Thirteenth Amendment, 2692–2693
Constitutional history, 1877–1901, 582–587
Asian immigrant legal challenges, 130–131 and Bill of Rights extension to states, 178–179, 1090–1092
and federalism, 1000, 1001, 1012
freedom of contract, 1112
Fuller Court, 1163–1170
public purpose doctrine, 2073, 2075
Constitutional history, 1901–1921, 587–592
clear and present danger test, 1352–1353
constitutional amendments, 72, 588, 589
and federalism, 1000, 1001, 1012
and First Amendment rights, 1949–1050
freedom of contract, 1112, 1116
Fuller Court, 1163–1170
Progressive thought, 2046–2048, 2048–2050
public purpose doctrine, 2073
republican form of government, 2210
Roosevelt (Theodore) presidency, 589–590
rule of reason doctrine, 2298–2299, 2895 Taft (William Howard) presidency, 589–590
White Court, 2897–2901
Wilson (Woodrow) presidency, 590, 591
Constitutional history, 1921–1933, 592–596
Asian immigrant court challenges, 131
and Bill of Rights extension to states, 179
and federalism, 1001, 1008, 1012
and First Amendment rights, 1050
freedom of contract, 1116
freedom of the press, 1138
Harding (Warren) presidency, 593
Hoover (Herbert) presidency, 595–596
Judicial Conference of the United States, 1452
Judiciary Act of 1925, 1497–1498
Nineteenth Amendment, 1808–1809
public purpose doctrine, 2073
Constitutional history, 1933–1945, 596–602
amendment ratification, 73

Asian American court challenges, 131 congressional investigations, 1595
Court-packing plan, 696–699, 1794, 2288–2289
and federalism, 1001, 1002
freedom of the press, 1138–1139
Hughes Court, 1312–1318
Japanese American cases' significance, 132 Judiciary Reform Act, 1498–1499 minimum wage legislation, 2881–2882
National Industrial Recovery Act, 1775–1776
New Deal legislative tests, 128, 2288–2289
New Deal's significance, 764
public purpose doctrine, 2073–2074, 2075–2076
Roosevelt (Franklin) presidency, 596–602
Roosevelt Court, 2292–2293
Constitutional history, 1945–1961, 602–608
antidiscrimination legislation, 96–97
and Bill of Rights extension to states, 179
Brown v. Board of Education's importance, 253 Eisenhower (Dwight) presidency, 605–607
and federalism, 1002
incorporation doctrine, 1355
North Atlantic Treaty, 1827 presidential powers decision, 1996
public purpose doctrine, 2076
secularist leanings, 1048
Truman (Harry) presidency, 603–605
Constitutional history, 1961–1977, 608–613
amendment ratification, 73, 75, 608
Burger Court, 272–278
devolution and federalism issues, 777
and federalism, 1002–1003, 1008
and First Amendment rights, 1002–1003, 1008, 1051
freedom of the press, 1145–1146
free press/fair trial, 1150
Griswold v. Connecticut significance, 1233–1234
institutional litigation, 1375
Nixon presidency, 1815–1818 religious belief definitions, 2173–2174
Watergate scandal, 2864–2865
Constitutional history, 1977–1985, 613–617
Burger Court, 272–277, 1008
and federalism, 1002–1003, 1008
feminist theory, 1032–1033
Reagan presidency, 617–622
Constitutional history, 1980–1989, 617–623
conservative program, 776 delegation doctrine, 761, 762
devolution, 776–777
federalism, 1002, 1003
freedom of intimate association, 1119
freedom of speech cases, 1132–1135
Iran-Contra affair, 206, 1402–1403
Reagan (Ronald) presidency, 617–622
Constitutional history, 1989–1999, 623–626
amendment ratification, 75
devolution, 776–777
freedom of the press, 1146
Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 1916 religious belief definition, 2174–2175
Constitutional interpretation, 626–633
avoidance doctrine, 142
of Bill of Rights application, 1354 and Bork nomination rejections, 50, 115, 210
broad construction, 250 of commerce clause, 454, 1189–1192
communitarianism, 472
constitutionalism, 639, 1035 contemporary federalism rulings, 995
damages claims, 741 deconstructionist readings, 758–759 departmentalism, 1487
as doctrine, 801
Douglas-Black clash, 816 of due process clauses, 2043–2045 economics linkage, 1563–1566
and federal common law authority, 977–978
Federalist, 1015–1017
and federal judicial appointments, 1018 and federal jurisdiction, 1502
First Amendment expansion, 1049–1050
Fourth Amendment, 2340
free exercise clause, 2192–2193
fruit of the poisonous tree, 1158
Hamilton's views, 1260
Hughes Court, 1312, 1314, 1317
interpretivist, 1393–1394, 1480, 1860–1861
Jacksonian strict approach, 1412, 1413
Jeffersonianism, 1422 judicial function in, 1034, 1458–1459 judicial policymaking vs., 1462
judicial review, 1477–1478
judicial strategy, 1485 judicial supremacy in, 1475, 1476, 1487–1488
jurisprudence, 1505–1508
Justice Baldwin's views, 156–157
Justice Barbour's views, 162
Justice Blackmun's views, 190–196, 1291, 2204, 2284
Justice Black's views, 185–188, 815, 816, 1233, 2037, 2038
Justice Blair's views, 198
Justice Blatchford's views, 198–199
Justice Bradley's views, 216–218
Justice Brandeis's views, 219–225, 1633–1634
Justice Brennan's views, 229–240, 1458, 1459, 1480, 1634, 2214
Justice Brewer's views, 240–242
Justice Breyer's views, 242–243
Justice Brown's views, 252–253
Justice Burger's views, 269–272
Justice Burton's views, 279–280
Justice Butler's views, 283–284
Justice Byrnes's views, 285–286
Justice Campbell's views, 298
Justice Cardozo's views, 313–316, 2713
Justice Catron's views, 325
Justice Chase's views, 334–336
Justice Clark's views, 420–421
Justice Curtis's views, 735–736
Justice Cushing's views, 737–738
Justice Davis's views, 746, 746–747
Justice Day's views, 749
Justice Douglas's views, 813–816, 815, 1233, 1480
Justice Duvall's views, 832
Justice Ellsworth's views, 882–884
Justice Field's views, 1035–1036, 1035–1039
Justice Fortas's views, 1082–1083
Justice Frankfurter's views, 1101–1104, 2037–2038
Justice Fuller's views, 1161–1163
Justice Ginsburg's views, 1196–1197
Justice Goldberg's views, 1200
Justice Gray's views, 1226–1227
Justice Grier's views, 1229–1230
Justice Harlan's (1833–1911) views, 1265–1270
Justice Harlan's (1899–1971) views, 1268–1270, 2037–2038
Justice Holmes's views, 1296–1298, 1633
Justice Hughes's views, 1309–1312
Justice Hunt's views, 1319
Justice Iredell's views, 1404
Justice Jackson's (Howell E.) views, 1409

Constitutional interpretation (continued)
Justice Jackson's (Robert H.) views, 1410–1411, 2903
Justice Jay's views, 1418
Justice Johnson's views, 1425, 1433
Justice Kennedy's views, 1529–1532
Justice Lamar's (Joseph) views, 1558–1559
Justice Lamar's (L. Q. C.) views, 1559
Justice Lurton's views, 1651–1652
Justice Marshall's (John) views, 1189–1192, 1458–1459, 1472, 1473, 1611–1612, 1633, 1667–1669, 1673–1675, 1682–1686, 1706–1707
Justice Marshall's (Thurgood) views, 1676–1681
Justice Matthews's views, 1698
Justice McKenna's views, 1709–1710
Justice McKinley's views, 1710–1711
Justice McLean's views, 1711–1712
Justice McReynold's views, 1714–1715
Justice Miller's views, 1731–1734
Justice Moody's views, 1756
Justice Murphy's views, 1768–1769
Justice O'Connor's views, 1841–1846
Justice Paterson's views, 1883–1884
Justice Peckham's views, 1890–1891
Justice Pitney's views, 1911–1912
Justice Powell's views, 1975–1980
Justice Reed's views, 2144–2145
Justice Rehnquist's views, 2152–2160
Justice Roberts's views, 2281–2282
Justice Rutledge's (Wiley) views, 2302–2303
Justice Sanford's views, 2310–2311
Justice Scalia's views, 2313–2316
Justice Shiras's views, 2413–2414, 2414
Justice Souter's views, 2453–2456
Justice Stevens's views, 2529–2539
Justice Stewart's views, 2541–2542
Justice Stone's views, 2543–2547
Justice Story's views, 333, 2553–2557
Justice Strong's views, 2563–2564
Justice Sutherland's views, 2260, 2626–2627
Justice Swayne's views, 2628
Justice Taft's views, 2634–2636
Justice Taney's views, 333, 1652, 2210, 2647–2650
Justice Thomas's view, 2695–2696
Justice Thompson's views, 2697–2698
Justice Todd's views, 2704
Justice Trimble's views, 2732
Justice Van Devanter's views, 2780–2781
Justice Vinson's views, 2791–2792
Justice Waite's views, 2822–2824
Justice Warren's views, 2849–2851
Justice Washington's views, 2859
Justice Wayne's views, 2867–2868
Justice White's (Byron) views, 2885–2893
Justice White's (Edward) views, 2894–2896
Justice Whittaker's views, 2902–2903
Justice Woodbury's views, 2923
Justice Woods's views, 2923–2924
legislative intent, 1592–1593
liberal construction, 1610–1613
Lincoln's view of, 1624
and living Constitution, 1633–1634
Madison's view of, 1659
of New Right, 1801–1802 noninterpretivist, 1480, 1820 nonjudicial, 1821–1824 original history, 628 original intent, 1506, 1857–1859
originalism, 1860–1865
passivist, 1506
"plain meaning rule" and textual approach, 627
and political question doctrine, 1951–1952
and postmodernism, 1971–1972 Progressive, 1309, 2046–2047 public understanding of, 2073
ratifier intent, 2120–2121
Reagan presidency, 2125–2126, 2127–2128
retroactivity of decisions, 2224–2225 right of association, 1107–1110
Roosevelt Court, 2293
and stare decisis, 1869 of stream of commerce doctrine, 2559 strict construction, 2560–2561
by Supreme Court appointments, 1485 textualist, 1820, 2681–2684 transformation of constitutional law and, 2712–2714
See also Interpretivism; Noninterpretivism
Constitutionalism, 633–640
in American Revolution period, 83–86
bicameralism, 171–173
British, 245–246
broad construction vs., 250
due process as core of, 2025
ex post facto as mainstay, 958
Federalist definition, 1015
as Field's approach, 1035 interest groups and, 1380–1382, 2063, 2064
Jeffersonian, 1423–1425
and judicial review, 1472–1478
and law of the land, 828
limited government linked with, 1618
Lockean philosophy, 1639, 2051, 2052
Madisonian, 1659–1662
of Marshall (John), 1674
Montesquieu's influence, 1755–1756 property's importance to, 2051–2057
public choice theory, 2063–2064
public interest law, 2071–2072
public law litigation, 2072–2073
public understanding of Court opinions, 2078
in religious context, 665–666 right to revolution and, 2248–2251
and rule of law, 2297–2298
taxation without representation and, 2656
Whig nationalism, 2884–2885
Constitutionalism and the American founding, 640–649
liberal construction, 1611–1612 right to revolution, 2248–2249
Tocqueville's commentaries on, 2703–2704
Constitutionality. See Judicial review
Constitutional litigation. See Litigation strategy Constitutional reason of state, 649–650
and inherent powers, 1370–1371
Constitutional reform, 650–651
Constitutional remedies, 651–53, 653–54 (update)
damages claims, 740–741
Constitutional rights, restrictions on. See Incidental burdens on constitutional rights; specific freedoms and rights
Constitutional rights of action. See Implied constitutional rights of action Constitutional theory, 654–657, 657–661 (update)
of Adams (John Quincy), 30–31
and administrative agencies, 37, 38, 40, 42 and Bork nomination rejection, 209, 210
of bureaucracy, 268
of Cardozo, 2901
conservatism, 507–511
constitutional dualism, 524–525 constitutional interpretation vs., 657–658 critical legal studies, 724–726 democratic theory conflicts and reconciliations, 765–767
dual federalism, 827

and economics theory, 1563–1566 historical background, 1387 of Hutchinson, 1323
and interest groups, 1380–1381 of Jefferson, 1419–1423, 1423–1425 jurisprudence, 1505–1508
and legal culture, 1576–1577
of Lincoln, 1620–1622, 1624, 2142
living Constitution as, 1632–1634
of Marshall (John), 1469–1470
of Montesquieu, 1755–1756 and ordered liberty, 1855 original intent, 1857–1859
originalism, 1859
pragmatism, 1982–194
Progressive thought, 2046–2048
ratifier intent, 2120–2021
representation, 2201–2203
republicanism and modern, 2213–2215 rights issues in historical perspective, 2252–2254 rights of counsel, 2260–2261
of Scalia, 2315–2316
on Union as indissoluble, 2142
of Webster, 2871, 2885
Whig party, 2885
of Wilson (James), 2909–2911
Constitution and civic ideals, 661–662
and political philosophy of the Constitution, 1948–1949
Constitution as aspiration, 662–665
Constitution as civil religion, 665–668
Constitution as literature, 668–670
feminist theory, 1032–1033
Contempt power, judicial, 670–671, 671–672 (update)
Bridges v. California, 244, 2076 evidence gathered through illegal electronic surveillance, 1184
executive privilege, 954
free press/fair trial, 1149–1150
public trial, 2076–2077
reporter's privilege, 1143
Times-Mirror Co. v. California, 244
Contempt power, legislative. See Legislative contempt power Continental Association. See Association, The Continental Congress, 672
Adams (Samuel) as delegate, 32
Declaration of Independence adoption, 752
Declarations and Resolves of 1774, 26, 1059
Dickinson as delegate, 779 independence advocacy, 27, 32, 1003
Wilson (James) as delegate, 2909
Contraception. See Birth control; Reproductive autonomy
Contract clause, 672–678
Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge Company, 332–333, 675
circuit courts and, 360
corporations under, 744, 2218
Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 673, 674, 675, 676, 690, 692, 744–746, 2218, 2285, 2871 debtors' relief legislation, 330 and duel federalism, 827 and economic liberties, 842
and economy, 850 and eminent domain, 2882–2883
expansion of, 1799
ex post facto laws and, 290
Fletcher v. Peck, 673, 674, 675 and Frazier-Lemke Act invalidity, 1645
and higher law, 1067–1068
Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, 1300–1301, 1645, 2218, 2226 inalienable police power as weakening, 211, 283, 1350 interstate compacts, 1228, 1399
King proposal, 1537
Legal Tender Act, 340
modern revival of, 70–71
Northwest Ordinance as precursor, 742
Piqua Branch of the State Bank of Ohio v. Knoop, 1910 and property protection, 2051 and protection of public health, 1829 as retroactivity of legislation limitation, 2225–2226
revision of, 2766
as right-to-work laws challenge, 2278 state reserved police power, 2218 and state taxation of banks, 801
and substantive due process, 2575
as temporal limit on lawmaking power, 2664
and vested rights, 1067, 2547
Webster's defense of, 2871
Webster's strict interpretation of, 2885
West River Bridge Company v. Dix, 2882–2883
Yazoo land grant, 1067, 1068, 1260
See also Freedom of contract; Obligation of contracts Contract theory. See Social compact theory Contract with America (1994), elements of, 775–776
Controlled-substance abuse, 678–680
crack cocaine and equal protection, 703–704
See also Drug regulation
Cooley doctrine. See Selective exclusiveness Cooperative federalism, 684
as American federalism emphasis, 1006 competitive federalism vs., 477 federal environmental laws, 1009, 1010 federal grants-in-aid, 827, 1003
Copyright, 685–686
First Amendment, 1377
intellectual property law, 1377–1378
patent, 1880–1881
protection of, 2326
Corporate citizenship, 687–689
dual state decision, 798 privileges and immunities clause, 805
Corporate federalism (historical development), 689–690
Corporate power, free speech, and democracy, 690–691
Corporations and the Constitution, 691–693
Brandeis's views, 220, 223–224
Braswell v. United States, 227 campaign finance, 139–140, 295, 296 charter vested rights limitation, 2059–2060 Chase Court on, 341
circuit courts and, 360
cities distinguished from, 361–362, 363
Civil Rights Cases, 409
congressional repeal of Mormon charter, 358–359 contract clause applicability, 744, 2218
corporate citizenship, 687–689, 798, 805
economy and, 850
Fourteenth Amendment protection and constitutional fictions, 526
freedom of contract, 687, 1112, 1116 freedom of speech rights, 1060 government-created, 1573–1574
institutional litigation, 1374
Lebron v. National Railroad Passenger Corp., 1573–1574 limited immunity from legislative controls, 745–746
Marshall v. Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, 1230
McCulloch v. Maryland, 692
multinational, 1765–1766 out-of-state business transactions, 159

Corporations and the Constitution (continued) privatization of public functions, 2017–2018 and public policy issues of late nineteenth century, 583
public purpose doctrine, 2074–2075
rule of reason, 2049
state action, 2482, 2490
state reserved police power, 2218
stockholder's suit, 2543
Taney Court on, 298, 365
See also Corporate citizenship; Corporate federalism; Corporate power, free speech, and democracy
Corwin Amendment (1861), 694
Counsel, right to be represented by. See Right to counsel Court-martial. See Military justice Court of Claims. See Claims Court
Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, 695–696
as constitutional court, 419 merged into new United States Court of Appeals, 981 Court of International Trade, 696
as former United States Customs Court, 695
Judicial Conference of the United States, 1452
Court of Military Appeals, 696
Court-packing plans, 696–699 defeat of, 1313–1314 and federal judicial system independence, 1494
Judiciary Reform Act, 1498–1499
Marbury v. Madison, 697, 1667–1668
NLRB v. Jones Laughlin Steel Co., 1035 rationale for, 1313, 1437–1438
Roosevelt (Franklin D.) strategy, 697–699, 1794, 2288–2289 Courts and social change, 699–700 (I), 700–701 (II)
juvenile proceedings, 1522
living Constitution, 1632–1634, 2712, 2714
public law litigation, 2072–2073
selective judicial activism, 1447–1448
sociological jurisprudence, 2445–2446
transformation of constitutional law, 2712–2714
See also Social science research and Constitutional law Courts of Appeals. See United States Courts of Appeals Court system. See Judicial system, federal Crack cocaine and equal protection, 703–704
Creationism, 706–708
balanced treatment statute, 2174, 2327
Epperson v. Arkansas, 2177, 2327
establishment clause, 925 religious fundamentalism and teaching of, 2184–2185, 2327
Tennessee v. Scopes, 2666
Creation of the Presidency, 1775–1789 (Thach), 947
Criminal code, federal. See Federal criminal law Criminal conspiracy, 708–709
conspiracy law, 511
incitement cases, 1352 to monopolize, 2413
Criminal Justice Act (1964), 709
and right to counsel, 2260
Criminal justice and due process, 709–711
bail, 147–151
Bill of Rights incorporation, 815 closed pretrial proceedings, 1181
DNA sampling, 800
double jeopardy, 807–812
ex post facto crimes, 957 fair trial, 970–972
fruit of the poisonous tree, 1157–1158
gag order, 1179–1180
grand jury, 1220–1223
habeas corpus, 1248–1252
incompetency to stand trial, 2060–2061
incorporation doctrine, 710, 1355, 1615, 1666, 2039–2040 insanity defense, 1718, 1719, 1720
jury nullification, 1512–1514
jury unanimity, 1517–1518
police interrogation and confessions, 1922–1932
preventive detention, 2004–2006
prisoners' rights, 2011–2013
procedural due process, 2035–2045
public trial, 2076–2077
reasonable doubt, 2138–2139
rights of criminally accused, 2254–2257
right to counsel, 2260–2265
See also Free press/fair trial; Race and criminal justice Criminal justice and technology, 711–713
DNA testing and genetic privacy, 800
electronic eavesdropping, 872–876 electronic media in courtroom, 1138, 1147–1148 unreasonable searches and seizures, 721
wiretapping, 2912–2913
Criminal justice system, 713–717 federal-state relations in enforcement, 1566–1571 habeas corpus burdens, 1254 racial discrimination, 2087, 2106. See also Capital punishment and race witness and juror sale of experiences to media, 2915–2916
See also Capital punishment; Law enforcement and federal-state relations; Military justice Criminal law. See Federal criminal law Criminal procedure, 717–723
arrest, 120
and Bill of Rights, 2035–2036, 2043
Brown v. Mississippi, 256
burden of proof, 264
and Burger Court, 380
due process, 256
due process clause as limitation on state, 1757
and federal civil rights enforcement, 200–201
Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 1029
felony, 1031, 1032
and Fourteenth Amendment, 200, 201
fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, 1157–1158
habeas corpus, 1252–1253
harmless error, 1270–1271
immunity grant, 1334–1335
indictment, 1361–1362
indigent right to counsel, 971, 1031, 1083, 1193–1194, 1462, 1973
information, 1369
insanity defense, 2061
insular cases, 1376
jury nullification, 1513–1514
law of the land, 828
Miranda rules, 1742–1744, 1922, 1926–1929, 2044 national uniform standards, 1008 presentment, 1991
pretrial disclosure, 2004
probable cause, 2023
real evidence, 2130
reasonable doubt, 2138–2139
reporter's privilege, 2199–2200
right against self-incrimination, 2234–2235
right to counsel, 2260–2265
Scalia's views, 2315
strict construction of decisions, 2561
subpoena, 2565–2567

unconstitutional conditions, 2749
waiver of constitutional rights, 2831
and Warren Court, 1927, 2848, 2855–2856
See also Law enforcement and federal-state relations; Police interrogation and confessions Criminal syndicalism laws, 723–724
incitement to unlawful conduct, 1353
injunction, 2940–2941
Taney Court and, 2640
Younger v. Harris, 2940–2941
Critical legal studies, 724–726
and critical race theory, 726
critique of liberalism, 1616
critique of rights, 725–726
deconstruction, 756, 1616
and indeterminacy thesis, 724–725 and pragmatism, 1983
Critical race theory, 726–728
and civil rights, 401
on difference and constitutional equality, 782
on hate speech, 1277
Cross-examination, right of. See Confrontation, right of Cruel and unusual punishment, 729–731, 731–732 (update 1), 732–733 (update 2)
and Bill of Rights (English), 175, 300 capital punishment cases, 236, 239, 300, 301–302, 307, 308, 721, 729, 1070–1071, 1199, 1529, 1702–1703, 2257
and career criminal sentencing laws, 316 drug mandatory sentences challenged under, 822–823
Eighth Amendment on, 2367, 2368, 2698–2699
Enmund v. Florida, 896 excessive penalties proportionate to the crime as, 2446–2447, 2873 expatriation seen as, 2733, 2851
federal criminal law, 985, 986 forfeiture of property in drug trafficking cases as, 680 juveniles and, 2475–2476 paddling of students as, 1369–1370 patients' rights and, 1885
Payne v. Tennessee, 1889
Penry v. Lynaugh, 1895 protection incorporated into territories, 1376 and rights of the criminally accused, 2257
Rummel v. Estelle, 2299
Scalia's views, 2316
social science research on, 2443 victim impact statements as conflict with, 208 Cults and the Constitution, 734 religious liberty in public places, 2189–2190 Cumberland Road bill. See Internal improvements
Curfew laws. See Japanese American cases; Juvenile curfew laws Currency. See Monetary power
Curtilage. See Open Fields Doctrine
Curtis Act (1924), 594
Custodial interrogation. See Police interrogation and confessions Customs Service employee drug testing, 825, 1096
growth of, 1568

D

Damages, 739–740
abstention clarification, 20
and constitutional remedies, 651, 652–653
executive immunity in civil rights actions, 2922
by federal courts against state actions, 1493
litigation strategy, 1631 punitive, 2055–2056, 2081–2083 tort, 2081–2083, 2706
zoning, 2945
Damages claims, 740–741
"actual malice" libel, 1607, 1608, 1609, 2850 constitutional, 740–741 government wrongs, 1217–1218, 1344
implied constitutional rights of action, 1344
noncoverage of libelous parody, 1322 official qualified immunity, 1336 restrictions on presidential immunity, 1335 and state sovereign immunity, 994–995
See also Punitive damages Darwinism and academic freedom, 21 balanced treatment statute, 2174, 2327
creationism teaching as alternative, 706–708 and dynamic conception of constitutional law, 2712–2713 and "living Constitution" phrase, 1632, 1633
Tennessee v. Scopes, 2666
See also Creationism
Death. See Euthanasia; Right to die
Death penalty. See Capital punishment; Capital punishment and race; Capital Punishment Cases of 1972; Capital Punishment Cases of 1976
Debate, freedom of. See Speech or debate clause
Debates in the Several State Conventions, on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution, The (Elliot), 2120 Decision, 752
dissenting opinion, 795
grounds of opinion, 1235 holding as basis, 1294 opinion of the court, 1854–1855
overruling, 1868
plurality opinion, 1920
ratio decidendi, 2121
retroactivity of, 2223–2225
Declaration and Resolves of First Continental Congress. See First Continental Congress, Declaration and Resolves of Declaration of Independence, 752–755
Adams (John) and, 27
Adams (Samuel) and, 32
as basis of Constitution, 31, 534–535, 755, 1174, 1944, 1945, 1946, 1985–1986
Dickinson's abstention, 779 on equal protection of the laws, 907 Franklin and drafting of, 105 higher law as basis, 754, 1174, 1286 Jefferson authorship, 1419 liberal ideals of, 1613
Martin (Luther) and, 1687 natural law basis, 1286, 2248
and natural right of revolution, 2248–2249, 2250 natural rights basis, 1387, 1419 and petitionary power, 2273 as popular sovereignty voice, 1962 quartering of troops grievance, 2689
race-consciousness, 2096
separation of powers anticipated by, 1944–1945 signers of, 336, 434, 1187, 2909 slavery passage deletion, 2050 Declaration of Rights and Grievances (1765). See Stamp Act Congress, resolutions of Declaration of war, 755–756
absence in Gulf War, 282, 1242–1243 absence in Korean War, 1541, 1998 absence in Vietnam War, 1242, 1998, 2790

Declaration of war (continued) constitutional provision, 2837 five congressional instances, 1998, 2836 by joint resolution, 1437 and presidential use of armed forces, 449 vs. initiating or deciding upon war, 1080
See also State of war
Declaratory judgment, 756
abstention doctrine, 20
advisory opinion, 51
cases and controversies, 323, 1464
equity, 920
justiciability, 1520
preenforcement challenges, 1464
ripeness, 1464
Declaratory Judgment Act of 1934, 323
Deconstruction, 756–759
of liberalism, 1616
De facto/de jure, 759
Burger Court, 276
desegregation litigation, 446–447 and racial balance, 2098
school busing, 1535–1536
school desegregation, 1231 school segregation, 706
segregation, 276, 759, 1024, 2219–2220, 2221
wealth discrimination, 1362
Defamation. See Group libel; Libel and the First Amendment
Defence of the American Constitution (Adams), 28–29 Defendant's rights. See Rights of the criminally accused Defense of Marriage Act. See Same-sex marriage Deficits, budget. See Balanced-budget amendment; Budget; Budget process Delegation of power, 760–761, 761–763 (update) to administrative agencies, 1935
checks and balances, 343
congressional relinquishment to presidency, 1999, 2000
Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation, United States v., 761
Emergency Price Control Act upheld, 2937 executive orders as, 944, 1999
Field v. Clark, 1039 in Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act, 1219
Hughes Court rulings, 1316
implied powers, 1345
inherent powers, 1370 legislative, 2148, 2317
legislative veto, 1333
New Deal invalidations, 41, 1232, 2288, 2317–2318 and presidential administrative control, 266 to regulatory agencies, 2148
Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 2317–2318 in sovereignty, 736 tariff regulation, 1262
Deliberate speed. See All deliberate speed Deliberative democracy, 763–765
public choice theory, 2064
vs. direct democracy, 785
See also Reapportionment; Representation Demeanor evidence. See Confrontation, right of De minimis non curat lex, definition, 765
Democracy. See Communications and democracy; Corporate power; Deliberative democracy; Democratic theory and constitutional law; Direct democracy; Free speech and democracy
Democracy and Distrust (Ely), 318, 383
Democracy in America (Tocqueville), 1365, 1955–1956
Democratic National Convention, 1837
Democratic Republicans. See Jeffersonianism Democratic theory and constitutional law, 765–767
Field's jurisprudence, 1036 judicial review tensions, 767, 1478–1481, 2049 jurisprudence impedances, 1506–1507 popular sovereignty and, 1962–1963
Progressive thought, 2049
religion-secularism debate, 2173–2175
Demonstration, 767–768
anti-Vietnam War, 2319, 2790–2792
civil rights, 389, 702
in District of Columbia, 796
draft card burning, 817–818
First Amendment protection, 375, 1047, 1317
and government regulation of free speech, 1131 injunction order, 2832 permit fee based on public order maintenance expenses, 1082
public forum doctrine, 2068
RICO application to, 1153
as trespass, 34
woman suffrage, 2918
See also Civil disobedience; Incitement to unlawful conduct Denaturalization, 768–769
naturalized citizens and, 366
Department of Justice. See Attorney general and Department of Justice; Civil Rights Division; Solicitor general
Deportation, 770–771
and alien due process rights, 266, 1331 of alien migrant workers, 1329, 1330
of aliens, 65, 67, 128–129, 268–269, 365, 366, 770–771, 1330
Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, 102, 1503–1504
of Chinese immigrants, 128–129 legislative veto, 1333, 1599
Palmer raids, 65, 1875
See also Expatriation Desegregation, 771–774
all deliberate speed, 69, 255, 772
all deliberate speed expiration, 1231 of armed forces, 118, 605, 946 artificiality of de facto/de jure distinction, 446–447
Bolling v. Sharpe, 206–207
Brown v. Board of Education, 253–255, 273, 375, 383, 388, 389, 390, 391, 394, 399, 411, 446, 664, 771–772, 854, 859, 2320, 2849, 2852–2853
Burger Court, 276
Civil Rights Act of 1960, 405
civil rights boycott, 1551, 1556
and constitutional remedies, 652
Cooper v. Aaron, 237–238, 683 courts and social change, 700, 701 of District of Columbia schools, 206–207, 253, 254 federal employees, 605
federal enforcement, 1025–1026, 1747
and federal grant conditions, 988 first school case outside of South, 1535
"freedom of choice" invalidated, 232, 1229 goals of, 2320, 2627
Green v. County School Board of New Kent, 232, 237
Griffin v. County School Board of Prince Edward County, 1231 housing discrimination, 1289 injunction use, 1373
institutional litigation, 1374
judicial power, 1471–1472, 1475–1476
judicial review, 1475–1476
Justice Department actions, 136, 1025

Keyes v. School District No. 1 of Denver, 237, 1535–1536 liability standards, 773 military units to dispel violence, 1969
Milliken v. Bradley, 773, 774, 2321 of public schools in large cities, 1736–1737 racial balance remedies, 773, 774, 2098
school busing, 706, 2320
school implementation rulings, 65, 773 social science research data, 2441
Southern Manifesto, 2458
suit against Internal Revenue Service, 70 unconstitutionality of resistance legislation, 1231
Warren Court, 2848, 2852, 2853
"white flight," 1231
Developmentally Disabled Assistance and Bill of Rights Act (1975), 775
as antidiscrimination legislation, 95
right to treatment, 789, 790 Devolution and federalism in historical perspective, 775–778
Dial-a-porn, 778
First Amendment rights, 1148
Dicta. See Obita dicta
Difference and constitutional equality, 780
Direct and indirect taxes, 784–785
Chase Court ruling, 340
constitutionality of, 2470
Field's judicial views, 1036
Hylton v. United States, 1324
import-export clause, 1348–1349
income tax, 1960, 1964, 2480
income tax invalidation, 1165, 1244, 1409, 1959–1960, 1964
intergovernmental tax immunities, 1383–1384
jurisdiction to tax, 1504–1505
out-of-state sale tax, 2907
Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 1959–1960, 1964 Populist view, 1964
property-tax financing of school districts, 1974–1975, 1977, 2309–2310, 2874
sales tax on religious materials upheld, 1427
Sixteenth Amendment, 784, 1165, 2421
See also Capitation taxes; Excise tax; State and local government taxation; State taxation of commerce Direct democracy, 785–786, 786–788 (update) and deliberative democracy, 763 initiative as, 1371–1372
Progressive reforms, 2047
recall as, 2141 referendum as, 2146
and republican form of government, 1239, 1963
Wilson's (James) advocacy, 2909–2911
See also Initiative; Recall; Referendum Direct elections, 788–789
as Populist platform, 1964 Progressive advocacy, 2047
of senators, 72, 764, 788
Seventeenth Amendment, 2387–2388
Direct-mail solicitation. See Commercial speech Disabilities, rights of persons with, 789–791
affirmative action, 775
Americans with Disabilities Act, 86–88
Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc., 792
Developmentally Disabled Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, 775 educational mainstreaming, 791
Education of Handicapped Children Acts, 95, 790–791
federal protection, 1027
O'Connor v. Donaldson, 789–790
Rehabilitation Act, 2152
special educational provisions, 61, 95, 860–861, 1721 special school district creation, 202, 927, 2179–2180 Disability discrimination, 791–792
Rehabilitation Act, 2152
Discovery, 793
and fair trial, 971
pretrial disclosure, 2004
and right of confrontation, 492
Discrete and insular minorities, 793–795
benign racial classification, 794 broadcasting license awards, 1723
Court protective role, 1311, 1381–1382 equal protection for, 375–376, 794, 910 as interest groups, 1381–1382 jury underrepresentation, 1509–1510, 1514–1515
litigation strategy, 1632
and neutrality principle, 2164
and preferred freedoms, 1990 race and sex in antidiscrimination law, 2092
race-consciousness, 794, 2095
reapportionment, 2136–2138
selective modern judicial activism, 1447, 1448
Stone footnote in United States v. Carolene Products Company, 317–318 Discrimination. See Age discrimination; Antidiscrimination legislation; Disability discrimination; Jury discrimination; Private discrimination; Race and sex in antidiscrimination law; Racial discrimination; Sex discrimination; Wealth discrimination Discrimination remedy. See Due process of law; Equal protection of the laws Dismissed time. See Released time Disorderly conduct. See Breach of the peace Dissenting opinion, 795
abortion rights, 12, 13, 2699, 2872
Abrams v. United States, 16
affirmative action, 54, 56
Agricultural Adjustment Act, 285 antitrust, 2895
by Black and Douglas, 815
by Brandeis, 219–221, 1352
Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge Company, 333 clear and present danger standard, 15, 16, 1352
conference, 488
Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, 2266
Griswold v. United States, 1462 grounds of opinion, 1235
by Holmes as "Great Dissenter," 1296, 1300, 1352, 1638, 2878 judicial social and economic predilections, 2882
as later overruling basis, 1462
Lochner v. New York, 1638, 2878
by Marshall (Thurgood), 1677–1678, 1680
and precedent, 1987
privacy rights, 1462
public understanding of, 2078
by Rehnquist, 2155–2156, 2157, 2160
by White (Byron), 2886, 2888, 2889, 2892–2893 District of Columbia, 795–796, 796–797 (update) abolition of slavery in, 31, 558 de jure segregation, 1024, 1086
diversity jurisdiction, 798

District of Columbia (continued) electoral votes, 73 federal district court, 1491, 1492
federal judiciary provisions, 1464 home rule, 796, 797–798 legislative court, 1589, 1590
"midnight" judicial appointments, 1667–1668 minimum wage for women and minors, 35–36, 797, 2882, 2921
representation, 796–797, 798
restrictive covenant, 2222, 2223 school desegregation ruling, 206–207, 253, 254 slavery in, 796 welfare residency requirement, 2878–2879
District of Columbia Crime Control Act (1970), 796
District of Columbia Judicial Nomination Commission, 798 District of Columbia Minimum Wage Law (1918), 797
Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 35–36, 2921
invalidation, 2921
as model legislation, 796
District of Columbia Representation Amendment, 797 ratification failure, 614, 796
District of Columbia Self-Governing and Government Reorganization Act (1973), 797–798 mayor, council, and charter provisions, 796
Diversity jurisdiction, 798–799
abstention doctrine, 20
ancillary, 89
chilling effect, 803
choice of law and, 357
circuit courts and, 360
and civil federal common law, 977 and concurrent jurisdiction, 483 and conflicts law, 358
District of Columbia residents' suits, 796
Dred Scott v. Sandford, 818, 1468
Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins, 921 and federal courts, 1468
Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1029
and local government, 1638
slavery and, 2431
substantive due process, 2570
United States Courts of Appeals, 2759
United States District Courts, 2762, 2764
Divorce and the Constitution, 799–800
child custody, 799–800
freedom of intimate association, 1121 indigent access to the courts, 204, 799, 1974, 2877
jurisdiction, 799 residence requirement, 799, 2219
DNA testing and genetic privacy, 800
experiment restriction, 2327 Doctrine, 801
act of state, 24–25
affected with a public interest, 52–53
Blackmun contributions, 190, 192–196 changed circumstances, 2713 common law, 465 constitutional interpretation, 801 economic regulation, 1189–1190
extraterritoriality, 958
fair return on fair value, 969–970 federal plenary power in foreign affairs, 1072 federal regulation of intrastate commerce, 2415–2416
freedom of the press, 1144
fruit of the poisonous tree, 1157–1158 gender equality, 1196–1197 inadmissible confessions, 1931 inalienable police power, 1350, 2218
irrebuttable presumption, 1404–1405 judicial review and evolution of, 1481
justiciability, 1520–1521
libel, 1607–1609
low-value speech, 1056
nontolerance of prior restraint, 2010 nullification repudiation, 1424
official immunity, 1335 original package, 1612, 1617, 1864–1865 plain feel, 1912 political question, 1652–1653, 1949–1953
and precedent, 1986–1988
preemption, 1989–1990
property, 2051, 2052
public forum, 1067–1071 public purpose, 2073–2076
reserved police power, 2218 retroactive application, 2224–2225 sovereignty, 1674–1675
stare decisis, 2477–2478
status of territories, 1358 stream of commerce, 2559–2560
See also Incorporation doctrine
Doctrine of vested rights. See Vested rights
Documents in American History (Commager), 447 Domestic commerce. See Intrastate commerce
Domestic violence clause, 803–804
and Fourteenth Amendment enforcement, 803–804 Dormant commerce clause, 804–806, 806–807 (update) judicial enforcement of federalism-based limits, 990 preemption of state laws under, 1390
Dormant powers, 807
Dorr Rebellion (1842), 1652, 2210
Double jeopardy, 807–809, 809–811 (update 1), 811–812 (update 2)
and capital punishment, 302
and career criminal sentencing laws, 316
and conspiracy law, 511
and criminal procedure, 720, 722 dual sovereignty rule, 1283 expansion to states, 170, 2039 federal appeal to increase criminal sentence not violation of, 893 and federal criminal law, 982–983, 985, 986 and impeachable offenses, 1336
and juvenile proceedings, 1523
Palko v. Connecticut, 1874
Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), 2112
and rights of criminally accused, 2256, 2257 and sexual predator laws, 2406 state-federal cooperation as nonviolation of, 164, 1562
Draft. See Conscription
Draft card burning, 817–818
as civil disobedience act, 371, 817–818 and conspiracy, 709
and First Amendment, 1836
Driver's Privacy Protection Act, 993
Drug abuse. See Controlled-substance abuse; Drug regulation
Drug Enforcement Administration, 1568
Drug regulation, 821–822, 822–823 (update 1), 823–824 (update 2)
civil forfeiture, 824
computer file of controlled substance prescriptions, 2883 crack cocaine and equal protection, 703–704
federal criminal law, 983–984
Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, 1069
Harrison Act, 804, 1274, 1567
jury nullification, 1512
national police power, 804
no-knock entry, 679, 1097

peyote sacramental use, 82, 679, 821–822, 823, 2165–2166, 2181, 2192, 2194–2195
Posse Comitatus Act, 1569
right against self-incrimination and, 1572
right of privacy and, 2242–2243
Whalen v. Roe, 2242–2243
Drug testing, 824–826, 826–827 (update)
balancing test, 824
of candidates for state offices, 330–331 of Customs Service employees, 679, 1782–1783 latitude in, 823 mandatory, 2328, 2337, 2422–2423
of railway employees, 679 reasonable expectation of privacy and, 2337
in schools, 824–827, 2341
as search and seizure, 825, 826, 2337
suspicionless, 1096
as unreasonable search, 822, 823, 826
Drunk driving. See Alcohol
Dual federalism, 827
in antebellum period, 567
and antitrust, 1539–1540 competitive federalism and, 477 congressional regulation of employment for state and municipal workers, 1776 and contemporary federalism trends, 995–996, 1000, 1001 cooperative federalism vs., 1006 and exclusive jurisdiction, 1012 Field's approach, 1037 interstate commerce restriction, 1261
Neagle, In re, 2311
Shreveport doctrine, 2416
state immunity from federal law, 2503–2504
state police power, 1244
Taney Court and, 827, 1000–1001
Due process of law, 828–829
abolitionist constitutional theory, 2, 3 abortion rights protection, 9, 11, 2057
Adams v. Tanner as violation, 32
administrative agencies, 37, 39
administrative law, 40, 41–42
alien entitlements, 131–132, 266, 1330, 1331, 1332
American Indian entitlements, 81
Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, 103
Attorney General's List as violation of, 138, 1436 bankruptcy power limitations, 161 bar admission, 2325
Black (Hugo) on, 329
burden of proof, 264
capital punishment, 299, 302, 307, 309
as civil liberty right, 373, 375 class action lawsuits, 422
coerced confessions, 256, 1280
Coke's origination of concept, 439
collateral attack, 441–442
commentators on the Constitution on, 451
communitarians on, 473
confrontation rights, 492
conspiracy law, 511
constitutional aspiration, 663
corporate citizenship, 805 corporations, 692
criminal justice, 709–711, 718, 722–723 decency and fairness standards, 2284 deportment, 770 disability rights, 790, 791
discovery, 793
District of Columbia school segregation as violating, 206, 253 double jeopardy as violating, 807
Dred Scott v. Sandford, 2424 emergence as limitation on state criminal procedure, 1757 entrapment, 898
evidence disclosure, 2255
Evitts v. Lucey, 935
ex post facto laws, 290, 958
eyewitness identification, 962 failure of pretrial disclosure, 2004
fair hearing, 265–266
fair trial, 970–972, 1142
as Fifth Amendment guarantee, 25, 33, 375, 828, 2306
First Amendment rights, 1126
first Court exposition of, 1771 first usage in American organic law, 1571
in foreign relations, 1077
Fourteenth Amendment clause, 375, 387, 760, 829, 970, 971, 1045, 1084, 1088, 1089–1090, 1091, 1288, 1355, 1572, 2036, 2317, 2318 freedom of assembly and association, 1107
freedom of contract, 25–26, 36, 70, 837–838, 1113, 1114, 1115, 1288, 2243
freedom of petition, 1125
fundamental rights, 1176–1177, 1233
Goldberg v. Kelly, 237 Harlan (1899–1971) conception, 1269
higher law, 1287
House Committee on Un-American Activities as violating, 1305
Hurtado v. California, 1321–1322 immigration procedure, 1329
incorporation doctrine, 1354–1355, 2042–2045
involuntary confession, 1931
Japanese American cases as violating, 1416
judicial policymaking, 1471 jury exclusion cases, 1514–1515 jury nonunanimous verdicts, 1518
just compensation for property taken, 1519 just compensation incorporation, 1354
in juvenile proceedings, 1183–1184, 1522, 1523
labor activity, 1553–1554
and law of the land, 828, 1571, 1572, 2035
legal tender cases, 340
lineup suspect, 1627–1628
loitering, 345
loyalty oaths, 2467
loyalty-security programs, 1649–1650, 2365
Magna Carta, 439
Massachusetts Body of Liberties, 1694
and natural rights, 1233
nondelegation of powers, 760
and original intent, 1507–1508
in parental rights, 1750
in parental rights termination, 1524
Parker v. Levy, 1879
penumbra theory, 1896
Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 1915
plea bargaining, 1917–1918
pretrial confrontations, 1538–1539
preventive detention, 2005, 2006
property deprivation, 2316 property interest, 1697–1698 property rights, 2051–2052, 2055–2056
punitive damage violations, 2082–2083 race, reproduction, and constitutional law, 2097
racial discrimination, 2099
Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton Railway Company, 2115
Railway Express Agency v. New York, 2115
reasonable doubt, 264
as retroactive legislation limitation, 2225, 2226
right to counsel, 23, 1193–1194, 2260
right to die, 2266
right to privacy, 2242, 2284

Due process of law (continued) right to travel, 1535, 2276
same-sex marriage, 2307
Scalia's views, 2316
self-incrimination protection, 33, 1930, 2039
sentencing, 2367
sex discrimination, 2391, 2398
sex offender notification laws, 2401, 2406
sinking fund cases, 2420
speedy trial, 2465
state action, 2487
state police power, 2508
substantive vs. procedural, 2025, 2032
Sunday closing laws, 2584 televising of criminal trial as violating, 330 terrorist control measures, 2675 ticket scalping, 2746
tribal economic development, 2731
vagrancy laws, 2774
vested rights, 2783, 2934–2935
voir dire, 2803
voting rights, 2807
Warren Court and, 1922
wealth discrimination, 204
women's status, 1740 yellow dog contract restraints, 1547
zoning, 2944–2945
See also Economic due process; Procedural due process of law, civil; Procedural due process of law, criminal; Substantive due process

E

Economic analysis and the Constitution, 834–837
Beard theory, 166–167, 2047
checks and balances, 834
commerce clause, 835–836
due process, 834–836
free market, 835 interest-group legislation, 1381
judicial review, 836
just compensation, 836–837
law and economics theory, 1563–1564
Lockean liberalism as influence, 834 monetary power, 834, 1751–1754
Progressive thought, 2046–2047, 2048–2050
state regulation of commerce, 835
state taxation of commerce, 835 taxing power, 834
welfare benefits, 837
Economic due process, 837–839
economic liberties, 841
and Fourteenth Amendment, 1007
freedom of contract, 25–26, 36, 837–838 interferences with free market, 838
judicial power, 839
Lochner v. New York, 838–839
police power, 838
property rights, 2051–2056
Young, Ex parte, 2940
See also Substantive due process Economic equal protection, 839–841
commerce clause, 840
comparable worth, 474–475
economic due process, 839–840
Edwards v. California, 2878 interest group politics, 840–841 for married women, 91
welfare rights, 2251, 2874–2877, 2879–2880
and welfare state, 2877–2881
See also Property rights; Welfare benefits Economic Interpretation of the Constitution, An (Beard), 166–167, 834, 2047
Economic liberties and the Constitution, 841–843
Bill of Rights, 842
as civil liberties, 382, 383 commercial powers of states, 841
contract clause, 842
economic due process, 837–839, 841
and economic regulation, 841
ex post facto laws, 841–842
Fourteenth Amendment, 841–842
freedom of contract, 842, 1111–1117
and property rights, 2052
substantive due process and, 2577
Economic Opportunity Act (1964), 843
Economic regulation, 843–847, 847–848 (update) affected with a public interest doctrine, 52–53, 844, 2829–2830, 2917 agricultural marketing, 62–63 agricultural production controls, 62, 285
Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 844–845
American System, 88
antitrust law vs., 104, 2413
Brandeis brief, 225
budget as presidential tool in, 262
Carolene Products Co., United States v., 1957–1958 chain store price discrimination, 2283 collisions of federal/state powers, 845–846 congressional powers, 1191 contractual expectations as challenges basis, 71 Court's distinctive treatment of, 847 as denial of equal protection, 1800 and economic due process, 837
and economic liberties, 841
Economic Stabilization Act, 849–850
Elkins Act, 882
Emergency Bank Act, 885
Emergency Price Control Act, 887, 2937 and employment discrimination, 847
Federal Trade Commission Act, 1030–1031
Fourteenth Amendment and, 844, 2519
freedom of contract invalidating, 1735–1736
and freedom of the press, 1139
Full Employment Act, 1160
Fuller Court rulings, 1164–1167 fundamental interests vs., 1173
and general welfare clause, 1186–1187
Granger cases, 1224–1225, 2823
Holmes's views, 1296, 1638, 1990
Hughes Court rulings, 1312–1313
Hughes's opinions, 1309–1301
Jacobs, In re, 1414 just compensation incorporated into equal protection, 2130 laissez faire principles, 1414 legislation invalidation, 1288 liberal individualism vs., 1614, 1615
Lochner v. New York, 845, 1638–1639
majoritarian vs. minoritarian bias, 1957–1958
Marshall (John) doctrine, 1189–1192
Minnesota rate cases, 1739–1740, 2899
Munn v. Illinois, 2823
New Deal, 1313–1316
permissive approach, 1034 presumption of constitutionality, 1990 price controls, 885, 887 price setting, 843–844 production, 2046
and Progressivism, 2049
Public Utility Holding Company Act, 2079–2080
Railway Express Agency v. New York, 2115
rational basis test, 1990, 2121–2122
regulatory agencies, 2147–2148
reserved police power, 2218

rule of reason, 2298–2299
state law upheld, 2907
state police power, 1788–1789
state regulation of private business prices disallowed, 2230
Stewart's views, 2542
Stone's views, 2545
stream of commerce doctrine, 2470
substantive due process and, 845, 851, 1034, 1639, 2292, 2437, 2571, 2575 tariff adjustment powers, 1262 tariff nullification, 1408, 1412 unfair competition, 1030 wartime legislation, 1605 wartime legislation extended into peacetime, 2924
World War I, 2927–2928
World War II, 2290, 2841, 2929–2930, 2937
zoning laws, 2311
See also Labor and the Constitution; Monetary power Economics of affirmative action, 848–849
Economic Stabilization Act (1970), 849–850
Economy, 850–853
antitrust law, 103–107
bankruptcy power, 851
Charles River Bridge significance, 333 Constitution and early economic growth, 850
contract clause, 850
and corporations, 850
eminent domain, 851 industrial (late nineteenth-century), 584 interstate commerce, 850
Progressive Era, 852 regulatory commissions, 852
Sherman Antitrust Act, 852
and substantive due process, 851
Tenth Amendment, 850
See also Commerce clause; Economic regulation Education Amendments of 1972 (Title IX), 853
as antidiscrimination legislation, 95, 406, 853, 1027
Education and the Constitution, 854–858, 858–860 (update)
academic freedom, 21–23, 855–856, 1137
affirmative action in higher education, 759–760 affirmative action in teacher hiring, 2933–2934
afrocentric schools, 58
alien rights, 1077, 1330, 1331, 1920
Amish refusal of schooling after age fourteen, 2187, 2914
Brown v. Board of Education. See under Desegregation civil rights, 854
compulsory attendance, 858 contracting-out cases, 2018 corporal punishment, 369–370, 974
creationism teaching, 706–708, 2184–2185, 2327 de facto vs. de jure segregation, 759, 1231 desegregation petitions, 771 desegregation rulings. See Desegregation discrimination against non-English-speaking students, 1563
drug testing, 824, 825, 826–827, 2341
equal access for extracurricular student groups, 906 equal opportunity for disabled children, 790–791
equal protection, 771–772, 856–857, 859
federal grants-in-aid, 854
First Amendment and, 855–856, 858–859
flag salute cases, 1064–1066, 2186
foreign-language teaching ban, 1724, 2188
Fourteenth Amendment and, 854
Fourth Amendment and, 856
freedom of assembly and association, 1108
freedom of speech, 170, 1126, 1134, 1137, 1281 freedom of speech issues in high school shootings, 1154 free exercise of religion cases, 1724, 2188, 2192 gun-free school zones, 1570–1571, 1642–1643
home schooling, 2184
Morrill Act, 1761
"official English" laws, 1847–1848
paddling of students, 1369–1370 and parental rights, 974 private school racial discrimination, 2017, 2299–2300 property ownership as basis for school district voting rights, 1542 property-tax financing challenge, 1974–1975, 1977, 2309–2310, 2387, 2874
public forum doctrine, 2069, 2070
Rehnquist Court decisions on civil liberties cases, 381 released time, 1703–1704, 2171–2172, 2947 religious exercises, 804, 2176–2180
religious fundamentalism, 2184–2185
school board removal of objectionable library books, 202, 1216 school choice, 61, 2321–2322, 2814–2815
school district voting rights, 1542
segregated. See Segregation single-sex education, 2417–2419 student free speech curbs, 170, 1281
student searches by school officials, 1799 student suspension without due process, 1205 student symbolic speech, 2702–2703 tax-exempt status denial in face of racial discrimination, 204 teacher loyalty oaths, 1648 teaching of evolution, 2666
tuition grants, 2738–2739
vouchers, 2814–2815
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 2187
See also Government aid to religious institutions; Religion in public schools; School prayers Education of Handicapped Children Acts, 860–861
antidiscrimination legislation, 95, 790–791 mainstreaming, 791 mental retardation, 1721
EEOC. See Equal Employment Opportunity Commission Effects on commerce, 861–862
direct-indirect test, 1540
Fair Labor Standards Act, 1548
as federal criminal jurisdiction basis, 1567
intrastate commerce regulation, 744 Jackson (Robert H.) rule, 2903
as sole criterion of congressional power, 2933
Wickard v. Filburn, 2903–2904
Eighteenth Amendment, 862
attacks on, 2927
Court rulings, 73
ratification, 72, 593, 2050
repeal of, 75, 594, 598, 2050, 2741
Volstead Act enforcement, 2803–2804
See also Prohibition Eighth Amendment
and Bill of Rights (English), 175
cruel and unusual punishment prohibition, 175, 729, 2316, 2367, 2368, 2698–2699

Eighth Amendment (continued) excessive bail prohibition, 148, 149, 150, 2005, 2306 and execution of mentally incompetent, 2061 and execution of the insane, 1071 forfeiture punishment limits, 983, 984 proportional penalty in, 2368
and punitive damages, 2055–2056, 2081–2083
and rights of the criminally accused, 2254, 2257
Salerno, United States v., 2162
See also Capital punishment
Elastic clause. See Necessary and proper clause Elected judiciary, 864–865
Election finance. See Campaign finance Elections, regulation of, 865–866
Federal Election Campaign Acts, 986–987
federal power, 423 frequent vs. infrequent, 763 polling place campaign-free zones, 279 Seventeenth Amendment, 72, 500, 589, 2387–2388
write-in votes, 264–265
Electoral College, 866–867
as deliberative democracy, 764
and democratic theory, 765 direct election proposals, 788, 789 District of Columbia votes, 73
multimember district, 1765 not mentioned in Constitution, 1934
political parties, 1934
presidential election of 1800, 278
presidential election of 1824, 30 and presidential nationalism, 1948
Twelfth Amendment, 866, 1940, 2740
Electoral districting, 867–869 (I), 869–870 (II) at-large system, 2286
Baker v. Carr, 138, 152–153, 233, 237, 1470, 1951, 1952, 1953, 1987, 2131, 2132, 2227, 2228, 2849
black-majority, 1735 black representation, 2814 census role, 326
equal protection, 867–868, 917
gerrymander, 867, 869, 1187–1189
as justiciable controversy, 2133, 2137, 2203, 2227–2228 majority-minority districts, 870
multimember district, 1765
new restrictions, 869
one person, one vote, 868, 869, 1852–1853, 2228, 2229
and political parties, 868
population equality, 2881
racial, 868
racial discrimination, 2093–2094, 2408
Reynolds v. Sims, 2227–2229
three-fifths clause, 2700
Voting Rights Act of 1965, 868–869, 870
See also Reapportionment; Representation Electoral districting, fairness, and judicial review, 870–871
gerrymander, 871, 1187–1189
landmark cases, 870–871
one person, one vote, 871, 1852–1853
reapportionment, 2130–2138
Electoral process and the First Amendment, 871–872
campaign finance, 872 rights of association, 872
Electronic eavesdropping, 872–876
executive inherent power claim, 2761–2762
by Federal Bureau of Investigation, 976
First Amendment ramifications, 872–873
Fourth Amendment requirements, 170, 873–875, 1643, 2342, 2416, 2896–2897 grounds for challenge, 64–65
by Justice Department, 136
Katz v. United States, 1093, 1527, 2139–2140 legal requirements for, 170, 873, 1527 as national security surveillance, 875
Olmstead v. United States, 1849–1850
Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act, 170, 873–875, 1527, 2913
protections against, 2416
reasonable expectation of privacy and, 2139–2140 as search, 872, 1850, 2139, 2140, 2141, 2333 and self-incrimination, 873 Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights and, 2365 strict construction of, 2561
third-party consent and, 2690–2691
as unreasonable search, 2767
upheld, 1405, 1849–1850, 2896–2897
White, United States v., 2896–2897
See also Wiretapping Electronic mail. See Internet
Electronic media freedoms. See Freedom of the press
Electronic surveillance. See Electronic eavesdropping
Elementary and Secondary Education Act (1965), 876
Eleventh Amendment, 876–878, 878–879 (update 1), 879–882 (update 2)
admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, 879
Age Discrimination Act, 881
Americans with Disabilities Act, 87
as Anti-Federalist concession, 12 as Chisholm v. Georgia reaction, 356, 1418
cities and, 362
Cohens v. Virginia, 436–439
Edelman v. Jordan, 853
environmental regulation, 904
and federalism, 994–995, 1010
Fourteenth Amendment exceptions to, 877, 880 governmental immunities under, 1470 government wrongs and, 1217, 1218 immunity of states from suit in federal court, 133, 877, 1493, 1562
intergovernmental immunity, 1382
interstate compacts, 1399
and judicial power, 1467–1468, 1470, 1493
Pennhurst State School & Hospital v. Hadlerman, 1893
Quern v. Jordan, 2085
Seminole Tribe v. Florida, 880–881 sovereign immunity, 876, 2459
validity upheld, 73
Elkins Act (1903), 882
as Interstate Commerce Act supplement, 1397
Ellsworth Court. See Supreme Court,, 1789–1801
E-mail. See Internet and freedom of speech
Emancipation Proclamation (1863), 884–885
provisions of, 417, 573
and Reconstruction, 1625
and Thirteenth Amendment, 884
Embargo Acts (1807–1809), 885
constitutional issues, 553
Emergency Bank Act (1933), 885
gold clause cases, 1201
Emergency Court of Appeals, 885–886
Emergency powers, 886–887
concurrent resolution, 886, 2842
expansiveness of contemporary presidential options, 1998 growth of presidential, 886–887, 2842 international economic transactions, 1386
National Emergencies Act, 612, 887

Roosevelt's (F. D.) interpretation, 2290
and state milk price-controls, 1788–1789
steel seizure controversy, 2526–2527, 2941
See also War powers
Emergency Price Control Act (1942), 887 delegation of power upheld, 2937
Emergency Court of Appeals, 885, 2937
rationing and price fixing, 887 Eminent domain, 887–889, 889–890 (update)
abstention doctrine, 19
civil forfeiture compared with, 372 congressional discretion, 889 and economic conditions, 851
and Fourteenth Amendment, 888–889
Hawaiian land reform, 1279
and just compensation, 888, 2646
Peckham and, 1890
police power and, 889
private property takings, 888–889, 2051–2052, 2055–2056, 2643, 2882–2883
public purpose doctrine, 2073, 2074, 2075, 2076
public use and, 2079, 2643
state action and, 2482
vested rights and, 888, 2783
See also Taking of property
Employee speech rights (private), 891–892
First Amendment, 891
obscenity, 891
unions and collective bargaining, 891 workplace harassment, 891, 2925
Employee speech rights (public), 892
low-First Amendment protection, 1551
Employers' Liability Acts (1906, 1908), 892–893
Employers' liability cases, 893
interstate commerce, 893
Employment. See Labor and the Constitution; Maximum hours and minimum wages legislation; Worker's compensation legislation; Workplace harassment and the First Amendment Employment discrimination, 893–894
of aliens, 1068
antidiscrimination legislation, 97, 99–101, 413, 2089
and civil rights, 396
Civil Rights Act of 1964, 392, 405, 406, 893–894
Civil Rights Act of 1991, 407–408
Civil Rights Act Title VII violation, 1232 comparable worth, 474
consent decrees, 507 disabled people, 86, 87, 791–792
disparate impact, 99, 100
and economic regulation, 847
Equal Employment Opportunity Act, 392 executive orders against, 1025 federal employee segregation, 605
and Fourteenth Amendment, 893
Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 406 grounds for, 893
institutional litigation, 1374
McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 406 out-of-state residents, 1286
punitive damages, 99
Rehnquist Court rulings, 2164–2165 religious groups' exemption, 2175 religious liberty and, 2191, 2192, 2193 retirement age as, 59–60 sexual harassment, 100–101, 1722
and Thirteenth Amendment, 893
Wards Cove Packing Co., Inc. v. Antonio, 2164–2165
See also Race and sex in antidiscrimination law; Workplace harassment and the First Amendment En banc, 895
and appellate courts, 895
Endo, Ex parte. See Japanese American cases Enforcement Acts. See Force Acts
Enfranchisement. See Voting rights; Woman suffrage English Bill of Rights. See Bill of Rights (English) English constitution. See British constitution
"English only" laws. See "Official English" laws
Entanglement test. See Government aid to religious institutions Entitlement, 897–898
budget process, 262
patients' rights, 1885 policy against unfunded, 777
as prison release, 897
procedural due process and, 897, 2027, 2028, 2032, 2033, 2880–2881
See also Welfare benefits; Welfare rights Entrapment defense, 898–899
Enumerated powers, 899–900
Bill of Rights, 175, 1091
broad construction, 1446
and conditional spending, 485
Court's judicial deference, 1445, 1446
dual federalism, 827, 995–996, 1000 and federal criminal jurisdiction, 1567
and general welfare clause, 1186
as limited government, 1618
and living Constitution, 1633
as nonapplicable to foreign affairs, 1071–1072
of President, 1996
and private behavior regulatory laws, 991 taxing and spending, 2660
Tenth Amendment, 899
See also Implied powers; Inherent powers; National police power; Necessary and proper clause Enumerated rights. See Bill of Rights Environmental Protection Agency, 1009
as executive agency, 2147
Environmental Quality Improvement Act. See Environmental regulation and the Constitution Environmental regulation and the Constitution, 900–903, 903 (update 1), 904–905 (update 2)
and Bill of Rights, 901–902
and commerce clause, 900, 904
consent decrees, 507
and Eleventh Amendment, 904 Endangered Species Act, 905
and federalism, 903–904
federalism-based invalidation of state laws, 990, 1009–1010
and Fourteenth Amendment, 905
and Fourth Amendment, 902–903
and interstate commerce, 904, 2564–2565, 2864
and just compensation for regulatory takings, 2150 land use regulation, 905
state police power, 1320
takings cases, 902–904
taxing and spending powers, 904–905
and Tenth Amendment, 901, 904
waste and pollution cases, 2864
Equal access, 906–907
access to the courts, 23, 1231–1232 extracurricular student groups, 906
feminist theory, 1032
First Amendment, 906
freedom of speech, 906
private discrimination, 2063
public accommodations, 2063
public interest law, 2071

Equal access (continued) religion in public schools, 2178
religious expression protection, 2185 voluntary school prayer, 169, 203, 2323 Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, 406 legislation establishing, 392 limited authority, 2147–2148
Equality. See Difference and constitutional equality; Equal protection of the laws Equal Pay Act (1964)
as antidiscrimination legislation, 95 comparable worth, 474
difference and constitutional equality, 780–783
Equal protection of the laws, 907–914, 914–916 (update 1), 916–918 (update 2)
abolitionist constitutional theory, 2 abortion access, 12, 1615
access to the courts, 23, 1232
as affirmative action issue, 54, 55–56, 760, 912, 915–917
and age discrimination, 59, 61 and alienage discrimination, 66, 72, 190, 365, 1219, 1329, 1331
and American Indians, 80
and antimiscegenation laws, 1038, 1646, 1744–1745, 2827–2828
as applying to illegal aliens, 1920
and Asian Americans, 129, 130, 131–132
and birth control access, 4, 182, 1118, 2204
Black Codes violating, 189, 908
Brennan opinions, 232–233, 237–238
and Brown v. Board of Education, 909–910, 912
Burger court views, 2309, 2310
and capital punishment, 307, 915, 1702–1703
choice of law and, 357
cities and, 362
civil liberties and, 375–376
Civil Rights Act of 1866, 402, 907, 912–913
Civil Rights Act of 1964, 405, 911, 913
civil rights cases, 909
Civil Rights Commission study, 410 civil rights protection, 387, 388, 389, 394, 399–400, 909
and comparable worth, 474
and compelling state interest, 155, 477
and conscription, 506, 2869
and conscription exclusion of women, 2295–2296 and constitutional aspiration, 663–664 and controlled-substance abuse, 678 and corporate citizenship, 805 and crack cocaine possession or trafficking, 703 critical race theory, 726 decision maker's motive, 2862–2863 Declaration of Independence on, 907 and desegregation, 771–772
difference and constitutional equality, 782
and direct democracy, 787
for disabled people, 790 and discrete and insular minorities, 375–376, 794, 910 discriminatory-intent test, 395–396
and domestic violence clause, 803
Dred Scott v. Sandford, 908–909, 912
due process clause, 912
early forerunner of, 1804 economic, 839–840, 2879–2880 economic regulation seen as denial of, 1800
and education, 856–857
and egalitarianism, 907, 912–913 and electoral districting, 867–868, 917, 2228 equal citizenship principle, 911
as feminist basis for antipornography campaign, 1965–1967
feminist theory, 1032
and First Amendment, 1921–1922
in foreign affairs, 1077
Fourteenth Amendment guarantee, 46, 181, 206, 253, 368, 394, 401, 907–913, 916, 1085, 1086–1087, 1088, 1089–1090, 1092
and freedom of contract, 1113, 1114, 1115
and freedom of intimate association, 1121–1123
and freedom of speech, 1130–1131
and gender rights, 1185
Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections, 1271–1272
and housing discrimination, 393
illegitimacy cases, 1325–1326, 1558 and indigency, 817, 1362
as initiative invalidations basis, 1372 and invidious discrimination, 1038, 1401
and involuntary sterilization, 2421–2422, 2528
Japanese American cases, 1416
and judicial activism, 910, 1448
and judicial legislation, 1458, 1459
and judicial policymaking, 1471
and judicial review, 915
and jury discrimination, 165, 1509, 1510, 1514, 2559 just compensation incorporated into, 2130 juvenile curfew laws challenges, 1521 and legislative intent, 1593 liberal extension of, 1615 and nonmarital children, 917 original intent interpretations, 1507–1508
Pace v. Alabama, 1873
Palmer v. Thompson, 1875
Paradise, United States v., 1877
for parental rights, 1750
Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association, 1899
Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 1902 and plea bargaining, 1917–1918
Plessy v. Ferguson, 909
and political question doctrine, 1951–1952
poll tax as denying, 1271
in primary elections, 909, 2008
prosecutorial discretion and, 2059 in public accommodation access, 2063
public interest law, 2071
and race and reproduction, 2097 and race and sex in antidiscrimination law, 2089 and race as adoption factor, 46 as racial discrimination test, 116, 909, 914–916, 2108 racial quotas challenge, 1172, 2110, 2146
Railway Express Agency v. New York, 2115
in rape case, 1725
rational basis, 914
in reapportionment, 2132–2133
as referendum challenge, 1415 and religious services in park without permit, 1807 and residence requirements, 2219
and restrictive covenants, 909, 2219
and rights of excluded jurors, 1514–1515
and right to counsel, 23
and right to travel, 2275
and rule of law, 2298
and same-sex marriage, 147, 2307, 2308
school closures as denying, 1231 as school desegregation basis, 206, 253, 254, 255 and segregation, 2354

and sentencing, 2368 separate but equal argued as, 909, 1918
Serrano v. Priest and, 2387
and sex discrimination, 232–233, 910, 914–915, 917, 1156–1157, 1199, 1615, 2089, 2390, 2396–2397, 2398, 2921
and sexual orientation, 916, 917–918, 2287, 2401, 2403 sexual orientation, 787, 916, 2401, 2403
Slaughterhouse cases, 2423
and Social Security Act, 2445
standard of review, 914, 916, 2471
and state taxes, 1724
"stopping place" problem, 911–912
strict scrutiny, 910, 914, 916, 2562
substantive due process and, 2577
and Sunday closing laws, 2584 Taney Court rulings, 908–909
and Thirteenth Amendment, 908, 911
and torts, 2706
and unauthorized religious services in public park, 1807
and voting rights, 831, 2203, 2807
and vouchers, 2814
Warren Court expansion of, 274, 909–912, 1271–1272, 2853
Washington v. Davis, 2862–2863
and wealth discrimination, 1232, 2309–2310, 2869–2870
and welfare benefits, 917, 2305, 2408 and women's status, 1185, 2920. See also Sex discrimination
Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 2939–2940
and zoning, 2945
See also Due process of law
Equal representation. See One person, one vote
Equal rights amendment, 918–919
and Fourteenth Amendment, 918
introduction and opposition, 594, 607, 2920
ratification failure, 614, 2117, 2921
and sex discrimination, 2392
Equitable restraint. See Abstention doctrine Equity, 919–920
and consent decree, 507 and injunction, 1373 judgment, 1442
jurisdiction, 920
in personam, 1374
Story's works on, 2556
Erdman Act (1898), 920–921
Adamson Eight-Hour Act, 33, 921
interstate commerce, 25, 920
outlawing yellow dog contracts, 25, 684, 1547, 2939
violating Fifth Amendment due process, 1547 Error, writ of, 921–922
appellate jurisdiction, 108
writs of certiorari compared with, 327, 921
Esch-Cummings Transportation Act (1920), 922
upheld, 750
Espionage Act (1917), 923–924
broad enforcement of, 2928
clear and present danger, 15–16, 1156, 2929
conspiracy, 709
Debs v. United States, 751
First Amendment and, 923
Frohwerk v. United States, 1156
incitement to unlawful conduct, 1352
prior restraint and censorship, 923
Rosenberg v. United States, 2294
Schenck v. United States, 1352, 2318–2319, 2928–2929
sedition, 2351
subversive advocacy, 2580, 2582
Establishment clause, 924–926, 926–927 (update)
accommodation of religion, 926–927
"actual" vs. "avowed" secular purpose, 1602
Agostini revised test, 61, 1604, 2179–2180
Blaine Amendment, 197
Board of Education of Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet, 927 child benefit theory, 348
County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 695 and creationism teaching, 706, 925 crèche display as part of seasonal exhibit allowed, 1653, 2166, 2198
crèche display invalidated, 1054–1055
cross erected in public forum, 312–313
Epperson v. Arkansas, 905
equal access, 906
expansive definitions of religion, 2173–2174
and First Amendment, 2378 freedom of religious speech, 2172–2173
freedom of speech, 926
government aid to religious institutions, 924, 1066, 1206–1208 governmental displays of religious symbols, 925 and intrachurch disputes, 2190
Lemon test, 203, 924, 925, 1206, 1560, 1562, 1602–1605, 2174, 2175, 2196
neutrality among religions, 926, 2166–2167, 2173–2174, 2187, 2188
neutrality vs. separationist view, 2294
Rehnquist restrictive interpretation, 2156–2157 released time challenges under, 1703–1704, 2171–2172 religious liberty interactions, 2175–2176, 2179, 2185, 2187, 2192 religious symbols in public places, 312–313, 1054–1055, 2196–2197, 2198
and sabbath laws, 2191, 2584–2585
sales tax on religious materials upheld, 1427
school choice, 2321
school prayers, 1, 168–169, 188, 1048–1049, 1207, 2176, 2179, 2322, 2323, 2324
secular humanism, 2177 and state churches, 1091
Warren Court and, 2856
See also Establishment of religion; Religious liberty; Separation of church and state Establishment of religion, 927–929
ambiguity and vagueness of, 2682
Becker Amendment, 167
Bill of Rights (United States), 927–928
broad vs. narrow view, 927 church vested with state veto power disallowed, 1562
and conscientious objection, 505 denominational discrimination disallowed, 1562–1563
Engel v. Vitale, 896
European precedents, 928
Everson v. Board of Education, 931
and First Amendment, 927–928, 1046, 1048–1049, 1054–1055
Lemon v. Kurtzman (Lemon I and II), 1601–1602, 1603
Madison's "Memorial and Remonstrance" defining, 1662
Pennsylvania colonial charters, 1894
Rehnquist Court and, 2166–2167
religious test for public office, 2197
Stevens's views, 2529
subtly coercive school-sponsored prayers, 1575–1576
Sunday closing laws, 2584 taxpayer challenge suits, 1465, 2777
Ten Commandments classroom posting invalidated, 1602, 1603

Establishment of religion (continued)
Toleration Act, 2704–2705
tuition grants, 2738
Vinson Court and, 2795
Virginia Statute of Religious Freedom, 928
See also Government aid to religious institutions; Religion in public schools; Separation of church and state Euthanasia, 930
and right of privacy, 2244, 2246
and right to die, 930, 2266–2271
Evangelicals and the Constitution. See Religious fundamentalism Evarts Act. See Circuit Courts of Appeals Act Evidence, 932–934
acquittal against, 1512–1514 admission of, 2726
burden of proof, 932
confession, 1923 and confrontation right, 1921 disclosure as right of criminally accused, 2255
DNA testing and genetic privacy, 800
and double jeopardy, 810
electronic surveillance as source, 1184, 1405
exclusionary rule, 121, 936, 1666–1667, 1815, 2039, 2044, 2045, 2257, 2872–2873
ex post facto laws, 290
eyewitness identification, 962
and fair trial, 971–972
and Fourteenth Amendment, 934
and free press/fair trial, 1151
fruit of the poisonous tree, 121, 1157–1158, 1928
good faith exception, 1204–1205
grand jury, 1220–1221
harmless error, 1270
hearsay, 933–934, 1282, 2345
from illegal electronic surveillance, 1184 from illegal warrantless arrest, 121 immunity grant, 1334–1335, 1526
incriminating confession, 1931 incriminating statements, 1931 indictment based on inadmissible, 1362 inevitable discovery exception, 1815 mere evidence rule, 1722, 2833–2834
and Miranda rules, 2230
pretrial disclosure, 2003–2004
and probable cause, 2023
as probable cause for search warrant, 141, 294, 1092 real, 2130
right to counsel, 242
search and seizure, 932, 1092
search incident to arrest, 2845
search warrant based on informant's tip, 1327 silver platter doctrine, 2416–2417
and Sixth Amendment, 932 in stop and frisk, 2552 subpoena for, 2567
from unconstitutional search, 2417 unlawfully seized, 290, 2872–2873
use immunity, 1526–1527
Weeks v. United States, 2872–2873
from wiretapping, 2913
Evidence against self. See Right against self-incrimination Evidentiary privilege, 934–935
right of privacy, 935
right to compulsory process, 480
Evolution, teaching of. See Creationism; Darwinism Excessive fines. See Civil forfeiture; Punitive damages Excise tax, 936
as agricultural subsidy, 294–285 on gambling, 1670
Hamilton constitutionality argument, 1260 on oleomargarine, 1704 on products of child labor, 350
Exclusionary rule, 936–939
Bill of Rights, 938
Boyd opinion, 2339
Burger Court exception, 273
and constitutional common law, 513
and constitutional remedies, 652
Court limits, 938 and criminal due process revisions, 2043–2044
and drug trafficking, 679 evidence obtained illegally, 2417 evidence obtained in violation of, 936 and exigent circumstances search, 937 extension to the states, 722 federal habeas corpus review, 1251
Fourteenth Amendment and, 936, 2917
Fourth Amendment, 936
Fourth Amendment and, 936, 2334, 2335, 2336, 2338, 2339
fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, 121, 936, 1157, 1815, 1928, 2336
good faith exception, 1204–1205, 2044
harmless error, 1270, 2045
inevitable discovery exception, 1815 as judicial policymaking, 1462
limitations, 2044, 2045
Mapp v. Ohio, 1666–1667, 2039
probable cause, 938
Reagan administration and, 2128
real evidence, 2130
rights of the criminally accused, 2257
search and seizure, 936, 1535, 2334–2336, 2338
search incident to arrest, 938
in state criminal cases, 722, 1666–1667 unlawfully seized evidence, 290
Weeks v. United States, 2872–2873
Wolf v. Colorado, 1666, 2039
Exclusive powers, 939
and doctrine of selective exclusiveness, 681
as dormant, 807
Executive agreements, 939–941, 941–942 (update)
advice and consent, 939–941
ambiguity and vagueness of, 2682
Bricker Amendment, 243–244, 1541
as domestic law, 737
in foreign affairs, 1075, 1075–1076, 2385
North American Free Trade Agreement, 942
Pink, United States v., 1910 preempting state law, 1390 for settling American claims, 741, 1078
treaty power, 939
World War II, 2929
Executive defiance of "unconstitutional" laws, 942–943
Anti-Federalist constitutional thought, 943 impoundment of funds as, 1349
veto power, 942, 2784–2785
Executive immunity, 943–944
as absolute for official actions, 1335
Butz v. Economou, 285 from civil rights damages, 2922
Clinton claims, 432
for constitutional violations, 943 expanded scope of, 1819 of federal officials, 943–944 good-faith defense, 944 for nonconstitutional violations, 943 non-immunity from civil damages litigation, 1335 reasonable good-faith belief, 944 of state officials, 943–944
Wood v. Strickland, 2922
See also Presidential immunity Executive Office of the President, 260, 262

Executive order, 944
affirmative action, 1026
Committee on Fair Employment Practices, 944
as delegated legislative authority, 1999
federal protection of civil rights, 944, 1025 fund sequestration for estimated budget deficit, 1219 importance during wars, 944 as ordinance-making power, 1995 Reagan's (Ronald) use of, 619
as regulation of government officials and agencies, 944 Roosevelt (Franklin D.) use of, 2929 for strikes, 2526, 2757
suspension of pending Iranian claims, 239
Wilson's (Woodrow) use of, 2928
Executive Order 9066 and Public Law 503 (1942), 944–945
Japanese American relocation, 944, 945, 1416, 2290, 2930
Executive Order 10340 (1952), 945
steel seizure, 945, 2526, 2734
Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 2941
Executive Order 11246 (1965), 945
affirmative action, 945, 1026
Executive Orders 9835 and 10450 (1947, 1953), 945–946
antidiscrimination measures, 946
Attorney General's List, 945
loyalty-security programs, 945, 1649
Executive Orders 9980 and 9981 (1948), 946
armed forces desegregation, 605, 946 federal employee desegregation, 605
Executive power, 946–949
advice and consent, 947
ambiguity and vagueness of, 2682
appointing and removal power, 109–111, 948 and appropriation of funds, 948
and bureaucracy, 265–267
of cabinet, 948
and Civil War, 416
Clay curtailment proposal, 424–425
Clinton administration claims, 432 as commander-in-chief, 448–449 of Congress in foreign policy, 493–496
Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act, 949 and congressional government, 499
and congressional war powers, 502–503 constitutional explicitness, 1471 and court-packing plans, 696
delegation of power, 760–761, 762
First Amendment, 948
and Gulf War, 1243
Hamilton's views of, 1258–1259, 1260
implied powers, 947
impoundment of funds, 948
and legislative veto, 1599–1601
line-item veto, 949, 1625–1627
Lockean view of, 1640 military, 385, 386–387 presidential attempts to extend, 591, 600 presidential emergency powers, 949 presidential succession, 608–609
Proclamation of Neutrality, 1259
prosecutorial discretion, 2058
Supreme Court justice appointments, 489, 490 of unitary executive, 2755–2756 and Vietnam War, 947
war powers, 1080
Wilson's (James) view of, 2910
Wilson's (Woodrow) broad view of, 2911
Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 1995
See also Presidential powers
Executive prerogative, 949–952
foreign affairs, 950
in Iran-Contra affair, 950 in Korean War, 951
legislative power, 950
noninterpretivist inroads seen on, 1393 treaty negotiations opening, 1991
Executive privilege, 952–954, 954–955 (update)
Clinton claims, 432, 954
Clinton v. Jones, 954
"deliberative process" privilege, 955
Freedom of Information Act exemptions, 1118 and impeachment, 953
as implied power, 1346
and independent counsel, 954, 1360 and indictment, 953 as inherent power, 1370 judicial contempt power, 954 and legislative investigation, 1596
Nixon, United States v., 952–954, 1816, 1955, 2865
Nixon claims, 274, 952–954, 1816, 1955, 2312, 2865 and presidential immunity in office, 954
and right against self-incrimination, 954 and right to refuse to produce documents, 952 and secrecy of communications, 1215 and Senate censure of Jackson, 1409
Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, 2365
and separation of powers, 952, 955, 2384 situational applications, 954–955 and special prosecutor, 2463
strict construction of, 2562
Washington's claims, 1419
as Watergate issue, 2312
Watergate issues, 2864, 2865
Exhaustion of remedies, 955–956
and habeas corpus, 1249
Exigent circumstances search, 956
automobile search, 2332
blood samples, 2319
exclusionary rule, 937
incident to arrest, 956, 2344
Payton v. New York, 1889
probable cause, 956
search and seizure, 2332
search incident to arrest, 956
unreasonable search, 2767
warrantless search, 956, 2846, 2881
Ex parte, 956
grand jury proceedings, 1221
Expatriation, 956–957
citizenship and, 363
as cruel and unusual punishment, 2733, 2851
Exposition and protest (1828–1829), 957
Ex post facto, 957–958
Calder v. Bull, 290
as constitutional prohibition on retroactive legislation, 2225
and economic liberties, 841–842
as mainstay of constitutionalism, 958
Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), 2112
and rule of law, 2298
See also Retroactivity of legislation Extradition. See Fugitive from justice Extraterritoriality, 958–959, 959–960 (update) and conduct compelled by foreign law, 960
search and seizure, 960
See also Territories of the United States Extremist speech, 960–962
hate speech, 1277–1279
See also Clear and present danger; Incitement to unlawful conduct; Subversive advocacy

Eyewitness identification, 962–963
as evidence, 962 lineup, 1627
right of confrontation, 492
right to counsel, 962, 1627

F

Facial challenge. See Invalid on its face Factions. See Interest groups
Fair comment. See Libel and fair comment Fair Employment Practices Committee, 1025 Fair hearing, 965–966
administrative law, 42
for alien, 1077 cease and desist orders, 325
regulatory agencies, 2149
rehearing, 2152
Fair Housing Act (1968), 393
Fair housing laws. See Open housing laws
Fair Labor Standards Act (1938), 966–968 child labor prohibition, 349, 594, 598, 1528
and commerce clause, 458, 459
hours and wages legislation, 1699–1700 invalidated for public employees, 1549 service and maintenance employee coverage, 1539
upheld, 743, 1315, 1548, 2046, 2293
Fairness doctrine, 968
broadcasting, 246, 247, 248, 249, 445, 968–969, 1130, 1391, 2144
Communications Act, 468–469
demise of, 249, 969, 1147, 2039
freedom of speech and, 968–969, 1130, 1147
Red Lion Broadcasting Company v. Federal Communications Commission, 968, 969, 2144 Fairness doctrine (historical development and update), 968–969
Frankfurter and Harlan argument against, 2037–2038 yielding to selective incorporation, 2039, 2040–2041
Fair return on fair value, 969–970
interstate commerce, 750
utility rate setting, 1023
Fair trial, 970–972
balancing test, 155
as basic right of the accused, 720 closed pretrial proceedings, 1181, 1199, 1214
discovery, 793
grand jury leaks, 1221, 1223 indictment based on inadmissible evidence, 1362 jury discrimination, 1509–1511
jury unanimity vs. "heavy" majority, 1434–1435 jury underrepresentations, 1514–1515
juvenile proceedings, 1522–1524 lineup suspect right to counsel, 1538–1539, 1627 military trials of civilians as violating, 830 open trial, 2231–2232
Pennsylvania colonial charters, 1894
pre- and post-indictment identification, 1538
prejudicial publicity, 1150, 1405, 2077
previous convictions, 1770 procedural criminal due process, 2039
public trial, 2076–2077
racial discrimination, 2088
right against self-incrimination, 2232–2241
right of confrontation, 1921 rights covered and not covered by Constitution, 714
right to counsel, 722, 1194, 1981, 2259–2265
speedy trial, 2465–2466
speedy trial extended to states, 1539
venue, 2782
waiver of constitutional rights, 974
See also Access to the courts; Free press/fair trial; Trial by jury Family and Medical Leave Act (1993), 2400 Family and the Constitution, 972–974
child abuse, 774–775
child custody awards, 799–800, 1083–1084, 1119, 1123
children's rights, 351–354 child's health protection, 2191
Child Support Recovery Act, 354
feudal privileges, 1035
foster families, 1083–1084
freedom of intimate association, 1118–1119, 1122–1124
illegitimacy, 1325–1326, 1605–1606
juvenile curfew laws challenges, 1521–1522
juvenile proceedings, 1523–1524
nonmarital children, 1824
parental control of child's education rights, 2188 parental pre-abortion notification, 6, 11, 193, 1293, 2208 parental rights termination, 1524 protection of family, 1756–1757 racial-preference in adoption, 45–47
welfare rights, 2875–2877
See also Divorce and the Constitution; Marriage and the Constitution
Fanny Hill (Cleland), 1716
Farm Mortgage Moratorium Act. See Frazier-Lemke Acts
FBI. See Federal Bureau of Investigation
FCC. See Federal Communications Commission
FECA. See Federal Election Campaign Acts Federal acts. See key word
Federal Budget. See Budget Federal Bureau of Investigation, 975–977
damages claims against, 740
electronic eavesdropping, 2139 federal judicial nominee screening by, 1019
growth of, 1568
Hoover (J. Edgar) directorship, 1303–1304 Federal common law, civil, 977–979
choice of law, 357
circuit courts, 360
seditious libel, 1016
Federal common law of crimes, 979–981
Federalist argument for, 1016
Madison's denial of concept, 1658 Federal Communications Commission abandonment of scarcity premise, 1147 broadcast regulation, 246–247, 248, 249 community communications, 469 delegated authority limits, 762 delegated licensing authority, 2148 dial-a-porn restrictions, 778
establishment of, 468
fairness doctrine, 968, 968–969, 969, 1147, 2144 minority station ownership, 1723, 2165 offensive language regulation, 1147
right of reply, 1141–1142
Federal constitutional rights. See Implied constitutional rights of action Federal courts. See Circuit courts; Claims Court; Constitutional court; Federal judicial appointments, tenure, and independence; Jurisdiction, federal; Supreme Court; United States Court of Appeal for the Federal Circuit; United States Courts of Appeals; United States District Courts Federal Courts Improvement Act (1982), 981 abolishment of Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, 696 Claims Court, 419

creation of United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, 2758 Federal criminal law, 982–985, 985–986 (update)
accusation notice, 2258
bias crimes, 1277
common law of crimes, 979–981
double jeopardy, 807–812, 982–983
federal-state enforcement, 1566–1571
Grady test, 982, 983 jurisdictional expansion, 1567
jury nullification, 1512–1514
jury size, 2255
jury unanimity, 1517, 2255
RICO cases, 982, 984
right against self-incrimination, 2237–2238
right to counsel, 1193
sentencing, 984
See also Criminal justice and due process; Criminal justice system; Criminal procedure Federal Election Campaign Acts (1971, 1974), 986–987
balancing test, 260
Buckley v. Valeo, 260, 1932, 1933, 1941
political action committees, 1932–1933
See also Campaign finance
Federal Elections Commission, 260, 987
Federal Farm Bankruptcy Act. See Frazier-Lemke Acts
Federal grants-in-aid, 987–989
conditional spending, 485–488
cooperative federalism, 684, 827, 1003 to education, 854 law enforcement, 1569
Massachusetts v. Mellon, 684
New Deal expansion of, 601
obiter dictum, 1157
revenue sharing, 2227
Sheppard-Towner Maternity Act, 2411, 2659
Federal Immunity Act (1954), 989
testimony about subversive activity, 605
Federalism, 989–994
avoidance doctrine, 142 capital district, 796
choice of law, 357–358
competitive, 477
conditional spending, 485–486
and constitutional common law, 514
and constitutional fictions, 526
as constitutional fundamental, 1947
and constitutionalism, 637–638
and constitutional theory, 654, 655
corporate, 689–690
devolution, 775–778
and divided sovereignty, 126
dormant commerce clause, 806, 990
dormant powers, 807
and Eleventh Amendment, 880, 881
environmental regulation, 903–904
exclusionary rule, 2917
and federal common law authority, 978
foreign affairs irrelevancy, 1071 and hate crime laws, 1276–1277
intergovernmental tax immunities, 1383–1384
interstate extradition, 1158
and judicial restraint, 1446
and judicial review, 990–992, 1473, 1490
jurisdiction, 1500
majoritarian bias concerns, 1956–1957
Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1688–1691 and political party system, 258, 1005–1006, 1940
as political philosophy of the Constitution, 1944
Rehnquist Court, 2169
and representation, 2131
and seditious libel laws, 1607 and slavery, 417
state action as safeguard of, 1037, 2489, 2491 and state constitutions, 1004
state police power and, 2509
states' rights and, 2518–2519
supremacy clause and, 2586
theories of the Union and, 2685–2688
treaty power, 2834
values of, 989–990, 998–999 and welfare right cases, 2876–2877
See also Cooperative federalism; Dual federalism
Federalism, contemporary practice of, 994–997
Gregory v. Ashcroft, 1229
intergovernmental tax immunities, 1384
Jeffersonian views as neofederalism basis, 1425 progressive centralization, 100
Report of the Conference of Chief Justices on Federal-State relationships, 2200–2201
revenue sharing, 2227
See also Law enforcement and federal-state relations Federalism, history of, 997–1003
Anti-Federalist constitutional thought, 101–102
Articles of Confederation, 124–125, 989, 997–998, 1010, 1013
Bill of Rights, 178, 1353–1354
Blackmun supporting opinion, 190, 191
Civil War changes in, 571
Clark (Tom) opinions, 420
devolution, 775–778
Federalist arguments for, 989, 995, 998, 999, 1010–1011, 1013–1015 feudal roots, 1035
First Continental Congress, 1059
as Frankfurter jurisprudence premise, 1102–1104 Fuller Court and, 1168–1169
and international influence of U.S. Constitution, 1363 and Prohibition, 1168–1169
as Reagan tenet, 2125, 2126
Roosevelt's (Franklin) transformation of, 597
Taft Court interpretation, 2641
Taney Court and, 2651
Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions, 1424
Waite Court and, 2822
wartime relaxation, 2927
Wilson's (James) arguments for, 2910
Federalism, theory of, 1003–1007
inception, 997, 1003–1004
intergovernmental tax immunities, 1383–1384
Justice Rehnquist's views, 2153, 2155, 2156, 2160
Montesquieu's beliefs, 1755
Federalism and civil rights, 1007–1009
Fourteenth Amendment, Section 5 enforcement, 1088, 1089–1089
Federalism and environmental law, 1009–1010
waste and pollution cases, 2864
Federalism and shared powers, 1010–1013
intergovernmental tax immunities, 1383–1384

Federalism in historical perspective. See Devolution and federalism in historical perspective; Federalism, history of Federalist, The, 1013–1015
on advice and consent, 47 on amending process, 74, 75 on bicameralism, 172 on bills of credit prohibition, 174 on checks and balances, 342–343 on commander-in-chief clause, 1997 on common defense, 2835 constitutional commentary, 449 on constitutional supremacy, 1963 on deliberative vs. direct democracy, 763, 785 on executive administration, 265 exposition of constitutional system, 1947 on factions, 1380–1381, 1382, 1933, 1947, 1956, 2063 on federalism theory, 989, 995, 998, 999, 1010–1011 on general welfare clause, 1186
Hamilton coauthorship, 1257, 1258–1259
on impeachment, 1338, 1340 on implied powers, 1344, 1346
as international influence, 1365
Jay essays, 1418
on judicial independence, 1463
on judicial power, 496–497, 1466, 1467, 1469
on judicial review, 1259, 1287, 1471, 1473, 1475, 1487 on judicial supremacy, 1487 on limited government, 1618 Madison's authorship, 1657, 1658, 1659, 1660–1661 on majoritarian and minoritarian biases, 1956 on military powers, 386
and original intent, 1394
on popular consent, 1962, 1963 on presidential removal power, 110 on privileges and immunities, 2019 ratification role, 2119
on representation, 2201 on republican government, 1963 on right of revolution, 2249 on source of Court's power, 1951 on spending power, 2468
on three-fifths clause, 2700 on unenumerated rights, 2752–2753
Federalists, 1015–1017
Adams cabinet, 29
Alien and Sedition Acts, 67, 1016, 1424
and Bill of Rights, 176, 178
deliberative democracy, 763 Hamilton leadership, 1259–1260
Hartford Convention, 1274
and Jeffersonian constitutionalism, 1424
Judiciary Act of 1801, 1422, 1496–1497
Judiciary Act repealed, 1498
majoritarian bias concerns, 1956–1957
"midnight judge" appointments, 697, 1667–1668 political philosophy, 1957 theory of the Union, 2686–2687
Federal judicial appointments, tenure, and independence, 1017–1020 constitutional provisions, 1463 forms of independence, 1455–1458 good behavior clause, 111, 1018, 1020, 1337–1338, 1454, 1456, 1948 impeachment, 1020, 1336–1340, 1456
Judicial Code, 1451
nonapplicable to territories or District of Columbia, 1464 tenure and salary provisions to ensure independence, 1463
See also Judicial independence; Judicial power
Federal judicial role, 1020–1023
Judicial Code, 1451
Federal judicial system. See Judicial system, federal Federal jurisdiction. See Jurisdiction, federal Federal Mortgage Moratorium Act. See Frazier-Lemke Acts
Federal Power Commission, 2866
Federal protection of civil rights, 1023–1027
attorney general and Justice Department, 404, 410–411, 1024, 1025, 1533
and color of law, 444
Force Acts, 1070
Federal question jurisdiction, 1027–1028
adequate state grounds, 34–35 congressional power under Article III, 1865
declaratory judgment, 756
Eleventh Amendment, 880
federal judicial system, 653, 1489, 1497
habeas corpus powers, 1495
Judiciary Act of 1801, 1497
Judiciary Act of 1875, 1497
Pennhurst State School & Hospital v. Halderman, 1893
removal of cases, 2198–2199
Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1028–1029
choice of law rules, 798 common law powers, 981
federal question jurisdiction, 1027, 1028
jurisdiction, 1500
Rule 11 sanctions and civil rights cases, 398
Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 1029
accusation notice, 2258
denaturalization proceedings, 769 federal felony definition, 1031 indictment or information, 1369
pretrial disclosure, 2004
venue, 2782
Federal Test Acts (1862, 1865, 1868), 318, 1029–1030
Federal Tort Claims Act (1946), 419, 1030, 1217–1218 sovereign immunity waiver, 2459, 2706, 2708
Federal Trade Commission Act (1914), 1030–1031
antitrust law, 104, 105, 106
removal provision, 1318 unfair competition provision, 1030
Felony, 1031–1032
accusation notice, 2258
arrest, 119, 121, 1031
criminal syndicalism laws, 723
definition, 1031
draft card burning as, 817–818
due process, 828
federal prosecutors, 1568 incitement to, 1352
indictment, 1361–1362, 1369
infamy as conviction result, 1363 misdemeanor distinction, 1031
police pursuits and constitutional rights, 1932
right to counsel, 23, 170, 1193–1194, 2255, 2259, 2261–2262 sterilization for habitual offenders invalidated, 2203
Feminist theory, 1032–1033
abortion rights, 5, 8–9, 2286 attack on liberalism, 1616 comparable worth, 474–475
on difference and constitutional equality, 782 on obscenity vs. pornography, 1838 pornography as hate speech, 1277–1278 pornography regulation, 1054, 1057, 1134, 1965–1968
pragmatism and, 1983

See also Woman suffrage; Woman suffrage movement Fetal viability. See Person
Feudalism and the Constitution, 1034–1035
Fifteenth Amendment (framing and ratification), 1039–1041
amending process, 72
as racial discrimination remedy, 387, 411, 578, 2099, 2480
woman suffrage exclusion, 91, 370, 2918–2919
Fifteenth Amendment (judicial interpretation), 1041–1042
antidiscrimination legislation, 94, 95, 402
circuit court decisions, 361 city boundary delineations, 362 constitutional circumvention, 2145–2146 enforcement limited to state abridgement of voting rights, 1089
Force Acts, 1070, 1415
gerrymander violation, 1203 grandfather clauses, 2900 literacy tests, 1242, 1629
segregationist practices as nullifying, 1168
as voting rights basis, 362, 2320, 2436, 2807, 2938
Waite opinions, 2822–2823, 2826–2827
See also Voting rights
Fifth Amendment
ambiguity and vagueness of, 2683 challenges to police power, 2508
due process clause, 25, 33, 375, 828, 2306, 2307 just compensation and, 2646
torts and, 2706
See also Double jeopardy; Due process of law; Grand jury; Right against self-incrimination; Taking of property
Fighting words, 1042–1043 broadcasting restraints, 981, 1043
chilling effect, 354
clear and present danger, 331, 1042
Cohen v. California, 435
First Amendment absolutism, 17, 1047
freedom of speech restrictions, 375, 1042–1043, 1057, 1128, 2855
hate speech, 1278
as low First Amendment value, 1056, 1057, 1133, 1646
as nonapplicable to flag burning, 1062
Filibuster, 1043–1044
in Senate, 2359
Final judgment rule, 1044
federal question jurisdiction, 1027
interlocutory, 1385
Firearms. See Gun control; Second Amendment
First Amendment, 1045–1052, 1053–1055 (update 1), 1055–1057 (update 2) absolutism, 17, 815, 1047, 1051, 2931
academic freedom, 21, 22
accommodation of religion distinction, 24
Alien and Sedition Acts as violation, 67, 1608 alien rights under, 1330–1331
ambiguity and vagueness of, 2683
anonymous political speech, 90–91 anti-abortion movement restraints, 93–94 balancing tests, 154–155 begging as speech protection, 1301
Black-Douglas literal full protection theory, 815
Black's "preferred" position doctrine, 187–188
Board of Education v. Pico, 202, 1216
Bork's controversial view of, 210
Brandeis defense of, 221, 222–223
Brennan analysis, 230–231, 234–235, 1062
Brennan on central meaning of, 2214
Bridges v. California, 1149
broadcasting, 249, 445, 1147, 1392, 2739
Buckley v. Valeo, 257, 1216
Burger Court and, 270–271, 273
cable television, 2739
campaign finance, 295, 296, 297, 1932 categories of speech excluded from, 1802
as censorship bar, 1317
child pornography, 350, 351, 1802 children's issues, 350–351
civil disobedience, 371
civil liberties guaranteed by, 375
clear and present danger test, 146, 426, 1050, 1051, 1149, 1299, 2318–2319, 2901
commercial speech, 17, 138, 139, 165, 460–464, 1118, 1133, 1135, 1556, 2351, 2800
Communist party witness testimony, 1595–1596
communitarians on, 472–473
compelled speech, 475
and compelling state interest, 155, 477
computerized forms of information, 482
and constitutional aspiration, 663 content-based/content-neutral principle, 1053–1059, 1128–1129, 1132–1135, 1147–1148, 1320, 1351, 1646, 2199
copyright protection, 1377
corporate citizenship, 688 defamatory speech, 167, 1235, 1236 demonstrations, 767–768
and direct democracy, 787–788 distribution of literature in public forum, 1391
draft card burning, 1836
and education, 855–856, 858–859
and electoral process, 871–872
electronic eavesdropping, 872–873
employee speech rights (private), 891
and enumerated powers, 1091
and equal access, 906
and equal protection doctrine, 1921–1922
Espionage Act, 923
essential rights construed as property, 2051
establishment clause, 2321, 2378
establishment of religion, 927–928
Everson v. Board of Education, 931
and executive power, 948
extremist speech, 960–961
fairness doctrine, 968–969
and fair trial, 972
and fighting words, 1042–1043, 1133, 1646 film censorship procedural requirements, 1106 flag desecration, 1061–1064
Fortas analysis, 1082–1083
Fourteenth Amendment's extension to states, 1045–1046 Framers' phrasing of, 177 freedom of association guarantee first recognized, 1773
free exercise clause, 1768 government-created corporations, 1573–1574
government secrecy, 1214–1215, 1257
government speech, 1215–1216 grand jury secrecy limits, 1223 group libel exclusion from, 167, 1236 as Hatch Act challenge, 268 and hate crimes, 1276
Holmes's changing view of, 1299
homeowner posting of "For Sale" or "Sold" signs, 1628
homeowner posting of political signs, 1556–1557
Hughes Court rulings, 1316–1317

First Amendment (continued)
incitement to unlawful conduct, 1351–1353
and incorporation doctrine, 179, 1008, 1353–1356 initiative petitions, 1372 intellectual property law, 1377–1378
interaction between two religious clauses, 2174–2176 interception of mail propaganda, 1560 judicial activism and restraint, 1445
labor activity, 1549–1556
legislative investigations, 2866 libel law, 1146, 1189, 1236, 1322, 1606–1608, 2067
libelous publications, 1805 libel plurality opinion, 829–830
liberalism and, 1615
lobbyist protection, 1636
low-value speech doctrine, 1056–1057, 1128, 1133, 1646, 2940
loyalty-security programs, 1649–1650
Madisonian understanding of, 1658, 1662 malicious libel, 1322 and marketplace of ideas, 1136–1137, 1670–1671 military power to restrict, 117
minors' rights, 1195
motion pictures, 1538
New York Times Company v. Sullivan, 231, 234–235, 237 as not mandating complete church-state separation, 1653
nude dancing, 1830–1832
obscenity prosecutions, 2318, 2476 obscenity status, 1048, 1837–1839, 2296
overbreadth doctrine, 250–251, 2317
Paul v. Davis, 1888
Pell v. Procunier, 1891
Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association, 1899 picketing, 1550–1551, 1921–1922, 2414
Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 1915 political party rulings, 1938–1939, 1942–1943 political speech shields, 1264 pornography protections, 1965–1968
as preferred freedoms, 1990–1991 prior restraint and, 1788, 1805–1806, 2009–2011, 2351
prisoners' rights, 2046
privacy and, 2014–2015 protection denial to alleged subversives, 79 protection of private property, 1672 public and nonpublic forums, 2068–2069 public employee curbs, 268 public employee protections, 36, 2066–2067, 2252
public's access right to criminal trial, 2231–2232 released time challenges, 2171–2172
reporter's privilege, 226–227, 2413
right to know, 2271, 2272
school prayers, 2322, 2323, 2324
scientific experimentation, 2327 securities regulation, 2350, 2351
seditious libel, 2353
shopping center uses, 1308, 1672, 2060, 2414–2415
Stewart's views, 2542
and strict scrutiny, 1050–1051, 1990, 2562 symbolic speech protection, 1061
textualism problems, 2683
two-level theory, 1837, 2744–2745
Warren Court emphasis, 380, 2854–2855
workplace harassment, 2925, 2926
World War I cases, 1049–1050, 1126, 2901
zoning ordinances, 2317
See also Extremist speech; Freedom of assembly; Freedom of assembly and association; Freedom of petition; Freedom of speech; Freedom of the press; Religious liberty; Separation of church and state
First Congress, 1057–1059
Association and, 534, 672 circuit court jurisdictions, 1489 full faith and credit statute, 1170 judicial removal, 1338
Judiciary Act of 1789, 1495–1497
right to petition debate, 2273
First Continental Congress, Declaration and Resolves of (1774), 1059–1060
Adams (John) role, 26
First World War. See World War I
Five Knights Case. See Petition of Right
Flag burning. See Flag desecration
Flag desecration, 1061, 1061–1064 (update)
clear and present danger test, 427
constitutional amendment proposal, 76
and content neutrality doctrine, 1054, 1133 as freedom of speech decision, 1133
and incorporation doctrine, 179
Scalia's views, 2315
Stevens's views, 2538
Texas v. Johnson, 382, 1062–1063, 1133
Flag Protection Act (1989), 1063
Flag salute cases, 1064–1066
clear and present danger test, 426, 2186, 2188, 2189
First Amendment privilege, 1048 free exercise vs. free speech applications, 2186
Stone Court and, 2549–2550
substantive due process and, 2574
FLSA. See Fair Labor Standards Act
FOIA. See Freedom of Information Act
Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (1938), 1069
as Pure Food and Drug Act extension, 2084
Food Stamp Act (1964), 2875
amendment (1971), 770
Force Act (1833), 1069
as response to South Carolina nullification, 1408, 1413, 2457
Force Acts (1870, 1871), 94, 1070
and federalism, 994
and Fifteenth Amendment, 1070, 1415
and Fourteenth Amendment, 1088 invoked in school desegregation violence, 1969 and Ku Klux Klan, 733 provisions, 181, 1070
repeal of portions by Civil Rights Repeal Act, 415 Foreign affairs, 1071–1078, 1078–1081 (update) act of state doctrine, 24–25
advice and consent, 47
Boland Amendment, 206, 621, 622
Bricker Amendment, 243–244
constitutional provisions, 2834–2839
crisis-based broad presidential powers, 741 delegation of power, 761
Embargo Acts, 885
executive agreements, 939
executive prerogative, 950
extraterritoriality, 958–960
free press/national security issue, 1140–1141 immigration and alienage laws, 1330, 1332
implied powers, 1345
International Emergency Economic Powers Act, 1386
international law and federal-state relations, 1389–1390
Iran-Contra affair, 1402–1403, 2128

Jay's Treaty, 1419
Marshall Plan, 1687
Monroe Doctrine, 1755
North Atlantic Treaty, 1827
Panama Canal treaties, 1876
police action, 1921
as political question doctrine, 1950, 1953 presidential act of recognition, 168 presidential order upheld, 239 presidential powers, 1071, 1073–1076, 1078–1081, 1996–1997, 2836–2837
presidential war powers, 1997–1998, 2002–2003
Proclamation of Neutrality, 2045–2046
Roosevelt's (Franklin D.) policies, 2289–2290
Roosevelt's (Theodore) policies, 2291–2292
Senate role in, 47, 2361–2362 state limitations, 1072–1073, 1997 territorial incorporation theory, 1169
United Nations Charter, 603, 2757–2758
war powers, 2834–2844, 2840–2844
Washington presidency, 2861–2862
Washington's Farewell Address, 2863
See also Congress and foreign policy; Gulf War; Korean War; Senate and foreign policy; Treaty power; Vietnam War; World War I; World War II

Foreign commerce, 1081 child labor prohibitions, 1528
and commerce clause, 1072–1073, 1081
drug regulation, 821, 823
import-export clause, 256, 1348–1349
North American Free Trade Agreement, 1826–1827
original package doctrine, 1864, 2923
Prohibition of Slave Trade Act, 2050
Pure Food and Drug Act, 2083–2084
selective exclusiveness, 2356

Foreign policy. See Congress and foreign policy; Congressional war policy; Foreign Affairs; Senate and foreign policy

Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (1976), 25

Forfeiture. See Civil forfeiture

Foster families, 1083–1084
intimate association value, 1124 same-race placement preference issue, 46

Founders' Constitution, The (Kurland and Lerner, eds.), 1543

Four-letter words. See Fighting words; Low-value speech; Obscenity

Fourteenth Amendment (framing), 1084–1087
abolitionist constitutional theory, 2
Amnesty Act, 89
antislavery constitutional arguments, 1288
as Bill of Rights extension to states, 33, 39, 178–180, 197, 1045–1046, 1090–1092, 2917 Bingham's role, 181 citizenship clause, 59, 129, 131, 168, 183–184, 364, 365, 366, 1085, 1087, 1090, 1092, 1167, 2305, 2354, 2497 civil liberties guarantees, 375
civil rights guarantees, 387, 402, 411
due process clause, 375, 387, 760, 829, 970, 971, 1045, 1084, 1088, 1089–1090, 1091, 1288, 1355, 1572, 2036, 2317, 2318
due process connotation, 1572
and Eleventh Amendment, 877, 880
Fourth Amendment incorporations, 2917 and fundamental rights, 1037
and higher law, 1288
historical background, 1356–1357
immunities clause. See subhead privileges and immunities clause below
incorporation doctrine, 814–15, 830, 1008, 1045, 1086, 1353–1356
and individual rights, 2480
Johnson's (Andrew) public disapprobation of, 1428
Joint Committee on Reconstruction, 1436
"male" terminology first introduced into Constitution, 2477, 2918 privileges and immunities clause (second), 2020–2021 privileges and immunities clause, 96, 1087–1088, 1091, 1288, 2305 racial discrimination remedy, 186, 1084–1087, 1088
ratification, 72, 578
as rational basis for governmental classifications, 678 speedy trial coverage, 1539 state action coverage, 2329, 2482 as Thirteenth Amendment clarification, 2143
tort due process, 2706 trial by jury coverage, 830 as unenumerated rights protection, 33 women's initial exclusion, 91, 370, 1740, 2477, 2918, 2919, 2920
See also Due process of law; Equal protection of the laws; Incorporation doctrine

Fourteenth Amendment (judicial interpretation) abortion decision, 5, 15, 2057 alien protection guarantee, 368
American Indians status, 79, 80, 82
Americans with Disabilities Act, 87, 88 anti-abortion movement citing, 92
antidiscrimination legislation, 94, 95, 96
antimiscegenation laws invalidation, 403, 1645–1646
arrest, 119, 120
and Asian Americans, 130, 131–132, 1331
capital punishment, 307, 309, 1529
Cardozo's common law approach to, 313–315
as censorship bar, 1317
Chase Court and, 338
citizenship of District of Columbia residents, 796 citizenship of women, 2919
Civil Rights Cases, 408–410 congressional remedial powers, 1527 controlled-substance abuse, 678
corporate citizenship, 688
corporate rights and privileges, 585 Court's selective activism and restraint, 1445 criminal justice and due process, 709–711
damages claims, 740
discrimination by private individuals, 1089 domestic violence clause enforcement, 803–804 due process incorporation into state criminal procedure, 2036–2042
economic due process, 1007
economic liberties, 841–842
economic regulation, 844, 2519
education applications, 854
eminent domain, 888–889
employment discrimination, 893
environmental regulation, 905
equal access, 2063
equal protection clause, 46, 206, 253, 387, 388, 389, 401, 780–783, 907–913, 916, 1084, 1086–1090, 1092, 1288, 1919, 2368, 2387, 2533
equal rights amendment, 918
Euclid v. Ambler Realty Company, 929 evidence, 934
exclusionary rule, 936

Fourteenth Amendment (continued) expansive readings of, 626
and federalism, 989, 991, 992
Field incorporation theory, 1036–1038
Force Acts, 1088
freedom of contract, 1007, 1547, 1638, 2414
freedom of petition, 1125
freedom of speech, 2309–2310, 2311
freedom of the press, 1317
judicial activism, 1448
jury trial right, 157–158, 181, 1700
just compensation for property taken, 1519
juvenile curfew laws challenges, 1521
juvenile proceedings, 1523
and original intent, 178, 1086, 1088, 1091
peaceable assembly, 1107
Pennhurst State School & Hospital v. Halderman, 1893
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 1908 as privacy right basis, 2246 private racially discriminative behavior, 1240–1241, 1437, 2063 and procedural due process, 64
property protection, 2051
public accommodation access, 168 public purpose definition, 2311 public use, 2079
race and sex in antidiscrimination law, 2089, 2091
racial discrimination, 186, 771, 1089, 1239–1241, 1437, 2093, 2099, 2101–2102, 2106, 2108
racial preference, 2109
racial quotas, 54
reapportionment, 152, 153
resident alien protections, 130
residential segregation, 2900
and restrictive covenants, 163
right against self-incrimination, 33, 1665–1666
right to counsel, 2260
right to life, 2329
same-sex marriage, 2307
separate but equal facilities, 771, 1918
sex discrimination, 218, 2398
Slaughterhouse cases, 2423–2424
state action limitation, 200, 280, 1037, 1063, 1064, 1411
state vs. private discrimination, 1089 vested rights protection, 1041–1042, 1225, 2203, 2783–2784, 2807 woman suffrage denial, 2477
See also Incorporation doctrine
Fourteenth Amendment, Section 5 (framing), 1087–1091
Fourteenth Amendment, Section 5 (judicial construction), 1089–1090 equal protection guarantee, 401
private discrimination, 2015, 2016
Waite opinions, 2822
Fourteenth Amendment as a new Constitution, 1090–1092
Fourth Amendment, 1092–1097, 1097–1098 (update) administrative search, 42, 43
alien rights, 1330, 1332
arrest, 119, 120
arrest warrant, 120–121, 140, 141
Black's restrictive interpretation of, 186–187 civil liberties guarantees, 375 collective rights, 1091 consent search waiver, 507
criminal justice technology, 711–713
damages claims, 740
drug testing, 822–827, 2328
education application, 856 electronic eavesdropping requirements, 170, 873–875, 1643, 2342, 2896–2897, 2913
environmental regulation, 902–903
exclusionary rule, 936, 2334, 2335, 2336, 2338, 2339
formalism of, 2339, 2340
Frankfurter championship, 1102 free press application, 1140, 1143, 1145
good faith exception, 1204–1205
habeas corpus, 2320
homeless persons' rights, 1302 implied damages action, 1344
incorporation doctrine, 1008, 2917 national security, 1781–1782
Paxton's Case, 1889
person concept, 1901
plain feel doctrine, 1912
plain view doctrine, 1914
pragmatism of, 2340, 2342, 2343 privacy guarantee, 2319
probable cause, 2022–2024, 2331, 2333, 2334, 2338, 2339
property definitions, 2339
property protection, 2051, 2052
reasonable expectation of privacy, 2139–2141
reasonableness requirement, 2337
right to privacy, 2334, 2337, 2342
search and seizure, 2333, 2338, 2344 search and seizure of innocent party's premises, 2948
search warrant based on informant's tip, 1327 search warrant requirement, 1092, 1099, 2343–2344 segregation and, 2354
seizure as witness against self, 2236
Stewart's views, 2542
stop and frisk, 2676
third-party consent, 2689
traffic stops, 2711
unreasonable search, 294, 330, 375, 822, 823, 1094–1095, 1097–1098, 1527, 2766–2768
waiver of constitutional rights, 2831 warrant clause, 2329, 2330, 2334
warrantless search, 2845, 2847, 2851
Weeks v. United States, 2872–2873
Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 2947–2948
Fourth Amendment, historical origins of, 1098–1099
Franchise. See Voting rights; Woman suffrage Frazier-Lemke Acts (1934, 1935), 1105 revision upheld, 2932
unconstitutionality, 1645
Freedmen's Bureau, 1106
Civil Rights Act of 1866, 402 economic support for freedmen, 416 federal civil rights enforcement, 1024
freedmen's rights, 578
Freedom of. . ., See also headings beginning with Right
Freedom of assembly and association, 1106–1110
Bill of Rights (English), 175
boycott, 215
campaign finance, 295
civil disobedience, 371
and content neutrality doctrine, 1053–1055
Cox v. New Hampshire, 702
demonstration, 702, 767
electoral process, 872
as First Amendment right, 1045, 1046, 1052, 1053
Fourteenth Amendment due process, 760, 1107 gay and lesbian St. Patrick's Day parade participation, 1320 juvenile curfew laws, 1521–1522 labor union organization, 1549, 1552 petition rights, 1125
political action committees, 1932–1933
and private discrimination, 2015, 2016–2017 public employee unionization, 1552 and public forum concept, 702, 1317
Slaughterhouse cases, 2424
state constitutions on, 1107

Freedom of association, 1110–1111
balancing test, 1193
as civil liberty, 376, 377
for collective bargaining, 4 Communist Party of the United States v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 472
as First Amendment right, 1052 first Court recognition of, 1773
freedom of intimate association, 1108, 1118–1125 groups and, 1236–1237 and guilt by association, 1241–1242 judicial interpretation, 1107–1111
and labor union organization, 1549, 1552 and legislative investigations, 1052, 2866–2867 and loyalty-security program, 1650 and married couple contraceptive use, 1108 NAACP v. Alabama, 1773
and petition right, 1125
by political parties, 1937, 1938–1939, 1942–1943 and refusal to answer state bar admission questions, 1541
and right of privacy, 2243–2244
and secret societies, 1109
and sedition, 2351
and sex discrimination, 2016–2017
See also Freedom of intimate association
Freedom of contract, 1111–1117
Adamson Act as noninterference, 33 affected with a public interest doctrine, 52, 53, 1115, 1166
Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 70, 1115, 2243
Chase Court and, 342
as civil liberty, 376, 382
corporations and, 687, 1112, 1116
due process clause, 25–26, 36, 70, 837–838, 2243
economic liberties, 842 equality of right, 25–26, 36
and Fourteenth Amendment, 1007, 2414
and fundamental interests, 1173 Holmes's dissent on, 1296
labor activity, 1547
maximum hour/minimum wage laws and, 35–36, 1638, 1764
Pitney and, 1911
as protected liberty, 1288
and public purpose doctrine, 2073 reaffirmed, 684
regulatory statute invalidated under, 1735–1736
Sherman Antitrust Act, 1165
Slaughterhouse cases, 2423
as subject to police power, 1294
substantive due process, 26, 687, 1114–1115, 1116, 2571, 2577
and ticket scalping, 2746
and vested rights, 1034
See also Obligation of contracts
Freedom of debate. See Speech or debate clause
Freedom of expressive association. See Freedom of association Freedom of information. See Right to know
Freedom of Information Act (1966), 1117–1118 applied to administrative agencies, 39
civil liberties and, 379
denouncement by Scalia, 2313
and government secrecy, 1215
Freedom of intimate association, 1118–1125
antisodomy law, 213, 2247, 2891
Bowers v. Hardwick, 213, 2247, 2891 as child custody issue, 800 and contraceptive use, 1108, 1118, 1234 and divorce, 799
foster families, 1083–1084, 1124
as freedom of association guarantee, 1110
fundamental interests, 1173 and illegitimacy, 1326, 1558 and miscegenation, 1744–1745, 2097
penumbra theory, 1896
right of privacy basis, 1237, 2242, 2243, 2246–2247
and right to marry, 1671–1672
and same-sex marriage, 2308
and sexual orientation, 1124, 2403
Freedom of petition, 1125
Bill of Rights (English), 175
and boycott, 215
and District of Columbia demonstrations, 796
as First Amendment right, 1046, 1052
Slaughterhouse cases, 2424
suppression of abolitionist petitions, 2, 31, 385, 2884
Freedom of religion. See Religious liberty Freedom of speech, 1125–1132, 1132–1135 (update 1), 1135–1137 (update 2) abortion counseling restraint, 2300
Abrams v. United States, 2901
absolutism, 17, 815
academic freedom, 21, 22
anonymous political speech, 90–91
anti-abortion protests, 93–94
antislavery suppressions, 2425–2426
bad tendency test, 146, 1129, 2311
balancing test, 154–155, 769, 1129–1130
and begging, 1301
Black-Douglas literal full protection theory, 815 and blasphemy, 198
as Bork nomination issue, 210
Brandeis on philosophical foundations of, 221, 222–223, 1050 breach of the peace vs., 227 broadcasting regulation, 246, 981, 1391–1392
Burger Court and, 380
and cable television, 2739 and campaign expenditure limitations, 260 and captive audience, 313 cases (1985–1989), 1132–1135
Cato's Letters, 324 children and, 351
chilling effect, 354, 471
civil disobedience and, 371, 1135–1136
civil liberties and, 375
clear and present danger test, 15, 16, 225–26, 426, 769, 961, 1129, 1352, 1955, 1990, 2318–2319, 2901 commercial speech restrictions, 1377
Communications Act, 469
communitarians on, 473
and computer technology, 481
and congressional investigation witnesses, 1595 for congressional members, 501 and conspiracy law, 511, 709 content-neutral/content-based doctrine, 1053–1059, 1128–1129, 1132–1135, 1215–1216, 1351, 1837, 2123, 2123–2124, 2167–2168, 2914
copyright and, 685–686, 1377 corporate rights, 690–691, 1060
and criminal syndicalism statutes, 723 degree and coverage scope, 1135–1137 and destruction of draft card, 818, 1836 economic implications, 1565–1566 employee speech, 891–892, 2925
employer speech, 1551–1552 and enhanced punishment of hate crimes, 1276
and equal access, 906
and espionage, 2318–2319
establishment clause, 926

Freedom of speech (continued) evolution teaching, 2666
extremist speech, 960–962
fairness doctrine, 968–969, 1147, 2230
fighting words, 375, 1042–1043, 1057, 1128, 2855
as First Amendment right, 1045–1048, 1053–1059 flag desecration cases, 1054, 1061–1064 and Fourteenth Amendment due process, 760 and free access to media, 1725
and freedom of association, 1110 freedom of press distinctions, 1147
Gitlow v. New York, 2901 and government refusals to aid religious expression, 1208, 1209 government subsidized speech, 1131–1132 and group libel, 167, 1235–1236 as hate crime challenge, 1276, 2913–2914
and hate speech, 1277, 2123–2124
Holmes's theory of, 1046, 1047, 1050, 1296, 1298–1300
homeowner posting of "For Sale" or "Sold" signs, 1628
homeowner posting of political signs, 1556–1557
hostile audience, 1304–1305
Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 1133 incidental burdens on, 1351
incitement test, 1351–1353, 1696
and incorporation doctrine, 179, 1008
and intellectual property law, 1377–1378
and Internet, 471, 1148, 1391–1392
Jefferson's statement on, 1423 and labor activity, 1549, 1551, 1553
least restrictive means test, 1573 and legislative investigation witnesses, 1595
listener's rights, 1628
low-value speech doctrine, 1056–1057, 1128, 1132–1133, 1646–1647, 2940
Mill (John Stuart) on, 1730–1731 movies protected under, 279 murder manuals and instructions of violence, 1153–1154 mythology of Holmes's championship, 1298–1300
O'Brien test, 1837
obscenity restrictions, 161–162, 1128, 2296 offensive language restrictions, 981, 1043, 1057, 1147
"official English" laws, 1847–1848
overt acts test, 1871 parliamentary rights, 1880
Pell v. Procunier, 1891
Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776, 1895
Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association, 1900 picketing rulings, 1550, 1907
and political parties, 1937
political speech, 871 polling place restrictions, 279 pornography ordinances and, 1966–1967
as preferred freedom, 1990
prior restraint and censorship, 2009–2011
protected from unprotected but related conduct, 2855 of public employees, 22, 892, 1134, 1137, 1782, 2866
public forum doctrine, 34, 203, 369, 1131, 1134, 2009, 2067–2071, 2167 religious groups' rights, 1560, 2172–2173, 2186, 2194, 2198, 2904 in "restricted environments," 1133–1134 and RICO Act, 1152–1153
and right against self-incrimination, 2235
right-privilege rejection, 234
Schenck v. United States, 2318–2319
scientific speech and, 2326 secondary boycott advertisement disallowed, 1203–1204 and seditious libel, 16, 1016, 1606–1607, 2353 shopping centers, 1131, 1308, 1566, 2414–2415 soundtrucks and amplifiers and, 2452–2453 special-use public property limitation, 34
standard of review, 2471
Stevens's views, 2538
Stewart's views, 2542
street-corner preaching, 1542
strict scrutiny, 2562
student curbs, 170, 1281
student on-campus worship group denial, 203
subsidized speech, 2567–2568
and subversive advocacy, 2580
symbolic speech, 1061, 1062, 2630–2632
Tennessee v. Scopes, 2666
Texas v. Johnson, 1133
two-level theory, 2744–2745
unconstitutional conditions, 2749–2750
unprotected areas, 2855 value pluralism and, 2778
Vinson Court and, 2794
and violence advocacy or instruction, 1153–1154
Warren Court and, 2854–2855
Whitney v. California, 2901–2902 and witness and juror personal experiences sales to media, 2915–2916
and workplace harassment, 2925, 2926
World War I cases, 1606–1607
See also Freedom of the press; Libel and the First Amendment Freedom of speech, legislator's. See Legislative immunity; Speech or debate clause Freedom of the press, 1138–1144, 1144–1147 (update 1), 1147–1149 (update 2)
absolutism, 17
actual malice rule, 1141, 1146, 1322, 1607, 1608–1609, 2067, 2850
ambiguity and vagueness of, 2683
and antislavery statements suppression, 2426 Bork controversial view of, 210 broadcasters and, 469, 691
Burger opinions, 271
cable television, 1147–1148
Cato's Letters, 324
Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., 436 and computer technology, 481, 482–483
and conspiracy law, 709 content-based/content-neutral regulation, 1054, 1055
copyright and, 685–686
corporate rights and, 690–691 electronic media and, 1138, 1147–1148 and fair trial. See Free press/fair trial
as First Amendment right, 1046, 1051, 1051–1052, 1054, 1055, 1138, 1144, 2351
Freedom of Information Act, 1117 freedom of speech distinctions, 1147 free newspaper space for political rebuttal disallowed, 1725 Grosjean v. American Press Co., 1138–1139, 1317
incidental burdens on, 1351
and incorporation doctrine, 179
and Internet, 1148
libel restrictions. See Libel and the First Amendment
Madison's view of, 1658

Milton (John) on, 1737–1739
and national security, 1129, 1139, 1140, 1145
Near v. Minnesota, 1138, 1145, 1317
New York Times Co. v. United States, 1438–1439, 1805–1807, 2009
and original intent, 1607
and Pentagon Papers publication, 1129, 1139, 1140, 1145, 1438–1439, 1805–1807, 2009
People v. Croswell, 1897
as preferred freedom, 1990
prior restraint and censorship, 1438–1439, 1805–1807, 2009–2011 privacy rights vs., 1142, 2014 and public property, 369
reporter's privilege, 226–227, 1143, 2413
and right against self-incrimination, 2236
and right to know, 1143–1144, 2271–2272 right to privacy vs., 2244 right to reply invalidations, 1142, 1144–1145, 1725 Sedition Act (1798) convictions, 67 seditious libel and, 1138, 1139, 2351, 2353 source disclosure, 1143
state action and, 2310
Stewart's views, 2542
student newspaper curbs, 1281
subsidized speech, 2568
and subversive advocacy, 2580
"taxes on knowledge" held unconstitutional, 1234
and tort liability, 1069, 1438–1439
Vinson Court and, 2794
Zenger's case, 1512, 2944
Free exercise clause. See Religious liberty Freeport Doctrine (1858), 1148–1149
slavery in territories, 813, 1625, 2436
Free press/fair trial, 1149–1152, 1152 (update) broadened open proceedings, 1199
closed pretrial proceedings, 1181, 1214, 2077
and electronic equipment, 330, 1142–1143, 1152
Estes v. Texas, 929
and First Amendment rights, 972, 1142, 1145–1446
gag order, 1138, 1142, 1144, 1145, 1151, 1152, 1179–1180, 1789, 2077
prejudicial publicity, 1150, 1405, 2077
prior restraint on pretrial publicity, 1789 public access to criminal trials, 2231–2232
Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 2231–2232, 2271–2272 televising of trial, 330 tort liability, 1438–1439
Free-Soil parties, 3, 31, 1848, 2435
Free speech and RICO, 1152–1153
Free Speech League, 2324
Free speech, murder manuals, and instruction of violence, 1153–1154
Columbine High School shootings, 1154
Free trade. See Commerce clause
French and Indian War, 755
French Revolution, 29
Fries' Rebellion, 1156
Fruit of the poisonous tree, 1157–1158
direct and indirect evidence, 2336
exclusionary rule, 121, 936, 1157, 1815, 1928, 2336
inevitable discovery, 1815
oral incrimination in wake of illegal arrest, 2922
FTC. See Federal Trade Commission Act
FTCA. See Federal Tort Claims Act
Fugitive from justice, 1158–1159
Articles of Confederation clause, 540
Fugitive Slave Acts (1793, 1850)
Abolitionist constitutional theory, 2, 3, 4 abolitionist legal challenge, 2432 civil liberties denials, 2425, 2431
Compromise of 1850, 477, 478
preemption doctrine, 2555
as property protection, 2427, 2428, 2430
upheld, 2006, 2417
Fugitive slavery, 1159–1160
abolitionist constitutional theory, 2, 3, 4, 2432
civil disobedience and, 370
Compromise of 1850, 477, 478
constitutional clauses on, 2, 409 denial of trial rights, 2425, 2431 federal law of 1793 upheld, 2006
habeas corpus, 1248
personal liberty laws, 3, 4, 1159, 1901, 2006
political trials, 1955
property protection, 2427, 2428, 2430
Sims' case, 2417
Somerset's case, 2452
taking of property application, 2054
Full Employment Act (1946), 1160
as post-World War II measure, 603
Fuller Court, 1163–1170
new judicialism, 1160, 1161–1162
separate but equal doctrine, 1160
Full faith and credit, 1170–1171, 1171–1172 (update)
Articles of Confederation clause, 540
and collateral attack, 441
and comity, 447, 2019
jurisdiction, 1500
Nevada-domiciled divorces, 799
Fundamental interests, 1172–1173
Brown v. Board of Education, 2309–2310 constitutional justification, 1505 education as, 2309, 2309–2310, 2310
and fundamental law, 1175
involuntary sterilization, 2528
litigation strategy, 1632
marriage as, 1671, 2943
as preferred freedoms, 1991
preventive detention, 2317
and privileges and immunities, 2020 reproduction autonomy, 2284, 2528
and strict scrutiny, 2562 voting rights as, 1401, 2228
welfare benefits, 742, 2408
See also Fundamental rights; Natural rights and the Constitution Fundamentalists and the Constitution. See Religious fundamentalism Fundamental law (history), 1173–1174
Bill of Rights (English), 174
and constitutional conventions, 514 and constitutional history before 1776, 529 as higher law, 1286–1289 law of the land as, 1571–1572
Locke's philosophy, 1639
Madison's respect for, 1658, 1659
Massachusetts Circular Letter, 1694 taxation without representation as violation, 2656 written constitution as, 84, 1173, 1174, 1419 Fundamental Laws of West New Jersey. See New Jersey Colonial Charters Fundamental law and the Supreme Court, 1174–1175
Constitution as basis, 1674
Fundamental Orders of Connecticut (1639), 1176
freedom of debate, 501 as genesis of written constitution, 1364
as social compact, 1303
Fundamental rights, 1176–1177
Cardozo definition, 1176, 1990
Court's definition of waiver, 1436

Fundamental rights (continued)
Courts' protective role, 655–657
Declaration of Independence on, 752–755 definitions, 1176, 1990, 2339 due process protection, 1176–1177, 1233 educational quality not seen as, 1974–1975, 1977
and Fourteenth Amendment, 1037 Frankfurter definition, 1176
habeas corpus, 1245, 1255
and incorporation doctrine, 1355
Insular cases dichotomy, 1176–1177
and international human rights, 1386–1388
as Jeffersonian constitutionalism element, 1423 loyalty oaths and, 2467
no benefits from violations of, 1157
Palko v. Connecticut, 1874
as preferred freedoms, 1990
and privileges and immunities, 1354
property linked with, 2051 reproductive autonomy, 2203, 2204 rights of accused persons and, 2744
same-sex marriage and, 2307, 2308
sex discrimination and, 2390, 2399
Slaughterhouse cases and, 2424 speedy trial as, 1539 voting as, 2879
Warren Court and, 1177
welfare aid not seen as, 2251, 2874–2875, 2879
See also Bill of Rights; Civil rights; First Amendment; Natural rights and the Constitution

G

Gag order, 1179–1180
abolitionist petitions, 2, 31, 560, 2425, 2884 constitutionality in murder case, 1789
and First Amendment, 1051, 2010
free press/fair trial, 1138, 1142, 1144, 1145, 1151, 1152, 1181, 2077
Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 1179, 1789, 2010
shield laws, 2413
Gag rule. See Civil liberties and the antislavery controversy; Freedom of petition; Slavery and the Constitution
Gambling, 1777, 1779, 2416
Puerto Rican statute, 1969
and right against self-incrimination, 1670
Gay rights. See Same-sex marriage; Sexual orientation; Sexual preference and the Constitution
Geary Act (1892), 128
Gender discrimination. See Sex discrimination Gender rights, 1185
abortion as, 5, 12–13, 14, 192 birth control as, 4, 182, 182–183 classification on basis of sex disallowed, 2921
in constitutional history, 2920–2921
difference and constitutional equality, 781–782
feminist theory, 1032–1033
feudal privileges, 1034, 1035
Fourteenth Amendment, 2477, 2918
freedom of contract equality, 36, 1112 Ginsburg cases, 1195, 1196–1197
judicial activism, 1448
male feudal privileges, 1034, 1035 married women's contract rights, 1112
Seneca Falls Convention, 2365–2366
single-sex education, 2417–2419 in Social Security benefits, 293
woman suffrage, 2917–2919
women's rights movement, nineteenth-century, 91–92
See also Equal rights amendment; Race and sex in antidiscrimination law; Reproductive autonomy; Sex discrimination
General Accounting Office, 261
General Appropriation Act (1907), 288
General Laws and Liberties of Massachusetts. See Massachusetts General Laws and Liberties
General warrant, 1185–1186
Fourth Amendment repudiation, 1092, 1098, 1099 historical background, 1098–1099
Paxton's case, 1888
Pitt and, 1912
probable cause, 2330
writ of assistance, 132, 1186
General welfare clause, 1186–1187
broad construction, 250
and federal grants-in-aid, 987
and federal power boundaries, 998 and inalienable police power, 283, 1350 as internal improvements basis, 1385 and public policy doctrine, 2076
supremacy clause and, 2587
Tennessee Valley Act, 2667
Genetic privacy. See DNA testing and genetic privacy Gerrymander, 1187–1188, 1188–1189 (update) census and control of, 326
electoral districting, 867, 869, 871
Fifteenth Amendment violation ruling, 1203
"incumbent survival," 2135 partisan, 1306, 2135
political question doctrine, 1952, 1953
racial, 392, 1188, 1783, 2093, 2136, 2137, 2814
as reapportionment result, 153, 2135, 2136
Global markets and the Constitution. See Multinational corporations, global markets, and the Constitution
Glorious Revolution (1688–1689), 175, 208, 1571–1572
Gold clause cases, 1201–1202
Court ruling, 2288
Gold Reserve Act, 1202–1203
necessary and proper clause, 1751
Gold Reserve Act (1934), 1202–1203
gold clause cases, 1201–1202
Good behavior, 1204
ensuring nonpartisan judiciary, 1948
as federal judicial tenure basis, 111, 1018, 1020, 1337–1338, 1454, 1456 judicial deviation as misdemeanor, 2284
public employees, 268
Good faith exception, 1204–1205
as exclusionary rule limitation, 2044
search and seizure, 2338
Government aid to religious institutions, 1206–1207, 1207–1208 (update 1), 1208–1209 (update 2)
Blaine Amendment prohibition, 197–198, 587
establishment clause, 924
invidious discrimination, 1048
Lemon test, 1602–1604
loan of state-purchased textbooks, 202
Mueller v. Allen, 1763
neutrality vs. separationist view, 2294 on-site special education services in sectarian schools, 61, 63, 2179 religion as "viewpoint" decision, 1559–1560 school choice and, 2321
secular instruction materials, 1604 secular purposes requirement, 1601–1602
separation of church and state, 2376, 2378

specifically created school district for special education children, 202, 927, 2179–2180 tax deductions for expenses, 1763 taxpayer suit standing, 1066, 2777
textbook loans to racially discriminative private schools, 2017
tuition grants, 2738–2739
vouchers, 1208, 2814–2815
Walz v. Tax Commission, 2833
Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind, 2916–2917
Wolman v. Walter, 2917
See also Religion in public schools Government arts funding. See Government speech Government as proprietor, 1209–1214
Government by Judiciary (Boudin), 212
Government employees. See Public employees Government instrumentality, 1214
Government regulation of the economy. See Economic regulation Government secrecy, 1214–1215
and First Amendment, 1257
Freedom of Information Act, 1117–1118, 1215
right to know, 2271–2272
See also Free press/fair trial
Government speech, 1215–1217
Board of Education v. Pico, 202, 1216 as constitutional puzzle, 202
Epperson v. Arkansas, 906
and freedom of speech, 1131, 1136
and minor political parties, 257, 1216
Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 1915
and privacy rights, 2244
and public forum, 2070
Government wrongs, 1217–1218
Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act (1985), 1219
balanced-budget amendment, 618
constitutionality challenges, 214, 615
as deficit reduction measure, 262
Scalia unconstitutionality opinion, 2313
Grandfather clause, 1219–1220
Fifteenth Amendment application, 2900
Gunn v. United States invalidation, 1219 literacy test exemptions, 129, 392, 1242, 1629, 2808
Grand jury, 1220–1222, 1222–1224 (update)
exclusionary rule, 290
felony, 1031
Fifth Amendment guarantee, 1091, 1222 and illegal electronic surveillance evidence, 1184 immunized testimony, 989, 1221, 1335, 1526, 1527 indictment, 1361–1362, 2256, 2258 indictment arrest warrant, 121 indictment excluded from incorporation doctrine, 1356
judicial review, 1222–1223 juror racial discrimination, 1510–1511
presentment, 1991
refusal to testify, 2747
reporter's privilege, 226–227, 1051, 1438, 2200 secrecy, 1222–1223
single judge as, 1849
state constitutional law, 2496 witness immunity grants, 989, 1526, 1527
Granger cases, 1224–1225
affected with a public interest, 52, 53, 1224, 2823
Grants-in-aid. See Federal grants-in-aid
Great Compromise, 1228
bicameralism arrangement, 172
and Constitutional Convention of 1787, 521, 543 federalism and shared powers, 1011
Gerry role, 1187
House of Representatives provision, 1305
Johnson (William Samuel) role, 1433
Paterson's role, 1882
Senate provision, 1305, 2358
Sherman's introduction of, 2412
three-fifths clause, 2700
Great Depression
Bankruptcy Act, 160 budget and fiscal policy, 262 commerce clause use, 2481
Fair Labor Standards Act, 967
farm bankruptcy acts, 1105
Hughes Court, 1311
invalidated legislation, 127–128 public programs, 40
public purpose doctrine, 2075–2076
state debtor relief, 1300–1301
Sutherland's obiter dictum on social legislation, 2882
See also New Deal
Greenback Act (1862), 417
Greenback issuance. See Legal tender cases
Grounds of opinion, 1235
Group conflict and the Constitution. See National unity, group conflict, and the Constitution Group libel, 1235–1236
Beauharnais v. Illinois, 167, 1235, 1236 excluded from First Amendment, 167
and freedom of speech, 1130
Groups and the Constitution, 1236–1238
amicus curiae, 89
class action suits, 422 guilt by association, 1241–1242
interest group litigation, 1378–1379
See also Freedom of assembly and association; Freedom of association
Growth of American Law, The: The Law Makers (Hurst), 1321
Growth of the American Republic, The (Commager), 447 Guarantee clause, 1238–1239, 1239 (update) initiative and referendum challenges under, 789, 1238–1239, 1372 legitimacy of state government, 1652
republican form of government, 2209
Guilt by association, 1241–1242
Hughes's argument against, 1241 individual rights restrictions, 1236–1237
Gulf of Tonkin Resolution (1964), 1242
Vietnam War, 2789, 2790
Gulf War, 1242–1243
Bush conduct of, 281, 282, 1242, 2002, 2043
Clinton actions in postwar period, 2002–2003
Gun control, 1243–1244 background checks on prospective handgun purchasers, 624 federal criminal prosecution, 1570–1571
gun-free school zones, 1570–1571, 1642–1643
López, United States v., 624, 1570–1571, 1642–1643
radical Populist constitutional interpretation vs., 2113–2114
Second Amendment arguments, 2113–2114, 2250, 2347
Gun-Free School Zones Act (1990), 1570, 1642–1643

H

Habeas corpus, 1245–1252, 1252–1253 (update 1), 1254–1255 (update 2)
abstention doctrine, 18

Habeas corpus (continued)
access to the courts, 23
adequate state grounds, 35, 2821
Antiterrorism Act restrictions on, 103, 1254–1255, 1503, 1504 appeals, 1701
Brown v. Allen, 1250
capital punishment, 302, 305, 306–307
in capital punishment review, 1254–1255
Chase Court and, 338, 339
and Civil Rights Act of 1866, 402
and collateral attack, 441, 442
as constitutional remedy, 651, 652, 653 in criminal procedural due process, 1100–1101 and excessive bail, 148, 175 federal court power to try facts anew, 975
federal question jurisdiction, 1495
Force Acts suspension of, 1070
Fourth Amendment and, 2320
Frankfurter commentary, 1245 fugitive slaves and, 2417
as fundamental interest, 1172
legislation, 1255–1256
Lincoln suspension of, 181, 416, 572
Merryman, Ex parte, 2841
Milligan, Ex parte, 1246, 1247
Penry v. Lynaugh, 1895
and personal liberty laws, 1901 prisoner claims for, 654, 1434, 2547–2548 as privilege, 2241, 2251
Quirin, Ex parte, 2085
scope of, 1252–1253, 2044
Slaughterhouse cases, 2424
state criminal process through, 1757 subversive advocacy and, 2580 waiver of rights, 2831
war powers, 2840
written law as basis of federal court power of, 207
Habeas Corpus Act of 1679, 1255
application in colonies, 1456
bail, 148, 175
as statute, 84
Habeas Corpus Act of 1863, 1256
and Union internal security policy, 572
Habeas Corpus Act of 1867, 1267
and constitutional remedies, 652
federal courts' writs for state prisoners, 1248, 1254
Harassment. See Hate speech; Sex discrimination; Workplace harassment and the First Amendment Harmless error, 1270–1271, 1271 (update) limitation in appeal, 2045
Harrison Act (1914), 1274
as national police power, 804, 1567
upheld, 804
Hartford Convention, 1274–1275
Adams (John Quincy) essay on, 30
New England state secession advocates, 2480 three-fifths clause abrogation demand, 2700 and War of 1812, 1017
Hatch Act (1940), 1275
political activity prohibitions, 268 relaxation of, 2845
right-privilege distinction, 2252
Hate crimes, 1275–1277
speech vs. conduct distinction, 1276, 2914
Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 2913–2914
Hate speech, 1277–1279
bias-motivated conduct vs., 1276 definition and characterization, 1056–1057
and freedom of speech, 1127–1128
group libel and, 1235–1236 overbreadth of legislation, 2123
R. A. V. v. City of St. Paul, 2123–2124, 2913–2914, 2926 regulation efforts, 470
workplace harassment, 2926
Hawaiian sovereignty. See Native Hawaiian sovereignty movements
Health Insurance for the Aged Act (Medicare) (1965), 1281
Health violations. See Administrative search Hearing. See Fair hearing; Rehearing Hearsay rule, 1282
of co-conspirators, 708 compulsory process right, 480 confrontation right, 492 credible, 2330 evidence, 933–934
and fair trial, 971
grand jury indictment, 1362
informant's tip, 1327
probable cause, 818
Hepburn Act (1906), 1284–1285
as Interstate Commerce Act supplement, 1397, 1398
Roosevelt (Theodore) proposal, 2292
Higher law, 1286–1289
as attack on writ of assistance, 1099 and contract clause, 1067–1068
as Declaration of Independence basis, 754, 1174, 1286 inherent power distinguished from, 1370–1371
law of the land as, 1571
as legislative power limitation, 1596
Loan Association v. Topeka, 1636
New Right opposition, 1801 philosophy of, 262, 1286–1287
slavery and, 2389
Terrett v. Taylor, 1636
vested rights and, 290
written constitutions as, 1174, 1474
History in constitutional argumentation, 1290–1292
Bill of Rights application, 1353
and interpretivism, 1394
Wisconsin school of legal history, 1321
History of the United States During the Administrations of Jefferson and Madison (Adams), 26 Holding, 1294
campaign finance, 296
and common law, 465
stare decisis, 2477
Holmes and free speech, 1046, 1047, 1050, 1296, 1298–1300
Homelessness and the Constitution, 1301–1302 judicial scrutiny of mental illness and, 1720 Homestead Act (1862), 1302
and Civil War economy, 417
Homosexuality. See Same-sex marriage; Sexual orientation; Sexual preference and the Constitution Hostile audience, 1304–1305
and breach of the peace, 228 and demonstration rights, 768 and free speech restriction, 1055
Hot pursuit. See Exigent circumstances search Hours of work legislation. See Adamson Eight-Hour Act; Maximum hours and minimum wages legislation House Committee on Un-American Activities, 1305 activities of, 605
bill of attainder, 1645
contempt conviction upheld, 162–163 Dies Committee as forerunner, 780 permanent committee status conferred on, 604 House of Representatives, 1305–1307 abolitionist petitions gag order, 560, 2425
apportionment, 172

constitutional amendment proposals, 76
in constitutional history, 1789–1801, 546
Dies Committee, 780
District of Columbia limited-voting delegate, 797 exclusive powers, 1307
First Congress, 1058
first members elected to, 319 impeachment articles of Andrew Johnson, 126, 1429 impeachment articles of Richard Nixon, 126–127 impeachment articles of William J. Clinton, 127, 1360 impeachment of federal judges, 1454 impeachment power, 111, 1307, 1336, 1340 investigative powers, 1594
joint Iran-Contra hearings, 1401–1403
legislative process, 1597–1599 member qualifications, 500, 1306 members' official immunity, 1335 and presidential tied vote, 1934
Speaker authority, 589
Speaker in presidential succession, 2002
Speaker qualifications, 1307 speech or debate clause, 2464
supermajority rules, 2585
and three-fifths clause, 2700 vacancy special-election requirement, 1307
Wilson's (James) founding influence, 2909–2910
Housing. See Open housing laws; Residential segregation; Restrictive covenant Housing and Rent Act (1947), 603
HUAC. See House Committee on Un-American Activities
Hughes Court, 1312–1318
civil liberties, 1311
Great Depression, 1311
New Deal, 1312–1318
Human body. See Body search; Property rights and the human body; Reproductive autonomy
Human life. See Person
Human Life Statute, 92
Human rights. See Fundamental rights; International human rights; Natural rights and the Constitution
Hyde Amendment, 1324
ban on Medicaid-funded abortion, 6, 7, 2205–2206

I

ICC. See Interstate Commerce Commission
IIRAIRA. See Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act Illegal aliens. See Alien; Immigration and alienage Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act (1996), 1235 and Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, 103 government benefits distinctions, 1332 legislative veto question, 1333
Illegitimacy, 1325–1327
as discrimination basis, 1824
and equal protection, 1122, 1558
and freedom of intimate association, 1122
fundamental interests, 1173 heightened scrutiny, 1605, 1606
immigration law, 1331
as invidious discrimination, 1401
Levy v. Louisiana, 1401
standard of review, 1326, 1605–1606
as suspect classification, 2732
See also Nonmarital children
Immigration and alienage, 1328–1330, 1330–1332 (update), 1332–1333 (update)
Alien and Sedition Acts, 67
Alien Registration Act, 68
alien status, 65–66
alien suffrage, 68–69
amnesty for resident aliens, 1333 Antiterrorism Act deportation provisions, 103
birthright citizenship, 183
Chinese Exclusion Act, 128, 1328, 1330
citizenship and, 368
discrete and insular minorities, 794 equal protection for undocumented aliens, 1920
expatriation, 956–957
Fuller Court and, 1167
head tax upheld, 1328–1329
Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act, 1325, 1332
Immigration Act quotas, 595
Immigration Reform and Control Act, 1333
legislative veto, 1333
literacy test, 1329
nativism, 1328–1329
race-based restrictions, 128, 1328–1329
as suspect classification, 66, 72 terrorism control, 2674
visas, 2801–2802
See also Asian Americans and the Constitution; Asian immigrants and constitutional history Immigration and Nationality Act (1952)
denaturalization, 768
deportation grounds, 770–771
Immigration Reform and Control Act (1986), 1333
Immunities. See Privileges and immunities Immunity. See Executive immunity; Immunity of public officials; Intergovernmental immunity; Judicial immunity; Legislative immunity; Presidential immunity: Sovereign immunity; Speech or debate clause; State immunity from federal law Immunity grant (self-incrimination), 1334–1335 and compulsory process right, 480
Counselman v. Hitchcock, 694–695
Federal Immunity Act, 989
grand jury, 989, 1221, 1335, 1526, 1527
and right against self-incrimination, 2237
supplanting Fifth Amendment right, 257, 1526
use immunity, 1526–1527
Immunity of public officials, 1335–1336 civil liability and unofficial presidential acts, 625
Stevens's views, 2537
waiver for unofficial communication, 1324 Impeachment, 1336–1340, 1340–1343 (update)
articles of impeachment of Andrew Johnson, 110, 126, 139, 181, 288, 579, 1339, 1340, 1429, 2476, 2669, 2751
articles of impeachment of Richard M. Nixon, 126–127, 338, 609, 1339, 1341, 2865 articles of impeachment of William J. Clinton, 127, 431, 433–434, 625, 1340, 1341–1342, 1360 censure by Senate vs., 1342 as checks and balances power, 342
Chief Justice as presiding officer, 346, 1340, 1343

Impeachment (continued)
executive privilege, 953
grounds for removal, 1336
House of Representatives role, 111, 1307, 1336, 1340 independent counsel (special prosecutor) and, 1360, 2463
judicial, 111, 337, 552, 1020, 1337–1341, 1454, 1456, 1669, 1684, 1953, 2763 legislative supremacy in, 1945 recall vs., 2141
Senate trial, 1336, 1340, 1953, 2360, 2363 special prosecutor (independent counsel) and, 1630, 2463
Imperial Presidency (Schlesinger), 1996
Implied constitutional rights of action, 1343–1344
Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 185, 1344
damages claims, 740–741, 1344
Rehnquist Court and, 2162–2163
violations by federal officials, 185
Young, Ex parte, 1343–1344
Implied powers, 1344–1348
Bank of the United States Acts, 159–160, 160, 250, 1259, 1461, 2861
broad construction, 250, 1345, 1707
Court's substantive interpretations, 1445
executive power, 947
and federalism, 1006
incidental, 1346–1347
and inherent powers, 1344, 1346, 1370
Jeffersonian rejection of concept, 1425
and living Constitution, 1633
Madison's theory of, 539
Marshall (John) on, 900
McCulloch v. Maryland, 744, 1461, 1633, 1685, 1706–1707
monetary, 1751–1754
supremacy clause, 2587
Tenth Amendment, 1011
Waite Court and, 2825
See also Enumerated powers
Import-export clause, 1348–1349
original package doctrine, 1864
state property tax, 1725 state violation, 256
Impost, 1349
definition, 1349
import-export clause, 1348–1349
original package doctrine, 1864
See also Excise tax; State taxation of commerce Impoundment of funds, 1349–1350
balanced-budget amendment as justifying, 154 Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act, 498–499, 610, 1349 congressional control over, 266 and delegation of power, 1999
executive power, 948
as Nixon policy, 610
Inalienable police power, 1350
backing claims against commerce clause, 1350
Boston Beer Company v. Massachusetts, 211–212 primacy over vested rights claim, 283, 1350 Incidental burdens on constitutional rights, 1350–1351
and religious liberty, 2181–2182
Incitement to unlawful conduct, 1351–1353
bad tendency test, 146, 1646
clear and present danger rule, 770, 1198, 1352 freedom to advocate ideas vs., 1538
hate speech, 1278
Herndon v. Lowry, 1285–1286
Holmes's Gitlow dissent, 1198–1199
as low First Amendment value, 1056, 1646–1647
Schenck v. United States, 1352
vagueness doctrine, 1285–1286
Income tax. See Direct and indirect taxes; Sixteenth Amendment
Incorporation doctrine, 1353–1356
Bill of Rights and Fourteenth Amendment, 33, 178–180, 186, 197, 760, 814, 815, 1005, 1045, 1051, 1086, 1091–1092, 1353
Black applications, 185–186, 814–815, 1086, 1355, 2037, 2038
Cardozo's hierarchy of rights, 1990
civil liberties and, 2310–2311
and criminal procedural due process, 710, 1355, 1615, 1666, 2039, 2039–2040
Douglas application, 814–815 and due process clauses of Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment, 2042–2045 earliest judicial rejection, 2832
and federalism, 1008
Field theory, 1036–1038, 1354
Fourth Amendment rights, 2917
Frankfurter-Black debate on, 33, 1101–1102 of freedom of assembly, 760 of freedom of speech, 760, 1046, 1788, 2186
Gitlow v. New York, 1198, 1354, 2186, 2310
Harlan (1833–1911) theory, 1267
Harlan (1899–1911) theory, 1269
Holmes's dissent, 1300 and judiciary policymaking, 1462
and just compensation, 2130
Near v. Minnesota as adoption of, 1788
Palko v. Connecticut, 1355, 1874, 1990, 2293
privileges and immunities, 2021
rationalization of rights incorporated, 1355
Sanford acknowledgement of, 2310–2311
Second Amendment status, 1243 selective, 1462, 2038–2045, 2293, 2856
trial by jury, 830
and Warren Court, 169–170, 380, 715
Incorporation doctrine and original intent, 1356–1358
Incorporation of territories, 1358
insular cases, 1376
Indecent speech. See Low-value speech
Independence of judiciary. See Judicial independence Independent counsel, 1358–1360, 1360–1361 (update) congressional creation of office, 115, 620
executive privilege, 954
impeachment articles of William J. Clinton, 127, 625 investigation of Clinton administration, 1360–1361
See also Special prosecutor
Independent state grounds. See Adequate state grounds
Indian Bill of Rights (1968), 2365
Indian Civil Rights Act (1968), 80–81, 82, 607
Indian tribes. See American Indians and the Constitution; Tribal Economic Development and the Constitution Indictment, 1361–1362
as accusation notice, 2258
arrest warrant, 121
executive privilege, 954
felony, 1361–1362, 1369
grand jury, 1220, 1221, 1222
impeachable offense vs., 1336, 1337, 1429 incorporation doctrine exclusion, 1356
law of the land, 828

presentment, 1991
as right of criminally accused, 2256
right to counsel prior to, 1538, 2263–2264 Indigent, 1362–1363
abortion funding restriction, 1272–1273, 1324, 1974
access to the courts, 204, 380, 799, 817, 1231–1232, 2877, 2879
Criminal Justice Act, 709
Edwards v. California, 861, 2878
equal protection rights, 817 homelessness, 1301–1302
in forma pauperis, 1368–1369 insanity defense right, 1719 poverty law, 1972–1975
public interest law, 2071
rights of criminally accused, 2255
right to counsel, 709, 971, 1031, 1083, 1193–1194, 1462, 1973, 2260, 2262–2263, 2265, 2877 right to counsel limitation, 2295 school finance, 2309–2310
Social Security Act, 2445
subpoena use, 2567
welfare rights, 2252, 2874–2875
welfare state, 2877–2871
See also Wealth discrimination
Indirect taxes. See Direct and indirect taxes Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), 723, 1954, 1955, 2580
Inevitable discovery, 2338
Infamy, 1363
Influence of the American Constitution abroad, 1363–1366, 1366–1368 (update) international human rights, 1386–1388, 1389
Informant's tip, 1368
from electronic eavesdropping, 2896–2897
Jencks Act, 1426
and probable cause, 2024, 2469
as search warrant basis, 1327, 1368, 2024, 2469
stop and frisk, 2552
In forma pauperis, 1368–1369
Gideon v. Wainwright, 1193, 1369
Information, 1369
Freedom of Information Act, 1117–1118
government secrecy vs. right to, 1214–1215
See also Marketplace of ideas; Right to know Inherent powers, 1370–1371
abstention doctrine, 18
executive electronic surveillance claim, 2761–2762
and implied powers, 1344, 1346, 1370
of President, 1996, 2841
sovereignty and, 1006
and steel mill seizure, 2839
Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 2839
Inherited hierarchy. See Feudalism and the Constitution Initiative, 1371, 1371–1372 (update) campaign finance and, 295, 297
deliberative democracy vs., 763–764
as direct democracy, 785, 787–788, 1371–1372
as direct legislation, 788 guarantee clause challenges, 789, 1238, 1239, 1372 paid circulators disallowed, 1939 physician-assisted suicide, 2270–2271 proposed jurisdictional reform, 1504 for state encouragement of private discrimination, 2170–2171
See also Referendum Injunction, 1372–1373
abstention doctrine, 20, 1373 against labor, 750–751, 831, 1192, 1373, 1545, 1547, 1553, 1555–1556, 1641, 1825, 2757 against picketing, 1192, 1373, 1547, 2733 against publication, 1788, 1806, 2009 against sale of allegedly obscene materials, 1538 against same-sex marriage, 147
anti-abortion protests, 94
Cherokee Indian Cases, 344
civil rights demonstration, 2832
Clayton Act, 831
and constitutional remedies, 652
and contempt power, 670
criminal syndicalism laws, 2940–2941 as curb on governmental official future constitutional violations, 740 expressive activity, 319 by federal court against state action, 1343–1344, 1493, 1750, 2940
final judgment rule, 1044
free press/fair trial issues, 1140, 1145, 1150–1151, 2077 in institutional litigation, 1373, 1374
jurisdiction, 1500
justiciability, 1520
national security, 1140, 1145
as offensive assertion of federal right, 1343–1344
Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 740 three-judge court approval, 1499 as yellow dog contract enforcement, 1292
Young, Ex parte, 1373, 2940
zoning, 2945
See also Gag order
In personam, 1734–1735
In re, 1374
In rem, 1374
Insanity defense. See Mental illness and the Constitution Inspections. See Administrative search
Institutes (Coke), 439–440
Institutional litigation, 1374–1375
Burger Court and, 275–276, 2280
doctrinal formula, 801
injunctive relief, 1373, 1374
pattern of official treatment, 2280
prisoners' rights, 2011–2012
residential segregation, 2221
school desegregation, 1231
See also Public law litigation
Insular cases, 1375–1376
federalism issue, 1169
Fuller dissent, 1161 fundamental rights dichotomy, 1176–1177
status of territories, 1358, 1376
Insularity. See Judicial independence Integration. See Desegregation; Segregation
Integration of the federal government. See Executive Orders 9980 and 9981 Intellectual property law and the First Amendment, 1377–1378
copyright, 685–686
patent, 1882
Intelligence Identities Protection Act (1982), 1140 Intent. See Original intent; Ratifier intent
Interest group litigation, 1378–1380
as constitutionally protected political activity, 1773 denial of standing, 1651 test case legality, 1773 Interest groups, 1380–1382
and Bork nomination, 1393
and economic due process, 840–841
and federalism, 1006, 1956–1957
and Japanese American internment, 1415–1416
public choice theory, 2063–2064
statutory interpretation, 2525 sustaining separation of powers, 1947 and term limits, 2669

Intergovernmental immunity, 1382–1383
dual federalism, 827
Stone's views, 2544
Intergovernmental tax immunities, 1383–1384
Graves v. New York ex rel. O'Keefe, 1226, 1384
Weston v. City Council of Charleston, 2882
Interlocutory, 1385
final judgment rule, 1044, 1385
Internal commerce. See Intrastate commerce
Internal improvements, 1385
American System, 88, 1385
broad construction justifying, 30, 250
Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge Company, 331–333
Jacksonian opposition, 1408, 1412, 1413
Maysville Road Bill, 1700–1701
spending power and, 2468
Internal Revenue Act (1862), 2539
Internal security. See Loyalty oath; Loyalty-security program; Subversive activity; Subversive advocacy
Internal Security Act (1950), 1385–1386, 1950
passage over Truman veto, 604–605, 1702
Subversive Activities Control Board, 2578
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1388
International Emergency Economic Powers Act (1977), 1386
International human rights, 1386–1389
treaty ratification and federal-state relations, 1390 International law and federal-state relations, 1389–1390
citizenship and, 368
executive branch deficiencies, 71, 1390
International trade. See Foreign commerce
Internet and freedom of speech, 1391–1392
Columbine High School shootings, 1154
Communications Decency Act, 471
Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 1148 Internet and freedom of speech.
indecent speech prohibition, 1057
Interposition, 1392
as Brown v. Board of Education reaction, 2458 Madison's opposition to, 1659
secession and, 2346
South Carolina ordinance of secession and, 2457
Webster-Hayne debates of 1830, 559
Interpretation, constitutional. See Constitutional interpretation Interpretivism, 1393–1396
counterpart to, 1820
judicial review, 1477–1478, 1480
and originalism, 1860–1861
Interstate comity. See Full faith and credit; Privileges and immunities
Interstate commerce, 1396
Adamson Eight-Hour Act, 33, 2912
agricultural production, 62, 63
Americans with Disabilities Act, 87
bituminous coal regulation, 184
Chase Court decision, 341
child labor and, 349, 1528, 2048
Child Support Recovery Act and, 354
and civil rights, 392
Civil Rights Act of 1964, 95, 405 competition in, 1739 congressional regulatory power, 750, 1261–1262, 1570–1571
definition, 2513
discrimination against, 2514, 2515 and dormant commerce clause, 805, 806
drug regulation, 821, 822, 823, 1274
economic factors, 850
effects on commerce, 861
Employers' Liability Acts, 893, 2899
employers' liability cases, 893
environmental regulation, 904, 1320, 2564–2565, 2864
Erdman Act, 920
Fair Labor Standards Act, 966, 1315, 1539, 1548, 2046
Federal Bureau of Investigation duties, 976 federal criminal jurisdiction, 1567, 1568, 1570–1571 federal protective powers, 750–751
Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, 1069
and fugitive from justice, 1159
Gun-Free School Zones Act, 1642–1643
Hepburn Act, 1284–1285
Hughes Court and, 1314–1315
import-export clause, 1348, 1349 insurance as, 2458 internal improvements and, 1385
Interstate Commerce Act, 1396–1397
intrastate rates competition, 1308 and labor union activity, 25, 167, 1561, 1641–1642
least restrictive means test, 1573
license cases, 1617
local environmental regulation, 1320
Mann Act, 1666
Mann Act sustained, 1294, 2899 minimum wage regulation, 743–744, 1315 national police powers, 1261–1262, 1294, 1777–1779 noxious products doctrine, 1830
original package doctrine, 256, 1348, 1612, 1617, 1864–1865, 2923
Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 1877
Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 1896
Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. v. Pennsylvania, 1904 privileges and immunities, 2020 production distinction, 1536, 1539–1540
Pure Food and Drug Act, 1290, 2083–2084, 2899
railroads and, 584
rational basis standard of review, 2122
regulatory agency, 1396–1397, 2147 restraint of, 2757
and securities law, 2350 segregation disallowance, 1257, 2063
separate but equal doctrine, 1645 service and maintenance employees coverage, 1539 slave trade, 1238
Southern Pacific Co. v. Arizona, 2458–2459 state discrimination based on proprietary prerogative, 1212 state highway regulation as unconstitutional, 2124 state liquor prohibition statutes, 1601 state regulation limitations, 750, 1189–1192, 2060, 2512, 2516
state taxation of commerce, 2521
Stone Court and, 2549
stream of commerce doctrine, 2559
subjects of commerce, 2565
Sugar Trust Case, 1539–1540, 1642
Sunday closing laws, 2584
Taney Court and, 2652
waste disposal across state line, 2864
Whig constitutional nationalism, 2885
White Court and, 2899
See also Excise tax; Interstate compact; Intrastate commerce

Interstate Commerce Act (1887), 1396–1397
and administrative law, 1001
and commerce clause, 455
long haul/short haul provision, 1642 and national railroad regulation, 584
Water Power Act, 2866
Interstate Commerce Commission
creation of, 1397, 2147
denial of rate-setting authority, 1397–1398
Mann-Elkins Act, 1666
and quasi-judicial bodies, 1464 and railroads, 1709 rate-making powers, 1285 regulatory activities, 2049
Interstate compact, 1398–1399 contract clause extension, 1228 proprietary adjustments, 1212–1213
sovereignty and, 2461
Interstate travel. See Right to travel Intimate association. See Freedom of intimate association Intolerable Acts. See First Continental Congress, Declaration and Resolves of Intrastate commerce, 1399
and commerce clause, 1396
exempted from Interstate Commerce Act, 1397 federal regulation, 2415–2416 interstate rates competition, 1308
Minnesota rate cases, 1739–1740, 2899
regulation validity, 744 reserved to state governance, 1191 segregation upheld, 1918
Shreveport doctrine, 2415–2416
state regulation of commerce, 2513
state taxation of commerce, 2521
stream of commerce doctrine, 2559
Invalid on its face, 1399–1400
chilling effect, 354
municipal ordinance, 1645
Invasion of privacy. See Right of privacy Inverse condemnation, 1400–1401
just compensation, 2643
Investigative power. See Legislative investigation
Investment Advisers Act (1940), 2351
Invidious discrimination, 1401
benign racial classification vs., 794 Douglas's use of term, 1401
and establishment of religion, 1048
Field's first impression decision, 1038
Ho Ah Kow v. Nunan, 1038
residential segregation, 2219
Involuntary servitude. See Peonage; Slavery and the Constitution
Iran-Contra affair, 1401–1403
Boland Amendment, 206, 2128
Bush comment on, 281
executive prerogative, 950
independent counsel investigation, 1361 and presidential and congressional powers in foreign policy, 621–622
Reagan presidency and, 2128
Senate and, 2360
Iranian Hostages Agreement, 741, 1078
Irrebuttable presumption, 1404–1405
mandatory maternity leave, 430
Item veto. See Line-item veto

J

Jacksonianism, 1411–1413
and judicial review, 1474–1475
and judicial supremacy, 1583–1584 Marshall (John's) dislike of, 1675 as Polk political theme, 1958
Whig Party opposition, 2884
Jackson's Proclamation to the People of South Carolina, 1413–1414
as nationalistic, 1408, 1409
Jackson's veto of the Bank of the United States Bill, 1414 based on presidential independency doctrine, 1408 based on separation of powers, 160 based on states' rights, 1412
Taney contribution, 2647
Japanese American cases (1943–1944), 1415–1417
and alien subversion fears, 65
as civil liberties infringement, 2841
constitutionality challenges, 129–130, 131, 1247, 2930–2931 constitutional significance, 132
executive order, 944, 945, 2290
as guilt by association, 1237, 1241
habeas corpus suspension, 1247 and presidential war powers, 1998, 2839 state of war rationale, 2505
Stone Court and, 2550
and war powers, 2841, 2842, 2930–2931
Japanese American relocation. See Executive Order 9066 and Public Law 503; Japanese American cases Japanese Americans. See Asian Americans and the Constitution; Asian immigrants and constitutional history; Japanese American cases
Jay Court. See Supreme Court, 1789–1801
Jay's Treaty, 1417, 1419
constitutional debate, 548–549 treaty power issues, 1259–1260, 2834, 2861–2862
Jeffersonianism, 1423–1425
Adams (John) conflicts with, 29
and judicial review, 1474–1475
Madison's defense of, 1658–1659
Marshall's (John) dislike of, 1675 repeal of Federalist Judiciary Act of 1801, 1422, 1498
See also Anti-Federalist constitutional thought Jehovah's Witnesses cases
blood transfusion, 2191
door-to-door pamphlet distribution, 1410–1411 flag salute refusal, 1065–1066, 2186, 2188
free speech basis, 2186, 2188 minors' street sale of merchandise, 2008 religion and free speech, 2172–2173, 2188
and religious liberty, 2188–2189, 2192
religious use of state property, 2198
Jencks Act (1957), 1426
Jim Crow. See Black Codes: Segregation; Separate but equal doctrine
Joint Committee on Reconstruction, 1436
Fourteenth Amendment framing, 1085
Joint resolutions, 1436–1437
annexation of Texas, 90
international agreement approval, 1992
See also Concurrent resolution Journalistic practices, tort liability, and the freedom of the press, 1438–1439
Food Lion, Inc. v. American Broadcasting Co. (ABC), 1069
See also Free press/fair trial
Journalists and the Supreme Court, 1439–1441
Judges' Bill (1925), 1490
Judgment, 1442
decision, 752
full faith and credit, 1170, 1171–1172
stay of execution, 2526
See also Final judgment rule; Habeas corpus; Res judicata

Judicial activism and judicial restraint, 1442–1449, 1449–1450 (update) in abortion decisions, 5, 11 activism's rise in late nineteenth century, 582–583 affected with a public interest, 53 areas of, 1447–1448
avoidance doctrine, 142
Blackmun approach, 192
as Bork nomination issue, 2127
Brandeis approach, 2313
Chase Court, 338
civil liberties, 383–384
conservative agenda, 776
equal protection of the laws, 910
Field's activism, 1035–1036
Frankfurter approach, 1101, 1450, 1458, 2313
Fuller approach, 1161
Hand (Augustus and Learned) restraint philosophies, 1263 hidden, 2325
Holmes's restraint, 1296, 1446
interpretivism, 1393–1394, 1395, 1480
judicial interpretive/noninterpretive review, 1477–1478 judicial legislation, 1458, 1459–1460
judicial policymaking, 1460–1463
judicial role, 1482–1485
and living constitution, 1632–1634
Marbury v. Madison, 1444–1445
Marshall approach, 1445
and original intent, 2127–2128
and particularism, 1197
and political philosophy of the Constitution, 1945 procedural vs. substantive, 1444–1446, 1450 restraint in wealth discrimination cases, 2869–2870 and social legislation, 2882
and standing, 2473
Taft approach, 2314
Thayer's rule, 1446, 1449
Thomas approach, 2695
Warren Court, 2853, 2857–2858
Warren Court vs. Burger Court, 272, 274, 277
See also Constitutional theory
Judicial appointments. See Appointment of Supreme Court justices; Confirmation process; Federal judicial appointments, tenure, and independence; Senate and judicial appointments
Judicial Code, 1451
abolishment of circuit courts, 361
amendment (1937), 1499
Judicial collegiality, 1451–1452
Judicial conference of the United States, 1452–1453
Chief Justice as presiding officer, 347
Judicial contempt power. See Contempt power, judicial Judicial immunity, 1453–1454
Butz v. Economou, 285
Court cases upholding, 1335
sterilization cases, 2565 Judicial impeachment, 1454–1455
Chase acquittal, 1339, 1340
as congressional process, 1340 historical debate, 1337–1339
Marbury v. Madison, 1669, 1684
Nixon v. United States, 1953 offenses, 1341 political elements, 1456
Judicial independence, 1455–1457
federal appointments and tenure, 1017, 1019–1020, 1463
and good behavior, 1204, 1948
Jay's advocacy, 1418
Jefferson's advocacy, 1422
as judicial appointment/confirmation criteria, 50–51 and political question avoidance, 1950–1951
and separation of powers, 1418
See also Federal judicial appointments, tenure, and independence Judicial legislation, 1457–1460
Baker v. Carr, 1458
Bork's views on, 210
Brown v. Board of Education, 1458, 1471
Cooper v. Aaron, 1458
Gideon v. Wainwright, 1458
judicial policymaking, 1460–1463
and statutory interpretation, 1459 taxpayer spending challenges, 1464–1465
Judicial policymaking, 1460–1463
double jeopardy, 808
and interpretivism, 1480
and judicial power, 1471
and political question doctrine, 1951–1952
rule of reason, 2298
See also Judicial legislation
Judicial power, 1463–1470
admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, 44–45, 1466–1467 antidisability discrimination legislation, 791 Anti-Federalist view of, 102
as apolitical, 1950–1951
appellate jurisdiction, 108–109
Article III specifications, 122, 979, 1463–1464, 1465, 1489
cases and controversies, 322, 1464–1467
civil liberties and civil rights, 380 congressional transfer of jurisdiction, 1827–1828 constitutional court jurisdiction, 523 as distinct from legislative power, 1596, 1597
diversity jurisdiction, 798–799
economic due process, 839
federal civil rights enforcement, 1007 as federalism check, 995, 996–997
federal judicial role, 1020–1023
federal judicial system, 1489–1498
federal question jurisdiction, 653, 1027–1028
Flast v. Cohen landmark decision, 1066–1067, 1465
and foreign affairs, 1071
judicial legislation, 1458–1460
Judiciary Act of 1789, 1495–1496
justiciability, 1519–1521
legitimacy debates, 1472
and local government, 1638
Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 1466 overstepped constitutional bounds, 1479–1480
Peters and, 1902
substantive due process and, 2577
Warren Court expansive view of, 2714
See also Federal judicial appointments, tenure, and independence; Judicial activism and judicial restraint; Judicial review Judicial power and legislative remedies, 1470–1472
Judicial Reform Act (1998), 1504
Judicial restraint. See Judicial activism and judicial restraint
Judicial review, 1472–1478
of abortion rights, 2285–2286
abstention doctrine, 19
of academic freedom, 22
Ackerman's dualist theory of, 524 of administrative acts, 1481–1482 alien deportation limitations, 1503 of alien proceedings, 1325, 1331, 1332
amending process, 73
Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act features, 103
and appellate jurisdiction, 109 areas for judicial activism, 1447–1448
avoidance doctrine, 142
Bonham's Case as precedent, 207–208
Boudin history of, 212

of bureaucracy, 266
cases and controversies, 322
by Chase Court, 338
checks and balances, 342
of civil liberties, 378–379, 380 of civil rights acts, 1026 classic justification, 1472, 1583
commentators on the Constitution on, 453
Commonwealth v. Caton as disputed precedent for, 467 of congressional contempt and investigative powers, 1536, 1594 as constitutional enforcement measure, 740
and constitutional fictions, 526 and constitutional interpretation, 632
and constitutionalism, 638
and constitutional theory, 654, 655–657
countermajoritarian potential, 767
and democratic theory, 1036 democratic theory's potential conflicts with, 765, 767
Eakin v. Raub, 833 of economic policy, 836 of electoral districting, 870–871 of equal protection of the laws, 915 facial challenges, 1399–1400 of federal criminal law, 983 of federalism issues, 989, 990–992, 993, 995, 996–997, 1473
Federalist justification, 1259, 1287, 1471 Federalist vs. Jeffersonian views of, 1498
federal question jurisdiction, 1027
first alleged state precedent, 1298 first reported instances, 165–166, 1324, 2301
and fundamental law, 1174–1175
of grand jury, 1222–1223
Hamilton espousal, 1259, 1260, 1287
Hand (Learned)-Wechsler debate, 1476, 1478
and higher law, 1287
inception of, 86, 165–166 of independent counsel removal, 1359 interpretive vs. noninterpretive, 1477–1478
interpretivism, 1393–1394
Jefferson's view, 1422, 1474
as judicial independence insurance, 50 and judicial legislation, 1458
and judicial power, 1489
judicial supremacy vs., 1487–1488 Judiciary Act of 1789 provisions, 1496, 2589–2590
and "law of the land," 1571
and legislative motivation, 1585–1589
limited government and, 1618–1619
Marbury v. Madison, 266, 740, 1287, 1424, 1469–1470, 1472, 1474, 1475, 1477, 1487, 1489, 1583, 1667–1670, 1673, 1675, 1986, 2589–2590
as Marshall Court legacy, 1686
Marshall's (John) views, 1472, 1473, 1474, 1475, 1477, 1583
Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1689–1690
Paterson's views, 1883
Peckham's views, 1890
philosophical theories, 1905 political questions outside scope of, 1454, 1949, 1952, 1953
and precedent, 1986
of punitive damages excesses, 2082–2083 rational basis standard, 2120–2122, 2123
rule of reason, 2299
Rutgers v. Waddington as early precedent, 2301 and sovereignty of the people, 1963
state police power and, 2507
state precedents for, 2723 state sovereignty and, 1181
strict scrutiny and, 2562
substantive due process and, 2049
as supremacy of federal law, 1490
Taft Court, 2637
of taxpayers suits, 1066
two-prong theory of, 2857 and unconstitutionality, 2752
U.S. constitutional example, 1367 value pluralism implications, 2778
Warren Court, 2857
Judicial review and democracy, 1478–1481
Progressive arguments, 2049
tensions between, 767, 1478–1481, 1494, 1506–1507 Judicial review of administrative acts, 1481–1482
and administrative agencies, 37, 39, 40, 41
Judicial role, 1482–1485
in protecting state autonomy, 1803
Judicial strategy, 1485–1487
Judicial supremacy, 1487–1488
Brennan arguments, 1458 in constitutional interpretation, 1475, 1476
Cooper v. Aaron, 1458
as deterrent against unconstitutional legislative drafts, 1583–1584 federal over state law, 1490
Fugitive Slave Act, 2
judicial review, 1472–1482, 1490
Marbury v. Madison, 1458–1459
Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1690 and nonjudicial interpretation of Constitution, 1821–1822 republican thought in conflict with, 2214–2215
Stewart's views, 2542
See also Judicial legislation Judicial system, federal, 1489–1498
caseload explosion, 1492–1493, 1494
federal question jurisdiction, 1027–1028, 1489, 1495, 1497
Judicial Code, 1451
Judiciary Act of 1789, 1495–1497
Judiciary Act of 1801, 1496–1497
jurisdiction, 1501–1504
justiciability, 1519–1521
public law litigation, 2072–2073 special tribunals, 1492 structural problems, 1493–1494 witness and juror financial profits from media sales, 2915–2916
See also Supreme Court headings
Judiciary Act of 1789, 1495–1496
appellate jurisdiction, 108
and Article III provisions, 546, 2589 attorney general post, 134 basic right to bail, 148, 149 circuit court system, 359, 1489, 1495, 1496, 2564, 2603
federal judicial system, 1463, 1489–1490
habeas corpus, 1254, 1256
Judicial Code, 1451
judicial review, 1496, 2589–2590
Paterson and, 1882
Posse Comitatus Act revision, 1969 provision for Supreme Court, 2589 removal powers, 1497, 2199
writ of prohibition, 2050
Judiciary Act of 1801, 1496–1497
circuit court system, 359, 2759
Jefferson's attack on, 551 partisan federal courts and judges, 29, 1667, 1684
Paterson and, 1883
repeal of, 1422, 1498, 1667, 1684, 2759
repeal upheld, 2564
Judiciary Act of 1837. See Circuit courts
Judiciary Act of 1869. See Circuit courts
Judiciary Act of 1875, 1497
federal judicial system, 1490
Judiciary Act of 1891. See Circuit Courts of Appeals Act Judiciary Act of 1911. See Judicial Code

Judiciary Act of 1925, 348, 1497–1498
Judiciary Acts of 1802, 1498
as repeal of Federalist 1801 Judiciary Act, 1422, 1498, 1667, 2564 Judiciary Reform Act (1937), 1498–1499
Jurisdiction, 1499–1501
abstention doctrine, 17–20
by administrative agencies, 41 admiralty and maritime, 44–45 American Indian tribal, 81
ancillary, 89–90
appeal, 107–108
appellate, 108–109
automobile search, 141
bankruptcy courts, 161
birthright citizenship, 183
Cherokee Indian Cases, 344 of civil court over military, 1736 concurrent, 483–484 congressional transfer from judiciary, 1827–1828 of constitutional law, 1674
declaratory judgment, 756 diversity, 798–799 divorce, 799
and double jeopardy, 810–811, 1562
and dual federalism, 1012
equity, 920
and fair trial, 970
federal civil rights cases, 2227
federal-state law enforcement, 1566–1571
fugitive from justice, 1158–1159
Fugitive Slave Act, 2
habeas corpus, 1248–1250, 1256
of independent counsel, 115
Judicial Code, 1451
Judiciary Act of 1801, 1496–1497
juvenile proceedings, 1522
legislative court, 1590
military justice, 2937
personal, 1500
religion in public schools, 1049
sovereignty and, 2461
status of forces agreement and, 2524 in stockholder' suit, 801 of Supreme Court, 722, 1184, 1498 territorial, 1499 of United States Courts of Appeals, 1491–1492, 2759
writ of prohibition, 2050
zoning, 2945
See also Original jurisdiction; Pendant jurisdiction Jurisdiction, federal, 1501–1503, 1503–1504 (update)
Bollman as precedent, 207
Chase Court, 338
civil liberties, 379
Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins, 1439
foreign affairs, 1076–1077
Judiciary Act of 1875 widening of, 1497
Judiciary Acts of 1802, 1498
legislative policy-limiting measures, 1503–1504
See also Appellate jurisdiction; Federal question jurisdiction Jurisdiction and Removal Act. See Judiciary Act of 1875 Jurisdiction to tax, 1504–1505
intergovernmental tax immunities, 1383–1384
Jurisprudence and constitutional law, 1505–1508
feminist theory, 1032–1033
jury composition, 1509–1512 mechanical, 1715
and ratifier intent, 2120
sociological, 2445–2446
Jurors and freedom of speech. See Witnesses, jurors, and freedom of speech Jury. See Blue ribbon jury; Grand jury; Petit jury; Trial by jury Jury challenges. See Peremptory challenges Jury discrimination, 1509–1511, 1511–1512 (update)
blue ribbon jury, 199–200, 1509
and fair trial, 970–971
improper exclusions, 1509–1510 invidious discrimination, 1038
loyalty oath, 1029–1030
peremptory challenges, 1510, 1511, 1898–1899, 2088, 2170
racial, 165, 189, 253, 1038, 1509, 1510–1511, 1787, 1825, 2558–2559, 2907 religious exemption, 2192 service as political right, 1509, 1514–1515
Strauder v. West Virginia, 388
voir dire potential, 2803
wealth discrimination, 253
William v. Mississippi, 2906–2907
Jury nullification, 1512–1514
capital punishment, 300
Jury service as a political right, 1514–1515 citizen's obligation, 368 underrepresented groups, 1509–1510
Jury size, 1515–1517
exclusion from incorporation doctrine, 1356 five-person unconstitutionality, 157–158, 1516, 1517
jury unanimity, 1517, 1518
Patton v. United States, 1887 six-member state criminal jury, 2255 six-person minimum, 264, 1516–1517, 2727, 2906 twelve on federal criminal jury, 2255
Jury trial. See Trial by jury Jury unanimity, 1517–1518, 1518–1519 (update) for federal criminal jury, 710, 1517, 2255
nonunanimous verdicts upheld, 1434–1435, 1510, 1518 reasonable doubt diminished, 1434 as traditional common law feature, 2727
Jus dare, 1519
Jus dicere, 1519
Just compensation, 1519
American Indian property, 80, 82
Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge Company, 332 Claims Court, 419
economic analysis, 836–837
eminent domain, 888, 2646
Fifth Amendment and, 2646
foreign affairs, 1077–1078
government acquisition of property, 2643 incorporated into due process clause, 1354 incorporated into equal protection clause, 2130
inverse condemnation, 1400–1401
Railroad Control Act, 2114
for regulatory takings, 2150–2151 for taking of property, 345, 1113, 1519, 1564, 2150, 2437, 2534, 2643, 2946 tribal economic development and, 2731
Justice Department. See Attorney general and Department of Justice; Civil Rights Division; Solicitor general
Justiciability, 1519–1521
avoidance doctrine, 142
as bar to direct democracy rulings, 785
and common law, 466
federal judicial system, 1491
guarantee clause, 1239
one person, one vote rule, 326
and political question doctrine, 1653
reapportionment, 152–153, 2133, 2137, 2203, 2227

resting on nature of legal wrong, 1953 standing as barrier, 122
Juvenile curfew laws, 1521–1522
Juvenile proceedings, 1522–1524
capital punishment, 2475–2746
double jeopardy attachment proceedings, 808
Gault, In re, 1183, 1523, 1524, 2265
legal fictions in, 2317
McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 1523, 1524
minors' rights, 352
preventive detention, 2005, 2317
reasonable doubt standard, 1523, 2912
right to counsel, 1183, 1523, 2263, 2265
trial by jury, 1709

K

Kansas-Nebraska Act (1854), 1525–1526
Lecompton constitution, 1526, 1574
Lincoln opposition, 1620 Pierce policy, 1908
popular sovereignty, 1962
provisions, 813
and Republican party formation, 3, 2216 and slavery in the territories, 2427 and territorial sovereignty, 2435
Keating-Owen Child Labor Act (1916), 1528
invalidation, 1261–1262, 1528
Kentucky Resolution. See Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions
Kerner Commission, 2220
Klan Act. See Force Acts
Korean War, 1541–1542
Bricker Amendment, 243–244, 1541, 1921
conscientious objection, 505
conscription, 2357
executive prerogative, 951
loyalty-security programs, 1541, 1650
McCarthyism, 1541, 1701–1702
military desegregation, 118
as police action, 603, 1541–1542, 1921
presidential plenary authority, 1075
Senate and, 2360
as state of war, 2505
steel seizure controversy, 946, 2448, 2526–2527
Subversive Activities Control Act, 2581
Truman policies, 2448, 2734
as undeclared war, 755, 1541, 1998
Ku Klux Klan
advocacy vs. incitement, 225–226 court victories for, 225–226, 733, 1272, 1955
Force Acts, 733, 1070
hate speech, 1277, 1278
incitement to unlawful conduct, 1353 symbol display in public square, 312–313, 2173
voting rights infringement conviction, 2938
Ku Klux Klan Act. See Force Acts

L

Labor and the antitrust laws, 1545–1546
applications, 70, 107, 167–168, 1555, 1641 Clayton Act, 425–426
injunction, 831, 1545
Loewe v. Lawlor, 1545, 1641–1642
Labor and the Constitution, 1546–1553, 1553–1554 (update)
Adamson Eight-Hour Act, 33, 2912
alien temporary workers, 1329–1330 alien unauthorized workers, 1333
boycott, 215
Brandeis opinions, 219–220, 223
Child Labor Amendment, 72, 73, 349, 594, 598
Child Labor Tax Case, 151–152
Clayton Act, 425–426, 831
Debs cases, 750–751
domestic violence clause, 803
economic vs. political activity distinction, 1549, 1551
Erdman Act, 25, 1547
Fair Labor Standards Act, 349, 458, 459, 594, 598, 966–967, 1548 and feudal privileges, 1034–35
freedom of contract, 1112 injunctions. See under Labor movement
Keating-Owen Child Labor Act, 1261, 1528
Landrum-Griffin Act, 603, 1560–1561
legal services right, 1109
Lochner v. New York, 1547, 1548, 1552–1553, 1638–1639
Loewe v. Lawlor, 1545, 1641–1642 maximum hour and minimum wage laws, 33, 35–36, 1638–1639, 1764
public employees, 1552
right-to-work laws, 2277–2278
Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 2819, 2820 strike limitations, 1549–1550, 1553
Taft-Hartley Act, 79, 2277–2278 union employees' speech rights, 891
Wagner Act, 442, 458, 603, 1547, 1547–1548, 2289, 2293
Wagner Act cases, 349, 1548, 2819–2821 women's protection laws, 2920–2921 workplace harassment and First Amendment, 2925–2926
See also Child labor; Labor and the antitrust laws; Labor movement; Maximum hours and minimum wages legislation
Labor and the Constitution, Taft-Hartley Act, 79, 442, 603
Labor Board cases. See Wagner Act cases
Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act. See Landrum-Griffin Act Labor movement, 1554–1556
bill of attainder, 257 boycott strikes, 215
closed shop, 434
collective bargaining, 442, 1545, 1548
constitutional aspiration, 664
freedom of contract, 25–26
injunction to enforce yellow dog contract, 1292 injunction use against, 750, 750–751, 831, 1192, 1373, 1545, 1547, 1553, 1555–1556, 1641, 1825, 2757
New Deal policy, 2293, 2818–2821
picketing, 1907
and political trials, 1954–1955
right-to-work laws, 2277–2278
self-regulation measures, 1561
workers' compensation legislation, 2924–2925
yellow dog contract, 1292, 2900
Land Ordinance of 1784. See Ordinance of 1784
Landrum-Griffin Act (1959), 1560–1561
federal authority over internal union affairs, 603 Land use controls, 2644
delegation of power, 1232
environmental regulations, 905
Hawaiian feudal tenure system, 1279
Homestead Act, 1302
just compensation for restrictions, 2150 restriction as economic value deprivation, 2055, 2150–2151
Yazoo land grant, 1067, 1068, 1260
See also Eminent domain; Zoning

Law and economics theory, 1563–1566
Lochner v. New York dissent, 1638
pragmatism and, 1983
Law enforcement and federal-state relations, 1566–1570, 1570–1571 (update) commerce-based federal criminal legislation, 1568, 1570 examples of crimes, 1568
Federal Bureau of Investigation, 975–977
López, United States v., 1570–1571
national police force, 1566, 1569–1570
Perez v. United States, 1567
Rewis v. United States, 1570 statutory interpretation, 1570–1571
See also Police interrogation and confessions
Law of Nations or the Principles of Natural Law, The (Vattel), 633, 637, 941, 2781
Law of the land, 1571–1572
constitutional commentary on, 449
and due process, 828, 1571, 1572, 2035
and higher law, 1287
and rule of law, 2297
Leading Constitutional Decisions (Cushman, ed.), 738
Least restrictive means test, 1573
and compelling state interest, 477
legislative intent, 1593
in regulating commercial advertising, 203–204
and religious liberty, 2182
Lecompton Constitution, 1574
Douglas (Stephen) opposition, 813
and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1526, 1574
Legacy of Suppression (Levy), 1607
Legal assistance. See Right to counsel
Legal culture, 1576–1578
Legal positivism. See Philosophy and the Constitution
Legal pragmatism. See Pragmatism Legal process, 1578–1580
access to the courts, 23
Legal Process, The: Basic Problems in the Making and Application of Law (Hart and Sacks), 1578
Legal realism, 1580–1581
critical legal studies, 724
deconstruction, 756–759
Douglas as central to movement, 814, 1581
interest group litigation, 1378
Laski influence, 1563
social science research, 2442–2443
Legal representation. See Right to counsel
Legal Service Corporation, 1378
Legal tender cases, 1581–1582
Chase Court, 340
Waite Court, 2825
Legislation, 1582–1589
advisory opinion on, 51
constitutionality. See Judicial review
Constitution as paramount to, 1583
District of Columbia experiments with "model," 796 and dormant powers, 807
ex post facto application, 957 federal environmental, 1009–1010
filibuster, 1043–1044
First Congress, 1058
full faith and credit, 1172
judicial, 1457–1460
judicial activism and restraint, 1446–1447 judicial review superseding, 740, 1583, 2389
judicial supremacy, 1458
legislative intent, 1592–1593
legislative power, 1596–1597 narcotics laws, 821–822
overbreadth, 1866–1868
pocket veto, 1920–1921
poverty programs, 1973
preemption of federal over state, 1988–1990 presidential influence on, 1999 presidential ordinance-making power, 1994–1995 procedural review, 1585 process in Congress, 1597–1599 purposes and motives, 1597–1599
rational basis test, 2121–2123
retroactivity of, 2225–2226
Revised Statutes of the United States (1875), 2227
ripeness of challenge, 279
statutory interpretation and, 2525 and sufferance federalism, 996
supermajority rules, 2585–2586
and term limits, 2670
See also Antidiscrimination legislation; Antitrust law; Race and sex in antidiscrimination law; specific acts Legislative contempt power, 1589 limited by judicial review, 1536, 1594 parliamentary privilege, 1888 upheld by Marshall Court, 1433
Legislative court, 1589–1590
Claims Court as, 419, 981 constitutional distinguished from, 523 constitutional legitimacy, 1019
Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1028 judicial appointments and tenure, 1019
and judicial power, 1463–1464, 1612 as Marshall (John) invention, 1612
as territorial court, 83
Legislative facts, 1590–1591
Brandeis brief, 225
and school desegregation ruling, 254, 255
Legislative immunity, 1591
as Articles of Confederation provision, 540 exclusion of unofficial communication, 1324 Legislative intent, 1591–1592
clear statement rule, 1229
and double jeopardy, 809–810
and federal common law authority, 978–979
language of law and, 2316
least restrictive means test, 1573
and severability, 2388–2389
Legislative investigation, 1593–1596
and freedom of association, 1052, 2866–2867
House Committee on Un-American Activities, 1305
as implied power, 1346
Iran-Contra affair, 1401–1403
limited by judicial review, 1536
of loyalty and security, 605
McCarthyism, 1701–1702
right against self-incrimination, 2866
Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 2867
Watergate scandal, 922, 2360, 2365, 2865
Watkins v. United States, 2866–2867
Legislative power, 1596–1597
administrative agencies, 40–42, 1482, 1935
bicameralism, 171
Civil War expansion of, 416 under commerce clause, 1396 constitutional explicitness on, 1471, 1945 delegation of, 2148, 2317 economic regulation curbs, 1414 executive power vs., 214 executive prerogative and, 950 federal elections regulation, 1940–1941 federal primary elections regulation, 2007 in foreign affairs. See Congress and foreign policy; Senate and foreign policy immigration and naturalization, 2801–2802

McCulloch v. Maryland broadening, 1425 under necessary and proper clause, 1058–1059, 1425
noninterpretivist inroads seen on, 1393
as popular sovereignty, 497
postal power, 1970–1971
pre-1937 judicially implied limitations, 2934–2935 preeminence under Jeffersonian constitutionalism, 1423
preemption, 1989–1990
privilege from arrest, 2019
Reconstruction policy, 2142–2143
regulatory agencies creation, 2148 Rehnquist Court challenges, 2169 of states, 1835
taxing and spending, 1998, 2000, 2658–2661
Legislative purposes and motives, 1597–1599 canons of construction, 1598 for congressional investigation, 1708
Legislative Reorganization Act (1946), 266, 494, 2360
Legislative veto, 1599–1601
and administrative agencies, 38, 269
Burger Court and, 380
checks and balances, 343
and concurrent resolution, 485
and constitutional theory, 654 and delegation doctrine, 762 and foreign policy, 495
invalidation of, 172, 762, 1386, 1460, 1599–1600, 2129, 2148 one-house status, 762, 1333, 1599, 1600, 2148 as power over executive policymaking, 611–612 and regulatory agencies, 2148
Lemon test, 1602–1603, 1603–1604 (update) actual purpose and effect components, 1602, 2196
Agostini revision, 61, 1604
Board of Education of the Westside Community Schools v. Mergens, 203, 1207 establishment clause, 203, 924
government aid to religious institutions, 1207
Lemon v. Kurtzman as basis, 1601–1602 neutrality principle ascendancy, 1207, 1208, 1209, 2176
and religious liberty, 2175–2176
replacement suggestions, 2176
Scalia critiques, 1560, 1602
Lend-Lease Act (1941), 2290, 2841
Lesbianism. See Same-sex marriage; Sexual orientation; Sexual preference and the Constitution
Letter concerning Toleration (Locke), 1639
"Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania" (Dickinson), 779, 1174
Letters from Birmingham Jail (King), 369 Letters of marque and reprisal, 1605
congressional power to grant, 385
Lever Food and Drug Control Act (1917), 1605
Libel and the First Amendment, 1606–1608, 1608–1610 (update)
absolutism, 17
actual malice standard, 1062, 1141, 1146, 1189, 1285, 1322, 1607, 1608–1609, 2067, 2850
Curtis Publishing Company v. Butts, 2067 false statement of facts as low-value speech, 1646, 1647
freedom of speech and, 1128, 1130
freedom of the press and, 1139, 1141–1142, 1146, 1729–1730
Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 1189 group libel, 1235–1236
Herbert v. Lando, 1285
Hustler Magazine and Larry Flynt v. Jerry Falwell, 1322 and interpretivism, 1861
and liberal media licensing laws, 470
Masson v. New Yorker Magazine, 1696–1697
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 234–235, 237, 1134, 1141, 1146, 1150, 1236, 1607, 1608, 1609, 1804–1805, 2014, 2067, 2850, 2855
plurality opinion, 829–830
press protections, 2313
and private person's recovery standard, 1607–1608 and public figure's status, 1052, 1609, 2067
and right to privacy, 2244 truth as evidentiary factor, 1260
Warren Court and, 2848, 2850
See also Seditious libel
Liberal constitutional construction, 1610–1613
and living Constitution, 1632–1635
Marshall (John) exemplifying, 1611 Liberalism, 1613–1617
and communitarianism, 472
and limited government, 1619
Lockean, 834
obscenity views, 1838
and value pluralism, 2778
of Warren Court, 1615, 1616, 2312, 2315, 2853, 2855–2858
Libertarianism, 16
Liberty of contract. See Freedom of contract Liberty party, 3, 182
License cases, 1617
dual federalism, 827
liquor, 1229–1230, 1617
original package doctrine, 256, 1348, 1612 state bar on imported liquor, 1601 Licenses
broadcasting, 247, 248–249, 968, 969, 1723–1724, 2009, 2165 and freedom of expression, 2009 liquor sales, 1617
motion pictures, 1106, 1538
oil import fees, 987 Life, definition of. See Person
Life-sustaining treatment. See Right to die Limited government, 1618–1619
broad construction vs., 250 contemporary limitations, 1995
Declaration of Independence on, 754
and federalism, 1001
Jeffersonian, 1425
judicial review seen as subversion of, 1498 as liberal agenda, 1613, 1619
Magna Carta as symbol of, 1663–1664
as political philosophy of Constitution, 1944, 1946
republican form of government, 2209 three specific connotations, 1618 Vattel as theorist, 2781
written constitutions and, 1474
Lincoln and constitutional theory, 1620–1622, 1624–1625, 2142
Lincoln-Douglas debates, 1625
binding Supreme Court decisions, 1475 criticism of Dred Scott decision, 1620 Freeport Doctrine, 1148
popular sovereignty, 1963
Lincoln's plan of Reconstruction, 1625 Line-item veto, 1625–1626, 1626–1627 (update)
constitutional amendment proposal, 76, 2129
executive power, 949

Line-item veto (continued)
Line Item Veto Act, 626
unconstitutionality ruling, 1627, 2169
Line Item Veto Act (1996), 1626–1627
Lineup, 1627–1628
right to counsel at, 1538–1539, 1627–1628, 2264–2265, 2818
testimonial and nontestimonial compulsion, 2677
Liquor. See Alcohol; Prohibition
Listeners' rights, 1628–1629
fairness doctrine, 968
First Amendment, 1046, 1560
and mail propaganda, 1560, 1628 religion as viewpoint ruling, 1559–1560
right to know, 1143, 1628, 2271
subsidized speech and, 2567–2568
Literacy test, 1629
Civil Rights Act of 1964, 405 congressional ban, 1629 effect on blacks, 392 grandfather clause, 129, 392, 1242, 1629
for immigrants, 1329 non-English schooling-level equivalence, 1527
voting rights, 1041, 1042, 1089–1090, 1629, 2808
Voting Rights Act of 1965, 1629
Litigation. See Class action; Institutional litigation; Public law litigation
Litigation strategy, 1629–1632
Litvinov Assignment, 168
Living Constitution, 1632–1635
as Brennan interpretive principle, 239, 240 expressed in McCulloch v. Maryland, 1633 as transformation of constitutional law, 2712–2714
Lobbying Disclosure Act (1995), 1636
Local government, 1637–1638
District of Columbia, 796, 797–798 law enforcement responsibilities, 1566, 1569 liability limitations, 1217
multimember districts, 1765, 2135
municipal immunity, 1767–1768
nonliability for employee violations, 1751 ordinance invalid on its face, 1645 proprietary-rights exception, 1210–1211, 1212
See also State and local government taxation
Long haul-short haul rate discrimination, 1642
Interstate Commerce Act provision, 1397, 1398
Loose construction. See Broad construction
Louisiana Purchase Treaty (1803), 1644
constitutional issues, 83, 228, 552, 1422, 1644
slavery issue, 2434
Low-value speech, 1646–1647
broadcasting restraints on vulgar words, 981, 1043, 1057, 1147, 1392
Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 1056 content-based free speech restrictions, 1056–1057, 1132–1133 obscenity-pornography distinction as, 1968
Loyalty oath, 1647–1648
American Civil Liberties Union cases, 157
Civil War, 1647–1648, 1649, 2143
electoral process and the First Amendment, 872
Elfbrandt v. Russell, 882
Federal Test Acts, 1029–1030
public employees, 2066, 2904 subversive activity definition, 1187
Test Oath Cases, 2679
Wieman v. Updegraff, 1649–1650
Loyalty-security programs, 1649–1650
Attorney General's List, 138, 604, 1436
Court restrictions, 1536
McCarthyism, 1702

M

Madisonian Constitution, 1657–1658, 1659–1662
Madison's "Memorial and Remonstrance" (1785), 1662
Madison's Notes of the Debates, 1662–1663 and abolitionist constitutional theory, 3
Mafia. See Organized Crime Control Act
Magna Carta, 1663–1664
and British constitution, 245
civil liberties, 374, 375
constitutionalism, 634
due process, 439, 828, 2035
freedom of petition, 1125
general search, 1098, 1099
law of the land, 1571, 1572, 2035
reconfirmation, 489 right to petition, 2272
rule of law, 1663–1664, 1945, 2234, 2297
Mail service. See Postal power Majority opinion. See Opinion of the court
Malapportionment. See Reapportionment
Malice aforethought. See Libel and the First Amendment Mandamus, writ of, 1666
and Marbury v. Madison, 1668, 1669 and original jurisdiction, 1668, 1669
United States Courts of Appeals, 2760
Mann Act (1910), 1666
as polygamy conviction basis, 1961 sustained, 1294, 2899
Mann-Elkins Act (1910), 1666
as Interstate Commerce Act supplement, 1397, 1398
Market economy. See Economic liberty and the Constitution; Economy; Law and economics theory Marketplace of ideas, 1670–1671 and corporate social responsibility, 688
freedom of speech, 1136–1137, 1299
hate speech, 1277
listener's rights, 1628
right to know, 2271
and value pluralism, 2778
Marriage and the Constitution, 1671–1672 birth control rights, 182, 1233–1234, 2203–2204
citizenship and, 368
equal protection, 1156–1157
freedom of intimate association, 1118–1119, 1120, 1121, 1123
as fundamental interest, 1671, 2943
husband's feudal privileges, 1034, 1035
miscegenation laws, 189, 403
miscegenation laws held invalid, 1645–1646 polygamy restriction, 1961–1962, 2186, 2229
privacy rights, 1233, 1234, 2052, 2242, 2243, 2247, 2943
rights issues in historical perspective, 2252–2253 same-sex, 147, 2307
spousal abortion consent, 6, 2206
women's economic rights, 91, 1112 women's historical coverture, 2920
Zablocki v. Redhail, 1671, 1672, 2943
See also Divorce and the Constitution; Family and the Constitution
Marshall Court, 1681–1687
American Indian decisions, 81
appellate jurisdiction, 436–437

on bills of credit, 174
on commerce clause, 454
on contract clause, 673, 674, 675, 677, 692
on corporations, 692
doctrinal contributions, 801 and dual-sovereignty system of federalism, 570
and implied powers, 900
Justice Johnson's independence, 1433
Justice Livingston's inactivity, 1635
Justice Marshall's leadership, 1673–1675, 1681–1682
Marbury v. Madison, 1667–1670, 1673, 1683–1684
McCulloch v. Maryland, 1705–1707
nationalistic decisions, 1000, 1001, 1017 Roane critiques, 2280
on state police power, 2556
Marshall Plan, 1687
Martial law. See Civil-military relations
Maryland Toleration Act (1649), 1691
Massachusetts Bay, Colonial Charters of (1629, 1691), 1693
and constitutionalism, 635
Massachusetts Body of Liberties (1641), 1694
bail, 149
civil liberties, 374
as constitutional influence, 531
due process, 828
Massachusetts Circular Letter of 1768, 1694–1695
Adams (Samuel) arguments, 31 and American constitutionalism, 643
Massachusetts Constitution (1780), 1695–1696
abolishment of slavery in Massachusetts, 1623 Adams (Samuel) as convention delegate, 32
bicameralism, 171
framed at first constitutional convention in world history, 516 political theory underlying, 27–28, 29
rule of law, 2297
as state constitution model, 540
Massachusetts General Laws and Liberties, 1696
Massachusetts Resolutions. See Embargo Acts
Mass demonstrations. See Demonstration
Master, special. See Special master
Maximum hours and minimum wages legislation, 1699–1700
Adamson Eight-Hour Act, 33, 2912
Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 36, 797, 1313, 2882, 2921
Adkins voiding minimum wage laws, 36
Brandeis brief, 35, 219, 225, 1746, 2443, 2920
Bunting v. Oregon upholding, 263, 1639
and commerce clause, 456
constitutionality history, 2881–2882
District of Columbia Minimum Wage Act, 35, 797, 2882, 2921
and due process, 36, 2049
Fair Labor Standards Act, 966–967
and freedom of contract, 36, 1547, 1735–1736
interstate commerce, 1315
and interstate commerce, 2566
invalidations, 1641, 2288
Lochner v. New York, 1547, 1548, 1552–1553, 1638–1639, 2049
Loewe v. Lawlor, 1641 for manufactures, 744
Muller v. Oregon, 1764
and religious liberty, 2192
and states' rights, 1760
Stettler v. O'Hara, 2529 sustained for women, 2529
upheld, 2289
West Coast Hotel Company v. Parrish, 2289, 2881–2882, 2921
women and children minimum wage, 35–36, 1313, 1547 women's minimum wages, 35–36, 1547, 2921 women's working hours, 225, 1764, 2920–2921
Mayflower Compact, 531
Maysville Road Bill (1830), 1700–1701
internal improvements halt, 1385
Jackson (Andrew) veto, 1408
McCarran Act. See Internal Security Act
McCarran-Walter Act. See Immigration and alienage
McCarthyism, 1701–1702
academic freedom, 21–22
Alien Registration Act, 67–68
and avoidance doctrine, 142
Communist Control Act, 606
and Federal Bureau of Investigation, 976 and Korean War-inspired anticommunism, 1541
legislative investigations, 1595
loyalty oaths, 1648
loyalty-security programs, 1649
right against self-incrimination, 1233
McNabb-Mallory Rule, 1713–1714
Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 1029
Mechanical jurisprudence, 1715
Media. See Broadcasting; Communications and community; Communications and democracy; Freedom of the press; Free press/fair trial; Journalistic practices, tort liability, and the freedom of the press; Reporter's privilege Medicaid-funded abortions constitutionality of state denial, 2880
Harris v. McRae, 1272–1273
Hyde Amendment, 6, 67, 1325, 2205, 2205–2206
Maher v. Roe, 1272, 1665, 2205, 2286, 2870, 2872
Medicare. See Health Insurance for the Aged Act
Meese Commission, 1715–1716
Megan's Law. See Sex offender notification laws
Memorandum order, 1717
Mental illness and the Constitution, 1717–1720, 1720 (update) capital punishment as cruel and unusual punishment, 1070–1071 indigent's right to insanity defense, 64
insanity defense, 2061
and involuntary confinement, 1846 involuntary sterilization, 2528
prisoner's rights, 2863
psychiatric legal limitations, 2060–2062 right to treatment/right to refuse treatment, 789–790 sexual predator laws, 2406, 2407
Mental retardation and the Constitution, 1720–1722
capital punishment, 2061
civil rights guarantees, 789, 792
Developmentally Disabled Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, 775, 789, 790 involuntary sterilization, 259, 284, 789, 791–792, 1297, 2528 involuntary commitment, 2061 not recognized as discrete and insular minority, 1382 rational basis scrutiny, 790, 792
right to die, 2268
Mercy killing. See Euthanasia; Right to die Mere evidence rule, 1722
search warrants, 2345
unreasonable search, 2767
Warden v. Hayden, 2833–2834

Mexican War
as declared war, 755, 1998
Spot Resolutions, 2469–2470
Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, 2720
Whig opposition, 2884
Military. See Armed forces
Military justice, 1726–1727
Chase Court and, 338–339
civilian trials, 746, 747, 830, 1464, 1955, 2170 civil-military relations, 385–387
Civil War, 2841
constitutional recognition as separate system, 117, 1464 court-martials, 603
Court of Military Appeals, 696
habeas corpus, 1247
jurisdiction and due process, 2937 jurisdiction of civil court over military, 1736
Milligan, Ex parte, 338–339, 386, 402, 448
Parker v. Levy, 1879
and political trials, 1054
Military Justice Act (1968), 2365
Military Reconstruction Acts (1867), 1728
Chase Court and, 339
enforcement of, 1745
Joint Committee on Reconstruction, 1436
and Omnibus Act, 1851–1852
Stevens's sponsorship, 2540
Military Selective Service Act (1967), 2357
Militia Act (1795), 416
Militia Act (1862), 571
Militias. See Second Amendment
Militias, modern, 1728–1729
constitutional controversy, 553, 2249–2250
Mill and freedom of expression, 1730–1731
Milton and freedom of expression, 1737–1739
Minimum wage. See Maximum hours and minimum wages legislation Ministerial Act, 1739
fugitive from justice, 1158
and President's discretionary power, 289
Minnesota rate cases, 1739–1740
closed loophole with federal regulation, 2899
Minorities. See Asian Americans and the Constitution; American Indians and the Constitution; Discrete and insular minorities; Immigration and alienage; Race-consciousness; Racial discrimination Minors. See Children and the First Amendment; Children's rights; Juvenile curfew laws; Juvenile proceedings
Miranda rules, 1742–1743, 1743–1744 (update)
Burger Court and, 273, 276, 1927, 1928
Edwards v. Arizona, 861, 1928 exceptions to, 273, 276, 1327, 1802–1803, 1856, 1927, 1928, 1930
"interrogation" definition, 2229–2230
Oregon v. Bradshaw, 861 police interrogation, 1922, 1926–1929, 1930, 2256 prisoner waiver of, 1926, 1930–1931, 2240
Rehnquist Court restrictions, 2169 requirement for, 2319
right to counsel, 1926, 1927, 1930, 2255, 2263–2264
self-incrimination warning, 1742–1744, 1865, 1922, 1926–1929, 2238, 2239–2240 undercover agent exception, 1327, 1930 violation of, 1865
waivers of, 1926, 2240
Warren Court and, 2850
weakening of, 1273, 1927–1928, 2169
White (Byron) dissent, 2886, 2889, 2892 Miscegenation, 1744–1745
antimiscegenation laws argued as equal treatment, 1038, 2827–2828
antimiscegenation laws held invalid, 1645–1646, 2309
Black Codes, 189
Loving v. Virginia, 403, 1645–1646, 2307, 2309
Pace v. Alabama, 1873, 2827–2828
race and constitutional law, 2097 same-sex marriage legal issues compared with, 2307, 2309 Misdemeanor, 1745
due process, 828
felony distinction, 1031
as impeachable offense, 1336, 1337, 1340, 1341, 1343 and impeachment of Presidents, 609
information, 1369
and jury trial, 157, 157–158
right to counsel, 116, 2255
warrantless arrest, 120, 121
Missouri Compromise (1820), 1747–1748
antislavery resolution of, 568, 569
constitutional issues, 556
Kansas-Nebraska Act as voiding, 813, 1525, 1526
Pinkney and, 1910 slavery issues, 2427, 2430, 2555
unconstitutionality ruling, 819, 820
Monetary power, 1751–1754
Emergency Bank Act, 885
gold clause cases, 1201–1202, 1751, 2288
Gold Reserve Act, 1202–1203
Legal Tender Cases, 1581–1582
McCulloch v. Maryland, 1583, 1585, 1587, 1611, 1705–1707, 1751 printing of money, 834
See also Bank of the United States Acts; Taxing and spending powers Monopolies. See Antitrust law; Commerce clause
Monroe Doctrine, 1755
Adams (John Quincy) authorship, 30
Monroe's cabinet and crafting of, 288
Roosevelt (Theodore) corollary, 2292
Mootness, 1758–1759, 1759–1760 (update)
Carroll v. President of Commissioners of Princess Anne, 319
DeFunis v. Odegaard, 759–760
and judicial power, 1464
and justiciability, 1520
Moral relativism. See Value pluralism and the Constitution
Morrill Act (1862), 417, 1761
Multimember district, 1765
nonpurposeful racial discrimination, 393, 1751, 1765, 2135
reapportionment, 2135
Multinational corporations, global markets, and the Constitution, 1765–1766
Multistate compacts. See Interstate compact Mundt-Nixon bill (1948–1949), 1766–1767
features in Internal Security Act, 1385 House Committee on Un-American Activities backing, 1305 Municipal Bankruptcy Act (1936), 1767
invalidation, 127
Municipal government. See Local government
Municipal immunity, 1767–1768
Monroe v. Pape, 1754
nonliability for employee violations, 1751

Muscle Shoals Bill (1931), 596
"Must carry" law, 1771–1772
broadcasting, 1147–1148, 2739–2740
communications and community, 469–470

N

NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund, 1774
Brown v. Board of Education, 253, 255, 772, 1528 civil rights movement litigation, 411 freedom of association in Alabama suit, 1773 Marshall (Thurgood) contribution, 1676, 1678
public interest law, 2071
restrictive covenant, 2222–2223
school desegregation, 772, 773–774
test cases as protected political activity, 1773
NAFTA. See North American Free Trade Agreement
Narcotics. See Controlled-substance abuse; Crack cocaine and equal protection; Drug testing; Drug regulation
Nashville Convention Resolutions (1850), 1774–1775
slavery in the territories, 2435
National American Woman Suffrage Association, 2919
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. See NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund
National Association of Broadcasters, 968
National Association of Colored Women, 2919
National Association of Manufacturers, 349
National Defense Act (1916), 2356
National Emergencies Act. See Emergency powers
National Environmental Policy Act. See Environmental regulation and the Constitution
National Firearms Act (1934), 2452
National Industrial Recovery Act (1933), 1775–1776
aims under commerce clause, 457–458 delegation of powers, 41, 2288, 2317–2318
"Little NIRA" bituminous coal case, 321
Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 1877
Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 2317–2318, 2592, 2819, 2820
unconstitutionality, 457, 599, 697, 2288, 2317–2318, 2592
Wagner Act, 2818–2819
Wagner Act cases, 2819–2820
Nationality Act (1940), 2733
National Labor Relations Acts. See Taft-Hartley Labor Relations Act; Wagner Act National Labor Relations Board, 1548–1549 and antitrust laws, 1545 judicial function, 2147
upheld, 1548, 2289
Wagner Act cases, 2819–2821
as Wagner Act provision, 2819
National Organization for Women, 379
National police power, 1777–1780
armed forces excluded from, 1969
Chase Court decision, 340
drug traffic regulation, 804 in employment relations, 1548
expansion of, 1704
general welfare clause, 1186–1187
Hammer v. Dagenhart, 1261–1262
interstate commerce restrictions, 1261–1262, 1294
Pure Food and Drug Act, 1001, 2083–2084
White Court expansion of, 2899
See also Police power; State police power
National Prohibition cases. See Amending process; Eighteenth Amendment
National Rifle Association, 1243
National Security Act (1947), 1781
National Security Agency, 2326
National security and the Fourth Amendment, 1781–1782
communications and democracy, 470
and constitutional reason of state, 649
electronic eavesdropping, 875
freedom of speech, 1129
freedom of the press, 1140, 1145
Jencks Act, 1426
loyalty-security programs, 1649–1650
right to travel, 1257
and scientific speech, 2326 and terrorism control, 2675 wiretapping provision, 2913
See also Subversive activity
National unity, group conflict, and the Constitution, 1783
National Voter Registration Act, 2812
Native American Church, 821–822, 823
Native Americans. See American Indians and the Constitution Native Hawaiian sovereignty movements, 1784–1785
Naturalization, 1785
and Alien Act, 67
citizenship and, 364–365, 366, 1785
common law and Calvin's Case, 294, 363 conscientious objector eligibility, 1195
denaturalization, 768–769
and Internal Security Act, 1386 pacifism and, 2325–2326 racial restrictions, 129, 130–131, 1167
Senate Judiciary Committee and, 2364
visas and, 2801
Wong Kim Ark, United States v., 2922
World War II cases, 2930
wrongful, 367
Natural law. See Higher law; Natural rights and the Constitution Natural rights and the Constitution, 1785–1787
Americans with Disabilities Act, 87
Boyd opinion, 2339
civil disobedience, 1537
as constitutional fundamental, 1947
as Declaration of Independence basis, 1419
due process, 1233
fundamental interests, 1172–1173
insular cases, 1376
and international human rights, 1387
Lockean philosophy, 1640, 2051, 2052, 2248
as not applied to territories, 1376 philosophy and the Constitution, 1904
privileges and immunities, 2019 procedural or remedial rights vs., 1376
property, 2051, 2052, 2053
representation, 2201
revolution based on, 2248, 2249–2250 slavery abrogating, 1947, 2210 social compact theory, 2439
as unenumerated rights, 2753
Nature of the Judicial Process, The (Cardozo), 313, 314, 2901
Nazi war criminals, denaturalization proceedings, 769
Necessary and proper clause, 1790–1791
and American Indians, 80, 81
amnesty, 89
and broad construction, 250 congressional power over federal elections, 1940

Necessary and proper clause (continued) congressional powers under, 1058–1059, 1425
enumerated powers, 1751
and federal power boundaries, 998, 1011 implied incidental powers doctrine, 1347
and inherent powers, 1370–1371
intergovernmental immunity, 1382
and judicial policymaking, 1461
as liberal latitude to exercise specific powers, 1259
and living Constitution, 1633
McCulloch v. Maryland, 1674, 1685, 1706–1707
and monetary power, 1751
Negligence. See Damages claims; Government wrongs
Negro and the First Amendment, The (Kalven), 1525 Neutral principles, 1792–1793
New Christian Right. See Religious fundamentalism
New Deal (constitutional significance), 1797–1798
as "constitutional moment," 764
New Deal, 1793–1797
administrative agencies, 40, 41
agricultural production controls, 62–63 brain trust, 2738 bureaucracy, 266
congressional investigations, 1595
constitutionality defense, 226
Court invalidations, 41, 284, 1232, 1313, 1437–1438, 1547, 2288
Court-packing plan, 113, 600, 697–699, 1437, 1794, 2288–2289
Court tests, 2288–2289, 2819–2821 and delegation of power challenges, 41, 1232, 2288, 2317–2318 devolution and federalism issues, 777
Emergency Bank Act, 885
and federalism, 1002
Frankfurter supportive rulings, 1103
gold clause cases, 1201–1202
Gold Reserve Act, 1202–1203
Hughes Court rulings, 1312–1316
Hughes invalidation rulings, 1311–1312 labor activity, 1546, 1547–1548, 1555
liberalism of, 1615, 1616
and living Constitution, 1634
National Industrial Recovery Act aims and unconstitutionality, 457, 599, 697, 1775–1776, 2288, 2317–2318, 2592
and political parties, 1935
Progressive agenda, 2884
Public Utility Holding Company Act, 2079–2080
rational basis test, 2123
Reed's role in, 2144 reforms, 599
regulatory agencies, 2147
Roosevelt (F.D.) policies, 2288–2291
Roosevelt Court, 2292–2293
Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 2317–2318, 2592, 2819, 2820
Tennessee Valley Authority Act, 2666–2667
Wagner Act, 2818–2819
Wagner Act cases, 2819–2821
New Jersey Colonial Charters, 1799–1800
New Jersey Plan, 1800
and federalism, 1011
as framework for discussion of Constitution, 519–520
Paterson and, 1882
as Virginia Plan alternative, 542–543
New Republic (periodical), 2047
New Right, 1801–1802
Newsman's privilege. See Reporter's privilege
New York Charter of Liberties and Privileges (1683), 1804
New York Port Authority Compact (1921), 1398–1399
Nineteenth Amendment, 1808–1809
Court rulings, 73
ratification, 72, 92, 593
woman suffrage, 2389, 2808, 2917–2918, 2919
women's minimum wage effect, 2920–2921
Ninth Amendment, 1809–1813, 1813–1815 (update) on rights retained to the people, 1091
unenumerated rights, 2752, 2754
NLRB. See National Labor Relations Board
No-knock entry, 1820
in drug search, 679, 1097
Nolo contendere, 1820
Noninterpretivism, 1820
and democracy, 1480–1481
dispute with interpretivism, 1393, 1394, 1395–1396
judicial review, 1478–1479, 1480
as nonoriginalism, 1394
as replacing broad construction, 250 Nonjudicial interpretation of the Constitution, 1821–1823, 1823–1824 (update)
by Lincoln, 1620–1622, 1624
and living Constitution, 1632–1634 original meaning of "commerce," 1643 value pluralism, 2778–2779
See also Commentators on the Constitution Nonmarital children, 1824
adoption and race, 45–46 citizenship of, 367
equal protection of the laws, 917
illegitimacy, 1325–1326
immigration law, 1331
Nontestimonial compulsion. See Testimonial and nontestimonial compulsion
Norris-LaGuardia Act (1932), 1825–1826
antitrust applied to unions, 1545 injunction in labor dispute, 1373 provisions of, 596
and Taft Court, 2638
North American Free Trade Agreement, 1826–1827
as executive agreement, 942 and federal-state relations, 1390
North Atlantic Treaty (1949), 1827
Northwest Ordinance (1787), 1829
alien suffrage, 68
bail, 149
King (Rufus) authorship, 1537
"law of the land" usage, 828, 1571
representation, 2130
republican form of government, 2209 rights guarantees, 742
slavery and, 2427, 2434, 2557
as territory governance model, 2479, 2673 Notice, 1830
of accusation, 2258–2259
administrative law, 42
ex parte, 956
in juvenile proceedings, 1183
by regulatory agency, 2149
waiver of rights, 2831
Notice clause. See Right to be informed of accusation
Noxious products doctrine, 1830
Nuclear technology. See Atomic Energy Act
Nude dancing, 1830–1832
Nullification, 1832–1833
and American System, 88
Calhoun theory, 292
Calhoun-Webster debate, 2871
commentators on the Constitution on, 450
Exposition and Protest, 957
Force Act, 1069, 1408, 1413–1414

as interposition, 1392
Jackson's Proclamation to the People of South Carolina, 1408, 1409, 1413–1414
Judge Peters, United States v., 1441–1442
Madison's opposition, 1659
Pennsylvania case, 1441–1442
secession and, 2346
South Carolina ordinance, 1424, 2457
states' rights and, 2519
Tariff Act of 1828, 559, 1069, 2480
theories of the Union and, 2687
Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions, 1424
Nullification, jury. See Jury nullification

O

Obiter dictum, 1835
free press/fair trial, 1149 grants-in-aid, 1157
on Missouri Compromise unconstitutionality, 819 political question doctrine, 2202
public forum doctrine, 2067–2068
scientific speech and, 2326
Obligation of contracts, 1835–1836
and economic liberties, 841 economic regulation as challenge to, 70–71
gold clause cases, 1201
Legal Tender Act, 340
limitations on state impairments of, 801 and state bankruptcy acts, 1848–1849 state charters for corporations, 745 and temporal limits on lawmaking powers, 2664 unconstitutional repeal of, 2766
See also Contract clause; Freedom of contract O'Brien formula, 1837
Obscenity, 1837–1839
Brennan opinions, 235
broadcasting prohibitions, 469
Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc., 251, 1968
Butler v. Michigan, 285 child pornography, 350, 351 child-protection rationales, 351 constitutional tests for, 1716–1717, 1734–1735, 2296, 2747 definition adjustments, 251, 1048, 1130, 1194, 1414, 1734–1735, 1839, 1967, 2747–2748, 2855
dial-a-porn, 778
employee speech rights (private), 891
and fighting words, 1043
First Amendment absolutism, 17
First Amendment and, 2476
First Amendment limitations, 1047–1048, 1128
and freedom of speech, 375
freedom of speech restrictions, 1128, 1130, 1134 injunction against sale, 1538
Lockhart articles on, 1640
as low-value speech, 1056, 1057, 1133, 1646, 1968, 2940
Miller test, 1130, 1734–1735, 1839, 1967, 2833 national standard over community standard, 1414
Paris Adult Theater I v. Slaton, 1734–1735, 1839 pornography definition vs., 1967, 1968 postal power over, 1970 prior restraint on film showing, 1106 procedural safeguards, 161–162
RICO Act application, 1153
Roth v. United States, 235, 1837, 1838, 1968, 2855 sales to minors, 1194–1195 search warrant and, 2476 standards for, 2747–2748
Stevens's views, 2534
Ulysses case, 2747–2748
Warren's views, 2850
"without redeeming social importance" standard, 1414, 1838
See also Pornography
Occupational Safety and Health Act, 44
Ocean law and the Constitution, 1840–1841
See also Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction Office of Management and Budget, 1846–1847 growth and power of, 1999 increased controls of, 260 required annual deficits report, 1219 as unit of the President's Executive Office, 289
"Official English" laws, 1847–1848
Official immunity. See Executive immunity; Immunity of public officials; Judicial immunity; Legislative immunity; Municipal immunity; Presidential immunity; Sovereign immunity
OMB. See Office of Management and Budget
Omnibus Act (1868), 1851–1852
Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act (1968), 1852
electronic surveillance requirements, 170, 873–875, 1527, 2913
Shreveport doctrine, 2416
One person, one vote, 1852–1853
Avery v. Midland County, 142
census and, 326
Colegrove v. Green, 440–441
electoral districting, 868, 869, 871
equal representation, 153, 2228, 2229
Gray v. Sanders, 1227–1228
primary elections, 2007
On Liberty (Mill), 1730–1731
Open fields doctrine, 1853
warrantless investigation to seize evidence, 1849
Open housing laws, 1853–1854
Civil Rights Act of 1968, 407, 1026, 1437, 1854, 2220, 2221 disabled persons coverage, 791 initiation of, 2220, 2221
private racial discrimination, 1437, 2221 referendum requirement overruled, 1320 state initiative overturning, 2170–2172 zoning and, 2947
Operation Rescue. See Anti-abortion movement
Opinion of the Court, 1854–1855
Chief Justice and, 346
concurring opinion, 485
conference, 488
decision vs., 752
Marshall Court innovation, 1683
obiter dictum, 1835
plurality opinion vs., 1920
precedent, 1986–1987
public understanding of, 2078
ratio decidendi, 2121
seriatim, 2387
See also Dissenting opinion
Oral argument, 1855
Chief Justice's role, 347 decision following, 742 Ordered liberty, 1855
and criminal procedural due process, 2036–2037
fundamental rights, 1176
and substantive due process, 2572
Ordinance of 1784, 1856
slavery and, 2427
territories and, 2479
Organized Crime Control Act (1970), 1857
immunity grant, 1335
review of sentence, 809

Organized Crime Control Act (1970) (continued)
upheld, 783
use immunity, 1526
Original intent, 1857–1859
Bill of Rights, 1353–1354
as Bork nomination issue, 210, 211, 2127
congressional war powers, 1080 as conservative agenda, 776 constitutional interpretation, 1506
devolution as, 776 of Fourteenth Amendment, 178, 1086, 1088, 1091
incorporation doctrine, 1356–1357
interpretivism, 1393–1396
as jurisprudence issue, 1506–1508 living Constitution vs., 1632 as New Right jurisprudence, 1801 radical Populist constitutional interpretation, 2113 ratifier intent, 2120–2021
scant evidence of, 1611
seditious libel, 1606–1607
textualism vs., 2315, 2681
See also Judicial activism and judicial restraint Originalism, 1859–1863
and constitutional theory, 655–656
historical citations in constitutional argumentation, 1291
and judicial restraint, 1450
ratifier intent, 2120–2121
Rehnquist defense of, 2159–2160
of Scalia, 2314, 2315, 2316
shift from, 2712, 2713
as successor term for interpretivism, 1394
Original jurisdiction, 1863–1864
appellate jurisdiction vs., 1468
Article III provision, 356, 1468
Cherokee Indian Cases, 344
circuit courts and, 360
Judiciary Act of 1789 provision, 1489, 1496
Marbury v. Madison, 1444–1445, 1468–1469, 1669, 1684
removal of cases, 2198–2199
special master, 2462
Supreme Court and, 2588
and writ of mandamus, 1668, 1669
Original package doctrine, 1864–1865
Brown v. Maryland, 1612
Chase Court decision, 341
License cases, 1617
limited to foreign commerce, 2923 and state import tax, 256, 1348
Webb-Kenyon Act, 2870
Overbreadth, 1866–1868
breach of the peace statutes, 227
Brennan as doctrine architect, 234, 238, 251
Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 250–251
Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc., 251 and chilling effect, 354, 803
and freedom of speech, 1131, 1317, 2854
Hatch Act challenge, 1275 hate crime law, 2123
invalid on its face, 1400
as litigation strategy, 1631
loyalty oaths, 2066
loyalty-security programs, 1536
and sedition, 2352
vagueness vs., 2775
Overruling, 1868–1870
of affirmative action intermediate scrutiny, 33
establishment clause, 926 expectations for Roe v. Wade, 12, 92–93
judicial policymaking, 1462
by Rehnquist Court, 2168
See also Retroactivity of judicial decisions
Overt acts test, 1870–1871
Overtime. See Maximum hours and minimum wages legislation

P

Pacifism. See Conscientious objection
Packers & Stockyards Act, 1873
consent decree, 1873
PACs. See Political action committees
Palmer raids, 1875
deportations of aliens, 65
and Justice Department, 135
and subversive advocacy, 2580
on suspected aliens and radicals, 1875
Panama Canal Treaties, 1876
as Bush justification for troops in Canal Zone, 2002 Canal Zone abolished, 1876
Carter (Jimmy) and ratification of, 320 and congressional power, 1876
Roosevelt (Theodore) presidency, 2292
Panic of 1819, 555
Pardoning power, 1878
amnesty, 89
Confederate amnesties, 1625 executive discretion as absolute, 1235
Ford pardon of Nixon, 1070, 1339, 1878, 2864, 2865
and impeachment, 1878
and judicial review, 467
limits of, 2319
as presidential power, 1235, 1878, 1996 and Sedition Act victims, 67, 1422 as unlimited, 1770
Parent-child relationships. See Family and the Constitution Parliamentary privilege, 1880
Pitt and, 1912
power to punish for contempt, 1880
speech or debate clause, 2464
Parochial schools. See Government aid to religious institutions
Parody
First Amendment coverage problems, 1377 noncoverage by libel law, 1322
Partial-birth abortion, 13, 14–15
Passenger cases, 1880
Passport restrictions. See Right to travel Patent, 1880–1882
copyright, 1880–1881
Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, 695–696
Grier opinions, 1230 intellectual property, 1337–1338, 1882
protection of, 2326
states' immunity from damage suits, 777 trademark and copyright vs., 1881
Paterson Plan. See New Jersey Plan
Patients' rights, 1884–1885
right to die, 2266–2271
and smallpox vaccination, 1884 treatment refusal, 1884
Patronage, 1885–1887
antipatronage doctrine, 1939
Branti v. Finkel, 226, 1939
and bureaucracy, 268
Elrod v. Burns, 226, 1885–1886, 1939, 1940 merit system vs., 1892
Pickering v. Board of Education, 1886
Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 1939, 2300–2301
Paxton's case, 1888–1889
general warrant, 1888
and Otis, 1865
writ of assistance, 132, 1099, 1888
Pendent jurisdiction, 1891
ancillary jurisdiction vs., 90
Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1028–1029
Pennhurst State School & Hospital v. Halderman, 1893

Pendleton Act, 1892
merit system for selecting U.S. employees, 1892 Pennsylvania Colonial Charters, 1894
bail, 151
colonial constitutions, 1894
and constitutionalism, 635–636
Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776, 1894–1895
as model for other state constitutions, 540 Paine contribution, 27
right against self-incrimination, 2235
right of revolution, 2248
Pentagon Papers case
Gravel v. United States, 1226 national security vs. free press, 1129, 1139, 1140, 1145
New York Times Co. v. United States, 1438–1439, 1805–1807, 2009
Penumbra theory, 1896
birth control, 1896, 2242
freedom of intimate association, 1896
right of privacy, 1810, 1896
Peonage, 1896–1897
Bailey v. Alabama, 151, 1310, 2900
Black Codes, 189
ruling against debt peonage ruling, 1960–1961
as substitute for black slavery, 1896–1897
Thirteenth Amendment and, 1960, 1961, 2900
Per curiam, 1898
Peremptory challenges, 1898–1899
Batson v. Kentucky, 1898–1899
and fair trial, 971
and jury discrimination, 1510, 1511, 2088, 2170
Persian Gulf War. See Gulf War Person, 1900–1901
abortion viability testing, 2872 constitutional references to, 1900 corporation as, 691, 692, 1900 doctrines of standing, 1900 fetus as, 5, 7, 8–9, 10, 11, 12, 14–15, 92, 1900, 2126, 2206, 2285, 2872 Fourth Amendment concept, 1901 property rights and human body, 2057–2058
right of privacy, 1901
right to die, 2267
substantive rights of, 1901
Personal liberty laws, 1901–1902
as anti-fugitive slave laws device, 3, 4, 1159, 1901, 2006
habeas corpus, 1901
as interposition, 1392
secession and, 2346
Personal relationships. See Freedom of intimate association
Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act (1996), 2875, 2876, 2877
Petition for Redress of Grievances. See Freedom of petition Petition of Right (1628), 1903
on bail, 148
Darnel's Case, 1903
due process, 828
on "law of the land" and "due process," 1571
quartering of troops, 2689
rule of law, 1903
sovereignty, 1903
as statute, 84
Third Amendment and, 1903
Petition rights. See Freedom of petition Petit jury, 1903
juror service as political right, 1514–151
jury size, 1515–1517
as right of the criminally accused, 2255
Sixth Amendment protection, 1091 trial jury, 1903
See also Jury discrimination
Philosophy and the Constitution, 1904–1906
Bill of Rights (United States), 1905
constitutional jurisprudence, 1505–1506 individual autonomy or majoritarian democracy, 1906
legal culture, 1576–1578
legal process school, 1578–1579 Lockean doctrines, 1639–1640 natural rights, 1904
original intent, 1506–1508, 1857–1859, 2127–2128
postmodern interpretation, 1971–1972
pragmatism, 1982–1984
and Reconstruction, 1905 separation of powers, 1904 theories of judicial review, 1905
See also Political philosophy of the Constitution Physician-assisted suicide. See Right to die Picketing, 1906–1908
and boycott, 215, 1551
and breach of peace, 702
as civil disobedience act, 370
civil rights boycott, 1551, 1556
clear and present danger test, 426
"content control," 1907
First Amendment protection, 375, 1047, 1556, 1921–1922
freedom of speech and, 1550, 1907
handbilling vs., 1553, 1906 individual residence ban, 1156 injunction, 1192, 1373, 1547, 2733
labor movement, 1906 regulation of, 1550–1551, 1561 in shopping centers, 1308, 2414
Thornhill v. Alabama, 1555
"unlawful objective test," 1907 upholding of peaceful, 1548, 1555, 1556
Pinckney Plan, 1909
Plain feel doctrine, 1912–1913
Plain view doctrine, 1913, 1913–1914 (update) and open fields doctrine, 1853
plain feel doctrine, 1912
search and seizure, 1913, 2680
Plea bargaining, 1917–1918
consent decree, 507
sentencing, 2367
speedy trial, 2465
unconstitutional conditions, 2749
waiver of constitutional rights, 2831
Warren Court and, 716
Plurality opinion, 1920
libel and, 829–830
as precedent, 1987
Plural marriage. See Polygamy
Pocket veto, 1920–1921
first employment, 1409 uses, 2784–2785
Pocket Veto Case, 1921
Police action, 1921
arrest, 120
Bricker Amendment, 243–244
declaration of war, 755–756
Korean War, 603, 1541–1542, 1921
and war powers, 2843, 2844
Police interrogation and confessions, 1922–1930, 1930–1931 (update 1), 1931–1932 (update 2)
Brown v. Mississippi, 256, 1923, 1924
Burger Court and, 1929
coerced confessions, 329, 2237
defendant's state of mind, 2062
due process test, 1280
Escobedo v. Illinois, 1925, 1926, 2263, 2264, 2856 inadmissible confession, 1931
"interrogation" definition, 2229–2230
juvenile proceedings, 1522
Massiah v. United States, 1925, 1929
McNabb-Mallory Rule, 1713–1714

Police interrogation and confessions (continued)
Miranda rules, 716, 1138, 1742–1744, 1922, 1923, 1926–1929, 1930, 2238, 2239–2240, 2263–2264, 2850, 2856
Miranda rules waiver, 1930–1931
Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act, 1852
right against self-incrimination, 2238, 2239–2240
rights of criminally accused, 2256, 2856
right to counsel, 1923, 1926, 1927, 1930, 1931, 2263 untrustworthiness rationale, 1924, 1929 voluntariness test, 1742–1743, 1924–1925, 1926, 1929, 1930, 2062, 2286
Police power, 1932
abuse of, 720
and affected with a public interest doctrine, 52, 1788–1789
and American Indians, 80, 81
commentators of the Constitution on, 451
constitutionalism and, 642
definition, 1932
and District of Columbia, 35
drug regulation, 823
economic due process, 838
and eminent domain, 889 freedom of contract subject to, 1294 Freund (E.) exposition of, 1154–1155 governmental assistance to children, 348 inalienable, 211–212, 1350 postal regulation, 1970 rate regulation, 1023 reserved power, 2218 vaccination and, 1415
vested rights and, 2783
zoning as, 2944–2945, 2946
See also National police power; Reserved police power; State police power
Police pursuits and constitutional rights, 1932
Political action committees, 1932–1933
campaign finance, 296
Political parties, 1933–1937, 1937–1938 (update) bipartisan foreign policy, 1076 direct primaries, 788, 789
Electoral College, 2740
electoral districting, 868
and federalism, 258, 1005–1006, 1940
Federalists, 1015–1017, 2861
federal judiciary appointments, 1019–1020 first demarcation of, 2861
freedom of association, 1108
gerrymander, 1188–1189, 1306 minor parties' status, 257, 1216, 1938 one-party primaries, 1041
patronage, 268, 1885–1886, 1939, 2300–2301
and presidential impeachment, 1342 presidential nominating conventions, 1934–1936 primary election, 2006–2008 public employee restrictions, 2066
reapportionment, 2136, 2137 shifts during 1850's, 564, 575–576 soft money spending, 1938
Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New York, 1938 two-party system, 1940
Washington's warning against, 1934
See also Campaign finance; Republican party; Whig party Political parties, elections, and constitutional law, 1938–1940 abortion issue, 11, 2872 affirmative action backlash, 56
antidiscrimination legislation, 98 control over nominating process, 1938
electoral districting, 868
presidential election of 1796, 549
presidential election of 1800, 549–550
as second and unofficial government, 258
See also Ballot access; Campaign finance Political parties in constitutional law, 1940–1944
Elrod v. Burns, 226, 1939, 1940
Terry v. Adams, 1941
Political philosophy of the Constitution, 1944–1947, 1947–1949 (update) critics of, 1957
deconstruction of, 756–759
interest groups, 1380–1382, 1947 liberal construction and, 1610–1613
liberalism and, 1613–1617
liberty emphasized over virtue, 1948–1949 Montesquieu's influence, 1755
pragmatism, 1982–1984
property linked with liberty, 2051 and questions of constitutional jurisprudence, 1507
ratifier intent, 2120
republicanism, 2211–2213
republicanism and modern theory, 2213–2215
selective judicial activism, 1447–1448
See also Interpretivism; Original intent; Originalism; Philosophy and the Constitution Political question doctrine, 1949–1951, 1951–1953 (update 1), 1953 (update 2)
Baker v. Carr, 138, 152–153, 233, 237, 1470, 1951, 1952, 1953
Civil War blockade decision as, 2022
Field v. Clark precedent, 1039 foreign affairs, 1076
guarantee clause, 1239
hearing of evidence against impeached judge, 1819
and judicial restraint, 1450
and justiciability, 1520, 1653, 1955
as liberal constitutional construction, 1612
Lincoln's affirmation of, 1624
Luther v. Borden, 1652–1653, 2210
Nixon v. United States, 1953 as precluding judicial review, 1454, 1470
and representation, 2202–2203
state action, 1652–163
Taney's reinforcement, 2650
Political speech. See Anonymous political speech; Campaign finance; Electoral process and the First Amendment; First Amendment; Freedom of speech; Subversion advocacy Political trials, 1953–1956
Politics, 1956–1958
and judicial independence, 1455–1457
majoritarian vs. minoritarian bias, 1956–1957
and Supreme Court appointments, 1615
See also Conservatism; Federalists; Jacksonianism; Jeffersonians; Liberalism; Political parties; Political question doctrine; Populism; Progressivism; Republican party; Whig party Poll tax, 1961
Breedlove v. Suttles, 228, 1961
Court denial of, 1271–1272
Court upholding of, 228 as equal protection denial, 1271
as invidious discrimination, 1401
Twenty-Fourth Amendment abolishment of, 73, 377, 1306, 1961, 2741 voting rights and, 392, 2808
as wealth discrimination, 1362, 1974, 2879
See also Capitation taxes

Pollution. See Environmental regulation and the Constitution; Federalism and environmental law; Waste, pollution, and the Constitution Polygamy, 1962–1962 beliefs vs. practices distinction, 2186, 2229
free exercise clause, 748, 1048, 1049
petition campaign, 2273
Reynolds v. United States, 2180, 2186, 2229
Popular consent. See Popular sovereignty in democratic political theory
Popular sovereignty, 1962
Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1525, 1526
Lincoln-Douglas debates, 1620, 1963
slavery in territories, 812, 1525, 1526, 1627, 1962, 2435
Taney Court and, 820
Wilmot Proviso and, 563, 1962, 2908
Popular sovereignty in democratic political theory, 1962–1964
Adams (John) reservations, 27
and amending process, 76, 77, 78
as constitutional political philosophy, 1945
and constitutional theory, 766
and Declaration of Independence, 752, 1962, 2248
and deliberative democracy, 763–764
and direct democracy, 785, 786
Framers' distrust of, 785
freedom of speech, 1126–1127
guarantee clause, 1238
Jacksonian, 1411–1413
Jeffersonian, 1423
through legislative power, 497
New Right jurisprudence, 1801
republican form of government, 2209
and right of revolution, 2248–2249
seditious libel and, 2352–2353
Populism, 1964–1965
constitutional amendments, 72 direct democracy, 785–785, 787–788 republican government vs., 1963
See also Popular sovereignty in democratic political theory Populist constitutional interpretation. See Nonjudicial interpretation of the Constitution; Radical Populist Constitutional interpretation Pornography, 1965–1967
child pornography, 350, 351, 375, 1646, 1802 content-neutral vs. content-based regulation, 1054, 1057
dial-a-porn, 778, 1148
First Amendment protections, 1965–1968
as hate speech, 1277–1278
Indiana ordinance unconstitutionality, 1966–1968 Internet, 1391
as low-value speech, 1134, 1646
Meese Commission, 1715–1716
as sex discrimination, 1134, 1965–1966, 1966–1968
Stevens's views, 2530
Stewart's "know it when I see it" aphorism, 1414, 1965
workplace harassment, 2926
See also Obscenity Pornography and feminism, 1966–1969 gender inequality argument, 1965–1966 hate speech theory, 1277–1278 regulation advocacy, 1054, 1057, 1134
Pornography over the telephone. See Dial-a-porn Posse Comitatus Act (1878), 1969
military enforcement of domestic law, 1568–1569 and President's use of armed forces, 448
Postal power, 1970–1971
Espionage Act powers, 2352
as federal criminal jurisdiction basis, 1567 mail refusal for antislavery literature, 384, 2425 over alleged foreign subversive propaganda, 1560, 1628 Postmodernism and constitutional interpretation, 1971–1972
deconstruction, 756–759, 1616
pragmatism, 1983
Poverty. See Indigent; Wealth discrimination; Welfare benefits Poverty law, 1972–1975
Edward v. California, 1973
welfare state, 2874–2875, 2877–2881
See also Welfare benefits; Welfare rights Pragmatism, 1982–1983, 1983–1984 (update) abortion decisions, 11
academic freedom, 21 of Clinton administration, 432
deconstruction, 756–759
formalist ideas supplanted by, 2339, 2342, 2343 as Holmes's approach, 1983
legal realism, 1580–1581
and living Constitution, 1632, 1633
Prayers in school. See Religion in public schools; School prayers
Preamble, 1985–1986
and amendment process (outside Article V), 78 deconstructionist readings of, 758
Precedent, 1986–1988
abortion rights, 12
affirmative action, 1304
campaign finance, 296
and common law, 465
and constitutional theory, 656
and interpretivism, 1395
and judicial activism and restraint, 1450
Marbury v. Madison as, 1669–1670 in New Deal, 1798
and opinion of the Court, 1854
and originalism, 1862
and overruling, 1868
Rehnquist Court overrulings, 2168
stare decisis, 2477–2478
Preemption, 1988–1989, 1989–1990 (update) and air traffic regulation, 263
and aliens, 66
and concurrent powers of federal and state governments, 484
and federalism, 996, 1010, 1289–1290
Fugitive Slave Act (1793) enforcement, 2555
and labor activity, 1554
legislative intent, 1593
Preferred freedoms, 1990–1991
Court's special role, 1311 and First Amendment-Fourteenth Amendment incorporation, 1051
fundamental rights, 1176
Rutledge endorsement, 2302
See also First Amendment; specific freedoms
Presentment, 1991
grand jury, 1220
law of the land, 828
line-item veto act violating, 1627
President and the treaty power, 1991–1994
as enumerated power, 1996
as foreign affairs power, 1071, 1074
Senate advice and consent, 47, 1073
Presidential Election Campaign Fund Act. See Federal Election Campaign Acts Presidential immunity, 1994
as absolute for official actions, 1335
Clinton v. Jones, 433–434, 1335, 1994
Nixon, United States v., 1818, 1994
Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 1335, 1994

Presidential ordinance-making power, 1994–1995
and concurrent resolution, 485
Presidential powers, 949, 1995–2000
appointing and removal, 109–111
Boland Amendment, 206 budget preparation and submission, 260, 261–62 congressional war powers vs., 755–756 crisis-enhanced, 741, 2290 differentiated from legislative power, 214
domestic violence clause, 803 emergency, 886–887
executive orders, 239
executive power, 946–949
expansive vs. narrow view of, 1995–1996
federal judicial appointments, 1018, 1019–1020
foreign affairs, 1071, 1073–1076, 1078–1081, 1996–1997, 2289–2290, 2836–2837
Hamilton's theory of, 2836–2837
implied, 1346
and impoundment of funds, 1349 independent counsel and judicial restrictions of, 1360 inherent, 1996, 2841
International Emergency Economic Powers Act, 1386
Jacksonian magnification of, 1409
Johnson's (Lyndon) concept of, 1430 judicial appointments, 1455–1456 judicial review vs., 1474–1475
Justice Jackson's sliding scale, 1996
Justice Story's views, 2554
Korean War, 1541
line-item veto proposals, 1625, 1626–1627
pardoning power, 1235, 1878, 1996
Prize Cases, 2866
Proclamation of Neutrality, 1259, 2045–2046
regulatory agencies, 2148–2149
Rehnquist Court restrictions, 2169
Roosevelt's (Theodore) broad view of, 1995, 2291 spending, 2000–2001
steel seizure controversy, 2526–2527, 2839, 2941
Supreme Court justice appointments, 111–112, 1018–1019, 1485
treaty power, 1991–1994
Truman's view of, 2734–2735
veto power, 196, 322, 547, 1999, 2784–2785
war powers. See Presidential war powers
Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 2941 Presidential removal. See Impeachment Presidential spending power, 2000–2001
impoundment of funds, 1349–1340, 1999
Presidential succession, 2001–2002
Twentieth Amendment, 2741
Twenty-Fifth Amendment, 73, 608–609, 2002, 2741
by vice president, 2786
Presidential war powers, 2002–2003
authority as commander-in-chief, 1075, 1996, 1997, 1998, 2844 based on practice and precedent, 1997–1998
Bush approach, 2002, 2843
Clinton approach, 1079, 2002–2003, 2844
concurrent resolution, 1998, 2838, 2843
for ending war, 494 Hamiltonian views of, 2836–2837
for initiating war, 1080 limitations, 2839
Lincoln's view of, 574, 1620–1621, 2840–2841
Prize Cases, 2022
Roosevelt's (F. D.) use of, 2290–2291
Truman's use of, 603
undeclared wars, 756, 1075
War Powers Acts, 1998
War Powers Resolution, 610–611, 1998, 2838–2839, 2843
in World War I, 2927–2928
See also Congressional war powers; War powers Press freedom. See Freedom of the press; Free press/fair trial Presumption of constitutionality. See Rational basis; Standard of review
Pretrial disclosure, 2003–2004
accusation notice, 2259
confrontation right, 492
and fair trial, 972
Preventive detention, 2004–2006
bail, 149, 150, 2005
Burger Court and, 273
Internal Security Act provisions, 1385–1386
Japanese American cases, 1415–1417
of juvenile offenders, 2005, 2317
punitive nature of, 2317
Racketeer Influences and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), 2306
Rehnquist's views, 2317
Salerno, United States v., 2162
Price controls. See Economic regulation; Police action; State police action
Price-fixing. See Antitrust law; Economic regulation Primary election, 2006–2007, 2007–2008 (update) as Article I voting right, 1941 black voter exclusion, 1041–1042, 1238, 2436 black voter participation, 392, 411 closed to independents, 1942
as direct democracy, 764
as direct elections, 788, 789, 1557
equal protection, 909 and independent voters, 1938, 1942
literacy test, 2485
opened to independents, 1938 party autonomy, 1938–1939 Populist platform, 1964
Progressive advocacy, 2047
racial discrimination, 1818, 1819
state action and, 1942, 2485
test case, 410, 423
white primary cases, 1941
Prior restraint and censorship, 2009–2011
demonstration rights, 768
Espionage Act, 923
First Amendment rights, 1049, 1317, 1788
Fourteenth Amendment rights, 1317 freedom of assembly, 1107
freedom of the press, 1138, 1139, 1144, 1145, 1438
free press/fair trial, 1150–1151
gag law, 1138, 1142 journalistic tort claims, 1438–1439
listeners' rights, 1628
motion pictures, 1106
Near v. Minnesota, 1788, 1806, 2009
Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 1789, 2010
Pentagon Papers case, 1438–1439, 1805–1807, 2009
religious services in park without permit, 1807
World War I, 2927
Prior testimony. See Confrontation, right of Prisoners' rights, 2011–2012, 2012–2013 (update 1), 2013 (update 2)
access to the courts, 23, 212, 2046
and body search, 205, 2013, 2244–2245
Burger Court on, 272

Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act, 653 constitutional violations and remedies, 654 correspondence censorship, 2046
cruel and unusual punishment, 654, 730, 731
drug testing, 824
freedom of speech regulation, 1134
habeas corpus, 1246–1255, 1434 lack of constitutional guarantees, 715 medical needs, 721 mental illness treatment with antipsychotic drugs, 2863
Pell v. Procunier, 1891
and privacy rights, 2244–2245 psychiatric treatment refusal, 2061
public forum doctrine, 2069
religious free expression, 1851, 2190 remedial litigation restraints, 1504
Stevens's views, 2529
voluntary self-incrimination, 1327 writ-writing assistance, 1434
Prison Litigation and Reform Act (1995), 1504
Privacy. See Reasonable expectation of privacy; Right of privacy Privacy Act (1974), 2013–2014
restricting flow of loyalty-security information, 1650
Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, 2365
Privacy and the First Amendment, 2014–2015
Private contract. See Freedom of contract
Private discrimination, 2015–2017
and antidiscrimination legislation, 413
and Civil Rights Act of 1866, 403
equal access laws, 2063
Reitman v. Mulkey, 2170–2171 residential discrimination, 2221
restrictive covenant, 2222–2223
Runyon v. McCrary, 2299–2300 state initiative supporting, 2170–2172 state laws vs., 1089
voting rights, 1415, 2938
Yarbrough, Ex parte, 2938
Privatization and the Constitution, 2017–2018
Privilege, evidentiary. See Evidentiary privilege Privilege against self-incrimination. See Right against self-incrimination Privileged comment. See Libel and the First Amendment Privilege from arrest, 2019
congressional privileges and immunities, 501 Privilege-right distinction. See Right-privilege distinction
Privileges and immunities, 2019–2022
abortion residency requirement, 2285 alien claims, 65 analysis for applying, 1798–1799
and antidiscrimination legislation, 96, 2021
Articles of Confederation clause, 540 and choice of law, 357 of citizens, 364, 686, 1354, 2019, 2021 congressional, 501–502
and federalism, 998
Fourteenth Amendment protection, 181, 1084, 1087–1088, 1091, 1125, 1357, 2020–2021, 2305
fundamental interests, 1172
and interstate commerce, 805, 806 interstate discrimination prohibitions, 1211–1212 nonresident employment ban as violating, 1286, 2020 privileges as distinct from immunities, 2251
and racial discrimination, 3
and search and seizure, 215–216
Slaughterhouse cases, 1091, 1354, 2021
state nonresident discrimination, 1286, 2020, 2218
substantive due process and, 2570, 2577
vested rights, 2784
voting rights and, 2388
women's claims, 218, 2920 Privy council, 2022
Prize Cases (1863), 2022
constitutionality upheld, 1230, 2868
and constitutional reason of state, 649 legality of blockade around seceding states, 415
Probable cause, 2022–2024
for administrative search, 43–44, 1095
Aguilar v. Texas, 2330, 2331
arrest, 120
arrest warrant, 120, 121
automobile search, 140, 244, 319, 329, 2169, 2846
civil forfeiture, 372–373
DNA forensic samples, 800
Draper v. United States, 2330
drug testing, 822, 825, 826, 827 dwelling inspections, 294
exclusionary rule, 938
exigent circumstances search, 956
fixed/variable, 2331 flight from officer not basis for, 2922
Fourth Amendment and, 2022–2024, 2331, 2333, 2334, 2338, 2339
grand jury, 1220, 1222
hearsay, 818
indictment, 1361
informant's tip, 1327, 1368
no-knock entry, 1820
plain view doctrine, 1913
prosecutorial discretion, 2058
real evidence, 2130
search and seizure, 1095, 2139
search warrant, 141, 1092, 1098, 1725, 2469, 2948
Spinelli v. United States, 2330 stop and frisk rule, 2552, 2675, 2939
third-party consent, 2689
traffic stops, 2711
unreasonable search, 71, 2022–2023, 2767
vagrancy laws, 2774
warrantless search, 140, 2329, 2846
wiretapping approval, 2913
Procedural activism/restraint. See Judicial activism and judicial restraint Procedural due process of law, civil, 2024–2031, 2031–2034 (update 1), 2034–2035 (update 2) administrative, 266, 1481–1482 alien removal, 1325
Bishop v. Wood, 184 and civil forfeiture, 2056 computer technology, 481 criminal due process vs., 709 damages, 739
deportation, 770
entitlement, 897, 2880–2881
failure to rehire nontenured college teacher, 203
freedom of intimate association, 1121
Hurtado v. California, 1321–1322
indigency, 1362
involuntary sterilization, 2422 and irrebuttable presumption, 1404 judicial review of administrative acts, 1481–1482
juvenile curfew laws, 1521
juvenile proceedings, 1523–1524
and law of the land, 828
mandatory maternity leave, 430
paddling of students, 1370
Parham v. J. R., 1878
Paul v. Davis, 1887–1888 property cases, 1749, 2053
public employees protections, 2066–2067

Procedural due process of law, civil (continued) punitive damages, 2082–2083 railroad rates, 346
by regulatory agencies, 2149
Social Security Act, 2445
student suspension, 1205 student termination, 201
taking of property, 2052
tort law, 2706
Procedural due process of law, criminal, 2035–2042, 2042–2045 (update)
bail, 147–151
civil due process vs., 709
exclusionary rule, 1666–1667, 2039
habeas corpus, 1100–1101, 1246–1255
indigent's right to prepare insanity defense, 64
irrebuttable presumption, 1404 jury service rights, 1514–1515
Moore v. Dempsey, 1758 police interrogation and confession, 1922–1932
preventive detention, 2306
prisoners' rights, 2013, 2863
public trial, 2076–2077
reasonable doubt, 2138–2139
sentencing, 2366, 2367
Warren Court and, 380
Process theory. See Legal process
Prochoice commentary. See Abortion and the Constitution Proclamation of Neutrality (1793), 2045–2046 cabinet participation, 288
executive power, 1259
Washington's issuance, 2861
Proclamations. See Presidential ordinance-making power Production, 2046
commerce and, 2560
Fair Labor Standards Act coverage, 966–967, 1539 interstate commerce distinction, 1536, 1539–1540
New Deal agricultural controls, 62
Progressive constitutional thought, 2046–2048
Darwinism and, 2713
judicial review and, 383
Wilson (Woodrow) theory, 2911 Progressivism, 2048–2050
child labor regulation, 2900
civil service statutes, 268
constitutional amendments, 72
constitutional interpretation, 1309
constitutional theory, 2046–2048
Declaration of Independence citations, 754 devolution and federalism issues, 777 direct election, 788 direct primary, 1557
economy and, 852
and federalism, 1008
initiative, 785, 1371
Justice Brandeis's views, 219, 223–224
Justice Day's views, 749
Justice Hand's (Learned) views, 1263
Justice Hughes's views, 1309–1310
LaFollette-Wheeler presidential ticket, 1557, 2884 national executive budget system, 261 and Populism, 1964
as prohibition movement ally, 2050
Pure Food and Drug Act, 2083–2084
recall, 2141
referendum, 785, 1557, 2146
representation reforms, 2202 as Roosevelt (Theodore) influence, 2292
White Court rulings, 2900
woman suffrage advocacy, 2918 Prohibition, 2050
and American Indians, 82
Eighteenth Amendment, 72, 75, 593, 598, 862
and federalism, 1168–1169
petition campaign, 2273
repeal of, 75, 594, 598, 2050, 2741
and state regulation of commerce, 1601, 2870
Taft Court and, 2641
Twenty-First Amendment, 73, 74–75, 594, 598
Volstead Act, 2803–2804
and woman suffrage movement, 2919
World War I, 2927
Prohibition, writ of, 2050
United States Courts of Appeals, 2050, 2760
Prohibition of Slave Trade Act (1807), 2050
as compromise, 2429
Prolife movement. See Anti-abortion movement
Proof standard. See Burden of proof; Reasonable doubt Property, 2051
alien ownership limitations, 129, 131 antiredistributive principle, 2051–2052
civil forfeiture, 372 constitutional respect for, 1945–1946, 2051 deprivation of, 2316
and due process, 1697
eminent domain, 2643
environmental regulation of private lands, 903 forfeiture in drug trafficking cases, 680 and homeless people, 1302 jurisdiction to tax, 1504–1505
just compensation, 1113, 1519
legal meaning, 2053, 2057, 2646 public forum criteria, 2068–2069
regulatory takings, 2149–2150, 2646
restrictive covenant, 2222–2223
and right of privacy, 2243
school district voting rights, 1542 as school finance basis, 1974–1975, 1977, 2309–2310, 2387, 2874 slaves as, 2426–2427
as voting requirement, 2052–2053, 2806
zoning, 2944–2946
See also Public forum; Taking of property Property rights, 2051–2055, 2055–2057 (update) of American Indians, 80, 82
Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge Company, 331–333
and contract clause, 673
of corporations, 687
Granger cases, 1224–1225
inheritance by illegitimate children, 1325–1326
intellectual property law, 1377–1378
investment-backed expectations and, 1564 as issue in free speech challenges, 1566 legislation adversely affecting, 2781 married women's coverture, 2920
procedural due process, 2035
racial equality in, 259
Rehnquist Court and, 2055–2056
sex discrimination, 36, 1112, 2920
slavery and, 2427
Stevens's views, 2532
substantive due process protection, 212, 259, 2048–2049, 2052, 2055–2056
Third Amendment affirmation, 2689
third-party consent, 2690
vested rights, 2782–2784
zoning infringement, 2946
Property rights and the human body, 2057–2058 organ transplants and sales, 2057–2058 tort protections, 2057

Proprietary prerogatives. See Government as proprietor Prosecutorial discretion and its constitutional limits, 2058–2059
double jeopardy, 807–811
evidence disclosure, 972, 2004
fair trial, 971–972
federal felony, 1568 immunity from suit, 1328 independent counsel, 1359–1360
jury nullification, 1512
pretrial disclosure, 2004, 2259
probable cause, 2023
racial discrimination, 2058, 2059, 2088
rights of the criminally accused, 2254–2257
Protests. See Civil disobedience; Demonstration Psychiatry and constitutional law, 2060–2062
Public accommodations, 2062–2063
Americans with Disabilities Act, 86, 87
antidiscrimination legislation, 97, 168, 413, 1089
civil liberties and, 379
Civil Rights Act of 1875, 404, 1089, 1437, 2062
Civil Rights Act of 1964, 405, 1282–1283
medical facility abortion restrictions, 7–9, 12
Plessy v. Ferguson legitimizing segregation, 1919 segregation in, 253, 2354, 2415, 2420, 2486, 2693
separate but equal doctrine, 1918, 1919 sexual preference discrimination, 1320
sit-ins, 168, 2420
Public assistance. See Welfare benefits; Welfare rights Public choice theory and constitutional jurisprudence, 2063–2064
Article III and, 122
Public employees, 2065–2067
affirmative action, 57
alien exclusions, 1065, 1077, 1262, 1331
civil service statutes, 268 compensation for outside speeches or articles, 1782 congressional regulation of state and municipal, 1776 damages claims against, 740 discharge for criticizing superior upheld, 2866 drug testing of, 824–827, 1096
Fair Labor Standards Act application, 967, 1549
Federal Bureau of Investigation investigations of, 976 federal rights violation suit, 1751 federal segregation, 1025, 2911 federal segregation ended, 605
and First Amendment, 36, 2252
free speech rights, 22, 892, 1134, 1137, 2866
Hatch Act, 251, 268, 1275
intergovernmental taxation, 1226, 1384 labor relations rights, 1552 liabilities for wrongs, 1217–1218
loyalty oath, 1187, 1648, 2904
loyalty-security programs, 1649–1650 merit system, 1892
overbreadth doctrine, 150–251
patronage, 226, 268, 1885–1887, 1939
Pendleton Act, 1892 political activity prohibition, 251, 268, 1275
right-privilege distinction, 22, 36, 2065–2066, 2252
Public facilities. See Public accommodations Public figure, 2067
defamation vs. freedom of the press, 1133, 1141, 1146, 2014 libel as actual malice, 1062, 1189, 1285, 1322, 1607, 1609, 2067, 2850, 2855 nonrecovery of defamation damages, 1133, 1322 Public forum, 2067–2068, 2068–2069 (update 1), 2069–2071 (update 2) access to, 369 airport terminals, 1391
Burger Court and, 2167
captive audience, 313
children's speech rights, 351
Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., 686–687
Cox v. Louisiana, 702
Cox v. New Hampshire, 702 criteria, 2068–2069
demonstrations, 702, 767
distribution of literature, 1283, 1317, 1391
freedom of assembly, 702, 1107, 1317 freedom of speech limitations, 34, 203, 369, 1131, 1134, 2009, 2067, 2167
hostile audience, 1304–1305
Hughes Court ruling, 1317
nonpublic forum distinction, 2068–2069
Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association, 1899 picketing standards, 702, 1550–1551 posting of political campaign signs, 369 property rights vs. free speech, 1565–1566
Rehnquist Court and, 2167
religion as "viewpoint" ruling, 1560
religious speech, 2173, 2189–2190, 2194, 2904 religious symbols displays, 312, 1054–1055, 1653, 2166, 2196–2197
religious use of state property, 2198
shopping centers, 476, 1131, 1308, 1566, 1672, 2060, 2414–2415 speeches, parades, and meetings, 702
Public interest law, 2071–2072
Brandeis influence on, 219, 223–224
standard of review, 1588
See also Judicial legislation; Judicial strategy; Public law litigation Publicity. See Commercial speech; Intellectual property law and the First Amendment Public law litigation, 2072–2073
and legal process school, 1578
Public purpose doctrine, 2073–2076
Dillon as leading advocate, 783–784 narrow interpretations of, 2311
regulatory takings, 2151
taking of property, 2055, 2074–2076
Public relief. See Welfare benefits
Public school desegregation. See Desegregation Public schools. See Education and the Constitution; Religion in public schools
Public trial, 2076–2078
closed pretrial proceedings, 1181, 1214, 2077
free press/fair trial, 1142, 2077
Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 2231–2232, 2271–2272
as right of criminally accused, 2256
Public understanding of Supreme Court opinions, 2078–2079
journalists' coverage of proceedings, 1439–1441
Public use, 2079
affected with a public interest, 2917
just compensation for property taken, 1519
Peckham's views, 1890
public purpose doctrine, 2074–2075

Public utilities regulation. See Economic regulation Public Utility Holding Company Act (1935), 2079–2080
  securities law, 2350
Public works. See Internal improvements; New Deal
Puerto Rico, 2080
  commonwealth status, 468
  emigrant voting rights, 1527, 1629
  federal district court, 1491, 1492 gambling statute, 1969
  legislative court, 1589
  territorial status, 2672
Puerto Rico, constitutional status of, 2080–2081
  insular cases, 1375–1376
Punishment. See Capital punishment; Cruel and unusual punishment; Sentencing Punitive damages, 2081–2082, 2082–2083 (update)
  and antidiscrimination legislation, 99, 100
  excessive as due process violations, 2055–2056
  Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip, 2314
  Scalia's views, 2314, 2315
  Smith v. Wade, 739
  tort, 2081–2083
Pure Food and Drug Act (1906), 2083–2084
  Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act revision of, 1069
  and interstate commerce, 1290, 2083
  as national police power, 1001, 2083
  upheld, 2899

Q

Quasi-public corporations. See Privatization and the Constitution Quotas, racial. See Racial quotas

R

Race and criminal justice, 2087–2089
  capital punishment, 2087–2088
  crack cocaine regulation, 703
Race and sex in antidiscrimination law, 2089–2093
  Civil Rights Act of 1991, 99–100
  color of law, 2092
  compelling state interest, 2091
  "compounded identities," 2090
  Degraffenreid v. General Motors Assembly Division, 2089–2091 disparate impact, 99, 100
  employment discrimination, 99, 100–101, 1232, 2089
  and Fourteenth Amendment, 2089, 2091
  Jefferies v. Harris County Community Action Association, 2090–2091
  standard of review, 2092
  strict scrutiny, 2091
Race and voting, 2093–2094
  gerrymander, 392, 1783, 2093, 2136, 2137, 2814
  multimember district, 1751, 1765, 2135
  reapportionment, 1735, 2093, 2136–2137, 2756
  See also Electoral districting; Poll tax; Voting rights; Voting Rights Act of 1965 and its amendments Race-consciousness, 2094–2096
  adoption same-race preferences, 46
  affirmative action, 52–58, 2094–2095, 2230–2231
  afrocentric schools, 58
  and antidiscrimination legislation, 99–100
  benign racial classification, 169
  broadcasting license awards, 1723, 2165
  child custody, 799–800
  discrete and insular minorities, 794, 2095
  employer speech restrictions, 1552
  gerrymander, 392, 1188, 1783, 2093, 2136, 2137, 2814
  judicial activism, 1448
  jury discrimination, 1511–1512
  minority business enterprises, 1172, 2230–2231 racial preference, 2146–2147
  racial proportionality, 2095
  reapportionment, 2136–2137, 2756
  strict scrutiny, 2170
Race, reproduction, and constitutional law, 2096–2098
  abortion-access restrictions, 7–9, 2097 Racial balance, 2098–2099
  busing for, 2320
Racial classification. See Benign racial classification; Invidious discrimination; Racial discrimination; Suspect classification Racial discrimination, 2099–2105, 2105–2107 (update 1), 2108 (update 2) in adoption policies, 46 affirmative action as remedy, 55–56, 2103–2105 affirmative action distinction, 232
  and afrocentric schools, 58 against American Indians, 83 against Asian Americans, 128–132, 1328–1331, 2939–2940. See also Japanese American cases alien rights, 1331
  by armed forces, 117–118
  badges of servitude, 145–146
  benign and ameliorative, 169, 794, 2106, 2146, 2165
  Black Codes, 189
  Brown v. Board of Education, 253–255, 771–772, 2099–2100
  Buchanan v. Warley, 259 on buses, 1761 in capital punishment, 300, 303, 306, 307–309, 310, 732, 733, 1702–1703, 2087, 2106–2107
  in citizenship denial, 129, 130–131, 819, 820 civil disobedience against, 371
  civil liberties and, 377
  Civil Rights Act of 1866, 403, 2100
  Civil Rights Act of 1964, 405, 2107
  class action lawsuits, 422
  and commerce clause, 459
  and compelling state interest, 2106
  constitutional colorblindness, 2105, 2108 in criminal justice system, 2087–2089, 2106, 2107
  and critical legal studies, 724
  and critical race theory, 726–728
  difference and constitutional equality, 780–781
  Dred Scott v. Sandford, 818–820, 2099 effects test, 2101–2104 in electoral districting, 868, 2286
  and equal protection clause, 116, 909, 915–916, 2108
  fighting words, 1057
  Fourteenth Amendment protections, 186, 771, 1084–1089, 1239–1241, 1437, 2093, 2099, 2101–2102, 2106, 2108
  Fuller Court and, 1167–1168
  group libel and, 1235–1236
  Guest, United States v., 1239–1241, 1437 and hate crime, 1275–1277
  and hate speech, 1277, 1278
  in housing, 1289
  and illegitimacy inheritance, 1605

in immigration and alienage, 1328–1329 and institutional tax-exempt status, 204
interstate commerce, 1257
invidious discrimination, 1038, 1401
Japanese American cases, 131, 1415–1417, 1871, 2107, 2930–2931
Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co., 1437
and judicial power, 1471–1472
in jury composition, 165, 189, 253, 1038, 1509, 1510–1511, 1787, 1825, 2558–2559, 2907
Justice Department civil rights actions, 136, 410–411
King's leadership of civil rights movement, 1536–1537 in land ownership, 1871
literacy tests, 1090, 1629 in local government, 1637, 1638
miscegenation laws, 1645–1646
multimember districts, 1751, 1765, 2135, 2136
neutrality principle, 2164, 2165, 2166
Pace v. Alabama, 1873
Plessy v. Ferguson, 253, 771, 1167, 1918–1919
political trials, 1955
poll tax, 1961
in primary elections, 1238, 1941, 2007, 2008, 1818, 1819 private, 1240–1241, 1437, 2015–2017 by private club, 1758 and private contracts, 407 by private religious schools, 2017 by private schools, 2299–2300
and property rights, 259
prosecutorial discretion and, 2058, 2059
in public accommodations, 168, 1282–1283, 2062–2063 purposeful, 2627 racial quota remedy, 1172, 2110–2111
and reapportionment, 2756
Reconstruction era, 578
Regents of University of California v. Bakke, 2104–2105
Rehnquist court and, 2164–2167
and republican form of government, 2210
residential segregation, 2219–2222
restrictive covenants, 2222–2223, 2410–2411 ripeness of protest action, 1865
separate but equal doctrine, 253, 1167, 2369–2370
sit-ins against, 2420
social science research, 2441, 2443–2444
state action, 280, 2491
strict scrutiny, 1417, 1448, 2106, 2108, 2170
suspect classification, 169, 186, 780–781, 1416, 1646, 2842
Vinson Court and, 2792, 2793
Warren Court and, 380, 2853–2854
White Court and, 2900–2901
workplace harassment as, 2926
zoning, 2220–221, 2945
See also Antidiscrimination legislation; Civil rights; Civil rights movement; Desegregation; Fifteenth Amendment; Segregation; Slavery and civil liberties; Slavery and the Constitution; Thirteenth Amendment; Voting rights Racial intermarriage. See Miscegenation Racial preference, 2109–2110
adoption placement, 45–47 aid to religious schools, 2110
Bakke decision, 2146–2147
Civil Rights Act of 1964, 2109
in state university acceptance, 2146–2147
See also Affirmative action; Race-consciousness; Racial quotas Racial quotas, 2110–2111
and affirmative action, 53, 54, 57
as badge of servitude, 2110
as benign racial classification, 169
Croson justification standard, 2165 and discrete and insular minorities, 794 immigration, 1329 minority business enterprises validity, 1172
Regents of University of California v. Bakke, 2110–2111 state university admissions, 2146
Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), 2111–2113
for anti-abortion violence, 13, 93, 2112
and criminal conspiracy, 708 as federal criminal law, 982, 984, 1568
and freedom of speech, 1152–1153
and preventive detention, 2306
Radical Populist constitutional interpretation, 2113–2114
Radio. See Broadcasting
Railroad Control Act (1918), 2114
Railroad regulation. See Economic regulation
Railroad Retirement Act (1934), 2114–2115
Railroads
employee drug testing, 679 employee retirement, 2114–2115
interstate commerce, 584
just compensation, 345
procedural due process, 346
Railroad Control Act, 2114
rate-setting. See Economic regulation
state taxation of commerce, 584
substantive due process, 346
taking of property, 345
Webb-Kenyon Act upheld, 421
Railway Labor Act, 392, 596
Rate regulation. See Economic regulation
Ratification of constitutional amendments, 2116–2118
District of Columbia representation failure, 796, 797 Eighteenth Amendment, 72, 862
equal rights amendment failure, 614, 2117, 2921
Fifteenth Amendment, 1040
Fourteenth Amendment, 1085, 2143
history of, 72–76
Nineteenth Amendment, 2917–2918
rescission debate, 74
Ratification of the Constitution, 2118–2119
Anti-Federalist opposition, 101–102, 1421, 1561, 1575, 1688, 2938
Bill of Rights inclusion, 32, 176–178, 1045, 1421, 1611, 2118–2119
campaign for, 523
Dickinson essays supporting, 780
and dual federalism, 995
due process clause, 829
Federalist arguments for, 1013–1015, 1258–1259, 1947, 2119
Federalists' strategy for, 2118
Hamilton's contribution, 1258–1259
Madison's contribution, 1657–1658
Pendleton's role, 1892
Pinkney's role, 1910
Randolph's (Edmund) role, 2116
Sherman's role, 2412
Washington's stature and, 2119
Wilson's (James) contribution, 2909
Yates's "Brutus" letters, 2938
Ratifier intent, 2120–2121
Ratio decidendi, 2121
grounds of opinion, 1235
opinion of the Court, 1854
Rational basis, 2121–2122, 2122–2123 (update) in age discrimination, 59 in alienage disqualification, 66, 72
census and, 326

Rational basis (continued) difference and constitutional equality, 781–782 economic regulations, 1990
equal protection, 914
in fetal viability tests, 8, 9 in governmental classification, 678 group homes for mentally retarded, 790, 792
Japanese American cases, 1416–1417 least restrictive means test vs., 1573 as legislation standard, 1588
legislative facts, 1590
legislative intent, 1593
public use, 2079
in school finance, 2309 in sex discrimination, 2390, 2399
in voting rights, 1271–1272
in wealth discrimination, 741, 742 in zoning cases, 428, 2945
Real evidence, 2130
Reapportionment, 2130–2136, 2136–2138 (update)
Baker v. Carr, 138, 152–153, 233, 237, 1470, 1951, 1952, 1953, 1987, 2131, 2132, 2227, 2228, 2849
black-majority congressional districts, 1735
Burger Court and, 273–274
census's role in, 326, 2136, 2137
electoral districting, 869
gerrymander, 153, 1187–1189, 1952, 2135 judicial authority dissent, 1470
judicial policymaking, 1461
justiciability, 2133, 2137, 2203, 2227
liberalism and, 1615
Mahan v. Howell, 1664–1665
O'Connor opinion, 1783
one person, one vote, 1852–1853
political question doctrine, 1951, 1952
precedent case, 1987 race-conscious, 2136–2137, 2756
racial, 1735, 2093
racial discrimination, 2756
representation reform, 2202
Reynolds v. Sims, 273, 2133, 2134, 2854
Warren Court and, 273, 1615, 2849, 2854, 2857
Wesberry v. Sanders, 1461, 2133–2134
See also One person, one vote
Reasonable doubt, 2138–2139
and Attorney General's List, 138 and burden of proof, 264, 1434
and capital punishment, 302, 311
and evidence disclosure, 972
and fair trial, 972
and grand jury, 1222
and guilt establishment, 718 and harmless error, 1270 and jury nullification, 1512–1514
in juvenile proceedings, 1523, 2912
and nonunanimous jury, 1434, 1518
as right of criminally accused, 2254, 2255
Reasonable expectation of privacy, 2139–2141
and drug testing, 825, 826–827, 2337
and electronic eavesdropping, 1527, 2139
and Fourth Amendment, 1093–1094
and grand jury, 1220, 1221, 1222, 1223
Katz v. United States, 1093, 1527, 2139–2140, 2141
Miller, United States v., 2140 and open fields doctrine, 1853
and property rights, 2052
Smith v. Maryland, 2140–2141 and trash search, 294
and unreasonable search, 2768
and unwarranted search, 141, 1527
See also Privacy Act; Privacy and the First Amendment; Right of privacy; Unreasonable search Reason of state. See Constitutional reason of state Recall, 2141
direct, 788
Progressive advocacy, 2047, 2292
Reciprocal tax immunities. See Intergovernmental tax immunities Reconstruction, 2142–2144
amendments, 72, 73–74, 577, 578
Bill of Rights amendments, 577, 578
Bill of Rights-Fourteenth Amendment incorporation, 178, 179–180. See also Incorporation doctrine black franchise, 1039
Chase Court, 338–340
civil rights activity during, 394
and conquered provinces theory, 504
as "constitutional moment," 764
Court-packing plan, 697
federal enforcement of civil rights, 1024 federal jurisdiction, 1501
Force Acts, 1070
Freedmen's Bureau, 1106
guarantee clause, 1238
habeas corpus, 1252, 1256
and individualistic rights, 1091–1092
Johnson (Andrew) policy, 2142, 1428. See also Articles of impeachment of Andrew Johnson
Joint Committee on Reconstruction, 1436
Judiciary Act of 1875, 1497
Justice Davis's views, 746
Lincoln's plan, 1625, 2142, 2818
Military Reconstruction Acts, 1436, 1728
Omnibus Act, 1851–1852
philosophy of the Constitution and, 1905 Posse Comitatus Act, 1969
republican form of government and, 2210
state suicide theory, 2520
Supreme Court and, 2591
Wade-Davis bill, 2818
Waite Court, 2822–2823
woman suffrage denial, 69, 1740, 2477, 2807–2808, 2918, 2919, 2920
Reconstruction amendments. See Fifteenth Amendment; Fourteenth Amendment; Thirteenth Amendment
Records of the Federal Convention (Farrand, ed.), 975
Redistricting. See Reapportionment
Redress of grievances. See Freedom of petition
Red Scare. See Communist party; Palmer raids; Subversive activity Referendum, 2146
campaign finance and, 295
deliberative democracy vs., 763–764
as direct democracy, 785, 787–788
as direct legislation, 788 equal protection attack, 1415
guarantee clause challenges, 789, 1238, 1239
Lecompton constitution, 1574
Progressive advocacy, 1557, 2047
regulation, 866
See also Initiative Regulation. See Economic regulation
Regulatory agencies, 2147–2149
broadcasting, 246–247, 249, 968–969, 1147, 2148
cable television explicit programming, 1134
cease and desist orders, 325 commissions' purposes, 2049 conservative deregulation, 776 and the economy, 852
environmental law, 1009–1010 and fair return on fair value, 969–970

Federal Trade Commission Act, 1030–1031
Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, 1069
and freedom of contract, 1116–1117
and interstate commerce, 805, 1397–1398, 2147–2148
and legislative veto, 1599
state police power, 1023
Water Power Act, 2865–2866
Regulatory takings, 2149–2152
Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel, 2226 economic viability test, 2055, 2150–2151 first application of takings clause, 2646
just compensation, 2150
Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council, 1651, 2149, 2150
and retroactivity of legislation, 2226
Rehabilitation Act (1973), 2152
as antidiscrimination legislation, 95, 406, 791, 1027
Rehearing, 2152
Rehnquist Court, 2160–2168, 2168–2170 (update)
abortion rights, 2872
capital punishment, 281, 2169
case-specific decisions, 2866
civil liberties, 380–381, 384
and critical race theory, 727
devolution, 776
as doctrinally splintered, 2161–2162
Fourth Amendment activity, 1095–1098
habeas corpus review, 1252, 1253, 1254
Kennedy as swing vote, 1530–1532
neutrality principle, 2164–2167, 2169–2170
political parties, 1938
preventive detention, 2317
property rights, 2055–2056
reapportionment, 2137–2138
reasonable expectation of privacy, 1093–1094
Rehnquist flexibility, 2158
search and seizure, 2340
sex discrimination, 2395
and social change, 700 solicitor general's role in, 2451
standard of review, 2472
standing, 122
state action cases, 400, 2487, 2492
unconstitutional conditions, 2750–2751
Released time, 2171–2172
college students' religious use of state university property vs., 2198
McCollum v. Board of Education, 1703–1704, 2171, 2176 off-premise allowed, 2171–2172, 2947 on-premise denied, 1703–1704, 2171
separation of church and state, 2371
Zorach v. Clausen, 2171–2172, 2947
Religion and fraud, 2172, 2194
Religion and free speech, 2172–2173
equal access, 2185
Jehovah Witnesses cases, 1410–1411, 2172–2173, 2186
in public forum, 2194
religion as "viewpoint" ruling, 1559–1560
religious use of state property, 2198
school facilities for student groups, 2178, 2179, 2185 teacher statements of own beliefs, 2178
unpopular sects, 2189–2190
See also School prayers Religion and secularism in constitutional interpretation and democratic debate, 2173–2174
conscientious objection, 2188
crèche and menorah as elements in secular holiday displays, 2196–2197, 2198 public school curriculum, 2177–2178
religious diversity, 2180–2181
Religion clauses in interaction, 2175–2176
constitutional provisions, 2185
school-sponsored religious exercises, 2179
Religion in public schools, 2176–2177, 2177–2178 (update 1), 2179–2180 (update 2)
Bible reading, 587
constitutional issues, 854–855
creationism teaching, 706–708, 2177 equal access rationale, 2185
and establishment clause, 1, 1048–1049, 2176
fundamentalist objectives, 706–708, 1049, 2177–2178, 2184–2185
and Lemon test, 203, 1206, 1208, 1209 outside school hours, 2178, 2179, 2185
private religious speech, 2179
Reagan's views, 2125–2126
released time, 1703–1704, 2171–2172, 2176, 2947
and separation of church and state, 2370 student on-campus worship meeting, 203
Ten Commandments posting, 2177
Warren Court and, 2856
See also Government aid to religious institutions; School prayers Religious diversity and the Constitution, 2180–2181
Religious freedom. See Religious liberty Religious Freedom Restoration Act (1993), 2181–2183
compelling state interest test, 625, 2195
and Fourteenth Amendment powers, 991 invalidation of state law cases, 2169, 2181, 2182, 2195
Religious fundamentalism, 2183–2185
creationism teaching, 706–708, 2184–2185
objections to public school curricula, 2177–2178, 2184–2185
and rulings against school prayer and Bible reading, 1049
Tennessee v. Scopes, 2666
Religious institutions and government aid. See Government aid to religious institutions Religious liberty, 2185–2192, 2192–2194 (update 1), 2194–2195 (update 2)
accommodation of religion, 24, 2194–2195
American Indian cases, 82, 1653, 2181. See also subhead peyote sacramental use below
Amish school-leaving age, 2187, 2914
bad tendency test, 1177
belief and action distinction, 2186, 2187, 2192, 2229, 2914
Burger Court and, 273
censorship of alleged sacrilegious films, 279 and child custody, 799–800
as civil liberty, 373
communitarians on, 473
compelling state interest test, 821, 2178, 2182, 2187
and conscientious objection, 505–506, 2187–2188
content-neutral and content-based regulation, 1053, 1054–1055 delineation of constitutional protection, 1049, 2192
Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 2182, 2184 establishment clause interaction, 2175–2176, 2185, 2187, 2192 and expansive definitions of religion, 2173–2174
federalism and, 624

Religious liberty (continued)
First Amendment and, 187–188, 389, 1045, 1046, 1047, 1053, 1768, 2186 flag salute in schools case, 1065, 2186 fraud protection vs., 2172, 2190
incidental burdens on, 1351
and incorporation doctrine, 179, 1008, 2186
as Jeffersonian constitutionalism element, 1423–1424
Maryland Toleration Act, 1691
and Mormon charter repeal, 358–359 nonapplicable to exemption from neutral law, 2175 off-premises released time, 2172 Penn's advocacy, 1892, 1894
peyote sacramental use, 821–822, 823, 1207, 2165–2166, 2181, 2182, 2184, 2192, 2194–2195
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 1908 polygamy's nonprotection, 1961, 2180, 2186
as preferred freedom, 1990
prisoners' rights, 1851, 2190
religious diversity, 2180–2181
Religious Freedom Restoration Act, 2181–2182
religious fundamentalism and, 2183–2185
Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Charter of, 2230
and right against self-incrimination, 2235
Sabbatarian cases, 1105, 2191, 2192, 2195, 2584 school curriculum objections, 2177–2178, 2184 secular regulation of, 748, 2008 separation of church and state and, 2371
slavery and, 2426
of solicitors, 299, 461 street-corner preaching and, 1542
strict scrutiny, 1575
Sunday closing laws, 2584 symbols in public places, 1054–1055, 1653, 2166, 2196–2197, 2198
Toleration Act, 2704–2705
value pluralism and, 2778
Virginia Statute of Religious Freedom, 2801
Williams (Roger) advocacy, 2906
yarmulke prohibition, 1292, 2192
See also Establishment clause; Establishment of religions; Government aid to religious institutions; Religion in public schools; Separation of church and state

Religious schools. See Government aid to religious institutions

Religious symbols in public places, 2196–2197
Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette, 312–313
County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 695
crèche display invalidated, 1054–1055
crèche or menorah display as part of seasonal exhibit, 1653, 2166, 2196 government endorsement test, 2196 use of state property, 2198

Religious test for public office, 2197–2198
Adams (John) advocacy, 27
Article IV prohibition, 2192

Religious use of state property, 2198

Remand, 2198

Remedies. See Constitutional remedies; Exhaustion of remedies

Removal of cases, 2198–2199
Chase Court, 338
civil rights, 402, 403, 414–415
and color of law, 445
and concurrent jurisdiction, 483
Judiciary Act of 1875, 1497, 2199
from state to federal courts, 414

Removal power. See Appointing and removal power, presidential Rendition. See Fugitive from justice; Fugitive slavery

Repeal Act (1894). See Civil Rights Repeal Act

Reporter's privilege, 2199–2200
and contempt of court, 1143, 1150
and freedom of the press, 1143
and grand jury testimony, 226, 1051, 1438, 2200
shield laws, 2413
and tort liability, 1438–1439

Report of the Conference of Chief Justices on Federal-State Relationships (1958), 2200–2201

Representation, 2201–2203
agency relationship, 2063–2064
Anti-Federalist view of, 102, 763
bicameralism, 171–173
and black disenfranchisement, 1092, 2093
British denial to American colonies, 27 census requirement, 326
and deliberative democracy, 763
District of Columbia denial of, 796–797, 798
Federalist definition, 1015
Federalists' view of, 763 filter theory of, 763
gerrymander, 1187–1188
Great Compromise, 1228
guarantee clause, 1238
in House of Representatives, 1305, 1306
multimember districts, 1765, 2135
Paine on, 1874
Puerto Rico, 2080
reapportionment, 152–153, 2130–2138, 2202, 2857 and republican government, 1963
in Senate, 172, 2357
three-fifths formula, 545, 2700
See also Electoral districting

Reproductive autonomy, 2203–2209
abortion, 5–11, 196
for adolescents, 193, 212, 317, 1293, 2204 birth control, 182, 1122, 1233–1234, 2203–2204
as civil liberty, 376, 380
DNA sampling excluded from, 800
and freedom of intimate association, 1119, 1120, 1122
Harris v. McRae, 1272–1273 and implied rights, 2163
involuntary sterilization, 2528
and judicial policymaking, 1461–1462
Maher v. Roe, 1665, 2205
property rights in the human body, 2057
race discrimination and, 2096–2098
right of privacy, 1289, 2052, 2242, 2243
Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton significance, 2284–2286, 2921
sex discrimination and, 2394
substantive due process and, 2573–2574
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 2872
See also Abortion and the Constitution; Birth control; Race, reproduction, and Constitutional law; Sterilization

Republican form of government, 2209–2211
Anti-Federalist definition of, 102, 1412
Constitution as embodiment, 1633 deliberative democracy, 763–764
federalism and, 998
first judicial exposition (1849), 1652, 2210
guarantee clause, 703, 1238–1239
initiative and, 785 initiative seen contrary to, 1371

Jacksonianism and, 1412–1413
liberalism and, 1614
political question doctrine, 1949–1950 and popular consent, 1962–1963 populism vs., 1963
as requirement for Confederate state's return to Union, 2818 and sanction of slavery, 1947
Republicanism, 2211–2213
Anti-Federalists and, 1957
guarantee clause, 1239
modern application of traditional thought, 2215
Republicanism and modern constitutional theory, 2213–2216
Republican party, 2216–2217
on Bill of Rights protections, 1357 contemporary political agenda, 2161
devolution agenda, 775–776
Fifteenth Amendment, 1039–1041
Fourteenth Amendment, 1084–1085, 1088
Lincoln leadership, 1620
Reconstruction policy, 2210
slavery in the territories issue, 3, 2216–2217, 2425, 2425–2426 Stevens (Thaddeus) power, 2539–2540
theory of the Union, 30
as Whig party successor, 1526, 2884
Republicans, Jeffersonian. See Jeffersonianism
Reserved police power, 2218
contract clause, 744–746, 1301, 1645, 2218
Reserve powers of states and people. See Tenth Amendment Residence requirements, 2218–2219
abortion, 2285
divorce, 799, 2219
hunting license fees, 157 privileges and immunities scrutiny, 1286, 2020, 2218
and right to travel, 2275–2276, 2277
state automobile tax, 2907 state law discrimination against out-of-staters, 2020
voting rights, 830–831, 2219, 2813
welfare assistance, 1973, 2218, 2219, 2275, 2873, 2874, 2877, 2878–2879
Zobel v. Williams, 2275–2276, 2277
Residential segregation, 2219–2222
Civil Rights Act of 1866 application, 393, 2220, 2221
Civil Rights Act of 1968 application, 393, 406, 407 class action suit against street closing, 1717 Fourteenth Amendment application, 2900
open housing laws, 1853–1854
restrictive covenant, 2222–2223
"white flight," 1231
zoning, 2947
Res judicata, 2222
Restrictive covenant, 2222–2221
and civil liberties, 377
Corrigan v. Buckley, 693
equal protection, 909
and Fourteenth Amendment, 163, 389 indirect enforcement, 163–164
as racial discrimination, 2410–2411 residential segregation cases, 2219
as segregation, 2355
and state action, 2484, 2485 unconstitutionality of, 2751
Vinson Court and, 2795
Retirement. See Age discrimination
Retroactivity of judicial decisions, 2223–2225
Retroactivity of legislation, 2225, 2225–2226 (update)
antidiscrimination law, 99–100
Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, 103
Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel, 2226
ex post facto, 957–958
Revenue sharing, 2226–2227
as federal grants-in-aid, 987
and federalism, 1003
Reverse discrimination. See Affirmative action; Race-consciousness; Racial preference; Racial quotas
Revised Statutes of the United States (1875), 2227
Judiciary Code, 1451
Revolution, right of. See Right of revolution Revolutionary War. See American Revolution and constitutional theory
RFRA. See Religious Freedom Restoration Act
Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Charter of (1663), 2230
RICO. See Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act Right argument for subsistence as, 2874–2875 privilege distinction, 2251–2252
See also Fundamental rights; headings beginning with Freedom of and those beginning with Right Right against self-incrimination, 2232–2239, 2239–2241 (update) adverse comment, 1231 alcohol testing refusal, 2458
blood samples, 2319
body search as non-violation of, 205
Boyd v. United States, 215–216, 2236
capital punishment and, 302
coerced confessions, 256, 329, 1183 collective entity rule, 2241
and common law, 1617–1618
and Communist Control Act (1954), 472 and compulsory process, 64, 470 corporate records, 227
DNA samples excluded from, 800
and due process, 828, 2039
electronic eavesdropping, 873
Estelle v. Smith, 929
executive privilege, 954
failure to pay federal marijuana tax, 1572
Federal Immunity Act, 989
Fifth Amendment protection, 721 forced vomiting of drug capsules, 2283–2284
Fourteenth Amendment protection, 33, 722, 1665–1666
and gambling, 1670 in government-linked coercion, 444 government undercover informant, 1930 immunity grant, 257, 1334–1335, 1526–1527
involuntary confession, 444 juvenile delinquency proceedings, 1183
legislative investigations, 1595, 2866
Lilburne as catalyst, 1617–1618 and McCarthyism, 1233, 1649
Miranda rules, 1742–1744, 1865, 1922, 1926–1929, 2238, 2239–2240
Miranda v. Arizona, 1741–1742 nonapplicable to mental illness commitment proceedings, 1720
police interrogation and confessions, 1922–1929, 1930–1932, 2238–2239
prearrest silence, 1426 prisoner voluntary self-incrimination, 1327, 1930 required registration of Communist organizations, 2581
as right of criminally accused, 2255, 2256
and right to counsel, 2234–2235, 2238, 2263, 2264
subpoena and, 2567
testimonial and nontestimonial compulsion, 2677–2678
textualism problem, 2683

Right against self-incrimination (continued)
two-sovereignties rule, 2237, 2745–2746
unconstitutional conditions, 2749
United States District Courts, 2764
unreasonable search, 216
use immunity, 1526–1527 voice sample allowed, 784 waiver of, 2831
Right of association. See Freedom of association Right of confrontation. See Confrontation, right of Right of privacy, 2241–2245, 2245–2248 (update)
in abortion, 5, 8, 10–11, 12, 92, 94, 274, 1118, 2242, 2284, 2285, 2921
and administrative search, 42, 43
balancing test, 155
in birth control, 4, 182, 1118, 1121, 1233–1234, 1461, 2203, 2242
and body search, 205–206, 1094, 1095, 2244–2245
as Bork nomination issue, 210, 211
and captive audience, 313
communitarians on, 473
and computer technology, 481, 482 constitutional recognition of, 1615, 2052 construction of, 2052 dissent argument, 1462 in DNA testing, 800
evidentiary privilege, 935
"false light" privacy, 2014
and First Amendment, 2014–2015
and freedom of intimate association, 1121–1122, 1237
and freedom of speech, 1130
and freedom of the press, 1142, 1145, 2014
Griswold v. Connecticut, 1120, 1122, 1233–1234, 1461, 1480, 1810–1812, 2242, 2243, 2246, 2247
by homeless people, 1302
and involuntary sterilization, 2528
and judicial policymaking, 1461–1462, 1480
as marriage protection, 2943 and Ninth Amendment, 1810–1812
and open fields doctrine, 1853
penumbra theory, 1896
as person, 1901
Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 1915 primary elections challenged as violating, 2007
prisoners' rights, 2013
Rehnquist Court rulings, 381
and right not to hear, 1628
"right" of publicity vs., 2014–2015 in right to die, 2266, 2268
in same-sex marriage, 2308
and search and seizure, 2334
Senate subcommittee investigation of Nixon administration abuses, 2365 and sex offender notification laws, 2401 in sexual orientation and preference, 2244, 2247, 2401, 2403, 2407 sound truck ban, 1542
Stewart's views, 2542
and substantive due process, 1289, 2573, 2575–2576
and unreasonable searches and seizures, 721
and warrantless search, 2847
Warren and Brandeis Harvard Law Review article, 2247
Whalen v. Roe, 2242–2243, 2245
See also Reasonable expectation of privacy Right of property. See Property rights Right of revolution, 2248–2249, 2249–2251 (update) federal suppression of Whiskey Rebellion, 2885 and gun control, 1243–1244
as Lockean extraconstitutional right, 1640, 2248
radical Populist constitutional interpretation, 2113
Right-privilege distinction, 2251–2252
academic freedom, 22
Brennan rejection of, 234
Holmes's rhetorical use of, 2251–2252
public employees, 22, 36, 2065–2066, 2252
Speiser v. Randall, 234 welfare cases, 1974
Rights. See Bill of Rights; Fundamental rights; Natural rights and the Constitution; Waiver of constitutional rights; specific rights found under headings beginning with Freedom and Right
Rights issues in historical perspective, 2252–2254
Rights of the criminally accused, 2254–2257
accusation notice, 2258–2259
against double jeopardy, 807–812, 2256, 2257 against self-incrimination, 2232–2241, 2255, 2256
ambiguity and vagueness of, 2683
bail, 147–151, 2257
constitutional delineation, 714–716
Miranda rules, 1742–1744, 2255, 2256, 2850
police interrogation and confessions, 1922–1931, 2256
public trial, 2076–2078, 2256
Rehnquist Court contraction of, 2162, 2169
speedy trial, 2465–2467
textualism problems, 2683
Warren Court's expansion of, 975, 1927, 1928, 2850, 2856
See also Fair trial; Right to counsel; Speedy trial; Trial by jury Right to bail. See Bail
Right to bear arms. See Gun control; Right of revolution; Second Amendment Right to be informed of accusation, 2258–2259
and fair trial, 971
Right to confront witnesses. See Confrontation, right of
Right to counsel, 2259–2265
as access to the courts, 23
Argersinger v. Hamlin, 116, 2262
Betts v. Brady, 2261
capital punishment and, 302
in criminal cases, 720, 722
Criminal Justice Act, 709
and due process, 828, 1538–1539, 2045
Escobedo v. Illinois, 923, 1200, 2263, 2264, 2856
evidence and, 242
expansion of, 116, 170
eyewitness identification, 962
and fair trial, 971
felony cases, 1031
Gideon v. Wainwright, 1193, 1462, 2261–2262, 2856
incorporation doctrine, 1355
indigent limitation, 2295
by indigents, 1031–1032, 1083, 1362, 1462, 1973, 2260, 2262–2263, 2265, 2877
and indigent's insanity defense, 64 and "interrogation" definition, 2230
Johnson v. Zerbst, 1436, 2260, 2261
juvenile proceedings, 1183, 1523, 2263
at lineup, 1538–1539, 1627–1628, 2264–2265, 2818
Massiah v. United States, 1696, 2264
Miranda rules, 1923, 1926, 1927, 1930, 1931, 2230, 2255, 2263–2264
Palko v. Connecticut, 1875
police interrogation and confessions, 1923, 1926, 1927, 1930, 1931, 2263

Powell v. Alabama, 1981, 2260–2261, 2263 pretrial procedures, 1538–1539
preventive detention, 2306 public interest law and, 2071–2072 quality of representation, 2265
race and, 2087
and right against self-incrimination, 2234–2235, 2238, 2263
as right of criminally accused, 1923, 1925, 2255
Scott v. Illinois, 2262 sentencing and, 2367 in summary courts-martial, 1726–1727 and waiver of constitutional rights, 974 Right to die, 2266–2267, 2267–2271 (update) assisted suicide, 2269–2270
communitarians on, 473
Cruzan v. Director of Missouri Department of Health, 790, 2163, 2266, 2267, 2268–2269
euthanasia, 930
and property rights in the human body, 2057
Quinlan, In re, 2268 refusal of treatment, 790, 930
Rehnquist Court and, 2163, 2170
and right of privacy, 2244, 2246, 2268
Scalia's views, 2314
and substantive due process, 2577–2578
Right to jury trial. See Trial by jury
Right to know, 2271–2272
Freedom of Information Act, 1117
and freedom of speech, 1132
and freedom of the press, 1143–1144, 1145–1146
government secrecy, 1214–1215
and listeners' rights, 1143, 1628 prior restraint vs., 2010
Privacy Act, 2012–2013
Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 2231–2232, 2271–2272
Right to petition, 2272–2274
and initiatives, 1371, 1372 lobbyist, 1636
state constitutional guarantees, 1107
See also Civil liberties and the antislavery controversy; Gag order Right to privacy. See Right of privacy
Right to remain silent. See Right against self-incrimination Right to travel, 2274–2276, 2276–2277 (update)
as civil liberty, 376
components of, 2305
Court approaches, 137, 1950 divorce and, 2452
facial challenges, 1400
Fifth Amendment due process protection, 1535 international, 2276 interstate, 2274–2275
and national security, 1141, 1257
passport denials, 1535, 2146, 2943
and privileges and immunities, 2021
restriction on indigents, 861, 2878 restrictions on suspect subversives, 116, 1109
Saenz v. Roe, 2305
Slaughterhouse cases, 2424
substantive due process and, 1077, 2306, 2574, 2577
visas, 2801–2802
and welfare rights, 2408, 2877, 2878–2879
See also Residence requirements Right to vote. See Voting rights
Right-to-work laws, 2277–2278
Ripeness, 2278–2279, 2279–2280 (update)
abstention doctrine, 19
as administrative agency challenge, 41
chilling effect, 355
declaratory judgment, 756
judicial power, 1464
of racial discrimination protest, 1865
Robinson-Patman Act (1936), 2283
Roosevelt Court, 2292–2294
Rucker Act (1887), 2459
Rule of four, 2296
and appeal, 108 and certiorari, 108, 2296
Rule of law, 2297–2298
arrest, 119
Bill of Rights (English), 175
capital punishment, 299
and constitutionalism, 633, 641
as constitutional political philosophy, 1945
and critical race theory, 726
difference and constitutional equality, 780 immunity doctrine tension with, 2459 jury nullification as undermining, 1514
Magna Carta, 1663–1664, 1945, 2234, 2297
Marbury v. Madison establishing, 1673
Petition of Right, 1903
and popular sovereignty, 1945
and presidential powers, 1996
Progressivism and, 2049
and retroactivity of legislation, 2225
and sovereign immunity, 2459, 2460
Story's views, 2555
Rule of reason, 2298–2299
antitrust law, 2472
corporation restraints, 1642, 2049
Sherman Antitrust Act, 2298–2299, 2314, 2895, 2898
as White (Edward) doctrine, 2895, 2898
Rules Enabling Act (1934), 1028
Rule-skepticism. See Legal realism
Runaway slaves. See Fugitive slavery
Rutledge Court. See Supreme Court, 1789–1801

S

Safety inspection. See Administrative search Same-sex marriage, 2307–2308 (I), 2308–2309 (II)
Baehr v. Lewin, 147
Defense of Marriage Act condemning, 432
due process and, 2307
equal protection and, 147, 2307, 2308
freedom of intimate association, 1124
full faith and credit, 1172
fundamental rights and, 2308
right of privacy and, 2308
right to marry and, 2308
sex discrimination and, 147, 2307, 2309
sexual orientation and, 2404
School busing, 2320–2321
Court affirmation, 1535
de facto/de jure segregation, 759 for desegregation, 391, 773 and federal judiciary equity powers, 1459
federal protection, 1026
local government and, 1638
Nixon's views, 2320 prohibitive initiative invalidation, 785–786 for racial balance, 2320, 2321
segregation maintenance and, 2320–2321
state effort to limit, 706
School choice, 2321–2322
voucher programs, 61, 2814–2815
School desegregation. See Desegregation School prayers, 2322–2323, 2323–2324 (update)
communitarians on, 473
constitutional amendment proposal, 76, 123, 2125–2126, 2127

School prayers (continued) daily Old Testament readings, 804 denial of student on-campus worship meeting, 203
Engel v. Vitale, 188, 2176–2177, 2856
and establishment clause, 1, 168–169, 188, 1048–1049, 1207, 2179
First Amendment and, 2322, 2323, 2324
"moment of silence" invalidated, 2174, 2323, 2832–2833 prohibition of, 380
and separation of church and state, 2371, 2372, 2373 student-initiated, 2179
subtle coercive pressure ruling, 1575–1576, 1603
unconstitutionality, 2176
voluntariness as immaterial, 2176
voluntary, 2322, 2323
Warren Court and, 2856
Science, technology, and the Constitution, 2326–2329
Atomic Energy Act, 133, 2326
computers, 481–483
criminal justice, 711–713, 800
drug testing, 2328
patents, 1881
See also Electronic eavesdropping; Wiretapping
Scientific creationism. See Creationism
Scopes trial, 2666
Scott Act (1888), 128
Scottsboro trials, 1981, 2260
Search, unreasonable. See Unreasonable search Search and seizure, 2329–2336, 2336–2338 (update 1), 2338–2343 (update 2) aerial searches, 2337, 2343, 2768 automobile searches, 140–141, 2332
balancing test and, 2331, 2340, 2341, 2342
border search, 209
Boyd v. United States, 215–216
Burger Court and, 276, 2162, 2340
drug regulation, 821, 823–824
drug testing, 825, 826, 2337
electronic eavesdropping, 872, 1850, 2139, 2140
evidence, 932
exclusionary rule, 936
expectation of privacy and, 2334
extraterritoriality, 960
Fourteenth Amendment/Fourth Amendment coextensive protections, 1535, 2917
Fourth Amendment, 1092–1096, 1097–1098, 1099
freedom of the press, 1143
general warrant, 1098–1099, 1185–1186
good faith exception, 1204–1205, 2338
habeas corpus review, 1251
hearsay evidence, 2330 from innocent party, 2948
limits on, 2331
no-knock entry, 679, 1097, 1820
nonapplicable to welfare caseworker home visit, 2934
open fields doctrine, 1853
of persons, 2331
plain view doctrine, 1913, 2680
probable cause, 2023, 2024, 2329, 2330, 2331, 2333
public, 2332, 2333 public surveillance and, 2337, 2343 reasonable expectation of privacy, 2139–2141
reasonable grounds for, 2337
Rehnquist Court, 2162, 2169, 2340
right against self-incrimination linked with, 2236 right of the criminally accused, 2254
silver platter doctrine, 2416–2417
sobriety checkpoints, 1726
state-federal single standard, 1535 stop and frisk clause, 2331, 2341
student searches by school officials, 1799 and surveillances, 711
third-party consent, 2689–2691
unconstitutionality of, 2751
warrantless search, 2845–2847
warrants, 2330, 2332, 2333
See also Exigent circumstances search; Unreasonable search Search incident to arrest, 2343–2344
exclusionary rule, 938
exigent circumstances, 956, 2344 extended to premises, 61 limits to person of the arrestee and his immediate environs, 355
plain view doctrine, 1913
search warrant and, 2343
unreasonable search and, 2329, 2766, 2769
as warrantless search, 2845–2846
Search warrant, 2344–2345
and administrative search, 42, 43
Aguilar affidavit, 63–64 arrest warrant parallel, 120–121
automobile search, 140, 141, 329–330 for computerized matching, 482 conflict of interest in issuance, 2345 drug search, 679, 1097
expansions, 2336, 2337
Fourth Amendment requirement, 1092, 1099, 2343–2344, 2344 hearsay evidence and, 2345 informant's tip as basis, 1327, 1368, 2024 invalid, 682–683 issuance of, 2344–2345 mere evidence rule and, 2345
no-knock entry, 1097
not required for consent search, 507 obscene materials and, 2476
Paxton's case, 1888
for premises of nonsuspects, 2948
probable cause, 1098, 2024, 2330, 2345, 2469, 2948
and property interest, 2339 and reasonable expectation of privacy, 141 Steagald v. United States, 2526 unreasonable search defined by, 2766 and writ of assistance, 132
See also Warrantless search Secession, 2345–2346 blockade legality, 415, 1230, 2022, 2868
Chase Court on, 339
and Civil War inception, 415 Compromise of 1850 halting, 813
and conquered provinces theory, 504
constitutional commentary on, 450
Corwin Amendment, 694
Exposition and Protest, 957
Force Act, 1069
and indestructibility of American federalism, 1007
and interposition, 2346
Lincoln's Constitution-based rejection of, 1624 Lincoln's election and, 1620 and nullification, 1413, 1424, 2346
and personal liberty laws, 2346 Republican party rejection of, 2217
South Carolina ordinance of, 2457 and sovereignty, 2346 and states' rights, 747, 1413, 2346, 2519
and view of the Union, 1621
See also Civil War; Confederate Constitution Second Amendment, 2346–2347, 2347–2348 (update)
ambiguity and vagueness of, 2684
civil-military provision, 385 Civil War militias, 574 federal power over militias, 1691 gun control and, 574, 1243–1244, 2347

militias and, 2347, 2348 presidential power over state militias, 1691
radical Populist constitutional interpretation, 2113–2114
Reconstruction era view of right to firearms, 1091
and right of revolution, 2249–2250
on rights of the people, 1091 on right to bear arms and, 2250, 2346, 2347, 2348
states' rights and, 2347, 2348
Secondary boycott. See Boycott
Second Continental Congress. See Continental Congress
Second Treatise (Locke), 1639–1640, 1962, 2297
Second World War. See World War II
Secret Service, 1568
Section 1983, Title 42, United States Code (judicial interpretation), 2349–2350 abstention doctrine and, 18
as constitutional remedy, 652, 653, 654 damage claims under, 739, 740
federal civil rights enforcement, 1025 federal court jurisdiction over civil rights cases, 2227 Force Acts as foundation, 1070
implied constitutional rights of action, 1344
judicial immunity, 1453–1454
as limitation on state and local government wrongs, 1217, 1344
Monell v. Department of Social Services, 1751, 1754
Monroe v. Pape, 1754, 1767
municipal immunity, 1751, 1754, 1767–1768
prosecutorial immunity from suit, 1328 state legislative officials' damages immunity, 2667 workplace hazards in municipalities, 442 zoning damages, 2945
Securities Act (1933), 2350
Securities Exchange Act (1934), 2350
Securities law and the Constitution, 2350–2351
Security. See National security and the Fourth Amendment
Sedition, 2351
Alien Registration Act, 68
chilling effect of, 2351
clear and present danger test, 426
Palmer raids, 1875, 2929
Pennsylvania v. Nelson, 1894
Sedition Act (1798). See Alien and Sedition Acts Sedition Act (1918), 2351–2352
repeal of, 2581
and subversive advocacy, 2580
Seditious libel, 2352–2353
anonymous political speech, 91
bad tendency test, 146
content-based restrictions, 1132
English law, 16, 1138, 1606 federal common law, 1016
First Amendment and, 2353
and freedom of speech, 16, 1126, 1606–1607
and freedom of the press, 1138, 1139, 2351, 2353
jury nullification, 1512
People v. Croswell, 1897
political trial, 1954
and popular sovereignty, 2352–2353
and subversive advocacy, 2579–2580 wartime applications, 1606–1607
World War I, 2928
Zenger's case, 1512, 2944
Segregation, 2354–2355
in armed forces, 117, 118, 946 Asian Americans, 129, 586
as badge of servitude, 1918, 1919
Black Codes, 189, 341, 401
Bob-Lo Excursion Company v. Michigan, 204
Brown v. Board of Education, 253–255
Buchanan v. Warley, 259
civil disobedience and, 370
civil rights and, 388–389 commerce clause and, 459 de facto/de jure distinction, 276, 759, 1024, 2320, 2321
in District of Columbia, 1086
equal protection and, 2354
Evans v. Abney, 930
Executive Orders 9980 and 9981, 605, 946
in federal employment, 1025, 2911 and federal tax-exempt status of schools, 24
and Fourteenth Amendment, 1086
in housing, 1853–1854
in interstate commerce, 1257, 1645
Jim Crow law and, 2354
in late nineteenth century, 586–587
McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 2628–2629
NAACP litigation, 1676, 1678
open housing laws, 1853–1854
Plessy v. Ferguson, 253, 388, 399, 411, 771, 1918–1919, 2354
in public accommodations, 168, 253, 1167, 2062–2063 public accommodations and, 2354, 2415, 2420, 2486, 2693 racial balance and, 2098
racial discrimination and, 2354–2355, 2369 residential, 1853–1854, 2219–2222, 2355, 2411 restrictive covenants and, 2355
Roberts v. City of Boston, 2282–2283
in schools, 253–255, 2320–2321, 2355
separate but equal doctrine, 253, 771, 1167, 1918–1919, 2062, 2282–2283
social science research, 399, 2443
state action and, 2483–2484, 2486
states' rights and, 1204, 2519
Sweatt v. Painter, 2628–2629 in transportation, 1761 urban residential, 2321 voter restrictions, 1041, 1042
zoning ordinances, 2354
See also Desegregation; Racial discrimination
Selective Draft Law Cases (1918), 2356
conscientious objection, 2173
constitutionality upheld, 506, 2928
involuntary servitude argument denied, 2187, 2928
Selective exclusiveness, 2356
and commerce clause, 681–682, 2356
and state vs. national commerce powers, 1192
Selective incorporation. See Incorporation doctrine
Selective prosecution. See Prosecutorial discretion and its constitutional limits
Selective Service Act (1917), 2356–2357
World War I, 2927
Selective Service Acts (1863, 1940, 1948), 2357
and civil disobedience, 371
and conscientious objection, 505 denominational exemptions, 2187 and draft card destruction, 1836
Vietnam War, 2790
Self-incrimination. See Right against self-incrimination; Immunity grant Self-representation, right to. See Waiver of constitutional rights

Senate, 2357–2361
advice and consent function, 47, 109, 114–116, 2358, 2359, 2363 advice and consent to federal judicial appointments, 1018 advice and consent to presidential appointing and removal power, 109–111 advice and consent to presidential treaty power, 1991–1993, 1996 Bork nomination rejection, 209 committees, 2360
confirmation process, 2325
constitutional amendment proposals, 76
and democratic theory, 765 direct election amendment, 72, 764, 788, 1306, 1964 disciplinary measures in, 2358 election to, 2358 equal representation in, 172
filibuster, 1043–1044, 2359
First Congress, 1058, 1059
Great Compromise and, 1305, 2358 impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, 126, 1429 impeachment trial of William J. Clinton, 127 impeachment trial powers, 111, 1336, 1340, 1342, 1819, 1953, 2360, 2363 impeachment trials of federal judges, 1454, 1953 investigative powers, 1594–1596
joint Iran-Contra hearings, 1401–1403, 2360
legislative process, 1597–1599
line-item authority, 1627 membership and powers, 500, 546, 547
members' official immunity, 1335 partial-birth abortion ban, 13 presidential censure by, 1342, 1409 Seventeenth Amendment and, 2387–2388
speech or debate clause, 2464
supermajority rules, 2585
Twentieth Amendment and, 2359 vice-president as president of, 2358
Watergate hearings, 922, 2360, 2365
Senate and foreign policy, 2361–2363
appointment approval, 2361, 2362 increase in powers during Clinton presidency, 1078–1079
Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 1078, 1079
treaty power, 1978, 1991–1993, 1996, 2359, 2361, 2362
Vietnam War, 2789
Senate and judicial appointments, 2363–2364
advice and consent to federal judicial appointments, 1017–1018, 1019–1020 advice and consent to Supreme Court justice nominations, 47–51, 111–112, 114, 1018–1019, 2364 appointment clause, 114–115 federal judges, 2363
impeachment powers, 111 reasons for rejections, 114–115
Senate Judiciary Committee and, 2363
Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 1078, 1079
Senate Judiciary Committee, 2364–2365
and Bork nomination, 209–210, 211
and naturalization, 2364
Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, 2365 subcommittees, 2364
and Supreme Court justice nominees, 112, 113
Thomas confirmation hearings, 2695
Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, 2365
Ervin as chair, 922, 2365
Seneca Falls Convention (1848), 2365–2366
civil disobedience and, 370 inclusion of suffrage, 1808, 2918, 2919
Stanton and, 2477
women's rights manifesto, 562
Sentencing, 2366–2369
capital punishment and, 2366
career criminal, 316 for crack cocaine possession or trafficking, 703 culpability and, 2368–2369 discretionary, 2366 disparity in federal sentencing, 984, 985 disproportionate, 2299
and double jeopardy protections, 810, 811–812
due process and, 2367
ex post facto applications, 2225 for federal crime, 984, 985, 1749–1750 indeterminate, 2366
mandatory, 2366
Mistretta v. United States, 984 parole and, 2366, 2367 plea bargaining and, 2367
procedural due process and, 2367
and right to counsel, 2367
victim impact statements, 208–209
Sentencing Reform Act (1984), 984, 1749
Separate but equal doctrine, 2369–2370
Brown v. Board of Education as response to, 2369, 2370 and civil vs. social rights distinction, 1038 constitutionality debate, 254, 771
equal protection of the laws, 909
Fuller Court ruling, 1160, 1167–1168
Jim Crow laws, 2369
Justice Harlan (1833–1911) dissent, 1167, 1267
Justice Hughes opinion against, 1311 minimum content within, 1748–1749
as not burdening interstate commerce, 1645 Plessy v. Ferguson, 253, 388, 399, 411, 771, 1918–1919, 2354
public accommodation, 2062
Roberts v. City of Boston, 2282–2283 single-sex education and, 2418
unconstitutionality, 2849, 2852
See also Segregation
Separation of church and state, 2370–2378, 2378–2381 (update)
accommodation of religion distinction, 24
aid to church-related schools, 2373–2376
Bible reading in schools challenge, 804
Bill of Rights and, 2370
Burger Court and, 273
Butler Act and, 2666
and creationism teaching, 706–708
establishment clause and, 924, 2371, 2372, 2378, 2379 establishment clause-religious liberty interactions, 2175–2176, 2187
First Amendment and, 2377, 2378
First Amendment limitations seen, 1653
government aid to religious institutions, 1206–1209 holiday displays, 2376–2377
in Jeffersonian constitutionalism, 1423–1425 legislative chaplaincies constitutionality, 1672
Locke espousal, 1639
Madison's "Memorial and Remonstrance" advocating, 1662
Mueller v. Allen, 1763
neutrality vs. separationist view, 2294 and public forum doctrine, 2070, 2073
Reagan's views, 2125–2126

rejection of religious test for public office, 2197
released time and, 1704, 2171, 2371 religion as "viewpoint" entitlements, 1559–1560 and religious free speech, 2173
religious fundamentalism and, 2184–2185
and religious legal exemptions, 2180–2181
religious liberty and, 2371
religious test for public office, 2192, 2197–2198
Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Charter of, 2230 school prayers and, 2371, 2372, 2373 state tax deductions for both secular and parochial school expenses, 1763
Stevens's views, 2534
Sunday closing laws, 2372, 2373, 2585
tax exemptions and, 2680–2681
Tennessee v. Scopes, 2666
Virginia Statute of Religious Freedom, 2801
Warren Court and, 2856
Williams (Roger) advocacy, 2906
See also Establishment clause; Establishment of religion; Government aid to religious institutions; Religion in public schools; Religious liberty; School prayers Separation of powers, 2381–2385, 2385–2387 (update)
act of state doctrine, 25
Adams (John) advocacy, 27
Adams (Samuel) concerns, 32
and administrative agencies, 37–38, 40, 41, 267, 269
and administrative law, 40, 41
advice and consent as, 47
and appellate jurisdiction, 108
and appointments clause, 115
avoidance doctrine, 142 balanced-budget amendment effect on, 153–154
Bowsher v. Synar, 214 and budget process, 260, 261, 262
and bureaucracy, 265, 266, 267, 269
Burger Court and, 380
cabinet subject to, 288, 289
cases and controversies, 322
checks and balances compared with, 342, 2381
and common law, 466
as constitutional fundamental, 1947
and constitutionalism, 637
and constitutional theory, 654
and declaration of war, 755–756
and executive agency, 2147 executive power vs. legislative, 214
executive privilege, 952, 955, 2384
executive veto power, 2383
and federal common law authority, 978
and federalism, 1010
and federalism in contemporary practice, 994–997 federal judiciary and legislative functions, 1749
federal jurisdiction, 1502–1503
in foreign affairs, 1071–1078, 1078–1081
guarantee clause, 1238
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha, 1219 in impeachment proceedings, 1336, 1340
and independent counsel, 115, 1359
and interdependencies, 1944
and interest groups, 1380, 1947
and judicial immunity, 1454
and judicial independence, 50–51, 1418, 1455–1457
and judicial review, 1474, 1481
and judicial supremacy, 1487–1488
and law of the land, 1572
legislative/executive/judicial branches in, 2381 legislative remedies for judicial power, 1470–1473
as limiting government, 1944
Lincoln's affirmation of, 1624
Marshall Court and, 1433
Montesquieu's influence in, 1755 nondelegation of power implicit in, 760–761
one-house legislative veto and, 1333 origin of, 2381–2383
Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 1877
and political parties, 258, 1935
as political philosophy of the Constitution, 1904, 1944, 1948 and political question identification, 1951 practical effects of, 2383
presidential power seen superseding, 1996
and regulatory agencies, 2147, 2148
in republican form of government, 2209, 2213
Scalia's views, 2313
and sovereign immunity, 2460
and special prosecutor, 2462, 2463–2464
and standing, 2475
in state constitutions, 2500
statutory interpretation and, 2525
Supreme Court and, 2383
taxpayers' and citizens' suits, 2661–2662 and taxpayer standing, 1066–1067
and vested rights, 1034
veto power and, 2784
Vinson Court and, 2793
and Watergate issues, 2864–2865
White (Byron) dissents, 2889, 2893
Wilson (Woodrow) arguments, 2909
See also Executive power; Judicial power; Legislative power; Presidential powers
Seriatim, 2387
Seventeenth Amendment, 2387–2388
and constitutional reform, 650
direct election of senators, 500, 764, 788, 1306, 1964
ratification, 72, 589
regulation of elections, 865
Seventh Amendment, 2388
and civil juries, 1091 and jury size, 1516 and jury unanimity, 1517
property protection, 2051
and trial by jury, 2388
Severability, 2388–2389
legislative intent, 2388–2389
Sex discrimination, 2389–2396, 2396–2398 (update 1), 2398–2400 (update 2) affirmative action to correct "manifest imbalance," 1435
antidiscrimination legislation, 97, 406, 791, 1027, 2089–2093
by armed forces, 117–118
Bradwell v. Illinois, 218
Burger Court and, 272–273, 274–275
citizenship laws and, 2400 comparable worth and, 474, 2397
Court endorsement of, 218 death benefit exceptions for widowers, 2881 direct private damage actions, 748 draft registration exclusion of women, 2295–2296
due process and, 2391, 2398
in education, 400
Education Amendments of 1972 (Title IX), 853
and equal protection, 232–233, 910, 914–915, 917, 1615, 2390, 2396–2397, 2398, 2921
equal protection rejections for, 1199, 2921
equal rights amendment, 918–919
federal protection, 1027

Sex discrimination (continued) feminist theory, 1032–1033, 1134
fighting words, 1057
freedom of association argument, 1110–1111, 2016–2017
fundamental rights and, 2390, 2399
Ginsburg judicial approach, 1196–1197 hate speech as, 1277, 1278 illegitimacy and, 799, 1404–1405 irrebuttable presumption analysis, 1404–1405 Lockwood, In re, 2920 male exclusion from nursing profession, 1746
neutrality principle, 2165
nonmarital children and, 1325, 1326, 1331 paternalism and, 2391
Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 1902 pornography as, 1134, 1965–1966, 1966–1968 pregnancy and, 2394, 2395, 2397 racial discrimination precedent, 2392
in rape case, 1725
rational basis test, 428, 2390, 2399
Reconstruction-era legitimacy, 2920
Rehnquist Court and, 2165, 2170
and same-sex marriage prohibitions, 147, 1124, 2307, 2309
and social change, 700
Social Security Act and, 2391–2392, 2397
standard of review, 273, 704, 2390, 2471
statutory rape and, 2399
strict scrutiny and, 2399
Title VII and, 2393, 2395, 2399
Violence Against Women Act, 2797
welfare benefits, 293–294
women's historical coverture, 2920
See also Race and sex in antidiscrimination legislation; Reproductive autonomy; Woman suffrage movement; Women in Constitutional history; Workplace harassment and the First Amendment
Sex offender notification laws, 2400–2401
Sexual harassment. See Workplace harassment and the First Amendment Sexual orientation, 2401–2403, 2403–2405 (update)
Bowers v. Hardwick, 213, 381, 400
and child custody, 800
and civil rights, 394, 400
Clinton administration rights policy, 432
communitarians on, 473
and constitutional aspiration, 665
discrimination and, 2401, 2402, 2403, 2404
equal protection, 787, 916, 917–918, 2287, 2401, 2403
and freedom of intimate association, 1124, 2403
and hate crime, 1276
and hate speech, 1277
and right of privacy, 2244, 2247, 2401, 2403, 2407
Romer v. Evans, 383, 400, 2286–2287
same-sex marriage, 147, 432, 2307, 2404
substantive due process and, 2401, 2403
See also Gender rights; Sexual preference and the Constitution
Sexual orientation and the armed forces, 2405–2406
Clinton administration policy, 432 discriminatory practices, 117, 118
Sexual predator laws, 2406–2407
See also Sex offender notification laws Sexual preference and the Constitution, 2407–2408
antisodomy law, 213, 2247, 2401, 2403, 2891–2892
Bowers v. Hardwick, 213, 381, 400
freedom of intimate association, 1124, 2403 public accommodation rights, 1320
right of privacy, 2244, 2247, 2401, 2403, 2407
Romer v. Evans, 383, 407, 2286–2287
St. Patrick's Day Parade participation, 1320
See also Sexual orientation Shays' Rebellion, 2410
and Annapolis Convention, 90
as constitutional concern, 28, 32
and domestic violence clause, 803
Sheppard-Towner Maternity Act (1921), 2411
federal grants to state, 2659
Sherman Antitrust Act (1890), 2412–2413
antitrust law, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107 application to unions, 70, 107, 1545, 1641–1642
and commerce clause, 455, 585 constitutionality as applied to holding companies, 1828
and the economy, 852
extraterritoriality, 959
Fuller construction, 1162
Fuller Court applications, 1165–1166
Loewe v. Lawlor, 1641
as nonapplicable to production monopolies, 2046
Olney's antipathy to, 1850–1851
Parker v. Brown, 1879
prosecution under, 1540
Roosevelt (Theodore) use of, 2292 rule of reason underpinnings, 2298–2299, 2314, 2895
Sugar Trust ruled as outside interstate commerce, 1539–1540, 1642, 2048
Shield laws, 2413
Shopping centers, 2414–2415
and compelled speech, 476
First Amendment rights, 1308, 1672, 2060
and freedom of speech, 1131, 1308
picketing cases, 1308, 2414
property rights vs. free speech, 1566
Shreveport doctrine, 2415–2416
invoked in Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 2317
Silver platter doctrine, 2416–2417
Elkins v. United States, 882 seizure of evidence and, 2416
Simpson-Mazzoli Act (1986), 2364
Single-sex education, 2417–2419
Sinking fund cases, 2419–2420
Sit-in, 2420
Bell v. Maryland, 168
as civil disobedience act, 371
civil rights movement, 389, 414
First Amendment protection, 1047
public accommodations, 2062
state action and, 2486
Sixteenth Amendment, 2421
direct and indirect taxes, 784, 1165
Eisner v. Macomber, 863–864
income tax, 1960, 1964, 2480
ratification, 72, 784, 1960
Sixth Amendment
ambiguity and vagueness of, 2683
evidence and, 932
speedy trial and, 1655, 2465–2467
subpoena and, 2567
textualism problems, 2683
venue and, 2782
See also Fair trial; Petit jury; Public trial; Rights of the criminally accused; Right to counsel; Speedy trial; Trial by jury Slander. See Libel and the First Amendment
SLAPPS. See Strategic lawsuits against public participation in government

Slaughterhouse cases, 2423–2422
Chase Court decision, 336, 341, 580
and constitutional fictions, 527
and federal civil rights enforcement, 201, 402
privileges and immunities, 1091, 1354
Waite Court and, 2827
Slavery and civil liberties, 2424–2426
abolitionist constitutional theory, 2–3 antislavery controversy, 384–385
badges of servitude, 145–146
Dred Scott v. Sandford, 374, 387, 402, 566
due process and, 2425
federalism and, 1007
freedom of speech and, 2425–2426
freedom of the press and, 2426
fugitive slave laws, 2, 3, 1159–1160 inconsistency with Declaration of Independence, 1613
personal liberty laws, 3, 4, 1159, 1901, 2006
religious liberty and, 2426
trial by jury rights, 2425, 2431
See also Black Codes; Fugitive slavery Slavery and property, 2426–2427
District of Columbia slave trade, 796
Dred Scott v. Sandford, 2054
Emancipation Proclamation, 884–885
fugitive slave laws, 2, 3, 4, 1159–1160 higher law invocation, 1287 interstate slave trade, 3, 1238 Lincoln's views, 1622–1623
property rights in the human body, 2057
slave trade prohibition, 545, 2050
taking of property application, 2054
See also Thirteenth Amendment Slavery and the Constitution, 2427–2434
abolitionist constitutional theory, 2–4 abolition of slave trade, 545, 2050 antebellum period, 566, 567–568
Corwin Amendment, 694
Declaration of Independence, 753, 754, 2050
Dred Scott v. Sandford, 754, 818–820
Emancipation Proclamation, 1625
fugitive slavery, 1159–1160
fugitive slavery and Article IV, 545 as major issue at Constitutional Convention of 1787, 521
Prohibition of Slave Trade Act, 2050
proslavery jurisprudence, 558 protective clauses, 2 republican ideals vs. sanctioned slavery, 1947, 2210 right to trial by jury and, 2431 slave trade and, 2429, 2430 sojourner slaves, 466–467 state and federal sovereignty, 298
Taney Court and, 2649, 2654–2655
Thirteenth Amendment prohibition, 2057, 2691
three-fifths clause, 545, 2700
Whig view as moral evil, 31
Slavery in the territories, 2434–2436
abolitionist constitutional theory, 2, 3 annexation of Texas and, 90 antebellum solutions, 569
Compromise of 1850, 477
Douglas (Stephen) policies, 812–813
Dred Scott v. Sandford, 818–820, 2216, 2436, 2647, 2649–2650
Freeport Doctrine, 813, 1148–1149, 1625, 2436
Homestead Act, 1302
Kansas-Nebraska Act, 1525–1526, 1620, 2427, 2435
Lecompton constitution, 1574
Lincoln-Douglas debates, 812–813, 1620, 1625
Lincoln opposition, 1622
Missouri Compromise, 1747–1748
Nashville Convention Resolutions, 1774–1775, 2435
Northwest Ordinance prohibition, 742
popular sovereignty, 812, 1525, 1526, 1627, 1962, 2435
Republican party "Free Soil" tenets, 2216–2217
Whig opponents, 31, 2884–2885
Wilmot Proviso, 3, 477, 563, 568, 569, 2908
Smith Act. See Alien Registration Act
Sobriety checkpoints. See Traffic stops Social choice theory. See Article III and public choice theory
Social compact theory, 2438–2440
and Concord town meeting resolutions, 483
and constitutional conventions, 514
and constitutionalism, 641–642
Declaration of Independence, 752
and equality doctrine, 802 Fundamental Orders of Connecticut, 1176, 1303
and higher law, 1636
and limited government, 1618
Mayflower Compact, 531
and natural rights, 2439
and preservation of private property, 2782 state linked with, 2478
unenumerated rights, 2753
and vested rights, 2782–2783
Social programs. See Entitlement; Welfare state
Social science in constitutional litigation, 2440–2442
Social science research and constitutional law, 2442–2444
Brandeis brief, 225, 2443
Brown v. Board of Education, 2443 capital cases, 2443 constitutional litigation and, 2440–2442
cruel and unusual punishment, 2443
jury size, 1516
jury unanimous vs. nonunanimous verdicts, 1518
legal realism, 2442–2443
obscenity laws, 2443
Plessy v. Ferguson, 2443
pragmatism, 1983, 1984
racial discrimination, 2443–2444
segregated education, 399, 2443 voting rights cases, 414
Social Security Act (1935), 2444–2445
Califano v. Goldfarb, 293
Medicare (Health Insurance for the Aged Act), 1281 objection on religious ground, 1575
Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton Railway Company, 2115
sex discrimination, 2391–2392, 2397
taxing and spending powers, 2659, 2660 unemployment compensation challenge, 2540–2541
upheld, 1283–1284, 2289, 2821
welfare programs, 2444, 2445
Sociological jurisprudence, 2445–2446
Brandeis brief, 225, 2443
interest group litigation, 1378
legal realism, 1580
Pound's formative role, 1972
pragmatism, 1982
selective judicial activism, 1448
Sodomy. See Freedom of intimate association; Sexual preference and the Constitution
Solicitor general, 2447–2451
Supreme Court role, 2448, 2449–2450, 2612
Solid waste disposal. See Waste, pollution, and the Constitution
Somerset's Case (1772), 2451–2452
Soundtrucks and amplifiers, 2452–2453
ban on "loud and raucous," 1542 as breach of the peace, 227 content-neutral ban, 1351
and freedom of speech, 1131

South Carolina Exposition and Protest. See Exposition and Protest South Carolina Ordinance of Nullification (1832), 2457 and Cherokee Indian Cases, 345 and compact theory, 1424 and Force Act, 1069, 1408, 1413–1414
Jackson's Proclamation to the People of South Carolina, 1408, 1409, 1413–1414
and Tariff Act, 559, 1069, 2480, 2519
South Carolina Ordinance of Secession (1860), 2457
Southern Christian Leadership Council, 411, 412
Southern Manifesto (1956), 2458
and civil rights, 390
Sovereign immunity, 2459, 2459–2460 (update)
act of state doctrine, 25
and Americans with Disability Act, 87–88 Eleventh Amendment prohibitions, 876, 1562
and federalism, 994–995, 1010
Federal Tort Claims Act, 1030, 2459, 2706, 2707
injunctive relief, 1373
judicial power, 1467–1468
Larson v. Domestic and Foreign Commerce Corporation, 1562 municipalities, 1767–1768
Osborn vs. Bank of the United States, 1467–1468
Pennhurst State School & Hospital v. Halderman, 1893 of states from congressional regulation, 1181–1182 suit against United States distinguished from suit against extraofficial acts or unconstitutional behavior, 1562
Sovereignty, 2460–2462
and amending process, 76, 77, 78
American Indian tribal, 82, 1535, 1612, 2731
American redefinition of, 246
Articles of Confederation, 125–126
Bill of Rights, 1091
citizenship and, 365
Civil War and, 415
and constitutionalism, 636
corporate challenges to state, 692 and Court federalism rulings, 992–993
Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation, United States v., 2289
delegation of power, 736
and double jeopardy, 808–812, 1283
external, 2289
and federal environmental laws, 1009–1010 in federalism system, 570, 997, 1006 government-proprietor distinction, 1210, 1211, 1212
guarantee clause, 1239
and immigration laws, 1330, 1332
Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1689–1690
McCulloch v. Maryland, 1674–1675 native Hawaiian movements, 1784–1785
and nullification, 1832
Pennsylvania v. Nelson, 1894 of the people. See Popular sovereignty in democratic political theory
Petition of Right, 1903
Piqua Branch of the State Bank of Ohio v. Knoop, 1911
and political philosophy of the Constitution, 1945
and political question doctrine, 1950
and presidential powers, 1997
and secession, 2346
and separation of powers, 32
state, 449, 450, 558–559, 2478–2479, 2555
states' rights and, 2519
supremacy clause and, 2587
over territories, 1358
tribal economic development and, 2731
as Voting Rights Act challenge, 2456–2457 war and foreign affairs, 2834–2839
westward expansion of, 564
See also Popular sovereignty Spanish American War
as declared war, 755, 1998
as federalism issue, 1169
Puerto Rico acquisition, 2080
Special interest groups. See Interest group litigation; Interest groups
Special master, 2462
institutional litigation, 1375
Supreme Court and, 2593
Special prosecutor, 2462–2464
appointment of, 2463 impeachment and, 2463
independent counsel appointment, 115
Reagan presidency, 2128–2129
in Watergate scandal, 209, 1359, 2463, 2865
See also Independent counsel Speech freedom. See Freedom of speech
Speech or debate clause, 2464
Burger Court and, 274
congressional privileges and immunities, 501 Gravel v. United States, 1226
legislative immunity, 1591 member absolute immunity, 1335 nonimmunity for unofficial communication, 1324 Speedy trial, 2465–2466, 2466–2467 (update 1), 2467 (update 2)
balancing test, 163
Barker v. Wingo, 163 denial of, 2465
pre-accusal period not covered, 1633 rights of criminal defendant, 2256, 2466 as Sixth Amendment right, 1655, 2465 states' application of, 1539
Speedy Trial Act (1974), 2466, 2467
Spending power, 2468–2469
deficit spending and, 2468
internal improvements, 2468
Spirit of American Government, The (Smith), 2046–2047
Spirit of the Laws, The (Montesquieu), 1470, 1755
Spoils system. See Patronage
Spot Resolutions (1847), 2469–2470
Stamp Act Congress, Resolutions of (1765), 531, 2470–2471
Dickinson's role, 779
Standard of proof. See Reasonable doubt
Standard of review, 2471–2472
abortion rights, 11, 1293
age discrimination, 59
alienage, 368
burden of proof, 264
capital punishment, 307 children of illegal aliens, 1920
commercial speech, 2472
and compelling state interest, 477
and constitutional limitations on government, 2471
equal protection, 914, 916, 2471
freedom of speech, 2471
illegitimacy cases, 1326, 1605 judicial activism or restraint, 1445
least restrictive means test, 1573
legislative facts, 1590–1591
legislative intent, 1593
race and sex in antidiscrimination law, 2092
rational basis, 1588, 2121–2123
religious liberty, 1575
sex discrimination, 273, 704, 2390, 2471
two bases, 741–742

Standing, 2472–2474, 2474–2475 (update)
as administrative agency challenge, 37, 41
Article III, 122, 1066
Burger Court, 122
cases and controversies, 322, 2472–2473
chilling effect, 355
criteria, 2472–2474
interest group litigation, 1378, 1651
invalid on its face, 1399–1400
judicial legislation, 1460 judicially broadened criteria, 776
judicial power, 1464
judicial restraint, 1450
jury discrimination, 1511–1512
as justiciability barrier, 122 lack of injury in fact, 1651 person, 1900
public choice theory, 122
Rehnquist Court, 122
Roe v. Wade, 2284
taxpayer suits, 1066–1067, 2777
Stare decisis, 2477, 2477–2478 (update) and abortion cases, 15, 2208 and capital punishment cases, 306
and judicial independence, 1455
and opinion of the Court, 1854
and overruling, 1868–1869
public choice theory, 122
Stevens's views, 2532
Stewart's views, 2541
State, 2478–2482
authority of, 2480
autonomy, 1803
and cities, 361–363 constitutional reason of, 649–650
corporate citizenship, 798
dual federalism, 827 immunity from damages, 2667
initiatives and referenda, 786, 787–788
interstate compacts, 2479
limitation on legislative power of, 2766 loyalty to, 2480
power delegated to, 2479 power to define and punish crimes, 721 senators allotted, 2479
as social compact, 2478
sovereignty, 2478–2479, 2555
supremacy clause and, 2479
voter qualifications, 68, 69, 1740
State action, 2482–2488, 2488–2490 (update 1), 2490–2491 (update 2)
abstention doctrine, 17–20
academic freedom, 21
adequate state grounds, 34–35
administrative agencies, 40, 42
alien restrictions, 1330, 1332–1333
antidiscrimination legislation, 95, 96 arrest warrants, 2488–2489
captive audience, 313
and civil liberties, 377
and civil rights, 389–390, 399
clear statement rule, 1229
and color of law, 444, 445
common law rights, 2489 compelling state interest, 2187
corporations and, 2482, 2490 criminal double jeopardy, 808 criminal procedural due process, 2036–2042
critical legal studies, 724
devolution policy, 777 direct-ballot process, 287–288 discrimination against aliens, 66, 1331
due process, 2036, 2487
economic due process, 839
eminent domain, 2482
federal court suits, 1060 federalism boundaries, 998, 1007, 1037, 2489, 2491 federal regulation of, 990–992, 996, 1493 foreign affairs exclusions and limitations, 1072–1073, 1997
Fourteenth Amendment and, 1088, 2036, 2329, 2482
as Fourteenth Amendment limitation, 200, 280, 1037, 1063, 1064, 1411 Fourteenth Amendment restrictions of, 816, 1037, 1089, 1090–1092
freedom of contract, 1113–1114
freedom of the press, 2310
full faith and credit, 1171–1172
Holmes's support for, 1296
incorporation doctrine, 33, 178–180, 186, 197, 760, 814–815, 1353–1356 individual's rights vs. See Compelling state interest initiative, 1371–1372
intent and procedural due process claim, 2032
interposition, 1392–1393
interstate compact, 1398–1399 judicial activism and judicial restraint, 1446–1447
jury discrimination, 1511
legislative investigation, 1594 liability for government wrongs, 1217 local government, 1637–1638
no-fault divorce, 799 political party primary laws, 2007–2008 political party regulation, 1940, 1941–1942 political philosophy of the Constitution, 1944
political question doctrine, 1652–1653, 1949–1951 preemption of federal law, 1988–1990
primary elections, 2485
in private conduct, 2492
in private discrimination, 280, 2015 privatization, 2017 and privileges and immunities clause, 2020 proprietary commercial benefits, 1211 public function of, 2675
public purpose doctrine, 2073–2076
residence requirements, 2218–2219
restrictive covenant, 2484, 2485
retroactivity of legislation, 2225–2226 search and seizure protections, 1535
segregation, 2483–2484, 2486
state residents preference laws, 2020
substantive due process and, 2569
tuition grants, 2738
voting rights, 2484–2485
vs. state inaction, 775 woman suffrage provisions, 2919
women's exclusion from political process, 2920
See also State police power
State action—beyond race, 2491–2493
and liberalism, 1616
State aid to parochial schools. See Government aid to religious institutions
State and Local Fiscal Assistance Act. See Revenue sharing State and local government taxation, 2493–2494, 2494–2495 (update) automobile tax residency requirement, 2907 church-owned real estate, 2191
commerce clause, 2493, 2494
direct taxes, 784
economic analysis, 834 intergovernmental immunities, 1383–1384, 2493
jurisdiction to tax, 1504–1505
out-of-state sales tax, 2907
privileges and immunities clause, 2493
public purpose doctrine, 2073–2075
restraints on, 2493
See also State taxation of commerce
State constitutional law, 2495–2499
amendment process (outside Article V), 77
Article V conventions clause, 123–124
bicameralism, 172

State constitutional law (continued)
capital punishment, 2498
common law and, 2496
equal rights, 2498
grand juries, 2496
individual rights, 2496 interpretation of, 2498 and Jeffersonianism, 1425 privileges or immunities in, 2495
rational basis standard, 2122
revision of, 2495, 2496
State constitutions, 2499–2503
amendments to, 2501 and American founding, 540–541, 642–643, 2501
in antebellum period, 566–567 assembly and petition rights, 1197
bicameralism, 172
contract clause, 673
criminal justice, 2502
due process clauses, 828–829
economic regulation, 2502
education, 2502 elections, 2500
English Bill of Rights as resource, 175 environmental protection, 2502
and federalism, 1004
first permanent, 540
as fundamental and written, 85–86, 1174 judicial systems, 2500
"law of the land" usage, 828, 829, 1571, 1572
legislative purpose, 1599
Massachusetts Constitution (1780), 27–29, 1695–1696
New York, 562
omissions of specific rights, 176
Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776, 540, 1894–1895 privacy guarantees, 2245
privilege from arrest, 2019
reapportionment requirements, 2132 religious liberty provisions, 2186
republican form of government, 2209–2210
for return to Union, 2818
revisions to, 2501
Rhode Island Dorr rebellion, 1652 separation of powers in, 2500
spending power, 2468
variety in, 2500
Vermont Constitution of 1777, 2782
Virginia Constitutional Convention of 1829–1830, 558
Virginia Declaration of Rights and Constitution of 1776, 540, 2799–2800
State immunity from federal law, 2503–2505
dual sovereignty and, 2503, 2504
Eleventh Amendment, 133, 877
Tenney v. Brandhove, 2667
State legislatures. See Reapportionment; Representation Statement of Principles on Academic Freedom and Tenure (1940), 21, 22
State of emergency. See Emergency powers
State of war, 2505
federal government food and fuel controls, 1605 joint resolution ending, 1437 police action vs., 1921
See also Declaration of war
State police power, 2505–2512
and commerce clause, 1320 commerce regulations, 1191
common law and, 2506
constitutionality of, 2509
dual federalism, 1244
due process and, 2508
Euclid v. Ambler Realty Company, 929
federalism and, 2509
Fourteenth Amendment and, 929
as inalienable, 1350, 2507, 2547
Johnson's (Andrew) vetoes upholding, 1428 judicial review and, 2507
in late nineteenth century, 585–586 law enforcement and federal relations, 1566–1571 limitations on, 2509, 2510 limiting freedom of contract, 1547 milk price-control program, 1788–1789 narrow interpretations of, 2311
and political parties, 1940
preemption, 2511–2512
private economic rights and, 2511 prohibition statutes, 2050 regulatory commissions, 1023 reserved, 2218
restraints on, 2511
restricted by freedom of contract doctrine, 684 rights of property and, 2508 rights of the public and, 2507
state action and, 2489
Story's views, 2555
subjects of commerce and, 2566
substantive due process and, 1764, 2509, 2571
supremacy clause and, 2587
Taney Court and, 2556
upheld by Justice Day, 749 use of deadly force, 2665
and vested rights, 1225, 2507
Waite Court on, 676
zoning and, 2510
State regulation of commerce, 2512–2515, 2515–2517 (update 1), 2517–2518 (update 2) alcohol bans, 1601, 2870
balancing test, 2517–2518
closed loophole with federal regulation, 2899
commerce clause curbs, 455, 1381, 1396 constitutional economic liberties, 841 discrimination against out-of-state interests, 2515–2517 dormant commerce clause, 804–807
economic analysis, 835
extraterritoriality issue, 2517 federal limits on, 2274
and freedom of contract, 1112 geographical terminology of, 2517–2518 importation of goods, 2514
and interstate commerce, 1189–1190, 1396, 2060, 2512, 2516
and intrastate commerce, 2513
and just compensation, 2129–2130
least restrictive means test, 1573
limits clarification, 750
"massive" burden invalidation, 171
Minnesota rate cases, 1739–1740, 2899
and privileges and immunities, 2019–2020 production and trade, 2514
rational basis standard of review, 2122
substantive due process and, 2547
Taft Court and, 2641
taxation of banks, 801
Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway v. Illinois, 2817
Webb-Kenyon Act, 2870
States' rights, 2518–2520
Bill of Rights on, 1091
civil rights and, 2519
as Civil War issue, 549, 571
and commerce clause, 454–455
and conditional spending, 486
conservativism and, 776–777, 1005
devolution and, 776–777
domestic violence clause and, 803 Eleventh Amendment and, 356
federalism and, 2518–2519
and federal protection of civil rights, 1008, 1023–1024

Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 1181–1182 immunity from congressional regulation, 1181–1182
interposition, 1392–1393
Jacksonianism and, 1412, 1413
Jeffersonian and, 1421–1422, 1424
and judicial supremacy, 1488
Lincoln's view of, 1622
nullification and, 2519
nullification crisis, 1408, 1409, 1412–1413
Randolph (John) advocacy, 2116
Roane advocacy, 2280
secession as, 747, 2346, 2519
Second Amendment and, 2347, 2348 sectional rivalry and, 2519
segregation under, 1204, 2519
sovereignty and, 2519
Taft Court support for, 2641
Taney Court on, 298, 2651
Tenth Amendment and, 178, 2667–2668
theories of the Union and, 2519
twentieth-century causes, 1424 and wages and hours legislation, 1760 States' rights amendments, 2520
State suicide theory, 2520–2521
State taxation of commerce, 2521–2523
in banking, 1655
and commerce clause, 2521
and contract clause, 801 dormant commerce clause litigation, 806
economic analysis, 835
import-export clause, 256, 1349, 1725
impost, 1349
in insurance, 1724
interstate commerce, 2521
intrastate commerce, 2521
Lockhart articles on, 1640
Multistate Tax Compact, 2523
original package doctrine, 1864
railroads, 584
Stone's views, 2544
Taft Court and, 2641
State tax incentives and subsidies to business, 2523–2524
Status of forces agreement, 2524
North Atlantic Treaty, 1827
Statutory construction. See Legislation Statutory interpretation, 2525
capital punishment, 307
census, 326
federal-state criminal enforcement relations, 1570–1571 interest group legislation, 2525
judicial legislation, 1459
legislative intent, 1229
Scalia's views, 2316
and vested rights, 1034
Stay of execution, 2526
Rosenberg v. United States, 2294
Steel seizure controversy, 2526–2527
Executive Order 10340, 945
and presidential inherent powers, 2839
and solicitor general, 2448
Truman rationale, 2734–2735
unconstitutionality ruling, 2941
Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 2839, 2941
Sterilization, 2528–2529
Buck v. Bell, 259, 284, 789, 791–792, 1297, 2528 constitutionality of, 2421–2422
fundamental interests and, 2528 habitual offenders statute invalidated, 2203, 2421–2422 immunity from damage suits, 2565 as instrument of genocide, 2528
Skinner v. Oklahoma, 2421–2422
substantive due process and, 2573
Stockholder's suit, 2543
Minnesota rate cases, 1739–1740
Supreme Court jurisdiction, 801
Stone Court, 2548–2551
flag salute cases, 2549–2550
Japanese American cases, 2550
lack of unity on, 2548
Stop and frisk, 2552–2553
airport, 2553 circumstantial evidence and, 2552
Fourth Amendment and, 2676
motivation for, 2676
probable cause, 2552, 2675, 2939
reasonable cause, 1095–1096 requirements for, 2552
search and seizure, 2331, 2341
susceptibility to abuse, 2676
unreasonable search and, 2767, 2769
Strategic lawsuits against public participation in government, 2557–2558
Stream of commerce doctrine, 2559–2560
Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act definition, 63 commerce clause limits, 1396, 2470
economic regulation, 2470
Fuller articulation, 1162–1163
interstate commerce and, 2559
intrastate commerce and, 2559
labor antitrust ruling, 1642 Marshall's (John) commerce power exposition foreshadowing, 1191 trade practices and, 2317
Strict construction, 2560–2562
Burger Court and, 380
of commerce power, 1190–1191 of free exercise clause, 2193, 2194 internal improvements as exceeding, 30 and Jackson presidency, 1409 and judicial role, 1484 liberal construction vs., 1611
as Rehnquist doctrine, 2154, 2155
Taney Court of contract clause, 675
textualism vs., 2315–2316
Strict scrutiny, 2562–2563
abortion rights, 11–12, 1293
affirmative action, 33–34, 57, 58
of alienage classification, 66, 72, 368, 1219
and compelling state interest, 477 content-based restrictions on high-value speech, 1133 durational residence voting requirements, 831 education denial to children of illegal aliens, 1920
equal protection of the laws, 910, 914, 916, 2562
and First Amendment rights, 1050–1051, 1990, 2562
and fundamental rights, 1176, 1177
illegitimacy, 1326
legislative facts, 1590–1591
Palmore v. Sidoti, 1876 preferred freedoms doctrine, 1990 public-nonpublic forum distinction, 2068–2069
race and sex in antidiscrimination law, 2091 of racial criteria, 46, 58, 1417, 1448, 2170
racial discrimination and, 2106, 2108
rational basis standard, 2123
same-sex marriage and, 2307 school finance and, 2387 sex-based classifications, 233, 273, 1157
sex discrimination and, 2399
of voting rights cases, 1271, 1272, 1401, 2203, 2228
of wealth discrimination, 741, 742 welfare benefits and, 2305
See also Compelling state interest Strip search. See Body search
Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, 411, 412
Subjects of commerce, 2565–2566
Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act, 62–63
farm bankruptcy acts, 1105

Subjects of commerce (continued)
Granger cases, 1224–1225
Interstate Commerce Act, 1396–1397
limitation on congressional regulation, 1190
Marshall (John) definition, 1191
See also Commerce clause; Foreign commerce; Interstate commerce; Intrastate commerce; State regulation of commerce Subpoena, 2566–2567
enforcement of, 2339
right to compulsory process and, 479
Subsidies to business. See State tax incentives and subsidies to business Subsidized speech, 2567–2568
abortion and, 2568
freedom of speech and, 2567
freedom of the press and, 2568
by government, 1131–1132
Substantive activism/restraint. See Judicial activism and judicial restraint Substantive due process, 2569–2575, 2575–2576 (update 1), 2576–2578 (update 2)
abolitionist constitutional theory, 2, 829
in abortion, 4–6, 12
antimiscegenation laws, 1646
bankruptcy power, 1645
in birth control, 182, 1233–1234
Bork's views, 210
Burger Court and, 274
Chase Court and, 338
and compelling state interest, 155, 477
contract clause, 2575
corporations and, 692
and criminal justice due process, 710 to defend personal liberties, 1724 diversity jurisdiction and, 2570
as economic regulation challenge, 845, 851, 1034, 1639, 2292, 2437, 2571, 2575
Evarts and, 931 excessive punitive damages, 2055
fair return on fair value, 970
federalism and shared powers, 1012
in flag salute cases, 2574
and foreign affairs, 1077
in freedom of contract, 26, 687, 1114–1115, 1116, 2571, 2577 in freedom of intimate association, 1237
fundamental interests, 1173 guarantee of personal freedoms and, 2421 historical jurisprudence background, 1291 and hours and wages legislation, 1699
inalienable police power, 1350, 2218
inception, 1287
incorporation, 1354
involuntary sterilization and, 2421–2422, 2528, 2573 judicial power and, 2577
juvenile curfew laws challenges, 1521
Lochner v. New York, 692 neutrality, 24
ordered liberty and, 2572
Peckham's views, 1890
as personal liberties guarantee, 255, 1123, 1724
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 1908 preventive detention and, 2306
and prisoner's rights, 2863
privacy rights, 1289
procedural due process vs., 2025, 2032
as property protection, 212, 2048–2049, 2052, 2055–2056
property rights protection, 212, 259, 2048–2049, 2052, 2055–2056 punitive damages excesses and, 2082–2083 in rate regulation, 346, 2437 in reproductive autonomy, 2573–2574
reserved police power, 2218 restraints on government power, 2569, 2577
right of privacy and, 2573, 2575–2576 right to die and, 2577–2578
right to marry and, 1118
right to travel and, 2306, 2574, 2577
same-sex marriage and, 2307
Scalia's views, 2316
sexual orientation and, 2401, 2403
sinking fund cases, 2420
Slaughterhouse cases and, 2423, 2570
standard of review, 2471
state action and, 2569
state case predating Court's acceptance, 2934–2935 in state police power, 1764, 2509, 2571 in state regulation of commerce, 2547 state vs. private action, 775
strict scrutiny and, 2562
vested rights and, 2052, 2784, 2934–2935
in voting rights, 2577
as weapon against police power, 1350
White's (Byron) views, 2893
Wynehamer v. People of New York, 2934–2935 yellow dog contracts and, 2571
Suburbanization. See Residential segregation
Subversive Activities Control Act (1950), 472, 2581
Subversive Activities Control Board, 2578
Communist Control Act, 472
executive order rejuvenating, 1995
and First Amendment rights, 1050
Internal Security Act, 1385
registration as violation of self-incrimination rights, 64, 1385
Subversive activity, 2578–2579
Alien Registration Act, 68, 769
Alien Registration Act convictions reversals, 2938–2939 aliens as suspects, 65
Attorney General's List, 137–138, 604
bad tendency test, 146
balancing test, 154–155
bills of attainder, 174, 1645
Brandenburg v. Ohio, 2353
civil liberties and, 2579
clear and present danger test, 426, 769, 1050, 1298, 1352–1353, 2580
denaturalization, 768
deportation, 770
Dies Committee, 780
Federal Bureau of Investigation monitoring of, 976
First Amendment absolutism, 17
freedom of association, 1108–1109
freedom of speech, 1127–1128
House Committee on Un-American Activities, 162–163, 1305 implied self-preservation powers against, 1347–1348 incitement/abstract doctrine distinction, 769, 1109, 1187, 1198, 1199, 1353, 2280, 2938–2939
Internal Security Act, 604–605, 1385–1386, 1950
labor unions, 79
legislative investigations, 1595
loyalty oaths, 1187, 1648
loyalty-security programs, 1536, 1649–1650
McCarthyism, 1701–1702
Mundt-Nixon bill, 1766–1767
Palmer raids, 1875, 2580
political trial, 1954
public employees' right-privilege distinction, 2065–2066 right to travel restriction, 116, 1535
Rosenberg v. United States, 2295 seditious libel charges, 2353
Subversive Activities Control Board, 2578

World War II policies, 2290
Yates v. United States, 2938–2939
See also Espionage Act; Sedition; Treason
Subversive advocacy, 2579–2582
clear and present danger, 2580
extremist speech, 961
freedom of speech and, 2580
freedom of the press and, 2580
habeas corpus and, 2580 incitement restrictions, 1352–1353 national security and, 2579
Palmer raids, 1875, 2580
right against self-incrimination, 2581
See also Communist party; National Security and the Fourth Amendment; Right to revolution; Subversive activity Sufferance federalism. See Federalism, contemporary practice of Suffrage. See Alien suffrage; Woman suffrage; Woman suffrage movement; Voting rights
Sugar Act (1764), 2470
Suicide, assisted. See Right to die
Sunday closing laws, 2584–2585
establishment of religion and, 1048, 2191, 2584 interstate commerce and, 2584 separation of church and state, 2372, 2373, 2585
Supermajority rules, 2585–2586
amending process, 75, 765
filibuster, 1043–1044
public choice theory, 2064
Supremacy clause, 2586–2587
and air traffic regulation, 263
ambiguity and vagueness of, 2682
and American Indians, 80
Chisholm v. Georgia, 1418
and comity, 447
and constitutional supremacy, 1458, 1471 Constitution as "law of the land," 1571–1572
and dormant powers, 807
dual federalism, 827
and federal grants-in-aid, 988–989
and federalism, 1011, 2586
and federal law, 1467 and general welfare, 2587
implied powers, 2587
intergovernmental tax immunities, 1383, 1384
interpretation problems, 2586–2587
and judicial legislation, 1458–1459
and judicial review, 1472–1473
and Paterson Plan, 543 preemption cases, 1988–1990
sovereignty and, 2587
state police power, 2587
states and, 2479
taxing and spending powers, 2661
torts and, 2706
treaty power, 2834
Supreme Court (history), 2588–2595
advice and consent to justice nominations, 47–51 advisory opinion refusal by, 51, 288
amicus curiae briefs, 89
anti-abortion movement, 92–93
antidiscrimination legislation, 97–98
antitrust law, 106–108
appointment of justices, 111–113
appointments clause, 114–115
avoidance doctrine, 142
Bork nomination, 209–211
Brown v. Board of Education significance, 253 confirmation process, 489–490
constitutional creation of, 1020, 1021 Court-packing attempts, 113, 600, 697–699 creation of contemporary federal judiciary system, 1490 Declaration of Independence and, 754 doctrinal development, 801
dormant commerce clause, 805–807
Douglas as longest-serving justice, 813 Field as second longest-serving justice, 1035 first black justice, 1429, 1676–1681 first woman justice, 1841–1846 former attorney generals as justices, 134 fundamental law, 1174–1175
great dissenters, 795 higher law applications, 1286–1289 impeachment of justices, 552 increase in number of justices, 1581
Jay as first Chief Justice, 1418 judicial leadership, 1485–1486 judicial supremacy claim, 1488
Judiciary Act of 1789, 1489, 1495–1497
Judiciary Act of 1801, 1496–1497
Judiciary Act of 1875, 1497
Judiciary Act of 1925, 1497–1498
Judiciary Acts of 1802, 1498
Judiciary Reform Act (1937), 1498–1499 justice composite type, 112 justice selection motivations, 112–113, 114
and legal culture, 1577
Legal Tender Cases, 1581–1582
litigation strategy, 1629–1632
nominations to, 2359
as only tribunal constitutionally required, 1463
original jurisdiction, 1489
and Progressivism, 2047, 2048–2050 review of state judgments, 1490 role and authority, 557 second woman justice, 1195–1198
See also Appointment of Supreme Court justices Supreme Court (role in American government), 2595–2600
appellate jurisdiction, 108–109, 436–437, 546, 2588, 2592, 2596, 2616, 2617, 2618 appellate jurisdiction limitation, 1503, 1504 braking decisions, 2597–2598
Circuit Courts of Appeals Act, 361 congressional relations, 496–498
constitutional interpretation, 629, 630, 631
as court of last resort, 1463
decision, 752
dissenting opinion, 795
essential functions, 2593
federal jurisdiction, 1502–1503
federal question jurisdiction, 1027–1028
Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 1029 interpretation of presidential powers, 2384
Judicial Code, 1451
judicial review, 1472–1478
judicial role, 1482–1485
judicial strategy, 1482–1485
original jurisdiction, 356, 2588, 2596, 2616, 2617 relation to state courts, 2588, 2590
See also Constitutional interpretation
Supreme Court, 1789–1801, 2600–2603
Jay as Chief Justice, 1418
prior judicial review instances, 165–166
Rutledge as Chief Justice, 2301
Supreme Court at work, 2603–2610
appellate jurisdiction, 1494, 1502
caseload, 2606, 2623–2624
Chief Justice's duties, 346–348, 2605 circuit court duty, 2589, 2603
clerks, 429, 2604–2605
conference, 488, 2607, 2620–2621 content and scope, 1493 decision announcements, 2607 denial of review, 2606 journalistic coverage, 1439–1441

Supreme Court at work (continued) judicial strategy, 1485–1487
legitimizing decisions, 2597, 2598 lower court compliance with, 2609
Office of Marshal, 2605 opinion assignment, 2607–2607
oral argument, 1855, 2607, 2621 period of terms, 2588, 2619–2620
plurality opinion, 1920
retroactivity of decisions, 2223–2225
ripeness, 2278–2280
special master appointments, 2462, 2593 tenure, 2588
term, 2669
Wheat as first official reporter, 2883
Supreme Court bar, 2610–2613
admission to, 2610, 2611
solicitor general and, 2612
Supreme Court decisions, impact of, 2613–2616
Brown v. Board of Education, 253–255 on civil rights, 2613
on corporations, 692
on desegregation, 2613
Dred Scott v. Sandford, 820 on economy, 2613
on federalism, 2613
Griswold v. Connecticut, 1120, 1122, 1233–1234 on legislative investigations, 2614
Marbury v. Madison, 1667–1670
McCulloch v. Maryland, 1705–1707
Plessy v. Ferguson, 1918–1919 on public opinion, 2614
public understanding, 2078 on regulatory commissions, 2614
Roe v. Wade/Doe v. Bolton, 2284–2286, 2921 on states and local communities, 2614
See also Judicial legislation; Judicial policymaking
Supreme Court opinions. See Advisory opinion; Concurring opinion; Dissenting opinion; Grounds of opinion; Opinion of the Court; Plurality Opinion; Public Understanding of Supreme Court opinions
Supreme Court practice, 2616–2623
test case, 2676–2677
Supreme Court's work load, 2623–2624
caseload explosion, 1492–1493
Judiciary Act of 1925, 1498
Suspect classification, 2624–2625
alienage as, 66, 72, 1219
and fundamental rights, 1177
illegitimacy as, 1326, 2732 and least restrictive means test, 1573 poverty not seen as, 2879 race as, 169, 186, 781, 1416, 1646, 2842 sex as, 1157
strict scrutiny, 1177
wealth discrimination, 742, 2309
Suspect's rights. See Miranda rules; Rights of the criminally accused Symbolic speech, 2630–2632
clear and present danger test, 427
First Amendment protection, 375
flag desecration, 1061, 1062
freedom of speech and, 2630
Ku Klux Klan, 312–313, 2173
Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 2702–2703
See also Religious symbols in public forums

T

Taft Court, 2637–2642
goals of, 2634–2635
inconsistencies in, 2638–2639 interpretation of federalism, 2641
judicial review, 2637
Taft-Hartley Labor Relations Act (1947), 2642
antisubversion provisions, 79
collective bargaining, 442
right-to-work laws, 2277–2278
steel seizure controversy, 2526
strike injunction, 1553
union membership, 1554
as Wagner Act successor, 2642, 2819
Taking of property, 2643–2644, 2644–2646 (update 1), 2646–2647 (update 2) building permit issuance, 802–803 cable television installation, 1643–1644
due process, 2534
and economics theory, 1563–1566
eminent domain, 888–889, 2051–2052, 2055–2056, 2882–2883 environmental regulation and, 902–904 executive agreement, 239
fair return on fair value, 750, 969–970
Frazier-Lemke Act voided as, 1105 fugitive slaves as, 2054, 2427, 2428, 2430
inverse condemnation, 1400–1401
just compensation, 345, 1113, 1519, 1564, 2150, 2437, 2534, 2643, 2946
nonphysical effects on value, 1651, 2055
Penn Central Transportation Co. v. New York City, 1892 per se rule for total, 1651, 2149–2150
procedural due process, 2053, 2054
property definition, 2646
and property rights, 2054–2055
public purpose doctrine, 2055, 2074–2076
public use restriction, 2079
Railroad Control Act, 2114
rate regulation and, 2437
regulatory takings, 1651, 2149–2150
as retroactive legislation limitation, 2225, 2226
zoning damages, 2945, 2946
Taney Court, 2651–2656
on bills of credit, 174, 2651
on commerce clause, 455, 681, 1700, 2651
on contract clause, 675–676
on corporations, 325
Dred Scott decision, 819–820, 2436, 2647, 2649–2650
dual federalism, 827, 1000–1001
equal protection of the laws, 908–909
federalism and, 2651
first case on commerce clause, 1700 instrumentalist tone of, 2653 on interstate commerce, 2652
landmark cases, 2647–2650 selective exclusiveness approach, 2652 on slavery, 568, 569–570, 2649, 2654–2655
on state police power, 2556
on states' rights, 298, 2651
Tariff Act (1828), 2656
Exposition and Protest, 957
South Carolina nullification, 559, 1069, 2480, 2519
Taxation without representation, 2656–2657
Adams (Samuel) protests, 31
and Bill of Rights (English), 175
colonial claims, 2201 and confirmatio cartarum, 489
constitutionalism and, 2656
Declaration of Independence charge of, 754
Declarations and Resolves of First Continental Congress, 1059
Dickinson commentary, 779
in District of Columbia, 796, 797
Henry (Patrick) protest, 1284
Townsend Acts as, 779, 2711
unconstitutionality, 2751
as violation of fundamental law, 2656

Tax Court of the United States, 2657
Tax credits and religious schools. See Government aid to religious institutions Taxing and spending powers, 2658–2660, 2660–2661 (update)
as antidiscrimination law basis, 95, 204 belonging solely to Congress, 1998
Boland Amendment, 206
budget process, 260, 261
child labor and, 151–152, 350, 1777–1779
Child Labor Tax Case, 151–152
commerce clause, 455
concurrent powers of federal and state governments, 484
conditional spending, 485–488
congressional agencies, 266 constitutional questions on, 2659 direct and indirect taxes, 784–785
drug regulation, 804, 821
and dual federalism, 827
Economic Opportunity Act, 843 enumerated powers and, 2660
environmental regulation, 904–905 establishment clause as limit, 1066
as federal criminal jurisdiction basis, 1567
and federal grants-in-aid, 987
and federalism, 994, 1010
and freedom of contract, 1117
general welfare clause, 1186–1187, 2659
Hamiltonian broad construction advocacy, 250 of House of Representatives, 1307
import-export clause, 1348–1349 for internal improvements, 1385 limits on, 2658
and line-item veto, 1626
New Deal, 1315
presidential impoundment, 1349
presidential spending power, 2000–2001 regulatory function of, 2658, 2659
revenue sharing, 2227
Social Security and, 2659, 2660
spending power, 2468–2469
standing and, 1464–1465 state and local governments, 1211
strict construction of, 2561
supremacy clause and, 2661
taxpayer challenges to spending programs, 1464–1465
See also Budget process; Direct and indirect taxes; Intergovernmental tax immunities; State and local government taxation Tax Injunction Act (1937), 447
Taxpayers' and citizens' suits, 2661–2662
cases and controversies, 1464–1465
federal funds to religious schools, 1066, 2777
federal spending challenges, 164–165
Flast v. Cohen, 1066–1067 personal stake in outcome of, 2661 separation of powers and, 1066–1067, 2661–2662
standing, 1066–1067, 2777
Technology and the Constitution. See Science, technology, and the Constitution Telecommunications Act (1996), 471, 2489
Telephone pornography. See Dial-a-porn
Telephone tapping. See Wiretapping Television. See Broadcasting; Cable television Temperance. See Prohibition
Temporal limits on lawmaking powers, 2663–2665
cloture rule, 434, 2664
Temporary Assistance for Needy Families, 2875–2876
Tennessee Valley Authority Act (1933), 2666–2667
constitutionality challenges, 128
Ten Pound Act Cases (1786–1787), 2667
as first judicial review instances, 165–166
Tenth Amendment, 2667–2669
age discrimination extension to state and local governments, 59 child labor regulation seen violating, 1528 Child Labor Tax Act and, 350
cities and, 362
devolution and, 776
dual federalism and, 827
economy and, 850
enumerated powers, 744, 899, 1011
and environmental regulation, 901, 904, 1009–1010
implied powers, 1011
and intergovernmental immunity, 1382
and judicial power, 1465
Municipal Bankruptcy Act as violation of, 127–128
on rights retained to the people, 1091
on states' rights, 178, 2533, 2667–2668
Tenure of Office Act (1867), 2669
violation as Johnson (Andrew) impeachment charge, 110, 126, 288, 579, 1339, 1428–1429, 2476, 2669 Term (Supreme Court), 2669
Term limits, 2669–2671
Anti-Federalist advocacy, 763 in state and local government, 2671
Stevens's views, 2537
Twenty-Second Amendment, 73, 2741–2742
Washington's Farewell Address precedent, 2862, 2863 Territorial Court, 2671–2672
slavery and, 2435
Territories of the United States, 2672–2673 acquisition authorization, 83
citizenship in, 2672 colonialism constitutionality, 1169 commonwealth status of, 468 constitutional guarantees, 830
diversity jurisdiction, 798
extraterritoriality, 959
federal judiciary provisions, 1464
incorporation, 1358 incorporation theory, 1169
insular cases, 1375–1376
legislative court, 1589–1590
Missouri Compromise, 1747–1748
Ordinance of 1784, 1856
republican form of government, 2209
as statehood probation, 2479
Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, 2720
See also Northwest Ordinance; Slavery in the territories Territory, 2673–2674
court, 2671–2672
and federalism, 1005
incorporation of, 2673–2674
Louisiana Purchase Treaty, 1644
Northwest Ordinance, 1829, 2479, 2673
Puerto Rico status, 2080–2081
Terrorism control and the Constitution, 2674–2675
Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, 101–102, 1503 free speech vs. advocacy of force, 1154
immigration law, 2674
and limitation of federal jurisdiction, 1503 Test Acts. See Federal Test Acts
Test case, 2676–2677
abortion rights, 2284–2286, 2921
birth control, 1233–1234
cases and controversies clause, 2676

Test case (continued)
Cherokee Indian Cases, 344 and civil rights legislation, 410
collusive suit, 443
as constitutionally protected political activity, 1773
on Indian lands, 1771
interest group litigation, 1378–1379
litigation strategy, 1630
Rhode Island Dorrite constitution, 1652 segregation ordinances, 259 separate but equal facilities, 1918–1917 voting rights in primary elections, 410, 423
woman suffrage, 1740, 2807–2808
Testimonial and nontestimonial compulsion, 2677–2679 alcohol-level blood test from unconscious person, 229
blood samples, 2319, 2677
drunk-driving blood test, 205
Fifth Amendment applications, 2237–2238, 2240–2241
right against self-incrimination and, 2677–2678
Testimonial immunity. See Immunity grant Test oath cases (1867), 2679–2680
and amnesty, 89
attorney loyalty oath ruling, 1030 and bill of attainder, 174, 1648
Chase Court and, 335, 339
civil liberties and, 2679
and First Amendment privilege, 1048
Texas annexation. See Annexation of Texas
Textualism, 2681–2684
ambiguity and vagueness of, 2682–2684
and judicial restraint, 1450
noninterpretivism, 1820
original intent and, 2315, 2681
"plain meaning" rule, 627 reliance on language of Constitution, 2681
of Scalia, 2315, 2316
strict constructionism vs., 2316
See also Transformation of constitutional law Theories of the Union, 2685–2689
of Adams (John Quincy), 30
compact theory, 2687, 2688
Constitutional Convention of 1787, 753–754 creation of states, 2685
federalism and, 2686
Federalist-Whig doctrine, 2686–2687, 2885
interposition, 1392–1393
of Lincoln, 1620–1621
Louisiana Purchase Treaty, 1644
nullification and, 2687
separation of powers and, 2685
states' rights and, 2519, 2686–2687 territorial problems and, 2685 of Webster (Daniel), 2871
Third Amendment, 2689
civil-military provision of, 385
Petition of Right, 1903
property rights and, 2052
Third-party consent, 2689–2691
actual authority basis, 1327–1328 electronic eavesdropping and, 2690–2691
probable cause and, 2689
property rights and, 2690
unreasonable search and, 2690
Thirteenth Amendment (framing), 2691–2693
abolitionist constitutional theory, 2691
African American citizenship, 820, 2143, 2822
"badges and incidents" theory, 201 badges of servitude, 201, 1918, 1919, 2016
Emancipation Proclamation, 884
Freedmen's Bureau, 1106
as peonage protection, 1960, 1961, 2900
ratification, 72, 577
Reconstruction policy, 2412–2143
slavery abolishment, 2057, 2480, 2497, 2691
three-fifths clause, 2692
Thirteenth Amendment (judicial interpretation), 2693–2695
and antidiscrimination legislation, 94, 95, 96, 401–402, 403
and badges of servitude, 146, 1437
and Civil Rights Act of 1866, 403
Civil Rights Cases, 408–410
and color of law, 445
conscription as involuntary servitude argument, 506, 2187, 2356, 2928
employment discrimination, 893
equal protection of the laws, 908, 911
as nonapplicable to group violence against blacks, 1293 as nonapplicable to Selective Draft Law Cases, 2187, 2928
Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 1887
peonage, 1897
private racial discrimination, 1241, 1283, 1293, 1437, 2015, 2016, 2063, 2099, 2290 property rights in human body prohibition, 2057
and rights of individual employee, 1549
Slaughterhouse cases, 2423
and voting rights, 2806
Thoughts on Government (Adams), 27
Three-fifths clause, 2700–2701
representation, 545
Thirteenth Amendment, 2692
Three-judge court, 2701
injunction approval, 1499
"Three strikes" laws. See Career criminal sentencing laws Timber Culture Act. See Environmental regulation and the Constitution
Title IX. See Education Amendments
Titles of nobility, 2703
Toleration Act (1689), 2704–2705
Bill of Rights (English), 175
Tonkin Gulf Resolution. See Gulf of Tonkin Resolution Tort Claims Act. See Federal Tort Claims Act
Torts, 2706–2710
Federal Tort Claims Act, 419, 1030, 1217–1218
Fifth Amendment and, 2706
Fourteenth Amendment and, 2706
journalistic liability, 1069, 1438–1439
litigation strategy, 1631
physical contact protection, 2057
procedural due process and, 2706
punitive damages, 2081–2083
sovereign immunity, 1030, 2459, 2706, 2707
supremacy clause and, 2706
worker's compensation replacing, 2924–2925
See also Damages; Damages claims
To Secure These Rights (report of the Committee on Civil Rights), 318
Townshend Acts (1767), 2711
as taxation without representation, 779
writ of assistance, 1099
Trade. See Commerce clause; Foreign commerce; Interstate commerce; Intrastate commerce; State regulation of commerce; State taxation of commerce Trademark law. See Intellectual property law and the First Amendment Trade unions. See Labor and the Constitution

Traffic stops, 2711–2712
automobile search, 209, 2711
Fourth Amendment and, 2711
sobriety checkpoints, 1096, 1726
Transactional immunity. See Immunity grant
Transformation of constitutional law, 2712–2714
living constitution, 1632–1634, 2712, 2714
originalism, 2712
progressive constitutional thought, 2713
Travel. See Right to travel
Travel Act (1961), 1568, 1670
Treason, 2715–2720
attainder of, 133–134
as breach of allegiance, 2716
Burr trial, 207, 278, 552, 2913 citizenship theory and, 364 conspiracy vs., 207, 278
constitutional provisions, 2840
conviction for, 2717
Cramer v. United States, 705
Davis (Jefferson) indictment, 747 dual nationality and, 2716–2717
Fries' Rebellion, 1156
Hartford Convention, 30
as impeachment ground, 609, 1336, 1337
political trials, 1954, 1955
right to counsel, 2259
in state constitutions, 2715
Whiskey Rebellion conviction and pardon, 2861, 2885 witness testimony, 2718
World War II cases, 2931
Treatise on Evidence (Wigmore), 2904–2905
Treatise on the Constitutional Limitations Which Rest upon the Legislative Power of the States of the American Union (Cooley), 680
Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo (1850), 2720
Treaty on the Execution of Penal Sentences (1977), 2720–2721
Treaty power, 2721–2722
and American Indians, 79, 81
Bricker Amendment, 243–244, 1541
and drug regulation, 821
executive agreements, 939 executive branch obligation deficiencies, 71
First Congress, 1059
and foreign affairs, 1076
Jay's Treaty, 1259–1260, 1419, 2861–2862
Louisiana Purchase Treaty, 1644
Missouri v. Holland, 1081
and political question doctrine, 1953
as preempting state law, 1389–1390, 2834 self-executing and non-self-executing treaties, 1080
Senate, 1978, 1991–1993, 1996, 2359, 2361, 2362
Senate advice and consent, 47, 1073, 1991
Senate's strengthened role under, 1978 supermajority rule, 2585
as supreme law, 1746 termination, 1993
territory acquisition, 83
Ware v. Hylton, 2834
See also President and the treaty power
Trespass, 2722–2723
civil disobedience and, 371
civil rights and, 389
demonstration restrictions, 34 informant electronic eavesdropping, 2896
labor activity, 1554
and open fields doctrine, 1849
Trial by jury, 2724–2730
applicable to territory, 1376
Bill of Rights, 1091
blue ribbon jury, 199–200
Bushell's Case, 282–283
in capital punishment cases, 302
Civil Rights Act of 1957, 404
compulsory process right, 479–481 confrontation right, 491–492 contempt power used to deny, 671 criminal case guarantee, 721, 722 in criminal contempt case, 435
declaratory judgment, 756
double jeopardy, 807–812
and due process, 828, 2039
evolution of, 2724–2725
fair trial, 970
felony, 1032
and fugitive slaves, 2425, 2431
and grand jury, 1220–1221
incorporation doctrine, 830, 2832
and incriminating statements, 1696 in injunction violation prosecutions, 596 judicial discretion, 166 jurors' rights, 1514–1515
jury nullification, 1512–1514
jury selection, 2727
jury size, 157–158, 264, 1515–1517, 2727, 2906
jury unanimity, 1434–1435, 1510, 1517–1518, 2727
juvenile proceedings, 353, 1523, 1709 for misdemeanors, 157, 157–158
Palko v. Connecticut, 1875
prejudicial publicity, 1150, 1405, 2077
Quirin, Ex parte, 2085
reasonable doubt, 2138–2139
as right of the criminally accused, 2255
Sixth Amendment and, 2724
Ten Pound Act Cases, 2667
venue, 2782
vicinage, 2786–2787
and victim impact statements, 208–209
voir dire, 2803
waiver of constitutional rights, 2830
Warren Court on, 716
See also Fair trial; Jury discrimination; Public trial; Speedy trial; Witness, jurors, and the freedom of speech Trials. See Fair trial; Impeachment; Military justice; Political trials; Public trial
Tribal economic development and the Constitution, 2731–2732
Tucker Act (1887), 2737–2738
Tuition grants, 2738–2739
enjoinment, 1231
establishment of religion and, 2738
state action and, 2738
See also Vouchers
TVA. See Tennessee Valley Authority Act
Twelfth Amendment, 2740
as Anti-Federalist concession, 72
Electoral College, 866, 1940
elector selection, 1940
Jefferson approval, 1423 separate presidential and vice-presidential ballots, 550 Twentieth Amendment, 2740–2741
presidential succession, 2741
ratification, 73, 594, 598, 2741
Senate and, 2359
term commencement, 2741
Twenty-Fifth Amendment, 2741
presidential incapacity, 1342, 1343 presidential succession, 2002
ratification, 73, 608
Twenty-First Amendment, 2741
as Prohibition repeal, 2050
ratification, 73, 74–75, 594, 598
Twenty-Fourth Amendment, 2741
capitation taxes, 312
poll tax abolition, 73, 377, 1306, 1961, 2741

Twenty-Fourth Amendment (continued)
ratification, 73, 608
voting rights, 2809
Twenty-Second Amendment, 2741–2742
constitutional reform, 650 presidential two-term limit, 73, 2741–2742
ratification, 73, 602
Twenty-Seventh Amendment, 2742–2743
ratification, 73, 75–76
Twenty-Sixth Amendment, 2743
ratification, 73, 75, 608
voting age, 377, 1090, 1306
Twenty-Third Amendment, 2743–2744
District of Columbia presidential electors, 796
ratification, 73, 608
Two-level theory, 2744–2745
clear and present danger test, 331
obscenity and, 1837
Two-sovereignties rule, 2745–2746
as Fifth Amendment restriction, 2237
Two Treatises of Government (Locke), 1639–1640

U

UCMJ. See Uniform Code of Military Justice
Ultra vires, 2747
Unconstitutional conditions, 2748–2749, 2749–2751 (update)
Unconstitutionality, 2751–2752
earliest rulings, 1279–1280, 1294 justiciability showing, 1521
Unenumerated rights, 2752–2754
abortion seen as, 10–11
as Bork nomination issue, 210, 211
Fourteenth Amendment protection, 33
natural rights and, 2753
Ninth Amendment and, 2752, 2754
social compact and, 2753
as statute invalidation vehicle, 11
See also Freedom of assembly and association; Freedom of intimate Association; Right of privacy Uniform Code of Military Justice, 1726–1727
Union. See Civil War; Theories of the Union Unions. See Labor and antitrust laws; Labor and the Constitution; Labor movement
Unitary executive, 2755–2756
United Colonies of New-England Commissioners, 997
United Nations Charter, 2757–2758
International human rights, 1387
and U.S. Korean War involvement, 1075, 1541, 1921
U.S. participation issues, 603
United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, 71
United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, 2758
creation of, 981, 1492
Judicial Conference of the United States, 1452 jurisdiction of Claims Court transferred to, 419, 2758 jurisdiction of Court of Customs and Patent Appeals transferred to, 696, 2758 review of Court of International Trade decisions, 696
United States Courts of Appeals, 2758–2761
in basic judiciary system, 1463 certification and, 327
diversity jurisdiction and, 2759
empowerments, 2760 established by Circuit Courts of Appeals Act, 361 functions, 2758–2759
Judicial Conference of the United States, 1452 jurisdiction and caseloads, 1491–1492, 2759
original jurisdiction, 2759
relationship to Supreme Court, 2760–2761
writ of mandamus, 2760
writ of prohibition, 2050, 2760
United States District Courts, 2762–2765
admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, 45, 1495
in basic judiciary system, 1463
caseload, 2764
concurrent jurisdictions, 2762
diversity jurisdiction, 2762, 2764
functions of, 2763 immunity grants by, 989
Judicial Code, 1451
Judicial Conference of the United States, 1452 statutory jurisdiction, 1490–1491 workload, 1491, 2763
Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1387–1388
Universal Military Training and Service Act. See Selective Service Acts Universities. See Academic freedom; Affirmative action; Education and the Constitution Unmarried cohabitation. See Freedom of intimate association Unreasonable search, 2766–2768, 2768–2770 (update) aural and visual surveillance, 1527
Chandler v. Miller, 330 drug testing as, 294, 822, 823, 826, 1096 exclusion of evidence gained by, 722
Federal Bureau of Investigation break-ins, 976 Fourth Amendment protection, 294, 330, 375, 822, 823, 1094–1095, 1097–1098, 1527, 2766–2768
and freedom of speech, 1131
harmless error, 1270
Katz v. United States, 1527 physical intrusion requirement, 1527
probable cause, 71, 2022–2023, 2767
prohibition on, 2330
reasonable expectation of privacy and, 2768
and right against self-incrimination, 216
and right of privacy, 721
rights of criminally accused, 2257
search incident to arrest and, 2329, 2766, 2769
stop and frisk, 2767, 2769
waiver of constitutional rights, 2831
warrantless searches and, 2766–2767, 2768, 2847
See also Exclusionary rule Unwritten Constitution, 2770–2772
and higher law, 1287
and limited government, 1618–1619
Unwritten law. See Higher law
Urban areas. See Cities and the Constitution; Public purpose doctrine; Residential segregation Urine testing. See Drug testing
Use immunity. See Immunity grant Utility regulation. See Economic regulation

V

Vaccination, 2773
patients' rights, 1884
religious liberty conflict, 2190
and right of privacy, 2244
as under police power, 1415
Vagrancy laws, 2774–2775
Papachristou decision, 816 street gang loitering ordinance, 345 vagueness doctrine and, 345, 2774

Vagueness, 2775–2777
breach of the peace statutes, 227
Chicago v. Morales, 345
chilling effect and, 354
civil rights cases and, 390 drug laws, 678–679
freedom of speech, 1131
free speech and RICO Act, 1152–1153 harassment law, 2925
incitement to unlawful conduct, 1285–1286
interpretive latitude and, 2775
invalid on its face, 1399
juvenile curfew laws, 1521
juvenile proceedings, 1523
as litigation strategy, 1631
loyalty oaths, 2066
loyalty-security programs, 1536
overbreadth vs., 1866–1867, 2775 partial-birth abortion bans, 13
Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 1916
vagrancy laws, 345, 2774
Value pluralism and the Constitution, 2778–2779
association with liberalism, 2778
freedom of speech and, 2778
marketplace of ideas and, 2778
New Right jurisprudence rejection of, 1801
VAWA. See Violence Against Women Act
Vehicular pursuits. See Police pursuits and constitutional rights Venue, 2782
change of, 2782
free press/fair trial, 1142
Judicial Code, 1451
Sixth Amendment and, 2782
vicinage vs., 2786–2787
Vermont Constitution of 1777, 2782
Vested rights, 2782–2784
Calder v. Bull, 290
Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge Company, 332–333
and contract clause, 1068, 2547
corporate charter, 2059–2060
Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 2871
due process and, 2783, 2934–2935 eminent domain and, 888, 2783
and feudalism, 1034
Fourteenth Amendment protection, 1041–1042, 1225, 2203, 2783–2784, 2807 and freedom of contract doctrine, 744, 745 inalienable policy power supremacy over, 283, 1350 Paterson ruling, 360, 1883
police power and, 2783
privileges and immunities, 2784
and public purpose doctrine, 2073 reserved police power and, 2218
state police power and, 1225, 2507
and substantive due process, 2052, 2784, 2934–2935
See also Contract clause
Veto power, 2784–2785
checks and balances, 342
executive defiance of "unconstitutional" laws, 942
Ford's extensive use of, 1070
impoundment of funds as, 1349
Jackson's extensive use of, 1408, 1409, 1412, 1414
Johnson's (Andrew) enlargement of, 1428 joint resolution subject to, 1436–1437
line-item veto, 1625–1627
pocket veto, 1920–1921, 2784–2785
and political philosophy of Constitution, 1945 presidential first use of, 547
as presidential power, 322, 547, 1996, 1999
separation of powers and, 2383, 2784
Vice-presidency, 2785–2786
and presidency of Senate, 2358 separate ballot for, 550
Vicinage, 2786–2787
Vietnam War, 2787–2791
amnesty, 89, 1070
antiwar demonstrations, 2319, 2790–2792 antiwar demonstrations in District of Columbia, 796 antiwar movement, 1431 antiwar suit against Army surveillance, 1557 Calley court-martial as political trial, 1954, 2360 congressional leadership in ending, 494 conscientious objection, 505, 506, 2188, 2193
conscription, 2357
and critical legal studies, 724
draft card burning, 817–818
executive power, 947
Gulf of Tonkin Resolution, 1242
interposition, 1392
Johnson's (Lyndon) strategy, 1430–1431
Massachusetts v. Laird, 1692
Parker v. Levy, 1879
Pentagon Papers case, 1129, 1139, 1140, 1145, 1805–1807, 2009
as police action, 1921
political question doctrine, 1470, 1955
presidential plenary authority, 1075 presidential war powers controversy, 494, 610 Senate antiwar policies, 2360
state of war, 2505
symbolic speech, 2703
as undeclared war, 755, 1242, 1998, 2360, 2787
War Powers Resolution, 485, 494, 610–611, 2838–2839, 2842, 2843
wiretapping, 2761–2762
Vinson Court, 2792–2797
alien hearings, 2408
Brown v. Board of Education arguments before, 2852 civil liberties rulings, 380, 2793, 2795
commentators on the Constitution on, 452
freedom of speech and, 2794
Justices of, 420
Rosenberg v. United States, 2294
Violence Against Women Act (1994), 2797
and constitutional aspiration, 665
Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions (1798–1799), 2798–2799
constitutional theory, 1412, 1421
as interposition, 1392
Jefferson and Madison authorship, 1421–1422, 1424 as response to Alien and Sedition Acts, 65, 67, 228, 1016, 1049, 1421, 1424
Virginia Charter of 1606, 2799
Virginia Declaration of Rights and Constitution of 1776, 2799–2800
bail clause, 158
civil liberties, 376
as first permanent state constitution, 540 as influence on French Declaration of Rights, 1366 and Jeffersonian constitutional theory, 1419–1420 Madison's role in, 1656
omitted rights, 176
property linked with liberty, 2051
republican form of government, 2209
right against self-incrimination, 2235

Virginia Plan, 2800
and bicameralism, 172
and federalism, 1011
as framework for discussion of Constitution, 518, 519, 521, 542 and judicial appointments, 48
Madison's contributions, 1657
Paterson and, 1882
Pinckney Plan, 1909
Randolph (Edmund) and, 2116
three-fifths formula, 2700
Virginia Statute of Religious Freedom (1786), 2801
and constitutional religious liberty guarantee, 2185
on establishment of religion, 928 Madison's "Memorial and Remonstrance" and, 1662
rejection of religious test for public office, 2197
Virtual representation. See Representation; Taxation without representation
Visas, 2801–2802
Voice samples. See Testimonial and nontestimonial compulsion Void for vagueness. See Vagueness
Voir dire, 2803
and fair trial, 970
and free press/fair trial, 1152
Volstead Act (1919), 2803–2804
Voluntariness. See Police interrogation and confessions Voting rights, 2811–2812 (update), 2811–2812 (update)
alien, 68–69
amendments broadening scope of, 1306
in antebellum period, 566
ballot access, 158, 2813 black disenfranchisement, 1168, 2202 of black males, 1039–1041, 1070, 1090, 1092, 1728 capitation taxes and, 312 citizenship separated from, 68–69, 91, 2918 city boundary delineations and, 362
Civil Rights Act of 1957, 404
Civil Rights Act of 1960, 405
Civil Rights Commission investigation of, 410 civil rights movement and, 1026 class actions, 2320 as Constitutional Convention of 1787 issue, 636
Court invalidations, 1041
in deliberative democracy, 764 District of Columbia disenfranchisement, 608, 796, 797
due process and, 2807
eighteen-year-old vote, 73, 608, 1090, 2743
electoral districting, 152–153, 867–870, 2227–2229, 2814
Fifteenth Amendment and, 2436, 2807, 2938
Fifteenth Amendment enforcement, 1089
Fifteenth Amendment non-protection of private abridgement, 1415, 2938
Fifteenth Amendment non-protection of women, 2918
Fifteenth and Nineteenth Amendment guarantees, 375, 387, 392 first case under Fifteenth Amendment, 2145
Force Acts, 1070
and Fourteenth Amendment framing, 1084–1085, 1086, 1087, 1090
as fundamental interest, 1401, 2228
gerrymander effects, 1187–1189, 1203, 2814 grandfather clause, 1219, 1242, 1629, 2808
homeless people and, 1302 jury service linkage, 1515 Lincoln's Reconstruction plan, 1625
literacy test, 1041, 1042, 1089–1090, 1629, 2808
Military Reconstruction Acts, 1728
multimember districts, 1751, 1765, 2135
non-English literacy equivalent, 1527
one person, one vote, 440, 1852–1853
poll tax abolishment, 73, 1271–1272, 1961 poll tax upheld, 228, 1961 primary election exclusions, 1238, 2808
primary elections, 423, 1941, 2007, 2008 primary election test case, 410, 423 property requirements, 2052–2053, 2806 punishment of private interference upheld, 2938
racial discrimination, 392–393, 1751, 2480, 2811, 2906–2907
and reapportionment, 152–153, 2130–2138
Reese, United States v., 2822–2823
Reese v. United States, 2145–2146, 2827
residence requirements, 830–831, 2219, 2813 rights violations investigation, 607 school district limitation, 1542
South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 2456–2457
state action and, 2484–2485
Stone Court and, 2550–2551
strict scrutiny, 1271, 1272, 1401, 2203, 2228
substantive due process and, 2577
Thirteenth Amendment and, 2806
Thornburg v. Gingles, 2136
Twenty-Fourth Amendment, 2741, 2809
Twenty-Sixth Amendment, 2743
understanding clause, 2320
Waite opinion, 2822–2823
Warren Court decisions, 380
wealth discrimination, 1271–1272, 1362, 1974, 2053
"white primary" and, 2808
write-in votes, 264–265
See also Fifteenth Amendment; Race and voting; Representation; Woman suffrage; Woman suffrage movement Voting Rights Act of 1965 and its amendments, 2812–2813, 2813–2814 (update)
amendments (1970), 2743
and black-majority districts, 1735 as broadening voter eligibility, 1306
and civil liberties, 377, 379
and civil rights, 392–393
constitutionality upheld, 2456–2457
electoral districting, 868–869, 870, 2093
enactment and provisions, 1026, 1042, 2810
gerrymander, 1188
impact of, 412
literacy equivalency provision, 1527, 1629 literacy tests suspension, 1090, 1629 multimember districts remedy, 1765, 2135
as national standard, 1008
Oregon v. Mitchell, 1856
primary elections, 2008
race-conscious reapportionment, 2756
reapportionment, 1765, 2135, 2136
Vouchers, 2814–2815
Agostini v. Felton supporting, 61, 1604 government aid to religious institutions and, 1208, 2814–2815 and religious objections to public school teachings, 2178
tuition grants, 2738–2739

Vulgarities. See Fighting words; Low-value speech

W

Wade-Davis Bill (1864), 2818
  Lincoln-congressional clash over, 1625
  Lincoln veto, 2142
Wadsworth Act (1940), 2357
Wage and hour law. See Adamson Eight-Hour Act; Fair Labor Standards Act; Maximum hours and minimum wages legislation
Wagner Act (1935), 2818–2819
  boycott, 215
  child labor, 349
  collective bargaining, 442, 1545
  commerce clause, 458
  employer speech, 1551
  Shreveport doctrine test, 2415
  union membership, 1553–1554
  upheld, 1547, 2289
  See also Taft-Hartley Labor Relations Act
Wagner Act cases (1937), 2819–2821
  and child labor, 349 employer treatment of unions, 1548
Waite Court, 2824–2830
  Civil Rights Cases, 2828
  Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendment opinions, 2822–2823, 2826–2827
  Legal tender cases, 1581–1582
  state action doctrine, 1037–1038
  on state police power, 676
Waiver of constitutional rights, 2830–2832
  Faretta v. California, 974
  Johnson v. Zerbst, 1436
  Miranda rules, 1926, 1930–1931, 2240
  plea bargaining as, 1917–1918
  right to counsel, 2260
  voluntariness of, 2710
War, declaration of. See Declaration of war
War, foreign affairs, and the Constitution, 2834–2840
  Congress and foreign policy, 494–495
  Senate and foreign policy, 2361–2363
War of 1812
  as declared war, 755, 1998
  and Federalists, 1017
  Hartford Convention protest, 1017, 2480
  interposition, 1392
  Madison's conduct of, 1659
War powers, 2840–2842, 2842–2844 (update 1), 2844 (update 2) and American hostage crisis in Tehran, 614–615 Clinton administration on, 432
  commentators on the Constitution on, 451
  concurrent resolution, 1998, 2838
  congressional, 502–503
  constitutional provisions, 2835
  declaration of war, 755–756, 1080, 1998
  emergency powers, 886
  government price regulation, 1605
  Gulf War, 1243
  historical background, 2834–2839
  International Emergency Economic Powers Act, 1386
  Japanese American cases, 131, 2930–2931
  Korean War, 1541
  legislation continued in peacetime, 2924
  National Security Act, 1781
  Story's views, 2554
  territory acquisition, 83
  War Powers Resolution (1973), 485, 494, 610–611, 2838–2839, 2842, 2843
  wartime dislocations legislation, 603
  World War I, 2927–2929
  World War II, 2929–2931
  See also Congressional war powers; Presidential war powers; War, foreign affairs, and the Constitution War Powers Acts (1941, 1942), 2844–2845
  presidential powers, 1998
War Powers Resolution (1973), 610–611, 2838–2839, 2842, 2843
  and concurrent resolution, 485
  congressional override of Nixon's veto of, 494 Warrant. See Arrest warrant; General Warrant; Search warrant Warrantless search, 2845–2847
  administrative search, 43, 44 automobile, 140, 141, 244, 329, 1427, 2295, 2846, 2847
  balancing test and, 2337
  benign forms of, 2847 blood samples and, 2319 body search as, 205 border search as, 209
  drunk-driving blood test, 205 of employment facilities voided, 1681
  exigent circumstances, 956, 2846
  exigent circumstances rejected, 2881 Fourth Amendment prohibition, 2881
  general search, 1098–1099
  general warrant, 1185–1186 homeless shelters protected from, 1302
  plain feel doctrine, 1912
  plain view doctrine, 1913
  probable cause, 140, 2329, 2846
  seizures in, 2339
  third-party consent, 2689–2691
  trash search, 294
  unreasonable search, 2766–2767, 2768, 2847 vessel search, 319
  Warren Court approach, 1095
Warren Court, 2851–2858
  access to the courts, 23
  antidiscrimination legislation, 94
  Brennan role in, 229–231, 232–236, 238–239
  Brown v. Board of Education, 254–255, 273, 771–772, 2849, 2852–2853
  Burger Court outlook vs., 270, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277
  capital punishment, 302
  civil liberties expansion, 379, 380, 2414, 2594
  commentators on the Constitution on, 452 conservative backlash, 776, 1291, 1315, 1801
  constitutionalism, 382–383, 658, 2072
  criminal defendant's rights, 975, 1927, 1928, 2263
  criminal procedure, 715–716, 1927, 2848, 2855–2856
  double jeopardy, 169–170
  draft card burning, 818
  due process decisions, 722 dynamic and changing Constitution view, 2713–2714
  electoral districting, 2227–2229
  equal protection, 274, 909–912, 1271–1272, 2853
  equal protection clause expansion, 1271, 1272, 2853 federalization of state criminal procedure, 2039 force of Warren's leadership, 1485–1486, 2848–2851, 2851–2852
  freedom of the press, 271–272
  fundamental interests, 1173
  fundamental rights, 1177
  habeas corpus expansion, 1252, 1253, 1254
  incorporation doctrine, 169–170, 179, 715, 1267

Warren Court (continued)
individual rights, 725
judicial activism, 607–608, 1448, 2853, 2857–2858
judicial power, 1066–1067
Justice Goldberg's record, 1200
Justice Marshall's (Thurgood) opinions and dissents, 1676–1682 Justices of, 420
landmark decisions, 273
legal process school as reaction to, 1578, 1579
legislative investigations, 2866–2867
libel laws, 2850, 2855
liberalism of, 607–608, 1615, 1616, 2853, 2855–2858
libertarianism of, 2312, 2315, 2340, 2549
Miranda rules, 1922, 1926, 2850
New Right backlash, 1801 originalism reaction to perceived excesses, 1291
overbreadth doctrine, 250
pragmatist legacy, 1983
probable cause, 1095
protections for public employees, 2066 race-related legislation, 1448
reapportionment, 152–153, 273, 1615, 2849, 2854, 2857
Reynolds v. Sims, 273, 2227–2229
scholarly critics, 1542 selective incorporation of Bill of Rights, 2039, 2041 self-incrimination cases, 64
as social change agent, 700
solicitor general role in, 2451
standard of review, 2471
state action and, 400, 2491
states' rights, 2520
strict scrutiny, 2562
suspect classification, 2625
taking of property, 2646
three themes of, 2853
voting rights, 2804
welfare benefits, 2408
Washington, D.C. See District of Columbia
Washington's Farewell Address (1796), 2862, 2863
Waste, pollution, and the Constitution, 2864
Watergate and the Constitution, 2864–2865
attorney general and Justice Department, 134, 135
Burger Court and, 274
Ervin as chair of Senate investigative committee, 922, 2365 executive privilege claim, 1955
final judgment rule, 1044
impeachment articles of Richard Nixon, 126–127, 609, 1339 Iran-Contra comparisons, 1402 issues involved, 609–610
Nixon, United States v., 1817–1818
Nixon pardon, 1070, 1339, 2864
Nixon refusal to surrender tapes, 1816
political trials, 1954
presidential immunity ruling, 1994
Senate select committee investigation, 2360, 2365
special prosecutor, 1359, 2463
Water Pollution Control Act. See Environmental regulation and the Constitution
Water Power Act (1920), 2865–2866
Water Quality Improvement Act. See Environmental regulation and the Constitution Wealth discrimination, 2869–2870
in abortion access, 6, 7, 8–9, 1324, 1665, 1974, 2205, 2286, 2870, 2872 in access to the courts, 23, 204, 1232, 1974
in bail-setting, 149, 716
due process, 204
equal protection guarantees, 2309–2310 guarantees against, 2309 and income tax unconstitutionality, 1960, 1964
indigency, 1362
jury selection from property tax rolls, 253 poll tax as, 1362, 1974, 2879 property-tax financing of school districts, 1974–1975, 2309–2310, 2387
right to counsel, 2262
San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, 2309–2310 strict scrutiny vs. rational basis standard, 741–742
as suspect classification, 472
in voting rights, 1271–1272, 1362, 1974, 2053, 2879
in welfare benefits, 741, 742, 2408, 2869, 2873 in zoning, 2947
Wealth of Nations (Smith), 834 Webb-Kenyon Act (1913), 2870
upheld, 421, 1169
Welfare benefits, 2873
abortion funding restriction, 5, 6, 8–9, 1665, 2205 alienage restrictions, 66, 1218–1219, 1332–1333 alienage rights, 190, 1077, 1331
Califano v. Westcott, 293–294
Contract with America (1994) opposition, 776
Court deference to legislative judgments, 2876–2877
Dandridge v. Williams, 741–742, 2873, 2874, 2876, 2879–2880 denied access to the courts, 23
devolution, 778
due process, 1697–1698
economic analysis, 837
entitlement, 897, 2880
equal protection, 917, 2305, 2408
fair hearing, 965–966
federal grants-in-aid, 988
food stamp program, 770, 2874–2875, 2876
and freedom of intimate association, 1119, 1120, 1122, 1123–1124 home visit by caseworker allowed, 2934 Johnson (Lyndon) administration, 1430
poverty law, 1973–1975
procedural due process, 1200–1201
residence requirements, 1973, 2218, 2219, 2275, 2873, 2874, 2877, 2878–2879
right-privilege distinction, 2252
Saenz v. Roe, 778, 2305
Shapiro v. Thompson, 2305, 2408
Social Security Act, 2445–2446
standard of review, 741–742
waiting period, 2408
wealth discrimination, 741, 742, 2408, 2869, 2873
Welfare rights, 2874–2875, 2875–2877 (update) international human rights guarantees, 1388
Lochner v. New York, 1638, 2878
nonmandated, 2877
privilege distinction, 2252
reform bill (1996), 777
See also Medicaid-funded abortions
Welfare state, 2877–2881
Economic Opportunity Act, 843
Health Insurance for the Aged Act (Medicare), 1281
Sheppard-Towner Maternity Act, 2411, 2659
welfare rights, 2874–2875

See also Maximum hours and minimum wages legislation; New Deal; Social Security Act
We, the People (Ackerman), 524
Whig party, 2884–2885
Adams (John Quincy) theory development, 30–31 constitutional nationalism, 2885 development of mass electioneering techniques, 559 theory of the Union, 2686–2687, 2885
Webster and, 2885
Whiskey Rebellion (1794), 2885
guarantee clause, 1238 militia response, 2861
White Court, 2897–2901
Justices of, 421
Wilkes Cases, 2905
right against self-incrimination, 2236
Williams Act (1934), 2350
Wilmot Proviso (1846), 2908
abolitionist free-soiler support, 3
Douglas (Stephen) opposition, 812
as popular sovereignty alternative, 563, 1962
on slavery in the territories, 2435
Wiretapping, 2912–2913
Black opinion on, 187 challenge rights, 64–65 electronic eavesdropping laws, 873
by federal agents, 1774
Federal Bureau of Investigation activities, 976, 2139 and interrogation by informers, 1853 Justice Department use of, 136 and lawlessness by public officials, 719 laws and, 873
and living Constitution, 1633–1634
Olmstead v. United States, 711, 1849–1850, 2913
Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act, 1852, 2913
presidential inherent power claim, 2761–2762
search and seizure, 1850, 2139, 2140
Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights investigation, 2365
See also Electronic eavesdropping
Witnesses, jurors, and the freedom of speech, 2915–2916
confrontation right, 2255
cross-examination, 2255
federal immunity, 989 fruit of the poisonous fruit, 1158
grand jury, 1221
legislative investigations, 1595
See also Right against self-incrimination
Woman's Christian Temperance Union, 2919
Woman's Party, 2919
Woman suffrage, 2917–2918
citizenship basis, 91, 370, 1740, 2477, 2918–2919, 2920
constitutional aspiration, 664
and Fifteenth Amendment, 91, 2736, 2807–2808
and Fourteenth Amendment, 1092, 1740, 2807
Minor v. Happersett denial of, 1740, 2807–2808, 2918, 2919, 2920
Nineteenth Amendment, 72, 73, 92, 593, 1306, 1808–1809, 2389, 2808, 2917–2918, 2919
post-Civil War denial, 69
Progressive advocacy, 2047
Reconstruction-era denial, 69, 1740, 2477, 2807–2808, 2918, 2919, 2920
and state law, 1740
Woman suffrage movement, 2918–2920
Anthony's work, 91–92
civil disobedience and, 370
petition campaign, 2273
Seneca Falls Convention, 562, 2365–2366, 2804
split over Fifteenth Amendment, 91
Stanton's work, 2476–2477, 2806
Truth's arguments, 2736
Women in constitutional history, 2920–2922
abortion rights, 4–15, 190, 191, 192, 196, 2204
Anthony and Stanton women's rights leadership, 91–92, 2476–2477, 2806
birth control rights, 4, 182–183, 2204
Brandeis brief, 224–225, 1764, 2920
equal rights amendment, 918–919
feminist theory, 1032–1033
freedom of intimate association, 1118–1119
gender rights, 1185
husband's feudal privileges, 1034, 1035
maximum hours and minimum wages laws, 35–36, 797, 1764
Seneca Falls Convention, 2365–2366
Supreme Court justices, 1195–1197, 1841–1846
Truth's contributions, 2736
woman suffrage movement, 2918–2919
See also Marriage and the Constitution; Race and sex in antidiscrimination law; Reproductive autonomy; Sex discrimination
Women's rights movement. See Feminist theory; Gender rights; Woman suffrage movement
Women's suffrage. See Woman suffrage; Woman suffrage movement Workers' compensation legislation, 2924–2925
and commerce clause, 456
graduated scale of compensation, 1804
Pitney and, 1911
Workplace harassment and the First Amendment, 2925–2926 (I), 2926 (II)
employee speech rights (private), 891, 2925
and freedom of speech, 1136
and hate speech, 1278
sexual harassment as Title VII violation, 100–101, 1722
World Trade Organization, 1766
World War I, 2926–2929
Budget and Accounting Act following, 261 clear and present danger doctrine, 1299, 1955
commerce clause use, 2481
conscription, 506, 2356–2357, 2927
conspiracy cases, 708
criminal syndicalism laws, 723–724
as declared war, 755, 1998
espionage, 2351
Espionage Act, 15–16, 751, 923–924
and First Amendment rights, 1049–1050, 1126, 2901, 2928
free speech cases, 1606–1607
Lever Food and Drug Control Act, 1605
loyalty-security programs, 1649
nativism, 1329
political trials, 1954, 1955
seditious libel, 2353
Selective Service Act, 2927
war powers, 2841, 2927–2929
Wilson (Woodrow) policies, 2911–2912, 2927, 2928
World War II, 2929–2931
alien detentions, 65
Bracero Program, 1330
conscientious objection, 505
conscription, 506, 2357
as declared war, 755, 1998
Emergency Price Control Act, 887, 2937

World War II (continued) group libel statutes following, 1235
habeas corpus suspension, 1246, 1247
Haupt v. United States, 1279 international human rights inception, 1387
Japanese American cases, 65, 129–130, 132, 1241, 1415–1417, 2290, 2930–2931
legislative investigation, 1595
loyalty-security programs, 1649, 2581
political trials, 1954
postwar Marshall Plan, 1687 presidential broad war powers, 1998 Roosevelt (Franklin D.) policies, 2290–2291, 2841, 2929–2931
segregation, 2355
Senate bipartisanship, 2360
as social change agent, 2390 subversive advocacy cases, 2580, 2581
treason cases, 2931
U.S. constitutional influence on occupation of Germany and Japan, 1365, 1367
war powers, 2841
War Powers Acts, 2844–2845
World Wide Web. See Internet Writ of assistance. See Assistance, writ of Writ of certiorari. See Certiorari, writ of Writ of error. See Error, writ of Writ of habeas corpus. See Habeas corpus Writ of prohibition. See Prohibition, writ of Writs of assistance. See Paxton's Case

Y

Yellow dog contract, 2939
Coppage v. Kansas, 2900
Erdman Act prohibiting, 25, 1547, 2939 injunction as enforcement, 1292
Norris-LaGuardia Act, 596
upheld, 684
Youth curfew laws. See Juvenile curfew laws

Z

Zenger's case, 2944
freedom of the press, 1138
jury nullification, 1512
seditious libel, 2352–2353
Zoning, 2944–2945, 2946–2947 (update) adult bookstore, 2317
adult movie theaters, 1054, 1057, 1133, 2199, 2529, 2940
controls, 2644
family-based restrictions, 973, 1124
First Amendment and, 2317
grandfather clause, 1219–1220
Penn Central Transportation Co. v. New York City, 1893, 2946 racial exclusionary, 2219, 2220–2221, 2222, 2354, 2484 rational basis review, 428, 2022
regulatory takings, 2150, 2151
Rehnquist Court rulings, 381
state police power, 2510
See also Restrictive covenant